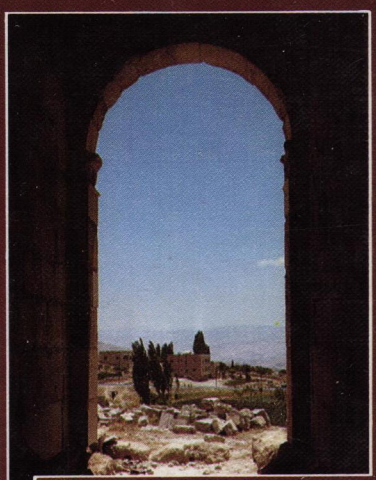
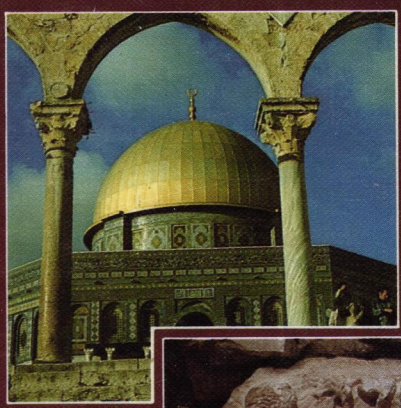
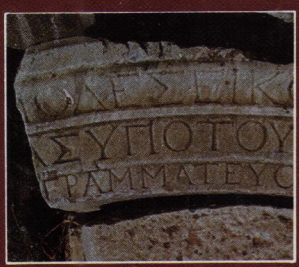
The Zondervan

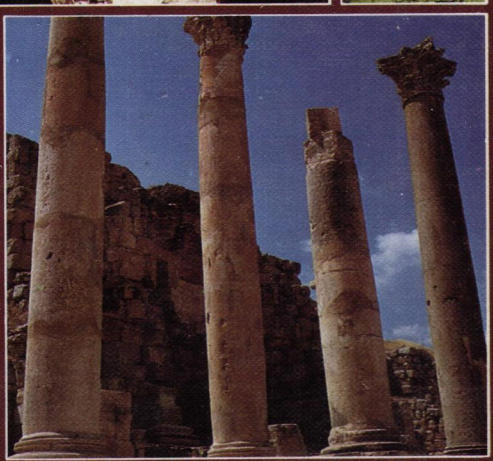
PICTORIAL BIBLE DICTIONARY

More than 5,000 entries, nearly 1,000,000 words, up-to-date and complete in one volume. More than 700 photos, charts and drawings.









Merrill C. Tenney

GENERAL EDITOR, with the assistance of a staff of 65 leading scholars and experts in various fields.

The Zondervan PICTORIAL BIBLE DICTIONARY

The Zondervan Pictorial Bible Dictionary is designed to provide quick access to information about the Bible in both words and pictures.

The more than 5,000 entries include discussions of historical, geographical, chronological, and biographical aspects of the Bible; as well as articles on theological subjects.

More than 700 pictures shed further light on many topics.

The spelling of names of persons and places has been taken from the King James Version; alternative spellings found in the American Standard Version and in the Revised Standard Version have also been noted.

CHRISTIANITY TODAY: "The high tone of the work and the excellent illustrations will make this a prized volume."

DR. FRANK E. GAEBELEIN, Late Headmaster, Stony Brook School: "A first-rate reference work."

DR. BILLY GRAHAM: "It's great! I use it all the time."

DR. PAUL S. REES: "Concise, comprehensive, and colorful . . . will appeal to a wide range of readers. A reference work deserving of high praise."

Dr. Merrill C. Tenney, General Editor, was Professor of Theological Studies, Graduate School of Theology, Wheaton College, and the author of several scholarly books on the Bible and theology.

Preface

Robert A. Millikan, American physicist and Nobel prizewinner, once said that a knowledge of the Bible is an indispensable qualification of a well-educated man. No other single book in the history of literature has been so widely distributed or read, or has exercised so powerful an influence upon civilization. It is the fountainhead of Western culture, and is the sole source of spiritual life and revelation for all Christians. For the development of Christian experience and for the propagation of faith, a study of the Scriptures is absolutely necessary. The history, laws, prophecies, sermons and letters which they contain provide God's estimate of man and His disclosure of Himself through the historic process of revelation culminating in the person of His Son, Jesus Christ.

Understanding the Bible is often difficult for the average reader because of the unfamiliar names of persons, places and objects to which it alludes. The historical and cultural backgrounds are alien to those of the modern day, and presuppose knowledge that is not easily attainable. The function of a Bible dictionary is to render accessible a body of information which will enable one to comprehend the meaning of the text he is reading, and to obtain ready and complete data concerning any related subject.

Within recent years, the need for a new, up-to-date reference work has become increasingly urgent. Fresh discoveries in archaeology, better understanding of the history and geography of the Middle East, and the fruit of multiplied research have provided new insights and interpretations. The advance of the graphic arts has improved greatly the effectiveness of photography, so that the artifacts and inscriptions of the past can be reproduced vividly for public exhibition. Realizing the opportunity for a fresh venture in this field, the Zondervan Publishing House, inspired by the interest and foresight of Mr. Peter deVisser, Director of Publications, has undertaken the task of creating a totally new dictionary, enlisting the cooperation of sixty-five competent scholars in every field from archaeology to zoology. The content includes more than five thousand entries, among which may be found a number of important monographs on Biblical and theological topics. In addition, the dictionary contains an extensive series of articles on Christian doctrines.

This Pictorial Bible Dictionary is a completely new, fully illustrated one-volume work. It is designed to provide quick access to explanatory data, both by the verbal exposition of biographical, chronological, geographical and historical aspects of the Bible, and by the illustrations related to them. The pictures have been selected for their relevance to the subject matter, for their historical value, and also with an eye to human interest.

The scope of a one-volume dictionary is necessarily limited. The articles are not intended to be exhaustive, nor are they planned primarily for professional scholars. They are gauged for the use of pastors, Sunday-school teachers, Bible class leaders and students who desire concise and accurate information on questions raised by ordinary reading. For intensive research, a more detailed and critical work is recommended.

Although the articles are written from a conservative viewpoint, each writer has been free to express his own opinions and is responsible for the material that appears over his signature. There may be minor disagreements between statements by different persons; in such instances there is room for debate, and the contributors have liberty to differ. Uncertainty still exists in some fields, since sufficient data are not available for final conclusions.

While the writers are indebted to many sources, no previously published work has been incorporated in these pages. The pictures have been taken chiefly from recent photographs, and are not old reprints. No expense has been spared to prepare the best possible aid for the Bible student.

In the matter of illustrations, special thanks are due Mr. and Mrs. G. Eric Matson of the Matson Photo Service, Los Angeles, formerly of the American Colony in Jerusalem, for placing at our disposal their vast and unsurpassed collection of photographs gathered in a lifetime career of professional photography in the Bible lands. We wish herewith also to thank all organizations and individuals who have extended their help in supplying photos and illustrations, including: the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago; the British Museum of London; the University Museum of Pennsylvania; the Radio Times Hulton Picture Library of London; Dr. Edward F. Campbell, Jr., Editor of The Biblical Archaeologist; the American Schools of Oriental Research; the University of Michigan Library; Dr. John F. Walvoord and Dr. Merrill F. Unger of Dallas Theological Seminary; Dr. and Mrs. Henry H.

Halley of Chicago; Dr. Siegfried H. Horn of Andrews University, and others.

A complete bibliography of all sources of information would obviously be impossible. Selected references have been appended to major articles in order to afford opportunity for further research.

Names of persons and places, for the most part, have been taken from the King James Version, which is still more widely read than any other, but variants occurring in the American Standard Version and in the Revised Standard Version have been noted. Pronunciation follows the practice of the unabridged second edition of Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language. All Hebrew and Greek names, as well as other names and terms, are followed by their English pronunciations in parentheses. Transliterated Hebrew and Greek words appear in italics, with their meaning when it can be identified. A list of symbols and abbreviations appears on pages xiii and xiv.

Special acknowledgments are due to Dr. Steven Barabas, Associate Editor, who collaborated in preparing articles for publication, and who contributed many himself; to Dr. E. M. Blaiklock, Professor Wick Broomall, Dr. Howard Z. Cleveland, the Rev. Charles Cook, Dr. Carl DeVries, the Rev. Arthur B. Fowler, the Rev. J. P. Freeman, Dr. Guy B. Funderburk, the Rev. Clyde E. Harrington, Dr. D. Edmund Hiebert, the Rev. John G. Johansson, the Rev. Brewster Porcella, Professor Arthur M. Ross, Dr. Emmet Russell, and Dr. Walter Wessel, who, in addition to the initialed articles published under their names contributed many of the unsigned articles; to Miss Verda Bloomhuff and the Rev. Briggs P. Dingman, who assisted in correction of copy and proof; and to Mrs. Carol Currie and Mrs. Alice Holmes for invaluable secretarial service. The General Editor wishes to express his gratitude to all those scholars named in the list of contributors who have lent their time and counsel to the production of this book.

Frontispiece: The famous Wailing Wall, or Wailing Place, at Jerusalem, where Jews gather each year to mourn the lost glory of ancient Israel and to observe the destruction of the Temple. Solomon's Temple was destroyed by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. and Herod's Temple by the Romans in 70 A.D. This wall is a section of the west wall of the Dome of the Rock, the mosque that now stands on the temple site, and which wall is believed to be composed of stones taken from the ruins of Herod's Temple when the mosque was built. The wall is also sometimes called Solomon's Wall, because traditionally these same stones are thought to have been part of the original Temple of Solomon. © MPS

AARON (ăr'ŭn, Heb. 'ahărôn, meaning undetermined), the oldest son of Amram and Jochebed, of the tribe of Levi, and brother of Moses and Miriam (Num. 26:59, Exod. 6:20). He was born during the captivity in Egypt, before Pharaoh's edict that all male infants should be destroyed, and was three years older than Moses (Exod. 7:7). His name first appears in God's commission to Moses (Exod. 4:14). When Moses objected that he did not possess sufficient ability in public speaking to undertake the mission to Pharaoh, God replied: "Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. . . . And thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people: and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God" (Exod. 4:14-16). In accordance with this command he met Moses in "the mount of God" after forty years' separation, and took him back to the family home in Goshen. Aaron introduced him to the elders of the people, and persuaded them to accept him as their leader. Together Moses and Aaron proceeded to Pharaoh's court, where they carried on the negotiations that finally brought the end of the oppression of the Israelites and the exodus from Egypt.

During Moses' forty years in the wilderness Aaron had married Elisheba or Elizabeth, daughter of Amminadab, and sister of Naashon, a prince of the tribe of Judah (Exod. 6:23, I Chron. 2:10). They had four sons: Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

Upon leaving Egypt, Aaron assisted his brother during the wandering in the wilderness. On the way to Sinai, in the battle with Amalek, Aaron and Hur held up Moses' hands (Exod. 17:9-13) in which was the rod of God, and Israel consequently won the battle. With the establishment of the tabernacle, Aaron became high priest in charge of the national worship, and the head of the hereditary priesthood.

In character he was weak and occasionally jealous. He and Miriam criticized Moses for having married an Ethiopian (Cushite) woman, outside the nation of Israel, and complained that Moses was not God's sole spokesman (Num. 12:1,2). When Moses went up onto Mt. Sinai to receive the tables of the law from God, Aaron acceded to the people's demand for a visible god that they could worship. Taking their personal jewelry, he melted it in a furnace and made a golden calf similar to the familiar bull-god of Egypt. The people hailed this image as the god who had brought them out of Egypt. Aaron did not remonstrate with them, but built an altar and proclaimed a feast to Jehovah on the morrow, which the people celebrated with revelry and debauchery (Exod. 32:1-6). When Moses returned from the mountain and rebuked Aaron for aiding this abuse, he made the naive answer: "They gave it (the gold) to me, and I threw it into the fire, and there came out this calf" (Exod. 32:24). It may be that Aaron meant to restrain the people by a compromise, but he was wholly unsuccessful.

When the revelation of the pattern for worship in the Tabernacle was completed two months later, Aaron and his sons were consecrated to the priesthood (Lev. 8:1 — 9:22). The consecration involved three offerings: a sin-offering to express cleansing and reconciliation; a burnt-offering of consecration to God; and a meat-offering or food-offering without blood, consisting of flour, salt, oil, and frankincense, representing the giving of worship and thanks to God. Aaron was invested with the clothes of his office: the robes "for glory and for beauty," breastplate, ephod, robe, embroidered coat, mitre (or turban), and girdle or sash, and linen drawers (Exod. 28). The final act of the ceremony was anointing him with holy oil, as a symbol of the grace and Spirit of God, equipping him with special power. Aaron immediately offered sacrifice and blessed the people, and the divine acceptance of his ministry was marked by fire from the Lord which consumed the offering laid upon the altar.

At the end of the wilderness wandering Aaron was warned of his impending death. He and Moses went up onto Mt. Hor, where he was stripped of his priestly robes, which passed in succession to his son, Eleazar. He died at the age of 123, and was buried in the mountain (Num. 20:22-29, 33:38, Deut. 10:6, 32:50). The people mourned for him thirty days.

The Psalms speak of the priestly line as the "house of Aaron" (Pss. 115:10,12, 118:3, 135:19), and he is mentioned in the book of Hebrews as a type of Christ who was "called of God as was Aaron" (Heb. 5:4,5), though the eternal priesthood of Christ is stated explicitly to be patterned on the order of Melchizedek and not on that of Aaron (Heb. 7:11). S.B.

AARONITES (âr'ŭn-īts), descendants of Aaron who fought with David against Saul (I Chron. 12:27). They were distinguished from the general tribe of Levites (I Chron. 27:17).

AB (ăb), the fifth month of the Hebrew year, coinciding approximately with early August (Num. 33:38).

ABADDON (ȧ-băd'ŭn, Heb. 'ăvaddôv, ruin, perdition, destruction), occurs six times in the OT (Job 26:6; 28:22; 31:12; Prov. 15:11; 27:20; Ps. 88:11). In Job 31:12 it has the general meaning of "ruin," "destruction." In three instances (Job 26:6; Prov. 15:11; 27:20) the word is parallel with Sheol, the abode of the dead. In Job 28:22 it means "death." In Ps. 88:11 it is synonymous with the grave. The word is found once in the New Testament (Rev. 9:11), where its Greek equivalent is Apollyon, the angel who reigns over the infernal regions. The Prince of Darkness is known under the name of Apollyon in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

ABAGTHA (ȧ-băg'thȧ, Heb. 'ăvaghethā'), one of the seven eunuchs who served King Ahasuerus as chamberlains (Esth. 1:10). The king had the eunuchs bring Queen Vashti before him. Oriental kings customarily had eunuchs to supervise their harems.

ABANA (ȧ-băn'ȧ, Heb. 'ăvānâ, KJV, ASV Abanah, m. Amanah, RSV Abana, m. Amana), the name of a river that flows through Damascus. Mentioned in the Bible only in II Kings 5:12, where Naaman says, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?" It was called by the Greeks the Chrysorrhoas ("golden stream"), and is the same as the modern Barada. Beginning about twenty-three miles NW of Damascus, in the Anti-Lebanon Mountains, it flows through Damascus, making the city, though bordering on a desert, one of the loveliest and most fertile on earth. It divides into nine or ten branches, and spreads out like an open fan into the plain east of Damascus.

ABARIM (ăb'ȧ-rĭm, Heb. 'avārîm, those beyond, or on the other side), either the region east of the Jordan or the name of a mountain range NW of Moab. The Israelites encamped here just before crossing the Jordan, and from one of its peaks Moses saw the Promised Land (Num. 27:12).

ABBA (ăb'ȧ, Heb. 'abbā'), Aramaic word for father, transliterated into Greek and thence into English. The corresponding Hebrew word is Ab. Found three times in the NT (Mark 14:36; Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6).

ABDA (ăb'dȧ, Heb. 'avdā', probably servant of God). 1. the father of Adoniram (I Kings 4:6);

2. a Levite, the son of Shammua (Neh. 11:17), called "Obadiah the son of Shemaiah" (I Chron. 9:16).

ABDEEL (ăb'dē-ĕl, Heb. 'avde'ēl, servant of God), the father of Shelemiah, ordered by King Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah the prophet and his scribe Baruch (Jer. 36:26).

ABDI (ăb'dī. Heb. 'avdî, probably servant of Jehovah). 1. A Levite, father of Kishi or Kish; the grandfather of David's singer Ethan (I Chron. 6:44). It is uncertain whether the Abdi of II Chron. 29:12 is the same man.

2. One of the sons of Elam who in Ezra's time had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:26).

ABDIEL (ăb'dī-ĕl, Heb. 'avdî'ēl, servant of God), a Gadite who lived in Gilead (I Chron. 5:15).

ABDON (ăb'dŏn, Heb. 'avdôn, meaning uncertain; may be servant, service, or servile). 1. One of the judges of Israel — the eleventh one mentioned. Nothing is said about his rule except that he judged Israel for eight years (Judg. 12:13-15). Josephus says (Ant. V 7, 15) that his reign was a peaceful one, and therefore "he had no occasion to perform glorious actions."

2. One of the sons of Shashak, a Benjamite, living in Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:23, 28).

3. The son of Jeiel of Gibeon (I Chron. 8:30; 9:35, 36).

4. An official of King Josiah, sent by him to Huldah the prophetess (II Chron. 34:20; called Achbor in II Kings 22:12).

ABDON (City), one of four Levitical cities in the tribe Asher (Josh. 21:30; I Chron. 6:74). It may be the same as "Hebron" in Joshua 19:28. Now called Abdeh, near the Mediterranean and about 15 miles S of Tyre.

ABEDNEGO (ȧ-bĕd'nē-gō, Heb. 'ăvēdhneghô', servant of Nego), one of the three Hebrews (Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego) whom Daniel requested be appointed over the affairs of the province of Babylon. The three were later saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. 1:7; 3:12-30).

ABEL (ā'bĕl, Heb. hevel, etymology uncertain; several meanings have been suggested: breath, transitoriness, suggestive of his brief life; shepherd, herdman, and son). Adam's second son, murdered by his brother Cain (Gen. 4). "Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of ground" (Gen. 4:2). Here are represented the two basic pursuits of civilized life, the agricultural and the pastoral. Abel is described as a righteous man (Matt. 23:35). He offered to God a lamb from his flock, which was accepted; while Cain's offer of the fruit of the ground was rejected. The reason for the divine preference is not given. The Scriptures do not say specifically that it was because of a difference in the material of the sacrifice. Hebrew law and custom allowed for both kinds. It may be that God had made known that a sacrifice involving the shedding of blood would alone be acceptable to Him and that Cain had defiantly decided to disregard God's will. On the other hand, it may have been the disposition of the offerer, not the outward offering, that God regarded. We read that Cain's "works were evil, and his brother's righteous" (I John 3:12). S.B.

ABEL (ā'bĕl, Heb. 'āvēl, a meadow). 1. The name of a city involved in the rebellion of Sheba (II Sam. 20:14, 18); the same as Abel-beth-maacah (II Sam. 20:15).

2. In I Samuel 6:18 KJV, "the great stone of Abel" should probably be "stone."

ABEL-BETH-MAACHA (ā'bĕl-bĕth-mā'ȧ-kȧ, Heb. 'āvēl bêth ma'ăkhâh), and Abel of Beth-Maacah, in KJV written "Maachah"; Abel, i.e. meadow, near Beth-maacah. A town in the extreme north of Palestine, probably about twelve miles north of Lake Huleh, in the tribe of Naphtali (II Sam. 20:15; I Kings 15:20). Sheba, son of Bichri, fled to it when his revolt against David failed. The town was saved from assault by Joab when, with its proverbial shrewdness, it followed the advice of a "wise woman" that it sacrifice Sheba (II Sam. 20:14-22). About 80 years later it was seized by Benhadad (I Kings 15:20), and in 734 B. C. by Tiglath-pileser, who captured it and carried off its inhabitants to Assyria (II Kings 15:29).

ABEL-CHERAMIM (ā'bĕl-kĕr-ȧ-mĭm, Heb. 'avēl-kerāmîm, meadow of vineyards), a place in Ammon, east of the Jordan, to which Jephthah pursued the Ammonites (Judg. 11:33).

ABEL-MAIM (ā'bĕl-mā'ĭm, Heb. 'āvēl mayim, meadow of waters), a variant of Abel-beth-maacah (II Chron. 16:4).

ABEL-MEHOLAH (ā'bĕl-mē-hō'lȧ, meadow of dancing), a town, not exactly identifiable, but probably in the Jordan valley, where Elisha was born and lived. The Midianites routed by Gideon fled to its environs (Judg. 7:22).

ABEL-MIZRAIM (ā'bĕl-mĭz'rā-ĭm, Heb. 'āvēl-mitsrayim, meadow or mourning of Egypt), a place east of the Jordan at which the funeral cortege of Jacob stopped to mourn for seven days before entering Canaan to bury the patriarch (Gen. 50: 11). It had been called the "threshing floor of Atad," but the Canaanites now called it the "mourning of Egypt," or the "funeral from Egypt," very likely because the princes and chief men of Egypt, with their chariots and horsemen, took part in the funeral rites.

ABEL-SHITTIM (ā'bĕl-shĭt'ĭm, Heb. 'āvēl ha-shittîm, acacia-meadow), a locality in the plains of Moab where Israel rested for the last time before crossing the Jordan (Num. 33:49).

ABEL THE GREAT. In I Samuel 6:18 the Hebrew text has "Abel," and is so translated by the KJV. The LXX reads Eben, meaning "stone," which is followed by the ASV and the RSV.

ABEZ (ā'bĕz). Used in KJV for Ebez. A town, mentioned in Joshua 19:20, found in Issachar.

ABI (ā'bī, Heb. 'ăvî), the mother of King Hezekiah, spoken of also as the daughter of Zechariah. The name is a contraction of Abijah (II Kings 18:2; II Chron. 29:1).

ABIA (ȧ-bī'ȧ), a variant for Abijah.

ABIASAPH (ȧ-bī'ă-săf, Heb. 'ăvî'āsāph, the father gathers, or adds), a descendant of Levi through Korah (Exod. 6:24).

ABIATHAR (ȧ-bī'ă-thȧr, Heb. 'evîāthār, father of abundance), the son of Ahimelech, the high priest, who with 84 priests was slain by Saul at Nob, on Doeg's telling the king that Ahimelech had inquired of the Lord for David and had given him the shewbread and the sword of Goliath (I Sam. 22). Abiathar escaped, bringing the ephod with him, and joined David (I Sam. 22:20-23). Abiathar and Zadok apparently shared the high priesthood between them when David ordered the ark to be brought to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:11). It may be that Saul had appointed Zadok high priest after the murder of Abimelech. The two men are mentioned together as high priests a number of times in the story of the rebellion of Absalom (II Sam. 15:24ff.).

Abiathar rendered David loyal service during Absalom's rebellion (II Sam. 15; 17:15; 19:11), but he joined Adonijah when the latter sought to seize the throne from Solomon (I Kings 1:7).

After Solomon's accession to the throne Abiathar again favored Adonijah, and for this the king deprived him of the high priesthood and banished him to his estate at Anathoth. Zadok became sole high priest (I Kings 2:26, 35). I Kings 4:4 still refers to Abiathar as being priest with Zadok, but this may refer to the period just before he was deposed. With the deposition of Abiathar, the rule of the house of Eli came to an end, as had been foretold 150 years before (I Sam. 2:31-35). Jesus refers to Abiathar in Mark 2:26. S.B.

ABIB (ā'bĭb, Heb. 'āvîv, an ear of corn), the preexilic name for the first month of the year (Exod. 13:4; 23:15; 34:18). After the exile the name was changed to Nisan. It fell about the time of our March and early April.

ABIDA (ȧ-bī'dȧ, Heb. 'ăvîdhā', the father knows), appears as Abidah in KJV (Gen. 25:4). A son of Midian and grandson of Abraham and Keturah Gen. 25:4; I Chron. 1:33).

ABIDAN (ȧ-bī'dăn, Heb. 'ăvîdhān, the father is judge), a prince of the tribe of Benjamin chosen to represent his tribe at the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. 1:11; 2:22). He was present at the dedication of the tabernacle, making an offering as one of the heads of Israel (Num. 7:60, 65).

ABIEL (ā'bī-ĕl, Heb. 'ăvî'ēl, the father is God, or God is father). 1. The grandfather of Saul and Abner (I Sam. 9:1; 14:51).

2. One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:32), also called Abi-Albon (II Sam. 23:31).

ABIEZER (ā'bī-ē'zêr, Heb. 'ăvî'ezer, father of help, or father is help). 1. A descendant of Joseph the son of Jacob who became head of one of the families of Manasseh. The judge Gideon belonged to this family (Judg. 6:11f; 8:2, 32). In Numbers 26:30 the form is Iezer (in KJV Jeezer).

2. One of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:27; I Chron. 11:28; 27:12).

ABIGAIL (ăb'ī-gāl, Heb. 'ăvîghayil, father is rejoicing). 1. The wife of Nabal, and, after his death, of David (I Sam. 25:3, 14-44; 27:3; II Sam. 3:3), to whom she bore his second son, Chileab (II Sam. 3:3, or Daniel, as in I Chron. 3:1).

2. A sister of David, daughter of Nahash, and mother of Amasa, commander of David's army (I Chron. 2:16).

ABIHAIL (ăb'ī-hāl, Heb. 'ăvîhayil, the father is strength). 1. A Levite, the father of Zuriel, who in the wilderness was the head of the house of Merari (Num. 3:25).

2. The wife of Abishur, of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:29).

3. A Gadite who lived in Gilead of Bashan (I Chron. 5:14).

4. The wife of Rehoboam, king of Judah. She was a daughter of Eliab, David's eldest brother (II Chron. 11:18).

5. The father of Queen Esther (Esther 2:15, 9:29).

ABIHU (ȧ-bī'hū, Heb. 'ăvîhû', the father is he), second son of Aaron (Exod. 6:23). With Aaron, Nadab his brother, and the 70 elders he went with Moses up Sinai for a limited distance (Exod. 24:1). He and Nadab were slain by Jehovah when they offered strange fire (Lev. 10).

ABIHUD (ȧ-bī'hŭd, Heb. 'ăvîhûdh, the father is majesty), the son of Bela, the eldest son of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:3).

ABIJAH (ȧ-bī'jȧ, Heb. 'ăvîyâh or 'ăvîyāhû, Jehovah is Father). 1. The wife of Judah's grandson Hezron (I Chron. 2:24).

2. The seventh son of Becher the son of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:8).

3. The second son of the prophet Samuel. Appointed a judge by his father; he became corrupt (I Sam. 8:2; I Chron. 6:28).

4. A descendant of Aaron. The ancestral head of the eighth of the 24 groups into which David had divided the priests (I Chron. 24:10). The father of John the Baptist belonged to this group (Luke 1:5).

5. A son of Jeroboam I of Israel (I Kings 14:1-18). He died from illness when still a child, in fulfillment of a prediction by the prophet Ahijah, to whom the queen had gone in disguise to inquire the issue of the child's illness. The death was a judgment for the apostasy of Jeroboam.

6. King of Judah, the son and successor of Rehoboam. He made war on Jeroboam in an effort to recover the ten tribes of Israel. In a speech before an important battle, in which his army was greatly outnumbered, he appealed to Jeroboam not to oppose the God of Israel, for God had given the kingdom to David and his sons forever. Abijah gained a decisive victory. Prosperity tempted him to multiply wives and to follow the evil ways of his father. He reigned three years. (II Chron. 12:16; 13; 14:1.)

7. A priest of Nehemiah's time (Neh. 10:7; 12:4,17).

8. The mother of Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:1), called Abi in II Kings 18:2.

9. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4,7).

ABILENE (ăb'ī-lēn, Gr. Abilené, probably from Heb., meadow), a tetrarchy near Anti-Lebanon. Luke 3:1 mentions it as the tetrarchy of Lysanias when John the Baptist began his ministry. Its capital Abela was about 18 miles NW of Damascus. In 37 A.D. the tetrarchy, with other territories, was given to Agrippa, and when he died in 44 A.D. it was administered by procurators until 53 A.D., when the emperor of Rome conferred it upon Agrippa II; and upon his death, toward the end of the century, it was made a part of the province of Syria.

ABIMAEL (ȧ-bĭm'ā-ĕl, Heb. 'ăvîmā'ēl, God is Father), the ninth of the 13 sons or descendants of Joktan, who was descended from Shem (Gen. 10:28; I Chron. 1:22).

ABIMELECH (ȧ-bĭm'ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ăvîmelekh, probably either the father is king or the father of a king). 1. A Philistine king of Gerar, near Gaza. It was at his court that Abraham tried to pass off Sarah as his sister. Struck by her beauty, Abimelech married her, but returned her to Abraham when he was warned by God in a dream (Gen. 20:1-18). Later, the two men made a covenant, when their servants contended over a well (Gen. 21:22-34).

2. A second king of Gerar, probably the son of the one mentioned in 1, at whose court Isaac tried to pass off his wife Rebekah as his sister (Gen. 26:1-11). He upbraided Isaac when the falsehood was detected. Later, their servants quarreled and a covenant was made between them, as had been done between Abraham and the first Abimelech.

3. The son of Gideon by a concubine (Judg. 8:31,9:1-57). After the death of his father, aspiring to be king, he slew 70 sons of his father. Only one son, Jotham, escaped. He was then made king of Shechem. After a reign of three years, an insurrection broke out against him. He captured and completely destroyed the city. Later, at the siege of Thekez, into which the defeated rebels from Shechem had fled, he was severely wounded by a mill-stone dropped from a wall on his head by a woman, and ordered his armorbearer to kill him with his sword, lest it be said to his shame that he was killed by a woman.

4. A Philistine king mentioned in the title of Psalm 34, who very likely is the same as Achish, king of Gath (I Sam. 21:10-22:1), with whom David sought refuge when he fled from Saul. It is possible that Abimelech was a royal title of Philistine kings, and not a personal name.

5. A priest in the days of David, a son of Abiathar (I Chron. 18:16); also called Ahimelech (LXX and in I Chron. 24:6). S.B.

ABINADAB (ȧ-bĭn'ȧ-dăb, Heb. 'ăvînādhāv, the father is generous). 1. A man living in Kiriath-jearim to whose home the ark was brought from the land of the Philistines. About a century later David removed the ark to Jerusalem (I Sam. 7:1,2; II Sam. 6:3; I Chron. 13:7).

2. The second of the eight sons of Jesse. He was in Saul's army when Goliath gave his challenge (I Sam. 16:8; 17:13; I Chron. 2:13).

3. A son of Saul, killed with his father by the Philistines at Mt. Gilboa (I Sam. 17:13; 31:2; I Chron. 8:33; 9:39; 10:2).

4. The father of a son-in-law of Solomon (I Kings 4:11).

ABINOAM (ȧ-bĭn'o-ăm, Heb. 'ăvînō'am, the father is pleasantness), the father of Barak (Judg. 4:6; 5:12).

ABIRAM (ȧ-bī'răm, Heb. 'ăvîrām, the father is exalted). 1. A Reubenite who with his brothers Dathan and Korah conspired against Moses and was destroyed by God (Num. 16).

2. The eldest son of Hiel the Bethelite, who rebuilt Jericho (I Kings 16:34).

ABISHAG (ăb'ī-shăg, Heb. 'ăvîshagh, the father wanders, or errs). A Shunamite woman who nursed David in his old age (I Kings 1:3,15). Adonijah's request to marry her after David's death caused Solomon to put him to death (I Kings 2:17ff.).

ABISHAI (ȧ-bĭsh'ā-ī, Heb. 'ăvîshay, meaning is doubtful). Son of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Asahel. He was impetuous and courageous, cruel and hard to his foes; but always intensely loyal to David. He counselled David to kill the sleeping Saul (I Sam. 26:6-9). He aided Joab in the murder of Abner, an act of revenge for the slaying of their brother Asahel (II Sam. 3:30). He was loyal to David when Absalom and Sheba revolted (II Sam. 16:9). He defeated a large army of Edomites (I Chron. 18:12,13). Late in David's life he rescued the king in the fight with Ishbibenob, the Philistine giant (II Sam. 21:17).

ABISHALOM (ȧ-bĭsh'ȧ-lŏm), a variant of Absalom.

ABISHUA (ȧ-bĭsh'ū-ȧ, Heb. 'ăvîshûa', perhaps the father is salvation or noble). 1. The son of Phinehas the priest (I Chron. 6:4,5,50; Ezra 7:5).

2. A Benjamite of the family of Bela (I Chron. 8:4).

ABISHUR (ȧ-bī'shêr, Heb. 'ăvîshûr, the father is a wall), a man of Judah, the son of Shammai (I Chron. 2:28,29).

ABITAL (ȧ-bī'tăl, Heb. 'ăvîtāl, the father is dew), one of the wives of David (II Sam. 3:4; I Chron. 3:3).

ABITUB (ȧ-bī'tŭb, Heb. 'ăvîtûv, the father is goodness), a Benjamite, son of Shaharaim and Hushim (I Chron. 8:8-11).

ABIUD (ȧ-bī-ūd, Gr. Abioúd, probably the Greek form of Abihud), the son of Zerubbabel. Mentioned only in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt. 1:13).

ABLUTION (See Washing)

ABNER (ăb'nêr, Heb. 'avnēr, the father is a lamp). The son of Ner, who was the brother of Kish, the father of King Saul. Abner and Saul were therefore cousins. During the reign of Saul, Abner was the commander-in-chief of his army (I Sam. 14:50). It was Abner who brought David to Saul following the slaying of Goliath (I Sam. 17:55-58). He accompanied Saul in his pursuit of David (I Sam. 26:5ff), and was rebuked by David for his failure to keep better watch over his master (I Sam. 15).

At Saul's death Abner espoused the cause of Saul's house and had Ishbosheth, Saul's son, made king over Israel (II Sam. 2:8). Abner and his men met David's servants in combat by the pool of Gibeon and were defeated with great slaughter. During the retreat from this battle, Abner was pursued by Asahel, Joab's brother, and in self-defense, slew him (II Sam. 2:12-32).

Soon after, Abner and Ishbosheth had a quarrel over Saul's concubine. This resulted in Abner's entering upon negotiations with David to go to his side, and he promised to bring all Israel with him. David graciously received him; but he was not gone for long when Joab heard of the affair, and believing or pretending to believe that Abner had come as a spy, Joab invited him to a friendly conversation and murdered him "for the blood of Asahel his brother."

David sincerely mourned the death of Abner. "Know ye not," he said, "that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" He left it to his successor to avenge Abner's death (I Kings 2:5). S.B.

ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION, meaning the abomination that desolates or appalls. When Daniel, in prophecy, tried to describe an abomination so abhorrent and loathsome to all moral and religious decency as to leave its abode desolate, he used this term (Dan. 9:27; 11:31; 12:11).

The Jews thought that Daniel 11:31 was fulfilled in 186 B.C., when Antiochus Epiphanes the king of Syria erected an idolatrous altar on the altar of the Temple in Jerusalem and sacrificed a pig thereon to the heathen god Jupiter Olympus (I Macc. 1:54; 6:7; II Macc. 6:2; Jos. Antiq. 12:5,4; 7,6).

Many scholars hold that Jesus' prophecy that His followers would see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the Holy Place (Matt. 24:15) was fulfilled when Jerusalem was destroyed in the year 70 A.D., when the Temple was desecrated by Roman soldiers and by Jewish Zealots. Other scholars, however, see in the prophecies of Daniel and of Jesus an eschatological reference, interpreting them to refer to the "man of sin" Paul speaks of in II Thessalonians 2. S.B.

ABRAHAM (ā'brȧ-hăm, Heb. 'avrāhām, the father is high). The son of Terah, and founder of the Hebrew nation. His family, descended from Shem, settled in Ur of the Chaldees. It appears that Terah was an idolater, for Joshua says of him that he "served other gods" (Josh. 24:2). He had three sons—Abraham, Nahor, and Haran.

Abraham was married to his half sister, Sarah. After the death of his brother Nahor, Abraham and his family, including his nephew Lot and his father Terah, left Ur to go to the land of Canaan (Gen. 11:27-31). We are not told the reason for the migration. Stephen, however, says that God had appeared to Abraham before he dwelt in Haran and had told him to leave his country for another land (Acts 7:2-4).

After staying some time in Haran, Abraham, now 75 years old, departed for Canaan, probably by way of Damascus. Not more than a year later he arrived in Canaan, where the Lord assured him in a vision that this was the land his seed would inherit.

A period of wandering, lasting about ten years, followed his entrance into Canaan. Successive stages of the journey are indicated by the mention of Shechem, Bethel, and the Negeb. During a time of famine Abraham went to Egypt, where he was hospitably received by the Pharaoh. Fearful for his life, he represented Sarah as his sister, but was compelled to leave when the Pharaoh learned the truth. In Canaan he and Lot separated because their herdsmen quarrelled. Lot selfishly chose the fertile plain of the Jordan, while Abraham pitched his tent among the oak groves of Mamre, in the hill country near Hebron.

Abraham lived in the hill country at least 15 years. He strengthened his position with the local Amoritish chieftains by uniting with them in the rescue of Lot from an Elamite king. On his return he was blessed by Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem, to whom he gave a tithe of his spoils.

God now renewed His promise of an heir to Abraham; but when no son came, his wife, despairing of having children of her own, suggested that he take as his concubine her maid Hagar. In the eighty-sixth year of his life Hagar bore him Ishmael (Gen. 16). Thirteen years later (Gen. 17:1), God revealed to him that the son of Sarah, and not Ishmael, should be his heir. God now appointed the rite of circumcision as a sign of the covenant made between Him and Abraham. Through the intercession of Abraham, Lot and his family were delivered from the impending destruction of Sodom.

Abraham then moved to the south country (Gen. 20:1), where he lived in a succession of places, for a while among the Philistines in Gerar, with whose king, Abimelech, he and Sarah had an experience similar to an earlier one with the Pharaoh of Egypt.

When Abraham was 100 years old, Isaac was born, an event soon followed by the expulsion of Ishmael (Gen. 21:1-21). Abraham and Abimelech concluded a treaty at Beersheba. Abraham's faith in God's promise met one last severe test when God commanded him to sacrifice his only son. He was saved from doing so by God's gracious substitution of a ram (Gen. 22).

After the death of Sarah, when Abraham was 140 years old, he obtained a wife for Isaac from his own people in Haran; and he married Keturah, by whom he had 6 children. Isaac, however, was left his sole heir. At the age of 175 years he died and was buried beside Sarah (Gen. 25:7-10) in the Cave of Machpelah he had purchased from Ephon (Gen. 23).

Abraham is a significant figure throughout the Bible. He is the progenitor of the people of Israel and the founder of Judaism. He stands out prominently in the Old Testament. In the New Testament there is a wealth of references to him. Paul calls him not only the father of the Jews but of all who believe (Rom. 4:11). He is thus the type of the Christian believer. Repeatedly he is held up as an example of faith at its best. S.B.

ABRAHAM'S BOSOM (Luke 16:22,23), represents blessedness after death. The figure is derived either from the Roman custom of reclining on the left side at meals, Lazarus being in the place of honor at Abraham's right, leaning on his breast; or from its appropriateness as expressing closest fellowship (John 1:18, 13:23). Because Abraham was the founder of the Hebrew nation, to be honored with his intimacy was the highest bliss.

ABRAM (See Abraham)

ABRECH (ăb'rĕk; Gen. 41:43) ASV margin, RSV margin, with note, "Abrek, probably an Egyptian word, similar in sound to the Hebrew word meaning to kneel"; KJV "bow the knee." It was the cry with which Joseph was announced when he appeared in public as second to Pharaoh. The word may have been imported from Assyria by the Hyksos kings, in which case it would be a title like "grand vizier." It is a vivid touch, in which we hear the very shout of the heralds honoring Joseph.

ABRONAH, KJV Ebronah (ā-brō'nà, Heb. 'avrōnâ). A camping place of the Israelites in the wilderness, one march before Eziongeber on the Gulf of Aqabah (Num. 33:34,35). Exact location uncertain. Possible meaning, crossing, ford.

ABSALOM (ăb'sà-lŏm, Heb. 'avshālôm, father (is) peace, written Abishalom in I Kings 15:2,10, meaning my father (is) peace). Third son of David, by Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, a small district NE of Lake Galilee (II Sam. 3:3; I Chron. 3:2). David's eldest son, Absalom's half-brother Amnon, ravished Absalom's sister Tamar (II Sam. 13:1-19), which greatly angered David, but Amnon was not punished (13:21). Absalom nursed his hatred for two years, then treacherously procured Amnon's assassination (13:22-29). Absalom fled to his grandfather and remained with him three years (13:37-39), while David "longed to go forth unto Absalom: for he was comforted concerning Amnon, seeing he was dead." At the end of that time Joab by stratagem induced David to recall Absalom, but David would not see him for two years more (14:1-24). Then Absalom by a trick of his own moved Joab to intercede with the king, and Absalom was restored to favor (14:28, 33).

Meanwhile, "in all Israel there was none to be so much praised as Absalom for his beauty," and for the abundance of his hair (14:25-27). He had three sons and a daughter, whom he named Tamar after his sister. Absalom now began to act like a candidate for the kingship (15:1-6), parading a great retinue, and subtly indicating how he would improve the administration of justice in the interests of the people. In the fortieth year of David's reign, or after forty years (or four, according to the LXX and Syriac versions) Absalom made pretence of a proper motive for visiting Hebron, the former capital of Judah when David began his reign, and Absalom's birthplace (II Sam. 3:2,3). There Absalom proclaimed himself king, and attracted the disaffected to his standard (II Sam. 15:7-14). David at once realized the seriousness of the rebellion and made hasty plans for immediate departure from Jerusalem (15:13-18). It was a sad as well as a hurried flight, marked by partings from friends, the defection of valued counselors such as Ahithophel, and the intense loyalty of men like Zadok and Abiathar the priests, whom David sent back to the capital, that with their sons as messengers they might keep David informed of events. Hushai the Archite also was asked to return and feign loyalty to Absalom, that he might "defeat the counsel of Ahithophel" (15:20-37).

Ahithophel advised Absalom to attack David at once, before he could gather a large following (17:1-4). Hushai advised delay until all the military power of the realm could be gathered under command of Absalom himself, to make sure of having a large enough force to defeat the warlike David and his loyal soldiers (17:5-14). Absalom actually followed a compromise plan. The armies met in the wood of Ephraim, where Absalom's men were disastrously defeated (18:1-8). Absalom, riding on a mule, was caught by his head in the branches of an oak, and the mule going on left him dangling helpless there, where Joab and his men killed him, though David had, in the hearing of the whole army, forbidden anyone to harm his son Absalom. It is thought that his luxuriant hair contributed to his downfall, by becoming entangled in the oak branches. Absalom was buried in a pit, covered with a heap of stones, in the wood where he fell (18:9-17). David's excessive grief over the death of this ungrateful son nearly cost him the loyalty of his subjects (18:33-19:8). Because all his three sons had died, Absalom had raised a "pillar" or monument to himself "in the king's dale." This pillar cannot be identified with the more recent building known as Absalom's tomb, in the valley of the Kidron. The title of Psalm 3 states that David wrote this psalm "when he fled from Absalom his son." The psalm breathes strong trust in God, to whom is ascribed the overthrow of David's enemies. There is no note of vindictiveness, but a sense of sorrow and resignation. E.R.

ABSTINENCE (ăb'stĭ-nĕns). The noun occurs once in KJV (Greek asitía) (Acts 27:21), and means abstinence from food. The verb "abstain" (Greek apéchomai) occurs six times, and means "hold oneself away from." The decree of the Jerusalem council (Acts 15:20,29) commanded abstinence from "meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication," practices abhorrent to Jewish Christians. Paul (I Thess. 4:3) connects abstaining from fornication with sanctification. In I Thessalonians 5:22 he exhorts to abstain from all appearance of evil. In I Timothy 4:3 he refers to false teachers commanding "to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth." In I Peter 2:11, Peter exhorts, "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul."

Abstinence from eating blood antedates the Mosaic law (Gen. 9:4). The life was held to reside in the blood (Lev. 17:11). Israel abstained voluntarily from eating the sinew on the thigh for the reason given in Genesis 32:32. Leviticus 11 defined what animals the children of Israel might not eat, "to make a difference between the unclean and the clean" (v. 47), and to keep Israel separate from other nations. The priests were forbidden to drink wine while they were ministering (Lev. 10:8,9). The Nazarites were to abstain from the fruit of the vine absolutely. The Rechabites took such a vow in deference to their ancestor Jonadab (Jer. 35). God's people are to abstain from participation in idol feasts (Exod. 34:15, Ps. 106:28, I Cor. 8:4-13, Rom. 14:21).

The injunctions regarding drunkenness and sobriety (Eph. 5:18, I Tim. 3:3,8, Tit. 2:2-4, I Cor. 5:11, 6:9,10, etc.) point to the wisdom of total abstinence from alcoholic beverages if one would be at his best for the Lord. They are reënforced by the fact that the believer's body is the temple of of the Holy Spirit (I Cor. 6:19, II Cor. 6:16), and by such words as Colossians 3:17. Paul's advice to Timothy (I Tim. 5:23) sanctions no more than medicinal use of wine mixed with water.

Abstinence is not a virtue in itself, but a means to make virtue possible. E.R.

ABYSS (ȧ-bĭs', Greek ábyssos) means, in the NT, the nether world, prison of disobedient spirits (Luke 8:31, Rev. 9:1,2,11, 11:17, 17:8, 20:1-3), or the world of the dead (Rom. 10:7). Abyss does not occur in KJV, but is translated "deep" in Luke 8:31 and Romans 10:7, "the bottomless pit" elsewhere. ASV has uniformly abyss, and RSV has abyss in Luke 8:31 and Romans 10:7, "the bottomless pit" in Revelation, except 20:3, where "the pit" alone appears.

In classical Greek ábyssos was an adjective meaning "bottomless," applied to the primeval deep of ancient cosmogonies, an ocean surrounding and under the earth. In the LXX it translates Heb. tehôm meaning the primal waters of Genesis 1:2; once the world of the dead (Ps. 71:20). In later Judaism it means also the interior depths of the earth, and the prison of evil spirits.

The use of abyss in Romans 10:7 is parallel with the use of "the lower parts of the earth" in Ephesians 4:9 (see Ps. 106:28). In both, a contrast between the highest heaven and the lowest depth is intended. In Luke 8:31 the demons fear the primal prison deep more than the known depth of the Lake of Galilee. In Revelation the horror of infinite deeps is intensified. E.R.

ACCAD (ăk'ăd, Heb. 'akkadh), one of the cities or districts of Nimrod's kingdom, with Babel, Erech, and Calneh. Babel and Erech are located on or near the lower Euphrates, Erech not far from what was then the head of the Persian Gulf. Calneh, formerly identified with Nippur between Babel and Erech, is now generally thought to be not the name of a city, but a word meaning "all of them," referring to the first three cities. This would leave the capital, Babel, and the chief cities of the northern (Accad) and southern (Erech) districts of Babylonia. The location of Accad is uncertain, though it is thought to be identical with Agade, chief city of a district of the same name in northern Babylonia, which Sargon I, the Semitic conqueror of the Sumerian Accadians, made his capital in 2475 B.C. The kingdom called Nimrod's had evidently fallen into disorder, and Sargon united the warring city-states under his firm rule. With the help of invaders first from the northeast and then from the northwest, Accadian civilization flourished sporadically and precariously until Semitic Amorites from the west founded a dynasty at Babylon about 1894 B.C., whose most illustrious ruler was Hammurabi (1792-1750 B.C.). Sumerian or Accadian civilization now finally came to an end. As Nimrod cannot be certainly identified with any person otherwise known, so Accad remains a shadowy city or region (Gen. 10:10).

ACCHO (ăk'ō, Heb. 'akkô, Judg. 1:31 KJV, in ASV and RSV Acco). The name occurs in some manuscripts and versions of Joshua 19:30. In the NT, Ptolemais; modern Arabic, 'Akka; English, Acre. A seaport, eight miles N of Mt. Carmel, 30 miles south of Tyre. The river Belus flows into the Mediterranean Sea close to the town. Accho was in the portion assigned to the tribe of Asher, but the Hebrews did not drive out the original inhabitants (Judg. 1:31). It received the name Ptolemais from the Ptolemies of Egypt, from whom it was wrested by the Romans. Paul stayed here a day with Christian brethren on his way from Tyre to Caesarea (Acts 21:7). The Crusaders occupied the town and named it St. Jean d'Acre. In modern times it was part of the Turkish Empire, except for a time when it was occupied by Egypt, being restored to the Turks with British help. Today it is in the nation of Israel, opposite the larger city of Haifa.

ACELDAMA (ȧ-sĕl'dȧ-mȧ) KJV, Akeldama (ȧ-kĕl'-dȧ-mȧ) ASV and RSV (Gr. Akeldamá). The field purchased with the money Judas received for betraying Christ (Acts 1:18,19). In Matthew 27:3-10 is a fuller account of the purchase, in which it is said that the priests bought it "to bury strangers in." Acts 1:18,19 is a parenthesis, not part of Peter's speech, but an explanation by Luke. These verses say that Judas "purchased a field with the reward of iniquity." The priests may have bought it in Judas' name, the money being his. The field was called "the place of blood" in Aramaic. Some think the Aramaic word means "field of sleep," or "cemetery," but the meaning "field of blood" is preferable, and appropriate because of Judas' death as described in Acts 1:18 in gruesome detail.

ACHAIA (ȧ-kā'yȧ, Gr. Achaiá). In NT times, a Roman province including the Peloponnesus and northern Greece south of Illyricum, Epirus and Thessaly, which were districts of Macedonia. Macedonia and Achaia generally mean all Greece (Acts 19:21, Rom. 15:26, II Cor. 1:1, I Thess. 1:7,8). In Acts 18:12 Gallio is accurately called "proconsul" (RSV) of Achaia; "deputy" in the KJV; for Claudius had just made Achaia a senatorial province, and the governors of such provinces were called proconsuls, while the governors of imperial provinces were called procurators. Corinth was the capital. In Acts 20:2 "Greece" refers to Achaia. In Romans 16:15 RSV has "Asia" instead of "Achaia," following the best Greek text. Other NT references to Achaia are II Corinthians 9:2 and 11:10.

ACHAICUS (ȧ-kā'ĭ-kŭs, Gr. Achaikós). A Corinthian Christian, named for his country of origin, who accompanied Stephanas and Fortunatus to bring supplies to Paul at Ephesus (I Cor. 16:17-19).

ACHAN (ā'kăn, Heb. 'ākhān), an Israelite whose story is told in Joshua 7. Achan took a garment, silver and gold, part of the spoil of Jericho. Joshua had devoted the metals to God (Josh. 6:17-19). All else was to be destroyed. Because of one man's disobedience Israel was defeated at Ai. God revealed the reason to Joshua. By a process of elimination Achan was found out. He confessed, and he and his family and possessions were brought down to the valley of Achor. The LXX reads, "and all Israel stoned him with stones. And they raised over him a great heap of stones," omitting the destruction of family and goods (Josh. 7:25,26). From this and the confusion of pronouns in the Hebrew text, sometimes "him," sometimes "them," some think that the command in Joshua 7:15 was not fully carried out. But the situation called for complete obedience. Achan is called Achar in I Chronicles 2:7. The Hebrew root of Achan has no known meaning. That of Achar means trouble. Joshua 7:26 says "wherefore the name of that place was called Achor (troubling) unto this day." The chronicler may have changed Achan's name to Achar because of the events of Joshua 7. E.R.

ACHAR (ā'kȧr, Heb. 'ākhār, trouble). The same as Achan (I Chron. 2:7).

ACHAZ (ā'kăz, Gr. Áchaz). The same as Ahaz.

ACHBOR (ăk'bôr, Heb. 'akhbôr, mouse). 1. Father of a king of Edom (Gen. 36:38,39, I Chron. 1:49).

2. A messenger sent by king Josiah to inquire of the Lord concerning the book found by Hilkiah (II Kings 22:12,14; called Abdon in II Chron. 34:20); father of Elnathan (Jer. 26:22; 36:12).

ACHIM (ā'kĭm, Gr. Acheím, from Heb. meaning Jehovah will establish). A descendant of Zerubbabel (Matt. 1:14). One of the ancestors of Christ, after the Babylonian captivity.

ACHISH (ā'kĭsh, Heb. 'ākhîsh). King of Gath, to whom David fled for protection (I Sam. 21:10-15). David becoming fearful, pretended insanity. Achish repulsed him, and David fled. David again seeking refuge with Achish, so behaved as to win his confidence (I Sam. 27:1-12). David consented to join Achish against Israel, but the Philistine lords objected; so Achish sent David away (I Sam. 29:1-11). He may be the same Achish to whom Shimei's servant fled (I Kings 2:39,40).

ACHMETHA (ăk'mē-thȧ, Heb. 'akhmethā'), ancient Ecbatana, modern Hamadân, capital of Media, where, in the reign of Darius, was found the decree of Cyrus authorizing the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem (Ezra 6:2).

ACHOR (ā'kôr, Heb. 'ākhôr, trouble). Valley (Josh. 15:7) where Achan was stoned (Josh. 7:24-26); subject of promises in Isaiah 65:10, Hosea 2:15.

ACHSA (See Achsah)

ACHSAH (āk'sȧ, Heb. 'akhsâ, anklet), daughter of Caleb the son of Jephunneh, who was given in marriage to Othniel, son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, in performance of a promise Caleb had made to give his daughter to him "that taketh Kirjath-sepher." The bride moved her husband to ask her father for a field. It was given him, but Achsah was not satisfied. Out riding one day, she met Caleb, and dismounting, she asked Caleb for springs to water the field. Caleb gave her both the upper and the lower springs. The story is told in charming and picturesque detail in both Joshua 15:16-19 and Judges 1:12-15.

ACHSHAPH (ȧk'shăf, Heb. 'akhshāph), a city (Josh. 11:1) which Joshua captured with its king (Josh. 12:7,20). It is named as being on the border of the lot assigned to Asher (Josh. 19:24,25). Achshaph is now tentatively identified with Tell Keisân, a few miles southeast of Accho (Acre; Ptolemais) and NE of Mt. Carmel.

ACHZIB (ăk'zĭb, Heb. 'akhzîv, a lie). 1. A city of Judah (Josh. 15:44) perhaps Tell el-Beidâ, southwest of Adullam. Called Chezib (Gen. 38:5) and Chozeba (I Chron. 4:22). See Micah 1:14.

2. A town in Asher (Judg. 1:31, Josh. 19:29) on the coast north of Accho. The Hebrews did not drive out the earlier inhabitants. In NT times Ecdippa, modern ez-Zib.

ACRE (ā'kêr). In Isaiah 5:10, Heb. tsemedh, a pair; the amount of land a yoke of oxen could plow in a day. In I Samuel 14:14, Heb. ma'ănâh, a field for plowing by a yoke of oxen (tsemedh).

The Acropolis, civic center of ancient Athens, crowned by the spectacular Parthenon and other temples. At its base are the ruins of the Odeon (music hall) of Herod Atticus. EG

ACROPOLIS (ȧ-krŏp'ō-lĭs, Gr. akrópolis, from ákros, highest, and pólis, city), the upper or higher city, citadel or castle of a Greek municipality; especially the citadel of Athens, where the treasury was. Athens' crowning glory is the Parthenon, the finest exemplar of Greek architecture. During Paul's stay in Athens (Acts 17:15-18:1), "his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." The images of gods and of heroes worshiped as gods filled Athens, and were inescapably conspicuous on the Acropolis. As Paul stood on Mars Hill, before the court of the Areopagus, he could see the temples on the Acropolis directly to the east, and the Agora (market place) below it.

Other NT cities — Corinth, Philippi, Samaria, etc. — each had its own Acropolis, which served as the town's civic and religious center, while the Agora constituted the central shopping plaza of that time.

ACROSTIC (ȧ-krôs'tĭc, Gr. akrostichís, from ákros, topmost, and stíchos, a line of poetry). In the form of acrostic found in OT poetry, each line or stanza begins with a letter of the Heb. alphabet in order. This literary device aided the memory. It is difficult to render in English. Monsignor Knox, The OT in English, (New York, Sheed and Ward, 1950), has tried to, in the passages cited below. English readers who would feel the effect of the Heb. acrostic may consult his translation. Psalms 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 145, Proverbs 31:10-31, Lamentations 1, 2, 4 are nearly regular acrostics. Psalm 119 has 22 sections of 8 verses, each section headed with a letter of the Heb. alphabet. Within the sections, each verse begins with the same letter. Lamentations 3 has groups of 3 lines, each beginning with the same letter. In chapter 5 the poet burst the bonds of the acrostic form, composing freely. Traces of acrostic are in Psalms 9 and 10, which Knox translates as such; possibly Nenemiah 1:2-10, etc. The imperfections of OT acrostics may be due to textual corruptions, or the poet's not adhering strictly to the acrostic form. ACTS OF THE APOSTLES (ȧ-pŏs''lz), the New Testament book which gives the history of early Christianity from the ascension of Christ to the end of two years of Paul's imprisonment in Rome.

I. Title of the book. An early MS has the title "Acts" (Greek práxeis, doings, transactions, achievements). Other early titles are "Acts of Apostles," "The Acts of the Apostles," "Acts of the Holy Apostles," etc. Acts narrates doings and speeches chiefly of Peter and Paul. There is some information about Judas (1:16-20), and the man chosen to succeed him (1:21-26); about John (3:1-4:31, 8:14-17); and James (12:12). The Twelve, except the betrayer, are listed in 1:13. Acts is not a history of all apostles, but a selection from the deeds and words of some who illustrate the progress of first century Christianity in those phases which interested the author, as he was moved by the Holy Spirit. The title "Acts of the Holy Spirit" has often been suggested, and the contents of the book bear out the appropriateness of such a title.

II. Author. Not until A.D. 160-200 do we have positive statements as to the authorship of Acts. From that time onward all who mention the subject agree that the author of the two books dedicated to Theophilus, the Gospel according to Luke, and the Acts of the Apostles, are by "Luke the beloved physician." Only in modern times have there been attempts to ascribe both books to Titus or some other author.

The author indicates that he was a companion of Paul, by writing "we" instead of "they" in recounting events when he was present. Luke joined Paul, Silas, and Timothy at Troas during the second missionary journey and accompanied them to Philippi, but did not go with them when they left there (16:10-17). Luke is next mentioned as being at Philippi toward the end of the third missionary journey, when Paul is about to sail for Palestine with the contributions of the Gentile churches for the poor at Jerusalem (20:4ff., Rom. 15:25ff.). We do not know whether Luke spent all the interval at Philippi. From this point Luke accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 20:5-21:18). Nor do we know how Luke spent the two years during which Paul was imprisoned at Caesarea, but Luke enters the narrative again "when it was determined that we should sail into Italy" (27:1), and continues with him, giving us a vivid account of the voyage to Rome. Acts breaks off abruptly (28:31), at the end of Paul's two years of ministry in the relative freedom of "his own hired house," where he "received all that came unto him, preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him." If a later writer had incorporated these "we" sections, he would have named their author to enhance their authority. But the style of the "we" passages cannot be distinguished from the style of the rest of Acts, nor from that of the Gospel according to Luke. The author of Luke and Acts is the author of the "we" sections of Acts, and a companion of Paul.

The question remains: Which of the companions of Paul is the author? He cannot be one of those named in the "we" sections as distinct from the author. He is not likely to have been one of those named in Paul's epistles written at times other than those included in the "we" sections. Of those named in Paul's letters written when the "we" author might have been with Paul, early Christian writers chose "Luke, the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14). Luke is not otherwise prominent in the NT. Why should he have been chosen, unless he was the right one? The medical language in Acts is not sufficient to prove that the author was a physician, but it is sufficient to confirm other evidence to that effect. Luke was with Paul shortly before his expected death (II Tim. 4:11).

Luke cannot be certainly identified with Lucius of Acts 13:1 or with Lucius of Romans 16:21. There is wide and ancient support for connecting Luke with Antioch in Syria. It is not probable that he was from Philippi. The tradition that he was a painter cannot be traced earlier than the tenth century. From II Corinthians 8:18 it is possible that Titus was Luke's brother, and that Luke was "the brother, whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches." Titus and Luke are named together in II Timothy 4:10,11. The conjecture that Luke was the "man of Macedonia" of Paul's vision (Acts 16:9) is attractive and inherently possible, but not certain.

III. Place. The place where Acts was written is not named, though the sudden ending of the book, while Paul is residing at Rome awaiting trial, makes Rome an appropriate place. The question of place is tied in with that of Luke's purpose in writing, and with the occasion for the publication of the book.

IV. Date. Allusions to the book in the Apostolic Fathers are too indefinite to compel the setting of a date much before the end of the first century A.D. If Acts is dependent on Josephus for information, it cannot be earlier than A.D. 93. But such dependence is not proved, and is highly unlikely. Acts must have been finished after the latest date mentioned in the book, in 28:30. The abrupt close indicates that it was written at that time, c. A.D. 61 or 62. Luke's Gospel has an appropriate ending; Acts does not. We are not told how the trial of Paul came out. There is no hint of Paul's release or of his death. The attitude toward Roman officials is friendly, which would not have been the case after the persecution under Nero set in, A.D. 64. The Jewish War of A.D. 66-70 and the destruction of Jerusalem are not referred to. Chapters 1-15 picture accurately conditions in Jerusalem before its destruction. It would be attractive to think that Luke's two books were written to inform and influence well-disposed Roman officials in their disposal of Paul's case.

V. The speeches in Acts. Do the speeches report what was actually said? We do not expect stenographic reporting, but Luke is a careful writer, as a comparison of his Gospel with Mark and Matthew shows. The style of the speeches in Acts is not Luke's, but that which is appropriate to each speaker, Peter, Stephen, Paul; even minor characters such as Gamaliel (5:25ff.), the Ephesian town clerk (19:35ff.), Tertullus (24:2ff.). Similarities between the speeches of Peter and Paul are explained by the fact that Paul explicitly preached the same Gospel as Peter. Speeches by the same person are varied in type, each suited to the occasion.

VI. Summary of the contents. Introduction, a. Summary of ground covered by the "former treatise," especially the resurrection ministry of Jesus, 1:1-11. b. The period of waiting; a ten days' prayer meeting in the upper room, 1:12-14. c. The choice of a successor to the betrayer as one of the Twelve, 1:15-26.

1. Pentecost, the birthday of the Church. a. the occasion and the event, 2:1-13. b. Peter's sermon, 2:14-36. c. The result: the beginning of the Church, 2:37-47.

2. Pictures of the first church in Jerusalem. a. A lame man healed, 3:1-11. b. Peter's sermon on this occasion, 3:12-26. c. Attempted suppression of the new church met by prayer-power, 4:1-30. d. A contrast in givers, 4:31-5:11: Barnabas, the generous giver, 4:31-37; Ananias and Sapphira, the grudging givers, 5:1-11. e. Growth of the healing ministry of the church, 5:12-16. f. Another attempt at suppression of the church met by obedience to God, 5:17-42. g. An administrative problem solved leads to further advance, 6:1-8. h. The attempt of the Council (Sanhedrin) to suppress the new leader, Stephen, 6:9-15. i. Stephen's defense, 7:1-53. j. Stephen's martyrdom, 7:54-60.

3. The Gospel spread to all Judea and Samaria, 8:1-25. a. The stimulus to expansion: Saul as persecutor, 8:1-4. b. Problems in Samaria, 8:5-25.

4. Three "continental" conversions. a. From the continent of Africa: the Ethiopian eunuch, 8:26-40. b. From Asia: Saul of Tarsus, 9:1-31. (Interlude: Peter in western Palestine, 9:32-43). c. From Europe: Cornelius of Italy, 10:1-48.

5. The Judean church accepts the mission to the Gentiles, 11:1-30. a. Peter convinces the Jewish Christians, 11:1-18. b. The extent of the early mission to the Gentiles, 11:19-21. c. Barnabas and

9. Paul's third missionary journey. a. Confirming the disciples in Galatia and Phrygia, 18:23. b. Apollos at Ephesus, 18:24-28. c. The mission to Ephesus, 19:1-20:1. d. Journeyings through Greece and Macedonia to Troas, 20:1-6. e. The mission to Troas, 20:6-12. f. The journey to Jerusalem, 20:13-21:16.

10. Paul's arrest and voyage to Rome, a. Paul in Jerusalem, 21:17-23:30. b. Paul in Caesarea, 23:31-26:32. c. The voyage to Rome, 27:1-28:15. Paul in Rome, 28:16-31. E.R.

ADADAH (ă-dā'dà, Heb. 'adh'ādhâh), a city in Judah (Josh. 15:22), not surely identified.

ADAH (ā'dà, Heb. 'ādhâh, ornament or morning). 1. One of Lamech's two wives (Gen. 4:19, 20, 23), mother of Jabal and Jubal. Lamech spoke a poem in praise of himself to his wives.

2. One of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2, 4, 10, 12, 16), daughter of Elon the Hittite. In Genesis 26:34 Esau marries Bashemath, daughter of Elon the Hittite, either another name for Adah, or her sister. Adah's son is Eliphaz (Gen. 36:10) and his sons are called hers (Gen. 36:12, 16).

ADAIAH (à-dā'yà, Heb. 'ădhāyâh, Jehovah hath adorned, or pleasing to Jehovah). 1. A man of Boscath, father of Josiah's mother (II Kings 22:1).

2. A Levite descended from Gershom (I Chron. 6:41-43).

3. A son of Shimshi the Benjamite (I Chron. 8:1, 21).

4. A Levite of the family of Aaron, head of a family living in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:10-12).

5. The father of Captain Maaseiah who helped Jehoiada put Joash on the throne of Judah (II Chron. 23:1).

6. A son of Bani who married a foreign wife during the exile (Ezra 10:29).

7. Another of a different Bani family who did the same (Ezra 10:34).

8. A descendant of Judah by Perez (Neh. 11:5).

9. A Levite of the family of Aaron. Most likely the same as 4 (Neh. 11:12).

ADALIA (ăd-ā-lī'à, Heb. 'ădhalyā'), the fifth of

I. Adam was a necessary complement to the divine plan. "There was not a man to till the ground" (Gen. 2:5). The accomplishment of God's plan required human instrumentality. God made the earth for man, and then the man for the earth.

II. Adam was fashioned a creature of God, bearing the image of God and possessing God-like faculties (Gen. 1:27; Ps. 8:6; Eccl. 7:29).

III. Adam was created a tripartite being, having a spirit, soul and body (Gen. 2:7; I Thess. 5:23).

IV. Adam was alone and needed companionship to satisfy his created instincts (Gen. 2:18), thus Eve was formed.

V. Adam was enticed and sinned (Gen. 3:6). After the satanic tempter there came the human tempter, and the act of taking the forbidden fruit offered by Eve ruined Adam and made him our federal head in sin and death. "In Adam all die."

VI. Adam received the promise of the Saviour. The first promise and prophecy of One able to deal with sin and Satan was given, not to Adam, but to the one responsible for Adam's transgression (Gen. 3:15), and in the coats of skins God provided to cover the discovered nakedness of Adam and Eve we have a type of the sacrifice of the Cross. In Adam we die, but in Christ we can be made alive. The first man Adam was of the earth, earthly, but the Second Man, the last Adam, was from heaven and kept His first estate of sinless perfection.

Hence we are led to consider Adam, a type of Christ: Christ, the Second Adam. In two key NT passages Paul takes Adam as a type of Christ. In Romans 5:12-21, Adam is the head of a race doomed by sin to death; Christ is the beginning of a people made righteous by His death. Paul is here concerned with the justification of sinners before a holy God. Adam, the first sinner, is an appropriate type of all who have followed in his path of disobedience to God. More than that, his sin is the source of their misery, for "by one man's offence death reigned." Paul not only thus compares Christ with Adam, but contrasts the two, in that while "by one man's disobedience many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous" (Rom. 5:19).

In I Corinthians 15, after having proved that Christ has risen from the dead, Paul introduces an argument which really continues that in Romans 5:12-21: "For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (I Cor. 15:21-22). All who are in Adam (the whole human race) are here contrasted with all who are in Christ (those human beings who have received Him as Saviour). The destiny of the former is death; the destiny of the latter, resurrection life. For (I Cor. 15:45), "the first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam (Christ) was made a quickening (life-giving) spirit."

The study of the life of Adam (Gen. 1:26-5:5) shows us the natural man in his original and intended glory, in the extremity of his fall, and in the possibilities which yet remain to him as man. The NT passages cited open before us the infinitely rich and eternal destiny awaiting and available to us through the perfect obedience unto death of the Second Adam, our Lord Jesus Christ. E.R.

ADAM (ăd'ăm, Heb. 'ādhām, red, or made), a city in the Jordan valley near Zaretan, where the waters of the river were backed up so that the Israelites crossed on dry ground when they entered the promised land from east of Jordan (Josh. 3:16). The exact location is in dispute.

The flow of the Jordan River temporarily blocked by earthquake-caused landslides near the ancient town of Adam, or Adamah, on July 11, 1927. This is thought to be near the spot of the Israelite crossing of Joshua 3:16. © MPS

ADAMAH (ăd'ā-mà, Heb. 'ădhāmâh, red ground), a fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:36). Location disputed.

ADAMANT (ăd'ā-mănt, Heb. shāmîr), a stone harder than flint (Ezek. 3:9, Zech. 7:12). The Heb. word is translated "diamond" in Jeremiah 17:1, "briers" in Isaiah 5:6, 7:23-25, 9:18, 10:17, 27:4, 32:13.

ADAMI (ăd'ā-mī, Heb. 'ādhāmî, earthy), a place on the border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33), united with "Nekeb" and forming "Adami-nekeb," in ASV and RSV.

ADAR (ā'dàr, Heb. 'ăddār), a place on the south border of Judah (Josh. 15:3 KJV). In ASV and RSV, Addar.

ADAR (à-dàr', ā'dàr, Heb. 'ădhār), the 12th month of the Babylonian calendar; used by the Hebrews after the exile (Ezra 6:15, Esth. 3:7, 13, 8:12, 9:1, 15, 17, 19, 21).

ADBEEL (ăd'bē-ĕl, Heb. 'adhbe'ēl, languishing for God), the third son of Ishmael and grandson of Abraham (Gen. 25:13, I Chron. 1:29).

ADDAN (ăd'ăn, Heb. 'addān, Ezra 2:59; 'āddôn in Neh. 7:61), one of the places in Babylonia from which the people named in Ezra 2:60-63 and Nehemiah 7:62-65 returned to Jerusalem after the exile, whose names could not be found in the genealogy of those entitled to be priests.

ADDAR (ăd'ar, Heb. 'addār, threshing floor). 1. Son of Bela, grandson of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:3). Called Ard in Genesis 46:21 and Numbers 26:40; counted as a son of Benjamin and head of a family in the tribe.

2. In ASV and RSV for Adar of KJV.

ADDER (See Animals—Reptiles)

ADDI (ăd'ī, Gr. Addí, Addeí, my witness, or adorned), an ancestor of Joseph, the husband of Mary, our Lord's mother (Luke 3:28).

ADDON (ăd'ŏn), the same place as Addan (Neh. 7:61; compare Ezra 2:59).

ADER (ā'dêr, Heb. 'adher, a flock), a son of Beriah, grandson of Shaharaim, a Benjaminite (I Chron. 8:15).

ADIEL (ā'dĭ-ĕl, Heb. 'ădhiēl, ornament of God). 1. A descendant of Simeon (I Chron. 4:36).

2. A priest, son of Jahzerah (I Chron. 9:12).

3. Father of Azmaveth, who was supervisor of David's treasuries (I Chron. 27:25). Perhaps the same as No. 2.

ADIN (ā'dĭn, Heb. 'ādhîn, delicate, or ornament). 1. One whose family returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:15, Neh. 7:20).

2. One whose posterity came back with Ezra (Ezra 8:6).

3. The name of a family sealing the covenant (Neh. 10:16). These are all thought to be the same family. The list in Ezra 2 appears to include both exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and some who returned later. The family included "chiefs of the people" (Neh. 10:14).

ADINA (ăd'ĭ-nà, Heb. 'ădhînā', ornament), a Reubenite and one of David's military officers (I Chron. 11:42).

ADINO (ăd'ĭ-nō, à-dī'nō, Heb. 'ădhînô, his adorned one). "The Tachmonite that sat in the seat, chief among the captains; the same was Adino the Eznite; he lift up his spear against eight hundred, whom he slew at one time" (II Sam. 23:8 KJV). ASV and RSV have the proper name Josheb-bassebeth instead of "that sat in the seat," and RSV omits the name of Adino the Eznite. I Chronicles 11:11 has "Jashobeam, an Hachmonite," with the same title and exploit.

ADITHAIM (ăd-ĭ-thā'ĭm, Heb. 'ădhîthayim, double ornaments), one of "the uttermost cities of... Judah" (KJV), "in the extreme South, toward the border of Edom" (RSV; Josh. 15:21), in the "lowland" or Shephelah (Josh. 15:33 ASV, RSV), and named in Joshua 15:36.

ADJURATION (ăj-ōō-rā'shŭn). The noun does not occur in the Bible, but the verb "adjure" (ă-jŏor') is found. In I Samuel 14:24 it translates a form of Heb. 'ālâh meaning cause to take an oath, rendered laid an oath on the people in RSV. In Joshua 6:26 it translates the Heb. shāva' in a form with the same meaning, which RSV renders "laid an oath on them." A curse for disobedience to the command is meant. The same Heb. word occurs in I Kings 22:16 and II Chronicles 18:15 with the meaning "charge, bind or command solemnly as if under penalty of a curse." While the actual taking of an oath is not involved, the circumstances are as solemn as if one were exacted. In Matthew 26:63 adjure translates Greek exorkizo where a charge of like solemnity is meant. In Mark 5:7 the Greek is horkizo, the simple verb without a strengthening preposition, and it is the appeal of a demoniac. In Acts 19:13 exorcists attempt to command demons in the name of Jesus. In I Thessalonians 5:27 Paul says "I charge you" (Greek horkizo) where ASV and RSV have "adjure." In every case, an appeal in the most impressive manner, an earnest entreaty, is meant; a solemn appeal. E.R.

ADLAI (ăd'lā-ī, Heb. 'adhlay, justice of Jehovah, or weary), father of Shaphat, who was overseer of David's cattle in the lowlands (I Chron. 27:29).

ADMAH (ăd'mà, Heb. 'adhmâh, red earth), a city near Gomorrah and Zeboiim (Gen. 10:19) with a king (Gen. 14:2, 8), destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (Deut. 29:23 with Gen. 19:24-28; see Hos. 11:8).

ADMATHA (ăd'mà-thà, Heb. 'adhmāthā', unrestrained), a prince of Persia and Media (Esth. 1:14).

ADNA (ăd'nà, Heb. 'adhnā, pleasure). 1. A son of Pahath-moab who had married a foreign wife during the exile (Ezra 10:30).

2. A priest, head of his father's house in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:12-15).

ADNAH (ăd'nà, Heb. 'adhnāh, pleasure). 1. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

2. A man of Judah who held high military rank under Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:14).

ADONI-BEZEK (à-dō'nī-bē'zĕk, Heb. 'ădhōnî-vezeq, lord of lightning, or of the city of Bezek), a king of Bezek, captured by the men of Judah and Simeon and taken to Jerusalem, where he was mutilated. The cutting off of his thumbs and great toes not only rendered him harmless but reminded him that man reaps what he sows (Judg. 1:5-7; Gal. 6:5).

ADONIJAH (ăd'ō-nī'jà, Heb. 'ădhōnîyāhû, my Lord is Jehovah), the fourth son of David, by Haggith, born at Hebron (II Sam. 3:2-4, I Chron. 3:2). Amnon and Absalom, David's first and third sons, had died; the second, Chileab, had not been mentioned since his birth, and might have died also. Adonijah, as the eldest living son, aspired to the throne. The story of his attempt and failure to seize the crown is told in I Kings 1:5-2:25.

He was a spoiled, handsome lad (1:6), and now he "prepared him chariots and horsemen, and fifty men to run before him (1:5). He won over Joab, also Abiathar the priest, but failed to gain Zadok the priest and Nathan the prophet. Moreover, "the mighty men which belonged to David, were not with Adonijah" (1:7,8). He held a great feast at En-rogel, to which he invited "all his brethren the king's sons, and all the men of Judah the king's servants," but he did not invite "Nathan the prophet, and Benaiah, and the mighty men, and Solomon his brother" (1:9,10). Nathan spoke to Bathsheba, Solomon's mother, and together they warned David of what Adonijah was doing. David, roused to action, had Solomon proclaimed king at Gihon (1:11-40). Adonijah and his guests heard the shout and the sound of the trumpet (1:41). Immediately Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, brought a full account of what had happened (1:42-48). The guests fled, and Adonijah sought refuge at the altar (1:49,50). Solomon pardoned him, and he returned home (1:51;53).

But after the death of David, Adonijah emboldened himself to ask Bathsheba to persuade king Solomon to give him Abishag, David's nurse in his last illness, for a wife (2:13-18). This revived Solomon's suspicions, and he had him killed (2:19-25).

2. A Levite, sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law (II Chron. 17:8).

3. A chieftain who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:14-16). E.R.

ADONIKAM (ăd-ō-nī'kăm, Heb. 'ădhōnîqām, my Lord has arisen), the ancestor of a family, 666 of whom returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:13). Among the chiefs of the people who returned with Ezra are three sons and 60 males of this family (Ezra 8:13). In the list of exiles whose genealogy proved them Israelites are 667 of this family (Neh. 7:18). The Adonijah of Nehemiah 10:16, because of his position among those who sealed the covenant, is thought to be the same as Adonikam.

ADONIRAM (ăd-ō-nī'răm, Heb. 'ădhōnîrām, my Lord is exalted), first appears by the name Adoram as an officer of David "over the tribute" (II Sam. 20:24). He continues under Solomon (I Kings 4:6); "over the levy" of laborers in Lebanon (I Kings 5:14). Rehoboam sends Adoram to compel the obedience of the rebels, but "all Israel stoned him . . . that he died" (I Kings 12:18). Both Adoram and Hadoram (II Chron. 10:18) are shortened forms of Adoniram.

ADONI-ZEDEK, ADONI-ZEDEC (KJV) (ă-dō'nī-zē'dĕk, Heb. 'ădhōnîtsedheq, lord of righteousness, or, my lord is righteous), Amorite king of Jerusalem (Josh. 10:1-27). Having heard how Joshua destroyed Ai and Jericho, and how Gibeon made peace with Israel, Adoni-zedek invited four other Amorite kings to join him in attacking Gibeon. Joshua came to the aid of Gibeon. God discomfited the kings, both in battle and with great hailstones. This was the day when Joshua called on the sun and moon to stand still until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. The kings hid in a cave, which Joshua sealed with great stones. Victory complete, Joshua ordered the kings brought out and slew them, and hanged them on trees until sunset, when they were cut down and buried in the cave where they had hidden. An earlier king of Jerusalem (Salem) bore a name, Melchizedek, meaning "king of righteousness" (Gen. 14:18-20).

ADOPTION (ă-dŏp'shŭn). The word occurs five times in the NT (Gr. huiothesía). The practice of adoption is exemplified in the OT: Pharaoh's daughter adopted Moses (Exod. 2:10) as her son. Hadad the Edomite married the sister of the Egyptian queen, and their son Genubath was brought up "among the sons of Pharaoh," whether formally adopted or not (I Kings 11:20). Esther was adopted by Mordecai (Esth. 2:7,15). These cases were outside Palestine, in Egypt or Persia. Whether adoption was practiced in the Hebrews' own land is not clear. Abram thinks of Eliezer of Damascus as his heir, but God tells him this shall not be (Gen. 15:2-4). Sarai gave her maid Hagar to Abram that he might obtain children by her (Gen. 16:1-3). Rachel (Gen. 30:1-5) and Leah (Gen. 30:9-12) gave Jacob their maids for a like purpose, a kind of adoption by the mother but not by the father. Jacob adopted his grandsons Manasseh and Ephraim to be as Reuben and Simeon (Gen. 48:5). The case of Jair (I Chron. 2:21,22) is one of inheritance rather than adoption. Whether Mary the mother of Jesus, or Joseph her husband, or both, were adopted, is a matter of inference incapable of direct proof (Luke 3:23, Matt. 1:16). Levirate marriage (Deut. 25:5,6) involved a sort of posthumous adoption of a brother's later-born son.

But none of the OT instances have a direct bearing on the NT usage of the term. Paul is the only writer to employ it, and with him it is a metaphor derived from Hellenistic usage and Roman law. The legal situation of a son in early Roman times was little better than that of a slave, though in practice its rigor would vary with the disposition of the father. The son was the property of his father, who was entitled to his earnings; who could transfer ownership of him by adoption or by a true sale; who could, under certain circumstances, even put him to death. An adopted son was considered like a son born in the family. He could no longer inherit from his natural father. He was no longer liable for old debts (a loophole eventually closed). So far as his former family was concerned, he was dead. Modifications of the rigor of sonship were at intervals introduced into Roman law, and a more liberal Hellenistic view was doubtless in the mind of Paul.

In Galatians 4:1-3 Paul states accurately the Roman law of sonship. In verse 4 he says that God sent His Son to be born into the human condition under law, and in verse 5 the purpose of God in so doing: "to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." We were not merely children who needed to grow up; we had become slaves of sin who needed to be redeemed, bought out of our bondage, that we might enter the new family which Christ brought into being by His death and resurrection. Adoption expresses both the redemption and the new relation of trust and love, for "because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father" (verse 6). The adoption brought us from slavery to sonship and heirship (verse 7).

The same thought appears in Romans 8:15. Verses 1-14 demonstrate that the adoption is more than a matter of position or status; when God adopted us, He put His Spirit within us, and we became subject to His control. This involves chastisement (Heb. 12:5-11) as well as inheritance (Rom. 8:16-18).

In Romans 8:23 "the adoption" is spoken of as future, in the sense that its full effects are to be consummated at the time of "the redemption of our body." This "redemption" is not the "buying out" of Galatians 4:5, but a word (Gr. apolytrosis) emphasizing the release, the loosing from all restraints which the limitation of a mortal body imposes. We are part of a suffering creation (verse 22). The spiritual body, the resurrection body, pictured in vivid terms of I Corinthians15:35-57, is the object of Paul's longing (Phil. 3:21, II Cor. 5:1-8). The present effects of God's adoption of us as sons are marvelous, yet they are only an earnest (II Cor. 1:22, 5:5, Eph. 1:13,14) of what the adoption will mean when we come into our inheritance in heaven.

In Romans 9:4 Paul begins with enumeration of the privileges of Israelites with "the adoption." Though God said, "Israel is my son, my first-born" (Exod. 4:22); and, "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my child out of Egypt" (Hos. 11:1); and Moses expressed the relationship, "Ye are the children of the Lord your God" (Deut. 14:1); yet Israel's sonship was not the natural relationship by creation, but a peculiar one by a covenant of promise, a spiritual relationship by faith, under the sovereign grace of God, as Paul goes on to explain in Romans 9-11. Thus a clear distinction is drawn between the "offspring" of God by creation (Acts 17:28) and the children of God by adoption into the obedience of faith.

With utmost compression of language Paul expresses, in Ephesians 1:4, 5, God's action which resulted in His adoption of us; and enumerates its effects in verses 6-12. This action began with God's election; "He hath chosen us in Him before the foundation of the world," using predestination as the mode, ("having predestinated us"); Christ is the agent (by Jesus Christ); and He Himself is the adopting parent (to Himself). God's sovereign act is stressed by the concluding phrase of verse 5: "according to the good pleasure of His will." That adoption is not a mere matter of position is made plain in the statement of the purpose of election: "that we should be holy and without blame before Him in love" (verse 4).

Adoption is a serious matter under any system of law. As a figure of speech expressing spiritual truth it emphasizes the sovereign and gracious character of the act of God in our salvation; our solemn obligation as adopted sons of our adopting Parent; the newness of the family relationship established; its climate of intimate trust and love; and the immensity of an inheritance which eternity alone can reveal to us. ADORAIM (ăd'ō-rām, Heb. 'ădhōrayim), a fortress built by Rehoboam in Judah (II Chron. 11:9). Probably now Dûra, a large village on rising ground W of Hebron.

ADORAM (ȧ-dō'răm), the same as Adoniram.

ADORATION (ăd-ō-rā'shŭn), "to kiss the hand with the mouth" in homage (Job 31:26,27: "If I behold the sun . . . or the moon .. . and my mouth hath kissed my hand"), the earliest idolatry, that of the sun, moon and stars. Laying the hand on the mouth expressed deep reverence and submission (Job 40:4). So "kiss the Son," i.e. adore Him (Ps. 2:12). Falling down prostrate was the worship paid to Babylonian idols (Dan. 3:5,6). Worship is due to God only, and was rejected by angels and saints when offered to them (Luke 4:8, Acts 10:25,26, Rev. 19:10; 22:8,9). "The adoration of the Magi" is the name given to the visit of the wise men to the infant Jesus (Matt. 2:11), and to paintings of the scene.

ADRAMMELECH (ăd-răm'ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'adhrammelekh, Adar is king). 1. The name which the author of II Kings 17:31 gives to Adar, the god the Sepharvites brought to Samaria when the king of Assyria settled them there, and in the worship of whom children were burnt in fire. It was a time of syncretism, when Israelites and Assyrian colonists both paid service to God and to heathen deities alike (II Kings 17:24-41).

2. A son of Sennacherib, who, with his brother Sharezer, slew their father in the temple of Nisroch (II Kings 19:37, Isa. 37-38).

ADRAMYTTIUM (ăd'rȧ-mĭt'ĭ-ŭm), an old port city of Mysia, in the Roman province of Asia, near Edremit. Paul sailed in a ship of Adramyttium along the coast from Caesarea in Palestine to Myra in Lycia, where an Alexandrian ship bound for Italy took him on board (Acts 27:2-6).

ADRIA (ā'drĭ-ȧ), originally that part of the gulf between Italy and the Dalmatian coast near the mouth of the Po River, named for the town of Adria. Later, it was extended to include what is now the Adriatic Sea; and, in NT times, also that part of the Mediterranean between Crete and the Peloponnesus on the east and Sicily and Malta on the west. This extended meaning appears in Acts 27:27, where Paul's ship is "driven up and down in Adria." "The shipmen deemed that they drew near to some country," and that land proved to be Malta (Acts 28:1 RSV; Melita in KJV).

ADRIEL (ā'drĭ-ăl, Heb. 'adhrîēl, honor or flock or help of God), son of Barzillai the Meholathite, to whom Merab, Saul's daughter, was given in marriage, when she had been promised to David (I Sam. 18:19, II Sam. 21:8). In II Samuel 21:8 "the five sons of Michal the daughter of Saul, whom she brought up for Adriel," are spoken of. "Michal" is here thought to be a copyist's error for Merab. The expression is peculiar, and so may the relationship have been. Adriel probably came from Abel-Meholah, which was either in West Manasseh or in Issachar.

ADULLAM (ă-dŭl'ăm, Heb. 'ădhullām, retreat, refuge), a city in the Shephelah or low country, between the hill country of Judah and the sea, 13 miles SW of Bethlehem; very ancient (Gen. 38:1,12,20; Josh. 15:35); the seat of one of the 31 petty kings smitten by Joshua (Josh. 12:15). Fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:7). Called for its beauty "the glory of Israel" (Mic. 1:15). Reoccupied on the return from the Babylonian exile (Neh. 11:30).

David hid in one of the many limestone caves near the city, with his family and about 400 men (I Sam. 22:1,2) at times when Saul sought his life. While David was here, three of his "mighty men" risked their lives to fulfil his expressed desire for water from the well of Bethlehem, but David refused to drink it because it was obtained at the risk of life (II Sam. 23:13-17, I Chron. 11:15-19). Adullam was indeed a "refuge" for David.

ADULLAMITE (ă-dŭl'ăm-īt, belonging to Adullum), used of Hirah, Judah's friend (Gen. 38:1, 12,20).

ADULTERY (ă-dŭl'tĕr-ē). In the OT, sexual intercourse, usually of a man, married or unmarried, always with the wife of another. One of the Ten Commandments forbids it (Exod. 20:14, Deut. 5:18). The punishment for both man and woman was death (Lev. 20:20, 18:20), probably by stoning (Deut. 22:22-24, John 8:3-7). Adultery and related words translate derivatives of the Heb. root n'ph (nā'aph), conveying the one plain meaning. The simple stem (Qal) of the verb is used, in addition to the foregoing, of the literal deed or doer (Prov. 6:32, Jer. 5:7, 7:9, 23:14, Hos. 4:2, Job 24:15); the intensive stem (Piel), suited to intense, emotionally charged speech (Jer. 29:23, Ezek. 23:37, Jer. 9:2, 23:10, Hos. 7:4, Mal. 3:5, Ps. 50:18). Instances where the woman is the doer are: in the simple verb stem, of literal action (Lev. 20:10, Ezek. 16:38 "as women that break wedlock," Ezek. 23:45): in the intensive stem (Hos. 4:13,14, 3:1, Prov. 30:20, Ezek. 16:32).

The OT also uses adultery as a figure for idolatrous worship. The simple verb stem occurs in this sense in Jeremiah 3:9; the intensive stem in Ezekiel 23:37, Jeremiah 3:8, and Isaiah 57:3. Plural nouns (adulteries) occur: Heb. ni'uphîm (Ezek. 23:43, Jer. 13:27); na'ăphûphîm (Hos. 2:4; all of idolatrous worship).

While fornication (the wider term for sexual offenses) is frequently and severely condemned in the OT, special solemnity attaches to the reproof of adultery, either in the relations of individual men and women, or figuratively, in the relations of the covenant people Israel, conceived of as a wife, with God, their spiritual husband. Isaiah, Jeremiah and Ezekiel use the figure (see references above). Hosea develops from personal experience with an adulterous wife an allegory of God's love for His unfaithful people. Adultery in the marriage relation is reprehensible: how much more infidelity in the behavior of human beings toward a God who loves us with a love which can well be expressed as that of a husband for his wife? Thus the figurative use enhances the literal sense, emphasizing the divine institution and nature of marriage.

In the NT, "adultery" translates Greek moicheúo and related words, which the LXX had already used for Heb. nā'aph. The meaning throughout the Bible widens and deepens, first with the prophets, then with Jesus and His apostles.

Jesus quotes the commandment (Matt. 5:27-30, 19:18, Mark 10:19, Luke 18:20), broadening its application to include the lustful look which betrays an adulterous heart. He teaches that such evils as adultery come from the heart (Matt. 15:19, Mark 7:21). Dealing with divorce, Jesus declares remarriage of a divorced man or woman to be adultery (Matt. 5:31,32, 19:3-9, Mark 10:2-12, Luke 16:18), with one exception (Matt. 5:32, 19:9), the interpretation of which by various interpreters differs. The Pharisee in a parable rejoices that he is not an adulterer (Luke 18:11). Jesus uses the term figuratively of a people unfaithful to God (Matt. 12:39, 16:4, Mark 8:38). In John 8:2-11 the account of a woman taken in adultery reveals Jesus' insistence on the equal guilt of the man. Without belittling the seriousness of adultery, Jesus exercises the sovereign pardoning power of the grace of God, coupled with a solemn injunction against future offenses. Jesus' attitude toward adultery springs from His conception of marriage as God intended it, and as it must be in the new Christian society.

Paul names adultery as one of the tests of obedience to the law (Rom. 2:22), quotes the commandment (Rom. 13:9), uses adultery as an analogy of our relation to God (Rom 7:3), says that adulterers "shall not inherit the kingdom of God" (I Cor. 6:9), and lists adultery among works of the flesh (Gal. 5:19). The sanctity of marriage is the point stressed in Hebrews 13:4. James 2:1 uses adultery and murder as examples of the equal obligation of all the commandments of God. In James 4:4 adultery is a figure of speech for unfaithfulness to God. Revelation 2:20-23 condemns spiritual adultery.

The NT treatment of adultery, following the implications of the OT concept, supports marriage as a lifelong monogamous union. Adultery is a special and aggravated case of fornication. In the teaching of Jesus and the apostles in the NT, all sexual impurity is sin against God, against self, and against others. Spiritual adultery (unfaithfulness to God) violates the union between Christ and His own. E.R.

ADUMMIM (ă-dŭm'ĭm, Heb. 'ădhummîm, perhaps red spots), a pass, "the going up to Adummim" (Josh. 15:7, 18:17), the ascent of Adummim on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho. It was on the north border of Judah and the south border of Benjamin. Convincingly held to be the scene of Jesus' parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-35).

ADVENT (See Eschatology)

ADVERSARY (ăd'vĕr-sâr'ē), an enemy, personal, national, or supernatural. In the OT, adversary translates a number of Heb. words meaning "show hostility to" (Exod. 23:22); "to bind, restrict" (Deut. 32:27); "straitness" (I Sam. 1:6); "to straiten, distress" (Exod. 23:22); "to strive, plead," (I Sam. 2:10); "accuser, opponent" (Num. 22:22); "to accuse, oppose" (Ps. 71:13); "owner of a judgment" (Isa. 50:8); "a man of strife" (Job 32:35). In the NT "adversary" translates antídikos (Matt. 5:25 etc.); antíkeimai, "be opposed to" (Luke 13:17 etc); hypenantíos, "opposed to" (Heb. 10:27). Antídikos refers to Satan in I Peter 5:8 and I Timothy 5:14.

ADVOCATE (ăd'vō-kāt, Gr. parákletos, advocate, supporter, backer, helper, Paraclete), Jesus Christ (I John 2:1). Also Jesus speaks of the Holy Spirit as "another Comforter" (John 14:16), using the same Greek word, thereby implying that He Himself is a "Comforter." The Holy Spirit is the Advocate of the Father with us, therefore our Comforter (John 14:16,26, 15:26, 16:7, where RSV translates "Counselor"). As applied to the Holy Spirit, the Greek word is so rich in meaning that adequate translation by any one English word is impossible. Comforter is as satisfactory as any, if it is taken in the fullest sense of one who not only consoles but strengthens, helps, counsels, with such authority as a legal advocate has for his client. As applied to Christ, the meaning is narrowed to that of Advocate with the Father (I John 2:1,2).

AENEAS (ē-nē'ăs), a paralytic, healed at Lydda by Peter (Acts 9:32-35).

AENON (ē'nŏn; in Aramaic means springs), a place near Salim, where John the Baptist was baptizing at the time Jesus was baptizing in Judea (John 3:22,23). The site of Aenon is unknown. Two possibilities are suggested for Salim; one east of Mt. Gerizim, the other 6 miles S of Scythopolis. There are springs near both places. It would have been unnecessary to mention "much water" (John 3:23) if Aenon had been close to the Jordan River. John seems to have moved from "Bethabara beyond Jordan" where we find him in John 1:28.

AEON (ē'ŏn, Greek aión). The word "aeon" does not occur in the English Bible, but is variously translated. Its original meaning is "relative time duration, limited or unlimited," i.e., a period of time, or eternity. A common translation in the NT is "world" (RSV often "age"). Frequently it occurs in phrases meaning "forever" (e.g., Matt. 6:13). KJV has "ages" twice (Eph. 2:7, Col. 1:26). When aeon is the word translated "world," its duration in time is involved, though aeon is sometimes synonymous with Greek kósmos, world-order (e.g., Mark 4:19, I Cor. 1:20, 2:6, 3:19). Good examples of aeon meaning a period of time are Hebrews 9:26, where "the end of the world" is the period ushered in by the first coming of Christ; and Matthew 24:3, 28:20, where "the end of the world" is its culmination at His second coming. We live during the period between (I Cor. 10:11). "This present age (time)" and "the age (world) to come" are distinguished (e.g., Mark 10:30, Matt. 12:32). "This (present) age (world)" (e.g., Rom. 12:2, II Tim. 4:10, Titus 2:12) implies the existence of another world. In Ephesians 1:21 "this world" precedes "that which is to come." Hebrews 6:5 speaks of "the powers of the world (RSV "age") to come," which believers already experience. The Gnostic concept of aeons as beings emanating from, and standing between God and the world, is foreign to the NT. E.R.

AGABUS (ăg'ă-bŭs), one of the prophets from Jerusalem who came to Antioch and prophesied a famine "throughout all the world" (inhabited world: the Roman Empire). This "came to pass in the days of Claudius Caesar." The prophecy led Christians at Antioch "to send relief unto . . . Judea . . . by . . . Barnabas and Saul" (Acts 11:27-30). Years later, a "certain prophet, named Agabus" came down from Jerusalem to Caesarea, and by a dramatic action warned Paul that he would be put in bonds if he persisted in going to Jerusalem (Acts 21:10,11). Though we cannot prove that the two prophets are one and the same man, there is no reason to doubt it.

AGAG (ā'găg, Heb. 'ăghāgh, perhaps meaning violent). 1. An important king of Amalek, (Num. 24:7), of whom Balaam prophesied that a king of Jacob (Israel) would surpass him.

2. The king of the Amalekites, whom Saul captured alive, though God had through the prophet Samuel ordered him to destroy them entirely (I Sam. 15:8,9). When Samuel reproached him, Saul excused himself (I Sam. 15:22 ff.), but Samuel was not satisfied. When Samuel had Agag brought in for judgment, Agag concluded, "Surely the bitterness of death is past." But Samuel, as judge, pronounced sentence of death upon him for all his cruel deeds, "and Samuel hewed Agag in pieces before the Lord" (I Sam. 15:32,33).

AGAGITE (ăg'ă-gīt, ā'găg-īt), an epithet applied to Haman as enemy of the Jews (Esth. 3:1,10, 8:5, 9:24).

AGAPE (ăg'ă-pā, Gr. agápe), the more frequent of two NT words for love, connoting the preciousness or worthiness of the one loved. It is used in Jude 12 (KJV "feasts of charity," ASV, RSV "love-feasts") of common meals which bore that name because they cultivated brotherly love among Christians. II Peter 2:13, I Corinthians 11:21,22, 33,34, Acts 20:11 may refer to them. In Acts 2:46 "breaking bread" refers to the Lord's Supper (cf. v. 42), but "eat their meat (food)" requires a full meal. I Corinthians 11:20-34 rebukes abuses which had crept into the love-feasts, and which marred the Lord's Supper. The Lord's Supper properly followed, but was distinct from the love-feast.

AGAR (ā'gär), the Greek name of Sarai's handmaid (Gal. 4:24,25).

AGATE (See Minerals)

AGE (See Aeon)

AGE, OLD, called the reward of filial obedience, according to the commandment (Exod. 20:12). The Mosaic legislation spelled out the respect to be shown the aged (Lev. 19:32). Younger men waited till they had spoken (Job 32:4). God promised Abraham "a good old age" (Gen. 15:15). When Pharaoh received him, Jacob lamented that he had not lived as long as his ancestors (Gen. 47:7-9). There are many Heb. words relating to old age in the OT, showing the honor in which the aged were usually held; yet the gray hairs which were so much respected had also their sorrows (Gen. 44:29-31). Official position went to older men (elders, e.g., Exod 3:16, Matt. 21:23). Elders were ordained for the early Christian churches (e.g., Acts 14:23). Aged men and women are given sound advice in Titus 2:2-5. There is a fine picture of old age in Ecclesiastes 12:1-7. Jesus Christ is portrayed with the white hair of old age in Revelation 1:14.

AGONY (ăg'gō-nē, Gr. agonía, agony, anguish). Occurs only in Luke 22:44, of Jesus' agony in Gethsemane. The word is derived from the Gr. agōn, "contest," "struggle," and depicts severe conflict and pain. Luke tells us that Christ's agony was such that "His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground." (See also Matt. 26:36-46, Mark 14:32-42, Heb. 5:7,8.) While Luke alone records the bloody sweat and the appearance of an angel from heaven strengthening Him, Matthew and Mark speak of the change in His countenance and manner, and record His words expressing overwhelming sorrow even unto death. The passage in Hebrews is the only clear reference in the New Testament apart from the Gospels to this agonizing crisis. His struggle was in part with the powers of darkness, which were then returning with double force, having retreated after Satan's defeat at the Temptation (Luke 4:13) "for a season" (Gr. "until the season," viz. in Gethsemane, Luke 22:53). Chiefly, however, His agony was caused by the prospect of the darkness on Calvary, when He was to experience a horror never known before, the hiding of the Father's face, the climax of His vicarious suffering for our sins. The one who knew no sin was to be made sin for mankind. The hour was before Him when He would cry out in wretchedness of soul, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" The prospect of this dreadful cup was that which caused the struggle in the Garden. In this supreme spiritual conflict, the Captain of our salvation emerged triumphantly victorious, as is evident in the language of final victory of faith over the sinless infirmity of His flesh: "The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18:11). B.P.

AGORA (ăg'gō-rà, Gr. agorá, market place). In ancient cities the town meeting place, where the public met for the exchange of merchandise, information and ideas. As centers where people congregated, the agorae of Galilee and Judea were the scenes for many of the healing miracles of Christ (Mark 6:56). Here the village idlers, as well as those seeking work, would gather (Matt. 20:3). Here the vain and the proud could parade in order to gain public recognition (Matt. 23:7; Mark 12:38; Luke 11:43; 20:46). Here also the children would gather for play (Matt. 11:16,17, Luke 7:32). In Gentile cities, the agorae served also as forums and tribunals. The agora of Philippi was the scene of the trial of Paul and Silas following the deliverance of a "damsel possessed with a spirit of divination" (Acts 16:16ff). In Athens, Paul's daily disputations in the agora led directly to his famed message before the Areopagus (Acts 17:17ff), which court met on Mars Hill, north of the Acropolis.

AGRAPHA (ăg'rà-fà, Gr. ágrapha, unwritten things). These are units of tradition concerning Christ, mostly sayings ascribed to Him, transmitted to us outside of the canonical Gospels. The entire collection of agrapha, gathered from all sources, is not large; and when what is obviously apocryphal or spurious is eliminated, the small remainder is of very little value.

Several sources of the agrapha may be noted. The best authenticated are those found in the NT outside of the Gospels: four in the Acts of the Apostles (1:f; 1:7f; 11:16; 20:35); two in the epistles of Paul (I Cor. 11:24f; I Thess. 4:15ff); and one in the Epistle of James (1:12). A second source of agrapha is found in ancient manuscripts of the New Testament. For the most part, sayings preserved in such manuscripts are of the nature of textual variations: parallel forms or expansions or combinations of sayings found in the canonical Gospels. A few, however, cannot be fitted into this category, as, for example, the following, which is found after Luke 6:5 in Codex Bezae: "On the same day, seeing someone working on the Sabbath, he [Jesus] said to him, 'Man, if indeed you know what you are doing, you are blessed; but if you do not know, you are cursed and a transgressor of the Law.' " A third source of ágrapha is patristic literature. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis (c. 80-c. 155), was the first of the Church Fathers to make a collection of the sayings of Jesus not recorded in the Gospels, but very little of his work survives. Agrapha are found in the works of Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and a few others. In Origen, for example, we have this: "I have read somewhere that the Saviour said . . . 'He that is near me is near the fire; he that is far from me is far from the kingdom.' " Still another source of agrapha is the papyri which have been discovered in Egypt during the past century, especially those found by Grenfell and Hunt at Oxyrhynchus. In some of these papyri one ágraphon follows another without context, introduced by the simple formula, "Jesus says," as in the following one: "Jesus says; Wheresoever there are two, they are not without God, and where there is one alone, I say, I am with him. Lift up the stone, and there shalt thou find me; cleave the wood, and I am there." Agrapha are found also in the apocryphal gospels, like the gospel according to the Hebrews and the gospel according to the Egyptians, but few, if any, of these can be regarded as genuine. The recently-discovered (1945 or 1946) Gnostic Coptic Gospel of Thomas, found near Nag Hamadi in Upper Egypt, which is dated around A.D. 150, consists of more than 100 short sayings of Jesus, the majority of which begin with the words "Jesus said," or they give a reply by Jesus when asked by His disciples to instruct them on a doubtful point. Many sayings ascribed to Jesus are found in Mohammedan sources, but these traditions are for the most part of no value. Although the number of agrapha collected by scholars seems imposing, only a very few have anything like a strong claim to acceptance on the ground of early and reliable source and internal character. Some scholars reject the agrapha in toto; others think that they are the remains of a considerable body of extra-canonical sayings which circulated in early Christian circles, and that a few of them, at least, may be genuine. See THOMAS, GOSPEL OF. S.B.

AGRICULTURE (ăg'rĭ-kŭl-chûr). Not a Bible word; husbandry and husbandman are used for the activity and the man who practices it. In the form of horticulture, it is as old as Adam (Gen. 2:5, 8-15). Caring for the garden of Eden became labor after the curse (Gen. 3:17-19). Nomad and farmer began to differentiate with Abel and Cain (Gen. 4:2-4), with the herdsman gaining favor with God. As animal husbandry took its place along with tillage as part of the agricultural economy, the farmer gained in social status. Yet as late as shortly before the Babylonian exile, nomads still felt a sense of superiority over the settled agricultural people (Jer. 35:1-11, the Rechabites). "Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard" (Gen. 9:20). Abraham and his descendants were nomad herdsmen in Canaan, though Isaac and Jacob at times tilled the soil (Gen. 26:12, 37:7). Recurrent famines and the sojourn in Egypt taught the Israelites to depend more on agriculture, so that the report of the spies regarding the lush growth in Canaan interested them (Num. 13:23, Deut. 8:8). Agriculture became the basis of the Mosaic commonwealth, whose land legislation is suited to an agricultural rather than a pastoral economy. The soil is fertile, wherever water can be applied abundantly. The Hauran (Peraea) is productive. The soil of Gaza is dark and rich, though light, and retains rain: olive trees abound. The Israelites cleared most of the wood which they found in Canaan (Josh. 17:18). Wood became scarce; dung and hay heated their ovens (Ezek. 4:12-15, Matt. 6:30). The water supply was from rain, rills from the hills, and the Jordan. Irrigation was effected by ducts from cisterns hewn out of rock. As population increased, the more difficult cultivation of the hills was resorted to, and yielded abundance. Terraces were cut, one above another, faced with low stone walls. The rain is chiefly in autumn and winter, November and December, rare after March, almost never as late as May. The "early" rain fell from about the September equinox to sowing time in November or December, the "latter" rain in January and February (Joel 2:23, Jas. 5:7). Drought two or three months before harvest meant famine (Amos 4:7,8). Wheat, barley and rye (millet rarely), were the staple cereals. "Corn," according to British usage, refers to any grain, not specifically to maize. The barley harvest was earlier than the wheat harvest. By the plague of hail in Egypt, "the flax and the barley were smitten, for the barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolled (i.e., in blossom) but the wheat and the rye were not smitten, for they were not grown up" (Exod. 9:31,32). Accordingly, at the Passover, the barley was just fit for the sickle, and the wave sheaf was offered. At the Pentecost feast, fifty days later, the wheat was ripe for cutting, and the first fruit loaves were offered. The vine, olive, and fig abounded, and traces everywhere remain of wine and olive presses. Cummin (including the black "fitches" (Isa. 28:27), peas, beans, lentils, lettuce, endive, leek, garlic, onion, cucumber and cabbage also were cultivated.

The Passover in the month Nisan answered to the green stage of produce; the feast of weeks in Sivan, to the ripe; and the feast of Tabernacles in Tisri, to the harvest home. The six months from Tisri to Nisan were occupied with cultivation; the six months from Nisan to Tisri, with gathering fruits. Rain from the equinox in Tisri to Nisan is pretty continuous, but is more decidedly marked at the beginning (the early rain) and the end (the latter rain). Rain in harvest was almost unknown (Prov. 26:1).

Viticulture is pictured in Isaiah 5:1-7, and Matthew 21:33-41. Some farming procedures are described in Isaiah 28:24-28. The plough was light, and drawn by yokes of oxen (I Kings 19:19). Fallow ground was broken and cleared early in the year (Jer. 4:3, Hos. 10:12). Seed was scattered broadcast, as in the parable of the sower (Matt. 13:1-8), and ploughed in afterward, the stubble of the preceding crop becoming manure by decay. In irrigated fields the seed was trodden in by cattle (Isa. 32:20). The contrast between the exclusive dependence on irrigation in Egypt and the larger dependence on rain in Palestine is drawn in Deuteronomy 11:10-12. To sow among thorns was deemed bad husbandry (Job 5:5, Prov. 24:30-32). Hoeing and weeding were seldom needed in their fine tilth. Seventy days sufficed between barley sowing and the offering of the wave sheaf of ripe grain at Passover. Oxen were urged on with a spearlike goad, which could double as a deadly weapon (Jud. 3:31). Harvesting and harvest customs in the time of the Judges are described in Ruth 2 and 3. Sowing varied seed in a field was forbidden (Deut. 22:9). Oxen, unmuzzled (Deut. 25:4), five abreast, trod out the grain on a threshing floor of hard beaten earth, to separate the grain from chaff and straw. Flails were used for small quantities and lighter grains (Isa. 28:27). A threshing sledge (Isa. 41:15) was also employed, probably like the Egyptian sledge still in use; a stage with three rollers ridged with iron, which cut the straw for fodder, while crushing out the grain. The shovel and fan winnowed the grain afterward by help of the evening breeze (Isa. 30:24, Ruth 3:2); lastly it was shaken in a sieve (Amos 9:9, Luke 22:31). The fruit of newly planted trees was not to be eaten for the first three years. In the fourth it was offered as firstfruits. In the fifth year it might be eaten freely (Lev. 19:23-25).

We have glimpses of the relations of farm laborers, steward (manager or overseer) and owner, in the book of Ruth, in Matthew 20:1-16, and Luke 17:7-9.

Agriculture was beset with pests: locust, cankerworm, caterpillar and palmerworm (Joel 2:25): God calls them "my great army," as destructive as an invasion by human enemies. Haggai speaks (2:17) of blasting, mildew and hail. Development of agriculture under the British mandate, and since the establishment of the State of Israel, and parallel but lesser development in the country of Jordan are restoring the coastal plain, the plains of Esdraelon and of Dothan, the Shephelah, the Negev and the Hauran to their ancient prosperity. AGRIPPA I (ă-grĭp'ă), known in history as King Herod Agrippa I, and in the NT, where he is mentioned in Acts 12, as Herod. He was the son of Aristobulus and Bernice and grandson of Herod the Great. Through friendship with the emperors Caligula and Claudius he gained the rulership first of Iturea and Trachonitis, then of Galilee and Perea, and ultimately of Judea and Samaria. He ruled over the thus reunited domain of Herod the Great from A.D. 40 until his death in A.D. 44 at the age of 54. While owing his position to the favor of Rome, he recognized the importance of exercising great tact in his contacts with the Jews. Thus it was that his natural humanity gave way to expediency in the severe conflict between Judaism and the growing Christian movement. He slew James "to please the Jews" and imprisoned Peter with the intention of bringing him before the people for execution after the passover (Acts 12:2-4). Agrippa's sudden death shortly thereafter, noted in Acts 12:20-23, is fully recorded by Josephus (Ant. XIX, 8). On the second day of a festival held in Caesarea in honor of Claudius, Agrippa put on a silver garment of "wonderful" texture and entered the amphitheater early in the morning. When the sun's rays shone upon his garment, the brilliant glare caused his flatterers to cry out that he was a god. Josephus adds that "the king did neither rebuke them nor reject their impious flattery." Almost immediately a severe pain arose in his abdomen; five days later he died in great agony. See also Herod.

AGRIPPA II (ă-grĭp'ă), known in history as King Herod Agrippa II and in the NT, where he is mentioned only in Acts 25 and 26, as Agrippa. He was the son of Agrippa I. Being only 17 at the death of his father, he was thought too young to succeed to the throne. Six years later (A.D. 50), he was placed over the kingdom of Chalcis, which included the right to appoint the high priest of the temple in Jerusalem. In A.D. 53 he was transferred to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip (Iturea and Trachonitis) and Lysanias (Abilene) and given the title, "king." After the death of Claudius in A.D. 54, Nero added to his realm several cities of Galilee and Perea. When Festus became procurator of Judea, Agrippa, accompanied by his sister (and consort) Bernice, went to Caesarea to pay his respects. It was at this time that Paul appeared before him, as recorded in Acts 25:23-26:32. In the final revolt of the Jews against Rome, Agrippa sided with the Romans in the destruction of his nation in the same cynical spirit with which he met the impassioned appeal of the apostle. Following the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, he retired with Bernice to Rome, where he died in A.D. 100.

AGUE (See Diseases, Malaria)

AGUR (ā-gûr, Heb. 'āghûr, gatherer), the author or "collector" of the wise sayings in Proverbs 30. He is named as the son of Jakeh (Prov. 30:1). His words are called "the prophecy," but better "the weighty utterance" (Heb. massa'). Cf. ASV mg. which reads, "Jakeh, of Massa." If this is the true reading, a connection might possibly be made between Agur and the tribe of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14).

AHAB (ā'hăb, Heb. 'ah'āv, father's brother). 1. Son of Omri and seventh king of the northern kingdom of Israel. He reigned 22 years, 873-851 B.C. Politically, Ahab was one of the strongest of the kings of Israel. In his days Israel was at peace with Judah and maintained her dominion over Moab, which paid a considerable tribute (II Kings 3:4). He went into battle on three different occasions in later years against Ben-hadad, king of Syria. While he had great success in the first two campaigns, he was defeated and mortally wounded in the third. Not mentioned in the Bible is Ahab's participation in the Battle of Karkar in 854 B.C. The "Monolith Inscription" of the Assyrian king Shalmanezer III contains a description of this battle which the Assyrians fought against a Syrian coalition of twelve kings. Of these, "Hadad-ezer," king of Damascus, is named first. Irhuleni of Hamath follows and in third place is "Ahab, the Israelite." The inscription states that Ahab commanded 2,000 chariots and 10,000 men. The number of his chariots was far greater than the number credited to any other king. Successful as he might have been politically, however, Ahab owes his prominence in the OT to the religious apostasy which occurred in Israel during his reign. Of him it is said, he "did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him" (I Kings 16:30). His marriage to Jezebel, daughter of the king of the Zidonians, while politically advantageous, was religiously disastrous. Jezebel introduced the idolatrous worship of Baal into Israel as well as the licentious orgies of the goddess Ashtoreth. She also instituted a severe persecution against the followers of Jehovah and killed all the prophets of the Lord with the sword, except the one hundred who were hidden by Obadiah (I Kings 18:4; cf. 19:14). At this critical period in the history of Israel, God raised up Elijah, whose faithful ministry culminated in the conflict with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (I Kings 18). Ahab's religious corruption was equaled by his love of material wealth and display. He was well known, e.g., for his elaborately ornamented ivory palace (I Kings 22:39). Not content with what he had, however, he coveted the vineyard of Naboth, which adjoined his palace at Jezreel. Naboth refused to sell the land and Ahab was utterly cast down in dejection. Seeing his state, Jezebel asked him to remember who was king in Israel and proceeded unscrupulously to charge Naboth with blasphemy, doing so in the name of the king, who weakly maintained silence. False witnesses testified against Naboth and he was stoned to death, following which Ahab took possession of the vineyard. This crime sealed the doom not only of Ahab, but of his family as well. The judgment of the Lord was that all of his posterity would be cut off (I Kings 21:21), even as had been the case with the two previous dynasties, those of Jeroboam and Baasha. The ringing condemnatory sentence given by Elijah, "In the place where dogs licked Naboth's blood, shall dogs lick thy blood," was fulfilled to the letter on Joram, his son (II Kings 9:24-26), and in part on Ahab himself (I Kings 22:38). Execution of this sentence was delayed owing to Ahab's partial and temporary repentance (I Kings 21:27-29). Ahab sinned also in failing to kill Ben-hadad, king of Syria, in their second battle (I Kings 20:20-43). This disobedience, as Saul's in the case of Agag, king of the Amalekites, was prompted by practical considerations which took precedence in Ahab's mind over God's will. For this sin, Ahab, as Saul before him, was told that he would pay with his life. Three years later he went into battle accompanied by Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, in the attempt to recover Ramoth-Gilead from the Syrians. He was mortally wounded by an arrow shot by one who "drew a bow at a venture" (I Kings 22:34). Ahab's character is succinctly summarized by the historian: "There was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up" (I Kings 21:25).

2. A false prophet who deceived the Jews in Babylon. Joining with Zedekiah, another false prophet, Ahab predicted an early return to Jerusalem. For this sin and for their immoral conduct, Jeremiah prophesied that they would be burned to death by the king of Babylon and that their names would become a byword (Jer. 29:21-23). B.P.

AHARAH (ȧ-hâr'ȧh, Heb. 'ahrah), the third son of Benjamin, probably the founder of a family (I Chron. 8:1).

AHARHEL (ȧ-hȧr'hĕl, Heb. 'ăharhēl), a son of Harum, founder of a family enrolled in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

AHASAI (ȧ-hā'sī, Heb. 'ahzay, my protector), a priest who lived in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:13).

AHASBAI (ȧ-hăs'bī, Heb. 'ăhasbay), the father of Eliphelet, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:34).

AHASUERUS (ȧ-hăz'û-ē'rŭs, Heb. 'ăhashwērôsh, representing the Persian Khshayārshā, which in Gr. became Xerxes). 1. The father of Darius the Mede. Mentioned in Daniel 9:1.

2. King of Persia, mentioned in the book of Esther. There seems to be little doubt that he is to be identified with the well-known Xerxes, who reigned from 486 to 465 B.C. The main support for this identification is to be found in the linguistic equivalence of the names, as noted below. In addition, a close similarity has been noted between the character of Xerxes and the character of the king of the Persians portrayed in the book of Esther. There are also historical correlations. Thus, the feast which was held in the third year of the reign of Ahasuerus at Shushan (Esth. 1:3) corresponds to an assembly held by Xerxes in his third year in preparation for the invasion of Greece. Herodotus states that Xerxes, following his defeat at Salamis and Plataea, consoled himself in his seventh year with the pleasures of the harem (Herodotus IX, 108). This parallels the biblical account which relates that Ahasuerus replaced Vashti by marrying Esther in his seventh year (Esth. 2:16) after gathering all the fair young virgins to Shushan. The Ahasuerus of Ezra 4:6, to whom were written accusations against the Jews of Jerusalem, is in all probability this same Xerxes, although sometimes identified with Cambyses, son of Cyrus.

AHAVA (ȧ-hā'vȧ, Heb. 'ahăwā'), a river in Babylonia named after a place by which it flowed Ezra 8:15, 21), where Ezra assembled the Jewish exiles to seek God's guidance and protection for the long and dangerous journey to Jerusalem.

AHAZ (ā'hăz, Heb. 'āhāz, he has grasped). 1. The 12th king of Judah in the divided monarchy; son of Jotham. He ruled from 735 to 715 B.C. Ahaz ascended the throne at the age of 20 (II Kings 16:2), ruling as co-regent with his father for four years and as sole monarch for 16 (Edwin R. Thiele, The Mysterious Numbers of the Hebrew Kings, Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1951, pp. 116-120). The critical period of his reign began when Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, made a league against Judah. As the moment of attack approached, the prophet Isaiah was sent by God to deliver a comforting message to Ahaz, whose heart was overwhelmed with fear (Isa. 7:1-9). After having promised that God would spare the city, Isaiah told Ahaz to ask a sign of God. Ahaz hypocritically refused to "tempt the Lord" by asking one, whereupon Isaiah cried out, "The Lord himself shall give you a sign: Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel" (Isa. 7:14). In the invasion, Pekah slew 120,000 men of Judah in one day; Zichri of Ephraim slew the king's son, Maaseiah, as well as Azrikam, the governor of his house, and Elkanah, who was second to the king. The Israelites carried 200,000 men, women and children captive to Samaria along with much spoil. Oded, the prophet, however, persuaded them to release the captives (II Chron. 28:6-15). Rezin also took many captives (II Chron. 28:5) and captured Elath (II Kings 16:6). Following this disastrous defeat, Judah was invaded by the Edomites from the E and the Philistines from the S and W (II Chron. 28:17,18). In his distress, Ahaz asked assistance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, sending treasure from the temple and palace as tribute (II Kings 16:8). Tiglath-pileser did come against the Syrians, whom he conquered (II Kings 16:9), but otherwise added to the difficulties of Ahaz. For "Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria came unto him, and distressed him, but strengthened him not" (II Chron. 28:20). The contact with Tiglath-pileser confirmed Ahaz in his religious apostasy. Early in his reign "he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, yea and made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out from before the children of Israel. And he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places, and on the hills, and under every green tree" (II Kings 16:3,4). Following his meeting with Tiglath-pileser in Damascus, Ahaz "sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus which smote him, and he said because the gods of the kings of Syria help them, therefore will I sacrifice to them, that they may help me. But they were the ruin of him and of all Israel" (II Chron. 28:23). He cut the temple vessels in pieces, closed the doors of the temple, made altars in every corner of Jerusalem, and made high places to burn incense to other gods in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 28:24,25). After the death of Ahaz, his body was "not brought into the sepulchres of the kings" (II Chron. 28:27) because of his great wickedness.

2. A great-grandson of Jonathan, son of King Saul; one of four sons of Micah and the father of Jehoadah (I Chron. 8:35,36). B.P.

AHAZIAH (ā'hȧ-zī'ȧ, Heb. 'ăhazyâh, Jehovah hath grasped). 1. Son of Ahab and Jezebel; eighth king of Israel. He reigned only briefly, 851-850 B.C.

Ahaziah was a worshiper of Jeroboam's calves and of his mother's idols, Baal and Ashtoreth. The most notable event of his reign was the revolt of the Moabites, who had been giving a yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams (II Kings 1:1; 3:4,5). Ahaziah was prevented from trying to put down the revolt by a fall through a lattice in his palace at Samaria. Injured severely, he sent messengers to inquire of Baalzebub, god of Ekron, whether he would recover. Elijah the prophet was sent by God to intercept the messengers and proclaimed to them that Ahaziah would die. The king in anger tried to capture the prophet, but two groups of 50 men were consumed by fire from heaven in making the attempt. A third contingent was sent to seize the prophet but instead prayed Elijah to deliver them from the fate of their predecessors (II Kings 1:13,14). Elijah then went down to Samaria and gave the message directly to the king, who died shortly afterwards. He was succeeded by his brother Jehoram (II Kings 1:17; cf. 8:16).

2. Son of Jehoram of Judah, and Athaliah; thus grandson of Jehoshaphat and Ahab, and nephew of Ahaziah of Israel. He was the sixth king of Judah in the divided monarchy and reigned only one year (II Chron. 22:2), 843 B.C. His name appears also as Jehoahaz (II Chron. 21:17; 25:23), thus representing a simple transposition of the component parts of the compound name. The name Azariah, which is given him in II Chronicles 22:6, is probably the result of a scribal error. According to II Kings 8:26, Ahaziah was 22 years old when he began to reign. There is undoubtedly a scribal error in II Chronicles 22:2, where it is stated that he was 42 years old when he ascended to the throne; for his father, Jehoram, was only 40 when he died (II Chron. 21:20). Ahaziah walked in all the idolatries of the house of Ahab, his mother being his counselor to do wickedly (II Chron. 22:3,4). He sinned also in allying himself with Jehoram of Israel against Hazael of Syria, going into battle at Ramoth-Gilead (II Chron. 22:5). Jehoram was wounded and Ahaziah went to see him at Jezreel. Here judgment came upon him through the hand of Jehu, who fell upon Jehoram and all the house of Ahab. Ahaziah, seeing the slaughter, fled "by the way of the garden house," but was smitten in his chariot at the going up to Gur by Ibleam. He fled to Megiddo and died there (II Kings 9:27). The account given in Chronicles presents different though not irreconcilable details of his death (II Chron. 22:6-9). Ahaziah was buried with his fathers in Jerusalem (II Kings 9:28), Jehu allowing this honorable burial because Ahaziah was the grandson of Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart (II Chron. 22:9). Following the death of Ahaziah, Athaliah seized the throne and killed all the seed royal of the house of Judah except Joash, Ahaziah's son, who was hidden by Jehoshabeath, sister of Ahaziah and wife of Jehoiada the high priest (II Chron. 22:10-12).

AHBAN (ȧ-băn, Heb. 'ahbān), a man of Judah, of the house of Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:29).

AHER (ā-hêr, Heb. 'ahēr), a Benjamite (I Chron. 7:12).

AHI (ā'hī, Heb. 'ăhî). 1. Chief of the Gadites in Gilead (I Chron. 5:15).

2. A man of Asher, son of Shamer (I Chron. 7:34).

AHIAH (See Ahijah)

AHIAM (ā-hī'ăm, Heb. 'ăhî'ām, mother's brother), one of David's 30 heroes (II Sam. 23:33).

AHIAN (ȧ-hī'ăn, Heb. 'Ahyān), a Manassite of the family of Shemida (I Chron. 7:19).

AHIEZER (ā-hī-ē'zêr, Heb. 'ăhî'ezer). 1. The head of the tribe of Dan in the wilderness (Num. 1:12; 2:25; 7:66).

2. A Gibeonite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

AHIHUD (ȧ-hī'hŭd, Heb. 'ăhîhûdh, brother is majesty). 1. Prince of the tribe of Asher; selected by Moses to help divide the land of Canaan (Num. 34:27).

2. A son of Ehud (I Chron. 8:7).

AHIJAH (ȧ-hī'jȧ, Heb. 'ăhîyâ, brother of Jehovah). 1. One of the sons of Jerahmeel, a great-grandson of Judah and brother of Caleb (I Chron. 2:25).

2. A descendant of Benjamin, mentioned in connection with an intra-family conflict (I Chron. 8:7).

3. Son of Ahitub, the brother of Ichabod and son of Phinehas, the son of Eli. He served as priest in Shiloh, "wearing an ephod," in the days of Saul (I Sam. 14:3). In the midst of a Philistine-Israelite battle, "Saul said unto Ahijah, Bring hither the ark of God. For the ark of God was at that time with the children of Israel" (I Sam. 14:18). This statement is often held to be in conflict with I Chronicles 13:3, where David says, "Let us bring again the ark of our God to us; for we inquired not at it in the days of Saul." Saul's order to Ahijah is thought also to imply that the ark was at Shiloh, whereas I Samuel 7:1 and I Chronicles 13:5-7 indicate that it was in Kirjath-jearim during the entire reign of Saul. The contradictions are only apparent ones. The definite statement concerning Ahijah as priest is that he wore an ephod, not that the ark was under his care at Shiloh. At a critical moment, Saul, contrary to his normal lack of interest in the ark, called upon Ahijah to bring it up to the scene of the battle. The text states, however, that even while Saul was talking to Ahijah, the sound of the battle in which Jonathan was engaged reached his ears (I Sam. 14:19). The ark was promptly forgotten for the time, and, as the battle was won by the Israelites, for the remainder of Saul's reign as well. It is felt by many that Ahijah is the same as Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, who, as priest at Nob, befriended David when he fled from Saul, following which Saul exacted terrible revenge by slaying Ahimelech and all the inhabitants of the city. Others suggest that Ahijah was the father or brother of Ahimelech.

4. The Pelonite, one of the valiant men of David's armies (I Chron. 11:36).

5. A Levite who was in charge of the treasures of the house of God in David's reign (I Chron. 26:20).

6. Son of Shisha and brother of Elihoreph. He was a scribe of Solomon (I Kings 4:3).

7. A prophet of Shiloh who met Jeroboam as he was going out of Jerusalem and foretold the transfer of ten tribes to him from Solomon by the symbolic action of rending his garment into twelve pieces, ten of which he gave to Jeroboam. He told him further that God would build him a "sure house" such as He had built for David if Jeroboam would walk in God's ways (I Kings 11:29-39). His other recorded prophecy was given to Jeroboam's wife, who in disguise consulted him as to her son Abijah's recovery. The prophet foretold not only the death of the son but also the extermination of the house of Jeroboam because he "had done evil above all that were before" him in making idols and in provoking God to anger (I Kings 14:1-16). Reference to his prophecy as one of the records of Solomon's reign is made in II Chronicles 9:29.

8. The father of Baasha, King of Israel, of the tribe of Issachar (I Kings 15:27).

9. One of the men who set their seal to the covenant drawn up before the Lord in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:26). B.P.

AHIKAM (à-hī'kăm, Heb. 'ăhîqām, my brother has risen up), son of Shaphan the scribe, and sent by Josiah to ask the meaning of the Book of the Law that was found (II Kings 22:12). Later, he successfully pleaded before the princes and elders that Jeremiah should not be put to death for his warnings of impending doom (Jer. 26:24). After the deportation to Babylon, Ahikam's son Gedaliah became governor over the remnant who remained in the cities of Judah (II Kings 25:22; Jer. 40:5).

AHILUD (à-hī'lŭd, Heb. 'ăhîlûdh, a child's brother), father of Jehoshaphat the recorder (II Sam. 8:16; 20:24; I Kings 4:3; I Chron. 18:15).

AHIMAAZ (à-hĭm'ā-ăz, Heb. 'ăhîma'ats, brother of anger). 1. The father of Ahinoam, wife of King Saul (I Sam. 14:50).

2. Son of Zadok the high priest (I Chron. 6:8). With Jonathan, son of Abiathar, he served as messenger in Absalom's rebellion, carrying tidings from Hushai, David's counselor and spy. Zadok and Abiathar, who took back the ark to Jerusalem at David's request, were to tell them while they were hiding outside the city whatever Hushai directed. They told David the counsel of Ahithophel for an immediate attack, Hushai warning that David should cross the Jordan at once (II Sam. 15:24-27; 17:15-22). David's estimate of Ahimaaz appears in his remark at his approach after the battle: "He is a good man, and cometh with good tidings" (II Sam. 18:27). Ahimaaz announced the victory but evaded the question concerning Absalom's fate, wishing to spare the feelings of the king. While he was still in David's presence the Cushite arrived and unfeelingly broke the news concerning the death of the king's son. Comparing I Kings 4:2 with I Chronicles 6:8-10, some infer that Ahimaaz died before he attained the priesthood and before his father Zadok, who was succeeded by Ahimaaz's son, Azariah.

3. One of Solomon's 12 commissary officers (I Kings 4:15). He married Basmath, the daughter of Solomon. Some suggest that he should be identified with the son of Zadok.

AHIMAN (à-hī'măn, Heb. 'ăhîman, my brother is a gift). 1. One of the three giant sons of Anak seen in Mount Hebron by the spies (Num. 13:22). The Anakim race was cut off from the land of Israel and Judah by Joshua (11:21,22). The three sons, Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai, were driven by Caleb from Hebron (Josh. 15:14) and killed (Judg. 1:10).

2. A Levite gatekeeper (I Chron. 9:17).

AHIMELECH (à-hĭm'-ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ăhîmelekh, brother of a king). 1. Saul's high priest who helped David by giving him the shewbread and Goliath's sword. Upon hearing this, Saul ordered the death of Ahimelech and the other priests with him (I Sam. 21-22). Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, escaped.

2. Son of Abiathar and grandson of Ahimelech (II Sam. 8:17; I Chron. 18:16; 24:6).

3. A Hittite who, with Abishai, was asked to accompany David to Saul's camp (I Sam. 26:6).

AHIMOTH (à-hī'-mŏth, Heb. 'ăhîmôth, brother of death), son of Elkanah (I Chron. 6:25), descendant of Kohath and a Levite.

AHINADAB (à-hĭn'-à-dăb, Heb. 'ăhînādhāv), a commissary officer of Solomon (I Kings 4:14).

AHINOAM (à-hĭn'-ō-ăm, Heb. 'ăhînō'am, my brother is delight). 1. Wife of King Saul (I Sam.14:50).

2. One of David's wives, a Jezreelitess (I Sam. 25:43), who lived with him at Gath (27:3). She and Abigail were captured by the Amalekites at Ziklag (30:5), but rescued by David (30:18). They were with David in Hebron (II Sam. 2:2), where Ahinoam bore Amnon, his first son (3:2).

AHIO (à-hī'ō, Heb. 'ahyô, brotherly). 1. Son of Abinadab. He and his brother Uzzah accompanied the ark of God from Gibeah on David's first attempt to remove it to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:1-11; I Chron. 13:1-14). Ahio walked before, guiding the oxen that drew the cart, while Uzzah walked alongside.

2. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:14).

3. A Gibeonite, son of Jehiel (I Chron. 8:31; 9:37).

AHIRA (à-hī'rà, Heb. 'ăhîra', brother of evil), prince captain of the tribe of Naphtali (Num. 1:15, 2:29, 7:78,83, 10:27).

AHIRAM (à-hī'răm, Heb. 'ăhîrām, brother of height, exalted brother), son of Benjamin (Num. 26:38). While his name does not appear in the list of Benjamin's sons given in Genesis 46:21, it is thought that Ehi is perhaps a shortened form of Ahiram. In the list of five sons given in I Chronicles 8:1,2 the name of Aharah, expressly mentioned as "the third" son, is thought to be a variant of Ahiram or a different name for the same person (cf. Num. 26:38,39, where Ahiram is the third name in a list of five).

AHIRAMITE (à-hī'-rà-mīt, Heb. 'ăhîrāmî, of the family of Ahiram), Num. 26:38.

AHISAMACH (à-hĭs'-à-măk, Heb. 'ăhîsāmākh. my brother supports), a Danite, the father of Aholiab (Exod. 31:6, 35:34, 38:23).

AHISHAHAR (à-hĭsh'à-hàr, Heb. 'ăhîshahar, brother of dawn), a descendant of Benjamin through Jediael and Bilhan (I Chron. 7:10).

AHISHAR (à-hī'shàr, Heb. 'ăhîshār, my brother has sung), an official over Solomon's household (I Kings 4:6).

AHITHOPHEL (à-hĭth'ō-fĕl, Heb. 'ăhîthōphel, brother of folly), David's counselor who joined the conspiracy of Absalom. His oracular wisdom was proverbial (II Sam. 16:23), and it seems clear that he was a mainspring of the rebellion (II Sam. 15:12). Some suggest, in looking for motivation for his treachery, that he was the grandfather of Bathsheba, for she was the daughter of Eliam (II Sam. 11:3), and an Eliam, the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, is listed as one of David's valiant men (II Sam. 23:34). Thus it is suggested that Ahithophel had a certain bitterness toward David, the murderer of his grandson by marriage and the corrupter of his granddaughter. Others note, however, that the time element seems insufficiently long for Ahithophel to have a married granddaughter at the time of David's great sin, and that it seems easier to believe that there were two men in Israel named Eliam. Furthermore, it seems unlikely that a man such as Ahithophel would conspire against the interests of his granddaughter and her son. His main motivation would appear to be ambition for personal power. His proposal to Absalom that he pursue David immediately with 12,000 men, smiting the king while he was still weary and under-protected, indicates his wisdom and boldness. David's prayer turned his counsel into foolishness (II Sam. 15:31), as Absalom deferred to Hushai's advice that they take time to muster all Israel against such a mighty man of war as David. Ahithophel, seeing his counsel rejected, realized that the cause of Absalom was lost, and went to his home and hanged himself (II Sam. 17:1-23). B.P.

AHITUB (ȧ-hī'tŭb, Heb. 'ăhîtûv, brother of goodness). 1. The brother of Ichabod and son of Phinehas the son of Eli; father of Ahiah (I Sam. 14:3) and Ahimelech (22:9,11,20). Though he is a son and father of priests, nothing is said of his own priestly office.

2. Son of Amariah and father of Zadok the high priest (II Sam. 8:17; I Chron. 6:7,8). He appears as grandfather of Zadok in I Chronicles 9:11; Nehemiah 11:11. A descendant of Aaron through Eleazar, he is to be distinguished from Ahitub 1. who descended through Ithamar (I Chron. 24).

3. Son of another Amariah and father of another Zadok (I Chron. 6:11,12). Cf. list in Ezra 7:1-5. Due to compression of names or copyist's error, 3. may be the same as 2.

AHLAB (ȧ'lăb, Heb. 'ahlāv, fat or fruitful), a town of Asher from which the Israelites were not able to drive the inhabitants. Some identify Ahlab with Gush Chaleb or Giscala, in the hills NW of the Sea of Galilee, home of John of Giscala.

AHLAI (ȧ'lī, Heb. 'ahlay, O would that!). 1. The father of Zabad, one of David's soldiers (I Chron. 11:41).

2. A daughter of Sheshan who married her father's Egyptian slave Jarha. They had a son Attai (I Chron. 2:31-35).

AHOAH (ȧ-hō'ȧ, Heb. 'ăhôah, brotherly), a son of Bela (I Chron. 8:4), from whom is derived the term "Ahohite" (II Sam. 23:9,28; I Chron. 11:12).

AHOHITE (ȧ-hō'hīt, Heb. 'ăhôhî), a patronymic given to the descendants of Ahoah: Dodo (II Sam. 23:9), Zalmon (23:28), and Ilai (I Chron. 11:29).

AHOLA (See Aholah)

AHOLAH (ȧ-hō'-lȧ, Heb. 'āhŏlâh, tent-woman). In God's parable to Ezekiel (Ezek. 23) is a woman who represents Samaria, capital of the Northern Kingdom, whose worship ("tabernacle") was self-devised (John 4:9,20-22). Her sister Aholibah (my tent is in her) is a symbol of Jerusalem (v. 4), capital of Judah whose worship was appointed by God. These "women" had been unfaithful to Jehovah their true husband (Isa. 54:5) by their lewdness with Egypt in their youth (i.e. adopting the ways of the world). Later, Aholah (Israel) was spiritually adulterous by her coalition with Egypt and Assyria and by imitating their luxury and idolatry. For these "whoredoms" God punished her with captivity by the very agent of her sin (Ezek. 23:9,10). Instead of being warned by the awful fate of Samaria, Aholibah (Judah) yielded to Babylonian culture (vv. 11-22). For this alienation from Him, God promised her a similar captivity by the very agent of her sin (vv. 22-49).

AHOLIAB (ȧ-hō'-lī-ăb, Heb. 'āhŏlîāv, father's tent), a man who was divinely endowed with artistic skill to construct the tabernacle (Exod. 31:6).

AHOLIBAH (See Aholah)

AHOLIBAMAH (ȧ-hŏl'ī-bā'mȧ, Heb. 'āhŏlîvāmâh, tent of the high place). 1. One of Esau's three wives, daughter of Anah the Hivite (Gen. 36:2,18. 25). She is also called Judith the daughter of Beeri (Gen. 26:34). Judith may have been her personal name and Aholibamah her married name, taken from the district in Edom near Mount Hor and Petra. Each of her three sons, Jeush, Jaalam, and Korah, became head of a tribe of Edomites occupying Mount Seir. The Edomites were always troublesome to the descendants of Jacob (Num. 20:14-21). They were the ancestral stock of the Idumeans, of whom was Herod the Great.

2. An Edomite duke (Gen. 36:41, I Chron. 1:52), probably so named from the district of his possession.

AHUMAI (ȧ-hū'mī, Heb. 'ăhûmay), a descendant of Judah (I Chron. 4:2).

AHURA MAZDA (ȧ'hōō-rȧ măzdȧ), the all wise spirit in the dualistic system of Zoroastrianism. Darius the Great, Xerxes (the Biblical Ahasuerus), and Artaxerxes were zealous worshipers of Ahura Mazda, held to be the creator of the worlds, greatest of the gods and source of all good.

AHUZAM (ȧ-hŭ-zăm, Heb. 'ăhuzzām, possessor), a man of the tribe of Judah, one of four sons born to Ashur by his wife Naarah (I Chron. 4:6).

AHUZZATH (ȧ-hŭz'ăth, Heb. 'ăhuzzath, possession), a "friend" of Abimelech. These men and Phicol, chief of the Philistine army, made a peace treaty with Isaac at Beersheba after they saw that the Lord had blessed him (Gen. 26:23-33). The ending -ath is in other Philistine names as Gath, Goliath.

AI (ā'ī, Heb. 'ay, ruin). 1. A city of central Palestine, E of Bethel. Abraham pitched his tent between Ai and Bethel when he arrived in Canaan (Gen. 12:8). Ai figures most prominently in the account of the conquest of the land; it was the second Canaanite city taken by the forces under Joshua (Josh. 7,8). Having conquered Jericho, the Israelites felt that a portion of the armies would be sufficient to conquer the much smaller Ai. The Israelite contingent was routed, however. It was then disclosed that Achan had sinned in taking articles from the consecrated spoil of Jericho. After the sin had been confessed and punishment meted out to Achan and his family, the Israelites made a second attack, which resulted in the total destruction of the city and the annihilation of all its inhabitants, 12,000 people. The city, the site of which belonged to the tribe of Benjamin following the partition of the land, had not been rebuilt when the book of Joshua was written (Josh. 8:28). It was, however, rebuilt in later days, for men of Ai returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:28; Neh. 7:32). Recent archaeological excavations at the site commonly identified with Ai indicate that the city was destroyed about 2350 B.C. and lay in ruins at the time of the Israelite conquest. In order to bring Scripture into harmony with this fact some suggest that the city was merely an outpost of Bethel under the control of a military captain. Thus there would have been a lack of substantial buildings, which would account for the absence of tangible remains of the period. Others suggest that the true site of Ai is yet to be found.

2. A city of Ammon, near Heshbon (Jer. 49:3).

AIAH (ā'yȧ, Heb. 'ayyâh, falcon). 1. A Horite (Gen. 36:24; I Chron. 1:40).

2. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (II Sam. 3:7, 21:8).

AIATH (ā'yăth, Heb. 'ayyāth), feminine form of the city Ai (Isa. 10:28).

AIJA (ā-ī'-jȧ, Heb. 'ayyā'), another form of the city Ai (Neh. 11:31).

AIJALON (See Ajalon)

AIJELETH SHAHAR (ā'-jē-lĕth shā'hȧr, Heb. 'ayyeleth hash-Shahar, the hind of the morning), title of Psalm 22. Some explain it as the name of a hunting tune to which the psalm was sung. More likely it alludes to its subject, the lovely and innocent hind symbolizing one who is persecuted unjustly (vss. 12,13,16). "The morning" may represent joy and deliverance after affliction. It suggests Messiah, whose deep sorrow (vss. 1-21) turns to triumphant joy (vss. 22-31).

AIN (ā'ēn, Heb. 'ayin, eye, fountain). From the basic meaning, "eye," is derived, by the vivid imagery of the East, the word, "fountain"; for the spring flashes in the landscape like a gleaming eye. It differs from beer, which is used of a dug well. Generally it is found in compounds, as En-gedi, En-dor, etc.

1. A landmark on the eastern border of the Promised Land; west of Riblah (Num. 34:11). It is usually thought to be the modern Ain el 'Azy, the main source of the Orontes river.

2. A southern city of Judah (Josh. 15:32), afterwards of Simeon (Josh. 19:7), then assigned to the priests (Josh. 21:16).

AIN FESHKA, oasis on the western side of the Dead Sea, south of Khirbet Qumran. Remains of buildings found in 1956 suggest that this was another center of the Qumran community; it provided a place for their work as farmers.

AIN KAREM (Heb. bekarmēy 'ên gedhî), a Hebrew phrase found in the Song of Solomon 1:14, meaning "the vineyards of Engedi." Engedi was a town on the W coast of the Dead Sea, about 35 miles from Jerusalem. In it was a copious fountain, which has created an oasis, rich with palms, vineyards, and balsam.

AIN KARIM (ā'ēn kâr'ĭm), a village in the hill country of Judea, five miles W of Jerusalem, and the traditional home of Zacharias and Elizabeth, parents of John the Baptist, who was born there. Mary came here from Nazareth to visit her cousin Elizabeth. The church in the town is dedicated to John the Baptist.

AIR. In the OT and Gospels found usually in expressions speaking of the birds or fowl of the air (Job 41:16 is the only exception) and representing words normally rendered by "heaven." Elsewhere in the NT it stands for aér, the atmosphere. Ineffective Christian living is pictured as a boxer "beating the air" (I Cor. 9:26). "Speaking into the air" describes unintelligible utterance (I Cor. 14:9). Satan is called "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2:2), i.e. the ruler of the demonic beings which fill the air. The rapture of the church shall culminate in her meeting her Lord the Saviour, Jesus Christ "in the air" (I Thess. 4:17).

AJAH (ā'-jà, Heb. 'ayyâh, falcon), a Horite (Gen. 36:24).

AJALON, AIJALON (ā'jà-lŏn, Heb. 'ayyālôn, place of gazelles). 1. A city of Dan (Josh. 19:42), assigned to the Levite sons of Kohath (I Chron. 6:69). It is mentioned most notably in the memorable words of Joshua, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou moon, in the valley of Ajalon" (Josh. 10:12). It is identified with the modern Yalo, 14 miles from Jerusalem, north of the Jaffa road.

2. The burial place of the judge Elon, in Zebulun (Judg. 12:12).

AKAN (ā'-kăn, Heb. 'ăqān, twisted), a descendant or branch of the Horites of Mount Seir (Gen. 36:27).

AKELDAMA (See Aceldama)

AKHENATON (ä'kĕn-ä't'n, he who is beneficial to Aton), the name chosen by Amenhotep IV (1377-1360 B.C.), ruler in the Eighteenth Dynasty of Egypt, when he changed the religion of his country, demanding that all worship only the sun god under the name Aton. Politically, his reign was disastrous. Internal disorders prevailed, and Egypt's Asian possessions began to slip away. His external troubles are illustrated by clay tablets found at Tell el-Amarna, the site of Akhetaton, the capital which he established. Hundreds of letters from vassal governors in Syria and Palestine speak of invasions and intrigue, and make appeal for help. Many of these tablets refer to invaders called the Habiru. Some feel that this name designates the Hebrews; others that it speaks of a non-Semitic people. Akhenaton is credited by many as being the first monotheist and, indeed, the inspiration for the monotheism of Moses. He clearly, however, worshiped the sun itself and not that Holy One who created the sun and all else in the universe.

AKKAD (See Accad)

AKKUB (ăk'-ŭb, Heb. 'aqqûv, pursuer). 1. Son of Elioenai (I Chron. 3:24).

2. A Levite who founded a family of Temple porters (I Chron. 9:17).

3. The head of a family of the Nethinim (Ezra 2:45).

4. A Levite who helped expound the Law (Neh. 8:7).

AKRABBIM (ăk-răb'ĭm, Heb. 'aqrabbîm, scorpions), always found with Ma'ăleh (Mā'-a-la), meaning "the going up to," "ascent of," or "pass." So the "ascent of the Scorpions," rising between the SW corner of the Dead Sea and Zin, was the southern boundary between Judah and Edom (Num. 34:4, Josh. 15:3), and was the boundary of the Amorites (Judg. 1:36). It was the scene of Judas Maccabeus' victory over the Edomites. Now identified as the pass Es-Sufah.

ALABASTER (ăl'-à-băs'têr, Gr. alábastron), not today's softer gypsum or sulphate of lime often called alabaster, but the harder oriental alabaster, a carbonate of lime. Its stalagmitic formation often gave to it streaks of varying shades and colors, which led to its being called onyx or onyx marble. Alabaster was popular for making perfume vases and boxes for precious ointments. This usage is referred to three times in the NT (Matt. 26:7, Mark 14:3, and Luke 7:37).

ALAMETH (ăl'-ă-mĕth, Heb. 'ālāmeth, concealment). 1. A son of Becher and grandson of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:8).

2. Variant of Alemeth (KJV, ASV), son of Jehoadah or Jarah (I Chron. 8:36, 9:42).

ALAMMELECH (à-lăm'-ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'allammelekh, oak of a king), a town of Asher (Josh. 19:26).

ALAMOTH (ăl'à-mŏth, Heb. 'ālāmôth, maidens, virgins), a musical term (Ps. 46:1; I Chron. 15:20) the meaning of which is uncertain. It may indicate a women's choir, musical instruments set in a high pitch, or instruments played by virgins.

ALCIMUS (ăl'sĭ-mŭs, Heb. 'elyāqûm, God will rise; Gr. Álkimos, valiant), a wicked high priest who was opposed by the Maccabees (I Macc. 7; 9).

ALEMETH or ALMON (ăl'-ĕ-mĕth, ăl'mŏn, hidden), a priests' city (I Chron. 6:60, Josh. 21:18). Now modern Almit.

ALEPH (á'lĕf, ox), first letter of the Hebrew alphabet (א). Although a consonant, it is the forerunner of the Gr. alpha and our English "a."

ALEXANDER, THE GREAT (ăl'ĕg-zăn'dêr, Gr. 'Aléxandros, man-defending), son of Philip, King of Macedon, and Olympias, an Epirote princess; born 356 B.C. Although not named in the Bible, he is described prophetically in Daniel, the "he goat" from the West with a notable horn between his eyes. He came against the ram with two horns which was standing before the river, defeated the ram, and became very great until the great horn was broken and four notable ones came up from it (Dan. 8:5-8). The prophecy identifies the ram as the kings of Media and Persia, the goat as the king of Greece, the great horn being the first king. When he fell, four kings arose in his place (Dan. 8:18-22). The historical fulfillment is striking: Alexander led the Greek armies across the Hellespont into Asia Minor in 334 B.C. and defeated the Persian forces at the river Granicus. Moving with amazing rapidity (the he goat "touched not the ground," Dan. 8:5), he again met and defeated the Persians at Issus. Turning south, he moved down the Syrian coast, advancing to Egypt, which fell to him without a blow. Turning again to the East, he met the armies of Darius for the last time, defeating them in the battle of Arbela, E of the Tigris River. Rapidly he occupied Babylon, then Susa and Persepolis, the capitals of Persia. The next years were spent in consolidating the new empire. Alexander took Persians into his army, encouraged his soldiers to marry Asians and began to Hellenize Asia through the establishment of Greek cities in the Eastern Empire. He marched his armies eastward as far as India where they won a great battle at the Hydaspes River. The army, however, refused to advance farther, and Alexander was forced to return to Persepolis. While still making plans for further conquests, he contracted a fever. Weakened by the strenuous campaign and increasing dissipation, he was unable to throw off the fever and died in Babylon in 323 B.C. at the age of 32. His empire was then divided among four of his generals. While Alexander was outstanding as a conqueror, his notable contributions to civilization came via his Hellenizing efforts. The fact that Greek became the language of literature and commerce throughout the "inhabited world," for example, was of inestimable importance to the spread of the Gospel. B.P.

ALEXANDRA (ăl-ĕg-zăn'drà, Gr. Aléxandra), wife of Aristobulus, King of the Jews (105-104 B.C.). Upon his death, she made her brother-in-law, Jannaeus Alexander king, and married him. After he died, Alexandra ruled from 78-69 B.C. John Hyrcanus II and Aristobulus II were her sons.

ALEXANDRIA (ăl'ĕg-zăn'drĭ-à, Gr. he Alexándreia), founded by Alexander the Great, 332 B.C.; successively the Ptolemaic, Roman and Christian capital of Lower Egypt. Its harbors, formed by the island Pharos and the headland Lochias, were suitable alike for commerce and war. It was the chief grain port for Rome. Its merchant ships, the largest and finest of the day, usually sailed directly to Puteoli, but at times, because of the severity of the weather, sailed under the coast of Asia Minor, as did the vessel which carried Paul (Acts 27:6). Alexandria was also an important cultural center, boasting an excellent university. This was patterned after the great school at Athens but soon outstripped its model. It was especially noted for the study of mathematics, astronomy, medicine and poetry. Literature and art also flourished. The library of Alexandria became the largest and best known in the world. In different eras it was reported as possessing from 400,000 to 900,000 books and rolls. The population of Alexandria had three prominent elements: Jews, Greeks and Egyptians. The Jews enjoyed equal privileges with the Greeks, so that they became fixed there. While they continued to regard Jerusalem as "the holy city," they looked upon Alexandria as the metropolis of the Jews throughout the world. It was here that the translation of the Old Testament into Greek, known as the Septuagint, was made in the third century before Christ. This became the popular Bible of the Jews of the Dispersion and was generally used by the writers of the New Testament. At Alexandria the OT revelation was brought into contact with Greek philosophy. The consequent synthesis became of great importance in subsequent religious thought. The influence of Alexandrian philosophy on the thought of the writers of the NT is debatable, but its impact on later theological and Biblical studies in the Christian church was great. According to tradition, Mark the evangelist first carried the Gospel to Alexandria and established the first church there. From this city, Christianity reached out into all Egypt and the surrounding countries. A theological school flourished here as early as the second century. Among its great teachers were Clement and Origen, pioneers in Biblical scholarship and Christian philosophy. B.P.

ALGUM (See Plants of the Bible)

ALIAH (See Alvah)

ALIAN (See Alvan)

ALLEGORY (Gr. allegoreúein, from állos, other, and agoreúein, to speak in the assembly). Used but once (Gal. 4:24), in reference to Hagar and Sarah, and Ishmael and Isaac; although the literary device is used extensively in Scripture, for example in Isaiah 5:1-7 and in the Song of Songs. To speak allegorically is to set forth one thing in the image of another, the principal subject being inferred from the figure rather than by direct statement. Clarity of inference differentiates between allegory and parable, because the latter usually requires an interpretation for the teaching which it parallels. Allegorizing (to be distinguished from the drawing out of spiritual truths from factual presentations) has had broad application in Bible teaching. Alexandrian Jews spiritualized Scripture, and in this they were followed by the Church Fathers, who reached an extreme in the school of Origen, where spiritualization reached great heights in mystical and moral meanings. In Galatians 4:24 Isaac, the child of promise, typifies the Christian who, justified in Christ, is free to love and serve his Father; while Ishmael, the child of contrivance, typifies the legalist who, under the law, is bound to serve and to seek justification in obedience. C.E.C.

ALLELUIA (ăl-lĕ-lū'yà, Heb. halellû-yāh; Gr. allelouiá, praise ye Jehovah), a word used by the writers of various psalms to invite all to join them in praising God (104:35; 105:45; 106:1,48; 111:1; 112:1; 113:1,9; 115:18; 116:19; 117:2; 135:1,21; first and last vs. of Psalms 146 to 150). The term Alleluia in Revelation 19:1,3,4,6 is borrowed from these psalms.

ALLIANCES. Bible: affinity, confederacy, conspiracy, covenant, join, testament. In this article covenant and testament (Heb. berîth, Gr. diatheké) are omitted when associated with God. In Genesis 21:27-32 Abraham and Abimelech "made a covenant" (Heb. kārath bĕrîth, cut a covenant). To cut a covenant is a formal term basic to alliance and covenant making. The cutting up and arranging the pieces of the sacrificial victim in pact-making was common among nations of antiquity and a regular practice of the Israelites. Jeremiah 34:18-20 refers to the practice of contracting parties passing between the pieces of flesh. Such cutting up and arrangement is understood variously: threat of similar treatment to covenant-breakers, animals representative of contracting parties, new unity by contractors passing between the pieces, association of divine witness in consecration of the sacrifice. "Cutting a covenant" is involved in pacts between individuals (I Kings 20:34), nations (Hos. 12:1), with death (Isa. 28:15,18), in agreements (II Kings 11:4), friendships (I Sam. 18:3), marriages (Mal. 2:14). Certain alliances were forbidden, as with Canaanites (Deut. 7:2), yet an agreement even on false premises was binding (Josh. 9:15,19). Sometimes a pillar was set up (Gen. 31:45-52), and presents given (I Kings 15:18). In the NT diathekē is a "covenant" or "testament," between men (Gal. 3:15), or with God.

ALLON (ăl'ŏn, Heb. 'allôn, oak). 1. A prince of Simeon (I Chron. 4:37).

2. Or Elon (Heb. 'ēlôn), a town, or "the oak in Zaanannim," a southern boundary point in Naphtali (Josh. 19:33 cf. Judg. 4:11).

3. Allon Bachuth, "the oak of weeping," a tree marking the burial place of Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah (Gen. 35:8).

ALLON BACHUTH (See Allon 3)

ALMIGHTY (awl-mīt'ē, Heb. shadday, meaning uncertain). LXX pantokrátor, all powerful. Used 57 times with 'ēl, Kúrios, Theós, for identification (Gen. 17:1), invocation (Gen. 28:3), description (Ezek. 10:5), praise (Rev. 4:8).

ALMODAD (ăl-mō'-dăd, Heb. 'almôdhādh, the beloved), first-mentioned of Joktan's 13 sons (Gen. 10:26, I Chron. 1:20). This Arabian name is preserved in El-Mudad, famous in Arabian history as reputed father of Ishmael's Arab wife and as chief of Jurham, a Joktanite tribe.

ALMON (ăl'mŏn, Heb. 'almôn, hidden), a Levitical city in Benjamin (Josh. 21:18). The same as "Alemeth" KJV and "Allemeth" ASV (I Chron. 6:60).

ALMON - DIBLATHAIM (ăl'mŏn-dĭb-là-thā'ĭm, Heb. 'almōn divlāthayim, Almon of two cakes of figs), one of the last stops of the Israelites on their journey from Egypt to the Jordan. Lying between Dibon-gad and the mountains of Abarim (Num. 33:46,47), it is probably the same as Beth-Diblathaim of Moab (Jer. 48:22), which King Mesha boasts in the famous Moabite stone as "built" by him.

ALMOND TREE (See Plants)

ALMS (ahms), kind deeds arising out of compassion, mercy, pity for the unfortunate. Word found 14 times, in Matthew, Luke and Acts only, although practice is of Mosaic legislation and epistolary injunction. Greek eleemosýne, also in LXX for tsedhāqâh, "righteousness," and hesedh, "kindness." Matthew 6:1 has dikaiosyné, "alms"; and in Acts 9:36 eleemosýne is translated "almsdeeds." Frequently the verb poiein, "to do," "perform" is used with the noun as periphrasis for simple verb of doing (Matt. 6:1,2,3; Acts 9:36; 10:2 = "gave alms"; 24:17 = "to bring alms"). In the OT the Law prescribes gleanings from the harvest, the vineyards, and the grain in the corners of the field for the poor (Lev. 19:9-10). Deuteronomy 24:10-22 stipulates further gleanings from the orchards and olive groves, and protects the rights of the poor and unfortunate concerning wages and working conditions, especially as to pledges, lest the poor be deprived of necessary garments, or be otherwise inconvenienced. Almsgiving is set forth in Deuteronomy 15:11, "For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land."

In later Judaism the righteousness of almsgiving becomes somewhat legalistic and professional. The lame man at the Gate Beautiful exemplifies professional begging in that daily he "sat for alms," and would "ask for alms," being well known to the people (Acts 3:1ff.). Perversion in receiving alms is seen in a beggar's cry couching the idea of "bless yourself by giving to me," while perversion in giving alms is seen in benefactors who "sound the trumpet," probably to be taken figuratively, and "to be seen" of men, involving the word from which we derive "theatre" (Matt. 6:1f). Almsgiving was of two kinds: "alms of the dish," food and money received daily for distribution; and "alms of the chest," coins received on the sabbath for widows, orphans, strangers and the poor. Practice of the NT Church is foreshadowed in the admonition of Jesus, "give alms of such things as ye have" (Luke 11:41, cf. I Cor. 16:2); and, "sell that ye have, and give alms" (Luke 12:33, cf. II Cor. 8:3). Alms in the NT Church, not named as such, are seen in the church of Macedonia in "their deep poverty . . . beyond their power . . . willing of themselves . . . ministering to the saints" (II Cor. 8:1-5). True purpose and spirit is shown in, "now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want" (II Cor. 8:14). The full measure of ministry, blessings and ability to give by God's grace is delineated in II Corinthians 8 and 9, to be done liberally, prayerfully, and cheerfully. See also James 2:15-16, and I John 3:17. A primary function of deacons was to distribute alms (Acts 6).

ALOTH (ā'-lŏth, Heb. 'ālôth), a town or district mentioned with Asher and of which Baanah was Solomon's commissary (I Kings 4:16). ASV has Bealoth.

ALPHA (ăl'-fà), first letter of the Gr. alphabet, (A). ALPHABET, a list of elementary sounds in any language, comes from the first two Gr. letters, Alpha and Beta. In contrast is Omega, the last letter of the Gr. alphabet. Combined with Alpha, it signifies completeness, as "from A to Z" in modern usage. So God is the Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End (Rev. 1:8), as is also Christ (Rev. 21:6, 22:13). Compare Isaiah 41:4, 44:6.

ALPHABET (See Writing)

ALPHAEUS (ăl-fē'-ŭs, Gr. Alphaíos). 1. Father of Levi (Mark 2:14).

2. Father of James the apostle (Matt. 10:3, Mark 3:18, Luke 6:15, Acts 1:13) and named with him to distinguish from James the brother of John.

3. Possibly Cleophas, husband of the Mary at the cross (John 19:25 cf. Mark 15:40), as Cleo- phas (Gr. Klōpas) and Alphaeus are of Semitic derivation. Unlikely the Cleopas of the Emmaus road (Luke 24:18) since Cleopas was a common Greek name.

ALTAR (awl'têr, Heb. mizbēah, meaning place of slaughter, Gr. bomós, in Acts only, and thusiastérion). Altars in Old Testament times were many and varied. Their importance is seen in that the word "altar" is used 433 times in the Bible (KJV).

Some of the early ones were crude elevations, usually of earth or stone, though other materials were sometimes employed. The shape and size varied with the kind of materials used. For instance, in I Kings 18:31 one is noted that was simply a pile of stones, while another was made of one single stone (I Sam. 14:33-35). Later on, altars were made of a great variety of materials such as bronze, horns, ashes, wood, marble, brick and alabaster. Some were very simple; others, elaborate. Cobern tells of a triangular altar found in an ancient Roman temple (Camden Cobern, The New Archeological Discoveries, New York: Funk and Wagnalls, 1921, p. 505). The usual custom of the heathen was to have their altars face the east. Sometimes upon them was carved the name of a deity or its appropriate symbol. These heathen altars varied in height depending on the kind of gods worshiped, celestial or terrestrial.

The first Hebrew altar we read about (Gen. 8:20) was the one erected by Noah after leaving the ark. Subsequently altars are spoken of as being built by Abraham (Gen. 12:7-8; 13:4,18; 22:9), Isaac (Gen. 26:25), Jacob (Gen. 35:1-7), Moses (Exod. 17:15), and Joshua (Josh. 8:30-31). Some of these must have been very simple in structure as the context of Genesis 22:9 would indicate. Most of the altars were built for sacrificial purposes, but some seem to have been largely memorial in character (Exod. 17:15-16; Josh. 22:26-27). Sometimes God stated just how the altar was to be built and of what materials.

With the erection of the tabernacle, altars were constructed by the Hebrews for two chief purposes, the offering of sacrifices and the burning of incense. Moses was commanded to make the altar of burnt offering for the tabernacle exactly as God had commanded him (Exod. 25:9). It was to be made of shittim (acacia) wood, which was to be overlaid with brass, or, as is more probable, copper. The shape was a square of five cubits which was to be three cubits high. A horn was to be made at each of the four corners. The purpose of these is uncertain. Apparently fugitives could hold to the horns for protection (I Kings 1:50-51), and sacrificial victims were bound to them (Ps. 118:27). A brass grating was placed in the center of the altar which projected through the opening on two sides.

Four rings were fastened to it in which two poles of the same material as the altar were to be placed to carry the altar. Steps leading up to the altar were forbidden (Exod. 20:26). "A septad of sacrifices were to be made 'an atonement for it' — apparently to sanctify it for the uses to which it was to be devoted (Exod. 29:37); and it was to be 'reconciled' or 'cleansed' on the Day of Atonement after the presentation of sin offerings for the high priest and the nation (Lev. 16:19,20), as if contact with the sin offering had defiled its sanctity." (W. S. Martin and A. Marshall, Tabernacle Types and Teaching, London: Pickering & Inglis, n.d., p. 34).

Certain brass utensils were made in connection with the altar. There were pans to hold the ashes, shovels for removing the ashes, basins to receive the blood and to convey it to the varied places for sprinkling, three-pronged flesh hooks with which to remove the flesh, and censers for carrying coals from the altar (Exod. 27:3). Once the fire on this altar was kindled, it was required that it burn continually (Lev. 6:13).

The altar of burnt offering was also in Solomon's temple, the second temple, and in the temple built by Herod. Its form was altered to fit into the varying sizes of these structures. Solomon made his altar of copper twenty cubits square and twenty cubits high (II Chron. 4:1). After its construction it had a very interesting history. Because idols had polluted it, King Asa had it rededicated (II Chron. 15:8). Later on Uriah had it removed from its regular place, in order, it seems, to make room for another one that he had patterned after the one Ahaz had seen in Damascus (II Kings 16:11-14). The terrible pollution of spiritual things in the reign of Ahaz led Hezekiah to cleanse the altar (II Chron. 29:12-18). Finally it was repaired and restored to its place by Manasseh (II Chron. 33:16).

In Zerubbabel's temple the altar was built first (Ezra 3:2), on the exact spot where it stood previously (Jos. Ant., 11:4, 1). After it had been desecrated by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was rebuilt, apparently with unhewn stone, by Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 4:47).

In addition to the altar for sacrifice, Moses was also commanded by God to make "an altar of incense" (Exod. 30:1), sometimes called a "golden altar" (Exod. 39:38; Num. 4:11). It was to be a cubit square and two cubits high (Exod. 30:2) with horns at each corner. It was made of shittim wood overlaid with pure gold. Around the top of this structure a crown of gold was placed beneath which were fixed two golden rings, one on each side. Staves of the same construction as the altar were placed through these rings to carry it (Exod. 30:1-5).

This altar was to be located before the veil that separated the holy place from the holy of holies, midway between the walls (Exod. 30:6; 40:5). Because of its special location, it was referred to as "the altar before the Lord" (Lev. 16:12). Elsewhere in the Bible it is referred to as "the whole altar that was by the oracle" (I Kings 6:22) and "the golden altar which is before the throne" (Rev. 8:3). Incense was burnt upon this altar twice each day (Exod. 30:7-8) and upon it was sprinkled the blood of the atonement (Exod. 30:10). The burning of incense on this altar symbolized the offering up of the believers' prayers (Rev. 8:3). It was while officiating at this altar that the angel appeared to Zacharias (Luke 1:10).

There are no altars recognized in the New Testament Church. While Hebrews 13:10 is sometimes used to prove the contrary, a careful study of this passage in its context is fatal to this idea. The idea in this passage is that Jesus Christ is the true altar of each believer. Paul mentions in Acts 17:23 the inscription "the altar to the unknown God," that had been placed over the altar erected in Athens. Such inscriptions were common in heathendom and are referred to by a number of early writers (see Augustine, The City of God 3:12).

There is good reason to feel that the need for altars was revealed to man very early as basic in approaching God. It played a leading role in all OT worship of the true God, and is seen both in and outside the Bible as playing a prominent part in most heathen religions. A careful study of the use of this article of furniture in Israel's worship furnishes us with many spiritual lessons today. It was the place of sacrifice where God was propitiated and where man was pardoned and sanctified. It looked to the great sacrifice that the Son of God was to make on the cross. The altar of sacrifice, being the first thing visible as one approached the tabernacle, spoke loudly to man that without the shedding of blood there would be no access to God and no forgiveness of sin (Heb. 9:9, 22). Most writers feel the brass or copper speaks of divine judgment. H.Z.C.

ALTASCHITH (ăl-tăs'chĭth, Heb. 'al tashēth, destroy not), a title notation in Psalms 57, 58, 59, 75. Significance uncertain. Same form found in prayer of Moses, "O Lord God, destroy not thy people" (Deut. 9:26).

ALUSH (ā'lŭsh, Heb. 'ālûsh), a desert campsite of the Israelites between Dophkah and Rephidim (Num. 33:13,14). Meaning: "crowding" (Rabbis).

ALVAH, ALIAH (ăl'và, Heb. 'alwâh), a duke of Edom (Gen. 36:40) called "Aliah" in I Chron. 1:51.

ALVAN, ALIAN (ăl'văn, Heb. 'alwān, tall), a son of Shobal the Horite (Gen. 36:23, I Chron. 1:40).

AMAD (ā'măd, Heb. 'am'ādh), a town of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:26).

AMAL (ā'măl, Heb. 'āmāl), an Asherite (I Chron. 7:35).

AMALEK (ăm'à-lĕk, Heb. 'ămālēq), son of Eliphaz (eldest son of Esau) by his concubine Timna (Gen. 36:12, I Chron. 1:36). Duke of Edom (Gen. 36:16).

AMALEKITES (ă-măl'ĕk-īts, ăm'à-lĕk-īts; Heb. 'ămālēqî), an ancient and nomadic marauding people dwelling mainly in the Negeb from the times of Abraham to Hezekiah, c. 2000-700 B.C.

HISTORY: First mention is among those smitten by Chedorlaomer in days of Abraham (Gen. 14:7). Moses felt their fury in the unprovoked attack upon the Israelites at Rephidim, for which God decreed continual war and ultimate obliteration (Exod. 17:8ff.). Joshua and the spies encountered them in Canaan and they and the Canaanites repulsed the Israelites at Hormah (Num. 14:45). During the period of the Judges they sided with the Ammonites and Moabites against the Israelites in the days of Ehud (Judg. 3:13), with the Midianites and the children of the East against Gideon (Judg. 6:3,33); and Abdon was buried "in the mount of the Amalekites" (Judg. 12:15). Saul was commissioned to destroy them utterly, but failed to do so and spared Agag (I Sam. 15:8ff.), and was himself slain by an Amalekite (II Sam. 1:8ff.). David invaded the Amalekites and other ancient inhabitants of the land from Shur to Egypt (I Sam. 27:8), and smote them severely in recovering his wives and property stolen during the raid upon Ziklag (I Sam. 30:18). They are numbered among nations subdued by him (II Sam. 8:12, I Chron. 18:11). Simeonites during the time of Hezekiah finally exterminated them (I Chron. 4:43).

DISTRIBUTION: Primarily in the Negeb SW of the Dead Sea, but also in the Sinai Peninsula from Rephidim (Exod. 17:8) to the border of Egypt (I Sam. 27:8); northward at Jezreel (Judg. 6:33), Pirathon (Judg. 12:15) and at or near Jericho (Judg. 3:13); and eastward to Mount Seir (I Chron. 4:42). See also Numbers 13:29.

ORIGIN: Unknown unless note in Genesis 14:7 is proleptic and Amalek is grandson of Esau (Gen. 36:12). Accordingly, "first of the nations" in Numbers 24:20 can be first in time, first in preeminence, or first to molest liberated Israel (at Rephidim). Arab traditions, late and conflicting, make the Amalekites stem from Ham.

CHARACTER: Warlike, usually confederate with Canaanites (Num. 14:45) or Moabites (Judg. 3:13), but sometimes alone, as at Rephidim (Exod. 17:8) and Ziklag (I Sam. 30:1). They "smote the hindmost . . . all that were feeble . . . and . . . feared not God" (Deut. 25:18), destroyed crops (Judg. 6:4). Agag likely a royal title, as Pharaoh in Egypt.

DESTINY: At Rephidim the Lord said, "I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven," and about Balaam, "his latter end shall be that he perish for ever" (Num. 24:20). Saul failed to destroy them, but David reduced them to inactivity, and the Simeonites at Mount Seir "smote the rest of the Amalekites that were escaped" (I Chron. 4:43). Archaeology has produced no evidence of them thus far. C.E.C.

AMAM (ā'-măm, Heb. 'ămām), an unidentified southern town belonging to Judah (Josh. 15:26).

AMANA, AMANAH (See Abana)

AMANA (à-mā'nà, Heb. 'ămānâh, constant (?)), a mountain near Lebanon (S of Sol. 4:8), whence flow the Amana springs (II Kings 5:12, marg.).

AMARANTHINE (ăm-à-răn'-thĭne, fadeth not away), an inheritance (I Pet. 1:4), glory (I Pet. 5:4). From amaranth, a flower which when picked does not wither; the unfading flower of the poets.

AMARIAH (ăm'à-rī'àh). 1. Levite, and ancestor of Ezra (I Chron. 6:7,11,52; Ezra 7:3).

2. Levite serving in house of the Lord under David (I Chron. 23:19; 24:23).

3. Chief priest under Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 19:11).

4. Levite under Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:15).

5. One guilty of intermarrying (Ezra 10:42).

6. Covenant signer (Neh. 10:3).

7. Levite under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:2).

8. Son of Hezekiah and great-grandfather of Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1). See also Nehemiah 11:4 and 12:13.

AMARNA, TELL EL (à-màr'nà, tĕll ĕl, the hill amarna), a name used to describe a mound of ruins in Egypt, halfway between Memphis and Luxor. It is the modern name for the ancient capital of Amenhotep IV (c. 1387-1366 B.C.). In 1887 a peasant woman, seeking the dust from ancient buildings with which to fertilize her garden, was digging in the ruins of Tell El Amarna. She found some clay tablets which she pulverized and took to her home. Finally an American missionary stationed at Luxor, Chauncey Murch, heard of this and notified some cuneiform scholars. After the site producing these tablets had been identified, it was excavated by Sir Flinders Petrie.

The excavation yielded 320 clay tablets of varying sizes with cuneiform writing upon both sides. Eighty-two are now in the British Museum; 160 in Berlin; 60 at Gizeh Museum, and the rest in private hands. They contain the private correspondence between the ruling Egyptian Pharaohs at that time and the political leaders in Palestine. It is believed they reflect the prevailing conditions that existed during the time Joshua carried on his campaigns in Palestine. Aside from confirming certain Biblical facts, they reveal the plan of Egyptian houses, thus throwing light on the early activities of Joseph in Egypt. These tablets have also provided valuable aid to scholars in establishing the Egyptian vocalic system.

AMASA (ă-mā'sà, Heb. 'ămāsā'). 1. Captain of the rebel forces under Absalom. According to II Samuel 17:25, his father was Ithra the Israelite, while Jether the Ishmeelite is given in I Chronicles 2:17. In either case, Abigail, sister of Zeruiah and David, was his mother, making him nephew to David and cousin to Absalom. Following the defeat of the rebels under Amasa and the death of Absalom by Joab in the wood of Ephraim (II Sam. 18:6ff), David made Amasa captain of the host in the place of Joab (II Sam. 19:13). When Sheba and the men of Israel rebelled, David set three days for Amasa to assemble the men of Judah (II Sam. 20:4). Amasa delayed beyond the set time, so David sent Abishai, brother of Joab, and a body of armed men after Sheba. Amasa joined forces with Abishai at "the great stone which is in Gibeon," where Joab, in feigned greeting, "took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him," and ran him through with his sword (II Sam. 20:8-10).

2. A prince of Ephraim, son of Hadlai, among those who sided with the prophet Oded in opposition to the intentions of Pekah of Israel to hold as slaves Jews taken in an attack upon Ahaz of Judah (II Chron. 28:12f).

AMASAI (à-măs'ā-ī). 1. Chief of the captains and spokesman for some men of Benjamin and Judah met by David as they came out to him at Ziklag. The Spirit came upon Amasai and he assured David of their loyalty to him (I Chron. 12:18).

2. A trumpeter among the priests in the procession bringing the ark to Jerusalem during the reign of David (I Chron. 15:24).

3. Father of Mahath, one of several Levites who sanctified themselves for the repairing of the temple during the time of Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:12). Possibly identified with "Mahath, the son of Amasai, the son of Elkanah" in I Chronicles 6:35, 36, which would make him a Levite in the line of Kohath, and progenitor of Samuel. See also I Chronincles 6:25.

AMASHAI (ā-măsh'ā-ī), a priest of the house of God at Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 11:13).

AMASIAH (ăm'ā-sī'ā, Heb. 'ămasyâh, Yahwe bears), son of Zichri who offered himself to the Lord as a captain under Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:16).

AMAZIAH (ăm-ā-zī'ā, Heb. 'ămatsyâh, whom Jehovah strengthens). 1. The ninth king of Judah (including Athaliah), lineage of David through Rehoboam (I Chron. 3:12), succeeding his father Joash who had been murdered by conspirators (II Kings 12:21). Seemingly co-regent with his father who was sick, for we read concerning Joash that the departing Syrians "left him in great diseases," and the conspirators subsequently "slew him on his bed" (II Chron. 24:25). Jehoash of Israel came to the throne in the 37th year of Joash of Judah (II Kings 13:10). Amaziah began to rule in the second year of Jehoash of Israel, which would be the 39th year of Joash of Judah (II Kings 14:1). Since Joash ruled for 40 years (II Chron. 24:1), there must have been a co-regency for at least a year.

The account of Amaziah is found chiefly in II Kings 14, with a parallel and supplementary account in II Chronicles 25. Amaziah came to the throne when 25 years old and ruled for 29 years, doing right as did his father, "but not with a perfect heart," for the high places were not taken away and the people continued to offer sacrifices and to burn incense. His first act was to slay his father's murderers, though he spared their children, as Moses had ruled in Deuteronomy 24:16. He then assembled an army of 300,000 men, appointed captains over thousands and hundreds (II Chron. 25: 5-6), and an additional 100,000 men of Israel, hired for 100 talents of silver. Warned by a man of God against using the Israelitish mercenaries, Amaziah protested the loss of his 100 talents, but, assured that "the Lord is able to give thee much more than this," he dismissed the Israelites, who returning home in anger, sacked certain cities of Judah along the way, taking away much spoil (II Chron. 25:13).

In the meantime, Amaziah went against Edom, took Selah (II Kings 14:7), possibly the rock-city now identified as Petra, slew 10,000 Edomites in battle, and slew another 10,000 captives by hurling them to death from the "top of the rock" (II Chron. 25:11-12). He brought back the gods of the Edomites and bowed down to them, offering incense, for which his destruction was foretold (II Chron. 25: 14-16). Amaziah then challenged Jehoash of Israel to war. In replying, Jehoash likened Amaziah to a "thistle" making demands of a "cedar," and advised him to be content with his victory over Edom. Amaziah persisted, so they joined in battle at Bethshemesh. The men of Judah were routed; Amaziah was captured and returned to Jerusalem, where 400 cubits of the wall facing Israel was broken down, after which Jehoash returned to Samaria, taking along hostages and treasures from the house of God and the house of the king. Fifteen years later a conspiracy made Amaziah flee to Lachish, but he was followed and killed, and his body brought back to Jerusalem.

2. A priest of Bethel, during the reign of Jeroboam II, who complained about the prophet Amos and advised him to go back to Judah, whereupon Amos prophesied his death in a foreign land and the tragic end of his wife and family (Amos 7: 10-17).

3. A Simeonite, whose son Joshah was among those who smote the remnant of Amalekites who had fled to Mount Seir (I Chron. 4:34, 43).

4. A Levite in the ancestry of the Ethan who served in the tabernacle about the time of David (I Chron. 6:45, 48). C.E.C.

AMBASSADOR, an envoy or messenger: OT Heb. tsîr, "ambassador," as in Isaiah 18:2, but "messenger," as Isaiah 57:9; mal'ākh, "ambassador," as in II Chronicles 35:21, but "messenger" in Numbers 20:14; lîts, "ambassador" as in II Chronicles 32:31, but "interpreter" in Genesis 42:23. Earliest instance is in the case of Edom and the Amorites (Num. 20:14; 21:21). Usually men of high rank, as Sennacherib's field-marshal, Tartan; chief eunuch, Rabsaris; and chief officer, Rabshakeh, met by Hezekiah's house-master, scribe and recorder (II Kings 18:17f). Note: Joshua 9:4, ". . . made as if they had been ambassadors . . ." may be read ". . . supplied themselves with provisions . . ." "We are ambassadors for Christ" (II Cor. 5: 20) and, "I am an ambassador in bonds" (Eph. 6:20), are both from presbeuein, "to be, work or travel as an envoy or ambassador." The concept of ambassador as personal representative of sovereign and state, in foreign residence, is likely foreign to the Biblical concept of messenger as ambassador.

AMBER (ăm' bêr, Heb. hash-mal, meaning unknown), only in description of color of divine glory (Ezek. 1:4, 27; 8:2). LXX eléktron, allied with eléktor, "the beaming sun," designating a compound of silver and gold.

AMEN (ā-mĕn, Heb. 'āmēn, Gr. amén), English and Greek both transliterations of Hebrew, from root meaning "confirm" or "support". LXX translates by génoito="may it become", KJV "verily." In NT as assent of congregation to utterances of leader (I Cor. 14:16); also equated with certainty of promises of God (II Cor. 1:20). General sense "so let it be," "truly," "indeed." OT: with doxologies (I Chron. 16:36, Neh. 8:6 and in the Psalms as 41:13); assent by congregation to laws (Num. 5:22, Deut. 27:15-26); oaths (Neh. 5:13); appointments (I Kings 1:36); title of God (Isa. 65:16) but KJV translates "God of truth" which suggests different Hebrew pointing; call to divine witness (Jer. 28:6). NT: To introduce a solemn saying of Jesus, always as, "Verily I say . . .," doubled always and only in John (but sometimes in OT, as Ps. 41:13 etc.); following a doxology (Rom. 11:36 etc.); following a benediction (Rom. 15:33 etc.); concluding particle at end of a writing, as frequently the Greek télos and Arabic tamm, both meaning "completion" (all but Acts, James and III John end with "Amen," with 15 benedictions, 3 doxologies and 6 unrelated); assent to forebodings (Rev. 1:7; 22:20); reverence to God (Rom. 1:25; 9:5, Rev. 1:18); title of God (Rev. 3:14 cf. Isa. 65:16).

AMETHYST (See Minerals)

AMI or AMON (ā'mī, Heb. 'āmî), a servant of Solomon (Ezra 2:57), called Amon in Neh. 7:59.

AMINADAB (See Amminidab)

AMITTAI (ă-mĭt'ī, Heb. 'ămittay, faithful), father of Jonah (II Kings 14:25, Jonah 1:1).

AMMAH (ăm'ā, Heb. 'ammâh, mother, or beginning), a hill facing Giah by way of the wilderness of Gibeon, where Joab and Abishai stopped at sundown in their pursuit of Abner after Asahel's death (II Sam. 2:24).

AMMAN (see Rabbah)

AMMI (ăm'ī, Heb. 'ammî, my people), a symbolic name given to Israel (Hos. 2:1) predictive of God's reconciliation to them, in contrast to sinful Israel represented by Hosea's son Lo-ammi, "not my people" (Hos. 1:9). See Rom. 9:25,26.

AMMIEL (ăm'ĭ-ĕl, Heb. 'ammî'ēl, my kinsman is God). 1. The son of Gemalli and spy of the tribe of Dan sent out by Moses (Num. 13:12).

2. The father of Machir, of Lo-debar (II Sam. 9:4,5; 17:27).

3. The father of Bath-sheba, one of David's wives (I Chron. 3:5).

4. The sixth son of Obed-edom who, with his family, was associated with the Tabernacle porters (I Chron. 26:5).

AMMIHUD (ă-mī'hŭd, Heb. 'ammîhûdh, my kinsman is glorious). 1. The father of Elishama, chief of Ephraim (Num. 1:10, 2:18, 7:48,53).

2. A man of Simeon and father of Shemuel (Num. 34:20).

3. A Naphtalite whose son, Pedahel, also assisted in the division of the land (Num. 34:28).

4. Father of Talmai and king of Geshur. Absalom fled to Talmai after he slew his brother Amnon (II Sam. 13:37).

5. Son of Omri, father of Uthai (I Chron. 9:4).

AMMINADAB (ă-mĭn'ā-dăb, Heb. 'ammînādhāv, my people is willing or my kinsman is generous).

1. A Levite. Aaron's father-in-law (Exod. 6:23).

2. A prince of Judah (Num. 1:7, 2:3, 7:12,17, 10:14, Ruth 4:19,20, I Chron. 2:10).

3. A son of Kohath, son of Levi (I Chron. 6:22). Perhaps the same as No. 1.

4. A Kohathite who assisted in the return of the Ark from the house of Obed-edom (I Chron. 15:10,11).

AMMISHADDAI (ăm-ĭ-shăd'ī, an ally is the Almighty), father of Abiezer, captain of the tribe of Dan in Moses' time (Num. 1:12, 2:25, 7:66,71, 10:25).

AMMIZABAD (ă-mĭz'a-băd, Heb. 'ammîzāvādh, my kinsman hath endowed, made a present), son of Benaiah, third of David's captains (I Chron. 27:6).

AMMON (ăm'ŏn, Heb. 'ammôn, a people). Ammon or Ben-ammi is the name of one of the sons of Lot born to him by his youngest daughter in the neighborhood of Zoar (Gen. 19:38). He was the father of the Ammonites, who occupied an area of land E of the Dead Sea in the land of Gilead.

AMMONITES (ăm'ŏn-īts, Heb. 'ammônîm), the name given to the descendants of Ben-ammi or Ammon (Gen. 19:38). They were related to the Moabites by ancestry (Gen. 19:38) and often appear in the Scriptures in united effort. Because by ancestry they were related to Israel, reflected in the name by which they are often called in the OT, Ben-ammi "children of my people," the Israelites were told by the Lord not to enter into the battle with them as they journeyed towards the land of Canaan (Deut. 2:19). Lot fled from the destruction of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, and dwelt in the mountains to the E of the Dead Sea. In this area God gave a tract of land for the Ammonites (Deut. 2:19), who occupied the land just east of Moab. It stretched to the N as far as the Jabbok River and on the S to the hills of Edom. Many years later the Ammonites made war with Israel in order to extend their borders farther west. However, though this land never really belonged to the Ammonites, they claimed it, and gave this as a reason for their aggression (Judg. 11:13).

Unable to expand westward and not desiring the desert tract of land on the E the Ammonites were confined to a small area. Although they were a nomadic people, they did have a few cities, their capital, Rabbath-Ammon, being the more famous.

The people were fierce in nature, rebellious against Israel and idolatrous in their religious practices. They threatened to thrust out the right eye of all in Jabesh Gilead (I Sam. 11:2). They were given to brutish murder (Jer. 40:14; 41:5-7; Amos 1:14). Though related to Israel, they refused to help them when asked (Deut. 23:4) and they joined with Moab in securing Balaam to curse them (Deut. 23:3-4). Later on in Israel's history they united with Sanballat to oppose the work of Nehemiah in restoring the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10,19). In religion they were a degraded, idolatrous people. Their chief idol was Molech, to whom they were guilty of offering human sacrifices (I Kings 11:7).

Because of their sins and especially because they constantly opposed Israel, Ezekiel predicted their complete destruction (Ezek. 25:1-7). Their last stand seems to have been against Judas Maccabeus (I Macc. 5:6). H.Z.C.

AMNON (ăm'nŏn). 1. Son of David by Ahinoam. By contrivance, he forced his half-sister Tamar as she tended him during a pretended sickness. For this he was later murdered by Tamar's brother Absalom.

2. A son of Shimon, of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

AMOK (ā'mŏk, Heb. 'āmôq), chief of priests who returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Neh. 12:7, 20).

AMON (ā'mŏn, Heb. 'āmôn), the successor and son of king Manasseh and the father of the illustrious king Josiah. Since this name was identical with that of the Egyptian deity, it is thought that perhaps Manasseh named him while he was still in idolatry. He was an evil king and after two years of reign was slain by officials of his household (II Kings 21:19-26; II Chron. 33:21-25).

2. The governor of Samaria to whom Micaiah the prophet was committed by Ahab the king of Israel because he had predicted the king's death (I Kings 22:15-28).

3. One of Solomon's servants (Neh. 7:57-59), though sometimes he is called Ami (Ezra 2:57).

AMON (ā'mon, Heb. 'āmôn), a city thought by most scholars to be the same as No (Jer. 46:25; Ezek. 30:14-15,16; Nah. 3:8), and as No-Amon. The word "sea" in Nahum 3:8 has given rise to some difficulty as to the location of this ancient city. However, the Nile is called "the sea" because of its appearance at the time of its flood stage, or this designation is used of the Nile in a poetic fashion (Job 41:31; Isa. 18:2). Therefore, this city in the days of Nahum, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel is today identified as Thebes.

Thebes is the Greek name of this old capital of Upper Egypt. It was called "No Amon" meaning "city of Amon," because this was the name of its chief deity. It was an obscure city in the old kingdom, but it became the capital of the middle kingdom commonly known as the Theban. This included the 11th through the 14th dynasties. It lessened in importance during period of the Hyksos, but with their expulsion it again became the capital. It was in this period that the city rose to the height of its fame. It has a number of famous temples and tombs. Perhaps the most famous tomb, discovered in 1922, was the tomb of Tutankhamen, with all of its equipment still intact.

AMORITE (ăm'ō-rīt, Heb. 'ĕmōrî, mountain dwellers). Although this word in the Hebrew is always in the singular, it is used collectively of that tribe of people who, according to Genesis 10:16, descended from Canaan. They probably were east Semites and while not Akkadians, were very closely akin to them.

They were a very prominent people in pre-Israelitish days, for it is believed that at one time their kingdom occupied the larger part of Mesopotamia and Syria, with their capital at Haran. The Mari tablets throw a flood of light on them, and it is now thought that Amraphel, king of Shinar (Gen. 14:1), was one of their kings. People from the north drove them from this region, causing them to settle in Babylonia, where they brought the entire area under their control, giving to Babylonia one of the richest periods in her history. When, after several hundred years, they were defeated by the Hitties, they settled throughout a large portion of Canaan and may even have ruled in Egypt for a time.

We do know that during their supremacy in Canaan they marched on the kingdom of Moab and under the leadership of king Sihon subdued a large portion of this land, in which they settled (Num. 21:13, 26-31). Joshua speaks of their land as E of the Jordan (Josh. 24:8), but Moses tells of their abode as being on the western shore of the Dead Sea (Gen. 14:7), on the plain Mamre (Gen. 14:13) and around Mount Hermon (Deut. 3:8). They were apparently a very wicked people, for God told Abraham that his descendants would mete out His vengeance on this people when their iniquity was full (Gen. 15:16). Under Moses' leadership this judgment was dealt to Og, king of Bashan, and to Sihon, king of Heshbon, the kings of the Amorites east of the Jordan. Their territory was subdued and given to Reuben, which he held for 500 years until it fell to Moab. This was a very rich land, being attractive to both farmers and herdsmen. Joshua met these people in battle in the united campaign of the five Amoritish kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish and Eglon (Josh. 10:1-43). These battles (Josh. 11:1-14), fought by Joshua under divine leadership, ended forever Amorite hostilities against Israel (I Sam. 7:14 and I Kings 9:20-21). H.Z.C.

AMOS (ā'mŏs, Heb. 'āmôs, Gr. Amós, burden-bearer), was one of the colorful personalities in an era which saw the rise of several towering prophetic figures. His ministry occurred in the reign of Jeroboam II (c. 786-746 B.C.), the son of king Jehoash of the Jehu dynasty. Due to the removal of Benhadad III of Syria as a military threat, the northern kingdom had been able to consolidate its hold on Damascus and extend its borders northwards to the pass of Hamath. To the south and east its territorial acquisitions equaled those of the early kingdom period under David and Solomon. While Assyria was becoming an increasingly serious political threat, its military might under Tiglath-pileser III was still a distant prospect when Jeroboam II began to rule Israel.

His forty-year reign was one of great prosperity for the northern kingdom, approaching in character the "golden age" of David and Solomon. With the threat of war removed, a cultural, social and economic revival took place. The expansion of trade and commerce resulted in a steady drift from country to city, and the small towns in the northern kingdom gradually became overcrowded. But prosperity was accompanied by an almost unprecedented degree of social corruption (Amos 2:6-8; 5:11-12) caused principally by the demoralizing influence of Canaanite Baal worship, which had been fostered at the local shrines from the time when the northern kingdom had assumed a separate existence.

Archaeological discoveries in Palestine have furnished a dramatic picture of the extent to which this depraved, immoral religion exerted its corrupting influences over the Israelites. Characteristic of the ritual observances were drunkenness, violence, gross sensuality and idolatrous worship. The effect of this demoralizing religion upon Hebrew society was seen in the corruption of justice, in wanton and luxurious living, and in the decay of social unity. The rich manifested no sense of responsibility towards the poor, and instead of relieving their economic distress, seemed bent upon devising new means of depriving them of their property.

To this perilous situation Amos brought a message of stern denunciation. Although he was not an inhabitant of the northern kingdom he was painfully aware of its moral, social and religious shortcomings. Amos lived in the small mountain village of Tekoa, which lay to the south of Jerusalem on the borders of the extensive upland pastures of Judah. By trade he was a herdsman of sheep and goats (7:14), and was also engaged in dressing the sycamore-fig tree, whose fruit needs to be incised about four days before the harvest to hasten the ripening process. His background was of a strictly agricultural nature, and his work afforded him ample time for meditating upon God's laws and their meaning for wayward Israel.

On receiving his call, Amos protested vigorously against the luxurious and careless living characteristic of Samaria, castigated the elaborate offerings made at the shrines of Beersheba and Gilgal, and stated flatly that ritual could never form an acceptable substitute for righteousness. He asserted the moral jurisdiction of God over all nations (1:3,6,9,11; 2:1,4,6) and warned the Israelites that unless they repented of their idolatry, and following a renewed spiritual relationship with God, commenced to redress social inequalities, they would fall victim to the invader from the East. So great was the impact of this vigorous personality that Amos was accused of sedition by Amaziah, the idolatrous high priest of Bethel (7:10 seq.). In reply Amos pointed out that he had no connection with any prophetic order, nor was he linked in any way politically with the house of David. Instead he was called by God to prophesy the captivity of an unrepentant Israel.

The style of his book, though simple, is picturesque, being marked by striking illustrations taken from his rural surroundings. His work as a herdsman was clearly not incompatible either with a knowledge of history (9:7) or with an ability to assess the significance of contemporary political and religious trends. The integrity of his book has suffered little at the hands of modern critical scholars.

Analysis:

1-2. The indictment of foreign nations including Judah and Israel.
3.1-5.17. The condemnation of wicked Samaria.
5.18-6.14. False security exposed; judgment foretold.
7.1-9.10. Five visions illustrate Divine forbearance and justice; Amos' reception at Bethel (7.10-17).
9.11-15. Epilogue promising restoration and prosperity.

R.K.H.

AMOZ (ā'mŏz, Heb. 'āmôts), the father of the prophet Isaiah (II Kings 19:2,20, Isa. 1:1, etc.).

AMPHIPOLIS (ăm-fĭp'ō-lĭs, Gr. Amphípolis, a city pressed on all sides), a city of Macedonia, situated on a bend of the river Strymon, founded by the Athenians in the fifth century B.C. and under the Romans, the capital of one of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided. It was a military post on the Via Egnatia, 33 miles SW of Philippi. Paul passed through it on the way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

AMPLIAS (ăm'plĭ-ăs, Gr. Ampliás), ASV, RSV, Ampliatus (ăm'plĭ-ā'tŭs), a Christian to whom Paul sent a greeting (Rom. 16:8).

AMRAM (ăm'răm, Heb. 'amrām, people exalted). 1. A descendant of Levi and of Kohath, and father of Aaron, Moses and Miriam (Exod. 6:18,20, Num. 26:59, I Chron. 6:3).

2. A son of Bani, who married a foreign wife during the exile (Ezra 10:34).

3. A son of Dishon, descendant of Anah (I Chron. 1:41). ASV, RSV have Hamran.

AMRAPHEL (ăm'rà-fĕl, Heb. 'amrāphel), king of Shinar, one of four kings, led by Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, who invaded Palestine to crush a rebellion (Gen. 14). After pillaging Sodom and Gomorrah, they took Lot and his goods and departed. Amraphel has been identified with Hammurabi, king of Babylon, whose reign has been variously dated from 1760 to 2100 B.C., but leading Babylonologists doubt whether there is any connection.

AMULET (ăm'ŭ-lĕt,), occurs once in ASV, RSV, Isa. 3:20), never in KJV. It translates the plural of Heb. Iāhash, meaning "serpent-charmer" as shown by KJV of Jeremiah 8:17, and ASV, RSV of Ecclesiastes 10:11, Isaiah 3:3, etc. Amulets have been worn from earliest times to ward off harm from snake-bites, diseases and other dangers. They were commonly stones, gems, or clay figurines, representing animals or gods, or scrolls inscribed with sacred words and were worn usually suspended from the neck.

AMUN (See Amon)

AMZI (ăm'zī, Heb. 'amtsî). 1. A descendant of Merari and of Levi, and progenitor of Ethan, whom David set over the service of song (I Chron. 6:44-46).

2. Ancestor of Adaiah, a priest in the second Temple (Neh. 11:12).

ANAB (ā'năb, Heb. 'ānāv, grapes), a city of the Anakim, taken by Joshua (Josh. 11:21). It fell to Judah (Josh. 15:50). SE of Debir, SW of Hebron, it retains its ancient name.

ANAH (ā'nà, Heb. 'ănâh). 1. Daughter of Zibeon and mother of Aholibamah, Esau's wife (Gen. 36:2,14,25).

2. Son of Seir, duke of Edom (Gen. 36:20,29, I Chron. 1:38).

3. Son of Zibeon (Gen. 36:24, I Chron. 1:40, 41).

Taking the names as names of individuals, the above is what the text gives us, except that in Genesis 36:14 "son" may be a better reading than "daughter." Taking the names as clan-names, there may be confusion as to the origin and relationships of kindred groups.

ANAHARATH (à-nā'hà-răth, Heb. 'anāhărāth), a town in the territory of Issachar, in the valley of Jezreel, near Shunem, Nain, and Endor. Modern en-Naura (Josh. 19:19).

ANAIAH (à-nī'àh, Heb. 'ānāyâh, Jehovah has answered). 1. A prince or priest who assisted in the reading of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

2. A Jew who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:22). Nos. 1 and 2 may be the same person.

ANAK (ā'năk, Heb. 'ānāq, long necked), descendant of Arba (Josh. 15:13) and ancestor of the Anakim (Num. 13:22,28,33).

ANAKIM (ăn'à-kĭm, Heb. 'ănāqîm), also called "sons (children) of Anak" or "of the Anakim." The spies compared them to the giants of Genesis 6:4

(ASV, RSV, Nephilim); also they were reckoned among the Rephaim (Deut. 2:11, ASV, RSV). Three chiefs of the Anakim were in Hebron (Num. 13:22) from the time of the spies till Caleb took it (Josh. 15:13,14). Remnants of them remained in Gaza, Gath and Ashdod (Josh. 11:21, 22).

ANAMIM (ăn'ȧ-mĭm, Heb. 'ănāmîm), a people descended from Mizraim (Gen. 10:13, I Chron. 1:11) of whom nothing further is known.

ANAMMELECH (ȧ-năm'ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ănammelekh), one of the gods of Sepharvaim, worshiped by colonists from that city settled in Samaria by order of the king of Assyria. The identity and location of Sepharvaim and the character of Anammelech are disputed (II Kings 17:31).

ANAN (ā'năn, Heb. 'ānān, cloud), a returned exile who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:26).

ANANI (ȧ-nā'nī, Heb. 'ănānî), a son of Elioenai, of the family of David (I Chron. 3:24).

ANANIAH (ăn'ȧ-nī'ȧh, Heb. 'ănanyâh, Jehovah is a protector). 1. The father of Maaseiah and grandfather of Azariah (Neh. 3:23).

2. A town of Benjamin (Neh. 11:32).

ANANIAS (ăn'ȧ-nī'ăs, Gr. form of Heb. hănanyâh, Jehovah has been gracious). 1. Husband of Sapphira (Acts 5:1-11). He and his wife pretended to give to the church all they received from a sale of property, but kept back part. When Peter denounced his deceit, Ananias fell down dead. The generosity of others (Acts 4:32-37) accentuates the meanness of Ananias. Yet lying to the Holy Spirit, rather than greed, was the sin for which he was punished. That his was the first gross act of disobedience within the church justifies the severity of the punishment. Peter rather prophesied than decreed his death, which was a penalty God inflicted.

2. A disciple of Damascus, who, obeying a vision, was the means of healing the sight of Saul of Tarsus, and of introducing him to the Christians of Damascus (Acts 9:10-19). In Acts 22:12-16, Paul recalls Ananias' part in his conversion, and speaks of him as "a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt" in Damascus.

3. A high priest before whom Paul was tried in Jerusalem (Acts 23:1-5). Paul, whether because of poor eyesight, or momentary forgetfulness, or Ananias' unpriestly behavior, reviled him, and promptly apologized. Ananias came down to Caesarea in person to accuse Paul before the Roman governor Felix (Acts 24:1). E.R.

ANAT (ā'năt) or Anu, Babylonian-Assyrian god of the sky, first named in a triad with Bel and Ea.

ANATH (ā'năth, Heb. 'ănāth), father of Shamgar, third judge after Joshua (Judg. 3:31; 5:6).

ANATHEMA (ȧ-năth'ĕ-mȧ, Gr. anáthema, the rendering in the LXX and in the NT of the Hebrew herem; anything devoted). A thing devoted to God becomes His and is therefore irrevocably withdrawn from common use. A person so devoted is doomed to death — a death implying moral worthlessness (Lev. 27:28,29; I Cor. 12:3; 16:22; Gal. 1:9; Rom. 9:3).

ANATHEMA MARANATHA (ȧ-năth'ĕ-mȧ mâr'-ȧ-năth'ȧ). The words were formerly interpreted as a double imprecation, but are now believed to have no necessary connection. Maranatha is a distinct sentence made up of two Aramaic words, either Maran atha, "Our Lord is come or comes," or Marana tha, "Our Lord, come," and was probably a widely-used expression among early Christians to indicate their fervent hope in the speedy return of Christ (I Cor. 16:22).

ANATHOTH (ăn'ȧ-thŏth, Heb. 'ănāthôth, probably the plural of "Anath," a goddess). 1. A city of Benjamin assigned to the priests (Josh. 21:18), the native place of Abiathar the high priest (I Kings 2:26) and Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. 1:1). Two of David's distinguished soldiers, Abiezer (II Sam. 23:27) and Jehu (I Chron. 12:3), also lived there.

2. A Benjamite, the son of Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

3. A leader of the men of Anathoth who sealed the covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. 10:19).

ANCHOR (Gr. ángkyra). In ancient times every ship carried several anchors. In successive periods they were made of stone, iron, lead, and perhaps other metals. Each had two flukes, and was held by a cable or a chain. The word is used only in Acts 27:29,30,40 and Hebrews 6:19: in Acts, in connection with Paul's journey to Rome, and in Hebrews, in a figurative sense.

ANCIENT OF DAYS. In Daniel 7:9,13,22, God, as He appeared in a vision to the Prophet. Compare "the likeness as the appearance of a man" in Ezekiel 1:26, where "the voice of the Almighty" has been heard (Ezek. 1:24); also the appearance of Christ in Revelation 1:12-16.

ANCIENTS (ān'shĕnts). This word (except in one instance — I Sam. 24:13) renders a Hebrew word which should always be translated "old men" or "elders"— men of age and experience.

ANDREW (ăn'drōo, Gr. Andréas, manly), the brother of Simon Peter, and son of Jonas, of Bethsaida on the Sea of Galilee (John 1:44). He was a fisherman, like his brother, with whom he lived at Capernaum (Mark 1:29). John the Baptist, whose disciple he was, directed him to Jesus as the Lamb of God. Convinced that Jesus was the Messiah, he forthwith brought his brother to Jesus (John 1:25-42). Subsequently Jesus called the two brothers to abandon their fishing and take up permanent fellowship with Him (Matt. 4:18,19); and later Jesus appointed him an apostle (Matt. 10:2; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). In the lists of the apostles his name always appears next to that of Philip, who was also from Bethsaida, and with whom he is associated at the feeding of the 5,000, where he expressed doubt that the multitude could be fed with the lad's five loaves and two fishes (John 6:6-9), and also at the request of the Greeks to see Jesus (John 12:22). Andrew was one of the four who asked Jesus about the destruction of the Temple and the time of the Second Advent. After Acts 1:13 he is never mentioned again. According to tradition, he preached in Scythia and suffered martyrdom in Achaia, being crucified on an X-shaped cross, now called a St. Andrew's cross.

ANDRONICUS (ăn'drō-nī'kŭs, Gr. Andrónikos), a Jewish believer, once a fellow-prisoner of Paul, to whom the apostle sent a greeting (Rom. 16:7).

ANEM (ā'nĕm, Heb. 'ānēm), a city of Issachar, set aside for the Levites (I Chron. 6:73). Omitted in the parallel list in Joshua 21:29.

ANER (ā'nêr, Heb. 'ānēr). 1. A brother of Mamre the Amorite, Abraham's ally in battle (Gen. 14:13,24).

2. A Levitical city in Manasseh (I Chron. 6:70).

ANGEL (Gr. ángelos, messenger), a supernatural or heavenly being a little higher in dignity than man. Angels are created beings (Ps. 148:2-5, Col. 1:16). Scripture does not tell us the time of their creation, but it was certainly before the creation of man (Job 38:7). They are described as "spirits" (Heb. 1:14). Although without a bodily organism, they have often revealed themselves in bodily form to man. Jesus said that they do not marry and do not die (Luke 20:34-36). They therefore constitute a company, not a race developed from one original pair. Scripture describes them as personal beings, not mere personifications of abstract good and evil. Although possessed of superhuman intelligence, they are not omniscient (Matt. 24:36; I Peter 1:12); and although stronger than men, they are not omnipotent (Ps. 103:20; II Peter 2:11; II Thess. 1:7). They are not glorified human beings, but are distinct from man (I Cor. 6:3; Heb. 1:14). There is a vast multitude of them. John said, "I heard the voice of many angels . . . and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands" (Rev. 5:11). They are of various ranks and endowments (Col. 1:16), but only one — Michael — is expressly called an archangel in Scripture (Jude 9). This great host of angels, both good and bad, is highly organized (Rom. 8:38; Eph. 1:21; 3:10; Col. 1:16; 2:15).

Angels were created holy (Gen. 1:31; Jude 6), but after a period of probation some fell from their state of innocence (II Peter 2:4; Jude 6). Scripture is silent regarding the time and cause of their fall, but it is clear that it occurred before the fall of man (for Satan deceived Eve in the Garden of Eden) and that it was due to a deliberate, self-determined rebellion against God, as a result of which they lost their original holiness, became corrupt, and were confirmed in evil. Some were "cast down to hell," where they are held in chains until the day of judgment (II Peter 2:4); while others were left free, and they oppose the work of God.

The work of the angels is varied. Good angels stand in the presence of God and worship Him (Matt. 18:10; Rev. 5:11; Heb. 1:6). They assist, protect, and deliver God's people (Gen. 19:11; Ps. 91:11; Dan. 3:28; 6:22; Acts 5:19). The author of Hebrews says (1:14), "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" They sometimes guide God's children, as when one told Philip to go into the desert near Gaza (Acts 8:26), and they bring encouragement, as when one spoke encouragingly to Paul in Corinth (Acts 27:23,24). Sometimes they interpret God's will to men (Dan. 7:16; 10:5,11; Zech. 1:9,13,14,19). They execute God's will towards individuals and nations (Acts 12:23; Gen. 19:12,13; II Sam. 24:16; Ezek. 9:2, 5,7). The affairs of nations are guided by them (Dan. 10:12,13,20). God uses them to punish His enemies (II Kings 19:35; Acts 12:23).

Angels had a large place in the life and ministry of Christ. They made their appearance in connection with His birth to Mary, Joseph, and the shepherds. After the wilderness temptation of Christ they ministered to Him (Matt. 4:11); an angel strengthened Him in the Garden (Luke 22:43); an angel rolled away the stone from the tomb (Matt. 28:2-7); and angels were with Him at the ascension (Acts 1:11).

As for the evil angels, it is clear that their principal purpose is to oppose God and to try to defeat His will and frustrate His plans. The word "Satan" means adversary, and Scripture shows him to be the adversary of both God and man. All of his many other names show his nefarious character. Evil angels endeavor to separate believers from God (Rom. 8:38). They oppose good angels in their work (Dan. 10:12,13). They hinder man's temporal and eternal welfare by a limited control over natural phenomena (Job. 1:12,13,19; 2:7), by inflicting disease (Luke 13:11,16; Acts 10:38; II Cor. 12:7), by tempting man to sin (Matt. 4:3; John 13:27; I Peter 5:8), and by spreading false doctrine (I Kings 22:21-23; II Thess. 2:2; I Tim. 4:1). They cannot, however, exercise over men any moral power independent of the human will, and whatever power they have is limited by the permissive will of God.

Scripture shows that good angels will continue in the service of God in the future age, while evil angels will have their part in the lake of fire (Matt. 25:41). S.B.

ANGEL OF THE LORD. In the OT we find the oft-recurring phrase, "the angel of the Lord," in which, in almost every case, this messenger is regarded as deity and yet is distinguished from Jehovah (Gen. 16:7-14; Gen. 22:11-18; Gen. 31:11,13; Exod. 3:2-5; Num. 22:22-35; Judg. 6:11-23, 13:2-25; I Chron. 21:15-17; I Kings 19:5-7). There is good reason for thinking that He is the pre-incarnate Logos, his appearance in angelic or human form foreshadowing His coming in the flesh.

ANGER, used of both the anger of man and of God, but oftener of the latter. The early Hebrews, observing that when a man is angry his nose swells and his nostrils quiver, sometimes used the expression "his nose burned" for "he became angry" (Gen. 30:2; Exod. 4:14). God's anger differs from man's in that it is a holy wrath, directed against sin.

ANIAM (ā-nī'ăm, Heb. 'ănî'ām, lament of the people), a son of Shemidah, a Manassehite (I Chron. 7:19).

ANIM (ā'nĭm, Heb. 'ānîm), a city in the southern hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:50), probably the ruins of el-Ghuwein S of Eshtemoa.

ANIMALS OF THE BIBLE. As there are far more references to mammals in the Bible than to any other animal forms, with the possible exceptions of insects and birds, the first part of this section treats of mammals, listing them alphabetically. Non-mammalian animals included here are dealt with separately. These include sponges, corals, mollusks, and three other classes of vertebrates besides mammals, viz., fishes, amphibians and reptiles.

Instead of discussing such forms as ox, bull, bullock, calf, cow, and heifer under separate headings, they have been included under the heading of "Cattle." Similarly, under "Horses" are included colt, foal, and ass; and under "Sheep" will be found lamb, ram and ewe.

Comparisons of the names given to the different animals were made as they occur in the Revised Standard Version, the American Standard Version, and the King James Version. An attempt has been made to include all of these mentioned in the last-named version.

Apes. King Solomon sent ships once every three years to Tarshish to obtain gold, silver, apes and other treasures. Although the identity of Tarshish is uncertain, it seems probable that the rhesus monkey of India, the one so popular in present-day zoos, was the animal meant. The term ape is now more restricted in meaning than formerly and would exclude the monkey.

Ass. More than 150 verses in the Bible refer to the ass. Along with zebras and horses they constitute the horse family, Equidae. The domesticated ass or donkey has served man for thousands of years, and is believed to have been derived from the still-existing Abyssinian or Somali Wild Ass. The ass is better at carrying loads, and is more sure-footed on mountain trails than the horse.

Abraham is believed to have owned asses that he took into Egypt, and Egyptians used them in monument building in 3000 B.C. White asses were more highly esteemed and commanded a higher price. The number of asses an Old Testament worthy owned was an indication of his wealth. Heavy farm work was done by them and they were also used as saddle animals, being preferred by rulers and great men for peaceful journeys. Horses were reserved for war. Jesus entered Jerusalem on the colt of an ass. Balaam rode a she-ass that was given the power of speech by the Lord in order to rebuke him. Samson used the jawbone of an ass to slay a thousand Philistines. Israelites were commanded neither to covet an ass nor to plow with an ox and an ass together. On one occasion they captured 61,000 asses from the Midianites.

Badger. Where references in Exodus and Numbers in the KJV mention "Badgers' skins," the RSV uses "goatskins." The badger as we know it is not found in Bible lands. European badgers have a wide distribution but are fierce fighters and hardly seem to satisfy the requirements for the dozen references found in the Scriptures. To have constructed a covering seventy-five feet by forty-five feet for the tabernacle from their skins would have required a considerable number of animals. It seems much more probable that goats both domesticated and available in numbers would have been used to provide the skins. Some have suggested that badgers' skins were made from a seal or cetacean.

Bats. Although bats are mammals they are named along with birds in the Scriptures. The bats of Palestine according to Wiley are mostly insectivorous but this statement has been questioned by one who has more recently lived for a considerable period in the Bible Lands. Among the approximately two thousand kinds throughout the world are fruit, meat, fish, nectar, and blood eaters. All are equipped with a natural "radar" system; most are social and nocturnal. The Bible classified them as unclean.

Bears. Fourteen references to bears occur. The "Syrian Brown Bear," Ursus syriacus, is the bear of the Old Testament. After Elisha's bald head (an unusual spectacle among the Hebrews) had drawn the mistreatment of the forty-two youths, two she bears appeared and tore them. On another occasion David fought and killed a bear while guarding his flocks. If, as some believe, Palestine was once much more heavily wooded, such encounters would appear more likely. The prophets Isaiah, Daniel, and John all had visions in which the bear figured prominently.

Behemoth. The hippopotamus is thought by some to be the animal Job had in mind. Known as the "River horses of Africa," they are bulky, ungainly, short-legged creatures weighing up to four tons. They sleep by day, blow and snort at night, and can swim, float, or sink and run along on the bottom.

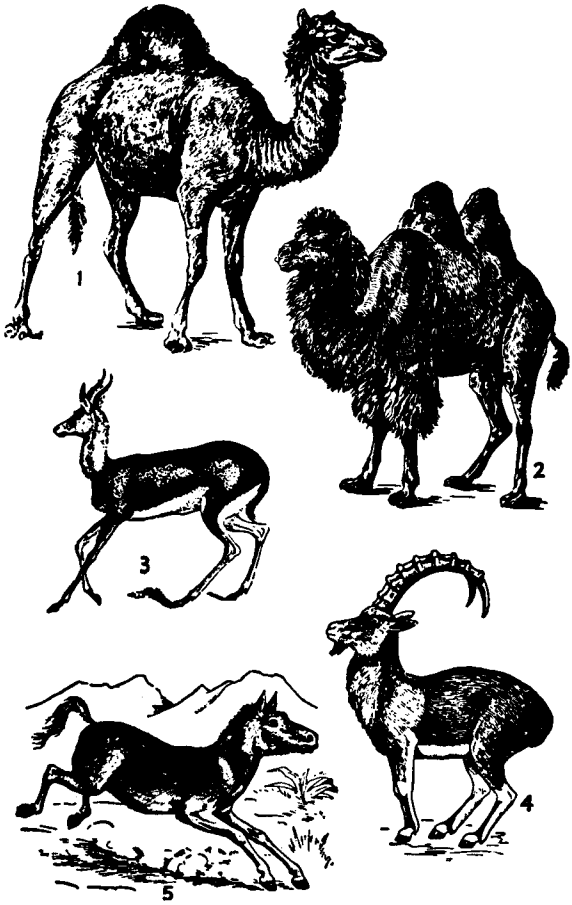
The elephant has also been named as the animal meant by "Behemoth." The fact that the Arabs traded extensively in ivory, that the elephant has a larger tail than a hippo's, and the manner of visibly taking copious draughts of water, all are presented as evidence that the animal that "moveth his tail like a cedar" and "drinketh up a river, and hasteth not" was surely an elephant (Job 40:17,23).

Boar. In Psalm 80:13 the wild "boar from the forest" is said to destroy the vine, but other references imply domesticated swine. Although the meat of swine was forbidden as food for the Israelites, in one instance a herd of two thousand was found in the country of the Gadarenes (Mark 5:11-13). The prodigal's degradation led to the feeding of swine (Luke 15:15,16). Warning was given not to cast pearls before swine.

Wild pigs are very fierce, courageous, and swift, and have been hunted as game animals for hundreds of years. Domestication by the Chinese occurred at a very early time. Pigs reproduce prolifically and are a good source of meat that can be easily preserved owing to the readiness with which it absorbs salt.



1. Dromedary (one hump). 2. Camel (two humps). 3. Gazelle. 4. Ibex, or wild goat. 5. Onager, or wild ass. DV

Camel. The Bible is reported to contain sixty-six references to the camel. These animals are very hardy, can endure privation, can withstand temperature extremes very well, and have a life span of forty to fifty years. They are cud-chewing vegetarians with a three-chambered stomach that can store a three days' water supply. In their hump a reserve supply of food is stored in the form of fat.

Camel's hair is used in cloth making. Their flesh and milk are esteemed by natives in certain areas. As beasts of burden the two-humped Bactrian camel can carry about four hundred pounds and in caravans covers about thirty miles per day. The one-humped camel or dromedary has longer legs, travels faster, and in a twenty-four hour day may cover more than 150 miles, and more often is the one used for riding and for carrying mail.

Job had three thousand camels and after prosperity returned to him he had six thousand. Abraham was rich in camels. In Matthew 19:24 the difficulty of a camel passing through the eye of a needle is mentioned. Oriental cities had small gates called "needle's eyes" for admitting late travelers, after the main gates had closed. To pass, the camel had to kneel down, be unloaded, work its way through on its knees.

Cattle. Cattle of today are descendants of wild forms such as the Aurochs, or Urus, Bos taurus primigenius, that occurred in parts of Europe and Northern Africa. These, like other members of the family Bovidae, are true ruminants with cloven hoofs and hence a very important item of food. As ruminants they have the four-chambered stomach enabling them to masticate their food leisurely and thoroughly.

Part of the loot in a battle between the Israelites and the Midianites consisted of seventy-two thousand beeves (Num. 31:33). A portion of Jacob's wealth consisted of forty kine and ten bulls (Gen. 32:15). Calves were valued for food, sacrifice, and idolatrous worship. It was a calf that was prepared upon the prodigal son's return. Calf-worship like that practiced by the Egyptians, was indulged in under the leadership of Aaron and of Jeroboam. Prophets Isaiah, Ezekiel, and John had visions in which the calf had a part. Bullocks were extensively used, particularly in the consecration of the Levites, the sacrificing of the priests, and in making sin offerings for the congregation. During the revivals under a number of Old Testament leaders, great numbers of bullocks along with rams and lambs were sacrificed. When Solomon built the temple he included in it a molten sea of brass supported by twelve brazen bulls (I Kings 7:25). David's distress when hunted by Saul was stated thus, "Many bulls have compassed me; strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round" (Ps. 22:12).

Cattle are mentioned in the first chapter of the Bible and constituted much of the wealth of Abraham and his descendants. Cattle figure prominently in the account of Joseph, Pharaoh, and the Egyptians. While wandering forty years the Israelites killed very few animals for food and consequently lusted for flesh. Heavy judgments upon the Egyptians in the time of Moses, and upon the Israelites in later times included the destruction or loss of their cattle.

The products which gave cattle much of their value are milk, butter, cheese, and leather. To describe Canaan as a place of prosperity it was called "a land flowing with milk and honey." While milk and butter are nourishing, Paul was distressed that the Corinthians had need of milk rather than of strong meat.

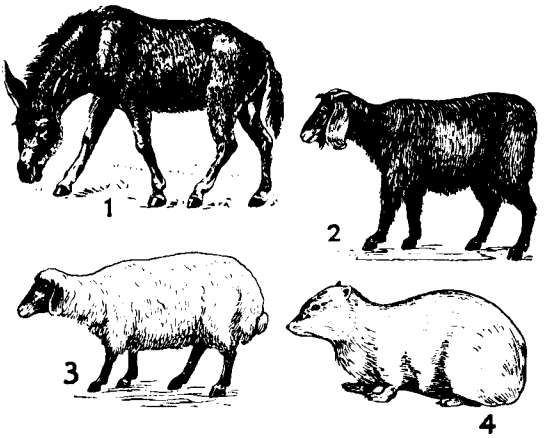
Oxen provided not only food and animals for sacrifice, but they also were important as draft animals. A number of commands were given pertaining to the care of these animals, and property rights associated therewith. When Elijah found him, Elisha was plowing with twenty-four oxen. They were partly responsible for Saul's decline when he spared the oxen after routing the Amalekites. Nebuchadnezzar was reduced to eating grass as the oxen. Ezekiel's vision of four creatures included the ox.

Chamois. In Deuteronomy 14:4-6 the chamois is listed among those animals that could be eaten. "Mountain sheep" is the name used in the RSV. It was probably the mountain sheep of Egypt and Arabia known as the Barbary Sheep or Aoudad.

Coney. The coney is similar to a rabbit except for its short legs and ears, and the absence of a tail. They are also called "little cousins of the elephant" and "drassies." As rock dwellers they are timid but very active. Conies occur from Africa north through Arabia to Asia. Their feet are four-toed like an elephant's; they are vegetarians with teeth like those of the rhinoceros, and their jaw action resembles cud-chewing although they lack the type of stomach for rumination.

Dogs. Dogs were possibly the first animal domesticated, being derived from wolf stock of Europe and Asia. Job spoke of the dogs that guarded his flocks (Job 30:1). In Bible times they were generally despised outcasts known for their ravenous and ruthless nature, and given to prowling and filthy habits (Prov. 26:11). The Syrophenician woman spoke of dogs that ate the children's crumbs (Matt. 15:26,27). Approximately forty Bible references are made to these unclean animals.

Dragons. Thirty-five references to "dragons" appear in the KJV. In those instances where the word is derived from the Hebrew word "tannin" a long serpent-like, symbolical animal is meant. Examples of this sort are found in Psalm 74:13, Ezekiel 32:2, and the Revelation. John uses the word "dragon" for Satan. Where "tannim," the plural of the Hebrew "tan" occurs, literal animals are understood. In some of these instances the crocodile is meant and elsewhere jackals were intended.



1. Mule. 2. Goat. 3. Fat-tailed sheep. 4. Hyrax, or coney. DV

Dromedary. See Camel.

Elephant. In the RSV the word "behemoth" is rendered "hippopotamus" in the footnote, whereas it is given as "elephant" in the margin of KJV (Job 40:15). Repeated references to elephants being used in warfare occur in the first and second books of Maccabees.

In a dozen or more instances ivory is mentioned in the Bible. For example, Solomon overlaid his ivory throne with gold thereby giving an indication of the relative values of these materials (I Kings 10:18). Where the doom of Tyre and Babylon is foretold reference is made to the extensive use they had made of ivory. King Ahab had houses and beds of ivory. Dr. Reisner's expedition from Harvard in 1931, reported that Ahab's palace covered between seven and eight acres, and that lavish use of ivory had been made there.

Fallow Deer. This term is changed to roebuck, q.v., the male of the roe deer, in the RSV (Deut. 14:5; I Kings 4:22,23). The term fallow deer is used today of a smaller deer that is found in forests and mountains across Europe and northern Asia. Along with the wild boar it is about the only wild game remaining in Europe.

Fox. In nine verses this animal is named, where it refers to the common fox of Palestine, Vulpes vulgaris, that resembles the common fox of Europe and the red fox of America. It is a member of the dog family, and in a number of ways resembles the dog. They are carnivorous, wary, quick-sensed, and swift. It is believed that the word fox in Scripture referred to jackals, for example, "that spoiled the vines." Samson could have more readily secured jackals in such numbers so that three hundred could be used in burning the fields of the Philistines (Judg. 15:14). It is thought that the animals were tied in pairs with a firebrand connected by a cord to their tails, thereby spreading fire far and wide as they raced away in terror.

The fox's craftiness was attested to by the fact that Jesus likened Herod's conduct to that of a fox.

Gazelle. The RSV employs the term "gazelle" in a dozen or more verses. They are small, swift antelopes found in hot, arid, barren wilderness areas of the Old World. Arabs train falcons to overtake, swoop down and stun gazelles with a blow on the head enabling hunters on fast horses to overtake them. In Asia hunters also use greyhounds, sometimes with the falcon, to effect their capture. There are sixty or more kinds of gazelles in Southern Asia and Northern Africa. A small form, the Dorcas Gazelle, is found in hot and barren areas of Syria and Palestine. As many as a hundred have been observed in a single herd. In Libya during World War II army trucks were used to chase them. Records of forty-five miles per hour for six or seven miles were reported.

Goats. Goats and sheep in the wild are inhabitants of the mountains. Both are cud-chewing, have hairy coats, and hollow horns. Wild goats are more sure-footed and adventurous. Both sheep and goats were domesticated as early as 3000 B.C. Milk, butter, cheese, and meat are obtained from goats. In Palestine goats were driven to the doors of customers where they were milked. They were much used for sacrifice and for feasts. Their hair was made into clothing. Containers for water and wine were made from goatskins in Bible times. The Bible has more than 130 references to goats and approximately fifty references to kids.

Greyhound. Proverbs 30:31 lists the "greyhound" among those things that Solomon said are "comely in going." An alternate translation given in the footnote of the ASV is "war-horse," whereas it is translated "strutting cock" in the RSV. Early Egyptian monuments carry pictures of this ancient breed of dog that is known to attain speeds up to forty miles per hour.

Hare. Baby hares are born with a good coat of hair and good eyesight whereas rabbits are born naked and blind. No native rabbits occur in Palestine but at least two species of hares are numerous. Hares are classified as unclean because they lack the divided hoof. Their jaw action resembles cud-chewing but they lack the ruminant's stomach.

In two instances where hares are mentioned in the Bible they are named by Moses (Lev. 11:4,6; Deut. 14:7).

Hart. Harts were apparently rather plentiful since they are mentioned as part of the daily fare at Solomon's table. These may have been either the red deer of Europe and Asia, Cervus elephus or the Syrian deer, C. barbatus. The former is similar to the American elk but somewhat smaller. Harts are stags or male deer whereas hinds are female deer. A single hart may weigh as much as three hundred pounds. Their six-pronged antlers are shed annually. The habitat of the hart differs from that of the gazelle as the former must have more water. This requirement is alluded to in Psalm 42:1, where the hart is said to long for flowing streams and its need of pasture is implied in Lamentations 1:6. The leaping of the hart is referred to in Isaiah 35:6.

Hind. See Hart. These female red deer are mentioned a number of times in the poetical books of the KJV, but are not listed as an item of food. Their fleetness is referred to by both Habakkuk and David who, almost four hundred years apart, used very similar expressions, "He maketh my feet like hinds' " in speaking of swiftly escaping their enemies (Ps. 18:33, Hab. 3:19).

Horse. At least four thousand years ago in central Asia some type of wild horse was tamed and domesticated. Only one species of truly wild horse remains today known as Prjevalsky's Wild Horse of Mongolia. Babylonians began using them to draw war chariots around 1700 B.C. Without horses, conquest on a large scale would have been impossible for Alexander the Great and for Genghis Khan. Herodotus reported the use of swift horses by the Persians for their postal system at least three thousand years ago.

The first of more than 150 verses referring to horses is found in Genesis 47:17 where Joseph in Egypt bought horses by giving bread to the people during a famine. Upon the death of Jacob, Joseph and an escort of horsemen and chariots carried him back to Canaan for burial. One of the ten plagues that befell the Egyptians in the the time of Moses led to a heavy loss of horses. Later, to overtake the fleeing Israelites, horses and chariots were used by the Egyptians.

A flock of goats at the River Kishon, Mt. Carmel in the distance. © MPS

Under Moses, God warned the people not to multiply horses. Saul was later killed in a battle with the Amalekites who were outfitted with chariots and horses. David captured chariots from the Syrians and destroyed most of them but reserved a hundred chariots. In so doing he disobeyed God and introduced their use in Israel. Solomon greatly increased their numbers and depended heavily on them as he strengthened the defenses of his land.

In most instances horses were employed in warfare; however, Isaiah connected them with agriculture (Isa. 28:24-29). They were also used in idolatrous processions (II Kings 23:11). Their use for riding is mentioned in II Kings 9:14-37 and Esther 6:8,10,11. In prophecy horses play a role as in Joel 2:4,5, and Revelation 9:7,9 and 6:1-8, where four horses of different colors are associated with singular disasters.

Hyena. Curiously, the word for hyena does not occur in the Bible although hyenas were abundant in Palestine. The word "Zeboim" in I Samuel 13:17-18 comes from a Hebrew word that is generally considered to refer to hyenas, and basically the same word is translated "speckled bird" in Jeremiah 12:7-9.

Ibex. See Pygarg.

Jackal. In both the ASV and RSV the word "jackals" in Job 30:29, is substituted for the word "dragons" of the KJV. The same change has been made in Psalm 44:19 and Isaiah 13:22; 34:13. In other instances where the word "dragon" is applied literally, that is, to mammals inhabiting desert places, one finds "jackals" in the newer versions.

Jackals are the wild dogs of warmer parts of the Old World. They hunt in small packs in a stealthy manner at night, and their role as scavengers is important. Abandoned buildings and desolate spots are frequented. The Gray or Yellow Jackal, Thos aureus is probably the species of the Bible Lands. See Fox.

Lamb. See Sheep.

Leopard. The word "leopard" is used in the same eight verses in the RSV as in the KJV. A leopard (panther) is more savage and malevolent than a lion. It possesses great fighting ability and is wary, treacherous, highly intelligent and subtle. It does not ordinarily attack human beings, although it is fearless. In Solomon's time leopards lived in parts of Palestine and in mountainous regions of Lebanon in Syria. Isaiah suggested the improbable by referring to a leopard lying down with a kid; Jeremiah spoke of the impossibility of the leopard changing its spots; Daniel and John used it in a figurative sense.

Leviathan. Both the ASV and RSV employ "leviathan" in Job 41:1. In footnotes for this verse both versions give the crocodile as an alternative meaning; however crocodiles are not caught with fishhooks. Some fabulous creature may be meant in Job 41:1 and also in Psalm 74:14 where breaking or crushing "the heads of Leviathan" is mentioned. It has been suggested that the latter reference was telling of the removing of the crocodiles so that the Israelites could safely cross the Red Sea. Sperm whales have been observed in the Mediterranean Sea and may have been intended in Psalm 104:26. Its use in Isaiah 27:1 may have been to symbolize Israel's enemies that were to experience God's judgment.

Lion. Lions by their size and majestic bearing have won the title, "King of Beasts." Usually they are friendly, travel in small groups, share prey peaceably, and kill only what they intend to consume. Few are man-killers. However, once a lion eats a man it is a threat thereafter. While lions are on their honeymoon they are particularly dangerous. During the construction of the Uganda Railway in East Africa two lions killed and ate twenty-eight Indian coolies as well as scores of natives.

India, Turkey, Iraq, Iran, Greece, Asia Minor and Syria all had lions in early times. Today, few remain outside of Africa and possibly India.

The Hebrew people were very familiar with lions and many books in the Bible mention them. The lion's strength is often referred to in the Scriptures. The Lord Jesus Christ is called the Lion of the tribe of Judah. The traits of lions are used to foreshadow those of the "King of Kings." Jacob compared three of his sons, Judah, Dan, and Gad, to lions. Throughout the Bible lions are either treated as natural animals or they are used as symbols of might.

Daniel's experience in the lions' den illustrates the use Oriental monarchs made of them as executioners. A number of instances are mentioned where a man killed a lion in a single-handed encounter (Judg. 14:5-18 and I Sam. 17:36,37).

God's judgment was visited upon the disobedient by the actual use of lions, and its severity predicted by likening the character of attacking nations to the ferocity of a lion.

Symbolically, Daniel described Babylon as a winged lion. Peter represented the devil as a destroying lion.

Mouse. Mice came from the Old World and accompanied man as he migrated all over the world. The terms "mouse" and "mice" occur in both the RSV and KJV in references found in Leviticus, I Samuel, and Isaiah, and probably include a number of small rodents. Evidently the Jews had followed heathen practices of eating swine's flesh and mice, and perhaps even hamsters, rats and jerboas, as the Arabs and Syrians did. After taking the ark from the Israelites, the Philistines were ravaged by a scourge of mice.

Mole. Where "mole" occurs in Leviticus 11:29,30 in the KJV, it is rendered "chameleon" in the RSV. Isaiah (Isa. 2:20) probably meant the blind rat or mole rat of Southeastern Europe rather than our true mole of America.

Monster. In place of "sea monsters" the ASV and RSV use "jackals' in Lamentations 4:3. From the facts that monsters are usually large, powerful animals, and that in this instance no difficulty was experienced in nursing their young during a time of severe famine, it seems probable that whales are meant. Where the KJV in Genesis 1:21 speaks of "great whale," the RSV uses "Sea monsters."

Mule. A mule is a cross between a male donkey and a female horse. Mules have been bred since earliest times and are almost always sterile. Breeding them was forbidden to Israelites (Lev. 19:19), but they were imported into Palestine. The finest were used by kings and officers, King David apparently having initiated their use for riding purposes. All of his sons rode on mules (II Sam. 13:29) and it was one of these that deserted Absalom (II Sam. 18:9).

Pygarg. The word "pygarg" means white-rumped and hence has been said to apply to some antelope such as the addax, one species of which is a native of desert regions of Northern Africa and the Egyptian Sudan.

The RSV translates it ibex, meaning a type of bearded wild goat. The Nubian Ibex occurs in Palestine as well as in Egypt and Arabia.

Roe. This word is used in nearly a dozen verses in the KJV but does not appear in the RSV. In most instances, both the RSV and ASV use the word "gazelle." Like the hind, a gazelle was not to be eaten. As the hart could be eaten so could the roebuck or male of the female roe.

Satyr. Both the KJV and RSV use "satyr" in Isaiah 13:21 and 34:14, but the ASV used "wild goat." Monsters supposedly half man and half goat were worshiped in both Egypt and Greece. The same word is translated "devils" in Leviticus 17:7 and II Chronicles 11:15, where idolatrous practices are denounced.

Sheep. If sheep ever existed in the wild state they were certainly domesticated before 3000 B.C., and probably before cattle. Sheep receive more attention in the Bible than any other animal. They were important in the domestic, civic, and religious life of the Israelites. Even today the Arabs depend heavily upon them. Earliest mention of sheep is in Genesis 4:2 where it is said that "Abel was a keeper of sheep."

Both Hebrew and Arab shepherds had to move to new locations whenever pasturage gave out. This led to a nomadic existence and to using tents as habitations. Water requirements meant that the shepherd must know where streams or wells could be found, and his movements with the flock were governed accordingly. Watering was always done at noon. The shepherd's care was beautifully portrayed in Psalm 23. Continuous care of sheep eventually led the shepherd to know each by name. Sheep were always led, never driven. Occasionally shepherdesses cared for sheep as in the case of the seven daughters of the priest of Midian whom Moses assisted. Wells became important meeting places of a tribe. Both good and poor shepherds are mentioned, and during the latter parts of Israel's history their leaders were denounced as being bad shepherds. Figures of speech concerning shepherding were used repeatedly as God warned them of their shortcomings. Jesus Christ came as the Good Shepherd and His arrival was announced to shepherds.

Sheep were kept for their milk more than for their flesh. The common breed could store a vast amount of fat in the tail and this was used as food. They also provided wool, and horns, used either for carrying oil or wine, or as trumpets for summoning the people and in religious rites. The skins of rams were used in making the covering of the tabernacle.

The reason why so much attention is given to sheep in the Bible is doubtless because they were used so much in sacrifice. Offerings consisted not only of lambs but also of ewes and rams. Where a prescribed service was intended, the type of animal was usually named. The ultimate and final sacrifice was the Lamb of God who in many respects was foreshadowed by the way in which lambs had served as sacrifices.

Swine. Although the names of "hog" and "pig" are not named in the Bible, "swine" are referred to a number of times. Members of the family Suidae, swine are unclean although they have the divided hoof. Solomon declared that "a beautiful woman without discretion" is "like a gold ring in a swine's snout" (Prov. 11:22, RSV). Through Isaiah, God rebuked the Israelites for eating swine's flesh (Isa. 65:2, 3, 4). Jesus warned against casting pearls before swine (Matt. 7:6). Peter spoke of a washed sow wallowing in mire (II Pet. 2:22). All of the Gospel writers except John told of the man freed of a legion of devils which entered a herd of two thousand swine that then dashed into the water and were drowned. It was odd that they should have been in Palestine, unless owned by Gentiles. The prodigal son was degraded to the place where he was forced to feed swine.

Unicorn. Wiley enumerates characteristics of this creature which may be pieced together from the eight passages where it is mentioned: it is exceptionally powerful, a voracious eater, has a pair of strong horns, was well known to people of Old Testament lands, was untamable, impossible to use for agriculture, very active while young, and fit for sacrifice. Instead of "unicorn" the ASV and RSV use "wild ox." This was possibly the auroch that stood six feet at the shoulder and was once plentiful in Palestine. Seen in profile it appeared to have but a single horn, hence the name unicorn.

Weasel. The weasel is listed along with the mouse and tortoise as an unclean animal (Lev. 11:29). These important rodent killers seem to kill for the sake of killing, and are found in almost all parts of the world.

Whale. "Whale" is retained in the RSV in the account found in Matthew 12:40. In Jonah 1:17 the RSV uses "great fish," and in Genesis 1:21 and Job 7:12 it is rendered "sea monsters" or "sea monster." Goodwin maintains that among whales, only the sperm whale has a throat structure capable of swallowing a man. Such whales have been seen in the Mediterranean. He relates an incident told by Sir Francis Fox of a sailor, who in 1891 fell overboard, was swallowed by a sperm whale and after twenty-four hours was rescued by his shipmates when they opened up the whale. After being mentally deranged for two weeks, he is said to have recovered. Sir Francis got this story from the ship's captain and crew.

Wolf. Wolves, dogs, and jackals are members of a family of carnivores. Wolves were very widely distributed across Europe and North America. Unprovoked attacks upon man are questioned unless the animal is famished. They are mentioned twelve times. Benjamin, a tribe, was likened to a wolf. Jesus repeatedly likened false prophets and teachers to wolves. Isaiah foretold that the wolf and lamb will feed together in the Messianic Kingdom (Isa. 11:6; 65:25).

Non-Mammalian Animals

Sponges. Sponges have served many purposes since earliest times. Ancient Greeks used them for padding their shields and armor as well as for bathing and scrubbing floors and furniture. They were used as mops and paint brushes by the Romans, and at one time were used as drinking cups, the user squeezing their contents into his upturned mouth.

At the crucifixion a bystander used a sponge fastened to a reed to lift vinegar to the lips of Jesus.

Corals. The central and western Mediterranean has a red coral, Corallium nobile, that has varied greatly in commercial value through the years. Slender twigs from its branching colonies are extensively used in making jewelry. Coral is mentioned by both Job and Ezekiel (Job 28:18; Ezek. 27:16).

Mollusks. The occurrence of mollusks is implied by numerous Old Testament references to the use of purple cloth. A dye, "Tyrian purple," was obtained from a glandular fluid secreted by several members of the genera Murex and Purpura.

Pearls are mentioned in several instances in the New Testament. They are produced by certain bivalve mollusks such as the clam and oyster and have always been highly esteemed. Jesus warned against casting pearls before swine in Matthew 7:6, and in Matthew 13:45,46. He likened the kingdom of heaven to "one pearl of great price" for which a merchant was willing to give his all.

Fishes. A goodly number of references to fish occur in both Old and New Testaments, but in no instance is a particular species implied in any way. They are mentioned in all five books of the Pentateuch.

Among kinds certainly known in Bible times as a food fish is the striped mullet, Mugil cephalus, found in the Mediterranean and numerous other waters. Another variety that was likely known was the barbel which is represented by various species, from England eastward to the East Indies.

One of the disasters meted out to the Egyptians was the destruction of the fish, and the fact that later on the Israelites lusted for the fish they had eaten while in Egypt signifies their importance as food. Several references to a fish gate imply the existence of a fish market. The use of line and hook is referred to in the Old Testament and the use of the net is mentioned in both Old and New Testaments. The numerous references to fish and to fishing in the Gospels give clear indication of their commercial importance in Palestine.

Amphibians. Two species of frogs and three of toads are reported from Egypt. One frog, Rana esculenta, is found all over Europe, in Syria and in Palestine, as well as in Egypt. One of the plagues visited on Pharaoh was a horde of frogs. Unclean spirits are likened to them in Revelation 16:13.

Reptiles. The Northern Viper or Adder, Vipera berus, is common in Europe and members of the same genus are found in Africa. In any case, the context in which the word "adder" occurs clearly implies a poisonous reptile. Because this English word is used for several different Hebrew words it is difficult to determine present-day species to which it applied.

Asp. Four times the word "asp" is used in such a manner as to indicate a poisonous reptile. There is general agreement that the Egyptian Cobra, Naja haje, is meant. This reptile was used by Pharaoh Tutankamen as his imperial symbol. It attains a length of at least eight and a half feet, prefers warm, dry regions with water available, and is found along the north and east coasts of Africa. A subspecies occurs in part of the Arabian Peninsula.

Chameleon. A family of large lizards, the Varanidae, are represented by species in Africa and Asia. The Nile Monitor, Varanus niloticus is the largest four-footed reptile in Africa with the exception of the crocodile, and attains a length of six feet. Nile monitors eat a wide variety of food, and deposit their eggs in termite nests.

The RSV uses "chameleon" rather than "mole" in Leviticus 11:30.

Cockatrice. Some dreaded reptile is evidently meant in Isaiah 11:8 and 59:5, and Jeremiah 8:17. Although basilisks have been suggested, they are harmless despite myths to the contrary.

Gecko. The word "ferret" of Leviticus 11:30 is translated "gecko" in the RSV and ASV. The one intended may be Ptyodactylus lobatus, although any of a number of species of three generally-nocturnal lizards may have been meant.

Lizard. Mentioned once in the Bible (Lev. 11:30), this animal may refer to the commonest lizard of Palestine, the Agama stellio, belonging to a family of dragon-lizards. These animals are diurnal, possess crests and dewlaps, and somewhat resemble the iguanids.

Serpent. The Bible has many references to serpents which imply poisonous qualities. No single species can be identified with certainty. The serpent is commonly used as a symbol of evil and Satan was called a serpent. Snakes do not use legs for locomotion, and are evidently meant rather than lizards.

Tortoise. This unclean animal of Leviticus 11:29 is rendered "great lizard" in the RSV. The Arabian thorny-tailed, color-changing lizard (Uromastix spinipes) is common in Egypt, and members of the same genus occur in Syria and Arabia.

Viper. Poisonous serpents of several varieties are probably meant where this term is used. C.M.

ANISE (See Plants of the Bible)

ANKLET, an ornament for the ankles, consisting of metal or glass spangles, worn by women. Sometimes anklets were linked together by an ankle chain. See DRESS.

ANNA (ăn'à, Gr. form of Hannah, grace), daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Asher. Widowed after seven years of marriage, she became a prophetess, and at the age of 84, when the infant Jesus was brought into the Temple to be dedicated, she recognized and proclaimed Him as the Messiah (Luke 2:36-38).

ANNAS (ăn'às, Gr. for Hanan, contraction for Hananiah, merciful, gracious; called "Ananos" by Josephus). In his 37th year, about A.D. 6, he was appointed high priest by Quirinius, governor of Syria, and was deposed about A.D. 15 by Valerius Gratus, governor of Judea. His five sons became high priests, and he was father-in-law of Caiaphas, the high priest (Jos. Antiq. XVIII. 2,1 and 2; John 18:13). He and Caiaphas are described as the high priests when John the Baptist began his public ministry (Luke 3:2), perhaps because as head of the family Annas was the most influential priest and still bore the title. That may explain why when Jesus was arrested He was first led to Annas (John 18:13), and after a preliminary hearing was sent bound to Caiaphas (John 18:24). That may also be the reason why Annas is called the high priest in Acts 4:6, when Peter and John were arrested, although Caiaphas was very probably the actual high priest.

ANOINT, to apply oil to a person or thing, a practice common in the East. Anointing was of three kinds: ordinary, sacred, and medical. Ordinary anointing with scented oils was a common toilet operation (Ruth 3:3; Ps. 104:15; Prov. 27:9). It was discontinued during a time of mourning (II Sam. 14:2; Dan. 10:3; Matt. 6:17). Guests were anointed as a mark of respect (Luke 7:46; Ps. 23:5). The dead were prepared for burial by anointing (Mark 14:8; 16:1). The leather of shields was rubbed with oil to keep it from cracking (Isa. 21:5).

Sacred anointing had as its purpose the dedicating of things or persons to God. Jacob anointed the stone he had used for a pillow at Bethel (Gen. 28:18). The Tabernacle and its furniture were anointed (Exod. 30:22-29). Prophets (I Kings 19:16; I Chron. 16:22), priests (Exod. 28:41; 29:7; Lev. 8:12,30), and kings (Saul—I Sam. 9:16; 10:1; David—I Sam. 16:1,12,13; II Sam. 2:7; Solomon —I Kings 1:34; Jehu—I Kings 19:16; among others) were anointed, the oil symbolizing the Holy Spirit, and they were thus set apart and empowered for a particular work in the service of God. "The Lord's anointed" was the common term for a theocratic king (I Sam. 12:3; Lam. 4:20).

Messiah, from the Hebrew word mashah, and Christ, from the Greek chrein, means "the anointed one." The word is twice used of the coming Redeemer in the OT (Ps. 2:2; Dan. 9:25,26). Jesus was anointed with the Holy Spirit at His baptism (John 1:32,33), marking Him as the Messiah of the OT (Luke 4:18,21; Acts 9:22; 17:2,3; 18:5, 28). His disciples, through union with Him, are anointed with the Holy Spirit, too (II Cor. 1:21; I John 2:20).

Medical anointing, not necessarily with oil, was customary for the sick and wounded (Isa. 1:6; Luke 10:34). Mark 6:13 and James 5:14 speak of the use of anointing oil by disciples of Jesus. S.B.

ANTELOPE (See Animals, Gazelles)

ANTICHRIST (Gr. antíchristos, against or instead of Christ). The word antichrist may mean either an enemy of Christ or one who usurps Christ's name and rights. The word is found only in I John 2:18,22; 4:3; II John 7, but the idea conveyed by the word appears throughout Scripture. It is evident from the way John and Paul refer to the Antichrist that they took for granted a tradition well known at the time (I John 4:3 "ye have heard," II Thess. 2:6 "ye know").

The OT gives evidence of a general Jewish belief in a hostile person or power who in the end time would bring an attack against God's people — an attack which would be crushed by Jehovah or His Messiah. Psalm 2 gives a picture of the rebellion of the world kingdoms "against the Lord and against his anointed." The same sort of contest is described in Ezekiel 38,39 and in Zechariah 12-14. In the Book of Daniel there are vivid descriptions of the Antichrist which find their echo in the writings of the apostles (cf., e.g., II Thess. 2:4 with Daniel 11:36f, and Rev. 13:1-8 with Daniel 7:8, 20f, 8:24, 11:28,30).

In His eschatological discourse Christ warns against "the false Christs" and "the false prophets" who would lead astray, if possible, even the elect (Matt. 24:24; Mark 13:22). In Matthew 24:15 He refers to "the abomination of desolation" spoken of by Daniel.

Paul gives us, in II Thessalonians 2:1-12, a very full description of the working of Antichrist, under the name of the "man of sin," in which he draws on the language and imagery of the OT. The Thessalonian Christians seem to have been under the erroneous impression that the "day of Christ" was at hand, and Paul tells them that before that day could come two things would have to take place, an apostasy and the revelation of the man of sin, the son of perdition. The "mystery of iniquity," he says, is already at work, but is held in check by some restraining person or power. With the removal of this restraining force, the man of sin is revealed. He will oppose and exalt himself above God and will actually sit in the temple of God and claim to be God. With Satanic power he will perform signs and lying wonders, bringing great deception to men who reject God's truth. In spite of his extraordinary power, however, the Lord Jesus at His parousia will slay him with the breath of His mouth.

In I John 2:18 John shows that the coming of the Antichrist was an event generally expected by the Church. It is apparent, however, that he is more concerned about directing the attention of Christians to antichristian forces already at work ("even now are there many antichrists"). He says that teachers of erroneous views of the person of Christ (evidently Gnostic and Ebonite) are antichrists (I John 2:22; 4:3; II John 7).

In the Book of Revelation the Beast of Revelation 17:8 recalls the horned Beast of Daniel 7,8. He claims and is accorded divine homage, and makes war on God's people. For a period of three and one half years he rules over the earth, and is finally destroyed by the Lord in a great battle. With his defeat the contest of good and evil comes to its final decision. ANTI-LEBANON (See Lebanon)

ANTIOCH (ăn'tĭ-ŏk, Gr. Antiócheia). 1. Antioch in Syria, the capital of Syria, built in 301 B.C. by Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the Seleucid Empire, which had been the Asiatic part of the vast empire of Alexander the Great. It was the greatest of 16 Antiochs he founded in honor of his father, Antiochus. Situated on the left bank of the Orontes, about 15 miles from the Mediterranean, with Seleucia as its port, the river being navigable up to the city, it was a great commercial center, with caravan roads converging upon it from the East. The city was set in a broad and fertile valley, shielded by majestic snow-covered mountains, and was called Antioch "the Beautiful and the Golden." In 65 B.C. the Romans took the city and made it the capital of the Roman province of Syria. Seleucid kings and early Roman emperors extended and adorned the city until it became the third largest in the Roman Empire (after Rome and Alexandria), with a population, in the first century A.D., of about 500,000. foundation, its inhabitants included many Jews, who were given privileges similar to those of the Greeks. Its citizens were a vigorous, aggressive race, famous for their commercial aptitude, their licentiousness, and the scurrility of their wit.

Antioch has an important place in the early history of Christianity. One of the original deacons of the Apostolic church was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts 6:5). The first Gentile church, the mother of all the others, was founded there. Many fugitive Christians scattered at the death of Stephen went to Antioch, where they inaugurated a new era by preaching not only to Hellenist Jews but to "the Greeks also" (Acts 11:20). The Jerusalem church sent Barnabas to assist in the work, and he, after laboring there for a while, summoned Paul from Tarsus to assist him. After working there for a year, they were sent with relief to the famine-stricken saints in Jerusalem. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (Acts 11:19-26), a designation probably coming from the populace, who were well-known for their invention of nicknames. The church at Antioch sent Paul and his companions out on his three missionary journeys Acts 13:1ff; 15:36ff; 18:23), and he reported to it on his return from the first two (Acts 14:26ff; 18:22). It submitted the question of the circumcision of Gentile converts to a council at Jerusalem (Acts 15), winning for the church at large a great victory over Judean narrowness.

Antioch gave rise to a school of thought distinguished by literal interpretation of the Scriptures. Between 252 and 380 ten Councils were held there. The city was taken and destroyed in A.D. 538 by the Persians, rebuilt by the Roman emperor Justinian shortly afterward, and in A.D. 635 was taken by the Moslems, by whom it has since, except for a brief period, been held. The place, now called Antakiyeh, is today unimportant, with a population of about 42,000.

In 1916 announcement was made of the finding of what has come to be known as "The Chalice of Antioch," found by Arabs in or near Antioch. It is a plain silver cup surrounded by an outer shell decorated with vines and the figures of Christ and the Apostles, and is set on a solid silver base. The cup was vigorously claimed to be the Holy Grail, used by Jesus at the Last Supper, and the figures on the shell were interpreted as first century portraits, but the authenticity of the chalice has been called in question. Serious scholars have, however, virtually proved that the most that can be said is that it may be a piece of early Christian silver from the fourth or fifth century, and had nothing to do with the Last Supper in Jerusalem. (For a careful study of this matter, see esp. H. H. Arnason, "The History of the Chalice of Antioch," BA, Vol. IV, No. 4 (Dec. 1941) and Vol. V, No. 1 (Feb. 1942). S.B.

2. Antioch near Pisidia, a town in southern Asia Minor, founded by Seleucus Nicator, and named in honor of his father, Antiochus. It was situated in Phrygia, not far from Pisidia, and was therefore called Antioch toward Pisidia and Pisidian Antioch to distinguish it from the other cities of the same name. In 25 B.C. it became a part of the Roman province of Galatia. Soon after, it became the capital of southern Galatia and was made a Roman colony. The Romans made it a strong garrison center to hold down the surrounding wild tribes. Paul and Barnabas preached in the synagogue there on their first missionary journey, but the Jews, jealous of the many Gentile converts that were made, drove the missionaries from the city to Iconium, and followed them even to Lystra (Acts 13:14-14:19). On Paul's return journey he revisited Antioch to establish the disciples. He must have visited Antioch on his second journey (Acts 16:6), and on his third (Acts 18:23). S.B.

ANTIOCHUS (ăn-tī′ŏkŭs, Gr. withstander). 1. Antiochus III, the Great (223-187 B.C.), king of Syria and sixth ruler of the Seleucid dynasty. By his victory over the Egyptians in 198 B.C. Syria gained control of Palestine. He was decisively defeated by the Romans in 190 and thereby lost control over Asia Minor. He was murdered by a mob while plundering a temple.

2. Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), son of Antiochus III and eighth ruler of the Seleucid dynasty, 175-163 B.C. (I Macc. 1:10; 6:16). In his attempt to Hellenize the Jews he had a pig sacrificed on the altar in Jerusalem, forbade circumcision, and destroyed all the OT books he could find. These outrages involved him in the Maccabean war in which the Syrian armies were repeatedly defeated by the brilliant Judas Maccabeus.

3. Antiochus V (Eupator), son of the above. He reigned as a minor for two years and then was slain.

ANTIPAS (ăn'tĭ pàs, Gr. Antípas), a contraction of Antipater. 1. An early Christian martyr of Pergamum, described as "my faithful martyr" (Rev. 2:13).

2. Herod Antipas, son of Herod the Great, and brother of Philip the tetrarch and of Archelaus, both, like him, rulers of parts of Palestine. See Herod.

ANTIPATER (See Herod)

ANTIPATRIS (ăn-tĭp'ȧ-trĭs, Gr. Antípatris, belonging to Antipater), a city built (or rebuilt) by Herod the Great, and named after his father Antipater. It lay on the road between Jerusalem and Caesarea. There is only one reference to it in Scripture, in connection with Paul's being taken, following his arrest in Jerusalem, from that city to Caesarea (Acts 23:31). It marked the NW limit of Judea.

ANTITYPE. By a type, in a Biblical sense, is meant a picture or object lesson by which God taught His people concerning His grace and redemptive power. An antitype is that which is represented by the type.

ANTONIA, TOWER OF, a castle connected with the Temple at Jerusalem, rebuilt by Herod the Great and named by him in honor of Mark Anthony, his patron. A Roman legion was stationed in the castle to guard against excesses on the part of the people. When Paul was seized in the Temple by the Jews, he was carried to this castle, from the stairs of which he addressed the people (Acts 21:30ff).

ANTOTHIJAH (ăn'tō-thī'jȧ, Heb. 'anthōthîyâh), a son of Shashak, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:24,25).

ANTOTHITE (ăn'tōth-īt), inhabitant of Anathoth; ASV, "Anathothite"; RSV, "of Anathoth" (I Chron. 11:28; 12:3).

ANTS (See Insects)

ANUB (ā'nŭb, Heb. 'ānûv), a son of Coz, descendant of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

ANVIL (ăn'vĭl). The Heb. pa'am originally meant strike, hit. The word occurs in several senses in the OT; only once with the meaning "anvil," Isaiah 41:7, in a passage concerning the encouragement given by one workman to another.

APELLES (ȧ-pĕl'ēz, Gr. Apellés), an approved Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a greeting (Rom. 16:10).

APES (See Animals)

APHARSATHCHITES (ăf'ȧr-săth'kīts), Ezra 4:9; Apharsakites (ȧ-fȧr'săk-īts), Ezra 5:6; 6:6, people in Samaria who protested to Darius against the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem. RSV translates "governors," considering the word as the name of a class of officials rather than of a tribe.

APHARSITES (ȧ-fȧr'sīts), Ezra 4:9, people in Samaria who protested against the rebuilding of the Temple in Jerusalem. RSV translates "Persians."

APHEK (ā'fĕk, Heb. 'ăpēk, strength, fortress). 1. A city NE of Beirut, identified with Afqa (Josh. 13:4).

2. A city in the territory of Asher, never wrested from its Canaanite inhabitants (Josh.19:30; Judges 1:31).

3. A town in the Plain of Sharon (Josh. 12:18), probably within 25 miles of Shiloh (I Sam. 4:1,12). The Philistines may have encamped here before the first battle with Israel at Ebenezer.

4. A town W of the Jordan in the Plain of Jezreel. The Philistines used it as a base in two important campaigns against Israel (I Sam. 1:4, 29:1). It may also have been the town where a wall fell and killed 27,000 of Benhadad's soldiers (I Kings 20:26-30), and where, according to prophecy, the Syrians were to be destroyed (II Kings 13:14-19).

APHEKAH (ȧ-fē'kȧ, Heb. 'ăphēqâh), a city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53) whose location is unknown.

APHIAH (ȧ-fī'ȧ, Heb. ăphîah), one of Saul's ancestors (I Sam. 9:1).

APHIK (See Aphek)

APHRAH (ăf'rȧ). "The house of Aphrah" is named in parallelism with Gath in Micah 1:10. ASV, RSV have "Beth-le-aphrah."

APHSES (ăf'sēz), a Levite chief of the 18th of the 24 courses in the service of the Temple (I Chron. 24:15). ASV, RSV, Happizzez.

APOCALYPSE (See Apocalyptic Literature)

APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, a type of Jewish and Christian religious writing which developed between the testaments and had its roots in Old Testament prophecy. The word "apocalyptic," derived from the Greek word apokalypsis in Revelation 1:1, means "revelation" or "unveiling," and is applied to these writings because they contain alleged revelations of the secret purposes of God, the end of the world, and the establishment of God's Kingdom on earth.

After the days of the post-exilic prophets, God no longer spoke to Israel through the living voice of inspired prophecy. The prophetic forecasts of the coming of God's Kingdom and the salvation of Israel had not been fulfilled. Instead of God's Kingdom, a succession of evil kingdoms ruled over Israel: Medo-Persia, Greece, and finally Rome. Evil reigned supreme. The hope of God's Kingdom grew dim. God no longered offered words of comfort and salvation to His people.

The apocalypses were written to meet this religious need. Following the pattern of canonical Daniel, various unknown authors wrote alleged revelations of God's purposes which explained present evils, comforted Israel in her sufferings and afflictions, and gave fresh assurances that God's Kingdom would shortly appear. Many modern critics place Daniel in these times, but there are valid reasons for an earlier date.

The outstanding apocalypses are I Enoch or Ethiopic Enoch, a composite book written during the first two centuries B.C., which is notable for its description of the heavenly Son of Man; Jubilees, an alleged revelation to Moses of the history of the world from creation to the end, written in the second century B.C.; the Assumption of Moses, late first century B.C.; Fourth Ezra or Second Esdras and the Apocalypse of Baruch, both written after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, and reflecting upon the tragic fall of God's people; Second Enoch or Slavonic Enoch, date uncertain. Other writings have been discovered among the so-called Dead Sea Scrolls which have not yet been made available for study.

A number of other writings are usually included in the discussion of apocalyptic literature, although they are not, properly speaking, apocalypses. The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, written in the second century B.C., imitating Old Testament predictive prophecy rather than apocalyptic, contains important eschatological materials. The 17th and 18th Psalms of Solomon, first century B.C., portray the hope of the coming of the Lord's Anointed to establish God's Kingdom. The Sibylline Oracles, which follows the pattern of Greek oracular literature, also contain eschatological passages.

Certain characteristics mark these apocalypses. 1. Revelation. They describe alleged revelations of God's purposes given through the media of dreams, visions, or journeys to heaven by which the seer learns the secrets of God's world and the future. 2. Imitation. These writings seldom embody any genuine subjective visionary experiences. Their "revelations" have become a literary form imitating the visions of the prophets in a thinly veiled literary fiction. 3. Pseudonymity. These books, although actually written close to New Testament times, are usually attributed to some Old Testament saint who lived long ago. Pseudonymity was employed as a means of validating the message of these authors to their own generation. Since God was no longer speaking through the spirit of prophecy, no man could speak in his own name or directly in the name of the Lord. Instead, the apocalyptists placed their "revelations" in the mouths of Old Testament saints. 4. Symbolism. These works employ an elaborate symbolism similar to that appearing in Daniel as a means of conveying their predictions of the future. 5. Pseudo-predictive. The authors take their stand in the distant past and rewrite history under the guise of prophecy down to their own day when the end of the world and the Kingdom of God were expected shortly to come.

There are distinct similarities, but also even more important differences between canonical and non-canonical apocalypses. The visions of Daniel provide the archetype which the later apocalypses imitate, and the Revelation of John records visions given to the apostle in similar symbolic forms. Both Daniel and the Revelation contain revelations conveyed through symbolism; but they differ from non-canonical apocalypses in that they are genuine experiences rather than imitative literary works, are not pseudonymous, and do not rewrite history under the guise of prophecy.

The importance of these apocalyptic writings is that they reveal to us first century Jewish ideas about God, evil, and history, and disclose Jewish hopes for the future and the coming of God's Kingdom. They show us what such terms as the Kingdom of God, Messiah, the Son of Man, etc., meant to first century Jews to whom our Lord addressed his Gospel of the Kingdom. G.E.L.

APOCRYPHA. Interspersed among the canonical books of the Old Testament in the old Latin Vulgate Bible are certain additional books and chapters. It is to these that Protestant usage generally assigns the term "Apocrypha." In English versions the Apocrypha are usually presented as 15 separate books. (See below for individual treatment of these.)

At the Council of Trent (1546) the Roman Catholic Church received as canonical all the additional materials in the Vulgate, except for I and II Esdras and the Prayer of Manasseh. That decision was taken, in contradiction of the best tradition of even the Roman Church, by way of reaction to the Reformers, who recognized as divinely inspired and, therefore, as their infallible rule of faith and practice only those books which were in the canon of the Jews (cf. esp., Josephus, Contra Apionem 1:8), the canon sanctioned by the Lord Jesus Christ.

I Esdras: It is called III Esdras in post-Trentian editions of the Vulgate, where the canonical Ezra and Nehemiah are called I and II Esdras ("Esdras" being the Greek form of Ezra). Except for the story of the wisdom contest (3:1-5:6), the contents are a version of the history narrated in II Chronicles 35-36:23, Ezra, and Nehemiah 7:73-8:12, embracing the period from the Josianic Passover to Ezra's reformation. Nothing is known of the author (or translator) of the LXX form except that he produced it some time before Josephus, who in his Antiquities strangely prefers it to the canonical record.

II Esdras: The Vulgate designation is IV Esdras. Some call it Apocalyptic Esdras because the central kernel (chapters 3-14) presents seven revelations allegedly given to Ezra in exile, several in visionary form and of largely eschatological import. To this original, composed by an unknown Jew, probably near the end of the first century A.D., and later translated into Greek Christian authors subsequently added in Greek, chapters 1, 2, 15, and 16. The Jewish original offers its apocalyptic prospects as an answer to the theodicy problem, acutely posed for Judaism by the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. The Christian addition assigns the casting off of Israel in favor of the Gentiles to Israel's apostasy.

Tobit: This romantic tale with religious didactic purpose was composed at least as early as the second century B.C. It is named after its hero, who is pictured as an eighth century B.C. Naphtalite carried into exile to Nineveh. His story becomes entwined with that of his kinswoman Sarah, exiled in Ecbatana. The tragedies of both are remedied through the adventures of Tobit's son Tobias, whom Sarah marries, and all under the angel Raphael's supervision. Prayer, fasting, and almsgiving are stressed but unfortunately in a context of auto-soterism.

Judith: Judith, like Tobit, is Jewish historical fiction with a religious moral. The historical setting is an anachronistic amalgam, including elements from two centuries (seventh to fifth) of Israelite fortunes. Using Jael-like tactics, Judith, a beautiful Jewess, saves besieged "Bethulia" by slaying Holofernes, the enemy commander. Possibly the grotesque anachronisms are intentional; Luther interpreted it as an allegory of Israel's triumphing, under God, over her enemies. The book evidences appreciation of Israel's peculiar theocratic privileges but magnifies a ceremonial piety which would exceed the requirements of Moses. Some think it was composed to inspire zeal during the Maccabean revolt in the 2nd century B.C.

Additions to the Book of Esther: The canonical Hebrew text of Esther has 163 verses; the Greek version has 270, the additional material being divided into seven sections and distributed at the appropriate points throughout the narrative, thus: A. before 1:1; B. after 3:13; C. and D. after 4:17; E. after 8:12; F. after 10:3. Inasmuch as genuine Esther contains explicit references to neither God nor traditional Jewish religious practices other than fasting, it is significant that prayers of Mordecai and Esther are included in the additions and also frequent mention of God. The Greek additions contradict details of canonical Esther and contain other obviously fictional elements. They appeared as an appendix to Esther in the Vulgate and this fusion of disconnected fragments constitutes a "book" in our Apocrypha.

The Wisdom of Solomon: The LXX uses this title; the Vulgate, Liber Sapientiae. The author, who identifies himself with the figure of Solomon, apparently was an Alexandrian Jew writing in Greek in the first century B.C. or A.D. (some, however, judge the book of composite authorship). The influence of Greek philosophy is evidenced by the dependence on logos speculations in the treatment of personified Wisdom and by the acceptance of various pagan teachings: the creation of the world out of pre-existent matter; the pre-existence of souls; the impedimentary character of the body; perhaps too, the doctrine of emanation. In tracing Wisdom's government of history from Adam to Moses, numerous fanciful and false embellishments of the biblical record are intruded.

Ecclesiasticus: This second representative of the wisdom genre of literature among the Apocrypha is also called after its author The Wisdom of Jesus ben Sira. Written in Hebrew, 180 B.C. or earlier, it was translated into Greek for the Alexandrian Jews by the author's grandson, c. 130 B.C. Ben Sira, apparently a professional scribe and teacher, patterned his magnum opus after the style of Proverbs. In it he expounds the nature of Wisdom, applying its counsel to all areas of social and religious life. Though often reflecting sentiments of the canonical books, Ben Sira also echoes the ethical motivations of pagan wisdom literature. Moreover, he contradicts biblical soteriology by teaching that almsgiving makes atonement for sin.

Baruch: This pseudepigraphic book is evidently composite. The first part (1:1-3:8), dated by some as early as the 3rd century B.C., was probably written in Hebrew, as was possibly also the remainder, which is of later origin. 1:1-3:8, composed in a prophetic prose, purports to have been produced by Jeremiah's secretary in Babylonian exile and sent to Jerusalem. It is a confession of national sin (in imitation of Daniel's) petitioning for removal of divine favor. Actually Baruch went to Egypt with Jeremiah and there is no evidence that he was ever in Babylonia. From 3:9 the book is poetry. 3:9-4:4 recalls Israel to wisdom. In 4:5-5:9 Jerusalem laments her exiled children, but assurances of restoration are offered.

Epistle to Jeremiah: In some Greek and Syriac manuscripts this "epistle" is found after Lamentations; in others and in the Vulgate it is attached to Baruch and hence appears as a 6th chapter of Baruch in most English editions. A superscription describes it as an epistle sent by Jeremiah to certain captives about to be led into Babylon. Cf. Jeremiah 29:1ff. The true author is unknown and the original language uncertain. A baffling reference to "seven generations" of exile (contrast Jer. 29:10) has figured in speculation as to its date which was no later than the second century B.C. It ridicules the inanity of idol worship as represented by the Bel cult and so served as warning to Jews and polemic against Gentiles.

The Prayer of Azariah and the Song of the Three Young Men. This is one of three sections (see also Susanna and Bel and the Dragon) added to the canonical Daniel in the "Septuagint" translation (whether from the first, i.e., probably by the early second century B.C., or in a later edition is not known) and afterwards in Theodotion's Greek Version. From the latter Jerome translated the additions into Latin, commenting that they did not exist in manuscripts of the Hebrew-Aramaic original of Daniel.

Between 3:23 and 3:24 of canonical Daniel both Greek and Latin Versions insert: a. a prayer of national confession with supplication for deliverance which Daniel's friend Azariah (cf. Dan. 1:7) offers while he and his two companions are in the fiery furnace; b. a psalm of praise (dependent on Pss. 148 and 136), uttered by the three; and c. a narrative framework, containing details not warranted by the genuine Daniel. This section is itself perhaps of composite authorship and was probably written in Hebrew.

Susanna: In the Vulgate, Susanna follows canonical Daniel as chapter 13; in Greek manuscripts it is prefixed to chapter 1. Two crucial puns at the climax of the tale suggest it was composed in Greek but there is no consensus. Its provenance and date are unknown; Alexandria about 100 B.C. is one theory. The story relates how two Israelite elders in Babylon, their salacious advances having been resisted by Susanna, falsely accuse her of adultery. But young Daniel effects Susanna's deliverance and the elders' doom by ensnaring them in contradictory testimony.

Bel and the Dragon: These fables ridiculing heathenism appear as Chapter 13 of Daniel in Greek and as chapter 14 in the Vulgate. They date from the first or second century B.C.; their original language is uncertain. Daniel plays detective to expose to Cyrus the fraud of the priests who clandestinely consumed the food-offerings of Bel (Baal, i.e., Marduk). After destroying Bel, Daniel concocts a recipe that explodes a sacred dragon. Consigned to a den of lions Daniel is miraculously fed and delivered.

The Prayer of Manasseh: According to II Chronicles 33:11ff, when the wicked king Manasseh had been carried into exile he repented and God restored him to Jerusalem. Verses 18, 19 refer to sources which contained Manasseh's prayer of repentance. The origin of the Apocryphal book which purports to be that prayer is unknown; possibly it was produced in Palestine a century or two before Christ. It contains confession of sin and petition for forgiveness. The view is expressed that certain sinless men need no repentance. In Greek manuscripts the Prayer appears in the Odes attached to the Psalter. In the old Vulgate it came to be placed after II Chronicles.

The First Book of the Maccabees: Beginning with the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes (176 B.C.), the history of the Jewish struggle for religous-political liberation is traced to the death of Simon (136 B.C.) in this, our most valuable source for that period. It narrates the exploits of the priest Mattathias and of his sons, Judas, Jonathan, and Simon, who successively led the Hasidim to remarkable victories. To Judas was given the surname "Maccabee," afterwards applied to his brothers, and four books (I-IV Maccabees). The author wrote in Hebrew and was a contemporary of John Hyrcanus, son and successor of Simon. According to one theory the last three chapters were added and the whole re-edited after the destruction of the Temple.

The Second Book of the Maccabees: Independent of I Maccabees, this history partly overlaps it, extending from the last year of Seleucus IV (176 B.C.) to the defeat of Nicanor by Judas (161 B.C.). The author states that he has epitomized the (now lost) five-volume history of Jason of Cyrene (2:23). Both Jason and the Epitomist wrote in Greek. Suggested dates for II Maccabees vary from c. 120 B.C. to the early first century A.D. Two introductory letters (1:1-2:18) were perhaps lacking in the first edition. While there are various errors in I Maccabees, legendary exaggeration is characteristic of the moralizing II Maccabees. It also inculcates doctrinal errors like the propriety of prayers for the dead. APOLLONIA (ăp'ŏ-lō'nĭ-à, Gr. Apollonía, pertaining to Apollo), a town of Macedonia on the celebrated Egnatian Way, 28 miles W of Amphipolis and 38 miles E of Thessalonica (Acts 17:1).

APOLLOS (à-pŏl'ŏs, Gr. Apollós, the short form of Apollonius), an Alexandrian Jew, described in Acts 18:24,25 as a man mighty in the Scriptures, eloquent, fervent in the spirit, and instructed in the way of the Lord, but knowing only the baptism of John. He came to Ephesus after Paul had visited that city on his second missionary journey and there met Aquila and Priscilla, who had been left there to labor pending the apostle's return. They heard him speak boldly in the synagogue, and observing that he was deficient in his knowledge of the Gospel, they "expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly" (Acts 18:26). It is not easy to determine from the brief account in Acts the precise character of his religious knowledge. Before long he went to Achaia with letters of recommendation from the Ephesian brethren. When he arrived in Corinth he "helped them much which had believed through grace: For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ" (Acts 18:27, 28).

Apollos' gifts and methods of presenting the Gospel were undoubtedly different from those of Paul, and he put the impress of his own mode of thinking upon many who heard him. Before long a party arose in the Corinthian church with the watch-word "I am of Apollos" (I Cor. 3:4). There does not, however, appear to have been any feeling of rivalry between Paul and Apollos. Paul urged Apollos to revisit Corinth (I Cor. 16:12), and he also asked Titus to help Apollos, apparently then in or on his way to Crete (Titus 3:13).

Luther suggested the theory, since accepted by many scholars, that Apollos was the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. S.B.

APOLLYON (See Abaddon)

APOSTASY (à-pŏs'tà-sē, Gr. apostasía, a falling away, a withdrawal, a defection). The Greek word is twice found in the NT, but in neither case is it rendered "apostasy" in the English Version. In Acts 21:21 Paul is falsely accused of teaching the Jews "to forsake Moses" (lit. "apostasy from Moses"). In II Thess. 2:3 Paul assures the Thessalonian Christians that the day of the Lord shall not come except the falling away (lit. "the apostasy") come first, and the man of sin be revealed. Apostasy, not in name but in fact, is often referred to in both testaments. OT Jews are rebuked for it. It is condemned in the Epistle of Jude. Biblical examples of it are Saul (I Sam. 15:11); Hymenaeus and Alexander (I Tim. 1:19,20); Demas (II Tim. 4:10).

APOSTLE (à-pŏs'l, Gr. apóstolos; one sent forth, a messenger), one chosen and sent with a special commission as the fully authorized representative of the sender.

In the NT the word appears in a twofold sense, as the official name of those 12 disciples whom Jesus chose to be with Him during the course of His ministry on earth, to see Him after His resurrection, and to lay the foundations of His Church; and in a broader, non-official sense, to designate Christian messengers commissioned by a community — like Barnabas, who was sent forth as a missionary by the church at Antioch (Acts 13:3). Once in the NT Jesus is called an apostle (Heb. 3:1), obviously in the sense referred to by Him in John 17:18. The Twelve were chosen by Jesus early in His Galilean ministry. Some had previously been disciples of John the Baptist (John 1:35-42). Four, at least, were fishermen (Luke 5:1-11); and one, a tax-collector (Matt. 9:9-13). Their names are given by each of the Synoptists (Matt. 10:2-4; Mark 3:14-19; Luke 6:13-16) and by the author of Acts (1:13).

In the Gospels they are usually called disciples, because as long as Jesus was with them they were still learners; after that, they are invariably referred to as apostles. Jesus gave much attention to their spiritual training; yet to the time of His resurrection, they failed to understand His mission, thinking that He was going to set up a temporal kingdom (Matt. 20:20-28; Mark 10:35-45). More than once they quarreled as to which of them should be greatest in that kingdom. It appears that, after the feeding of the 5,000, they fell in with the purpose of the multitude to make Jesus king by force (John 6:15). Though they accepted Jesus' Messianic claims, they could not understand the necessity of His death. All were on an equal footing, although three of them — Peter, James the son of Zebedee, and John — seem to have been somewhat closer to Jesus than the others; and Peter, by force of personal character, usually took the place of leadership. Peter, however, is nowhere in Scripture accorded a position of superiority or primacy. John is called the disciple whom Jesus loved (John 19:26; 20:2; 21:7,20). Judas betrayed the Lord into the hands of His enemies and then committed suicide. His place was later taken by Matthias (Acts 1:15-26). The apostles accompanied Jesus on His various preaching tours, went with Him to the Jewish feasts in Jerusalem, saw His wonderful works, and were privately instructed by Him. In spite of all this, when finally they saw Him arrested and crucified, as He had often foretold He would be, they all forsook Him and fled (Matt. 26:56). It is plain that they did not expect His resurrection, which Jesus had also frequently foretold, and that they were convinced of it only by the very plainest proofs furnished by Himself. It was only when this became undeniable, that light entered their minds and they saw Him for what He is, the Saviour of the world. Between the resurrection and the ascension Jesus spent much time opening their minds to understand the Scriptures (Luke 24:45; Acts 1:2).

The experience of Pentecost, ten days after the Lord's ascension, made them altogether different men, so that henceforth they fearlessly gave witness with power to the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. At first, the preaching of the Gospel was confined to Jerusalem, with Peter and John taking the lead. Their first mission outside of Jerusalem was to Samaria, where many believed (Acts 8:5-25). Persecution, arrest, and even murder of one of their number by the Jewish religious leaders only caused them to increase their efforts.

The number of the Twelve was increased when Paul, the chief persecutor of the Christians, was miraculously converted and called to be an apostle. With the transfer of the center of church activity to Antioch, where an active church consisting of Jews and Gentiles was built up, Paul became the leading figure in the Church, and most of the remaining narrative of the Acts is occupied with his missionary journey to the Gentiles. When we leave him a prisoner in Rome, the Gospel witness has spread through all the Mediterranean world.

Of the missionary work of the other apostles we know almost nothing from Scripture. Tradition tells us a little, but not much that is trustworthy. The majority, it seems, died martyrs' deaths. In the early Church they consistently claimed to possess and exercised a unique authority, given them by Christ, to lay the foundations of the Church. They spoke, wrote, and acted with a consciousness that they were specially commissioned to represent their Lord and to give to needy men the message of redemption. Their office was not, and could not be, passed on to others. It was unique. S.B.

APOSTOLIC AGE, the period in the history of the Christian Church when the Apostles were alive, beginning with the Day of Pentecost and ending with the death of the Apostle John near the end of the first century. Our only source for the period is the NT, especially Acts and the Epistles.

APOTHECARY (ȧ-pŏth'ĕ-kâ-rē), a word found in Exodus 30:25,35; 37:29; II Chronicles 16:14; Nehemiah 3:8; Ecclesiastes 10:1 in the KJV, although the Hebrew word it renders is more accurately translated "perfumer," as it usually is in the RV; for the reference is not to the selling of drugs, but to the making of perfumes.

APPAIM (ăp'ā-ĭm, Heb. 'appayim), son of Nadab, of the family of Hezron (I Chron. 2:30, 31).

APPAREL (See Dress)

APPEAL (ȧ-pēl'). No provision is made in the OT for the reconsideration from a lower to a higher court of a case already tried. Exodus 18:26 shows, however, that Moses provided for lower and higher courts: "The hard cases they brought unto Moses, but every small matter they judged themselves." In Deuteronomy 17:8-13 provision is made for a lower court, under certain conditions, to seek instructions as to procedure from a higher court; but the decision itself belonged to the lower court.

In NT times the Roman government allowed each synagogue to exercise discipline over Jews, but only the Romans had the power of life and death. A Roman citizen, could, however, claim exemption from trial by the Jews and appeal to be tried by a Roman court. Paul did this when he said, "I appeal unto Caesar" (Acts 25:11).

APPEARING (See Eschatology)

APPELLATIO (ăp'ĕ-lā'tĭō), the judicial process to which Paul resorted in Festus' court (Acts 25:1-12), was the act by which a litigant disputes a judgment, with the effect that the matter in dispute is automatically referred to a higher magistrate, normally the one who appointed the magistrate from whose judgment appeal is made. Hence, in Paul's case, the appeal to Caesar. The litigant either pronounced the word appello as Paul did (Acts 25:11), or submitted the appeal in writing. In either case the presiding magistrate was under obligation to transmit the file, together with a personal report (litterae dimissoriae) to the competent higher magistrate.

APPHIA (ăf'ĭ-ȧ, ăp'fĭ-ȧ, Gr. Apphía), called "our beloved" in KJV, "our sister" in ASV, RSV, following a different text. A Christian of Colossae, by many believed to be the wife of Philemon and mother of Archippus (Philem. 2).

APPIAN WAY (ăp'ĭ-ăn), oldest of Roman roads, begun in 312 B.C. which originally ran from Rome to Capua and was later extended to Brundisium. Parts of the road are still in use. Paul must have traveled by it from Puteoli to Rome (Acts 28:13-16).

APPII FORUM (ăp'ĭ-ī fō'rŭm), a town on the Appian Way, a day's journey for sturdy travelers, 43 Roman (39½ English) miles from Rome toward Naples, where Paul was met by Christian brethren from Rome (Acts 28:15).

Ruins of ancient aqueduct to Caesarea. JFW

AQUEDUCT (ăk'wĕ-dŭkt), a channel, covered or open, cut in the rock; or built of stone and sometimes faced with smooth cement; or carried on stone arches across depressions; to convey water from reservoirs, pools, cisterns or springs to the places where the water is to be used. The word does not occur in the Bible, but aqueducts may have existed even in pre-Israelite times, and were probably developed until the excellent work of the Nabatean period (100 B.C. to A.D. 100). The Roman period shows many fine examples. Hezekiah excavated the Siloam tunnel (conduit) to bring water into Jerusalem by a way which could not be stopped up in time of siege (II Kings 20:20, II Chron. 32:30), and this served the purpose of an aqueduct.

AQUILA (ăk'wĭ-là, Gr. Akýlos; Latin for "eagle"), a Jew whom Paul found at Corinth on his arrival from Athens (Acts 18:2,18,26; Rom. 16:3,4; I Cor. 16:19; II Tim. 4:19). A characteristic feature of Aquila and his wife Priscilla is that their names are always mentioned together. One in their interest in Christ, all that they accomplished was the result of that unity of spiritual nature and purpose. Having been expelled from Rome, they opened a tent-making business in Corinth. Because Paul followed the same trade, he was attracted to them. Being in full sympathy with Paul, they hospitably received him into their home, where he remained for a year and a half. Their willingness to "lay down their necks" for him earned the gratitude of all the churches. By their spiritual insight Apollos and many others were helped. Aquila and Priscilla had a "church in their house." Priscilla is usually named first: whether because she became a Christian first, or was more active, or for some other reason, is a matter of conjecture.

AR (ar, Heb. 'ār), a city or district of Moab, referred to in a song quoted in Numbers 21:15, named in Deuteronomy 2:9,18,29 and in a prophecy of Isaiah (15:1).

ARA (ā'rà, Heb. 'ārā'), son of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:38).

ARAB (ăr'ăb, Heb. 'ărāv), a city in the hill country of Judah, probably er-Râbiyeh, south of Hebron (Josh. 15:52).

ARABAH (ăr'à-bà, Heb. hā-ărāvâh, desert plain, steppe), El-Ghor (the Jordan Valley) N of the Dead Sea; Wadi el-Arabah S of it. The remarkable rift running from Mt. Hermon to the Gulf of Aqabah. Its northern portion drains into the Dead Sea, and from above the Sea of Chinnereth (Gennesaret) is below sea level. South of the Dead Sea it is higher, and drains into the Gulf of Aqabah at Ezion-geber. The name is transliterated in KJV only in Joshua 18:18, but everywhere in ASV and RSV; where KJV usually has "plain," sometimes "desert," or "wilderness," once "champaign." The southern portion is referred to in Deuteronomy 1:1, 2:8. It is connected with the Dead Sea and the Sea of Galilee in Deuteronomy 3:17, 4:49, Joshua 3:16, 12:3, II Kings 14:25. It was used in the most extended sense, as appears from Deuteronomy 11:30, Joshua 8:14, 12:1, 18:18, II Samuel 2:29, 4:7, II Kings 25:4, Jeremiah 39:4, 52:7. The Arabah represents one of the major natural divisions of Palestine in Joshua 11:16, 12:8. It is a narrow valley of varying breadth; the productivity of various sections depends on availability of water; populated intermittently from early ages, it lay in the path of caravan traffic between the Arabian and Sinai deserts and Canaan to the N. The Israelites made stops here in their wilderness wanderings. Solomon got iron and copper from the mines of the Arabah, which was part of the extended kingdom of David and Solomon, when they ruled over Edom.

ARABIA (à-rā'bĭ-à, Heb. ha'erev, 'ārav, 'ărāv, steppe), the large peninsula, consisting of Arabia Petraea, including Petra and the peninsula of Sinai; Arabia Deserta, the Syrian desert, between the Jordan Valley and the Euphrates; Arabia Felix, the S; bounded E, S and W by the Persian Gulf, Indian Ocean and Red Sea; N by the Fertile Crescent. Arabia is an arid steppe, rocky tableland with enough rainfall in the interior and south to support considerable population, yet its resources are so meager as to encourage emigration. With water barriers on three sides, expansion was toward the more fertile lands northward, in successive waves of Canaanites, Israelites, Amorites, Babylonians, Assyrians, Aramaeans (called Syrians in the Bible), Idumaeans and Nabataeans, all Semitic peoples, who collided with Indo-Europeans pressing down from Asia Minor and Iran. The proximity of Arabia, with a border ill-defined and difficult of defense, and with a "have-not" population ready to plunder, was a major factor conditioning the history of Israel.

The first mention of Arabia in the Bible by name is in the reign of Solomon, when its kings brought gold and spices, either as tribute or in trade (I Kings 10:15, II Chron. 9:14). Arabians brought tribute to Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:11). They joined the Philistines against Jehoram, defeating him disastrously (II Chron. 21:16-22:1). At desolate Babylon not even the Arabian nomad will pitch his tent (Isa. 13:20). Isaiah 21:13-17 lays a burden upon Arabia and her "forests" (thickets, RSV). Moral depravity is indicated in Jeremiah 3:2. The kings of Arabia are involved in judgment on the nations after the Babylonian captivity (Jer. 25:24). Arabia sold cattle to Tyre (Ezek. 27:21). Arabians gave Nehemiah trouble when he was rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:19, 4:7, 6:1). Arabians were among those present at Pentecost (Acts 2:11). Paul "went into Arabia" (Gal. 1:17). Belief that he went to Mt. Sinai is based on the experiences of Moses and Elijah there, and on Paul's mention of "mount Sinai in Arabia" in the same letter (4:25). E.R.

ARAD (ā'răd, Heb. 'ărādh). 1. A descendant of Benjamin, (I Chron. 8:15).

2. A city in the Negev, about 17 miles south of Hebron. In Numbers 21:1,33; 40 KJV has "king Arad the Canaanite" where ASV, RSV have "the Canaanite, the king of Arad." He attacked Israel in the wilderness, and is listed as one of the kings conquered by the Israelites (Josh. 12:14). Arad is named in locating the settlement of the Kenites (Judg. 1:16).

ARAH (ā'rà, Heb. 'ārah, wayfarer). 1. A son of Ulla, an Asherite (I Chron. 7:39).

2. The father of a family that returned from exile (Ezra 2:5; Neh. 7:10). Perhaps the same as No. 1.

3. A Jew whose granddaughter became the wife of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. 6:18).

ARAM (ā'răm, Heb. 'ărām): 1. A son of Shem (Gen. 10:22,23, I. Chron. 1:17).

2. Son of Kemuel, Abraham's nephew (Gen. 22:21).

3. Son of Shamer, of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:34).

4. In KJV, for the Greek form of Ram (Matt. 1: 3,4, ASV, RSV), called Arni in ASV, RSV of Luke 3:33.

5. A district of the hill country belonging to Gilead (I Chron. 2:23).

6. The name of Syria (Num. 23:7) and of its people, and usually so translated (II Sam. 8:5, I Kings 20:20, Amos 1:5). The land of Mesopotamia is Aram-naharaim, Aram between the two rivers (Gen. 24:10 etc.). The title of Psalm 60 refers to David's wars with two districts of Syria, Aram-naharaim and Aram-zobah. Isaac's wife was "the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, the sister of Laban the Syrian" (Gen. 25:20), Aramaean in RSV. The Aramaeans of Damascus play a significant role in the history of the Hebrew people from the time of Abraham (Gen. 15:2). Conquered by David, the Aramaean kingdom of Damascus became a rival of the northern kingdom of Israel, and after long conflict, its master, but fell to Assyria in the last days of Israel.

Aram was thus a broad term designating the lands of the Fertile Crescent from Mesopotamia to Phoenicia. Its people came out of the same Arabian reservoir of Semitic peoples as the Hebrews, and were closely related to Israel, with whom their history was intertwined, sometimes in alliance, often in conflict. E.R.

ARAMAIC (âr'à-mā'ĭk, Heb. 'ărāmîth), a West Semitic language, closely related to Hebrew, which developed various dialects. Genesis 31:47 calls attention to Laban's use of Aramaic in contrast to Jacob's use of Hebrew. That Aramaic had become the language of Assyrian diplomacy is clear from II Kings 18:26, Isaiah 36:11 (see RSV); also that Aramaic and Hebrew were so different that the people of Jerusalem did not understand the former. Jeremiah 10:11 is in Aramaic, an answer by the Jews to their Aramaic-speaking conquerors who would seduce them to worship idols. Daniel 2:4-7:28 is in Aramaic, also Ezra 4:8-6:18 and 7:12-26. It is not surprising that men in government circles in their period of history should write Aramaic, but why these particular parts of their books should be in Aramaic is not clear. Some Aramaic place and personal names occur in the OT, as Tabrimmon and Hazael. There are several Aramaic words and phrases in the NT, such as Talitha cumi (Mark 5:41); Ephphatha, (Mark 7:34); Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani (Mark 15:34, Matt. 27:46); Maranatha (I Cor. 16:22); Abba, Father (Mark 14:36, Rom. 8:15, Gal. 4:6), and many other words and names. It has been generally assumed as proven that Aramaic was the colloquial language of Palestine from the time of the return of the exiles from Babylon. But some believe that Hebrew was spoken in Galilee in NT times. It is probably safe to assert that our Lord habitually spoke Aramaic and occasionally Greek, and read and could speak Hebrew.

ARAN (ā'răn, Heb. 'ārān), one of the two sons of Dishan, and grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. 26:28; I. Chron. 1:42).

Mount Ararat, in eastern Armenia, now Turkey. RTHPL

ARARAT (âr'à-răt, Heb. 'ărārāt), a country in eastern Armenia, a mountainous tableland from which flow the Tigris, Euphrates, Aras (Araxes) and Choruk rivers. Near its center lies Lake Van, which, like the Dead Sea, has no outlet. Its general elevation is about 6,000 feet, above which rise mountains to as much as 17,000 feet, the height of the extinct volcano which in modern times is called Mt. Ararat, and on which the ark is supposed to have rested, though Genesis 8:4 is indefinite: "upon the mountains of Ararat" (plural). Thither the sons of Sennacherib fled, after murdering their father (II Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38, where the land is correctly called Armenia in KJV, following the LXX of Isa. 37:38). Jeremiah 51:27 associates the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni and Ashkenaz with the kings of the Medes as prophesied conquerors of Babylonia. The region is now part of Turkey. The Babylonian name was Urartu, having the same consonants as Heb. 'ărārāt, and its meaning cannot be determined with certainty.

ARATUS (âr'à-tŭs), Greek poet from Paul's native province, Cilicia. Flourished about 270 B.C. From his Phaenomena Paul quotes (Acts 17:28).

ARAUNAH (à-rô'nà, Heb. 'ărawnâh), the Jebusite who owned a threshing floor on Mount Moriah, which David purchased in order to erect an altar. Because of David's sin in numbering the people, the land was smitten with a plague. When the plague was stayed, David presented a costly offering to the Lord (II Sam. 24:15-25). Called Ornan in I Chronicles 21:18-28.

ARBA (ar'bà, Heb. 'arba'), the father of Anak, founder of the city which bore his name, Kirjath-arba or Hebron.

ARBATHITE (ar'bà-thīt, Heb. ha-'arvāthî), one of David's 30 heroes, a native of the Arabah or of Beth-arabah, called Abi-albon in II Samuel 23:31, Abiel in I Chronicles 11:32.

ARBITE (ar'bīt, Heb. ha-'ārbî), one of David's mighty men, in II Samuel 23:35, Parai. In his place in I Chronicles 11:37 we have Naarai the son of Ezbai.

ARCHAEOLOGY

I. The Nature, Scope, and Functions of Biblical Archaeology.

A. The Nature of Archaeology. Archaeology is concerned with all phases of man's activity in the past, and investigates the varied aspects of human endeavor by excavating ancient buried cities, and by examining the houses, implements, and other artifacts, by deciphering inscriptions, and by evaluating the language, literature, monuments, art, architecture, and other components of human life and achievement.

B. The Scope of Biblical Archaeology. In Biblical Archaeology, all the results of Near Eastern Archaeology which bear directly or indirectly on the Biblical record are brought into focus in order to help us to understand the Scriptures better, to evaluate critical questions, to solve exegetical problems, and to gain a fuller appreciation of the ancient world in which the Bible was written and which forms its background. The following paragraphs illustrate these functions.

C. The Functions of Biblical Archaeology.

1. Archaeology and the Understanding of the Bible. At countless points archaeological discoveries furnish a fuller understanding of the Bible, and in this role the discoveries serve as a gigantic commentary. To illustrate: in the patriarchal record, we read of Jacob's leaving the home of Laban in northern Mesopotamia (Gen. 31:20-21). Laban pursued after Jacob and his family to recover the family images which Rachel had stolen, and finally overtook them. Failing to find the family images, Laban pointed to his grandchildren (Jacob's children), and announced with the air of one achieving a psychological victory, "These children are my children" (Gen. 31:43). One is perplexed at this indication of a grandfather claiming control over his grandchildren, for it is quite universally understood that parents, not grandparents, have such control. Specific archaeological light, which helps to understand this passage came in the discovery of the Nuzi Tablets in 1925 in northern Iraq, near

One of the Nuzi adoption tablets. OIUC

Kirkuk. These tablets date from the 15th century B.C., the latter part of the Patriarchal Period (2000-1500 B.C.), and illuminate many aspects of patriarchal life and customs. In relation to Laban's statement concerning his grandchildren, the Nuzi Tablets are significant, for they show that in ancient Assyria, when a man, as Laban, adopts a son, which he evidently did with respect to Jacob, then the grandfather did exercise control not only over his adopted children, but also over their children, his grandchildren. Thus the Nuzi Tablets enable us to understand the implications of Laban's statement, "These children are my children." Furthermore, the Nuzi Tablets show that these events portrayed in the lives of the Patriarchs fit into the early period when the Bible indicates the Patriarchs lived, and not into the later period of the supposed J and E documents. Others aspects of the archaeological illumination of the Patriarchal Period are dealt with in the later section of this article on that era.

2. Archaeology and Critical Questions. At numerous points, subjective critical views of the Bible are elucidated objectively by specific archaeological discoveries. Such a case is the dating of the Song of Miriam (Exod. 15) in the record of the Exodus from Egypt, which by implication of its contents would date back to the period of Moses, c. 1400 B.C. Certain liberal critics have dated it to the days of the building of Solomon's Temple (c. 970 B.C.) and some as late as the Exile (600-500 B.C.). One of the chief reasons for such a late date is the reference to "the mountain of thine inheritance, O Jehovah" (Exod. 15:17). This was assumed to refer to Mount Zion and the Temple, necessitating a date at least as late as 970 B.C., and according to some, as late as the period 600-500 B.C. Striking light on the question came from the Ras Shamra Tablets, discovered on the coast of Syria in 1929, and dating back to 1400 B.C. One of these tablets has the very same expression, "The mountain of thine inheritance," in the Baal Epic where Baal speaks of the mountain to the north. W. F. Albright commented in this connection, "It now becomes absurd to use the verse as an argument for such an improbable late date of the Song of Miriam. This beautiful triumphal hymn, which may rightfully be termed the national anthem of ancient Israel, must now be pushed back to Israelite beginnings" ("The Bible After Twenty Years of Archaeology," Religion in Life, 21:4:543, Oct. 1952). Again and again archaeological evidence shows that late-dating and many other aspects of liberal higher criticism are now unsupported.

3. Archaeology and Higher Criticism. It is sometimes stated that archaeological discoveries have had little if any bearing on higher criticism, as in the observation of A. W. F. Blunt, Bishop of Bradford: "It is unfortunate that . . . we have been treated to such statements as that 'archaeology has disproved the higher criticism.'" (Introduction to Caiger's Bible and Spade). On the contrary, an examination of archaeological evidence shows just the reverse. Higher criticism cannot remain aloof in its ivory towers, oblivious to the vast amount of light cast on a multitude of problems by archaeological evidence. Beginning with the book of Genesis and the record of the Patriarchs, we find that the view of the late background of the Pentateuch is not supported by the evidence of the Nuzi Tablets. The implications of the broader phases as well as the small details of the Patriarchal record show that the background of the Patriarchal accounts fits into the earlier part of the second millennium B.C. (Cf. Laban's statement, "These children are my children" earlier in this article). Space prevents detailed consideration of other illustrations of the way in which archaeology bears on higher criticism, and we give merely the summary at the end of an article by the writer on "Archaeology and Higher Criticism" (Bib. Sac., Jan., 1957):

Israelite monotheism cannot be denied to the day of Moses, for either monotheism or an approach to it is found revealed in the archaeological records of the Near East at that time.

The documentary theory cannot remain aloof, for even the Babylonian flood account, discovered in the excavation of ancient Nineveh, fails to support the idea of two separate documents being fused to form the biblical flood record. Supposed early and late words have been held in the past to point to early and late documents in the Bible, but when objective factual light is brought to bear, as the discovery of the two words for "I" in the Ras Shamra Tablets from the period of 1400 B.C., we see that a convenient theory has to give way to potent fact.

Nor is the sacrificial system a late development, as shown by the Ras Shamra Tablets. Judges is acknowledged in the light of topographical and archaeological light to reflect "remarkable accuracy," and Daniel's Belshazzar in the light of the archaeological discoveries is no longer an unhistorical person and an item of evidence for dating the book late.

Archaeological discoveries do not support the idea of late material in the last twelve chapters of Joshua, to be assigned to a late writer designated by "P." The word "javelin" (sword, Joel 2:8) is not a late word supporting the late dating of Joel, but is early, as shown by the Ras Shamra Tablets, and the internal evidence of both Psalms and Job show, in the light of archaeology, reason for the long-accepted early dates for both. The chronicler knew whereof he spoke in referring to the drachma, a Greek coin, and the Aramaic of Ezra is not late, as shown by the Elephantine Papyri, but is contemporary with the century of Ezra.

In conclusion, we see that rationalistic higher criticism, far from maintaining itself in a lofty position on an untouchable pedestal, finds itself not only modified at almost every point but definitely weighed in the balance and found wanting in respect to many of its most crucial tenets.

4. Archaeology and the Study of the Biblical Text. At times Biblical students are puzzled when seeking to get the exact meaning of a Biblical text. In the account of the childhood of Samuel, the Bible records that when Hannah brought Samuel to the tabernacle, she also brought three bullocks, or as the Hebrew text read originally, "bullock three." Then, we are told, she offered a bullock; here the Hebrew text actually reads, "the bullock." The words, "the bullock" imply that she brought one bullock. Is one to explain the passage as indicating that she brought one or three? Specific light on this question concerning this biblical text came from the ancient Assyrian clay tablets, excavated in Iraq, which show that in referring to the age of animals, the number follows the name of the animal and the word "year" is understood but not written. Thus the phrase "bullock three" is an elliptical expression for the fuller phrase "a bullock of three years." In the light of the archaeological evidence, Hannah did not bring three bullocks and then offer "the bullock," but she brought one bullock of three years and sacrificed the bullock. Light on word construction, vocabulary, and many other phases of the biblical text has come from the ancient clay tablets, which for the most part are written in Semitic languages related to the Biblical Hebrew.

5. Archaeology and the Appreciation of the Ancient World. In earlier years, scholars could sit at their desks in London or Philadelphia and imagine what life was like in Bible times. Today, thanks to archaeology, we no longer imagine — we can reconstruct much of ancient life. We illustrate from the days of Elisha, nearly 3000 years ago (850 B.C.): Houses in that day often had two stories, and underground drains kept the interior of the city relatively dry. The houses were provided with plaster-lined cisterns (abundantly illustrated in the writer's excavation of Dothan), and Israelite women no longer needed to depend on water from the nearest spring.

The workman had iron tools of every kind — iron axes and adzes to cut trees, thin iron saws set in frames; sledge hammers as well as chisels and gouges. The farmer had iron sickles to harvest his grain. With the potter's wheel, which had already been in use for nearly 2000 years, there developed a type of mass-production in turning out a great deal of everyday pottery which was functional, rather than decorative as it had been in earlier centuries. Jewelry, cosmetic palettes, pendants of bone and ivory appear in every excavation of this period. Clothing, as pictured in the Assyrian monuments depicting Israelites, consisted of long fringed tunics for men, over which they wore fringed mantles, while on their feet they wore high boots turned up at the toes. (Cf. Albright, "The Time of Elijah," in Archaeology of Palestine, pp. 208-212). Every phase of ancient life is illuminated by archaeological discoveries.

II. Archaeological Light on the Main Periods of Biblical History.

A. The Early Chapters of Genesis.

1. Creation Tablets (Gen. 1 and 2).

a. Subject of the Tablets. Archaeological excavation in the region of ancient Mesopotamia in the 19th century brought forth tablets which give the text of the so-called Babylonian Creation Account. It tells of a plot of the gods of the lower world led by the goddess Tiamat against the great gods of Babylonia. The great gods chose a champion, Marduk, who fought against Tiamat, and cut her in half, using one half to form the heavens. Imbedded within this myth is a reference to the creation of man and the world. It is not primarily a pagan account of creation, but rather an epic in praise of Marduk, as pointed out by the late Professor Heidel at the University of Chicago (Babylonian Genesis, p. 3).

b. Comparison with the Biblical Record. The majesty and authority of the biblical record of creation stands in sharp contrast to the polytheism and crassness of the Marduk-Tiamat myth in the Babylonian account.

c. The Bible and Pan-Babylonianism. At the beginning of the twentieth century, Fredrich Delitzsch of Berlin set forth the radical idea that much of the early part of Genesis was a reworking and "purifying" of Babylonian myths and legends. At first glance the Hebrew word for deep, tehom, does bear a resemblance to the name Tiamat, the Babylonian goddess. A careful examination of the two words, however, shows that the Babylonian word Tiamat cannot yield the word tehom. A significant analysis of the question was given by Alexander Heidel in his Babylonian Genesis. He concluded: "To derive tehom from tiamat is grammatically impossible because the former has a masculine, the latter a feminine ending. Moreover, it would have no h . . . ." (Ibid., p. 85).

2. Archaeology and Eden (Gen. 1-2). The clay tablets and inscriptions of ancient Mesopotamia tell of an early sacred garden in which there was a tree of life. This sacred tree appears often on the seals of important people of ancient Babylon, as well as in the reliefs on decoration of the palaces (Ira Maurice Price, The Monuments and the Old Testament, Philadelphia: Judson Press, 1958, p. 111).

3. The Fall of Man (Gen. 3): The Adapa Story. The Story of Adapa, on ancient Babylonian tablets, tells that Adapa was brought before the gods because he broke the wing of the south wind. Food was placed before him, but he did not eat it and failed to gain eternal life (Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, edited by James B. Pritchard, Princeton University Press, 1955, pp. 101-102). In both the biblical record and the Adapa story, eating is involved in relation to eternal life. One must leave open the question whether this is a coincidental parallel or whether the Adapa story does represent a handing down of some knowledge of the events in Eden.

4. The Long-Lived Patriarchs (Gen. 5). A parallel to the long-lived patriarchs in the early chapters of Genesis is found in the Sumerian King List. The figures given for the kings listed here are beyond imagination: "Alalgar ruled 36,000 years . . . Dumuzi, a shepherd, ruled 36,000 years . . ." (Ibid., p. 265).

5. The Flood (Gen. 6-8). One of the striking archaeological discoveries of the last century was that of the Babylonian tablets giving the account of a great flood. The text of these tablets appears to date back to the early second millennium B.C. and is paralleled by fragments even earlier. It tells that the great god Ea warned a man named Utnapishtim: "Build a ship . . . aboard the ship take thou the seed of all living things (Ibid., p. 93). The flood waters came upon the land, then subsided, and the craft landed on a mountain. A dove was sent forth, then a swallow, and finally a raven. The many parallels between the biblical account and the Babylonian are evidence of an early knowledge of the flood. Throughout the world are records, traditions, and legends of a great flood. According to Johannes Riehm, there are a total of 268, all implying a universal knowledge of a great flood.

6. The Table of the Nations (Gen. 10). Many of the names of peoples and countries given in the Table of Nations in Genesis 10 were unknown outside of the Bible until discovered in the archaeological monuments. These would include Ashkenaz, the Ashkunz of the monuments; Togarmah-Tegarama; Elishah-Alashi; Tarshish-Tarsisi (pronounced in Assyrian Tarshish); Accad-Akkadu, and many others. W. F. Albright had commented on this chapter: "The Table of Nations remains an astonishingly accurate document" ("Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands," Supplement to Young's Concordance, published separately by The Biblical Colloquium, 1955, p. 71).

B. The Patriarchal Period (Gen. 12-36) (2000-1800 B.C.).

1. Patriarchal Palestine. Archaeological documents give us a graphic picture of Palestine in the early second millennium B.C. Shortly after 2000 B.C., an Egyptian nobleman named Sinuhe fled from Egypt, because of the political situation, and came to Canaan, where he lived for an extended period. He tells that it was "a goodly land . . . there were figs in it and vines . . . copious was its honey, plenteous its oil; all fruits were upon its trees. Barley was there and spelt" (Price, Monuments and the Old Testament, 1958, p. 148).

2. The Battle of the Kings (Gen. 14). In earlier years the record of the invasion of the four kings in the days of Abraham was rejected as unhistorical by many critics. The discovery in the archaeological records of names paralleling Arioch (Eri-aku) and Tidal, the two words forming Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:1), has taken the account out of the realm of legend. The very term for "retainers" (Gen. 14:14) is found in a cuneiform tablet from 15th century Palestine (Albright, "Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands," p. 76). Evidence of extended travel, as implied in this expedition, and the discovery of some of the very place names in Palestine (such as Ham, Gen. 14) show the historical background of the account. "Such early accounts can no longer be regarded as mythical or prehistoric" (Price, Monuments and the Old Testament, 1958, p. 145).

3. The Nuzi Tablets and the Patriarchal Accounts (Gen. 15:35). A whole series of events in the lives of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob has become clearer as a result of the discovery of the Nuzi Tablets from ancient Assyria, datable to the 15th century B.C.

a. Adoption. The Nuzi Tablets show the practice of adopting a son in patriarchal times, if one had no natural son. This clarifies the relationship between Abraham and Eliezer and explains Abraham's statement: "One born in my house is my heir" (Gen. 15:13).

b. Oral Blessing. When Isaac blessed Jacob, thinking it was Esau, it might be expected that upon discovery of the deception, he would merely repeat the blessing and apply it to Esau. But this he did not do. Light on the question also came from the Nuzi Tablets, which show the binding nature of an oral promise, and that it had validity even in a law court. This is demonstrated in the case of a young man named Tarmiya, recorded in the Nuzi Tablets, who sought to marry a young woman, Zululishtar. His brothers, however, tried to prevent him. Tarmiya won legal permission in the law court case which followed, by invoking his father's oral promise that he could take Zululishtar to wife.

c. Family Images (Gen. 31). Rachel's theft of the family images (Gen. 31:19) and Laban's great concern to recover them has puzzled Bible commentators. The Nuzi Tablets show, however, that the possession of the family images indicated right of inheritance. Laban did not want Jacob to inherit his estate. Many other aspects of customs and practices in the patriarchal period are graphically illuminated by the Nuzi Tablets (Cf. Laban's statement, "These children are my children," in this article, I, C, 1.).

C. Egypt and the Wilderness (Gen. 37-Deut. 34) (1800-1400 B.C.).

1. Joseph in Egypt. The turning point in Joseph's career came when he went to Dothan in northern Palestine to find his brothers. The site of this ancient city has been excavated in a series of campaigns by the writer and Mrs. Free and their excavation staff. These discoveries show that it was a thriving city in the days of Joseph (Gen. 37:17) and in the time of Elisha (c. 850 B.C.; II Kings 6: 13), the two periods in which it is mentioned in the Biblical narrative. Sold by his brothers to a passing camel caravan of traders, he was brought to Egypt, where the background of his life is abundantly illuminated by Egyptian archaeological discoveries.

a. Rise to Power (Gen. 41, 42). It has been objected that a Hebrew slave could never rise to power in a powerful foreign state. Archaeological discoveries show, on the contrary, that a Canaanite by the name of Dudu rose to high favor in the Egyptian court; another Canaanite, Meri-Ra, became armor-bearer to Pharaoh; and Yankhamu, also a Canaanite, acted as deputy for Pharaoh of Egypt in the grain growing district of Egypt (J. P. Free, Archaeology and Bible History, Wheaton, Illinois: Scripture Press, 5th ed., 1956, p. 77).

b. Joseph's Titles (Gen. 45:8). Joseph is designated as "Father to Pharaoh," "Lord of all his house," and "Ruler throughout all the land of Egypt" (Ibid., p. 78). Egyptian archaeological texts illustrate the various governmental posts which Joseph likely held as the important official under the king (William A. Ward, "Egyptian Titles in Genesis 39-50," BS, Jan., 1957, pp. 40-59).

c. Egyptian Names. Some scholars have completely rejected the historicity of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt. This view, however, is contradicted by many lines of evidence, including the discovery that many Israelite names were of Egyptian origin. According to W. F. Albright instances of Israelite names include Moses, Hophni, Phinehas, perhaps Merari, and others. ("Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands," 1955, p. 84). More recent research has also made it possible to be reasonably confident of the location of many sites referred to in Exodus, including Ramses, Pithon, Succoth, and Baal-zephon (Ibid., p. 84).

Dr. Free pointing to a layer of ashes at Jericho. Joshua 6 says that Jericho was burned after capture.

d. Joseph's Era and Biblical Criticism. There are many bits of Egyptian coloring in the account of Joseph in Egypt which have been beautifully illustrated by Egyptian archaeological discoveries (Ibid., p. 78). R. H. Pfeiffer, late Professor of Old Testament at Harvard, acknowledges a definite knowledge of Egypt on the part of the author of the Pentateuch.

2. The Exodus: The Song of Miriam (Exod. 15). The Song of Miriam, composed at the time of the Exodus from Egypt, has been dated hundreds of years later by certain liberal scholars, chiefly because the reference to the "Mountain of thine inheritance" was held to be a reference to Mt. Zion and the Temple. As noted at the beginning of this article, the discovery of the Ras Shamra tablets yielding a text with the same phrase from 1400 B.C. showed that such a phrase occurs early and is not evidence of a late date (this article, I, C, 2.).

D. The Conquest and Judges (Joshua, Judges) (1400-1050 B.C.).

1. Evidence of the Conquest. A number of sites excavated in Palestine show evidence of violent destruction in the period between 1400 and 1200 B.C. They are very definitely to be connected with the conquest under Joshua and the further conquests in the period of the Judges. In this period, Bethel (Judges 1:22) was destroyed by a great fire which left a solid mass of burned brick (Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past, Princeton University Press, Second Edition, 1959, p. 160). At Lachish the burned remains of a city from the 13th century B.C. was discovered (Ibid., p. 162). At Kirjathsepher (Josh. 10:38; Judg. 1: 11-13), there is at the end of the Late Bronze Period (1600-1200 B.C.) a great burned layer and above it an Israelite city (Ibid., p. 163). At Hazor (Josh. 11:10-13), Garstang found evidence of destruction about 1400 B.C. and subsequent excavations by Yiga'el Yadin showed similar destruction at the end of the Late Bronze Period (Ibid., p. 165).

2. Jericho (Josh. 6). From 1930 to 1936 Jericho was excavated by John Garstang of the University of Liverpool. He found the fallen walls of Jericho and reported that they "fell outward so completely that the attackers would be able to clamber up and over the ruins into the city" (John Garstang, Joshua-Judges, London, Constable, 1931, p. 146; cf. Free, op. cit., p. 130). Further excavation 1952-1958 by the British School of Archaeology found some Late Bronze Age pottery (1600-1200 B.C.) but not as much as they expected. Miss Kathleen Kenyon, the director, concluded that much of the city of Joshua's day had been eroded away. It should also be pointed out that Garstang had already dug there for seven years and had removed much of it.

3. The Record of the Book of Judges. Some critical scholars have held that the book of Judges is made up of stories which were not written until about 550 B.C., more than half a millennium after the time portrayed in the accounts. John Garstang, however, in his book Joshua-Judges, points out: "We find no reason to doubt that the historical narrative contained in the books of Joshua and Judges, so far as it was derived from the old sources . . . was founded upon fact" (p. 141). At many points archaeological evidence has been found which illuminates and confirms the book of Judges:

a. Names. Names in the book of Judges, such as Ahiman and Talmai (Judg. 1:10), appear in the Ras Shamra Tablets, showing that these names fit into that early period (Free, op. cit., p. 141).

b. Cities. Jerusalem was not captured in this period according to Joshua and Judges.This is confirmed by the evidence of the Amarna Tablets, which show that the king of Jerusalem remained loyal to the Pharaoh of Egypt. Hazor's destruction is evidence in the archaeological discoveries (For other evidence concerning the book of Judges, see Free, op. cit., pp. 142-145).

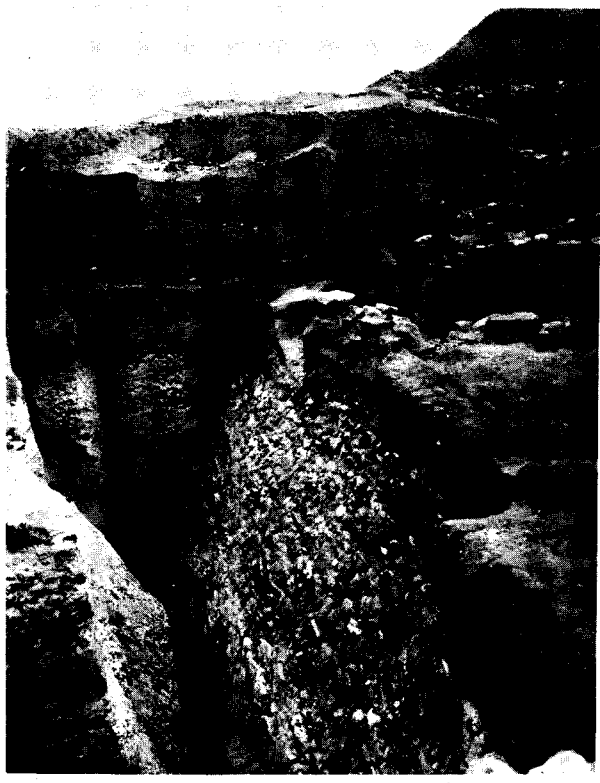
E. The Monarchy (I Sam.-Dan.) (1050-600 B.C.).

1. The Rise of the Monarchy in Israel. The archaeological monuments and records show that the two great powers on either side of Israel — Assyria and Egypt — were at a low ebb in the eleventh and tenth centuries B.C. (1100-900 B.C.), when the monarchy in Israel began and developed under Saul, David, and Solomon. God's sovereignty in restraining nations is here evidenced.



Remains of the city walls of ancient Jericho. © MPS

2. Light on the Reign of Saul (c. 1025 B.C.). Saul ruled Israel from the town of Gibeah, about two miles N of Jerusalem. Excavations there by W. F. Albright revealed seven levels, from 100 B.C. to A.D. 70. The fortress of the second town, with walls six feet thick and a massive stair case, is likely the castle of Saul. The archaeological evidence showed that it was destroyed shortly after his death (Bulletin of American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 52).

3. The Period of David (II Sam.; I Chron. 11-29) (1010-971 B.C.). In the earlier years of the 20th century, critical theory denied to the age of David the musical development and musical organizations described in the Bible (I Chron. 23: 5-6). Archaeological discoveries show, on the contrary, that music was well developed long before the days of David.

a. Objects of Art. Tomb paintings dated about 1900 B.C. show Asiatic Semites coming into Egypt, one carrying a lyre. Tomb paintings at Thebes (1400 B.C.) portray a girl with a lyre, another with an oboe. The name of David's guild musician, Calcol (I Chron. 2:26) is paralleled on inscriptions on the Megiddo ivories, and Than and Haman (I Chron. 2:6), in the Ras Shamra Tablets. W. F. Albright observes that such discoveries prove the correctness of the biblical indication of early musical guilds in the days of David (W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, Baltimore: the Johns Hopkins Press, 1942, p. 127; cf. Free, op. cit., p. 151).

b. Davidic Psalms. Many Psalms attributable to David from their internal evidence have been dated hundreds of years later by critics of the 19th and 20th centuries. Archaeological discoveries throw specific light on several aspects of this problem: the spelling used in the Gezar Calendar and in contemporary archaeological inscriptions help us fix a date in the tenth century B.C. for Psalm 18 (Albright, Archaeology of Palestine, p. 220). Also, in the light of the Ras Shamra Tablets (Ugaritic Texts) many of the Psalms once downdated to the late period must be put back into early Israelite times, not later than the tenth century B.C. Albright comments, "There is no longer any reason to refuse a Davidic date for such Psalms" (Ibid., pp. 226-227).

c. David's Reign. Details of David's reign are highlighted by archaeological discoveries. The low ebb of both Egypt and Assyria in the eleventh and tenth centuries B.C. explains why, under God's direction, the Kingdom could develop and expand (See E, 1. above). The power of the Philistines in the time of Saul and David is explained by the Egyptian monuments showing the attempt of the Philistines to enter Egypt. They were repulsed, then landed in Palestine to add to the troubles of Saul and David.

4. Solomon's Reign (I Kings 1-11) (971-931 B.C.). Many details of Solomon's reign are illuminated by archaeological discoveries:

Ruins of Solomon's Stables at Megiddo. OIUC

a. Solomon's Stables (I Kings 9:19). Extensive stables dating to the tenth century B.C. and used by following generations were uncovered by the University of Chicago at Megiddo, a city specifically mentioned as the scene of Solomon's extensive building operations (I Kings 9:15). One section uncovered would have housed nearly 500 horses; similar stables have been found at Hazor and Tell el Hesi. Some archaeologists have suggested that these stables date to the time of Ahab, rather than Solomon, and a similar view was set forth in the spring of 1960 by Yiga'el Yadin, Israelie archaeologist. However, as W. F. Albright observed in earlier years, the stables were built by Solomon, and used by succeeding generations down into the time of Ahab.

b. Trade Activities. Solomon's relations with the land of Sheba (I Kings 10:ff) are illuminated by discoveries showing that the latter country was a thriving kingdom earlier than had been previously supposed. Tarshish (I Kings 10:22) is now shown by archaeological inscriptions to be the Island of Sardinia, and Ophir is mentioned in an inscription from Tell Qasileh (near Jaffa and the modern city of Tel-Aviv; Albright, "Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands," pp. 93-94).

c. Building Styles. While nothing remains of Solomon's temple, details of construction are illuminated by archaeological discoveries. The proto-Ionic or proto-Aeolic pilaster capital for columns was extensively used, as shown by archaeological discoveries at Megiddo, Samaria, Shechem in Moab, and near Jerusalem, dating from the tenth to the eighth centuries B.C. It was likely used in some of the Solomonic buildings (Ibid., p. 93).

d. Solomon's Seaport (I Kings 9:26). The biblical reference to Solomon's seaport on the Red Sea was strikingly illuminated by the excavation of Nelson Glueck (1938-40) which uncovered this important copper smelting center in the Solomonic period. Solomon's workmen utilized the principle of the forced draft in refining copper (Cf. Free, op. cit., pp. 171-2).

5. Over Forty Kings of Scripture. Earlier in the 20th century, Robert Dick Wilson pointed out that 41 kings of the Bible are to be found in the ancient archaeological records. Of these there are 26 foreign kings, including five kings of Egypt (Shishak, Tirhakah, et al.), five Assyrian kings, five Babylonian, and kings of several other countries. Six kings of Israel and four of Judah were found in archaeological inscriptions by Dr. Wilson, and since his death in 1930, the names of two more Judean kings have been discovered: Jehoiachin on tablets found near the Ishtar Gate in Babylon and brought to the attention of scholars in the early 1940's, and Ahaz on a carnelian seal published in 1940 by C. C. Torrey (BASOR, 79, pp. 27-28; cf. G. Ernest Wright, Biblical Archaeology, Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1957, p. 162; also Edward J. Young's revision of Robert Dick Wilson, A Scientific Investigation of the Old Testament, Chicago: Moody Press, 1959, p. 71). Wilson pointed out that these archaeological monuments containing the names of more than 40 biblical kings show that "the text of the proper names in the Hebrew Bible has been transmitted with the most minute accuracy" (Ibid., p. 71).

6. Rehoboam's Reign. The Bible records that shortly after the division of the kingdom, in the reign of Rehoboam, the Egyptian King Shishak invaded Palestine (I Kings 14:25). This is illuminated by the archaeological inscriptions on the walls of the temple of Karnak in southern Egypt, which portray Shishak, tell of his invasion into Palestine, and enumerate 156 place names in Palestine which he claimed to have taken. These included Ajalon, Gaza, Gibeon, and Taanach (Price, op. cit., p. 233).

7. Ahab (874-853 B.C.) and other kings of the Northern Kingdom. Ahab is listed in the Assyrian royal inscriptions as one of those combating Shalmaneser III of Assyria. The archaeological monument known as the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser records and portrays the tribute paid to the same king by Jehu a few years later. The invasion of Moab in the days of Omri and Ahab is illuminated by the Moabite stone, which gives details paralleling the record in II Kings 3-4-7. In another inscription Tiglath-pileser refers to the payment of tribute by Menahem. In inscriptions written by the scribes of Sargon II, he tells of the capture of Samaria and the carrying away of 27,290 Israelite captives. Some of the captives, as recorded in II Kings 17:6, were settled in the valley of the Habor, the river of Gozan. Excavation by von Oppenheim at Halaf in northern Mesopotamia established the location of Gozan, the capital of the upper Khabur district (Albright, Recent Discoveries in Bible Lands, p. 95).

8. Light on Samaria and the end of the Northern Kingdom. The excavation of Samaria by Harvard University revealed the buildings of the days of Omri and Ahab (ninth century B.C.). In the level following their time, nearly 70 ostraca (potsherds bearing writing) were found listing payments of oil and wine as revenue or taxes sent to the storerooms of the royal palace (Free, op. cit., pp. 182-3). Many of the names on these ostraca are formed with the word Baal — Abi-baal, Meri-baal —, giving archaeological light on the impact of Baal worship, as implied in the Bible (I Kings 16:31-32). Baal worship had made such inroads that people were giving names to their children which included the name Baal. The Samaria excavations also brought forth many ivory plaques, panels, small boxes, and furniture decorations, confirming the biblical reference to Ahab's "ivory house" (I Kings 22:39). The fall of Samaria (722-21 B.C.) is described in the archaeological records of Sargon, king of Samaria, and the biblical record is given in II Kings 17:5-6.

9. The Last Days of the Southern Kingdom (II Kings 22-25; II Chron. 34-36; Jeremiah) (640-586 B.C.). Striking archaeological light on the last days of the Southern Kingdom (just before and after 600 B.C.) came in the discovery of a group of clay tablets found near the Ishtar Gate in Babylon (cf. this aritcle, II, E, 5.). These tablets record the rations given by the king of Babylon to the captive King Jehoiachin, confirming the biblical record that Jehoiachin, the next to the last king of Judah, was taken captive by the Babylonians and later given a daily allowance by the Babylonian king (II Kings 25:27-30). As the Babylonian army closed in on the Kingdom of Judah in the period of 588-87 B.C., the Bible indicates that the cities of Lachish and Azekah had not yet fallen (Jer. 34:7). Most significant archaeological light on these two cities comes from the discovery in the excavation at Lachish of ostraca which proved to be military dispatches. One of these letters (No. 4), written by the army officer at a military outpost to his superior officer at Lachish, says, "We are watching for the signals of Lachish, according to all indications which my lord hath given, for we cannot see Azekah." This letter not only shows that the Babylonian army of Nebuchadnezzar was tightening its net around the land of Judah, but mentions the very two cities, Azekah and Lachish, which the Bible indicates fell at the end of the war, shortly before Jerusalem. Much other important light is brought to bear on this period by the Lachish Letters (For details, cf. Free, op. cit., pp. 579-600).

F. The Exile and Return from Captivity (II Kings 25-Malachi) (c. 600 B.C.-425 B.C.).

1. The Desolation of Palestine in the Days of the Exile (sixth century B.C.). The biblical record of the destruction of many towns (Jer. 34:7) at the beginning of the Exile and the desolation of Jerusalem and much of the land (II Kings 25:10-12) has been doubted by certain scholars. C. C. Torrey of Yale considered the account of the restoration given in Ezra as "quite apocryphal" (Albright, Archaeology of Palestine, p. 141). The excavations have shown, on the contrary, that many of the cities of Judah were destroyed and not rebuilt, and others were destroyed and reoccupied after a long period of abandonment. There is not a single known case where a town of Judah itself was occupied continuously throughout the period of the Exile (Ibid., p. 142). This strikingly illustrates the Biblical indication of the desolation of the land, and fails to support Torrey's theory that the biblical writers exaggerated the destruction of Nebuchadnezzar's army.

2. Evidence of the Exiles in Babylonia and Egypt. Archaeological evidence of the Jews who were taken to Babylonia (II Kings 25:11) was found in tablets excavated at Nippur, which come from this period and contain many typically Jewish names. In Egypt, the Elephantine Papyri, found on an island in the Nile, gives us light on the Jews living there who stemmed from the group that went down at the beginning of the Exile in the days of Jeremiah (Jer. 43:6-7). These papyrus letters were actually written by these Jews in the fifth century B.C. (cf. J. P. Free, op. cit., p. 231).

3. The Edict of Cyrus and the Return from Exile. The Bible records that when King Cyrus gained control of Babylon (539 B.C.), he allowed the Jews to return to their native land (Ezra 1:1-4). Archaeological light on this action of Cyrus came in the discovery of a clay cylinder on which Cyrus' edict is recorded concerning his sending displaced and captive people back to their original homes: "I gathered together all their populations and restored them to their dwelling places" (Price, op. cit., p. 314; cf. Ancient Near Eastern Texts, edited by Pritchard, p. 316).

G. The Intertestamental Period (400 B.C. to the Time of Christ).

1. Spread of Greek Culture. Archaeology has illuminated the general background from the close of the Old Testament (425-400 B.C.) to New Testament times. The spread of Greek culture following the days of Alexander the Great (333 B.C.) is illustrated in the discovery of Greek inscriptions, coins and objects of art in practically every excavation of this period.

2. The Zeno Papyri. The Zeno Papyri, excavated in Egypt, contain a letter from Tobias, the governor of Ammon (c. 250 B.C.) in eastern Palestine, stating that he was sending horses, dogs, and camels to the king of Egypt. This Tobias is a later descendant of the Tobiah (Greek, Tobias) who troubled Nehemiah in the days of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10; cf. Free, op. cit., p. 249). Much other light has been shed on the Intertestamental period, but the limits of this article preclude further discussion. Useful material will be found in Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past, pp. 244-253; Free, Archaeology and Bible History, pp. 255-282; and John A. Thompson, Archaeology and the Pre-Christian Centuries, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1958.

H. Archaeology and the New Testament.

1. The Language of the New Testament. Up until the turn of the last century, many Bible students believed that the New Testament was written in a special Greek, quite different from classical Greek, and sometimes characterized as "Biblical" Greek. At the end of the 19th century, a young German scholar, Adolph Deissmann, realized that the ancient everyday Greek documents being excavated in Egypt were written in a Greek very similar to that of the New Testament. This revolutionary discovery showed that the New Testament was written in the Greek of everyday life, a language that would be meaningful and bring home the message of Scripture to every man who used Greek as his means of communication, and not merely to those who understood so-called "Biblical" Greek. The archaeological discoveries have shown that one New Testament word after another is not some special invented term, but a word that would have immediate and full meaning to those who lived 2,000 years ago. The word "daily" for example, was found in one of the papyrus documents at the head of a shopping list, and has the specific meaning of food just "for the day."

2. The Dead Sea Scrolls and the New Testament.

a. New Testament Vocabulary. The Dead Sea Scrolls, first brought to the attention of the world in 1948 after being discovered in a cave at the north end of the Dead Sea, contain a number of manuscripts of a Jewish sect which was flourishing between 100 B.C. and A.D. 100. Here we find light on the religious vocabulary of the New Testament period, for words parallel to "fellowship," "congregation," and "church" appear in the Dead Sea Scroll documents (Finegan, op. cit., p. 289). It should be emphasized that the Dead Sea Scrolls were not the source for the words of Christ. This is forcefully pointed out by Millar Burrows, who states that the differences between the Dead Sea Scrolls and the words of Christ are more striking than the similarities (Millar Burrows, Dead Sea Scrolls, New York: Viking Press, 1955, p. 331). The scrolls do, however, give us specific light on the "religious vocabulary" of the first century A.D.

b. The Religious Background of the New Testament. From the Gospels we know of several Jewish religious groups, including the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Herodians. Now the Dead Sea Scrolls give us additional insight into another group, who may be the Essenes, described by the Jewish historian Josephus. They were a religious community which could be joined by those who adhered to the laws and regulations set down in their "Manual of Discipline."

c. The Scrolls and the Work of Christ. The scrolls tell of a teacher of righteousness, who has been identified by some as Dupont-Sommer, as a Messianic parallel to Christ. Again, competent scholars, as Burrows, have pointed out that the divergences are great, and one cannot maintain the teacher of righteousness of the scrolls to be a source of things stated concerning Christ (Burrows, op. cit., pp. 330-31).

d. The Scrolls and the Evangelical View of the Bible). The evangelical view of the Bible, that it is divinely inspired, is not challenged by the material in the Dead Sea Scrolls. In view of the fact that some writers have implied that the Dead Sea Scrolls were the origin of ideas in the New Testament, and that conservative theologians have much to dread from the Dead Sea Scroll material, one should note W. F. Albright's forcible statement that he "doubts whether any conservative theologian is in the least apprehensive as to what the scrolls may bring forth, but he does know a number of liberals who are seriously worried about the fate of their pet hypotheses" (Review of Edmund Wilson's book, The Scrolls from the Dead Sea, New York Herald Tribune Book Review section).

For further study, out of the multitude of books on the Dead Sea Scrolls, two of the most useful are Millar Burrows, Dead Sea Scrolls, 1955, mentioned above in section (a). Though Burrows by his own acknowledgment holds the liberal position, there is a wealth of useful objective material in this book; it is supplemented by his second volume, More Light on the Dead Sea Scrolls, New York: Viking Press, 1958. A shorter very useful book by an evangelical scholar is F. F. Bruce's Second Thoughts on the Dead Sea Scrolls, Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1956.

3. Archaeological Confirmation of the New Testament. While the New Testament, in contrast to the Old Testament, was written over a span of much less than one hundred years, there are a number of specific confirmations, including the evidence of the accuracy of Luke's reference to the enrollment of Cyrenius in Luke 2:1-3, and the confirmation of the accuracy of the geographical references concerning Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe in Acts 14:6. (For further summaries of specific confirmation and illumination of the New Testament, see the writer's Archaeology and Bible History, pp. 282-340.)

For further study in New Testament archaeology, though written many years ago, Camden M. Cobern's The New Archaeological Discoveries and Their Bearing upon the New Testament, (New York, Funk and Wagnalls, 9th ed., 1929) still has a great amount of useful material not found in more recent books. It can be supplemented by Finegan's, Light from the Ancient Past, 2nd ed., 1959, pp. 247-551, which has very useful and up-to-date material. See also Merrill F. Unger's recent volume, Archaeology and the New Testament, Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1962. J.P.F.

ARCHANGEL (See Angel)

ARCHELAUS (ärʹkĕ-lāʹŭs), son of Herod the Great, who succeeded his father as ruler of Idumea, Samaria and Judea in 4 B.C. He was deposed by the Roman government in A.D. 6 (Matt. 2:22).

ARCHERS (arʹchĕrz), bowmen, hunters or warriors with bow and arrow. Ishmael is the first man so named in the Bible (Gen. 21:20). Joseph is represented as victor in a battle of archery (Gen. 49:23,24). RSV has "sound of musicians" instead of KJV "noise of archers" (Jud. 5:11), which makes better sense, archers not being noted for noise. Archery plays a part in a crisis in the relations of David and Jonathan (I Sam. 20:17-42). Philistine archers mortally wounded Saul (I Sam. 31:3, I Chron. 10:3). The sons of Ulam, Benjamites, "were mighty men of valor, archers" (I Chron. 8:40). Josiah was killed by archers (II Chron. 35:23). Job compares his troubles to being surrounded by archers (Job 16:13). Archers are mentioned in Isaiah 21:17, 22:3; Jeremiah 50:29. Light-armed, mobile, effective at a distance, archers were valuable in any army, and their skill was no less useful in hunting.

ARCHEVITES (arʹkē-vīts), colonists in Samaria who complained to Artaxerxes about the Jews' rebuilding Jerusalem (Ezra 4:9). Identified in RSV as "the men of Erech" in Babylonia.

ARCHI (ärʹkī), probably not the name of a place but of a clan which possessed Ataroth in Ephraim, perhaps modern Tell es-Nasbeh, a few miles S of Bethel. In Joshua 16:2, where KJV has "and passed along until the borders of Archi to Ataroth," ASV renders, "and passed along unto the border of the Archites to Ataroth," and RSV, "it passes along to Ataroth, the territory of the Archites."

ARCHIPPUS (ärʹkĭpʹŭs, master of the horse), a Christian at Colossae, conspicuous as a champion of the Gospel, a close friend (or perhaps son) of Philemon, an office-bearer in the Church (Col. 4:17, Philem. 2). Because of the spiritual atmosphere at Colossae (like Laodicea, Rev. 3:14-19), it is not surprising to find Paul exhorting his fellow-soldier to maintain his zeal and fidelity.

ARCHITE (ärʹkīt), a member of the clan of Ataroth in Ephraim (Josh. 16:2). Hushai, David's friend (I Chron. 27:33), acted as his secret agent in the rebellion of Absalom, to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (II Sam. 15:31-17:23).

ARCHITECTURE, may be defined as the art or science of building. As a form of art (q.v.), architecture is the effort to make a building aesthetically pleasing as well as useful. It must be classified as an abstract art, for it is the least representational of all the arts. For example, an artist who wished to portray the Madonna and Child could hardly use architecture as his medium; modern architects do indeed attempt to employ symbolism in order to make it representational, but even this is greatly limited. Architecture could further be described as the most social of the arts, since a building is usually designed for more than one person, whether it is a church, a railroad station, or a home. The sole exception probably would be the monument or tomb which is intended simply to contain the remains of a single individual.

The materials of architecture in antiquity were wood, clay, brick (formed of clay, whether sun-baked or kiln-fired), and stone — in general, local availability was the determining factor in the choice of material used. It is well known that wooden beams were exported from Lebanon (the famed "cedars of Lebanon") to practically all parts of the ancient Middle East; likewise the beautiful and distinctive rose granite was exported from the quarries at Aswan in Upper Egypt to many lands to be used for columns and statues, but these are notable exceptions.

One of the earliest materials for building is known as "wattle and daub," formed by driving stakes into the ground and interlacing reeds or withes to form the framework, and then covering both sides with plastic clay. When the clay had dried in the sun it was quite permanent and required only a periodic coat of plaster to preserve it. Wattle-and-daub walls have been found dating back to the earliest period of building, namely the late Neolithic period. Buildings of this material can be included under the subject of architecture only in the broadest sense of the word, however, for there is little indication of an aesthetic quality.

Clay bricks seem to have been invented by the Obeid people in Persia before they descended to the Mesopotamian plain early in the fourth millennium B.C. The temple at Abu Shahrein (known in ancient times as Eridu) in southern Mesopotamia, and that at Tepe Gawra in northern Mesopotamia (both from the early part of the fourth millennium) can clearly be described as architectural buildings, incorporating several features which became characteristic of Mesopotamian architecture, of which we shall mention only the use of the buttress, designed not so much to strengthen the construction as to break up the monotonous expanse of a clay-brick wall.

In Egypt, early builders not only experimented with clay and brick, but also with wood, and then they made a remarkable transition to stone masonry. The genius traditionally connected with this new building technique was Imhotep, the designer and builder of the Step Pyramid at Saqqara in the time of Zoser (or Djoser) of the Third Dynasty (c. 2780 B.C.). From an examination of the remains at Saqqara there seems to be little doubt that the builders were seeking to imitate wood through the medium of stone, for we find simulated hinges and boards carved in stone doors that obviously could not function and other features that would be useful in wood but only ornamental in stone.

In the same building compound at Saqqara are found such remarkable features as the Proto-Doric column (which seems to have been formed in stone after the pattern of papyrus bundles), the cornice, corner posts, and other tectonic elements. The columns, it should be added, are not free-standing but are an integral part of the stone building; yet they cannot properly be identified as pilasters since they have all of the other features of the column. Fluting is not only concave in the customary Doric manner but also convex, and the capitals appear to be papyrus and palm leaves, which compare to the acanthus leaves of the Corinthian columns of Greek architecture of a much later period. If the columns were free-standing, the fluting would number from 14 to 20 around the circumference of the column, which compares to 20 flutes in the classical Doric order.

One of the early problems to be faced in building was the construction of the roof, and the solutions led to two main forms of architecture: trabeated and arcuated. The trabeated form is designed and constructed using horizontal beams supported by vertical posts, commonly called "post and lintel." The arcuated form makes use of various modifications of the arch. In the trabeated form the length of span between vertical supports is limited by the strength of the material used for the lintel. If, for example, the lintels were constructed of stone, as in ancient Egypt, it was only by using stone of great thickness that a span of any reasonable length could be obtained, and as a result the space between columns in Egyptian temples is not much greater than the diameter of the columns. Wooden beams, on the other hand, permitted more useful space between the uprights. With the modern invention of structural steel and reinforced concrete, the span reaches probably its greatest limit.

An attempt to solve this problem resulted in the development of the arch. The first step was probably the corbelled vault, which is formed by stepping out successive courses of brick or stone beyond the supporting wall or column, to meet similar corbelling from the adjacent vertical support. Corbelled vaults can be found at Ur in Mesopotamia as early as the Early Dynastic Period (c. 3000-2340 B.C.), and in Egypt as early as the tombs of the Third Dynasty (c. 2780-2680 B.C.) at Reqaqnah and Beit Khallaf. To judge from predynastic drawings from Egypt, the true arch may have developed from the practice of bending reeds which had been erected vertically to form side walls, so they would join overhead to form a roof. The arch, which is but a refinement of corbelling to effect a curved line rather than a step-like appearance, is found also in some of the buildings of Ur. The use of the arch in large buildings, however, does not seem to have been used successfully until the Roman period, and is generally attributed to the Etruscans. A modification of the corbelled vault, in which the stones form the sides of a triangle coming to an apex overhead, is found in Mycenaean tombs at Mycenae and Ugarit, dating from the 15th or 14th century B.C.

Unusual styles of architecture include the pyramid-shaped building. The ziggurat in Mesopotamia is generally believed to be the representative of a mountain; it was built of clay brick with exterior staircases or a sloping ramp, and probably a shrine at the top. One of the best preserved has recently been excavated at Choga Zambil, 20 miles SE of Susa, in Iran. The pyramids in Egypt were built as tombs and were constructed of stone, having an inner room or rooms. The Egyptians developed great precision in squaring and orienting their pyramids.

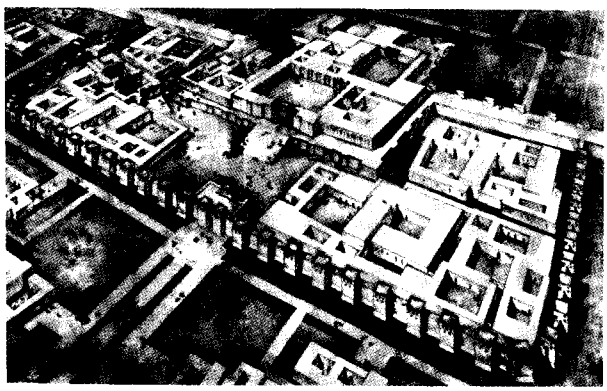
The Levant was very poor architecturally in the early second millennium B.C., and what little there is of quality can be traced to external origins. Original architecture does, however, seem to have developed in northern Syria, the most characteristic being the bît hilani, a temple or palace compound in which there are a portico and a throne room with their long axis parallel to the façade, and behind which are small rooms, probably bedrooms and a storeroom. This pattern developed in the second millennium but became characteristic of the early first millennium B.C. One feature of north Syrian architecture that should be mentioned is the use of a zoomorphic base to support a column, and often a human figure for the column.

The Arch of Titus at Rome. UANT

Among the Israelites, architecture does not seem to have been developed as an art or a skill; rather, Phoenician craftsmen were brought in to build Solomon's palace and temple. Phoenician elements seem to be present also in the building of subsequent Israelite periods; it is difficult to classify these, however, for the Phoenicians seem to have made use of many techniques and styles, some of which can be traced to Cyprus and Egypt. Their use of metalwork in architecture, (e.g., the columns in front of Solomon's temple) was possibly derived from Asia Minor.

The Hittites made use of stone foundations, often using large stones, at first rough but later dressed, and characteristically with the first course set with the long dimension vertically. The upper portions of their buildings were frequently built of sun-dried brick strengthened by wooden beams — a type of architecture which can be found in the same areas in Asia Minor to the present time.

Late Assyrian architecture is perhaps best understood through the excavations of the palace of Sargon II at Khorsabad (720-704 B.C.). Regularity and a notable use of symmetry in the buildings are characteristic. Much of the work was still of clay brick, with the use of glazed bricks (a technique which had been imported by the Mitanni from Crete) to protect the exterior or exposed surfaces, as well as to lend decorative elements.



Reconstruction of the Palace of Sargon II, King of Assyria (721-705 B.C.), at Khorsabad. OIUC

Persian architecture seems to have developed the use of the cyclopean foundation, which may have come from the Urartians in the region of Lake Van. This use of huge stones, sometimes with drafting around the edges, is comparable to the well-known Herodian use of large stones; this is particularly true of Taht-i-Sulayman, north of Pasargadae in Iran, where the foundation stones could easily be mistaken for those at Râmat el-Khalîl near Hebron built by Herod several centuries later. The Persians seem to have brought in the Ionic column from the Greek world and to have developed and used it widely. The base of Persian columns is characteristically Ionic with fluting; the double volute at the capital is likewise Ionic; the columns, however, are more slender and graceful. Some idea of the gracefulness of Persian columns may be gained from the fact that the ratio of the height to the diameter, which in Egyptian columns is rarely more than six to one and which attained a maximum of ten to one in the Corinthian order, is twelve to one in the Hall of Xerxes at Persepolis. Likewise the distance between the columns, which in Egypt is rarely much more than one diameter, and in Greek architecture from one to slightly less than three diameters, in Persian buildings is between three and a half and six, and even seven, diameters. This gave the halls a sense of spaciousness not found in other large buildings of antiquity. One feature of the capital of the Persian column seems to be unique, namely the use of a stylized bull with a head at either end, the heads serving to support the longitudinal beams, while the hollow of the back supported the transverse beams.

The supreme achievement in architecture is admittedly the Periclean architecture of Greece (460-400 B.C.). This is the Doric order characterized by simplicity and symmetry. There are certain optical refinements, among which may be mentioned the use of entasis (a slight convexity in columns to avoid the impression of hollowness that straight lines would give), similarly a slight convexity of long horizontal lines (to avoid the appearance of sagging), deviation from perpendicular at the corners of the building and from exact intervals of spacing between the columns (to avoid the appearance that the end columns are leaning outward and the central columns are too close together). We can clearly see the developments of the Doric order if we consult first of all the Temple of Apollo at Corinth (about the sixth century B.C.), then the great temple of Poseidon at Paestum in Italy (early fifth century B.C.), which is in the transition stage, and finally the Parthenon at Athens (middle fifth century B.C.). The Ionic order achieved its classical form during this same period, having originated along the Asiatic coast of the Aegean Sea. The Corinthian order developed toward the end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth century B.C., and reached its zenith in the Greco-Roman period a few centuries later.

Roman architecture owed much to the Greeks but adopted some elements from the Etruscans; among the latter is principally the arch. In general we may say that Roman is not as subtle as Greek architecture but at the same time it is more utilitarian. The Greeks had developed the skill of masonry to a high degree of perfection and fit marble blocks together with remarkable accuracy without mortar or cement. The Romans, on the other hand, developed the use of pozzolana, a volcanic earth which was mixed with lime to make a hydraulic cement. Using this as mortar, they were able to bond courses of stone without exact precision in masonry, increase the span in arches, and build two-story structures. Roman architecture even more so than Greek included memorial arches and columns, amphitheaters, theaters, the forum (or market place), and many other forms familiar to us from the numerous remains of the Roman world to be found all over the Middle East.

ARELI (à-rēʹlī), a son of Gad and founder of the tribal family, the Arelites (Gen. 46:16, Num. 26:17).

AREOPAGITE (ârʹē-ŏpʹà-jīt, -gīt), Dionysius, (Acts 17:34), a member of the court of Areopagus which had jurisdiction of manners, morals and teaching in Athens.

AREOPAGUS (ârʹē-ŏpʹà-gŭs, Gr. Áreios págos), the rocky hill of the god Ares, or Mars. A spur jutting out from the western side of the Acropolis at Athens, separated from it by a short saddle. To the N, directly below, was the Agora or marketplace.

Areopagus is also the name of the council which met on Mars' hill, a court dating back to legendary times, in NT days still charged with questions of morals and the rights of teachers who lectured in public. Its importance was enhanced under the Romans. Paul was brought to the Areopagus (Acts 17:19) to be examined regarding his teaching. KJV says that "Paul stood in the midst of Mars hill," where ASV and RSV have "in the midst (middle) of the Areopagus," referring to the court, not the hill, which is clearly the meaning (Acts 17:22). Before these "solid citizens," the bulwark of civic and religious conservatism, Paul met the mocking taunts of adherents of the two most popular philosophies, Epicureanism and Stoicism, in an address more widely read today than any of the writings of the philosophers, and by which almost alone the Council of Areopagus is remembered. There were numerically scant results of Paul's mission in Athens, and the founding of no church is recorded, but Dionysius the Areopagite, one of the members of this honorable court, "clave unto him, and believed" (Acts 17:34). E.R.

ARETAS (ārʹē-tăs, pleasing or virtuous), a Nabatean king, father-in-law of Herod the tetrarch, whose deputy sought to apprehend Paul at Damascus (II Cor. 11:32, see Acts 9:24).

ARGOB (ârʹgŏb, Heb. 'argōv, heap, or region of clods). 1. A well-defined region of Bashan, identified with the kingdom of Og in Deuteronomy 3:4, 13, 14, and I Kings 4:13. This land of 60 strong, fortified cities was taken by the Israelites under Moses (Deut. 3:4), and was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3:13), because Jair of this tribe conquered the region. He gave it his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair (Deut. 3:14). In Solomon's reign, one of his princes, the son of Geber, held Argob, which still had 60 "great cities with walls and brasen bars" (I Kings 4:13).

2. II Kings 15:25 refers to either a place or a person. If a place, it would appear to be where one of the king's houses was located. If a person, he may have been either a follower of Pekahiah, killed with him; or a follower of Pekah who took part in the murder of Pekahiah. The Heb. text is uncertain. RSV omits mention of Argob altogether.

ARIDAI (à-rīdʹā-ī, à-rīdʹī), one of Haman's ten sons, killed by the Jews (Esth. 9:9).

ARIDATHA (à-rīdʹà-thà, ăr-ī-dāʹthà), a son of Haman, killed by the Jews (Esth. 9:8).

ARIEH (à-rīʹĕ, ārʹī-ĕ), named with Argob in II Kings 15:25 KJV, ASV, either as places or as persons. Omitted in RSV. The Heb. text is uncertain.

ARIEL (ârʹī-ĕl, Heb. 'arî'ēl, lion of God). 1. One of an embassy sent by Ezra to bring "ministers for the house of our God" to the returning exiles from Babylonia (Ezra 8:16,17).

2. In II Samuel 23:20 and I Chronicles 11:22, where KJV has "two lionlike men of Moab," ASV conjectures "two sons of Ariel of Moab," and RSV

"two ariels of Moab," explaining in the margin, "the meaning of the word ariel is unknown." But in view of the context, the KJV translation is still acceptable.

3. A poetic name, "lioness of God," given to Jerusalem (Isa. 29:1, 2, 7).

ARIMATHEA (ăr'ĭ-mə-thē'ə), the city of the Joseph who buried the body of Jesus in his own new tomb near Jerusalem (Matt. 27:57, Mark 15:43, Luke 23:51, John 19:38). The location of Arimathea is in doubt, but is conjectured to be Ramathaim-zophim, the Ramah of Samuel's residence, in the hill-country of Ephraim, about 20 miles NW of Jerusalem and six miles SE of Antipatris.

ARIOCH (ăr'ĭ-ŏk). 1. The king of Ellasar in Syria and confederate with Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:1, 4, 9).

2. Captain of the king's guard at Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2:14-25).

ARISAI (ə-rīs'ā-ī, ăr'ĭ-sī), a son of Haman who was killed by the Jews (Esth. 9:9).

ARISTARCHUS (ăr'ĭs-tär'kŭs, the best ruler), a Macedonian of Thessalonica, one of Paul's travel-companions. This convert from Judaism is spoken of as Paul's "fellow-prisoner," implying imprisonment for the Gospel's sake (Acts 19:29, 20:4, 27:2, Col. 4:10, Philem. 24).

ARISTOBULUS (ə-rĭs'tō-bū'lŭs, the best counselor), a Christian in Rome, whose household Paul greeted. There is a tradition that he was one of the 70 disciples, and that he preached in Britain (Rom. 16:10).

ARK (ärk) of Noah; Heb. tēvâh, meaning 1. a chest; 2. a vessel to float; in the Bible, always the second meaning. It is used of the vessel which God directed Noah to build (Gen. 6:14-16). God told Noah what to bring into it (Gen. 6:18-21), and Noah obeyed (Gen. 6:22-7:10). The ark floated during the Flood (Gen. 7:11-8:3), then came to rest "upon the mountains of Ararat" (Gen. 8:4). After Noah abandoned the ark (Gen. 8:18, 19), what happened to it is unknown. There are traditions, and there have been expeditions, with claims of finding remains, but nothing conclusive. We do not even know on which peak of the mountains in the land of Ararat the ark grounded.

The ark of Noah is referred to in Matthew 24:38, Luke 17:27 in a warning of coming judgment; in Hebrews 11:7 as an example of faith; and in I Peter 3:20 "the days of Noah, while the ark was in preparation," are held up as an example of "the long-suffering of God," followed by disaster for the "disobedient," salvation for the few who entered the ark. The same Hebrew word is used of the basket of bulrushes in which Moses was cast out to float upon the Nile (Exod. 2:2-5).

ARK, of the covenant or of the testimony; Heb. 'ărôn ha-berîth, chest of the covenant. The word 'ărôn is used of the coffin (mummy-case) of Joseph (Gen. 50:26); elsewhere of the chest containing the tables of the law, resting in the tabernacle or in the temple. God directed Moses (Exod. 25:10-22, Deut. 10:2-5) to make it of shittim (acacia) wood, of precise dimensions, and to overlay it with pure gold within and without, with a crown of gold about it. There were to be rings of gold at the corners, and staves covered with gold to put through the rings to carry the ark. Within was to be placed "the testimony which I shall give thee." A mercy seat of gold, with two winged cherubim of gold, was to be placed on top of the ark. There God promised to meet and talk with Moses. The ark was made after the golden calf was destroyed (Deut. 10:1, "At that time"), and was set up in the tabernacle (Exod. 40:20).

The ark went before Israel in the wilderness journeys "to search out a resting-place for them" (Num. 10:33). The ark was instrumental in the crossing of Jordan on dry land under Joshua (Josh. 3), and in the capture of Jericho (Josh. 4:7-11). Joshua prayed before the ark after the defeat at Ai (Josh. 7:6) and after the subsequent victory, at Mt. Ebal, the ark being present (Josh. 8:33). In the days of Eli the ark was in the tabernacle at Shiloh (I Sam. 3:3). It was taken into battle against the Philistines, and captured by them. "The glory is departed from Israel, for the ark of God is taken" (I Sam. 4:3-22). It was held by the Philistines until a plague convinced them that the ark was too dangerous to keep, and it was ceremoniously sent back (I Sam. 5:1-6:15) to Beth-shemesh. The men of this place also suffered a plague for looking into the ark, and it was removed to Kirjath-jearim (I Sam. 6:19-21). Here it was treated with due respect, being kept in the house of Abinadab under the care of his son Eleazar (I Sam. 7:1, 2).

David brought the ark to Jerusalem, after some misadventures (II Sam. 6, I Chron. 13 and 15). When Uriah said to David, "The ark, and Israel, and Judah, abide in tents" (II Sam. 11:11), he may have meant that the ark had been taken away by the army into the field, or merely that the ark was in a tent (the tabernacle) just as the armies of Israel and Judah were in tents. At the time of Absalom's rebellion, Zadok and the Levites carried the ark out of Jerusalem, but David had them take it back (II Sam. 15:24-29). The priests brought the ark into Solomon's temple (I Kings 8:3-9). There was nothing in it at this time "save the two tables of stone, which Moses put there at Horeb."

Before the ark was made, Moses directed that a pot of manna be laid up before the Lord (Exod. 16:32-34) and Hebrews 9:4 says that "the golden pot that had manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant" were in the ark (at some time;,not necessarily throughout its existence). Jeremiah, writing after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, prophesies that in time to come the ark will no longer be of significance for worship (Jer. 3:16). Psalm 132:8 speaks of the ark poetically as representing the strength of the Lord, whether the ark was in existence at the time this psalm was written or not. Hebrews 9 uses the tabernacle and all its furnishings, including the ark, in explaining by analogy salvation by the high-priesthood of Christ. After the destruction of the first temple, there is no evidence as to what happened to the ark, but only highly speculative tradition and conjecture. Synagogues, from our earliest knowledge of them to the present, have had arks in the side wall toward Jerusalem; therein the scrolls of the Law are stored behind a curtain. E.R.

ARKITES (ȧr'kīts, Heb. 'areqî), people of Arka, a Phoenician town a few miles NE of Tripoli, and near but not on the sea. The Arkites are named among descendants of Canaan (Gen. 10:17, I Chron. 1:15).

ARM, used as a figure for might, of God (Isa. 53:1). "Break the arm," i.e., the power (Ezek. 30:25). "Stretched out arm," image from a warrior with spear or sword thrust forth (see Josh. 8:26).

ARMAGEDDON (ȧr-mȧ-gĕd'ŏn, Gr. Armageddón, from Heb.; Mount Megiddo; ASV, Har-Magedon), a word found only in Revelation 16:16, for the final battleground between the forces of good and evil. The Valley of Jezreel and the Plain of Esdraelon at the foot of Mount Megiddo were the scene of many decisive battles in the history of Israel: the victory sung by Deborah and Barak (Judg. 5:19, 20); Gideon's defeat of Midian (Judg. 6: 33); Saul's death at the hands of the Philistines (I Sam. 31, see II Sam. 4:4); where Josiah was slain in battle with Pharaoh-nechoh (II Kings 23: 29, 30); Ahaziah fled and was killed there (II Kings 9:27). The town of Megiddo guarded the pass which formed the easiest caravan route between the Plain of Sharon and the Valley of Jezreel, and the low mountains around were silent witnesses of perhaps more bloody encounters than any other spot on earth, continuing down to recent times. Hence the appropriateness of this place for the vast conflict pictured in Revelation 16.

ARMENIA (ȧr-mē'nĭ-ȧ), occurs only in KJV of II Kings 19:37 and Isaiah 37:38, where it is said that the two sons of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, "escaped into the land of Armenia" after murdering their father. ASV and RSV, and KJV elsewhere (e.g. Gen. 8:4, Jer. 51:27) have Ararat, following the Heb. and LXX. The same mountainous country, north of Assyria, is meant by both names.

ARMLET, BRACELET (ȧrm'lĕt; -lĭt; brās'lĕt; -lĭt), an ornament usually for the upper arm, worn by both men and women. "Armlet" appears in ASV, RSV of Exodus 35:22, Numbers 31:50, in RSV of II Samuel 1:10, Isaiah 3:20. KJV usually has "bracelet" here, and in other places (e.g., Gen. 24: 22, 38:25, Ezek. 16:11, 23:42). The Heb. original uses several different words, the precise meaning of none of which is certain. Archaeological finds illustrate possible objects to be designated armlets.

ARMONI (ȧr-mō'nī, belonging to the palace), a son of Saul by his concubine Rizpah. He was slain by the Gibeonites to satisfy justice (II Sam. 21:8-11).

ARMOR-BEARER, bearer of weapons. Abimelech (Judg. 9:54), Saul (I Sam. 31:4), Jonathan (I Sam. 14:12) and Joab (II Sam. 23:37) had one. Cf. Goliath (I Sam. 17:7,41).

ARMORY. Three Hebrew words: ('ôtsār, Jer. 50: 25) figurative for the "Lord's means of judgment"; rendered also "treasure," "treasury," "store-house"; (nesheq, Neh. 3:19) "store-house for valuables and arms"; (talpîyôth, S. of Sol. 4:4) used figuratively for "beauty."

ARMS, ARMOR (ȧrms, ȧr'mẽr), mentioned often in the Bible, both literally and as illustrative of spiritual conflicts. Here only hand weapons and body armor are considered, not chariots or machines used in sieges.

A. Offensive weapons. 1. Sword is the first mentioned in the Bible; "a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. 3:24). Heb. hereb, a weapon for smiting, is the common sword (Gen. 27:40; Exod. 17:13); a sword for punishment is ascribed to God (Exod. 5:3, 22:24). Figurative and literal are united in "the sword of the Lord and of Gideon" (Judg. 7:20). Gideon's men were executing the judgment of God. In NT Greek the commoner word is máchaira, short sword, dagger, or saber (Matt. 26:47-53, Rom. 8:35, 13:4); figuratively "the sword of the Spirit" (Eph. 6:17). Once, in Luke 2:35, and six times in the Book of Revelation (1: 16, etc.), rhomphaía, a large, broad sword, occurs, with symbolic meaning. 2. Rod, a stick loaded at one end, which could be for reassurance (Ps. 23:4); used to count sheep (Lev. 27:32), or a weapon (Ps. 2:9). 3. Sling, a band of leather, wide in the middle to receive a stone. With the ends held together, it was swung around the head, then one end was released that the stone might fly to its mark (I Sam. 17:40, 49, Judg. 20:16, II Kings 3:25). 4. Bow, sometimes of steel (II Sam. 22:35, Job 20:24, Ps. 18:34) and arrows. First mentioned (Gen. 27:3) as used in hunting, except the "bow in the cloud" (Gen. 9:13-16, rainbow). The practice of archery is described in I Samuel 20:20-22, 35-40. The bow is mentioned but once in the NT (Rev. 6:2). 5. Spear, lance, javelin or dart, sharp-pointed instruments to be thrust or thrown (Josh. 8:18, Judg. 5:8, I Sam. 17:7, 18:11, Ps. 68:30, different Heb. words). Spearmen are mentioned in Acts 23:23, and a Roman lance pierced the body of Jesus on the cross (John 19:34). Flame-tipped darts were used (Eph. 6:16).

Israelites in armor. Left, heavily armed, with shield, spear and helmet; right, lightly armed with sling, bow and quiver. DV

B. Defensive armor. 1. Shields were either large, Heb. tsinnâh, (I Sam. 17:7, 41), and sometimes for display (II Chron. 9:16), called thyreós, "like a door" in Greek (Eph. 6:16); or small, round, Heb. māghēn (Gen 15:1, Judg. 5:8). 2. Helmet, (I Sam. 17:5, Isa. 59:17), sometimes of brass (I Sam. 17:38), surrounding the head (Eph. 6:17, I Thess. 5:8. 3. Coat of mail, only in I Samuel 17:5, 38, called "breastplate" in Isaiah 59:17. In the NT, Greek thórax (Eph. 6:14, I Thess. 5:8, figuratively; Rev. 9:9, 17, symbolic). 4. Greaves, for the legs, only in I Samuel 17:6. 5. Girdle, or belt from which the sword hung (II Sam. 20:8). Ephesians 6:14 implies it as part of a heavy-armed soldier's equipment, the description of which in Ephesians 6:11-18 is evidently drawn from Paul's intimate contact, as a prisoner, with Roman guards. "The whole armor," Greek panoplía, is a technical term for such armament. Note also the detailed description of the armor of Goliath (I Sam. 17:4-7).

E.R.

ARMY, a collection of men armed and organized for warfare. Of the several words used for army, gedhûdh is used 32 times and generally means a band of light troops foraging (I Sam. 30:8, II Sam. 22:30, etc.), though in the time of Amaziah (ninth century B.C.) it was used (II Chron. 25) of his great army of 300,000 chosen men of Judah and Benjamin with, at first, 100,000 mercenaries from the northern kingdom. These were drafted and put under colonels and captains ("captains of thousands and captains of hundreds"). The armies of Israel, when directed of God and led by Him, were uniformly successful (Josh. 1:3, 5:14), but when like Amaziah (II Chron. 25:14) and, earlier, Saul (I Sam. 15) the king refused to listen to God, defeat and death followed. Hayil, used 231 times and translated "army" 54 times, implies might, valor or wealth (Exod. 14:9: "all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen and his army"). "Army" here implies infantry, which in most times has been the backbone of the army. For some reason, God did not want Israel to use or to depend upon cavalry. (Deut. 17:16, 20:1, Isa. 13:1) mahăneh, used over 200 times, generally means "encampment," but is rendered "army" three times, referring to the Philistine forces, and hinting at their methodical warfare.

The word ma'ărākhâh, used 20 times is generally rendered "army" and implies ordered arrangement or battle array (I Sam. 17:21). The word tsāvā' properly means "host," e.g., "Lord God of Sabaoth" (Isa. 22:15, etc.) means "Lord God of hosts." It is used nearly 500 times and is rendered "army" 29 times. The word emphasizes the vast number of the soldiers. When used of God's army, the "soldiers" may be people (Ex. 7:4), angels (Ps. 103:21) and by implication locusts (Joel 2). The corresponding Greek word stratia is used of angels (Luke 2:13) and of stars and planets (Acts 7:42).

God's arrangement for His people and His army in the wilderness journey made for perfect order. They encamped with the tabernacle at the center (Num. 2), the three families of the Levites and the priests closely surrounding it, then the other 12 tribes at a slightly greater distance. Three tribes were grouped on each side of the tabernacle under the banners of the leading tribes: Judah eastward, with Issachar and Zebulun; Reuben southward, with Simeon and Gad; Ephraim, westward, with Manasseh and Benjamin; and Dan to the north, with Asher and Naphtali. When they marched, the Levites, carrying the tabernacle, occupied the center of the line, and the high command was there.

In the days of the judges, God raised up from time to time men of special ability to save Israel when she had suffered for her apostasies and had been brought to repentance. These judges saved Israel from her foreign oppressors, and they varied greatly in character, from the godly Deborah (Judg. 4,5) to the rather erratic champion, Samson (Judg. 14-16). Israel's armies down to Solomon's time were composed mostly of footmen, armed with swords, spears, bows and arrows and slings, and protected by small shields, with a judge, general or king at the head.

Numbers 1 contains a military census of Israel at Sinai just after the exodus, and Numbers 26 a second census taken 40 years later in the plains of Moab. According to the plain sense of the English versions, the number of military men was immense: over 603,000 at the exodus and nearly as many at the Jordan, and these figures imply a total population of something like three million men, women, and children, accompanied by herds and flocks. It is hard to picture them drinking at a common spring, even a large one. The Hebrew word eleph means either a thousand or a family, and by reading "families" in the censuses, some would make the numbers more comprehensible. E.g., Numbers 1:21 could read "forty-six families, five hundred men." This would not only make the story more easy to understand, but it would explain the very remarkable numerical phenomenon in censuses. In all the twenty-four numbers recorded, in the hundreds' digits we have not a single "zero," "one," "eight" or "nine" and only one "two" in the whole list. The trouble with this theory, however, lies in the totals: if eleph here means family, the total in Numbers 1:46 would become 598 families, 5,500 men instead of 603,550 men, for we could not "carry over" the hundreds' digit.

Israel, on condition of obedience (Deut. 28:1-7) could have become the paramount power of the earth, but when she had gone into hopeless apostasy, God began to raise up great universal world powers (Dan. 2) and to overturn (Ezek. 21:27) Israel, preparing for the coming of our Lord. The Babylonians with their hordes were overthrown by the Persians, originally a hardy race whose armies were mostly cavalry; but when Xerxes, the "Ahasuerus" of Esther 1, attempted to invade Europe, he was defeated. Esther 1 tells of his great "feast" of six months, which was really a military council preparing for his invasion of Greece in 480 B.C. The eastern army was defeated by the Greeks with their phalanxes of heavy armed infantry, arranged closely in ranks and files. The Greek armies, in turn, were conquered by the Romans. The Romans had a genius for government and for military organization, and the various NT references mention their "chief captains" (Acts 21:31), whom we would call colonels, their centurions (Acts 10:1), etc., implying their organization into legions and armies. Our Lord (Matt. 26:53) hints at a possible angelic army divided like the Roman into legions. The smallest group of soldiers mentioned in the Bible is the quaternion (Acts 12:4), composed of only four soldiers. A.B.F.

ARNAN (ȧr'năn), head of a noble Jewish family about 500 B.C. (I Chron. 3:21).

ARNON (ȧr'nŏn), the swift "roaring stream" and the valley of the same name which empty into the E side of the Dead Sea a little N of its center. It arises in the hills of northern Arabia and flows a little W of N and then turns westward to descend precipitately into the Sea, emptying at about the lowest point on the earth's surface. It is now a "wadi," implying that it is dry through most of the year. It is first mentioned (Num. 21:13) as the boundary between the Moabites and the Amorites in the time of Moses, and Israel encamped upon its N side so as not to invade Moab. In Judges 11:18-26 Jephthah tells the Ammonites how Israel had held the land N of the Arnon for 300 years previous to his time (c. 1560-1260 B.C.). For all those years, and for a long time after, the Arnon was the southern boundary of the tribe of Reuben. It now flows through the kingdom of Jordan. In the days of Jehu, (ninth century B.C.) Hazael, king of Syria smote Israel E of the Jordan as far as Arnon (II Kings 10:32,33).

AROD (ā'rŏd), a son of Gad (Gen. 46:16), where he is called Arodi, head of the family of Arodites in the time of Moses (Num. 26:17).

AROER (ȧ-rō'êr, Heb. poor, naked, helpless). The same word is rendered "heath" in Jeremiah 17:6, 48:6. 1. A town on a branch of the brook Jabbok, fortified early by the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:34), having been taken from Sihon, king of the Amorites (cf. Josh. 13:25). A camping place of Joab (II Sam. 24:5) when taking a census in the days of David. Isaiah speaks of it (Isa. 17:2) as being deserted in his time.

2. A town about 35 miles south of 1, located on the N bank of the Arnon, and so in the tribe of Reuben and just across from Moab. Moses took this also from Sihon (Deut. 2:36), and gave it to Reuben (Josh. 13:9). Hazael, king of Syria, took it from Israel in the days of Jehu (II Kings 10:33). Jeremiah scoffs at its inhabitants (Jer. 48:19).

3. A town in the southern part of Judah (I Sam. 30:28).

ARPAD (ȧr'păd), a town and its surrounding region in the northern part of Syria near Hamath (modern Hamah), with which it is associated in all six biblical references. Rabshakeh, representing Sennacherib before the Jews of Jerusalem, 701 B.C., boasts that the gods of Arpad could not stand before his master, therefore neither could the God of the Jews. In Jeremiah's time (c. 580 B.C.) Arpad had melted away (Jer. 49:23).

ARPHAXAD (ȧr-făk'săd, Heb. and ASV, Arpachshad), third son of Shem, c. 2479 B.C., the first birth recorded after the Flood. He lived 438 years, and was the ancestor of Hebrews and of many Arab tribes; in fact, of all Semites except Assyrians, Elamites, Lydians and Syrians (Gen. 10:22-11:13). Also possibly a region of Assyria.

ART, the application of human skills to produce a pleasing effect. The word is also used in a broader sense with reference to the good and the useful, but the narrower meaning, referring to the beautiful, is more common. The six major arts are music, the dance, architecture, sculpture, painting, and literature.

It is difficult to date the beginning of art. If some human being found pleasure in the shape of a stone axe or flint sickle, this might be described as the beginning of art. By any definition, the line drawings in the cave of La Madelaine from the Old Stone Age would seem to be art. Architecture (q.v.) might be traced to the first building of a house, although some effort at an aesthetic quality should be added to the utilitarian value in order for the building to qualify as "art." Artistic attempts can be found in the early temples in Mesopotamia from the fourth millennium B.C. and in Egypt only slightly later. Sculpture is found in Mesopotamia and Egypt as early as the beginning of the third millennium. Literature must be placed before the time of writing, for the folk stories and legends had already taken on forms that gave pleasure to the hearers in the preliterary period — again toward the end of the fourth millennium B.C. To judge from wall paintings in Egypt, music and the dance must go back to about the same time. Hence it seems reasonable to date the beginning of art in historical cultures to some time in the fourth millennium B.C. The origin of the arts may be intended in Genesis 4:21-22, where Jubal and Tubal-Cain are mentioned.

The arts can be classified as spatial (architecture, sculpture, painting) and temporal (music, literature), with the dance extending over both categories. Spatial art can be seen as a whole before the parts become meaningful; temporal art on the other hand must be seen or heard in the parts before the whole is comprehended. The temporal forms therefore require a greater use of the memory on the part of the observer, and a certain amount of repetition and interpretation on the part of the artist. Music, and in many cases, literature, might be called aural arts, whereas the others are visual arts.

In each of the arts, categories of matter, form, and content can be distinguished. By matter is meant all the material available to the artist which he can select, arrange, and use for his purpose; by form is meant all the ways in which he can organize the material; and by content, what is actually expressed when he has finished. The artist's innate ability is discernible in his selection of matter and form; it would be ludicrous if an artist were to attempt to present a sunset at sea by sculpturing in marble, or a thunderstorm by a piccolo solo.

It becomes increasingly apparent, as we think on the subject of art, that something of the image of God as Creator is to be found in man as artist. The artist creates. In fact, some authors claim that there is no art in nature and no art without the creativity of the artist.

Each art has limitations imposed upon it in the extent of its message. Music and the dance can convey certain emotional messages, but in spite of the saying that "music is the universal language," it is seriously limited in the intellectual message it can convey. Sculpture and painting can convey messages from the visible world, but are more limited in conveying ideas or emotions. Literature is by far the most communicative of all the arts and can be used to convey conceptual, emotional, and other ideas. In keeping with this fact is the presentation of the revelation of God through the medium of literature.

In Israel, probably because of the commandment against representational art (Exod. 20:4), there were no great contributions to the arts of painting or sculpturing. The major architectural works in Israel seem to have been done by Phoenician craftsmen. References to the dance in the Old Testament are extremely limited, and afford no information on the form or content. The development of music in Israel, on the other hand, is noteworthy, and to judge from the titles, we may assume that many of the Psalms, if not all, were sung to music and accompanied by musical instruments. Literature, however, was the most thoroughly developed art in Israel and reached a level not surpassed in all antiquity. W.S.L.S.

ARTAXERXES (ar-ta zûrk'sēz), a proper name or possibly title, like Pharaoh, Caesar, etc. for several kings of Persia. The name is variously derived by scholars but perhaps "strong king" (Gesenius) is as good as any. Herodotus made it mean "great warrior." The name or title of three Persian kings in the OT. 1. The pseudo-Smerdis of Ezra 4:7-23, a Magian usurper who claimed to be Smerdis, a son of Cyrus who had died. This false Smerdis took the title Artaxerxes and reigned about seven months in 522, 521 B.C. He was opposed to the liberal policies of Cyrus and Cambyses (called Ahasuerus in Ezra 4:6) and so was glad to prohibit the Jews from building the temple.

2. A Persian king (Ezra 7:1-8:1, Neh. 2:1, 5:14, 13:6) nicknamed "Longimanus" or "Long-handed" because of a deformity of his right hand. He granted the requests of Ezra (7:6) in 457 B.C. and of Nehemiah (Neh. 2:1-8) in 444 B.C. to go to Jerusalem and gave them power, supplies, and authority.

3. Possibly another king who must have reigned before 516 B.C. (Ezra 6:14).

ARTEMAS (ar'tē-măs), a companion of Paul at Nicopolis whom Paul expected to send to Crete. Mentioned only in Titus 3:12. In tradition, a bishop of Lystra.

Above, reconstruction of the Temple of Artemis (Diana) at Ephesus. Below, the site as it appears today. UANT © MPS

ARTEMIS (ar'tē-mĭs), the Greek goddess of hunting, corresponding to the Roman Diana. She had many temples, but the greatest was at Ephesus where she was deeply venerated, but her worship there was more like the impure worship of Ashtaroth of Phoenicia (Acts 19:23-41). Her temple at Ephesus was counted as one of the wonders of the world.

ARTIFICER (See Occupations)

ARTILLERY (ar-til'ĕr-ē), a word which in the KJV is used only in I Samuel 20:40, where it refers to Jonathan's bow and arrows. The RV has "weapons."

ARUBOTH (a-rŭb'ŏth), a region of the Shephelah in Judah assigned to Ben-hesed to provide food for Solomon's court (I Kings 4:10).

ARUMAH (a-rōō'ma), a place near Shechem in Ephraim where Abimelech dwelt (Judg. 9:41). Variously placed NE or S of modern Nablus.

ARVAD (ar'văd), a small island, containing a city of the same name, off the coast of Syria about 40 miles north of Tripoli. Its people are mentioned with Sidonians as rowers of Tyre (Ezek. 27:8,11). They were descendants of Ham through Canaan (Gen. 10:18). The name seems to mean "a place of fugitives," and it is said to have been first built by fugitives from Sidon. Later called "Ruad" from the same root. There are remains of the sea-walls with immense stones 12 feet long and 10 feet high, indented with deep grooves, perhaps for tying up boats.

ASA (ā'sà, Heb. 'āsā', healer). 1. Third king of Judah, reigning from 964-923 B.C. (I Kings 15:9-24, II Chron. 14-16). He was the first of the five kings of Judah (Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Hezekiah, Josiah) who were outstanding for godliness, and he deserves special credit considering his idolatrous ancestors. He was the son of Abijam and grandson of Rehoboam. The grandmother of Asa was Maacah, a daughter of Absalom, a confirmed idolatress who greatly influenced Judah toward idolatry. She is spoken of as "mother" of both her son (I Kings 15:2) and her grandson (15:10). Asa began his reign by deposing his wicked and powerful grandmother and by destroying a fearful, impure image that she had set up. He then drove out the Sodomites, and destroyed idols that his fathers had worshiped (15:12), commanding Judah to seek the Lord God of their fathers (II Chron. 14:4).

In the early peaceful days of his reign, he gathered into the house of the Lord the dedicated things which his father and he had vowed to the Lord (I Kings 15:15). Then c. 953 B.C. Zerah the Ethiopian (probably Osorkon II of Egypt's dynasty XXII) came against him with an immense force which the Lord helped Judah defeat at Mareshah in the west-central part of Judah, because Asa trusted the Lord (II Chron. 14:9-15). In II Chronicles 15:1-13 we see how the Lord approved and encouraged Asa in his faith and in his work of reformation. Later, in 948 B.C., (the 36th year of the kingdom, not the reign) of Asa, Baasha of the northern kingdom made war against Judah; and this time, Judah did not put her whole trust in the Lord, but Asa bribed Ben-hadad of Syria to break his league with Baasha so as to draw off the forces of Israel. This Ben-hadad did, but the Lord, through his prophet Hanani rebuked Asa for trusting in politics rather than in God (I Kings 15:16-22, II Chron. 16:1-10). In the 39th year of his reign Asa was taken with a severe disease of the feet, and because he trusted his physicians rather than the Lord, he died (II Chron. 16:11-14).

2. A Levite among those who had returned from captivity (I Chron. 9:16).

ASADIAH (ăs-să-dī'à), the son of Chelcias and father of Sedecias, in the ancestry of Baruch, according to the apocryphal book that bears his name (Baruch 1:1).

ASAHEL (ăs'à-hĕl, whom God made). 1. Youngest son of Zeruiah, David's sister; and brother of Joab and Abishai. These three were among the mighty men of David; and Asahel was over 24,000 men (I Chron. 27:7). Very fleet of foot, he pursued Abner, Saul's former general (II Sam. 2:18-23), who slew him.

2. A teaching Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:8).

3. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign, who oversaw the offerings (II Chron. 31:13).

4. Father of a certain Jonathan (Ezra 10:15).

ASAHIAH (ăs'à-hī'à, whom Jehovah made, ASV Asaiah), one of Josiah's officers whom he sent to inquire of the Lord concerning the words of the law which Shaphan had read to the king (II Kings 22:12-14).

ASAIAH (à-sā'yà, whom Jehovah made). 1. A Simeonite, c. 800 B.C. (I Chron. 4:36).

2. A Levite of the family of Merari in the time of David (I Chron. 6:30).

3. A Shilonite, one of the first after the captivity to dwell in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:5).

4. One of the chief Levites of the family of Merari in David's day (I Chron. 15:6,11). This may be the same as 2 above. He seems to have been the leader of about 220 Levites who assisted in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem.

ASAPH (ā'săf), a Levite of the Gershonite family, appointed over the service of praise in the time of David and Solomon (I Chron. 16:5, II Chron. 5:12). He led the singing and sounded cymbals before the ark, and apparently set up a school of music (Neh. 7:44). There are 12 psalms credited to Asaph (50, 73-83); and it seems as though there must have been two Asaphs, centuries apart, who wrote psalms. Psalms 50, 73, 76, 78 certainly, and perhaps 75, 77, 82, could have been written in David's time; but 74, 79, and perhaps 83 belong to the Captivity. On the other hand, all these seem to have been written by a man, or men, of deep, spiritual contemplative nature, easily distinguished from David and the other psalmists.

2. Father of Hezekiah's recorder (II Kings 18:18).

3. An official under Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh. 2:8).

4. In I Chronicles 26:1 read Ebiasaph (cf. ch. 9:19).

ASAREEL (à-sā'rē-ĕl, ASV Asarel), a descendant of Judah and a son of Jehallelel (I Chron. 4:16).

ASARELAH (ăs'à-rē'là, ASV Asharelah), a Levite singer of the sons of Asaph in David's time (I Chron. 25:2). Called Jesharelah in v. 14.

ASCENSION OF CHRIST (See Acts 1:6-11, Mark 16:19, Luke 24:50-52). The ascension of our Lord Jesus Christ necessarily came between His earthly and His heavenly ministry. He came to die for our sins, and to rise for our justification (Rom. 4:25), then He entered heaven to sit at the right hand of the Father (Acts 2:32-35) and to act as our Mediator (I Tim. 2:5) when we come to the Father in prayer, and as our Advocate (I John 2:1) when we fail to come. It occurred publicly and visibly, partly to convince His disciples of the reality of the event, and partly to build a strong hope for His equally visible return (Acts 1:11). His ascension was predicted in the OT (Ps. 68:18, cf. Eph. 4:8) and by our Lord Himself (John 20:17), and has been accepted as a central doctrine by all Christians since Pentecost. It is included in the Apostles' Creed: "He ascended into heaven and sitteth at the right hand of God." His going was a necessary preliminary to the Holy Spirit's coming (John 16:7).

ASENATH (ăs'ĕn-ăth), a daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On, the modern Heliopolis, near Cairo, Egypt. Pharaoh gave her to Joseph as wife (Gen. 41:45-50), and she bore to him Manasseh ("causing to forget") and Ephraim ("doubly fruitful") before the famine began.

ASER (ā'sêr), the Greek form of Asher (q.v.).

ASHAN (ā'shăn), a town in the tribe of Judah, later given to Simeon because Judah's territory was too large; then made a city of refuge and given to the priests (Josh. 15:42, 19:7, I Chron. 4:32, 6:59). This was one of about a dozen towns mentioned in the lists of Judah and Simeon, as the boundary was indistinct and the territories overlapped.

ASHBEA (ăsh'bē-à), head of a family in Judah which worked in fine linen (I Chron. 4:21). He was a descendant of Shelah.

ASHBEL (ăsh'bĕl), the second son of Benjamin, son of Jacob. (I Chron. 8:1). The Ashbelites (Num. 26:38) descended from him.

ASHCHENAZ (See Ashkenaz)

ASHDOD (ăsh'dŏd, stronghold, fortress), one of the five chief cities of the Philistines: Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath and Ekron (Josh. 13:3). They were assigned to Judah, but Judah failed to dispossess the inhabitants "because they had chariots of iron" (Judg. 1:19). Ashdod was a center of Dagon (fish-god) worship, but when the Philistines thought to honor the ark of the Lord by placing it in the house of Dagon (I Sam. 5:1-7), God cast down and destroyed their idol. The Philistines found by careful testing that their plagues (see I Sam. 5,6) were from God and so they sent back the ark, with a trespass-offering. Uzziah, king of Judah early in the eighth century B.C., conquered the city (II Chron. 26:6). Amos predicted Ashdod's destruction (1:8). C. 700 B.C. Sargon II of Assyria took it (Isa. 20:1). In Jeremiah's prophecy (25:15-29) Ashdod was to drink with the nations "the cup of wrath" from the hand of the Lord. Zephaniah prophesied the destruction of the Philistines (Zeph. 2:4), and Zechariah said that "a bastard" (probably a foreign race) would dwell there (Zech 9:6). In Nehemiah's time (c. 444 B.C.) the men of Ashdod combined with others to hinder the Jews (Neh. 4:7-9), and, failing, they tried intermarrying with them (Neh. 13:23,24) so as to produce a mongrel race, but Nehemiah foiled them. In the LXX and in NT Ashdod is "Azotus." Philip, the evangelist, found himself there after the Holy Spirit had taken him away from the Ethiopian eunuch.

ASHDODITES (See Ashdod)

ASHDOTH PISGAH (ăsh'dŏth-pĭz'gà), the slopes or the springs of Pisgah, a mountain range just E of the northern end of the Dead Sea, belonging to the high, rugged mountains of Abarim which reach from the Arnon to the Jabbok. E of Jordan (Deut. 3:17, 4:49, Josh. 12:3, 13:20).

ASHER, or ASER (ăsh'ĕr, ā'sĕr, happy, Aser in KJV of NT). 1. The second son of Zilpah, the hand-maid whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter and whom she gave to Jacob; and named "Happy" by Leah in her happiness at his birth. Born at Padan-Aram (in the plain of Mesopotamia) during Jacob's service with Laban (Gen. 30:13). We know little of his personal history, except the names of his five children (Gen. 46:17).

2. The tribe descended from Asher (Josh. 19: 24-31) was given the territory along the Mediterranean in the NW corner of Palestine, but failed to drive out the inhabitants of Sidon, Accho (modern Acre) and other Canaanite towns, and settled down to dwell among them. By David's time Asher seems to have become insignificant, for this tribe is omitted in the list of David's chief rulers (I Chron. 27:16-22). In NT and LXX "Aser" (q.v.).

ASHERAH (à-shē'rà), wrongly translated "grove" in KJV, 1. A goddess of the Phoenicians and Syrians, taken over by Israelites when they fell into idolatry.

2. The images supposed to represent this goddess. Her worship was lewd and associated with that of Baal (Ex. 34:13, I Kings 16:29-33).

ASHES. The expression "dust and ashes" (Gen. 18:27, etc.), is a play on words ("aphar" and "epher") and signifies man's origin, as to his body, from the ordinary chemical elements. It contrasts the lowliness of man with the dignity of God. Ashes were sprinkled over a person, or a person sat among ashes, as a sign of mourning (II Sam. 13:19, Job 2:8); and so the word is often united with "sackcloth" to express mourning (Jer. 6:26).

The lovely expression "beauty for ashes" (Isa. 61:3) is also a play on words. Another word for ashes, deshen, is used for the remains of the burnt offering (Lev. 6:10,11, etc.).

ASHIMA (à-shī'mà), a god of the Hamathites, whose worship was brought to Samaria at its repopulation by the king of Assyria c. 715 B.C. (II Kings 17:30).

ASHKELON, ASKELON, ASCALON (ăsh'kĕ-lŏn, ăs'kĕ-lŏn), one of the five chief cities of the Philistines, located on the sea-coast about 12 miles N,NE of Gaza. It was taken by the tribe of Judah shortly after the death of Joshua (Judg. 1:18), but was retaken by the Philistines and was in their hands through much of the OT period. In the eighth century B.C. it was denounced by Amos for its complicity with Phoenicia and Edom in their warfare upon Israel (Amos 1:6-8). Zephaniah, writing in the dark days before the captivity of Judah (Zeph. 2:4,7) and looking far into the future, saw the restoration of Judah, and the Jews occupying the desolate ruins of Ashkelon; and Zechariah, writing about 518 B.C., prophesied, first, that Ashkelon would see the destruction of Tyre, and, second, that Ashkelon itself would be destroyed (Zech. 9:5). Apparently it was rebuilt, for Herod the Great was born there, and Roman ruins have been found. During the crusades, it came to life again and Richard Coeur-de-Lion held court there. Later the town reverted to the Saracens.

ASHKENAS (See Ashkenaz)

ASHKENAZ (ăsh'kĕ-năz). 1. Great grandson of Noah through Japheth and Gomer (Gen. 10:3, cf. I. Chron. 1:6).

2. A tribe or nation mentioned once (Jer. 51:27) and associated with Ararat and Minni as an instrument of wrath in the hands of God against Babylon.

ASHNAH (ăsh'nà), the name of two villages of Judah: 1. in the lowland W of Jerusalem and near the tribe of Dan (Josh. 15:33), and 2. about 27 miles SW of Jerusalem (Josh. 15:43).

ASHPENAZ (ăsh'pĕ-năz), prince of the eunuchs in the court of Nebuchadnezzar. It was he who gave to Daniel and his companions their new heathen names: Belteshazzar, etc. (Dan. 1:3,7).

ASHTAROTH OR ASTAROTH (ăsh'tà-rŏth), an ancient city in Bashan, where king Og dwelt. Probably so named from its having a temple to the goddess Ashtoreth (q.v.). It is generally mentioned with Edrei (q.v.), and the two were given to Machir of the tribe of Manasseh when Moses divided the territory east of the Jordan before his death (Deut. 1:4, Josh. 9:10, 13:31, etc.). It was given in Joshua's time to the children of Gershon, of the tribe of Levi (Josh. 21:27 — here called "Beeshterah"). Its site is now known as Tell-Ashtarah, in the fertile plain of Hauran, S of Damascus and E of the Sea of Galilee. Uzzia (I Chron. 11:44) one of David's mighty men, came from this town.

ASHTAROTH (ăsh'tà-rŏth), ASTARTE (ăs-tär'tē). Ashtaroth is plural of Ashtoreth, name of any of the fertility goddesses of the ancient Near East; Babylonian Ishtar, Greek Astarte; in Canaan a consort of El (Baal) (Judg. 2:13, I Kings 11:5, 33, II Kings 23:13). The plural Ashtaroth refers to the many local goddesses (Judg. 10:13, I Sam. 7:3,4, 12:10, 31:10); also to the city of Og, king of Bashan, (Deut. 1:4, Josh. 9:10, 12:4, 13:12, 31), which became a Levitical city in Manasseh E of Lake Galilee (I Chron. 6:71), called Ashtaroth-Karnaim in Genesis 14:5. Modern Tell 'Ashtaroth.

ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM (ăsh'tē-rŏth-kär-nā'ĭm), a town or region of the Rephaim in Abram's time smitten by four kings of the East (Gen. 14:5). It is located by some E of the Jordan and identified with the Ashtaroth of Bashan (Deut. 1:4). Exact site unknown.

ASHTORETH (ăsh'tō-rĕth), a goddess of the Canaanites, worshiped all along the seacoast from Ras Shamra (Ugarit) southward through Phoenicia and Philistia. The plural Ashtaroth is found commonly and refers to the idols representing her. Her male consort was apparently Baal, and the two were worshiped with lewd rites. In Judges 2:11-23 we are told that Israel forsook their God, and served Baal and Ashtaroth. The prophet Samuel brought about a great revival, but before Israel could be saved from the Philistines, they had to give up Ashtoreth and turn to Jehovah (I Sam. 7:3,4). Israel kept fairly close to the Lord through the times of Samuel, Saul and David and the early days of Solomon, until that "wise" man lost his wisdom by marrying various heathen women for political reasons. They succeeded in turning his heart from the Lord to the worship of the Ashtaroth and other idols (I Kings 11:4-8). These idols remained more than three and a halt centuries till Josiah defiled and demolished them (II Kings 23:13,14). Gesenius related the name Ashtoreth to the Persian word "sitarah" or "star" and connects it with Venus, the goddess of love.

Ivory carving from Nimrud, of the "woman at the window," possibly the goddess Ashtoreth, or Astarte. BM

ASHUR (ăsh'ĕr), great grandson of Judah through Pharez and Hezron (I Chron. 2:24, 4:5).

ASHURBANIPAL (ă-shōōr-bă'nĕ-păl, Ashur creates a son), king of Assyria. He was grandson of the famous Sennacherib (q.v.) who reigned from 704 to 681 B.C. and son of Esar-Haddon, who reigned from 681-668 B.C. Ashurbanipal, or, as he was known to the Greeks, Sardanapalus, reigned from 668-626 B.C., and therefore was contemporary with Manasseh of Judah in the last half of his reign, Jotham his son, and the godly Josiah during the first twelve years of his reign. Modern scholars have reason to be grateful to Ashurbanipal because he was a lover of learning and collected a great library of cuneiform tablets (over 22,000 in number) which have given to us most of what we know of Babylonian and Assyrian literature.

ASHURITES (ăsh'ûr-īts) a tribe mentioned as a part of the realm of Ishbosheth, son of Saul (II Sam. 2:9). Possibly the same as the Asherites or men of Asher (Judg. 1:32). Possibly the "Asshurim" of Genesis 25:3, mentioned among the Arabian descendants of Abraham through Keturah, are the same. In KJV (Ezek. 27:6) we find the expression "the company of the Ashurites" but in ASV the very different rendering "inlaid in boxwood." The literal reading of the Hebrew is "daughter of Ashurites," but with a slightly different pointing the same letters yield "in boxwood."

ASHURNASIRPAL II (ă-shōōr-năs' ĭr-păl), ruthless and mighty king of Assyria late in the tenth or early in the ninth century B.C. when she was rising by constant warfare to her greatest power. During the reigns of his grandfather Adadnirari II and his father Tukulti-Ninurta, the power of Assyria had been centralized and strengthened and the army had been highly organized and well armed. Assyria was seeking always to expand — her strength lay in constant conquest — and so this ruler subjugated all Mesopotamia, and defeated Babylon, which had challenged his power.

ASHVATH (ăsh'văth), an early descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:33).

ASIA (ā'zhà). 1. The great continent E of Europe and Africa.

2. Asia Minor, otherwise Anatolia, the great western promontory of Asia, partially bounded by the three seas, Black, Aegean and Mediterranean, and the site of much of Paul's missionary work.

3. Proconsular Asia, the Roman province in NT times, which contained the SW part of Asia Minor, and in particular "the seven churches of Asia" addressed in the first three chapters of Revelation. In the NT the word occurs 21 times and always refers to this division, not the first two mentioned above. Its capital was Ephesus, where both Paul and John labored. Most of its cities have disappeared; but Smyrna (Rev. 2:8-11) remains a great city even now; and Philadelphia endured till the Middle Ages.

ASIARCHS (ā'shĭ-ärk, "chief of Asia"), found once in ASV as a transliteration of the Greek title, but is rendered "chief of Asia" (Acts 19:31) in KJV. Civil and priestly officials of the province of Asia chosen yearly to preside over the national games and theatrical displays. These patriotic pageants were financed by the Asiarchs, and so only rich men could afford to enjoy the honor. The meaning of the word in Greek is "rulers of" (or chief of) Asia and is a purely honorary title. It is to the real honor of those mentioned in Ephesus that they showed themselves friends to Paul.

ASIEL (ā'sĭ-ĕl, God is maker), a Simeonite, mentioned only in I Chronicles 4:35, as a prince in his family.

ASNAH (ăs'nà), head of a family of temple servants ("Nethinim") who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel, 536 B.C. (Ezra 2:50).

ASNAPPER (ăs-năp'ĕr), mentioned only in Ezra 4:10 as "the great and noble Asnapper" who had brought over and set in Samaria people of various nations previous to the time of Zerubbabel. His name is not mentioned in the Assyrian annals, but it has been proved, almost to a certainty, that this name is an Aramaean corruption of Ashurbanipal. It was he who colonized Samaria and other regions by wholesale deportations of conquered peoples.

ASP (See Animals)

ASPATHA (ăs-pā'thà), third son of Haman, enemy of the Jews. (Esth. 9:7).

ASRIEL (ăs'rĭ-ĕl). KJV once Ashriel. 1. Grandson of Manasseh and son of Gilead, and head of the family as Asrielites. (Num. 26:31, Josh. 17:2).

2. A son of Manasseh by his Aramaean concubine (I Chron. 7:14).

ASS (See Animals)

ASSIR (ăs'ĕr, captive). 1. A cousin once removed of Moses (Exod. 6:24).

2. Great grandson of the former (I Chron. 6:23).

3. In KJV apparently a son of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:17), but it should read "Jeconiah the captive." Cf. ASV.

ASSOS (ăs'ŏs), modern Behramkoy, seaport of Mysia in Asia Minor, on the N coast of the gulf of Adramyttium, seven miles from the island of Lesbos to the S near Methymna, 20 miles S of Troas (Acts 20:13,14). The ship, with Luke and others, sailed from Troas around Cape Lectum, while Paul walked the shorter way (20 Roman miles) overland to Assos, where he reached the ship in time for her to arrive that evening at Mitylene, a port on the SE coast of Lesbos.

ASSUR, ASSHUR (ăs'ûr, ăsh'ûr, Heb. 'ashshûr), the god of the Assyrians; their reputed human founder; the ancient capital of the country; often the nation Assyria. Asshur is the builder of Nineveh and nearby cities (Gen. 10:11). He comes from the kingdom of Nimrod, a descendant of Ham, but may not be of his race, for in Genesis 10:22 and I Chronicles 1:17 Asshur is a descendant of Shem. ASV, RSV render Genesis 10:11 to read that Nimrod went into Assyria and founded Nineveh. In Balaam's prophecy (Num. 24:22,24) Asshur appears to be Assyria. Assur in Ezra 4:2 is translated Assyria in ASV, RSV. In Psalm 83:8, in a list of enemies of Israel, RSV retains Assur, ASV has Assyria. In Ezekiel 27:23 in a list of nations with whom Israel traded, and 32:22, in a list of nations to be destroyed, ASV retains Asshur, RSV has Assyria. In Hosea 14:3 ASV, RSV translate Assyria. For most occurrences of the Heb. word, KJV has Assyria, which is the probable meaning in every instance.

ASSURANCE (ă-shoor'ăns) and related words render two Heb. words, 'āman, "confirm," "support," also translated by words meaning "to be faithful," "believe," etc.; and bātah, "trust," also translated by words meaning "confidence," etc.; and once qûm, "rise" (Lev. 27:19). Isaiah 32:17 says that in the reign of Messiah (verse 1), "the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance (bâtah) forever." OT teaching clearly is that such assurance, though under other names, is open to those who are righteous before God in any age (Ps. 37:1-7,25, Prov. 3:5,6). In the NT, pístis, "faith," occurs once (Acts 17:31) and peítho, "persuade," once (I John 3:19), for "assurance." Elsewhere the word is plerophoría, "the supreme fulness," "certainty." In I Thessalonians 1:5, "in much assurance" is contrasted with "in word only," but is parallel with "in power, and in the Holy Ghost," which shows that assurance is not a formal acceptance of doctrine, but a vital certainty incorporated into the Christian life. Colossians 2:2 speaks of "full assurance of understanding"; Hebrews 6:11 of "full assurance of hope"; and Hebrews 10:22 of "full assurance of faith." As in the OT, much NT teaching fosters assurance without using the word (John 14-17, I John 5:13,20). Interpretations by theologians of the nature and extent of assurance differ widely from one confessional group to another. The Biblical basis remains for the Christian to explore and appropriate. ASSYRIA (ă-sĭr'ĭ-à, Heb. 'ashshûr), originally a land between the upper Tigris and Zab rivers, with its capital first at Assur, later at Nineveh. Assyria was taken over in the third millennium B.C. by Semites from Arabia. First mentioned in the Bible in Genesis 2:14. Assyria and the Assyrians are frequently named, sometimes as Asshur or Assur. By 1900 B.C. Assyrian traders had a colony in Hittite territory, at Kanish in Asia Minor. In the 13th century B.C., Assyrian military expeditions crossed the Euphrates, and by 1100 B.C. they reached the Mediterranean. Assyria was not strong enough to maintain this advance. By 1000 B.C. the Aramean kingdom of Zobah reached the Euphrates, but David, by conquering Zobah, stopped its invasion of Assyria, and by the irony of history, enabled Assyria to become strong. In the tenth century began a century of powerful and systematic advance. Assyria rounded out its borders N and E, conquered Babylonia, and advanced westward through Aramean territory to the Mediterranean. Under Shalmaneser III, the Assyrians turned toward Palestine, and in 853 were defeated at Karkar, but claimed a victory over Ben-hadad of Damascus and a coalition including Ahab, king of Israel. They failed to follow up their effort.

After the religious revival under Elijah and Elisha, the coalition of Israel with Syria broke up, at the accession of Jehu as king (II Kings 9,10). Shalmaneser III seized the opportunity to claim tribute from Jehu and to weaken Damascus. Internal difficulties kept Assyria from further Palestinian inroads for nearly a century, when, shortly after the middle of the eighth century B.C., Tiglath-pileser III invaded the West, divided the territory into subject provinces, and exchanged populations on a large scale, to make rebellion more difficult. In 733-732 B.C. he conquered Galilee, the plain of Sharon and Gilead from Israel, and made Israel and Judah pay tribute (II Kings 15:29, 16:9). Isaiah prophesied that this attempt to subjugate Judah would eventually fail. Shalmaneser V besieged Samaria for three years. He died during the siege, and his successor Sargon II (now called Sargon III) took the city in 721 B.C. and carried its more prosperous citizens into exile, replacing them with colonists from other provinces of his empire (II Kings 17:6-41).

For nearly a century thereafter, Assyria was troubled from all sides, from Babylon, Elam, the Medes, Phrygia and Egypt. Yet Sennacherib nearly captured Jerusalem in 701-700 B.C. (II Kings 18:13-19:37, Isaiah 36,37), the danger ending only when "the angel of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians" 185,000, followed by the assassination of Sennacherib. Manasseh, king of Judah, paid tribute, except during a short rebellion for which he was carried to Babylon, but released after he sought the Lord (II Chron. 33:11-13). The last quarter of the seventh century B.C. saw the fall and decline of the Assyrian empire and its subjugation by the Chaldean conquerors of Babylonia, with the Medes. Nineveh was taken in 612 B.C. For a short time Babylonia replaced Assyria as the great power. The prophets Elijah, Elisha and Isaiah are largely concerned with Assyria, and several other prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Nahum, Zephaniah and Zechariah refer to it. Jonah was actually sent to prophesy to Nineveh, and the revival he unwillingly promoted saved the city from destruction for a long period of time.

Assyrian art, architecture, and technology were successively influenced by Sumerians, Akkadians and Babylonians, and early attained high levels, exciting the admiration and imitation of Ahaz king of Judah (II Kings 16:10-13). Literature was largely utilitarian: legal, historical, commercial, scientific, pseudo-scientific and religious, but exists in abundance, notably the recently discovered library of Ashurbanipal, consisting of thousands of clay tablets. The Assyrians early added to their worship of the primitive national god Asshur the Babylonian deities with their cultic apparatus. Wherever they influenced Israel and Judah, the effect was demoralizing, as the historical books of the Bible and the prophets bear abundant witness.

ASTARTE (See Ashtaroth, Ashtoreth)

ASTROLOGERS (ăs-trŏl'ō-jĕrz, Heb. 'ashshāph), in Daniel 2:10, 27, 4:7, 5:7, 11, 15, singular; 1:20, 2:22, plural; means "conjurer, necromancer." RSV translates uniformly "enchanter," but has "astrologer" for KJV "soothsayer," Heb. gezar, "divider, determiner of fate" in these passages. In Isaiah 47:13, "the astrologers, the star-gazers" of KJV are "those who divide the heavens, who gaze at the stars" in RSV. "Astrologers" here is Heb. hāvar shāmayîm, "they that divide the heavens, distinguish the signs of zodiac." It is difficult to distinguish the various sorts of practicers of magical arts. Seeking information from the stars was widely practiced from earliest times, but with all other forms of superstition was forbidden to the Chosen People, who were to seek their God directly.

ASTROLOGY (ăs-trŏl'ō-jē), the art practiced by astrologers.

ASTRONOMY. While the word astronomy is not found in the Bible, there are many passages in the Scriptures which refer to some aspect of the subject. God is recognized as the maker of the stars (Gen. 1:16) as well as the one who knows their number and names (Ps. 147:4). In the 19th Psalm there is a beautiful poem telling how the heavenly bodies (referring to the stars) show forth the glory of their Creator. Here there is reference made to the sun as another of the heavenly bodies.

In the Bible there are hundreds of references to stars, sun, moon, and planets. Evidently the early Bible writers were much better acquainted with the subject of astronomy than are many modern people. When God wished to tell Abraham how numerous his descendants would be, he took him out and showed him the stars. Then God said, "Look toward heaven and number the stars, if you are able to number them" (Gen. 15:5). Later on God compared the number of Abraham's descendants not only with the stars, but also with the sand on the seashore (Gen. 22:17). For many years it was not clear that this was a fair comparison. Before the invention of the astronomical telescope it was not at all certain that the number of stars was as great as the number of grains of sand on the seashore. Modern discoveries, however, have proved that the Bible was right. The total number of stars is approximately equal to the number of grains of sand which are on the seashore. This number is so large that it is very difficult to comprehend. The Bible refers in a most striking manner to the height of the stars; that is, to their distance from the earth: "Is not God high in the heavens? See the highest stars, how lofty they are!" (Job 22:12).

The true distances to the stars were not known until 1838 when Bessel first computed the distance to a star. Before that time astronomers had little idea how distant stars were from the earth. Now the distances to many stars have been measured, and it turns out that these distances are more than one hundred thousand times the diameter of our solar system.

Another reference to the great height of the stars is found in Isaiah 14:13. Here Satan says, "I will ascend to heaven above the stars of God." The inference here is that it must be a very great distance to the stars. This is exactly what astronomers have found to be the case, though for many years scientists did not know this fact.

It appears that the biblical writers were aware that the stars differ greatly from each other. Paul, writing to the church at Corinth, says, "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for star differs from star in glory" (I Cor. 15:41). This has been verified by the astronomers. Not only do stars have different colors, but they also differ widely in size, in density, in temperature, and in total amount of light emitted. The sun, about which the earth revolves, is an average star. While it is over one million times as large as the earth, there are some stars which are one million times as large as the sun. On the other hand, there are other stars smaller than the planet Mercury.

One of the many sins of the children of Israel was that of worshiping idols. They wanted to worship also the sun, the moon, and the stars. In Deuteronomy 4:19 they were warned not to indulge in such worship. In spite of such warnings, sun-worship prevailed many times. Asa and Josiah, kings of Judah, found it necessary to take away the sun images which had been kept at the entrance to the temple.

A number of individual stars and constellations are mentioned in the Old Testament. Kesil (Orion) is mentioned in Isaiah 13:10, Amos 5:8, and Job 9:9. Ash or Ayish occurs in Job 9:9; 38:32, and refers to the Great Bear or possibly the Hyades or Pleiades. Also in Job 38:32 is found Mazzarot, which may possibly be the Northern or Southern Crown.

While there is little evidence in the Bible that the Hebrew people had indulged very much in the study of astronomy, yet it is abundantly clear that they recognized a sublime order in the movements of the heavenly bodies. They observed carefully the daily rising of the sun, its majestic movement across the meridian, and its final setting in the west. This is vividly portrayed in the story of the battle with the Amorites as recorded in the tenth chapter of Joshua. Here it is recorded that the sun stood still in the midst of the heaven. This expression undoubtedly refers to the meridian, the great arc connecting the zenith with the north and south points.

Many theories have been proposed in an attempt to give a scientific explanation to this "long day of Joshua." None is completely satisfactory and they will not be discussed here. It is sufficient to add that this is one of many miracles recorded in the Bible given to us to show that God is the ruler and sustainer of the universe.

More remarkable than the long day of Joshua when the sun apparently stood still, is the story of the return of the shadow on the sundial of Ahaz. In this case the Lord gave the King Hezekiah a sign saying, "Behold, I will make the shadow cast by the declining on the dial of Ahaz turn back ten steps" (Isa. 38:8). This is, indeed, a very remarkable miracle. If taken literally, this means not only that the earth stopped rotating on its axis, but that it reversed its direction of rotation for a short time. Again the scientists have no answer to explain such an event.

There are a number of allusions in the Bible to eclipses of the sun and of the moon. In Isaiah 13:10 it is stated that, "the sun will be dark at its rising," while in Joel 2:31 we have the statement, "the sun shall be turned to darkness, and the moon to blood." These two descriptions accord quite well with observations of eclipses of the sun and of the moon. As the shadow of the moon sweeps across the face of the sun it appears that the sun is turned to darkness. When the earth comes directly between the sun and the moon, there is an eclipse of the moon. When the eclipse is complete, it is still possible to see the surface of the moon, due to the fact that the atmosphere of the earth bends the light rays from their straight line path. Thus sunlight is bent somewhat as it passes the earth, is then reflected by the moon and returns again to the earth. Just as the sun appears to be red when it is setting, due to the passage of the light through more atmosphere, so the eclipsed moon appears orange in color. The Bible uses the apt expression, "turned to blood" to describe this astronomical phenomenon.

Calculated eclipses of the sun which occurred during Old Testament times are as follows: July 31, 1063 B.C.; Aug. 15, 831 B.C.; June 15, 763 B.C.; May 18, 603 B.C.; May 28, 585 B.C. Very likely the prophets Amos and Joel witnessed the eclipse of Aug. 15, 831 B.C. Such an eclipse is vividly described by Amos, "I will make the sun go down at noon, and darken the earth in broad daylight" (Amos 8:9).

The subject of astrology has been connected with astronomy since early times. The reference in Judges 5:20 no doubt refers to the influence of the stars in the lives of men. The writer states, "From heaven fought the stars, from their courses they fought against Sisera." However, the Hebrew people seemed to have had little to do with the subject. In the book of Daniel there are repeated statements made concerning the astrologers. It is to be noted that Daniel and his three friends, though closely associated with astrologers, are always mentioned as keeping themselves separate and undefiled. Again and again when the magicians and the astrologers were unable to perform a task, it was Daniel who was able to do important things for the king. Thus it is apparent that the Bible condemns the pseudo-science of astrology.

Probably the most fascinating part of biblical astronomy concerns the star of Bethlehem. This story is told in the second chapter of Matthew. When the wise men from the east came to Jerusalem they asked, "Where is he who has been born king of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the east and have come to worship him" (Matt. 2:2). Even the king was greatly disturbed over the news, for he inquired of them diligently at what time the star appeared. This star seemed to be their ever present guide, for it is stated that "the star which they had seen in the east went before them; till it came to rest over the place where the child was" (Matt. 2:9).

The question before us is this: What kind of a star can continually guide men to a definite point on the earth? Many answers have been proposed. One is that this was an unusual conjunction of bright planets. A conjunction is the coming together on the same meridian at the same time of two or more celestial objects. It is known that in the year 6 B.C. there was a conjunction of Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. However, this conjunction would not have been visible to the wise men for it was too near the sun. Another difficulty is that 6 B.C. is two years too early for the birth of Christ.

Another theory is that this star was a nova. A nova is a star that suddenly becomes very bright. Ordinarily such a star is too dim to be seen by the unaided eye. Very quickly such a star increases its brightness greatly and becomes as bright or brighter than the brightest star in the sky. Many novae have been discovered and studied. The problem in this case is to explain how such a bright star could serve as a guide to the wise men.

Still another theory proposed to explain the star of Bethlehem is that this was the planet Venus at its greatest brilliance. It is true that this planet does appear at times as a very bright object in the winter sky. However, these wise men knew the movements of the planets, and, therefore, the bright appearance of Venus would hardly have served as a guide to lead them to the Christ child.

Evidently we have here another of the many Bible miracles which modern science is unable to explain. Undoubtedly this miraculous appearance, which is called a star, aroused the curiosity of the wise men to such an extent that they followed it for many miles until finally it pointed out the exact place where they wished to go.

There is abundant evidence in the Bible that many of the constellations were known to the writers. The Lord asked Job many questions. Among these is the following: "Can you bind the chains of the Pleiades, or loose the cords of Orion?" (Job 38:31). One constellation has a special significance to the Christian. It is Cygnus, the flying swan or the Northern Cross. It really has the appearance of a huge cross in the summer sky. Six bright stars form a Roman Cross. It is about the size of the Big Dipper.

This cross may be said to be the evening's call to worship. It reminds us of the passage from Luke, "Look up and raise your heads, because your redemption is drawing near" (Luke 21:28). This constellation sinks westward in the sky until at Christmas time it stands upright just above the horizon in the northwest. There is rich symbolism here in the fact that the star, Deneb, at the top of the cross, where the head of Christ was, is a supergiant, while the one at the bottom, Albireo, where his feet were, is a telescopic double. It is really very beautiful with one star being yellow and the other blue.

In the last book of the Bible and in the last chapter of that book, the Lord Jesus is called "the bright and morning star" (Rev. 22:16). Evidently the writer, the apostle John, had frequently waited for the morning light and had watched for the bright morning star, which is usually a planet. Its beauty had greatly inspired him, so he uses this apt figure by referring to the Lord Jesus Christ as the bright morning star. May Christians watch for His coming as men of old have watched for the morning and have seen the bright stars of the morning! H.H.H.

ASUPPIM (ȧ-sŭp'ĭm), a Heb. word meaning "collectors," left untranslated in KJV (I Chron. 26:15, 17); in ASV, RSV, "storehouses." The same word (Neh. 12:25) in KJV is "thresholds," ASV, RSV, "storehouses." They were at the S gate of the Temple.

ASYNCRITUS (ȧ-sĭng'krĭ-tŭs, incomparable), a Christian in Rome to whom Paul sends a salutation (Rom. 16:14).

ATAD (ā'tăd, Heb. 'ātādh, thorn), name of a place, "the threshing floor of Atad," E of Jordan, where the Children of Israel mourned for Joseph. The Canaanites called the place Abelmizraim (Gen. 50-11).

ATARAH (ăt'ȧ-rȧ), a wife of Jerahmeel and mother of Onam (I Chron. 2:26).

ATAROTH (ăt'ȧ-rŏth, -rōth, crowns). 1 Modern Khirbet-at-tārûs, E of Jordan in the territory of Reuben, but fortified by Gad (Num. 32:3, 34).

2. On the border between Ephraim and Benjamin, to the W (Josh. 16:2), probably the same as Ataroth-addar (Josh. 16:5, 18:13).

3. On the eastern border of Ephraim (Josh. 16:7).

4. Near Bethlehem (I Chron. 2:54). The locations of the last three are uncertain.

ATER (ā'tĕr). 1. The ancestor of an exiled family (Ezra 2:16; Neh. 7:21).

2. Ancestor of a family of gatekeepers who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

3. The chief of the people who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:17).

ATHACH (ā'thăk), a city of Judah, probably near Ziklag. David sent to it from Ziklag some of the spoil taken from the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:30).

ATHAIAH (ȧ-thī'ȧ, Jehovah is helper), the son of Uzziah a Judahite in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 11:4).

ATHALIAH (ăth'ȧ-lī'ȧ). 1. The only woman who ever reigned over Judah. Her story is told in II Kings 8:18, 25-28; 11:1-20, and in fuller detail in II Chronicles 22:1-23:21, 24:7. She was the daughter of Ahab king of Israel and Jezebel the devotee of Baal, the granddaughter of Omri king of Israel, and the wife of Jehoram king of Judah. After the death of their son Ahaziah, Athaliah reigned for six years. She put to death all Ahaziah's sons except Joash, whom Jehosheba, sister of Ahaziah and wife of Jehoida the priest hid until the seventh year. Then Jehoida conspired to put Joash on the throne. Coming into the Temple to see what the excitement meant, Athaliah found that the coronation had already taken place. She was allowed to leave the Temple, that it might not be defiled with her blood, but was killed as she went out the door.

2. A son of Jeroham, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:26).

3. The father of Jeshiah, a returned exile (Ezra 8:7).

ATHENS (ăth'ĕnz, Gr. Athénai), in ancient times the famous capital of Attica, one of the Greek states, now the capital of Greece. The city was named after its patron goddess Athene. It centered around a rocky hill called Acropolis, and was 4½ miles from the sea. Two walls, 250 feet apart, connected the city with its harbor (Peiraeus). According to tradition, the city was founded by Cecrops, who came from Egypt about 1556 B.C.; it sent 50 ships to the Trojan War; and it was ruled by kings until about 1068 B.C. After that it was ruled by archons. Two of the most famous archons were Draco, who c. 620 B.C. issued laws "written in blood," and Solon, who in 594 B.C. gave the state a constitution. The Athenians defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490, and again in 480 at Salamis. They then built a small empire, with a powerful fleet for its support. The period of Athens' greatest glory was during the rule of Pericles (459-431), who erected many beautiful public buildings in the city and under whose administration literature and art flourished. The Peloponnesian War (431-404) ended with the submission of Athens to Sparta. Later wars sapped the strength of Athens. Philip of Macedon crushed the city in 338 B.C. In 146 B.C. the Romans made it a part of the province of Achaea. The Roman general Sulla sacked the city in 86 B.C. It subsequently came into the hands of the Goths, the Byzantines, and other peoples. The Turks ruled it from A.D. 1458 until the emancipation of Greece in 1833.

In ancient times Athens had a population of at least a quarter of a million. It was the seat of Greek art, science and philosophy, and was the most important university city in the ancient world, even under Roman sway. Although politically conquered, it conquered its conquerors with its learning and culture.

Paul visited the city on his second missionary journey, and spoke to an interested but somewhat disdainful audience on Mars Hill (Acts 17). He called their attention to an altar "to an Unknown God" he had seen in the city, and declared that he could tell them about this God. He made some converts in the city, but there is no record of his establishing a church there or of his returning on any later occasion. From Athens he went to Corinth, where he remained for a year and a half and established a strong church. S.B.

ATHLAI (ăth'lā-ī), a man of Israel who in the days of Ezra (c. 456 B.C.) divorced his foreign wife (Ezra 10:28).

ATONEMENT (ă-tōn'ment), root meaning in English, "at-one-ment": i.e. the bringing together of two who have been enemies into a relationship of peace and friendship. The word belongs primarily to the OT, as it occurs only once in the NT (Rom. 5:11) and there the ASV properly renders it "reconciliation." "For if, while we were enemies, we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son, much more being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life; and not only so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received the reconciliation."

The words "atonement," "make atonement," "appease," "pacify," etc. from the Hebrew root kaphar occur about 110 times in the OT, principally in Leviticus and Numbers, and the root idea is "to cover." The primitive verb and its noun occur in Gen. 6:14, "pitch it within and without with pitch." Just as the pitch covered the ark and protected its inmates, so the shed blood of sacrifice stands between man and the outraged law of a holy God.

On the Day of Atonement, the high priest had first to make atonement for himself and his house (Lev. 16:16), then for the tabernacle itself because it was fouled by the sins of Israel, then for the people. Their sins were ceremonially dealt with by the use of two goats: the first goat died as a sin offering (16:15), even as our Lord died for us on the cross; then the high priest confessed the iniquities and transgressions of Israel over the scapegoat (16:21,22), which was then released and bore "upon him all their sins into a solitary land." And so we read in Psalm 103:12 "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us"; in Micah 7:19, "thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (of God's forgetfulness) and in Isaiah 38:17, "For thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back." The beautiful word "mercy-seat" for the covering of the ark of the covenant comes from the same word, and has been rendered by some just "covering," but the beauty of the meaning is thus lost. The sprinkling of the blood upon the mercy-seat (Lev. 16:14) was the divine way of picturing the merciful covering of our sins.

In Christian theology, atonement is the central doctrine of our faith and can properly include all that our Lord accomplished for us on the cross. It was a vicarious (i.e. substitutionary) atonement. On the Day of Atonement, perhaps the goat which was substituted was in some sense not as valuable as a man, though the goat had never sinned: but God in His matchless grace provided a Substitute who was infinitely better than the sinner, absolutely sinless and holy, and dearer to the Father than all creation. "The wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23a), and "Him who knew no sin, he made to be sin on our behalf: that we might become the righteousness of God in Him" (II Cor. 5:21).

There are two opposite facts that the ingenuity of the theologians could not have reconciled without God's solution: first, that God is holy and He hates sin, and that by His holy law sin is a capital crime; and second, that "God is love" (I John 4:8); and so the problem was "How can God be just and at the same time justify the sinner?" (cf. Rom. 3:26). John 3:16 tells us that God so loved that He gave — but our blessed Lord was not just a means to an end — He was not a martyr to a cause. In the eternal counsels of the Trinity, He offered Himself to bear our sins (Rev. 13:8), and so, voluntarily, He emptied Himself of the divine trappings of omnipotence, omniscience, and glory (Phil. 2:5-8), that He might be truly human, became the Babe of Bethlehem. For about 33 years He perfectly fulfilled the law on our behalf (Matt. 5:18) and then paid the penalty for our sins in His death for us upon the cross. Our Lord's work of atonement looks in three directions: looking toward sin and Satan, He redeemed us with His precious blood (I Pet. 1:18, 19: "Ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold — but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot"); looking toward us, He reconciled a world of sinners with God (Rom. 5:6-11: "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life"—); and looking toward the Holy Father, He propitiated divine justice (I John 2:2: "And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world").

It seems strange that theologians have invented so many theories of the atonement when the teaching expressed above seems to be clear and simple. A partial answer lies in the difficulty of putting into philosophical language the mysteries of the faith; but a larger explanation is that the truth cannot be explained adequately by those who have not experienced it. A.B.F.

ATONEMENT, DAY OF. Theologically and spiritually, the center of Leviticus, "the book of holiness," is the 16th chapter, which gives the law for the day of atonement; and the divinely inspired commentary on this chapter is found in Hebrews 9:1-10:25. Israel practically had two beginnings for its years, six months apart. In the first month, the 14th day, they ate the Passover as a memorial of the events leading to the exodus from Egypt; and half a year later, in the seventh month, and the tenth day (Lev. 16:29) they afflicted their souls and the priest made atonement for them. Nowadays, the Jews celebrate their New Year's day (rosh hash-shanah) on the first day of the "seventh" month, and the day of atonement (yom kippur) properly yom hakkippurim on the tenth. The purpose of the day of atonement seems to have been at least four-fold: first to show God's hatred of sin, that the "wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23), and that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission" of sin (Heb. 9:22); second, to show the contagious nature of sin, for even the Holy place had to be cleansed (Lev. 16:16) "because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins"; third, to point forward by three types to the death of "the Lamb of God," our blessed Saviour; and fourth, by its repetition year after year to signify that the way into the very presence of God had not been made manifest before the death of Christ (Heb. 9:7-9). When our Lord offered Himself on Calvary, the veil of the temple was rent (Mark 15:38), and God signified that from that moment on, we were under a new covenant — a covenant of grace, not of law. "For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ" (John 1:17). The OT ceremonies were but symbols and types and shadows: the NT records the realities; in OT times, God was teaching His people by "kindergarten" methods — godliness brought health, long life, and prosperity; and sin brought quick, visible, corporeal punishment. Today, under grace, we look back to Calvary, when the great Day of Atonement took place once for all.

ATROTH (ăt'rŏth). Properly "Atroth-shophan," a town built and fortified by the tribe of Gad, E of Jordan (Num. 32:35). KJV reads Atroth, Shophan, as though two towns are named.

ATTAI (ăt'ā-ī). Half-Egyptian member of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:35,36).

2. Mighty man of Gad who joined David (I Chron. 12:11).

3. Younger brother of Abijah, king of Judah (II Chron. 11:20).

ATTALIA (ăt'ā-lī'ā), a seaport of Pamphylia near Perga, mentioned in Acts 14:25. On Paul's first missionary journey, he landed at Perga, several miles inland, but on his return he and Barnabas sailed for Antioch in Syria from Attalia, the main seaport on the Gulf of "Adalia" as it is spelled today. The city was founded by and named for Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamum from 159-138 B.C.

AUGUSTUS CAESAR (ô-gŭs'tŭs sē'zêr). Gaius Octavius, whose male ancestors for four generations had the same name, was born in Rome, Sept. 23, 63 B.C. and early became influential through his great-uncle, Julius Caesar. He was studying quietly in Illyria when he heard of Caesar's murder, March 15, 44 B.C. and then, hastening to Italy he learned that Caesar had adopted him and made him his heir. Thus, in his early manhood, by skillful manipulation of his friends he conquered his rival, Antony, at Actium. The beginning of the Roman Empire may be reckoned from this date, Sept. 2, 31 B.C. By his adoption he had become "Caesar," and now, in 31 B.C., the Roman senate added the title "Augustus." Although he preserved the forms of a republic, he gradually got all the power into his hands. He reigned till A.D. 14. Some of the secular histories omit the most important event in his reign — a Babe was born at Bethlehem! In the NT, Augustus Caesar is mentioned just once (Luke 2:1).

AUL (ôl), an obsolete variant of awl. A sharp, piercing tool (Exod. 21:6, Deut. 15:17).

AUTHORIZED VERSION (See Bible, Translations of)

AVA (ā'vȧ), ASV Avva, a region in Assyria from which Sargon brought men to populate devastated Samaria (II Kings 17:24); thought by some to be the Ivah (ASV Ivvah) of II Kings 18:34. These men worshiped the gods Nibhaz and Tartak (II Kings 17:31).

AVEN (ā'vĕn; Heb. 'āwen, vanity). 1. The Egyptian city "On" (Gen. 41:45), dedicated to the sun, and still existing as "Heliopolis" or "City of the Sun," about eight miles from Cairo (Ezek. 30:17). Some think that Ezekiel deliberately mispronounced On to show his contempt for its idol worship.

2. Hosea (10:5,8) contemptuously calls the places of the heathen calves of Bethel, the "high places of Aven."

3. Evidently a valley in Syria, dedicated to heathen worship (Amos 1:5), and thought by some to be Baalbek.

AVENGER (ȧ-vĕn'jêr). In the Mosaic law, and in primitive societies quite commonly the law was "life for life," and so if a man was killed, his nearest of kin was made the avenger of blood (Num. 35:11-34). A distinct difference was made between murder and manslaughter. The same Hebrew word is rendered "kinsman" (Ruth 4:1) and "redeemer" (Job 19:25).

AVIM, AVIMS, AVITES (ā'vĭm, ā'vĭmz, ā'vīts). 1. An ancient people who dwelt in the region of Gaza before the time of Moses (Deut. 2:23). In the time of Joshua's old age, these people still were not rooted out (Josh. 13:3).

2. A city in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23), perhaps populated by the remains of this ancient tribe.

AVITH (ā'vĭth), name of a town or city, which was the capital of Hadad, the fourth king of Edom, before there were any kings of Israel (Gen. 36:35).

AWL (See Aul)

AX, the well-known chopping instrument, represented by a number of Heb. and Gr. words (I Kings 6:7, Ps. 74:6, II Sam. 12:31, Jer. 10:3, Matt. 3:10).

AYIN (ā'yĕn), in KJV, Ain, Heb. 'ayin, "an eye," "a spring or fountain." 1. The 16th letter of the Hebrew alphabet, probably so named because originally in outline an eye.

2. A place on the N boundary line of Palestine (Num. 34:11).

3. A town in Judah near Rimmon (Josh. 15:32; I Chron. 4:32).

AZAL (See Azel)

AZALIAH (ăz'ȧ-lī'ȧ, Heb. 'ătsalyâhû, probably Jehovah has set aside, or Jehovah has shown himself distinguished), a son of Meshullam and father of Shaphan the scribe (II Kings 22:3).

Augustus Caesar. JHK

AZANIAH (ăz'ȧ-nī'ȧ, Heb. 'ăzanyâh, Jehovah has set aside, or Jehovah has given ear), a son of Jeshua, a Levite who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:9).

AZAREEL, AZARAEL (ȧ-zā'rē-ĕl, Heb. 'ăzar'ēl, God is helper; AV reads Azareel in Nos. 1-5, Azarael in No. 6). 1. A Levite who entered the army of David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

2. A musician in the temple in David's time (I Chron. 25:18).

3. A captain in the service of David (I Chron. 27:22).

4. A man Ezra persuaded to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:41).

5. A priest who lived in Jerusalem after the exile (Neh. 11:13).

6. A musician who played in the procession when the wall was dedicated (Neh. 12:36).

AZAREL (Same as Azareel)

AZARIAH (ăz'ȧ-rī'a, Heb. 'ăzaryâhu, Jehovah hath helped). 1. King of Judah. See Uzziah.

2. A man of Judah of the house of Ethan the Wise (I Chron. 2:8).

3. The son of Jehu, descended from an Egyptian through the daughter of Sheshan (I Chron. 2:38).

4. A son of Ahimaaz (I Chron. 6:9).

5. A Levite of the family of Kohath (I Chron. 6:36).

6. A son of Zadok the high priest, under Solomon (I Kings 4:2).

7. A high priest and son of Johanan (I Chron. 6:10).

8. Son of Nathan, an officer at Solomon's court (I Kings 4:5).

9. A prophet, son of Obed, in the reign of King Asa (II Chron. 15:1-8).

10. Two sons of King Jehoshaphat; probably half brothers.

11. A son of Jehoram (II Chron. 22:6, called Ahaziah in verse 1).

12. Son of Jeroham, who helped to overthrow Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

13. Son of Johanan who helped in getting the captives of Judah released (II Chron. 28:12).

14. A Levite who assisted in purifying the Temple in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 29:12).

15. A high priest who rebuked Uzziah's attempt to assume priestly functions (II Chron. 26:16-20).

16. A son of Hilkiah; a high priest not long before the Exile (I Chron. 6:13,14).

17. A man of Judah who bitterly opposed Jeremiah (Jer. 43:2).

18. One of the captives taken to Babylon, whose name was changed to Abed-nego (Daniel 1:7).

19. The son of Maaseiah, who helped repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:23 f).

20. A Levite who assisted Ezra in explaining the Law (Neh. 8:7).

21. A priest who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:2).

22. A prince of Judah who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:32,33).

AZAZ (ā'zăz, Heb. 'āzāz, strong), a Reubenite, the son of Shema or Shemaiah (I Chron. 5:8).

AZAZEL (ȧ-zā'zĕl, Heb. 'āzā'zēl; KJV scapegoat, RV removal), a name used in connection with one of the goats chosen for the service of the Day of Atonement. The word occurs in one passage only (Lev. 16:8, 10, 26). The meaning of the word is very uncertain. Many interpretations have been proposed, none completely satisfactory. The word has been interpreted both personally and impersonally:

1. It has been regarded as the name of an evil spirit living in the wilderness to whom the goat laden with the sins of the people was sent.

2. Some consider the word as an abstraction meaning "removal." One of the two goats was for the Lord; the other, for removal.

3. The word is regarded as an epithet of the devil. The goat laden with sin belongs to the devil.

Whatever the exact meaning of the word, it is clear that the aim of this part of the ritual of the Day of Atonement was to provide the people with a visible token of the removal of their sins. It was a symbolical declaration that the land and people were purged from guilt.

AZAZIAH (ăz'ȧ-zī'ȧ, Heb. 'āzazyāhû, Jehovah is strong). 1. A harper during the reign of David (I Chron. 15:21).

2. The father of the prince of Ephraim in the reign of David (I Chron. 27:20).

3. A Levite overseer of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

AZBUK (ăz'bŭk), father of a certain Nehemiah who lived at the same time, but was not the same as the famous governor of that name (Neh. 3:16).

AZEKAH (ȧ-zē'kȧ), a town in NW Judah. It is mentioned as a place to which Joshua pursued the kings at the battle of Gibeon (Josh. 10:10,11). Other places where it is mentioned are Joshua 15:35; I Samuel 17:1; II Chronicles 11:9; Jeremiah 34:7; Nehemiah 11:30.

AZEL (ā'zĕl). 1. A descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul (I Chron. 8:37 f., 9:43 f.).

2. A place near Jerusalem (Zech. 14:5).

AZGAD (ăz'găd, Heb. 'azgādh, Gad is strong, or fate is hard), the ancestral head of a family of postexilic Jews (Ezra 2:12, 8:12; Neh. 7:17, 10:15).

AZIEL (ē'zī-ĕl, Heb. 'ăzī'ēl, God is my strength), a Levite musician (I Chron. 15:20, Jaaziel in verse 18, and Jeiel in 16:5).

AZIZA (ȧ-zī'zȧ, Heb. 'ăzîzā', strong), a man in the time of Ezra who divorced his foreign wife (Ezra 10:27).

AZMAVETH (ăz-mā'vĕth, Heb. 'azmāweth, death is strong. 1. One of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:31).

2. A Benjamite, one of whose sons followed David (I Chron. 12:3).

3. A man in charge of David's treasures (I Chron. 27:25).

4. A descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (I Chron. 8:36).

5. A place north of Anathoth to which some exiles returned (Ezra 2:24; Neh. 12:29; also called Beth-azmaveth [Neh. 7:28]).

AZMON (ăz'mŏn, Heb. 'atsmôn, strong), a town on the south border of Judah (Num. 34:4,5; Josh. 15:4, RV). Site unknown.

AZNOTH-TABOR (ăz'nŏth-tā'bôr, Heb. 'aznôth tāvōr, the ears, i.e., slopes of Tabor), a place near Mt. Tabor on the border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:34).

AZOR (ā'zôr), a post-exilic ancestor of Christ (Matt. 1:13,14).

AZOTUS (See Ashdod)

AZRIEL (ăz'rī-ĕl, Heb. 'azrî'ēl, God is help). 1. A chieftain of the half tribe of Manasseh E of the Jordan (I Chron. 5:24).

2. A Naphtalite of David's time (I Chron. 27:19).

3. The father of Seraiah of Jeremiah's time (Jer. 36:26).

AZRIKAM (ăz'rī-kăm, Heb. 'azrîqām, my help has arisen. 1. A son of Neariah (I Chron. 3:23).

2. A descendant of Saul (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

3. A Levite, descended from Merari (I Chron. 9:14).

4. An officer of Ahaz (II Chron. 28:7).

AZUBAH (ȧ-zū'bȧ, forsaken). 1. A wife of Caleb (I Chron. 2:18,19).

2. The mother of Jehoshaphat (I Kings 22:42).

AZUR (See Azzur)

AZZAH (See Gaza)

AZZAN (ăz'ăn, strong), the father of Paltiel, prince of Issachar in the days of Moses (Num. 34:26).

AZZUR (ăz'ẽr, Heb. 'azzur, helped, in KJV twice Azur). 1. Father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer. 28:1).

2. Father of Jaazaniah (Ezek. 11:1).

3. One of the signers of the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:17).

BAAL (bā'ăl, Heb. ba'al, lord, possessor, husband). 1. The word Baal appears in the OT with a variety of meanings. Originally it was not a proper noun, but later it came to be so used. Sometimes it is used in the primary sense of "master" or "owner," as in Exodus 21:28,34; Judges 19:22; Isaiah 16:8. Since the Hebrew husband was regarded as the literal owner of his wife, Baal was the common term for husband, as in Exodus 21:3; II Samuel 11:26; Hosea 2:16. Most often, however, the word refers to the Semitic deity or deities called Baal. Baal is not the name of one god, but the name of the presiding deity of any given locality. Because the worship of Baal was much the same everywhere in Canaan, in time Baal came to represent the idea of one god. The Baalim were the gods of the land, owning and controlling it, and the increase of crops, fruits, and cattle was under their control. The farmer was completely dependent upon the Baalim. Some Baals were greater than others. Some were in control of cities, as Melkart of Tyre. The name Baal occurs as early as the Hyksos period (c. 1700 B.C.). The Amarna letters and the Ras Shamra texts (c. 1400 B.C.) make Baal a prominent Semitic deity, and in the latter the name is not only applied to local gods, but is also used as the name of a distinct god Baal.

Baal was worshiped on high places in Moab in the time of Balaam and Balak (Num. 22:41). In the period of the Judges there were altars to him in Palestine (Judg. 2:13; 6:28-32); and in the time of Ahab and Jezebel, the daughter of the heathen king of the Sidonians, the worship of Jehovah was almost supplanted by that of Baal. The struggle between Baalism and Judaism came to a head on Mount Carmel when the Prophet Elijah met the priests of Baal and slew 450 of them (I Kings 16:32; 18:17-40). The cult quickly recuperated, however, and prospered until crushed by Jehu (II Kings 10:18-28). Jezebel's daughter, Athaliah, the wife of Jehoram, gave the worship of Baal a new impulse (II Chron. 17:3; 21:6; 22:2). When she was overthrown, the temple of Baal at Jerusalem was destroyed and the chief priest killed before the altar (II Kings 11:18). Before long, however, there was another revival of the worship of Baal (II Chron. 28:2; II Kings 21:3). Josiah again destroyed the temple of Baal at Jerusalem, and caused the public worship of the god to cease for a time (II Kings 23:4,5). Prophets of Israel, especially Jeremiah, often denounced Baal worship (Jer. 19:4,5).

In the worship of Baal, incense and burnt sacrifices were offered to him (Jer. 7:9), and on extraordinary occasions the victims were children offered by their parents (Jer. 19:5). Lascivious rites accompanied the worship (I Kings 14:23,24). Sometimes priests, dancing around the altar in a state of frenzy, slashed themselves with knives (I Kings 18:26,28). At first the name Baal was used by the Jews for their God without discrimination, but as the struggle between the two religions developed, the name Baal was given up in Judaism as a thing of shame, and even names like Jerubbaal were changed into Jerubbesheth.

2. A descendant of Reuben, the first-born son of Jacob (I Chron. 5:5).

3. A Benjamite (I Chron. 8:30).

4. A town somewhere on the border of Simeon (I Chron. 4:33).

5. In composition it is often the name of a man and not of Baal, e.g. Baal-hanan, a king of Edom (Gen. 36:38; I Chron. 1:49). S.B.

BAALBEK (bāl'bĕk, city of Baal), a city of Coele-Syria, about 40 miles NW of Damascus, celebrated for its magnificence in the first centuries of the Christian era, and famous since then for its ruins. Early identified with the worship of Baal, the sun god, the Greeks named it Heliopolis, "City of the Sun." It cannot be identified with any Bible locality. It became a place of importance only after it was made a Roman colony. Chief of the ruins is the great Temple of the Sun, 290 ft. x 160 ft., built of incredibly huge stones from near-by quarries. The city was completely destroyed by earthquake in 1759. The Prussian government undertook its excavation in 1902.

BAALE OF JUDAH (bā'ăl-jōō'dà), a town on the N border of Judah, the same as Baalah and Kiriath-baal and Kiriath-jearim (II Sam. 6:2; I Chron. 13:6).

BAAL-GAD (bā'ăl-găd, Gad is Baal), a place in the valley of Lebanon, at the foot of Mount Hermon, which marked the N limit of Israel's conquest of Canaan (Josh. 11:17; 12:7; 13:5). Its site is uncertain.

BAAL-HAMON (bá'ăl-hā'mŏn, Baal of Hamon), a place where Solomon had a vineyard (S. of Sol. 8:11). Its location is unknown.

BAAL-HANAN (bā'ăl-hā'năn, Baal is gracious). 1. The son of Achbor and king of Edom (Gen. 36:38; I Chron. 1:49).

2. An official under David (I Chron. 27:28).

BAAL-HAZOR (bā'ăl-hā'zôr, Baal of Hazor), a place beside Ephraim where Absalom had a sheep-range and where he brought about the death of Amnon in revenge for the outrage upon his sister (II Sam. 13:23).

BAAL-HERMON (bā'ăl-hûr'mŏn, Baal of Hermon), a town or place near Mt. Hermon marking the NW limit of the half tribe of Manasseh E of the Jordan (Judg. 3:3; I Chron. 5:23).

BAALI (bā'ă-lī, my lord, my master). After the conquest of Canaan it was the common practice of the Israelites to use the name "Baal," the common name for all local gods, as well as "Jehovah." Hosea demands that this degradation cease and that Jehovah be no longer called "my Baal," but "Ishi" (my husband) (Hos. 2:16) The Israelites later abandoned the use of "Baal" for "Jehovah."

BAALIS (bā'à-lĭs, Heb. ba'alîs), a king of the Ammonites who reigned soon after Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem. He instigated the murder of Gedaliah (Jer. 40:14).

BAAL-MEON (bā'ăl-mē'ŏn, Heb. ba'al me'ôn, Baal of Meon), an old city on the frontiers of Moab, assigned to Reuben (Num. 32:38). It is called Beth-meon in Jeremiah 48:23 and Beon in Numbers 32:3.

BAAL-PEOR (bā'ăl-pē'ôr, Heb. ba'al pe'ôr, Baal of Peor), a Moabite deity, probably Chemosh, the national deity of the Moabites, worshiped on the top of Mount Peor. The Israelites, when encamped at Shittim, were induced by Moabite women to the worship of this deity, and were severely punished by God as a result (Num. 25:1-9; Ps. 106:28; Hos. 9:10).

BAAL-PERAZIM (bā'ăl-pē-rā'zĭm, Heb. ba'al perātsîm, Baal of the breaking through), a place near the valley of Rephaim where David obtained a great victory over the Philistines (II Sam. 5:18-20; I Chron. 14:9-11).

BAAL-SHALISHA (bā'ăl-shāl'ĭ-shà, Heb. ba'al shālîshâh, Baal of Shalisha), a place in Ephraim from which bread and corn were brought to Elisha when he was at Gilgal (II Kings 4:42-44).

BAAL-TAMAR (bā'ăl-tā'mär, Heb. ba'al tāmār, Baal of the palm tree), a place in Benjamin, near Gibeah and Bethel (Judg. 20:33).

BAAL-ZEBUB (bā'ăl-zē'bŭb, Heb. ba'al zevûv, Baal, or lord of flies), the name under which Baal was worshiped by the Philistines of Ekron (II Kings 1:2,3,6,16). Ahaziah consulted him to find out whether he should recover from his illness, and was therefore rebuked by Elijah. There can be little doubt that Beelzebub is the same name as Baalzebub. The Greek text, however, has Beelzebul. Just how these changes in spelling took place is a matter of conjecture. Beelzebub is the prince of the demons (Matt. 10:25; 12:24; Mark 3:22; Luke 11:15,18,19). Jesus identifies him with Satan (Matt. 12:26; Mark 3:23; Luke 11:18). Beelzebul signifies "lord of the dwelling"; this is pertinent to the argument in Matthew 10:25; 12:29; Mark 3:27.

BAAL-ZEPHON (bā'ăl-zē'fŏn, Heb. ba'al tsephôn, lord of the north), a place near which the Israelites encamped just before they crossed the Red Sea (Exod. 14:2,9; Num. 33:7). The site is unknown.

BAANA (bā'à-nà, Heb. ba'ănā', son of oppression). 1. Two officers in the service of Solomon (I Kings 4:12; 4:16; A.V. "Baanah").

2. The father of Zadok, one of those who helped in rebuilding the wall in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3:4).

BAANAH (bā'à-nà, Heb. ba'ănâh, son of oppression). 1. A captain in the army of Ish-bosheth who with his brother murdered Ish-bosheth and thus assisted in turning the kingdom to David, who, however, had them put to death as criminals (II Sam. 4).

2. The father of Heleb, one of David's warriors (II Sam. 23:29; I Chron. 11:30).

3. A Jew who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and was one of those who sealed the covenant (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7; 10:27).

BAARA (bā'à-rà, Heb. ba'ărā', the burning one), a wife of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:8).

BAASEIAH (bā'à-sē'yà, Heb. ba'ăsēyâh, the Lord is bold), an ancestor of Asaph, the musician (I Chron. 6:40).

BAASHA (bā'à-shà, Heb. ba'shā', boldness), the son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar. He became the third king of Israel by assassinating Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, in the second year of his reign, when the latter was directing the siege of Gibbethon in the land of the Philistines. He exterminated the house of Jeroboam, and made Tirzah his capital. He ascended the throne in the third year of Asa, king of Judah (I Kings 15,16). He carried on a long war with Asa. About the 16th year of Asa, Baasha began to fortify Ramah, five miles N of Jerusalem, in order to blockade the N frontier of Judah, but was prevented from completing this work by Ben-hadad, king of Damascus, whom Asa hired (I Kings 15:16-21; II Chron. 16:1-6). Asa then tore down Baasha's defences, and for his own protection built up the bulwarks of Geba (between Ramah and Jerusalem). Baasha continued the calf worship begun by Jeroboam, and the Prophet Jehu threatened him and his house with a worse fate than Jeroboam's. After a reign of 24 years he died a natural death and was succeeded by his son, Elah, who was killed, along with every member of the house of Baasha, by Zimri (I Kings 15,16). S.B.

BABEL, TOWER OF (bā'bĕl, gate of God), an expression is not found in the OT, but it is used popularly for the structure built in the plain of Shinar, as the story is told in Genesis 11:1-9. The men of Shinar intended to build a tower "whose top may reach unto heaven," but Jehovah frustrated them by confusing their tongues. The author of Genesis assumes that before this the whole human species was a single tribe moving from place to place and speaking one language. The event took place not very long after the Deluge.

At the sites of many ancient cities in Mesopotamia there are found the remains of large towers called "ziggurats." These were sacred temple-towers, built in stages, steplike, of brick and asphalt, at the top of which there was usually a shrine. The Tower of Babel was, however, not a temple-tower, but simply a tower, apparently the first one ever attempted. The ziggurats were very likely to an extent imitations of this tower.

It is not known for certain whether the ruins of the Tower of Babel are still extant. There are rival claimants for the honor. S.B.

BABYLON (băb'ĭ-lŏn), the Greek form of the Hebrew word bāvel, which was closely allied to, and probably derived from, the Akkadian babilu or "gate of God." The name referred not only to the city itself but also to the country of which it was the capital. Though not the oldest city in Babylonia it soon became the most important both from the standpoint of size and influence.

Babylon was situated in central Mesopotamia on the river Euphrates, some fifty miles south of modern Baghdad, capital of Iraq. A huge plantation of palm trees added to the beauty of the ancient city, and a permanent water supply assured fertility for the surrounding areas. It was within easy reach of the Persian Gulf, and being situated on an important caravan-trade route was in contact with all the most important cultural centers of the ancient Near East.

The date of its foundation is still disputed. The connection between Akkad, Calneh, Erech and Babylon (Gen. 10:10) indicates a period at least as early as 3000 B.C. Babylon may have been founded originally by the Sumerians, and an early tablet recorded that Sargon of Akkad (c. 2400 B.C.) destroyed Babylon and took some of its sacred earth to his own capital city, Akkad. This is probably a reference to the hallowing of the spot by the Tower of Babel (Gen. 11) which the ancient Mesopotamians had constructed in the apparent hope that the deity could be persuaded to descend from heaven and dwell among men. Whatever the date of its foundation, the earliest archaeological levels of the mound which once was stately Babylon come from the first dynasty period, i.e. the nineteenth to sixteenth centuries B.C.

The history of Babylon is complicated by the fact that it was governed by rulers from several lands, who were successively engaged in struggles for its capture and retention. It was the scene of many a decisive battle, its magnificent buildings being plundered in various periods and its walls and temples leveled from time to time. Yet this apparently indestructible city rose from its ruins on each occasion more splendid than before, until during the reign of Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605-562 B.C.) it was probably the largest and most elaborate city in the ancient world. All that now remains of its former glory is a series of mounds some five miles in extent, lying mostly on the left bank of the Euphrates.

The political history of Babylon was bound up with that of Babylonia and Assyria, though from the beginning of the eighteenth century B.C. (about the period of Terah's migration from Ur, Gen. 11:31) until the time of the Assyrian regime (ninth to sixth centuries B.C.), Babylon was the dominant influence in Mesopotamia. Under Hammurabi (c. 1704-1662 B.C.), the last great king of the first dynasty, the Babylonian empire stretched from the Persian Gulf to the middle Euphrates and upper Tigris regions. Archaeological discoveries have brought to light many of the achievements of this remarkable scholar-statesman, the most interesting of which is his celebrated legal code. His attempts to unify and organize social life led him to collect and expand existing minor law codes. The resulting legislation was of a most comprehensive nature, and Hammurabi ordered it to be incised on a basalt column and placed in the temple of Shamash, god of justice, for all to see. This column is in every sense a monument of ancient jurisprudence. It was carried away as a trophy by invading Elamites in a surprise raid during the twelfth century B.C., and was unearthed only in 1901 at Susa (Biblical Shushan) by J. de Morgan.

The first dynasty of Babylon fell about 1596 B.C. when the Hittite king Mursilis I (c. 1600 B.C.) advanced from modern Anatolia (modern Turkey) with an army and sacked the city. For about three hundred years Babylon was at the mercy of the Kassites who lived to the north, the Elamites, and other warlike nomadic peoples. An early Assyrian monarch Tukulti-Ninurta I (c. 1250 B.C.) occupied Babylon and took the sacred statue of Marduk, patron deity of the city, to Ashur. From the end of the tenth century B.C. Babylon became a vassal of Assyria, being controlled by the kings of Nineveh. Occasionally the vassal ruler revolted and attempted to form a new dynasty in Babylon, but by the time of Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (c. 745-727 B.C.) Babylon was completely under Assyrian control. This redoubtable monarch, known as Pul in II Kings 15:19 and I Chronicles 5:26, attacked the northern kingdom of Israel, carried away captives from Gilead, Galilee and Naphtali (II Kings 15:29), demanded booty and reduced Israel to a series of provinces.

One of the more vigorous vassal rulers of Babylon who revolted against Assyria was Marduk-apal-iddin (c. 722-711 B.C.), the Merodach-Baladan of II Kings 20:12f., and Isaiah 39:1. He endeavored to organize a coalition against his overlord Sargon II (c. 722-705 B.C.), and sought the kingdom of Judah as an ally. Isaiah dissuaded Hezekiah from such a course on the ground that it would be futile. A small stone tablet was unearthed in Babylonia which depicted Merodach-Baladan as a stout man with the long curled hair and beard typical of Babylonia. He held a sceptre in his left hand, and on his head he wore a conical helmet quite unlike the usual Assyrian crown. Merodach-Baladan's schemes were ended by Sargon, who subdued him with difficulty and occupied the throne of Babylon.

Sargon was succeeded by his son Sennacherib (c. 705-681 B.C.), who employed vassal princes to keep Babylon in subjugation. When this device failed he attacked the city and sacked it in 689 B.C., removing the statues of its gods to Assyria. It was left to his son Esarhaddon (c. 681-669 B.C.) to repair the damage and restore the city, perhaps at the instigation of his mother, who was apparently of Aramean descent. When Esarhaddon died his kingdom was divided between his two sons. Ashurbanipal (c. 669-626 B.C.), the last great Assyrian ruler, reigned in Nineveh while his brother Shamash-Shumukin occupied the throne of Babylon. They quarreled bitterly, and in 651 B.C. Ashurbanipal attacked and burned Babylon. His brother was killed and a vassal was appointed to succeed him. Towards the end of Ashurbanipal's life this man became increasingly rebellious, and from 631-612 B.C. the influence of Babylon increased to the point where Nabopolassar founded an independent dynasty in 626 B.C., known as the neo-Babylonian or Chaldean regime.

Under Nabopolassar (c. 626-605 B.C.) and his son Nebuchadnezzar II (c. 605-562 B.C.), ancient Babylon attained to the height of its splendor. While both men were notable military strategists they were also individuals of cultural interests, and they set about rebuilding the old Babylonian empire so as to make it the most splendid and notable of all time. Military expeditions brought numbers of captive peoples to Babylonia, and these were employed as artisans and craftsmen on the vast reconstruction projects. As a result of the energy and imagination of Nabopolassar and his son, the influence of Babylon far outstripped that of Nineveh, and in 616 B.C. the Babylonians began a military campaign against the middle Euphrates region which ended in the destruction of the Assyrian empire.

Nabopolassar first marched to the Balikh river and sacked a number of towns, but returned to Babylon the same year. In 615 B.C. he set out to attack Ashur, and after a year's siege the city capitulated. A revolt in the central Euphrates region delayed a further attack on Assyria, but in 612 B.C. a combined force of Babylonians and Medes marched against Nineveh, captured it and burned it to the ground. The remnant of the Assyrian forces fled to Haran in northwestern Mesopotamia, and despite their attempts to ally with Egypt they were decisively defeated in 610 B.C., ending the power of the Assyrian regime.

A battle at Carchemish in 605 B.C. against the Egyptians gave the Babylonian forces a decided military advantage, and Nabopolassar decided to occupy southern Palestine, probably with the intention of using it as an advance base for a subsequent attack upon Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar directed the operation on the death of Nabopolassar in 605 B.C., and in 597 B.C. the first attack upon Judah took place. This was followed by others in 586 and 581 B.C., the result of which was to send several thousand inhabitants of Judah to Babylon as captives. This group joined other previously-enslaved peoples, supplementing the already large labor force employed on the gigantic tasks of reconstruction and expansion current in the empire.

Once Nebuchadnezzar felt reasonably secure he devoted an increasing amount of attention to the expansion of cultural interests in imperial territory, and more particularly in Babylon. His objective was to make his capital the most notable city in the world, and to this end he constructed new canals and navigable waterways, erected magnificent buildings and laid out extensive parks. A number of travelers who visited Babylon at this time have left their impressions of the city. The description furnished by Herodotus in particular clearly indicates his amazement at its great size and splendor.

According to this notable historian of antiquity the city occupied an area of about 200 square miles, and was built on both sides of the Euphrates. It was protected by a double defensive brick wall reinforced with towers. To the outside of this wall, about twenty yards distant, was an additional defensive wall of burnt bricks set in bitumen. The outer portion of the twin walls extended over seventeen miles and was constructed under Nebuchadnezzar, while his predecessors were responsible for other parts of the fortification. Excavations at the mound have shown that the earliest attempt at constructing a defensive system goes back to the nineteenth century B.C.

According to cuneiform sources, access to the city was gained by eight gates, four of which have been excavated. Probably the most impressive of these is the Ishtar gate, located at the northern end of the mound. To reach it one passed down part of the great stone-paved processional street which was about 1000 yards in length. It was decorated on either side with figures of lions passant in enameled brick. Assyrian art was at its height at this period, and the draftmanship and execution of these animals indicates an advanced degree of artistic skill. The Ishtar gate was also decorated with animals, consisting of about a dozen rows of bulls and mythological dragons placed alternately. The decor was executed predominantly in blue and brown enamel, and was done in the time of Nebuchadnezzar.

When the city was at the height of its influence there were more than fifty temples in Babylon. When some of these were excavated they were found to be in a reasonably good state of preservation. The temple of Ninmah, goddess of the underworld, was built by Ashurbanipal near the Ishtar gate. The ground plan indicated that when approached from the north a vestibule led into a larger courtyard, the south end of which was decorated with pillars. Beyond these was an antechapel while to the south of this area was the shrine of the deity, containing among other structures an elevated platform designed to support a statue of the goddess. In addition there were living quarters for the priests, and stairways which gave access to other parts of the building. A great number of terra cotta figurines were uncovered at the site, but proved to be of little importance.

The southern citadel which was adjacent to the processional street comprised a huge complex of buildings whose main sections were the work of Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar. Several blocks of buildings and courtyards finally led to the royal palace, many of whose rooms were ornately decorated with blue enameled bricks incorporating motifs similar to those used in Greece at a later time. The living quarters provided for the royal family, the court officers and the retinue of servants displayed the grandeur and pomp characteristic of an eastern court.

In this complex was situated one of the seven wonders of the world, the celebrated "hanging gardens" of Babylon. They actually consisted of terraces supported on huge masonry arches, on which carefully tended gardens had been laid out at different levels. Most probably they were designed and executed under Nebuchadnezzar, who had married a Median princess and intended the raised gardens to be a comforting reminder of her mountainous homeland. They included many species of Babylonian and Persian plants in addition to the palm trees which were a characteristic feature of Babylonia at that time. The interesting feature of these raised gardens was the fact that they were visible above the tops of the buildings, and provided a welcome contrast of greenery against an otherwise unrelieved background of white roofs or an expanse of sky. A number of mechanical hoists provided the means by which water was raised to these elevated terraces.

In an enclosed area southwest of the Ishtar gate was the huge ziggurat of Babylon, which was closely linked with the temple of Marduk lying immediately to the south. A ziggurat was properly a staged or terraced tower crowned with a small shrine dedicated to a particular deity. The structure was generally erected upon a mound or artificial brick platform, presumably to serve as a protection against floodwaters. Sometimes the term ziggurat is used to include the platform as well as the tower itself. This great staged tower of Babylon may have been the original Tower of Babel (Gen. 11: 1-9), modified by subsequent reconstruction and additions. From archaeological and other sources it would appear that it was a seven-story building of sun-dried mud brick faced with kiln-dried brick. An eighth story probably consisted of a small shrine dedicated to Marduk, and in the time of Nebuchadnezzar it was faced with blue enameled bricks. Access to the various levels was gained by means of stairways or ramps. The ground plan of the ziggurat was approximately 300 feet square, and the structure as it stood in the sixth century B.C. exceeded 300 feet in height.

The associated temple of Marduk consisted of an annex leading to the principal building. In the latter were a number of chapels devoted to deities other than Marduk, but his shrine was by far the most ornate, being richly decorated with gold, alabaster, cedar-wood panelling, lapis lazuli, obsidian and other semi-precious stones. Much of this work was done in the sixth century B.C.

Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., and during the next five years three kings, one of whom was the Evil-Merodach of II Kings 25:27, occupied the throne until Nabonidus came to power in 556 B.C. He was a mystic who had antiquarian interests, and after a short rule made his son Bel-shar-usur (Belshazzar) regent while he retired to Teima in Arabia. After nine years he returned to Babylon only to witness the overthrow of the city by Cyrus in 539 B.C. This conqueror did not pillage Babylon, however, but acted respectfully towards the shrines and deities of the land. Enslaved populations were liberated, including the captive Hebrews, and Cyrus, "king of Babylon," set about building up his vast Persian empire.

Darius I (c. 521-485 B.C.) continued the political tendencies begun by Cyrus, but in later years the center of influence of the Achaemenid regime moved from Babylon to Persepolis and Ecbatana. When the Persian empire fell to Alexander the Great in 330 B.C., Babylon was destroyed. Alexander intended to reconstruct the great ziggurat, and ordered the rubble removed from the site, but his death in 323 B.C. saw the task unfinished.

Although remaining as an inhabited site, Babylon declined still further in importance under the Parthians (c. 125 B.C.), and was last mentioned on a Babylonian clay tablet dated about 10 B.C. At the present time the Baghdad to Bassorah railway line passes within a few yards of the mound that was once the most splendid city of the world.

BACA (bā'kà, Heb. bākhā, a balsam tree), in KJV in Psalm 84:6, where RV has "the Valley of weeping," with a marginal variant, "the valley of the balsam-trees." The tree is called a weeper probably because it exudes tears of gum. There is nó trace of a real tree with this name. The phrase refers figuratively to an experience of sorrow turned into joy.

BACHRITES (băk'rīts), a family of Ephraim, called Becherites in ASV, RSV (Num. 26:35), descendants of Becher (called Bered in I Chron. 7:20).

BADGER (See Animals)

BAG, various kinds are mentioned in the Bible. 1. Heb. kelî; Gr. péra. This was a kind of haversack, made of skin, for the carrying of one or more days' provisions. This is the "scrip for the journey" mentioned in Matthew 10:10.

2. Heb. kîs, a bag for merchant's weights such as is mentioned in Deuteronomy 25:13: "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small."

3. Gr. ballántion, a more finished leather pouch which served as a "purse": "Carry neither purse, nor scrip" (Luke 10:4).

4. Heb. hărît, a large bag, one large enough to hold a talent of silver (II Kings 5:23).

5. Heb. tserôr, this was a bag that could be tied with a string, and was a favorite receptacle for valuables. It is translated "bundle" in Genesis 42:35. In the NT this bag is expressed by zone in Greek (Matt. 3:4; 10:9; Acts 21:11; Rev. 1:13; 15:6).

BAHURIM (bà-hū'rĭm, Heb. bahurîm), a place in Benjamin which lay on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho, not far from the Mount of Olives. It is frequently mentioned in the history of David. It was the home of Shimei, who cursed David on his flight from Absalom (II Sam. 16:5; 19:16; I Kings 2:8). Jonathan and Ahimaaz hid in a well there when acting as David's spies (II Sam. 17:18).

BAJITH (bā'jĭth, Heb. bayith, house), found only in Isaiah 15:2. Bayith may be textual error for bath, "daughter," in which case we should read "The daughter of Dibon is gone up to the high places." Some think that the RVm reading, "Bayith and Dibon are gone up to the high places to weep," is the proper rendering.

BAKBAKKAR (băk-băk'êr, Heb. baqbaqqar, investigator), a Levite (I Chron. 9:15).

BAKBUK (băk-bŭk, Heb. baqbûq, bottle), the founder of a family of Nethinim who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

BAKBUKIAH (băk'bū-kī'à, Heb. buqbuqyâh, flask, or perhaps, the Lord pours out), a name occurring three times in Nehemiah (11:17, 12:9,25), all the references being to one person, a Levite in high office in Jerusalem right after the Exile.

BAKER (See Occupations and Professions)

BALAAM (bā'lăm, Heb. bil'ām, perhaps devouring or devourer), the son of Beor from the city of Pethor on the Euphrates, a diviner whose remarkable history may be found in Numbers 22:2-24:25; 31:8,16; Deuteronomy 23:4; Joshua 33:22; 24:9; Nehemiah 13:2; Micah 6:5; II Peter 2:15; Jude 11; Revelation 2:14.

When the Israelites pitched their tents in the plains of Moab, immediately after their victory over Sihon and Og, Balak, the king of the Moabites, sent an embassy of elders of Moab and Midian to Balaam, offering to reward him if he would curse the Israelites. After looking to God about the matter, he replied that God had forbidden him to comply with the request. Balak then sent some messengers of a higher rank with more alluring promises. This time God permitted him to go, cautioning him, however, to give only the message God gave him. On his way to Balak this command was strongly impressed on Balaam's mind by the strange behavior of his ass and his encounter with the angel of the Lord.

Balak took him to the high places of Baal from which a part of the camp of the Israelites could be seen. To Balak's disappointment, Balaam pronounced upon the Israelites a blessing instead of a curse. Surprised and incensed at the words of the diviner, Balak thought that a fuller view of the camp of Israel might change his disposition, and took him to the top of Mt. Pisgah, but the only result was further blessing instead of cursing. The children of Israel are compared to a lion who will not lie down until he has eaten his prey. In his despair Balak now suggested that the issue be tried from a third locality. They went to the top of Peor, and there the Spirit of God came upon Balaam and caused him to declare not only that God would bless Israel, but that he who blessed her would be blessed, and he who cursed her would be cursed. In his bitter disappointment, Balak now broke forth in angry reproaches, and ordered Balaam to go home, but without the promised reward. Before he left, Balaam reminded the king that at the very beginning he had said that no amount of money could make him give anything other than the commandment of the Lord. He then uttered a last prophecy — the most remarkable he had given so far — in which he foretold the coming of a Star from Jacob and a scepter out of Israel which would smite Israel's enemies, including Moab.

Nothing else is said of Balaam until Numbers 31. There the seer who had sought to turn away Jehovah from His people, and failed, tried before long to turn the people from Jehovah. He knew that if he succeeded in this, the consequences to Israel would be such as Balak had desired, God's curse upon Israel. By his advice the Israelites were seduced into idolatry and all the vile abominations connected with it. In the judgment that followed, no fewer than 24,000 Israelites perished, until it was evident that the nation abhorred idolatry as a great crime against Jehovah. By God's command Israel meted out vengeance upon her seducers the Midianites; and in the universal slaughter, Balaam also perished.

In the NT Balaam is several times held up as an example of the pernicious influence of hypocritical teachers who attempt to lead God's people astray. No Bible character is more severely excoriated. S.B.

BALAH (bā'là, Heb. bālâh), a town in SW Palestine (Josh. 19:3), Bilhah in I Chronicles 4:29. Site unknown. It may be the same as Baalah in Judah (Josh. 15:29).

BALAK (bā'lăk, Heb. bālāq, devastator), a king of Moab in Moses' day who hired Balaam, a diviner from the Euphrates, to pronounce a curse on the Israelites (Num. 22-24; Judg. 11:25; Micah 6:5; Rev. 2:14). Frightened by the story of Israel's victory over Sihon and Og, he evidently thought that the favor of Jehovah could be turned from Israel to his own nation. Instead of cursings, he heard blessings; but he achieved his end in an indirect way when he followed Balaam's advice to seduce men of Israel to idolatry, as a result of which sin God brought heavy judgment on the chosen people.

BALANCE (băl'ăns), the English word is from the Latin bilanx and means "having two scales." It is used to translate three Hebrew words: mo'znayim, kaneh, and peles. The balances of the Hebrews consisted of a horizontal bar, either suspended from a cord that was held in the hand, or pivoted on a perpendicular rod. Scales were suspended from the ends of the bar, one for the object to be weighed, the other for the weight. At first the weights were of stone. Weighing with such balances could be accurately done, but the system was liable to fraud, so that in the OT there is much denunciation of "wicked balances" (Micah 6:11).

BALD LOCUST (See Insects)

BALDNESS (bôld'nĕs). Natural baldness is seldom mentioned in the Bible. It was believed to result from hard work (Ezek. 29:18) or disease (Isa. 3:17,24). Baldness produced by shaving the head, however, is frequently referred to. It was done as a mark of mourning for the dead (Lev. 21:5; Isa. 15:2; 22:12; Micah 1:16). Shaving the head as a sacrifice to the deity was the custom of the people in the land, and the Israelites were strictly forbidden to practice it (Lev. 21:5; Deut. 14:1). The custom among neighboring nations of shaving all but a small patch in the center of the head was also forbidden (Lev. 19:27; 21:5). When a Nazarite completed his vow, the shaven hair was offered as a sacrifice to Jehovah (Num. 6:18; cf. Acts 18:18; 21:24).

BALM (bäm, Heb. tsŏrî), an odoriferous resin perhaps obtained in Gilead (Gen. 37:25; Jer. 8:22; 46:11), and exported from Palestine. It was used as an ointment for healing wounds (Jer. 51:8). It came from a small tree not now found in Gilead, and perhaps it never grew there. See PLANTS.

BAMAH (bā'mà, Heb. bāmâh, high place). Ezekiel (Ezek. 20:29) plays upon the two syllables ba (go) and mah (what), with evident contempt for the high place to which the word refers.

BAMOTH-BAAL (bā'mŏth-bā'ăl, Heb. bāmôth ba'al, high places of Baal), a place N of the Arnon, in the tribe of Reuben, to which Balak took Balaam (Num. 21:19; 22:41).

BANDS. In English the word has two common meanings: that which holds together or binds, and a company of men. Both meanings are found in Scripture. In the NT reference is made to the "Italian Band," a cohort of Roman soldiers stationed at Caesarea (Acts 10:1), and the "Augustan Band," a cohort to which the Roman centurion Julius, who had charge of Paul on his voyage to Rome, belonged (Acts 27:1).

BANI (bā'nī, Heb. bānî, posterity). 1. A Gadite, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:36).

2. A Levite whose son served in the tabernacle in David's time (I Chron. 6:46).

3. A descendant of Judah whose son lived in Jerusalem after the Captivity (I Chron. 9:4).

4. A Levite and builder (Neh. 3:17).

5. A Levite (Neh. 9:4).

6. A Levite who lived before the return from exile (Neh. 11:22).

7. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:13).

8. A leader who also signed the covenant (Neh. 10:14).

9. Founder of a family some of whom returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:10). Some took foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

10. Founder of a house (Ezra 10:34), a descendant of whom was also named Bani (Ezra 10:38).

BANK (băngk). In its modern form, banking is of recent origin (17th century), but banking of a primitive kind was known in ancient times, among both Jews and Gentiles. Money was received on deposit, loaned out, exchanged for smaller denominations or for foreign money. Israelites could not charge each other interest (Exod. 22:25), but could lend on interest to Gentiles (Deut. 23:20).

BANNER (băn'ĕr, Heb. nēs, deghel, banner, ensign, standard). Banners were used in ancient times for military, national, and ecclesiastical purposes very much as they are today. In connection with Israel's wilderness journey we read, "The children of Israel shall encamp every man by his own standard, with the ensigns of their fathers' houses" (Num. 2:2). The word occurs frequently in the figurative sense of a rallying point for God's people (Isa. 5:26; 11:10; Jer. 4:21).

BANQUET (băng'kwĕt). The Hebrews, like other peoples of the ancient East, were very fond of social feasting. At the three great religious feasts, which all males were expected to attend, the family had its feast. Sacrifices were accompanied by a feast (Exod. 34:15; Judg. 16:23-25). There were feasts on birthdays (Gen. 40:20; Job 1:4; Matt. 14:6), marriages (Gen. 29:22; Matt. 22:2), funerals (II Sam. 3:35; Jer. 16:7), laying of foundations (Prov. 9:1-5), vintage (Judg. 9:27), sheep-shearing (I Sam. 25:2,36), and on other occasions. A banquet always included wine-drinking; it was not simply a feast in our sense. At a large banquet a second invitation was often sent on the day of the feast, or a servant brought the guests to the feast (Luke 14:17; Matt. 22:2ff). The host provided robes for the guests, and they were worn in his honor and were a token of his regard. Guests were welcomed by the host with a kiss (Luke 7:45), and their feet were washed because of the dusty roads (Gen. 18:4; Judg. 19:21; Luke 7:44). The head was anointed (Ps. 23:5; Luke 7:46), and sometimes the beard, the feet, and the clothes. The head was decorated with garlands (Isa. 28:1). The guests were seated according to their respective rank (I Sam. 9:22; Luke 14:8), the hands were washed (II Kings 3:11), and grace was said (I Sam. 9:13; Matt. 15:35; Luke 22:17). The Pharisees made hand washing and the saying of grace burdensome rituals. The feast was put under the superintendence of a "govérnor of the feast," usually one of the guests, whose task it was to taste the food and the drinks and to settle about the toasts and amusements. The most honored guests received either larger or more choice portions than the rest (Gen. 43:34; I Sam. 9:23f). Portions were sometimes sent to friends not attending the feast (II Sam. 11:8; Neh. 8:10). Often the meal was enlivened with music, singing, and dancing (II Sam. 19:35; Luke 15:25), or with riddles (Judg. 14:12). A great banquet sometimes lasted seven days, but excess in eating and drinking was condemned by the sacred writers (Eccl. 10:16f; Isa. 5:11f). S.B.

BAPTISM (băp'tĭzm), a term derived from the Greek báptisma (antecedent, baptízo); the etymological significance of the word often has been obscured by a lack of exegetical clarity and by forced interpretation. Its true meaning can be found only in its usage and its theological significance. Its antecedent meaning involves its Judaic usage in the OT times, and its practice by John the Baptist. Its incipient meaning lies in Christ's baptism and His interpretation of it. Its formal meaning is to be found in its apostolic interpretation, particularly Pauline.

The use of the word baptízo in Jewish usage first appears in the Mosaic laws of purification (Exod. 30:17-21; Lev. 11:25; 15:8; 17:15; Num. 19:17, 18; 31:22,23) where it undeniably means a mere "washing" or "cleansing." In the Septuagint version of the OT, translated into the Hellenistic idiom of the New Testament, the word is used but three times: II Kings 5:14 and Ecclesiasticus 34:25, where the meaning again is that of cleansing, and Isaiah 21:4, where its meaning is obscured. It is clear, however, that later Judaism incorporated this primary connotation of cleansing and purification into its idea of the New Covenant relation and used it as a rite of initiation, as reflected in the practices of the Qumran sect and the Dead Sea Scroll communities.

While late Judaism certainly attached a deeply pietistic significance to the cleansing act, John the Baptist, who followed in this tradition, infused into the ritual act of initiation and purification an ethical quality which it had not had before. His was a moral community of penitent souls seeking personal righteousness, and he associated with the act of baptism the imperative necessity for a thorough change in the condition of the soul, manifested in a remission of sins through repentance. His fervent exhortation to "repent and flee from the wrath to come" (Matt. 3:7,8) was not a mere invitation to a religious ceremony, but was, rather, symptomatic of the change in the act of baptism itself. The meaning of the act was deepened, therefore, by its transformation from a rite to which one submitted himself to a positive moral act initiated by the individual as a decisive commitment to personal piety.

John's baptism was, nevertheless, only transitory — his baptism of repentance was but preparatory to a baptism of identification. The meaning and efficacy of baptism can be understood only in the light of the redemptive death and resurrection of Christ. Christ referred to his death in the words "I have a baptism to be baptized with" (Luke 12:59) and, "Can you drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?" (Mark 10:38; Matt. 20:22). Here the word báptisma, which indicates the state or condition, is used instead of baptismos, which applies to Jewish rites and refers only to the act itself. Baptisma, used only in the NT and in Christian writings, never refers to the act alone, but always incorporates into its meaning the entire scope of the redemptive significance of the incarnate person of Christ.

The baptism of Jesus, therefore, relates the act of baptism to the meaning of the salvation events through His own person and work. When Jesus submitted to the baptism of John He conjoined the act of water baptism with the efficacy of His redemptive work, making them inter-related and vital to each other. To this act of water baptism He added the promise of the baptism with the Spirit, the means by which His redemptive work for man became efficacious (Mark 1:8; Matt. 3:11; Luke 3:16; Acts 1:4ff; 11:16). Through this baptism, entry into Christ's redemptive work is gained. Utilizing the initiatory and purificatory connotations found in water baptism, Christ made spiritual baptism (by the Holy Spirit) synonymous with the actual application of the virtues of His death and resurrection to sinful man.

The Apostolic writers, particularly Paul, enlarged the concept of the spiritual aspect of baptism by relating it to the whole of the redemptive act. To the generic symbolism of cleansing, Paul attributed to its spiritual significance the quality of entry into the righteousness of Christ through an identification with Christ Himself. Spiritual baptism is the means by which the redeemed sinner is incorporated into the spiritual body of Christ, not merely as an act of initiation, but as a state or condition of personal righteousness. It is, therefore, the only access to identification with the redeeming Christ.

Baptism may, therefore, he regarded from two perspectives: its subjective significance, as the baptism of the Holy Spirit in which the believer is brought into positive relationship to God; and its symbolic significance, as the objective manifestation of the believer's acquiescence to that relationship. Its subjective significance lies in its nature as spiritual baptism, while its objective form relates to its symbolic significance.

Its subjective significance is represented in the NT by many analogies. It is regarded as the means of participation in the death and resurrection of Christ. In Romans 6:3-5, Paul relates the actual spiritual condition of his readers to such a participation in the death and resurrection through baptism. "Do you not know that all of us who have been baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death? We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, so that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life." This identification is not merely to the death of Christ, in which the believer has also died to sin, but to the resurrection of Christ, in which the believer has found "newness of life." Spiritual baptism is therefore an entry into the new life in Christ — a passage from the old creation into the new creation. This involves not merely forgiveness of sins, but an impartation of the life and righteousness of Christ to the believer (II Peter 1:4). The believer is "in Christ," and Christ is in the believer. Moreover, this identification, effected through spiritual baptism, cleanses the believer through the blood of Christ (Titus 3:5f). True baptism is, therefore, the incorporation of the believer into Christ's righteousness and an infusion of that righteousness into the believer.

Its symbolic significance is depicted in its objective form. While much debate has focused on the varying interpretations of the forms of baptism, each form (immersion, sprinkling or pouring) is clearly associated with the concept of cleansing and identification, which are, as reflected in its spiritual significance, its two integral parts. Immersion, however, depicts more clearly the symbolic aspect of baptism since its three steps of *im*mersion — going into the water, *sub*mersion — going under the water, and *e*mersion — coming out of the water, more closely parallel the concept of entering into the death of Christ, experiencing the forgiveness of sins, and rising to walk in the newness of Christ's resurrected life (Rom. 6:4).

The genius of Christian baptism, however, is to be found not merely in its symbolic significance, but in its actual effect in the life of the believer. True baptism must always be vitally related to faith. Only through responsive faith to the regenerative work of Christ can the soul participate in spiritual baptism, and subsequently in the symbolic form of the act itself. Through faith, as a commitment to the person of Christ, the believer is brought into an actual relation to God through the radical change of nature which is inherent in spiritual baptism. Faith is a "surrender-in-response" relationship to the Holy Spirit, who, through spiritual baptism, brings man into vital union with God.

While much emphasis in recent evangelical use has been placed on the "symbol only" concept of baptism, and, while the NT pointedly abstains from ascribing a sacramental value to the act itself, a renewed emphasis upon the spiritual significance of baptism will restore to its proper place a much neglected aspect of this doctrine. No statement of the doctrine can be a truly Biblical one if it fails to emphasize that beyond the symbolic and commemorative act performed by man there is also the inward operation of the Holy Spirit, bringing man into a redemptive relationship through his participation in and identification with the death, burial, and resurrection of Christ, and the subsequent infusion of the merits of that death and resurrection into the life of the believer, by which he may live as one dead to sin, but alive to God (Rom. 6:11). C.B.B.

BAR- (bär), an Aramaic word for the Hebrew bēn, "son." In the NT it is used as a prefix to the names of persons, e.g., Bar-Jonah, "son of Jonah" (Matt. 16:17); Barabbas; Bar-Jesus; Barnabas; Barsabbas; Bartholomew; Bartimaeus.

BARABBAS (bär-ăb'ăs, Gr. Barabbás, for Aramaic Bar-abba, son of the father, or teacher), a criminal chosen by the Jerusalem mob, at the instigation of the chief priests, in preference to Christ, to be released by Pilate on the feast of the Passover. Matthew calls him a notorious prisoner, and the other evangelists say he was arrested with others for robbery, sedition, and murder (Matt. 27:16; Mark 15:15; Luke 23:18; John 18:40). The custom here mentioned of releasing a prisoner on the Passover is otherwise unknown. The reading "Jesus Barabbas" for his full name in Matthew 27:16f, was found by Origen in many MSS., and is still to be found in some early versions and a few cursives. It is probably due to a scribe's error in transcription.

BARACHEL (bär'ă-kĕl, Heb. bārakh'ēl, God blesses), a Buzite, whose son Elihu was the last of Job's friends to reason with him (Job 32:2,6).

BARACHIAS (bär'ă-kī'ăs, Gr. Barachías), the father of Zachariah, who was slain between the Temple and the altar (Matt. 23:35).

BARAK (bâr'ăk, Heb. bārāq, lightning), the son of Abinoam of Kedesh, a refuge city in Mt. Naphtali. He was summoned by Deborah the judge and prophetess to lead the Israelites to war against the Canaanites under the leadership of Sisera, the commander in chief of Jaban, king of Canaan. For 20 years Israel had been oppressed by the Canaanites. The farm lands were plundered; traffic almost ceased; and the fighting men of Israel were disarmed, so that not a shield nor a spear was to be seen among them. Barak raised an army of 10,000 men, mostly from a few faithful tribes, which encamped on Mt. Tabor, the wooded slopes of which protected them against the chariots of the Canaanites. The army of Israel routed Jabin's 800 iron chariots and heavily-armed host in the plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon). A heavy rainfall caused the alluvial plain to become a morass in which the Canaanite army found it impossible to move, and assisted in the discomfiture. Sisera abandoned his chariot and ran away on foot. Barak pursued him and found him slain by Jael in her tent. A peace of 40 years was secured (Judg. 4,5). In Hebrews 11:32 Barak's name appears among those who achieved great things through faith.

BARBARIAN (bär-bâr'ĭ-ăn), originally anyone who did not speak Greek. Paul uses it in this strict sense in Romans 1:14, where Greeks and barbarians means the whole human race. Romans and Jews did not mind being called barbarians in this sense. In I Corinthians 14:11 Paul uses the word to describe one who spoke an unintelligible foreign tongue; and so also in Acts 28:2,4, where the inhabitants of Melita are called barbarians (they spoke a Punic dialect). In Colossians 3:11 the word refers to those who did not belong to the cultivated Greek race.

BARBER (See Occupations and Professions)

BAR-JESUS (bär'jē'sŭs, Gr. Bariesoús, son of Jesus), a Jewish magician and false prophet in the court of Sergius Paulus when the latter was proconsul of Cyprus. He was struck blind for interfering with Paul's work (Acts 13:6-12).

BAR-JONA (bär'jō'nà, Gr. Bar-iōnás, probably son of Jonah, or son of John), a surname of the Apostle Peter (Matt. 16:17).

BARKOS (bär'kŏs, Heb. barqôs), one of the Nethinim who founded a family some members of which returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55).

BARLEY (See Plants)

BARNABAS (bär'nà-băs, Gr. Barnábas, explained in Acts 4:36 to mean son of exhortation or consolation), the surname of Joseph, a Levite from Cyprus, who was an early convert to Christianity. He sold a field and gave the proceeds to the support of the poorer members of the church in Jerusalem (Acts 4:36ff). In Acts 11:24 he is described as "a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith," traits which early brought him into leadership. When the church in Jerusalem hesitated to receive Paul into their fellowship, Barnabas removed their fears by speaking in the apostle's behalf (Acts 9:27).

After the start of the work at Antioch, the church in Jerusalem sent Barnabas there to give the work direction; and he, after laboring there for some time, went to Tarsus and brought back Paul as his associate (Acts 11:22-26). At the end of a year the two men were sent to carry alms from the infant church to their brethren at Jerusalem, who were suffering from famine (Acts 11:27-30). Returning with John Mark from Jerusalem, they were ordained as missionaries and proceeded on a mission to the Gentiles (Acts 13:2,3). Barnabas as well as Paul is called an "apostle" (Acts 14:14) Together the two men labored at Cyprus, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. Up to Acts 13:43, the leadership is ascribed to Barnabas; after that, Paul takes the precedence. At Lystra, after a cripple was healed, the inhabitants worshiped Barnabas as Jupiter, and Paul, the chief speaker, as Mercury (Acts 13:3-14:28). After their return to Antioch, the church sent them to the council at Jerusalem (Acts 15:2). They were commissioned to carry the decrees of the council to the churches in Syria and Asia Minor (Acts 15:22-35).

The beginning of a difference between the two men is suggested by Paul in Galatians 2:13, where he says that Barnabas went along with Peter in the latter's inconsistent course. This was followed by a more serious break when, after Paul had suggested a second missionary journey, he refused to take along Mark, the cousin of Barnabas, on the ground that he had left them on their first journey. The two men separated, Barnabas going with Mark to Cyprus, while Paul went to Asia Minor (Acts 15:36-41). The mutual affection of the two evangelists did not, however, cease. Paul's allusions to Barnabas in his epistles shows that he continued to hold his former associate in high esteem (I Cor. 9:6; Gal. 2,1,9,13; Col. 4:10). Some early church leaders attributed the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews to Barnabas. S.B.

BARREL (băr'ĕl), the KJV rendering of kadh in I Kings 17:12-16, 18:33. A large earthenware water jar is meant. Such a jar is still used in Palestine.

BARSABAS (bär-sàb'ăs, Gr. from Aram., son of Sabbas, or perhaps, son of, i.e., born on, the Sabbath). 1. The surname of the Joseph who with Matthias was nominated by the apostles as the successor of Judas (Acts 1:23).

2. The surname of Judas, a prophet of the Jerusalem church, sent with Silas to Antioch with the decree of the Jerusalem council, and afterward returned to Jerusalem (Acts 15:22). Nothing further is recorded of him.

BARTHOLOMEW (bär-thŏl'ŏ-mū, Gr. from Aram., son of Tolmai or Talmai, Gr. Bartholomaíos), one of the twelve apostles. He is mentioned in all four of the lists of the apostles in the NT (Mark 3:18; Matt. 10:3; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). There is no further reference to him in the NT, and the traditions concerning him are not trustworthy. Some scholars think that Bartholomew is the surname of Nathanael, who was led to Christ by Philip (John 1:45,46). The reason for this is that in the list of the apostles in the Gospels the name of Bartholomew immediately follows that of Philip, and the Synoptic Gospels never mention Nathanael, while John never mentions Bartholomew. This view has, however, not been conclusively established.

BARTIMAEUS (bär'tĭ-mē'ŭs, Gr. Bartímaios, son of Timaeus), a blind man healed by Jesus as He went out from Jericho on His way to Jerusalem shortly before Passion Week (Mark 10:46-52). A very similar account is given by Luke (18:35-43), except that the miracle occurred as Jesus drew near to Jericho, and the blind man's name is not given. Matthew (20:29-34) tells of Jesus healing two blind men on the way out of Jericho. On the surface the stories seem irreconcilable, but there is no doubt that if we knew some slight circumstance not mentioned the difficulty would be cleared up. Various explanations, which may be found in the standard commentaries, have been suggested.

BARUCH (bâr'ŭk, Heb. bārûkh, blessed). 1. Son of Neriah and brother of Seraiah (Jer. 36:32), of a princely family. He was the trusted friend (Jer. 32:12) and amanuensis (Jer. 36:4ff) of the prophet Jeremiah. A man of unusual acquirements, he might have risen to a high position if he had not thrown in his lot with Jeremiah (Jer. 45:5). Jeremiah dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read them to the people (Jer. 36). King Jehoiakim, on hearing the opening sentences of the prophecy, became greatly angered, and burned the roll. He ordered the arrest of Baruch and Jeremiah, but they escaped. Baruch rewrote the prophet's oracles with additions (Jer. 36:27-32). In the reign of Zedekiah, during the final siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah bought his ancestral estate in Anathoth, and since he was at that time a prisoner, placed the deed in Baruch's hands, and testified that Israel would again possess the land (Jer. 32). Josephus (Ant. X,ix,1) says that Baruch continued to live with Jeremiah at Mizpah after the fall of Jerusalem. After the murder of Gedaliah, the leaders accused him of unduly influencing Jeremiah when the latter urged the people to remain in Judah (Jer. 43:3), a fact which shows how great Baruch's influence was thought to be over his master. He was taken to Egypt with Jeremiah (Jer. 43:6). After that, all reliable records about him cease. Jerome preserves a tradition that he died in Egypt soon after reaching there. Other traditions say that he was taken by Nebuchadnezzar to Babylon after this king conquered Egypt, and that he died there twelve years later. The high regard in which Baruch was held is shown by the large number of spurious writings that were attributed to him, among them The Apocalypse of Baruch, the Book of Baruch; the Rest of the Words of Baruch; the Gnostic Book of Baruch, and others.

2. A man who helped Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:20).

3. A priest who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:6).

4. The son of Colhozeh, a descendant of Perez (Neh. 11:5). S.B.

BARUCH, BOOK OF, one of the Apocryphal books, standing between Jeremiah and Lamentations in the LXX. It is based on the tradition which represents Baruch, the son of Neriah, as spending his last years in Babylon. Although some modern Roman Catholic scholars hold that it is the work of Jeremiah's friend and amanuensis, the book in its present form is usually thought to belong to the latter half of the first century of our era. The book purports to be a treatise by Baruch to the exiles, and is made up of an introduction and three sections. The first section contains a confession of sin and a prayer for the return of God's favor. In the second section wisdom is praised in words recalling Job 28 and 29 and the Book of Proverbs. In the third section words of encouragement are addressed to the exiles similar to those in the second part of Isaiah.

BARZILLAI (bär-zĭl'ā-ī, Heb. bārzillay, made of iron). 1. A wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim, E of the Jordan, who brought provisions to David and his army when the king fled from Absalom (II Sam. 17:27-29). When David was returning to Jerusalem, after Absalom's defeat, David invited Barzillai to come to live in the capital, but Barzillai, who was then 80, refused because of his age, and therefore arranged that his son Chinham should go in his stead (II Sam. 19:31-40). David before his death charged Solomon to "show kindness unto the sons of Barzillai" (I Kings 2:7).

2. One of the returning exiles living in Ezra's time. He took "a wife of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite" and adopted his wife's family name (Ezra 2:61,62).

3. A Meholathite, whose son Adriel married Saul's daughter, either Michal (II Sam. 21:8) or Merab (I Sam. 18:19).

BASEMATH (băs'ĕ-măth, Heb. bāsmath, fragrant), see Bashemath.

BASHAN (bā'shăn, Heb. bāshān, smooth, fertile land), the broad, fertile region E of the Sea of Galilee, extending, roughly, from Gilead on the S to Mt. Hermon on the N. Josephus identifies Bashan with Gaulonitis and Batanea (cf. Jos. Antiq. iv. 5,3 with I Kings 4:13; and Antiq. ix. 8,1 with II Kings 10:33). In the days of Abraham it was occupied by a people called the Rephaim (Gen. 14:5). Og, the last king of the race, was defeated and slain by the Israelites at Edrei in the time of Moses (Num. 21:33-35; Deut. 3:1-7). The whole district was assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3:13). Edrei, Ashtaroth, Golan, and Salecah were its chief cities (Deut. 1:4; 3:1,10; 4:43). Solomon taxed the land (I Kings 4:13). It was lost to Israel in the Syrian wars (I Kings 22: 3ff; II Kings 8:28; 10:32,35). Tiglath-pileser incorporated it in the Assyrian empire (II Kings 15: 29). The Nabataeans held it in the second century B.C. It was included in the kingdom of Herod the Great, and then belonged to Philip, Herod's son. It was celebrated for its cattle (Ps. 22:12), its breed of sheep (Deut. 32:14), and for its oak trees (Isa. 2:13; Ezek. 27:6). S.B.

BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR (bā'shăn-hā'vŏth-jā'ĭr, Heb. bashan-hawwōth-ya'îr, encampments of Jair in Bashan), a group of unwalled towns in the NW part of Bashan (Deut. 3:14). They were conquered by the Manassite clan Jair (Num. 32:41) when Reuben and Gad requested to have the eastern Jordanic region, immediately after Israel's conquest of Og and Sihon. There were 60 of these towns (Josh. 13:30).

BASHEMATH (băsh'ĕ-măth, Heb. bāsmath, fragrant, "Basemath" in RV). 1. One of Esau's wives, daughter of the Hittite Elon (Gen. 26:34). She is called Adah in the genealogy of Edom (Gen. 36:2,3).

2. Ishmael's daughter and sister of Nebaioth, the last of Esau's three wives, according to the genealogy in Genesis 36:3,4,13,17. In Genesis 28:9 she is called Mahalath.

3. Solomon's daughter, married to Ahimaaz, Solomon's tax collector for Naphtali (I Kings 4: 15).

BASIN (bā'sĭn, the ARV has "basin," the KJV and ERV "bason"), a wide hollow vessel for holding water for washing and other purposes (John 13:5). The word is used for various kinds of bowls and dishes: 1. a small vessel used for wine and other liquids (Exod. 24:6).

2. A shallow vessel used to receive the blood of sacrifices in the Temple (Exod. 12:22) and for domestic purposes.

3. A large bowl used in the Temple for various purposes, especially at the great altar (Zech. 9:15).

BASKET (băs'kĕt), four kinds of baskets mentioned in the OT, but we cannot tell from their names their differences in size, shape and use. They were made of various materials — leaves, reeds, rushes, twigs, or ropes; and they had various shapes and sizes. Some were small enough to be carried in the hands; others had to be carried on the shoulder or head or borne upon a pole between two men. They were used for a variety of purposes: for carrying fruit (Deut. 26:2); for carrying bread, cake, and flesh (Gen. 40:17; Exod. 29:2,3); for carrying clay to make bricks, and earth for embankments (Ps. 81:6). In the NT two kinds of baskets are referred to. The kóphinos (Matt. 14:20; Mark 6:43; John 6:13) was a relatively small basket that could be carried on the back to hold provisions. Twelve of these baskets were used to gather the food that remained after the feeding of the 5,000. The spuris was considerably larger, as we may be sure from its being used in letting Paul down from the wall at Damascus (Acts 9:25). Seven of these were used to gather the food that was left after the feeding of the 4,000 (Matt. 16:9,10). S.B.

BASMATH (băs'măth), in the KJV, with this spelling, appears only in I Kings 4:15. Elsewhere it is spelled Bashemath. See BASHEMATH.

BASTARD (băs'tẽrd, Heb. mamzēr, Gr. nóthos, bastard, specifically, child of incest), appears only three times in Scripture, twice in the OT, once in the NT. In Deutermonomy 23:2 it probably means a "child of incest," not simply an illegitimate child. There it says that a bastard and his descendants to the tenth generation are excluded from the assembly of the Lord. Jephthah, the son of a strange woman, was called to be a judge of Israel (Judg. 11:1,2). In Zechariah 9:6 we read, "And a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod, and I will cut off the pride of the Philistines." The RVm has "a bastard race." Brown, Driver, and Briggs suggest this means a "mixed population." In Hebrews 12:8 the word is used in its proper sense of "born out of wedlock." Bastards had no claim to paternal care or the usual privileges and discipline of legitimate children.

BAT (See Animals)

BATH (See Weights and Measures)

BATH, BATHING, BATHE. Bathing in the ordinary, non-religious sense, whether for physical cleanliness or refreshment, is not often met with in the Scriptures. The average Hebrew had neither the water nor the inclination for bathing. In most cases where "bathe" occurs in the KJV, partial washing is meant. Public baths of the Greek type were unknown among the Hebrews until Greek culture invaded Palestine under Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 168 B.C.). The dusty roads of Palestine made frequent washing of the feet necessary, and this was always done when tarrying at a house (Gen. 18:4; 19:2; John 13:10). Bathing in the Bible stands chiefly for ritual acts — purification from ceremonial defilement because of contact with the dead, defiled persons or things, or things under the ban. Priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or making an offering on the altar (Exod. 30:19-21). The high priest bathed on the day of the atonement before each act of expiation (Lev. 16:4,24). In the time of Christ, the Jews washed their hands before eating (Mark 7:3,4). According to Josephus, the Essenes practiced daily bathing for ceremonial reasons. S.B.

BATHRABBIM (băth'răb'ĭm, Heb. bath-rabbîm, daughter of multitudes), the name of a gate of Heshbon (S. of Sol. 7:4). Near it were two pools which are compared to the Shulammite's eyes.

BATH-SHEBA (băth-shē'bà, Heb. bath-sheva', daughter of Sheba), the daughter of Eliam (II Sam. 11:3) or Ammiel (I Chron. 3:5); both names have the same meaning. She was the wife of Uriah the Hittite, a soldier in David's army, during whose absence in the wars David forced her to commit adultery with him (II Sam. 11). Uriah was then treacherously killed by the order of David (II Sam. 11:6ff). She became David's wife and lived with him in the palace. Four sons, including Solomon, were the result of this marriage (II Sam. 5:14; I Chron. 3:5), after the first child had died (II Sam. 12:14ff). With the help of the prophet Nathan she defeated the plot of Adonijah to usurp the kingdom, and succeeded in having David choose Solomon as his successor. Adonijah was ultimately put to death. She was a woman of resourcefulness and energy and retained her influence over David until his death. Her sons Nathan and Solomon were both ancestors of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:6; Luke 3:31).

BATH-SHUA (băth'shōō'à, Heb. bath-shûa', daughter of opulence, or daughter of Shua). 1. In Genesis 38:2 and I Chronicles 2:3, where the name is translated "Shua's daughter," the wife of Judah.

2. In I Chronicles 3:5, the mother of Solomon. It is probably a misreading of Bath-sheba, due to a scribal error. The LXX has Bath-sheba.

BATTERING RAM (See War, Warfare)

BATTLE. In ancient times a trumpet-signal by the commander opened each battle (Judg. 7:18), and, when it was over, called the soldiers away from the fight (II Sam. 2:28; 18:16). Priests accompanied the army into war to ascertain the Divine will (I Sam. 14:8ff; Judg. 6:36ff). To make Jehovah's help in battle more certain, the Ark was taken along. When the army drew nigh unto battle, a priest or the commander encouraged the soldiers by reminding them of God's presence and help. The faint-hearted were exempted (Deut. 20:8). Military science was relatively simple. A force was usually divided into two attacking divisions, the one in the rear serving as a reserve or as a means of escape for the leader, in case of defeat. Spearmen probably formed the first line, bowmen or archers the second, and slingers the third. Horses and chariots were not used by Israel until quite late. Most of the fighting was done by footmen. Sometimes the battle was preceded by duels between individuals, and these on occasion determined the outcome of the battle (I Sam. 17:3ff; II Sam. 2:14ff). Night attacks and ambushments were often resorted to (Judg. 7:16ff; Josh. 8:2). S.B.

BATTLE-AX (See Arms and Armor)

BATTLE-BOW (See Arms and Armor)

BATTLEMENT, a term applied to parapets with open spaces, surmounting ancient fortified buildings and city walls. From the openings, stones, lances, and arrows were hurled upon attacking soldiers below. In Deuteronomy 22:8 we read that battlements should be provided for the roofs of houses to keep people from falling from them, since roofs were much used for evening recreation.

BAVIA (băv'ā-ĭ, Heb. bawway), a son of Henadad, who helped in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:18).

BAYTREE (See Plants)

BAZLITH (băz'lĭth, Heb. batslîth, stripping), the ancestor of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra 2:52; Neh. 7:54).

BAZLUTH (băz'lŭth, Heb. batslûth), the same as Bazlith, see above. Spelled Bazluth in Ezra 2:52 and Bazlith in Nehemiah 7:54.

BDELLIUM (dĕl'ĭ-ŭm, Heb. bedhōlah), a substance mentioned in Genesis 2:12 and Numbers 11:7, variously taken to be a gum or resin, a precious stone, or a pearl. It was of the same color as manna, and found like gold and the onyx stone or the beryl in the land of Havilah. The Greeks gave the name bdellium to a gum obtained from a tree growing in Arabia, Babylonia, India, and Media. The LXX translates it in Genesis 2:12 as "ruby," and in Numbers 11:7 as "rock crystal."

BEALIAH (bē'ā-lī'ā, Heb. be'alyâh, Jehovah is Lord), a Benjamite soldier who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

BEALOTH (bē'ā-lōth, Heb. be'ālôth). 1. A town in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:24).

2. A locality in north Israel (I Kings 4:16, Aloth KJV). The text is uncertain.

BEAM (bēm), used in the OT to refer to beams used in constructing the upper floors and roofs of buildings (I Kings 7:3) and to the beam of a weaver's loom (Judg. 16:14). Jesus uses the term in a figurative sense in Matthew 7:3 and Luke 6:41 in contrast to a mote in order to show how inconsistent it is to criticize minor faults in others when ours are so much greater.

BEAN (See Plants)

BEAR (See Animals)

BEARD (bērd), with Asiatics a badge of manly dignity, in contrast to the Egyptians, who usually shaved the head and the face. As a sign of mourning, it was the custom to pluck it out or cut it off. The Israelites were forbidden to shave off the corners of their beards, probably because it was regarded as a heathenish sign (Lev. 19:27). To compel a man to cut off his beard was to inflict upon him a shameful disgrace (II Sam. 10:4f).

BEAST (bēst). 1. A mammal, not man, distinguished from birds and fishes, and sometimes also from reptiles (Gen. 1:29,30).

2. A wild, as distinguished from a domesticated animal (Lev. 26:22; Isa. 13:21,22; 34:14; Mark 1:13).

3. Any of the inferior animals, as distinguished from man (Ps. 147:9; Eccl. 3:19; Acts 28:5). The Mosaic law made a distinction between beasts that were ceremonially clean or unclean.

4. An apocalyptic symbol of brute force—sensual, lawless, and God-opposing. In Daniel 7 four successive empires are thus symbolized: Babylon, Media-Persia, Greece, and Rome. In Revelation 13:1-10 a superman rises out of the sea, manifests great power, and demands worship as if he were God. Revelation 13:11-18 tells of another beast, who comes out of the earth; he is often identified with the Antichrist. The beasts of Revelation 4:6-9 of the KJV are in the RV very properly called "living creatures."

BEATITUDES (bē-ăt'ī-tūds, Lat. beatitudo, blessedness). The word "beatitude" is not found in the English Bible. It means either (1) the joys of heaven, or (2) a declaration of blessedness, especially as made by Christ. Beatitudes occur frequently in the OT (Pss. 32:1,2; 41:1; 65:4, etc.). The Gospels contain isolated beatitudes by Christ (Matt. 11:6; 13:16; 16:17; 24:46, with the Lukan parallels; John 13:17; 20:29). But the word is most commonly used of the declarations of blessedness made by Christ in the discourses recorded by Matthew (5:3-11) and (Luke 6:20-22) which are called the "Sermon on the Mount" and the "Sermon on the Plain." Scholars are not agreed whether we have here two different records of the same discourse or records of two different but similar discourses.

The Beatitudes do not describe separate types of Christian character, but set forth qualities and experiences that are combined in the ideal character as conceived by Christ. In Matthew there are eight beatitudes and no woes; in Luke, four beatitudes and four corresponding woes. In Matthew all the sayings except the last are in the third person; in Luke they are in the second. In Matthew all the blessings except the last are attached to spiritual qualities; in Luke, to outward conditions of poverty and suffering. The general declarations in Matthew require the spiritual conditions; while the special declarations in Luke, since they are addressed to disciples, do not. Luke omits the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh beatitudes of Matthew. Some scholars profess to find a gradation in the order in which they are recorded. Much has been written on the grouping of the beatitudes, but no grouping is generally accepted. S.B.

BEBAI (bē'bā-ī, Heb. bēvay). 1. The ancestral head of a family that returned from the captivity (Ezra 2:11; 8:11; Neh. 7:16; 10:15).

2. One of this family.

BECHER (bē'kêr, Heb. bekher, first born, or young camel). 1. The second son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21; I Chron. 7:6). His descendants find no place in the registry of families (Num. 26:38; I Chron. 8:1-6), probably because they were too few in the beginning to form a tribal family. Becher's nine sons ultimately had 20,200 male descendants (I Chron. 7:8,9). They lived in Anathoth and other places in the territory of Benjamin.

2. A son of Ephraim, and founder of a family (Num. 26:35, Bachrites in KJV). But in I Chronicles 7:20 we read "Bered," which may be the correct form.

BECHORATH bē-kō'răth, Heb. bekhôrath, the first birth), an ancestor of Saul of the tribe of Benjamin (I Sam. 9:1).

BED. In the East, in ancient times, as now, the very poor as a rule slept on the ground, their outer garments serving as both mattress and blanket. The law, therefore, forbade such a garment to be kept in pledge after sunset, lest the man should be without covering (Deut. 24:13). In more advanced conditions a rug or a mat was used as a bed. At first it was laid on the floor, usually near a wall; later it was put on an elevation, either a raised part of the floor or a bedstead, which gave rise to the expression "go up into my bed" (Ps. 132:3). Beds on raised platforms along the walls of a room were covered with cushions and used as a sofa during the day. Such beds were rolled up and put away in a closet or another room for the day. The bedchamber where Joash was hidden was not a chamber for sleeping, but a storeroom in which bedding was kept (II Kings 11:2). Still later, in some cases, a mattress took the place of the mat, and a pillow was also used, along with a blanket of some kind. Bedsteads must have been used occasionally, for the giant Og had one made of iron, a marvel in those days (Deut. 3:11). The very wealthy had more elaborate and ornamented bedsteads. Amos speaks of "beds of ivory" (6:4; 3:15), and in Esther 1:6 we read of "beds . . . of gold and silver." Such bedsteads were sometimes further furnished with pillars and a canopy (S. of Sol. 3:10), and they had on them silken cushions (Amos 3:12 RV) and rich coverings (Prov. 7:16). S.B.

BEDAD (bē'dăd, Heb. bedhadh, alone), the father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gen. 36:35; I Chron. 1:46).

BEDAN (bē'dăn, Heb. bedhān, perhaps son of judgment). 1. A Hebrew judge who with Jerubbaal, Jephthan, and Samuel is mentioned as a deliverer of the nation (I Sam. 12:11). The Book of Judges does not mention him. It is thought that "Bedan" is a misreading for "Abdon" (Judg. 12:13) or for "Barak," which is found in the LXX and the Syriac.

2. A son of Ulam of the house of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:17).

BEDEIAH (bē-dē'yà, Heb. bēdheyâh, servant of Jehovah), a son of Bani who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra 10:35).

BEE (See Insects)

BEELIADA (bē'ĕ-lī'à-dà, Heb. be'elyādhā', the Lord knows), a son of King David (I Chron. 14:7); called Eliada in II Samuel 5:16 and I Chronicles 3:8.

BEELZEBUB (See Baalzebub)

BEELZEBUL (See Baalzebub)

BEER (bē'êr, Heb. be'ēr, a well). 1. A place where the Israelites stopped during their wilderness journey (Num. 21:16), possibly the same as Beer-elim (Isa. 15:8).

2. A place to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech (Judg. 9:21). Site unknown.

BEERA (bē-ê'rà, Heb. be'ērā', a well), a descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:37).

BEERAH (bē-ê'rà, Heb. be'ērâh, a well), a Reubenite prince whom Tiglath-pileser carried away captive (I Chron. 5:6).

BEER-ELIM (bē'êr-ē'lĭm, Heb. be'ēr 'ēlîm, well of Elim), a village of Moab (Isa. 15:8). See Beer 1.

BEERI (bē-ê'rī, Heb. be'ērî, belonging to the well). 1. A Hittite, father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gen. 26:34).

2. The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. 1:1).

BEER-LA-HAI-ROI (bē'êr-là-hī'roi, Heb. be'ēr lahay rō'î, the well of the living one who sees me), a well, probably near Kadesh, where the Lord appeared to Hagar (Gen. 16:7,14) and where Isaac lived for some time (Gen. 24:62; 25:11).

BEEROTH (bē-ê'rōth, Heb. be'ērôth, wells), a Canaanite town whose inhabitants succeeded in deceiving Israel by making a covenant with them (Josh. 9:3ff). When the deceit was discovered, they were made slaves by the Israelites (Josh. 9). Apparently they were Hivites (Josh. 9:7). It was in the territory assigned to Benjamin (Josh. 18:25; II Sam. 4:2). The murderers of Ish-bosheth (II Sam. 4:2), and Naharai, Joab's armor-bearer (II Sam. 23:37), came from Beeroth; and Beerothites returned from Babylon after the Exile (Ezra 2:25).

BEERSHEBA (bē'êr shē'bà, Heb. be'ēr shēva', Gr. Bersabée, well of seven, or the seventh well).

Location: The most southerly town in the kingdom of Judah; hence, its practical boundary line, with only the Wady el Arish (the river of Egypt, Gen. 15:18) some 60 miles below the city, to the S. In the days of the conquest of Canaan, allotted to the tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:2). The familiar expression "from Dan to Beersheba" is employed to designate the northern and southern extremities of the nation of Israel (II Sam. 3:10; 17:11; 24:2, et. al).

Etymology: The most probable meaning of the appellation "Beersheba" is the "Well of seven," or "the seventh well." In Hebrew the verb "to swear" and the numeral "seven" are almost identical; therefore, by inference, Beersheba has been styled the "well of the oath" (Gen. 21:31).

The religious and historical background: Hagar wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba as she fled from before her mistress, Sarah (Gen. 21:14). Abraham made the covenant with the Philistine princes here (Gen. 21:32). The patriarch made this his residence after the "offering up" of Isaac (Gen. 22:19). God appeared to Jacob on his way down into Egypt to be reunited to his son Joseph, after their years of separation, promising His continued presence (Gen. 46:1). Elijah, the prophet, sought refuge in Beersheba in seeking to escape from the terror of the wicked Queen Jezebel, wife of Ahab, of Israel (I Kings 19:3). The prophet Amos was constrained to rebuke the idolatrous tendencies which he saw infiltrating into the religious life of Beersheba from Bethel and from Dan (Amos 8:14). The town receives no mention in the New Testament. The modern name of Beersheba is Bir Es Seba. J.F.G.

BEETLE (See Insects)

BEGGAR (bĕg'ar, one who lives off the charity of others). The beggar, as a professional class, was unknown during Mosaic times. The law of Moses made ample provision for the poor of the land. In imprecatory fashion, Psalm 109:10 sets forth begging as the fate and punishment of the children of the wicked. As cities developed, begging became more prevalent. In the New Testament, beggars appear with some frequency: the blind beggar (John 9:8,9), blind Bartimaeus (Mark 10:46-52), the beggar by the "Beautiful" gate of the Temple (Acts 3:1-11) and, perhaps, most famous of all, Lazarus, the godly beggar who stands in opposition to the ungodly rich man (Luke 16:19-31).

BEKAH (See Weights & Measures)

BEL (Bāl, Heb. bēl), the Baal of the Babylonians. The Babylonian Hymn to Bel translated from the cuneiform script reveals him as the supreme ruler, the life-giver, the god of justice, he who holds society together, controller of the elements, particularly fire. Isaiah 46:1; Jeremiah 50:2; 51:44. See Baal.

BELA (bē'là, Heb. bela', destruction), a neighboring city of Sodom and Gomorrah, in the vicinity of the Dead Sea; spared, through the intercession of Lot (Gen. 19:23-30), from the fiery holocaust which overtook the cities of the plain, later known as Zoar. According to Deutermonomy 34:3, Moses is said to have viewed the southern sector of the Promised Land from Jericho, the city of palm trees, unto Zoar. For all practical purposes this places its situation at the S end of the Dead Sea. On the basis of the LXX reading of Isaiah 15:5 and Jeremiah 48:34, it would appear as if the Dead Sea extended farther than at the present time. The name Zoar implies "little one."

BELAH (bē'là, Heb. bēlay). 1. The son of Beor, an Edomite king, previous to the kings of Israel (Gen. 36:32ff; I Chron. 1:43).

2. First-born son of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:6; 8:1). Head of the family of the Belaites (Num. 26:40).

3. Son of Azaz, a Reubenite, an exceptionally wealthy man (I Chron. 5:8,9). His possessions extended from Nebo to the Euphrates.

BELIAL (bē'lī-ăl, Heb. belîya'al, Gr. Belíar), an epithet of scorn and disdain that appears frequently throughout the OT, either as such or in its associate variation, "Sons of Belial" (Deut. 13:13; Judg. 19:22; I Sam. 2:12, etc.). The term implied "reckless," "lawless." The word also came to be used as a synonym for "vain fellow" or "fool," a "good for nothing." Nabal (I Sam. 25:25) receives such a description from the lips of Abigail, his wife. Cf. Raca (Matt. 5:22). The Apostle Paul employs the term once (II Cor. 6:15) where Belial (Beliar) stands as opposed to Christ, thus approaching the diabolical status of Antichrist. In this later usage, it is frequently employed by Jewish Apocalyptic writers for both Satan and Antichrist.

BELL (Heb. metsillôth, pa'ămôn). The latter of these terms rendered bell is found in Exodus 28: 33ff, 39:25,26. These bells were attached to the hem of the sacerdotal robes worn by Aaron and his descendants as they performed priestly service in the Tabernacle. The tinkling of the bells gave assurance to the worshipers without that the high priest had not incurred divine retribution but remained alive as their intercessor. The other Hebrew term is employed just once, in Zechariah 14:20, where the bells bear the inscription "Holy unto the Lord." These "bells" are more like our cymbals than bells so understood. The bell was not used in biblical times for the purpose of religious convocation as today. The use of the bell to summon the worshipers is a distinctively Christian practice dating back to the end of the fourth century, A.D. Its usage seems to have been introduced by Bishop Paulinus who lived during that time. Miniature bells, however, are frequently used to the present time to fasten to the necks of goats and sheep, thus facilitating the shepherd's task of knowing their whereabouts. J.F.G.

BELLOWS (bĕl'ōs), an ancient device employed to fan the flames of the fires of the smelting furnace. The Egyptian type of bellows was operated by the feet, alternately treading upon two inflated skins. This created a forced draft by means of reed tubes, tipped with iron, as the air thus jettisoned into the glowing fire, caused the flames to burn more brilliantly and hotly. As each skin was exhausted of its supply of air, the workman would raise it by a cord attached for that purpose and inflate the skin again. This process was then repeated as many times as deemed necessary. See Jeremiah 6:29.

BELSHAZZAR (bĕl-shăz'ar, Heb. bēlsha'tstsar, may Bel protect the king). For many years regarded as a fictitious literary creation of a post-captivity author assuming the nom de plume of Daniel (c. 165 B.C.), it is now well-authenticated through archaeological studies that Belshazzar was an historic personage. In the fifth chapter of Daniel, he is referred to as the "Son of Nebuchadnezzar 5:2,11,13, 18,22). This is in conformity to general Semitic usage where one's descendant is frequently referred to as his "son." Nebuchadnezzar died in 562 B.C., after a forty-two year reign, and was followed in quick succession by Amel-Marduk (562-560 B.C.), the Evil-Merodach of Jeremiah 52:31 and II Kings 25:27. He was replaced by Nergal-Shar-usar (Neriglissar) who reigned 560-556 B.C. He was succeeded by Labashi-Marduk, his weak son, who reigned but a few months, and then was overthrown by revolution.

One of the conspirators Nabonidus (Nabonaid) now ascended the throne. Though a revolutionary, he was still a man of culture and religious zeal for the gods of Babylon. He is sometimes styled the "World's first archaeologist." Nabonidus is thus the last true king of Babylon, and the father of Belshazzar whom he constituted co-regent with him as he himself retired to Arabia, presumably to consolidate the weakening empire. The Nabonidus chronicle was written after the capture of Babylon in 539 B.C. Cyrus of Persia declares how he was able to take the city without a struggle, and, describing his leniency towards the population, regards himself as an "Enlightened Despot" and executioner of the will of the gods. His estimation of the character of Belshazzar is exceedingly low, not at all out of harmony with that represented by the biblical account.

In regards to the scriptural account, Belshazzar's miserable doom came about at the end of, and largely as a consequence of, a drunken orgy, held October 29, 539 B.C. (cf. the "Feast of Belshazzar"). Suddenly the fingers of a man's hand appeared, writing in fiery letters a message which Belshazzar could not decipher, but which he still recognized as ominous. Following the failure of his advisers to decipher the "cryptogram," upon the suggestion of the Queen-Mother the venerable Hebrew prophet Daniel was summoned. He, after verbally castigating Belshazzar, interpreted the message ("Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting," etc.). The judgment was swift and inevitable. Babylon fell to the Medo-Persians; Belshazzar was slain; and Darius in the name of Cyrus, took the throne. J.F.G.

BELTESHAZZAR (bĕl'tĕ-shăz-ar, Heb. bēltsha'tstsar, may Bel protect his life). The name given to the Hebrew Prophet Daniel by Nebuchadnezzar's steward (Dan. 1:7; 2:26; 4:8; 5:12). Not to be confused with Belshazzar (Dan. 5:1ff).

BEN (Heb. ben). 1. In Semite usage, a term employed to designate a male descendant, without being limited to the paternal-filial association of the west. Thus, Uzziah (Azariah) can be represented as Joram's son, despite the intervening generations (Matt. 1:8). The term Ben is also employed in connection with a clan; in plural only, as in the children of (sons of) Israel; children of (sons of) Ammon, etc. It is also used in prefixes of proper names, as BENjamin, BENhadad, etc. It is likewise used to connote a class, as "Sons of the prophets" (II Kings 2:15).

2. A Levite appointed by David to serve in a musical capacity before the Ark of the Lord (I Chron. 15:18). The text is doubtful, because Ben is not mentioned in vs. 20, and receives no reference at all in the LXX.

BENAIAH (bē-nā'yà, Heb. benāyâh, Jehovah has built), according to I Chron. 27:5, the son of Jehoiada, the priest, and so of the tribe of Levi; probably from the village of Kabzeel in the S of Judah (II Sam. 23:30). He was appointed over David's personal body-guard, the Cherethites and the Pelethites (I Kings 1:38). He was a man of exceptional prowess and bravery. He earned this reputation by slaying two "lion-like" men of Moab, and also killing a lion trapped in a pit in a snowstorm. Although outstanding for these achievements, Benaiah never gained the status of David's "original three," of whom Joab was the chief (II Sam. 23:8), but is always listed as being next in order of rank. One of the special duties imposed upon Benaiah by the rapidly failing monarch was the oversight of the coronation of his son Solomon (I Kings 1:38f). Benaiah played no part in the rebellion of Adonijah, but remained faithful to the cause of Solomon. He thus succeeded Joab as captain of the host (I Kings 2:35; 4:4).

Some 12 men bear this designation. 1. One of David's "valiant 30," the Pirathonite, tribe of Ephraim (II Sam. 23:30).

2. A prince from the tribe of Simeon, who drove the Amalekites from the pastureland of Gedor (I Chron. 4:39f).

3. A Levite who played with the psaltery "upon alamoth" at the return of the Ark to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:18).

4. A priest appointed to blow the trumpet upon the same occasion (I Chron. 15:24).

5. Ancestor of Jahaziel the prophet who prophesied for Moab and Ammon in the days of Jehoshaphat, the good king (II Chron. 20:14).

6. One of the overseers for the offerings in the Temple in the days of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:13).

7. A man who had taken a foreign wife in the time of Ezra (Ezra 10:25). Four different men are called Benaiah in Ezra (Ezra 10:25,30,35,43).

8. Father of Pelatiah who died as a judgment for teaching falsity in the days of Ezekiel (Ezek. 11:13). J.F.G.

BEN-AMMI (bĕn'ăm'ī, Heb. ben 'ammî, son of my people), son of the younger daughter of Lot (Gen. 19:38) whom she conceived through her own father following the destruction of Sodom. The progenitor of the Ammonites. Moab shares a like origin through the older sister (Gen. 19:37).

BENE-BERAK (bĕn'ĕ-bē'răk, Heb. benê beraq, Gr. Banebarak, sons of lightning), a town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:45). Its modern counterpart is represented by Ibn Ibrak, a few miles SE of Jaffa.

BENE-JAAKAN (bĕn'ĕ-jā'ā'kăn, Heb. benê ya'aqān), a desert encampment of the Israelites on their journey, placed immediately before Mosera, the site of Aaron's demise in Deuteronomy 10:6. The Bene-jaakans are sometimes identified with the Horites.

BENEVOLENCE, DUE (bĕn-ĕv'ō-lĕns, Gr. ophelé), so rendered by the KJV, I Corinthians 7:3. The more modern translations simply render the term Ophele as "due." Paul uses it to refer to obligation in the marriage bed. A euphemism for sex relations.

BENHADAD (bĕn-hā'dăd, Heb. ben hădhadh, Gr. huios Hader), the name is titular, as opposed to a proper name. As the rulers in Egypt bore the title Pharaoh, so the rulers of Syria bore the designation Benhadad, "son of (the god) Hadad." The Syrians believed their rulers were lineal descendants of the Syrian god Hadad, the deity of storm and thunder, to be identified with Rimmon (II Kings 5:18). There are three individuals in the OT called Benhadad: Benhadad I, Benhadad II, Benhadad III.

Benhadad I was a contemporary with Asa, king of Judah (I Kings 15:18). It is plausible that he is to be identified with Rezon, the founder of the kingdom of Damascus (I Kings 11:23-25). At the request of Asa of Judah, Benhadad severed his alliance with Baasha of Israel and aligned himself with the southern kingdom (I Kings 15:16ff). Though his assistance was of temporary value, the price which Asa was obliged to pay for such aid was tremendous, as Benhadad not only gained control of the treasures of Asa's kingdom, but was able through his alliance to extend his territory into the Hebrew kingdoms themselves. Asa was sternly reprimanded for this unfortunate alliance by the prophet, Hanani (II Chron. 16:7ff).

Benhadad II was in all probability the son of Benhadad I. He is the Hadadezer of the monuments. He was contemporary with Ahab of Israel, against whom he waged war, laying siege to the newly constructed capital, Samaria. Because of the ungracious terms of surrender demanded by Benhadad, Ahab refused to capitulate. With divine aid, Ahab was able utterly to rout the Syrian army at the battle of Aphek (I Kings 20:26ff). Ahab spared the life of Benhadad, thus never fully realizing the victory which otherwise would have been his.

Benhadad III was son of the usurper Hazael, hence not in direct line. His name was adopted from the illustrious name before him. He was a contemporary of Amaziah, king of Judah, and Jehoahaz of Israel. He reduced the fighting personnel of the nation till it was like the dust of the threshing (II Kings 13:7). It was at this time that God raised up to Israel a deliverer, most likely Ramman-Mirari III, as shown from an inscription. Joash was able to defeat Benhadad on three different occasions and to recover the cities of Israel (II Kings 13:25). Under Jeroboam II the northern kingdom restored its prestige, but Amos had already prophesied of the time when Israel and Samaria would go into captivity beyond Damascus (Amos 1:4ff and 5:27). J.F.G.

BENHAIL (bĕn'hā'īl, Heb. ben-hayil, son of strength), one of the princes sent out by Jehoshaphat on a "teaching-mission" to the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

BEN-HANAN (bĕn'hā'năn, Heb. ben-hānān, son of grace), a son of Shimon of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

BENINU (bĕ-nī'nū, Heb. benînû, our son), a Levite in post-exilic days, one of the co-signers of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:13).

BENJAMIN (Bĕn'jà-mĭn, Heb. binyāmîn, son of my right hand, Gen. 35:17ff), the youngest son of the patriarch Jacob whom his wife Rachel bore to him in her dying agony; named Benoni ("son of my sorrow") by Rachel, his mother, but renamed Benjamin ("son of my right hand") by his father Jacob. Of all the children of Jacob, he alone was born in Palestine, between Ephrathah and Bethel. Together with his elder brother, Joseph, he appears as a special object of parental love and devotion, no doubt due in part at least to the sad circumstances surrounding his birth. He seems to have played no part in the sale of Joseph into Egypt. The intercession on the part of Judah in the behalf of Benjamin (Gen. 44:18-34) is one of the most moving speeches in all of literature. No doubt, the brothers had been softened in their attitude as they had observed the continued suffering of their father over the fate of Joseph whom he believed irrevocably lost.

2. A great-grandson of Benjamin, son of Jacob (I Chron. 7:10).

3. One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:32).

BENJAMIN, TRIBE OF, named for Jacob's youngest son. On the basis of the first census taken after the exodus, the tribe numbered 35,400; at the second census, it numbered 45,600 (Num. 1:37; 26:41).

In the division of territory by Joshua among the 12 tribes, the portion for the tribe of Benjamin was assigned between Judah on the S and Ephraim on the N (Josh. 11:18ff). Benjamin thus occupied a strategic position commercially and militarily. Benjamin loyally participated in Deborah's rebellion against Sisera (Judg. 5:14). The civil war with Benjamin constitutes a sad and strange story (Judg. 19,20).

Saul, son of Kish, came from this tribe (I Sam. 9:1ff). After the death of Saul, there was tension and actual fighting between the forces of David and the men of Benjamin. Ishbosheth, Saul's weak son, was set up as David's rival (II Sam. 2:8). Shemei, of Bahurim, who cursed David, was a Benjamite (II Sam. 16:5,11). At the time of the schism, after the death of Solomon, however, the Benjamites threw in their lot with the tribe of Judah, and followed the Davidic house as represented by Rehoboam, as against Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, to the north. Benjamin was included in the restoration. Saul of Tarsus (Paul) was a member of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. 3:5). J.F.G.

BENO (bē'nō, Heb. benô, his son), a Levite, the son of Jaaziah (I Chron. 24:26,27).

BEN-ONI (bĕn'ō'nī, Heb. ben-'ônî, son of my sorrow), the other name given to Benjamin by his expiring mother Rachel (Gen. 35:18). See BENJAMIN.

BEN-ZOHETH (bĕn'zō'hĕth, Heb. ben-zôhēth, probably to be strong), son (or perhaps grandson) of Ishi of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

BEON (bē'ŏn, Num. 32:3, known also as Baal-Meon), a town built by the tribe of Reuben, which chose to remain on the E side of the Jordan. Under its new name it was allotted to the Reubenites after the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 13:17). See BAAL-MEON.

BEOR (See Balaam)

BERA (bē'rà, Heb. bera', gift), king of Sodom, defeated by Chedorlaomer in the days of Abraham at the battle of Siddim (Gen. 14:2,8).

BERACHAH (bĕr'à-kà, a blessing), one of the 30 volunteers who came to the aid of David at Ziklag when he fled from Saul. These men were known for their ability as archers (I Chron. 12:3).

BERACHAH, VALLEY OF (bĕr'à-kà, valley of blessing), the location where Jehoshaphat assembled his forces to offer praise to God for victory over the Ammonites and Moabites (II Chron. 20:26). It lies between Bethlehem and Hebron, not far from En-Gedi.

BERACHIAH (bĕr-à kī'à, Heb. berekhyâh, Jehovah blesses), sometimes Berechiah. 1. One of David's descendants (I Chron. 3:20).

2. Father of Asaph, the singer (I Chron. 6:39).

3. A Levite dwelling in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:16).

4. A custodian of the Ark (I Chron. 15:23).

5. An Ephraimite who protested the sale of Hebrews to their fellows (II Chron. 28:12).

6. The father of Meshullam, a builder during the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4,30; 6:18).

7. The father of Zechariah, a prophet of the restoration (Zech. 1:1,7).

BERAIAH (bĕr'ă-ī'à), a son of Shimei of the house of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:21).

BEREA or BEROEA (bĕr-ē'à, Gr. Béroia), a city in SW Macedonia (Acts 17:10-15; 20:4). Lying at the foot of Mt. Bermius, situated on a tributary of the Haliacmon, its origins appear lost in the mists of time. The Berea mentioned by Thucydides in all likelihood refers to another place. However, it is twice mentioned by Polybius (xxviii:8, xxvii:8). Following the battle of Pynda in 168 B.C., it surrendered to the Romans and was counted in the third of the four divisions of the empire of Alexander the Great. In the NT Paul and his party visited there on the second missionary journey. Here they found some open-minded people who were willing to study the teachings of Paul in the light of the Scripture. This happy situation was disrupted, however, when Jews from Thessalonica arrived, turning the Bereans against the message, thus forcing Paul to flee to Athens. Silas and Timothy remained there for a brief while, instructing the true believers.

BERED (bē'red, Heb. beredh, to be cold). Between Kadesh and Bered was the well-known well, Beer-la-hai-roi (Gen. 16:14). The various Targums render Bered as Shur, thus placing it in the vicinity of Kadesh-Barnea. That Bered is to be located in the region of the Negeb cannot be doubted. It was called Elusa by Ptolemy. It formed a connecting link between Palestine, Kadesh and Sinai.

BERI (bĕ'rī, Heb. bērî, wisdom), a descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:36).

BERIAH (bē-rī'à, Heb. berî'âh, meaning uncertain, perhaps gift or evil). 1. This name is given to a son of Asher the father of Heber and Malchiel (Gen. 46:17; I Chron. 7:30). The Beriites were descended from him (Num. 26:44).

2. Ephraim called one of his sons Beriah "because it went evil with his house" (I Chron. 7:23). Men of Gath had slain a number of men in the land in connection with a raid they had made on the cattle there. If Beriah means "a gift" he was thus named because in the face of Ephraim's losses, this son is regarded as a gift from the Lord.

3. One of the descendants of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:13,16). He with his brother "drove away the inhabitants of Gath." Apparently from him and Shema, his brother, were descended the people of Aijalon (I Chron. 8:13).

4. A Levite, the son of Shimei of the Gershonites. His children, being few, were counted with those of his brother, Jeush (I Chron. 23:7-11).

BERIITES (bē-rī'īts, Heb. berî'îm), a people mentioned only once in the Bible (Num. 26:44). It descended from Beriah, who, in turn, was from the tribe of Asher (Gen. 46:17).

BERITES (bē'rīts, Heb. bērîm, choice young men), mentioned only in II Samuel 20:14. During the revolt of Sheba, responding to his call, these people followed him.

BERNICE (bĕr-nī'sē, Gr. Berníke, victorious). Three times in the book of Acts reference is made to Bernice (Acts 25:13,23; 26:30), Herod Agrippa's eldest daughter (Acts 12:1), a very wicked woman who lived an incestuous life. According to Josepus, she was first married to Marcus. After his death she became the wife of Herod of Chalcis, her own uncle (Josephus, Ant. 19:5,1; 20:7,1-3). After Herod's death she had evil relations with Agrippa, her own brother, and with him listened to Paul's noble defense at Caesarea. Later she was married to King Ptolemy of Sicily. This marriage was of short duration, as she returned to Agrippa. She was later the mistress of Vespasian and Titus, who finally cast her aside.

BERODACH-BALADAN (bē-rō'dăk-băl'à-dăn, Marduk has given a son), a king of Babylon, called also Merodach-baladan, and referred to in Isaiah 39:1 as sending a letter and a present to king Hezekiah. Scripture records that this was done to congratulate him for his physical recovery. Archaeology reveals that this present was designed to urge him to rebel against Assyria.

BEROTHAH, BEROTHAI (bē-rō'thà, bē-rō'thī, Heb. bērôthāh, well or wells), a town situated between Hamath and Damascus (Ezek. 47:16). Probably the same as a city of Hadadezer which David took (II Sam. 8:8). It has now been identified as Bereitan N of Damascus.

BERYL (bêr'ĭl, Heb. tarshîsh, yellow jasper, Gr. béryllos), a stone mentioned several times in the OT and once in the NT (Rev. 21:20). Brown, Driver and Briggs feel this was a yellow or gold-covered stone. The Latin and Greek words used to translate this indicate uncertainty about the true nature of this stone. Fletcher's article in I.S.B.E. reflects the same uncertainty. It was one of the precious stones in the high priest's breastplate (Exod. 28:20; 39:13). Daniel uses it to describe the man in his vision (Dan. 10:6). Our modern beryl is beryllium aluminum silicate, but of the true nature of this ancient stone, little is known.

BESAI (bē'sī, Heb. bēsay, down-trodden), the founder of a family which returned to Jerusalem from Babylon under the leadership of Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:52).

BESODEIAH (bĕs'ō-dē'yà, Heb. besòdheyâh, in the counsel of Jehovah), the father of Meshullam, a builder under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:6).

BESOM (bē'zŭm, Heb. mat'ătē', broom), a word signifying the punishment that was to be meted out to Babylon (Isa. 14:23). It is an eastern metaphor for utter destruction.

BESOR (bē'sôr, Heb. besôr), a brook five miles S of Gaza where David left 200 of his men who were too faint to assist in pursuing the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:9,10,21). Some identify this as Wady en Sheriah, while others think it is Wady Ghazzah.

BETAH (bē'tà, confidence), a city of Syria which David captured and from which he took much brass, later used by Solomon in making furnishings for the temple (II Sam. 8:8). It is called "Tibhath" in I Chronicles 18:8. The site is unknown.

BETEN (bē'tĕn, Heb. beten, hollow), a city on Asher's border (Josh. 19:25). Its location is uncertain.

BETH (bĕth, house), the name by which the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet is known. The Hebrew uses it also for the number two. It is the most common OT word for house. It designates a more permanent dwelling than tent. It is used often in connection with other words to form proper names, the most common of which is Bethlehem.

BETHABARA (bĕth'ăb'à-rà, house of the ford), a place on the E bank of the Jordan where John baptized (John 1:28). The later and more reliable Greek manuscripts have rendered this word "Bethany." Care must be taken, however, not to confuse this with the city of the same name near Jerusalem, the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus. Its exact location is uncertain. Some identify it with Bethbarah (Judg. 7:24).

BETHANATH (bĕth'ā'năth, the temple of Anath), a city near Naphtali (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33) identified with the modern el-Baneh.

BETH-ANOTH (bĕth'a'nōth, house of Anoth), a town in the hill country of Judea (Josh. 15:59). It derives its name from Anoth, the goddess of the Canaanites.

BETHANY (bĕth'à-nē, Gr. Bethanía, house of unripe dates or figs). 1. Bethabara of John 1:28 (KJV) is in the best MSS. rendered "Bethany." From the best authorities we learn that nothing certain is known of its location except that it is beyond the Jordan where John was accomplishing his work (John 1:28).

2. Another city of this name, the home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus, situated about two miles SE of Jerusalem (John 11:18) on the eastern slope of Mount Olivet. Some refer to this as the Judean home of Jesus. It was here He raised Lazarus (John 11) and attended the feast at Simon's house (Matt. 26, Mark 14, and Luke 7). In the region of this city the ascension took place (Luke 24:50-51). It is known today as El-Azariyeh. The modern city contains the supposed tomb of Lazarus and house of Simon the leper.

BETH-ARABAH (bĕth'ăr'ā-bà, house of the desert), a town known also as Arabah (Josh. 18:18), probably located at the northern end of the Dead Sea. It was one of the six cities of Judah on the northern border of that tribe's territory.

BETHARAM (bĕth'ā'răm), a town belonging to Gad, E of the Jordan (Josh. 13:27). It is called also "Bethharam" (Num. 32:36), which some think is the more correct spelling.

BETHARBEL (bĕth'ār'bĕl, house of Arbel), probably a town in the tribe Naphtali, mentioned in Hosea 10:14 as the scene of a horrible destruction brought about by Shalmaneser. The event is used as illustrative of the disaster to come upon Ephraim. It hardly seems possible that this name is used here of the well-known city by this name on the Euphrates. It is the modern Irbid, located a few miles NW of Tiberias.

BETHAVEN (bĕth'ā'vĕn, Heb. bēth'āwen, house of vanity), a town located on the northern mountains of Benjamin (Josh. 18:12), beside Ai, E of Bethel (Josh. 7:2) and W of Michmash (I Sam. 13:5; 14:23). The name, though not the place mentioned by Amos (4:4; 5:5), is used by Hosea (4:15; 10:5, 8) to reveal the fallen condition of Bethel due to the idolatry introduced by King Jeroboam. The house of God (Bethel) had become the house of vanity and idolatry (Bethaven).

BETHAZMAVETH (bĕth'ăz-mā'vĕth, house of the strong one of death), a village belonging to Benjamin mentioned in Nehemiah 7:28. Forty-two former inhabitants of this city accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon on his return to Jerusalem.

BETH BAAL MEON (bĕth bā'ăl mē'ŏn, Heb. bêth ba'al me'ôn, house of Baal-meon), a place in the territory assigned to Reuben, E of the Jordan (Josh. 13:17). This is the same as Baal-meon (Num. 32:38) and Beon (Num. 32:3). Jeremiah speaks of it as belonging to Moab (Jer. 48:23), and this is confirmed by the appearance of this name on the Moabite Stone. It is identified today with the ruins of Ma'in in N Moab.

BETHBARAH (bĕth'bâr'à, Heb. bêthbārâh, house of the ford), one of the important fords across the Jordan. It has never been identified, though some identify it with Bethabarah. The Midianites were expected to use this as they escaped from Gideon. This is the reason for Gideon's instruction to his messengers to "take before them the waters unto Beth-barah" (Judg. 7:24). Here Jephtha slew the Ephraimites (Judg. 12:4) and perhaps it is the place where Jacob crossed (Gen. 32:22).

BETH-BIREI (bĕth'bĭr'ī, house of my creator), a town of Simeon (I Chron. 4:31) in the southern part of Judah. Joshua refers to this place as Bethlebaoth "abode of lions" (Josh. 19:6) and as Lebaoth (Josh. 15:32). It has not yet been identified.

BETHCAR (bĕth'kär, house of sheep), a place W of Mizpah to which Israel pursued the Philistines. They "smote them, until they came under Bethcar" (I Sam. 7:11). It has never been identified. In this area the stone was set up called Ebenezer (I Sam. 7:12).

BETH DAGON (bĕth'dā'gŏn, house of Dagon), a town located in the shephelah of Judah. Mentioned in Joshua 15:41. It was five miles from Lydda and has been identified as Khirbet Dajun. The name suggests the worship of Dagon the god of the Philistines, revealing how far this worship had been extended beyond Philistine territory. This name was also used of a town on the border of Asher (Josh. 19:27).

BETH-DIBLATHAIM (bĕth' dĭb'lă-thā'ĭm, house of a double cake of figs), a Moabitish town known also as Almondiblathaim (Num. 33:46) and Diblath (Ezek. 6:14). Jeremiah speaks of it (Jer. 48:22) and it is mentioned on the Moabite Stone. It is not certainly identified.

BETHEL (bĕth'ĕl, Heb. bêth-'ēl, house of God). 1. A town originally known as "Luz," located 12 miles N of Jerusalem (Gen. 28:19), W of Ai. It was near this spot that Abraham stopped on his way to the Negeb and offered a sacrifice (Gen. 12:8; 13:3). Jacob called Luz "Bethel" (Gen. 28:10-22), since it was here that God met him and confirmed the Abrahamic covenant to him. Jacob revisited this town when he returned from Padan-aram in response to the command of God (Gen. 35:1). Here he built an altar and worshiped, calling the place "El-bethel" (Gen. 35:7). Here Jacob buried Deborah, the nurse of Rebekah who had died (Gen. 35:8). It was a logical stopping place, for it lay on a well-known route running from the Plain of Esdraelon to Beersheba.

Bethel seems to have been a Canaanite city originally, and after the conquest by Joshua was given to the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. 18:21-22). Joseph's descendants, under the guidance of the Lord, went up against Bethel and took it (Judg. 1:22-26). It remained on the southern border of Ephraim. During the period of the Judges, because of the wickedness of the tribe of Ephraim, the Israelites marched against them. They stopped at Bethel to ascertain God's will (Judg. 20:18). The ark abode there at this time (Judg. 20:26-28). To this city Samuel went from time to time to conduct business and to worship (I Sam. 7:16; 10:3).

At a later period when the kingdom was divided, Jeroboam, in order to nullify the influence of Jerusalem as the center of religious activity for the people, chose Bethel as one of the two centers in which he set up golden calves (I Kings 12:26-30). Here he sacrificed to the calves and placed priests to minister in the high places (I Kings 12:32). Because of these and other sins, Amos cried out against this city (Amos 3:14; 4:4-6). Hosea too pronounced judgment on this city, even calling it "Bethaven," "the house of idols" (Hos. 4:15). Here the Assyrian priest dwelt that he might teach the people whom Assyria had placed in the land (II Kings 17:27-28). It was not until Josiah became king that this idolatry was removed from Bethel and the true worship of Jehovah established (II Kings 23:15-23). When the Jews returned from the Babylonian captivity, Ezra and Nehemiah both record that some returned to Bethel (Ezra 2:28; Neh. 7:32) and, as one might suppose, they are listed as Benjamites (Neh. 11:31).

Bethel is mentioned in the apocryphal books as being fortified by Bacchides (I Macc. 9:50).

Bethel has now been identified as Beitin. The ruins cover several acres on a low hill between two wadies which unite and descend into Suweinit towards the SE. Abundant stones are still seen in the area not unlike those Jacob set up in this city for his pillow. Albright has done extensive excavation on this site and writes of many archaeological confirmations of the Biblical history of this place.

2. Another city mentioned in southern Judah (I Sam. 30:27) is also called Bethel. Joshua refers to it as "Bethul" (Josh. 19:4). It is noted again as "Bethuel" (I Chron. 4:30). This site has not yet been identified. H.Z.C.

BETHEMEK (bĕth'ē'mĕk, house of the valley), a city mentioned in Joshua 19:27 in the valley of Jiphthahel on the edge of Asher's territory. It is not yet identified.

BETHER (bē'thêr, Heb. bether, separation), a range of mountains mentioned in the Song of Solomon (2:17). The RSV renders this "rugged mountains," indicating that a proper name was not intended. Perhaps the "mountains of spices" (8:14) is a reference to the same place.

BETHESDA (bĕ-thĕs'dà, Gr. Bethesda, house of grace), a spring-fed pool at Jerusalem, surrounded by five porches (John 5:1-16). Sick folk waited to step down into these waters which were thought to have healing properties. The fourth verse of the KJV, mentioning a regular troubling of the waters by the descent of an angel, is omitted in the RV, since evidence from the best texts does not support this statement. Here Jesus healed a man who had been sick for 38 years.

In 1888, while the church of St. Anne in NE Jerusalem was being repaired, a reservoir was discovered. On the wall is a faded fresco which depicts an angel troubling the water. It is thought, therefore, that this best fits the description in the New Testament. The reservoir is cut from the rock and is rain-filled. It is about 55 feet in length and 12 feet in width. It is approached by a flight of steps both steep and winding.

BETHEZEL (bĕth'ē'zĕl, a house adjoining), a town in southern Judea in the Philistine plain (Mic. 1:11). For a time this was thought to be the same as Azel (Zech. 14:5), but now has been identified with Deir el-Asal.

BETHGADER (bĕth'gā'dêr, house of the wall), a place in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:51), probably to be identified with Geder (Josh. 12:13).

BETHGAMUL (bĕth'gā'mŭl, house of recompense), a Moabitish city (Jer. 48:23). It is now identified with Khirbet Jemeil. It has been cited as a good example of an unwalled town.

BETH-GILGAL (bĕth'gĭl'găl, Heb. bêth hagilgal, house of Gilgal), a place from which singers came to the dedication of the Jerusalem wall. It is probably to be identified with Gilgal (Neh. 12:27-29).

BETHHACCEREM (bĕth'hă-kē'rĕm, house of the vineyard), a Judean town (Neh. 3:14), ruled by Malchiah. Jeremiah notes it as a vantage site for signaling in time of danger (Jer. 6:1). It is now identified with a place on top of Jebel 'Ali called 'Ain Karim. On top of this hill are cairns which are thought to have been used for beacons.

BETH-HARAN (bĕth'hā'răn, house of the mountaineer), a fenced city built by the Gadites E of the Jordan (Num. 32:36). It is the same as Beth-haram.

BETH-HOGLAH (bĕth'hŏg'là, house of a partridge), a place belonging to Benjamin lying between Jericho and the Jordan (Josh. 15:6; 18:19, 21). It is identified now with Ain Hajlah.

BETHHORON (bĕth'hō'rŏn, Heb. bêth-hôrōn, place of a hollow), two towns, the upper and the lower (Josh. 16:3,5; I Chron. 7:24; II Chron. 8:5), separated by a few miles. Beit Ur el foka ("the upper") is 800 ft. higher than Beit Ur el tahta ("the lower"). Built by Sherah, a granddaughter of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:24), Bethhoron lay on the boundary line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. 16:3,5), on the road from Gibeon to Azekah (Josh. 10:10,11). It was assigned to Ephraim and given to the Kohathites (Josh. 21:22).

For centuries a strategic route into the heart of Judea went up from Joppa (modern Jaffa) on the coast through the Valley of Ajalon (modern Yalo), ascending through the two Bethhorons to Gibeon (four miles distant) on its way to Jerusalem. It was in this valley that Joshua commanded the sun and moon to stand still while he discomfited the Amorite kings in his defense of the Gibeonites. These five kings he chased over the pass to Bethhoron (Josh. 10:10-13). Along this route the Philistines fled after they had been defeated at Michmash (I Sam. 14:31), and it was there that Judas Maccabeus overthrew the army of Seron, a prince of Syria (I Macc. 3:13-24). The importance of the Bethhoron pass as a key route into Palestine explains the fortification of its towns by Solomon (II Chron. 8:5). It is no longer important, but great foundation stones can be seen there yet today.

BETH-LE-APHRAH (bĕth'lē-ăf'rà, Heb. bêth-le'-aphrâh, house of dust), a town, site unknown; "In the house of Aphrah roll thyself in the dust" (Mic. 1:10).

BETHLEBAOTH (bĕth'lē-bā'ŏth, Heb. bêth levā'-ôth, house of lionesses), a town of Simeon (Josh. 19:6), called Beth-birei in I Chronicles 4:31.

BETHLEHEM (bĕth'lē-hĕm, Heb. bêth-lehem, house of bread). 1. A town five miles SW of Jerusalem, 2550 ft. above sea level, in the hill country of Judea, on the main highway to Hebron and Egypt. In Jacob's time it was called Ephrath ("fruitful") and was the burial place of Rachel (Gen. 35:16,19; 48:7). After the conquest of Canaan it was called Bethlehem-judah (Ruth 1:1) to distinguish it from Bethlehem 2 (see below). It was the home of Ibzan, the tenth judge (Judg. 12:8-10); of Elimelech, father-in-law of Ruth (Ruth 1:1,2), as well as her husband Boaz (2:1,4). Here their great-grandson David kept his father's sheep and was anointed king by Samuel (I Sam. 16:13, 15). Hence, it was known as "the city of David" (Luke 2:4,11). It was once occupied by a Philistine garrison (II Sam. 23:14-16), later fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:6).

In Jeremiah's time (41:17) the caravan inn of Chimham (see II Sam. 19:37-40) near Bethlehem was the usual starting-place for Egypt. The inn mentioned in Luke 2 was a similar one and may have been the same. Here the Messiah was born (Matt. 2:1, Luke 2), for which this town that was "little among the thousands of Judah" (Mic. 5:2) achieved its great fame. Its male children under two years of age were slain in Herod's attempt to kill the King of the Jews (Matt. 2:16).

Justin Martyr, second century, said that our Lord's birth took place in a cave close to the village. Over this traditional manger-site the emperor Constantine (330 A.D.) and Helena his mother built the Church of the Nativity. Rebuilt more sumptuously by Justinian in the sixth century, part of the original structure still stands, and it is a popular attraction for tourists today. The grotto of the nativity is beneath a crypt, 39 ft. long, 11 wide, and 9 high, hewn out of the rock and lined with marble. A rich altar is over the supposed site of the Saviour's birth. In a part of this cave Jerome, the Latin scholar, spent thirty years translating the Bible into Latin.

Modern Bethlehem is a village of less than ten thousand inhabitants. The slopes abound in figs, vines, almonds, and olives. The shepherds' fields are still seen to the NE.

2. A town of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15), now the village of Beit Lahm, seven miles NW of Nazareth.

BETH-LEHEM-JUDAH (See Bethlehem)

BETH-LE-JESHIMOTH or BETHJESIMOTH (bĕth'jĕsh'ĭ-mŏth, Heb. bĕth ha-yeshīmōth, place of deserts), a town E of the mouth of the Jordan, next to the last camp of the Israelites (Num. 33:49). It was assigned to Reuben (Josh. 13:20).

BETH-MAACHAH (bĕth'mā'à-kà, Heb. bêth ma'akhâh), a town to which Joab pursued Sheba (II Sam. 20:14,15).

BETHMARCABOTH (bĕth'mär'kà-bŏth, Heb. bĕth hamarkāvōth, the house of chariots), a town of Simeon in the extreme S of Judah (Josh. 19:5; I Chron. 4:31). Possibly one of the cities which Solomon built for his chariots (I Kings 9:19).

BETH-MEON (bĕth'mē'ŏn), a city of Moab (Jer. 48:23), same as Beth-baal-meon (Josh. 13:17).

BETHNIMRAH (bĕth'nĭm'rà, Heb. bêth nimrâh, house of leopard), a fenced city of Gad E of the Jordan (Num. 32:3,36). The LXX reading, "Beth-anabra," in Joshua 13:27 has led some to identify this with Bethabara in the NT, whose abundant waters were the scene of John's baptizing (John 1:28).

BETHPALET or BETH-PHELET (bĕth'pā'lĕt or bĕth'fē'lĕt, Heb. bêth pelet, house of escape), a town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:27; Neh. 11:26).

BETHPAZZEZ (bĕth'păz'ĕz), a town of Issachar (Josh. 19:21).

BETHPEOR (bĕth'pē'ôr, Heb. bêth pe'ôr, house of Peor), one of Israel's last camp sites (Deut. 3:29; 4:46). Here Moses was buried (Deut. 34:6). A possession of Reuben (Josh. 13:20).

BETHPHAGE (bĕth'fà-jē, Heb. bêth paghâh, house of unripe figs), a village on the mount of Olives, on the road going E from Jerusalem to Jericho. The traditional site is NW of Bethany, which the NT mentions twice (Mark 11:1-11; Luke 19:28-40). Here the colt was obtained for the Palm Sunday entry into Jerusalem (Matt. 21:1-11). It was in the vicinity of Bethphage that Jesus cursed the fruitless fig tree (Matt. 21:18-20; Mark 11:12-14,20-21).

BETHRAPHA (bĕth'rā'fà, Heb. bêth rāphā), son of Eshton in the genealogy of Judah (I Chron. 4:12).

BETHREHOB (bĕth'rē'hŏb, Heb. bêth rehôv, house of Rechob), an Aramean town and district near the valley containing the town Laish or Dan (Judg. 18:28). Probably identical with Rehob (Num. 13:21), the northern limit of the spies' search, it is thought to be the modern Hunin, site of a Crusaders' castle-fortress commanding the Huleh plain. The Ammonites, having needlessly provoked David, hired the men of Bethrehob in a futile defense against David's attack (II Sam. 10).

BETHSAIDA (bĕth'sā'ĭ-dà, Gr. Bethsaidá, house of fishing). 1. A village close to the W side of the sea of Tiberias, in the land of Gennesaret, where Jesus sent His disciples by boat after He had fed the 5000 (Mark 6:45-53). John says that they headed for Capernaum (6:17), but when they were blown off their course they landed in Gennesaret and then went to Capernaum. Possibly, therefore, this Bethsaida was close to Capernaum and may have been its fishing district next to the lake. This would explain how Peter and Andrew are said to be of Bethsaida (John 1:44; 12:21), whereas Mark mentions their house close to the synagogue in Capernaum (1:29). Along with Chorazin and Capernaum, Jesus upbraided Bethsaida for unbelief (Matt. 11:20-23; Luke 10:13-15).

2. Another Bethsaida, NE of the sea of Tiberias and scene of the feeding of the 5000 (Luke 9:10). Jesus restored sight to a blind man in Bethsaida (Mark 8:22), which is on the E side of the lake, since Jesus had just come from Dalmanutha (same as Magdala, Matt. 15:39) on the W side (Mark 8:10-13). This Bethsaida was a village in Gaulonitis (now Jaulan) and enlarged to be the capital by Philip the tetrarch who called it Julias, after Julia, the daughter of Emperor Augustus. Its site is uncertain, but some identify it with et Tel, E of the Jordan and a mile from the sea of Tiberias, from which it rises to a height of 100 feet.

BETHSHAN or BETHSHEAN (bĕth'shăn or bĕth'shē'ăn, Heb. bêth-shan or bêth-sheān, house of quiet), a city of Manasseh in the territory of Issachar, but one out of which the Canaanites could not be driven (Josh. 17:11,12; Judg. 1:27). It lay 14 miles S of the Sea of Galilee, overlooking the plain of Esdraelon in the valley of Jezreel. After Saul died in Mount Gilboa, the Philistines fastened his body to the wall of Bethshan and put his armor in the temple of Ashtaroth as trophies of their victory (I Sam. 31:8-12). Later, the men of Jabesh-gilead stole the bones of Saul and his sons from the street of Bethshan, but David recovered them and gave them a proper burial (II Sam. 21:12-14).

Today the site of the city is a mound, called Tell el-Husn ("Mound of the Fortress"), located near the Arab village of Beisan (note the similarity to Bethshan). Excavations by the University of Pennsylvania, 1921-33, have yielded rich finds, dating the history of the city from 3500 B.C. to the Christian era. A stratification of 18 levels of debris and ruined houses can be seen as evidence of repeated destructions and eras of rebuilding. Because of its commanding location, it was fortified with double walls and was a strong Egyptian outpost from the 15th to the 12th century B.C. Temples and monument-inscriptions by three Pharaohs were discovered which date back to this time. The excavators have shown that Bethshan was destroyed between 1050 and 1000 B.C., the approximate time of King David, who may have destroyed it. Four Canaanite temples were unearthed at the site, one of which has been identified with the "house of Ashtaroth" (I Sam. 31:10), and another with the temple of Dagon where the Philistines fastened Saul's head (I Chron. 10:10). In Solomon's reign, Bethshan was included in one of his commissary districts (I Kings 4:12). A.M.R.

BETHSHEMESH (bĕth'shĕ'mĕsh, Heb. bêth-shemesh, house of the sun). 1. A town of NW Judah near the Philistine border (Josh. 15:10; I Sam. 6:12). It was a priests' city given by Judah to the Levites (Josh. 21:16; I Chron. 6:59). The Philistines had been plagued for their seizure of the ark of God. Anxious to be rid of it, they put the ark on a cart pulled by two milking cows and tied their calves at home (I Sam. 6). They expected the cows to return instinctively to their young, but if they left them behind, this would be a sure sign of guidance by Israel's God and of His influence on the Philistines' misery. The animals left Ekron and headed for Bethshemesh seven miles away, not turning aside until they came to the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite where the ark was received and a sacrifice made to the Lord. Here, too, many died for their irreverence toward the ark; but perhaps only 70 were smitten instead of 50,070 (I Sam. 6:19); the latter figure may be due to an error in later texts (see Keil & Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Books of Samuel, p. 68).

Bethshemesh was in a commissary district of Solomon (I Kings 4:9). Here Joash king of Israel encountered Amaziah of Judah and took him prisoner (II Kings 14:11-13; II Chron. 25:21-23). Irshemesh ("city of the sun," Josh. 19:41) may be the same city. Today the name is preserved as Ain Shems, SE of Gezer. Implements of the late Canaanite and early Israelite period have been discovered here such as pottery, weapons, and jewelry. Quantities of pottery suggest a later Philistine occupancy (II Chron. 28:18).

2. A city of Issachar (Josh. 19:22).

3. A city of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33) from which the Canaanites were not driven.

4. An idol city in Egypt (Jer. 43:13), the Egyptian city On, the Greek Heliopolis. So many cities of the same name show how widespread was sun worship. A.M.R.

BETHSHITTA (bĕth'shĭt'ȧ, Heb. bêth ha-shittâh, house of the acacia), a town in Zererath near Jordan to which the Midianites fled after their overthrow by Gideon (Judg. 7:22).

BETHTAPPUA (bĕth'tăp'ū-ȧ, Heb. bêth-tappûah, house of apples), a town in the hill part of Judah (Josh. 15:53). Tappuah was a son of Hebron (I Chron. 2:43). Now Taffuh, five miles W of Hebron, surrounded by fruitful terraces.

BETHUEL or BETHUL (bē-thū'ĕl or bĕth'ŭl, Heb. bethû'ēl or bethûl, abode of God.). 1. Son of Nahor and Milcah, nephew of Abraham, and father of Rebekah and Laban (Gen. 22:22,23; 24:15,24,47; 28:2). His significance in the arrangements for his daughter's marriage is conspicuous. When Abraham's servant asked Rebekah if there was room at her father's house, she ran and told those in her mother's house (Gen. 24:28). Her brother invited him in, not Bethuel, the natural one to do so. Laban and Bethuel (the son mentioned first) acknowledged his mission to be from the Lord. Presents were given to Rebekah, and to her mother and brother, not her father; and when the bride left home, it was not as a daughter but as a "sister" (24:55-60). These many references make Bethuel seem incapable, whether from age or imbecility, to manage his own affairs.

2. A town in the S of Simeon (Josh. 19:4; I Chron. 4:30) and same as Chesil (Josh. 15:30).

BETHUL (See Bethuel)

BETHZUR (bĕth'zûr, Heb. bêth-tsûr, house of rock), one of Judea's strongest natural fortresses in the mountains of Judah, near Halhul and Gedor (Josh. 15:58). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:7). Nehemiah, son of Azbuk and ruler of half of Beth-zur, helped to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:16). Known as Bethsura in Maccabean times, it was an important military stronghold, where Judas Maccabeus defeated the Greek army under Lysias (I Macc. 4:28-34). It is now Beit Sur, four miles N of Hebron, near the main road from Hebron to Jerusalem.

BETONIM (bĕt'ō-nĭm, Heb. betônîm), a town of Gad, E of the Jordan (Josh. 13:26).

BEULAH (bwū'lȧ, Heb. be'ûlâh, married), a poetic name for the land of Israel in its future restored condition (Isa. 62:4). The word is the feminine passive participle from the verb ba'al ("to be a lord," or "to marry"), and hence could almost be rendered "lorded" (cf. I Pet. 3:6; Isa. 54:4-6).

BEZAI (bē'zā-ī). 1. Head of a family of 323 men who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:17; Neh. 7:23).

2. Probably a member of the same family a century later (Neh. 10:18).

BEZALEEL (bē-zăl'ē-ĕl, in the shadow of God). 1. Son of Uri, son of Hur of the tribe of Judah, whom the Lord called by name (Exod. 31:2; 35:30) and by his Spirit empowered to work in metals, wood, and stone for the tabernacle. He had as a helper Aholiab (ASV Oholiab) of the tribe of Dan, whom God similarly empowered for the work in textiles.

2. A descendant of Pahath-moab, an official of Moab, who in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah was compelled to give up his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

BEZEK (bē'zĕk, scattering, sowing). 1. A town in the territory of Judah taken for Israel under Joshua from the Canaanites and Perizzites of whom more than 10,000 had congregated there. Its king had either the name or more probably the title "Adonibezek" (i.e. lord of Bezek). The ruin Bezkah, about 20 miles NW of Jerusalem, may mark the spot (Judg. 1:4,5).

2. The place where Saul numbered his forces before going to relieve Jabesh-gilead (I Sam. 11:8), about 14 miles NE of Samaria.

BEZER (bē'zêr, Heb. betser, strong). 1. A city in the wilderness plateau E of the Dead Sea and in the tribe of Reuben, set apart as a city of refuge (Deut. 4:43) and as a home for Merarites of the tribe of Levi (Josh. 21:36). Mesha, king of Moab, on the Moabite stone, claims that he fortified it.

2. One of the mighty men of the tribe of Asher, known only as a son of Zophah (I Chron. 7:37).

BIBLE. The collection of books recognized and used by the Christian church as the inspired record of God's revelation of Himself and of His will to mankind.

1. Names. The word "Bible" is from Gr. biblia, pl. of biblion, diminutive of biblos (book), from byblos (papyrus). In ancient times papyrus was used in making the paper from which books were manufactured. The words biblion and biblia are used in the OT (LXX) and the Apocrypha for the Scriptures (Dan. 9:2; I Macc. 1:56; 3:48; 12:9). By about the fifth century the Greek Church Fathers applied the term biblia to the whole Christian Scriptures. Later the word passed into the western church, and although it is really a plural neuter noun, it came to be used in the Latin as a feminine singular. Thus "The Books" became by common consent "The Book."

In the NT the OT is usually referred to as "the scriptures" (Matt. 21:42; 22:29; Luke 24:32; John 5:39; Acts 18:24). Other terms used are "scripture" (Acts 8:32; Gal. 3:22), the "holy scriptures" (Rom. 1:2; II Tim. 3:15, KJV), and "sacred writings" (II Tim. 3:15, RV).

The plural term biblia stresses the fact that the Bible is a collection of books; that the word came to be used in the singular emphasizes the fact that behind these many books there lies a wonderful unity; that no qualifying adjective stands before it points to the uniqueness of this book.

The names "Old" and "New Testament" have been used since the close of the second century to distinguish the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. "Testament" is used in the NT (KJV) to render the Greek word diatheke (Latin testamentum), which in classical usage meant "a will," but in the LXX and in the NT was used to translate the Hebrew word berith, "a covenant." Strictly, therefore, "Old" and "New Testament" mean "Old" and "New Covenant," the reference being to the covenants God made with His elect people in the two dispensations. The name Novum Testamentum occurs first in Tertullian (A.D. 190-220).

2. Languages. Most of the OT is written in Hebrew, the language spoken by the Israelites in Canaan before the Babylonian Captivity, but after the "Return" giving way to Aramaic, a related dialect generally spoken throughout SW Asia. A few parts of the OT are in Aramaic (Ezra 4:8-7:18; 7:12-26; Jer. 10:11; Dan. 2:4-7:28). The ancient Hebrew text consisted only of consonants, since the Hebrew alphabet had no written vowels. Vowel signs were invented by the Jewish Masoretic scholars in the sixth century and later.

Except for a few words and sentences, the NT was composed in Greek, the language of ordinary intercourse in the Hellenistic world. The difference of NT Greek from classical Greek and the Greek of the LXX used to be a cause of bewilderment to scholars, but the discovery, since the 1890's, of many thousands of papyri documents in the sands of Egypt has shown that the Greek of the NT is identical with the Greek generally spoken in the Mediterranean world in the first century. The papyri have thrown a great deal of light upon the meaning of many NT words.

3. Compass and Divisions. The Protestant Bible in general use today contains 66 books, 39 in the OT and 27 in the NT. The 39 OT books are the same as those recognized by the Palestinian Jews in NT times. The Greek-speaking Jews of this period, on the other hand, recognized as Scripture a larger number of books, and the Greek OT (LXX) which passed from them to the early Christian Church contained, in addition to the 39 books of the Hebrew canon, a number of others, of which seven — Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, I and II Maccabees, plus the two so-called additions to Esther and Daniel — are regarded as canonical by the Roman Catholic Church, which therefore has a canon of 46 books. Jews today consider canonical only the 39 books accepted by Protestants.

In the Hebrew Bible the books are arranged in three groups, the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings. The Law comprises the Pentateuch. The Prophets include the Former Prophets: Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings; and the Latter Prophets: Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Minor Prophets. The Writings take in the remaining books: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Chronicles. The total is traditionally reckoned as 24, but these correspond to the Protestant 39, since in the latter reckoning the minor prophets are counted as 12 books, and Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra-Nehemiah as two each. In ancient times there were also other enumerations, notably one by Josephus, who held 22 books as canonical (after the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet), but his 22 are the same as the 24 in the traditional reckoning.

In the LXX both the number of books and the arrangement of them differ from the Hebrew Bible. It is evident that the NT writers were familiar with the LXX, which contained the Apocrypha, but no quotation from any book of the Apocrypha is found in their pages. The books of the Apocrypha are all late in date and are in Greek, though at least one (Sirach) had a Hebrew origin. The more scholarly of the Church Fathers (Melito, Origen, Athanasius, Jerome, etc.) did not regard the Apocrypha as canonical, although they permitted their use for edification.

The Protestant OT does not follow the grouping of either the Hebrew canon or the LXX. It has, first, the five books of the Pentateuch; then the 11 historical books, beginning with Joshua and ending with Esther; after that what are often called the poetical books: Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon; and finally the prophets, first the major and then the minor.

All branches of the Christian Church are agreed on the NT canon. The grouping of the books is a natural one: first the four Gospels; then the one historical book of the NT, the Acts of the Apostles; after that the Epistles, first the Epistles of Paul and then the General Epistles; and finally the Revelation.

4. Text. Although the Bible was written over a period of approximately 1,400 years, from the time of Moses to the end of the first century A.D., its text has come to us in a remarkable state of preservation. It is of course not identical with the text that left the hands of the original writers. Scribal errors have necessarily crept in. Until the invention of printing in the middle of the 15th century, all copies of the Scriptures were made by hand. There is evidence that the ancient Jewish scribes copied the books of the OT with extreme care. The recently discovered Dead Sea Scrolls, some going as far back as the second and third centuries B.C., contain either whole books or fragments of all but one (Esther) of the OT books; and they bear witness to a text remarkably like the Hebrew text left by the Masoretes. The Greek translation of the OT, the Septuagint, begun about 250 B.C. and completed about 100 years later, although it differs in places from the Hebrew text current today, is also a valuable witness to the accuracy of the OT text.

In the NT the evidence for the reliability of the text is almost embarrassingly large, and includes about 4500 Greek manuscripts, dating from about A.D. 125 to the invention of printing; versions, the Old Latin and Syriac going back to about A.D. 150; and quotations of Scripture in the writings of the Church Fathers, beginning with the end of the first century. The superabundance of textual evidence for the NT may be appreciated when it is realized that very few manuscripts of ancient Greek and Latin classical authors have survived, and these are all late in date. Among the oldest manuscripts of the Greek NT that have come down to us are the John Rylands fragment of the Gospel of John (c. 125); Papyrus Bodmer II, a manuscript of the Gospel of John dating c. 200; the Chester Beatty Papyri, consisting of three codices containing the Gospels and Acts, most of the Pauline Epistles, and the Revelation, dating from c. 200; and Codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus, both written about 350.

5. Chapters and Verses. The books of the Bible originally had no chapters or verses. For convenience of reference, Jews of pre-Talmudic times divided the OT into sections corresponding to our chapters and verses. The chapter divisions we use today were made by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1228. The division of the NT into its present verses is found for the first time in an edition of the Greek NT published in 1551 by the Paris printer, Robert Stephens, who also, in 1555, brought out an edition of the Vulgate which was the first edition of the Bible to appear with our present chapters and verses. The first English Bible to be so divided was the Genevan edition of 1560.

6. Translations. The Old and New Testaments appeared very early in translations. The OT was translated into Greek (the LXX) between 250-150 B.C., and other translations in Greek appeared soon after the beginning of the Christian era. Parts, at least, of the OT were rendered into Syriac as early as the first century; and a Coptic translation appeared probably in the third century. The NT was translated into Latin and Syriac c. 150 and into Coptic c. 200. In subsequent centuries versions appeared in the Armenian, Gothic, Ethiopic, Georgian, Arabic, Persian, and Slavonic languages. The Bible, in whole or in part, is now available in more than 1100 different languages and dialects. Many languages have been reduced to writing in order that the Bible might be translated into them in written form; and this work still goes on in many lands.

7. Message. Although the Bible consists of many different books written over a long period of time by a great variety of writers, most of whom did not know one another, it has an organic unity that can be explained only by assuming, as the book itself claims, that its writers were inspired by the Holy Spirit to give God's message to man. The theme of this message is the same in both Testaments, the redemption of man. The OT tells about the origin of man's sin and the preparation God made for the solution of this problem through His own Son the Messiah. The NT describes the fulfilment of God's redemptive plan; the four Gospels telling about the Messiah's coming; the Acts of the Apostles describing the origin and growth of the Church, God's redeemed people; the Epistles giving the meaning and implication of the Incarnation; and the Revelation showing how some day all of history will be consummated in Christ. The two Testaments form two volumes of one work. The first is incomplete without the second; and the second cannot be understood without the first. Together they are God's revelation to man of the provision He has made for his salvation.

BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS. In the earliest days of English Christianity the only known Bible was the Latin Vulgate, made by Jerome between A.D. 383 and 405. This could be read only by the clergy and by monks, who alone were familiar with the language. In A.D. 670 Caedmon, a monk at Whitby, produced in Old English a metrical version of some of the more interesting narratives of the OT. The first straightforward translation of any part of the Bible into the language of the people was the Psalter, made c. A.D. 700 by Aldhelm, first bishop of Sherborne in Dorset. Some parts of the NT were translated into English by Bede, the learned monk of Jarrow, author of the famous Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation. According to a letter of his disciple Cuthbert, Bede was engaged in translating the Gospel of John into English on his deathbed. It is not certain whether he completed it, but, unfortunately, his translation has not survived. King Alfred (871-901) produced during his reign English versions of parts of the Old and New Testaments, including a part of the Psalter. Some Latin Gospels which survive from this period have written between the lines what are known as "glosses," a word-for-word translation of the text into English, without regard to the idiom and usage of the vernacular. From the same period as these glosses come what are known as the Wessex Gospels, the first independent Old English version of the Gospels. Towards the end of the tenth century Aelfric, archbishop of Canterbury, translated parts of the first seven books of the OT, as well as parts of other OT books.

For nearly three centuries after the Norman conquest in 1066 the uncertain conditions of the language prevented any real literary progress, but some manuscripts survive of translations of parts of the Bible into Anglo-Norman French. About the beginning of the 13th century an Augustinian monk named Orm or Ormin produced a poetical version of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles called the Ormulum. From the first half of the 14th century there survive two prose translations of the Psalter, done in two different dialects; and from the end of the 14th century, a version of the principal NT epistles, apparently made, however, not for the use of the common people, but for monks and nuns. There was no thought as yet of providing ordinary layfolk with the Bible in their own tongue. It was Wycliffe who first entertained this revolutionary idea. And it was Wycliffe who first made the whole Bible available in English.

John Wycliffe. Born in Yorkshire about the year 1320, Wycliffe stands out as one of the most illustrious figures of the 14th century. This was a period of transition, neither the Middle Ages nor the Reformation — a kind of middle ground between the two. The old order was struggling with the new. Throughout the whole of this century the prestige of the Roman Catholic Church was very low. The "Babylonian captivity" of the popes at Avignon (1309-1378) was followed by the "Great Schism," when for 40 years there were two rival popes, one at Rome and the other at Avignon. In the struggle between the papacy and the English parliament over the papal tribute, Wycliffe sided with the parliament. The outstanding Oxford theologian of his day and an ardent ecclesiastical reformer, he is called the "Morning-star of the Reformation." He was convinced that the surest way of defeating Rome was to put the Bible into the hands of the common people, and therefore decided to make such a translation available. Under his auspices, the NT came out in 1380, and the OT two years later. It is uncertain exactly how much of the translation was done by Wycliffe himself. A number of scholars worked with him on the project, one of them, Nicholas Hereford, doing the greater part of the OT. The translation was made from the Latin, not from the original languages. Since printing was not known until the next century, copies were made by hand, and were naturally very expensive. About 170 are at present in existence. It was never really printed until 1850, when the Oxford Press brought it out. The original manuscript in the handwriting of at least five different men is preserved in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. To help him in his efforts for reform, Wycliffe organized a kind of religious order of poor preachers, called Lollards, whom he sent abroad through England to preach his doctrines and to read the Scriptures to all who wished to hear. Foxe reports that the people were so eager to read it that they would give a whole load of hay for the use of the NT for one day. There was opposition to Wycliffe on the part of the Church, but contrary to his own expectations, he was permitted to retire to his rectory at Lutterworth, where he quietly died in 1384. Twelve years later, however, his bones were disinterred and burned, and the ashes scattered over the river that flows through Lutterworth. His translation has indelibly stamped itself on our present-day Bible. Some of the expressions that are first found in his version are: "strait gate," "make whole," "compass land and sea," "son of perdition," "enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Four years after Wycliffe's death his secretary, John Purvey, issued a careful revision of his translation, introduced with an interesting prologue and accompanied by notes. The Church, however, did not approve of the new Bible. In 1408 a decree, known as the "Constitutions of Oxford," was issued forbidding anyone to translate or read any part of the Bible in the vernacular without the approval of his bishop or of a provincial council. Six years later a law was enacted that all persons who should read the Scriptures in the mother tongue should "forfeit land, catel, life, and goods from their heyres for ever." Nicholas Hereford and John Purvey were imprisoned. The public demand for the Bible continued, however, in spite of the severe penalties attached to its circulation.

The 15th century was one of the great epochs of human history. In that century there lived such men as Columbus, Galileo, Francis Bacon, Kepler, Marco Polo, and the inventor of printing, Gutenberg, who in 1454 brought out in Germany the first dated printed work, a Latin Psalter, and two years later the famous Gutenberg Bible in the Vulgate. After the capture of Constantinople in 1453, Christian scholars were compelled to leave the capital of the Eastern Empire, where for a thousand years Greek learning had flourished. They brought with them to Western Europe many Greek manuscripts. This led to a revival of interest in Biblical studies and made it possible for Erasmus to issue in 1516 the first printed edition of the Greek New Testament. At the beginning of the 16th century Greek was for the first time introduced as a subject of study in the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. By 1500 most of the countries of Europe had the Scriptures in the vernacular. England, however, had only scattered copies of the Wycliffe manuscript version, the language of which had by then become obsolete. The Constitutions of Oxford were still in force. England was ready for a new translation of the Bible, from the original languages.

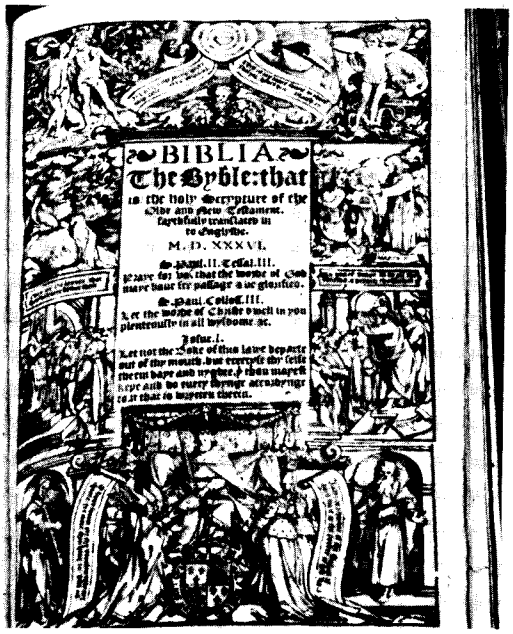
William Tyndale. William Tyndale, the next great figure in the history of the English Bible, was born about the year 1494, and spent ten years studying at Oxford and Cambridge. Soon after leaving Cambridge, while working as a chaplain and tutor, he said in a controversy with a clergyman, "If God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy that driveth a plough to know more of the Scripture than thou dost." This became the fixed resolve of his life. In his projected translation he tried to get the support of the Bishop of London, but without success. A wealthy London cloth-merchant finally came to his support, but after six months, in 1524, Tyndale left for the Continent because, he said, he "understood at the last not only that there was no room in my lord of London's palace to translate the New Testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all England, as experience doth now openly declare." He was never able to return to England. He seems to have visited Luther at Wittenberg, and then went to Cologne, where he found a printer for his New Testament. A priest discovered his plan, and Tyndale was obliged to flee. In Worms he found another printer, and there, in 1525, 3000 copies of the first printed English NT were published. By 1530 six editions, numbering about 15,000 copies, were published. They were all smuggled into England — hidden in bales of cotton, sacks of flour, and bundles of flax.

As soon as Tyndale's NT reached England, there was a great demand for it: by the laity, that they might read it, and by the ecclesiastical authorities, that they might destroy it! A decree was issued for its destruction. Bishops bought up whole editions to consign to the flames. As a result, only a few imperfect copies survive. Tyndale's English NT began a new epoch in the history of the English Bible. It was not a translation from the Latin, as Wycliffe's had been, but was rendered from the original Greek, the text published by Erasmus. With each successive edition, Tyndale made corrections and improvements. So well did Tyndale do his work that the KJV reproduces about 90 per cent of Tyndale in the NT. After the completion of the NT, Tyndale started to bring out a translation of the OT from the Hebrew text, but he lived only to complete the Pentateuch, Jonah, and probably the historical books from Joshua to II Chronicles. After ten years on the Continent, mostly in hiding, he was betrayed in Antwerp by an English Roman Catholic, and was condemned to death for being a heretic. He was strangled, and his body burned at the stake. His last words were a prayer, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes." But Tyndale won his battle. Although his NT was burned in large quantities by the Church, it contributed greatly towards creating an appetite for the Bible in English. The government, moreover, began to see the wisdom and necessity of providing the Bible in English for common use. The break with the papacy in 1534 helped greatly in this.

Miles Coverdale. While Tyndale was incarcerated in Belgium, an English Bible suddenly appeared in England. This was in 1535. It had come from the Continent. The title-page stated that it had been translated out of the German and Latin into English. This Bible was the rendering of Miles Coverdale, although in the NT and in those parts of the OT done by Tyndale, it was no more than a slight revision of the latter's work. It was the first complete printed Bible in the English language. It was not made from the Hebrew and Greek, for in the dedication (to Henry VIII) Coverdale says that he used the work of five different translators. His version of the Psalms still appears in the Book of Common Prayer, used daily in the ritual of the Church of England. Two new editions of Coverdale's Bible appeared in 1537, with the significant words on the title page, "Set forth with the King's most gracious license." So within a year of Tyndale's death, the entire Bible was translated, printed, and distributed, apparently with royal approval.

First page of Coverdale's Bible, dated 1536, probably printed in Switzerland. The second edition, in 1537, was the first complete English Bible to be printed in England. BFBS



Thomas Matthew. In 1537 another Bible appeared in England, this one by Thomas Matthew a pen-name for John Rogers, a former associate of Tyndale's) who was burned at the stake by Queen Mary in 1555. The whole of the NT and about half of the OT are Tyndale's, while the remainder is Coverdale's. It bore on its title-page the words, "Set forth with the king's most gracious license." This Bible has the distinction of being the first edition of the whole English Bible actually to be printed in England. So now two versions of the English Bible circulated in England with the king's permission, Coverdale's and Matthew's, both of them heavily dependent upon Tyndale.

The Great Bible. The next Bible to appear was a revision of the Matthew Bible, by Coverdale. The printing of this was begun in Paris, but the Inquisition stepped in and the work was completed in England. It appeared in 1539 and was called the Great Bible because of its large size and sumptuousness. In his revision Coverdale made considerable use of the Hebrew and Greek texts then available. Subsequent editions were called Cranmer's Bible because of a preface he wrote for it in which he commended the widespread reading of the Scriptures and declared that they were the sufficient rule of faith and life. At the foot of the title-page were the words, "This is the Bible appointed to the use of the churches." This makes explicit an order that was issued in 1538, while this Bible was being printed, that a copy of it was to be placed in every church in the land. The people cordially welcomed the Great Bible, but its size and cost limited it largely to use in churches.

The later years of Henry VIII were marked by a serious reaction against the Reforming movement. In 1543 Parliament passed an act to ban the use of Tyndale's NT, made it a crime for an unlicensed person to read or expound the Bible publicly to others, and restricted even the private reading of the Bible to the upper classes. Three years later Parliament prohibited the use of everything but the Great Bible. In London large quantities of Tyndale's NT and Coverdale's Bible were burned at St. Paul's Cross.

In the brief reign of Edward VI, who succeeded his father Henry VIII on the latter's death in 1547, no new translation work was done, but great encouragement was given to the reading of the Bible and to the printing of existing versions, and injunctions were repromulgated that a copy of the Great Bible be placed in every parish church.

The Genevan Bible. With the accession of Mary in 1553, hundreds of Protestants lost their lives, among them some men closely associated with Bible translation, like John Rogers and Thomas Cranmer. Coverdale escaped martyrdom by fleeing to the Continent. Some of the English Reformers escaped to Geneva, where the leading figure was John Calvin. One of their number, William Wittingham, who had married Calvin's sister, produced in 1557 a revision of the English NT. This was the first English NT printed in roman type and with the text divided into verses. He and his associates then undertook the revision of the whole Bible. This appeared in 1560 and is known as the Genevan Bible, or more familiarly as the Breeches Bible from its rendering of Genesis 3:7, "They sewed fig-tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches." It enjoyed a long popularity, going through 160 editions, 60 of them during the reign of Queen Elizabeth alone, and continued to be printed even after the publication of the KJV in 1611.

The Bishops' Bible. Queen Elizabeth, who succeeded Mary Tudor after the latter's three years and nine months' reign, restored the arrangements of Edward VI. The Great Bible was again placed in every church, and people were encouraged to read the Scriptures. The excellence of the Genevan Bible made obvious the deficiencies of the Great Bible, but some of its renderings and the marginal notes made it unacceptable to many of the clergy. Archbishop Parker, aided by eight bishops and some other scholars, therefore made a revision of the Great Bible, which was completed and published in 1568 and came to be known as the Bishops' Bible. It gained considerable circulation, but the Genevan Bible was far more popular and was used more widely.

Rheims and Douai Version. This came from the Church of Rome, and is the work of Gregory Martin, who with a number of other English Romanists left England at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign and settled in the NE of France, where in 1568 they founded a college. The NT was published in 1582, and was done while the college was at Rheims, and hence is known as the Rheims New Testament, but the OT was not published until 1609-10, after the college had moved to Douai, and hence it is called the Douai Old Testament. The Preface warned readers against the then existing "profane" translations and blames Protestants for casting what was holy to dogs. Like Wycliffe's version, this one was made not from the original languages but from Latin, and is therefore only a secondary translation. The main objection to the version is its too close adherence to the words of the CHAP. I.

1 The creation of Heauen and Earth, 3 of the light, 6 of the firmament, 9 of the earth separated from the waters, 11 and made fruitfull, 16 of the Starres, Moone, and Starres, 20 of fish and foules, 24 of beasts and cattell, 26 of Man in the image of God, 29 Also the appointment of food.

IN the beginning God created the Heauen, and the Earth.

2 And the earth was without forme, and voyd, and darkenesse was vpon the face of the deepe: and the Spirit of God mooued vpon the face of the waters.

3 And God said, Let there be light: and there was light.

4 And God saw the light, that it was good: and God diuided the light from the darkenesse.

5 And God called the light, Day, and the darkenesse he called Night: and the euening and the morning were the first day.

6 And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters: and let it diuide the waters from the waters.

7 And God made the firmament, and diuided the waters which were vnder the firmament, from the waters which were aboue the firmament: and it was so.

8 And God called the firmament, Heauen: and the euening and the morning were the second day.

9 And God said, Let the waters vnder the heauen be gathered together vnto one place, and let the dry land appeare: and it was so.

10 And God called the dry land, Earth, and the gathering together of the waters called he, Seas: and God saw that it was good.

11 And God said, Let the earth bring forth grasse, the herbe yeelding seed, and the fruit tree, yeelding fruit after his kinde, whose seed is in it selfe, vpon the earth: and it was so.

12 And the earth brought forth grasse, and herbe yeelding seed after his kinde, and the tree yeelding fruit, whose seed was in it selfe, after his kinde: and God saw that it was good.

13 And the euening and the morning were the third day.

14 And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heauen, to diuide the day from the night: and let them be for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes and yeeres.

15 And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heauen, to giue light vpon the earth: and it was so.

16 And God made two great lights: the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the starres also.

17 And God set them in the firmament of the heauen, to giue light vpon the earth, original Latin and the too great Latinizing of the English. It included the Apocrypha, and contained a large number of notes, most of them to interpret the sacred text in conformity with Roman Catholic teaching and to reply to the arguments of the Reformers. The Rheims-Douay Bible in use today is not the same as the one made by Gregory Martin, but is a thorough revision made of it between 1749 and 1763 by Bishop Richard Challoner. It was first authorized for use by American Roman Catholics in 1810.

King James Version. When Elizabeth died, in 1603, the crown passed to James I, who had been king of Scotland for 37 years as James VI. Several months after he ascended the throne of England he called a conference of bishops and Puritan clergy to harmonize the differences that existed in the Church. At this conference Dr. John Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, a leader of the Puritan party in the Church of England, suggested that a new translation of the Bible be made to replace the Bishops' Bible, which many people found unacceptable. The proposal pleased the king, who violently disliked the Genevan Bible, and a resolution was passed to produce a new translation of the Bible from the original Hebrew and Greek, without any marginal notes, for the use of all the churches in England.

Without delay, King James nominated 54 of the best Hebrew and Greek scholars of the day. Only 47 actually took part in the work, which did not begin until 1607. They were divided into six groups: three for the OT, two for the New, and one for the Apocrypha. Two of the groups met at Oxford, two at Cambridge, and two at Westminster. Elaborate rules were laid down for their guidance. When a group had completed its task, its work was submitted to 12 men, two from each panel. Final differences of opinion were settled at a general meeting of each company. In cases of special difficulty, learned men outside the board of revisers were consulted. Marginal notes were used only to explain Hebrew and Greek words and to draw attention to parallel passages. Italics were used for words not found in the original but necessary to complete the sense.

The revisers, who received no financial remuneration for their work, completed their task in two years; and nine more months were devoted to a revision of their work by a special committee consisting of two members from each group. In 1611 the new version was published. Although the title-page described it as "newly translated out of the original tongues" and as "appointed to be read in churches," neither statement is entirely in accord with the facts. The work was actually a revision of the Bishops' Bible on the basis of the Hebrew and Greek; and it was never officially sanctioned by King, Parliament, or the Church. It did not win immediate universal acceptance, taking almost 50 years to displace the Genevan Bible in popular favor. In the course of time slight alterations were made, especially in spelling, to conform to changing usage, but these were all done piecemeal by private enterprise. Its excellence is shown by the fact that after 350 years it is still used in preference to any other version in the English-speaking Protestant world, for both public and private use.

English Revised Version. This version was made necessary for a number of reasons: in the course of time the language of the KJV had become obsolete; a number of Greek manuscripts were discovered that were far superior to those available to the KJV translators; and improvement in the knowledge of Hebrew made possible a more accurate rendering of the OT. It had its origin in 1870 with the Convocation of Canterbury of the Church of England when a committee was appointed to invite outstanding Hebrew and Greek scholars, irrespective of religious denomination, to join in the revision of the KJV. Eventually two companies were formed, each of 27 men, one for the OT, the other for the NT. American scholars were also invited to cooperate, and they formed two companies corresponding to the British. It was agreed that American suggestions not accepted by the British revisers were to be recorded in an appendix to the published volume, and that the American revisers were to give their moral support to the new Bible and were not to issue an edition of their own for a term of 14 years. The revisers were guided by a number of rules, the most important being that they were to make as few alterations as possible into the text of the KJV consistently with faithfulness.

Altogether, the Greek text underlying the revised NT differed from that used by the KJV translators in 5,788 readings, only about one fourth of these making any material difference in the substance of the text, although none so seriously as to affect the doctrines of the faith. In the English text of the NT there are about 36,000 changes. The new Bible differed from its predecessors in printing poetical passages in the OT as poetry and in grouping verses into paragraphs according to sense-units.

The NT was published in 1881, and the OT in 1885. The work occupied the NT company for about 40 days each year for ten years; while the OT company was occupied for 792 days over a period of 14 years. The revisers gave their time and labor without charge. When they completed their work, they disbanded. Although the new version received acceptance unprecedented in the history of the Bible, so that three million copies were sold within the first year, it did not meet with immediate approval, nor has it in the years since then won for itself a place of undisputed supremacy. There is no doubt of its superior accuracy as a translation, but sacred associations clinging to the KJV have caused many people to turn from it.

American Standard Version. The American scholars who cooperated with the English revisers on the ERV were not entirely satisfied with it. For one thing, the suggested changes printed in the Appendix represented only a part of the changes they wanted made; and for another thing, the English revisers retained a large number of words and phrases whose meanings and spellings were regarded as antiquated, and words that are English but not American in meaning. For these and other reasons they did not disband when the ERV was published, but their revision of the ERV was not published until 1901. It is regarded as being on the whole superior to the ERV, at least for American uses, but it has its defects, as, for example, the substitution of "Jehovah" for "Lord," especially in the Psalter.

Other Twentieth Century Versions. The discovery, at the end of the 19th century, of many thousands of Greek papyri in the sands of Egypt, all written in the everyday Greek language of the people, had a revolutionary influence upon the study of the Greek of the NT. NT Greek had hitherto presented a vexing problem, since it is neither classical Greek nor the Greek of the Septuagint. Now it was shown to be the Greek of the papyri, and therefore the colloquial language of Greek-speaking people in the first century. It was felt that the NT should be translated into the everyday speech of the common man, and not in stilted and antiquated English. These developments created a keen interest in bringing out fresh translations of the NT in the spoken English of today; and in the next 45 years a number of new modern-speech versions came out, most of them by individuals, but a few by groups of scholars.

The first of these to appear was The Twentieth Century New Testament: A Translation into Modern English Made from the Original Greek. (Westcott & Hort's Text). This was published in 1902 (reprinted 1961) and was the work of about 20 translators whose names were not given. In 1903 R. F. Weymouth brought out The New Testament in Modern Speech; it was thoroughly revised in 1924 by J. A. Robertson. James Moffatt, the well-known Scottish NT scholar, brought out The Bible: A New Translation in 1913,14. The American counterpart of Moffatt is The Complete Bible: An American Translation (1927, revised 1935). The NT part first appeared in 1923 and was the work of E. J. Goodspeed; while four scholars, headed by J. M. Powis Smith, did the OT. The New Testament. A Translation in the Language of the People, by C. B. Williams, came out in 1937. The New Testament in Modern English (1958), by J. B. Phillips, is one of the most readable of the modern-speech translations. The Amplified New Testament (1958), which gives variant shades of meaning in the original, was followed in 1961 by The Amplified Old Testament. Part Two (Job-Malachi), balance of OT to follow in 1964. It is the work of Frances E. Siewert and unnamed assistants. The Holy Bible: The Berkeley Version in Modern English (1959) is the work of Gerrit Verkuyl in the NT and of 20 American scholars in the OT. Kenneth Wuest's The New Testament — An Expanded Translation appeared complete in 1961. Also in 1961 appeared The Simplified New Testament, a new translation by Olaf M. Norlie.

During this period the Roman Catholic Church brought out a number of new versions: The New Testament of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ (1941), a revision of the Rheims-Challoner NT sponsored by the Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine; the Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures, under the general editorship of Cuthbert Lattey, of which only the NT (1935) and parts of the OT have thus far appeared; and the translation from the Latin Vulgate made by Ronald A. Knox, the NT in 1945 and the OT in 1949.

Revised Standard Version. This is a revision of the ASV (1901), the NT appearing in 1946 and the OT in 1952. It was sponsored by the International Council of Religious Education, and is the work of 32 American scholars who worked in two sections, one dealing with the OT, the other with the NT. It was designed for use in public and private worship. In this version the language is modernized; direct speech is regularly indicated by the use of quotation marks; and the policy is followed (as in the KJV) of using a variety of synonyms to translate the Greek words where it is thought to be advisable.

New English Bible. This is a completely new translation, not a revision of previously existing versions. The first suggestion for this version came from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; but it is the joint effort of all the major religious denominations and organizations in the British Isles. C. H. Dodd is the General Director of the whole translation. The first requirement put on the translators is to produce a genuinely new translation, in which an attempt should be made consistently to use the idiom of contemporary English to convey the meaning of the original languages. Assisting the translators is a panel of advisors on literary and stylistic questions. Only the NT (1961) has come out thus far. As in the case of all previous translations, this one has been greeted with a mixture of praise and criticism. It is expected that the OT will be published in a few years. S.B.

BICHRI (bĭk'rī, first-born), mentioned in II Samuel 20:1 as the father of Sheba, who made insurrection against David.

BIDKAR (bĭd'kär), a military officer of Israel who joined Jehu in his revolt and was made his captain (II Kings 9:25). He cast the body of Joram, king of Israel, into the plot of Naboth's vineyard, after Jehu had slain him.

BIGTHA (bĭg'thà), one of the seven chamberlains of Ahasuerus, i.e. Xerxes (Esth. 1:10).

BIGTHAN or BIGTHANA (bĭg'thăn or bĭg'thā'nà), one of the chamberlains of king Ahasuerus, i.e. Xerxes, who with another, Teresh, had plotted to slay the king. Mordecai heard of the plot, and through Esther warned the king, who had the two men hanged (Esth. 2:21-23; 6:2).

BIGVAI (bĭg'vā-ī, fortunate). 1. One of the 11 or 12 chief men who returned from captivity by permission of Cyrus in 536 B.C. (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7).

2. The ancestor of a family of over 2,000 who returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:14; Neh. 7:19). Some think that the slight difference of numbers in the two verses quoted is due to the possibility that Ezra's was a list made in Babylon before starting, and Nehemiah's at Jerusalem after arriving. Some few have dropped out and a few added during the migration.

3. Probably the same as 2. The ancestor of a family of which 72 men returned with Ezra in 457 B.C. (Ezra 8:14).

BILDAD (bĭl'dăd), one of Job's three "comforters" (cf. Job 2:11-13 with 42:7-10). He was evidently a descendant of Shuah (Gen. 25:2), a son of Abraham by Keturah, who became patriarch of an Arab tribe. Bildad made three speeches (Job 8,18,25), and his distinctive character as a "traditionalist" can best be seen in 8:8-10.

BILEAM (bĭl'ē-ăm), a town in the western half of the tribe of Manasseh given in Joshua's time to the Levites of the Kohathite family who were not priests (I Chron. 6:70). Perhaps the same as the Ibleam of Joshua 17:11; Judges 1:27, and II Kings 9:27.

BILGAH (bĭl'gà, cheerfulness). 1. Head of the 15th course of priests in David's time (I Chron. 24:14).

2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel in 536 B.C. (Neh. 12:5).

BILGAI (bĭl'gā-ī), a priest in Nehemiah's time, 444 B.C. (Neh. 10:8).

BILHAH (bĭl'hà, foolish). 1. Maid-servant of Rachel, Jacob's beloved wife, and later given to Jacob by Rachel that she might bear children who would be credited to Rachel (Gen. 29:29; 30:1-8). She became ancestress of the two tribes, Dan and Naphtali. In the polygamous system of early Israel, she would be ranked higher than a mere concubine, but not as high as her free-born mistress.

2. A town in the tribe of Simeon. Spelled "Balah" in Joshua 19:3.

BILHAN (bĭl'hăn, foolish). 1. A son of Ezer, son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:27; I Chron. 1:42). Etymologically, the name is the same as Bilhah, but with the Horite ending.

2. An early Benjamite; son of Jediael, son of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:10). He had seven sons who were mighty men and heads of large families.

BILSHAN (bĭl'shăn), one of the 11 or 12 leaders of the Jews who returned from captivity in 536 B.C. (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7).

BIMHAL (bĭm'hăl), one of the three sons of Japhlet of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:33).

BINDING AND LOOSING. The carrying of a key or keys was a symbol of the delegated power of opening and closing. In Matthew 16:19, our Lord gave the "power of the keys" to Peter, and Peter's use of the keys is narrated in what may be called the "three stages of Pentecost." On the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:14-40) Peter preached the first Christian sermon and opened "the kingdom of heaven" to what became a Hebrew-Christian church; then with John he went to Samaria (Acts 8:14-17) and opened the same "kingdom" to the Samaritans; and still later in the house of Cornelius (Acts 10:44-48) he opened it to the Gentiles; so that the Church could become universal. The medieval teaching about Peter standing at the gate of heaven to receive or reject souls of men has no basis in the Bible teaching.

BINNUI (bĭn'ū-ī, built). 1. A Levite, whose son was partly in charge of the silver and gold at Ezra's return (Ezra 8:33).

2. One of the sons of Pahath-moab who had married foreign wives (Ezra 10:30).

3. A son of Bani who had been similarly guilty (Ezra 10:38).

4. One of the rebuilders of Jerusalem in 444 B.C. who also became a covenanter under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:24; 10:9).

5. Alternate spelling of Bani (cf. Ezra 2:10; Neh. 7:15) whose family returned with Zerubbabel.

6. A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8).

BIRDS of 360 to 400 different kinds occur in Palestine, and of these, 26 are found only there. The Bible mentions about 50, using Hebrew or Greek names which can sometimes be identified with particular species of the present. Birds are mentioned in all but 21 books of the Bible and 19 times in the apocryphal books. The following birds are specifically mentioned.

Bittern, a heron-like bird of marshy environment with a mournful call. It was prophesied that it would live in a waste land which replaced the cursed Edom (Isa. 34:11). Translated as "porcupine" in ARV and RSV.

Chicken, the common domesticated barn yard fowl, descended from the wild red jungle fowl of India, Burma, and Malaya. Mentioned as the young of a hen which shows consideration for her offspring, as Christ would have comforted Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37). Perhaps the "fatted fowl" of I Kings 4: 22-23. See "hen."

Cock, the male of the domestic chicken. Used as a symbol of the early part of the day because of its morning crowing (Mark 13:35), a reminder of Jesus' word to Peter that he would deny his Lord (Matt. 26:74). There is a church in Jerusalem today named Gallicante, after the cock which Peter heard.

Cormorant, a swimmer and diver with webs between all four toes. It can pursue and catch fish under water. Some orientals use it to capture fish for them. A dweller in waste places, hence a sign of a curse on land formerly inhabited, such as Edom and Nineveh. Included in list of unclean birds in Leviticus 11, probably because it is a flesh eater. Since the flesh contained blood, and Israelites were forbidden to eat blood, they were also prohibited from eating birds which were carnivorous. In Isaiah 34:11 it is "pelican" in ARV, and "hawk" in RSV. Zephaniah 2:14 replaces "cormorant" with "pelican" in ARV and "vulture" in RSV.

Crane, a long-necked, long-legged wading bird whose voice is a croak or a honk heard for several miles. Hezekiah's lament over his sickness is compared to that of a crane (Isa. 38:14). Its time of migration is well known, so that its faithful return is contrasted to Israel's faithlessness (Jer. 8:7).

Crow. No specimen is mentioned in the Bible, but the word is the symbol of the voice of the cock and other birds.

Cuckoo, an unclean bird of Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14. The RSV translates this "sea gull," the ARV "sea mew," and G. R. Driver "long-eared owl." The gull and owl are flesh eaters, hence condemned for human food.

Cuckow, the KJV name for cuckoo. See cuckoo.

Dove. Probably the rock pigeon or the rock dove similar to our domestic pigeon, common in flocks in parks and around buildings. It was sent from the ark after the flood, but found no land, so returned, but did not go out until after a fortnight when firm footing was available (Gen. 8:8-12). It flies rapidly on high, as the Psalmist wishes his prayers also could. The dove is a promise of a blessed future for those in humble circumstances; for though one has lain among the pots, yet he shall be as the wings of doves covered with silver and feathers covered with gold (Ps. 68:13). The "pots" may be ash grates, as in some translations. This, then, becomes a source of the phrase, "Beauty for ashes." The dove appropriately becomes a symbol of a lover in the Song of Solomon for its soft cooing voice was well known. However, Hezekiah compares his mourning over his illness to the voice of a dove (Isa. 38:14) and both Isaiah and Ezekiel felt that sinful Israel would mourn like a dove. Like the swift flight of doves (Isa. 59:11; Ezek. 7: 16) so would help come from Zion (Isa. 60:8). Their nests "in the clefts of the rock, in the covert of a cliff" (S. of Sol. 2:14 RSV) or "in the sides of the mouth of a gorge" (Jer. 48:28 RSV) suggest peaceful retreats for lovers or from threat of judgment. Doves are among the less intelligent of birds, hence foolish Ephraim is compared to a "silly dove." Their harmlessness is mentioned in Matthew 10:16. The Spirit of God descends "like a dove" (Matt. 3:16). Doves were sold in the Temple for the rites of purification, but Jesus cast out the sellers (Matt. 21:12).

Eagle, a large, hawk-like bird having powerful beak, talons, and wings, with a spread of over four feet. Israel was carried from Egypt by Jehovah on eagles' wings (Exod. 19:4; Deut. 32:11). The Lord renews the youth of the soul like the eagle (Ps. 103:5) so that it mounts up with wings as eagles (Isa. 40:31). The woman of Revelation 12 escapes the serpent by using the gift of "two wings of a great eagle." Israel will be chastised by a nation "as swift as the eagle flieth" (Deut. 28:49; Jer. 4: 13). Even though Edom should be as inaccessible as an eagle's high nest, it will be destroyed (Jer. 49:16; Obad. 4). Eagles will eat the eyes of mockers (Prov. 30:17; Matt. 24:28). In these verses the KJV and ARV use the term "young eagles," while the RSV prefers "vultures." Several symbolic creatures have eagles' features (Ezek. 1:10; Ezek. 17: 3). Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom was compared to a lion with eagle's wings (Dan. 7:4). In their death Saul and Jonathan were "swifter than eagles" (II Sam. 1:23), and Job's days passed away as fast as an eagle hastening to the prey (Job 9:26). Riches are not to be desired, for they fly away as eagles toward heaven (Prov. 23:5). The eagle is among the unclean birds of Leviticus 11.

Falcon, a hawk with long-pointed wings and long tail. It is an unclean bird in Leviticus 11 (KJV), translated "kite" by RSV.

Fowl, used of all flying birds (Gen. 1:20) and even includes the bat (Lev. 11:13,19) which is a mammal. Mentioned as sacrifices (Lev. 1:14), food (Deut. 14:20) and scavengers of perished sinners (Ezek. 29:5). They are wise (Job 35:11) but God possesses greater wisdom (Job 28:7). Men are worth more than many fowls (Luke 12:24).

Gier Eagle, a KJV term; called "vulture" in RSV and ARV and "osprey" by G. R. Driver. See "ospray."

Glede, a kind of vulture or hawk. An unclean bird of Deuteronomy 14:13.

Great Owl, an unclean bird of Leviticus 11. Listed as "Ibis" in RSV. See "owl."

Hawk, a fast-flying, sharp-tongued, curved-beaked predator, considered unclean in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14. It is similar to the eagle and the flight of both is mentioned as God given in Job 39:26-27.

Hen, the female of the domestic chicken, which is solicitous for its young, even as Jesus wishes to be for Jerusalem (Matt. 23:37).

Heron, a long-legged, marsh-inhabiting wading bird. Unclean in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14.

Hoopoe, see "lapwing."

Kite, see "falcon" as it is translated in ARV and RSV.

Lapwing, perhaps the woodcock, a long-billed bird living on worms. RSV and ARV translate this term "hoopoe" as does Driver. The hoopoe has a prominent crest and curved bill pictured in an Egyptian fowling scene 3800 years ago. "It probes in filth for insects and worms and this habit doubtlessly earned for it an 'unclean' classification." (Parmalee)

Little Owl, see "owl." An unclean bird of Leviticus 11.

Nighthawk, called the same in KJV and RSV but "short-eared owl" by Driver and "owl, swallow, cuckoo" by Young's Analytical Concordance. Nighthawks and whip-poor-wills are similar small-beaked, strong-flying insect-eating birds. The nighthawk is listed as unclean in Leviticus 11.

Ospray, spelled "osprey" in modern English, as in RSV. A fish-eating hawk which has roughened pads on its feet to help hold slippery fish. An unclean bird of Leviticus 11.

Ossifrage, the "bearded vulture" in Driver's dictionary account. An unclean bird of Leviticus 11. See "vulture." (Called "gier eagle" in ARV.)

Ostrich, the largest living bird, whose habits are accurately described in Job 39:13-18. With "a bounding stride of 15 feet or more, ostriches can indeed 'scour the plain,' running 40 miles an hour and easily out-distancing the fastest horse" (Parmalee). The author of Lamentations considered them cruel (4:3). Job felt that his sad state made him like a companion of the reticent ostrich (Job 30:29 ARV).

Owl, a nocturnal bird of prey, hunting rodents and other small animals. They reminded the Israelites of desolate and ruined cities (Isa. 34:15). The "great owl" is similar to the American great-horned owl, twenty-two inches long, and the "little owl" is the most common owl in Palestine. All were considered unclean (Lev. 11 where ARV and RSV have "ostrich"). All owls have mournful voices, resembling a discouraged prayer (Ps. 102:6).

Partridge, a member of the order of birds to which chickens belong. Because of their swift and sneaky running, they are excellent game birds. David compared himself to a partridge when Saul was hunting him (I Sam. 26:20). It was supposed that partridges robbed eggs from others and hatched them, a symbol of getting riches unfairly (Jer. 17:11).

Peacock, the beautiful birds brought for Solomon's courtyard, probably from India and Ceylon. The peacocks mentioned in Job 39:13 (KJV) are probably ostrich hens (ARV).

Pelican. Dr. Driver thinks the pelican in the list of unclean birds of Leviticus 11 is the scops owl, only eight inches long. Pelicans, like cormorants, have webs between all four toes, which enable them to pursue the fish they eat. Whether the Hebrew qaath means owl or pelican, it refers to an unclean bird on account of its flesh eating habit.

Pigeon, the common rock dove (see dove). Because pigeons do not migrate and are numerous, their young were easily obtained by the poor for sacrifice (Gen. 15:9; Luke 2:24).

Quail, a ground dweller, scratching for food and having strong flying muscles for rapid flight of short duration. Its flesh is good for food (Exod. 16:13; Ps. 105:40). Quail migrate in enormous flocks only a few feet above the ground, "two cubits high" (Num. 11:31).

Raven, similar to a large crow, with larger head and shoulders, and an omnivorous eater, hence condemned in Leviticus 11. It could live on dead bodies, so did not return when Noah sent it from the ark. Ravens fed Elijah (I Kings 17:4) and are fed by God (Job 38:41), dwell in places formerly inhabited (Isa. 34:11) and will pick out the eye of a mocker (Prov. 30:17).

Screech Owl, a small owl with penetrating voice. Parmalee mentions that many owls are found "in the rock tombs of Petra, chief city of ancient Edom," which may point to a fulfillment of Isaiah 34:13,14, although the creature mentioned here may be the ostrich (ARV).

Sea Mew, see "cuckoo."

Sparrow, a small, seed-eating bird closely akin to the American house sparrow. Noisy, active and prolific. It was protected in the Temple (Ps. 84:3). This name may also include wrens like our house wren. Sparrows were so cheap that when four were purchased a fifth was added free, but all are noticed by the heavenly Father, "Fear ye not, therefore . . ." (Matt. 10:31). Sparrows live in groups, so a sparrow "alone on a housetop" (Ps. 102:7) is an unusual sight. The Hebrew word tsippor in this verse may better be translated rock thrush, which haunts lonely places.

Stork, a long-legged, heron-like bird feeding in marshes but nesting in trees (Ps. 104:17). It has a regular migration time, more faithful than God's people (Jer. 8:7). Their powerful wings are referred to in Zechariah 5:9.

Swallow, probably the swift, with dashing flight and piercing repeated call. Appropriate to Hezekiah's chattering in his illness (Isa. 38:14).

Swan, member of duck and goose family but with longer neck. Called "swan" in KJV, but "water hen" in RSV, "horned owl" in ARV, and "little owl" by Driver, and Young's Analytical Concordance. Because it is included in the list of unclean birds it is more than likely the meat-eating owl rather than the vegetarian swan.

Turtledove, a wild pigeon of migratory habits, similar to our mourning dove, singing frequently early in the spring (S. of Sol. 2:12), abundant for sacrifices (Gen. 15:9), so that they were a godsend to the poor (Luke 2:24).

Vulture, a hawk-like bird feeding on dead animals, and the slain of Isaiah 34:15 (called "kite" in ARV). Included among unclean birds of Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14. Wide ranging in its soaring, but God knows a path the vulture has not seen (Job 28:7, ARV has "falcon" here). R.L.M.

BIRSHA (bîr'shà), king of Gomorrah who was defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2,10).

BIRTH, the bringing into existence of a separate life. Although this is accompanied by rending pain, there is no evidence that such pain would have occurred had not sin entered the human race. (See Genesis 3:16 where pain in child-bearing is a part of the curse upon Eve for her sin.) This pain is so uniquely severe that in nine-tenths of the forty-odd uses of the word "travail" in Scripture ("as of a woman in travail") it is used as a figure for intense suffering (Jer. 13:21; Rom. 8:22; Gal. 4:19, etc.) Apparently the ancient Hebrew women went through travail more easily than the Egyptians (Exod. 1:19).

The day of one's birth is, in a sense, the most important day of his life, for without it, he would not have been; and so the celebration of birthdays goes back into very ancient times (Gen. 40:20; Matt. 14:6, etc.). The Hebrew ceremonies connected with childbirth are given in Leviticus 12. The permission to the poor to offer "a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons" in place of a lamb (Luke 2:24) gives touching testimony to the comparative poverty of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Our Lord, in John 3:3-6, makes a clear distinction between the first and second births of a regenerate person; and when this distinction is applied, it seems so to divide men as almost to make two different species; the once-born and the regenerate. The former are depraved, and unless they repent they are destined for judgment (Heb. 9:27; 10:31); while the latter are being made partakers in the divine nature (II Peter 1:4, etc.) and are destined for glory. A.B.F.

BIRTHRIGHT. From time immemorial a man's firstborn son has been given privileges above those of his younger brothers. This is illustrated today by the order of succession to the throne (in Britain for instance). Among the Israelites God had a special claim on the firstborn, at least from the time of Exodus, when He destroyed the firstborn of Egypt, and claimed those of Israel by right of redemption (Exod. 13:2,12-16). The birthright included a double portion of the inheritance (Deut. 21:15-17), and the privilege of priesthood; but in Israel God later set apart the tribe of Levi instead of the firstborn for that service. (Note Numbers 3:38-51, where the Levites are about the same in number as the firstborn of Israel). Esau lost his birthright by selling it to Jacob for a mess of pottage, and no regret could undo the loss he had brought upon himself. (See Gen. 25:27-34, Heb. 12:16 and compare the destinies of Israel and of Edom, Obad. 17,18). In Israel, Reuben lost his birthright through sin, and his next brothers Simeon and Levi lost theirs through violence; and so the blessing came to Judah (Gen. 49:3-10).

BIRZAVITH (bîr-zā'vĭth), either a son of Malchiel of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:31), or a village whose people were descendants of Malchiel.

BISHLAM (bĭsh'lăm), an officer of Cambyses ("Artaxerxes") who opposed the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 4:7).

BISHOP (bĭsh'ŭp, Gr. epískopos, overseer), originally the principal officer of the local church, the other being the deacon or deacons (I Tim. 3:1-7). The title "elder" or "presbyter" generally applied to the same man; "elder" referring to his age and dignity, and "bishop" to his work of superintendence. As the churches multiplied, the bishop of a larger church would often be given special honor, and so gradually there grew up a hierarchy, all the way from presiding elders to bishops (over groups of churches), then archbishops.

BITHIAH (bĭ-thī'ȧ, daughter of Jehovah), the name suggests that she was a convert to Judaism, though she is called a daughter of Pharaoh. Mentioned only in I Chronicles 4:18 as wife of Mered of the tribe of Judah.

BITHRON (bĭth'rŏn, rough country), a region in the tribe of Gad between the Jordan and Mahanaim. Mentioned only in II Samuel 2:29.

BITHYNIA (bĭ-thĭn'ĭ-ȧ, Gr. Bithunía), a region along the northern edge of Asia Minor fronting on the Black Sea, the Bosphorus and the Sea of Marmora. Paul and his companions desired to enter Bithynia with the Gospel (Acts 16:6-10) but the Holy Spirit was leading toward Europe, and so they could not enter. However, there were Christians there in the first century (I Pet. 1:1). The Roman governor Pliny the Younger complained to Trajan concerning the Christians and at the beginning of the second century asked how to deal with them.

Bithynia was settled very early, and its known history goes back past the sixth century B.C., when Croesus made it a part of his kingdom. A king of Bithynia in the third century B.C. invited the Gauls into Asia, so originating "Galatia." From the 13th century on, it has been Turkish, or at least ruled by the Turks.

BITTER HERBS. At the passover, the Israelites were to eat roast lamb (a lamb whose blood had been sprinkled for their salvation) with unleavened bread (because of the haste of their departure), and bitter herbs (as symbolic of the bitterness of their servitude, Exod. 12:8; Num. 9:11). Perhaps horse-radish is the nearest equivalent in our diet. See PLANTS.

BITTERN (See Birds)

BITUMEN (bĭ-tū'mĕn), a mineral pitch widely scattered over the earth, and one of the best waterproofing substances known. It was used with slime (or perhaps as "slime and pitch") to cover the ark of bulrushes (Exod. 2:3) and to waterproof Noah's ark (Gen. 6:14), for mortar in the tower of Babel (Gen. 11:3), and as a curse upon Edom (Isa. 34:9). There were great deposits near the Dead Sea, and at different places in Mesopotamia. The principal modern source is a great lake of pitch on the island of Trinidad.

BIZJOTHJAH (bĭz-jŏth'jȧ, contempt of Jehovah, ASV Biziothiah), a town in the south of Judah in Joshua's time (Josh. 15:28).

BIZTHAH (bĭz'thȧ), one of the seven chamberlains in the court of Xerxes ("Ahasuerus") who were commanded to bring out Queen Vashti for exhibition.

BLAINS (See Diseases)

BLASPHEMY (blăs'fĕ-mē, Gr. blasphémia). To reproach or to bring a railing accusation against any one is bad enough (Jude 9), but to speak lightly or carelessly of God is a mortal sin. In Israel the punishment of blasphemy was death by stoning (see Lev. 24:10-16). The third commandment, "Thou shalt not take the name of Jehovah thy God in vain" (Exod. 20:7) was observed so meticulously by the Jews that they would not speak the sacred Jehovah name at all, and so no one knows today for certain how it was pronounced. In the Hebrew Bible the consonants of the "sacred tetragrammaton" YHWH occur more than 6,000 times, but always with the vowels for the word "LORD." As a result of this superstitious reverence, the word Jehovah is found only half a dozen times in the KJV, and the word LORD is used instead. Naboth, at Jezebel's instigation, was falsely charged with blasphemy (I Kings 21:10-13), as were our Lord (Matt. 9:3, etc.) and Stephen (Acts 6:11). What our Lord said would have been blasphemy were it not true. The Jews, with a peculiar sense of humor, sometimes used the word "to bless" meaning "to curse" or "to blaspheme" (I Kings 21:10,13; Job 1:5,11, 2:5,9).

BLASTUS (blăs'tŭs, Gr. Blástos), a chamberlain of King Agrippa (Acts 12:20) who apparently was easily bribed. The men of Tyre and Sidon used him in approaching the king.

BLESS, BLESSING (Heb. bārakh). 1. God blesses nature (Gen. 1:22), mankind (Gen. 1:28), the Sabbath (Gen. 2:3), nations (Ps. 33:12), classes of men (Ps. 1:1-3) and individuals (Gen. 24:1, etc.).

2. Godly men should "bless" God; i.e. they should adore him, worship him and praise him (Ps. 103:1,2, etc.),

3. Godly men by words and actions can bestow blessings on their fellows (Matt. 5:44; I Pet. 3:9).

4. In Bible times, godly men under inspiration bestowed prophetic blessings on their progeny, e.g. Noah blessing Japheth and Shem (Gen. 9:26,27), Isaac blessing Jacob and Esau (Gen. 27:27-29,39, 40), Jacob blessing the tribes of Israel (Gen. 49), and Moses also blessing them (Deut. 33).

5. We can bless things when we set them apart for sacred use e.g. the "communion cup" (I Cor. 10:16).

BLESSING, THE CUP OF. In the "communion" service, the church (i.e. the assembly of believers) blesses the cup when it is set apart for the Lord's Supper (I Cor. 10:16).

BLINDNESS (See Diseases)

BLOOD, the well-known fluid pumped by the heart all through the body of animals and of men. The word occurs over 400 times in the Scriptures, being especially frequent in Leviticus, which deals with Hebrew worship and the way to holiness; in Ezekiel, which has much to say about God's judgments; and in the letter to the Hebrews, which is the divine commentary on Leviticus. In 24 of the Bible books, the word does not occur, not because it is unimportant but because these books deal with other subjects.

The blood contains the vital principle or the essence of animal and human life (Gen. 9:4 — "But flesh with the life thereof which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat"). Because of the sacredness of life, that energy which only God can give, the Israelites were enjoined from eating the blood, or even flesh from which the blood had not carefully been removed. This prohibition is at the basis of the Jewish usages referred to as "kosher," which prevents the orthodox Jews from buying or eating meat which has not been slaughtered and drained of blood under the supervision of a rabbi. Not only was the eating of blood forbidden to Israel, but also to the strangers who lived with Israel (Lev. 17:10-14), and the penalty for the breaking of this law was that the sinner should be "cut off from among his people." This meant at least exclusion from fellowship and probably death as well.

The book of Leviticus speaks of the blood nearly one hundred times. It is mentioned especially in chapter 17, which deals with the eating of flesh. In the various offerings (Lev. 1-7), except for the meal offering of chapter 2, the blood was to be sprinkled upon the altar, indicating the substitution of the victim's blood for that of the sinner.

Because of the sacredness of God's law and of His demand of holiness in His creature, man, from the beginning this principle has held — that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23a); but "God is love," and so, in His infinite wisdom, He has provided an escape for the sinner. Though it is true that "without the shedding of blood, there is no remission" (Heb. 9:22), He has been pleased to accept the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ in lieu of ours, but only on condition of our belief in him. "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many" (Heb. 9:28) and this could take place only once, and so the Old Testament offerings were provided, not to take away sin, but to point forward to the supreme sacrifice upon Calvary.

The prohibition of eating blood with the flesh, like the rest of the law, was no doubt "nailed to the cross" when our Lord's death fulfilled the demands of the law (Col. 2:14). A.B.F.

BLOOD, AVENGER or REVENGER OF. Genesis 9:6, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," is the basis for capital punishment. In Israel of old, and among the Arabs and other primitive peoples of today, when murder or manslaughter was committed, the nearest of kin of the slain person took it upon himself to execute vengeance. In the law of Moses, it was recognized that the avenger would pursue a killer, and so cities of refuge were provided for those guilty of manslaughter, but not of murder (Num. 35:6). The Hebrew word for "avenger" is go'el and this word means also "kinsman" and "redeemer." This indicates that the executioner would ordinarily be a kinsman. In the book of Ruth, Boaz was the kinsman, who also performed the duty of a redeemer in Ruth's behalf (Ruth 4:1-8; Deut. 25:5-10). The word go'el had a twofold application to Boaz, who was both kinsman and redeemer to Ruth, but in the case of our Lord it is threefold. As Son of man he is our kinsman, he was our Redeemer (1 Pet. 1:18, 19); and he will be the Avenger of blood (Isa. 63:1-6; Rev. 14:14-20; 19:11-21). A.B.F.

BLOOD, ISSUE OF (See Diseases)

BLOODY SWEAT (See Diseases)

BOANERGES (bō'ā-nûr'jēz, sons of thunder), a title bestowed by our Lord upon the two brothers James and John, the sons of Zebedee (Mark 3:17), probably because of their temperamental violence (cf. Luke 9:54-56).

BOAR (See Animals)

BOAZ (bō'ăz, Heb. bō'az), a well-to-do Bethlehemite in the days of the judges who became an ancestor of our Lord by marrying Ruth, the Moabitess, widow of one of the sons of Elimelech, his kinsman (Ruth 2,3,4). This was in accordance with the levirate law of Deuteronomy 25:5-10; Boaz could marry Ruth only after the nearer kinsman (Ruth 3:12; 4:1-8) had refused the privilege, or the duty. The other refused because if he had married Ruth and had had a son, a portion of his property would have gone to the credit of Elimelech's posterity, instead of his own by a former marriage. It is impossible to date Boaz exactly, because the genealogy of Ruth 4:18-22 (given in Matt. 1:4-6) is almost certainly a partial list, giving ten names to cover 800 years. The list in Matthew 1 is demonstrably schematic, as it omits four names of kings, and this one in Ruth is almost as surely so. They are both true, but, like most genealogies, partial. Salmah (or Salmon) given here as the father of Boaz, lived at the time of the Conquest, for he married Rahab, but the general setting of the story is that of a later period of settled life.

BOAZ AND JACHIN (See Temple)

BOCHERU (bō'kĕ-rōō), a distant descendant of Saul, at the time of the return from captivity (I Chron. 8:38). One of the six sons of Azel.

BOCHIM (bō'kĭm, weepers), a name given to the place where the Angel of Jehovah appeared and rebuked the children of Israel because of their failure to drive out the heathen and to destroy their places of worship (Judg. 2:1-5).

BOHAN (bō'hăn), a descendant of Reuben after whom a stone was named (Josh. 15:6; 18:17). The stone was on the boundary between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, and was NW of the northern end of the Dead Sea and NE of Jerusalem.

BOIL (See Diseases)

BOLSTER, a head-rest, or pillow (Gen. 28:11,18; I Sam. 19:13; 26:11,16).

BONDMAID, BONDMAN (See Occupations)

BONE. In the living body, bones form the strong framework, and the connotation is one of strength. "Bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh" (Gen. 2:23) was spoken in a literal sense of Eve; but almost the same words (Gen. 29:14), spoken by Laban to Jacob, are figurative and show only kinship. Strong chastening is thought of as a bone-breaking experience (Ps. 51:8), and the terrible writhing on the cross of Calvary literally threw bones out of joint (Ps. 22:14). Dry bones form a picture of hopeless death (Ezek. 37:1-12). The paschal lamb, without a broken bone (Exod. 12:46) was a type of the Lamb of God (John 19:36).

BOOK, generally a literary production having more or less unity of purpose. Books may be classified by their forms or subjects, but more particularly by the nature and quality of the written material within. In ancient Assyria and Babylonia much of the writing which was thought to be of value was done in wedge-shaped characters on soft clay which was then baked, and the "libraries" were, in form, almost like piles of brick.

In ancient Egypt, men early learned to press and glue thin sheets of the papyrus plant into sheets of "paper"; the writing was in narrow columns upon sheets of regular size which were then glued together and wound around two sticks, thus forming a "volumen" or roll. Still later, men learned to bind the sheets together into a "codex" very similar to our modern books. "Book" in the Bible always refers to a roll, which word occurs 14 times in Jeremiah 36. In Pergamum, in the second century B.C., due to the scarcity of paper, men learned to dress the skin of calves and of kids. This new substance was named "parchment" in honor of its origin, and almost displaced papyrus in many regions.

In ancient books made of papyrus or of parchment, the writing was generally upon one side of each sheet, but occasionally, owing to afterthoughts, material was written also on the backside (see Rev. 5:1). When a book was sealed, the contents were made secret, and when unsealed they were open (cf. Dan. 12:4,9 and Rev. 5:1-4 on the one hand, with Rev. 5:5; 22:10 on the other). Only the Son of God was found worthy to open the seals of the book of the future which had been locked in the hands of "him that sat on the throne."

Judaism, Christianity and Islam are all "book-ish" religions and their main books have greatly changed the history of the human race.

The Bible is the book, God's word, and it differs from all other books in that it alone is inspired (God-breathed). The Bible originally had 63 books, as the division of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles into "First" and "Second" was not originally intended. The larger books were generally written upon separate rolls (see Luke 4:17) but sometimes the "megilloth" (Ruth, Esther, Lamentations, Song of Solomon and Ecclesiastes) were bound together, as were also "The Twelve" i.e. the Minor Prophets. Many books which have been lost are mentioned in the Bible: e.g. "the book of Jasher" (Josh. 10:13), "the Acts of Solomon" (I Kings 11:41) etc. The word "book" is also used figuratively as in "the Lamb's book of life" (Rev. 21:27). BOOTH, a simple, temporary shelter generally constructed of tree-branches with the leaves left on. It was used by the guardian of a vineyard or vegetable garden when the fruit was fit to be stolen. Sometimes used for a larger enclosure (Gen. 33:17) such as Jacob built for his cattle. (Cf. Isa. 1:8 ARV)

BOOTY, that which is taken from a defeated enemy. In the law, as given through Moses, very different arrangements were made for varying circumstances. In the case of some very wicked heathen cities, everything was to be "devoted" to the Lord; i.e. to be destroyed absolutely so as not to be used by any man, except for some metallic vessels which could be sterilized by fire (Josh. 6:18-21). Persons who were taken as prey could sometimes be enslaved (Deut. 20:14), but in other cases must be utterly destroyed (Deut. 20:16-18). The purpose here was to prevent the heathen from teaching their abominations to God's people, Israel. Cf. I Samuel 15, where Saul's hypocritical half-obedience brought ruin upon himself and his house.

The very practical question as to the division of the booty was solved partly by custom, as when Abram freely devoted a tenth of the spoil to the Lord by giving it to Melchizedek (Gen. 14:20), and partly by legislation, as when David ordered that booty be shared equally by those who because of weariness could not continue in battle (I Sam. 30:21-25).

BOOZ (See Boaz)

BORROW, BORROWING. The Semitic peoples, as a general thing, have "an eye to business," and it seems quite natural when leaving a place of service, whether as a hireling or a slave, to ask for a gift. In Exodus 3:22, 11:2, 12:35 the KJV unfortunately translates the Hebrew verb shā'al ("ask") by the verb "borrow," and so gives the wrong impression that the Israelites cheated the Egyptians, and worse still that the Lord encouraged this "borrowing." The fact is that the Egyptians, thoroughly cowed by the rigors of the ten plagues, were willing to give largely in order to get rid of their troublesome "guests"; and God, in His providence, allowed Israel to despoil the Egyptians (Exod. 12:36), in order to provide gold and silver for the tabernacle which was to be constructed. "Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee" (Ps. 76:10).

The law of Moses gives careful directions concerning the responsibility of those who borrow, or who hold property in trust, or who are criminally careless in regard to the property of another (Exod. 22:1-15). Among the blessings promised Israel on condition of obedience is that they would be lenders and not borrowers (Deut. 28:12).

BOSCATH (See Bozkath)

BOSOM (bo͝oz'ŭm). Although in English the word means the part of the body between the arms, in Scripture it is generally used in an affectionate sense, e.g. "the Son, who is in the bosom of the Father" (John 1:18), carrying the lambs in his bosom (Isa. 40:11), John leaning on the bosom of Jesus (John 13:23), or Lazarus in Abraham's bosom (Luke 16:22,23). It can be almost synonymous with "heart" as the center of one's life, as in Ecclesiastes 7:9, "anger resteth in the bosom of fools," or Psalm 35:13, "my prayer returned unto mine own bosom." Quite commonly, of course, it refers to conjugal love, as in Micah 7:5, "her that lieth in thy bosom." We read also of the bosom as a place of hiding money (Prov. 17:23).

BOSOR (Same as Beor, See Balaam)

BOSSES, the convex projection in the center of a shield (Job 15:26).

BOTCH (See Diseases)

BOTTLE. 1. Container made of goat-skin, sewed up with the hair outside and used for carrying water (Gen. 21:14-19), for storing wine (Josh. 9:4,13), for fermenting milk into "leben" or "yogurt" (Judg. 4:19, etc.). The fact that fermenting wine expands and stretches its container is used by our Lord in His discourse about putting new wine into old bottles (Luke 5:37,38). A new skin bottle would be elastic enough to stretch with the pressure of the fermenting wine, whereas an old stiff wineskin would burst. Our Lord's teaching here is that Christianity cannot be contained in Judaism, nor can grace be confined in the bonds of the law. This meaning of "bottles" is used figuratively by Elihu in Job 32:19 as indicating his feeling that he must relieve himself by speaking.

2. Container made of baked clay, and hence very fragile (Jer. 19:1-11). As Jeremiah broke the bottle, so God would deal in fury with Israel.

3. Beautifully designed glass bottles, often found in Egyptian tombs, were used originally for burying some of the tears of the mourners with the deceased. See Psalm 56:8: "Put thou my tears into thy bottle."

4. The word rendered "bottles" in Hosea 7:5 could better be translated "heat" or "fury."

5. Figuratively, the clouds as the source of rain (Job 38:37).

6. Psalm 119:83, "I am become like a bottle in the smoke" does not refer, as some think, "to a custom," but rather to careless housekeeping. In the smoke of a kitchen without windows or chimney, a leather vessel which hung there would soon become brittle and dry. A.B.F.

BOUNDARY STONES. Our God is a God of order and not of confusion; and so in the matter of property, He not only set careful bounds to the land of His people (Josh. 13-21), but provided a curse for those who remove their neighbors' landmarks (Deut. 27:17; cf. 19:14). Figuratively, this implies a decent regard for ancient institutions (Prov. 22:28; 23:10).

BOW (See Arms and Armor)

BOW (See Rainbow)

BOWELS, in the KJV occurs 36 times, and in three principal senses: 1. Literally (II Chron. 21:15-19; Acts 1:18).

2. As the generative parts of our bodies whether male or female (Gen. 15:4; Ps. 71:6).

3. The seat of the emotions, as we use the word "heart." (See Lam. 1:20 [ASV "heart"]; Phil. 1:8 [ASV "tender mercies"]).

BOWL (bōl). There are a number of Heb. and Gr. words rendered "bowl" in the RV. 1. sēphel, a large, flat earthenware dish for holding something like milk (Judg. 5:25).

2. mizrāq, sometimes also rendered "basin", large costly bowls, like the silver bowls presented by the princes of the congregation (Num. 7:13f).

3. gāvia', rendered "pot" by the KJV in Jeremiah 35:5; a large silver bowl like the kind used at banquets to replenish drinking cups.

4. gullâh, the receptacle for oil in the candlestick of Zechariah's vision (Zech. 4:3), and the bowl-shaped capitals of Jachin and Boaz (I Kings 7:41,42; II Chron. 4:12,13).

5. kubba'ath kôs, RV "bowl of the cup"; KJV "dregs of the cup" (Isa. 51:41,42).

6. phiále, RV "bowl," KJV "vial" (Rev. 5:8, etc.).

BOX, BOX TREE (See Plants)

BOZEZ (bō'zĕz), a rocky crag near Gibeah (I Sam. 14:4). Because one of General Allenby's officers read this account, the British followed the route of Jonathan and attacked the Turks here in 1918, conquering them even as Jonathan and his armor-bearer defeated the Philistines.

BOZKATH or BOSCATH (bŏz'kăth), a city of Judah (Josh. 15:39), the home of the maternal grandfather of king Josiah (II Kings 22:1).

BOZRAH (bŏz'rà, Heb. bōtsrâh, sheepfold). 1. An important city of Edom, the residence of Jobab, one of Edom's early kings (Gen. 36:33). In Jeremiah 49:13,22, where the approaching doom of Edom is given, Bozrah is especially mentioned, and in Amos 1:12 we read of its palaces. The place is identified as the modern village of "el-Busaireh" i.e. "the little Bozrah," a few miles SE of the Dead Sea near the road toward Petra. In Micah 2:12 the word is probably "Bozrah," though it can be read as a common noun, i.e. "a sheepfold."

2. In Jeremiah 48:24 the word refers to a town in Moab. It lies about 75 miles S of Damascus, and was enlarged and beautified (c. A.D. 106) by the emperor Trajan who made it the capital of the province of Arabia.

BRACELET, properly a circlet for the wrist, but the word translates in the KJV five different Hebrew nouns. In II Samuel 1:10 the word probably means "armlet" as a mark of royalty; in Exodus 35:22 it could be "brooches," as in ASV, or "clasps"; in Genesis 38:18,25 it represents the cords about the neck from which the signet ring was suspended (see ASV in loc); in Genesis 24:22, etc., it is properly 'bracelet," from the root meaning, "something bound on," and so in Ezekiel 16:11 and 23:42, and in Isaiah 3:19, in the interesting inventory of 21 items of feminine adornment, it could be rendered "twisted chains." Bracelets and other rather showy adornments (anklets, nose-rings, armlets, etc.) were much admired in ancient days. See DRESS.

BRAMBLE (See Plants)

BRANCH, a word representing 18 different Hebrew and four Greek words in the Bible. The most interesting use of it is as a title applied to the Messiah as the offspring of David (Jer. 23:5; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12).

BRASS, next to silver and gold, the most frequently mentioned metal in Scripture. Today, brass is an alloy of copper and zinc, whereas bronze is an alloy of copper with tin; but the OT uses one word (or rather four words from one root) for copper (Job 28:2), bronze (II Sam. 22:35 probably), and brass (Dan. 10:6, cf. Rev. 1:15). Copper and its alloys were among the earliest metals worked by man; Tubal-cain (Gen. 4:22) being the first man mentioned as a worker in brass and iron. Most of the vessels for the courts of the tabernacle and of the temple were of "brass." In Nebuchadnezzar's vision (Dan. 2:31-39) the "belly and thighs of brass" signified the then future dominion of Greece, whose soldiers were notable for their brazen shields and weapons. The brazen cooking vessels of today in the East are mostly of copper, prevented from poisoning the food by a thin plating of tin which needs frequently to be restored by a process similar to soldering.

BRAY. 1. The ass brays when hungry (Job 6:5), and some low-grade people are described contemptuously as braying (Job 30:7).

2. To pound or "bray" as in a mortar (Prov. 27:22). This word, related to the verb "to break," is rare both in English and in Hebrew, but is easily understood by the context.

BRAZEN SEA. In II Kings 25:13, I Chronicles 18:8, and Jeremiah 52:17, we read of the great "sea of brass," a rather exaggerated figure for the immense laver which Solomon placed in front of the temple for washing the sacrifices and the bodies of the priests.

BRAZEN SERPENT. Numbers 21:4-9 records how the people of Israel complained against Moses and against God, who in judgment sent fiery serpents against them. When the people confessed their sin, Moses made a "serpent of brass," set it upon a pole and in effect said, "Look and live"; and whosoever looked recovered. This brazen serpent later was worshiped, but Hezekiah contemptuously called it "a piece of brass" (II Kings 18:4) and destroyed it. This brazen serpent was a type of our Lord bearing our sins on the cross (John 3:14-16).

BREAD, the "staff of life," generally baked from dough made of wheat flour which has been leavened (raised by means of fermenting yeast) and made into loaves of various shapes and sizes. At the time of the Passover (Exod. 12), the Israelites ate unleavened bread because of their haste, and ever afterward they memorialized this in their annual feast of unleavened bread (Exod. 12:15-20). In times of distress and of famine, barley was used instead of wheat. It was used by the poorer classes as a general thing. In Judges 7:13, the Midianite's dream of a barley loaf, which was interpreted as "the sword of Gideon," perhaps hinted at the poverty of Israel under Midianite oppression; and in John 6:9 the boy's store of five barley loaves would suggest that he came from a family or a region which could not afford the more delicious and nutritious wheat bread.

In the more primitive parts of Syria today, there are several sorts of wheat bread. In some villages, a barrel-shaped hole in the ground is used as an oven and the women adroitly knead the bread into large thin sheets which they lay on cushions and slap against the hot wall of the oven. Though dried dung mixed with straw is used as fuel, the taste is not impaired. Ezekiel 4:9-17 gives a vivid picture of baking in famine times. In other villages of Syria, a convex sheet of iron is placed over an open fire and the bread is similarly baked; but in the larger towns and cities there are bakeries to which the people bring their loaves for baking. The long stone oven is heated for hours, then the raised loaves, about eight to ten inches in diameter and one-fourth inch thick, are placed inside by means of a long wooden paddle. The heat quickly bakes the surface, and gas forming inside splits the loaves; then they are turned and soon removed (Hos. 7:8).

"Bread," as the most universal solid food, is often used figuratively for food in general. Genesis 3:19, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," Matthew 6:11, "Give us this day our daily bread," and similar passages refer to all sustenance. The word "bread" is used by the Lord in a mystical, but very true and precious sense in His discourse on "the bread of life" in John 6:43-59. As important as is solid food ("bread") to our bodies, so necessary is the Lord to spiritual life. And so, in the "breaking of bread" at our "communion" services, some partake in a very real way of Christ, while others, not discerning the body, eat and drink condemnation to themselves. In the tabernacle and in the Temple, the loaves of shew-bread indicated the presence of the Lord, the "Bread of life" among His people. A.B.F.

BREAD, SHEW (See Bread)

BREECHES (See Dress; Inner Tunic)

BRICK, building material made of clay dried in the sun. The word for "brick" in the Hebrew is derived from the verb "to be white" and is almost identical with "Lebanon," so-named for its snow-clad mountain tops. The very name would lead us to expect the oriental bricks to be whitish in color, rather than red like our more common brick. The earliest mention of brick in the Bible (Gen. 11:3) shows that the molding of clay into brick and its thorough burning were known when the tower of Babel was built, not more than a century after the Flood; and the finding of potsherds under the Flood deposits at Ur and Kish shows that the allied art of making clay into pottery was known before the Flood.

Owing to the prevalence of stone in Egypt, and its comparative rarity in lower Mesopotamia, the use of brick for building was much more common in Chaldea than in Egypt, though the sad record of the bondage of Israel in Egypt (Exod. 1:11-14; 5:7-19) shows that at least some cities in Egypt were built of brick rather than of stone. In fact, the ruins of Pithom have been found with the three grades of brick in situ: bricks with binding material of straw at the bottom; above them, brick made of stubble; and at the top, bricks of pure clay with no binding material at all. The ancient bricks were generally square instead of oblong, and were much larger than ours; something like 13 x 13 x 3½ inches, and often were stamped before baking with the name of the monarch: e.g. Sargon or Nebuchadnezzar. Much of the ancient brick-work was of bricks merely baked in the sun, especially in Egypt, but at Babylon the bricks were thoroughly burned. In Jeremiah 43:9 (KJV) we read of a "brick kiln" in Egypt in the sixth century B.C. The ASV renders the word "brickwork," but II Samuel 12:31 clearly speaks of a brick kiln back in David's time, and Nahum, taunting the Ninevites four centuries later (Nah. 3:14) tells them to "make strong the brick kiln." In Isaiah 9:10 the "pride and stoutness of heart" of the Israelites is rebuked because they intended to replace the thrown-down bricks with stone, even as many a modern city has been rebuilt after a catastrophe. The sin was not in their desire for improvement, but in their impious and profane pride. A.B.F.

BRIDE, BRIDEGROOM (See Wedding)

BRIDECHAMBER (See Wedding)

BRIDGE. The word "bridge" is not found in the English Bible. The idea of a bridge must have been suggested early, perhaps by a plank or fallen tree across a small stream, but Israelites seem to have been more talented commercially (Deut. 8: 17,18) than as engineers; and so they generally crossed a stream by a ford (Gen. 32:22; Josh. 2:7; Judg. 3:28) or in some cases by a ferry-boat (II Sam. 19:18). Although the principle of the arch was early known, as seen in two stones leaning against each other to bridge a small gap in Mycenaean ruins, it was not till the time of the Roman Empire that the magnificent arches, bridges and and aqueducts appeared and that the bridge may be said to have come into its own.

BRIDLE, the part of a harness that surrounds the head of the beast and connects the bit with the reins. It occurs properly, seven times in the OT and represents two words: one used in Proverbs 26:3, "a bridle for the ass," and the other in Psalm 32:9, "with bit and bridle." In Psalm 39:1 the word should be "muzzle." In the NT the word occurs once (Rev. 14:20) and the corresponding verb twice (James 1:26; 3:2). The ancient Assyrians sometimes bridled their captives. In Isaiah 37:29 God is represented as about to bridle the Assyrians in a similar way, but, of course, figuratively.

BRIER (See Plants)

BRIMSTONE, properly sulphur. The Hebrew word is related to "gopher," a resinous wood which was used in the construction of the ark; and so its root meaning is "resinous" or "highly combustible." It is generally connected with judgment, as when the Lord rained brimstone and fire upon Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:24; cf. Ps. 11:6), or as when the dust of Edom shall be turned into brimstone (Isa. 34:9), and in the NT, where "fire and brimstone" are principal elements in the punishment of the wicked in Gehenna, or the "lake of fire" (Rev. 20:10; 21:8). In Revelation 9:17, "fire, jacinth, brimstone" refer to colors — red, blue, yellow.

BRONZE, an alloy of copper with tin. The word is not found in Scripture, but probably the "steel" used as a material for making metallic bows (II Sam. 22:35; Job 20:24; Ps. 18:34) was really bronze. Bronze is much more elastic than brass, and so is more suitable for bows and for bells than the other alloy. Since there are so many varying proportions in which copper can be alloyed with tin, it is difficult to describe accurately "copper" (Ezra 8:27), and "brass" (Exod. 35:5, et seq.), and to be sure whether or not bronze is intended.

BROOK, a small stream. One of "the sweet words of Scripture," because the Bible was written in lands near the desert, and by men who therefore appreciated water. Many brooks are named in the Bible: Kidron (II Sam. 15:23), Besor (I Sam. 30: 9) et al. In Isaiah 19:6-8 the word rendered "brooks" in the KJV seems to refer to the Nile or its irrigating streams (see ASV). In Psalm 42: 1 the word rendered "brooks" seems to mean "channels" and is generally rendered "rivers" (S. of Sol. 5:12; Ezek. 36:4,6, etc.). The word nahal, rendered "brook" over 40 times in the KJV, often means "a wadi"; i.e. a torrent in winter and spring, which dries up in summer.

BROTHER. 1. A male person related to another person or other persons by having the same parents (Gen. 27:6), or the same father (Gen. 28:2), or the same mother (Judg. 8:19).

2. A man of the same country (Exod. 2:11; Acts 3:22).

3. A member of the same tribe (II Sam. 19:12).

4. An ally (Amos 1:9).

5. One of a kindred people (Num. 20:14).

6. A co-religionist (Acts 9:17; I Cor. 6:6); often, Christian disciples (Matt. 23:8; Rom. 1:13).

7. A fellow office-bearer (Ezra 3:2).

8. Someone of equal rank or office (I Kings 9: 13).

9. Any member of the human race (Matt. 7: 3-5; Heb. 2:17). Someone spiritually akin (Matt. 12:50).

BROTHERS OF OUR LORD. Were it not for the prevalence of the false doctrine of "the perpetual virginity of the blessed Virgin" this subject would hardly have seemed worthy of the long discussions which have been written about it. The expression in Matthew 1:25, "and knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son; and he called his name Jesus," testifies not only to the fact of the virgin birth of our Lord, but also to the other items, well-known later, that she bore to Joseph several children while Jesus was growing up. Mark 6:3, "Is not this the carpenter, the son of Mary, the brother of James, and Joses, and of Juda and Simon? and are not his sisters here with us?" testifies that when Jesus was a little more than 30 years of age he had at least six uterine brothers and sisters. If, as some have ingeniously argued, these had been sons of Joseph by a previous marriage, the whole argument of this passage would have lost its force.

John 7:1-10 states that the brothers of Jesus, in the midst of His ministry did not believe in Him, though it is almost a certainty that James was not only the human leader of the first church at Jerusalem by 50 A.D. (Acts 15:13, 21:18) but the writer of the epistle that bears his name; and that Jude, the author of the epistle, was the "Juda" (ASV "Judas") of Mark 6:3. The fact of their not claiming to be his brethren in the headings of their respective epistles is beautiful evidence of their Christian humility and of their reverence for His position as their Lord.

Of Joses (Tischendorf "Joseph") and of Simon, there is no further record. One would hardly expect four sons of a carpenter to have had prominent places in the early church.

The genealogists work out with much detail a list of the "kinsmen" of our Lord, making James and John His first cousins, Joseph of Arimathea the uncle of His mother, etc.; whereas the only hint of Christ's human relation in the Bible is where Elisabeth, mother of John the Baptist, is called "cousin" (ASV "kinswoman") of Mary (Luke 1:36). BUCKET or PAIL, a vessel for drawing or holding water, found only in two verses of Scripture. In Isaiah 40:15 all the nations, compared with God, are but as the last drop in a bucket which has just been emptied. In Numbers 24:7 the reference is to a numerous posterity.

BUKKI (bŭk'ī). 1. A prince of the tribe of Dan chosen to help Joshua divide the land (Num. 34: 22).

2. Son of Abishua, and high priest of Israel (I Chron. 6:5,51; Ezra 7:4).

BUKKIAH (bŭ-kī'à), one of the sons of Heman (I Chron. 25:4,13), who were appointed over the service of song in the time of David. Bukkiah had in his group at least 11 of his "sons and his brethren."

BUL (bōōl), the eighth month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year (I Kings 6:38), fitting into November and/or December of our calendar.

BULL (See Animals: Cattle)

BULLOCK (See Animals: Cattle)

BULRUSH (See Plants)

BUNAH (bū'nà), a great-great-grandson of Judah (I Chron. 2:25) in the early days of the judges.

BUNNI (bŭn'ī), three Levites mentioned in Nehemiah had this name. 1. A helper of Ezra (Neh. 9:4).

2. An early dweller in Jerusalem in the fifth century B.C. (Neh. 11:15).

3. One of the chief covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:15).

BURDEN, that which is laid upon one in order to be carried. The word translates eight different words in the OT and three in the NT. When it is literally used, it is easily understood and needs no special comment. Figuratively, it is used in the sense of "responsibility" (Num. 11:11; Matt. 11: 30) or of a "sorrow" (Ps. 55:22), but by far the most frequent use in the OT is "oracle" (Isa. 15: 1; 19:1; 22:1, etc.). These are generally "dooms," though in Zechariah 12:1 and in Malachi 1:1 the word is used simply for a "message."

BURIAL, the act of placing a dead body in a tomb, in the earth or in the sea, generally with appropriate ceremonies; as opposed to exposure to the beasts, or abandonment or burning. Various peoples, notably the Egyptians, who believed that their dead would live and practice ordinary human occupations in "the land of the dead," often went to great lengths to preserve the bodies of their departed loved ones. They sometimes placed with the mummy tools or instruments or weapons, and occasionally slew and buried a wife or a servant to accompany the one whom they had buried.

Partly because of God's word, "Dust thou art and to dust thou shalt return" (Gen. 3:19), the people of Israel almost always buried their dead; and because the land of Canaan had so many caves, these places were very frequently used as places of burial. Probably the prevailing motive for our respect for the dead, and even for the place of burial is the sense of decency, and our feeling of love for the person, often without regarding the fact that the real person has gone and that only his former "residence" remains.

The story of the treatment of the bodies of Saul and of his sons sheds light on the whole subject. The Philistines beheaded the bodies, exhibiting the heads throughout their land and fastening Saul's body to the wall of Bethshan (I Sam. 31:8-13). The men of Israel rescued the bodies, burned them, and reverently buried the bones under a tree and mourned seven days.

It is remarkable that although God had given to Abraham the deed of the land of Canaan (Gen. 15:18-21), the only land which the patriarchs possessed before Joshua's time was the burial places for the original family: a cave at Hebron, and a field at Shechem (cf. Gen. 23 — the burial of Sarah, Gen. 49:29-32 — Jacob's final request, and Josh. 25:32,33 — the burial of the mummy of Joseph and the body of Eleazar). In Canaan, in ancient times, and in the more primitive parts of the land even today, there was (and is) no embalmment in most cases, but immediate burial to avoid unpleasant odors (Acts 5:5-10) and ceremonial uncleanness (Num. 19:11-22). In the time of Christ, men's bodies were wrapped in clean linen (Matt. 27:57-60) and spices and ointments were prepared (Luke 23:56).

The strange story of the dead Moabite reviving when he touched the bones of Elisha (II Kings 13:20,21), shows not only the speedy decomposition of a body, but the informality of burials in the time of war or necessity; and the still stranger story of the disobedient prophet (I Kings 13) shows how a heathen altar could be defiled by the burning of bones upon it (13:1-3) and the desire of a prophet to be buried near another whom he honored (13:30,31). In several cases of sinful rulers, ordinary burial was denied to their bodies: the dogs ate Jezebel (II Kings 9:10); Jehoram of Judah, who died with incurable diseases, was not buried with the kings (II Chron. 21:18-20); Uzziah was buried in a field, not in the tombs of the kings (II Chron. 26:23); and Jehoiakim was buried with the burial of an ass (Jer. 22:18,19).

BURNING. God's judgments have often been accompanied with fire, e.g. Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:24-28), Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:1-6), the 250 rebels in the wilderness (Num. 16:2,35). The final dissolution of this present evil world is to be with fierce fire (II Pet. 3:7-10,12).

BURNING BUSH, a thorny bush which Moses saw burning and from which he heard Jehovah speak (Exod. 3:2,3; Deut. 33:16; Mark 12:26). Many attempts have been made to identify the bush, but without success. There are varied interpretations of the exact meaning of the incident as a method of revelation. There are three other theophanies with fire in the Bible: Exodus 13:21; 19:18; II Thess. 1:8 KJV (yet to be fulfilled).

BURNT OFFERING (See Offerings)

BUSH (See Plants)

BUSHEL (See Weights & Measures)

BUSINESS (See Trade and Travel)

BUTLER (See Occupations and Professions)

BUTTER. After the milk has been churned and the "butter" (in our sense of the word) produced, it is boiled and the curds separated from the almost pure oil; this is poured into a goatskin and kept until slightly rancid (to western taste) and then is used with food, but more generally for frying eggs or vegetables. It is mentioned eleven times in the OT, of which three are figurative uses: (Job 20:17, "the brooks of honey and butter"; 29:6, "when I washed my steps with butter"; and Psalm 55:21, "the words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart"). In the other cases, where the word is used literally, e.g. Gen. 18:8, it implies good eating.

BUZ (bŭz). 1. A nephew of Abraham, second son of Nahor (Gen. 22:21) whose family apparently settled in Arabia. See Jeremiah 25:23, where Buz is mentioned with various districts of Arabia. The word means "contempt" and probably illustrates an eastern superstition of giving a baby an unpleasant name so as "to avert the evil eye." One belonging to this region was a "Buzite" (see Job 32:2,6).

2. Head of a family in the tribe of Gad (I Chron. 5:14) otherwise unknown.

BUZI (bū'zī), Ezekiel's father (Ezek. 1:3).

BYBLOS (See Gebal)

BYWAYS, literally "crooked paths." The word occurs only in Judges 5:6. On account of the oppression of the enemies of Israel (Philistines and Canaanites), people dared not walk on the highways, but kept out of sight by using little-known crooked paths.

C

CAB (căb, a hollow vessel, ASV "kab"), a measure of capacity, a little less than two quarts; mentioned only in II Kings 6:25.

CABBON (kăb'ŏn), a town in Judah, taken by Israel from the Amorites (Josh. 15:40). It may be the same as Machbena (I Chron. 2:49).

CABUL (kā'bŭl). 1. A city of Galilee, mentioned in Joshua 19:27 as a border city of the tribe of Asher in the NE of Palestine. It lies between the hills about nine miles SE of Acre and is still inhabited.

2. A name given by Hiram of Tyre to a district in N Galilee, including twenty cities, which Solomon ceded to him (I Kings 9:13) and which probably included the original Cabul. It seems from II Chronicles 8:2 that Hiram (Huram) returned these cities and that Solomon rebuilt them.

CAESAR (sē'zêr). 1. The name of a Roman family prominent from the third century B.C., of whom Caius Julius Caesar (c. 102—Mar. 15,44 B.C.) was by far the most prominent.

2. The title taken by each of the Roman emperors: e.g. Augustus Caesar who reigned when our Lord was born (Luke 2:1); his successor Tiberius Caesar who reigned 14-37 A.D. (Luke 3:1); Claudius Caesar, 41-54 (Acts 11:28; 18:2). Nero, under whom Peter and Paul were martyred, 54-68 (Philip. 4:22). Domitian was "Caesar" from 81-96 and it was under him that John was exiled to Patmos. "Caesar" is mentioned by our Lord (Luke 20:22-25) both literally as referring to Tiberius, and figuratively as meaning any earthly ruler. The name Caesar came to be used as a symbol of the state in general, and is often used in this sense in the NT (Matt. 22:17,21; Mark 12:14,16,17; Luke 20:22,24,25).

CAESAREA (sĕs'ă-rē'ă), a city built between 25-13 B.C. by Herod "the Great" at a vast cost and named in honor of his patron Augustus Caesar. It lay on the coast of the Mediterranean about 25 miles NW of Samaria which Herod had rebuilt and renamed "Sebaste," also in honor of Augusta. Herod intended it as the port of his capital, and a splendid harbor was constructed. Great stone blocks were used to top the reefs that helped to form the harbor. Being military headquarters for the Roman forces, and the residence of the procurators, it was the home of Cornelius in whose house Peter first preached to the Gentiles (Acts 10). It was the place of residence of Philip, the evangelist, with his four unmarried prophesying daughters (Acts 8:40; 21:8,9), who entertained Paul and Luke and their party on their return from the third missionary journey. Later it was the enforced residence of Paul while he was a prisoner for two years, and there Paul preached before King Agrippa (Acts 23:31-26:32). The Jewish war which Josephus described with such power and pathos, and which culminated in the destruction of Jerusalem, had its origin in a riot in Caesarea. Here Vespasian was proclaimed emperor of Rome in the year 69, while he was engaged in the Jewish war. In church history it was the birthplace of Eusebius (c. 260 A.D.) and the seat of his bishopric. Caesarea is still called Kaysārīyeh.

CAESAREA PHILIPPI (sĕs'ə-rē'ə fĭ-lĭp'ī, Caesarea of Philip), a town at the extreme northern boundary of Palestine, about 30 miles inland from Tyre and 50 miles SW of Damascus. It lies in the beautiful hill country on the southern slopes of Mt. Hermon, and was probably very near the scene of our Lord's transfiguration. (Cf. Matt. 16:13-17: 8; Mark 8:27-9:8). The town was very ancient, being perhaps the Baal-gad of Joshua 12:7, 13:5, and for centuries it was a center of worship of the heathen god "Pan," whence it was known as "Paneas" and whence the modern name Banias (because there is no "p" in the Arabic alphabet). Augustus Caesar presented it, with the surrounding country, to Herod the Great, who built a temple there in honor of the emperor. Herod's son, Philip the tetrarch, enlarged the town and named it Caesarea Philippi to distinguish it from the other Caesarea. It lies at the easternmost of the four sources of the Jordan, and near here these streams unite to form the main river. It was at a secluded spot near here that the Lord began to prepare His disciples for His approaching sufferings and death and resurrection, and that Peter made his famous confession (Matt. 16:13-17).

CAGE, so-called when used by the fowler to keep his live birds, but "basket" when used for fruit (Jer. 5:27; Amos 8:1,2). Cf. Revelation 18:2 KJV.

CAIAPHAS, JOSEPH (kā'yə-făs). In the century from 168 B.C. when Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated the temple, to 66 B.C. when the Romans took over, the high-priesthood was almost a political office, the priests still coming from the descendants of Aaron but being generally appointed for worldly considerations.

From 66 B.C. the Roman rulers appointed not only the civil officers (e.g. Herod) but the high-priests as well with the result that the office declined spiritually. Annas, the father-in-law of Caiaphas (John 18:13) had been high-priest by appointment of the Roman governor from 7 A.D. to 14 (see Luke 3:2) and though three of his sons succeeded for a short period, Caiaphas held the office from A.D. 18-36, with Annas still a sort of "high-priest emeritus." After our Lord had raised Lazarus from the dead (John 11) many of the Jews believed in Him (11:45,46), but some through jealousy reported the matter to the Pharisees, who with the chief priests gathered a council, fearing, or pretending to fear, that if Jesus were let alone many would accept Him, and the Romans would destroy what was left of Jewish autonomy. Then Caiaphas (John 11:41-53) declared that it would be better for Jesus to die than that the nation be destroyed. When, a little later, our Lord was betrayed into the hands of His enemies, the Roman soldiers and the Jewish officers took Him first to the house of Annas, where by night He was given the pretense of a trial (John 18:12-23). Then Annas sent Him bound to Caiaphas before whom the "trial" continued (John 18:24-27). Thence He was delivered to Pilate, because the Jews could not legally execute Him. A.B.F.

CAIN (kān). 1. The first son of Adam and Eve, and a farmer by occupation. As an offering to God, he brought some of the fruits of the ground, while his brother brought an animal sacrifice. Angry that his offering was not received (Heb. 11:4 shows that this was because of the lack of a right disposition toward Jehovah), he slew his brother. He added to his guilt before God by denying his guilt and giving no evidence of repentance. He fled to the land of Nod and there built a city, becoming the ancestor of a line which included Jabal, forefather of tent-dwelling cattle-keepers; Jubal, forefather of musicians; Tubal-cain, forefather of smiths; and Lamech, a man of violence. His wife must have been one of his own sisters — not an impropriety in those days.

2. The progenitor of the Kenites (Josh. 15:57).

3. A village in Judah (Josh. 15:57).

CAINAN (kā-ī'năn). 1. In ASV "Kenan," the fourth from Adam in the Messianic line (Gen. 5:12-14; I Chron. 1:2; Luke 3:37).

2. A son of Arphaxad (Luke 3:36), omitted in Genesis 10:24; 11:12, but found in the LXX, from which Luke quotes.

CALAH (kā'là), a very ancient city of Assyria on the upper reaches of the Tigris, built originally by Nimrod, who is listed in Genesis 10:6-12 as a grandson of Ham, son of Noah. According to KJV, the builder was "Asshur" an eponym for Assyria, but cf. ASV. The city was apparently rebuilt by Shalmanezer I (reigned c. 1456-1436 B.C.), then later abandoned for many centuries till Ashurnasir-pal who is pictured as "Ruthlessness Incarnate" (reigned c. 926-902 B.C.) restored it. Aside from the Bible mention, the city is famous for having been the site of immense statuary in the form of winged lions and winged bulls some of which can be seen in the British Museum today. Several great palaces have been excavated there, and the place is now known as "Nimrud."

CALCOL (See Chalcol)

CALDRON, a large pot or vessel in which meat is to be boiled (Jer. 52:18,19 [ASV "pots"]; Ezek. 11:3,7,11). In Job 41:20 it is probably a mistranslation.

CALEB (kā'lĕb, dog). 1. The son of Jephunneh, the Kenezite; the prince of Judah who represented his tribe among the twelve chief men whom Moses sent from the wilderness to Paran to spy out the land (Num. 13:6). Most of the spies brought back a pessimistic report. Their names are almost forgotten, but two heroes of faith, Caleb and Joshua, who encouraged the people to go up and take the land are still remembered. Because Israel in cowardice adopted the majority report, God imposed upon them forty years "wandering" in the wilderness till that generation should die out. Caleb was 40 years old when the spies were sent (Josh. 14:7). At the age of 85, at the distribution of the land of Canaan, he asked for Hebron and the hill country where lived the fearful Anakim who had terrorized ten of the spies, and Joshua gave it to him. Later he became father-in-law of Othniel, the first of the "judges," by giving him Achsah his daughter (Judg. 1:12-15,20).

2. A son of Hezron, son of Judah (I Chron. 2:18,19,42) probably the same as the "Chelubai" of I Chronicles 2:9.

CALEB-EPHRATAH (kā'lĕb-ĕf'rà-tà), named in I Chronicles 2:24 as the place where Hezron died. The Hebrew and LXX texts differ here; and many scholars prefer the LXX reading, "after the death of Hezron, Caleb came unto Ephrath, the wife of Hezron, his father." When a son took his father's wife, it signified that he was claiming his father's possessions.

CALENDAR (kăl'ĕn-dàr). Calendars are devised as a trustworthy means for recording history and determining dates in advance for social, civic and religious anniversaries, and for economic planning. Comparatively little is known of the calendar of the early Israelites from the patriarchs to the Exile, but a critical study of the Biblical records and archaeological discoveries is rewarding.

During the Bible period, time was reckoned solely on astronomical observations. The early Chaldean and Egyptian astrologers became quite learned in the movements of astronomical bodies. Their discoveries, as well as those of other Near Eastern neighbors, made their impact on the Jewish calendar. From earliest times the sun and moon were determinants of periodicity, days, months and years.

I. Days in the Biblical record of time begins with the account of creation. Various reckonings and measurements were derived from these early records. The order of the Jewish day, beginning in the evening, was based on the repeated phrase, "and there was evening, and there was morning" (Gen. 1:5b). While the Babylonian day, like that of most Near Easterners, began at sunrise, the Jewish day began at sunset (Deut. 23:11). Actually the demarcation between the end of one day and the beginning of another as observed by the ancient Israelites was that moment when three stars of the second magnitude became visible. This is confirmed in Nehemiah (4:21) "so we labored at the work, and half of them held the spears from the break of dawn till the stars came out."

Days of the week were not named by the Jews, but were designated by ordinal numbers. The term "sabbath" was not the name of the seventh day but a sacred designation.

Days were also subdivided in a manner set forth in the Creation account. And God said, "Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to separate the day from the night . . . the greater light to rule the day" (Gen. 1:14-16; see also Num. 9:16; Ruth 3:13).

Days were further subdivided into hours and watches. The day, as distinguished from the night, showed no exact divisions into parts in early Biblical records. It was, however, divided into periods of indefinite lengths designated by the terms "evening," "morning," "mid-day," and "the day declines" (Judg. 19:8). Dividing the day into hours was probably a later adoption. The Hebrew word for hour, sha'ah variously translated, is Aramaic (Dan. 3:6; 4:33), but Babylonians and Egyptians had hour-marking devices long before Daniel, and apparently Israel did, too. Babylonians divided the day by sun-watches into twelve equal parts, which were subdivided by the sexagenary system into minutes and seconds. The Egyptians divided the day plus the night into twenty-four hours, for which they had at least two calibrated measuring devices. One was a shadow clock, comprised of a horizontal piece of wood with markings to which was attached at one end a short T-like piece, set toward the E in the morning and toward the W in the afternoon. A specimen, dating about 1400 B.C., is now in the Berlin Museum. Another Egyptian timepiece was the water-clock, clepsydra, the oldest known specimen of which dates from the reign of Amenhotep III, c. 1400 B.C. It is of alabaster, shaped like a flower-pot, with calibrated marks inside and a small aperture near the bottom through which the water gradually flowed out. Whether borrowed or devised the Jews had sundials as early as the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah, c. 715-687 B.C. When he was deathly sick, "Isaiah the prophet cried to the Lord; and he brought the shadow back ten steps, by which the sun had declined on the dial of Ahaz" (II Kings 20:11; Isa. 38:8). In the New Testament, John 11:9) records the rhetorical question of Jesus, "Are there not twelve hours in the day?" — as distinguished from night. This kind of daily reckoning is also seen in the crucifixion account which mentions the third, sixth and ninth hours (Mark 15: 25; 33f), referring to 9 A.M., noon, and 3 P.M. respectively.

Early Hebrews divided the nights into three watches: "the morning watch" (Exod. 14:24); "the middle watch" (Judg. 7:19); and "at the beginning of the watches" (Lam. 2:19). The Romans divided the night into four watches, from which Jesus drew an analogy in his eschatological warning of unpredictable time — ". . . in the evening, or at midnight, or at cockcrow, or in the morning" (Mark 13:35).

II. Weeks constituted special and significant periodicity units for the "chosen people." The seven-day week is of Semitic origin, but reckoned from various reference points. The Babylonians and Assyrians bound their weeks to the lunar cycle, corresponding with the four phases, and began anew with each new moon. The Jewish week had its origin in the Creation account of seven days' duration, and ran consecutively in a free week system irrespective of lunar or solar cycles. This was out of the high esteem held for the sabbath. Conversely, the Egyptian week had ten days.

Astronomical bodies were divinely ordained in creation to be timemarkers. Days and years were measured by the sun; months by the moon; and cycles by sun, moon and stars. The week alone was not controlled by celestial bodies, but originated by divine command for man's economic, physical and spiritual welfare.

Though God placed special emphasis on the seventh day at the time of creation (Gen. 1:2f), the records are silent as to its observance during the long intervening interlude between then and Moses' day. If those of the pre-flood era or of the patriarchal period observed a "sabbath," there are no Biblical records of it. However, since it was kept alive in tradition until recorded in Genesis, it is a reasonable conjecture that it was preserved in practice also. Anyway, it was either revived or given special emphasis by Moses. The first recorded instance of the observance of "a day of solemn rest, a holy sabbath to the Lord" (Exod. 16:23) was when the Israelites were gathering manna in the wilderness. Subsequently, the sabbath became the most holy, as well as the most frequent of all the sacred days observed by the Jews.

When the fourth commandment in the Decalogue, "Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy" (Exod. 20:8), was transmitted to Israel by Moses, it was designated as a perpetual memorial sign of the covenant between God and His chosen people. "And the Lord said to Moses, 'Say to the people of Israel, You shall keep my sabbaths, for this is a sign between me and you throughout your generations, that you may know that I, the Lord, sanctify you" (Exod. 31:13). Thereafter it became a distinctive Jewish day, with successive injunctions to observe it, describing the manner of doing so, and the penalties for its desecration (Exod. 23:12; 35:2f). Emphasis on keeping "His holy sabbath" is seen in the Habakkuk (1:5) commentary of the Dead Sea Scrolls and the bitter accusations hurled at Jesus on this point (Mark 2:24). However superficial might have been the observance by some of Jesus' contemporaries, He confirmed its divine authenticity by going "to the synagogue, as his custom was," on the sabbath day to teach, preach and heal (Luke 4:16). Early Christian Jews made a habit of assembling on the first day of the week to commemorate Jesus' resurrection on that day (Luke 24:1); hence the last day became the first for worship and rest in Christendom.

III. Months, in effect, is a synonym for moons. Ancient people seemingly universally worshiped the moon and measured time by it, probably because of its conspicuousness and regular occurrence. The Arabic word for moon means "the measurer," and the Egyptian moon god, Thoth, was the god of measure. Even apostate Jews at times worshiped the moon along with other heavenly bodies (II Kings 23:5; Jer. 8:2).

"Moon" was synonymous with "month" in common parlance in Moses' day (Exod. 19:1). Later, when the responsibility of making the calendar was vested in the Sanhedrin, three of their number, including the chief, were entrusted as watchmen to report the first appearance of the new moon. A declaration of the beginning of a new month was then quickly dispatched over the country by fire signals, and later by messengers. The patriarch Hillel probably introduced the constant calendar.

The early Israelites designated their months by names which they borrowed from the Canaanites or Phoenicians. These names had seasonal connotations as implied in the four which have survived in the early Biblical records. Abib (Exod. 13:4; Deut. 16:1), corresponding to Nisan in the later calendar, means "month of the ripening ears." Ziv (I Kings 6:1), corresponding to Iyyar, means "month of flowers." Ethanim (I Kings 8:2), corresponding to Tishri, means "month of perennial streams." Bul (I Kings 6:38), corresponding to Marchesvan, means "rain or showers," being the first month in the rainy season.

About the end of the kingdom period the calendar was reformed, replacing the old names of the months with ordinal numerals, and changing the beginning of the year to spring. This is illustrated in I Kings (6:1 and 8:2), where the writer explicitly correlated the numeral month with older names, as "the month of Ziv, which is the second month." On the other hand the writer of Haggai (1:1; 2:1,10), about 520 B.C., at the time of the rebuilding of the temple, uses the numeral designation of months without any explanatory references. Yet Zechariah, a contemporary work, relates the numeral month to the Babylonian names, which came into popular use after the Exile. This is illustrated in the seventh verse of the first chapter in the expression "the eleventh month which is the month Shebat," and in chapter seven, verse one, "the ninth month, which is Chislev."

The post-exilic names of months were, as confirmed by the Talmud, adopted from the Babylonian calendar, but not used for civil and historical purposes. These, like the early Canaanite names, had their origin close to nature, as is seen from their derivations. Nisan — "move," "start," being the first month of the ecclesiastical year as well as of the vernal equinox; Iyyar — "to be bright," "flower"; Sivan — "appoint," "mark"; Tammuz—name of an ancient Akkadian god identified with vegetation; Ab — "hostile" heat, "bulrushes" growing; Elul — "to shout for joy" at vintage; Tishri — "begin" civil year, "dedicate" to the sun-god by Babylonians, and to which the Jews might have associated the Creation and the Day of Judgment; Marchesvan — "drop," "rainy season"; Kislev — (derivation uncertain); Tebeth — "to sink," "dip"; Shebat — (unknown); Adar — "to be dark."

The Gezer Calendar, dated in the tenth century B.C., gives an interesting glimpse into the agricultural life in Palestine at that early date. This archaeological find by Macalister is a limestone plaque bearing a Hebrew inscription enumerating farm operations for eight months, mentioning sowing, flax harvest, barley harvest, and vine pruning.

IV. Years. The Jewish calendar contained two concurrent years, the sacred year, beginning in the spring with the month Nisan, and the civil year, beginning in the fall with Tishri. The sacred year was instituted by Moses following the Exodus, and consists of 12 or 13 lunar months of 29½ days each. The civil year claims a more remote antiquity, reckoning from the Creation, which traditionally took place in autumn (3760 B.C.). It came into popular use in the third century of the Christian Era. That this order of the year was kept by the ancient Hebrews is supported by the Mosaic command, "You shall keep the feast of ingathering at the end of the year, when you gather in from the field the fruit of your labor" (Exod. 23:16).

The Babylonians and Egyptians devised the intercalary month in order to reconcile the lunar and solar years. The Jewish leap years in their Metonic cycle of 19 years were fixed, adding an intercalary month to the 3rd, 6th, 9th, 11th, 14th, 17th, and 19th years. If, on the 16th of the month Nisan, the sun had not reached the vernal equinox, the month was declared to be the second Adhar and the following one Nisan.

In 46 B.C. a great advance over contemporary calendars was made by Julius Caesar, whose calendar year contained 365¼ days. It had a discrepancy of 11 minutes in excess of the solar year, and so was superseded by the Gregorian calendar in A.D. 1582, which was adopted by England in 1752. It has the infinitesimal error of gaining one day in 3,325 years.

Josephus (Ant. I, iii, 3) said that Moses ordered that the year of holy days and religious festivals begin with Nisan, the month in which the Exodus transpired, but that he retained the old order of year for buying and selling and secular affairs. This observation has been confirmed by critical study and subsequent Jewish custom of keeping both a sacred and a civil year.

Feasts and fasts were intricately woven into the lunar-solar sacred year. Three great historic feasts were instituted by Moses: "the feast of unleavened bread"; "the feast of harvest"; and "the feast of ingathering" (Exod. 23:14-17), corresponding roughly to Passover, Pentecost, and Thanksgiving. There were also numerous minor feasts.

Beginning in the month Nisan or Abib (Neh. 2:1; Exod. 23:15) the sacred holidays of feasts and fasts came in the following order. On the 14th of Nisan, the first month, the Passover (Exod. 12:18f; 13:3-10) was observed in preparation for the following week's festival and in eating the paschal supper (see Matt. 26:17-29). The 15th to 21st was the Feast of Unleavened Bread (Lev. 23:6) which included, on the 15th, a sabbath, a day of holy convocation; on the 16th, Omer or presenting the first sheafs of harvest; and on the 21st another holy convocation. This is also the month of latter or spring rains when the Jordan was in flood (Josh. 3:15).

Christian Easter, fulfilling the Passover, is reckoned on solar-lunar cycles, coming on the first full moon on or after the vernal equinox (March 21).

The name of the second month, Iyyar, known formerly as Ziv (I Kings 6:1,37), does not occur in the Bible, as is also true with Tammuz, Ab, and Marchesvan. The Jews fasted on the 10th in commemoration of the death of Elijah; the 14th was the Second or Little Passover for those who could not keep the regular one (Num. 9:10,11); and on the 16th was a fast for the death of Samuel.

Pentecost or Feast of Weeks, or of Harvest, or of Firstfruits, when loaves as firstfruits of the gathered harvest were presented (Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:17,20; Num. 28:26; Deut. 16:9f) was celebrated on the sixth or seventh of Sivan (Esth. 8:9). (Cf. Acts 2:1.) This was the first of the two great agricultural feasts, coming at the end of seven weeks after the beginning of barley harvest, or 50 days after the Passover.

Next in annual order was the Jewish New Year (Rosh Hashanah), one of the most important and probably the oldest feast, observed on the first day of the civil year, in the month, Tishri, the former Ethanim or seventh month (I Kings 8:2). It was called the Feast of Trumpets, a precursor of one emblem of modern New Year's celebration. It was a day of holy convocation, of reading the law (Neh. 8:1-8), of blowing trumpets, of burnt offerings, of cereal offerings, and of profound solemnity, introducing "Ten Days of Repentance" (Num. 29:1-16; Ezra 3:4-6). This protracted feast culminated in the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), Tishri 10th, one of the most holy days for the Jews. This is strictly a fast day and the only one commanded by law (Lev. 16:26-34; 23:27-32), called "the fast" in Acts 27:9. The Jewish Calendar makes "provision that neither Rosh Hashanah nor Yom Kippur may fall on the day before or the day after the sabbath, or the seventh day of Tabernacles on a sabbath." From the 15th to 21st of Tishri the Jews held the Feast of Ingatherings or Tabernacles or Booths (recalling the wilderness wandering), when the Firstfruits of wine and oil were offered (Exod. 23:16; Lev. 23:34-42; Deut. 16:13). It was a day of soul-searching and expiation of sins and of deep gratitude to God. It was the third of the three great feasts commanded by Moses, and the second of the two great agricultural feasts, corresponding to our modern Thanksgiving.

Winter holy days were few, though one of significance is mentioned in the Gospel of John (10:22f): "It was the Feast of the Dedication at Jerusalem; it was winter, and Jesus was walking in the temple." Dedication of the Temple was instituted by Judas Maccabaeus in 164 B.C. This feast was held on the 25th of Chislev (Zech. 7:1), which month was followed by the tenth month, Tebeth (Esth. 2:16), and the eleventh month, Shebat (Zech. 1:7).

Besides the one divinely ordained fast, the Day of Atonement, there were minor fasts, some temporary (Ezra 9:5; Neh. 1:4) and some annual. One fast in memory of the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:1-7), instituted after the Exile, was observed on the ninth of Ab. Another, the fast of Esther, was observed on the 13th of Adar and followed the next two days by the Feast of Purim.

The lunar-solar year of Jewish feasts, fasts, and farming was fortified between the divine order of heavenly bodies "for signs and for seasons and for days and years" (Gen. 1:14), and the divine promise after the Flood that "While the earth remains, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night shall not cease" (Gen. 8:22).

V. Cycles. Inspired by God's hallowing the seventh day in creation, the Jews derived a special sacredness for the number seven. Religious convocations and festivals were highly regarded on the seventh day, seventh week, seventh month, seventh year, and seven times seven years.

Hence, the epitome of the sabbatical feasts, of which the perennial ones have been mentioned, may thus appear. The sabbath of seven days; Pentecost, at the end of seven weeks after Passover; the Feast of Trumpets, introducing the sacred seventh month, were all "appointed assemblies" (mo'adhim) of the Lord.

The sabbatical year was one of solemn rest for landlords, slaves, beasts of burden, and land, and freedom for Hebrew slaves. The volunteer produce of farm and vineyard was to be gathered and consumed by the poor alone (Exod. 23:10f; Lev. 25:20-22). The sabbatical and jubilee years were synchronized with the civil or agricultural year, beginning in autumn.

The Jubilee, every 50th year, following "seven weeks of years," was a hallowed year whose observance included family reunions, canceled mortgages, and return of lands to original owners (Lev. 25:8-17).

VI. Eras in the Bible calendar comprise the whole span of time from the Creation of the world to the consummation of the ages. Great events are terminal markers. These mountain peaks of time, in chronological sequence, are Creation, Flood, Abraham, Exodus, Exile and Birth of Jesus. Consequently the eras may be designated Antediluvian, Post-diluvian, Patriarchal, Israelite, Judean, and Christian. (Cf. Matt. 1:2-17; Luke 3:23-37.)

Astronomically, that phenomenal star which guided the Magi divided human history. It is the pivotal point from which all history is dated, terminating the old order and initiating the new. It stands as the signal reference point of all time, the pre-eminent red-letter date in the Bible calendar. In the Jewish calendar it separates the history "Before the Christian Era" (B.C.E.) from that of the "Christian Era" (C.E.). In the Christian calendar it separates all "Before Christ" (B.C.) from that in "Anno Domini" (A.D.), "year of our Lord." G.B.F.

CALF, a young bull or cow. Calves were used for food and for sacrifice. Calves used for sacrifice were usually males a year old.

CALF, GOLDEN (See Calf Worship)

CALF WORSHIP was a part of the religious worship of almost all ancient Semitic peoples. At least as early as the Exodus, living bulls were worshiped in Egypt. The Babylonians looked upon the bull as the symbol of their greatest gods. The bull was a sacred animal in Phoenicia and Syria. Among the Semitic Canaanites the bull was the symbol of Baal. It appears that the bull was in some way connected with the reproductive processes of plants and animals and with the sun. It symbolized strength, vigor, and endurance.

The bronze bull-calf of the god Apis of Egypt.

Aaron made a golden image of a male calf in order that the people might worship Jehovah under this form (Exod. 32:4). It is very unlikely that the Golden Calf was a representation of an Egyptian deity. The feast held in connection with this worship was a "feast of Jehovah" (Exod. 32:5).

After the division of the kingdom, Jeroboam set up two golden calves in his kingdom, one at Bethel and one at Dan (I Kings 12:28,29) because he feared that his people might desert him if they continued to worship in Jerusalem. He was not trying to make heathenism the state religion, for the bull images were erroneously supposed to represent Jehovah. In time, these images, at first recognized as symbols, came to be regarded as common idols (I Kings 12:30; Hos. 13:2). S.B.

CALKER, one who makes a boat waterproof whether in building or repairing (Ezek. 27:9,27). The men of Gebal (modern Jebail) were calkers for Tyre.

CALL (Gr. klésis, calling), one of the most common verbs in the Bible, representing over 20 words in the Hebrew and Greek text; but principally with one or another of four different meanings: 1. To speak out in the way of prayer — "Call unto me, and I will answer thee" (Jer. 33:3).

2. To summon or appoint — "I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the earth (Jer. 1:15).

3. To name a person or thing —"and God called the light Day" (Gen. 1:5).

4. To invite men to accept salvation through Christ. This last is a call by God through the Holy Spirit, and is heavenly (Heb. 3:1) and holy (II

Tim. 1:9). I Corinthians 1:26 and 7:20 use the word in a peculiar sense, as referring to that condition of life in which men were when they became Christians.

CALNEH (kăl'nĕ), one of the four cities, including also Babel, Erech (whence "Iraq"), and Akkad which were founded by Nimrod in the third generation after the Flood (Gen. 10:10). It was in the land of Shinar in the southern part of Mesopotamia. It is not identified, but Kulunu and Nippur have been suggested.

CALNO (kăl'nō), a city named in Isaiah 10:9 in a list of the Assyrians' victories. Almost certainly the same as Calneh q.v.

CALVARY (kăl'vȧ-rē, Lat. calvaria, skull), a place not far from the walls of Jerusalem where Christ was crucified and near which He was buried (Luke 23:33). The Latin calvaria is a rendering of the Greek kranion, skull, which renders the Hebrew Gulgoleth and the Aramaic Gulgulta. The common explanation is that the name was due to the cranial shape of the hill.

The exact site of Calvary is a matter of dispute. Two sites contend for acceptance, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which is within the walls of the modern city; and the Green Hill, or Gordon's Calvary, in which is Jeremiah's Grotto, a few hundred feet NE of the Damascus Gate. The first is supported by ancient tradition, while the second was suggested for the first time in 1849, although much is to be said in its favor.

CAMEL, the well-known "ship of the desert" because of its ability to go long without water and to pad safely through soft sand; and to the Arabs a prized possession. The fact that the word for "camel" is practically identical in Hebrew and in Arabic tells us that the patriarchs knew and used camels long before they used horses. They are mentioned prominently in the inventories of Abraham (Gen. 12:16), Jacob (Gen. 30:43) and of Job (Job 1:3 cf. 42:12). Though the camel was reckoned as unclean to the Hebrews (Lev. 11:4) its milk was used (Gen. 32:15). The "dromedaries" of I Kings 4:28 were probably swift horses (cf. ASV). Though some writers have described them as "docile," "stupid" would be a better word. They obey in a grumbling way and growl as loudly while being unloaded as when being loaded. Not dangerous except for a month in winter; but their bite is dangerous because of their filthy teeth. See also ANIMALS.

CAMEL'S HAIR, mentioned only in Matthew 3:4 and Mark 1:6, where we are told that John the Baptist wore a garment of camel's hair. It is probable, however, that this was not a garment made of the relatively expensive woven camel's hair, but of dressed camel's skin. Such garments are still used in the Near East. Some think that Elijah's mantle was made of camel's hair (II Kings 1:8; cf. Zech. 13:4).

CAMON or KAMON (kā'mŏn), a town in Gilead mentioned in Judges 10:5 as the burial place of the judge Jair.

CAMP, ENCAMPMENT (Heb. mahăneh), a group of tents intended for traveling or for temporary residence as in case of war — contrasted with village, town or city which are composed of houses and other more or less permanent buildings. The word mahaneh occurs over 200 times and is properly rendered by "camp," but 61 times it is translated "host" and four times "army," indicating the military purpose of the encampment. In Genesis 32:1,2, when the angels of God met Jacob, he exclaimed "This is God's host" (literally "camp") and he named the place "Mahanaim" or "Two Camps," referring to God's host and his own. Israel in the wilderness was given precise instructions as to the order and arrangements of its camp, both at rest and in traveling (Num. 2,3). The tabernacle in the center indicated the centrality of God in their life and worship. It was surrounded rather closely by the priests and Levites; and then further back were the 12 tribes, grouped in threes and led by Judah on the E, Reuben on the S, Ephraim on the W, and Dan on the N. In Deuteronomy 23:9-14 are given the sanitary and ceremonial observances which were used to keep the camp clean and wholesome. A.B.F.

CAMPHIRE (kăm'fīr, Heb. kōpher), an Asiatic thorny shrub with fragrant white flowers (S. of Sol. 1:14; 4:13). "Henna-flowers" in ASV.

CANA of Galilee (kā'nȧ of găl'ĭ-lē), mentioned four times in the Gospel of John (2:1-11; 4:36-54; 21:2) and nowhere else in Scripture. It was in the highlands of Galilee, as one had to go down from there to Capernaum; but opinions differ as to its exact location. It may have been at "Kefr Kenna" about five miles NE of Nazareth, or at "Kana-el-Jelil" a little further N. Here Jesus performed His first miracle, graciously relieving the embarrassment caused by the shortage of wine at a marriage feast. It was here too (John 4:46) that he announced to the nobleman from Capernaum the healing of his apparently dying son; and Nathanael was of Cana (John 21:2).

CANAAN, CANAANITES (kā'năn, kā'năn-īts). 1. Canaan was the son of Ham in the genealogical lists in Genesis 9,10. His descendants occupied Canaan and took their name from that country (Gen. 9:18,22; 10:6).

2. Canaan was one of the old names for Palestine, the land of the Canaanites dispossessed by the Israelites. The etymology of the name is unknown, as is also the earliest history of the name; but Egyptian inscriptions of c. 1800 B.C. use it for the coastland between Egypt and Asia Minor. In the Amarna letters of c. 1400 B.C. the name is applied to the Phoenician coast. According to Judges 1:9,10, Canaanites dwelt throughout the land. In Genesis 12:6; 24:3,37; Joshua 3:10 the Canaanites include the whole pre-Israelite population, even E of the Jordan. The language of Canaan (Isa. 19:18) refers to the group of West Semitic languages of which Hebrew, Phoenician, and Moabite were dialects. The Canaanites were of Semitic stock, and were part of a large migration of Semites (Phoenicians, Amorites, Canaanites) from NE Arabia in the third millennium B.C. They came under Egyptian control c. 1500 B.C. The Israelites were never able completely to exterminate them. Many were undoubtedly absorbed by their conquerors. The continued presence rendered the religious problem of the Israelites serious and difficult. S.B.

CANAANITE, SIMON THE, so-called in Matthew 10:4 KJV, but in ASV "the Cananaean" (margin "or Zealot"); one of the original twelve apostles. He bore the epithet "Canaanite" to distinguish him from Simon Peter.

CANANAEAN (kā'nȧ-nē'ăn), the description of Simon "the Zealot" in Matthew 10:4 ASV, but "Canaanite" by mistake in KJV. Probably "zealot" (Luke 6:15) from an Aramaic word is the correct description.

CANDACE (kăn'dȧ-sē, Gr. Kandáke), the Queen of Ethiopia mentioned only in Acts 8:27. The name seems to have been a general designation of Ethiopian queens (like "Pharaoh" for Egyptian kings, and "Caesar" for Roman emperors). Her chief treasurer, a eunuch went to Jerusalem to worship and was led by Philip the evangelist to faith in Christ.

CANDLE. In a way, the word "candle" should not appear in the English Bible at all. The Hebrew word nēr, occurring 43 times, is rendered in KJV "lamp" 33 times (and this should be its rendering every time), "candle" nine times, and "light" once.

The simple fact is that in Elizabethan days in England people used candles and not lamps, whereas in ancient times in the warm climate, where the Word of God was given, men used little olive-oil lamps. Wax or tallow candles would have melted in the wilderness heat, even if they had been invented. It was the custom of the ancients to keep a house lamp burning day and night. A perennially burning lamp was a symbol of prosperity (Job 29:3; Ps. 18:28), a lamp put out, of judgment (Prov. 24:20; Jer. 25:10; Rev. 2:5).

CANDLESTICK. The Hebrew word menôrâh, always rendered "candlestick" in KJV, occurs 43 times in the OT, but could more accurately be rendered "lampstand," because the "lights" were not candles at all, but olive-oil lamps. The Aramaic word nebrashta, occurring only in Daniel 5:5, would better have been rendered "chandelier" and the Greek word luchnia would better be understood "lampstand." Matthew 5:15 KJV has "candle" and "candlestick," but ASV more correctly "lamp" and "stand." In the tabernacle, as constructed in the wilderness, the lampstand (described in Exod. 25:31-40) with its seven branches holding the seven lamps of gold, stood at the left as the priests entered the Holy place. In the temple that Solomon built, there were ten lampstands of gold (II Chron. 4:7), but they were placed in front of the Holy of Holies (I Kings 7:49; II Chron. 4:7). A.B.F.

CANDY, a word that does not occur in the Bible, but the Jews had "confections" (Exod. 30:35) and the children chewed sugar cane when they could.

CANE, probably the sweet calamus (in KJV Isa. 43:24, Jer. 6:20 only; but cf. Exod. 30:23, where it is listed among the "chief spices").

CANKER (kăn'kêr, Gr. gággraina, gangrene), a word that occurs once in Scripture, II Timothy 2: 17. It may mean cancer. See DISEASES.

CANKERWORM (Heb. yeleq), the name given to a larval stage of the locust (Joel 1:4; 2:25; Nah. 3:15,16). It was very voracious (Nah. 3:15). See INSECTS.

CANNEH (kăn'ē), mentioned only in Ezekiel 27: 23 among the towns and regions with which Tyre traded. Some identify it with Calneh, q.v.

CANONICITY (kăn-ŏn-ĭc'ĭtē). The word "canon" originally meant "measuring rule," hence "standard." In theology its chief application is to those books received as authoritative and making up our Bible. The Protestant canon includes 39 books in the Old Testament, 27 in the New. The Roman Catholic Canon adds seven books and some additional pieces to the Old Testament (see Apocrypha). The Jews receive as authoritative the same 39 books as do Protestants.

It is commonly said that the Protestant test of canonicity is inspiration. That is, Protestants receive into their canon those books which they believe to be immediately inspired of God and therefore true, infallible, inerrant, the very Word of God. Creeds of the Reformation age often listed the books received as inspired, but the Protestant churches have received these books not because of the decision of a Church or Council, but because the books themselves were recognized as true and inspired, having God for their author. The history of the acceptance of these books and the study of the principles on which this reception occurred is an important phase of Bible introduction.

The Old Testament Canon

The Jewish Talmud of about 400 A.D. names the books of the Jewish canon in approximately the order found in our Hebrew Bibles today. By combining the 12 Minor Prophets, counting the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles each as one book, etc., they arrive at the number of 24 books, divided into 5 of law, 8 of prophets, and 11 books of writings (Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra-Nehemiah, Chronicles). In earlier days they combined Ruth with Judges, Lamentations with Jeremiah and thus made 22 books equivalent to the 22 letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Origen, the Christian scholar of about A.D. 250, lists 22 OT books, but not in the order of the Talmud. Earlier, Melito of Sardis about A.D. 170 tells us that he went to Palestine to ascertain accurately the number of Old Testament books. He lists the five books of the Law first, then the others following in an order rather similar to that of our English Bible.

Before Melito, we have the vital witness of the Jewish historian Josephus. About A.D. 90 he wrote his work against Apion. In it, (i.8), he says that the Jews receive 22 books—5 of the Law of Moses, 13 of prophecy, and 4 of hymns to God and precepts for life. These books, he says, the pious Jew would rather die than to alter or deny. He says these books were written by Moses and the succeeding prophets from that time to the days of Artaxerxes (around 400 B.C.) and that their other later books, not being by prophets, were not thus regarded. It is obvious that the Talmudic order and classification of the books had not yet arisen in Josephus' day.

About A.D. 90 the Jews held the Council of Jamnia. We have only the later Talmudic reports concerning it, but apparently the canonicity of certain books was discussed, Ecclesiastes, Proverbs, etc. It should be made emphatic that this was not the time of original canonization of any book, as Josephus' witness assures us. Doubters arise in any age. But that Proverbs was already considered as canonical in the second century B.C. we can now prove by the reference in the Zadokite Documents xi. 20.

Earlier evidence on the OT canon gives us no listing, but considerable valuable information. Philo, the Egyptian Jew of the first century A.D., evidently received the 22 Hebrew books, for he quotes from many of them and from them only, as authoritative. The NT evidence is in accord. Most of the OT books are quoted and the seven apocryphal books are not. The NT gives no positive evidence on the order of the books, but it reveals in general a twofold division of the OT such as is found in Melito rather than the threefold. A dozen times the OT is referred to as the "Law and the prophets" or "Moses and the prophets," etc. As is evident from NT usage, this twofold category included all 22 books. Only once does it adopt the threefold classification, Moses and the prophets and the Psalms (Luke 24:44; but cf. vs. 27).

Pre-Christian evidence has been greatly augmented by the discovery of the Dead Sea scrolls. Previously, only the apocryphal books and other Jewish writings were available. These sources occasionally quoted books of the OT, but not with great frequency. Of special importance was the prologue to Ecclesiasticus, dated in 132 B.C. Three times it refers to the "law, and the prophets, and the other books of our fathers." One time it refers to these as already translated into Greek—the LXX. Because of the antiquity of this witness, the threefold canon was formerly held to be original. The twofold canon of the NT was not then explained. The Dead Sea Scrolls now, however, give four places (Zadokite Documents v. 21; vii. 15ff; Manual of Discipline 1,3; viii. 13ff) where the OT is referred to in two categories, the law and the prophets, as is usual in the NT. That this twofold canon included all our present books seems obvious from the fact that the Qumran Community quoted from most of the OT books, including those later classified in the third division of "writings," and has left manuscripts of all the Biblical books, except Esther. Thus the twofold canon is as early or earlier than the threefold. In line with this evidence is the fact that the LXX translation, at least in later copies, accords with the twofold, but not the threefold division.

From the above outline of evidence it is easily seen that the apocryphal books of Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, I and II Maccabees, and certain additions to Esther and Daniel, have no ancient authority and were not received by Christ, the apostles, or the Jewish people. Only in the Roman Catholic Council of Trent of about

A.D. 1545 were they canonized and then it was likely a result of the reaction against the Reformers.

It also appears that the critical development theory that the law was canonized in 400 B.C., the prophets in 200 B.C. and the writings in A.D. 90 is opposed to the facts. Some of the books concerning which the Council at Jamnia at A.D. 90 had questions were already accepted in the Qumran texts (Proverbs, in the Zadokite Documents xi,20) or were in A.D. 90 actually counted among the prophets by Josephus. The view is that Daniel was not classed among the prophets because it was not written until 165 B.C. after the canon of the prophets had closed. But now it is admitted that Ecclesiastes, also among the writings in our Hebrew Bibles, was composed before 250 B.C. Josephus' testimony is also clear. Daniel was among the prophets in the early days.

The view of the conservative W. H. Green also is in error. He said the third division was composed by men who did not have the office of a prophet (Daniel, he claims, had the gift but not the office). But Daniel was among the prophets in antiquity. So were Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles, Ruth, etc. Furthermore, how does Green know that the author of Judges, now in the second division, was a prophet, and that the author of Chronicles, now in the third division, was not?

The fact is that those who spoke the word of God to Israel were called prophets. There is no record of any group who were inspired without being prophets. Most of the OT books were clearly written by prophets. The authors of some others, like Joshua and Proverbs, Song of Solomon, most of the Psalms, etc., were also prophets—at least they received revelations from God (Num. 12:6). For several books information on authorship is lacking, but even Green admits that Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings were written by prophets. One has as much right to hold that Ruth, Job, Esther, Chronicles, etc., were by prophets as to say that Judges was. Certainly these books are included under the designation "prophets" in the Qumran scrolls and in the NT. If books of prophetic origin were to be received by Israel, this is a practical test that would check on the authority of written teaching as well as oral (cf. Deut. 13:1-5; 18:15-22). On this basis it can be explained how it was that the writings of prophets were accorded prompt acceptance by the faithful (cf. Josh. 1:7,8; Jer. 36:8-16; 26:18; Dan. 9:2, etc.). Hebrews 1:1 sums up the whole matter, "God . . . spake . . . by the prophets."

The New Testament Canon

Information on the early use of the NT books has been augmented in recent years both by the discovery of old portions of the NT and of early books quoting it.

There has been no question among the Christian churches since early times as to which books belong in the NT. All branches of Christendom have accepted as authoritative and inspired the current 27 books. They are accepted as authoritative because they are held to be true and immediately inspired of God.

Copies of the NT date from an early age. Already in the last century two remarkable old manuscripts had come to light—Sinaiticus and Vaticanus —from about AD. 325. Since then, the discovery of the Chester Beatty papyri has given portions from the previous century which cover parts of the Gospels and Acts, most of the Pauline Epistles and about half of Revelation. In 1935 an even more remarkable fragment was published. Though small —parts of five verses of John 18—it is precious as being the earliest. This Rylands papyrus is dated to the first half of the second century, or around A.D. 125. When skeptical scholars of the last century dated the fourth Gospel around 170, little did they know that there existed a piece of it coming from within 30 years of John's lifetime!

Recently the sands of Egypt have yielded new treasures. The Bodmer papyrus of John, dating from about A.D. 200, is almost complete. Another Bodmer papyrus coming from the early 200's includes I and II Peter and Jude along with a portion of the Psalms. Thus some actual NT manuscripts are now not too far removed from the days of the apostles themselves.

There was early a general agreement as to the books which the church at large accepted as canonical, but early evidence is not complete in detail for every book. Several books were accepted in some quarters but not in others. Contrary to statements sometimes made, no other books beside these 27 were ever given significant or general acceptance. The history of this acceptance of books is given very carefully by Westcott in his work on the Canon and the details for individual books are extensively presented in Zahn's monumental Introduction to the NT. One must not, however, confuse the acceptance of the books with the establishment of the canon. In a sense, the canon was established at once as soon as there were inspired books, for the NT books claim authority and recognize the authority of one another. Some churches had some of the books early, but it took time for all of the books to be distributed and for the evidence of their genuineness to be given to all and accepted by all. Fortunately for us, the early Christians were not gullible; they had learned to try the spirits. Furthermore, the Gnostic heresy rather soon began to multiply spurious writings and this made people cautious. It took time to convince everybody of every book. The history of the collection of the books traces this process.

The Period of A.D. 170

In brief survey, we may take three early periods for analysis. At about 170 the Muratorian Canon listed those books acknowledged to be apostolic and to be read in the churches. It includes the Gospels and Acts, mentions 13 Pauline epistles, warning against some forgeries, refers to two epistles of John—probably in addition to the first epistle which is quoted—and names Jude and the Revelation of John. It mentions an apocalypse of Peter "though some amongst us will not have this latter read in the churches." We now know it was a spurious writing. The Shepherd of Hermas is rejected as non-apostolic. Thus all our books are listed except Hebrews, James, I and II Peter which are not mentioned at all. Westcott thinks this was due to a break in the manuscript's archetype, for all these had been accepted earlier.

The Period of A.D. 140

This is the age of Justin Martyr who tells us how the Gospels (all four) are read in the church services along with the OT. He quotes several other books including Hebrews. From this period we now have new evidence in the "Gospel of Truth" discovered recently in Egypt. This book, written by the Gnostic Valentinus, was referred to by Irenaeus in 170 and dates from about 150. It weaves into its pantheistic composition all our NT books except James, II Peter, II, III John and Jude. Hebrews and Revelation are definitely included. One student, W. C. van Unnik, concludes that "round about 140-150 a collection of writings was known at Rome and accepted as authoritative which was virtually identical with our NT ("The Gospel of Truth and the NT," The Jung Codex, trans. and ed. by F. L. Cross, New York: Morehouse-Gorham, 1955, p. 124).

The Period from 95 to 118

Omitting many details, we may turn to the three great witnesses of the earliest age. Clement of Rome, Ignatius, and Polycarp all wrote between A.D. 95 and about 118. They show by quotation or clear allusion, that they knew and used all our NT books except Luke, Revelation, Colossians, Philemon, II Peter, II and III John and Jude. (See the evidence in Westcott, General Survey of the History of the Canon of the New Testament, pp. 22-48, and the author's Inspiration and Canonicity of the Bible, pp. 202-206). Moreover, these authors held the apostles in such high repute that their writings would obviously be treasured and accepted. Clement rather clearly ascribes inspiration to Paul. Actually, the omission of some of the books was not significant. Revelation and II and III John were possibly not yet written when Clement wrote in A.D. 95.

Later Problems

Although our books were accepted at an early date, yet the history of their use is discontinuous. The Gospels were never challenged until a later group of heretics questioned all the Johannine writings, claiming that they were spurious. Note that here, as usual, denial of apostolicity involved denial of authority. The book of Hebrews was continuously and from early days received and accepted as Pauline in Egypt. In Rome it was used by Clement, Justin, and Valentinus. The witness of Irenaeus (170) and Tertullian (about 200) is hardly clear. Then for a while its apostolicity was questioned and therefore its authority. Finally the views of Egypt and Palestine prevailed and it was fully accepted. II Peter had least external testimony, but here fortunately, the internal testimony is strong. Jude, which is in the Muratorian Canon and was accepted as apostolic by Tertullian, clearly quotes from II Peter 3:3. Also, if II Peter is not genuine, it is the basest of forgeries.

The New Testament Witness

And we must not forget the vital witness of the NT itself. Paul claims the authority of an apostle (I Cor. 9:1; II Cor. 12:11,12, etc.) and declares his letters are to be accepted (I Cor. 14:37; II Thess. 3:14). John in Revelation does the same (Rev. 1:3; 22:18,19). Peter insists that Paul's writings are Scripture (II Pet. 3:15; cf. 3:2). Jude quotes Peter as apostolic (Jude 18). It seems probable that I Timothy 5:18 quotes Luke 10:7 as Scripture. The fact is, as the early Church knew, that Christ had promised His apostles a special work of the Spirit, inspiring them as teachers of His revelation (John 14:26; 16:13). It is true that a few, a very few of the books were actually written by those not themselves apostles. But it is clear that the apostles used helpers in their writing (Rom. 16:22; I Pet. 5:12). The early church fathers called such men as Mark, Luke, and the author of Hebrews helpers or disciples of the apostles and accepted their work as that of the apostles with whom they labored. At least the books were all written and apparently were all accepted within the period of the apostles.

Other indications combine to teach us that these 27 books are rightly in our canon. The Holy Spirit has witnessed through the generations to the saving truth therein contained. These books have brought untold blessing where they have been received and obeyed. The church with one voice finds them to be the very word of God. R.L.H.

CAPERNAUM (kà-pûr'nā-ŭm, Gr. Kapernaóum, from Heb. Kaphar-Nahum, village of Nahum), a town on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee where Jesus made His headquarters during His ministry in Galilee (Matt. 4:13; Mark 2:1). In Scripture it is mentioned only in the Gospels, and perhaps did not arise until after the Captivity. That it was a town of considerable size in the days of Christ is shown by a number of facts: a tax-collector had his office there (Mark 2:14); a high officer of the king (Herod Antipas) had his residence there and built a synagogue for the people there (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:1-10). Jesus performed many striking miracles there, among them the healing of the centurion's palsied servant (Matt. 8:5-13), the man sick of the palsy borne by four (Mark 2:1-13), and a nobleman's son (John 4:46-54). It was there that He called Matthew to the apostleship as he was sitting at the receipt of custom (Matt. 9:9-13). The discourse on the Bread of Life, which followed the feeding of the 5,000, and many other addresses were delivered there (Mark 9:33-50). In spite of Jesus' striking works and teachings, the people did not repent, and Jesus predicted the complete ruin of the place (Matt. 11:23,24; Luke 10:15). His prophecy was so completely fulfilled that the town has disappeared and its very site is a matter of debate. There are two main claimants, about 2½ miles apart, for the honor of being the site: Tell Hum, which is about 2½ miles SW of the mouth of the Jordan; and Khan Minyeh, which is SW of Tell Hum. The present trend of opinion is in favor of Tell Hum. S.B.

CAPH (kâf), the 11th letter of the Hebrew alphabet corresponding to our "k." As a numeral it is eleven.

CAPHTOR (kăf'tôr, Heb. kaphtôr), the place from which the Philistines originally came (Amos 9:7). Jeremiah (47:4) calls it an island. There are a number of theories regarding the matter, but the one that is most widely accepted is that they came from the Isle of Crete in the Mediterranean. There is evidence of ancient connection between Crete and Philistia (Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5, where the LXX renders Cherethites "Cretans"); and the Philistines are called Cherethites, which may mean Cretans. It is possible that Caphtor includes with Crete also the other islands in the vicinity, including Caria and Lycia.

CAPPADOCIA (kăp'ă-dō'shĭ-ă), a large inland region of Asia Minor which apparently was given this name by the Persians though its people were called "Syrians" by the Greeks. In the latter time of the Persian empire the region was divided into two territories of which the more northerly was later named Pontus and the southerly Cappadocia, which name it retained in New Testament times. It was bounded on the N by Pontus, on the E by Syria and Armenia, on the S by Cilicia and on the W by Lycaonia. The Romans built roads through the "Cilician gates" in the Taurus range so that Cappadocia could readily be entered from the S. The Cappadocians were Aryans. Jews from Cappadocia (Acts 2:9) were among the hearers of the first Christian sermon along with men from other Anatolian provinces; and Peter directed his first epistle (I Pet. 1:1) in part to "the elect—of the Diaspora"—dwelling in various provinces in the N. It is almost certain that many of these Cappadocian Jews were converted on the day of Pentecost and so have the honor of being among the very earliest Christians. A.B.F.

CAPTAIN, a word that in KJV translates 16 different words in the original text (12 Hebrew, one Aramaic, three Greek), but by far the most frequent is sar which occurs 419 times in the OT and is rendered "prince" 208 times (cf. "Sarah" for "princess"), "captain" 126 times, "chief" and "ruler" each 33 times. Most of them are terms expressing leadership, and do not refer to specific grades or ranks in a military organization. The meaning is obvious. In the NT Christ is called "captain of their (our) salvation" (Heb. 2:10). "Chiliarchos" or "leader of a thousand" (John 18:12) could be translated "colonel," while the "captain of the temple" (Acts 4:1, etc.) was not a military officer at all, though he had soldiers under his authority. Though the general intent is clear, the meaning is not technically definite.

CAPTIVITY. The term Captivity, when used of Israel, has reference not to the long series of oppressions and captivities of the Israelites by hostile peoples, beginning with the bondage in Egypt and ending with the domination of Rome, but to the captivity of the Ten Tribes in 722 B.C. and the captivity of Judah in 586 B.C. The practice of making wholesale deportations of people as a punishment for rebellion was introduced by Assyria, but other nations adopted it.

1. The Captivity of the Northern Kingdom. Assyria first made contact with the Northern Kingdom when Shalmaneser II (860-825 B.C.) routed in the battle of Karkar (854 B.C.) the combined forces of Damascus, Hamath, Israel, and other states who had united to stop his westward progress. In another campaign Shalmaneser received tribute from Jehu, king of Israel. Not many years later, Rimmon-nirari III (810-781) compelled Syria to let go her hold of Israel. Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B.C.), one of the greatest monarchs of antiquity, after capturing Samaria, put on the throne as his vassal Hoshea, who had slain Pekah, king of Israel. With the death of Tiglath-pileser III, Hoshea decided to strike a blow for independence. Help was promised by the king of Egypt, but it did not come. Hoshea was made a prisoner, and the capital doomed to destruction, as the prophets had foretold (Hos. 10:7,8; Isa. 28:1; Mic. 1:5,6). It was, however, only after a three years' siege that the city was captured. Before it fell, Shalmaneser had abdicated or died, and Sargon, who succeeded him, completed the conquest of the city and deported the inhabitants to Assyria (II Kings 17:6,7; 18:11,12). Some time later, Sargon's grandson Esarhaddon, and his great-grandson Ashur-banipal, imported to the region of Samaria some conquered peoples from the East (Ezra 4:2,10). Not all of the inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom were taken into captivity. The very poor, who could cause no trouble in the future, were left (II Kings 25:12). Intermarriage with the imported peoples resulted in the hybrid stock later known as the Samaritans. The Ten Tribes taken into captivity, sometimes called the Lost Tribes of Israel, must not be thought of as being absorbed by the peoples among whom they settled. Some undoubtedly were, but many others retained their Israelitish religion and traditions. Some became part of the Jewish dispersion, and others very likely returned with the exiles of Judah who had been carried off by Nebuchadnezzar in 536 B.C.

2. The Captivity of the Southern Kingdom. The captivity of Judah was predicted 150 years before it occurred (Isa. 6:11,12; 11:12). Isaiah (11:11; 39:6) and Micah (4:10) foretold that the place of the captivity was to be Babylonia; and Jeremiah announced that it would be for 70 years (Jer. 25:1,11,12). The Southern Kingdom rested on a firmer religious foundation than the Northern Kingdom, and was therefore able to survive longer, but it too had in it the seeds of moral and spiritual decay that caused its eventual disintegration.

Sargon was followed by a number of brilliant rulers, but by 625 B.C. the hold of Assyria over its tributary peoples had greatly slackened. Revolts broke out everywhere, and bands of Scythians swept through the empire as far as Egypt. Nineveh fell to the Babylonians in 606 B.C., never to rise again. A great new Babylonian empire was built up by Nebuchadnezar (604-562 B.C.). Judah became a vassal of Nebuchadnezzar, but Jehoiakim the king, although warned by the Prophet Jeremiah, turned and rebelled against him. Nebuchadnezzar thereupon came into Jerusalem in 605 B.C. and carried off to Babylon the vessels of the house of God and members of the nobility of Judah, among them Daniel the prophet (II Chron. 36:2-7; Jer. 45:1; Dan. 1:1-3). Jehoiakim was taken in chains to Babylon (II Chron. 36:6). In 597 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar carried off Jehoiachin, his mother, his wives, 3,000 princes, 7,000 men of might, and 1,000 artisans (II Kings 24:14-16). Among them was the prophet Ezekiel. This was the first large-scale deportation of the Southern Kingdom into Babylonia. Eleven years later (586) Nebuchadnezzar burned the temple, destroyed the city of Jerusalem, and deported into Babylonia all but the poorest of the land (II Kings 25:2-21). A third group was taken into Babylonia five years after the destruction of the city (Jer. 52:30).

The exiled Jews were not heavily oppressed by their conquerors. They engaged in business, built houses (Jer. 29:5-7; Ezra 2:65), and even held high positions in the state (Dan. 2:48; Neh. 1:11). They could not continue their system of sacrifices, but they had with them their priests and teachers (Jer. 29:1; Ezra 1:5); and Ezekiel gave them constant encouragement (Ezek. 1:1). In 539 B.C. Babylon fell to Cyrus king of Persia, who issued a decree permitting the return of the Jews to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1:1-4). The next year about 43,000 returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:64), the rest preferring to remain in Mesopotamia (Zech. 6:10). In 458 B.C. 1,800 returned with Ezra. S.B.

CARAVAN, a group of travelers united together for a common purpose or for mutual protection and generally equipped for a long journey, especially in desert country, or through foreign and presumably hostile territory. Jacob's "company" (Gen. 32,33) is a good example of a caravan organized to carry a clan to a new home; and the host of the Amalekites whom David destroyed (I Sam. 30:1-20) is another caravan, organized for raiding purposes. In the trackless desert where oases are few and far between and where savage beasts and more savage men are found, it was essential to go in caravans for protection's sake. The word does not occur in KJV, but "company" and "troop" could often have been "caravan."

CARBUNCLE, a word occurring four times in KJV but rendering three different Hebrew words, all representing something bright and glittering. Both ruby and emerald have been suggested as equivalents. Used in the high priest's breastplate (Exod. 28:17; 39:10). See MINERALS.

CARCAS (kär'kăs), a eunuch in the service of Xerxes ("Ahasuerus"). (Esth. 1:10.)

CARCASE (ASV and modern English, carcass), the dead body of a man or beast. The word is a translation of six different words in Scripture with root ideas of something fallen, faded, exhausted; or just the bare idea of body, as in Judges 14:8,9. The law of Moses, probably partly for sanitary reasons, required that carcasses of "unclean" beasts should be considered abominable. Read Leviticus 11:8-40.

CARCHEMISH (kär'kē-mĭsh), an ancient city of the Hittites located on the W bank of the Euphrates 63 miles NE of Aleppo. It was important commercially and militarily. For many years it paid tribute to the kings of Assyria. When Sargon captured it in 717 B.C., the Hittite empire fell with it (Isa. 10:9). It was the scene of a great victory by Nebuchadnezzar over Pharaoh Necho in 605 B.C. (Jer. 46:2; II Chron. 35:20). Its site is called Jerabis or Jerablus.

CAREAH (kä-rē'ä), or generally and more properly Kareah. The father of Johanan and Jonathan who tried to save Gedaliah from assassination (Jer. 40:8-43:7), but later wickedly went to Egypt to dwell there.

CARMEL (kär'měl, garden). 1. The mountainous promontory jutting into the Mediterranean Sea just S of the modern city Haifa and straight W of the Sea of Galilee. On the map of Palestine, it forms the principal deviation from a comparatively straight coastline, and it forms the southern wall of the magnificent bay (or gulf) of Acre, the best natural harbor south of Beirut. When the word occurs with the definite article it generally refers to Mt. Carmel and is often used as an illustration of a beautiful and fruitful place (Isa. 35:2; but contrast 33:9, which pictures God's judgment). South of Carmel lies the fruitful plain of Sharon and NE of it flows the river Kishon through the plain of Esdraelon. At Carmel Elijah stood against 850 heathen prophets and defeated them (I Kings 18). Carmel was visited by Elisha (II Kings 2:25; 4:25).

2. A very ancient town of Judah about seven miles nearly S of Hebron. First mentioned in Joshua 15:55, it is best known as the residence of the very churlish Nabal who refused kindness to David (I Sam. 25:2-40) and whose life was saved by the tact of his beautiful wife Abigail, who later became a wife of David.

CARMELITE (kär'měl-īt), a native of Judaean Carmel: applied to David's wife Abigail who had first married Nabal (I Sam. 27:3, etc.) and to Hezro, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:37, etc.).

CARMI (kär'mē). 1. One of the sons of Reuben, eldest son of Jacob; and head of the family of the "Carmites" (Gen. 46:9; Num. 26:6, etc.).

2. An early descendant of Judah (probably great-grandson) and father of Achan (Josh. 7:1), mentioned in I Chronicles 4:1 as "son" i.e. descendant of Judah.

CARNAL (kär'năl). Fleshly, of or pertaining to the body as the seat of the desires and appetites; usually employed in Scripture in the bad sense, as opposed to spiritual. In I Corinthians 2:14-3:4, Paul first divides mankind practically into two classes—the natural and the spiritual. This corresponds to the classification of men as once-born and twice-born. Then he classifies Christians as "carnal" and "spiritual" and lists the marks of carnality as "envying, strife, divisions" (KJV) and undue emphasis of personalities: "I am of Paul—I am of Apollos." "Carnal" does not necessarily imply active and conscious sin, but is opposed to "spiritual" (Rom. 7:14; II Cor. 10:4; Heb. 7:16; 9:10, etc.), the dominance of the lower side of man as apart from the divine influence.

The Old Testament uses the expression "lying carnally" to describe adultery (Lev. 18:20) and fornication (Lev. 19:20), but these ugly words are used far more often figuratively and refer to idolatry. To take the love that belongs to husband or wife and give it to another is adultery; and to take the love that belongs to God and give it to another is idolatry (Hos. 1-3; Rev. 17:18). A.B.F.

CARPENTER (See Occupations, Professions)

CARPUS (kär'pŭs), a Christian brother living at Troas mentioned only in II Timothy 4:13. He had evidently been the host of Paul while he was in Troas.

CARRIAGE, occurs five times in the KJV and in each case refers to that which is carried; baggage (I Sam. 17:22; Isa. 10:28).

CARSHENA (kär'shē-nà), one of the seven princes of the Medo-Persian kingdom in the days of the great Xerxes, husband of Vashti, and later of Esther (Esth. 1:14).

CARTS, and wagons, are very ancient. In Genesis 45:19-21 Pharaoh provided carts for the wives and children of Jacob at the descent into Egypt. In the days of Eli the Philistines took the ark of God, and finding it a most unwelcome guest, they put it upon a cart and let it go back to Israel (I Sam. 6); but when David later desired to bring the same ark to his city, he used a cart, and the result was disastrous (See II Sam. 6:1-11).

CASIPHIA (kà-sĭf'ĭ-à), a place near the river Ahava, a tributary of the Euphrates, twice mentioned in Ezra 8:17 as a place where exiled Levites lived.

CASLUHIM (kăs'lū-hĭm), one of the seven tribes listed in Genesis 10:13,14 and its parallel passage I Chronicles 1:11,12 as descended from "Mizraim," which is the name for Egypt. The Philistines are said to have come out from this tribe.

CASSIA (See Plants)

CASTLE, a large fortified building or set of buildings, as that of a prince or nobleman. David took the Jebusite castle in Jerusalem and made it into his residence (I Chron. 11:5,7). Castles were built in the cities of Judah by Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:12) and in its forests by Jotham (II Chron. 27:4). Where the KJV uses "castles," the RV sometimes, more correctly, uses encampments (I Chron. 6:54). Nehemiah erected a castle in Jerusalem which later became the Tower of Antonia, where Paul was confined.

CASTOR AND POLLUX (kăs'tẽr, pŏl'ŭks; Gr. Dióskuroi, sons of Zeus). In Greek mythology, they were sons of Zeus by Leda, one of his numerous mistresses. Castor was a horseman, and Pollux an adept boxer. They were later put in the sky in the constellation known as "Gemini," "the Twins," and were considered as tutelary deities favorable to sailors, which explains why the ship mentioned in Acts 28:11, in which Paul sailed, was named in their honor. St. Elmo's fire used to be credited to Castor and Pollux.

CATACOMBS are subterranean burial places used by the early Church. The principal catacombs are outside Rome, where the galleries in the tufa rock extend for six hundred miles, according to one estimate, and so surround the city that they even act as a cushion against earthquake shocks. The lowest estimate of the graves contained in the catacombs is 1,750,000, the highest 4,000,000, covering ten generations. This permits minimum and maximum estimates of 175,000 and 400,000 Christians in each generation, not allowing for the upward curve in the numbers of those connected with the Church over the period named. Since the population of Rome was about 1,000,000 it will be seen that the catacomb figures make nonsense of Gibbon's once accepted estimates of the Christian population of the capital. Family burial places in the catacombs provide striking evidence for the vertical spread of the faith.

CATERPILLAR (See Insects)

CATHOLIC EPISTLES, a term applied to the Epistles of James, Peter, John, and Jude. It goes back to the early church Fathers, but how it arose is unknown. The most commonly accepted explanation is that the Epistles were addressed not to individual churches or persons, but to a number of churches. They were addressed to the Church at large, i.e., the universal Church. The seeming exceptions, II and III John, were probably included as properly belonging with I John and of value to the general reader.

CATTLE (See Animals)

CAUDA (kow'dà), a small island lying about 25 miles to the S of Crete (Acts 27:16 in KJV "Clauda") and now called Gavdo. Here Paul and his companions were almost wrecked on their journey toward Rome.

CAUL. 1. The chief meaning is a deep fold above the liver, the omentum which is loaded with fat and which with the kidneys was used in several of the Levitical offerings (Lev. 3:4; 4:9, etc.).

2. The pericardium or the breast as a whole (Hos. 13:8).

3. Bag or purse (Isa. 3:18). See also DRESS.

CAVE, a hollowed-out place in the earth, whether formed by nature or by man. In a mountainous land such as Palestine, where there is much limestone, caves are likely to be quite numerous. Caves were often used for regular human habitation, for hiding from the law or from enemies in warfare, for securing precious treasure (such as the recently discovered Dead Sea scrolls), for storehouses and cisterns, for stables for cattle, and for burial (Gen. 19:30; I Kings 19:9, etc.).

CEDAR (See Plants)

CEDRON (sē'drŏn, in ASV more properly "Kidron"), a ravine which in winter contains the brook of the same name, flowing southward between Jerusalem and Mt. of Olives on the E of the city. It is mentioned by this name only in John 18:1. It is loved for the sacred memories connected with it and the Garden of Gethsemane which lay beside it.

CEILING (KJV and ERV "cieling"), appears only in I Kings 6:15, where it says that Solomon built the walls of the ceiling with cedar. The reference here is not to the upper surface of a room, but to the inner walls. The word "ceiled" appears several times, but it usually means to panel the walls of a building.

CELLAR, a place for storage of wine (I Chron. 27:27) or oil (v. 28). The root idea here is not that of a room under a house, but that of a place of storage.

CENCHREA (sĕn'krē-à, Cenchreae in ASV), the eastern harbor of Corinth, and the little town on the harbor. Paul in Romans 16:1 commends to the Roman church, Phoebe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchrea, which Paul may have founded on his second missionary journey. Paul stopped here to have his head shaved in fulfillment of a vow (Acts 18:18).

CENSER, a vessel, probably shaped like a saucepan, for holding incense while it is being burned (Num. 16:6,7,39). The Hebrew word rendered "censer" is generally translated "censer," sometimes "firepan," and in three cases "snuffdish" (Exod. 25:38; 37:23; Num. 4:9).

CENSUS, a numbering and registration of a people. The OT tells of three different occasions when a formal census was taken. The first was at Mount Sinai, soon after the Israelites left Egypt (Num. 1). The second was taken at Shittim near the end of the 40 years' wilderness wandering. The third was made by David. The exiles who returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel were also numbered (Ezra 2). Shortly before the birth of Christ, the Emperor Augustus ordered an enrollment in his empire (Luke 2:1).

CENTURION (cĕn-tū'rĭ-ŏn, Lat. centum, 100), a commander of a hundred soldiers in the Roman army. The word, of course, does not appear in the OT. The one first mentioned is the centurion of Capernaum whose beloved servant was sick unto death (Matt. 8:5-13; Luke 7:2-10). This officer had gone so far as to build a synagogue for the Jews, so that the Jews appreciated him and begged Jesus to heal the servant. The centurion showed real reverence to Jesus when he said "I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof," and Jesus said "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." The next is Cornelius (Acts 10) "a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house." It was to him that Peter was sent, and going almost unwillingly, Peter "used the keys" to open up salvation to the Gentiles, as he had at Jerusalem for the Jews (Acts 2) and at Samaria for its people (Acts 8:14-17). Another was Julius, of the Augustan band (Acts 27:1-43) whose duty it was to take Paul to Rome. He saved Paul's life when the soldiers wished to kill all the prisoners, and Paul, by his presence and counsel, saved the centurion with all the ship's company. Other centurions are mentioned elsewhere (Matt. 27:54; Acts 22:25; 23:17). A.B.F.

CEPHAS (sē'fās, Gr. Kephás, from Aram. Kepha, rock, or stone). A name given by Jesus to the Apostle Peter (John 1:42). See PETER.

CHAFF, the refuse of the grain which has been threshed and winnowed. This is partly dust and dirt, but the real chaff is the hard and inedible coat of the grain. By threshing, most of this is separated, and then on a windy day the grain is tossed into the air and the chaff and the shorter pieces of straw are blown away. In Isaiah 5:24 and 33:11 the word properly means "dry hay" fit for burning. The more common word (Heb. mots) is generally used as a figure for worthless or godless men (Ps. 1:4; "The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away"). It is used also for godless nations (Isa. 17:13). The evanescence of the wicked is likened in Hosea 13:3 to the morning cloud, the early dew, the chaff driven by the whirlwind, and the smoke out of the window (KJV "chimney"!). In Daniel 2:35, the Aramaic word rendered chaff signifies the small chaff that can get into the eye and irritate it. The word in Jeremiah 23:28 means the broken straw. In the preaching of John the Baptist (Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17) our Lord is to save the righteous (gather the wheat into His garner) but the wicked ("the chaff") He will burn with unquenchable fire.

CHAIN. The English word represents many Hebrew words, meaning chain, necklace, band, bracelet, clasp, hook, ring and rope. All OT references are given without distinguishing the Hebrew originals. Chains were used: 1. As marks of distinction, in the case of Joseph (Gen. 41:42), and Daniel (Dan. 5:7,16,29).

2. For ornaments (Exod. 28:14,22; 39:15,17, 18) in the tabernacle. Chains were among the atonement offerings (Num. 31:50). Some had lunettes attached, such as the Midianites used to adorn their camels' necks (Judg. 8:21,26). Wreaths of chain work ornamented the tops of the pillars (I Kings 7:17; II Chron. 3:16) and elsewhere in Solomon's Temple (I Kings 6:21; II Chron. 3:5). As jewelry, chains are referred to in Psalm 73:6; Proverbs 1:9; Song of Solomon 1:10; 4:9; Isaiah 3:19; 40:19 (idols); Ezekiel 16:11.

3. For fetters (Ps. 68:6; 149:8; Isa. 45:14; Jer. 39:7; 40:1; 52:11; Lam. 3:7; Ezek. 7:23; 19:4, 9; Nah. 3:10). In the NT most of the references represent the Greek hálusis, chain. In Mark 5:3,4; Luke 8:29, chains are used to bind a demoniac; in Acts 12:6,7, Peter in prison was bound with two chains to the guards who slept on either side of him; in Acts 21:33, Paul was bound with two chains, but quickly released; in Acts 28:20, Paul was bound by a chain on his right hand to a soldier's left; to which he refers also in II Timothy 1:16; a circumstance which offers one explanation of why Paul dictated his letters to an amanuensis. An angel binds Satan with a chain (Rev. 20:1). In Jude 6 chain translates desmós, anything for tying or fastening; in II Peter 2:4, seirá, cord, rope. See also DRESS. E.R.

CHALCEDONY (kăl-sĕd'ō-nē, kăl-sĕ-dō'nē, Gr. chalkedón), the precious stone adorning the third foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. 21:19). The modern meaning of the term cannot be traced earlier than the 15th century A.D. Pliny writes of a Chalcedonian emerald, also of a Chalcedonian jasper. Chalcedon, modern Kadikoy near Scutari on the Bosporus opposite Istanbul, was probably the place of origin. RSV translates "agate" without explanation.

CHALCOL (kăl'kŏl), a son (or descendant) of Mahol (I Kings 4:31). Solomon was wiser than he. Calcol, a son (or descendant) of Zerah (I Chron. 2:6). Since four of the same names occur in both passages as brothers, Chalcol and Calcol are probably the same person. ASV, RSV have Calcol in both places.

CHALDAEA or CHALDEA (kăl-dē'à), the country of which Babylon was the capital, and which conquered Judah and carried its inhabitants into captivity. The name occurs in KJV only in Jeremiah 50:10; 51:24,35; Ezekiel 11:24; 16:29; 23:15,16.

CHALDEAN (kăl-dē'ăn), an adjective referring to things pertaining to Chaldaea; or a noun referring to a man of Chaldaea.

CHALDEAN ASTROLOGERS (See Wise Men)

CHALDEES (kăl-dēz, kăl'dēz), the people of Chaldea; the Chaldeans.

CHAMBERING (chām'bêr-ĭng), repeated or habitual acts of illicit intercourse (Rom. 13:13).

CHAMBERLAIN (chām'bêr-lĭn). In the OT the eunuch in charge of a king's harem, especially in Persia (Esth. 1:10,12,15; 2:3,14,15,21; 4:4,5; 6:2,14; 7:9), called "eunuch" in RSV. In II Kings 23:11 RSV retains "chamberlain" for the same Hebrew word. In Acts 12:20 the chamberlain is "one who is over the king's bedchamber," an intimate and confidential position. In Romans 16:23 the word used is often translated "steward." ASV, RSV have "treasurer," which is accurate in this connection.

CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY, rooms in the temple where seventy elders of Israel worshiped idols with incense. RSV has "room of pictures" (Ezek. 8:12). Verse 10 indicates what the pictures or images represented.

CHANCELLOR (chăn'sĕ-lêr, RSV commander), a Persian official in Palestine (Ezra 4:8,9,17).

CHANGERS OF MONEY, men who exchanged one currency for another at a premium. Coins issued by many governments circulated in Palestine; also Jews must convert their currency into shekels for the temple-tax. It was not the trade but the place where they plied it which led Christ to drive them out of the temple court (Matt. 21:12; Mark 11:15; John 2:14,15). All three Gospels use the Greek kollybistés, a changer of small coins. John 2:14 has kermatistés, with identical meaning. "Exchangers" (Matt. 25:27) translates trapezítes, better rendered (RSV) "banker," lender of money at interest. Both used tables (trapezas) and often combined the two functions.

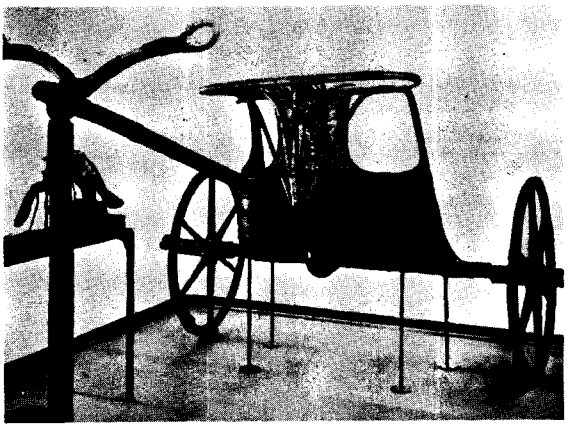
CHAPMAN (chăp'măn), a traveling trader or merchant (II Chron. 9:14).

CHARASHIM (kăr'ă-shĭm, Heb. hărāshîm, craftsmen), Valley of, E of Joppa between Ono to the N and Lod (Lydda) to the S; settled by one Joab, apparently of Judah (I Chron. 4:14). It received its name because artificers or craftsmen dwelt there (Neh. 11:35).

CHARCHEMISH, CARCHEMISH (kär'kē-mĭsh, kär-kē'mĭsh), Hittite capital on the Euphrates, focus for invasions between Egypt, Assyria and Europe. See CARCHEMISH.

CHARGER, a dish or platter given as an offering for the tabernacle (Num. 7:13-85); called "dishes" in Exodus 25:29; 37:16. Another word (Ezra 1:9) refers to baskets or dishes belonging to the temple service. The NT word means a wooden dish or platter (Matt. 14:8,11; Mark 6:25,28).

CHARIOT (chăr'ĭ-ŭt, Heb. rekhev and derivatives, from a root meaning mount and ride), a two-wheeled vehicle drawn by two horses. In Egypt, Joseph rides in Pharaoh's second chariot (Gen. 41:43). Chariots were in Jacob's funeral procession (Gen. 50:9). Pharaoh pursued the children of Israel into the Red Sea with chariots (Exod. 14:7-15:19).



King Tutankhamen's chariot in the Cairo museum.

The Canaanites used chariots studded with iron, or covered with plates of iron, which kept the Israelites from conquering the plains (Judg. 1:19). The Philistines mustered mighty hosts of chariots against Israel (I Sam. 13:5). David hocked the chariot-horses of his enemies (II Sam. 8:4). Adonijah prepared chariots when he plotted to overthrow his father David (I Kings 1:5). Solomon built establishments to house many chariots (I Kings 9:19). He imported chariots from Egypt at 600 shekels each (I Kings 10:28,29). Both divided kingdoms used chariots in war (I Kings 16:9; 22:34; II Kings 23:30). Some parts of a chariot are referred to in I Kings 7:33. There was a pole to which the two horses were yoked; an axle; wheels with six or eight spokes; and a body fastened to the axle and pole.

Often only two men rode in the chariot; a driver and a warrior (I Kings 22:34), but sometimes the Hittite practice of adding a shield-bearer was followed. The Assyrian chariot was heavier than the Egyptian or Hebrew, and carried three or four men. Nahum 2:3,4 is a vivid picture of such chariots. Elijah was honored by being escorted up to heaven by a chariot of fire (II Kings 2:11), and his manner of going became a proverb (II Kings 2:12; 13:14). God is represented as having thousands of chariots, showing His power (Ps. 68:17). Trust in chariots is vain compared with trust in God (Ps. 20:7). Habakkuk 3:8 sees God riding upon the chariots of salvation. The chariots of the sun (II Kings 23:11) were used in sun-worship (verse 5). Chariots were used for riding (S. of Sol. 1:9; 6:12), especially by royalty. Other Hebrew words are used for chariot: in Song of Solomon 3:9,10, a litter is meant; in Ezekiel 23:24 a war-chariot; Psalm 46:9, a wheeled vehicle. In the NT, Greek hárma, a war-chariot (Rev. 9:9) drawn by horses, used also for riding (Acts 8:28,29,38). In Revelation 18:13 the word is rhéda, a Gallic wagon with four wheels. E.R.

CHARITY (chăr'ĭ-tē), the KJV rendering of Greek agápe in 28 places. Agápe is translated "love" in 87 places; "dear," once (Col. 1:13). Charity represents Latin caritas, but caritas also stands in the Vulgate in passages where KJV has "love." Charity in the Bible never means giving to the poor, but always a God-inspired love which includes respect for, and concern for the welfare of the loved one. The inspired description is found in I Cor. 13.

CHARRAN (See Haran)

CHASTE, CHASTITY (chāst, chăs'tĭ-tē, Gr. hagnós), originally meaning pure in a ritual sense, tabu, consecrated; it developed a moral sense as the Greeks gained higher conceptions of deity. In the Bible, where the highest conception of God always prevailed, the moral and the religious are never separated. Hagnós is translated "chaste" in I Peter 3:2, Titus 2:5, regarding Christian women; II Corinthians 11:2, referring to the Corinthian Christians as a "chaste virgin" bride for Christ. It is translated "clear" (II Cor. 7:11), "pure" (I John 3:3; Phil. 4:8, etc.). Derivatives are translated "pure," "pureness," "purity," "purify," "purification," "sincerely," and in the LXX they are used for Heb. words of kindred meanings. Chastity in the relations of men and women is the NT norm; the standard for all forms of purity.

CHASTISEMENT (chăs'tĭz-mĕnt, Heb. mûsār, from verb yāsar, discipline [the moral nature], chasten, admonish, correct; Gr. paideía, child-training, the formation of manhood). Both are translated by many English words, exhibiting shades of meaning derived from the central concept: the widest sense (Deut. 11:2); punishment (Jer. 30:14); discipline (Heb. 12:8); in Isaiah 53:5 the whole range of meaning is exhibited in the substitution of the sinless Servant of Jehovah for His guilty people. When músār is translated "chastening," discipline rather than punishment is meant (Job 5:17; Prov. 3:11,12, whence Heb. 12:5-11 is drawn; Isa. 26:16); retribution (Lev. 26:28); instruction in wisdom is prominent in Proverbs; unjust chastisement (I Kings 12:11); the prayer of Psalm 6:1 is answered (Ps. 94:12). The Greek word in Acts 7:22; 22:3; II Timothy 3:16 (learn, teach, instruction) refers to education. Heb. yākah occurs of child-training (II Sam. 7:14); of the meaning and value of suffering (Job 33:19; Ps. 73:14). Daniel has chastened himself by humility (Dan. 10:12, Heb. 'ānâh). Chastisement is the process by which God provides a Substitute to bear our sins, brings men to put their trust in Him, trains those whom He has received till they reach maturity. E.R.

CHEBAR (kē'bär), a river or canal beside which Ezekiel saw visions (Ezek. 1:1; 3:23; 10:15,20,22; 43:3); in Babylonia ("the land of the Chaldeans," Ezek. 1:3); at Tel-abib (Ezek. 3:15); not yet identified.

CHECKER WORK (chĕk'ẽr-wûrk), ornamentation for the capitals of two pillars in Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:17). ASV, RSV have "coats of checker work" in Exodus 28:4. The root means "interweave."

CHEDORLAOMER (kĕd'ôr-lā-ō'mûr), king (Gen. 14:1,4,5,9,17) of Elam, S of Media and E of Babylonia; named by Semites (Gen. 10:22), but inhabited chiefly by Indo-Europeans; later part of Persia, modern Iran. Chedorlaomer, with Amraphel king of Shinar (Babylonia), Arioch king of Ellasar and Tidal king of nations or of Goiim (so ASV, RSV), made war with Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela or Zoar, all near the Dead or Salt Sea. Chedorlaomer held sway over the five cities for 12 years. In the 13th year they rebelled. In the 14th year Chedorlaomer and his allies conquered the country they traversed, and met the king of Sodom and his allies on the same battleground (the vale of Siddim or the Salt Sea) where Chedorlaomer had defeated them 14 years earlier. The bitumen pits of the region were the undoing of the local defenders. But Abram the Hebrew in a swift night raid with 318 retainers recovered the spoil of Sodom, and pursued the invaders to a point near Damascus. The story is told fully (Gen. 14) because it involved Abram and his brother's son Lot.

CHEESE, once Heb. gevînâh (Job 10:10) curd, cheese, from a root meaning "coagulate"; once Heb. shâphâh (II Sam. 17:29) cream, because skimmed off; once Heb. hărîtsî hehālāv (I Sam. 17:18) cuts of milk, i.e., cheese. Milk of kine, goats or sheep was stored in skins. In a warm climate, without refrigeration, it would soon curdle. The process of cheese-making employed can only be guessed from the practices current in the Near East today.

CHELAL (kē'lăl), a man of Palath-moab who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:30).

CHELLUH (kĕl'ū), one of the sons of Bani who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:35).

CHELUB (kē'lŭb, Heb. kelûv, another form of Caleb). 1. A brother of Shuah, a Judahite (I Chron. 4:11).

2. Father of Ezri, and superintendent of the tillers of the ground in David's time (I Chron. 27:26).

CHELUBAI (kē-lōō'bī), son of Hezron, elsewhere called Caleb (I Chron. 2:9).

CHEMARIM (kĕm'ā-rĭm, Heb. kemārîm), probably from a root meaning "prostrate oneself" (Zeph. 1:4). The Heb. word occurs also in II Kings 23:5; Hosea 10:5, and always refers to idolatrous priests.

CHEMOSH (kē'mŏsh), the god of Moab, so named in an ancient Israelite song (Num. 21:29, alluded to in Jer. 48:7,13,46). Jephthah refers to Chemosh as god of the Ammonites (Judg. 11:24), either by mistake or because Ammon also worshiped Chemosh in addition to Molech. Solomon introduced the worship of Chemosh into Jerusalem to please a foreign wife, though thereby he displeased his God (I Kings 11:7,33). Josiah defiled this high place of Chemosh (II Kings 23:13), putting an end to its use as a place of worship. Mesha, king of Moab, suffered a great disaster in his rebellion against Israel, in consequence of which he offered his son, the heir to the throne of Moab, as a burnt offering (II Kings 3:4-27). The inscription on the Moabite stone shows that this sacrifice was made to Chemosh, and describes (in terms whose similarity in style to the terms employed by the Israelites of the true God only accentuates the contrast between the two) the help which Mesha believed Chemosh had given his people in war, and the chastisement which Chemosh meted out to them when they were unfaithful.

CHENAANAH (kē-nā'ā-nà). 1. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah who smote Micaiah (I Kings 22:11,24; II Chron. 18:10.23).

2. The brother of Ehud, son of Bilham, a Benjamite (I Chron. 7:10).

CHENANI (kē-nā'nī, kĕn'ā-nī), a Levite who helped bring the returned exiles into agreement about the covenant worship of God (Neh. 9:4).

CHENANIAH (kĕn'ā-nī'à). 1. A chief Levite when David brought up the ark from the house of Obed-edom (I Chron. 15:22,27).

2. An Izharite, an officer of David's (I Chron. 26:29). Some identify the two as one.

CHEPHAR-HAAMMONI (kē'fär-hă-ăm'ō-nī, ASV, RSV Chephar-ammoni, Josh. 18:24), an Ammonite town in the territory of Benjamin, site unknown.

CHEPHIRAH (kē-fī'rà), a Hivite town which, with Gibeon, by deceit gained the protection of the Israelites (Josh. 9:17); in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:26); some of whose citizens returned after the Exile (Ezra 2:25; Neh. 7:29); modern Tell Kefireh between Ajalon and Gibeon.

CHERAN (kē'răn), son of Dishon, the son of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:26; I Chron. 1:41).

CHERETHIM, CHERETHITES (kĕr'ĕ-thĭm, kĕr'ĕ-thīts), a Philistine tribe in southern Palestine (I Sam. 30:14; Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5), from whom David drew his bodyguard, commanded by Benaiah (II Sam. 8:18; 15:18; 20:7,23; I Kings 1:38,44; I Chron. 18:17). The Heb. name may be from a root kareth, to cut down, indicating that the Cherethite guards were executioners, or at least swordsmen. Twice LXX translates "Cretans" (Ezek. 25:16; Zeph. 2:5), indicating their belief that the Cherethites came from Crete; and indeed the Philistines originated there. Elsewhere LXX has Cheleththi or Chereththi (except I Sam. 30:14, Cholthi). David's guard was probably recruited from foreign mercenaries.

CHERITH (kē'rĭth), the brook where, at God's command, Elijah hid himself during the first part of the famine he had predicted (I Kings 17:1-5). It was "before Jordan," a Heb. expression ('al-penê), which means "toward the face of"; of location, "in front of"; usually "east of" (so RSV); but not always so; hence is no conclusive help in identifying the brook. Perhaps it was as obscure in Elijah's day as now; therefore a secure hiding place.

CHERUB (chĕr'ŭb), pl., CHERUBIM (chĕr'ŭ-bĭm), which KJV treats as singular, with a plural, cherubims. In other than Biblical usage, the English plural is cherubs. The cherubim and a flaming sword were placed at the E of Eden to keep the way of the tree of life, after Adam and Eve were expelled from the garden (Gen. 3:24). God directs Moses to place two cherubim of beaten gold on the mercy seat above the ark, where God would commune with Moses in the tabernacle (Exod. 25:18-22; 37:7-9). The curtains of the tabernacle were embroidered with cherubim (Exod. 26:1). God dwelt between the cherubim (Num. 7:89; I Sam. 4:4; II Sam. 6:2; II Kings 19:15; Ps. 80:1; 99:1; Isa. 37:16), both in the tabernacle and the temple. The cherubim in the temple were huge figures newly made for the purpose (I Kings 6:23-28; II Chron. 3:10-13; 5:7,8). Carved cherubim also ornamented the walls of the house (I Kings 6:29). Hebrews 9:5 mentions the cherubim in the tabernacle. David sings of God riding on a cherub (II Sam. 22:11; Ps. 18:10). Psalm 18 pictures a storm, God riding upon and speaking from the clouds. His glory rested between the cherubim above the mercy seat in the tabernacle.

That the cherubim were more than clouds or statues is plain from the description Ezekiel gives (Ezek. 10:1-22; 9:3), which shows that they are the "living creatures" of the first chapter. They were winged creatures with features both animal and human. Each had four faces; of a man, a lion on the right side; of an ox on the left side; also of an eagle (Ezek. 1:10). In Ezekiel 10:14 the faces are of a cherub, a man, a lion and an eagle, wherein "cherub" substitutes for "ox." The etymology is doubtful; possibly from Heb. root karah, give a feast. A connection with Greek glyps, griffin, is not established. There is no corresponding word for similar winged animal-human representations in Assyria or Egypt. The Heb. conception is original.

Primarily the cherubim are the living chariot or carriers of God when appearing to men; His throne or the bearers of it. Their earliest recorded employment was as guardians of Eden. Figures of these living beings were used symbolically in both tabernacle and temple. In the new temple of Ezekiel's vision the only cherubim are those decorating the walls (Ezek. 41:17-25); and those show two faces; of a man and a young lion.

The seraphim of Isaiah 6:2-8 are similar beings. Four constellations of the zodiac were given the same names as the four faces of the cherubim, and in ancient times they marked the solstices and the equinoxes. Rabbinical tradition assigns them to the standards of the divisions in the camp of Israel; the lion, Judah, on the E; the ox, Ephraim, W; a man, Reuben, S; the eagle, Dan, N. Thus the standards, leading the Israelites, would indicate Israel as the earthly counterpart of the heavenly host, led by the cherubim. Early church fathers equated the four faces with the four Evangelists; Matthew, the lion; Mark, the ox; Luke, the man; John, the eagle. In Revelation 4:6-9; 5:6-14; 6:1-8; 7-11; 14:3; 15:7; 19:4 are four "beasts" (Greek zôa, living creatures; so ASV, RSV; to be distinguished from the beasts, Greek theria, wild beasts mentioned in Rev. 13:1, etc.). They are described in terms identifying them with Ezekiel's living creatures or cherubim. The first living creature was like a lion; the second like a calf; the third had a face as a man; the fourth was like a flying eagle (Rev. 4:7). They are the bearers of the judgments which follow the breaking of the first four seals.

To sum up: the cherubim are living heavenly creatures, servants of God in theophany and judgment, appearing in winged human-animal form with the faces of lion, ox, man, and eagle. Their representations in tabernacle and temple as statues and in embroidery and carving are not a breach of the commandment (Exod. 20:4). They are significant in prophecy (Ezek.), and in the Apocalypse (Rev.). Their service is rendered immediately to God. They never come closer to man than when one took fire in his hand and gave it into the hands of "the man clothed with linen" (Ezek. 10:7). Yet it is "between the cherubim" that lay the mercy seat on which the blood of atonement was sprinkled: nothing can more nearly touch our salvation. In the OT sanctuary, where everything was done and taught by visible, tangible types and symbols, physical representations of the living heavenly cherubim were essential. In Ezekiel's new temple, and in the heavenly sanctuary of Hebrews and Revelation, they are no longer needed, for redeemed man there stands in the presence of the living cherubim themselves. The carvings in Ezekiel 41:18 are memorial only. E.R.

CHERUB (kē'rŭb), an unidentified place in Babylonian territory whence exiles returned to Judea (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

CHESALON (kĕs'ā-lŏn), a place identified (Josh. 15:10) with Mount Jearim. It lay on the northern border of Judah, W of Jerusalem, NE of Beth-shemesh. Modern Kesla.

CHESED (kē'sĕd, kĕs'ĕd), the fourth son of Nahor, and nephew of Abraham (Gen. 22:22).

CHESIL (kē'sĭl, kĕs'ĭl), a town in the S of Judah, near Hormah and Ziklag (Josh. 15:30). Its place in the lists is taken by Bethul in Joshua 19:4; by Bethuel in I Chronicles 4:30.

CHEST. 1. Receptacles for money to repair the temple (II Kings 12:9,10; II Chron. 24:8,10,11). Heb. 'ārôn is translated "coffin" once (Gen. 50:26); elsewhere the "ark" in tabernacle and temple.

2. "Chests of rich apparel, bound with cords, and made of cedar," of the merchandise of Tyre (Ezek. 27:24). RSV, on no better lexical authority, translates "carpets of colored stuff, bound with cords and made secure." Heb. genāzîm is rendered "treasuries" in Esther 3:9; 4:7.

CHESTNUT TREE (See Plants)

CHESULLOTH (kē-sŭl'ŏth), a town in Issachar (Josh. 19:18). In NT times Exaloth or Xaloth, modern Iksâl, SE of Nazareth.

CHEZIB (kē'zĭb), the town where Shelah was born to Judah and Shuah (Gen. 38:5). It may be the same as Achzib 1.

CHICKEN (See Birds)

CHIDON (kĭ'dŏn), threshing floor of, (I Chron. 13:9), where Uzza died for touching the ark. Called Nachon's in II Samuel 6:6. Near Jerusalem; site unknown.

CHILD, CHILDREN (chīld, chĭl'drĕn). Among the people of the Bible, both OT and NT, as in most other cultures, children, especially male, were greatly desired (Gen. 15:2; 30:1; I Sam. 1:11,20; Ps. 127:3; 128:3; Luke 1:7,28). Among the Hebrews all the firstborn belonged to God and must be redeemed (Num. 3:40-51). Children were sometimes dedicated to God for special service (Judg. 13:2-7; I Sam. 1:11; Luke 1:13-17,76-79). Male descendants of Abraham were circumcised on the eighth day (Gen. 17:12; 21:4; Luke 1:59; 2:21), when the name was given. Weaning often was delayed, and celebrated (Gen. 21:8) with a feast. Education was primarily in the home and was the duty of parents (Exod. 12:26,27; Deut. 6:7; Josh. 4:21-24; Prov. 22:6; Eph. 6:4; Col. 3:21; II Tim. 3:15). Discipline was to be firm, with corporal punishment (Prov. 22:15; 23:13; 29:15). Much was expected of children (Prov. 20:11). Obedience and respect to parents were commanded (Exod. 21:17; Eph. 6:1-3; Col. 3:20; I Tim. 3:4,12; Tit. 1:6). Favoritism was sometimes shown (Gen. 25:28; 37:3). Affection for children is strikingly portrayed in many instances, as in David's love for a child who died (II Sam. 12:15-23); and in the raising of children to life by Elijah (I Kings 17:17-24), by Elisha (II Kings 4:18-37) and by Jesus (Matt. 9:23-26; Mark 5:35-43; Luke 8:49-56). Jesus' love and concern for children is seen in Matthew 18:1-14; 19:13-15; Mark 9:35-37; 10:13-16; Luke 9:46-48; 18:15-17. Jesus recognized children's play (Matt. 11:16). Many attractive pictures of childhood occur; e.g. Moses (Exod. 2:1-10), Samuel (I Sam. 1:20-3:19), Jesus (Luke 2:7-40), Timothy (II Tim. 1:5; 3:14,15).

"Children" is an affectionate address, as in I John, of an old man to adults, who are, nevertheless, expected to act their age (I Cor. 13:11; 14:20). The attention given to the childhood of the Messiah in prophecy (Isa. 7:14; 9:6) prepares us for the infancy narratives in Matthew 2 and Luke 2. The Savior came as a helpless babe, and grew up through a normal childhood. A return to childlike receptiveness and trust is required of those who would enter the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 18: 1-14; 19:13-15; Mark 9:35-37; 10:13-16; Luke 9: 46-48; 18:15-17). E.R.

CHILDBEARING. The word occurs (I Tim. 2:15) in a passage relating to the proper sphere and conduct of woman. "She shall be saved in childbearing" cannot refer to salvation from sin, which is by grace through faith, but to safe-keeping through the pain which became incident to childbirth through the Fall (Gen. 3:16). Hebrew mothers had the assistance of midwives (Exod. 1:15-21). Newborn babies had the navel cut, were washed with water, salted and wrapped in swaddling clothes (Ezek. 16:4; Luke 2:7,12). Purification rites were prescribed after childbirth (Lev. 12; Luke 2:22-24).

CHILDREN OF GOD, or sons and daughters of God. 1. Angelic beings (Gen. 6:1-4; Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7), though at least the first of these may be godly men.

2. Men, by creation (Luke 3:38; Isa. 64:8; "his offspring" Acts 17:28).

3. Israel in covenant relation to God (Exod. 4: 22; though rebellious Isa. 1:2-4).

4. Individual Israelites (Hos. 1:10).

5. The inclusion of Gentiles is intimated (Isa. 19:25).

6. Jesus (Matt. 3:17; 17:5; Luke 1:35).

7. Through Jesus men may become redeemed children of God (John 1:12; 14:6; by a new birth, John 3:3) in full moral and spiritual sonship (Rom. 8:14-17; Phil. 2:15; I John 3:10) with final likeness to God (I John 3:1-3).

CHILDREN OF ISRAEL (See Israel)

CHILEAB (kĭl'ē-ăb), the second son of David (the first by Abigail) born at Hebron (II Sam. 3:3). Called Daniel in I Chronicles 3:1.

CHILION (kĭl'ĭ-ŏn), one of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, who married Orpah in Moab and died there (Ruth 1:2-5; 4:9,10).

CHILMAD (kĭl'măd), a place which traded with Tyre; associated with Asshur (Ezek. 27:23); site unknown, perhaps modern Kalwâdha near Bagdad. Other readings of the text give "all Media," or "Asshur was as thine apprentice in trading."

CHIMHAM (kĭm'hăm), presumably a son of Barzillai the Gileadite, whom David took to Jerusalem in his service at the request of Barzillai and in his place (II Sam. 19:37-40). "The habitation of Chimham" (Jer. 41:17) retained his name for centuries after his time.

CHINNERETH, CHINNEROTH (kĭn'ē-rĕth, -rŏth). 1. A fortified city on the NW shore of the Sea of Galilee (Josh. 19:35)); modern Tel Oreimeh, meaning Harp Hill. Chinnereth means "harp," and the hill on which it stood is harpshaped.

2. A district in Galilee; "All Chinnereth, with all the land of Naphtali" (I Kings 15:20).

3. The sea later known as Gennesaret or Galilee (Num. 34:11; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 11:2; 12:3; 13:27). The sea also is harpshaped.

CHIOS (kī'ŏs), an island in the Mediterranean Sea 12 miles W of Smyrna, past which (between Mitylene and Samos) Paul sailed on his voyage to Rome (Acts 20:15).

CHISLEV (kĭz'lĕv, KJV Chisleu), the ninth month of the Hebrew ritual year (Neh. 1:1; Zech. 7:1).

CHISLON (kĭz'lŏn), the father of Elidad, the prince of Benjamin in Moses' time who assisted in the division of the land (Num. 34:21).

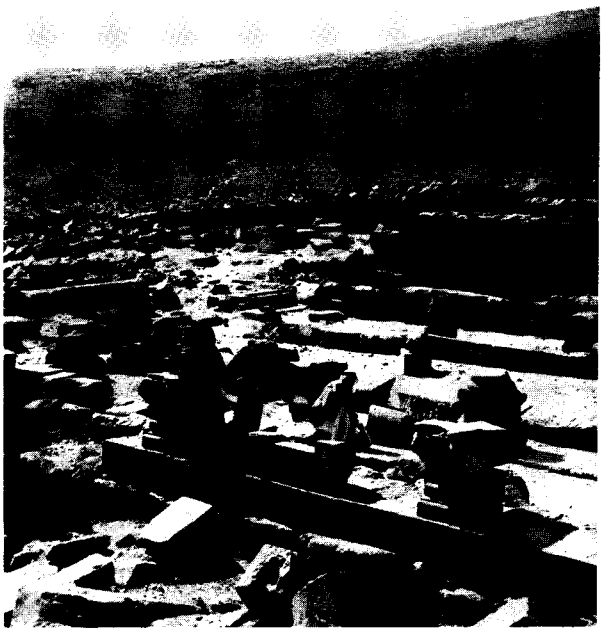
CHISLOTH-TABOR (kĭs'lŏth-tā'bôr), the same place as Chesulloth (Josh. 19:12).

CHITTIM, KITTIM (kĭt'ĭm), descendants of Javan (Gen. 10:4; I Chron. 1:7, Kittim); Cyprus and its inhabitants. Balaam prophesies that ships from Chittim (KJV), Kittim (ASV, RSV) will afflict Asher (Num. 24:24). In Isaiah 23:1,12; Jeremiah 2:10; Ezekiel 27:6, KJV has Chittim, ASV Kittim, RSV Cyprus. In Daniel 11:30 KJV has Chittim, ASV, RSV Kittim. The Heb. kittîm came to apply not only to Cyprus, but also to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean.

CHIUN (kī'ŭn), Saturn as a god (Amos 5:26). KJV has, "the tabernacle of your Molech and Chiun your images, the star of your god"; ASV, "the tabernacle of your king and the shrine of your images, the star of your god"; RSV, "Sakkuth your king, and Kaiwan your star-god, your images."

CHLOE (klō'ē), a woman whose people informed Paul of contentions in the Corinthian church. Where she lived and how her people gained their information is not told. She was well-known to the Corinthian Christians by her personal name.

CHORASHAN (kŏr'ăsh'ăn), a place in the S of Judah to which David sent some of the spoil of the Philistines (I Sam. 30:30). ASV, RSV Borashan. The same as Ashan.



Ruins of Chorazin, north of Capernaum. © MPS

CHORAZIN (kō-rā'zĭn), modern Khirbet Kerâzeh, ruins about two miles N of Tell Hûm, the site of Capernaum. Chorazin is mentioned only in the woes Christ pronounced upon it (Matt. 11:21; Luke 10:13). His condemnation of it, in conjunction with Bethsaida and Capernaum, indicates that Chorazin must have been an important city. It ceased to be inhabited by the time of Eusebius (latter half of the third century). Only a few carved stones remain today.

CHOZEBA (kō-zē'bà), a town of Judah; ASV, RSV, Cozeba (I Chron. 4:22). "Then men of Chozeba" are notable, among others, because "the records are ancient" (ASV, RSV).

CHRIST, JESUS (krīst, jē'zŭs, Gr. Iesoús, for Heb. Jeshua, Jehoshua, Joshua, Jehovah is salvation; Heb. māshîah, Gr. Christós, anointed).

I. Comprehensive Life and Work. Though the life of Christ, as ordinarily understood, embraces the years our Lord spent on this earth, as described in the four Gospels, His full career spans the ages and invites reflection on its several aspects. Fundamental to the various "I Am" sayings of Jesus is His assertion of absolute existence (John 8:58). Therefore it is reasonable to think of Him as belonging to eternity. Scripture, in fact, affirms His pre-existence, and does so in terms of fellowship with the Father (John 1:1); glory (John 17:5) and designation in advance as the Saviour of the world (I Pet. 1:20). His more immediate relation to the realm of men and things belongs to His activity in creation. All things came into being through Him (John 1:3; I Cor. 8:6; Heb. 1:2) and in Him continue to have their cohesive principle (Col. 1:17). Evidence is not lacking for His presence, too, in the OT. The manifestations of God in this period are apparently connected with the pre-incarnate Christ. When Isaiah glimpsed the glory of God he was seeing Christ (John 12:41). Moses and the prophets spoke of Him (John 5:46; Luke 24:27,44) with special reference to His sufferings and the glories that should follow (I Pet. 1:11). Some of the more important passages of a predictive nature are Genesis 3:15; Deuteronomy 18:15,18; Psalms 2,16,22,110; Isaiah 7:14; 9:6-7; 11; 42:1-4; 52:13-53:12; 61:1-2; Jeremiah 23:5-6; Micah 5:2. In addition there are covenantal statements which do not speak of the Messiah directly and personally, but which involve Him in crucial ways (Gen. 12:3; II Sam. 7:12-16). As though in anticipation of the incarnation, the Son of God showed Himself at times to the faithful in visible form as the Angel of the Lord or the Angel of the covenant (Gen. 18:1-19:1; Judg. 13). Before His Advent Christ had thoroughly identified Himself with His people, so that when He came, He came unto His own (John 1:11).

By the incarnation, the Christ of God took on Himself human nature in order to reveal God to men in a way they could grasp (John 1:14,18), to become their Saviour by ransoming them from their sins (Mark 10:45) and to deal sympathetically with their needs (Heb. 2:17-18). Today, in glory, He is still the God-man. The incarnation persists.

The present ministry of Christ is being carried on in heaven, where He represents the saints before the throne of God (I John 2:1; Heb. 7:25). By the successful completion of His work on earth He is exalted to be the head of the church (Eph. 1:22; 4:15), and by the Spirit directs the life and service of His saints on earth (Matt. 28:20).

One purpose of the incarnation was not achieved during the earthly ministry of our Lord, but is reserved for His second coming. His kingly rule will then be introduced following His work as judge (Matt. 25:31-34). This future coming is one of the major truths set forth in the Epistles (Phil. 3:20-21; II Thess. 1:7-10) and is the leading theme of the Book of Revelation. After the millennial kingdom, Christ will enter with His people upon the blessedness of the eternal state which will be unmarred by the inroads of sin or death.

II. The Earthly Ministry. The long-heralded Christ came in the fulness of time (Gal. 4:4). God providentially supplied the proper background for His appearing and mission. The world had become to a great extent homogeneous through the spread of the Greek language and culture and through the organizing genius of Rome. The means were thus provided for the spread of the gospel once it had been forged out in the career of the Son of God. His Advent occurred at a point in human history when the law of Moses had done its work of demonstrating the sinfulness of man and the impossibility of achieving righteousness by human effort. Men here and there were looking with longing for spiritual deliverance.

Entirely in keeping with this divine control of the circumstances surrounding the incarnation is the careful selection of the Virgin Mary as the mother of Jesus. The birth of the Saviour was natural, but His conception was supernatural, by the power of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:35). Augustus, too, was drawn into the circle of the instruments chosen of God, when he was constrained to order a universal enrollment for taxation, not realizing that thereby he would make possible the birth of Jesus in the place appointed by prophetic announcement (Luke 2:1-7; Mic. 5:2). The shepherds, by their readiness to seek out the babe in the manger and by their joy at seeing Him, became prototypes of the humble souls in Jewry who in coming days would recognize in Jesus their Saviour. An intimation of Gentile desire to participate in the Christ may be seen in the coming of the Magi from the East. In darker perspective appears the figure of Herod, emblematic of the hatred and opposition which would meet Jesus of Nazareth and work for His death. In the scribes who are conversant with the Scriptures but apathetic about seeking the One who fulfilled them we see the shape of things to come—the leaders of a nation receiving Him not when He came unto His own.

In more theological terms the Christ-event is an incarnation. God was manifest in flesh. The one who was in the form of God took the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men (Phil. 2:6-7). Therefore, when the Scriptures assert from time to time that God sent His Son into the world, this affirmation is not to be treated as though Christ is merely a messenger of God such as the prophets of old. Rather, He is the eternal Son of God now clothing Himself with human nature to accomplish the salvation of men. Though the expression God-man is not found in the sacred records, it faithfully expresses the truth regarding the person of Jesus Christ. poses. He took what is common to us all, our human nature, yet free from any taint of sin, and combined it with deity to become an actual person with His own individuality. This is the mystery of the incarnation. The gulf between the Creator and the creature is bridged, first by the person and then by the mediatorial work of Christ.

The boyhood of Jesus should be approached from the standpoint of the truth revealed about the incarnation. Deity did not eclipse humanity so as to render the process of learning unnecessary. Christ grew in body and advanced in knowledge and in the wisdom which enabled Him to make proper use of what He knew. He did not command His parents but rather obeyed them, fulfilling the law in this matter as in all others. The scriptural accounts have none of the fanciful extravagances of the Apocryphal Gospels which present the boy Jesus as a worker of wonders during His early years. They emphasize His progress in the understanding of the OT and affirm His consciousness of a special relation to His Father in heaven (Luke 2:49).

At His baptism Jesus received divine confirmation of the mission now opening out before Him and also the anointing of the Holy Spirit for the fulfillment of it. The days of preparation were definitely at an end, so that retirement was put aside and contact begun with His people Israel. By the baptism He was fulfilling all righteousness (Matt. 3:15) in the sense that He was identifying Himself with those He came to redeem.

Closely related to the baptism is the temptation, for it partakes likewise of this representative character. The first man Adam failed when put to the test; the last Adam succeeded, though weakened by hunger and harried by the desolation of the wilderness. In essence, the temptation was the effort of Satan to break Christ's dependence on the Father, so that He would desert the standpoint of man and rely upon special consideration as the Son of God. But Christ refused to be moved from His determined place of chosen identification with the race. "Man shall not live by bread alone . . ." is His first line of defense, and He maintains it in the two following episodes, quoting the obligation of Israel in relation to God as His own reason for refusing to be moved from a place of trustful dependence upon the Almighty (Matt. 4:7,10).

Only when equipped by the baptism and seasoned by the ordeal of temptation was Jesus ready for His life work. No word of teaching and no work of power is attributed to Him prior to these events, but immediately thereafter He began moving in the power of the Spirit to undertake the work the Father had given Him to do (Luke 4:14).

The public ministry of Jesus was brief. Its length has to be estimated from the materials recorded in the Gospels. John gives more information on this point than the other Evangelists. Judging from the number of Passovers mentioned there (John 2:23; 5:1 [?]; 6:4; 13:1) the period was at least somewhat in excess of two years and possibly more than three.

John supplements the Synoptic Gospels also in the description of the place of ministry, for whereas they lay chief stress upon Galilee, plus notices of a visit to the regions of Tyre and Sidon (Matt. 15:21-28); Caesarea-Philippi (Matt. 16:13ff); the Gentile cities of the Decapolis (Mark 7:31; cf. also Mark 5:1-20); Samaria (Luke 9:51-56; 17:11); and the region east of the Jordan River known as Perea (Mark 10:1), John reports several visits to Jerusalem. In fact, most of his record is taken up with accounts of Jesus' ministry in Judea. The Synoptists hint at such a ministry (e.g., Matt. 23:37; Luke 10:38-42), but give little information.

For the conduct of His Galilean mission, Jesus made the city of Capernaum His headquarters. From this center He went forth, usually in the company of His disciples, to challenge the people in city and town and village with His message. Several such tours are indicated in the sacred text (Mark 1:38; 6:6; Luke 8:1). A part of His ministry consisted in healings and exorcisms, for many had diseases of various sorts and many were afflicted with demon possession. These miracles were not only tokens of divine compassion but also signs that in the person of Jesus of Nazareth the Promised One had come (cf. Matt. 11:2-6; Luke 4:16-19). They were revelations of the mercy and power of God at work in God's Anointed. Jesus found fault with the cities of Galilee for rejecting Him despite the occurrence of so many mighty works in their midst (Matt. 11:20-24).

The message proclaimed by Jesus during these itinerating journeys was epitomized in the phrase, "the kingdom of God." Fundamentally, this means the rule of God in human life and history. The phrase may have a more concrete significance at times, for Jesus speaks now and again about entering into the kingdom. In certain passages He makes the kingdom to be future (Matt. 25:31ff) but in others it is present (Luke 11:20). This last reference is of special importance, for it connects the kingdom with the activity of Jesus in casting out demons. To the degree that Jesus invades the kingdom of Satan in this fashion, to that degree the kingdom of God has already come. But in the more spiritual and positive aspects of kingdom teaching, where the individual life is concerned, the emphasis does not fall upon invasion of personality or compulsive surrender to the power of God. The laws of discipleship are demanding indeed, but for their application they await the consent of the individual. No disciple is a monument to force but rather to the persuasive power of love and grace.

If we inquire more definitely into the relation of Jesus Himself to the kingdom, we are obliged to conclude that He not only introduces the kingdom (in a sense John the Baptist did that also) but was its perfect embodiment. The appropriate response to the preaching of the kingdom is committal to the will of God (Matt. 6:10), and it is crystal clear that the doing of the will of God was the mainspring of Jesus' ministry (Matt. 12:50; John 4:34; Mark 14:36). It is evident, of course, that Jesus will also inaugurate the final phase of the kingdom when He comes again in power and glory. Entrance into the present aspect of the kingdom comes through faith in the Son of God and the successful completion of His mission. This could be done during His earthly ministry by anticipation of His redeeming work and thereafter by acceptance of the Gospel message.

Much of our Lord's teaching was conveyed through the instrumentality of parables. These were usually comparisons taken from various phases of nature or human life. "The kingdom of God is like . . ." This method of teaching preserved the interest of the hearers until the spiritual application could be made. If the truth so taught was somewhat veiled by this method, this served to seal the spiritual blindness of the unrepentant and at the same time created a wholesome curiosity on the part of those who were disposed to believe, so that they could be led on to firm faith by more direct teaching.

The ministry of the Saviour was predominantly to the multitudes during its earlier phase, as He sought out the people where they were, whether in the synagogue or on the city street or by the lakeside. "He went about doing good" is the way Peter described it later on (Acts 10:38). But much of the last year of ministry was given over to instruction of the twelve disciples whom He had chosen (for the two phases see Matt. 4:17 and 16:21). This shift of emphasis was not due primarily to the lack of response on the part of the multitudes, although His following faded at times (John 6:15,66), but principally to His desire to instruct His disciples concerning Himself and His mission. These men, nearly all Galileans and many of them fishermen, had been able to learn much through hearing Jesus address the crowds and through watching Him heal the sick and relieve the distressed, and especially through being sent out by Him to minister in His name (Luke 9:1-6), but they needed more direct teaching to prepare them for the part they would play in the life of the church after the ascension.

What they saw and heard during those early days confirmed them in their understanding of the person of Jesus as the Messiah and the Son of God (Matt. 16:16), but they were quite unprepared to receive His teaching on the issue of His earthly life as involving suffering and death (Matt. 16:21-23). Although this prospect was a "must" for Jesus (vs. 21), for Peter it was something that the Lord could dismiss from consideration if He would (vs. 22). If the most prominent one of the apostolic circle felt this way about it, no doubt the others were of the same mind. Their thoughts were so taken up with the prospect of a kingdom of external power and glory that they were perplexed and disturbed to find that their Master anticipated quite a different experience. His prediction of a rising again from the dead fell on deaf ears, for the blow of the announcement about the forthcoming death had been too heavy. Even the lessons of the transfiguration scene, where the death was the theme under discussion and the glory beyond was presented to their sight, did not completely effect the orientation of the disciples to the teaching of Jesus. He had to repeat it more than once (Mark 10:34-45). Their sorrow in the garden of Gethsemane shows that they had reluctantly adjusted to it but could not look beyond it to resurrection nor could they realize how much that death itself could mean to their spiritual welfare. After the resurrection they were much more open to the Lord's instruction, and He used the occasion of His appearances to them for enlightenment from the OT as to the divine purpose pre-written there concerning Himself (Luke 24:26-27,44).

Christ's investment of time and patience with these men was well rewarded, for when the Spirit took up the work of instruction begun by Him and gave them His own power for witness, they became effective instruments for the declaring of the Word of God and for the leadership of the Christian Church. The record of the Book of Acts vindicates the wisdom of Christ and His understanding of the future.

Standing over against the Twelve in their attitude to Jesus are the scribes and Pharisees. The former were experts in the law and the traditions which had grown up around it, and the latter were men dedicated to a meticulous devotion to this heritage of Judaism. These groups usually worked together, and they collided with Jesus on many occasions over many issues. It was shocking to them that He would declare men's sins forgiven and claim a special relation to God as Son which others did not have. They resented His rejection of the traditions which they kept so carefully, and stood aghast at His willingness to break the sabbath (in their way of thinking) by doing deeds of mercy on that day. It was tragic that men who held to the Scriptures as God's Word should fail to see in Jesus Christ the One of whom that Word spoke. They refused to put their trust in Him despite all His miracles and the matchless perfection of His personal life. Because tradition meant more to them than truth, they stumbled in their apprehension of the Christ of God. In the end they made common cause with their opponents, the Sadducees, in order to do away with Jesus.

Even as Christ was engaged in teaching His disciples, from the days of the transfiguration on, He was ever moving toward Jerusalem to fulfill His course at the cross (Luke 9:51). In those latter days some stirring events were unfolded—the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, the cleansing of the temple, the institution of the Lord's Supper, the soul conflict in the garden of Gethsemane, the arrest and trial, the crucifixion, the resurrection, the appearances, the ascension into heaven. In all of them Jesus remains the central figure. In all of them He receives testimony to Himself or gives it. Nothing is unimportant. All contribute to the working out of the plan of God. The cross is man's decision respecting Christ, but it had already been His own decision and that of the Father. It underscored the sins of some men even as it removed the sins of others. In the cross man's day erupted in violence and blasphemy. In the resurrection God's day began to dawn. It was His answer to the world and to the powers of darkness. In it Christ was justified and His claims illuminated.

III. Names, Titles and Offices. Considerable help in understanding the person and work of Christ may be gleaned from a consideration of the terms used to designate Him, especially as these are employed by Himself and His close associates. Jesus is used mostly in the narratives of the Gospels, and only rarely does it appear in direct address. It means Saviour (Matt. 1:21), being related philologically to the Hebrew name Joshua. In the KJV of Hebrews 4:8, Jesus actually stands in the text instead of Joshua. For the most part the name Jesus is joined with other terms when used in the Epistles, but occasionally it stands alone, especially in Hebrews, and doubtless for the purpose of emphasizing His humanity as a continuing element of His being. Therefore it is legitimate for us today to use the simple name in unadorned fashion, but to do so exclusively could indicate a lack of appreciation of the rounded presentation which the Scriptures give of Him.

Christ, meaning "anointed one," is the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew word Messiah. Its function as a title is emphasized by the fact that often it occurs with the definite article, which gives it the force of "the promised Christ," the one who fulfills the concept of Messiah as set forth in the Old Testament Scriptures. Our Lord uses it thus of Himself in Luke 24:46, for example: "And he said to them, Thus it stands written that the Christ should suffer and rise from the dead the third day." By extension of meaning the same form is used by Paul as a synonym for the Church (I Cor. 12:12), thus emphasizing the intimate bond between Christ and His people. Of special interest is the development which led to the use of Christ as a personal name. It must have taken place early in the life of the Church, for we find it reflected, for example, in the opening verse of Mark's Gospel—"The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." Possibly our Lord Himself is responsible for this usage (John 17:3). In the Epistles there are numerous occurrences of Christ alone as a name (I Cor. 15:3, e.g.).

A circumstance which may strike the reader of the Gospels as odd is the prohibition against making Jesus known as the Christ during the days of His ministry. He imposed this restriction on the disciples (Matt. 16:20) and somewhat similarly choked off any possible testimony from demons (Luke 4:41). If this title should be used freely of Him among the Jews, it would excite the populace to expect in Him a political Messiah who would gain for them their national freedom and many accompanying benefits. Since this was not the purpose of Jesus, He did what He could do to suppress the use of the term Messiah with regard to Himself, though He welcomed it in the circle of the apostles (Matt. 16:16).

Only once does the name Emmanuel occur, and then in connection with the conception of Jesus (Matt. 1:23). It is a Hebrew word meaning "God with us," and is peculiarly appropriate as an explanation of the significance of the birth of Jesus as involving the incarnation. For some reason the name did not gain currency in the Church, perhaps because it was crowded out by Jesus and Christ.

Among the ancients it was common to distinguish a man not only by name but also by place of residence. Consequently Jesus was often called the Nazarene because of his years spent in the village of Nazareth (Luke 24:19). As used of Jesus' followers by the Jews the term took on an element of reproach which it did not possess in any recognizable way during His life on earth.

When Jesus referred to Himself His most usual method of identification was to use the title Son of Man. It was more than a means of identification, however, for it linked Him to a conception of majesty which had gathered around the term since its use in Daniel 7:13. Although it is possible that occasionally the title stresses Jesus' humanity, in the main it serves to point to His transcendence as a heavenly figure. Certainly the widespread notion that Son of Man expresses the humanity of Jesus, as Son of God expresses His deity, is quite misleading (cf. Luke 22:69-70). By using this title publicly rather than Messiah, Jesus was able to avoid suggesting that His mission was political in nature, and instead could put into the title by His own use of it the content which He wanted to give to it. The Church recognized the Lord's right to exclusive use of the term and did not employ it, out of deference to Him (the one exception is Stephen in Acts 7:56).

One of the most familiar designations for Jesus is Son of God. Only in John's Gospel does He use it of Himself (John 5:25; 10:36; 11:4). But elsewhere He uses its equivalent, the Son (Matt. 11:27), which is especially appropriate when used opposite the Father, and which in such a passage clearly sets off the uniqueness of this particular Son. In the Synoptic Gospels considerable care is needed in order to impute to the term Son of God the exact nuance of meaning proper to its every occurrence. Geerhardus Vos discerned four meanings: the nativistic, which stresses the divine origination of the person of Jesus as a human figure; the ethico-religious, which points to the filial relation which Christ sustained to the Father within the context of His human life, similar to that which any child of God has; the Messianic, which has to do with His appointment as the anointed of God to execute His mission as the one sent of the Father, in fulfillment of OT prophecy; the trinitarian or ontological, in which the unique relation of Christ to the Father as the only Son is expressed. This latter, of course, represents the highest level of sonship (see G. Vos, The Self-Disclosure of Jesus, pp. 141ff).

Rather frequently in the course of His ministry Jesus was addressed as Son of David (Matt. 21:9; Luke 18:38), which is distinctly a Messianic title pointing to Him as the one who fulfilled the Davidic covenant, the one who was expected to establish the kingdom and bring Israel to freedom, peace, and glory (cf. Matt. 1:1; Luke 1:32-33).

A few passages proclaim outright that Jesus is God (John 1:1 in a pre-incarnate setting; John 1:18 according to the strongest manuscript evidence; John 20:28; Rom. 9:5 according to the most natural construction of the verse; Titus 2:13; Heb. 1:8). That the passages are relatively few in number is probably due to the fact that Jesus Christ, as known to men, was in a position of subordination to the heavenly Father, His deity veiled by His humanity, so that it was much more natural to assign to Him the predicates of deity than to refer to Him directly as God. Semitic monotheism as the background for the early Hebrew Christians doubtlessly exercised a restraining influence also. Some moderns about whose orthodoxy there is no question have nevertheless confessed to a feeling of restraint in referring to Jesus as God, though they do not doubt His essential deity (e.g., James Denney in a letter to W. Robertson Nicoll included in the life of Nicoll by T. H. Darlow, New York: Doran Co., 1925, p. 361).

No term is more expressive of the faith of early believers in Jesus than Lord (Acts 2:36; 10:36; Rom. 10:9; I Cor. 8:6; 12:3; Phil. 2:11). It denotes the sovereignty of Christ, His headship over the individual believer, the church as a body, and all things. For those who were strangers, it was merely a title of respect (John 4:11), but for those who were deeply attached to the Saviour it had the highest import, calling alike for homage and obedience (John 20:28; Acts 22:10). Used sparingly during the period of the earthly ministry prior to the resurrection, it takes on an increased use and heightened significance as a result of that tremendous event.

Some titles pertain to the mission of Christ more than to His person. One of these is Word (John 1:1,14; I John 1:1). As such Christ is essentially the revealer of God, the one who opens to the understanding of men the nature and purposes of the Almighty and discloses that higher wisdom which stands in contrast to the wisdom of men. In keeping with such a title is the designation Teacher, by which our Lord was customarily addressed in the days of His flesh. This attests the impact of His instruction and the authority which lay behind it. Despite the fact that Jesus lacked rabbinic training, He could not be denied the recognition of the wisdom which shone through His spoken word.

The classic designation of Christ as Servant is given by Paul in Philippians 2:7, but it was widely recognized in the early church that our Lord fulfilled the Servant of Jehovah role in Himself (see Matt. 12:17-21). That it dominated the thinking of Christ Himself may be safely affirmed in the light of such a passage as Mark 10:45.

Central to the mission of Christ was His work as Saviour. We have already seen that the name Jesus has this meaning, the name suggesting the reason for His coming into the world. Luke 2:11 and John 4:42 are among the passages which herald Christ under the aspect of His Saviourhood. The idea in the word is not merely deliverance from sin and all the other woes which afflict man, but the provision of a state of wholeness and blessedness in which man realizes the purpose of God for him. In reports of the healings of Jesus, the verb form denotes the state of soundness which results from the healing touch of the Saviour.

Jesus' saving mission is declared also in the expression, Lamb of God (John 1:29,36; cf. Rev. 5:6). Peter likewise uses the word "lamb" of Jesus, with special reference to His qualification of sinlessness (I Pet. 1:19).

The reference to Jesus as High Priest is confined to the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it occurs some ten times, His work being described as taking place in the heavenly sanctuary, in the presence of God, where the fruits of His death for sinners on the earth are conserved in His work of intercession (Heb. 9:11-12).

More general is the characterization of our Lord as the Mediator between God and men (I Tim. 2:5). This term takes account of the barrier which sin erected between the Creator and the creature, which Christ alone was qualified to remove. For the concept in the OT, see Job 9:33.

Paul uses the title Last Adam (I Cor. 15:45) in contrast to the first Adam, suggesting the undoing of the consequences of sin brought on by Adam's transgression (cf. Rom. 5:12-21), and the realization of new creation life which is to be communicated to all believers in resurrection glory even as it is already their portion in Christ in a spiritual sense.

This list of names and titles of Christ is not exhaustive. The resources of languages are taxed in the sacred record to set forth the full excellence and worth of the Son of God. When His work is considered in its broad sweep, the most satisfying analysis divides it in accordance with the offices which He fulfills—prophet, priest and king. The prophetic ministry relates especially to the testimony borne in the days of His flesh as He heralded the kingdom of God, warned of coming judgment, and encouraged the people of God. He is still the faithful and true witness as He speaks to the church through the Spirit. As priest our Lord made the one sacrifice of Himself which brought to an end animal sacrifices and put away sin for ever (Heb. 9:26). Faithful and merciful, He ministers before God on behalf of His people who are compassed by sin and infirmity (Heb. 2:17; 4:15-16). The term king relates especially to the future activity of our Lord as He comes again to supplant the kingdom of the world with His own gracious and sovereign rule (Rev. 11:15). He shall be no ordinary ruler, but King of kings, without a peer.

IV. Character. "What manner of man is this?" Such was the amazed observation of the disciples of Jesus as they beheld Him in action and felt the strength and mystery of His personality as they companied with Him. Certain ingredients of character deserve special mention, but it cannot be said that He was noted for some things above others, for this would involve disproportion and would reflect upon the perfection of His being. He had integrity. After all, this is the kernel of character. The Gospel appeal consisting in the challenge to lodge faith in Christ would be impossible if He were not trustworthy. No taint of duplicity marred His dealings with others, for there was no mixture of motives within His heart. He could not deceive, for He was Truth incarnate. The claims of Jesus in areas where we have no means of testing them can be cordially received for the reason that in areas where His affirmations can be judged they stand the test.

Christ had courage. When Aristotle advanced his famous doctrine of the mean, he illustrated it by courage, which lies midway between cowardice and recklessness. Judged by this standard, the character of Jesus appears in a most favorable light, for in Him one can detect no wild instability even in the most intense activity, nor any supineness in His passivity. Christ had physical courage. Without it He could never have cleared the temple singlehandedly. He had the courage of conviction. Peter was probably His boldest disciple, yet he denied his Lord under pressure, whereas Jesus confessed His own person and mission before the Sanhedrin even though it meant His death. The stamina of men is often attributable, at least in part, to the help and sympathy of their fellows, but Jesus stood alone as He faced His final ordeal.

Our Lord showed great compassion as He dealt with people. This is the word used in the Gospels. In the Epistles it is called love. The sight of multitudes forlorn and forsaken by those who should have been their spiritual shepherds stirred Christ to the depths of His being. Out of His compassion He ministered to their physical need for food and health, and went on to tell them the secrets of the life of true godliness. Compassion was more than an emotion with Jesus. It was a call to action, to selfless ministry on behalf of the needy. He gave Himself to one with the same intensity that He showed in dealing with the many. Virtue went out of Him and He did not regret the loss, for it is the nature of love to give. To love the loveless and love them to the end and to the uttermost — this is the love that Paul describes as passing knowledge (Eph. 3:19). It is a love that proved itself through death—He loved me and gave Himself for me (Gal. 2:20), and yet remains deathless.

Jesus clothed Himself with humility. He could talk about this as His own possession without affectation (Matt. 11:29). Christ wrought a revolution in ethics by dignifying humility in a world which despised it as weakness. Though the universe was His creation and though He was equal with the Father, though every knee would one day bow before Him, yet He was not lifted up with pride because of these things. The mind of Christ is that which takes every reason for exaltation and transmutes it into a reason for selfless service. In essence His humility was His refusal to please Himself. He came not to be ministered unto but to minister.

Our Lord's character is crowned with perfection or sinlessness. This perfection was not simply the absence of sin, but the infusion of a heavenly holiness into all that He said and did. It may be objected that when Jesus gave way to anger and spoke out in bitter denunciation of the Pharisees (Matt. 23) that He revealed at least a trace of imperfection. But a character without the power of righteous indignation would be faulty. If Jesus had failed to expose these men He would not have done His full duty as the exponent of truth. He is the image of the Father, and God is angry with the wicked every day.

V. Influence. A life so brief, so confined in its geographical orbit, so little noticed by the world in His own time, has yet become the most potent force for good in all of human history. This is seen in the Scriptures of the NT. In every single book which goes to make up this collection, Jesus Christ is the inevitable point of reference. Even so brief and personal a writing as Philemon owes its inspiration to the Son of God who came to make men free. The Gospels picture Him in the flesh; the Epistles present Him in the Spirit. The Acts of the Apostles depicts the victories of His grace in the extension of His Church; the Revelation sets forth the triumph of His glory through His personal presence once more in history.

His influence upon the saints is so radical and comprehensive that nothing can describe it better than the assertion that Christ is their life. They were not truly living until they came to know Him by faith. Until He comes into the heart, self rules supreme. When He comes, He creates a new point of reference and a new set of values. To be Christ-centered is simply normal Christian experience.

What Christ can do in transforming a life may be seen to good advantage in the case of Saul of Tarsus. Apart from Christ the world might never have heard of him. Because in Christ he died to self and lived in the energy of the risen Christ to glorify God, his is a household name wherever Christians are found.

It is inevitable that sinners should feel the touch of Christ and never be the same afterward. Regarding the self-righteous leaders of His own time Jesus could say, "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin; but now they have no cloke for their sin" (John 15:22). Christ is the conscience of the world. Because He is the light of the world, when men stand in that light then turn from it, they walk in deeper darkness and are without hope.

In a more general sense, Christ has mightily affected society in its organized state. He has taught the world the dignity of human life, the worth of the soul, the preciousness of personality. Because of this the status of women has steadily been improved under Christian influence, slavery has been abolished, and children, instead of being exposed as infants and neglected in formative years, are recognized as a primary responsibility for the lavishing of love and care. Human life, when weak or deformed or diseased, is no longer regarded as forfeiting a right to a place in society, but rather entitled to help. The fact that governments and scientific groups are now engaged in social service on a large scale ought not to disguise the fact that the impulse for these works of mercy has been the Christian church acting in the name and spirit of Christ. The arts owe their sublimest achievements to the desire to honor the Son of God. Beethoven called Handel the greatest composer of all time, a man who could not complete his oratorio The Messiah without being moved repeatedly to tears as he thought upon the incarnation. Every cathedral spire that pierces the sky throughout Christendom bears its silent testimony to the loving outreach toward God that is induced through the knowledge of Christ the Lord. Moralists and philosophers, even when they lack faith in Him for the saving of the soul, nevertheless are often found acknowledging wistfully that they wish they had a personal inheritance in Him as they commend Him to others as the one great hope for mankind. CHRISTIAN (krĭs'chăn, krĭst'yăn, Gr. Christianós). The Biblical meaning is "adherent of Christ." The disciples were formally called Christians first in Antioch (Acts 11:26). Agrippa recognized that to believe what Paul preached would make him a Christian (Acts 26:28). Peter accepted the name as in itself basis for persecution (I Pet. 4:16). Thus gradually a name imposed by Gentiles was adopted by the disciples of Jesus. Some Jews had referred to them as "the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts 24:5); and Paul, when a persecutor, as those "of the Way" (Acts 9:2). The Latin termination ianós, widely used throughout the empire, often designated the slaves of the one with whose name it was compounded. This implication occurs in the NT (e.g., Rom. 6:22; I Pet. 2:16). The apostles wrote of themselves as servants (slaves) of Christ (Rom. 1:1; James 1:1; II Pet. 1:1; Jude 1:1; Rev. 1:1). The NT calls the followers of Christ brethren (Acts 14:2); disciples (Acts 6:1,2); saints (Acts 9:13; Rom. 1:7; I Cor. 1:2); believers (I Tim. 4:12); the church of God (Acts 20:28); those that call upon the name of the Lord (Acts 9:14; Rom. 10:12,13); etc. To the first Christians, their own name mattered not at all: their concern was with the one Name of Jesus Christ (Acts 3:16; 4:10,12; 5:28). Inevitably, the name which they invoked was given to them: Christians, Christ's men. Its NT meaning is alone adequate for us. E.R.

CHRISTIANITY (krĭs'chĭ-ăn'ĭtē, krĭs'tĭ-ăn'ĭ-tē). The word does not occur in the Bible. Greek Christianismós, "Christianism," Christianity, was first used by Ignatius (Ad Magnes 10). Latin Christianismus occurs in Tertullian, Against Marcion 4, 33; in Augustine, The City of God, 19, 21, 1; and Jerome, on Galatians 6:4. Latin Christianitas, whence our word Christianity, occurs first in the Codex Theodosianus 16, 7, 7 and 12, 1, 112; and by metonymy for the Christian clergy, 12, 1, 123. The name was made by Christians to designate all that which Jesus Christ brought to them of faith, life and salvation. Its character is summed up in the words of Jesus, "I am the way, the truth, and the life: no man cometh unto the Father but by me" (John 14:6); "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly" (John 10:10). The classic summary of its doctrines is in the words of Paul in I Corinthians 15:1-4. It is all "according to the scriptures": OT and NT together form the authoritative revelation of what Christianity is. The resurrection of Jesus was the final proof to His disciples that He is the Messiah and Redeemer of men (Acts 2:22-36).

CHRISTMAS (krĭs'măs, krĭst'măs), the anniversary of the birth of Christ, and its observance; celebrated by most Protestants and by Roman Catholics on December 25; by Eastern Orthodox churches on January 6; and by the Armenian church on January 19. The first mention of its observance on December 25 is in the time of Constantine, about A.D. 325. The date of the birth of Christ is not known. The word Christmas is formed of Christ + Mass, meaning a mass of religious service in commemoration of the birth of Christ. Whether the early Christians thought of or observed Christmas is not clear. Once introduced, the observance spread throughout Christendom. Some Christian bodies disapprove of the festival. Many customs of pagan origin have become part of Christmas, e.g., the Christmas tree; but most of these no longer have a heathen connotation, but have acquired a Christian meaning (e.g., the Christmas tree points upward to God and reminds us of His gifts). A commemoration of the birth of Christ in harmonious keeping with the events surrounding that birth (Luke 2:1-20; Matt. 1:18-2:12) is a natural and normal expression of love and reverence for Jesus Christ. E.R.

CHRONICLES, I and II, are called in Hebrew, diverê ha-yāmîm, "The words (affairs) of the days," meaning "The annals" (cf. I Chron. 27:24). Similar annals, now lost, are mentioned in I and II Kings (for example, I Kings 14:19,29); they cannot, however, consist of our present books, which were not written until a century later. The church father Jerome (A.D. 400) first entitled them, "Chronicles." Originally, they formed a single composition, but were divided into I and II Chronicles in the LXX, about 150 B.C. In the Hebrew, they stand as the last books of the OT canon. Christ (Luke 11:51) thus spoke of all the martyrs from Abel, in the first book (Gen. 4), to Zechariah, in the last (II Chron. 24).

Chronicles contains no statements about its own authorship or date. The last event it records is the decree of Cyrus in 538 B.C., which permitted the Jews to return from their Babylonian captivity (II Chron. 36:22); and its genealogies extend to approximately 500 B.C., as far, that is, as to Pelatiah and Jeshaiah (I Chron. 3:21), two grandsons of Zerubbabel, the prince who led in the return from exile. The language, however, and the contents of Chronicles closely parallel that of the book of Ezra, which continues the history of the Jews from the decree of Cyrus down to 457 B.C. Both documents are marked by lists and genealogies, by an interest in priestly ritual, and by devotion to the law of Moses. The closing verses, moreover, of Chronicles (II 36:22-23) are repeated as the opening verses of Ezra (1:1-3a). Ancient Hebrew tradition and the modern scholarship of Wm. F. Albright (JBL 40 [1921], pp. 104-124) therefore unite in suggesting that Ezra may have been the author of both volumes. His complete work would then have been finished some time around 450 B.C. (See CYRUS)

Ezra's position as a "scribe" (Ezra 7:6) may also explain the care that Chronicles shows in acknowledging its written source materials. These include such records as those of Samuel (I Chron. 29:29) and Isaiah (II Chron. 32:32) and a number of other prophets (II 9:29; 12:15; 20:34; 33:19) and, above all else, "The book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (16:11; 25:26; etc.). This latter work cannot be equated with our present-day I-II Kings, for verses such as I Chronicles 9:1 and II 27:7 refer to "The book of the kings" for further details on matters about which I-II Kings is silent. The author's source must have been a larger court record, now lost, from which both Kings and Chronicles subsequently drew much of their information.

The occasion for the writing of Chronicles appears to be that of Ezra's crusade to bring post-exilic Judah back into conformity with the law of Moses (Ezra 7:10). From 458 B.C. and onward, Ezra sought to restore the temple worship (7:19-23,27; 8:33-34), to eliminate the mixed marriages of Jews with their pagan neighbors (9-10), and to strengthen Jerusalem by rebuilding its walls (4:8-16). Chronicles, accordingly, consists of these four parts: genealogies, to enable the Jews to establish their lines of family descent (I Chron. 1-9); the kingdom of David, as a pattern for the ideal theocratic state (I Chron. 10-29); the glory of Solomon, with an emphasis upon the temple and its worship (II Chron. 1-9); and the history of the southern kingdom, stressing in particular the religious reforms and military victories of Judah's more pious rulers (II Chron. 10-36).

As compared with the parallel histories in Samuel and Kings, the priestly annals of Chronicles lay a greater emphasis upon the structure of the temple (I Chron. 22) and upon Israel's ark, the Levites, and the singers (I Chron. 13, 15-16). They omit, however, certain individualistic, moral acts of the kings (II Sam. 9; I Kings 3:16-28), as well as detailed biographies of the prophets (I Kings 17-22:28; II Kings 1-8:15), features which account for the incorporation of Chronicles into the third (non-prophetic) section of the Hebrew canon, as distinguished from the location of the more homiletical books of Samuel and Kings in the second (prophetic) division. Finally, the chronicler foregoes discussion of David's disputed inauguration and later shame (II Sam. 1-4, 11-21), of Solomon's failures (I Kings 11), and of the whole inglorious history of Saul (I Sam. 8-30, except his death, 31) and of the northern kingdom of Israel: the disillusioned, impoverished Jews of 450 B.C. knew enough of sin and defeat; but they needed an encouraging reminder of their former, God-given victories (as II Chron. 13,14,20,25).

Because of these emphases, many modern critics have rejected Chronicles as being Levitical propaganda, a fiction of "what ought to have happened" (IB, III:341), with extensive (and conflicting) revisions as late as 250 B.C. (so Adam C. Welch, Robert F. Pfeiffer, and W. A. L. Elmslie). The book's high numeric totals (such as the 1,000,000 invading Ethiopians, II Chron. 14:9) are subject to particular ridicule, despite the elucidations that have been presented by believing scholars (see Edward J. Young, An Introduction to the Old Testament, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949, pp. 388-390). Liberal writers, however, with their prior repudiation of the Mosaic origin of OT religion, are simply unable to evaluate Chronicles in an objective fashion: its repeated validations of the ceremonies of the Pentateuch leave them no alternative but to deny its historicity. Yet excavations at Ugarit, a Canaanitish city of Moses' day, have confirmed the authenticity of just such religious practices (see J. W. Jack, The Ras Shamra Tablets: their Bearings on the Old Testament, Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1935, p. 29ff); and Albright observes that the reliability of many of the historical statements that are found only in Chronicles has been established by recent archaeological discovery (BASOR 100 [1945], p. 18). Furthermore, though Chronicles does stress the bright side of Hebrew history, it does not deny the defeats (cf. I Chron. 29:22 on the successful second anointing of Solomon and II Chron. 17:3 on the more exemplary first ways of David). The prophetic judgments of Kings and the priestly hopes of Chronicles are both true, and both are necessary. The morality of the former is invaluable, but the redemption of the latter constitutes the more distinctive feature of Christian faith. J.B.P.

CHRONOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT, the science of determining the dates of the NT books and the historical events mentioned therein. The subject is beset with serious difficulty since sufficient data are often lacking and the computations must be based upon ancient documents which did not record historical events under precise calendar dates like modern historical records. Neither sacred nor secular historians of that time were accustomed to record history under exact dates but felt that all demands were satisfied when some specific event was related to a well-known period, as, the reign of a noted ruler, or the time of some famous contemporary. Luke's method of dating the beginning of the ministry of John the Baptist (Luke 3:1,2) is typical of the historian's method of that day. Further, the use of different local chronologies and different ways of computing years often leave the results tentative. NT chronology naturally falls into two parts: the life of Christ, and the apostolic age.

Life of Christ. The erection of a chronology of the life of Christ turns around three points: His birth, baptism, and crucifixion. Luke's statement of the age of Jesus at His baptism (Luke 3:23) links the first two, while the problem of the length of the ministry links the second and third.

The Christian Era, now used almost exclusively in the Western World for civil chronology, was introduced at Rome by Abbot Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century. It is now generally agreed that the beginning of the era should have been fixed at least four years earlier.

According to the Gospels Jesus was born some time before the death of Herod the Great. Josephus, the Jewish historian, who was born A.D. 37, affirms (Ant. XVII,6,4) that Herod died shortly after an eclipse of the moon, which is astronomically fixed at March 12-13, 4 B.C. His death occurred shortly before Passover, which that year fell on April 4. His death in 4 B.C. is also confirmed from the known commencement of the rule of his three sons in that year. The age of Jesus at Herod's death is not certain. The "two years" for the age of the children slain at Bethlehem (Matt. 2:16) offers no sure indication, since Herod would allow a liberal margin for safety, and since part of a year might be counted as a year. It does show that Jesus was born at least some months before Herod's death. Christ's presentation in the temple after He was 40 days old (Luke 2:22-24; Lev. 12:1-8) makes it certain that the wise men came at least six weeks after His birth. The time spent in Egypt is uncertain, but may have been several months. Thus the birth of Jesus should be placed in the latter part of the year 5 B.C.

Luke's statement (3:1,2) that Jesus was born in connection with the "first enrollment" when "Quirinius was governor of Syria" (ASV) was once fiercely assailed as erroneous, since Cyrenius (AV), or Quirinius, was known to be governor in connection with the census of A.D. 6. But it is now known that he was also connected with the Syrian government at some previous time. Papyrus evidence shows that Augustus inaugurated a periodic census every 14 years, from 8 B.C. onward. Herod's war with the king of Arabia, his troubles with Augustus, as well as the problem of the method of taking the census among the Jews, may have delayed the actual census in Palestine for several years, bringing it down to the year 5 B.C.

Luke gives the age of Jesus at His baptism as "about thirty years" (3:23). Although the statement of age is not specific, it naturally implies that His age was just about 30, a few months under or over. Born in the latter part of 5 B.C., His baptism then occurred near the close of A.D. 26 or the beginning of 27. The 40-day period of the temptation, plus the events recorded in John 1:19-2:12 seem to require that the baptism occurred at least three months before the first Passover of His public ministry (John 2:13-22). Since Herod began the reconstruction of the temple in 20 B.C., the "forty and six years" mentioned by the Jews during this Passover, using the inclusive Jewish count, again brings us to A.D. 27 for this first Passover.

Apparently John began his ministry some six months before the baptism of Jesus. Luke dates that beginning as "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar" (3:1). Augustus died in August of A.D. 14, but 15 years added to that would be two years too late for our previous dates. Since Tiberius had been reigning jointly with Augustus in the provinces for two years before his death, it seems only natural that Luke would follow the provincial point of view and count the 15 years from the time of Tiberius' actual assumption of authority in the provinces. Thus counted, the date is in harmony with our other dates. The ministry of John, begun about six months before the baptism of Jesus, commenced about the middle of A.D. 26.

The time of the crucifixion will be determined by the length of the ministry of Jesus. Mark's Gospel seems to require at least two years: the plucking of the ears of grain (April-June) marks a first spring; the feeding of the 5,000 when the grass was fresh green (March-April), a second; the Passover of the crucifixion, a third. John's Gospel explicitly mentions three Passovers (2:23; 6:4; 11:55). If the feast of 5:1 is also a Passover, as seems probable, a view having the traditional backing of Irenaeus, then the length of the ministry of Jesus was full three years and a little over. This places the crucifixion at the Passover of A.D. 30.

Apostolic Age. Due to the uncertainties connected with the limited data for an apostolic chronology, authorities have arrived at varied dates. The Book of Acts with its many notes of time, mostly indefinite, offers but few points for the establishment of even relatively fixed dates. Even Paul's apparently precise chronological notes in Galatians 1:18 and 2:1 leave us in doubt as to whether "after three years" and "after the space of fourteen years" are to be regarded as consecutive or as both counting from his conversion. The death of Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12:23) and the proconsulship of Gallio (Acts 18:12) are important for the chronology of the period.

The death of Herod Agrippa I, one of the fixed dates of the New Testament, is known to have taken place in A.D. 44. It establishes the year of Peter's arrest and miraculous escape from prison. The proconsulship of Gallio is also strongly relied upon for an apostolic chronology. A fragmentary inscription found at Delphi associates his proconsulship with the 26th acclamation of Claudius as Imperator. This would place his proconsulship between May 51 and 52, or May 52 and 53. The latter date is more probable since Gallio would assume office in May and not in midsummer as some advocates of the earlier date assumed. Since apparently Paul had already been at Corinth a year and a half when Gallio arrived, his ministry at Corinth began in the latter part of A.D. 50. Efforts to determine the time of the accession of Festus as governor, under whom Paul was sent to Rome, have not resulted in agreement. From the inconclusive data advocates have argued for a date as early as A.D. 55 and as late as 60 or 61. The balance of the arguments seems to point to 60, or perhaps 59. If the latter, the suggested dates should be adjusted accordingly.

Chronological Table. The dates for many NT events must remain tentative, but as indicated by Luke (3:1,2), they have a definite correlation with secular history. (See the accompanying diagram). The following chronological table is regarded as approximately correct. The dates for the NT literature assume a conservative viewpoint.

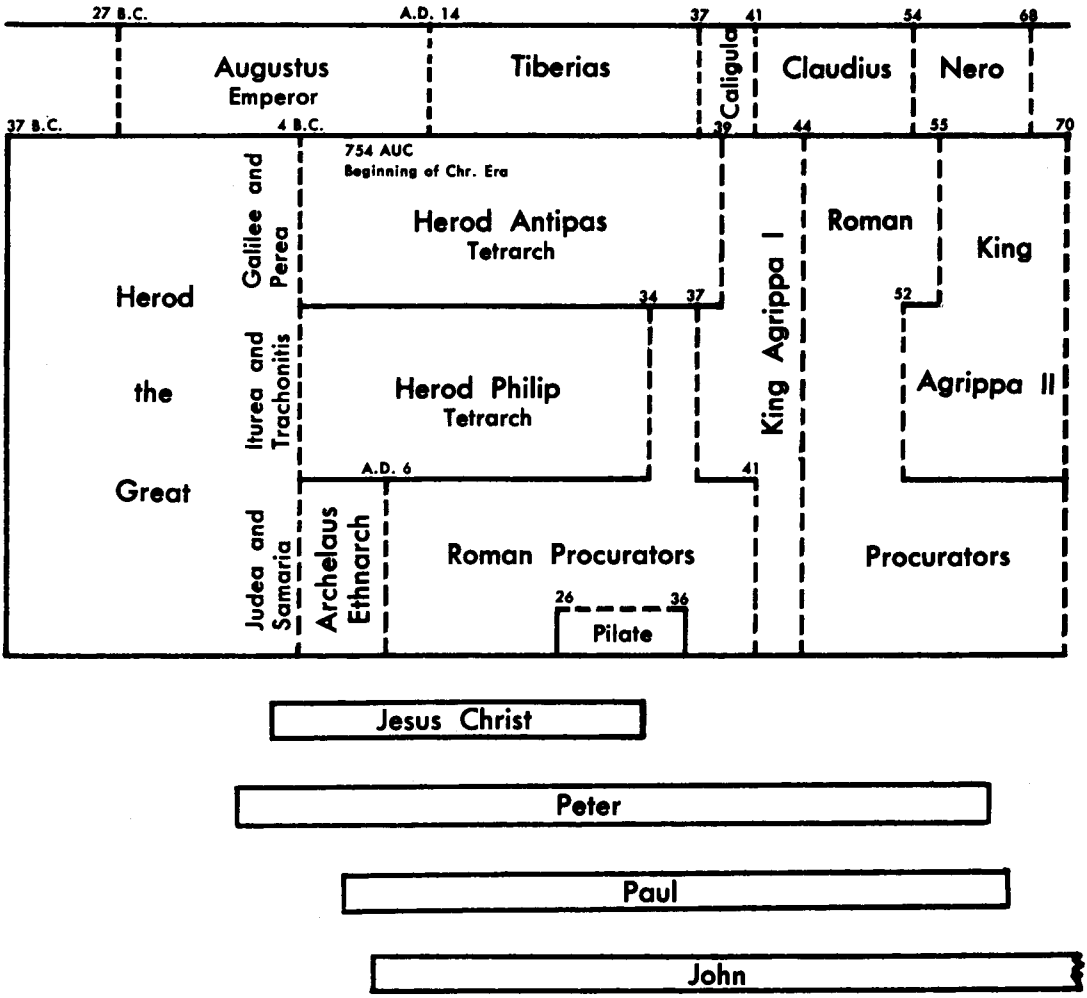
Chronological Chart of the New Testament



CHRONOLOGY, OLD TESTAMENT. The chronology of the Old Testament presents many complex and difficult problems. The data are not always adequate or clear, and at times are almost completely lacking. Because of insufficient data many of the problems are at present beyond solution. Even where the data are abundant the exact meaning is often not immediately apparent, leaving scope for considerable difference of opinion and giving rise to many variant chronological reconstructions. The chronological problem is thus one of the availability of evidence, of the correct evaluation and interpretation of that evidence, and of its proper application. Only the most careful study of all the data, both Biblical and extra-Biblical, can hope to provide a satisfactory solution.

FROM THE CREATION TO THE DELUGE. From the creation to the deluge the only Biblical data are the ages of the patriarchs in the genealogical tables of Genesis 5 and 7:11. The Masoretic text gives 1,656 years from Adam to the deluge; the Samaritan Pentateuch gives 1,307 years, and the Septuagint, 2,242. The numbers of the MT are in agreement with the Samaritan except in the cases of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech, where the numbers of the MT are higher by 100 years, 120, and 129 respectively. For the eight patriarchs from Adam to Methuselah, the numbers of the LXX are a century higher in each instance than those of the Samaritan, while for Lamech the number is 135 years higher.

Extra-Biblical sources for this period are almost completely lacking. The early Sumerian king list names eight kings with a total of 241,200 years from the time when "the kingship was lowered from heaven" to the time when "the Flood swept" over the land and once more "the kingship was lowered from heaven." (Thorkild Jacobsen, The Sumerian King List, Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1939, pp. 71, 77). Such a statement, however, makes no practical contribution to the solution of this phase of OT chronology. Nor is modern science in a position to supply a detailed and final solution.

The Deluge to Abraham. For the period from the deluge to Abraham we are again dependent upon the genealogical data in the Greek and Hebrew texts, and the Samaritan Pentateuch. Reckoning the age of Terah at the birth of Abraham as 70 (Gen. 11:26), the years from the deluge to Abraham would be 292 according to the MT, 942 according to the Samaritan Pentateuch, and 1172 according to the LXX. But if the age of Terah at Abraham's birth is reckoned as 130 years (on the basis of Gen. 11:32; 12:4; and Acts 7:4), the above totals would be raised by 60 years. On this basis the Hebrew text would give 352 years from the deluge to Abraham, and the Greek, 1232.

In this area the testimony of the MT stands alone against the LXX and the Samaritan Pentateuch, where the numbers are 100 years higher than those of the MT for Arphaxad, Salah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug, while for Nahor, the grandfather of Abraham, the Samaritan is 50 years higher and LXX 150, than the MT.

Serious chronological difficulties are thus encountered in the period immediately beyond Abraham. Abraham was 86 years old at the birth of Ishmael (Gen. 16:16), and 100 at the birth of Isaac (Gen. 21:5). But how old was Terah at the birth of Abraham, 70, 130, or some number not revealed? And how old was Nahor at the birth of Terah, 29, 79, or 179? If Terah was 130 years old at the birth of Abraham, as seems to be indicated by the Biblical evidence, it must be admitted that the numbers of the Septuagint for this period (135, 130,130,134,130,132,130,179,130), are much more consistent with each other than the numbers of the Hebrew (35,30,34,30,32,30,29,130). But it will be noticed that in the case of nine patriarchs in the Septuagint, five of them were 130 years old when their sons were born, while in the Hebrew three out of eight were 30, one was 130, while the others were all in their thirties with the exception of Nahor who was 29—one year from 30. And if Terah was 130 years old when Abraham was born, why should it have been regarded as so very unusual for Abraham to have a son at the age of 100 (Gen. 17:17; 18:11; 21:2,5)?

An endeavor to assess the relative values of the three sources involved accomplishes little, for the indications are that none is altogether complete. Certainly the LXX had great weight in NT times, for in Luke's table of the ancestors of Christ, there is listed a second Cainan, son of Arphaxad (Luke 3:36), in harmony with the LXX of Gen. 11:12,13 —a name not found in the MT. If the LXX is here to be followed rather than the MT, another 130 years should be added to the years of the deluge and creation, for that is the age of Cainan in the LXX at the time of the birth of Salah.

The omission of the names of known individuals is frequent in Biblical genealogical records. Thus Matthew's table of the ancestors of Christ omits the names of three Judean kings—Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah—with the statement that "Joram begat Ozias" (Matt. 1:8), whereas Uzziah was actually the great-great-grandson of Joram. A comparison of Ezra 7:1-5 with I Chronicles 6:4-15 shows a block of six names missing in Ezra's tabulation.

Extra-Biblical materials from the deluge to Abraham are of little assistance in the establishment of an absolute chronology for this period, but there is sufficient evidence to show that the time involved is much greater than that indicated by the genealogical data of the MT. No exact synchronisms exist between Biblical and secular chronology of this period, and the exact chronology of Mesopotamia and Egypt has not yet been established.

Because of the difficulties involved, it must be admitted that the construction of an absolute chronology from Adam to Abraham is not now possible on the basis of the available data.

Abraham to Moses. From Abraham to Joseph the detailed patriarchal narratives provide more data than are available for the preceding periods, and we have the certainty that there are no missing links. There are, also, a number of correlations with later and better known periods. Since Abraham was 75 years old at the time of his entrance into Canaan (Gen. 12:4), and since he was 100 at the birth of Isaac (Gen. 21:5), there were 25 years from the entry into Canaan to Isaac. Isaac was 60 at the birth of Jacob (Gen. 25:26), and Jacob was 130 at his entrance into Egypt (Gen. 47:9,28), making 215 years from the beginning of the sojourn in Canaan to the beginning of the sojourn in Egypt. The total length of the sojourn was 430 years (Exod. 12:40). Did this involve only the sojourn in Egypt or did it include also the sojourn in Canaan? If Israel was in Egypt 430 years, there were 645 years from the entrance into Canaan to the Exodus. Otherwise there were 430 years from Abraham's entry into Canaan to Moses' departure from Egypt, and the length of the Egyptian sojourn would have been only 215 years.

According to I Kings 6:1 the temple was founded in the 480th year after the Exodus, which was the fourth year of Solomon's reign. On the basis of a 40-year reign for Solomon (I Kings 11:42) and in accord with the established chronology of the kings, that was 966 B.C. This would provide 1445 as the date of the Exodus and 1525 as the year of Moses' birth (Exod. 7:7). If the 430-year sojourn involved only the period in Egypt, Abraham entered Canaan in 2090. If it included the years in Canaan, the date was 1875. The answer depends on the meaning of the prophecy of Genesis 15:13-16 and the reconstruction of the details from Abraham to Moses. From Abraham to Joseph the details are known, but from Joseph to Moses there is only genealogical evidence.

Due to omissions, repetitions, and other variations in the genealogical lists, the endeavor to establish times by the evidence of such lists must be regarded as highly precarious. Compare, for instance, the line of descent of Samuel and his sons from Levi and Kohath as recorded in I Chronicles 6:22-28 and in verses 33-38, and see I Samuel 8:2 for the names of these sons. Compare also the various lists of the sons of Benjamin and their descendants as found in Genesis 46:21; Numbers 26:38-40; I Chronicles 7:6-12; and 8:1-40. The variations in existence here and in many other lists indicate the dangers involved in dogmatic reconstructions based only on genealogical evidence.

The ancestry of Moses from Jacob through Levi, Kohath, and Amram is repeatedly given (Num. 3:17-19; 26:57-59; I Chron. 6:1-3; 23:6, 12,13), including the ages of these patriarchs at the time of death (Exod. 6:16,18,20), but the ages at the time of their sons' births are not recorded. Jochebed, the wife of Amram and mother of Moses, is said to have been the sister of Kohath, son of Levi and father of Moses (Exod. 6: 16,18,20), and to have been born to Levi in Egypt (Num. 26:59). This might appear to be conclusive evidence of a comparatively brief period in Egypt and to make a sojourn there of 430 years impossible. But there are difficulties. While four to five generations from Jacob to Moses may be indicated in the above line of descent, 11 generations may be counted from Jacob to Joshua (I Chron. 7:20-27). And that some considerable period was involved is clear from the fact that Joseph before his death saw the children of the third generation of both his sons (Gen. 50:23), and that at the time of the Exodus Amram and his brothers were already regarded as founders of clans (Num. 3:27).

Levi was the elder brother of Joseph and must have been born not more than ten years before Joseph (Gen. 29:30-34; 30:22-43; 31:41). Since Joseph was 30 when he stood before Pharaoh (Gen. 41:46), and since seven years of plenty and two years of famine had passed at the time of Jacob's entry into Egypt (Gen. 41:47,53; 45:6), Joseph would have been 39 when Jacob was 130 (Gen. 47:9,28), and would thus have been born when Jacob was 91. That, however, would have made Jacob an old man of about 80 at the time of his marriage and the birth of his firstborn. That is possible but hardly probable. In view of the frequency of the numbers of 30 or 130 in age lists of Biblical patriarchs, and in view of the significance of the number 30 in connection with the Sed Festival in Egypt honoring a ruler on the 30th anniversary of his appointment as heir to the crown, the question might well be raised as to whether 130 as the age of Jacob is employed in an absolute sense. If not, the chronological reckonings based upon it are only approximate and not absolute.

It should also be noticed that if the sojourn in Egypt was 215 years and if there were only four generations from Jacob to Moses, then Levi must have been about 100 at the birth of Jochebed, and Jochebed 84 at the birth of Moses. Since the birth of Isaac to Sarah when she was 90 and to Abraham when he was 100 was regarded as in the nature of a miracle (Gen. 17:17; 18:11-14; Rom. 4:19), these ages are hardly probable.

On the basis of the Old Testament data it is impossible to give a categorical answer as to exactly what was involved in the 430-year sojourn, nor is it possible to give an absolute date for Abraham's entry into Canaan. Paul regarded the 430 years as beginning at the time when the promises were made to Abraham (Gen. 12:1-4) and terminating with the giving of the law at Sinai (Gal. 3:16,17). On this basis the date of the entry into Canaan and the beginning of the sojourn was 1875.

An Exodus date of 1445 calls for 1405 as the beginning of the conquest (Num. 33:38; Deut. 1:3; Josh. 5:6). According to these dates the Exodus took place during the reigns of the famous rulers of Egypt's Eighteenth Dynasty, c. 1570-1325. This fits in well with the Habiru inroads of the Amarna period and with the evidence of Israel's presence in Palestine during the Nineteenth Dynasty, c. 1325-1200. In view of recent evidence of a sedentary occupation of Trans-Jordan from the end of the Middle Bronze Age, c. 1550 B.C., to the end of the Late Bronze Age, c. 1250 (see G. Lankester Harding, "Recent Discoveries in Jordan," Palestine Exploration Quarterly, Jan.-June, 1958, pp. 10-12), the view that non-occupation of that area from the 18th to the 13th centuries B.C. makes a 15th century date for the Exodus impossible, is no longer tenable.

The Conquest to the Kingdom. The establishment of absolute dates from Moses through Joshua and the judges to the setting up of the monarchy is again not possible with the available data. With the date 1405 for the beginning of the conquest, we secure 1399 as the year when Caleb received his inheritance, since he was 40 when he was sent as a spy from Kadesh-barnea (Josh. 14:7) in the second year after the departure from Egypt (Num. 10:11,12; Deut. 2:14), and he was 85 when he received his inheritance 45 years later (Josh. 14: 10). The date of Joshua's death can not be given, for we do not know how old he was when he was sent as a spy, although he was 110 when he died (Josh. 24:29).

Many attempts have been made to set dates for the judges, but with the data now available an accurate chronology for this period is at present impossible. The data are as follows:

	Reference	Years
Oppression under Cushan-rishathaim	Judg. 3:8	8
Deliverance under Othniel; rest	Judg. 3:11	40
Oppression under Eglon of Moab	Judg. 3:14	18
Deliverance by Ehud; rest	Judg. 3:30	80
Oppression under Jabin of Hazor	Judg. 4:3	20
Deliverance under Deborah; rest	Judg. 5:31	40
Oppression under Midian	Judg. 6:1	7
Deliverance under Gideon; rest	Judg. 8:28	40
Reign of Abimelech	Judg. 9:22	3
Judgeship of Tola	Judg. 10:2	23
Judgeship of Jair	Judg. 10:3	22
Oppression of Gilead by Ammon	Judg. 10:8	18

Judgeship of Jephthah	Judg. 12:7	6
Judgeship of Ibzan	Judg. 12:9	7
Judgeship of Elon	Judg. 12:11	10
Judgeship of Abdon	Judg. 12:14	8
Oppression under the Philistines	Judg. 13:1	40
Judgeship of Samson	Judg. 15:20; 16:31	20
Judgeship of Eli	I Sam. 4:18	40

The sum of the above numbers is 450 years. But there is no evidence that that is the actual length of the judges' period. The judgeship of Samuel is not included in the above total because the years are not given. That these terms of judgeships and oppressions should be regarded as consecutive is mere conjecture. A number of the judges were unquestionably local rulers, exercising control over limited areas while others held office in other parts of the land. This was the case with Jephthah who ruled over Gilead (Judg. 10:18; 11:5-11; 12:4). Judgeships and oppressions at times overlapped as with Samson who "judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years" (Judg. 15:20). Two oppressions might have been simultaneous in different parts of the land, as with the Ammonites in the NE and the Philistines in the SW (Judg. 10:6,7). The numerous 40's or multiples and submultiples of 40 (40,80,20,40,40,10,40,20,40) are no doubt to be taken as round rather than absolute numbers. Jephthah's 300 years after the conquest (Judg. 11:26) is almost certainly merely approximate. Due to the above uncertainties no detailed chronology of this period can be given with confidence.

The United Monarchy. Due to a number of uncertainties the absolute date for the establishment of the United Monarchy can not be given. The OT does not give the length of the reign of Saul, but Paul in a sermon at Antioch refers to it as 40 years (Acts 13:21). If Saul reigned a full 40 years, David was not born until ten years after Saul began his reign, for he was 30 when he took the throne (II Sam. 5:4). The battle with the Philistines at Michmash, with Jonathan in command of a large part of the army, presumably took place early in Saul's reign, perhaps even in his second year (I Sam. 13:1,2). In such a case Jonathan would have been well advanced in years when David was a mere youth, which is out of harmony with the picture in the Biblical record. Other difficulties are also involved, all making it clear that Saul either did not reign a full 40 years, or that he must have been very young when he took the throne.

The reign of David, on the other hand, may be regarded as a full 40 years for he reigned seven years in Hebron and 33 in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:4,5; I Kings 2:11; I Chron. 3:4), and one event is dated in the 40th year (I Chron. 26:31).

Solomon began his reign before the death of David (I Kings 1:32-48), but how long is not recorded. Presumably it was only a short time, but the indefiniteness of this period must be taken into consideration in any endeavor to establish an absolute chronology. And the 40 years of his reign (I Kings 11:42) might have been intended as a round number. Going back to the Exodus the recorded periods are as follows: 40,8,40,18,80,20,40, 7,40,3,23,22,18,6,7,10,8,40,20,40,40,40,40. Unless we can be certain that all these numbers are absolute, we cannot be certain of an absolute chronology for the periods involved.

The Divided Monarchy. For the period of the Divided Monarchy an entirely different situation is found. Here there are an abundance of data which may be checked against each other, and which are no longer round. Four Biblical yardsticks are here provided—the lengths of reign of the rulers of Judah and those of Israel, and the synchronisms of Judah with Israel and of Israel with Judah. Furthermore, a number of synchronisms with the fixed years of contemporary Assyria make possible a check with an exact chronological yardstick, and make possible the establishment of absolute years B.C. for the period of the kings.

Various methods were employed in the ancient East for reckoning the official years of kings. When Solomon's kingdom was first divided, Judah followed those nations where the year when a ruler took the throne was termed his "accession year." Israel, on the other hand, followed those nations where a king termed his initial year his "first year." According to this latter method the year when a king began to reign was always counted twice—as the last year of his predecessor and as his own first official year. Thus reigns reckoned according to this method were always one year longer in official length than those reckoned according to the former method, and there was always a gain of one year for every reign over absolute time. The following graphs will make these two methods of reckoning clear, and will show how the totals of Israel for this period increase by one year for every reign over those of Judah:

The following table shows how the totals of both nations from the disruption to the death of Ahaziah in Israel in the 18th year of Jehoshaphat in Judah (omitting the seven-day reign of Zimri) are identical and perfectly correct when correctly understood:

ISRAEL			JUDAH
King	Official years	Actual years	King	Years
Jeroboam	22	21	Rehoboam	17
Nadab	2	1	Abijam	3
Baasha	24	23	Asa	41
Elah	2	1	Jehoshaphat	18
Omri	12	11
Ahab	22	21
Ahaziah	2	1
Total	86	79		79

The following are the conditions that make possible the construction of a chronological pattern of the kings based on the Biblical data which possess internal harmony and are in accord with the years of contemporary Assyria and Babylon: Tishri regnal years for Judah and Nisan years for Israel; accession-year reckoning for Judah except for Jehoram, Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Joash, who followed the non-accession-year system then employed in Israel; non-accession-year reckoning in Israel for the early period, and from Jehoash to the end, accession-year reckoning; synchronisms of each nation in accord with its own current system of reckoning; a number of co-regencies or of overlapping reigns when rival rulers exercised control; a double chronological pattern for both Israel and Judah involving the closing years of Israel's history.

The years of the kings based on the above principles are as follows:

ISRAEL			JUDAH
Ruler	Overlapping Reign	Reign	Ruler	Overlapping Reign	Reign
Jeroboam I		931/30-910/9	Rehoboam		931/30-913
			Abijam		913 -911/10

THE EXILE AND RETURN. The book of Kings closes with the notice of the release of Jehoiachin from capitvity on the 27th day of the 12th month, in the 37th year of his captivity and the accession year of Amel-Marduk (II Kings 25:27). That was April 2, 561 B.C.

Babylon fell to the Persians Oct.12,539 B.C., and Cyrus in the first year of his reign issued a decree permitting the Jews to return and rebuild the temple (II Chron. 36:22; Ezra 1:1). On the basis of Nisan regnal years this would have been 538 B.C. However, Nehemiah 1:1; 2:1 gives evidence that the author of Nehemiah reckoned the years of the Persian kings not from Nisan as was the Persian custom, but from Tishri, in accord with the Jewish custom. The Aramaic papyri from Elephantine in Egypt give evidence that the same custom was employed by the Jewish colony there in the fifth century B.C. (See S. H. Horn and L. H. Wood, "The Fifth-Century Jewish Calendar at Elephantine," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, XIII (January, 1954), pp. 1-20.) Inasmuch as Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah were originally one and came from the same author, the indications are that the first year of Cyrus referred to in Ezra 1:1 was reckoned on a Tishri basis, and that it was, therefore, in 537 that Cyrus issued his decree.

Haggai began his ministry on the first day of the sixth month in the second year of Darius (Hag. 1:1), Aug. 29, 520, and Zechariah commenced his work in the eighth month of the same year (Zech. 1:1), in October or November, 520. The temple was completed on the third of Adar, the sixth year of Darius (Ezra 6:15), March 12, 515

The return of Ezra from Babylon was begun the first day of the first month, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (Ezra 7:7,9). Artaxerxes came to the throne in December, 465, which would bring the first of Nisan of his seventh year on April 8, 458, according to Persian reckoning, but on March 27, 457, according to Judean years. The evidence that this was the custom then employed has already been given above.

Word was brought to Nehemiah of the sad state of affairs at Jerusalem in the month Kislev of the 20th year of Artaxerxes (Neh. 1:1), and in Nisan of that same 20th year Nehemiah stood before the king and received permission to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the city (Neh. 2:1-8). That was April, 444. With Nehemiah's return to Babylon in the 32nd year of Artaxerxes (Neh. 13:6), 433/32, the chronology of the Old Testament proper comes to a close. E.R.T.

CHUB (kŭb, Heb. kûv), a land mentioned with Ethiopia, Libya, and Lydia in Ezekiel 30:5. The Hebrew text may here be corrupt. The LXX has Lud.

CHUN (kŭn, Heb. kûv), an Aramean city taken by David (I Chron. 18:8). In II Samuel 8:8 Berothai is given as the name of the city. The identification is uncertain.

CHURCH. The English "church" derives from the Greek kuriakós (belonging to the Lord), but it stands for another Greek word ekklesía (whence "ecclesiastical"), denoting an assembly. This is used in its general sense in Acts 19:32, but had already been applied in the LXX as an equivalent for the "congregation" of the Old Testament. Stephen's speech makes this equation (Acts 7:38), and in this sense it is adopted to describe the new gathering or congregation of the disciples of Jesus Christ.

In the Gospels the term is found only in Matthew 16:18 and 18:17. This paucity is perhaps explained by the fact that both these verses seem to envisage a situation still future. Only after the saving work of Christ is effected will the Old Testament Church be reconstituted as that of the New. Yet the verses show that Christ has this reconstitution in view, that the Church thus reconstituted will rest on the apostolic confession, and that it will take up the ministry of reconciliation.

When we turn to Acts, the situation changes. The saving work has been fulfilled, and the New Testament form of the Church can thus have its birthday at Pentecost. The term is now used regularly to describe local groups of believers. Thus we read of the churches at Jerusalem in Acts 5:11, Antioch in 13:1, and Caesarea in 18:22. At the same time the word is used for all believers in universal fellowship, as is possibly the case in 9:31. From the outset the Church has both a local and a general significance, denoting both the individual assembly and the world-wide community.

This twofold usage is also seen in Paul. He addresses his epistles to specific churches, e.g., Corinth (I Cor. 1:2) or Thessalonica (I Thess. 1:1). Indeed, he seems sometimes to localize further by referring to specific groups within the local community as churches, as though sending greetings to congregations within the one city (cf. Rom. 16:5). Yet Paul also develops more fully the conception of a Church of all believers embracing the local churches, as in I Corinthians 10:32 and I Timothy 3:15, and with an even grander sweep in Colossians 1:18 and especially Ephesians. The other New Testament books give us mostly examples of the local usage, as in III John 9 and Revelation 1:4; 2:1, etc.

A point to be emphasized is that there is no tension between the local and the universal sense. Each church or congregation is the Church in its own setting, and each a manifestation or concretion of the whole church. This means that there is scope for great flexibility in organization and structure according to particular and varying needs. At the world-wide level it is unlikely that there can ever be more than the loosest practical interconnection. Varying degrees of integration are possible at national, provincial or municipal levels. But the basic unity is always the local church, not in isolation or as a parochially-minded body, but as a concretion of the universal fellowship with a strong sense of belonging to it.

This leads us to the further consideration that the Church is not primarily a human structure like a political, social or economic organism. It is basically the church of Jesus Christ ("my church" Matt. 16:18), or of the living God (I Tim. 3:15). The various Biblical descriptions all emphasize this. It is a building of which Jesus Christ is the chief corner-stone or foundation, "an holy temple in the Lord," "an habitation of God through the Spirit" (Eph. 2:20f). It is the fellowship of saints or people of God (cf. I Pet. 2:9). It is the bride of Jesus Christ, saved and sanctified by Him for union with Himself (Eph. 5:25f). Indeed, it is the body of Jesus Christ, He being the head or whole body, and Christians the members (Rom. 12:5; I Cor. 12:12f; Eph. 4:4,12,16f). As the body, it is the fulness of Christ, who Himself fills all in all (Eph. 1:23).

It is to be noted, as opposed to many commentators, that the Bible does not call this being of the Church as Christ's temple, bride or body, its ideal or mystical reality. While there is an element of imagery in the terms, this is its true reality as the company of those who believe in Christ, and are thus dead, buried and raised in Him as the Saviour-substitute. True, this reality is not the visible one of earthly organization. The various local concretions in this sinful age do not conform to their new and true reality any more than does the believer to what he now is in Christ. In its real life the Church is known only in faith. It is thus hidden, and in the old phrase may be styled invisible. The visible life which it must also have, and which should be conformed to its true reality, may fall far short of it. Indeed, in visible organization even the membership cannot be fully identical with that of the true Church (cf. Simon Magus). Yet the Church invisible is not just ideal or mystical, but the real fact of the Church is in Christ, as the new man of faith is the real fact of the believer. In every manifestation, there should thus be the aim, not of conformity to the world, but of transformation by renewal into the likeness of Him in whom it has its true life (cf. Rom. 12:2).

In this connection appears the relevance of the traditional marks or "notes" of the Church. It is one (Eph. 4:4), for Jesus Christ has only one temple, bride and body, and all divisions are overcome in death and resurrection with Him, and by endowment of His Spirit. In all its legitimate multiformity, the visible Church should thus seek a unity corresponding to this reality. It is holy, for it is set apart and sanctified by Himself (Gal. 1:4; Eph. 5:26). Even in its pilgrimage in the world, it is thus to attest its consecration by the manner of its life and the nature of its service (cf. I Pet. 1:15). It is catholic, constituted from among all men of all races, places and ages (Eph. 2:14; Col. 1:6; 3:11; Rev. 5:9). For all its diversity of membership and form, it is thus to maintain its universality of outreach, yet also its identity and relevance in every age and place. It is apostolic, for it rests on the foundation of the apostles and prophets (Eph. 2:20), the apostles being raised up as the first authoritative witnesses (Acts 1:8) whose testimony is basic and by whose teaching it is called, instructed and directed. In all its activity it is thus to "continue steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship" (Acts 2:42), not finding apostolicity in mere externals, but in conformity to apostolic teaching and practice as divinely perpetuated in Holy Scripture.

This brings us to the means of the Church's life, and its continuing function. It draws its life from Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit, but it does so through the Word of which it is begotten (James 1:18), and by which it is nourished and sanctified (Eph. 5:26; I Pet. 2:2). Receiving life by the Word, it also receives its function, namely, to pass on the Word that others may also be quickened and cleansed. It is to preach the Gospel (Mark 16:15), to take up the ministry of reconciliation (II Cor. 5:19), to dispense the mysteries of God (I Cor. 4:1). Necessarily, therefore, it is the Church of the divine Word and sacraments first received by believers and then passed on to others; hence the Reformation insistence that the marks of the visible Church are preaching of the Word and administration of the Gospel sacraments.

The ministry of the Church arises in this connection. The apostles were first commissioned, and they ordained others, yet no rigid form of ministry arises in the New Testament. Rather, we have patterns, notably of speech, action and rule as historically focused in the elders, deacons and overseers or bishops. If it is essential that there should be the threefold pattern, there seems no Biblical prescription for its discharge in a fixed order, nor for non-interchangeability of function, nor for the sharp isolation of an official ministry from the so-called laity or "mere" people of God. The Bible's concern is that there should be real ministry, i.e., service, not in self-assertion and pride, but in humility, obedience and self-offering conformable to the example of Him who was among us as one who serves (cf. Matt. 23:11f; Phil. 2:5f; I Pet. 5:1f).

Finally, the Church's work is not merely for men's salvation, but to the praise of God's glory (Eph. 1:6; 2:7). Hence neither the Church nor its function ceases with the completion of its earthly task. There is ground, therefore, for the old distinction between the Church triumphant and the Church militant. All the Church is triumphant in its true reality. But the warring and wayfaring church is still engaged in conflict between the old reality and the new. Its destiny, however, is to be brought into full conformity to the Lord (I John 3:2) with all the saints. Towards this it moves hesitantly yet expectantly, confident in its future glory when it will be wholly the Church triumphant as graphically depicted in Revelation 7:9ff, enjoying its full reality as the bride and body of the Lord. CHUSHAN RISHATHAIM (kū'shăn rĭsh'ā-thā'ĭm), a Mesopotamian king who held the Israelites in bondage for eight years. Othniel, Caleb's younger brother, put an end to his rule (Judg. 3:5-11).

CHUZA (kū'zà, Gr. Chouzás), the steward of Herod Antipas. In Luke 8:3 we read that his wife Joanna, "and Susanna, and many others," ministered to Christ and His disciples of their substance. He was undoubtedly a man of rank and means.

CILICIA (sĭ-lĭsh'ĭ-à, Gr. Kilikía), a country in SE Asia Minor, bounded on the N and W by the Taurus range, on the E by the Amanus range, and on the S by the Mediterranean. It had two parts, the western one called the Rugged; the eastern one, the Plain Cilicia, the chief city of which was Tarsus, the birthplace of Paul (Acts 21:39; 22:3; 23:34). The early inhabitants must have been Hittites. Later, Syrians and Phoenicians settled there. It came under Persian sway. After Alexander, Seleucid rulers governed it from Antioch. It became a Roman province in 100 B.C., and was reorganized by Pompey, 66 B.C. One of its governors was Cicero, the orator (51-50 B.C.). Cilicia is accessible by land only by way of its two famous mountain passes, the Cilician Gates and the Syrian Gates. Jews from Cilicia disputed with Stephen (Acts 6:9). The Gospel reached it early (Acts 15:23), probably through Paul (Acts 9:30; Gal. 1:21). On Paul's second missionary journey he confirmed the churches which had been established there (Acts 15:41), and on his way to Rome as a prisoner he sailed over the sea of Cilicia (Acts 27:5). S.B.

CIRCUMCISION (sĭr kŭm sĭ shŭn, Lat., a cutting around), the cutting off of the foreskin, a custom that has prevailed, and still prevails, among many peoples in different parts of the world — in Asia, Africa, America, and Australia. In ancient times it was practiced among the western Semites — Hebrews, Arabians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Egyptians, but not among the Babylonians, Assyrians, Canaanites, and Philistines. Various theories are held regarding the origin and original significance of circumcision, but there can be no doubt that it was at first a religious act.

Among the Hebrews the rite was instituted by God as the sign of the covenant between Him and Abraham, shortly after the latter's sojourn in Egypt. God ordained that it be performed on Abraham, on his posterity and slaves, and on foreigners joining themselves to the Hebrew nation (Gen. 17:12). Every male child was to be circumcised on the eighth day. Originally the father performed the rite, but in exceptional cases a woman could do it (Exod. 4:25). In later times a Hebrew surgeon was called in. The child is named at the ceremony. Nowadays the rite is performed either in the home of the parents or in a synagogue. In former times flint or glass knives were preferred, but now steel is usually used.

According to the terms of the covenant symbolized by circumcision, Jehovah undertook to be the God of Abraham and His descendants, and they were to belong to Him, worshiping and obeying only Him. The rite effects admission to the fellowship of the covenant people, and secures to the individual as a member of the nation his share in the promises God makes to the nation as a whole. Circumcision reminded the Israelites of God's promises to them and of the duties they had assumed. The prophets often reminded them that the outward rite, to have any significance, must be accompanied by a "circumcision of the heart" (Deut. 30:6; Lev. 26:41; Ezek. 44:7; Jer. 9:25, 26). Jeremiah says that his countrymen are no better than the heathen, for they are uncircumcised in heart. Paul uses the word concision for this outward circumcision not accompanied by a spiritual change. In the early history of the Christian church Judaizing Christians argued for the necessity of circumcising Gentiles who came into the Church, over against Paul, who held that Christ made an end of all Jewish rites. The Apostolic Council took up the problem and decided against them (Acts 15). S.B.

CISTERN (sĭs'tẽrn, Heb. bō'r or bôr), an artificial tank or reservoir dug in the earth or rock for the collection and storage of rain-water, or, sometimes, of spring water brought from a distance by a conduit. A cistern is distinguished from a pool by being always covered. Cisterns were very numerous in Palestine. The long, dry, rainless summers, lasting from May to September, and the small annual precipitation, together with a lack of natural springs, made the people largely dependent upon rain water. Cisterns were fed from surface and roof drainage by gutters and pipes. The hilly character of the land allowed little rain to penetrate the soil. Most of it flowed down the steep hillsides through the many ravines and water-courses, and it was easily brought by conduits to pools and cisterns. Cisterns in Palestine varied in size and character. Some were cut wholly in the rock, often in the form of a bottle-shaped tank, with a long stairway leading to the surface of the ground. They were frequently of great depth, some more than a hundred feet deep. Very large ones were supported by rock pillars. The Temple area in Jerusalem had at least 37 great cisterns, one of them holding between two and three million gallons. Public rock-cut cisterns were made within the city walls so that the inhabitants could hold out in time of siege.

Where the substratum of the soil was earth and not rock, cisterns of masonry were built. Some of these were large and had vaulted roofs supported by pillars. Besides the large public cisterns, there were many smaller private ones. Ancient sites are honeycombed with them. All cisterns had one or more openings for drawing water to the surface. They needed periodic cleaning because of the impurities washed in from the outside. Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons. Joseph was cast into one (Gen. 37:22), and Jeremiah the prophet was let down into one with a miry bottom (Jer. 38:6). Zechariah 9:11 alludes to the custom of confining prisoners in an empty cistern. CITIES OF REFUGE, six cities, three on each side of the Jordan, set apart by Moses and Joshua as places of asylum for those who had accidentally committed manslaughter. Those E of the Jordan were Bezer in Reuben, Ramoth-Gilead in Gad, and Golan in Manasseh (Deut. 4:41-43); those W of the Jordan were Hebron in Judah, Shechem in Ephraim, and Kedesh in Naphtali (Josh. 20:7,8). To aid the killer in escaping the pursuit of the avenger of blood, provision was made that the principal roads leading to these cities should always be kept open. No part of Palestine was more than 30 miles away from a city of refuge — a distance that could easily be covered in one day.

In Semitic lands, if a man were slain it was regarded as the duty of his nearest relative to avenge him. Only in that way could justice be satisfied. Almost no distinction was made between intentional and unintentional killing. Many a man was therefore killed in revenge for what was an accident. Cities of refuge were provided to protect a man until his case could be properly adjudged. The right of asylum was only for those who had taken life unintentionally. Wilful murderers were put to death at once.

The regulations concerning these cities of refuge are found in Numbers 35, Deuteronomy 19:1-13, and Joshua 20. If a manslayer reached a city of refuge before the avenger of blood could slay him, he was given asylum until a fair trial could be held. The trial took place where the accused had lived. If proved innocent of wilful murder, he was brought back to the city of refuge. There he had to stay until the death of the high priest. After that he was free to return to his own home. But if during that period he passed beyond the limits of the city of refuge, the avenger of blood could slay him without blame. The temple at Jerusalem could also be used as a place of refuge. S.B.

CITIES OF THE PLAIN (Heb. kikkar ha-yardēn, circle of the Jordan), cities near the Dead Sea, including Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Zoar; first referred to in Genesis 13:10-12, where Lot, after Abraham had given him the choice of where he wanted to live, decided to dwell in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom. In Genesis 14 it says that they were royal cities, each with its own king, and that Abraham delivered Lot when the cities were attacked and Lot taken captive. The story of the destruction of the cities because of their wickedness is given in Genesis 19. It is thought that God may have accomplished this by causing an eruption of gases and petroleum to ignite. Only Lot and his two daughters were spared. The exact site of the cities is unknown; but although there are weighty arguments for believing that they were at the N end of the Dead Sea, scholars favor the S end, especially since asphalt in large quantities has been found only at the S. It is believed that the sea covers the site. In the Bible, Sodom and Gomorrah are often used as a warning example of sin and divine punishment (Deut. 29:23; Isa. 1:9, 3:9; Jer. 50:40; Ezek. 16:46; Matt. 10:15; Rom. 9:29, etc.). S.B.

CITIZENSHIP (Gr. politeuma, commonwealth). In the NT the word for citizen often means nothing more than the inhabitant of a country (Luke 15:15; 19:14). Among the ancient Jews emphasis was placed on Israel as a religious organization, not upon relationship to city and state. The good citizen was the good Israelite. Non-Israelites had the same protection of the law as native Israelites, but they were required not to perform acts hurting the religious feelings of the people. The advantage of a Jew over a Gentile was thus strictly spiritual. He was a member of the theocracy.

Among the Romans, citizenship brought the right to be considered as equal to natives of the city of Rome. Emperors sometimes granted it to whole provinces and cities, and also to single individuals, for services rendered to the state or to the imperial family, or even for a certain sum of money. Roman citizens were exempted from shameful punishments, such as scourging and crucifixion, and they had the right of appeal to the emperor with certain limitations.

Paul says he had become a Roman citizen by birth. Either his father or some other ancestor had acquired the right and had transmitted it to his son. He was proud of his Roman citizenship, and, when occasion demanded, availed himself of his rights. When writing to the Philippians, who were members of a Roman colony, and therefore Roman citizens, Paul brings out that Christians are citizens of a heavenly commonwealth, and ought to live accordingly (Phil. 1:27; 3:20). CITY. In ancient times cities owed their origin not to organized manufacture, but to agriculture. When men left the pastoral life and settled down to the cultivation of the soil, they often found their cattle and crops endangered by wandering tribes of the desert; and it was to protect themselves from such enemies that they created first the village and then the city. Cities were built in areas where agriculture could be carried on, usually on the side of a mountain or the top of a hill, and where a sufficient supply of water was assured. The names of cities often indicate the feature that was determinative in the selection of the site. For example, the prefixes Beer, meaning "well," and En, meaning "spring," in such names as Beer-sheba and En-gedi, show that it was a local well or spring that determined the building of the city. Names like Ramah, Mizpah, and Gibeah (all from roots indicating height), which were very common in Palestine, indicate that a site on an elevation was preferred for a city. A ruling family sometimes gave its name to a city (Beth, meaning "house of").

Ancient farmers did not have their own farmsteads. At the end of a day's work they retired for the night to the village or city. Smaller villages sought the protection of nearby cities. That is the meaning of the expression "cities and their villages" and "cities and their daughters," in Numbers 21:25; 32:42; Josusha 15 and 19. In return for the protection offered against nomadic depredations, the cities received payment in service and produce. Sometimes a city was protected by a feudal lord around or near whose fortress the city was built. Often it depended entirely upon the strength of its walls and the bravery of its men.

The chief feature distinguishing a city from a village was that it had a wall (Lev. 25:29f). Walls 20 and 30 feet thick were not unusual. Sometimes it was also surrounded by a moat (Dan. 9:25, "wall" in KJV), and even by a second smaller wall acting as a rampart (II Sam. 20:15, "trench" in KJV). The wall had one or more gates which were closed during the night (Josh. 2:5,7), and in later times on the sabbath (Neh. 13:19). The gates were strengthened with iron or bronze bars and bolts (Deut. 3:5; Judg. 16:3), and had rooms overhead (II Sam. 18:24). From the roof of the wall or from a tower by the gate, a watchman was on the lookout for approaching danger (Jer. 6:17). The gates were approached by narrow roads easy to defend. From a distance, usually all that could be seen of a city was its walls, except possibly its inner stronghold.

Within the walls, the important features of a city were the Tower or Stronghold, the High Place, the Broad Place by the Gate, and the streets. The Tower was an inner fort protected by a garrison to which the inhabitants could flee when the outer walls were taken by an enemy. The people of Shechem tried unsuccessfully to hold out against Abimelech in such a tower (Judg. 9:49), and the king was afterwards killed by a stone thrown by a woman from the tower within the city of Thebez (Judg. 9:53). When David captured the stronghold of Zion, the whole city came into his possession (II Sam. 5:7). Sometimes towers abutted against the inside of the city wall.

The High Place was an important part of every Canaanite city and retained its place in Palestine to the time of Solomon's reign (I Sam. 9:12 ff). There sacrifices were offered and feasts held. Originally they were on an elevation, but the term became the general one for any local sanctuary even when it was on level ground.

The Broad Place was an open area — not a square, but only a widening of the street, just inside the city gate, serving the purpose of social intercourse in general. It was the center of communal life. Here justice was administered, deliberative assemblies were held, news was exchanged, and business was transacted. Strangers in the city passed the night there if they had no friends in the city. It had a defensive value in time of war, as it permitted the concentration of forces in front of the city gate.

The streets in ancient cities were not laid out on any fixed plan. They were narrow, winding, unpaved alleys. The streets of Jerusalem were not paved until the time of Herod Agrippa II. Cities built on steep hillsides had streets on the roofs of houses. Streets were rarely cleaned and were unlighted. Certain streets were allocated to particular trades and guilds—for bakers, cheese-makers, gold smiths, etc.

Little is known about the way city government was administered. In Deuteronomy 16:18 and 19:12 mention is made of elders and judges. Samaria had a governor (I Kings 22:26). Jerusalem must have had several high officials (II Kings 23:8). S. B.

CITY OF DAVID. 1. The Jebusite stronghold of Zion captured by David, and named by him the city of David. It stood on a ridge near the later site of the temple. David made it his royal residence.

2. Bethlehem, the home of David (Luke 2:4).

CLAUDA (klô'dà), a small, unimportant island off the SW coast of Crete. Paul's ship was driven under its lee by a storm on his way to Rome (Acts 27:16).

CLAUDIA (klô'dĭ-à), a member of the Christian church at Rome, who, along with other members of that church, joined with Paul in sending Timothy greetings (II Tim. 4:21).

CLAUDIUS (klô'dĭ-ŭs), the fourth Roman emperor (41-54). He was nephew of Tiberius, the second Roman emperor. A weak, vacillating man, he was under the influence of unprincipled favorites and his wife Messalina. His second wife, Agrippina, poisoned him in 54. Herod Agrippa I, the grandson of Herod the Great, had assisted him much in his advancement of the throne, and in consequence was given the whole of Palestine. Claudius also gave to the Jews throughout the empire the right of religious worship, but later he banished all Jews from Rome (Acts 18:2; cf. Suet. Claud. 25). The famine foretold by Agabus took place in the reign of Claudius (Acts 11:28). Ancient writers say that from various causes his reign was a period of distress over the whole Mediterranean world.

The Emperor Claudius

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS (klô'dĭ-ŭs lĭs'ĭ-ăs), a chief captain who rescued Paul from fanatical Jewish rioters at Jerusalem (Acts 21:31; 24:22). He was a chiliarch (i.e. leader of 1,000 men), in charge of the Roman garrison at Jerusalem, stationed in the Castle of Antonia, adjoining the temple. When Paul informed him that he was a Roman citizen, and therefore could not legally be scourged, he told Paul that he had purchased his Roman citizenship with a great price. To protect Paul, he soon afterward sent him to Caesarea, to Felix, the Roman governor.

CLAY, a word that renders a number of different Hebrew words and one Greek word, and is frequently used in the Bible in a literal or metaphorical sense, in the latter sense meaning dust or flesh (as made from earth). Clay was widely used in OT times for the making of brick, mortar, and pottery, and, in some countries, for the making of tablets on which inscriptions were impressed. Mud bricks were not always made of true clay, but of mud mixed with straw. True clay was variable in composition, giving variety to quality and color, and thus was suited for different uses. As a building material, clay has been used from very ancient times. Babylon was made wholly of brick, either baked or dried in the sun. Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, was made mostly of brick. The villages of Egypt were constructed of sun-dried clay.

CLAY TABLETS. In ancient times writing was done on papyrus, parchment, potsherds, and clay tablets. Clay tablets were made of clean-washed, smooth clay. While still wet, the clay had wedge-shaped letters (now called "cuneiform" from the Latin cuneus, meaning "wedge") imprinted on it with a stylus, and then was kiln-fired or sun-dried. Tablets were made of various shapes — cone-shaped, drum-shaped, and flat. They were often placed in a clay envelope. Vast quantities have been excavated in the Near East. It is estimated that of those that have been found, about a half million are yet to be read, and that 99 per cent of the Babylonian tablets have yet to be dug. The oldest ones go back to 3,000 B.C. They are practically imperishable; fire only hardens them the more. Personal and business letters, legal documents, books, communications between rulers are represented. One of the most famous is the Code of Hammurabi, a Babylonian king who lived long before the time of Moses. They reveal intimate details of everyday life in the Near East and shed light on many obscure customs mentioned in the Old Testament. Some tell the story of the Creation, the Fall, and the Deluge. They do much to verify the truthfulness of the Biblical record. S.B.

CLEANTHES (klē-ăn'thēz), son of Phanius of Assos and head of the Stoic school from 263 to 232 B.C. He infused religious fervor into Zeno's Stoicism. He taught that the universe was a living being and God its soul. He taught disinterestedness in ethics, maintaining that doing good to gain advantage was like feeding cattle for meat. He taught, too, that evil thoughts were worse than evil deeds. His Hymn to Zeus, a surviving poem, contains the words quoted by Paul in Athens (Acts 17:28).

CLEMENT (klĕm'ĕnt), a Christian who labored with Paul at Philippi (Phil. 4:3). It is uncertain whether he was in Philippi when Paul wrote. Origen (Comm., John 1:29) identifies him with the church father who afterwards became bishop of Rome and wrote an epistle to the Corinthian church, but if he is right, Clement must have lived to an extreme old age.

CLEOPAS (klē'ō-păs), one of the two disciples to whom the Lord appeared on the afternoon of the resurrection day. They walked with Him from Jerusalem to Emmaus, about seven miles away (Luke 24:18). Nothing more is known about him. He is not to be confused with the Cleophas mentioned in John 19:25, although some Christian fathers assumed that the two were identical.

CLEOPHAS (klē'ō-făs), mentioned in John 19:25 as the husband of Mary, one of the women who stood beside the cross, and is described as a sister of the mother of Jesus. He is not the same as the Cleopas who walked with Jesus to Emmaus (Luke 24:18).

CLOAK (See Dress)

CLOSET (Gr. tameion), found in Matthew 6:6 and Luke 12:3, and referring most probably to a special store closet in which bedding was stored during the day. If required, it could also be used as a sleeping-room or for private conference. Our Lord advised that it be used for private prayer.

CLOUD. There are few references in the Bible to clouds having to do with actual weather conditions, the reason for this being that the weather in Palestine is not very varied. There were two recognized seasons, a rainy one from October to April, and one of sunshine from May to September. The Hebrews were not much given to making comments upon the weather. In Scripture there are, however, many references to clouds in a metaphoric and figurative sense. They symbolize transitoriness. God says Judah's goodness is like a morning cloud (Hosea 6:4), and Job compares his prosperity to the passing clouds (Job 30:15). Sometimes they are used as a type of refreshment, for they bring shade from the oppressive sun and give promise of rain. Clouds without water, therefore, symbolize a man who promises much but does not perform (Prov. 16:15; 25:14; Jude 12). The darkness of clouds is the symbol of mystery, especially that of creation (Job 3:5; 38:9; Ps. 97:2). Their distance from the earth is made to typify the unattainable (Isa.:14:14; Job 20:6; Ps. 147:8). One of the most frequent and suggestive uses of the figure is in connection with the presence of God. Clouds both veil and reveal the divine presence. Jehovah rides upon the cloud (Isa. 19:1; Nah. 1:3); He is present in the cloud (Exod. 19:9; 24:16; 34:5). The pillar of cloud symbolized God's presence and guidance to the children of Israel in their wilderness journeys (Exod. 40:36; Ps. 78: 14). The cloud appears at our Lord's transfiguration (Matt. 17:5) and at His ascension (Acts 1:9), and it has a place in His prediction of His coming again (Matt. 24:30; 26:64). S.B.

CLOUD, PILLAR OF, was a symbol of the presence and guidance of God in the 40 years wilderness journey of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan (Exod. 13:21,22). At night it became fire. When God wanted Israel to rest in any place, the cloud rested on the tabernacle above the mercy seat (Exod. 29:42,43) or at the door of the tabernacle (Exod. 33:9,10; Num. 12:5), or covered the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34-38).

CLOUT (See Dress)

CNIDUS (nī'dŭs), a city of Caria, at the SW corner of Asia Minor, past which Paul sailed on his journey to Rome (Acts 27:7). It was situated at the end of a long, narrow peninsula projecting between the islands Cos and Rhodes, and had two excellent harbors. It had the rank of a free city. Jews lived there as early as the second century B.C. Only ruins are left of a once flourishing city, especially noted for its temple of Venus and a statue of the goddess by Praxiteles.

COAL, often found in the English Bible, but it never has reference to true mineral coal, which has not been found in Palestine proper, where the geological formation as a whole is recent. Coal of a poor quality has been found at Sidon, and for a time some was mined at Lebanon. The half dozen Hebrew and Greek words rendered "coal" refer either to charcoal or to live embers of any kind. Charcoal was used by the Hebrews to provide warmth in winter (Isa. 47:14; John 18:18), for cooking (Isa. 44:19; John 21:9), and by the smith (Isa. 44:12; 54:16). It was made by covering a carefully stacked pile of wood with leaves and earth and then setting fire to it. After several days of burning and smoldering, the wood was converted into charcoal and the pile was opened.

In Psalm 120:4 there is mention of "coals of juniper," doubtless a kind of broom abundant in Judaea. In Isaiah 6:6 and I Kings 19:6 the Hebrew word denotes a hot stone (RVm). Frequently the word is used metaphorically. "As coals are to burning coals . . . so is a contentious man to kindle strife" (Prov. 26:21), means that quarrelsome men add fuel to a flame. In Proverbs 25:22 and Romans 12:20, where we are told to give to an enemy good in return for evil, for so coals of fire will be heaped upon his head, the coals of fire are not meant to suggest the pain of punishment to the guilty, but the softening of his heart as he thinks with burning shame of his unworthy hatred. Love will melt and purify. In Lamentations 4:8 the literal meaning of the Hebrew word translated "coal" is "blackness" (RVm). S.B.

COCK (See Birds)

COCKATRICE (See Animals)

COCK CROWING, when referring to time, is the third of the four watches into which the Romans divided the night: evening, midnight, cock crowing, morning. Cock crowing was between 12 and 3 a.m. (Matt. 26:34; Mark 13:35).

COCKLE (See Plants)

COELE SYRIA (sēl'ē-sēr'ĭ-à), in KJV Celosyria, Gr. Koíle Syría, hollow Syria), the name for that part of Syria that lay between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon Mountains, but it was often used to cover all the Syrian possessions as far S as Egypt and as for E as the Euphrates. The term frequently occurs in the OT Apocrypha.

COFFER (kŏf'êr), a word occurring only in I Samuel 6:8,11,15, and probably referring to a small box in which the Philistines put their golden mice and other offerings when they returned the Ark. The exact meaning of the term is obscure.

COFFIN, used only in Genesis 50:26. The literal meaning of the Hebrew word is "chest" or "box," but in this case may mean "mummy-case." Coffins were unknown among the Israelites, who were carried to the grave upon a bier, a simple flat board with two or three staves. In Egypt, where Joseph died, the dead were embalmed and put in a mummy-case.

COIN (See Money)

COL-HOZEH (kŏl-hō'zĕ, all-seeing one), a Judahite of Nehemiah's day whose son Shallum rebuilt the fountain gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:15; 11:5).

COLLAR (See Dress: 4,Cloak, Mantle, Robe)

COLLEGE, a mistranslation of the Hebrew mishneh in the KJV of II Kings 22:14 and II Chronicles 34:22. The Hebrew word also appears in Zephaniah 1:10, where it is correctly rendered "the second," and denotes the second quarter of the city of Jerusalem, which was not far from the Fish-Gate.

COLLOP (kŏl'ŭp, Heb. pîmâh), an old English word meaning a slice of meat or fat. It is used only in Job 15:27, where the wicked man is said to gather fat upon his loins.

COLONY (Gr. kolonía, a transliteration of the Latin colonus, farmer), in the only occurrence of the word in the NT, Acts 16:12, it says that Philippi was a colony. A colony was a settlement of Roman citizens, authorized by the government, in conquered territory. The settlers were usually retired Roman soldiers, settled in places where they could keep enemies of the empire in check. They were the aristocracy of the provincial towns where they lived. Such colonies had the rights of Italian cities: municipal self-government and exemption from poll and land taxes.

COLOSSAE (kŏ-lŏs'ē, Gr. Kolossaí), an ancient city of Phrygia, situated on the S bank of the Lycus river. It was about 11 miles from Laodicea and 13 from Hierapolis. Colossae stood on the most important trade route from Ephesus to the Euphrates, and was a place of great importance from early times. Xerxes visited it in 481 B.C., and Cyrus the Younger in 401 B.C. The city was particularly renowned for a peculiar wool, probably purple in color (colossinus). The church at Colossae was established on Paul's third missionary journey, during his three years in Ephesus, not by Paul himself (Col. 2:1), but by Epaphras (Col. 1: 7,12,13). Archippus also exercised a fruitful ministry there (Col. 4:17; Philem. 2). Philemon was an active member of this church, and also Onesimus (Col. 4:9). During Paul's first Roman imprisonment Epaphras brought to him a report of the religious views and practices in Colossae which called forth his epistle, in which he rebuked the church for its errors. Colossae lost its importance by the change of the road-system. Laodicea became the greater city. During the seventh and eighth centuries its openness exposed it to the terrible raids of the Saracens, and the people moved to Chonae (now called Chonas), a fortress upon the slope of Mt. Cadmus, about three miles farther south. In the 12th century the Turks destroyed the city. Archaeologists have unearthed ruins of the ancient church. S.B.

COLOSSIANS, BOOK OF (kō-lōsh'ănz), an epistle written by the Apostle Paul when he was a prisoner (Col. 4:3,10,18), about the year 62, probably during his first imprisonment in Rome (Acts 28:30, 31), although Caesarea (Acts 23:35; 24:27) and Ephesus have also been suggested. The external and internal evidence for its genuineness is all that can be desired. The church was very likely founded during Paul's three year stay in Ephesus on his third missionary journey. It appears from Colossians 2:1 that Paul himself had never preached in Colossae. Epaphras, a native of Colossae (Col. 4:12), was probably converted under Paul's ministry at Ephesus, and was then sent by the apostle to preach in his native city (Col. 1:7). He also appears to have evangelized the nearby cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col. 4:13). At the time Paul wrote this epistle, the minister of the church at Colossae was Archippus (Col. 4:17), who may have been Philemon's son (Philem. 2). Epaphras had recently come to Paul with a disturbing report of the condition of the church and this led Paul to the writing of the letter. The bearer of the letter was Tychicus (Col. 4:7,8), to whom Paul also intrusted the epistle to the Ephesians (Eph. 6:21), which was probably written at the same time. With him went Onesimus (Col. 4:9), a runaway slave converted by Paul, bearing Paul's letter to Philemon, a resident of Colossae, who was also one of Paul's converts, perhaps made at Ephesus.

In the few years since Paul had been in the province of Asia an insidious error had crept into the church at Colossae. Who the false teachers were we do not know; but it is clear that the trouble was different from that faced by Paul at Galatia, where Judaizers had tried to undermine his work. The teaching attacked by Paul is described in 2:8,16-23. It was, at least in part, Judaistic, as is seen in his reference to circumcision (2:11; 3:11), ordinances (2:14), meats and drinks, feast days, new moons, and sabbaths (2:16). There was also in it a strong ascetic element. Special self-denying rules were given (2:16, 20,21) which had as their purpose the mortification of the body (2:23). Some sort of worship of angels was practiced — a worship which continued for several centuries, as we know from the fact that in the fourth century the Council of Laodicea in one of its canons condemned it, and in the fifth century Theodoret said that the archangel Michael was worshiped in the area. This heresy claimed to be a philosophy, and made much of wisdom and knowledge (2:8). Plainly, the Colossians were beguiled by this religious syncretism and even took pride in it (2:8). The exact origin of this false teaching is unknown. Some find it in Essenism; others in incipient Gnosticism or in contemporary Judaism with a syncretistic admixture of local Phrygian ideas.

Paul met these errors, not by controversy of personal authority, but by presenting the counter truth that Jesus Christ is the image of the invisible God (1:15), in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge and in whom the fulness of the divine perfections find their perfect embodiment (1:19). He is the creator of all, and all power is from Him. On the cross He revealed the impotence of all the powers that had tried to thwart His purposes (2:15). Freedom from the corruption of human nature is found in the newness of life which the death and resurrection of Christ provide. The epistle may be divided into four parts: 1. The salutation and thanksgiving (1:1-8); 2. The doctrinal section (1:9-2:5); 3. Practical exhortations (2:6-4:6); 4. Concluding salutations 4:7-18). Towards the end of the epistle (4:16), Paul asks that the Colossian church exchange epistles with the church at Laodicea, to which he has also written. It is likely that this letter to the Laodiceans is our epistle to the Ephesians, sent as a circular letter to various churches in the Roman province of Asia. S.B.

COMFORTER, THE (See Holy Spirit)

COMMANDMENT, used in the English Bible to translate a number of Hebrew and Greek words meaning law, ordinance, statute, word, judgment, precept, saying, charge, etc. The idea of authority conveyed by these words comes from the fact that God as sovereign Lord has a right to be obeyed. The instruction of Jesus is full of ethical teachings which have the force of divine commandments. What He says is as authoritative as what was said by Jehovah in OT times. That is true even when He does not use the word "commandment" or its equivalents, as He often does. But what is said of Jehovah and Jesus Christ is also true of the apostles. Paul, for example, does not hesitate to say, "the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord" (1 Cor. 14:37). The Bible makes it abundantly clear that God is not satisfied with mere external compliance with His commandments, but expects willing and joyful obedience, coming from the heart.

COMMANDMENTS, TEN The OT is distinctly a religion of law, with creed, cult, and conduct prescribed minutely by Jehovah. Judaism glories in the Torah (Rom. 9:4), the revelational instruction which has come to the elect nation as a gift of grace and which has come to it invested with divine authority and sanction. Torah is revered because it embodies the will and wisdom of the Creator. Expressing God's own nature, it demands of the creature only what the Creator's holiness necessitates for fellowship with Himself. The apex and quintessence of Torah is the Decalogue, the Code of the Ten Words, received by Moses on Mt. Sinai. That it is unique among the several Codes found in the OT can scarcely be disputed. Originally spoken by God in a context calculated to produce unforgettable awe (Exod. 19:9-25), it was afterward inscribed by His finger on two tables of stone (Exod. 31:18); in fact, it was inscribed by Him a second time after Moses in anger had shattered the first two tables (Deut. 10:1-4). It was placed in the Ark of the Covenant (Exod. 25:21) and thus enshrined at the very center of Israel's worship. All of its precepts, with the exception of sabbath-keeping, are repeated in the NT. Hence the Code of the Ten Words is indeed sui generis, a statement which gives the distillation of religion and morality: these principles, so simply phrased, are remarkably comprehensive and universally valid. Mt. Sinai, therefore, was the scene of an epochal event in human history; from a religious standpoint, only Mt. Calvary surpasses it.

Before examining this Code in any detail we must answer several questions concerning it. First, How explain the two somewhat dissimilar versions of it which the Pentateuch contains, one in Exodus 20:1-17, the other in Deuteronomy 5:6-21? In the Exodus version the Fourth Commandment grounds sabbath-keeping in God's sabbath-rest after His six days of creation; in the Deuteronomic version, however, sabbath-keeping is grounded in the Egyptian deliverance. Moreover, the two versions do not agree with respect to the Tenth Commandment, which forbids covetousness; different verbs are used and the order of clauses varies. But surely these are trivia which fade into nothingness when we remember that the Deuteronomic version is part of an address Moses delivered. In an oral recital one scarcely expects notarial precision. Not only so: Moses, because of the Spirit's guidance, was free to introduce new elements and slight changes.

Second, How are the Ten Words to be numbered? W. S. Bruce helpfully clears away the complexities of this question. "These commandments are not numbered by Moses, and consequently different schemes of arrangement have been common. The most ancient of these is that found in Josephus and in the writings of Philo. It is accepted by the Greek Church and by the Reformed Churches, and is that most commonly known among English-speaking communities. In it the preface is not made a commandment or part of one: but the first commandment simply forbids the worship of false deities, and the second prohibits the use of idols; while all the prohibitions of covetousness are included under the last command. Among the Fathers this division is supported by Origen. The Jews, on grounds that do not appear to be very trustworthy, regard the first commandment as containing only Exodus xx.2: 'I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt.' This they interpret as a command to believe in Jehovah as their God, because of His gracious deliveries of their forefathers from bondage. Then, to preserve the number ten, they include in one our first and second commandments; and they justify this by regarding the prohibition of images as an extension of the idea of the unity of God. On the other hand, the Roman and the Lutheran Churches reverse this order and include the first and second commandments in one; while to preserve the number ten, they divide the last commandment into two, thus combining two separate and dividing two similar things" (The Ethics of the Old Testament, Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1909, pp. 101-102).

Third, How are the Ten Words to be divided between the two tables? The Roman Catholic Church puts three commandments on the first table, seven on the second. The Reformed Church adheres to a four and six classification. Josephus, however, gives the traditional five and five arrangement, the first table dealing, as he says, with piety, the second with probity. Taking Josephus as his guide, C. E. Luthardt in his History of Christian Ethics gives what seems to be the most satisfactory division:

FIRST TABLE

1. No other gods.
2. No image of God.
3. No dishonouring of God's name.
4. No desecration of God's day.
5. No dishonouring of God's representatives (parents).

SECOND TABLE

1. No taking away of a neighbour's life.
2. No taking away of his wife — his home — his dearest good.
3. No taking away of his goods.
4. No taking away of his good name.
5. Nor even coveting of his good or his goods. (Quoted in Bruce, op. cit., pp. 103-104).

Fourth, Is there any significance to the fact that the Ten Words are inscribed on two tables rather than one? Apparently so. The first table is devoted to the worship of God, the second to the service of man. We gather, accordingly that in OT thought a right relationship with God is essential for a right relationship with man. In other words, religion is the basis and dynamic of morality. Our Lord Jesus in His master-simplification of Torah (Matt. 22:37-40) teaches that love to God and love to man are the two all-inclusive imperatives; actually, love is the sole imperative since neighbor-love is derived from and sustained by our love for God.

Fifth, Is this Code merely negative or does it have a positive aspect as well? Admittedly, the only commandment couched in positive terms is the Fifth Law which enjoins respect for one's parents. But the seeming negativism of the Ten Words is only superficial. Whenever an evil is forbidden, the opposite good is implicitly demanded. Here we have far more than a forbidding: we have a requiring as well. So, as we have noticed, when Jesus interprets and epitomizes this Code, He reduces it to the positive virtue of love. Paul does exactly the same thing in Romans 13:8-10. This Law cannot be fulfilled only by concern and care; it calls for loving obedience to God and loving service to man.

Sixth, Is this Code really to be viewed as "a yoke of bondage" (Gal. 5:1) or as a wise provision which God graciously made for His people? Undeniably in the course of the centuries rabbinic traditionalism perverted Torah into a grievous legalism; undeniably, too, the Law as a whole had a pedagogic function, revealing as it did — and still does — man's need of Jesus Christ (Rom. 7:7; Gal. 3:24). Yet the primary purpose of the Ten Words was to enable the Israelites, as Jehovah's redeemed and peculiar treasure, to enter into a life of joyful fellowship with their Redeemer. This Code issued from God's sovereign and saving relationship with His elect nation. It was imposed at His initiative and as the result of His covenantal activity. Passages like Exodus 20:2 and Deuteronomy 4:32-40 show that Israel's Saviour was Israel's Legislator. This Law, then, was designed to bring Jehovah's saving deed to its fulfillment by creating a holy community, a community reflecting His own nature, a community in which He could dwell and by which He could be magnified (Lev. 11:44; 20:8). Hence, used lawfully (I Tim. 1:8), this Code, which guided life rather than gave it, was a source of beatitude (Ps. 19:8-9; 119:54).

With these six questions answered, let us now analyze briefly each of the Ten Words. The First Commandment (Exod. 20:3) enjoins a confession of Jehovah's singularity, His absolute and exclusive deity. It predicates faith in Him as the one and only God. Though not expressly teaching monotheism, it inferentially denounces polytheism as treason and unbelief. It demonstrates that God is not a class term but a proper Name.

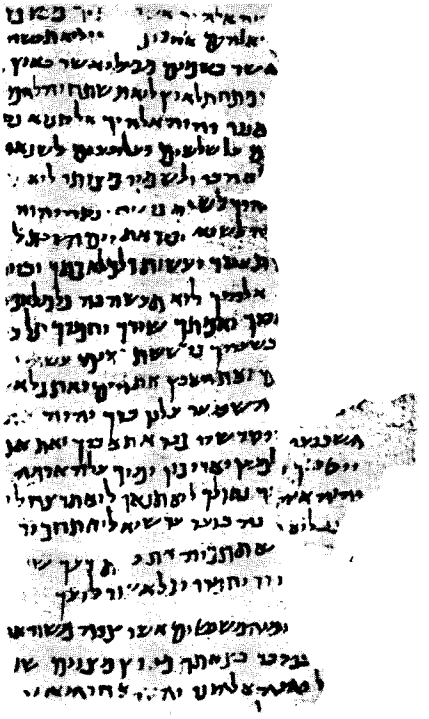
The Second Commandment (Exod. 20:4-6) enjoins the adoration of Jehovah's spirituality. Forbidding His worship by any false means, it rebukes the gross idolatry which surrounded Israel. It shows that because of His very Being (John 4:24) no visible or material representation of true Deity is possible. Thus it prevents wrong concepts of God from taking root in man's mind (Rom. 1:21-23).

The Third Commandment (Exod. 20-7) enjoins the reverence of Jehovah's Name. Since in the OT name and person are equivalent, with the name practically a reification of the person, this Law prohibits blasphemy and profanity. It also interdicts immorality, any conduct which causes God's honour to suffer defilement by the sinner who bears His Name (Rom. 2:24-25). With respect to the sacredness and significance of God's Name, Malachi 3:16-17 is instructive.

The Fourth Commandment (Exod. 20:8-11) enjoins the observance of Jehovah's day. For both humanitarian (Amos 8:5-6) and religious (Isa. 58:13-14) reasons, one day of rest in every seven is a blessed necessity. A sabbath — whether on Saturday as commemorating a finished creation or on Sunday as commemorating a finished redemption — serves man's physical and spiritual welfare simultaneously (Mark 2:27).

The Fifth Commandment (Exod. 20:12) enjoins the honor of God's surrogates, parents to whom He grants a kind of co-creatorship in the begetting of children and to whom He grants a kind of co-rulership in the governing of children. Let any nation abandon respect for the mystery, dignity, and authority of parenthood, and before long the moral fibre and social fabric of that nation are bound to disintegrate. That is why the OT statutes on this score are so severe (Exod. 21: 15; Deut. 27:16; Prov. 20:20).

The Sixth Commandment (Exod. 20:13) is a prohibition of murder. A man's life is, patently, his one utterly indispensable possession; but, more than that, man is God's image-bearer, and murder wantonly destroy's God's image. Hence capital punishment is the penalty affixed to a breaking of this law (Gen. 9:5-6).



The Nash Papyrus, from the first century B.C., contains the Ten Commandments as presented in Deuteronomy 5. Until discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, this was the earliest Hebrew document containing any portion of the Bible. BA

The Seventh Commandment (Exod. 20:14) is a prohibition of adultery, a stringent prohibition which safeguards the sanctity of marriage and throws a bulwark around the home. In our day we are beginning to see what happens when the home is undermined by marital infidelity.

The Eighth Commandment (Exod. 20:15) is a prohibition of theft in any and all forms. Property is essentially an extension of a man's personality, and thus this law indicates that the rights and achievements of one's neighbor must not be ignored.

The Ninth Commandment (Exod. 20:16) is a prohibition of falsehood in its many varieties, whether perjury, slander, or defamation. Truth is the cement of community, the sine qua non of enduring interpersonal relationships on every level. Consequently, the OT like the NT stresses the need for a sanctified tongue (Ps. 5:9; 15:1-4; Prov. 18:21; Jer. 9:1-5).

The Tenth Commandment (Exod. 20:17) is a prohibition of covetousness, and as such reveals that the Ten Words are not simply a civil code, but form a moral and spiritual code which strikes beneath the surface of the overt act (and the overt act is the exclusive province of civil law), tracing evil conduct to evil desire, probing the hidden motives of men (and motive is the province of morality and religion, God's province). This Tenth Commandment, therefore, highlights the pivotal importance of wrong appetites and intentions; it agrees with Paul that covetousness is idolatry (Col. 3:5), since inordinate craving means that man's ego has become man's god.

Except as the NT deepens and extends its principles, the Decalogue represents the high-water level of morality. V.C.G.

COMPEL, in English, suggests the idea of force, though not necessarily physical. When Jesus, in Luke 14:23, says "compel them to come in," He means that Christians should use the utmost zeal and moral urgency to get people to enter the kingdom of God.

CONANIAH (kŏn'ă-nī'à, Heb. kônanyāhû, Jehovah has founded, in KJV twice Cononiah. 1. A Levite in charge of tithes and offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:12,13).

2. A Levite in Josiah's reign (II Chron. 35:9).

CONCISION (kŏn-sĭzh'ŭn, Gr. katatomé, mutilation, cutting), a term used only once in the Bible, in Philippians 3:2, to designate circumcision that is wholly ceremonial and without regard for its spiritual significance. Paul distinguishes it from true circumcision (verse 3).

CONCUBINE, in the Bible, not a paramour, but a woman lawfully united in marriage to a man in a relation inferior to that of the regular wife. No moral stigma was attached to being a concubine. It was a natural part of a polygamous social system. Concubinage is assumed and provided for in the law of Moses, which tried to prevent its excesses and abuses (Exod. 21:7-11; Deut. 21:10-14). Concubines were commonly taken from among Hebrew or foreign slave girls, or Gentile captives taken in war, although free Hebrew women might also become concubines. They enjoyed no other right but lawful cohabitation. They had no authority in the family or in household affairs. Their husbands could send them away with a small present, and their children could, by means of small presents, be excluded from the heritage (Gen. 25:6). The children were regarded as legitimate, although the children of the first wife were preferred in the distribution of the inheritance. In patriarchal times, at least, the immediate cause of concubinage was the barrenness of the lawful wife, who herself suggested that her husband have children by her maid-servant (Gen. 16 and 30). Prominent OT figures who had concubines were Nahor (Gen. 22:24), Abraham (Gen. 25:6), Jacob (Gen. 35:22), Eliphaz (Gen. 36:12), Gideon (Judg. 8:31), Saul (II Sam. 3:7), David (II Sam. 5:13; 15:16; 16:21), Solomon (I Kings 11:3), Caleb (I Chron. 2:46), Manasseh (I Chron. 7:14), Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:21), Abijah (II Chron. 13:21), and Belshazzar (Dan. 5:2). S.B.

CONCUPISCENCE (kŏn-kū'pĭ-sĕns, Gr. epithumía), a word meaning intense longing or yearning for what God would not have us to have or be. It does not refer to sexual desire only. (Rom. 7:8; Col. 3:5; I Thess. 4:5).

CONDUIT (kŏn'dū ĭt), a channel, either cut out of solid rock or made of masonry, for conveying water from its source to the place where it was delivered. It was covered with stones to keep the water pure and cool. Conduits were used to deliver water to towns or for purposes of irrigation. One of the oldest in Palestine was about 13½ miles long and brought water from the Pools of Solomon, beyond Bethlehem, to the temple in Jerusalem. Tradition ascribes its construction to Solomon. Hezekiah constructed a conduit in anticipation of Sennacherib's invasion (II Kings 20:20). Other conduits mentioned in the Bible are one where Isaiah was commanded to meet Ahaz (Isa. 7:3), and beside which the messengers of Sennacherib stood when they spoke to the people on the wall (II Kings 18:17; Isa. 36:2), and another referred to in II Chronicles 32:30.

CONEY (See Animals)

CONFECTION, found only in Exodus 30:35, it refers to a compound of perfume or medicine, not sweetmeats.

CONFECTIONARY, a perfumer; found only in I Samuel 8:13. RVm has "perfumers."

CONFECTIONER (See Occupations, Professions)

CONFESSION (Heb. yādhâh, Gr. homologéo, and their derivatives). Both the Hebrew and Greek words are capable of the same twofold meaning as the English. To confess is openly to acknowledge one's faith in anything, as in the existence and authority of God, or the sins of which one has been guilty. Occasionally it also means to concede or allow (John 1:20; Acts 24:14; Heb. 11:13), or to praise God by thankfully acknowledging Him (Rom. 14:11; Heb. 13:15). In the Bible confession of sin before God is recognized as a condition of forgiveness. Christ taught the necessity of confessing offenses committed against other men (Matt. 5:24; Luke 17:4). The Bible gives no instruction about the mode of confession or the person to receive it, but no authority is found in it for the auricular confession practiced in the Roman church.

CONGREGATION (Heb. 'ēdhâh and qāhāl, Gr. ekklesía and sunagogé), a word used in Scripture mainly to refer to the Hebrew people; in its collective capacity regarded as God's people, or as an assembly of the people summoned for a definite purpose (I Kings 8:65) or met on a festal occasion (Deut. 23:1). Sometimes it refers to an assembly of the whole people; sometimes, to any part of the people who might be present on a given occasion. Occasionally it conveys the idea of "horde." Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation and took part in its proceedings probably from the time he bore arms. He had, however, no political rights as an individual, but only as a member of a house, a family, or a tribe, which was usually represented by its head, known as an elder or a prince. The elders, summoned by the supreme governor or the high priest, represented the whole congregation, served as a national parliament, and had legislative and judicial powers. They sat as a court to deal with capital offenses (Num. 15:32, 33), declared war, made peace, and concluded treaties (Josh. 9:15). The people were strictly bound by their acts, whether they approved of them or not (Josh. 9:18). Occasionally the whole body of people was assembled for some solemn religious occasion (Exod. 12:47; Num. 25:6; Joel 2:15) or to receive some new commandments (Exod. 19:7,8; Lev. 8:4). After the conquest of Canaan, the congregation was assembled only to consider very important matters. S.B.

CONIAH (kō-nī'a, Heb. konyāhû, Jehovah is creating). A form of the name Jehoiachin, found in Jeremiah 22:24,28; 37:1. See JEHOIACHIN.

CONSCIENCE (Gr. syneídesis), a word is not found in the OT, but the idea frequently appears, as when Adam and Eve hide from God (Gen. 3:8) and Joseph's brothers confess their guilt regarding him (Gen. 42:21). In ancient religion and philosophy the word seldom appeared in its modern meaning of the moral sense of the individual applied to his conduct, but it was never thought of as having any religious connection. Jesus never used the word.

In the NT outside of Paul's epistles, where it is found with fair frequency, it is used only in Acts (in speeches by Paul) and in Hebrews and I Peter. Nowhere in the NT is there a clearly defined doctrine of conscience, or even a description of it.

The most illuminating passage in the NT on the nature of conscience is Romans 2:14,15, where Paul declares that all men, both Gentiles and Jews, are responsible for their actions before God, because all have a revelation of God's moral law as their standard for right living, the Jews in the law of Moses, and the Gentiles in the law written on their hearts. Heathen Gentiles, moreover, know that they ought to obey it, for their conscience tells them to. I Corinthians 8-10 is the passage where "conscience" occurs most often. There Paul says that the Christian whose conscience allows him to eat meat offered to idols has no right to disregard the conscience of a less well-instructed Christian brother who thinks it wrong to eat it (I Cor. 8:7,12), or the ignorant conscience of a heathen (I Cor. 10:27). In II Corinthians 4:2 and 5:11 he applies the word "conscience" to the approval of his conduct by others. Repeatedly, Paul, Peter, and the author of Hebrews stress the need of having a good conscience toward God. Hebrews, which emphasizes the effects of the atonement on the individual, declares that the OT sacrifices did not produce a conscience free from the sense of guilt, because only the blood of Christ can do that. S.B.

CONSECRATION, an act by which a person or thing is dedicated to the service and worship of God. It is the translation of several Hebrew and Greek words of different meanings. 1. Heb. hāram, "devote"; "I will consecrate ("devote") their gain unto the Lord" (Micah 4:13). 2. Heb. nāzar, nēzer, "separate" (Num. 6:7,9,12). 3. Heb. qādhēsh, "to be set apart," i.e., set apart from that which is common or unclean (Exod. 28:3; 30:30; Josh. 6:19; II Chron. 26:18; 29:33; 31:6; Ezra 3:5). 4. Heb. millē' yadh, lit. "to fill the hand," a peculiar idiom usually used for the installation of a priest into his office or of the installation offerings put into his hands (Exod. 28:41; 29:9; 29:29; Lev. 8:33). 5. Gr. teleióo, "to make perfect" Heb. 10:20).

CONVERSATION, a word often used in the KJV to render various terms signifying conduct or manner of life, especially with respect to morals. The Greek words rendered "conversation" in Philippians 1:27 and 3:20 refer to "civil life" or "citizenship." Paul means that we should live like citizens of heaven.

CONVERSION (kŏn-vêr'zhŭn, Heb. shûv, Gr. epistrophé), occurs only once in the Bible (Acts 15:3). The words commonly used in the English Bible as equivalent with the Hebrew and Greek words are "turn," "return," and "turn back," "turn again." Thus "conversion" is synonymous with "turning." The turning may be in a literal or in a figurative, ethical or religious, sense, either from God, or, more frequently, to God. It is to be noted that when the turning refers to a definite spiritual change, it almost invariably denotes an act of man: "Turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways (Ezek. 33:11); "Except ye turn" (Matt. 18:3). Since the word implies both a turning from and a turning to something, it is not surprising that in the NT it is sometimes associated with repentance (Acts 3:19; 26:20) and faith (Acts 11:21). That is, conversion on its negative side is turning from sin, and on its positive side is faith in Christ, "Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 20:21) expresses the content of the idea, although the word turning is not found in the verse. Although conversion is an act of man, Scripture makes clear that it has a divine ground. The turning of sinful man is done by the power of God (Acts 3:26). In the process of salvation, conversion is the first step in the transition from sin to God. It is brought about by the Holy Spirit operating upon the human mind and will, so that the course of man's life is changed. It is not the same as justification and regeneration, which are purely divine acts. It may come as a sudden crisis or as a process more or less prolonged.

CONVICTION (kŏn-vĭk'shŭn, Gr. elégcho, to convince or prove guilty). Conviction is the first stage of repentance, experienced when in some way the evil nature of sin has been brought home to the penitent, and it has been proved to him that he is guilty of it. Although the word "conviction" is never used in the KJV, both Testaments give many illustrations of the experience. In the OT one of the most notable is found in Psalm 51, where David, realizing he has sinned against God, is overwhelmed with sorrow for his transgression and cries out to God for forgiveness and cleansing. In the NT the central passage bearing on this theme is John 16:7-11, where Jesus says that when the Holy Spirit comes "He will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment." Here the word "reprove" means "convince" or "prove "guilty." The thought is that the Holy Spirit addresses the heart of the guilty and shows how inadequate ordinary standards of righteousness are. The purpose of conviction is to lead to godly repentance. S.B.

CONVOCATION (kŏn-vō-kā'shŭn, Heb. mikrā'), used in the expression "Holy Convocation," but it is sometimes used alone (Num. 10:2; Isa. 1:13; 4:5). A convocation was a religious festival during which no work could be done. The holy convocations were the sabbath days (Lev. 23:1-3), Pentecost (Lev. 23:15-21), the first and seventh days of the feast of unleavened bread (Exod. 12:16; Lev. 23:6,7), the first and tenth days of the seventh month, the latter being the great day of atonement (Lev. 23:24-28), and the first and eighth days of the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:34-36). The phrase "solemn assembly" is applied only to the concluding festivals at the end of Passover and Tabernacles.

COOS (Kō'ôs, Gr. Kós, summit), a long, narrow island off the coast of Caria in S Asia Minor, mentioned in connection with Paul's third missionary journey in Acts 21:1. It was the birthplace of Hippocrates (the father of medicine), the famous painter Appelles, and Ptolemy Philadelphus.

COPING (kōp'ĭng), a word used only in I Kings 7:9 and probably referring to the customary parapets on Oriental house roofs, which were always flat.

COPPERSMITH (kŏp'êr-smĭth, Gr. chalkeús), found in the NT only in II Timothy 4:14: "Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil." The word should be rendered "worker in brass."

COR (See Weights & Measures)

CORAL (kŏr'ăl, Heb. rā'môth), the Hebrew word, the meaning of which is not entirely certain, is twice rendered "coral" (Job. 28:18; Ezek. 27:16), and, once, "too high" (Prov. 24:7). Red coral, which is the calcareous skeleton of a branching colony of polyps, was highly prized in ancient times, and was obtained in the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas at various depths down to about 100 fathoms. It differs much from the white coral which forms coral reefs. It was made into beads and charms.

CORBAN (kôr'băn, Heb. qorbān, an offering), occurs in the Hebrew text of the OT and refers to an offering or sacrifice, whether bloody or unbloody, made to God (Lev. 1:2,3; 2:1; 3:1; Num. 7:12-17). It is found in the NT in Mark 7:11, where it has reference to money dedicated to God. The Talmud says that the Jews were much given to making rash vows to God, without any intention of carrying them out. By Christ's time the reprehensible practice arose of children avoiding the responsibility of looking after their parents' material needs by telling them that their money was dedicated to God and that it would be wrong to divert it from this sacred purpose. This could be done by simply pronouncing the votive word "Corban." Ideally, the money thereafter belonged to God, but actually the one who made the vow might keep it in his possession. By referring to this custom Christ demonstrated the sophistry of tradition which enabled the Jews to disregard plain commandments of God, like the one requiring children to honor their parents.

CORD (kôrd, Heb. hevel, yether, mêthār, Gr. schoinion). Throughout the East in ancient times ropes and cords were made of goat's or camel's hair spun into threads and then plaited or twisted into the larger and stronger form. Sometimes they were made of strips of skin from goats and cows twisted together. Ropes for temporary fastenings were sometimes made from vines twisted together, and also from the bark of the branches of the mulberry tree. Frequently the word is used in a figurative sense in the Bible. Thus Job speaks of being "holden in cords of affliction" (Job 36:8), and Solomon says that the wicked "shall be holden with the cords of his sins" (Prov. 5:22). Other illustrations of this figurative use are Psalm 2:3; 129:4; 140:5; Ecclesiastes 4:12; Isaiah 5:18; 54:2.

CORIANDER (See Plants)

CORINTH (kôr'ĭnth, Gr. Kórinthos, ornament), a city of Greece on the narrow isthmus between the Peloponnesus and the mainland. Under the Romans, Athens was still the educational center of Greece, but Corinth was the capital of the Roman province called by them Achaia, and the most important city in the country. Land traffic between the N and S of Achaia had to pass the city, and much of the commerce between Rome and the East was brought to its harbors.

Corinth occupied a strategic geographical position. It was situated at the southern extremity of the isthmus, at the northern foot of the lofty (2000 ft.) and impregnable Acrocorinthus, which commands a wonderful view over the Saronic Gulf on the E and the Corinthian Gulf on the W, as well as over central Greece and the Peloponnesus. From the Acrocorinthus it is possible on a clear day to see the Acropolis of Athens 40 miles away. Corinth had three harbors: Lechaem, 1½ miles to the W, Cenchreae, 8½ miles to the E, and Schoenus, also to the E, but much less used than Cenchrea. Lechaeum was connected with Corinth by a double row of walls. Because of its highly-favored commercial position, in ancient times the city was known as "two-sea'd Corinth."

Ancient sailors dreaded making the voyage round the southern capes of the Peloponnesus, and this, as well as the saving of time effected, caused many of the smaller ships and their cargoes to be hauled across the narrow isthmus on a track. Sometimes the cargo of large ships was removed at the harbor, carried across the isthmus, and then loaded on another ship on the other side. Several attempts were made in ancient times to cut a ship-canal across the isthmus, notably one by Nero about A.D. 66, but none was successful. One was opened in 1893, and is now in use.

Corinth had an ancient and very interesting history. Phoenician settlers were early attracted to it. They introduced many profitable manufactures and established the impure worship of the Phoenician deities. Later, Greeks from Attica became supreme. They probably changed the name of the city to Corinth, and glorified the games held there in honor of Poseidon, the god of the sea. About 1074 B.C. the Dorians conquered the city. After the invention of triremes, about 585 B.C., a series of important colonies was founded, and Corinth became a strong maritime force. The city was lukewarm in the Persian wars, and opposed Athens in the Peloponnesian war. Except for a brief period, the Macedonians held the city from 335-197 B.C. The Romans declared Greece and Corinth free in 196 B.C., but in 146 B.C., in consequence of a rebellion against Rome, the city was totally destroyed by the Roman consul Mummius, and its famous art treasures taken as spoil to Rome. Julius Caesar rebuilt it as a Roman colony and made it the capital of Achaia in 46 B.C., and after that it rapidly came into prominence again. The Goths raided it in the third and fourth centuries; the Normans sacked it in 1147; the Venetians and Turks held it in the Middle Ages; from 1715 until 1822 it remained with the Turks. A severe earthquake in 1858 caused the abandonment of the city and the building of a new town a few miles from the ancient site. Modern Corinth has a population of about 9000 people. Until, in recent times, archaeologists began excavating the ancient city, nothing marked its site except seven columns of an old Doric temple.

In Roman times Corinth was a city of wealth, luxury, and immorality. It had no rivals as a city of vice. "To live like a Corinthian" meant to live a life of profligacy and debauchery. It was customary in a stage play for a Corinthian to come on the scene drunk. The inhabitants were naturally devoted to the worship of Poseidon, since they drew so much of their wealth from the sea, but their greatest devotion was given to Aphrodite, the goddess of love. Her temple on the Acrocorinthus had more than a thousand hierodouloi—priestesses of vice not found in other shrines of Greece, and she attracted worshipers from all over the ancient world. Besides drawing vast revenues from the sea, Corinth had many important industries, its pottery and brass, especially, being famous all over the world. The Isthmian games, held every two years, made Corinth a great center of Hellenic life.

At the height of its power, Corinth probably had a free population of 200,000, plus a half million slaves. Its residents consisted of the descendants of the Roman colonists who were established there in 46 B.C., many Romans who came for business, a large Greek population, and many strangers of different nationalities attracted to the city for various reasons. In the last group was a considerable body of Jews, and also some Gentiles brought under the influence of Judaism because of its monotheism and lofty morality.

Paul visited Corinth for the first time on his second missionary journey (Acts 18). He had just come from Athens, where he had not been well-received, and he began his work in Corinth with a sense of weakness, fear, and trembling (I Cor. 2:3). A special revelation from the Lord in a night vision altered his plans to return to Thessalonica (Acts 18:9,10; I Thess. 2:17,18), and he was told to speak freely and boldly in the city. At his first arrival, he became acquainted with Aquila and Priscilla, fellow Christians and, like himself, tent-makers. During his stay of a year and a half he resided in their home. He labored with his own hands, so that his motives as a preacher would be above suspicion. Soon after his arrival, Silas and Timothy rejoined him, Timothy bringing news from the church at Thessalonica (I Thess. 3:6).

Every sabbath Paul preached in the synagogue, but before long he met with strong opposition from the Jews, so that he turned from them and for the rest of his stay in Corinth gave his attention to the Gentiles (Acts 18:6). He was then offered the use of the house of Titus Justus, a God-fearing Gentile, who lived next door to the synagogue. Many turned to Christ and were baptized as a result of Paul's preaching, among them Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, and all his house. None of the baptisms in Corinth were performed by Paul himself, except those of Crispus, Gaius (Paul's host on his later visit (Rom. 16:23), and the household of Stephanas, who were Paul's first converts (I Cor. 16:15).

During Paul's stay in Corinth, Gallio, the elder brother of the Roman philosopher, Seneca, came to govern Achaia as proconsul. This was about the year 51, as an inscription found at Delphi in 1908 shows. The Jews brought an accusation before him against Paul, charging that he was preaching a religion contrary to Roman law. Gallio, however, refused to admit the case to trial and dismissed them. It is evident that he looked upon Christianity as being only an obscure variety of Judaism and that to him the quarrel between the Jews and Paul had its origin in nothing more than differing interpretations of the Jewish law. Following Gallio's decision, the Greek bystanders vented their animus against the Jews by seizing and beating Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, and Gallio paid no attention to them. Gallio's action was highly important, for it practically amounted to an authoritative decision by a highly-placed Roman official that Paul's preaching could not be interpreted as an offense against Roman law; and from this experience Paul gained a new idea of the protection the Roman law afforded him as a preacher of the Gospel. After many days, Paul left Corinth to go to Jerusalem and Antioch, on his way stopping off briefly at Ephesus.

Luke tells little of the subsequent history of the church at Corinth. Apollos, a convert of Aquila and Priscilla at Ephesus, was sent from Ephesus with a letter of recommendation, and he exercised an influential ministry in Corinth (Acts 18:27,28; I Cor. 1:12). There is evidence that during Paul's stay in Ephesus on his third missionary journey he paid a brief visit to Corinth (II Cor. 12:14; 13:1), although some hold that he did this later from Macedonia. While at Ephesus he wrote a letter to Corinth which has not been preserved (I Cor. 5:9). A reply to this, asking advice on important problems facing the church, and an oral report brought to him that all was not well in the church, led to his writing I Corinthians. This was probably sent by the hands of Titus: at least he was sent to Corinth by Paul about this time (II Cor. 7:13). Timothy was also sent to Corinth on some mission (I Cor. 4:17). After the silversmiths' riot at Ephesus, Paul went to Troas, hoping to meet Titus there with news from Corinth, but he was disappointed and went on to Macedonia, where he did meet him. On getting a largely favorable report, Paul wrote II Corinthians, and probably sent Titus to deliver it. After some time in Macedonia, Paul went to Greece, spending three months there (Acts 20:2,3), chiefly, no doubt, in Corinth. On Paul's third missionary journey he had been much occupied with getting offerings of money for the poor Christians in Jerusalem from the various churches he had founded. The Corinthian church responded to this appeal generously (II Cor. 9:2-5). It was during this visit to Corinth that Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans (Rom. 16:23). Whether he ever returned to the city is unknown.

About the year 97, Clement of Rome wrote an epistle, which survives, to the church at Corinth. It shows that in his time the Christians there were still vexed by divisions. S.B.

CORINTHIANS (kô-rĭn'thĭ-ănz), First and Second Epistles. The First Epistle to the Corinthians was written by the Apostle Paul in Ephesus on his third missionary journey (Acts 19; I Cor. 16: 8,19), probably in 56 or 57. He had previously written a letter to the Corinthians which has not come down to us, in which he had warned against associating with immoral persons (I Cor. 5:9); and in reply had received a letter, (alluded to several times in I Corinthians 5:10; 7:1; 8:1), in which they declared it was impossible to follow his advice without going out of the world altogether, and submitted to him a number of problems on which they asked his opinion. This letter from Corinth was probably brought by three of their number, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaícus (I Cor. 16:17), who came to visit Paul at Ephesus, and undoubtedly told him about the condition of the church. Meanwhile, Paul had heard of factions in the church from the servants of Chloe (1:11), probably from Corinth, and this news caused him much pain and anxiety. It was these various circumstances that led to the writing of I Corinthians.

The following are the subjects discussed in the epistle, after the introductory salutation (I Cor. 1:1-9):

1. In the first four chapters the apostle takes up the reported factionalism in the church, and points out the danger and scandal of party spirit. He reminds them that Christ alone is their Master, their Christian teachers being only servants of Christ and fellow-workers with God.

2. In chapter 5 the apostle deals with a case of incestuous marriage, and prescribes that the offender be put out of the church so that his soul may be saved.

3. In chapter 6 Paul comes to their practice of bringing disputes between themselves before heathen judges for litigation, and shows that this is morally wrong and out of harmony with the spirit of love by which they as Christians should be animated.

4. Various phases of the subject of marriage are considered in chapter 7. While commending a celibate life, Paul holds marriage to be wise and honorable. He forbids divorce between Christians and separation of Christians married to heathen partners.

5. The eating of meat offered to idols was a problem of conscience to many Christians, and ch. 8-10 are devoted to it. Paul points out (ch. 8) that while there is nothing inherently wrong in a Christian's eating such food, the law of love requires that it be avoided if it will offend another who regards the eating of it as sin. In ch. 9 he illustrates this principle of self-control in his own life; lest his motives in preaching the Gospel be misunderstood, he refuses to exercise his undoubted right of looking for material aid from the church. In ch. 10 he warns against a spirit of self-confidence and urges them to be careful not to seem to countenance idolatry.

6. Paul next takes up certain abuses in public worship: first, the matter of appropriate head apparel for women in their assemblies (11:2-16), and then the proper observance of the Lord's Supper (11:17-34), in the administration of which there had been serious abuses.

7. There then follows a long discussion of the use and abuse of spiritual gifts, especially speaking in tongues (chs. 12-14), and the apostle, while commending the careful exercise of all the gifts, bids them cultivate above all God's greatest gift, love (chs. 13).

8. In ch. 15 Paul turns to a consideration of one of the most important of their troubles — the resurrection of the dead, which some were inclined to doubt. He meets the objections raised against the doctrine by showing that it is necessitated by the resurrection of Christ and that their salvation is inseparably connected with it.

9. The epistle concludes with directions about the collections being made for the saints in Jerusalem, the Mother-Church, and with comments about Paul's plans and personal messages to various of his friends.

The Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written by Paul on his third missionary journey somewhere in Macedonia, where he had just met Titus, who had brought him a report concerning the church at Corinth.

The epistle reveals that Judaising teachers — perhaps recently arrived from Jerusalem — had sought to discredit the apostle, and had succeeded in turning the church as a whole against him. Paul was denounced as no minister of Christ at all. This revolt caused Paul to make a brief visit to Corinth in order to restore his authority (II Cor. 12:14; 13:1,2), but the visit did not have its expected effect.

The report Titus brought Paul was, on the whole, most encouraging. The majority had repented of their treatment of Paul and had cast out of the church the man who had led the attack on him. Paul's authority was acknowledged once more. Titus seems to have helped greatly in bringing about this happy change. It was the report of Titus that chiefly occasioned the writing of this epistle.

Paul's mention of a severe letter which had caused him great sorrow of heart to write (2:3,4, 9; 7:8-12) has naturally caused scholars to wonder what he had in mind. Some think he refers to I Corinthians; others hold that this letter, like the one referred to in I Corinthians 5:9, is wholly lost; while still others believe that it is preserved in II Corinthians 10-13, which, they say, was written by Paul at Ephesus sometime after the writing of I Corinthians.

II Corinthians is the least methodical and the most personal of Paul's epistles. It is very autobiographical, and falls naturally into three main divisions:

1. In chs. 1-7 Paul, after giving thanks to God for his goodness to him in trial (1:1-11), gives some thoughts on the crisis through which the church has just passed. 2. In chs. 8 and 9 he treats of the collection for the poor in Jerusalem. 3. Chs. 10-13 are a defense of Paul's ministry against the attacks of his enemies and a vindication of his apostleship. S.B.

CORMORANT (See Birds)

CORN (See Plants, Wheat)

CORNELIUS (kôr-nēl'yŭs, Gr. Kornélios, of a horn), a name of ancient and honorable standing among the Romans. Before the NT age, it was borne by such distinguished families as the Scipios and Sulla. He was a centurion of the Italian cohort. While being stationed at Caesarea, in obedience to instructions received in a vision, he sent for Simon Peter, who was staying at Joppa, to learn from him the message whereby he and his household should be saved (Acts 11:14).

As to his moral character, he is described as díkaios kaì phoboúmenos, "upright and god-fearing." His exact religious status prior to Peter's visit is ambiguous, but the likelihood is that Cornelius was a pious Roman, who, disillusioned by polytheism and disappointed by philosophy, had gravitated spiritually towards Judaism, and was now a "proselyte of the Gate" (Acts 11:2). Any doubts that Peter was acting improperly by sharing the message with this first Gentile convert are obviated by the twofold consideration of Peter's preparatory vision (10:9-16) and the subsequent outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon Cornelius' household (Acts 10:44-47). On these grounds, Peter defended his conduct before his critics at Jerusalem (Acts 11:1-18). J.F.G.

CORNERSTONE (Heb. pinnâh, akrogoniaíos), a term that has both a literal and figurative use in Scripture but is usually used figuratively (Ps. 118:22; Job 38:6; Isa. 28:16; Zech. 10:4, etc.). Among the Canaanites, before the conquest of the land of Joshua, the laying of the foundation stone was accompanied by the dreadful rite of human sacrifice. Numerous skeletons have been unearthed, especially those of tiny babies in earthen jars.

Following rabbinical practice, which understood the term "cornerstone" in a Messianic context, the Synoptics validate the claim of Jesus of Nazareth to Messiahship by citation of Psalm 118:22 (Matt. 21:42; Mark 12:10; Luke 20-17). In a similar fashion must be understood the Pauline and Petrine usage of the word (see Rom. 9:33, quoting Isa. 28:16 and 8:14, following LXX; also Eph. 2:20 et. al., I Peter 2:6, etc.). J.F.G.

CORNET (Heb. shôphār, qeren). The musical instruments mentioned in the OT fall into three groups: the stringed, the percussion, and the wind. The instrument known as the "cornet" is to be found in the last class. It was a curved horn, the sound being a dull monotone. Some translators have understood the term to imply a musical instrument akin to the bagpipe or oboe (I Chron. 15:28; Ps. 98:6; Dan. 3:5,10,15; Hos. 5:8).

COS, COOS (kōs, KJV Cō ŏs), an island off the coast of Asia Minor, one of the Sporades; mountainous in terrain, especially in the southern sector. The birthplace of Hippocrates, the father of medicine and of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The name of its capital is also Cos. A large Jewish settlement was located here. It is mentioned in connection with Paul's third missionary journey (Acts 21:1).

COSAM (kō'săm), an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:28).

COSMETICS, any of the various preparations used for beautifying the hair and skin. Such practices are regarded with disfavor by the writers of Holy Writ. Jezebel, Ahab's wicked queen, painted her face immediately prior to her slaying by Jehu, son of Nimshi (II Kings 9:30). The practice of painting the eyes is referred to by Ezekiel in an uncomplimentary vein in the parable of Aholah and Aholibah (Ezek. 23:40b). The "painted stare" is referred to by Jeremiah (Jer. 4:30). See Perfume.

COTTON (Per., karpas), originally designated muslin or calico. Its use was gradually extended to include linen. The plant was imported to Palestine shortly after the Captivity. Cotton was spun into cloth by weavers in Egypt. The mummies of Egypt were wrapped in this material. It is mentioned but once in the Bible (Esth. 1:5,6), where the word "green" should be rendered "cotton," as in the RSV. See PLANTS.

COUCH, a piece of furniture for reclining. The couch became so ornate that Amos rebuked the rich for the costly display of their couches (Amos 6:4). Sometimes, however, the couch was no more than a rolled-up mat which could be easily transported (Matthew 9:6). See BED.

COULTER (kōl'têr), a plowshare (I Sam. 13:19-21). The plows used in eastern lands today are very similar to those used in ancient times. At first, a plow was nothing more than a sturdy branch of a tree; later it was improved so that a pair of oxen could be attached to it. The sharp end of the plow scratched rather than turned over the soil so that the seed might be sown. In later times, the plowman steered the plow with one hand, while guiding the oxen with the other. See PLOW.

COUNCIL (koun'sĕl, Heb. rigmâh, Gr. sumboúlion, sunédrion), a Jewish governing body, more or less informally held. David speaks of "the princes of Judah and their council" (Ps. 68:27); but he does not mean the Sanhedrin, which did not come into existence until after the Captivity. Except for Matthew 12:14 and Acts 25:12, the word "council" in the KJV always refers to the Sanhedrin, as the Greek shows.

COUNSELLOR (koun'sĕ-lêr). The modern English spelling, "counselor," is not found in the KJV. The word refers to one who gives counsel. It is found in both Testaments. A counsellor (Gr. bouletes) was a member of the Sanhedrin. The word is applied to Joseph of Arimathea (Mark 15:43; Luke 23:50).

COURSE OF PRIESTS AND LEVITES. David divided the priests and Levites into 24 groups, called courses in Luke 1:8, each with its own head (I Chron. 24:1 ff). These courses officiated for a week at a time, the change being made on the sabbath before evening sacrifice.

COURT. At the advice of Jethro, Moses instituted a system of jurisprudence for the Israelites. He appointed judges over tens, fifties, hundreds, and thousands; and finally a Supreme Court under himself and his successors. There was no opportunity of appeal to a higher court (Exod. 18:25, 26). The office of judge was an elective one (Deut. 1:13). Eventually judges were usually chosen from among the Levites, although this was not necessary. They were held in very high regard. In time, the profession of law developed among the Hebrews, its members being called "Lawyers," "Scribes," or "Doctors of the Law" (Luke 2:46). These men studied and interpreted the law, decided questions of the law, and taught Hebrew boys the law.

Technical knowledge of the law was not a prerequisite to become a judge. Under the Romans the supreme legislative and judicial body was the Sanhedrin. Its judgment was final except in cases involving capital punishment, when the consent of the procurator had to be secured. The Sanhedrin met in Jerusalem.

COVENANT, translates the Hebrew noun berîth. The verbal root of berîth means either "to fetter" or "eat with," which would signify mutual obligation, or "to allot" (I Sam. 17:8), which would signify a gracious disposition: compare the Hittite "suzerainty covenant," in which a vassal swore fealty to his king, out of gratitude for favors received (E. J. Young, The Study of Old Testament Theology Today, London: J. Clarke, 1958, p. 62).

In the OT, berîth identifies three differing types of legal relationships. 1. A two-sided covenant between human parties, both of which voluntarily accept the terms of the agreement (for friendship, I Sam. 18:3-4; marriage, Mal. 2:14; or political alliance, Josh. 9:15, Obad. 7). God, however, never "enters in" to such a covenant of equality with men. The closest approximation is the "covenant of redemption" between Jehovah and Christ (mentioned in certain of the Psalms, 2:7-8; 40: 6-8), under which the Son agrees to undertake man's salvation. But the actual term berîth is not employed. 2. A one-sided disposition imposed by a superior party (Ezek. 17:13-14). God the Lord thus "commands" a berîth which man, the servant, is to "obey" (Josh. 23:16). In the original "covenant of works" (Hos. 6:7 ASV), He placed Adam on probation, bestowing life, should he prove faithful (Gen. 2:17). Humanity failed; but Christ, the last Adam (I Cor. 15:45), did fulfill all righteousness (Matt. 3:15, Gal. 4:4), thereby earning restoration for all who are His. 3. God's self-imposed obligation, for the reconciliation of sinners to Himself (Deut. 7:6-8, Ps. 89:3-4). As He stated to Abraham, "I will establish My covenant between Me and thee . . . to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee" (Gen. 17:7).

The LXX avoided the usual Greek term for covenant, synthéke (Meaning a thing mutually "put together"), as unsuitable for the activity of the sovereign God, and substituted diathéke (a thing, literally, "put through"), the primary meaning of which is "a disposition of property by a will." The LXX even used diathéke for the human-agreement type of berîth. NT revelation, however, makes clear the wonderful appropriateness of diathéke, testament, for describing the instrument of God's redemptive love: "For, where a testament is, there must of necessity be the death of him that made it . . . [Christ's] death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant" (Heb. 9:16). "Testament," indeed, signifies a specific form of covenant, the bequest; and it well describes God's OT berîth, because apart from the death of Christ the OT saints "should not be made perfect" (11:40; see J. B. Payne, An Outline of Hebrew History, Grand Rapids: Baker, 1954, pp. 220-228).

The covenant then constitutes the heart of all God's special revelation: when put into writing, "the book of the covenant" becomes the objective source for man's religious hope (Exod. 24:7); and, as E. J. Young has summarized it, "The subject matter with which [Biblical] theology is concerned is that covenant which God has made with man for man's salvation" (op. cit., p. 61). Scripture consists of "the Old Testament" and "the New Testament." For while there can be but one testament, corresponding to the one death of Christ ("My blood of the testament," according to the better MSS of Matt. 26:28), revelation yet organizes itself under the older testament, with its anticipatory symbols of Christ's coming (Jer. 31-32, II Cor. 3:14), and the newer testament, commemorative of His accomplished redemption (Jer. 31:31, II Cor. 3:6).

The following aspects compose the testamentary arrangements: the testator, God the Son, "the mediator" (Heb. 9:15); the heirs, "the called" ones (9:15); the objective method of effectuation, a gracious bequest (9:16); the subjective conditions by which the heir qualifies for the gift, namely, commitment (9:28: it is "to them that wait for Him"); and the inheritance of reconciliation, "eternal salvation" (9:15,28). Certain specific features then characterize this covenant. Its objective effectuation is always marked by a monergism, "one worker," God exercising pure grace (cf. Gen. 15:18, Exod. 19:4), unassisted by man's works (Eph. 2:8-9); b. the death of the testator (Exod. 24:8, Heb. 9:18-22); c. the promise, "I will be their God, and they shall be My people" (Gen. 17:7 to Rev. 21:3); d. the eternity of the inheritance (Ps. 105:8-10. Num. 18:19 thus mentions "a covenant of salt"; compare Lev. 2:13, "the salt [eternal preservation] of the testament of thy God"); and e. a confirmatory sign, such as the rainbow to Noah (Gen. 9:12-13), the exodus to Moses (Exod. 20:2), or Christ's resurrection to us (Rom. 1:4). Subjective appropriation of the covenant is likewise marked by unchangeable features of human response: a. faith (Gen. 15:6, Deut. 6:5; Heb. 11:6) and b. obedience, both moral (Gen. 17:1, Matt. 7:24, Eph. 2:10) and ceremonial (Gen. 17:10-14, Acts 22-16, I Cor. 11:24); for genuine faith must be demonstrated by works (James 2:14-26).

Yet God's revelations of His covenant also exhibit historical progression (covenants, plu., Rom. 9:4). Under the older testament appear 1. the Edenic (Gen. 3:15), God's earliest promise of redemption, though at the cost of the "bruising of the heel of the seed of woman"; 2. the Noachian (9:9), for the preservation of the seed; 3. the Abrahamic (15:18), granting blessing through Abram's family; 4. the Sinaitic (Exod. 19:5-6), designating Israel as God's chosen people; 5. the Levitical (Num. 25:12-13), making reconciliation through priestly atonement; and 6. the Davidic (II Sam. 23:5), with Messianic salvation promised through David's dynasty. Each of these covenants anticipated the same redemptive death; yet differences appear, particularly in their ceremonial response. A "dispensation" may thus be defined as a covenantal period during which faith in Christ is manifested by a distinct form of ceremonial obedience. Even our own, newer testament thus exhibits two stages: 7. the present new covenant in Christ, which is internal, "in their heart"; reconciling (as always, "I will be their God"); direct, "They shall all know Me"; and with finished atonement, "For I will forgive their iniquity" (Jer. 31:33-34, Heb. 8:6-13). But its ceremony, the Lord's Supper, possesses a dispensational limit, exhibiting "the Lord's death till He come" (I Cor. 11: 26). For Ezekiel speaks of 8. the future covenant of peace, when our internal salvation will reach out to embrace external nature (Ezek. 34:25), when direct spiritual communion will become "face to face" (20:35; 37:27), and when divine forgiveness will achieve the goal of peace among all nations (34:28). J.B.P.

COVERING THE HEAD, mentioned only in I Corinthians 11:15, where Paul says that a woman's hair is given her for a covering. In the preceding verses he says that women should have their heads covered in public worship. At that time in Greece only immoral women were seen with their heads uncovered. Paul means that Christian women cannot afford to disregard social convention; it would hurt their testimony. In giving them long hair, a natural veil, nature teaches the lesson that women should not be unveiled in public assemblies.

COVETOUSNESS, (kŭv'ĕt-ŭs-nĕs), has various shades of meaning, among the most important the following: 1. The desire to have something (I Cor. 12:31; 14:39). 2. The inordinate desire to have something (Luke 12:15 ff; Eph. 5:5; Col. 3:5). 3. Excessive desire of what belongs to another (Exod. 20:17; Rom. 7:7). A great deal of OT law was intended to counteract the spirit of covetousness. Outstanding examples of covetousness are: Achan (Josh. 7); Saul (1 Sam. 15:9,19); Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5:1-11).

COW (See Animals: Cattle)

COZ (kōz), a man of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

COZBI (kŏz'bī), a Midianite woman slain by Phineas, Aaron's grandson, because through her the plague had come upon Israel in the wilderness (Numbers 25:16-18).

CRACKNEL, cakes cooked in a pan, corresponding to our pancakes (I Kings 14:3).

CRAFT, CRAFTSMAN (See Occupations, Professions)

CRAFTINESS, CRAFTY, ability that stops short of nothing, however bad, to attain its purpose; guile; cunning (Dan. 8:25; Luke 20:23).

CRANE (See Birds)

CREATION, does not occupy a great deal of space in the Bible, but is clearly presented in Genesis 1-2, and in Hebrews 11:3, and is emphasized in Isaiah 40-51 and in the latter part of Job. The Bible clearly teaches that the universe, and all matter, had a beginning, and came into existence through the Will of the eternal God. In Genesis 1:1, the words "the heaven and the earth" summarize all the various materials of the universe. This verse has been interpreted in various ways, but all agree in its essential significance. This is true even of the new interpretation that takes it as a mere introduction to what follows, rendering it: "When God began to create heaven and earth," for even on this interpretation v.2 would describe the situation that came into existence shortly after God began to create, rather than to contradict Hebrews 11:3 by implying that there was preexisting matter.

Some hold that there is a long gap between verses 1 and 2, in which God's perfect creation came into chaos through a great catastrophe. Hebrew syntax permits such a view but does not require it.

The length of the creative days of Genesis 1 is not stated in the Bible. The Hebrew word "day" may mean a period of light between two periods of darkness, a period of light together with the preceding period of darkness, or a long period of time. All three usages occur frequently in the Bible, including Genesis 1-2. No one of them is exactly 24 hours, though the second one is near it. There is no indication as to which of the three is meant, though the type of expression used in the third, fifth and sixth days seems to suggest a long period. The Bible gives no information as to how long ago the original creation of matter occurred, or the first day of creation began, or the sixth day ended.

On the seventh day (Gen. 2:2-3) God ceased from His labors. This is given as an example for man in his life of six days of labor followed by one day of rest (cf. Exod. 20:11). No end to the seventh day is mentioned. As far as the Bible tells us, the cessation of God's creative activity still continues.

There is much discussion about the question of "evolution" in relation to creation, but the word "evolution" is used in many different ways. If taken in its historic sense, to indicate the theory that everything now existing has come into its present condition as a result of natural development, all of it having proceeded by natural causes from one rudimentary beginning, such a theory is sharply contradicted by the divine facts revealed in Genesis 1-2. These chapters indicate a number of specific divine commands bringing new factors into existence. God's activity is indicated throughout the entire creation. It is explicitly stated several times that plants and animals are to reproduce "after their kind." Moses nowhere states how large a "kind" is, and there is no ground for equating it with any particular modern definition of "species." Yet it is clear that Genesis teaches that there are a number (perhaps a large number) of "kinds" of plants and of animals, which cannot reproduce in such a way as to evolve from one into the other. Nothing in the Bible denies the possibility of change and development within the limits of a particular "kind."

Moreover, the creation of man is sharply distinguished from the other parts of the creation, and the creation of woman is described as a distinct act of God. Genesis 2:7 (in the Hebrew) clearly teaches that man did not exist as an animate being before he was a man, created after the image of God.

It is sometimes said that the Bible begins with two contradictory accounts of creation. To say that it begins with two creation accounts is like saying that an atlas begins with two maps. A map of the world and a map of the United States would overlap. The first would include a great deal of territory not included in the second. The second would include a great deal of detail not mentioned in the first. This is exactly the relation between the two creation accounts. Genesis 1 describes the creation of the universe as a whole. Genesis 2:4-25 gives a more detailed account of the creation of man and says nothing about the creation of matter, of light, of the heavenly bodies, or of plants and animals, except to refer to the creation of animals as having taken place at an earlier time.

It is sometimes said that the creation story of Genesis 1 begins with a watery chaos and that of Genesis 2 with a dry earth. There is no contradiction in this because the two begin at different places in the whole series of creative events.

It is sometimes alleged that Genesis 2 gives a different order of events of creation from Genesis 1. Actually, however, only two creative acts are involved in Genesis 2: the creation of man and that of woman. There is no contradiction between the order in which they are described and that of Genesis 1.

Genesis 2 does not describe the creation of vegetation, as some interpreters allege, but simply mentions that God planted a garden. Even this act took place before the creation of man. Only by reading extremely primitive concepts into Genesis 2 could one insist on interpreting it as meaning that God created man and then laid him on the shelf for a few years while the garden that He proceeded to plant should grow large enough to be a satisfactory place for man to live. The verbs in Genesis 2:8,9 must be interpreted, in normal fashion, as implying an English pluperfect.

The same is true of v.19 where creation of the animals is specifically referred to. God, looking for a companion for man, brought before him the animals that He had previously created, to show him the need of a different sort of helper. Genesis 2 does not contradict Gen. 1 in any way, but adds to our understanding of the details of an important portion of God's creative activity. A.A.M.

CREATURE (Gr. ktísis), in the NT the word denotes that which has been created (Rom. 1:25; 8:39; Heb. 4:13). Sometimes used with adjective kaine in the sense of the new creation (II Cor. 5:17) or in contrast to the old man versus the new man (Gal. 6:15).

CREATURE, LIVING (Heb. hayyâh, Gr. zóon) a symbolical figure presented first in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 1:5ff), and again in Revelation 4:6-9; 5:6,8,11; 6:1,3,5-7. In Ezekiel's vision there are four living creatures. They had the general appearance of a man, but each had four faces and four wings, and the feet of an ox. Under their wings they had human hands. The front face was that of a man; to the right and left of this were the faces of a lion and of an ox, and in the back was the face of an eagle. Fire gleamed from their midst. Later they are called "cherubim" (Ezek. 10:1ff). The living creatures in Revelation are somewhat modified from those in Ezekiel's vision.

CREED (Lat. credo, "I believe"), a rule of faith, a symbol, a public confession or declaration of Christian doctrine or belief. The creeds of Christendom group themselves into five more or less distinct groups. First are the ecumenical or earlier creeds, which include the Apostles' Creed (n.d.), the Nicene Creed (A.D. 325), the Chalcedonian Creed (A.D. 451), the Athanasian Creed, commonly ascribed to Athanasius (d. A.D. 333). The second larger division deals with the creeds of the Greek Church, embracing the confessions of Gennadius (A.D. 1453), the "Orthodox Confession of Peter Mogilas" (A.D. 1643), the Decrees of the Synod of Jerusalem (A.D. 1672), etc. In addition, the Greek Church tenaciously holds to the above-mentioned ecumenical creeds. The third division is that of the Roman Catholic Church, which in addition to the basic ecumenical creeds, holds to the Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent (A.D. 1563-64), the Profession of the Tridentine Faith (A.D. 1564), the Papal Definition of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary (A.D. 1854), the Vatican Decrees of 1870, upholding the dogma of Papal Infallibilty, the Ecumenical Council summoned by the late Pius XII, where the dogma of the bodily assumption of the Virgin Mary was adopted (A.D. 1950). Within the Councils of the Roman Catholic church in the 1960's some modifications of the more stringent laws of said church seem to be taking place, such as the abolition of the "Sacred Latin" tongue for the modern languages, and the abrogation of "Extreme Unction" for simply "Praying for the Sick."

The fourth division contains the Lutheran Confessional Statements, which include the Augsburg Confession, (A.D. 1530) for which Luther himself produced the doctrinal sections, a mild conciliatory decree, the Articles of Smalcald (A.D. 1537), the Formula of Concord (A.D. 1577).

The fifth and final division embraces the Reformed and Evangelical Church Creeds. These include the Swiss or Zwinglian Confessions (A.D. 1536-66), the Belgic Confession (A.D. 1561), the Decrees of the Synod of Dort (A.D. 1604-1619), the Remonstrance (A.D. 1610), the Canons of Dort (A.D. 1619), the Westminster Confession (1643-48). This confession consisted at first of the revision of the thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, which was followed by a strong affirmation of the Nicene Creed. The Westminster Confession was likewise given a strong Puritanical or Calvinistic orientation.

Baptistic groups and Quakers doubt the advisability of creeds, having as a motto: "No creed, but Christ." Nevertheless, despite rancor, abuses and excesses, it seems that the Holy Spirit has been pleased in general to use the various creeds as an instrument to insure the doctrinal purity of the Church at large. CREEK (Gr. kólpos). Modern translations utilize the word "bay" as a substitution for the KJV "creek," identified as the traditional "St. Paul's Bay" about eight miles NW of the town of Zaletta on the island of Malta (Melita) (Acts 27:39).

CREEPING THING (See Animals, Insects)

CRESCENS (Gr. Kréskes, increasing), the companion of the apostle Paul at Rome who had departed for Galatia (II Tim. 4:10).

CRETE, CRETAN (krēt, krē'tăn, Gr. Kréte, Krétes, Acts 2:11, Titus 1:12), an island in the Mediterranean Sea with Cythera on the NW and Rhodes on the NE, forming a natural bridge between Europe and Asia Minor. Crete is about 156 miles long and from seven to 30 miles wide. Despite its enviable geographical position, Crete has never attained a prominent place in history, partly because of internal dissensions and, in more modern times, because of its acceptance of Turkish rule and the Islamic faith. In mythology Mt. Ida is the legendary birthplace of Zeus, the head of the Greek Pantheon. King Minos, the half historical, half mythological character, alleged son of Zeus, was an early ruler. Both Thucydides and Aristotle accepted the existence of King Minos and claimed that he established maritime supremacy for Crete by putting down piracy. Aristotle compares the institutions of Crete to those of Sparta. Crete is said to have been colonized by the Dorians from Peloponnesus. The most important cities of Crete are Cnossos, excavated by Arthur Evans; Gortyna near the gulf of Messara; and Cydonia. Around 140 B.C. the Jews established a large enough colony on this island to be able to appeal successfully to the protection of Rome.

CRETE IN THE OT — The Cherethites (I Sam. 30:14; Ezek. 25:16) held to be a group of Philistines, are identified as Cretans.

CRETE IN THE NT — A number of Cretans are represented as being present upon the Day of Pentecost. Paul visited Crete and left his assistant Titus in charge. In the opinion of the Apostle Paul, even the Christians in Crete were not of high moral character: "Cretans are always liars . . ." (Titus 1:12). The first words of this quotation are to be found in the hymn to Zeus by Callimachus. The particular lie of which the Cretans were always guilty was that they said the tomb of Zeus, a non-existent personage, was located on their island. Laziness and gluttony also characterized them. Titus is charged sharply to rebuke them (Titus 1:13). A storm on his journey to Rome forced Paul's ship into the port of Cnidus (Acts 27:17). The narrative does not specifically indicate that Paul actually landed on the island.

CRIB (Job 39:9, Prov. 14:4, Isaiah 1:3), a rack constructed for the feeding of domestic livestock. A manger (Luke 2:7). Isaiah complains that "the ox knoweth his master and the ass his master's crib" (Isaiah 1.3).

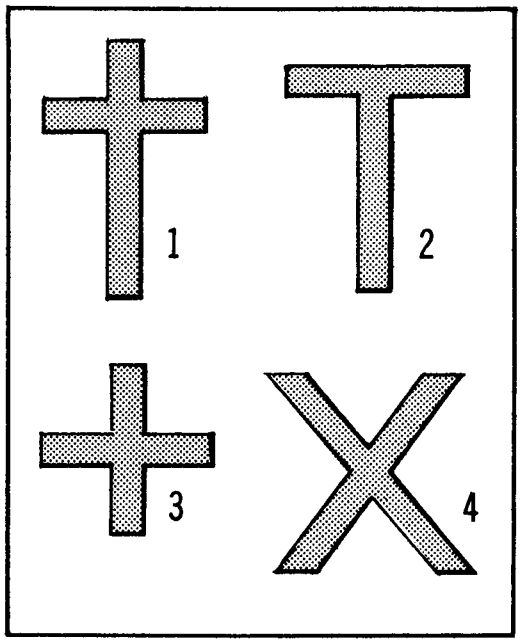
CRIMSON (Heb. karmîl, tôlā'), refers to the brilliant red dye obtained from a bug. The word is applied to garments (II Chron. 2:7,14; Jer. 4:30 KJV). The best known citation is doubtless the prophet's assurance in Isaiah 1:18.

CRISPING PIN (Heb. hărîtîm, Isaiah 3:22 KJV), pins for crisping or curling the hair. The term has also been translated as bags (II Kings 5:23), girdles, veils, and turbans. See DRESS.

CRISPUS (krĭs'pŭs, Gr. Krĭspos, "curled," Acts 18,7, 8; I Cor. 1:14), formerly the ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth; converted under the preaching of Paul and subsequently baptized by him.

CROP (Lev. 1:16), the enlargement of the gullet of a bird where food is partly macerated, removed by the priest for sacrificial purposes.

CROSS (Gr. staurós). There are three Biblical uses of the term: first, the cross in its literal aspect; secondly, the Cross as a symbolic representation of redemption; thirdly, death upon the cross, i.e., crucifixion. Our English word is derived from the Latin Crux. The cross existed in four different forms: 1, the crux immissa, the type usually presented in art in which the upright beam extends above the cross beam, traditionally held to be the cross upon which the Redeemer suffered and died; 2, the crux commissa, or "Saint Anthony's Cross" in the form of the letter "T"; 3, the Greek cross in which the cross beams are of equal length; 4, the crux decussata, or "Saint Andrew's Cross," in the shape of the letter "X." Antedating these forms, the Assyrians impaled the body with a crude pointed stick. "I marched from the Orontes . . . I conquered their cities . . . I caused great slaughter . . . I took their warriors prisoner, and impaled them on stakes before their cities . . ." (From the report of Ashurbanipal), Keller, Werner: THE BIBLE AS HISTORY; New York: Wm. Morrow and Co., 1954: pp. 229-30.



Four forms of the Cross.

Because of the sacrificial death of the Saviour upon the cross, the cross rapidly became interwoven into the theological construction of religious thinking, especially Paul's. In I Corinthians 1:17, the "preaching" (kerugma) of the Cross is set forth as the "divine folly" in sharp contrast to earthly wisdom. In Ephesians 2:16, it is presented as the medium of reconciliation. In Colossians 1:20, peace has been effected through the Cross. In Colossians 2:14, the penalties of the law have been removed from the believer by the Cross. How Paul as a pious Hebrew, to whom one hanged was accursed, and as a Roman to whom one crucified was an object of scorn (Gal. 3:13), came to glory in the Cross would be one of the absurdities of history, were it not for the fact that the apostle held the Crucified as the Christ of God. (Gal. 2:20). Crucifixion was one of the most cruel and barbarous forms of death known to man. It was practiced, especially in times of war, by the Phoenicians, Carthaginians, Egyptians, and later by the Romans. So dreaded was it that even in the pre-Christian era, the cares and troubles of life were often compared to a cross.

The details of the crucifixion of Christ are passed over, the evangelists resting content with the simple statement "They crucified him" (Matt. 27:35; Mark 15:24). Following His trial before the Jewish and Roman authorities, He was led forth for crucifixion. Preparatory to the actual ordeal itself, He was scourged. The prisoner was bent over, tied to a post, while the Roman lictor applied blow upon blow upon His bared back with a lash intertwined with pieces of bone or steel. This in itself was frequently sufficient to cause death.

The agony of the crucified victim was brought about by a number of factors. First, the painful but non-serious character of the wounds inflicted. Although there were two distinctive methods of affixing a living victim to a cross, tying or nailing, it is well established that Christ underwent the horror of the latter, or possibly both. The second factor causing great suffering was the abnormal position of the body. The slightest movement would be accompanied with additional torture. The third factor would be the traumatic fever induced by hanging for such a long period of time.

What was the physical reason for Christ's death? Recent medical studies have sought an answer to the question. When a person is suspended by his two hands, the blood sinks rapidly into the lower extremities of the body. Within six to twelve minutes blood pressure has dropped to 50 per cent, while the rate of the pulse has doubled. The heart is deprived of blood and fainting follows. This leads to an orthorastic collapse through insufficient circulation. Death by crucifixion is due to heart failure. Victims of crucifixion did not generally succumb for two or three days. Death was hastened by the "crucifragium" or the breaking of the legs. "When they came to Jesus and saw that He was dead already, they brake not his legs" (John 19:33). Sometimes, a fire was built beneath the cross that its fumes might suffocate the sufferer.

Among the Jews, a stupefying potion was prepared by the merciful women of Jerusalem, a drink which Christ refused (Mark 15:23). To such a death, the one who was co-equal with God descended (Phil. 2:5). J.F.G.

CROW (See Birds)

CROWN, a band encircling the head to designate honor; there are three principal types of crowns: the royal crown, the priestly crown, and the crown of the victor. Some of the terms employed for "crown" in the OT are: Heb. qodhqôth, a part of the human anatomy, the "crown" of the head, the pate (Deut. 28:35, II Sam. 14:25, etc.); Heb. zēr, that which encircles the head, viz. a garland of flowers (Exod. 25:11); Heb. nezer, that which is a symbol of dedication to the priesthood, the priestly crown; Heb. 'ătārâh, the customary term (I Chron. 20:2, Prov. 4:9). In the NT (Gr., stéphanos and diádema are used. The first refers to a garland or chaplet such as was worn by a victorious athlete. This type of crown is employed figuratively by Paul and John as a symbol of Christian triumph (II Tim. 4:8, Rev. 2:10). The diadem was a symbol of the power to rule.

Of particular interest is the crown of thorns which Jesus wore (Gr. akánthinos stéphanos, Matt. 27:29, Mark 15:17, John 19:2). The particular variety of thorns from which this crown was woven is impossible to determine, as there are about 22 words in the Bible used for the thorny plants, and the Greek word is a generic, not a specific term. J.F.G.

CROWN OF THORNS (See Crown)

CRUCIFIXION (See Cross)

CRUSE (krōos), a small, porous, earthen vessel for the purpose of holding liquids (I Sam. 26:11, 12, 16; I Kings 19:6). In the NT alabástron as the alabaster cruse or flask for holding ointment — not a box as in KJV (Matt. 26:7, Mark 14:3, Luke 7:37).

CRYSTAL. Both Hebrew and Greek terms can be rendered "ice"; more likely it means rock crystal or crystallized quartz. The reason for the selection of the word "ice" is that the ancients believed that crystal was formed by the process of intense cold (Job 28:17; Rev. 4:6, 21:11, 22:1). See METALS and MINERALS.

CUBIT (See Weights and Measures)

CUCKOO (See Birds)

CUCKOW (See Birds)

CUCUMBER (See Plants)

CUMMIN (See Plants)

CUNEIFORM (kū-nē'i-fôrm), a system of writing by symbolic characters used chiefly in the Mesopotamian area in ancient times. The system is regarded as the forerunner of the alphabet. The cuneiform characters were developed by the Sumerians, who recorded them upon clay tablets which they baked firm in the oven. The term refers to the wedged-shaped characters of the script. At the time of the discovery of the personal library of Ashurbanipal of Nineveh (ruled 668-626 B.C.) by Layard and Rassam (1850-1854) literally multitudes of these clay tablets were unearthed, among them the Babylonian versions of creation and of the flood, which show striking similarities with the accounts in the OT. According to Olmsted of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, more than half a million of these tablets are yet to be deciphered.

The Tel-El-Amarna Letters (1400-1350 B.C.), found in Egypt in 1887, consisting of 300 clay tablets are written in the Akkadian form of the cuneiform script. The Akkadian was the "Lingua Franca" of that day, i.e., the language of trade and diplomacy used between Syria and Egypt. (See AMARNA, TELL-EL).Of still greater importance was the discovery between 1929 and 1939 at Ras Shamra in the NW ot Syria of the Ugaritic literature. This was written in a Canaanite dialect closely related to proto-Hebrew. The Ras Shamra literature, dating closely c. 1400 B.C., gives us much information on Canaanite religion and presents many parallels to the OT in vocabulary and poetic style. J.F.G.

CUP (Heb. kôs, Gr. potérion), a term used in a literal and figurative sense. Cups were of various forms and designs, and made of a variety of materials: gold, silver, earthenware, copper, bronze, etc. The cups of the Hebrews, whether metal or porcelain, often carried designs borrowed from Phoenicia and Egypt. All of Solomon's drinking vessels were of gold (I Kings 10:21). The cups mentioned in the NT were, beyond much doubt, of Roman style.

The word cup may also signify a laver (Exod. 24:6) or goblet (S. of Sol. 7:2; I Chron. 28:17). The cup is used as a symbol of prosperity or of Jehovah's blessing and, in reverse, of Jehovah's malediction upon the wicked (Ps. 11:6; 16:5; 23:5). The cup also represents drunkenness and other illicit pleasures (Prov. 23:31; 51:7; Rev. 17:4; 18:6). "Cup of consolation" (Jer. 16:7) stems from the oriental custom of sending to bereaved friends food and drink for their mourning feast. "Cup of salvation" (Ps. 116:13), "Cup of blessing" (I Cor. 10:16), or "Cup of the Lord" (verse 21). Paul here refers to the communion cup, over which the blessing is said prior to the feast which commemorates the Lord's death and burial. The cup from ancient times signifies fellowship. Thus, when the believer takes the cup of the Lord, he enters into fellowship with Him. The "cup of demons" (I Cor. 10:21) mentioned in opposition to the cup of the Lord can best be understood in this context. The apostle is saying in a figurative way that we cannot have fellowship with Christ and with the forces of darkness at one and the same time. At heathen feasts the cup was sacred to the name of the god in whose name the feast was being held. Thus at the communion service, the cup is sacred to the name of the Redeemer who instituted its practice (Matt. 26:27; Mark 14:23, 24; Luke 22:20). The "cup of trembling" literally, cup of intoxication (Isa. 51:17, 22; Zach. 12:2); "Cup of astonishment, desolation" (Ezek. 23:33); "Cup of fury" (Isa. 51:17-22); "Cup of indignation" (Rev. 14:10).

CUPBEARER (Heb. mashqeh, one giving drink), a palace official who served wine at a king's table. Cupbearers were men of confidence and trust. They are mentioned in Genesis 40:1ff; I Kings 10:5; II Chronicles 9:4; Nehemiah 1:11.

CURSE (Heb. 'ālāh, me'ērâh, qelālâh; Gr. katápa), the reverse of "to bless." On the human level, to wish harm or catastrophe. On the divine, to impose judgment. In the oriental mind the curse carried with it its own power of execution. A curse was imposed upon the serpent (Gen. 3:14). Noah cursed Ham (Gen. 9:25). The curse of Balaam, the pseudo-prophet, turned to a blessing. (Num. 24:10). A curse was placed upon Mount Ebal for disobedience to the law of Moses (Deut. 27:1-9). The cursing of one's parents is sternly prohibited by Mosaic regulations. Christ commanded those who would be His disciples to bless and curse not (Luke 6:28). When Peter, at Christ's trial, denied that he knew Him, he invited a curse upon himself (Matt. 26:74). This passage is often misunderstood by Western readers. Paul represents the curse of the law as borne by Christ upon the cross for the believer (Gal. 3:13). The modern Western practice of cursing, i.e., using profane language, is never referred to in the Scriptures. See BLASPHEMY.

CURTAINS (Heb. yerî'âh). 1. The curtains of fine linen and goats' hair which covered the tabernacle (Exod. 26:1ff; 38:9ff). Gradually, the "curtains" gave their name to the entire structure.

2. Employed figuratively by Isaiah (40:22), referring to the heavens. He uses the word dōq, lit. "gauze."

CUSH (kūsh, Heb. kûsh). 1. The oldest son of Ham, one of the three sons of Noah. (Gen. 10:6-8, I Chron. 1:8-10). Among the descendants were Seba, Havilah, Sabta, Raamah, and Sabtecha. They were mostly located in Arabia. Nimrod is likewise said to be the son of Cush, but the word "son" probably means "descendant."

2. "Cush, the Benjamite," the title for Psalm 7, viewed as referring to King Saul, the Benjamite. Since Cush and Kish are similar in sound, they are held to be one. Saul's father's name was Kish.

3. Cush, the country. The name of the territory through which the Gihon flowed (Gen. 2:13), translated Ethiopia by KJV, but in view of the distance of Ethiopia in relation to the Red Sea, the site is probably in SE Babylon or Chaldea. The wife of Moses is referred to as a Cushite, making her a target of criticism by Miriam and Aaron (Num. 12:1). If this be Zipporah, the wife of Moses, mentioned earlier, her origin was that of the land of Midian. The earlier passages seem to indicate Cush as African, the latter as Asian. The precise identification of either the woman or the country constitutes an unsolved problem.

CUSHI (kū'shī), a member of the Cushite people. 1. The man sent by Joab to inform David that Absalom's rebellion was quelled and that the time was ripe for him to return to his throne. (II Sam. 18:21-32).

2. A contemporary of Jeremiah, the great-grandfather of Jehudi (Jer. 36:14).

3. The father of the Prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

CUSTOM, when not referring to a tax, usually means "manner," "way," or "statute" (Gen. 31:35; Judg. 11:39; Jer. 32:11). Heathen religious practice is referred to in Leviticus 18:30 and Jeremiah 10:3. In the NT it means "manner," "usage" (Luke 1:9; Acts 6:14) and "religious practices."

CUSTOM, RECEIPT OF (RV "place of toll"), from which Matthew (Levi) was called to follow Christ (Matt. 9:9). In post-exilic days the tribute was usually in terms of a road toll. The Romans imposed tribute or tax upon the Jews as upon all their subjects for the maintenance of their provincial government. Tax collectors or publicans were despised because of their notorious dishonesty and willingness to work for a foreign power.

CUTHA or CUTH (kū'thà, kŭth), the longer form preferable, one of the cities from which Sargon, king of Assyria, brought immigrants to repopulate the area of Samaria which he had sacked in 720 B.C. (II Kings 17:24-30). Because of their numerical predominance, the inhabitants of Samaria were henceforth referred to as Cutheans. As a result of mixture, a synthesis between Mosaism and heathenism arose. This is one of the explanations for the deep antipathy existing between the Jews and the Samaritans down into the days of the NT (John 4:9). The ruins and temples of Cutha. From the contract tablets found by Rassam at Tel-Ibrahim it now appears that the ancient name of Cutha was Gudua or Kuta. This city of high culture and commerce lay NE of Babylon and was one of its most important centers. Rassam describes its almost perfect ruins as being about 3,000 feet in circumference and 280 feet high. In it was a sanctuary dedicated to Ibrahim (Abraham). Both city and its great temple, the latter dedicated to Nergal, appear to date back to Sumerian times.

CUTTINGS (cuttings in the flesh), a heathen practice, usually done in mourning for the dead, which was forbidden to the children of Israel (Lev. 19:28). This cruel practice, extending from the cutting of the hair or beard to self-mutilation, was widespread among the heathen nations. Homer refers to it in the Iliad where, in place of human sacrifice, the people cut themselves in mourning for the deceased Achilles. Besides being indicative of excessive grief, these cuttings were supposed to propitiate the idols of the heathen. They included tattooings, gashes, castrations, etc. In Elijah's day, the priests of Baal cut themselves till the blood ran in a vain attempt to make Baal answer (I Kings 18:28). Tattooing as a mark of allegiance to a deity, or as soldiers to their commander was also explicitly forbidden (Lev. 19:28). This practice was forbidden on humanitarian grounds and because most of it was performed as a religious rite to some local heathen deity. Solon forbade the women of Athens of his day to beat themselves till the blood ran. The holiness code of Israel reads, "Ye are the children of the Lord your God: ye shall not cut yourselves" (Deut. 14:1). The LXX adds the phrase, "in your flesh for the dead." The only cutting in the flesh allowed in Israel is that of circumcision at the command of God (Gen. 21:4). J.F.G.

CYLINDER SEALS, a cylindrical disc measuring from 1½ to 3 inches long — sometimes made of terra cotta, other times of precious stones. On it were printed for publication insignia of different descriptions.

CYPRESS (see Plants)

CYPRUS (sī'prŭs, Gr. kúpros, "copper"), an island in the eastern part of the Mediterranean directly off the coast of Syria and Cilicia, 148 miles long and about 40 miles across. In mythology, it is famous as the birthplace of Zeus. Historically, its roots are deep in the past. The OT refers to it as the "Isles of Chittim" (Kittim, RSV, Ezek. 27:6).

The island is rich in copper deposits, hence, its name. In the pre-Christian era, a large colony of Jews settled there, who later formed the nucleus of the Christian church ministered to by Paul and company. During the Roman rule, the Jews were expelled from Cyprus in the days of Hadrian.

Barnabas, who accompanied Paul on his first missionary journey, was a native of the island (Acts 4:36), and with John Mark returned to evangelize Cyprus after they had left Paul's company (Acts 15:36-39). The Apostolic party passed through the island from Salamis to Paphos. At Paphos, Sergius Paulus, the imperial deputy of the island believed in Christ (Acts 13:12).

Cyprus has known various conquerors, in addition to the Assyrians who had been attracted by its rich resources. The Egyptians, the Hittites, the Phoenicians, the Greeks, Romans, Turks, and British have all taken advantage of its attractive character.

The aboriginal inhabitants of Cyprus seem to have been of Minoan stock. After the breakup of the Minoan civilization, the dark ages settled down upon the island. The curtain rose again when Hellenistic settlers from the Greek mainland reached it. Sargon in 709 B.C., made himself ruler of Cyprus and it paid tribute to Assyria until the days of Esarhaddon. The demise of the Assyrian Empire appears to have brought it relative freedom, until it was annexed to Egypt in 540 B.C. With the rise of Cambyses (526 B.C.), Cyprus passed under Persian rule until the time of Alexander the Great, to whom it surrendered voluntarily and helped with the siege of Tyre. During the late inter-testamental period it fell into the hands of the Romans (cf. I Macc. 10:13). A number of the ill-famed guard of Antiochus Epiphanes were Cypriots. In 58 B.C. Cyprus was accorded provincial status by the Romans. In 22 B.C. it was made the direct charge of the Senate. Roman coins of this particular period are rather numerous.

It was at Paphos in Cyprus that Elymas, the sorcerer, attempted to dissuade the deputy from becoming a Christian, and was punished by being deprived of his sight (Acts 3:11). J.F.G.

CYRENE, CYRENIAN (sīrē'nī, Gr. Kyréne, wall), a Libyan city in N. Africa, W of Egypt from which it was separated by a part of the Libyan Desert. It was situated some 2,000 feet above the Mediterranean from which it was ten miles distant. The coastline afforded a natural shelter from the heat of the Sahara. It is protected by steps of descending ranges about 80 miles to the S. The fertility and climate of the city are delightful and productive.

Cyrene, originally a Greek colony, was founded by Battus in 603 B.C. This veritable "oasis in the desert" attracted travelers and commerce from early times. Among its distinguished citizens was Carneacles, the founder of the new Academy at Athens. Aristippus, the Epicurean philosopher and friend of Socrates, also came from this city. Ptolemy Euregetes I incorporated Cyrene as a part of Egypt in 231 B.C. It later passed into the hands of the Romans, being willed to them by the last Ptolemy.

Cyrene is not mentioned in the OT but becomes important in the NT. A native of Cyrene, Simon by name, was impressed by the Roman soldiers into carrying the cross of Jesus (Luke 23:26). Thus Simon immortalized his city. There were also representatives of this city present in Jerusalem upon the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:10). Its Jewish population warranted a synagogue (Acts 6:9). Lucius of Cyrene receives mention in Acts 11:19, 20. Archaeology has shown that it was the Greek plan to make Cyrene the "Athens of Africa." The most interesting remains are a great system of tombs cut out of solid rock into the cliff. Architecture and paintings adorn these tombs.

CYRENIUS (sī-rē'nĭ-ŭs, KJV, better Quirinius, RV), mentioned but once in the NT (Luke 2:2). (See Quirinius)

CYRUS (sī'rŭs, Heb. Kôresh), the son of Cambyses, king of Anshan. With the rise of Cyrus began the renowned Persian Empire which was to continue until the coming of Alexander the Great. Seven years subsequent to the demise of Nebuchadnezzar, Nabonidus ascended the throne of Babylon, in 555 B.C. He was destined to be the last ruling sovereign of the neo-Babylonian Empire, for in the highlands of Iran another kingdom was forging out of its own program of conquest. With the defeat of the Medes, when Astyages, king of the Medes, was vanquished by Cyrus, the realm of Persia commenced to assume threatening proportions. Cyrus himself announced his genealogy: "I am Cyrus, king of the hosts, the great king, king of Babylon, king of Sumer and Akkad . . . son of Cambyses, the king, king of Anshan; the grandson of Cyrus . . . the great-grandson of Teispes . . . king of Anshan . . ." In this same inscription, Cyrus proceeds to relate how the city of Babylon opened its gates to him without resistance, thus confirming the Biblical account recorded in Daniel 5 when Darius, acting as vice-regent for Cyrus, took the city of Babylon in the name of Cyrus the Great. The neo-Babylonian empire was in no condition to resist the advance of Cyrus, and fell easy prey into the hands of the Persians. The OT sets the framework of reference against the backdrop of Belshazzar's impious feast (Daniel 5:1-30).

Cyrus entered Babylon on October 29, 539 B.C. and presented himself in the role of the liberator of the people. He allowed the images of the gods to be transported back to their original cities, and instituted a kindly policy of repatriation for captive peoples. His policies of moderation naturally extended to the Hebrews, whom he encouraged to return to Judea to rebuild their temple (II Chron. 36:22, 23; Ezra 1:1-6; etc.). Isaiah refers to Cyrus as the "Anointed One" (Isa. 44:27, 28; 45:1-5). J.F.G.

DABAREH (dăb'ā-rĕ), erroneous spelling of Daberath (Josh. 21:28).

DABBASHETH (dăb'ā-shĕth), hill town of uncertain location, but adjoining the heritage of Zebulun (Josh. 19:10).

DABERATH (dăb'ĕ-răth), an ancient town near the western side of Mt. Tabor; part of the heritage of Issachar given to the Levites (Josh. 19:12; I Chron. 6:72). A strategic location, the probable site of the defeat of Sisera by Barak. (Judg. 4:14-22).

DAGON (dā'gŏn, Heb. dāghôn, probably fish), chief god of the Philistines. Originally worshiped by Canaanites before Philistine invasion of Canaan, as indicated by place names such as Bethdagon in Judah (Josh. 15:41), and in Asher (Josh. 19:27). Either a fish god or the god of agriculture, from Dag, "fish," or Dagan, "grain." On a wall of a palace in Babylon he is shown as half fish. That he was god of agriculture is supported by the tribute which priests and diviners bade the rulers to send when the ark was returned to Israel. Five golden mice and five golden emerods (tumors, ASV) were votive offerings expressing gratitude for Dagon's freeing their fields of mice and their bodies of tumors. Saul's head was placed in a temple of Dagon (I Chron. 10:10). Samson destroyed the temple of Dagon in Gaza (Judg. 16:30). J.D.F.

DALAIAH (dăl'ā-ī'à). 1. Descendant of David (I Chron. 3:1-24).

2. A priest of Aaron's line (I Chron. 24:18).

3. A prince who pleaded with King Jehoiakim not to destroy the roll containing the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:12,25).

4. The founder of a post-exilic family whose genealogy was lost (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).

5. The father of Shemaiah (Nah. 6:10).

DALE, THE KINGS. 1. Where Abram met Melchizedek (Gen. 14:17).

2. Absalom's memorial (II Sam. 18:18).

DALMANUTHA (dăl-mà-nū'thà), a village on the W coast of the Sea of Galilee, adjoining Magdala (Matt. 15:39). Landing place of Jesus after feeding the multitude (Mark 8:10). It is mentioned only in the NT. Considerable ruins near modern Mejdel (Magdala) are considered the location.

DALMATIA (dăl-mā'shà, Gr. Dalmatía, deceitful), a mountainous province on the E shore of the Adriatic Sea. Christianity, implanted under Titus, (II Tim. 4:10), continues until today. It was ruled by Rome as early as 160 A.D. Paul may have visited in the province (Rom. 15:19); in his time it was regarded as part of Illyricum.

DALPHON (dăl'fŏn), one of Haman's sons who were slain and hanged after Esther became queen (Esth. 9:6-13).

DAMARIS (dăm'à-rĭs, Gr. dámaris), a convert of Paul at Mars Hill (Acts 17:34).

nation after nation went to war, a city whose boast for centuries has been, "The world began at Damascus, and the world will end there." It is a modern focal point between the Christian and the Mohammedan worlds, center of tourist interest and of international unrest.

It was founded some 2,200 years before Christ by Uz, a grandson of Shem (Josh. 1:6; 4). It is the capital of Syria, a small region of unique geological formation, lying between Mt. Hermon and the Syrian Desert. It is watered by the Barada and the Wady Awaj, Abana and Pharpar of the OT (II Kings 5:12). A 2,000 foot elevation gives it a delightful climate. Its gardens and olive groves still flourish after millennia of cultivation. By the time of Abraham it was well-enough known to be a landmark (Gen. 14:15). Caravan routes from the E, W, and S crossed in the city, carrying treasures of silks, perfumes, carpets, and foods.

Damascus and Syria played an important part in Biblical history. En route from Ur, Abraham found in Syria a steward, Eliezer, who was his heir presumptive until Isaac came (Gen. 15:2,3). From the days when Abram liberated Lot (Gen. 14:13-16), there were repeated periods of peace and war among his descendants, many of them involving Damascus. Abraham secured a wife for Isaac from Syria, hence Israel is of Syrian ancestry (Gen. 24; Deut. 26:5). Jacob labored long in Syria for Rachel (Gen. 29). Damascus was once a rich city whose fairs were far-famed (Ezek. 27:16). According to Josephus, Hadad was the first king (Ant. VII:5; 2). David subjugated and ruled the city for a season (II Sam. 8:5,6; I Chron. 18:3-6). Rezon, a deserter, slew King Hadadezer whom David had defeated, and made himself king. He hated Israel and harassed Solomon "during all the days of his life" (I Kings 11:23-25). Solomon had made extensive purchases from Syria (I Kings 10:29). Asa, king of Judah, bribed Ben-hadad, grandson of Rezon of Syria, to aid him against Israel, paying him with temple treasures (I Kings 15:16-21). Elijah, acting upon instructions from God, anointed Hazael to be king of Syria and Jehu to rule Israel, to the end that Judah might be punished (I Kings 19:15-17). Elah succeeded Baasha in Israel (I Kings 16:6) and while drunk was slain by Zimri who usurped the throne and destroyed the house of Baasha (I Kings 16:10-14). Zimri killed himself (I Kings 16:18); his son Omri succeeded him, and was followed by Ahab (I Kings 16:29). Ben-hadad attacked Ahab with a great force, but during a drunken orgy was overwhelmed. Ahab foolishly allowed him to return to his throne (I Kings 20:1-34). Later, becoming ill, he sent Hazael to consult Elisha who made a prophecy that led Hazael to assassinate Ben-hadad and usurp the throne for which Elijah had anointed him (I Kings 19:15; II Kings 8:7-15). Hazael overcame Ahaziah and Joram (II Kings 8:28), ravaged Reuben and Manasseh, and Israel (II Kings 10:32-33; 13:3).

A strong kingdom was developed under Ahab, with merchants in Samaria (I Kings 20:34). Syrians defeated Joash after he failed in a test before Elisha (II Kings 13:14-22). Ben-hadad II succeeded Hazael, and Israel recovered her lost possessions (II Kings 13:24,25). Under Jeroboam Damascus was retaken by Israel (II Kings 14:28). Ahaz, in order to save his kingdom from Syria, made an alliance with Tiglath-Pileser (Pul) who destroyed Damascus and ended Syria's power for many decades (II Kings 16:7-9). The city remained of little importance until 333 B.C. when an army of Alexander the Great captured it. Then followed two centuries of rise and fall. In 63 B.C. Syria became a province of the Roman Empire (Jos. Wars I:6;2).

During New Testament days Damascus was an important center, ruled by Arabia under Aretas (II Cor. 11:32). A strong Christian community had developed by Paul's day. While en route there to arrest the believers, Saul was converted (Acts 9:1-18). He escaped his Jewish enemies of the city by being let down from a wall in a basket (Acts 9:25; II Cor. 11:33). After a checkered history under Rome, Damascus was captured by Moslems in 635 A.D. and made the seat of the Mohammedan world. It remained the center of the Moslem faith until 1918 when it was put under French mandate after World War I. In 1946 it became a free state. J.D.F.

DAMNATION (Heb. rasha, to hold guilty, Deut. 25:1; Isa. 50:9; 54:17, etc.; Gr. krino, to put under condemnation, John 3:17,18; Rom. 14:22; katakrino, to hold to be unpardonable, Matt. 12:41; 20:18; Rom. 8:1,3,34; Heb. 11:7; krima and krisis, judgment, eternal punishment, Matt. 23:33; Mark 12:40; John 5:29; Rom. 3:8; 5:16; 13:2; I Cor. 11:29,34; apoleia, destruction, damnation, II Pet. 2:3). The penalty for unbelief (II Thess. 2:12); for adulterous relations (I Tim. 5:11,12); for hypocrisy (Matt. 23:14); for treason (Rom. 13: 2). When referring to the future, the words mean primarily eternal separation from God with accompanying awful punishment (see Ps. 88:10-12; Isa. 38:18); being cast into Gehenna (Matt. 5: 29; 10:28; 23:33; 24:51; Mark 9:43, etc.). The severity of the punishment is determined by the degree of sin (Luke 12:36-48), and it is eternal (Mark 3:29; II Thess. 1:9; Isa. 66:24; Jude 6,7). J.D.F.

DAN (CITY), northernmost city of Palestine. Originally Leshem (Josh. 19:47; Judg. 18:29). Captured by Danites and renamed Dan (Judg. 18). It was a commercial center at one time (Ezek. 27: 19). Here Jeroboam I set up the golden calf (I Kings 12). The city marked the northern limit of Israel in the common phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" (Judg. 20:1; I Sam. 3:20, etc.).

DAN (TRIBE OF), the tribe to which Dan the fifth son of Jacob gave origin, and, the territory allotted it in Canaan. One son is mentioned among those who migrated to Egypt (Gen. 46:8,23). By the time of the Exodus his offspring had increased to a total of 62,700 men (Num. 1:39). The tribe acted as rear guard during the Exodus (Num. 10:25). They were given a fertile area lying between Judah and the Mediterranean Sea, occupied by the Philistines whose lands extended from Egypt to the coast W of Shechem (Josh. 13:3). Failure to conquer Philistia made the Danites move northward where, by a bit of strategy, they conquered Leshem (Laish of Judg. 18:29), and renamed it Dan (Josh. 19:47; Judg. 18:1-29).

The heritage of Dan, though small, was productive and, with the acquisition of extra lands, provided for growth. Aholiab and Samson were Danites (Exod. 31:6; Judg. 13:2, 24). Jeroboam, Solomon's servant, set up a golden calf in Dan and put high places throughout Israel (I Kings 12:25-33). Menahem stayed Pul (Tiglath-Pileser) by bribery (II Kings 15:14-20), but eventually Pul returned, overran Israel and took many Danites into captivity (I Chron. 5:26). Little is known of the tribe from that time. J.D.F.

DANCING has formed a part of religious rites and has been associated with war and hunting, with marriage, birth, and other occasions since the records of man began to be written. It grew out of three basic human reactions: 1, the desire to imitate movements of beasts, birds, even the sun and moon; 2, the desire to express emotions by gestures; 3, gregarious impulses.

Throughout past ages dancing has been associated with worship. Closely related to religious praises was the sacramental dance in which worshipers sought to express through bodily movements praise or penitence, worship or prayer. Out of the primitive dances the esthetic dance of civilized ancient nations slowly developed. In these the primary concern of the dancers was to reveal grace, speed, and rhythm, often to appeal to the carnal nature of both participants and spectators. Vashti refused to expose herself to this end (Esth. 1:12). Priests of all pagan religions cultivated dancing, but at times found it the source of dissipation and harm. For ages it has been accompanied by clapping of the hands. Percussion and other noise-making instruments seem to be native to the dance (Judg. 11:34; Ps. 68:25).

The Hebrew people developed their own type of dancing, associated in the main with worship. Basically, it was more like modern religious shouting by individuals, or processions of exuberant groups. Three things characterized it: 1, the sexes never intermingled in it, except where pagan influences had crept in (cf. Exod. 32:19); 2, usually dancing was done by women, with one leading, as in the case of Miriam (Exod. 15:20,21). In this incident, as well as on other occasions, a form of antiphonal singing was used. 3. Dancing usually took place out of doors. For women dancers, see Exodus 15:20; Judges 21:19ff; I Samuel 18:6; Psalm 68:25. Men danced solo, as in the case of David before the Ark (II Sam. 6:14-16), and in groups, as when Israel celebrated the victory over the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:16). The time for dancing was recognized by the writer of Ecclesiastes (3:4). Job complained against the rich because of their ability to dance (Job 21:11). Jeremiah bemoaned the tragedy that made singing and dancing out of place (Lam. 5:15). The redemption of Israel was to be celebrated by dancing, both virgins, and men and boys having part (Jer. 31:13). The Romans introduced the Greek dance to Palestine. Primitive Christian churches allowed the dance, but it soon caused degeneracy and was banned, as is indicated by many of the early Christian writers. J.D.F.

DANIEL (dănyĕl, Heb. dānîyē'l or dānī'ēl, God is my judge). 1. David's second son (I Chron. 3: 1;—Chileab, II Sam. 3:3).

2. A post-exilic priest (Ezra 8:2; Neh. 10:6).

3. The exilic seer of the book of Daniel. The prophet was born into an unidentified family of Judean nobility at the time of Josiah's reformation (621 B.C.); for he was among the select, youthful hostages of the first Jewish deportation, taken to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B.C.; the third year of king Jehoiakim (Dan. 1:1,3). The reliability of this date and, indeed, of the whole account has been consistently attacked by hostile criticism. Daniel's dating, however, simply follows the customary Babylonian practice of numbering the years of a king's reign after his accession-year (contrast Jer. 46:2 which speaks of this date as Jehoiakim's fourth year). The publication, moreover, of D. J. Wiseman's Nebuchadnezzar tablets demonstrates that after the Babylonian defeat of Egypt at Carchemish in 605 B.C. Nebuchadnezzar did "conquer the whole area of Hatti" (Syria and Palestine) and "take away the heavy tribute of Hatti to Babylon" (Chronicles of Chaldean Kings (626-556 B.C., London: Trustees of the British Museum, 1956, pp. 26,29), just as claimed in Daniel 1:2 (cf. II Chron. 36:6-7 and J. B. Payne, "The Uneasy Conscience of Modern Liberal Exegesis," Bulletin of the Evangelical Theological Society, I:1 (Winter, 1958), pp. 14-18).

For three years Daniel was trained in all the wisdom of the Chaldeans (Dan. 1:4-5) and was assigned the Babylonian name Belteshazzar, "Protect his life!", thereby invoking a pagan deity (4:8). Daniel and his companions, however, remained true to their ancestral faith, courteously refusing "the king's dainties" (1:8, tainted with idolatry and contrary to the Levitical purity-laws). God rewarded them with unsurpassed learning (1:20), qualifying them as official "wise-men" (cf. 2:13). Upon Daniel, moreover, He bestowed the gift of visions and of interpreting dreams (1:17; cf. Daniel's wisdom in the Apocryphal stories of Susanna and Bel and the Dragon).

Near the close of his second year (602 B.C.) Nebuchadnezzar required his fellow-Chaldeans, who as the ruling strata in society had assumed the position of priestly diviners (2:2; cf. Herodotus, I:191), to identify and interpret an undisclosed dream that had troubled him the preceding evening (2:5,8, ASVmg). The hoax of spiritism and astrology was duly exposed, but when judgment was pronounced upon the enchanters Daniel and his companions were included under the death-sentence. But the "God in heaven that revealeth secrets" (2:28, cf. 2:11) answered Daniel's prayer for illumination (2:18-19). Daniel revealed both the dream, depicting a fourfold image, and its import of four world empires (Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome) that should introduce God's Messianic kingdom (2:44; see DANIEL, BOOK OF). Nebuchadnezzar forthwith elevated him to be chief over the wise-men (2:48 does not, however, state that he became a pagan priest, as inferred by those who would discredit Daniel's historicity). He further offered him the governorship of the province of Babylon, though Daniel committed this latter appointment to his three friends (2:49; see SHADRACH, FURNACE).

In the latter years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (604-562 B.C.), Daniel's courage was demonstrated (4:19, cf. 4:7) when he interpreted the king's dream of the fallen tree. Tactfully informing his despotic master that for seven "times" (months? cf. 4:33) pride would reduce him to beast-like madness, he reiterated "that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men" (4:24-25; cf. its historical fulfillment twelve months later, 4:28-33).

In 552 B.C., after the retirement of king Nabonidus to Arabian Teima and the accession of his son Belshazzar to the royal dignity (ICC, p. 67), Daniel was granted his vision of the four great beasts (Dan. 7), which parallels Nebuchadnezzar's earlier dream of the composite image.

Then in 550, at the time of Cyrus' amalgamation of the Median and Persian states and of the growing eclipse of Babylon, Daniel received the prophecy of the ram and the he-goat, concerning Persia and Greece (8:20-21) down to Antiochus IV (8:25). On Oct. 12, 539 B.C., Cyrus' general Gobryas, after having routed the Chaldean armies, occupied the city of Babylon. During the profane revelries of Belshazzar's court that immediately preceded the end, Daniel was summoned to interpret God's "handwriting on the wall"; and the prophet fearlessly condemned the desperate prince (5:22-23). He predicted Medo-Persian victory (v. 28), and that very night the citadel fell and Belshazzar was slain.

When Darius the Mede (presumably Gobryas, or another official of similar name, cf. John C. Whitcomb, Darius the Mede, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1959, pp. 17-24) was made king of Babylon by Cyrus (5:31; 9:1), he at once sought out Daniel as one of his three "presidents" (6:2; cf. Whitcomb, op. cit., p. 17, on the established historicity of such appointments), because of his excellency, and was considering him for the post of chief administrator (6:3). Daniel's jealous colleagues, failing to uncover valid charges of corruption (6:4), proceeded to contrive his downfall through a royal edict prohibiting for thirty days all prayers or petitions, save to Darius himself. Daniel was promptly apprehended in prayer to God; and Darius had no recourse but to cast him into a den of lions, as had been prescribed. God, however, intervened on behalf of His faithful servant (cf. 6:16) and shut the lions' mouths, though they subsequently devoured his accusers, when condemned to a similar fate. It was in this same first year of Darius, as the seventy years of Babylonian exile drew to a close, that the angel Gabriel answered Daniel's prayers and confessions with a revelation of the "seventy weeks" of years (490 yrs., Dan. 9:24-27), from the decree for rebuilding Jerusalem (under Ezra (?), 7:18,25; cf. 4:12-16) to the Messiah, His death, and the confirming of the Gospel to Israel (458 B.C. through A.D. 33). "So Daniel prospered into the reign of Cyrus the Persian" (Dan. 6:28; 1:21).

The last known event in the life of Daniel took place in the third year of Cyrus (536 B.C.), when he was granted an overpowering vision of the archangel Michael contending with the demonic powers of pagan society (10:10-11:1); of the course of world history, through the persecutions of Antiochus IV (11:2-39); and of the eschatological antichrist, the resurrections, and God's final judgment (11:40-12:4). The vision concluded with the assurance that though Daniel would come to his grave prior to these events he would yet receive his appointed reward in the consummation (12:13). Thus in his mid-eighties, after completing his inspired autobiography and apocalyptic oracles, he finished his honored course.

The historicity of Daniel the prophet is confirmed, both by the words of Christ (Matt. 24:15) and by references to his righteousness and wisdom, as witnessed by his prophetic contemporary Ezekiel (14:14,20 and 28:3, in 591 and 586 B.C., respectively), though modern critics have attempted to relate the latter passages to a mythological Daniel of Ugaritic legend. Those, however, who stand committed to the truth of Scripture, find in Daniel a timeless demonstration of separation from impurity, or courage against compromise, of efficaciousness in prayer, and of dedication to Him whose "kingdom is from generation to generation" (Dan. 4:34). J.B.P.

DANIEL, BOOK OF, although standing as the last of the major prophets in the English Bible, it appears in the Hebrew OT (which consists of "the law, prophets, and writings") as one of the "writings." For though Christ spoke of Daniel's function as prophetic (Matt. 24:15), his position was that of governmental official and inspired writer, rather than ministering prophet (cf. Acts 2:29-30).

The first half of the book (chapters 1-6) consists of six narratives on the life of Daniel and his friends: their education (605-602 B.C.), Daniel's revelation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream-image, the trial by fiery furnace, his prediction of Nebuchadnezzar's madness, his interpretation of the handwriting on the wall (539 B.C., the fall of Babylon), and his ordeal in the lions' den (see DANIEL, SHADRACH). The second half consists of four apocalyptic visions, predicting the course of world history. Their scope may be outlined as follows:

Daniel 7 envisions the rise of four beasts, explained as representing successive kings (kingdoms, 7:23). The description parallels that of the image in chap. 2. The first empire must therefore be contemporary Babylon (2:38); and the fourth, Rome, in which God's Messianic kingdom was set up (2:44). Between lie Persia and Greece. The vision further describes the disintegration of Rome into a tenfold balance of power (2:42; 7:24; Rev. 17:12,16), the eventual rise of antichrist for an indefinite period of "times" (Dan. 7:8,25), and his destruction when a "Son of man" comes with the clouds of heaven (7:13). This last figure symbolizes the saints of the Most High (7:22), epitomized in Jesus Christ, the "last Adam" (Mark 14:62; I Cor. 15:45). For though His kingdom was "set up" at His first coming, it will "consume [earth's pagan] kingdoms" at His glorious second advent (Dan. 2:44) and millennial reign ("a season," 7:12).

Chapters 2:4b-7:28 are composed in the international language of Aramaic. But with chapter 8, Daniel resumes his use of Hebrew, probably because of the more Jewish orientation of the remaining three visions. That of the ram and the he-goat depicts the coming victory of Greece (331 B.C.) over the amalgamated empire of Media and Persia (8:20-21) and the subsequent persecution of Judah by Antiochus IV (168-165 B.C., 8:9-14,23-26). Chapter 9, on the 70 weeks, then illuminates Christ's first coming, 69 "weeks" of years (= 483 yrs.) after the decree for Jerusalem's rebuilding, presumably to Ezra in 458 B.C. (Ezra 7:18,25; cf. his results, 4:12-16). With God-inspired accuracy, Daniel thus inaugurates the 70th week in A.D. 26, with the baptismal anointing of Christ (Dan. 9:25; Luke 3:21-22; 4:18). In the midst of this week the Anointed One is to be cut off (Dan. 9:26), thereby making reconciliation for iniquity (9:24) and causing Old Testament sacrifice to cease (9:27; see Matt. 27:51; Heb. 9:8-12). Yet for an additional three and one-half years, God's redemptive covenant will be confirmed to Israel (cf. Rev. 12:6,14), after which Jerusalem will be rendered desolate (A.D. 70, Dan. 9:26-27; Matt. 24:15). Other evangelical interpreters terminate the 69th week with Christ's death and commence the 70th week with a covenant of antichrist, before His second coming. Chaps 10-12, after elaborating on the succession of Persian and Greek rulers through Antiochus, then moves on to "the time of the end," foretelling Antichrist's tribulation (Dan. 11:40-12:1), the resurrections of the saved and the lost (12:2, cf. Rev. 20:4-6,12), and the final judgment (Dan. 12:2).

The authorship of the book of Daniel is nowhere expressly defined, but is indicated by the autobiographical, first-person composition from 7:2 onward. Unity of style and content (as admitted by Driver, Rowley, and Pfeiffer), plus God's commitment of "the book" to Daniel (Dan. 12:4), implies the latter's authorship, shortly after his last vision, in 536 B.C. (10:1).

Modern criticism, however, overwhelmingly denies the authenticity of Daniel as a product of the sixth century B.C. Indeed, as early as A.D. 275 the neo-Platonic philosopher Porphyry had categorically repudiated the possibility of Daniel's miraculous predictions. Anti-supernaturalism must bring the "prophecy" down to a time after the events described (especially after Antiochus' sacrilege of 168 B.C.); or, if the latest possible date has been reached, it must then reinterpret the predictions to apply to other, already-accomplished events. Consequently, since Daniel was extensively quoted (and misunderstood) as early as 140 B.C. (Sibylline Oracles 3:381-400), rationalists have no alternative but to apply the supposed coming of the Messiah and the fulfillment of the 70 weeks to Maccabean times, rather than Christ's, even though this requires "surmising a chronological miscalculation on the part of the writer" (ICC, p.393). Dating Daniel in the second century is thus the result, fundamentally, of presuppositions of skepticism and is opposed to the actual evidence and testimony: for it makes the book's record of itself a deception and a fraud; and Jesus Christ, who believed that "Daniel the prophet" did predict Roman imperialism (Matt. 24:15), it charges with falsehood based on ignorance.

The surface arguments of current negative criticism may be classified as historical, literary, and theological. A number of specific censures have been advanced against Daniel's historical authenticity. These may, however, be dismissed, either as arguments from silence or as answered by recent archaeology (see DANIEL). More generally, it is asserted that Daniel conceived of a fictitious Median empire, existing as a separate kingdom between Babylon and Persia (thus allowing Daniel's fourth empire to be identified with Greece rather than Rome, as required by liberalism's presuppositions). But the very passage adduced (5:31-6:1) speaks of unified Medo-Persia (6:8,12 cf. 5:28); and Daniel elsewhere identifies his second empire as the dual kingdom of Media and Persia (7:5, cf. 8:3,20) and his third, as the fourfold Greek (7:6, 8:8,22). Again, the fact that the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, written about 180, omits Daniel from its survey of Scripture proves little other than the Sadducaic prejudice of its writer; for he likewise disregards the book of Ezra, whose high theology parallels that of Daniel. Fragments of Daniel have, moreover, been discovered among the Dead Sea scrolls of Qumran, datable to the very second century B.C., in which the book's fraudulent composition is commonly claimed.

On literary grounds Daniel has been questioned because of its utilization of certain terms of Persian or Greek origin. The book itself, however, was not written until the Persian period; and its Greek words are limited to the names of musical instruments, as "psaltery" (3:5), that may early have been imported into Babylon. Among the apocryphal literature from Qumran, there has been recovered a "Prayer of Nabonidus" (RB 63:3 July, 1956), pp. 507-415) that closely parallels Daniel's record of Nebuchadnezzar's madness (Dan. 4). Far, however, from proving Daniel to be a corruption of this third century work, the Qumranic legend, though garbled, serves to suggest the essential historicity of Daniel's account. As to the so-called "late" Aramaic and Hebrew languages of Daniel, Edward J. Young has concluded that "There is nothing in them which in itself necessarily precludes authorship by Daniel in the sixth century B.C." (An Introduction to the Old Testament, rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1958, p. 392).

Lastly, the theology of Daniel, with its apocalyptic eschatology, Biblicism, and developed angelology, is said to prohibit exilic origin. Yet Isaiah had composed an apocalypse, describing the resurrection in terms similar to Daniel's, as early as 711 B.C. (Isa. 26:19 — negative critics deny its authenticity, too!); when Daniel in 538 B.C. devoted himself to the inspired "books" (Dan. 9:2), the Old Testament canon was complete, except for three minor prophets, the last two books of Psalms and Chronicles — Esther (see CANON); and Daniel's angels, both in name and in function, stand naturally in the Hebraic religious development. His book was designed to inspire Jewish exiles with confidence in the Most High (4:34-37), and those of God's people today who will approach this book in faith believing will discover therein victorious supernaturalism that overcomes the world. DAN-JAAN (dăn'jā'ăn), a town covered by David's census (II Sam. 24:6). Hebrew dān ya'an, "Dan played a pipe," indicates it was a suburb of Dan. It was on the road to Ijon or Sidon (I Kings 15:20; II Chron. 16:4).

DANNAH (dăn'à), a mountain town given by Caleb as part of the heritage of Judah (Josh. 15:49). Its location is uncertain but not far from Hebron. Some authorities make it modern Idnah.

DARA, DARDA (dăr'à, dàr'dà), a member of a noted family of wise men. He was either a son of Mahol (I Kings 4:31) or son of Zerah (I Chron. 2:6).

DARIC (dăr'ĭk), a Persian gold coin used in Palestine after the return from captivity (Ezra 2:69; Neh. 7:70-72 ASV). It was worth about $5.00. See MONEY.

DARIUS (dă-rī'ŭs, Heb. dāryāwesh, Gr. Dareios), a common name for Medo-Persian rulers. Numerous cuneiform tablets contain references to them, especially to Darius Hystaspes. Darius, the Mede, seems to have been the same as Gubaru who was an officer in the army of Cyrus, probably governor of a Persian province N of Babylon. His name is possibly a translation of "Darius." He was the son of Ahasuerus, hence a Mede (Dan. 9:1). Belshazzar's notable feast (Dan. 5) ended in the destruction of the Chaldean Empire, and Darius the Mede (Gubaru) became ruler of the province by appointment of Cyrus at the age of 62. Daniel tells us that Darius the Mede was not heir to the throne, but nevertheless was made king (Dan. 5:31). He seems to have exercised authority contemporaneously with Cyrus.

Cuneiform records list Nabonidus as the last king of the Medes; so Belshazzar, his son, was ruling in Babylon while his father was away at war. Darius reorganized the government and gave Daniel a high place (Dan. 6:1-3). Evil princes set out to destroy him (6:4-9). Jehovah rescued Daniel from the lions and thus advanced his cause before the king (6:10-23). Darius the Mede seems to have ruled for only a brief time (10:1; 11:1).

Darius Hystaspes was the greatest of the Persian rulers. Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, continued the conquests which his noted father had started. He did not, however, recognize the claims of the Jews (Jos. Ant. XI:1:2). In one of his campaigns he was defeated by the Egyptians, and on his way home committed suicide. Taking advantage of the king's defeat, a pretender named Smerdis was made king by zealots of the Magian religious sect and he ruled one year (Jos. XI:3;1), until slain by Darius and other princes, Darius having had himself made king. He was a collateral descendant of Cyrus who, according to tradition, had selected Darius to succeed him. Between the reign of Cyrus and that of Darius, the Jews had been mistreated, and work on rebuilding Jerusalem and the temple stopped (Ezra 4:1-6). An appeal was made to Darius who made search and discovered the original decree of Cyrus favoring the Jews. Under his lenient reign, they restored the walls of the city and rebuilt the temple (Ezra 6:1-15). Darius was beset by rebellious subjects and spent much time in putting these down. He reorganized the government and extended its boundaries. He conducted many magnificent building enterprises and encouraged men of letters, especially the historians who extolled his prowess (Josephus, Ant. XI:1:3). The Greeks never yielded to him, however, and after some futile campaigns, his forces were overwhelmed in the battle at Marathon 490 B. C. Darius planned another campaign against the Greeks, but rebellion in Egypt interfered, and death in 486 B. C. ended his career. He was succeeded by Xerxes, a grandson of Cyrus the Great.

Darius, the Persian (Neh. 12:22). There is uncertainty among scholars as to whether this was Darius Nothus or Darius Codomannus, but evidence favors the claim that he was the latter, whose kingdom was destroyed by Alexander the Great in 330 B. C. Following a disastrous defeat near Arbela the Persian Empire crumbled, Darius the Persian being its last king. J.D.F.

DARKNESS (Heb. hōshekh, the dark, Gr. skótos, darkness), used in the Old and the New Testaments both in a literal and in a figurative sense. For ages mankind has associated it with evil, danger, crime; it has also been the metaphor whereby mystery is described and the place of eternal punishment has been pictured. Several uses of the term are found in the Scriptures: 1. To denote the absence of light (Gen. 1:2,3; Isa. 45:7; Job 34:22).

2. To depict the mysterious (Exod. 20:21; I Kings 8:12; Ps. 97:2; Isa. 8:22; II Sam. 22:10; Matt. 10:27).

3. As ignorance, especially about God (Job 37:19; Prov. 2:13; Eccl. 2:14; John 12:35; I Thess. 5:1-8).

4. To describe the seat of evil (Prov. 4:19; Matt. 6:23; Luke 11:34; 22:53; John 8:12; Rom. 13:12; I Cor. 4:5; Eph. 5:11).

5. Presenting supernatural events (Gen. 15:12; Exod. 10:21; Matt. 27:45; Rev. 8:12; 16:10).

6. A sign of the Lord's return (Joel 2:2; Amos 5:8; Isa. 60:2; Matt. 24:29).

7. An agency of eternal punishment (Matt. 22:13; II Pet. 2:4,17; Jude 6,7; see also Job 2:1-5; 20:20).

8. It describes spiritual blindness (Isa. 9:2; John 1:5; I John 1:5; 2:8; Eph. 5:8), sorrow and distress (Isa. 8:22; 13:10; Ps. 23:4). It never holds sway where the Redeemer has come to shed His light (Col. 1:13).

DARKON (där'kŏn), a descendant of Solomon's servant, Jaala, who returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:56).

DATHAN (dā'thăn), a great-grandson of Reuben (Num. 16:1). He, with his brothers, Abiram and Korah, rebelled against Moses (Num. 16:1-15), for which sin they were swallowed by the earth (Num. 16:31-35; see also Num. 26).

DAUGHTER (dô'tĕr), is a word of various uses in the Bible. It refers to both persons and things, often without regard to kinship or sex. There is the familiar usage of child to parent (Gen. 6:1; 20:12; 24:23; Judg. 11:34; Matt. 15:28). Not prized as highly as sons they were sometimes sold into slavery (Exod. 21:7). The word is used to indicate a remoter relationship, as when Rebekah is called "my master's brother's daughter" (Gen. 24:48) although she was the speaker's granddaughter (Gen. 24:15,24). It often refers, to any female descendant, regardless of the nearness of relations (Luke 1:5). Jacob's sons called their sister a daughter (Gen. 34:13-17; see Ps. 45:13; 144:12). It represents women in general (Gen. 28:6; Num. 25:1). It was often used in the figurative sense, referring to offspring (Isa. 22:4; Jer. 9:1; Lam. 4:10); to those who worshiped the true God (Ps. 45:10; S. of Sol. 1:5; 3:11; Isa. 62:11; Zech. 9:9; Matt. 21:5; John 12:15). Physical means of making music, the mouth, ears, etc., were called daughters of music (Eccl. 12:4).

DAVID (dā'vĭd, Heb. Dāwîdh, beloved or, as in ancient Mari, chieftain,' BA 11 1948, p. 17), Israel's greatest king, described in I Samuel 16 through I Kings 2:11 (I Chron. 11-29), plus many of the Psalms, he ranks with Moses as one of the most commanding figures in the Old Testament.

David was born in 1040 B. C. (II Sam. 5:4), the youngest son of Jesse of Bethlehem (I Sam. 16:10-11), and developed in strength, courage, and attractiveness while caring for his father's sheep (16:12, 17:34-36). When God rejected Saul, the prophet Samuel sought out David and secretly anointed him as Israel's next king; and the youth became correspondingly filled with God's Spirit (16:13). Saul, meanwhile, summoned David to periodic appearances at court, to soothe his own demon-possessed mind by skillful harp-playing (16:18, 17:15). While still in his teens, David gained national renown and the friendship of Saul's son Jonathan (18:1-3; cf. 20:12-16, 23: 16-17) through his faith-inspired victory over the Philistine champion Goliath (17:45-47). Saul's growing jealousy and four insidious attempts on David's life served only to increase the latter's popularity (cf. 18:13-16,27). At length, urged on by David's rivals (cf. Ps. 59:12), Saul openly sought his destruction; and, though frustrated by Samuel and the priests at Nob, he did succeed in driving David into a life of outlawry (I Sam. 19: 11, 21:9).

David fled to Philistine Gath, but his motives became suspect. Only by a stratagem and by God's grace (I Sam. 21:12, Ps. 56:3, 34:6-8) did he reach the wilderness cave of Adullam in Judah (Ps. 142:6). Here David was joined by the priest Abiathar, who had escaped Saul's retaliatory attack upon Nob (cf. Ps. 52:1), and by a variety of malcontents [I Sam. 22:2]. On three separate occasions Saul attempted to seize David: when fellow-Judeans from Ziph betrayed his presence, after his deliverance of Keilah (I Sam. 23, Ps. 54: 3); at the cave of En-gedi by the Dead Sea, where Saul was caught in his own trap (I Sam. 24, Ps. 7: 4, 57:6); and upon David's return to Ziphite territory, when he again spared his pursuer's life (I Sam. 26). Near the end of 1012 B. C., however (27:7), David in despair sought asylum in Gath, feigning vassalage (27:8-12; 28).

Upon the destruction of Saul at Mt. Gilboa in 1010 B.C. and the Philistine domination of Israel from Beth-shan (cf. the demonstrated abandonment of Gibeah, Saul's capital, G. Ernest Wright, Biblical Archaeology, Philadelphia: Westminster, 1957, pp. 122-123), David composed his moving lament of "The Bow" (II Sam. 1:19-27), the authenticity of which is unquestionable (R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament, New York: Harper, 1941, p. 351). Shortly thereafter, David's forces advanced inland to Hebron, where he was declared king over Judah. His appeal, however, to the northern and eastern tribes elicited no response (II Sam. 2:7); and for five years most of Israel lay under Philistine control.

In 1005 B.C. Saul's general, Abner, enthroned Ish-bosheth, a son of the former monarch; but in the conflict that followed David's arms gained ascendancy. Abner himself eventually transferred his support to David, only to be treacherously slain by David's vengeful commander, Joab (II Sam. 3). But after the death of Ish-bosheth (II Sam. 4) all Israel acclaimed David king, 1003 B.C. (II Sam. 5:1-5; I Chron. 11:10, 12:38).

Realizing that their "vassal" had gotten out of hand, the Philistines undertook an all-out attack upon reunited Israel. David, however, after an initial retreat to Adullam (II Sam. 5:17, 23:13-17), expelled the enemy in two divinely-directed campaigns (5:18-25; cf. the archaeological confirmation of his reoccupation of Beth-shan, Wm. F. Albright, The Archaeology of Palestine and the Bible, New York: Revell, 1932, pp. 40-44). He next established a new capital by capturing the Jebusite stronghold of Jerusalem. This strategic site on the Benjamite border served not only as an incomparable fortress, vulnerable only to the "scaling hooks" of Joab (II Sam. 5:8; Merrill F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament, Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1954, pp. 206-208), but also as a neutral location between the rival tribes of N and S. David then constructed "Millo," a fortification (?) that "filled up" Jerusalem's breached northern wall (R. A. S. Macalister, A Century of Excavation in Palestine, New York: Revell, 1925, pp. 104-106). Actually, because of Maccabean demolitions on the hill Ophel (David's City of Zion), no ruins survive that may be assigned him with confidence, though Davidic fortifications have been uncovered at Debir and Bethshemesh. Joab, for his bravery was confirmed as commander (I Chron. 11:6). Under him were organized twelve corps of militia, each with 24,000 men, on periods of one-month duty annually (I Chron. 27). David's military organization also included the professional Cherethites and Pelethites (Cretans and Philistines) and certain elite groups: "the 600" mighty men (II Sam. 15:18; cf. I Sam. 27:2), "the 30" heroes, and "the 3" most distinguished (II Sam. 23; I Chron. 11).

David also elevated Jerusalem into his religious capital by installing Moses' ark of the covenant in a tent on Zion (Ps. 24; II Sam. 6; cf. Num. 4:15 on the death of Uzzah). He honored it, both with a dedicatory psalm (I Chron. 16, from Pss. 96, 105, 106) and with a permanent ministry of Levitical singers under Asaph (I Chron. 25; 16:5,37, 42). Once criticized as post-exilic fiction, these regular shārîm have been authenticated by even earlier Canaanitish parallels from Ugarit (Unger, op. cit., pp. 215-218; cf. BA 4 (1941), pp. 33-47). Eventually David organized 38,000 Levites under hereditary leaders, appointing them as doorkeepers, treasurers, or even district judges (I Chron. 23-26). The Aaronic priests he divided into 24 rotating courses, which were continued into NT times (I Chron. 24:10; Luke 1:5).

From 1002 to about 995 B.C., David expanded his kingdom on all sides: W against Philistia, taking Gath, one of its five ruling cities (II Sam. 8:1); E against Moab, (8:2); N against Syria, in two campaigns (10:13 and 18, cf. 8:3), to the Euphrates River; and S against stubborn Edom (I Kings 11:15; Ps. 60:10). An alliance with Hiram of Tyre enabled David to construct a palace in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:11). David's political organization shows analogies with Egypt's, his "cabinet" (8:15-18) including such officers as the recorder (public relations official), the scribe (secretary of state; Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins, 1953, p. 120), and other later additions (20:23-26). Over all, however, whether tribal princes (I Chron. 27:16-24) or royal officials (27:25-31), David reigned supreme.

Rest ensued (II Sam. 7:1; 22:1-51 = Ps. 18), and David proposed a permanent temple for Jehovah in Jerusalem. But while the Prophet Nathan denied David the privilege of building God's house (because of excessive bloodshed, I Chron. 22:8; 28:3), he revealed that God would build David's "house," raising up his son to construct the temple (II Sam. 7:13a) and establishing his dynasty (7:13b), to culminate in the incarnation of God's eternal Son (7:14). This "Davidic covenant" (Ps. 89:3; 132:12) mediates Christian salvation for all (Isa. 55:3; Rev. 22:16), climaxing God's promises, begun in Genesis 3:15 and accomplished in the new testament of Jesus Christ. God's Spirit then inspired David to compose Messianic psalms, depicting the deity of Jehovah's anointed Son (Ps. 2), His eternal priesthood (Ps. 110), His atoning death (Ps. 22), and His resurrection, ascension, and coming kingdom (Pss. 2, 16, 68). Some of David's greatest achievements lie in this literary sphere. Of the 150 canonical psalms, 73 possess titles asserting Davidic authorship. These references, moreover, appear in the oldest MSS and warrant full acceptance (Robert Dick Wilson, PTR 24 (1926), pp. 353-395). David also composed some of the titleless psalms (cf. Pss. 2, 95; Acts 4:25; Heb. 4:7); he stimulated Asaph and his associates to the inscripturation of others; and the king personally compiled the first book of the Psalter (Pss. 1-41; cf. his closing doxology in 41:13). One of the world's best loved compositions is David's heart-affirmation, "The Lord is my shepherd . . ." (Ps. 23).

Yet soon after this, David lapsed into a series of failures (Mephibosheth's appearance [II Sam. 9] could not have preceded 995 B.C. [9:12, 4:4], nor could Solomon's birth [12:24] have been long subsequent). He slew seven innocent descendants of Saul (but not Mephibosheth, 21:7) to enforce a promise rashly made to pagan Gibeonites (contrast Num. 35:33). He committed adultery with Bath-sheba and murdered her husband to conceal his crime (II Sam. 10-11). When exposed by Nathan, he humbly confessed his sin (the great penitential psalms 32 and 51); but the testimony of God's people had suffered compromise, and Nathan condemned the king to corresponding punishments (II Sam. 12:10-14). David also became guilty of ineffective control over his sons. Thus in about 990 B.C. Amnon, following his father's shameful example (13:1-14), raped his sister Tamar; and two years later Absalom avenged Tamar by murdering Amnon (13:23-29). Until about 983 B.C. (13:38; 14:28) David shunned Absalom's presence; and four years later (15:7 ASVmg) Absalom revolted, driving his father from Jerusalem (cf. Pss. 3, 63) and specifically fulfilling Nathan's curses (II Sam. 16:20-22). Through fatal delay, Absalom was defeated and slain by Joab, though only the latter's stern rebuke could shake David from irresponsible grief over the death of his son (18:33-19:8). Even after David's restoration to Jerusalem, inter-tribal jealousies led Sheba of Benjamin to prolong the disorder (II Sam. 20).

David's last years (975-970 B.C.) were occupied with Philistine wars (21:15-22) and with a military census, motivated by David's pride in his armed forces (24:3,9; Ps. 30:6). Plague resulted. But when the destroying angel halted at Araunah's threshing floor on Mt. Moriah, just N of Jerusalem

(II Chron. 3:1), this area became marked as David's place of sacrifice and the very house of God (I Chron. 22:1; Ps. 30 title). David subsequently undertook massive preparations for the temple (I Chron. 22); he received in writing from God's Spirit the plans for its construction (28:12, 19); and he solemnly charged Solomon and the princes with their execution (I Chron. 22, 28-29). As David became increasingly incapacitated by age, his oldest surviving son, Adonijah, attempted to usurp the throne from Solomon, the divinely designated heir. Nathan, however, aroused David to proclaim Solomon's coronation (I Kings 1). Thus in 970 B.C., after a final charge to his son (2:2-9), David died. His last words were a prophecy of the future Davidic Messiah and of his own salvation, springing from this covenant (II Sam. 23:5). J.B.P.

DAVID, CITY OF, a part of the Jerusalem plateau, 2500 feet above sea-level. This plateau is bounded on the E by the Kidron Valley and on the W and S by the Hinnom, which show a 500 ft. drop to their southeastern junction. It is connected on the N with the central ridge of Palestine and is bisected by a smaller valley, the Tyropoeon. Western Jerusalem, the "Upper City," is larger and higher and, since the fourth Christian century, has been designated (erroneously) the City of David. The eastern half, however, the peak of which is called Ophel or Zion (I Kings 8:1; II Chron. 33:14), possesses Jerusalem's chief water-supply (the Gihon spring, in the Kidron Valley) and marks the true City of David (II Chron. 32:30).

Mixed Canaanite settlement on Zion (Ezek. 16:3) dates back to the third millennium. The area occupied was small, about 1250 x 400 ft.; but a Jebusite wall, 27 feet in width, rendered the natural cliffs almost impregnable (cf. the "descent" noted in Neh. 3:15-16; 12:37). David, however, scaled the stronghold in 1003 B.C., made it his capitol, and called it and the surrounding town the "City of David" (II Sam. 5:9, 6:10; I Chron. 11:7). He is known to have constructed fortifications, palaces and other government houses, and a tent for God's ark (II Sam. 5:11; I Kings 3:1, 9:24; I Chron. 11:8, 15:1,29; II Chron. 8:11); but no certainly Davidic structures have been recovered. David and his successors were buried in the City of David (I Kings 2:10, 11:43; 15:8; II Chron. 16:14, 21:20, 24:16, etc.).

Solomon enlarged Jerusalem beyond the City of David to include Mt. Moriah, for the temple and other buildings, on the N (I Kings 8:1) and probably part of the western plateau opposite Ophel. In the eighth century, Hezekiah seems to have extended the City of David southward to include the new Pool of Siloam, for his water tunnel from Gihon (II Chron. 32:4-5,30; II Kings 20:20; Isa. 22:9-11). By the time of Josiah, 621 B.C., Jerusalem also included the mishneh or "second quarter," W of the temple (?) (Zeph. 1:10; II Kings 22:14); but it was the old City of David which the Greeks chose to fortify as their citadel during the Maccabean wars (I Macc. 1:33, 7:32). Simon reoccupied this "Lower City" in 139 B.C. (14:36-37). He partially leveled the ridge so that it should not rival Moriah to the north (Jos. Ant. XIII, vi,7), and the name Ophel (Ophlas) was shifted to the area between the old City and the temple. After A.D. 70 the original City of David was abandoned and now lies outside the walls of Jerusalem.

In Luke 2:11, the Christmas angels identified David's native town of Bethlehem as "the city of David." J.B.P.

DAY (Heb. yôm, Gr. heméra), a word often misinterpreted because of its various uses in the Bible. It often denotes time from sunrise to sunset (Gen. 1:5; Ps. 74:16). At an early date it was divided into three parts—morning, noon, and evening (Ps. 55:17; Dan. 6:10). Probably due to Medo-Persian influence after the Exile, it was divided into 12 hours (John 11:9). Early morning was the first hour; the sixth hour was noon. Time could not be determined by clocks, so the length of an hour depended upon the time of the year. The word also refers to time in general (Judg. 18:30; Obad. 12; Job 18:20). It is also used figuratively, referring to the day of judgment (Isa. 2:12; Joel 1:15; Amos 5:18; Rom. 13:12), the length of life (Gen. 5:4), the time of opportunity (John 9:4), and any time (Prov. 12:16 ASV, note 3). J.D.F.

DAY OF ATONEMENT (Heb. yōm hakkipūrîm), the annual day of atonement when the high priest offered sacrifices for the sins of the nation (Lev. 23:27; 25:9). It was the only fast period required by Mosaic law (Lev. 16:29; 23:31). It came in August and was preceded by special sabbaths (Lev. 23:24). Instituted in recognition of man's inability to offer full atonement for his sins (Heb. 10:1-10), it was a day of great solemnity and strictest conformity to the law. The elaborate ritual, given in Leviticus 16, was as follows: 1. The high priest sanctified himself by a ceremonial bath and putting on white garments (v. 4). 2. He made atonement for himself and the other priests by sacrificing a bullock (Num. 29:8). 3. A goat was chosen by lot for a sin offering and sacrificed before the congregation (Lev. 16:8,9); blood from the bullock first and then the goat, was sprinkled on and about the mercy seat after the Holy of Holies had been sanctified by incense (vv. 12,14,15); a scapegoat was sent into the wilderness, the anti-type of the promised "Sin-bearer" (vv. 20-22); the high priest changed his garments, after a second ceremonial bath, and made the final offering (vv. 23-28).

DAY OF CHRIST, a term used in the NT to indicate the redemptive ministry of Jesus, both while in the flesh and upon His return. Sometimes it is called "that day" (Matt. 7:22) and "the day" (I Cor. 3:13). It refers to the return of Jesus for his own and for the judgment of unbelievers (I Cor. 1:8; 5:5; II Cor. 1:14; Phil. 1:6,10; 2:16; II Thess. 2:2,3). It is for the completion of the redemptive work (II Thess. 2:1,13). It is the day of triumph (Phil. 2:9-11). Paul's epistles, especially, are suffused with the longing for the day of Christ when He will manifest Himself in glory and establish His kingdom.

DAY OF THE LORD, an eschatological term referring to the consummation of God's kingdom and triumph over His foes and deliverance of His people. It begins at the second coming and will include the final judgment. It will remove class distinction (Isa. 2:12-21), abolish sins (II Pet. 3:11-13) and will be accompanied by social calamities and physical cataclysms (Matt. 24; Luke 21:7-33). It will include the millennial judgment (Rev. 4:1-19:6) and culminate in the new heaven and the new earth (Isa. 65:17; 66:22; Rev. 21:1).

DAYSMAN (dāz'măn, Heb. yākhah, to act as umpire), a mediator or arbitrator—one who has set a day for hearing a dispute. As used in Job 9:33, the word means an umpire or referee who hears two parties in a dispute and decides the merits of the case. In eastern lands it was the custom for the judge to put his hands upon the heads of the two parties in disagreement to show his authority and desire to render an unbiased verdict. Job means that no human being is worthy of acting as a judge of God.

DAYSPRING (dā'sprĭng, Heb. shahar, to break forth), a poetic name for dawn (Job 38:12). It describes the advent of Messiah (Luke 1:78).

DAYSTAR (Gr. phosphóros, light-giving), the planet Venus, seen as a morning star, heralding the dawn. The prophet compared the splendor of the king of Babylon to Lucifer, son of the morning (Isa. 14:12; in RV daystar). Jesus calls Himself "the bright and morning star" (Rev. 22:16). In II Peter 1:19 the word daystar is applied to Christ.

DEACON, DEACONESS (dē'kŭn, dē'kŭn-ĕs, Gr. diákonos, servant). Paul called himself a deacon (I Cor. 3:5; Eph. 3:7). Jesus was declared to be a deacon of the circumcision (Rom. 15:8). He said, "If anyone will serve me" (Emoí tis diakoné) . . . "where I am, there shall also my servant (diákonos) be" (John 12:26). Household servants were diakónoi (Matt. 22:13). Paul told Timothy how to be a good diákonos (I Tim. 4:6). The diaconate, as a church office, is based by inference upon Acts 6:1-8, but at least two of the seven men were evangelists. Ignatius, a contemporary of the Apostle John, declared that the deacons were not mere servers of meat and drink. But they did serve (diakonein) tables, so that the apostles could give themselves to the ministry (diakonía) of the Word. Their successors came to be recognized as church officers. Qualifications given in I Timothy 3 show that they were not considered ordinary lay members of the church. Paul's mention of deacons in connection with bishops (Phil. 1:1) supports the view. Clement of Rome based the office upon the two classes of synagogue workers given in Isaiah (60:17,LXX translation) where pastors and helpers are named. Deaconess is from the same Greek word. Phebe was named by Paul as a deaconess (Rom. 16:1). Certain women ministered (diekónoun) unto Jesus (Luke 8:2,3). It does not appear from the Scripture or early church literature that deaconesses were ever church officers. J.D.F.

DEAD SEA, called in Scripture the Salt Sea (Gen. 14:3), Sea of the Arabah ("plain," Deut. 3:17), or East(ern) Sea (Joel 2:20; Zech. 14:8 ASV). It has the earth's lowest surface, 1290 ft. below sea-level. Occupying a geologic fault that extends from Syria through the Red Sea into Africa, it measures 47 x 10 miles (approximately 300 sq. mi.). Cliffs rise 1500-2500 ft. on either shore. North of Lisan, "the tongue" (Josh 15:2 ASVmg), the water's depth attains 1300 ft., though southward it averages less than ten. The Sea is slowly expanding, as the muddy Jordan extends its northern delta. Salt concentration reaches 25%, four times that of ocean water. Magnesium bromide prevents organic life; the climate is arid, and the heat extreme.

Though man's historical access to the Dead Sea has been slight, five streams S of Lisan recommended the Plain of Siddim to Lot as a "well-watered garden," 2090 B.C. (Gen. 13:10). Yet writing some 600 yrs. later Moses explained, "The same is the Salt Sea" (14:3 ASV), a fact suggested by the known growth of the Sea (once crossable at Lisan), by his mention of "slime pits" (bitumen, 14:10 ASVmg) now active on the Sea's floor (cf. Josephus' name, "Lake Asphaltites," Ant. i, 9,1), and by contemporaneous ruins discovered on Lisan (BA 5, May 1942). God's destruction of Sodom in 2067 B.C. may thus reflect the area's combustibleness (19:24,28); and Jebel Usdum, "mountain of Sodom," still identifies an extensive rock-salt formation opposite Zoar (cf. 19:26; Luke 17:32).

The Dead Sea constituted Israel's eastern border (Num. 34:12; Ezek. 47:18). At En-gedi, which terminates the principal descent from Judah, a spring provided refuge for David, 1015 B.C. (I Sam. 24:1). The Valley of Salt, S of the Sea, witnessed the victories of David and of Amaziah, 790 B.C., over Edom (I Chron. 18:12; II Kings 14:7) and countermarches in the days of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 20:1-2; II Kings 3:8-9; the "Moabite Stone"). On the E shore above the Arnon, the springs of Callirhoe served Herod the Great during his final illness (4 B.C.); and at Machaerus his son Herod Antipas imprisoned John the Baptist (Mark 1:14; 6:17). On the W shore, above En-gedi lies Khirbet Qumran, site of the NT Essene community with its famous scrolls; and opposite Lisan rises Masada, Palestine's finest natural fortress, the refuge of Herod against Parthians in 42 B.C., and the last stand of Jerusalem's zealots in A.D. 70 (Jos. Wars VII, x,1). In modern times the Dead Sea has produced potash; but Ezekiel predicts a healing of its waters, granting abundant life in God's kingdom-age (47:8-10).

DEAD SEA SCROLLS, discovered, probably in 1947, by Arabic Bedouin and brought to the attention of the scholarly world late that year and early in 1948. The discoveries were made in caves located in the marly cliffs, a mile or so W of the northwestern corner of the Dead Sea, at a place known by the modern Arabic name of Qumran, which is near a copious spring of fresh water known as Ain Feshkha. This location is at the eastern edge of the Wilderness of Judah. Accordingly, alternate names for the discoveries including "Qumran," "Ain Feshkha," or "Wilderness of Judah" are sometimes used.

The scrolls were seen by several scholars in the latter part of 1947, some of whom have admitted that they passed them up as forgeries. One of the scholars who recognized the antiquity of the scrolls was the late Professor Eleazar L. Sukenik of Hebrew University, who was subsequently successful in purchasing some of them. Other scrolls were taken to the American School of Oriental Research in Jerusalem, where the Acting Director pro tempore, Dr. John C. Trever, convinced of their value, arranged to photograph the portions which were brought to him. One of his photographs was sent to Professor William F. Albright, who promptly declared that this was "the most important discovery ever made in Old Testament manuscripts."

The scrolls which were purchased by the Hebrew University included the Hebrew University Isaiah Scroll (1QIs^{b}), which is a partial scroll of the book, the Order of Warfare, also known as the War of the Sons of Light against the Sons of Darkness (1QM), and the Thanksgiving Hymns or Hodayot (1QH). The scrolls purchased by the Syrian archbishop and published by the American Schools of Oriental Research included the St. Mark's Isaiah Scroll (1QIs^{a}) which is a complete scroll of the book, the Habakkuk Commentary (1QpHab) which contains the text of chapters one and two of Habakkuk with a running commentary, and the Manual of Discipline (1QS), which contains the rules for the members of the Qumran community. These all have subsequently come into the possession of the State of Israel and are housed in a shrine in the Hebrew University, Jerusalem.

Israel. They have been published in numerous editions and translated into many languages, and are readily available for anyone who wishes to study them either in translation or in facsimile.

Following the discovery of these important scrolls, which are now all but unanimously accepted as having come from the last century B.C. and the first century A.D., the region from which they came was systematically explored. Numerous caves were found, and so far eleven caves have yielded materials from the same period as the original scrolls. Most of these materials have come from the fourth cave explored (known as Cave Four or 4Q); others of significance come from Cave Two, Five, and Six. According to recent reports the most significant discoveries are those from Cave Eleven (11Q).

At least 382 manuscripts are represented by the fragments of Cave Four alone, about 100 of which are Biblical manuscripts. These include fragments of every book of the Hebrew Bible except Esther. Some of the books are represented in many copies: e.g., 14 different manuscripts of Deuteronomy, 12 manuscripts of Isaiah, and 10 manuscripts of Psalms are represented in Cave Four; other fragments of these same books have been found in other caves. Almost complete scrolls of Psalms and Leviticus have been found in Cave Eleven, but these have not yet been published. One of the significant finds, which may turn out to have important bearing on the theories of date and authorship, concerns the Book of Daniel, fragments of which have been found with the change from Hebrew to Aramaic in Daniel 2:4 and from Aramaic to Hebrew in 7:28-8:1, exactly as in our modern texts of Daniel.

In addition to Biblical books, fragments of Deuterocanonical writings have been found, specifically Tobit and Ecclesiasticus, as well as fragments of several noncanonical writings. Some of these latter were already known, such as Jubilees, Enoch, the Testament of Levi, etc.; others were not previously known, such as the peculiarly Qumranian documents: the Thanksgiving Psalms, the Book of Warfare, the commentaries on portions of Scripture, etc. These last give us insights into the nature and beliefs of the community at Qumran.

Near the cliffs on an alluvial plateau overlooking the shore of the Dead Sea is the site of an ancient building complex often referred to as the "Monastery." This was thoroughly excavated over several seasons, and has yielded important data about the nature, size, and date of the Qumran community. From coins found there, together with other remains, the community has been dated within the limits of 140 B.C. and A.D. 67. The members were almost all male, although the literature contains provisions for the admission of women and children. The number of living there at any one time was in the neighborhood of two to four hundred. A mile or so S at Ain Feshkha were found the remains of other buildings, the nature of which is not exactly clear. The fresh water of the spring probably was used for the growing of crops and other needs of the community.

From the sect's literature we know that the people of Qumran were Jews who had split off from the Jerusalem or main stream of Judaism, and indeed were quite critical of and even hostile toward the priests at Jerusalem. The fact that they used the name, "The Sons of Zadok" has suggested to some scholars that they should be connected with the Zadokites or Sadducees; other scholars believe that they are rather to be identified with the Essenes, a third sect of Judaism described by Josephus and Philo. It is not impossible that elements of truth are to be found in both of these theories and that there was originally a split in the priestly or Sadducean line which first joined the movement known as the Hasidim, the forerunners of the Pharisees, ultimately to split again and form a narrow separatist group part of which located at Qumran. We must await further discoveries before we attempt to give a final answer to this entire problem.

The community devoted itself to the study of the Bible. The life of the community was largely ascetic, and their practices included ritual bathing, sometimes referred to as baptism. This has been understood by some to be the origin of the baptism of John the Baptist. A study of John's baptism alongside that of the Qumranians shows, however, that the two practices were quite distinct; hence, if John did come from this community (which is not yet proven and may never be), he must have developed important distinctions in his own doctrine and practice of baptism.

Some scholars believe that Zoroastrian elements are to be found in the Qumran writings, particularly with reference to dualism and angelology. The problem is extremely complex. Zoroastrian dualism developed greatly in post-Christian times, and therefore it is precarious to assume that the Zoroastrian beliefs as we know them represent the beliefs a century or two before the time of Christ.

The discoveries at Qumran are important for Biblical studies in general. The matter of the canon is not necessarily affected, since the group at Qumran was a schismatic group in the first place, and, moreover, the absence of Esther does not necessarily imply that they rejected this book from the canon. In the matter of the text of the Old Testament, however, the Dead Sea Scrolls are of great importance. The text of the Greek Old Testament (or the Septuagint), as well as the quotations of the Old Testament in the New, indicate that there were other texts beside the one that has come down to us (the Masoretic Text). The study of the Dead Sea Scrolls makes it clear that at the time of their production, which would be about the time of the production of the Scriptures used by the New Testament authors, there were at least three texts in existence: one we might call the ancestor of the Masoretic Text; the second was a text closely related to that used by the translators of the Septuagint; the third was a text differing from both of these other texts. The differences are not great and at no point do they involve doctrinal matters; but for careful textual study of the Old Testament it is important that we free ourselves from the notion that the Masoretic Text is the only authentic text. As a matter of fact, the quotations of the Old found in the New Testament rather imply that it was not the Masoretic Text which was most commonly in use by New Testament authors. These statements should be qualified by pointing out that the quality of the text varies from book to book in the Old Testament, and that there is much more uniformity in the text of the Pentateuch than in some of the other portions of the Hebrew Bible. The Dead Sea Scrolls have particularly made great contributions to the study of the text of Samuel.

In relation to the New Testament, the Dead Sea Scrolls are likewise of importance. There are no New Testament texts in the discoveries at Qumran, obviously, since the earliest book of the New Testament had been written only very shortly before the destruction of the Qumran community. Moreover, there was no reason why any of the New Testament writings should have reached Qumran. On the other hand, there are certain references and presuppositions found in the New Testament, particularly in the preaching of John the Baptist and Jesus Christ, and in the writings of Paul and John, which are placed against a background now recognizably similar to that furnished by the documents from Qumran. Thus, for example, the Gnostic background found in certain Pauline writings and formerly thought to be second century Greek Gnosticism—thus requiring a late date for the composition of Colossians—is now recognized as a Jewish Gnosticism of the first century or earlier. Similarly the Fourth Gospel is shown to be Palestinian and not Hellenistic.

A great deal has been written concerning the relationship of Jesus Christ to the Qumran community. There is no evidence in the Qumran documents that Jesus was a member of the sect, and nothing in the New Testament requires such a position. Rather, the outlook of Jesus with reference to the world and particularly toward His own people is diametrically opposite that of Qumran, and it can be safely asserted that He was not a member of that group at any time. He may have had some disciples who had come out of that background, particularly those who were formerly disciples of John the Baptist—though this is far from proven. The attempt to show that the Qumran Teacher of Righteousness was the pattern for the Gospel portrayal of Jesus cannot be established on the basis of the Dead Sea Scrolls. The Teacher of Righteousness was a fine young man with high ideals who died untimely; there is, however, no clear statement that he was put to death, certainly no indication that he was crucified or rose from the dead or that the Qumranians expected him to return. The difference between Jesus and the Teacher of Righteousness stands out clearly at several points: the Teacher of Righteousness was never referred to as the Son of God or God Incarnate; his death was not sacrificial in its nature; the sacramental meal (if such it was indeed) was not viewed as a memorial of his death or a pledge of his return in any way connected with the forgiveness of sin. Obviously in the case of Jesus Christ, all of these things are clearly asserted, not once but repeatedly in the New Testament, and indeed form a necessary basis without which there is no Christian faith. DEATH. In the Bible the word is used in various senses.

It refers to cessation of natural life: Abraham (Gen. 25:11), Aaron's wicked sons (Lev. 16:1), Moses (Deut. 34:5), a woman in travail (1 Sam. 4:20), a father (Matt. 8:22), David's child (II Sam. 12:23), a thief (Mark 15:27), even the son of Man (Mark 15:37), from every age and class death takes its victims. It is pictured as the departure of the spirit from the body (II Tim. 4:6), as being inevitable (Josh. 23:14), as laying aside the body (II Cor. 5:1), as the return to the former natural state (Eccl. 3:20; 12:7). It is pictured as a sleep (Jer. 51:39; Dan. 12:2; John 11:11; Acts 7:60). It is a state in which God is not seen (Isa. 38:11; Job 35:14), nor praised (Ps. 6:5; Isa. 38:18). It is the result of sin (Gen. 2:17; Rom. 5:21; 6:23; I Cor. 15:56; Heb. 2:14; James 1:15). In the spiritual sense death is a separation from God, or spiritual night (Luke 1:79; I John 3:14; Rom. 5:12, 6:23; John 3:36; Eph. 2:1,5; Rev. 2:11). The righteous and wicked go on forever, the righteous to everlasting good (Isa. 35:10, 45:17; Dan. 7:14, 12:2; Rev. 7:17), the evil to eternal torment (Jer. 20:11; Dan. 12:2; Matt. 25:46; Mark 3:29; II Thess. 1:9; Jude 7).

Confusion has arisen in some minds regarding the meaning of passages which seem to teach total destruction of man, whether good or bad. David's plaint over the death of his child (II Sam. 12:21, 22) is cited, but that David knew that death was not the end of rational existence is attested by numerous expressions such as Psalm 23; 62:2,7; 89:26; 116:14, etc. Job's question (14:14) is readily answered by himself (Job 19:25-27). Matthew 10:28 must be interpreted in the light of the discourse which contains it. Such passages as Job 7:9,10; and Psalm 6:5 must be interpreted in the light of other statements by their authors, none of which teaches that sin ultimately annihilates the wicked. Death to the righteous is a glorious experience (Num. 23:10; Ps. 116:15; Rev. 14:13). Jesus has conquered death and removed from it the awful sting (Isa. 25:8, 26:19; Hos. 13:14; John 5:24; I Cor. 15:53-57; I John 5:12; Rev. 1:18).

The second death has been misinterpreted by many, yet the revelation regarding it is plain. It is definitely final separation from God. God's law of the wages of sin included the penalty of death (Gen. 2:17). While physical death was involved, the special penalty was spiritual death, or separation from fellowship with the Creator. Expulsion from Eden typified this. So spiritual death is at first broken fellowship with Jehovah, with its consequent penalties. Paul so interpreted it (I Cor. 15:21-23). They who are victorious in their faith will not be hurt by the second death (Rev. 2:11), because He who has power over it will never forsake his inheritance (Ps. 94:14). Consummation of the judgment ushers in the second death, eternal and absolute separation from God in the lake of fire and brimstone (Rev. 20:6,14). J.D.F.

Tell Beit Mirsim, ruins of Debir, ancient Kirjath-sepher in southern Palestine. © MPS

DEBIR (dē'bêr), a city of Judah, once a center of culture for the Canaanite people. Probably it took its name from the pagan temple in which the oracle occupied the holy place (see I Kings 6:5, where Debhir is translated "oracle" — Holy of Holies in margin). It is called Kirjath-sepher, or "town of books" (Josh. 15:15). It could have been "town of scribes" (sopher). In Joshua 15:49 it is called Kirjath-sannah. It was SW of Jerusalem, some ten miles west of Hebron and was occupied by the Anakim (Josh. 11:21; 15:14). It was captured by Joshua (10:38,39), evidently retaken by the Canaanites, and captured a second time under Caleb, who gave his daughter as reward to its captor, Othniel being the winner (Josh. 15:13-17). It later became a priestly possession (Josh. 21:15; I Chron. 6:58).

2. Debir, a king of Eglon, who made an alliance with the king of Jerusalem against Joshua and was defeated at Gibeon (10:1-11).

3. Debir, a town on the border of Gad near Mahanaine (Josh. 13:24-26).

4. A town on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15:7), on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho.

DEBORAH (dĕb'ō-rà, Heb. devôràh, bee). 1. Rebekah's beloved wet-nurse (Gen. 24:59, 35:8), who accompanied her former nursling to Palestine — she became attached to Jacob's household and died at great age (c. 2065-1909 B.C.; cf. Gen. 25:20, 35:8) near Bethel, the tree under which she was buried being called 'Allôn-bākhûth (oak of weeping).

2. The fourth and greatest (with Gideon) of Israel's judges, a prophetess, a wife of Lappidoth (Judg. 4-5). She resided near the border of Benjamin and Ephraim, probably belonging to the latter tribe, and administered justice under "the palm-tree of Deborah" (4:4-5). Like most Hebrew "judges," however, Deborah served primarily as a divinely-appointed deliverer and executive leader of Israel.

After the death of Ehud, God's people had lapsed into apostasy, with the result that He subjected them to the Canaanitish king Jabin II of Hazor, whose commander, Sisera, "had 900 chariots of iron; and 20 years he mightily oppressed Israel" (4:2-3; cf. James B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, Princeton Univ. Press, 1950, p. 237). This period (c. 1240-1220 B.C.) coincides with the unrest that followed upon Hittite collapse and the death of Egypt's Rameses II, the treaties between which had preserved order in Palestine since the days of Seti I, 80 years before (3:30; cf. John Garstang, Joshua-Judges, London: Constable, 1931, pp. 278-283). Rameses' successor, however, was the elderly Merneptah. Despite his claim to have pacified both Canaanites and Israelites (cf. his famous "Israel-stela," Pritchard, op. cit., pp. 376-378), disorder became rampant: "The highways were unoccupied, and . . . was there a shield seen in Israel?" (5:6-8)

Then arose Deborah, "a mother in Israel," (5:7). Summoning Barak of Naphtali, she prophesied that an offensive from Mt. Tabor at the northeastern limit of Esdraelon would lure Sisera and Jabin's army to annihilation on the plains below (4:6-7). Barak agreed, provided Deborah's inspiring presence should accompany the troops, though Deborah predicted Sisera's death by a woman (4:8-9). Barak and Deborah then scouted Esdraelon around Kedesh (Tell Abu Kudeis, E of Megiddo? Garstang, op. cit., p. 301); they mustered 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun; and, together with princes of Issachar (5:15), they occupied Tabor (4:12). Deborah also summoned Dan and Asher in the N (cut off by Hazor) and Reuben and Gad in Transjordan, who failed to respond (5:16-17; Simeon and Judah in the far S remain unmentioned). But Benjamin, Ephraim, and Machir (Manasseh) answered the call (5:14), probably massing at Jenin at the southeastern edge of Esdraelon (Ibid., pp. 299-300). Deborah thus accomplished Israel's first united action since the conquest, 175 years before.

Sisera, meanwhile, advanced from Harosheth in western Esdraelon, forded the Kishon southward to marshal the Canaanite kings from Jokneam, Megiddo, and Taanach (5:19), and pressed inland along its southern bank. But God in heaven's courses fought against Sisera (5:20). A providential storm (cf. 5:4), which turned the plain into a morass, rendered Sisera's chariotry unmaneuverable, and they were cut to pieces by Israel's wildly charging foot-soldiers. The routed Canaanites, cornered at the Kishon ford, were then swept away by a flash-flood (5:21). Sisera was slain in single flight, by the woman Jael at Kedesh (4:11,17-22); Jabin was destroyed (4:24); and the land rested 40 years (5:31), corresponding to the reign of Rameses III, the last great Pharaoh of Egypt's XXth dynasty. After the battle, Deborah and Barak sang Deborah's song of victory (5:2-31, cf. v. 7), the contemporaneous authenticity of which is universally recognized from its archaic language, vivid descriptions, and ringing faith (v. 31).

Yet Deborah's record has occasioned manifold criticism against Scripture. 1. Textually, her song's admitted antiquity has been used to discredit the reliability of Scripture's earlier prose narratives (ICC, p. 110). But while poetry does tend to preserve archaic forms, the "modernized" Hebrew of the Pentateuch need not affect true Mosaic authorship (cf. R. Laird Harris, "On a Possible Revision of the Biblical Text During the Monarchy," Evangelical Theological Society, Annual Papers, 1953, pp. 18-24).

2. Confusion, futhermore, is alleged between Joshua II and Judges 4-5, as two garbled accounts of one actual battle against Jabin (IB II:683, 712). Yet Joshua's opponent, in 1400 B.C., may have been a predecessor of Deborah's; or "Jabin," a hereditary title in Hazor.

3. Contradictions are discovered between the prose and the poem: fewer tribes fighting in chapter 4, and Sisera killed in his sleep (ICC, pp. 107-108). But the poetry intentionally singles out the tribes; and Sisera's sleeping, in 5:26, is apparently understood; and his "bowing and falling," in 5:27, simply describes his subsequent death-agonies.

4. Within the prose, a conflation is surmised between a King-Jabin story in Kedesh-Naphtali and a King-Sisera story in Esdraelon (ICC, pp. 108-109). Yet the Kedesh of 4:9-11 fits Esdraelon, not Naphtali; and Scripture never designates Sisera "king," only "captain" (an Aegean or Hittite mercenary-adventurer?) of Jabin.

5. The Biblical date of Deborah is lowered a full century by Albright to 1125 B.C. (BASOR 62 (1936), p. 29), but only because of his theory that no Philistines (cf. 5:6, 3:31) could reach Palestine before the 1100's; yet see Genesis 21:34, 26:1!

6. Morally, the charge that the scriptural account of Jael is "reprehensible . . . cannot be justified" (IB II:716). But while we question this Gentile's treacherous methods, Deborah's insight into her fearless and unsolicited devotion to God's people renders her "blessed above women" (5:24).

DEBT (Heb. neshî, Gr. opheílema, a sum owed, an obligation). Under Mosaic law Jews were not allowed to exact interest (usury) from other Jews (Exod. 22:25). Special laws protected the poor against usurers (Exod. 22:25-27; Deut. 24:12,13). After the Exile cruel practices arose in collecting debts (II Kings 4:1-7; Isa. 50:1). A debtor had to make good his obligation, so land that was pledged (mortgaged) could be seized, but had to be restored during the Jubilee year (Lev. 25:28). A house so pledged could be sold, or held in perpetuity if not redeemed during a year, unless it was an unwalled town (Lev. 25:29,30). In NT times the Mosaic code was disregarded. We read of bankers, money-changers, interest, usury (Matt. 25:16-27; John 2:13-17). Debtors were often thrown into prison (Matt. 18:21-26). Jesus taught compassion towards those in debt (Matt. 18:23-35). The prayer of Jesus, "forgive us our debts," implies guilt from unpaid moral obligations to God (Matt. 6:12). J.D.F.

DECALOGUE (dĕk'ă-lŏg, Gr. déka, ten and logós, word), the basic laws of the Hebrew state. They were given by God to Moses at Mt. Sinai (Exod. 20). The laws were inscribed on tablets of stone (Deut. 4:13) and were afterwards carried in the ark of the covenant (Deut. 10:2). There is a slight difference between the record in Exodus 20:1-17 and that in Deuteronomy 5:6-21. Catholics and Lutherans unite 1 and 2 and divide 10; Eastern (Greek) Catholics and most Protestants accept the order given in the KJV. Jesus approved the law (Matt. 5:18; 22:40), fulfilled it (Matt. 5:27-48; 23:23), and became the end of the law for righteousness to all who believe (Rom. 10:4; 8:1-4).

DECAPOLIS (dē-kăp'ô-lĭs, Greek déka, ten, and pólis, city), a region E of Jordan that had been given to the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 32:33-42). A league of ten cities, consisting of Greeks who had come in the wake of Alexander's conquests, was established after the Romans occupied the area (65 B. C.). According to Ptolemy, the number was later increased to 18. They had their own coinage, courts, and army (Jos. XIV:4:4). Ruins of temples, theaters and other buildings tell of the high degree of culture which developed in these cities. Jesus drove the demons into swine near Gadara, one of these cities (Mark 5:1-20), and became popular in the Decapolis (Matt. 4:24,25; Mark 7:31-37).

DECISION, VALLEY OF, where God will some day gather all nations for judgment (Joel 3:2,12). It is called the Valley of Jehoshaphat (Jehovah judges), and has been identified by some with the valley of Kidron, but this is only conjecture. Perhaps no particular valley is intended, and the name may be only a symbol of the event.

DECREE, an official ruling or law. It translates various words in the OT such as 'ĕsār, interdict (Dan. 6:7); gezērāh, decision (Dan. 4:17); dāth, law (Dan. 2:9), In general it refers to any fiat of an official nature. In Esther 1:20, Daniel 3:10, Jonah 3:7, the word refers to laws governing special occasions. In Acts 16:4 the Greek dogma means rules for Christian living. God's decree is His settled plan and purpose (Ps. 2:7-10; Dan. 4: 24; see also Exod. 32:32; Rev. 13:8).

DEDAN (dē'dăn), an Arabian people descended directly from Noah (Gen. 10:6,7). They established themselves in the region about the northwestern end of the Persian Gulf. They were also related to Abraham by his concubine Keturah (Gen. 25:3). Mention of these people occurs frequently in the Chaldean and Assyrian tablets. Israelites of later generations considered them kinsmen. Dedanites were warned by Jeremiah to flee to the back country (Jer. 49:7,8). They were an important commercial people. Isaiah called the Dedanites traveling tradesmen (21:13). Ezekiel wrote of their connection with Tyre (27:3,15, 20), and foretold that the destruction of the Dedanim was to accompany that of the Edomites (Ezek. 25:13). J.D.F.

DEDICATION (Heb. kādhēsh, to sanctify, hănukkâh, to consecrate), an expression denoting dedication to holy ends. Often used of the consecration of persons, but usually of the setting apart of things for God's use. Consecration of the tabernacle (Num. 7) was an elaborate ceremony, as was that of the temple (I Kings 8). Among various dedicated things were: the city wall (Neh. 12:27), private dwellings (Deut. 20:5), the temple treasure (I Chron. 28:12), the child (Exod. 13:2), people (Exod. 19:14; I Sam. 16:5), and booty of war (II Sam. 8:10,11). The dedication of Nebuchadnezzar's image (Dan. 3:2,3), and of Herod's temple (Jos. XV:11:6), were elaborate occasions.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF, an annual festival of the Jews held throughout the country for eight days, celebrating the restoration of the temple following its desecration at the hands of the Syrians under Antiochus Epiphanes (I Macc. IV; 52-59; II Macc. X:5), of which Josephus gives a graphic picture (Ant. XII:5:4). The feast came on the 25th of Kislev (December). Josephus called it the "Feast of Lights." Like the Feast of Tabernacles, it was a time of pageantry and joy. It was at this feast that Jesus delivered in the temple the discourse recorded in John 10:22ff, at Jerusalem. J.D.F.

DEEP, a translation of Hebrew and Greek words of varying meaning. Hebrew: metsûlâh, the ocean (Neh. 9:11; Job 41:31; Ps. 107:24; Isa. 44:27); metsôlâh, torment (Ps. 88:6); tehôm, chaos (Gen. 1:2; 7:11); subterranean water (Gen. 49:25; Deut. 33:13); ămîq, mysterious (Dan. 2:22); ămōq, depth, or power (Lev. 13:4,31; Job 11:8). Greek: báthos, of water or condition (Luke 5:4; John 4:11; Acts 20:9; II Cor. 8:2); buthós, sea (II Cor. 11:25) or abyss (Luke 8:31; Rev. 9:1, 11:7).

DEFILE (dē-fīl'). There are a number of Hebrew and Greek words which in general mean to profane, pollute, render unclean. In the OT, defilement was physical (S. of Sol. 5:3), sexual (Lev. 18:20), ethical (Isa. 59:3; Ezek. 37:23), ceremonial (Lev. 11:24; 17:15; etc.), and religious (Num. 35:33; Jer. 3:1). In the NT it is ethical or religious (Mark 7:19; Acts 10:15; Rom. 14:20). In the NT the idea of ceremonial or ritual defilement does not exist. In OT times God's purpose in issuing laws regarding ceremonial defilement was clearly an educative one—to impress the Israelites with His holiness and the necessity of their living separate and holy lives.

DEGREE (dē-grē, Heb. ma'ălâh, a going up or ascent, Gr. tapeinós, low). The word degrees occurs in the titles of 15 psalms, Psalms 120 to 134, which are called Songs of Degrees. The common opinion regarding the meaning is that they were sung by the pilgrims as they went up to Jerusalem (cf. I Sam. 1:3; Ps. 42:4; 122:4; Isa. 30:29). The word is also used in II Kings 20:9,10, where Hezekiah is told that the sign that the Lord would heal him would be that his sundial would go back ten degrees, and in a secondary sense of rank or order (I Chron. 15:18; 17:17; Ps. 62:9; Luke 1:52; James 1:9).

DEGREES, SONGS OF, the title given Psalms 120-134. Uncertainty exists as to the origin of the title. Some Jewish authorities attributed it to the use made of fifteen steps leading from the court of men to the court of women in the temple. The Levitical musicians performed with these steps as the stage. It is possible that originally the songs were part of a ritual which required the Levities to advance up the steps as they played or sang. Some scholars attribute the title to the way in which the thought advances from step to step, as seen in 121:4,5; 124:1,2,3,4, but all these songs do not do this. Because Ezra (7:9) used the word hammä'lâh, a going up from Babylon, some have thought that the title originated when exiles were returning to Jerusalem during the reign of Artaxerxes in Babylon. The most logical explanation is that the title was given the series of hymns because they were used by pilgrims during the annual journeys to the three required feasts in Jerusalem. One tradition has it that Solomon wrote Psalm 132 and the others were written later. They are songs of penitence (120,131), praise (121,128,133, 134), and praise and prayer (122,123,129,132).

DEKAR (dē'kär), the father of one of Solomon's twelve purveyors (I Kings 4:7-9).

DELAIAH (dē-lā'yà, raised or freed by Jehovah).
1. A descendant of David (I Chron. 3:1,24).
2. A priest of David's time and leader of the 23rd course of temple service (I Chron. 24:18).
3. A prince who besought Baruch not to burn the sacred roll containing the prophecy of Jeremiah (Jer. 36:12,25).
4. Head of a tribe that returned under Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra 2:60; Neh. 7:62).
5. The father of Shemaiah who advised Nehemiah to flee (Neh. 6:10).

DELILAH (dē-lī'là, dainty one), a Philistine woman from the valley of Sorek, which extends from near Jerusalem to the Mediterranean. By her seductive wiles she learned the secret of Samson's strength and brought him to his ruin (Judg. 16:4-20).

DELUGE (See Flood)

DEMAS (dē'mās, Gr. Demás, popular), a faithful helper of Paul during his imprisonment in Rome (Col. 4:14). Paul called him a "fellow laborer" (Philem. 24). He was probably a citizen of Thessalonica to which place he went upon deserting Paul (II Tim. 4:10).

DEMETRIUS (dĕ-mē'trĭ-ŭs, Gr. Demétrios, belonging to Demeter). 1. The disciple whom John praised in his letter to Gaius (III John 12).
2. The jeweler of Ephesus who raised a mob against Paul because his preaching had resulted in damage to his lucrative business of making silver images of the goddess Diana (Acts 19:23-27). The name of one Demetrius, a warden of the Ephesian temple, has been found by modern explorers; he probably was the silversmith. Three kings of Syria bore the name: Demetrius Soter or Saviour (Jos. Ant. XII:10;1-4); D. Nikator, or Conqueror (ibid. XIII:5,2,3,11); D. Eukarios, the fortunate, (ibid. XIII:13;3 and XIV:1;3).

DEMONS (Gr. daimónion), evil spirits (Matt. 8: 16, Luke 10:17,20; Matt. 17:18 compare with Mark 9:25). The immaterial and incorporeal nature of both Satan and his demon hosts is graphically set forth by the Apostle Paul in describing the believer's intense conflict as being "not against flesh and blood," but against "principalities," "powers," "world-rulers of this darkness," and "spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places" (Eph. 6:12). Again the non-material and incorporeal character of demons is hinted in the expression "The prince of the powers of the air, the spirits that are now at work in the hearts of the sons of disobedience" (Eph. 2:2, Weymouth).

The Apostle John likewise stresses the incorporeality of demons in his reference to the three unclean spirits issuing out of the mouth of the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet as the "spirits of demons" (pneúmata daimonion, Rev. 16:14). The construction is patently a genitive of apposition, more particularly defining the general term "spirits," which may be either good or bad, as in this case, bad, or "demon-spirits."

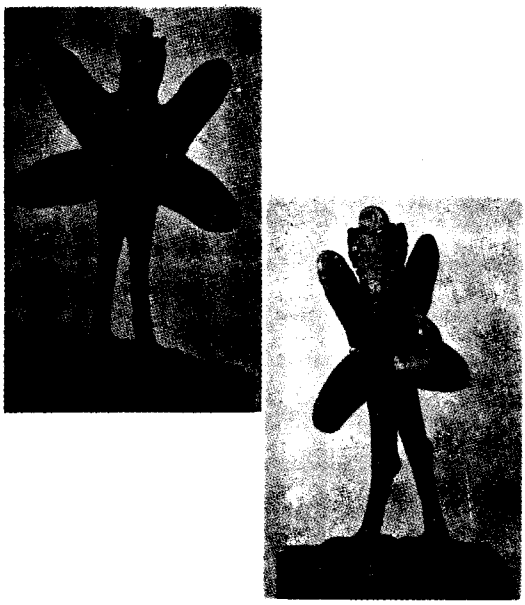
As purely spiritual beings or personalities, demons operate above the laws of the natural realm and are invisible and incorporeal. The Bible presents them as such, and thus free from magical rites and exorcistic rigmarole, which contaminate ethnic and rabbinic demonology. The Word of God however, does recognize the principle of miracle where natural law may be temporarily transcended and denizens of the spirit world glimpsed (II Kings 6:17; 2:11). On this principle John in apocalyptic vision saw the awful last-day eruption of locust-demons from the abyss (Rev. 9:1-12), as well as the three hideous frog-like spirits which emanate from the Satanic trinity (the dragon, the beast and the false prophet) in the Tribulation to muster the world's armies to their predestined doom at Armageddon (Rev. 16: 13-16).

As spirit personalities demons have an intellectual nature through which they possess superhuman knowledge. Plato's etymology of daimon from an adjective meaning "knowledge" or "intelligent" (Cratylus I, 389) points to intelligence or knowledge as the basic characteristic of demonic nature. Scripture features the perspicacity of demons. They know Jesus (Mark 1:24), bow to Him (Mark 5:6), describe Him as "the Son of the Most High God" (Mark 5:7), entreat Him (Luke 8: 31), obey Him (Matt. 8:16), vitiate sound doctrine (I Tim. 4:1-5), conceal the truth of Christ's incarnate deity and sole Saviourhood (I John 4: 1-3) and comprehend prophecy and their inevitable doom (Matt. 8:29).

Because of their superphysical knowledge, demons are consulted in spiritistic oracles through spiritistic mediums, who allow themselves to get under the control of evil spirits for oracular purposes (I Sam. 28:1-25; Acts 16:16), as is seen in both ancient and modern spiritism, erroneously called "spiritualism."

In their moral nature all demons (as fallen angels) are evil and depraved, in distinction to the good spirits (the unfallen angels), who are sinless. The moral turpitude of demons is everywhere evidenced in Scripture by the harmful effects they produce in their victims, deranging them mentally, morally, physically and spiritually, and by the frequent epithet of "unclean," which often describes them (Matt. 10:1; Mark 1:27; Luke 4:36; Acts 8:7; Rev. 16:13). Fleshly uncleanness and base sensual gratification are the result of demon control of the human personality (Luke 8:27). Demons figure in the moral collapse of a people who yield to gross carnality and sexual sin, so rampant in the world today (II Tim. 3:1-9; Rev. 9:21,22).

In addition to their superhuman intelligence and moral turpitude, demons possess terrible strength, imparting it to the human body (Luke 8:29), and binding their victims as with chains and with physical defects and deformities (Luke 13:11-17), such as blindness (Matt. 12:22), insanity (Luke 8:26-36), dumbness (Matt. 9:32,33) and suicidal mania (Mark 9:22).



An Assyrian demon, Pazuzu, front and rear views of a bronze representation. "The ancient Semitic world was thought of as populated with these creatures, who caused every conceivable kind of trouble. Cuneiform literature abounds with omens, charms and incantations against these evil spirits. This bronze charm was made to insure the efficacy of a charm or incantation uttered against his baneful activity as evil spirit of the southwest wind." OIUC (from Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament)

Demons under the leadership of Satan seek to oppose God's purposes and to hinder man's welfare. So intimately bound up are they with their prince leader that their work and his are identified rather than differentiated. Thus the earthly life of our Lord is said to have consisted in going about "doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil" (Acts 10:38). Certainly much of this so-called oppression by the devil was the work of Satan's minions, the demons, as a cursory examination of the Gospel records will show.

Demons are of two classes — those who are free with the earth and the air as their abode (Cor. 1:13; Eph. 2:2; Eph. 6:11-12) and those who are imprisoned in the abyss (Luke 8:31; Rev. 9:1-11; Rev. 20:1-3). The abyss is only the temporary prison house of evil spirits, which must surrender its doleful inhabitants to Gehenna or the "lake of fire" (Matt. 25:41), the eternal abode of Satan, demons, and unsaved men. DENARIUS (See Money)

DEPRAVITY (dē-prăv'ĭ-tē), a theological term not found in Scripture, although the reality expressed by the word is certainly there. Negatively, it means that man, as a result of the fall, has lost his original righteousness and love for God. Positively, it means that man's moral nature has become corrupted, and that he has an irresistible bias toward evil. The corruption extends to every part of his nature and every faculty of his being. In his depraved state man can do nothing perfectly pleasing to God. This does not mean that he has no qualities pleasing to men, that he is as bad as he can be, or that he is as opposed to God as he can possibly be. The image of God in which he was created has not been completely obliterated; some vestiges of it remain. He cannot, however, no matter how hard he tries, love God with all his heart or his neighbor as himself; nor can he change his supreme preference for himself, or so radically transform his character that he can live according to God's law. Arminian and Calvinistic theologians differ on the extent of depravity, but they are agreed that without the saving grace of God no salvation is possible. S.B.

DEPUTY (dĕp'ū-tē, Heb. nitstsāv, Gr. anthúpatos), one appointed to rule under a higher authority, as a regent in place of a king (I Kings 22:47) or a Roman consul or proconsul (Acts 13:7; 18:12; 19:38). Roman proconsuls were appointed by the Roman senate to govern senatorial provinces, usually for one year. They exercised judicial as well as military power in their province. During their term of office their power was absolute, but when it expired they were accountable for what they had done.

DERBE (dûr'bē, Gr. Dérbe), a city in the SE corner of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor. In Acts 14:20 it is called Dérbe; in 20:4, Derbaíos. Paul visited it on the first journey after being stoned at Lystra (Acts 14:20), also on his second tour (Acts 16:1), and probably on the third. Gaius, who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem, was from there (Acts 20:4). It was about three miles NW of Zasta and 45 miles S of Konia (Iconium).

DESERT, a rendering of a number of Hebrew and Greek words. 1. Heb. midbār and Gr. éremos, a wilderness, yet capable of pasturing flocks (Gen. 16:7; 21:20; I Sam. 17:28; Matt. 3:1; Mark 1:13).

2. Heb. 'ărāvâh, an arid region. When used with the definite article, it denotes the plain of the Jordan and Dead Sea (Ezek. 47:8; II Sam. 2:29).

3. Heb. yeshîmôn, a waste. With the definite article, it is rendered as a proper name, Jeshimon (Num. 21:20).

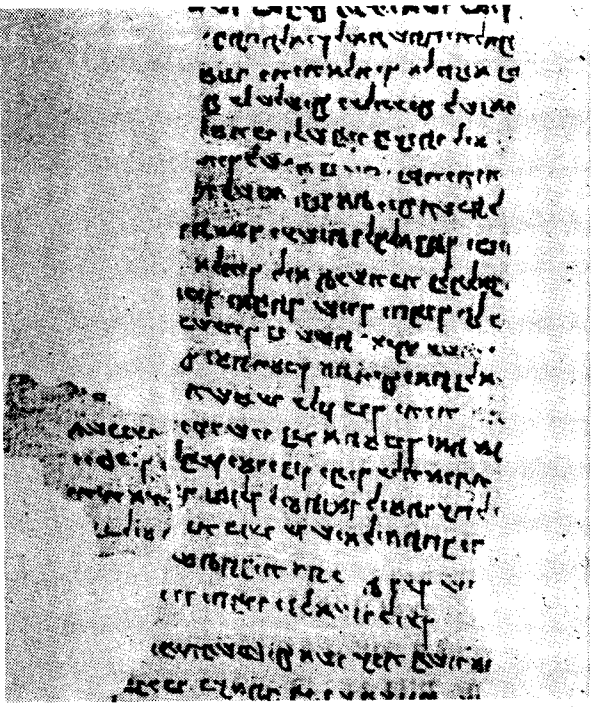
4. Heb. hārbâh, waste, desolate place (Isa. 48:21; Ezek. 13:4). It must not be thought that the deserts known to the Israelites were merely wastes of sand, like the Sahara. They were mostly latently fertile lands, needing only rain to make them fruitful.

DESIRE OF ALL NATIONS, a phrase occurring only in Haggai 2:7. The ERV has desirable things; and the KJVm, things desired. When the temple was erected in Ezra's time, the prophet was directed to encourage the older men who had seen the more magnificent Temple of Solomon and were disappointed with what they now saw, by assuring them that God was with them, and in a little while He would shake the heavens, the earth, the sea, the dry land, and the nations, and "the desire of all nations" would come to fill the house with His glory. Many expositors refer the prophecy to Christ's first advent, and others to the second advent; while still others deny a Messianic application altogether, translating "the desire of all nations" by "the desirable things of all nations," i.e. their precious gifts (cf. Isa. 60:5,11; 61:6).

DESOLATION, ABOMINATION OF (See Abomination of Desolation)

DEUEL (dū'ĕl), a Gadite, father of Eliasaph, prince of Gad in the wilderness just after the Exodus from Egypt (Num. 1:14, 7:47, 10:20). In Num. 2:14 the name is Reuel. It is uncertain which form of the name is correct.

DEUTERONOMY (dū'tĕr-on'ō-mē, Gr. Deuteronómion, second law). In sight of the Canaan he may not enter, Moses gathers the hosts of Israel about him as would a father his children for his farewell addresses. These, set within the historical framework of several brief narrative passages, constitute the book of Deuteronomy. Since the occasion of



A small portion of the Nash Papyrus fragment of Deuteronomy 5. BA

Moses' farewell was also the occasion of the renewal of the covenant made earlier at Sinai, the appropriate documentary pattern for covenant ratification supplied the pattern for Moses' speeches and thus for the book.

The English title is unfortunate, being based on the LXX's mistranslation of the phrase, "a copy of this law" (17:18), as to deuteronomion touto, "this second law." The Jewish name, devārîm, "words," derives from the opening expression, "These are the words which Moses spake" (1:1a). This title is felicitous because it focuses attention on a clue to the peculiar literary character of the book; for with such an expression began the treaties imposed by ancient imperial lords upon their vassals. Deuteronomy is the text or "words" of a suzerainty covenant made by the Lord of heaven through the mediatorship of Moses with the servant people Israel beyond the Jordan.

The claims of Deuteronomy concerning its own authorship are thus plain. It purports to consist almost entirely of the farewell speeches of Moses addressed to the new generation which had grown to manhood in the wilderness. The speeches are dated in the last month of the 40 years of wandering (1:3) and it is stated that Moses wrote as well as spoke them (31:9,24; cf. 31:22). There is the confirmatory witness of Jesus who affirmed the Mosaic authorship of the Law, i.e., the Pentateuch (cf. esp. Mark 10:5; 12:26; John 5:46,47; 7:19). Modern orthodox Christian scholars, therefore, join older Jewish and Christian tradition in maintaining the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy as well as of the first four books of the Pentateuch. Almost all such scholars recognize that the account of Moses' death (Deut. 34) is exceptional and some would attribute to a compiler (perhaps the unknown author of Deut. 34) much of the narrative framework of Deuteronomy. Whether or not the Biblical testimony allows the latter latitude, even that variety of the conservative position stands in clear opposition to modern negative theories of the origin of Deuteronomy.

According to the Development Hypothesis which won the day among 19th century negative critics, Deuteronomy was a product of the seventh century B.C., and provided the program for the reform of Josiah (cf. II Kings 22:3-23:25), allegedly introducing the concept of a centralized cultus into Israelite religion at that late date. But unless a wholesale critical rewriting of the historical sources be undertaken, it is manifest that the concept of the central altar was normative during the entire life of Israel in Canaan. Moreover, it is equally apparent that, taken at their face value, the covenant stipulations propounded in Deuteronomy are directed to a unified young nation about to enter upon a program of conquest to secure its inheritance, not to the diminishing remnant of the divided kingdom. Indeed, many of those stipulations would be completely incongruous in a document produced in the seventh century B.C. That dating, though still dominant, is being increasingly challenged even from the side of negative criticism. While some have suggested a post-exilic origin, more have favored a pre-Josianic date. There is a growing tendency to trace the sources of the deuteronomic legislation back to the early monarchy — if not earlier. The view that these traditions were preserved at a northern cult center, being shaped according to ritual patterns, is widespread. Some would detach Deuteronomy from the Pentateuch and treat Deuteronomy — II Kings as a unit representing the historical-theological perspective of a distinctive "school," i.e., the "deuteronomic."

The unity, antiquity, and authenticity of Deuteronomy are evidenced by the conformity of its total structure to the pattern of Near Eastern suzerainty treaties dating from the second millennium B.C. The classic covenantal pattern consisted of the following sections: preamble, historical prologue, stipulations, curses and blessings, invocation of oath deities, directions for deposit of duplicate treaty documents in sanctuaries and periodic proclamation of the treaty to the vassal people.

Such substantially is the outline of Deuteronomy:

I. Preamble: Covenant Mediator (1:1-5)
II. Historical Prologue: Covenant History (1:6-4:49)
III. Stipulations: Covenant Life (5-26)
IV. Curses and Blessings: Covenant Ratification (27-30)
V. Succession Arrangements: Covenant Continuity (31-34)

(1:1-5): Here the speaker is identified, viz., Moses as the Lord's representative. (1:6-4:49): A rehearsal of God's past covenantal dealings with Israel from Horeb to Moab serves to awaken reverence and gratitude as motives for renewed consecration. (5-26): When covenants were renewed the former obligations were repeated and brought up to date. Thus chapters 5-11 republish the decalogue with its primary obligation of fidelity to Yahweh, while chapters 12-26 in considerable measure renew the stipulations of the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21-23) and other earlier Sinaitic legislation, adapting where necessary to the new conditions awaiting Israel on the threshold of Canaan. (27-30): Directions are first given for the future and final act in this covenant renewal to be conducted by Joshua in Canaan (27). Blessings and curses are then pronounced by Moses as the sanctions for Israel's immediate ratification of the covenant, but also as a prophecy of Israel's future down to its ultimate exile and restoration (28-30). (31-34): Here the necessary preparations are made for the continuity of leadership through the succession of Joshua and for the continuing confrontation of Israel with the way of the covenant by periodic reading of the covenant document, which was to be deposited in the sanctuary, and by a prophetic song of covenant witness (31,32). Then there are the final blessings and the death of Moses, by which the "dynastic" provisions became operative (33,34).

Stylistically, the adoption of the documentary pattern of the international suzerainty treaties is the most noteworthy fact. Next in importance is the preponderantly oratorical nature of the contents. There is general acknowledgement of the homogeneity of style, which is a fluent prose (chapters 32,33 are poetry) marked by majestic periods, warmly impressive eloquence, and the reiteration and exhortation of the earnest preacher for decision.

Deuteronomy is the Bible's full-scale exposition of the covenant concept and demonstrates that, far from being a contract between two parties, God's covenant with His people is a proclamation of His sovereignty and an instrument for binding His elect to Himself in a commitment of absolute allegiance.

Israel is confronted with the demands of God's governmental omnipotence, redemptive grace, and consuming jealousy. Consecration to the Lord is to be manifested in obedience to the programmatic mandate of establishing His kingdom in His land. That involves on the one hand the execution of the commission of conquest, by which divine judgment would be visited on the devotees of alien gods in God's land, and on the other hand the creation of a community of brotherly love in the bonds of common service to the Lord within the possessed inheritance. This covenant calling was not an unconditioned license to national privilege and prosperity. By the covenant oath Israel came under both the curses and the blessings which were to be meted out according to God's righteous judgment. The covenant relation bestowed, called still to responsible decision: "I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and curse; therefore choose life, that both you and your seed may live: that you may love the Lord your God . . . for that is your life" (30:19,20a).

M.G.K.

DEVIL (Gr. diábolos, slanderer), one of the principal titles of Satan, the arch-enemy of God and of man. Thirty-five times in the NT the word refers to Satan; but unfortunately in KJV the same word is used about 60 times to render the Greek daimonion which is properly translated "demon" in ASV. Three times in the NT the word diabolos is used for ill-natured persons, or "slanderers" (I Tim. 3:11, II Tim. 3:3, and Titus 2:3, but in KJV the last two of these are "false accusers"). The word "devil" occurs only four times in the OT (KJV), twice representing sa'îrim which means "he-goats" (Lev. 17:7, II Chron. 11:15) and twice translating shēdim or "demons" (Deut. 32:17, Ps. 106:37. (Cf. ASV for these four renderings.) The LXX renders "Satan" in the OT as "diábolos," i.e., "devil," but the Vulgate and the English versions rightly employ "Satan" as the proper name. In Numbers 22:22, the Angel of the Lord stood in the way as an adversary (Hebrew Satan) to the mad prophet Balaam, but generally the word is used in the bad sense.

How did Satan originate? "God is love," and God is holy. Because love is His predominating characteristic, God desired to surround His throne with creatures whom He might love, and by whom He might be loved. Because of His holiness, these creatures must also be holy; and by logical necessity love and holiness cannot be forced. Compulsory love or holiness would not be either love or holiness, and could not satisfy the all-wise Creator. Therefore these loving and holy creatures must be endowed with the ability to choose whether "to glorify God and to enjoy Him forever" or to reject Him and suffer the consequences. The story of the beginning of sin is nowhere related explicitly in the Word; but certain passages seem to hint so strongly, that the following theory has long been held to explain them. [If this theory is not true, we have not the slightest inkling as to the origin of sin. Isaiah 14:12-20 is apparently directed to "the king of Babylon" and Ezekiel 28: 12-19 similarly to "the prince of Tyre" but in each case the prophet uses language which could not truly and literally refer to any mere man.]

Apparently God first peopled the universe, or at least our part of it, with a hierarchy of holy angels, of whom one of the highest orders was (or contained) the cherubim. One of them, perhaps the highest of all, was "the anointed cherub that covereth," who was created beautiful and perfect in his ways. This cherub knew that he was beautiful (this required only intelligence), but pride entered his heart and the first sin in the whole history of eternity occurred. Pride led to self-will (Isa. 14:13,14) and self-will to rebellion. This great cherub became the adversary ("Satan") of God, and apparently led other angels into rebellion. (Cf. Jude 6, II Pet. 2:4, etc.). God then created man in His own image (innocent but with the possibility of becoming holy on condition of obedience. Because Satan already hated God, he hated man whom God loved, and tried to destroy him. It is evident that God could have destroyed Satan at the moment that he became "Satan," but God has tolerated him these many centuries, and has used him for testing man until the days of testing shall be over. Then Satan and all the other enemies of God will be cast into the "lake of fire", (Rev. 20:10-15). In the age-long (though not eternal) conflict between good and evil, it sometimes seems as though God has given Satan every advantage. Even so, God's victory is certain.

Among the devil's characterizations are "the god of this world" (or "age") (II Cor. 4:4), "the prince of the powers of the air" (Eph. 2:2), and "the devil and his angels" (Matt. 25:41). All these point to his immense power. In Ephesians 6:12 it is stated that our wrestling is "not against flesh and blood, but against principalities — powers — the rulers of the darkness of this world (or "age") — against spiritual wickedness in high places." Our enemy is a murderer and a liar (John 8:44). On the other hand, he is a coward (James 4:7), and he can be defeated (Matt. 4:1-11) by "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (Eph. 6:17). His principal method of attack is that of temptation (Matt. 4:3), and his leading temptations can be grouped under "the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life" (I John 2:16). These three he used effectively on Eve (Gen. 3;6) and on her descendants, but ineffectively on our Lord (Matt. 4:1-11). He is called "Abaddon" and "Apollyon" (i.e. "Destroyer") in Revelation 9:11, "Beelzebub, the prince of the devils" in Matthew 12:24 and "the accuser of our brethren" (Rev. 12:7-12), where he is also characterized as "the great dragon," "the old serpent" and "the deceiver of the whole world." Satan clearly showed his brazen shamelessness when, as recorded in Job 1,2, he came before God with "the sons of God" and misrepresented the character and the purposes of Job. His end and our victory are sure (Rev. 20). A.B.F.

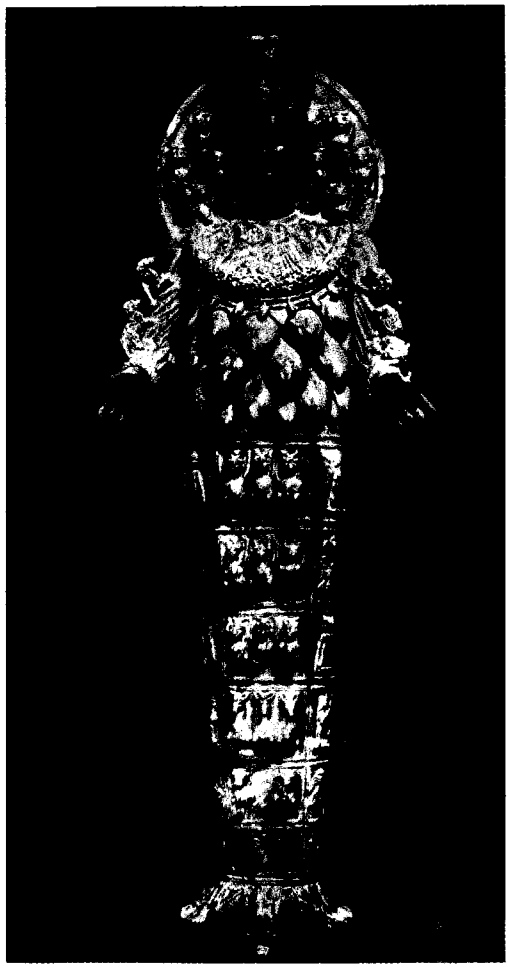
DEVOTED THING, that which is set apart unto the Lord, and therefore belongs no longer to the former owner, nor may it be used for sacrifice. A sacrifice or offering is a voluntary gift from the owner, and can at any time previous to the ceremony be recalled, but not so a devoted thing. Achan's sin at Jericho (Josh. 6:17-19) was considered far more serious than mere stealing, for he had taken of the devoted thing. Nations, cities or men who were "devoted" were utterly to be destroyed; e.g. the Amalekites (I Sam. 15).

DEW, the moisture which forms in drops during a still, cloudless night upon the earth or any body which rapidly radiates heat, under air which is saturated with water vapor. In Syria and most of Palestine, these conditions are fulfilled through the cloudless summer and early autumn, and the dew is a great blessing to the fruits of the land. The word (Hebrew and Aramaic tal) occurs 35 times and almost always with pleasant connotation. Dew is often used in Scripture as a symbol of blessing (Gen. 27:28; Micah 5:7) and of refreshment (Deut. 32:2; Job 29:19; Ps. 133:3; Isa. 18:4).

DIADEM (Gr. diádema), properly an emblem of royalty, but in the OT, the Hebrew word is generally rendered "mitre" and refers to the turban of the chief priest (Zech. 3:5), a royal diadem (Isa. 62:3), or a turban (Job 29:14). In the NT, the word does not occur in the KJV but is used three times in Rev. (12:3,13:1,19:12) as an emblem of absolute power, and is sharply to be distinguished from the crown (Gr. stéphanos) which is used elsewhere in the NT. The stéphanos was given to victorious athletes, to generals and to the early emperors of Rome, until Diocletian (c. 284-305) transformed the empire into an Oriental absolutism, and adopted the diadem as a symbol of his autocracy. Our Lord, too, will wear the diadem (Rev. 19:12).

DIAL, properly a graduated arc intended to mark the time of day by the shadow of a style or gnomon falling upon it. In modern times the style is generally (and properly) parallel to the axis of the earth. The word occurs only twice in the Bible (II Kings 20:11, Isa. 38:8) referring to the "sun-dial of Ahaz" which he may have introduced from Babylonia, where it was used as early as the eighth century B.C. The Hebrew ma'ălâh here rendered "dial" is generally "degrees" or steps, from the root meaning "to go up". It would seem from this that the time of day was found by the men of Hezekiah's time by the shadow of a pillar as it ascended or descended the steps leading to the palace. The miracle recorded in connection with the dial can be compared with the "long day" in Joshua's time (Josh. 10:12-14) and is equally inexplicable on natural grounds.

DIANA (dī-ăn'à, Lat. Diana, Gr. Ártemis), the Roman goddess of the moon. A daughter of Jupiter, she was a twin sister of Apollo, who was associated with the sun, as she was with the moon. She was represented as a virgin huntress and was widely worshiped. When the Greek worship penetrated Italy about 400 B.C. the Italians identified Diana with Artemis, her Greek counterpart. Her worship was pure as compared with the sensual worship of eastern gods and goddesses.



Diana of the Ephesians (Artemis). JHK

"Diana of the Ephesians," mentioned only in Acts 19:24-35, is Artemis in the Greek, and her myths were of a very different sort. Her silver "shrines" (Acts 19:24) were little "temples" containing an image of Artemis as imagined by the Asiatics, a combination of the Greek virgin goddess with the many-breasted and lewd Semitic moon goddess Ashtoreth. For the Ephesians, Artemis was the great Asiatic nursing mother of gods, men, animals, and plants, and was the patroness of the sexual instinct. Her images, instead of being artistically beautiful like those of the Greeks, were ugly, more like the lascivious images of India and Tyre and Sidon. Her special worship was centered in the great temple at Ephesus. The reason for the location there was probably the finding of a very interesting aerolite which supposedly fell from heaven (Acts 19:35). The feasts of Diana "whom all Asia and the world worshippeth" (19:27) were commercialized, and there was a large industry among the silversmiths of making shrines and idols to this goddess. The preaching of Paul interfered with this commerce, and aroused violent opposition. It seems that Paul and his companions had preached the Gospel from the positive side instead of directly attacking, for the townclerk testified that they "were neither robbers of temples nor blasphemers of our goddess (19:37). A.B.F.

DIASPORA (dī-ăs'pō-rà, Gr. diasporá, that which is sown), the name applied to the Jews living outside of Palestine and maintaining their religious faith among the Gentiles. God had warned the Jews through Moses that dispersion among other nations would be their lot if they departed from the Mosaic Law (Deut. 4:27: 28:64-68). These prophecies were largely fulfilled in the two captivities, by Assyria and Babylonia, but there were other captivities by the rulers of Egypt and Syria, and by Pompey, which helped scatter the Israelites. Especially from the time of Alexander the Great, many thousands of Jews emigrated for purposes of trade and commerce into the neighboring countries, particularly the chief cities. By the time of Christ the diaspora must have been several times the population of Palestine. As early as 525 B.C. there had been a temple of Jehovah in Elephantine, in the early years of the Maccabean struggle. The synagogues in every part of the known world helped greatly in the spread of Christianity, for Paul invariably repaired to them in every city he visited. S.B.

DIBLAIM (dĭb-lā'ĭm), father-in-law of Hosea, the prophet (Hos. 1:3).

DIBLATH (dĭb'lăth) occurs in Ezekiel 6:14; in the RV it is "Diblah," which seems to have been an early copyist's error for Riblah, q.v. It was a town about 50 miles S of Hamath. In Ezekiel, this place was the northern limit of God's judgments which were to fall upon Palestine for its odious idolatry.

DIBON, DIBON-GAD (dī'bŏn). 1. A place in the high plain of Moab about ten miles E of the Dead Sea. It was one of the stations of Israel in its journey toward the Promised Land (Num. 33:45, 46). It belonged to Sihon, king of the Amorites (Num. 21:21-31) who was conquered by Israel under Moses. The city was rebuilt by the tribe of Gad (Num. 32-34). Moses apparently gave it to Reuben (Josh. 13-17). It was later taken by Moab under King Mesha, who rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab c. 906 B.C. (II Kings 1:1, 3:4,5). According to Scripture (II Kings 3), Israel badly defeated Mesha at the ensuing battle, but Mesha set up a stele at Dibon (the famous "Moabite stone") boasting of his defeating Ahab.

(2). A town in Judah, occupied by some of the Jews who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 11:25).

DIBRI (dĭb'rē), a Danite, whose grandson fought with an Israelite in the camp, cursed, and then was stoned for his blasphemy (Lev. 24:11-16).

DIDRACHMA (See Money)

DIDYMUS (dĭd'ĭ-mŭs, a twin), surname of Thomas (John 11:16, 20:24, 21:2).

DIKLAH (dĭk là), son of Joktan, and his descendants who probably lived in Arabia (Gen. 10:27; I Chron. 1:21).

DILEAN (dĭl'ē-ăn), a town in the lowlands of Judah (Josh. 15:38).

DIMNAH (dĭm'nà), a town in Zebulun, bestowed upon the Merarite Levites (Josh. 21:35). Rimmon (I Chron. 6:77) may be the same place.

DIMON (dīmŏn), a town in Moab, generally called "Dibon" (q.v.), but in Isaiah 15:9 twice written Dimon, about four miles N of Aroer.

DIMONAH (dī-mō'nà), a town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:22), probably the same as the "Dibon" of Nehemiah 11:25.

DINAH (dī'nà), a daughter of Jacob and Leah (Gen. 30:21), and so far as is recorded, his only daughter. While sightseeing (Gen. 34) at the city near which Israel encamped, Shechem, the prince, violated her, for which crime Levi and Simeon, her brothers, destroyed the city.

DINAITE (dī'nà-īt), a member of the tribe of Dinaites whom Ashurbanipal had brought from Assyria to colonize Samaria (cf. II Kings 17:24 with Ezra 4:7-10).

DINHABAH (dĭn'hà-bà), the city of Bela, the first known king of Edom (Gen. 36:32).

DIONYSIUS, THE AREOPAGITE (dī-ŏnĭsh'ĭ-ŭs, the ăr'ē-ŏp'à-gīt), a member of the Areopagus, the Athenian supreme court; mentioned as one of Paul's converts at Athens (Acts 17:34).

DIOSCURI (dī-ŏs'kŭ-rē, Gr. Dióskouroi, sons of Zeus). In mythology, they were twin sons of Zeus by Leda, named Castor and Pollux (Acts 28:11), and were regarded by sailors as guardian deities.

DIOTREPHES (dī-ŏt'rĕ-fēz, Gr. Diotrephés, nurtured by Zeus), a leading member, perhaps the bishop, of the church to which Gaius belonged, to whom John the beloved apostle wrote his third epistle. Few facts are known about him. His domineering attitude made him an obstacle to the progress of the church. The facts, though sad, have been a great blessing and comfort to many a minister who has had to serve a "one-man church." Pride and love of pre-eminence are of the devil and are exactly opposite to that unselfish humility that the Holy Spirit demands (Phil. 2: 3-8).

DISCERNING OF SPIRITS, the ability which the Holy Spirit gives to some Christians to discern between those who spoke by the Spirit of God and those who were moved by false spirits. The phrase occurs in I Corinthians 12:10 as one of the gifts of the Spirit.

DISCIPLE (Gr. mathetés, a learner), a pupil of some teacher. The word implies the acceptance in mind and life of the views and practices of the teacher. In the NT it means, in the widest sense, those who accept the teachings of anyone — like the disciples of John the Baptist (Matt. 9:14) the Pharisees (Matt. 22:16), Moses (John 9:28). Usually, however, it refers to the adherents of Jesus. Sometimes it refers to the Twelve Apostles (Matt. 10:1; 11:1; etc.); but, more often, simply to Christians (Acts 6:1,2,7; 9:36). Followers of Jesus were not called "Christians" until the founding of the church at Antioch (Acts 11:26).

DISEASES to which the Bible refers appear largely to have been well-known disease entities, identical with those that now exist. Inaccurate translation and archaic nomenclature for the descriptions and names of diseases in the KJV, and only patchy improvement in the ASV, have produced much confusion in understanding these diseases.

I. Diseases with Primary Manifestations in Skin. The hygienic measures outlined in Leviticus are in agreement with modern concepts of communicable disease control, especially as regards availability of running water and isolation of the patient. Two kinds of skin disease are recognized in Leviticus: a) those classified as (Heb.) tsāra'ath (so-called leprosy in KJV) which were believed to require isolation, and b) those not requiring isolation. Leviticus 13 gives clear diagnostic distinctions and procedural guides based upon the developmental characteristics of the various diseases. Spinka believes that human tsāra'ath diseases include leprosy, syphilis, smallpox, boils, scabies, fungus infections (e.g. favus, tinea, actinomycosis), all of which are of known contagious potentiality, and also pemphigus, dermatitis herpetiformis, and skin cancer, which are doubtfully contagious. In addition there are classified as tsāra'ath certain mold and fungus growths in houses and cloth, conditions assuming importance from the standpoint of human allergy, often with manifestations in the form of asthma.

A. Tsāra'ath diseases.

1. Leprosy, also known as Hansen's disease, as defined today, is the name for disease processes caused by the microorganism Mycobacterium leprae. There are two types: a. The lepromatous type begins with brownish-red spots on the face, ears, forearms, thighs and/or buttocks which later become thickened nodules and, losing their skin covering, become ulcers ("sores") with subsequent loss of tissue and then contraction and deformity. It was apparently the lepromatous type that was chiefly in view in the Biblical cases of true leprosy. b. The tuberculoid type is characterized by numbness of an affected area of skin and deformity such as fingers like claws resulting from paralysis and consequent muscle wasting (atrophy). The advanced forms of leprosy are not described in Leviticus 13, presumably because this chapter is concerned with early diagnosis. Advanced leprosy would only be seen in isolation outside the camp.

2. Syphilis is regarded by Spinka as probably the disease called the "botch of Egypt" in Deut. 28:27. It is a disease which from time to time throughout the ages has burst forth in virulent form with high mortality, e.g, Israel in Num. 25:9, and Europe after the discovery of America. It is chiefly spread by sexual intercourse and is often associated with gonorrhea (cf. tsāra'ath associated with "running issue" in Lev. 22:4). Starting with a hard ulcer on the privates, after some weeks raised spots (papular eruptions) appear on the torso and extremities (almost never on the face) devoid of itching. Years later syphilis of the vital organs such as heart, liver or brain may become evident, often with fatal outcome. This late type of syphilis seems to be in view in Prov. 7:22,23 where, referring to a harlot, it says, "He goeth after her straightway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter . . .till a dart strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life." Syphilis may also be present from birth and give rise to abnormalities such as "flat nose" (Lev. 21:18) in which the septal cartilage of the nose is largely destroyed.

3. Smallpox, uncontrolled, is a serious scourge of mankind. It consists of red spots which turn rapidly into blister-like pustules over the entire body including the face. Short suggest that Job's so-called boils (Heb. shehîn) were smallpox, true boils not occurring in such profusion. The Heb. shehîn refers to several types of diseased skin, today referred to as a. papule (a raised red spot), b. vesicle (a small blister containing yellow fluid) called "blain" in KJV and ASV, an archaic word that is found in the 1868 but not the 1957 medical dictionary, c. pustule (a small blister containing pus), d. boil (a deep, broad inflammation about a hair root resulting in death of the tissues in its center with pus formation about this core, the pus discharging through an external opening), e. carbuncle (a large boil with multiple openings), and f. malignant pustule (anthrax).

4. Hezekiah's so-called "boil," which was almost fatal, may well have been a true boil or carbuncle. Another suggestion is that it was anthrax. The local application of a poultice of figs has been recognized therapy for gumboils in comparatively recent times. Its use by Hezekiah at the command of God's prophet (II Kings 20:7) has often been cited as divine approval of the utilization of medicinal means of therapy.

5. Speculation regarding the "boil breaking forth with blains" (Heb. shehîn) upon man and beast in Exod. 9:9 (the sixth plague) has suggested two alternative explanations. a. Both man and beast were infected with virtually the same disease called smallpox in man and cowpox in cattle, the germ of cowpox being originally utilized for vaccination against smallpox. b. The "murrain" of domestic animals of Exod. 9:3 (the fifth plague) was anthrax of animals later transmitted to man as malignant pustule (anthrax). Anthrax, untreated, is a fatal infectious disease, chiefly of cattle and sheep, characterized by the formation of hard lumps and ulcers and symptoms of collapse. In man without modern therapy it is also often fatal.

6. Scabies is called "the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed" (Deut. 28:27). It is caused by a tiny insect allied to spiders which burrows under the skin. The itching is intense. Infection is spread to others through close bodily contact. The ancients knew no cure for it, but it readily responds to modern medicines.

B. Skin diseases not requiring isolation. Non-tsāra'ath skin diseases (Heb. gārāv and yallepheth) are called "scab," "scall" and "scurvy" in the KJV, and probably include what today are known as eczema, psoriasis and impetigo. Of these only impetigo is very contagious, it being of very superficial character without system manifestations. The scurvy of modern medicine, which is cured by citrus fruits by virtue of their vitamin C content, obviously is a different disease from the scurvy of the KJV. Modern scurvy could not occur amongst the fruit and vegetable-eating Israelites and is not a skin disease.

Inflammation is present in wounds, bruises and sores, and is aggravated by accompanying infection when the skin is broken. Wounds are usually due to external violence and when the skin is unbroken are called bruises. A sore, more properly called an ulcer, is a wound in which the skin and underlying tissues are laid open, almost invariably becoming infected, e.g. Heb. yabbāl (Lev. 22:22) which Gesenius defines as a running suppurating sore, but is mistranslated "wen" in both the KJV and ASV, both old and new medical dictionaries failing to give such meaning to the word wen. A wen is properly defined as a sebaceous cyst formed by a hair root which has failed to discharge its oily secretion.

II. Diseases With Primary Internal Manifestations.

A. Plague evidently played a large rôle in OT history. It begins with fever and chills which are followed by prostration, delirium, headache, vomiting and diarrhea. Caused by the germ Pasteurella pestis, two forms of plague occur: a. bubonic and b. pneumonic, both forms being sudden in onset and very serious.

Plague bubo of the right armpit. SD

1. Bubonic Plague apparently broke out among the Philistines when they placed the captured ark of God in an idol temple (I Sam. 5). This disease is transmitted by rats through infected fleas which they carry on their bodies, the fleas transferring to man for livelihood after the rat host dies of the disease. The disease causes the lymph nodes of the groin and armpits to enlarge to the size of walnuts. These enlarged nodes are known as buboes (Heb. 'ŏphālîm, meaning mounds), wrongly called "emerods," i.e., hemorrhoids, in the KJV. This outbreak of bubonic plague was attributed to "mice that mar the land" (I Sam. 6:5 KJV). The Septuagint more vividly says: "In the midst of the land thereof mice were brought forth, and there was a great and deadly destruction in the city . . . and the land swarmed with mice." As does the Chinese word lao-shu today, the Heb. 'akhbār doubtless means rat as well as mouse, no other word for rat occurring in the Bible, although rats are known to have existed in the land since rat skeletons have been found there by archeologists. The recognition of plague breaking out in dwellings (cf. Ps. 91:10), following lines of communication, and its transmission by rats is noteworthy.

2. Pneumonic Plague is transmitted by droplet spray from the mouth. The first case in an epidemic apparently arises from a case of bubonic plague that has been complicated by plague pneumonia. Untreated pneumonic plague is always fatal. The victim goes to bed apparently well and is found dead by morning. It appears very likely that it was either bubonic or pneumonic plague or both that destroyed Sennacherib's army (II Kings 19:35) when 185,000 men were "all dead corpses" by early morning.

B. Consumption (Heb. shahepheth, "wasting disease") doubtless included tuberculosis, malaria, typhoid fever, typhus fever, dysentery, chronic diarrhea, and cholera. These diseases are contagious and are sometimes referred to as pestilences, being especially prevalent under circumstances of impaired nutrition and crowding such as are encountered in the siege of a city, e.g. Jeremiah 21:6,7,9; Deuteronomy 28:21,22.

1. Tuberculosis occurs in acute or chronic form, more commonly the latter. Under the living conditions of OT days, it probably not only attacked the lungs (common form in America today), but also the bones and joints (common in underdeveloped lands today). Crookback, i.e. extreme hunchback of Leviticus 21:20 may result from tuberculosis of the spinal vertebrae, and less commonly from severe back injury. Tuberculosis anywhere in the body may produce fever, defective nutrition with underweight, or discharge of infectious pus (referred to as an "issue" in Leviticus). The disease may produce chronic invalidism or death if the disease process is not arrested.

2. Typhoid Fever and Typhus Fever both give rise to similar symptoms of steady fever and delirium lasting for a matter of weeks, frequently being fatal. Typhoid fever is transmitted through contaminated water, and flies carrying contamination to food and drink. Typhus fever is transmitted to humans by lice which have fed on infected human beings.

3. Malaria is believed to be the great fever with which Peter's mother-in-law was stricken. The burning ague of Leviticus 26:16 and the extreme burning of Deuteronomy 28:22 were probably malaria. Transmitted by certain species of mosquito, malaria is responsible for much chronic illness. A chill followed by fever often subsides in a few hours only to recur more severely some hours later, continuing intermittently thereafter. Death may ensue if untreated.

4. Diarrhea, Dysentery and Cholera, caused by microorganisms taken into the body in contaminated food or drink, were doubtless prevalent in OT times. They are characterized by frequent watery bowel movements, often by vomiting and fever, and, if protracted, by weakness and prostration. Publius' fever and "bloody flux" (Acts 28:8) was probably dysentery, a diarrhea associated with painful spasms of the bowel, ulceration, and infection, either amoebic or bacillary, giving rise to blood and pus in the excreta. As to cholera, it is fatal in half of the cases when modern treatment is not utilized.

III. Diseases Caused By Worms and Snakes.

1. Intestinal Roundworm Infection (Ascariasis) is a common disease today in lands where sanitation is poor, and is believed to have been responsible for Herod Agrippa I's death (Acts 12:21-23). The pinkish yellow roundworm, Ascaris lumbricoides, is about 10 to 16 inches long and 1/5 inch in diameter. Aggregated worms sometimes form a tight ball with their interlocking bodies so as to obstruct the intestine, producing severe pain and copious vomiting of worms. If the obstruction is not promptly relieved by surgery, death may ensue. The roundworm does not chew and devour, but feeds on the nutrient fluids in the bowel and may work its way through diseased portions of the bowel as though it had eaten a hole through it. This writer, when in China, encountered such a worm emerging through a perforation in an inflamed appendix which he was removing surgically. Josephus' account of Herod's death is highly suggestive of intestinal obstruction as produced by these worms.

2. The Guinea Worm, Dracunculus medinensis, formerly called the serpent or dragon worm, has probably been known longer than any other human parasite. It is still found in interior Arabia and the adjacent Red Sea coast. Some regard it as the fiery serpent of Numbers 21. The infection enters the human body through drinking water containing Cyclops (a water insect 1/50 inch long) infected with tiny Guinea worm larvae. In about one year the female worm attains a length of 3 feet, being 1/15th inch in diameter, usually maturing under the skin of the leg or arm. A blister is raised in the skin through which a huge brood of tiny larvae are extruded. This area itches and burns intensely. Death may result from internal complications or severe secondary infection, particularly if the worm becomes broken. The ancient and modern treatment consists in hastening the extrusion of larvae with cold water followed by gradual extraction of the worm. This is done by winding the worm around a stick of wood without breaking it, taking a turn or two of the stick each day. Complete removal takes about 3 weeks. The implication is that Moses with his brass model of the Guinea worm twisted around a wooden stick taught the Israelites how to extract the worm.

3. The Snake-bite which Paul received was doubtless inflicted by a venomous snake of the pit-viper type. Experts today stress that the bite of a venomous snake is not poisonous unless it is accompanied by envenomation, the latter failing to take place if the contents of the poison sac located at the base of the snake's hollow fangs have just previously been completely squeezed out, or if the sac is ineffectively squeezed when the snake strikes. Note envenomation apparently did not take place in Acts 28:3,6, the snake, enraged by the fire, having doubtless repeatedly struck at surrounding objects whereby it exhausted all its venom. At any rate, in a life-saving effort it evidently fastened itself to Paul's hand without squeezing any venom out of its poison sac. This is a frequent occurrence and makes for difficulty in assessing degree of envenomation and evaluating the efficacy of one snake-bite treatment as compared with another. When envenomation with pit-viper venom takes place the tissues may swell to three or four times their normal size in the region of the bite in a few minutes.

IV. Diseases of the Eyes.

1. Epidemic Blindness described in II Kings 6:18, when a whole army was struck with blindness, is not the rarity that some may imagine. The writer, while a missionary in China, was in close contact with an army contingent which was decimated with blindness in a few days. Gonorrhea of the sexual organs had been occurring sporadically. Suddenly this same gonorrhea germ in the midst of unsanitary conditions changed its propensities to produce acute blinding inflammation of the eyes in violent epidemic form, spreading from eye to eye like wildfire, which is one of the recognized potentialities of this germ. Many of the soldiers were permanently blinded. The army troops which had been the most feared for their cruel depredations were suddenly rendered powerless and the condition of the men was pitiful as one saw them trying to grope their way about, the totally blind being led about by the partially blinded.

2. Infirmity (Gal. 4:13) of the Apostle Paul, referred to as his "thorn in the flesh" (II Cor. 12:7), is considered by many authorities to have been trachoma, an infectious eye disease. Early in the disease there is often acute inflammation of the eyelids with sago-like elevations which make the lids feel like sandpaper. This frequently spreads on to the bulb of the eye, especially the cornea, the transparent part of the bulb, which becomes red and inflamed. At this stage, infection with other germs is often added. Copious purulent secretion is poured out over the lid margins, forming a tough, crusting scab as the secretion dries and unites with the greasy secretion of the glands of the lid margin.

It is possible that Paul's blindness encountered on the Damascus road was of this type. For three days the secretion was evidently so severe that it formed incrustations at the lid margins such as to glue and mat together the lashes of the lids, so that the eyelids could not be parted. At the end of this time we are told he saw again after scabs (Gr. lepides, which Hobart says is the medical term for particles or scaly substance thrown off from the body) fell (Gr. apepesan which Hobart points out was used by Hippocrates with reference to "the falling off of the scab, caused by burning in a medical operation, from the eyelid") from his eyes. Subsequently Paul seemingly was afflicted with chronic trachoma as might well be expected. a. He failed to recognize the high priest (Acts 23:2-5). b. The Galatians proffered their good eyes for his (Gal. 4:13-15). c. He wrote with "large letters" (Gal. 6:11 ASV). d. He used amanuenses.

Severe chronic trachoma commonly produces scarring of the eyelids with incurving of the cartilage of the eyelid called entropion which makes the lashes poke into and rub back and forth on the cornea, resulting in a frosted appearance, impaired vision, and blindness if unrelieved. This condition comprises a literal thorn in the flesh of the eye. It is frequently encountered by medical missionaries in underdeveloped lands today. Modern surgery performed on these eyelids produces outcurving of the lids and either transplants or removes the offending eyelashes. Without surgery the only recourse is to pluck out the lashes one by one, but this only affords transient relief since the lash soon reappears as a sharp, stiff stubble which even more effectively sticks into the cornea like a thorn.

V. Nervous and Mental Diseases.

While terminology and explanations of causation regarding emotional and mental diseases have varied greatly through the centuries, there is clear insight in the Scriptures concerning the relationship between the emotional state and physical disease (psychosomatic medicine). This is exemplified in Proverbs 17:22: "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine: but a broken spirit drieth the bones." Here the merry heart might well imply the resolution of excessive emotional tensions in a manner superior to that of any tranquilizer. In contrast, some forms of arthritis occur on an emotional basis, the outcome of a "broken spirit," whereby the bones are seemingly dried of joint lubrication.

Both Elijah and Jonah were men who lapsed into states of extreme nervous exhaustion, often referred to as neurasthenia," a common condition amid the tension of modern days. God's method of dealing with this condition as outlined in the Scriptures in I Kings 19 and in Jonah is a model for modern psychiatric therapy for this condition. In the case of Epaphroditus (Phil. 2:25-30) there is clear recognition then as today of the rôle played by pressure of work and anxiety as he endeavored to accomplish a colossal task unaided by those who should have been his helpers. Doubtless there was physical illness superimposed upon the emotional tension symptoms in his case, as is often encountered in modern times. In addition there are mental diseases which are recognized as disease entities just as distinctive as appendicitis or pneumonia. The general term used in the KJV for those so afflicted is lunatic, although formerly this term referred to epilepsy as well as insanity because of supposed relationship to the phases of the moon. As today, legal responsibility for actions was regarded as tempered by proof of mental incompetence. Hence we find David escaping from Achish by pretending "madness" (I Sam. 21:13-15). Perhaps he was even imitating some of Saul's actions as observed during Saul's state of what the modern psychiatrist would diagnose as manic-depressive insanity, with its periods of black melancholy, flashes of homicidal violence, and deeply rooted delusion that people were plotting against him which characteristically ended in Saul's suicide. Nebuchadnezzar is considered by Short to have been a victim of paranoia, a delusional form of insanity well known to medical science.

VI. Miscellaneous Medical Disorders and Therapy.

1. The woman's issue of blood of 12 years' duration (Luke 8:43,44) was doubtless excessive menstrual flow, a fairly common condition. In its severe form, it is commonly due to fibroid tumor in the womb encroaching upon the lining of the womb. Flooding flow of blood with large clots occurs, depleting the body of blood so as to cause severe anemia. The modern remedy usually employed in this condition is removal of the tumor from the womb or removal of the womb (hysterectomy). This surgery obviously was not available in NT times so that it is quite understandable that all this woman's living was spent on unavailing medical care.

2. In connection with Jesus' agony in Gethsemane, we read that "His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (Luke 22:44 — italics ours). Some have thought that this refers to actual blood-tinged sweat. Short tends to take this point of view despite his confession that this phenomenon must be very rare and is not well authenticated. Rather it seems that the emphasis here is to be put upon the phrase "as it were," referring to the size and weight of the drops of sweat. It should be recalled that this occurred at night. Jesus' enemies carried lanterns and torches, but evidently He had neither. The color of the sweat was therefore unobservable. In the quietude of the garden the heavy drip of large drops of sweat was probably heard and not seen by the disciples, particularly as Jesus came to them to arouse them from sleep. The word drops (Gr. thromboi) when used in connection with blood usually means "clots." It may be that the simile here includes that idea, i.e. the drops of sweat sounded like blood clots falling on the ground.

3. Timothy was admonished to shun profane babblings on the basis that "their word will eat as doth a canker" (II Tim. 2:17 KJV — italics ours). The word canker is more appropriately rendered gangrene in the ASV, the Greek word being ganggraina. Gangrene means local death of the tissues. Common forms of gangrene are: (a) gas gangrene, a rapidly fatal type caused by a spreading gas-forming germ in muscles after recent injury; (b) diabetic gangrene a "dry" gangrene which spreads less rapidly, caused by circulatory impairment associated with uncontrolled diabetes; (c) septic gangrene which spreads from the edges of infected ulcers.

4. Dropsy (Luke 14:2), in modern medical language called edema, is a condition in which the tissues retain too much fluid. It may be caused by heart disease, kidney disease, or local infection, and may terminate fatally.

5. Dumbness, i.e. inability to speak, may arise from deafness since difficulty naturally is encountered in reproducing unheard sounds. It also may arise from hemorrhage (apoplexy) or thrombosis (clotting) in relation to the blood vessels of one or more of the speech centers of the brain. Often a marked degree of recovery takes place in these instances of so-called stroke as the clotted blood is gradually absorbed from the affected area. Such may have happened to Zacharias (Luke 1:20-22, 64), whereas Nabal (I Sam. 25:36-38) evidently experienced a fatal stroke.

6. Of similar nature to stroke of the brain is coronary occlusion (of an artery of the heart), commonly referred to as a heart attack, such as apparently took place when David's heart smote him (II Sam. 24:10).

7. A dwarf such as is referred to in Leviticus 21:20 may have been dwarfed through tuberculosis or injury of the spine, but deficiency of thyroid function such as is found in cretinism is also a likely cause. In the latter condition there is also usually mental deficiency which comprises added reason for not permitting such an individual to participate in priestly service. Cretinism today responds well to thyroid extract therapy if administered early in life.

8. As to orthopedic conditions, reference is made to the maimed (those whose bodies are deprived of a part) and the halt (those who limp in walking because of lameness from a disabled lower extremity). The latter may be due to a fracture which has healed in an unfavorable position or it may be due to atrophy (wasting) of the muscles. Atrophy of a hand is referred to as a withered hand in Luke 6:6. Atrophy usually results from palsy or paralysis (synonymous terms), a condition characterized by loss of control of movement of muscles through disease or destruction of nerves or nervous tissue.

9. Frequent instances of unspecified sickness occur throughout the Biblical record. It is noteworthy that some of these cases of sickness did not experience divine healing. For example, Paul informs us, "Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick" (II Tim. 4:20). Also Paul tells us concerning himself that his thrice-repeated prayer for the removal of his thorn in the flesh was answered not by removal of his infirmity but by the bestowal of more grace (II Cor. 12:8-10). It therefore does not follow that the Bible teaches that all Christians are entitled to divine healing by virtue of being Christians.

James exhorts that the church elders be called to pray for the sick. He also directs "anointing with oil in the name of the Lord" (James 5:14). The latter has perhaps wrongfully been assumed to refer to a church ritual. Bauer's Greek Lexicon states that the Greek verb aleípho, used for "anointing," commonly referred to rubbing oil on the skin as a household remedy, corresponding to the modern household remedy of rubbing camphorated oil on the skin. It would seem to be James' meaning that the sick one is not only to be prayed for but the commonly accepted remedies are also to be applied as an indication of compassionate concern so that all that can be done to help the sick is done. Jesus' disciples made similar use of the application of oil to the sick (Mark 6:13). P.E.A.

DISH, a receptacle for food, generally made of baked clay, or else of metal. The "chargers" of Numbers 7 were large flat dishes of beaten silver; but most of the dishes in Scripture were pottery. "Bosom" in Proverbs 19:24, 26:15 should be "dish." Orientals ate from a central platter or dish, generally using a thin piece of bread for a spoon and handling the food quite daintily (Matt. 26:23). A special courtesy consisted in picking out a good piece of meat from the central dish and handing it to a guest. See POTTERY.

DISHAN (dĭ'shăn), the seventh son of Seir, the Horite. (Gen. 36:21, etc.).

DISHON (dĭ'shŏn). 1. A chief among the Horites (Gen. 36:21).

2. A great-grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:25). The two may, however, be the same.

DISPENSATION (dĭspĕn-sā'shŭn, Gr. oikonomía, law or arrangement of a house), a word that appears in the Bible four times, all of them in the NT: I Corinthians 9:17; Ephesians 1:10, 3:2; Colossians 1:25. In the first two and the fourth it means "stewardship," "office," "commission" — words involving the idea of administration. Thus Paul says in I Corinthians 9:17, "I have been entrusted with a commission"; in Ephesians 3:2, "you have heard of the stewardship of God's grace that was granted to me for you; and in Colossians 1:25, "according to the divine office which has been granted to me for you." In Ephesians 1:10, a linguistically difficult passage, the word dispensation refers to God's plan of salvation which He is bringing to reality through Christ, in the fulness of times. The idea of administration is involved here, too, but it is considered from the divine side. The stewardship, or arrangement, for man's redemption, is God's. The NT therefore uses the word in a twofold sense: with respect to one in authority, it means an arrangement or plan; with respect to one under authority, it means a stewardship or administration.

The modern theological use of the term as a "period of time during which man is tested in respect to obedience to some specific revelation of the will of God" (Scofield Reference Bible, p.5) is not found in Scripture. Scofield divides the whole of time from the creation to the judgment into seven dispensations. The Scriptures do indeed make a distinction between the way God manifested His grace in what may be called the "Old Covenant" and the way His grace has been manifested since the death of Christ in what may be called the "New Covenant." It is this that Paul has in mind when he speaks of God's dispensations in Ephesians and Colossians. In God's redemptive plan the era of law prepared the way, by types and shadows, for the new era of salvation through Christ, which in the NT is regarded as the climax of history (Heb. 1:2). S.B.

DISPERSION (See Diaspora)

DIVES (dī'vēz, Lat. rich), a name applied to the rich man in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31) in the Vulgate. It renders the Greek word ploúsios.

DIVINATION (dĭv'ĭ-nā'shŭn), the attempt to obtain secret knowledge, especially of the future, either by inspiration (Acts 16:16) or by the reading and interpreting of certain signs called omens. Those who practice divination assume that the gods or spirits are in possession of secret knowledge desired by men and that they can be induced to impart it. Divination was highly developed by all ancient peoples — the Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, etc. — and even the Hebrews practiced it, although it was severely condemned by Moses and the prophets. Deuteronomy 18:10f is the classical passage on this subject. There were various modes of divination: by reading omens, dreams, both involuntary and those induced by what is called "incubation," i.e. by sleeping in some sacred place where the god revealed his secrets to the sleeper; the use of the lot; hydromancy or foretelling from the appearance of water; astrology or the determination of the supposed influence of the heavenly bodies on the destiny of a person or nation; rhabdomancy, or the use of the divining rod (Hosea 4:12; Ezek. 8:17); hepatoscopy, or divination by an examination of the liver of animals; necromancy, or consulting the dead; and the sacrifice of children by burning.

S.B.

DIZAHAB (dī'zȧ-hăb), a place located in the region of Sinai, or possibly farther north where Moses gave his farewell address to the Israelites (Deut. 1:1).

DOCTOR (Gr. didáskalos, teacher). The word didáskalos appears many times in the NT, but is rendered doctor only in Luke 2:46. It is usually rendered master or teacher, whether referring to Jesus or other teachers.

DODAI (dō'dī), David's captain over 24,000 men whose service culminated in the second month of each year. (I Chron. 27:4).

DODANIM (dō'dȧ-nĭm), the fourth son of Javan, the son of Japheth (Gen. 10:4). In the LXX, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and in the Hebrew text of I Chron. 1:7 it is written "Rodanim."

DODAVAH (dō'dȧ-vȧ), father of Eliezer, who prophesied against Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 20:37).

DODO (dō'dō). 1. A man of Issachar, grandfather of the judge Tola. (Judg. 10:1).

2. A son of Ahohi, and father of Eleazar the second of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:9).

3. A man of Bethlehem whose son Elhanan was one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:24).

DOEG (dō'ĕg), an Edomite whom Saul had made chief of his herdsmen. When David, fleeing from Saul, came to Nob, Doeg was being detained "before the Lord" for some reason. He reported to Saul about Ahimelech, the priest helping David (I Sam. 21:1-9). In revenge, Saul gathered all the house of Ahimelech and Doeg slew them, 85 priests, all the women and children of the village, and killed even the cattle. (I Sam. 22:11-23).

DOG (See Animals)

DOOR (Heb. pethah, opening, doorway, deleth, door — the swinging part, Gr. thúra. Doors in ancient times turned on pivots turning in sockets above and below, and were frequently two-leaved. The word is often used in the NT in a figurative sense, many times referring to Christ (John 10:1,2,7; Rev. 3:20); but also to opportunity (Matt. 25:10; Acts 14:27; I Cor. 16:9), and freedom and power (Col. 4:3).

DOORKEEPER. Public buildings, temples and walled cities had special officers to keep the doors; see Psalm 84:10: "I had rather be a doorkeeper"; John 18:16,17, "the maid that kept the door," etc. Generally in the English Bible the word is "porter," e.g. II Sam. 18:26, "the watchman called unto the porter."

DOPHKAH (dŏf'kȧ), a station of the Israelites, between the Red Sea and Sinai (Num. 33:12), about 25 miles NW of Mt. Sinai.

DOR (dôr), a very ancient Canaanite city on the coast of Palestine, about eight miles north of Caesarea. In Joshua 11:12 for "borders of Dor" read "heights of Dor" and similarly for "coast of Dor" in Joshua 12:23. Its ruler fought against Joshua, but he conquered Dor (Josh. 11:1-8). In Judges 1:27 it is mentioned as one of the towns not occupied by the Israelites. Its place is now occupied by the village of Tantura.

DORCAS (dôr'kăs, Gr. Dorkás, a gazelle), an early Christian disciple living at Joppa, who was well known for her works of charity. When she died, Peter was sent for. He prayed and she was raised from the dead. As a result, many believed (Acts 9:36-43).

DOTHAN (dō'thăn, Heb. dōthān, possibly two wells), a place in the boundaries between the tribes of Manasseh and Issachar, about 13 miles N of Shechem. Gesenius says its name derives from the Chaldaic "Dothain," i.e., "two wells," and if that is correct, it adds interest to the story of Joseph's brethren casting him into a dry well-pit there (Gen. 37:24). Nearly a millennium after Joseph's experience, the prophet Elisha (II Kings 6:13) was dwelling at Dothan when the king of Syria tried to capture him with an army, for he had learned that Elisha was able to tell his plans to the king of Israel, Joram. When Elisha's servant informed him that a great host surrounded Dothan, Elisha prayed that the Lord would open his servant's eyes, and the servant saw angelic hosts defending his master.

DOUGH, the soft mass of moistened flour or meal which after baking becomes bread or cake. The word may apply before the mass has been raised by yeast as in Exod. 12:34,39, but generally after raising, as in Jeremiah 7:18 and Hosea 7:4.

DOVE (See Birds)

DOVE COTE, referring to the openings of pigeon-houses, is not found in the KJV, ERV, ASV, or RSV. It is found in the Moffatt translation. Isaiah 60:8, "Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?" is the only Biblical reference to dove cotes. In ancient times pigeon-houses had many openings. Pigeons were kept for food, for sport, and for their dung.

DOVE'S DUNG, mentioned only in II Kings 6:25 as a food to which the famished people of Samaria were reduced. See PLANTS.

DOWRY (dou'rē), the price paid by the suitor to the parents of the prospective bride; also the portion which the bride brought to her husband. Genesis 30:20, 34:12, Exodus 22:17, and I Samuel 18:25 illustrate various uses of the word.

DRACHMA (See Money)

DRAGON. The Hebrew word tannîn is variously translated "dragon," "whale," "serpent," or "sea-monster." It referred to an imaginary creature of great size and frightening aspect. A number of passages in the KJV rendered "dragon" are more correctly translated "jackal" in the RV (Job 30:29; Ps. 44:19; Isa. 13:22; etc.) In the NT, Satan is portrayed in the Book of Revelation by means of dragon imagery (12:9; 20:2).

DRAM (See Weights and Measures)

DRAUGHT HOUSE, a privy or water-closet. In some Oriental cities unspeakably filthy, and so Jehu (II Kings 10:27) gave the utmost disgrace to the temple of Baal, whose worship he extirpated. See Mark 7:19.

DRAWER OF WATER. Bringing water from a well or a spring to the house was generally relegated to the servants, and was heavy work (Deut. 29:11; Josh. 9:23-27). Sometimes the girls did it. (Gen. 24:19-25).

DREAM. In early patriarchal times, God often appeared in theophany to godly men but from the time of Jacob and onward His revelations were more often in dreams. (Contrast for instance the experience of Abraham in Genesis 18 with that of Jacob in Genesis 28:10-17). He could reveal His will in dreams today, but the written Word of God, and the indwelling Holy Spirit have made dreams of this sort unnecessary. (Contrast Num. 12:6 with Jude 8). Frequently in ancient times God spoke in dreams to persons outside the chosen family, e.g. to Abimelech of Gerar (Gen. 20:3), to Laban (Gen. 31:24), to the butler and baker of Pharaoh (Gen. 40:8-19), to Pharaoh himself (Gen. 41:1-36) then much later to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. 2:1-45, 4:5-33) etc. In these dreams, the meaning was clear enough to need no interpretation, as in those of Abimelech and Laban, or else God caused one of his servants to interpret the meaning, as in the latter cases. One principle of interpretation seems quite evident: when the symbol is in the natural realm, the interpretation is in the human realm; e.g. when Joseph dreamed of the sun, moon and eleven stars bowing to him, his brethren immediately knew the meaning as referring to his father, mother and brethren (Gen. 37:9-11). When the symbol is in the human realm, as in Daniel 7:8, "eyes like the eyes of a man and a mouth speaking great things," the interpretation is in the spiritual realm. Dreams may lead men astray, but God's Word tells how to deal with this situation (Deut. 13:1-3; cf. I John 4:1-6), Jeremiah 23:25-32 and other passages speak of lying prophets, perhaps akin to spiritists and other deceivers of today. Notice the contrast between Mary, to whom God spake directly by the Angel Gabriel (Luke 1:26-35), and Joseph, to whom the angel appeared in a dream (Matt. 1:20-24). A.B.F.

DRESS. Our knowledge of the kind of clothing worn by the people of Biblical times comes from Scriptural statements; from representations of the people and their clothing we find on monuments, reliefs, seals, plaques, and tomb-paintings; and from graves and tomb remains.

All these, coupled with the traditions and usages extant among the present Bedouin Arab tribes, lead us to the conclusion that at a very early period of man's existence he learned the art of spinning and weaving cloth of hair, wool, cotton, flax, and eventually silk (Gen. 14:23; Gen. 31:18,19; 37:3; 38:28; Job 7:6; Ezek. 16:10,13), and from these established certain simple styles which were continued from generation to generation, then carried by Esau and Ishmael and their descendants into Arabia, where the Arab continued them through the centuries — always with a feeling that it was decidedly wrong to change.

When the Arabs overran the larger part of the Bible lands in the sixth century A.D., they returned with these patterns of clothing, and in general have so nearly continued the basic forms that in unspoiled areas much the same garments will be worn today as were worn by Jacob of OT times, and by Jesus of NT times.

The clothing worn by the Hebrew people of Biblical times was graceful, modest, and exceedingly significant. They were considered so much a part of those who wore them that they not only told who and what they were, but were intended as external symbols of the individual's innermost feelings and deepest desires, and his moral urge to represent God aright. With certain kinds of cloth and with astonishingly vivid colors of white, purple, scarlet, blue, yellow, and black, they represented the state of their minds and emotions. When joyful and ready to enter into festive occasions, they donned their clothing of brightest array, and when they mourned or humbled themselves, they put on sackcloth — literally cloth from which sacks were made — which was considered the very poorest kind of dress, and quite indicative of their lowly feelings (I Kings 20:31,32; Job 16:15; Isa. 15:3; Jer. 4:8; 6:26; Lam. 2:10; Ezek. 7:18; Dan. 9:3; Joel 1:8).

When a person's heart was torn by grief, the inner emotions were given expression by "rending" or tearing the garments (Mark 14:63; Acts 11:14). To confirm an oath, or seal a contract, a man plucked off his shoe and gave it to his neighbor. When Jonathan made a covenant with David, he went even farther, and gave him his own garments.

There was variety in clothing such as characterized the people from the various lands adjacent to Palestine, and within the narrow confines of the country itself there was a distinctive clothing that set off the Canaanite from the Philistine. Among the Hebrews there were slight differences in dress as characterized ranks, trades, and professions. Yet it was little less than amazing how similar were the general patterns worn. The variety for the most part was in quality and in decoration. Clothing was colored red, brown, yellow, etc., but white was much preferred. It denoted purity, cleanliness, and joy. Princes, priests, and kings of near eastern countries wore purple, except on special occasions when they often dressed in white garments. Others sometimes wore white on the occasions of joy and gladness. But in general the people wore darker colors, yet they tended toward the brighter side.

The basic garments in general used among the men of Biblical times, seem to have consisted of the inner-tunic, the tunic-coat, the girdle, and the cloak. Added to this was the head-dress, and the shoes or sandals.

Arab peasant types, who still wear clothing very similar to that worn in Bible days. © MPS

1. The inner-tunic or undershirt, which in cooler weather the male members of the oriental family wore next to the body, was usually made of a long piece of plain cotton or linen cloth made into a short shirt-like under-garment. At times it was little more than a loin-cloth in length, and at other times it reached below the knees, or even just above the ankles. It was not usually worn when the weather was warm. The KJV refers to such under-garments worn by priests as "breeches" (Exod. 28:42).

2. The tunic-coat or Ketonet was a close-fitting shirt-like garment which was the most frequently worn garment in the home and on the street. In ancient times it was frequently of one solid color, but at the present it is more often made of a gaily-colored striped cotton material which among the Arabs is often called "the cloth of seven colors" because of the narrow vertical stripes of green, red, yellow, blue, and white which alternate. It was lined with a white cotton material, and worn over the undershirts when it was cool, but next to the body when the weather was warm. This garment usually had long sleeves, and extended down to the ankles when worn as a dress coat, and was held in place by a girdle. Hard-working men, slaves, and prisoners wore them more abbreviated — sometimes even to their knees, and without sleeves — as shown on the Behistun inscription.

On Sennacherib's Lachish relief (701 B.C.), the elders and important men of the city are shown wearing long dress-like white tunics which came well down near the ankles. These garments were pure white, with no decorations, and no girdle to hold them. In this and other reliefs, however, the Hebrews had just been taken captive and were prisoners of war, therefore could well have been divested of all but their basic garments.

3. The girdle was either a cloth or a leather belt, which was worn over the loose coat-like skirt or shirt. The cloth girdle, ordinarily worn by village and townspeople, was a square yard of woolen, linen, or even silk cloth first made into a triangle, then folded into a sash-like belt about five to eight inches wide and some 36 inches long. When drawn about the waist, and the tapering ends tied in the back, it not only girded the loins but its folds formed a pocket in which was carried a variety of articles such as nuts, loose change, and other small objects or treasures. It was worn by both men and women and the model woman of Proverbs 31 made them to sell to the merchants. The girdle is not only a picturesque article of dress, but also may indicate the position and office of the wearer. It is sometimes used to signify power and strength (II Sam. 22:40; Isa. 11:5; Jer. 13:1; Eph. 6:14).

Clothing worn by men and women was similar in appearance in many respects, but with important differences. KC © FC

The leather girdle or belt was from two to six inches wide, and was frequently studded with iron, silver, or gold. It was worn by soldiers, by men of the desert, and by countrymen who tended cattle or engaged in the rougher pursuits of life. This type of girdle was sometimes supported by a shoulder strap, and provided a means whereby various articles such as a scrip (a small bag or wallet for carrying small articles), sword, dagger, or other valuables could be carried. It was the kind of girdle worn by Elijah (II Kings 1:8) and by John the Baptist (Matt. 3:4). Today the laborer and the poorer classes use rawhide or rope for a girdle; the better classes use some woolen or camel's hair sashes of different widths. The women wear long garments reaching to the feet, and a girdle of silk or wool, usually having all the colors of the rainbow, and with fringe hanging from the waist nearly to the ankles.

The girdle, whether made of cloth or leather, was a very useful article of clothing in that it so frequently entered into so many activities of everyday life. When one was to walk, or run, or enter into any type of service he "girded himself" for the journey or for the task at hand. Thus it was that girded loins were a symbol of readiness for service or endeavor. Isaiah said of the Messiah that righteousness should be "the girdle of his waist and faithfulness the girdle of his loins" (Isa. 11:5), and Paul spoke of the faithful Christian as having his "loins girt about with truth" (Eph. 6:14).

4. The cloak, mantle, or robe was a large, loose-fitting garment, which for warmth and appearance was worn over all other articles of clothing as a completion of male attire. It was distinguished by its greater size and by the absence of the girdle. It existed in two varieties, which were usually known as the "me-il," and the "simlah."

The me-il was a long, loose-sleeved robe or public dress which was worn chiefly by men of official position and by ministers, educators, and the wealthy. It was the robe of the professions (I Sam. 2:18,19), a dress of dignity, culture, and distinction — the mark of high rank and station (I Sam. 24:11; I Chron. 15:27). It was rich in appearance and could well have been the "coat of many colors" which Jacob gave to Joseph, or the like of which Hannah made and brought to Samuel from year to year as he ministered before the Lord at Shiloh (I Sam. 2:18,19). In its finest form, it must have been the high priests' "robe of the ephod with its fringes of bells and pomegranates swaying and swinging and tinkling" as he walked (Exod. 28:31-38). It is generally understood that there were two kinds of ephods — one with its rich and elaborate insignia and paraphernalia peculiar to the office of high priest, and by the other a more simple "linen ephod" worn by leaders of distinction other than the high priests (II Sam. 6:14).

The simlah was the large, loose-fitting sleeveless cloak or mantle which, in general pattern, corresponds to the long and flowing garment which the Arab shepherd and peasant call an abba or abayeh. They wear it by day, and wrap themselves in it by night, therefore it was not to be taken in pledge unless it was returned by sundown (Exod. 22:26).

These simple yet picturesque garments were usually made of wool, goat-hair, or camel-hair. Men of distinction frequently wore more colorful cloaks called "robes," which were made of linen, wool, velvet, or silk, elaborately bordered and lined with fur.

This long outer garment or top-coat was, in all probability, the "mantle" worn by Elijah and Elisha (II Kings 2:8-14). It was the camel's-hair garment worn by John the Baptist (Matt. 3:4). It is frequently made of alternate strips of white, red, and brown, or is formed by sewing together two lengths of cloth so that the only seams required were those along the top of the shoulders. In unusual cases, however, the cloak is woven of one broad width, with no seam. Such, many believe, was the garment, wrongly translated "coat," which Christ wore, and over which, at the crucifixion, the Roman soldiers "cast lots" rather than "rend" it, for it "was without seam, woven from the top throughout" (John 19:23).

On Shalmaneser's Black Obelisk (ninth century B.C.), the artist shows Israelite men wearing long cloaks or mantles with elaborate fringed borders both on the cutaway fronts and along the bottom. These were in keeping with the Mosaic injunction to make them blue "fringes in the borders of their garments" that they might remember to do all the commandments and be holy unto God (Num. 15: 38-40; Deut. 22:12).

The word "skirt," found a number of times in the Bible (KJV), usually refers to an article of male, not female, clothing, and has a number of meanings: (1) "extremity" (Ruth 3:9, (2) "corner" (I Sam. 24:4ff), (3) "hem" (Exod. 28:33), (4) "collar" (Ps. 133:2).

5. The headdress was chiefly worn as a protection against the sun and a finish to a completed costume. It varied from time to time according to rank, sex, and nationality. In the main, however, there were three known types that were worn by the male members of the Hebrew and surrounding nations; the cap, the turban, and the head-scarf.

The ordinary brimless cotton or woolen cap, corresponding somewhat to our skull-cap, was sometimes worn by men of poorer circumstances. Captives are seen wearing these as they are depicted on the Behistun Rock. The turban (hood, RV in Isa. 3:23) was made of thick linen material and formed by winding a scarf or sash about the head in artistic style and neatly concealing the ends. That of the high priest was called a mitre (Exod. 28).

The head-scarf, known among the Arabs as the kaffiyeh, is usually made up of a square yard of white or colored cotton, wool, or silk cloth folded into a triangle and draped about the head. The apex of the triangle falls directly down the back, forming a V point, while the tapering ends are thrown back over the shoulders, or in cold weather they are wrapped about the neck. This graceful head-scarf is held in position by an ajhal, which is made of several soft woolen or silk twists bound by ornamental threads, and worn in coils about the head. An ornamental tassel falls to the side or down the back. When Ben-hadad's shattered Syrian army realized the serious loss it had suffered, some of his men suggested to him that they "put sackcloth on their loins and ropes upon their heads" and go to the king of Israel, hoping he would save their lives (I Kings 20:31,32).

Shoes and sandals were considered the lowliest articles that went to make up the wearing apparel of the people of Bible Lands (Mark 1:7). In the Bible, and in secular sources, they were mentioned at a very early period, and are seen in considerable variety on the Egyptian, Babylonian, Assyrian, and Persian monuments. A pair of terra cotta shoes, of the modern snow-shoe variety, were found in an Athenian grave of about 900 B.C.

Shoes were of soft leather, while sandals were of a harder leather. The sandals were worn for rougher wear. According to some authorities, the sole was of wood, cane, or sometimes bark of the palm tree and was fastened to the leather by nails. They were tied about the feet with thongs, or shoe-latchets (Gen. 14:23; Neh. 1:7). It was customary to have two pairs, especially on a journey.

Shoes were usually removed at the doorway before entering a home, on approaching God (Exod. 3:5), and during mourning (II Sam. 15:30). Property rights were secured by the seller pulling off his shoe and giving it to the purchaser (Ruth 4:7). The "clouts" referred to in Josh. 9:5 are patched shoes.

Women's Dress. Among the Hebrews neither sex was permitted by Mosaic law to wear the same form of clothing as was used by the other (Deut. 22:5). A few articles of female clothing carried somewhat the same name and basic pattern, yet there was always sufficient difference in embossing, embroidery, and needlework so that in appearance the line of demarcation between men and women could be readily detected.

The women wore long garments reaching almost to the feet, with a girdle of silk or wool, many times having all the colors of the rainbow. Often such a garment would have a fringe hanging from the waist nearly to the ankles.

The ladies' head-dress, for example, usually included some kind of a kaffiyeh or cloth for covering the head, yet the material that was in that covering was of a different quality, kind, or color from that worn by the men. And, also, it was frequently pinned over some kind of a cap made of stiff material and set with pearls, silver, gold, or spangled ornaments common to that day. If a woman was married, these or other more significant coins covered the entire front of her cap and constituted her dowry. Her under garments would be made of material such as cotton, linen, or silk, as might befit her wealth or station in life. She would probably wear a long skirt with long, pointed sleeves. Over this was a small rather tightly-fitting jacket or "petticoat" — meaning little coat. The small jacket would be made of "scarlet" or other good material and was a thing of exquisite beauty because of its being covered with "tapestry" or fine needlework, wrought with multi-colored threads. A woman of even moderate circumstances could have beautiful clothing, for it was "the fruit of her own hands" (Prov. 31:19).

In the OT many articles of women's clothing are mentioned which cannot be exactly identified. Ezekiel 13:18,21 refers to a "kerchief" (Heb. mispahah), a head-covering or veil of some sort, the exact nature of which is unknown. Isa. 3:16-24 speaks of "mufflers," probably two-piece veils, one part covering the face below the eyes; the other, the head, down over the neck; "wimples," rendered "shawls" in the RV; "stomachers," which in the English means that part of a woman's dress which covered the breast and the pit of the stomach — usually much ornamented, but the meaning of the Hebrew is unknown; also "crisping-pins," and "cauls" (RV), which cannot be identified.

Women often added to their adornment by an elaborate "plaiting" of the hair. I Peter 3:3 finds it necessary to warn Christian women against relying upon such adorning to make themselves attractive. In the OT there are a number of references to painting the eyes in order to enhance their beauty, but it is always spoken of as a meretricious device, unworthy of good women. Jezebel painted her eyes (II Kings 9:30).

In ancient times women especially were much given to various kinds of ornaments. Earrings and nose-rings were especially common. On account of their drop-like shape, earrings are called "pendants" (Isa. 3:19), "chains" (Isa. 3:19 KJV), and "collars" (Judg. 8:26). Men also wore such earrings (Gen. 35:4; Judg. 8:24). The nose-ring, or nose-jewel made necessary the piercing of the nostrils. Rings were worn by both men and women. All ancient Israelites wore signet-rings (Gen. 38:18). Rings were often worn on the toes; anklets (spangles) on the ankles (Isa. 3:18); bracelets on the arms and wrists (Gen. 24:22; Ezek. 16:11).

Beginning about the second century B.C., all male Jews were expected to wear at morning prayers, except on sabbaths, and festivals two phylacteries, one on the forehead, called a frontlet, the other on the left arm. They consisted of small leather cases containing four passages of Scripture from the OT; Exodus 13:1-10, 11-16; Deuteronomy 6:4-9; 11:13-21. G.F.O. & S.B.

DRINK. The most common beverage of the Jews was water. This was procured chiefly in two ways, by means of cisterns, which were possessed by every well-appointed house (II Sam. 17:18; Jer. 38:6) and by means of wells, which were rare and were usually the possession of a clan or community.

Wine was also widely used, both in the form of new wine, called must, and fermented wine. In the heat of harvest frequent use was made of a sour drink consisting of a mixture of water and wine, and of a strong drink, called shekhar, the method of preparing which is unknown. Wine was sometimes spiced to improve its taste. Wine was also made from pomegranates, and possibly also from ripe dates and barley. The Mishna also speaks of honey-wine and cider.

Next to bread and vegetables the most important food was milk, both of larger and smaller cattle, especially goat's milk. This was usually kept in skins. Because of the hot climate, fresh milk soon became sour, but it was very effective for quenching thirst. S.B.

DRINK OFFERING, an offering of oil and wine made to God as a part of the Levitical worship. Such offerings accompanied many of the sacrifices (Exod. 29:40,41). They were presented at all set feasts (Lev. 23:13,18,37). The heathen also made drink offerings to their gods (Deut. 32:38). See OFFERINGS.

DROMEDARY (See Animals)

DROPSY (See Diseases)

DROSS, the refuse in impure metals which is generally separated by melting, when the dross rises to the top and may be skimmed off. Used figuratively of what is worthless (Isa. 1:22,25; Ezek. 22:18,19; Ps. 119:119).

DRUNKENNESS. The Scriptures show that drunkenness was one of the major vices of antiquity, even among the Hebrews. Among the better-known cases of intoxication are the following: Noah (Gen. 9:21), Lot (Gen. 19:33,35), Nabal (I Sam. 25:36), Uriah (II Sam. 11:13), Amnon (II Sam. 13:28), Elah, king of Israel (I Kings 16:9), and Benhadad, king of Syria (I Kings 20:16). The prophets frequently denounce drunkenness as a great social evil of the wealthy. Even the women were guilty (Amos 4:1). The symptoms and effects of strong drink are vividly pictured in the Bible (Job 12:25; Ps. 107:27; Isa. 28:7; Hosea 4:11; etc.). While the writers of Scripture condemn intemperance in the strongest terms, they do not prescribe total abstinence as a formal and universal rule. Nevertheless, the principles laid down point in that direction. In ancient times the poor could not afford to drink to excess. The cheapening of alcoholic drinks has made drunkenness a much greater social problem in modern times. The following passages state principles which point to voluntary abstinence from all intoxicants: Matt. 16:24f; Mark 9:42f; Rom. 14:13-21; I Cor. 8:8-13. Drunkenness is sometimes used figuratively (Isa. 29:9). S.B.

DRUSILLA (drōō-sĭl'ȧ, Gr. Droúsilla), the youngest of the three daughters of Herod Agrippa I, her sisters being Bernice and Mariamne. At the age of 14 she married Azizus, king of Emesa, but left him for Felix, procurator of Judea, who was captivated by her beauty and employed a Cyprian sorcerer to gain her for his wife. They had one son, Agrippa, who died in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius. When Paul unsparingly preached before Felix and Drusilla of righteousness, temperance, and judgment, Felix trembled (Acts 24:24,25). See HEROD.

DUKE (Heb. 'allûph and nāsîkh). These Hebrew words are sometimes rendered "duke" (especially when used of the leaders of the Edomites), "princes," "principal men," and "governor." In general, they mean a leader of a clan or a tribal chief. See Genesis 36:15ff; Exodus 15:15; I Chronicles 1:5lff; Joshua 13:21.

DUMAH (dū'mȧ, Heb. dûmâh, silence). 1. One of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen. 25:14-16) and apparently head of one of the twelve tribes of Ishmaelites in Arabia.

2. A place (unknown) but connected with Seir or Edom (Isa. 21:11-12). The designation may be symbolic, applying to all Edom and indicating its coming destruction. (Cf. Obad. 1:15,16).

3. A village in the S of Judah and associated with Hebron in Joshua 15:52-54.

DUMBNESS (See Diseases)

DUNG, the excrement of man or beast. In several of the offerings, under the Levitical priesthood the blood and the fat and the flesh were used, but the skins and the dung were discarded or burnt outside the camp (Exod. 29:14; Lev. 8:17). The ultimate disgrace was to have one's carcass treated as dung (II Kings 9:37). Dry dung was (and is) often used as fuel (See Ezek. 4:12-15). Paul counted his natural advantages as dung (ASV "refuse") compared with his blessings in Christ.

DUNG GATE, one of the eleven gates of the Jerusalem of Nehemiah's time (See Neh. 3, especially v. 14). It was located near the SW corner of the wall, and was used for the disposal of rubbish, garbage and dung. It led out to the valley of Hinnom.

DURA (dū'rȧ), a plain in the province of Babylon where Nebuchadnezzar set up his great image of gold to be worshipped (Dan. 3:1).

DWARF (Heb. daq, thin, small, withered), an abnormally small person, but in Leviticus 21:20 one of those twelve sorts of unfortunate people who could not officiate at the altar, but who with their brethren, the Levites, could eat the bread of their God. See DISEASES.

EAR (Heb. 'ōzen, Gr. oús, otíon, the physical organ of hearing). In Biblical times people spoke to each other's ears; instead of listening they "inclined their ears." When they prayed, God "bowed down His ear" to hear them. The ear had a significant part in some Jewish ceremonies. It was sanctified by blood in the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood. (Exod. 29:20; Lev. 8:24) and at the cleansing of a leper (Lev. 14:14). The piercing of the ear of a slave denoted permanent servitude (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

EARING (ēr'ing, Heb. hārîsh, ploughing time), translated "earing" in KJV, the RV rendering is plowing (Gen 45:6; Exod. 34:21).

EARNEST (êr'nĕst, Gr. arrábon), a legal term in English law denoting the payment of a sum of money to make a contract binding, guaranteeing a further payment to fulfill the contract. Thus the significance of the apostle Paul's use of this word in regard to the Holy Spirit in three passages may be understood (II Cor. 1:22; 5:5; Eph. 1:14). The gift of the Holy Spirit to believers is the assurance that their redemption will be fully carried out.

EARRING (ēr'rĭng, Heb. nezem, 'āghîl, hoop). The ancient Hebrews had no specific word for earrings; these jewels were just rings or hoops made of gold (though sometimes the metal is not specified). They were worn by men and women either on the nose or on the ears: a nose-ring in the following passages (Gen. 24:47; Isa. 3:21; Ezek. 16:12), and earrings in these references (Gen. 35:4; Exod. 32:2,3; Ezek. 16:12). In the rest of the passages where such rings or hoops are mentioned they may be either nose rings or earrings (Exod. 35:22; Num. 31:50; Judg. 8:24-26; Job 42:11; Prov. 11:22; 25:12; Hosea 2:13). When worn as earrings the ring was passed through a hole pierced in the lobe of the ear. Probably pendants were suspended from them. In Isaiah 3:20 the Hebrew term lachash is translated earrings in KJV, but this word actually means an amulet.

EARTH (Heb. 'ădhāmâh, ground, 'erets, earth, Gr. gē, earth, oikouméne, inhabited earth; kósmos, orderly arrangement). 'ădhāmâh most commonly means the tilled reddish soil of Palestine. But it is also used to denote a piece of real estate property (Gen. 47:18ff1); earth as a material substance (Gen. 2:7); a territory (Gen. 28:15); the whole earth (Gen. 12:3; Deut. 14:2).

'Erets denotes commonly the earth as opposed to the sky (Gen. 1:1; Josh. 2:11); also very frequently it means land in the sense of a country (Gen. 13:10; 45:18). In the New Testament gē means ground, arable and otherwise (Matt. 5:18; John 8:6); the earth as opposed to the heavens (Matt. 6:10; Acts 2:19); territory or region (Luke 4:25; John 3:22). Oikouméne carries the meaning of the inhabited earth or the world (Luke 4:5; Matt. 24:14), the Roman Empire (Luke 2:1), all the inhabitants of the earth (Acts 17:6; Rev. 3:10). Kósmos in a derived sense is used to denote the earth, though it is always translated world in our Bibles. It has more to do with the inhabitants of the earth than with the actual planet.

Sometimes it is difficult to tell whether the earth or the land is meant, particularly in the prophetic books. For example, in Isaiah 24:1,3, 4,5, the word "earth" may mean "land" instead. The ancient Hebrew had no idea of the shape or size of the earth, or that it was a planet. The earth was simply the area where men lived, moved and had their being. But Job 26:7 is a scientifically correct statement, "He stretcheth out the north over empty space, and hangeth the earth upon nothing."

EARTHQUAKE (ûrth'kwāk, Heb. ra'ash, quaking, Gr. seimos, earthquake). There are four actual earthquakes recorded in Scripture: the one which occurred at Mt. Horeb for Elijah's benefit (I Kings 19:11); that referred to by Amos (1:1) and Zechariah (14:5) as occurring in the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah; the one which happened at the resurrection of Christ (Matt. 28:2); and the one which freed Paul and Silas from prison (Acts 16:26). An earthquake is mentioned in Isaiah 29:6 as a form of judgment from the Lord on the enemies of His people.

The earth has been plagued with quakes all through its history. The book of Revelation predicts more for the future (8:5; 11:13,19; 16:18).

In most of the cases of the mention of an earthquake in the Bible, God caused them for a specific purpose. But earthquakes have occurred in Palestine in modern times as they did in ancient times. This land is situated on the edge of one of the main earthquake belts of the planet, which extends from Spain eastward through the Mediterranean area and the Himalaya mountains to the East Indies. C.E.H.

EAST (Heb. qedem and other forms of this root, front, aforetime, east; mizrâh, place of the sunrise, east, Gr. anatolé, rising, east). East was a significant direction for the Hebrews. The gate of the tabernacle was on the east side (Exod. 38:13; 14). In the wilderness, Moses and Aaron encamped on the east side of the Tabernacle and this area was barred to strangers (Num. 3:38). Judah encamped on the east side of the camp (Num. 2:3). This same tribe was first in the line of march (Num. 10:14). On the analogy of the Tabernacle many scholars think the chief entrance to Solomon's temple was on the east side. In Herod's temple the "door of the temple which is called Beautiful" (Acts 3:2) was the east gate (Alfred Edersheim The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, Vol. I, New York: Longmans, Green, and Co., 1899, p. 245). Ezekiel saw the glory of the Lord leave the doomed temple by the east gate (Ezek. 10:19; 11:23). In this prophet's description of the Lord's temple, Ezekiel saw the glory of the Lord coming from the East and entering the temple by the east gate (Ezek. 43:2,4).

The phrase "children of the East" occurs frequently in the OT. It refers to the inhabitants of the lands E of Palestine, on the edge of the desert. Job was such a one (Job 1:3). The Wise Men came from the East, and said they had seen the star of the King of the Jews in the East (Matt. 2:1,2). C.E.H.

EASTER (Gr. páscha, passover), rendered Easter in Acts 12:4 KJV, but correctly translated Passover in ASV. The day on which the Church celebrates the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

There is no celebration of the Resurrection in the NT. The Jewish Christians linked it with the Passover, and so observed it on the 14th day of Nisan regardless of the day of the week. But Gentile believers celebrated the Resurrection on the Lord's day, Sunday. This difference was settled by the Council of Nicea in 325 A.D. which ruled that Easter should be celebrated on the first Sunday after the full moon following the vernal equinox. This is the system followed today, the date of Easter varying between March 22 and April 25.

EAST SEA, or the Dead Sea, formed part of the eastern boundary of Canaan proper, being the southern section of the great valley of the Jordan river. In the division of the tribes this sea became the eastern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:5).

EAST WIND (Heb. qādîm). Winds of the E came to Palestine over the desert; therefore it was a hot, dry, wind in the wilderness (Jer. 4:11). An E wind brought the plague of locusts on Egypt (Exod. 10:13), and dried up the sea so the Israelites could cross over on dry land (Exod. 14:21). Many references mention the destructive results of the E wind; thin and blasted ears of corn (Gen. 41:6), broken ships (Ps. 48:7; Ezek. 27:26); withered plants (Ezek. 17:10); dried fountains (Hosea 13:15); Jonah smitten (Jonah 4:8). The E wind was used as a means of judgment by God (Isa. 27:8; Jer. 18:17).

EBAL (ē'băl, Heb. 'êvāl, meaning uncertain). 1. A son of Shobal (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40).

2. A mountain 3077 feet high, one of the highest points in the land of Samaria. It stood opposite Mt. Gerizim, across a valley through which ran an important route of travel. At its foot was Jacob's well (see John 4:20: "on this mountain"), and the city of Shechem was located near by. When the Israelites first entered the land, Moses commanded them to erect on Mt. Ebal a monument of stones on which the law was inscribed, and a stone altar for burnt offerings and peace offerings. The law, with its blessings and curses was recited by the people antiphonally, the blessings from Mt. Gerizim, and the curses from Mt. Ebal (Deut. 27:4-26). Joshua renewed this procedure after the conquest of Ai (Josh. 8:30-35). The central location of this mountain and its height made it valuable for military purposes. A ruined fortress is still visible on its summit.

3. One of the sons of Joktan (I Chron. 1:22).

EBED (ē'bĕd, Heb. 'evedh, servant). 1. Father of Gaal, the adversary of Ahimelech who unsuccessfully rebelled against this ruler in Shechem (Judg. 9:26-45).

2. Son of Jonathan, one of the 50 men of the family of Adin that came from Babylon under Ezra (Ezra 8:6).

EBED-MELECH (ē'bĕd-mē-lĕk, Heb. 'evedh melekh, servant of the king), an Ethiopian eunuch who, when he heard about Jeremiah's being cast into a miry dungeon, was moved to go to the king and ask for permission to pull the prophet out. The king granted him 30 men, and with cords of rags and worn-out garments they drew Jeremiah up out of that dungeon (Jer. 38:7-13). The Lord gave Jeremiah a message for Ebed-Melech, assuring him of safety and protection in the coming destruction of the city (Jer. 39:15-18).

EBEN-EZER (ĕb'ĕn-ē'zêr, Heb. 'even-'ezer, stone of help). 1. A town of Ephraim near Aphek by which the Israelites encamped before fighting a losing battle with the Philistines (I Sam. 4:1). The ark of God was captured by these enemies of Israel, and they brought it from Eben-ezer to their city, Ashdod (I Sam. 5:1).

2. Later God gave them victory over the Philistines. Samuel then took a stone and set it up as a memorial of the occasion calling it Eben-ezer, "the stone of help," saying, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us" (I Sam. 7:12).

EBER (ē'bêr, Heb. 'ēver). This word means "a region across or beyond." It may be the eponym of the Hebrews, as its form is the same as the word 'iberi (Hebrew) without the gentilic ending. The Hebrews were a people who came from a region beyond the Euphrates river. 1. The son of Shelah, a grandson of Shem (Gen. 10:24; 11:14; I Chron. 1:18). He was the father of Peleg and Joktan (Gen. 10:25; 11:16; I Chron. 1:19-25).

2. The head of a family in the tribe of Gad (I Chron. 5:13).

3. The oldest son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:12).

4. A son of Shemei, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:22).

5. Head of a priestly family that came from Babylon under Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:20).

EBIASAPH (ē-bī'ă-săph, Heb. 'avî'āsāph and 'ĕvî'āsāph, my father has gathered), a son of Elkanah, a descendant of Kohath, son of Levi (Exod. 6:24; I Chron. 6:23; 9:19).

EBRONAH (ē-brō'-nàh, Heb. 'avrōnâh, the ASV has Abronah), the encampment of the Hebrews just before they arrived at Ezion-geber at the gulf of Aqabah (Num. 33:34). The site is uncertain.

ECBATANA (ĕk-băt'-ă-nà, Heb. 'ahmethā'), the capital of Media and the summer residence of the Persian kings. It is found in the Behistun inscription of Darius I. It is mentioned in an inscription of Tiglath-Pileser I at a much earlier time. It was later the Parthian capital also. In Greek the name of this city became Hagbatana (Herodotus) or Ecbatana (II Maccabees). It is mentioned in the Bible only in Ezra 6:2 as Achmethā, denoting the location of the palace in which the decree of Cyrus authorizing the building of the Jewish temple was found. According to Herodotus, this city was founded by Deioces, a Median king. Cyrus captured it in 550 B.C., and Alexander the Great took it from the Persians in 330 B.C. The modern city of Hamadan is located on or near the same site. Very little remains of the ancient city.

ECCLESIASTES (ĕ-klē-zī-ăs'-tēz, Gr. Ekklesiatés, Heb. qōheleth, meaning, probably, an official speaker in an assembly—the Preacher). This is one of the most perplexing books in the Bible. The Solomonic authorship, now generally rejected, can still be maintained on the following grounds: 1. The one who calls himself "the Preacher" is described as David's son and as king in Jerusalem (1:1,12).

2. This same person designates himself as a collector of proverbs (12:9), a description that obviously fits Solomon (cf. I Kings 4:32).

3. The reference to the author's great wisdom (1:16; 2:9) accords with Solomon's ability (cf. I Kings 4:30f).

4. The author's description of the splendor of Jerusalem during his reign (2:4-9) points unmistakably to Solomon (cf. I Chron. 29:25).

5. Several rather subtle references to characteristics of his life (e.g., 4:13; 7:26,28; 10:6,16) point plainly to Solomon.

6. The close parallel between this book and Proverbs is best explained by unity of authorship.

Some have considered Ecclesiastes as unworthy of a place in the sacred canon because of its rather apparent skepticism and pessimism. In order, however, to understand the nature and purpose of this book one must weigh carefully the import of such features as the following: 1. The exclusive use of Elohim (rather than Jehovah) as the divine name tacitly reminds us that the author is dealing with man's relationship to God as Creator rather than as Redeemer.

2. The oft-repeated "under the sun" designation confirms the supposition that the author is speaking from the viewpoint of general rather than supernatural revelation.

3. The ubiquitous "vanity" that resounds like a doleful refrain adds further weight to the view that the author is dealing with life apart from the light of special revelation.

4. Finally, the denial that anything can be "new" (1:9f) cogently enforces the idea that the author's thoughts are within the circle of the old covenant rather than the new covenant (cf. Isa. 42:9; 43:18f; 65:17; Jer. 31:31).

In this book, therefore, we find the basic elements of general revelation: 1. God's existence (3:14; 5:2).

2. God's sovereignty and power (6:2; 7:13; 9:1).

3. God's justice (5:8; 8:12f).

4. man's sinfulness (7:20; 9:3).

5. man's finiteness and limitations (8:8,17).

6. man's duty and responsibility (9:7-10; 12:13).

7. man's immortality (3:11; 12:7).

8. punishment and rewards (2:26; 3:17; 8:12; 11:9; 12:14).

Thus this book, properly understood, is a negative preparation for the Gospel; for, using a man especially endowed with knowledge and experience, the Spirit of God shows in this book how far such a man can go "under the sun." Here we have natural revelation at its best; for, let us note, there is nothing in this book that contradicts the rest of Scripture. In fact, the author's final conclusion (12:1,13) leads him to the very door of the kingdom of God. As the law was designed to lead men to Christ, so this book was written to lead those "under the sun" to the Son (cf. Heb. 1:1). W.B.

ECUMENICISM (ĕcū-mĕn'ĭ-cĭsm), derives from the Greek oikouméne, the whole inhabited world. An older adjectival derivative is ecumenical. Thus the first world-wide councils from Nicea (A.D. 325) were described as ecumenical, and the patriarch of Constantinople claimed to be the ecumenical bishop in virtue of his assumed primacy. Neither the adjective nor the noun is used in the Bible in any special sense.

More recently, the term ecumenical has come into Protestant usage through missionary conferences aimed to bring the Gospel to the whole inhabited globe (New York, A.D. 1900). It was adopted by Archbishop Soderblom of Sweden when, after the First World War, he convened a conference to study the role of the church in reconstruction (Stockholm, A.D. 1925). Since then, the efforts of the churches to work together and to try to achieve closer unity have been commonly styled the Ecumenical Movement, and ecumenicism or ecumenism has been coined to express concern for, participation in, or the fulfillment of this or similar movements.

While not a Biblical term, ecumenicism may claim a Biblical basis. From the missionary angle, Christians are committed to a world-wide task. From that of inter-relationships, the churches of various localities cannot be isolated units. They share a common faith, common tasks and common interests. Where matters of general importance arise, they should be considered on a global and not just a parochial or national level (cf. Acts 15:6ff). In its basic significance, ecumenicism as concern for the faith, work and welfare of the whole church is something which none would wish to hamper or ignore.

Yet there are aspects of contemporary ecumenicism which demand care and caution. In some quarters there is the tendency to think of it more strictly in ecclesiastical terms. This may find expression in the unbiblical and undesirable hope of ultimately constructing a single world-church under central control; or it may emerge in the notion that only churches linked with and participating in the movement should be regarded as Christian bodies, e.g., for negotiation with the state. Such hierarchical attitudes negate true ecumenicism, yet form a tempting substitute.

Moreover, there is the danger of the desire for ecumenicity taking precedence of Christian confession in the strict sense. That is, attempted comprehension may lead to the recognition of all groups which in some sense claim to follow Jesus Christ. Fortunately, the World Council has thus far clung to a minimal confession of Jesus Christ as Saviour and God, but many local supporters would prefer to weaken this in order to include, e.g., Unitarians. Once more, the result would be fatal to true ecumenicism, and true Christians alienated might well be greater than the peripheral groups included.

Again, it is hard to see how there can be real ecumenicism without agreement in basic Scriptural doctrine. To cooperate in missionary or social work is not enough, nor is it always possible if there is no agreement on the Gospel to be preached nor the basis and goal of the action undertaken, nor is discussion adequate, though obviously useful. Nor is there any value in formulae which merely hide disagreement. The Ecumenical Movement realizes this, but without acceptance of Scripture as the supreme rule of faith and conduct ecumenicism must surely be unattainable or fictitious.

Finally, there is the danger of confusing unity and uniformity. Churches may confess a common faith, but with variations of statement and emphasis, and minor disagreements on some issues. They may engage in basic acts of worship and ministry, yet in very different outward forms. To achieve world-wide fellowship, it is not necessary that the same forms or practices should be accepted by or enforced on all. Thus far, the Ecumenical Movement has hardly seen uniformity as a desirable or practicable end, but groups within it are prepared to insist on at least some specific forms, e.g., of baptism or the ministry, as essentials of true ecumenical recognition. Such demands negate real ecumenicism, and submission to them can only destroy rather than promote it.

More positively, the requirements of a genuinely Biblical ecumenicism may be briefly stated. It may be agreed that all Christians should be concerned for their world-wide fellowship. But the basis of this fellowship is not found in shared interests, the sense of unity or fellowship, or a common structure. It is found in Jesus Christ as the One in whom all are one. Ecumenicism arises where He is given preeminence as Saviour and Lord. Without this, there can be no common missionary program, social task or doctrinal conversation. With it, ecumenicism is already achieved. The rest is only expression and application in varying needs and situations. In a word, ecumenicism has not to be built up by human construction; it is already given in the Lord Himself.

Yet this is not quite so simple as it sounds. The Jesus Christ confessed must be the real Jesus Christ, not our idea of Him. He must be the Jesus Christ of the Old and New Testaments. Any other is an illusory Christ with an illusory message. Hence, ecumenicism centered in Christ is centered in Him as preached in Scripture. It is thus Bible-centered. Problems arise in this connection, e.g., of the canon and interpretation. Discussion and even disagreement may arise. This does not destroy real ecumenicism, however, so long as there is common loyalty to the Biblical testimony. Outside that, there neither is nor can be true unity.

Again, confession of Jesus Christ implies affirmations concerning Him, concerning God as revealed in Him, and concerning His saving work. Now ultimately all that is sure and essential is found in the Bible. Yet this needs to be stated for confession and instruction. Thus difficulties arise, and in areas of less importance these need not be resolved for true unity. But it is essential that there should be material agreement on the great and basic affirmations, e.g., as reached at the first ecumenical councils, or as brought out at the Reformation. Ecumenicism is not destroyed by isolated or private errors, e.g., on the part of some leaders. But even these can be disruptive, and public disavowal by churches of the cardinal Biblical articles makes ecumenicism impossible, since it involves basic repudiation of Christ Himself.

Finally, faith in Jesus Christ means ministry of word and action, and therefore evangelism and practical service in obedience and discipleship. Evangelism is the preaching of the evangelical word and the administering of the evangelical sacraments or ordinances. Service is the relief of the needy in the name of Jesus Christ. It is to be noted that mere attachment to a common cause, or acceptance of a common form, theory or method, gives only a spurious or incomplete unity in these fields. True ecumenicism demands obedience to the command of Jesus as Lord and conformity to the pattern of Jesus as Servant. Where these are present, cooperation and even in some cases integration as well as more concentrated action may be expected among contiguous and even more separated churches, not from without or in terms of uniformity, but from within in deep and enduring unity. Naturally and spontaneously, therefore, ecumenicity will find practical expression as on the New Testament scene. G.W.B.

EDAR (ē'dăr, ASV Eder, Heb. 'ēdher, flock), a tower near which Jacob encamped on his way back to Canaan (Gen. 35:21).

EDEN (ē'd'n, Heb. 'ēden, delight). 1. The district in which the Lord God planted a garden in which He put the newly-created man, Adam. In it grew every tree that was pleasant to see and good for food, including the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. A river flowed out of Eden and divided into four heads or streams; the Pishon which went around the land of Havilah, where gold was found; the Gihon which flowed around the whole land Cush; the Hiddekel (or Tigris) which flowed in front of Assyria; and the Euphrates (Gen. 2:8-14). Adam and Eve lived there until they sinned by eating the forbidden fruit and were expelled from it (Gen. chapters 2 & 3). Later Scripture writers mention Eden as an illustration of a delightful place (Isa. 51:3; Ezek. 28:13; 31:9,16,18; 36:35; Joel 2:3).

The location of Eden has been much investigated in both ancient and modern times. Actually the data given in Genesis are not sufficient to fix its site because two of the rivers, the Pishon and Gihon, were unknown even to the ancients and still are to modern scholars. Attempts have been made to locate Eden in the mountains of Armenia in the area where the Tigris and Euphrates and several other rivers rise. But the sources of all these streams are not together but are separated by mountain ranges. Mesopotamia, where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers flow, is also within the Fertile Crescent where archaeology has found the oldest civilization. Some scholars suggest the district at the head of the Persian Gulf as the likely location. It has been widely believed that the silt brought down by the rivers has added over a hundred miles of land to the head of the gulf since 3000 B.C. But recent geological examination of this land has indicated that it may not have changed much during the ages. At the site of Eridu, situated near what was considered to be the ancient shore line, clay tablets have been found which tell of a garden in the neighborhood in which grew a sacred palm tree. Further upstream, a short distance N of ancient Babylon, the Tigris and Euphrates flow close together so that canals connect them. Delitzsch considered this area to be the proper location of Eden.

2. An Eden mentioned by the Assyrians as conquered by them along with Gozan Haran and Rezeph (II Kings 19:12; Isa. 37:12). Ezekiel 27:23 also mentions this region. It is believed to be the Bit-adini of the Assyrian inscriptions located on the Euphrates. The house of Eden, or Beth-Eden (Amos 1:5), was probably near Damascus, since it is mentioned in a Syrian context, but some scholars think it was the same place as Bit-adini.

3. A Gershonite who lived in Hezekiah's time and served under Kore, the porter of the E gate of the temple, in distributing the holy oblations (II Chron. 29:12; 31:15). C.E.H.

EDER (ē'dêr, Heb. 'edher, floods). 1. A city in S Judah near Edom (Josh. 15:21), possibly the same as Adar. Site unknown.

2. A son of Mushi, the son of Merari (I Chron. 23:23; 24:30).

EDOM, EDOMITES (ē'dŏm, ē'dŏmīts, Heb. 'ĕdhōm, 'ădhômîm, from 'ĕdhōm, red), the nation and its people who were the descendants of Esau. He founded the country, so his name is equated with Edom (Gen. 25:30; 36:1,8). The country was also called Seir, or Mt. Seir, which was the name of the territory in which the Edomites lived, the mountain and plateau area between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Aqabah about 100 miles long and up to 40 miles wide. The original inhabitants of this land were the Horites, or "cave dwellers" (Gen. 14:6). When Esau departed from Canaan to find room for his cattle and came to Mt. Seir (Gen. 46:5-8), the Horites had some tribal chiefs reigning in the land (Gen. 36:29,30). Esau took the daughter of one of these chiefs for a wife, Oholibamah, daughter of chief Anah (Gen. 36:2, 25). Esau's sons and grandsons were also tribal chiefs (Gen. 36:15-19,40-43). Probably the Edomites gradually absorbed the Horites, until they disappeared (Deut. 2:12,22).

The kingdom of Edom was founded during the 13th century B.C., according to archaeological evidence. In the process of about four centuries the government of Edom changed from one under tribal chiefs to a monarchy. Eight of these kings reigned over Edom before the Israelites had any such ruler (Gen. 36:31-39). One of these kings was on the throne at the time of Moses and refused to permit the Israelites to pass through his country (Num. 20:14-21). Other evidence of ancient Edom is the Papyrus Anastasi VI of Egypt, dated late 13th century B.C., which mentions the passage of shepherd tribes from Edom to the richer pasture land of the Nile delta. The El Amarna letter No. 256, from about 1400 B.C., mentions Edom, in the form Udumu, as one of the enemies of a Jordan valley prince.

Saul fought against the Edomites (I Sam. 14: 47), but David conquered them and put garrisons throughout the whole land (II Sam. 8:14). The Israelite army spent six months cutting off all the men of the kingdom (I Kings 11:15,16). Solomon made Ezion-geber and Eloth, on the Gulf of Aqabah, seaports from which his ships sailed to Ophir (II Chron. 8:17,18). Archaeologists investigating the site of Ezion-geber discovered that this city had been carefully planned by Solomon. It was laid out on the spot where the north wind blows strongest. The reason for this location became evident when a complex of buildings was found to have rooms set at just the right angle to catch the full force of the wind. These rooms were blast furnaces using the wind as a draft for fires which smelted and refined iron and copper into metal articles the Israelites could use. The ore for this plant was obtained from mines in the Aqabah.

Judah lost Edom in the reign of Jehoram when she revolted against him about 847 B.C. (II Kings 8:20,22). About 50 years later Amaziah, king of Judah, inflicted a severe defeat on the Edomites (II Kings 14:7). About 735 B.C. Rezin, king of Syria, at war with Judah, captured Eloth and drove the Jews out (II Kings 16:6). When Jerusalem was destroyed and Judah depopulated by the Babylonians in 586 B.C., the Edomites rejoiced over the affliction of the Judeans and began to take over the southern part of Palestine. Eventually they penetrated as far N as Hebron. This action intensified the already smoldering hatred between the Jews and Edomites (see Ps. 137:7; Ezek. 25:12-14; Amos 1:11; Obadiah 10-14).

The Edomites were also subject to Babylon. Under the Persian Empire Edom became a province called Idumea, the Greek form of Edom. In 325 B.C. an Arab tribe known as the Nabateans conquered the eastern part of Edom's territory. In Maccabean times, John Hyrcanus subdued the Idumeans and forced them to accept Judaism. When the Romans took over Palestine the Edomites also were included. From Idumea came Antipater, the father of Herod the Great. He became procurator of Judea. After the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 A.D. the Idumeans disappeared from history. Thus the rather mournful career of the Edomites came to an end. Only in the early centuries of their kingdom, before the Israelites became powerful, did they enjoy freedom to any great extent.

The Assyrians came in contact with Edom as early as the seventh century B.C. When her kings began to penetrate as far south as Palestine, Edom, along with Judah, and her other neighbors, paid tribute to Assyria for many years. She is mentioned many times in the inscription of the kings of Assyria beginning with Adad-Nirari III 800 B.C. to Ashurbanipal (686-633).

Edom figures prominently in the prophetic Scriptures as the scene of great future judgments (see notably Isa. 34:5,6; 63:1). She is the only neighbor of the Israelites who was not given any promise of mercy from God. C.E.H.

EDREI (ĕd'-rē-ī, Heb. 'edhre'î, strong). 1. One of the chief sites of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. 1:4; Josh. 12:4) where he fought with the Israelites (Num. 21:33; Deut. 3:1). They defeated him and took his country with its cities, including Edrei (Deut. 3:10). This town was assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 13:12,31). It was located near the southern source of the Yarmuk river, about ten miles NE of Ramoth-Gilead, and about 30 miles E and a little S of the Sea of Galilee. In the temple of Ammon in Karnak, Egypt, is a list of the cities which Thutmose III (1490-1936 B.C.) claimed he conquered or exercised dominion over in Upper Retenu (Syria and Palestine). Ederi appears on this list. Its modern name is Der'aa, a town of about 5,000 inhabitants in southern Syria.

2. A fortified city of Naphtali, location unknown (Josh. 19:37).

EDUCATION (See Schools)

EGG (Heb. bêtsâ, whiteness), appears only in the plural form bêtsîm. Birds' eggs (Deut. 22:6); ostrich eggs (Job 39:14); any kind of eggs (Isa. 10:14); snake eggs (Isa. 59:5). Another word, hallāmût (Job 6:6) is translated "egg" in KJV and ASV, but in the margin ASV has "purslain," a plant whose juice had an insipid taste.

EGLAH (ĕg'-lâh, Heb. 'eglâh, heifer), the name of one of David's wives who was the mother of his sixth son, Ithream (II Sam. 3:5; I Chron. 3:3).

EGLAIM (ĕg'-lā-ĭm, Heb. 'eglayim), a place in Moab (Isa. 15:8). Site unknown.

EGLON (ĕg-lŏn, Heb. 'eghlôn). 1. A city of Canaan located between Gaza and Lachish, whose king joined four others against Gibeon because this city had made a covenant with Joshua. Gibeon appealed to Joshua, who came with the Israelites, defeated, and destroyed the five kings (Josh. 10: 3,5,23). Later Joshua captured the city (10:36,37; 12:12). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:39). Its modern site is believed to be 'Aglan north of Tell el Hesey. Archaeologists have ascertained that it was destroyed by fire in the 13th century B.C. thus confirming Joshua's conquest of it. Remains of Solomon's building program have also been found there.

2. A king of Moab who, with the help of the Ammonites and Amalekites, captured Jericho, the city of palm trees (Judg. 3:12,13). The Israelites served him for 18 years (3:14). Then he was killed by Ehud, whom the Lord had raised up to save the children of Israel (3:21).

EGYPT, LAND OF (ē'jĭpt, Gr. Aígyptos). "Egypt is the gift of the Nile." This classic statement of Hecateus, echoed by Herodotus, is a reflection of actual circumstances and of the Egyptian appreciation of the great river. The Nile, which courses like a living tube through the desiccated hills and deserts of NE Africa, laid down the black alluvium of the delta and the entire river valley. In view of the almost complete absence of rain, the annual overflow of the Nile was of great importance to the land, for it watered the soil and provided it with new alluvium and some organic fertilizer. Its waters were used for drinking (Exod. 7:18,21,24; Ps. 78:44), for bathing (Exod. 2:5), and for irrigation (Deut. 11:10). Its stream (Heb. ye'or) was the main channel of commerce and travel, with a prevailing north wind to favor southbound sailing vessels against the current.

The regularity of the inundation afforded a practical agricultural calendar and the coincidence of the rise of the Nile and the appearance of the Dog Star (Sirius; e.g., Sothis) on the horizon at daybreak around July 19 was the basis for a chronological unit of 1460 years, which is termed a Sothic cycle. Since the Egyptian calendar of 365 days was one-fourth day short of the true year, the Egyptian New Year's Day worked its way through the calendar until it again coincided with the rising of Sothis and the inundation (365 x 4 = 1460). The recognition of this cycle and several references to it in dates of historical records make some helpful checkpoints in Egyptian chronology.

The awareness of the dependence of land and people on the resources of the Nile led to the deification of the river. The longest river in the world, the Nile covers some 4000 miles from its sources in equatorial Africa to its divided mouths which open into the Mediterranean. The White Nile is the principal stream, with tributaries joining it from the E, from their points of origin in the Ethiopian hills. The Blue Nile enters at Khartoum. Farther N the Atbara, the last consequential affluent, empties its periodic flow into the northbound stream. From this junction the Nile continues some 1500 miles without tributary to the sea. Numbered from Aswan S, in order of their discovery by modern explorers, are six cataracts, areas in which hard rock resisted the erosive action of the rushing stream. To varying degrees these hindered river travel and served as barriers to military movement. From Aswan to Cairo is a stretch of somewhat less than 600 miles. Below Cairo spreads the fan of the delta, c. 125 miles long and 115 miles wide.

The division of the land into Upper and Lower Egypt predates the union into one nation. Lower Egypt included the delta and a short section of the valley southward; the balance of the valley to Aswan was Upper Egypt. These areas were subdivided into administrative units which in Greek times were called "nomes," 20 in Lower Egypt and 22 in its southern counterpart. With the cataracts and the Nubian desert to the S and SE, the Libyan desert and the Sahara to the W, and the Arabian desert on the E, the valley was not subject to the frequent invasions which characterize less defensible lands. The biggest threat from outside was on the delta edges; even here the passage of armies was handicapped by terrain and climate. On the NE border, fronting Asia, the Egyptians made early use of fortress and other checkpoints to control ingress from this direction. With such protection, the country was free to develop its culture in comparative security and still to retain a free exchange of goods and ideas with other peoples.

The climate of the land, along with the particular beliefs of the people, has been of great advantage to archaeology, so that it may be said that Egypt is the archaeological area par excellence. Lack of rain and frost, plenty of dry sand to form a protective cover over remains, and abundant use of stone for monumental building are helpful environmental factors. The burial customs have been of much help to the cultural historian, for the relief sculpture, tomb furniture, models, and inscriptions tell much of the daily life of antiquity.

Its Name. To the Israelites, Egypt was Mizraim (Heb. mitsraim), a term of which the form and derivation are unknown. The Egyptians themselves had a number of names they used for their country; usually it was called "the Two Lands," which has reference to the origin of the nation in the union of Upper and Lower Egypt, just as the name "the United States of America" has historical derivation. Egypt was also Kemet, "the Black Land," the rich alluvial soil of the valley, as opposed to Desheret, "the Red Land," the barren waste of the desert.

Religion. The religion of ancient Egypt is a vast and labyrinthine subject. Much of the religious literature appears as a hodgepodge of heterogeneous conflicting statements to the modern Western reader, to whom many of the allusions must remain obscure. In general, the religion may be described as a complex polytheism, with many local deities of varying importance. A list of these divinities would be impractical, but seven may be singled out: Osiris and Isis, who are well-known from their later adoption by the mystery religions of Greece and Rome; Ra (Re), a sun-god, who came into prominence in Dynasty 5; Horus, another sun-god, the son of Osiris and Isis; Set, the rival of Osiris and Horus; Amon-Re, who became the god of empire; Ptah, the god of Memphis; Khnum, the god of Elephantine. The attempt of Akhenaton (Amenhotep IV) to reorient Egyptian religion with a primary emphasis on Aton, the sun-disc, has been widely discussed as a tendency toward monotheism. There is no evidence of possible Israelite influence on his beliefs. His innovations did not long survive him and the priests of Amon at Thebes scored a theological-political victory. Much of the religious literature has a mortuary interest; this preoccupation with death was a futile gesture to transfer earthly life to an eternal dimension. There are no reflections of the Egyptian concept in the Bible, and the absence of any large body of OT teaching concerning life beyond the grave may be a divine avoidance of a possible snare to the Israelites. The influence of Egyptian religion on Israelite religious practice was largely negative. In several instances the Israelites were led into apostasy to worship Egyptian gods (see below), but even these occasions were rare.

Its History. Preceding the historical or dynastic period are a number of prehistoric cultures which are known in general outline. In the late predynastic epoch there is interesting evidence of cultural influence from Mesopotamia. The rudiments of hieroglyphic writings also appear about this time and usher in the historical period. The materials for writing the political history of Egypt are lists of kings (such as those inscribed in temples of Abydos and Karnak, that of a tomb at Sakkarah, the Turin Papyrus, and the Palermo Stone) and numerous historical records, both of kings and of lesser persons active in history-making. The dynastic scheme is a historiographical convenience inherited from the priest-historian Manetho, who divided Egyptian history from Menes to Alexander into 31 dynasties. Egyptologists have used a somewhat standard arrangement of these dynasties into historical periods. A highly condensed outline follows: Protodynastic Period (Dyn. 1-2; 3100-2700 B.C.). According to the tradition of Manetho, the first king of united Egypt was Menes, who came from Thinis in Upper Egypt, united the Two Lands, and established his capital at Memphis, in about 3200-3100 B.C. Some scholars equate Menes with Narmer and/or Aha. Royal tombs of this period have been found at Sakkarah and Abydos. Old Kingdom (Dyn. 3-6; 2700-2200). This is a high point in Egyptian history. The canons of art were firmly established in this period and perhaps the bases of the applied sciences were also laid. In Dyn.3 the step pyramid of Djoser, "the world's first monumental architecture in stone," was built at Sakkarah. Its architect, Imhotep, was also famed in other fields of accomplishment. Dyn.4 was the time of the pyramid-builders par excellence: the pyramids of Khufu(Cheops), Khafre(Chephren), and Menkaure(Mycerinos) were constructed at Giza. Kings of Dyn.5-6 had their pyramids at Sakkarah; in these were inscribed the religious writings known as the Pyramid Texts. The proverbs of Ptahhotep, a vizier of Dyn.5, are well-known. First Intermediate Period(Dyn.7-11; 2200-2050). This was a period of weakness and confusion; Dyn.7-8 were at Memphis; 9-10, at Herakleopolis; 11, at Thebes. The literature is an outgrowth of the pessimism of the times; it includes the writing of Ipuwer, the Dialogue of a Man Weary of Life; the Song of the Harper. Middle Kingdom(Dyn.12; 2050-1800) was another peak in Egyptian history. Art and architecture flourished. This is the time of the Eloquent Peasant and of the adventures of the courtier Sinuhe. In religious literature the Coffin Texts are found. There is a trend toward democratization of royal privileges, along with an emphasis on ma'at, "justice, right." The king is heralded as "the shepherd" of the people. The Second Intermediate Period (Dyn.13-17; 1800-1580) was another dark age for Egypt. Insignificant rulers made up Dyn.13-14; Dyn.15-16 are the Hyksos dynasties, which may be of greater importance than brief, derogatory Egyptian references lead us to think. Dyn.17 was made up of Theban rulers who began the movement to expel the Hyksos. The New Kingdom or Empire(Dyn.18-20; 1580-1090) marked the height of Egyptian imperialistic ambitions, with some fluctuations. Outstanding rulers include: in the Eighteenth Dynasty, Hatshepsut, the woman-king, who sponsored a voyage to Punt and built a fine mortuary temple at Deir el Bahri; Thutmose III, the energetic warrior and capable administrator; Amenhotep III, the Magnificent, a lavish spender who neglected the empire and with his successor, Akhenaton, the religious innovator, ignored the pleas for help from Palestine-Syria (Amarna Tablets). In the Nineteenth Dynasty the outstanding figure is Rameses II, the builder, renovator, and chiseler; in the Twentieth it is Rameses III, who defeated the Sea Peoples. The Post-Empire Period or Period of Decline(Dyn.21-25; 1150-663) finds Egypt a "broken reed." There was a short restoration in the Saite Period(Dyn.26; 663-525), which includes Necho and Apries (Biblical Hophra, Jer. 44:30). Conquered earlier by the Assyrians, Egypt was subject to Persian domination(Dyn.27-30; 525-332). With Alexander the Great came the end of the dynasties and of native rule. After the death of Alexander(323), Egypt was governed by the Ptolemies until the Romans made it a province in 31 B.C.

Egypt and the Bible: To the Israelites, Egypt was somewhat of an enigma, a land of contrasts, a country which they hated but respected. When a Psalmist looked back to the days of the Exodus, he referred to the Egyptians as a "people of strange language" (Ps. 114:1), a description to which even many moderns may assent. Egypt was the iron furnace of affliction during the bondage, but Israelites were so impressed with the might of the Pharaonic kingdom that there were elements in Judah that looked to Egypt for help even after Egypt had become the broken reed of Assryrian contempt (cf. II Kings 18:21: Isa. 36:6). An unreliable ally, Egypt was also a sanctuary for some of Israel's individual enemies. From Egypt, too, came some of the worst occasions for apostasy in Israel. Egypt appears in the Bible as a type of the ephemeral, earthbound system called "the world"; in one instance it is an allegorical synonym for Sodom and for rebellious Jerusalem (Rev. 11:8). Nevertheless, it was an abundant Near Eastern breadbasket and was for centuries the ranking world power. It afforded food for many a hungry Palestinian, and heat-smitten wandering tribes were permitted to cross its borders to graze their animals in the delta. Joseph realized that God's providence was in his being sold into Egypt (Gen. 45:5-9), and Jacob was instructed by the Lord to go to Egypt (Gen. 46:3-4).

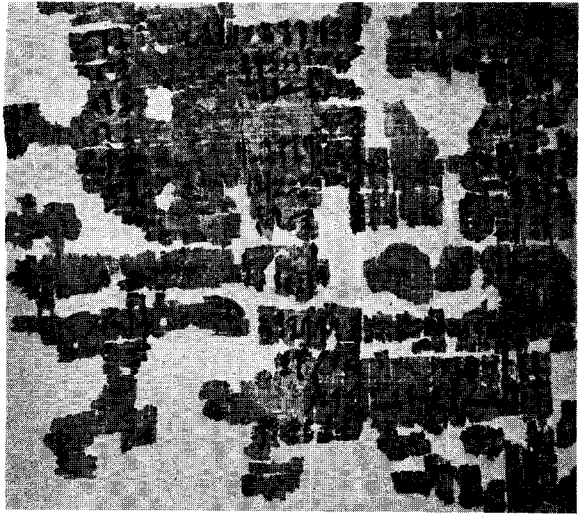
Egypt appears early in Biblical references, since Mizraim (Egypt) is found in the Table of Nations as a son of Ham (Gen. 10:6). Abram's sojourn in Egypt is a well-known incident. It is evident from Genesis 12:10 that Egypt was the place to which Palestinians naturally looked in time of famine. The famous scene from the wall-paintings of the tomb of Khnumhotep II at Beni Hasan shows a group of Asiatics in Middle Egypt for purposes of trade and illustrates several facets of Abram's descent into Egypt. The fears of Abram concerning the king's interest in Sarai were real and perhaps well-founded, but there is no certain evidence for such royal behavior in Egyptian literature. The oft-cited Tale of Two Brothers relates a quite different sort of situation, for there the wife is anxious to be rid of her husband so that she may become a wife of Pharaoh. The closest Egyptian-Biblical relationships may be seen in the narrative of Joseph and the account of Israelite life in Egypt to the time of their Exodus (Gen. 37, 39-50; Exod. 1-15). A listing of some of the most intriguing elements includes: Joseph's coat (Gen. 37); Potiphar, "an Egyptian" (Gen. 39); Potiphar's wife (39:6-18), with interesting parallels in the Tale of Two Brothers, a not uncommon episode in many cultures; the prison for political offenders (39:20); the duties of butler and baker; dreams in Egypt; Egyptian viticulture (Gen. 40); cattle and the Nile; grain-growing (Gen. 41); shaving (41:14); east wind (41:27); taxes (41:34); the gold (41:42); chariots (41:43); the priest of On (Heliopolis) (41:45); Egyptian names; Egypt as a source of food (41:57); divination (44:5); the land of Goshen (Gen. 47); the Egyptian priesthood (47:22); embalming, mummification, and burial rites (Gen. 50). In Exodus 1 there are references to brick-making, field work, and obstetrical practices which are particularly Egyptian. In Chapter 2 the references to the Nile are of interest. The account of the signs and the plagues shows an intimate knowledge of Egyptian life and provides a study in the relationship of natural and miraculous phenomena. In Exodus 11:2 the asking for jewelry of silver and gold is a reflection of the expert Egyptian work in metals. The Egyptian pursuit of the fleeing Israelites (Exod. 14:10,23) finds pictured parallels in the battle reliefs of Egypt's chief monarchs. The ironic mention of graves in Egypt (14:11) reminds us of the vast necropolis that marks the desert fringe. Well into the wilderness, the refugees were outside of Egyptian concern and out of its effective reach; but, barely escaped from slavery, the Israelites were soon engrossed in worshiping the golden calf (Exod. 32), a descendant of the bovine worship of Memphis and other Egyptian cities. There were also fond recollections of good eating in Egypt, with its fish, cucumbers, leeks, onions, and garlic, which the Israelites regarded as strength-giving fare (Num. 11:5-6). During the period of the Judges, the hill-country of Palestine saw little likelihood of antagonistic Egyptian interference. Egyptian power had declined; in about 1100 B.C. the royal emissary, Wen-Amon, found little respect for the might of Egypt along the Mediterranean coast.



A list of slaves, including Hebrews, from Egypt, about the time of Joseph, c. 1700 B.C. Brooklyn Papyrus.

With this weakness, the time was ripening for the rapid growth of a young and vigorous nation in the former Asiatic empire of Egypt. When the Israelite monarchy came into existence, neither Saul nor David had recorded immediate dealings with the land of the Nile. Solomon, however, married a daughter of the current Pharaoh, who captured and destroyed Gezer and presented it to his daughter as dowry (I Kings 9:16). It is stated that Solomon's wisdom excelled that of Egypt (I Kings 4:30) and we are informed of his commercial relations with Egypt (II Chron. 1:16-17). Late in Solomon's reign, an Edomite enemy, Hadad, who as a child had found asylum in Egypt after a raid by David into Edomite territory, left Egypt to become an active adversary of Solomon. Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, fled to Egypt to escape Solomon; as first king of the northern tribes, this Jeroboam, "who made Israel to sin," set up calf-images at Dan and Bethel (I Kings 12:26-33), a religious importation influenced by his Nilotic exile. In the fifth year of Rehoboam (926 B.C.) the Egyptian king Sheshonk (Biblical Shishak) carried out an expedition into Palestine which saw the temple stripped of its treasures to meet his demands (I Kings 14:25-26; II Chron. 12:1-9).

Egypt was a strong influence in Judean politics in the days of Isaiah and Jeremiah, who were aware of the weakness of Egypt against the Assyrian threat. When the Assyrian remnant was making its dying stand and Egypt marched to aid them against the rampaging Babylonians, the Judean Josiah made a fatal effort to stop the Egyptian forces at Megiddo (II Kings 23:29-30; II Chron. 35:20-27). After the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and the subsequent murder of Gedaliah, the Judeans again looked to Egypt as a place of refuge in spite of the prophet's warning. Here they were scattered about, with a group as far S as Elephantine maintaining a temple and keeping up correspondence with Palestine, as revealed by the Aramaic papyri found at Elephantine. In the NT most of the references to Egypt have to do with Israel's past. One important mention had current meaning, for Joseph was divinely directed to take the infant Jesus and Mary to Egypt to escape the wrath of Herod (Matt. 2:13-15; cf. Hosea 11:1; Exod. 4:22).

Significance and future. It is remarkable that Egypt so often was a place of refuge or a means of sustaining life. Though it is regarded by typological extremists as an invariable epitome of "the world," Egypt has the scriptural prediction of a wonderful future: "In that day Israel will be the third with Egypt and Assyria, a blessing in the midst of the earth, whom the Lord of hosts has blessed, saying, 'Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel my heritage' " (Isa. 19:24-25 RSV; cf. 19:18-23).

C.E.D.

EGYPT, RIVER OF, the dividing line between Canaan and Egypt (Gen. 15:18; Num. 34:5), the southern boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:4,47). In the other four occurrences it is coupled with the Euphrates river (Gen. 15:18; I Kings 8:65; II Kings 24:7; II Chron. 7:8) as marking the N and S limits of the land given to the Israelites. It is not really an Egyptian river at all, but a wady (a stream and its valley) of the desert near the border of Egypt. It is identified as the Wady el-Arish.

EHI (e'hī, Heb. 'ēhî), a son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21); in Numbers 26:38, spelled Ahram; in I Chronicles 8:1, Ahara.

EHUD (ē'hŭd, Heb. 'ēhûdh, union). 1. A descendant of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:10; 8:6).

2. A judge of the Israelites, a Benjamite, the son of Gera. The people were in distress because of the heavy hand of Eglon, the king of Moab, who had captured Jericho and extracted tribute from Israel from there. Ehud, a left-handed man, made a double-edged dagger which he carried on his right thigh. After he had delivered the tribute, he secured an opportunity to commune with Eglon, the king, in private. He drew his dagger, thrust it through the king's body, and locked the doors of the room when he went out. The king's servants hesitated to disturb him too quickly. During the delay, Ehud escaped. Back home he rallied the Israelites from Benjamin and Ephraim and led them against the Moabites. They utterly subdued these enemies. The land had peace for 80 years until Ehud died (Judg. 3:15-30).

EKER (ē'kêr, Heb. 'ēqer, root), a son of Ram descendant of Judah (I Chron. 2:27).

EKRON (ĕk'rŏn, Heb. 'eqrôn, eradication), the most northern of the five chief cities of the Philistines (see I Sam. 6:17). It was located on the boundary between Judah and Dan (Josh. 15:11; 19:43), but was assigned to Judah (Josh. 15:45). After the captured ark of God was sent by the Philistines from Ekron to escape the wrath of God (I Sam. chap 6), the Israelites regained possession of Ekron and other cities (1 Sam. 7:14). Following David's victory over Goliath the Israelites drove the Philistines back to Ekron (I Sam. 17:52). The god of this city was Baal-zebub (II Kings 1:3). The prophets mention Ekron along with other Philistine cities (Jer. 25:20; Amos 1-8; Zeph. 2:4; Zech. 9:5,7).

In the Assyrian inscriptions Ekron appears as amquarruna. Sennacherib assaulted it and killed its officials because they had been disloyal to Assyria (Ancient Near Eastern Texts pp. 287, 288). Esarhaddon called upon 22 cities which paid tribute to him (Ekron being one of them) to help transport building supplies for his palace (ibid. p. 291). Ashurbanipal included Ekron in the list of cities which paid tribute to him (ibid. p. 294). The Greek form of Ekron, Accaron, appears once in the Apocrypha (I Macc. 10:89) and in the accounts of the Crusades. Its modern site is 'Agir or Catrah, both on the Wady Surar. C.E.H.

EL (Heb. 'ēl, God), the primitive, generic word for God in the Semitic languages: Aramaic elah, Arabic ilah, Akkadian ilu (the u is the ending for the nominative case). In the OT el is used over 200 times for "God." In the prose books it often has a modifying term with it, but in the poetic books, Job and Psalms, it occurs alone many times. The name of the chief god of the Canaanites was El, as the Ras Shamra texts demonstrate. The Hebrews borrowed this word from the Canaanites. El has a plural elim, occasionally elhm, in Ugaritic; but the Hebrews needed no plural, though a plural term, 'elohim, was their regular name for God.

The root from which 'ēl was derived has been much discussed. Gesenius held that 'ēl was from 'wl, "to be strong," and many have accepted this view. Noldeke derived it from the Arabic root 'ul, "to be in front of" as a leader. Ewald suggested a Hebrew root 'lh to which both 'el and 'elohim belonged, with the meaning "strong." Kittel viewed the preposition el, "to be in front of," in combination with the root 'alah, to which 'el belonged, giving it the meaning " the end of all human seeking." Lagarde, using the same preposition, put forth the idea of God as the goal for which all men seek. Gesenius' view seems the most likely. But a truly satisfactory theory is impossible because 'el and the other terms for God, 'elohim and 'eloha, are all prehistoric in origin.

The Canaanite god El was the father of men and of gods. He was called ab adm, "father of mankind" (Krt. 37,151); ab snnm, "father of years" (text) 49: 1:8; 51:IV:24; 2 Aqht: VI:49). He was an immoral and debased character. It is a tribute to the high quality of the character of the God of Israel that when the Hebrews took over this name and applied it to Him, it lost all its evil connotations. C.E.H.

ELA (ē'lȧ, KJV Elah, Heb. 'ēlā', terebinth), the father of Solomon's commissary officer stationed in the tribe of Benjamin (I Kings 4:18).

ELADAH (ĕl'-ȧ-dȧh, Heb. 'el'ādhâh, God has adorned), ASV Eleadah, a descendant of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:20).

ELAH (ē-'lȧh, Heb. 'ēlâh, terebinth). 1. A descendant of Esau, who was a chief of Edom (Gen. 36: 41).

2. The valley in which David killed Goliath (I Sam. 17:2.19; 21:9).

3. A king of Israel, the son of Baasha. He reigned two years and was slain by Zimri, a captain in his army, who destroyed all the rest of Baasha's descendants, thus fulfilling the prediction of Jehu, the prophet, made in I Kings 16:1-4 (I Kings 16:6-14).

4. The father of Hoshea, the last king of Israel (II Kings 15:30; 17:1; 18:1,9).

5. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (I Chron. 4:15).

6. A Benjamite, one of the people who returned to Jerusalem from Babylon (I Chron. 9:8).

ELAM (ē'lăm, Heb. 'ēlām). 1. A son of Shem, thus making the nation, Elam, to be Semitic. The Hebrews looked at them as such, but neither in custom nor language were they Semitic (Gen. 10:22; I Chron. 1:17).

2. A son of Shashach, a descendant of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:24).

3. The fifth son of Meshelemiah, a doorkeeper of the Korahites (I Chron. 26:3).

4. The progenitor of a family of 1254 members which returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:7; Neh. 7:12).

5. Another forefather of a returned family with the same number of members (Ezra 2:31; Neh. 7:34).

6. The father of two sons who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:7).

7. An ancestor of a man who confessed marriage to a foreign woman. Evidently this ancestor was either No. 4, 5, or 6 (Ezra 10:2,26).

8. A chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14).

9. One of the priests who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12:42).

ELAM (ē'lăm, Heb. 'ēlām), a country situated on the E side of the Tigris river opposite Babylonia in a mountainous region. Its population was made up of a variety of tribes. Their language, different from the Sumerian, Semitic, and Indo-European tongues, was written in cuneiform script. It has not yet been deciphered to any great extent. Elam was one of the earliest civilizations. In Sumerian inscriptions it was called Numma (high mountain people), which term became Elamtu in Akkadian texts; in classical literature it was known as Susiana, the Greek name for Susa, the capital city of Elam.

Sargon I (2350 B.C.) claimed conquest of Elam in his day. Later on, about 2280 B.C., an Elamite king invaded Babylonia and took back much spoil. Gudea, a ruler of the city of Lagash, about 2100 B.C., mentions that the Elamites collected some of the timbers which he used in constructing the temple of Ningirsu, the god of Lagash. Hammurabi (1728-1686 B.C.) subdued the Elamites. In the time of Abraham, according to Genesis 14:1 ff., an Elamite king, Chedorlaomer, made a raid on Palestine.

Elam figures prominently in Babylonian and Assyrian texts because it was situated so close to them. When Babylon became active against Assyrian supremacy, Elam became her chief ally. Assyria was not able to subdue Elam completely until the time of Ashurbanipal (668-626 B.C.), who sacked the country thoroughly in 640 B.C. This catastrophe practically finished Elam as a nation, but part of the country was not much affected by these intrusions of Semitic powers. This district called Anzan was, next to the capital at Susa, the most important part of the nation. From that area Cyrus, the conqueror of Babylon, arose.

Isaiah cites Elam as one of the nations going up with Cyrus against Babylon (Isa. 21:2) and joining the Assyrian army against Judah (Isa. 22:6). Elam was one of the nations forced to drink the cup of God's wrath (Jer. 25:25), and doomed to judgment (Jer. 49:34-39). Ezra 4:9,10 refers to Elamites as among the peoples brought over to Samaria by the Assyrians. Acts 2:9 includes Elamite as one of the tongues being spoken by visitors at Jerusalem. C.E.H.

ELASAH (ĕl'ȧ-sȧh, Heb. 'el'āsâh, God has made). 1. One of the sons of Pashur who was guilty of marrying foreign women (Ezra 10:22).

2. Son of Shaphan, one of the men by whom Jeremiah sent from Jerusalem a message of advice to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:3).

ELATH, ELOTH (ē'lăth, ēlōth, Heb. 'êlâth, or 'êlôth, lofty trees), a town situated at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah in Edom. It was located very near to Ezion-geber, Solomon's seaport (I Kings 9:26). The Israelites passed by the area on the way to the promised land (Deut. 2:8). Azariah (767-740 B.C.) built it up, probably for use as a seaport, when he took it from Edom (II Kings 14:22; II Chron. 26:2). During the reign of Ahaz over Judah (736-716 B.C.) Rezin, king of Syria, joined with Pekah, king of Israel, and threatened Jerusalem. Rezin captured Elath, and the Syrians (or more likely, the reading should be Edomites) occupied it (II Kings 16:5,6). The Romans called it Aelana and made it a military post. After the Moslems conquered the Middle East a castle was erected there to protect the pilgrims going to Mecca from that port. In the tenth century, according to reports, Elath was a great port of Palestine. Later it fell into decay. Turkey and Egypt both controlled it; after 1917 the Arabs took it over. Aqaba, or Eilar (its modern name) was in the territory allotted to the Jews in 1949. They have made it a port to bring in oil. C.E.H.

EL-BETHEL (ĕl-bĕth'ĕl, Heb. 'ēl bêth-'ēl, the God of the house of God), the name Jacob gave to Luz because there God revealed Himself to him (Gen. 35:7).

ELDAAH (ĕl-dā'ah, Heb. 'eldā'â, God has called), a son of Midian (Gen. 25:4).

ELDAD (ĕl'dăd, Heb. 'eldādh, God has loved), a man who, along with another man, Medad, remained in camp when the 70 elders selected by Moses were gathered around the Tabernacle to receive the gift of prophecy. The spirit of prophecy came to Eldad and Medad in camp and they prophesied there. The news of this fact excited Joshua and he begged Moses to forbid them. But Moses said he wished that all God's people were prophets (Num. 11:24-29).

ELDER (ĕld'ĕr, Heb. zāqēn, Gr. presbúteros). In ancient times the older men of a community were known as the elders. They governed the community and made all major decisions. Moses called the elders of Israel together to announce that the Lord had heard their cries for help and had appointed him to lead them out of Egypt (Exod. 4:29). Later he called them out to institute the Passover (Exod. 12:21). At Sinai 70 of the elders went up the mountain with Moses and saw the God of Israel (Exod. 24:9). In the wilderness, to relieve Moses, 70 elders shared his divine anointing (Num. 11:25). After the Israelites had settled in Canaan and had a king over them, the elders still functioned. They were a separate group from the heads of the tribes and the princes of the fathers' houses (I Kings 8:1). Each town had its group of elders, as Bethlehem did (I Sam. 16:4), "the elders of every city" (Ezra 10:14). After the return from exile the elders made up the Sanhedrin, the governing council of the Jews.

This type of society continued into New Testament times. The elders joined the priests and scribes against Jesus (Matt. 27:12). When churches came into being, elders were appointed for each congregation (Acts 14:23). The terms "elders" and "bishops" are used interchangeably in the NT. The "elders" of Acts 20:17 are called "bishops" in verse 28. In Titus 1:5, "elders" in the Cretan churches are mentioned. In listing qualifications for such an office, Paul calls them "bishops" in verse 7. These men were required to be blameless in their lives and obedient to the truth in their faith (I Tim. 3:1-7; Titus 1:6-9). Their duties involved spiritual oversight of the congregation and teaching the Word. Those who ruled well and had done teaching were worthy of honor on both these aspects of their work (I Tim. 5:17). Before the first century A.D. had elapsed, the term "bishop" had taken on a special meaning, denoting the one leader of a church. This situation is illustrated both in the book of Acts and in Paul's epistles in the person of James, the brother of Jesus, who was obviously the head man in the Jerusalem church.

The 24 elders in heaven around the throne of God as depicted in the book of Revelation probably represent the heavenly priesthood of the church associated with Christ, the Great High Priest. C.E.H.

ELEAD (ĕ'lē-ăd, Heb. 'el'ādh, God has testified), an Ephraimite slain by men of Gath while making a raid to steal cattle (I Chron. 7:21).

ELEADAH (See Eladah)

ELEALEH (ē'lē-ā'lĕ, Heb. 'el'ālēh, God doth ascend), a town always mentioned with Heshon, being located about a mile N of that place, in the tribe of Reuben (Num. 32:3,37). Isaiah and Jeremiah mention it in prophecies against Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:9; Jer. 48:34). The modern site is marked by ruins and is called El Âh.

ELEASAH (ĕ'-lē-ā-sàh, Heb. 'el'āsâh, God has made). 1. A Hezronite (I Chron. 2:39,40).

2. A Benjamite, a descendant of Saul (I Chron. 8:37; 9:43).

ELEAZAR (ĕ-lē-ā'-zàr, Heb. 'el'āzār, God has helped). 1. The third son of Aaron (Exod. 6:23). After the death of the two elder sons, Nadab and Abihu (Lev. 10:1,2), Eleazar was designated to be chief priest (Num. 3:32). He ministered before the Lord with Ithamar, his brother, helping his father. But the Lord assigned special tasks to Eleazar: gathering up the 250 censers offered to the Lord by rebellious men, and beating them out for a covering for the altar (Num. 16:36-39); and taking the lead in the ceremony with the red heifer (Num. 19:3,4). When Aaron died Eleazar became the chief priest (Num. 20:28). He assisted Moses in numbering the people (Num. 26:1,2); in dividing the spoil from the slaughter of the Midianites (Num. 31:13-54); and in assigning to the 2½ tribes land E of the Jordan river (Num. 32:28). He was divinely appointed to help Joshua divide the promised land among the tribes (Num. 34: 17), and carried out this task (Josh. 14:1; 19:51). His only son was Phineas (I Chron. 6:4). Eleazar died soon after Joshua's death (Josh. 24:33).

2. The son of Abinadab who was sanctified to keep the ark after it had been brought to his father's house (I Sam. 7:1).

3. Son of Dodai, one of the three mightiest men of David who wrought a great victory over the Philistines (II Sam. 23:9,10; I Chron. 11:12-14).

4. A childless son of Mahli (I Chron. 23:21,22; 24:28).

5. Son of Phineas, a Levite, one of the group to which Ezra delivered the temple treasures for tabulating and keeping for the temple (Ezra 8: 32-34).

6. A priest who took part in the service dedicating the wall (Neh. 12:42).

7. An ancestor of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Matt. 1:15).

ELECT (ē-lĕct'. Heb. bāhîr, Gr. eklektós, chosen), as used in Scripture, both words mean "chosen" or "elected" by God. In the OT Moses is called "the chosen of God" (Ps. 106:23). The nation of Israel is six times noted as God's chosen people (I Chron. 16:13; Ps. 105:6,43; 106:5; Isa. 43:20; 45:4). King Saul is once so designated (II Sam. 21:6). David is once called God's chosen one (Ps. 89:3). In prophecy Christ is set forth as God's "elect one" (Isa. 42:1). The redeemed Israelites of the future will be "God's elect" (Isa. 65:9,15,22).

In the NT those who have received Christ as Saviour are called "the elect" 20 times. Twice Jesus is designated as "God's chosen" (Luke 9:35; 23:35). Once angels are called "elect" (I Tim. 5:21).
C.E.H.

ELECTION (Gr. eklogé, choice, selection). Since the whole of humanity is fallen in sin from which it cannot extricate itself, none will be saved apart from the redeeming grace of God. The decree, as a sovereign choice of God, as to who may receive this grace is the basis of election.

Election is God's eternal and immutable decree to choose from depraved men, who because of their sin deserve condemnation, those whom He will save, providing the source of their salvation in grace through Christ, and the means through the instrumentality of the Holy Spirit's regenerative work. Biblical usage of the word centers primarily in eklektos, as an adjective signifying "the chosen," and in eklogē, as a noun, signifying "that which is chosen," the object of the choice. In its larger context, it is applied in a variety of ways. In the OT this concept is often used of the election of Israel to be the people of covenant privilege (Deut. 4:37; 7:6,7; I Kings 3:8; Isa. 44:1,2). In both Testaments it is applied to Christ as the Messiah (Isa. 42:1 and I Peter 2:4,6). While eklektos is used of Christ (Luke 23:35) and of angels (I Tim. 5:21) it is most often used of individual believers (Mark 13:20,22,27; Rom. 8:33; Col. 3:12; II Tim. 2:10; I Pet. 1:1; II John 1:13). Eklage is used almost invariably in the NT to individuals. In its more restricted sense, it refers to the election of men to salvation.

The sovereign decree of God to choose out (ek, from lego, to pick out) is the basic idea in election. This concept is applied in at least five ways: to elect those who are to be saved, to elect the means of their salvation in Christ, to elect the means in the redeeming activity of the Holy Spirit, to elect the results in the implantation of Christ's righteous nature to those who are saved, and to elect the destiny of eternal fellowship with God.

The source of election is in God alone (John 6:37,44; Eph. 1:4). The very nature of election restricts its source to God, without regard to anything external to Himself. All men are depraved: none will be saved apart from God's divine intervention in grace; whom He chooses to be saved lies within His own sovereign will (Rom. 9:11,16,18; Eph. 1:5,11).

The cause of election is at least twofold: God's compassionate mercy extended toward men in Christ (without which no man would be saved), and His own glory. No ground can be delineated for God's mercy: it can be understood only in His love (John 3:16); nor can any ground be determined for God electing to salvation men who have spurned His moral demands, other than His freely-electing, sovereignly-determined compassion Election is, however, set within the context of His glory, which is to be seen displayed magnificently in the redeemed soul of man (Rom. 9:23; 11:33; Eph. 1:6).

While election is an immutable decree of the one Godhead, administratively it may be viewed as: the decree of the Father by which He gave to the Son those whom He elected to salvation in the Son, the decree of the Son to receive those to be redeemed and to assume the human nature to accomplish their redemption, and the decree of the Spirit to accomplish in them by regenerative activity the total ends of the decree.

Much attention has been given to the relation between God's sovereign choice in election and the foreknowledge of God, since the two concepts are related in Romans 8:27-30, and I Peter 1:1,2. Erroneous interpretations have implied that election was based on a foreknowledge by God of the choice which man would make, using foreknowledge "prior" knowledge. This interpretation not only contradicts the idea of sovereignty, but ignores the basic meaning of the word foreknow.

In Hebraistic use, proginosko does not mean mere knowledge beforehand, but connotes the idea of "regard with favor," or "to make an object of care" as in Exodus 2:25 and Romans 11:2 where "know" carries the additional idea of approval. While it is certain that God had a prior knowledge of man's actions, it does not follow that any such actions were to be the basis of God's choice of them. Prior knowledge arose out of prior choice — God's unconditioned choice. Foreknowledge implies not knowledge alone, but an act of God's will to accomplish that which He knows. His knowledge cannot be separated from His will, nor can His will be conditioned by mere prior knowledge of an event. Foreknow is synonymous with forelove. Foreseen faith or foreseen holiness is not the cause of election. A man is not elected because he is going to believe; he believes because he is elect (Acts 13:48). The sole grounds of election rests in the divine counsel.

When election refers to salvation, its objects are individual men. The concept of universal election is foreign to Scriptures; rather, particular election only is taught (Matt. 22:14; John 15:19; Rom. 8:29; 9:13,15,18,22; I Thess. 5:9). At the same time election is not to a general conformity to the redeemed life, but to a specific regeneration of nature and indwelling of the life-force of Christ's righteousness. Election assures that the redemptive grace of God will draw the depraved and rebellious heart of man into loving fellowship and responsive obedience to God.

EL-ELOHE-ISRAEL (ĕl'ē-lō'hĕ-īz'rā-ĕl), an altar erected by Jacob when he settled near Shechem. The name means "God, the God of Israel," and reflects the revelation of God and of his own name, received at Peniel (Gen. 33:20).

ELEMENTS (ĕl'ē-mĕnts, Gr. stoicheía, rows, series, alphabet, first principles of a science, physical elements, primary constituents of the universe, heavenly bodies, planets, personal cosmic powers). In Hebrews 5:12 first principles is clearly the meaning, as shown by Greek arché, principles, in Hebrews 6:1. Galatians 4:3,9 refer to heathen deities and practices. Colossians 2:8,20, translated rudiments, indicate a more philosophical concept of the elements. II Peter 3:10,12 refer to heavenly bodies or physical elements.

ELEPH (ē'lĕf), a place in the lot of Benjamin, near Jerusalem (Josh. 18:28). RSV, Ha-eleph. Perhaps the name should be read with the preceding word, Zelah-eleph. Site uncertain.

ELEPHANT (See Animals)

ELEUSIS (ĕl'ū-sĭs), today an industrial suburb of Athens where the ruins of a considerable temple and precinct are found. This was the shrine of Demeter, or the Earth-Goddess, into whose "mystery cult" freeborn Athenians were annually initiated. The ceremonies were elaborate, aiming at the stirring of emotion and promoting a conviction of regeneration. Little is known about the ceremony, for the initiates generally kept their vows of secrecy; but it seems clear that part of the ritual was the elevation of an ear of corn (wheat), the symbol of death and re-birth. This is perhaps the explanation of the imagery of Christ's remark at John 12:24. A sheaf of corn may be seen on a plinth lying among the ruins today.

ELEVEN, THE, the eleven apostles (Acts 1:26) or disciples (Matt. 28:16) remaining after the death of Judas (Mark 16:14; Luke 24:9,33; Acts 2:14).

ELHANAN (ĕl-hā'năn). 1. A son of Jaare-oregim (called also Jair), a Bethlehemite who slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliath (II Sam. 21:19; I Chron. 20:5).

2. A son of Dodo of Bethlehem and one of David's 30 heroes (II Sam. 23:24; I Chron. 11:26).

ELI (ē'lī, Heb. 'ēlî), of the family of Ithamar, fourth son of Aaron, who acted as both judge and high priest in Israel. He lived at Shiloh in a dwelling adjoining the Tabernacle (I Sam. 1-4; 14:3; I Kings 2:27). Little is known about him until he was well advanced in age, when Hannah came to pray for a son. The conduct of Eli's sons, Phinehas and Hophni, who, although lacking their father's character, were put into the priest's office, brought sorrow upon his declining years. Their conduct so shocked the people that they "abhorred the offering of the Lord." While Eli warned them of their shameful ways, he did not rebuke with the severity their deeds merited. Instead, Eli mildly reasoned with his sons, saying, "Why do ye such things?" But the sons no longer heeded their father, and he "restrained them not." An old man of ninety, almost blind, Eli waited to hear the result of the battle between the Israelites and the Philistines. When the messenger came with the news of the slaughter of his sons and of the taking of the ark, Eli fell off his seat and died of a broken neck. A good and pure man, Eli was weak and indecisive.

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI (ā'lēē, ā'lēē, làmà sàbàch'thànēē, Gr. eloi, eloi, lama sabachthani), the English transliteration of a Greek phrase (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34), which in turn is a transliteration of either the Hebrew or an Aramaic version of Psalm 22:1. The phrase as it appears in the best text of Matthew is closer to Aramaic; in Mark it is closer to Hebrew. The words are the central one of the seven cries of Jesus from the cross, as gathered from all four Gospels. The fact that in both instances the words are first transliterated shows the deep impression they made on some of the hearers. Both evangelists then translated them for the benefit of readers unfamiliar with either Hebrew or Aramaic, and their translation is authoritative as to what Jesus meant when He uttered them, since during His resurrection ministry He explained to them the meaning of all that concerned His death (Luke 24:45,46). Conjecture has been made which would connect sabachthani with an Aramaic verb meaning "deliverer," which would permit a rendering, "for this hast thou spared me," which is inconsistent with the evangelists' translation. Christ was forsaken by the Father when He bore our sins. E.R.

ELIAB (ē-lī'ăb, Heb. 'ĕlî'āv). 1. A son of Helon and leader of the tribe of Zebulun when the census was taken in the wilderness (Num. 1:9; 2:7; 7:24, 29; 10:16).

2. A son of Pallu or Phallu, a Reubenite, and father of Nathan and Abiram (Num. 16:1,12; 26: 8,9; Deut. 11:6).

3. The eldest son of Jesse and brother of David (I Sam. 16:6; 17:13,28). Once called Elihu (I Chron. 27:18). Of commanding appearance, when he was serving with Saul's army at the time it was menaced by Goliath, Eliab resented his younger brother's interference. Eliab's daughter Abihail became one of Rehoboam's wives (II Chron. 11:18).

4. A Levite in David's time who was a tabernacle porter and musician (I Chron. 15:18,20; 16:5).

5. A Gadite warrior who with others came over to David when David was hiding in the wilderness (I Chron. 12:9).

6. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet; a Kohathite Levite (I Chron. 6:27). Called Elihu (I Sam. 1:1) and Eliel (I Chron. 6:34).

ELIADA (ē-lī'ā-dà, Heb. 'elyādhā'). 1. One of David's sons (II Sam. 5:16; I Chron. 3:8).

2. A Benjamite, a mighty warrior who led 200,000 of his tribe to the army of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:17).

3. KJV, Eliadah; ASV, RSV, Eliada. The father of Rezon, the captain of a roving band that annoyed Solomon (I Kings 11:23).

ELIAH (ē-lī'à).. 1. A son of Jeroham, the Benjamite who was head of his tribe (I Chron. 8:27).

2. One of the sons of Elam who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:26).

ELIAHBA (ē-lī'ā-bà), a Shaalbonite, and one of David's famous guard (II Sam. 23:32; I Chron. 11:33).

ELIAKIM (ē-lī'ă-kĭm, Heb. 'elyāqîm, God sets up). 1. A son of Hilkiah, successor of Shebna as the master of Hezekiah's household. The manner of his displacing Shebna, and the reasons for it, together with the responsibilities and honors of his office, are set forth in Isaiah 22:15-25. He was spokesman for the delegation from Hezekiah, king of Judah, which attempted to negotiate with the representatives of Sennacherib, king of Assyria who was besieging Jerusalem (II Kings 18:17-37; Isa. 36:1-22). Upon the failure of these negotiations, Eliakim headed the delegation sent to implore the help of Isaiah the prophet (II Kings 19:2; Isa. 37:2).

2. The original name of king Jehoiakim (II Kings 23:34; II Chron. 36:4).

3. A priest who helped in the dedication of the rebuilt wall in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 12:41).

4. A grandson of Zerubbabel and ancestor of Jesus (Matt. 1:13).

5. Another and earlier ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30).

ELIAM (ē-lī'ăm). 1. The father of Bathsheba, wife of David (II Sam. 11:3). Called Ammiel in I Chronicles 3:5.

2. The son of Ahithophel the Gilonite (II Sam. 23:34).

ELIAS (ē-lī'ăs), the Greek form of the name of the Prophet Elijah, used in KJV in all occurrences in the NT. ASV, RSV have Elijah. See ELIJAH.

ELIASAPH (ē-lī'à-săf). 1. The son of Deuel and head of the Gadites in the sojournings in the wilderness (Num. 1:14; 2:14; 7:42,47; 10:20).

2. A son of Lael, a Levite and prince of the Gershonites during the wilderness wanderings (Num. 3:24).

ELIASHIB (ē-lī'ă-shīb, Heb. 'elyāshîv, God restores). 1. A priest in David's time from whom the 11th priestly course took its name (I Chron. 24:12).

2. A son of Elioenai, descendant of Zerubbabel, a Judahite (I Chron. 3:24).

3. The high priest at the time of the rebuilding of the city wall (Neh. 3:1,20,21; 13:4,7,28).

4. A Levite and singer who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

5. A son of Zattu who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:27).

6. A son of Bani who also married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:36).

7. An ancestor of Johanan who helped Ezra in gathering together the foreign wives, and other matters during the reign of Darius the Persian (Ezra 10:6; Neh. 12:10,22,23).

ELIATHAH (ē-lī'ă-thà), a son of Heman and a musician in David's reign (I Chron. 25:4,27).

ELIDAD (ē-lī'dăd), a prince of the tribe of Benjamin and a member of the commission in the division of Canaan (Num. 34:21).

ELIEL (ē'lī-ĕl, ē-lī'ĕl, Heb. 'ĕlî'ēl, God is God). 1. A Levite of the family of Kohath and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (I Chron. 6:34). Called Eliab in 6:27.

2. A chief man of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan (I Chron. 5:24).

3. A son of Shimhi the Benjamite (I Chron. 8:20).

4. A son of Shashak, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:22).

5. A Mahavite and a captain in David's army (I Chron. 11:46).

6. Another of David's heroes (I Chron. 11:47).

7. The seventh Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:11). Perhaps the same person as No. 5 or 6.

8. A chief of Judah, a man of Hebron, in David's time (I Chron. 15:9). Perhaps the same man as No. 5.

9. A chief Levite who helped in the return of the ark from the house of Obed-edom (I Chron. 15:11).

10. A Levite overseer of tithes and offerings in Hezekiah's reign (II Chron. 31:13).

ELIENAI (ĕl'ī-ē'nī), a son of Shimhi, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:20).

ELIEZER (ĕl'ī-ē'zêr, Heb. 'ĕlî'ezer, God is help). 1. Abraham's chief servant, and "son of his house," that is, one of his large household. He is named "Eliezer of Damascus" probably to distinguish him from others of the same name (Gen. 15:2). Probably he is the unnamed servant Abraham sent to his own country and kindred to secure a bride for Isaac, his son of promise (Gen. 24).

2. The second son of Moses and Zipporah to whom his father gave this name ("God is my help") as a memento of his gratitude to God (Exod. 18:4; I Chron. 23:15,17; 26:25).

3. A son of Becher and grandson of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:8).

4. A priest who assisted, by blowing a trumpet, in the return of the ark to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:24).

5. Son of Zichri, a Reubenite ruler in David's time (I Chron. 27:16).

6. The prophet who rebuked Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahaziah in the expedition to Tarshish (II Chron. 20:37).

7. A chieftain sent with others to induce many of the Israelites to return with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra 8:16).

8. A priest who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:18).

9. A Levite who had done the same (Ezra 10:23).

10. One of the sons of Harim who had done likewise (Ezra 10:31).

11. An ancestor of Jesus in the inter-testamental period (Luke 3:29).

ELIHOENAI (ĕl'ī-hō-ē'nī, to Jehovah are my eyes. See also Elioenai). 1. A descendant of Pahath Moab who returned with Ezra in Artaxerxes' time (Ezra 8:4). In ASV, RSV, Eliehoenai.

2. Perhaps also the seventh son of Meshelemiah the son of Kore of the sons of Asaph, a Korahite doorkeeper of the tabernacle in David's reign (I Chron. 26:3). In KJV, Elioenai; ASV, RSV, Eliehoenai.

ELIHOREPH (ĕl'ī-hō'rĕf), one of king Solomon's scribes (I Kings 4:3).

ELIHU (ē-lī'hū, Heb. 'elîhû, He is my God). 1. The father of Jeroham and great-grandfather of Samuel the prophet (I Sam. 1:1). Called also Eliel in I Chronicles 6:34.

2. A man of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

3. A Kohathite of the family of Korah, and a tabernacle porter in David's time (I Chron. 26:7).

4. A brother of David, who became ruler over Judah (I Chron. 27:18). Also known as Eliab.

5. The youngest of Job's friends, the son of Barachel, a Buzite, that is, an Aramean (Job 32:2-6; 34:1; 35:1; 36:1).

ELIJAH (ē-lī'jà, Heb. 'ēlîyāhû, Jehovah is God). See also Elias. The name is borne by four men in the Bible, of whom three are mentioned but once each: 1. A Benjamite and son of Jeroham, resident at Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:27 ASV, RSV; called Eliah in KJV).

2. A son of Harim, who married a foreign wife during the exile (Ezra 10:21).

3. An Israelite induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:26 ASV, RSV; called Eliah in KJV).

4. The well-known prophet. The story of his life begins at I Kings 17:1, where he is said to be, according to the received text, born at Tishbeh. This might possibly be Lisdib, in the territory of Naphtali, W of the Jordan. But Elijah is strongly identified with the region E of the Jordan, and Nelson Glueck (The River Jordan, Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1946, pp. 169-174) accepts a correction of the text of I Kings 17:1 to read "Elijah the Jabeshite, from Jabesh-gilead." This would make Elijah a native of Gilead, and not a mere sojourner there. This fits well with what we know of the prophet, but the traditional view is also possible. Wherever he was born, Elijah has been living in Gilead for some time when he enters the Biblical narrative.

The story opens dramatically, Elijah confronting Ahab with a prophecy of drought (17:1), to be broken only "by my word," says the prophet. God directs Elijah to go eastward to the brook Cherith and to hide there (17:2-7). The location of this brook is uncertain. It has been identified with wady Kelt, W of the Jordan. Glueck (op. cit. p. 170) maintains that it is E of the Jordan, because "east" is the usual meaning of "before" in topographical indications. He suggests a branch of the River Jabesh. The interest centers not in the location, but in what happened there; the ravens brought food to Elijah morning and evening till the brook dried up, and God directed Elijah to Zarephath, where a widow would sustain him (17:8-16). Zarephath is outside Israel in Phoenician territory, a circumstance to which Jesus Christ refers in His first sermon at Nazareth (Luke 4:25-26). The widow is in extremely straitened circumstances, and her reward for entertaining the prophet is that her supply of meal and oil is miraculously multiplied as long as Elijah is with her. Her son becomes so ill "that there was no breath left in him." Elijah prayed, and stretched himself upon him three times and prayed again, and the sick child revived (17:17-24).

Three years pass, and it is time for the drought to be broken (18:1-16). King Ahab in person, and his steward Obadiah go out through the land of Israel to find grass for the horses and mules. Obadiah is a faithful believer in God, who has supported a hundred young prophets in hiding. Elijah meets Obadiah, and asks him to warn Ahab that he is coming to meet him. Obadiah demurs, but is reassured, and obeys. Ahab and Elijah meet, and Elijah proposes a test as to whether the Canaanite Baal or the Israelite God is the true God (18:17-40). Four hundred fifty prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of the groves (sacred to the Baals) are to be on one side; Elijah alone on the other. The meeting takes place on Mt. Carmel, in the sight of a vast multitude of the people. Elijah challenges the people to accept the verdict of fire from heaven. Elijah directs the whole proceeding, the preparations made by the prophets of Baal, and later his own. While the Baal worshipers call frantically on their gods in orgiastic dances, Elijah jeers at them and at their gods. When they retire, it is time for the evening oblation in the temple at Jerusalem. Elijah directs the building of an altar of rough stones. The sacrificial animal is prepared and laid upon the wood. A trench is dug about the altar, and water poured in to fill it and to drench the sacrifice. With simple, majestic directness Elijah prays, and fire from heaven falls, burning up sacrifice and altar and dust, licking up the water in the trench. Convinced, the people cry, "The Lord, He is God; the Lord, He is God!" On the orders of Elijah, the prophets of Baal are taken down to the brook Kishon at the foot of Mt. Carmel, and there slain. Elijah curtly orders Ahab, "Get thee up, eat and drink; for there is a sound of abundance of rain" (18:41-46). Whatever his feelings in the matter, whether meekly or sullenly, Ahab goes to attend to his eating and drinking.

Elijah has other business to occupy him. He climbs Mt. Carmel once more, with a servant, whom he sends to a lookout point to scan the skies for rain clouds, while Elijah prays. At the seventh look, there is a cloud "like a man's hand." Elijah sends his servant to warn Ahab to hasten "that the rain stop thee not." As Ahab rode to Jezreel, Elijah girded up his long gown in his belt and ran before Ahab's chariot to Jezreel. When Ahab told Jezebel all that Elijah had done, she vowed vengeance on the prophet (19:1-8). Elijah fled for his life, a day's journey beyond Beersheba into the wilderness, and sat down under a juniper tree, despondent. But an angel had baked a cake on coals, and set a cruse of water at Elijah's head, so Elijah ate and drank, rested and ate again, and went in the strength of that food 40 days and 40 nights to Horeb the mount of God (19:9-21). There, where Moses had received the Law, Elijah experienced mighty wind, earthquake and fire, before he heard the still, small voice of the Lord. He received a commission to anoint Hazael king over Syria in Damascus, and Jehu to be king over Israel, and Elisha to be his own successor as prophet. Elijah is assured that there are yet 7,000 in Israel who have not bowed the knee to Baal. To this Paul refers in Romans 11:2-4. Elijah first finds Elisha, and calls him to his side.

In the ensuing wars between Ahab and Benhadad king of Syria, Elijah does not appear (I Kings 20). But when Jezebel takes Naboth's vineyard for Ahab, and has Naboth murdered, Elijah meets the king in the vineyard to rebuke him for the act (21:1-24). Ahab repented, and Elijah brought him word from the Lord that the prophesied ruin should not come in his days, but in his son's (21:27-29). Elijah does not appear again during the lifetime of Ahab, but in his son Ahaziah's days, Elijah sends him a message of impending death (II Kings 1). Ahaziah sends a captain with 50 men to take Elijah, but Elijah calls down fire from heaven, which destroys them. A second company of 50 meet the same fate. When the third captain with his 50 approaches Elijah, he begs for mercy, and the angel of God directs Elijah to go with this captain without fear. So Elijah repeats his message of impending death to Ahaziah, who shortly dies. In the reign of Ahaziah's son Jehoram, Elijah is taken up to heaven in a whirlwind (II Kings 2:1-15). Elisha insists on following him all the way to Bethel, then to Jericho, and at each place the sons of the prophets warn Elisha of his master's being taken away. They go on to Jordan, where Elijah wrapped his mantle together and with it struck the water, and the waters were divided so that Elijah and Elisha went over on dry ground. Elijah invited Elisha to make one last request, and Elisha asks for "a double portion of thy spirit." Elijah says that this is a hard request, which will be granted only if Elisha sees Elijah when he is taken from him. As they walked along and talked, a chariot and horses of fire parted them, and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven. Elisha saw it, cried, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!" Elisha rent his own clothes in two, took up the mantle of Elijah that fell from him as he ascended, and went back to Jordan. Smiting the waters with the mantle of Elijah, he cried "Where is the Lord God of Elijah?" and the waters parted as before. The prophets of Jericho recognized that the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha.

The fulfillment of Elijah's prophecy concerning Jezebel is recorded in II Kings 9:36; regarding the house of Ahab in II Kings 10:10,17. Jehoram receives "a writing" from Elijah (II Chron. 21:12-15), the only reference we have to any writing by the prophet. An old man at this time, it is natural that he should write rather than journey to the court in person.

In Malachi 4:5,6, God promises "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." This expectation of the return of Elijah appears frequently in the NT, as John the Baptist (Matt. 11:14; 17:10-13; Mark 9:13; Luke 1:17; John 1:21, 25); and Jesus (Matt. 16:13; 14; Mark 6:15; 8:28; Luke 9:8,19). Elijah appears to Jesus on the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. 17:3,4; Mark 9:4,5; Luke 9:30-33). James and John are reminded of how Elijah called down fire from heaven (Luke 9:54). Some thought Jesus called for Elijah to rescue Him from the cross (Matt. 27:47,49; Mark 15:35,36). The epistle of James uses Elijah as an example of a man who prevailed in prayer (James 5:17,18). Whether Elijah is one of the two witnesses, together with Enoch, in Revelation 11, is a matter of interpretation, resting on the fact that Enoch and Elijah are the only two men recorded as being taken up to heaven without dying. E.R.

ELIKA (ē-lī'kà), a Harodite, one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:25).

ELIM (ē'lĭm, Heb. 'êlîm, terebinths), the second stopping-place of the Israelites after they crossed the Red Sea on their exodus from Egypt. It is on the W side of the Sinaitic peninsula, on the caravan route to the copper and turquoise mines of Sinai. In spite of its advantages, 12 springs of water and 70 palm trees, the Israelites seem not to have stayed there long, preferring to put a greater distance between themselves and the land of their bondage (Exod. 15:27; 16:1; Num. 33:9,10).

ELIMELECH (ē-lĭm'ĕ-lĕk, Heb. 'ĕlîmelekh, my God is king), a man of Bethlehem-judah who emigrated to Moab during a famine in Judah in the time of the Judges (Ruth 1:2,3; 2:1,3; 4:3,9). He and his sons died in Moab. He is remembered because his daughter-in-law Ruth was faithful to his widow Naomi.

ELIOENAI (ēl'ĭ-ō-ē'nī, to Jehovah are my eyes). See also Elihoenai. 1. A son of Neariah of the family of David (I Chron. 3:23,24).

2. The head of a family of Simeon (I Chron. 4:36).

3. The head of one of the families of the sons of Becher, son of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:8).

4. A son of Pashur, a priest who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:22). Perhaps the same person as the one mentioned in Nehemiah 12:41.

5. A son of Zattu who married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:27).

6. A priest, perhaps the same person as No. 4 (Neh. 12:41).

ELIPHAL (ē-lī'făl, ĕl'ĭ-făl, Heb. 'ĕlîphāl, God has judged), son of Ur, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:35). Eliphal and Ur are thought to be Eliphelet and Ahasbai of II Samuel 23:34, for textual reasons.

ELIPHALET (ē-lĭf'ă-lĕt), the last of David's sons born at Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:16; I Chron. 14:7; called Eliphelet in I Chron. 3:8 KJV and in all places in ASV, RSV). See ELIPHELET.

ELIPHAZ (ĕl'ĭ-făz, Heb. 'ĕlîphaz, possibly God is fine gold). 1. A son of Esau by Adah, daughter of Elon (Gen. 36:4-16; I Chron. 1:35,36).

2. The chief of Job's three friends (Job 2:11); from Teman, traditionally famous for its wise men (Jer. 49:7). Eliphaz' speeches show clearer reasoning than those of the other two friends. In his first speech (Job 4,5) Eliphaz traces all affliction to sin, through the natural operation of cause and effect, and admonishes Job to make his peace with God. In his second address (Job 15) Eliphaz shows irritation at Job's sarcasm, reiterates his arguments, and depicts strongly the fate of the wicked. In his third address (Job 22) Eliphaz definitely charges Job with sin and points out to him the path of restoration. In Job 42:7-9 God addresses Eliphaz as the chief of Job's friends, and commands him to make sacrifice in expiation of their fault in wrongly accusing Job, saying that Job will pray for them and they will be forgiven.

ELIPHELEH (ē-lĭf'ĕ-lĕh), a Levite singer and harpist who had charge of the choral service when the ark was returned (I Chron. 15:18,21). Called Eliphelehu in ASV, RSV.

ELIPHELET (ē-lĭf'ĕ-lĕt). 1. The last of David's sons (I Chron. 3:8). See ELIPHALET.

2. Another son of David born in Jerusalem (I Chron. 3:6; called Elpalet I Chron. 14:5 KJV, Elpelet ASV, RSV).

3. A son of Ahasbai, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:34).

4. A son of Eshek and descendant of Saul, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:39).

5. A leader of the sons of Adonikam who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra 8:13).

6. A son of Hashum who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:33).

ELISABETH (See Elizabeth)

ELISHA (ē-lī'shà, called Eliseus, the Gr. form of Heb. 'ĕlîshā', in Luke 4:27 KJV, Elisha in ASV, RSV). At Horeb God directed Elijah to anoint Elisha as his successor (I King 19:16-21), who was to aid Hazael, king of Syria, and Jehu, king of Israel in taking vengeance on the enemies of God. Elijah left Horeb and on his way north found Elisha the son of Shaphat of Abelmeholah (I Kings 19:16) plowing with the last of 12 yoke of oxen. The number of oxen indicates the wealth of the family. Elijah cast his mantle upon Elisha, who understood the significance of the act as the choice of himself to succeed the older prophet. Elisha ran after Elijah, who had not tarried to explain his action, and begged for permission to kiss his parents farewell. Elijah's reply, "Go back again; for what have I done to thee?" led Elisha to go home and make his own decision to accept the prophetic call. Elisha next appeared in connection with the translation of Elijah (II Kings 2). He persisted in following Elijah till the latter was carried up to heaven. Because he saw him go, a double portion of Elijah's spirit was given him. Taking the mantle of Elijah, he used it to make a dry path over Jordan, as his master had done, and tried to dissuade the sons of the prophets from a fruitless search for the body of Elijah. Elisha healed the waters of a spring at Jericho with salt. When children of the city made fun of his baldness, Elisha cursed them in the name of the Lord. Two she-bears came out of the wood and "tare" 42 of them. It is not said that they were killed; the bears clawed them.

Elisha had a long ministry during the reigns of Jehoram, Jehu, Jehoahaz and Joash, kings of Israel. After the death of Ahab (II Kings 3), Moab rebelled against his son Jehoram. When Jehoram secured the king of Edom and Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, as allies, Jehoshaphat insisted on consulting Elisha. Elisha referred Jehoram to the prophets of his parents, but out of regard to Jehoshaphat, counseled them to dig trenches to channel water from Edom to relieve their army, and predicted victory over the Moabites. Elisha saved a poor widow from financial distress by miraculous multiplication of her oil supply (II Kings 4: 1-7). He visited the home of a "great woman" and her husband in Shunem so often that she had a room built for him (II Kings 4:8-37). Elisha sent his servant Gehazi to ask the woman what she would like to have him do for her in return for her hospitality. She asked a son, and a son was given her. When the lad was old enough to go to the fields with his father, he suffered a fatal sunstroke. His mother herself went for Elisha, who, after sending Gehazi, whose efforts were fruitless, himself came, and after great effort the child came back to life. At Gilgal during a famine (II Kings 4:38-41), Elisha saved a school of the prophets from death because of eating poisonous vegetables. When a present of food was given him, Elisha set it before 100 men, and the Lord increased the supply to satisfy them (II Kings 4:42-44). Elisha healed the Syrian captain Naaman of leprosy (II Kings 5); Gehazi proved himself an unworthy servant. Elisha rescued a young prophet's borrowed ax-head (II Kings 6:1-7). He gave timely warning, repeatedly saving Israel from defeat by the Syrians (II Kings 6:8-23). The Syrians came to Dothan, where Elisha was living with a servant, whom Elisha showed the armies of God protecting the city. The Syrians were stricken with blindness, and Elisha led them to Samaria, and persuaded the king of Israel to feed them and release them. The Syrians invaded Israel no more for a time. When Syria finally besieged Samaria and the city was reduced to terrible straits, the king of Israel blamed Elisha (II Kings 6:24-7:20). Elisha predicted relief the next day. Four lepers, considering their case hopeless, visited the Syrian camp, found it deserted, and reported. The spoils of the Syrians relieved the inhabitants of Samaria. Elisha advised the "great woman" to escape a coming famine by going to Philistia (II Kings 8:1-6). When she returned and sought restoration of her property, Gehazi, who had just been telling the king the deeds of Elisha, was the means of the woman's securing restitution.

Elisha visited Damascus and had an innocent part in Hazael's succeeding Ben-hadad as king of Syria. Elisha sent a young prophet to anoint Jehu king of Israel (II Kings 9:1). Before Elisha died (II Kings 13:14-21), Joash, king of Israel, came to visit him and received an object lesson by means of arrows, with regard to his war against the Syrians. A man being hastily buried in Elisha's sepulchre touched Elisha's bones and revived. Elisha's ministry was filled with miracles, many relieving private needs, some related to affairs of state. Elisha's prophetic insight and wise counsel made him a valuable though not always appreciated adviser to kings. He finished the work of Elijah, destroying the system of Baal worship, completed the tasks assigned to Elijah of anointing Hazael and Jehu, and saw the final ruin of the house of Ahab and Jezebel. The mention of the cleansing of Naaman, the Syrian, from leprosy in Luke 4:27 perhaps indicates this as the crowning achievement of his career, giving Elisha an influence with the Syrian king which enabled him to help Israel. Elisha's story is told with vigor and vivid detail, making him live as few OT characters do. The incidents are not all told in chronological order; but they bear the marks of historical truth in the simplicity of their narration. E.R.

ELISHAH (ē-lī'shà, Heb. 'ĕlîshâh, God saves), the eldest son of Javan, grandson of Noah and founder of a tribal family (Gen. 10:4; I Chron. 1:7). The land from which Tyre got its purple dye (Ezek. 27:7); somewhere around the Mediterranean; South Italy, North Africa or Greece, perhaps; not yet identifiable.

ELISHAMA (ē-lĭsh'ámà, Heb. 'ĕlîshāmā', God has heard). 1. Grandfather of Joshua and son of Ammihud and prince of the Ephraimites at the outset of the wilderness sojourn (Num. 1:10; 2:18; 7:48, 53; 10:22; I Chron. 7:26).

2. A son of David born in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:16; I Chron. 3:8).

3. Another son of David, who is also called

Elishua (I Chron. 3:6; cf. II Sam. 5:15).

4. A son of Jekaniah, a Judahite (I Chron. 2:41).

5. Father of Nethaniah and grandfather of Ishmael "of the seed royal" who lived at the time of the Exile (II Kings 25:25; Jer. 41:1). Nos. 4 and 5 may be the same person.

6. A scribe or secretary to Jehoiakim (Jer. 36: 12,20,21).

7. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people the law (II Chron. 17:8).

ELISHAPHAT (ē-lĭsh'ā-făt), one of the "captains of hundreds" who supported Jehoiada in the revolt against Athaliah (II Chron. 23:1).

ELISHEBA (ē-lĭsh'ĕbà), Amminadab's daughter, sister of Nahshon, captain of Judah (Num. 2:3). By marrying Aaron (Exod. 6:23) she connected the royal and priestly tribes.

ELISHUA (ĕl'ĭ-shū'à, ē-lĭsh'wà), a son of David born in Jerusalem (II Sam. 5:15; I Chron. 14:5). Likewise called Elishama in I Chronicles 3:6.

ELIUD (ē-lī'ŭd), the son of Ashim and father of Eleazar and ancestor of Christ (Matt. 1:14,15).

ELIZABETH (ē-lĭz'ā-bĕth, Gr. Elisábet, God is [my] oath, KJV Elisabeth), the wife of a priest Zacharias, herself of the lineage of Aaron (Luke 1:5-57). In fulfillment of God's promise, she in her old age bore a son, John the Baptist. Her kinswoman (cousin) Mary of Nazareth in Galilee, having learned that she was to be the virgin mother of Jesus, visited Elizabeth in the hill country of Judea. Elizabeth's Spirit-filled greeting prompted Mary to reply in a song called Magnificat. After Mary returned home, Elizabeth's son was born. She was a woman of unusual piety, faith, and spiritual gifts, whose witness to Mary must have been an incomparable encouragement. Luke, who alone tells the story, appreciated the significant role of women in the history of redemption, and emphasized the agency of the Holy Spirit in the life of Elizabeth.

ELIZAPHAN (ĕl'ĭ-zā'făn, ē-lĭz'ăfăn, Heb. 'ĕlîtsāphān, God has concealed). 1. The son of Uzziel, chief ruler of the Kohathites when the census was taken in Sinai (Num. 3:30; I Chron. 15:8; II Chron. 29:13), called Elzaphan in Exodus 6:22 and Leviticus 10:4. In Chronicles his Levitical class is treated as co-equal with the Kohathites.

2. The son of Parnach, prince of the tribe of Zebulun in the wilderness (Num. 34:25).

ELIZUR (ē-lī'zĕr), the son of Shedeur, and prince of the Reubenites, who helped in the census Moses took (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30-35; 10:18).

ELKANAH (ĕl-kā'nà, Heb. 'elqānâh, God has possessed). 1. The father of Samuel, the prophet (I Sam. 1:1-2:21). His tender solicitude for his favorite wife Hannah and for their first son appears in the story. He is called an Ephraimite from Ramathaim-zophim, in the hill country of Ephraim, but he appears to have been a Levite, descendant of Kohath (I Chron. 6:22,23,27,33,34), though the genealogical data are not clear.

2. A son of Korah, a Levite, descendant of Kohath (Exod. 6:23,24; I Chron. 6:24). The sons of Korah did not die with their father, who perished for rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num. 26: 11).

3. The second to king Ahaz, killed by Pekah, king of Israel, when he invaded Judah (II Chron. 28:7).

4. One of the ambidextrous warriors who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:6).

5. In addition, several Levites bear the name Elkanah (I Chron. 6:22-28; 33-38; 9:16). It is impossible to distinguish them with certainty from one another. Elkanah was a favorite name in the Kohathite line.

ELKOSH (ĕl'kŏsh), Nahum 1:1, the place of origin of Nahum. (KJV, ASV, the Elkoshite; RSV, of Elkosh). Jerome says that a town in Galilee was shown him as Elkosh. The Nestorians locate it and the tomb of the prophet near the Tigris, N of Mosul. Another tradition places Elkosh "beyond Jordan," but emendation of that text and other considerations lead some to believe that Elkosh was in the S of Judah. "Unknown" is the safest conclusion.

ELLASAR (ĕl-lā'sar, Heb. 'ellāsār), one of the city-states whose king, Arioch (Eri-aku), invaded Palestine in the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:1,9). It is the ancient Babylonian Larsa (with the last three letters transposed in Heb.), modern Senkereh, SE of Babylon, between Erech and Ur. At first independent, it became subject to Hammurabi (Amraphel of Gen. 14:1,9) or to his successor. Ellasar was at this period a city of a high degree of civilization, a center of sun-god worship, with a temple-tower (Ziggurat) called "House of Light," which was a seat of mathematical, astronomical and other learning. Ruins of city walls and of houses remain. Thus the four kings with whom Abraham fought (Gen. 14:13-16) were no petty chieftains, but sovereigns of flourishing and cultured cities, from one of which Abraham himself had recently emigrated.

ELMODAM (ĕl-mō'dăm), Elmadam in ASV, RSV), the son of Er, and ancestor of Joseph, Mary's husband (Luke 3:28).

ELNAAM (ĕl-nā'ăm), the father of David's guard, Jeribai and Joshaviah (I Chron. 11:46).

ELNATHAN (ĕl-nā'thăn, Heb. 'elnāthān, God has given). 1. Father of Nehushta, the mother of Jehoiachin (II Kings 24:8).

2. The son of Achbor, sent to Egypt by king Jehoiakim to bring back the Prophet Uriah (Jer. 26:22). He was one of those who urged king Jehoiakim not to burn the roll which Jeremiah had written (Jer. 36:12,25). (He may be the same person as No. 1.)

3. Name of two "leading men" and one man "of insight," Levites, sent on an embassy by Ezra (Ezra 8:16).

ELOHIM (ĕ-lō'hĭm), the most frequent Hebrew word for God (over 2,500 times in the OT). Several theories of the origin of the word have been proposed, some connecting it with Heb. 'ēl or 'ĕlôah, others distinguishing them from 'ĕlōhîm. The origin is prehistoric and therefore incapable of direct proof. Elohim is plural in form, but is singular in construction (used with a singular verb or adjective). When applied to the one true God, the plural is due to the Hebrew idiom of a plural of magnitude or majesty. (Gen. 1:1, etc). When used of heathen gods (Exod. 18:11; 20:3; Gen. 35:2; Josh. 24:20, etc.) or of angels (Ps. 8:5; 97:7; Job 1:6, etc.) or judges (Exod. 21:6; I Sam. 2:25, etc.) as representatives of God, Elohim is plural in sense as well as form. Elohim is the earliest name of God in the OT and persists along with other names to the latest period. Whatever its etymology, the most likely roots mean either "be strong," or "be in front," suiting the power and preëminence of God. Jesus is quoted as using a form of the name from the cross (Matt. 27:46, Eli; Mark 15:34, Eloi). See articles Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani. E.R.

ELOI (See Elohim)

ELON (ē'lŏn). 1. Hittite whose daughter Bashemath (Gen. 26:34) or Adah (Gen. 36:2) Esau married.

2. The second of Zebulon's three sons (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26).

3. The Zebulonite who judged Israel ten years (Judg. 12:11,12).

ELON (place). 1. A town in the territory of Dan (Josh. 19:43), location unidentified.

2. Elon-beth-hanan, a town in one of the districts which furnished provisions for Solomon's household (I Kings 4:9).

ELPAAL (ĕl-pā'ăl), son of Shahuraim, a Benjamite and head of his father's house (I Chron. 8: 11,12,18).

ELPALET (ĕl-pā'lĕt, ĕl'pa-lĕt; ASV, RSV Elpelet), a son of David (I Chron. 14:5). See ELIPHALET (I Chron. 3:6).

EL SHADDAI (ĕl shăd'ā-ī, -shăd'ī), the name of God by which, according to Exodus 6:3, He appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. As to Abraham, this is borne out by Genesis 17:1; as to Jacob, by Genesis 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3; translated "God Almighty." Often "the Almighty" (Shaddai without El) is used as a name of God (Gen. 49:25; Num. 24:4,16, in Balaam's prophecies; Ruth 1:20,21; Ps. 68:14; 91:1; 30 times by Job and his friends, from Job 5:17 to 37:23; once God refers to Himself as "the Almighty," Job 40: 2). The name is rare in the prophets (Isa. 13:6; Ezek. 1:24; 10:5; Joel 1:15). "Almighty" appears in the NT as a designation of God, translating Greek pantokrátor, all-powerful (II Cor. 6:18; 8 times in Rev., once, 19:6, translated "omnipotent"). Thus this name for God which was a favorite of the patriarchs, especially Jacob and Job, becomes prominent in the songs of heaven. The etymology of El Shaddai is in dispute, "Almighty God" being the widely accepted meaning, while some who would derive the Hebrew religion from pagan cults favor "mountain god." E.R.

ELTEKEH (ĕl'tē-kē), a city in the territory given to Dan, on its southern border with Judah (Josh. 19:44). With its suburbs (KJV, ASV) or pasture lands (RSV) it was given to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:23, ASV, RSV Elteke). Probably Khirbet el-Muqenna, E of Ekron.

ELTEKON (ĕl'tē-kŏn), one of six cities in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:59); site unknown; perhaps near Hebron because named next to Bethanoth which is in that vicinity.

ELTOLAD (ĕl-tō'lăd), a city in the Negeb of Judah toward Edom (Josh. 15:30), but assigned to Simeon (Josh. 19:4). Also (I Chron. 4:29) called Tolad.

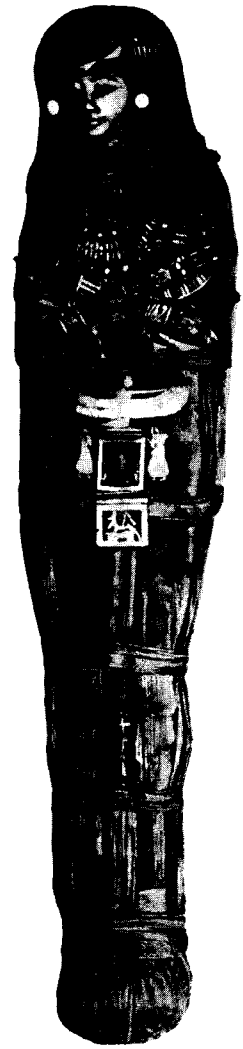
ELUL (ĕ-lōōl'), the sixth month of the Hebrew year, approximately August-September (Neh. 6: 15). See CALENDAR.

ELUZAI (ē-lū'zā-ī), a Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

ELYMAS (ĕl'ĭmăs, Gr. Elýmas), a Jew, Bar-jesus (meaning son of Jesus or Joshua), a sorcerer who was with Sergius Paulus, the proconsul of Cyprus. He became blind following Paul's curse, in consequence of which the proconsul believed in the Lord (Acts 13:4-13). His name, Elymas, is Greek in form, but is not a Greek translation of Bar-jesus or of "sorcerer" (Greek mágos), but may be the transliteration of an Aramaic or Arabic root meaning "wise," and equivalent to mágos: hence the phrase, "Elymas the sorcerer (for so is his name by interpretation") (Acts 13:8).

ELZABAD (ĕl-zā'băd, ĕl'zà-băd). 1. A Gadite who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:12).

2. The son of Shemaiah and a Korhite Levite (I Chron. 26:7).



A fine example of Egyptian embalming, the mummy of the woman Katebet, at Thebes. BM

EMBALM (ĕm-bàm), to prepare a dead body with oil and spices to preserve it from decay. Embalming was of Egyptian origin. The only clear instances of it in the Bible were in the cases of Jacob and Joseph. Joseph ordered his slaves, the physicians, to embalm his father (Gen. 50:2,3; a process which took 40 days); and later Joseph himself was embalmed (Gen. 50:26). The purpose of the Egyptians in embalming was to preserve the body for the use of the soul in a future life: the purpose of the Hebrews was to preserve the bodies of Jacob and Joseph for a long journey to their resting place with Abraham (Gen. 50:13). In the case of Joseph, centuries elapsed before burial in the ancestral tomb (Exod. 13:19; Josh 24:32). The process of embalming is not described in the Bible. Body cavities were filled with asphalt, cedar oil or spices, or all three. The body was wrapped tightly in linen cloths, the more perishable parts being stuffed with rolls of linen to maintain the shape of the human form. The Hebrew word for "embalm," hānat, means "to spice, to make spicy." The body of Asa is said to have been buried with spices, but is not said to have been embalmed (II Chron. 16:14). Jesus comments on the use of spices in burying (Matt. 26:12; Mark 14:8; John 12:7); and His body was buried with 100 pounds of myrrh and spices, wrapped in a linen cloth (John 19:39,40). The women who watched the burial considered this inadequate, for they prepared and brought to the sepulchre more spices (Mark 16:1; Luke 23:35,36; 24:1). Martha thought the body of Lazarus was decaying, hence clearly he had not been embalmed (John 11:39); but he was so bound that he had to be loosened (John 11:44). The widow's son at Nain was simply being carried out for burial (Luke 7:11-17): Ananias (and presumably Sapphira) were merely wrapped up (Acts 5:6,10). The Biblical concept of the future life made embalming unnecessary. E.R.

EMBROIDERY (ĕm-broi'dêr-ē), appears once in KJV as verb embroider (Exod. 28:39), translating Hebrew shāvats, referring probably to a checkered weaving (ASV, RSV) or plaiting of the coat with colored threads. The noun "embroider" occurs twice (Exod. 35:35; 38:23), Hebrew rāqam, to variegate, weave in colored threads. "Broidered" translates Hebrew riqmâh, variegated Ezek. 16:10,13,18; 26:16; 27:7,16,24: RSV embroidered), and renders Hebrew tashebēts, ASV, RSV checkerwork (Exod. 28:4) and Greek plégma, twined, twisted, plaited; of hair (I Tim. 2:9, KJV broided, ASV, RSV braided). Riqmâh is also translated "divers colors" (I Chron. 29:2, RSV colored stones; Ezek. 17:3, of bird plumage); "needlework" (Judg. 5:30, ASV, RSV embroidered with a design on both sides); and Psalm 45:14, ASV broidered work, RSV many-colored. Aside from the use of the Hebrew terms for the colors of gems and of feathers, they seem to have meant to weave into the cloth or draw in with a needle, or appliqué colored threads to make checkered designs, or other, for hangings of the tabernacle, for the coats, girdles and ephod of the priests, for royal garments, and for clothing of private persons. The details of such work given in the Bible impress us with the rich and gorgeously colorful character of needlework which may be called embroidery but furnish no exact idea of its appearance or method of manufacture. E.R.

EMIM (ē'mĭm, Heb. 'êmîm, KJV Emim), the original inhabitants of Moab (Deut. 2:10,11). They were a great people, that is, powerful and of advanced civilization; numerous; and tall of stature, so that they were, like the Anakim, called giants. Out of harsh experience, the Moabites called them "Terrors," such being the meaning of Hebrew 'êmîm. In the time of Abraham they were defeated by the Mesopotamian invaders in Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. 14:5), a plain E of the Dead Sea.

EMMANUEL (ĕ-măn'ū-ĕl), or Immanuel, the name meaning "with us is God," given by Isaiah to a child whose birth and childhood are a sign to Ahaz (Isa. 7:14; 8:8,10), and whose later life, sufferings and glory are the theme of his book. Micah 5:2 takes Immanuel to be the Messiah, whom Matthew 1:23 identifies as Jesus.

EMMAUS (ĕ-mā'ŭs), the village to which two disciples were going on the day of Jesus' resurrection, when He met and was recognized by them as He broke the bread at supper (Luke 24:7-35). It was about 60 furlongs or stadia (RSV, seven miles) from Jerusalem, in what direction is not stated. From early centuries several possibilities to the NW have been advocated. One site, 'Amwâs, is 20 miles (some manuscripts read 160 stadia) from the city, too far to suit Luke's narrative. Kubeibeh, Kuloniych and other sites have their partisans.

EMMOR (ĕm'êr), the father of Sychem (Acts 7:16). Same as Hamor.

ENAM (ē'năm, Heb. 'ênayim, place of a fountain), one of 14 cities "in the valley," lowland or Shephelah of Judah, near Jarmuth, Azekah, Bethshemesh, and Socoh. It is thought to be the same as Enaim, between Adullam and Timnah in the same region of the Negev (Gen. 38:14,21 ASV, RSV: in KJV "an open place," "openly"). This name means "two fountains." It has not yet been identified.

ENAN (ē'năn), the father of Ahira, of the tribe of Naphtali, who assisted in the Sinai census (Num. 1:15; 2:29; 7:78,83; 10:27).

ENCAMPMENT (ĕn-kămp'mĕnt). The children of Israel encamped at many places on their way from Egypt to Canaan (Exod. 13:20; 14:2,9; 15:27; Num. 33:10-46; Josh. 4:19; 5:10). Hebrew hānât, usually translated "encamp," is also rendered "abide in tents, pitch, rest intent," etc. Often the stay at an encampment was brief, sometimes long (Exod. 18:5). God gave instructions for the camp and its movements (Num. 1:50-2:34; 10:1-28, 33-36). Though men, women and children camped together, arrangements were military. References to encampments of soldiers, of Israel or of other nations, assembled for war, occur (Josh. 10:5, 31, 34; Judg. 6:4; 9:50; 10:17; 20:19; 1 Sam. 11:1; 13:16; II Sam. 11:11; 12:28; I Kings 16:15,16; I Chron. 11:15; II Chron. 32:1). Job 19:12 uses the word figuratively. Psalm 34:7 applies it to an angel; Zechariah 9:8, to God. It is literal in Psalms 27:3 and 53:5.

ENCHANTMENT (ĕn-chânt'mĕnt), the use of any form of magic, including divination. Several Hebrew and Greek words, variously translated, occur. All forms of enchantment were forbidden God's people (Deut. 18:10; Acts 8:9,11; 13:8,10; 19:19).

ENDOR (ĕn'dôr, Heb. 'ên dor, spring of habitation), a village about seven miles SE of Nazareth, in Manasseh's territory, in western Palestine, and the home town of the "witch of Endor," the spiritist medium Saul visited before his last battle with the Philistines (I Sam. 28:8-25).

EN-EGLAIM (ĕn-ĕg'lā-ĭm), a place by the Dead Sea, between which and En-gedi Ezekiel prophesied that fishers would one day spread their nets (Ezek. 47:10). Site unknown.

EN-GANNIM (ĕn-găn'ĭm, Heb. 'ên gannîm, fountain, spring of gardens). 1. A town in the lowland, valley or Shephelah of Judah, mentioned with Eshtaol and Zanoah (Josh. 15:34).

2. A town in the territory of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 19:21; 21:29). The modern Jenīn, SW of Mt. Gilboa, at the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, on the main road through Samaria to Jerusalem; with beautiful gardens and fruitful orchards, well watered by local springs.

EN-GEDI (ĕn-gē'dī, Heb. 'ên gedhî, spring or fountain of the kid or wild goat), an oasis on the W coast of the Dead Sea about midway of its length, in the territory of Judah (Josh. 15:62). Here David fortified a refuge from Saul (I Sam. 23: 29; 24:1). Jehoshaphat defeated the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites from Mt. Seir when they attacked by the narrow paths up the steep cliffs from the shore (II Chron. 20:2). En-gedi is there identified with Hazazon-tamar, occupied by Ammorites, which Chedorlaomer invaded in the days of Abraham (Gen. 14:7). Its luxurious verdure, due to warm springs, was famous in the days of Solomon (S. of Sol. 1:14). Ezekiel prophesied that fishers would stand here, in the restored land (Ezek. 47:10). Known then as Engaddi, it continued to be prominent through the NT period and until the time of Eusebius. It is the modern Ain Jidi, and the OT site is Tell ej-Jurn.

ENGRAVER. The OT and archaeology reveal a knowledge of engraving or carving among the Israelites, although developed neither to the extent nor skill as among neighboring countries. This may have been due to the warnings against "graven images" (Exod. 20:4). Signet rings, engraved with a man's seal or sign, were common (Gen. 38:18, Esth. 3:12, Jer. 22:24). Each of the two onyx stones on the high priest's shoulders was engraved with the names of six tribes, and his breastplate bore 12 stones, each engraved with the name of a tribe (Exod. 28:9-21). Bezaleel and Aholiab were craftsmen in gold, silver, brass, stones, and wood (Exod. 31:1-9, 38:22,23), gifted by God to make the furnishings of the tabernacle. Not only did they carve and engrave, but they taught these skills to others (Exod. 35:30-35). See also OCCUPATIONS. A.M.R.

EN-HADDAH (ĕn-hăd'à, Heb. 'ên haddâh, swift fountain), a town on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:21).

EN-HAKKORE (ĕn-hăk'-ō-rē, Heb. 'ên ha-kôrē', fountain of him who cried), a spring which burst out from Ramath-lehi ("hill of the jawbone") at Samson's cry, when he thirsted after slaying a thousand Philistines with a jawbone (Judg. 15: 19).

EN-HAZOR (ĕn-hā'zôr, Heb. 'ên hātsôr, fountain of the village), a fenced city in Naphtali named with Kedesh and Edrei (Josh. 19:37). Probably modern Hasireh, W of Kadesh.

EN-MISHPAT (ĕn-mĭsh'-păt, fountain of judgment), the older name for Kadesh (Gen. 14:7).

ENOCH (ē'nŭk, Heb. hănôkh, consecrated, Gr. Henóch). 1. Cain's eldest son, for whom the first city was named (Gen. 4:17,18).

2. Son of Jared (Gen. 5:18) and father of Methuselah (Gen. 5:21-22, Luke 3:37). Abram walked "before God" (Gen. 17:1), but of Enoch and Noah alone it is written that they walked "with God" (Gen. 5:24, 6:9). Walking with God is a relic of the first paradise when men walked and talked with God in holy familiarity, and it anticipates a new paradise (Rev. 21:3, 22:3,4). The secret of his walk with God was "faith"; faith was the ground of his "pleasing God"; his pleasing God was the ground of his being "translated that he should not see death" (Heb. 11:5,6). After the monotonous repetition of the patriarchs who "lived . . . begat . . . and died" (Gen. 5), the account of Enoch's walk with God and translation without death stands forth in bright relief. He, too, begat sons and daughters, yet family ties were no hindrance to his walking with God. Indeed, it was not until after he was 65 years old, when he begat Methuselah, that it is written, "Enoch walked with God." He typifies the saints living at Christ's coming who will be removed from mortality to immortality without passing through death (I Cor. 15:51,52). His translation out of a wicked world was an appropriate testimony to the truth ascribed to him in Jude 14,15, "Behold, the Lord cometh . . . to execute judgment."

ENOCH, BOOKS OF, a collection of apocalyptic literature written by various authors and circulated under the name of Enoch. I Enoch is an Ethiopic version made through the Greek from the original Hebrew text that was written by the Chasidim or by the Pharisees between 163-63 B.C. It is the best source for the development of Jewish doctrine in the last two pre-Christian centuries. Jude 14, 15 may be an explicit quotation from it. II Enoch was written A.D. 1-50.

ENOS (ē'nŏs, Heb. 'ĕnôsh, mortal, Gr. Enós), son of Seth and grandson of Adam (Gen. 4:26, 5:6-11, Luke 3:38). Attached to his birth is an implication of godly fear (see Gen. 4:26, marg.). He lived 905 years.

ENOSH (ē'nŏsh, Heb. 'ĕnôsh, mortal), a more acceptable way of Anglicizing the name of Seth's son (I Chron. 1:1; ERV Gen. 4:26, 5:6-11, Luke 3:38).

EN-RIMMON (ĕn-rĭm'ŏn, Heb. 'ên-rimmôn, fountain of a pomegranate), a place S of Jerusalem (Zech. 14:10), 11 miles NE of Beersheba. "Ain and Rimmon" (Josh. 15:32; Josh. 19:7; I Chron. 4:32). Reinhabitated after the Captivity (Neh. 11:29).

EN-ROGEL (ĕn-rō'gel, Heb. 'ên rōghēl, fountain of feet), so-called because fullers trod their cloth with their feet there. It was on the border between Benjamin and Judah (Josh. 15:7, 18:16), below Jerusalem near the junction of the valley of Hinnom and the valley of Jehoshaphat. Here Jonathan and Ahimaaz hid to receive intelligence for David from within the walls (II Sam. 17:17). Here also Adonijah held his sacrificial feast, expecting to seize the throne (I Kings 1:9). Today it is a well 125 ft. deep called Bir Aiyub or "well of Job." En-rogel is often mistaken to be Gihon Spring (I Kings 1:38) or "The Virgin's Fount," but this is too close to Jerusalem to be a hiding place (II Sam. 17:17).

ENTAPPUAH (ĕn-tăp'ū-à, Heb. 'ên tappûah, spring of apple), a town on the eastern border of Manasseh in the land of Tappuah (Josh. 17:7,8).

EPAENETUS (ēp-ē'nē-tŭs, Gr. Epaínetos, praised), a Christian at Rome greeted by Paul as "my well-beloved, who is the firstfruits of Asia (better MS reading) unto Christ" (Rom. 16:5). This is all that is known of him.

EPAPHRAS (ĕp'à-frăs, Gr. Epaphrás), a contraction of Epaphroditus, but not the same NT character. He was Paul's "dear fellowservant" and minister to the church at Colosse, perhaps its founder (Col. 1:7). He brought to Paul a report of their state (1:4,8) and sent back greetings to them from Rome (4:12). Commended by Paul for his ministry of intercession, he desired their perfect and complete stand in all the will of God. Here is true pastoral concern which extended to other churches in the Lycus River valley as well (4:13). Paul also called him "my fellow-prisoner." This may mean that he voluntarily shared the apostle's imprisonment; or he may have been apprehended for his zeal in the Gospel.

EPAPHRODITUS (ē-păf-rō-dī'tŭs, Gr. Epaphróditos, lovely), the messenger delegated by the church at Philippi to bring their gifts to Paul while he was in prison. This the apostle gratefully received as a sweet-smelling sacrifice to God (Phil. 4:18). Epaphroditus contracted a serious illness. On recovery, he longed to return to his flock and relieve their anxiety on his behalf. Paul held him in high esteem as "brother, companion in labor, and fellowsoldier," and sent him back to Philippi bearing his epistle (2:25-30).

EPHAI (ē'fī, Heb. 'ĕphay, gloomy), the Netophathite whose sons were among the captains of the forces left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon (Jer. 40:8). They served under Gedaliah, the governor appointed by the Babylonians. After their warning of the plot against Gedaliah went unheeded (40:13-16), they were slain with him by Ishmael, son of Nethaniah (41:3).

EPHER (ē'fĕr, Heb. 'ēpher, calf). 1. Son of Midian and grandson of Abraham (Gen. 25:4, I Chron. 1:33).

2. Son of Ezra of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. 4:17).

3. A family head in the half-tribe of Manasseh E of Jordan (I Chron. 5:23,24).

EPHESDAMMIM (ē-fĕs-dăm'ĭm, Heb. 'ephes dammîm, boundary of blood), a place so-called from the bloody battles fought there between Israel and the Philistines. Lying between Shocoh and Azekah in Judah, it was the Philistine encampment when David slew Goliath (I Sam. 17:1). Called Pas-dammim in I Chronicles 11:13. Modern Beit Fased ("house of bloodshed") may be over the ancient site.

EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, generally acknowledged to be one of the richest and most profound of the NT epistles. The depth and grandeur of its concepts, the richness and fullness of its message, and the majesty and dignity of its contents have made it precious to believers in all ages and in all places. Its profound truths and vivid imagery have deeply penetrated into the thought and literature of the Christian Church.

Ephesians explicitly claims Pauline authorship (1:1; 3:1) and its entire tenor is eminently Pauline. The early Christian Church uniformly received and treasured it as from Paul. Only within the modern era have liberal critics raised doubts as to its Pauline origin. The attacks are based solely on internal arguments drawn from the style, vocabulary, and theology of the epistle. These arguments are subjective and inconclusive and offer no compelling reasons for rejecting the undeviating evidence of text and tradition. If the Pauline authorship is rejected, the epistle must be ascribed to someone who was fully Paul's equal, but the literature of the first two centuries reveals no traces of anyone capable of producing such a writing.

Ephesians was written while Paul was a prisoner (3:1; 4:1; 6:20). The prevailing view has been that it was written from Rome during Paul's first Roman imprisonment (Acts 28:30-31). Some attempts have been made to shift the place of composition to Caesarea (Acts 24:27), or even to Ephesus during an unrecorded imprisonment there (II Cor. 11:23; Acts 19:10; 20:18-21,31), but the traditional Roman origin firmly holds the field.

The letter was transmitted to its destination by Tychicus (6:21-22), being dispatched together with Colossians and Philemon (Col. 4:7-8; Philem. 9,13,17). Thus all three were sent to the Roman province of Asia, but there is much scholarly disagreement as to the precise destination of Ephesians. The uncertainty arises from the fact that the words "at Ephesus" (en Ephesō) in 1:1 are not found in three very ancient copies (the Chester Beatty papyrus, the Uncials Aleph and B). Passages in the writings of Origen and Basil indicate that they also knew the enigmatical reading produced by the omission of "at Ephesus." But the words are found in all other manuscripts in their uncorrected form and in all ancient versions. With the exception of the heretical Marcion, whom Tertullian accused of tampering with the title, ecclesiastical tradition uniformly designates it as "to the Ephesians."

How are the phenomena to be accounted for? One widely accepted view is that the epistle was really an encyclical sent to the various churches of Provincial Asia, of whom Ephesus was the most important. It is often further assumed that originally a blank was left for the insertion of the local place name. The impersonal tone and contents of the epistle are urged as confirmation.

The view is plausible but it has its difficulties. If it was originally directed to a group of churches, would not Paul, in accordance with his known practice of making a direct address, rather have written "in Asia," or "in the churches of Asia"? In all other places where Paul uses the words "to those who are" he adds a local place name. Then how is the uniform tradition of its Ephesian destination to be accounted for? Those who insist it was for Ephesus alone are confronted with the encyclical nature of its contents. A fair solution would seem to be that the epistle was originally addressed to the saints "at Ephesus" but was intentionally cast into a form that would make it suitable to meet the needs of the Asian churches. As transcriptions of the original to the mother church were circulated, the place of designation might be omitted, although uniformly recognized as the epistle originally addressed to the Ephesians.

Its contents offer no clear indication as to the occasion for the writing of Ephesians. Its affinity to Colossians in time of origin and contents suggests an occasion closely related to the writing of that epistle. Ephesians seems to be the after-effect of the controversy that caused the writing of Colossians. Colossians has in it the intensity, rush, and roar of the battle field, while Ephesians has a calm atmosphere suggestive of a survey of the field after the victory. With the theme of Colossians still fresh in mind Paul felt it desirable to set forth the positive significance of the great truths set forth in refuting the Colossian heresy. A firm grasp of the truths here set forth would provide an effective antidote to such philosophical speculations.

Ephesians sets forth the wealth of the believer in union with Christ. It portrays the glories of our salvation and emphasizes the nature of the Church as the Body of Christ. As indicated by the doxology in 3:20-21, its contents fall into two parts, the first doctrinal (1-3), the second practical and hortatory (4-6). An outline may suggest some of its riches.

THE SALUTATION. 1:1-2

I. DOCTRINAL: The Believer's Standing in Christ. 1:3-3:21
   1. The thanksgiving for our redemption. 1:3-14
   2. The prayer for spiritual illumination. 1:15-23
   3. The power of God manifested in our salvation. 2:1-10
   4. The union of Jew and Gentile in one Body in Christ. 2:11-22
   5. The apostle as the messenger of this mystery. 3:1-13
   6. The prayer for the realization of these blessings. 3:14-19
   7. The doxology of praise. 3:20-21

II. PRACTICAL: The Believers' Life in Christ. 4:1-6:20
   1. Their walk as God's saints. 4:1-5:21
      a. The worthy walk, in inward realization of Christian unity. 4:1-16
      b. The different walk, in outward manifestation of a changed position. 4:17-32
      c. The loving walk, in upward imitation of our Father. 5:1-17
      d. The summary of the Spirit-filled life. 5:18-21
   2. Their duties as God's family. 5:22-6:9
   3. Their warfare as God's soldiers. 6:10-20

THE CONCLUSION. 6:21-24. D.E.H.

EPHESUS (ĕf'ĕ-sŭs, Gr. Ephesos, desirable), an old Ionian foundation at the mouth of the Cayster. Greek colonies which surround the Mediterranean and Black Sea were primarily trading-posts. Migrant communities of Greeks did not seek to dominate the hinterlands, but to secure an emporion or "way in," a bridgehead for commerce, and enough surrounding coast and territory to support the community. Great cities grew from such foundations from Marseilles to Alexandria, some of them royal capitals. And in all cases colonies became centers or outposts of Hellenism, distinctive, and civilizing.

Ephesus displaced Miletus as a trading port, but when its harbor, like that of Miletus, in turn silted up, Smyrna replaced both as the outlet and emporion of the Maeander valley trade-route. In the heyday of Asia Minor 230 separate communities, each proud of its individuality and wealth, issued their own coinage and managed their own affairs. The dominance of Persian despotism, wide deforestation, and the ravage of war in a natural bridge and highway between the continents slowly sapped this prosperity, but in early Roman times, as in the days of its Ionian independence, Ephesus was a proud, rich, busy port, the rival of Alexandria and Syrian Antioch.

Built near the shrine of an old Anatolian fertility goddess, Ephesus became the seat of an oriental cult. The Anatolian deity had been taken over by the Greeks under the name of Artemis, the Diana of the Romans. Grotesquely represented with turreted head and many breasts, the goddess and her cult found expression in the famous temple, served, like that of Aphrodite at Corinth, by a host of priestess courtesans.

Round the cult clustered much trade. Ephesus became a place of pilgrimage for tourist-worshipers, all eager to carry away talisman and souvenir, hence the prosperous guild of the silversmiths whose livelihood was the manufacture of silver shrines and images of the meteoric stone which was said to be Diana's image "fallen from heaven." Ephesus leaned more and more on the trade which followed the cult as commerce declined in her silting harbor. Twenty miles of reedy marshland now separate the old harbor works from the sea and even in Paul's day the process was under way. Tacitus tells us that an attempt was made to improve the seaway in A.D. 65, but the task proved too great. Ephesus in the first century was a dying city, given to parasite pursuits, living, like Athens, on a reputation, a curious meeting place of old and new religions, of East and West. Acts 19 gives a peculiarly vivid picture of her unnatural life. The "lampstand" has gone from its place, for Ephesus' decline was mortal sickness, and it is possible to detect in the letter to Ephesus in the Apocalypse a touch of the lassitude which was abroad in the effete and declining community. The temple and part of the city have been extensively excavated. E.M.B.

EPHLAL (ĕf'lăl, Heb. 'ephlāl, judge), son of Zabad of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:37).

EPHOD (ēf'-ŏd, Heb. 'ēphōdh). 1. A sacred vestment originally worn by the high priest and made of "gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work" (Exod. 28:4ff; 39:2ff). It was held together front and back by two shoulder pieces at the top and a girdle band around the waist. On each shoulderpiece was an onyx stone engraved with six names of the tribes of Israel. Attached to the ephod by chains of pure gold was a breastplate containing 12 precious stones. Beneath the ephod was worn the blue robe of the ephod, having a hole for the head and extending to the feet with a hem alternating with gold bells and pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet (Exod. 28:31-35; 39:22-26).

The High Priest clothed in the Ephod. DV

Later, persons other than the high priest wore ephods. Samuel wore a linen ephod while ministering before the Lord (I Sam. 2:18) which was characteristic of the ordinary priests (2:28; 14:3; 22:18). David wore a linen ephod while he danced before the Lord after bringing the ark to Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:14). Abiathar carried off from Nob an ephod which represented to David the divine presence, for of it he inquired the will of the Lord (I Sam. 23:6,9; 30:7,8).

The ephod was misused as an object of idolatrous worship by Gideon (Judg. 8:27) and associated with images by Micah (Judg. 17:5; 18:14).

2. Father of Hanniel who was the prince of the children of Manasseh (Num. 34:23). A.M.R.

EPHPHATHA (ĕf'ă-thà, Gr. Ephphathá from Aram. 'etpătah, passive imper. of the verb petah, be thou opened), occurs only in Mark 7:34. Uttered by Jesus as He was healing a deaf man.

EPHRAIM (ē'frâ-ĭm, Heb. 'ephrayim, double fruit), the younger of two sons of Joseph and his Egyptian wife Asenath (Gen. 41:50-52). The aged Jacob, when he blessed his grandsons Manasseh and Ephraim, adopted them as his own sons. Despite Joseph's protest, Jacob gave the preferential blessing (signified by the right hand) to Ephraim (Gen. 48:1-22). When Jacob blessed his own sons, he did not mention Ephraim and Manasseh, but gave a special blessing to their father Joseph (Gen. 49: 22-26).

Ephraim was the progenitor of the tribe called by his name, as was also Manasseh. This brought the number of the Hebrew tribes to 13, but the original number 12 (derived from the 12 sons of Jacob, of whom Joseph was one) continued to be referred to. The separation of the tribe of Levi from the others for the Tabernacle service, and its failure to receive a separate territory in which to live, helped to perpetuate the concept of "The Twelve Tribes of Israel."

Ephraim together with Manasseh and Benjamin camped on the W side of the Tabernacle in the wilderness (Num. 2:18-24). Joshua (Hoshea) the son of Nun, one of the spies and Moses' successor, was an Ephraimite (Num. 13:8). Ephraim and Manasseh were mentioned as making up the Joseph group in Moses' blessing (Deut. 33:13-17).

At the division of the land among the tribes the children of Joseph (except half of Manasseh which settled E of the Jordan, Num. 32:33; 39-42) received the central hill country of Palestine, sometimes called Mt. Ephraim. This area is bounded on the N by the Valley of Jezreel, on the E by the Jordan River, on the S by a "zone of movement" (a series of valleys which invite travel across Palestine) which runs from Joppa to Jericho, and on the W it stretches to the Mediterranean. The Joseph tribes were not able to occupy this land completely for a long time, being forced up into the heavily wooded hill country (Josh. 17:14-18) by the Canaanites and Philistines who occupied the good bottom lands and who by their superior civilization and power (Judg. 1:27-29) kept the Hebrews subservient until the time of David. Ephraim and Manasseh seem to have been bitter rivals (Isa. 9:20,21), Manasseh being the larger group (Gen. 49:22) but Ephraim asserting the more vigorous leadership. Although they seem to have held their land in common for a time (Josh. 17:14-18) it was presently divided between them. Ephraim's portion was well defined and very fruitful, its soil fertile and its rainfall more plentiful than Judah's to the S (Deut. 33:13-16).

Ephraim's inheritance is described in Joshua 16: 5-10. The territory was bounded on the S by the northern borders of Benjamin and Dan. Bethel was just across the line in Benjamin, the two Beth-horons were just in Ephraim, as was Gezer toward the sea. The western boundary seems ideally to have been the Mediterranean. On the N, the brook Kanah separated Ephraim from the half of Manasseh, as did the towns of Shechem (in Manasseh) and Taanath-shiloh. Then the line seems to have turned abruptly southward, through Ataroth, passing near Jericho and thence to the Jordan. References to the towns for Ephraimites within Manasseh (Josh. 16:9; 17:9) suggest that the rivalry between these two tribes had resulted in some boundary changes.

At Shiloh, in the territory of Ephraim, the Tabernacle was pitched by Joshua (Josh. 18:1) and this town remained a religious center for the Hebrews (Josh. 22:12; Judg. 18:31; 21:19; I Sam. 1:3,9,24; 2:14; 3:21) until it was destroyed by the Philistines after the battle of Ebenezer (I Sam. 4:1-11). Samuel was an Ephraimite (I Sam. 1:1). The Ephraimites contributed their share of the hatred and strife which divided the Hebrew tribes during the dark days of the judges (Judg. 8:1-3; 12:1-6).

It would appear that Ephraim, in common with the rest of the central and northern tribes, was never completely reconciled to the rule of Judah which the Davidic dynasty brought (II Sam. 2:8, 9; I Kings 12:16). When Jeroboam I, an Ephraimite (I Kings 11:26), rebelled against Solomon's son Rehoboam, no doubt his own tribe supported him completely. Ephraim became such a leader in the new northern Hebrew kingdom that in addition to its more common name Israel, the kingdom is also called Ephraim (Isa. 7:2,5,9,17; Hos. 9:3-16). From this time on the tribe's history is merged with that of this kingdom.

Ephraim is also the name of a city N of Jerusalem, mentioned in II Sam. 13:23 and John 11: 54. It has been identified with modern Et-Taiyibeh, a few miles NE of Bethel. The forest of Ephraim (II Sam. 18:6) was probably located in Transjordan near Mahanaim. J.B.G.

EPHRAIM, MOUNT OF (ē'frâ-ĭm, Heb. har 'ephrayim), the mountainous part of the territory of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. 17:15, etc., ASV) or "hill-country," which phrase is not accurate, as all the hills are part of the same mountain range which runs through central Palestine.

EPHRAIM, WOODS OF (Heb. ya'ar 'ephrayim), occurs only in II Samuel 18:6 where it denotes the place of the decisive battle in which the soldiers of David defeated the forces of Absalom. The context indicates that this fighting took place in the land of Gilead E of the Jordan. The site has not been identified.

EPHRAIMITE (ē'frâ-ĭm-īt, Heb. 'ephrayim, always occurs in this plural form), a member of the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. 16:10 and Judg. 12).

EPHRAIN (ē'frâ-ĭn, Heb. 'ephrôn, fawn), the name of one of the towns which, along with Bethel, Abijah took from Jeroboam (II Chron. 13:19). ASV has Ephron in this verse with Ephrain in the margin. May be same as Ophrah (Josh. 18:23). Modern Taiyibeh.

EPHRATH (ĕf'răth, Heb. 'ephrāth, fruitful land), a shorter form of Ephrathah, KJV Ephratah, the place where Rachel was buried. (Gen. 35:16).

2. Second wife of Caleb, son of Hezron. She was the mother of Hur (I Chron. 2:19,20).

3. The ancient name of Bethlehem or the district around it. This name is attached to that of Bethlehem in the great prophecy of the place of the birth of Christ (Mic. 5:2).

EPHRON (ē'frŏn, Heb. 'ephrôn, fawn), a Hittite, the son of Zohar, of the children of Heth in Hebron, from whom Abraham purchased, for four hundred shekels of silver, the field of Machpelah which contained a cave in which he buried Sarah, his wife (Gen. 23:8,9).

2. A mountain on the N border of Judah located about six miles NW of Jerusalem (Josh. 15:9).

3. A city taken from Jeroboam by Ahijah (II Chron. 13:19). Perhaps identical with Ephrain or Ophrah.

EPICUREANS (ĕp-ĭ-kū-rē'ănz, Gr. Epikoúreioi), the followers of Epicurus, the Greek philosopher who lived 341-270 B.C. He taught that nature rather than reason is the true reality; nothing exists but atoms and void, that is, matter and space. The chief purpose of man is to achieve happiness. He has free will to plan and live a life of pleasure. Epicurus gave the widest scope to this matter of pleasure, interpreting it as avoidance of pain, so that the mere enjoyment of good health would be pleasure. Such stress on the good things of life, while very practical, is also very dangerous. For the philosopher the highest joy is found in mental and intellectual pursuits, but for lesser souls lower goals of sensual satisfaction fulfill the greatest pleasure. Thus the high standards of the founder were not maintained and the philosophy gained a bad reputation. Since such teaching appealed to the common man, this natural philosophy became widespread. It was widely held at the time of Christ. Paul met it at Athens when he encountered the philosophers of that city (Acts 17: 16-33). They were not impressed by his teaching of creation, judgment and resurrection, since all these doctrines were denied by the Epicurean philosophy. C.E.H.

Sealed letters, or epistles, sheets of papyrus rolled, tied and sealed, to be delivered by messenger. JHK

EPISTLE (ē-pis'l, Gr. epistolé, letter, epistle). Written correspondence, whether personal or official, has been common to all ages. The OT abounds with evidences of widespread written letters, among the best known being David's letter to Joab concerning Uriah (II Sam. 11:14,15), Jezebel's letter regarding Naboth (I Kings 21:8,9), Sennacherib's letter to Hezekiah (II Kings 19:14); as does also the NT (Acts 9:2; Rom. 16:1ff; I Cor. 7:1).

The term is, however, almost a technical one, referring particularly to the 21 epistles of the NT. The NT epistles were written by 4 (possibly 5) writers: Peter, Paul, John, Jude, and the author of Hebrews. Paul wrote 13 (or 14, if Hebrews is by him); Peter, 2; John, 3; and Jude 1. According to the custom of the time, they usually begin with the name or title of the writer and that of the addressee or addressees; then follow words of greeting, the message of the epistle; and at the end the author usually gives his name. It was Paul's usual practice to employ an amanuensis to write from dictation. The epistles were written to individual churches or groups of churches (almost always given by name) and to individuals. Seven are called General Epistles, because they were written to the church at large.

The epistles are not disguised doctrinal treatises. They were written in the way of ordinary correspondence, and deal with situations, whether doctrinal or practical, needing immediate attention. They were written in reply to letters or as the result of other information otherwise obtained. It is very apparent that the writers realized that what they wrote was authoritative and came from God. They all deal with some aspect of the redemptive message and experience. Although written to deal with specific local situations, they set forth fundamental principles applicable to the individual and collective life of all believers. They were received from the beginning with the OT Scriptures (II Peter 3:15,16).

The influence of the NT Epistles on the literature of Christianity is seen in the writings of the next century, which were mostly epistolary in form. Indeed, heretics wrote epistles in the name of the apostles.

It is not to be supposed that all of the epistles of the apostles have survived. Paul in I Corinthians 5:9 refers to a letter he had written to the Corinthians prior to our I Corinthians; and in Colossians 4:6 he speaks of an epistle to the Laodicean church. S.B.

ER (ûr, Heb. 'ēr, watchful), eldest son of Judah by the daughter of Shua, the Canaanite. Judah took a wife for him named Tamar. He was so wicked the Lord slew him (Gen. 38:3,6,7).

2. The third son of Shelah, the son of Judah (I Chron. 4:21).

3. An ancestor of Jesus in the maternal line (Luke 3:28).

ERAN (ē'răn, Heb. 'ērān, watcher), the son of Shuthelah who was the oldest son of Ephraim. His descendants were the Eranites (Num. 26:36).

ERASTUS (ē-răs'tŭs, Gr. Érastos, beloved), a name which occurs three times, each time denoting a friend of Paul: 1. Acts 19:22 "And having sent into Macedonia two of them that ministered under him, Timothy and Erastus," Paul stayed in Asia.

2. The treasurer of the city of Corinth whom Paul mentions as saluting the Christians at Rome (Rom. 16:23).

3. Probably the same man is designated in II Timothy 4:20 as remaining at Corinth.

ERECH (ē'rĕk, Heb. 'erekh), a city of ancient Babylonia mentioned in Genesis 10:10 as the second city founded by Nimrod. The Babylonian form of the name is Uruk. The modern site is called Warka, and is located near the Euphrates river, 40 miles NW of Ur. This city was mentioned much in ancient Mesopotamian literature. Erech was the home of Gilgamesh, the hero of the great Akkadian epic.

Archaeology has found that this city was one of the oldest of Babylonia, being founded before 4000 B.C., and continued to flourish until after 300 B.C. One of the early dynasties of the Sumerians ruled from Erech. Culturally, it boasted the first ziggurat, or tower, and began the use of clay cylinder seals.

ERI (ē'rī, Heb. 'ērî, my watcher), the fifth son of Gad (Gen. 46:16).

ESAIAS (See Isaiah)

ESAR-HADDON (ē'sär-hăd'ŏn, Ashur has given a brother), a younger son of Sennacherib, who upon the murder of his father by his older brother (II Kings 19:36,37; II Chron. 32:21; Isa. 37:37,38) obtained the throne of Assyria. His reign (681-669 B.C.) brought important political developments. He restored the city of Babylon which his father had destroyed, and fought campaigns against the Cimmerians and other barbaric hordes from beyond the Caucasus. His greatest accomplishment was the conquest of Egypt, Assyria's competitor for world domination.

In preparation for his Egyptian campaign, Esarhaddon subdued the Westlands. Sidon was destroyed, its inhabitants deported, its king beheaded, and a new city erected on its site. According to Ezra 4:2, Esar-haddon brought deportees into Samaria, which had already been colonized with pagans by Sargon when he destroyed it in 722 B.C. After Sidon's fall, 12 kings along the Mediterranean seacoast submitted to the Assyrians, and were forced to supply wood and stone for the king's palace in Nineveh. Among these was "Manasi king of Yaudi," the Manasseh of the Bible. Manasseh had little choice. The Assyrian empire had now reached its greatest power and it appears that most of the Judean citizenry preferred peaceful submission, even with the Assyrian pagan influences now imposed upon them, to constant abortive rebellion. Manasseh's summons to appear before an Assyrian king, mentioned in II Chronicles 33:11-13, probably took place in the reign of Esar-haddon's successor, Assurbanipal.

In 671 Egypt fell to Esar-haddon when he occupied Memphis and organized Egypt into districts under princes responsible to Assyrian governors. A later Egyptian rebellion necessitated a second Assyrian campaign there, during which Esar-haddon died and Assurbanipal his son succeeded him.

ESAU (ē'saw, Heb. 'ēsāw, hairy), the firstborn of the twin brothers, Esau and Jacob, sons of Isaac and Rebecca (Gen. 25:24,25). Before their birth God had told their mother that the elder should serve the younger (Gen. 25:23). Esau became a man of the fields. He apparently lived only for the present. This characteristic was demonstrated when he let Jacob have his birthright for a mess of pottage because he was hungry (Gen. 25:30-34).

At the age of 40 he married two Hittite women (Gen. 26:34). When the time came for Isaac to give his blessing to his son, he wanted to confer it on Esau, but, through trickery, Jacob obtained the blessing instead. This loss grieved Esau very much. He begged for another blessing and when he received it he hated it because it made him the servant of his brother. He hated Jacob for cheating him and intended to kill him (Gen. 27).

When Esau saw Jacob sent away to obtain a wife from his mother's relatives he understood that Canaanite wives did not please his father so he went out and took for himself two additional wives of the Ishmaelites (Gen. 28:6-9).

Years later when he was living in Mt. Seir, Esau heard that Jacob was returning to Canaan (Gen. 32:3-5). With 400 men he set out to meet his brother. But the provisions Jacob made to placate him caused him to greet his brother warmly (Gen. 32:7-33:15). They soon parted company and Esau went back to Mt. Seir (Gen. 33:16).

In the providence of God Esau was made subservient to Jacob. In Hebrews 12:16,17 he is described as a profane person. Long after his death the Lord declared he had loved Jacob and hated Esau (Mal. 1:2,3). The apostle Paul used this passage to illustrate how God carries out His purposes (Rom. 9:10-13).

Sometimes in Scripture Esau is used as the name of the land of Edom in which his descendants lived (Gen. 36:8). C.E.H.

ESCHATOLOGY (ĕs-kà-tŏl'ō-gē, Gr. éschatos, last and lógos, ordered statement), a division of systematic theology dealing with the doctrine of last things such as death, resurrection, the second coming of Christ, the end of the age, divine judgment, and the future state. It properly includes all that was prophetic of future events when recorded in Scripture.

PRESUPPOSITIONS. Among theological conservatives it is generally agreed that Biblical prophecies will be fulfilled and such events as resurrection from the dead, reward of the saints, punishment of the wicked, and the continued conscious existence of all human souls throughout eternity will eventuate. Biblical eschatology assumes that the Scriptures predict future events with infallible accuracy and constitute a divine disclosure of the future.

Contemporary liberalism has questioned the predictive character of Biblical prophecy by denying that it is possible to know the details of future events in advance. Schweitzer in his The Mystery of the Kingdom of God (translated from the German, 1925) introduced the liberal teaching that eschatology was the center of apostolic teaching and that Christ Himself erroneously taught the imminent end of the age, dying on the cross when He realized He was mistaken. The contemporary emphasis in interpretation of eschatology has been further developed by C. H. Dodd, O. Cullmann, and others, in their definition of "realized eschatology" as divine purpose being fulfilled today. The contemporary experience of eschatology is also characteristic of the neo-orthodox and crisis theologians such as Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, and Reinhold Niebuhr, though the concept of a future consummation at the end of the age is also allowed. Only the conservative point of view does full justice to predictive Scripture as actually foretelling future events.

PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION. Though conservatives agree on essential doctrines, three types of interpretations have arisen. The early church adopted the point of view of premillennialism or chiliasm, anticipating a literal return of Christ to the earth, the establishment of His kingdom on the earth for one thousand years, and the beginning of the eternal state thereafter. The Alexandrian school of theology (third century), interpreting prophecy in a nonliteral or allegorical way, viewed the millennial kingdom as having already begun with the first coming of Christ, to be consummated in His second coming, and to be followed immediately by the eternal state. This view was championed by Augustine (354-430) and was adopted by the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant Reformers such as Calvin and Luther. A variation of amillennialism known as postmillennialism was introduced by Daniel Whitby (1638-1725) who taught that the last one thousand years of the present age would fulfill promises of peace and righteousness on earth and be a crowning triumph of the Gospel. The world conflicts of the first half of the 20th century and a realistic appraisal of the world situation have caused a general abandonment of postmillennialism and a return to either Augustinian amillennialism or premillennialism.

Differing interpretations of eschatology result from the literal or nonliteral interpretation of prophecy, the more literal leading to premillennialism, the less literal to the amillennial view. Approaches also vary on the question of the central purpose of God in eschatology. Amillennialism tends to emphasize soteriology or the salvation of the elect as the dominating factor, whereas premillennialism usually adopts the principle that the manifestation of the glory of God is the supreme purpose in divine dealing with men in successive ages, and distinguishes God's program in eschatology for Israel from that of His program for the world as a whole or His program for the church.

ESCHATOLOGY IN THE OLD TESTAMENT. Though eschatology is not the main theme of the early books of the OT, eschatological considerations are constantly applied. God is presented as the Creator and Ruler who in divine providence directs the progress of history. Man is introduced as created in the image and likeness of God, and human life is declared to be purposeful and consummated in the life after death. The major burden of OT prophecy deals with life on earth and events of future human history, but belief in life after death, the resurrection of the body, and divine rewards and punishments in the life to come permeate the OT as they do the New. Job, probably a contemporary of Abraham, anticipated a coming Redeemer and the resurrection of his body (Job 19:25-26). Abraham, according to Hebrews 11:14-16, anticipated dwelling in a heavenly city after death. The OT abode of the dead called "Sheol," though often merely a reference to the grave, in some instances refers to the intermediate state (Deut. 32:22; Ps. 16:10; 139:8). The saint is promised deliverance from death by resurrection (Isa. 25: 6-9; 26:19; Dan. 12:2-3).

Individual eschatology, concerned with life, death, resurrection, and reward or punishment, is set in a context of general eschatology or prediction of the movement of history. In the OT this concerns principally the nation Israel, beginning with Genesis 12 and the divine covenant with Abraham. Abraham was promised not only personal reward, but that his seed should possess the Holy Land as a perpetual possession and that through his posterity blessing should come to all nations of the earth. David was promised that his kingdom and throne should continue forever. The prophets in the midst of the captivity and the apostasy of Israel connected the fulfillment of these prophecies with the coming of the Messiah and the establishment of His kingdom in the earth. Amillenarians and postmillenarians interpret these prophecies as largely fulfilled in the Church, and have not attempted literal explanation of the details. Many premillenarians assert the promise of future possession of the Holy Land to Israel as valid and to be fulfilled literally in the coming millennial kingdom of Christ on earth following His second advent. Promises given to Israel are distinguished from promises addressed to saints in general or to the Church in the present age.

The OT abounds also in prophecies relating to Gentiles or those outside the seed of Abraham. Many predictions were given of individual judgments, already largely fulfilled. To Daniel was revealed the larger picture of the divine program for the nations of the world as embodied in the four empires of his vision (Dan. 2,7). Daniel predicted that there would be four major movements in Gentile history, beginning with the Babylonian Empire, followed by the Medio-Persian Empire, the Macedonian Empire of Alexander the Great, and to be concluded with the Roman Empire. Many consider the last stages of the Roman Empire to be still future and to be fulfilled in the world conflict immediately preceding the second advent. The eschatology of the OT, therefore, while dealing with individual hope, is largely concerned with the major movement of divine providence as it relates to Israel and the Gentiles. Of great importance is the line of prophecy relating to the coming of the Redeemer, the Son of David, who was to be the Saviour of the World.

NEW TESTAMENT ESCHATOLOGY. Though sometimes distinguished sharply from OT eschatology, it is reasonable to assume that the NT continues, interprets, enlarges, and completes the OT eschatology. The fulfillment of prophecies in the NT which are related to the first advent of Christ, involving hundreds of OT Scriptures, is obvious proof of the principle that prophecy will have actual fulfillment in specific events. Looming large in eschatology are the teachings of Christ related to the kingdom of God. Some have considered this primarily a reference to the spiritual government of God as embracing all saints. Others have recognized the added factor of further teachings concerning the spiritual qualities which will enter into His future millennial kingdom. From the lips of Christ Himself is given a comprehensive prophetic picture presenting moral and spiritual aspects of the kingdom of God in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5-7), the character of divine spiritual government in the present age (Matt. 13), and the consummating events climaxing in the second advent of Christ to set up His earthly kingdom (Matt. 24-25). In recognition of the age between the first and second advents, Christ gave extensive teaching on the spiritual qualities of the present age (John 13-16). This is subsequently enlarged in the epistles and recorded in part historically in Acts. The present age is characterized as a time in which the church is formed, composed of Jew and Gentile alike, who believe in Christ. Premillenarians find also in the NT, and especially in Revelation 20, anticipation of a future mediatorial kingdom of Christ in which He reigns over the entire earth for one thousand years.

Though liberal theologians tend to interpret the second advent as a spiritual experience occurring contemporaneously, conservatives are agreed that the second advent is a future event in which Christ personally and bodily returns to the earth. Differences arise as to details relating to the coming great tribulation and time of trouble preceding the second advent. Pretribulationists anticipate a coming of Christ for the saints before the time of trouble (I Cor. 15:51-52; I Thess. 4:13-18). The translated and resurrected saints will return with Christ from heaven to the earth when He comes to establish His earthly kingdom. Post-tribulationists view both events as occurring after the tribulation.

The NT adds considerably to scriptural testimony concerning individual eschatology. Extensive treatment is given to the subject of resurrection (I Cor. 15), and many details are supplied such as the character of the judgment seat of Christ (II Cor. 5:10-11), the description of the lake of fire (Rev. 20:14-15), and the hope of the imminent return of Christ (Titus 2:13). Amillenarians find fulfillment of both reward and punishment at the time of the second advent. Premillenarians postpone the resurrection of the wicked until after the millennial kingdom has been completed (Rev. 20: 11-15). The NT also gives further light on the intermediate state, describing it as a time of consciousness either in bliss or suffering (Luke 16: 19-31; Phil. 1:23).

New Testament eschatology concludes with the picture of the eternal state in Revelation 21-22. The New Jerusalem, represented as a city 1350 miles square and a similar distance in height, whether interpreted literally or figuratively, presents the glorious hope of an eternal home in the presence of God. Biblical eschatology does not dwell on the details of the eternal state, but rather emphasizes the application of eschatology to contemporary decisions. Eschatology is not designed to satisfy curiosity but to provide an intelligent comprehension of the future as a guide for a present program, and a sure ground for hope. The superlative and distinctive character of Biblical eschatology becomes immediately apparent when compared to the fragmentary and fantastic eschatologies offered in heathen religions. J.F.W

ESDRAELON (ĕs'drā-ē'lŏn, a Gr. modification of Jezreel; does not occur in Heb.; is Gr. in form; found only in Revelation), the great plain which breaks the central range of Palestine in two. In the OT it is known as the plain, or valley, of Jezreel. It affords a direct connection between the maritime plain and the Jordan valley. It lies between Galilee on the N and Samaria on the S.

This plain is triangular in shape, and is 15 by 15 by 20 miles in size. Several passes enter into it making it easy of access and important commercially and in military operations. Many cities were situated in it, one of the most important being Megiddo, which guarded one of the main entrances. The Canaanites were strongly established in this region before the Israelites came into Palestine. The tribes of Issachar and Zebulun were assigned to this area, but the Israelites never gained complete control of it until the time of David.

Esdraelon was the scene of some of the most important battles in Bible history: the victory of Barak over Sisera (Judg. 4) and of the Philistines over Saul and his sons (I Sam. 31). Here the Egyptians mortally wounded Josiah, king of Judah, when he went out to intercept the army of Pharaoh Necho (II Kings 23:29).

This valley has always been very fertile. Today Jewish colonists find it a prosperous farming region. A great future conflict seems indicated for this area, according to Revelation 16:16. C.E.H.

ESDRAS, BOOKS OF (See Apocrypha)

ESEK (ē'sĕk, Heb. 'ēseq, contention), the name which Isaac gave to a well which his servants dug in the valley of Gerar and which the herdsmen of Gerar struggled for, claiming it belonged to them (Gen. 26:20).

ESH-BAAL (ĕsh'bā'ăl, Heb. 'esha'al, man of Baal), the fourth son of Saul (I Chron. 8:33 and 9:39). The same man is called Ishbosheth in II Samuel 2:8,10,12, etc. He was made king of Gilead by Abner after Saul's death. A few years later he was murdered.

ESHBAN (ĕsh'băn, Heb. 'eshvān, man of understanding), a descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen. 36:26; I Chron. 1:41).

ESHCOL (ĕsh'kŏl, Heb. 'eshkōl, cluster). 1. An Amorite who lived in Hebron and who helped Abram defeat king Chedorlaomer and his forces and bring back Lot and his family (Gen. 14:13,24).

2. A valley near Hebron in which the men sent by Moses to spy out the land found a cluster of grapes which they carried back to the people (Num. 13:23,24).

ESHEAN (ĕsh'ē-ăn, Heb. 'esh'ān), a city in the territory assigned to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:52). In ASV Eshan. It was located in the Hebron area.

ESHEK (ē'shĕk, Heb. 'ēsheq, oppression), a descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul, and brother of Azel. His grandsons were mighty men of valor in the tribe of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:38-40).

ESHTAOL (ĕsh'tā-ŏl, Heb. 'eshtā'ôl), a town in the lowlands of Judah on its border with Dan (Josh. 15:33; 19:41). In the book of Judges it is always mentioned with Zorah. Samson, as he grew up, began to be moved by the Spirit of the Lord at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol (3:25). He was buried there (16:31). The Danites sent out five brave men from Zorah and Eshtaol to look for an area where the tribe could have additional living space. After discovering the city of Laish they returned to these cities and gave a favorable report. Then 600 armed men set forth out of Zorah and Eshtaol to go and conquer Laish (Judg. 18:2,8,11).

ESHTEMOA (ĕsh'tē-mō-ȧ, Heb. eshte môa'). 1. A city assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:14). It was located eight miles S of Hebron. This city, among others, received from David a share of the spoil of his victory over the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:28). The modern name of the site is Es Semu.

2. The son of Ishbah (I Chron. 4:17).

3. A Maacathite, a son of Hodiah (I Chron. 4:19).

ESHTEMOH (ĕsh'tē-mō), a city located in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:50). The same as Eshtemoa above.

ESHTON (ĕsh'tŏn, Heb. 'eshtôn, perhaps effeminate), a descendant of Judah (I Chron. 4:11,12).

ESLI (ĕs'lī, Gr. Eslí), an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:25).

ESROM (ĕs'rŏm, Gr. Esróm), the son of Perez, an ancestor of Christ (Matt. 1:3; Luke 3:33). KJV Esrom, RV Hezron.

ESSENES (ĕ-sēnz', Gr. Essenoí or Essaíoi). The meaning of the name is much debated; possibly it denotes "holy ones." They constituted a sect of the Jews in Palestine during the time of Christ, but are not mentioned in the NT. Our principal sources of information regarding them are Josephus and Philo (first century) and Pliny the Elder and Hippolytus (second century).

The Essenes lived a simple life of sharing everything in common. They practiced strict rules of conduct. They were mostly unmarried. They were reported to number 4,000. The majority of them lived together in settlements, but some resided in the cities of the Jews. Apparently they kept their ranks filled by the adoption of other people's children. They did not participate in the temple worship, but had their own purification rites. They observed the sabbath day very strictly and greatly venerated Moses. They would take no oaths; but new members, after going through a three-year probationary period, were required to swear a series of strong oaths that they would co-operate in every way with the organization and would never reveal to outsiders any of the affairs or beliefs of the sect.

The Essenes have come into public attention in late years because of the study of the Dead Sea scrolls, and the excavation of the monastery called Khirbet Qumran where the scrolls were written. This literature and building give evidence of an organization very similar to what is known about the Essenes. The structure was occupied from the end of the second century B.C. to 135 A.D. The Essenes are known to have flourished in this period. Also, the location of the building fits the description of the elder Pliny. The literature reveals that the people of Qumran Community were avid students of the Jewish Scriptures. Many scholars believe them to be the Essenes; but so many religious groups were in existence during the last century B.C. that certainty in the matter has not yet been achieved.

Many of the Essenes perished in the wars against the Romans. Many of the survivors probably became Christians. C.E.H.

ESTHER (ĕs'tĕr, Heb. 'estēr, which may come from Akkad. Ishtar (Venus), Gr. astér, star), a Jewish orphan maiden in the city of Shushan, who became Queen of Persia. Her Hebrew name was Hadassah (myrtle). Her cousin, Mordecai, who was a minor official of the palace, reared her as his own daughter. Xerxes, the Persian king, had divorced his wife, and when he sought a new queen from among the maidens of the realm he chose Esther. When the Jews in the empire were faced with destruction she was able to save them. In honor to her the book which bears her name is read every year at the Feast of Purim.

ESTHER, BOOK OF, the last of the historical books of the OT. It was written after the death of King Ahasuerus (Esth. 10:2). Most scholars agree that Ahasuerus was Xerxes who reigned 485 B.C. to 465 B.C. Probably the book was written about 400 B.C. The author is unknown, but it is evident from the details of the story that he was well acquainted with the Persian court life. The book of Esther has always been accepted as canonical by the Jews.

External proof of the career of Mordecai has been found in an undated cuneiform text which mentions a certain Mordecai (Marduka) who was a high official at the Persian court of Shushan during the reign of Xerxes and even before that under Darius I. This text came from Borsippa and is the first reference to Mordecai outside the Bible.

Outstanding peculiarities of the book are the complete absence of the name of God; the lack of any direct religious teaching; and no mention of prayer. These remarkable features can have occurred only by deliberate design. Probably the book was written for the Jews in the Persian empire as a story which could be circulated without danger of offending the people of that land who ruled over many Jews.

The story contains many dramatic elements. King Ahasuerus gave a great feast to all the officials of his realm. Queen Vashti offended him when she refused to appear before the company at the command of the king. As a result he divorced her (Ch. 1). Later, in order to procure another queen, he ordered all the beautiful maidens of the land brought together. Among them was Hadassah, who had been reared by her cousin Mordecai. Her name was changed to Esther by the Persians. This maiden was chosen by the king to be his queen. Mordecai discovered a plot against the king's life (Ch. 2). The king made Haman his chief minister. Everybody bowed down to him but Mordecai refused to do so. This disrespect infuriated the high official. Knowing Mordecai was a Jew, Haman decided to destroy all the Jews in revenge for his hurt feelings. Lots, called Pur, were cast to find an auspicious day for the destruction. The consent of the king was obtained, and an official decree was written and publicized throughout the empire setting the date for the slaughter of the Jews (Ch. 3). Mordecai sent word to Esther that she must plead for her people before the king (Ch. 4). At the risk of her life she went in before the king. He received her favorably. Instead of pleading with him at once she invited him and Haman to a banquet. There the king asked her to state her request, but she put it off and invited them to another banquet. Haman, rejoicing in his good fortune, but incensed at Mordecai, had a gallows constructed on which to hang him (Ch. 5). That night, unable to sleep, the king was listening to the reading of the royal chronicles. When the account of Mordecai's discovery of the assassination plot was read, the king asked what reward had been given him, and was told none at all.

It was early morning and Haman had come to ask permission to hang Mordecai. But the king asked him what should be done to a man he wished to honor. Being convinced that the king could have only him in mind, Haman suggested the greatest of honors he could imagine. At the king's command he was obliged to bestow those honors on Mordecai (Ch. 6). At the second banquet Esther told the king about the scheme to destroy her people and named Haman as the one responsible for it. The king became very angry and ordered Haman to be hanged on the gallows he had made (Ch. 7). Another decree was sent out which enabled the Jews to save themselves (Ch. 8). In two days of fighting they were victorious everywhere. Esther and Mordecai wrote letters to the Jews instituting the commemoration of these two days in an annual Feast of Purim (Ch. 9). Mordecai, being next to the king, brought blessing to the people (Ch. 10).

In the Septuagint the book of Esther contains several interpolations scattered through the story.

ETAM (ē'tăm). 1. A town and clan in Judah between Bethlehem and Tekoa (I Chron. 4:3), Khirbet el-Khôkh, rebuilt by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:6); also named in LXX of Joshua 15:59a.

2. A village near En-rimmon in Simeon (I Chron. 4:32).

3. The rock where Samson lived after a slaughter of Philistines (Judg. 15:8,11). Maybe same as 1.

ETERNAL LIFE (ē-tûr'năl, -n'l, līf, Gr. zoé aiónios). Zoé is the usual NT word for life in a general sense; the opposite of death. Aiónios is the usual word for eternal, everlasting. Literally it means age-long. Since an age is the longest time which the human mind can conceive clearly, aiónios came to be used for infinity of time, whether conceived as unending duration, or as existence in which past and future are always present. Eternal life, therefore, is not merely age-long, after which it ceases to be. It is endless in duration, having its beginning in the mind of the eternal God (Eph. 1:4), and eternal in quality, that is, like the life of God as revealed in His Son Jesus Christ (I John 5:11,12). Though our eternal life thus has an eternal past in the purposes of God, our experience of it begins with the new birth (John 3; Tit. 3:4-7), when we believe in Jesus Christ who truly is our eternal life (John 17:2,3; Gal. 2:20). Eternal or everlasting life is most prominent in John's Gospel (3:15,16, 36; 4:14,36; 5:24,39; 6:27,40,47,54,68; 10:28; 12:25,50; 17:2,3) and in I John (1:2; 2:25; 3:15; 5:11,13,20) but is not absent from the Synoptics (Matt. 19:16,29; 25:46; Mark 10:17,30; Luke 10:25; 18:18,30), nor from Acts (13:46,48) or the Epistles (Rom. 2:7; 5:21; 6:22,23; Gal. 6:8; I Tim. 1:16; 6:12; Tit. 1:2; Jude 21). John 3 describes the beginning of eternal life; John 6 its continuance; I John 1:1-4 its rootage in Christ. The references in the Synoptic Gospels show that eternal life was a concept independent of, though related to, the kingdom of God; not peculiarly Johannine. "Eternal" defines the "life" which believers receive "in Christ"; the word "eternal" stresses the endless character of that life, freed from the fear and the fact of death by the hope of the resurrection (John 11:25,26).

E.R.

ETERNITY (ē-tûr'nĭ-tē), occurs but once in KJV (Isa. 57:15); for Heb. 'adh, perpetuity, advancing time; usually translated "ever"; also "everlasting, evermore, (of) old, perpetually." ASV, RSV replace KJV "world" in Ecclesiastes 3:11 with "eternity" (Heb. 'ôlām, age, long duration, antiquity, futurity, duration of the world). The adjective eternal renders Heb. 'ôlām (Isa. 60:15; RSV for ever); qedhem, before (Deut. 33:27); Gr. aídios, everlasting (Rom. 1:20); aión, age (Eph. 3:11; I Tim. 1:17 RSV of ages); elsewhere aiónios, age-long, eternal, everlasting; mostly in the phrase "eternal life." The Biblical concept of eternity and the eternal refers to the endless past, the unending future, or to God's present experience of all time.

ETHAM (ē'thăm, Heb. 'ēthām), an uncertain site on the journey of Israel out of Egypt, which they reached after leaving Succoth and before turning back to Pihahiroth. After crossing the Red Sea they traveled three days in the wilderness of Etham to reach Marah (Exod. 13:20; Num. 33:6-8). Thus Etham appears to have been a wilderness district on both sides of the N end of the Red Sea.

ETHAN (ē'thăn, Heb. 'êthan). 1. An Ezrahite of Solomon's time, renowned for his wisdom (I Kings 4:31; Ps. 89 title).

2. A son of Zerah, son of Judah (I Chron. 2:6, 8).

3. A descendant of Gershon, son of Levi (I Chron. 6:39-43).

4. A singer, descendant of Marari, son of Levi (I Chron. 6:44; 15:17,19)

ETHBAAL (ĕth'bā'ăl, Heb. 'ethbaal), a king of Sidon whose daughter Jezebel became the wife of Ahab, king of Israel (I Kings 16:31).

ETHER (ē'thêr, Heb. 'ether), a town in Judah named between Libnah and Ashan (Josh. 15:42); Khirbet 'Ater; perhaps the same assigned to Simeon named between En-rimmon and Ashan (Josh. 19:7,9).

ETHIOPIA (ē'thĭ-ō'pĭ-à, Heb. kûsh, Gr. Aithiopía), a country extending S of Egypt from the first cataract of the Nile indefinitely, including Nubia, Sudan and northern if not southern modern Ethiopia. Heb. Kûsh, Cush, son of Ham (Gen. 10:6-8; I Chron. 1:8-10), from whom descended the most southern peoples known to the Hebrews, in Arabia and N Africa. Ethiopia (Gen. 2:13 ASV, RSV Cush) may be anywhere in this general direction. Job 28:19 mentions the topaz of Ethiopia. Moses married an Ethiopian woman (Num. 12:1 RSV Cushite). In the reign of Rehoboam, Ethiopians came against Judah with the king of Egypt (II Chron. 12:3); and in the reign of Asa (II Chron. 14:9-13; 16:7-9) Zerah, the Ethiopian with a million men, was defeated in Judah. "The Arabians, that were near the Ethiopians" (II Chron. 21:16) indicates the lands on both sides of the Red Sea, in the Arabian peninsula and in Africa, sometimes under the same rule.

The Ethiopians had skin of different appearance (Jer. 13:23); the Greek name Aithíops, burnt-face, shows the color to have been dark. Pictures on monuments show that they were a mixed race, some Negro, some Semitic, some Caucasian. Ethiopia enters Bible history most prominently when Tirhakah, an Ethiopian king of a dynasty which had conquered Egypt, came against Judah in the days of Hezekiah, and was only driven away by the superior force of Assyria (II Kings 19:9; Isa. 37:9). Henceforth the ultimate ruin of Ethiopia is a theme of prophecy (Isa. 11:11; 18:1; 20:3-5; 43:3; 45:14; Jer. 46:9; Ezek. 29:10; 30:4, 5; 38:5; Zeph. 3:10; Nah. 3:9). The English versions vary between "Ethiopia" and "Cush." Echoes are in Psalms 68:31; 87:4. Ethiopia is the western limit of the Persian empire of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:1; 8:9). Ethiopia in NT times was ruled by a queen whose name or title was Candace (Acts 8:27). Ethiopia was a sparsely populated land traversed by the Blue and White Nile and their tributaries, a reservoir of hardy manpower for ambitious rulers (Isa. 18:1; 2 ASV, RSV).

E.R.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH (ē'thĭ-ō'pĭ-ăn ū'nŭk), treasurer of Candace, queen of the Ethiopians (Acts 8:26-39). He was a mighty man (Gr. dynástes) or nobleman. As a eunuch he could not be a full member of the Jewish community (Deut. 23:1), but he had been worshiping in Jerusalem and was reading aloud the book of Isaiah when Philip, sent by the Holy Spirit from Samaria to help him, met his chariot. From Isaiah 53, Philip led the African to faith in Christ, so that he asked for and received baptism and went on his way toward Gaza rejoicing.

ETHNAN (ēth'năn), a son of Helah, wife of Ashur, a Judahite (I Chron. 4:7).

ETHNI (ĕth'nī), a Gershonite Levite and an ancestor of Asaph whom David set over the service of song (I Chron. 6:41). Likely the same person named Jeaterai in I Chronicles 6:21.

EUBULUS (ū-bū'lŭs), a Christian disciple at Rome who, with others, saluted Timothy (II Tim. 4:21).

EUERGETES (ū-ûr'jē-tēz), "benefactors," a title of honor often voted by Greek states to public men. Our Lord alludes to the title (Luke 22:25).

EUNICE (ū'nĭs, ū-nī'sē, Gr. Eunike), the Jewish wife of a Greek; daughter of Lois and mother of Timothy (Acts 16:1; II Tim. 1:5). They lived at Lystra, where the two women and Timothy were converted, probably on Paul's first visit (Acts 14:6-20), since Timothy knew of Paul's persecution there (II Tim. 3:11). She brought up her son to know the OT Scriptures (II Tim. 3:15).

EUNUCH (ū'nŭk, Heb. sārîs, Gr. spádon, eunoúchos), a castrated male. From the employment of such men as custodians of royal harems the term came to designate an officer, whether physically a eunuch or not. Heb. sārîs is translated officer 12 times (e.g., Gen. 37:36; 39:1, a married man); chamberlain 13 times (e.g., II Kings 23:11); eunuch 17 times (II Kings 9:32, Jezebel's attendants; Jer. 29:2; 34:19; 38:7; 41:16; in 52:25 ASV, RSV Officer, of the last kings of Judah; II Kings 20:18; Isa. 39:7; Dan. 1:3-18, in the service of heathen kings). The Mosaic law forbade those blemished by castration to enter the congregation (Deut. 23:1), but Isaiah prophesied of a day when this disability would be removed and their loss compensated (Isa. 56:3-5). Eng. eunuch is a transliteration of Greek eunoûchos. The Ethiopian (Acts 8:27-39) was a queen's treasurer in whom Isaiah's prophecy may well have encouraged a new hope. Our Lord uses the term and its cognate verb four times in Matthew 19:12; those born eunuchs and those made eunuchs by men are physically incapable of begetting children; those who "have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake" are they whom continence has kept chaste and celibate that they may concentrate their lives on promoting the kingdom of heaven. Jesus Himself was the prime example. Such are the men referred to as "virgins" (RSV chaste) in Revelation 14:4. The eminent though erratic Christian scholar Origen, late in life regretted having taken Matthew 19:12 literally.

EUODIAS, properly Euodia (ū-ō'dĭ-à, Gr. Euodía, prosperous journey or fragrance), a Christian woman at Philippi. She is mentioned in Philippians 4:2 where Paul beseeches Euodia and Syntyche that they be of the same mind in the Lord.

EUPHRATES (ū-frā'tēz, Heb. perāth, from a root meaning "to break forth," Gr. Euphrátes), the longest and most important river of Western Asia, frequently in the OT called "the river," "the great river," as being the largest with which Israel was acquainted, in contrast to the soon drying up torrents of Palestine (Isa. 8:7; Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7). It rises from two sources in the Armenian mountains whose branches join after having run 400 and 270 miles, respectively. The united river runs SW and S through the Taurus mountains towards the Mediterranean; but the ranges N of Lebanon prevent its reaching that sea; it turns SE and flows 1000 miles to the Persian Gulf. The whole course is 1780 miles; for 1200 it is navigable for small vessels. The melting of the snows in the Armenian mountains causes the river to flood each spring. Nebuchadnezzar controlled the floods by turning the water through sluices into channels for distribution over the whole country. The promise to Abraham that his seed's inheritance should reach the Euphrates (Gen. 15:18; Deut. 1:7; Josh. 1:4) received a partial fulfillment in Reuben's pastoral possessions (I Chron. 5:9,10); a fuller accomplishment under David and Solomon, when an annual tribute was paid by subject petty kingdoms in that area (I Chron. 18:3; II Sam. 8:3-8; I Kings 4:21; II Chron. 9:26). The Euphrates was the boundary between Assyria and the Hittite country after Solomon's time, according to inscriptions.

B.P.

EUROCLYDON (ū-rŏk'lī-dŏn, Gr. Euroklýdon, from eúros, the east wind, and klýdon, a wave; thus an east wind raising mighty waves), found only in Acts 27:14. RV has Euraquilo. Euraquilo thus is an ENE wind, just that which is best suited to the facts. It came down from the island of Crete, S of which Paul was sailing. It would be extremely dangerous to a ship with large sails, threatening either to capsize her or to drive her onto the quicksands (vs. 17).

EUTYCHUS (ū'tĭ-kŭs, Gr. Eútychos, fortunate), a young man of Troas mentioned in Acts 20:9 who, while listening to Paul preach, was overcome with sleep and fell out of the third story window to his death. Paul then went down and restored him to life.

EVANGELIST (ē-văn'jĕ-lĭst, Gr. euangelistés, one who announces good news), used in a general sense of anyone who proclaims the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Sometimes in the NT, however, it designates a particular class of ministry, as in Ephesians 4:11: "And he (Christ) gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors, and teachers . . ." The evangelist founded the church; the pastor-teacher built it up in the faith. The evangelist was not confined in service to one spot, but moved about in different localities, preaching the good news concerning Jesus Christ to those who had not heard the message before. Once such had put their trust in the Lord, then the work of the pastor-teacher began. He would remain with them, training them further in the things pertaining to Christ and building them up in the faith. Apostles (Acts 8:25; 14: 7; I Cor. 1:17) did the work of an evangelist, as did also bishops (II Tim. 4:2-5). Philip, who had been set apart as one of the seven deacons (Acts 6:5) was also called "the evangelist" (Acts 21:8). Thus it can be seen that the word refers to a work rather than to an order. The evangelist was not necessarily an apostle, bishop-elder, or deacon, but might be any of these. Evangelist in the sense of "inspired writer of one of the four Gospels," was a later usage. B.P.

EVE (Heb. hawwâh, life, living), the first woman, formed by God out of Adam's side. Adam designated her (Gen. 2:23) as woman (Heb. 'ishshâh) for she was taken out of man (Heb. 'ish). In these words there is suggested the close relationship between man and woman; a relationship which the first man was unable to find in the animal creation. Both the way in which Eve was created and the designation "woman" serve to emphasize also the intimacy, sacredness and inseparability of the marital state, transcending even that relationship which exists between children and parents (Gen. 2:24). The name "Eve" was given to her after the fall and implies both her being the mother of all living and her being the mother of the promised Seed who should give life to the human race now subjected to death. While the Scriptures uniformly trace the fall of the race to the sin of Adam, the part which Eve played in this tragedy is vividly portrayed in Genesis 3. Her greater weakness and susceptibility to temptation are juxtaposed with Adam's willful act of disobedience. Deceived by Satan, she ate of the fruit. Enamored of his wife, Adam chose to leave God for the one He had given him. Paul twice refers to her in his epistles (II Cor. 11:3; I Tim. 2:13). B.P.

EVENING SACRIFICE, one of the two daily offerings prescribed in the Mosaic ritual (Exod. 29:38-42; Num. 28:3-8). Every evening (as also every morning) a yearling lamb was sacrificed as a continual burnt offering. With each lamb there was offered a tenth deal of flour, mingled with oil, for a meal offering and the fourth part of a hin of wine for a drink offering.

EVI (ē'vī, Heb. 'ĕwî), one of the five kings of Midian slain by the Israelites during their encampment in the plains of Moab (Num. 31:8). His land was allotted to Reuben (Josh. 13:21).

EVIL (ē'vĭl, Heb. ra', Gr. ponērós, kakós), a term designating that which is not in harmony with the divine order. In the Bible evil is clearly depicted under two distinct aspects: moral and physical. The reconciliation of the existence of evil with the goodness and holiness of a God infinite in His wisdom and power is one of the great problems of theism. The Scriptures indicate that evil has been permitted by God in order that His justice might be manifested in its punishment and His grace in its forgiveness (Rom. 9:22,23). Thus the existence of evil is a reminder of the fact that the universe is designed not for the production of happiness among rational creatures but for the manifestation of the manifold perfections of God. Moral evil, or sin, is any lack of conformity to the moral law of God. According to the Bible, it is the cause of the existence of physical or natural evil in this world. Adam and Eve, the first humans, enjoyed perfect fellowship with God in the garden of Eden. In the day that they partook of the fruit of the tree which was in the midst of the garden, thus disobeying God, they fell under God's condemnation and were banished from the garden. The ground was then cursed for man's sake, and from that time forward man has been forced to gain his sustenance through arduous, sorrowful toil, even as woman has borne children only through suffering and labor (Gen. 3:16-19). In the NT the relationship between moral and natural evil is indicated by Paul in Romans 8: 18-22. B.P.

EVIL-MERODACH (ē'vil-mĕ-rō'dăk), a king of Babylon who reigned two years (562-560 B.C.). His name (Amelu-Marduk is the Babylonian form) means "Man of Marduk." This is a theophorous name, Marduk being the chief god of Babylon (cf. Ishbosheth, Ishbaal). The son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-Merodach was murdered by his brother-in-law, Neriglissar (the Nergal-Sharezer of Jer. 39:3), a prince who usurped the throne. References to him as lawless and indecent indicate the probable reasons for the coup which cut short his reign.

Evil-Merodach released Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from his 37-year Babylonian imprisonment, and gave him a position of prominence among the captive kings and daily allowance of food for the rest of his life (II Kings 25:27-30; Jer. 52:31-34); but he was not permitted to return home to Judah. Cuneiform tablets recovered from Babylon, dated from the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, refer to provisions which were supplied to Jehoiachin and other royal prisoners. The latest of these tablets is at least eight years earlier than the time of Jehoiachin's release referred to in Scripture. It would seem that Evil-Merodach increased the king's allowance from the small amount mentioned in these tablets. J.B.G.

EVIL SPIRITS (See Demons)

EWE (ū), a female sheep. Several Hebrew words (rāhēl, 'ûl, seh, cavsâh) are represented in translation by this term.

EXCOMMUNICATION, disciplinary exclusion from church fellowship. The Jews had two forms of excommunication, apparently alluded to in Luke 6:22 by Christ: "Blessed are ye when men ... shall separate you from their company [the Jewish middûy, for 30, 60 or 90 days], and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil [the Jewish hērem, a formally pronounced, perpetual cutting off from the community; cf. John 9:34,35, marg.], for the Son of man's sake." Christian excommunication is commanded by Christ (Matt. 18:15-18), and apostolic practice (I Tim. 1:20) and precept (I Cor. 5:11; Titus 3:10) are in agreement. "Delivering unto Satan" (I Cor. 5:5; I Tim. 1:20) seems to mean casting out of the church, Christ's kingdom of light, into the world that lies in the power of the wicked one (Eph. 6:12; I John 5:19). The object of excommunication is the good of the offender (I Cor. 5:5) and the moral well-being of the sound members (II Tim. 2:17). Its subjects are those guilty of heresy or great immorality (I Tim. 1:20; I Cor. 5:1-5). It is inflicted by the church (Matt. 18:18) and its representative ministers (Titus 3:10; I Cor. 5:1,3,4). Paul's infallible authority when inspired gives no warrant for uninspired ministers claiming the same right to direct the church to excommunicate as they will (II Cor. 2:7-9). B.P.

EXECUTIONER, an officer of high rank in the East; commander of the bodyguard who executed the king's sentence. Potiphar (Gen. 37:36, marg.) was the "chief of the executioners." Nebuzaradan (Jer. 39:9, marg.) and Arioch (Dan. 2:14, marg.) held this office. In the Gospel record we are told that King Herod sent an executioner (Gr. spekouattōr, originally a military watch or scout) i.e. one of his bodyguard, to behead John the Baptist (Mark 6:27).

EXILE usually refers to the period of time during which the Southern Kingdom (Judah) was forcibly detained in Babylon. It began with a series of deportations during the reigns of the Judaean kings, Jehoiakim (609-598 B.C.), Jehoiachin (598 B.C.), and Zedekiah (598-587 B.C.). After the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (587 B.C.) the kingdom of Judah ceased to exist as a political entity. Although there were settlements in Egypt, it was the exiles in Babylon who maintained the historic Jewish faith and provided the nucleus which returned to Judea subsequent to the Decree of Cyrus (536 B.C.). The Northern Kingdom (Israel) was earlier exiled to Assyria (722 B.C.). It was the policy of the Assyrian conquerors to move the populations of captured cities, with the result that Israelites were scattered in various parts of the empire, and other captives were brought to the region around Samaria (II Kings 17:24). Subsequent history knows these people as the Samaritans. Although men from the Northern Kingdom doubtless returned with the Judaean exiles, no organized return took place from the Assyrian captivity.

Causes. Both theological and political causes are mentioned in the Biblical accounts of the exile. The prophets note the tendency of both Israel and Judah to forsake the Lord and adopt the customs of their heathen neighbors. These include the licentious worship associated with the Baal fertility cult and the Molech worship which required the offering of human beings in sacrifice to a heathen deity. Politically the exile was the result of an anti-Babylonian policy adopted by the later kings of Judah. Egypt, the rival of Babylon, urged the Judaean kings to refuse to pay tribute to Nebuchadnezzar. Although Jeremiah denounced this pro-Egyptian policy it was adopted with disastrous results. Egypt proved to be a "broken reed" and the kingdom of Judah was rendered impotent before the Babylonian armies. After a siege of eighteen months Nebuchadnezzar entered Jerusalem, destroyed the temple, and took captive the inhabitants of the city.

SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC CONDITIONS. The exile worked great hardships on a people who were forcibly removed from their homeland and settled in new territory. The Psalmist pictures the exiles weeping in Babylon, unable to sing the songs of Zion in a strange land (Ps. 137:4). The exiles who had been deported with Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin prior to the destruction of Jerusalem hoped that they would soon be able to return home. False prophets placed a two-year limit on the period of exile (Jer. 28:11). Jeremiah, however, urged the exiles to settle down, build houses, marry, and pray for the peace of the land in which they lived. He stated that it would be 70 years before they would be back in Judaea (Jer. 29: 4-14). The Babylonians permitted the Jews to congregate in their own settlements. One of these, known as Tel Abib, was the scene of Ezekiel's prophetic ministry. Tel Abib was located near Nippur on the River Chebar, also known as the Grand Canal.

Religious Conditions. The Prophets Ezekiel and Daniel ministered in Babylon during the exile. Jeremiah, who had urged Zedekiah to make peace with Nebuchadnezzar, was permitted to remain in Judah after the destruction of Jerusalem. The murder of Gedaliah, appointed by Nebuchadnezzar as governor of Judah, precipitated a move on the part of the remaining Jews to migrate to Egypt. Although tradition suggests that he subsequently went to Babylon, Jeremiah's actual prophetic ministry ends among the Jews in Egypt.

Ezekiel was taken to Babylon at the time of the deportation of Jehoiachin. He prophesied to the Jews at Tel Abib, warning them of the impending destruction of Jerusalem. Subsequent to the fall of the city, Ezekiel held forth the hope of a return from exile and the re-establishment of Jewish worship in Palestine.

Daniel was one of the youths selected to be taken to Babylon at the time of the first deportation (under Jehoiakim). God-given abilities and a spirit of faithfulness enabled Daniel to rise to a position of influence in the Babylonian court — a position which he maintained through varying political regimes to the time of Cyrus the Persian, conqueror of Babylon. Like Ezekiel, Daniel spoke of the exile as temporary in duration. He also depicted a succession of world powers, culminating in the reign of the Messiah as the goal of history.

Within pre-exilic Judaism, the center of worship was the Jerusalem Temple where sacrifices were offered daily and where annual festive occasions were observed. With the destruction of the temple a new spiritual orientation took place. Jews came together for the purpose of prayer and the study of Scripture in gatherings which later were called synagogues. The emergence of the synagogue made possible the continuance of Jewish religious life during the period of absence from the temple. The synagogue persisted after the building of the second temple (516 B.C.), and is still an important factor in Jewish life.

The sacred books of the Jews assumed great importance during the period of the exile. The law, which had been lost prior to Josiah's reign (II Kings 22:8), became the subject of careful study. By the time of the return from Babylon, the institution of the scribe was established. Scribes not only made copies of the law, but they also served as interpreters. Ezra is regarded as the first scribe (Neh. 8:1 ff). The sabbath, a part of the Mosaic law, assumed a new meaning to the displaced Jews of the exile. It served as a weekly reminder of the fact that they had a definite covenant relationship to God, and became a marker to distinguish the Jew from his Babylonian neighbor. When Nehemiah led a group back to Palestine he insisted that the sabbath be scrupulously observed (Neh. 13:15-22).

Political Conditions. The exile began during the reign of the Neo-Babylonian king, Nebuchadnezzar, and ended with the decree of the Persian king, Cyrus. Nebuchadnezzar defeated an Egyptian army which had joined forces with the Assyrians, who were retreating before the Babylonians, at Carchemish on the upper Euphrates (605 B.C.). The campaign against Egypt was deferred when Nebuchadnezzar, on receiving news of the death of his father, Nabopolassar, returned home to insure his succession to the kingdom. Judah was among the states of western Asia which Nebuchadnezzar claimed as heir to the Assyrians whom he had defeated in battle. Babylonian armies occupied Judah during the reign of Jehoiakim (c. 603 B.C.) and took captive a number of its leading citizens, leaving only "the poorest of the people" in the land. Jehoiakim was allowed to retain his throne until he rebelled (II Kings 24:12-16). In 598 B.C. the Babylonian king called upon the vassal states (including Moab, Syria, and Ammon) to support his power in Judah by force of arms (II Kings 24:2). When Jehoiakim was killed in battle his eighteen year old son, Jehoiachin, succeeded him. After a reign of but three months, Jehoiakin was deported to Babylon with 10,000 Jews, including Ezekiel. Jehoiachin's uncle, Zedekiah, the third son of Josiah, was made a puppet king in Jerusalem (II Kings 24:17-19). In spite of the warnings of Jeremiah, Zedekiah yielded to the pro-Egyptian party and refused to pay tribute to Babylon. Thereupon Nebuchadnezzar laid siege to Jerusalem and, after one and one-half years, entered the city, destroyed its temple, and deported its citizens (587 B.C.) Following the murder of Gedaliah, the governor appointed by Nebuchadnezzar to handle Judaean affairs after the destruction of Jerusalem, the final deportation took place (c. 581 B.C.) (II Kings 25:22).

Nebuchadnezzar reigned for more than 40 years, but he left no able successor. Jehoiachin was given a place of honor among the exiles in Babylon by Evil-Merodach (561-560 B.C.), son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. Neriglissar (559-556 B.C.) and Labashi-Marduk (556 B.C.) had brief, non-significant reigns. Nabonidus (Nabu-Na'id), with his son Belshazzar, served as the last ruler of the Neo-Babylonian Empire 556-539) B.C.). Nabonidus had an interest in archaeology and religion, but was inefficient as a ruler. He repaired the ziggurat to the moon god Sin at Ur where one of his daughters served as priestess. Another daughter is said to have maintained a small museum of archaeological finds. His diversified interests caused Nabonidus to name Belshazzar, his eldest son, as prince regent. It was during the reign of Belshazzar that the Neo-Babylonian Empire came to an end. Cyrus had made rapid conquests after his succession to the throne of the small Persian principality of Anshan (559 B.C.) Successively unifying the Persians, conquering the neighboring Medes and the distant Lydians of Asia

Minor, Cyrus marched against Babylon, which he defeated (539 B.C.) The governor of Babylon, Gubaru, is doubtless to be identified with "Darius the Mede" mentioned in Daniel 5 and 6. Cyrus issued the decree which permitted Jews to return to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple (Ezra 1:1-4). This may be regarded as the end of the exile, although many Jews chose to remain in Babylon.

Results. Although the exile ended the political independence of Judaea, it served to emphasize the fact that God was in no sense confined to Palestine. He accompanied His people to Babylon and providentially cared for them there. In an idolatrous environment, the Jew stressed his monotheistic faith, having seen the errors of idolatry which brought on the exile. Although many Jews returned to their homeland following the decree of Cyrus, others remained in the Persian Empire with the result that Judaism became international in scope. C.F.P.

EXODUS (ĕk'sō-dŭs, Gr. a going out), the event which terminated the sojourn of Israel in Egypt. The family of Jacob (Israel) voluntarily entered Egypt during a time of severe famine in Canaan. Joseph, who had been sold into slavery by jealous brothers, was then vizier of Egypt and his Israelite brethren were assigned suitable land in the northeastern section of Egypt known as Goshen. When a new dynasty arose "which knew not Joseph," i.e., forgot what he had done for Egypt, the Israelites were reduced to the status of slaves. Fearful lest they should prove sympathetic with foreign invaders, Pharaoh ordered the male children destroyed. The infant Moses, however, was placed in an ark of bulrushes where he was seen by Pharaoh's daughter who ordered that he be rescued. Raised in the royal court, Moses chose to turn his back on the possibilities of advancement in Egypt in order to lead his oppressed people into freedom.

Date of the Exodus. There has been no unanimity among Bible students concerning the date of the Exodus, or the identity of the pharaohs who took part in the oppression of Israel. Later pharaohs are sometimes mentioned by name (e.g. Pharaoh Hophra, Pharaoh Necho), but the title, "Pharaoh," is given only in the Exodus account. Some Biblical scholars consider that I Kings 6:1 is decisive in furnishing the date of the Exodus. We are told that Solomon began to build the temple "in the 480th year after the children of Israel were come up out of the land of Egypt." Since we know the approximate dates of Solomon's reign, this information can be used in calculating the date of the Exodus. The date suggested by this method of computation, about 1441 B.C., falls within the reign of Amenhotep II, son of Thutmose III, one of the great empire builders of New Kingdom Egypt. Paintings from the tomb of Rekhmire, vizier of Thutmose III, depict Semites working as slave laborers on building projects.

Adherents of the "early date" of the Exodus (1441 B.C.) also find support for their position from the Amarna Letters (1400-1366 B.C.). These cuneiform tablets, discovered at the site of Akhnaton's capital, contain correspondence from the kings of the city-states in Canaan who ask the help of the pharaoh against a people known as Habiru. This, it is suggested, is a description of the battles fought subsequent to the Exodus by the armies of Israel in seeking to accomplish the conquest of Canaan. There are, however, serious difficulties in the matter of accepting the early date. During the Eighteenth Dynasty of Egyptian history (when the early date would fall), the capital of Egypt was at Thebes S of the delta, and the building operations of Thutmose III seem to have been centered there. Subsequently, however, (during the time of the Rameses) the pharaohs resided in the delta where they engaged in extensive building activity. It is specifically in the delta region, adjacent to Goshen, where Moses met with Pharaoh, and it was in the city of Rameses (also known as Avaris and Tanis) in the eastern delta where the Israelites are reported to have labored (Exod. 1:11). Advocates of the early date suggest that the name Rameses is a modernization of an older name.

Because of these problems in dating the Exodus as early as 1441 B.C., an increasing number of Biblical scholars have come to accept a date in the 13th century. Explorations in Transjordan by the archaeologist, Nelson Glueck, indicate a gap in the sedentary population of that region from about 1900 to 1300 B.C. The Bible, however, indicates that Israel met formidable opposition from Sihon and Og, kings in the East-Jordan country and that the Moabite king sought to bring a curse on Israel to prevent their progress into Canaan. The earlier suggestion of evidence that Jericho fell about 1400 B.C.—put forth by Garstang—has been questioned by recent expeditions there, under the direction of Dr. Kathleen Kenyon. The excavations at Hazor by Yigael Yadin also tend to point toward a 13th century date for the Exodus, as did earlier excavations at Lachish and Debir. The Stele of Merneptah (c. 1229 B.C.) provides the first reference to Israel in the Egyptian monuments. Merneptah claims a decisive victory over the Israelite people. It may be significant that the ideogram for "nation" is not used. In any event we know that Israelites were fighting in Canaan during the reign of Merneptah. The predecessor of Merneptah was Rameses II who reigned for 67 years from his capital at Tanis (or Rameses) in the delta. Some Biblical scholars suggest that Sethi I, father of Rameses, began the oppression, which was continued under Rameses, during whose reign the Exodus took place. Those who hold to this 13th century date for the Exodus suggest that the 480 years of I Kings 6:1 be taken as a round number signifying 12 generations. Since generations are frequently much less than 40 years apart, there may be a smaller time span between the Exodus and the building of Solomon's temple. This view is accepted by many who hold to the full inspiration of the text of Scripture. In view of the fact that the non-Israelite characters in the story of the Exodus are not identified in Scripture, it is wise to avoid a dogmatic approach to the question. The evidence for the historicity of the Exodus account is decisive, but the evidence for specific dates is still inconclusive.

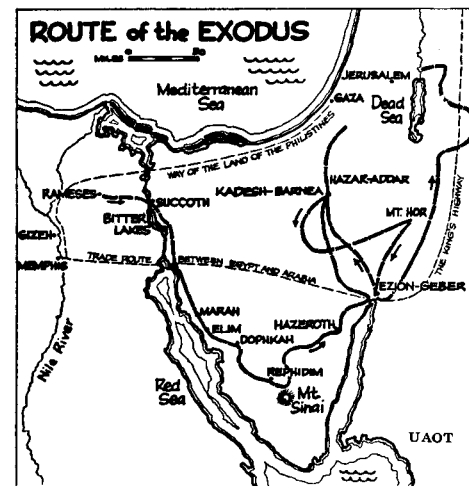
Route. The Biblical record (Exod. 13:17) states that Israel did not take the direct route through the Philistine country to Canaan. Had she done so Israel would have had to pass the Egyptian wall (Biblical Shur) which protected the northeastern highways out of Egypt. This wall was guarded and could be passed only with great difficulty. If she successfully crossed the border, further opposition could be anticipated from the Philistines. The discipline of the wilderness was a part of God's preparation for His people before they were to come into open conflict with formidable foes. Leaving Rameses (Exod. 12:37), in the eastern delta, the Israelites journeyed southeastward to Succoth (Tell el-Mashkutah). They then moved on to Etham "in the edge of the wilderness" where they were conscious of God's guidance in the pillar of cloud and pillar of fire (Exod. 13:21-22). The word Etham is derived from an Egyptian word meaning "wall" and was probably part of the series of fortifications built by the Egyptians to keep out the Asiatic nomads. From Etham they turned back and encamped before Pi-hahiroth, described as "between Migdol and the sea over against Baal-zephon." The location of these sites is not known with certainty. Pi-hahiroth is possibly an Egyptian word meaning "house of the marshes." Baal-zephon is the name of a Semitic deity who was worshiped in Egypt, doubtless at a shrine located at the town which bore his name. After passing Pi-hahiroth, Israel arrived at the body of water designated in the English versions as the Red Sea, the Yam Suph of the Hebrew text. The geography of the Exodus suggests that this Yam Suph, or Sea of Reeds, formed a natural barrier between Egypt and the Sinai Peninsula, the ultimate destination of the Israelites. The topography of this region has been altered since the construction of the Suez Canal, but the Yam Suph was probably N of Lake Timsah. An Egyptian document from the 13th century B.C. mentions a Papyrus Lake not far from Tanis. Wright and Filson (in Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible, Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1956) suggest a location at the southern extension of the present Lake Menzaleh. The Exodus from Egypt through the Yam Suph was made possible by the direct intervention of God, who "caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind" (Exod. 14:21). Israel was thus able to cross from Egypt to the Sinai Peninsula. When the armies of Pharaoh attempted to pursue the Israelites, the Egyptians were destroyed by the waters which returned to their normal course.



Number of Israelites. The Bible states that 600,000 men took part in the Exodus (Exod. 12:37). A year later the number of male Israelites over the age of 20 was 603,550 (Num. 1:46). During the years of Israel's sojourn in Egypt, the population multiplied to the point where Pharaoh was alarmed lest Israel side with an enemy in the event of war (Exod. 1:7-10). It was this very fear that brought about the oppression.

Miracles. The Exodus period was one of the great epochs of Biblical miracles. The first nine plagues may have been related to the natural phenomena of Egypt, but their timing and intensification were clearly supernatural. The last plague—the death of the firstborn—signaled the beginning of the Exodus. Israel ate the Passover meal in haste, ready to depart from Egypt. The opening of the Red Sea by the "strong east wind" was the means by which God brought His people out of Egypt into the wilderness where, for period of 40 years, they were miraculously sustained. EXODUS, BOOK OF, the second book of the Bible. The name is a transliteration of the Greek word meaning "a going out," referring to the departure of Israel from Egypt. The Hebrews called the book "and these are the names," which are the opening words of 1:1. The book may be conveniently divided into three main sections:

1. Israel in Egypt (1:1-12:36), describing the multiplication of Israel and their sufferings; the birth, preparation, and commission of Moses; the ministry of Moses and Aaron to Israel and to Pharaoh; and the ten plagues upon the Egyptians, climaxed by the Passover and the death of the firstborn.

2. The Journey to Sinai (12:37-19:2), which tells of the hasty flight of Israel from Egypt; the importance of the Passover and the consecration of the firstborn; the destruction of Pharaoh's army; the Song of Moses and Miriam; the waters of Marah; the miracle of the quails and the manna; the waters of Massah and Meribah; the war with Amalek; and the counsel of Jethro.

3. Israel at Sinai (19:3-40:38 deals with Jehovah's manifestation at Mount Sinai: the Ten Commandments; the civil law; instructions for building the tabernacle and its furniture and for making the priests' garments; sacrifices for the consecration of Aaron and his sons; the episode of the golden calf; the renewing of the two tables; the shining of Moses' face; the construction of the tabernacle; and the filling of the tabernacle with the glory of Jehovah.

Whereas the Book of Genesis sets forth the origin of the nation of Israel, the Book of Exodus describes the process whereby God molded it into a full-grown theocratic nation, redeemed and set apart for His purposes in the earth. In this book is recorded the fulfillment of three great prophecies of Genesis: 1. that Israel would become a great nation in Egypt (Gen. 46:3); 2. that they would be afflicted there 400 years (Gen. 15:13); and 3. that God would finally judge Egypt and bring Israel out with great substance (Gen. 15:14). Joseph emphasized the hope of Exodus on his deathbed (Gen. 50:24-25), and during the centuries that followed, this promise must have served as "a more sure word of prophecy . . . a light that shineth in a dark place" (II Pet. 1:19).

The actual date of the Exodus, though a difficult problem, is also an important one for understanding the background of the book. Critical scholars usually date the Exodus around 1280 B.C. in the reign of Rameses II. But the chronology of the Book of Judges, plus the explicit statement of I Kings 6:1, calls for 1447 B.C. as the correct date. Biblical chronology dates the arrival of Joseph in Egypt as a slave around 1900 B.C., during the height of the Middle Kingdom. He died about 1806 B.C., and the new king "who knew not Joseph" (1:8) must have been the first Hyksos invader of Egypt (about 1730 B.C.). These Hyksos invaders were less numerous than the Hebrews at that time, and had cause to fear that they might ally themselves with the native Egyptians. After the Hyksos were driven out (c. 1580 B.C.), the Egyptians of the powerful Eighteenth Dynasty continued to oppress the Hebrews. Moses was born in 1527 B.C. and was raised by Hatshepsut, daughter of Thutmosis I and later a Pharaoh-Queen (1501-1480). Thutmosis III (1480-1447), the mighty "Napoleon of Egypt," was the Pharaoh of the Oppression, and his son Amenhotep II (1447-1425) was the Pharaoh of the Exodus. Not only do the Biblical events fit perfectly into this portion of Egyptian history, but also it must be said that the Biblical account cannot be harmonized with the view that the Exodus occurred around 1280 B.C. The main argument in support of this view is that the store city of Raamses (1:11) could only have been built during the reign of Raamses (or Rameses) II (1290-1224 B. C.). But if this be so, then the birth of Moses must be dated later than this to allow for the lengthy events of 1:12-22, and the Exodus could not be dated until 80 years after that (7:7). This would allow less than a century between the Exodus and the reign of Saul! Such a view is utterly unnecessary, however, for evidence has been discovered that pharaohs of the Nineteenth Dynasty used names employed by the Hyksos, and even worshiped gods honored by the Hyksos, so that Hyksos kings could have built a city named Raamses. Also, it has been shown that although the capital of the Eighteenth Dynasty pharaohs was located far to the S of the land of Goshen at Thebes, both Thutmosis III and Amenhotep II built extensively in the delta and thus could have had a palace and court in the vicinity of the land of Goshen (cf. John Rea, "The Date of the Exodus," Bulletin of the Evangelical Theological Society, Summer, 1960). J.C.W.

EXORCISM (ĕk'sôr-sĭzm, Gr. exorkízo, to adjure), the expelling of demons by means of magic charms, spells, and incantations. It was a common practice among ancient heathen. In Acts 19:13-16, the profane use of Jesus' name as a mere spell was punished by the demon's turning on the would-be exorcists; these "vagabond Jews" were pretenders. Christ, however, implies that some Jews actually cast out demons (Matt. 12:27), probably by demoniacal help; others, in the name of Jesus, without saving faith in Him (Matt. 7:22). He gave power to the twelve, the seventy, and to the other disciples after His ascension (Matt. 10:8; Luke 10:17-19; Mark 16:17; Acts 16:18). The term "exorcise" is never applied in Scripture to the Christian casting out of demons.

EXPIATION (ĕx'pĭ-ā'shŭn), the act or means of making amends or reparation for sin. The word is to be distinguished from its correlative term, "propitiation." From the Bible viewpoint sin is looked upon as a failure to meet obligations, a failure for which satisfaction must be provided. "Expiation" speaks of this satisfaction. Sin is also looked upon as that which awakens on the part of God a righteous anger which must be set aside before He can and will deal with the sinner without imposing judgment upon him. "Propitiation" views satisfaction as appeasing the wrath of God. The sinner's guilt, then, is expiated by satisfaction (i.e. by a vicarious punishment). God is thereby rendered propitious; i.e. He is now able to pardon and bless the sinner. See PROPITIATION.

EYE (Heb. 'ayin, Gr. ophthalmós), the organ of sight. The literal sense is that which is most frequently found in the Scriptures, where the eye is recognized as among the most valued of the members of the body. In the Mosaic legislation, if a man should smite a slave's eye so that it was blinded, the slave was to be released on account of the eye (Exod. 21:26). One of the most cruel customs of the heathen nations was that of putting out the eyes of a defeated enemy (II Kings 25:7). The word is also used often in figurative expressions. Frequently "eye" speaks of spiritual perception and understanding. Thus the Word of God enlightens the eyes (Ps. 19:8). Growth in spiritual knowledge comes through the eyes of the understanding being enlightened (Eph. 1:18). Other expressions speak of the eye as indicative of character. The good man has a "bountiful eye (Prov. 22:9). High or lofty eyes (Ps. 131:1) describe the proud man. The envious man is one with an evil eye (Matt. 20:15).

EYES, PAINTING OF, referring to the ancient practice of painting the eyelids in order to enhance the beauty of the feminine face (Jer. 4:30, marg.; Ezek. 23:40). Thus Jezebel "put her eyes in painting" (II Kings 9:30, marg.). To this day Oriental women paint the eyelids with antimony or kohl (a black powder made of the smoke black from the burning of frankincense) to make them look full and sparkling, the blackened margin contrasting with the white of the eye.

EYESALVE (Gr. kolloúrion), a preparation compounded of various ingredients used either by simple application or by reduction to a powder to be smeared on the eye (Rev. 3:18). When used figuratively, it refers to the restoration of spiritual vision.

EZBAI (ĕz'bā-ī), the father of Naari, one of David's valiant men (I Chron. 11:37).

EZBON (ĕz'bŏn). 1. One of the sons of Gad (Gen. 46:16), also called Ozni (Num. 26:16).

2. The first named son of Bela, a son of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:7).

EZEKIEL (ē-zēk'yĕl, Heb. yehezqē'l, God strengthens), a Hebrew prophet of the Exile. A play is made on this name in connection with the prophet's call (3:7,8,14). Of a priestly family (1:3), Ezekiel grew up in Judea during the last years of Hebrew independence and was deported to Babylon with Jehoiachin in 597 B.C., probably early in life. He was thus a younger contemporary of the Prophet Jeremiah and of Daniel, who, also as a young man was taken to Babylon in 605 B.C. Ezekiel lived with the Jewish exiles by the irrigation canal Chebar (1:1,3; 3:15) which connected the Tigris River with the Euphrates above Babylon; Daniel carried out his quite different work in the Babylonian court. We know little more about Ezekiel, except that he was married (24:18).

Ezekiel was called to be a prophet in the fifth year of his captivity (1:1,2); the last date mentioned is the 27th year (29:17); his ministry therefore lasted at least 22 years, from about 593-571 B.C.

The "captivity" of the Jews consisted in their deportation to a foreign land. Once arrived in Babylon, however, the exiles seem to have been completely free to settle and live their lives as they pleased. At Nippur, located on the Chebar canal, have been found many records of a Jewish business house, the Murashu Sons, indicating the possibilities open to the exiles. Many of the Jews became so settled in their adopted land that they refused to leave it at the end of the Exile, and from that time to this the majority of the Hebrews have lived outside of Palestine.

When Jerusalem was finally destroyed, some ten years after he arrived in Babylon, Ezekiel entered into the sufferings of his people. On the day on which the final siege began, the prophet's wife became suddenly sick and died. In this he became a sign to the people and was not allowed to go through the customary period of mourning, doubtless to emphasize to them the greater sorrow now coming upon the nation.

In recent years a good deal of interest has been awakened in the unusual states of the prophets during the reception of their revelations. Some have diagnosed Ezekiel's condition as catalepsy, but the passages adduced (3:14,15,26,27; 4:4,5; 24:27) hardly support such a theory. Rather it would seem that the occasional silence of the prophet and his lying on the ground were signs to gain the attention of the people and to act out his message.

Ezekiel was a powerful preacher. Possessing a deeply introspective and religious nature, he used allegory, vivid figures and symbolic actions to clothe his message. His favorite expression to denote the divine inspiration, "The hand of the Lord was upon me" (1:3; 3:14,22, et al.) shows how strongly he felt impelled to communicate the message given him. His preaching was directed to his Jewish brethren in exile, and, like Jeremiah's, was often resented, for it held out little hope for the immediate future. No doubt his message was ultimately received, for the Exile became a time of religious purgation. In Babylon the Jews were cured permanently of their idolatry, and Ezekiel, their major religious leader, must be given much credit for that.

The prophet's ministry was divided into two periods. The first ends with the siege of Jerusalem in 587 B.C. (24:1,27). It was a message of approaching destruction for Jerusalem and of condemnation of her sin. The second period begins with the reception of the news of Jerusalem's fall, some two years later (33:21,22). Now the prophet's message emphasized comfort and looked forward to the coming of the Kingdom of God. It would appear that during the two years between, Ezekiel ceased all public ministry.

Frequently in this book (87 times), Ezekiel is referred to as "son of man." The term means a mortal, as in Psalm 8:4 and is used here to emphasize the prophet's weakness and need of dependence upon God for his success. Later the term came to be a messianic designation. J.B.G.

EZEKIEL, BOOK OF, until quite recently universally accepted as written by the author whose name the book bears. Recent radical critics have denied the unity of the book and have attributed all or parts of it to later writers. There has been no agreement among these critics, however. The arguments for both the unity of the book and its origin with Ezekiel are very strong. The book is autobiographical, Ezekiel frequently using the first person singular pronoun. The arrangement of the book shows its unity—all the parts fit together and, indeed, need each other to make the whole.

The locality of Ezekiel's ministry was Babylon to which he had been deported in 597 B.C. Chapters 8-11 contain a unique vision of events which were transpiring in Jerusalem, made possible when "the spirit lifted me up . . . and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem" (8:3). Elsewhere in the book an intimate knowledge of events in far away Jerusalem is implied (e.g., 24:1,2). It appears impossible that Ezekiel in Babylon could have known in such detail events in Jerusalem except by divine inspiration. Therefore many modern scholars are of the opinion that Ezekiel really prophesied in Jerusalem until the city fell. The clear statements of the book, however, indicate his presence with the Jews in Babylon when he "saw" (8:6,9,10) the Jerusalem events, and a serious attempt to understand the visions must grapple with these statements rather than deny them.

The book is divided into three parts: 1. Denunciation of Judah and Israel, 1-24, dated 593-588 B.C.

2. Oracles against foreign nations, 25-32, dated 587-571 B.C.

3. The future restoration of Israel, 33-48, dated 585-573 B.C.

The prophecies of the first section (1-24) were uttered before the fall of Jerusalem. Ezekiel's call to the prophetic work is described in chapters 1-3. Here occurs his vision of the divine glory—God's throne borne by an unearthly chariot of cherubim and wheels (1:4-21). The prophet eats the scroll upon which his sad message is written (2:8-3:3) and he is commanded to be the Lord's watchman, his own life to be forfeit if he does not cry the alarm (3:16-21; cf. 33:1-9). Ezekiel then predicts the destruction of Jerusalem by symbolic acts (4-7), such as laying siege to a replica of the city (4:1-8) and by rationing food and drink (4:9-17). Next follows the famous vision of Jerusalem's iniquity, for which Ezekiel is raptured in spirit to Jerusalem (8-11), and sees all kinds of loathsome idolatry being practiced in the temple courts. While he watches the desecration of the House of the Lord, he beholds the divine glory which had been manifested in the holy of holies (8:4) leave the temple and city (9:3; 10:4,19; 11:22,23) symbolizing God's abandonment of His apostate people. At that moment Ezekiel returns in spirit to Babylon. The rest of the first section (12-24) records symbolic actions and sermons of the prophet predicting the fall of Jerusalem. He enacts the departure into exile (12:1-7), preaches against false prophets (13) and in two deeply moving oracles (16,23) depicts the ungrateful people's apostasy. His statement of the individual's responsibility before God (18) is famous. Finally he announces the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, and in the evening of the same day his wife dies and he becomes dumb until the fall of the city (24).

After the prophecies of judgment against foreign nations (25-32) comes the climax of the prophet's vision, written after the fall of Jerusalem—the restoration of Israel (33-48). God will bring back the people to their land, send the Son of David to reign over them, and give them a new heart (34,36). The vision of the valley of dry bones (37) is a figurative statement of this regathering of the nation. Then follows Israel's defeat of the Gentile powers, Gog and Magog (38,39). Finally a great restored temple is pictured (40-43), its holy services (44-46), the river of life running from it (47) and the people of Israel living in their places around the city called "The Lord is there" (48) to which the glory of the Lord has returned (43: 2,4,5; 44:4). EZEL (ē'zĕl, Heb. hā'āzel, departure), the stone near Saul's house which marked the final meeting place of David and Jonathan (I Sam. 20:19).

EZEM (ē'zĕm, in AV twice Azem, mighty), a town near Edom assigned to Simeon (Josh. 15:29; 19:3; I Chron. 4:29).

EZER (ē'zêr, Heb. 'ēzer, help). 1. One of the sons of Seir and a chief of the Horites (Gen. 36:21; I Chron. 1:38).

2. Descendant of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, and the father of Hushah (I Chron. 4:4).

3. An Ephraimite who was slain by men of Gath (I Chron. 7:21).

4. The first of the Gadite men of might who joined David in Ziglag when he was a fugitive from Saul (I Chron. 12:9).

5. The son of Jeshua, ruler of Mizpah. Under Nehemiah, Ezer repaired a section of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:19).

6. One of the Levitical singers who participated in the dedication of the rebuilt walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 12:42).

EZION-GEBER (ē'zī-ŏn-gē'bêr, Heb. 'etsyôn gever), a city near Elath on the Gulf of Aqabah. It was the last stopping place of the Israelites in their wilderness wanderings before Kadesh (Num. 33:35,36). The city's period of greatest prosperity was in the time of Solomon, who there built a fleet of ships which sailed between Ezion-Geber and Ophir, a source of gold (I Kings 9:26ff; II Chron. 8:17,18). Jehoshaphat joined with Ahaziah in making ships at Ezion-Geber which were designed to sail to Ophir, but the fleet was destroyed before leaving port (II Chron. 20:35,36; I Kings 22:48, 49). The site of Ezion-Geber has been located at Tell Kheleifeh, and extensive excavations have been carried on under the direction of Nelson Glueck. The city was located between the hills of Edom on the E and the hills of Palestine on the W, where N winds blow strongly and steadily down the center of the Wadi el-Arabah. The location was chosen to take advantage of these winds, for the city was an industrial center as well as a seaport. The excavation uncovered an extensive industrial complex centered on the smelting and refining of copper (chiefly) and iron. The furnace rooms were so placed that they received the full benefit of the prevailing winds from the N which were used to furnish the draft for the fires. Nearby mines were worked extensively in Solomon's day to supply the ore for these smelters. These operations were an important source of Solomon's wealth. B.P.

EZNITE (ĕz'nīt, Heb. 'etsnî), designation of Adino, one of David's chief captains (II Sam. 23:8). The parallel passage (I Chron. 11:11) speaks of Jashobeam, a Hachmonite, who "lifted up his spear." It has been conjectured that the words of II Samuel "the same [was] Adino the Eznite" are a corruption for the Heb. "he lifted up his spear."

EZRA (ĕz'rà, Heb. 'ezrā', help). 1. A man of Judah, mentioned in I Chronicles 4:17.

2. A leading priest who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1). In Nehemiah 10:2 the name is spelled in its full form, Azariah.

3. The famous Jewish priest and scribe who is the main character of the Book of Ezra and the co-worker of Nehemiah.

Ezra was a lineal descendant from Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the high priest, and from Seraiah, the chief priest put to death at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar (II Kings 25:18-21). All that is really known of Ezra is what is told in Ezra 7-10 and Nehemiah 8-10. There are various traditions about him in Josephus, II Esdras, and the Talmud, but they are discrepant, and consequently no reliance can be put on anything they say unless it is also found in the canonical Scriptures.

In the seventh year of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (458 B.C.), Ezra received permission from the king to return to Jerusalem to carry out a religious reform. Following the return from the Babylonian captivity, the temple had been rebuilt in 516 B.C., in spite of much powerful and vexatious opposition from the Samaritans; but after a brief period of religious zeal, the nation drifted into apostasy once more. Many of the Jews intermarried with their heathen neighbors (Mal. 2:11); the temple services and sacrifices were neglected (Mal. 1:6-14) and oppression and immorality were prevalent (Mal. 3:5). Just how Ezra acquired his influence over the king does not appear, but he received a royal edict granting him authority to carry out his purpose. He was given permission to take with him as many Israelites as cared to go; he was authorized to take from the king and the Jews offerings made for the temple; to draw upon the royal treasury in Syria for further necessary supplies; to purchase animals for sacrifice; to exempt the priests, Levites, and other workers in the temple from the Persian tax; to appoint magistrates in Judaea to enforce the law of God, with power of life and death over all offenders. Eighteen hundred Jews left Babylon with him. Nine days later, they halted at a place called Ahava, and when it was found that no Levites were in the caravan, 38 were persuaded to join them. After fasting and praying three days for a safe journey, they set out. Four months later they reached the Holy City, having made a journey of 900 miles. The treasures were delivered into the custody of the Levites, burnt-offerings were offered to the Lord, the king's commissions were handed to the governors and viceroys, and help was given to the people and the ministers of the temple.

When he had discharged the various trusts committed to him, Ezra entered on his great work of reform. The princes of the Jews came to him with the complaint that the Jewish people generally, and also the priests and Levites, but especially the rulers and princes, had not kept themselves religiously separate from the heathen around them, and had even married heathen wives. On hearing this report, he evinced his horror and deep affliction of soul by rending his garment and tearing his hair. Those who still feared God and dreaded His wrath for the sin of the returned exiles gathered around him. At the evening sacrifice that day he made public prayer and confession of sin, entreating God that they might not lose His favor by reason of their awful guilt. The assembled congregation wept bitterly, and amid the general grief, Shechaniah, one of the company, came forward to propose a covenant to put away their foreign wives and children. A proclamation was issued that all Jews were to assemble in Jerusalem three days later, under pain of excommunication and forfeiture of goods. At the time appointed, the people assembled, trembling on account of their sin and promising obedience. They requested that, since the rain fell heavily (it was at the time of the winter rains in Palestine) and the number of transgressors was great, Ezra would appoint times for the guilty to come, accompanied by the judges and elders of each city, and have each case dealt with. A divorce court, consisting of Ezra and some others, was set up to attend to the matter; and after three months, in spite of some opposition, the work of the court was finished and the strange wives were put away.

The Book of Ezra ends with this important transaction, and nothing more is heard of Ezra till 13 years later, in the 20th year of Artaxerxes (446 B.C.), he appears again at Jerusalem, when Nehemiah, a Babylonian Jew and the favored cupbearer of Artaxerxes, returned to Jerusalem as governor of Palestine with the king's permission to repair the ruined walls of the city. It is uncertain whether Ezra remained in Jerusalem after he had effected the above-named reformation, or whether he had returned to the king of Persia and now came back with Nehemiah, or perhaps shortly after the arrival of the latter. Since he is not mentioned in Nehemiah's narrative till after the completion of the wall (Neh. 8:1), it is probable that Nehemiah sent for him to aid in his work. Under Nehemiah's government his functions were entirely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character. He read and interpreted the law of Moses before the assembled congregation during the eight days of the feast of Tabernacles, assisted at the dedication of the wall, and helped Nehemiah in bringing about a religious reformation. In all this he took a chief place. His name is repeatedly coupled with Nehemiah's, while the high priest is not mentioned as taking any part in the reformation at all. Ezra is not again mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon. It may be that he had himself returned to Babylon before that year.

Evidence points to Ezra's ministry taking place during the reign of Artaxerxes I (465-424 B.C.); but there are some modern critics who put Ezra after Nehemiah, holding that the sections dealing with them in the two books that bear their names have been transposed and that the chronicler (the supposed author of the two books and of I and II Chronicles) blundered in the few passages which associate the two.

According to Jewish tradition, Ezra is the author of the Book of Ezra and of I and II Chronicles. Many modern scholars hold that he wrote the Book of Nehemiah as well. I Esdras, a part of the OT Apocrypha, reproduces the substance of the end of II Chronicles, the whole of Ezra, and a part of Nehemiah, and was written somewhere near the beginning of the first century, A.D. There is also an apocalyptic book known as II Esdras, written about 100 A.D., describing some visions granted to Ezra in the Babylonian exile.

Ezra made a lasting impression upon the Jewish people. His influence shaped Jewish life and thought in a way from which they never altogether departed. S.B.

EZRA, BOOK OF, so named because Ezra is the principal person mentioned in it; possibly also because he may be its author. It does not in its entirety claim to be the work of Ezra, but Jewish tradition says it is by him. Supporting this view is the fact that chs. 7-10 are written in the first person singular, while events in which he did not take part are described in the third person. The trustworthiness of the book does not, however, depend on the hypothesis that Ezra is the author. The majority of modern critics believe that the two books of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah constitute one large work, compiled and edited by someone designated the Chronicler, who has been dated from 400 to 300 B.C. Ezra's ministry is to be placed during the reign of Artaxerxes I (465-424 B.C.).

The Book of Ezra continues the narrative after Chronicles, and tells the story of the return from Babylon and the rebuilding of the temple. The purpose of the author is to show how God fulfilled His promise given through prophets to restore His exiled people to their own land through heathen monarchs, and raised up such great men as Zerubbabel, Haggai, Zechariah, and Ezra to rebuild the temple, re-establish the old forms of worship, and put a stop to compromise with heathenism. All material which does not contribute to his purpose he stringently excludes.

As sources for the writing of the book, the author used genealogical lists, letters, royal edicts, memoirs, and chronicles. Some of these were official documents found in public records. This diversity of material accounts for the varied character of the style and for the fact that it is written in both Hebrew and Aramaic.

The order of the Persians kings of the period is Cyrus (538-529 B.C.), Darius (521-486), Xerxes (486-464), and Artaxerxes I (464-424). In view of this succession, 4:7-23 departs from the chronological order of events. The reason for this is probably that the author regarded a sequence of content more important than a chronological order. He brings together in one passage the successful attempts of the Samaritans to hinder the building of the temple and the city walls.

The period covered is from 536 B.C., when the Jews returned to Jerusalem, to 458 B.C., when Ezra came to Jerusalem to carry out his religious reforms. It thus covers a period of about 78 years, although the 15 years between 535 and 520 and the 58 years between 516 and 458 are practically a blank; so that we have a description of selected incidents, and not a continuous record of the period.

For an understanding and appreciation of the book a few historical facts must be kept in mind. There is an interval of 50 years between the last events in the previous historical writings and the events of Ezra. Both Kings and Chronicles close with the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the deportation of many of its inhabitants into Babylonia. There they were settled in colonies, and were not mistreated as long as they were quiet subjects. Many of them prospered so well that when, later, they had an opportunity to return to their home land, they chose not to do so. Since the temple was destroyed, they could not carry on their sacrificial system; but they continued such religious ordinances as the sabbath and circumcision, and gave great attention to the study of the Law.

The Exile was brought to a close when the Babylonian Empire fell before Cyrus, king of Persia, in 538 B.C. The way in which the expectations of the Jews respecting Cyrus were fulfilled is told in the opening narrative of the book of Ezra. The return from exile did not bring with it political freedom for the Jews. They remained subjects of the Persian Empire. Jerusalem and the surrounding districts were under the control of a governor, who sometimes was a Jew, but usually was not. Persian rule was in general not oppressive; but tribute was exacted for the royal treasury and the local governor. The hostile population surrounding them, especially the Samaritans, did all they could to make life miserable for them, especially by trying to bring them into disfavor with the Persian authorities. There were a few differences in the religious life of the Jews before and after the Exile. Idolatry no longer tempted them—and never did again. The external features distinctive of Jewish worship and the ceremonial requirements of the Laws were stressed. Prophecy became less important, scribes gradually taking the place of the prophets.

The Book of Ezra consists of two parts. The first (chs. 1-6) is a narrative of the return of the Jews from Babylonia under Zerubbabel and the restoration of worship in the rebuilt temple; while the second (7-10), tells the story of a second group of exiles returning with Ezra, and of Ezra's religious reforms. F

FABLE, usually defined as a narrative in which animals and inanimate objects of nature are made to act and speak as if they were human beings. The word "fable" is not found in the OT, but the OT has two fables: Judges 9:7-15 and II Kings 14:9. In the NT "fable" is found as the translation of múthos ("myth") in I Timothy 1:4; 4:7; II Timothy 4:4; Titus 1:14; II Peter 1:16. In II Peter 1:16 it has the general meaning of fiction, that is, a story having no connection with reality. The exact nature of the fables referred to in the pastoral epistles is beyond our knowledge, but they may have to do with some form of Jewish-Gnostic speculation.

FACE, in the OT, the translation of three Hebrew words: 1. 'ayin, eye; 2. 'aph, nose; 3. pānîm, face; and in the NT, of the Greek prósopon, face. The word is used literally, figuratively and idiomatically. Often "my face" is nothing more than an oriental idiomatic way of saying "I." Sometimes it means presence, and sometimes favor. The averted face was the equivalent of disapproval or rejection (Ps. 13:1; 27:9). To spit in the face was an expression of contempt and aversion (Num. 12:14). To harden the face means to harden one's self against any sort of appeal (Prov. 21:29). To have the face covered by another was a sign of doom (Esth. 7:8). Falling on the face symbolized prostration before man or God (Gen. 50:18). Setting the face signified determination (Luke 9:51). To cover the face expressed mourning (Exod. 3:6).

FAIR, a word translating more than a dozen Hebrew and Greek words, none of which have the modern sense of blond or fair-skinned. It has the meaning of beautiful, attractive (Acts 7:20); unspotted, free of defilement (Zech. 3:5); plausible, persuasive (Prov. 7:21); making a fine display (Gal. 6:12); good (of weather) (Job 37:22).

FAIR HAVENS (Gr. Kaloí Liménes), a small bay on the S coast of Crete, about 5 miles E of Cape Matala. Paul stayed there for a time on his way to Rome (Acts 27:8-12). The harbor was not suitable to spend the winter in, so it was decided to sail from there, with the hope of reaching Phoenix, a more secure harbor, also on the S coast of Crete.

FAIRS (Heb. 'izzāvôn), a word found in KJV only in Ezekiel (27:12,14,16,19,27). The RV more accurately renders it "wares," the commodities bartered in Oriental markets. The KJV so translates the Hebrew word in Ezekiel 5:33.

FAITH (Heb. 'ēmûn, Gr. pístis), has a twofold sense in the Bible, an active and a passive one; in the former, meaning "fidelity," "trustworthiness"; in the latter, "trust," "reliance." An example of the first is found in Romans 3:3, where "the faith of God" means His fidelity to promise. In the overwhelming majority of cases it has the meaning of reliance and trust.

In the OT (KJV) the word "faith" occurs only twice (Deut. 32:20; Hab. 2:4), and even the verb form, "to believe," is far from common, appearing less than 30 times. What we find in the OT is not so much a doctrine of faith, as examples of it. It sets forth the life of the servants of God as a life of faith. That which differentiates their lives from others is their self-commitment to God, implicitly involving unwavering trust in and obedience to Him. The foundation of Israel's faith was the revelation that God had made to the fathers and to Moses, the covenant He had made with them at Sinai, and the conviction that the covenant promises would some day be fulfilled. The observance of the Law and a life of faith were not for them incompatible. Faith lay behind the keeping of the Law as its presupposition. The Law was a mode of life incumbent upon those whose trust was in Jehovah. OT faith is never mere assent to a set of doctrines or outward acceptance of the Law, but utter confidence in the faithfulness of God and a consequent loving obedience to His will.

When used with a religious application, faith, in the OT, is sometimes in a specific word or work of God (Lam. 4:12; Hab. 1:5), or the fact of God's revelation (Exod. 4:5; Job 9:16), or the words or commandments of God in general (Ps. 119:66); or in God Himself (Gen. 15:6). Faith is put in the word of God's prophets because they speak for Him, and He is absolutely trustworthy (Exod. 19:9; II Chron. 20:20). NT writers, especially Paul and the author of Hebrews, show that the faith manifested by OT saints was not different in kind from that expected of Christians.

In contrast with the extreme rarity with which the terms "faith" and "believe" are used in the OT, they occur with great frequency in the NT — almost 500 times. A principal reason for this is that the NT makes the claim that the promised Messiah had finally come, and, to the bewilderment of many, the form of the fulfilment did not obviously correspond to the Messianic promise. It required a real act of faith to believe that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah. It was not long before "to believe" meant to become a Christian. In the NT, faith therefore becomes supreme of all human acts and experiences.

In His miracles and teaching Jesus aimed at creating in His disciples a complete trust in Himself as the Messiah and Saviour of men. Everywhere He offered Himself as the object of faith, and made it plain that faith in Him is necessary for eternal life, that it is the certain outcome of faith in the OT Scriptures that God requires it of men, and that refusal to accept His claims will bring eternal ruin. His primary concern with His own disciples was to build up their faith in Him.

The record in Acts shows that the first Christians called themselves "the believers" (Acts 2:44, etc.) and that they went everywhere persuading men and bringing them unto obedience to the faith that is in Jesus (Acts 6:7; 17:4; 28:24). Before long, as communities of believers arose in various parts of the Mediterranean world, the meaning and implications of the Christian faith had to be taught them in considerable fullness by the apostolic leaders, and so the NT books appeared.

It is in Paul's epistles that the meaning of faith is most clearly and fully set forth. Faith is trust in the person of Jesus, the truth of His teaching, and the redemptive work He accomplished at Calvary, and, as a result, a total submission to Him and His message, which are accepted as from God. Faith in His person is faith in Him as the eternal Son of God, the God-man, the second man Adam, who died in man's stead, making possible justification with God, adoption into His family, sanctification, and, ultimately, glorification. His death brings redemption from sin in all its aspects. The truth of His claims is attested by God's raising Him from the dead. Some day He will judge the quick and the dead. Faith is not to be confused with a mere intellectual assent to the doctrinal teachings of Christianity, though that is obviously necessary. It includes a radical and total commitment to Him as the Lord of one's life.

Unbelief, or lack of faith in the Christian Gospel, appears everywhere in the NT as the supreme evil. Not to make a decisive response to God's offer in Christ means that the individual remains in his sin and is eternally lost. Faith alone can save Him. S.B.

FAITHFULNESS (Heb. ĕmûnâh), an attribute or quality applied in the Bible to both God and man. When used of God, it has in the OT a twofold emphasis, referring first to His absolute reliability, firm constancy, and complete freedom from arbitrariness or fickleness, and also to His steadfast, loyal love toward His people and His loyalty. God is constant and true in contrast to all that is not God. He is faithful in keeping His promises, and is therefore worthy of trust. He is unchangeable in His ethical nature. God's faithfulness is usually connected with His gracious promises of salvation. Faithful men are dependable in fulfilling their responsibilities and in carrying out their word. In the NT there are frequent exhortations to faithfulness. It is one of the fruits of the Spirit in Galatians 5:22.

FALCON (See Birds)

FALL, THE. The fall of man is narrated in Genesis 3 as a historical fact, not as a myth. It stands in a context of historical facts. Though not alluded to again in the OT, it is regarded as historical in the Apocrypha (Wis. 2:24) and in the NT (Rom. 5:12 f.; I Cor. 15:22). Some philosophers and theologians think the story is an allegory describing the awakening of man from a brute state of self-consciousness and personality — a fall upward, rather than downward, but such an explanation conflicts radically with Biblical teaching. There is no doubt that Paul takes the story literally and sees in the fall the origin of sin in the human race. The Scriptural view of sin and of redemption takes the fall for granted.

A denial of the fall requires that sin be made a necessity, with its origin in the Creation or in the Creator, and thus sin loses its character as sin; it becomes everlasting and indefeasible. If there has been no fall into sin, no redemption from sin is possible. Sin, moreover, becomes an inexterminable trait of man's nature. The Scriptures, however, teach us that man was created in God's own image, with a rational and moral nature like God's, with no inner impulse or drive to sin, and with a will perfectly free to do His will. There was nothing, moreover, in his environment to compel him to sin or to make sin excusable. God made him responsive to His call of love, and responsible for maintaining that responsivity. There was, indeed, outward solicitation to sin, on the part of the serpent, but there was no need to yield to the temptation.

The question Adam faced was whether ultimate happiness and fulfilment for him lay in theonomy or in autonomy, in the doing of God's will in love or in conducting his life in the way he chose, apart from the will of God.

The effect of the fall, as the rest of the Bible explicitly and implicitly brings out, was not merely immediate alienation from God for Adam and Eve, but guilt and depravity for all their posterity and the cursing of the earth.

Redemption from the effects of the fall is accomplished through the second man Adam, Jesus Christ (Rom. 5:12-21; I Cor. 15:21,22, 45-49). S.B.

FALLOW DEER. (See Animals)

FALLOW GROUND (Heb. nîr, untilled), twice found in the OT (Jer. 4:3; Hos. 10:12), is used in the sense of untilled ground.

FALSE CHRISTS (Gr. pseudó-christoi, false Christs). On Tuesday of Passion Week, Jesus warned His disciples that false Christs and false prophets would arise and that they would with great signs and wonders try to lead astray even the elect (Matt. 24:5,11, 23:25; Mark 13:6,21-23; Luke 21:8).

FALSE PROPHET, THE, is referred to only in the book of Revelation (16:13; 19:20; 20:10), but is usually identified with the two-horned beast of Revelation 13:11-18, who deceived the peoples of the earth with his lying wonders and killed those who refused to worship the image of the seven-headed beast (Rev. 13:1-10). The two beasts are clearly tools and instruments of Satan. In some way, the two-horned beast is a minister of the seven-headed one. In Revelation 16:13 we are told that three unclean spirits like frogs came out of the mouths of the dragon, beast, and false prophet. In Revelation 19:20 the beast (apparently the one with seven heads) and the false prophet, who is described as having performed deceiving miracles and killed those who refused to worship the image of the beast, are cast into a lake burning with brimstone. The devil is cast into that same lake of fire where the beast and the false prophet are (Rev. 20:10). Christian opinion is divided upon the interpretation of the two-horned beast. S.B.

FAMILIAR SPIRIT (Heb. 'ôv, etymology and exact meaning unknown). The term is generally used to refer to the spirit of a dead person which professed mediums claimed they could summon for consultation (Deut. 18:11). The word "familiar" has in this phrase the sense of the Latin familiaris, belonging to one's family, and hence ready to serve one as a servant. Such a spirit was thought to be able to reveal the future (Isa. 8:19; I Sam. 28:7). Since the voice seemed to come in a whisper from the ground, the medium was very likely a ventriloquist. Israelites were forbidden by Jehovah to consult familiar spirits (Lev. 19:31; Isa. 8:19). This was regarded as apostasy so serious that those who consulted them were put to death (Lev. 20:6). Saul put away mediums early in his reign, but consulted the witch of Endor, who "had a familiar spirit," when he became apostate just before his death (I Sam. 28:3-25; I Chron. 10:13). Manasseh dealt with familiar spirits (II Kings 21:6; II Chron. 33:6), but his grandson Josiah carried out the enactment of the Mosaic Law against them (II Kings 23:24). The practice of consulting them probably prevailed more or less to the time of the exile (Isa. 8:19; 19:3). S.B.

FAMILY (Heb. mishpahah, bayith, house, family; Gr. patriá, clan). The OT has no term corresponding exactly to the English "family." The Hebrew family unit was larger than families today, and included some or all of the following: the father or master, the supreme head of the household; his mother, if she was living with him after the death of his father; his wives and concubines and their children; his children by other women; daughters-in-law and sons-in-law living on the paternal estate; other free Israelite friends and relatives; foreigners living under his protection; and male and female slaves. Since in primitive times the family assumed many of the responsibilities of modern government, like protection of life and property, large families were necessary.

Marriage was arranged not by the young people involved, but by the man (or his father) and the family of the bride, for whom a dowry, or purchase money, was paid to her father. In spite of this commercial aspect of the marriage contract, there is evidence that the love of the young people for each other often had an important part in the preliminaries of the marriage (Gen. 29; I Sam. 18:20). The wife was regarded as the property of the husband. He could divorce her, but she could not divorce him. Not only were polygamy and concubinage permitted, but no disgrace was attached to them. Wives, however, usually enjoyed more consideration than concubines.

Within his own domain, the authority of the head of the family was almost absolute. He could sell his children as slaves, and had power of life and death over them (Lev. 18:21; 20:2-5; II Kings 23:10). To dishonor a parent was a crime punishable with death (Exod. 21:15,17). He was also the chief religious functionary of the house, offering sacrifices to Jehovah on behalf of his family. Upon him rested the responsibility of training them in the ancient traditions.

While a wife was bought and paid for, her actual position was usually far from being a mere chattel. Her own family stood ready to avenge her in case she was mistreated by her husband. She had the chief place in the sub-family formed by her and her children in a polygamous household. The early training of the children was given mostly by her.

A large family was regarded as a great blessing. To be without children was a disgrace.

In the NT, Paul has much to say about family life. He stresses the need of bringing all family relationships under the principle of Christian love.

S.B.

FAMINE (Heb. rā'āv, hunger, famine, Gr. limós, want of food). In ancient times, in Palestine and Egypt, famines were not infrequent. They were produced by (1) want of rainfall in due season, (2) destructive hail storms and rain out of season, (3) destruction of crops by locusts and caterpillars, and (4) the cutting off of food supplies by a siege. Pestilence often followed, and the suffering was great. Famines which were the result of natural causes are recorded in the time of Abraham, who left Canaan and sojourned in Egypt (Gen. 12:10); in the time of Joseph, when the famine "was over all the face of the earth" (Gen. 41:56); in the time of the Judges (Ruth 1:1), of David, for three years (II Sam. 21:1), of Ahab and Elijah (I Kings 17:1; 18:2, and of Elisha (II Kings 4:38). Famines produced by sieges are mentioned in II Kings 6:25 — the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Nehemiah 5:3 tells of a "dearth" after the return from the Babylonian Captivity. The NT tells of a famine "throughout all the world" in the time of Claudius (Acts 11:28). In His Olivet discourse Jesus predicted famines in various places (Matt. 24:7), a prophecy believed to be partly fulfilled in the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, which is described with harrowing detail by Josephus, who says that "neither did any other city ever suffer such miseries" (Wars, V.x.5). Famines are sometimes said to be sent as punishments, and sometimes they are threatened as such (Lev. 26:19 f; Deut. 28: 49-51; II Kings 8:1; Isa. 14:30; 51:19; Jer. 14:12, 15; Ezek. 5:16). A special mark of God's favor and power is to be preserved in time of famine (Job 5:20; Ps. 33:19; 37:19). Sometimes the word "famine" is used in a figurative sense, as when Amos says that God will send a famine, not of bread and water, "but of hearing the words of the Lord" (Amos 8:11).

S.B.

FAN (Heb. mizreh, winnowing fan), a fork with two or more prongs used to throw grain into the air after it had been threshed, so that the chaff might be blown away. The work was done toward evening and at night when a wind came in from the sea and carried away the light chaff. Sometimes a shovel was used for the same purpose.

FARMING. The Israelites in the time of the patriarchs were a nomadic people. They first learned agriculture in Palestine, after the conquest of Canaan. After that a large proportion of the people were engaged in agrarian pursuits. The pages of the Bible have much to say about agricultural occupations.

Agriculture was the background for all the legislation of Israel. At the time of the conquest every family probably received a piece of land, marked off by stones that could not be removed lawfully (Deut. 19:14; 27:17; Hos. 5:10). The soil of Palestine was generally fertile. Fertilizing was almost unknown. To maintain the fertility of the land, the law required that farms, vineyards, and olive orchards were to lie fallow in the seventh year (Exod. 23:10). On the year of jubilee those who had lost their ancestral estates recovered possession of them. Terracing was necessary to make use of soil on the hillsides. Irrigation was not required, since there was usually sufficient rainfall.

Plowing to prepare the land for sowing was done in autumn, when the early rains softened the ground that had become stone-hard in the summer sun. This was done with a crude wooden plough drawn by oxen; or, if the soil was thin, with a mattock. With such implements the surface of the ground was hardly more than scratched — perhaps three or four inches. Little harrowing was done, and was probably unknown in Palestine in early times.

The summer grain was sown between the end of January and the end of February. Usually the seed was scattered broadcast from a basket, but careful farmers put it in furrows in rows (Isa. 28:25). Between sowing and reaping the crops were exposed to several dangers: the failure of the latter rain, which came in March and April; the hot, drying easterly winds that often came in March and April (Gen. 41:6); hailstorms (Hag. 2:17); various kinds of pestiferous weeds like tares and thorns (Jer. 12:13; Matt. 13:7, 25); injurious insects, especially the palmer-worm, the canker-worm, the caterpillar, and the locust (Amos 7:2); the thefts of crows and sparrows (Matt. 13:4); and fungus diseases, especially mildew (Deut. 28:22). As the harvest season approached, particularly valuable crops were protected by watchmen (Jer. 4:17); but the law permitted a hungry person to pick grain in passing by (Deut. 23:25; Matt. 12:1).

The time of harvest varied somewhat according to the climatic condition of each region, but usually began about the middle of April with the coming of the dry season. Barley was the first grain to be cut, and this was followed a few weeks later with wheat. The grain harvest generally lasted about seven weeks, from Passover to Pentecost. Whole families moved out of their village homes to live in the fields until the harvest was over. The grain was cut with a sickle and laid in swaths behind the reaper. It was then bound into sheaves and gathered into shocks (Exod. 22:6). In the interests of the poor, the law forbade a field to be harvested to its limits.

The grain was threshed in the open air, a custom made possible because the harvest season was free from rain (I Sam. 21:16 ff.). During the threshing-time the grain was guarded by harvesters who spent the nights upon the threshing floor (Ruth 3:6). The threshing floor was constructed in an exposed position in the fields, preferably on a slight elevation, so as to get the full benefit of the winds. It consisted of a circular area 25 or 40 feet in diameter, sloping slightly upward at the edges, and was usually surrounded with a border of stones so as to keep in the grain. The floor was level and rolled hard. The sheaves of grain, brought in from the fields on the backs of men and animals, were heaped in the center. From this heap, sheaves were spread out on the floor, and then either several animals tied abreast were driven round and round the floor, or two oxen were yoked together to a threshing-machine, which they dragged in a circular path over the grain until the kernels of grain were separated from the stalks. The threshing machines were of two kinds, a board with the bottom studded with small stones or nails, or a kind of threshing wagon. While this was going on, the partly threshed grain was turned over with a fork. After that the grain was winnowed by tossing the grain and chaff into the air with a wooden fork or shovel so that the wind might blow away the chaff. This was usually done at night, to take advantage of the night breezes. The chaff was either burned or left to be scattered by the winds. The grain was then sifted with a sieve to remove stones and other impurities, and collected into pits or barns (Luke 12:18).

Of the large number of crops the Israelites cultivated, wheat and barley were the most important. Among other crops they raised were rye, millet, flax, and a variety of vegetables. See also AGRICULTURE.

FARTHING (See Money)

FASTING (Heb. tsûm, Gr. nesteía, néstis), meaning abstinence from food and drink for a longer or shorter period, is frequently mentioned in the Scriptures. Sometimes, instead of the single word "fast" the descriptive phrase "to afflict the soul" is used, the reference being to physical fasting rather than to spiritual humiliation. This term is used in various parts of the OT, but is the only one used to denote the religious observance of fasting in the Pentateuch (Lev. 16:29-31; 23:27; Num. 30:13; Ps. 35:13; Isa. 58:3,5,10).

The only fast required by Moses was that of the Day of Atonement. Before the Babylonian Captivity it was the one regular fast (Lev. 16:29,31; 23:27-32; Num. 29:7; Jer. 36:6). During this period there are many examples of fasts on special occasions, held because of transgression or to ward off present or impending calamity. Samuel called for such a fast (I Sam. 7:6); Jehoiakim and the princess proclaimed a fast after Baruch had read the condemnatory word of the Lord given through Jeremiah (Jer. 36:9); Jezebel hypocritically enjoined a fast when she sought to secure Naboth's vineyard (I Kings 21:9,12). We read of individuals who were moved to fast — for example, David, when his child became ill (II Sam. 12:16, 21-23), and Ahab on hearing his doom (I Kings 21:27).

After the Captivity four annual fasts were held in memory of the national calamities through which the nation had passed. They are mentioned only in Zechariah 7:1-7; 8:19). These fasts, established during the Captivity, were held on the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months. The Mishna (Taarith, iv,6) and St. Jerome (in Zachariam, viii) give information on the historical events which these fasts were intended to commemorate. By the time of Christ they had fallen into disuse, and were not revived until after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. In Rabbinic times the Feast of Purim, the origin of which is explained in Esther (9:31,32), was accompanied by a fast in commemoration of the fast of Esther, Mordecai and the Jews (Esther 4:1-3, 15-17). The OT gives a number of instances of other fasts in which the whole people joined (Ezra 8:21-23; Neh. 9:1). Examples of fasts by individuals are given in Nehemiah 1:4 and Daniel 9:3. A fast of great strictness was proclaimed by the heathen king of Nineveh to avert the destruction threatened by Jehovah through Jonah (Jonah 3:5).

Fasting among the Israelites was either partial or total, depending upon the length of the fast. When Daniel mourned three full weeks, he ate no "pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in his mouth" (Dan. 10:2,3). The fast on the Day of Atonement was "from even till even" (Lev. 23:32); and no food or drink was taken. Other day-long fasts were from morning till evening. Longer fasts are mentioned in Nehemiah 1:4 and Daniel 10:2,3. The fasts of Moses and Elijah for forty days were exceptional (Exod. 34:28; I Kings 19:8).

Religious fasting was observed as a sign of mourning for sin, with the object of deprecating divine wrath or winning divine compassion. The prophets often condemn the abuse of the custom, for Israelites superstitiously thought that it had value even when dissevered from purity and righteousness of life (Isa. 58:3-7; Jer. 14:10-12; Zech. 7,8). Fasts were not necessarily religious in nature. They were commonplace when someone near and dear died, as when the inhabitants of Jabesh fasted after they had buried Saul and Jonathan (I Sam. 31:13), and after the death of Abner (II Sam. 1:12).

There are few references to fasting in the Gospels, but what is said shows that frequent fasts were customary with those Jews who desired to lead a specially religious life. We are told that Anna "served God with fastings and prayers night and day" (Luke 2:37). Again, the Pharisee in the parable says, "I fast twice in the week" (Luke 18:12). Jesus fasted for forty days in the wilderness, but it is not clear whether this fast was voluntary or not. There is no reason to doubt that He observed the usual prescribed public fasts, but neither by practice nor by precept did He stress fasting. He was so unascetic in His ordinary mode of life that He was reproached with being "a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber" (Matt. 11:19; Luke 7:34). In all His teaching He spoke of fasting only twice. The passages are as follows:

Matthew 6:16-18. In this passage voluntary fasting is presupposed as a religious exercise, but Jesus warns against making it an occasion for a parade of piety. The important thing is purity and honesty of intention. Fasting should be to God, not to impress men. Jesus approves of fasting if it is an expression of inner contrition and devotion. The externalism of the Pharisees has its own reward.

Matthew 9:14-17; Mark 2:18-22; Luke 5:33-39. Here, the disciples of John and of the Pharisees ask Jesus, "Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not?" Jesus replies that fasting, which is a sign of mourning, would be inconsistent with the joy which should characterize those who know that the Messiah has finally come and is now with them. The time will come, however, when He will be taken away, and then His disciples will mourn. It is obvious that the reference to His being taken away is to His crucifixion, not His ascension, for the ascension, signifying the completion of His redemptive work, is no occasion for mourning. Jesus here sanctions fasting, as He does in the Sermon on the Mount; but He refuses to enjoin it on His disciples. In the parables of the Old Wineskins and the Old Garment He shows that fasting belongs to the body of old observances and customs and is not congruous with the liberty of the Gospel. The new era that He inaugurates must have new forms of its own.

The references to fasting in Matthew 17:21 and Mark 9:29 are regarded by textual scholars as corruptions of the text.

The Acts of the Apostles has a few direct references to fasting. The church at Antioch fasted and prayed before sending out Paul and Barnabas as missionaries (Acts 13:2,3). On Paul's first missionary journey, elders were appointed in every church, with prayer and fasting (Acts 14:23). The reference to the fasting of Cornelius, in Acts 10:30, is an interpolation. The only other direct references to fasting in the NT are found in II Corinthians 6:5 and 11:27, where Paul describes his sufferings for Christ; and here, most likely, he has in mind involuntary fasting.

There are, therefore, in the NT only four indisputable references to voluntary fasting for religious purposes, two by our Lord in the Gospels, and two in the Acts of the Apostles. Jesus does not disapprove of the practice, but says nothing to commend it. The apostolic church practiced it, but perhaps only as a carry-over from Judaism, since most of the early disciples were Jews.

FAT (Heb. hēlev, helev). 1. The subcutaneous layer of fat around the kidneys and other viscera, which, like the blood, was forbidden by the Mosaic law to be used for food, but was burned as an offering to Jehovah, for a sweet savor unto Him (Lev. 4:31). This had to be done on the very day the animal was slain, apparently to remove temptation (Exod. 23:18). The purpose of the law was to teach the Israelite that his best belonged to God. Long before the Mosaic law was given, Abel brought the fat of the firstlings of his flock to Jehovah; and we read that the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering. (Gen. 4:4).

2. Sometimes used in the KJV to refer to a wine vat, a receptable into which the grape juice flowed from the "press" above (Joel 2:24; Isa. 63:2).

FATHER (Heb. 'āv, Gr. patér), has various meanings in the Bible. 1. Immediate male progenitor (Gen. 42:13). In the Hebrew family the father had absolute rights over his children. He could sell them into slavery and have them put to death. Reverence and obedience by children is prescribed from the earliest times (Exod. 20:12; Lev. 19:3; Deut. 5:16, etc.). The Scriptures many times set forth the character and duties of an ideal father.

2. Ancestor, immediate or remote. Abraham is called Jacob's father (Gen. 28:13), and God tells him he will be the "father of many nations" (Gen. 17:4). The founders of the Hebrew race, the patriarchs, are referred to as its fathers (Rom. 9:5); so also heads of clans (Exod. 6:14; I Chron. 27:1).

3. The word has many figurative and derived uses. A spiritual ancestor, whether good or bad, as Abraham, "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. 4:11); and the devil, "Ye are of your father the devil" (John 8:44). The originator of a mode of life ("Jabal: he was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle" (Gen. 4:20). One who exhibits paternal kindness and wisdom to another: "be unto me a father and a priest" (Judg. 17:10). A revered superior, especially a prophet and an elderly and venerable man (I Sam. 10:12; I John 2:13). Royal advisors and prime ministers: "God hath made me a father to Pharaoh" (Gen. 45:8). Early Christians who have died: "since the fathers fell asleep" (II Peter 3:4). A source: "Hath the rain a father?" (Job 38:28).

4. God is Father: as Creator of the universe, "the Father of lights" (James 1:17); as Creator of the human race, "Have we not all one father? hath not one God created us?" (Mal. 2:10); as one who begets and takes care of his spiritual children, "Ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15). In a special and unique sense, God is the Father of Jesus Christ (Matt. 11:26; Mark 14:36; Luke 22:42). S.B.

FATHOM (See Weights and Measures)

FATLING. One of the clean animals (calf, lamb, kid, etc.) fattened for offering to God. See Psalm 66:15, II Samuel 6:13, etc.

FEAR (Heb. yir'âh, Gr. phóbos). This word in English has two principal meanings: first, that apprehension of evil which normally leads one either to flee or to fight; and second, that awe and reverence which a man of sense feels in the presence of God, and to a less extent in the presence of a king or other dread authority. A child feels the first of these in the presence of a cruel parent, and the second before one who is good, but who must also be just. There are 15 different Hebrew nouns which are rendered "fear" in KJV, but in the NT the Greek phóbos is used in both senses; i.g., in Matthew 14:26 the disciples cried out for fear, thinking that they saw a ghost; whereas in Romans 3:18, "There is no fear of God before their eyes," the second meaning is implied. The word "reverend" which occurs only in Psalm 111:9 means literally "to be feared," and is used only for God. For the two senses in the OT, contrast Psalm 31:13, "fear was upon every side," with Proverbs 9:10, "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." A.B.F.

FEASTS (Heb. mô'ēdh, an assembling; hagh, dance, or pilgrimage). The feasts, or sacred festivals, held an important place in Jewish religion. They were religious services accompanied by demonstrations of joy and gladness. In Leviticus 23, where they are described most fully, they are called "holy convocations." Their times, except for the two instituted after the exile, were fixed by divine appointment. Their purpose was to promote spiritual interests of the community. The people met in holy fellowship for acts and purposes of sacred worship. They met before God in holy assemblies.

1. The Feast of the Weekly Sabbath. This stood at the head of the sacred seasons. The holy convocations by which the sabbaths were distinguished were quite local. Families and other small groups assembled under the guidance of Levites or elders among them and engaged in some common acts of devotion, the forms and manner of which were not prescribed. Little is known of where or how the people met before the Captivity, but after it they met in synagogues and were led in worship by teachers learned in the law.

2. The Passover, or the Feast of Unleavened Bread. The Passover was the first in point or time of all the annual feasts, and historically and religiously it was the most important of all. It was called both the Feast of the Passover and the Feast of Unleavened Bread, the two really forming a double festival. It was celebrated on the first month of the religious year, on the 14th of Nisan (our April), and commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from Egypt and the establishment of Israel as a nation by God's redemptive act. The Feast of Unleavened Bread began on the day after the Passover and lasted seven days (Lev. 23:5-8). This combined feast was one of the three feasts the Mosaic Law enjoined to be attended by all male Jews who were physically able and ceremonially clean (Exod. 23:17; Deut. 16:16), the other two being the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles. These were known as the pilgrimage festivals; and on all of them special sacrifices were offered, varying according to the character of the festival (Num. 28,29).

3. The Feast of Pentecost. Other names for this are the Feast of Weeks, the Day of the Firstfruits, and the Feast of Harvests. It was celebrated on the sixth day of the month of Sivan (our June), seven weeks after the offering of the wave sheaf after the Passover. The name "Pentecost," meaning "50th," originated from the fact that there was an interval of 50 days between the two. The feast lasted a single day (Deut. 16:9-12), and marked the completion of the wheat harvest. The characteristic ritual of this feast was the offering and waving of two loaves of leavened bread, made from the ripe grain which had just been harvested. This was done by the priest in the name of the congregation. In addition to these wave offerings, the people were enjoined to give the Lord an offering of the first fruits of their produce. The amount of the offering was not designated.

4. The Feast of Trumpets, or New Moon. This was held on the first day of the seventh month, Tishri (our October), which began the civil year of the Jews. It corresponded to our New Year's day, and on it, from morning to evening, horns and trumpets were blown. After the exile the day was observed by the public reading of the Law and by general rejoicing.

5. The Feast of the Day of Atonement. This was observed on the 10th day of Tishri. It was really less a feast than a fast, as the distinctive character and purpose of the day was to bring the collective sin of the whole year to remembrance, so that it might earnestly be dealt with and atoned for. On this day the high priest made confession of all the sins of the community, and entered on their behalf into the most holy place with the blood of reconciliation. It was a solemn occasion, when God's people through godly sorrow and atonement for sin entered into the rest of God's mercy and favor, so that as the partakers of His forgiveness they might rejoice before Him and carry out His commandments.

6. The Feast of Tabernacles, or Booths, or Ingathering. This was the last of the sacred festivals under the old covenant, in pre-exilic times. It began five days after the day of atonement (Lev. 23:34; Deut. 16:13), and lasted seven days. It marked the completion of the harvest, and historically commemorated the wanderings in the wilderness. During this festival people lived in booths and tents in Jerusalem to remind themselves of how their forefathers wandered in the wilderness and lived in booths. The sacrifices of this feast were more numerous than at any other. The last day of the feast marked the conclusion of the ecclesiastical year. The whole feast was popular and joyous in nature.

Besides the above feasts, which were all pre-exilic and instituted by Jehovah, the Jews after the Captivity added two others, the Feast of Lights, or Dedication, and the Feast of Purim.

The Feast of Lights was observed for eight days beginning on the 25th day of Kislev (our December). It was instituted by Judas Maccabeus in 164

Shebet	(February)
Adar	(March)	14 – The Feast of Purim

B.C. when the Temple which had been defiled by Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, was cleansed and rededicated to the service of Jehovah. During these days the Israelites met in their synagogues, carrying branches of trees in their hands, and held jubilant services. The children were told the brave and stirring deeds of the Maccabees to rouse them to noble emulation.

The Feast of Purim was kept on the 14th and 15th days of Adar (our March), the last month of the religious year. It is said to have been instituted by Mordecai to commemorate the failure of Haman's plots against the Jews. The word Purim means "lots." On the evening of the 13th the whole book of Esther was read publicly in the synagogue. It was a joyous occasion. S.B.

FELIX fē'lĭks, Gr. Phélix, happy), born Antonius Claudius, a Greek subject, was made a freedman by Claudius, the emperor from A.D. 41 to 54, and given the surname Felix (i.e. Happy) probably in congratulation. He and his brother Pallas were favorites of Claudius and later of Nero (A.D. 54-68), and so Felix evidently thought that he could do as he pleased. Tacitus said of him that "he revelled in cruelty and lust, and wielded the power of a king with the mind of a slave." His very title of "procurator" hints at his fiscal duties of procuring funds for Rome, which he seems to have accomplished with all sorts of tyranny. He began his career as procurator of Judea by seducing Drusilla, the sister of Agrippa II, and wife of the king of Emesa (modern Homs), and marrying her. Because she was Jewish (at least on one side) he learned much of Jewish life and customs.

Felix appears in the Biblical account only in Acts 23:24 - 25:14. He was susceptible to flattery, as the speech of Tertullus shows, and also to conviction of sin, as is shown by his terror when Paul reasoned before him of "righteousness, temperance and judgment to come." His conviction faded; he procrastinated; and then held Paul for about two years (c. 58 - 60), hoping that Paul would buy his freedom. He was then replaced by Festus, a far better man.

FELLOES (fĕl'ōz), the exterior parts of the rim of a wheel which unite the outer ends of the spokes. The word occurs only in I Kings 7:33.

FELLOW (Heb. rē'a, Gr. hetaíros), a word which in English has two diverse meanings: 1. A person, but usually implying a certain amount of contempt as in Judges 18:25, "lest angry fellows run upon thee," and I Samuel 29:4, "Make this fellow return," where AVS has, "Make the man return," which is technically correct but lacks the feeling of KJV.

2. A friend, companion, associate or partner, as in Hebrews 1:9: "God hath anointed thee . . . above thy fellows." In denying the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, the Koran says of "Allah," "He does not beget, nor is he begotten, and he has no fellow." In Judges 11:37 (KJV) the word occurs once in the feminine, but ASV has "companion."

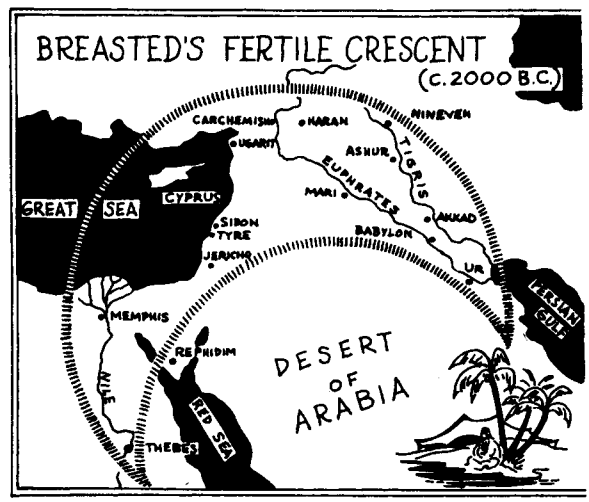
FELLOWSHIP (Gr. koinonía, that which is in common). 1. Partnership or union with others in the bonds of a business partnership, a social or fraternal organization, or just propinquity. Christians are told not to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers (II Cor. 6:14-18) because such a union, either in marriage, business or society, is incompatible with that fellowship with Christians and with God.

2. Membership in a local Christian church or in the Church. From the very beginning of the Church at Pentecost, "they continued stedfastly in the apostles' doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers" (Acts 2:42).

3. Partnership in the support of the Gospel and in the charitable work of the Church (II Cor. 8:4).

4. That heavenly love which fills (or should fill) the hearts of believers one for another and for God. For this love and fellowship, the Scriptures employ a word "agape" which scarcely appears in classical Greek. This fellowship is deeper and more satisfying than any mere human love whether social, parental, conjugal or other.

FENCED CITY. All of the six Hebrew words which are used for fenced cities are from the one root, bātsar, which means to restrain, withhold, or to make inaccessible. Owing to the usual insecurity in the East, most of the towns and even many of the small villages are enclosed in walls. It seems strange to ride through two or three miles of fields without a single building, and then to enter the gate of a little village and find the houses packed together with hardly a place to breathe. In the description of the kingdom of Bashan in the days of Moses (Deut. 3:5) we read of cities "fenced with high walls, gates, and bars," but the Israelites utterly destroyed them. The Edomite city of Bozrah (Mic. 2:12) gets its name from the same root. Figuratively, the word is used to show God's protection of Jeremiah — "I will make thee unto this people a fenced brazen wall . . . for I am with thee to save thee and to deliver thee, saith the Lord" (Jer. 15:20).



FERTILE CRESCENT, does not occur in Scripture but is a modern description of the territory which may roughly be described as reaching NW from the Persian Gulf through Mesopotamia, then W to the N of Syria, then SW through Syria and Palestine. In this crescent the land is mostly rich and fertile, and is watered by the Tigris, the Euphrates, the Orontes and the Jordan, besides numerous rivers descending the west side of Lebanon, and in most of the region irrigation has long been employed. Various grains like wheat and barley, and fruits such as grapes, olives, figs, oranges, lemons, pomegranates abound. If one attempts to cross in a straight line from one end of the crescent to the other he will find himself most of the way in the great Syrian desert, with only an occasional oasis. This configuration of the land explains much of Bible history.

FESTIVALS (See Feasts)

FESTUS, PORCIUS (Gr. Pórkios Phéstos, festal, joyful), the Roman governor who succeeded Felix in the province of Judea (Acts 24:27). The date of his accession in uncertain. Of the life of Festus before his appointment of Nero as procurator of Judea almost nothing is known, and he appears in the Bible (Acts 24:27 - 26:32) principally in his relationship with his prisoner, the apostle Paul. Festus was apparently a far better and more efficient man than his predecessor. At the very beginning of his rule, he took up the case of Paul, and as king Agrippa said, Paul "might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed unto Caesar." Paul had made this appeal when Festus, at the instance of the Jews, was considering bringing Paul to Jerusalem for trial. Festus evidently knew that Paul was a good man (Acts 25:25), but he was unable to understand Paul's reasoning with king Agrippa, and thought that Paul had gone mad with much study. (Acts 26:24). Festus died at his post, and was followed, c. A.D. 62, by Albinus.

FETTERS, bonds, chains or shackles, generally for the feet of prisoners and made of brass or of iron (Judg. 16:21; Ps. 105:18; 149:8). The NT word (Mark 5:4, Luke 8:29) indicates that the fetters were for the feet.

FEVER (See Diseases)

FIELD. The Biblical "field" was generally not enclosed, but was marked off from its neighbors by stone markers at the corners, and sometimes one or two along the sides. Because they were unenclosed, and because of the usually unsettled conditions, a watchman was ordinarily employed, especially when the crop was nearing maturity. Besides the danger of human intruders, there was sometimes danger from straying cattle or even of cattle driven by thieving men (Exod. 22:5), and of fire if a Samson (Judg. 15:5) or an angry Absalom (II Sam. 14:30) were about. The word is used also in a larger sense for "territory," as in Genesis 36:35, where "the field of Moab" is any place in Moabite territory; and as in the parable of the tares (Matt. 13:38), where "the field is the world." Many of the ancient "fields" were the habitat of wild animals (Ps. 80:13).

FIG (See Plants)

FILLET. In the description of the tabernacle in Exodus 27:10,11 and 38:10-19 the "fillets" were the rods between the columns that supported the hangings of the court. In Jeremiah 52:21 the word means a cord for measuring. Cf. ASV in loco.

FINING-POT, found only in Proverbs 17:3 and 27:21 and means the crucible in which silver or gold is melted to be purified from dross.

FIR (See Plants)

FIRE (Heb. 'ēsh, Gr. pýr), probably one of the earliest discoveries of man; perhaps first seen as a result of lightning, but man soon invented ways to use it and found it a most useful servant as well as a cruel master. The first use of the word "fire" in Scripture is in Genesis 19:24, which says that "fire from the Lord out of heaven" destroyed the cities of the plain; but the use of fire was far more ancient. Before the Flood, Tubal-Cain (Gen. 4:22) was the father of smiths, in the account of the Abrahamic covenant (Gen. 15:17) one reads of a smoking furnace and a flaming torch. Many students believe that God showed His acceptance of Abel's offering (Gen. 4:4) by sending fire to consume it. In the institution of the Aaronic priestly ceremonies, God sent fire from heaven to consume the first offering (Lev. 9:24) to show His acceptance. This fire was to be kept burning continually (Lev. 6:9). When the two sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, offered "strange fire," probably when intoxicated (Lev. 10:1,9,10), God's fiery judgment descended upon them and slew them. The final destiny of the enemies of God is the "lake of fire" (Rev. 19:20; 20:10,14). This world will some day be consumed by fire (II Pet. 3:7-12).

God uses "fire" not only for judgment but also for testing, and so we learn that the works of all believers will be tested as by fire (I Cor. 3:12-15). God's glory is accompanied by fire (Ezek. 1:27), the seraphim are fiery creatures (Isa. 6:2), as were the "fiery serpents" of Numbers 21:6 (from the same Hebrew verb saraph "to burn"), and our Lord is pictured with eyes as a flame of fire, hinting at his work of judgment (Rev. 1:14). Fire is used to refine gold and to cleanse us (Mal. 3:2).

FIREBRAND, from three Hebrew words: (1) a stick for stirring fire (Isa. 7:4, Amos 4:11), (2) brands, sparks (Prov. 26:18), and (3) a torch, as in Judges 15:4 and Judges 7:16. Job 12:5 has the same word, meaning a lamp that is burnt out.

FIREPAN (Heb. mahtâh), a vessel used for carrying live coals, as in Exodus 27:3. The Hebrew word is rendered "censer" 15 times, as in Leviticus 10:1, and "snuff dish" three times, as in Exodus 25:38. The meaning is evident from the context.

FIRKIN (See Weights and Measures)

FIRMAMENT (fĭr'mȧ-mĕnt, Heb. raqîa'), the expanse of sky surrounding the earth, made by God on the second day of creation to "divide the waters from the waters" (Gen. 1:6). The Hebrews thought of the "firmament" as the apparent void above in which the clouds float and the lights of heaven are set by God. The Hebrew word suggests something stretched or spread out like a curtain (Isa. 40:22). It corresponds to the "empty space" of Job 26:7. The translators of the LXX rendered the Hebrew word raqîa' as steréoma, which has the meaning of a firm and solid structure — something beaten out, like brass. This fitted in with the Alexandrian conception of the universe as being a succession of spheres, each carrying a planet; but it is not in accord with the real meaning of the Hebrew word. St. Jerome, in the Vulgate, made c. A.D. 400, translated the word steréoma as firmamentum, which also suggests something solid or firm. Our English word "firmament" does not correctly suggest the real meaning of the Hebrew word. S.B.

FIRST-BEGOTTEN (Gr. protótokos), a term applied to the Lord Jesus Christ in Hebrews 1:6 and in Revelation 1:5, the former referring to "the eternal generation of the Son of God" and the latter to his resurrection. ASV has "firstborn" in both places.

FIRSTBORN (Heb. bekhôr, Gr. protótokos). The Hebrew word is used chiefly of men, but is used also of animals (Exod. 11:5). It appears that man early felt that God has the first claim on animals (Gen. 4:4). Among the ancestors of the Hebrews there was a sacrifice to the deity of the firstborn offspring of men and animals. Because the firstborn of the Israelites were preserved at the time of the first Passover, every firstborn male of man and beast became consecrated to Jehovah (Exod. 13:2; 34:19). The beasts were sacrificed, while the men were redeemed (Exod. 13:13,15; 34:20; cf. Lev. 27:6). At Sinai the Levites were substituted for the Israelite firstborn (Num. 3:12,41,46; 8:13-19). On the 30th day after birth the father brought his firstborn to the priest and paid five shekels to redeem him from service in the temple (cf. Luke 2:27).

Among the Israelites the firstborn son possessed special privileges. He succeeded his father as the head of the house and received as his share of the inheritance a double portion. Israel was Jehovah's firstborn (Exod. 4:22) and was thus entitled to special privileges, as compared with other peoples. Jesus Christ is described as the firstborn (Rom. 8:29; Col. 1:15; Heb. 1:6), an application of the term that may be traced back to Psalm 89:27, where the Messiah is referred to as the firstborn of Jehovah. S.B.

FIRST DAY OF THE WEEK (See Sunday)

FIRST FRUITS (Heb. rē'shîth, bikkûrîm, Gr. aparché). In acknowledgement of the fact that all the products of the land came from God, and thankfulness for His goodness, Israelites brought as an offering to Him a portion of the fruits that ripened first, these being looked upon as an earnest of the coming harvest. Such an offering was made both on behalf of the nation (Lev. 23:10,17) and by individuals (Exod. 23:19; Deut. 26:1-11). These first fruits went for the support of the priesthood.

FISH (See Animals)

FISH GATE, an ancient gate on the E side of the wall of Jerusalem, just W of Gihon, where in the days of Nehemiah, men of Tyre congregated to sell fish and various wares on the sabbath (II Chron. 33:14; Neh. 13:16). It is probably identical with the "Middle Gate" of Jeremiah 39:3.

FISHING (See Occupations and Professions)

FISHHOOK, not only the means of catching fish as is done today, but also of keeping them, at least for a time (cf. Amos 4:2 with Job 41:1,2). Peter generally used a net, but see Matthew 17:27, where the Lord told him to cast a hook.

FISH POOL (Heb. berēkhôth, pool), in KJV occurs only in Song of Solomon 7:4, but the word should be rendered "pool," as it is in the RV.

FITCH (See Plants)

FLAG (See Plants)

FLAGON, a large container for wine. The word nevel is rendered "flagon" in Isaiah 22:24, elsewhere "bottle." The word 'ăshîshâh rendered "flagon" in II Samuel 6:19 and other places in KJV should be "cakes of raisins" as in ASV.

FLAX (See Plants)

FLEAS (See Insects)

FLEECE, the shorn wool of a sheep. The first of the shearing was to be given to the priesthood, as a part of their means of support (Deut. 18:4). Gideon's experience (Judg. 6:37-40) has given rise to the custom of "putting out a fleece" in seeking God's guidance.

FLESH (Heb. bāsār, shē'er, Gr. sárx). 1. Literally, the soft part of the bodies of men and animals.

2. By metonymy, all animals, as in Genesis 6:19.

3. Again by metonymy, mankind in general, as in Numbers 16:22, "the God of the spirits of all flesh."

4. Our ordinary human constitution as opposed to our mental and moral qualities as in Matthew 26:41, "the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak."

5. Human nature deprived of the Spirit of God and dominated by sin (Rom. 7:14; I Cor. 3:1,3; Col. 2:18; I John 2:16).

FLESH-HOOK (Heb. mazlēgh), a metal implement with one or more teeth, used for handling large pieces of flesh, especially around the sacrificial altar. In the tabernacle it was made of brass (Exod. 27:3; 38:3), but in the temple it was made of gold (I Chron. 28:17). In Samuel's time it was used to remove the priests' share of the meat offering (I Sam. 2:13,14).

FLIES (See Insects)

FLINT (See Minerals)

FLOCK, a collection of sheep under the care of a shepherd, sometimes including goats as well (Gen. 27:9). The larger animals such as cattle, camels, asses, etc. were counted as herds, not flocks. Israel lived in OT times in a pastoral civilization and a man's flocks made up most of his wealth, providing clothing, food, milk and animals for sacrifice. Figuratively both Israel and the Church are counted as flocks, and God is the Good Shepherd (Isa. 40:11; Matt. 26:31; Luke 12:32; I Pet. 5:2,3).

FLOOD, DELUGE.

I. Historical Background of Flood Interpretations. The Noahic flood has been a subject for discussion among scientists and theologians for many centuries.

During the middle ages the Church was the authority in all areas of thought. Science as we know it today did not exist, for with its theological orientation the Church looked with disfavor upon observations which did not have theological explanations. It was only natural then that when the early geologists observed many thousands of feet of sedimentary rocks (those formed from particles of previously existing rock or chemically precipitated from solution) in the mountains of Europe and the British Isles, they should turn to the Church for an explanation. The easiest answer for the layers of sediments was that they were laid down by the Noahic Flood. As the sedimentary layers were studied further, problems arose when it was discovered that not all the layers were contemporaneous. It was also readily observed that some sediments had been deposited, hardened into rock, folded into mountain ranges, eroded off and then covered with new sediments. At some places the sedimentary rock layers were cut by formerly molten rock material which indicated volcanic activity after the sediments were deposited. Sixteenth and seventeenth century scientists attempted to harmonize the interpretation of field observations with church tradition.

As a result, many interpretations of the meaning and physical characteristics of the Flood have been suggested, modified, abandoned, and sometimes reproposed. These interpretations have produced some highly improbable explanations of the events of the deluge which have so confused the issue that it is difficult to separate intelligent exegesis of the Biblical accounts from fanciful eisegesis of the same passages. The reality of the Flood can hardly be questioned, however, because of the many references to it in both the Old and New Testament. Among these are chapters 6, 7, and 8 of Genesis, Genesis 9:11, 28; 10:1, 32; Matt. 24:38, 39; Luke 17:27; II Peter 2:5.

II. The Purpose of the Flood. An important aspect of the deluge is that God preserved some men, for Noah and his family were saved from destruction by going into an ark which Noah made according to God's specifications, and in which he gathered animals and birds preserved to replenish the earth.

It is apparent from Gen. 6:5-7 and other passages such as II Peter 2:5, 6 that the Flood was brought upon the earth as a judgment on the sins of the people. Man had become so sinful that "it repented the Lord that He had made man on the earth" (Gen. 6:6 KJV). In Scripture the reference to the Flood is linked with the judgment at the second coming of the Lord (Matt. 24:39). It is also mentioned in relation to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Luke 17:27-29; II Peter 2:5, 6).

The purpose of God as stated in Genesis 6:7 indicates that His judgment was not against the inanimate rocks or against plants, but against "man and beast, and the creeping things and the fowls of the air."

III. The Phenomena of the Flood. In the following passage, however (Gen. 6:11-13), the earth is included in the judgment. There is again difference of opinion as to the meaning of Gen. 6:13 in which God said, "The end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold I will destroy them with the earth" (KJV). That the earth was not utterly destroyed as it will be in the last times (II Peter 2:10) is apparent. Some writers would interpret Gen. 6:13 to mean that great geologic catastrophes overwhelmed the earth's surface, while others point out that Gen. 6:6, 7, 12, and 13 all stress that it was the sin of living things ("flesh") that was to be punished and that the effect upon the inanimate rocks of the world is only incidental to punishing man.

Despite all attempts at scientific explanation of the minute details of the Flood, there seems to be no doubt that God worked a miracle in causing the Flood. In II Peter 3:5, 6 the Flood is compared with the creation of the world and is a miracle of the same order. In the same passage, II Peter 3:7ff, the final destruction of the world is given the same miraculous explanation as the Noahic Flood.

IV. The Source of the Flood. The Biblical account of the accumulation and dispersal of the waters of the Flood is very brief. In Gen. 7:11 the source of the water is explained ". . . all the fountains of the great deep were broken up and the windows of heaven were opened."

The Hebrew word Tehom, translated great deep in the KJV, is the same used in Gen. 1:2. That this does not necessarily include all the oceans is shown by its use in Isaiah 51:10 when it refers to the escape of the Israelites through "the depths of the sea" (the Red Sea). The word "fountain" (Hebrew ma'yan) means literally place of a spring. This could mean that water rose from the ocean or from fresh water springs on the earth or both.

V. Suggested Causes of the Flood. Some would prefer to believe that the expression "fountains of the great deep were broken up" indicates that the ocean (actually the Persian Gulf, an arm of the ocean) invaded the land. Others have assumed this implies volcanic activity and that some of the water of the Flood is "juvenile water" which is formed from the oxygen and hydrogen which may occur as separate elements in the molten rock deep in the earth's crust. This school of thought would also attribute a great deal of diastrophism (movements of the solid crust which result in a relative change of position of the rock formations concerned) to this verse. This could account for the subsidence of the mountains of the earth so that they could be covered more easily by the waters of the deluge.

To attribute volcanic activity to Gen. 7:11 is highly speculative, for at no place in the Genesis account of the Flood is any more specific description of conditions given. The fact that igneous rock (rock formed by the cooling of molten rock material) is found between or cutting sedimentary rock layers is not good evidence for volcanic activity at the time of the Flood. Sediments which have been laid down during historic time have been cut by lava coming up to present day volcanoes. It has also been observed that the oldest layers are also cut by igneous rocks. It seems apparent, therefore, that volcanic activity has gone on throughout the world's history. It is not possible to designate any particular rock body as being coincident with the Flood.

"The windows of heaven were opened" has been accepted as a description of rain. Some have seen this as a torrential downpour greater than normally experienced on the earth today. A hypothesis has been proposed that the earth from the time of Creation (or at least man's creation) was surrounded by a canopy of water in some form until the time of the Flood. The canopy was suggested as being water vapor, ice or liquid water. If such a canopy existed, it is proposed that its transfer from around the earth to the earth as water would cause a rain for many days.

The canopy idea, although firmly entrenched in literature, has doubtful Biblical authority. The language of Ezekiel, "the likeness of the firmament upon the heads of the living creature was as the colour of the terrible crystal stretched forth over their heads above" (Ezek. 1:22), has been cited as authority, with "the terrible crystal" referring to an ice canopy. This theory seems highly speculative. Again it should be noted that if a miraculous explanation for the Flood is accepted, physical explanations are not necessary.

VI. The Duration of the Flood. The length of the Flood is generally agreed upon within a few days. The Hebrews used a solar calendar in contrast to the Babylonian lunar month and the Egyptian arbitrary 365-day year. Most authorities would put the number of days from the time the rain started (Genesis 7:11) to the time Noah left the ark (Genesis 8:14) between 371 and 376 days.

VII. Traditions of the Flood. Traditions regarding a disastrous flood which occurred long ago are handed down by many peoples. Isolated tribes in all parts of the world have been found to have such traditions. This is not surprising when the destruction caused by present day floods as well as hurricanes and tornadoes accompanied by great rains is considered. A tribe occupying a limited area could be destroyed completely by one storm. If there were survivors they would date their civilization from such an event. Some traditional floods have been dated as having occurred within the last few hundred years by archaeological evidence.

The Hebrews, Assyrians and Babylonians, who lived within the area of the Tigris-Euphrates basin, all had traditions of a great flood. These narratives stated the purpose of the flood to be punishment because the world was full of violence, but the Hebrew story remained simple and credible, whereas the other accounts became complex and fanciful. Only the Biblical account retained a monotheistic viewpoint. Although it is not possible to affirm dogmatically that all of these three histories had a common origin, it seems probable that they did.

VIII. The Universality of the Flood. One of the great differences of opinion in describing the Flood concerns its extent. Traditionally most Biblical interpreters considered the submergence to be universal; that is, that it covered the entire globe including the highest mountains. The reasons proposed to defend this viewpoint include the fact that in the Gen. account universal terms are used. "All the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered" (Gen. 7:19) and "all flesh died" (Gen. 7:21). It has been pointed out that if the Flood were local there would be no need for an ark to preserve Noah, for God could have directed him to move with the animals to an area that was not to be submerged.

The fact that many civilizations have flood traditions has been cited as an evidence for a universal flood. The same evidence could be used to argue for a local flood because the accounts of floods in other parts of the world are less like the Hebrew tradition than those of the Assyrians and Babylonians who lived in the same areas as the Hebrews.

Today many conservative scholars defend a local flood. The crux of their argument seems to center in the covenant relation of God to man. He deals with certain groups, such as the children of Israel. The reasoning in regard to Noah is that Noah was not a preacher of righteousness to peoples of other areas but was concerned with the culture from which Abraham eventually came. Physical arguments have also been raised against a universal flood: origin and disposal of the amount of water necessary to make a layer six miles thick over the whole world, the effect upon plant life by being covered for a year, the effect upon fresh water life of a sea which contained salt from the ocean, and the fact that many topographic features of the earth such as cinder cones which show no evidence of erosion by a flood and which are much older than the flood could possibly be. It seems, therefore, that a person can advocate either a local or a universal concept of the Flood and find evidence to support his view.

IX. Chronology of the Flood. Although Ussher in his chronology placed the flood at 2348 B.C., most scholars recognize a much earlier date.

Scholars who have advocated that the earth has developed to its present condition by a series of major calamities have been called catastrophists. These consider the Noahic Flood as the greatest of these catastrophes and believe that the Pleistocene ice age was related to the Flood. If, as the catastrophists believe, the Flood was associated in some way with the end of the Pleistocene ice age, a date of at least 10,000 B.C. would have to be accepted. Archaeological and anthropological evidence has caused some scholars to put the origin of man back more than 100,000 years so that there is not any general agreement among conservative scholars concerning the actual date of the deluge. The lack of consensus with regard to the details of the Flood should make all aware of the danger of placing so much importance on the interpretation of this important event that the other lessons of the Bible are missed.

Tabulated Chronology of the Flood

1. The making of the ark (Gen. 6:14)
2. Collection of the animals (Gen. 7:9)	7 days before the rain started
3. Fountains of the great deep were broken up and the windows of heaven were opened	Second month, 17th day in Noah's 600th year
4. Rain (Gen. 7:12)	40 days and 40 nights
5. All the high hills covered (Gen. 7:19)	150 days
6. Water prevailed upon the earth (Gen. 7:24)	150 days
7. Water returned from off the earth (Gen. 8:3)
8. Ark rested upon the mountains of Ararat (Gen. 8:4)	Seventh month, 17th day
9. Waters decreased (Gen. 8:4)
10. Tops of mountains seen (Gen. 8:5)	Tenth month, 1st day
11. Noah waited (Gen. 8:6)	40 days
12. Noah sent forth raven and a dove; dove returned (Gen. 8:7-9)
13. Noah waited (Gen. 8:10)	7 days
14. Noah sent forth dove again (Gen. 8:10); dove returned with olive branch (Gen. 8:11)	7 days
15. Noah waited (Gen. 8:12)	7 days
16. Noah sent forth dove which did not return (Gen. 8:12)	7 days
17. Noah removed covering; face of the ground was dry (Gen. 8:13)	1st month, 1st day, Noah's 601st year
18. Earth dried; Noah left ark (Gen. 8:14)	2nd month, 27th day

FLOUR, fine-crushed and sifted grain, generally wheat or rye or barley (Judg. 7:13). Eastern flour was not quite as fine or as white as ours, and as a result, the bread was more wholesome. The "meat" offerings, were of flour. "Meat" here should be "meal." (Cf. Lev. 6:15 in KJV and ASV.)

FLOWER (See Plants)

FLUTE (See Music)

FLY (See Insects)

FOAL (See Animals)

FODDER, the mixed food of cattle, generally from several kinds of grain sown together (Job 6:5; Job 24:6 "corn" in ASV; Isa. 30:24).

FOOD, nutritive material taken into a living organism to sustain life, to promote growth and the repair of the tissues, and to give energy for the vital processes. The Bible says little about food for animals. Bible animals for the most part are herbivorous, though carnivorous ones are mentioned. Some omnivorous animals, like swine, are mentioned, but almost always in a contemptuous way (Matt. 7:6) and swine were forbidden as food (Isa. 65:4).

At the very beginning of human history, Adam's food for his first day was probably some ripe fruit near him as he awoke to consciousness, and when he began to hunger, his nose as well as his eyes directed him to his first meal. Food and water would of course be necessary from that first day. Before sin had entered into human history, God apparently prescribed a vegetarian diet, both for man and beast (Gen. 1:29,30), but one must not build too much on silence here as regarding the content of diet. By the time that Noah built the ark, there was a distinction between clean and unclean beasts (Gen. 7:2,3) and when God made his covenant with Noah after the flood (Gen. 9:3,4) flesh was permitted as food. Blood was forbidden, and it seems that the reason for this prohibition was as much theological as sanitary for "the life (Hebrew nephesh or soul) is in the blood" (cf. Lev. 17:11). Coming down now to the time of Moses, fat was also prohibited as food (Lev. 3:16,17) and again, the reason given is religious but not hygienic. In the time of the Restoration (Neh. 8:10) Nehemiah encouraged the people to "eat the fat" while celebrating a national "Thanksgiving day." One might imagine here that Nehemiah had forgotten that "all the fat is the Lord's" (Lev. 3:16) until one notices that the Hebrew word for "fat" here is not the one used in Leviticus. The word in Nehemiah could just as well be rendered "dainties" and refers probably to the various rich confections of which Eastern people are so fond.

The animals most frequently mentioned in the Bible are the domestic herbivorous animals, and these are divided sharply into two classes; the clean and the unclean. (See Lev. 11) The clean animals were to be used for food and for sacrifice and the four-footed ones were distinguished by their hoofs and by their chewing the cud. The camel chews the cud but does not part the hoof and so was considered unclean, though its milk was and is greatly used by desert-dwellers. Swine part the hoof but do not chew the cud, and so were ceremonially unclean. They were perhaps prohibited as food because of the mischievous trichina spiralis, a worm which has long infested swine, and from half-roasted pork can enter the human body and create great harm. Of the seafood which was reckoned unclean the principal ones were oysters and shrimps. One can easily realize how dangerous they would be in a land where climate was hot and there was no refrigeration. In other words, most of the distinctions between "clean" and "unclean" foods were clearly based upon sanitary reasons.

In Palestine and Syria, fresh fruit can be obtained throughout the year. Oranges last in the spring till the very short season of apricots arrives. After the apricots come the plums, figs, pomegranates, etc., which last until the grapes appear, and they in turn remain until the oranges and lemons are again in season.

The preparation of food differs from Western custom. Generally meat is eaten not in steaks and roasts, but cut up and served with rice, and often imbedded in "coosa" (a kind of squash) or wrapped in cabbage or grape leaves. The bread is not as white and fine as is ours, but is far more healthful. A common laborer often takes as his lunch two hollow loaves of bread, one filled with cheese and the other with olives. There were several sorts of sweets, of which dried figs boiled in grape molasses (Gen. 43:11) was one of the best known. Near the sea, fish were very commonly eaten. Various kinds of vegetables were used: beans, lentils, millet, melons, onions, gourds; also spices: cummin, mint, mustard, and salt; and honey.

Food is a figure of spiritual sustenance. Peter tells his readers to "desire earnestly the sincere [unadulterated] milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby." Peter was writing to young Christians (I Pet. 2:1-3) but Paul clearly distinguishes between Scripture which can be likened to "milk for babes" and that which can be compared with "strong meat," or solid food. A.B.F.

FOOL, in modern usage, a dolt or a simpleton, but in Scripture generally impiety or lack of moral good sense is implied as well. "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God" (Ps. 14:1; 53:1). Solomon in his writings, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, makes about 80 statements about fools, showing their emptiness, their conceit and pride, their boasting and self-confidence, and in four cases in Ecclesiastes, their thick-headedness and their wordiness (Eccl. 2:19; 10:3,14). In Matthew 23:17 we read how the Lord called the scribes and Pharisees fools; not implying intellectual stupidity, but spiritual blindness. Men can be clever in mind, but at the same time fools in spiritual matters.

FOOT, the part of the body on which men and animals walk, or that part of furniture on which it stands. As regards furniture, the base of the laver just outside the tabernacle is several times called its foot (Exod. 30:18; 35:16, etc.). The foot of man, because in contact with the earth, is thought to be less honorable than the hand or the head, but in the Christian church "the foot" (i.e. the lowest member) should not suffer a feeling of inferiority or of envy, and say "Because I am not the hand, I am not of the body" (I Cor. 12:15) nor should the more prominent directing member ("the head") say to the foot, "I have no need of thee." In the East, shoes are ordinarily removed when entering a house. On entering a house, the lowest servant is detailed to wash the feet of the visitor. So the priests, before entering the tabernacle in divine service, must wash their feet as well as their hands at the laver, just outside, so that no trace of defilement would accompany their service. (For spiritual application, see John 13:10, Heb. 10:22). In lands where irrigation is practiced, men use shovels to move the earth for the larger channels, but a foot will suffice for a small channel to water a furrow (Deut. 11:10). To humiliate an enemy utterly, one sometimes put his foot upon the captives' necks as Joshua's captains did (Josh. 10:24).

FOOTMAN. 1. A member of the infantry as distinguished from the cavalry—horsemen and charioteers. The bulk of ancient armies consisted of footmen.

2. A runner, one of the king's bodyguard (I Sam. 22:17).

FOOTSTOOL (Heb. keves, Gr. hypopódion), a word is used in Scripture both literally (II Chron. 9:18; James 2:3) and figuratively: of the earth Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:35), of the Temple (Lam. 2:1), of the Ark (Ps. 99:5), and of subjection, especially of heathen enemies by the Messianic king (Ps. 110:1; Matt. 22:44; Acts 2:35).

FORD (Heb. ma'var), a shallow place in a stream where men and animals can cross on foot. In the small streams of Palestine and Syria, fording places are quite frequent and can easily be found simply by following the main roads which in many cases are mere bridle paths. Such probably were the fords of the Jabbok (Gen. 32:22) where Jacob halted, and of the Arnon (Isa. 16:2). The Jordan, however, is a strong and rapid stream, and its fording places are few and far between. When Israel crossed, God miraculously stopped the waters upstream by a landslide. John the Baptist baptized at Bethabara (John 1:28 KJV), which name indicates that a ford was there. Joshua's spies (Josh. 2:7) evidently forded the Jordan, and Ehud (Judg. 3:28) took the same place to prevent Moabites from crossing there. Farther up the river and about two hundred years after Ehud, Jephthah (Judg. 12:5,6) made his famous "Shibboleth test" at a ford of the Jordan.

FOREHEAD, that part of the face which is above the eyes. Because it is so prominent, its appearance often determines our opinion of the person. In Ezekiel 16:12 KJV reads "I put a jewel on thy forehead," but ASV (more correctly) has, "I put a ring upon thy nose." The forehead is used as a very dishonorable word where we read of a "harlot's forehead" (Jer. 3:3) indicating utter shamelessness, and at the same time it stands for courage, as when God told Ezekiel (Ezek. 3:9) that he had made the prophet's forehead harder than flint against the foreheads of the people. The forehead is also the place for the front of a crown or mitre (Exod. 28:38), where the emblem of holiness on Aaron's forehead would make the gifts of the people acceptable before the Lord. A mark was put upon the foreheads of the men of Jerusalem who mourned for its wickedness, and they were spared in a time of terrible judgment (Ezek. 9:4). Similarly in Revelation 7 God's servants were sealed by an angel; and it seems that this seal not only saved the elect ones but it showed forth their godly character. In the ages of glory that are to come, the name of God will be marked on the foreheads of his own people (Rev. 22:4). A.B.F.

FOREIGNER (Heb. nokhrî, stranger; Gr. póroikos, sojourner). The Jewish people divided all humanity into two groups, of which they belonged in the smaller and more select group; namely, Jews and Gentiles. "Lo, it is a people that dwelleth alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations" (Num. 23:9b ASV). With the Greeks, the division was Greeks and Barbarians (Rom. 1:14). The common word for foreigner (Hebrew, nokri) is generally translated "stranger" and seems generally to be used with a slightly contemptuous meaning. "Are we not accounted of him strangers?" (Gen. 31:15). It generally implies also a heathen religion, as in I Kings 11:1 where "Solomon loved many strange women."

Foreigners were debarred from a number of privileges accorded only to Israelites: eating the passover (Exod. 12:43), entering the sanctuary (Ezek. 44:9), becoming king (Deut. 17:15). Israelites were forbidden to enter into covenant relations with them (Exod. 23:32), or to intermarry with them on equal terms (Exod. 34:12,16). They could be sold the flesh of animals that had died, which Israelites were forbidden to eat (Deut. 14:21); they could be loaned money with interest (Deut. 23:20); and debts could be collected from them even in the year of release (Deut. 15:3). In NT times the Jews even refrained from eating and drinking with Gentiles (Acts 11:3; Gal. 2:12). Foreigners, could, however, always become Israelites by fully accepting the Law and its requirements. A.B.F.

FOREKNOWLEDGE (See Election)

FOREORDINATION (See Election)

FORERUNNER (Gr. pródromos). Rulers, intending a visit, often send advance agents to prepare the way for their reception; so John the Baptist was the forerunner of our Lord (Isa. 40:3; Luke 3:4-6). The word "forerunner" is used of Jesus, who has preceded us into the visible presence of God to insure our personal access to God (Heb. 6:20).

FORESKIN (Heb. 'orlâh, Gr. akrobustía), the fold of skin which is cut off in the operation of circumcision. Just as the American Indians used scalps of enemies as signs of their prowess, so David presented two hundred foreskins of the Philistines (I Sam. 18:25-27). In Deuteronomy 10:16 the word is used figuratively meaning submission to God's law. In Habakkuk 2:16 it refers to the indecent exhibitionism of a drunken man.

FOREST (Heb. ya'ar, sevakh, âvîm), a piece ot land covered with trees naturally planted, as distinguished from a park where man's hand is more evident. In ancient times, most of the highlands of Canaan and Syria except the tops of the high mountains were covered with forests. Several forests are mentioned by name, those of Lebanon the most often, for these were famous for the cedar and the fir trees. From the forest of Lebanon, Hiram of Tyre (I Kings 5:8-10) brought down cedar and fir trees to the sea and floated them southward to the port which Solomon had constructed, from which his servants could transport the timbers to Jerusalem. Solomon's "house of the forest of Lebanon" (I Kings 7:2, etc.) was apparently his own house, and was so named because of the prevalence of cedar in its structure. KJV names the "forest of his Carmel" in II Kings 19:23 and Isaiah 37:24, but ASV renders it more truly the "forest of his fruitful field" without attempting to locate it. "The forest of Arabia" (Isa. 21:13) is also incapable of location upon a map. It was in a wood or forest in Ephraim that the crucial battle of Absalom's rebellion was fought (II Sam. 18) and "the wood devoured more people than the sword devoured" (v. 8).

FORGIVENESS (Heb. kâphar, nâsâ', sâlah; Gr. apolúein, charízesthai, áphesis, páresis). In the OT, pardon, and in the NT, remission, are often used as the equivalents of forgiveness. The idea of forgiveness is found in either religious or social relations, and means the giving up of resentment or claim to requital on account of an offense. The offense may be a deprivation of a person's property, rights, or honor; or it may be a violation of moral law.

The normal conditions of forgiveness are repentance and the willingness to make reparation, or atonement; and the effect of forgiveness is the restoration of both parties to the former state of relationship. Christ taught that forgiveness is a duty, and that no limit should be set to the extent of forgiveness (Luke 17:4). An unforgiving spirit is one of the most serious of sins (Matt. 18:34,35; Luke 15:28-30). The ground of forgiveness by God of man's sins is the atoning death of Christ. Jesus taught that the offended party is, when necessary, to go to the offender and try to bring him to repentance (Luke 17:3). God's forgiveness is conditional upon man's forgiveness of the wrongs done him (Matt. 5:23,24; 6:12; Col. 1:14; 3:13). Those forgiven by God before the Incarnation were forgiven because of Christ, whose death was foreordained from eternity. Christ's atonement was retroactive in its effect (Heb. 11:40). God's forgiveness seems, however, to be limited. Christ speaks of the unpardonable sin (Matt. 12:31,32), and John speaks of the sin unto death (I John 5:16). The deity of Christ is evidenced by His claim to the power to forgive sins (Mark 2:7; Luke 5:21; 7:49). S.B.

FORK, mentioned only in I Samuel 13:21 as the translation of two words which could be rendered "a three-tined gatherer." It probably was the ancient type of our modern pitchfork.

FORNICATION (Heb. zânâh, Gr. porneía), unlawful sexual intercourse of an unwed person. It is to be distinguished from adultery which has to do with unfaithfulness on the part of a married person, and from rape which is a crime of violence and without the consent of the person sinned against. When these sins are mentioned in the Bible, they are often figurative of disloyalty. Idolatry is practically adultery from God. This ugly sin ought not even to be a subject of conversation among Christians (Eph. 5:3,4) and is commonly associated with the obscene worship of the heathen. For the spiritualizing of this sin, see Jeremiah 2:20-36, Ezekiel 16, and Hosea 1-3, where it applied to Israel; and Revelation 17, where it applies to Rome.

FORT, FORTRESS. Every city in ancient times was fortified by a wall and its citadel. The KJV often speaks of such cities as "fenced," and other terms are also used by the KJV and the RV. Even before the Israelites entered Canaan, they were terrified by the reports of cities "great and fortified up to heaven" (Num. 13:ff; Deut. 1:28). These cities were not necessarily large; they were usually, indeed, quite small. Jerusalem was so well fortified that it was not until the time of David that the city was captured from the Jebusites. Usually the city was built on a hill, and the fortifications followed the natural contour of the hill. Many times there was both an inner and an outer wall. The walls were built of brick and stone, and were many feet thick. After the Israelites entered the land, they too built fenced cities (Deut. 28:52; II Sam. 20:6).

FORTUNATUS (fôr-tū-nā'tŭs, Gr. Phortounátos, blessed, fortunate), a Christian who came with two others to bring gifts from the Corinthian church to Paul when he was about to leave Ephesus in A.D. 59 (I Cor. 16:17).

FORUM APPII, rendered Appii Forum in KJV (Acts 28:15), but more correctly in ASV as "The Market of Appius," a place 43 miles SE of Rome, where Paul was met by the brethren. It was a station on the famous Appian Way to Naples.

FOUNDATION (Heb. yāsadh, to found; Gr. katabolé, themélios), that upon which a building stands, or else the first layer of the actual structure; its walls. The word is often used figuratively. A temporal use of the word is found at least nine times in the NT, referring to the time of the foundation of the world. Some other figurative uses: as when the Church is built upon "the foundation of the apostles and prophets" (Eph. 2:20), or when simple Christian teaching is based upon "the foundation of repentance from dead works" (Heb. 6:1), or as when Jesus Christ is spoken of as the foundation of Christian theology (I Cor. 3:10,11).

FOUNTAIN, a spring of water issuing from the earth. In a country near the desert, springs, pools, pits, cisterns and fountains are of great importance and many towns and other locations are named from the springs at their sites: e.g., Enaim, "two springs" (Gen. 38:21 ASV); Enam, with the same meaning (Josh. 15:34); En-gedi, i.e., "the fountain of the kid" (Josh. 15:62); and a dozen others, like the English Springfield, or the French Fontainebleau. In the story of the Flood "the fountains of the great deep" were broken up, referring to great convulsions of the earth's surface (Gen. 7:11) which, with the rain, caused the Flood; and in the preparation of the earth for man, the Son of God (Wisdom personified) was with the Father before there were any "fountains abounding with water" (Prov. 8:24). The word is used both literally and figuratively, both pleasantly and unpleasantly. Figuratively, it refers to the source of hemorrhages (Lev. 20:18; Mark 5:29). In Proverbs, compare "a troubled fountain and a corrupt spring" (25:26) with "a fountain of life" (13:14; 14:27). In the Bridegroom's praise of his pure bride (S. of Sol. 4:12,15) she is first "a fountain sealed" then "a fountain of gardens." In the curse of Ephraim (Hos. 13:15), "his fountain shall be dried up" as a terrible punishment; but on the pleasant side, David speaks (Ps. 36:9) of "the fountain of life" as being with the Lord. In the Lord's conversation with the woman at the well (John 4:14), He told her of "a well of water springing up into everlasting life." Among the delights of heaven, will be "the fountain of the water of life" (Rev. 21:6). A.B.F.

FOUNTAIN GATE, the gate at the SE corner of the walls of ancient Jerusalem, mentioned only in Nehemiah (2:14; 3:15; 12:37).

FOWL (See Birds)

FOWLER (Heb. yōkēsh), a bird-catcher. Because fowlers used snares, gins, bird-lime, etc. and caught their prey by trickery, "fowler" is used to describe those who try to ensnare the unwary and bring them to ruin (Ps. 91:3; 124:7; Hos. 9:8).

FOX (See Animals)

FRANKINCENSE (Heb. levōnâh, from root meaning whiteness), a resinous substance obtained from certain trees of the Boswellia genus and the family of balsams. To obtain the frankincense, an incision is made through the bark of the tree deep into the trunk, and a strip of bark is peeled off. As the whitish juice exudes, it hardens in the atmosphere and is gathered after about three months' exposure in the summer. When sold, the frankincense is in the form of "tears" or of irregular lumps, and has been used as a perfume, as a medicine, and by Egyptians and Hebrews in their religious rites. It is spoken of as coming from Arabia (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20) and perhaps from Palestine (S. of Sol. 4:6,14). It was an ingredient of the perfume for the most holy place (Exod. 30:34-38) which was exclusively reserved for this particular use. Frankincense was mingled with the flour in the meal-offering (Lev. 2:1,15,16) but was rigidly excluded from the sin-offering (Lev. 5:11) which was far from being an offering of a sweet savor. Soon after the birth of Jesus, the wise men presented to Him gifts of gold, of frankincense and myrrh; and these precious gifts, presented in worship may well have helped to finance His sojourn in Egypt (Matt. 2:11,15). See PLANTS.

FREEMAN, a rendering of two slightly different Gr. words, apeleútheros, found in I Corinthians 7:22, where it refers to a slave who has received his freedom, although in this verse the reference is to one who has received spiritual freedom from the Lord, and eleútheros, found in Galatians 4:22,23, 30, Revelation 6:15, where it means a free man as opposed to a slave.

FREEWILL OFFERING (See Offerings)

FRET (Heb. hārâh, mā'ar). 1. To fret is to be vexed, chafed, irritated, or to be angry; and the godly man is not to fret himself (Ps. 37:1,7,8). By contrast, one should have his mind stayed on the Lord (Isa. 26:3).

2. A fretting leprosy (Lev. 13:51,52) is a sharp, bitter, painful leprosy.

FRINGE (Heb. tsîtsith, tassel, lock), the tassel of twisted cords fastened to the outer garments of Israelites to remind them of their obligations as Israelites to be loyal to Jehovah (Num. 15:38, 39; Deut. 22:12). Later they became distinct badges of Judaism (cf. Zech. 8:23). They were common in NT times (Matt. 9:20; 14:36; 23:5).

FROG (See Plagues)

FRONTLET (Heb. tôtāphôth, from tūph, to bind), anything bound on the forehead, particularly phylacteries, which were worn on the forehead and on the arms. Phylacteries were prayer bands consisting of the following passages from the Law of Moses: Exodus 13:1-10; 11-16; Deuteronomy 6: 4-9; 11:13-21, which were put in small leather cases and fastened to the forehead and the left arm. They were worn by all male Jews during the time of morning prayer, except on the sabbath and festivals.

FROST, (Heb. kephōr, hănāmāl), usual in winter on the hills and high plains in Bible lands. Frosts in the late spring do great damage to fruit. The manna in the wilderness is compared to hoar-frost (Exod. 16:14). Frost is an evidence of God's power (Job 37:10; 38:29).

FRUIT (Heb. perî, Gr. karpós). The fruits most often mentioned in Scripture are the grape, pomegranate, fig, olive, apple; all of which are grown today; but the lemon, orange, plum and apricot were unknown or at least unmentioned. The word "fruit" is often used metaphorically: "the fruit of thy womb" (Deut. 7:13, cf. 28:11), "the fruit of their own way" (Prov. 1:31), "fruit unto life eternal" (John 4:36) etc. The fruit of the Holy Spirit consists of all the Christian virtues (Gal. 5:22,23).

FRYING PAN (Heb. marhesheth), properly a pot or saucepan in which things are boiled or baked. The word occurs only in Leviticus 2:7 and 7:9 and no frying is intended or implied.

FUEL (Heb. 'ōkhlâh, or ma'ăkhōleth, food). In ancient times wood, charcoal, various kinds of thorn bushes, dried grass, and the dung of camels and cattle was used as fuel. There is no evidence that coal was used by the Hebrews as fuel; their houses had no chimneys (Isa. 9:5,19; Ezek. 4:12, 15; 15:4,6; 21:32).

FULLER (See Occupations and Professions)

FULLER'S FIELD (Heb. sedhēh khôvēs), a field, just outside of Jerusalem, where fullers washed the cloth material they were processing. A highway and a conduit for water passed through it (Isa. 7:3; 36:2). It was so near the city that the Assyrian Rabshakeh (q.v.), standing and speaking in the field, could be heard by those on the city wall (II Kings 18:17). Its exact site is in dispute.

FULLER'S SOAP, an alkali prepared from the ashes of certain plants and used for cleansing and fulling new cloth. The word is used figuratively in Malachi 3:2.

FUNERAL, the ceremonies used in disposing of a dead human body; whether by burying, cremation, or otherwise. The word does not occur in the Bible. The rites differed with the place, the religion, and the times; except for royal burials in Egypt, the elaborate ceremonies that are used with us today were not held.

In Palestine, as a general thing, there was no embalmment and the body was buried a few hours after death; sometimes in a tomb, but more often in a cave. Coffins were unknown. The body was washed and often anointed with aromatic spices (John 12:7; 19:39). The procession of mourners, made up of relatives and friends of the deceased, were led by professional mourning women, whose shrieks and lamentations pierced the air. It was an insult to a man's reputation to be refused proper burial (Jer. 22:19). The "Tombs of the kings" on the E side of Jerusalem, and the "Garden tomb," where our Lord's body was laid, are evidences of the two types of burial. In Egypt, the bodies were embalmed so skillfully that many of them are recognizable today after the lapse of thousands of years.

FURLONG (See Weights and Measures)

FURNACE (Heb. kivshān, kûr, attûn, 'ālîl, tannûr; Gr. káminos). Furnaces for central heating are not mentioned in the Bible nor are they much used today in Bible lands. The burning fiery furnace of Daniel 3 was probably a smelting furnace and used only incidentally for the punishment of men. The most common word "tannur" could be and often is more properly rendered oven (cf. Gen. 15: 17 with Lev. 2:4; Hos. 7:4-7). Furnaces were used for melting gold (Prov. 17:3), silver (Ezek. 22: 22), brass or bronze (Ezek. 22:18) and including also tin, iron and lead and for baking bread (Neh. 3:11; Isa. 31:9). The word is often used figuratively, as in Deuteronomy 4:20 where it means Egypt and in Matthew 13:42, which refers to the punishment of the wicked at the end of the world. Quite recently, Solomon's ingenious smelting furnaces near Elath on the Gulf of Akaba have been found, arranged so that the constant north wind furnished a natural draft for melting the brass or copper. After being prepared there, the metal was taken to the plain of the Jordan for casting (I Kings 7:46).

FURNITURE (Heb. kār, kēlîm; Gr. skevé). In the Bible the principal reference to furniture is in the articles in and about the tabernacle and the temple. The main items were the large altar and the laver, outside; then the table of showbread (KJV "shewbread"), the lamp-stand, or "candlestick" and the altar of incense in the holy place, then in the holy of holies the ark of the covenant (Exod. 25-40). Generally beds were mats, spread upon the floor, and rolled up during the day, though Og of Bashan is said to have had a bedstead (Deut. 3:11). The tables in OT times were generally very low and people sat upon the floor to eat. Royal tables were often higher (Judg. 1:7), as were those in NT times (Mark 7:28).

G

GAAL (gā'ăl, Heb. ga'al, loathing), a son of Ebed (Judg. 9:26-41), captain of a band of freebooters who incited the Shechemites to rebel against the rule of Abimelech. After the death of his father, Gideon, Abimelech murdered all but one of his 70 brothers so that he might become king of Shechem. After gaining the confidence of the men of Shechem, Gaal boasted under intoxication that he could overcome Abimelech if made leader of the Shechemites. Zebul, the prefect of Shechem, jealous of Gaal, secretly relayed this information to Abimelech who set up an ambush by night with four companies against Shechem. In the morning when Gaal went out and stood in the gate of the city, Abimelech and his army rose up out of hiding and chased Gaal and his company into the city, but Zebul thrust them out. Whereupon, Abimelech fought against the rebels and killed them and destroyed their city and sowed it with salt. Nothing more is known of Gaal, but clearly his weakness was foolhardy boasting which he failed to make good in action.

GAASH (gā'ăsh, Heb. ga'ash, quaking), a hill near Mount Ephraim. On its N side was Timnath-serah, the city given to Joshua (Josh. 19:49,50), where also he was buried (Judg. 2:9). The "brooks of Gaash" was the native place of Hiddai (II Sam. 23).

GABA (gā'-bà, Heb. gāva'), a Benjamite city (Josh. 18:24). Same as Geba (21:17; I Kings 15:22).

GABBAI (găb'-ā-ī, Heb. gabbay, collector), a chief of Benjamin after the captivity (Neh. 11:8).

GABBATHA (găb'à-thà, Aram. gabbetha', height, ridge), the place called the "Pavement" (John 19:13). Here Pilate sat on the Bema, or judgment seat, and sentenced Jesus before the people. Josephus (Ant. xv. 8, 5) states that the temple was near the castle of Antonia, and implies that Herod's palace was near the castle (xv. 11, 5). Therefore, if Pilate was residing in Herod's palace at Passover time in order to keep a watchful eye on the Jews, his residence was near the castle. An early pavement has been excavated near here consisting of slabs of stones three feet square and a foot or more thick. This may well have been the pavement where Jesus was brought forth from the judgment hall for sentencing.

GABRIEL (gā'brĭ-ĕl, Heb. gavrî'ēl, man of God, Gr. Gabriél), an angel mentioned four times in Scripture, each time bearing a momentous message. He interpreted to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat (Dan. 8:16f). In Daniel 9:21f he explained the vision of the 70 Weeks. Gabriel announced to Zacharias the birth of John, forerunner of the Messiah (Luke 1:11-20), and he was sent to Mary with the unique message of Jesus' birth (Luke 1:26-38). His preparation is the ideal for every messenger of God: "I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee" (Luke 1:19). The Bible does not define his angel-status, but he appears in the Book of Enoch (chs. 9,20,40) as an archangel.

GAD (găd, Heb. gādh, fortune). 1. Jacob's seventh son; firstborn of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid (Gen. 30:9-11). Of his personal life nothing is known except that he had seven sons at the time of the descent into Egypt (46:16).

The Gadites numbered 45,650 adult males (Num. 1:24,25), but at the second census their number had fallen to 40,500 (26:18). Their position on march was S of the tabernacle next to Reuben. These two tribes and the half-tribe of Manasseh remained shepherds like their forefathers, and because of their "great multitude of cattle" they requested of Moses the rich pasture lands E of Jordan for their possession (Num. 32). This was granted (Josh. 18:7) on the condition that they accept their responsibility by accompanying the nine and a half tribes across Jordan in warfare against the Canaanites. The warriors of these two and a half tribes took the lead in the conquest of western Palestine (Josh. 1:12-18; 4:12) and returned to their families with Joshua's blessing (22:1-9). Fearing that the Jordan would alienate their children from the fellowship and faith of the western tribes, they erected a huge altar called Ed ("witness") as evidence of their unity in race and faith (Josh. 22:10-34). A satisfactory explanation removed the thought of war which seemed inevitable at first over a schismatic religion.

The territory of Gad, difficult to define, was formerly ruled by Sihon, king of the Amorites. It lay chiefly in the center of the land E of Jordan, with the half-tribe of Manasseh on the N and Reuben to the S. The northern border reached as far as the Sea of Chinnereth (Josh. 13:27); the southern border seems to have been just above Heshbon (13:26), although cities below this were built by Gad (Num. 32:34). One of these is Dibon, where the famous Moabite stone was found.

Genesis 49:19 seems to describe the military prowess of the Gadites: "Gad, a troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at the last" ("press upon their heel," ASV) meaning that they would put their enemies to retreat. Moses said of Gad: "Blessed is he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lioness and teareth the arm, yea, the crown of the head," etc. (Deut. 33:20,21). Because they trusted in the Lord and cried to Him for help, they utterly defeated the Hagarites (I Chron. 5:18-22). It was natural for men of such faith and ability to extend their borders as far as Gilead (5:16). Of the Gadites who joined themselves to David it is said that they were "men of might, and men of war fit for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler," etc. (I Chron. 12:8,14,15). Other famous men of Gilead or Gad were Barzillai (II Sam. 17:27; 19:31-40) and Elijah. The land of Gad was long the battlefield between Syria and Israel (II Kings 10:33). Gad finally was carried captive by Assyria (II Kings 15:29; I Chron. 5:26) and Ammon seized their land and cities (Jer. 49:1).

2. The seer or prophet of King David. He advised David to get out of "the hold" and flee from Saul into Judah (I Sam. 22:5). Later, he gave David his choice of punishment from the Lord for his sin in numbering the children of Israel (II Sam. 24:11-17; I Chron. 21:9-17) and told him to build an altar to the Lord in the threshingfloor of Araunah (II Sam. 24:18). Gad assisted in arranging the musical services of the temple (II Chron. 29:25) and recorded the acts of David in a book (I Chron. 29:29).

3. A Canaanite god of fortune, seen in compound names such as Baal-gad (Josh. 11:17; 12:7; 13:5) and Migdal-gad (Josh. 15:37). In Isaiah 45: 11f there is a curse against idolaters. "That troop" (Gad) is the Babylonian or Syrian deity Fortune and "that number" (Meni) is the deity Destiny (see ASV). A.M.R.

GADARA, GADARENES (găd'ā-rà, găd-à-rēnz', Gr. Gádara, Gadarenón). Gadara was a member of the Decapolis and is associated with "the country of the Gadarenes" in the Gospels (Mark 5:1; Luke 8:26,37; Matt. 8:28, Gr. text). Its ruins are identified with Um Keis today on a steep hill five miles SE of the Sea of Galilee and three miles S of the Hieromax or Yarmuk River. At the foot of the hill to the N were hot springs and baths. When Christ came across the lake from Capernaum, He landed at the SE corner where the steep bank descends from the eastern highlands into the Jordan valley. Two demoniacs met Him, and out of them Jesus cast many demons. There were swine feeding nearby, and when Jesus allowed the demons to enter them they ran headlong down the steep slope into the lake and were drowned. In the cliffs around Gadara, or Um Keis, tombs have been excavated out of the limestone, some measuring 20 feet square, with side recesses for bodies. Like the demoniacs, people still dwell in them today. Nearby there is a field of several acres strewn from stone coffins and their lids. This description would hardly fit Gerasa, a town some 50 miles S of the Sea of Galilee, although it might be appropriate to refer generally to it as the "country of the Gerasenes," which is the reading of an important manuscript in Mark and Luke. Some texts of Matthew and Luke read "country of the Gergesenes," which is identified with the present Khersa farther N on the eastern shore of the lake. This might not be improper if the town were under the jurisdiction of the larger Gadara. Khersa's steep hill rising from the water's edge with rock-caves suitable for tombs does meet the narrative description of the Gospels. In Roman times Gadara was the best fortified city in Peraea, and its remains are impressive still. A Roman street can be seen with its colonnades prostrate on either side. A.M.R.

GADDI (găd'ī, Heb. gaddî), Manasseh's representative among the twelve spies (Num. 13:11).

GADDIEL (găd'ī-ĕl, Heb. gaddî'al), Zebulun's representative among the twelve spies (Num. 13:10).

GADI (gā'dī), father of Menahem who usurped the throne of Israel from Shallum (II Kings 15:14-20).

GAHAM (gā'-hăm), a son of Nahor, brother of Abraham, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

GAHAR (gā'hàr), a family of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra 2: 47).

GAIUS (gā'yŭs, Gr. Gaíos). 1. A Macedonian who traveled with Paul on his third missionary journey and was seized in the riot at Ephesus (Acts 19:29).

2. A man of Derbe who was one of those accompanying Paul from Macedonia to Asia (Acts 20:4).

3. A Corinthian whom Paul baptized (I Cor. 1: 14). Since Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans from Corinth, this may be the same Gaius who was his host and "of the whole church" (either in whose house the Christians assembled or were given lodging Rom. 16:23).

4. The addressee of III John. A convert of John, he is spoken of as "the wellbeloved" (III John 1) and is commended for his love and hospitality to traveling preachers of the Gospel (III John 5-8).

GALAL (gā'lăl), the name of two Levites: 1. I Chronicles 9:15.

2. I Chronicles 9:16; Nehemiah 11:17.

GALATIA (gà-lā'shĭ-à), the designation in NT times of a territory in north-central Asia Minor, also a Roman province in central Asia Minor The name was derived from the people called Galatians (Galatai), a Greek modification of their original name Keltoi or Keltai, Celtic tribes from ancient Gaul. After having invaded Macedonia and Greece about 280 B.C., they crossed into Asia Minor on the invitation of Nikomedes I, king of Bithynia, to aid him in a civil war. After ravaging far and wide, they were finally confined to the north-central part of Asia Minor, where they settled as conquerors, giving their name to the territory. Their chief city-centers were Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium. In 189 B.C. the Galatians were subjugated by Rome and continued as a subject kingdom under their own chiefs, and after 63 B.C. under kings. Upon the death of King Amyntas in 25 B.C., the Galatian kingdom was converted into a Roman province called Galatia. The province included not only the area inhabited by the Galatians but also parts of Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Isauria. The terms Galatia and Galatians henceforth carried a double connotation: geographically, to designate the territory inhabitated by the Galatians, politically to denote the entire Roman province. That the cities of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, evangelized by Paul on his first missionary journey, were in the province of Galatia is now recognized by all scholars.

The name Galatia occurs in I Corinthians 16:1; Galatians 1:2; II Timothy 4:10; and I Peter 1:1. In the last passage some scholars think the reference may be to the European Gaul. In Acts 16:6, 18:23 the name is an adjective (Galatikē chōra), the Galatian country or region. Luke apparently means the district, not the province, since in Acts, when speaking of Asia Minor, he employs the old ethnographic designations. The context in I Peter 1:1 seems clearly to indicate that the province is meant. Paul's general practice of employing political designations would point to that usage also in Galatians 1:1 and I Corinthians 16:1.

If Galatia in Galatians 1:1 means the Roman province, then the churches addressed were those founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13-14); if it means the old ethnographic territory of Galatia, then the churches were established on the second missionary journey (Acts 16:6).

D.E.H.

GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE, a short but very important letter of Paul, containing his passionate polemic against the perversion or contamination of the Gospel of God's grace. It has aptly been described as "the Magna Charta of spiritual emancipation" and it remains as the abiding monument of the liberation of Christianity from the trammels of legalism.

The contents of the epistle so unmistakably reveal the traces of Paul's mind and style that its genuineness has never been seriously questioned even by the most radical NT critics. The testimony of the early church to its integrity and Pauline origin is strong and unambiguous.

Written to "the churches of Galatia," it is the only Pauline epistle that is specifically addressed to a group of churches. They were all founded by Paul (1:8,11; 4:19-20), were all the fruit of a single mission (3:1-3; 4:13-14), and were all affected by the same disturbance (1:6-7; 5:7-9). Paul had preached among them the Gospel of the free grace of God through the death of Christ (1:6; 3:1-14). The reception of Paul and his message by the Galatians had been warm and affectionate (4:12-15). The converts willingly endured persecution for their faith (3:4) and "were running well" when Paul left them (5:7).

The startling information received by Paul that a sudden and drastic change in attitude toward him and his Gospel was taking place in the Galatian churches caused the writing of the epistle. The change was being induced by the propaganda of certain Jewish teachers who professed to be Christians, acknowledged Jesus as Messiah, but overlaid and obscured the simplicity of the Gospel of free grace by their insistence that to faith in Christ must be added circumcision and obedience to the Mosaic law (2:16; 3:2-3; 4:10,21; 5:2-4; 6:12). Paul realized clearly that this teaching neutralized the truth of Christ's all-sufficiency for salvation and destroyed the message of justification by faith. From this fatal mixing of law and grace Paul sought to save his converts by means of this epistle.

Due to the geographical and the political connotation of Galatia in NT times, two views concerning the location of the Galatian churches are advocated. The North-Galatian theory, which interprets the term in its old ethnographic sense to denote the territory inhabited by the Galatian tribes, locates the churches in north-central Asia Minor, holding that they were founded during Acts 16:6. The South-Galatian theory identifies these churches with those founded on the first missionary journey (Acts 13-14), located in the southern part of the province of Galatia. The former was the unanimous view of the Church Fathers. They naturally adopted that meaning since in the second century the province was again restricted to ethnic Galatia and the double meaning of the term disappeared. The majority of the modern commentators support the latter view. Supporting this view is the known practice of Paul of using provincial names in addressing his converts; it best explains the familiar reference to Barnabas in the epistle; Acts 16:6 gives no hint of such a protracted mission as the older view demands; the older view cannot explain why the Judaizers would bypass the important churches in South Galatia; known conditions in these churches fit the picture in the epistle.

Views concerning the place and date of composition are even more diverse. Advocates of the North-Galatian theory generally assign the epistle to Ephesus during the third missionary journey, near the time of Romans. South-Galatian advocates vary considerably; some place it before the Jerusalem Conference, while others place it as late as the third missionary journey. Advocates of the pre-Conference date place it at Syrian Antioch. Others place it on the second missionary journey, perhaps during the ministry at Corinth. The effort to date it before the Jerusalem Conference faces definite chronological difficulties. This early dating is not demanded by the silence of the epistle concerning the Conference decrees. The decrees were already known to the Galatians (Acts 16:4), while in writing the epistle Paul would desire to establish his position on grounds independent of the Jerusalem Church. Since apparently he had already twice visited the churches (4:13; 1:9), a date after Paul's second visit to the south-Galatian churches seems most probable (c. A.D. 52). During that second visit Paul had sought by warning and instructions to fortify his converts against the danger (1:9; 4:16; 5:3). The impact of the Judaizers upon the Galatians threatened to destroy his work. The result was this bristling letter.

The contents of Galatians make evident Paul's purpose in writing. The first two chapters show that he was compelled to vindicate his apostolic authority. The Judaizers, in order to establish their own position which contradicted Paul's teaching, had attempted to discredit his authority. Having vindicated his apostolic call and authority, Paul next sets forth the doctrine of justification in refutation of the teaching of the Judaizers. A reasoned, comprehensive exposition of the doctrine of justification by faith exposed the errors of legalism. Since the Judaizers asserted that to remove the believer from under the law opened the floodgates to immorality, Paul concluded his presentation with an elaboration of the true effect of liberty upon the Christian life, showing that the truth of justification by faith logically leads to a life of good works. The epistle may be outlined as follows:

THE INTRODUCTION. 1:1-10
1. The salutation. 1-5
2. The rebuke. 6-10

I. The Vindication of his Apostolic Authority. 1:11-2:21
1. The reception of his Gospel by revelation. 1:11-24
2. The confirmation of his Gospel by the apostles at Jerusalem. 2:1-10
3. The illustration of his independence. 2:11-21

II. The Exposition of Justification by Faith. 3:1-4:31
1. The elaboration of the doctrine. 3:1-4:7
   a. The nature of justification by faith. 3:1-14
   b. The limitations of the law and its relations to faith. 3:15-4:7
2. The appeal to drop all legalism. 4:8-31

III. The Nature of the Life of Christian Liberty. 5:1-6:10
1. The call to maintain their liberty. 5:1
2. The peril of Christian liberty. 5:2-12
3. The life of liberty. 5:13-6:10

THE CONCLUSION. 6:11-17

THE BENEDICTION. 6:18

D.E.H.

GALBANUM (gal'bā-nŭm), a gum resin from two Persian plants of the carrot family. It has a pungent, disagreeable odor and was mixed with other ingredients in the sacred incense to increase and retain its fragrance longer. (Exod. 30:34).

GALEED (găl'ē-ĕd, Heb. gal'ēdh, a heap of witnesses), the name given by Jacob to the heap of stones which he and Laban raised on Mount Gilead as a memorial of their brotherly covenant (Gen. 31:47,48). Sealing their compact of friendship with a common meal, Laban called the place Jegarsahadutha, the Aramaic or Chaldee equivalent, meaning "the heap of testimony."

GALILEAN (găl'ĭ-lē'ăn), a native or resident of Galilee (Matt. 26:69; John 4:45; Acts 1:11, 5:37) and detected as such by his dialect (Mark 14:70).

GALILEE (găl'ĭ-lē, Heb. hā-gālîl, the ring or circuit, Gr. he Galilaía), the most northerly of the three provinces of Palestine (Galilee, Samaria, Judea). Measuring approximately 50 miles N to S and 30 miles E to W, it was bounded on the W by the plain of Akka to the foot of Mt. Carmel. The Jordan, the Sea of Galilee, Lake Huleh, and the spring at Dan marked off the eastern border. Its northern boundary went eastward from Phoenicia to Dan. The southern border was in a southeasterly direction from the base of Mt. Carmel and the Samaritan hills along the Valley of Jezreel (Plain of Esdraelon) to Mt. Gilboa and Scythopolis (Bethshean) to the Jordan. The Valley of Jezreel was a vital communications link between the coastal plain and the center of Palestine. For this reason, decisive battles were often fought here for possession of this desirable pass. The city of Megiddo was important for the control of the valley and lends its name to Har-Magedon, the Hill of Megiddo, or Armageddon, where the conflict between Christ and the armies of the Antichrist is predicted to occur (Rev. 16:16).

An imaginary line from the plain of Akka to the N end of the Sea of Galilee divided the country into Upper and Lower Galilee. "Galilee of the Gentiles" refers chiefly to Upper Galilee, which is separated from Lebanon by the Leontes River. It was the territory of Asher and Naphtali. Here lie the ruins of Kedesh Naphtali, one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:7; 21-32). In this region lay the twenty towns given by Solomon to Hiram, King of Tyre, in payment for timber from Lebanon (I Kings 9:11). The land was luxurious and productive, a rugged mountainous country of oaks and terebinths interrupted by fertile plains. It was said of Asher, in the west, that he would eat fat for bread and yield royal dainties and dip his feet in oil (Gen. 49:20; Deut. 33:24,25). The olive oil of Galilee has long been esteemed as of the highest quality. Lower Galilee was largely the heritage of Zebulun and Issachar. Less hilly and of a milder climate than Upper Galilee, it included the rich plain of Esdraelon (or Jezreel) and was a "pleasant" land (Gen. 49:15) that would yield "treasures in the sand" (Deut. 33:19) The sand of these coasts was especially valuable for making glass. Important caravan trade routes carried their busy traffic through Galilee from Egypt and southern Palestine to Damascus in the NE as well as E and W from the Mediterranean to the Far East.

The northern part of Naphtali was inhabited by a mixed race of Jews and heathen (Judg. 1:33). Its Israelite population was carried away captive to Assyria to Tiglath-pileser and replaced by a colony of heathen immigrants (II Kings 15:29; 17:24), hence called "Galilee of the nations" or "Gentiles" (Isa. 9:1; Matt. 4:13,15,16). During and after the captivity, the predominant mixture of Gentile races impoverished the worship of Judaism. For the same reason the Galilean accent and dialect were noticeably peculiar (Matt. 26:73). This caused the southern Jews of purer blood and orthodox tradition to despise them (John 7:52). Nathanael asked, rather contemptuously, "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (John 1:46). Yet its very darkness was the Lord's reason for granting it more of the light of His presence and ministry than to self-satisfied and privileged Judea. He was sent "for a light of the Gentiles" (Isa. 42:6) as well as to the "lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. 15:24). Wherever He found faith and repentance, He bestowed His blessing, whereas unbelief often hindered His activity (Matt. 13:58). He preached His first public sermon in the synagogue at Nazareth, in Lower Galilee, where He had been brought up (Luke 4:16-30). His disciples came from Galilee (Matt. 4:18; John 1:43,44; Acts 1:11, 2:7); in Cana of Galilee He performed His first miracle (John 2:11). Capernaum in Galilee, the home of His manhood (Matt. 4:13; 9:1), is where the first three Gospels present His major ministry. Galilee's debasement made some of its people feel their need of the Saviour. This and its comparative freedom from priestly and pharisaical prejudice may have been additional reasons for receiving the larger share of the Lord's ministry.

After the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C., Herod Antipas governed the tetrarchy of Galilee (Luke 3:1) until A.D. 39. Jesus referred to him as "that fox" (Luke 13:32). Sepphoris was his capital at first, three miles N of Nazareth, but about A.D. 20 he built a new capital on the shore of the Sea of Galilee and named it Tiberias, after the reigning emperor. Succeeding him was Herod Agrippa I with the title of "king." Upon his death in A.D. 44 (Acts 12:23), Galilee was joined for a while to the Roman province of Syria, after which it was given to Agrippa II. It became the land of Zealots and patriots who, in their hatred of foreign rule and in their longing for the Messiah, incited the populace to rebellion, which led Rome to destroy Jerusalem in A.D. 70. After the fall of Jerusalem, Galilee became famous for its rabbins and schools of Jewish learning. The Sanhedrin or Great Council was moved to Sepphoris and then to Tiberias on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. This is most interesting in light of the fact that when Herod Antipas built his capital and residence on top of a cemetery, strict Jews utterly abhorred the place. Here the Mishna was compiled, to which the Gemara was added subsequently, forming the Palestinian Talmud. The remains of splendid synagogues in Galilee, such as those at Capernaum and Chorazin, still attest to the prosperity of the Jews there from the second to the seventh century.

In 1925 the famous "Galilee skull" was found in a cave near the Sea of Galilee; and in 1932, in a cave near Mt. Carmel, Dr. Theodore D. McCown discovered a Paleolithic skeleton resembling primitive Neanderthal man. A.M.R.

GALILEE, SEA OF, so-called from its washing the E side of Galilee. It is also known by other names. It is called "the Sea of Gennesaret" (Luke 5:1), since the fertile Plain of Gennesaret lies on the NW (Matt. 14:34). The OT calls it "the Sea of Chinnereth (Heb. "harp-shaped," the shape of the sea, Num. 34:11; Deut. 3:17; Josh. 13:27) or "Chinneroth" (Josh. 12:3; I Kings 15:20), from the town so named on its shore (Josh. 19:35), of which Gennesaret is probably the corruption. "The Sea of Tiberias" is another designation (John 6:1; 21:1), associated with the capital of Herod Antipas. All its names were derived from places on the western shore. Its present name is Bahr Tabariyeh.

Located some 60 miles N of Jerusalem, its bed is but a lower depression of the Jordan valley. The water's surface is 685 feet below the level of the Mediterranean and it varies in depth up to 150 feet. As the Jordan River plunges southward on its course from Mt. Hermon to the Dead Sea, it enters the Sea of Galilee at its northern end and flows out of its southern end, a distance of thirteen miles. Its greatest width is eight miles, at Magdala. The view from Nazareth road to Tiberias is beautiful. The bare hills on the W, except at Khan Minyeh (present Capernaum) where there is a small cliff, are recessed from the shore. From the eastern side, the western hills appear to rise out of the water to a height of 2000 feet, while far to the N can be seen snowy Mt. Hermon. The eastern hills rise from a coast of half a mile in width and are flat along the summit. The whole basin betrays its volcanic origin, which accounts for the cliffs of hard porous basalt and the hot springs at Tiberias, famous for their medicinal value. The warm climate produces tropical vegetation — the lotus thorn, palms, and indigo. The Plain of Gennesaret on the NW abounds with walnuts, figs, olives, grapes, and assorted wild flowers. Josephus called it "the ambition of nature which forces those plants that are natural enemies to one another to agree together" (Josephus iii. Wars, x.8). The fresh water is sweet, sparkling, and transparent, with fish in abundance. Smith paints an idyllic picture of the whole scene: "In that torrid basin, approached through such sterile surroundings, the lake feeds every sense of the body with life. Sweet water, full of fish, a surface of sparkling blue, tempting down breezes from above, bringing forth breezes of her own, the Lake of Galilee is at once food, drink and air, a rest to the eye, coolness in the heat, an escape from the crowd, and a facility of travel very welcome in so exhausting a climate. Even those who do not share her memories of Christ feel enthusiasm for her. The Rabbis said: 'Jehovah hath created seven seas, but the Sea of Gennesaret is His delight.' " (George Adam Smith, The Historical Geography of the Holy Land, New York: A. C. Armstrong and Son, 1908, p.

442). The Gospel accounts picture fishing as a prosperous industry here in Biblical times, but today, instead of fleets of fishing vessels, only a boat or two is seen. On these shores Jesus called His first disciples, four of whom were fishermen, and made of them fishers of men (Matt. 4:18; Luke 5:1-11).

The Sea of Galilee is noted for its sudden and violent storms caused by cold air sweeping down from the vast naked plateaus of Gaulanitis, the Hauran and Mt. Hermon through the ravines and gorges and converging at the head of the lake where it meets warm air. It was just such a storm that Jesus rebuked with His "Peace, be still" (Mark 4:39). Another time, the disciples were trying to reach Bethsaida when "a great wind" turned the water into huge waves, preventing any headway. Then Jesus appeared, walking toward them on the tempestuous water. As soon as they took Him into the boat they reached their desired haven (Matt. 14:22-34; Mark 6:45-53; John 6:15-21). So impressed were the disciples that they worshiped Him saying, "Of a truth Thou art the Son of God."

The Sea of Galilee was the focus of Galilee's wealth. Nine cities of 15,000 or more stood on its shores. To the NW was Capernaum, the home of Peter and Andrew (Mark 1:29) and where Matthew sat at custom (Matt. 9:9). It was the scene of much of Jesus' Galilean ministry. Below this, on the western side, was Magdala (present Mejdal), the home of Mary Magdalene, and three miles S of here was Tiberias, the magnificent capital of Galilee. On the NE corner was Bethsaida Julias, the native place of Philip, Andrew and Peter (John 1:44), and one-time capital of Philip the tetrarch. Gergesa lay S of here. The sites of Capernaum, Chorazin (modern Kerazeh) to the N of it, and Bethsaida have long been in dispute. Whatever their locations may have been, their near obliteration accords with their condemnation by the Saviour for their unbelief (Matt. 11:20-24). Of these towns, once thriving with dyeing, tanning, boat building, fishing, and fish-curing, two are now inhabited, namely Magdala, consisting of a few mud huts, and Tiberias. A.M.R.

GALL. 1. From a Heb. root meaning bitter, the human gall (Job 16:13; 20:25); the poison of serpents (20:14).

2. Heb. rō'sh, head. A bitter and poisonous herb, perhaps the poppy (Deut. 29:18; Jer. 8:14, 9:15; Hos. 10:4, "hemlock"). Criminals were given a potion before crucifixion to deaden pain. Thus, opium would suit well the drink given to the Lord: "vinegar (wine, ASV) mingled with gall" (Gr. cholé, Matt. 27:34, cf. Ps. 69:21). Mark says "with myrrh" (15:23). But Jesus chose to bear the full agony of death.

GALLERY, three terraced passageways or balconies running round the chambers in the temple of Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 41:16; 42:3,5,6). The upper two stories were shorter due to the absence of supporting pillars.

GALLEY (See Ship)

GALLIM (găl'ĭm, Heb. gallîm, heaps), a town of Benjamin enumerated with Laish and Anathoth (Isa. 10:30). By "daughter of Gallim" is meant the inhabitants. It was the home of Phalti the son of Laish (I Sam. 25:44). Site uncertain.

GALLIO (gal'ĭ-ō, Gr. Gallíon), Junius Annaeus Gallio, the Roman proconsul (AV, "deputy") of Achaia when Paul was in Corinth (A.D. 51). Luke accurately calls him "proconsul," for Achaia had been an imperial province administered by a legate, but in A.D. 44 Claudius gave it to the Senate whose provinces alone were under the rule of proconsuls.

Born in Cordova, Spain, as Marcus Annaeus Novatus, he was adopted into the family of Lucius Junius Gallio, the rhetorician, whose name he took. Of his amiable character Seneca said, "No mortal was ever so sweet to one as Gallio was to all," and, his brother adds, "to love him to the utmost was to love all too little." How exactly and undesignedly this independent testimony coincides with Acts 18:12-17! Alarmed over the inroads that the Gospel was making, the Jews in Corinth brought Paul before the judgment seat of Gallio. The charge: "persuading men to worship God contrary to the law." But which law? Meaning their own, they hoped to convince Gallio that Paul was guilty of an offense against a lawful religion and hence against the Roman Government itself; but he was not impressed. "If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you," said he. "But since (Gr.) it is a question of words and names and your law, look ye to it; for I will be no judge of such matters. And he drave them from the judgment seat." The Greeks then beat the chief ruler of the synagogue, but Gallio remained indifferent to the incident. A governor more stern might have arrested the violence at once, but in the providence of God Gallio's action amounted to an authoritative decision that Paul's preaching was not subversive against Rome. This gave Paul the protection he needed to continue his preaching there. Had Gallio become a Christian, he might not have committed suicide later.

GALLOWS, a pole for executing and exhibiting a victim by impalement. Made 75 feet high by Haman for Mordecai (Esth. 5:14; 6:4).

GAMALIEL (gā-mā'lĭ-ĕl, Heb. gamlî'ēl, reward of God, Gr. Gamaliél). 1. Son of Pedahzur and chief of the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 1:10; 2:20; 7:54, 59; 10:23). He assisted Moses in numbering the people.

2. A Pharisee and eminent doctor of the law; grandson of Hillel and first of only seven rabbis to be given the title of Rabban. Paul was one of his pupils (Acts 22:3). When the enraged Sanhedrin sought to slay the Apostles for their bold testimony to Christ, Gamaliel stood up in the council and urged judicious caution on the ground that if the new doctrine were of God they could not overthrow it, and if it were of man it would perish of itself (Acts 5:34-39). Held in esteem by all the people, his counsel was heeded, and God used it to give a needed respite to the infant Church. Inasmuch as Gamaliel believed in God's sovereign control, his advice was sound; but also underlying it was the premise of pragmatism that what succeeds is good and what fails is evil. Contrarily, the Scriptures point out that the wicked do prosper (Ps. 73:12) and the godly are often destitute (Ps. 109:22-26). Truth must be tested by the standard of God's word. The tradition that he afterward became a Christian is incongruous with the high esteem accorded him in the Talmud: "Since Rabban Gamaliel died, the glory of the Law has ceased."

GAMES. Not much is known concerning the amusements of the ancient Israelites, partly because the earnestness of the Hebrew character did not give them prominence. Instead of public games, the great religious feasts supplied them with their anniversary occasions of national gatherings. There are references to dancing (Ps. 30:11; Jer. 31:13; Luke 15:25). The dance led by Jephthah's daughter (Judg. 11:34) and the dances of the Israelitish women (I Sam. 18:6; 21:11; 29:5) were public dances of rejoicing to celebrate a warrior's victory. Religious dancing was engaged in by Miriam and the women of Israel at the Red Sea (Exod. 15:20); by the Israelites around the golden calf at Sinai (32:19); and by David before the ark (II Sam. 6:14,16). (See also Ps. 149:3; 150:4). Of course, children of every race have their games. Zechariah prophesied that "the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof" (8:5). "He will . . . toss thee like a ball into a large country," warned Isaiah (22:18). In the NT the only children's game mentioned is that of mimicking the wedding dance and funeral wail to the music of the flute (Matt. 11:16,17; Luke 7:32).

Jason's introduction of Greek games and a gymnasium, frequented by the priests, was among the corrupting influences which broke down the fence of Judaism against Hellenism and threw it open to the sacrilegious assaults of King Antiochus Epiphanes, c. 175 B.C. (I Macc. 1:14; II Macc. 4:12-14). Herod erected a theater and amphitheater at Jerusalem and Caesarea where contests in gymnastics, chariot races, music, and wild beasts were held every five years in honor of Caesar, much to the annoyance of the faithful Jews (Josephus, Ant., XV, viii,1; ix,6).

The public games of Greece and Rome were common knowledge among Christians and non-Christians of the first century, providing the NT writers with rich source material from which to illustrate spiritual truths. Condemned criminals were thrown to lions in the arena as punishment and for sport. In I Corinthians 15:32 Paul alludes to fighting with beasts at Ephesus (though his frays were with beastlike men—Demetrius and his craftsmen—not with literal beasts, from which his Roman citizenship exempted him). When a Roman general returned home victorious, he led his army in a triumphal procession, at the end of which trailed the captives who were condemned to fight with beasts. Paul felt that in contrast to the proud Corinthians, God had set forth (exhibited prior to execution) the Apostles last as captives doomed to die, because they were made a spectacle to be gazed at and made sport of in the arena of the world (I Cor. 4:9). Nero used to clothe the Christians in beast skins when he exposed them to wild beasts. Cf. II Timothy 4:17, "I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion" (viz. from Satan's snare, I Pet. 5:8).

In I Corinthians 9:24,25 the Isthmian games, celebrated every two years on the isthmus of Corinth, are vividly alluded to. Held in honor of the Greek gods, the festival consisted of foot races, horse races, chariot contests, jumping, wrestling, boxing, and throwing of the discus and javelin. To the Greeks they were a subject of patriotic pride, a passion rather than a pastime, and thus made a suitable image of earnestness in the Christian race: "Know ye not that they which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the prize? So run, that ye may obtain. And every man that striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible." The coveted crown was a garland made of laurel, olives leaves, or pine needles; our crown is incorruptible (I Pet. 1:4) and therefore demands greater fidelity. The competitor had to "strive lawfully" or else he was not crowned (II Tim. 2:5), i.e. he had to observe the conditions of the contest, keeping to the bounds of the course, having previously trained himself for ten months with chastity, abstemious diet, enduring cold, heat, and severe exercise. As in boxing, so in the Christian race, Paul beat his body and brought it under subjection, lest that by any means when he had preached ("heralded"; the herald announced the name and country of each contestant and displayed the prizes) to others, he should be rejected by the judge, not as to salvation but to the winner's crown of victory (James 1:12). In view of the reward, Paul denied himself, being servant of all in order to win more souls to Jesus Christ. The Christian does not beat the air, missing his opponent, but he fights certainly, with telling blows upon the enemy (I Cor. 9:18-27). As the runner looks intently at the goal and casts away every encumbrance, so the Christian runs, casting aside not only sinful lusts but even harmless and otherwise useful things which would retard him. He must run with enduring perseverance the race set before him, looking off unto Jesus who is the Captain and Finisher of our faith (Heb. 12:1,2). Paul used the same figure in addressing the Ephesian elders (Acts 20:24) and the Philippians (3:12-14). The Colossians were urged to let the peace of God rule as umpire in their hearts and thus restrain wrong passions that they might attain the prize to which they were called (3:15). Other allusions to the language of games are in Ephesians 6:12, "We wrestle not against flesh and blood" and II Timothy 4:7, "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course" (Gr. I have struggled the good contest, not merely a fight). See also I Timothy 6:12 and Revelation 2:10. A.M.R.

GAMMADIM (găm'ă-dĭm, Heb. gammādhîm), occurs in Ezekiel 27:11 only as "gammadims" (KJV), but in ASV translated "valorous men." Foreigners would hardly be trusted to watch in the towers of Tyre. Variously interpreted, the ASV rendering seems most fitting as an epithet of the warriors of Tyre.

GAMUL (gā'-mŭl, Heb. gāmûl), the head of the twenty-second course of priests (I Chron. 24:17).

GARDEN (Heb. gan, gannâh, a covered or hidden place, Gr. kéros), a cultivated piece of ground, usually in the suburbs, planted with flowers, vegetables, shrubs, or trees, fenced with a mud or stone wall (Prov. 24:31) or thorny hedges (Isa. 5:5) and guarded (whence "garden") by a watchman in a lodge (Isa. 1:8) or tower (Mark 12:1) to drive away wild beasts and robbers.

The quince, citron, almond and other fruits, herbs, and various vegetables and spices are mentioned as growing in gardens. A reservoir cistern, or still better a fountain of water, was essential to a good garden. See Song of Solomon 4:15, "a fountain of gardens," i.e. a fountain sufficient to water many gardens.

The occurrence of no less than 250 botanical terms in the OT shows the Israelite fondness for flowers, fruits, and pleasant grounds. These are still a delight to the Oriental who lives in a hot, dry country. Every house court or area generally had its shade tree. The vine wound round the trellis or outside staircase, the emblem of the loving and fruitful wife and happy home (Ps. 128:3). The "orchards" (Heb. paradises) were larger gardens specially for fruit trees. Solomon's gardens and fruit orchards with pools of water for irrigation (Eccl. 2:4-6) very likely suggested the imagery of Song of Solomon 4:12-15. The "king's garden" (II Kings 25:4; Neh. 3:15; Jer. 39:4; 52:7) was near the pool of Siloam.

The Hebrews used gardens as burial places. The field of Machpelah, Abraham's burial ground, was a garden with trees in and around it (Gen. 23:17). Manasseh and Amon were buried in Uzza's garden (II Kings 21:18,26). The garden of Gethsemane was a favorite resort of Jesus for meditation and prayer (Matt. 26:36; John 18:1,2). In idolatrous periods, gardens were made the scene of superstition and image worship, the awful counterpart of the primitive Eden (Isa. 1:29; 65:3; 66:17). The new Paradise regained by the people of God (Rev. 22:1-5) suggests in a fuller way the old paradise planted by God but lost through sin (Gen. 2:8).

Spiritually, the believer is a garden watered by the Holy Spirit (Jer. 2:13; 17:7,8; John 4:13,14; 7:37-39). The righteous "shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season" (Ps. 1:3). "A well watered garden" expresses abundant happiness and prosperity (Isa. 58:11; Jer. 31:12) just as "a garden that hath no water" (Isa. 1:30) expresses spiritual, national and individual barrenness and misery. GAREB (gā'rĕb, Heb. gārēv, scabby). 1. An Ithrite, a member of one of the families of Kirjathjearim (I Chron. 2:53) and one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:38; I Chron. 11:40).

2. A hill near Jerusalem to which the city would expand, as foreseen by the prophet Jeremiah (31:39). The site is unknown.

GARMENTS (See Dress)

GARMITE (gär'mīt, Heb. garmî), a name applied to Keilah (I Chron. 4:19). Meaning is obscure.

GARNER (gär'nêr, Heb. māzû), a barn or storehouse (Ps. 144:13); Heb. 'ōtsār, a storehouse for precious items (II Chron. 32:27) and for food (Joel 1:17). Gr. apothéke, a barn used as a granary (Matt. 3:12; 6:26; Luke 3:17; 12:18,24).

GARRISON (Heb. matstsāv and netsîv, placed), a fortress manned by soldiers (II Chron. 17:2). Its primary reference is that of a military post for the occupation of a conquered country such as the Philistines had when they held the land of Israel (I Sam. 10:5; 13:3; 14:1,6). David put garrisons in Syria and Edom when he subjugated those people (II Sam. 8:6,14). In Ezekiel 26:11, "thy strong garrisons" is a wrong rendering of matstsēvâh. It refers to the pillars or obelisks in honor of the gods of Tyre which would totter before the conquering Nebuchadnezzar.

GASHMU (găsh'mū, Heb. gashmû, Neh. 6:6), a form of Geshem (2:19; 6:1,2), an Arabian who opposed Nehemiah's building of the wall of Jerusalem.

GATAM (gā'tăm, Heb. ga'tām), grandson of Esau; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:11,16; I Chron. 1:36).

GATE (Heb. usually sha'ar, opening, Gr. púle), the entrance to enclosed buildings, grounds, or cities. The gates of a city were the place where the Oriental resorted for legal business, conversation, bargaining, and news. The usual gateway consisted of double doors plated with metal (Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2). Wooden doors without iron plating were easily set on fire (Judg. 9:52; Neh. 2:3,17). Some gates were made out of brass, as was "the Beautiful Gate" of Herod's temple (Acts 3:2), more costly than nine others of the outer court that had been poured over with gold and silver (Josęph, Wars of the Jews, V,v,3). Still others were of solid stones (Isa. 54:12; Rev. 21:21). Massive stone doors are found in ancient towns of Syria, single slabs several inches thick and ten feet high, turning on pivots above and below. Gates ordinarily swung on projections that fitted into sockets on the post and were secured with bars of wood (Nah. 3:13) or of metal (I Kings 4:13; Ps. 107:16; Isa. 45:2).

Being the weakest points in a city's walls, the gates were frequently the object of a foe's attack (Judg. 5:8; I Sam. 23:7; Ezek. 21:15,22) and therefore flanked by towers (II Sam. 18:24,33; II Chron. 14:7; 26:9). To "possess the gates" was to possess the city (Gen. 22:17; 24:60). They were shut at nightfall and opened again in the morning (Deut. 3:5; Josh. 2:5,7).

Markets were held at the gate, and the main item sold there gave its name to the gate ("sheep gate," Neh. 3:1; "fish gate," Neh. 3:3; "horse gate," Neh. 3:28). The gate was the place where people met to hear an important announcement (II Chron. 32:6; Jer. 7:2; 17:19-27) or the reading of the law (Neh. 8:1,3) or where the elders transacted legal business (Deut. 16:18; 21:18-20; Josh. 20:4; Ruth 4:1,2,11). "Neither oppress the afflicted in the gate" meant to mete out impartial justice

(Prov. 22:22). Psalm 69:12, "They that sit in the gate speak against me, and I was the song of the drunkards"; i.e., not only among the drunken revellers, but in the grave deliberations of the judges in the place of justice was he an object of abusive language. Amos 5:12, "they turn aside the poor in the gate"; i.e., they refuse them their right; vs. 10, "they hate him that rebuketh in the gate," viz. the judge who condemns them (Zech. 8:16). Isaiah 29:21, "They lay a snare for him that reproveth in the gate"; i.e., they try by bribes and misrepresentations to ensnare into a false decision the judge who in public court would reprove them for their iniquity, or to ensnare the prophet who publicly reproves them. "The Sublime Porte," the title for the Sultan of Turkey, was derived from the eastern usage of dispensing law in the gateway. It was also the king's or chief's place of audience (II Sam. 19:8; I Kings 22:10). Daniel sat in the gate of King Nebuchadnezzar as "ruler over the whole province of Babylon" (Dan. 2:48,49). Regarded as specially sacred, the threshold in Assyrian palaces bore cuneiform inscriptions and was guarded by human-headed bulls with eagles' wings. In Israel, sentences from the Law were inscribed on and above the posts and gates of private houses (Deut. 6:9). Josiah destroyed the high places near the gates that were used for heathen sacrifices (II Kings 23:8).

Figuratively, gates refer to the glory of a city (Isa. 3:26; 14:31; Jer. 14:2) or to the city itself (Ps. 87:2; 122:2). In Matthew 16:18, the "gates of Hades" not prevailing against the Church may refer to infernal powers assaulting the Church or to the Church's greater power in retaining her members than the grave has for its victims.

GATH (găth, Heb. gath, winepress), one of the five great Philistine cities (Ashdod, Gaza, Askelon, Gath, and Ekron, Josh. 13:3; I Sam. 6:17). Its people were the Gittites, of whom were Goliath (I Sam. 17:4) and other giants (II Sam. 21:19-22). In harmony with this fact is the record of the Anakims' presence in Gath after Joshua had destroyed the neighboring territory (Josh. 11:22). It was one of the five cities to which the Philistines carried the ark of God and thereby brought on the people God's heavy visitation with tumors (I Sam. 5:8,9). David fled from Saul to Gath where he feigned madness to save his life (I Sam. 21:10-15). The second time he visited Gath, King Achish assigned him Ziklag as a residence (I Sam. 27:2-6). During his sixteen months here, he won the confidence of the king through subterfuge and intrigue (27:7-29:11). Some of David's six hundred followers were Gittites, one of whom was his loyal friend Ittai. They may have attached themselves to him at this time or when he smote and subdued the Philistines (II Sam. 8:1; 15:18-21). Though tributary to Israel after David conquered it (I Chron. 18:1), Gath retained its own king (I Kings 2:39). Rehoboam, Solomon's son, rebuilt and fortified the town (II Chron. 11:8). Later, Hazael, king of Syria, captured Gath from Jehoash, king of Judah (II Kings 12:17), but Uzziah won it back (II Chron. 26:6). From the fall of this walled city Amos sounds a warning lesson to those at ease in Zion (6:1,2). The omission of Gath from the list of the five cities (Amos 1:6,8; Zeph. 2:4,5; Zech. 9:5,6) indicates it had lost its place among them by that time. Its site today is uncertain. Gath lay on the border between Judah and Philistia, between Shocoh and Ekron (I Sam. 17:1,52). Tell es-Safiyeh favors this description, lying on a hill at the foot of Judah's mountains, ten miles E of Ashdod and ten SE of Ekron.

GATH-HEPHER (găth-hē'fêr, Heb. gath hahēpher, winepress of the well), a town on Zebulun's border (Josh. 19:12,13, ASV). Birthplace of Jonah the prophet (II Kings 14:25). Now el Meshhed, where his supposed tomb is still shown, on a hill two miles from Nazareth in Galilee.

GATH-RIMMON (găth-rĭm'ŭn, Heb. gath rimmôn, winepress of Rimmon or pomegranates). 1. A city of Dan on the Philistine plain, given to the Levites (Josh. 19:45; 21:24; I Chron. 6:69).

2. A town of Manasseh, W of Jordan, assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:25). In I Chronicles 6:70 this is called Bileam, which is probably the true reading in Joshua 21:25, an error due to a copyist's eye catching "Gath-rimmon" in the previous verse.

GAULANITIS (gôl-ăn-ī'-tĭs), a province NE of the Sea of Galilee ruled by Herod Antipas. The name is derived from Golan, a city of Manasseh in Bashan and one of three cities of refuge E of the Jordan (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:8; 21:27).

GAZA (gā'-zà, Heb. 'azzâh, strong, Gr. Gáza), one of the five chief Philistine cities and the most southwesterly toward Egypt. Originally a seaport, the town moved to a hill three miles inland on the great caravan route between Syria and Egypt. Here it became an important rest stop on the edge of the desert and a popular trading center. Its position and strength (as its name means) made it the key of this line of communications. It is called by its Hebrew name Azzah (Deut. 2:23; I Kings 4:24; Jer. 25:20).

Originally a Canaanite city (Gen. 10:19), Gaza was assigned by Joshua to Judah (Josh. 15:47) but was not occupied till after Judah had taken it (Judg. 1:18), as the Anakims were still present (Josh 11:22; 13:3). The Philistines soon recovered it (Judg. 13:1) and there Samson perished while destroying his captors (16:1,21). Solomon ruled over it (I Kings 4:24), but it was Hezekiah who gave the decisive blow to the Philistines (II Kings 18:8). God through Amos threatened Gaza with destruction by fire for her transgressions (Amos 1:6). This was fulfilled by one of the pharaohs of Egypt (Jer. 47:1). The predictions that Gaza would be forsaken (Zeph. 2:4) and that its king should perish (Zech. 9:5, i.e., its Persian satrap, or petty king subordinate to the great king of Persia) were fulfilled by Alexander the Great who took the city in 332 B.C., after it had resisted his siege for two months. He bound Betis the satrap to a chariot, dragging him round the city, and slew 10,000 of its inhabitants, selling the rest as slaves. It was desolated again by fire and sword by the Maccabees in 96 B.C. In turn, Gaza passed under the control of Syria and Rome.

Philip met the Ethiopian eunuch "S unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza which is desert" (Acts 8:26). Once Gaza was the seat of a Christian church and bishop in the midst of Greek culture and temples, but it turned Moslem in A.D. 634. Now, of its 20,000 inhabitants, only a few hundred are Christians, the rest Moslems.

Modern Ghuzzeh is the metropolis of the Gaza Strip which is crowded with Arab refugees today. N of Ghuzzeh lies an extensive olive grove from the fruit of which soap is made. Its trade in corn is considerable, and there can still be heard the grinding of corn by millstones such as Samson was forced to work with in his prison house at Gaza (Judg. 16:21). The Tel el Muntar or "hill of the watchman" (II Kings 18:8), SE of Gaza, is the hill up which Samson carried the gates of the city (Judg. 16:3). A.M.R.

GAZELLE (See Animals)

GAZER (See Gezer)

GAZEZ (gā'zĕz). 1. Son of Ephah.
2. Grandson of Ephah, Caleb's concubine (I Chron. 2:46).

GAZZAM (găz'ăm), one of the Nethinim, whose posterity returned from exile (Ezra 2:48; Neh. 7:51).

GEBA (gē'bà, gā'bà, Heb. geva' hill), a town in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18:24 ASV, RSV; Gaba in KJV), assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21:17; I Chron. 6:60; 8:6). Jonathan defeated the Philistines at Geba (I Sam. 13:3). Saul and Jonathan then remained in Geba (I Sam. 13:16 ASV, RSV; KJV translates Gibeah, also in 14:5; see Judg. 20:10,33). Geba is SW of Wady Suweinīt, opposite Michmash (I Sam. 14:5), where Jonathan and his armor-bearer, by a bold stratagem won a signal victory. Geba should be Gibeon in II Samuel 5:25 (ASV margin has Gibeon), as in the parallel passage (I Chron. 14:16). Asa fortified Geba with stones and timber which Baasha had gathered to build Ramah (I Kings 15:22). In the time of Hezekiah Geba was the northernmost city of the kingdom of Judah, as Beersheba its southernmost (II Kings 23:8; II Chron. 16:6). The Assyrians, marching toward Jerusalem, stored their baggage at Michmash, crossed the pass to Geba and camped for a night (Isaiah 10:28,29). Men from Geba returned after the exile (Ezra 2:26; Neh. 7:30 ASV, RSV; Gaba in KJV). Levites from Geba helped in the rebuilding of Jerusalem (Neh. 11:31; 12:29). Zechariah 14:10 prophesied that the land will be made a plain from Geba to Rimmon, except for lofty Jerusalem.

GEBAL (gē'băl, Heb. geval, border, Gr. Búblos, Bíblos). 1. A seaport of Phoenicia, between Sidon and Tripolis; modern Jebeil, 25 miles N of Beirut. In the 15th century B.C. it was subject to Egypt. Its political history included periods of independence alternating with subjection to successive empires. In Greek and Roman times it was called Byblos, from the manufacture of papyrus there. Joshua 13:5,6 refers to the land of the Giblites or Gebalites, the land of Lebanon at the foot of Mt. Hermon, as part of the land God gave to the children of Israel; God promised to drive out its inhabitants if Joshua would divide it by lot to the Israelites; but we have no record of Joshua accepting the offer, and the Israelites never controlled Gebal. In I Kings 5:17,18, ASV, RSV replaces "stonesquarers" of KJV with "Gebalites" or "men of Gebal." Expert stonemasonry was among the industries of Gebal. Shipbuilding was another, for Ezekiel 27:9 tells us that caulkers from Gebal worked on ships at Tyre. Skilled technologies, paper-making, fine stonework and seaworthy shipbuilding distinguished Gebal, rather than the extraction of raw materials or mass production alone.

2. A land between the Dead Sea and Petra; modern Jibâl, in northeastern Edom; allied with enemies of Israel, including Edom and Assyria (Ps. 83:6-8).

GEBER (gē'bêr). 1. One of Solomon's twelve purveyors for Southern Gilead (I Kings 4:13).

2. The son of Uri, who was over great pasture lands east of Jordan (I Kings 4:19). The two Gebers are sometimes identified as the same person.

GEBIM (gē'bĭm), a place near Anathoth and Nob, whose inhabitants fled at the approach of the Assyrian invaders (Isa. 10:31).

GECKO (See Animals)

GEDALIAH (gĕd'à-lī'à, Heb. gedhalyâh). 1. A son of Shaphan, king Josiah's secretary and Governor of Mizpah (II Kings 25:22-25; Jer. 39:14; 40:5-16; 41:1-18; 43:6). This Judean of high rank was the one who protected Jeremiah, whose views he shared, from the anti-Chaldeans. Nebuchadnezzar made him governor over "the poor people left in the land." He ruled, however, for only two months. The anniversary of his treacherous murder is observed as one of the four Jewish feasts (Zech. 7:5; 8:19).

2. A priest, of the sons of Jeshua, who had taken a strange wife during the exile (Ezra 10:18).

3. Grandfather of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. 1:1).

4. One of the six sons of Jeduthun, a harper and head of the second of twenty-four companies, his consisting of twelve musicians (I Chron. 25:8,9).

5. A son of Pashur and the prince who caused Jeremiah to be imprisoned (Jer. 38:1-6).

GEDER (gē'dêr, Heb. gedher), Canaanite royal city near Debir, taken by Joshua (Josh. 12:13); perhaps Beth-gader (I Chron. 2:51) and the birthplace of Baal-hamon the Gederite (I Chron. 27:28).

GEDERAH (gĕ-dē'rà, Heb. gedhērâh, wall), a town on the heights between the valleys of Sorek and Aijalon in the Shephelah of Judah (Josh. 15:36,41) named with Gedorothaim (two walls) and Gederoth (walls). Modern Jedîreh. Jozabad (I Chron. 12:4) was a Gederathite. For KJV "those that dwelt among plants and hedges" ASV, RSV have "the inhabitants of Netaim and Gederah."

GEDOR (gē'dôr, Heb. gedhôr, wall). 1. A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:58); now Khirbet Jedûr, a few miles north of Hebron.

2. The town where Jeroham lived, whose sons were among the Benjamites who came to David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:7); location unknown.

3. A descendant of Benjamin, who, with his father Jehiel and brothers, dwelt at Gibeon (I Chron. 8:31; 9:37).

4. Among the descendants of Judah, Penuel (I Chron. 4:4) and Jered (I Chron. 4:18) are both named as the "father" of Gedor: since the genealogical tables in which the names occur are different, two persons named Gedor must be meant.

5. In the time of Hezekiah, princes of Simeon went to Gedor to find pasture for their flocks, and finding it so good, they drove out the inhabitants and settled there.

GEHAZI (gē-hā'zī, Heb. gêhăzî, valley of vision), the servant of Elisha. He first appears when Elisha sought to reward the Shunamite woman for her hospitality (II Kings 4:8-37). When she declined to ask any reward, Gehazi answered, "Verily she hath no child, and her husband is old." Elisha promised her that she should bear a child, which came to pass. "When the child was grown," he died of sunstroke. The woman went with her sorrow to Elisha. He sent Gehazi with instructions to lay Elisha's staff upon the face of the child; but "the child is not awaked." Elisha then came himself and restored the child to life. Elisha had Gehazi call the woman to receive her son. Gehazi next appears when Naaman is healed (II Kings 5: 1-27). Elisha refused any reward. After Naaman left, Gehazi determined to run after Naaman and ask something. Naaman gave him more than he asked. Gehazi hid his booty before he reached home, but Elisha knew what had happened, and rebuked Gehazi by invoking upon him the leprosy of which Naaman had been cured. Gehazi is last met with, talking with the king of "all the great things that Elisha hath done" (II Kings 8:4-6). As Gehazi was telling of the Shunamite woman's son being restored to life, the woman herself appeared, to ask the king to restore to her the property which she abandoned upon the advice of Elisha during a seven years' famine. The king ordered her fully compensated. Because Gehazi appears in the court of the king, it has been inferred that he had repented and been healed of his leprosy, though II Kings 5:27 renders this doubtful. He shows no resentment against Elisha. Gehazi was an efficient servant, but weak enough to yield to avarice. He lacked his master's clear moral insight and stamina, and he bore no such relations to Elisha as Elisha bore to Elijah.

GEHENNA (gē-hĕn'à, Gr. geénna, a transliteration of the Aramaic form of Heb. gê-ben-hinnôm, valley of the son of Hinnom), a valley on the W and SW of Jerusalem, which formed part of the border between Judah and Benjamin (comparing Josh. 15:8 with 18:16); still recognized as the border after the exile (Neh. 11:30,31); modern Wadî errabâbi. Here Ahaz (II Chron. 28:3; see II Kings 16:3) and Manasseh (II Chron. 33:6; see II Kings 21:6) sacrificed their sons to Molech (Jer. 32:35). For this reason Josiah defiled the place (II Kings 23:10). After referring to the idolatrous barbarities (Jer. 7:31,32) Jeremiah prophesies a great slaughter of the people there, and in the siege of Jerusalem (Jer. 19:1-13). After the OT period, Jewish apocalyptic writers began to call the Valley of Hinnom the entrance to hell, later hell itself. In Jewish usage of the first century A.D., Gehenna referred to the intermediate state of the godless dead, but there is no trace of this sense in the NT. The NT distinguishes sharply between Hades, the intermediate, bodiless state, and Gehenna, the state of final punishment after the resurrection of the body. Gehenna existed before the judgment (Matt. 25;41). The word occurs 12 times in the NT, always translated "hell" ASV, RSV margin "Gehenna." Eleven times it is on the lips of Jesus; as the final punishment for calling one's brother a fool (Matt. 5:22); for adultery, when the severest measures have not been taken to prevent commission of this offense (Matt. 5:29,30); and others (Matt. 18:9; Mark 9:43,45,47); in a warning as to whom to fear (Matt. 10:28; Luke 12:5). A hypocrite is called a "son of hell" (Matt. 23:15) who cannot "escape the damnation of hell" (Matt. 23:33). James 3:6 speaks of the "tongue" as "a fire," being "set on fire of hell." A fire was kept burning in the Valley of Hinnom to consume the offal deposited there. Terms parallel to Gehenna include "furnace of fire" (Matt. 13:42,50); "lake of fire" (Rev. 19:20; 20:10 14,15); "eternal fire" (Jude 7); "cast down to hell" (II Pet. 2:4), where the Greek verb means "cast down to Tartaros," a Greek name for the place of punishment of the wicked dead. Its use by our Saviour Jesus Christ warns us of the destiny which even the love of God does not avert from those who finally refuse His forgiveness. See HADES, HELL E.R.

GELILOTH (gē-lī'lōth—lōth, Josh. 18:17), the name of a place on the border of Benjamin with Judah, E of Jerusalem; perhaps the same as the Gilgal of Joshua 15:7, whose name has a similar meaning (circuit). It cannot be the Gilgal near Jericho in the Jordan Valley.

GEMALLI (gē-măl'ī, camel owner or rider), the father of Ammiel, ruler of the tribe of Dan, and one of the twelve spies sent out to explore the land (Num. 13:12).

GEMARIAH (gĕm'à-rī'à, Jehovah hath fulfilled or accomplishment of the Lord). 1. A prince, son of Shaphan the scribe and brother of Ahikam (Jer. 36:10-25). This scribe with others sought in vain to keep king Jehoiakim from burning the roll which Baruch had written at the dictation of Jeremiah.

2. A son of Hilkiah, sent by King Zedekiah as ambassador to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon. He also carried a letter from Jeremiah to the captive Jews (Jer. 29:3).

GENEALOGY (jĕn'ē-ăl'ō-jē, Heb. yahas, Gr. genealogía), a list of ancestors or descendants; or descent from an ancestor; or the study of lines of descent. Genealogies are compiled to show biological descent, the right of inheritance, succession to an office, or ethnological and geographical relationships. The word occurs several times in the English Bible (I Chron. 4:33; 5:1,7; 7:5,7,9,40; 9:22; II Chron. 12:15; 31:16-19; Ezra 2:62; 8:1; Neh. 7:5, 64; I Tim. 1:4; Tit. 3:9), but most Bible genealogies are introduced by other words, such as "the book of the generations of," or "these are the generations of," or are given without titles. Bible genealogies are not primarily concerned with mere biological descent. The earliest (Gen. 4:1, 2,17-22), by its emphasis on occupations (Abel, shepherd; Cain, farmer and city-builder; Jabal, cattleman; Jubal, musician; Tubal-cain, metal worker), in a family register of Cain's descendants, shows when new features of the culture were introduced. The genealogy of the line of Seth (Gen. 4:25,26; 5:1-32), a list of long-lived individuals, contrasts with the genealogy in Genesis 10:1-32, which is clearly a table of nations descended from the three families of Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Many of the names are Heb. plurals in "-im," signifying nations, tribes, cities or towns rather than individuals. The scope of Biblical genealogies narrows to the Chosen People and their close relatives (Gen. 11:10-22, Shem to Abraham; 22:20-24, Abraham's near kin). Next are the children of Abraham by Hagar (Gen. 16:15; 25:12-18); by Sarah (21:1-3; 25:19-28) and by Keturah (25:1-4); then the children of Jacob (Gen. 29:31-30:24; 35:16-26); and of his brother Esau (Gen. 36) for many generations in Edom. Jacob's posterity who came into Egypt are carefully enumerated (Gen. 46:8-27); part of them again (Exod. 6:14-27) to bring the genealogy down to Moses and Aaron; the inclusion of brief mention of the sons of Reuben and Simeon before the fuller genealogy of the Levites may be due to this list being taken from an earlier one. Numbers 26:1-56 is a census on genealogical principles, for the purpose of equitable division of the land. The military organization of the Israelites for the wilderness journey was by genealogy (Num. 1-3), and this included the priests and Levites (3:11-39), and provided for a tax and offerings (7:11-89) for the support of religion (3:40-51), as well as the order of march in peace or war (10). Many other references to persons must be taken into account in attempting a complete genealogy. Ruth 4:17-22 picks up the genealogy of Judah from his son Pharez, to carry it down to David, whose children are listed: those born in Hebron (II Sam. 3:2-5) and in Jerusalem (5:13-16). David's "mighty men" are named, with brief notices of their descent (II Sam. 23:8-39): Solomon's princes and providers of food are likewise treated (II Kings 4:1-19).

The major genealogical tables of the OT are in I Chronicles 1-9. They use most of the earlier genealogical material, but show differences which at a distance of time are puzzling. Satisfactory solutions are not available for many of these. Mistakes in copying would account for some; differences in the purpose of the recorders for others. The books of Kings and Chronicles contain information about the family relationships of the kings of Judah and of Israel. Ezra 2:1-63; 8:1-20 and Nehemiah 7:7-63 name by families those who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylonian captivity, including many whose descent could not be traced. Ezra 7:1-6 gives Ezra's own line of descent from Aaron. Ezra 10:18:44 names those who had married foreign women. Nehemiah 3 names those who helped rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. There follow lists of those who helped Ezra proclaim the law of God (Neh. 8:1-8); of those who sealed the covenant to keep the law (Neh. 10:1-27); of the leading inhabitants in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:1-10), in nearby Judah (11:20-24), and in more remote villages of Judah and Benjamin (11:25-36). Nehemiah 12 deals with the priests who accompanied Zerubbabel (1-9); the succession of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua (10,11); the "priests, the chief of the fathers," in the days of Joiakim (12-21); Levites in this period (22-26); princes and priests who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (31-42). The prophets usually begin their books with some indication of their genealogy (Isa. 1:1; Jer. 1:1; Ezek. 1:3; Hos. 1:1; Joel 1:1; Jonah 1:1; Zeph. 1:1; Zech. 1:1).

The genealogies of Jesus Christ will be dealt with in a separate article. Other NT persons generally appear without indication of their descent. Occasionally the father is named (e.g., James and John, the sons of Zebedee, Luke 5:10, etc.). Paul cherishes his pure Heb. descent (Phil. 3:4,5). I Timothy 1:4 and Titus 3:9 are sometimes thought to refer to pagan Gnostic series of beings intermediate between God and the created earth, but it is more likely that the rabbinic over-concern with human genealogies is meant, because the false teachers seem to be Jewish, and the term "genealogies" is not used by heathen authors of the pagan Gnostic series. Since the two genealogies of Jesus Christ in Matthew and Luke are known to have caused controversy a century or so later, it may not be improper to surmise that this difficulty was already troubling the churches.

It is certain that the NT shows far less concern for the genealogy of human beings than does the OT. In the OT, God was bringing forth a Chosen People who should be a nation peculiarly devoted to preserving the revelation of Him until in the fulness of time God sent forth His Son, Who should draw to Himself a new people, united not by descent from a common human ancestor, but by a genealogy of one generation only: a child of God by a new and spiritual birth. E.R.

GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (jĕn'ē-ăl'ō-jē). Two genealogies are given in the NT: in Matthew 1:17, and in Luke 3:23-38. Matthew traces the descent of Jesus from Abraham and David, and divides it into three sets of fourteen generations each, probably to aid memorization. There are fourteen names from Abraham to and including David. From David to and including Josiah, and counting David a second time, there are fourteen names. (David is named twice in Matt. 1, v. 17). From Jechoniah to Jesus we have fourteen names. Matthew omits three generations after Joram, namely Ahaziah, Joash and Amaziah (I Chron. 3:11,12). Such an omission in Heb. genealogies is not peculiar to Matthew. He names Zerah as well as Perez, and mentions the brethren of Judah and of Jechoniah, which is unusual. Contrary to Heb. practice, he names five women: Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, Bathsheba (the wife of Uriah), and Mary, each name evoking associations, dark or bright, with the history of the chosen people. Matthew carefully excludes the physical paternity of Joseph by saying "Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom" (feminine singular in Greek) "was born Jesus" (1:16). The sense of "begat" in Heb. genealogies was not exact: it indicated immediate or remote descent, an adoptive relation, or legal heirship, as well as procreation.

Luke's genealogy moves from Jesus to Adam. Between Abraham and Adam it is the same as in I Chronicles 1:1-7,24-28, or the more detailed genealogies in Genesis; making allowance for the different spelling of names in transliteration from Heb. or Greek. From David to Abraham Luke agrees with OT genealogies and with Matthew. Between Jesus and David Luke's list differs from Matthew's, and there is no OT record to compare with Luke's, except for Nathan being one of David's sons, and for the names of Salathiel (Shealtil) and Zorobabel (Zerubbabel). At this point the two genealogies crossed, through adoption or otherwise.

As Matthew gave the line of the kings from David to Jechoniah, it is probable that from Salathiel to Joseph he named those who were heirs to the Davidic throne. Luke's record then would be that of physical descent, though crossing the royal line at one point. In Luke 3:23 there is a question as to how much should be considered parenthetical. Some would include "of Joseph" in the parenthesis: "(as was supposed of Joseph)," making Heli in some sense the father of Jesus, perhaps his maternal grandfather. This construction is awkward. Another supposition is that Joseph is really the son-in-law of Heli, through his marriage to Mary, thought to be Heli's daughter. If both genealogies are those of Joseph, his relationship to Heli must be different from his relationship to Jacob. Scholars have wrestled with the problems of the two genealogies from the second century, when pagan critics raised the difficulty, Many explanations have been more ingenious than convincing, involving complicated and uncertain inferences.

A relatively simple solution is given by A. T. Robertson in his A Harmony of the Gospels for Students of the Life of Christ, New York: George H. Doran and Co., 1922, pp. 259-262. In this view, widely accepted, Matthew gives the legal descent of heirship to the throne of David, through Joseph, while Luke gives the physical descent of Jesus through Mary. Matthew is concerned with the kingship of Jesus, Luke with His humanity. Both make plain His Virgin Birth, and therefore His Deity. In the light of these salient facts, on which the agreement of Matthew and Luke is obvious, their differences only accentuate their value as independent witnesses, in whose testimony the Holy Spirit did not see fit to cause them to collaborate. The question is fully discussed in J. G. Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, New York: Harper and Brothers, 1930, pp. 202-209, and in ISBE, vol. 2, pp. 1196-1199. Matthew's genealogy establishes the legal claim to the throne of David through his foster-father Joseph; Luke's establishes His actual descent from David through Mary. Luke 1:32 says that Mary's child "shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David." Romans 1:3,4 agrees with this: Jesus "was made of the seed of David according to the flesh," which could only be through Mary; "and declared to be the Son of God . . . by the resurrection from the dead." II Timothy 2:8 echoes this. Isaiah 11:1 indicates that Messiah is to be physically a descendant of David's father Jesse. The genealogies must be seen in the light of this fact. (Compare Matt. 22:41-46 and parallels with the answer in Rom. 1:4). E.R.

GENERATION (jĕn'ĕr-ā'shŭn), in the OT, the translation of two Heb. words: (1) tôledhôth, from a root yalad, to beget, used always in the plural, refers to lines of descent from an ancestor, and occurs in the phrase "these are the generations of," introducing each of eleven sections of Genesis, from 2:4 to 37:2 (also elsewhere in Gen., Exod., Num., I Chron., and Ruth 4:18); (2 dôr, a period of time (e.g., Deut. 32:7, past; Exod. 3:15, future; Ps. 102:24, both); all the men living in a given period (e.g., Gen. 7:1; Judg. 3:2); a class of men characterized by a certain quality (e.g., Deut. 32:5; Ps. 14:5); a dwelling place or habitation (Isa. 58:12; Ps. 49:19).

In the NT, generation translates four Greek words, all having reference to descent: (1) geneá, most frequent in the synoptic Gospels; for lines of descent from an ancestor (e.g., Matt. 1:17); or all the men living in a given period (e.g., Matt. 11:16); or a class of men characterized by a certain quality (e.g., Matt. 12:39); also, a period of time (Acts 13:36; Col. 1:26). (2) génesis, in Matthew 1:1, in a heading to verses 2:17, used to mean "genealogy"; (3) génnema, in the phrase "generation of vipers" (Matt. 3:7; 12:34; 23:33; Luke 3:7; ASV "offspring"; RSV "brood"); génos, race (I Pet. 2:9; ASV, RSV "race"); (4) Matthew 24:34 and parallels Mark 13:30 and Luke 21:32 present a special problem. If "this generation" (geneá) refers to the people then living, these verses, despite their position, must relate to the destruction of Jerusalem and not to the Second Coming of Christ. But the meaning may be that the generation which sees the beginning of the special signs of the Second Coming will see the end of them. Another interpretation is that "generation" here refers to the Jewish nation. Geneá may bear the sense of nation or race. E.R.

GENESIS (jĕn'ĕ-sĭs), the first book of the Bible. The name is derived from a Greek word meaning "origin" or "beginning," which is the title given to the book in the Septuagint. The Hebrew name for the book is berēshîth, from Genesis 1:1 ("in the beginning"). The special phrase, "These are the generations of" divides the book into eleven sections (2:4, 5:1, 6:9, 10:1, 11:10, 11:27, 25:12, 25:19, 36:1, and 37:2), and serves as a superscription to the section that follows it. These sections do not describe the origin of the person mentioned in the superscription (or of "the heavens and earth" in the case of 2:4), but rather the further history of the one whose origin has already been described, plus that of his immediate offspring. A broader outline divides the book into two unequal sections. Genesis 1:1 through 11:26 describes the creation of the heavens, the earth, plants, animals, and man; the Fall and the Edenic curse; the antediluvian age and the great Flood; and the descendants of Noah down to Terah. Genesis 11:27 through 50:26 traces the history of Abraham and Lot; Ishmael and Isaac; Jacob and Esau; and Joseph and his brethren in Egypt.

GENESIS 1-11 AND UNIFORMITARIAN SCIENCE. Evangelical scholars have differed widely in their reaction to the claims of uniformitarian and evolutionary science that the earth has existed for billions of years, that animals preceded man by millions of years, that man has been on earth for hundreds of thousands of years, and that the Flood could have covered only a small part of the earth. Various attempts to harmonize Genesis with uniformitarian theories have gained wide acceptance among evangelicals, but such harmonizations reveal fatal inconsistencies and concessions which render them Biblically untenable. The Scriptural doctrine of a geographically universal and geologically significant Flood actually undermines the entire superstructure of uniformitarianism; for such a catastrophe, continuing for an entire year and covering all the high mountains of the antediluvian earth, must, of absolute necessity, have accomplished a vast amount of geologic work in a relatively short period (cf. H. C. Leupold, Exposition of Genesis, Columbus: The Wartburg Press, 1942, pp. 201, 296, 301; and J. C. Whitcomb and H. M. Morris, The Genesis Flood, Nutley, N. J.: The Presbyterian and Reformed Pub. Co., 1961, pp. 76, 123, 265-72). See FLOOD OR DELUGE.

It is difficult to find room in Genesis 1-11 for the vast periods of time which are demanded by uniformitarians. The Scriptures reveal that the heavens, the earth, the sea, "and all that in them is" were created within six days, and therefore that man should labor for six days (Exod. 20:9-11). This is not the only indication that the days of creation were literal 24-hour days. (1) Although the word "day" sometimes refers to a period of undetermined length (cf. Joel 1:15), it always refers to a 24-hour period when a numerical adjective accompanies it, as it does six times in the first chapter of Genesis. (2) The phrase "evening and morning" is a technical Hebrew phrase meaning 24 hours (cf. Dan. 8:14 ASV). (3) Plants (created the third day) could hardly have survived a geologic age without sunlight (created the fourth day). If Moses had wanted to express the idea that the sun was simply made visible on the fourth day he could have used such a term as "appear" (verse 9). All attempts to make the days of creation correspond to the geologic ages have failed. For example, the Bible states that fruit trees were created two days before marine organisms; but paleontologists of the uniformitarian school insist that marine life existed millions of years before fruit trees. Other harmonization efforts, such as the revelatory view and the framework hypothesis, are contradicted by the plain reading of the text (cf. Paul A. Zimmerman, ed., Darwin, Evolution, and Creation, St. Louis: Concordia Pub. House, 1959, pp. 57-64).

The basic incompatibility of Genesis and uniformitarianism is seen further in the fact that Adam is said to have had dominion over the entire animal kingdom and that the diet of both man and beast was vegetarian (1:26-30; cf. Isa. 11:6-9). This could hardly have been the case if animals had been dying, devouring each other, and in many cases whole species becoming extinct millions of years before Adam's creation. Romans 8:20-22 teaches that "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain" under "the bondage of corruption" as a consequence of Adam's fall. To postulate a "reign of tooth and claw" during vast ages before Adam would be to undermine the force of this passage. In contradiction to uniformitarian hypotheses, Genesis reveals that God created the heavens and the earth as a dynamic, functioning entity. Thus, even as Adam was created instantly as a grown man, so also the earth and its living creatures were created fully "grown" within six days, with the oceans already containing the salts and chemicals necessary for sustaining marine life (1:2,10,20), the dry land equipped with a mantle of soil for plants and trees (1:11), the light rays from distant stars already performing their God-intended function of shining upon the earth (1:14-19), and the animals and plants created after their kinds (1:11,12,20-25). The "grown creation" doctrine is simply the Biblical doctrine of creation rightly understood, and is illustrated in the NT by the miracle of the changing of water to wine (John 2:1-11). The presuppositions which underlie the various age-determination methods of modern geology may be properly challenged, therefore, by those who accept the Biblical doctrine of creation (cf. John W. Klotz, Genes, Genesis, and Evolution, St. Louis: Concordia Pub. House, 1955, pp. 86-96).

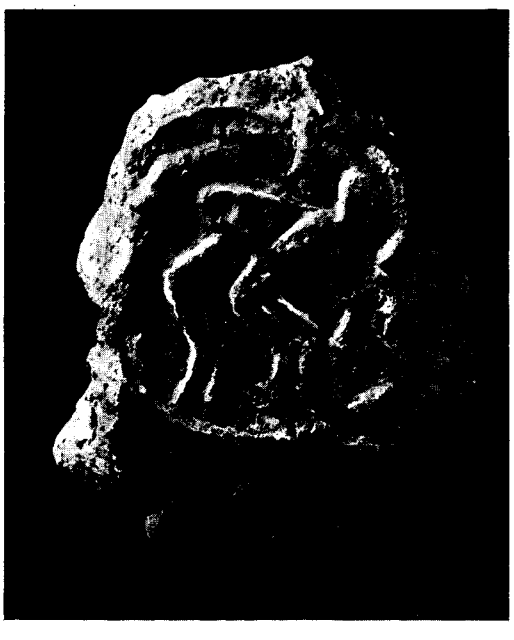
GENESIS 12-50 AND ARCHAEOLOGICAL DISCOVERY. In spite of a century and a half of attacks by scholars of the critical school, the unity and Mosaic authorship of Genesis have been successfully defended by orthodox scholars, and the documentary hypothesis has been shown to rest upon false presuppositions (cf. O. T. Allis, The Five Books of Moses, Nutley, N. J.: The Presbyterian & Reformed Pub. Co., 1943). Furthermore, the entire field of OT studies has been revolutionized in recent decades by the discovery of vast numbers of clay tablets which shed important light upon ancient Near Eastern history and customs. Over 100,000 of these tablets date to the early second millennium B.C., and therefore fall within the patriarchal period (cf. D. J. Wiseman, Illustrations From Biblical Archaeology, Grand Rapids: Wm. B. Eerdmans Pub. Co., 1958, p. 25). Only a few of the discoveries which shed light on Genesis can be listed here.

The "Adam and Eve Seal" found near Nineveh in 1932 by Dr. E. A. Speiser, who dated it about 3500 B.C. UMP



Abraham's choice of Eliezer of Damascus to be his heir (15:2-4) corresponds to ancient Semitic and Hurrian custom, which provided that the adopted heir yield his rights in case a natural son should be born (Wiseman, op. cit., p. 25). Sarah was only following the ways of her contemporaries when she gave Hagar to Abraham to bear a child for him (16:1-3), and Abraham was understandably grieved when Sarah later insisted on driving out both Hagar and Ishmael (21:11), for a Nuzi legal document (c. 1500 B.C.) states that "if Kelim-ninu (the bride) does not bear, Kelim-ninu shall acquire a woman of the land of Lullu (a slave) as wife for Shennima (the bridegroom), and Kelim-ninu may not send the offspring away" (James B. Pritchard, ed., Ancient Near Eastern Texts, Princeton University Press, 1950, p. 220). Furthermore, Nuzi sale-adoption documents have shed light on Jacob's relationship to Laban. We thus discover that possession of the household gods marked a person as the legitimate heir, and that the adopted son forfeited his inheritance if he took another wife outside of the family. This explains Rachel's theft of Laban's teraphim (31:19) and Laban's warning that Jacob should take no other wives besides his daughters (31:50) (Pritchard, op. cit., pp. 219-220). We have also learned that personal names like Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were current in those days; that Shechem, Ai, Bethel, and Dothan were thriving cities around 2000 B.C.; that the Negev region and the Jordan valley were also thickly populated; and that Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed about that time and their ruins lie under the waters of the Dead Sea (Wiseman, op. cit., pp. 29-30).

With regard to the patriarchs in Egypt, important archaeological discoveries have also been made (see EXODUS). For example, it is now recognized that Abraham could have had camels in Egypt (12:16) (cf. Joseph P. Free, "Abraham's Camels," JNES, July, 1944, pp. 187-93), and that groups of Semites migrated into Egypt as early as 2000 B.C. (tomb paintings at Beni Hassan). A recently published papyrus dating to about 1800 B.C. "lists seventy-nine servants in an Egyptian household, forty-five of whom are 'Asiatics', probably sold into Egypt as slaves . . . Some of them bear good Hebrew names like Shiphrah and Menahem" (Wiseman, op. cit., p. 39). A great many examples of authentic Egyptian coloring in the patriarchal narrative of Genesis 39-50 have now been fully illustrated by archaeological discoveries (cf. M. F. Unger, Archaeology and the Old Testament, Grand Rapids: Zondervan Pub. House, 1954, pp. 132-34). In the words of the eminent archaeologist William Foxwell Albright, "So many corroborations of details have been discovered in recent years that most competent scholars have given up the old critical theory according to which stories of the Patriarchs are mostly retrojections from the time of the Dual Monarchy (9th-8th centuries B.C.)." GENNESARET (gĕ-nĕs'à-rĕt). 1. "The land of Gennesaret" (Matt. 14:34; Mark 6:53), a plain stretching about three miles along the northwest shore of the Sea of Galilee, extending about a mile inland: the modern el-Ghuweir. With a rich, loamy, well-watered soil, today as in Bible times it is extraordinarily fertile; the only easily tillable land bordering the Sea of Galilee. The fig, olive, palm and walnut trees, which ordinarily require diverse conditions, all grow well here.

2. "The Lake of Gennesaret" (Luke 5:1), elsewhere in Luke simply "the lake" (5:2; 8:22,23,33); the same as the Sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18; 15:29; Mark 1:16; 7:31; John 6:1); or the OT "Sea of Chinnereth."

GENTILES (jĕn'tīlz, Heb. gôy, plural gôyîm, nation, people), translated "Gentiles" in KJV of the OT 30 times, "people" 11 times, "heathen" 142 times, "nation" 373 times, "nation" being the usual translation in ASV, RSV. Sometimes gôy refers to Israel (Gen. 12:2; Deut. 32:28; Josh. 3:17; 4:1; 10:13; II Sam. 7:23; Isa. 1:4; Zeph. 2:9; translated "nation" or "people" in KJV as well as ASV, RSV). But 'âm is the ordinary term for Israel. Gôy usually means a non-Israelite people. In the NT, Greek éthnos renders gôy, while laós, people, corresponds to Heb. 'âm. Éthnos is translated "Gentiles" in the NT in KJV, ASV and RSV. Héllenes, Greeks, is translated "Gentiles" in KJV, "Greeks" in ASV, RSV (John 7:35; Rom. 2:9,10; 3:9; I Cor. 10:32; 12:13).

Under conditions of peace, considerate treatment was accorded Gentiles under OT law (e.g., Deut. 10:19; 24:14,15; Num. 35:15; Ezek. 47:22). Men of Israel often married Gentile women, of whom Rahab, Ruth and Bathsheba are notable examples, but the practice was frowned upon after the return from exile (Ezra 9:12; 10:2-44; Neh. 10:30; 13:23-31). Separation between Jew and Gentile became more strict, until in the NT period the hostility is complete. Persecution embittered the Jew, and he retaliated by hatred of everything Gentile, and by avoidance, so far as was possible, of contact with Gentiles. The intensity of this feeling varied, and gave way before unusual kindness (Luke 7:4,5).

While the teachings of Jesus ultimately broke down "the middle wall of partition" between Jew and Gentile, as is seen in the writings of Paul (Rom. 1:16; I Cor. 1:24; Gal. 3:28; Eph. 2:14; Col. 3:11) and in Acts, yet Jesus limited His ministry to Jews, with rare exceptions (the half-Jewish Samaritans, John 4:1-42, the Syrophoenician woman, Matt. 15:21-28; Mark 7:24-30; the Greeks in John 12:20-36). He instructed His twelve disciples, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not" (Matt. 10:5); but did not repeat this injunction when He sent out the Seventy (Luke 10:1-16). Jesus' mission was first to "his own" (John 1:11), the Chosen People of God; but ultimately to "as many as received him" (John 1:12). Limitations of time held His ministry on earth within the bounds of Israel; reaching the Gentiles was left to the activity of the Holy Spirit working through His disciples.

In Acts, from the appointment of Paul as the apostle to the Gentiles (9:15), the Gentiles become increasingly prominent. Even the letters addressed particularly to Jewish Christians (James; I Pet.; Heb.; Rom. 9-11) are relevant to Gentiles also. The division of all mankind into two classes, Jew and Gentile, emphasizes the importance of the Jews as the people through whom God made salvation available to all people. E.R.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE, the outer part of the temple, which Gentiles might enter. See TEMPLE.

GENUBATH (gē-nū'băth, Heb. genuvath, theft), a son of Hadad the Edomite, the fugitive prince, by the sister of Queen Tahpenes, the wife of the pharaoh who governed Egypt toward the end of David's reign (I Kings 11:20).

GERA (gē'rà, Heb. gērā', grain), a name common in the tribe of Benjamin. 1. A son of Benjamin (Gen. 46:21).

2. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:3,5).

3. Father of Ehud (Judg. 3:15).

4. A son of Ehud (I Chron. 8:7).

5. Father of Shimei (II Sam. 16:5; 19:16,18; I Kings 2:8). Some of these are thought to be the same person, taking "father" to mean a remote ancestor, and "son" a remote descendant.

GERAH (See Weights and Measures)

GERAR (gē'rär, Heb. gerār, circle, region), a town in the Negev, near but not on the Mediterranean coast south of Gaza, in a valley running northwest and southeast, and on a protected inland caravan route from Palestine to Egypt (Gen. 10:19). Here Abraham sojourned with its king, Abimelech (Gen. 20:1,2); and later Isaac (Gen. 26:1-33) had similar and more extended experiences with the king and people of the region. Here Asa and his army defeated the Ethiopians, and plundered Gerar and the cities round about (II Chron. 14: 13,14). Its site is thought to be the modern Tell ej-Jemmeh, which has been excavated, uncovering levels of occupation from the Late Bronze Age to the Byzantine period.

GERASA (gē-rā'sà), a city E of the Jordan midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea, in the Decapolis at the eastern edge of the Peraea; partially excavated; the modern Jerash. The name does not occur in the Bible, but the adjective Gerasenes occurs in Mark 5:1 ASV, RSV, and the margin of Matthew 8:28 RSV and Luke 8:26,37 RSV. The MSS vary in all these passages between Gadarenes, Gerasenes and Gergesenes; and all the above occurrences relate to the region where Jesus healed a demoniac and permitted the demons which possessed the man to rush down a steep slope into the Sea of Galilee, hence this incident must have occurred on the shore. A possible location is at Kursi (Gergesa) on the eastern shore of the lake. Gadara (Muqeis) is SE of Lake Galilee. The place where the Gospel incident occurred may have been referred to sometimes as the country of the Gergesenes, a purely local name; or of the Gadarenes, from the nearest city; or of the Gerasenes, from the most important city of the district. See GADARA.

GERGESA (gûr-gē'sà), a place probably midway of the eastern shore of Lake Galilee, where the bank is steep. The adjective Gergesenes occurs in Matthew 8:28 KJV and RSV margin; Mark 5:1 RSV margin; and Luke 8:26,37 ASV, RSV margins. See GADARA.

GERIZIM (gĕ-rī'zĭm, gĕr'ĭ-zĭm), a mountain of Samaria, Jebel et-Tôr, 2,849 feet high, SW of Mt. Ebal. Through the valley between runs a main N-S road of Palestine, so that this pass is of strategic military importance. Moses commanded that when the Israelites came into the Promised Land, the blessing for keeping the law should be spoken from Mt. Gerizim, and the curse for not obeying it from Mt. Ebal (Deut. 11:29; 27:4-26), six tribes standing on the slopes of either peak (Deut. 27: 11-14). It is conjectured that Mt. Gerizim was selected for the blessing and Mt. Ebal for the curse, from the point of view of one looking eastward, to whom Mt. Gerizim would be on the right or "fortunate" side. From the top of Mt. Gerizim Jotham shouted his parable of the trees to the men of Shechem in the valley below, reminding them of all that his father Gideon had done for them (Judg. 9: 7-21). After the Israelites, returning from Babylonian exile, refused to let the mixed races of Samaria help rebuild Jerusalem (Ezra 4:1-4; Neh. 2:19,20; 13:28), the Samaritans built themselves a temple on Mt. Gerizim. "This mountain" referred to in John 4:20,21, is Gerizim, where the Samaritans worshiped in the open, after their temple was destroyed by the Maccabees. The small Samaritan community of Nablus still celebrates the Passover on Mt. Gerizim. Samaritan tradition maintains that Abraham attempted to sacrifice Isaac on this mountain (Gen. 22:1-19); that at a nearby Salem he met Melchizedek (Gen. 14:17-20); and that Jacob's dream (Gen. 28:10-17) occurred at Khirbet Lanzah on Mt. Gerizim. The ruins of a fortress built by the Emperor Justinian in 533 A.D. remain. A rock with a cup-shaped hollow which could have been used for libations, is the traditional altar of the Samaritan temple. The Nablus community also possesses an important MS of the Pentateuch.

GERSHOM (gûr'shŏm, from Heb. gārash, to cast out, but in popular etymology explained as from gēr, stranger, Exod. 2:22; 18:3). 1. The first-born son of Moses and Zipporah. He was born in Midian (Exod. 2:22; 18:3; I Chron. 23:15,16; 26:24). The unusual circumstances of his circumcision are told in Exodus 4:21-28.

2. The eldest son of Levi, according to I Chronicles 6:16,17,20,43,62,71; 15:7). Elsewhere called Gershon. See Gershon.

3. One of the family of Phinehas, and one of the "heads of houses" who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra 8:2).

4. Father of Jonathan, the Levite who became priest to the Danites who settled in Laish (Judg. 18:30). KJV calls him "son of Manasseh," but ASV, RSV have "sons of Moses," since the "n" in the Heb. text which converts the consonants of Moses into Manasseh is thought to have been inserted to disguise the fact that Moses had such a graceless descendant as this Jonathan.

GERSHON (gûr'shŏn, Heb. gēreshôn), firstborn of the three sons of Levi (Gen. 46:11; Exod. 6:16, 17; Num. 3:17,18,21,25; 4:22,28,38; 7:7; 10:17; 26:57; Josh. 21:6; I Chron. 6:1; 23:6). His descendants are also called Gershonites (Num. 3:21, 23,24; 4:24,27; Josh. 21:33; I Chron. 23:7; 26:21; 29:8; II Chron. 29:12). The functions of the Gershonites during the wilderness wanderings are described in Numbers 3:23-25; 4:21-28; for which functions two wagons and four oxen were deemed sufficient (Num. 7:7). They continued prominent in the service of the Temple of Solomon, and in that of Zerubbabel, especially as singers. See also GERSHOM 2.

GERZITES (gûr'zīts), GIZRITES (gĭz'rīts), or GERIZZITES (gĕ-rĭz'ĭts, gĕr'ĭ-zīts), a tribe named between the Geshurites and the Amalekites (I Sam. 27:8), KJV Gezrites; ASV Girzites, margin Gizrites; RSV Girzites. They are called the ancient inhabitants of the land, on the way to Shur, toward Egypt; that is, in the S or Negev of Judah; not certainly connected with Gezer. If originally of Gezer, they may have been driven S by invading Israelites or Philistines.

GESHAM (gē'shăm), a son of Jahdai and descendant of Caleb (I Chron. 2:47). KJV Gesham; ASV, RSV Geshan, also the 1611 edition of KJV.

GESHEM (gē'shĕm), the Arabian who along with Sanballat and Tobiah, sought to oppose the building of the wall by Nehemiah (Neh. 2:19; 6:1,2). The same as Gashmu (Neh. 6:6).

GESHUR (gē'shûr, Heb. geshûr, bridge). 1. A country in Syria (II Sam. 15:8; ASV margin and RSV, Aram) on the western border of Og's kingdom of Bashan E of the Jordan (Josh. 12:5). Jair of Manasseh conquered Bashan up to Geshur (Deut. 3:14). Although in the territory of Israel, the Geshurites were not driven out (Josh. 13: 11,13) but "dwelt in the midst of Israel." In fact, Geshur and Aram took from Jair sixty towns (I Chron. 2:23 ASV, RSV) though KJV makes it appear that Jair took the cities from Gilead. David made alliance with their king Talmai by marrying his daughter Maacah (II Sam. 3:3; I Chron. 3:2). Her son Absalom, after he murdered Amnon, sought refuge with her father (II Sam. 13:37,38), whence Joab brought Absalom back (II Sam. 14: 23,32; 15:8).

2. A district between southern Palestine and Sinai, near Philistine territory (Josh. 13:2), unconquered at the close of Joshua's career; against which David made a raid when he was taking refuge from Saul among the Philistines (I Sam. 27:8). Whether these Geshurites were a branch of the same people as 1, is undetermined.

GETHER (gē'thêr), third of Aram's sons (Gen. 10:23; I Chron. 1:17). The latter reference reckons him among the sons of Shem.

GETHSEMANE (gĕth-sĕm'à-nē, probably from the Aramaic for "oil-press"), the place of Jesus' agony and arrest (Matt. 26:36-56; Mark 14:32-52; Luke 22:39-54; John 18:1-12—John tells of the arrest only). In Matthew 26:36; Mark 14:32 it is called "a place"; Luke does not give the name, says that the place was one to which Jesus customarily resorted, and that it was on the Mount of Olives; John 18:1, also without naming it, explains that it was a garden across the Cedron (Kidron) valley from Jerusalem. The traditional site, cared for by the Franciscans, is not far from the road, near the bridge over the Kidron, and is laid out in neat gardens. Within are eight large olive trees. If the Emperor Titus destroyed all the trees around Jerusalem during the siege of 70 A.D., as Josephus asserts, these trees cannot be so old as the time of Jesus, but they are certainly ancient, and they add to the atmosphere of a place where Christian devotion centers. Armenian, Greek and Russian churches claim other olive groves nearby as the correct site. It is certainly in the vicinity. The sufferings of Christ as His hour approached, portrayed by Matthew, Mark and Luke, and the humiliation of His arrest, told by all four evangelists, concentrate the reverent thought and feeling of believers, so that the very name Gethsemane evokes the love and adoration due to the Saviour who prayed here. E.R.

GEUEL (gē-ū'ĕl), a son of Machi, a prince of Gad and the representative of the Gadite tribe sent out to explore Canaan (Num. 13:15).

GEZER (gē'zêr, Heb. gezer, portion), a fortified place, Tell-Jezer, 18 miles NW of Jerusalem, between the valley of Sorek and the valley of Aijalon. It lies S of the main road from Jerusalem to Jaffa (Haifa), and E of the railroad. The site was identified by M. Clermont-Ganneau in 1873, and excavated by R. A. S. Macalister in 1904-7. Prehistoric inhabitants occupied caves on the rocky heights. Its military importance, overlooking main routes through the country, has led to its occupation in many periods of history. The Egyptians captured Gezer about 1500 B.C., but their power decreased a century or so later. When Israel entered the land, Horam king of Gezer came to help Lachish, after their king had been killed following the battle of the day on which the sun stood still (Josh. 10:1-34). Horam and "his people," that is, his army, were destroyed completely, but Gezer was not taken. The king of Gezer is listed (Josh. 12:12) among those whom Joshua smote (defeated). Gezer is on the southern boundary of Ephraim, near the Bethhorons (Josh. 16:3-10; I Chron. 7:28). The inhabitants of Gezer were not driven out (Josh. 16:10; Judg. 1:29) but later became slave-labor. Gezer was one of the cities given to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21: 21; I Chron. 6:67). David smote the Philistines as far as Gezer (I Chron. 20:4; also Gazer, KJV, Gezer in ASV, RSV, in II Sam. 5:25; I Chron. 14:16), but it remained for Solomon to reduce the people of Gezer to forced labor, and to rebuild the city, which the pharaoh of Egypt had taken and burnt and given to Solomon as a dowry with his daughter (I Kings 9:15-17). Gezer was occupied in the Greek period. Though not mentioned in the NT, it was known in NT times as Gazara. The Crusaders fortified Gezer, and it has undergone several changes of owners since then. Archaeological remains illustrate the life of the people fully. E.R.

GHOR, THE (gôr), the upper level of the Jordan valley, about 150 feet above the Zor or jungle through which the river channel winds.

GHOST (gōst), the human spirit as distinguished from the body. Ghost translates Heb. nephesh, breath (of life) in KJV, ASV of Job 11:20 (RSV, breathe their last), and Jeremiah 15:9 (RSV, swooned away). Heb. gāwa', gasp out, expire, is used of Abraham (Gen. 25:8), Ishmael (Gen. 25: 17), Isaac (Gen. 35:29) and Jacob (Gen. 49:33); in all which cases RSV has "breathed his last." For gāwa' in Job 3:11; 10:18; 13:19; 14:10, RSV uses varied expressions. In the NT, "ghost" renders Greek pneúma, breath, spirit, in Matthew 27:50; John 19:30 KJV: ASV, RSV have "spirit." Gr. ekpnéo, breathe out, appears in Mark 15:37,39; Luke 23:46 KJV, ASV: RSV has "breathed his last." These four Gospel references all relate to Jesus. In Acts 5:5 (Ananias); 5:10 (Sapphira); 12:23 (Herod), RSV has "died" for Greek ekpsýcho, lose consciousness, expire. "Holy Ghost" in KJV is translated "Holy Spirit" in ASV, RSV.

GIAH (gī'à), an unknown place near Gibeon, where Joab overtook Abner (II Sam. 2:24).

GIANTS. The first mention of giants in the Bible is in Genesis 6:4, where ASV, RSV have Nephilim, a Heb. word of uncertain etymology. Nephilim were found in Canaan when the spies went through the land (Num. 13:33; KJV giants). Beside their huge stature the spies felt like grasshoppers. Once (Job 16:14) "giant" translates Heb. gibbôr, which RSV text renders "warrior," ASV margin "mighty man," its usual meaning. The other Heb. words translated "giant" are rāphā', rāphâh, and the plural rephāîm, of uncertain etymology. The giants whom the Israelites met when they attempted to enter Canaan through Moab (Deut. 2:11,20), are called Rephaim in ASV, RSV. They resembled the Anakim, and the Moabites called them Emims, while the Ammonites called them Zamzummims. They were tall, large-framed and powerful. The last of this race was Og, king of Bashan, whose iron bedstead, nine cubits long, was famous (Deut. 2:11; Josh. 12:4; 13:12). The giant Rephaim were a vanishing race when the Israelites came out of Egypt. The land of the giants (Rephaim) is referred to in Joshua 17:15; the valley of the giants or Rephaim, located southwest of Jerusalem, in Joshua 15:8; 18:16. The Rephaim are named in Genesis 14:5; 15:20; the valley of Rephaim in II Samuel 5:18,22; 23:13; I Chronicles 11:15; 14:9; Isaiah 17:5. So the memory of this fearsome race persisted in their ancient haunts. II Samuel 21:15-22 records encounters of some of David's mighty men with descendants of the giant (Raphah). But the best known giant of all, Goliath of Gath, champion of the Philistines, whom David as a youth slew (I Sam. 17), though described as of a huge stature and great strength, is not called a giant on that account. It was not necessary to name the obvious. Thus giants terrorized the Israelites from their entry into Canaan until the time of David. Tall men like Saul were admired (I Sam. 10:23); the Lord had to remind Samuel not to consider height when choosing the next king (I Sam. 16:7). Isaiah 45:14 notes that the Sabeans were tall. The question, How tall is a giant? can be answered only in terms of the average height of the race which is using the term. Giants were abnormally strong, yet they had their weak points, as David's victory over Goliath proved.

GIBBAR (gĭb'ar), a man whose children returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:20). Perhaps the Gibeon of Nehemiah 7:25.

GIBBETHON (gĭb'ē-thŏn), Tell el-Melât, W of Gezer in the territory of Dan (Josh. 19:44), allotted to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. 21:23). Baasha killed King Nadab at Gibbethon while Israel was besieging the city, which was now in the hands of the Philistines (I Kings 15:27). A quarter century later Israel again besieged Gibbethon, and Omri was made king there by the army, upon receiving news that Zimri had killed Baasha (I Kings 16:15-17), whereupon the army abandoned the siege of Gibbethon.

GIBEA (gĭb'ē-à), a son of Sheva, and grandson of Caleb (I Chron. 2:49).

GIBEAH (gĭb'ē-à). 1. A city in the hill country of Judah, site unknown (Josh. 15:57).

2. A city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:28), modern Tell el-Fûl, in NT times Gabath Saul; on the E side of the N-S road a few miles north of Jerusalem and on a height commanding a view of the latter; Gibeah of Saul, where excavation has uncovered the rustic but strong fortress-palace from which Saul ruled Israel. Judges took place the abuse of a Levite's concubine, which brought on war between Benjamin and the rest of Israel (Judg. 19,20). The transactions at Gibeah during the reign of Saul are recorded in I Samuel 10:26; 11:4; 13:2,15,16; 14:2, (ASV, RSV have Geba); 14:16; 15:34; 22:6; 23:19; 26:1. Also ASV margin has Gibeah instead of "the hill," referring to the place where stood the house of Abinadab to which the ark of God was brought when it was returned by the Philistines (I Sam. 7:1), and whence David brought it into Jerusalem (II Sam. 6:3). Here seven of Saul's descendants were hanged to satisfy the vengeance of the Gibeonites (II Sam. 21:6; RSV has Gibeon). One of David's mighty men was from Gibeah of Benjamin (II Sam. 23:29; I Chron. 11:31). The people of Gibeah fled when the Assyrians marched toward them (Isa. 10:29). Hosea calls for a warning (Hos. 5:8) at Gibeah because of the sins Israel has committed "from the days of Gibeah" (Hos. 9:9; 10:9); the sins of Saul's reign had been remembered for centuries.

GIBEATH (gĭb'ē-ăth, Josh. 18:28), probably the same as Gibeah of Saul, which see. RSV text has Gibeah; margin Heb. Gibeath.

GIBEON (gĭb'ē-ŏn, Heb. giv'ôn, pertaining to a hill), a city of Benjamin (Josh. 18:25) NW of Jerusalem; in NT times Gabao; modern ej-Jib. It was given to the priests (Josh. 21:17). At the time of the Conquest, Joshua, without consulting the Lord, was deceived by the ambassadors of Gibeon into making a treaty with them (Josh. 9) whereby he promised not to destroy them. Upon discovering the deception, though their lives were spared, they were made woodcutters and water-carriers. A coalition of Canaanite kings attacked Gibeon because they had made peace with Joshua (Josh. 10), whereupon Joshua came to the aid of Gibeon, and the battle was fought in which Joshua called upon the sun to stand still to give him time for more fighting (alluded to in Isa. 28:21). No other city made peace with Israel (Josh. 11:19). Gibeon was the chief of four Hivite cities (Josh. 9:17). Abner representing Israel, and Joab representing David, met at a pool, the remains of which may still be seen, at Gibeon; and here, after an indecisive contest between two groups of twelve men each, a disastrous battle was fought (II Sam. 2:1-28; 3:30), following which Abner and Joab agreed to a cessation of the fighting. At a great stone in Gibeon Joab slew Amasa (II Sam. 20:8). David smote the Philistines from Gibeon on the north to Gezer on the south (I Chron. 14:16). Zadok the priest was assigned to minister at the high place in Gibeon (I Chron. 16:39,40; 21:29). Solomon, at the outset of his reign, came to Gibeon to sacrifice, and to dream — to good purpose (I Kings 3:3-15; II Chron. 1:2-13). Again Solomon received a message from the Lord here (I Kings 9:1-9). In I Chronicles 8:29; 9:35 we read of the father of Gibeon, husband of Maachah, dwelling there. People from Gibeon returned to Jerusalem from the captivity and helped build the walls (Neh. 3:7; 7:25). Jeremiah confronted a false prophet from Gibeon in the temple (Jer. 28:1). Gibeon is the scene of a rescue of Israelites during the Assyrian occupation (Jer. 41:11-16). E.R.

GIBEONITES (gĭb'ē-ŏn-īts), the inhabitants of Gibeon; Hivites (Josh. 9:3,7), Hurrians or Horites (Gen. 36:20; Deut. 2:12) who had formerly lived in Edom. Because of the deceitful manner in which they gained the favor of Joshua, they were made slave-laborers for menial tasks such as chopping wood and drawing water (Josh. 9). They were the peasants of the Mittannian empire which in 1500 B.C. reached from Media to the Mediterranean. Its rulers were Indo-Aryans, its peasants of another but non-Semitic race. The Gibeonites and their allies, at the time of the Conquest by Joshua, controlled a tetrapolis of four cities — Beeroth, Chephirah, Kirjath-baal and Gibeon. Because of a prolonged famine, David inquired of the Lord and learned that the cause was blood-guilt because Saul had massacred the Gibeonites; wherefore David delivered up seven descendants of Saul to their vengeance (II Sam. 21:1-9). A Gibeonite was leader of David's thirty mighty men (I Chron. 12:4). Gibeonites helped repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:7).

GIBLITES (gĭb'līts), the inhabitants of Gebal or Byblos (Josh. 13:5; ASV, RSV Gebalites). The Gebalites (ASV) or men of Gebal (RSV) are called stonesquarers in KJV of I Kings 5:18. See GEBAL.

GIDDALTI (gĭ-dăl'tī), a son of Heman, and one of the heads of music (I Chron. 25:4,29).

GIDDEL (gĭd'ĕl). 1. A member of the family of Nethinims who returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:49).

2. Sons of Giddel; descendants of Solomon's servants who also came up to Jerusalem from exile (Ezra 2:56; Neh. 7:58).

GIDEON (gĭd'ē-ŏn, Heb. gidh'ôn, feller or hewer), the son of Joash, an Abiezrite (Judg. 6:11), who lived in Ophrah, not far from Mt. Gerizim, not the Ophrah of Benjamin (Josh. 18:23). The record about Gideon is found in Judges 6:1-9:6. When he is first mentioned he was a mature man. His first-born, Jether, was a youth (8:20). Gideon had already become a noted warrior (6:12), perhaps by waging "underground" warfare against the marauding Midianites. The extent to which the people had been enslaved is shown by the fact that Gideon had to hide in a winepress to do the threshing (6:11). That the messenger who called Gideon to lead Israel was from God was attested to by supernatural fire which consumed a sacrifice which he had placed upon a rock (6:17-23).

Gideon responded to the call and, with the help of some friends, overthrew the altar of Baal and cut down the sacred grove around it. He erected instead a new altar, naming it Jahveh-Shalom, Jehovah gives peace (6:24). For his daring feat the followers of Baal wanted to slay him, but his father intervened. Instead of death he was given a new name, Jerubbaal, or "Contender with Baal" (6:28-32). Later the name was changed to Jerubbesheth, "Contender with the Idol," evidently to eliminate any recognition of Baal (II Sam. 11:21). Gideon then issued a call to adjoining tribesmen to war against the Midianites. Having gathered a formidable host, he sought to know the surety of his faith and so put forth the famous test of the fleece (6:36-40). As further assurance, he was instructed to slip into the enemy's camp, and there he overhead one soldier tell another of a dream and interpret it as meaning that Gideon's smaller army would win the battle (7:9-14). To prevent human boasting over victory, God instructed Gideon to reduce his force to 300 picked men by (1) letting the faint-hearted go home; and (2) by choosing only such men as were cautious enough to dip their drinking water while passing over a stream (7:1-8). Thus came the famous army of 300.

By a piece of strategy, involving psychological warfare, Gideon's small band surprised the enemy by a night attack. Three groups of 100 each attacked from three directions. At the proper time a signal was given, shields for the lights were removed, and trumpets blared forth. The sleeping Midianites were terrified. So complete was their rout that they slew one another in the mad flight (7:15-22). Gideon then called upon his allies to join in the chase. Ephraim captured two of the kings (8:1-3). Gideon pursued the other two northward and captured them near the confluence of the Sea of Galilee and the Jordan (8:4-21). Thus the country was delivered all the way to the Jordan (7:22,23; 8:1-21). When his people would have made him king, Gideon refused and instead called for an offering of the golden trinkets which had been captured from the Midianites. With these he made an ephod, either an image of Jehovah, or a sacred vestment worn by a priest in the sanctuary. Because of its worth and beauty, it later became an object of worship (8:24-27). Gideon's ability and statesmanship are shown in his long and fruitful ministry of forty years as judge (8:28). During his life he begat 71 sons, one, Abimelech, by a concubine of Shechem. After Gideon's death idolatry returned (8:32-35), Abimelech seized an opportune time, engaged mercenaries, invaded the land of Gideon, and destroyed all the seventy sons except Jotham who escaped by a bit of strategy (9:1-6). J.D.F.

GIDEONI (gĭd'ē-ō'nī, cutter down), a prince of Benjamin's tribe (Num. 7:60) whose son ruled them (10:24).

GIDOM (gī'dŏm, Heb. gidh'ōm, desolation), mentioned only in Judges 20:45. An isolated place east of Bethel, to which the routed Benjamites fled from angry brethren.

GIFT, GIVING. Giving played a great part in the social life of Bible times. At least eleven words in the Bible are used for it: eshkār, a reward (Ps. 72:10); minhâh, an offering to a superior (Judg. 3:15); mattān, that given to gain a favor (Gen. 34:12), or as an act of submission (Ps. 68:29); mattenā' and mattānâh, an offering (Gen. 25:6; Dan. 2:6); shōhadh, a bribe (Deut. 16:19). In the NT, dósis and dóron, anything given (Luke 21:1; James 1:17); dóma, a present (Matt. 7:11); cháris, and chárisma, special enduement (Rom. 1:11; I Tim. 4:14); to be cherished (I Cor. 12:31).

GIFTS, SPIRITUAL (Gr. charismata), a theological term meaning any endowment that comes through the grace of God (Rom. 1:11). They make possible good works (Eph. 2:10). Paul discussed at length in I Corinthians 12 the enduements for special tasks in and through the churches (Rom. 6:23; II Cor. 1:11; I Pet. 4:10). They are found in ability to speak an unlearned tongue (I Cor. 14:1-33); power to drive out evil spirits (Matt. 8:16; Acts 13:7-12); special ability in healing the sick (I Cor. 12:9); prophecy (Rom. 12:6); keenness of discernment (wisdom) and knowledge (I Cor. 12:4-8). These gifts are to be sought diligently (I Cor. 12:31), but never at the risk of neglecting the "more excellent way" of pursuing faith, hope and love, of which love is the greatest gift (I Cor. 13:13). Fruits of the Spirit are given in Galatians 5:22-23.

Everyone is accountable for any gift bestowed upon him (I Pet. 4:10; I Cor. 4:7). Claims of having such gifts are to be tested by doctrine (I Cor. 12:2,3) and on moral grounds (Matt. 7:15; Rom. 8:9). Ability in preaching is a spiritual gift (I Cor. 2:4; II Tim. 1:6). To know the deep things of God requires spiritual insight (I Cor. 2:11-16). The gifts are distributed by the Holy Ghost (Heb. 2:4). GIHON (gī'hŏn, Heb. gîhôn, burst forth). 1. One of the four rivers in Eden (Gen. 2:8-14). The name indicates that it arose either from some large spring or a cataract. Since it "encompasseth the whole land of Ethiopia" it is supposed to be the Nile whose origin from lakes Albert and Victoria would account for the name. However, Ethiopia was the name given to the land occupied by the descendants of Cush, and covered a vast area. Isaiah called it the land of Cush (11:11). Cushan appears in Habakkuk 3:7. Since Eden was probably in the Tigris-Euphrates Valley, it is possible that Gihon was a small stream in that region. Reliable evidence confirms the claim of some scholars that Cush refers to an area in northwest India. Kassi (Cush) appears in some ancient records of the region.

2. Gihon is also the name of a noted spring near Jerusalem. Solomon was anointed there to succeed David (I Kings 1:32-40). That the spring provided a goodly supply of water is shown by the fact that Hezekiah, during his prosperous reign, had its water diverted by a tunnel to serve the growing population of Jerusalem (II Chron. 32:27-30). Recent discoveries show that this tunnel was that connected with the Pool of Siloam, so-called because it fed that watering place in the city. Remains of an ancient canal have been found through which the water once entered and it may be of this that Isaiah wrote (8:6). This spring was originally controlled by the Jebusites (II Sam. 5:6) who cut a tunnel to bring it near enough to the wall for it to be drawn without exposure of their women to raiders. J.D.F.

GILALAI (gĭl'ă-lī), a member of a band of musicians who under Ezra's direction had part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36).

GILBOA (gĭl-bō'ȧ, Heb. gīlbō'a, bubbling). It has been identified as Jabel Fuku'a, a range of barren hills on the eastern side of the Plain of Esdraelon, named from a noted spring. The mean elevation of the hills is about 1,600 feet. Ain Jalud on the northern slope of the range has been identified as the location of the spring. Saul gathered his forces here to await an attack by the Philistines. Fear drove him to consult the Witch of Endor (I Sam. 28:4-7). During the battle he was wounded; his forces were routed; and he committed suicide (I Chron. 10:1-8).

GILEAD (gĭl'ē-ăd, Heb. gil'ādh, rugged). The name is used to indicate Israel's possession E of the Jordan River. Josephus so understood it (Ant. XII; 8:3). It extended from the lower end of the Sea of Galilee to the northern end of the Dead Sea, and from the Jordan eastward to the desert, a plateau of some 2,000 feet elevation. At the time of Moses it was a lush region with goodly forests, rich grazing lands, and abundant moisture. A scenic gorge of the noted brook, Jabbok, running into the Jordan, divided it. Jacob camped at Gilead when fleeing from Laban (Gen. 31:7-43). Overtaken at that place, he made a covenant with Laban which was confirmed by a pile of stones which Jacob named Galeed, "Heap of Witness" (Gen. 31:47 marg.). During succeeding years it came to be applied to the entire region which included Mount Gilead (Gen. 31:25), the land of Gilead (Num. 32:1), and Gilead (Gen. 37:25).

When Canaan was allocated to the Israelites, Gilead fell to the Reubenites, Gadites and to half the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3:13). An account of the conquest of the region is found in Deuteronomy 2 and 3. Moses was permitted to see the goodly plain before his death (Deut. 34:1). After the land was conquered a great altar was erected beside the Jordan that true worship might not be forgotten (Josh. 22:10).

Gilead became famous because of some of its products. Balm was exported to Tyre (Ezek. 27:17); Jeremiah knew of its curative power (8:22; 46:11; 51:8). The Ishmaelites who bought Joseph carried balm to Egypt (Gen. 37:25). Beside the Jabbok Jacob had his reconciliation with Esau (Gen. 32:22-33:15). Jair, a Gileadite, served for twenty years as judge over Israel (Judg. 10:3). Jephthah, a great grandson of Manasseh, was also a judge. Being the son of a concubine, he was banished by his brothers, but when Gilead was in dire distress, he was recalled by the elders (Judg. 11:1-3). He defeated the Ephraimites and prevented fugitives from crossing the Jordan by resorting to the noted password, Shibboleth (Judg. 12:1-7). Absalom gathered his forces in Gilead when he rebelled against David (II Sam. 15:13-23). The Gileadites finally fell into gross idolatry (Hos. 6:8; 12:11), were overcome by Hazael (II Kings 10:32-34), and led into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 15:27-29). J.D.F.

GILGAL (gĭl'găl, Heb. Gilgāl, circle of stones), the first camp of Israel after crossing the Jordan (Josh. 4:19,20). While encamped there Joshua restored the Hebrew rite of circumcision in response to God's promise to "roll away the reproach of Egypt" (Josh. 5:2-9). The town which grew up was near the northern border of Judah (Josh. 15:7). Most authorities agree that this is the town included in the judicial circuit of Samuel (I Sam. 7:16). And it is certain that the altar-memorial of stones erected there became a pagan shrine of later years against which Hosea (4:15) and Amos (4:4) warned the people. According to Josephus, Gilgal was about ten miles from the Jordan and two miles or more from Jericho.

It was to Gilgal that Saul was sent by Samuel to be confirmed as king over Israel (I Sam. 11:15). There Saul later grew restless because of the delay in the coming of Samuel and offended Jehovah by presuming to act as priest and make his own sacrifice (I Sam. 13:1-10). Judah gathered at Gilgal to meet David when he returned from defeating the rebels under Absalom (II Sam. 19).

Gilgal is not mentioned in the NT and its location is not known. The town from which Elijah ascended was not this Gilgal (II Kings 2:1). Gilgal furnished singers who had part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:27-43). A large pool has been located at modern Jiljuliyeh, which may mark the site. Some authorities disagree with the idea that Gilgal near Jericho was the city in Samuel's circuit, and others claim that the Gilgal mentioned by Hosea and Amos was another city near Shechem. J.D.F.

GILOH (gī'lō), home of Ahithophel, one of David's counsellors who rebelled with Absalom (II Sam. 15:12), also a town of Judah (Josh. 15:51).

GIMZO (gĭm'zō, place of lush sycamores), a town some three miles southwest of Lydda, off the Jerusalem highway, captured by Philistines during the reign of Ahaz (II Chron. 28:18). Jimza is no doubt its present location.

GIN, a trap to ensnare game (Amos 3:5) or to deceive and destroy (Ps. 140:5; 141:9); a pitfall (Job 18:9) or an offense (Isa. 8:14).

GINATH (gī'năth, protector), the father of Tibni, a contender for the throne of Israel (I Kings 16:21).

GINNETHO (See Ginnethon)

GINNETHON (gĭn'ē-thon), a priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:4) and signed the Levitical covenant (Neh. 10:6. Gennetho in KJV).

GIRDLE (See Dress)

GIRGASHITES (gûr'gà-shītes), one of seven Canaanite tribes conquered by Joshua (Deut. 7:1). They were descendants of Ham (Gen. 10:15,16). Their land was promised to Abram (Gen. 15:21) and to Israel (Josh. 3:10). Tradition says they fled to Africa.

GISPA (gĭs'pà, listener), an overseer of the Nethinims, in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 11:21).

GITTAH-HEPHER (See Gath-hepher)

GITTAIM (gĭt'ā-ĭm, Heb. gittayim, perhaps two wine presses), a town of Benjamin to which the Beerothites fled (Neh. 11:31,33), probably at the time of Saul's cruelty (II Sam. 4:3), and lived as protected strangers. Exact site unknown.

GITTITES (gĭt'ĭt, of Gath), natives of Gath, unconquered at the time of Joshua's death (Josh. 13:1-3). The Ark was deposited in a Gittite home (II Sam. 6:8-11). David's guard included 600 men of Gath (II Sam. 15:18). Goliath was a Gittite (II Sam. 21:19).

GITTITH (gĭt'ĭth, Heb. gittîth), a word found in the titles of Psalms 8, 81, 84. Its meaning is uncertain. It may denote some musical instrument made in Gath, or a melody or march popular in Gath.

GIZONITE (gĭ'zō-nīt). Hashem, one of David's valiant men, was described as a Gizonite (I Chron. 11:34). Probably an error for Gunite. He was probably the same as Jashen the Gunite (II Sam. 23:32).

GLASS, although a product known and used by man for ages, where its manufacture first arose is unknown. Pliny attributed it to the Phoenicians, but it was made in Egypt at least 2,500 years before Christ. It is supposed to have been discovered from lumps of glass found where large shocks of straw had burned, or through glaze appearing on pottery that was burned where sand and soda were present. By 1500 B.C. glass trinkets, as well as vessels, had come into general use in Egypt. No doubt Egyptian artisans introduced it to Nineveh, Phoenicia and other lands. As early as 750 B.C. Assyrians were making it, and Phoenicians had developed into a paying industry the making of glass beads.

The fact that glass does not seem to have been used to any degree by the Hebrews may be accounted for by their hatred of Egyptian products (Lev. 18:3), or else it was cheaper for them to produce pottery. Mirrors (Exod. 38:8) were made of polished bronze. The only direct reference in the OT to glass is Job 28:17, where gold and crystal (glass RSV) are compared with wisdom. The Hebrew word is zekukith, and may be translated mirror, hence the claim of some scholars that even this passage does not refer to glass. The glass mentioned by Paul (II Cor. 3:18), and that to which James referred (1:23,24) was evidently the customary mirror of polished bronze, as the Gr. word used, meant such. By the time of Christ the people of Palestine were familiar with glass. The figurative expressions, revealing the transparent nature of the Holy City, pictured by John in Revelation 21:18,21, refer to crystal glass. J.D.F.

GLEAN (Heb. lāqat, 'ālal), the Hebrew custom of allowing the poor to follow the reapers and gather the grain that was left behind or the grapes which remained after the vintage (Judg. 8:2; Ruth 2:2, 16; Isa. 17:6). This custom was backed by one of the agricultural laws of Moses (Lev. 19:9; 23:22; Deut. 24:19-21). The word is also used figuratively to describe the utter destruction of Israel (Jer. 6:9; 49:9,10).

GLEDE (See Birds)

GLORY, the exhibition of the excellence of the subject to which it is ascribed. Concerning God, it is the display of His divine attributes and perfections. Concerning man, it is the manifestation of his commendable qualities, such as wisdom, righteousness, self-control, ability, etc. A connotation of splendor is included, such as "the glory of the moon and the stars" (I Cor. 15:41). In both Testaments there are references to the Shekinah glory of God, although not by name, for the word occurs in the Targums, not in the Bible. To avoid anthropomorphisms (ascription of physical characteristics to God) which might lead to erroneous doctrine, the Targum writers spoke of the glory of the Shekinah. This was actually the physical manifestation of the presence of God, as seen in the pillars of cloud and fire. NT references to the Shekinah glory are seen in John 1:4 and Romans 9:4. Glory is both physical and spiritual, as is seen in Luke 2:9 ("the glory of the Lord shone round about them") and John 17:22, where it refers to the glory of the Father, which Jesus gave to His disciples. As for the saints, glory culminates in the changing of their bodies to the likeness of their glorified Lord (Phil. 3:20).

GNASH (năsh, Heb. hāraq, Gr. brugmós). In the OT the expression "to gnash with the teeth" represents for the most part rage, anger, or hatred (Job 16:9; Pss. 35:16; 37:12; 112:10). In the NT it expresses disappointment rather than anger (Matt. 8:12; 13:42,50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Luke 13:28).

GNAT (See Insects: Flies)

GOAD (gōd, Heb. dōrevān, malmādh, Gr. kéntron), an eight-foot wooden pole, shod at one end with a spade used for removing mud from the plow and at the other with a sharp point for prodding oxen. It was a formidable weapon in the hands of Shamgar (Judg. 3:31). To "kick against the pricks" pictures oxen kicking against the goads — a figure of useless resistance to a greater power.

GOAT (See Animals)

GOATH (gō'ăth, Heb. gō'âh), a place (RV has Goah) the site of which is unknown, but apparently W of Jerusalem. Mentioned only once, in Jeremiah 31:39, in connection with prophecy concerning the restoration of Jerusalem. Referred to by Josephus as "the camp of the Assyrians."

GOB (gŏb, Heb. gôv, pit, cistern), a place mentioned in II Samuel 21:18 as the scene of two of David's battles with the Philistines. Here the brother of Goliath defied Israel but was slain by Jonathan, son of Shimei. The Septuagint calls it Gath, which is probably correct.

GOD (Heb. 'ĕlōhîm, ēl, 'elyôn, shaddāy, yahweh; Gr. theós). Although the Bible does not contain a formal definition of the word "God," yet His being and attributes are displayed on every page. The greatest definition of the word in the history of Christendom, that is, in the culture in which the Bible has been a prevailing influence, is the definition found in the Westminster Shorter Catechism (Q.4): "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable, in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." It is fair to say that this definition faithfully sets forth what the Bible constantly assumes and declares concerning God.

God is a Spirit. These words mean that God is a non-material personal being, self-conscious and self-determining.

In the differentia of the definition we have three adjectives each modifying seven nouns. The descriptive units in which these words are combined are not logically separable, but are inextricably woven together, so as to delineate the unity and the integrated complexity of God's attributes. The analysis cannot be exhaustive, but only descriptive.

Infinite. The infinity of God is not an independent attribute. If we were to say, "God is the infinite," without specification, the meaning would be pantheistic, equal to saying, "God is everything." In using the word "infinite" we must always be specific.

Infinite in His being. This doctrine is intended to teach that God is everywhere. The omnipresence of God is vividly brought out in such scriptures as Psalm 139. God is not physically, relatively, or measurably big. The word "immensity" is used by good theologians, but it conveys to some minds a false impression, as though God were partly here and partly there, like a giant, or an amorphous mass, or a fluid. The omnipresence of God means that wherever we are, even though we be like fleeing Jacob at Bethel (Gen. 28:16), God Himself is there.

It is easier to conceive of God's omnipresence by saying, "Everything everywhere is immediately in His presence." Finite creatures can act instantaneously in a limited area. Everything within one's reach or sight is immediately in His presence, in the sense that distance is no problem. So in an absolutely perfect sense, everything in the universe is immediately in the presence of God.

Infinite in His wisdom. This phrase designates God's omniscience. The Bible throughout regards His omniscience as all-inclusive, and not dependent upon discursive processes. God's knowledge does not increase or diminish as He knows when the temporal events of his redemptive program take place. He eternally knows what He has known in the past and what He will know in the future.

The words Infinite in His power point to His omnipotence, His ability to do with power all that power can do, His controlling all the power that is or can be.

Infinite in His holiness, justice and goodness. These words signify God's moral attributes. Holiness is regarded in the Bible as His central ethical character. Basic ethical principles are revealed by the will of God, and derived from and based upon the character of God. "Ye shall be holy for I am holy" (Lev. 11:44f. et passim). Justice refers to His administration of rewards and punishments among the personal beings of the universe. Goodness in this context indicates His love, His common grace toward all, and His special grace in saving sinners.

Infinite in His truth. This is the attribute which designates the basis of all logic and rationality. The axioms of logic and mathematics, and all the laws of reason, are not laws apart from God, to which God must be subject. They are attributes of His own character. When the Bible says that "it is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18; Titus 1:2) there is no contradiction of omnipotence. How much power would it take to make two times two equal five? Truth is not an object of power.

There is no mere tautology in the Bible, as though the multiplication tables were true by mere divine fiat. As in ethics, so in rationality, the Biblical writers constantly appeal to the truth of God's immutable character. "He cannot deny himself" (II Tim. 2:13).

Just as the adjective "infinite," in the definition we are considering, applies to all the specified attributes, so the words "eternal" and "unchangeable" similarly apply to all.

Eternal in the Bible means, without temporal beginning or ending; or in a figurative sense, "eternal" may designate (as in the words "eternal life") a quality of being suitable for eternity.

That God existed eternally before the creation of the finite universe does not imply a personal subject with no object, for God is triune. (See TRINITY.)

The idea that eternity means timelessness is nowhere suggested in the Bible. This false notion doubtless came into Christian theology under the influence of Aristotle's "Unmoved Mover" (see Aristotle's Physics, book Theta, Ch. 6, 258b, 1.12, and Metaphysics, book Lambda, Ch. 7 et passim), the influence of which is strong in Thomas Aquinas.

That the Bible does not teach that God is timeless, is an objective, verifiable fact. The evidence is well set forth by Oscar Cullmann. See his Christ and Time.

Unchangeable, in Bible language, points the perfect self-consistency of God's character throughout all eternity. This is not a static concept, but dynamic, in all His relations with His creatures. That God brings to pass, in time, the events of his redemptive program is not contradictory. The notion that God's immutability is static immobility (as in Thomism) is like the notion of timelessness, and is contrary to the Biblical view. The God of the Bible is intimately and actively concerned in all the actions of all His creatures.

God is known by His acts. Supremely, "God has spoken in his Son" (Heb. 1:1ff). Further, His "invisible" being, that is, His "eternal power and divine character [theiotes as distinguished from theotes]" are "known" and "clearly seen" by "the things he has made" (Rom. 1:20). "The heavens declare the glory of God" (Ps. 19; Rom. 10:18). It is customary to distinguish between "natural revelation" and "special revelation," the Bible being identical with the latter.

God is known in fellowship. That by faith God is known, beyond the mere cognitive sense, in fellowship with His people, is one of the most prominent themes throughout the Bible. Moses, leading His people in the exodus, was assured, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." And Moses replied, "If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence" (Exod. 33:14f). The Bible abounds in invitations to seek and find fellowship with God. See Psalm 27, Isaiah 55, and many similar gracious invitations.

Other gods are referred to in the Bible as false gods (Judg. 6:31; I Kings 18:27; I Cor. 8:4-6), or as demonic (I Cor. 10:19-22). J.O.B.

GODLINESS (Gr. eusébeia, theosébeia), the piety toward God and rectitude of conduct which springs from a proper relationship with Him. It is not belief in itself, but the devotion toward God and love toward man which result from that belief. Religious faith is empty without godliness, for it is then but an empty form (II Tim. 3:5). The Gr. eusébeia is found fifteen times in the NT; it is translated fourteen times as godliness and once as holiness. It is the sum total of religious character and actions, and produces both a present and future state of happiness. It is not right action which is done from a sense of duty, but is that spontaneous virtue that comes from the indwelling Christ, and which reflects Him. B.P.D.

GOLAN (gō'lăn, Heb. gôlān), a city in the territory of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, E of the Jordan. It was one of the three cities of refuge, and assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Deut. 4:43). Probably an important city in its day, it was destroyed by Alexander Janneus after his army had been ambushed there. The site cannot definitely be identified, but the archaeologist Schumacher believes it was seventeen miles E of the Sea of Galilee, in present Syria, located in Gaulanitis, one of the four provinces into which Bashan was divided after the Babylonian captivity. It is a fertile plateau, 1000-3000 feet in elevation.

GOLDSMITH (See Occupations & Professions: Artificer)

GOLGOTHA (gŏl'gō-thà, Gr. Golgothá, from Aram. gulgaltā', skull), the place of our Lord's crucifixion. From the Heb. gulgoleth, which implies a bald, round, skull-like mound or hillock. The Latin name, Calvarius (bald skull) has been retained in the form Calvary (Luke 23:33). In the RV, it is simply, "the skull." Two explanations of the name are found: (1) It was a place of execution, and therefore abounded in skulls; (2) The place had the appearance of a skull when viewed from a short distance. The Gospels and tradition do not agree as to its location. Both Matthew (27:33) and Mark (15:22) locate it outside the city, but close to it (John 19:20) on the public highway, which was the type of location usually chosen by the Romans for executions. Tradition locates it within the present city. B.P.D.

GOLIATH (gō-lī'ăth, Heb. golyāth, Gr. Goliáth, exile), a gigantic warrior of the Philistine army, probably one of the Anakim (Num. 13:33; Josh. 11:22). Goliath's size was extraordinary. If a cubit is 21 inches, he was over eleven feet in height; if about 18 inches, he was over nine feet. The only mention made of Goliath is his appearance as a champion of the Philistines (I Sam. 17). The Philistines had ventured on another inroad into Israel's territory, and had taken a firm position on the slope of a hill, with Israel encamped on a hill opposite. From the Philistine camp Goliath made daily challenges to personal combat, but after forty days no one had accepted. David had been sent to his brothers with provisions. When he heard Goliath's challenge, he inquired its meaning. Upon being told, he went to face Goliath, armed only with a sling and five stones. Hit in the forehead, Goliath fell, and David cut off his head. When the Philistines saw that their champion was dead, they fled, pursued by victorious Israel. The Goliath of II Samuel 21:19 was probably the son of the giant whom David killed. He was slain by Elhanan, one of David's men. A discrepancy has been imagined, and some have thought that it was Elhanan who slew the giant. B.P.D.

GOMORRAH (gō-mŏr'à, Heb. 'ămōrâh, Gr. Gomórra, submersion), one of the five "cities of the plain" located in the Vale of Siddim at the S end of the Dead Sea. Zoar alone escaped the destruction by fire from heaven in the time of Abraham and Lot. The district where the five cities were located was exceedingly productive and well-peopled, but today traces of the punitive catastrophe abound. There are great quantities of salt, with deposits of bitumen, sulphur and nitre on the shores of the Dead Sea. The location was long a contention, but it definitely was established in 1924 by an archaeological expedition led by the late eminent archaeologist, Dr. Melvin Grove Kyle. "The Lisan is a kind of promontory that juts out from the eastern shore toward the western mountains and almost cuts the sea in two. Anciently, it manifestly separated the sea to the north of it from the low plain to the south of it. Thirty-five years ago, when I first saw the Dead Sea, it was so much lower than now that there was a beautiful island at the north end. Today, as we approach the Port of Jericho, we pass over the region of that island in several feet of water. The cities are clearly shown to have stood in front of Jebel Usdum, where they lie under the waters today. This region was found by geologists to be a burned-out area of oil and asphalt, of which there has been an accumulation which is now being exploited. Where these conditions exist, there is an accumulation of gases. Geologists admit that at some past time there was a great explosion, with first an upheaval and then a subsidence of strata. Salt, mixed with sulphur, was carried up into the heavens white hot and so rained down upon the cities of the plain, exactly as the Scriptures describe the rain of fire and brimstone from heaven" (Kyle, Explorations at Sodom, pp. 67,130,137-38). GOPHER WOOD (gō'fĕr wo͝od, Heb. 'ătsê ghōpher), the wood from which Noah's ark was made (Gen. 6:14). The word "gopher" is unknown elsewhere in Hebrew or allied languages. It may refer to some resinous wood, like pine, cedar, or cypress; or the reference may be to boats made of interwoven willow branches and palm leaves, coated on the outside with bitumen.

GOSHEN (gō'shĕn, Heb. gōshen, probably mound of earth). 1. The NE section of the Nile delta region is usually termed "the land of Goshen." Here the Israelites under Jacob settled, while Joseph was prime minister (Gen. 46). The district is not large, having an area of some 900 square miles, but because of irrigation is considered some of the best land of Egypt, excellent for grazing and for certain types of agriculture. The district had two principal cities, both built for the Pharaohs by the Hebrews. The one of greater importance had, at various times, at least three and possibly four names. Zoan, Avaris and Tanis were certainly its names, and archaeologists do not agree as to whether it also bore the name of Raamses. Some indicate a different location for Raamses. Under the name of Avaris, it was for 500 years the capital of the Hyksos. The other city, Pithom, is particularly interesting to the student of Biblical archeology because here is found a proof of Exodus 5:7-13, where the labor overseers were told to refuse the Hebrew workmen straw for making bricks, yet with no diminution of the assigned quota. In a building at Pithon are found three types of bricks, beginning at its foundation where straw was used. After the refusal of straw, the Hebrews desperately gathered all bits of straw and stubble they could find, and such bricks are found higher in the building. It was completed with bricks devoid of straw.

2. A district of S Palestine, lying between Gaza and Gibeon, its name probably given in remembrance of Egypt (Josh. 10:41).

3. A town mentioned with Debir, Socoh and others, in the SW part of the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:51). B.P.D.

GOSPEL (gŏs'pĕl, Gr. euaggélion, good news). The English word Gospel is derived from the Anglo-Saxon godspell, which meant "good tidings" and, later, the "story concerning God." As now used, the word describes the message of Christianity and the books in which the story of Christ's life and teaching is found. This message is the good news that God has provided a way of redemption through His Son Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit works through the Gospel for the salvation of men (Rom. 1:15,16). In the NT the word Gospel never means a book (one of the four Gospels), but always the good tidings which Christ and the apostles announced. It is called "the gospel of God" (Rom. 1:1; I Thess. 2:2,9); "the gospel of Christ" (Mark 1:1; Rom. 1:16; 15:19); "the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts 20:24); "the gospel of peace" (Eph. 6:15); "the gospel of your salvation" (Eph. 1:13; and "the glorious gospel" (II Cor. 4:4). The Gospel has to do entirely with Christ. It was preached by Him (Matt. 4:23; 11:5), by the apostles (Acts 16:10; Rom. 1:15), and by the evangelists (Acts 8:25). It was not until c. A.D. 150 that the word Gospel was applied to the writings concerning the message of Christ. Each of the four records was called a Gospel, and likewise the four together. S.B.

GOSPEL, THE FOUR GOSPELS. The word Gospel is derived from the Anglo-Saxon gōd spell, or good tidings, and is a literal translation of the Greek euaggélion, which meant originally a reward for bringing good news, and finally the good news itself. In the NT the term is applied to the revelation of God's plan for reconciling man to Himself by forgiving his sin and by transforming his character. The Gospel is the story of God's gift of salvation through the person and work of Christ which the church has been commissioned to proclaim (Mark 16:15; Acts 20:24; Eph. 1:13). The impact of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ compelled His disciples to present His message to the public. By repeating the significant features of His ministry and His accompanying precepts, following the general order of His biography, they formulated a body of teaching which may have varied in detail with each recital, but which maintained the same general content.

The existence of this standardized message is confirmed by the NT itself. Paul, in the Epistle to the Galatians, mentioning a visit to Jerusalem which took place before A.D. 50, said: ". . . I laid before them the gospel which I preach among the Gentiles" (Gal. 2:2). In another passage he defined it clearly: "... the gospel which I preached unto you, which ye also received, wherein also ye stand, by which also ye are saved . . . For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received: that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures: and that he was buried; and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures; and that he appeared to Cephas ..." (I Cor. 15:1-5). A similar presentation is afforded by the report of Peter's address in the house of Cornelius, the Gentile centurion. After sketching the baptism, life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, Peter concluded: "He [God] charged us to preach unto the people, and to testify that this is he who is ordained of God to be the judge of the living and the dead. To him bear all the prophets witness that through his name every one that believeth shall have remission of sins" (Acts 10: 42,43).

From these samples of apostolic preaching one may conclude that the facts of Jesus' life constituted the Gospel, which was interpreted and applied to suit the occasion on which it was preached.

This Gospel, which was initially proclaimed in oral form, has been transmitted through the writings which are consequently called the "Gospels." Although Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John differ considerably in detail, they agree on the general outline of Jesus' career, on the supernatural character of His life, and on the high quality of His moral precepts. From the earliest period of the church they have been accepted as authoritative accounts of His life and teachings.

Character: Reduced to writing, the Gospel message constitutes a new type of literature. Although it is framed in history, it is not pure history, for the allusions to contemporary events are incidental, and the Gospels do not attempt to develop them. They contain biographical material, but they cannot be called biography in the modern sense of the word, since they do not present a complete summary of the life of Jesus. The Gospels are not sufficiently didactic to be called essays; they conceal rather than reveal the direct opinions of their writers. The chief purpose of the Gospels is to create faith in Christ on the part of their readers, who may or may not be believers. Nothing exactly like them can be found either in the OT, to which their writers referred frequently, nor in the Hellenic and Roman literature contemporary with them.

Of the numerous accounts and fragments that were composed to perpetuate the ministry and teaching of Jesus, only four are accorded a place in the NT: Matthew, written by Jesus' disciple Matthew Levi, the tax-gatherer; Mark, from the pen of John Mark, an inhabitant of Jerusalem and a companion of Barnabas and Paul; Luke, the first half of a history of Christianity in two volumes by an associate of Paul; and John, a collection of select memoirs by John, the son of Zebedee. Although the authorship of all of these Gospels has been disputed, there has been an increasing tendency to revert to the traditional views stated above. Other Gospels, such as the Gospel of Peter, or the Gospel of Thomas, are later productions of the second and third centuries and usually represent the peculiar theological prejudices of some minor sect.

Origin of the Gospels: The existence of the oral Gospel is attested by Papias, one of the earliest of the church fathers, who lived at the close of the first century. A quotation from the preface to his "Interpretation of our Lord's Declarations" preserved in Eusebius indicates that he still depended on the transmission of the Gospel content by the living voice. "But if I met with any one who had been a follower of the elders anywhere, I made it a point to inquire what were the declarations of the elders . . . for I do not think that I derived so much benefit from books as from the living voice of those that are still surviving" (quoted in Eusebius: Historia Ecclesiae, III. 39). In Papias' time not more than two or three of the original band of Jesus' disciples would still be living, and he would be compelled to obtain his information from those who had heard the apostles. Nevertheless, he preferred the oral testimony to written record. Irrespective of the value of Papias' judgment, his words indicate that the content of the apostolic preaching was independently transmitted by word of mouth two generations after the crucifixion, simultaneously with the use of whatever written records existed.

A clue to the transition from oral preaching to written record is provided by explanatory statements in the Gospels of Luke and John. In the introduction to his Gospel, Luke asserts that he was undertaking to confirm by manuscript what his friend Theophilus had already learned by word of mouth (Luke 1:1-4). He spoke of facts which were taken for granted among believers, and indicated that there had already been numerous attempts to arrange them in orderly narratives. Since his use of the word "narrative" (Gr. diēgēsis) implies an extended account, there must have been a number of "gospels" in circulation which he considered to be either inaccessible or else unsatisfactory. If his use of language permits deduction by contrast, these rival gospels were the opposite of his own. They were partial in content, drawn from secondary sources, and perhaps were not organized by any consecutive line of thought. They may have been random collections of sayings or events which had no central theme, or they may not have contained enough biographical material to afford an adequate understanding of Jesus' life.

Luke affirmed on the contrary that he had derived his facts from those who "from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" (1:2). Not only had his informants shared in the events of which they spoke, but also they had been so affected that they became propagandists of the new faith. Luke had been a contemporary of these witnesses, and had investigated personally the truth of their claims, that he might produce an orderly and accurate record of the work of Christ.

John also committed his Gospel to writing that he might inculcate faith in Christ as the Son of God (John 20:30,31). He did not profess to give an exhaustive account of Jesus' activities, but took for granted that many of them would be familiar to his readers. The selective process that he employed was determined by his evangelistic purpose and theological viewpoint.

Although Matthew and Mark are less explicit concerning their origins, the same general principles obtain. The introduction of Matthew, "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ, the son of David, the son of Abraham" (Matt. 1:1), duplicates the phraseology of Genesis (Gen. 5:1) to convey the impression that, like Genesis, it is giving a significant chapter in the history of God's dealing with man. Mark's terse opening line, "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God," is a title, labeling the following text as a summary of current preaching. Neither of these two offers any reason for its publication, but one may deduce fairly that all of the Gospels began in an attempt to preserve for posterity what had hitherto existed in the minds of the primitive witnesses and in their public addressses.

There has been some question whether the Gospels were first published in Aramaic, the language of Palestine, where the church began, or in Greek. Eusebius quoted Papias' statement that Matthew composed his history in the Hebrew dialect and everyone translated it as he was able (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiae, III, 39). Without the original context, these words are ambiguous. Papias does not make clear whether "Hebrew" was the speech of the OT, or whether he really meant Aramaic. He does not specify whether Matthew's contribution was simply collected notes from which others composed a Gospel, or whether he had already formed an organized narrative that was translated. He does imply that before the Gentile expansion had made the literature of the church Greek, there was a body of material written in Hebrew or Aramaic.

Papias' statement has aroused a great deal of controversy. There are Aramaisms in the Gospels such as Ephphatha (Mark 7:34), Talitha cumi (Mark 5:41), and the cry from the cross, Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani (Mark 15:34), which reflect Jesus' use of His mother tongue and the perpetuation of His language in the memoirs of His followers. These, however, do not necessitate that the Gospels were written originally in Aramaic. C. C. Torrey (Our Translated Gospels. New York, Harper, 1936) contended that all four Gospels were translations, but there is no agreement on the evidence. If they were translations, they must have been composed prior to the middle of the first century, when the churches were predominantly Palestinian. It is more likely that the Gospels originated in the evangelistic preaching to the Gentile world, and that they were written in Greek, although they contained an Aramaic background.

Composition of the Gospels: The personal reminiscences of the apostolic band, plus the fixed content of their preaching constituted the materials from which the Gospels were constructed, and the purpose of the individual writers provided the method of organization. Both Luke (1:1-4) and John (20:30,31) pledge accuracy of historical fact before they proceed with interpretation, and the same may safely be predicated of Matthew and Mark. All the Gospels were composed for use in the growing movement of the Church; they were not written solely for literary effect. Matthew obviously wished to identify Jesus with the Messiah of the Old Testament by pointing out that He was the fulfilment of prophecy and that He was intimately related to the manifestation of the kingdom. Mark, by his terse descriptive paragraphs, depicted the Son of God in action among men. Luke employed a smoother literary style and a larger stock of parabolic stories to interest a cultured and perhaps humanistic audience. John selected episodes and discourses which others had not used in order to promote belief in Jesus as the Son of God.

The Publication of the Gospels: Where and when these documents were first given to the public is uncertain. The earliest quotations from the Gospel material appear in the letters of Ignatius, in the Epistle of Barnabas, the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and the Epistle of Polycarp. All of these are related to Antioch of Syria, and their quotations or allusions bear a stronger resemblance to the text of Matthew than to that of any other Gospel. If, as Papias said, Matthew was first written for the Hebrew or Aramaic church in Jerusalem, it may have been the basis for a Greek edition issued from Antioch during the development of the Gentile church in that city. It would, therefore, have been put into circulation some time after A.D. 50, and before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70.

Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 200) described the writing of the Gospel of Mark: "When Peter had proclaimed the word publicly at Rome, and declared the gospel under the influence of the Spirit; as there was a great number present, they requested Mark, who had followed him from afar, and remembered well what he had said, to reduce these things to writing, and that after composing the Gospel he gave it to those who requested it of him. Which, when Peter understood, he directly neither hindered nor encouraged it." (Eusebius, Historia Ecclesiae, VI, 14.) Irenaeus (c. A.D. 100), Clement's contemporary, confirmed this tradition, adding that Mark handed down Peter's preaching in writing after his death. If the second Gospel represents the memoirs of Peter, it is possible that its content did not become fixed in literary form until A.D. 65 or later.

The Gospel of Luke may have been a private document, sent first of all to Luke's friend and patron, Theophilus. The adjective "most excellent" (Luke 1:3) implies that he probably belonged to the aristocracy, and that the dual work which Luke wrote was calculated to remove any lingering doubts that he may have entertained concerning the historical and spiritual verities of Christian faith. It can hardly have been written later than A.D. 62, since it must have preceded Acts, which was written about the end of Paul's first imprisonment.

The last chapter of John's Gospel attempts to correct a rumor that he would never die. Obviously the rumor would have no basis unless he had attained an advanced age at the time when the concluding chapter was written. It is possible that it can be dated before A.D. 50, but most conservative scholars place it about A.D. 85. Traditionally it has been ascribed to the apostle John, who ministered at Ephesus in the closing years of the first century.

Synoptic Problem: The three Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called synoptic from the Greek word synoptikos, which means "to see the whole together, to take a comprehensive view." They present similar views of the career and teaching of Christ, and resemble each other closely in content and in phraseology.

The numerous agreements between these Gospels have raised the question whether the relationship between them can be traced to common literary sources. Almost the entire content of the Gospel of Mark can be found in both Matthew and Luke, while much material not found in Mark is common to the other two Gospels. On the other hand, each Gospel has a different emphasis and organization. The "Synoptic Problem," as it is called, may be stated as follows: If the three Gospels are absolutely independent of each other, how can one account for the minute verbal agreements in their text? If they are copied from each other, or compiled freely from common sources, how can they be original and authoritative? Are they, then, truly the product of inspired writers, or are they merely combinations of anecdotes which may or may not be true?

Numerous theories have been propounded to account for these phenomena. The most popular in recent years has been the documentary theory, which assumes that the Gospels were derived from Mark and a hypothetical document called "Q" (from the German Quelle, meaning source), containing chiefly sayings of Jesus. According to this theory Matthew and Luke were composed independently by combining these two sources. Canon B. H. Streeter (The Four Gospels, New York, Macmillan, 1936) suggested also the addition of two special sources, M for Matthew and L for Luke, embodying the private knowledge or research of the two writers.

While this hypothesis seemingly solves the problem of the verbal resemblances, it is not entirely satisfactory. The existence of "Q" is at best only a probability; no copy of it has ever been found. R. M. Grant has pointed out that extant collections of the "Sayings of Jesus" dating from the second and third centuries should probably be assigned to the Gnostics, who, in turn, were dependent either on oral tradition or upon the canonical Gospels for their text (R. M. Grant, The Secret Sayings of Jesus, New York, Doubleday, 1960, pp. 29,40-61). These documents which have been considered analogous to "Q," and therefore as justifying the hypothesis of its existence, are themselves secondary. It is more likely that the coincident didactic passages of Matthew and Luke are drawn from utterances that Jesus repeated until they became fixed in the minds of His disciples, and were reproduced later in the Gospels.

In recent years the school of historical criticism, called Formgeschichte, has advanced another alternative. In an attempt to penetrate the development of the Gospel story before the Gospels, it has suggested that they were composed out of individual reminiscences of Jesus' deeds and bits of His teaching that were first preserved and circulated by His followers. Through repetition and selection these stories took permanent shape, and were incorporated into a general sequence that constituted the Gospel narratives. Advocates of Formgeschichte have separated the unitary sections of the Gospels into various classes: the Passion story of Jesus' last days; the Paradigms, stories of Jesus' deeds that illustrate the message; Tales of miraculous occurrences told to interest the public; Legends of saintly persons that are morally edifying; Sayings of Jesus that preserve His collected teachings in speeches or in parables.

This modification of oral tradition injects a greater uncertainty into the process of literary history. If the Synoptic Gospels are merely different arrangements of independent blocks of text, the problem of origins is multiplied. While sections of the Gospels may have been used for illustrative purposes, and while certain parts of them, like the Sermon on the Mount, might have once been a separate collection of sayings (or deeds, as the case may be), the fact that they were composed in the first century by trustworthy disciples of Jesus precludes fraud or unreliability.

Perhaps the best solution of the Synoptic Problem is the fact that all three Gospels are dealing with the life of the same Person, whose deeds and utterances were being continually preached as a public message. Constant repetition and frequent contact between the preachers tended toward fixing the content of the message. From the day of Pentecost the "teaching of the apostles" possessed some definite form, for it was used in instructing inquirers (Acts 2:42). As the church expanded, the written accounts were created to meet the demand for instruction, and they reproduced the phraseology and content of the oral teaching. Each Gospel, however, was shaped to its own purpose and audience, so that the variations in wording reflected the differences of interest and environment. Matthew was written for Christians with a Jewish background; Mark for active Gentiles, probably Romans; Luke for a cultured and literary Greek. All three, however, bear united witness to the supernatural character and saving purpose of Jesus Christ.

The Johannine Problem: The Fourth Gospel differs markedly in character and in content from the Synoptics. Excluding the feeding of the five thousand and the Passion narrative, there are few points of agreement with the others. So radical are the differences that the veracity of the Gospel has been challenged on the grounds that if it is historical, it should coincide more nearly with the Synoptics.

For this reason some have held that the Fourth Gospel was written in the second century as the church's reflection on the person of Christ, phrased in terms of the Greek Logos doctrine. The discovery of the Rylands Fragment, a small scrap of papyrus on which a few verses of John were written, demonstrated that by the beginning of the second century the Gospel of John was circulated as far as southern Egypt. Since the handwriting of the fragment can be dated about 125 A.D., the Gospel must have been written earlier. It could not have been a late product of church tradition.

The language of the Gospel does not necessitate a Hellenistic origin. The existence of the concepts of light and of darkness, truth and falsehood, living waters, and others in the Dead Sea Scrolls show that John need not have drawn his vocabulary from Hellenism, but that many of his terms were a part of contemporary Judaism (William LaSor, The Amazing Dead Sea Scrolls, Chicago, Moody Press, 1953, pp. 211-214). The Gospel of John is the account of an eye-witness, writing in his later years and interpreting the person of Christ in the perspective of his Christian experience.

Canonicity: The Gospels were among the first writings to be quoted as sacred and authoritative. There are quotations or allusions from individual passages in Ignatius of Antioch (c. A.D. 116), the Epistle of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas, which were written in the early part of the second century. Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 140) mentions the Gospels explicitly, calling them "Memoirs of the Apostles" (First Apology, LXVI). Marcion of Sinope (c. A.D. 100), a Gnostic, edited a compilation of Scriptures in which he included a mutilated Gospel of Luke. Tatian, (c. A.D. 150) an Assyrian who was converted in Rome under the ministry of Justin, and later became a Gnostic, produced the first harmony of the Gospels, called the Diatessaron. It included only the familiar four, weaving their text together into one continuous narrative. Only a few traces of the Diatessaron are still available in translations or in commentaries, but its existence proves that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were already the chief sources of information concerning the life and works of Jesus in the first half of the second century.

Growing intercommunication between the churches and the need for strengthening their defenses against heresy and the attacks of pagan critics promoted their interest in a canon of the Gospels. By A.D. 170 the four Gospels were securely established as the sole authorities. According to Irenaeus' contention, "It is not possible that the Gospels can be either more or fewer in number than they are. For since there are four zones of the world in which we live and four principal winds . . . it is fitting that she [the church] should have four pillars, breathing out immortality on every side . . ." (Against Heresies, III, xi, 8). Irenaeus' reasons are not very cogent, but the fact that he acknowledged only four indicates the sentiment of his times. The Muratorian Canon, a fragmentary manuscript of the seventh or eighth century containing a list of accepted books earlier than A.D. 200, included in its original form the four Gospels; and they were used by Tertullian of Carthage (c. A.D. 200), Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200), Origen of Alexandria (c. A.D. 250), Cyprian of Carthage (c. A.D. 250); and they appear in the manuscript texts of the Chester Beatty Papyri and of the Old Latin version, both of which were in existence before A.D. 300. Eusebius (c. A.D. 350) and the fathers following him exclude all other Gospels from their official list, leaving these four the undisputed supreme authorities for knowledge of the life and work of Jesus Christ. GOURD (See Plants)

GOVERNOR (gŭv'êr-nôr), one who governs a land for a supreme ruler to whom he is subordinate. The word governor in the ERV is the rendering of a large variety of Hebrew and Greek words, and is used to represent men holding a number of official governmental positions. For example, Joseph, the prime minister of Egypt, was called its governor (Gen. 42:6; 45:26); Gedaliah, left in Judah to rule the conquered Jews after the destruction of Jerusalem, was called governor (Jer. 40:5; 41:2). In the NT the term occurs chiefly in reference to the Roman procurators of Judea — Pilate, Felix, and Festus. In the 1st century A.D., Roman provinces were of two kinds: imperial and senatorial. The first were ruled by procurators appointed by the emperor; the second, by proconsuls appointed by the senate. Judea was an imperial province. Pontius Pilate was the fifth of the governors of Judea; Felix, the eleventh; and Festus the twelfth. Procurators were directly responsible to the emperor for their actions, and ruled for as long as he willed.

GOZAN (gō'zăn, Heb. gôzān), a city located in NE Mesopotamia, on the Habor River, a tributary of the Euphrates. Here the Israelites were deported by the Assyrians following the fall of Samaria, the capital of the northern kingdom, (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; 19:12; I Chron. 5:26). The Assyrians called the city Guzanu, (the Guzanitis of Ptolemy). In 1911 Baron Von Oppenheim discovered a new culture at Tell Halaf, the modern name for Gozan. The relics of pottery are thought to date back to as far as 4000 B.C.

GRACE (Heb. hēn, Gr. cháris), a term employed by the Biblical writers with a considerable variety of meaning: (1) Properly speaking, that which affords joy, pleasure, delight, charm, sweetness, loveliness; (2) Good will, loving-kindness, mercy, etc; (3) the kindness of a master toward a slave. Thus by analogy, it has come to signify the kindness of God to man (Luke 1:30). The NT writers, at the end of their various epistles, frequently invoke God's gracious favor upon their readers (Rom. 16:20, 24; Phil. 4:23; Col. 1:19; I Thess. 5:28; et. al.). In addition, the word "grace" is frequently used to express the concept of kindness bestowed upon someone undeserving thereof. Hence, undeserved favor, especially that kind or degree of favor bestowed upon sinners through Jesus Christ. "For God who is rich in mercy for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead in sins hath quickened us together in Christ — by grace we are saved" (Eph. 2:4,5). Grace, therefore, is that unmerited favor of God towards fallen man, whereby, for the sake of Christ — who is the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth—(John 1:14) He has provided for man's redemption. He has from all eternity determined to extend favor towards all who exercise faith in Christ as Lord and Saviour.

The relationship between law and grace is one of the major themes of the Pauline writings (Rom. 5:1; 15-17; 8:1,2; Eph. 2:8,9; Gal. 5:4,5). Grace is likewise without equivocation identified as the medium or instrument through which God has effected the salvation of all believers (Titus 2:11). Grace is also regarded as the sustaining influence enabling the believer to persevere in the Christian life (Acts 11:23; 20:32; II Cor. 9:14). Thus, it is not merely the initiatory act of God in grace which secures the believers' eternal salvation, but also that which maintains it throughout the entirety of the Christian life. It is also used as a token or proof of salvation (II Cor. 1:5, RV "benefit"). A special gift of grace is imparted to the humble (I Pet. 5:5; James 4:6). Grace can also refer to the capacity for the reception of divine life (I Pet. 1:10). There are likewise several secondary senses in which "grace" is used: a gift of knowledge (I Cor. 1:4); thanksgiving or gratitude expressed for favor (I Cor. 10:30; I Tim. 1:1,2). Grace is employed at least once in the sense of "reward or recompense" (Luke 6:32), for which Matthew substitutes the term misthos, or wages (Matt. 5:46).

GRAFF, GRAFT, a horticultural process by which the branches of the wild olive tree in eastern lands are cut back so that branches from a cultivated olive may be inserted and grafting take place. Paul makes use of this practice in reverse (Rom. 11:17-24) where the opposite process is envisioned as happening; i.e., the wild branches, the Gentiles, are thought of as "grafted in" to the good stock of the parent tree, the children of Israel. This deliberate inversion, certainly not a foolish mistake, heightens rather than mitigates the picturesque figure of speech conveying the eternal truth of the rejection of Israel and the status of the church.

GRAIN (See Plants)

GRANARY (grăn'ârē, Heb. māzû, Gr. apothéke, derived from a Hebrew word meaning to gather (Ps. 144:13), or Heb. ôtzār, storehouse (Joel 1:17). In the NT the term is sometimes rendered barn, and sometimes garner (Matt. 3:12; Luke 3:17). The Egyptians had storehouses for grain, liquor, armor, provisions, jewels, etc. Joseph, during the years of famine in Egypt, had authority over the storehouses (Gen. 41:56).

GRAPE (See Plants)

GRASS. There are a great many species of true grasses in Palestine, but actual turf is virtually unknown. The word "grass" is used in a somewhat comprehensive sense in the English version and is the rendering of a number of Hebrew terms and one Greek term. Genesis 1:11,12 divides the vegetable kingdom into three great classes: grass, herbs, and trees. The word is used in a figurative sense, too, as when man's brief exile is compared to grass (Ps. 103:15,16; Matt. 6:30; Luke 12:28).

GRASSHOPPER (See Insects)

GRATE (Heb. resheth), a copper network, moved by a copper ring at each corner and placed under the top of the great altar (Exod. 27:4; 35:16; 38:4,5). It reached halfway up the altar and was doubtless to catch the ashes from the burning sacrifices.

GRAVE (Heb. qĕvĕr, she'ôl, Gr. mnemeion), a place for the interment of the dead; a tomb, a sepulchre. Graves and accompanying burial customs differed in Biblical times from country to country. The pyramids were used for burial of members of the royal house. The Egyptians were meticulous in the construction of their graves because of their ardent belief in a future life. The rich were buried in a mastaba, or a rectangular structure of brick placed above the grave itself. In the neighborhood of Gizeh near the pyramids and at Saqqarah a number of these mastabas have been discovered. The very poor were interred clothesless and coffinless in the dry, sandy soil of Egypt. In later centuries, the rock tomb was substituted for the mastaba. Examples of these are the rock-hewn tombs of Thotmes III and Tutankhamon. Tutankhamon's tomb consisted of a passage cut into a hill of rock leading to a hall supported by columns where the sarcophagus of the pharaoh lay. Bas-reliefs in bright colors were frequently depicted on the walls of these tombs. Sumerian practice demanded that the royal dead be accompanied by the living, human beings and animals, forming a ghastly entourage. Queen Shu-ad of Ur, Abraham's city, was interred in this style with her husband. Three of the great kings of Persia cut their tombs out of the rocks near Persepolis. Among the Hebrews, graves were sometimes mere holes in the earth (Gen. 35:8; I Sam. 31:13); natural caves or grottos; or artificial tombs hewn out of the rock (Luke 7:12, John 11:30). In such a sepulchre, provided through the kindness of Joseph of Arimathea, the body of Jesus was laid. Flat stones were placed upon the graves as markers to warn passers-by that they should not contract ceremonial defilement by unwittingly trespassing. These stones were whitewashed annually in the month of Adar. This was the underlying figure of speech behind Jesus' stinging rebuke of the Pharisees, "Ye are like unto whited sepulchres" (Matt. 23:27). There were some traces still extant in the days of Christ (Matt. 8:28) of the idea that tombs were the dwelling places of demons. J.F.G.

GRAVE CLOTHES (Gr. keiría, winding sheet). Preparatory to burial, the body was washed, and frequently anointed with spices, then stretched out on a bier until it was ready to be buried (Acts 5:7). After the washing and anointing, the corpse was wrapped in a linen winding sheet, the hands and feet were bound with grave-bands, and the face covered with a napkin (John 11:44; 19:40).

GRAVEN IMAGE, an image of wood, stone, or metal, shaped with a sharp cutting instrument as distinguished from one cast in a mold (Isa. 20:22; 44:16,17; 45:20). Images were, however, sometimes cast and then finished by the graver (Isa. 40:19). Such images were used by the Canaanites (Deut. 7:5), by the Babylonians, and by others (Jer. 50:38; 51:47,52). The Israelites were forbidden by the Decalogue to make them (Exod. 20:4).

GRECIA, GRECIANS. Grecia is Greece, the home of the Hellenes. Greeks and Grecians, however, are to be distinguished. Greeks are generally those of Hellenic race (e.g. Acts 16:1; 18:4 and probably John 12:20), but the word may be used to indicate non-Jews, foreigners and aliens (Rom. 1:16). Grecians were Greek-speaking Jews, folk of the Dispersion, from areas predominantly Greek (Acts 6:1; 9:29). Greece and its associated island groups form the SE end of southern Europe's mountain system, a rugged peninsula and archipelago, not rich in fertile or arable land, which was the terminus of the southward movement of the Indo-European-speaking tribes who became the Greek people. These tribes, or their predecessors, had established ordered life in the peninsula and islands by the twelfth century before Christ. Their civilization vanished before the end of the second millennium, in a dark age of destruction and invasion occasioned by further waves of wandering tribes, just as Celt, Roman, Saxon, Dane, Norman, ripples of the same folk-movement of related peoples, made a succession of construction and destruction in Britain. Out of four centuries of chaos emerged the complex of peoples on island and mainland who are called the Greeks. Their own generic name was Hellenes, but Graecia was a portion of the land which, lying in the NW, naturally came first into the ken of Rome. After the common fashion of popular nomenclature (see under 'Palestine'), the name of the part which first claimed attention was extended to include the whole. Mediated through Rome, the term Greece was applied to all Hellas, and all Hellenes were called Greeks by western Europe. Geography, as always, played a part in the history of the people. The city state was a natural consequence of the isolated plain or river valley ringed by precipitous terrain. So was sea-faring. And from sea-faring and the dearth of fertile land in a rugged peninsula, sprang colonization, and the spread of Greek colonies which marked the first half of the pre-Christian millennium. As early as the eighth century before Christ, Greek ports and trading posts were scattered from the Crimea to Cadiz. In these same centuries began the first flowering of Greek thought and poetry. In Ionia, the foundations of scientific and philosophical thought were laid. On Lesbos, in those same years, Sappho and Alcaeus wrote supreme lyric poetry. In short, the active, inquisitive, brilliant, inventive Greek race was visible in full promise round the eastern end of the Mediterranean before the bright flowering of fifth-century Athens. That century was one of the great golden ages of man. Greece, interpreted by the dynamic people of Attica, in one brief noon-tide of the human spirit, made immortal contributions to literature, art, philosophy and political thought. Everything Greek in all future centuries was deepened and colored by Athens' achievement. Hellenism, which had centuries of dynamic life ahead of it, was shaped by Athens in the short years of its spiritual supremacy. Athens' glory faded, and her strength was sapped in lamentable war with the dour and uncreative autocracy of Sparta. On the ruins of a Greece fatally weakened by internecine strife, Philip of Macedon, in the mid-fourth century before Christ, built his empire. His son Alexander, in one of the strangest acts of conquest in all history, took that empire to India, swept the vast state of Persia out of existence, and, as his father had unified Greece, brought under his single rule the great complex of states and kingdoms which lay between the Dardanelles and the Indus, the Caspian and the Nile. When Alexander died in Babylon at the age of thirty-three in 323 B.C., his generals divided the world (vid. sub Seleucids, Ptolemy), and out of the division arose the Oriental kingdoms which the Romans conquered when their empire rounded the Mediterranean Sea. The Greek language, Greek thought, Greek culture, in the wake of Alexander, provided a unifying element in all the Middle East. Without the vast flow of the Greek tide eastwards, the NT could not have been born. Greek provided its language and fashion of thought. Hellenism was a stimulus to the human mind. To reason, question, speculate, was a habit with the Greeks. Hence the logical mind of Greek-speaking Paul of Tarsus, heir of both Hellenism and Judaism. Hence the 'Grecians' of the NT, Stephen, for example, and Philip, who sweep fresh, bold, and vigorous into the story of the early Church, ready to reform, and to rethink old concepts. Paul needed his Greek education, as he needed the Judaism of Gamaliel. Paul's synthesis of the covenants, so compelling in its logic, so fundamental in Christian theology, was the work of a Greek Jew. It was thought trained in the Hellenism of Tarsus which solved the problem of the Testaments, and brought out from the stores of Judaism the wares which Christians could recognize and use. E.M.B.

GREEK LANGUAGE was a major branch of the Indo-European language which is the presumed parent of all the languages of Europe except Basque, Finnish and Hungarian, and of Sanskrit and the languages which derive from the Sanskrit stock in India. From Ireland to Pakistan this linguistic kinship can be demonstrated from vocabulary, morphology, and syntax. No monuments of the original Indo-European language exist, but the wide diffusion of demonstrably related tongues is strong argument for some form of early unity. The pattern of folk-wandering, which spread the Indo-European languages so widely, was a longer and more complex process than was imagined in the nineteenth century. This century has demonstrated the Indo-European basis of Hittite, and in 1953 Michael Ventris showed that the language of the Pylos tablets was a primitive Greek, thus proving that the language was spoken in the Peloponnesus several centuries before the time once favored for the arrival in the area of the Hellenic tribes. The piecemeal nature of their southward infiltration, and the firm geographical subdivisions of the area they occupied, led to the survival into literary times of several dialects, Attic-Ionic, spoken in Attica, and the Ionic areas of Asia Minor, with associated islands; Achaean, which included the Aeolic of Lesbos, and the dialects of Thessaly and Boeotia, together with the undocumented dialect of the Arcado-Cyprian; and thirdly what L. R. Palmer calls West Greek, including under that name the dialects of Phocis, Locris, Elis, and Aetolia, together with the Doric of the Peloponnesus, the Peloponnesian colonies, and Magna Graecia. Of these dialects, Attic achieved the supreme position because of the worth and greatness of the incomparable literature in which it found its expression. Attic Greek was one of the major achievements of the human mind. The richness and subtlety of its syntax, its flexibility, the delicacy of its particles, these and other linguistic features make Attic the most expressive medium ever developed for human thought. The dialects passed with the city states and the unification of Greece, and were followed by a basic Greek which developed in the form of a simplified Attic. This, spread by Alexander's conquests throughout the eastern end of the Mediterranean, was called the Koine or Common Dialect. It was the speech of the LXX and the NT, and the major influence in bringing the contributions of Palestine, Greece, and Rome into that partnership which determined the form and shape of the NT, the global Gospel of Paul of Tarsus, the Christian Church, and modern Europe. GREEK VERSIONS. 1. The first and most famous of the Greek Versions of the OT, and the only one to survive in its entirety, is the Septuagint or "Version of the Seventy." This is the version most frequently quoted in the NT, for it became the Bible of the Hellenistic Jews, as the Vulgate became the Bible of the Latin world. The Vulgate was, in fact, in direct succession, being a translation of the Septuagint. Legend has gathered around so remarkable an achievement of translation, but it is possible to disengage some essential facts. It seems certain that the Septuagint was published in the time of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (295-247 B.C.), the Golden Age of Greek Alexandria. The city was always remarkable for its large colony of Jews, and the Greek Version of the Scriptures was probably a nationalistic gesture, designed to demonstrate, in what was becoming the world's second language, the worth of Jewish literature. It is doubtful whether the suggestion emanated from the king himself, interested though he was in all literature . The story of the 72 elders sent from Jerusalem, and the 72 days taken to complete the work, is legend. The Septuagint is written in the common dialect, but tinged by Hebraisms. The quality of the language and style varies, but on the whole the Greek is odd and undistinguished. It prompts knotty questions of criticism, to the solution of which the Dead Sea Scrolls have provided a little material. They have demonstrated, for example, that the Septuagint followed an older Hebrew text than that which survived in the traditional OT.

2. The acceptance of the Septuagint as the Bible of Greek-speaking Christianity, prompted orthodox Jewry to produce its own version distinct from it. Hence the version of Aquila of Hadrian's day (A.D. 117-138). The version of which only fragments exist, was in the worst "translation Greek," which followed slavishly the Hebrew forms and syntax.

3. Theodotian, an Ephesian of the second century, and an Ebionite Christian, produced a version which could be described as a RV of the Septuagint. It found favor with the Christian community. It was a freer translation than that of Aquila.

4. Symmachus, of unknown date, produced, perhaps at the end of the second century, a Greek version which appears to have been the best of all the translations, a rendering into idiomatic Greek. E.M.B.

GREYHOUND (See Animals)

GRIND (Heb. tāhan, Gr. alétho, grind with a hand mill), the grinding of grain into flour when pulverized between two heavy stones, a domestic art usually performed by women; hence, the import of Christ's parable: "Two women shall be grinding at the mill . . ." (Matt. 24:41; Luke 17:35).

GROVE (Heb. ăshērâh, Gr. álsos, mistranslated grove in the KJV following the LXX and the Vulgate). Although one gains a rather confused picture from the mere reading of the Scripture, the sum total of information affords a rather full and horrible panorama of iniquitous idolatry. The equipment for such worship, presumptively Phoenician in origin, were the "high places," (Heb. bāmôth), the altars crowning them, the standing pillars and the images of the Ashera. The worship was interwoven with the concept of the fertility of the land, and so became a fertility cult. The chosen symbol of the cult was the trunk of a tree. This explains the prohibition against the planting of trees by the altar of Jehovah (Deut. 16:21; Judg. 6:25,28,31). The goddess of the cult was Asherah, who also appears as mistress of the sea. A long risqué poem describes the journey of Lady Asherah to obtain permission from El to erect a temple (see Pritchard: Archaeology and the Old Testament, pp. 112f). The prophets of Israel roundly condemn the worship of Asherah and congratulate those kings who destroyed them (I Kings 15: 13f; II Kings 17:10; 21:3; 23:4). Allied with the idea of fertility, Asherah has her counterpart in the Babylonian Ishtar, the goddess of love, and as such the goddess of human productivity.

GUARD, the rendering of a number of Heb. and Gr. words: 1. tabbāh, slaughterer, used of Potiphar (Gen. 37:36, etc.), Nebuzaradan (II Kings 25:8, etc.; Jer. 39:9, etc.), and Arioch (Dan. 2: 14). The term may refer to a member of the king's bodyguard, who also had the duty of "slaughtering" anyone who tried to harm the king. 2. rûts, runner, trusted foot soldiers of a king, who performed various functions (I Kings 14:27,28; II Kings 10:25). 3. mishmār, watch (Neh. 4:22). 4. mishma'ath, guard (II Sam. 23:23). 5. spekoulátor, guard, a spy (Mark 6:27). 6. koustodía, watch (Matt. 27:65).

GUDGODAH (gŭd-gō'dȧ, Heb. gudgōdhâh, cleft, division), a place in the wilderness journeys of the children of Israel (Deut. 10:7), corresponding to Hor-haggidgag of Numbers 33:32. Identification still uncertain.

GUEST CHAMBER (Heb. lishkâh, in I Sam. 9:22 of KJV "parlor", katáluma, inn, room in which to eat). The lishkâh may have been a room in which the sacrificial feasts were held. Katáluma often means "inn," but in Mark 14:14 and Luke 22:11 it means a room in which to eat.

GUILT is the deserving of punishment because of the violation of a law or a breach of conduct. In the OT law the conception of guilt is largely ritualistic and legalistic. A person could be guilty as the result of unwitting sin (Lev. 5:17). Israel, moreover, is viewed as an organic whole, so that what one does affects all. There is collective responsibility for sin, as when Achan sinned and all Israel suffered. With the prophets, the ethical and personal aspects of sin and of guilt are stressed. God is less interested in ritual correctness than in moral obedience.

In the NT Jesus stressed the importance of right heart attitude as over against outwardly correct acts, and taught that there are degrees of guilt, depending upon a person's knowledge and motive (Luke 11:29-32; 12:47,48; 23:34). Paul also recognized differences of degree in guilt (Acts 17:30; Eph. 4:18). Theologians differ as to whether Paul in Romans 5:12-21 teaches that Adam's guilt was imputed to all his posterity; and if it was, just how it was done. S.B.

GUNI (gū'nī). 1. The name of a family clan of the tribe of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24; Num. 26:48; I Chron. 7:13).

2. The head of a Gadite family (I Chron. 5:15).

GUNITE (gū'nīt), the family of Guni, son of Naphtali (Num. 26:48).

GUR (gûr), a rising ground, not definitely identified, but thought to be near Jenin; roughly, about 12 or 13 miles NE of Samaria. The place where Ahaziah received his mortal wound while fleeing from Jehu, after the slaughter of Joram (II Kings 9:27).

GUR-BAAL (gûr'bā'ăl, sojourn of Baal), a small colony town of Arabs, against whom Uzziah of Judah was given divine aid (II Chron. 26:7); perhaps in the desert S of Beer-sheba.

GUTTER (gŭt'têr, Heb. tsinnôr, pipe, spout, conduit), the channel or tunnel (AV Gutter) through which David's soldiers are inferred to have marched to wrest the city of Jerusalem from Jebusite rule (II Sam. 5:8), at the fountain of Gihon (q.v.), site of the later tunnel which Hezekiah constructed (II Kings 20:20) connecting the spring at Gihon with the pool of Siloam. It was 1800 ft. long and 6 ft. high. It was dug out as a far sighted measure so that the city's water supply would not be imperiled during the impending siege at the hands of Sennacherib of Assyria.

A view in the Siloam Tunnel, built by King Hezekiah in the eighth century B.C., and also known as Hezekiah's Tunnel or the Gutter. The famous Siloam Tunnel inscription was cut out from the wall near this point. © MPS

H

HAAHASHTARI, HAASHTARI (hā'ā-hăsh'tà-rī, hā-āsh'tà-rī, the Ahashtarite), a man of Judah, mentioned in I Chronicles 4:6. Probably a muleteer, son of Naarah.

HABAIAH (hà-bā'yà, Jehovah has hidden), ancestor of some priests in Zerubbabel's time (Ezra 2: 61); called Hobaiah in Nehemiah 7:63 RV.

HABAKKUK (hà-băk'ŭk, Heb. hăvaqqûq, embrace), the name of a prophet and of the eighth book of the Minor Prophets, which is entitled "The oracle which Habakkuk the prophet saw" (1:1). Of the man Habakkuk nothing is known outside of the book which bears his name. Legendary references to him (in the apocryphal Bel and the Dragon and elsewhere) appear to have no historical value. The musical references in Chapter 3 have led some to believe that he was a member of a Levitical musical guild; even this is uncertain.

Most traditional scholars believe the book to be a unity, the work of Habakkuk, produced in Judah during the Chaldean period. The reasons for this view are found in the book itself. The temple still stands (2:20; 3:19) and the rise of the Chaldean power is predicted (1:5,6). The argument here depends upon the understanding of the Hebrew word kasdîm, translated Chaldeans. Some recent scholars emend the word to kittîm, meaning Cypriots, and understand it to refer to the Macedonian Greeks under Alexander the Great. They therefore date the book to this much later period. There is no good reason to make this emendation. Kasdîm clearly means Chaldeans.

The Neo-Babylonian or Chaldean empire first came to prominence when the Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar defeated the Egyptians at the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C., and re-established Babylon as the seat of world power. The prophecy of Habakkuk could hardly have been given before 605 B.C. Jerusalem fell to Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B.C. The book must be placed somewhere between these dates, probably during the reign of the Judean king Jehoiakim. Some date the book earlier, believing that the Chaldeans were known to Judah before Carchemish and emphasizing the unexpectedness of the attack mentioned by Habakkuk (1: 5). Still, a date soon after 605 B.C. seems to be preferred.

A fragment of the Habakkuk Commentary from the Dead Sea Scrolls. © Shrine of the Book, Jerusalem. MPS

In modern times the unity of the book has been questioned. The psalm of Chapter 3 is certainly somewhat different in style from the rest of the book, but this is hardly sufficient reason to deny it to Habakkuk. The theory that all psalms were post-Exilic in Israel is now discredited. The theme of the prose part (chs. 1,2) is the same as that of the psalm. And there are real similarities of language. Chapter 3 is specifically ascribed to Habakkuk (3:1), and there seems to be no good internal indication that he was not its author.

Chapters 1 and 2 set forth Habakkuk's prophetic oracle or burden. Twice the prophet is perplexed and asks divine enlightenment; twice he is answered. First he is concerned over the violence and sin of his people, the Judeans. Why are these wicked men not punished (1:2-4)? God answers that He is about to send the Chaldeans to judge Judah (1:5-11). This answer plunges Habakkuk into a greater perplexity: How can a righteous God use the wicked Chaldeans to punish Judah, which, although it has become apostate, is still better than the Chaldeans (1:12-17)? God's answer is that the proud conquerors will themselves be punished (2:1-20). The Chaldeans are puffed up with self-sufficient pride, but in this hour of national calamity the righteous will live by His faithfulness, i.e., by His constancy, abiding in God although all of the helps given to the OT believers (the nation, the temple and its ritual) are swept away (2:4). This statement naturally becomes important to the NT writers and is quoted in Romans 1:17, Galatians 3:11, and Hebrews 10:38. The second answer to Habakkuk concludes with a series of woes against the Chaldeans (2:5-20).

Chapter 3 is called "a prayer of Habakkuk the prophet" (3:1). In a moving lyric poem the prophet records his final response to God's message of judgment. He describes the divine revelation in terms of a stormy theophany (3:2-15), but concludes that no matter what comes he will trust in God (3:16-19).

The commentary on Chapters 1 and 2 recently found at Qumran near the Dead Sea casts little light on the meaning of these chapters, although it enables us to know how the Essene community there in the first century B.C. understood the book.

J.B.G.

HABAZINIAH (hab'à-zī-nī'à), ancestor of the Rechabites of the time of Jeremiah. Mentioned only in Jeremiah 35:3.

HABERGEON (hăb'ẽr-jŭn, Heb. tahărā'), a jacket of mail to defend the breast and neck (II Chron. 26:14; Neh. 4:16). Job 41:26 has "pointed shaft," with "coat of mail" in the margin. Habergeon is also used to render a different Heb. word of uncertain meaning in Exodus 28:32; 39:23.

HABIRU (hà-bī'rū), the name of a people first made known in the Amarna letters (15th century B.C.), where they are mentioned among those who are intruders of Palestine. Since then the name has appeared in Babylonian texts and documents from Mari (18th century B.C.), the Hittite records from Boghaz-keui and the Hurrian texts from Nuzi (14th century B.C.). The same name appears in Egyptian records as "Apiriu" as late as the 12th century B.C. Abraham is the first person in the Bible to bear the name Hebrew, 'Ibri (Gen. 14: 13). Some scholars philologically equate the names Habiru and 'Ibri. The fundamental meaning of Habiru seems to be "wanderers." It is not an ethnic designation, for the Habiru of these various texts are of mixed racial origin, including both Semites and non-Semites. The name Habiru therefore has a wider connotation than the people known as Hebrews, although it became associated with them particularly. The patriarchal movements of Genesis appear to be parts of a larger movement of peoples known as the Habiru, with the Hebrew conquest of Canaan as only one of these. The connection, if any, of the Hebrews with the Habiru still remains obscure. S.B.

HABOR (hā'bôr, Heb. hāvōr), a river of Gozan, the region in the northern part of Mesopotamia to which Shalmanezer, king of Assyria, banished the northern tribes of Israel after Hoshea, the last king, had rebelled against him (II Kings 17:6; 18:11). To this same region, Tiglath-pilezer (Tilgath-pilneser) had carried the tribes E of Jordan (I Chron. 5:26).

HACHALIAH (hăk'ă-lī'ă, in ASV, Hacaliah), the father of Nehemiah, governor of the Jews (Neh. 1:1; 10:1).

HACHILAH (hă-kī'lă), a hill in the wilderness SE of Hebron, near Ziph and Maon (I Sam. 23:19; 26:1,3)). Here David hid from Saul, but was discovered, and here Saul encamped, seeking David.

HACHMONI (hăk'mō-nī, Heb. hakhmônî, wise), the father of Jehiel, an associate of David's sons (I Chron. 27:32) and of Jashobeam, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:11). Cf. "Tachmonite" in II Samuel 23:8. The text is obscure.

HADAD (hā'dăd, sharpness, fierceness). 1. A grandson of Abraham through Ishmael (Gen. 25:15; Hadar in KJV; I Chron. 1:30).

2. An early king of Edom, whose capital was at Pau or Pai (I Chron. 1:50). In Genesis 36:39 he is called "Hadar."

3. An earlier king of Edom, a son of Bedad, who smote Midian in the field of Moab (Gen. 36:35; I Chron. 1:46).

4. An Edomite of royal descent whose life had been saved in his early childhood by flight from David's devastating attacks. Hadad went to Egypt, where Pharaoh received him and his men, gave him a house, and highly favored him. Hadad became brother-in-law to Tahpenes, queen of Egypt, but later when he learned that Joab had died, he went back to Edom and became an adversary to Solomon (I Kings 11:14-25).

5. The supreme God of Syria, whose name is found in proper names like Ben-hadad and Hadadezer. In Assyrian inscriptions he is identified with their air-god Ramman, i.e., Rimmon.

HADADEZER, HADAREZER (hăd'ăd-ē'zêr, hăd'ăr-ē'zêr, Hadad is a help), a king of Zobah, twice defeated in battle by David, king of Israel (II Sam. 8:3ff; 10:15-19; I Chron. 18:3ff). Zobah was a kingdom lying NE of Damascus and between the valleys of the Orontes and the Euphrates.

HADAD-RIMMON (hā'dăd-rĭm'ŏn, Hadad and Rimmon, two Syrian divinities), a place in the valley of Megiddo, where Josiah, king of Judah, was mortally wounded (II Kings 23:29,30), and where later there was a memorable mourning for him as recorded in Zechariah 12:11. It is now called Rummaneh, i.e. "place of pomegranates."

HADAR (hā'dăr). 1. According to Genesis 25:15 in KJV a son of Ishmael, but the Hebrew and ASV unite in calling him Hadad and I Chronicles 1:30 supports Hadad.

2. The last of the ancient kings of Edom (Gen. 36:39) but in I Chronicles 1:50,51 he also is called Hadad. "Hadar" and "Hadad" are easily confused in Hebrew.

HADASHAH (hă-dăsh'ă, new), a town of Judah in the low plain in Joshua's time (Josh. 15:37).

HADASSAH (hă-dăs'ă, a myrtle), daughter of Abihail, who became Esther, queen of Xerxes, i.e. Ahasuerus (Esth. 2:7,15).

HADATTAH (hă-dăt'ă, new), a town in the S of Judah. In Joshua 15:25 KJV makes it seem to be a separate town, but the Hebrew and ASV make it clear that "Hadattah" is simply a description of Hazor. It may be that there were an old and a new Hazor.

HADES (hā'dēz, Gr. Haídes, not to be seen), the place or state of the dead, as contrasted with the final punishment of the wicked. In the NT Greek, the word occurs ten times and is uniformly rendered "hell" in KJV. In the TR from which KJV was translated, the word occurs also in I Corinthians 15:55 and is rendered "grave," but in the better texts the Greek has thanate and ASV "death," which is correct. The NT word is taken over from the Greek mythology, where Hades was the god of the lower regions. Although the word was taken from heathen myths, the concept is from the OT word Sheol. Sheol occurs 65 times in the Hebrew OT and is rendered in KJV as "hell" 31 times, "the grave" 31 times, and "the pit" three times; but in ASV it is uniformly transliterated Sheol, even as Hades in the ASV is a transliteration rather than an attempt to translate the Greek. The word "hell" in English always has an unpleasant connotation and is properly thought of as the final destiny of the wicked when it translates geenna, which occurs 12 times and is always rendered "hell."

For the most part, the NT does not give very definite light on Hades. In Matthew 11:23 (cf. Luke 10:15) our Lord says that Capernaum will go down into Hades. The preposition "down" points to the OT teaching that Sheol is inside the earth (Amos 9:2; Ps. 139:8, etc.) and the following verse (Matt. 11:24) puts the day of judgment for both Sodom and Capernaum later than the stay in Hades. In Matthew 16:18, "the gates of hell" seem to be a reference to Satan's headquarters, as the great enemy of the Christian Church. In the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31) the rich man is pictured as being tormented in Hades, but able to see in the distance Abraham with Lazarus in his bosom. He asks for a drop of water to cool his tongue and for a message to be sent to his five brethren who are still alive on earth, and in each case his request is denied. In the first Christian sermon Peter quotes (Acts 2:25-31) from Psalm 16:8-11 proving from it that our Lord arose from the dead and was not left in Hades. In Revelation "death and Hades" are four times associated (1:18; 6:8; 20:13,14), being treated as almost synonymous terms. In the last verse mentioned, death and Hades are to be cast into the lake of fire, i.e. doomed to utter destruction. See GEHENNA. A.B.F.

HADID (hā'dĭd, Heb. hādhîdh, sharp), a village in Benjamin named with Lod (Ezra 2:33; Neh. 7:37; 11:34). It was located about three miles E of Lydda.

HADLAI (hăd'lī, ceasing, forbearing), the father of Amasa, an Ephraimite chief, mentioned only in II Chronicles 28:12.

HADORAM (hă-dō'răm, Heb. hădhōrām). 1. A son of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; I Chron. 1:21) and probably an Arab tribe of that name in Arabia Felix.

2. Son of the king of Hamath whom his father sent to congratulate David on his victory over Hadadezer (I Chron. 18:9-11). In II Samuel 8:9, 10 the name is written as Joram.

3. Rehoboam's superintendent of the men under taskwork (II Chron. 10:18). The children of Israel stoned him when Rehoboam sent him to them, presumably to collect taxes or to raise a levy of workers. (Perhaps the same as Adoniram of I Kings 4:6.)

HADRACH (hā'drăk, Heb. hadhrākh), a country associated with Damascus and Hamath and mentioned only in Zechariah 9:1. Gesenius guesses that it lay E of Damascus.

HAGAB (hā'găb, Heb. hāghāv, locust), ancestor of some temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46).

HAGAR (hā'gar, Heb. hāghār, emigration, flight), an Egyptian handmaid to Sarai, wife of Abram (Gen. 12:10-20). God had promised to him a son who would be his heir (Gen. 15:4), but Sarai was barren, and so, following the marital customs of the times, she gave Hagar to her husband as her substitute (Gen. 16:1-16). Nuzi documents which have been discovered stipulate that if a wife is barren, she must furnish her husband with a slave wife.) When Hagar saw that she had conceived, she despised her mistress, causing trouble in the household. Hagar was driven out, but the angel of the Lord appeared to her and sent her back to her mistress (Gen. 16:7-14). When Ishmael, her son, was 14 years old, his father 100 and Sarah 90, Isaac was born. At a great feast held in connection with Isaac's weaning, Ishmael scoffed at the proceedings (Gen. 21:9), and as a result Sarah insisted that Hagar and her son be cast out, which Abraham unwillingly did. God told Abraham that Ishmael's descendants would become a nation. Hagar is last seen taking for her son a wife out of the land of Egypt, her own land (Gen. 21:1-21). Paul made the story of Hagar an allegory of the difference between law and grace (Gal. 4:21-5:1).

HAGARENES, HAGARITES (hā'gar-ēnz, hā'gar-īts, in ASV "Hagrites"), an Arab people with whom in the days of King Saul, the tribe of Reuben made war (I Chron. 5:19,20). The Hagarites were so strong that Reuben won the victory only by crying to God in the battle. Psalm 83 tells how the Hagarenes were leagued not only with Moab and the Ammonites E of the Jordan, Edom, the Ishmaelites and Amalek to the S, but also with Gebal, Tyre and Philistia along the coast against Israel, and Asaph prays that God for His own name's sake will defeat them utterly.

HAGGAI (hăg'ā-ī, Heb. haggay, festal), prophet of the Lord to the Jews in 520 B.C. Little is known of his personal history. He lived soon after the Captivity, and was contemporary with Zechariah (cf. Hag. 1:1 with Zech. 1:1).

After the return from the Captivity the Israelites set up the altar upon its base, established daily worship, and laid the foundation for the second temple; then they were compelled to cease building for some years. However, though times were hard they were able to build fine ceiled houses for themselves (Hag. 1:4). Meanwhile kings succeeded one another in Persia. Cyrus, favored of God and friend of the Jews (Isa. 44:28; II Chron. 36:22) passed away in 529 B.C.; then his son Cambyses (the "Ahasuerus" of Ezra 4:6) reigned 529-522 B.C., followed for only seven months in 522 by the Pseudo-Smerdis (a usurper); then arose Darius Hystaspes (Ezra 4-6; Hag., Zech. 1-6), who helped and encouraged the Jews to go ahead, and who commanded the hinderers to desist. In the second year of Darius (520 B.C.) Haggai fulfilled his brilliant mission of rebuking and encouraging the Jews. The five short messages which make up his books are all dated, occupying only three months and 23 days; and in those few weeks the whole situation changed from defeat and discouragement to victory. Zechariah assisted Haggai in the last month of his recorded ministry (Zech. 1:1-6).

In order to make the dates clearer to modern readers, we shall give the months their approximately equivalent names in our calendar. On "Sept." 1, 520 B.C. the Lord spoke through Haggai, and instead of addressing the people at large, the prophet went straight to "headquarters," i.e., to Zerubbabel the prince and to Joshua, the high priest. The people stopped building the Lord's house though they were quite able to build their own, and God's message was "Consider your ways." The punishment for their neglect had been futility; they labored much but produced little; and so God used "weather judgments" to bring them to their senses. The leaders heeded the message and with the best of the people, they began immediately to build and on "Sept." 24 God's short message was "I am with you" (Hag. 1:13). A month later, they were tempted to be discouraged when they contrasted their present effort with the former magnificent temple and so God told them that "the glory of this house shall be greater than the former" (2:9). This message was delivered on "Oct." 21 and it contained the notable statement, that "the silver is mine, and the gold is mine." The fourth and fifth messages came in one day "Dec." 24, 520 B.C. In the fourth, Haggai said that holiness is not contagious, though evil is, and Israel's change in attitude would cause God to change chastening into blessing. In the last message (2:20-23) God predicts a shaking of the nations but at the same time a great reward to Zerubbabel. One wonders if this is connected with the fact of Zerubbabel's becoming an ancestor of our Lord in both the royal line (Matt. 1:13) and the Lucan line (Luke 3:27). A.B.F.

HAGGERI (hăg'ĕ-rī, wanderer), the father of Mibhar, one of David's heroes (I Chron. 11:38), ASV "Hagri."

HAGGI (hăg'ī, festal), a son of Gad, and grandson of Jacob (Gen. 46:16); patriarch of the Haggites (Num. 26:15).

HAGGIAH (hă-gī'à, a festival of Jehovah), a Levite of the family of Merari, mentioned only in I Chronicles 6:30.

HAGGITH (hăg'ĭth, festal), wife of David (II Sam. 3:4) and mother of Adonijah (I Kings 1:5-31).

HAGIOGRAPHA (hăg'ĭ-ŏg'rà-fà, holy writings), a name applied to the third division of the OT by the Jews, the other two being the Law and the Prophets. Sometimes they were called the "Writings." They comprise 11 books, in the following order: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Song of Solomon, Ruth Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, I and II Chronicles.

HAI (hā'ī, the heap). 1. A town E of Bethel and near Beth-aven (Gen. 12:8; 13:3). Because of the sin of Achan, the Israelite attack on it failed; but after he was punished, it was taken (Josh. 7,8). In Joshua the name is spelled Ai in the KJV.

2. A city of the Ammonites (Jer. 49:3).

HAIL. 1. Hail storms sometimes take place in the Near East in the spring and summer and do considerable damage to crops, sometimes even injuring property and endangering life. Plagues of hail are mentioned in Exodus 9:23,24 and Joshua 10:11. The prophets speak of hail as a means of punishing the wicked (Isa. 28:2; Ezek. 38:22; Rev. 8:7; 11:19).

2. An interjection found only in the Gospels as a translation of chaire, used as a greeting or salutation.

HAIR, the natural head-covering common to man and to most mammals. It varies in length, color and structure among the different races and seems to be intended of God for protection, for beauty and for identification. The peoples of the Bible lands were generally black-haired, though red-haired individuals are fairly common among the people of Israel. Hebrews and Arabs (cf. Rev. 9: 8) wore their beards long as a mark of dignity but the Egyptians were clean-shaven (Gen. 41:14).

The quick-whitening of hair was one of the symptoms of leprosy (Lev. 13:3,10), but if the leprosy and the white hairs covered the body and there was no raw flesh, the leprosy was no longer contagious (Lev. 13:13). Thin yellow hair appearing in the head or beard was a symptom of scall or scurf, related to leprosy (Lev. 13:29-37).

The men of Israel were not to mar the corners of the beard (Lev. 19:27) and this prohibition explains the "prayer-locks" in front of the ears of Jewish men today. The word "hair" is used in several figurative senses: e.g., in marksmanship some Benjamites could "sling stones at a hairbreadth and not miss" (Judg. 20:16); or in meaning complete safety — "there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground" (I Sam. 14:45); or to indicate multiplicity — "my iniquities are more than the hairs of my head" (Ps. 40:12); or to show age or dignity — "the hair of his head like pure wool" (Dan. 7:9). Hair was a mark of beauty and sometimes of pride. Absalom's hair (II Sam. 14:26; 18:9), of which he was inordinately proud, caused his death. In Samson's case, his uncut hair was a symbol of his Naziritic dedication, and when he lost his hair, his strength went with it (Judg. 13:7; 16:17-20). In NT times the length of the hair was one mark of distinction between the sexes (I Cor. 11:14-16). A.B.F.

HAKKATAN (hăk'à-tăn, the little one), father of Johanan who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:12).

HAKKOZ (hăk'ŏz, the nimble, KJV sometimes has Koz, once Coz). 1. A descendant of Aaron whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity (I Chron. 24:10; Ezra 2:61; Neh. 3:4,21).

2. A man of Judah (I Chron. 4:8).

HAKUPHA (hà-kū'fà, bent, bowed), father of some of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra 2:51; Neh. 7:53).

HALAH (hā'là), a district in Media to which many of the captive Israelites were taken by Shalmanezer and by Tiglath-pilezer (II Kings 17:6; 18:11; I Chron. 5:26). It is about 80 miles W by N of the famous Behistun rock.

HALAK (hā'lăk, smooth), a mountain that marked the southern limit of the conquests of Joshua; perhaps the chalk cliffs crossing the Arabah about six miles S of the Dead Sea (Josh. 11:17; 12:7).

HALHUL (hăl'hŭl), a town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:58) about four miles N of Hebron. It retains its ancient name, and contains a mosque dedicated to the Prophet Jonah.

HALI (hā'lī, ornament), a town on the southern boundary of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:25).

HALL, in the KJV denotes: (1) the court of the high priest's palace (Luke 22:55); (2) the official residence of a Roman provincial governor. It was called the praetorium (Matt. 27:27; Mark 15:16).

HALLEL (hă-lāl, praise). Psalms 113-118, which were read on Passover day, were called the "Egyptian Hallel"; Psalm 136 is an antiphonal Psalm of praise and is sometimes called "the Hallel." Psalms 120-136 are often called the "Great Hallel."

HALLELUJAH (hăl'ē-lōō'yà, Heb. hallelû-yâh, praise ye Jehovah), a word which is found in most of the languages into which the Bible has been translated. Like "Amen," it is nearly a universal word. It is found dozens of times, principally in the Psalms, often at the beginning and the end, as in Psalm 150:1,6.

HALLOHESH (hă-lō'hĕsh, the whisperer), in Nehemiah 3:12, father of Shallum, a ruler, and in Nehemiah 10:24 one of the covenanters, perhaps the same man.

HALLOW (hăl'ō, to render or treat as holy). The prime idea in this as in the kindred words "holy," "sanctify," etc., is the setting apart of a person or a thing for sacred use; to hold sacred; reverence as holy.

HAM (hăm, Heb. hām, perhaps hot). 1. The youngest son of Noah, born probably about 96 years before the Flood; and one of the eight persons to live through the Flood. He became the progenitor of the dark races; not the Negroes, but the Egyptians, Ethiopians, Libyans and Canaanites (Gen. 10:6-20). His indecency, when his father lay drunken, brought a curse upon Canaan (Gen. 9: 20-27).

2. A city of the Zuzim, E of the Jordan (Gen. 14:5). This is not the same word as the son of Noah.

3. The descendants of the original Ham (Ps. 78:51; 105:23; 106:22). In these passages "Ham" is used as another name for Egypt as representing Ham's principal descendants.

HAMAN (hā'măn, Heb. hāmān), the great enemy of the Jews in the days of Esther. He is called "the Agagite," undoubtedly because he came from Agag, a territory adjacent to Media. "Ahasuerus" or Xerxes, as he is known in secular history, had promoted Haman to a high position in the court, but Mordecai, the noble Jew, refused to do him obeisance, and so Haman plotted to destroy the Jewish race, but God intervened. Esther foiled Haman's plot (Esth. 7) and Haman died on the gallows he had made for Mordecai.

HAMATH (hā'măth, Heb. hămāth, fortification), one of the most ancient surviving cities on this earth, located in upper Syria on the Orontes river from which it derives its water by means of immense undershot water wheels driven by the current. The "entrance of Hamath" (Num. 34:8) was to be the northern limit of Israel, but God left some of the Hivites in that neighborhood to be a test to the faithfulness of Israel (Judg. 3:3). In the days of David, Hamath had a king of its own (II Sam. 8:9). Jeroboam II, the last powerful king of the northern tribes (II Kings 14:23-28), recovered Hamath to Israel. It has had for thousands of years a checkered history. For a time it was under the power of Assyria (II Kings 18:34), later under Babylonia (Jer. 39:5); and still later Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria (c. 175-164 B.C.) renamed it Epiphaneia after himself. Today it is largely Moslem, but with a large admixture of Christians. The city is dominated by its citadel hill which no doubt contains layers of many different civilizations.

HAMATH-ZOBAH (hā'măth-zō'bà), mentioned in II Chronicles 8:3, but the reference is uncertain. It could mean the neighbor kingdoms of Hamath and Zobah, or some place called Hamath, belonging to the kingdom of Zobah; or, to avoid confusion with the Zobah in the Hauran (II Sam. 23:36), Hamath may have been mentioned in connection with it.

HAMMATH (hăm'ăth, hot spring). 1. One of the fortified cities assigned by lot to the tribe of Naphtali in the division of the land under Joshua (Josh. 19:35). It lay close to the shore of the Sea of Galilee, only a mile or so S of the city of Tiberias, and even today three of these hot springs send up sulphurous water at the southern extremity of the ancient ruins. Gesenius thinks that it is probably the same as the Hammoth-dor of Joshua 21:32, and Hammon of I Chronicles 6:76.

2. The founder of the house of Rechab (I Chron. 2:55). Hemath in KJV.

HAMMEDATHA (hăm'ē-dā-thà), father of Haman the Agagite, the villain in the book of Esther (Esth. 3:1, etc.).

HAMMELECH (hăm'ĕ-lĕk, the king), father of Jerahmeel and Malchiah (Jer. 36:26; 38:6). The KJV wrongly translates it as a proper name; it should be rendered "the king," as in ARV.

HAMMER. There are two chief words for "hammer" in the OT, pattîsh, a tool for smoothing metals and for breaking rocks (Isa. 41:7; Jer. 23:29), and maqqeveth, a mallet to drive tent-pins into the ground (Judg. 4:21; I Kings 6:7), for building and for making idols (Isa. 44:12; Jer. 10:4). The word "hammer" is sometimes used figuratively for any crushing power, as Babylon (Jer. 50:23) or God's word (Jer. 23:29).

HAMMOLEKETH (hă-mŏl'ē-keth, the queen), a sister of Gilead (I Chron. 7:18). "Hammolecheth" in KJV.

HAMMON (hăm'ŏn, hot spring). 1. A place in Asher about 10 miles S of Tyre (Josh. 19:28).

2. A city of Naphtali (I Chron. 6:76). See HAMMATH, which may be the same place (Josh. 19:35).

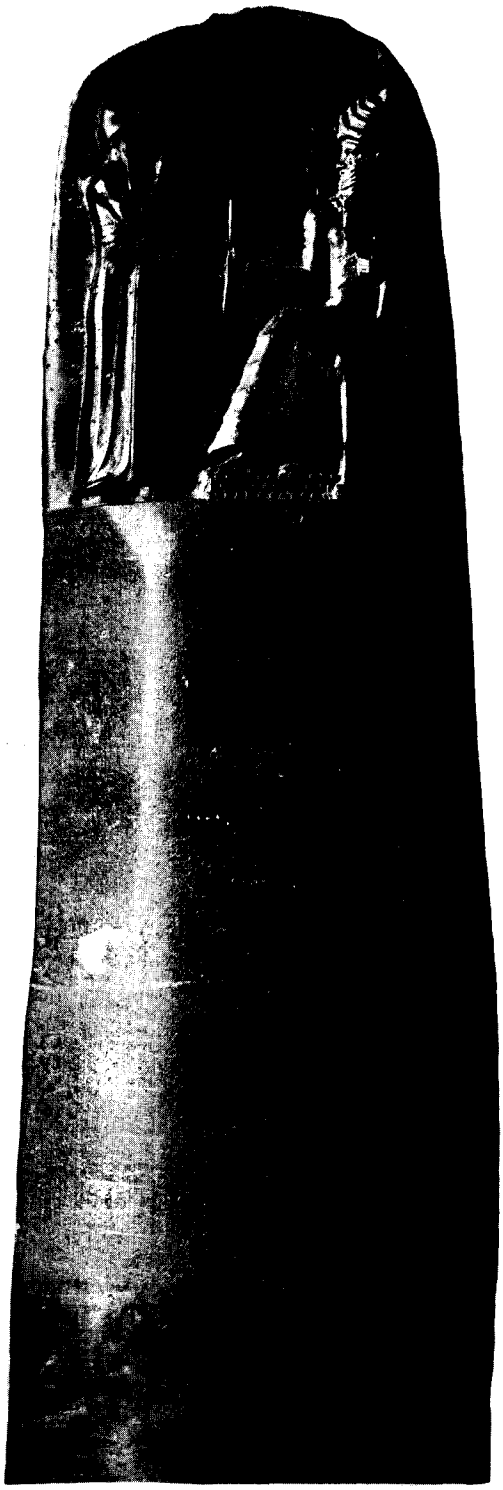
HAMMOTH-DOR (hăm'ŏth-dôr, warm springs of Dor), a city in Naphtali, appointed as a city of refuge (Josh. 21:32). See HAMMATH.

Portrait of Hammurabi, King of Babylon, carved on a limestone tablet. BM

HAMMURABI (hàm'ōō-rà'bē), the king of the city of Babylon who brought that city to its century-and-a-half rule over southern Mesopotamia known as the Old Babylonian Kingdom. He was an Amorite, the name given to a Semitic group which invaded the Fertile Crescent about 2000 B.C., destroying its civilization and establishing their own Semitic culture. There has been considerable difference of opinion about the date of his reign, recent scholars favoring 1728-1686 B.C.

Hammurabi made Babylon one of the great cities of the ancient world. Archaeologists have discovered that in his city the streets were laid out in straight lines which intersect approximately at right angles, an innovation which bears witness to city planning and strong central government, little known in Babylon before this time. Marduk, the god of Babylon, now became the head of the pantheon and his temple, Etemenanki, one of the wonders of the ancient world. Many letters written by Hammurabi have been found. These show his close attention to the details of his realm, and enable us to call him an energetic and benevolent ruler.

Hammurabi began the first golden age of Babylon — the second being that of Nebuchadnezzar, over a thousand years later. He systematically unified all of the old world of Sumer and Akkad (southern Mesopotamia) under his strongly centralized government. The prologue to his famous law code describes his administration: "Anu and Enlil (the sky and storm gods) named me to promote the welfare of the people, me, Hammurabi, the devout, god-fearing prince, to cause justice to prevail in the land, to destroy the wicked and the evil, that the strong might not oppress the weak, to rise like the sun over the black-headed (people), and to light up the land. Hammurabi the shepherd, called by Enlil, am I; the one who makes affluence and plenty abound . . . the one revived Uruk, who supplied water in abundance to its people; the one who brings joy to Borsippa; . . . who stores up grain for mighty Urash; . . . the savior of his people from distress, who establishes in security their portion in the midst of Babylon . . . that justice might be dealt the orphan and the widow . . . I established law and justice in the language of the land, thereby promoting the welfare of the people."



The famous Code of Hammurabi, 282 laws engraved on a stone stele eight feet high. At the top, Hammurabi is shown receiving the symbols of authority from the god Marduk. © LMP

By far his most famous claim to fame is Hammurabi's law code. It is inscribed on a magnificent stele of black diorite, eight feet high, found at Susa in 1902. Formerly it had stood in Babylon, but the Elamites carried it off when they conquered Babylon in the 12th century B.C. It is now in the Louvre in Paris. At the top of the stele is a finely sculptured scene showing Hammurabi standing before the sun god Shamash (the patron of law and justice) who is seated and is giving to Hammurabi the laws. Beneath in 51 columns of text are the laws, in beautiful cuneiform characters.

It is now known that Hammurabi's was not the first attempt to systematize the laws of Babylonia. Fragments of several previous law codes have been found. Ur-nammu of Ur and Lipit-Ishtar of Isin both promulgated earlier codes and another was known in Eshnunna. But Hammurabi's is the most complete expression of early Babylonian law, and undoubtedly incorporates many laws and customs which go back to far earlier times. Hammurabi did not invent these laws; he codified them.

The monument contains not only the code, but Hammurabi added a prologue and epilogue, which narrated his glory (a portion was quoted above) and that of the gods whom he worshiped, blessed those who should respect his inscription and cursed future vandals who should deface it. The whole inscription is translated in Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the OT (edited by James B. Pritchard, Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1950, pp. 163-180) and should be read by students interested in the subject.

The law code itself included nearly 300 paragraphs of legal provisions touching commercial, social, domestic and moral life. There are regulations governing such matters as liability for (and exemption from) military service, control of trade in alcoholic drinks, banking and usury, the responsibility of a man toward his wife and children, including the liability of a husband for the payment of his wife's debts. Hammurabi's code was harsher on upper-class offenders than on a commoner committing the same offense. Death was the penalty not only for homicide, but for theft, adultery, and bearing false witness in cases involving the accused's life. But the graded penalties show a great advance on primitive laws, and contemporary legal texts show that the harsher penalties were rarely exacted.

Women's rights were safeguarded. A neglected wife could obtain a divorce. A concubine who had become a mother was entitled to the restitution of whatever she had brought with her, or a pecuniary indemnity appropriate to her social position. If a house fell on its owner, or a doctor injured his patient, the man who built the house, or treated the patient, might suffer death, mutilation, or at least a heavy fine.

Students of the Bible are especially interested in the comparison of Hammurabi's code with the Mosaic legislation of the Bible. There are many similarities. In both a false witness is to be punished with the penalty he had thought to bring upon the other man. Kidnapping and house-breaking were capital offenses in both. The Biblical law of divorce permits a man to put away his wife, but does not extend to her the same right as did Hammurabi. Both codes agree in prescribing the death penalty for adultery. The principle of retaliation upon which a number of Hammurabi's laws were based is vividly stated in Exodus 21:23-25.

How are these similarities to be explained? It is obvious that Hammurabi's could not have borrowed from Moses, for the Hebrew lawgiver lived several centuries after the Babylonian. Direct borrowing in the other direction also seems very unlikely. Most scholars today agree that the similarities are to be explained by the common background of the Hebrews and Babylonians. Both were Semitic peoples inheriting their customs and laws from their common ancestors. At first this explanation would seem to run counter to the Biblical claim that Moses' law was given to the legislator by divine revelation. A closer examination of the Pentateuch will show that the Hebrews before they came to Sinai followed many of the regulations set forth in the law (e.g. penalties against murder, adultery, fornication, Gen. 9:6; 38:24; the levirate law, Gen. 38:8; clean and unclean animals, Gen. 8:20; Sabbath, Gen. 2:3; Exod. 16:23,25-29). Moses' law consists of things both old and new. What was old (the customs the Hebrews received from their ancient Semitic ancestors) was here formally incorporated into the nation's constitution. Much is new, especially the high view of the nature of Jehovah and the idea that law is an expression of this nature (Lev. 19:2).

Formerly many scholars identified the Amraphel, king of Shinar, whose invasion of Transjordan is described in Genesis 14:1-12 with Hammurabi king of Babylon. Recently this identification has generally been given up. The two names are not the same and the chronological problems raised by the new low date for Hammurabi makes their equivalence very unlikely. J.B.G

HAMONAH (hà-mō'nà, multitude), prophetic name of a city near the future burial place of Gog (Ezek. 39:16).

HAMON-GOG, VALLEY OF (hā'mŏn-gŏg, multitude of Gog), a place E of the Dead Sea which will be set apart for the burial of the "multitude of Gog" (Ezek. 39:11-15), after God's destruction of the northern host which will invade Israel in "the latter years" (Ezek. 38:8).

HAMOR (hā'môr, Heb. hămôr, an ass), father of Shechem who criminally assaulted Dinah, a daughter of Jacob, as a result of which both father and son were killed in revenge by her brothers Simeon and Levi (Gen. 34:1-31).

HAMUEL (hăm'ū-ĕl, warmth of God), a Simeonite mentioned only in I Chronicles 4:26. In ASV more properly Hammuel.

HAMUL (hā'mŭl, pitied, spared), a grandson of Judah, and son of Perez (Gen. 46:12), head of the family of Hamulites.

HAMUTAL (hà-mū'tal, father-in-law is dew), mother of two kings of Judah, Jehoahaz (II Kings 23:31) and Zedekiah (24:18).

HANAMEEL (hăn'à-mĕl), mentioned only in Jeremiah 32:7-12, was a cousin of Jeremiah the prophet, who while in prison bought from Hanameel a field, when real estate values were low because of the Chaldean invasion, to encourage the Jews to believe that the captivity would not be permanent and that restoration was certain. In ASV, Hanamel.

HANAN (hā'năn, Heb. hānān, gracious). 1. A Benjamite of Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:23).

2. A son of Azel, a descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 9:44).

3. One of David's mighty men, son of Maachah (I Chron. 11:43).

4. One of the Nethinim, or temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:49).

5. An interpreter of the Law (Neh. 8:7).

6. Three covenanters with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:10,22,26).

7. An influential Jew in Jerusalem (Jer. 35:4).

HANANEEL (hà-năn'ē-ĕl, Heb. hănan'ēl, God is gracious), a tower in the wall of Jerusalem (Jer. 31:38; Zech. 14:10) on the N side between the sheep gate and the fish gate (Neh. 3:1; 12:39).

HANANI (hà-nā'nī, Heb. hănānî, gracious). 1. A son of Heman, David's seer who served in music (I Chron. 25:4,25).

2. Seer in Asa's time who rebuked Asa and was imprisoned (II Chron. 16:7-10).

3. A priest who had married a foreigner (Ezra 10:20).

4. Brother of the great Nehemiah. (Neh. 1:2; 7:2). It was he who brought to Nehemiah in Shushan, the news of Jerusalem's sad state, and Nehemiah later gave to him and to Hananiah, governor of the castle, authority over Jerusalem.

5. One of the musical priests whom Nehemiah appointed for the celebration at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 12:36). Ezra was the leader of this band.

HANANIAH (hăn'à-nī'à, Heb. hănanyâh, Jehovah is gracious). 1. A son of Heman, David's seer (I Chron. 25:4,23) who headed the 16th course of musical Levites.

2. A captain of Uzziah's army (II Chron. 26:11).

3. Father of Zedekiah, who was one of Jehoiakim's princes (Jer. 36:12).

4. The grandfather of Irijah who arrested Jeremiah for alleged treason (Jer. 37:13).

5. Father of a Benjamite household, who dwelt at Jerusalem (I Chron. 8:24).

6. The Heb. name of Shadrach, one of the three who survived the furnace of fire (Dan. 1:6,7).

7. A son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:19,21).

8. A returner with Ezra (Ezra 10:28) who married a foreign woman.

9. A perfumer in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:8).

10. Another repairer of the wall (Neh. 3:30).

11. A governor of the castle in Jerusalem, a faithful man who feared God (Neh. 7:2).

12. One of the chief covenanters, perhaps the same as the preceding (Neh. 10:23).

13. Head of a priestly house in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:12,41).

14. A false prophet of Gibeon in the tribe of Benjamin in the days of Zedekiah, the last king of Judah (Jer. 28). In the year 594 B.C. he stood up against Jeremiah, God's prophet who had been pronouncing the doom of Judah and Jerusalem, and prophesied that within two years Nebuchadnezzar would bring back the vessels of the temple, would restore to power Jehoiachin who had reigned for three months in 597 B.C., and would bring back the Jewish captives. Jeremiah rebuked him. Jeremiah had been wearing a yoke of wood to symbolize the coming captivity. Hananiah broke it off and he was told that a yoke of iron would take its place. The Lord slew him that year.

HAND, one of the most frequently used words in Scripture, occurring over 1,600 times. Besides its literal use, it occurs in many figurative senses as well. It very often stands for power, as in Genesis 9:2,5. "Into your hand are they delivered" would make nonsense if taken literally; and "at the hand of every beast will I requite it" does not prove that beasts have hands. To "put one's hand under the thigh" as in Genesis 24:2,9; 47:29 meant to take a solemn oath; to "put one's hand upon the head" meant blessing, as in Genesis 48:14, and signifies ordination, as in I Timothy 4:14 and II Timothy 1:6. To "kiss one's own hand" can be a mark of adoration, as in Job 31:27; while to kiss the hand of another is one of the usual marks of respect in the East, though this custom is not mentioned in Scripture.

The Hebrew expression "to consecrate" would be literally "to fill the hand," thus intimating that without consecration we have little or nothing to offer to God. God, being a spirit, neither has nor needs hands, yet we read of the "hand of God" in several connections, all of which are easily understood. "The hand of God was very heavy there" (I Sam. 5:11) refers to a plague which the Philistines suffered. "By stretching forth thy hand to heal" (Acts 4:30) shows God's powerful mercy. "No man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand" (John 10:29) indicates God's omnipotent protection of His own. To be placed at the right hand of royalty is a high honor and, of course, at "the right hand" of Deity is incomparably higher. "Jehovah said to my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand —" (Ps. 110:1) shows the supreme position of the Son of God. When He judges the nations (Matt. 25:31-46), separating the "sheep" from the "goats," "he shall set the sheep on his right hand, but the goats on the left," showing that the left hand is equally the place of dishonor. The Hebrew word for "north" is the same as for "the left hand" and for "south" the same as for the right hand. In a trial, the accuser stood at the right hand of the accused, as is shown in Zechariah 3:1, where Satan is the accuser; but our Advocate stands also at our right hand to defend us (Ps. 109:31; 16:8).

A.B.F.

HANDICRAFT, a trade requiring manual skill, the art of using one's hands gainfully. Among some rich and decadent nations, the crafts and trades were left to slaves, but the Jews trained every boy to a trade; so Paul was a tent-maker (Acts 18:3) and even our Lord learned the art of carpentry (Mark 6:3). Some handicrafts go back to extreme antiquity; e.g. the making of musical instruments and smithery to antediluvian days (Gen. 4:21, 22). Bezalel was called of God to his trade (Exod. 31:2).

HANDKERCHIEF. The Gr. soudárion is a transliteration of the Latin word sudarium, which was a cloth intended to wipe sweat from the face. Handkerchiefs were brought from Paul's body for healing purposes (Acts 19:12); the wicked servant (Luke 19:20-23) kept his lord's money in a napkin; the face of dead Lazarus was enclosed in a napkin — the same word —(John 11:44), as was also the face of our Lord (John 20:7).

HANDLE, found only in Song of Solomon 5:5 referring to the door knob. The Hebrew word has over a dozen meanings.

HANDMAID or HANDMAIDEN, a female slave or servant. When used of one's self, it indicates humility, as Ruth, speaking to Boaz (Ruth 3:9); Hannah praying to the Lord (I Sam. 1:11) and speaking to Eli (1:16); Mary speaking to Gabriel (Luke 1:38) and singing (Luke 1:48).

HANDS, IMPOSITION OF, a ceremony, the idea behind which varies, but the fundamental sense seems to be that of transference, but sometimes accompanied by the ideas of identification and of devotion to God. It appears in the ritual of sacrifice (Exod. 29:10,15,19, etc.), in the act of blessing(Gen. 48:14) and of witness-bearing in capital offenses (Lev. 24:14).

On the great day of atonement (Lev. 16:21) Aaron was to lay all the sins of Israel upon the head of the scape-goat who would carry them away. Jacob put his hands of blessing upon both the sons of Joseph (Gen. 48:13-20); Peter and John laid hands on the Samaritan Christians who then received the Holy Spirit (Acts 8:14-17); Paul ordained Timothy (II Tim. 1:6) who also received a gift through ordination by the presbytery (I Tim. 4:14). The act was accompanied by prayer (Acts 6:6).

HANDSTAFF, a rod carried in the hand, mentioned only in Ezekiel 39:9. Probably a weapon.

HANES (hā'nēz), a place in Egypt mentioned only in Isaiah 30:4. From its association with Zoan, and the context, it would seem to have been in the Delta, though some associate it with Heracleopolis Magna, W of the Nile and far up the river.

HANGING, or death by strangulation, was not a form of capital punishment employed in Bible times. Where the word is used in Scripture, except in the two cases of suicide by hanging (Ahithophel, II Sam. 17:23; Judas, Matt. 27:5), it refers to the suspension of a body from a tree or post after the criminal had been put to death. This was practiced in Egypt (Gen. 40:19,22), by the Israelites (Deut. 21:22), and by the Persians. Hanging added to the disgrace. The body was buried before nightfall (Deut. 21:23, Josh. 8:29).

HANGINGS (Heb. kelā'îm, māsākh), those parts of the tabernacle and its court which were so hung as to preserve the privacy and the sacredness of that which was within. Some were more or less permanent, but others could be removed to permit passage of a person. Of the first class were the 280 cubits of fine twined linen, five cubits wide which enclosed the court (Exod. 27:9-19) and the curtains of the tent itself (Exod. 26:1-14); and of the second class the screen of the court (Exod 27:14-16), the hanging screen at the door of the tent (Exod. 26:36), and the veil which shut out from vulgar view the most holy place (Exod. 26:31-35). It was the veil corresponding to this that was rent of God from top to bottom at the crucifixion of our Lord (Matt. 27:51, Heb. 9:8, 10:19,20).

HANIEL (hăn'ĭ-ĕl, Heb. hannî'ēl, grace of God, ASV Hanniel). 1. A prince of Manasseh who helped in dividing the land among the tribes (I Chron. 34:23).

2. An Asherite, son of Ulla (I Chron. 7:39).

HANNAH (hăn'a, Heb. hannâh, grace, favor), one of the two wives of Elkanah, a Levite who lived at Ramathaim-zophim, a village of Ephraim. It was otherwise known as Ramah (cf. I Sam. 1:1 with 1:19). Peninnah, the other wife of Elkanah (I Sam 1:2), had children, but Hannah was for a long time barren, and as is common in polygamous households, "her rival provoked her sore" (1:6). The fact that Elkanah loved Hannah and gave her a double portion (1:5) only increased the hatred and jealousy in Peninnah's heart. But Hannah was a godly woman and she prayed for a son and vowed to give him to the Lord as a perpetual Nazirite. Eli saw Hannah's lips moving in silent prayer, and rebuked her for what he thought was drunkenness. She replied very humbly and Eli apologized; the family returned home; she conceived and became the mother of Samuel the great prophet of Israel and the last of the judges. Hannah's praise (2:1-10) shows that she was a deeply spiritual woman. Her song resembles Mary's song, "the Magnificat" (Luke 1:46:55) when she, too, was expecting a baby in miraculous circumstances.

Each woman rejoiced in the Lord, and each gave in marvelous fashion God's way of dealing with the proud and with the humble. Cf. 1:8 with Luke 1:52,53 and Ps. 113:7-9.) A.B.F.

HANNATHON (hăn'nà-thŏn, Heb. hannāthôn, gracious), a city on the northern boundary of Zebulon (Josh. 19:14). It is mentioned in the Amarna Letters.

HANNIEL (han'ĭ-ĕl, Heb. hannî'ēl, the favor of God). 1. Son of Ephod, the prince of the tribe of Manasseh, appointed by Moses to help in dividing the land (Num. 34:23).

2. Son of Ulla, and a descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:39).

HANOCK (hān'nŏk, Heb. hănôkh, initiation). 1. A grandson of Abraham by Keturah through their son, Midian (Gen. 25:4, I Chron. 1:33; KJV has Henoch).

2. Eldest son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9; Exod. 6:14, I Chron. 5:3), he was the head of the family of the Hanockites (Num. 26:5).

HANUN (hā'nŭn, Heb. hānûn, favored). 1. King of Ammon who, having mistaken David's friendly servants for spies, mistreated them, thus bringing on a war in which the Ammonites lost their independence (II Sam. 10; and I Chron. 19).

2. A man who, with the help of the inhabitants of Zanoah, built the valley gate setting up the doors, locks and bars of it in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:13).

3. Son of Zalaph, who helped repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:30).

HAPHRAIM (hăph-rā'ĭm, ASV Hapharaim, Heb. hăphārayim, two pits), a city located near Shumem in Issachar (Josh. 19:19). Modern Et-Taiyibeh.

HARA (ha'rà, Heb. hārā', mountain country, a place named in I Chronicles 5:26, along with Halah, Habor and the river Gozan, as the destinations of the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh when they were carried away by the Assyrians. But such a place as Hara is unknown. The LXX omits it in this verse, as also do II Kings 17:6 and 18:11 in naming the destinations of the captive nation, Israel. Both these latter references add the phrase "in the cities of the Medes"; LXX has "mountains of the Medes". Some scholars think Hara should read Haran; others believe the text is corrupt.

HARADAH (hàr-ā'dà, Heb. hărādhâh, terror), one of Israel's encampments in the wilderness wanderings at which they tarried after leaving Mount Shepher (Num. 33:24). The site is unknown, but its name suggests it was a mountain.

HARAN (hā'răn, Heb. hārān, mountaineer). 1. Youngest brother of Abram and father of Lot, Abram's nephew. He died in Ur before his father, Terah, departed with his family from that city (Gen. 11:27,28).

2. A son of Caleb by his concubine, Ephah. This Haran had a son named Gazez (I Chron. 2:46).

3. A Gershonite Levite who lived in the time of David, he was the son of Shimei (I Chron. 23:9).

HARAN or CHARRAN (hā'răn, chăr'răn, Heb. hārān, Gr. charhrán), a city located in northern Mesopotamia, on the Balikh river, a branch of the Euphrates, to which Terah, the father of Abram, emigrated with his family (Gen. 11:31). After his father's death Abram departed from this city to go into the land of Canaan (Gen. 12:4). His brother Nahor remained there. Abraham later sent his servant to find a wife for his son Isaac among his relatives there (Gen. 24:4). After that Jacob, at the request of his father, Isaac, came to this same area in search of a wife (Gen. 29:4,5). In the time of Hezekiah, Rabshakeh, an officer of Sennacherib, when delivering a propaganda lecture to the people of Jerusalem, mentioned Haran, along with other cities in the same area, as conquered by Assyria (II Kings 19:12; and Isa. 37:12). Ezekiel mentions this city as one of those which carried on trade with Tyre (Ezek. 27:23).

Haran is frequently referred to in Assyrian and Babylonian records under the form of harranu, Anglicized as Harran. This term means road, probably because this city was located at the intersection of the trade routes from Damascus in the S and that going E and W between Carchemish and Nineveh. A center of worship of the moon-god, Sin, was established there in very early times. The city and temple were wrecked in the wars of the Assyrian kings. After the fall of Nineveh in 612 B.C., some Assyrian refugees fled to Harran and held out there until 610 B.C. Nabonidus, king of Babylon, who delighted in restoring old temples, rebuilt the city and temple and reinstated the worship of the moon-god there about 75 years later. This city is mentioned in Mari documents in the form of Nakhur, probably from Nahor, Abram's brother. The Romans knew it as Carrhae, famous as the place where the Parthians defeated Crassus in 53 B.C. It is still in existence as Harran, near the original site in southern Turkey. The present day Moslems who live in the area have many traditions concerning Abraham. C.E.H.

HARARITE (hā'rà-rīte, Heb. hărārî, mountain dweller), an area in the hill country of either Judah or Ephraim. This term occurs only in the catalog of David's mighty men. Shammah, the son of Agee, a Hararite (II Sam. 23:11,33); Jonathan, the son of Shagee the Hararite (I Chron. 11:34); Ahiam, the son of Sacar the Hararite (I Chron. 11:35).

HARBONA, HARBONAH (hàr-bō'nà, hâr-bō'nà, Heb. harevônā', harevônâh, ass driver), one of the seven chamberlains of Ahasuerus, king of Persia (Esth. 1:10; 7:9).

HARE (See Animals)

HAREPH (hā'rĕf, Heb. hārēph, scornful), son of Caleb, and father of Bethgader (I Chron. 2:51).

HARETH, HERETH (hā'rĕth KJV, Hē'rĕth ASV, Heb. hereth), occurs only in I Samuel 22:5 as the name of a forest in Judah where David stayed.

HARHAIAH (hàr-hā'ja, Heb. harhăyâh, meaning unknown), father of Uzziel, a goldsmith, who repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

HARHAS (hàr'hăs, Heb. harhas, meaning uncertain), grandfather of Shallum, husband of Hulda the prophetess (II Kings 22:14). In II Chronicles 34:22 this name is Hasrah.

HARHUR (hàr'hûr, Heb. harhūr, fever), head of one of the families which returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra. 2:51, Neh. 7:53).

HARIM (hā'rĭm, Heb. hārim, consecrated or slit-nosed). 1. A priest assigned to the third course in David's time (I Chron. 24:8).

2. A family which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:32, Neh. 7:35).

3. A family of priests which returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:39, Neh. 7:42; 12:15). Members of this family married foreign wives (Ezra 10:21).

4. Another family who married foreign wives (Ezra 10:31).

5. Father of Malchijah, a worker on the wall (Neh. 3:11). This man may have been the same one who entered into a covenant with the Lord under Nehemiah (Neh. 10:5).

6. Another man who covenanted with the Lord under Nehemiah (Neh. 10:27).

HARIPH (hā'rĭf, Heb. harîph, autumn), a family which returned to Judah from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:24). (The corresponding place, Ezra 2:18, has Jorah). A man of this name was among those sealed in the covenant with God (Neh. 10:19).

HARLOT, a prostitute, which kind of woman is designated by four terms in the OT: (1) zônâh, the regular word for harlot and the most frequently used; (2) qedēshâh, a special kind of harlot, a religious prostitute, that is, a priestess of a heathen religion in which fornication was part of the worship. Mentioned only four times, but three of those references are early (Gen. 38:21,22, and Deut. 23:17; (3) 'ishshâh zārâh, or zārah alone, a "strange woman," occurs only in the Book of Proverbs, and the way it is used there shows that a harlot is meant; (4) nokhrîyâh, a foreign (or strange) woman, found, in this form, also only in the Book of Proverbs, and it obviously means harlot.

The first two of the above terms were sometimes translated whore, other times harlot in the KJV. In ASV zônâh is consistently rendered harlot and qedēshâh, prostitute.

The NT word for harlot is pórnē, which in KJV is inconsistently sometimes whore and sometimes harlot, but in ASV is always harlot.

Some legal measures were in force concerning harlots. Parents were not to force their daughters to become harlots (Lev. 19:29; 21:7,14), priests were not to marry harlots (Lev. 19:29), the wages of harlotry were not to be brought into the temple to pay a vow (Deut. 23:18). These prohibitions were necessary to keep the worship of the Lord free from the impurities of the sin of harlotry.

The actual punishment of harlots was severe when enforced. In Genesis 38:24 Judah ordered Tamar to be burned for being a harlot. Leviticus 21:9 commanded burning for a priest's daughter who became a harlot. Deuteronomy 22:21 ordered stoning for a bride found to have played the harlot.

Such a common sin needed to be guarded against. It is not surprising to find that the Book of Proverbs, which mentions every term for harlot except qedēshâh, teaches about and warns against harlots by admonitions and illustrations. The situation in the Corinthian Church was such that the Apostle Paul had to give the Christians there special warnings against fornication with harlots (I Cor. 6:15,16).

The words harlot and harlotry are used very often, especially in the prophetic books, to describe idolatry. This figurative use was evidently based on the idea that the Lord was the husband of the nation of Israel (see Jer. 3:20). When the people took their allegiance from Jehovah and gave it to idols instead, He called it "going a whoring after other gods" (KJV) or "playing the harlot with other gods" (ASV). This expression occurs rather frequently in the prophetic books, and a few times in other books. Also, this spiritual harlotry is mentioned several times in the Book of Revelation, chapter 17. C.E.H.

HARNEPHER (här'nĕ-fĕr, Heb. harnepher), a son of Zophal in the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:36).

HAROD (hā'rŏd, Heb. hârōdh, trembling), a spring, or well, beside which Gideon and his men encamped one morning. The Lord reduced his army there to 300 men with whom he routed the Midianites that night (Judg. 7:1). It was located in the Mount Gilboa area about four miles SE of the city of Jezreel. The modern name of the spring is Ain Jalud.

HARODITE (hā'rŏd-īt, Heb. hărōdî, belonging to Herod), patronymic of two of David's mighty men, Shammah and Elika (II Sam. 23:25). In the parallel place in I Chronicles 11:27 this name is given as "Harorite", a scribal error for "Harodite".

HAROEH (hà-rō'ĕ, Heb. hārō'eh, the seer), a son of Shobal, and grandson of Caleb, son of Hur (I Chron. 2:52).

HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES (hā-rō'shĕth, Heb. hărōsheth haggôyim), a town near the Kishon river in N Palestine. It was the home of Sisera, the captain of the army of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. 4:2,13,16). The significance of the phrase "of the Gentiles" is unknown but suggests mixed races lived there. It has been identified with modern Teil 'Amr in the Mt. Carmel Kishon area.

HARP (See Music)

HARROW (hă'rō, Heb. sādhādh), occurs three times, always as a verb. Job 39:10 translated "harrow." In Isaiah 28:24 and Hosea 10:11 it is rendered "break up the clods." From the root meaning of the word it seems to mean dragging or leveling off a field.

HARROWS (Heb. hārîts), a sharp instrument made of iron with which David cut conquered peoples (II Sam. 12:31, I Chron. 20:3). It has no connection with the verb rendered "harrow."

HARSHA (hàr'shà, Heb. harshā', dumb, silent), the head of family of the Nethinim which returned under Zerubbabel from exile (Ezra 2:52, Neh. 7:54).

HART (See Animals)

HARUM (hā'rŭm, Heb. hārum, made high), a descendant of Judah mentioned as the father of Aharhel (I Chron. 4:8).

HARUMAPH (hà-rōō'maf, Heb. hărûmaph, perhaps slit-nosed), the father of Jedaiah, a worker helping to repair the wall (Neh. 3:10).

HARUPHITE (hà-rōō'fīt, Heb. harûphî, or hărîphî). Shephatiah, one of the men who joined David's forces in Ziglag, was called the Haruphite or the Hariphite (I Chron. 12:5). If this latter form is the correct one, then this man may be connected with the Hariph clan (Neh. 7:24).

HARUZ (hā'rŭz, Heb. hārûts, diligent), father-in-law of Manasseh, king of Judah (II Kings 21:19).

HARVEST (hàr-vĕst, Heb. qātsîr, Gr. therismós). The economy of the Israelites was strictly agricultural. Harvest time was a very significant event for them. They had three each year. The barley reaping (Ruth 1:22) came in April-May; the wheat harvest (Gen. 30:14) was about six weeks later in June-July, and the ingathering of the fruits of tree or vine took place in September-October.

Grain crops were reaped with sickles, and the cut stalks were laid in bunches which were carried to the threshing-floor. Some laws governed these simple harvest operations. The corners of the fields were not to be reaped, and the scatterings of the cut grain were not to be picked up. The part of the crop thus left was for the poor people to use (Lev. 23:22). The owner was required each year to present the first-fruits of the crop as an offering to God before he could take any of it for his own use (Lev. 23:10,14). Stalks of grain which grew up without being sown could not be harvested (Lev. 25:5). With a new orchard or vineyard the fruit could not be gathered for three years, and the fourth year's crop had to be given entirely to the Lord. So the owner had to wait until the fifth year to get any fruit for himself (Lev. 19:23-25).

The Lord fitted the three main religious feasts which He prescribed for the people into this agricultural economy. The Passover came in the season of the barley harvest (Exod. 23:16). Seven weeks later at time of the wheat harvest occurred the feast of Pentecost (Exod. 34:22). The feast of Tabernacles was observed the seventh month, which was the period of the fruit harvest (Exod. 34:22).

In the New Testament, most of the time the term harvest is used figuratively for the gathering in of the redeemed saints at the end of the age (Matt. 13:39). C.E.H.

HASADIAH (hă-ȧ-dī'ȧ, Heb. hăsadhyâh, Jehovah is kind), a son of Zerubabbel (I Chron. 3:20).

HASENUAH (hăs-ē-nū'ȧ, Heb. hassenu'âh, the word is senuah with the definite article prefixed, meaning the hated one). 1. An ancestor of Sallu, a Benjamite who returned from exile (1 Chron. 9:7). In ASV "Hassenuah."

2. The father of Judah, the assistant overseer of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 11:9). In KJV Senuah (q.v.).

HASHABIAH (hăsh-ȧ-bī'ȧ, Heb. hăshavyâh, whom Jehovah esteems). 1. An ancestor of Ethan, a Levite and temple singer in David's time (I Chron. 6:45).

2. An ancestor of Shèmaiah, a Levite, who returned from Babylon (I Chron. 9:14) and lived in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:15).

3. A son of Jeduthun, a musician in David's time (I Chron. 25:3).

4. A civil official in David's time (I Chron. 26:30).

5. Overseer of the tribe of Levi in David's time. (I Chron. 27:17).

6. A chief of the Levites in Josiah's time (II Chron. 35:9).

7. A Levite teacher whom Ezra brought with him (Ezra 8:19).

8. A chief priest in Ezra's company (Ezra 8:24).

9. Ruler of the half tribe of Keilah, a worker on the wall (Neh. 3:17).

10. A priest, head of the family of Hilkiak (Neh. 12:21).

11. An ancestor of Uzzi, the overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 11:22).

12. A chief of the Levites who sealed the covenant (Neh. 3:17) and was appointed to praise God (Neh. 12:24).

HASHABNAH (hȧ-shăb'nȧh, Heb. hăshavnâh), one of those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:25).

HASHABNIAH (hăsh'ăb-nē-ī'ȧ, Heb. hăshavneyâh). 1. The father of Hattush, a worker on the wall (Neh. 3:10). ASV Hashabneiah.

2. One of the Levites who prayed at the confession of sin (Neh. 9:5). ASV Hashabneiah.

HASHBADANA (hăsh-băd'ȧ-nȧ, Heb. hashbaddânâh), a man who stood on the left of Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

HASHEM (hā'-shĕm, Heb. hāshĕm), a man whose sons were among David's mighty men (1 Chron. 11:34). The parallel passage (II Sam. 23:32) has Jashen.

HASHMANNIM (hăsh'-măn-nĭm, Heb. hashmannîm, meaning unknown), a Hebrew word that occurs only in Psalm 68:33 and is translated heaven of heavens. But it may be a textual error for bashmannim, which means "with oils or ointment."

HASHMONAH (hăsh-mō'nȧ, Heb. hashmōnâh), a station where the Israelites encamped in the wilderness (Num. 33:29,30). The site is unknown.

HASHUB (See Hasshub)

HASHUBAH (hȧ-shōō'bȧ, Heb. hăshuvâh, consideration), a son of Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:20).

HASHUM (hā'-shŭm, Heb. hāshum). 1. A family that returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:19; 10:33; Neh. 7:22).

2. A priest who stood at the left of Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

3. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:18). Maybe the same as 2.

HASHUPHA (hȧ-shōō'fȧ, Heb. hăsūphā'), a family that returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46), ASV Hasupha.

HASMONAEANS (See Maccabees)

HASRAH (hăs'-rȧ, Heb. hasrâh, meaning uncertain), grandfather of Shallum, the husband of Hulda the prophetess (II Chron. 34:22). In the parallel place (II Kings 22:14) this name is given as Harhas.

HASSENAAH (hăs-ē-nā'-ȧ, Heb. hassenā'âh, the word is sena'ah (q.v.) with the definite article prefixed, meaning the hated one). Father of the sons who built the fish gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:3).

HASSHUB (hăsh'ŭb, Heb. hashshûv, considerate). 1. The father of Shemaiah, a Levite who returned from exile (I Chron. 9:14). He dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:15. KJV Hashub.

2. A worker on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:11).

3. Another worker on the wall (Neh. 3:23). KJV Hashub.

4. One who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:23). KJV Hashub. May be identical with 2 or 3.

HASUPHA (See Hashupha)

HAT (See Dress)

HATACH (hā'tăk, Heb. hăthākh, meaning uncertain), a chamberlain of the king of Persia appointed to attend upon Esther (Esth. 4:5-10).

HATHATH (hā'-thăth, Heb. hăthath, terror), a son of Othniel, the first judge of Israel (I Chron. 4:13).

HATIPHA (hà-tī'fà, Heb. hăṭîphā', meaning uncertain), head of family of the Nethinim which returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:54; Neh. 7:56).

HATITA (hà-tī'tà, Heb. hăṭîṭā', exploring), an ancestor of a family of Levitical porters which returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

HATSI HAM MENUCHOTH (hă-tsī-hăm-mĕn-ū'-kōth, Heb. hăṭsî hammenūhôth, half of the Menuhoth), a marginal reading on I Chronicles 2:54 in KJV which is eliminated in ASV.

HATTIL (hăt'-ĭl, Heb. hattîl, waving), a family which returned from exile under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59).

HATTIN, HORNS OF (hăt'tĕn, hollows), a peculiar form of a hill near the village of Hattin, which tradition dating from the 13th century holds as the scene of Christ's Sermon on the Mount. The crater-like top of this hill has a grassy knoll about 60 feet high on each end of it; these are called the Horns of Hattin. This phrase is not mentioned in the Bible but it may denote the "mountain" of Matthew 5:1.

HATTUSH (hăt'-ŭsh, Heb. hattûsh, meaning unknown). 1. A descendant in the royal line of Judah in the fifth generation from Zerubbabel (I Chron. 3:22).

2. A descendant of David who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra 8:2).

3. A worker on the wall (Neh. 3:10), may be the same as 2.

4. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:4), may be the same as 2 or 3.

5. A priest who returned with Zerubabbel (Neh. 12:2).

HAURAN (hà'ōō-rän, Heb. hawrān, probably black or black land), the modern name of a great plain situated on a plateau 2000 feet high E of the Jordan river and N of the land of Gilead. In ancient times it was called Bashan. Its soil is of volcanic origin and is very rich, making the region famous for its wheat crops. The name Hauran is mentioned only by Ezekiel in his description of the boundaries of the land of Israel in the Millennial age (47:16,18).

The Israelites never had a very great hold on this area. Its openness to the E made it a frequent prey to robbers from the desert. Under the Romans, Herod ruled over it as part of his realm, and he greatly encouraged settlement by stopping the robber raids. It was then known as Auranitis. Christianity flourished there from the second century A.D. until the seventh century, when it was overthrown by the Moslems. Today Hauran is an integral part of Syria.

HAVILAH (hăv'-ĭ-là, Heb. hăwîlâh, sand-land). 1. A son of Cush, a descendant of Ham (Gen. 10:7; I Chron. 1:9).

2. A son of Joktan, a descendant of Shem (Gen. 10:29; I Chron. 1:23). These names are generally taken to mean tribes or nations. If both references refer to the same area, it pertained to both Hamitic and Semitic peoples. It is generally thought to have been located in southern Arabia.

3. A land encompassed by the river Pishon which flowed from a source in the Garden of Eden; it contained gold and other minerals (Gen. 2:11, 12). Probably located in Armenia or Mesopotamia, although actual location is uncertain.

4. A land mentioned as one of the boundaries of the dwelling of the Ishmaelites "from Havilah unto Shur that is before Egypt." This Havilah is probably the same as 2 in southern Arabia (Gen. 25:18). Saul conquered the Amalekites in this same area "from Havilah as thou goest to Shur that is before Egypt" (I Sam. 15:7).

HAVOTH-JAIR (hā-vŏth-jā'-ĭr, Heb. hawwōth-yā'îr, [ASV Havvoth-jair] villages of Jair), a group of villages which Jair, son of Manasseh, took (Num. 32:41). The word hawwah means a village of tents; it is used only in connection with these towns of Jair. This group consisted of 30 villages (Judg. 10:4; I Chron. 2:22,23). Jair captured both Gilead and Bashan, this latter district evidently contained 30 more towns (Deut. 3:14; Josh. 13:30; I Kings 4:13; I Chron. 2:23). The phrase Havoth-jair applied only to the villages in Gilead.

HAWK (See Birds)

HAZAEL (hăz'-ā-ĕl, Heb. hăzā'ēl, God sees), a high official of Benhadad, king of Syria, whom, when the king was sick, he sent to inquire of the prophet Elisha concerning his recovery from this illness. Elisha told Hazael the king would certainly recover, but he would surely die. Previously God had instructed Elijah to anoint Hazael king of Syria (I Kings 19:15). Hazael pretended to be surprised by Elisha's statement that he would become king. He returned and suffocated Benhadad, and seized the throne for himself (II Kings 8:7-15).

This usurpation is confirmed by an inscription of Shalmaneser III which states that Hadadezer of Damascus (that is, Benhadad) perished and Hazael, a son of nobody, seized the throne. This phrase "a son of nobody" means he was not in the royal line of descent.

The date of Hazael's reign can be ascertained as at least 43 years in length (841-798 B.C.); very likely it was a few years longer. Ahaziah, king of Judah, reigned only one year (II Kings 8:26). That year was 841. During that year he fought with Joram, king of Israel against Hazael (II Kings 8:28). In the annals of Shalmaneser III, king of Assyria (858-824), for his 14th year (844), he recorded a battle against Hadadezer (Benhadad) of Damascus. In his 18th year (840) Shalmaneser said he encountered Hazael at Damascus. So Hazael usurped the throne during the period (844-841). He reigned at least until 798, the date of the death of Jehoahaz, king of Israel, for Hazael oppressed Israel all the days of this king (II Kings 13:22.) He died shortly afterwards (II Kings 13:24).

Hazael greatly punished Israel, as Elisha had foreseen (II Kings 8:12). He wounded Jehoram, son of Ahab, at Ramoth-gilead (II Kings 8:29). During the reign of Jehu, Hazael took all the territory E of the Jordan valley from Israel (II Kings 10:32). While Joash was ruling in Judah, Hazael captured Gath and threatened Jerusalem, but Joash induced him to retire by paying tribute (II Kings 12:17,18). He continually raided Israel during the reign of Jehoahaz (II Kings 13:3). As previously mentioned, he oppressed Israel all the days of this king (II Kings 13:22). Shalmaneser III records two attacks on Hazael in which the Assyrian king claims great victories with severe damage to the Syrian countryside. C.E.H.

HAZAIAH (hà-zā'yà, Jehovah sees), member of a family of Shiloh whose great-grandson lived in Jerusalem 444 B.C. (Neh. 11:5).

HAZAR (hā'zär, Heb. hăṭsar, a settlement), often the first element in Heb. place names.

HAZAR-ADDAR (hā'zär-ăd'är), a place on the southern boundary of Judah, W of Kadesh-barnea and E of Azmon (Num. 34:4). In Joshua 15:3 it is called simply Addar (KJV Adar).

HAZAR-ENAN (hā'zär-ē'năn, village of fountains), the NE corner of the land of Canaan as promised of the Lord to the people of Israel (Num. 34:9,10; cf. Ezek. 47:17).

HAZAR-GADDAH (hā'zär-găd'à, village of good fortune), a town in the south of Judah, very close to the boundary of Simeon (Josh. 15:27).

HAZAR-HATTICON (hā'zär-hăt'ĭ-kŏn, middle-village), mentioned only in Ezekiel 47:16 as being near Damascus and on the border of Hauran. Exact location uncertain.

HAZARMAVETH (hā'zär-mā'vĕth, village of death), found in the "Table of the nations" (Gen. 10:26 and I Chron. 1:20); apparently a son of Joktan, but probably representing the people or the district of modern Hadramut.

HAZAR-SHUAL (hā'zär-shōō'ăl, village of the jackal), a town in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:28) later bestowed upon Simeon (Josh. 19:3). After the captivity held by Simeonites (I Chron. 4:28) and Judah (Neh. 11:27).

HAZAR-SUSAH (hā'zär-sū'sà, village of a mare), a town given to Simeon out of Judah (Josh. 19:5), but called "Hazar-susim," i.e. "village of horses" in I Chronicles 4:31. Site uncertain.

HAZAZON-TAMAR (hăz'à-zŏn-tā'mĕr, Hazazon of the palm trees), ancient name of a town on the W coast of the Dead Sea, occupied in Abraham's time by the Amorites (Gen. 14:7), but smitten by the four great kings of the East. KJV Hazezon-tamar.

HAZEL (hā'z'l), found in Genesis 30:37, KJV, where it renders the Heb. luz, which the RV better translates "almond tree."

HAZELELPONI, ZELELPONI (hăz'ĕ-lĕl-pō'nī, zĕlĕl-pō'nī, ASV Hazzelelponi), a Jewish woman mentioned only in I Chronicles 4:3.

HAZERIM (hà-zē'rĭm, villages), the ancient homes of the Avvim near Gaza in southern Palestine (Deut. 2:23). RV properly translates "villages."

HAZEROTH (hà-zē'rŏth, courts or villages), a station on Israel's journeys in the wilderness, about 40-45 miles from Mt. Sinai, northeastward toward the Gulf of Akabah. The people seem to have stayed there for some time after the terrible plague at Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. 11:35). It was here that Aaron and Miriam made their rebellion against Moses (Num. 12). The identification of the place is uncertain.

HAZEZON-TAMAR (hăz'ĕ-zŏn-tā'mĕr), another spelling for Hazazon-tamar, q.v.

HAZIEL (hā'zī-ĕl, God sees), a Gershonite Levite in the latter days of David (I Chron. 23:9).

HAZO (hā'zō), a son of Nahor and uncle of Laban and Rebekah (Gen. 22:22).

HAZOR (hā'zôr, Heb. hātsôr, an enclosed place), the name of at least five towns mentioned in the Bible: 1. An important town in northern Palestine, ruled in the days of Joshua by Jabin (Josh. 11:1, 10). Palestine at the time was a conglomeration of little city-states or kingdoms, and of various groups united by tribal ties. For the former, see Joshua 11:1, and for the latter Joshua 11:3. This Hazor was reckoned as "the head of all those kingdoms" in Joshua's day, and Jabin led them against Joshua, who almost annihilated them. Nearly two centuries later, another Jabin (Judg. 4) reigning at Hazor was reckoned as king of Canaan, but God, using Deborah and Barak, subdued and destroyed him. Hazor, having a strategic location in the hills, about five miles W of the waters of Merom, was fortified by Solomon (I Kings 9:15). Its Israelite inhabitants were carried away into captivity (II Kings 15:29) in Assyria by Tiglath-pileser about the middle of the eighth century B.C.

2. A town in the extreme south of Judah, mentioned only in Josh. 15:23.

3. Another town in the south of Judah (Josh. 15:25). Its name "Hazor-hadattah" means simply "new Hazor" and indicates that some of the inhabitants of Hazor (2) had removed to a new location. KJV in Joshua 15:25 makes it seem that Hazor and Hadattah were separate places but cf. ASV.

4. A town N of Jerusalem, inhabited by Benjamites in the restoration (Neh. 11:33).

5. A region in the south of Arabia against which Jeremiah pronounced a "doom" (Jer. 49:28-33).

HAZOR-HADATTAH (hā'zôr-hà-dăt'à, new Hazor), see No. 3 in the article on Hazor. Joshua 15:25 in KJV makes it seem like the names of two villages.

HE (hā), the fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, pronounced like English h. It was also used for the number 5.

HEAD (hĕd, Heb. rō'sh, Gr. kephalé). The word "head" occurs about 433 times in Scripture and the Hebrew word for "head" occurs 592 times, being translated "head" 349 times, "chief" 90 times, "top" 75 times, "company" 12 times, "beginning" 14 times, "captain" 10 times, "chapiter" 4 times, etc. There are many figurative uses: "the hoary head" (Prov. 16:31), expressing old age; "heads over the people" (Exod. 18:25); "round the corners of your heads" (Lev. 19:27, referring to a heathen custom of trimming the beard); "heads of the people" (Num. 25:4, probably meaning "chiefs"; cf. ASV); "his blood shall be upon his head" (Josh. 2:19, meaning "we shall not be responsible for his life"); keeper of mine head" (I Sam. 28:2 i.e. "my protector"); "Am I a dog's head" (II Sam. 3:8 i.e. "Am I utterly contemptible?"); "yet will I not lift up my head" (Job 10:15, i.e. "yet will I not be self-assertive"); "his head reached unto the clouds" (Job 20:6, i.e "he be highly exalted"), etc.

HEADBAND, HEADDRESS (See Dress)

HEAD OF THE CHURCH. In the NT Christ is described as "the head of the church" (Eph. 1:22; 5:23), and "head of the body, the church" (Col. 1:18; cf. Eph. 4:15). This figure speaks of the preeminence of Christ, His authority, and the complete dependence of the church upon Christ. It must not be pressed to mean that Christ is the intellectual center of His people, through whom the members are passively governed, for to the Jewish mind, the heart, not the head, was the seat of the intellect. In Colossians 1:18 the headship of Christ over the body denotes His priority of rank.

HEADSTONE (See Cornerstone)

HEART (Heb. lēv, lēvāv, Gr. kardía). Although the word occurs more than 900 times in Scripture, it is almost never used in a literal sense, the principal exception being in Exodus 28:29,30, which speaks of the breastplate of judgment upon the heart of Aaron. Commonly the "heart" is regarded as being the seat of the intellect, the feelings and the will; e.g., "every imagination of the thoughts of his heart" (Gen. 6:5) would imply intellect; "comfort ye your hearts" (Gen. 18:5; or "strengthen your heart" as in ASV) would imply feeling; while "that seeking him with the whole heart" (Ps. 119:2) means the will. It is often used to signify the innermost being, i.e., "It grieved him at his heart" (Gen. 6:6). In modern usage, "heart" is used to imply affection, as "I have you in my heart," as found in Psalm 62:10, "If riches increase, set not your heart upon them" and in scores of other passages.

Both in ancient times and today, different parts of the body are used figuratively as the seat of different functions of the soul; and the ancient usage often differs from the modern. In expressing sympathy, we might say "This touches my heart," where the ancient might say "my bowels were moved for him" (S. of Sol. 5:4). Psalm 7:9 in KJV has "the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins," whereas ASV has "the minds and hearts." Here ancient "hearts" is equated with modern "minds" and ancient "reins," i.e., "kidneys" with modern "hearts." This is not a question of truth and error as between ancient and modern psychology, but reflects a difference in common figurative usage. The NT was written mostly by Jews and so is colored by Hebrew thinking and usage; e.g. "They do always err in their heart" means "They are wrong in their thinking" though probably the affections are included as well. Often the word "heart" implies the whole moral nature of fallen man, e.g. "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked" (Jer. 17:9) whereas the next verse in KJV has "search the heart, try the reins" but in ASV "search the mind, try the heart." A.B.F.

HEARTH. In ancient times homes were heated very differently from today. In the poorer houses the hearth consisted of a depression in the floor of a room in which a fire was kindled for cooking or for warmth. Chimneys were unknown: smoke escaped from the house as it could, or through a latticed opening for the purpose. The better class of houses were heated by means of a brazier of burning coals. This was a wide, shallow pan which could also be used for cooking. (See Gen. 18:6; Ps. 102:3; Isa. 30:14; Hosea 13:3; Jer. 36:22,23; Zech. 12:6.)

HEATH, a shrub with very small, narrow, rigid leaves. The species Erica verticillata grows on the W slopes of Lebanon. (See Jer. 17:6; 48:6).

HEATHEN (hēē'th'n, Heb. gôy, pl. gôyim, Gr. éthnos, people, nation). [Anglo-Saxon, dweller on the heath.] In the OT gôy is rendered "Gentiles," "heathen," and "nation," but it is usually used for a non-Israelitish people, and thus has the meaning of "Gentiles." Sometimes, however, it refers to the Israelites, as in Genesis 12:2; Deuteronomy 32:28, but the word ordinarily used for the people of God is 'ām. In the NT Éthnos is the equivalent of gôy in the OT, while laós corresponds to 'ām. Sometimes in the KJV the Gr. Héllenes renders "Gentiles" (John 7:35; Rom. 2:9,10).

The differentiation between Israelites and Gentiles was more sharply accentuated in NT times than in OT times, the reason for this being chiefly that the Jews had suffered so much from Gentile hands. Gentiles were looked upon with aversion and hatred. This is evident in the NT (John 18:28; Acts 10:28; 11:3).

God's interest in and concern for the heathen is seen in the OT, especially in the Book of Jonah. In the NT Jesus commanded the apostles to preach the Gospel to all the world; and we find them proclaiming it to Gentile nations throughout the Mediterranean world. S.B.

HEAVEN (Heb. shāmayim, Gr. ouranós). 1. Cosmologically, one of the two great divisions of the universe, the earth and the heavens (Gen. 1:1; 14:19; etc.); or one of the three — heaven, earth, and the waters under the earth (Exod. 20:4). In the visible heavens are the stars and planets (Gen. 1:14-17; Ezek. 32:7,8). Later Jews divided the heavens into seven strata, but there is no evidence for this in the Bible, although Paul spoke of being caught up into the third heaven (II Cor. 12:2). The term, "heaven of heavens" (Deut. 10:14; I Kings 8:27; Ps. 148:4) probably means the "height of heaven."

2. The abode of God (Gen. 28:17; Ps. 80:14; Isa. 66:1; Matt. 5:12) and of the good angels (Matt. 24:36); where the redeemed shall some day be (Matt. 5:12; 6:20; Eph. 3:15); where the Redeemer has gone and intercedes for the saints, and from which He will some day come for His own (I Thess. 4:16).

3. The inhabitants of heaven (Luke 15:18; Rev. 18:20). S.B.

HEAVE OFFERING (See Offerings)

HEAVE SHOULDER (See Offerings)

HEAVING AND WAVING (See Offerings)

HEBER (hē'bĕr, associate). 1. A great-grandson of Jacob through Asher and Beriah (Gen. 46:17).

2. The Kenite whose wife Jael killed Sisera (Judg. 4:11-21). He had been friendly with the Canaanites who had been oppressing Israel.

3. A son of Ezrah (KJV "Ezra") of the tribe of Judah and probably of the family of Caleb, the good spy (I Chron. 4:18).

4. A man of the tribe of Benjamin, and son of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:17). In KJV the name of these other men, whose name should be Eber as in ASV.

5. The head of a family in the tribe of Gad (I Chron. 5:13).

6. A Benjamite, son of Shashak, mentioned only in I Chronicles 8:22.

7. One mentioned in Christ's genealogy (Luke 3:35 KJV), father of Peleg and Joktan. He is properly called "Eber" elsewhere (e.g. Gen. 10:24, 25; Gen. 11:12-16). See EBER, HEBREWS.

HEBREW OF THE HEBREWS. When Paul in Philippians 3:4-6 so described himself, he meant that he was a pure-blooded Hebrew who had retained the language and customs of his fathers, in contrast to other Jews who had adopted Greek language and customs.

HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE. Authorship. The writer of Hebrews does not attach his name to his letter. I John is the only other epistle in the NT to which a name is not attached. Because of this fact, there has been much discussion since the first century as to who wrote Hebrews.

Early Christians held various opinions. Those on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean and around Alexandria associated the book with Paul. Origen (185-254 A.D.) held that the thoughts of the book were Paul's, but the language and composition were someone else's. In North Africa, Tertullian (155-225 A.D.) thought that Barnabas wrote Hebrews. Although the epistle was first known in Rome and the W (I Clement, dated around 95 A.D. cites Hebrews frequently), for 200 years Christians in Rome and the W were unanimous in their opinion that Paul did not write Hebrews. Who did write Hebrews these early Christians did not say.

Present day Christians should hardly be dogmatic about an issue which from the very beginning of the church was surrounded with uncertainty. A careful study of the epistle in the Greek text discloses some important things about the author: 1. The letter has a polished Greek style, like that of a master rhetorician. The continuous use of this style is unlike Paul who frequently picks up a new stream of thought before he finishes the one he is treating. 2. The vocabulary, figures of speech, and manner of argument show an Alexandrian and Philonic influence (Philo, 20 B.C. to 50 or 60 A.D.). Paul, having come from Tarsus and having been educated in Jerusalem, did not have such a background. 3. Both Paul and the writer of Hebrews quote the Old Testament frequently. But the way they introduce their quotations is quite different. Paul's formulas — "just as it has been written" (19 times), "it has been written" (10 times), "the Scripture says" (6 times), "the Scripture proclaims good tidings beforehand" (1 time) — never occur in Hebrews. Paul's manner of introducing quotations puts the reader's attention on the content quoted. The writer of Hebrews, as an orator, puts the stress on the one who speaks. For him God, Christ, or the Holy Spirit is speaking.

Along with many present day scholars, this author favors Apollos as the possible writer of Hebrews. He was a Jew, born in Alexandria (Acts 18:24), a learned and cultured man. He was well-versed in the Scriptures (Acts 18:24). Being orally taught the way of the Lord, Apollos was teaching about Jesus even when he knew only John's baptism (Acts 18:25). He was a man of enthusiasm. Priscilla and Aquila, Paul's friends, led Apollos to a full knowledge of Christ (Acts 18:26). After he received this fuller knowledge, he was a man of courage. He left Ephesus for Achaia to help the believers there (Acts 18:27). He consistently used the Scriptures in his public preaching (Acts 18:25). Paul testifies to Apollos' capability in I Corinthians chapters 1-4. His polished rhetorical style may have been a contributing cause to the Apollos party which was found in Corinth (I Cor. 3:4,5,6). Apollos' modesty and desire to avoid friction are seen in I Corinthians 16:12. He was still an active co-worker of Paul late in Paul's ministry (see Titus 3:13). In Apollos one can explain all of Hebrews' similarities with Paul as well as the distinct differences from Paul.

Assuming Apollos to be the author, one can best date the letter between 68-70 A.D.

Original Readers. The letter was first known in Rome and the West. Its first readers were Jewish Christians who spoke and wrote Greek. The brief statement: "They from Italy salute you" (Heb. 13:24) certainly favors the readers' being located in Italy. If the writer had been in Italy, he would have named the precise place. A letter from any city in the United States would not say: "Those from the United States send greetings." But if the letter came from an interior city of India or Brazil, such a greeting would be appropriate. Hence, it appears there were Italian Christians with the writer somewhere outside of Italy as he penned this letter. The writer knows the readers well. He refers to their spiritual dullness (5:11-14), their faithful ministering to the saints (6:9-10), their experiences after their conversion (10:32-36). The term used for their spiritual leaders or rulers is hoi hēgoumenoi (13:7,17,24), a technical term found nowhere else in the New Testament, but other writings coming from Rome and the West have this same term (cf. I Clement 1:3; 21:6; Shepherd of Hermas II, 2:6, 9:7 [proegoumenoi]). Their first leaders seem to have died (13:7), while their present leaders are continually engaged in the task of watching over the flock (13:17). To these the writer sends greetings (13:24).

Although absolute certainty cannot be reached, it seems best to regard the original readers as being located somewhere in Italy. Many roads led to Rome. These believers may have been in one of the cities nearer or farther from the capital. Paul himself spent seven days with the brothers in Puteoli (Acts 28:13-14). They could have been in Rome or its suburbs. As the writer pens this letter, Timothy has departed [from him] and is absent (perfect tense) — very likely on some tour of churches. As soon as he appears (or if he comes soon), the writer and Timothy together will visit the readers (Heb. 13:23).

Outline and Summary of Content — An outline shows the centrality of Jesus Christ in the book of Hebrews.

PROLOGUE: COURSE AND CLIMAX OF DIVINE REVELATION (1:1-3)

I. PRE-EMINENCE OF CHRIST HIMSELF (1:4-4:13)
- A. Superiority of Christ to Angels (1:4-14)
- B. Warning: Peril of Indifference to These Truths (2:1-14)
- C. Reason Christ Became Human (2:5-18)
- D. Christ's Position is Greater than That of Moses (3:1-6)
- E. Warning: Unbelief Brings Temporal and Eternal Effects (3:7-4:13)

II. PRIESTHOOD OF JESUS CHRIST (4:14-10:18)
- A. Importance of His Priesthood for a Believer's Conduct (4:14-16)
- B. Qualifications of a High Priest (5:1-10)
- C. Warning: Immaturity and Apostasy are Conquered Only by Faith, Longsuffering, and Hope (5:11-6:20a)
- D. Melchizedek's Eternal Successor (6:20b-7:28)
- E. Heavenly Sanctuary and New Covenant (8:1-13)
- F. Priestly Service under the Old Covenant and the New (9:1-28)
- G. Inadequacy of the Sacrifices under the Law contrasted with the Efficacy and Finality of Christ's Sacrifice (10:1-18)

III. PERSEVERANCE OF CHRISTIANS (10:19-12:29)
- A. Attitudes to be Sought and Attitudes to be Shunned (10:19-38)
- B. Faith in Action—Illustrious Examples from the Past (11:1-40)
- C. Incentives for Action in the Present Scene and in the Future Goal (12:1-29)

POSTSCRIPT: EXHORTATIONS, PERSONAL CONCERNS, BENEDICTION (13:1-25)

Although God spoke to the fathers by the prophets, He has now spoken by His Son. In the prologue we see the distinctiveness of the Son. He is before history, in history, above history, the goal of history, and the agent who brings about a cleansing of men from sins committed in history. He shares the essence of Deity and radiates the glory of Deity. He is the supreme revelation of God (1:1-3).

The writer's first main task is to make clear the pre-eminence of Christ (1:4-4:13). He is superior to angels. They assist those who will be heirs of salvation. Christ, by virtue of who He is, of God's appointment, and of what He has done, stands exalted far above them. It would be tragic to be careless of the great salvation which He proclaimed. He will achieve for man the promise that all things will be in harmonious subjection to man. He can do this because He is fully man and has provided the expiation for sins. He is superior to Moses, for Moses was a servant among the people of God, while Christ is a son over the people of God. It would be tragic to cease trusting Him. Unbelief kept one entire generation of Israelites from Canaan. Christians are warned of such unbelief. Faith is emphasized as well as zeal to enter into the eternal rest of God. Both the Gospel of God and God Himself scrutinize men.

The second major emphasis in the letter falls upon the priesthood of Christ (4:14-10:18). Qualifications, conditions, and experiences of the Aaronic priesthood are listed in comparison to Christ as a priest. Before further developing this theme, the writer warns his readers of their unpreparedness for advanced teaching. Only earnest diligence in things of God will bring them out of immaturity. Christ as a priest, like Melchizedek, is superior to the Levitical priesthood because His life is indestructible. He was both priest and sacrifice. His priesthood is eternal. His sanctuary is in heaven and His blood establishes the validity of the New Covenant which is also an eternal covenant. His one offering on behalf of sins is final; i.e., it is for all time. Likewise He has made perfect for all time those who are in the process of being sanctified.

The last main section of Hebrews deals with the response of Christians. Perseverance on the part of Christians springs out of fellowship with God, activity for God, faith in God, and a consciousness of what lies ahead (10:19-12:29).

In concluding the letter the writer puts stress on the cross as the Christian altar and the resurrection of the Shepherd of the sheep as the basis for God's action. Such redemptive-historical events move the believer to action (13:1-25).

Teaching. Although more space is devoted to Christ, the letter has a fully developed set of teachings about God the Father.

Much is said about Christ. He is fully God and fully man. He is active in creation. The atonement of Christ, as both priest and sacrificial victim, is developed in detail. In the role of a priest, He is a leader and guide. He also is the revealer of God. Great depth is achieved in all of these teachings about Christ's person and work.

Very little is said about the Holy Spirit in Hebrews. The Spirit is mentioned only seven times: three times in reference to the inspiration of the OT, once in regard to the work of Christ, once in regard to the apostate's rejection of Christianity, and twice in regard to the believer.

The Old and New Covenants are compared and reasons for the superiority of the New or Eternal Covenant are given.

The doctrine of sin in Hebrews focuses attention on unbelief and the failure to go on with God to the eternal city.

Shadow and reality are carefully contrasted. Heaven is the scene of reality. Earth is concerned both with shadow and reality. Christ is the bridge between the temporary and the eternal.

The people of God are looked upon as migrating from a transitory setting to an abiding city. This migration involves God's Word, the matter of testing, discipline or punishment, faithfulness, and God's activity in sanctifying or making holy. The Christian life is developed in the framework of this heavenly pilgrimage.

Eschatology or last things involves the obtaining of eternal rest, a final shaking of heaven and earth, the personal return of Christ, and glory belonging to God for ever and ever. A.B.M.

HEBREW, HEBREWS, traditionally considered designations for Abraham and his descendants, especially through Jacob, the equivalent of Israelite(s). I Samuel 14:21 may suggest that the terms are to be equated. Jews quite uniformly have used "Israel" and "the children of Israel" (later "Jews") in referring to themselves, finding in such terminology treasured religious and national associations. Foreigners thought of them as "Hebrews" (Exod. 1:16; 2:6), and they so identified themselves in speaking to non-Jews (Gen. 40:15; Exod. 10:3; Jonah 1:9). Also, in contexts involving contrasts between Israelites and those of other nations, the same phenomenon appears (Gen. 43:32; Exod. 1:15; 2:11; I Sam. 13:3; 14:21).

One must reckon, however, with the possibility that in OT times the names "Hebrews," "Habiru," "Khapiru," " 'Apiru," and 'pr were forms of the same word, (equivalent to the Akkadian SA.GAZ), a designation without national significance. Rather, they indicated wandering peoples greatly restricted as regards financial means and without citizenship and social status. Ancient records show "Habiru" to be scattered over western Asia for centuries until about 1100 B.C. Nomadic peoples, mostly Semitic — sometimes raiders, sometimes skilled artisans — they frequently offered themselves as mercenaries and slaves, with individuals occasionally rising to prominence. In Egypt, the Israelites were reduced to a lowly position and later moved about in the wilderness. Conceivably they could, therefore, have been known as "Hebrews." Interestingly enough, in taking oaths the Habiru swore by "the gods of the Habiru," whereas identical phraseology, "The God of the Hebrews," is found in Exodus 3:18; 5:3; 7:16. "Hebrews" and "Habiru" were terms employed prior to the name "Israel," and both were discontinued generally about the time of the Judges.

NT "Hebrew" references contrast people (Acts 6:1) and language (John 5:2; 19:13,17,20; 20:16) to differentiate between the Greeks and Hellenistic culture on the one hand and Jews and their traditional life and speech on the other. What is called "Hebrew language" may in John's Gospel refer to Aramaic, but in the Apocalypse to Hebrew proper (Rev. 9:11; 16:16).

Etymologically, it has been debated whether "Hebrew" is to be traced to Eber, the father of Peleg and Joktan (Gen. 10:24,25; 11:12-16) or is derived from the Hebrew root "to pass over" and has reference to "a land on the other side," as the dweller E of the Euphrates might think of Canaan. However, the possible equating of the Hebrews and the Habiru might suggest that the Hebrews were "those who crossed over" in the sense of trespassing, i.e. "trespassers." B.L.G.

HEBREW LANGUAGE. With the exception of Aramaic in Ezra 4:8-6:18; 7:12-26; Daniel 2:4-7; 28 and Jeremiah 10:11, Hebrew is the language of the OT. The term "Hebrew" was first used as a designation for individuals or a people and only later denoted a language. The OT refers to the language not as "Hebrew" but as "the language of Canaan" (Isa. 19:18) or "the Jews' language" (II Kings 18:26,28 and parallel passages; also Neh. 13:24). Josephus, Ecclesiasticus and the NT (Rev. 9:11; 16:16), however, speak of it as "Hebrew." With close affinity to Ugaritic, Phoenician, Moabitic and the Canaanite dialects, Hebrew represents the northwest branch of the Semitic language family. Its sister languages include Arabic, Akkadian and Aramaic. With few exceptions, extant texts of Ancient Hebrew are those of the OT and certain of the apocryphal and pseudepigraphic works. Inscriptions employing the language include the Siloam Inscription from the eighth century B.C. and the Gezer Calendar from the tenth century B.C.

In large measure, the OT Hebrew must be self explanatory. However, the Ugaritic Ras Shamra tablets shed much light upon the meaning of the Hebrew Bible, and since the structure and vocabulary were so very similar in the various Semitic tongues, much cognate language help is available for the understanding of the language of the Israelites. The Greek translation of the OT, the LXX, is also of much value in interpretative study of Biblical Hebrew.

As the language encountered Aramaizing and Hellenizing influences in the half dozen centuries preceding the advent of Christ, its use as a spoken language became less and less. Some of the Dead Sea Scrolls were written in Hebrew, and Hebrew was the vehicle for the writing of such Jewish religious literature as the Mishnah and the Midrashim in the early part of the Christian era and in medieval times for Biblical commentaries and philosophical and literary works. In modern Israel, Hebrew has again become a living tongue.

The historical origins of the language are somewhat obscure but go back beyond 2000 B.C. The OT literature, written over a period of more than a thousand years, reveals a minimum of stylistic changes, although loan words and new ways of expression became more or less noticeable with the passing of years, especially after the Exile. It is also true that at a given time dialectical differences existed, a fact attested by the narrative in Judges 12, in which Ephraimites were unable to pronounce the "sh" of their neighbors to the south.

With its short sentences and simple coordinating conjunctions, ancient Hebrew lent itself well to the vivid expression of events. These features, together with parallelism and rhythm and special meanings and constructions made Hebrew poetry, as found in the Psalms and to a large extent in the Prophets, most expressive and strikingly effective.

Basic tools for the understanding of the language include the latest revisions of Gesenius' grammar and lexicon, and the lexicons of Koehler & Baumgartner and Davies-Mitchell, and the concordances of Mandelkern and Lisowsky. B.L.G.

HEBRON (hē'brŏn, Heb. hevrôn, league, confederacy). 1. One of the oldest cities of the world, and one which has had several names at different times. It is located 19 miles SW of Jerusalem on the main road to Beer-sheba, and has one of the longest records for continuous occupation. Though lying in a shallow valley, it is about 3,000 feet above sea-level and 4,300 feet above the Dead Sea which lies a few miles E of Hebron. The hills about the city still bear choice grapes, and the Jewish people there make a fine wine. The brook of Eshcol from which the spies brought an immense cluster of grapes (Num. 13:22-24) ran quite near Hebron. Hebron's original name was Kiriath-arba, i.e. "fourfold city" (Josh. 14:15; 15:13).

Hebron is replete with historical interest. It was early a camping place for Abram, to which he removed his tent, and dwelt by the oaks of Mamre (Gen. 13:18 mistranslated in KJV "the plain of Mamre"). This was close to Hebron, and here Abram built an altar unto the Lord. The only land that Abram owned, though God had promised him Canaan (Gen. 15:18-21), was the field of Machpelah, which he purchased from the Hittites as a burial place for Sarah (Heb. 11:8-10; Gen. 23:17-20). In this cave Sarah and Abraham, later Isaac and Rebekah, then Jacob and Leah were buried. At the partition of Canaan after the partial conquest, Hebron and its environs were given to Caleb to conquer (Josh. 14:6-15), which he did (15:14-19); but later the city itself was given to the Kohathite Levites (I Chron. 6:55,56), though Caleb's descendants kept the suburban fields and villages. When David was king over Judah, but not yet over all Israel, his capital city was Hebron for seven and a half years, and there the elders of Israel anointed him king over all Israel. He removed the capital to Jerusalem, but when Absalom rebelled against his father, he made Hebron his headquarters and there prepared his coup-d'état (II Sam. 15:7-12).

2. Third son of Kohath, and so an uncle of Mŏses, Aaron and Miriam (Exod. 6:18). His descendants, 1,700 men of valor in the days of David, had the responsibility for the Lord's business and for the service of the king west of Jordan (I Chron. 26:30).

3. A town in Asher (Josh. 19:28 KJV). ASV has "Ebron," but "Abdon" (Josh. 21:30, copied in I Chron. 6:74) is almost certainly the correct reading.

4. A descendant of Caleb, son of Hezron, son of Perez, son of Judah (I Chron. 2:42,43), not to be confused with Caleb the good spy, who was a distant cousin.

HEDGE, loose stone walls without mortar, or cut thorn branches or thorny bushes, common as "hedges" and "fences" in Palestine. The word can be rendered, fence, wall or hedge. The use of a hedge about a vine or tree was mainly for protection (Ps. 80:12). Figuratively, prophets should make up a hedge for the people's protection (Ezek. 13:5), and God is pictured as so doing (Mark 12:1) for His people. The very poor live in highways and hedges (Luke 14:23).

HEGAI or HEGE (hĕg'ā-ī, hē'gē), the eunuch employed by Xerxes the Great ("Ahasuerus") as keeper of the women in the king's harem (Esth. 2:3,8,15). Some think that "Hegai' 'is not a proper name but means "eunuch."

HEIFER, a young cow (Gen. 15:9; Deut. 21:3; I Sam. 16:2). Heifers were used in religious rites only in the ceremony of Deuteronomy 21:1-9.

HEIFER, RED (See Animals)

HEIR (See Inheritance)

HELAH (hē'là), one of the two wives of Ashur (ASV Ashhur), posthumous son of Hezron (I Chron. 4:5,7).

HELAM (hē'lăm, Heb. hēlām), a place in the Syrian desert E of the Jordan where David defeated the forces of Hadarezer, king of Aram-zobah (II Sam. 10:16,17). The exact location is unknown.

HELBAH (hĕl'bà, a fertile region), a town in the tribe of Asher from which the men of Israel failed to expel the Canaanites. Near the River Leontes in Lebanon (Judg. 1:31).

HELBON (hĕl'bŏn, fertile), a city of northern Syria, celebrated in ancient times for its wine (Ezek. 27:18). Some think that a village in the Anti-Lebanon about 13 miles NW of Damascus is intended.

HELDAI (hĕl'dā-ī). 1. The captain over 24,000 men whose duties were in the 12th month under David (I Chron. 27:15). Probably the same as Heled in I Chronicles 11:30 and as Heleb in II Samuel 23:29.

2. One of three noble Jews who brought gold and silver from Babylon, and who were to surrender the metal to Zechariah (Zech. 6:9-15) that he might make crowns for Joshua the high-priest. (The name is spelled "Helem" in 6:14).

HELEB (hē'lĕb), one of David's valiant men of war (II Sam. 23:29). See HELED and HELDAI.

HELED (hē'lĕd), a mighty man of David's army (I Chron. 11:30). See HELEB and HELDAI.

HELEK (hē'lĕk), the second son of Gilead of the tribe of Manasseh and head of a family (Num. 26:30; Josh. 17:2).

HELEM (hē'lĕm, health). 1. A man of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:35), called Hotham in verse 32.

2. An ambassador, mentioned only in Zechariah 6:14; but also certainly the same person as Heldai (Zech. 6:10).

HELEPH (hē'lĕf, change), an ancient village on the border of Naphtali (Josh. 19:33). Perhaps on the site now called Beitlif in Galilee.

HELEZ (hē'lĕz). 1. A man of Judah, of the family of Hezron, but also of Egyptian descent (I Chron. 2:39).

2. One of David's mighty leaders, called a "Paltite" in II Samuel 23:26, but "Pelonite" in I Chronicles 11:27; an Ephraimite (I Chron. 27:10).

HELI (hē'lī, Heb. 'ēlî), the father of Joseph, the husband of Mary, in the genealogy of Jesus in Luke 3:23. According to another view, he is the father of Mary, the mother of Jesus, a view that is reached by punctuating the Gr. differently. See GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

HELIOPOLIS (hē-lĭ-ŏp'ō-lĭs, Heb. 'ôn, Gr. Heliopolis, city of the sun), a city near the S end of the Delta of the Nile, the site of a temple to the sun built by Amenophis I. It was a very old and holy city, with a learned school of priests. Joseph's father-in-law belonged to the priests of the Sun Temple (Gen. 41:45; 46:20). In the intertestamental period Onias built a Jewish Temple there. The modern site is the village El-Matariye.

HELKAI (hĕl'kā-ī, perhaps an abbr. of Helkiah), a priest of the Jews in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:15).

HELKATH (hĕl'kăth, Heb. helqath, a field), a town on the southern border of the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:25) given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. 21:31). Later called Hukok (I Chron. 6:75). Site uncertain .

HELKATH HAZZURIM (hĕl'kăth hăz'ū-rĭm, the field of the sharp knives), a piece of ground near the pool of Gibeon where the men of Joab fought with an equal number of the men of Abner, and all 24 fell down slain (II Sam. 2:12-16).

HELL. The real existence of hell is irrefutably taught in Scripture as both a place of the wicked dead and a condition of retribution for unredeemed man.

No formal statement of immortality occurs in the Old Testament, yet it constantly alludes to the "cutting off" of the wicked from God. While the word, Sheol, does not pointedly refer to a definitive doctrine of endless retribution, but rather to a shadowy existence beyond the grave, it nevertheless reflects the belief in a future and continued existence. Translated by KJV and ERV as "hell," the word carries the connotation of doom, hopelessness and futility. "The wicked in a moment go down into Sheol" (Job. 21:13). "The wicked shall be turned into Sheol, and all the nations that forget God" (Ps. 9:17). "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in Sheol, behold thou art there" (Ps. 139:8). "The way of life is above the wise, that he may depart from Sheol beneath" (Prov. 15:24). The etymology of the word is uncertain. It may be translated merely as "grave" or "abode of the dead," or it may be given the stronger connotation of "hell." However it may be translated, its meaning is clear — it represents the place of future retribution (Job 26:6), the abode of the wicked (Prov. 23:4, Job 21:30), a place of punishment (Prov. 15:11). It is inseparably associated with spiritual death (Ps. 89:48), and is contrasted with the destiny of the righteous (Ps. 17:15).

In the Inter-Testamental period, both apocryphal literature and Rabbinical teaching continued the development of the association of immortality and retribution until, during the New Testament times, two words were used: Hades (Gr. hádes) and Gehenna (Gr. geénna). Gehenna, used 13 times in the New Testament, and with but one exception (James 3:6) always by Christ, indisputably refers to the place of retributive suffering.

The word derives its meaning from the Hebrew, ge-hinnom (the valley of Hinnom) which was a pit into which refuse was dumped. A site which had long been contemptuously regarded in the Hebrew mind, as when Josiah dumped the filth of Jerusalem (II Kings 23:10) to be burned, and in which the bodies of executed criminals were tossed, it had become a technical term for unending torment, and is so used in Matthew 10:28 and Mark 9:43. Hades, used by the Septuagint translators for Sheol, and thus somewhat undefined in early usage, undeniably assumed definiteness of meaning by Christ's use of it in Matthew 11:23 (Luke 10:15), where it represents destruction, in Matthew 16:18, where it is synonymous with the kingdom of evil, and in Revelation 1:18, where it represents confinement in prison and is identified with death. In each of these cases, the reality of hell is established through Christ's reference to it.

The nature of hell is indicated by the repeated reference to everlasting punishment (Matt. 25:46); everlasting fire (Matt. 18:8); everlasting chains (II Thess. 1:8); the eternal fire (Jude 7); the pit of the abyss (Rev. 9:2,11); outer darkness (Matt. 8:12); the wrath of God (Rom. 2:5); second death (Rev. 21:8); eternal destruction from the face of God (II Thess. 1:9); and eternal sin (Mark 3:29). While many of these terms are symbolic and descriptive, they connote real entities, about which existence there can be no doubt.

The duration of hell is explicitly indicated in the NT. The word "everlasting" (aionios) is derived from the verb aion, signifying an "age" or "duration." Scripture speaks of two aions, or ages: the present age and the age to come (Matt. 12:32; Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30; Eph. 1:21). The present age — this world — is always contrasted with the age to come as temporal, while the future age is to be endless. As the everlasting life of the believer is to be endless, just so the retributive aspect of hell refers to the future infinite age. In every reference in which aiōnios applies to the future punishment of the wicked, it indisputably denotes endless duration (Matt. 18:8; 25:41,46; Mark 3:29; II Thess. 1:9; Heb. 6:2; Jude 6).

Hell is, therefore, both a condition of retribution, and a place in which the retribution occurs. In both these aspects, the three basic ideas associated with the concept of hell are reflected: (1) absence of righteousness, (2) separation from God, and (3) judgment.

The absence of personal righteousness, with its correlative of the presence of personal unrighteousness, renders the individual unable to enter felicitude with the holy God (Mark 3:29). The eternal state of the wicked, therefore, will involve a separation from the presence of God (John 3:36). The concept of judgment is heightened by the note of finality in the warnings against sin (Matt. 8:12). It is a judgment, however, against man's sinful nature — still unredeemed though Christ died — (Matt. 25:31-46) and is decisive and irreversible.

When all else has been said about hell, however, there is still the inescapable fact of Scripture — it will be a retributive judgment upon the spirit of man — the inner essence of his being. The severity of the judgment will be upon the fixed character of his essential nature — his soul, which will involve the eternal loss of exclusion from Christ's kingdom and fellowship with God. HELLENISTS (hĕl'ĕn-ĭsts), non-Greeks who spoke Greek, a term used specially of Jews who made Greek their tongue, and with it often adopted Greek ideas and practices (Acts 6:1; 9:29). The KJV has Grecians, RSV Hellenists.

HELMET (See Arms, Armor)

HELON (hē'lŏn, valorous), father of Eliab, a leading man of Zebulun at the first census (Num. 1:9).

HELPMEET, now often used as one word, meaning a helper, generally a wife; but in Genesis 2:18 it is two words. "I will make him a help, meet for him," i.e., suitable for or answering to him. It is often changed to "helpmate," which means the same.

HELPS. In the NT there are four lists of "gifts" which God has given to His Church (Rom. 12:6-8, I Cor. 12:7-11, 28-31, and Eph. 4:11,12) and these are not to be confused with the officers who are listed elsewhere. "Helps" are mentioned only in I Corinthians 12:28, and the Greek word occurs only here. It means protector or assistant, and probably refers to the ability to perform helpful works in a gracious manner .

HEMAM (hē'măm), a grandson of Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:22). "Homam" in I Chronicles 1:39.

HEMAN (hē'măn, Heb. hêmān, faithful). 1. A grandson of Judah through Zerah (I Chron. 2:6). He is listed as one of the most notable wise men, though Solomon was wiser.

2. The first of the three Levites whom David appointed to lead in the musical services (I Chron. 6:33). He was "the king's seer in the words of God to lift up the horn" (I Chron. 25:5) and had 14 sons and three daughters.

3. Psalm 88 is attributed to Heman the Ezrahite, and if "Ezrahite" means "Zerahite," as many think, he may be the same as 1. above.

HEMATH (hē'măth). In Amos 6:14 "Hemath" should be "Hamath" as in ASV. In I Chronicles 2:55 "Hemath" should be Hammath" as in ASV. He was the father of Rechabites (Jer. 35:2-18). See HAMATH.

HEMDAN (hĕm'dăn, Heb. hemdān, pleasant), an early Horite in the land of Seir, who discovered hot springs in the wilderness (Gen. 36:26). In I Chronicles 1:41 the Heb. text and RV have "Hamran, but KJV has "Amram." Hemdan is probably the original form.

HEMLOCK (See Plants)

HEM OF A GARMENT, the fringes or tassels on the borders of the Jewish outer garment (Num. 15:38,39) containing a thread of blue. The word "hem" (Exod. 28:33,34, 39:24-26) should be "skirt." Cf. ASV in loco. To "touch the hem (ASV "border") of his garment" (Matt. 9:20,21, 14:36) denoted a reverent approach, not daring to lay hold of Him, but having faith in the efficacy of His miraculous power.

HEN (Heb. hĕn, favor), a son of Zephaniah (Zech. 6:14), but RV margin has "for the kindness of the son of Zephaniah," in which case the son's name disappears.

HEN (Gr. órnis), a general term for "bird," "fowl," etc. (Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34).

HENA (hēn'a, Heb. hēna'), a city on the south bank of the Euphrates, about 180 miles NW of ancient Babylon. It was mentioned by Rabshakeh, along with four other cities whose gods could not save them from destruction by Sennacherib, as a proof that Jehovah could not save Jerusalem (II Kings 18:34, 19:13, Isa. 37:13).

HENADAD (hĕn'ā-dăd, favor of Hadad), head of a family of Levites who helped Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:9), and who in the next century helped Nehemiah in building (Neh. 3:18,24).

HENOCH (See Enoch)

HEPHER (hē'fĕr, pit, well). 1. Head of the family of the Hepherites (Num. 26:32). His son Zelophehad had five daughters who were commanded to marry within their tribe so as not to alienate any of the tribal property of Manasseh to another tribe (Num. 27:1-8, 36:1-9).

2. A son of Ashhur (KJV Ashur), the founder of Tekoa (I Chron. 4:5,6).

3. One of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:36) from Macherah, a place otherwise unmentioned and unknown.

4. A royal city in Canaan listed among the 31 which Joshua conquered (Josh. 12:17). The land of Hepher (I Kings 4:10) was SW of Jerusalem.

HEPHZIBAH (hĕf'zī-bà, Heb. hephtsî-vâh, my delight is in her). 1. Wife of King Hezekiah (II Kings 21:1) and mother of Manasseh.

2. A symbolical name given to Zion (Isa. 62:4).

HERB (See Plants)

HERD. Israel, before Joshua's time, like the Bedouin of today, was a nomadic people, and after the conquest of Canaan continued to be a pastoral people for the most part. For the property of such a people see Job 1:3 or 42:12. The herds consisted of the larger animals, as contrasted with the flocks of sheep, goats, etc. The cattle were used in plowing and threshing, and for sacrifice, but were not commonly fattened for food, though in contrast, see Ezekiel 39:18.

HERDMAN. Hebrew has three words rendered herdman in the Bible: bôqēr, a cowherd (Amos 7:14); rō'eh, a general term for any kind of herdman (Gen. 13:7,8; 26:20); nōqēdh, one who spots or marks the sheep, hence a herdman (Amos 1:1). Herdmen generally did not own the sheep; they were hirelings.

HERES (he'rez, sun). 1. A district around Aijalon from which the Amorites were not expelled (Judg. 1:35). The meaning is uncertain.

2. A place E of the Jordan from which Gideon returned after his defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. 8:13).

3. An Egyptian city (Isa. 19:18). Undoubtedly Heliopolis.

HERESH (hē'resh, dumb, silent), a Levite who early returned from captivity (I Chron. 9:15).

HERESY (hâr'ĕ-sē, Gr. haíresis, from vb. hairéo, to choose). 1. A sect or faction, not necessarily representing a departure from orthodox doctrine, as "sect of Sadducees" (Acts 5:17), "sect of Nazarenes" (Acts 24:5). The Pharisees are called "the straitest sect" (Acts 26:5). Christianity is called a heresy in Acts 24:14; 28:22.

2. A doctrine or sect representing a departure from sound doctrine (II Pet. 2:1).

HERMAS (hûr'măs, Gr. Hermás), a Roman Christian (Rom. 16:14), not to be confused with the writer of the "Shepherd of Hermas" in the second century.

HERMES (hûr'mēz). 1. The Greek name which is rendered "Mercury" in Acts 14:12. He was one of the mythological gods of Greece and Rome, and messenger of the gods.

2. One to whom Paul sends greetings in Romans 16:14, of whom nothing else is known.

HERMOGENES (hûr'mŏj'ē-nēz, Gr. Hermogénes, born of Hermes), one of the professed Christians in Asia (probably at Ephesus) who deserted Paul when he was in trouble (II Tim. 1:15).

HERMON (hûr'mŏn, Heb. hermôn, sacred mountain), the mountain that marks the southern terminus of the Anti-Lebanon range. A line drawn from Damascus to Tyre will pass through Mt. Hermon at its middle point, and will practically coincide with the northern boundary of Palestine. The ridge of Hermon is about 20 miles long. It has three peaks, two of them rising over 9,000 feet. Hermon has borne several names: the ancient Amorites called it "Shenir" or "Senir" (Deut. 3:9; cf. Ps. 29:6 and Ezek. 27:5, where it is called a source of fir trees for Tyre); the Sidonians called it "Sirion" (Deut. 3:9 though Ps. 29:6 would apparently separate them); the Arabs call it "Jebel-esh-Sheikh" or "Mountain of the old man" perhaps because of its white head, but more likely because of its dignity.

Hermon is awe-inspiring whether seen from the NE at Damascus, the W from Lebanon back of Sidon, the SW from Nazareth or the SE from Hauran. Our Lord's transfiguration almost certainly occurred on its slopes, for He was at Caesarea-Philippi just S of the mountain only a week before. Before the advent of modern refrigeration, both Damascus and the summer resorts on Mt. Lebanon obtained ice from Hermon, and so it was often called "Jebel-et-telj," i.e., "Ice-mountain." Hermon is once called "Sion" (Deut. 4:48) not to be confused with Zion in Jerusalem, which is "Sion" in the NT. A.B.F.

HEROD (hĕr'ŭd). When Pompey organized the East in 63 B.C., he appointed Hyrcanus, second of that name, to be the high-priestly ruler of an ethnarchy comprising Galilee, Samaria, Judaea, and Perea. One Antipater, an Idumaean was Hyrcanus' senior officer or vizier. Pompey's arrangements were modified by Gabinius in 57 B.C. by the reduction of Hyrcanus' authority and the division of the ethnarchy into autonomous communities. Notable services rendered at Alexandria to Julius Caesar in 48 B.C., led to the restoration of Hyrcanus' authority and the appointment (47 B.C.) of Antipater to the procuratorship of Judaea. Antipater had, in fact, been the leading spirit in the policy which won Caesar's favor, and Antipater used his advantage with an astuteness which foreshadowed the career of his son. Antipater persuaded the now aged Hyrcanus to appoint Phasael, Antipater's eldest son, to the prefecture of Jerusalem, and Herod, his second son, to the governorship of Galilee.

When Antipater was murdered in 43 B.C., his two sons succeeded to his position in Hyrcanus' court. It was the year after Julius Caesar's assassination, and jubilant that Caesar's plan for a decisive campaign on the vulnerable eastern frontier of Rome was shelved, the Parthians, the perennial military problem of the northeast, were restive. In 40 B.C. they penetrated Palestine, carried off Hyrcanus, and drove Phasael, also a captive, to a death of suicide. Herod eluded both military action and Parthian treachery. He withdrew from Jerusalem, shook off pursuit by clever rearguard skirmishing near Bethlehem, and escaped to Egypt. Outwitting Cleopatra, and reaching Rome through the perils of winter voyaging, Herod set his case before Octavian and Antony. It is a remarkable tribute to his charm, daring, political acumen, and consummate diplomacy, that he won the support of both triumvirs who were so soon to divide in disastrous rivalry. The whole remarkable story is told drily in the first book of Josephus' Wars of the Jews.

The thirteen years which lay between the assassination of Caesar, and the emergence of Octavian as the victorious Augustus, after Antony's defeat at Actium in 31 B.C., were a time of paralysis and uncertainty throughout the Roman world. Herod saw in such confusion the opportunity for decisive action. Landing at Acre in 39 B.C., with only the promise of Roman favor, Herod went to claim his kingdom, and to unseat the Parthian puppet, Antigonus. Palestine, with its hill-country, deserts, and fenced cities, called for a variety of military ability. Herod showed himself the able master of varied types of war. The two years of tireless activity which made him, by the age of thirty-six, the master of his inheritance, revealed all the facets of Herod's amazing personality. He was a ruthless fighter, but at the same time a cunning negotiator, a subtle diplomat, and an opportunist. He was able to restrain his Roman helpers and simultaneously circumvent the Jews. Between 39 and 37 B.C. Herod revealed those qualities, if qualities they may be called, which enabled him for thirty-four years to govern subjects who hated him, within the major framework of Roman imperial rule, to steer, as the task demanded, a safe course through political dilemma, and to pursue a dual policy without ruinous contradiction.

In 30 B.C. Herod succeeded in retaining the favor of Octavian, shared though that favor had been with the defeated rival, Antony. He was confirmed in his kingdom, and for the rest of his life never departed from the policy of supporting the emperor, and in all ways promoting his honor. Restored Samaria was called Sebaste, the Greek rendering of Augustus; Caesarea was built to form a harbor on the difficult open coast of Palestine, to provide Rome with a salutary bridgehead and base on the edge of a turbulent province, and to make a center of Caesar-worship in the land of the nationalistic and monotheistic Jews.

Simultaneously Herod followed a policy of Hellenization, establishing games at Jerusalem, and adorning many of the Hellenistic cities of his domains. At the same time Herod sought to reconcile the Jews, who hated his pro-Roman and Hellenizing policies, and who never forgave his Edomite blood. During the great famine in Judaea and Samaria of 25 B.C., Herod spared no trouble or private expense to import Egyptian corn, and in the eighteenth year of his reign (20 B.C.) began the great Jerusalem temple, which was forty-three years under construction (John 2:20). Nothing he did served to win metropolitan Jewry. It was Herod's policy to crush the old aristocracy, married though he was to Mariamne, the heiress of the Hasmonaean house. He built up a nobility of service, drawing upon both Jews and Greeks. He sought subtly to channel messianic ambitions of the baser sort in his direction by encouraging the political party of the Herodians (Mark 3:6; 12:13 et al.), whose policy seems to have been the support of the royal house and a Hellenized society. Politically, this royalist group was descended from the old Hellenizing apostates whom Jason called Antiochians (II Macc. 9:9-14). They were probably Jews of the Dispersion, from whom Herod also recuited his subservient priesthood, and were Sadducees in religion. Such varied patronage and support produced checks and balance in the composite society of Herod's kingdom which made for stability of rule, but of course did nothing to reconcile the divided elements of the populace, metropolitan and Hellenistic Jews, Sadducees and Pharisees, people and hierarchy. It was only the common challenge of Christ which drew together such dissidents as Sadducee and Pharisee, and the Romans and the priests, just as it healed, according to a surprising footnote of Luke (23:12), a rift between Antipas and the procurator.

To manage a situation so complex and to survive, demanded uncommon ability, and an ordered realm. Of Herod's ability there is no doubt, and with his foreign mercenaries, his system of fortresses, and the centralized bureaucracy which he built in imitation of the Ptolemaic system, he gave Palestine order, and even opportunity for economic progress. At the same time Herod was a cruel and implacable tyrant. His family and private life was soiled and embittered by feuds, intrigue, and murder. The king's sister Salome seems to have been in league with Herod's son Antipater by Doris, his first consort, against Mariamne, daughter of Hycranus II, the king's favorite wife. Mariamne was put to death in 29 B.C., and her two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, in 7 B.C. Antipater himself was put to death by Herod in the last days of his reign. He died in 4 B.C. The murder of the Innocents recorded in the Gospels falls within the context of his final madness. Josephus' grim picture (Wars, I:33:5) of the physical and mental degeneration of the aging king is detailed enough for diagnosis. It is the picture of an arteriosclerotic, the former athlete and "hard liver," increasingly prone to delusions of persecution, and uncontrollable outbursts of violence, the results of hypertension and a diseased brain.

Herod's will divided the kingdom. Archelaus, son of Malthace, a Samaritan woman, took Judaea and Idumaea, by far the choicest share. Herod Antipas, of the same mother, received Galilee and Peraea, and Philip, son of a Jewess named Cleopatra, took Ituraea, Trachonitis and associated districts in the northeast. Archelaus, who inherited his father's vices without his ability, took the title of king and bloodily quelled disorders which broke out in Jerusalem. The result was a wide uprising, which required the intervention of Varus, governor of Syria. It was at this time that the Holy Family returned from Egypt (Matt. 2:22): "But when Joseph heard that Archelaus was reigning as King over Judaea in the place of his father Herod, he was afraid to go there . . . but withdrew into Galilee and came to a town called Nazareth."

It was imperative for Archelaus to reach Rome, and secure from Augustus confirmation of his position, before the situation in Palestine could be presented in too lurid a light by his enemies. Archelaus' petition was opposed in person by Herod Antipas, who made much of Herod's testamentary incapacity, and by a Jewish embassy. Somewhat surprisingly, Augustus declared in favor of Archelaus, though he denied him the royal title. The incident provided the background for the Parable of the Pounds, related by Luke (19:11-27). Archelaus was the "nobleman" who went "to receive a kingdom," and the facts were no doubt brought to mind by the sight of the palace which Archelaus had built at Jericho, where the story was told. (Josephus. Ant. 17:13:1). It is a striking illustration of the fact that the incidental machinery of a parable is exempt from theological and moral significance. It is a canon of such exegesis that the main point only must be disengaged, and no significance attached to pictorial and background detail. Archelaus maintained his stupid and tyrannical reign for the ten years. In A.D. 6, a Jewish embassy finally secured his deposition and banishment to Gaul. Herod I first built the palace at Jericho. It was burned down at the time of his death, but rebuilt and restored by Archelaus. It was discovered and excavated in 1951. Judaea fell under procuratorial rule. Coponius, a Roman knight, was appointed governor (Josephus B.J. 2:8). A tax-census was the first administrative necessity, and this precipitated the revolt of Judas of Gamala, and the emergence of the Zealots as a sinister force in Palestinian politics.

Herod Antipas (the word is an abbreviation for Antipater) equalled his father's long reign. "That fox," Christ called the ruler of Galilee, and the name has reference to the Herodian cunning, the subtle diplomacy, and astute management of a difficult situation, which enabled Antipas to retain his puppet position and petty royal power until A.D. 39. It was probably some time before A.D. 23, that Herod Antipas met the evil genius of his latter years, the dynamic Herodias, wife of his half-brother Philip. This brother, who is not to be confused with the son of Cleopatra, the tetrarch of Ituraea, was the son of an unnamed wife of Herod I. Some have said that this woman, who was the daughter of Simon the high-priest, was another Mariamne, but it is difficult to establish this. Philip lived quietly in Rome, and it was here that Antipas met Herodias, Philip's niece and wife, daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod I and Mariamne.

It is difficult to say who was primarily to blame for the notorious liaison which took back Herodias to Palestine as the de facto Queen of Antipas. She remained loyal to the tetrarch in his later misfortunes, though offered release by Caligula, and the immoral partnership of the twain seems to have been cemented by genuine physical attraction and community of temperament. But trouble dogged the union. Herod's rightful queen, daughter of Aretas, king of Nabataeans, heard of the liaison before the couple reached Palestine, and escaped first to the fortress of Machaerus, and thence to her father's capital of Petra, before her returning husband could detain her. Herod therefore came home to find a troublesome frontier war on his lands. Hence the celebration of his birthday, the tragic feast described in the Gospels, at the stronghold of Machaerus. Josephus is authority for this. Hence, too, the death of John the Baptist, for here, after his denunciation of Herod's sin, the preacher of the wilderness had been incarcerated. The crime so dramatically contrived was the final turning point in Herod's life. Until then, according to a strange remark in the Second Gospel (Mark 6:20), there had been some faint aspiration for good: "Herod feared John, knowing that he was a just man and a holy, and he respected him; and when he heard him he did many things, and heard him gladly."

The campaign against Aretas ended disastrously. Antipas was forced to appeal to Rome for help, and the task was assigned to Vitellius, governor of Syria. The affair dragged on until A.D. 37, when Tiberius died. A prey to that uncertainty which was increasingly to attend changes in the Roman principate, Vitellius stayed his hand, and Antipas never won revenge. Two years later, Antipas fell. He had been trusted by Tiberius, who appreciated the tetrarch's continuation of his father's pro-Roman policy, to which the foundation of Tiberias on Galilee was a solid monument. Tiberius, in the last year of his principate (A.D. 36), had even used Herod as a mediator between Rome and Parthia. Presuming upon this notable imperial favor, and incited by Herodias, Herod petitioned Caius Caligula, Tiberius' successor, for the title of king. He was, however, deposed by that incalculable prince, on a suspicion of treasonable conduct, a charge levelled successfully by Herod Agrippa I, his nephew. Herodias accompanied the man she had ruined morally and politically into obscure exile. Salome her daughter, the dancer of the Machaerus feast, married her uncle Philip, tetrarch of Ituraea, about A.D. 30. After Philip died in A.D. 34, she married her cousin Aristobulus, king of Chalcis, north of Abilene in the Anti-Lebanon hill-country.

Philip of Ituraea seems to have been the best of Herod's three surviving sons (Josephus, Ant. 17:2:4; B.J.II 9). His remote province insulated him from some of the problems of Jewry, but he seems in his own person to have been a man of generous mold and notable justice. He beautified the town of Caesarea Philippi, and marked his continuation of the Herodian pro-Roman policy by naming the northern Bethsaida Julias after Augustus' unfortunate daughter.

The deceased Philip's vacant tetrarchy was the first foothold of the third Herod to be mentioned in the NT (Acts 12:1). Herod Agrippa I, named after the able minister of Augustus, grandson of Herod I, son of Aristobulus, and brother of Herodias, had been brought up in Rome under the protection of Tiberius' favorite son, Drusus. He had all the Herodian charm and diplomatic subtlety, which explains how, as the boon companion of the mad Caligula, he was yet able to deter that prince from the final folly of setting up his statue in the Temple at Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. 18:8). Such an achievement demanded not only clever wits, but courage of no mean order. In A.D. 37, on Caligula's succession, Herod Agrippa was granted Philip's realm. To this was added Galilee and Peraea, on the exile of Antipas and Herodias. The malicious word in Rome had paid rich dividends. With his grandfather's subtlety, Agrippa knew how to survive a succession. When Caligula was assassinated in A.D. 41, Agrippa, who had played his cards with remarkable astuteness, remained in the favor of Claudius, Caligula's successor, who turned over to Agrippa's control the whole area of his grandfather's kingdom. He succeeded to such dignity, moreover, with the consent and the favor of the Jews. The old hostility to the Idumaean dynasty had vanished, and even the Pharisees were reconciled. Hence the gesture of favor in the first royal persecution of the Church. Luke's account (Acts 12:20-23) of the king's shocking death in his royal seat of Caesarea, is substantiated by Josephus' longer narrative (Ant. 19:8:2). Josephus looked upon Herod with admiration as the last great Jewish monarch, and the correspondence between the historian's account and Luke's unfavorable notice is remarkable. In both accounts the pomp and circumstance of Agrippa's royal estate is notable. Agrippa died in A.D. 44, and his eminence was therefore brief. Whether it would have long survived under a less indulgent prince, or under an imperial government which had already vetoed his proposal to fortify Jerusalem, is a matter which his early death left undecided. It is possible for modern medicine to diagnose the intestinal complaint described by Luke in the accepted terminology of his profession. A symptom is a visible, violent, and agonizing peristalsis. Luke uses a single adjective for the cause of death, admitting more readily this metaphorical significance than the English phrase "eaten of worms." Agrippa was only fifty-four years of age. After his death Palestine fell wholly under Roman rule, a take-over facilitated by the consolidation under Agrippa of the old Herodian domains. There was considerable disorder over the next four years.

Agrippa left a teen-age son, who was made by Claudius the king of Chalcis in A.D. 48. This was a Lebanese ethnarchy. In A.D. 53, the territory of Philip the tetrarch and Lysanias were added to this realm, together with an area on the western side of Galilee, including Tiberias. The appointment carried the title of King, so in 53 Agrippa became Agrippa II, last of the Herodian line. He appears only in the brilliantly told story of Acts 25, where, as Festus' guest, he heard the defense of Saint Paul. After the fashion of Eastern monarchies, Agrippa was married to his sister Bernice. Another sister was the wife of Antonius Felix, the procurator of Judaea, whom Festus succeeded. This young woman was named Drusa, after the Roman protector of Agrippa I, Drusus, son of Tiberius. Drusilla, the diminutive, was a pet-name. Probably in 53, Drusilla was married to Aziz of Emesa, a principality north of Syria, which included the city of Palmyra. In the following year, significantly after Claudius' death, she yielded to the solicitations of Felix, Claudius' freedman, and that emperor's notorious appointment to the procuratorship of Palestine. In October 54, she became Felix' third wife. It was probably the influence of Agrippa II and Bernice, working through a Jewish party in Rome which had obscure connections with Poppaea, wife of Nero, which secured the dismissal of Felix. Drusilla and her son Agrippa appear to have resided in Pompeii, and possibly perished in the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79.

In the story of the examination of Saint Paul is seen a vivid and revealing picture of the deference Rome was prepared to pay to a puppet king, and indeed some of the respect which Rome undoubtedly owed to a remarkable royal house which had been a major bastion of Roman peace in the Middle East for three generations. In the king himself is seen a typical Herod of the better sort, royal, intelligent, pro-Roman, but vitally interested in Judaism, which, with live understanding, he saw to be the key to the history of his land.

With this event, which is difficult to date precisely, Agrippa and the Herodian line disappear from history. Festus died in A.D. 64. One brief reference in Josephus reveals that Agrippa lived on in the garrison town of Caesarea to see the vast ruin and destruction of his country in the Great Revolt of A.D. 66 to 70. So ended the Herods, an astonishingly able family, whose pro-Roman policy went far to postpone the inevitable clash between Rome and the Jews, and played, in consequence, an unwitting but significant part in holding the peace during the formative years of the Christian Church in Palestine. E.M.B.

HERODIANS (hĕ-rō'dĭ-ănz, Gr. Herodianoí), a party mentioned only three times (Matt. 22:16; Mark 12:13; 3:6) as joining with the Pharisees to oppose Jesus. Nothing more is known about them than what the Gospels state. It appears that they were neither a religious sect nor a political party, but Jews who supported the dynasty of Herod, and therefore the rule of Rome. The first time they are referred to (Matt. 22:16) they join with the Pharisees to destroy Jesus; the second time (Mark 12:13) they try to trap Jesus by asking Him whether it is proper to pay tribute to Caesar.

HERODIAS (hĕ-rō'dĭ-ăs, Gr. Herodiás), wicked granddaughter of Herod the Great who married her uncle Philip, but his brother Antipas saw her at Rome, desired her and married her. John the Baptist reproved Herod Antipas for his immoral action (Luke 3:19,20) and was put in prison for his temerity (Matt. 14:3-12; Mark 6:14-29). This did not satisfy Herodias, so by a sordid scheme she secured the death of John. Later, Antipas was banished to Spain. Herodias accompanied him, and died there.

HERODION (hĕ-rō'dĭ-ŏn, Gr. Herodíon), a Christian at Rome, kinsman of Paul and recipient of his greeting (Rom. 16:11).

HERON (hĕr'ŏn, Heb. 'ănāphâh), a bird mentioned only in Leviticus 11:19 and Deuteronomy 14:18, where they are listed among the birds Israelites could not eat. They were of three kinds — white, blue, and brown. Their wing-sweep was from 3½ to 5 feet. They lived principally on fish and reptiles, and could be found in abundance in the swamps of Lake Huleh, on the Jordan, the Kishon, and the seacoast of Palestine.

HESED (hē'sĕd, mercy), father of one of Solomon's officers (I Kings 4:10).

HESHBON (hĕsh'bŏn, Heb. heshbôn, reckoning), an ancient city of the Moabites lying nearly 20 miles E of the Jordan. Sihon, king of the Amorites in the days of Moses took this and the surrounding country from the Moabites, and Israel in turn took it from Sihon (Num. 21:21-31). Sihon's territory, of which Heshbon was the capital, reached northward from the Arnon to the Jabbok, at the strong border of the Ammonites. The tribe of Reuben asked Moses for this land as it was suitable for cattle, and Moses granted their request; so, three hundred years later (1260 B.C.) when the Ammonites made war against Israel, Jephthah taunted them (Judg. 11: 12-28) with the fact that their god Chemosh was not able to stand against Israel for all those centuries. Heshbon and its suburbs were given to the Levites (I Chron. 6:81). Isaiah's prophecy of doom upon Moab (Isa. 15:4; 16:8,9), describes the normal fertility of the land around Heshbon, and the fact that it had gotten back into the hands of Moab before Isaiah's time; and when Jeremiah, a century later pronounced his dooms, Heshbon was still standing, though to be judged of Jehovah (Jer. 48:2-35; 49:3). The city still stands, but it is a ruin. It is known as Hesbān.

HESHMON (hĕsh'mŏn), a town on the S boundary of Judah (Josh. 15:27).

HETH (hĕth, Heb. hēth), great-grandson of Noah through Ham and Canaan (Gen. 10:15) and progenitor of the great Hittite people. They are sometimes called "sons of Heth" (Gen. 23:3), "daughters of Heth" (Gen. 27:46), but generally "Hittites" i.e. "terrible." For many centuries their records, except as recorded in the Bible, were lost; but now they are well known to archaeologists and are reckoned with the Babylonians and the Egyptians as one of the great peoples of the time. See HITTITES.

HETHLON (hĕth'lŏn, Heb. hethlôn), a place NE of Tripoli, Syria and just N of Mt. Lebanon from which one passes into the great plain of Coelo-Syria to the entrance of Hamath (Ezek. 47:15; 48:1); mentioned as the beginning of the northern boundary of restored Israel. The exact location is unknown today.

HEXATEUCH (hĕk'sa-tūk), "the six-volumed book," a term invented to include the book of Joshua with the Pentateuch in a literary unit, on the assumption that its component parts were combined by a common editor.

HEZEKI (hĕz'ē-kī, Heb. hizkî), a Benjamite mentioned only in I Chronicles 8:17. ASV Hizki.

HEZEKIAH (hĕz'ē-kī'a. Heb. hizqîyâh, Jehovah has strengthened), king of Judah for 29 years, from c. 724 to 695 B.C. His story is told in II Kings 18-20, II Chronicles 29-32, and Isaiah 36-39. He lived in one of the great periods of human history. The first Olympiad from which the Greeks dated their history occurred in 776 B.C.; Rome was reputed to have been founded in 753 B.C. Assyria, though approaching its end, was still a mighty power; and Egypt, though weak, was still strong enough to oppose Assyria. Judah's position, on the main road between Egypt and Assyria, was a very precarious one. Hezekiah's grandfather Jotham reigned at Jerusalem (755-739 B.C.) when Hezekiah was a child, and though he was in some ways a good king, he allowed the people to sacrifice and burn incense in the high places. Because of Judah's growing apostasy, Jehovah permitted the Syrians and the Northern Kingdom to trouble Jerusalem. In Hezekiah's youth and early manhood, his weak and wicked father Ahaz was king. He went so far as to follow the abominable rites of the Moabites by burning children in the fire (II Chron. 28:3), and this in spite of the warnings of the Prophets Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah. It was at this time when Israel and Syria were threatening that God gave through Isaiah the famous "virgin-birth" prophecy (Isa. 7:14). For a while Hezekiah was associated in the government with his father, but because of his father's incapacitation he was made active ruler. He began his reign, at the age of 25, in troublous and threatening times. Some counselled with Egypt against Assyria; others favored surrender to Assyria to save themselves from Egypt. Isaiah warned against trusting in foreign alliances. One of the first acts of Hezekiah was the cleansing and reopening of the temple, which his father had left closed and desecrated. After this was accomplished, the Passover feast was celebrated (II Chron. 30). The idolatrous altars and high places were destroyed.

From the fourth to the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign the Northern Kingdom was in trouble. Sargon finally destroyed Samaria and deported the people to Assyria. According to an Assyrian account, Sennacherib subjugated Judah (c. 715 B.C.). Hezekiah became ill, probably from a carbuncle, and almost died, but God granted him 15 years' extension of life (II Kings 20:1-11). After his recovery, Merodach-Baladan of Babylon sent an embassy ostensibly to congratulate him, but actually to persuade him to join a secret confederacy against the Assyrian power. Hezekiah, flattered by the attention he was being shown by the Babylonian ambassador, displayed to him his wealth, and was soundly rebuked by Isaiah (II Kings 20: 12-19). Assyria compelled Judah to pay heavy tribute, to obtain which Hezekiah even had to strip the plating from doors and pillars of the temple. Shortly after, Assyria decided to destroy Jerusalem, but God saved the city by sending a sudden plague which in one night killed 185,000 Assyrian soldiers. After Hezekiah's death, his son Manasseh succeeded him (II Kings 20:21). A.B.F.

HEZION (hē'zī-ŏn, vision), father of Tab-rimmon and grandfather of Benhadad, king of Syria (I Kings 15:18).

HEZIR (hē'zĕr, swine). 1. A priest in the 17th course of Aaronic priests (I Chron. 24:15).

2. One of the covenanters with Nehemiah in the revival (Neh. 10:20).

HEZRAI (hēz'rā-ī), a Carmelite, one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:35; RV has Hezro). In I Chronicles 11:37 both KJV and RV have Hezro.

HEZRO (See Hezrai)

HEZRON (hĕz'rŏn, enclosure). 1. A grandson of Judah through Perez (Gen. 46:12, etc.).

2. A son of Reuben (Gen. 46:9).

3. A place on the southern border of Judah (Josh. 15:3). Cf. HAZOR (3) which is the same place.

HIDDAI (hĭd'ā-ī), one of David's heroes (II Sam. 23:30). The same as Hurai of I Chronicles 11:32.

HIDDEKEL (hĭd'ē-kĕl, Heb. hiddegel), the Hebrew name of the Tigris river, one of the four rivers of Genesis 2:11-14. It was the eastern boundary of Mesopotamia and of Babylon and its bank seems to have been a resort of Daniel (Dan. 10:4).

HIEL (hī'ĕl, Heb. hî'ēl, probably, God liveth), a man of Bethel during the reign of Ahab who rebuilt Jericho and thereby brought upon himself and his sons the curse which Joshua had pronounced half a millennium before (I Kings 16:34; cf. Josh. 6:26).

HIERAPOLIS (hī'ĕr-ăp'ō-lĭs, Gr. Hierápolis, sacred city), a city mentioned only in Colossians 4:13, in the territory of ancient Phrygia but in the NT period a part of the Roman province of Asia. It received its name from the fact that it was the seat of worship of important deities. The location was on the right bank of the Lycus about eight miles above its junction with the Maeander. Tradition connects the Apostle Philip with the church, and Papias, notable disciple of John the beloved, was born there. Great ruins survive.

HIEROGLYPHICS (See Writing)

HIGGAION (hĭ-gā'yŏn, Heb. higgāyôn), a musical term occurring in Psalm 9:16, probably referring to the "solemn sound" of harp music that was to be played at that point. In Psalm 92:3 it is rendered "solemn sound."

HIGH PLACES (Heb. bāmâh, rāmâh, elevation). It seems to be inherent in human nature to think of God as dwelling in the heights. From earliest times men have tended to choose high places for their worship, whether of God, or of the false gods which men have invented. In Canaan these high places had become the scenes of orgies and human sacrifice connected with the idolatrous worship of these imaginary gods; and so, when Israel entered the Promised Land they were told to be iconoclasts as well as conquerors. "Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their figured stones (KJV 'pictures') and destroy all their molten images, and demolish all their high places" (Num. 33:52). These figured stones bore upon themselves crude carvings, sometimes more or less like geometrical figures, or else talismans, or other signs presumably understood by the priests and used to mystify or terrorize the worshipers. Israel partly obeyed but largely failed in this work. In Judges 1:19-35 we read of the failures of eight different tribes to drive out the people of the land, and though "the people served Jehovah all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders" who outlived Joshua (Josh. 24:31; Judg. 2:7), they soon relapsed into idolatry, used the high places for the worship of Baalim, and "provoked Jehovah to anger."

Before God would use Gideon to drive out the Midianites (Judg. 6:25) Gideon had to throw down his father's altar to Baal and the image (Asherah) which was beside it. Before Solomon built the temple, there was a mixed condition of worship. The tent of meeting (i.e. the tabernacle) with most of its furniture was at the high place at Gibeon, several miles N of Jerusalem, though David had brought the ark to Jerusalem. Solomon went to the high place at Gibeon to offer sacrifice, and there God heard his prayer and granted him surpassing wisdom (II Chron. 1:1-13). Later some godly kings like Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:1) destroyed the high places, while others like Manasseh relapsed and rebuilt them (II Chron. 33:3). After Manasseh had been punished and had repented, he was restored to his throne, and resumed the temple worship, but the people "sacrificed still in the high places, but only unto Jehovah their God" (II Chron. 33:17). Through Manasseh's early influence, the people had gone so far into apostasy that they could not repent, but through the godliness of Josiah, especially after he had heard the law read (II Kings 22:8-20), the judgment was delayed till after the death of Josiah. His great "housecleaning" is described in II Kings 23:1-25. God's attitude toward the godly kings and toward the wicked ones like Ahab in the north and Ahaz and Manasseh in the south depended largely upon their attitude towards the high places. A.B.F.

HIGH PRIEST (See Priest)

HILEN (hī'lĕn), a city of Judah assigned to the Levites (I Chron. 6:58); spelled Holon in Joshua 15:51; 21:15.

HILKIAH (hĭl-kī'a, Heb. hilqîyâh, the portion of Jehovah), the name of seven persons mostly priests in Israel: 1. The father of Eliakim who was manager of Hezekiah's household (II Kings 18:18).

2. A Merarite Levite (I Chron. 6:45).

3. Another Merarite, door-keeper in David's time (I Chron. 26:11).

4. The high priest in the days of Josiah, king of Judah. It was he who found the book of the Law while cleaning the temple (thought by many to have been the book of Deuteronomy) and sent it to Josiah (II Kings 22,23; II Chron. 34).

5. A priest who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel 536 B.C. (Neh. 12:7).

6. The father of Jeremiah, dwelling at Anathoth (Jer. 1:1).

7. Father of Gemariah (Jer. 29:3), a priest who stood with Ezra at the Bible reading (Neh. 8:4).

HILL COUNTRY (Heb. giv'âh, har, 'ōphel), a term applied to any region of hills and valleys which could not quite be called mountainous, but in Scripture it generally applies to the higher part of Judaea (Luke 1:39,65) and in the OT to the southern part of Lebanon E of Sidon (Josh. 13:6). In Joshua 11:3, RV speaks of "the hill country" near Jerusalem where KJV has "mountains."

HILLEL (hĭl'ĕl, he has praised), the father of Abdon who judged Israel. He was from Pirathon, a hill-village in Ephraim.

HIN (See Weights and Measures)

HIND (See Animals)

HINGE, a contrivance which enables a movable part such as a door or a window to swing in its place, often used figuratively for something of cardinal importance. Ancient heavy doors swung upon "ball and socket" joints. In I Kings 7:50 it means the socket on which the doors turned. In Proverbs 26:14 the word is derived from a verb meaning to twist or to turn in pain or in laziness. Hinges as we know them today were unknown in ancient times.

HINNOM, VALLEY OF (hĭn'ŏm), more properly "the valley of the son of Hinnom," running southward from the Jaffa gate at the W side of Jerusalem, then turning eastward and running S of the city till it joined the valley of the Kidron. It was a part of the boundary between Judah on the S (Josh. 15:8) and Benjamin on the N (Josh. 18:16). No one knows anything of the "son of Hinnom" except that he lived before Joshua's time, and presumably owned the valley. It seems to have been a dumping ground and a place for burning. Here was Topheth (II Kings 23:10) where human sacrifices had been offered to Molech, and so it was later to be called "the valley of slaughter" (Jer. 19:6). The Hebrew name, transliterated into Greek geenna (or gehenna) becomes the word for "hell," used 11 times by our Lord and once by James (3:6). Our Lord is speaking of the final destination of the wicked; and probably "the lake of fire" (Rev. 19:20; 20:10,14,15; 21:8) is a description of the same terrible place. That the mythological name "Tartarus" was also used is implied in II Peter 2:4, where Peter uses a verb derived from "Tartarus" to mean "to cast down to hell." See GEHENNA. A.B.F.

HIP AND THIGH, used only in Judges 15:8 to denote the thoroughness with which Samson slew the Philistines.

HIRAH (hī'rà), a "friend" of Judah, living at Adullam (Gen. 38:1,12,20) SW of Bethlehem.

HIRAM (hī'rām, Heb. hîrām, sometimes also hûrām and hîrôm). 1. King of Tyre in the reigns of David and of Solomon, with both of whom he was on friendly terms. His father was Abibaal. Hiram is first mentioned in II Samuel 5:11, almost at the beginning of his reign, when he sent messengers to David with cedar-trees, carpenters and masons who built David a house. The wood was floated in rafts down the coast to Joppa, and then brought overland to Jerusalem. Hiram, an admirer of David, after David's death sent an embassy to Solomon (I Kings 5:1), of which Solomon promptly took advantage and arranged that Hiram should send him timber of cedar and fir from Lebanon. It is evident that Tyre had the hegemony of Phoenicia at the time, for the Sidonians (I Kings 5:6) are spoken of as servants of Hiram; and the "stone-squarers" (I Kings 5:18 KJV) were men of Gebal (modern Jebail) N of Beirut.

A century later Sidon seems to have become more powerful, for Ethbaal, who is reckoned by the genealogists as great grandson of Hiram, is called "king of Sidon" (I Kings 16:31). Both Solomon and Hiram were Semites, and were keen businessmen. Solomon not only supplied Hiram with vast quantities of wheat and olive oil annually for food (I Kings 5:11), but he surrendered to Hiram 20 "cities" of Galilee (9:10-13). When Solomon had finished building the temple (seven years) and his own palace (thirteen years), Hiram journeyed to Galilee and was greatly dissatisfied when he surveyed the cities, and he nicknamed them "Cabul," a term of uncertain origin which Josephus (Ant. 8:5:3) says means in the Phoenician tongue "not pleasing." Hiram and Solomon built a navy and supplied it with shipmen on the Red Sea. They made expeditions from Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah southward to Ophir, whence they brought gold (I Kings 9:28). They had also a "navy of Tarshish" on the Mediterranean which brought to them from afar "gold and silver, ivory, apes and peacocks" (I Kings 10: 22). No definite record is found of his death. He had a daughter who became one of Solomon's "seven hundred" (I Kings 11:1,3).

2. A worker in brass whom Solomon brought from Tyre to assist in the building of the temple (I Kings 7:13,14,40-45; II Chron. 2:13,14; 4:11-16). His mother was a woman of the tribe of Dan, who had married first into the tribe of Naphtali, then later a Tyrian man. The expressions "of Huram, my father's" (II Chron. 2:13) and "Huram, his father" (II Chron. 4:16) are of uncertain meaning.

HIRELING, laborer who works for his wages. He was ordinarily to be paid at once: "In his day thou shalt give him his hire" (Deut. 24:15). Cf. the parable of the 11th hour laborers (Matt. 20:1-6); but service might be for a longer time as when Jacob worked seven years for each of his wives and six years for his flocks and herds, all of which were his hire (Gen. 29:15-20,27,28, 30:28-36). A hireling from outside Israel could not partake of the passover (Exod. 12:45).

HITTITES (hĭt'ĭts, Heb. hittîm), as also the Mesopotamians and Egyptians (II Kings 7:6) were one of the three great powers confronting early Israel. Once held to be unreliable, the Biblical portrayals of Hittite dominance were first substantiated by discoveries at Carchemish on the Euphrates in 1871 and then totally vindicated by Hugo Winckler's excavations at Khattusa (Boghaz-koy) in Turkey, 1906-07. Ten thousand tablets from this ancient Hittite capital served to confirm Joshua's description of the entire western Fertile Crescent as "land of the Hittites" (1:4).
