IV Compilation. Psalms is organized into five books: 1-41, 42-72, 73-89, 90-106, and 107-150; and, since the same psalm appears in more than one collection — e.g., Pss. 14 and part of 40 (Book I) as 53 and 70 (Book II), and the latter halves of 57 and 60 (Book II) as 108 (Book V) — it seems likely that each compilation experienced independent existence. Furthermore, since the last psalm of each collection was composed with terminal ascriptions that were designed for the book as a whole (41:13; 72:18-20; 89:52; 106:48, and the entire 150th Psalm for Book V), it appears that the origins of these five concluding psalms provide clues for the compilation of their respective books. Psalm 41 was written by David; and, since the remaining psalms of Book I are also attributed to him (except for Ps. 1, which constitutes the book's introduction; Ps. 10, which combines with 9 to form one continuous acrostic; and Ps. 33, which has no title), it would appear that David himself brought together this first collection. He further composed Psalm 106 (cf. I Chron. 16:34-36); so that Book IV, with its liturgical nature (contrast the more personal character of Pss. 1-41), must likewise be traced to David's own hand, prior to his death in 970 B.C. Books II-III exhibit more of a national interest (cf. their stress upon Elohim, God transcendent, rather than upon the Lord's personal name, Jehovah). King Solomon (d. 930 B.C.), who was responsible for the doxology of 72:18-20, thus becomes the historical compiler of Book II (his reference to "the prayers of David," 72:20, seems to be due to his father's having composed over half of the chapters that make up Pss. 42-72). Book III, however, was completed and collected by unnamed Korahites soon after 586 B.C. (see above); for though the body of Psalms 88-89 was written by Solomon's Ezrahites, the title that is prefixed to both (cf. the inappropriateness of the description "song [joyful]" to Ps. 88 alone) designates the sons of Korah as its ultimate compilers (cf. its terminal strophe, 89:38-52, which they seem to have suffixed in the spirit of Ps. 88). Indeed, this third book includes several post-Solomonic and sixth century compositions; and, when combined with Books I-II, it constituted Israel's psalter of the Exile. Finally Book V, which parallels David's Book IV in liturgical interest but includes several post-Exilic (as well as early Davidic) psalms, came into being shortly after 537 B.C. It then remained for a Spirit-led scribe to bring Books IV and V into union with I-III, adding his own inspired composition of Psalms 146-150 as a grand halleluia for the entire Psalter. Since this last writing occurred in 444 B.C. (Ps. 147:13) at the time of Ezra's proclamation of the written law and reform of temple worship (Neh. 8-10), it may well be that Ezra himself executed the final compilation of the book (cf. Ezra 7:10).

V. Contents. Each of the 150 psalms exhibits the formal character of Hebrew poetry. This consists, not primarily in rhyme, or even rhythmic balance, but rather in a parallelism of thought, whereby succeeding phrases either repeat or in some way elaborate the previous line. The poems vary in content. Hermann Gunkel has proposed a number of categories, not all of which appear valid (see Section VI); but the following psalm-types do distinguish themselves, by subject or by their Hebrew titles. Certain portions (e.g., 34:11-16) exhibit a marked gnomic or wisdom character, much akin to Proverbs (cf. Pss. 37, 49, 73, 128, 133, and especially Solomon's Ps. 127). The title Maschil, "instructive"(?), which suggests a didactic or at least meditative quality, appears in 13 of the superscriptions. Included is the historical 78th Psalm (cf. the recited histories of Pss. 81, 105, 106). The title Michtam, "atoning"(?), introduces Psalms 16,56-60, perhaps because of reference to covered sins; and among David's most famous penitential psalms are the 32nd and 51st (cf. 38, 130, 143).

Most of the poems possess a lyric, singing quality and are entitled "psalm" (mizmôr, stringed accompaniment; 57 times) or "song" (shîr, joyful melody; 30 times). Their praises may be general Ps. 145) or specific (e.g., Pss. 19, 119, concerning God's revelation). The term Shiggaion (Ps. 7, Hab. 3:1), "dirge," suggests the emotion of grief and validates Gunkel's categories of both national and individual laments. Of related character are the imprecatory psalms. Such prayers for the overthrow of the ungodly, while never to displace the Christian's standard of love, yet constitute a necessary part of God's inspired Word. They describe God's abhorrence of sin (Pss. 101:8, 139:21), man's resignation of vengeance to God (37:8-9, 104: 34-35), divine rather than personal vindication (83:3-5, 92:11-15), and heaven's ultimate triumph (125:4-5; or 109:6-19, predicting Judas, Acts 1:20. Cf. Chalmers Martin, "The Imprecations in the Psalms," PTR I. (1903), 537-553). Particular significance attaches to the 17 specifically Messianic psalms, in the whole or in parts of which Christ either is referred to in the third person (8:4-8; 72:6-17; 89:3-4, 28-29, 34-36; 109:6-19; 118:22; 132:11-12), is addressed in the second (45:6-7; 68:18; 102:25-27; 110), or speaks Himself in the first person (2; 16:10; 22; 40:6-8; 41:9b-c; 69:4, 21,25; 78:2).

VI Use. Psalm titles in Books I-III contain a number of musical terms in Hebrew. Some of these designate ancient melodies, to which the poems may have been sung: Aijeleth Shahar, "The doe of dawn" (Ps. 22); Al-taschith, "Do not destroy," probably a vintage-song (Pss. 57-59,75; cf. Isa. 65:8); Jonath-elem-rechokim, "Dove of distant trees" (Ps. 56); Muth-labben, "Death to the son" (9); Shoshannim, "Lilies" (45, 69); and Shushaneduth, "Lily of testimony" (60, 80). Others preserve musical instructions, much of the significance of which is now uncertain: alamoth, "maidens, treble"(?) (Ps. 46), perhaps contrasted with sheminith, "[lower] octave" (6, 12); gittith, "the instrument from Gath"? (8,81,84); mahalath (leannoth), "grief (for afflicting)" (53,88); neginoth, "stringed instruments" (seven times, plus Hab. 3:19); nehiloth, "wind instruments" (Ps. 5); and selah, "lifting up" (71 times, not in titles but at the end of strophes; cf. 3:2,4,8), perhaps indicating a dramatic pause for musical effects (cf. higgaion selah, "meditation pause"(?) (9:16). A number of Israel's psalms had specific liturgical usage. The "songs of degrees" (Pss. 120-134) may have been chanted by pilgrims ascending to Jerusalem (cf. 121:1, 122:4). Psalm 92 was composed for sabbath use. The Hallel (113-118) accompanied the passover (cf. Matthew 26:30), and "The LORD reigneth (93-100) constitutes a liturgical series magnifying God's sovereignty. Gunkel, accordingly, proposes a category of "psalms for the enthronement of Yahweh." Sigmund Mowinckel even postulates an elaborate Hebrew new year's festival based on Babylonian analogies: the king, as Jehovah's "son," is said to have participated in various cult-dramas and processions, with a climactic reestablishment of God's kingship for another season. But while verses such as 24:7, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates . . . and the King of glory shall come in," probably do preserve references to David's historic procession to bring the ark of God into Jerusalem (II Sam. 6, cf. I Kings 8:6), Mowinckel's enthronement theory is both theologically unacceptable and historically unsupported (IB, IV,7; Harris, op. cit., II,69).

Paralleling Mowinckel's stress upon cultic origins is a modern emphasis upon a collective rather than individualistic understanding and use of Psalms. Yet while certain of its poems do exhibit group expression (particularly among the pilgrim songs, 124,126, even when using "I," 129), others manifest distinctly individualistic consciousness (1, 21,112,127). The compilation embraces not simply the congregational hymnbook of Solomon's temple but also the devotional heart beat of men like David, who "strengthened himself [against the crowd] in Jehovah his God" (I Sam. 30:6 ARV). The richest blessings of the Psalms flow from its affirmations of personal faith, "The LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want" (23:1).

PSALMS OF SOLOMON. One of the pseudepigrapha, extant in Greek, apparently a translation from a Heb. original, consisting of 18 psalms in imitation of the canonical psalms, probably written between 64 and 46 B.C. They relate to the afflictions of the Jews of that period, and are significant for the light they shed on Jewish Messianic expectations.

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (sū'dē-pĭg'rà-fà), books not in the Heb. canon or the Apocrypha, ascribed to earlier authors; including The Ascension of Isaiah, Assumption of Moses, Book of Enoch, Book of Jubilees, Greek Apocalypse of Baruch, Letters of Aristeas, III and IV Maccabees, Psalms of Solomon, Secrets of Enoch, Sibylline Oracles, Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch, Epistle of Baruch, and Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs. They are important for their disclosure of Jewish ideas in the intertestamental period.

PTOLEMAIS (See Accho)

PTOLEMY (tŏl'ĕ-mē, Gr. Ptolemaíos), the common name of the 15 Macedonian kings of Egypt whose dynasty extended from the death of Alexander the Great in 323 B.C., to the murder of the young Caesarion, son of Julius Caesar and Cleopatra, at Octavian's orders in 30 B.C. The first Ptolemy, surnamed Soter, 367 to 282 B.C., was a distinguished officer of Alexander, became satrap of Egypt in 323 B.C., and, as one of the Diadochi, or "Successors" of Alexander, converted his command into a kingdom. As a successor of the pharaohs, Ptolemy I took over the ancient administration of Egypt, and especially the theory glimpsed in the OT story of Joseph, that the ruler owned the land. Hence a vast and ramified, highly centralized bureaucracy, which became a permanent feature of Ptolemaic rule, prepared the way for the Roman imperial administration of Egypt, and contrasted with the Hellenistic policies of the rival Seleucid regime.

A mass of papyrological evidence provides a detailed picture of state control in the Ptolemaic system. In passing, it may be mentioned that Ptolemy I wrote a history of Alexander, which is most unfortunately lost. The second Ptolemy, surnamed Philadelphus, 308 to 246 B.C., consolidated the organization of the land. He was responsible for much of its remarkable financial system, including the most highly developed banking system of ancient times, a rigid machinery of control in commerce and industry, and a nationalized, planned, and budgeted economy.

Ptolemy I, reproduced from a silver tetradrachma of the period (323-283 B.C.).

In the reign of Ptolemy II there first erupted the long rivalry with the Seleucids of Syria over the Palestinian frontier, with Antioch inheriting the old role of the Hittites and Assyrians, and Alexandria continuing the old pharaonic policy in the northern approaches. Ptolemy II also instituted the cult of the divine ruler, a simple enough graft on old indigenous beliefs, a preparatory factor for Caesar-worship. The great city of Alexandria grew apace during this reign. Ptolemy II built the amazing Pharos lighthouse outside the twin harbors, and the Museum, the most notable center of culture and literature in the ancient world. He established the famous library, and cut a canal from the Red Sea to the Nile. This was the Golden Age of Ptolemaic Egypt.

The next reign, that of Ptolemy III, surnamed Euergetes I, 288 to 221 B.C., saw the high tide of expansion and the first premonitory symptoms of decline. They were in full view under the fourth Ptolemy, surnamed Philopator, 244 to 205 B.C., whose reign saw some significant native uprisings, and the loss of Nubia for a generation. There followed a century of dynastic strife, palace intrigue, anarchic minorities, and decline, during which Egypt survived through the strength of its natural defenses and its strategic isolation rather than through the worth and enlightenment of its leadership. Ptolemy XI, surnamed Alexander II, 100 to 80 B.C., was the last of the male line of Ptolemy I. He was killed by rioting Alexandrians, notoriously an unruly populace.

Ptolemy XII, surnamed Auletes or the Flute-player, 116 to 51 B.C., fled to Rome in the face of Alexandrian lawlessness, and the restoration of the king to his tottering throne by Gabinius, at the Senate's orders, was Rome's first significant intervention in the land, which the Republic, no less than Napoleon nearly 19 centuries later, saw to be the strategic key to the Middle East. The wife of Ptolemy XIII was Cleopatra VII, the famous bearer of the name. Domestic, and consequently political and dynastic strife between husband and wife, led to Caesar's intervention, after his rival Pompey had met his death in Egypt. Ptolemy XIV was an insignificant brother of Cleopatra, Ptolemy XV her ill-fated son by Caesar.

The great achievement of the Ptolemies was Alexandria, with all that its immense cultural institutions signified in the ancient world. Alexandria was creative and conservative. It preserved much of the literature of Greece, and but for the plague of Islam, which engulfed the land, would have preserved more. It produced great writers and scientists. It fathered the Septuagint. It created 'Alexandrianism,' which meant much in the literature of Rome. Alexandria always stood apart from Egypt. It was a Greek city, and its peculiar contribution to Hellenism was the gift to history and civilization of the first Ptolemies.

PUA (pū'à, Heb. pû'âh), another form of Puvah or Phuvah. A member of the family clan of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar. Num. 26:23.

PUAH, PUVAH (pū'à, pū'và), the name of one of the Hebrew midwives who refused to obey the edict of the Pharaoh to destroy the infant sons born of Hebrew women (Exod. 1:15-20).

PUBLICAN (See Occupations and Professions)

PUBLIUS (pŭb'lĭ-ŭs, Gr. Póplios), the chief person on the island of Malta (Melita) in the Mediterranean. He gave lodging and food to Paul and his companions after their shipwreck on the island's rocky coast. Paul also healed his father and many others (Acts 27:27-44; 28:7-10).

PUDENS (pū'dĕnz, Gr. Poúdes, modest), a Christian in the city of Rome who sends greetings to Timothy in Paul's last letter (II Tim. 4:21).

PUHITES (pū'hīts, Heb. pûthî, simple) family descended from Caleb, residing in Kiriath-Jearim (I Chron. 2:50,53).

PUL (pŭl, pōōl). 1. A king of Assyria, Tiglath-pileser III, who invaded Israel in the days of Menahem and was bribed to depart (II Kings 15:19), though he carried off captives (I Chron. 5:26).

2. A tribe or place in Africa, named between Tarshish and Lud (Isa. 66:19), conjectured to be Put.

PULPIT (pŭl'pit, Heb. mighdôl), a scaffolding, a platform, or a high object of any kind (Neh. 8:4), used primarily as a position from which to speak.

PUNISHMENT (pŭn'ĭsh-mĕnt). Death was the punishment for striking or even reviling a parent (Exod. 21:15,17); blasphemy (Lev. 24:14,16,23); sabbath breaking (Num. 15:32-36); witchcraft Exod. 22:18); adultery (Lev. 20:10); rape (Deut. 22:25); incestuous or unnatural connection (Lev. 20:11,14,16); kidnaping (Exod. 21:16); idolatry (Lev. 20:2). Cutting off from the people is ipso facto excommunication or outlawry, forfeiture of the privileges of the covenant people (Lev. 18:29). The hand of God executed the sentence in some cases (Gen. 17:14; Lev. 23:30; 20:3; Num. 4:15,18,20). Capital punishment was by stoning (Deut. 22:24); burning (Lev. 20:14); the sword (Exod. 32:27); hanging: the hanged were accounted accursed, so were buried at evening, as the hanging body defiled the land (Gal. 3:13; II Sam. 21:6,9); strangulation (not in Scripture, but in rabbinical writings). Other punishments; sawing asunder (Heb. 11:37); cutting with iron harrows (II Sam. 12:31; RSV, labor with harrows, etc.); precipitation (Luke 4:29; II Chron. 25:12; stripes, only 40 allowed (Deut. 25:2,3), therefore only 39 given (II Cor. 11:24); the convict stripped to the waist, received them from a three-thonged whip, either lying on the ground (Deut. 25:2), or in a bent position tied to a pillar.

If the executioner exceeded the number he was punished. Punishment in kind (lex talionis) was a common principle (Exod. 21:23-25), also composition, restitution of the thing or its equivalent (Exod. 21:19,30). Slander of a wife's honor was punished by a fine and stripes (Deut. 22:18,19). Crucifixion was not practiced till Roman times. Punishment for sin is widely recognized in the Bible, and is in the hands of God (directly, Gen. 4:1-16; Lam. 3:37-39; 4:6; Zech. 14:19; indirectly, I Pet. 2:14; everlasting punishment (Matt. 25:46). See PRISON. E.R.

PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING. The fact of everlasting punishment, for those who reject God's love revealed in Christ, is plainly stated in Matthew 25:46, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment (kolasin aionion) but the righteous into life eternal (zoen aionion)." In this saying Jesus is speaking of persons who, by their attitude toward his "brethren" had given evidence of their rejection of himself (vs. 45).

The same doctrine is explicit in the OT in Daniel 12:2. (See discussion of this passage in the article on Resurrection.) Here it is predicted that those not raised "to everlasting life" will be raised "to shame and everlasting contempt."

In Matthew 25:46 one and the same Greek word aionion (translated "everlasting" in one instance and "eternal" in the other) applies to the destiny of both the saved and the lost. The same word is used in the LXX of Daniel 12:2, translating the Hebrew word olam, and applying to the destiny of both classifications of men. There are no stronger words in Hebrew or in Greek with which to express infinite time than those designating the duration of the punishment of the wicked.

The final place of everlasting punishment is called the "lake of fire" (Rev. 19:20; 20:10,14,15). This is also called "the second death" (Rev. 2:11; 20:6,14,15). In this connection it should be remembered that "death" in biblical usage never means extinction or non-existence. Always the word designates a relative state of existence. That "the second death" is a state of conscious existence is evident from Revelation 14:9-11; 20:10.

"Hell" is an Anglo-Saxon word the root meaning of which probably is "the hidden." This translates the probable root meaning of the Greek Hades, Hades, thought to be derived from a, not, and the root of eidos, visible. Consequently "Hell" and "Hades" both probably have the root meaning of "The unseen realm."

In the KJV "hell" translates She'ol, or Sheol in the OT, and this corresponds to the fact that LXX regularly renders She'ol as Hades. There are competent scholars who argue that in the OT She'ol always means the physical grave. On this point more study is needed.

In the NT, however, Hades, translated "Hell," occurs five times in contexts in which it could not mean the physical grave, and there are none of the remaining five passages (Matt. 11:23, parallel to Luke 10:15, these two obviously figurative; Matt. 16:18; Rev. 1:18; 6:8, the last also figurative) in which the context demands any other meaning than "the unseen realm where the souls of all the dead are."

In Acts 2:27,31, Peter, quoting Psalm 16:10, points out that Christ's soul did not remain in Hades. It is entirely contrary to all Biblical assumptions to think of the soul of a godly person as being in the physical grave. The thought of Christ's soul being in Hades while his body was in the grave is found in the Apostles' Creed, and is supported by His word, "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Luke 23:43). See PARADISE.

Luke 16:19-31 gives considerable information about Hades, the invisible realm of the dead. The "rich man" is "in Hades," "in torments," and sees Lazarus "afar off" in the fellowship of Abraham (vs. 23), that is, in the part of Hades called "Paradise." But the "rich man" says, "I am tormented in this flame (vs. 24)," and he is told that he is separated from Paradise by "a great gulf" over which no man can pass, vs. 26." He is thus in that part of Hades which is 12 times (Matt. 5:22, 29,30; 10:28; 18:9; 23:15,33; Mark 9:43,45,47; Luke 12:5; James 3:6) called "Gehenna," and once (II Pet. 2:4) "Tartarus," for both of which, as well as for Hades, the KJV uses "Hell."

It is obvious that in Revelation 20:13,14, as well as in Acts 2:27,31 and Luke 16:23, discussed above, the word Hades, Hades, could not refer to the physical grave.

At the final resurrection Hades is to be completely emptied (Rev. 20:13). With the bulk of its remaining contents, i.e., those "not found written in the Book of Life," it will be "cast into the lake of fire" (Rev. 20:14,15).

The reason for eternal punishment is rejecting the love of God in Christ (John 3:18). "Light has come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light" (John 3:19).

God has given men the free offer of the Gospel (John 3:16) and the convicting work of the Holy Spirit (John 16:8,9). Jesus described the act of rejecting this work of the Holy Spirit as being "guilty of eternal sin" (Mark 3:29). J.O.B.

PUNITES (pū'nīts, Heb. pûnî), descendants of Puvah, of the tribe of Issachar (Num. 26:23; Gen. 46:13; I Chron. 7:1).

PUNON (pū'nŏn, Heb. pûnōn), a desert encampment of the Israelites marking the second stop after leaving Sinai (Num. 33:42,43). Eusebius identified it as being N of Petra, a penal colony where convicts were sent to mine copper, also called Phinon or Phainon. Eusebius is probably correct in his identification.

PUR (pūr, Heb. pl. pûrîm, lots), a Jewish festival celebrated on the 14th and 15th of the month Adar (Feb.-Mar.) commemorating the deliverance of the Hebrews from the plots of the wicked Haman in the post-Exilic period (Esth. 3:7; 9:26). So styled from the casting of the lot to determine the most expeditious time of Israel's mass murder.

PURIFICATION (pūr'ĭ-fĭ-cā'shŭn). That the concept of purity was deep within the religio-social structure of the children of Israel since very early times will come as no surprise to the student of the Bible. The attitude of Jewry as a whole, and of the Pharisees as a class finds expression in Mark 7:3,4. Religious purity was both ceremonial and ethical. Under the Mosaic law, ceremonial purification was required for four acts: (1) the birth of a child, removed through circumcision (if male) and the isolation of the mother for a varying period (Lev. 12:2ff); (2) contact with a corpse; the offering of the red heifer is prescribed for the sacrifice of purification (Num. 19:1-10); (3) certain diseases, as leprosy (Lev. 13:8); (4) uncleanness due to a running sore (Lev. 15). Family purity was guarded through strict relations concerning sex (Lev. 20:1-21; Deut. 22:20, 21). In the NT though there is a transference from the outward to the inner; there is no relaxing of the basic requirements for purity itself (Matt. 5: 27f; 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-11; I Cor. 5:9-13; 6:18-20; 7:8ff).

PURPLE (pûr'p'l, Heb. 'argāmān, Gr. porphýra). (Exod. 25:4; 26:36; 28:15; 35:6; Judg. 8:26; II Chron. 2:14; 3:14; Esth. 1:6; 8:15; S. of Sol. 3:10; Mark 15:17:20; Luke 16:19; Acts 16:4). Purple was a very costly dye extracted from the marine mulex trunculus, a marine mollusk, from which the Phoenicians were able to manufacture the dye. The shell was broken so that a small gland in the neck of the mollusk might be removed and crushed. The crushed gland gave out a milk-like fluid that turned purple or scarlet upon contact with the air. The shells of the mollusk from which purple is obtained can yet be seen strewn along the shore of Tyre and near the ancient dye-works of Athens and Pompei. Because of its extreme costliness, it became a mark of distinction to wear a robe of purple. In later times, ecclesiastical officials arrayed themselves in purple robes. In early times, royalty was so dressed. In very ancient times, the common people of the Sumerian civilization were forbidden on pain of punishment to wear the purple. The Saviour was dressed in mockery at His trial in a robe of purple (Mark 15:17). Lydia, Paul's first European convert, was a seller of purple (the purple dye) (Acts 16:14).

PURSE (Gr. ballánion), a rather finely finished leather pouch or bag which served as a "purse" in ancient times. The term translated "purse" in the KJV, Matthew 10:9, is the Gr. zone and refers to the Oriental girdle made of crude leather or woven camel's hair worn around the waist. Sometimes, these "girdles" were finely tooled, and contained "slots," in which gold and silver coins could be kept. If the "girdle" was made of cloth, then the money was placed within the folds themselves. Cf. Luke 10:4; 12:34.

PURTENANCE (pŭr'tĕ-năns, Heb. qerev), rendered "inwards" or "entrails" by the more recent versions (Lev. 1:9; 3:3; etc.).

PUT (pŭt, Heb. pût, Gr. Phoúd, variant from Phoút), the third son of Ham; as a nation, identified with Libya; the LXX renders Put as Phuge, "flight," in Nahum 3:9. Jeremiah identifies Put as being adept in the use of the shield (Jer. 46:9). Put has also been taken to signify Egypt.

PUTEOLI (pū-tē'ō-lē, Gr. Potíoloi, little wells or springs), a well-known seaport of Italy located in the Bay of Naples; it was the nearest harbor to Rome. It was the natural landing place for travelers from the East to Rome. In Acts 28:13-14 Luke reports that Paul landed there with the other prisoners when he was taken to Rome for trial. Paul and Luke and their party found Christian brethren there and enjoyed their hospitality for seven days before going on to Rome. The old ruins may still be seen in the northern part of the bay, including part of a pier Paul is supposed to have used. The modern name is Pozzuoli.

PUTIEL (pū'tĭ-ĕl, Heb. pûtî'ēl), the father-in-law of Eliezer, Aaron's son (Exod. 6:25).

PUVAH (See Phuvah)

PYGARG (See Animals)

PYRAMIDS (pēēr'ă-mĭds), approximately 80 tombs with superstructures of pyramidal form still in existence from ancient Egypt. Many are in an extremely poor state of preservation, though their original form may be discerned. The Egyptian Old Kingdom, especially Dynasties 3-4 (about 2700 B.C.) was in a particular sense the Pyramid Age, for in that period it was customary for royalty to be interred in such a tomb. The largest and best preserved of the pyramids date from that time, including the well-known pyramids of Khufu (Cheops), Khafre (Chephren), and Menkaure (Mycerinos) at Giza. The pyramids of the Old Kingdom range geographically from Abu Roash in the N to Meidum in the S, on the W side of the Nile, in accordance with the theological concepts of the Egyptians. C.E.D.

QUAIL (See Birds)

QUARANTANIA (kwŏr'ăn-tā'nĭ-à), the mountain where according to tradition Satan tempted Jesus to worship him (Matt. 4:8-10); Tell es-Sultân, a short distance W of OT Jericho.

QUARRIES (kwŏr'ēz, Heb. pesîlîm, graven images). "The quarries" are mentioned in a doubtful passage in Judges 3:19,26. The marginal readings in KJV and ASV suggest "graven images," a rendering supported by the authority of the Septuagint and the Vulgate. Some piece of local nomenclature and a lost tradition are no doubt involved. Perhaps the place was a dump for discarded and roughly broken idols. Perhaps "sculptured stones" is the correct translation, and the reference to Joshua's stones of commemoration by Jordan. The word "quarry" occurs in another disputed passage at I Kings 6:7. RSV says, probably correctly, that the stones were dressed "at the quarry."

QUARTUS (kwôr'tŭs, Gr. Koúartos), a Christian man of Corinth whose greetings Paul sends to the church at Rome together with those of Gaius and Erastus (Rom. 16:23). No doubt he was a friend and assistant of Paul and a worker in the Corinthian church. There is an old tradition that he was originally one of the seventy disciples or missionaries Jesus sent out in Palestine (Luke 10:1).

QUATERNION (kwà-tĕr'nĭ-ŭn, Gr. tetrádion), a detachment of four men (Acts 12:4). The "four quaternions" to whom the prisoner was committed were the four patrols who took the four watches of the night. Two, no doubt, watched inside and two outside the guardhouse.

QUEEN. Dowager queens, or mothers of the monarch, are those who appear in the most influential roles in the Biblical records: 1. Jezebel, princess of Tyre who, during the 22 years of her husband Ahab's reign, and during the 13 years' rule of her sons Ahaziah and Joram, exercised a strong influence in favor of Phoenician pagan cults (I Kings 16:28-II Kings 9:37 passim). 2. Athaliah, daughter of Jezebel, and a similar character, was the wife of Jehoram of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat. On the accession of her son Ahaziah (not to be confused with Ahaziah of Israel, his uncle), Athaliah exercised a dominant authority and after Ahaziah's assassination held the throne alone, securing her position by dynastic massacre (II Kings 11). 3. Bathsheba, mother of Solomon, widow of David and Uriah, demonstrated her decisive character in the situation following the death of David (I Kings 1).

Foreign queens mentioned in the OT are: 1. Vashti, the deposed queen of Ahasuerus of Persia (Esth. 1). 2. Esther, the Jewess, her successor, a brave woman whose situation, nonetheless, violated the tenets of the Law and demonstrated the compromised position of those who took no part in the movements of restoration headed by Ezra and Nehemiah. 3. Balkis, legendary name of the Queen of Sheba (I Kings 10). 4. Nehemiah 2:6 and Daniel 5:10 refer to unnamed queens.

In the NT are: 1. Bernice, or Berenice, sister of Agrippa II, and wife of her uncle, Herod, king of Chalcis (Acts 25 and 26). 2. Drusilla, wife of King Azizus of Emesa, whom she deserted to become the third wife of Felix, procurator of Judaea. E.M.B.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN (Heb. melekheth ha-shāmayim). Some controversy surrounds the philology and significance of this title, but it seems best to regard it as the female deity to whom, with their families' aid and connivance, Hebrew women made offerings (Jer. 7:18; 44:17-25). The most likely identification is with Ashtoreth, goddess of love and fertility, synonymous with the Assyrian and Babylonian Ishtar, and the Roman Venus. The "wailing for Tammuz" was associated with her cult (Ezek. 8:14). Its ritual was the license and obscenity characteristic of the eastern fertility cults, ever a temptation to the Hebrews, and the chief objective of the prophets' attack on paganism. E.M.B.

QUICKSANDS (Gr. Sýrtis), occurs once in the NT (Acts 27:17) where it is used in a geographical sense. The "Syrtes" (plural) were shoals and shifting sands lying in the waters between Tunisia, Tripolitania, and Cyrenaica. The Syrtis Major, the area which the skipper of the Alexandrian grainship sought so desperately to avoid, formed the SE corner of the great oblong bay (i.e. the Gulf of Sidra) while the Syrtis Minor formed the westerly end (i.e. the Gulf of Gabes). Underwater archaeology has confirmed the evil reputation held by this North African bay as a graveyard of ships.

QUIRINIUS (kwĭ-rĭn'ĭ-ŭs, Gr. Kyrénios). The reference to this Roman governor in Luke 2:2 has raised some historical difficulties, and WH brackets it as a gloss. If Luke wrote the words, and he probably did, a historian of such proved accuracy is not likely to have made a major mistake. The task devolves upon the commentator to sort out the facts with due consciousness of the gaps in our historical material. It is known that Quirinius ("Cyrenius" is an Anglicized form of the Greek rendering of the name) was governor of Syria A.D. 6-9, that Judaea was incorporated at the time, and a census taken which caused the rebellion of Judas (Acts 5:37). Abundant papyrological evidence from Egypt has established the 14 year cycle of the census in that province, and fixes A.D. 20 as a census year. This fixes Quirinius' later census in A.D. 6, and demands 9 or 8 B.C. for an earlier occasion, or at least 7 or 6 B.C. if account be taken of political and practical impediments not apparent today. The difficulty then arises that Sentius Saturninus, and not Quirinius, was governing Syria from 9 to 7 B.C., and Quinctilius Varus from 6 to 4 B.C. A clue to a solution lies in an inscription which states that P. Sulpicius Quirinius governed Syria twice. W. M. Ramsay offers the best solution of this puzzle. He suggests that Quirinius was in control of the foreign relations of Syria during the war with the Cilician hill tribe of the Homonadenses in 6 B.C. This is consistent with the term used, and with Roman policy. An enrollment in Herod's kingdom would thus be supervised by him. (See Sir W. M. Ramsay's remarkable book, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? esp. ch. XI.) The enrollment could have taken place in the autumn of 5 B.C., postponed thus by the dying Herod's devices of obstruction and procrastination. E.M.B.

RA (See Re)

RAAMAH (rā'ā-mà, Heb. ra'mā'), the fourth son of Cush and grandson of Ham (I Chron. 1:9); the father of Sheba and Dedan (Gen. 10:7; cf. I Chron. 1:9). The prophet Ezekiel identifies Raamah as one of the merchant tribes that traded in spices, gold and precious stones with Tyre (Ezek. 27:22).

RAAMIAH (rā'ā-mī'à, Heb. ra'amyâh, Jehovah has thundered), one of the companions of Zerubbabel who returned with him to Jerusalem from the captivity (Neh. 7:7); called Reelaiah by Ezra (Ezra 2:2). The text may be corrupt at this point.

RAAMSES (rā-ăm'sēz, Heb. ra'amsēs, Ra'mesēs), a Hebrew place name derived from the Egyptian royal name Ramesses. In the OT it appears first as the name of the district of the Delta in which Jacob and his sons were settled by Joseph (Gen. 47:11). (The LXX also reads Ramesse for the second "Goshen" of the Hebrew (and English) text of Gen. 46:28). Raamses and Pithom are the names given in Exodus 1:11 for the two store cities the Israelites were forced to build for the Pharaoh of the Oppression. From Raamses the Israelites began their exodus from Egypt (Exod. 12:37; Num. 33:3,5). At present there is fairly general agreement that Raamses is to be identified with Avaris-Tanis-Zoan, the modern San el Hagar in the northeastern part of the Delta, an identification which has considerable bearing upon the interpretation of the exodus. C.E.D.

RABBAH, RABBATH (răb'à, Heb. rabbâh, Gr. Rabbáth; in KJV twice Rabbath [Deut. 3:11; Ezek. 21:20]). The full name is rabbath benê 'ammôn, Rabbah of the children of Ammon. The only city of the Ammonites to receive mention in Scripture; therefore we may conclude its importance. It is first mentioned in connection with the "bed" or sarcophagus of Og, King of Bashan (Deut. 3:11). Rabbath lay E of the Jordan, and was not assigned to the tribe of Gad at time of the division of the land (Josh. 13:2-5). It disappears from history following the days of Joshua until the days of David who sent an embassage of consolation to Hanun king of the Ammonites because of the death of his father. The Ammonite monarch grossly insulted the messengers of David (II Sam. 10:1-6). The next spring Rabbah was besieged by the army of David. The city capitulated when Joab captured the city's water-supply. The prophetic utterances against Rabbath-Ammon are of interest. Jeremiah (49:2f) utters imprecatory judgment against Milcom, the chief Ammonite deity. Ezekiel pictures Nebuchadnezzar as pausing at Rabbah to decide his further course of action (Ezek. 21:20f). Amos predicts a "fire being kindled in the wall of Rabbah" (Amos 1:14). It seems to have been at Rabbah that Baalis, king of the Ammonites, concocted the plot which was to cost Gedaliah, the provisional governor for the Babylonians, his life (Jer. 40:14f). Subsequently, Rabbah was captured by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 B.C.), who changed its name to Philadelphia. It later became the seat of Christian Bishops. It is now known as Amman, the capital of the Hashemite kingdom of Jordan. J.F.G.

RABBI (See Occupations and Professions)

RABBITH (răb'ĭth, Heb. hārabbîth), a town in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. 19:20). Identified by Knobel as Arabonheh at the southern tip of Mt. Gilboa and by Conder as Rama, eight miles S of Gilboa.

RABBONI (răb-bō'nī), a variant of Rabbi, the Heb. word for Master. The title used by Mary Magdalene to Jesus upon the resurrection morning (John 20:16). See Rabbi.

RAB-MAG (răb'măg, Heb. rav māgh), one of the Babylonian princes present at the capitulation of Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3). Same as Nergalsharezer (Jer. 39:3).

RABSARIS (răb'sà-rĭs, Heb. rav-sārîs), the title of an Assyrian and Babylonian official usually taken to be "chief eunuch," though Assyriologists have produced evidence for the reading "chief of the 'heads' (leaders, leading men)." The title appears in the Bible only in II Kings 18:17, where it is related that Sennacherib "sent the Tartan, the Rabsaris, and the Rabshakeh with a great army from Lachish to King Hezekiah at Jerusalem" (RSV) to effect the capitulation of that city to the Assyrians. The mission was unsuccessful, but was followed by another embassage, which also conveyed a letter to Hezekiah. Hezekiah took the matter to God in prayer and was encouraged by the word of the Lord as spoken by Isaiah. The angel of the Lord smote the Assyrian forces and Sennacherib returned to Nineveh (II Kings 19:35-36).

RABSHAKEH (răb'shà-kĕ, Heb. ravshāqēh), the title of an Assyrian official, with the meaning "chief cup-bearer" or "chief of the officers(?)" (II Kings 18:17,19,26-28,37; 19:4,8, and parallel, Isa. 36:2,4,11-13,22; 37:4,8). While Sennacherib was besieging Lachish, he sent his Rabshakeh to Jerusalem to deliver an ultimatum to that city. When representatives of Hezekiah protested that he should speak in Aramaic so that the people on the wall could not understand, he deliberately addressed his challenge to those onlookers and then left to join the Assyrian forces at Libnah.

RACA (rà'kà, Gr. rhaká, empty, vain, or worthless fellow), a term of contempt, signifying a depreciatory estimate of someone's intellectual endowment (Matt. 5:22).

RACE (Heb. ōrah, mērôts, Gr. agón, stádiov, most frequently, a foot-race). The clearest refs. are I Corinthians 9:24; Hebrews 12:1; II Timothy 4:7. Other passages may well allude to it (Rom. 9:16; Gal. 5:7; Phil. 2:16). The Greek race was one of a series of highly competitive games. It consisted of (a) the goal, a square pillar opposite the entrance to the course, marking the end of the track; (b) the herald, whose duty it was to announce the name and the country of each competitor, as well as the name and family of the victor; (c) the prize, the crown or wreath which was awarded the winner (cf. I Cor. 9:25; II Tim. 2:5); (d) the judges (II Tim. 4:8), where the Lord is viewed as the righteous Judge who bestows the wreath on those who have truly run well.

RACHAB (See Rahab)

RACHAL (rā'căl, Heb. rākhāl), a place in the Negev of Judah where David and his men roamed as fugitives as they were pursued by the relentless Saul (I Sam. 30:29). David sent spoil from Ziklag to some of its leading men.

RACHEL (rā'chĕl, Heb. rāhēl, ewe, Gr. Rhachél), the wife of Jacob, the mother of Joseph and Benjamin (Gen. 29:6,16,18; 31, 30:1-9; cf. Jer. 31:

15; Matt. 2:18). Rachel was the younger daughter of Laban, the Aramaean (AV. "Syrian"), the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's mother (Gen. 28:2); thus Jacob and Rachel were full cousins. The circumstances under which Jacob met Rachel are interesting. Jacob had quarreled bitterly with his brother Esau over the latter's frustration in regard to the stolen blessing (Gen. 27:35ff). Accordingly, Jacob's mother, Rebekah, suggested that her son Jacob retire for a period, which she hopefully imagined would be brief, to the house of her brother Laban in Haran (Padan-Aram) (Gen. 27: 43-45). Upon his arrival, struck by Rachel's beauty, Jacob immediately fell in love with her (Gen. 29:17,18). A contract was signed with Laban in terms of years of labor (the seven years being the usual period of indentured servants) at the expiration of which Rachel was to be Jacob's wife. In the light of the Nuzi tablets, much of the transactions between the two men becomes easier to understand, if not entirely justifiable by Christian mores. It would appear that according to Nuzian customs, Jacob became male heir, Laban at this time having no male heir of his own. He thus adopted Jacob as his son, giving him both Leah and her sister Rachel to wife. Thus arose the dispute over the right of the possession of the Teraphim, the household gods which Rachel concealed in the baggage as she, together with Jacob her husband, fled away (Gen. 31:30f). These household deities, about the size of a miniature doll, were regarded as indisputable evidence as to the rights and privileges of family ownership. Cf. Laban's indignant query, "Wherefore hast thou stolen my gods?" (Gen. 31:30). Jacob, after becoming prosperous, took his departure from the house of Laban (Gen. 31:21). One reason why the "face of Laban was not towards Jacob as it had been before," is that Laban by now seems to have sons of his own, who regarded Jacob as an interloper (Gen. 31:1). For some time, Rachel remained barren, bearing Jacob no children. The two children that Rachel bore to Jacob were Joseph (30:22), while yet in the house of Laban, and Benjamin after the return home. Rachel, however, died in childbirth with Benjamin (Gen. 35:16-19). This may partially show why Jacob favored the sons of his beloved Rachel above the sons of Leah. The character of Rachel varies between the very attractive and the unattractive. She partook of her family's traits of scheming and duplicity (Gen. 31: 34). A believer in monotheism, she yet clung to the forms of polytheism. Jeremiah pictures her as rising from her grave to weep over the children who are being carried to Babylon, never to return (Jer. 31:15). The Apostle Matthew takes this as prophetic of the slaughter of the Innocents by Herod the great (Matt. 2:18). J.F.G.

RADDAI (răd'ā-ī, Heb. radday), the fifth of the seven sons of Jesse, the father of David (I Chron. 2:14).

RAGAU (rā'gô, Gr. Rhagaú), the Greek form of Reu, an ancestor of Christ (Luke 3:35).

RAGUEL, REUEL (rā-gū'ĕl, Heb. re'ûʾēl), the father-in-law of Moses (Num. 10:29), KJV Reuel (Exod. 2:18); a Midianite, also described as a Kenite (Judg. 4:11). It seems best to consider Hobab as Moses' brother-in-law and Jethro (Reuel, Raguel) as his father-in-law.

RAHAB (rā'hăb, Heb. rāhāv, broad, Gr. Rháchab). 1. A woman best known for her prominent role in the capture of Jericho during the days of Joshua (Josh. 2:1, etc. Matt. 1:5; Heb. 11:31; James 2: 25). The spies sent by Joshua were received into the house of Rahab prior to the siege of the city by the army of Israel. When the king of Jericho sent a posse of men in search of the spies, Rahab refused to betray their whereabouts. As a reward for her fidelity in this affair, she was promised by the two spies her own safety and the protection of her family, on condition of her continued loyalty and secrecy (Josh. 2:14-20). True to the promise that the spies had made to her, Joshua and his men spared Rahab after they had captured the city (Josh. 6:17). Jewish tradition has held Rahab in high honor, one tradition making her the wife of Joshua himself (Jew. Enc.).

According to Matthew's genealogy, she is not only one of the four women mentioned in the family tree of the Saviour, but also the mother of Boaz, the husband of Ruth, and the great-grandmother of King David (Matt. 1:5; Ruth 4: 18-21). The author of Hebrews speaks of her as a shining example of faith (Heb. 11:31). James shows his appreciation of her as a person in whom faith was not merely "theological" but practical as well (James 2:5).

2. A mythical monster of the deep. In such passages as Job 9:13 and Psalm 89:10 the motif of the slaying of the dragon appears. In Isaiah 51:9 Jehovah's victory is complete because he has cut Rahab, the monster, to ribbons. This poetic symbolism has much in common with the Ras Shamra literature, and may be the prototype of legends like St. George and the Dragon. The RAHAB YASHAB (the "Rahab that sits still") of Isaiah 30:7 portrays the impotency of the monster of Egypt (symbolized by the crocodile) in the day of invasion. J.F.G.

RAHAM (rā'hăm, Heb. raham, pity, love), son of Shema, father of Jorkeam (I Chron. 2:44).

RAIMENT (See Dress)

RAIMENT, CHANGES OF (See Dress)

RAIN (Heb. mātār, geshem, heavy rain; yôreh, former rain, malkôsh, latter rain, Gr. brécho, hyetós). The word in the Scriptures is employed in both a literal and figurative sense. The amount of rainfall in Biblical countries varies greatly. In Egypt, for example, there is very little, if any rainfall, the land being dependent for water upon the Nile. In Syria and the land of Israel, however, the situation is the reverse, as the rainfall normally is abundant. The contrasting states of Egypt and the land of Israel's possession are brought out in Deuteronomy 11:10,11. Since the summer is very dry in Israel, the rainy seasons come in the spring (the "latter rains") and in the fall (the "former rains"). One can be almost certain that from c. 1 May to c. 15 October, no rain will fall. "The winter is past, the rain is over and gone" (S. of Sol. 2:11). Many people thus sleep on the roofs of the houses to escape the heat and to enjoy the cooling night breezes. The greatest amount of rain falls between November and February, tapering off till the coming of summer, and renewing itself the ensuing autumn. The latter or spring rains are considered such a natural blessing that they assume an eschatological significance (Zech. 10:1; Joel 2:23). The withholding of the rain at the proper season, particularly in the spring, was regarded as a most severe punishment indeed (I Kings 17:1-16; 18:18; Deut. 28:23,24), and in reverse order, the abundance of rain denoted the rich blessing of Jehovah upon His people (Deut. 28:12). Famine, one of the more tragic effects of the lack of rain, is also regarded as a token of the divine displeasure (II Sam. 21:1-14). In heathen concepts, Baal was conceived as the god of rain. This aids in explaining, but not justifying, the immoral practices of the fertility cults which believed that their sexual orgies would induce Baal to send rain. Elijah's contest upon Carmel was to prove the superiority of the God of Israel in the realm of the forces of nature.

RAINBOW (Heb. qesheth, bow). The Biblical interpretation of the rainbow is found in the story of Noah, with whom God entered into a covenant that never again would He send a universal deluge to destroy the whole inhabited earth (Gen. 9:8-17). This feature of the flood story is unique in that none of the accounts from Babylon, as the well-known Gilgamesh Epic, makes mention of the bow as the covenantal sign. Ezekiel compares the glory of God to that of a rainbow (Ezek. 1:28). John, as a prisoner on Patmos beheld the throne of God encircled by the rainbow (Rev. 4:3).

RAISINS (See Food)

RAKKATH (răk'ăth, Heb. raqqath), one of the fortified cities assigned to the tribe of Naphthali (Josh. 19:35). It is near the Sea of Galilee. There is some evidence that Tiberias was built upon the ruins of Rakkath.

RAM (See Animals, Sheep)

RAMA, RAMAH (rā'mà, Heb. hārāmâh, height).

1. Ramah-Arael, a city assigned by lot to the tribe of Naphthali, probably to be identified with the modern er-Rama, a large Christian village on the southern tier of the mountains of upper Galilee (Josh. 19:36).

2. Rhama-Ramah, a territory mentioned as forming the boundary of Asher (Josh. 19:29). It has been identified with Ramiyeh, a village some 13 miles SE of Tyre, and 12 miles E of the "Ladder of Tyre."

3. Ramah Iamah (or Ramah of Benjamin, and various other orthographic forms), a city assigned to the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned along with Gibeon and Beeroth; the headquarters of Deborah, judge of Israel during the days of the oppression of Sisera (Judg. 4:5). It was the home of the Levite whose concubine's flight and slaying brought about inter-tribal warfare (Judg. 20). At the time of the division of the kingdom, Ramah of Benjamin was destroyed, for we read that Baasha of Israel built it again to ward off his rival, Asa, king of Judah (I Kings 15:16,17). Ramah of Benjamin is mentioned in the "catalogue of doom" listing the cities about to be punished by the Assyrian king (Isa. 10:28-32).

4. Ramah-Aramathaim, the hometown of Elkanah and Hannah, and the birthplace of the Prophet Samuel (I Sam. 1:19; 2:11). The text at this point bears evidence of having been corrupted, and various readings have been suggested, as, Ramathiam Zophim (KJV), "Aramathaim," etc. Later, Samuel made it the center of his circuit (I Sam. 7:16,17), and here he first became acquainted with King Saul (I Sam. 9:6ff). Here Israel demanded a king (I Sam. 8:4). Ramah of Benjamin: Samuel retired here after his final break with Saul (I Sam. 15:34); the place where David found refuge from the crazed king (I Sam. 19:18); the place marking the tomb of Samuel (I Sam. 25:1; 28:3). Its present site seems to be Er-Ram, NW of Jerusalem.

5. Ramah-of-the-south, see RAMATH-LEHI, below.

RAMATH-LEHI (rā'măth-lē'hī, Heb. rāmath lehî, the hill or height of Lehi), the place where Samson cast away the jawbone of an ass after the slaughter of the Philistines (Judg. 15:17). The hill may have received its name because of its real or fancied resemblance to a jawbone. Sometimes identified with the Wady-es Sarrar, not far from Timnath and Zorah, Samson's area of operation (Judg. 13:25; 14:1).

RAMATH-MIZPEH (rā'măth mĭz'pĕ, Heb. rāmath-mitspeh, the heights, or the watchtower), the northern boundary line of the tribe of Gad (Josh. 13:26). It is probably the same place that marked the early sanctuary erected by Jacob and Laban as a witness (Gen. 31:46-48). It has the triple names of Mizpeh, Galeed, and Jegar-Sahadutha. Mizpeh implies the idea of watching, while the other two convey the thought of a cairn of stones set up as a witness between two contending parties. Probably Mizpeh is the same as Ramoth-Gilead, so famous in the subsequent history of Israel.

RAMATH (RAMAH) OF THE SOUTH (rā'măth, Heb. rām'ôth neghev, Ramoth of the south), a city in the southern sector of Judah which was allotted to the tribe of Simeon (Josh. 19:8 AV). It is understood to be the same as Baalath-beer by many, as well as identified with the Ramoth (pl.) to whose inhabitants David sent gifts which he had taken as spoil from the Amalekites (I Sam. 30:26). All proposed identification is tenuous.

RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM (See Ramah)

RAMATHITE (See Ramah)

RAMESSES (râ-ăm'sēz, various other spellings, e.g., Rameses, Ramses), the most common royal name of Egyptian dynasties 19 and 20. Rameses I was the founder of the Nineteenth Dynasty, but the most illustrious of the bearers of this name was his grandson, Rameses II. He was an ambitious and imperious individual. He made a determined effort to recover the Asiatic empire but his errors in judgment in the Hitttite encounter at Kadesh on the Orontes eventuated in a stalemate which later produced an Egyptian-Hittite treaty. Rameses established his capital at Tanis, in the Delta, but his building and rebuilding activities extended throughout the land and even beyond Egypt proper. Among his impressive constructions are the completion of the hypostyle hall at Karnak and of his father's funerary temple at Abydos; his own temple at Abydos; the forecourt and pylon of the Luxor temple; the Ramesseum at the Theban necropolis; and Abu Simbel in Nubia. Extensive building operations were supplemented by his usurpations of monuments of his predecessors, a practice which enhanced his reputation beyond his merits. This, plus the presence in the OT of the name Raamses for a city and district in the Delta, brought about the acclamation of Rameses II as the pharaoh of the Oppression, in spite of chronological complications with OT data. Among the varying interpretations of the Exodus, this identification of Ramesses II is not widely held at present. Ramesses III was the second king of the Twentieth Dynasty; perhaps his most outstanding accomplishment was the repelling of an invasion of the Delta by the Sea Peoples. His best-known construction is his mortuary temple at Medinet Habu, not far from the Ramesseum. At the end of his reign a serious harem conspiracy occurred. The other eight kings of this name, who followed in Dynasty 20, are relatively unimportant, though documents relating to the tomb robberies in the Theban necropolis in the reign of Ramesses IX are of interest. Though certain of these kings, such as Ramesses II and III, must have had at least indirect influence on Israelite life, none of them is mentioned in the OT.

RAMOTH (rā'moth, Heb. rāmôth, height). 1. A precious stone of uncertain variety (Job 28:18; Ezek. 26:16).

2. An Israelite who after the Exile divorced his Gentile wife at the urging of Ezra (Ezra 10:29).

3. One of the cities of refuge in the tribe of Gad, elsewhere called Ramoth-Gilead (Josh. 20:8; 21:38). It formed one of the administrative districts of Solomon over which Ben Geber was stationed (I Kings 4:13). It is perhaps best known as the scene of the last battle of King Ahab. It is identified as Tell Ramith in N Jordan (I Kings 22:1-37).

RAMS' HORNS (See Musical Instruments, Shofar)

RAMS' SKINS, the skins of the sheep tanned with oil used for outer clothing by the shepherds of the Near East. They were utilized as the exterior covering for the tabernacle (Exod. 25:5).

RANSOM (răn'sŭm, Heb. kōpher, pidhyôn, gā'al; Gr. lýtron, antilýtron), the price paid for the redemption of a slave (Lev. 19:20); a reparation paid for injury or damages (Exod. 22:10-12); a fee, fine, or heavy assessment laid upon a man as a substitute for his own life (Exod. 21:30). There was no ransom provided for the wilful murderer (Num. 35:31). In the NT the term signifies that redemptive price offered by Christ upon the cross for the salvation of His people (Mark 10:45; I Tim. 2:5).

RAPHA (rā'fà, Heb. rāphā'). 1. The last son of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:2).

2. A descendant of Saul through Jonathan (I Chron. 8:37).

RAPHU (rā'fū, Heb. rāphû'), father of Palti, one of the spies sent out to investigate the land of Canaan (Num. 13:9).

RAS SHAMRA (rȧs shȧm'rȧ, Arab. Fennel Head), the modern name of the mound which marks the site of the ancient city of Ugarit, located on the Syrian coast opposite the island of Cyprus. The city, with its port, Minet el Beida (White Harbor), was an important commercial center through which passed the trade of Syria and Mesopotamia with Egypt, Cyprus, and the Aegean area. Occasionally antiquities had been found here by local people, but in 1928 a peasant struck the roof of a buried tomb with his plow and made a discovery which attracted the attention of the authorities. In 1929 the French archaeologist C. F. A. Schaeffer began a series of excavations which have revealed much of the history of the site. Test shafts showed that there were five major strata, the earliest dating to the Neolithic period.

Ugarit was swept from the historical scene in about 1200 B.C., when the Sea Peoples overran the area. The city is mentioned in Egyptian historical inscriptions, in the Amarna Tablets (Akkadian), and in Hittite records. Its relations with Egypt were quite close during the Twelfth Dynasty and again in the time of Ramesses II. Ugarit was at the peak of its prosperity in the 15th-14th centuries B.C., but was destroyed by an earthquake in the mid-14th century. It recovered from this catastrophe, but was under Hittite and then Egyptian domination. Though the excavation of the mound has resulted in many significant finds, the most striking was that of a scribal school and library of clay tablets, adjoining the temple of Baal and dating from the Amarna Age. Various Near Eastern languages and scripts appeared at Ugarit, but the majority of the tablets used an unknown cuneiform script, which study showed to have an alphabet of some 30 signs. Credit for the work of decipherment goes to H. Bauer, E. Dhorme, and C. Virolleaud. The language, now called Ugaritic, was found to be of the Semitic family and closely related to Hebrew. The texts contain various types of writings: syllabaries and vocabularies; personal and diplomatic correspondence; business, legal, and governmental records; veterinary texts dealing with diagnosis and treatment of ailments of horses; and, most important, religious literature.

The myths and legends of Ugarit have provided valuable primary sources for the knowledge of Canaanite religion. These stories have been given modern titles, e.g., "The Loves and Wars and Baal and Anat," "The Birth of the Gods," "The Wedding of Nikkal and the Moon," "The Legend of Keret," "The Legend of Aqhat." At the head of the Ugaritic pantheon was El, who was also known as Father of Man, Creator of Creators, Bull El, etc. His consort was Asherah, a fertility goddess who was a stumblingblock to Israel. Ahab (I Kings 16:33) and Jezebel (I Kings 18:19) promoted her worship, and Manasseh even put her image in the temple (II Kings 21:7). Among the many offspring of El and Asherah was Dagon (Judg. 16:23; I Sam. 5), a grain god, whose son Baal was of great prominence. A god of rain and storm, Baal, whose proper name was Hadad (Thunderer), also figured in the fertility cycle. Baal was also called Aliyan Baal, Dagon's Son, Servant of El, Rider of Clouds, and Baal-Zebul (cf. I Kings 1; Matt. 12:24). In Israel, the priests of Baal lost an important contest with the prophet of God on Mt. Carmel (I Kings 18). Baal's sister and wife, the virgin 'Anat, goddess of love and fertility and goddess of war, is known in the OT as Astarte or Ashtoreth. In addition to these, numerous lesser divinities are named. The deities of Ugarit are often quite ungodly: El ordinarily is easy-going and easily influenced, but sometimes is rash and even immoral, as in his seduction and expulsion of two women. Baal mates with his sister and also with a heifer. 'Anat slaughters people and wades in blood and gore. This aspect of Canaanite religion occasioned the stern warning of the Lord to Israel concerning such worship.

The texts provide information concerning ritual and sacrifice and the temple plan, and recovered objects also contribute to an understanding of the religion and culture. The tablets and the OT elucidate each other; the Ugaritic texts have been used in OT textual criticism and have been helpful in Hebrew lexicography. Many interesting suggested relationships may be cited. Ugaritic practice illumines the Biblical prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother's milk (Exod. 23:19; 24:26; Deut. 14:21). A veterinary text refers to a poultice which has been cited as a parallel to Isaiah's prescription for king Hezekiah (II Kings 20:7; Isa. 38:21). The legend of Aqhat tells of a good and just king named Dan'el, whom some have sought to equate with the Daniel of Ezekiel 14:14,20; 12:3). The system of weights used at Ugarit was like that of Israel. These examples illustrate the type of information provided and discussion aroused by the investigation of the remains of this long-dead city.

C.E.D.

RASOR, RAZOR (rā'zêr, Heb. ta'ar, môrâh). The earliest razors were made of flint. Later they were made of bronze, and finally of steel. Joseph is said to have shaved himself before he was liberated from prison to stand before Pharaoh (Gen. 41:14). This was no doubt due to deference to Egyptian, rather, than Hebrew custom, as the priests of Egypt shaved daily. The cutting of the beard by a priest of Israel was forbidden, presumably because of its affinity to pagan practices (Lev. 21:5). The Nazarite was likewise forbidden the use of the razor as long as his vows were upon him (Num. 6:5).

RAVEN (See Birds)

RE, RA (rā), a masculine deity in the pantheon of the gods of Egypt, identified with the sun-god. He stands within the circle of the "creation-myths." Creation is viewed as a procreation on the part of the male and his female. The ancients, unlike the nation of Israel, drew no line of differentiation between the brute forces of nature and their deities. In fact, the elemental forces of nature were the deities, to whom were assigned personalized names. Re was thought to have engaged in a fierce battle against the dragon of chaos and darkness. The struggle was repeated yearly, or even daily in the ceremonial liturgy of Egypt. Yet life was not regarded in such tragic fashion as it was in Mesopotamia. Victory was always assured in the fullness and glory of the present order. The primeval hill upon which Re holds sway emerged from the floor of the ocean of chaos. Creation stems from the Sun. In later times, Re came to be referred to as Amen-Re, Osiris, and other such names. In the mystery religions, he was designated as a Soter-Theos, a "savior-god," a deity who rescues his people from death. The center of the worship of Re was Heliopolis, the ancient On. The ninth plague was in reality a judgment on Re, the Sun God (Exod. 12:21-23). Joseph, after being made food administrator of the land, married the daughter of the priest of On of the cult of Re (Gen. 41:45). J.F.G.

REAIAH, REAIA (rē-ā'yà, Heb. re'āyâh, Jah hath seen). 1. The eponym of a Calebite family (I Chron. 4:2).

2. A Reubenite (I Chron. 5:5).

3. The family name of a company of Nethinim (Ezra 2:47; Neh. 7:50).

REAPING (Heb. qātsar, Gr. therízo). Reaping in ancient times consisted in either pulling up the grain by the roots, or cutting it with a sickle. The stalks were then bound into bundles and taken to the threshing floor. In Bible lands, cutting and binding are still practiced. The reaper sometimes wears pieces of cane on his fingers to prevent the sharp spears of wheat or the sickle from cutting him. Strict laws for reaping were imposed upon Israel (Lev. 19:9; 23:10; 25:11; Deut. 16:9). Samuel mentions that reaping will be a duty that the nation's newly-chosen king, Saul, will demand of them (I Sam. 8:12). The figurative usage of the term speaks of deeds that produce their own harvest (Prov. 22:8; Hos. 8:7; I Cor. 9:11; Gal. 6:7,8).

REBA (rē'bà, Heb. reva'), one of the five chieftains of Midian slain by Israel at the command of Moses (Num. 31:8; Josh. 13:21).

REBEKAH, REBECCA (rĕ-bĕk'à, Heb. rivqâh, Gr. Rhebékka), the daughter of Bethuel, her mother's name unrecorded. Her grandparents were Nahor and Milcah. She was the sister of Laban, the wife of Isaac, mother of Esau and Jacob, and first receives mention in the genealogy of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (Gen. 22:20-24).

It is in Haran, "the city of Nahor," where we are first introduced to Rebekah (Gen. 24). In this incident Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, is sent forth to seek a bride for Isaac. Rebekah, after listening to solicitations of the servant, decides to marry Isaac. In this story, the delineation of her character is winsome and attractive. In the story that follows, however, she is not only ambitious but grasping and rapacious. Though the object of her husband's love (Gen. 24:67), Rebekah bore him no children for 20 years. It was only after special intercession on the part of Isaac that God gave her the two famous children, Esau and Jacob. Although twins, Esau was reckoned as the firstborn and Jacob as the second. However, God told her "the elder shall serve the younger" (Gen. 25:23). Whether directly influenced by this predictive utterance or not, Jacob became his mother's favorite. This led her to perpetrate a cruel ruse upon the aged and blind Isaac. Disguised as his brother Esau, Jacob obtained the blessing (Gen. 27:5-17). When it became evident that Jacob and Esau could no longer live under the same roof, at her suggestion, Jacob fled from home to her relatives in Aram (Gen. 27:42-46). Rebekah never saw her son alive again. Outside of Genesis there is only one reference to her (Rom. 9:10-12).

RECAH, RECA (rē'kà, Heb. rēchâh), an unknown place in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:12).

RECHAB (rē'kăb, Heb. rēkhāv, horseman). 1. One of the assassins of Ishbosheth, a son of Saul, who together with his brother Baanah entered the home of Ishbosheth while he was taking a rest at noon and slew him upon his own bed. They then decapitated him, and carried his head to David expecting to receive a reward, as the murder of Ishbosheth left David without a rival upon the throne of Israel. However, the reaction of the king was quite different from what they had anticipated, as he commanded them both to be executed (II Sam. 4:5-11). They were Benjamites from Beeroth (4:5).

2. An early ancestor of the Kenite Tribe which later became identified with the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:55). Rechab was the founder of the order of the Rechabites. It was Jehonadab who rode with Jehu on the penal mission against the house of Ahab (II Kings 10:15ff). Jeremiah utilizes the example of the Rechabites and their obedience to their father to drink no wine as a method of sharply berating the nation for their lack of obedience to God (Jer. 35:1-19). The Rechabites, though thirsty, had refused to partake of the wine rather than break faith. The Israelites, though partakers of the divine blessings, had indeed broken the covenant (vss. 12-16). Thus the object-lesson is brought to completion.

RECONCILIATION (rĕk'ŏn-sĭl-ĭ-ā'shŭn, Gr. katallagé). Reconciliation is a change of relationship between God and man based on the changed status of man through the redemptive work of Christ. Three aspects of this change are suggested by three words used for it in the New Testament.

1. A reconciliation of persons between whom there has existed a state of enmity. The Greek katallasso denotes an "exchange" which when applied to persons, suggests an exchange from enmity to fellowship. Reconciliation is therefore God exercising grace toward man who is in enmity because of sin, establishing in Christ's redemptive work the basis of this changed relationship of persons (II Cor. 5:19). That this reconciliation is the burden of God is shown by Romans 5:10 where it is suggested that even while we were enemies, God reconciled us to Himself through the death of His Son.

This changed relationship, however, is possible only because of the changed status of man, not in God. God is never said to be reconciled to man, but man to God since it is man's sinfulness which creates the enmity (Col. 1:21; Rom. 8:7). This enmity precipitates God's wrath (Eph. 2:3,5) and judgment (II Cor. 5:10) which is allayed only through the reconciliation wrought through the death of Christ (Rom. 5:10) who knew no sin, but became sin for man that we might receive his righteousness as the basis of reconciliation.

2. A reconciliation of condition so that all basis of the enmity-relationship is removed and a complete basis of fellowship is established (II Cor. 5: 18-20; Eph. 2:16). Apokatallasso denotes a "movement out of" and suggests that since man is redeemed through the righteousness of Christ he is redeemed out of his condition of unrighteousness and thus reconciled to God in this new relationship. The grace of God assures the reconciled man that the grace-basis replaces the sin-basis and that he is established before God in a new relationship.

3. A reconciliation arising out of the change in man induced by the action of God. Katallagé suggests that man is not reconciled merely because his relationship has changed, but because God has changed him through Christ so that he can be reconciled (Rom. 5:11; 11:15; II Cor. 5:18 and Eph. 2:5). Reconciliation arises therefore, out of God, through Christ, to man, so that not only may the barriers to fellowship existing in sinful man be removed, but the positive basis for fellowship may be established through the righteousness of Christ imputed to man.

The definitive basis for reconciliation rests both in what God does in annulling the effects of sin in man so that no enmity exists, and in what He does in creating a redeemed nature in man with which He can have fellowship. Reconciliation is always pre-eminently God working in man to change the basis of relationship. Yet, men are both given the ministry of reconciliation (II Cor. 5:18) and invited to be reconciled to God. From his position of being reconciled, as accomplished as fact, man is to turn to God to respond to the new relationship in faith and obedience.

Even though the sufficient ground of reconciliation is established in the completed redemptive work of Christ, reconciliation is the basis upon which the continued fellowship is established, "for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life" (Rom. 5:10). RECORDER (See Occupations & Professions)

RED (Heb. ādhōm, Gr. erythós). The Hebrew word is a derivative of dam signifying blood; hence, a blood-like or a blood-red color. The adjective "red" is applied to the following items: (1) the badger skins dyed red which formed the outward covering for the Tabernacle (Exod. 25:5; 26:14; 35:7; etc.); (2) the color of certain animals (Num. 19:2; Zech. 1:8; 6:2; Rev. 6:4; 12:13); (3) the color of the human skin (Gen. 25:25; I Sam. 16:12); (4) redness of eyes (Gen. 49:12; Prov. 23:29); (5) red sores (Num. 12:10); (6) wine (Prov. 23:31; Isa. 27:2 AV); (7) water (II Kings 3:22); (8) pavement (Esth. 1:6); (9) the color of sin (Isa. 1:18); (10) the advancing foe against the city of Nineveh is depicted as bearing red or scarlet shields before him.

REDEEMED, REDEEMER (See Redemption)

REDEMPTION (rē-dĕmp'shŭn, Heb. pāraq, to tear loose, Gr. lýtron, a ransom). Rooted in the secular usage of the word, the NT doctrine of redemption draws its meaning from a parallel with the marketplace concept "to buy back," and thus describes the specific means by which the larger salvation concepts may be gained.

Its meaning is rooted in several words: exagorazo, to buy out, as the purchase of a slave for freedom, and is so used in Galatians 3:13 and 4:5; lytróo, to release on receipt of a ransom, as in Titus 2:14 of the work of Christ in redeeming men of iniquity; lýtrosis, a deliverance, as in Hebrews 9:12 of deliverance through Christ's death; and apolýtrosis, a releasing from bondage on payment of a ransom, as in Romans 3:24.

Originally restricted to its commercial usage, the word is used in the NT to contain both the idea of deliverance and the price of that deliverance, or ransom. Both ideas are in Romans 3:24 where it is asserted that man is freely justified by grace "through redemption that is in Christ Jesus"; in I Corinthians 6:20 where redemption is viewed as being "bought with a price"; and in Galatians 3:13 where Christ is said to have redeemed us "from the curse of the law being made a curse for us" (Eph. 1:7; I Pet. 1:18,19; Rev. 5:9).

Redemptiveness connotes deliverance from the enslavement of sin and release to a new freedom. This new freedom is presented in Scripture as always residing in Christ. Man is redeemed from sin to a new life in Christ (Rom. 6:4). This new life is not merely a life gained by being released from sin, but one which exists only in continual relation with Christ, gained through the positive implantation of Christ's righteousness to man.

The death of Christ is the redemptive price. His atoning sacrifice is the ransom paid for man's deliverance (John 3:17; Matt. 20:28; I Tim. 2:6). Moreover, His sacrifice is regarded as a substitute for man's bondage (John 11:50; Rom. 5:6,8; II Cor. 5:14,15,21; Mark 10:45). His death is both sacrificial and propitiatory, since it is in His death alone that man finds redemption.

The soteriological concept of redemption may be extended to three general areas. 1. It is closely associated with forgiveness, since man receives forgiveness through the redemptive price of Christ's death (Eph. 1:7; Col. 1:14); 2. It involves justification, since the deliverance achieved through redemption establishes man in a restored position of favor before God (Heb. 9:15). 3. It promises final deliverance from the power of sin at the coming of the Lord (Rom. 8:23; Eph. 4:30).

The fundamental idea of the word is a dual one: redemption from and redemption to. Redemption is from the law; from the penalty of the law; from sin; from Satan and from all evil. Redemption is to a new freedom from sin, a new relationship to God, and a new life in Christ.

Redemption to the new life in Christ is the basis of Christ's sacrificial death. The new life arises out of the new principle of life imparted to man (Rom. 6:4). Redemption to Christ is redemption to his life, his nature, his holiness. It is joining with him in his death and rising with him in the power of his resurrection glory. He has abolished the enmity between God and man by redeeming man out of his sinful relationship, and establishing him in a new nature achieved through the efficacy of his death.

Moonlight on the Red Sea. "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; these see the works of the Lord, and His wonders in the deep" (Psalm 107:23, 24). © MPS

Redemption rests in Christ's satisfaction of the requirements for ransom. He took our sinful nature upon Himself in order that He might satisfy the demands of the Law by assuming our guilt. Voluntarily exercising His will so to do, He achieved the ransom within Himself in order that He might deliver us from the bondage of sin. "Christ also suffered for sins once, the righteous for the unrighteous, that he might bring us to God; being put to death in the flesh, but quickened in the spirit" I Peter 3:18. C.B.B.

REDEMPTION OF LAND. In Hebrew society, any land which was forfeited through economic distress could be redeemed by the nearest of kin. If, however, there was no one to redeem it, the property still returned to its original owner in the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:24-34).

RED HEIFER. The ashes of the red heifer were used for the removal of certain types of ceremonial uncleanness such as purification of the leper, or defilement incurred through contact with the dead (Num. 19:9; 20, 21).

RED SEA (Heb. yam sûph). Upon the occasion of the Exodus of the Israelites from Egypt "God led the people not by the way of the land of the Philistines, though that was near, . . . but God led them around by the way of the wilderness by the Red Sea" (Exod. 13:17,18). With Rameses as their point of departure (Exod. 12:37), the nation of liberated slaves marched across the eastern boundaries of the Land of Goshen towards a body of water, traditionally rendered as the "Red Sea." The site of Israel's encampment, however, previous to their crossing, is recorded as Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the Sea. Hence, Israel took a southeasterly course to Succoth, about 32 miles away, and from there a road to Sinai which they most easily followed. Often the target of the critics, the route of the Exodus has now fairly well been established, as a long series of Egyptian fortifications along the route has actually been described by Pharaoh Seti I in his Karnak inscriptions in Upper Egypt. The "store chambers" of which the Biblical record speaks were actually discovered by Naville, not at Pithom, but at Succoth, c. nine miles E in the Wady Tumilat.

It is now quite evident that the "Red Sea" rendering is erroneous, as Yam Sûph should be rendered "Reed Sea" or "Marsh Sea." It is highly improbable that the northern arm of the Red Sea (the Gulf of Suez) is meant. There are no reeds in the Red Sea. In addition, the text implies that the Yam Sûph formed the barrier between the land of Egypt and the desert. If that which we think of as the Red Sea were intended, then Israel would have been obliged to cross a far greater territory in a far shorter span of time than the account actually indicates. Be it recalled that the Israelites as a nation of slaves resided in Goshen. Near the city of Rameses-Tanis (Goshen), there were two bodies of water, the "Waters of Horus" which is the same as Shihor, (Isa. 23:3; Jer. 2:18), and a body of water which the Egyptians themselves referred to as "Suph," called also the "papyrus marsh." This last mentioned "Sea of Reeds" or Lake Timsah is beyond reasonable doubt the body of water crossed by the fleeing Israelites, with the Egyptians in hot pursuit. This newer identification in no way mitigates nor militates against the miraculous deliverance of the people of God by supernatural means, nor does it dissipate the awful judgment which overtook the armies of Pharaoh. J.F.G.

REED (rēd, Heb. qāneh, 'āghammîm, 'āhû; Gr. kálamos). A reed stalk was used as a measuring rod. In Babylonia six cubits made a reed or qāneh. Among the Israelites a reed came to denote a fixed length of six long cubits (Ezek. 40:5; 41:8). In Revelation 11:1 and 21:15,16 a reed is used to measure the temple and the holy city.

REED (See Plants)

REELAIAH (rē'ĕl-ā'yà, Heb. re'ēlyâh), one of the 12 heads of families returning with Zerubbabel after the captivity (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7). Nehemiah renders the name "Raamiah." "Reelaiah" seems to be the preferred form.

REFINE, REFINER (See Occupations: Coppersmith)

REFUGE, CITIES OF (Heb. 'ārê hamiqlāt, Gr. póleis tón phygadeuterion), the six cities on either side of the Jordan which under the supervision of the Levites were set aside for the asylum of the accidental slayer. East of the Jordan, they were Bezer in the tribe of Benjamin, Ramoth-Gilead of Gad, Goian in Manasseh. West of the river, they were Hebron in Judah, Shechem in Ephraim, and Kedesh in Naphtali (Num. 35:6,14; Josh. 20: 7ff; 21:13; 27:32,38). The need for appointing cities of refuge arose because of the strong concept that it was one's duty to avenge the blood of his nearest slain relative even though the slaying was of an accidental nature. Therefore, these cities of refuge were designated until the accused could stand fair trial.

REGEM (rē'gĕm, Heb. reghem), a descendant of the house or clan of Caleb, son of Jadhai (I Chron. 2:47).

REGEM-MELECH (rēg'ĕm mĕlĕk, Heb. reghem melekh), one of a delegation sent to inquire of Zechariah concerning the propriety of the act of fasting (Zech. 7:2).

REGENERATION (rē-jĕn-ĕr-ā'shun, Gr. palingenesía). Regeneration has as its basic idea, "to be born again," or "to be restored." Though the word is actually used only twice in the NT (Matt. 19:28 and Titus 3:5), many synonymous passages suggest its basic meaning. Related terms are: born again (John 3:3,5,7); born of God (John 1:13; I John 3:9); quickened (Eph. 2:1,5); and renewed (Titus 3:5 and Rom. 12:2).

Regeneration is, therefore, the spiritual change wrought in the heart of man by an act of God in which his inherently sinful nature is changed and by which he is enabled to respond to God in faith.

This definition grows out of the nature of man's sinfulness. As long as man is in sin, he cannot believe in God. If he is to believe, he will do so only after God has initiated a change by which he may be released from the bondage of his will by sin. Regeneration is that act of God by which he is thus released, and from which he may exercise the dispositions of a freed nature.

Regeneration is basically, therefore, an act of God through the immediate agency of the Holy Spirit operative in man (Col. 2:13), originating in him a new dimension of moral life; a resurrection to new life in Christ. This new life is not merely a neutral state arising out of forgiveness of sin, but a positive implantation of Christ's righteousness in man, by which he is quickened (John 5:21), begotten (I John 5:1), a new creation (II Cor. 5:17) and a new life (Rom. 6:4).

Regeneration involves an illumination of the mind, a change in the will, and a renewed nature. It extends to the total nature of man, irrevocably altering his governing disposition, and restoring him to a true experiential knowledge in Christ. It is a partaking of the divine nature (II Pet. 1:4), a principle of spiritual life implanted in the heart.

The efficient cause of regeneration is God (I John 3:9) acting in love through mercy (Eph. 2: 4,5) to secure the new life in man through the instrument of His word (I Pet. 1:23).

In regeneration, the soul is both passive and active: passive while it is still in bondage to sin, and active when it is released. The regenerating work of the Holy Spirit is not conditioned by a prior acquiescence of the soul, but when the soul is released from sin, regenerated, it voluntarily and spontaneously turns toward God in fellowship.

C.B.B.

REHABIAH (rē'hă-bī'à, Heb. rehavyâh, rehavāhû, Jah is wide), son of Eliezer, grandson of Moses (I Chron. 23:17; 24:21; 26:25).

REHOB (rē'hŏb, Heb. rehōv, broad). 1. The northern limit to which the spies came as they searched out the land (Num. 13:21). It is mentioned in the wars of David against the Syrians (I Sam. 10:6). On the basis of Judges 18:28, Rehob and Beth-Rehob appear to be identical.

2. Two separate towns belonging to the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:28; 19:30).

3. The father of Hadadezer, king of Aram, whose capital appears to have been Zobah, which David conquered in the battle on the banks of the Euphrates (II Sam. 8:3,12).

4. A Levite who was one of the co-signers of the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:11).

REHOBOAM (rē'hō-bō'ăm, Heb. rehav'ām), the son of Solomon and his successor on the throne of Israel. His mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess (I Kings 14:21). He was born about 975 B.C. and was 41 when he began to reign. He chose Shechem as the site of his inauguration. Solomon's wild extravagances and his vain ambition to make Israel the world power of his day led him to set up a tremendously expensive capital and a very elaborate harem. The importation of so many pagan women for his harem resulted in a spiritual debacle in Israel. The luxuries of his palace and the expenses of his diplomatic corps and of his vast building program resulted in burdensome taxation. The northern tribes turned to Jeroboam for leadership, to whom God had revealed that he was to rule ten of the tribes (I Kings 11:26-40). When the coronation had been set, Jeroboam was called home from Egypt, and through him an appeal was made to Rehoboam for easier taxes. The latter, however, heeding the advice of young men, refused to heed the appeal, with the result that Israel rebelled. When Adoram was sent to collect the tribute, he was slain and Rehoboam fled to Jerusalem (I Kings 12:16-19). Jeroboam was then made king of the ten tribes. Rehoboam raised an army from Judah and Benjamin, but was forbidden by God to attack (20-24). Jeroboam then fortified Shechem and Penuel, instituted pagan rites, and waged a relentless struggle against Rehoboam (I Kings 12:25-28; 14:29,30).

Rehoboam did not sit repining, but set to work to make his realm strong. Pagan high places were set up, and shrines throughout the land allowed abominable practices to be observed among the men (I Kings 14:22-24). Upon being dissuaded from attacking Israel, Rehoboam began to strengthen his land. He fortified Bethlehem, Gath, Lachish, Hebron and other cities, and made them ready to endure a siege by enemy forces. He gave refuge to priests and Levites whom Jeroboam had driven from Israel, and they brought wisdom and strength to his realm (II Chron. 11:5-17). The fortified cities were captured by King Shishak of Egypt. It is possible that Shishak's invasion resulted from Jeroboam's influence in Egypt, whither he had fled to escape Solomon's wrath (I Kings 11:40). Inscriptions in the temple at Karnak name 180 towns captured by Shishak, many of them being in the northern kingdom.

Rehoboam seems to have inherited his father's love for luxury and show, for he gathered a goodly harem and reared a large family (II Chron. 11:18-23). He had 18 wives and 60 concubines (30 according to Josephus. Ant. V:8; 1; 10; 1). He was not content with fortifying his land, but spent large sums upon ornate places of worship. He made Abijah, his son, his successor. J.D.F.

REHOBOTH (rē-hō'bŏth, Heb. rehōvôth, broad places). 1. The name of a city built in Assyria by Ashur (Gen. 10:11). The home of Saul (Shaul in I Chron. 1:48), a king of Edom prior to the coming of a Hebrew Monarch (Gen. 36:31-37). Its location is not known.

2. A well dug by Isaac in the Valley of Gerar after Abimelech had driven him from the land of the Philistines (Gen. 26:9-22). Ruhaibah, near Beersheba, is the probable site, its ruins with numerous cisterns cut into solid rock indicating an ancient stronghold.

REHUM (rē'hŭm, Heb. reḥûm, beloved). 1. A Hebrew who returned from captivity with Ezra (Ezra 2:2).

2. An officer of Artaxerxes' court who helped frame a report to his king, accusing the Jews of rebelling and warning him that to permit the completion of the job of restoring Jerusalem would result in the loss of these vassal people (Ezra 4:7-24).

3. A son of Bani who helped repair the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:17).

4. One who signed the covenant with God after Israel had returned from captivity and had been so signally blessed (Neh. 10:25).

5. A priest among the host that went to Palestine with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:3, KJV margin, Hamm).

REI (rē'ī, Heb. rē'î, friendly), one who did not join Adonijah in his rebellion against David (I Kings 1:8).

REINS (rāns, Heb. kilyâh, Gr. nephrós), a word used to designate the inward parts. The kidneys were thought by the Israelites to be the seat of the emotions (Ps. 7:9; 26:2; Jer. 17:10; Job 19:27).

REKEM (rē'kĕm, Heb. reqem, friendship). 1. A king of Midian who was slain by order of Jah (Num. 31:1-8). He is called prince in Joshua 13:21.

2. A city belonging to Benjamin (Josh. 18:27), the location now unknown.

3. A son of Hebron and father of Shammai of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 2:42-44).

RELIGION (Gr. threskeía, outward expression of spiritual devotion). The Latin religare means to hold back or restrain. It came to be applied to the services and ritual and rules by which faith in and devotion to deity were expressed. In the OT there is no word for religion. Fear (Ps. 2:11; Prov. 1:7) and worship (Ps. 5:7; 29:2; Deut. 4:19; 29:26) of God refer primarily to attitudes of the mind and acts of adoration, rather than to a ritual. Threskeía in the NT means outward expression of religion and the content of faith. James makes a distinction between the sham and the reality of religious expression (1:26,27). Paul was loyal to his Hebrew religion before being converted (Acts 26:1-5). Religious in James 1:26 (thréskos) implies superstition.

REMALIAH (rĕm'à-lī'à, Heb. remalyāhû, Jehovah adorns), the father of King Pekah (II Kings 15:25).

REMETH (rē'měth, Heb. remeth, height), a city in the tribe of Issachar (Josh. 19:17-21); probably Ramoth of I Chronicles 6:73 and Jarmuth of Joshua 21:29.

REMMON (See Rimmon)

REMNANT, a rendering of different Hebrew words: yether, what is left (Deut. 3:11; 28:54); she'ār, the remainder (Ezra 3:8; Isa. 10:20; 11:16); she'ērîth, residue (II Kings 19:31; Isa. 14:30). At first the word denoted a part of a family or clan left from slaughter, and later came to be applied to the spiritual kernel of the nation who would survive God's judgment and become the germ of the new people of God. Thus Micah saw the returning glory of Israel (2:12; 5:7). Zephaniah saw the triumph of this remnant (2:4-7), and so did Zechariah (8:1-8). Isaiah named a son She'ār Jashub which is "A remnant returns" (7:3).

REMON METHOAR (rĕm'ŏn-měth'ō-ar), a town on the border of the heritage of Zebulum (Josh. 19:13). See Rimmon.

REMPHAN (rĕm'făn), a pagan deity worshiped by the Israelites in the wilderness (Acts 7:37-50). It is probably a name for Chiun, or Saturn (Amos 5:26), a view supported by the LXX.

REPENTANCE (rē-pen'tans, Heb. nāham, shûv, Gr. metanoéō, metamélomai). The two Greek words translated "repent" in the English Bible suggest the basic meaning of the word. Metanioa (Acts 2:38; Rom. 2:4) connotes a change of mind with regard to sin, a sorrow for sin which primarily is intellectual in nature; while metameleia connotes a change of soul, a sorrow that leads to turning away from sin (Matt. 27:3; II Cor. 7:9,10).

The meaning of both words leads to defining repentance as that divinely wrought conviction of sin in the heart that the soul is guilty before God, and a resolute turning away from sin in which the sinner identifies himself with the gracious act of God in redeeming him. Repentance involves both a change of mind about sin, and a change of heart-attitude toward sin. It is at the time a renunciation of sin and an acceptance of the Holy Spirit's enablement to holy living.

Repentance may be viewed from both a divine and human perspective. God is said to be the author of repentance (Acts 4:31) in that it is through the regeneration wrought by the Holy Spirit that man is led to a consciousness of his sinfulness and to a rebellion against it as a principle of life. In his sinful nature, man cannot repent; however, through the illuminating work of the Holy Spirit he is led to see himself as a sinner in rebellion against God, and as evil in nature. Hence man's repentance is always preceded by God's illuminating activity.

Repentance is always conjoined with faith, however, and man must act, once illuminated by grace. Where there is true faith there will always be true repentance; and conversely, where there is not true repentance there can never be true faith.

Repentance is necessary to salvation. Jesus asserted that it was a necessary condition (Matt. 3:2,8; 4:17), while both Paul and Peter identified it with true salvation (Acts 20:21; II Pet. 3:9).

There are two aspects of repentance: the act of repenting, and the state of penitence. The act of repenting involves sorrow for both the fact of sin and the acts of sin in the life of the sinner. It precipitates decisive conviction of sin and resolution to change. The act of repentance, however, leads to the state of penitence in which the whole nature of man is changed so that he becomes identified with the grace of God, living in abhorrence of sin, with continual renunciation of it in his life.

REPHAEL (rē'fā-ĕl, Heb. rephā'ēl, God heals), a son of Shamaiah who served as a tabernacle gatekeeper (I Chron. 26:7-12).

REPHAH (rē'fà, Heb. rephah, a prop), a grandson of Ephraim and a resident of Bethel (I Chron. 7:23-25).

REPHAIAH (rē-fā'yà, Heb. rephāyâh, Jehovah heals). 1. Descendant of David (I Chron. 3:21, Rhesa of Luke 3:27).

2. Son of Ishi, who helped defeat the Amalekites (I Chron. 4:42-43).

3. Grandson of Issachar and head of a clan (7:2).

4. Descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 9:40-43).

5. Son of Hur, a builder (Neh. 3:9).

REPHAIM (rĕf'ā-ĭm, Heb. rephā'îm, mighty), (in KJV twice Rephainer (Gen. 14:5; 15:20). The name of a giant people who lived in Canaan even before the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:5; 15:20). They are listed among Canaanites who were to be dispossessed (Gen. 15:20). They were like the Anakims in Deuteronomy 2:11,20. Og, king of Bashan, was a descendant of the Rephaim (Josh. 12:4; 13:12; 17:15 marg.).

REPHAIM, VALLEY OF (rĕf'ā-ĭm, vale of giants). This was a fertile plain S of Jerusalem, three miles from Bethlehem. It was a productive area (Isa. 17:4,5), and thus was a prize for which the Philistines often fought. David twice defeated the Philistines in this valley (I Chron. 14:8-12; 14:16).

REPHIDIM (rĕf'ĭ-dĭm, Heb. rephîdhîm, plains), a camping site of the Hebrews in the wilderness before they reached Sinai. There Moses struck a rock to secure water (Exod. 17:1-7; 19:2). At this place also occurred the battle with the Amalekites (Exod. 17:8-16). The camp of the Hebrews is supposed to have been at the present Wady Feiren. If so, it afforded ample protection against a surprise attack, its gateway into the vale being between rocky cliffs from one of which the water came. Archaeologists have found at this place evidence of a once fertile valley in which a strong city had been built.

REPROBATE (rĕp'rō-bāt, Gr. adókimos). The basic idea in reprobation is that of failing "to stand the test." Adokimos, (the negative of dokimos, meaning "to approve") connotes disapproval or rejection. When applied to man's relation to God it suggests moral corruption, unfitness, disqualification — all arising out of a lack of positive holiness. It is used in Romans 1:28 of a "reprobate (disapproved) mind"; in I Corinthians 9:27 of a "castaway body," and II Corinthians 13:5-7 of a "sinful nature." Other uses in II Timothy 3:8, Titus 1:16, etc., bear the same disapproval quality. Man in sin is reprobate, disqualified, disapproved, and rejected because he cannot "stand the test" of holiness. Only in Christ's righteousness may he be "approved."

RESEN (rē'sĕn, Heb. resen, fortified place), a town founded by Nimrod (Gen. 10:8-12) between Nineveh and Calah. Xenophon reports that Larissa was a strongly fortified city in this section and this may be the Resen of Scripture.

RESERVOIR (Heb. miqwâh, a source of water). Because most of western Asia was subject to periodic droughts, and because of frequent sieges, cities put great store by their waterworks. Some of the reservoirs and many private cisterns were hewn into solid rock. Some provided for abundant storage (Neh. 9:25 marg.). Uzziah helped his land by having many cisterns built (II Chron. 26:10). Elisha bade Israel to provide many special reservoirs (ditches) near Jerusalem (II Kings 3:12-17). It was considered wise for each home to have its own cistern (II Kings 18:31). Among the most famous reservoirs of Palestine were the pools of Solomon, 13 miles from the city (Eccl. 2:6). Water from these was conveyed to the city by aqueducts, some of which remain until today.

RESHEPH (rē'shĕf, a flame), a descendant of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:25). Nothing else is known about him.

REST (Heb. nûah, menûhâh, peace, quiet, Gr. anápausis, katápausis), a word of frequent occurrence in the Bible, in both Testaments. It is used of God as resting from His work (Gen. 2:2) and as having His rest in the temple (I Chron. 28:2). God commanded that the seventh day was to be one of rest (Exod. 16:23; 31:15) and that the land was to have its rest every seventh year (Lev. 25:4). God promised rest to the Israelites in the land of Canaan (Deut. 12:9). The word is sometimes used in the sense of trust and reliance (II Chron. 14:11). Christ offers rest of soul to those who come to Him (Matt. 11:28). Hebrews 4 says that God offers to His people a rest not enjoyed by those who died in the wilderness.

RESURRECTION (Gr. anástasis, arising; egérsis, a raising), a return to life subsequent to death. "The Bible . . . knows nothing of an abstract immortality of the soul, as the schools speak of it; nor is its Redemption a Redemption of the soul only, but of the body as well. It is a Redemption of man in his whole complex personality — body and soul together." So in the 1890's wrote James Orr, the great theologian of Glasgow. (The Christian View of God and the World, p. 196.) This distinctive fact has been noted by many competent exegetes and commentators, both before Orr's time and more recently. To deny the resurrection is, in Biblical thought, to deny any immortality worthy of the character of our faith in God (Matt. 22:31, 32; Mark 12:26,27; Luke 20:37,38). It is not that the soul does not exist in a disembodied state (see INTERMEDIATE STATE) between death and resurrection; but in the Biblical view, man in the intermediate state is incomplete, and awaits "the redemption of the body" (Rom. 8:23. See II Cor. 5:3ff and Rev. 6:9-11).

In the Old Testament the most explicit passage on the resurrection is Daniel 12:2. The KJV reads, "Many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt."

A clearer translation is suggested in the Jamieson Fausset and Brown Commentary, on the basis of data taken from Tregelles and supported by the Jewish commentators. The first two words of this text in Hebrew, rabbim miyyeshene literally mean "many from among the sleepers . . ." It is not correct, argues J. F. and B., to take "many" as equivalent to hoi polloi "the many" which often means "all." There is no article here in the Hebrew. The two words together indicate a distinction, "from among." It would have been very simple, if the writer had intended to indicate all the dead, for him to have omitted the preposition "from" and used kol, "all," or to have omitted rabbim, "many," and said, "Those who sleep . . ."

The word "some," used twice in this text, elleh . . . elleh, is preferably rendered "these . . . those." We therefore translate the verse as follows: "Many from among those who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake, these to everlasting life, but those [i.e. the rest of the dead, will awake] to shame and everlasting contempt." This clearer translation throws light on Revelation 20:4-15 and other NT passages in which the predicted resurrection of the dead is divided into two distinct phases.

Isaiah predicts the resurrection of the righteous dead in no uncertain terms: "Thy dead men shall live; together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust; for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead" (Isa. 26:19). Verse 14 of this chapter may be intended to indicate that the unrighteous will not be raised to enjoy the period of blessedness and expansion predicted in vs. 15. The distinction, however, is not as clear as in Daniel 12:2.

Isaiah 25:8a, "He will swallow up death in victory," is obscure in its OT context, but Paul (I Cor. 15:54. Cf. II Cor. 5:4b) interprets these words as pointing, not to resurrection, but to the sudden experience of being enveloped in immortality, that is, the "change" (I Cor. 15:51-53) to be experienced by the living saints at the "moment" of the "last trump."

A much discussed OT passage related to the doctrine of the resurrection is Job 19:23-27. It is regrettable that this inspiring confession of faith should have been made the subject of controversy, but such is the case. The crux of the difficulty is in the word mibbesari, which literally means "from my flesh" and is translated in the KJV, "in my flesh."

The preposition min, "from," is discussed in an article more than six and one half double column pages long in Brown, Driver, Briggs, our best Hebrew Lexicon. One section is devoted to the discussion of min as giving "the place out of which one looks."

Job's interest in the resurrection is evident from 14:13-15. In chapter 19 he is speaking of his resurrection when his Redeemer comes at the latter day to stand upon the earth. Jerome (340-420 A.D.) clearly so understood; and the Septuagint. although the text is obscure, certainly indicates that Job is referring to his future resurrection.

The translators of the ASV of 1901 were probably wrong in bringing in the highly questionable translation, "without my flesh." Their marginal reading "from my flesh," is strongly to be preferred. What Job literally said was, "Though, after my skin, [so diseased], they destroy this [body], yet from [the vantage point of] my flesh I shall see God." He then adds, in effect, "I myself shall see him with my very own eyes!"

Other OT references to resurrection are Psalm 16:9-11 (see Acts 2:25-28,31; 13:35; Ps. 17:15; 49:15). There are also many passages in which faith in the resurrection must be assumed in the background.

The question why there are not more and clearer resurrection passages in the Pentateuch and the historical books, must be met with facts as they stand in the progress of God's revelation. Not everything is revealed at once, yet every age has sufficient light for its spiritual life and fellowship with God. Contemporaneous heathen religions were permeated with fantastic notions of the future life. It is remarkable that the writers of Scripture maintained a simple faith in God without these heathen fantasies.

The non-canonical books of the ancient Judeo-Christian world contain much material on the resurrection which there is not space to discuss. The reader will find most of this material in R. H. Charles' Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the O. T. Many exact references are given in the index in Vol. II under the heading "Resurrection."

In the New Testament the word anastasis, "resurrection," signifies the arising to life of dead bodies, or a dead body. There is one possible exception, Luke 2:34, though probably "resurrection" is the meaning here, too. In secular Greek the word may refer to any act of rising up or sitting up; but the theological interpretation of the word in the NT does not depend only upon its literal meaning, but upon the contexts in which it is found.

The doctrine of resurrection is stated clearly in its simplest form in Paul's words before the Roman law court presided over by Felix: "there will be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust" (Acts 24:15). The most detailed statement of the doctrine of twofold resurrection is found in Revelation 20:4-15. (For the author's analysis of this passage see the article MILLENNIUM). In his article on "Resurrection" in ISBE, Burton Scott Easton said, "Two resurrections are found in Revelation 20:5,13 and quite possibly in I Thessalonians 4:16; I Corinthians 15:23,24. Hence the phrase, 'first resurrection.'"

In the words of Jesus the only clear allusion to a twofold resurrection is found in John 5:25,28,29. It must be remembered that John shares the cosmic perspective from which the eschatological complex began with the incarnation (see I John 2:18). As Dr. Geerhardus Vos (Pauline Eschatology pp. 36ff) has said, "The age to come [which began at the incarnation] was perceived to bear in its womb another age to come." In John 5:25 Jesus refers to the fact that He "now" exercises His power to raise the dead selectively, "they that hear will live." (Compare the resurrection of Lazarus, John 11, and of the son of the widow of Nain, Luke 7:11-17, as well as Matt. 27:50-53.) Verses 28 and 29 of John 5 refer to the future and allude to the distinction made in Daniel 12:2, which John explicates in Revelation 20:4-15.

Paul implies in I Thessalonians 4:16,17 that the dead who are not "in Christ" will not be raised at the same time with the redeemed. This is made more clear in I Corinthians 15:20-28. Verses 20-23 base the resurrection of the dead firmly upon the power of Christ as exhibited in his own resurrection (see RESURRECTION OF CHRIST), and state the substance of the later pronouncement before Felix (Acts 24:15). By the power of Christ all the dead will be raised.

With verse 23 Paul begins an enumeration of three "orders" of resurrection, one of which, the resurrection of Christ, is past. (1) "aparche Christos, Christ the firstfruits. (2) epeita hoi tou Christou . . ., afterwards those who are Christ's . . ." This second "order" of resurrection is said to take place "at his appearing, parousia." (3) "eita to telos . . ., then the end . . ." The "end" in this context follows the resurrection of "those who are Christ's." It includes the time when Christ "reigns" and subdues all His enemies. The last enemy, death itself is to be subdued. This must be regarded as taking place when all the rest of the dead without exception stand before the great white throne (Rev. 20:12ff). This final subduing of death is Paul's third "order" of resurrection.

Since Paul's first "order" is the resurrection of Christ, it is obvious that Paul's second and third "orders" of resurrection coincide with John's future "first resurrection" and his resurrection of "the rest of the dead" (Rev. 20:4-15).

The nature of the redeemed in the resurrection is not described in great detail, yet the Scripture does not leave us totally ignorant. We shall be corporeally "like his [Christ's] glorious body" (Phil. 3:21. Cf. I John 3:2). It is enough to know that we shall be like our Lord.

This matter is discussed by Paul at length in I Corinthians 15:35-50. The numerical identity is the same. The corporeal identity which is "sown in corruption . . . sown in lack of honor . . . sown in weakness . . . sown a natural body . . ." is the same identity which is "raised in incorruption . . . raised in glory . . . raised in power . . . raised a spiritual body . . ."

But the numerical identity of the mortal body with the resurrection body has nothing to do with the disposition of the material particles which make up the body at the moment of death. Material particles are constantly changing in our mortal bodies without loss of bodily identity. The resurrection is simply a miracle.

It is essential to the Christian faith that Christ, like whom we shall be, arose from the dead "in the same body in which he suffered"; that the grave was empty and that His body of "flesh and bones" (Luke 24:39) was recognizable. Yet His body was "changed," "glorious," "spiritual," perfectly adapted as well for normal communications as for the free unencumbered activities of the spirit.

Our mortal body is "flesh and blood" (I Cor. 15:50) but not so the resurrection body. The marriage relationship in particular is a thing of the past for those who are raised from the dead as inheritors of the Kingdom (Luke 20:34-36; Cf. Mark 12:24, 25; Matt. 22:29,30).

The resurrection saints will participate with Christ in the government of the world (Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:28,29; I Cor. 6:2,3. See MILLENNIUM).

The moral implications of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body are sharply emphasized in I Corinthians 15:30-34. Why be concerned about carnality if the body is only a temporary shell? So argued the corrupt party in the Corinthian church. We are too "spiritual" to struggle against bodily appetites.

But Paul replies sharply, "Do not be deceived; evil associations corrupt good ethics. Sober up righteously and stop sinning. Some are shamefully ignorant of God. I speak to shame you" (vss. 33, 34; original translation). As Geerhardus Vos says (op. cit. p. 61) "Eschatology . . . yields ipso facto a philosophy of history . . . and every philosophy of history bears in itself the seed of a theology . . . [which must bear] practical theological fruitage." If one denies the historical purposes of God in this created material world, including the implications to our bodily resurrection, Biblical ethics begin to be undermined. J.O.B.

RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST. The Easter miracle is the heart of Christian faith: the NT, if anything, is even more resurrection-oriented than it is cross-centered. Indeed, it is the resurrection which interprets the cross and which therefore shapes the Church's theology as well as its worship and life. In the words of Floyd Filson, "The interpreting clue and the organizing fact of Biblical theology is the resurrection of Jesus" (Jesus Christ The Risen Lord, New York: Abingdon Press, 1956, p. 29). Both historically and theologically, A. Michael Ramsey insists, it is necessary to make the resurrection our standing place (The Resurrection of Christ, Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1946, pp. 9-10), recognizing that Christian faith is resurrection-faith and that Christian theism is resurrection-theism. The Christian God is not simply God, even the triune God: He is the God who raises the dead (Rom. 4:16-17; Eph. 1:19-20; I Pet. 1:21). Hence Christian faith per se is faith in the resurrection (Rom. 10:9), for the Easter miracle transforms the tragedy of the Cross into Gospel (I Cor. 15:3-4).

I. The Centrality of the Resurrection. A mere inventory of NT texts is sufficient to show that the resurrection must not be viewed as, in F. X. Durrwell's phrase, "a mere epilogue to Calvary." In our Lord's own teaching, for example, His resurrection is never divorced from His crucifixion. The atoning cross and the empty tomb form a redemptive complex (Matt. 16:21; Matt. 20:18-19; Mark 8:31; Mark 9:31; Mark 10:33-34; Luke 24:26; John 10:17-18). In the apostolic kerygma which figures so largely in the Book of Acts, the resurrection proves not only that the scandal of the cross is really God's saving deed, but also that Jesus is the true Messiah rather than a lying impostor (Acts 2:22-36; 3:12-18; 4:10; 5:29-32; 10:39-43; 13:19-37; 17:23-31). Peter's explicit witness to the resurrection is also stated in his First Epistle (1:3-5,21; 3:18-22). In all probability Peter's witness likewise forms the substance of the Marcan account. The testimony of the Johannine literature is somewhat limited but equally emphatic (John 11:25-26; 20-21; Rev. 1:18).

So frequently does Paul allude to the resurrection that McCheyne Edgar has every warrant for this conclusion: "The Pauline Gospel was preeminently that of a Risen Saviour" (The Gospel of a Risen Saviour, Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1892, p. 69. Cf., e.g., Acts 13:19-37; 17:23-31; 26:8; Rom. 1:4; 4:25; 6:4-11; 7:4; 8:11,23; 14:9; I Cor. 15; II Cor. 1:9-10; 4:14; 5:14-15; 13:4; Gal. 1:4; Eph. 1:19-23; Phil. 3:10; Col. 1:18; 2:12; I Thess. 1:10; 4:14; 5:10; II Tim. 1:10; 2:8). Surely, then, Durrwell's appraisal of the Pauline Gospel is not exaggerated: "St. Paul more than anyone is the Apostle of the risen Lord; he is supremely the 'witness of the resurrection.' He has seen and heard Christ in His heavenly glory, and has seen and heard Him only thus. The Christ whom he met transcended the limitations of history; by His resurrection He was established in glory, and this was how the apostle knew Him in that first blinding experience of salvation. Consequently, his preaching was to be concerned less with recounting the words and deeds of Christ as handed down by tradition, than with trying to express his own realization of the risen Christ as the source of redemption. His Gospel is primarily this one fact, the resurrection of Christ from the dead; he sees Christ as the source of life, but it is the risen Christ that he sees" (F. X. Durrwell, The Resurrection, New York: Sheed and Ward, 1960, pp. 23-24).

Because of the prominence assigned to the resurrection in the NT, "it ought to occupy," William Milligan argues, "a far more important place than it generally does, alike in our theological systems and in our religious life" (The Resurrection of Our Lord, New York: The Macmillan Company, 1927, p. 232). Obviously his argument demands acquiescence.

II. The Theology of the Resurrection. All too often evangelicals seem excessively concerned with the evidential values and apologetic problems of the resurrection; in fact, with a few shining exceptions they have failed to emphasize properly its enormous implications for theology.

Christologically considered, the resurrection established Jesus as the Son of God with power. In Romans 1:4 does Paul simply mean that our Lord's deity was validated by the Easter miracle, or does he mean that, supernaturally raised up, the Son of Mary entered upon that mode of existence which befits God's Son? Is Durrwell's Roman Catholic exegesis too far-fetched? "The Resurrection was not merely a coming back to life, but a birth into a new life which Christ did not have in his bodily humanity. . . . Born of the Virgin into the life of a son of man, on Easter day he was reborn into the life of the Son of God. Paul is not afraid of the notion of Christ's having a second birth. At Easter he interprets the Father as making that solemn statement, 'Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.' (Acts xiii.33.) 'This day' starts at the first instant of Christ's existence (Rom. i.3; Phil. ii.6), but its high noon is at Easter. Following his birth into the world at Bethlehem, comes a new Christmas in a blaze of light" (op. cit., p. 126). In any event, by virtue of His resurrection, Jesus became more than perfected Man, the prototype of glorified humanity (I Cor. 15:35-57; Phil. 3:20-21); He became even far more than the Destroyer of death (II Tim. 1:10; Rev. 1:18). By virtue of His resurrection Jesus was declared to be Lord and Christ (Acts 2:36), invested with universal power (Matt. 28:18). And in its NT use, as Filson points out, kúrios signifies "the Resurrection and Exaltation. . . . What do these references to Exaltation and lordship mean? They imply and result from the Resurrection. They recognize that for his earthly work Jesus has been uniquely honored by the Father. But this does not mean that Jesus is now taking a long heavenly vacation, without active interest in the life of the church. He has a central role in the continuing life of his people. As his position at the right hand of God implies, he acts with authority as God's supreme and central agent in the carrying out of God's will. The idea that once Easter is over, we are through with Jesus until the last judgment (if there is one), completely misunderstands NT faith and preaching. Jesus is the effective and active Lord of his church" (Filson, op. cit., pp. 50-51). Thus by virtue of His resurrection, the despised Nazarene became Head of the Church (Eph. 1:19-23) and cosmic Sovereign, though His sovereignty is as yet incognito (Phil. 2:9-11). By virtue of His resurrection, He also became a life-giving Spirit (Acts 2:32-33; I Cor. 15:45). Milligan's comment on this point is insightful: "When, therefore, we apprehend in faith that Second Adam from whom the new life comes, it is with the Redeemer as One who not only died but who rose again that we have to do; and the Church of Christ felt this with that wonderful instinct of which it is difficult to speak as if it were less than inspiration. Why did her weekly day of worship not commemorate the Incarnation or the death upon the cross? Because neither was the beginning of her life. At neither of these points of His history was her Lord in a position to give her life. It was at His Resurrection that He became a 'life-giving spirit' — a spirit clothed with a body entirely conformed to His spiritual state, and able without let or hindrance to dispense itself to man in all the fulness of its heavenly power. In the Risen Christ, therefore, the new life of believers has its source" (Milligan, op. cit., pp. 169-170).

By virtue of His resurrection, moreover, our Saviour entered upon His ministry as High Priest, presenting His own sacrificial blood to the Father, performing the functions of intercession (Rom. 8:34) and benediction. Though the Letter to the Hebrews contains only a single reference to the resurrection (13:20), the truth expressed in that single reference is nevertheless presupposed at every turn in the apostolic argument: the resurrected Christ is the Melchizedekian Priest. Again, by virtue of His resurrection, our Saviour was appointed Judge of the living and the dead (Acts 10: 42; 17:31). In sum, by virtue of His resurrection, Jesus is now perfected Man, seated at the right hand of the Majesty on high, victorious and vindicated, the Destroyer of death, a life-giving Spirit, the Saviour, Head, and Priest of His people, the world's future King and Judge.

Soteriologically considered, the resurrection is an integral part of the whole redemptive process. It is, to be sure, the sign of the Father's approbation, the miracle by which the Son's sacrifice is attested and accepted. But it is no mere addendum to Calvary, an idea which Milligan demolishes. On the cross, Jesus finished His work of passive obedience; there His submission to suffering and struggle came to an end. But very significantly in the NT salvation is never connected merely with the death of Christ; it is connected with His blood, the blood which as priest He now offers. A text like Hebrews 9:12-14 reveals irrefutably that "we must think of Christ's blood as living blood, and of the pardon of sin as only the initiatory result of His sacrifice of Himself. In short, through all Christ's offering we deal with life. Christ is 'a living sacrifice'; we are in Him, and sharing the blessings of His salvation, are also 'a living sacrifice' (Rom. xii.1). And the end and purpose of everything that is done is that we may be brought into loving fellowship with God, and into the holy life which such fellowship involves; 'for if the blood of goats and bulls, and the ashes of a heifer sprinkling them that have been defiled, sanctify unto the cleanness of the flesh; how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered Himself without blemish unto God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?' (Heb. ix. 13,14)" (Milligan, op. cit., pp. 283-284). Only a risen Lord can be a life-giving Spirit and therefore a Saviour. Only a risen Lord can be a Saviour because only a risen Lord, as Head and Priest of His people, can truly and fully save, carrying every member of His body with Him through death into glory by the power of His endless life.

Eschatologically considered, the resurrection is the pledge and pattern of a creation from which the ravages of sin have been sacrificially removed, a cosmos brought to its God-intended fulfillment. William Hordern is merely paraphrasing the NT when he writes concerning the resurrection: "It was the shattering of history by the creative act of God. It begins a new era for the universe, a decisive turning point for the human race. To men held in the grip of fear and futility, to men who see only the blind laws of nature grinding on their way, foredooming man to his fate; to men who see no hope for the future of mankind, the Resurrection proclaims the fact that there is a power at work in the world which is mightier than all the forces that crucified our Lord. The Resurrection is not just a personal survival of the man Jesus, a phenomenon to be studied by the Society of Psychical Research; it is a cosmic victory." (A Layman's Guide to Protestant Theology, New York: The Macmillan Company, 1955, p. 205). The resurrection of Jesus is of course a guarantee that life continues after death (John 11:25-26; 14:19), as well as a guarantee of judgment to come (Acts 17:31). But the NT does not speak of an abstract, immaterial survival; it speaks of bodily resurrection, a life after death in which the total man participates. Thus the resurrected body of our Lord prophesies the nature of that future embodiment which believers will enjoy — a body recognizably the same (Luke 24:36-43; John 20:27), a body no longer subject to space-time limitations (Luke 24:31; John 20:19,26), a body changed and glorified (Matt. 22:30; I Cor. 6:13; 15:30-38,51), a body adapted to serve as the instrument of personality in a new dimension of existence.

Beyond the purely personal effects of the resurrection, however, lie its cosmic outworkings. Here the great and sufficient text is Romans 8:19-22. As Durrwell puts it in a memorable sentence, "The mystery of Easter will be imprinted on the universe" (op. cit., p. 300).

III. The Historicity of the Resurrection. Granted that the disciples of Jesus believed Him to be alive after His passion — and virtually no scholar today denies that the early Church sprang from a sincere faith in the resurrection — what if that faith was sincerely mistaken? Then Paul's dolorous conclusions follow (I Cor. 15:17-19). To establish the factuality of the resurrection — insofar as the uniqueness of that event allows — is therefore a top-priority task in Christian apologetics.

Little time need be spent refuting the shopworn theories by which unbelief has sought to explain away the Easter miracle. The older criticism, whether deistic, agnostic, or atheistic, operated on the presupposition that we live in a closed universe, absolutely governed by a causal nexus which renders any divine inbreaking unthinkable. Thus it was driven to advance such untenable hypotheses as the swoon theory (on the cross Jesus passed into a death-like coma from which He revived in the coolness of the tomb), the fraud theory (the Jewish authorities were correct in alleging that the followers of Jesus had stolen His corpse), the hallucination theory (hope, faith, and love conspired à la Renan to create "appearances" which, while real to the disciples, were only illusions). Detailed refutation of these views is abundantly available. (Cf., e.g., the works by Milligan, Edgar, Ramsey, together with Frank Morison, Who Moved the Stone?, Doremus A. Hayes, The Resurrection Fact, and Arnold Lunn, The Third Day.)

More recent critics continue to operate on essentially the same presupposition even if they do so less blatantly. Adhering to theism in most instances, they recoil from the crass miracle of a bodily resurrection which leaves a tomb empty. Hastings Rashdall may serve as spokesman for this entire school of theology or, more correctly, philosophy. "The disappearance or absolute annihilation, the reanimation, or the sudden transformation into something not quite material and yet not quite spiritual, of a really dead body, would involve the violation of the best ascertained laws of physics, chemistry, and physiology. Were the testimony fifty times stronger than it is, any hypothesis would be more possible than that. But in the present state of our knowledge of the kind of causality which is discovered in the relation between mind and mind, or between mind and body, there is nothing to be said against the possibility of an appearance of Christ to His disciples which was a real, though supernormal psychological event, but which involved nothing which can properly be spoken of as a suspension of natural law" (From an unpublished essay quoted in Kirsopp Lake: The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1907, pp. 268-269). That is why Kirsopp Lake personally advocates the hypothesis that the women who came to anoint the body of our Lord probably visited the wrong grave, coincidentally encountering a stranger from whom they fled. Lake candidly admits, however, that his hypothesis is indeed a hypothesis, a theory framed in keeping with his own conviction that a quasi-materialistic life after death is unthinkable. "The historical evidence is such that it can be fairly interpreted consistently with either of the two doctrinal positions . . . but it does not support either. The story of the empty tomb must be fought out on doctrinal, not on historical or critical grounds" (op. cit., p. 253). For similar reasons Canon B. H. Streeter adopts the vision theory of Theodore Keim, who, repudiating the idea of hallucination, wrote in a famous paragraph: "We find ourselves in the midst of impossibilities when we make the ordained of God to end, or when we leave the matter to the chance-play of visions, that he is awakened from the dead for the dead. The evidence that Jesus was alive, the telegram from heaven, was necessary after an earthly downfall which was unexampled and, in the childhood of the human race, would be convincing. The evidence that he was alive was therefore given by his own impulsion and by the will of God. The Christianity of today owes to this evidence, first its Lord and then its own existence: the latter, because it rejoices in Him, and because it sees its own future. . . . Thus, though much has fallen away, the faith-fortress of the resurrection of Jesus remains" (Quoted in Ramsey, op. cit., p. 51). Streeter holds that the body of Jesus must have been removed by human agency and that, consequently, the tomb was actually empty. But in order to reassure the disciples God sent a "telegram from heaven"; in other words, He granted a series of veritable appearances by the living Christ. Streeter further maintains that Jesus possibly revealed Himself to His disciples "in some form such as might be covered by Paul's phrase 'a spiritual body'; possibly through some psychological channel similar to that which explains the mysterious means of communication between persons commonly known as telepathy; or possibly in some way which we have at present no conception. On such a view the appearances to the disciples can only be called visions, if by visions we mean something directly caused by the Lord Himself, veritably alive and personally in communion with them" ("The Historic Christ," Foundations, Seven Oxford Men, London: Macmillan and Co., Limited, 1913, p. 136). Emil Brunner also objects to the NT assertions regarding a bodily resurrection and a vacant tomb, though he holds fast to the "truth" or eschatological significance of the resurrection (The Mediator, Philadelphia: The Westminster Press, 1947, pp. 576-583. For an effective answer cf. G. R. Beasley-Murray Christ Is Alive!, pp. 15-18). The views of Karl Barth, Rudolph Bultmann, and John Knox are acutely analyzed in Richard R. Niebuhr's Resurrection and Historical Reason. It is Niebuhr's opinion that these theologians, however diverse their positions, are still enthralled by Immanuel Kant, "working . . . with conceptual tools fashioned by the father of modern philosophy. Hence Niebuhr charges that "So far as the basic problem of a positive attitude toward the Biblical history is concerned, there is no indication of a 'neo-orthodox' movement. Rather, the fundamental positions outlined by the nineteenth-century theologians continue to mold contemporary methodology" (Richard R. Niebuhr, Resurrection and Historical Reason, New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1957, p. 81). What Christianity requires, Niebuhr insists, is "a genuinely theological conception of history and historical reason" (op. cit., p. 104). Into the subtleties of this debate it is unnecessary to enter now. Suffice it to say that there are no valid reasons for disbelieving the NT accounts of our Lord's resurrection (Twelve reasons for accepting the factuality of the Easter miracle are given by Samuel Zwemer, The Glory of the Empty Tomb, New York: Fleming H. Revell Company, 1947, pp. 43-44). On Christian presuppositions the Biblical evidence is more than adequate. Operating on their own presuppositions, evangelicals can say with Ramsey: "We would not use these presuppositions for the pressing of historical conclusions; but we would so bear them in mind as to avoid a sort of inhibition if the converging lines of evidence seem to point to a supernatural event at the climax of the story of Christ. Thus if the evidence is pointing us towards a Resurrection of an utterly unique sort we will not be incredulous, for the Christ is Himself a unique and transcendent fact in history. If the evidence is pointing us towards a miracle we will not be troubled, for the miracle will mean not only a breach of the laws that have been perceived in this world but a manifestation of the purpose of the creator of a new world and the redeemer of our own. And if the evidence is pointing us towards an act wherein spirit and body are strangely blended and exalted, our minds will have no terrors: for the message of the NT is pervaded through and through by the belief that the spiritual and the material are interwoven in the purpose of the Word-made-flesh. Why is it judged incredible with you, if God should raise the dead?" (op. cit., pp. 57-58). V.C.G.

REU (rē'ū, Heb. re'û, friendship), the son of Peleg and a fifth generation son of Shem (Gen. 11:10-19). Peleg is called Phalec in Luke 3:35, and Reu is called Ragau.

REUBEN (rōō'bĕn, Heb. re'ûvēn, Gr. Rhoubén, See a son!), the eldest son of Jacob, born to him by Leah in Padan-aram (Gen. 29:32). Nothing is known about his early life, except that he brought mandrakes (q.v.) to his mother which she used in getting Jacob to give her another son (Gen. 30:14f). Reuben committed incest at Eder (Gen. 35:22). Either because of this sin, or out of innate weakness (Gen. 49:4) his tribe never rose to power. He delivered Joseph from death by warning his brothers against the results of such an act (Gen. 37:19-22; 42:22) and later offered his sons a surety for Benjamin (42:37). He took four sons into Egypt (Gen. 46:9). When Israel went from Egypt, he had 151,450 descendants (Num. 1:21, 2:16). Reubenites made a covenant with Moses in order to occupy the rich grazing lands of Gilead (Num. 32:1-33). That they kept the covenant is attested by the monument to Bohan, a descendant of Reuben (Josh. 15:6). When the other tribes were settled in Canaan, Reuben, Gad and half of Manasseh returned to Gilead and set up a great monument as a reminder of the unity of Israelites (Josh. 22). In protecting their flocks against marauding nomads they became a bold and skilled warlike people (I Chron. 5:1-19). They sent 120,000 men to support King David (I Chron. 12:37). They were oppressed during Jehu's reign (II Kings 10:32,33). They were taken into captivity by Tiglath-pileser of Assyria (I Chron. 5:25,26).

REUBENITES (rōō'bĕn-īts), descendants of Reuben, son of Jacob. When Moses took the census in Midian, Reuben numbered 43,730 men of military age (Num. 26:1-7). They were joint possessors of Gilead and Bashan (Deut. 3:12; 29:8), and were praised by Moses for their fidelity (Josh. 22:1-6). They supported David against the Philistines (I Chron. 11:42; 12:37). Tiglath-pileser took them into the Assyrian captivity.

REUEL (rōō'ĕl, Heb. re'û'ēl, God is friend). 1. A son of Esau by Mashemath (Gen. 36:4,10).

2. A priest in Midian who gave Moses a daughter as wife (Exod. 2:16-22)), probably the same as Jethro (Exod. 3:1).

3. The father of Eliasaph (called Deuel in Num. 1:14; 7:42, etc.; Num. 2:14).

4. A Benjamite (I Chron. 9:8).

REUMAH (rōō'mà), a concubine of Nahor who was a brother of Abraham (Gen. 22:20-24).

REVELATION. The word "revelation" is of Latin derivation and means "unveiling." It is the translation of the Greek apokalýpsis. The last book of the Bible was named by its author The Apocalypse [Unveiling] of Jesus Christ, and the title (as also the same phrase in I Cor. 1:7; II Thess. 1:7; I Pet. 1:7,13) refers to the visible return of the Lord. But elsewhere the word almost always refers to the making known of truth in propositional or experiential form.

In Christian theology the doctrine of revelation is the doctrine of God's making Himself and relevant truths known to men. It is customary to divide the subject into "general" and "special" revelation. For purposes of this article, and contrary to custom, it seems best to discuss the latter first.

Special Revelation is found (1) in the person and work of Jesus Christ, and (2) in the Bible.

1. Christians hold that "God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself" (II Cor. 5:19), not merely in the sense that Jesus was a man through whom God worked, but in the sense that "In him dwells all the fullness of deity (theotes) in bodily form" (Col. 2:9 my translation here and elsewhere if the KJV is not followed). He was "God manifest in the flesh" (I Tim. 3:16), the second person of the Trinity, coequal, coeternal, and consubstantial with the Father and the Spirit.

This being the case, it follows that Christians regard every act, every moment in the life of Jesus as revelatory. What He says, does, and experiences, God-in-the-flesh, says, does and experiences. The title "Word," Logos (John 1:1-18; Rev. 19:13), presents Him as the "rational expression" of God. He is the "visible presentation (eikon) of the invisible God" (Col. 1:15), "the [visible] stamp of His [God's] substance" charakter tes hypostaseos autou (Heb. 1:3). When Jesus said, "I and the Father are one" (John 10:30), He was not denying the numerical distinctions of the persons of the Trinity, but affirming the unity of the divine substance. When He said to Philip, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (John 14:8,9), He indicated that, with reference to Philip's request, "Show us the Father," Jesus is Himself as full a "showing" as Philip could possibly comprehend.

The incarnation, Jesus Christ in history, is the point of the wedge in the Christian approach to the world. "God, who in many portions and many modes spoke of old to the fathers by the prophets, hath, at the end of these days, spoken to us by the Son" (Heb. 1:1,2). The Christian's God is not mythological or imaginary. He is revealed in a well-documented life in the flesh at a well-known juncture of time and place in history.

2. It is impossible in a brief article to enter into evidences that the Bible is divine revelation. Suffice it to say that for the faithful Church down through the centuries "the Bible is the Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice." (See Gaussen's Theopneustia, James Orr's The Bible Under Trial, and especially Warfield's Revelation and Inspiration.)

That Christ and His apostles believed and taught that the Bible in its entirety is divine revelation is brought out by Warfield with overwhelming evidence. For example, Christ said, "The Scriptures cannot be broken" (John 10:35); and Paul said, "All Scripture is God-breathed" (II Tim. 3:16). Peter declares that "No Scripture ever came into being as a private release, nor was any [scriptural] prophecy ever brought by human volition, but men spoke from God, being carried along by the Holy Spirit" (II Pet. 1:20,21). For the writers of the NT, what the Scripture says, God says.

It may be argued that all the references cited in the last paragraph above apply to the OT. This is true, but there is abundant evidence that the NT writers claimed an equal authority. See, for example, II Thessalonians 3:6,14,16. Peter calls Paul's epistles "Scripture" (II Pet. 3:15,16); and Paul quotes a saying of Jesus' found in Matthew 10:10 and Luke 10:7 as Scripture (I Tim. 5:18).

On the nature of the Bible as revelation, the reader is invited to meditate. Peter refers to the prophetic Word as "more sure" than his own eyewitness experience of the transfiguration (II Pet. 1:16-19), and he says that to this Word, "you do well to devote yourselves, as to a light shining in a dark, squalid place."

General Revelation is found outside the Bible, and apart from Jesus Christ in the flesh, (1) in nature and (2) in the convicting work of the Holy Spirit. It is proper to consider general revelation after special revelation, because, while the Bible is just as truly a part of the human environment as any other book, and while Jesus is just as much a part of verifiable history (See the article on Resurrection) as Julius Caesar, yet it is in Christ and in the Bible that we find explicit propositional revelation. It is appropriate to begin with the propositional explicit in any inquiry, and to take up later the merely inferential.

1. Nature does not give propositional truth. It gives data from which inferences are reasonably drawn. Those who reject natural theistic evidences set these evidences off as though it were claimed that they are mathematical demonstrations. Thomas Aquinas, unsatisfactory as his formulations are, never claimed syllogistic cogency for his "proofs."

Psalms 8 and 19 (see Rom. 10:18) and many other Scriptures declare that there is divine revelation in nature. Inductive evidence may be good and sufficient evidence. Paul makes a vehement statement which assumes the force of natural revelation: "From the creation of the cosmos, God's invisible attributes, his eternal power and divine character (theiotes, not theotes as in Col. 2:9), known by the things [which he] made, are clearly seen, so that they [who turn from God] are inexcusable" (Rom. 1:20).

2. The promise of Christ that the Holy Spirit will convict the world of the sin of rejecting Him (John 16:8-11) does not indicate revelation of facts otherwise unknown, but it does emphasize a much neglected truth. Given the data of special revelation and of revelation in nature, the Holy Spirit, administering both the common grace and the special grace of God, does act upon the hearts and minds of men in convicting power, enabling them to see what they see (Matt. 13:13-15) and to comprehend what they hear, and enabling (Eph. 2:8; Phil. 2:13) God's elect to accept their Saviour. Thus Paul refers to his conversion (Gal. 1:15,16) as God's act of revealing His Son in Him. See also GOD. J.O.B.

REVELATION, BOOK OF THE (Gr. apocalýpsis, an unveiling), sometimes called The Apocalypse, is the last book of the Bible and the only book of the NT that is exclusively prophetic in character. It belongs to the class of apocalyptic literature in which the divine message is conveyed by visions and dreams (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE). The title which the book itself assumes (1:1) may mean either "the revelation which Christ possesses and imparts," or "the unveiling of the person of Christ." Grammatically, the former is preferable, for this text states that God gave this disclosure to Christ that He might impart it to His servants.

The Author. Unlike many apocalyptic books which are either anonymous or published under a false name, Revelation is ascribed to John, evidently a well-known character among the churches of Asia Minor. He claimed to be a brother of those who were suffering persecution, and was called by one of the angels who imparted to him the vision of a "prophet."

The earliest definite historical reference to this Apocalypse appears in the works of Justin Martyr (c. A.D. 135), who, in alluding to the 20th chapter, said that John, one of the apostles of Christ, prophesied that those who believed in Christ would dwell in Jerusalem a thousand years. Irenaeus (A.D. 180) quoted Revelation five times, and named John as the author. Clement of Alexandria (c. A.D. 200) received the book as authentic Scripture, and the Muratorian Fragment (c. A.D. 170) lists it as a part of the accepted canon by the end of the second century.

Its relation to John, the son of Zebedee, was questioned by Dionysius of Alexandria (A.D. 231-265) on the grounds that the writer unhesitatingly declared his name, whereas the author of the Fourth Gospel did not do so, and that the vocabulary and style were utterly different from the Johannine Gospel and Epistle. He admitted that the Apocalypse was undoubtedly written by a man named John, but not by the beloved disciple. Eusebius, who quotes Dionysius at length, (Historia Ecclesiae, VII, 25) mentions both in the quotation and also in a discussion of his own (HE III, 39) that there were hints of two Johns in Ephesus, and intimates that one wrote the Gospel, and the other, Revelation. This view is not generally supported by the Fathers, nor does the internal evidence make it necessary. The second "John" is a shadowy figure, and cannot be identified with any of the known disciples of Jesus mentioned in the Gospels. The so-called grammatical mistakes are chiefly unidiomatic translations of Hebrew or Aramaic expressions, which would be impossible to render literally into Greek. The very nature of the visions made smooth writing difficult, for the seer was attempting to describe the indescribable. There are some positive likenesses to the accepted Johannine writings, such as the application of the term "Word of God" to Christ (19:13), the reference to the "water of life" (22:17), the concept of the "Lamb" (5:6). It is possible that John had the aid of an amanuensis in writing the Gospel and the Epistles, but that he was forced to transcribe immediately the visions that he had without the opportunity to reflect on them or to polish his expression.

Date and Place. There are two prevailing views regarding the date of the Apocalypse. The earlier date in the reign of Nero is favored by some because of the allusion to the temple in 11:1-2, which obviously refers to an early structure. Had the Apocalypse been written after A.D. 70, the temple in Jerusalem would not have been left standing. The number 666 in 13:18 has also been applied to Nero, for the total numerical value of the consonants of his name, if spelled NERON KESAR, will add up to 666 exactly. In the 18th chapter the allusion to the five kings that are fallen, one existing, and one yet to come, could refer to the fact that five emperors, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, had already passed away; another, perhaps Galba, was reigning, and would be followed shortly by still another (17:9-11). By this reasoning the Revelation would belong at the end of Nero's reign, when his mysterious suicide had given rise to the belief that he had merely quit the Empire to join the Parthians, with whom he would come to resume his throne later.

A second view, better substantiated by the early interpreters of the book, places it in the reign of Domitian (A.D. 81-96), almost at the close of the first century. Irenaeus (c. A.D. 180), Victorinus (c. A.D. 270), Eusebius (c. A.D. 328), and Jerome (c. A.D. 370) all agree on this date. It allows time for the growth of declension that is presupposed by the letters to the churches, and it fits better with the historical conditions of the Roman empire depicted in the symbolism.

The place of writing was the island of Patmos, where John had been exiled for his faith. Patmos was the site of a penal colony, where political prisoners were condemned to hard labor in the mines.

Destination. Revelation was addressed to seven churches of the Roman province of Asia, which occupied the western third of what is now Turkey. The cities where these churches were located were on the main roads running N and S, so that a messenger carrying these letters could move in a direct circuit from one to the other. There were other churches in Asia at the time when Revelation was written, but these seem to have been selected because they were representative of various types of need and of Christian experience. They have been variously interpreted to represent successive periods in the life of the Church, or as seven aspects of the total character of the Church. Undoubtedly they were actual historical groups known to the author.

Occasion. Revelation was written for the express purpose of declaring "the things which must shortly come to pass" (Rev. 1:1), in order that the evils in the churches might be corrected and that they might be prepared for the events that were about to confront them. The moral and social conditions of the empire were deteriorating, and Christians had already begun to feel the increasing pressure of paganism and the threat of persecution. The book of Revelation provided a new perspective on history by showing that the kingdom of Christ was eternal, and that it would ultimately be victorious over the kingdoms of the world.

Methods of Interpretation. There are four main schools of interpretation. The Preterist holds that Revelation is simply a picture of the conditions prevalent in the Roman empire of the late first century, cast in the form of vision and prophecy to conceal its meaning from hostile pagans. The Historical view contends that the book represents in symbolic form the entire course of Church history from the time of its writing to the final consummation, and that the mystical figures and actions described therein can be identified with human events in history. The Futurist, on the basis of the threefold division given in Revelation 1:19, suggests that "the things which thou sawest" refer to the immediate environment of the seer and the vision of Christ (1:9-19), "the things which are" denote the churches of Asia, or the Church age, which they symbolize (2:1-3:22), and "the things which shall be hereafter" relate to those events which will attend the return of Christ and the establishment of the city of God. The Idealist or Symbolic school treats Revelation as purely a dramatic picture of the conflict of good and evil which persists in every age, but which cannot be applied exclusively to any particular historical period.

Structure and Content. Revelation contains four great visions, each of which is introduced by the phrase "in the spirit" (1:10; 4:2; 17:3; 21:10). Each of these visions locates the seer in a different place, each contains a distinctive picture of Christ, and each advances the action significantly toward its goal. The first vision (1:9-3:22) pictures Him as the critic of the churches, who commends their virtues and condemns their vices in the light of His virtues. The second vision (4:1-16:21) deals with the progressive series of seals, trumpets and bowls, which mark the judgment of God upon a world dominated by evil. The third vision (17:1-21:8) depicts the overthrow of evil society, religion, and government in the destruction of Babylon and the defeat of the beast and his armies by this victorious Christ. The last vision (21:9-22:5) is the establishment of the city of God, the eternal destiny of His people. The book closes with an exhortation to readiness for the return of Christ.

Outline:

Introduction: The Return of Christ 1:1-8
I. Christ, the Critic of the Churches 1:9-3:22
II. Christ, the Controller of Destiny 4:1-16:21
III. Christ, the Conqueror of Evil 17:1-21:8
IV. Christ, the Consummator of Hope 21:9-22:5
Epilogue: Appeal and Invitation 22:6-21

REVELLING (Gr. kómos, orgy), a word used to designate any extreme intemperance and lustful indulgence, usually accompanying pagan worship. Paul lists it with murder as barring the way into the kingdom of God (Gal. 5:21), and Peter denounces it (I Pet. 4:3). The word is translated riotous in Romans 13:13 and revel in II Peter 2:13 (RSV).

REVILE, REVILER, REVILING (Heb. qālal, Gr. antiloidoréo, blaspheméo, loidoréo, oneidizo), a word meaning to address with opprobrious or contumelious language; to reproach. Israelites were forbidden to revile their parents on pain of death (Exod. 21:17). Israel was reviled by Moab and Ammon (Zeph. 2:8). Jesus endured reviling on the cross (Mark 15:32). Revilers will have no part in the kingdom of God (I Cor. 6:10).

REVISED VERSIONS (See Bible, English version)

REWARD, a word rendering at least a dozen different Hebrew and Greek words with very similar meanings. In modern English the word means something given in recognition of a good act. In the ERV, however, it generally refers to something given, whether for a good or a bad act (Ps. 91:8; Jer. 40:5; Mic. 7:3; I Tim. 5:18).

REZEPH (rē'zĕf, Heb. retseph, stronghold), an important caravan center in ancient times. It was ravaged by Assyria during Hezekiah's reign (II Kings 19:8-12; Isa. 37:12). It may be the modern Rusafah, a few miles W of the Euphrates.

REZIA (rē-zī'â), a descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:39); also Rizia.

REZIN (rē'zĭn, Heb. retsîn). 1. The last king of Syria to reign in Damascus. He was used to chasten Judah (II Kings 15:37). He restored Syrian cities 16:6), and the siege which he and Pekah undertook against Jerusalem led Isaiah to assure Judah by issuing the prophecy about the virgin birth of the Messiah (Isa. 7:4-16). To escape Rezin, Ahaz made an alliance with Tiglath-pileser, who invaded Israel, captured Damascus, slew Rezin and carried the Syrians into captivity (II Kings 16:9). Tiglath left many records of his conquests, some of which show Rezin (Rasuni in the tablets) to have been an important ruler. One tablet contains an account of his death, but it was lost after the English scholar Sir Henry Rawlinson had read it. After Rezin's death Syria never recovered her prestige.

2. Founder of a family of Nethinims, or temple servants, who are mentioned in I Chronicles 9:2; Ezra 2:43-48.

REZON (rē'zŏn, Heb. rezôn, nobleman), a citizen of Zobah, a small country NW of Damascus. Evidently a rebel, he took advantage of an invasion of Zobah by David and led a band of guerrillas to Damascus where he made himself king. Hadadezer, the rightful king, was overthrown by David, and Rezon met little opposition (I Kings 11:23-25). He must have been a wise ruler, for Syria soon became a strong nation. He made an alliance with Hadad of Edom and began to harass Israel whom he hated (vs. 25). He is almost certainly the same as Hezion mentioned in I Kings 15:18, although Hezion could have been his son. In either case, he founded a dynasty of strong Syrian rulers, among them being the noted Ben Hadad I and his son, Ben Hadad II.

RHEGIUM (rē'jĭ-ŭm, Gr. Rhégion), modern Reggio, was a Greek colony on the toe of Italy, founded in 712 B.C. Opposite Messana in Sicily, where the strait is only six miles wide, Rhegium was an important strategic point. As such it was the special object of Rome's care, and in consequence a loyal ally. The port was also a haven in extremely difficult water. Paul's ship, having tacked widely to make Rhegium, waited in the protection of the port for a favorable S wind to drive her through the currents of the strait on the course to Puteoli (Acts 28:13).

RHESA (rē'sà, Gr. Rhesá), the son of Zerubbabel, hence a scion of Solomon (Luke 3:27).

RHODA (rō'dà, Gr. Rhóda, rose), the name of the girl who answered the door in the very human story of Acts 12:13. She was a servant, probably a slave of Mary, John Mark's mother.

RHODES (rōdz, Gr. Rhódos, rose), a large island off the mainland of Caria, some 420 square miles in extent. Three city-states originally shared the island, but after internal tension and conflict with Athens which lasted from 411 to 407 B.C., a federal capital with the same name as the island was founded. Rhodes controlled a rich carrying trade, and after the opening of the E by Alexander, became the richest of all Greek communities, and able to maintain its independence under the Diadochi or "Successors" of Alexander. Rhodes, over this period, became a center of exchange and capital, and successfully policed the seas. Coming to terms with the rising power of Rome, Rhodes cooperated with the Republic against Philip V of Macedon, and Antiochus of Syria (201-197 B.C.). In the third Macedonian war Rhodes adopted a less helpful attitude, and in spite of the protests of Cato, preserved in one of the earliest samples of Latin oratory, the state was punished by economic reprisals. Rome in fact was seeking an excuse to cripple a rival to her growing eastern trade. The amputation of Rhodes' Carian and Lycian dependents, and the declaration of Delos as a free port ruined the community (166 B.C.). Loyalty to Rome in the war with Mithridates won back some of the mainland possessions, but Rhodes' glory was past, and when Paul called on his way from Troas to Caesarea (Acts 21:1), Rhodes was only a station on the trade routes, a free city, but little more than a provincial town. Rhodes was the center of a sun-cult, the famous colossus being a statue of Helios. See RODANIM. E.M.B.

RIBAI (rī'bī), a Benjamite of Gibeah, father of Ittai (II Sam. 23:29), a mighty man (I Chron. 11:26,31).

RIBLAH (rīb'là, Heb. rivlâh), the city at the head waters of the Orontes River was a stronghold for both Egyptians and Assyrians. Copious water ran from its springs; fertile lands, E and W, and timber lands in near-by Lebanon made it a coveted prize of war. When Pharaoh Necho captured Jerusalem about 600 B.C. he took King Jehoahaz, put Judah under tribute to Egypt, and led the king to Egypt where he died (II Kings 23:31-34). A few years later, Nebuchadnezzar, then at war with Egypt, captured Jeremiah and took King Zedekiah to Riblah as captive. There his sons were killed before him, his eyes were put out and he was taken in chains to Babylon (II Kings 25:6,7). Nebuchadnezzar then destroyed Jerusalem, and the chief priests and temple guards were led to Riblah where, before the Jews were taken into captivity, they were slain (vss. 8:21). Riblah was on the E side of Ain, probably near Mt. Hermon (Num. 34:11).

A 16th century artist's conception of the great Colossus of Rhodes, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. It was of brass, more than 100 feet high, and spanned the harbor entrance. Erected about 288 B.C., it was wrecked by an earthquake about 224 B.C. © RTHPL

RIDDLE (Heb. hîdhâh, from a root meaning to bend or twist, hence any artifice in speech, a hidden saying, a proverb). This is a form of language long used by man. The Queen of Sheba propounded to Solomon "hard questions," or riddles (I Kings 10:1; II Chron. 9:1). A classic example of the riddle is that propounded by Samson to entrap his enemies (Judg. 14:14, RSV). Samson's noted retort to the Philistines is also a riddle (Judg. 14:18b). Solomon became famous as an author of proverbs and riddles (I Kings 4:32). To know dark sayings is a mark of wisdom (Prov. 1:6). Riddle also refers to words of indefinite meaning, "dark speeches" (Num. 12:8; Ps. 49:4), "hard sentences" (Dan. 5:12), "taunting proverb" (Heb. 2:6). A NT riddle appears in Revelation 13:18, and another in I Corinthians 13:12, marg.

RIGHTEOUSNESS (Heb. tsaddîq, Gr. dikaiosýne, the quality of rightness or justice). One word root in the NT, dik, and a corresponding root in the OT, tsedeq, convey the essential idea of righteousness, or *right*ness. Some authorities say that the original meaning of dik is "upright"; others say "custom." The latter suggestion is doubtful. In any case the root meaning in Biblical Greek usage is "right," that is, right with reference to whatever norm is implied in the context.

In accordance with the meanings of noun endings (see noun suffixes in any good grammar) dikaiosis (Rom. 4:25; 5:18) speaks of the act of making right, or justification; dikaiosýne (Rom. 3:21-26 and elsewhere frequently) emphasizes the status of rightness, while dikaioma calls attention to the result of making right, either by legal enactment (Rom. 1:32; 8:4 and elsewhere), or by justification (Rom. 5:16,18; Rev. 19:8 and elsewhere). But these nouns are not always sharply distinguished.

In the most frequent and most important Biblical usage, righteousness is conceived as judged by the standard of God's holy law, which is derived from His holy character, and "summarily comprehended" in the decalogue (Exod. 20:1-17).

Throughout the Bible, mankind is considered to be corrupt and lacking in righteousness (Rom. 3:23, etc.) on account of the representative, self-corrupting act of our original progenitor (Rom. 5:12-21). Man is held to be totally incapable of making himself righteous (Rom. 3:19,20).

Only through the atoning work of Christ can man be given righteousness. (Isa. 54:17, "Their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord.")

This imparting of righteousness is in two distinguishable but inseparable phases. In justification by faith man is forensically made right with the demands of the law by the atonement of Christ (II Cor. 5:21). In sanctification he is progressively made righteous in character and conduct (I John 1:7-9). J.O.B.

RIMMON (rĭm'ŏn, Heb. rimmôn, pomegranate). 1. A city near Edom in the southern part of Judah's heritage (Josh. 15:32). It was often associated with Ain. Nehemiah called it En-rimmon (Neh. 11:29).

2. A noted rocky fortress not far from Gibeah was named Sela Rimmon, or Rimmon of the rocks (Judg. 20:45-47).

3. A Benjamite of the clan of the Beerothites. He had two sons who slew Ishbosheth, Jonathan's son, and took his head to David who, in great anger, had them slain (II Sam. 4:2-12).

4. A Syrian god was named Rimmon. After Naaman had been healed of his leprosy, he asked God's prophet for permission to accompany his king when he went to the temple of Rimmon to worship (II Kings 5:15-19).

5. A village of Simeon's heritage. It is listed next to Ain (I Chron. 4:32).

6. A city of Zebulun's heritage which was made a Levitical possession, going to the children of Merari (I Chron. 6:77).

RIMMON-METHOAR (rĭm'ŏn-mĕ'thō-ar, Heb. rimmôn hamethō'ār). This is evidently an error in translation. Rimmon was the place name, Methoar from a Hebrew word meaning "reaching out." It was part of the heritage of Judah (Josh. 19:13). Zebulun's land reached to it and may have included a suburb, hence the descriptive name.

RIMMON PAREZ (See Rimmon-Perez)

RIMMON-PEREZ (rĭm'ŏn pĕ'rĕz, Parez in KJV). It was the fourth camp of Israel after Sinai (Num. 33:16-19). Rimmon was a common place name, due to the abundance of pomegranates at the time in the Near East. Parez means cleft, so this was, no doubt, a valley into which entrance was made between cliffs.

RIMMON, ROCK OF, a natural fortress to which 600 Benjamites fled after escaping slaughter (Judg. 20:45,47; 21:13). It was identified by Robinson as a rocky area near Jeba or Gibeah, still bearing the name. Early Christian writers located it 15 Roman miles NW of Jerusalem.

RING (See Dress)

RING (Heb. tabba'ath, to sink or stamp, Gr. daktýlios, pertaining to a finger). This article of jewelry derived its Hebrew name from its use as a signet. It became the symbol of authority. The pharaoh gave a tabba'ah to Joseph (Gen. 41:42,43). King Ahasuerus gave one to Haman, the enemy of the Jews (Esth. 3:10). The prodigal's father placed a ring on the hand of his son (Luke 15:22). This was more than an ornament; it restored the son to authority in the household. The ring early became very valuable, as is shown by Isaiah's plaint (3:18-23). Originally the signet was worn on a chain or wire about the neck, but the need to safeguard it led to its being put on the hand. Earrings and nose rings were not called tabba'ath. The seal was an engraved stone, fastened to the ring (Exod. 28:11). Such rings have been found among Egyptian artifacts. That they were common during apostolic days is seen from James 2:2 where the Greek word chrysodaktýlios, means "ringed with gold" or wearing many rings.

RING-STREAKED (Heb. 'āqōdh, striped or notched), mottled of color, characterizing Laban's sheep (Gen. 30:35; 31:8,12). Also ring-straked.

RINNAH (rĭn'a, Heb. rinnâh), a son of Shimon of Judah, called son of Hanan in LXX (I Chron. 4:20).

RIOT, translation of various words: Heb. zālal, to squander in evil ways (Prov. 23:20; 28:7); Gr. asotía, waste (Titus 1:6; I Pet. 4:4); kómos, revelry (Rom. 13:13); tryphé, luxury (II Pet. 2:13).

RIPHATH (rī'făth, Heb. rîphath), a son of Gomer (Gen. 10:3; I Chron. 1:6 see marg.).

RISSAH (rĭs'a, Heb. rissâh, ruins), Israel's sixth camp after leaving Sinai (Num. 33:21). Its site is not known, but it was some 200 miles S of Jerusalem.

RITHMAH (rĭth'ma, Heb. rithmâh, juniper), the third camp of Israel from Sinai (Num. 33:18). Some authorities think this an error for Ramath of the South (Josh. 19:8).

RIVER. Of the dozen or so words rendered river in the Bible only three need be mentioned. 1. Nāhār (Gr. potamós) is used of the largest rivers known to the Israelites — the Tigris and Euphrates (Gen. 2:14), the Abana and Pharpar (II Kings 5:12), the Jordan (Mark 1:5), and the rivers of Ethiopia (Zeph. 3:10). The river or the great river usually refers to the Euphrates (Gen. 15:18; 31:21).

2. Nahal usually means a winter torrent the bed of which is dry in summer, but may refer to a perennial stream like the Jabbok (Deut. 2:37).

3. Ye'ôr, a stream, usually refers to the Nile and its mouths (Gen. 41:1; II Kings 19:24). Once it denotes the Tigris (Dan. 12:5-7).

RIVER OF EGYPT, a brook (RSV) on the SW border of Palestine flowing into the Mediterranean Sea (Gen. 15:18; Num. 34:5). Now Wadi el Arish.

RIZPAH (rĭz'pa, Heb. ritspâh, hot stone), a daughter of Aiah, a Horite (I Chron. 1:40, called Ajah in Gen. 36:24). Saul took her as a concubine (II Sam. 3:7a). Ishbosheth, a son of Saul, accused Abner, a cousin, of incest with her (II Sam. 3:7b). The accusation enraged Abner who transferred his allegiance from Saul to David (II Sam. 3:8-21). In his zeal to establish Israel, Saul had slain a host of Gibeonites, and as a result a serious famine had come to Israel. Upon consulting Gibeonites about restitution for the evil, David learned that only the death of Saul's sons would atone. Among those turned over to Gibeon were two sons by Rizpah (II Sam. 21:1-8). Because of Rizpah's devotion to her sons, David had the bones of her sons and those of Saul and Jonathan buried in the tomb of Saul's father, Kish (II Sam. 21:14).

ROADS. For a detailed and historical treatment of the roads of Palestine, Sir G. A. Smith's Historical Geography of the Holy Land may be consulted (esp. pp. 149-154, 263-283, 374, 375, 388-391, 425-430). To summarize: 1. The chief S-N traverse is the road via Pelusium, Rafia, and Gaza, and thence up the Maritime Plain, the ancient invasion route of Thutmose, Rameses, Sennacherib, Cambyses, Alexander, Pompey, Titus, Saladin, Napoleon and Allenby. Carmel closes the northern end. Passage was possible by a rough and exposed route on the seaward side, a path used by Richard Lion-Heart, and by Napoleon on his withdrawal, and known as Les Detroits by the Crusaders. On the landward side, Esdraelon, and thence Phoenicia, was reached by several low passes, chiefly those which run through Megiddo, and the route through the Valley of Dothan (Gen. 37:35). The latter route was used by those seeking Jordan and Damascus.

2. A more easterly traverse from Damascus S lay through the arid deserts and mountains E of the Jordan valley, through the tribal territories of Manasseh, Reuben and Gad, into Moab, and down the desert valley of the Arabah (Deut. 8: 15). This was the so-called King's Highway.

3. Lateral roads from the high country joined the N-S communications of the Maritime Plain, and provided alternative routes across Palestine to Syria and Damascus. One road ran from Gaza to Hebron. Another from Jerusalem ran through Lydda (Lod) to Joppa, with a loop to Emmaus, if that town may be properly located W of Jerusalem (Luke 24). This road was probably Paul's route to Caesarea (Acts 23), branching N at Lydda, and passing through Antipatris.

4. N-S routes inland were naturally not so numerous as those on the easy Maritime Plain. A road, however, ran up to Jerusalem from Hebron through Bethlehem, and continued N from Jerusalem to Samaria, forking at Sychar (John 4).

5. The roads from the E into Judaea cross miles of arid and difficult wilderness. There are roads from Jericho NW to Ai and Bethel, SW to Jerusalem, and SSW to the lower Kidron and Bethlehem. The first was Israel's invasion route, the second the road of Jesus' last journey to Jerusalem, the third probably the route of Naomi and Ruth. There are numerous minor roads W from Engedi and Masada.

6. The Negev desert lies across the southern approaches to Palestine, and thrusts the highways, as is indicated above, either W towards the level seacoast, or E into the Wadi Arabah. Solomon's cargoes from Ophir came, no doubt, by the Arabah route from Ezion-Geber on the Gulf of Akaba, cutting the corner of the Negev S and W of the Dead Sea, and reaching Jerusalem by way of Hebron.

7. "Galilee," writes Smith (op. cit., p. 425) "is covered with roads to everywhere, roads from the harbors of the Phoenician coast to Samaria, Gilead, Hauran and Damascus; roads from Sharon to the valley of the Jordan . . . from Egypt to Assyria. They ran over Lower Galilee by its long parallel valleys, and even crossed the high plateau of Upper Galilee on the shortest direction from Tyre and Sidon to Damascus." The same authority analyzes their detailed routes and historical significance (pp. 425-430).

Sidelights: (a) Paul's conversion took place on one of two routes to Damascus. Paul joined either the road which struck east N of the Sea of Galilee, the main caravan route from Egypt, or, keeping a more northerly direction through Sychar, passed to Scythopolis, and S of the Sea of Galilee. (b) In traveling inland from Neapolis to Philippi, Paul traversed part of the famous Via Egnatia, whose western terminal was Dyrrachium. In proceeding N to Rome by way of Tres Tabernae, he was on the first of Roman roads, the ancient Via Appia. (c) Smith discusses "the desert Gaza" (Acts 8:26) which lay on the Ethiopian's southward journey. The roads of the Maritime plain avoided the dunes and drifting sand by an inland routing, and "desert Gaza" distinguished the ruined town of the Philistines from the new port of the name, by which the Romans were seeking to provide a haven on the difficult coast. (d) Coming to Palestine from Samaria, or journeying back to Haran, Abraham, Eleazer, and Jacob followed old caravan and invasion routes of no clear definition round the westward horn of the Fertile Crescent. (e) None of the roads above listed were paved before Roman days. Smith (op. cit., pp. 232, 626) mentions the remains of Roman road engineering in Palestine. (f) "The Way of the sea," (Isa. 9:1), the Via Maris of the Middle Ages was the route from Damascus to the Maritime Plain, the inner portion of the road from the Euphrates to the Nile, and applied equally to the alternative routes N and S of the Sea of Galilee. ROBBERY, illegal seizure of another's property. Early in Israel's history such a crime was forbidden by law (Lev. 19:13). In the days of the Judges it was unsafe to travel the highways because of robberies (Judg. 5:6) by highwaymen (Judg. 9: 25). Houses were built to resist robbers, who were often base enough to seize the money of orphans and widows (Isa. 10:2). Honor did not exist among thieves (Ezek. 39:10). So depraved had Israel become by Hosea's day that companies of priests had turned to pillage (Hos. 6:9).

David warned against the lust for riches which resulted in robbery (Ps. 62:10). Isaiah wrote of God's hatred for this means of getting a burnt offering (61:8). Among vices of God's people listed by Ezekiel is robbery (22:29). Nahum accused Nineveh of being a center of numerous robberies (Nah. 3:1). Withholding tithes and offerings from God's storehouse was robbery of this kind (Mal. 3:8).

The prevalence of robbery during NT times is attested by the story of the Good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-37). Jesus warned against robbers who will enter the Christian fold (John 10:1). Heaven is the secure depository for those who expect treasures for the future (Matt. 6:19,20). Paul who knew his world as few men of his day knew it, was familiar with violent seizure by thieves (II Cor. 11:26). He also knew that Jesus' claim to equality with God was not one of illegal seizure (Phil. 2:6).

ROBE (See Dress)

ROBINSON'S ARCH is the portion of an arch which remains in the S part of the W exterior wall of the Haram esh-Sherif, or temple area, at Jerusalem. It is named for the Biblical scholar, Edward Robinson, who noted the stonework in 1838 and called attention to its significance in his Biblical Researches. These courses of stone begin some 39 feet from the SW corner of the enclosure wall and extend 51 feet along the wall. Robinson's recognition of their nature was based on the remark of a companion, and his acquaintance with the writings of Josephus led him to link this arch with the bridge to which the Jewish writer refers incidentally five times in his Antiquities. This bridge crossed the Tyropoeon Valley, joining the temple complex on Mt. Moriah with the Xystus, a kind of gymnasium or assembly-place on Mt. Zion. Excavation in the valley by Charles Warren revealed the base of the pier of the arch and parts of the fallen arch itself, but further traces of a bridge at this point are lacking. Farther N along the wall is Wilson's Arch, which is almost completely preserved; here a crossing of the valley can be made out with some certainty. Since Josephus mentions four gates on the W side of the temple area, some associate the arches with these entrances and regard both arches as parts of bridges, but J. Simons and others judge that Robinson's Arch supported not a bridge but a balcony which provided a view of the valley and of the SW hill. C.E.D.

ROBOAM (See Rehoboam)

ROCK (Heb. sela', a cliff or mass of stone; tsûr, a crag; Gr. pétra, any stone). Horeb's rock which Moses was to strike (Exod. 17:6) was tsûr, that in Kadesh to which he was to speak was sela' (Num. 20:8). A sela' was often a natural fortress, as at Rimmon (Judg. 20:45,47). Sometimes it was a mountain (I Sam. 23:25,26). Tsûr in Numbers 23:9 means a craggy height. Both terms are used to refer to God: The Lord is my rock (II Sam. 22:2), my sela' and fortress (Ps. 18:2; 71:3). For their tsûr is not as our rock (Deut. 32:31). See also (Ps. 61:2; 62:2; 95:1). The NT use of petra was both literal and figurative. The petra gave security to the house (Matt. 7:24,25). The Lord's burial place had been cut into a petra (Mark 15:46). Jesus made a distinction between Simon the petros and the basic truth (petra) in Peter's confession, the truth upon which the ekklesia was to be built (Matt. 16:18). Believers are living stones builded into a spiritual house (I Pet. 2:5).

ROD (Heb. maqqēl, matteh, shēvet, Gr. rhábdos), originally a name given to a piece of tree limb used as a support or as a weapon. There is little difference between the word for rod and that for staff. The rod had varying uses in ancient times. Jacob used rods to change the color of Laban's goats and sheep (Gen. 30:37-41). Such rods became a symbol of authority (Jer. 48:17). Moses carried a rod when he returned to Egypt (Exod. 4:2,17,20; 7:9-20). Aaron's rod was used to bring lice upon Egypt (Exod. 8:16,17). Moses' rod, upheld, brought hail and lightning (Exod. 9:23), and locusts (10:13). It caused the sea to divide (14:16). He smote the rock at Horeb (17:5-7) with a rod, and at Kadesh (Num. 20). It was held aloft in Rephidim (Exod. 17:9-13). The rod, used at first as a weapon, came to be a sign of authority, hence a sceptre. To kill a servant with the rod was illegal (Exod. 21:20). The shepherd's rod was used in counting sheep (Lev. 27:32). God's anger was for Job a rod (Job 9:34). Chastisement was symbolized by the rod (Ps. 89:32; 125:3; Prov. 13:24; 22:15; 29:15). The coming of Christ was to be preceded by the rod (Mic. 5:1). Jesus is to win with a rod (sceptre, Ps. 2:9). Paul would use a rod if forced to do so (I Cor. 4:21). Aaron's budding rod was symbolic of Christ's eternal reign (Heb. 9:1-28). The victorious believer will rule with a rod (Rev. 2:27). The temple of God was measured with a rod-like reed (Rev. 11:1).

RODANIM (rŏd'ā-nĭm), a tribe descended from Javan, a son of Japheth (I Chron. 1:5,7). Both here and in Genesis 10:4 the RV gives Dodanim, but the LXX gives Rodanim or Rodians, which rendering is supported by the RSV reading, "men of Rhodes" (Ezek. 27:15). Ezekiel's account of the trade by Dedan (KJV) would link that city with Rhodes. Records of trade between Rhodes and western Mediterranean ports date back to 700 B.C.

ROE, ROEBUCK (See Animals)

ROGELIM (rō'gē-lĭm), a thrifty community near Mahanaim. Its citizens took supplies to David's army (II Sam. 17:27,29), and led him across the Jordan (19:31).

ROHGAH (rō'gà), a descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:34).

ROLL, a scroll, a literary work on papyrus or parchment rolled around a core or spool. The decree of Cyrus to restore the temple was a roll (Ezra 1:1), and Jeremiah wrote on such a roll (36:2). Books with pages did not come into use until the second century A.D. See WRITING.

ROLLER, anything that turns or revolves. Isaiah saw the confusion of wicked nations as a rolling thing before a hurricane (17:13).

ROMAMTI-EZER (rō-măm'tī-ē'zēr, highest help), one of the 12 sons of Heman who were set by David as temple musicians (I Chron. 25:4,31).

ROMAN EMPIRE. 1. Territorial. Considered as a territorial phenomenon, the Roman Empire was the result of a process of expansion which began in the sixth and seventh centuries before Christ. It was a process initiated by the pressure of a difficult environment, in a rapidly filling and not overfertile peninsula, on a Latin-speaking community which occupied a strategically advantageous position on some low hills by the major ford over the Tiber. The main fortress and federation of this group of associated settlements was called Rome, probably an Etruscan name. The origin of the population was an amalgam of tribal elements welded into a dynamic unity on an enclave around the lower reaches of the river by the pressure of the Etruscans to the N, and the Italic hill-tribes of the highlands which formed their hinterland. Casting off the domination of Etruria in a conflict which found traditional consummation in the expulsion of the Tarquin kings in 509 B.C., Rome early began that search for a stable frontier which was to form the guiding motive of her history. That quest, with what Toynbee would call its successive challenge and response, took her step by step to the subjugation of the Italian peninsula, and the domination of its peoples — the Etruscans, whose culture and empire, Asiatic in origin, opportunely decayed in the fourth century before Christ; the Italic tribes, Oscan and Umbrian and related to the Romans, who occupied the highland spine of the peninsula with its associated plains; the Greeks, whose colonies, since the eighth century, had dotted the coast-line from Cumae to Tarentum; and finally the Celtic Gauls of northern Italy and the Po plain.

Italy was Roman to the Alps by the middle of the third century before Christ. This metropolitan empire was no sooner achieved than Rome clashed with Carthage, the great Phoenician commercial empire of the N African coast. The island of Sicily, half Greek, half Carthaginian, lay, a bridgehead and a temptation, between the continents, and became the scene of the first collision between two powers for whom the Western Mediterranean was proving too small a common sphere. Sixty years of intermittent war followed, from which Rome emerged victorious with her first provinces, Sicily, Sardinia, and Spain. An overseas empire thus visibly began, but defense and security were the motives as Rome moved into the sister peninsulas, first Spain and then Greece. In spite of the intrusion into later history of such figures as Caesar and Pompey, it may be fairly said that originally and generally Roman imperialism owed no inspiration to an Alexander, seeking conquest for motives of personal glory and mysticism, no Sennacherib or Nebuchadnezzar systematically building empires and concentrating the world's wealth in mighty capitals, no Cortes or Pizzaro in frank search of loot. Even in the second and first centuries before Christ, when the material advantages of Empire were manifestly corrupting the Republic's ruling class, expansion and conquest were still associated with the search for a defensible frontier and military security.

The eastward movement through Greece, Asia Minor, and the Middle East began in answer to Macedon's support of Carthage in the Second Punic War. It continued logically in the clash with imperial Syria, and found uneasy pause with Pompey's pacification and organization of the eastern Mediterranean completed in 63 B.C. The historic process of expansion was associated with the emergence of successive perils, and Rome's attempts to meet them. In similar fashion the drive to the E died out in the varied efforts to stabilize the Parthian frontier made from the days of Augustus to Trajan. The northward expansion through Gaul, which paused finally on the Rhine and the fortification lines of Northern Britain, was a process similarly motivated. If Pompey was the architect of the eastern Empire, Julius Caesar was the builder of the western, and although in that age of rival dynasts the personal ambitions of army commanders is an element which the historian cannot discount, it remains a fact that it was the uneasy memory in Italy of barbarian inroads from the unpacified northern hinterlands which provided impulse and first occasion for the conquest of Gaul and the associated islands across the Channel.

By the beginning of the Christian era the Roman Empire was reaching the limits of its expansion. It was the policy of Augustus to consolidate, but that policy was based upon a shrewd realization that the physical limit of Roman expansive energy was in sight. It is true that the sable frontier of long search was still elusive. Shocked by a major military disaster in A.D. 9, as the armies probed the difficult German forests towards the Elbe, Augustus had chosen the Rhine as a northern frontier. The Danube formed its logical eastward continuation. The Rhine-Danube line, which in general remained the limit of the Empire, was the longest riverline in Europe. Extensions beyond it, such as Dacia, were never completely integrated, and safer and more defensible alternatives were beyond physical reach. History was to demonstrate how difficult the Rhine-Danube line was to defend, and over it came final disaster. Spain, Gaul, and Britain formed stable enough buttresses in the W, while the southern marches rested on the Sahara, a desert frontier, and strategically the most stable of all. The E, with its vulnerable northern end, and the perennial problem of the Parthians, was never secured, and some of the imagery of the Apocalypse reflects the fear felt in the Middle East of the archer cavalry from over the Euphrates.

The NT came into being, and the early Church was established in an Empire which had organized and pacified a deep belt of territory round the Mediterranean basin, and western Europe. That area owed its security to Rome, a security achieved against notable dangers and grave disadvantages, and destined to endure for a vital three centuries. The same complex of territories owed to Rome a more stable government than much of it had ever known, and a community of life which went far to produce that fusion of Greece, and Rome, and of Palestine which formed the background and climate for the NT and subsequent Christendom.

2. Politically, the term Roman Empire is used in contradistinction to Roman Republic to describe the system of rule and government known as the principate. The year 31 B.C., the date of the Battle of Actium, is arbitrarily chosen as the dividing line. The contemporary observer was conscious of no change or transition. Such an observer saw the passing of a peril, and the prospect of peace after another violent bout of civil strife which had plagued a century of constitutional crises. Octavian, Julius Caesar's adoptive nephew, had defeated Antony, and when the victor drew into his hands the powers of the republican magistracies, concentrated in his person the offices and functions of ancient constitutional executives, and added thereto such marks of prestige as those which accompanied the title of "princeps," the appellation of "imperator," and the new name "Augustus," no one at the time, who observed merely the surface of events, saw aught but a continuation and an intensification of a policy which for 50 years had made a mockery of constitutional government. Extraordinary commands and special powers had long since prepared the way for the autocracy which emerged full-fledged with Augustus.

The constitutional breakdown from which the principate arose can be traced back for over a century. The Senate had ruled Rome, more by prestige than by clearly defined legal right to do so, in the great days of Rome's struggle with Carthage. A tight oligarchy, the great families whose members gave Rome her generals and administrators, ruled with a strength and a decisiveness the times demanded, and the land had no reason to regret their leadership. Rome emerged from the wars with Carthage, shaken but victorious, at the beginning of the second century before Christ. At the end of that century the ills which broke the Republic and led to the principate were in full view. The Senate whose leadership had sufficed for a compact city state, and had made shift to rule Italy, proved, in fact, unequal to the task of governing an empire. Three problems were beyond their solution: the city mob, tool and instrument of a new breed of demagogues; the corruption in the dominant minority arising from the temptations of rule in conquered lands; and the power of the generals. All three were problems of empire. The urban proletariat had been built out of a decayed yeoman class ruined by changes in Italian land utilization following vast influx of capital from subjugated territories. The generals owed their power to the needs of distant defence and the military forces which new frontiers demanded. A vested interest was thus created, shared by soldiery and commander. Rome, throughout the next four centuries, was never to hear the last of it, and the only answer would have been the creation of a strong free middle class which the early acceptance of Christianity would have provided. Julius Caesar was the most notable of the military dynasts, and he died under the daggers of a frustrated Senate because he drove too ruthlessly towards the autocratic solution of the Senate's corruption and the Republic's breakdown. His adoptive nephew, Octavius, was a more subtle person. By a mixture of good fortune, astute diplomacy and a flair for picking colleagues, Octavius won power, but it was always power with a flavor of constitutional legality, and characterized by an ancient and accepted terminology. Octavius, later called by the honorary title Augustus, was "emperor" only in the sense that, as supreme commander, he alone had the right to the title "imperator" with which victorious generals had ever been saluted by their troops. To most men he was simply "princeps," or "prince," which meant simply "first citizen." His varied powers, functions and privileges nevertheless added up to autocracy. The system gave peace, and the world, especially the provinces, was prepared to barter a fiction of liberty for that.

The Roman Empire, using the word in the political sense of the term, was the governmental framework of the Roman Peace, that era of centralized government which held the Mediterranean world in comparative tranquillity for significant centuries. No wonder that the Eastern provinces, accustomed since the days of ancient despotism to the deification of rulers, early established the custom of worshiping the Emperor. The notion, justified in Rome itself by the myths of demigods and deified benefactors such as Hercules, gained currency through the writings of poets such as Horace and Vergil, who genuinely believed in the divine call of Augustus, and who, without a transcendent view of deity, saw no incongruity in ascribing divine attributes to a man of destiny. Such were the sinister beginnings of a cult which Rome chose as a cement of empire, and which led to the clash with the Church, whose early acceptance might have provided a more noble and effective bond.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE. The genuineness of the Epistle has never been seriously questioned by competent critics familiar with first century history. Although other NT epistles have been wrongly attacked as forgeries not written by the alleged authors, this epistle stands with Galatians and I and II Corinthians as one of the unassailable documents of early church history.

There can be no doubt that the author, Paul, formerly Saul of Tarsus (Acts 13:9), was a highly intellectual, rabbinically educated Jew (Gal. 1:14; Acts 22:3) who had been intensely hostile to the Christian movement and had sought to destroy it (Gal. 1:13; I Cor. 15:9; Acts 8:1-3; 9:1,2). Even the critics who reject the supernatural cannot deny the extraordinary nature of the fact that this able enemy became the greatest exponent of the Christian faith and wrote the most powerful statements of Christian doctrine. The accounts of his conversion are given in Acts 9:3-19; 22:1-16; 26:9-18 and the event is alluded to in his writings (Gal. 1:15; I Cor. 15:8-10).

The literary unity of the last two chapters with the body of the epistle has been questioned. There are manuscripts which have the doxology of 16:25-27 at the end of chapter 14; some have it in both places. Yet none of the MSS lacks chapters 15 and 16, and there is no evidence that the epistle was ever circulated in a form in which it ended without its last two chapters.

It is not difficult for anyone who is familiar with letters of a theological and missionary nature to imagine how this inspiring doxology might appear out of its intended place in some copies.

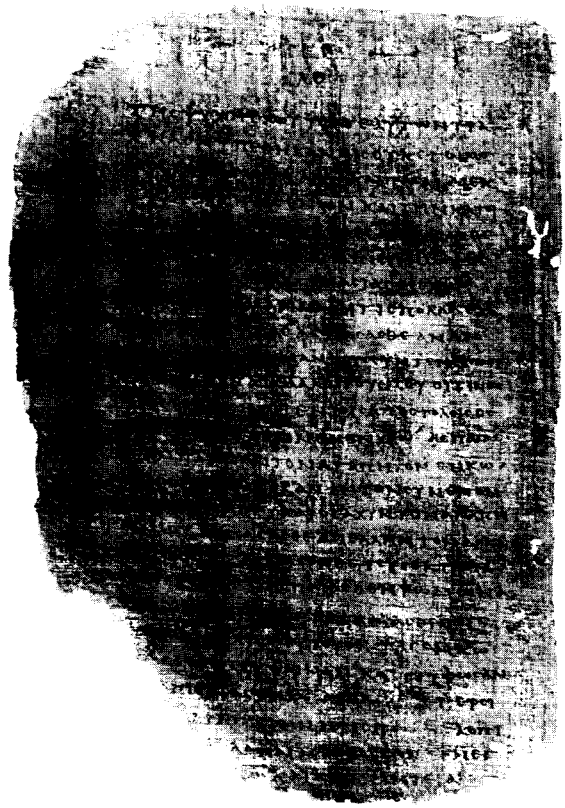
This is a letter, not a treatise. It was not intended to be a formal literary product. In the midst of greetings from friends who were with the author as he wrote (16:21-23), Tertius, the scribe to whom the letter was dictated puts in his own personal greeting (16:22). Perhaps Paul was interrupted at vs. 21. As he stepped away, he said, "Tertius, put in your greeting while I attend to so and so." He returned in a moment and resumed his dictating. The people of the Bible were human beings under human circumstances, and the epistle means more to us because this is so.

Perhaps Paul composed this pericope, 16:25-27, at the end of his discussion of "judging and scandalizing," chapter 14. This little doxology is a compact paragraph, a unit in itself. It would fit in appropriately in a number of places.

The opening verses of chapter 15, on "the strong and the weak," are obviously related to the material in chapter 14. One pictures Paul resuming his work at 15:1 after an interruption. Tertius takes up his pen, and Paul says, "I must say more about the treatment of the weaker brother. The little paragraph of praise to God that we did last, is to go at the very end, after we have finished everything else." Tertius draws a line through it, and later faithfully copies it at the end.

The prayer at the end of chapter 15 is not to be taken as the conclusion of a letter. It is only the appropriate conclusion of a particular topic. Paul had been telling of his itinerary. He is deeply moved as he contemplates the perils of his impending visit to Jerusalem, and he strongly implores the prayers of the saints in Rome in respect to this matter (vss. 30-32). Quite naturally and spontaneously at this point he breaks into a prayer for them. The conclusions of Paul's letters always contain some striking use of the word "grace" (see II Thess. 3:17,18), a word not found here. Therefore the prayer of 15:33 should not be construed as a conclusion of a letter.

The main body of the letter ends at 16:20 with the words "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen." Verses 21 to 24 are intentionally a postscript. He has finished the personal greetings to people in Rome. Phebe, who is to take the letter to Rome, is nearly ready to begin her journey. Greetings from friends in Corinth, who may have assembled for a farewell, belong by themselves in a postscript, followed by another benediction (vs. 24). Then finally comes the exalted doxology (vss. 25-27).



A leaf from the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, from the Michigan Papyri P46 (Beatty-Michigan MS.), in the University of Michigan Library. UML

The peculiarities which have caused some to question the literary unity of the last two chapters with the main body of the epistle, give no ground whatever for questioning the epistle's genuineness. No forger or redactor would have left such matters open to question. The only reasonable explanation of the data is that the epistle is exactly what it purports to be, a personal letter from the Apostle Paul to the Church at Rome, which he was planning to visit.

The time of writing cannot here be discussed in detail. Suffice it to say that the epistle clearly places itself in the three month period (Acts 20:3) which Paul spent in Corinth just before going to Jerusalem. According to the best authorities in NT chronology this three month period was about Dec. 56 to Feb. 57.

Why the epistle was written is not a difficult question to answer. In the first place Paul was emphatic in his claim to be "the apostle of the Gentiles" (Rom. 11:13; 15:16; see also Gal. 2:7-9; Eph. 3:2-8; Acts 9:15; 22:15-21; 26:17-20,23), and Rome was the capital of the Gentile world. Paul was a Roman citizen and a visit to Rome was consistent with his regular mode of operation. He established churches in strategic centers and worked in major cities.

There was this difference, however. There was a church already existing at Rome, probably founded by local people who had heard the Gospel in their travels. It was Paul's peculiar policy to preach in hitherto unevangelized areas (Rom. 15:17-24; cf. also II Cor. 10:14-16). His proposed visit to Rome was not inconsistent, however, for (1) he had a contribution to make to their spiritual welfare (1:11-13), and (2) he planned to visit Rome on his way to evangelize Spain (Rom. 15:24).

He was asking the church in Rome to help him in this project. The structure of the epistle is built around Paul's travel plans.

There was a great theological reason for the writing of this epistle, a problem which had demanded the epistle to the Galatians at an earlier juncture in Paul's ministry. It concerned the relation of (1) the OT Scriptures, (2) contemporaneous pharisaic Judaism, and (3) the Gospel as implemented by the earthly work of Christ. It had been difficult for Peter to orient himself to the new day (Gal. 2:6-14 and ff); but he had made the transition (Acts 15:7-12; see also II Pet. 3:15,16). We may well marvel at Peter's humility and true vision when, in calling Paul's epistles "scripture," he certainly included Galatians, in which his own short sightedness is recalled.

It has been said that if Galatians is the "Magna Charta" of the Gospel, Romans is the "Constitution." The theological substance of this epistle had to be presented to the NT church, whether addressed to Rome or not, but there were circumstances in Rome which made it appropriate for Paul, in a relatively calm frame of mind, with time for fuller elaboration, and without having become personally involved in local affairs, as he had in Galatia, to expand the central doctrine of the epistle to the Galatians. Thus he explained his purpose in coming to Rome and the main purpose of his life ministry and message. There was friction and misunderstanding between Jewish and Gentile Christians in the Roman church. We know from the personal greetings at the end that it was a mixed church. The problem is reflected in almost every section of the epistle, but especially in chapters three, four, nine, ten and eleven. Both sides were stubborn. There was a moment, probably brief, even after Paul had reached Rome, when Mark and a certain Jesus Justus were the only Christian Jews in Rome who would cooperate with Paul (Col. 4:10,11). A clarification of the Gospel and its implications was needed.

The content and outline of this epistle must be understood from the point of view of Paul's total ministry and his particular travel plans. True, the greatest theme in the work is justification by faith. But this is not an essay on that subject. Much of the material simply does not fall under any subheading of that theme. This is a letter from the apostle to the Gentiles to the church in Rome, and the subject is Why I Am Coming to Visit You. Outlines which fail to see this viewpoint, and which seek to force the material into formal divisions as though this were an essay, are very likely to assign sub-topics and secondary sub-headings which do not fit. Some outlines are almost like "zoning" laws, forbidding the reader to find in certain sections material which certainly is there.

The following very simple outline is suggested. (The great doctrinal themes are discussed in articles on doctrinal topics.)

I. The Apostle Paul to the Christians in Rome. I am entrusted with a message which I must deliver to you; i.e., the Gospel in all its implications. (1:1-17).
II. (a) The Gentile world is wretchedly lost. (1:18:32). This is true in spite of God's justice toward attempted morality. (2:1-16).
   (b) The Jewish world is equally lost, in spite of all their privileges. (2:17-3:20).
III. Justification by Faith is my great message. (3:21-5:21). There is no space for the wealth of sub-topics.
IV. Holy living in principle. (6:1-8:39).
V. God has not forgotten the Jews. (9:1-11:36).
VI. Details of Christian conduct. (12:1-15:13).
VII. (a) Travel plans. (15:14-33).
   (b) Personal to people in Rome. (16:1-20).
   (c) Personal from people in Corinth. 16:21-23).
   (d) Doxology. (16:24-27). J.O.B.

ROME. Of the Indo-European tribes who entered Italy, the Latins formed a separate branch, occupying an enclave round the Tiber mouth and the plain of Latium. They were surrounded, and indeed constricted, by the Etruscan empire in the N, the Greek maritime colonies in the S, and by related but hostile Italic tribes, who held the rest of the peninsula and the arc of hill-country, which fenced off the Latin plain. Hence arose a sense of unity imposed upon the Latin speaking communities, and the linking of their scattered groups into leagues and confederacies. Hence, too, the old need of lowlanders for defense to build stockaded retreats to which the plainsmen could retire with flocks and families, and to locate such forts on hills and outcrops of higher land. The habit may be illustrated from the acropolis of Troy to the Maori pass on Auckland's volcanic cones of precolonial days. In such wise Rome came into being. Vergil's idyllic picture of primitive Rome in the Eighth Book of his Aeneid is not far from the truth. The most ancient acropolis could have been the Palatine hill, where the stockade of one shepherd community was built.

But the Palatine was not the only eminence. The valley of the Tiber at the point is a deep trough, averaging a mile in width, cut into the soft tufa floor of the lower course of the river. The edges of this trench were anciently eroded by tributary streams, and thus, geologically speaking, was formed the famous group of hills with which the future city was always associated. They were the Capitol, the Palatine, and the Aventine, with the Caelian, Oppian, Esquiline, Viminal, and Quirinal as flat-topped spurs. Through the area the river forms an S-shaped curve. In the course of this curve the river shallows and forms an island. This point is the one practicable ford on the river between the sea and a very distant locality upstream. The Tiber tends to run narrow and deep. Geography thus played a dominant role in history. The group of hills and spurs were ultimately occupied by communities such as those whose ninth century traces have been discovered on the Esquiline and the Quirinal. The old habit of Latin federation gave them a sense of unity which was finally translated into common institutions and defense. Traffic across the Tiber ford necessarily concentrated at this point. Indeed all the trade between the Etruscan N and the Greek and Italian S perforce crossed the river there. The river valley was also a highway of commerce between the sea and the hills. Salt may have been the principal commodity carried that way. The group of hill settlements thus straddled Central Italy's main communications, and those who have held such positions of advantage have always grown rich and powerful. Perhaps a faint memory of the significance of the Tiber ford is embedded in the name pontifex, which appears to mean etymologically "bridgemaker."

Archaeological evidence suggests that the settlements had coalesced to form the original city by the sixth century B.C., for burials from the Palatine and Capitoline cemeteries, on the edge of the marshy bottom which was to be the Forum, cease at that time. The Cloaca Maxima, which drained these hollows, may have been commenced about this date. Synoecism, therefore, took place under the kings, whose rule in early Rome, encrusted though it is with legend, is established fact. The Wall of Servius made Rome into a considerable fortress, comparable with such hill-strongholds as Veii and Ardea. Over the period of the kings, and especially the Etruscan kings, whose rule closes the regal period of early Roman history, the city built the Pons Sublicius to replace the Tiber ford, developed the Campus Martius as a training-ground, concentrated business activities in the forum, and began to crowd the hills and hollows with houses and temples. Rome was probably a large populous city by the fourth century B.C. Valleys formed an irregular roading pattern which remained a feature through all history, and by the third century there is evidence of the great "insulae" or tenement houses, which were to become another characteristic feature of Rome, and which suggest the overcrowding, squalor, and slums of the early capital. It is difficult to obtain a clear picture of a city which has always been occupied, and whose accumulated building has limited archaeological investigation. Aqueducts, bridges, quays, temples, porticoes, the monuments of civic and of family pride, followed over the centuries. It is possible to trace great outbursts of building activity at certain periods. At the end of the second century B.C., the influx of capital from the beginnings of provincial exploitation promoted expansion. Sulla, who endeavored to reduce some of the central urban tangle to order, Pompey did much to adorn the city, and Augustus boasted that he had "found the city built of brick and left it built of marble." Augustus set the fashion for two imperial centuries, and it is from the first and second centuries after Christ that most of the surviving ruins date: the great baths of Caracalla, Diocletian, and Constantine, for example, and, most famous of all, the Flavian Amphitheatre, called still by the medieval name of Colosseum.

A vivid picture of the perils and inconveniences of life in the great city at the turn of the first century of our era is found in the Third Satire of Juvenal, the rhetorical poem imitated in Johnson's London. In population the city of Rome probably passed the million mark at the beginning of the Christian era, and during the first century may have risen somewhat above this figure. It was a motley and cosmopolitan population. "Long since," Juvenal complained early in the second century, "Syrian Orontes has flowed into the Tiber," and he numbers the foreign rabble as one of the chief annoyances of urban life, to be ranked with traffic dangers, fire, and falling houses. In the third and fourth centuries, a time of urban decay all over the Empire, the city declined, and the population probably fell to something near half a million by the last days of the Western Empire.

It is possible roughly to estimate the proportion of Christians over the imperial centuries. In the Catacombs, ten generations of Christians are buried. It is difficult to reach an accurate estimate of the extent of these galleries in the tufa rock, or of the number of graves they contain. The lowest estimate of the length is 350 miles, the highest 600 miles. The lowest estimate of the burials is 1,175,000, the highest 4,000,000. It is a pity that religious exclusivism prevents the final settlement of this question. At any rate, given a population averaging one million over the ten generations of the Church's witness, and this is rather high in view of the third and fourth century decline, we have on the first figure a Christian population averaging 175,000 per generation, and on the higher figure one averaging 400,000 per generation. Such averaging is obviously bad statistical method, for the number of the Christian population would be smaller in the earlier and larger in the later centuries. But if the figure of 175,000 is taken to represent a middle point in the period, say about the middle of the third century after Christ, it becomes clear that Gibbon's well-known estimate is hopelessly awry. Gibbon suggested that, at this time, probably one twentieth of the population of the city were Christians. The most conservative estimate from the evidence of the Catacomb burials is that at least one fifth were Christians, and that probably the proportion was much larger.

Orr pointed out in his Morgan Lectures of some 65 years ago (Neglected Factors in the History of the Early Church) that the Catacombs also provide evidence of the vertical spread of Christianity in the imperial society of the capital, and likewise refuted Gibbon's statement that the Church was "almost entirely composed of the dregs of the populace." The case of Pomponia Graecina, for example, reported by Tacitus (Ann. 13:32), may be traced to the Catacombs, where De Rossi established the fact that the Crypt of Lucina was connected with the Pomponian gens, and suggested plausibly that Lucina may have been the Christian or baptismal name of Pomponia herself, who appears, from Tacitus' report, to have faced a domestic tribunal because of a Christian faith. If Pomponia was, in fact, a Christian, since she lived on into the principate of Domitian, she may have had part in two aristocratic conversions of which there is evidence — those of Flavius Clemens the consul, and of Domitilla, his wife. The former was the cousin, and the latter the niece of Domitian himself. Dio Cassius (67:44) informs us that these two were accused of "atheism," a common allegation against Christians, and of "going astray after the custom of the Jews." Flavius Clemens was put to death, and his wife banished. De Rossi appears to have established the fact that the illustrious pair were Christians. He discovered the crypt of Domitilla, and also an elegantly constructed "crypt of the Flavians." Harnack's contention that "an entire branch of the Flavian family embraced Christianity" thus seems established. Next to Domitian, Flavius Clemens and Domitilla held the highest rank in the Empire. Their two sons had even been designated by Domitian as his heirs. It seems, as James Orr remarked (op. cit. pp. 117 sqq), "almost as if, ere the last Apostle had quitted the scene of his labors, Christianity was about to mount the seat of Empire."

Rome, like Babylon, became a symbol of organized paganism and opposition to Christianity in the Bible. In the lurid imagery of the document of protest which closes the canon of the NT, John mingles Empire and City in his symbolism of sin. Chapters 17 and 18 of the Apocalypse envisage the fall of Rome. The former oracle, passionate, indeed shocking in its imagery, shows Rome like a woman of sin astride the seven hills, and polluting the world with her vice. The second of the two chapters reads like a Hebrew "taunt-song." It pictures, in imagery reminiscent of Ezekiel on Tyre, the galleys loading for Rome in some Eastern port. There was "merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk and scarlet and . . . vessels of ivory and . . . precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, and cinnamon, and frankincense, beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men." The climax is bitter, as the Seer pictures Ostia, the Tiber port of Rome, in the stark ruin in which it appears today, Rome under the smoke of her burning, and the voice of gladness stilled.

The city appears once only in an historical context. Paul landed at Puteoli, probably traversed the Pontine Marshes by barge (Hor. Sat. 1:5:11-23), halted at Forum Appii (ib. 4), and pushed up the Appian Way through the village of Tres Tabernae, or Three Shops. Alerted by the little church of Puteoli (Acts 28:14,15) members of Rome's Christian community met Paul at both stopping places. On the evidence of the Nazareth Decree, it appears that a group had been established in Rome since the principate of Claudius in the late forties of the century. Paul would enter by the Capena Gate. His "hired house" (Acts 28:30) would be in some block of flats, an "insula."

E.M.B.

ROOM. 1. A chamber in a house (Acts 1:13).

2. In the KJV room is used in the sense of place or position in society (Matt. 23:6; Luke 14:7,8; 20:46). This meaning is now obsolete.

ROOT (Heb. shōresh, Gr. rhíza), usually used in a figurative sense. Judah was promised new roots after the captivity (II Kings 19:30; Isa. 37:31; see Rom. 15:12). The roots of the wicked shall not endure (Isa. 5:24). Jesus was the root of David (Isa. 11:1,10). The Messiah was to come from an unexpected root (Isa. 53:2). Daniel used the word in writing about Nebuchadnezzar whose roots (remnant of kingdom) would remain during his period of suffering for sin (Dan. 4:8-23). In the parable of the sower, the roots did not develop on or among stones (Matt. 13:20). The fig tree and its roots died (Mark 11:20). The source of spiritual life is in the roots (Rom. 11:17,18), even as the love of money is the root of evil (I Tim. 6:10).

ROPE (Heb. hevel, line or cord, 'ăvōth, a woven band, Gr. schoinion, a cable). Hushai counseled Absalom to have Israel bring hevel (strong cables), with which to pull into the river the city where David might take refuge (II Sam. 17:7-13). Sackcloth upon the body and a hevel about the head (a woven band) were symbols of deep servility (I Kings 20:31,32). In II Samuel 8:2 hevel is a line, as it was a small linear measure. Rahab used a hevel (rope) to let the spies over the wall of Jericho (Josh. 2:1-16). 'Ăvōth was used of the binding of Samson (Judg. 16:11,12). Isaiah used it in deriding Israel's efforts to pile up iniquity (5:18,19). Small ropes or cords were used to fasten the sacrificial animal to the altar (Ps. 118:27). In the NT schoinion means either a cable made of bulrushes (Acts 27:32), or small ropes used to lead cattle (John 2:15).

ROSE (See Plants)

ROSETTA STONE, a damaged inscribed basalt slab, found accidentally at Fort St. Julien on the Rosetta branch of the Nile, near the city of Rosetta, by a French army work crew in 1799. Terms of the French surrender to the British gave the French finds to the victors and the Rosetta Stone was placed in the British Museum. The monument was originally set up in 196 B.C. as a formal decree of the Egyptian priesthood in honor of Ptolemy V (Epiphanes) with an identical text in three parts: hieroglyphic, demotic, and Greek. The parallel texts furnished the key for the decipherment of the Egyptian, with the proper names providing the basic clues for the achievement. Decipherment of the hieroglyphs was accomplished by Jean Francois Champollion in 1822.

C.E.D.

ROSH (rŏsh, Heb. rō'sh, head). 1. A son of Benjamin who went to Egypt with Jacob and his sons (Gen. 46:21). He probably died without issue.

2. Head of three nations that are to invade Israel during the latter days (Ezek. 38:2,8). Gog is chief of Magog, Meshech, and Tubal (RSV). These tribes were from the far N, hence Rosh is probably Russia.

ROW, ROWERS (See Ship)

RUDDY (Heb. 'adhmônî, red), a word used to refer to a red or fair complexion, in contrast to the dark skin of the Hebrews (I Sam. 16:12; 17:42; S. of Sol. 5:10).

RUDE (Gr. idiótes, untrained, ignorant of rules), used in II Corinthians 11:6 where Paul denies that his inability as a speaker indicates lack of knowledge of his subject. "I am not a technically trained orator" is the meaning.

RUDIMENTS (rōō'di-mĕnts, Gr. stoicheía, the first principles or elements of anything). The Greek word is found in the NT seven times, and the KJV renders it in three different ways: Galatians 4:3,9 and II Peter 3:10,12 "elements"; Colossians 2:8,20 "rudiments"; Hebrews 5:12 "first principles." In II Peter 3:10,12 it probably means the physical elements of the world. In Hebrews 5:12 the KJV rendering is correct. In Galatians 4:3,9 and Colossians 2:8,20 the reference is to rudimentary religious teachings, in this instance the ceremonial precepts of the worship of the Jews.

RUE (See Plants)

RUFUS (rōō'fŭs, Gr. Rhoúphos), the brother of Alexander and the son of Simon of Cyrene who bore the cross (Mark 15:21). A Rufus is also greeted by Paul in Romans 16:13; "Rufus, chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine," is the Apostle's affectionate phrase. If the two references are to one man, it may be conjectured that Simon or Simon's widow became a Christian, and emigrated from Cyrene to Rome, this being the reason for Mark's cryptic reference. Mark was probably writing in Rome.

The Rosetta Stone, one of the most important archaeological finds in history, with identical inscriptions in 3 languages, Hieroglyphic, Demotic and Greek. BM

RUHAMAH (rōō-hà'mà, to be pitied), Hosea's daughter by Gomer (Hos. 2:1). The name at first given the child was Lo-ruhamah, "not to be pitied" (Hos. 1:6,8). God revealed to the prophet that she was to be symbolic of Israel, who would be fully pardoned (1:10,11).

RULER, a name used to translate several Hebrew and Greek words meaning king, captain, exalted one, overlord, magistrate, etc. 1. Mōshēl, a king or supervisor (Gen. 45:8; Prov. 23:1). 2. Nāghîdh, overseer (I Sam. 25:30; I Kings 1:35). 3. Sar, director or leader (Gen. 47:6; II Kings 11:4,19). 4. Sāghān, deputy (Ezra 9:2; Neh. 2:16 RSV marg). Other words occur in Daniel 3:2f; 5:29; in Deuteronomy 1:13; Isaiah 29:10; in II Samuel 6:21; Daniel 5:7.

In the NT the chief words are: 5. árchon, judge or magistrate (Acts 23:5; John 3:1). 6. Archisuvágogos is ruler of the synagogue (Mark 5:35). 7. In Ephesians 6:12 rulers of this world, kosmokrátores, are different from the ruler of the universe, pantokrátōr. 8. Politárches, mayor of a city (Acts 17:6,8). 9. Architríklinos, chief of a feast. John 2:9).

RUMAH (rōō'mà, Heb. rûmâh, tall place), the home of Pedaiah, whose daughter, Zebudah, bore Jehoiakim to Josiah of Judah. It is probably Arumah of Judges 9:41, Rumah in Joshua 15:52, LXX.

RUSH (See Plants)

RUTH (rōōth, Heb. rûth), a name found only in the book bearing the name. She was a Moabitess who married a son of Elimelech and Naomi of Bethlehem (Ruth 1:1-4). Her romance, resulting in her becoming an ancestor of the Messiah (Matt. 1:5), came during a famine in Israel during the days of the theocracy (1:1). Elimelech's two sons married Moabite women, whom they soon left widowed (1:5). When the three men died, Naomi returned to Judah (1:7). Ruth's decision to conform to the customs of the day, which made her a servant of the dead husband's family, won her lasting renown. God's hand guided Ruth into the field of Boaz (2:1-3). Returning home with much barley, Naomi knew she had found favor with her kinsman (2:20-23). Ruth was wise enough to obey Boaz and Naomi, with the result that Boaz, in keeping with Hebrew law (Deut. 25:5), took her to be his wife, after a nearer kinsman of Naomi had declined to do so (Ruth 4:6,13). Critics have maligned Ruth because of her lying at the feet of Boaz (3:1-5), being ignorant of the customs of the period. Naomi knew that this act was an appeal to Boaz to assume his obligations under law for her. In other words, it was a marriage proposal, and all that Boaz held sacred in manhood made him respond in honor.

RUTH, BOOK OF. The origin of this book has been a much-debated subject. From the time references in 1:1 it is certain that it was written many years after the period of the Hebrew theocracy. The reference to former times in Israel (4:7) indicates that it was of a later date than Deuteronomy. In the LXX, as well as the Vulgate, the book follows Judges in the OT canon, hence is rightly classed as a historical record. The primary purpose behind it was to present the link between Judah and the Gentile world in the ancestry of Jesus Christ (Matt. 1:5,6). Some scholars think it was only a romance written to justify the marriage of Jews with alien women. The author is unknown, but he could have been a post-Exilic scholar who objected to Ezra's rigid elimination of alien wives from among the returning captives (Ezra 9,10). Aside from its historical and genealogical contents, the book is of great merit because of its ethical teachings. Ruth's refusal to be free exalts the importance of safekeeping a moral obligation. She could not have known what would result from her decision. Her willingness to obey Naomi's instructions, as well as to be a menial laborer, emphasizes the message of the OT and of experience, that youth needs counsel from them who are more mature. Finally, the marriage ceremony shows that worthy people respect customs whose symbolism portrays basic commitments among men, e.g., the shoe as a sign of assuming another's obligations (4:7,8. See Deut. 25:5-10). J.D.F.

S

SABA, SABAEANS (să'bà, să-bē'ănz, Heb. sevā', sevā'îm, Gr. Sabá). The name Saba is mentioned in Genesis 10:7 and I Chronicles 1:9 as a son of Cush. In Isaiah 43:3 the name is coupled with Ethiopia, and in Psalm 72:10 with Sheba. In Isaiah 45:14 God says to Israel, "The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia and of the Sabeans, men of stature, shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine." "Sabeans from the wilderness" are referred to in Ezekiel 23:42. Saba was situated between the Nile and the Atbara. It is a region about 400 miles long and 200 miles broad, and was known to the Hebrews as Cush. Strabo (xvi. 4, 8-10) says there was a harbor named Saba on the W coast of the Red Sea. Josephus (Ant, II, x, 2) identifies the Sabeans with the people of Saba in Upper Egypt, which he says Moses besieged and captured when in the service of the Egyptians. Another Sabaean race, mentioned in Genesis 10: 28; 25:3, was located in Arabia. They built a unique civilization and great empire. The Queen of Sheba who made a visit of state to the court of Solomon came from there.

SABACHTHANI (sà-băkh'thà-nē, Gr. sabachthaneí), a word in the utterance of Jesus on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46, Mark 15:34). With some changes of form, the sentence is probably from Psalm 22:1.

SABAOTH, THE LORD OF (săb'ă-ōth, Gr. sabaóth, hosts). The "Lord of Sabaoth" is the same as "Lord of hosts." The phrase is used in Romans 9:29 and in James 5:4. Its equivalent, the "Lord of hosts," is often found in the OT. It has sometimes been explained as meaning that Jehovah is the God of the armies of Israel, but more likely it means that all created agencies and forces are under the command and leadership of Jehovah. The title expresses Jehovah's great power.

SABBATH (săb'ath, Heb. shabbāth, Gr. Sábbaton, to desist, cease, rest), the weekly day of rest and worship of the Jews. The sabbath was instituted at creation. The story of creation (Gen. 1:1-2:3) closes with an account of God's hallowing of the seventh day, because on it He rested from His creative labors. We read, "And God blessed, and sanctified it: because that in it he rested from all his work which God created and made" (Gen. 2: 3). There is no distinct mention of the sabbath in Genesis, but a seven-day period is mentioned several times in connection with the Flood (Gen. 7:4,10; 8:10,12) and once in connection with Jacob's years at Haran (Gen. 29:27,28), showing that the hebdomadal division of time must have been known then.

There is no express mention of the sabbath before Exodus 16:21-30. In the wilderness of Sin, before the Israelites reached Mount Sinai, God gave them manna, a double supply being given on the sixth day of the week, in order that the seventh day might be kept as a day of rest from labor. Moses said to the people, "This is that which the Lord has said, Tomorrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord: bake that which ye will bake today . . . and that which remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning" (Exod. 16:23). Shortly afterward the Ten Commandments were given by Jehovah at Sinai (Exod. 20:1-17; 34:1-5). The fourth commandment enjoined Israel to observe the seventh day as a holy day on which no work should be done by man or beast. Everyone, including even the stranger within the gates, was to desist from all work and to keep the day holy. The reason given is that Jehovah rested on the seventh day and blessed and hallowed it. It is clear that God intended the day to be a blessing to man, both physically and spiritually. The sabbath is frequently mentioned in the Levitical legislation. It was to be kept a holy convocation for the worship of the Lord (Lev. 23:3), and was to remind the Israelites that God had sanctified them (Exod. 31: 13). Forty years later, Moses reminded the Israelites of God's command to observe the sabbath and told them that they were under special obligation to keep it because God had delivered them from bondage in Egypt (Deut. 5:15).

Various attempts have been made by OT critics to find a Babylonian origin for the Jewish sabbath. There is evidence that among the Babylonians certain things were to be avoided on the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th days of the month; but the 19th day breaks the sequence of 7's; and there is no question that the Hebrew sabbath is much older than this Babylonian observance. Among the Hebrews, moreover, the sabbath was associated with the idea of rest, worship, and divine favor, not certain taboos.

After the time of Moses the sabbath is mentioned sometimes in connection with the festival of the new moon (II Kings 4:23; Amos 8:5; Hosea 2:11; Isa. 1:13; Ezek. 46:3). The prophets always exalted the sabbath and found fault with the Israelites for the perfunctory observance of it. They made confession of Israel's sin in profaning the sabbath (Isa. 56;2,4; 58:13; Jer. 17:21-27; Ezek. 20:12-24).

The sanctity of the sabbath is shown by the offering upon it of two lambs, while only one was sacrificed on the other days of the week (Num. 28:9,19). The 12 loaves of shewbread were also presented on that day (Lev. 24:5-9; I Chron. 9: 32). A wilful sabbath-breaker was put to death (Num. 15:32-36). The Israelite could not even light a fire in his home on the sabbath. Psalm 92, expressing delight in the worship and works of Jehovah, was composed for the sabbath day. In the Persian period Nehemiah rebuked and took strong measures against those who disregarded the law of the sabbath by doing business on it (Neh. 10:31; 13:15-22).

With the development of the synagogue during the Exile, the sabbath became a day for worship and the study of the Law, as well as a day of rest. There are not many references to the sabbath in the apocryphal books. Antiochus Epiphanes tried to abolish it, along with other distinctively Jewish institutions (168 B.C.). At the beginning of the Maccabean war, Jewish soldiers allowed themselves to be massacred rather than profane the sabbath by fighting, even in self-defense. After 1,000 Jews were slaughtered in this way, they decided that in the future it would be permissible to defend themselves if attacked on the sacred day, but not to engage in offensive operations (I Macc. 2:31-41). It was not, however, considered allowable to destroy siege-works on the sabbath; and so Pompey was permitted to raise his mound and mount his battering rams against Jerusalem without interference from the Jews (Jos. Antiq. xiv. 4, 2 and 3).

During the period between Ezra and the Christian era the scribes formulated innumerable legal restrictions for the conduct of life under the law. Two whole treatises in the Talmud are devoted to the details of sabbath observance. One of these, the Shabbath, enumerates the following 39 principal classes of prohibited actions: sowing, plowing, reaping, gathering into sheaves, threshing, winnowing, cleansing, grinding, sifting, kneading, baking, shearing wool, washing it, beating it, dyeing it, spinning it, making a warp of it, making two cords, weaving two threads, separating two threads, making a knot, untying a knot, sewing two stitches, tearing to sew two stitches, catching a deer, killing, skinning, salting it, preparing its hide, scraping off its hair, cutting it up, writing two letters, blotting out for the purpose of writing two letters, building, pulling down, extinguishing, lighting a fire, beating with a hammer, and carrying from one property to another. Each of these chief enactments was further discussed and elaborated, so that actually there were several hundred things a conscientious, law-abiding Jew could not do on the sabbath. For example, the prohibition about tying a knot was much too general, and so it became necessary to state what kinds of knots were prohibited and what kind not. It was accordingly laid down that allowable knots were those that could be untied with one hand. A woman could tie up her undergarment, and the strings of her cap, those of her girdle, the straps of her shoes and sandals, of skins of wine and oil, of a pot with meat. She could tie a pail over the well with a girdle, but not with a rope. The prohibition regarding writing on the sabbath was further defined as follows: "He who writes two letters with his right or his left hand, whether of one kind or of two kinds, as also if they are written with different ink or are of different languages, is guilty. He even who should from forgetfulness write two letters is guilty, whether he has written them with ink or with paint, red chalk, India-rubber, vitriol, or anything which makes permanent marks. Also he who writes on two walls which form an angle, or on the two tablets of his account-book, so that they can be read together, is guilty. He who writes upon his body is guilty. If any one writes with dark fluid, with fruit juice, or in the dust on the road, in sand, or in anything in which writing does not remain, he is free. If any one writes with the wrong hand, with the foot, with the mouth, with the elbow; also if any one writes upon a letter of another piece of writing, or covers other writing" (Shabbath xii. 3-5). Jesus had things like this in mind when He said, "Woe unto you also, ye lawyers! for ye lade men with burdens grievous to be borne, and ye yourselves touch not the burdens with one of your fingers" (Luke 11:46).

Jesus came into conflict with the religious leaders of the Jews especially on two points: His claim to be the Messiah, and on the matter of sabbath observance. The rabbis regarded the sabbath as an end in itself, whereas Jesus taught that the sabbath was made for man's benefit, and that man's needs must take precedence over the law of the sabbath (Matt. 12:1-14; Mark 2:23-3:6; Luke 6:1-11; John 5:1-18). He Himself regularly attended worship in the synagogue on the sabbath (Luke 4:16).

The early Christians, most of whom were Jews, kept the seventh day as a sabbath, but since the resurrection of their Lord was the most blessed day in their lives, they began very early also to meet for worship on the first day of the week (Acts 2:1), and designated it as the Lord's day. Paul directed the Corinthian Christians to bring their weekly offering to the charities of the Church on the first day of the week (I Cor. 16:1,2). As the split between the Jews and Christians widened, the Christians came gradually to meet for worship only on the Lord's day and gave up the observance of the seventh day. S.B.

SABBATH, COVERT FOR THE, very obscure expression found in II Kings 16:18. Ahaz, king of Judah, turned from the house of the Lord for the king of Assyria "the covert for the sabbath that they built in the house, and the king's entry without." It appears to refer to some colonnade along which the king and his attendants could pass when he visited the temple on holy days. It is not mentioned in the description of the temple, and must have been added afterwards, and probably was richly adorned. It is not mentioned anywhere else.

SABBATH, MORROW AFTER THE, an expression of uncertain meaning found in Leviticus 23:11, where Moses instructs the Israelites that the priest was to wave a sheaf of the firstfruits of their harvests before the Lord "on the morrow after the sabbath." Some hold that the "sabbath" meant here was the ordinary weekly sabbath which fell during the seven days of the Passover. That was the view of the Sadducees of the time of Christ. The Pharisees, however, held, and many modern scholars agree with them, that the term sabbath here is not the weekly sabbath, but the first day of the Passover on whatever day of the week it might fall.

SABBATH, SECOND AFTER THE FIRST, an expression of uncertain meaning found in Luke 6:1. Scholars are not agreed as to its exact meaning. Many explanations have been suggested, of which the following may be mentioned. 1. The first sabbath of the second year in a sabbatical cycle of seven years.

2. The first sabbath after the second day of the Passover.

3. The first sabbath of the ecclesiastical year. The Jewish civil year began in Tisri (mid-September), while the ecclesiastical year began in Nisan (mid-March). In any case the time of the year was spring or early summer, as the mention of the ripe grain shows.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY, used only in Acts 1:12, where it designates the distance between Mount Olivet and Jerusalem. A sabbath day's journey was a journey of limited extent which the scribes thought a Jew might travel on the sabbath without breaking the Law. Such a journey was 2,000 cubits (3,000 feet) from one's house or domicile, a distance derived from the statement found in Joshua 3:4 that there was to be that much distance between the ark and the people on their march. The rabbis, however, devised a way of increasing this distance without infringing the Law by depositing some food at the 2,000-cubit limit, before the sabbath, and declaring that spot a temporary residence.

SABBATICAL YEAR (See Feasts)

SABBEUS (să-bē'ŭs, Gr. Sabbaías), in I Esdras 9:32, the same as "Shemaiah" in Ezra 10:31.

SABTA, SABTAH (săb'tà, Heb. savtā', savtâh), the third son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; I Chron. 1:9). There was probably a place named Sabta in South Arabia, but its exact location is uncertain.

SABTECHA, SABTECHAH (săb'tē-kà, Heb. savtekhā'), the fifth-named of the sons of Cush in the genealogy of Genesis 10:5-7. His descendants probably lived in South Arabia.

SACAR (sā'kàr, Heb. sākhār, wages). 1. Father of Ahiam, a follower of David. He was a Hararite

(I Chron. 11:35). In II Samuel 23:33 the name is spelled "Sharar."

2. A son of Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:4).

SACKBUT (See Music)

SACKCLOTH (săk'klŏth). The English word is derived from the Hebrew sak, a course cloth, dark in color, usually made of goat's hair. It was worn by mourners (II Sam. 3:31; II Kings 19:1,2), often by prophets (Isa. 20:2; Rev. 11:3), and by captives (I Kings 20:31). Its exact shape is not known. Some think that originally it was a loin-cloth, which in prehistoric times was the only article of clothing worn by the ancestors of Israel, and which in later times was worn only as a religious duty. Others think it was like a corn-sack, with openings for the neck and arms. It was usually worn over another garment, but sometimes next to the skin (Jonah 3:6; I Kings 21:27; II Kings 6:30; Job 16:15; Isa. 32:11).

SACRAMENT (săk'rà-mĕnt), derived from the Latin sacramentum, which in classical times was used in two chief senses: as a technical legal term to denote the sum of money which the two parties to a suit deposited in a temple, of which the winner had his part returned, while the loser forfeited his to the temple treasury; as a technical military term to designate the oath of obedience of a soldier to his commander. In the Greek NT there is no word corresponding to "sacrament," nor do we find the word used in the earliest history of Christianity to refer to certain rites of the Church. Pliny the Younger (c. A.D. 112) uses the word in connection with Christianity in a famous letter in which he says that the Christians of Bithynia bound themselves "by a sacramentum to commit no kind of crime," but it is doubtful whether he uses the word with any special Christian meaning. The word sacramentum was used with a distinctively Christian meaning for the first time in the Old Latin Bible and in Tertullian (end of 2nd century). In the Old Latin and in the Vulgate it was employed to translate the Greek mysterion, "mystery" (e.g. Eph. 5:32; I Tim. 3:16; Rev. 1:20; 17:7). For a long time it was used not only to refer to religious rites, but to doctrines and facts.

Because of the absence of any defined sacramental concept in the early history of the church, the number of sacraments was not regarded as fixed. Baptism and the Lord's Supper were the chief. In the 12th century Hugo of St. Victor listed 30 sacraments that had been recognized by the church, while Gregory of Bergamo and Peter Lombard listed only seven: Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony — a list adopted by Thomas Aquinas, and later by the Council of Trent. The number seven was supported by many fanciful arguments that seven is a sacred number. There is no NT authority for it, and it is a purely arbitrary figure. It is hard to see on what principle Baptism and the Lord's Supper, which were instituted by Christ, can be put in the same category with marriage, which is as old as the human race.

The Reformers saw in the NT sacraments three distinguishing marks: (1) they were instituted by Christ; (2) Christ commanded that they be observed by His followers; (3) they are visible symbols of divine acts. Since baptism and the Lord's Supper are the only rites for which such marks can be claimed, there can be only two sacraments. There is justification for classifying them under a common name because they are associated together in the NT (Acts 2:41,42; I Cor. 10:1-4).

Some modern critics challenge the claim that baptism and the Lord's Supper owe their origin to Christ, but a fair reading of the NT shows that these sacramental rites were universal in the Apostolic Church and that the apostles observed them because they were convinced that Christ had instituted them. They taught the Church to observe the things which Christ commanded (Matt. 28:20). Circumstances of great solemnity surrounded the institution of the sacraments by Christ. The Lord's Supper was appointed by Him upon the eve of His redemptive sacrifice, while baptism was commanded at the time of His ascension, for all who became His disciples.

These rites were regarded as ritual acts of faith and obedience towards God and as means appointed by Christ to bring the members of the Church into communion with His death and resurrection through the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19,20; I Cor. 11:23-27; Acts 2:38; Rom. 6:3-5; Col. 2; 11,12). They are symbolic rites setting forth the central truths of the Christian faith: death and resurrection with Christ and participation in the redemptive benefits of Christ's mediatorial death. They are visible enactments of the Gospel message that Christ lived, died, was raised from the dead, ascended to heaven, and will some day return, and that all this is for man's salvation. In the NT baptism is intimately connected with the following: the forgiveness of sin (Acts 2:38; 22:16; Eph. 5:26; Titus 3:5); the gift of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:38; I Cor. 12:13); union with Christ in His death and resurrection (Rom. 6:3-6; Col. 2:12); regeneration (John 3:5; Titus 3:5); entering into the relationship of sonship with God (Gal. 3:26,27); belonging to the Church (Acts 2:41); and the gift of salvation (Mark 16:16). The Lord's Supper symbolizes Christ's death for the remission of sins (Matt. 26:28). It is a seal of the New Covenant in Christ's blood, an assurance of eternal life now, a promise of the Second Coming, a pledge of the eventual Messianic triumph. As means of grace the efficacy of the sacraments lies not in themselves as outward acts, but in the blessing of Christ through the Holy Spirit, and is conditioned by faith in the recipient. S.B.

SACRIFICE (Heb. zevah, Gr. thusía), a religious act belonging to worship in which offering is made to God of some material object belonging to the offerer — this offering being consumed in the ceremony, in order to attain, restore, maintain, or celebrate friendly relations with the deity. The motives actuating the offerer may be varied, worthy or unworthy, and may express faith, repentance, adoration, or all of these together; but the main purpose of the sacrifice is to please the deity and to secure His favor.

Origin of Sacrifice. The origin of sacrifice is a matter of dispute. The question is, did sacrifice arise from the natural religious instinct of man, whether guided by the Spirit of God or not, or did it originate in a distinct divine appointment? Genesis records the first sacrifice, by Cain and Abel, but gives no account of the origin of the idea. The custom is clearly approved by God; and in the Mosaic Law it is adopted and elaborately developed. The view that the rite was initiated by an express command of God is based mainly on Genesis 4:4f, which states that Abel offered to God an acceptable sacrifice, and on Hebrews 11:4, where it is said that Abel's sacrifice was acceptable to God because of his faith. It is argued that Abel's faith was based upon a specific command of God in the past and that without such a divine command his sacrifice would have been mere superstition. Many who hold this view also say that the garments provided by God to hide the nakedness of Adam and Eve must have come from an animal that was sacrificed and that in this sacrifice we have a type of the sacrifice of Christ to cover man's spiritual nakedness before God. While all this possibly may be deduced from Scripture, it is obviously not a necessary deduction.

Those who hold that sacrifice was devised by man, with or without direction by God's Spirit, as a means of satisfying the wants of his spiritual nature have advanced several theories. 1. The gift theory holds that sacrifices were originally presents to God which the offerer hoped would be received with pleasure and gratitude by the deity, who would then grant him favors. 2. The table-bond theory suggests that sacrifices were originally meals shared by the worshipers and the deity, with the purpose of knitting them together in a firmer bond of fellowship. 3. The sacramental-communion theory is a modification of the table-bond theory. The basis of it is the belief among some primitive peoples that animals share along with man in the divine nature. The worshiper actually eats the god, thus acquiring the physical, intellectual, and moral qualities which characterized the animal. 4. The homage theory holds that sacrifice originates not in man's sense of guilt, but in man's desire of expressing his homage to and dependence upon the deity. 5. The expiatory theory says that sacrifices are fundamentally piacular or atoning for sin. Conscious of his sin and of the punishment which it deserves, man substitutes an animal to endure the penalty due to himself, and so makes his peace with the deity.

Classification of Sacrifices. Sacrifices have been classified in a variety of ways, chiefly the follow- 1. Those on behalf of the whole congregation; and those on behalf of the individual. 2. Animal or bleeding sacrifices; and bloodless offerings. 3. Sacrifices assuming an undisturbed covenant relationship; and those intended to restore a relationship which has been disturbed. 4. Animal sacrifices; vegetable sacrifices; liquid and incense offerings. 5. Sacrifices made without the help of a priest; those made by a priest alone; and those made by a layman with the help of a priest. 6. Sacrifices which express homage to the deity; those designed to make atonement for sin; and peace offerings, to express or promote peaceful relations with the deity. 7. Self-dedicatory sacrifices; eucharistic sacrifices; and expiatory sacrifices. 8. Sacrifices in which the offering was wholly devoted to God; and sacrifices in which God received a portion, and the worshiper feasted on the remainder.

History of Sacrifice in OT Times. The sacrifices of Cain and Abel (Gen. 4:4f) show that the rite goes back almost to the beginnings of the human race. No priest was needed in their sacrifices, which were eucharistic and possibly expiatory. The sacrifice of Noah after the Flood (Gen. 8:20f), is called a burnt-offering, and is closely connected with the covenant of God described in Genesis 9:8-17. In the sacrifices of Abraham, several of which are mentioned (Gen. 1:7,8; 13:4,18; 15: 4ff), he acted as his own priest, and made offerings to express his adoration of God and probably to atone for sin. In Genesis 22 he is shown by God that He does not desire human sacrifices, a common practice in those days. The patriarchs Isaac and Jacob regularly offered sacrifices (Gen. 26: 25; 28:18; 31:54; 33:20; 35:7; 46:1). Job and his friends offered sacrifices (Job 1:5; 42:7-9), probably to atone for sin. The Israelites during their sojourn in Egypt no doubt were accustomed to animal sacrifices. It was to some such feast that Moses asked the pharaoh for permission to go in the wilderness (Exod. 3:18; 5:3ff; 7:16); and he requested herds and flocks for the feast to offer burnt-offerings and sacrifices (Exod. 10:24,25). The sacrifice of the Passover (Exod. 12:3-11) brings out forcibly the idea of salvation from death. Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, a priest, offered sacrifices on meeting Moses and the people (Exod. 18:12).

The establishment of the covenant between Israel and Jehovah was accompanied by solemn sacrifices. The foundation principle of this covenant was obedience, not sacrifices (Exod. 19:4-8). Sacrifices were incidental — aids to obedience, but valueless without it. The common altars were not abolished with the giving of the Covenant Code (Exod. 20:24ff), but continued to be used for centuries by Joshua, Gideon, Jephthah, Samuel, Saul, David, Elijah, and many others. They were perfectly legitimate and even necessary at least until the building of the temple in Jerusalem.

At the division of the kingdom in 931 B.C. golden calf worship was established at Dan and Bethel, with priests, altars, and ritual (I Kings 12: 27f). High places, most of them very corrupt, were in use in both kingdoms until the time of the Exile, although occasionally attempts were made in the southern kingdom to remove them. With the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem in 586 B.C. the entire cultus was suspended, but on the return from the captivity an altar was built and sacrifices resumed. At the time of Nehemiah there existed a temple at Elephantine in Egypt, built by Jews, where a system of sacrifices was observed. Sacrifices were made in the temple in Jerusalem until its destruction by the Romans in A.D. 70. The Jews have offered none since then.

The Mosaic Sacrifices. Every offering had to be the honestly acquired property of the offerer (II Sam. 24:24). Sacrifices had value in the eyes of Jehovah only when they were made in acknowledgment of His sovereign majesty, expressed in obedience to Him, and with a sincere desire to enjoy His favor. The only animals allowed for sacrifice were oxen, sheep, goats, and pigeons. Wild animals and fish could not be offered. The produce of the field allowed for offerings was wine, oil, and corn, either in the ear or in the form of meal, dough, cakes, etc. Sacrifices were of two kinds: animal or bleeding, and vegetable or bloodless.

1. Animal Sacrifices. Both sexes were accepted for sacrifice, although for some sacrifices the male was prescribed. With one exception (Lev. 22:23), no animal with any sort of wound or defect could be offered (Lev. 22:21-24). The law enjoined that animals be at least eight days old (Lev. 22:27); and in some cases the age of the animal is specified (Lev. 9:3; 12:6; Num. 28:3,9,11). According to the later rabbis, animals more than three years old could not be sacrificed. There was no prescription of age or sex with regard to pigeons or turtle doves; but they were offered only by the poor as substitutes for other animals.

a. The Sin Offering (Lev. 4:1-35; 6:24-30). This was for sins unconsciously or unintentionally committed; sins committed intentionally, but with mitigating circumstances (Lev. 5:2,3; 12:6-8); certain kinds of ceremonial defilements (Lev. 5:2,3; 12:6-8); and sins deliberately committed but afterwards voluntarily confessed. For conscious and deliberate violations of the Law no atonement was possible, with some exceptions, for which provision was made in the guilt offerings. Capital crimes: the breaking of the law of the sabbath (Num. 15:32); adultery (Deut. 22:22,23); murder (Exod. 21:12); and sacrilege (Josh. 7:15) were punished with death. Sin-offerings were made for the whole congregation on all the feast days, and especially on the Day of Atonement. They were also offered on the occasion of the consecration of priests and Levites (Exod. 29:10-14,36). Every year, on the great Day of Atonement, sin-offerings were offered for the high-priest. With the exception of these important national occasions, the sin-offerings were presented only on occasions of special circumstances which demanded expiation of sin.

The costliness of the offering and the procedure to be followed depended upon the theocratic importance of the offender. For the high-priest a young bullock was the appointed offering (Lev. 4:3); for a prince it was a he-goat (Lev. 4:23); in ordinary cases a she-goat or a sheep was sufficient. The poor could offer two pigeons, and where even these were too much, a small portion of fine flour was substituted (Lev. 5:7,11).

In all other blood sacrifices the blood was simply poured around the altar; in this one the blood was sprinkled. If a member of the congregation made the offering, the blood was smeared upon the horns of the altar in the fore-court (Lev. 4:7,18, 25,30). When a sin-offering was for a priest or the whole congregation, the officiating priest took some of the blood of the sacrifice into the holy place and sprinkled it seven times before the veil of the sanctuary, and then smeared it on the horns of the altar of incense. The blood that was left had to be poured out at the base of the altar. After the blood was sprinkled, the fat portions of the animal were burned upon the altar. The remainder of the flesh was disposed of in two ways: in the case of sin-offerings of any of the congregation the flesh was eaten in the fore-court by the officiating priest and his sons; while in the case of sin-offerings for a priest or for the whole congregation, the whole animal was burned outside the camp in a clean place.

b. The Guilt Offering (Lev. 5:14-6:7). (In the KJV, the "trespass offering.") This was a special kind of sin-offering, and was offered for transgressions where restitution or other legal satisfaction could be made, or was made. When the rights of God or men were violated, the wrong had to be righted, the broken law honored, and the sin expiated by a guilt-offering. The offering, which was always a lamb, with one exception (Lev. 14:12), was made after the satisfaction required had been made. The ritual was the same as in the sin-offering, except that the blood was not sprinkled, but was poured over the surface of the altar. Its main purpose was to make expiation for dues withheld from God, like neglect to pay at the proper time what was due to the sanctuary; and from man, like robbery, failure to return a deposit, swearing falsely regarding anything lost, and seduction of a betrothed bond-maid. The sin-offering of a lamb made atonement to God. Restitution, with an additional one-fifth, made reparation to man.

c. The Burnt Offering (Lev. 1). The distinguishing mark of this offering was that it was wholly consumed on the altar; while in other animal sacrifices only the fat portions were burned. The purpose of the offering was propitiation; but with this idea was united another, the entire consecration of the worshiper to Jehovah. Because of the regularity and frequency with which it was offered, it was called the "continual" burnt-offering (Exod. 29:42); and because no part was left for human consumption, it was also called the "whole burnt-offering" (Ps. 51:19). This was the normal sacrifice of the Israelite in proper covenant relationship with God, and was the only sacrifice regularly appointed for the sanctuary service. It was offered every day, in the morning and in the evening. On ordinary days a yearling lamb was sacrificed; on the sabbath day two lambs were offered at morning and evening sacrifice (Num. 28:9,10). On other special feast days a larger number of animals was offered. There were also private burnt-offerings when a Nazirite fulfilled his vow or defiled himself (Num. 6), at the consecration of priests (Exod. 29:15), at the cleansing of lepers (Lev. 14:9), at the purification of women (Lev. 12:6), and for other ceremonial uncleanness (Lev. 15:15,30). This was the only sacrifice that a non-Israelite was permitted to offer (Lev. 17:8; 22:18,25).

d. The Peace Offerings (Lev. 3). These were called peace-offerings because they were offered by those who were at peace with God, to express gratitude and obligation to God, and fellowship with Him. They were not commanded to be offered at any set time, except Pentecost (Lev. 23:20), and were presented spontaneously as the feelings of the worshiper prompted (Lev. 19:5).

The ritual was the same as for the sin-offering, except that the blood was wholly poured upon the altar, as in the trespass-offering and burnt-offering. The fat was burned; the wave-breast and heave-leg were kept by the priests; and the rest of the flesh was eaten at the sanctuary by the sacrificer and his friends (Lev. 7:15f; Deut. 12:1,17f). A meat- and drink-offering always accompanied this sacrifice. This meal denoted the fellowship which existed between the worshiper and God, and was a symbol and pledge of friendship and peace with Him. There were three kinds of peace-offerings: praise-offerings, votive offerings, and free-will offerings. For all three classes oxen, sheep, and goats of either sex could be offered (Lev. 3:1,6,12). The animals had to be without blemish, except for the free-will offerings, where animals with too short or long a limb were allowed (Lev. 22:23). Peace-offerings were also offered on occasions of great public solemnity or rejoicing.

2. Vegetable or Bloodless Sacrifices. These were of two kinds, the meat-offerings (called "meal-offerings" in the ASV) and the drink-offerings. They were offered on the altar of the fore-court.

a. The Meat Offerings (Lev. 2:1-16; 6:14-18) were not animal offerings, as the name suggests, but offerings of fine flour, or of unleavened bread, cakes, wafers, or of ears of grain roasted, always with salt and, except in the sin-offering, with olive oil (Lev. 2:1,4,13,14; 5:11). They were sometimes accompanied by frankincense. Only a portion was consumed by fire on the altar; the rest was kept by the priests, who ate it in a holy place (Lev. 6:16; 10:12,13). The meal-offering accompanied the other offerings, except the sin-offering, on all important occasions (Lev. 7:11ff; Num. 15). It always followed the morning and evening burnt-offerings. The idea back of the meal-offering seems to have been that since people would not ordinarily eat meals consisting only of flesh, it would be wrong to offer only flesh to God.

b. The Drink Offerings were not independent offerings under the law, but were made only in connection with the meal-offering which accompanied all burnt-offerings and all peace-offerings which were Nazirite, votive, or freewill (Num. 6:17; 15:1-12). They did not accompany sin and trespass-offerings. The drink-offering consisted of wine, which was poured out upon the altar, probably upon the flesh of the sacrifice.

Besides the above, three offerings were regularly made in the holy place: the 12 loaves of shewbread, renewed every Sabbath; the oil for the seven-branched candlestick, which was filled every morning; and the incense for the altar of incense, which was renewed every morning and evening. SACRILEGE (săk'rĭ-lĕj). The expression "commit sacrilege" occurs in Romans 2:22 KJV as the translation of hierosulein, "rob temples" RV. The RV more exactly expresses the meaning of the Greek verb.

SADDLE (săd'l, Heb. mercāv, a riding seat). The verb habhash, "to bind on," is used of getting a beast (always an ass) for riding (Gen. 22:3; Num. 22:21; Judg. 19:10; II Sam. 16:1; 17:23; 19:26; I Kings 2:40; II Kings 4:24). Asses were not ridden with saddles. An ass carrying a heavy burden had a thick cushion on its back to relieve the pressure.

SADDUCEES (săd'yū-sēz, Gr. Saddoukaioi), one of the religious parties which existed among the Jews in the days of Christ and the early Church, and which, while exercising comparatively little influence among the people, resisted the truth of the Gospel. Its origin is uncertain, but it is to be sought in the period in Jewish history between the restoration of the Jews to their own land (536 B.C.) and the Christian era. No evidence of Sadduceeism is to be found in Israel before the captivity.

The origin of the name of the sect is obscure. The root of the word means "to be righteous," and the word has sometimes been taken to be an adjective, "the righteous ones," but since the Sadducees were not particularly distinguished for their righteousness, it is unlikely that they got their name from this word. The probability is that the name is derived from some person named Zadok. The best-known Zadok in history was the Davidic high priest (II Sam. 8:17), from whom succeeding high priests claimed to descend. He himself was descended from Aaron through the line of Eleazar (I Chron. 24:3), and was instrumental in the return of the ark (II Sam. 15:24-29). The Prophet Ezekiel, in his description of the restored temple, says that because the sons of Zadok remained loyal to Jehovah when the Israelites went astray, they would be ministers in the new sanctuary (Ezek. 40:46; 44:15). Some scholars hold that the Sadducees trace their origin to this Zadok. Others, however, think that the name comes from another Zadok, a disciple of Antigonus of Socho (c. 250 B.C.), who taught that obedience to God should be absolutely disinterested, without expectation of future reward. This view goes back to an apocryphal legend in the Abot-de-Rabbi Nathan (c. 1000 A.D.). There is also the possibility that the name may be derived from some Zadok unknown to us.

The chief authorities for our knowledge of this sect are Josephus, the NT, and the Talmud. Josephus lays great stress upon the aristocratic nature of the Sadducees. He says, "They only gain the well-to-do; they have not the people on their side." They were the political party of the Jewish aristocratic priesthood from the time of the Maccabees to the final fall of the Jewish state. The Sadducees were priests, but not all priests were Sadducees. Josephus, for example, was a priest and a Pharisee. The likelihood is that the priestly party only gradually crystallized into the sect of the Sadducees. From the time of the Exile, the priesthood in general constituted the nobility of the Jewish people, and the high priest became an increasingly powerful figure. The priestly aristocracy became leaders in the Hellenizing movement that began with Alexander the Great. Because of their sympathy with the policy of Antiochus Epiphanes, they took no part in the Maccabean struggle, which was supported mainly by the Pharisees, a group of religious enthusiasts who opposed what they regarded as the religious deterioration of the Jewish nation. The high priesthood and the throne were united in a single person when, c. 143, B.C., Simon was recognized as both high priest and ruler of the Jews. This centralization of power led to a number of forms of reaction, especially from the Pharisees. Probably not theological at first, the Sadducees became so to defend their policies against the attacks of the Pharisees. Under the Romans, they became the party favorable to the government. As aristocrats, they were naturally very conservative, and were more interested in maintaining the political status quo than in the religious purity of the nation. Since they were satisfied with the present, they did not look forward to a future Messianic age. Not popular with the people, they nevertheless sometimes found it necessary to adopt the Pharisaic policy in order to win the popular support.

The Sadducees had a number of distinctive beliefs, contrasting strongly with those of the Pharisees:

1. They held only to the written Law, and rejected the traditions of the Pharisees. Josephus says: "The Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers, which are not written in the law of Moses; and for that reason it is that the Sadducees reject them, and say that we are to esteem those observances to be obligatory which are in the written Word, but are not to observe what are derived from the tradition of our forefathers. And concerning these things it is that great disputes and differences have risen among them" (Antiq. xiii.10,6). In other words, the Sadducees believed that the Word of God alone was the seat of religious authority. The Pharisees, on the contrary, believed that just as binding as the Law itself was the supposed oral tradition of the teachings of Moses and the rulings on the Law made by the scribes over the years. Some of the church fathers, notably Hippolytus, Origen, Jerome, and Tertullian, credited the Sadducees with regarding the Pentateuch as alone canonical, but this is apparently an error, since Josephus does not mention this, and in the Talmud the Sadducees are introduced as drawing arguments from the other books of the OT in their own defense. It is unlikely, moreover, that the Sadducees would have been admitted to the Sanhedrin had this been true.

2. A second distinctive belief of the Sadducees was their denial of the resurrection of the body, personal immortality, and retribution in a future life. "The doctrine of the Sadducees," says Josephus, "is this, that souls die with the bodies" (Antiq. xviii.1,4); and again, "they also take away the belief of the immortal duration of the soul, and the punishments and rewards in Hades" (Jewish War, ii,i,14). According to the NT, the Sadducees denied the resurrection of the body (Matt. 22:23; Mark 12:18; Luke 20:27; Acts 4:1,2; 23:8), but it says nothing about their denial of immortality and future retribution.

3. According to Acts 23:8, the Sadducees denied the existence of angels and spirits. Seeing that they accepted the OT, in which supermundane spirits often appear, it is hard to understand their position on this subject. A number of factors may have been responsible for this: their general indifference to religion, their rationalistic temper, and the wild extravagances of the angelology and demonology of the Pharisees.

4. The Sadducees differed from both the Pharisees and the Essenes on the matter of divine predestination and the freedom of the human will. According to Josephus, the Essenes held that all things are fixed by God's unalterable decree; the Pharisees tried to combine predestination and free will; and the Sadducees threw aside all ideas of divine interposition in the government of the world. "They take away fate," says Josephus, "and say there is no such thing, and that the events of human affairs are not at its disposal, but they suppose that all our actions are in our own power, so that we are ourselves the causes of what is good, and receive what is evil from our own folly" (Antiq. xiii. 5,9; comp. also Jewish War, II.8,14). They felt no need of a divine providence to order their lives. They thought man is entirely the master of his own destiny and that the doing of good or evil is left entirely to man's free choice.

The Sadducees are mentioned by name in the NT only about a dozen times (Matt. 3:7; 16:1,6,11f; 22:23,24; Mark 12:18; Luke 20:27; Acts 4:1; 5:17; 23:6-8); but it must be remembered that when mention is made of the chief priests, practically the same persons are referred to. They seem mostly to have ignored Jesus, at least in the early part of His ministry. Jesus directed His criticism against the Pharisees, although once He warned His disciples against the leaven of the Sadducees (Matt. 16:6,11). With the Pharisees, they asked Jesus to show them a sign from heaven (Matt. 16:1). They resented His action in cleansing the temple (Matt. 21:12f; Mark 11:15f; Luke 19:45f), and were filled with indignation at His claim of the Messianic title "son of David" (Matt. 21:15f). They tried to discredit Him in the eyes of the people and get Him in trouble with the Roman power by their questions as to His authority (Matt. 21:23), as to the resurrection (Matt. 22:23), and as to the lawfulness of paying tribute to Caesar (Luke 20:22). They joined the scribes and Pharisees in their attempt to destroy Him (Mark 11:18; Luke 19:47). They sat in the Sanhedrin which condemned Him, and the chief priest who presided was a member of their party. In their opposition they were probably most influenced by their fear that a Messianic movement led by Him would bring political ruin (John 11:49).

After the day of Pentecost the Sadducees were very active against the infant Church. Along with the priests and the captain of the temple they arrested Peter and John and put them in prison. A little later, they arrested all the apostles and took counsel to slay them (Acts 5:17,33). Their hostile attitude persisted throughout the rest of the Acts of the Apostles. There is no record of a Sadducee being admitted into the Christian Church. According to Josephus (Antiq. xx,9,1), they were responsible for the death of James, the brother of the Lord. With the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, the Sadducean party disappeared. S.B.

SAINT. In the KJV the word "saint" is used to translate two Hebrew words, qādôsh and hasîdh. The root idea of the first is separation. In a religious sense it means that which is separated or dedicated unto God, and therefore removed from secular use. The word is applied to people, places and things, as: the temple, vessels, garments, the city of Jerusalem, priests, etc. The root of the second word is personal holiness. The emphasis is on character. It has a strong ethical connotation. These words are used either in the plural or with a collective noun. The reason for this is that a person's standing before God is regarded as a matter of his belonging to a larger whole — the nation Israel or the Christian church — this larger whole standing in covenant relationship to God. In the Septuagint the word hagioi is used to refer to God's covenant people Israel. In the NT this word is transferred to the members of the Christian Church. The saints are the Church (I Cor. 1:2). The Church comprises people called out of the world by God's electing grace to be His own people. All who are in covenant relation with Him through repentance and faith in His Son are regarded as saints. Objectively, the saints are God's chosen and peculiar people, belonging exclusively to Him. Subjectively, they are separated from all defilement and sin and partake of God's own holiness. Throughout the Bible, but especially in the epistles of the NT, the saints are urged to live lives befitting their position (Eph. 4:1; Col. 1:10). S.B.

SALA, SALAH (sā'là, Heb. shelah, missile, petition, Gr. Salá), a son of Arphaxad (Gen. 10:24; 11:13ff; I Chron. 1:18,24; Luke 3:35-36).

SALAMIS (săl'ă-mĭs, Gr. Salamís), a town on the E coast of Cyprus, founded, according to tradition, by Teucer, from the island of Salamis, off the coast of Greece. It possessed a good harbor and was a populous and flourishing town in the Hellenic and Roman periods. Paul and Barnabas preached the Gospel there in the synagogues of the Jews (Acts 13:5), showing that there was a large Jewish community in Salamis. Nothing is said of the duration or success of the visit. Paul did not return to Salamis, but Barnabas doubtless did on his second missionary journey (Acts 15:39), and according to tradition he was martyred there in the reign of Nero.

SALATHIEL (sà-lā'thĭ-ĕl, Gr. Salathiél, I have asked God), the son of Jeconiah, king of Judah, and father of Zerubbabel, according to the genealogy in Matthew 1:12; while in the Lukan genealogy he appears as the father of Zerubbabel, indeed, but as the son of Neri (Luke 3:27). The apparent discrepancy in the genealogies is probably to be explained on the principle that Matthew gives the genealogy of Jesus according to the legal succession, while Luke gives it according to the actual succession or right of consanguinity. If the direct line failed in Jeconiah, because he had no son to succeed him, the right of succession went to Salathiel, a descendant of Nathan and the son of Neri, who, as being the legal heir to Jeconiah, was reckoned his son by Matthew.

SALCAH (săl'kà, Heb. salekhâh), a city on the extreme NE boundary of the kingdom of Bashan, near Edrei (Deut. 3:10; Josh. 12:5; 13:11). Og, king of Bashan, once ruled it, and undoubtedly it was included in the portion given to the half-tribe of Manasseh. It later became the N limit of the Gadites (I Chron. 5:11). It is now known as Salkhad.

SALCHAH (sal'kà), another spelling of Salcah, q.v.

SALEM (sā'lĕm, Heb. shālēm, peace), the name of the city of which Melchizedek was king (Gen. 14:18; Heb. 7:1,2). Josephus (Ant. I,X,2) says that Jewish writers generally regarded it as a synonym of Jerusalem. It is apparently so regarded in Psalm 76:2.

SALIM (sā'lĭm, Gr. Saleím), a place referred to in John 3:23 as near Aenon, where John was baptizing. A comparison of John 1:28; 3:26; 10:40 shows that it must have been W of the Jordan, but its exact location is unknown.

SALLAI (săl'ā-ī, Heb. sallay). 1. Chief of a family of Benjamites who lived at Jerusalem (Neh. 11:8).

2. The name of a priestly family (Neh. 12:20), called "Sallu" in verse 7.

SALLU (See Sallai)

SALMA (săl'mà, Heb. salmā', strength), a son of Caleb, son of Hur, and father of Bethlehem (I Chron. 2:51; 2:54).

SALMON (săl'mŏn, Heb. salmôn, clothing), the father of Boaz the husband of Ruth, and grandfather of Jesse, father of David (Ruth 4:20,21; I Chron. 2:11; Matt. 1:4,5; Luke 3:32).

SALMONE (săl-mō'nē, Gr. Salmóne), a promontory forming the E extremity of the isle of Crete. Paul sailed near it on his way to Rome (Acts 27:7). It is now known as Cape Sidero.

SALOME (sà-lō'mē, Gr. Salóme, fem. of Solomon). 1. The wife of Zebedee, and mother of James and John (cf. Matt. 27:56 with Mark 15:40; 16:1). She was one of the women who companied with Jesus in Galilee to minister to Him (Mark 15:40, 41). She was present at the crucifixion of Jesus, and was among those who at Easter morning came to the tomb to anoint the dead body of their Lord (Mark 16:1).

2. The daughter of Herodias, and the grandniece of Herod Antipas, whose dancing before Herod pleased him so much that as a reward she obtained the head of John the Baptist (Matt. 14:3-11; Mark 6:17-28). Her name is not given in the Gospels. For her name see Jos. Antiq. xviii. 5,4.

SALT was used in ancient times, as it is today, for seasoning and preserving food. Salt of a poor quality was found in great abundance on the shore of the Dead Sea, where it was gathered after the salty water had evaporated. It was also cut from the neighboring salt cliffs. On the sea coast the inhabitants filled holes in rocks with sea water and then collected the salt when the water had evaporated. In the N part of Palestine salt was probably purchased from Phoenician traders. Salt was also used as an antiseptic in medicine. Newborn babies were always bathed and rubbed with salt (Ezek. 16:4). The law required the use of salt with offerings of all kinds (Lev. 2:13; Ezek. 43:24). Sometimes captured cities were doomed to utter destruction by sowing the ground with salt. Abimelech did this to Shechem (Judg. 9:45). In Numbers 18:19 and II Chronicles 13:5 a "covenant of salt" is mentioned. To this day it is true among the Arabs that to eat of a person's salt, or to partake of his hospitality, is regarded as a token of amity and brings one under his protection. In Scripture the word salt is often used in a figurative sense. It typifies barrenness and sterility (Deut. 29:23; Jer. 17:6). Jesus calls His true disciples "the salt of the earth" (Matt. 5:13; Mark 9:50; Luke 14:34). Salt is used to describe wholesome character and speech (Mark 9:50; Col. 4:6). James says it is as incongruous for the same mouth to utter blessings and cursings as for a fountain to yield both sweet and salt water (James 3:11). (See Minerals) S.B.

SALT, CITY OF, a city in the wilderness of Judah, not far from the Dead Sea. It is mentioned as being between Nibshan and Engedi (Josh. 15:62). Its exact site is uncertain.

SALT, COVENANT OF, a covenant of permanent and perpetual obligation. Since salt was a necessary part of the daily diet, and salt was always used in sacrifices to Jehovah (Lev. 2:13), it was not long before men saw a connection between salt and covenant making. To "eat salt with" a person meant to share his hospitality. When covenants were made, they were usually confirmed with sacrificial meals, and salt was always present. Numbers 18:19 says that offerings to Jehovah were to be "a covenant of salt for ever before Jehovah."

SALT SEA (See Dead Sea)

SALT, VALLEY OF, a valley in which great victories were won over the Edomites, first by the army of David (II Sam. 8:13), and later by Amaziah, king of Judah (II Kings 14:7; II Chron. 25:11). It was between Jerusalem and Edom, but its exact site is uncertain.

SALU (sā'lū, Heb. sālû'), a prince of the tribe of Simeon, and the father of Zimri who was slain by Phinehas (Num. 25:14; I Macc. 2:26).

SALUTATION (săl-ū-tā'shŭn, Gr. aspasmós), a greeting given either orally (Luke 1:29,41,44) or in writing (I Cor. 16:21; Col. 4:18; II Thess. 3:17). Greetings in the Bible sometimes included acts as well as words: a profound obeisance or prostration, a kissing of the hand, kneeling, falling upon the neck of another, embracings. Every situation in life had its own salutation: the return of a friend from a journey, the birth of a son, a marriage, wearing new clothes, dining, the appeals of a beggar, etc. Among the more common salutations on meeting were the following: "Blessed be thou of the Lord" (Gen. 43:29); "The Lord be with thee" (Ruth 2:4); "Peace be unto thee" (Luke 24:36); "Hail!" (Matt. 26:49). Monarchs were saluted with the words, "Let the king live for ever" (I Kings 1:31; Neh. 2:3). The Pharisees especially liked salutations in public places (Matt. 23:7; Mark 12:38). Because salutations were usually so time-consuming, when Jesus sent out the Seventy, He forbade salutations by the way (Luke 10:4). Salutations were given at partings as well as at meetings. "Go in peace," or "Farewell" (I Sam. 1:17; 20:42; II Sam. 15:9; Mark 5:34). Epistolary salutations were more brief and direct. The salutations of Paul's epistles are usually elaborate and of rich spiritual fulness. S.B.

SALVATION (săl-vā'shŭn, Heb. yeshû'âh, Gr. sotérion). In the Bible the word "salvation" is not necessarily a technical theological term, but simply denotes "deliverance" from almost any kind of evil, whether material or spiritual. Theologically, however, it denotes (1) the whole process by which man is delivered from all that interferes with the enjoyment of God's highest blessings, (2) the actual enjoyment of those blessings.

The root idea in salvation is deliverance from some danger or evil. This deliverance may be from defeat in battle (Exod. 15:2), trouble (Ps. 34:6), enemies (II Sam. 3:10), violence (II Sam. 22:3), reproach (Ps. 57:3), exile (Ps. 106:47), death (Ps. 6:4), sin (Ezek. 36:29). The outstanding instance of divine salvation in the early history of Israel was the deliverance from Egypt. Since it is God who provides the deliverance, He is often spoken of as Saviour (Isa. 43:3,11; Jer. 14:8), a title which in the NT is usually applied to Jesus Christ. In the OT salvation is at first thought of as deliverance from present evil in a temporal and material sense, but with the deepening sense of moral evil, salvation acquires a profound ethical meaning. At first the conception of salvation is primarily national, but gradually the prophetic horizon broadens and salvation is seen to include Gentiles as well as Jews (Isa. 49:5,6; 55:1-5). There is also increasing stress upon the individual. Salvation is not necessarily for the nation as a whole, but for the righteous remnant. It includes, moreover, deliverance from sin itself as well as from the various evils which are the consequence of sin (Ps. 51; Jer. 31:31-34; Ezek. 36:25-29). With the development of the Messianic idea the word salvation comes to be used in the technical theological sense of the deliverance, especially from sin, to be brought in with the Messianic age.

In the OT, complete trust in God was the most important of the human conditions for salvation. Next in importance,and following naturally from the first, was obedience to God's moral law as expressed in the various codes of law. God, however, was not satisfied with a mere legalistic fulfilment of the letter of the law. Forgiveness of sins was conditioned upon repentance. Most sins also required a ritual sacrifice as part of the act of repentance.

In the teaching of Jesus, salvation is often used to denote deliverance from trouble, like illness (Matt. 9:22), but it usually means deliverance from sin through entrance upon a new divine life. It is a present experience, although its complete fulfilment is eschatological. To the Pharisees of His day, salvation was a reward given to the man who perfectly lived up to the requirements of the law; but Jesus says that He came to seek the lost (Luke 19:10) and that salvation is through faith in Him, the incarnate Son of God (John 3:16).

The central theme of the entire apostolic age is the salvation brought by Jesus. Salvation is represented primarily as deliverance from sin. The whole NT lays stress upon the sufferings and death of Christ as mediating salvation (Eph. 2:13-18). As in the teaching of Jesus, salvation throughout the NT is regarded as a present experience, but it is eschatological as well. Indeed, the blessings of salvation the believer has now are only a foretaste of what are to be his in the coming age, after Christ comes. The salvation Christ brings is not merely deliverance from future punishment, but also from sin as a present power (Rom. 6). It includes all the redemptive blessings we have in Christ, chiefly conversion, regeneration, justification, adoption, sanctification, and glorification. It provides a solution for the whole problem of sin, in all its many aspects. Through union with Christ, the believer has died to sin (Rom. 6:2), has crucified the flesh — or corrupt human nature (Gal. 5:24), and has become a new creature (II Cor. 5:17). He is free from the law (Rom. 6:14; 7:6) and has exchanged the bondage of its requirements for the freedom of the new man in Christ (Col. 2:14; Gal. 5:1,13, 18). The reception of the deliverance is made possible by faith, which involves not mere mental assent to certain doctrinal propositions, but repentance and whole-hearted commitment to Christ as Saviour and Lord (Rom. 3:28; Eph. 2:8). On the divine side, the ultimate cause of salvation is the divine mercy. It is entirely undeserved, and is by God's grace alone. So far as the possibility of receiving it is concerned, salvation is available to all men (John 3:16; I Tim. 4:10). In some sense, the doctrine of salvation extends beyond man so as to affect the universe. Eventually all things are to be subjected unto the Son (I Cor. 15:28), and all things in heaven and on earth will be summed up in Christ (Eph. 1:10). No foe will remain to dispute Christ's authority or in any way mar the glories of His eternal kingdom. Even the physical universe will be redeemed.

SAMARIA (sà-mâr'ĭ-à, Heb. shōmerôn, Gr. Samáreia). The country of Samaria occupied a rough square of some 40 miles N and S by 35 E and W. It was the territory occupied by the ten tribes led by Jeroboam, extending roughly from Bethel to Dan, and from the Mediterranean to Syria and Ammon. The frontiers are somewhat blurred, whether a geographical or a political definition is attempted. Sir George Adam Smith, after careful geographical and historical analysis, concludes: ". . . the southern frontier of Samaria gradually receded from the Vale of Ajalon to the Wady Isher and 'Akrabbeh. The northern was more fixed, and lay from the Mediterranean to Jordan, along the S edge of Esdraelon, by the foot of Carmel and Gilboa. If Carmel is shut off, the edge of Sharon may be taken as the western boundary; the eastern was Jordan . . ." (Historical Geography of the Holy Land, pp. 324, 325. Pp. 249-256 for detailed description). The earliest name for this section of the Palestinian uplands was Mount Ephraim (Josh. 17:15; 19:50; Judg. 3:27; 4:5 etc).

Viewed from the sea, the area does, in fact, present the appearance of a unit, a compact "massif." The western flank, generally poor country, falls away from the summits in a slope more gradual than that of the Judaean highlands. Access is easy, and little history gathered round slopes so indefensible and sterile. Over the divide, the one conspicuous pass is that in which Shechem lies, between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim. It crosses the range and merges into a valley swinging S to Jordan, dividing the eastern flank of Mount Ephraim into two portions, a close-piled bulwark of high country to the S, and an open series of broad valleys to the N. "Plains, meadows, and spacious vales" (Sir George Adam Smith, op. cit. p. 327) are a remarkable feature within this highland mass, providing both gentle access ("the out-goings of Mount Ephraim" of Josh. 17:18), and secluded pasture-lands within. Hence the trend of Samaria's history. The country was too open for successful defense. Hence, too, the frequency with which the chariot is mentioned in the annals of the northern kingdom, and the ease with which surrounding paganism poured into the life of the northern tribes.

It will be convenient to deal with the major centers of the land separately:

1. Shechem. Samaria is the "heart-land" of Palestine, and Shechem the geographical center of the whole country, and the hub of early Israelite history. Shechem lay in a fertile vale between Ebal and Gerizim, near modern Nablus (i.e. Neapolis, or New Town, Vespasian's foundation to replace the shattered Jewish town). It was the favorite pasturage of the patriarchs (Gen. 12:6; 33:18,19; 37:12,13), whither Joseph's bones were later borne (Josh. 24:32). There are few details in the record of the Hebrew infiltration of this area. Events ran true to the geography of the land, and the Canaanites offered little active resistance. Two opposing amphitheaters across the vale of Shechem were the scene of the great assemblies of Joshua 8 and 24. Judges 9 gives a vivid impression of the fertility of the valley. Its abundant food and verdure are woven with the grim story of Gideon's son. Shechem was the obvious site of the capital, after the lamentable division of the land, but Shechem was no fortress, as Jeroboam soon decided. He removed the royal seat to Tirzah (I Kings 14:17), a policy maintained by his immediate successors (I Kings 15:33; 16:6). The next usurper, Omri, who was a competent soldier, was not satisfied, and chose the site of Samaria.

2. Samaria. It is sometimes a matter of difficulty in reading the later chapters of the records of the Kings, and some passages in the prophets, to decide whether Samaria refers to the land, or to Omri's foundation. In the NT it is sometimes equally difficult to decide. Luke 17:11 and John 4:4 refer to the district. In Acts 8:5-25 either meaning is possible, and Moffatt's rendering of vs. 5, "a town in Samaria," is quite legitimate. Samaria, or Shomeron, meant "Watch Tower," and so Omri intended his fortress to be. It commanded a wide prospect, and lay back from the center of the land towards the sea, a feature favored by a dynasty which made much of its Phoenician alliance. It took the Assyrians three years (723 to 721 B.C.) to reduce the fortress. Ahab and Jezebel, his Phoenician bride, established in Samaria a tradition of luxury, vice, and paganism, against which Amos, Micah, Isaiah, and Hosea raised their protest. The Assyrian conquest brought the utter doom which the prophets had predicted. The inhabitants were deported in mass to Assyria, and the dismantled stronghold repopulated by Assyrian settlers brought in to replace them. In 331 B.C., after a punitive massacre by Alexander the Great, a body of Macedonian colonists were also introduced. As Samaria had fitted the Phoenician policy of Ahab, so too it was conveniently situated for the pro-Roman activities of Herod. As a place of residence it was conveniently linked with the port of Caesarea, which Herod built. The town of Sebaste, however, Herod's foundation, occupied only a portion of the eastern part of Samaria's ancient site. Here Herod married and murdered Mariamne, and sent to death his two sons.

3. Sychar and Jacob's Well. Until the middle of the last century (e.g. Dean Alford in his Greek Testament), Sychar of John 4:5 was commonly identified with Shechem. More recent opinion favors the Arab village of El-Askar. Smith devotes Chapter XVIII of his monumental work to the vexed question. It is impossible to be quite certain of the locality of either Sychar or the Well. The tradition of the Well is not OT, and the present cluttered site has no stronger claim to authenticity than many of the other holy places of Palestine.

4. Shiloh. This is probably the Arab village of Seilun 12 miles S of Shechem. Judges 21:19 pinpoints the place, and if Lebonah is indeed the modern Lubbar, the site of Shiloh is identified with some certainty. The locality appears as a sacred site for the "tent of meeting" in Joshua 18:1,9,10; Judges 21:19. The religious function of Shiloh was preserved for some three to four centuries (I Sam. 4:4). Samuel served as a child at Shiloh, and it is notable that the "tent of meeting" had become by his time a permanent building (I Sam. 1:9; 3:15). The disaster and discredit which fell on Eli's family may have led to the abandonment of Shiloh as a religious center. At any rate it ceased to function thus about this time, and Psalm 78:60-62 and Jeremiah 7:12,14 may indicate that the Philistines overran it.

Bethel. This town, on the southern frontier of the district of Samaria, was a famous religious locality. It is mentioned 65 times in Scripture. It was the scene of Jacob's dream, the imagery of which may have been based on accounts of a Sumerian ziggurat, and to which Christ obliquely refers in John 1:51. Bethel was already a sanctuary when the land was divided, and Jeroboam used it as a holy place to displace the religious authority of Jerusalem. Here the king set up one of his golden calves, and established his idolatrous priesthood (I Kings 12:28). First an unnamed prophet from Judah (I Kings 13:1-3), and then the fiery Amos, attacked this worship. Hosea also spoke against the Bethel cult, and the prophecies of all three were fulfilled when Josiah of Judah destroyed the pagan altars (II Kings 23:15,16). The southern locality of Bethel, on an unstable frontier, made it peculiarly susceptible to such a punitive invasion. Amos 8 indicates that Bethel was a busy market-town, a function likely to develop at the junction of several important highways. Bethel is a few miles from Ai, and since archeological investigations have established the fact that Ai was destroyed about 2200 B.C., while Bethel provides much evidence of destruction in Joshua's time, it has been plausibly suggested that Bethel bore the name Ai at the time of the invasion. The Troas of the NT and ancient Troy are much further apart. E.M.B.

SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH (See Samaritans)

SAMARITANS (sə-măr'ĭ-tănz, Heb. shōmerōnîm, Gr. Samareítai). The word may signify, according to context: (1) the inhabitants of Samaria (the region rather than the town; e.g. II Kings 17:26; Matthew 10:5; Luke 9:52, 10:33; 17:16; John 4:9,30,40; Acts 8:25); (2) the sect which derived its name from Samaria, a term of contempt with the Jews (John 8:48); (3) since the seventeenth century, "a good Samaritan" (Luke 10:33) has signified a generous benefactor.

Racially the Samaritans are difficult to identify. In 721 B.C. Sargon of Assyria destroyed Samaria. On the walls of the royal palace at Dur-Sarraku (Khorsabad), he recorded the fact, and his subsequent policy of depopulation, deportation, and reestablishment: "In my first year of reign . . . the people of Samaria . . . to the number of 27,290 I carried away . . . The city I rebuilt — I made it greater than it was before. People of lands which I had conquered I settled therein. My tartan I placed over them as governor." It seems clear that the policy of deportation applied particularly to Samaria as a city and not as a region. Jeremiah 41:5 for example, seems to imply that a remnant of true Israelites remained in Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria a century later; so a substratum, or admixture of the Hebrew stock in the later composite population must be assumed. The newcomers from the N may be presumed to have intermarried with the Israelite remnant, and ultimately the population took the general name of Samaritans.

The completeness of the devastation left by the Assyrian invasion is evident from the infestation by wild beasts of which the immigrants complained (II Kings 17). Superstitiously, the intruders concluded that "the god of the land" was angry at their presence and their ignorance of His propitiatory rites. They sent to the Assyrian monarch and asked him to select a priest from among the deportees to instruct them in the necessary ritual of worship. The king (it was Esarhaddon) acceded to the request, and some instruction in the faith of Jehovah penetrated the stricken district. It was a mixed religion which resulted. "They feared Jehovah," we read, "and served their own gods." Josiah's reforms crossed the border at Bethel, and seem to have extended into the northern districts. There was little indeed, to prevent their infiltration. Religious revival was not the sort of military penetration which invited Assyrian attention (II Kings 23:15; II Chronicles 34:6,7). The measure of purification, which may be presumed to have taken place in the Samaritan religion about this time, did not, however, reconcile Samaritan and Jew racially.

After the return from captivity, enmity became inveterate between the Samaritans and the Jewish remnant of Ezra and Nehemiah. On the strength of their worship of Jehovah "since the days of Esarhaddon" (Ezra 4:2), the Samaritans sought a share in the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem, but were firmly rebuffed, hence the policy of obstruction from Sanballat of Samaria which was a serious hindrance to Nehemiah's work (Neh. 2:10,19; 4,6). Sanballat's son-in-law was Manasseh, grandson of the Jewish high-priest, and Nehemiah's drive for racial purity led to the expulsion of this young man from Jerusalem. By his emigration with a considerable band of dissident Jews to Samaria, the rift between the peoples, politically and religiously, was made permanent. Manasseh persuaded the Samaritans, according to tradition, to abandon many of their idolatrous practices, and with Sanballat's building on Mount Gerizim of a schismatic temple for his son-in-law, the sect of the Samaritans was established. It was from this time too, that Samaria became a refuge for malcontent Jews, with the consequent use of "Samaritan" as a term of abuse for a dissident rebel (John 8:48). John Hyrcanus destroyed the temple on Gerizim along with the city in 109 B.C. When Herod provided another temple in 25 B.C., the Samaritans refused to use it, continuing to worship on the mount (John 4:20,21).

Founded as it was before the rise of the great prophetic tradition, the religion of the Samaritans was based on the Pentateuch alone. Their position was held with some firmness, and Josephus mentions a disputation before Ptolemy Philometor on the question which the Samaritan woman poses in John 4:20, which resulted in the death, according to the rules of the debate, of the defeated Samaritan advocates. Christ's firm answer (loc. cit. vss. 21-23) stressed the incompleteness of the Samaritan tradition, its inadequate revelation, and the common transience of the cherished beliefs of both Samaritan and Jew. The greatness of Christ is shown in the story, for at no time had the bitterness between Samaritan and Jew been greater. At one Passover during the governorship of Coponius (A.D. 6-9), when, according to annual custom, the gates of the temple were opened at midnight, some Samaritans had intruded and polluted the holy place by scattering human bones in the porches. Samaritans were thereafter excluded from the services (Jos., Antiq. 18:2:2). They were cursed in the temple. Their food was considered unclean, even as swine's flesh. The whole situation narrated in John 4 is therefore remarkable, the buying of food in Sychar, the conversation at Jacob's Well, and the subsequent evangelization of the area. (See also Acts 8:5-25). It is a magnificent illustration of the emancipation which Christianity was to bring to those grown immobile in the bondage of Judaistic prejudice. E.M.B.

SAMGARNEBO (săm'gär-nēb'bō, Heb. samgarnevô, be gracious, Nebo), one of Nebuchadnezzar's chief army officers who entered Jerusalem (Jer. 39:3).

SAMLAH (săm'lä, Heb. samlâh, a garment), one of the kings of Edom. He was a native of Masrekah, and reigned before the Israelites had kings (Gen. 36:36,37; I Chron. 1:47,48).

SAMOS (sā'mŏs, Gr. Sámos, height), an island off western Asia Minor colonized by Ionians in the 11th century B.C., notable for metal-work, woollen products, and probably utility pottery, though it is not certain that "Samian ware" necessarily implied a large native industry of this sort. Samos joined the Ionian revolt but was treated generously by the Persians, fought for Xerxes at Salamis, but later joined the Athenian confederacy. With typical fickleness she deserted this, and the revolt was crushed by Pericles himself (441 B.C.). Thenceforward cooperation was loyal, and the Samians were given the citizenship by a grateful Athens after Aegospotami in 405 B.C. Samos was occupied by Lysander in the next year and regained by Athens only in 365 B.C. Samos produced the moralists and poets Aesop, Ibycus, and Anacreon, and the astronomer Conon. Paul touched at Samos on his last voyage to Jerusalem (Acts 20:15). E.M.B.

SAMOTHRACE (săm'ō-thrās, Gr. Samothráke, Samos of Thrake), an island in the NE Aegean, mountainous and rising to over 5,000 feet. Its population was Samian, and it was associated with the Athenian maritime confederacies. Samothrace was the home of the mystery cult of the Cabiri, twin gods of Phrygian or Phoenician origin, which was in wide vogue during the Hellenistic age, and included Roman notables among its initiates. Paul called here on his first voyage to Europe (Acts 16:11).

SAMSON (săm'sŭn, Heb. shimshôn, probably little sun, Gr. Sampsón, Lat. and Eng. Samson), one of the judges of Israel, perhaps the last before Samuel. The story of his life is told in Judges 13-16. He was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan, the son of Manoah.

Zorah, where he was born, was about half way between Jerusalem and the Mediterranean, along the coast of which the Philistines lived. His birth was announced by the angel of the Lord beforehand to his mother, who was barren. The angel told her that she would have a son, that this son should be a Nazirite from his birth, and that the Lord should begin to use him to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines. Nazirites were under special vow to God to restrain their carnal nature, thus showing the people generally that if they would receive God's blessing they must deny and govern themselves and be faithful to their vows of consecration as God's covenant people. The preternatural strength that Samson exhibited at various times in his career was not his because he was a natural giant, but because the Spirit of the Lord came upon him to accomplish great deeds.

At the time of his birth the Israelites had been in bondage to the Philistines for 40 years because they had done evil in the sight of the Lord. After his birth "the child grew, and the Lord blessed him. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol" (Judg. 13:24,25). But almost from the beginning of his career he showed one conspicuous weakness, which was ultimately to wreck him: he was a slave to passion. He insisted, against the objections of his parents, on marrying a Philistine woman of Timnath, which was not far from Zorah. At the wedding feast he propounded to the guests a riddle, wagering that if they guessed it he would give them 30 changes of raiment. By threatening the life of his bride, they compelled her to obtain the answer from him. When he found he had been tricked, in revenge he killed 30 Philistines of Askelon and gave his guests their garments, thus fulfilling his wager. He went home without his wife, giving the impression that he had forsaken her. When, later, he returned to her, he found that her father had given her in marriage to someone else, and was offered her sister in her stead. In revenge, Samson caught 300 jackals, and sent them into the Philistine fields of corn in pairs with burning torches tied between their tails. The Philistines retaliated by burning his wife and her father.

This act of vengeance only provoked another and a greater from himself. He smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter, and took up his abode on the top of a rock called Etam. The Philistines invaded Judah and demanded the surrender of their arch-enemy. Samson agreed to allow the Israelites to deliver him into the hands of the Philistines, but on the way he broke the cords that bound him, and seizing the jawbone of an ass he killed with it 1,000 men. With this great feat Samson clearly established his title to the position of a judge in Israel. The historian says in this connection, "And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years" (Judg. 15:20). The expression "in the days of the Philistines" implies that the ascendancy of the Philistines was not destroyed but only kept in check by the prowess of Samson.

Samson next went down to Gaza, a Philistine stronghold, and yielded to the solicitations of a harlot. When it became known that he was in the city, the Philistines laid a trap for him; but at midnight Samson arose, took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and carried them a quarter of a mile to the top of the hill before Hebron. God in His mercy continued to give him supernatural strength notwithstanding his evil actions.

Continuing his life of vicious self-indulgence, Samson before long became enamored of another Philistine woman, named Delilah, through whom he lost his physical power. The Philistine leaders bribed her with a large sum of money to betray him into their hands. By their direction she begged him to tell her in what his great strength lay. Three times he gave her deceitful answers, but at last he gave in to her importunities and revealed that if only his hair were cut he would be like other men. She lulled him into a profound sleep; his hair was cut; and when he awoke and heard her derisive cry, "The Philistines be upon thee Samson," he found that, not merely his strength, but also God had departed from him. Now at the mercy of his enemies, he was bound with chains, his eyes were put out, and he was sent to grind in the prison-house of Gaza.

How long Samson continued in this state of shameful bondage is unknown — perhaps some weeks or even months. On the occasion of a great feast to the God Dagon, his captors resolved to make sport of him by making him play the buffoon before the assembled multitude. The temple of Dagon was filled with people — with 3,000 on the roof to watch the sport. Meanwhile, his hair had grown again, and with his returning strength he longed to be avenged on his enemies for at least one of his two blinded eyes (Judg. 16:28). He asked the lad who attended him to allow him to rest between the two pillars on which the building was supported. Taking hold of them, he prayed that God would help him once more; and with a mighty effort he moved the pillars from their position and brought down the roof, burying with himself a large number of Philistines in its ruins. In this dying act he slew more than he had slain in his life.

With all of his failings he is listed with the heroes of faith in Hebrews 11 (vs 32). By faith in God's gift and calling, he received strength to do the wonders he performed. In his life too often animal passion ruled. He was without real self-control; and accordingly he wrought no permanent deliverance for Israel. S.B.

SAMUEL (săm'ū-ĕl, Heb. shemû'ĕl, name of God, or his name is El; some grammarians prefer a derivation from yishma' ' El, God hears; others associate the name with sha'al, to ask, on the basis of I Sam. 1:20). Samuel is often called the last of the judges (cf. I Sam. 7:6,15-17) and the first of the prophets (3:20; Acts 3:24; 13:20). He was the son of Elkanah and Hannah, of Ramathaim-zophim in the hill country of Ephraim. The account of the events associated with the birth of Samuel indicates that his parents were a devoted and devout couple. Hannah's childlessness led her to pour out her complaint and supplication to God in bitterness of heart; but she trusted God to provide the answer and promised to give to the Lord the son she had requested. When Samuel was born, she kept her promise; as soon as the child was weaned she took him to Shiloh and presented him to Eli. Then she praised the Lord in prayer (usually called her "Song," 2:1-10). Samuel grew up in the Lord's house and ministered to the Lord (2:11; 3:1) and each year when his parents came to sacrifice at Shiloh, his mother brought a little robe for Samuel. Spiritually and morally, the times were bad. The sons of Eli were unworthy representatives of the priestly office. In their greed they violated the laws of offering (2:12-17); they also engaged in immoral acts with the women who served at the entrance of the tent of meeting (2:22). Though Eli remonstrated with them, he was not firm enough and the Lord declared that He would punish him (2:27-36).

Under such circumstances there was little communion with God, but the Lord called to Samuel in the night and revealed to him the impending doom of Eli's house. The Lord blessed Samuel and "let none of his words fall to the ground" (2:19), so that all Israel knew that Samuel was a prophet of the Lord. Eli died upon receiving the news of the death of his sons and the capture of the Ark of the Covenant in a Philistine victory over Israel. Some time after the return of the Ark to Israel, Samuel challenged the people to put away foreign gods and to serve the Lord only (7:3). When the Philistines threatened the Israelite gathering at Mizpah, Samuel interceded for Israel and the Lord answered with thunder against the enemy. The Philistines were routed and Samuel set up a memorial stone which he called Ebenezer ("Stone of help," 7:12).

Samuel, judge and priest, made his home at Ramah, where he administered justice and also built an altar. He went on circuit to Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah (7:15). In his old age he appointed his sons, Joel and Abijah (cf. I Chron. 6:28), as judges in Beersheba, but the people protested that his sons did not walk in his ways but took bribes and perverted justice. The people requested a king to rule them, "like all the nations" (8:6). Samuel was displeased by their demand, but the Lord told him to grant their request and to warn them concerning the ways of a king. Samuel was now brought into acquaintance with Saul the son of Kish, who was searching for his father's lost asses. About to give up, Saul was encouraged by his servant to confer with Samuel, of whom he said, "There is a man of God in this city, and he is a man that is held in honor; all that he says comes true" (9:6 RSV). In I Samuel 9, Samuel is called a "seer" (ro'eh) rather than a "prophet" (nabi'), "for he who is now called a prophet was formerly called a seer" (vs. 9). God had revealed to Samuel that Saul was to come to see him; at the conclusion of this first meeting, Samuel secretly anointed Saul as king (10:1) and foretold some confirmatory signs, which came to pass as predicted (10:1-13). Samuel then called an assembly of Israel at Mizpah and the choice of Saul was confirmed by lot. Samuel related to the people the rights and duties of a king and wrote these in a scroll which was placed in the sanctuary (lit., "before the Lord," 10:25). After Saul's victory over the Ammonites, Samuel again convened Israel and Saul's kingship was confirmed at Gilgal. Samuel was now advanced in years and retired from public life in favor of the king. In his address to Israel he reviewed the Lord's dealings with them and reminded them of their duty to serve God. He called on the Lord to bear witness to the words of His prophet by sending a thunderstorm, though it was the season of wheat harvest. The Lord sent the storm, and "all the people greatly feared the Lord and Samuel" (12:18). They requested Samuel to intercede for them and he replied with a significant statement on responsibility and intercession.

Samuel next appears in conflict with Saul; a national crisis had arisen with a Philistine threat and Saul summoned the people to Gilgal. When Samuel was late in coming to make offerings, Saul presumed to make them himself. Samuel accused Saul of foolishness and disobedience and said that Saul's kingdom would not continue. Samuel then went to Gibeah and Saul engaged in a victorious battle with the Philistines. After Saul's success, Samuel commissioned him to annihilate the Amalekites (chap. 15). In this expedition Saul again showed incomplete obedience; Samuel reminded him of the necessity of absolute obedience and told him God had rejected him to remain as king. This was the last official meeting of Samuel and Saul (15:35); Samuel returned to Ramah and grieved over Saul. The Lord appointed Samuel to serve again as "kingmaker" and sent him to Bethlehem to anoint the young shepherd, David, as Saul's successor (cf. I Chron. 11:3). Later, in flight from Saul, David took refuge on one occasion with Samuel in Naioth of Ramah (19:18), where Samuel was head of a group of prophets. When Saul came after David, the Spirit of God came upon Saul and he prophesied before Samuel (19:23-24). II Chronicles provides additional information concerning Samuel's part in the organization and conduct of the service of God. David and Samuel installed the gatekeepers of the tent of meeting (I Chron. 9:22). Samuel also dedicated gifts for the house of the Lord (I Chron. 26:28). Samuel was diligent in the Lord's service and it is noted that he kept the feast of the passover in a memorable way (II Chron. 35:18). Samuel was also a writer (cf. I Sam. 10:25); he is credited with "the Chronicles of Samuel the Seer" (I Chron. 29:29). Jewish tradition also ascribed to him the writing of the Biblical books which bear his name. Samuel died while Saul was still king and was buried by solemn assembly of the people at Ramah (I Sam. 25:1).

Samuel's last message to Saul came upon the occasion of Saul's recourse to the spirit-medium of Endor on the eve of Saul's death on Mt. Gilboa. Samuel is mentioned in several other OT books and is recognized as a man of prayer. In Psalm 99:6 it is said that he was "among those who called on His name." The intercession of Samuel is cited in Jeremiah 15:1. In the NT he is referred to by Peter (Acts 3:24) as one who foretold the events of NT times; Paul mentions him in a sermon at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:20). In Hebrews 11:32 he is listed among those whose faith pleased God.

From the standpoint of modern research, a number of the places named in the OT in connection with Samuel have been identified and some have been excavated. Among those at which archaeological work has been done are Shiloh (Tell Seilun), Mizpah (Tell en-Nasbeh?), Gibeah (Tell el Ful), and Bethel (Beitin). Tradition also associates with Samuel the site called Nebi Samwil ("prophet Samuel"), which has also been suggested as the site of Mizpah. C.E.D.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. The books are named after Samuel, the outstanding figure of the early section. Originally there was only one book of Samuel, but the LXX divided it into two. The division was followed by the Latin versions and made its appearance in the Hebrew text in Daniel Bomberg's first edition (1516-1517). In the LXX the books of Samuel and the books of Kings are called I-IV "Books of Kingdoms"; the Vulgate numbers them similarly but names them "Books of Kings." The title Samuel, which appears in Hebrew manuscripts, is followed in most English translations.

Authorship and date. There is little external or internal evidence as to the authorship of Samuel. Jewish tradition ascribes the work to the Prophet Samuel: "Samuel wrote the book which bears his name and the Book of Judges and Ruth" (Baba Bathra, 14b), but it also raised the problem relating to Samuel's death, which is recorded in I Samuel 25:1. All of the events of I Samuel 25-31 and II Samuel occurred after Samuel's death. The statement of I Samuel 27:6, "Ziklag has belonged to the kings of Judah to this day" (RSV), is taken by some to demand a date in the divided kingdom; others insist that this need not be later than the end of the reign of David. Samuel was a writer and certainly his writing was used in the composition of these books. I Chronicles 29:29 refers to "the Chronicles of Samuel the seer," "the Chronicles of Nathan the prophet," and "the Chronicles of Gad the seer." Since David's death is not included in our books of Samuel, it has been thought probable that they were written before that event. Another suggestion is that some Judean prophet wrote the books shortly after the division of the kingdom, writing by inspiration and using sources such as those mentioned above. By liberal scholars, Samuel is regarded as a composite of at least two sources, early and late, similar to the so-called J and E sources of the Pentateuch. The earlier is dated to Solomonic times and centers around Saul and David; the later, of the eighth century, deals with Samuel; their union is assigned to a date about a century after that. O. Eissfeldt isolates three sources, which he labels L, J, and E. This division into "documents" stands on traditional liberal bases: duplicates, contradictions, and differences in style and viewpoint. For detailed discussion, one must refer to the books on introduction and to the commentaries. In general it may be noted that alleged duplicates are records of separate but similar events, of the same incident from different viewpoints, or of references to previously recorded happenings. Supposed contradictions may often be harmonized by close examination of the text and context. Differences in style and point of view need not indicate multiple authorship, but may reflect various purposes in the writing of a single author. As usual in theories of composite authorship, the redactor or editor must bear a heavy load of mixed credit and blame. Positively, the unity of Samuel is attested by the following: (1) the orderly and consistent plan of the work; (2) the interrelations of parts of the books, as noted by Driver; (3) uniformity of language throughout. The unity of II Samuel is generally recognized. Additional light on the text of Samuel may be supplied by the Qumran materials.

Content. Outline (after Pfeiffer). (1) Shiloh and Samuel, I Samuel 1:1-7:1; (2) Samuel and Saul, 7:2-15:35; (3) Saul and David, I Samuel 16-31; II Samuel 1; (4) David as king of Judah, II Samuel 2-4; (5) David as king of all Israel, II Samuel 5-24. 1. The book begins with Hannah's distress, her supplication, and the answer in the form of Samuel's birth. The song of Hannah shows relationships to both the Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55) and the prophecy of Zechariah (Luke 1:68-79). Samuel's childhood was spent at Shiloh; here the Lord spoke to him and revealed the future of the priestly line of Eli. The battle with the Philistines resulted in a Philistine victory, the capture of the ark, and the death of Eli. A source of trouble in Philistia, the ark was sent back to Israel. 2. When the people requested a king, Samuel remonstrated with them but was directed by the Lord to grant their request. Saul was brought to Samuel and secretly anointed as king. This selection was later confirmed by lot at an assembly of all Israel at Mizpah. Saul's first impressive act, the rescue of Jabesh-Gilead from the besieging Ammonites, led to his confirmation as king of Gilgal. Samuel now retired from active public life (chap. 12) though he continued to serve as adviser to the king. Incomplete obedience brought about Saul's rejection from the kingship. 3. The youthful David was designated as Saul's successor and secretly anointed by Samuel. David became Saul's court musician and later served king and country well by slaying Goliath in single combat. On this occasion Saul inquired concerning David's family, so that Jesse too could be rewarded (cf. 17:24). David now became a close friend of Jonathan, Saul's son, but Saul was now both jealous and afraid of David, and his hostility soon produced open attempts upon David's life. David was forced to flee, and the pursuit by Saul, though intermittent, was not concluded until the Philistines swept the Israelites before them on Mt. Gilboa and Saul and his sons perished. David mourned their passing in an eloquent elegy (II Sam. 1). 4. David reigned as king of Judah in Hebron for 7½ years. Overtures were made to unite all Israel under his leadership. 5. These efforts were crowned with success and David wisely took Jerusalem and made it his new capital, for since it had been in Jebusite hands it had had no definite affiliation with Judah or the northern tribes. David continued to build the kingdom and the Lord announced to him the perpetuity of his dynasty (II Sam. 7). Though David conquered his enemies and was gracious to Jonathan's son, he was overcome by temptation in the idleness of semi-retirement. The affair with Bathsheba led to bitter heartache and also to sincere repentance on the part of the king. Circumstances in the royal family brought about the rebellion of Absalom, which again saw David in flight for his life. The killing of Absalom ended the revolt but increased David's sorrow. Restored to Jerusalem, David had to deal promptly with the short-lived revolt of Sheba. II Samuel ends with a summary of battles with the Philistines, David's praise of the Lord (chap. 22; 23:2-7), the listing of his mighty men, and the catastrophe of the census (chap. 24).

Purpose. The purpose of all OT history is clearly stated in the NT (Rom. 15:4; I Cor. 10:11): to serve as warning, instruction, and encouragement. More specifically, the books of Samuel present the establishment of the kingship in Israel. In preserving the account of Samuel, the judge and prophet, the books mark the transition from judgeship to monarchy, since Samuel filled the prophetic office and administered the divine induction into office of Israel's first two kings. SANBALLAT (săn-băl'ăt, Heb. sanvallat, Assyr. Sin-uballit, the god Sin has given life), a Horonite; that is, a man of Beth-horon. He was a very influential Samaritan who tried unsuccessfully to defeat Nehemiah's plans for rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 4:1ff). He then plotted with others to invite Nehemiah to a conference at Ono in order to assassinate him, but Nehemiah saw through his stratagem and refused to come. When this device failed, he tried vainly to intimidate the Jewish governor (Neh. 6:5-14). Sanballat's daughter married into the family of Eliashib, the high priest at the time of the annulment of the mixed marriages forbidden by the Law (Neh. 13:28), but her husband refused to forsake her, and went with her to Shechem, where he became the high priest of a new temple built by his father-in-law on Gerizim. Sanballat's name is mentioned in some interesting papyri letters found at the end of the 19th century in Egypt. He was then the governor of Samaria.

SANCTIFICATION (săngk-tĭ-fĭ-kā'shŭn, Gr. hagiasmós, a separation, setting apart). While the noun does not occur in the OT, the verb "to sanctify" (Heb. qādhash), appears frequently. Its meaning is not primarily ethical but formal, its fundamental force being to separate from the world and consecrate to God. To sanctify anything is to declare that it belongs to God. It may refer to persons, places, days and seasons, and objects used for worship. Among objects sanctified to Jehovah in the OT are the first-born of Israel (Exod. 13:2), the Levites (Num. 3:12), the priests and the tent of meeting (Exod. 29:44), the altar (Exod. 29:36), the offering (Exod. 29:27), the Sabbath (Neh. 13:19-22), the nation of Israel as a whole (Exod. 19:5,6), a man's house or his field (Lev. 27:14, 16). To sanctify Jehovah means to put Him in a category by Himself, to acknowledge Him as God, to recognize Him as supreme, sovereign, with a unique claim on all of His creation. When Christ sanctifies Himself (John 17:19), He means that He consecrates Himself to His mediatorial work as Redeemer. The word "saint" comes from the same root and means "a sanctified one" — one who belongs to Christ. This formal meaning appears in I Corinthians 7:12-14, where the unbelieving husband is said to be sanctified by the wife, meaning not that he is different in moral character, but stands in a certain privileged relation to God.

In an ethical sense sanctification means the progressive conformation of the believer into the image of Christ, or the process by which the life is made morally holy. The transformation of the believer's life and character follows naturally from his consecration to a God who is morally perfect. Now that we belong to Christ we are to live to Him (Eph. 4:1; Col. 3:1-4; I Thess. 5:10). God has made a twofold provision for the believer's sanctification: the redemptive work of Christ and the work of the indwelling Holy Spirit. Sanctification has its beginning when a person becomes a Christian. God then, in regeneration, implants a new life in man, and gives to him the Holy Spirit, who makes real in his experience that for which Christ died for him at Calvary. It is in Romans 6-8 that we have the most extended teaching in the Bible on the ground and experimental outworking of sanctification. In a sense it is a gift, as is every part of salvation, but it must be daily appropriated through the moral surrender of our life to God. It is not momentary and instantaneous, but a lifelong process, completed only when we see Christ. See HOLINESS. S.B.

SANCTUARY (săngk'tū-â-rē, Heb. miqdāsh, Gr. hágion, holy place), refers almost exclusively to the tabernacle or temple. God's sanctuary was His established earthly abode, the place where He chose to dwell among His people. Psalm 114:2 says that "Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion." God Himself is a sanctuary for His people (Isa. 8:14; Ezek. 11:19). The word is used particularly of the holy of holies, whether of the tabernacle or temple. When it is used in the plural, it usually denotes idolatrous shrines, or high places, which Israelites who compromised with heathenism sometimes built (Amos 7:9). A sanctuary was also a place of asylum, the horns of the altar especially being regarded as inviolable (cf. I Kings 2:28f). In the NT the word is used only in the Epistle to the Hebrews (8:2; 9:1,2; 13:11), where the author makes clear that the earthly sanctuary was only a type of the true sanctuary which is in heaven, of which Christ is the high priest, and in which He offers Himself as a sacrifice (Heb. 10:1-18). S.B.

SAND (Heb. hôl, Gr. ámmos), a rock material formed of loose grains of small size formed as the result of weathering and decomposition of various kinds of rocks. It is found in abundance in deserts, in the sea, and on the shores of large bodies of water. The writers of the Bible were very familiar with it, and they often refer to it as a symbol of (1) numberlessness, vastness, (2) weight, (3) instability. The descendants of Abraham were numberless (Gen. 22:17; Jer. 33:22; Rom. 9:27; Heb. 11:12); as were also the enemies of Israel (Josh. 11:4; Judg. 7:12; I Sam. 13:5). Joseph accumulated grain as the sand of the sea (Gen. 41:49). God gave to Solomon understanding and largeness of heart as the sand on the seashore (I Kings 4:29). The thoughts of God, says the Psalmist, "are more in number than the sand" (Ps. 139:18). Job says that if his grief were weighed it would be heavier than the sand of the sea (Job 6:3). A house built on sand symbolizes a life not built on the teachings of Jesus (Matt. 7:26).

SANHEDRIM, SANHEDRIN (săn'hē-drĭm, săn'hē-drĭn, Talmudic Heb. transcription of the Gr. synédrion, a council), the highest Jewish tribunal during the Greek and Roman periods, often mentioned in the NT, where the Greek name is always in the English version translated "council." The Talmud connects the Sanhedrin with Moses' 70 elders, then with the alleged Great Synagogue of Ezra's time; but the truth is that the origin of the Sanhedrin is unknown, and there is no historical evidence for its existence before the Greek period. During the reign of the Hellenistic kings Palestine was practically under home rule, and was governed by an aristocratic council of elders which was presided over by the hereditary high priest. The council was called Gerousia, which always signifies an aristocratic body. This later developed into the Sanhedrin. During most of the Roman period the internal government of the country was practically in its hands, and its influence was recognized even in the Diaspora (Acts 9:2; 22:5; 26:12). After the death of Herod the Great, however, during the reign of Archelaus and the Roman procurators, the civil authority of the Sanhedrin was probably restricted to Judaea proper, which is very likely the reason why it had no judicial authority over our Lord so long as He remained in Galilee. The Sanhedrin was abolished after the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70). A new court was indeed established bearing the name "Sanhedrin," but it differed in essential features from the older body. It had no political authority, and was composed exclusively of rabbis, whose decisions had only a theoretical importance.

The Sanhedrin was composed of 70 members, plus the president, who was the high priest. Nothing is known as to the way in which vacancies were filled. The members probably held office for life, and successors were very likely appointed either by the existing members themselves or by the supreme political authorities (Herod and the Romans). Since only pure-blooded Jews were eligible for the office of judge in a criminal court, the same principle was probably followed in the case of the Sanhedrin. New members were formally admitted by the ceremony of the laying on of hands.

The members of the Sanhedrin were drawn from the three classes named in Matthew 16:21; 27:41; Mark 8:31; 11:27; 14:43,53; 15:1; Luke 9:22; 22:26: "the chief priests, with the scribes and the elders." By the chief priests is meant the acting high priest, those who had been high priests, and members of the privileged families from which the high priests were taken. The sacerdotal aristocracy were the leading persons in the community, and they were the chief members of the Sanhedrin. The scribes formed the Pharisaic element in the Sanhedrin, although not all Pharisees were professional scribes. The elders were the tribal and family heads of the people and priesthood. They were, for the most part, the secular nobility of Jerusalem. The president bore the honorable title of "prince." Besides the president, there were also a vice-president, called the "head or father of the house of judgment"; and another important official, whose business it was, in all probability, to assist in the declaration of the law. There were also two or three secretaries, and other subordinate officials, of which "constables" (Matt. 5:25) and "servants of the high priest" (Matt. 26:51; Mark 14:47; John 18:10) are mentioned in the NT. According to Josephus, in the time of Christ the Sanhedrin was formally led by the Sadducean high priests, but practically ruled by the Pharisees, who were immensely popular with the people (Ant. XVIII,1.4). The Pharisees were more and more represented in the Sanhedrin as they grew in importance.

In the time of Christ the Sanhedrin exercised not only civil jurisdiction, according to Jewish law, but also, in some degree, criminal. It could deal with all those judicial matters and measures of an administrative character which could not be competently handled by lower courts, or which the Roman procurator had not specially reserved for himself. It was the final court of appeal for all questions connected with the Mosaic law. It could order arrests by its own officers of justice (Matt. 26:47; Mark 14:43; Acts 4:3; 5:17f; 9:2). It was also the final court of appeal from all inferior courts. It alone had the right of judging in matters affecting a whole tribe, of determining questions of peace or war, of trying the high priest or one of its own body. It pronounced upon the claims of prophets and upon charges of blasphemy. The king himself could be summoned to its bar; and Josephus relates that even Herod did not dare to disobey its summons (Ant. xiv.9.4). It had the right of capital punishment until about 40 years before the destruction of Jerusalem. After that it could still pass, but it could not execute, a sentence of death without the confirmation of the Roman procurator. That is why our Lord had to be tried not only before the Sanhedrin but also before Pilate (John 18:31,32). But for this, He would have been put to death in some other way than by crucifixion, for crucifixion was not a Jewish mode of punishment. The stoning of Stephen (Acts 7:57f) without the approval of the procurator was an illegal act — a lynching. In the case of one offense the Sanhedrin could put to death, on its own authority, even a Roman citizen, namely, when a Gentile passed the gate which divided the court of the Jews from that of the Gentiles (cf. Acts 21:28), but even this was subject to the procurator's revision of the capital sentence. The Roman authority was, however, always absolute, and the procurator or the tribune of the garrison could direct the Sanhedrin to investigate some matter, and could remove a prisoner from its jurisdiction, as was done in the case of Paul (Acts 22:30; 23:23f).

The Sanhedrin at first met in "the hall of hewn stones," one of the buildings connected with the temple. Later, the place of meeting was somewhere in the court of the Gentiles, although they were not confined to it. They could meet on any day except the Sabbath and holy days, and they met from the time of the offering of the daily morning sacrifice till that of the evening sacrifice. The meetings were conducted according to strict rules and were enlivened by stirring debates. Twenty-three members formed a quorum. While a bare majority might acquit, a majority of two was necessary to secure condemnation, although if all 71 members were present, a majority of one was decisive on either side. To avoid any hasty condemnation, where life was involved judgment was passed the same day only when it was a judgment of acquittal. If it was a judgment of condemnation, it might not be passed till the day after. For this reason, cases involving capital punishment were not tried on a Friday or on any day before a feast. A herald went before the condemned one as he was led to execution, and cried out: "So-and-so has been found guilty of death. If anyone knows anything to clear him, let him come forward and declare it."

SANSANNAH (săn-săn'à, Heb. sansannâh, a palm branch), a town in the S of Judah (Josh. 15:31), identical with Hazar-susah, a town of Simeon (Josh. 19:5), and almost certainly the same as Hazar-susim (I Chron. 4:31). The site is not exactly identified.

SAPH (săf, Heb. saph, a basin, threshold), a Philistine giant, one of the four champions of the race of Rapha who was slain by one of David's heroes (II Sam. 21:18; I Chron. 20:4).

SAPHIR (sā'fēr, Heb. shāphîr, glittering), one of a group of towns mentioned in Micah 1:10-15, which, because of its association with Gath, Achzib (of Judah), and Mareshah, was most likely in SW Palestine.

SAPPHIRA (să-fī'rà, shappîrā', an Aramaic word meaning beautiful), the wife of Ananias who with her husband was struck dead because they both lied to God (Acts 5:1-10).

SARA, SARAH, SARAI (sâr'à, Heb. sāray, sārâh, Gr. Sára. Sárah means princess; the meaning of Sarai is doubtful). 1. The wife of Abraham, first mentioned in Genesis 11:29. She was ten years younger than Abraham, and was married to him in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. 11:29-31). According to Genesis 20:12, she was Abraham's half-sister, the daughter of his father, but not of his mother. Marriage with half-sisters was not uncommon in ancient times. Her name was originally Sarai. She was about 65 years old when Abraham left Ur for Haran. Later, she accompanied Abraham into Egypt, and was there passed off by him as his sister because he feared the Egyptians might kill him if they knew she was his wife. Years later, Abraham did the same thing at the court of Abimelech, king of Gerar (Gen. 20:1-18). In each instance grievous wrong was averted only by God's intervention, and Abraham was rebuked by the pagan rulers for his lack of candor. Still childless at the age of 75, she induced Abraham to take her handmaid Hagar as a concubine. According to the laws of the time, a son born of this woman would be regarded as the son and heir of Abraham and Sarah. When Hagar conceived, she treated her mistress with such insolence that Sarah drove her from the house. Hagar, however, returned at God's behest, submitted herself to her mistress, and gave birth to Ishmael. Afterward, when Sarai was about 90, God promised her a son; her name was changed to Sarah; and a year later, Isaac, the child of promise, was born (Gen. 17:15-27). It was during this period that Abraham almost brought upon himself dishonor and ruin by lying about Sarah to Abimelech, king of Gerar. A few years later, at a great feast celebrating the weaning of Isaac, Sarah observed Ishmael mocking her son, and peremptorily demanded the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael (Gen. 21). Abraham reluctantly acceded, after God had instructed him to do so. Sarah died at Kiriath-arba (Hebron) at the age of 127, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham purchased as a family sepulchre (Gen. 23:1,2). Sarah is mentioned again in the OT only in Isaiah 51:2, where she is referred to as the mother of the chosen race. In the NT she is mentioned in Romans 4:19; 9:9; Galatians 4:21-5:1; Hebrews 11:11; and I Peter 3:6.

2. The daughter of Raguel, the wife of Tobias (Tobit 3:7,17).

SARDIS (sär'dĭs, Gr. Sárdeis), the chief city of Lydia, under a fortified spur of Mount Tmolus in the Hermus valley, near the junction of the roads from central Asia Minor, Ephesus, Smyrna, and Pergamum, capital of Lydia under Croesus, and seat of the governor after the Persian conquest. Sardis was famous for arts and crafts, and was the first center to mint gold and silver coinage. So wealthy were the Lydian kings, that Croesus became a legend for riches, and it was said that the sands of the Pactolus were golden. Croesus also became a legend for pride and presumptuous arrogance, when his attack on Persia led to the fall of Sardis and the eclipse of his kingdom. The capture of the great citadel by surprise attack by Cyrus and his Persians in 549 B.C., and three centuries later by the Romans, may have provided the imagery for John's warning in Revelation 3:3. The great earthquake of A.D. 17 ruined Sardis physically and financially. The Romans contributed 10,000,000 sesterces in relief, an indication of the damage done, but the city never recovered.

SAREPTA (sa-rĕp'ta, Gr. Sárepta), the name in Luke 4:26 (KJV) for the town of Zarephath, where Elijah lived with a widow and her son (I Kings 17:9,10). The RSV renders it Zarephath.

SARGON (sär'gŏn, Heb. sargôn, the constituted king). 1. Sargon I was a famous king of early Babylon who founded an empire which extended to the Mediterranean (2400 B.C.). He is not referred to in the Bible. The story is told that he (like Moses) had been put by his mother into an ark of bulrushes in the river, there to be rescued, in the case of Sargon, by Akki the irrigator.

2. Sargon II (722-705 B.C.) was an Assyrian king who is mentioned by name in the Bible only in Isaiah 20:1. He was a usurper, perhaps of royal blood. Shalmaneser V, his predecessor, besieged Samaria in 724 B.C. During the siege Shalmaneser died (722), and in 721 the city fell to Sargon. It is strange that the Bible does not mention him in the story of Samaria's fall (II Kings 17:1-6). Some authorities believe that Sargon did not become king until after the city fell. However, Sargon claims to have captured Samaria, and a certain ambiguity in II Kings 17:6 allows for a new, although unnamed, Assyrian monarch there.

Soon after Sargon came to the throne, the Babylonians, assisted by the Elamites, revolted against him and were with difficulty subdued. According to Sargon's inscriptions the remnant of the Israelites at Samaria, who had been put under an Assyrian governor, revolted, along with other Syrian and Palestinian provinces (720 B.C.). This revolt Sargon quickly suppressed. At this time he also defeated the Egyptian ruler So, who had come to the aid of rebelling Gaza (II Kings 17:4).

Later Sargon captured Carchemish, the great Hittite city (717 B.C.), thus precipitating the fall of the Hittite empire. He also mentions placing Arab tribes as colonists in Samaria. Sargon claims on his inscriptions to have subdued Judah. Evidently Judah became more or less involved in a rebellion against Assyria, led by Ashdod. This Philistine city was captured by the Assyrians and reorganized as an Assyrian province (711 B.C.; cf. Isa. 20:1), and Judah was subdued but not harmed. Hezekiah was later to revolt against Sargon's son Sennacherib.

Sargon built a new palace and royal city ten miles NE of Nineveh, which he called Dur-sharrukin (Sargonsburg), the ruins of which are called Khorsabad. He was murdered in 705 B.C. and succeeded by his son Sennacherib. J.B.G.

SARID (sā'rĭd, Heb. sārîdh, survivor), a village on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. 19:10,12), probably modern Tell Shadud, N of Megiddo.

SARSECHIM (sär'sē-kĭm, Heb. sarsekhîm), one of Nebuchadnezzar's princes who entered Jerusalem when it fell (Jer. 39:3). The name is difficult to identify. Many scholars believe that it (together with the Nebo of the previous word) represents Nebushazban (cf. Jer. 39:13), a good Babylonian name. This person's title was Rabmag (i.e., a court official).

SARUCH (See Serug)

SATAN (sā'tăn, Heb. sātān, Gr. Satán or Satanás, an adversary), the chief of the fallen spirits, the grand adversary of God and man. Without the article the Heb. word is used in a general sense to denote some one who is an opponent, an adversary; thus, the angel who stood in Balaam's way (Num. 22:22); David as a possible opponent in battle (I Sam. 29:4); a political adversary (I Kings 11:14). With the definite article prefixed it is a proper noun in Job 1-2, Zechariah 3:1-2, designating Satan as a personality. In Psalm 109:6 the article is lacking, and reference may be to a human adversary (cf. ASV "an adversary"), but it is generally conceded that in I Chronicles 21:1 the word is a proper name without the article. The teaching concerning evil and a personal devil finds its full presentation only in the NT. In the NT the term Satan, transliterated from the Heb., always designates the personal Satan (but cf. Matt. 16:23; Mark 8:33). This malignant foe is known in the NT by a number of other names and descriptive designations. He is frequently called "the devil" (Gr. diábolos), meaning the slanderer (Matt. 4:1; Luke 4:2; John 8:44; Eph. 6:11; Rev. 12:12; etc.). ("Devils" in KJV and ERV is properly "demons"). Other titles or descriptive designations applied to him are "Abaddon" or "Apollyon" (Rev. 9:11); "Accuser of the brethren" (Rev. 12:10); "Adversary," Gr. antídikos (I Pet. 5:8); "Beelzebub" (Matt. 12:24); "Belial" (II Cor. 6:15); "the deceiver of the whole world" (Rev. 12:9); "the great dragon" (Rev. 12:9); "the evil one" (Matt. 13:19,38; I John 2:13; 5:19); "the father of lies" (John 8:44); "the god of this world" (II Cor. 4:4); "a murderer" (John 8:44); "the old serpent" (Rev. 12:9); "the prince of this world" (John 12:31; 14:30); "the prince of the powers of the air" (Eph. 2:2); "the tempter" (Matt. 4:5; I Thess. 3:5).

These varied designations indicate the dignity and character of Satan. In the book of Job he is pictured as mixing with the sons of God (angels) in their appearing before God, although by his moral nature not one of them. Jude 9 pictures him as a formidable foe to Michael the archangel. While clearly very powerful and clever, he is not an independent rival of God but is definitely subordinate, able to go only as far as God permits (Job 1:12; 2:6; Luke 22:31). Christ gives a fundamental description of his moral nature in calling him "the evil one" (Matt. 13:19,38). Moral evil is his basic attribute; he is the very embodiment of evil. Christ's words in John 8:44 give the fullest statement of Satan's moral character: "He was a murderer from the beginning, and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own: for he is a liar, and the father of it." I John 3:8 asserts that "the devil sinneth from the beginning." As a murderer, liar, sinner, evil is the very environment and inherent nature of the devil.

The origin of Satan is not explicitly asserted in Scripture, but the statement that he "abode not in the truth" (John 8:44) implies that he is a fallen being, while I Timothy 3:6 indicates that he fell under God's condemnation due to ambitious pride. While many theologians refuse to apply the far-reaching prophecies in Isaiah 14:12-14 and Ezekiel 28:12-15 to Satan, contending that these passages are strictly addressed to the kings of Babylon and Tyre respectively, conservative scholars generally hold that they contain a clear revelation of Satan's origin. These profound prophecies seem clearly to go much beyond any earthly ruler and harmonize with the scriptural picture of Satan's close relations with world governments (Dan. 10:13; Eph. 6:12; John 12:31). These passages picture Satan's pre-fall splendor as well as his apostasy through pride and self-exaltation against God. A consuming passion of Satan is to be worshiped (Matt. 4:9; Isa. 14:14; Rev. 13:4,15; I Cor. 10:20). In his fall Satan drew a vast number of lesser celestial creatures with him (Rev. 12:4).

Satan is the ruler of a powerful kingdom standing in opposition to the kingdom of God (Matt. 12:26; Luke 11:18). He exercises authority in two different realms. He is the head of a vast, compact organization of spirit-beings, "his angels" (Matt. 25:41). As "the prince of the power of the air" (Eph. 2:2), he skillfully directs an organized host of wicked spirits in the heavenlies who do his bidding (Eph. 6:12). Acts 10:38 makes it clear that the outburst of demonic activities during the ministry of Jesus was Satan-inspired. Satan is not omnipresent, but through his subordinates he makes his influence practically world-wide. He also exercises domination over the world of lost humanity. He is "the prince of this world" (John 12:31; 14:30; 16:11), the evil world-system which he has organized upon his own principles (II Cor. 4:3-4; Col. 1:13; I John 2:15-17). That "the whole world lieth in the evil one" (I John 5:19 ASV) indicates that the world is in the grip of and passively yielded to the power of the devil. This power over men he holds by virtue of usurpation.

Animated by an unrelenting hatred against God and all goodness, Satan is engaged in a world-wide and age-long struggle against God, ever seeking to defeat the divine plans of grace toward mankind and to seduce men to evil and their ruin. As "the deceiver of the whole world" (Rev. 12:9), his primary method is that of deception — about himself, his purpose, his activities, his coming defeat. Satan was the seducer of Adam and Eve (Gen. 3:1-7; II Cor. 11:3); he insinuated to God that Job served Him only for what he got out of it (Job 1:9); he stood up against Israel (I Chron. 21:1) and God's high priest (Zech. 3:1-2). Under divinely imposed limitations he may be instrumental in causing physical affliction or financial loss (Job 1:11-22; 2:4-7; Luke 13:16; II Cor. 12:7). He snatches away the Word of God sown in the hearts of the unsaved (Matt. 13:19), sows his counterfeit Christians among the sons of the kingdom (Matt. 13:25, 38-39), blinds the minds of men to the Gospel (II Cor. 4:3-4), and induces them to accept his lie (II Thess. 2:9-10). Often he transforms himself into "an angel of light" by presenting his apostles of falsehood as messengers of truth (II Cor. 11:13-15). He clashes in fierce conflict with the saints Eph. 6:11-18), is ever alert to attempt to destroy them (I Pet. 5:8), and hinders the work of God's servants (I Thess. 2:18). Certain members of the church who were expelled are said to have been delivered to Satan, but with the design to produce their reformation, not their destruction (I Cor. 5:5; I Tim. 1:20).

Although Satan was judged in the cross (John 13:31-33), he is still permitted to carry on the conflict, often with startling success. But his revealed doom is sure. He now has a sphere of activities in the heavenlies (Eph. 6:12); he will be cast down to the earth and will cause great woe because of his wrath, which he will exercise through "the beast" (Rev. 12:7-12; 13:2-8; II Thess. 2:9). With Christ's return to earth he will be incarcerated in the bottomless pit for 1000 years; when again released for a season he will again attempt to deceive the nations but will be cast into the "lake of fire," prepared for him and his angels (Matt 25:41), to suffer eternal doom with those he deceived (Rev. 20:1-3, 7-10). D.E.H.

SATRAP (sā'trăp), the official title of the viceroy who in the Persian empire ruled several small provinces combined as one government. Each of these provinces had its own governor. In Ezra 8:36 and Esther 3:12 the term is translated lieutenants in KJV, but satraps in RSV. In Daniel 3:2; 6:1, the KJV renders it princes; the RSV, satraps.

SATYR (sāt'ĕr), a word that represents the Hebrew word sā'ir which is used to describe the wild animals or demons which should dance among the ruins of Babylon (Isa. 13:21, quoted in Rev. 18:2) and of the Edomite cities (Isa. 34:14). In Leviticus 17:7 and II Chronicles 11:15 (RSV) it denotes an object of idolatrous worship.

SAUL (sôl, Heb. shā'ûl, asked of God), the first king of Israel, a son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin, a handsome man a head taller than his fellow Israelites. He is introduced in I Samuel 9, after the people had requested Samuel for a king (chap. 8). Saul and Samuel met for the first time when Saul was searching for some lost asses of his father. Greeted by Samuel with compliments, Saul replied with becoming humility (9:21; cf. Judges 6:15). Before Saul left, Samuel secretly anointed him as king of Israel, as the Lord had directed. God gave Saul a changed heart (10:9) and Saul prophesied among a group of prophets who met him on his way home.

The choice of Saul as king was confirmed by lot at an assembly of Israel convened by Samuel at Mizpah, but the bashful young man was in hiding and had to be brought before the people. In spite of his manly appearance he was ridiculed by some riffraff, "but he held his peace" (10:27). His forbearance was supplemented by compassion and decision in his rescue of Jabesh-Gilead from the threat of the Ammonites (chap. 11). The lowly nature of the young kingdom is demonstrated by the fact that the king earned his livelihood as a dirt-farmer. When the message arrived from the besieged city, Saul was returning from the field behind the oxen (11:5). The king's summons to the people, in the form of pieces of a dismembered yoke of oxen, galvanized Israel into a unified response (11:7; cf. Judges 19:29).

After the deliverance of the city, Saul showed his generosity by insisting that his earlier detractors should not be punished. A military crisis with the Philistines revealed flaws in the character of Saul. When Samuel delayed in coming to make offering before battle, Saul presumed to present the offering himself. He thus showed himself to be only a superficially spiritual individual and attempted to justify his behavior with hollow excuses. For this action the kingdom was to be taken from him (13:13-14). On the human side, we are reminded of the pressure of the situation: the great superiority of the Philistines in number (13:5), attitude (13:6-7), and equipment (13:19-23). The Philistines had a monopoly of the metal industry; they limited smiths to Philistine territory and charged the Israelites high rates for the sharpening of tools. At the time of battle only Saul and Jonathan among the Israelites had sword or spear. The Philistines were routed in spite of Saul's bad judgment in denying food to the Israelites at a time when they most needed strength. Saul fought valiantly and successfully against all the enemies of Israel (14:47-48); though he was a brave leader he was not a good soldier, for he was not aware of the necessity of absolute obedience. The affair of the Amalekites, though a military success, was a spiritual failure; covetousness led to incomplete obedience and again Saul tried to vindicate himself by lies and religious excuses which Samuel set aside with the significant statement on the importance of obedience (15:22). Saul then returned to his house in "Gibeah of Saul," marked by the modern Tell el Ful, "the mound of the beans." Excavation has revealed the fortress-palace of Saul; of modest size, it was built with the practical strength and utility of casemate walls.

David enters the narrative in I Samuel 16; he was anointed by Samuel as future king and was introduced to court life by appointment as court musician to play the lyre for Saul when the king was tormented by an evil spirit. After David defeated Goliath, David was again presented before Saul and was heralded by the women of Israel as a greater hero than Saul. Jealousy, hatred, and fear led Saul to direct and indirect attempts against David's life (18:10-11; 18:21; 19:1,11) and resulted in the hide-and-seek chase which twice drove David into Philistine territory (21:10; 27:1 ff.). The unsuspecting aid given to David by the priests of Nob moved Saul to slaughter the priests and to annihilate the city (22:17-19). Saul's life was spared by David on two occasions, at Engedi (24:1-7) and in the wilderness of Ziph (26:6-12). The eve of Saul's final battle found the king consulting the witch of Endor and receiving from the deceased prophet Samuel the message of his fate. The next day Saul and his sons died in the battle on Mt. Gilboa. The Philistines decapitated Saul and took his remains to Bethshan, where they placed his armor in the temple of Ashtaroth (I Sam. 31:10), his head in the temple of Dagon (I Chron. 10:10), and his body on the city-wall. Excavation at this site (Tell el Husn) showed two temples of this period. The N. temple was identified by a hieroglyphic inscription as the temple of 'Antit ('Anat), which is a form of Astarte or Ashtaroth. The S. temple had no identification but probably is the "house of Dagon." The men of Jabesh-Gilead remembered Saul's concern for them; in gratitude they recovered his body and the bodies of his sons from the walls of Bethshan, gave them honorable burial at Jabesh, and fasted in mourning. David also, when he heard the report, went into mourning and expressed his grief in the elegy of II Samuel 1:19-27. C.E.D.

SAVIOUR (sāv'yôr, Gr. sotér, saviour, deliverer, preserver), one who saves, delivers, or preserves from any evil or danger, whether physical or spiritual, temporal or eternal. A basic OT concept is that "God is the deliverer of His people"; it is emphatically declared that man cannot save himself and that Jehovah alone is the Saviour (Ps. 44.3,7; Isa. 43:11; 45:21; 60:16; Jer. 14:8; Hos. 13:4). The Heb. term rendered "saviour" is a participle, rather than a noun, indicating that the Hebrews did not think of this as an official title of God but rather as a descriptive term of His activity. In the OT the term is not applied to the Messiah; He receives salvation from God (Ps. 28:8; 144:10; II Sam. 22:51), but He comes to offer salvation to all (Zech. 9:9; Isa. 49:6,8; etc.). The term is also applied to men who are used as the instruments of God's deliverance (Judg. 3:9, 15 ASV; II Kings 13:5; Neh. 9:27; Obad. 21).

The Greeks applied the title sotér (Saviour) to their gods; it was also used of philosophers (e.g., Epicurus), or rulers (e.g. Ptolemy I; Nero), or men who had conferred signal benefits upon their country. But in the NT it is a strictly religious term and is never applied to a mere man. It is used of both God the Father and Christ the Son. God the Father is Saviour, for He is the author of our salvation which He provided through Christ (Luke 1:47; I Tim. 1:1; 2:3; 4:10; Titus 1:3; 2:10; 3:4; Jude 25). Saviour is pre-eminently the title of the Son (Titus 1:4; 2:13; 3:6; II Tim. 1:10; II Pet. 1:1,11; 2:20; 3:2,18; I John 4:10). At His birth the angel announced Him as "a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord" (Luke 2:11). His mission to save His people from their sins was announced before His birth (Matt. 1:21) and was stated by Jesus as the aim of His coming (Luke 19:10). The salvation which He wrought is for all mankind and He is "the Saviour of the world" (I John 4:14; John 4:42). Those who are saved are brought into a spiritual union with Christ as members of His body, hence He is called "the Saviour of the body" (i.e., the Church) (Eph. 5:23). In Titus 2:10 it is implied that Christian salvation extends also to the ethical ephere, since "the doctrine of God our Saviour" is urged as an incentive to holy living. Believers await a future work of Christ as Saviour when He shall come again to consummate our salvation in the transformation of our bodies (Phil. 3:20). D.E.H.

SAVOR, SAVOUR (sā'vôr, Heb. rēah, Gr. osmé), the translation of Hebrew and Greek words meaning taste (Matt. 5:13, Luke 14:34) or, more often, smell, whether stench (Joel 2:20) or a pleasant smell. In the latter case it is in the OT usually qualified by the word sweet, and is used to refer to a sacrifice which God was pleased to accept. Thus, "The Lord smelled the sweet savor" (Gen. 8:21, cf. Num. 15:3). In the NT the word is used metaphorically to refer to the incense burnt in a victor's triumphal procession (II Cor. 2:14), to Christ's obedience to God (Eph. 5:2), or to the Christian's sacrifice of obedience to God (II Cor. 2:15, Phil. 4:18).

SAVORY MEAT, the meals made by Jacob and Esau for their father Isaac prior to receiving his blessing. They are called savory food in the RSV (Gen. 27:4,9,14,17,31). Meat in the KJV frequently means the more general term food. Said to have been made of venison (game, RSV, Gen. 27:3), this meal was a favorite of Isaac's (27:4), and thus a fitting preparation for his giving the blessing.

SAW. Probably the earliest saws were made of flint, with serrated edges, mounted in a frame. Other saws were like knives, of bronze or iron. Small handsaws were like ours today, but the teeth were shaped in the other direction, so that the worker did not shove, but pulled against the wood. Large western handsaws were unknown in Bible times. Palestinian carpenters probably sat on the floor and held the wood between their toes, which became as skillful as extra hands.

Stone was sawed as well as wood (I Kings 7:9). Saws used in the construction of the pyramids and other great buildings of Egypt were made of bronze and had one handle. The Assyrians used a double-handled saw. When Scripture says that David put his war captives "under saws" (II Sam. 12:31, cf. I Chron. 20:3), it probably means that "he set them to labor with saws" (RSV).

Hebrews 11:37 speaks of martyrs who were "sawn asunder." Jewish tradition (in the Martyrdom of Isaiah, a pseudepigraphical book) states that the prophet Isaiah was sawn asunder by a wooden saw by Manasseh. Perhaps the reference in Hebrews is to this event. J.B.G.

SCAB (See Diseases, Skin)

SCAFFOLD (Heb. kiyyôr). Solomon knelt on a "brazen scaffold" when he dedicated the temple (II Chron. 6:13). The RSV translates the expression "a bronze platform."

SCALE. 1. Only fish having fins and scales were permitted as food for the Hebrews (Lev. 11:9-12). The Greek word lepís means rind, husk, flake and is used to describe St. Paul's recovery from temporary blindness: "There fell from his eyes as it were scales, and he received his sight" (Acts 9:18). Probably literal scales are not meant.

2. Scales as an instrument for weighing are referred to in Isaiah 40:12 and Proverbs 16:11 (balance, KJV). A simple balance is here meant. The weights used in these scales were, obviously, handmade and never uniform, hence the constant temptation to use "divers weights . . . and a false balance" (Prov. 20:23).

SCALL (See Diseases, Skin)

SCAPEGOAT (Heb. 'ăzā'zēl), a term that occurs only in Leviticus 16:8,10,26 and has been interpreted quite variously. It is used to refer to the second of two goats for which lots were cast on the Day of Atonement. The first was sacrificed as a sin offering (16:9), but the second "for the scapegoat" (16:26) had the people's sins transferred to it by prayer and imposition of hands, and was then taken into the wilderness.

The Hebrew term translated scapegoat is thought to be related to an Arabic word meaning remove; thus it is often translated removal (i.e., scapegoat). The actual meaning of the term and its use in the context of Leviticus 16 are very uncertain.

Some authorities regard the term to be the name of the solitary place to which the goat was taken. This does not seem very likely. Others (as KJV) regard it as a qualifying word for goat — i.e., the goat which removes the guilt of the people, the scapegoat. Some scholars see in the word the name of a personal being — a demon of the wilderness or a fallen angel who seduces men to evil (as in the Book of Enoch), or an epithet applied to the devil.

A parallel to the scapegoat may be seen in the Scriptures. In the ritual for a recovered leper, the living bird was released in the country to carry the evil away and the leper declared clean (Lev. 14:6). In the Babylonian New Year's day festival a similar rite was practiced, when a slain sheep was taken away and thrown into the river, its bearers being regarded as unclean (cf. Lev. 16:26). Certainly the general idea of the scapegoat is clear: guilty Israel's sin had been removed and forgotten by God. J.B.G.

SCARLET. The Hebrew and Greek words usually translated scarlet in the Bible are shānî and kókkinos, from the latter of which is derived the English cochineal. In Daniel 5:7,16,29 the Aramaic word for purple has been rendered scarlet. The color was probably a bright rich crimson. It was obtained from the eggs of the insect (coccus ilicis) called kirmiz by the Arabs, from which is derived the English word crimson. This insect abounds on the holm oak trees in Palestine.

Scarlet cloth was used for the hangings of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:4; Num. 4:8) and for the high priest's vestments (Exod. 39:1). Scarlet stuff was used for the cleansing of the recovered leper (Lev. 14:4) and in other ceremonies of purification (Num. 19:6). Its significance in this connection is unknown. Royal or expensive apparel was of scarlet (II Sam. 1:24; Prov. 31:21; Lam. 4:5; Matt. 27:28; Rev. 17:4; 18:12,16). It appears to have been used to mark thread or rope (Gen. 38:28,30; Josh. 2:18,21), and the lips of the bride in Song of Solomon are likened to scarlet thread (4:3). Sins are "as scarlet" (Isa. 1:18); this may be the origin of the custom of using the term red or scarlet to denote things sinful, still in vogue today. J.B.G.

Baton, scepter and flail — all symbols of royal authority — from the tomb of Tutankhamen, in the Cairo Museum. The baton is gold-covered and jewelled; the scepter is of gold and blue glass; the flail of gilted wood, green glass and carnelian. SHH

SCEPTER (sĕp'tĕr, Heb. shēvet; Gr. rhábdos), a rod held in the hands of kings as a token of authority. The Hebrew shēvet is the word for rod or club, and is used of an ordinary rod (II Sam. 7:14), a shepherd's crook (Ps. 23:4), or the staff of a marshal (as RSV translates Judg. 5:14 — evidently the "writer" there mustered the troops), as well as of the symbol of authority.

This staff-scepter might be used for protection (II Sam. 23:21; Ps. 23:4) or for punishment (Isa. 10:24; 30:31). When dying Jacob blessed his son Judah and promised him the royal leadership in words which Christians understand as a Messianic prediction, it was the scepter which denoted the royal prerogative (Gen. 49:10). So, frequently the scepter indicates sovereignty in general, perhaps even conquest (Num. 24:17; Isa. 14:5; Amos 1:5,8; Zech. 10:11). God's kingship is also represented thus (Ps. 45:6).

The use of the scepter by an oriental monarch is illustrated by the story of king Ahasuerus, who held it out to Esther as a mark of favor. She touched the top of it, perhaps as an act of homage, or possibly to indicate a desire to be heard (Esth. 5:1,2). The scepter of Ahasuerus was of gold; Ezekiel refers to scepters made from vine branches (19:11,14). When Christ was mocked as a king, a reed was placed in His hand for a scepter (Matt. 27:29). J.B.G.

SCEVA (sē'vȧ, Gr. Skeuá), a Jew, who was a chief priest living in Ephesus, whose seven sons were exorcists (Acts 19:14-17). There were only synagogues in Asia Minor, so he could not have been an officiating high priest. The Jews, although scattered throughout the Roman world, remembered their ancestry, and priests were probably then as now singled out for honor in the synagogue. A demon-possessed man overpowered the sons of this Sceva, and they fled the house naked and wounded.

SCHISM (sĭz'm, Gr. schísma, a rent or division), so rendered in NT only in I Corinthians 12:25; of a garment rendered "rent" (Matt. 9:16; Mark 2:21); of a crowd "division" (John 7:43; 9:16; 10:19), and "divisions" in I Corinthians 1:10; 11:18. The reference here is not to doctrinal heresy but to dissensions which threaten disruption.

SCHOOL, a place or institution devoted to teaching and learning. The word "school" occurs in our Bible only in Acts 19:9 where the reference is to the lecture-hall of Tyrannus, apparently a Greek teacher of rhetoric or philosophy, but the references to teachers and teaching are numerous in both Testaments. The OT stresses the duty and importance of religious teaching and training. Hebrew appreciation of the nature and value of the teaching function is evident from the fact that ten different Heb. verbs are rendered "teach" in our KJV. Yet significantly the Mosaic legislation contains no commands requiring the establishment of schools for formal religious instruction. Hebrew education was mainly domestic and continued to be so until after the return from the Babylonian captivity.

The home was the first and most effective agency for religious training. During the nomadic life of the patriarchs, education was purely a domestic activity, and the parents were the teachers. God called Abraham as the father of the chosen people and put upon him the responsibility to train his children and his household to walk in the ways of the Lord (Gen. 18:19; cf. Ps. 78:5-7). The reference in Genesis 14:14 to Abram's "trained men" implies a definite training program supervised by him. The varied commands in Deuteronomy to teach the children clearly imply domestic education (4:9; 6:7-9; 11:19; 32:46). Proverbs 22:6 is an exhortation encouraging the importance of parental instruction. The training was imparted primarily through conversation, example, and imitation; it utilized effectively the interest aroused by actual life-situations, such as the Passover, the redemption of the first-born, family rites, etc. (Exod. 12:26-27; 13:14-16). The well-known talent of the East for story telling would also be used in the vital transmission of religious truth and faith to the children. While all teaching was religiously oriented, reading, writing, and elementary arithmetic were taught. The command to the Israelites to write the precepts of the law upon their doorposts and gates (Deut. 6:9; 11:20) and upon great plastered stones in the land (27:2-8) implies a general ability among the people at the time to read and write.

The older people had opportunity to receive religious instruction from the priests and Levites (Lev. 10:10-11), who could be found at the sanctuary or in Levitical cities. Every seventh year, at the feast of Tabernacles, the law was read publicly for the instruction of the assembled people (Deut. 31:10-13). The priests and Levites, supported by the offerings of the people, were to be the religious teachers of the nation, but it seems clear that this aspect of their work was not consistently maintained. Only during the revival under King Jehoshaphat does one read of the priests and Levites fulfilling their calling to teach the people all the ordinances of the Law (II Chron. 17:7-9). The ineffective teaching ministry of a corrupt priesthood was supplemented by the service of the prophets, the first of whom was Samuel. To make his reform permanent and effective Samuel instituted a school of the prophets at Ramah (I Sam. 19:19-20). Later such schools flourished at Bethel (II Kings 2:3), Jericho (2:5), Gilgal (4:38), and elsewhere (6:1). Living in colonies under a leader, these "sons of the prophets" formed a religious training center, their chief study being the law and its interpretation. They became teachers and preachers who denounced national, family, and personal sins (I Kings 20:35-42; II Kings 17:13). Not all the students in these schools possessed the predictive gift, nor were all the prophets of Israel students in such schools (Amos 7:14-15). The preaching of God's prophets, rebuking, instructing, and announcing the future purposes of God, spread religious knowledge and stimulated spiritual life. Professional teachers were employed in the homes of the wealthy (II Sam. 12:25; II Kings 10:5; Isa. 49:23). The sages, or "men of wisdom," were apparently informal, self-appointed teachers, instructors in practical philosophy, the spiritual descendants of the great Solomon (Ps. 119:99; Prov. 5:13; 13:20). But there is no positive evidence that special rooms or buildings for school purposes were yet used, although the thought is not excluded.

With the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity there came a renewed emphasis upon religious instruction. Regular teaching was carried on during the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Levites being the teachers of the people (Neh 8:7-9; Ezra 7:10). Ezra the priest, described as "a ready scribe in the law of Moses" (Ezra 7:6), made the study and teaching of the law his chief concern. With the cessation of prophecy in Israel the study of the law became a matter of scholastic learning. Gradually there arose a class of men who came to be known as the scribes or lawyers, men whose chief employment was the study and interpretations of the law and who handed down interpretations as to its application to the practical duties of life. At first the scribes restricted their educational activities to adults, and the education of the children remained in the home.

The synagogue, which has a prominent place in post-exile Jewish life, apparently had its origin during the Babylonian captivity. When the exiled people were deprived of their temple and its services, they found it helpful to gather for the reading of the Scriptures and prayer. Upon their return to the land the synagogue spread rapidly and developed into an important educational agency. The synagogue services with their lections from the law and the prophets and the sermonic "exhortation" (Luke 4:17-21; Acts 13:15-16; 15:21), made their educational contribution to the religious life of the people. Regarded chiefly as places of teaching (never of sacrifice), they became associated with the development of an elementary school system among the Jews. Even before the days of Jesus synagogues, with schools for the young, were to be found in every important Jewish community.

The synagogue "attendant" (Luke 4:20) generally served as teacher; if there were more than 25 students an assistant was provided. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were taught as a means to an end. Since the primary aim of education was religious, the OT furnished the subject matter of instruction. Memorization had a prominent place, with emphasis on catechizing, drill, and review. Discipline was strict, the cane was kept available, but undue severity was not condoned. Students seeking training beyond that given in the synagogue schools turned to eminent scribes for further instruction. This was given partly in their homes, and partly in the synagogues or the temple porticoes. The instruction was devoted to the rabbinical interpretation of the law and its applications to life. Such advanced theological training Saul of Tarsus received in Jerusalem "at the feet of Gamaliel" (Acts 22:3).

Jesus was much more than a teacher, but He was first of all a teacher and was recognized as such by His contemporaries. Although unauthorized by the Jewish authorities, as a God-sent teacher He was constantly engaged in teaching the people. He generally employed the methods of the rabbis but poured into His teaching an authority that challenged and held His audiences. In selecting and training the twelve He became a teacher of teachers. He commissioned His followers to carry out a world-wide teaching ministry (Matt. 28:19-20). Teaching was an important phase of the work of the early Church in Jerusalem (Acts 2:42; 4:1-2; 5:21,28). The work of Barnabas and Saul at Antioch was essentially a teaching ministry (Acts 11:26). Paul the Apostle, preeminent as missionary and evangelist, was a peripatetic teacher, teaching in public assemblies, by personal contact, and by his epistles. He thought of himself as "a teacher of the Gentiles" (I Tim. 2:7). The NT places emphasis upon the teaching function in the Christian Church. "Pastor-teachers" (Eph. 4:11) were recognized as Christ's gift to His Church. Teaching was regarded as an essential function of the pastor (I Tim. 3:2). Unofficial or volunteer teachers also had an important part in the work of the church (James 3:1; Rom. 12:7). The author of Hebrews insisted that all believers should mature spiritually so that they could become teachers (5:12). Much unofficial Christian teaching was carried on by members in their homes (Acts 18:26; Titus 2:3-4). In NT times the Christian churches assembled in the homes of members (Rom. 16:3-5; I Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15; Philem. 2). By the end of the first century the educational work of the Church came to be systematically developed. The Church Fathers were foremost in all educational matters and did much to develop and promote education, the chief handmaid of the Church. D.E.H.

SCIENCE, rendering of Heb. maddā' in Daniel 1:4 and Gr. gnósis in I Timothy 6:20 KJV, both meaning knowledge. Daniel 1:4 is literally "understanding knowledge or thought." In I Timothy 6:20 the reference is to that professed knowledge which sets itself up in contradiction to the truth of the Gospel. The word does not have its modern connotation.

SCOFF (Heb. qālas, to scoff at, mock, deride, rendered "mock" in II Kings 2:23, Ezekiel 22:5, Habakkuk 1:10.

SCOFFER (Gr. empaíktes, one who scoffs or mocks), one playing with trifles, hence one who derides, mocks (II Pet. 3:3, "mocker" in ASV; so rendered in Jude 18).

SCORPION (skôr'pĭ-ŏn, Heb. 'aqrab, Gr. skorpios), an insect of the arachnid (spider-like) type, with claws that give it the appearance of a miniature lobster. Its tail bears a stinger with which it poisons its victim, and it is therefore described as a creature to be feared (Deut. 8:15; Ezek. 2:6; Luke 10:19, 11:12; Rev. 9:5,10). Several kinds are common in the desert areas of Palestine, where they hide underneath stones. The punishment with scorpions which King Rehoboam threatened (I Kings 12:11; II Chron. 10:11) likely referred to whips or scourges, q.v.

SCOURGE (skûrj, Heb. generally shût, to whip, lash, scourge; shôt, a whip, scourge; Gr. mastigóo, to whip, flog, scourge; mástix, a whip, lash; phragellóo, to flog, scourge, as a public punishment of the condemned), the act or the instrument used to inflict severe pain by beating. Scourging, well known in the East, was familiar to the Hebrews from Egypt. The Mosaic law authorized the beating of a culprit, apparently with a rod, but limited to 40 the strokes given the prostrate victim (Deut. 25:3). Leviticus 19:20 does not impose true scourging (biqqoreth, rendered "punished" in ASV, expresses an investigation). I Kings 12:11, 14 apparently refers to true scourging. It was later legalized among the Jews and a three-thonged whip was used, but the legal limitation was observed (II Cor. 11:24). It was administered by local synagogue authorities (Matt. 10:17; Acts 22:19) or by the Sanhedrin (Acts 5:40).

Among the Romans either rods were used (Acts 16:22; II Cor. 11:25) or whips, the thongs of which were weighted with jagged pieces of bone or metal to make the blow more effective (Matt. 27:26; Mark 15:15; John 19:1). It was used to wrest confessions and secrets from its victims (Acts 22:24). The number of blows was left to the whim of the commanding officer. Its victims, tied to a stake with back bared to the tormentors, generally fainted from the resultant lacerations, or even died. It was forbidden to Roman citizens (Acts 22:25), being generally reserved for slaves or those condemned to death.

Scourge is used figuratively for "affliction" in Joshua 23:13; Job 5:21; 9:23; Isaiah 10:26; 28:15, 18. Note the mixed metaphors in Isaiah 28:15.

SCRIBES (See Occupations and Professions)

SCRIBES, JEWISH, a class of learned men who made the systematic study of the law and its exposition their professional occupation. In the NT they are generally called "scribes" (Gr. grammateis, experts versed in the law; scribes), corresponding to the Heb. sopherim. They are also called "lawyers" (Gr. nomikoi, legal experts, jurists; Matt. 22:35; Luke 7:30; 10:25; 11:45; 14:3) and "doctors of the law" (Gr. nomodidaskaloi, teachers of the law; Luke 5:17; Acts 5:34). They are prominent in the Gospels, often associated with the Pharisees (Matt. 5:20; 12:38; 15.1; 23:2,13, etc.; Mark 7:5; Luke 5:21,30; 6:7; 11:53; 15:2; John 8:3). But they are also mentioned alone and were not necessarily Pharisees (Matt. 9:3; Mark 2:6; 3:22; 9:14; Luke 20:39). The Pharisees were a religious party, while the scribes held an office. The double designation distinguishes them from the Pharisees, but the majority of the scribes belonged to the Pharisee party which recognized the legal interpretations of the scribes. Certain expressions imply that the Sadducees also had their scribes (Mark 2:16 ASV; Luke 5:30 ASV; Acts 23:9).

The powerful position of the scribes in the NT was the result of a long development. The scribes of pre-exilic days were public writers, governmental secretaries, and copiers of the law and other documents (II Sam. 8:17; 20:25; I Kings 4:3; II Kings 12:10; Jer. 8:8; 36:18; Prov. 25:1). The distinctive nature of the office of the scribe first comes into view with Ezra, who set himself to the task of teaching the law to the returning exiles (Ezra 7:6, 10-11, 21). At first this naturally fell to the priests (Neh. 8), but gradually there arose a separate group of professional students who devoted themselves to the preservation, transcription, and exposition of the law. When during the Hellenistic period the upper priests became largely tainted with paganism, the scribes became the zealous defenders of the law and the true teachers of the common people. By NT times they held undisputed sway as the recognized exponents of the law and the revered representatives of Judaism. They received the deep respect of the people, as indicated in the honorable term rabbi, meaning "my master, or teacher." Proudly they claimed the positions of first rank, sought the public acclaim of the masses, and dressed in long robes like the nobility (Matt. 23:5-7; Mark 12:38-39; Luke 11:43; 20:46). They demanded from their disciples utmost reverence, claiming an honor surpassing that due to parents. To facilitate discussion and the exchange of opinions, the scribes lived in communities, the main seat of their activity being Jerusalem (Matt. 15:1; Mark 3:22), but they were also found in Galilee (Luke 5:17), and even in the dispersion.

Accepting the law as the basis for the regulation of all of life, they made it their primary task to study, interpret, and expound that law as the rule for daily life. The lack of details in the law they filled up through the gradual development of an extensive and complicated system of teaching intended to safeguard the sanctity of the law. By their practice of making "a fence about the law" they added to its actual requirements, thus loading the people with "burdens grievous to be borne" (Luke 11:46; Matt. 23:4). Their diligent search of the OT for recondite meanings they felt was meritorious and entitled them to eternal life (John 5:39). This vast and complicated mass of scribal teaching, known as "the tradition of the elders" (Matt. 15:2-6; Mark 7:1-13), was orally transmitted and required prolonged study to master. In their desire to know the law the common people readily turned to the legal experts as teachers. They taught in the synagogues, and trained their pupils in their scribal lore. All higher instruction, if not all instruction of the day, was in their hands. Because of their legal knowledge the scribes were often called upon to serve as judges in Jewish courts. They constituted an important element in the membership of the Sanhedrin (Matt. 26:57; Mark 14:43; 15:1; Luke 22:66; Acts 4:5). Since the scribes functioned as judges and the law prohibited judges from receiving presents or bribes (Exod. 23:8; Deut. 16:19), they were obliged to make their living some other way. Most of them, like Paul (Acts 18:3), followed some trade even though their activity as scribe was primary. But apparently this principle was strictly observed only in connection with their judicial, not their instructional, activities. Christ's denunciation of their greed makes it obvious that while they professed to offer instruction gratuitously they had indirect ways of securing their fees (Mark 12:40; Luke 20:47).

Because Jesus refused to be bound by the scribal accretions to the law (John 5:10-18; Mark 7:1-13), the scribes soon fiercely opposed Him. Throughout His ministry they were His most watchful and determined opponents (Mark 2:16; Luke 5:30; 15:2). Their hypocrisy and unrelenting hatred drew forth Christ's devastating denunciation of them as recorded in Matthew 23. They played an important part in the death of Jesus (Matt. 26:57; 27:41; Mark 15:1,31; Luke 22:66; 23:10), also in the persecution of the early Church (Acts 4:5; 6:12). Not all the scribes were wholly bad, for Nicodemus and Gamaliel were scribes, but as a whole they were marked by spiritual corruption and were the very quintessence of Pharisaism. D.E.H.

SCROLL. The scroll or roll was the usual form of the book in the Bible world. It had been used in Egypt from very early times, made of papyrus, the paper-like tissue made from the reeds growing along the Nile. The "roll of the book" (megillath-sephēr, "scroll," RSV, Jer. 36:2) was the Hebrew name for a scroll. The one referred to in this passage in Jeremiah was made of papyrus — one of leather could hardly have been burned in an open brazier. The papyrus for making scrolls was imported from Egypt. Several sheets were glued together to make a scroll of the desired length, which was then rolled on rods so that the beginning of the scroll was on the right and the end on the left (the Hebrews wrote from right to left). The writing was in columns. In the story of the destruction of Jeremiah's scroll, as the successive columns (Jer. 36:23 RSV, not "leaves" as in KJV) were read, the king cut them off and burned them.

A library or royal archives is called a house of rolls (Ezra 6:1). Ezekiel is commanded to eat a scroll (2:9-3:3), no doubt in a vision.

As time went on, perhaps after the Exile, the Hebrews began to write important works on scrolls of smoothed skins of animals. Such rolls would last much longer than those of paper. The first scroll of Isaiah from Qumran (the Dead Sea Scrolls") was written on 17 pieces of skin of different sizes, sewn together at their edges, and in one place glued together as well. This scroll is a little more than ten inches wide and when unrolled is 24 feet long. It contains 54 columns of text. These skins are of leather, but in later times the skins were treated in a special way and called parchment, which was whiter, and in general made a more attractive appearance than did regularly tanned leather.

The Jews were extremely careful in the preparation of scrolls of the Scriptures. Only the skins of clean animals could be used. To the present day the scroll is the form of the book used in the reading of the Scriptures in the synagogue.

The book-form or codex was introduced for private MSS in the second century A.D., and soon took over as a far more convenient form of the book, except in the synagogue. The famous fourth century MSS of the Greek Bible (Sinaiticus, Vaticanus) are in the codex form.

There were different ways of dividing the books of the Bible on the scrolls; either a separate scroll was taken for each book or several books were written on one scroll. "The Twelve" is the Hebrew name for the twelve Minor Prophets, since all were written on one scroll. To write the whole OT on one scroll would be almost impossible.

Among the awful portents of the day of judgment, it is said that "the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll" (Isa. 34:4). J.B.G.

SCYTHIAN (sĭth'ĭ-ăn, Gr. hoi Skýthai), the name is used by classical writers as a general term for the barbarians of the steppes. In common parlance it was a term for the savage and uncivilized (Col. 3:11). Scythia was the name given by the Greeks to an ill-defined area between the Carpathians and the Don, the western portion of which included the black earth wheatlands of the modern Ukraine. The steppe-land was wide open to nomadic invasion, and the Indo-European tribes who occupied it in the seventh century B.C. are those to whom most properly the term Scythian is applied. There must have been a considerable "folk-wandering" about this time, because Scythians appeared in upper Mesopotamia and Syria between 650 and 620 B.C. and another force reached the middle Danube. South Russia, to speak in modern geographical terms, was firmly occupied. The nomads were formidable soldiers, swift archer-cavalry versed in the tactics of desert warfare and mobile strategy. By a "scorched-earth" policy and by their elusive defense they frustrated an attack of Darius in 512 B.C., and similarly beat off Alexander's general Zopyrion in 325 B.C. They exploited the labor of the earlier inhabitants, and were considerable exporters of wheat to the Greek Black Sea colonies. Greek pottery and metal work were taken in exchange, and the tombs of the chiefs have produced a rich profusion of such articles. The Celts and Samaritans seem to have displaced the Scythians in the last three centuries before Christ. E.M.B.

SEA (Heb. yām, Gr. thálassa). In the Bible the term is used in several ways. 1. The ocean, the gathering of the waters at the creation, is called sea (Gen. 1:10; Pss. 8:8; 24:2).

2. Almost any body of water, salt or fresh, is called sea. The Mediterranean (Acts 10:6), the sea of Galilee (Matt. 4:18; Num. 34:11), the Dead Sea (Deut. 3:17), the Red Sea (Exod. 13:18; 14:2) are referred to in Scripture. Obviously, not all of these would be called seas by us. Galilee is a lake, being only about 12½ by 7½ miles in size, but it is often called a sea.

3. Even rivers may, in poetic language, be called a sea: the Nile (Isa. 18:2; 19:5), and the Euphrates (Isa. 21:1).

4. The basin in Solomon's temple was called a sea (see SEA, BRAZEN).

The ancient Hebrews were not a sea people. The sea in the Bible becomes a symbol of restlessness, instability and sin (Isa. 57:20; Jer. 49:23; James 1:6; Jude 13; Rev. 13:1).

SEA, BRAZEN, the great basin in Solomon's temple where the priests washed their hands and feet preparatory to temple ministry (I Kings 7:23-26; II Chron. 4:2-6). It was made of brass which David had taken in war (I Chron. 18:8), and stood between the altar and the holy place. It was round, ten cubits (18 feet) in diameter and five cubits (7½ feet) in height and held 2,000 baths (possibly 12,000 gallons, I Kings 7:23,26). It stood upon 12 brass oxen, in four groups of three each, facing the four directions of the compass. When Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem he broke the basin to pieces and took them to Babylon (II Kings 25:13,16; Jer. 27:19-22).

SEA OF GLASS. In the vision of heaven in the Revelation, a glassy sea is seen before the throne of God (Rev. 4:6; 15:2). It is translucent, "like unto crystal." Nearby stand the victorious singing saints. The sea symbolizes God's purity and holiness, and also the victory of the redeemed hosts who have crossed it.

SEA OF JAZER (Heb. yām ya'zēr). No such sea is known. Jazer was a town in Gilead. The only mention of the sea of Jazer (Jer. 48:32) is probably a scribal error, and the city of Jazer is meant (cf. RSV).

SEA MEW (See Birds, Cuckoo)

SEA MONSTER (Heb. tannîn), any great fish of the sea (Gen. 1:21; Job 7:12; in KJV whale).

SEASON (See Time, Calendar)

SEAT (Heb. môshāv, sheveth, kissē', tekhûnâh, Gr. kathédra, thrónos), a place or thing upon which one sits, as a chair or stool (I Sam. 20:18; Judg. 3:20). Often (especially when it represents the Greek word thronos) it means throne (Luke 1:52; Rev. 2:13; 4:4; 11:16; 13:2; 16:10). It is used also of the exalted position occupied by men of rank or influence (Matt. 23:2; Ps. 1:1). Jesus reproached some of the men of his day for preferring the chief seats in the synagogue (Matt. 23:6; Mark 12:39; Luke 11:43; 20:46). These were special seats set in front of the reader's platform, facing the congregation, reserved for those held in honor. The great synagogue in Alexandria had 71 such seats, which were occupied by members of the great Council of that city.

SEBA (sē'bà, Heb. sevā', Gr. Sabá), a people descended from Cush (Gen. 10:7) who lived in southern Arabia. Seba is a dialectical variation of Sheba. The people of Seba were called Sabeans.

SEBAT (sē'băt, Heb. shevāt), the 11th month of the Hebrew year (Zech. 1:7), spelled Shebat in RSV. It corresponded to our February. See YEAR.

SECACAH (sē-kā'kà, Heb. sekhākhâh), a village in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. 15:61), whose location is unknown.

SECHU (sē'kū, Heb. sēkhû), a village near Samuel's town of Ramah (I Sam. 19:22), probably in the direction of Gibeah (vs. 9). The name is spelled Secu in RSV.

SEAL (Heb. hôthām, seal, signet; tabb'ath, signet-ring; hātham, to seal; Gr. sphragízo, katasphragízomai, to seal). 1. Literal sense. A device bearing a design, a name or some other words so made that it can impart an impression in relief upon a soft substance like clay or wax. When the clay or wax hardens, it permanently bears the impression of the seal. The discovery by archaeologists of thousands of seals reveals that their use goes back to the 4th millennium B.C. and that they were used throughout the ancient civilized world from Mesopotamia to Rome. They were made of a variety of hard substances like limestone, metal, and all kinds of precious stones. Originally they took the form of a cylinder with a hole from end to end for a cord to pass through, but this was gradually superseded by the scarab (beetle-shaped). Some were carried by cords hung from the neck or waist; many were cone-shaped, and were kept in boxes; but most were made into finger-rings. Every person of any standing had a seal. The best ones were engraved by skilled seal-cutters and were real works of art. A great variety of designs was represented on them — deities, people, animals, birds, fish, plants, and combinations of these. Many of them bore inscriptions giving the name of the owner or of his overlord, and his profession or office. Many seals with Biblical names have been found — among them Hananiah. Azariah, Menahem, Micaiah, Jotham, Nehemiah and Gedaliah. Excavations in Palestine have produced hundreds of jar-handles bearing seal impressions, some with the place of manufacture and personal names (perhaps of the potter).

Scarabs of the Seventeenth Century B.C., from Garstang, The Story of Jericho.

Seals were used for a number of purposes. (1) As a mark of authenticity and authority to letters, royal commands, etc. (I Kings 21:8; Esth. 3:12; 8:8,10). (2) As a mark of the formal ratification of a transaction or covenant, as when Jeremiah's friends witnessed his purchase of a piece of property (Jer. 32:11-14) and the chief men of Jerusalem set their seal to a written covenant to keep its laws (Neh. 9:38; 10:1). (3) As a means of protecting books and other documents so that they would not be tampered with (Jer. 32:14; Rev. 5:2,5,9; 6:1,3). (4) As a proof of deputed authority and power (Gen. 41:42; Esth. 3:10; 8:2). (5) As a means of sealing closed doors so as to keep out unauthorized persons (Dan. 6:17; Matt. 27:66; Rev. 20:3). Usually doors were sealed by stretching a cord across them and then sealing the cord. (6) As an official mark of ownership, like the seals on jar-handles and jar-stoppers.

2. Figurative sense. Scripture often uses the term metaphorically to betoken authentication, confirmation, ownership, evidence, or security. God does not forget sin, but stores it up against the sinner, under a seal (Deut. 32:34; Job 14:17). Prophecies that are intended to be kept secret for a time are bound with a seal (Dan. 12:4,9; Rev. 5:1ff; 10:4). Paul speaks of having sealed the offering of the Gentiles for the saints in Jerusalem (Rom. 15:28). This may have been literal, thus guaranteeing his honesty, or it may denote Paul's approval of the Gentile gift. The word has the sense of authentication in I Corinthians 9:2, where Paul describes his converts at Corinth as the "seal" placed by Christ on his work — the proof or vindication of his apostleship. The circumcision of Abraham is described as an outward ratification by God of the righteousness of faith which he had already received before he was circumcised (Rom. 4:11). Believers are said to be "sealed with the promised Holy Spirit" (Eph. 1:13), as an owner sets his seal on his property; and the same thought is conveyed in the words, "in whom you were sealed for the day of redemption" (Eph. 4:30). God marks off His own by putting His seal on their foreheads (Rev. 7:2-4). S.B.

SECOND COMING OF CHRIST, THE, one of the most prominent doctrines in Scripture. In the NT alone it is referred to over 300 times. The night before His crucifixion Jesus told the apostles that He would come again (John 14:3), and at the time of His ascension two angels appeared to the apostles, saying that He would come back in the same manner as they had seen Him go (Acts 1:11). The NT shows that thenceforward His coming was the "blessed hope" of His people (Titus 2:13). There is a great difference of opinion as to what is meant by the Lord's return. Some regard it as the coming of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, or the coming of Christ into the heart at conversion, or Christ's coming in judgment at the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, or Christ's coming for the believer at death, or Christ's coming for the conversion of the world. Careful examination of the Scriptures referring to the second coming makes it clear, however, that His coming will be personal, bodily, and visible. For example, the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost cannot be what is meant because the Acts and the Epistles show that long after the day of Pentecost the Church was still looking for the fulfillment of Christ's promise that He would come again. Christ Himself, moreover, clearly distinguished between death and His coming (John 21:23). The coming of Christ is the climax and culmination of His redemptive work, when the Church will be completed, and the Lord will usher in that Kingdom which will eventually result in God being all in all (Rom. 8:19-23; I Cor 15:23-28; Eph. 1:14). See also CHRIST. S.B.

SECT (sĕkt, Gr. haíresis, sect, party, school), of schools of philosophy; in NT of religious parties: the Sadducees (Acts 5:17), the Pharisees (15:5; 26:5), the Christians (24:5; 28:22). Also in 24:14 ASV ("heresy" in KJV).

SECUNDUS (sē-kŭn'dŭs, Gr. Sékoundos, a name of Latin origin, meaning second), a Thessalonian Christian, otherwise unknown, who with several others had preceded Paul to Troas (Acts 20:4). If one of the delegates entrusted with the collection, he probably accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (Acts 24:17; II Cor. 8:23; Rom. 15:25-26).

SECURITY, the theological teaching which maintains the certain continuation of the salvation of those who are saved; also known as the perseverance of the saints. Its advocates appeal to the promises of Scripture, such as John 10:28; Romans 8:38-39; Philippians 1:6; II Thessalonians 3:3; I Peter 1:5. They maintain that since salvation is God's work, the regenerate must be ultimately saved or God's purpose and work would come to naught, and that the very nature of eternal life forbids the thought of its not being eternal. But the opponents reply by pointing to the numerous passages of warning, such as I Corinthians 9:27; Galatians 5:2-4; Hebrews 4:4-6; 10:31-35; II Peter 2:20-22; Ezekiel 3:20; 33:13,18; etc.; that the promises appealed to by the advocates are really conditional (cf. "they" and "I" in John 10:27-29); that Scripture teaches the necessity of human striving (Luke 13:24; Col. 1:29; II Tim. 2:5); that this teaching ignores the fact of human free will and disregards the realities of human experience. Both positions are held by devout, sincere, and godly believers. Extremes on either side have produced confusion and conflict. A third approach would recognize that Scripture gives both serious warnings and clear promises to the saved, that both should be accepted at face value, and that one should humbly acknowledge that he cannot completely rationalize the relation of the human and the divine in the salvation of the believer. D.E.H.

SEDUCER (sē-dūs'ẽr, Gr. góes, wailer, howler), a cheat, a false teacher, a deceiver, perhaps through the use of magical arts (II Tim. 3:13; "impostor" in ASV).

SEED (Heb. zera', Gr. spérma, spóros). There is a threefold usage of this word in Scripture. 1. Agricultural. The farmer held his seed in his upturned garment, casting it out as he walked. Grain was sown in the early winter, after the first rains. Christ's parable of the sower is well known (Mark 4:1-20; Luke 8:5-15). Land was measured by the amount of seed which could be sown on it (Lev. 27:16). The wilderness was "land not sown" (Jer. 2:2).

2. Physiological. "Seed of copulation" (RSV, "emission of semen") is a frequent expression in the Hebrew laws of cleanness (Lev. 15:16ff). The NT speaks of Christians as having been begotten by God — "of incorruptible seed" (I Pet. 1:23; I John 3:9).

3. Figurative. Here seed means descendants (Gen. 13:16) or genealogy (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61), or a class of people ("seed of evildoers," Isa. 1:4). "The holy seed" (Isa. 6:13; Ezra 9:2) is a special designation of the people of Israel. St. Paul's use of seed (in contrast to "seeds") in Galatians 3:16 had for its purpose a proof that the promises to Abraham were realized in Christ. This is an example of rabbinical exegesis, used by the apostle against his rabbinical adversaries. J.B.G.

SEEDTIME (See Agriculture)

SEER (See Occupations)

SEGUB (sē'gŭb, Heb. seghûv). 1. The younger son of Heil. He died when his father set up the gates of Jericho, which he was then building (I Kings 16:34). Thus the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. 6:26) was fulfilled. Some regard Segub's death as an example of infant sacrifice, but this is not clear from the account.

2. Son of Hezron by a daughter of Machir (I Chron. 2:21,22).

SEIR (sē'ẽr, Heb. sē'îr). Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:20; I Chron. 1:38) was the ancestor of the inhabitants of the land of Seir.

SEIR, LAND OF and MOUNT (sē'ẽr, Heb. sē'îr). 1. The Land of Seir and Mt. Seir are alternate names for the region occupied by the descendants of Edom or Esau. Originally called the land of Seir (Gen. 32:3; 36:20,21,30; Num. 24:18), it was later called Edom. It is a mountainous and extremely rugged country, about 100 miles long, extending S from Moab on both sides of the Arabah or the great depression connecting the southern part of the Dead Sea with the Gulf of Akabah (Gen. 14:6; Deut. 2:1,12; Josh. 15:1; Judg. 11:17,18; I Kings 9:26). The summit of Mt. Seir rises about 3500 feet above the adjacent Arabah. The land is very rocky and not nearly so fertile as Palestine (cf. Mal. 1:2-4). Yet it had fields, vineyards, wells, and a N-S highway ran through it, as it does through the region today (Num. 20:17,19). Sela was the Edomite capital in the days of the Hebrew monarchy; later the place was called Petra. Bozrah and Teman were important places. In the Greek period the name of the land was modified to Idumea.

Esau made his home in Mt. Seir, and his descendants dispossessed the Horites (Deut. 2:12; Josh. 24:4), the original inhabitants (Gen. 14:6). A remnant of the Amalekites took refuge in these mountain fastnesses, but were finally destroyed by the Simeonites (I Chron. 4:42,43). The term Seir is also used collectively for the people who lived in Mt. Seir (Ezek. 25:8).

2. Another region called Seir is a ridge on the border of the territory of Judah W of Kirjath-jearim (Josh. 15:10), generally identified with the rocky point on which the village of Saris stands, southwest of Kirjath-jearim. J.B.G.

SEIRAH, SEIRATH (sē-ī'rà, sē-ī'răth), a place in Mt. Ephraim, probably in the SE part, to which Ehud escaped after murdering Eglon (Judg. 3:26).

SELA (sē'là, Heb. sela', Gr. pétra), a place in Edom taken by King Ahaziah (II Kings 14:7). It is probably also referred to in II Chronicles 25:12; Isaiah 42:11 and Obadiah 3 where in each case the KJV translates "rock." The second reference the RSV translates "Sela." It seems to be the place made famous in Greek times by the name Petra, the capital of the Nabateans.

SELAH (sē'là, Heb. sālal, to lift up), a term occurring 71 times in the Psalms, and also in Habakkuk 3:3,9,13. The meaning of selah is unknown. It is generally believed that its usage was that of a musical or liturgical sign. The LXX seems to understand it as a direction to the orchestra — "lift up," i.e., play the instruments while the singers are silent. The Jewish Targums and St. Jerome render it "for ever," but there is no support for this. Jacob of Edessa (A.D. 640-708) compared it to the Amen sung by the Christians after the Gloria. Perhaps selah was used in a similar way, as a signal for the singing of some sort of doxology or benediction after psalms or parts of psalms divided for liturgical use. It will be noted that the word usually occurs at a place where a very significant statement has been made, making that a good place for a break or pause. It is believed that selah was introduced during the late Persian period.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH (sē'là-hă-mà'lē-kŏth), a cliff in the wilderness of Maon. It was called Sela-hammahlekoth ("rock of divisions or escapes") because there David eluded Saul (I Sam. 23:28). About eight miles NE of Maon there is a great gorge called Wadi Malaki, impassable except by making a detour of many miles; this is probably the place.

SELED (sē'lĕd, Heb. seledh), a man of Judah of the family of Jarahmeel (I Chron. 2:30).

SELEUCIA (sē-lū'shĭ-à, Gr. Seleukía). The Seleucia of the NT was founded in 300 B.C. by Seleucus I Nicator, to provide a seaport for Syrian Antioch which lay some 16 miles inland. It lay near the mouth of the Orontes, and was a naval base in Roman imperial times. It was the port of departure for Paul and Barnabas on their first journey (Acts 13:4). This city is to be distinguished from the Seleucia on the Tigris founded by the same monarch 12 years earlier.

SELEUCIDS (sĕ-lū'sĭds, Gr. Séleukos). The Seleucids took their name from Seleucus, a cavalry officer of Alexander. He was one of the Diadochi, or "Successors," the name given to those remarkable military personalities who successfully partitioned Alexander's empire after his death. By 312 B.C., after some vicissitudes, Seleucus had established himself in command of Babylonia, Susiana, and Media, and from this date his dynasty and era can be conveniently reckoned. By 301 B.C. he was master of Syria, and forthwith founded Antioch and Seleucia to express the westward aspiration of his kingdom, and to balance Seleucia on the Tigris, its eastern bastion. The Seleucids, who commonly bore the name of the founder of the dynasty or of his son Antiochus, were the true heirs of Alexander. Their borders fluctuated with the give and take of strife on the eastern frontiers, and with the Ptolemies, who inherited the pharaohs' sensitivity to Palestine, but for over two centuries and more of independent rule the Seleucids held the major portion of Alexander's realms. Their empire was frequently termed Syria from the portion fronting the NE corner of the Mediterranean, which was their seat and center, and where they sought to establish an eastern Macedonia. In others ways, too, they followed Alexander's policy. The Ptolemies in Egypt took over the pharaonic system, and sought to be the pharaohs' successors in rule, government, and dignity. The Seleucids sought to Hellenize their domains, to mingle immigrant Greeks with Asiatics. In such wise was the stage set for Paul of Tarsus, heir of two cultures, and for the Greek New Testament. The clash between the Seleucids and the Jews, which precipitated the Maccabaean revolt, must be set to the debit side of this Hellenizing policy. The Greek cities, which the Seleucids founded all over their empire, were in general a civilizing force which prepared the way for the fruitful mingling of Palestine, Greece, and Rome, and hence for Europe as we know it in the West. Greek life and thought took root in the Middle East, and penetrated far into Asia. Royal authority, for all the democratic constitution of their Greek foundations, was shaped by the Seleucids on the Oriental model favored by Alexander. The Seleucid monarchy proved, in consequence, one of the political influences which prepared the eastern half of the Roman Empire for the deification of the Emperor, and the imperial cult which meant so much in the history of the early Church, and helped to precipitate the damaging contest between the Christians and the State. E.M.B.

SELVEDGE (sĕl'vĕj, Heb. qātsâh). The "self-edge" was the edge of each of the two curtains (which were themselves each composed of five parts), which together covered the boards of the sanctuary of the tabernacle. They were coupled at the selvedge by 50 loops of blue connected by clasps with 50 others on the opposite side (Exod. 26:4; 36:11).

SEM (See Shem)

SEMACHIAH (sĕm'ă-kī'ă, Jehovah has sustained), a Levite, a descendant of the doorkeeper Obed-edom (I Chron. 26:7).

SEMEI (sĕm'ē-ī, Gr. Semeí). 1. One of those who put away their "strange wives" (I Esdras 9:33), probably the same as Shimei in Ezra 10:33.

2. The KJV form of Semein (Luke 3:26).

SEMEIN (sĕm'ē-ĭn, Gr. Semeein), an ancestor of Christ, who lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke 3:26).

SEMITES (sĕm'īts). The term Semite is derived from Noah's son Shem (Gen. 9:18,19; 10:21-31), and is used to identify a diverse group of ancient peoples whose languages are related, belonging to the Semitic family of languages. It is not certain that since these Semitic peoples spoke related languages, they themselves were related in blood. But since it is impossible now to gain a more accurate knowledge of the relationship of ancient peoples, this obvious connection in language is of some use.

The world of the Semites, in ancient historical times, was the Fertile Crescent, that green land which begins in southern Babylonia in the E, and includes Mesopotamia, Syria and Palestine, ending at the border of Egypt in the W. It is hemmed in by mountains, seas, and deserts. Strangely enough, one of the latter, the great Arabian desert, appears to have been the original homeland of the Semites. From earliest times there have been irruptions from this desert into the Fertile Crescent, bringing new strength to the Semitic civilizations. We can name some of the principal irruptions: the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Arameans, the Nabateans, and the Arabs. The last of these, under Mohammed's leadership, brought a new religion and later a great empire to a considerable part of the Asia-Africa-Europe continent.

The principal Semitic peoples of ancient times were:

1. The Akkadians — the Babylonians and Assyrians who lived in Mesopotamia and spoke a common language. From c. 2350 B.C. to 538 B.C. these gifted, vigorous people dominated Mesopotamia. Several times they produced empires which ruled the ancient world. Their Akkadian language, written on clay by means of cuneiform signs, was for more than a millennium the lingua franca of the world of that time. The cities of Ur, Babylon and Nineveh, rulers such as Sargon I, Shalmaneser III and V and Sennacherib, Hammurabi the law codifier (who though an Amorite ruled a Babylonian empire) and Assurbanipal the library builder testify to the greatness of the Akkadian civilization.

2. The Arameans. Principally traders and catalysts of culture rather than its creators, the Aramean speaking people lived in Syria from c. 1700 B.C. to the time of Christ, although their political power ceased some centuries earlier. Damascus, Aleppo, Hama, and Zobah were their cities. Their language supplanted Akkadian as the world language and was adopted by the Jews after their return from exile. It became the language of the Talmud, and half of the book of Daniel is written in Aramaic. It was through the Aramaic language that the Semitic civilization was given to the Greeks and Romans. Syriac (a form of Aramaic) was an important language in the early church. Today there are still a few Aramaic speaking islands of culture in the Middle East.

3. The Canaanites. This term is used to designate a number of peoples who lived in southern Syria (including Palestine) in ancient times. Even the Hebrews can be considered a Canaanite group. Although we still know very little about the Canaanites before the coming of the Hebrews, the recent finds at Ugarit are shedding light on their culture. The Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites were Canaanites. It appears that the Canaanites invented the alphabet. The Hebrews seem to have borrowed the Canaanite language and culture, and made it their own. The Phoenicians were a Canaanite people, pushed up into the Lebanon littoral, who took to the sea, and became the first people to dominate the Mediterranean and make it their common highway (1200-400 B.C.).

4. The Arabs. Little is known about the inhabitants of Arabia prior to Mohammed. The great contributions of the Arabs after the coming of Islam lie beyond the scope of this work.

5. The Ethiopians. Across the Red Sea from southern Arabia, the Ethiopians had a flourishing Semitic civilization from 500 B.C. to the time of Mohammed. J.B.G.

SENAAH (sē-nā'ä, Heb. senā'âh), the descendants of Senaah (sometimes spelled Hassenaah, with the Hebrew definite article attached) were a part of the company returning from captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:35; Neh. 7:38). They rebuilt the fish gate of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:3). The name may also refer to a place (unknown).

SENATE (sĕn'ăt, Gr. gerousía, a council of elders), mentioned in Acts 5:21; not a body different from the "council" (Sanhedrin) but a more precise equivalent indicating its dignity as composed of old men.

SENATOR (See Occupations & Professions)

SENEH (sē'nĕ, Heb. seneh), the name of the southern of two great cliffs between which ran the gorge of Michmash. Jonathan and his armorbearer passed here on their way to surprise the Philistine garrison (I Sam. 14:4,5). Located 3½ miles SE of Michmash.

SENIR (sē'nĭr, Heb. senîr), the Amorite name of Mt. Hermon (Deut. 3:9; S. of Sol. 4:8), a source of fir timber (Ezek. 27:5). Twice spelled Shenir in KJV.

SENNACHERIB (sĕ-năk'ĕr-ĭb, Heb. sanhērîv, Assyr. Sin-ahe-irba, Sin (moon-god) multiplied brothers), an Assyrian king (705-681 B.C.), the son and successor of Sargon II (722-705 B.C.). He restored the capital to Nineveh, on the E bank of the Tigris, opposite the present city of Mosul. It is represented today by the mounds Kuyunjik and Nebi Yunus ("prophet Jonah"); Kuyunjik was dug in part by Layard and the palace of Sennacherib was found. Sennacherib constructed palaces, temples, city-walls, and a water system, including the aqueduct of Jerwan (cf. building inscriptions, D. D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1927, II, pp. 362-483; hereafter ARAB). He was an able soldier and it is in this capacity in which he is best remembered. Upon his succession to the throne he found it necessary to deal with revolts throughout the empire. Exasperated by the repeated intrigues of Babylon and its king, Merodach-baladan, he finally reduced the city to ruins in 689 B.C. In the W there was like rebellion; among the rebels was Hezekiah of Judah. On his third campaign, 701 B.C., Sennacherib marched west to settle those difficulties. The accounts of his campaigns were recorded on clay prisms, among which are the Taylor Prism (British Museum) and the Oriental Institute Prism, which include the Assyrian version of the conflict with Hezekiah. Sennacherib took Sidon and moved south, receiving tribute and capturing Ashkelon, Beth-Dagon, Joppa, and other Palestinian cities (ARAB, II, p. 239). At Eltekeh (cf. Josh. 19:44; 21:23) he defeated a coalition of Palestinians, plus some Egyptian forces. Hezekiah had taken Padi, king of Ekron, who was allied with Sennacherib, and made him a captive (ARAB, II, p. 240). Sennacherib now seized Ekron and restored Padi to his throne. He did not take Jerusalem, but he boasted that he shut up Hezekiah "like a bird in a cage." The OT gives three records of this invasion and its results (II Kings 18:13-19:17; II Chron. 32:1-22; Isa. 36:1-37:38).

It was in the 14th year of Hezekiah that Sennacherib came against Judah and took all of its fortified cities. Hezekiah offered to pay tribute and had to strip the temple of its treasures to make payment. The Assyrian sent his officers to Jerusalem to deliver an ultimatum concerning capitulation. At this time Sennacherib was besieging Lachish, which he took, and then moved against Libnah. The reliefs of the palace of Sennacherib at Kuyunjik depicted the capture of Lachish. When Sennacherib heard that Tirhakah king of Egypt was coming against him, he sent a second message to Hezekiah. Hezekiah made this a matter for prayer and the prophet Isaiah brought him God's assurance of deliverance. Tirhakah was involved in the coalition defeated by Sennacherib; Egypt of that period was correctly evaluated by the Assyrian spokesman as "a broken reed" (II Kings 18:21; Isa. 36:6). The Bible relates that Jerusalem was delivered by the Lord, who sent His angel to smite the Assyrian armies and thus forced Sennacherib to retire to his homeland (II Kings 19:35-36; II Chron. 32:21; Isa. 37:36-37). Various naturalistic explanations of this incident have been attempted. Herodotus preserves a story of an Assyrian defeat occasioned by a plague of mice, which consumed the equipment of the armies and left them helpless before their enemies; some have associated the mice with the carrying of some disease-plague.

Back in Nineveh, Sennacherib was assassinated by two of his sons in 681 B.C. (II Kings 19:37; Isa. 37:38) in an effort to upset the succession which he had decreed for Esarhaddon, but Esarhaddon was equal to the situation and gained the throne. The Assyrian account of the Judean campaign follows: "As to Hezekiah, the Jew, he did not submit to my yoke, I laid siege to 46 of his strong cities, walled forts and to the countless small villages in their vicinity, and conquered (them) by means of well-stamped (earth-) ramps, and battering-rams brought (thus) near (to the walls) (combined with) the attack by foot-soldiers, (using) mines, breeches (sic) as well as sapper work. I drove out (of them) 200,150 people, young and old, male and female, horses, mules, donkeys, camels, big and small cattle, beyond counting, and considered (them) booty. Himself I made a prisoner in Jerusalem, his royal residence, like a bird in a cage. I surrounded him with earthwork in order to molest those who were leaving his city's gate. . . . Hezekiah himself, . . ., did send me later, to Nineveh, my lordly city, together with 30 talents of gold, 800 talents of silver . . . his (own) daughters, concubines, male and female musicians. In order to deliver the tribute and to do obeisance as a slave he sent his (personal) messenger." (A. Leo Oppenheim, in J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament. 2nd ed. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1955, p. 288. Cf. ARAB, II, p. 240). C.E.D.

SENSUAL (sĕn'shū-ăl, Gr. psychikós, pertaining to the soul), having the nature and characteristics of the soul, i.e., the natural life which men have in common with brutes; of the physical body (I Cor. 15:44); of one dominated by the self-life with its carnal desires (Jude 19; I Cor. 2:14); of the sensual wisdom characterizing the unregenerated mind (James 3:15).

SENUAH (See Hasenuah)

SEORIM (sē-ō'rĭm, Heb. se'ōrîm), a descendant of Aaron; one of the courses or subdivisons of the priests in the time of David (I Chron. 24:1-8).

SEPHAR (sē'fär, Heb. sephārâh), the eastern limit of the territory of the sons of Joktan (Gen. 10:30). This may be equated with the Arabic Zafar, the name of two towns in southern Arabia.

SEPHARAD (sē-fā'răd, Heb. sephārādh), the place of captivity of certain people of Jerusalem (Obad. 20). Its location is uncertain; perhaps it is to be identified with Shaparda, which Sargon II, who exiled Israelites to the cities of the Medes, and claims to have conquered Judah, mentions as a district of southwestern Media. Among the Jews of the post-Biblical period the term was used to refer to Spain.

SEPHARVAIM, SEPHARVITE (sĕf'ar-vā'ĭm, sē'fär-vīt), the place from which the Assyrians brought colonists to live in Samaria (II Kings 17: 24,31). The inhabitants of the place were called Sepharvites. The place is also referred to in the Rabshakeh's threatening speech to Jerusalem (II Kings 18:34; 19:13) as a place conquered by the Assyrian armies. Formerly Sepharvaim was identified with Sippar in Babylonia, but recently scholars have tended to reject that theory and have identified it with the Sibraim of Ezekiel 47:16, a place located in the region of Hamath.

SEPTUAGINT (sĕp'tū-à-jĭnt), the first and most important of a number of ancient translations of the Hebrew OT into Greek. Little is certainly known about it, for our information is frequently based on ancient traditions of doubtful authenticity, and scholars are divided in their judgments both concerning its origin and its usefulness in textual criticism.

The story of the origin of the Septuagint is told in the Letter of Aristeas, a pseudepigraphical book written in the second half of the second century B.C. It states that Ptolemy II (called Philadelphus, the king of Egypt, 285-247 B.C.) wished to have a translation of the Jewish Law for his famous library in Alexandria. At his request, the high priest Eleazer of Jerusalem sent 72 men, six from each tribe, to Egypt with a scroll of the Law. In 72 days, they translated one section each from this scroll, and afterwards decided on the wording together. So the version was called Septuagint (the translation of the 70, abbreviated LXX). Later writers elaborated on this story to the effect that the 72 had translated the whole OT (not the Pentateuch only), each independently of the other, in seclusion. The exact agreement of the 72 copies proved the work's inspiration.

What is the truth of this story? It is generally agreed that the Pentateuch was translated from Hebrew into Greek in Egypt at about the time of Ptolemy II, say 280 B.C. The rest of the OT was done at a later date. Most scholars believe the whole to have been finished by 180 B.C., although some scholars (notably Kahle) disagree, and believe that the LXX never contained more than the Pentateuch until the Christians took it over and added the rest of the OT books much later.

It seems most likely that the LXX originated not by the desire of Ptolemy II (although the project may have had his approval), but out of the need of the Alexandrian Jews. Alexandria of the third century B.C. was a large city with a great Jewish population. These Jews were Greek speaking, having long since forgotten their own language. The vigorous Jewish intellectual life of Alexandria (exemplified by Philo Judaeus a later century) would demand the Torah in Greek, just as an earlier generation of Jews made Targums of the OT in the Aramaic language.

The fact that the LXX was not made all at once is plain by the unevenness of its character. Some parts, e.g., the Pentateuch, are a rather literal and accurate translation of the Hebrew text. Other books, as I, II Samuel, differ greatly from the Masoretic Text (our present Hebrew Bible). Recent finds at Qumran ("The Dead Sea Scrolls") include a Hebrew MS of Samuel whose text seems very close to the LXX of this book. The LXX Daniel was such a free paraphrase that it was set aside in favor of a later translation made by Theodotion. The LXX Jeremiah is one-seventh, and the LXX Job is about one-fourth shorter than the Masoretic Text. The LXX, then, is not one book, but a collection of translations of the OT produced by Jews of the Diaspora.

The LXX came to have great authority among the non-Palestinian Jews. Its use in the synagogues of the Diaspora made it one of the most important missionary aids. Probably it was the first work of substantial size ever to be translated into another language. Now the Greeks could read the divine revelation in their own tongue. When the NT quotes from the OT, as it frequently does, the form of the quotation often follows the LXX.

The early Christian Church, built largely on converts from the synagogues of the Greek-speaking world, took over the LXX as their Bible. Their use of it, to prove to the Jews that Jesus was the Messiah, caused a change in the Jews' attitude toward it. Soon after A.D. 100, the Jews completely gave up the LXX and it became a Christian book. The Jews sponsored new translations of the OT, those by Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion being best known.

Our oldest copies of the LXX today are from the three great Greek MSS of the Bible from the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. — Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus. It is quite plain that these represent a LXX which has had a long textual history, and that it is now impossible to say to what extent these copies agree with the original translation made some 600 or 700 years before. Origen (died c. A.D. 250) sensed the problem of many divergent readings in the MSS in his day, and sought to produce a resultant text in his Hexapla. The textual criticism of the LXX is a difficult task, on which the last word remains to be said.

The LXX is of use in two ways to Biblical studies today:

1. It is a valuable witness to the understanding of the OT in pre-Christian days. As such it is frequently the originator of an exegetical tradition still followed. When, e.g., the majority of English Old Testaments render the covenant name for God (in Hebrew YHWH) by "LORD," they are merely following the lead of the LXX, which rendered the word by the Greek kyrios — "Lord." Another example of the LXX's influence on subsequent translations is its rendering of the Hebrew 'ĕlōhîm (God) by aggeloi ("angels"), e.g., in Psalm 8:5. The writer of the Hebrews epistle (2:7) followed the LXX here, as did the KJV: "a little lower than the angels." Most modern translators prefer to translate 'ĕlōhîm literally, as, e.g., the RSV: "little less than God."

2. The LXX is a very important tool for use in the science of textual criticism — the attempt to bring to light the original text of the Bible. In quite a few cases the Masoretic Text and the LXX do not agree. A person knowing neither of the original languages can sense the difference by comparing Amos 9:11,12 with Acts 15:16,17. James quotes Amos, and his quotation agrees in general with the LXX, which is quite different from the Masoretic Text. Of course, the great majority of the differences between the two are inconsequential; the Amos-Acts passage was cited because the difference there is of some consequence for the meaning of the passage. Another example is Psalm 22:16, where the Hebrew Bible "like a lion my hands and my feet" is rendered "they pierced my hands and my feet" in the English Bibles, following the LXX. Often when the Hebrew text is difficult (as in the last example) modern translators correct the text by using the easier-to-explain readings of the LXX. To what extent this adherence to the easier reading is justified is not easy to say. A recent trend of thought among Biblical scholars is to question the correctness of these easier LXX readings and to seek by etymological study to make sense of the more difficult reading in the Masoretic Text. In spite of these problems, it can be said that the LXX is an eloquent witness to the accuracy with which the OT has come down to us from ancient days.

Interior of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem, supposedly the site of the tomb of Jesus. © MPS

SEPULCHRE (See Tomb)

SEPULCHRE, CHURCH OF THE HOLY, the church professedly covering the tomb where Jesus was buried. Tradition points to its identification by Helena, mother of Constantine, in A.D. 325. Constantine built an elaborate church on the site, dedicated in A.D. 335. The authenticity of the site is much disputed. The destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and its more complete devastation in A.D. 135 make the certainty of the identification questionable. According to Scripture the crucifixion and burial took place outside the city wall (John 19:20; Matt. 28:11; Heb. 13:12). Many authorities seriously doubt that the traditional site was outside the city wall. It is very difficult (but not impossible) to plot the course of the wall so as to exclude the traditional site. Actually no remains of a city wall following such a course have been found. Discovery of remains of an apparently first-century wall N of the supposed line of the third wall, begun by Agrippa I in A.D. 41, suggests that the present wall is the true second wall and that the traditional second wall excluding the Holy Sepulcher never existed. This would place the site within the city. But authorities are not agreed as to the true significance of the discovery. The traditional site has its strong defenders and vigorous opponents. Demonstrable proof of the location of the actual tomb is lacking. D.E.H.

SERAH (sē'rà, Heb. serah), a daughter of Asher (Gen. 46:17; I Chron. 7:30). Once spelled Sarah (Num. 26:46).

SERAIAH (sē-rā'yà, Heb. serāyāhû). 1. A son of Kenaz (I Chron. 4:13).

2. A scribe who held office under David (II Sam. 8:17).

3. A Simeonite, son of Asiel (I Chron. 4:35).

4. One of the men sent to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer. 36:26).

5. The high priest when Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem. He was put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (II Kings 25:18-21; Jer. 52:24-27). He was the father of Jehozadak, who was taken into captivity, and the grandfather of Jeshua, the high priest under Zerubbabel at the return from exile. He may also be the Seraiah named as an ancestor of Ezra (I Chron. 6:14,15; Ezra 3:2; 7:1).

6. The son of Neriah, a quartermaster (RSV), carried to Babylon when Jerusalem fell (Jer. 51:59-64).

7. The son of Tanhumeth, from the town of Netophah (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

8. A priest, the third in the list of those who returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2; Neh. 7:7, where he is called Azariah; 12:1), and third also in the record of those who sealed the covenant binding all Jews not to take foreign wives (Neh. 10:2). He became governor of the temple when it was rebuilt (Neh. 11:11). He is mentioned (as Azariah) also in I Chronicles 9:11.

SERAPHIM (sĕr'à-fĭm, Heb. serāphîm), called in the KJV seraphims (-im is the Hebrew plural ending; hence the s is superfluous) were celestial beings whom Isaiah saw standing before the enthroned Lord when he was called to the prophetic ministry (Isa. 6:2,3,6,7). This is the only mention of these creatures in the Bible. They seem to be comparable to the four living creatures of Ezekiel 1:5-25 and Revelation 4:6-8.

The word seraphim means "burning ones." The same word is used to describe the serpents in the wilderness (Num. 21:6,8); some commentators have concluded that the seraphim of Isaiah's vision were serpentine in form. This is not correct. Actually, like the cherubim (q.v.) and the living creatures, they belong to an order of unearthly beings attending the throne of God. They were seen by Isaiah as having the hands, faces and voices of men and stood upright; they had three pairs of wings. It has been suggested that they symbolized lightning. Certainly their posture (their faces and feet covered by their wings) was one of worship and adoration before God, contributing to the sense of awe and reverence in His presence. J.B.G.

SERAPIS (sē-rā'pĭs), a highly venerated Graeco-Egyptian god. His worship was introduced into Egypt under the Ptolemies with the transfer of his statue to Alexandria and the cult was accepted by the people as the anthropomorphic equivalent of the Egyptian divinities Osiris and Apis. The worship of this god soon won a wide acceptance in the Hellenic world, spread to Rome, and ultimately became one of the leading cults of the west. He is not mentioned in Scripture, but being worshiped at Corinth he must be included among the so-called "gods many" mentioned by Paul (I Cor. 8:5).

SERED (sē'rĕd, Heb. seredh), a son of Zebulun (Gen. 46:14; Num. 26:26), and founder of a tribal family.

SERGEANT (See Occupations & Professions)

SERGIUS PAULUS (sûr'jĭ-ŭs pô'lŭs, Gr. Sérgios Paúlos), the Roman proconsul (KJV "deputy") of Cyprus, a senatorial province from 22 B.C. He was "a prudent man," one possessed of intelligence and discretion; in his desire to know the truth he had come under the evil influence of Bar-Jesus but revealed his prudence in requesting to hear the missionaries, in Cyprus on the first journey. Deeply impressed by what he saw and heard, the proconsul "believed," which most naturally means that he became a Christian (Acts 13:7-12).

SERMON ON THE MOUNT, the first of six extended discourses of Jesus given in the Gospel of Matthew, covering chapters five, six and seven. The others are (2) the mission of the twelve (Matt. 9:35-11:1); (3) the parables by the sea (13:1-52); (4) on humility (chapter 18); (5) denouncing hypocrisy (chapter 23); (6) on eschatology (chapters 24 and 25).

Some of these discourses are given in Mark and Luke in the same situations as in Matthew, but always in shorter form. Much of the teaching material which Matthew gives in these long discourses is given also by Mark and Luke, with close verbal similarity, but in fragments in other settings than Matthew's.

These facts have caused critical students to question, in greater or less degree, the integrity of Matthew's record of the Lord's teaching ministry. Some relatively conservative scholars have held that Matthew's six great discourses of Jesus were built up by Matthew from scattered materials.

It is obviously impossible in this short article to give an answer in detail, but it can be stated that there is no sound reason to doubt that Matthew's account of the discourses of Jesus is true and reliable.

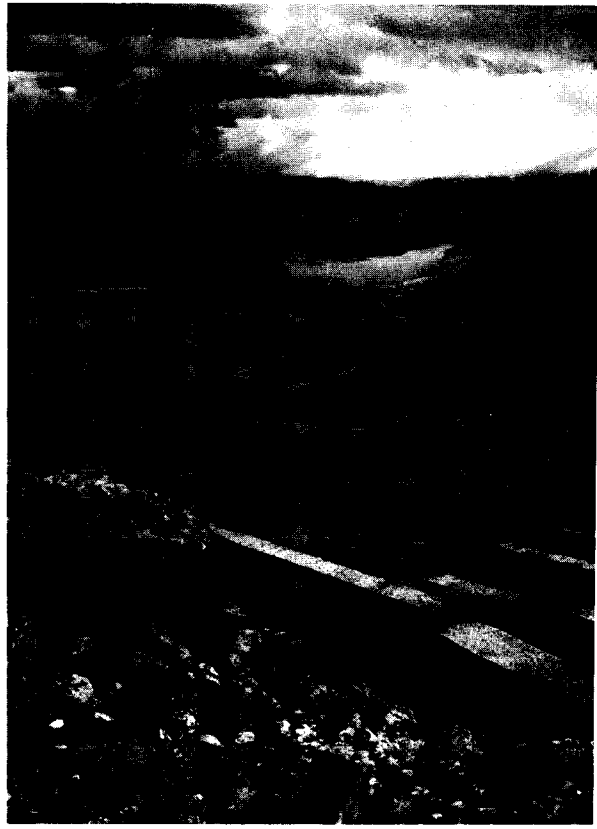
The nature of Jesus' itinerant ministry to shifting crowds was such that He must have repeated similar material a great many times under a great variety of circumstances. Moreover, in any one extended session of His teaching, there were interruptions, questions, arguments, digressions.

The word "sermon" is misleading to the modern mind. Matthew does not say that Jesus arose, entered the pulpit, and delivered a sermon which He had formally prepared in a quiet library! The crowds were following Him (Matt. 5:1; Luke 6:17) to see His miracles. He went up the mountain a little way so that His immediate followers would be nearer than the rest (Matt. 5:1); and then He came down with them to a level place (Luke 6:17), still in "the mountain." Presently He sat down and began to teach, with special attention to the disciples who were near.

The Biblical writers, of course, used no quotation marks, and the modern reader must understand that they do not claim to give quotations word for word. Neither do they claim to give all that was said on any occasion. They do claim that their words are a true presentation of the substance quoted.

Let the reader allow his imagination to picture the giving of the first beatitude, for example. Jesus says, "Blessed are you poor people." A dull person interrupts, "How can that be? We're in want." Jesus replies, "God's kingdom is yours (Luke 6:20) [if you will have it], but more important, — Blessed are they who feel their spiritual poverty, for the kingdom of heaven is theirs." (Matt. 5:3).

The "sermon," then, is a student's (Matthew's) report of a class lecture and discussion, and should be studied in that light. Luke's account is to be understood as based upon another student's notebook (See Luke 1:1-4 for Luke's sources of information). The fact that there are digressions from a formal outline (Matt. 5:25,26,29,30, etc.) is evidence of the genuineness of the record. What teacher in touch with the minds of his class is ever able to avoid digressions from the outline he had in mind?



The view from Jebel Hattin (Horns of Hattin), looking out over the Sea of Galilee. This is the traditional site of the Sermon on the Mount, and it is generally known as the Mount of Beatitudes. © MPS

This mode of regarding the matter does not in any way contradict the inspired truthfulness of the Gospel record as it stands.

It is remarkable what unity and order of thought is evident in the sermon on the mount. There is no space for a detailed analytical outline, which the careful reader can profitably make for himself. Is the teaching of Jesus literally applicable to human beings in this world? The meek do not now inherit the earth (5:5) and public or national nonresistance leads to slavery.

If we take the teaching of Jesus in the same reasonably flexible way in which He obviously intended it, the way in which He interpreted the ten commandments (Matt. 12:4,5,11,12, etc.), the way of the heart rather than of mere outward conduct (Matt. 5:22,28), there is not a word which we need not heed today. We should be willing to take a slap in the face. This is not to say that we must stand by and see the innocent suffer lawless injury. Jesus did not contradict the principle that those responsible for law enforcement must bear "the sword" (Rom. 13:1-5) and that "not in vain." The sermon on the mount is Christ's instruction to us for godly living in the present world. J.O.B.

SERPENT (See Animals, Reptiles)

SERUG (sē'rŭg, Heb. serûgh, meaning uncertain), a descendant of Shem; son of Reu and great-grandfather of Abraham (Gen. 11:20,22f; I Chron. 1:26). In KJV of Luke 3:35 he is called Saruch (Gr., seroúch); ASV and RSV have Serug. He is thus in the Messianic line. Saurgi, a city of Harran district mentioned in Assyrian texts, probably was named after him. He lived 230 years.

SERVANT (See Occupations & Professions)

SERVANT OF JEHOVAH, a term applied in the OT to the patriarchs (Exod. 32-13), Moses (Num. 12:7f), Joshua (Judg. 2:8), David (II Sam. 7:5-29), the prophets (Zech. 1:6), and others. It is chiefly used, however, as a title for the Messiah in Isaiah 40 — 66 (esp. in 42:1-9; 49:1-13; 50:4-11; 52:13 — 53:12). The Servant is the same person previously described in 7:14; 9:6f; 11:1-5; he is also identified as "the Branch" (cf. 4:2; 11:1; 53:2 with Jer. 23:5f; 33:15; Zech. 3:8; 6:12f). The NT applies the Servant-passages to Christ (42:1-4 is quoted as fulfilled in Matt. 12:18-21; and 52:13 — 53:12 is quoted in Matt. 8:17; Luke 22:37; John 12:38; Acts 8:32f; Rom. 10:16; cf. also John 1:29; Rom. 8:34; Heb. 9:28; I Pet. 2:21-25). The Servant's mission is fulfilled only in Christ: election (42:1; 49:7; I Pet. 2:4,6), birth (49:1; 53:2; Luke 1:31-35), anointing (42:1; 48:16; 59:21; 61:1; Matt. 3:16; Luke 4:18f), ministry (49:8-13; Acts 10:36-43), rejection (49:4,7; 53:1-3; Acts 3:13-18), obedience (50:4-7; Phil. 2:7f), new covenant (42:6; 49:8; 55:3; Matt. 26:26-29), vicarious death (53:4-12; I Pet. 2:22-25), resurrection (53:10-12; Acts 2:24-36), salvation offered (49:8; 61:2; Luke 24:46-49), mission to Gentiles (42:1,6f; 49:6,12; 60:3,9; Matt. 28:18-20), glorification and intercession (49:3; 53:12; Acts 2:33-36; Phil. 2:6-11; Heb. 7:24f). W.B.

SERVICE. The word rendered "service" in KJV is chiefly the Hebrew noun 'avôdhâh (labor; service), which is used in a wide variety of meanings: (1) the use of the earth (I Chron. 27:26 ["tillage"]; Ps. 104:14); (2) inferior or menial work ("servile work" — Lev. 23:7f, 21, 25, 35f); (3) work rendered as a slave (Exod. 1:14; 2:23 ["bondage"]; (4) a stipulated work-agreement between two persons for a definite period (Gen. 29:27; 30:26; Hos. 12:12); (5) military employment (I Chron. 26:30; Ezek. 29:18); (6) work connected with the construction or repair of the tabernacle or temple (Exod. 36:1,3,5; 30:32; I Chron. 28:20f; 29:7; II Chron. 34:13); (7) the performance of a ritual or ordinance (Exod. 12:25f; 13:5; Josh. 22:27; II Chron. 35:16); (8) chiefly, work as a ministration performed publicly by priests and Levites (Num. 3:6ff; 4:4-49; 8:11-26; 16:9; 18:4-7, 21-31; I Chron. 23:27f,32). Levitical and priestly service was God-ordained (Num. 18:7; I Chron. 24:19; 28:12f), orderly (I Chron. 24:3, 19; II Chron. 8:14; 29:35; 31:2; 35:10), manifold (I Chron. 23:28,32; 25:1,6), limited (Num. 8:24-26), and rewarded (Num. 18:21,24,31).

KJV renders the following words "service" in the NT: diakonia (attendance; ministering — Luke 10:40; Rom. 15:31; II Cor. 11:8; Rev. 2:19); douleuo (to serve [as a slave] — Gal. 4:8; Eph. 6:7; I Tim. 6:2); latreía (ministration — John 16:2; Rom. 9:4; 12:1; Heb. 9:1,6); latreuo (to minister — Heb. 9:9); leitourgia (public ministration — II Cor. 9:12; Phil. 2:17,30) (B. F. Westcott, The Epistle to the Hebrews, London: Macmillan and Co., 1889, pp. 230-232). W.B.

SERVITOR (See Occupations & Professions)

SETH (sĕth, Heb. shēth [so KJV in Num. 24:17; I Chron. 1:1], see below). 1. Adam's third son; father of Enos (Gen. 4:25f; 5:3-8). His name (meaning "appointed," i.e., "substituted") signifies that he was considered a "substitute" for Abel (4:25). His birth recalled man's tragic loss of the divine image (5:1f). He became the founder of the line of faith (4:26; Luke 3:38).

2. The Moabites (Num. 24:17). [Sheth, see ASV].

SETHUR (sē'thĕr, Heb. sethûr, hidden), son of Michael, a representative prince of the tribe of Asher sent by Moses, at Jehovah's command, to spy out Canaan (Num. 13:2f,13).

SEVENEH (sē-vē'nĕ, Heb. sewēnēh, meaning uncertain), mentioned in Ezekiel 29:10, 30:6. It is rendered Syene in the KJV. This is the Hebrew reading of an Egyptian town located on the first cataract of the Nile, known today as Aswan. Here the Jews, during the control of the Persians, erected a temple in which they worshiped Jehovah.

SEVENTY, THE, Disciples of our Lord. The mission of the Seventy (mentioned only in Luke 10:1-20) probably represents a rehearsal of responsibilities and conditions that the disciples would meet after Christ's departure. Note the following parallels with Acts: (1) the mission of others outside the Twelve (Luke 10:1; Acts 8:1,4); (2) the inclusion of the Gentiles (Luke 10:8; Acts 10:17); (3) the kingdom of God proclaimed (Luke 10:9, 11; Acts 8:12); (4) the reception (Luke 10:5-9; Acts 2:41f) and rejection (Luke 10:10ff; Acts 7:54-60) of the Gospel; (5) triumph over demonic powers (Luke 10:17ff; Acts 16:16ff); (6) joy of discipleship (Luke 10:17; Acts 5:41).

SEVENTY WEEKS, THE, a name applied to Daniel 9:24-27, a prophecy that presumably, in contrast to the general prophecies in Daniel 2 and 7, pin-points the exact time within the fourth kingdom when the Messiah shall appear. Practically all agree that the "weeks" designate 490 years. The prophecy is (1) divided: the successive periods are described as 7,62,1; (2) dated: its terminus a quo ("from" — 9:25) and its terminus ad quem ("unto" — 9:25); (3) determinative: its purposes regard Israel (9:24), redemption (9:24), the Messiah (9:24,26f), the sacrifices (9:27), Jerusalem (9:25,26f). (4) debated (see below). Three main views are held: (1) the critical, that the "prophecy" (written by a pseudo-Daniel in 165 B.C.) synchronizes (inaccurately) with the history between 586 B.C. (Jerusalem's fall) and 164 B.C. (Antiochus); (2) the dispensational, that the 69th week terminated at the crucifixion, leaving the 70th (with the present age intervening as a "great parenthesis") to be fulfilled in the Great Tribulation; (3) the conservative, or traditional, that the 70th week was introduced by Christ's baptism and bisected (3½ years) by His death, thus causing the sacrifices to cease (9:27). W.B.

SEVEN WORDS FROM THE CROSS. These words of Christ were probably uttered in the following order: (1) Before the darkness: "Father, forgive them," etc. (Luke 23:34); "Verily I say unto thee," etc. (Luke 23:43); "Woman, behold thy son," (John 19:26f). (2) During the darkness: "My God, my God," (Matt. 27:46; Mark 15:34). (3) After the darkness: "I thirst" (John 19:28, fulfilling Ps. 69:21); "It is finished" (John 19:30); "Father, into thy hands" (Luke 23:46, quoting Ps. 31:5). These seven words may be described as: (1) propitiatory — "Father, forgive"; (2) promissory — "Today thou shalt be with me in paradise"; (3) provisionary — "Woman, behold thy son"; (4) protestatory —"My God, my God, why didst thou forsake me?" (Matt. 27:46, ASV mg.); (5) peremptory — "I thirst"; (6) proclamatory — "It is finished"; (7) pacificatory — "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." Theologically, these words, in the order given above, illustrate (1) divine forgiveness; (2) assurance of immortality; (3) good works; (4) the awfulness of Christ's death; (5) the true humanity of Christ; (6) the perfection of Christ's atonement; (7) the divine complacency.

SHAALABBIN (shā'ā-lăb'ĭn, Heb. sha'ălabbîn, prob. haunt of foxes; cf. Judg. 15:4), a town listed in Joshua 19:42 between Ir-shemesh and Aijalon as assigned to the Danites. See SHAALBIM.

SHAALBIM (shā-ăl'bĭm, Heb. sha'albîm), a town won by the Danites from the Amorites with the help of the Ephraimites (Judg. 1:35). In Solomon's time a representative from this town was appointed as commissary officer (I Kings 4:9). "Eliahba the Shaalbonite" (II Sam. 23:32; I Chron. 11:33), one of David's special guards, came from this town (Shaalbon = Shaalbim). Some have identified Shaalbim (Shaalbon, Shaalabin) with modern Selbit, a town in central Palestine. See SHAALABBIN.

SHAALBONITE (See Shaalbim)

SHAAPH (shā'ăf, Heb. sha'aph, meaning uncertain). 1. The sixth in a list of sons of Jahdai (I Chron. 2:47).

2. A scion of Caleb by Maachah, a concubine. This man became the progenitor of the inhabitants of Madmannah (I Chron. 2:49; cf. Josh. 15:31).

SHAARAIM (shā'ā-rā'ĭm, Heb. sha'ărayim, two gates [so rendered in LXX of I Sam. 17:52]; KJV [incorrectly] Sharaim in Josh. 15:36). 1. A town belonging to Judah in the Shephelah or "low country" (Josh. 15:36); mentioned elsewhere only in I Samuel 17:52.

2. A town belonging to Simeon (I Chron. 4:31); listed as Sharuhen in Joshua 19:6 and Shilhim in Joshua 15:32.

SHAASHGAZ (shā-ăsh'găz, Heb. sha'ashgāz), a chamberlain (or eunuch) in charge of "the second house" of concubines belonging to King Ahasuerus (Xerxes); Esther was entrusted to his care (Esth. 2:14).

SHABBETHAI (shăb'ē-thī, Heb. shabbethay, Sabbath-born), a Levite of Ezra's time who is mentioned as a participant in the foreign-wives controversy (Ezra 10:15, ASV; cf. mg.), as an interpreter of the Law (Neh. 8:7f), and as a chief Levite over the temple (Neh. 11:16).

SHACHIA (shā-kī'ā, Heb. sākheyâh, probably Jehovah has hedged about), son of Shaharaim, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:10).

SHADDAI (shăd'ī, Heb. shadday, exact meaning still uncertain, although KJV's Almighty probably approximates basic idea), a title for God found 48 times in the OT. Appearing first in Genesis 17:1 (cf. 35:11; Exod. 6:2f) as a self-designation of God, it is subsequently used by Isaac (Gen. 28:3), Jacob (43:14; 48:3; 49:25), Balaam (Num. 24:4, 16), Job (31 times), Naomi (Ruth 1:20f), David (Ps. 68:14; 91:1), and the prophets (Isa. 13:6; Ezek. 1:24; 10:5; Joel 1:15). Rightly understood, Exodus 6:2f does not support the critical view that El Shaddai (or Elohim) was God's exclusive name in the pre-Mosaic revelation.

SHADOW, a word used literally, figuratively, and theologically. Literally, of a mountain (Judg. 9:36), tree (Dan. 4:12; Hos. 4:13; Mark 4:32), dial (II Kings 20:9-11), booth (Jonah 4:5), gourd (Jonah 4:6), a person (Acts 5:15); figuratively, of life's shortness (I Chron. 29:15; Job 8:9; Ps. 102:11), of protection (either good, as in Ps. 17:8; 36:7; 91:1; or evil, as in Isa. 30:3; Jer. 48:45), of the Messiah's blessings (Isa. 4:6; 32:2; 49:2; 51:16), of death (either physical, as in Job 10:21f; Ps. 23:4; 107:10,14; or spiritual, as in Isa. 9:2; Matt. 4:16; Luke 1:79); and theologically as follows: (1) of God's unchangeableness (James 1:17); (2) of the typical nature of the OT (Col. 2:17; Heb. 8:5; 10:1), illustrated in these facts: the OT prefigures in outline the NT substance; the OT represents externally (in rites and ceremonies) what the NT fulfills internally; the OT saints, nevertheless, could, by faith, comprehend the inner reality of the shadow; the NT, therefore, fulfills and abolishes the OT shadow; the NT saints, however, can still draw from the shadow spiritual instruction; and, finally, even NT saints, with the shadow and the substance, still await the full day of spiritual understanding (I Cor. 13:12). W.B.

SHADRACH (shā'drăk, Heb. shadhrakh, meaning uncertain), the Babylonian name given to Hananiah, one of the Hebrew youths committed to the prince of the eunuch (Dan. 1:3,7).

SHAFT, found in KJV only in Isaiah 49:2 (Heb. hēts, arrow) and in Exodus 25:31; 37:17; Numbers 8:4 (all Heb. yārēk, thigh, loin, side, base). In the latter passages it represents the shank of the golden candelabrum; in Isaiah 49:2 it is used in a Messianic sense.

SHAGE (shā'ge, Heb. shāghē', wandering), a Hararite ("the mountaineer"), father of Jonathan and one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:34; however, the text here is uncertain; cf. II Sam. 23:11,33).

SHAHARAIM (shā'hà-rā'ĭm, Heb. shaḥărayim, double dawn), a Benjamite who, in the land of Moab, had three wives (Hushim, Baara, Hodesh) and nine sons, who became heads of families (I Chron. 8:8-11). The text of vs. 8 is uncertain.

SHAHAZIMAH (shā'hà-zī'mà, Heb. shaḥătsûmâh, toward the heights), a town in Issachar between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. 19:22). In ASV Shahazumah.

SHALEM (shā'lĕm, Heb. shālēm, safe), a place mentioned in Genesis 33:18 (KJV); however, most modern scholars (see ASV in peace and RSV safely) take the Hebrew to express the manner of Jacob's return to Shechem.

SHALIM, LAND OF (shā'lĭm, Heb. sha'ălîm, district of foxes), a region, probably near the N boundary of Benjamin's territory, traversed by Saul in search of his father's asses (I Sam. 9:4). ASV Shaalim.

SHALISHAH (shà-lī'shà, Heb. shālishâh, a third part), a district through which Saul went in search of his father's lost asses (I Sam. 9:4); identified by some with Baal-shalishah (II Kings 4:42). KJV Shalisha.

SHALLECHETH, THE GATE OF (shăl'ĕ-kĕth), the name of the W gate of Solomon's Temple assigned by lots to Shuppim and Hosah, Levitical porters (I Chron. 26:13-16). Some suppose that the offal of the temple was "cast" through this gate.

SHALLUM, SHALLUN (shăl'ŭm, shăl'ŭn, Heb. shallûm or shallûn, recompense), a name (Shallum) applied to all of the following except the last (Shallun): 1. The youngest son of Naphtali (I Chron. 7:13 = Shillem in Gen. 46:24 and Num. 26:48f).

2. The son of Shaul and grandson of Simeon (I Chron. 4:25; cf. Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:12f).

3. The son of Sisamai and father of Jekamiah (I Chron. 2:40f).

4. Son of Kore and chief of the gate-keepers (I Chron. 9:17,19,31; Ezra 2:42; 10:24; Neh. 7:45 = Meshelemiah of I Chron. 26:1 and Shelemiah of I Chron. 26:14). Some hold, however, that I Chronicles 7:13 identifies a different person.

5. Son of Zadok and father of Hilkiah (I Chron. 6:12f); ancestor of Ezra (Ezra 7:1f = Meshullam of I Chron. 9:11 and Neh. 11:11).

6. A king of Israel who, having slain Zechariah, reigned in his place for one month; then he himself was slain by Menahem (II Kings 15:10-15).

7. The father of Jehizkiah and an Ephraimite chief (II Chron. 28:12).

8. Son of Tikvah and husband of the prophetess Huldah; custodian of the sacerdotal wardrobe (II Kings 22:14; II Chron. 34:22; perhaps = Jer. 32:7 [Jeremiah's uncle]; see 10 below).

9. A king of Judah, son of Josiah (I Chron. 3:15; Jer. 22:11); better known as Johoahaz II (II Kings 23:30f,34; II Chron. 36:1).

10. Uncle of Jeremiah (Jer. 32:7; see 8 above).

11. Father of Maaseiah (Jer. 35:4; cf. 52:24).

12. One of the Levitical porters who was compelled to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

13. A son of Bani who was compelled to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra 10:42).

14. The son of Hallohesh; a ruler who, with his daughters, helped to build the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:12).

15. Shallun, son of Col-hozeh; ruler of the Mizpah-district; a builder of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:15).

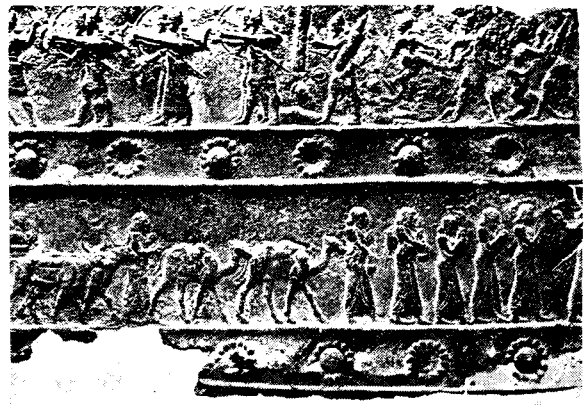
SHALMAI (shăl'mī, Heb. shalmay in Ezra 2:46, but salmay in Neh. 7:48; ASV and RSV have Salmai in Neh. 7:48), the ancestral head of the Nethinim family that returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:46; Neh. 7:48).

SHALMAN (shăl'măn, Heb. shalman), mentioned only in Hosea 10:14. The person (Shalman) and place (Beth-arbel) are now unknown. The ancient versions differ considerably. The two most likely theories: (1) a contraction of Shalmaneser; (2) the Moabite king Salmanu, mentioned in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser.

SHALMANESER (shăl'măn-ē'zêr, Heb. shalman'eser = Assyr. Sulman-asaridu, [God] Sulman is chief), the title of five Assyrian kings, only one of whom is directly mentioned in the OT; another one is important because he refers to an Israelitish king.

1. Shalmaneser III (859-824 B.C.), son of Ashurnasirpal; the first Assyrian king who, as far as the records reveal, had political and military contacts with a king of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. Although Shalmaneser III is not mentioned as such in the Biblical narrative (I Kings 16:29-22:40; II Chron. 18:1-34), yet his Monolith Inscription in the British Museum recounts a coalition, composed principally of Syria [Hadadezer = Benhadad] and of Israel ["Ahab, the Israelite"], that he met and presumably defeated at Karkar, N of Hamath in the Orontes Valley, in 853 B.C. Ahab, according to this inscription, contributed 2,000 chariots and 10,000 troops in the battle against Shalmaneser. As indicated above, no record of this event is found in the contemporary Biblical data. The reference to Ahab in a non-Biblical archaeological source adds substantial weight to the trustworthiness of the OT record.

2. Shalmaneser V (726-722 B.C.), son of Tiglath-pileser (who died in 727 B.C.); the only Assyrian king named Shalmaneser in the OT history (unless Shalman, in Hos. 10:14, be a contraction of Shalmaneser). There are two references to him: (1) II Kings 17:3-5, which recounts how, first, Shalmaneser received tribute from Hoshea, the last king of the Northern Kingdom; then, after Hoshea had formed an alliance with So, king of Egypt, Shalmaneser, returning to Palestine in a more extensive campaign, imprisoned Hoshea and besieged Samaria for three years. The prophet Hosea, a contemporary of Hoshea's turbulent reign, often speaks out against entanglements with either Assyria or Egypt (Hos. 5:13; 7:11; 8:9; 12:1); (2) II Kings 18:9-11, which agrees in essential details with the previous passage (II Kings 17:3-5), but also synchronizes the siege and fall of Samaria with the ruling house of Jerusalem (Hezekiah). Since Sargon (mentioned only in Isa. 20:1 in ancient literature before the advent of modern discoveries) was, according to his own testimony, the conqueror of Samaria (in 722/721 B.C.), the Biblical record implicitly agrees, for it says: (1) "the king of Assyria took Samaria" (II Kings 17:6); and (2) "they took it" (II Kings 18:10) — in neither case actually affirming that Shalmaneser was the one who took the city. There is a possible allusion to Shalmaneser V in "King Jareb" (i.e., "the champion king"), which Hosea uses as a humorous or sarcastic reference to some Assyrian king (Hos. 5:13; 10:6). W.B.



An engraved bronze band from a palace gate of Shalmaneser III of Assyria, showing a battle scene above, and tribute being paid to the victorious king in the lower panel. BA SHAMA (shā'mà, Heb. shāmā', He [God] has heard), a son of Hotham, the Aroerite; one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:44).

SHAMARIAH (See Shemariah)

SHAMBLES (Gr. mákellon, from the Lat. macellum, meat market [so RSV]). Paul, answering a question of conscience regarding meat sold in the makellon, instructs the Corinthian Christians to eat such meat without further inquiry as to its use in pagan sacrifices. The essential nature of the meat as food has not been affected (cf. I Tim. 4:4); but this liberty must not endanger a weaker brother's conscience (I Cor. 10:23-33).

SHAME, SHAMEFACEDNESS (Heb. bosheth, Gr. aischýne, Gr. aidós). This subject has many aspects: subjective (Gen. 2:25; 3:7) or objective (Jer. 11:13; Hos. 9:10); positive (Prov. 19:26; 28:7) or negative (Prov. 10:5; Rom. 1:16; I John 2:28); literal (Exod. 32:25) or figurative (Rev. 3:18; 16:15); individual (Gen. 38:23) or national (Judg. 18:7; Isa. 30:3-5); removable (Isa. 54:4) or unremovable (Jer. 23:40); loved (Hos. 4:18, ASV) or hated (Eph. 5:12); punitive (Isa. 47:3; Ezek. 16:51-54; 44:12) or commendatory (I Sam. 20:30-34; II Sam. 6:20; 13:11-14); now (Heb. 6:6) or future (Ezek. 32:24f; Dan. 12:2); human (Ps. 119:31) or divine (Ps. 69:7-9; 89:45; Isa. 50:6; Heb. 12:2); due to something natural (II Sam. 19:1-5; I Cor. 11:6,14) or something unnatural (II Sam. 13:11-14; Phil. 3:19). "Shamefacedness" in I Timothy 2:9 denotes sexual modesty.

SHAMED (shā'mĕd, Heb. shāmedh, destruction; however, many MSS. read shāmer, watcher; ASV has Shemed), the third-named son of Elpaal; builder of Ono and Lod (I Chron. 8:12).

SHAMER (shā'mêr, Heb. shemer, guard). 1. A descendant of Levi; father of Bani (I Chron. 6:46).

2. Son of Heber and head of an Asherite clan (I Chron. 7:32; Heb. Shômer [so KJV]); same as Shamer (Heb. Shāmer) in vs. 34. Numerous variations exist in Heb. MSS. See also SHEMED (I Chron. 8:12) and SHEMER (I Kings 16:24).

SHAMGAR (shăm'gär, Heb. shamgar), son of Anath; slayer of 600 Philistines (Judg. 3:31; cf. I Sam. 13:19-22). He is listed between Ehud and Barak; but no definite years are assigned to his judgeship. Since Beth-anath belonged to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:38; Judg. 1:33), and since this tribe was prominent in the contemporary struggle against the Canaanite king Jabin (Judg. 4:6,10; 5:18), it is probable that Shamgar was also a member of this tribe. Israel had been commanded to exterminate the inhabitants of Canaan completely (Exod. 23:31-33; Deut. 7:1-5; 20:16-18); but Israel had disobeyed this divine command (Judg. 1:27-36); therefore, these unsubdued Canaanites had now become a snare to the Israelites. In fact, the situation was now somewhat reversed: Israel was cowed and disarmed, surreptitiously using the "byways" (Judg. 5:5f). In this chaotic condition Shamgar slew 600 Philistines, using only an oxgoad as his weapon. He thus prepared the way for the greater deliverance of Israel under Deborah and Barak.

SHAMHUTH (shăm'hŭth, Heb. shamhûth, desolation), an Izrahite; the fifth divisional commander, for the fifth month of the year, in David's organization of his army (I Chron. 27:8, RSV); probably the same person as Shammah the Harodite (II Sam. 23:25) and Shammoth the Harorite (I Chron. 11:27).

SHAMIR (shā'mêr, Heb. shāmîr, a sharp point). 1. A town allotted to Judah (Josh. 15:48); now usually identified with the ruin Sōmerak, about 13 miles SW of Hebron.

2. A town in Mount Ephraim; the residence and burial-place of Tola, one of the judges (Judg. 10:1f). Its identification is still uncertain. The residence of Tola, an Issacharian, in a city of Ephraim has been explained as due either to the turbulent condition of Issachar's territory or to the fact that Issachar had cities within Ephraim.

3. A Levite, son of Micah; a temple-attendant (I Chron. 24:24).

SHAMMA (shăm'à, Heb. shammā', astonishment or desolation), one of the 11 sons of Zophah; a descendant of Asher (I Chron. 7:37).

SHAMMAH (shăm'à, Heb. shammâ, waste). 1. The son of Reuel and grandson of Esau; an Edomite chief (Gen. 36:13,17; I Chron. 1:37).

2. The third son of Jesse and brother of David (I Sam. 16:9; 17:13); also called Shimea (I Chron. 20:7), Shimeah (II Sam. 13:3,32) and Shimei (II Sam. 21:21). He was one of the seven sons of Jesse rejected before the choice of David as king (I Sam. 16:1-13). He fought, with his two older brothers, in Saul's warfare against the Philistines (I Sam. 17:13-19,22f). He was the father of Jonadab (II Sam. 13:3,32) and of Jonathan, whose victory over a Philistine giant is especially noted (II Sam. 21:21f).

3. One of David's three mightiest men, the son of Agee (II Sam. 23:11 = Shage in I Chron. 11:34). His single-handed victory over the Philistines (II Sam. 23:11f), his loyalty to David in the cave of Adullam (II Sam. 23:13), and his heroic deed in David's behalf (II Sam. 23:15-17) are especially noted concerning him. A comparison of I Chronicles 11:12 with II Samuel 23:11,33 makes it appear evident that Shammah's name (as one of the three mightiest) has been accidentally omitted from the former passage.

4. One of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:33); also called Shammoth (pl. of Shammah) (I Chron. 11:27) and Shamhuth (I Chron. 27:8). Some consider him the same person as 3.

SHAMMAI (shăm'ā-ī, Heb. shammay, contraction of shema'yâ, Jehovah has heard), the name of three descendants of Judah: 1. A son of Onam, who was the son of Jerahmeel by Atarah; father of Nadab and Abishur (I Chron. 2:28,32).

2. A son of Redem and father of Maon (I Chron. 2:44f); a descendant of "Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel" (I Chron. 2:42).

3. A descendant of Ezrah [so Heb. and ASV; AV has Ezra] (I Chron. 4:17f). The text here is extremely ambiguous and uncertain; probably, by a transposition, Shammai was the son of Mered by Bithiah, Pharaoh's daughter (I Chron. 4:18).

SHAMMOTH (shăm'ŏth, Heb. shammôth, desolation), one of David's mighty men of war (I Chron. 11:27); apparently the same as Shammah (II Sam. 23:25) and Shamhuth (I Chron. 27:8).

SHAMMUA (shă-mū'à, Heb. shammû'a, heard or renowned). 1. The son of Zaccur, a spy, representing the tribe of Reuben, sent out to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:4).

2. A son of David by Bath-sheba; brother of Solomon (II Sam. 5:14 [KJV has Shammuah]; I Chron. 14:4), or Shimea (I Chron. 3:5).

3. A Levite; father of Abda (or Obadiah) (Neh. 11:17 = Shemaiah in I Chron. 9:16).

4. The representative of the priestly family of Bilgah (I Chron. 24:14; Neh. 12:5,18 = Bilgai in Neh. 10:8); a priest, whose father returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:1-7), officiating in the high priesthood of Joiakim (Neh. 12:12).

SHAMMUAH (shă-mū'à, Heb. shammû'a), son of David (II Sam. 5:14 = Shammua in I Chron. 14:4 [KJV] and Shimea in I Chron. 3:5 [KJV]).

SHAMSHERAI (shăm'shē-rī, Heb. shamsheray, [?] sunlike), the first named of six sons of Jeroham; a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:26).

SHAPHAM (shā'făm, Heb. shāphām), a Gadite who lived in Bashan, second in authority in the time of Jotham (I Chron. 5:12).

SHAPHAN (shā'făn, Heb. shāphām, hyrax or rock rabbit), the faithful scribe during Josiah's reign (II Kings 22:3-20; II Chron. 34:8-28). The record cites four responsibilities that he faithfully performed: (1) his oversight of the finances of the repairs of the temple (II Chron. 34:8-13,16f); (2) his transmission of the newly discovered law-book to Josiah (II Chron. 34:14f); (3) his reading of this book before Josiah (II Chron. 34:18); (4) his mission, with others, to carry Josiah's message to the propheteess Huldah (II Chron. 34:20-28). Shaphan's faith is seen in the names he gave his sons: Ahikim (my brother has risen up); Gemariah (Jehovah has accomplished); Elasah (God has made); Jaazaniah (Jehovah hearkens). Shaphan's faith is seen in his son's lives: Ahikim, who accompanied his father on the mission to Huldah (II Chron. 34:20ff) and later became Jeremiah's protector (Jer. 26:24); Elasah, who, with others, transmitted Jeremiah's message to exiles in Babylon (Jer. 29:1-3); Gemariah, who resisted destructive attempts against Jeremiah's writings (Jer. 36:10,12,25); but Jaazaniah did not possess his father's faith (Ezek. 8:11). Two sons of Ahikim, however, continued their grandfather's faith: Micaiah (Jer. 36:11-13) and Gedaliah (Jer. 39:14; 40:5f,9,11f; 43:6).

SHAPHAT (shā'făt, Heb. shāphāt, he has judged). 1. The son of Hori, who was chosen from the tribe of Simeon to spy out the land of Canaan (Num. 13:5).

2. The father of Elisha the prophet (I Kings 19:16,19; II Kings 3:11; 6:31).

3. A Gadite chief in Bashan (I Chron. 5:12).

4. The son of Adlai, one of David's herdsmen (I Chron. 27:29).

5. The last named son of Shemaiah, a descendant of the royal line of David (I Chron. 3:22). (Shemaiah's sons are here said to be six in number; but the fact that only five are actually named shows that one name has been lost in the process of the transmission of the text.) W.B.

SHAPHER (shā'fĕr, Heb. shepher [ASV more correctly renders Shepher], beauty), the name of a mountain between Kehelathah and Haradah at which the Israelites encamped in their wilderness wanderings (Num. 33:23). It is otherwise unknown and unidentified.

SHAPHIR (See Saphir)

SHARAI (shȧ-rā'ī, Heb. shārāy), a "son" of Bani; mentioned in a list of men who, at Ezra's command, divorced their foreign wives (Ezra 10:10, 40,44).

SHARAIM (shȧ-rā'ĭm, Heb. sha'ărayim, two gates), a town in Judah (Josh. 15:36, AV); see Shaaraim.

SHARAR (shā'rêr, Aram. shārār, firm), the father of Ahiam the Hararite; one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:33 = Sacar in I Chron. 11:35).

SHARE (Heb. maharesheth, plowshare), an agricultural instrument mentioned only in I Samuel 13:20 [LXX has "a reaping-hook"; other versions differ considerably].

SHAREZER (shȧ-rē'zêr, Heb. sar'etser, Assyr. Shar-usur, protect the king), 1. A son of the Assyrian king Sennacherib, who, with his brother Adrammelech, slew his father (II Kings 19:37 = Isa. 37:38).

2. A contemporary of Zechariah the prophet and member of a delegation sent from Bethel to Jerusalem (Zech. 7:2 = Sherezer in KJV).

SHARON (shăr'ŭn, Heb. shārôn [always with definite article except in I Chron. 5:16], plain). 1. The coastal plain between Joppa and Mount Carmel, a place proverbial in ancient times for its fertility, pasturage and beauty (I Chron. 27:29; S. of Sol. 2:1; Isa. 35:2); the location of such towns as Dor, Lydda (Acts 9:35), Joppa, Caesarea and Antipatris.

2. The suburbs (ASVm "pasture lands") of Sharon possessed by the tribe of Gad (I Chron. 5:16).

3. Lassharon q.v. (Josh. 12:18).

4. Figuratively, (a) of man's state of regeneracy — fruitfulness and glory (Isa. 35:2); (b) of man's eternal state — of peace for evermore (Isa. 65:10,17).

SHARONITE (shăr'ŭn-īt, Heb. shārônî, of Sharon), a description applied to Shitrai, David's chief herdsman in the plain of Sharon; the only Sharonite mentioned in the Bible (I Chron. 27:29).

SHARUHEN (shȧ-rōō'hĕn, Heb. shārûḥen), an ancient town in SW Palestine, S of Gaza and W of Beersheba; assigned to the tribe of Simeon within Judah's territory (Josh. 19:6; cf. Gen. 49:7); apparently the same as Silhim (Josh. 15:32) and Shaarim (I Chron. 4:31). See Shaarim. Now identified with Tell el-Fār'ah.

SHASHAI (shā'shī, Heb. shāshay, whitish or noble), a "son" of Bani; listed among those men who, at Ezra's command, divorced their foreign wives (Ezra 10:40).

SHASHAK (shā'shăk, Heb. shāshaq), a Benjamite, son of Beriah (I Chron. 8:14f); father of 11 sons (I Chron. 8:22-25).

SHAUL, SHAULITES (shā'ŭl, shā'ŭ-līts, Heb. shā'ûl, asked [of Jehovah]; shā'ûlî, of Shaul). 1. The sixth in a list of eight kings that ruled over Edom (Gen. 36:37f [Saul in AV] = I Chron. 1:48f).

2. A son of Simeon (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15; Num. 26:13; I Chron. 4:24). He is called "the son of a Canaanitish woman" (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:

15). Thus the Shaulites (Num. 26:13), who descended from him, were of mixed blood.

3. A descendant of Levi; son of Uzziah; ancestor of Samuel (I Chron. 6:24 = Joel in vs. 36).

SHAVEH, VALLEY OF (shā'vĕ, Heb. shāwēh, a plain), also called "the king's dale"; a place near Salem (i.e., Jerusalem [Ps. 76:2]), where, after rescuing his nephew Lot, Abraham met the king of Sodom (Gen. 14:17). Identified by some as the same place where Absalom erected a memorial to himself (II Sam. 18:18).

SHAVEH-KIRIATHAIM (shā'vĕ-kĭr' yà-thā'ĭm, Heb. shāwēh qiryāthayim, the plain of Kiriathaim [i.e., "twin cities"]), a plain where Chedorlaomer smote the Emim (Gen. 14:5), probably located on the E of the Dead Sea (cf. Num. 32:37).

SHAVING. The act of shaving is represented by the Hebrew words gāzaz, to shear (used of animals except in Job 1:20 [of man's head]; Jer. 7:29 [fig., of Jerusalem]; Mic. 1:16 [of a woman's, i.e., Jerusalem's, hair]; Nah. 1:12 ["cut down" = destruction by the Assyrians; cf. Isa. 7:20 below]), gālaḥ (used only of human shaving; in KJV = poll" [II Sam. 14:26], shave, shave off, be shaven), 'āvar ta'ar, to cause a razor to pass over (as in Num. 6:5; 8:7); and by the Greek word xyrao (only in I Cor. 11:5f; Acts 21:24 in NT). The priests (Lev. 21:5; Ezek. 44:20) and the Nazirites (Num. 6:5; cf. I Sam. 1:11) among the Israelites were prohibited from shaving; furthermore, the Hebrews as a people, in contrast to surrounding nations, generally accepted the beard as a sign of dignity (cf. II Sam. 10:4f). Shaving had these connotations: (1) an act of contrition (Job 1:20); (2) an accommodation to a custom (Gen. 41:14; cf. I Cor. 11:5f); (3) an act of consecration for Levites (Num. 6:9; 8:7); (4) an act of cleansing for lepers (Lev. 14:8f; 13:32ff); (5) an act completing a vow (Num. 6:18; Acts 18:18; 21:24); (6) an act of commitment of a captive woman (Deut. 21:12); (7) an act of conspiracy against a man's Nazirite vow (Judg. 16:19); (8) an act of contempt (II Sam. 10:4 = I Chron. 19:4); (9) an act, fig. expressed, of cleansing a corrupt nation (Isa. 7:20; cf. 1:16; 6:5; and II Kings 18:13ff).

SHAVSHA (shăv'shà, Heb. shawshā'), David's secretary of state (I Chron. 18:16 = Shisha in I Kings 4:3 = Seraiah in II Sam. 8:17 = Sheva in II Sam. 20:25).

SHEAF (Heb. 'ălummâh, 'ōmer, 'āmîr). The sheaf was a handful of grain left behind the reaper (Jer. 9:22, RSV), gathered and bound usually by children or women (Ruth 2:7,15) in a joyous mood (Ps. 126:6; 129:7f). Thus stacked they became dry and inflammable (Zech. 12:6; cf. Judg. 15:1-5, ASV); but they were beautiful sights (S. of Sol. 7:2). A donkey (Neh. 13:15) or a heavily loaded cart (Amos 2:13) bore these bundles to the threshing-floor (Ruth 3:6f; Mic. 4:12). Some sheaves, however, were left behind for the poor (Deut. 24:19; cf. Ruth 2:7,15; Job 24:10). The sheaf of the first-fruit (Lev. 23:10-15; cf. II Chron. 31:5-10) typically represents: (1) Christians, as representatives of a larger harvest (Rom. 16:5; I Cor. 16:15; James 1:18), possessed by the Spirit (Rom. 8:23), and dedicated to God (Rev. 14:1-5); (2) Christ, as an evidence of the believer's later resurrection (I Cor. 15:20,23).

SHEAL (shē'ăl, Heb. she'āl, asking), a "son" of Bani; listed among those who divorced their foreign wives (Ezra 10:29).

SHEALTIEL (shē'ăl'tĭ-ĕl, Heb. she'altî'ēl, I have asked God), the father of Zerubbabel (Ezra 3:2, 8; 5:2; Neh. 12:1; Hag. 1:1,12,14; 2:2,23 = Salathiel in I Chron. 3:17; Matt. 1:12; Luke 3:27). The apparent discrepancy between I Chronicles 3:17 and Luke 3:27 and the other passages cited is explained by the supposition that the childless Sheatiel adopted Zerubbabel, the son of his brother Pedaiah, as his legal son.

SHEARIAH (shē'à-rī'à, Heb. she'aryâh, Jehovah esteems), one of the sons of Azel; a descendant of Jonathan (I Chron. 8:38; 9:44).

SHEARING HOUSE (Heb. bêth 'ēqedh hārō'îm, house of binding of the shepherds, i.e., binding-house of the shepherds), the place between Jezreel and Samaria where Jehu met and slaughtered 42 unsuspecting members of the royal house of Ahaziah, king of Judah, while they were on their way, apparently ignorant of Jehu's revolt, to Ahaziah, who was visiting Joram, the wounded king of Israel (II Kings 10:12-14). The corpses were cast into a pit (Heb. bôr; cf. its use in Gen. 37:24; Jer. 41:7,9). A possible identification of Bêth-'ēqedh hārō'îm, is Kufr Ra'i, the Ra'i supposedly preserving the Heb. word for "shepherds (rô'îm).

SHEAR-JASHUB (shē'ar-jà'shŭb, Heb. she'ār yāshûv, a remnant shall return), the symbolic name of Isaiah's oldest son (Isa. 7:3; 8:18). The symbolism is reflected in the historic return from Babylon and is fulfilled in the spiritual return to the Lord at Messiah's advent (Isa. 1:9; 4:3f; 10:20-23; 65:8f; Rom. 11:5f,16-29).

SHEBA (shē'bà, Heb. shevā', seven, an oath). 1. A chief of a Gadite family (I Chron. 5:13).

2. A town allotted to Simeon (Josh. 19:2). Some suppose it to be a corruption of Shema (cf. LXX and Josh. 15:26); others, in view of its absence in I Chronicles 4:28, which gives a similar summation (cf. Josh. 19:2-6), suppose either that it is a variant form of Beer-sheba (see ASV) or that it has been accidentally introduced by the process known as dittography.

3. The son of Birchi, a Benjamite. Motivated by jealousy over the rising power of the Tribe of Judah, as represented by David, Sheba inspired a short-lived insurrection against the kingship of David. Finally cornered by Joab in Abel-beth-maachah, Sheba met an unexpected end when the inhabitants of Abel-beth-maachah, at the behest of a wise woman, threw Sheba's head over the town's wall and thus pacified the wrath of Joab and brought the rebellion to an inglorious end. As a result, David's rule over all Israel was considerably strengthened (II Sam. 20).

4. A son of Raamah, son of Cush (Gen. 10:7; I Chron. 1:9).

5. A son of Joktan; grandson of Eber (Gen. 10:28; I Chron. 1:22); the probable founder of the kingdom of the Sabeans (Sheba) in S. Arabia (see below).

6. The oldest son of Jokshan, Abraham's son by Keturah (Gen. 25:3; I Chron. 1:32). It is probable that this man's descendants, by intermarriage or otherwise, finally became identified with the descendants of 4 and 5; together they constitute what is called the kingdom of Sheba or the Sabeans. These people, known particularly by the Queen of Sheba and her illustrious visit to King Solomon (I Kings 10:1-13; II Chron. 9:1-12; Matt. 12:42), are pictured in the Bible as traders in precious stones and incense (Isa. 60:6; Jer. 6:20; Ezek. 27:22; 38:13) and in slaves (Job 1:15; Joel 3:8).

SHEBAH (shē'bà, Heb. shiv'âh, seven or oath), the name of a well which the servants of Isaac dug. The town Beer-sheba, i.e. "well of the oath" is so called from this well (Gen. 26:31-33 but cf. 21: 28-31.

SHEBAM (shē'băm, Heb. sevām, sweet smell), a town in Reuben (Num. 32:3) called also "Shibmah" (Num. 32:38). ASV "Sebam" and "Sibmah" are more acceptable. E of the Dead Sea, but exact location unknown. Cf. Isaiah 16:8,9.

SHEBANIAH (shĕb'à-nī'à, Heb. shevanyâh, meaning uncertain). 1. One of seven priests appointed to blow trumpets before the ark of the covenant when it was brought to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:24).

2. One of the Levites who led the people in praising God in Nehemiah's time and later signed the covenant with him (Neh. 9:4,5; 10:10).

3. Another Levite who was among the covenanters (Neh. 10:12).

4. A priest who was among the covenanters (Neh. 10:4).

5. The head of a family of priests who served in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. 12:14).

SHEBARIM (shĕb'à-rĭm, Heb. shevārîm, breaches, or ASV margin quarries), a place to which the men of Ai chased the soldiers of Israel (Josh. 7:5).

SHEBAT (See Sebat)

SHEBER (shē'bêr, Heb. shever), son of Caleb (not the famous spy) by his concubine Maachah (I Chron. 2:48).

SHEBNA (shĕb'nà, Heb. shevnā'). 1. Steward of Hezekiah (Isa. 22:15-21) who, in pride, had made a sepulchre for himself. For his pride, the Lord predicted that he would toss him like a ball into a far country where he would die, and his place would be taken by the godly Eliakim (Isa. 22:22, Rev. 3:7).

2. A scribe, also in Hezekiah's time, who went out with others to face the Rabshakeh, the emissary of Sennacherib (Isa. 36:3-37:2, II Kings 18).

SHEBUEL (shē-bū'ĕl, Heb. shevū'ēl). 1. A chief Levite in the time of David, descended from Moses through his son Gershom (I Chron. 23:16; 26:24), placed over the treasures. In I Chronicles 24:20 "Shubael."

2. One of the sons of Heman, chief musician in David's service of praise (I Chron. 25:4), also called Shubael in 25:20. Heman had 14 sons and three daughters, all in the choir.

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAH (shĕk-ă-nī'à, Heb. shekhanyâh, dweller with Jehovah). 1. Head of the tenth of the 24 courses of priests in the days of David. The priests had so multiplied that David divided them thus, giving two-thirds of the courses to descendants of Eleazar and one-third to descendants of Ithamar, the sons of Aaron (I Chron. 24:11).

2. An almoner of Hezekiah for the priests in their cities (II Chron. 31:15), the priests deriving their support principally from the oblations of the people.

3. A descendant of David in the time of the Restoration, and head of a house (I Chron. 3:21,22).

4. A descendant of Parosh, whose descendant Zechariah returned with Ezra leading 150 men (Ezra 8:3).

5. A son of Jehaziel (Ezra 8:5) who led back 300 men.

6. A son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam, who first made confession to Ezra of having married foreign women, and who proposed that a covenant be made and that the foreign wives and children be put away (Ezra 10:2-4).

7. The keeper of the E gate of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah. His son Shemaiah was one who helped repair the wall (Neh. 3:29).

8. Son of Arah, and father-in-law to Tobiah, the notorious foe of Nehemiah at the time of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 6:18). The fact that he had given his daughter to Tobiah the Ammonite was proof of his unworthiness.

9. One of the chiefs of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:3).

SHECHEM (shē'kĕm, Heb. shekhem, shoulder), a personal name and the name of a district and city in the hill-country of Ephraim in N central Palestine. The city makes its initial appearance in Biblical history as the first place in Canaan to be mentioned in connection with Abram's arrival in the land. Here the Lord appeared to Abram and promised the land to his descendants; Abraham responded with the building of an altar (Gen. 12: 6-7). When Jacob returned from Paddan-Aram he settled down at Shechem and purchased land from the sons of Hamor (Gen. 33:18-19; Josh. 24:32). In Genesis 33-34 it is seen that Shechem was the name of the city and also of the prince of the city. It appears that the names Shechem and Hamor are hereditary names or perhaps a kind of title (cf. Judg. 9:28). While Jacob was at Shechem the unfortunate incident of Dinah occurred and Simeon and Levi, her full brothers, exacted drastic revenge on the city (Gen. 34). It was at Shechem that the brothers of Joseph were herding Jacob's flock when Joseph was sent to check on their welfare (Gen. 37:12-14). The city is not referred to again until the listing of the tribal divisions of the land after the conquest (Josh. 17:7); Shechem was in the territory allotted to Ephraim. It was selected by Joshua as one of the cities of refuge (Josh. 20:7; 21:21; I Chron. 6:67). Here Joshua gave his farewell address (Josh. 24:1) and made a covenant with the people (vs. 25). Joseph was buried in the plot of ground which his father Jacob had purchased here (Josh. 24:32).

One of the interesting personages in the kaleidoscopic history of Judges, Abimelech, the son of Gideon and a concubine, is closely associated with Shechem. Abimelech conspired with his mother's relatives to kill all the other sons of Gideon and to have himself made king of Shechem (Judg. 9: 6). Trouble developed between Abimelech and the people of Shechem; a conspiracy against Abimelech was revealed to him by the ruler of the city. In the fighting which followed, Abimelech took the city and completely destroyed it. When a number of people took final refuge in the stronghold of the temple of Baal-berith or El-berith, Abimelech gathered fuel and fired the stronghold, so that about 1000 persons perished in the conflagration (9:46-49). After the death of Solomon, his son Rehoboam went to Shechem to be made king by all Israel (I Kings 12:1; II Chron. 10:1); when the principles of his prospective administration were challenged by Jeroboam, Rehoboam followed the disastrous advice of his impetuous, youthful counselors and thus caused the rupture of the kingdom. Jeroboam became king of ten tribes and "built Shechem in the hill country of Ephraim" (I Kings 12:25) as his captital. The city is mentioned in parallel passages in the Psalms (Psa. 60:6; 108:7) and is named in a list of prophetic condemnations against Israel (Hosea 6:9). After the destruction of Jerusalem, men from Shechem and other cities came to Mizpah to be under the protection of Gedaliah and there were deceived and slain by Ishmael (Jer. 44:5ff.). The city is not certainly mentioned again in the Bible, but the conversation of Jesus and the Samaritan woman (John 4) occurred in this vicinity. It has been suggested that the Sychar (usually identified as modern Askar) of John 4:5 should be read Sychem (Shechem; cf. Acts 7:16), with the Old Syriac Gospels. In A.D. 72 the city was rebuilt as Flavia Neapolis, from which the name of the present village of Nablus is derived.

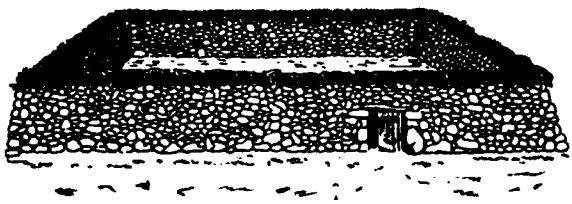
The name Shechem occurs in historical records and other sources outside Palestine. It is mentioned as a city captured by Senusert III of Egypt (19th century B.C.) and appears in the Egyptian cursing texts of about the same time. "The mountain of Shechem" is referred to incidentally in a satirical letter of the 19th Dynasty. Shechem also figures in the Amarna Letters; its ruler, Lab'ayu, and his sons are accused of acting against Egypt, though he protests that he is devotedly loyal to the pharaoh. The site of the ancient city is Tell Balatah, just E of Nablus. The tell has a mixed archeological history: E. Sellin began work here in 1913 and resumed it in 1926. In 1928 G. Welter succeeded him as director; in 1934 the seventh and final campaign of the German archeologists was in charge of H. Steckeweh, whose labors are of particular value because the previous work had shown inadequate handling of both pottery, chronology and stratigraphy. In spite of limitations, the work produced some important results. In the first campaign a triple gate of Middle Bronze date was found in the NW section of the city; nearby, unearthed in 1926, was a large temple which has been identified as the temple of Baal-berith. In 1926 the eastern gate of the city was found, along with part of the city-wall. Middle Bronze Shechem had a fine battered (sloping) wall of cyclopean masonry, found standing to a maximum height of 10 meters, with some of its stones over two meters long. Hyksos type fortifications also occur at Shechem, with ramparts of beaten earth (terre pisée). Several cuneiform tablets of the Amarna age add to the store of written materials from Palestine. In 1934 a limestone plaque bearing a representation of a serpent goddess and an inscription in alphabetic script was found. The most recent work at Balatah is that of the Drew-McCormick Expedition (1956-), with G. Ernest Wright as director. The first two seasons (1956, 1957) were devoted to a study of the fortifications and of the temple area. In 1960 work was continued on the temple and the palace underlying it and the expedition set for its objective the recovering of the stratigraphy of the city in a residential complex. It is of great interest that the excavators conclude that the temple of Baal-berith (Judges 9:4), "the house of Millo" (9:6), and the "tower" (9:46 ff.) are designations of the same temple-citadel structure. It is significant for the chronology of Judges that it appears that the events of Judges 9 are to be dated to the first half of the 12th century. Considerable work for the future is outlined by staff members of the expedition. C.E.D.

SHECHINAH (See Shekinah)

SHEDEUR (shĕd'ē-êr, Heb. shedhê'ûr, caster forth of light), a Reubenite, the father of Elizur, prince of Reuben (Num. 1:5; 2:10; 7:30; 10:18).

SHEEP (See Animals)



A sheepfold built of rough stone walls. DV

SHEEPCOTE, SHEEPFOLD (Heb. gedhērâh, mikhlâh, mishpethayin, nāweh; Gr. aulé), an enclosure intended for the protection of sheep and also to keep them from wandering out and getting lost. These folds were simple walled enclosures, usually without roofs, with the walls covered with thorns to keep out robbers. Several flocks would usually pass the night in one fold under the care of a shepherd who guarded the door. Each shepherd knew his own sheep and was known by them.

SHEEP GATE (Heb. sha'ar ha-tsō'n), a gate of Jerusalem mentioned in Nehemiah 3:1,32; 12:39. It was probably near the NE corner of the wall as Nehemiah built it, but about one-fourth mile inward from the present NE corner of the wall.

SHEEP MARKET, not mentioned in the Greek NT but possibly implied in John 5:2. The Greek simply means something that pertains to the sheep.

SHEEPMASTER (See Occupations & Professions)

SHEEP-SHEARER (See Occupations & Professions)

SHEERAH (See Sherah)

SHEET, a large piece of linen (Acts 10:11; 11:5). The word used indicates the material rather than its use. In Judges 14:12,13 "sheets" in KJV probably means "linen undergarments," though ASV has merely "linen garments." Cf. Proverbs 31:24.

SHEHARIAH (shē-hà-rī'à, Heb. sheharyâh), one of the sons of Jeroham, a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:26) listed among the early inhabitants of Jerusalem after the captivity.

SHEKEL (See Money)

SHEKINAH (shē-kī'nà, Heb. shekhînâh, dwelling of God), a word, though not occurring in the Bible, that is employed by some Jews and by Christians to describe the visible presence of Jehovah. It is alluded to in such places as Isaiah 60:2 by the phrase "his glory" and in Romans 9:4 by the phrase "the glory." Moses calls this the "cloud" in Exodus 14:19. Its first appearance occurred for a twofold purpose when Israel was being led by Moses out of Egypt. It hid the Israelites from the pursuing Egyptians and lighted the way at night for Israel (Exod. 13:21; 14:19-20). To the Egyptians it was a cloud of darkness, but to Israel a cloud of light. It later covered Sinai when God spoke with Moses (Exod. 24:15-18), filled the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34:35), guided Israel (Exod. 40:36-38), filled Solomon's temple (II Chron. 7:1) and was frequently seen in connection with Christ's ministry in the NT (Matt. 17:5; Acts 1:9).

H.Z.C.

SHELAH, SHELANITE (shē'là, Heb. shēlâh, Gr. Sála; Heb. shē'là-nīt, sprout). 1. Son of Arpachshad and father of Eber among the early Semites (Gen. 10:24); written Salah in KJV, and Sala in Luke 3:35 KJV.

2. From another root meaning a petition, the third son of Judah (Gen. 38:5-26). The Shelanites were named from him. (Num. 26:20).

SHELEMIAH (shĕl-ĕ-mī'à, Heb. shelemyâh, Gr. Selemiá, friend of Jehovah). 1. Door-keeper at the E side of the house of God in David's time (I Chron. 26:14). In the previous verses of this chapter, he is called Meshelemiah.

2. The son of Cushi and grandfather of Jehudi whom the princes of Jehoiakim sent to Baruch, Jeremiah's secretary (Jer. 36:14).

3. One of the three whom Jehoiakim sent to arrest Baruch and Jeremiah, the prophet (Jer. 36:26).

4. The father of Jehucal or Jucal whom Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah to ask his prayers (Jer. 37:3, cf. 38:1).

5. Son of Hananiah and father of Irijah, a captain of the ward who arrested Jeremiah on a false charge as Jeremiah was about to leave Jerusalem (Jer. 37:13).

6. Two men of the family of Bani in the days of Ezra who had taken foreign wives and who were compelled to give them up in order to purify Israel (Ezra 10:39,41).

7. Father of Hananiah, a repairer of the wall (Neh. 3:30).

8. A priestly treasurer in Nehemiah's day (Neh. 13:13).

SHELEPH (shē'lĕf, Heb. shāleph), a son of Joktan and head of an Arab tribe named for him (Gen. 10:26).

SHELESH (shē'lĕsh, Heb. shēlesh), son of Helem, an early descendant of Asher, son of Jacob (I Chron. 7:35).

SHELOMI (shē-lo'mī, Heb. shelōmî, at peace), father of Ahihud, a prince of the tribe of Asher whom the Lord appointed to help divide the land (Num. 34:27).

SHELOMITH, SHELOMOTH (shē-lō'mĭth, shē-lō'mŏth, Heb. shelōmîth, shelōmôth, peaceful). 1. A daughter of Dibri of the tribe of Dan, in the days of Moses. She had married an Egyptian and their half-breed son was executed for blasphemy (Lev. 24:10-12,23).

2. A chief Kohathite Levite and a cousin of Miriam, Aaron and Moses (I Chron. 23:18).

3. A leading Gershonite Levite in David's time (I Chron. 23:9).

4. A descendant of Moses through his son Eliezer (I Chron. 26:25). David set him and his brethren over the things which were set apart to Jehovah to maintain his house.

5. A son or daughter of Rehoboam, king of Judah (II Chron. 11:20), and therefore brother or sister of King Abijah of Judah.

6. Daughter of Zerubbabel (not the great Zerubbabel who led back the Jews at the behest of Cyprus, but his cousin, both named "Zerubbabel" i.e. "born in Babylon") and sister of Meshullam and Hananiah (I Chron. 3:19).

7. Ancestor of a family of 160 men who returned with Ezra in 457 B.C. (Ezra 8:10). LXX has "of the sons of Bani, Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah," while the Hebrew text followed by the English is obscure.

SHELUMIEL (shē-lū'mī-ĕl, Heb. shelumî'ēl, God is peace), a chief Simeonite in the days of Moses who helped take the census and who presented an oblation for Simeon (Num. 1:6; 7:36).

SHEM (shĕm, Gr. sém, name, fame), second son of Noah, and progenitor of the Semitic race, was born 98 years before the Flood (Gen. 11:10) and lived six hundred years, outliving his descendants for nine generations excepting Eber and Abraham. In the racial prophecy which Noah made after the event of his drunkenness (Gen. 9:25-27), he mentions "Jehovah, God of Shem." The three great monotheistic religions, Judaism, Christianity and Islam, all had Semitic origins, and Noah added concerning Japheth that his descendants would "dwell in the tents of Shem," indicating that the Aryan peoples to a large extent have derived their civilization from the Semites. In the "Table of the nations" (Gen. 10) Shem is given five sons, of whom Arpachshad (KJV "Arphaxad") was clearly an individual and the others are peoples or progenitors of peoples: e.g., "Lud" refers to the Lydians in Asia Minor, "Elam" points to the Elamites who lived E of the Tigris river; "Aram" means the Aramaeans or Syrians who lived in Syria and Mesopotamia and "Asshur" is Assyria. Scoffers pointed out a century ago that "Asshur" is mentioned also in the Hamite list (10:11), but archaeologists have found Hamitic artifacts under Semitic ruins of Assyrian cities. Shem, Ham and Japheth probably differed only as brothers do, but their descendants are quite distinct. A.B.F.

SHEMA (shē'mà, Heb. shemā', fame, rumor). 1. A town in the southern part of Judah (Josh. 15:26).

2. Son of Hebron of the descendants of Caleb in Judah, and father of Raham (I Chron. 2:44).

3. Son of Joel and father of Azaz in the genealogy of the Reubenites (I Chron. 5:8).

4. A Benjamite, head of a father's house in Benjamin who lived at Aijalon and put to flight the inhabitants of Gath (I Chron. 8:13).

5. One who stood at the right hand of Ezra in the revival in Jerusalem when Ezra read the book of the law to the people (Neh. 8:4).

6. "Shema" is the Hebrew name for Deuteronomy 6:4, probably the most often quoted verse in the Bible, as every good Jew repeats it several times every day — "Hear, O Israel: the Lord our God is one Lord."

SHEMAAH (shē-mā'à, shemā'âh, fame), a man of Gibeah of Benjamin whose two sons helped David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:3).

SHEMAIAH (shē-mā'yà, Heb. shem'yâh, Jehovah has heard). 1. A prince among the families of the tribe of Simeon (I Chron. 4:37).

2. A Reubenite, son of Joel (I Chron. 5:4), possibly the same as Shema of verse 8.

3. A chief Levite of the sons of Elizaphan in the days of David (I Chron. 15:8,11).

4. A Levite scribe in the days of David; son of Nethaneel, who recorded the courses of the priests (I Chron. 24:6).

5. Also in David's time, the first-born son of Obed-edom and father of mighty men among the door-keepers of the house of God (I Chron. 26: 4,6,7).

6. A brave prophet of God who forbade Rehoboam, king of Judah, to go against the house of Israel in the N (I Kings 12:22-24). Shemaiah later wrote a biography of Rehoboam which has been lost (II Chron. 12:15).

7. A descendant of David, related to the Messianic line (I Chron. 3:22) and the father of five or six sons.

8. A Merarite Levite in the days of Nehemiah, who dwelt in Jerusalem (I Chron. 9:14; Neh. 12: 18).

9. A Levite, son of Galal and a descendant of Elkanah, mentioned among the first inhabitants who returned from exile (I Chron. 9:16). In Nehemiah 11:17 he is called "Shammua."

10. A Levite whom King Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the towns of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

11. One of the Levites who cleansed the temple in the days of Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:14).

12. A Levite who was appointed to assist in the distribution of food to the cities of the priests in the days of Hezekiah (II Chron. 31:15).

13. A chief Levite in the days of Josiah who assisted in the great passover (II Chron. 35:9).

14. A leader of the Levites who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:13).

15. One whom Ezra sent back for ministers (Ezra 8:16), possibly the same as the preceding.

16. A son of the priests, who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:21).

17. Another, guilty of the same sin (Ezra 10: 31).

18. Son of Shecaniah, keeper of the E gate of Jerusalem, who helped rebuild the wall (Neh. 3: 29).

19. One who tried to intimidate Nehemiah (Neh. 6:10).

20. A priest who signed the covenant (Neh. 10:8).

21. A priest or Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:6).

22. A musical priest in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:36).

23. A priest who assisted in the celebration of the completing of the wall, possibly the same as the preceding (Neh. 12:42).

24. The father of Uriah the prophet, whom Jehoiakim, king of Judah slew for prophesying against the sins of Jerusalem (Jer. 26:20).

25. A false prophet who fought against Jeremiah to his own hurt and therefore was not to see God's blessing nor to leave any seed (Jer. 29:24-32).

26. The father of Delaiah, one of the princes in the days of Jehoiakim, who heard the words of the prophet (Jer. 36:12).

SHEMARIAH (shĕm-à-rī'à, Heb. shemaryâh, Jehovah keeps). 1. One of the mighty men of Benjamin who joined David while he was at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

2. A son of Rehoboam, king of Judah by his cousin Mahalath, a granddaughter of David (II Chron. 11:19).

3. One of the family of Harim who married a foreign wife and was compelled by Ezra to put her away (Ezra 10:32).

4. One of the sons of Bani who had been likewise guilty (Ezra 10:41). In KJV (II Chron. 11: 19) sometimes spelled Shamariah.

SHEMEBER (shĕm-ē'bĕr, Heb. shem'ever), king of Zeboiim, a city in the vicinity of the Dead Sea in the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:2). He rebelled against Chedorlaomer of Elam.

SHEMER (shē'mĕr, Heb. shemer, guard), owner of a hill in central Palestine which Omri, king of Israel, bought and fortified and named after its former owner, Samaria (I Kings 16:24). Shamar in KJV of Chronicles.

SHEMIDA, SHEMIDAH (shē-mī'dà, Heb. shemîdhā'), an early member of the tribe of Manasseh through Gilead, and therefore inheriting land E of the Jordan (Num. 26:32, Josh. 17:2). He had four sons (I Chron. 7:19).

SHEMIDAITES (shē-mī'dà-īts, Heb. shemîdhā'), the family descended from Shemida q.v. (Num. 26:32; Josh. 17:2), belonging to the half-tribe of Manasseh.

SHEMINITH (shĕm'ĭ-nĭth, eighth, i.e. the octave, and meaning the lower octave), a musical term. The harps tuned to the "sheminith" were to be used with men's voices (I Chron. 15:21, titles for Pss. 6 and 12).

SHEMIRAMOTH (shē-mĭr'ȧ-mŏth, Heb. shemîrāmôth). 1. One of the second degree Levites under David, for music (I Chron. 15:18,20).

2. One of the teaching Levites appointed by King Jehoshaphat to teach in Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

SHEMUEL (shĕ-mū'ĕl, Heb. shemû'ēl, name of God), the same as Samuel in Hebrew. 1. A Simeonite, divider of Canaan under Joshua (Num. 34:20).

2. Samuel, here spelled Shemuel in KJV (I Chron. 6:33)

3. The head of a house in Issachar (I Chron. 7:2).

SHEN (shĕn, Heb. ha-shēn, tooth or pointed rock), a sharp rock a short distance W of Jerusalem near which Samuel set up the monument of victory which he called "Ebenezer" (I Sam. 7:12).

SHENAZAR (shē-năz'ȧr, Heb. shen'atsar), a son of Jeconiah, i.e. Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, born in captivity (I Chron. 3:18). ASV has it more correctly Shenazzar.

SHENIR (shē'nĕr, Heb. senîr, shenîr), the Amorite name for Mount Hermon, a place of fir trees (Ezek. 27:5), one of the limits of the half-tribe Manasseh (I Chron. 5:23). KJV, Deuteronomy 3:9 and Song of Solomon have "Shenir," but the Hebrew and ASV have uniformly "Senir."

SHEOL (shē'ōl, Heb. she'ôl), the OT name for the place of departed souls, corresponding to the NT word "Hades." The word occurs 65 times in the Hebrew OT and is rendered in KJV 31 times "hell," 31 times "grave," and three times "pit." The reason for this variety of translation is that "hell" is ordinarily thought of as a place of punishment, and so "grave" is substituted when the reference is to the souls of good men; e.g., Jacob said that he would go down into the "grave" mourning for his son (Gen. 37:35), and Job prayed "Oh that thou wouldest hide me in the grave" (Job 14:13). In ASV, the word is not translated but merely transliterated "Sheol," without any attempt to theorize as to its meaning. Sheol is represented as being inside the earth. Numbers 16:30,33 pictures the earth opening and swallowing up Korah and his company so that they went down alive into Sheol. Amos 9:2-4 names five places in which the enemies of Jehovah might attempt to hide from him, but from whence he would bring them. Though the original sense may refer merely to a hollow place, it is quite commonly thought of as a place of punishment; e.g. "The wicked shall be turned into Sheol (Ps. 9:17), and certainly of severe discomfort (Ps. 116:3), "The pains of Sheol gat hold upon me," though the Messianic prophecy of Psalm 16:10, "For thou wilt not leave my soul to Sheol," quoted in the first Christian sermon (Acts 2:27), certainly could not refer to punishment. A large part of the confusion of thought concerning Sheol arises from the invisibility of the soul. Since it is difficult to conceive the idea of space in connection with invisible beings, Sheol often means the place or state of the soul between death and resurrection when the soul will be joined with a spiritual body (I Cor. 15:42-49). The clearest indication of different conditions in Sheol is in our Lord's parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), where the rich man is pictured as in torment, while Lazarus was in "Abraham's bosom."

A.B.F.

SHEPHAM (shē'făm, Heb. shephām, nakedness), a place in the NE of Canaan, near the Sea of Galilee (Num. 34:10,11).

SHEPHATIAH (shĕf'ȧ-tī'ȧ, Heb. shephatyâh, Jehovah is judge). 1. The fifth son of David, born at Hebron to his wife Abital (II Sam. 3:4).

2. Son of Reuel and father of Meshullam, dwelling in Jerusalem soon after the return from captivity (I Chron. 9:8).

3. One of the mighty men who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:5).

4. Son of Maacah, a Simeonite prince ruling his tribe in the days of David (I Chron. 27:16).

5. One of the seven sons of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (II Chron. 21:2).

6. Founder of a family with 372 descendants who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:4).

7. One of the children of Solomon's servants whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57).

8. One whose descendant Zebadiah returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:8). This may have been the same Shephatiah as the preceding.

9. Son of Mahalaleel whose descendant Athaiah dwelt at Jerusalem soon after the walls had been rebuilt (Neh. 11:4).

10. One of the men of Zedekiah who desired that Jeremiah be put to death for prophesying (Jer. 38:1).

SHEPHELAH, THE (shē-fē'lȧ, Heb. ha-shephēlâh, Gr. sephelá, saphelá, low country). The word does not occur in the English Bible but the Hebrew has it 19 times, rendered in KJV "low country" or "low plain" four times, "plain" three times, "vale" five times, and "valley" seven times, but in ASV uniformly "lowland." It represents the undulating country between the mountains of Judah and the maritime plain S of the plain of Sharon, extending through the country of Philistia along the Mediterranean. In Joshua 12:8 it is one of the six geographical sections of the promised land W of Jordan. It had an abundance of sycamore trees (I Kings 10:27). Its limestone hills were from 500 to 800 feet high. In the valleys good crops were grown, especially grapes. Samson's exploits took place there, and David hid there from Saul.

SHEPHER (See Shapher)

SHEPHERD (See Occupations & Professions)

SHEPHI, SHEPHO (shē'fī, shē'fō, barrenness), one of the early descendants of Seir, the Horite (Gen. 36:23; I Chron. 1:40). "Shepho" in Genesis, "Shephi" in I Chronicles.

SHEPHUPHAN (shē-fū'făm, Heb. shephûphān), a grandson of Benjamin through Bela his firstborn (I Chron. 8:5). The name appears in Genesis 46:21 as "Muppim" and in I Chronicles 7:12,15; 26:16 as "Shuppim."

SHERAH (shē'rȧ, Heb. she'ĕrâh), a daughter or a granddaughter of Ephraim and apparently a powerful woman, for she built or fortified three villages (I Chron. 7:24 cf. II Chron. 8:5).

SHERD (See Potsherd, Ostraka)

SHEREBIAH (shĕr-ē-bī'ȧ, Heb. sherēvyâh). 1. One of the chief priests who were brought from Casiphia to join Ezra on his return to Jerusalem, to whom Ezra entrusted treasures for the temple (Ezra 8:18,24), who translated the reading of the Law into Aramaic for the people (Neh. 8:7), and who confessed the sins of Israel (Neh. 9:4).

2. A covenanter with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:12).

3. A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 12:8).

4. A chief Levite in the days of Eliashib (Neh. 12:24).

SHERESH (shē'rĕsh, Heb. shāresh), a grandson of Manasseh through Machir (I Chron. 7:16) and the ancestor of Manassites living in Gilead.

SHEREZER (shĕ-rē'zēr, Heb. sar'etser), a man sent from Bethel to Jerusalem to ask the priests whether the days of mourning should be continued (Zech. 7:2).

SHESHACH (shē'shăk, Heb. shēshakh), in the opinion of many, a cryptogram for "Babel" formed by reversing the letters of the alphabet. When the prophet first used this device (Jer. 25:26) it was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar and it would have been folly openly to predict the doom of Babylon. When he later used it (Jer. 51:41), Israel was in captivity, Jerusalem had long been in ruins, and the use of the word with its explanation as Babylon could do no harm.

SHESHAI (shē'shī, Heb. shēshay), one of the sons of Anak, giants whom the spies feared (Num. 13:22), but whom Caleb drove out (Josh. 15:14) and Judah destroyed (Judg. 1:10).

SHESHAN (shē'shan, Heb. shēshān), an early descendant of Judah through Perez, Hezron and Jerahmeel (I Chron. 2:31,34) who gave his daughter as wife to an Egyptian servant Jarha (I Chron. 2:35-41).

SHESHBAZZAR (shĕsh-bāz'ĕr, Heb. sheshbatstsar), a prince of the Jews when Cyrus made a decree permitting the Jews to go back to Jerusalem to rebuild the house of God. He was made governor, was given the sacred vessels of the temple which had been taken at the captivity, and helped lay the foundation of the temple (Ezra 1:8,11; 5:14,16). He may be the same as Zerubbabel.

SHETH (shĕth, Heb. shēth, compensation). 1. The name given by Eve to her third son (I Chron. 1:1).

2. An unknown race mentioned in Balaam's parable (Num. 24:17).

SHETHAR (shē'thär, Heb. shēthar), one of the seven princes of Persia and Media who "saw the king's face" in the days of Xerxes (Esth. 1:14).

SHETHAR-BOZENAI, SHETHAR-BOZNAI (shē'thär-bŏz'ĕ-nī, shē'thär-bŏz'nī), a Persian official who tried to prevent the Jews from building the temple and complained to the king (Ezra 5:3,6).

SHEVA (shē'vä, Heb. shewā'). 1. David's scribe or secretary (II Sam. 20:25), perhaps the same as "Seraiah" in 8:17).

2. Son of Caleb (probably not the famous spy) by his concubine Maacah (I Chron. 2:49).

SHEWBREAD, SHOWBREAD (See Tabernacle)

SHIBAH (shī'bä, Heb. shiv'âh), the well from which Beer-sheba was named (Gen. 26:33). In KJV the name is written "Shebah."

SHIBBOLETH (shĭb'bō-lĕth, Heb. shibbōleth, an ear of grain or a stream), a word which was differently pronounced on the two sides of the Jordan, and so was used by the men of Gilead under Jephthah as a test to determine whether the speaker was of Ephraim or not (Judg. 12:5,6).

SHIBMAH, SIBMAH (shĭb'mä, Heb. shivmâh), a city taken by the tribe of Reuben from the Moabites (Num. 32:38).

SHICRON, SHIKKERON (shĭk'rŏn, Heb. shikkerôn), a town W of Jerusalem on the northern border of Judah (Josh. 15:11). ASV Shikkeron.

SHIELD (See Armor)

SHIGGAION (shĭ-gā'yŏn, Heb. shiggāyôn), a musical term found in the heading of Psalm 7. It may refer to a dithyramb, or rhapsody.

SHIGIONOTH (shĭg-ĭ-ō'noth), plural of Shiggaion. The heading of Habakkuk's lovely psalm (Hab. 3:1).

SHIHON, SHION (shī'ŏn, Heb. shî'ôn), a town on the border of Issachar (Josh. 19:19), a few miles W of the S end of the Sea of Galilee, near Nazareth. ASV Shion.

SHIHOR, SIHOR (shī'hôr, Heb. shîhôr). At least three views have been held regarding Shihor (usually Sihor in KJV): (1) it refers to the Nile; (2) it refers to a stream which separated Egypt from Palestine; (3) it refers to a canal, with waters drawn from the Nile, on the border between Egypt and Palestine. See Joshua 13:3; I Chronicles 13:5; Isaiah 23:3; Jeremiah 2:18.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH (shī'hôr-lĭb'năth, Heb. shîhôr livnāth), a small stream flowing into the Mediterranean Sea on the southern border of Asher (Josh. 19:26). Perhaps the Belus near Acre, from the sand of which glass was made.

SHIKKERON (See Shicron)

SHILHI (shĭl'hī, Heb. shilhî), father-in-law of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (I Kings 22:42).

SHILHIM (shĭl'hĭm, Heb. shilhîm), a town in the S of Judah in Joshua's time (Josh. 15:32).

SHILLEM, SHILLEMITE (shĭl'ĕm, shĭl'ĕm-īt), the fourth son of Naphtali (Gen. 46:24) and the family descended from him (Num. 26:49). In I Chronicles 7:13 he is called Shallum.

SHILOAH (See Siloam)

SHILOH (shī'lō, Heb. shīlōh), the person referred to in the prophecy of Jacob in Genesis 49:10, "The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until Shiloh come." This has been interpreted in many different ways. The ASVm has "'Till he come to Shiloh, having the obedience of the peoples,' Or, acc. to Syr., 'Till he come whose it is,' etc." The RSV has "until he comes to whom it belongs; and to him shall be the obedience of the peoples." The principal interpretations are the following:

1. The passage is Messianic. The difficulty of this interpretation is that nowhere else in the OT is Shiloh found as a personal name, and none of the ancient MSS apply the word personally to the Messiah. This application is not older than the 16th century (apart from a fanciful passage in the Talmud).

2. Shiloh refers to the town in central Palestine where Joshua placed the tabernacle after the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 18:1), and the reading, "Till he comes to Shiloh," is favored.

3. Shiloh is not regarded as a proper name at all. It is thought to be a compound word meaning "whose it is." This is apparently the reading presupposed in the LXX, the Peshitta, and the Jewish Targums, and seems to be alluded to in Ezekiel 21:27, "until he come whose right it is." The passage has a Messianic reference if this reading is adopted.

S.B.

SHILOH (shī'lō, Heb. shīlōh), a city in the tribe of Ephraim, about 12 miles N and E of Bethel and about the same distance S of Sychar where Jacob's well was, just E of the highway from Bethel to Shechem (Judg. 21:19). It stood on an isolated hill which could easily be defended either against the Canaanites from the N or the Philistines from the SW. Here the children of Israel under Joshua assembled after the first phases of the conquest of Canaan and set up the tabernacle, thus making Shiloh the capital city of Canaan under the theocracy. Here the tabernacle remained till in the days of Samuel, about 400 years later, the ark was removed in a battle with the Philistines (I Sam. 4:3) and began its wanderings which lasted almost to the days of Solomon's temple, which was built to receive it. From Shiloh the men of Benjamin, by Israel's permission, kidnaped wives after the Benjamite war under the priesthood of Phinehas, the grandson of Aaron, and to Shiloh the godly Elkanah and his wife repaired before the birth of Samuel (I Sam. 1:3). Here the boy Samuel received his call from God (3:20,21).

From the time of the removal of the ark, Shiloh gradually lost its importance, and especially when David made Jerusalem the capital of the kingdom of Israel. This loss of importance was principally because God "forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he placed among men" (Ps. 78:60). During the reign of King Saul, Israel's first king, and especially during his war with the Philistines, Ahijah, great-grandson of Eli, was high priest of Israel wearing the sacred ephod at Shiloh (I Sam. 14:3). After the division of the kingdom, though the ark and the temple were at Jerusalem, and though Jeroboam, the apostate king, had set up centers of worship at Dan and at Bethel, another Ahijah, prophet of the Lord, was still at Shiloh, representing God before the true men of God in the northern kingdom, and to him Jeroboam sent to inquire about his sick son (I Kings 14), and here Ahijah pronounced the doom of Jeroboam's house (I Kings 14:13).

In the days of Jeremiah, Shiloh was a ruin (Jer. 7:12,14), though there were some men there after the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. 41:5). The modern name for the place of Shiloh is Seilun.

A.B.F.

SHILONI, SHILONITE (shī-lō'nī, shī'lō-nīt, Heb. shîlōnî). 1. An inhabitant of Shiloh. The one most often mentioned is Ahijah, the Shilonite (I Kings 11:29; II Chron. 9:29).

2. Ancestor of Maaseiah, one of the Jewish princes who dwelt in Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. 11:5).

SHILSHAH (shĭl'shà, Heb. shilshâh), one of the 11 sons of Zophah, an early member of the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:37).

SHIMEA (shĭm'ē-à, Heb. shim'ā'). 1. A brother of David whose son slew a giant of Gath (I Chron. 20:7).

2. Son of David and Bathsheba ("Bathshua") born in Jerusalem (I Chron. 3:5).

3. A Merarite Levite (I Chron. 6:30).

4. A Gershonite Levite, grandfather of Asaph who stood with Heman in the service of sacred song under David.

No. 1 is probably the same as "Shimma" (I Chron. 2:13 KJV), "Shamma" (I Sam. 16:9), "Shimeah" (II Sam. 21:21 KJV), and "Shimei" (ibid. ASV). The name is spelled three ways in the Hebrew, five ways in the English.

SHIMEAH (shĭm'ē-à, Heb. shim'ā'). 1. Brother of David (II Sam. 13:3).

2. A son of Mikloth a Benjamite (I Chron. 8:32) who lived at Jerusalem. In 9:38 his name is written "Shimeam."

SHIMEAM (See Shimeah)

SHIMEATH (shĭm'ē-ăth, Heb. shim'ath, fame), an Ammonitess, whose son Zabad (II Chron. 24:26) or Jozacar (II Kings 12:21) helped to assassinate King Joash of Judah.

SHIMEATHITES (shĭm'ē-ăth-īts, Heb. shim'āthîm), one of the three families of scribes that dwelt at Jabez in Judah (I Chron. 2:55). They were Kenites related to the Rechabites.

SHIMEI (shĭm'ē-ī, Heb. shim'î, famous). 1. A son of Gershon and head of a Levite family. Spelled Shimi in KJV (Exod. 6:17).

2. A Gershonite Levite in the days of David, and head of one of the courses of Levites (I Chron. 23:7-10).

3. One of David's mighty men who remained faithful in Adonijah's attempted usurpation of the throne (I Kings 1:8).

4. One of Solomon's purveyors of food who was over Benjamin (I Kings 4:18).

5. The grandson of Jehoiachin, or, as he was later called, Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:19).

6. A Simeonite, father of 22 children (I Chron. 4:26,27).

7. An early Reubenite, son of Gog and father of Micah (I Chron. 5:4).

8. An early Merarite Levite, cousin once removed of Moses and Aaron (I Chron. 6:29).

9. The head of a father's house in Judah (I Chron. 8:21), spelled Shimhi in KJV.

10. The head of one of the 24 courses of musical Levites, who with his 12 sons and brethren made up the tenth course (I Chron. 25:17).

11. A man of Ramah, whom David set over the vineyards (I Chron. 27:27).

12. One of the descendants of Heman, the singer, who helped in the house-cleaning of the temple under Hezekiah (II Chron. 29:14).

13. A Levite, treasurer over the oblations and tithes in Hezekiah's time (II Chron. 31:12,13).

14. One of the Levites who had married a foreign woman in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:23).

15. One of the family of Hashum who had married a foreign woman in Ezra's time (Ezra 10:33).

16. One of the family of Bani who had done the same (Ezra 10:38).

17. Son of Kish and grandfather of Mordecai the Jew who brought up Esther (Esth. 2:5).

18. A representative of a leading family who in the final restoration of Israel will weep in contrition when they look upon him whom they have pierced (Zech. 12:13).

19. A Benjamite of the house of Saul, and son of Gera who cursed David in the day when he was fleeing from Absalom his son, and cast stones at David. David refused to let his cousin Abishai slay him (II Sam. 16:5-14). When David was returning, victorious, Shimei prayed for forgiveness and David pardoned him (II Sam. 19:16-23), but when Solomon sat upon the throne (I Kings 2:36-46) he first confined him to Jerusalem, then executed him for disobedience.

SHIMEON (shĭm'ē-ŭn, Heb. shim'ôn, hearing), one of the family of Harin in Ezra's time who had married a foreign wife (Ezra 10:31).

SHIMHI (See Shimei)

SHIMI (See Shimei)

SHIMITE (shĭm'ĭt), a member of the family descended from Shimei (Num. 3:21 KJV; ASV Shimeites).

SHIMMA (shĭm'à, Heb. shammâh), the third son of Jesse (I Chron. 2:13 KJV), also called Shammah (I Sam. 16:9).

SHIMON (shī'mŏn, Heb. shîmôn), head of a family in the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:20).

SHIMRATH (shĭm'răth, Heb. shimrăth, watch), one of the sons of Shimei in the tribe of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:21).

SHIMRI (shĭm'rī, Heb. shimrî). 1. Son of Shemaiah and head of a father's house in the tribe of Simeon (I Chron. 4:37).

2. Father of Jediael and Joha, two of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:45).

3. A son of Hosah of the Merarite Levites, whom, although he was not the first-born, Hosah made chief of his 13 kinsmen. Spelled Simri in KJV (I Chron. 26:10).

4. A Levite who assisted in cleansing the temple (II Chron. 29:13).

SHIMRITH (shĭm'rĭth, Heb. shimrîth, watchful), a Moabitess, mother of Jehozabad who helped to slay Joash, king of Judah (II Chron. 24:26); also called Shomer (II Kings 12:21).

SHIMROM, SHIMRON (shĭm'rŏm, shĭm'rŏn, Heb. shimrôn, a guard). 1. The fourth son of Issachar, son of Jacob (Gen. 46:13). In I Chronicles 7:1 KJV has Shimrom.

2. A town in the northern part of Canaan whose king united with Jabin, king of Hazor, to fight against Joshua and the Israelites (Josh. 11:1ff). In Joshua 19:15 it is mentioned among the cities given in the division of the land to the tribe of Zebulun. In Joshua 12:20, among the conquests of Joshua, it is called Shimron-Meron.

SHIMRON-MERON (shĭm'rŏn-mē'rŏn), a town listed among the 34 victories of Joshua in the conquest of Canaan (Josh. 12:20).

SHIMSHAI (shĭm'shī, Heb. shimshay, sunny), a scribe among the enemies of the Jews who had been hindering the attempts to rebuild the temple (Ezra 4:8).

SHINAB (shī'năb, Heb. shin'āv), king of Admah, one of the Canaanite cities which later was destroyed with Sodom (Gen. 14:2).

SHINAR (shī'nàr, Heb. shin'ar), the region containing the cities of Babel, Erech (cf. modern Iraq), Accad, and Calneh, Genesis 10:10, the locations of which, except Accad, are unknown. Accad may have been the Agade known to archaeologists as the capital chosen by Sargon I, ancient king of Babylon. Shinar lay on the alluvial plain of Babylonia and for many centuries was perhaps the most fertile region on earth. Herodotus speaks of two-hundred-fold yields of grain there. Genesis 11:1-9 speaks of the early post-diluvians traveling E and finding a plain in the land of Shinar where they started to build a tower. In the days of Abraham, Amraphel, king of Shinar, invaded Canaan (Gen. 14:1); Nebuchadnezzar was ruler of the land of Shinar, Daniel 1:2, and it is mentioned in prophecy (Isa. 11:1; Zech. 5:11).

SHION (shī'ŏn, Heb. shî'ôn, overturning), a town in Issachar, perhaps about three miles NW of Mt. Tabor (Josh. 19:19). KJV Shihon.

SHIPHI (shī'fī, Heb. shiph'î), father of Ziza, a prince in one of the families of Simeon (I Chron. 4:37).

SHIPHMITE (shĭf'mīt, Heb. shephām), the patronymic of Zabdi who was over the increase of the vineyards under David (I Chron. 27:27). Probably from Shepham in Judah.

SHIPHRAH (shĭf'rà, Heb. shiphrâh, beauty), one of the Hebrew midwives who risked their lives to save the Hebrew boy babies (Exod. 1:15-21).

SHIPHTAN (shĭf'tăn, Heb. shiphtān, judicial), father of Kemuel, a prince of Ephraim, whom Joshua appointed to help divide the land (Num. 34:24).

SHIPS (Heb. 'ŏnîyâh, tsî, sephînâh; Gr. ploíon, ploiárion, naús, skáphe). Ships and navigation find only a small place in the OT. The Hebrews were an agricultural people, and the Phoenicians and Philistines, over long periods, separated them from a coastline which was itself harborless and difficult. In Judges 5:17 there is cryptic reference to some experience of ships in the case of the two tribes of Asher and Dan, but Hebrew sea-faring in general was second-hand. The Phoenicians, confined to their coastal-strip, and with the timber resources of the Lebanon range in their hinterland, were prompted by geography to exploit the sea, and became, in the process, the great navigators of the ancient world; hence the symbolic vessel with ivory benches and embroidered purple sails of Ezekiel's metaphor in his denunciation of Tyre (Ezek. 27:4-11). Solomon's fleet at Ezion-geber (I Kings 9 and 10) was composed of Phoenician ships and manned by Phoenician crews. Jehoshaphat's later attempt to revive the trade ended in shipwreck, due, no doubt, to inexperienced Hebrew handling of the ships. The "ships of Tarshish" mentioned in this connection and elsewhere (e.g. Isa. 2:16), were probably sturdy vessels built, in the first instance, for the commerce with Tartessus in Spain, the term thereafter being applied, like "China clipper" and "East Indiamen," to vessels generally used for arduous and distant voyaging. Solomon's southern fleet, for example, traded to Ophir, and, if the cargoes are an indication, to Southern India as well (I Kings 10:22).

It is certain that the Phoenicians penetrated to Cornwall for tin, and to the Canaries. They probably used the trireme, the useful vessel with three banks of oars, which was a Phoenician invention. Remaining OT references are few and commonly poetic. Psalm 107:23-27 speaks of the terrors of a storm at sea, and Psalm 104:26 briefly mentions ships. Isaiah 18:2 speaks of the boats or rafts built of bound bundles of papyrus, which are sometimes depicted in Egyptian murals, and Daniel 11:30 refers to warships from Cyprus (Chittim or Kittim). In NT times the shipping of the Mediterranean was principally Greek and Roman. The Romans maintained war-fleets of triremes and quinqueremes ("three-oared" and "five-oared" ships). How the rowers on these vessels were arranged has been much debated, and the view that there were three banks of benches is now generally rejected. It is probable that the benches had a forward slant, and that each rower pulled an individual oar sitting three (or five in the case of of the quinquereme) to a bench. The warship (or "long ship," as it was sometimes called) was not designed for heavy loads, but for speed and maneuverability. Hence the frequency of shipwreck, and sometimes mass disaster, in Roman naval history. The great artists in the naval use of the trireme were the Athenians, whose admiral Phormion (c. 440-428 B.C.) developed the tactics which kept the Athenians supreme at sea until the Syracusans invented the ramming devices which struck Athenian naval power a fatal blow in the Great Harbor (413 B.C.). Merchant ships were more heavily built, and were designed to stay at sea for long periods in all weathers, and to carry considerable cargoes.

The classic passage is Acts 27 which contains Luke's brilliant account of the voyage and wreck of the Alexandrian grain-ship. These vessels were of considerable size. There were 276 people aboard the ship on which Paul and Luke traveled (Acts 27:37). Josephus states that he traveled to Rome on a ship with no less than 600 aboard (Vita 3). The Alexandrian grain-ship, Isis, of the second century A.D. measured 140 by 36 feet, and would be rated at 3250 tons burden. No doubt these were exceptional vessels, and the average merchant ship was probably in the vicinity of 100 tons. Paul's ship may have been on a northern route because of the lateness of the season (Acts 27:6), though Ramsay is of the opinion that this was the regular route from Egypt to Rome (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 319). There was a particularly dangerous period for autumn navigation, extending, according to Vegetius (De Re.Mil. 4:39), from mid-September to mid-November. Paul's voyage fell within this period. The story illustrates the difficulty of handling the ancient sailing ship in adverse winds. From Myra, on the extreme southern point of Asia Minor, the ship was proceeding west to Cnidus, a port at the SW extremity of Asia Minor. A wind off the shore drove the vessel S, and the shipmaster was compelled to seek shelter under the lee of the 140-mile-long island of Crete (27:7). Fair Havens, where the ship found refuge was (and is) a little more than half way along this coast, just E of the part where the island rises into a group of lofty mountains. Funnelled down from these highlands (27:14), the NE wind drove them S from the "more commodious" harbor of Phenice, over 23 miles of turbulent sea, to the off-shore island of Clauda. The brief advantage of the island's protection was used to haul in the boat, which was being towed water-logged behind (27:16). To the S lay the Syrtes, ancient graveyard of ships, as modern underwater archeology has strikingly revealed. Hence the battle to maintain a westerly course, aided by a veering of the wind to the E, as the cyclonic disturbance shifted its center. At this point (27:17) they "used helps, undergirding the ship." These tautened cables, employed to bind the straining timbers against the stress of the sea and the leverage of the loaded mast, are mentioned elsewhere in ancient literature. "See you not," says Horace, writing metaphorically of the laboring ship of state (Od. 1:14), "that the side is stripped of oars, the masts crippled by the rushing southwest wind, the yard-arms groaning, and that without ropes the hull can scarcely bear the too peremptory sea." (See also Plato Rep. 10:616c). It is possible that the hull was "undergirded" by strong ropes, but that an extension of the cables above deck formed a network which could be twisted to tautness. It is probable that the "tackling," which was thrown overboard, was the rigging and the long spar on which the main-sail depended, a device likely to become unmanageable during a storm. The ship on which Paul continued his voyage from Malta to the grain-port of Puteoli, had "the sign" of Castor and Pollux (28:11). The Great Twin Brethren were the patrons of ship-men, and had special care of storm-bound ships (Hor. Od. 1:12:27-32). The account in Acts 27 also tells of soundings for depth (27:28) and the bracing of the ship by a system of compensatory anchors (27:29). This is the purport of the metaphor in Hebrews 6:19. James 3:4 refers to the rudder paddles.

The "boats" of the Sea of Galilee, which figure in the Gospels, were sturdy fisher-craft or the barges of local lake-side trade. They comfortably contained a dozen men, but an unusual draught of fish was an embarrassment (Luke 5:7). It is not known what wood was used for the boats of Galilee, but Theophrastus says that sea-going ships were constructed from larch, cypress, and fir (Hist. Pl.5:7).

SHISHA (shī'shà, Heb. shîshā'), the father of two of Solomon's secretaries; Elihoreph and Ahijah (I Kings 4:3), thought by some to be identical with Seraiah (II Sam. 8:17), Sheva (II Sam. 20:25 and Shavsha (I Chron. 18:16).

SHISHAK (shī'shăk, Heb. shîshaq, Egyp. Sheshonk), an Egyptian king, the founder of the 22nd or Libyan dynasty. He was from a Libyan family which for some generations had been situated at Herakleopolis in the Fayyum. Libyan mercenaries were common in the Egyptian army in the 21st dynasty and some of them rose to positions of rank. The weakness of Egypt during much of the 20th-21st Dynasties ironically permitted the Libyan-Egyptian Sheshonk to seize control of Egypt some two centuries after Rameses III had decisively defeated the Libyans. Shishak I located his capital at Bubastis (Pi-beseth, Ezek. 30:7) in the eastern Delta. To secure the succession of his newly founded dynasty he married his son to the daughter of the last king of the 21st dynasty. Shishak was a vigorous leader, who inaugurated an aggressive foreign policy and attempted to recover the lost Asiatic empire by force of arms. In the fifth year of Rehoboam, king of Judah, c. 926 B.C., he marched on Palestine, reaching as far N as Megiddo and Bethshan and E into Transjordan.

Earlier in his reign he had provided asylum to the Israelite Jeroboam, who had fled to Egypt to escape the wrath of Solomon (I Kings 11:40). With Jeroboam on the northern throne, Shishak showed no favoritism, but impartially overran both Judah and Israel. Jerusalem was a victim of this campaign and the temple was looted of its treasures (I Kings 14:25-26; II Chron. 12:1-9). At Megiddo a badly damaged stela of Shishak was found by the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago. In Egypt the record of the campaign was carved on the S exterior wall of the temple of Karnak, just E of the Bubastite Portal. He is depicted in the traditional attitude of smiting his enemies, here Asiatics, and the god Amon is shown leading before the king a total of 156 captives in ten lines, each prisoner representing a conquered Palestinian town. The captives are portrayed in stylized form, an oval containing the name of the city surmounted by the head, shoulders, and pinioned arms of the victim. Many of the names which can be read and identified occur in the OT. Among them are Megiddo, Taanach, Shunem, Beth-shean, Ajalon, Beth-horon, Gibeon, and Socoh. The interesting place name, "Field of Abraham," appears in this list. The undisturbed burial of Shishak I was found at Bubastis (Tanis) by P. Montet in 1938-1939. Though his dynasty endured for roughly 200 years, internal conflict, stagnation, and incapability kept it at, or below, the level of mediocrity.

SHITRAI (shĭt'rĭ, Heb. shitray), a Sharonite, placed by David over the flocks that fed in Sharon (I Chron. 27:29).

SHITTAH TREE (See Plants)

SHITTIM (shĭt'ĭm, Heb. ha-shittîm), the name of the wood which comes from the acacia tree, mentioned 26 times in connection with the tabernacle and its furniture (Exod. 25-38). The wood is hard, fine-grained, yellowish-brown in color but turns nearly black with age. It exudes a gum called "acacia-gum" or "gum-arabic." See Plants.

SHITTIM (place), a contraction of Abel-shittim, i.e. "meadow of acacias," the last stop of Israel in the wilderness before crossing the Jordan into the promised land (Num. 25:1; 33:49). There Balaam tried to curse Israel but had to bless instead, and there he told Balak how to seduce the men of Israel (Mic. 6:5; Num. 22:1; 25:3). From there Joshua sent the two spies to Jericho (Josh. 2:1) and thence Israel departed to cross the Jordan (Josh. 3:1). Used perhaps symbolically for a place which, in the future, Jehovah will richly bless (Joel 3:18).

SHIZA shī'zà, Heb. shîzā'), a man of Reuben, father of Adina, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:42).

SHOA (shō'à, Heb. shōa', rich), though written in the English versions as though a country or province, it is probably (with Pekod and Koa) to be taken as a description of Israel's great enemy, the Chaldeans (Ezek. 23:23).

SHOBAB (shō'bab, Heb. shôvāv). 1. A grandson of Hezron of Judah through Caleb (I Chron. 2:18).

2. A son of David born in Jerusalem (I Chron. 3:5).

SHOBACH (shō'bak, Heb. shôvakh), the general of the Syrian army under Hadarezer, king of Zobah, defeated by David (II Sam. 10:16-18). In I Chronicles 19:16, Shophach.

SHOBAI (shō'bī, Heb. shovāy), a gatekeeper of the temple, some of whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45).

SHOBAL (shō'băl, Heb. shôvāl). 1. One of the sons of Seir the Horite, very early inhabitant of what was later Edom (Gen. 36:20,23). These Horites or Hurrians were expelled and destroyed by the Edomites, descendants of Esau (Deut. 2:12). Shobal is listed as one of the chiefs of the Horites (Gen. 36:29).

2. An early Ephrathite of the sons of Caleb (not the spy), an ancestor or founder of Kiriath-jearim (I Chron. 2:50,52; Josh. 15:9).

3. A grandson of Judah and father of Reaiah (I Chron. 4:1,2).

SHOBEK (shō'bĕk, Heb. shôvēq), one of the 44 chiefs of the Jewish people who covenanted with Nehemiah to keep the law of Jehovah (Neh. 10:24).

SHOBI (shō'bī, Heb. shōvî), a prince of the Ammonites, son of Nahash and probably brother of Hanun (II Sam. 17:27).

SHOCHO (shō'kō, Heb. sôkhōh), a city in Judah, built by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:7). ASV here has Soco, KJV Shoco.

SHOE (See Dress)

SHOE LATCHET (See Dress)

SHOFAR (See Music, Musical Instruments)

SHOHAM (shō'hăm, Heb. shōham), a Merarite Levite in the days of David (I Chron. 24:27).

SHOMER (shō'mĕr, Heb. shōmēr, keeper, watcher). 1. The father of Jehozabad, one of the conspirators against Joash of Judah, who slew him because of the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the priest (II Kings 12:20,21; II Chron. 24:25,26).

2. A great-grandson of Asher, through Beriah and Heber (I Chron. 7:32). In verse 34 he is called Shemer (ASV) and Shamer (KJV).

SHOPHACH (shō'făk, Heb. shôvakh), general of the Syrians, whom David slew (I Chron. 19:16, 18). In II Samuel 10:16, Shobach.

SHOPHAN (shō'făn, Heb. shôphān), the second half of the name of Atroth-shophan, a city of the tribe of Gad (Num. 32:35).

SHOPHAR (See Music, Musical Instruments)

SHORE, the land where it meets the sea, represented by five words in Scripture: 1. hôph, that which is washed by the sea (Judg. 5:17; Jer. 47:7).

2. qātseh, the end or extremity (Josh. 15:2), referring to the Dead Sea.

3. sāphâh, the lip or edge (Gen. 22:17), the sand which is on the sea-shore.

4. cheílos, the same idea in Greek (Heb. 11:12).

5. aigialós, in the ministry of our Lord in Galilee, the multitude stood on the shore and Jesus sat in a boat so that all could see and hear without thronging Him (Matt. 13:2). After His resurrection, Jesus stood on the shore while the disciples were fruitlessly fishing to hide their sorrow and perplexity (John 21:4), and in Acts 27:39 the bank of a wide creek is called a shore.

SHOSHANNIM (shō-shăn'ĭm, lilies), found in the titles of Psalms 45,69,80 and in Ps. 60 in the singular. Perhaps lily-shaped musical instruments, perhaps the name of spring-songs.

SHOULDER (Heb. shekhem, kathēph, zerôa' shôq; Gr. ómos, brachíon), a word often used in both a literal and figurative sense. When a man of Israel offered an ox or a sheep, the shoulder went to the officiating priest as a part of his portion (Deut. 18:8). The shoulder pieces of the ephod, the sacred garment of the high priest, were to bear onyx stones on which were graven the names of the tribes (Exod. 28:1-12), thus indicating that the priest bore a heavy responsibility for the people; and similarly, a ruler bears upon his shoulders the weight of the government (Isa. 9:6). Although in traveling, the sections of the tabernacle could be carried in wagons, the priests had to carry the sacred furniture upon their shoulders (Num. 7:6-9), much as Jehovah is pictured as bearing his beloved upon his shoulders (Deut. 33:12), and as the good shepherd bears the lost sheep when he finds it (Luke 15:5). In much of the east, the "waterworks" consist of wells, to which the maidservants resort to draw water, and whence they bear it on their shoulders (Gen. 21:14) in large jars; and even wellborn maidens carried water thus (Gen. 24:15). "To pull away the shoulder" (Zech. 7:11) is to refuse to obey, and to "thrust with the shoulder" (Ezek. 34:21) is insolence. A.B.F.

SHOULDER PIECE (Heb. kathēph). That part of the ephod in which the front and the back were joined together so as to make the garment to be of one piece (Exod. 28:7,8).

2. The piece of meat which is taken from the shoulder of the beast (Ezek. 24:4).

SHOVEL (Heb. rahath, ya', yāthēdh), a tool used for clearing out ashes etc. from the altar (Exod. 27:3, II Chron. 4:11 etc.), for sanitary purposes (Deut. 23:13), or for winnowing (Isa. 30:24).

SHOWBREAD, SHEWBREAD (See Tabernacle)

SHRINE (Gr. naós), a dwelling for a god (Acts 19:24), used only once in the English versions, but the same Gr. word naós is used about 44 times and translated temple. (Acts 17:24, I Cor. 3:16).

SHROUD (Heb. hōresh), generally the dress for the dead, but also a bough (Ezek. 31:3) where KJV has " a shadowing shroud," but ASV has "a forest-like shade."

SHRUB (See Plants)

SHUA (shōō'a, Heb. shua', prosperity). 1. A Canaanite whose daughter became Judah's wife (Gen. 38:2,12). The KJV incorrectly spells this shuah. 2. The daughter of Heber who was the grandson of Asher (I Chron. 7:32).

SHUAH (shōō'ah, Heb. shûah, depression). 1. A son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. 25:2; I Chron. 1:32).

2. (See Shua No. 1).

3. Chelub's brother (I Chron. 4:11). Some MSS read "Son of." This name is another form of "Caleb" and is doubtless used to distinguish him from Caleb, the son of Hegron and Caleb, the son of Jephunneh.

SHUAL (shōō'al, Heb. shû'āl, fox). 1. One of the 11 sons of Zophat from the tribe of Asher (I Chron. 7:36).

2. I Samuel 13:17 refers to the "Land of Shual." It is named as one of the places invaded by one of the marauding tribes of Philistines. It probably lies a few miles NE of Bethel.

SHUBAEL (shōō'bā-ĕl, shuvā'ēl, captive). a name given to two Levites (I Chron. 24:20; 25:20). They are also referred to as Shebuel.

SHUHAM, SHUHAMITE (shōō'hăm, shōō'hăm-īt, Heb. shûhām), the son of Dan (Num. 26:42; Gen. 46:23), called also "Hushim." Dan's descendants are called "Shuhamites."

SHUHITE (shōō'hīt, Heb. shûhī, a native of Shuah), a term describing one of Job's friends by the name of Bildad (Job 2:11; 8:1; 18:1; 25:1; 42:9). It is very likely that this term refers back to Abraham's son by Keturah named Shuah. From him came a tribe of Arabs that dwelt near to Uz, the birthplace of Job (Job 1:1; 2:11). The exact location of this tribe is not certainly known, but it is likely that these people dwelt in the far northern area W of the Euphrates. If they were near Uz, as Job 2:11 indicates, this would place Uz in this region rather than farther S as is commonly done.

SHULAMITE (shōō'lăm-īt, Heb. shunammîth, peaceful), a title applied to a young woman in the Song of Solomon 6:13. There is some difference of opinion as to the origin of this term. It is not unlikely that it is a feminine form of Solomon. Both the RV and RSV have more correctly spelled this word Shulammite. If this word is the same word as "Shunammite," as the LXX rendering would imply, then it could be derived from the town of Shunem. See SHUNAMMITE, SHUNEM.

SHUMATHITES (shōō'măth-īts, Heb. shumāthî, garlic), a family of Kirjath-jearim (I Chron. 2:53).

SHUNAMMITE (shōō'năm-īt, Heb. shunammîth, a native of Shunem). 1. An unnamed woman whose son Elisha raised from the dead (II Kings 4:12). This woman had made her home available to the prophet when in this area. Later on, God used Elisha to save her from impending death (II Kings 8:1-6).

2. This word is applied also to David's nurse, Abishag (I Kings 1:3; 2:17-22).

SHUNEM (shōō'nĕm, Heb. shûnēm), a place belonging to the tribe of Issachar (Josh. 19:18). Here the Philistines encamped before they fought at Gilboa (I Sam. 28:4). Here lived David's nurse, Abishag (I Kings 1:3). Shunem was also the home of the woman who befriended Elisha whose son he restored (II Kings 4:8-37). It lies in a very rich section of Palestine a short distance N of Jezreel at the foot of "Little Hermon." A valuable spring of water doubtlessly attracted the Philistines to choose it as a camp site.

SHUNI, SHUNITE (shōō'nī, shōō'nīt, Heb. shûnî), the son of Gad who founded a group known as Shunites (Gen. 46:16; Num. 26:15).

SHUPHAM, SHUPHAMITE (shōō'fam, shōō'făm-īt, Heb. shûphām), a son of Benjamin and founder of the group known as "Shuphamites" (Num. 26:39). He is probably to be identified with the person "Shephuphan" (I Chron. 8:5).

SHUPPIM (shŭ'pĭm, Heb. shuppîm). 1. A Benjamite (I Chron. 7:12,15).

2. One of the two who had charge of the gate of the temple, Shallecheth (I Chron. 26:16), a Levite.

SHUR (shōōr, Heb. shûr, wall), a locality S of Palestine and E of Egypt. It was in this region that the angel of the Lord found Hagar when she fled from Sarah (Gen. 16:7-14). Abraham too dwelt in this territory at one time (Gen. 20:1).

SHUSHAN (shōō'shăn, Heb. shûshan), a city of the Babylonians probably named from the lilies that grow in this region in large numbers. It was famous in Biblical history as one of the capitals of the Persian empire (Neh. 1:1; Esth. 1:2; Dan. 8:2) during the time of Darius the Great. Here also Persian kings came to reside for the winter, and Daniel had the vision mentioned in Daniel 8:2. The Greeks called this place "Susa." It was located in the fertile valley on the left bank of the Choaspes River called Ulai in Daniel 8:2,16. It enjoyed a very delightful climate. Many Jews lived here and became prominent in the affairs of the city as the Books of Esther and Nehemiah show. From this city was sent the group who replaced those removed from Samaria (Ezra 4:9).

In the last part of the 19th century the French carried on extensive excavations at Shushan directed by Dieulafoy. This archaeological effort uncovered the great palace of King Xerxes (486-465 B.C.) in which Queen Esther lived.

SHUTHELAH, SHUTHALHITE (shōō-thē'là, shōō-thăl'hīt, Heb. shûthalhî). 1. One of the three sons of Ephraim (Num. 26:35-36). His descendants are called "Shuthalhites" and are given in I Chronicles 7:20-21.

2. The sixth person descending from Shuthelah is also called by his name. I Chronicles 7:21 mentions his father as Zabad and reveals that he is the father of Ezer and Elead.

SHUTTLE (shŭ'tl, Heb. 'eregh), a word used as a figure of the quick passing of life (Job 7:6). Job says that his days pass as swiftly as the rapidly moving shuttle of the weaver.

SIA (sī'à, Heb. sî'ā', assembly), a leader of the Nethinim whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:47). Spelled Siaha in Ezra 2:44.

SIBBECAI, SIBBECHAI (sĭb'ē-kī, sĭb'ē-kī, Heb. sibbekhay), a captain of several thousand men in David's army. He is usually designated as "The Hushathite" (II Sam. 21:18; I Chron. 11:29; 20:4; 27:11). He found a place among the mighty men of David chiefly for his victory over the Philistine Saph (II Sam. 21:18).

SIBBOLETH (See Shibboleth)

SIBMAH (sĭb'mà, Heb. sevām), a town located on the E of the Jordan and belonging originally to Moab. It was finally taken by the Amorites led by King Sihon (Num. 21:26). Later it was captured by and given to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. 13:19). Most scholars feel it is to be identified with Shebam (Num. 32:3) or Shibmah (32:38). It was famous for its luxurious vines and fruits (Isa. 16:8; Jer. 48:32).

SIBRAIM (sĭb-rā'ĭm, Heb. sivrayim), a point marking Palestine's northern boundary between Damascus and Hamath (Ezek. 47:16).

SICHEM (sī'kĕm, Heb. shekhem), the same as Shechem.

SICILY (sĭs'ĭ-lē), the triangular island lying off the toe of Italy was colonized in prehistoric times by a tribe closely related to those in the enclave round the mouth of the Tiber who became the Roman people. The W and S of the island was colonized from the eighth century B.C. onwards by the Carthaginians (themselves Phoenician colonists from Tyre), and the E and N by the Greeks. Colonization in both cases was by the building of "emporia," or seacoast towns, designed to exploit the hinterland. Centuries of tension and strife between the Greeks and Carthaginians ended with the intervention of Rome in the middle of the third century B.C. The western Mediterranean was too small for two first class powers, and Rome and Carthage both looked upon Sicily as a bridgehead. Hence the firmness with which Rome took advantage of factional strife at Messana to invade the island. The end of the Punic wars saw Sicily a Roman province.

SICK, SICKNESS (See Diseases)

SICKLE (sĭk'l, Heb. hermēsh, a reaping hook, maggāl, a reaping hook; Gr. drépanon, a tool used for cutting grain). The earlier sickles varied in size, shape, and in the material from which they were made. The earliest type seems to have been constructed of wood. It resembled our modern scythes, though smaller, and its cutting edge was made of flint. Later sickles were constructed of metal. These were used mostly for cutting grain, but on occasions they were used for pruning. Mark and John use the sickle in a figurative sense as the instrument of God's judgment (Mark 4:29; Rev. 14:14,16ff).

SIDDIM, VALE OF (sĭd'ĭm, Heb. 'ēmeq hasiddîm, the valley of the fields), a place mentioned in Genesis 14:3-8 as the battle-ground where Chedorlaomer and his allies met the kings of Sodom and other nearby cities. In the time of Abraham it must have been a place of great fertility, since it was chosen by Lot because of its productivity (Gen. 13:10). From Genesis 14:3,10 it seems to have been near to the Dead Sea and full of slime pits. In the past some scholars have placed it at the N end of the Dead Sea. The general view today, however, is that Siddim was located at the southern end of the Dead Sea. Because of the wickedness of the inhabitants of this area, God judged the locality many years ago in the days of Abraham. Its cities were completely destroyed and probably much of this territory was inundated by the waters of the Dead Sea. H.Z.C.

SIDON (sī'dŏn, Heb. tsîdhôn, Gr. Sidón), a Phoenician city midway between Berytus (Beirut) and Tyre. Small offshore islands made an excellent port. In ancient times they seem to have been linked by moles. Sidon appears in the OT as the chief city of Phoenicia, and the name was applied frequently to the whole nation (Gen. 10:15; Judg. 10:12). The city seems to have been a center of trade and enterprise. Homer, whose text dates from the eighth century before Christ, speaks of Sidon's artistic metal work ("A mixing bowl of silver, chased; six measures it held, and in beauty it was far the best in all the earth, for artificers of Sidon wrought it cunningly, and men of the Phoenicians brought it over the misty sea" (Iliad 23: 743-748). The Odyssey 4.613-619 speaks of a similar cup "lipped with gold"). Purple dyeing and glass blowing were also Sidonian industries. By an odd chance, the crimson dye which Sidonian inventors found how to extract from the murex shellfish, was called after the name of the other great Phoenician town, "Tyrian purple."

The art of glass blowing was discovered in the first century B.C. at Sidon, and the names of a number of Sidonian glass-blowers have been recovered from surviving samples of their art. Sidon shared fully in the seafaring, commercial, and colonizing enterprises of the Phoenician people. The last-named activity extended, according to tradition, as far as Malta. Outside the OT, Sidon finds its first mention in ancient documents in the Amarna Letters, which reveal Prince Zimrida of Sidon contesting Egyptian lordship of the coastal strip, the main area which the Phoenicians aspired to rule. Similar advantage was taken of a period of Egyptian withdrawal and decline, in the period of Sidonian expansion which followed the death of Rameses II. It was at this time that Sidon came into conflict over Dor with the other occupants of coastal Palestine, the Philistines. Israel suffered from the same burst of activity (Judg. 1:31; 10: 12). By and large, the history of Sidon followed the course of that of all Phoenicia. In common with the rest of the lands of the Middle East, Sidon fell under the power in turn of Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome. Brief-lived patterns of alliance (Jer. 27:3), periods of independence, parley, subjection, ill-advised revolt, destruction, and renaissance, were the common lot of the smaller lands of the region amid the rise and fall of the great empires. Sidon had a bad name in Scripture as a hot-bed of Phoenician idolatry (Isa. 23; Ezek.

28), and of Gentile materialism (Matt. 11:21,22). The neighborhood of Sidon, not more than 50 miles from Nazareth, was visited by Christ (Matt. 15:21; Mark 7:24-31), and Sidonians resorted to Him (Mark 3:8; Luke 6:17). Sidon was a residence of Christian disciples, and a port of call of Paul (Acts 27:3). E.M.B.

SIEGE (See War)

SIEVE (sĭv, Heb. kevārâh, netted, nāphâh, a sieve), a utensil used by the eastern people to sift grains. Some of the Egyptian sieves were made of strings or reeds. Those constructed of string were used for finer work whereas those made from reeds were used for sifting coarser material. It is used in the Bible in a figurative sense in both passages where the word occurs (Isa. 30:28; Amos 9:9).

SIGN (Heb. 'ôth, a signal, môphēth, a miracle, omen; Gr. semeíon, an indication). In Scripture this word generally refers to something addressed to the senses to attest the existence of a divine power. Miracles in the Old Testament were often signs (Exod. 4:8; 8:23). Several specific things were given as signs, such as the rainbow (Gen. 9: 12-13); some of the feasts (Exod. 13:9); the sabbath (Exod. 31:13); and circumcision (Rom. 4: 11). Often extraordinary events were given as a sign to insure faith or demonstrate authority. When Moses would not believe God, his rod was turned into a serpent and his hand became leprous as signs of God's divine commission (Exod. 4:1-8). Sometimes future events were given as present signs, as in the case of Ahaz (Isa. 7:14). When Christ was born, the place of His birth and His dress were to be signs of His identity to the shepherds. When the Scribes and the Pharisees asked Jesus for a sign, He assured them that no sign was to be given them except the sign of Jonah, whose experience in the fish was to portray Christ's burial and resurrection. Revelation tells that before Christ returns there will be signs in the heavens, in the stars, moon and sun. H.Z.C.

SIGNET (See Seal)

SIHON (sī'hŏn, Heb. sîhôn), a king of the Amorites who became prominent chiefly because of his opposition to Israel on their journey from Egypt to Palestine. His capital in the land E of the Jordan River was Heshbon. Prior to Israel's journey the Amorites under his leadership had driven out the Moabites from this section of land and had taken over this territory. God permitted him to dispossess the Moabites, but when he led the attack against Israel, he was killed and his forces scattered (Num. 21:21-24; Deut. 1:4,20,24-30). His capital was taken and the territory given to Israel. This episode is often referred to as a reminder to Israel of what God had done for them and became a source of encouragement to them (Deut. 3:2). When Jephthah was judge of Israel, the Moabites came and demanded that Israel return this land to them (Judg. 11:12-13). However, Jephthah reminded them that Sihon had seized this property and God had given it to them and, therefore, neither they nor the Ammonites had any right to it.

SIHOR (sī'hôr, Heb. shîhôr, turbid), a body of water mentioned in connection with Egypt (Josh. 13: 3; Isa. 23:3; Jer. 2:18). It is correctly spelled "Shihor." Its identity is uncertain, some thinking it is the Nile River, while others think it is Brook of Egypt, the modern Wady-el-'Arish.

SILAS (sī'lăs, probably the Aramaic form of Saul, asked), a name occurring only in the book of Acts, where it identifies a prominent member of the Jerusalem church (Acts 15:22,32) and a Roman citizen (Acts 16:37), who was sent by the church with Paul and Barnabas to deliver the letter which was formulated by the Jerusalem council to the church at Antioch (Acts 15:22,23). After spending some time at Antioch, Silas returned to Jerusalem. When Paul fell out with Barnabas, he turned for help on his so-called second missionary journey to Silas, whose ministry he no doubt had closely observed at Antioch. Little is said of Silas in Luke's account. He was with Paul at Philippi and shared both in the beating and imprisonment there. When Paul left Berea for Athens, Silas and Timothy were left behind. Apparently Timothy rejoined Paul only at Athens, while Silas stayed on in Macedonia. He, along with Timothy, who had returned to Thessalonica, rejoined Paul at Corinth (Acts 18:5).

Although no further references to the name Silas occur in the NT, it is almost certain that Silvanus is the same person. He joins Paul in the salutation of both I and II Thessalonians (1:1), and is mentioned by Paul in his second letter to the Corinthians with reference to the preaching of Christ at Corinth (II Cor. 1:19). Silvanus also appears as the amanuensis of Peter (I Pet. 5:12). W.W.W.

SILK (Heb. meshî, drawn, Gr. sérikon, silken), a word mentioned four times in the Bible (Prov. 31: 22; Ezek. 16:10,13; Rev. 18:12). It is doubtful if the OT passages refer to silk as we know it, but Revelation 18:12 does. The Greek word is sér, the Greek name for China, from which silk came.

SILLA (sĭl'à, Heb. sillā', embankment), an unknown place in the valley below Millo (II Kings 12:20).

SILOAH, SHILOAH (See Siloam)

SILOAM (sĭ-lō'ăm, Gr. Siloám), a reservoir located within the city walls of Jerusalem at the S end of the Tyropoean Valley. II Kings 20:20 states that Hezekiah "made the pool and the conduit and brought water into the city," and II Chronicles 32:30 that he "closed the upper outlet of the waters of Gihon and directed them down to the west side of the city of David." These words undoubtedly refer to the conduit leading from the intermittent Spring of Gihon (Jerusalem's most important water supply) through the rock Ophel to the reservoir called the Pool of Siloam. The earliest knowledge of this tunnel dates back to 1838 when it was explored by the American traveler and scholar Edward Robinson and his missionary friend Eli Smith. They first attempted to crawl through the tunnel from the Siloam end, but soon found that they were not suitably dressed to crawl through the narrow passage. Three days later, dressed only in a wide pair of Arab drawers, they entered the tunnel from the Spring of Gihon end, and advancing much of the way on their hands and knees and sometimes flat on their stomachs, went the full distance. They measured the tunnel and found it to be 1750 feet in length.

The tunnel is full of twists and turns. The straight line distance from the Spring Gihon to the Pool of Siloam is only 762 feet, less than half the length of the tunnel. Why it follows such a circuitous route has never been adequately explained. Grollenberg suggests that it may have been "to avoid at all costs any interference with the royal tombs, which were quite deeply hewn into the rock on the eastern slope of Ophel" (Atlas of the Bible, New York: Nelson, 1956, p. 93).

In 1867 Captain Charles Warren also explored the tunnel, but neither he nor Robinson and Smith before him, noticed the inscription on the wall of the tunnel near the Siloam end. This was discovered in 1880 by a native boy who, while wading in the tunnel, slipped and fell into the water. When he looked up he noticed the inscription. The boy reported his discovery to his teacher, Herr Conrad Schick, who made the information available to scholars. The inscription was deciphered by A. H. Sayce, with the help of others. It consists of six lines written in Old Hebrew (Canaanite) with prong-like characters. The first half of the inscription is missing, but what remains reads as follows: "[. . . when] (the tunnel) was driven through: — while [. . .] (were) still [. . .] axe(s), each man toward his fellow, and while there were still three cubits to be cut through, [there was heard] the voice of a man calling to his fellow, for there was an overlap in the rock on the right [and on the left]. And when the tunnel was driven through, the quarrymen hewed (the rock), each man toward his fellow, axe against axe; and the water flowed from the spring toward the reservoir for 1,200 cubits, and the height of the rock above the head(s) of the quarrymen was 100 cubits" (Ancient Near Eastern Texts ed. James B. Prichard, Princeton University Press, 1955, p. 321).

The importance of the Siloam inscription can scarcely be overestimated. Not only does it give a fascinating account of the building of the tunnel, but as G. Ernest Wright says it "has for many years been the most important monumental piece of writing in Israelite Palestine, and other Hebrew inscriptions have been dated by comparing the shapes of letters with it" (Biblical Archaeology, Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1957, p. 169).

The Siloam Inscription, in early Hebrew monumental script, dating about 700 B.C. Removed from the walls of the Siloam Tunnel, it is now in the museum at Istanbul, Turkey. © MPS

In 1890 a vandal entered the tunnel and cut the inscription out of the rock. It was subsequently found in several pieces in the possession of a Greek in Jerusalem who claimed he had purchased it from an Arab. The Turkish officials seized the pieces and removed them to Istanbul where they are today.

The Siloam tunnel was not the only conduit which had been built to bring water from the Spring of Gihon into Jerusalem. At least two others preceded it, but neither was adequately protected against enemy attack. It was probably to one of these former conduits that Isaiah referred in the words, "the waters of Shiloah that flow gently" (Isa. 8:6).

It was to the pool of Siloam that Jesus sent the blind man with the command, "Go, wash" (John 9:7). He obeyed, and came back seeing. W.W.W.

SILOAM, TOWER OF (sĭ-lō'ăm), a tower which was probably part of the ancient system of fortifications on the walls of the city of Jerusalem near the pool of Siloam. The collapse of this tower and the resulting death of 18 persons (were they workmen employed on the aqueduct that Pilate was building? Cf. Jos. BJ, II, ix, 4) is cited by Jesus (Luke 13:4). Apparently the accident was well known to His hearers, but is not mentioned elsewhere.

SILOAM, VILLAGE OF (sĭ-lō'ăm). There is no mention of a village by this name in the Bible. However, on the rocky slope across the valley E of the Spring Gihon (see Siloam, above) is a rocky slope on which is situated the modern village of Silwan (Siloam). At this site an inscription over the door of a tomb, discovered at the end of the 19th century but only recently deciphered by Professor N. Avigad, indicates that the tomb may have belonged to Shebna, an official during Hezekiah's time (cf. Isa. 22:15,16).

SILVANUS (See Silas)

SILVER (See Minerals)

SILVERSMITH (See Artificer under Occupations and Professions)

SIMEON (sĭm'ē-ŭn, Heb. shim'ôn, Gr. Symeón). 1. The second son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. 29:33). He and his brother Levi massacred the Hivites living in Shechem because of an injury done to their sister Dinah (Gen. 34:24-31).

2. The tribe of which Simeon, the son of Jacob, became the founder. He had six sons, all but one of whom founded tribal families. At the distribution of the land of Canaan the extreme S of Canaan was assigned to this tribe. Eventually most of the tribe disappeared.

3. An ancestor of Jesus (Luke 3:30).

4. A righteous and devout man to whom the Holy Spirit revealed that he would not die until he had seen the Messiah. When the infant Jesus was brought into the temple, he took Him into his arms and praised God (Luke 2:25,34).

5. Simon Peter (Acts 15:14). See PETER.

6. One of the Christian leaders in the church at Antioch, surnamed Niger, who set apart Paul and Barnabas for their missionary work (Acts 13:1,2). Nothing more is known of him.

SIMEONITE, a member of the tribe of Simeon; see above 2.

SIMILITUDE (sĭ-mĭl'ĭ-tūd, Heb. temûnâh, likeness; demûth, pattern; tavnîth, model; Gr. homoiótes, homoíoma, homoíosis, resemblance). The first word is found four times in the OT (Num. 12:8; Deut. 4:12,15,16), and some form of the divine manifestation seems to be intended. The second word is probably best translated by "pattern," as II Chronicles 4:3 reveals. The third word seems to convey a resemblance of that which it represents (Ps. 106:20; 144:12). The last three words, all derived from the verb homoióo, have the idea of something that is like or similar to another thing (Rom. 5:14; Heb. 7:15; James 3:9). While all three words are found in the LXX, the second of these is used to translate all three of the Hebrew words.

SIMON (sī'mŭn, Gr. Símon, hearing). 1. The son of Jonas, and brother of Andrew, a fisherman who became a disciple and apostle of Christ. He was surnamed Peter, "stone," and Cephas, Aramaic for "rock" (Matt. 4:18; 16:17,18, etc.). See PETER.

2. Another disciple of Jesus called the "Cananaean," a member of the party later called "the Zealots" (Matt. 10:4; Mark 3:18). The word does not mean "inhabitant of Cana." Luke properly translates the Hebrew by zealot (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13).

3. A leper of Bethany in whose house Jesus' head was anointed (Matt. 26:6; Mark 14:3).

4. A brother of the Lord (Matt. 13:55; Mark 6:3).

5. A man from Cyrene, father of Alexander and Rufus, who was compelled to carry the cross of Jesus (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26).

6. A Pharisee in whose house Jesus' feet were anointed by the sinful woman (Luke 7:40,43,44).

7. Judas Iscariot's father (John 6:71; 12:4; 13:2,26).

8. Simon Magus, a sorcerer at Samaria, with great power and influence among the people (Acts 8:9-13). He "believed" as the result of Philip's preaching there, although the real nature of his faith is not clear, as his subsequent action reveals. He undoubtedly was especially impressed by the operation of divine power in Philip, a power which exceeded his own. After being baptized he continued with Philip, hoping, no doubt, to learn more of this power. Subsequently Peter and John were sent from the Jerusalem church to Samaria to pray for the new converts and to lay hands on them with a view to their receiving the Holy Spirit. When Simon saw that the Spirit was given by the laying on of hands he tried to buy this power for himself from the apostles. His request called forth a blistering rebuke by Peter (Acts 8:14-24).

In post-apostolic Christian literature Simon Magus plays a prominent role. He was thought by Irenaeus (Against Heresies, I, 23) to be the founder of Gnosticism and the eponymous leader of the sect of the Simonians. According to Justin Martyr (Apology, I, 26), he went to Rome during the reign of Claudius, and the Acts of Peter relates how he led Roman Christians astray by his false teachings. He is particularly prominent in the pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies where he appears as the arch-opponent of Peter. The relationship between this Simon and the one in Acts is not clear. The actual founder of the sect of the Simonians may have been confused early in the Church with the Simon of Acts.

9. A tanner who lived at Joppa with whom Peter stayed "for many days" (Acts 9:43; 10:6,17,32). W.W.W.

SIMON MACCABEUS (sī'mŭn măk'ă-bē-ŭs), the second son of the priest Mattathias. He was surnamed Thassi, and was the elder brother of Judas Maccabeus. With his father and brothers he fought against the Syrians. At his father's death, he was made the adviser of the family. Eventually, as the last surviving member of the family, he succeeded in defeating the Syrians. He was acknowledged by the Jews as high priest, captain and leader, and was authorized to wear the purple. In 135 B.C. he was murdered by his son-in-law while visiting the cities of his dominion.

SIMON MAGUS (See Simon)

SIMPLE (Heb. pethî, silly, Gr. ákakos, akéraios, harmless). The basic idea of the word in the OT is "easily influenced" (Ps. 19:7; 119:130; Prov. 7:7). The two uses of the word in the NT (Rom. 16:18,19) carry the idea of being harmless or guileless.

SIMRI (sĭ'mrī, Heb. shimrî), a son of the Levite, Hosah. David appointed him as doorkeeper in the temple. While not the firstborn, he was made head of his tribe (I Chron. 26:10).

SIN (Heb. hāttā'th, missing; pesha', transgression; 'awôn, perversion; ra', evil in disposition; resha', impiety; Gr. hamartía, missing the mark; parábasis, transgression; adikía, unrighteousness; asébeia, impiety; anomía, contempt and violation of law; ponería, depravity; epithumía, lust). According to the Bible, the first sin in the universe was an act of free will in which the creature deliberately, responsibly and with adequate understanding of the issues, chose to corrupt the holy, godly character with which God originally endowed His creation.

There is definite indication in the Bible that mankind is not the only order of created personal beings among whom sin has become an actuality. In Jude, verse six, there is reference to "the angels that did not keep their own realm (arche) but left their proper dwelling." The parallel verse, II Peter 2:4, speaks of "the angels that sinned."

The Biblical writers assume that Satan is the chief of the fallen angels. In I John 3:8 we read, ". . . the devil sins from the beginning." From I Timothy 3:6, it is suggested that Satan's root or basic sin was pride. The words of Jesus are more explicit, "He [the Devil] was a murderer from the beginning. He did not take his stand in the truth; [this is evident] because truth is not in him. When he speaks falsehood he speaks out of his own things for he is a falsifier and the father of falsehood" (John 8:44).

Jesus' statement that the Devil is, from the beginning, a murderer and a falsifier is probably based upon the fact that by falsehood Satan brought about the fall of man, in which man (1) became liable to physical death, (2) became liable to eternal punishment, "the second death," and (3) became spiritually dead, that is, alienated from fellowship with God (Gen. 3).

There are expositors who hold that, aside from the above rather clear references to the fall of Satan, the prophetic denunciations of Babylon (Isa. 13: and 14:, especially 14:12-14) and of the King of Tyre (Ezek. 28:1-19, especially vss. 12-19) contain references to Satan's original status and his fall. We must reject "double meaning" exegesis, but it is not unreasonable to hold that certain sentences in these prophecies may contain analogies which would throw light upon Satan's probable original status and fall.

The statements are not very full, but yet the Biblical account of the primeval origin of sin is clear enough: Sin first became actual in an order of personal beings who are not a race (Matt. 22:30; Mark 12:25; Luke 20:35,36). They do not have racial solidarity or racial representative responsibility. This order of beings, presumably having fully adequate understanding of the holy character of God and of God's impartation of His holy character to His creatures, were endowed with the power of ethical spiritual choice. Some of these beings, including Satan as the chief, deliberately chose to corrupt their God-given holy character, and chose further to spread their corruption as widely as possible in God's creation. Their sin was the act of a group of individuals as individuals and does not involve the "federal" or representative principle. Since their sin was, we suppose, a deliberate act with fully adequate understanding, it is analogous to the fully conscious and responsible act, subsequent to conviction by the Holy Spirit, in which act Jesus said that the sinner is "guilty of eternal sin" (Mark 3:29). In other words, they sinned without remedy.

The original human sin is very simply recorded in the third chapter of Genesis, and its implications for mankind are expounded in Romans 5:12-21. Man was created with a holy, godly nature, in fellowship with God. He was placed in an environment which was "all very good." He was then tempted by Satan, and he deliberately chose the path of self-corruption and enmity against God.

Unlike the angels, mankind is not a mere aggregate of individuals. Man is a race with group solidarity, and representative responsibility. The representative principle governs all of human life. Just as every American must say, "I signed the Declaration of Independence in 1776," or "I declared war Dec. 7, 1941," similarly, every descendant of Adam must say, "I became a wicked corrupt sinner in the garden of Eden; and I crucified the Lord of Glory at Calvary. My representatives did it, and the action was mine."

The nature of sin is suggested by the nature of the origin of sin in the universe, and the nature of the original sin of the human race. "Sin is any want of conformity unto, or transgression of, the law of God" (Westminster Shorter Catechism. Cf. I John 3:4).

The Biblical view of sin, however, does not depend wholly upon the concept of law, for the Biblical writers appeal to the holy character of God as the basis of the law. "Ye shall be holy for I, Jehovah, your God, am holy" (Lev. 19:2), is the constant presupposition. It was the revelation of the holy character of God (Isa. 6:1-6) which caused Isaiah to recognize his own sinful corruption. Thus sin is not only violation of the divine law, which is an expression of God's will; more profoundly, it is violation of the expression of God's holy character. It is corruption of the goodness which God originally imparted to His creatures; especially is it the corruption of the godliness with which God originally endowed man when He created him in His own image.

Sin may then be defined ultimately as anything in the creature which does not express, or which is contrary to, the holy character of the Creator. Sin then is not merely what we do, but what we are. There is sin in our race and in our nature.

The remedy for sin, according to the Biblical view (Rom. 5:12ff), is based equally upon the representative principle. In the time of world war II one might have repudiated the act of Congress in declaring war. He would then have been moved to a concentration camp. Tojo would have been his representative and Pearl Harbor would have been his deed.

Reversing the figure, the believer says, I repudiate my sin and I accept the One who died at Calvary as my representative. In Him, I died for my sins. My only hope is His substitutionary atonement, for He bore my sin "in His own body on the tree" (I Pet. 2:24). J.O.B.

SIN (Heb. sîn, clay), an Egyptian city mentioned only in Ezekiel 30:15,16, called by the Greeks "Pelusium," lying on the eastern arm of the Nile River. Ezekiel refers to it as "the stronghold of Egypt (Ezek. 30:15). A wall was built on the S, and with the sea on the N and impassable swamps on the other sides the city was practically impregnable. Since Thebes and Sin were at the opposite ends of Egypt, mentioning these two cities as Ezekiel does implies God's judgment falling upon the entire land of Egypt.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF, a wilderness through which the Israelites passed between Elim and Mt. Sinai (Exod. 16:1; 17:1; Num. 33:11,12). It is probably to be identified with Debbet er-Ramleh, a sandy tract in the interior of the peninsula of Sinai at the foot of Jebel et-Tih, but the coastal plain of el-Markhah has also been suggested. The fixing of its position depends upon the location of Mt. Sinai, on the exact site of which scholars are in disagreement.

SINAI (sī'nī, Heb.. sînay, meaning uncertain), a word used in three senses in the Old Testament:

1. It is applied to a peninsula which lay to the south of the Wilderness of Paran between the Gulf of Aqabah and Suez on the E and W respectively. This peninsula has a triangular shape and is 150 miles wide at the N and 250 miles long. Some of the Egyptian dynasties claimed this region as some of their most valued area. They carried on mining operations for turquoise, iron and copper, and much of their red granite and pink gneiss came from this locality.

2. It is applied to a wilderness, the "Wilderness of Sinai" (Exod. 19:1). It is the place where Israel came in the third month after they left Egypt. It may be used loosely as a synonym for the Sinaitic Peninsula but probably technically does not embrace as much territory.

3. Finally, there is the mountain often referred to as Mount Sinai (Exod. 19:20), or Horeb. It was on this mountain that God met and talked with Moses and gave him the law (Exod. 19:3). There has been much debate over the exact location of Mount Sinai. There are four possible sites: (1) Mount Serbal, on Wadi Feiran. A serious objection to this identification, however, is that there is no plain large enough in the neighborhood to offer camping ground for a large host; (2) Jebel Musa (Mountain of Moses) and Ras Safsaf, a short ridge with two peaks, one with an altitude of 6,540 feet and the other 7,363 feet. St. Catherine's Monastery, a monastery of Greek monks, is located at the foot of Jebel Musa; (3) Jebel Hellal, a 2,000 foot elevation 30 miles S of El-a'Arish; and (4) Mount Seir, on the edge of the Arabah. The only later visit to the mount recorded in Scripture is Elijah's when he fled from Jezebel (I Kings 19:8). H.Z.C.

SINEW (sĭ'nū, Heb. gîdh, sinew), the tendons and sinews of the body (Gen. 32:32; Job. 40:17; Ezek 37:6-8). It is used once in a figurative sense (Isa. 48:4).

SINGING (See Song; Music)

SINGLE EYE (Gr. ophthalmós haploús, a healthy eye), an eye that is clear, sound, and healthy, with the connotation generous (Matt. 6:22; Luke 11:34).

SINIM (sī'nĭm, Heb. sînîm), a country cited in a prophecy by Isaiah (49:12) to illustrate God's promise that the dispersed Israelites would some day be gathered from the farthest regions of the earth. It is obviously not W or N, since both are mentioned in the prophecy. It must, therefore, be S or E, and apparently very far away. The most widely held view is that China is meant, either because some Israelites were already living there or would live there. There is evidence that the Jews traded with the Chinese as early as the third century B.C. H.Z.C.

SINITES (sī'nīts, Heb. sînî), a tribe descended from Canaan (Gen. 10:17; I Chron. 1:15). No definite identification is possible.

SION, MOUNT (sī'ŭn, Heb. sî'ôn, lofty, Gr. Seón), one of the varied designations by which Mount Hermon is referred to (Deut. 4:48).

SIPHMOTH (sĭf'mŏth, Heb. siphmôth), a place in the southern part of Judah to which David often came (I Sam. 30:28). The site has not been positively identified.

SIPPAI (sĭp'ī, Heb. saph), a man, known also as Saph, descended from the giants. He was slain at Geser by Sibbechai (I Chron. 20:4).

SIRACH, SON OF (sī'răk, Gr. Sirách), the supposed author of the Apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus. He calls himself "Jesus, the Son of Sirach the Jerusalemite." He wrote about 190-170 B.C.

SIRAH (sī'rà, Heb. sirâh), a well mentioned in II Samuel 3:26. It is probably 'Ain Sarah which is located about a mile N of old Hebron.

SIRION (sĭr'ĭ-ŏn, Heb. siryôn, coat of mail), a name given to Mt. Hermon by the Zidonians (Deut. 3:9). It is called Shirion in Psalm 29:6.

SISMAI, SISAMAI (sĭs'mī, sĭs'à-mī, Heb. sismay), a son of Eleasah from the tribe of Judah. One who descended from Sheshan's daughter (I Chron. 2:40).

SISERA (sĭs'êr-à, Heb. sîserā'). 1. A man employed by Jabin, king of Hazor, as the captain in his army. In Judges, chapters four and five, we have the account of the battle which was carried on between Sisera and Barak. Sisera was a thorn in Israel's side for 20 years, waging war against them with 900 iron chariots (Judg. 4:2-3). Finally, Deborah the prophetess, who judged Israel at that time, urged Barak under the direction of God to unite his forces and go against Sisera. She assured him that God would deliver him into Barak's hands. He agreed, if Deborah would go with him, and she gave her consent. These two armies met in battle on the plain at the foot of Mount Tabor (Judg. 4:14). The forces of Sisera were killed or scattered and Sisera fled on foot, taking refuge in the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber, the Kenite. Here he was killed by Jael while he slept in her tent. The remarkable victory was celebrated by the song of Deborah.

2. The name Sisera is found again in the names of the Nethinim (Ezra 2:53; Neh. 7:55) who returned from captivity under Zerubbabel's leadership. See BARAK, DEBORAH.

SISTER (Heb. 'āhôth, Gr. adelphé), a word used in both Hebrew and Greek with varying ideas. In the OT it is used of females having the same parents, having but one parent in common, a kinswoman and a woman of the same country (Gen. 20:12; Num. 25:18; Lev. 18:9; Job 42:11). In the NT it is used of girls belonging to the same family or just to blood relatives (Matt. 13:56; Mark 6:3; Luke 10:39). It also has a figurative sense as seen in several places in the Bible (Ezek. 16:45; 23:11; Rom. 16:1; II John 13).

SITNAH (sĭt'nà, Heb. sitnâh, hostility), the name given to the second well dug by Isaac (Gen. 26:21), suggesting a contest between the Israelites and the people of Gerah.

SIVAN (sē-vàn', Heb. sîwān), the name given to the third month of the Hebrew sacred year which is the ninth month of the civil year (Esth. 8:9). See CALENDAR.

SKIN (Heb. 'ôr, naked, geledh, smooth, bāsār, flesh, Gr. dérma, skin). One of the very common words in the OT, 'ôr is used of both animal skin (Gen. 3:21; 27:16; Jer. 13:23) and human skin (Exod. 34:35; Lev. 13:2; and Job 7:5). Geledh is found only once in the Bible (Job 16:15) describing the action of Job putting sackcloth on his body. This was a tight-fitting garment expressive of mourning and perhaps suggests the sad condition of Job's physical appearance. Bāsār is the most common word used for human flesh (Gen. 2:21; II Kings 4:34; Prov. 14:30) and for the flesh of animals (Lev. 7:15).

Skins of animals were used as bottles both for water and for wine. They formed many useful articles of clothing. Various kinds formed the protection for the tabernacle in the wilderness. Ezekiel tells of shoes being made from skins (Ezek. 16:10).

The word is also used figuratively in several places (Job 2:4; 19:20). The two Greek words are used only three times in the NT and in each case speak of articles of clothing.

SKIRT (See Dress)

SKULL (See Golgotha)

SKY (Heb. shahaq, vapor), a word found only in the plural in the Bible (Ps. 18:11; Isa. 45:8). The word refers sometimes to the clouds and other times to the firmament. At least once it is used figuratively (Deut. 33:26).

SLANDER (Heb. dibbâh, slander, Gr. diábolos, slanderer), a malicious utterance designed to hurt or defame the person about whom it is uttered. The Scriptures frequently warn against it (Lev. 19:16; Ezek. 22:9; Eph. 4:31; Col. 3:8; James 4:11).

SLAVE, SLAVERY (Heb. 'evedh, servant, slave, Gr. dóulos, bondslave, servant). While the Hebrew and Greek words are very common in the Bible, the English word slave is found but twice (Jer. 2:14; Rev. 18:13), and the word slavery does not occur at all in the KJV, because both the Hebrew and the Greek word involved are more often rendered "servant."

Among the Hebrews, slaves could be acquired in a number of ways: as prisoners of war (Num. 31:7-9); by purchase (Lev. 25:44); by gift (Gen. 29:24); by accepting a person in lieu of a debt (Lev. 25:39); by birth from slaves already possessed (Exod. 21:4); by arrest if the thief had nothing to pay for the object stolen (Exod. 22:2-3); and by the voluntary decision of the person wanting to be a slave (Exod. 21:6). Slaves among the Hebrews were more kindly treated than slaves among other nations, since the Mosaic Law laid down rules governing their treatment. They could gain their freedom in a number of ways (Exod. 21:2-27; Lev. 25:25ff; Deut. 15:12-23). Slavery continued in NT times, but the love of Christ seemed to militate against its continued existence (Eph. 6:5-9; Gal. 3:28).

SLEEP (Heb. shēnâh, yāshēn, shākhav, Gr. hýpnos), a word used in a number of ways in the Bible. Its most natural use is to refer to physical rest (1 Sam. 26:7; Jonah 1:5-6). Most cases of physical sleep were natural ones, but some were supernaturally imposed to accomplish a divine purpose (Gen. 2:21; 15:12). Believers' rest in sleep is considered a gift from God (Ps. 127:2).

Methods of sleep varied usually with the social status of the people. The most common bed was simply a mat (Matt. 9:6). No special bed clothes were provided in this case, but those worn in the day were used (Exod. 22:26-27). Wealthy people had more elaborate beds variously constructed (Deut. 3:11; I Sam. 19:13).

Sleep is also used figuratively in the Bible, sometimes referring to those who are spiritually indolent (Matt. 25:5; Rom. 13:11) and to indicate the death of the believer (I Cor. 11:30; I Thess. 4:13).

SLIME (Heb. hēmār, boiling up, zepheth, flowing). Perhaps the two most common uses of this substance are found in Genesis 11:3 and Exodus 2:3. Probably it resembled asphalt and was used as a cement for bricks as well as for water-proofing. It is thought to be derived from natural gas and petroleum through a process of oxidation. In early Biblical history it seemed to be plentiful in the area around the Dead Sea.

SLIP (Heb. zemôrâh, pruned), a cutting from a plant. It is used but once in the Bible (Isa. 17:10).

SLOTHFUL (Heb. ātsal, indolent; remiyyâh, treachery; rāphâh, slack; Gr. nothrós, sluggish; oknerós, indolent). The combined idea from these words is that of a person who is undependable because of his laziness.

SLOW (Heb. kāvēdh, heavy; 'erekh, to make long; Gr. bradýs, dull; árgos, inactive). Moses says he is slow of speech (Exod. 4:10). This does not refer to any particular defect but simply to the fact that his words did not come readily. "Long-suffering" would almost be a synonym of 'erekh as seen in many OT passages (Neh. 9:17; Ps. 103:8; 145:8). It always has a reference to the passions in the OT. The Greek words are found only three times in the NT (Luke 24:25; Titus 1:12; James 1:19).

SLUGGARD (See Slothful)

SMITH (See Occupations & Professions)

SMYRNA (smîr'nà, Gr. Smýrna), a port on the W coast of Asia Minor at the head of the gulf into which the Hermus debouches, a well protected harbor, and the natural terminal of a great inland trade-route up the Hermus valley. Smyrna's early history was checkered. It was destroyed by the Lydians in 627 B.C., and for three centuries was little more than a village. It was refounded in the middle of the fourth century before Christ, after Alexander's capture of Sardis, and rapidly became the chief city of Asia. Smyrna was shrewd enough to mark the rising star of Rome. A common danger, the aggression of Antiochus the Great of Syria, had united the two states at the end of the third century before Christ, and the bond formed in the face of the eastern peril remained unbroken. Smyrna was, indeed, the handiest of bridgeheads, a useful Roman counterpoise in Aegean waters to the naval power of Rhodes. It was to this ancient alliance, which Smyrna referred in A.D. 26, when the city petitioned Tiberius to allow the community to build a temple to his deity (Tac. Ann. 4.56). The permission was granted, and Smyrna built the second Asian temple to the Emperor. The city had worshiped Rome as a spiritual power since 195 B.C.; hence Smyrna's historical pride in her Caesar-cult. Smyrna was famous for science, medicine, and the majesty of its buildings. Apollonius of Tyana refers to her "crown of porticoes," a circle of beautiful public buildings which ringed the summit of Mount Pagos like a diadem; hence John's reference (Rev. 2:10). Polycarp, Smyrna's martyred bishop of A.D. 155, had been a disciple of John. E.M.B.

SNARE (Heb. pah, a spring net; Gr. pagís, trap; bróchos, a noose), a device for catching both birds (Ps. 124:7) and animals. The words are employed often in the Bible in a figurative sense. "Snares of death" is a phrase used often to imply anything that might destroy (Ps. 91:3; 141:9). The word also is used in a variety of ways to point out things God's people should avoid: heathen gods (Deut. 7:16); the ephod Gideon made (Judg. 8:27); false prophets (Hos. 9:8); and riches (I Tim. 6:9).

SNOUT (Heb. 'aph, nostril), the long, projecting nose of a beast, as of a pig. In Proverbs 11:22 a woman without discretion is compared to a jewel of gold in the swine's snout.

SNOW (Heb. shelegh, white; telagh, white; Gr. chión). Snow is common in the hill country of Palestine. It never becomes very deep and it is not uncommon to have winters without any. The tops of the high mountains are covered with snow most of the year and this becomes the source of much of the water there. It is stored in caves in the mountains in the winter for cooling beverages and for refrigerating purposes in the summer.

The Bible often refers to snow in a figurative sense. "Time of snow" seems to be a figure representing a winter day (II Sam. 23:20) and "fear of snow" is a similar phrase representing cold (Prov. 31:21). It is a symbol of the highest purity and stands for the condition of the redeemed soul (Isa. 1:18; Ps. 51:7); and the righteousness of the believer (Rev. 19:8). It symbolizes whiteness and purity (Matt. 28:3; Rev. 1:14). It describes the whiteness of the leper (II Kings 5:27). H.Z.C.

SNUFF (Heb. sha'aph, to inhale; naphah, to blow at). The first Hebrew word expresses the practice of wild asses who pant for wind like the dragons in view of the heat (Jer. 14:6). Malachi uses the second Hebrew word in a symbolic sense to express contempt for God's sacrifices (Mal. 1:13).

SO (Heb. sô'), the name of a king of Egypt, mentioned in II Kings 17:4 as king in the days of Ahaz, king of Judah, and Hoshea, king of Israel. Hoshea made an alliance with So, bringing down the wrath of Assyria upon Israel (II Kings 17:5). It is difficult to identify him. He is either the king mentioned in Herodotus by the name of Sabaeo, or he is to be identified with Sib'e who, in 720 B.C., because of his alliance with the king of Gaza, Hanun, had to fight with Sargon, by whom he was defeated.

SOAP (Heb. bōrîth). Soap in a modern sense was unknown in OT times. Even today it is not used in some parts of Syria. Clothes, cooking utensils, and even the body were cleansed with the ashes of certain plants containing alkali (e.g., soapwort, glasswort, and saltwort). This cleansing material is referred to in Jeremiah 2:22 and Malachi 3:2.

SOCHO, SOCOCH, SOCOH (sō'kō, Heb. sōkhōh, branches). 1. One of the cities given to the tribe of Judah (Josh. 15:35). Later on King Rehoboam strengthened this city after the northern tribes had revolted (II Chron. 11:7). From this city Solomon drew his supplies (I Kings 4:10). It is identified with Khirbet Shuweikeh.

2. About ten miles SW of Hebron lies another city by this name (Josh. 15:48).

SOCKET (See Tabernacle)

SODI (sō'dī, Heb. sôdhî), the father of the Israelite spy representing the tribe of Zebulun (Num. 13:10).

SODOM (sŏd'ŭm, Heb. sedhōm, Gr. Sódoma), one of the so-called "Cities of the Plain," the others being Admah, Gomorrah, Zeboiim, and Zoar. The site of "the Plain" has been variously conjectured. A purple passage in Sir George Adam Smith runs: "Though the glare of this catastrophe burns still, the ruins of it have entirely disappeared, and there remains in the valley no authentic trace of the names it has torn and scattered to infamy across the world" (Hist. Geog. of the Holy Land, pp. 504, 505). Little more can be said, though recently the suggestion has been revived that "the Plain" is the shallow southern end of the Dead Sea, and that the waters cover the remains. Underwater archaeology may or may not confirm this assertion which appears first to have been made by Thomson in his 19th century classic, The Land and the Book.

Above, Jebel Usdum, the so-called Hill of Sodom, at the southern end of the Dead Sea. Below, ruins at Tel Ghassul, one of the supposed sites of Sodom in Trans-Jordan, excavated by Jesuits. © MPS

An area round the northern end of the Dead Sea was later favored, mainly on the grounds that this region only is fully within the range of vision from Bethel, from which vantage point Lot made his fatal choice (Gen. 13:10-12). The southern end is shut off by the high country round Engedi. Abraham's field of view from a point E of Hebron, from which he looked in the morning towards Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 19:28), may lead to the same conclusion. Reply might be made that what the patriarch saw was the column of smoke from whatever form of catastrophe destroyed the whole area. Attempts have been made to pin-point the site by a reconstruction of the invasion-route of the raid described in Genesis 14. According to II Chronicles 20:2 Hazazon-tamar is Engedi, half-way up the western shore of the Dead Sea. If the invaders, circling the sea from the S, clashed with the Amorites here, then they must have continued N to capture Sodom, and not returned upon their tracks. But could not the Hazazon-tamar of Genesis 14 be the Tamar of Ezekiel 47:19 to the SW of the water? Zoar can be located on the Moabite shore from Isaiah 15:5 and Jeremiah 48:34, and at the southern end of the sea from Josephus (B.J. 4:8:4), but Deuteronomy 34:3 assumes that the town was visible from Pisgah. Perhaps there were two towns of the name. The conclusion is that, failing conclusive archaeological evidence, the Cities of the Plain must be listed as lost. Sodom, on account of the story of Genesis 19, became a name for vice, infamy, and judgment (Isa. 1:9 and 10; 3:9; Jer. 23:14; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:46, 48,49,53,55; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9; Matt. 10:15; Luke 17:29; Rom. 9:29; II Pet. 2:6; Jude 7; Rev. 11:8). Hence the KJV term in Deuteronomy 23:17; I Kings 14:24, and elsewhere. It was the theme of judgment on iniquity which was in the mind of the Jew or Christian who, some time before the eruption of A.D. 79, scribbled on a wall in Pompeii "SODOMA GOMORRA." E.M.B.

SODOMA (See Sodom)

SODOMITE (See Sodomy)

SODOMY (sŏd'ŭm-ĕ, Heb. qādhēsh, a male temple prostitute). A sodomite was one who practiced that unnatural vice for which Sodom became noted (Gen. 19:5). Though not named as such it is referred to in Romans 1:27. God strictly forbade this practice (Deut. 23:17). Usually the practice was in connection with heathen worship, and its presence was a sign of departure from the Lord (I Kings 14:24). Both Asa (I Kings 15:12) and Jehoshaphat took measures against this sin (I Kings 22:46), but its practice continued, until in the days of Josiah it was being practiced in Jehovah's house (II Kings 23:7).

SOLDER (sŏ'dêr, Heb. deveq, joint), a metallic substance used to join metals together (Isa. 41:7).

SOLDIER (See Occupations & Professions, also Warfare)

SOLOMON (sŏl'ō-mŭn, Heb. shelōmōh, peaceable), the third and last king of united Israel. He built the kingdom to its greatest geographical extension and material prosperity. Though a very intelligent man, Solomon in his later years lost his spiritual discernment and for the sake of political advantage and voluptuous living succumbed to apostasy. His policies of oppression and luxury brought the kingdom to the verge of dissolution, and when his son Rehoboam came to the throne the actual split of the kingdom occurred. Solomon was the second son of David and Bathsheba, the former wife of Uriah the Hittite. When he was born, the Lord loved him, so that the child was also called Jedidiah, "beloved of the Lord" (II Sam. 12:24-25). He did not enter into the history of Israel until in David's advanced old age, when a conspiracy attempted to make Adonijah, the son of David and Haggith, king. Nathan and Bathsheba quickly collaborated to persuade David of the seriousness of the situation, and David had Solomon anointed king at Gihon by Zadok the priest while the conspirators were still gathered at En-rogel. As David's death drew near, he gave Solomon practical advice as to faithfulness to God, the building of the temple, and the stability of the dynasty. Solomon had to deal harshly with Adonijah and his followers when they continued to plot against him. Adonijah and Joab were put to death and Abiathar the priest was expelled from the priesthood. Solomon made Benaiah head of the army and Zadok became priest in Abiathar's stead. David had also told Solomon to kill Shimei, who had cursed David at the time of Absalom's revolt; this was done by Solomon, after placing Shimei on a probation which Shimei violated.

Solomon now began a series of marriage alliances which were his eventual undoing. He married the daughter of the king of Egypt, who had sufficient power to capture Gezer and to present it as a dowry to his daughter. Early in his reign he loved the Lord; he sacrificed at the great high place of Gibeon, where the tabernacle was located; here he offered a thousand burnt offerings. That night at Gibeon the Lord appeared to him in a dream and told him to make a request of Him of whatever he desired. Solomon chose above all else understanding and discernment. God was pleased with this choice and granted his request and also gave him riches and honor. A demonstration of this gift came upon his return to Jerusalem, where his decision in the case of two harlots caused the people to see that God's wisdom was in the king. He was an efficient administrator: each department had its appointed officers and the country was divided into 12 districts, different from the tribal divisions, each responsible for the provisions of the royal household for a month of the year. The corvée was in operation against the descendants of subjugated peoples and with taxation and conscription Israel began to see some of the evils of monarchy against which Samuel had warned (I Sam. 8:11ff), though during the reign of Solomon "Judah and Israel were as many as the sand of the sea; they ate and drank and were happy" (I Kings 4:20 RSV). The kingdom extended from the Euphrates in the N to the border of Egypt in the SW.

Solomon was a wise and learned man; it is stated that his wisdom was greater than that of the wise men of the East and of Egypt. He was expert in botany and zoology; he was a writer, credited with 3,000 proverbs and 1,005 songs; he is named the author of the Song of Songs, his greatest song (Song of Solomon 1:1), the book of Proverbs (Prov. 1:1), Ecclesiastes (Eccl. 1:1,12); and two Psalms (cf. titles, Pss. 72, 127). His fame was widespread and people came from afar to hear him. He made an alliance with Hiram king of Tyre, who had been a friend of David. This relationship was of great advantage to him, who now undertook a tremendous building program, particularly that of the temple in Jerusalem on Mt. Moriah. He contracted with Hiram for the supply of cedar and cypress wood and arranged for Phoenician builders to supplement the Israelite corvée. A chronological reference is supplied in I Kings 6:1, which states that the year that construction of the temple was begun numbered the fourth year of Solomon and the 480th year after the Exodus from Egypt. David had wanted to build the temple, but the Lord reserved that privilege for Solomon (II Sam. 7:13; I Chron. 17:4-6,12; 22:6-11; 28:6); nevertheless, Solomon got the complete plan of the structure from his father (I Chron. 28:11-19). David had also gathered much building material, especially precious metals and other costly commodities, and had taken freewill offerings for the building of the temple (I Kings 7:51; I Chron. 22:2-5; 29:1-19). A description of the temple is given in some detail (I Kings 6:2-36). It is said incidentally that "he built the inner court with three courses of hewn stone and one course of cedar beams" (vs. 36; cf. 7:12). The archaeologists of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago found at Megiddo evidence of the use of this technique in the Solomonic level.

The temple was finished in seven years and Solomon's palace was 13 years in building. The latter consisted of various houses or halls: the House of the Forest of Lebanon; the Hall of Pillars; the Hall of the Throne (also the Hall of Judgment); his royal quarters; and a palace for his Egyptian wife. A great amount of bronze was used for ornamental work, for architectural features such as the two large pillars of the temple vestibule, and for decorative and functional articles, such as the altar, the molten sea, and all sorts of utensils and implements used in the temple service. This part of the project was the responsibility of a craftsman, Hiram of Tyre (I Kings 7:14 RSV; cf. II Chron. 2:13-14). Much of the copper used for these purposes probably came from mines worked by the Israelites. It is only in comparatively recent years that the great mining and smelting enterprises of Solomon have become known, for they are not referred to in the Bible. In his explorations in the Negev, Glueck found that the area was of much importance in Solomonic times. Many towns were built and fortified and a number of copper mines were worked and the preliminary processing done nearby. Exploration led to the identification of Tell el Kheleifeh as Ezion-geber (proposed earlier by F. Frank). Excavation here brought to light the remains of an industrial town, with blast furnaces utilizing the prevailing winds to operate on the principle of the Bessemer forced-air draft.

When the temple was completed, an impressive dedication service was held. The Ark of the Covenant was brought up from Zion by the priests and was placed in the Holy of Holies. Solomon blessed the people, and made a heartfelt prayer of dedication. Sacrifices were made and fire from heaven consumed them. Finally, a great feast was held. The Lord appeared to Solomon again, as at Gibeon; He had heard his supplication and now promised to establish his heirs as He had promised to do for David, if he and his descendants remained faithful to the Lord. After the celebration of the dedication, Solomon settled accounts with Hiram king of Tyre. Solomon gave him 20 cities in the land of Galilee, but when Hiram inspected them and was not satisfied, he also paid him 120 talents of gold. Solomon's work of building extended throughout the land, with labor provided by a forced levy of the descendants of the people Israel did not annihilate at the time of the conquest. He built at Gezer, Hazor, Megiddo, Upper Beth-horon, Lower Beth-horon, Baalath, Tadmor in the wilderness, and in Lebanon. He did additional building at Jerusalem. He made store-cities and cities for his chariots and cavalry throughout the domain. No longer need Israel fear for lack of armaments. Solomon had 1400 chariots and 12,000 horsemen (II Chron. 1:14); he also had 4,000 stalls for horses (II Chron. 9:25). Stables for at least 450 horses were found at Megiddo: similar stables were excavated at Gezer, Taanach, Tell el Hesi, and Tell el Far'ah. He also engaged in a profitable trade in chariots and horses between Egypt and the Hittites. His commercial interests led him to the sea; since the Mediterranean coast afforded no good harborage in the area held by him, he made his port at Ezion-geber near Eloth on the Gulf of Akabah of the Red Sea. Again he was assisted by Hiram, who provided Phoenician seamen (II Chron. 8:18).

The rulers were enriched by this trade with the East; Ophir was a source of gold, "almug (algum) wood," and precious stones. Solomon's ships also went to Tarshish with the Phoenician fleet and brought back all sorts of exotic things. Tremendous wealth thus came to Solomon by commerce, mining, tribute (I Kings 4:21), and gifts from visitors (10:25). Among the most distinguished of these visitors was the queen of Sheba. Women were a serious weakness of Solomon; not only did he make many political alliances through marriage, but he "loved many foreign women" (I Kings 11:1) and he "clung to these in love" (vs. 2). God had warned that such marriages would lead to apostasy; the harem of Solomon held a collection of some 700 wives and 300 concubines; and "his wives turned away his heart after other gods; and his heart was not wholly true after the Lord his God" (vs. 4 RSV). He built places of worship for the false gods to satisfy his heathen wives. The Lord was angered at Solomon's failure to keep His explicit commands and announced to him the rift in the kingdom which was to take place in the reign of his son.

The rule of Solomon had been quite peaceful, but trouble was brewing. Hadad the Edomite, who as a child had survived a raid by David and had escaped to Egypt, now returned to plague him. In Syria Rezon was made king at Damascus and became an enemy of Israel. In Israel a capable young man, Jeroboam the son of Nebat, was informed by the Prophet Ahijah that he would become ruler of 10 tribes of Israel. Solomon attempted to kill Jeroboam, but Jeroboam took refuge in Egypt until the death of Solomon. The signs of the impending division of the kingdom were evident; when he died in 930 B.C. and his son Rehoboam became king, the break soon became a reality. Other historical records of Solomon's reign cited in the Bible include "the book of the acts of Solomon" (I Kings 11:41), "the history of Nathan the prophet," "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and "the visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat" (II Chron. 9:29 RSV). A great temporal ruler, possessing every natural advantage, almost inconceivably wealthy in material splendor, learning, and experience, Solomon was nevertheless a disappointment. Though he began so well, the tragedy of his gradual apostasy had more disastrous results than the infamous scandal of his father, who sincerely repented and was a man after the Lord's own heart. C.E.D.

SOLOMON, SONG OF (Heb. shîr ha-shîrîm) is unique among Biblical books, for its story centers in the joys and distresses of the love relationship between a man and a woman.

Name. The Hebrew name, "The Song of Songs," is taken from 1:1, which introduces the book as "the song of songs which is Solomon's." This use of the Hebrew superlative makes the book the best of the 1,005 songs of Solomon (I Kings 4:32) or perhaps the greatest of all songs.

Authorship and date. There is considerable range of opinion as to the authorship and date of the book. R. Pfeiffer concludes that the Song of Songs is "an anthology of erotic poems," of c. 250 B.C., using the language as the sole criterion for the date. The frequent use of Aramaic forms and words and the presence of names of foreign products, a Persian word, and a Greek word are taken as evidence for a late date. On the other hand, it has been pointed out that these usages are not inconsistent with Solomonic authorship. In view of the extensive commerce and widespread diplomatic relations of Solomon, the presence of foreign terms, especially for articles imported or imitated from foreign sources, is to be expected. The use of Aramaic is no indication of date and may also be accounted for by the northern origin of the Shulammite. The book ascribes its authorship to Solomon and there are lines of evidence which agree with this ascription. The book has relationships with other writings attributed to Solomon. The author's acquaintance with plants and animals is reminiscent of Solomon (I Kings 4:33). The mention of "a mare of Pharaoh's chariots" (1:9, RSV) accords with Solomon's engaging in horse-trading with Egypt and with his being married to a daughter of the pharaoh. The lover is called "the king" (1:4) and there are other indications of his royal interests, in addition to references to Solomon by name. The place-names range throughout Palestine and thus fit well with an origin predating the divided kingdom.

Content. Though the book is difficult of analysis, the divisions of Delitzsch are often followed. (1) The mutual admiration of the lovers, 1:2-2:7; (2) Growth in love, 2:8-3:5; (3) The marriage, 3:6-5:1; (4) Longing of the wife for her absent husband, 5:2-6:9; (5) The beauty of the Shulammite bride, 6:10-8:4; (6) The wonder of love, 8:5-8:14.

Interpretation. There is great diversity and much overlapping among interpretations of the Song of Solomon. Various views are: 1. Allegorical, 2. Typical, 3. Literal, 4. Dramatic, 5. Erotic-literary, 6. Liturgical, and 7. Didactic-moral.

1. The Allegorical view may be Jewish, Christian, or a combination of these. The first regards the Song as descriptive of the love of God and His people Israel; the second discerns the love of Christ and the Church or the individual believer. Usually this view denies or ignores the historicity of the events described. Hippolytus and Origen introduced this interpretation into the church and this has been the popular or prevailing position, along with the Typical view. Arguments in its favor include: (1) It explains the inclusion of the book in the canon. (2) It harmonizes with the Biblical use of marriage as an illustration of the Lord's relationship to His people. Against these are argued: (1) Other reasons may be advanced for its presence among the canonical books. (2) Elsewhere the figure of the marriage relationship is made the basis for specific teaching. (3) Nothing in the book itself vitiates its historicity. (4) The necessity of interpreting details leads to fanciful and absurd interpretations.

2. The Typical interpretation combines literal and allegorical views, maintaining both the historicity and the spiritualizing of the book. It is reasoned in support of this view: (1) The superlative of the title connotes spiritual meaning. (2) Solomon is a type of Christ; (3) marriage also is a type (cf. above). Against these are urged: (1) Spiritual value does not demand typology. (2) The definition and application of "type" are debatable.

3. The Literal view is that the book presents actual history and nothing more.

4. The Dramatic interpretation regards the Song as a drama based on the marriage of Solomon to a Shulammite girl. Here may be included the Shepherd-hypothesis (Jacobi, Ewald, et al), which proposes a triangle of Solomon, the girl, and her shepherd-betrothed. On this hypothesis, the girl refuses the blandishments of the king and remains true to her shepherd. The book is not labeled drama, which was not a widely used Hebrew literary form. If the book were merely a drama, its presence in the canon is not explained.

5. The Erotic-literary view (Eissfeldt, Pfeiffer) is that the book is simply a collection of love-songs.

6. The Liturgical view regards the Song as borrowed pagan liturgy associated with fertility-cults. It is inconceivable that a work of such an origin should be in the canon.

7. The Didactic-moral interpretation holds that the book presents the purity and wonder of true love. It regards the book as history and also agrees that the love portrayed does direct us to the greater love of Christ, in accordance with the history of Christian interpretation. The purpose of the Song of Solomon, therefore, is to teach the holiness and beauty of the marriage-love relationship which God Himself ordained. C.E.D.

SOLOMON'S POOLS, three in number, were located a short distance from Jerusalem and were fed by two chief sources, surface water and springs. Cleverly engineered aqueducts carried water from the desired spring to the pools. From these pools the water was conveyed by the same means to the wells under the temple area (Eccl. 2:6).

In the summer of 1962, Solomon's Pools were again in the news, when a severe drought made necessary an emergency pipeline from a big new well at Hebron, to alleviate Jerusalem's water shortage. The 18 miles of pipe, furnished by the United States Agency for International Development, was laid within a matter of days, and the water was pumped into the ancient reservoirs, Solomon's Pools, eight miles S of Jerusalem (Time, Aug. 17, 1962).

SOLOMON'S PORCH, a magnificent colonnade built by Solomon on the E side of the temple area. Christ and the apostles walked in it (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12).

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS (Heb. 'avedhê shelōmōh). The descendants of Solomon's servants are named among those returning from Babylon to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55,58; Neh. 7:57,60; 11:3). In the days of Solomon some were appointed to care for certain temple duties, and these being descendants of these servants, presumably carried on the same kind of duties. Whether they were Levites or non-Israelitish people is not known.

SOLOMON'S TEMPLE (See Temple)

SON (Heb. bēn, Gr. huiós), a word which has quite a variety of meanings in the Bible. Genetically the Hebrew word expresses any human offspring regardless of sex (Gen. 3:16). In genealogical records the word "son" is often a general term expressing descendants (Dan. 5:22). Many times, of course, the word means a person, usually a male, who was the direct child of a given father (Gen. 9:19; 16:15).

Another very common Biblical use of this word is in connection with another following word to express something about the individual or individual's described. Perhaps the most familiar usage of this kind is the two titles used of our Lord, "Son of man" and "Son of God." "Son of perdition" is used of Judas. Sometimes groups are thus designated (I Thess. 5:5). Genesis 6:4 speaks of the "sons of God," and Deuteronomy 13:13 "sons of Belial."

Closely allied to this use is still another in which the word "son" indicates relationship in a certain group. Believers in the OT are often called "sons of God" (Deut. 14:1), and believers in the NT have the same designation (I John 3:2). The word is sometimes used to indicate membership in a guild or profession (II Kings 2:3,5; Neh. 3:8).

SON OF GOD. The key text for a proper understanding of the words "Son of God," as applied to Jesus, is John 5:18b. ". . . he said that God was his own Father, making himself equal with God." The same thought is frequently emphasized. Cf. "that all men should honor the Son just as they honor the Father" (John 5:23 original tr.). In John 10:30ff Jesus' words "I and the Father are one" touched off violent opposition. His adversaries said ". . . we stone you . . . for blasphemy, even because you, being a man, make yourself out to be God" (vs. 33). Jesus answered ". . . why do you say to him whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world, 'You blaspheme,' because I said, 'I am the Son of God?' " (vs. 36). The words "Son of God" were clearly understood in the Jewish setting as meaning "God," or "equal with God."

It is not denied that the words in other contexts may have other meanings. (See SONS OF GOD, CHILDREN OF GOD.) But deity is implied in the words as applied to Jesus.

This fact doubtless stems from the Hebrew usage in which, when the context did not in any way indicate derivation of being, the words "son of . . ." meant "of the order of . . .," as the sons of the prophets, of the apothecaries, of the goldsmiths, of the singers (Neh. 3:8,31; 12:28).

With this usage in mind, it is easy to see how Jesus' contemporaries in Palestine took His claim to be the Son of God as a claim to be of the order of God, that is, "equal with God," or "God."

It is suggested (contrary to common opinion) that "Son of God" as applied to Jesus never has reference to the derivation, or "eternal generation," of His being, but the words simply designate His eternal, co-equal and consubstantial deity.

1. All references to His being sent forth from the Father (like His saying "the Father is greater than I" John 14:28) point to His particular temporal activity and function in the divine economy, not in any way to His eternal and essential being.

2. The word monogenes, wrongly translated "only begotten," is not from gennao, "to beget," but from genos, "kind." It means "the only one of his kind," or "unique." The French Bible correctly reads "son Fils unique," "his unique Son."

3. There can be no doubt that the prophetic words "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten Thee," in Psalm 2:7 refer to Christ. But to refer these words to the "eternal generation" of His being, or to any actual generation in time, would involve all manner of contradictions and inconsistencies. The words must be taken as declaratory of a previously existing fact.

The speaker in the psalm is a king and he speaks as of his coronation day. This verse is quoted by Paul in Acts 13:30 in connection with the evidential nature of Christ's resurrection. Again it is quoted in Hebrews 1:5; 5:5. In the former instance the author seems to associate the text with Christ's second coming. We are reminded of the heavenly announcement of Christ's Sonship on the occasion of His baptism (Matt. 3:17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22; cf. John 1:32-34), in His transfiguration (Matt. 17:5; Mark 9:7; Luke 9:35; II Pet. 1:17,18); and the similar voice from heaven during His public teaching (John 12:28). On all these occasions, and in any phase of the ministry of Christ in time, especially in any phase of his exaltation, the Father declares and acknowledges His eternal Son. We must therefore take the words "this day have I begotten thee" as a figurative expression, meaning, "on this occasion I reveal and declare thy Sonship."

4. It is a very common opinion among Bible-believing scholars that the phrase "Son of God" refers in some instances to the virgin birth of Christ. To the present writer this opinion seems doubtful. It is true that Christ took human nature and entered this world at Bethlehem by the miracle of the virgin birth. He was "conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the virgin Mary" literally. But this was not the origin of His personality and did not make Him the Son of God. The Scripture is very explicit that the miracle by which the eternal Son of God "became flesh" was wrought by the Holy Spirit, the third Person of the Trinity. Yet never in the history of Christianity, never in orthodox or heretical literature, never has any group of people who claimed to believe the NT spoken or thought of the Holy Spirit as the father of Jesus. His birth was a miracle and in the absolute sense of the word, a virgin birth.

There is indeed one statement, Luke 1:35b, which seems to stand to the contrary. In English it reads, "therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God." This reading is certainly possible, even probable according to the textus receptus as it was punctuated before Hort. However, Westcott and Hort's reading and punctuation, supported also by Nestle's margin, points in the direction of the following translation, "therefore also that which is born shall be called holy; the Son of God." The meaning of the verse is the answer to the question, How can the "Son of the Highest" (vs. 32) be sinlessly born, i.e. Mary's question of vs. 34. The answer is that by the miraculous protection of the Holy Spirit, that which is to be born will be "holy," free from any taint of sin, as the Son of God must be. Thus the virgin birth is not the ground and reason of the title Son of God, but the supernatural protection of the Holy Spirit is the ground of the sinlessness, holiness, of the virgin birth.

5. There should be extensive and thorough research into the history of the doctrine of the "eternal generation of the Son." It arose in Christian theology to negate the Arian error that there ever was a time when the Son was not. Origen made "eternal generation" a kind of Platonic subordinationism. His views, and the pre-Nicene views of Eusebius were repudiated by the orthodox church. In Athanasian theology, "eternal generation" is simply a firm denial of Arianism and nothing more. Now that we know that monogenes is not related to gennao ("to beget") but simply means "unique," we have a clearer view of the absolute deity of Christ than was possible in the fourth century.

Son of God, as a title of Jesus, thus refers exclusively to His co-equality, co-eternity, con-substantiality with the Father and the Spirit in the eternal Triune Godhead. J.O.B.

SON OF MAN. In Hebrew usage the phrase "son of . . ." frequently meant "of the order of. . . ." (See SON OF GOD.) "Son of man" seems to mean essentially, man, a distinct member of the order of humanity. It is applied to Ezekiel repeatedly (Ezek. 2:1,3,8ff), and to Daniel once (8:17).

The one OT usage which colors all NT use of the phrase as applied to Christ is Daniel 7:13,14, "I saw in the night visions, and behold one like the Son of Man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him. His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

That Jesus identified Himself as the Son of man in this sense is clear from His words when on trial before the Jewish authorities: "You will see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power; and coming with the clouds of heaven" (Mark 14:62. Cf. Matt. 26:64; Luke 22:69). Jesus here preceded the quotation from Daniel 7:13,14 by a phrase from Psalm 110:1. The Son of man sitting at the right hand of God, as referred to in the NT (see esp. Acts 2:34,35; Heb. 1:13; 10:12,13), points to His awaiting in heaven (Acts 3:21) the time of His appointment to take the earth as His visible kingdom. He is now, as to His visible presence, like the nobleman in the far country (Luke 19:11-27). The parable alludes to Archelaus who went to Rome to be appointed king in Herod's realm and to come back and rule. At the time appointed by the Father, Jesus will come as the heavenly Son of man to rule the world. Thus Jesus, before the Jewish authorities, distinguishes two future stages in the doings of the Son of Man (1) His resuming His seat in heaven, and (2) His coming again to reign.

In the Olivet discourse Jesus predicted (Matt. 24:27; cf. Luke 17:24) that His return as the heavenly Son of man would be instantaneously visible everywhere like a flash of lightning. Further, He identified this coming as the heavenly Son of man with the prophecy of Zechariah 12:10-14, which contains the significant words, "they shall look upon me whom they have pierced." In Matthew 24:30 Jesus says, "And at that time will be seen the sign of the Son of man in heaven. And at that time 'all the tribes of the land will mourn' [cf. Zech. chapter 27] and they will see 'the Son of man coming upon the clouds of heaven' [Dan. 7:13] with power and great glory."

A little earlier in His ministry Jesus has said, "Truly I tell you that you who have followed with me [in my trials, Luke 22:28,29], in the regeneration when the Son of man sits upon his glorious throne, you will sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel" (Matt. 19:27,28).

Warfield says, "Whenever, in the Apocalyptic literature we meet the figure of the Son of Man, it is transcendentally conceived. When our Lord Himself derived from it His favorite self-designation of Son of Man, He took it over in a transcendental sense; and meant by applying it to Himself to present Himself as a heavenly Being who had come forth from heaven and descended to earth on a mission of mercy to lost men." (Warfield, Christology and Criticism, pp. 46f; reprint from Prin. Theol. Rev. XIV 1916.)

Although Son of Man, as Jesus uses the term, always refers to Himself as the One who is coming again to rule the world, this does not mean that everything He says of the Son of Man is eschatological. He adopts the title with its eschatological implications, and applies it to Himself in any and all situations. Since His incarnation He is that Son of Man. Thus He asked, as Matthew (16:13) records, His question, "Who do men say the Son of Man is?"

Liberal writers on the "Life of Christ" from Reimarus (1694-1768) to Albert Schweitzer have made the great mistake of construing Matthew 10:23b eschatologically, and arguing that Jesus when He gave instructions to the twelve for their mission did not yet regard Himself as the heavenly Son of Man. Liberals generally picture Jesus as sitting down to wait for the Son of man to come in the clouds, suffering great disappointment, and finally deciding that He must Himself be the Son of Man. (See Schweitzer Quest p. 335. Edwin Lewis NH and NE pp. 131f.)

The context should have prevented this error. In Matthew's record (8:20; 9:6) Jesus had previously been familiarly designating Himself as Son of Man in the presence of His disciples. When He said (10:23b), "You will not finish with the cities of Israel until the Son of Man comes," they understood His plan to come where they were preaching, as given in Matthew 11:1 (cf. Luke 10:1). "When Jesus had finished instructing his twelve disciples he departed thence to teach and preach in their [the disciples'] cities." Chapter 11 records Jesus' ministry as He follows up the twelve, and in chapter 12 they are all together again.

The title Son of Man as used by Jesus to apply to Himself is found some 78 times in the Gospels. (Cf. also Acts 7:56; Rev. 1:13; 14:14). In all circumstances it designates Him as the God-Man. J.O.B.

SONG (Heb. shîr, shîrâh). Singing played a prominent part in the worship and national life of the Hebrews. The first song in the Bible was sung by Lamech (Gen. 4:23-24). It was not uncommon for the Jews to compose a song celebrating some special victory or religious experience that was significant (Exod. 15). The Psalter has been designated "The Song Book of Israel" and it contains many kinds of songs. The music to which these songs were sung has been lost, but it was undoubtedly similar to that of the Arabs today — plaintive, limited in compass, and marked by emphasis in rhythm.

Paul urges believers to sing (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16). The book of Revelation speaks often of heavenly singing (Rev. 5:9; 14:3).

SONG OF DEGREES (See Music)

SONG OF SONGS (See Solomon, Song of)

SONG OF THE THREE HEBREW CHILDREN, an addition to the book of Daniel found in the OT Apocrypha. It consists of 68 verses and in the LXX and Vulgate follows Daniel 3:23 and forms an integral part of that chapter. It is one of three additions to Daniel found in the Apocrypha. The author of the Song is unknown; the date of writing is about 164 B.C.; and the language is Greek. It is a hymn of praise, and has practically nothing to do with the sufferings of the three young men.

SONS OF GOD, CHILDREN OF GOD. The words here discussed may refer metaphorically to any personal creatures of God. In Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; angelic beings are designated. In speaking of the inappropriateness of worshiping idols (Acts 17:28) Paul quotes Aratus, "we also are his offspring," thus applying the concept to the entire human race. Compare Luke 3:38; "Adam was the son of God."

The meaning of "sons of God" (benê-hā-'ĕlōhîm), occurring twice in Genesis 6:1-4 is much disputed. The meaning of "giants" (hannephilîm) and of "mighty men . . . of renown" (haggibbōrîm . . . hashshēm) is involved in the question.

It is possible here only to summarize the opinion which is presented as preferable: 1. The term "mighty men . . . of renown" explains the word "giants." Neither term indicates anything demonic or mythological, but both should be understood in their simple literal meaning, even as in modern English. (See I Chron. 11:10,24; Num. 13:33; and see "giant" in Webster's dictionary.) 2. The statement of Genesis 6:4, taken simply and literally, informs the reader that such giants of old, mighty men of renown, were born of normal human marriage. In other words, they were not demonic beings. 3. "Sons of God," here as often elsewhere, simply means human beings with special emphasis upon man's nature as created in the image of God. 4. There is nothing essentially wicked in men selecting beautiful wives. The words translated "of [literally, from among] all which they chose," do not properly suggest any excess or even polygamy, but rather discriminating selection, choice from among those who were eligible. 5. The fact that the context condemns gross universal wickedness (vss. 5-7 and possibly also vs. 3) does not prove that vss. 1,2,4 designate anything in itself wicked, or abnormal. In fact "mighty men of renown" is rather likely to point to outstanding good men among evil men.

It is reasonable therefore to hold that "sons of God" in Genesis 6:1-4 is a normal reference to men created in the image of God. The most important scriptural use of "sons" or "children of God" is that which designates the regenerate as distinct from the unregenerate. The teaching that all men are, in this sense, spiritually children of God is very objectionable. Jesus said, "If God were your father, ye would love me . . . Ye are of your father the Devil . . . He that is of God heareth God's words" (John 8:41-47). John said, "In this the children of God are manifested, and the children of the Devil . . ." (I John 3:10). God's appeal to humanity is an offer of spiritual sonship (II Cor. 6:17-7:1). Paul develops this theme (Rom. 8:14-19) and looks forward to "the apocalypse of the Sons of God" (vs. 19. Cf. Col. 3:4; I John 3:2).

J.O.B.

SONS OF THE PROPHETS, a title given to members of prophetic guilds or schools. Samuel was the head of a company of prophets at Ramah (I Sam. 7:17; 28:3), and 200 years later Elijah and Elisha were presidents of similar groups. They were men endowed with the prophetic gift (I Sam. 10:10; 19:20-23) who gathered around God's great leader for common worship, united prayer, religious fellowship and instruction of the people (I Sam. 10:5,10; II Kings 4:38,40; 6:1-7; 9:1). In the times of Elijah and Elisha they formed a comparatively large company (II Kings 2:7,16) and lived together at Bethel, Jericho, and Gilgal (II Kings 2:3,5; 4:38).

SOOTHSAYER, SOOTHSAYING, one claiming or thought to possess the power to foretell future events (Josh. 13:22; Jer. 27:9), interpret dreams (Dan. 4:7), and reveal secrets (Dan. 2:27).

SOP (Gr. psomíon, a morsel of bread), a thin wafer used to dip food from a common platter (John 13:26). Using the sop had long been common among the Hebrews (Ruth 2:14; Prov. 17:1).

SOPATER (sō'pà-tĕr, Gr. Sópatros), son of Pyrrhus who accompanied the apostle Paul on his last journey from Corinth to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). He was a Christian from the church at Berea and is the same as Sosipater who joins with Timothy, Lucius and Jason in sending greetings to the church at Rome (Rom. 16:21).

SOPHORETH (sō'fē-rĕth, Heb. sōphereth), one of Solomon's servants who was among the captives to return to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55).

SORCERER, SORCERY (Heb. kashshāph, kāshaph; Gr. mágos), one who claimed to have supernatural power or knowledge. He often used magic potions and was considered to be in league with evil forces. The practice of sorcery was widespread in ancient times (Exod. 7:11), and was regarded an evil practice for Israel (Isa. 47:9; Mal. 3:5). Practice of the occult arts was prevalent in NT days. Simon of Samaria used sorcery, but was converted under Philip (Acts 8:9-13), and Paul and Barnabas found a sorcerer in Paphos (Acts 13:8-11).

SORE (See Diseases)

SOREK (sō'rĕk, Heb. sôrēq, vineyard), a valley which extends from near Jerusalem to the Mediterranean Sea about eight and one-half miles S of Joppa. It was in this valley that Samson found Delilah (Judg. 16:4). It was a fertile area in which vineyards flourished. Today it produces rich harvests of grains. A modern railroad follows the valley to Jerusalem. In OT times a highway ran along the same route. It was over this road that the Ark was conveyed after it had been taken from the Philistines (I Sam. 6:10-14). There the Philistines suffered a great defeat at the hands of the Israelites (I Sam. 7:3-14). It is doubtless Wadi es-Sarar.

SOSIPATER (See Sopater)

SOSTHENES (sŏs'thĕ-nēz, Gr. Sosthénes), the apparent successor of Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue at Corinth. During Paul's first visit in that city, Sosthenes was beaten by the crowd in the presence of Gallio, the Roman proconsul of Achaia (Acts 18:17). No reason is given for this action, but it is likely that they took "advantage of the snub which the proconsul had administered to the leaders of the Jewish community" to vent their anti-Semitic sentiment (F. F. Bruce, The Book of Acts, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956, p. 375). It is quite possible that he subsequently became a Christian, for a Sosthenes joins Paul in the salutation of I Corinthians. If this is not the Sosthenes of Acts 18, he is otherwise unknown in the NT.

SOTAI (sō'tī, Heb. sōtay), one of the servants of Solomon who returned from captivity under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:55; Neh. 7:57).

SOUL (Heb. nephesh, Gr. psyché), the word commonly used in the Bible to designate the non-material ego of man in its ordinary relationships with earthly and physical things. It is one of a number of psychological nouns, all designating the same non-material self, but each in a different functional relationship. Thus, the "mind" (nous) is the self in its rational functions. Again "mind" (phronema) is the self as deeply contemplating. "Heart" (kardia) is the self as manifesting a complex of attitudes. "Will" (thelesis) is the self as choosing and deciding. "Spirit" (pneuma) is the self when thought of apart from earthly connections. When the blessed dead in heaven are spoken of as having been put to a martyr's death, they are called "souls" (Rev. 6:9). When there is no reference to their former bodily experience, they are called "spirits" (Heb. 12:23).

These functional names of the ego are not used with technical discrimination. They often overlap. The difference between man and beast is not that man has a soul or spirit (Gen. 1:20; 7:15; Eccl. 3:21), but that man is created in the image of God, whereas the beast is not.

The above remarks assume dichotomy, that is, that there are only two substantive entities which make up the whole man (1) the body, which at death returns to dust, awaiting the resurrection, and (2) the non-material self which, if regenerate, goes to paradise or heaven; if not, to the abode of the wicked dead. There are many, however, who hold to a trichotomous view, arguing that "soul" and "spirit" are two distinct substantive entities, and the body, a third. They cite I Thessalonians 5:23; I Corinthians 15:44; Hebrews 4:12 for evidence.

Modern non-Christian psychology ignores or denies the existence of the soul as a substantive entity. The "self" is usually spoken of as a mere behavior pattern, a consciousness, but not a being which is conscious.

It should be held that, in this created world, whenever movement in space occurs, there is something which moves; and similarly, whenever consciousness occurs, there is something, the soul or mind, which is conscious. J.O.B.

SOUTH, the translation of various Heb. words in the KJV. They refer to a compass point, a country, or a general direction. The most common Hebrew word (neghev, a dry region) refers primarily to an indefinite area lying between Palestine and Egypt. Abram journeyed toward the South (Gen. 12:9). He went to the South when returning from Egypt (Gen. 13:1). David conquered the South (I Sam. 27:8-12), and so did the Philistines (II Chron. 28:18). Ramoth was in this area (I Sam. 30:27 RSV). Isaac dwelt here when he met Rebekah (Gen. 24:62-67). The Hebrews were commanded to conquer the South (Deut. 1:7). Judah's heritage extended from the Dead Sea, across the South, to the confluence of the River of Egypt and the Great Sea (Josh 15:1-47). Caleb gave a portion of the South to his daughter Achsah as her dowry when she was given to the hero, Othniel (Judg. 1:15).

This region extended from the lower end of the Dead Sea SW to Kadesh-Barnea, thence NW along the River of Egypt to the Mediterranean, its boundaries being somewhat indefinite in the semi-desert regions. Its name, "a dry region," does not indicate a desert; it probably arose because it had a less ample supply of water than Judah had. In it the Hebrews found Amelekites (Num. 13:29) Jerahmeelites (I Sam. 27:10) and other tribes whom they either exterminated or absorbed. J.D.F.

SOVEREIGNTY of GOD. The word "sovereign," although it does not occur in any form in the English Bible, yet conveys the oft-repeated Scriptural thought of the supreme authority of God. He is called "[Pantokrator] Almighty" (II Cor. 6:18 and nine times in Rev.); "the blessed and only Potentate [Dynastes], the King of Kings and Lord of Lords" (I Tim. 6:15). He "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will" (Eph. 1:11). His sovereignty follows logically from the doctrine that he is God, Creator and Ruler of the universe.

The sovereignty of God is sometimes presented in the Bible as an unanalyzed ultimate. "Nay but, O man, who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power over the clay, of the same lump to make one vessel unto honor, and another unto dishonor [i.e. to suffer dishonor]?" (Rom. 9:20,21; See Isa. 45:9. Cf. Ps. 115:3; Dan. 4:35; and many similar passages). God is not subject to any power or any abstract rule or law which could be conceived as superior to or other than Himself.

Yet the Scripture is equally emphatic that God's character is immutably holy and just and good. "He cannot deny himself" (II Tim. 2:12). "It is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18; cf. Titus 1:2). A man of faith may rightly stand before Jehovah, and plead, "Shall not the judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 19:25). "His mercy endureth forever" is an oft recurring phrase (Ps. 136). He assures His people of His eternal self-consistency: "I am the LORD, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed" (Mal. 3:6).

The inscrutable sovereignty of God is manifested, not so much in the punishment of the reprobate as in the salvation of His people. In His holy character He must logically punish moral evil. (See SIN) But His sovereignty is most marvelously revealed in that He has graciously elected to save a people from their sin and from its consequences. J.O.B.

SOWER, SOWING (See Agriculture)

SPAIN (Gr. Spania), the westernmost peninsula of Europe, populated basically by an Indo-European stock allied to the Celts. The land was early noticed by the Phoenicians who established a major emporium at Tartessus. The Carthaginians inherited the Phoenician interest in Spain, and New Carthage (Cartagena) was developed by Hannibal as his base against Italy in the Second Punic War. Spain, in consequence, became a theatre of conflict in this clash of nations, and with the victory of Rome remained in Roman hands. It was not until the time of Augustus that the peninsula was finally pacified and organized. It was rapidly Romanized. Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius I, among the emperors, were Spaniards; among men of letters, the two Senecas, Lucan, Columella, Quintilian, Martial, and Prudentius came from Spain. Paul's projected visit (Rom. 15:24) was clearly in line with his evident policy to capture for the Church the nodal points and principal bastions of empire. E.M.B.

SPAN (See Weights and Measures)

SPARROW (See Birds)

SPECKLED (Heb. nāqōdh, mottled in color), a word used to denote varied colors of beasts. The most familiar example of its use is in Genesis 30: 25-43 where Jacob applied his knowledge of selective breeding of livestock in order to collect from Laban what he considered a fair wage.

SPICE (Heb. besem, bōsem, sammîm, nekhō'th, reqah; Gr. ároma, ámomon), anything having a pleasant odor, usually herbs. The principal Heb. word (besem, sweet-scented) refers to any aromatic vegetable compound, such as myrrh, cinnamon, cassia and so forth (Exod. 30:23,24). Spices were often mixed with oil to make them more durable and easily applied (Exod. 30:25, 35:8). Spices played an important part in worship throughout the Near East (Exod. 25:1-6). In the temple, Levites were keepers of spices (I Chron. 9:29). A rare spice (bōsem, creating desire) is indicated in the Song of Solomon 5:13; 6:2. In Genesis 37:25 and 43:11 spices, or spicery, mean treasure. Hezekiah revealed to spies of Babylon the temple treasures, including rich spices, and was rebuked by Isaiah (II Kings 20:12-18). Spices were used in preparing the body of Jesus for burial (John 19:40). Some were brought to the tomb after Jesus had risen (Mark 16:1). J.D.F.

SPIES (Heb. rāgal, to travel by foot). The custom of sending secret agents to discover facts about an enemy is age-old. The Heb. word for a spy is suggested by the secrecy with which he did his work—he went stealthily. Joseph accused his brothers of being spies (Gen. 42). Joshua sent spies to Jericho (Josh. 6:23). David sent them to see if Saul was with his army at Hachilah (I Sam. 26:1-4). Absalom put secret agents throughout Israel to seize power when notified he had become king (II Sam. 15:7-10). Priests and scribes sent spies to entrap Jesus (Luke 20:20).

SPIKENARD (See Plants)

SPINDLE (Heb. kîshôr, shaft), an implement, 8 to 12 inches long, used in spinning. The rope of carded fiber or wool was attached to one end and the spindle rotated by hand. Thus the thread was twisted. In Egypt both men and women did spinning, but among the Hebrews only women did the work (Exod. 35:25; Prov. 31:19).

SPINNING (See Occupations & Professions)

SPIRIT (Heb. rûach, breath, spirit; Gr. pneúma, wind, spirit), one of the Biblical nouns (see list of such nouns, and also the trichotomist view, in the article on SOUL) denoting the non-material ego in special relationships. The self is generally called "spirit" in contexts where its bodily, emotional, and intellectual aspects are not prominent, but where the direct relationship of the individual to God is the point of emphasis.

A typical instance is Romans 8:15b,16, which would be better translated, "In that we cry . . . 'Father,' the Spirit himself bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God." The martyrs in heaven are called "souls" when there is special reference to the brutal form of their death (Rev. 6:9). But in the exalted description of the heavenly goal which lies before the church (Heb. 12:22-24), the blessed dead are referred to as "the spirits of just men made perfect."

In modern non-Christian culture the Biblical personal meaning of "spirit" is commonly denied. The Biblical word "spirit" has an impersonal meaning in both Hebrew and Greek, as it has in English. See the expression "the spirit of slumber" in Romans 11:8; and "the spirit of deep sleep" in Isaiah 29:10. The context must show whether the meaning is personal or impersonal. Usually there is no doubt.

The same Hebrew and Greek words translated "spirit" can also mean "wind" or "breath." In at least one passage (John 3:8) the interpretation is doubtful, but this verse would much better be translated, "The Spirit breathes where he chooses. You hear his voice, but you do not know where he comes from nor where he goes. So everyone is born who is born from the Spirit." This brings out the sovereign grace of God in regeneration. In the context the word pneuma clearly designates the Holy Spirit, who is a non-material person. (See John 4:24, "God is a Spirit," and cf. GOD).

SPIRITS IN PRISON. The words under consideration occur in I Peter 3:18-20, and the same thought is suggested in I Peter 4:6. On the basis of a superficial reading of these texts, a doctrine of a limbus patrum, or borderland place of confinement of the patriarchs who died before the time of Christ, has grown up. In support of this view it is held that Ephesians 4:8ff. teaches that, at His ascension, Christ took the patriarchs from this limbus to heaven. Matthew 27:52,53 is somehow made to fit in with this theory, and the phrase, "He descended into Hades" in the Apostles Creed is also brought in.

In this brief article the sound opinion in which Calvin (Institutes II, XVI, IX), Charles Hodge (Systematic Theology Vol. II pp. 616-625) A.T. Robertson (Word Pictures Vol. VI. pp. 115ff), Warfield (quoted by Robertson) generally (though not in every detail) agree, can only be summarized.

1. "Quickened by the Spirit" (I Pet. 3:18) refers to Christ's resurrection (Rom. 8:11), not to His disembodied state. 2. The time when Christ, in the Spirit, "went and preached" (vs 19) was when the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah" (vs 20. Cf. I Pet. 1:11; II Pet. 2:5). 3. The "spirits in prison" (vss. 19,20) are those who, in the days of Noah, refused Noah's message, and are now, as Peter writes, in the Tartarus (II Pet. 2:4) part of Hades. 4. I Peter 4:6 means "This is why the Gospel was preached [of old (cf. Gal. 3:8)] to [those who are now] dead, so that they might be judged as men [now] in the flesh [are to be judged], and might live according to God by the Spirit."

There is nowhere in Scripture any warrant for the doctrine of a chance to hear the Gospel after death. J.O.B.

SPIRITUAL GIFTS (Gr. charísmata). The word is used in the NT to refer to extraordinary gifts of the Spirit given to Christians to equip them for the service of the Church. Several lists of such gifts are given (Rom. 12:6-8; I Cor. 12:4-11, 28-30; cf. Eph. 4:7-12). They may be broadly divided into two categories, those connected with the ministry of the word of God, and those connected with the ministry of practical service.

In the first group belong apostleship, involving the proclamation of the Word of the Gospel to the unbelieving world; prophecy, the ministry of the word to the believing Church, including rarely the prediction of a future event; discerning of spirits, the ability to discern between false and true prophets and apostles; teaching, including the word of knowledge and the word of wisdom; tongues; and interpretation of tongues.

In the second group belong working of miracles such as exorcism and raising the dead; gifts of healings; ruling and governments, that is, knowing how wisely to direct the affairs of the Church; and helps, such as being of assistance to the weak, as in the office of deacon. S.B.

SPIT, SPITTLE, SPITTING (Heb. yāraq, rōq; Gr. ptúo). Spitting in the face indicated gross insult (Num. 12:14; Deut. 25:9). Spittle allowed to run on the beard means to drool (I Sam. 21:13). The Gr. word for spit evidently arose because of the peculiar sound made in spitting, ptúo. Jesus used spittle in curing blind eyes in Bethsaiada (Mark 8:23) and put spittle upon a mute tongue in Decapolis (Mark 7:33). Jesus was insulted during His trial by being spat upon (Matt. 26:67; Mark 14:65). J.D.F.

SPOIL (Heb. bizzâh, meshissâh, shōd, shālāl; Gr. harpagé, skýlon), the plunder taken from the enemy in war; pillage; booty; loot. The spoils of war were divided equally between those who went into battle and those who were left behind in camp (Num. 31:27; Josh. 22:8; I Sam. 30:24). Parts were given to the Levites and to the Lord (Num. 31:28,30). Under the monarchy, the king received part of the spoils (II Kings 14:14; I Chron. 18:7,11).

SPOKES (Heb. hishshūrîm), rods connecting the rim of a wheel with the hub. In the temple there were ten lavers or basins made of bronze (I Kings 7:27-33), apparently for the washing of sacrifices. They were set on bases of elaborate design moving upon wheels. The spokes were part of these wheels.

SPONGE (See Animals)

SPOT (Heb. mûm, Gr. spílos). The Heb. word denotes a blemish on the face (S. of Sol. 4:7; Job 11:15). It is also rendered "blemish" (Lev. 24:19f) and "blot" (Prov. 9:7). The Gr. word is used figuratively of a stain of sin (II Pet. 3:14; Jude 23).

SPOUSE (See Marriage)

SPREAD, SPREADING (Heb. pāras, to disperse, Gr. strónnymi), to scatter, strew, or disperse, as in "spread abroad" (Isa. 34:3; Matt. 21:8; Mark 1:28).

SPRINKLING (Heb. zāraq, nāzâh; Gr. rhantízein). Sprinkling of blood, water, and oil formed a very important part of the act of sacrifice. In the account of the forming of the covenant between Jehovah and Israel (Exod. 24:6-8), half the blood was sprinkled on the altar and the rest on the people. When Aaron and his sons were consecrated, some blood was sprinkled on the altar and some on Aaron and his sons and on their garments. In the various offerings — burnt, peace, sin — blood was always sprinkled. Sprinkling was sometimes done in handfuls, sometimes with the finger, and sometimes with a sprinkler — a bunch of hyssop fastened to a cedar rod.

STABLE (Heb. naweh, a fold), a building, tent, or enclosure in which to lodge and feed animals (Ezek. 25:5).

STACHYS (stā'kĭs, Gr. Stáchys, head of grain), a Roman Christian to whom Paul sent a greeting (Rom. 16:9).

STACTE (stăk'tē, Heb. nātāph, a drop), a rare ointment used as an ingredient of the sacred perfume to be used in the tabernacle worship (Exod. 30:34,38), very probably myrrh.

STAFF, STAVES (See Rod)

STAIRS (Heb. maălâh, Gr. anabathmós). The name was given to steps leading to an upper chamber (I Kings 6:8; Mark 14:15; Acts 9:37). Stairs led up to the city of David (Neh. 12:37), to the porch of the gate to Jerusalem (Ezek. 40:6), and to the altar on its east side (Ezek. 43:17). Since stone steps have not been found among ruins in Palestine, it is supposed that stairs in ancient times were made of wood.

STAKE (Heb. yāthēdh), a tent-pin or tent-pole (Exod. 27:19; Isa. 33:20; 54:2).

STALL (Heb. marbēq, 'āvas, 'urvâh, repheth, 'ēvūs, Gr. phátne), a place for the care of livestock. One kind was not enclosed, often being a thatched or tented shelter, at times a fattening place (Amos 6:4; Mal. 4:2). In winter, horses were kept in barns in which each had its fenced room. Solomon's barns provided stalls for 4,000 horses (II Chron. 9:25, 40,000 in I Kings 4:26). The stall where Christ was born was a feeding place, usually connected with an inn (Luke 13:15).

STAR (See Astronomy)

STAR OF THE WISE MEN (See Astronomy)

STATURE (Heb. middâh, measure, and qômâh, standing up; Gr. helikía, greatness). The giant of Gath was of great stature (II Sam. 21:20), as were the sons of Anak (Num. 13:32,33), and the Sabaens (Isa. 45:14). God does not regard stature in size as a primary asset for leadership (I Sam. 16:7; Isa. 10:33). Jesus grew in stature (Luke 2:52). Zacchaeus was short in stature (Luke 19:3). One's height (stature) cannot be increased by wishing (Matt. 6:27; Luke 12:25).

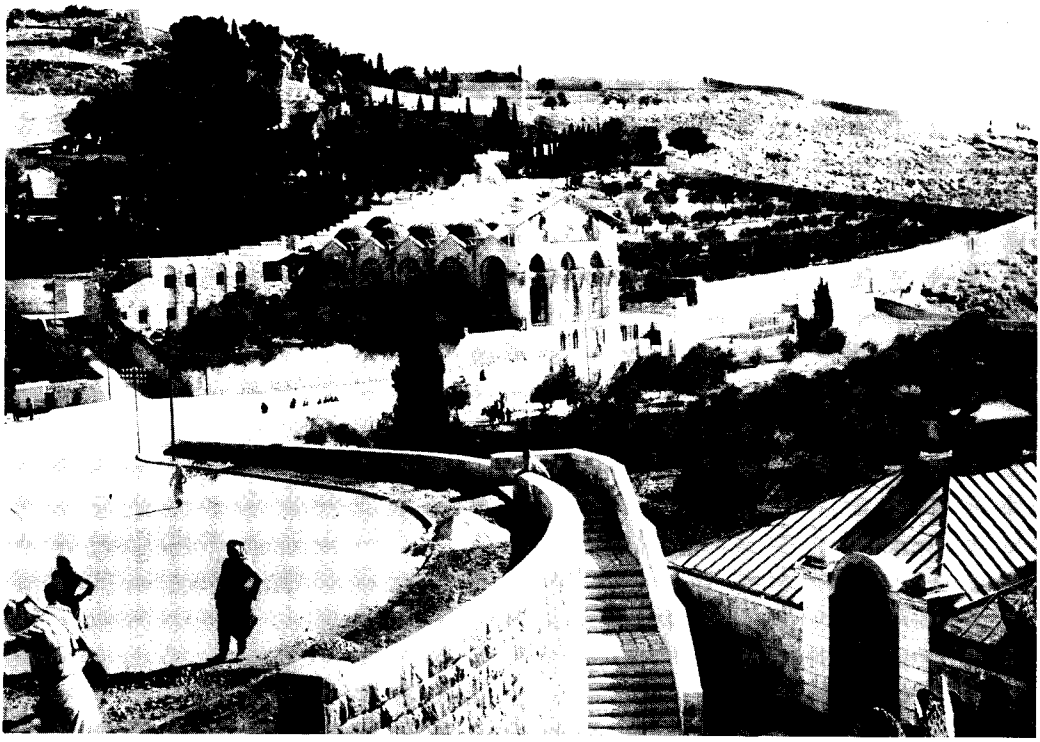
STEEL (See Minerals: Iron)

STELE (stē'lē, Gr. stéle, an erect block or shaft). The custom of erecting stone markers, usually upright narrow slabs, prevailed among ancient Egyptians. They were placed in tombs and public buildings where they honored people of high estate. The Hebrews do not seem to have adopted the custom, probably because it was felt they violated the Fourth Commandment (Exod. 20:4). A noted stele showing a Moabite victory over Israel was found in Bethshan in 1868. The Grecian stele was the forerunner of modern gravestones.

STEPHANAS (stĕf'ā-năs, Gr. Stephanás, crown), a Christian at Corinth, whose household were Paul's first converts in Achaia (I Cor. 16:15). Paul had not only won them to Christ, but they also were among the few at Corinth whom he had personally baptized (I Cor. 1:16). Subsequently, they had rendered invaluable service to the Church (I Cor. 16:15). Stephanas himself had come to Paul at Ephesus along with Fortunatus and Achaicus (I Cor. 16:17). It is thought that they may have delivered the letter which was sent by the Corinthian church to Paul.

STEPHEN (stē'vĕn, Gr. Stephanós, crown), one of the seven appointed to look after the daily distribution to the poor in the early church (Acts 6:1-6). The need for such men arose out of the complaint of the Hellenists (i.e., Greek-speaking Jews) that their widows were not receiving a fair share of this relief. Stephen, described as "a man full of faith and of the Holy Spirit" (Acts 6:5), and six others were elected by the church and consecrated by the apostles in order to insure an equitable distribution.

Stephen's ministry was not, however, limited to providing for the poor. He did "great wonders and signs among the people" (Acts 6:8). While this probably brought him into great favor with the people generally, another aspect of his ministry engaged him in bitterest conflict with the adherents of Judaism. He taught in the synagogue of



The Greek Orthodox Chapel of St. Stephen, at the lower right hand corner of the picture, marks the traditional spot of the stoning of the first Christian martyr (Acts 7:58, 59). Hence the name, St. Stephen's Gate, is applied to the gate in the east city wall of Jerusalem close by. the Libertines (i.e., freedmen) and there debated with Diaspora Jews from Cyrene, Alexandria, Cilicia and Asia. When it was evident that they could not refute Stephen's arguments in open debate, these Jews hired informers to misrepresent his arguments. They went around proclaiming, "We have heard him speak blasphemous words against this holy place, and the law: For we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us" (Acts 6:13,14). These accusations were such that the council could be assured of the support of the people of Jerusalem. Since they were largely dependent upon the temple for their livelihood, any threat to it constituted a threat to them.

Acts 7 records Stephen's remarkable apologia before the council. F. F. Bruce rightly points out that it was "not a speech for the defense in the forensic sense of the term. Such a speech as this was by no means calculated to secure an acquittal before the Sanhedrin. It is rather a defense of pure Christianity as God's appointed way of worship" (The Book of Acts, NINTC, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956, p. 141). Stephen's exclamation at the close of his speech is particularly important to a proper understanding of it: "Behold, I see the heavens opened, and the Son of man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts 7:56). This is the only occurrence of the title "Son of Man" in the NT on the lips of anyone other than Jesus Himself. It reveals that "Stephen grasped and asserted the more-than-Jewish-Messianic sense in which the office and significance of Jesus in religious history were to be understood. . . . Whereas the Jewish nationalists were holding to the permanence of their national historical privilege, and even the 'Hebrew' Christians gathered around the Apostles were, with all of their new Messianic faith, idealizing the sacred institutions of the past, . . . Stephen saw that the Messiah was on the throne of the Universe. The Son of Man, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, had arrived in the presence of God, and had received from God 'dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all peoples, nations, and languages should serve him' " (William Manson, The Epistle to the Hebrews, London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1951, pp. 31,32).

Such radical thinking was too much for the listening Sanhedrin. "They cried out with a loud voice and stopped their ears . . . and cast him out of the city, and stoned him," and the witnesses, whose responsibility it was to cast the first stones (cf. Deut. 17:7), laid their clothes at Saul's feet (Acts 7:57,58). W.W.W.

STEWARD (See Occupations & Professions)

STOCK, STOCKS. 1. The bole of a tree was a stock and was worshiped by apostate Israel (Isa. 44:19; Jer. 2:27; Hos. 4:12).

2. A family (Lev. 25:47; Isa. 40:24; Acts 13:26; Phil. 3:5). Children of the stock of Abraham were appealed to by Paul in Antioch (Acts 13:26). He was proud of being of the Hebrew stock (Phil. 3:5).

3. An instrument of punishment. There were various kinds. One was a machine by which the body was twisted into an unnatural position and thus made to endure excruciating agony (Jer. 20:2,3). Madmen, posing as prophets, were put on the rack (Jer. 29:26). Paul and Silas were put in stocks to make sure they did not escape from prison in Philippi (Acts 16:24).

STOICISM (stō'ĭ-sĭzm). Though the influence of Stoicism upon the NT writers was apparently next to negligible (cf. Morton Scott Enslin, The Ethics of Paul, pp. 14-44), this school of philosophy is of interest to Bible readers because of the apostle's encounter with it in Athens (Acts 17:18). Boasting a galaxy of distinguished exponents, both Greek and Roman — e.g. Zeno, Cleanthes, Seneca, Cicero, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius—Stoicism was a system of pantheistic monism. It held that fire is the ultimate substance with God, the active principle of the cosmos, permeating everything as a sort of soul. Nature, it taught, is a hierarchical unity controlled by the universal Logos, an impersonal reason at once immanent and divine. As participant in the Logos, man is also participant in deity. Indeed, the true essence of humanity is nous or mind, the capacity to understand the rational order veiled by phenomena. As a logos-being, man can perceive and assent to the determinism which makes all events necessary and which therefore reduces evil to mere appearance. By assenting to this determinism — indifferently called fate or providence — man is able to live in harmony with nature. Hence the Stoic ethic is egocentrically negative. Nothing lies within man's power except imagination, desire, and emotion; thus by cultivating not alone detachment from the world outside him but also mastery over his reactions to the world's impingement upon himself, the philosopher achieves freedom, happiness, and self-sufficiency. Impressively noble and lofty when practiced by, say, a Marcus Aurelius, Stoicism was aristocratic and austere, rigorously excluding pity, denying pardon, and suppressing genuine feeling. Its view of sin was hopelessly shallow, since it did not think in terms of obedience to a personal God. Sin was simply an error of judgment, easily rectified by a change of opinion. But among its virtues were cosmopolitanism and egalitarianism. Whatever his position or handicap, any man, Stoicism affirmed, even a slave like Epictetus, can be inwardly free. Moreover, as partakers of a common rational nature, men everywhere are subject to the same law. Implicit in Stoicism, accordingly, was the idea of a universal morality rooted in the universal Logos. STONE (Heb. 'even, Gr. líthos). Upon entering Canaan, the Hebrews, who had made bricks in Egypt (Exod. 5:7), readily turned to the abundant supply of stones, both from quarries and from stream beds. Limestone (Isa. 27:9), gravel (Lam. 3:16), and stones rounded by water in streams (I Sam. 17:40; Job 14:19), were abundant.

Large flat slabs were used as covers for wells (Gen. 29:2-10), doors for caves (Josh. 10:18), and for burial caves (Matt. 27:60). Stones were also used as landmarks (II Sam. 20:8). The stones mentioned in Deuteronomy 19:14; 27:17 and Proverbs 22:28 were boundary stones (see Josh. 15:6; I Kings 1:9). Great stones were used in the foundation of the temple (I Kings 6:7). The palace for the pharaoh's daughter was of costly stones (I Kings 7:8-12). One may today see samples of Israelite stone work in the Wailing Wall of Jerusalem. A stone from the city wall is 14 feet long and three and three-quarter feet square. Remains of quarries in many places of the land show how widespread the use of stone was in ancient times.

Stones were used in setting up altars and memorials. These were of various kinds: cairns, tables, steles or upright slabs, and circular areas enclosed by rocks. After Joshua had led the Hebrews over Jordan he set up a cairn composed of 12 stones taken from the river's bed by representatives of the 12 tribes (Josh. 4:1-9). Jacob set up a cairn to commemorate his experience at Bethel (Gen. 28:18). His contract with Laban was sealed by a stele (Gen. 31:45-46). The miraculous victory over the Philistines called for a memorial (I Sam. 7:5-12). A cairn was placed over one who was executed by stoning, as were the king of Ai (Josh. 8:29), and Absalom (II Sam. 18:17,18). Joshua's last official act was to erect a memorial to Israel's covenant with God (Josh. 24:26-28).

Stone weapons were frequently used by the Israelites. The familiar story of David's victory over the giant of Gath reveals the skill of one who had mastered the use of the sling (I Sam. 17). Among David's warriors were some who could sling stones (I Chron. 12:2). King Uzziah included in his arsenal stones for slingers and for catapults (II Chron. 26:14,15). Stones were used in individual conflict (Exod. 21:18; Num. 35:17-23). Certain crimes were punished by stoning (Lev. 20:2,27; 24:23).

The transition from using an object or a rite in worship to making it an object of worship is never difficult. So Israel was prone to worship stones. Among other pagan evils Isaiah found libations being offered to river stones (57:3-7). The law prohibited any such use of stones (Lev. 26:1).

An illustration of the use of stones as objects in heathen worship. This is the Temple of Obelisks at ancient Gebal, the Biblical name for what is now Byblos on the Phoenician coast. SHH

Figurative uses of stone are frequent in Heb. writings: Egyptians sank like stones (Exod. 15:5); God's arm could make His enemies still as stones (Exod. 15:16); Nabal's fear petrified him (I Sam. 25:37); Job spoke of ice as stone (38:30). God has power to change stony hearts into flesh (Matt. 3:9). The hard heart is like stone (Ezek. 11:19). The new name given Simon (Petros, a little stone) was bestowed by the Master as an indication of the character which this apostle would have in the days ahead (John 1:42). God is the stone of Israel (Gen. 49:24; Dan. 2:34). The messianic kingdom is a stone which will crush the kingdoms of men (Dan. 2:34; Matt. 21:44). Jesus Christ is the stone which the builders rejected (Ps. 118:22; Matt. 21:42). Paul presented Jesus as the chief cornerstone of the new dispensation (Eph. 2:20-22). Believers are living stones in God's temple (I Pet. 2:5-8). J.D.F.

STONES, PRECIOUS (See Minerals)

STONING, the ordinary form of capital punishment prescribed by Hebrew law. Stoning was the penalty for blasphemy (Lev. 24:16), idolatry (Deut. 13:6-10), desecration of the sabbath (Num. 15:32-36), human sacrifice (Lev. 20:2), and occultism (Lev. 20:27). Achan and his family were stoned because of his perfidy to Israel (Josh. 7:16-26). Jesus rebuked Jerusalem for stoning the prophets (Matt. 23:37; Luke 13:34). Stephen was stoned (Acts 7:58,59). The execution took place outside the city (Lev. 24:14; I Kings 21:10,13; Acts 7:58).

STOOL, a three or four-legged seat, long known among men. The Shunammite woman put one in Elisha's room (II Kings 4:10). A stool of peculiar form was used in Egypt for women in childbirth (Exod. 1:16).

STORE CITIES, supply depots for provisions and arms. Solomon built some in a region given to his Egyptian wife by Pharaoh (I Kings 9:15-19; II Chron. 8:4-6). Some were captured by Ben-hadad (II Chron. 16:4) and restored by Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:12).

STOREHOUSE, a place for keeping treasures, supplies, and equipment. Obedience to Jehovah was rewarded with full storehouses (Deut. 28:8; Mal. 3:10). David built a storehouse and thus prepared an abundant supply of materials for the temple (I Chron. 29:16). The temple storehouse was a vital part of equipment needed in Hebrew worship (II Chron. 31:10).

STORK (See Birds)

STOVE, in Palestine, usually made of clay. Some were small portable fireplaces, burning charcoal. Others were built outside the house and were heated with dry sticks, grass, and even dung. The hearth mentioned in Jeremiah 36:22 was a bronze heater. Only the well-to-do could afford a brazier. For cooking, the stove was molded so as to hold the pot or pan above the fire bowl through which air passed from vents at the bottom. The fire by which Peter warmed himself during the trial of Jesus was probably in a brazier (Mark 14:67).

STRAIGHT STREET, a name given to any route extending in a straight course across a city. Most streets were narrow and crooked. The avenue across Damascus, 100 feet wide with a walk along each side, was called Straight (Acts 9:11).

STRAKES, an older English word for "streaks" (Gen. 30:37; Lev. 14:37).

STRANGER (Heb. gēr, sojourner or stranger; tôshāv, sojourner; nokhrî, ben nēkhar, foreigner; zār, stranger). A gēr or tôshāv was a foreigner who put himself under the protection of Israel and of Israel's God, who submitted to many requirements of the law of Israel, and who was therefore given certain privileges not accorded to the nokhrî and the zār, who were also called strangers. The gēr was allowed to rest on the Sabbath and was supposed to be treated kindly (Exod. 20:10; 22:21; 23:9,12). He was classed with the Levite, the fatherless, and the widow (Deut. 14:21,29; 16:11; 26:11-13). He offered sacrifices to Jehovah, and was expected to observe various ceremonial and other requirements (Lev. 17:10ff; 18:26; 20:2; 24:16:22). The nokhrî was a foreigner who did not have cultus-fellowship with Israel, since his allegiance was claimed by another people and another deity. He was forbidden to enter the sanctuary (Ezek. 44:7-9); interest could be exacted from him (Deut. 15:3; 23:20). The zār was not necessarily a foreigner. The meaning of the word may be determined from its context. It is often used of foreigners as people entirely different from, or even hostile to, Israel (Isa. 1:7; Ezek. 11:9).

STRANGLE (Heb. hānaq, Gr. pnígo, to choke), to deprive of life by choking, and so without bloodshed. Israelites were forbidden to eat flesh from strangled animals because it contained the blood (Lev. 17:12). At the Jerusalem council even Jewish Christians were forbidden to eat such meat, lest they offend the Jews (Acts 15:20).

STREAM OF EGYPT (See River of Egypt)

STRIKER (Gr. pléktes), a pugnacious person (I Tim. 3:3; Titus 1:7).

STRINGED INSTRUMENTS (See Music)

STRIPES (Heb. nākâh, Gr. plegé). Scourging by lashing was a common form of punishment in ancient times. The Jewish law authorized it for certain ecclesiastical offenses (Deut. 25:2,3). Among the Jews a scourge consisting of three thongs was employed, and the number of stripes varied from a few up to 39. When scourging took place in the synagogue, it was done by the overseer, but the Sanhedrin also administered such punishment

A stove of baked clay, 3 feet high, from Taanach, with decorated sides, and holes for draft intake. DV (Acts 5:40). Roman scourges had pieces of metal or bones attached to the lashes. The victim was stripped to the waist and bound in a stooping position. The body was horribly lacerated so that often even the entrails were exposed.

STRONG DRINK (See Wine)

STUBBLE (Heb. qāsh, teven; Gr. kaláme), the stalks of grain left after reaping. Usually about half of the stem remained in the field. When the Hebrews made brick in Egypt, they had to gather this rather than use the straw from threshing floors which had previously been provided (Exod. 5:10-14). The word became a simile for wayward Israel (Isa. 47:14).

STUMBLING BLOCK (Heb. mikshôl, Gr. skándalon), a term referring to anything that causes a person to trip or fall. In a figurative sense it means a cause of material or spiritual ruin. Israel's iniquity and idolatry were a stumbling block to her (Ezek. 14:3,4; Jer. 18:15). Paul urged Christians not to put a stumbling block in the way of a brother (Rom. 14:13; I Cor. 8:9). Jesus, as preached by Paul (Rom. 9:32), was a stumbling block to the Jews (I Cor. 1:23).

SUAH (sū'à, Heb. sûah), one of the descendants of Asher (I Chron. 7:36).

SUBURB (Heb. migrāsh, open land), lands near cities used for pasturage of animals (Josh. 21:2,42; Ezek. 45:2).

SUCCOTH (sŭk'ŏth, Heb. sukkôth, booths or huts).
1. A place E of the Jordan at which Jacob built a house for himself and booths for his animals after his return from Mesopotamia (Judg. 8:4,5; Gen. 32:22). It was in the valley of the Jordan, near Zarethan (I Kings 7:46), and was assigned to the Gadites (Josh. 13:27). Gideon punished the town severely for its refusal to assist him when he pursued Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. 8:5-16). The site has not been identified.

2. The first station of the Hebrews on leaving Rameses (Exod. 12:37; 13:20; Num. 33:5). The exact position is unknown.

SUCCOTH BENOTH (sŭk'ŏth bē'nŏth, Heb. sukkōth benôth), a pagan god whose image was worshiped in Samaria after Assyria had captured it and put foreign rulers over it (II Kings 17:24-30). It may be a title of Marduk, the tutelary deity of Babylon.

SUCHATHITES (sū'kăth-īts), a native or inhabitant of Sucah or Socah (I Chron. 2:55). The site is unknown.

SUETONIUS (swē-tō'nĭ-ŭs). Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus lived from about A.D. 69 to A.D 140. He was a friend of Pliny (Ep. 3.8), practiced law, and was briefly secretary to Hadrian. He was a voluminous writer, and his Lives of the Caesars, his major surviving work, gives him a secure, if minor, place in Roman literature. His reference to the expulsion of the Jews under Claudius, following trouble in the Roman ghetto, "at the instigation of one Chrestos," is an almost certain reference to the Church (See Acts 18:2; Suetonius, Claudius 25:4; Arnaldo Momigliano, The Emperor Claudius and His Achievement [1932]). E.M.B.

SUKKIIM (sŭk'ĭ-ĭm, Heb. sukkîyîm), a tribe of people whose warriors joined Shishak of Egypt when he invaded Judah. Their identity is uncertain.

SUKKOTH (See Feasts)

SULPHUR (See Minerals)

SUMER (sū'mêr), one of the two political divisions, Sumer and Akkad, originally comprising Babylonia. Its principal cities were Nippur, Adab, Lagash, Umma, Larsa, Erech, Ur and Eridu, most of which were on or near the Euphrates.

SUN (Heb. shemesh, server; ôr, luminary; hammâh, hot body; heres, blistering; Gr. hélios, sun). The beneficent nature of the sun was known among the Hebrews. Sun, moon and stars determine times and seasons (Gen. 1:14; Jer. 31:35). Night and day were caused by the sun (Gen. 1:5). Since the location of the sun determined the extent of heat and light, the day was divided accordingly. Mid-morning was when the sun grew hot (I Sam. 11:9); noon was when it was brightest (Gen. 43:16); beyond noon the heat waned and it was the cool of the day (Gen. 3:8). Times and seasons were controlled by the "ordinances of heaven" (Job 38:33; Ps. 119:91). The sun also determined directions. The rising of the sun became E (Isa. 45:6); the going down of the sun (Ps. 50:1) became W. The left hand or darker quarter was N, and the right hand or brighter quarter S (Gen. 13:14; Job 37:17; Ezek. 40:24). The sun also made it possible for man to survive, for it produced fruits (Deut. 33:14). Poetic fancies arose about the sun. It is like a bridegroom (Ps. 19:4,5), stands in his house (Hab. 3:11), is ever watchful (Ps. 19:6b), dependable (Ps. 72:5), and tells of God's continuing care (Ps. 84:11). The problem of astronomy created by the standing sun (Josh. 10:13) and the returning sun dial (II Kings 20:11; Isa. 38:8) will be answered when the full story of time has been learned by man. J.D.F.

SUN, WORSHIP OF. The worship of the sun has found varied forms as far apart as the cult of Apollo in Greece and the religion of the Mayas and Incas in the American continent. Egypt, however, in the ancient world, was its special home. Breasted writes: "In a land where a clear sky prevailed, and rain was seldom seen, the incessant splendor of the sun was an insistent fact, which gave him the highest place in the thought and daily life of the people" (History of Egypt, pp. 58,59). The center of such worship was On, or Heliopolis, a city in the Delta. Here the sun was called Re, the solar orb. Atum was the dying sun, tottering to the west. As Kephri, the sun was a youth rising with vigor. In the reign of Amenhotep IV, or Ikhnaton, a purified form of sun-worship was introduced. Reviving an old name for the sun, Aton, and identifying the deity with Re, the pharaoh, who was something of a religious genius, endeavored to bring his people to a more spiritual form of worship, a project which involved a fierce contest with the Amon hierarchy of Thebes, a battle won by the priests with the ruler's death. The beautiful psalm to the sun written by the pharaoh bears striking resemblance to Psalm 104 of the Hebrew Psalter, and throws vivid light on a remarkable religious leader, and the most interesting religious movement in Egyptian history. (See Chapter XVIII in J. H. Breasted, op. cit.)

SUNDAY. The name Sunday is derived from pagan sources. Dividing the calendar into seven-day weeks was the work of Babylonian astrologers. From them the plan went into Egypt, where the days were named for planets, one for the sun. By 250 A.D. this method of reckoning time had become well established throughout the civilized world. (Cassius, Hist. of Rome, 37:18). After Christianity had been planted in northern Europe, the Teutonic people substituted the names of their gods for Egyptian titles, so we have Tiwes-day (Tuesday), Woden's Day (Wednesday) and Thor's Day (Thursday). But the first day continued to be called Sun's Day, largely because Emperor Constantine by royal decree in 321 made it Solis Day, day of the sun.

No doubt Abraham learned about the seven-day week while in Ur. The revelation given to Moses about the order followed in creation (Gen. 1) confirmed the teachings of Abraham. The sabbath thus became a vital part of the seven-day week. Jesus, by His example, led the Jewish converts to continue to observe the sabbath (Matt. 12:9; 13:54; Mark 6:2; Luke 4:16; John 6:59). But He also distinguished between the ritual-bound sabbath of the Jews and the day which God had sanctified for the welfare of man. He said He is the lord of the sabbath (Matt. 12:1-8). He healed the sick on the sabbath (Matt. 12:10-13). Slavery to sabbatical regulations is not the will of God (Mark 2:27,28). In places where the Jews were numerous, their refusal to concede that one can be saved apart from observance of the Hebrew ritual, led to grave controversy within the ranks of Christians, especially those in Antioch. From 200 A.D. on we find no mention by the church fathers of the observance of the seventh day as the time for Christian worship.

After the resurrection, which occurred on the first day of the week (Luke 24:1; John 20:1), the disciples of Jesus quite naturally met on that day to celebrate the event. Jesus endorsed their choice by some special appearances on that day (Mark 16:9; John 20:19). The disciples in Troas worshiped on the first day (Acts 20:7). In his first letter to the Corinthians Paul admonished them to lay by in store as God had prospered them, doing it week by week on the first day (I Cor. 16:2). Since the Greeks had no seven-day week at the time, one must infer that Paul had already let the Corinthians know that the first day is the Christian sabbath. That he nowhere mentions the seventh day as a day for worship is evidence that it had been supplanted by the first day. The term Lord's Day occurs only in Revelation 1:10 and is a natural adaptation of a Roman custom of calling the first day of the month "Emperor's Day." By 150 A.D. the designation had been accepted throughout the Christian world. As the stronger Hebrew Christian churches declined in influence, the tendency to observe the Hebrew sabbath slowly passed.

The early Christian writers confirm the fact that the first day was taken as the Christian day of worship, and subsequently history proves that it supplanted the Heb. sabbath, even among the converts from Judaism. Justin Martyr, who lived during the second century, wrote of the Lord's Day services. Ignatius, bishop of Antioch about 110 A.D., claimed that the day had supplanted the Jewish sabbath. The Epistle of Barnabas, written in the second century, likewise supports the view that the Lord's Day had become the day for stated worship of Christians. The Roman historian, Pliny, wrote in 112 A.D. to Emperor Trajan, telling him how Christians in Bithynia met on a certain day before dawn to sing hymns to Christ as God. The Didache, or Teachings of the Apostles, gives a command for believers to come together on the Lord's Day. Undoubtedly Jewish persecution caused Christian Jews to abandon meeting in the synagogues on the sabbath. Eventually, they met only on the Lord's Day to worship their Lord.

SUPERSCRIPTION (sū'pêr-skrĭp'shŭn, Gr. epigraphé, an inscription [so RSV]). 1. The wording on coins (Matt. 22:20; Mark 12:16; Luke 20:24).

2. The words painted on a board which was attached to the cross (Mark 15:26; Luke 23:38). The Roman custom was to have such a board, naming the crime of which the condemned man was accused, carried before him to the place of execution. John 19:19,20 call it a title (Greek, titlos). Matthew 27:37 says that Jesus' accusation, written, was set over His head. Each evangelist gives the wording as it impressed him, John the most fully, or perhaps it appeared in a slightly different form in each of the three languages in which it was written.

SUPERSTITIOUS (sū'pêr-stĭsh'ŭs). In Acts 17:22 Paul calls the Athenians deisidaimonésterous, which KJV translates, too superstitious; ASV margin, somewhat superstitious; ASV, RSV, very religious. The Greek word is neutral and applies to any religion, good or bad. The comparative form used means "more religious than most people." This would be the sense in which Paul used it; he would not deliberately antagonize his hearers.

SUPH, SUPHAH (sōōf, Heb. sûph). KJV has "the Red Sea" for both names. Suph (Deut. 1:1 ASV, RSV) is the place in front of which Moses repeated the law to Israel. Suphah (Num. 21:14 ASV, RSV) is also E of Jordan. Neither place can be identified.

SUPPER, LORD'S (See Lord's Supper)

SUPPLICATION (See Prayer)

SURETY, SURETYSHIP (shōōr'tē, -ĕ-tē, -shĭp). 1. In the phrase of "of a surety," meaning "surely," as the translation of various words (Gen. 15:13; 18:13; 26:9; Acts 12:11).

2. Relating to the giving of a pledge and a promise to give or do something if another fails; signified by "striking hands." Thus Judah remains in prison as surety that Benjamin will come to Joseph (Gen. 43:9; 4:32). Becoming surety for either a foreigner or a neighbor is consistently condemned in Proverbs (6:1-5; 11:15; 17:18; 20:16;

22:26; 27:13), as periling the assets and the peace of mind of the surety. Job, unable to find any human being to give him the needed assurance, asks God to be his surety (Job 17:3). Hezekiah follows his example (Isa. 38:14); also the psalmist (Ps. 119:122). Jesus, by His incarnation, life, death, resurrection and ascension became the surety for the performance of all the promises of God relating to salvation and assurance in the new and better covenant (Heb. 7:22). E.R.

SURFEITING (sûr'fĕt-ĭng, Gr. kraipále, a drinking-bout), over-indulgence of food or drink; intoxication; a drunken headache (Luke 21:34). Dissipation is a good rendering (RSV).

SUSA (See Shushan)

SUSANCHITES (sū-săn'kīts, Heb. shûshānekhāyē'), colonists planted in Samaria by the Assyrians when they deported the Israelites (Ezra 4:9,10), ASV Shushanchites; RSV the men of Susa, that is, the Elamites). They came from Susa or Shushan in Elam.

SUSANNA (sū-zăn'a, Heb. shôshannâh, Gr. Sousánna, lily). 1. One of the women who went with Jesus and the Twelve on their missionary journeys, and provided for them out of their means (Luke 8:1-3).

2. The heroine of The History of Susanna, in the OT Apocrypha. See APOCRYPHA.

SUSI (sū'sī, Heb. sûsî), a Manassite, father of Gaddi, one of the 12 men sent to spy out the land (Num. 13:11).

SWADDLING BAND (Heb. hăthullâh, Gr. spárgana), bands of cloth in which a new born baby was wrapped. The child was placed diagonally on a square piece of cloth which was folded over the infant's feet and sides. Around this bundle swaddling bands were wound. Mary herself wrapped the baby Jesus in swaddling bands (Luke 2:7,12). For a figurative use, see Job 38:9.

SWALLOW (See Birds)

SWAN (See Birds)

SWEAR (See Oath)

SWEAT (Heb. zē'âh, Gr. hidrós). After the Fall, God tells Adam that he will now have to work hard enough to cause sweat, in order to get his food (Gen. 3:19). Priests in the future temple are not to wear anything that causes sweat (Ezek. 44:18). During Christ's agony in Gethsemane "his sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground" (Luke 22:44).

SWEAT, BLOODY, a physical manifestation of the agony of Jesus in Gethsemane (Luke 22:44). Since Luke is believed to have been a physician, his language has been subjected to closest scrutiny. He does not say that the sweat became blood, but that it became "as it were" or "like" great drops of blood. He is not identifying, but comparing the sweat with blood. The Greek word thrómboi, translated "great drops," elsewhere means "clots," and is used of clots of blood, curds of milk, nipples, elevated places; all solid matter. Nevertheless, the point should not be stressed: drops, however thick, of sweat are here meant. Ancient and modern medicine know cases of blood extravasated from the capillaries mingling with and coloring the sweat, under severe stress of emotion.

SWELLING (swĕl'ĭng, Heb. ga'awâh), usually translated "pride," but in Psalm 46:3 refers to the tumult of a stormy sea. Heb. gā'ôn, (elsewhere translated pride, excellency, majesty, pomp, arrogancy, in Jeremiah 12:5; 49:19; 50:44); Zech. 11:3 KJV pride of Jordan; RSV always jungle of the Jordan, refers to the dense thickets infested by wild beasts, difficult and dangerous to penetrate, along the banks of the Jordan. Greek physíosis (II Cor. 12:20, RSV conceit) means "pride, being puffed up." Gr. hypérogkos (II Pet. 2:18 RSV, loud boasts of folly; Jude 16 RSV, loud-mouthed boasters) means swelled up, talking big.

SYCHAR (sī'kăr, Gr. Sychár), a village of Samaria located near Jacob's well, where Jesus met the Samaritan woman (John 4:5). It was situated on the main road that led from Jerusalem through Samaria to Galilee. No mention is made of it in the OT, but there is a Suchar or Sichar referred to in the rabbinical writings (cf. SBK, II, 432, 433). Sychar is most often identified with the modern Askar, although the identification is not certain. It is situated close to Shechem (with which it has often been incorrectly identified) and on the eastern slope of Mount Ebal. The site which by continuous tradition has been identified with Jacob's well lies about half a mile to the S. In Jesus' day Sychar was only a small village.

SYCHEM (See Shechem)

SYENE (sī-ē'nē, Heb. sevēnēh), an Egyptian city, identified as present-day Aswan, at the First Cataract of the Nile, on the E bank of the river, opposite the island of Elephantine, which is well-known to Biblical students from the Aramaic papyri found there. During much of the history of Egypt this area marked the effective southern boundary of Egypt. The name Syene appears but twice in the OT (Ezek. 29:10; 30:16), both times in prophecies against Egypt and in geographic designations of the extent of Egyptian territory, from Migdol in the N to Syene in the S.

SYMBOL, that which stands for or represents something else; a visible sign or representation of an idea or quality or of another object. Symbolism in its religious application means that an object, animal, action, form or words or whatever else is involved has a deeper spiritual meaning than a simple literal interpretation might suggest. A symbol, unlike a type, is usually not prefigurative but rather represents something which already exists. The Passover, however, was both symbolical and typical, and the symbolic actions of the OT prophets were often predictive in nature.

Interpretation of Symbols. The literature of all the peoples of the world contains symbols. Symbolism was particularly attractive to the oriental mind. Thus the Bible contains many symbols. Some parts of Scripture, of course, contain more (viz., the prophetic literature and apocalyptic books) than others. The interpretation of these symbols presents a formidable problem to the student of the Word of God.

Symbols and their meanings arise out of the culture of the peoples that use them. The more remote and obscure the culture the more difficult the interpretation of the symbols. Bernard Ramm suggests the following general rules for the interpretation of symbols:

1. Those symbols interpreted by the Scriptures are the foundation for all further studies in symbolism. The Book of Revelation interprets many of its symbols, e.g., the bowls of incense are the prayers of the saints (5:8), the great dragon is Satan (12:9), the waters are peoples, multitudes, nations and tongues (17:15). When the Bible interprets its own symbols we are on sure ground and can often find the same symbols used elsewhere in Scripture in the same or at least similar ways.

2. If the symbol is not interpreted: a. Investigate the context thoroughly. b. By means of a concordance check other passages which use the same symbol and see if such cross references will give the clue. c. Sometimes the nature of the symbol is a clue to its meaning (although the temptation to read the meanings of our culture into these symbols must be resisted). d. Sometimes comparative studies of Semitic culture reveal the meaning of a symbol.

3. Beware of double imagery in symbols. Not all symbols in the Bible have one and only one meaning. The lion is a symbol for both Christ ("the Lion of the tribe of Judah") and for the Devil (I Pet. 5:8). Some entities have more than one symbol to represent them, i.e., Christ is represented by the lion, lamb and branch, and the Holy Spirit by water, oil, wind and the dove (Protestant Biblical Interpretation, Boston: Wilde, 1956, pp. 214, 215).

Symbolism of Numbers. It is evident that certain numbers in the Bible have symbolical significance. The following are particularly important: Seven, probably the most important number in Scripture (it occurs about 600 times), has been called the sacred number par excellence. In the literature of ancient Babylonia it is the number of totality or completeness. To speak of the seven gods is to speak of all the gods. This seems to be its primary symbolical meaning in Scripture (cf. the seven creative days in Gen. 1), although M. S. Terry thinks that it symbolizes "some mystical union of God with the world, and accordingly, may be called the sacred number of the covenant between God and his creation" (Biblical Hermeneutics, Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2 ed., n. d., p. 382). The Book of Revelation makes frequent use of the number seven. There are seven churches (1:4), spirits (1:4), candlesticks (1:12,13), stars (1:16), lamps (4:5), seals (5:1; 8:1), horns and eyes (5:6), trumpets (8:2), thunders (10:3), heads of the great dragon (12:3), angels with plagues (15:1), vials (15:7), heads of the beast (13:1), mountains (17:9) and kings (17:10). Three appears to be symbolical of "several," "a few," "some," although at times it means "many" or "enough." Terry thinks that it is the number of divine fulness in unity (ibid., p. 381). The three persons of the Trinity particularly suggest this symbolical meaning. Four in the Bible seems to stand for completeness, especially in relation to range or extent. Thus there are four winds (Jer. 49:36; Ezek. 37:9), four directions, four corners of a house (Job 1:19), of the land of Israel (Ezek. 7:2) and of the whole earth (Isa. 11:12). Ten, since it is the basis of the decimal system, is also a significant number. In the Bible it is often a round number of indefinite magnitude. Twelve seems to be the mystical number of the people of God. The twelve tribes, twelve apostles, and the twelve thousand times twelve thousand sealed in the Book of Revelation bear out this symbolical meaning. Forty is the round number for a generation and also appears to be symbolical of a period of judgment (cf. the forty days of the flood, the forty years of wilderness wandering, and the forty days and nights of Jesus' temptation).

Of special interest is the mysterious number 666 in the Book of Revelation (13:18). This may be an example of Jewish Gematria, i.e., the art of attaching values to names according to the combined numerical value of the letters composing them. The numerical value of Neron Kaesar in Hebrew is 666. However, M. Tenney points out that "the usual spelling of Caesar must be changed in order to fit the explanation — a device which makes the interpretation dependent upon it at least suspicious" (Interpreting Revelation, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1957, p. 19).

Symbolism of Colors. Since color differentiations were not as exact in the ancient world as they are in modern times, it is difficult to identify Biblical colors precisely. As an example, Ramm cites the use of the Latin word purpureus which "was used to describe snow, the swan, the foam of the sea, a rose, a beautiful human eye, and purple objects" (op. cit., p. 218). Particularly difficult are the Hebrew words translated blue, purple, and scarlet. No unanimity of opinion exists among Biblical scholars with regard to the symbolical meaning of colors. Much care must be taken, therefore, in seeking to assign symbolic meanings to colors. The following are suggestions: White, the color of light, is a symbol of purity, holiness and righteousness (Rev. 7:14). Blue is difficult, but perhaps Terry is right when he says that "blue, as the color of the heaven, reflected in the sea, would naturally suggest that which is heavenly, holy and divine" (op. cit., p. 393). Scarlet, since it was most often the dress of kings, is regarded as symbolic of royalty. Black, the opposite of white, would naturally be associated with evil, such as famine (Rev. 6:5,6) or mourning (Jer. 14:2). Red is symbolic of bloodshed and war (Rev. 6:4; 12:3).

Symbolic Actions. Not only objects, names, numbers and colors are symbolic in Scripture, but actions too may be symbolic. Symbolic actions often are prefigurative and are especially associated with the Old Testament prophets. H. L. Ellison points out that "behind these actions lie the deep convictions of more primitive men that words and actions are significant, and that by doing something similar to what you prophesy, you are helping forward the fulfilment and making it more certain" (Ezekiel, the Man and His Message, Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956, p. 32). Ellison does not mean that the prophets necessarily believed this but that it made their message more impressive. Such symbolical actions by the prophets are found as early as Samuel's day. When Saul took hold of Samuel's robe and tore it, this was understood by Samuel to be symbolic of the tearing away of Saul's kingdom (I Sam. 15:27,28). By tearing his garment into 12 pieces Ahijah symbolized the break-up of the kingdom of Solomon (I Kings 11:29,30; cf. also II Kings 13:14-19; 22:11). Symbolic action is especially frequent in the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jeremiah's smashing of the pot before the elders of the people and the senior priests in the Valley of Benhinnom was clearly understood by the people, as their subsequent reaction shows. Symbolic action was involved in Ezekiel's call to the prophetic office when the Lord commanded him to eat the scroll, inscribed on the front and back with words of lamentation and mourning and woe (Ezek. 2:9, 10). Ezekiel was not only thereby informed of the content of his message but the importance of assimilating the same. Many of Ezekiel's symbolic actions were calculated to gain a hearing of the message God had given him to proclaim. This was particularly true of his drawing on the brick of the siege of Jerusalem (Ezek. 4:1-4). Ellison pointedly remarks, "We can easily understand . . . the excitement in Tel-Abib as the news went round that Ezekiel, who had not been seen outside the house for days, was acting in a way calculated to bring disaster to Jerusalem" (ibid., p. 33).

Jesus also used symbolical actions to convey spiritual truth. While all the Gospels attest to our Lord's symbolical actions, the author of the fourth Gospel places special stress on them. He calls Jesus' miracles signs (semaia). Tenney has pointed out that the verb form of this word (semainein) "evidently meant a kind of communication that is neither plain statement nor an attempt at concealment. It is figurative, symbolic, or imaginative, and is intended to convey truth by picture rather than definition" (op. cit., p. 186). When in the Fourth Gospel Jesus multiplies the loaves, this is symbolic of the fact that He is Himself the Bread of Life (John 6). The blind man healed is symbolic of Christ as the Light of the World (John 9), and Lazarus raised from the dead is symbolic of Jesus as the Resurrection and the Life (John 11).

SYMEON (See Simeon)

SYNAGOGUE (Gr. synagogé, place of assembly), a Jewish institution for the reading and exposition of the Holy Scriptures, which originated perhaps as early as the Babylonian exile. It is supposed that the synagogue had its precursor in the spontaneous gatherings of the Jewish people in the lands of the exile on their day of rest and also on special feast days. Since religion stood at the very center of Jewish existence, these gatherings naturally took on a religious significance. The Jews of the exile needed mutual encouragement in the faithful practice of their religion and in the hope of a restoration to the land. These they sought and found in spontaneous assemblies which proved to be of such religious value that they quickly spread throughout the lands of the dispersion. G. F. Moore thinks that elements of the later synagogue service originated in the things which would have been most natural for the people to do and say under such circumstances (Judaism, Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1927, I, 283).

No specific mention of a synagogue occurs in pre-Christian writings with the possible exception of Psalm 74:8: "They have burned up all the synagogues ["meeting places" RSV] of God in the land." This is a late psalm, possibly belonging to the Persian era.

From about the second century B.C. onward, the sect of the Pharisees assumed a leading role in the synagogues. It was an institution peculiarly adapted to achieve their ends. "Through it, more perhaps than by any other means, they gained the hold upon the mass of the people which enabled them to come out victorious from their conflicts with John Hyrcanus and Alexander Jannaeus and to establish such power as Josephus ascribes to them" (Moore, ibid., II, 287).

By NT times the synagogue was a firmly established institution among the Jews, who considered it to be an ancient institution, as the words of James in Acts 15:21 show: "For from early generations Moses has had in every city those who preach him, for he is read every sabbath in the synagogues" (RSV). Josephus, Philo and later Judaism traced the synagogue back to Moses. While this, of course, has no historical validity, it does reveal that Judasim regarded the synagogue as one of its basic institutions.

In the first Christian century synagogues could be found everywhere in the Hellenistic world where there were sufficient Jews to maintain one. In large Jewish centers there might be numbers of them. However, the 480 synagogues claimed by the Jerusalem Talmud (Megillah 73 d) for Jerusalem must be taken with a grain of salt!

Purpose. The chief purpose of the synagogue was not public worship but instruction in the Holy Scriptures. The very nature of Judaism, a religion of revelation, demanded such an institution to survive. For the Jews "it was not to be imagined that a man or a people could be righteous without knowing God's holy character, and what was right in his eyes and what was wrong. And if God had revealed these things, plainly revelation was the place to go to learn them" (Moore, ibid., I, 282). All of the rabbis emphasized the importance of knowing the Law. Hillel taught: "An ignorant man cannot be truly pious" (Aboth, ii, 5) and "The more teaching of the law, the more life; the more school, the more wisdom; the more counsel the more reasonable action. He who gains a knowledge of the law gains life in the world to come" (Aboth, ii, 14). The destiny of both the nation and the individual was dependent on the knowledge of the Law. It was the explicit purpose of the synagogue to educate the whole people in the Law.

How effectively the synagogue, along with the school, fulfilled this purpose is to be seen (1) from the survival of Judaism, especially in the diaspora despite the pressures of pagan influences; (2) from the thorough Judaistic nature of Galilee in the first century which in the time of Simon Maccabeus was largely pagan; and (3) from the knowledge of the Scriptures which the Apostle Paul assumes of his hearers in the Hellenistic synagogues.

Officials. Although there might be more in some of the larger synagogues, there were always at least two officials. The Ruler of the Synagogue (Heb. ro'sh ha-keneseth; Gr. archisynagogos) was probably elected by the elders of the congregation. He was responsible for (1) the building and property; (2) the general oversight of the public worship, including the maintenance of order (cf. Luke 13:14); (3) the appointing of persons to read the Scriptures and to pray; and (4) the inviting of strangers to address the congregation (Acts 13:15). Generally there was only one ruler for each synagogue, but some synagogues had more (Acts 13:15).

The Minister or Attendant (Heb. hazzān; Gr. hyperetes, cf. Luke 4:20) was a paid officer whose special duty was the care of the synagogue building and its furniture, in particular the rolls of Scripture. During the worship it was the hazzān who brought forth the roll from the chest and handed it to the appointed reader. He also returned it to its proper place at the conclusion of the reading (Luke 4:20). He had numerous other duties which included the instruction of children in reading, the administration of scourgings, and the blowing of three blasts on the trumpet from the roof of the synagogue to announce the beginning and end of the sabbath. Since his work was closely associated with the synagogue building and its equipment, he sometimes lived under its roof.

Building and Furniture. Synagogue buildings varied greatly. They were usually built of stone and lay N and S with the entrance at the S end. Their size and elegance were largely determined by the numerical strength and prosperity of the Jewish communities in which they were built. The principal items of furniture were (1) a chest in which the rolls of Scripture were kept, wrapped in linen cloth; (2) a platform or elevated place on which a reading desk stood; (3) lamps and candelabra, trombones and trumpets and (4) benches on which the worshipers sat.

Worship. The congregation was divided, the men on one side and the women on the other. The more prominent members took the front seats. The service began with the recitation of the Jewish confession of faith, the Shema': "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God, the Lord is One, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Deut. 6:4, 5). This was both preceded and followed by thanksgivings, two before and one after the morning Shema', and two both before and after the evening Shema'. The first of the two which preceded both morning and evening Shema' reads: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, former of light and creator of darkness, author of welfare (peace), and creator of all things."

After the Shema' came the prayer (Tefillah). The Ruler of the Synagogue could call upon any adult male of the congregation to say this prayer. The person praying usually stood before the chest of the rolls of Scripture. The oldest form of the Tefillah consisted of a series of ascriptions or petitions each of which ended in the benedictory response: "Blessed art thou, O Lord," etc. About the close of the first century an arrangement was made in which there were 18 of these prayers, from which the name "The Eighteen" (Shemoneh 'Esreh) was derived, a name which was maintained even when a 19th prayer was added. Prayers 1-3 were in praise of God; 4-16 were petitions; and 17-19 were thanksgivings. On sabbaths and festival days only the first three and last three were recited. A single prayer was substituted for the intervening 13 petitions, so that the total prayer consisted of seven parts. On New Year's, however, three prayers were substituted for the 13.

The Scripture lesson which followed the Tefillah could be read by any member of the congregation, even children. The only exception was that at the feast of Purim a minor was not allowed to read the book of Esther. If priests or Levites were present in the worship service, they were given precedence. The readers usually stood while reading (cf. Luke 4:16).

Prescribed lessons out of the Pentateuch for special sabbaths were established early. For other sabbaths the reader himself chose the passage, but subsequently all the Pentateuchal readings became fixed. Sections, called sedarim, were established in order to complete the reading of the Pentateuch within a prescribed time. Babylonian Jews divided the Pentateuch into 154 sections and thus completed reading it in three years, whereas Palestinian Jews read it through once every year.

A lesson from the prophets immediately followed the reading from the Pentateuch. This custom is mentioned as early as the Mishnah, and was practiced in NT times. When Jesus came to His home town, Nazareth, and entered the synagogue, He stood up to read (Luke 4:16ff). The book of the Prophet Isaiah was given to Him, and when He opened the book, He read. It is not clear from this account whether or not Jesus Himself chose the portion. He may have, because the readings from the prophets were not fixed and either the ruler of the synagogue or the reader could choose them. The prophetical lessons were usually considerably shorter than those from the Pentateuch and have been likened to texts rather than Scripture lessons. Translations often accompanied both readings. In Palestine, where the Scriptures were read in Hebrew, an extemporaneous and free translation accompanied in Aramaic, one verse at a time for the Law, three at a time for the prophets.

The sermon followed the reading from the prophets (cf. Acts 13:15 where it is called a "word of exhortation," logos parakleseos). That this was an important part of the synagogue service is revealed by the many references to teaching in the synagogue in the NT (Matt. 4:23; Mark 1:21; 6:2; Luke 4:15; 6:6; 13:10; John 6:59; 18:20). The preacher usually sat (Luke 4:20), but the Acts account has Paul standing (13:16). No single individual was appointed to do the preaching. Any competent worshiper might be invited by the ruler to bring the sermon for the day (Luke 4:16,17; Acts 13:15). The importance of the "freedom of the synagogue," as this custom was called, to the propagation of the Gospel can scarcely be overemphasized. Jesus constantly went into the synagogues to teach, and everywhere Paul went he searched out the synagogue. This was not only that he might preach the "good news" to his fellow countrymen but also to reach the God-fearers (hoi sebomenoi, hoi phoboumenoi). These were Gentiles who had become disillusioned with the old pagan religions and were attracted to Judaism because of its high ethical morality and its monotheistic faith. They were not proselytes. Certain requirements in order to attain that status, particularly circumcision, kept them out. But they were interested observers. Some even kept the Jewish holy days, observed eating regulations and were tolerably conversant with the synagogue prayers and scripture lessons. These God-fearers proved to to be ready recipients of the Gospel, and it was primarily to reach them that Paul often used the "freedom of the synagogue" to preach Christ.

The worship in the synagogue closed with a blessing which had to be pronounced by a priest and to which the congregation responded with an "Amen." If no priest was present, a prayer was substituted for the blessing.

The form of worship of the synagogue was adopted by both the Christian and Muslim religions, and that form in its general outline is to be found today in their places of worship.

SYNAGOGUE, MEN OF THE GREAT, a council of 120 men, supposedly originating at the time of Ezra, to which Jewish tradition attributed the origination and authoritative promulgation of many ordinances and regulations. Among the many functions ascribed to them were the completion of the collection of sacred books by the addition of Ezekiel, Daniel, Esther and the Twelve, minor alterations of the OT text, the authorization of the observance of the Feast of Purim and the days on which it was to be kept, and the setting up of the curriculum of study in the three main branches of Jewish learning, Midrash, Halakah, and Haggadah. One of its latest members is said to have been Simon the Just (c. 200 B.C.). Much doubt exists about the reliability of these traditions, and some scholars deny the existence of any such council at all. W.W.W.

SYNOPTIC PROBLEM (See Gospels)

SYNTICHE, SYNTYCHE (sĭn'tĭ-chē, Gr. Syntúche, fortunate), a prominent woman member of the church at Philippi who was having a disagreement with a fellow lady Christian, Euodias. Paul, in his letter to that church, entreats these two women "to agree in the Lord" (Phil. 4:2).

SYRACUSE (sĭr'ă-kūs, Gr. Syrákousai), a town on the E coast of Sicily. Syracuse was the most important and prosperous Greek city on the island. It boasted two splendid harbors which contributed substantially to its material prosperity. Corinthian and Dorian Greeks, led by Archias, founded the city in 734 B.C. The Athenians, at the height of their power (413) tried to take the city, but were completely routed. In 212 B.C. Syracuse passed under the control of Rome.

The Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed from Malta to Puteoli put in at Syracuse for three days (Acts 28:12). Whether or not Paul went ashore during this time is not stated in the Acts account.

SYRIA (sĭr'ĭ-ă, Heb. 'ărām, Gr. Syría). An abbreviation of Assyria or possibly from the Babylonian Suri, the name of a district in N Mesopotamia. Herodotus first applied the name Syria to the territory occupied by the Aramaeans, but this name was not popularized until the Hellenistic period. In the Hebrew Bible it is called 'Aram, after the Aramaeans, nomads from the Syro-Arabian desert who occupied the area in the 12th century B.C.

Location and Area. The territory of Syria varied considerably, often had vague boundaries and really never constituted a political unit. Generally speaking, it included the area S of the Taurus Mountains, N of Galilee and Bashan, W of the Arabian desert and E of the Mediterranean. This was a territory approximately 300 miles N to S and 50-150 miles E to W. The chief cities were Damascus, Antioch, Hama, Biblos, Aleppo, Palmyra and Carchemish.

Topography. Two mountain ranges, both running N and S, constitute the most prominent topographical features. The eastern range includes Mt. Hermon (over 9,000 ft. high), and the western Mt. Casius and the Lebanon. Between these two ranges is the high plain called Coele Syria watered by the Jordan, Leontes, and Orontes Rivers. To the E of Hermon flow the Abana and the Pharpar, while in the N of Syria there are tributaries of the Euphrates. The many rivers and good soil made Syria generally more prosperous than her neighbor to the S.

History. In the earliest period of its history Syria was dominated by Amorites, Hittites, Mitanni and especially Egyptians. When, however, the sea peoples invaded Syria from the N in the 12th century, an opportunity was afforded the Semitic Aramaean tribesmen of the desert to abandon their nomadic way of life and settle in the best areas of Syria. They had actually begun to infiltrate this area before the 12th century, but had not had the opportunity to establish themselves.

The Aramaeans at the time of David and Solomon were divided into a number of small kingdoms, the principal ones being: Aram of Damascus, Aram of Zobah, Aram-maacah, Aram of Beth-rehob and Aram-haharaim. The strongest of these was Zobah, whose king Hadadezer David defeated in battle along with the Syrians of Damascus who came to Hadadezer's aid (II Sam. 8:3-7). David also subdued Aram-maacah (I Chron. 19:6-19), Aram of Beth-rehob (II Sam. 10:6) and Aram-naharaim ("Aram of the rivers," usually translated "Mesopotamia" in the RSV, I Chron. 19:6).

Solomon was unable to hold David's gains in Syria, and the political and military weakness in Israel caused by the disruption afforded the Syrian kingdoms, particularly Damascus, opportunity to further strengthen themselves.

Asa, king of Judah (911-876) appealed to Syria for help against Baasha, king of Israel (909-886). This resulted in an invasion by Benhadad I, king of Damascus, of the northern kingdom (I Kings 15:16-21).

Omri (885-874) of Israel, being faced with the growing power of Syria, strategically consummated an alliance with the Phoenicians by the marriage of his son Ahab to Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidonians (I Kings 16:31). Twice during Ahab's reign (374-853) the Syrians under Benhadad I tried to invade Israel. but were put to flight first at Samaria (I Kings 20:1-21) and the following year at Aphek (I Kings 20:26-34). Three years of peace with Syria followed. Then Ahab, in alliance with Jehoshaphat of Judah, made an attempt to recover Ramoth-Gilead and was killed on the field of battle.

Jehoram of Israel (852-841) allied himself with Ahaziah (852) to war against Benhadad's successor, Hazael, and was wounded in battle at Ramoth-Gilead (II Kings 8:28,29).

During Jehu's reign (841-814) Hazael captured the area E of the Jordan (II Kings 10:32,33), and during the reign of Jehu's son, Jehoahaz (814-798), completely overran Israel and took numbers of its cities. These were retaken by Jehoash (798-782) from Hazael's successor, Benhadad II (II Kings 13:25). The successes of Jehoash were continued by his son, Jeroboam II (782-753), who recovered all of the cities which had been taken by the Syrians from Israel over the years. He even successfully reduced Damascus (II Kings 14:25-28).

Nothing is known of Syria from about 773 until the accession of Rezin in 750. During this time the Assyrian threat which had been present already for a considerable time was becoming progressively more real. To meet it, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel (740-732) formed a military alliance. In 735 or 736 they attacked Jerusalem (II Kings 16:5; Isa. 7:1) either to eliminate Judah as a possible foe or to force her into their coalition. Judah's king, Ahaz (735-715), had just come to the throne. He panicked, and despite the Prophet Isaiah's warnings, sent for help from Assyria (Isa. 7:1,25). This apparently was just the excuse Tiglathpileser III needed to invade Syria-Palestine. He captured the Israelite cities in the territories of Dan and Naphtali (II Kings 15:29) and took the people captive to Assyria. He then turned his attention to Damascus and in 732 subdued the city and brought an end to the Aramaean state, something his predecessors had tried vainly to accomplish for over 50 years.

In subsequent years the Chaldeans and Egyptians fought over Syria and with the rise of the Persians it passed into their hands. The Battle of Issus (331) brought Syria under the control of Alexander the Great. At his death it became the most important part of the Seleucid kingdom, which included large areas to the E, including Babylon. By the close of the second century Syria, with Antioch as its capital, was all that was left of the kingdom of the Seleucidae. In 64 B.C. the Romans made it a province and increased its area to include all the territory from Egypt to the Taurus Mountains, and from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates.

Syria played a prominent part in the early Church. It was at Antioch that the followers of Jesus were first called Christians (Acts 11:26). Paul was converted in Syria on the road to Damascus (Acts 9:1-9) and was commissioned with Barnabas by the Antioch church to take the Gospel to the Gentiles (Acts 13:1-3). W.W.W.

SYRIA MAACHAH (See Maachah)

SYRIAC, the Syrian tongue or language, the KJV terms for the Hebrew, 'ărāmîth, "Aramaic" or the "Aramean language" (II Kings 18:26; Ezra 4:7; Isa. 36:11; Dan. 2:4). Syriac is Eastern Aramaic and the literary language of the Christian Syrians. Early Syriac versions of the Bible are important for textual study.

SYRIAC VERSIONS (See Texts and Versions)

SYRIAN (sĭr'ĭ-ăn, Heb. 'ărām, Gr. Sýroi). 1. The language of Syria; Aramaic (II Kings 18:26; Ezra 4:7; Isa. 36:11; Dan. 2:4 KJV, Syriac).

2. The people of Syria (II Sam. 8:5, etc.); in earlier times, broadly the Arameans (Gen. 25:20; 28:5; Deut. 26:5).

SYROPHOENICIAN (sī'rō-fē-nĭsh'ăn, sĭr'ō-, Gr. Syrophoínissa), an inhabitant of the region near Tyre and Sidon, modern Lebanon. A Greek-speaking Canaanite woman, native of this region, though a Gentile, by persistence and humility won from Jesus healing for her daughter (Mark 7:26; cf. Matt. 15:22).

SYRTIS (sûr'tĭs, Gr. Sýrtis). The Syrtes (pl.) were the banks of quicksand off the coast of Libya. The Greater Syrtis was located W of the Cyrene. When the northeaster hit the ship on which Paul was traveling, the sailors feared lest they were being driven on to this great shoal of quicksand (Acts 27:17).

T

TAANACH (tā'ă-năk, Heb. ta'anak), a fortified city of Canaan, whose king was defeated by Joshua, but which was not occupied by the Israelites until later, when it was held by Manasseh (Judg. 1:27, 5:19; Josh. 12:21, 17:11; I Chron. 7:29). Mentioned in the El Amarna letters and other Egyptian records. A ruin mound remains.

TAANATH-SHILOH (tā'ă-năth-shī'lō, Heb. ta'ănath shilōh, approach to Shiloh), a town on the NE border of the heritage of Ephraim (Josh. 16:6). It was about ten miles E of Shechem and the same distance W of the Jordan River. Several large cisterns and ruins SE of Nablus are supposed to mark the site of the town.

TABBAOTH (tă-bā'ŏth, Heb. tabbā'ôth, rings), a family of temple servants who returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

TABBATH (tăb'ăth, Heb. tabbāth), a place named in tracing the route of flight of the Midianites and their allies after Gideon's 300 defeated them (Judg. 7:22). If the current identification with a site E of the Jordan between Jabesh-gilead and Succoth is correct, the army must have crossed the Jordan in their flight.

TABEAL, TABEEL (tā'bē-ăl, tā'bē-ĕl). 1. Father of one of the allied kings whom Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel attempted to make their puppet king of Israel (Isa. 7:6 KJV Tabeal; ASV, RSV Tabeel).

2. An official in Samaria who complained to Artaxerxes about the activity of the Jews (Ezra 4:7, all versions Tabeel).

TABERAH (tăb'ĕ-rà, Heb. tav'ērâh, burning), a place in the wilderness where the fire of the Lord burned some outlying parts of the camp of Israel as punishment for their complaining (Num. 11:1-3; Deut. 9:22). Probably three days' journey from Sinai (Num. 10:33); site unidentified.

TABERNACLE (Heb. 'ōhel, mô'ēdh, tent of meeting; mishkān, dwelling; Gr. skené, tent). The religious vitality of the Hebrews and the resilience of their social and political organization in the time of Joshua would indicate that the period of the wilderness wanderings was the truly creative era from which all that was best in subsequent Israelite history and religion took its rise. Under the dynamic spiritual leadership of Moses the children of Israel came to worship a cosmic deity whose virility contrasted sharply with the capricious decadent gods of ancient Near Eastern religion. The God of Sinai revealed Himself as a supremely moral being whose leadership extended over the whole earth. He was the only true God, and He desired to enter into a special spiritual relationship with Israel as a means of His self-expression in the world.

Since this relationship demanded the undivided worship of the Israelites, it was of supreme importance for a ritual tradition to be established in the wilderness so that Israel could engage in regular spiritual communion with her God. The nomadic nature of the sojourn in the Sinai peninsula precluded the building of a permanent shrine for worship. The only alternative was a portable sanctuary which would embody all that was necessary for the worship of Jehovah under nomadic conditions, and which could also serve as a prototype of a subsequent permanent building.

Such tent-shrines were by no means unknown in the ancient world. An early writer (c. 700 B.C.) spoke of a primitive Phoenician structure which was apparently placed on a cart and pulled by oxen. In pre-Islamic times the qubbah or miniature red leather tent with a dome-shaped top was used for carrying the idols and cultic objects of the tribe. Some qubbahs were large enough to erect upon the ground, while others were smaller and were mounted upon the backs of camels. Such tents were credited with the power of guiding the tribe in its journeys, and in time of war were particularly valuable for the degree of protection which they afforded. The qubbah possessed an innate sanctity which was only slightly inferior to that of the sacred cultic objects which it housed. It was used as a rallying point, a place of worship, and a locale for the giving of oracles. Since the majority of tents in antiquity were dark in color, the fact that the sacred shrine was a conspicuous red (cf. Exod. 25:5) indicates a religious tradition which reaches back to remote antiquity. Other forms of portable tent-shrines have been preserved on basreliefs, notably one from the time of Rameses II (c. 1301-1234 B.C.) which shows the tent of the divine king placed in the center of the Egyptian military camp. Another from the Roman period at Palmyra in Syria depicts a small domed tent erected on the back of a camel.

At Sinai, Moses was given a divine revelation concerning the nature, construction and furnishings of the tabernacle (Exod. 25:40). The work was carried out by Bezaleel, Oholiab and their workmen, and when the task was accomplished the tent was covered by a cloud which enshrouded the divine glory (Exod. 40:34).

The descriptions of the tabernacle in Exodus 26-27 and 35-38 make it clear that the structure was a portable shrine. Particularly characteristic of its desert origins are the tent curtains, the covering of red leather, and the acacia wood used during the construction. While it is possible to be reasonably certain about the ground plan of the Mosaic tabernacle, there are a number of problems connected with the terminology used in relation to the structure itself. The tabernacle stood in an outer enclosure or court, described in Exodus 27:9-18 and 38:9-20. Taking the ancient Hebrew cubit to indicate a linear measure of 18 inches, the dimensions of the enclosure were 150 feet in length and 75 feet in width. The sides were covered with curtains made from finely-woven linen. They were about seven feet long and were fastened at the top by hooks and at the bottom by silver clasps to 60 supporting pillars of bronze, placed at intervals of some seven feet. The enclosure thus formed was uninterrupted apart from an opening in the E wall which was screened by linen curtains embroidered in red, purple and blue. These hangings were about 30 feet wide, while those at either side of the entrance were a little over 20 feet wide. The pillars had capitals (KJV "chapiters") overlaid with silver, and were set in bases (KJV "sockets") of bronze. They were held in position by bronze pins (Exod. 27:19; 38:20).

Within this open court the various types of sacrificial offerings were presented and the public acts of worship took place. Near the center was situated the great altar of burnt offering made from acacia wood overlaid with bronze (Exod. 27:1-8), measuring nearly eight feet square and about five feet in height. Its corner projections were known as the "horns" of the altar. The various sacrificial implements associated with this altar were also made of bronze. A fire which had been miraculously kindled burned continuously on the altar, and was tended by the priests (Lev. 6:12; 9:24). Almost in the center of the court was the bronze laver which was used by the priests for ritual ablutions (Exod. 30:17-21).

To the W end of the enclosure, parallel to the long walls, stood the tabernacle itself. A rectangular structure about 45 feet by 15 feet, it was divided into two parts, a holy place and a most holy place. The basic constructional material was acacia wood, easily obtainable in the Sinai peninsula, fashioned into 48 "boards" some 15 feet in height and a little over two feet in width, overlaid with gold. The KJV "board" (qerashim) should be rendered "frame," since the same word is found on a Canaanite tablet describing the "throne room" (i.e., a trellis pavilion) of the deity El. When the vertical arms (yadhoth) were joined to the acacia frames the same general effect would be produced. The resultant structure would be light in weight yet sufficiently sturdy for ritual purposes. The base of the trellis was set in a silver fixture, and the whole was held together by horizontal bars at the top, middle, and bottom.

The completed structure was divided into two compartments by a curtain on which cherubim were embroidered in red, purple, and blue, and which was suspended on four acacia supports. The outermost of these two areas was known as the holy place, and was about 30 feet by 15 feet in area. The innermost part of the tabernacle, the "holy of holies" or most holy place was 15 feet square. The entrance to the tabernacle was screened by embroidered curtains supported by five acacia pillars overlaid with gold.

The wooden framework of the tabernacle was adorned by ten linen curtains (Exod. 26:1-7), embroidered and decorated with figures of cherubim. It measured about 40 feet in length and six feet in width, being joined in groups of five to make two large curtains. These were then fastened together by means of loops and golden clasps (KJV "taches") to form one long curtain 60 feet long and 42 feet wide. This was draped over the tabernacle proper in such a way that the embroidery was visible from the inside only through the apertures of the trellis work. Three protective coverings were placed over these curtains. The first was made of goat's hair and measured 45 feet long and six feet wide; the second consisted of red-dyed rams' hides, while the third was made of tahash-leather (KJV "badger's skins"). Much speculation has centered upon the latter term, and it appears to be connected etymologically with an early Egyptian word tj-h-s, used technically of treating or processing leather. Thus the Hebrew would imply a specially finished covering of leather.

The information furnished in Exodus makes it difficult to decide whether the tabernacle proper had a flat, somewhat sagging drapery roof, or one which was tent-like in shape with a ridge-pole and a sloping roof. Present day models of the tabernacle vary in their interpretation of this question. Historically speaking, if the influence of the desert-tent was predominant there may well have been some peak or apex to the structure. If, however, the tabernacle had anything in common with the design of contemporary Phoenician shrines, a flat roof would probably result.

Exodus 25:10-40 described the furniture of the sanctuary. The holy place, or outer chamber of the tabernacle, contained a table of showbread, a small acacia-wood structure overlaid with gold measuring three feet in length, 18 inches in breadth and a little over two feet in height. According to Leviticus 24:5-9, 12 cakes were placed on this table, along with dishes, incense bowls and flagons of gold. The bread was renewed each week, and was placed in two heaps upon the table. Nearby stood the elaborately-wrought menorah or seven-branched candlestick of pure gold. A carefully-executed floral motif was a feature of its design, and associated with the candlestick were golden snuffers. The furnishings of the holy place were completed by the addition of a gold-covered altar of incense, about 18 inches square and three feet in height. Like the great bronze altar it had projections on each corner, and like the table of showbread had golden rings and gold-covered stave to enable it to be moved readily.

The furniture of the innermost shrine, the most holy place, consisted entirely of the ark of the covenant. This was a small, box-like structure of acacia wood whose length was just under four feet, while the breadth and height were slightly above two feet. It was covered on the inside and outside with sheet gold, and had golden rings and staves like the table of showbread and the altar of incense. The lid of the ark, the "mercy seat," was covered with solid gold. On each end was a golden cherub whose wings stretched towards the center of the lid. The precise appearance of the cherubim is a matter of some uncertainty, but in the OT they were generally represented as winged creatures having feet and hands. Some ivory panels unearthed at Samaria depict a composite figure having a human face, a four-legged animal body and two elaborate, conspicuous wings.

The ark was the meeting place of God and His people through Moses, and contained the tablets of the law (Exod. 25:16,22). According to Hebrews 9:4 a pot of manna and Aaron's rod were also placed in the ark. An elaborately-worked veil separated the most holy place from the outer compartment of the tabernacle, and when the Israelites journeyed from place to place the sacred ark was secluded from view by being wrapped in this curtain. Consequently the ark was normally seen only by the high priest, and that on very special ceremonial occasions.

In the tabernacle all the sacrifices and acts of public worship enjoined by the law were undertaken. A wealth of detail surrounds the legislation for sacrificial offerings in the Mosaic code, but for practical purposes they could be divided into two groups, animal and vegetable. Flour, cakes, parched corn, and libations of wine for the drink-offerings constituted the normal vegetable sacrifices, and were frequently offered in conjunction with the thanksgivings made by fire (Lev. 4:10-21; Num. 15:11; 28:7-15). Acceptable animals were unblemished oxen, sheep and goats, not under eight days old and normally not older than three years (cf. Judg. 6:25). In cases of poverty doves could be offered as a sacrifice (Exod. 12:5; Lev. 5:7; 9:3f), but fishes were not acceptable. Human sacrifice was explicitly prohibited (Lev. 18:21; 20:25). Salt, an emblem of purity, was employed in conjunction with both the vegetable and slain offerings. The sacrifices were normally presented to the officiating priests in the outer court of the sanctuary, but on occasions were offered elsewhere (Judg. 2:5; I Sam. 7:17, etc.). In all sacrifices it was necessary for the worshiper to present himself in a condition of ritual purity (Exod. 19:14). In animal sacrifices he then identified himself with his offering by laying his hand upon it and dedicating it to the purposes of atonement through vicarious sacrifice. Afterwards the blood was sprinkled near the altar and the tabernacle proper. When worshipers partook of a sacrifice in the form of a meal, the idea of communion with God was enhanced. On the Day of Atonement the nation's collective sins of inadvertence were forgiven, and on that occasion only the high priest entered the most holy place.

According to Exodus 40:2,17 the tabernacle was set up at Sinai at the beginning of the second year, fourteen days before the passover celebration of the first anniversary of the Exodus. When the structure was dismantled during the wanderings, the ark and the two altars were carried by the sons of Kohath, a Levite. The remainder of the tabernacle was transported in six covered wagons drawn by two oxen (Num. 7:3 seq.).

For over 35 years during the wilderness period the tabernacle stood at Kadesh, during which time the ordinary sacrifices were apparently not offered consistently (cf. Amos 5:25). Apart from the comment that the ark preceded the Israelites when on the march (Num. 10:33-36), little is said of the tabernacle during the sojourn in the Sinai peninsula.

Under Joshua the first site of the tabernacle in Canaan was probably at Gilgal (Josh. 4:19), though there is no direct mention of this. Probably an early location was at Shechem, where the desert covenant was renewed (Josh. 8:30-35). During the lifetime of Joshua the tabernacle was settled in Shiloh, in Ephraimite territory, to avoid disputes and jealousy on the part of the tribes. Perhaps the degree of permanence associated with this site led to the designation of the structure by the term "temple" (I Sam. 1:9; 3:3). This may indicate that the fabric of the original tabernacle had become worse for wear, and that it had been replaced by a more substantial building. Whatever may have been the case, Shiloh was the central sanctuary until the ark was captured by the victorious Philistines after the battle of Ebenezer (c. 1050 B.C.).

The subsequent history of the tabernacle is somewhat obscure. Saul established it at Nob, close to his home in Gibeah, but after he massacred the priests (I Sam. 22:11ff) the tabernacle was transferred to Gibeon (I Chron. 16:39; 21:29), perhaps by Saul himself.

When David wished to institute tabernacle religion in his capital city of Jerusalem, he prepared a place for the ark and pitched a tent in the tradition of the Gibeon tabernacle (II Sam. 6:17ff). The ark was brought from Kirjath-jearim and subsequently lodged in the Davidic tabernacle with due ceremony. This act climaxed David's plan to give the security and legitimacy of religious sanction to his newly-established monarchy. The altar of the tabernacle at Gibeon was used for sacrificial worship until the time of Solomon, when both it and the Davidic tabernacle were superseded by the building of the temple. The new edifice incorporated all that remained of earlier tabernacle worship (I Kings 8:4) and at that point the history of the tabernacle terminated.

Some of the archaic technical terms associated with the tabernacle call for comment. The designation 'ōhĕl mō'ēdh (Exod. 33:7 et al) or "tent of meeting" was first applied to a structure which antedated the tabernacle proper. It was pitched outside the camp, and Joshua was its sole attendant (Exod. 33:11) in the absence of a regularized priesthood. It was a place of revelation, where the people met with God. The word mō'ēdh has been discovered in an Egyptian document dated c. 1100 B.C., referring to an assembly of the citizens of Byblus. The term occurs again in Isaiah 14:13, where the reference is to the assembly of the gods in the remote northern regions, a popular theme in pagan Canaanite writings. The "tent of meeting" or "tabernacle of the congregation" referred to in Exodus 33 is apparently an interim structure, based on the pattern of a simple desert shrine. It combined political and social functions with the religious revelations given by God to His covenant assembly.

The word mishkan, commonly used to designate the tabernacle, is related to the ordinary Canaanite word for "dwelling-place," and meant originally a tent, thus reflecting the nomadic background of tabernacle worship. A related verb, shakhan (KJV "dwell"), is used of God being "tabernacled" with His people (Exod. 25:8; 29:45 et al). This usage is found in a number of ancient Semitic writings and means "to encamp." The sense is that of God's revealing Himself on earth in the midst of His chosen people. This is clearly distinguished from the use of the verb yashav, "to dwell" "inhabit," which is only used of God dwelling in heaven. This subtle distinction was noted by the Apostle John when he recorded that the word became flesh (i.e., a body) and dwelt (eskenósen, literally, was tabernacled) amongst us (John 1:14). The doctrine of the shekinah glory, which grew up in the intertestamental period, was also related to the words shakhan and mishkan, denoting a local manifestation of Divine glory.

A degree of symbolism was naturally attached by the Hebrews to various aspects of the tabernacle. The structure typified God dwelling with His people (Exod. 25:8), while the ark of the covenant spoke particularly of His presence and forgiving love. The 12 cakes of showbread represented the Twelve Tribes dedicated to divine service. The menorah typified Israel as a people called to be the children of light (cf. Matt. 5:14ff), and the ascending incense symbolized the act of prayer (cf. Rev. 5:8; 8:3). The writer of Hebrews interpreted the tabernacle proper in terms of its twofold division typifying the earthly and heavenly aspects of Christ's ministry. The old tabernacle was but a shadow of the true ideal (Heb. 8:5; 10:1), the latter being pitched by God, not man (8:2). The language of Ephesians 5:2 is distinctly reminiscent of Levitical sacrificial terminology, and the Evangelists were sufficiently impressed by the symbolism of the rent veil to point out that Christ had opened up for all a way into the most holy place. In the early Church and in later times more elaborate, sometimes even fanciful, interpretations were imposed upon the structure and ritual of the tabernacle. R.K.H.

TABITHA (tăb'ĭ-thà, Aram. Tabeithá; Gr. Dorcás, meaning, in Greece, a roe, in Syria and Africa, a gazelle), the name of a Christian woman disciple who lived in Joppa and made clothing to give to poor widows. When she died, Peter was summoned, and he raised her from death (Acts 9:36-43).

TABLE (Heb. lûah, Gr. pláx, writing tablet). The law was engraved on stone tablets (Exod. 24:12; II Cor. 3:3; Heb. 9:4). Of undefined material (Isa. 30:8; Hab. 2:2; Luke 1:63 Gr. pinakídion). Figuratively of the heart (Prov. 3:3; 7:3; Jer. 17:1). Heb. mēsav (S. of Sol. 1:12 RSV) and Gr. klíne (Mark 7:4 see ASV, RSV note) mean "couch." Heb. shuleban, originally a leather mat spread on the ground (Ps. 23:5; 78:19); the table of the shewbread (Exod. 25:23, etc.; Heb. 9:2 Gr. trá- peza) made of acacia wood overlaid with gold. Kings, queens and governors had dining tables (I Sam. 20:29; I Kings 18:19; Neh. 5:17); also private persons (I Kings 4:10; Job 36:16). Psalm 128:5 is an attractive picture of a family table. Gr. trápeza, a four-legged table, is used of dining tables (Luke 22:21; 30; Acts 6:2). To eat under the table was for dogs and the despised (Judg. 1:7; Matt. 15:27; Luke 16:21). Moneychangers used tables (Matt. 21:12, etc.). Communion is served from the Lord's table (I Cor. 10:21). TABLE OF SHEWBREAD (See Tabernacle)

TABLES OF THE LAW, stone tablets on which Moses wrote the ten commandments (Exod. 24:3, 4a,12; 31:18; Deut. 4:13; 5:22). It is said that God wrote them with His finger, though He dictated them to Moses. When Moses came down from the mountain and saw the worship of the golden calf, he threw down the tablets, breaking them (Exod. 32:15; 19; Deut. 9:9-17; 10:1-5). At God's command, Moses again went up the mountain with two new tablets, and wrote the law anew (Exod. 34:1-4,27-29). Though God said "I will write," He also said to Moses, "Write these words." Moses put these tablets in the ark (Deut. 10:5) where they were in the time of Solomon (I Kings 8:9 = II Chron. 5:10). They are referred to in the NT (II Cor. 3:3; Heb. 9:4).

TABLET (See Dress)

TABOR (ta'bêr). 1. A mountain in Galilee where the borders of Issachar, Zebulun and Naphtali meet (Josh. 19:22). On its slopes Barak gathered 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun (Judg. 4:6, 12,14; 5:18) including contingents from some other tribes (5:13-15), to fight against Sisera and the Canaanite army at Megiddo. Here Zeba and Zalmunna, kings of Midian, killed Gideon's brothers (8:18,19). This commanding height was long a sanctuary of idolatrous orgies (Hos. 5:1). Mt. Tabor is E of Nazareth, SW of the Sea of Galilee, NE of the plain of Esdraelon. From its summit, 1843 feet above sea level, the Hill of Moreh rises to the S, with Mt. Gilboa beyond. To the N, beyond the N Galilean hills, rises Mt. Hermon, with which it is linked in Psalm 89:12. With Carmel it is compared to the mass of Nebuchadnezzar's advance against Egypt (Jer. 46:18). Ancient tradition places the Transfiguration here, although it is far from Caesarea Philippi, and can be called "exceeding high" only because of the extensive view. But six days would have sufficed to make the journey from Caesarea Philippi to Mt. Tabor (Matt. 16:13; 17:1 and parallels), hence the identification is not impossible. A recently built Franciscan church, monastery and hostel, perpetuating the tradition, now crown the summit.

2. The plain of Tabor, or (ASV, RSV) oak of Tabor (I Sam. 10:3). Samuel told Saul he would meet men bearing gifts here, as a sign of God's favor. Geographical notes in the context (9:5-10:10) have led to the opinion that this oak cannot have been on Mt. Tabor, in which case its site is uncertain. Anciently and until recently Mt. Tabor was heavily forested. The oak or terebinth (ASV margin) might have been a well-known sacred tree or grove.

3. A Levite city of the sons of Merari, in Zebulun (I Chron. 6:77). Some identify it with the village of Dabareh or Dabrittha, modern Debûriyeh, on the western slope of Mt. Tabor, whose name may perpetuate the memory of the prophetess and judge, Deborah, or Judges 4 and 5. E.R.

TABRET (See Musical Instruments)

TABRIMMON, TABRIMON (tăb-rĭm'ŏn), son of Hezion and the father of Benhadad, king of Syria (I Kings 15:18). Tabrimon in KJV.

TACHE (tăch, Heb. qerāsîm, a clasp), a clasp of gold, to couple the cloth curtains of the tabernacle (Exod. 26:6; 36:13); of bronze, to couple the goat's hair curtains (26:11; 36:18). The veil hung from the clasps in a manner not explained (26:33). Taches (RSV, hooks) are associated with the frame of the tabernacle (35:11; 39:33). In all other references ASV, RSV have "clasps."

TACHMONITE, TACHEMONITE (tăk'mō-nīt, Heb. tahkemōnî), the family of David's chief captain (II Sam. 23:8) who sat in the gate (KJV) or Josheb-basshebeth (ASV, RSV); the same as Jashobeam, a Hachmonite (I Chron. 11:11). The text of both verses is difficult.

TACKLING (Heb. hevel, rope, Gr. skeué, equipment, ship's tackle), refers either to the hawsers (Isa. 33:23) or furniture (Acts 27:19) of a ship.

TADMOR (tăd'môr, Heb. tadhmōr), a city in the desert NE of Damascus. In patriarchal times a much-traveled road ran through it from Damascus N to Haran. When Israel was in Egypt, a caravan route already ran eastward from Qatna to the Euphrates. Solomon either built a new city close by, or rebuilt the old, after his conquest of Hamath-zobah (II Chron. 8:4). The context (8:3-6) mentions Solomon's building projects in various parts of his dominion. In the parallel passage in I Kings 9:18 KJV, Tadmor is spoken of as "in the wilderness, in the land." ASV has Tamar, RSV "Tamir in the wilderness, in the land of Judah." The Heb. consonantal text has tmr, which should represent Tamar; but which is pointed with the vowel signs of Tadmor; and so it was traditionally read. The context in I Kings 9:15-19 also speaks of many places throughout Solomon's kingdom, though in a different order (from II Chron. 8:3-6), so that it is possible that the two Tadmors are identical. If so, the added "of Judah" in RSV must be rejected. There are textual variants which would yield either "in the wilderness of Aram (Syria)" or "In the wilderness of the South (Negev)" instead of "in the wilderness, in the land" in I Kings 9:18. In NT times and later Tadmor or Tudmur became Palmyra, city of palm trees, a magnificent and wealthy city on the caravan route eastward from Emesa to Babylon and to Dura. Excavations reveal impressive Roman ruins. Palmyra enjoyed its greatest fame and prosperity under its Roman-appointed king Odenatus and his widow Zenobia, who made herself queen and defied the Romans. The ruins include Corinthian columns and a temple to the sun. E.R.

TAHAN, TAHANITE (tā'hăn-īt, Heb. tahan). 1. A son of Ephraim and founder of a tribal family (Num. 26:35).

2. A descendant of the same family in the fourth generation (I Chron. 7:25).

TAHAPANES, TAHPANHES (tà-hăp'à-nēz, Heb. tahpanhēs), a fortress city at the eastern edge of the Nile Delta, on the eastern border of Egypt, on an old caravan road to Palestine and beyond; early a Greek settlement, by them named Daphnae, perpetuated in the modern Tell Defenneh. Jeremiah saw it as powerful enough to break "the crown" of Judah. Hither Jews fled after the fall of Jerusalem (Jer. 2:16 KJV Tahapanes, ASV, RSV Tahpanhes; 43:1-7). Here Jeremiah (43:8-11; 44:1; 46:14) prophesied its destruction; Ezekiel also (30:18, Tehaphnehes). During their century it was a city of trade and the manufacture of pottery and jewelry. Excavations have uncovered ruins of this period.

TAHASH (tā'hăsh, Heb. tahash), a son of Reumah, concubine of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. 22:24 KJV, Thahash).

TAHATH (tā'hăth, Heb. tahath, below). 1. A Kohathite Levite, son of Assir and father of Uriel (I Chron. 6:24,37).

2. Son of Bered, grandson of Shuthelah the son of Ephraim (I Chron. 7:20). Also the name of the 24th station of Israel from Egypt, and the 11th from Sinai (Num. 33:26,27).

TAHPENES (tà'pēn-ēz, Heb. tahpenês), the Egyptian queen who brought up Genubath, the son of her sister and of Hadad, the Edomite adversary of David and Solomon (I Kings 11:14-22).

TAHREA (tà'rē-à, Heb. tahrēa'), a grandson of Mephibosheth, son of Micah, and so a descendant of Saul through Jonathan (I Chron. 9:41; called Tarea in 8:35).

TAHTIM-HODSHI (tà'tĭm-hŏd'shī), a town at the northern limit of David's census (II Sam. 24:22). RSV, following a Septuagint reading, translates "to Kadesh in the land of the Hittites." Kadesh on the Orontes was the southern Hittite capital.

TALE, in KJV renders several Heb. and Gr. words which in ASV, RSV are translated according to their different meanings: a sigh (Ps. 90:9); number (Exod. 5:8,18); count (I Chron. 9:28); slander (Ezek. 22:9); idle talk (Luke 24:11).

TALEBEARING, slander, forbidden in the law (Lev. 19:16, see RSV); reproved in Proverbs 11:

13; 20:9, RSV gossiping). A word meaning "whisperer" (so ASV, RSV) is used in Proverbs 18:8; 26:20,22. (See also I Tim. 5:13.)

TALITHA CUMI (tăl'ĭthà kōō'mē), the Aramaic words which Jesus spoke when He raised Jairus' 12-year-old daughter from death (Mark 5:41). They are intimate and endearing, and might be rendered, "Little lamb, get up."

TALMAI (tăl'mī, -mā-ī, Heb. talmay). 1. A son of Anak in Hebron and probably the founder of the family of the Anakim, driven from Hebron by Caleb (Num. 13:22; Josh. 15:14; Judg. 1:10).

2. A king of Geshur, whose daughter Maacah was one of David's wives and Absalom's mother (II Sam. 3:3; 13:37; I Chron. 3:2).

TALMON (tăl'mŏn, Heb. talmôn), a Levite porter and founder of a tribal family, members of which returned with Zerubbabel and served as porters in the new temple (I Chron. 9:17; Ezra 2:42; Neh. 7:45; 11:19; 12:25).

TALMUD (tăl'mŭd), a collection of Jewish writings of the early Christian centuries. There is a Palestinian Talmud, and a later, more authoritative, much longer Babylonian Talmud. Each consists of Mishnah and Gemara. Mishnah grew out of oral tradition, whose origin is obscure. The Mosaic Law did not cover all the needs of a developing society, and the defect was supplied by oral rabbinical decisions. When, to preserve these, they came to be written down, a further need was felt for a commentary on them. This function the Gemara fulfils. The scope of the Talmud may be seen in the titles of the six parts of the Mishnah: Seeds, relating to Agriculture; Feasts; Women and Marriage; Civil and Criminal Law; Sacrifices; Clean and Unclean Things and their Purification.

TAMAH (tā'mà, Heb. temah), the children of Tamah (Neh. 7:55) or Thamah (Ezra 2:53) were Nethinim or temple-servants (RSV) who returned from exile with Zerubbabel. ASV, RSV Temah.

TAMAR (tā'mêr, Heb. tāmār, palm tree). 1. The wife of Er; then Levirate wife of Onan; by whom, after the death of Onan, her father-in-law Judah had twin sons, Perez and Zerah (Gen. 38). She is remembered in Ruth 4:12, in the genealogy in I Chronicles 2:4, and her name is recorded as that of one of the women in the ancestral line of Jesus (Matt. 1:3 KJV Thamar).

2. A daughter of David and sister of Absalom, whom her half-brother Amon violated (II Sam. 13:1-33).

3. The daughter of Absalom (II Sam. 14:27).

4. A place at the SE corner of the boundary of the future Holy Land as described in Ezekiel's vision (Ezek. 47:18,19; 48:28).

5. A city in Syria, more commonly known as Tadmor, later Palmyra. See TADMOR.

TAMIR (See Tadmor)

TAMMUZ (tăm'ŭz, Heb. tammûz), a fertility god widely worshiped in Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine; equivalent to Osiris in Egypt and Adonis of the Greeks. His consort was the goddess Ishtar (Astarte or Ashtoreth). Their cult involved licentious rites. Tammuz was supposed to have been killed by a wild boar, while shepherding his flocks. His wife rescued him from the underworld. His death was taken to represent the onset of winter. The long dry season was broken by spring rains when he came to life again. The fourth month of the Babylonian and later Jewish calendar was named for him (June-July). The only mention of him in the Bible occurs in connection with the custom of women mourning for him (Ezek. 8:14), which, being observed at the very gate of the temple of the true God, seemed to the prophet one of the most abominable idolatries. His Greek name Adonis is derived from the Phoenician and Hebrew word for "Lord."

TANACH (See Taanach)

TANHUMETH (tăn-hū'mĕth, Heb. tanhūmeth), a Netophathite and father of Seraiah, one of the Hebrew captains who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (II Kings 25:23; Jer. 40:8).

TANIS (See Zoar)

TANNER, TANNING (See Occupations and Professions)

TAPHATH (tā'făth, Heb. tāphath), Solomon's daughter, wife of the son of Abinadab, Solomon's commissariat officer in Dor (I Kings 4:11).

TAPPUAH (tă-pū'à, Heb. tappûah). 1. A city whose king Joshua conquered (Josh. 12:17); in the lowland or shephelah of Judah (15:34); location uncertain.

2. A town on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. 16:8); "The land of Tappuah belonged to Manasseh, but the town of Tappuah on the border of Manasseh belonged to the sons of Ephraim" (Josh. 17:8 RSV). Its spring, En-tappuah, was on the boundary of Manasseh (17:7). Modern Sheikh Abū Zarad.

3. One of the sons or descendants of Hebron (I Chron. 2:43). Beth-tappuah in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:53) may have been his home.

TARAH (tā'rà, Heb. terah), a stage in Israel's march between Tahath and Mithcah (Num. 33: 27,28 ASV, RSV Terah).

TARALAH (tăr'à-là, Heb. tar'ălâh), a city of Benjamin between Irpeel and Zelah (Josh. 18:27). Exact location unknown.

TAREA (tā'rē-à, Heb. ta'ărēa'), a descendant of King Saul (I Chron. 8:35), written Tahrea in I Chronicles 9:41.

TARES (See Plants)

TARPELITES (tàr'pĕl-īts, Heb. tarpelāyē'), the people of a nation from whom the "great and noble Osnappar" transported into the region around Samaria many colonists (Ezra 4:10). KJV has "Asnapper." He was probably Esar-haddon (Ezra 4: 2) or a general under him.

TARSHISH (tàr'shĭsh, Heb. tarshîsh). 1. A son of Javan, great-grandson of Noah (Gen. 10:4), and presumably progenitor of a Mediterranean people, as most of these names in the "Table of the Nations" refer not only to individuals but to the people descended from them.

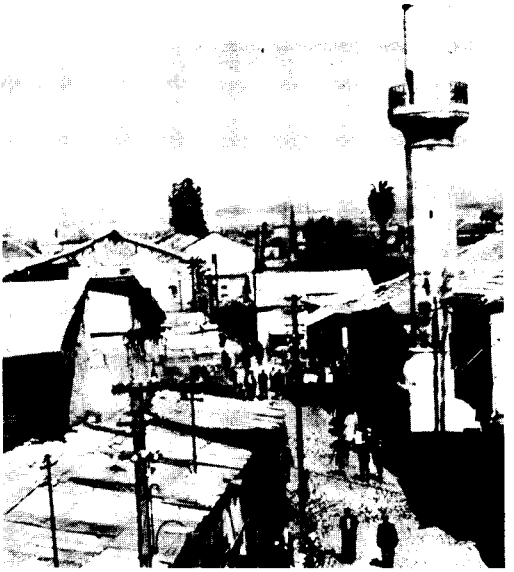
2. A place, presumably in the western Mediterranean region, conjecturally identified by many with Tartessus, an ancient city located on the Atlantic coast of Spain but long lost. Jonah fled to it (Jonah 1:3).

3. "Ships of Tarshish" seems to refer to large ships of the kind and size that were used in the Tarshish trade, for Solomon had "ships of Tarshish" going from Ezion-geber through the Red Sea and on to India, making the round trip in three years (I Kings 10:22).

4. A great-grandson of Benjamin (I Chron. 7: 10).

5. One of the seven princes of Persia and Media who stood in the presence of Xerxes (Esth. 1:14).

TARSUS (tàr'sŭs, Gr. Tarsós), a city of Cilicia, the capital of the province from A.D. 72, and the birthplace and early residence of the Apostle Paul, a fact which he himself notes with civic pride (Acts



A street scene in Tarsus, Paul's native city, in Asia Minor. JFW

21:39), echoing a line of Euripides (Ion 8) applied to Athens, which the Tarsians appear to have appropriated. The city stood on the Cilician plain, a little above sea-level, and some ten miles inland. The Cydnus provided an exit to the sea, and in ancient times the river course was equipped with artificial dock and harbor facilities. Tarsus was an ancient city, the seat of a provincial governor when Persia ruled, and, in the days of the Greek Syrian kings, the center of a lumbering and linen industry. Acts 18:3 probably refers to an associated skill, the manufacture of a rough goat-hair cloth, known from the same province as "cilicium." During the first century before Christ the city was the home of a philosophical school, a university town, where the intellectual atmosphere was colored by Greek thought.

Tarsus stood, like Alexandria, at a confluence of East and West. The wisdom of the Greeks and the world-order of Rome, mingled with the good and ill of Oriental mysticism, were deep in its consciousness. A keen-minded Jew, born and bred at Tarsus, would draw the best from more than one world. The Jews had been in Tarsus since Antiochus Epiphanes' refoundation in 171 B.C., and Paul belonged to a minority which had held the Roman citizenship probably since Pompey's organization of the East (66-62 B.C.). E.M.B.

TARTAK (tär'tăk, Heb. tartāq), a god worshiped by the Avvites, a people of Assyria who were transplanted from their land to Samaria after its fall to Assyria (II Kings 17:31).

TARTAN (tär'tăn, Heb. tartān), a commander-in-chief of the Assyrian army (Isa. 20:1; II Kings 18:17). A title, not a proper name.

TASKMASTERS (See Occupations & Professions)

TATTENAI, TATNAI (tăt'ĕ-nī, tăt'nī, Heb. tattenay), a Persian governor of the territory W of the Jordan who was ordered to assist the Jews in the rebuilding of the temple (Ezra 5:3,6; 6:6,13).

TAVERN (See Inn)

TAVERNS, THREE, the place where the Christian brethren of Rome met Paul (Acts 28:15), near or at Appii Forum, about 33 miles SE of Rome.

TAXES, charges imposed by governments, either political or ecclesiastical, upon the persons or the properties of their members or subjects. In the nomadic period, taxes were unknown to the Hebrews. Voluntary presents were given to chieftains in return for protection. The conquered Canaanites were forced to render labor (Josh. 16:10; 17:13; Judg. 1:28-35). Under the theocracy of Israel every man paid a poll-tax of a half shekel for the support of the tabernacle worship (Exod. 30:13; 38:25,26), and this was the only fixed impost. It was equal for rich and poor (Exod. 30:15). Under the kings, as Samuel had warned the people (I Sam. 8:11-18), heavy taxes were imposed. They amounted to a tithe of the crops and of the flocks besides the forced military and other services which would be imposed. In the days of Solomon, because of his great building program (the magnificent temple, the king's palaces, thousands of stables for chariot-horses, the navy, etc.) the burden of taxes was made so oppressive that the northern tribes rebelled at his death (I Kings 12).

During the days of the divided kingdom Menahem (II Kings 15:19,20) bribed the Assyrian king with a thousand talents of silver to support him, and he raised this from the rich men of his kingdom. Similarly Hoshea (II Kings 17:3) paid heavy tribute to Assyria and on refusing further to pay he lost his kingdom. Later, Pharaoh Necho of Egypt put Judah under heavy tribute, and Jehoiakim oppressively taxed Judah (II Kings 23:33, 35). Under the Persian domination, "tribute, custom or toll" (Ezra 4:13) were forms of taxation, though Artaxerxes exempted "priests, Levites," etc. (Ezra 7:23,24). The Ptolemies, the Seleucidae, and later the Romans, all adopted the very cruel but efficient method of "farming out the taxes," each officer extorting more than his share from those under him, and thus adding to the Jewish hatred of the publicans, among whom were at one time Matthew and Zacchaeus, both converts later. TEBAH (tē'bà, Heb. tevah), a nephew of Abraham, born to Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. 22:24).

TEBALIAH (tēb-à-lī'à, Heb. tevalyāhû), a son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite, a gate-keeper of the tabernacle under David (I Chron. 26:11).

TEBETH (See Calendar)

TEETH (Heb. shēn, Gr. odoús). Isaiah 41:15 tells of "a sharp threshing instrument having teeth," literally "possessor of sharp edges," a figure referring to Israel as God's instrument of judgment upon the nations. In Psalm 58:6 "great teeth," literally "biters," could refer either to teeth or jaws. In Proverbs 30:14 "jaw teeth as knives" is clearly figurative, referring to the oppressors of the poor, and the same word in Joel 1:6, "the jaw-teeth of a lioness," is hyperbole, describing the very destructive habits of the locust. In none of the preceding instances is the ordinary word for tooth used. Some of the more frequent uses of the common words are illustrated in the following passages: Genesis 49:12 "his teeth white with milk" probably refers to the purity and holiness of the Messiah; "tooth for tooth" (Exod. 21:24) is of course literal; gnashing with the teeth can be a token of anger (Job 16:9) or of remorse (Matt. 8: 12 and several other references to the suffering of the wicked after death) or of contemptuous rage (Lam. 2:16; Acts 7:54). Proverbs 10:26 provides a hint, if one is needed, that the ancients did not have good dental care. Song of Solomon 4:2 speaks of the beauty of teeth. A.B.F.

TEHINNAH (tē-hĭn'à, Heb. tehinnâh, entreaty), son of Eshton of Judah, "father of the city of Nahash" (I Chron. 4:12).

TEIL TREE (See Plants)

TEKEL (tĕ'kĕl, Heb. teqēl), part of the curse of Belshazzar, who was weighed in the balances and found wanting (Dan. 5:25). It means "weighed," from the same root as "shekel" which was a weight long before it was a coin.

TEKOA, TEKOAH, TEKOITE (tĕ-kō'à -īt, Heb. teqôa', tekô'âh), a city of Judah or an inhabitant thereof. Tekoa lay 12 miles S of Jerusalem and the same distance NE of Hebron. It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Chron. 11:6). Previous to this, Joab, David's cousin and general, had sent to Tekoa for a "wise woman" and intrigued with her to persuade David to bring back Absalom. The prophet Amos describes himself as "among the herdsmen of Tekoa" (Amos 1:1) and later as a "dresser of sycomore-trees" (7:14) and this gives us a hint as to the civilization of the city and surrounding country. Jeremiah warns Judah of the approaching danger from the N (Jer. 6:1). Ruins of the place survive in Takū'a. A.B.F.

TEL-ABIB (tĕl'ā'bĭb, Heb. tēl 'āvîv), a place by the river Chebar in Babylonia where Ezekiel visited and ministered to the Jewish exiles (Ezek. 3: 15). Not to be confused with the modern city Tel-aviv in Palestine.

TELAH (tē'là, Heb. telah, fracture), an early Ephraimite (I Chron. 7:25).

TELAIM (tē-lā'ĭm, Heb. ha-telā'îm, lambs), the place where Saul mustered his army against Amalek (I Sam. 15:4); possibly the same as Telem (Josh. 15:24) in Judah. See TELEM.

TELASSAR (tē-lăs'ēr, Heb. tela'ssār), a place mentioned by the Rabshakeh of Assyria as inhabited by the children of Eden, whose gods could not deliver them from the Assyrian kings (Isa. 37:12). It has not been identified.

TELEM (tē'lĕm, Heb. telem). 1. A city of Judah near the border of Edom (Josh. 15:24).

2. A porter who put away his foreign wife after the return from captivity (Ezra 10:24).

TEL-HARESHA, TEL-HARSA (tĕl'hà-rē'shà, tĕl'-hàr'sà, Heb. tēl-harshā'), a place in Babylonia from which certain people who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel had difficulty in proving that they were truly Israelites (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7: 61).

TELL (Arabic, Heb. tēl), a mound or heap of ruins which marks the site of an ancient city and is composed of accumulated occupational debris, usually covering a number of archeological or historical periods and showing numerous building levels or strata. Ordinarily, city sites were selected in association with certain natural features, such as a spring or other convenient water supply, a hill or similar defense advantage, or trade routes determined by local geography. In the course of the history of a town, many rebuildings would be necessitated because of destruction by war, earthquake, fire, neglect, or like causes. In the Bible, the fact that a city had become only a mound is often regarded as a result of judgment. Deuteronomy 13:16 prescribes that an apostatizing city should be destroyed and reduced to a tell. Joshua executed judgment upon Ai when he burned it and "made it forever a heap of ruins" (Josh. 18:28, RSV). Jeremiah prophesied that Rabbah of Ammon would become "a desolate mound" (49: 2, RSV). In harmony with this is the declaration of Jeremiah that in the restoration of the land of Israel "the city shall be rebuilt upon its mound" (30:18, RSV). Joshua 11:13 states that in the northern campaign Joshua did not destroy any of "the cities that stood upon their mounds" (RSV), except Ai (here the KJV missed the point of the text, translating, "the cities that stood still in their strength"). The term tel also appears as an element in place-names of living towns; see Ezekiel 3:15; Ezra 2:59; and Nehemiah 7:61. C.E.D.

TELL EL AMARNA (tĕl-ĕl-à-màr'nà), or more accurately, simply El Amarna, is the modern name for Akhetaton, the city built as the capital of Egypt by Akhnaton (Amenhotep IV, c. 1387-1366 B.C.), as a result of his break with the priests of Amon at Thebes. Both the city and the religious innovations of the king did not long survive his reign.

Of great historical importance are the clay tablets (more than 350) accidentally discovered here by a peasant woman in 1887. These tablets, written in cuneiform and addressed to Amenhotep III and Amenhotep IV, mainly represent the official correspondence from the petty rulers of Palestine-Syria, but also include letters from the kings of Mitanni, Assyria, and Babylonia. The princes of Palestine-Syria complain of intrigues and of incursions of outsiders and request the sending of Egyptian troops. Among the invaders are the Habiru, whose relationship to the Hebrews, or Israelites, and the Exodus has been much discussed. C.E.D.

TEL-MELAH (tĕl-mē'lȧ, Heb. tēl-melah, hill of salt), a Babylonian town, probably on the low salty district not far N of the Persian Gulf (Ezra 2:59; Neh. 7:61).

TEMA (tē'mȧ, Heb. têmā'). 1. One of the 12 sons of Ishmael and progenitor of a tribe (Gen. 25:12-16).

2. A place at the northern edge of the Arabian desert where the above tribe lived (Job 6:18-20; Isa. 21:14; Jer. 25:23).

TEMAH (See Tamah)

TEMAN (tē'măn, Heb. têmān, on the right, i.e. toward the south). 1. A grandson of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen. 36:11,15).

2. An Edomite chief probably not the same as #1 above (Gen. 36:42).

3. A city in the northeastern part of Edom, noted at one time for the wisdom of its people (Jer. 49:7).

TEMANI (tĕm'ȧ-nī), an inhabitant of Teman (Gen. 36:34).

TEMENI (tĕm'ĕ-nī, Heb. têmenî), a son of Ashhur (I Chron. 4:6).

TEMPERANCE (Gr. egkráteia, nephálios, sóphron). The prime meaning is self-control (Acts 24:25; Gal. 5:23; II Pet. 1:6; I Cor. 9:25). It is not limited to abstinence from liquor. In Acts 24:25 the reference is to chastity. In I Timothy 3:2,11; Titus 2:2 it is the opposite of "drunken."

TEMPLE (Heb. hêkhāl, bayith, Gr. hierón, naós), the name given to the complex of buildings in Jerusalem which was the center of the sacrificial cult for the Hebrews. This ritual of sacrifices was the central external service of the ancient people of God, and the unifying factor of their religion, at least in OT times. By the time of Christ, the importance of the temple was somewhat lessened because of the place of the local synagogue in Jewish life.

Three temples stood successively on Mt. Moriah (II Chron. 3:1) in Jerusalem. This site is today called the Haram esh-Sherif and is a Muslim holy place. The first temple was built by Solomon, the second by Zerubbabel and the Jews who returned from the Babylonian exile. The third temple, which was in use in the days of Jesus, was begun and largely built by Herod the Great.

Most ancient religions had temples. Indeed, the Canaanite temples found at Megiddo and Hazor are not unlike that of the Hebrews in ground plan. The Jerusalem temple was distinctive in that it contained no idol in the inner sanctum, but only a box (called the ark) containing the two tables of the law, with the worshiping cherubim above.

The central place of the temple in the religious life of ancient Israel is reflected throughout the Bible. The Psalms abound in references to it (42:4; 66:13; 84:1-4; 122:1,9; 132:5,7-8,13-17). The temple was the object of religious aspiration (23:6; 27:4,5). Pilgrimage to the temple brought the people of Israel from the ends of the earth (Ps. 122:1-4; Acts 2:5-11). The visit of Jesus to the temple at the age of 12 is well-known (Luke 2:41-51). Later He exercised some of His ministry there (Matt. 26:55; Luke 19:45; John 7:28,37; 10:23). The early Jerusalem Christians also worshiped there until the break between Israel and the Church became final (Acts 3:1; 5:12,42; 21:26-34).

Solomon's Temple. The great economic and cultural development of the Hebrews during the reigns of David and Solomon led to the desire to build a temple. The tabernacle, the previous sacrificial center (Exod. 35-40), was a simple and impermanent structure brought to Palestine by the Hebrews from their desert wanderings. It was natural enough that David should wish "God's house" to be as grand as his own (II Sam. 7:2). David, however, was not permitted to undertake the construction of this "house" (II Sam. 7:5-7; I Chron. 22:8). He did prepare for it, both in plans and materials (I Chron. 22:1-19; 28:1-29:9) and more especially by arranging its liturgical service (I Chron. 23:1-26:19).

There are no known remains of Solomon's temple. It is clear that it was patterned after the tabernacle, but was much more complex and ornate. The Phoenicians, who were more advanced culturally than the Hebrews, played a great part in the design and construction of the temple. Recently, archeologists have discovered remains in Phoenicia and Syria which have increased our understanding of the details and motifs of the temple at Jerusalem. Especially useful is the temple found at Tell Tainat in Syria, which was built at about the same time as Solomon's. Its architectural details are believed to be the best guide extant today in reconstructing the details of Solomon's temple. Much of this information is to be found in an article by Paul L. Garber, "Reconstructing Solomon's Temple" (BA vol. xiv:1: May 1951), and in a model of the temple made by E. G. Howland (based on Garber's research) pictured in this article. This model is probably a much more authentic reconstruction than the famous one made by Schick in the last century.

The temple was noted for lavish beauty of detail rather than for great size. It was accessible only to the priests; the lay Israelites came to it, but never entered it. Seven years were required to complete the temple, which was dedicated in Solomon's 11th year, c. 950 B.C. (I Kings 6:38), and destroyed when the Babylonians burned Jerusalem in 587 B.C.

The temple was a prefabricated building. It was made of limestone finished at the quarries (I Kings 6:7) in or near Jerusalem. When the stones were brought to the building site they were built into the wall according to plan. From this arose the tradition of the rejected cornerstone (Ps. 118:22; I Pet. 2:6-8). The stone walls were covered with paneling of Lebanon cedar wood, probably finished by skilled Phoenician craftsmen (I Kings 5:6; 6: 15,18). The main descriptions of Solomon's temple are found in I Kings 5:1-9:25 and II Chronicles 2:1-7:22. While many details are uncertain, what can be known of the building with fair certainty is here given.

The temple consisted of three sections: 1. The Ulam or porch through which the temple proper was entered. 2. The Hekhal or Holy Place, which was lighted by clerestory windows (I Kings 6:4). Its dimensions were 30 feet wide, 60 feet long and 45 feet high. It was paneled with cedar, with gold inlay to relieve the wooden monotony and to give the impression of grandeur. 3. The Devir or Holy of Holies (II Chron. 3:8-13), the inner sanctum, a 30 foot cube, windowless and overlaid with gold. The floor was raised and the cubicle was reached by steps from the Hekhal. Here God especially manifested His presence by the Shekinah glory cloud.

The temple was built on a nine-foot high platform, which was reached by ten steps, a dramatic approach for religious processions. On this platform, before the entrance to the Ulam, stood two pillars, called Jachin and Boaz (I Kings 7:15-22). Possibly these names are the first words of inscriptions carved upon the pillars. Just behind them, doors led to the Ulam or porch, a kind of antechamber to the Hekhal. The cypress doors were carved with cherubim, palm trees and open flowers inlaid with gold, (I Kings 6:18,32,35). These motifs are frequently found in ancient Near Eastern temple structures.

The Hekhal contained ten golden lampstands (I Kings 7:49, not "candlesticks," as in KJV). A lampstand from Herod's temple is pictured on the Arch of Titus in Rome, where it is being carried away by the Roman soldiers after the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. Twelve tables held the 12 loaves of shewbread ("bread of the presence"). The incense altar (I Kings 7:48), with horns, stood near the entrance of the Devir.

The Devir contained two guardian cherubim, made of olive wood and adorned with gold. A number of archeological remains lead to the conclusion that these were winged sphinxes, with a lion's body, human face and great wings. They symbolized the majestic presence of God. On the floor beneath them stood the ark of the covenant, the box overlaid with gold, its lid called the mercy seat, upon which the atoning blood was sprinkled on the Day of Atonement (Lev. 16:14,15).

At both sides and at the rear of the temple were built three-storied storage rooms. They were not as high as the central structure and thus the light from the clerestory windows supplied illumination for the Hekhal. This clerestory feature would appear to have been an ancestor of the same window arrangement of the medieval cathedrals (recessed window-walls rising above the lower wings or aisle portions). In the chambers around the sanctuary was kept the immense temple treasury (I Kings 7:51).

In the courtyard before the temple stood two objects intimately connected with the temple worship: the sacrificial altar and the laver or molten sea. The altar of burnt offering was the central object in the sacrificial service. It was made of brass (II Chron. 4:1) and probably stood on the great rock which is today covered by the Dome of the Rock on the Haram esh-Sherif.

South of the altar stood the copper alloy laver or molten sea (I Kings 7:23-26; II Chron. 4:2-6). This mammoth cast "sea" was made in the Jordan Valley where clay suitable for molding the metal was to be found. It was 3½ inches thick, about 15 feet in diameter and 7½ feet high, and stood on the backs of 12 bulls, three facing in each direction. Similar animal supports for thrones are known to have existed among Israel's neighbors. The bull was the Canaanite symbol of fertility and associated with Baal (Hadad), the god of rain. The presence of this motif in Solomon's temple suggests that more syncretism may have taken place in the Hebrew religion than is at first evident when one reads the Bible. Some scholars have doubted whether this immense reservoir with a capacity estimated at 10,000 gallons could have practicably been used for the ceremonial washing, especially since ten small lavers are mentioned (II Chron. 4:6), and think that its main purpose was to symbolize that water or the sea is the source of life. The Babylonians broke up and carried off this amazing example of ancient metal casting (II Kings 25:13).

The temple did not stand alone; it was one of a number of royal buildings constructed by Solomon in the new section of Jerusalem, just N of the old city of David. Solomon's own palace, another for the pharaoh's daughter, the House of the Forest of Lebanon, the Hall of Pillars, and the Hall of the Throne (I Kings 7:1-8) were others in this government quarter. Viewed in this context, the temple appears like a royal chapel. The temple was dedicated by Solomon himself. His prayer on that occasion (I Kings 8:22-61) shows a great religious spirit reaching out even to including the pagan nations in the worship of Yahweh.

Certain changes doubtless took place in the temple during the Hebrew kingdom. Pagan idolatry was occasionally introduced (II Kings 16:10-18; 21:4-9; Ezek. 8:3-18). Pious kings reformed, refurbished and rededicated it (II Chron. 29:3-31: 21; 34:8-33). Foreign kings raided it (I Kings 14: 25,26; II Kings 12:18; 14:14; 18:15,16). When Jerusalem finally fell to the Babylonians in 587 B.C., the temple along with the rest of the city was destroyed and its valuable contents carried to Babylon (II Kings 25:8,9, 13-17).

Ezekiel's Temple. Ezekiel the prophet was also a priest. In the early part of his book he predicts that God will judge His idolatrous people by withdrawing His presence from Jerusalem, leaving it to the Gentiles to desolate. But the latter part of the book predicts the reversal of this. Judah and Israel reunited will be regathered. The climax of this vision is the prophet's description of the restored temple of God, with the living waters proceeding from it and the people of God dwelling around it (40-48). Yahweh Shammah, "The Lord is there" is the key to this vision; God will yet again dwell among His people. The temple here described is an ideal construction, both like and unlike Solomon's; none ever existed like it and it is difficult to see how any such temple could ever be built.

Differing views have been held concerning the meaning of this temple vision. Those interpreters who look for a very literal fulfillment of the prophecies believe that this temple will be a part of the millennial kingdom, a great world center of the worship of God, located at Jerusalem. The sacrifices mentioned (43:18-27) are regarded as commemorative in nature — looking back to Christ's perfect sacrifice rather than forward to it, as did the OT sacrifices.

Other scholars argue that this description can hardly be taken literally. They maintain that the Hebrews epistle states that the sacrificial system prefigured Christ, and now that His perfect sacrifice has been made, the imperfect types are done away (Heb. 7:11-10:39). John in the Revelation (21:9-22:5) appears to use Ezekiel's temple vision, but he writes not of a millennial temple but of the eternal glory of the church, Thus these interpreters understand Ezekiel's temple as a highly figurative foreshadowing of the new and holy temple of the Lord which is the body of Christ (Eph. 2:11-3:6).

The Restoration Temple of Zerubbabel. The return of the Jews from Babylonian exile (in 538 B.C.), made possible by the decree of Cyrus, was a small and unpromising one. The returnees were few in number and their resources were so meager as to need frequent strengthening from the Jews who remained in Babylon. The temple they built is a good example of this. When the foundation was laid, the old men, who had seen the "first house" (Solomon's temple), wept for sorrow (Hag. 2:3), but the young men, who had been born in exile, shouted for joy (Ezra 3:12). Like most of the reconstruction in that first century of the Second Commonwealth, the temple must have been modest indeed.

Soon after the return, the community began to rebuild the temple. Jeshua the high priest and Zerubbabel the governor were the leaders of the movement. Many difficulties kept the builders from completing the temple until 515 B.C. At that time they were urged on in the work by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah and the building was finished. No description of this temple exists. Its dimensions were probably the same as Solomon's, but much less ornate and expensive.

The Holy Place of the new temple seems to have had a curtain at its front. It had one lampstand, a golden altar of incense and a table of shewbread. Another curtain separated the Hekhal from the Holy of Holies. According to Josephus, the Holy of Holies was empty. Evidently the ark had been destroyed in 587 and was never replaced. A single slab of stone marked its place. The Babylonian Talmud asserts that five things were lacking in the new temple: the ark, the sacred fire, the Shekinah, the Holy Spirit, and the Urim and Thummim.

No doubt the temple was repaired and beautified many times in the succeeding centuries, but of this we have no information. Our next knowledge of it comes from the days of Antiochus Epiphanes. In 168 B.C. this Syrian king sought to stamp out the Hebrew religion, robbed the temple of its furniture and desecrated it, forcing the High Priest to sacrifice swine upon its altar. This action precipitated the Maccabean revolt. In 165 the Jews, led by the Maccabees, recaptured, cleansed and rededicated the temple. I Maccabees 4:44-46 tells how they replaced the stone altar of burnt offering with stones that had not been defiled, meanwhile saving the old stones "until there should come a prophet to give an answer concerning them." The story of the rededication of the temple and the miraculous supply of oil for the lamps is perpetuated in the Jewish festival of Hanukkah.

Judas Maccabaeus at this time fortified the temple with walls and towers, making it the citadel of Jerusalem. Sometime during the next century a bridge was built across the Tyropoeon Valley connecting the temple with the Hasmonean palace. The Hasmoneans (a later name for the Maccabees) were both high priests and kings and by this bridge they sought to make the temple easier to defend. All of this points up the fact that the Second Commonwealth period was one of uneasy peace at best, and that the temple henceforth was to be both the religious and military center of the Jews, until, in A.D. 70, the temple fell and the Jews lost both the religious life as they had always known it, and their fatherland as well.

In 63 B.C. the Roman general Pompey captured Jerusalem and took the temple after a hard struggle, breaking down the Hasmonean bridge. Although Pompey did not harm the temple, the Roman consul Crassus plundered it of all its gold nine years later.

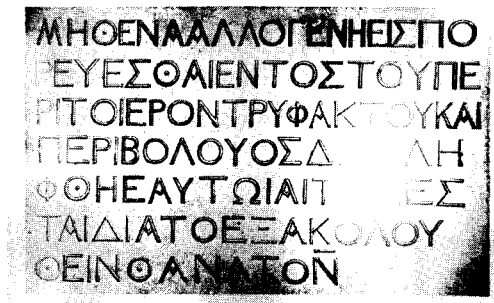
Herod's Temple. Our sources of information concerning Herod's Temple are Josephus the Jewish historian, who flourished about A.D. 70, and who was a priest, and the tract Middoth of the Mishnah written at least a century after the destruction of the temple. Neither can be used uncritically, and many details of the Herodian building and service remain uncertain.

Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.) was an indefatigable builder. Many cities and heathen temples had been rebuilt by him and it was natural that he should wish to show his own grandeur by making the modest restoration temple larger, more complex, and much more beautiful. Other motives probably moved him, especially his desire to ingratiate himself with the more religious Jews, who resented his Idumean origin and friendliness with the Romans.

Herod began his work in his 18th year (20-19 B.C.), The Jews were afraid that the work would interrupt the temple service, but Herod went to great lengths to prevent this, rebuilding the old structure piecemeal, never stopping the ritual observances, until an entirely new temple came into being. Since only priests could enter the temple and the inner court, one thousand of them were the masons and the carpenters for that inner area. The "house" itself was finished in a year and a half; eight years were spent on the surrounding buildings and courts which were not finally completed until A.D. 64. The Jews said to Jesus that the temple had been 46 years in building (John 2:20); more than 30 more years were to pass before it was really finished, then only to be destroyed. All speak of the grandeur of the building, which was of white marble, its eastern front covered with plates of gold, which reflected the rays of the rising sun.

The temple area was probably equivalent to the modern Haram esh-Sherif, except that the N end of the Haram was the location of the fortress Antonia. This area, twice as large as that on which Zerubbabel's temple was situated was artificially built up by underground arches (the present



TABLET FROM HEROD'S TEMPLE.

It is one of those tablets which forbade strangers, as Josephus tells us, from passing the sacred enclosure. The translation is:—

"No stranger is to enter within the balustrade round the temple and enclosure. Whoever is caught will be responsible to himself for his death, which will ensue."

The passage of Josephus is as follows:—

"When you go through those first cloisters unto the second courts of the sacred temples, there was a partition made of stone all round, whose height was three cubits; its construction was very elegant. Upon it stood pillars at equal distances from one another, declaring the law of purity, some in Greek, and some in Roman letters, that no "Foreigner should go within the [illegible]"

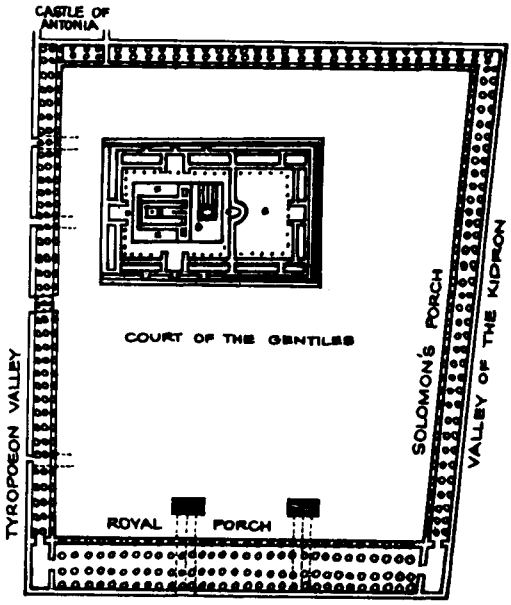
"Solomon's Stables") and fill held in by retaining walls (the Wailing Wall is a part of Herod's western retaining wall). The area, some 26 acres in size, was surrounded by a high wall. Gates on each side led into it, but the principal gates were in the S and W walls, leading in from the city. The eastern gate may have been the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3:2,10) perhaps located where the Golden Gate stands today. Around the inside of the walls ran porches. The finest one was on the S side — the Royal Porch — having four rows of dazzling white marble columns in the Corinthian style, 162 columns in all. The eastern porch was called Solomon's (John 10:23; Acts 3:11; 5:12). During the feasts the Roman guards used to walk on the roofs of the porches to see that order was kept.

Near the NW corner of the temple area was located the fortress Antonia. It dominated the temple and was the headquarters of the guard so often needed to keep the peace. From the stairs which led from the temple precincts to Antonia, Paul delivered his sermon (Acts 21:31-22:21) after having been rescued by the guard from the mob.

Entering the temple area one came to four successive walled courts which surrounded the temple, each more exclusive than the one outside it. The first was the Court of the Gentiles. It was not holy ground and non-Jews were permitted there. Here buying and selling went on; it was here that Jesus cleansed the temple (John 2:14-17). Within the Court of the Gentiles were situated the temple and inner courts, built on a platform 22 feet above the floor of the outer court. Stairways led up to this platform. A stone wall surrounded it, on which wall were placed stones with inscriptions in Greek and Latin forbidding non-Jews from entering on pain of death. Several of these stones have been found (cf. Acts 21:26-28).

On the platform was the inner court. It was the temple precinct and holy ground. Only the covenant people could enter here. It was surrounded by a high wall and against the inner side of this wall were built storage chambers and colonnades. Ritual paraphernalia was kept in some of the chambers and the Sanhedrin is believed to have met in one of them. The inner court was divided into two unequal parts by a cross wall running N and S. The eastern and smaller area was the Women's Court. Here women as well as men were permitted and here were located 13 chests like inverted trumpets, into which offerings for the expenses of the temple services were placed. In this place the poor widow was commended by Jesus when she gave her two copper coins (Mark 12:41-44). For reasons of ceremonial purity only men were allowed in the western area, which contained in its center the temple proper. Around the temple was the Court of the Priests which contained the altar of burnt offering and the laver. Around the Priests' Court was the Court of Israel, accessible to all Jewish males. Here the men gathered when the service was being carried on, to pray and to observe the offering of the sacrifices (Luke 1:10).

In the center of these many courts within courts stood the temple itself, raised 12 steps above the Court of the Priests. Perhaps the forbidding inaccessibleness of the sanctuary is in Paul's mind when he says that Christ "has broken down the dividing wall of hostility" to bring the Gentiles into the fellowship of the people of God (Eph. 2:14).



Ground plan of the Temple of Herod, looking northward. UANT

The temple had a porch facing the E, 100 cubits in length and breadth, and 20 cubits deep. It projected 15 cubits beyond the sides of the temple proper, for the temple was only 70 cubits wide. Above the entrance to the porch (which had no door) Herod had placed a golden eagle, which as a Roman emblem (and an unclean bird!) was most distasteful to the Jews. Shortly before his death it was destroyed. In front of the doorway to the Hekhal or holy place hung a beautifully colored Babylonian curtain or veil. The inner area of the Hekhal was 40 cubits long, 20 cubits broad and 60 cubits high, and it contained the altar of incense in the middle, the table of shewbread on the N, and the lampstand on the S. Only the officiating priests could enter this room, to bring in the incense morning and evening, to trim the lamps daily, and to replace the shewbread every sabbath.

Between the Hekhal and the Devir or holiest place hung two curtains, with a cubit's space between them. On the Day of Atonement the high priest entered the Devir with his censer by going to the S side, passing between the curtains to the N side, and thus emerging into the holiest place. The Gospels refer to these as one veil, which was rent at the time of Jesus' crucifixion (Matt. 27:51; Mark 15:38; Luke 23:45). The Devir was empty and entered by the high priest once a year, upon the Day of Atonement.

An upper room, 40 cubits high, covered the two chambers of the temple. From this room workmen were let down in boxes to effect needed repairs. Probably this was to avoid needless walking through the sacred house. As in Solomon's, so in Herod's temple, there were storerooms along the sides, except for the front or E, where the porch stood. These were used for storage and for the residence of officiating priests. No natural light came into this temple from roof or windows. It depended on the lamps for its light.

In front of the temple, in the Courtyard of the Priests, stood the altar of burnt offering. It is believed that this altar stood on the great rock which is covered today by the building called the Dome of the Rock on the Haram esh-Sherif. It was made of unhewn stones. There was a fire burning on the altar always. At the SW corner was located a drainage channel for the blood to the Kidron Valley. N of the altar were 24 rings affixed to the ground. To these were tied the sacrificial victims, and there they were killed by slitting the throat. Still further to the N were pillars with iron hooks on which the carcasses were hung for dressing. If this reminds the modern reader of a butcher shop rather than a place of worship, he should remember that this antithesis would have been meaningless in the Biblical world. Not only did the priests live by eating many of the sacrificial victims, but any slaying of an animal for food anywhere was considered a kind of religious act — a sacrifice — and certain rituals were prescribed.

South of the sacrificial altar was the bronze laver or washbasin, where the priests washed their hands and feet. The water was supplied by pipes from the temple spring.

The temple was burned when Jerusalem fell to the Roman armies in August, A.D. 70. Pictures on the triumphal arch of Titus in Rome show the soldiers carrying off the temple furniture as loot. This destruction made complete and final the break between the Temple and the Church and thus helped to establish the Church as a religion completely separate from Israel. The early Christians saw in this forced cessation of the Jewish ritual a proof of the validity of Christ's claims to be the Redeemer foreshadowed by the OT ceremonial law.

In the NT the term temple is used figuratively in a number of ways. Jesus spoke of the temple of His body (John 2:19,21). The individual believer is a temple (I Cor. 6:19). So also is the Church, but this temple, unlike the earthly one, is equally accessible to all believers (Heb. 6:19; 10:20), now freed by Christ from the ritual limitations of the Old Covenant (Eph. 2:14). The book of Hebrews (especially chaps. 7-10) in great fulness expounds on Christ as the fulfiller of the typology of the temple and its ritual. The culmination of this idea of the "better covenant" is seen in the New Jerusalem where "I saw no temple in the city, for its temple is the Lord God the Almighty and the Lamb" (Rev. 21:22). J.B.G.

TEMPTATION (Heb. massâh, Gr. peirasmós, trial, proof). It is essential that a distinction be drawn immediatey between the two antithetical ideas which are embraced within this concept. On the one hand, temptation signifies any attempt to entice into evil; on the other hand, temptation indicates a testing which aims at spiritual good. Unless these two meanings are kept in view, the positive as over against the negative aspect, confusion inevitably results.

In its negative significance, that of enticement to perpetrate evil, temptation in Biblical teaching is traceable to Satan, the malignant being who stands opposed to the divine purposes. The very embodiment of evil — intelligence and will devoid of any morality — Satan is the ultimate source of all desire and action contrary to the holy love of God. Designated the Tempter in Matthew 4:3 and I Thessalonians 3:5 (cf. I Cor. 7:5), his mode of operation is vividly described in Genesis 3, which supplies, typologically and historically, the analogue of our Lord's temptation experience. Employing the serpent as his tool, Satan skillfully undermines man's fidelity to God (I Tim. 2:14-15). Taste, sight, and sinful egoism are utilized to bring about apostasy. "And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat" (Gen. 3:6). Obviously, the eating of the forbidden fruit only externalizes the internal apostasy which has preceded the overt act. Here, then, in this aboriginal drama the devices of the Tempter are fully revealed — the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, as the apostle calls them (I Jn. 2:16). These are Satan's basic stratagems (Eph. 6:11) which he deploys with endless variation. These same stratagems were deployed against our Lord on the threshold of His ministry. In Matthew's account (cf. 4:1-11) the Tempter suggested that Jesus make stones into bread; but the lust of the flesh was resisted. The Tempter next suggested that Jesus cast Himself down from a pinnacle of the temple and be miraculously delivered, thus dazzling the multitude by a sheer wonder; but the lust of the eyes was resisted. Finally, the Tempter suggested that Jesus gain the world and its glory by abandoning His Father and becoming the Devil's accomplice; but the pride of life was resisted. Never once did Jesus waver in His allegiance to God. He refused to sign any declaration of independence; He refused to prostitute His power to selfish ends. Triumphantly He ran the whole gamut of evil enticement. Hence the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews declares that our Saviour was "in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (4:15). And that same author declares that, because of His triumph over temptation, Jesus "is able to succour them that are tempted" (2:18).

In the struggle with temptation one must, consequently, bear in mind that the human agents who entice to evil are only dupes and instruments, almost invariably aware of their deepest motivation (Deut. 13:6; Eph. 2:2; 5:6). He must remember, too, that the temptation is almost invariably camouflaged: evil artfully masquerades as good, appropriating the highest levels of life, and religion especially, for its own malignant purposes (II Cor. 11:14). One must also remember that as fallen creatures men have susceptibility to sin which neither Adam nor the Second Adam had (James 1:14). They must likewise recognize their own frailty and pray, "Lead us not into temptation" (Matt. 6:13). Resolutely they must shun any situation in which they may become the objects of Satanic enticement. Yet in our frailty there is comfort in Paul's assurance, "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it" (I Cor. 10:13).

The positive significance of temptation is that of testing with the intent of creating spiritual good: it is proving with a view to approving or improving and occasionally reproving. Thus God, who as Holy Love can never be the source of evil in any form (James 1:13), tested Abraham (Gen. 22:1). Thus God tested Job, who exclaimed, "But he knoweth the way that I take; when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold" (Job 23:10). Thus God still tests His people (I Pet. 1:7; 4:12-13; James 1:2,12). But He tests, even sometimes severely and painfully, only for purposes of reproving and improving (Deut. 8:2-3; 13:3; Judg. 2:20-23; I Cor. 11:32; Heb. 12:4-11) or for purposes of approving. The divine intention in testing is plainly stated in Deuteronomy 8:16.

In a moral universe where conflict rages between the Creator and His adversary, an order characterized by freedom, sin, and faith, even redeemed man must expect to live in spiritual tension (Acts 14:22; Heb. 10:32-34). After all, Jesus Christ did, and the servant is not above his Lord. But by the illumination of Scripture and the enablement of the Holy Spirit (Luke 4:1-13), the servant too can experience blessing and victory after — and in the very throes of — struggle.

TENONS (tĕn'ŭn, Heb. yādh, hand), small projections at the lower ends of the tabernacle boards to sink into sockets to hold the boards in place (Exod. 26:17 etc.).

TENT (Heb. 'ōhel, Gr. skené), a temporary dwelling generally made of strong goat's-hair cloth stretched over poles and held in place by cords reaching out to stakes driven into the ground. It is the typical dwelling of nomadic peoples. Tents are of various shapes — round and tapering, flat and oblong. All of the belongings of a nomadic family could normally be carried on one pack animal. A sheikh would, of course, have several tents. The word tent is often used to refer to a habitation generally (Gen. 9:27; I Kings 8:66; Job 8:22; Ps. 84:10), and it is often used figuratively (Isa. 13:20; 54:2; Jer. 10:20).

TERAH (tē'rà, Heb. terah). 1. Son of Nahor (Gen. 11:24-32), lived at Ur of the Chaldees and was an idolater (Josh. 24:2). When God called Abram out of Ur with its civilized idolatry, Terah went as far as Haran in Mesopotamia where he and his family remained till Terah died at 205 years of age; then Abram with his family and his nephew Lot proceeded to Canaan.

2. A wilderness camp of the Israelites (Num. 33:27,28).

TERAPHIM (tĕr'à-phēm, Heb. root and meaning dubious), a term used of a kind of household idol and means of divination. In Genesis 31:19 the teraphim of Laban were stolen by Rachel; these were small enough to be concealed in a camel-saddle (vss. 34-35). They were a valuable possession, for their ownership involved the inheritance of the property of Laban, as is illustrated by the Nuzi tablets. In I Samuel 19:13-16 Michal, by placing such an object in David's bed, deceived Saul's messengers into thinking that David was there but was too ill to receive visitors. This idol resembled a man in size and appearance sufficiently well to make the ruse temporarily effective.

Teraphim, or household idols, of the type that Rachel stole from Laban. These are from Nuzi. BA

In the time of the judges, Micah had teraphim among the religious articles of his household shrine (Judges 17:5); these furnishings were coveted and seized by the Danites (18:14-20). In the spiritual revival under King Josiah the teraphim and other "abominations" in Judah and Jerusalem were put away (II Kings 23:24). Zechariah asserted that "the teraphim utter nonsense" (Zech. 10:2, RSV). Hosea prophesied that "the children of Israel shall dwell many days without king or prince, without sacrifice or pillar, without ephod or teraphim" (Hosea 3:4, RSV). Ezekiel included the consultation of teraphim among the divination practices of the king of Babylon preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (Ezek. 21:21). C.E.D.

TERESH (tē'rĕsh, Heb. teresh), a chamberlain of Xerxes ("Ahasuerus") of Persia who attempted to assassinate his master but was discovered by Mordecai and thwarted (Esth. 2:21).

TERRACE (Heb. mesillâh), one of a series of steps which Solomon made of algum trees as an approach to the temple (II Chron. 9:11).

TERROR, in ordinary usage, means extreme fear or dread; or sometimes, the one who causes such agitation. The word renders about a dozen Hebrew and Greek words which are rendered also by such words as "dread," "fear," "horror," "terribleness," "ruin," etc. Characteristic are Psalm 55:4, "the terrors of death"; Genesis 35:5, "the terror of God was upon the cities," II Corinthians 5:11, "knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men."

TERTIUS (tûr'shĭ-ŭs, Gr. Tértios), the scribe or amanuensis of Paul, the writer, at the Apostle's dictation of the Epistle to the Romans. He added a personal salutation (16:22).

TERTULLUS (tẽr-tŭl'ŭs, Gr. Tértyllos), a diminutive of Tertius. It was the name borne by the professional advocate employed by the Jews to state their case against Paul before Felix, the procurator of Judaea (Acts 24:1). A few words only of Tertullus' elaborate oration are given, but enough to reveal the nature of his rhetoric and the character of his accusation. It is not unlikely that the orator was a Roman, for there is a Latin ring about some of his phrases as they appear in Luke's Greek, and his name, of course, is Latin, though this does not necessarily fix his nationality. He was obviously trained in the arts of contemporary rhetoric, and what impressed Luke was his elaborate exordium. Such a subterfuge, wrote Calvin, is "a sign of bad faith." It is rather a traditional courtesy, and the device, albeit purged of mendacity and sycophancy, is to be distinguished also in the opening gambit of Paul's reply (Acts 24:10). E.M.B.

TESTAMENT, a word that occurs several times in the NT as a translation of the Greek diathéke, more accurately rendered "covenant." It is true that the Greek word signifies a testamentary disposition, but the NT usually appears to use the Greek word in the meaning rather of its cognate synthéke, which accurately renders the OT berith, a binding agreement or contract between man and man, or man and God. The earliest account of the institution of the Lord's Supper contains the words: "This cup is the new covenant (testament) in my blood" (I Cor. 11:25). The reference is to Exodus 24:8. A new relation between God and man was thereby created. The imagery in Hebrews 9:15-20 takes in the further notion of a testamentary disposition, operative only after the death of the testator. Hence the Revisers' preference in vss. 16, 17 for the word "testament." E.M.B.

TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PROPHETS, an apocryphal document that claims to report the last words of the 12 sons of Jacob. It is probably a second century production concocted of traditional material, and containing Christian interpolations. Each patriarch is represented as dealing with the particular vice or virtue which attaches to him in the historical record, and as speaking in elaborate description of judgments and rewards. The work has survived in Greek and Armenian versions. It is obviously inspired by Jacob's commission to his sons from his deathbed (Gen. 49). E.M.B.

TESTIMONY, generally "a solemn affirmation to establish some fact" and commonly, among Christians, the statement of one's Christian experience. In Scripture, it usually refers to that which was placed in the ark of the covenant (Exod. 25:21), or to the Word of God (Ps. 119:14,88,99, etc.). In Mark 6:11 shaking off the dust of the feet in leaving an unfriendly city was to be considered as a testimony against it.

TEXTS AND VERSIONS (OLD TESTAMENT). The OT is a book of sacred literature for Jews and Christians, and has no rival in quality or scope of influence among other sacred writings of the world today. It is the focal unit of Judaism and the foundation of Christianity's sacred literature. In Jesus' time it was called "The Scriptures," though Jesus himself often referred to it by its divisional terminology. On the day of His resurrection Jesus declared to the men on the road to Emmaus, "that everything written about me in the law of Moses and the prophets and the psalms must be fulfilled" (Luke 24:44). It was also the Bible of Peter, Stephen, Philip, Paul, and the other early Christians (Acts 2:7; 8:13).

I. Origin of the Old Testament

A. General Discussion: The OT today consists of 39 books, identical with those of the Hebrew Bible, which has a different arrangement. Customary divisions of the English version are Historic, with 17 books: Poetic, with five; and Prophetic (major and minor), with 17. The Hebrew Bible was divided under Law (Torah), comprising the Pentateuch; Prophets (Neviim): Kings, and Later Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor Prophets; and Writings (Kethuvim), including the eleven remaining books. With certain combinations the Hebrew OT numbered only 24 books. Josephus reduced the number to 22 by further combinations.

B. Canonization: The final confirmation of the books of the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings as exclusively canonical by Jewish scholars cannot be placed later than 400, 200, and 100 B.C. respectively. However, the writing and adoption by consensus doubtless antedated these dates by centuries. Since some contemporary writings were accepted and some rejected during the periods of the above mentioned tripartite divisions, some basis for discrimination was necessary. The critical term for this process is "Canon," derived from the Greek word Kanon, "rod," which came from the Hebrew and Old Babylonian words for "reed," meaning "measure." There were no canonical decrees governing selection, but Scriptural authority seems to have been derived from usage by devout Jews, and any pronouncements of measuring methods were only confirmations thereof. Some critics think that the formation of the Canon began in 621 B.C. during Josiah's reign and ended in the Council of Jamnia, A.D. 90. Actually the Council only confirmed the established authority of the books composing our present OT, recognized and accepted before the time of Jesus. The need for some criterion, however, for standardization to insure protection and preservation of holy writ was doubtless long in the minds of the rabbis. Probably the first to sense keenly this need were the scribes, the Sopherim, who elaborated a theory of inspiration. They said that inspiration belonged to the prophetic office, and the range of prophetic activity began with Moses and ceased with Ezra (though according to rabbinical writings it ended in the time of Alexander the Great). According to these limitations, any writings before Moses or after the prophets would automatically be apocryphal. Consequently the books of the OT were all inspired writings of men chosen of God, and spanning a period of approximately a thousand years, embraced within the traditional dates of 1450-444 B.C.

C. Authorship. Evidences of authorship and transmission of the respective books of the OT are negligible. The traditional view of authorship, as preserved in the Talmud, has basic validity. "Moses wrote his own book and the section concerning Balaam (Num. 22:2-25:9) and Job. Joshua wrote his own book and (the last) eight verses of the Torah. Samuel wrote his own book and Judges and Ruth. David wrote the Book of Psalms, incorporating the productions of ten elders: Adam (139), Melchizedek (110), Abraham (89), Moses (90), Heman (88), Jeduthun (39, 62, 77), Asaph (50, 73-83), and the three sons of Korah (42, 44-49, 84, 85, 87). Jeremiah wrote his own book and the Book of Kings and Lamentations. Hezekiah and his company wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, the Song of Songs, and Koheleth. The men of the Great Synagogue wrote Ezekiel, the Twelve, Daniel and Esther. Ezra wrote his own book and the genealogies of the Book of Chronicles, including his own" (MHSM ch. II).

Internal and external evidences combine to give a provisional view of Biblical authorship. The cultural development of the Hebrews in correlation with that of their contemporaries may be seen through the eyes of the archeologists. First however, the Scriptural record should be reviewed.

Belief in special revelation to the authors of the OT, of divinely inspired and directed writers, has textual bases. In the Pentateuch numerous claims are made to Moses' divine commission and written contributions. "Jehovah spake unto Moses" occurs again and again in Leviticus. The earliest reference to writing in the Bible is Exodus (17: 14), where "The Lord said to Moses, 'Write this as a memorial in a book'"; and in 24:4 "Moses wrote all the words of the Lord" (Cf. 34:28). In Numbers 33:2 (RSV) the record states that "Moses wrote down their starting places, stage by stage." Deuteronomy 31, verse 9 states that "Moses wrote this law," verse 24 concludes that "Moses had finished writing the words of this law in a Book." Other evidences showing that Moses is the substantial author of the Pentateuch are found in several books of the OT and in the Gospels (Josh. 1:7f; Judg. 3:4; II Chron. 25:4; Ezra 6:18; 7:6; Mal. 4:4; Matt. 8:4; Mark 7:10; 10:5; Luke 20: 37; John 5:45-47; 7:19).

In Exodus 24:7 concerning Moses, "Then he took the book of the covenant, and read it in the hearing of the people." The Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20-23) is probably the oldest writing in the OT. It is the nucleus around which the framework of the Pentateuch was built.

II. Texts

A. Fragmentary Scripts. No autograph texts of any Old Testament writing are known to exist today, but the textual critic tries with all available means to reconstruct texts as nearly like the originals as possible. Until 1947, when the Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered, the earliest complete extant manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible were dated about A.D. 1000. There were, however, fragmentary evidences of considerable value, brought to light from time to time by archeologists, contributing to the validity of the Bible claims.

B. The art of writing was known as early as 3,000 B.C. among the old civilizations of the Near East. Temple inscriptions, the Code of Hammurabi, and the Gilgamesh Epic, with accounts of Creation, original sin, and the Flood, antedate Moses by several centuries. Numerous examples of early writing exist to support the claim that Moses, who "was instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," (Acts 7:22), could have and did write the passages claimed for him in the Bible.

C. Antecedents of the Hebrew language may be found in Old Phoenicia, a land on the Mediterranean coast N of Palestine settled by an early wave of Semites. These precocious seafaring people are accredited with giving the world its first alphabet. As early as the sixteenth century B.C. evidences of a Hebrew-Phoenician alphabet are found, from which a standardized script emerged about the tenth century B.C. This is the cursive script, in which the Old Hebrew was written, and that employed for the original writing of the OT books. This script was replaced by the Hebrew-Aramaic square script probably a century before Christ. However, since the Samaritan Pentateuch is in the Old cursive script, the square letters must not have been used until after the schism between Judea and Samaria about 432 B.C. (Neh. 13:28). Modern scholarship dates the Samaritan Pentateuch at 128 or 122 B.C. Furthermore, the transition seems not to have preceded the Septuagint, though the Aramaic square letters were in use centuries before by the Jews in Egypt. Seemingly, the square Aramaic script was gradually adopted by the Jews after the Exile (536-538 B.C.), and used latest in sacred writing. The letter from 'Arshan (c. 410 B.C.), Egypt, is non-Biblical, and is written in the square Hebrew letters. Jesus' reference to the "jot" in the law indicates this type of script in Biblical use in his time (Matt. 5:18).

Other writings discovered in Phoenicia have had valuable bearing on Hebrew philology. Excavations in a mound at Ras Shamra, ancient Ugarit, unearthed a small temple with a library underneath. Among the finds were tablets containing script of only 27 different characters. This proved to be archaic Hebrew, dated about 1400 B.C., hence one of the earliest alphabetic writings yet known. Another important discovery on the Phoenician coast was made at Byblos, Old Testament Gebal (Ezek. 27:9). It was a remarkable alphabetical inscription on the Ahirams sarcophagus, dated about 100 B.C. Byblos is the name from which our term Bible is derived.

D. Fragments of the Hebrew Language. From Palestine, the mound of Old Lachish (Josh. 10:31f) yielded a bowl, a jar, and a dagger containing brief inscriptions in alphabetic script, similar to that found in Sinai, and dating probably between 1750 and 1550 B.C. Similar characters inscribed in ink on a potsherd were found at Beth-shemesh from about the tenth century B.C. Twenty-one letters found at Lachish consisted of broken pieces of pottery on which were inscribed archaic Hebrew by a military commander during the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar in 588 B.C. To these may be added fragmentary inscriptions from the Gezer Calendar, c. 900 B.C.; Moabite Stone, c. 800; Siloam Tunnel, c. 700; and numerous others. Prior to the discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls, the small sheet known as the Nash Papyrus, dated second to first century B.C., was our earliest Biblical Hebrew document. It contains the Ten Commandments and the Shema' (Deut. 6:4).

E. The Bible in the Hebrew Language. The OT was originally written in Hebrew, with the exception of a few chapters and verses in the later books. These were written in Aramaic, a kindred language, and are found in Daniel 2:4 to 7:28; Ezra 4:8 to 6:18; 7:12-26; and Jeremiah 10:11.

The Scriptures were written on animal skins, called vellum or parchment, or on papyrus. Papyrus comes from a water plant of that name from the marshes of the Nile. The glutinous pith was sliced and the stripes laid at right angles and pressed together, making a very smooth and durable paper.

The Hebrew Bible is the work of many authors over a period of more than a thousand years, roughly between the fifteenth and fifth centuries B.C. As it grew in size it also grew in sacredness and authority for the Jews.

F. Preservation of the Texts. Two obvious factors have militated against the preservation of autograph writings and archaic texts. First, when transcriptions were made onto new scrolls, the old deteriorating ones were destroyed lest they fall into the hands of profane and unscrupulous men. Second, attempts were made at different times by the enemies of the Jews to destroy their sacred literature. Antiochus Epiphanes (c. 167 B.C.) burned all the copies he could find, and many rolls were destroyed during the Roman wars (c. A.D. 70).

Another hazard of the Scriptures, which threatened accurate transmission, was the repeated copying by hand. Scribal errors and explanatory marginal notes doubtless resulted in slight deviations from the original, but the fidelity of the copyist is amazing. Ezra and his school of scribes, the Great Synagogue, and subsequent rabbinical schools and priests and scribes worked diligently to perpetuate the original Scriptures. It was the Masoretic scholars who devised the present vowel system and accentual marks. Before this the consonantal Hebrew Scripture was not vocalized. Chapter divisions came much later, appearing first in the Vulgate, A.D. 1227 or 1248, and transferred to the Hebrew Bible about 1440. Verses were marked in the Vulgate as early as 1558.

G. The Dead Sea Scrolls. In 1947 some Palestinian herdsmen accidentally stumbled onto a cave in the Judean hills that proved to be a veritable treasure house of ancient scriptures. Thereupon the announcement of the Dead Sea Scrolls was acclaimed by Biblical scholars as the greatest manuscript discovery in modern times. From this and other caves by the Wadi Qumran, NW of the Dead Sea, came a hoard of OT parchments dated 200 B.C. to the first century A.D.

The first major find comprised four scrolls. One of the first documents was a copy of the Book of Isaiah in Hebrew, and another a copy of the first two chapters of the book of Habakkuk in Hebrew, with added commentary. Later discoveries yielded fragments with portions of other Biblical books in Hebrew. The Deuteronomy fragments were written in archaic script. Altogether, the manuscript fragments constitute over 400 books, a few almost intact, and more than 40,000 fragments. Ninety of these books were parts of the Bible, with every OT book except Esther being represented among them.

These scrolls are of great critical value on the basis of such factors as antiquity and authenticity. The scroll of Isaiah A is dated near 200 B.C., while that of Ecclesiastes and the fragments of Exodus and Samuel are estimated by some to be as old as 250 and 225 B.C. respectively.

One valuable contribution of the Dead Sea Scrolls is to provide a critical basis for the study of the three main lines of transmission by which the text of the Old Testament has come down to us. The first of these, and probably the most trustworthy, is the Massoretic Hebrew text of the eighth and ninth century A.D.; the second is the Greek Septuagint; and the third is the Samaritan Pentateuch. The respective forms of Hebrew texts which were the antecedents of these three families seem now to have been varying types of texts current among the people of Israel in general in the closing centuries of the Second Jewish Commonwealth, and in no sense sectarian. It may be that the Masoretic text was derived from a Babylonian recension, the Septuagint from Egyptian Hebrew, and the Samaritan from a Palestinian text, but it seems obvious that all were used in Judea.

III. Versions of the Old Testament

A. Greek Versions.

1. The Septuagint, whose value can hardly be over estimated, was in popular use in Jesus' time and is often quoted by NT writers. It is a translation of Hebrew into Greek by Jewish scholars in Alexandria, Egypt. The Pentateuch was translated about 250 B.C. and the entire OT completed a hundred years later. The term "Septuagint" is the Latin word for seventy, the number of rabbis who did the translating, probably under orders of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The Greek employed was not the classical idiom but rather anticipated that of the NT, the Koine. It was designed to preserve the old religion among the dispersed Jews in a language they commonly used. The oldest extant fragments of the Septuagint today are from a papyrus roll of Deuteronomy, dated about 150 B.C., found on an Egyptian mummy, and now in the John Rylands Library, Manchester, England.

2. Other Greek Versions. Three Greek translations from the Hebrew were made in the second century A.D., but only fragments of them have survived. Aquila, a proselyte Jew, made a very literal translation which became the official Greek version for the Jews. Theodotion, a Christian of Pontus, made a translation between A.D. 180 and 192 which seemed to be partially a revision of the Septuagint. It was a free rendering of the idiomatic Greek and became popular in the early Christian churches. About A.D. 200 Symmachus faithfully translated the Hebrew into good smooth Greek though somewhat paraphrastic. Jerome's commentary on these versions was that, "Aquila translates word for word, Symmachus follows the sense, and Theodotion differs slightly from the Septuagint."

3. The Hexapla was a translation and six-column arrangement by Origen in Caesarea about A.D. 240. This was a kind of harmony of the translations of Aquila, Theodotion, Symmachus, and the Septuagint. It became the authoritative Greek OT for some churches. Only fragments of this work remain.

4. Several Greek manuscripts containing excerpts from the OT have been discovered. The oldest were written on papyrus, and those after the fourth century on vellum. The script of the latter is in "uncials," capital letters written separately, used generally from the third to the tenth century A.D., and in "cursives," from about the ninth to the sixteenth century A.D.

A papyrus manuscript of the minor prophets, in uncials, dated the latter part of the third century A.D., was found in Egypt and is now in the Freer collection, Washington, D.C.

B, Codex Vaticanus, dated about the middle of the fourth century A.D., contains most of OT and NT. It is in the Vatican Library where it was known as early as the fifteenth century.

א (or Aleph), Codex Sinaiticus, contains a limited fragment of the OT of equal age with B. It was discovered in 1844 by Tischendorf in the Monastery of St. Catherine at Mt. Sinai, and placed in the royal library at St. Petersburg (Leningrad). It was later purchased from the Soviet Government and placed in the British Museum in 1933.

A, Codex Alexandrinus, a manuscript in uncials dated in the fifth century A.D., was a gift to King James I and brought to England later in 1628, and placed in the British Museum.

B. Aramaic Versions.

The Targums were probably oral translations of the Hebrew Scriptures into Aramaic after the later replaced the Hebrew as the spoken language of the Jews. The Targums contain religious instructions along with interpretations which accompanied the reading of scripture in the synagogues. Compare Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth (Luke 4:16-27). Besides the Targum of Jonathan on the Prophets, there are three on the Pentateuch, all of which were put into written form from about the first to the ninth century A.D. The three are the Onkelos (Babylonian), the Jerusalem Targum, and the Fragmentary Palestinian Targum.

C. Syriac Versions. The Peshitta is the Syriac Bible of the Old Testament translated in the second or third century A.D. for the benefit of Christians whose language was Syriac. Many manuscripts survive. The earliest date known on any manuscript of the Bible is found on one containing Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, in the British Museum, and corresponding to A.D. 464.

D. Latin Versions.

1. The Old Latin versions probably originated among the Latin-speaking Jews of Carthage and were adopted by the Christians. An entire Bible in "Old Latin" circulated in Carthage by A.D. 250. There were a variety of Latin versions before Jerome's day, representing three types of Old Latin text: African, European, and Italian.

2. The Vulgate was produced by the scholarly Jerome in a cave in Bethlehem adjacent to what he believed was the Grotto of the Nativity. Jerome translated directly from the Hebrew with references to the Septuagint and Origen's Hexapla. He was commissioned in A.D. 382 by Pope Damasus to make an official revision of the Old Latin Bible. His work was completed in A.D. 405. The Vulgate is a creditable work, though not an infallibly accurate translation of the original text. Rather, it was an interpretation of thought put into idiomatic, graceful Latin. It was virtually without a rival for a thousand years. The Douay Version, translated from the Vulgate, is the authorized Roman Catholic Bible in English.

E. Other Eastern Versions. The Coptic versions were made for Christians in Egypt in the second or third century A.D. The Ethiopic version was made in the fourth or fifth century. The Gothic version was prepared by Ulfilas about A.D. 350. The Armenian version, beautiful and accurate, was made for Christians of eastern Asia Minor about A.D. 400. A twin to the latter was the Georgian version of the fifth or sixth century. The Slavonic version of the ninth century is preserved in the oldest manuscript of the whole Bible in existence today. It is dated 1499, and known as Codex Gennadius, now in Moscow. The Arabic version, necessitated by the Arabic conquests of the 7th and 8th centuries, was begun by Saadya in the tenth century.

These ancient versions aid the critic in trying to restore the original text and in interpretations. For data on English versions, see BIBLE, ENGLISH VERSIONS. G.B.F.

TEXTS AND VERSIONS (NEW TESTAMENT). The Bible, and especially the NT, occupies a place which is unique in the literature of ancient times, and not least so in respect to the history of its transmission through the centuries. No other ancient writing approaches it in the number of copies which were made of it from the time it was written until the age of printing; its existing mss. approach the date of its origin far more closely than do the mss. of almost any other piece of ancient literature; and the NT (with the OT) stands virtually alone in the literature of antiquity as a work which was translated into other languages. In the beginning, of course, there was no "New Testament" as a single volume. The individual books were written over a period of years and afterwards were gradually brought together.

1. The Greek Manuscripts. What did a book of the NT look like when it was first written? Its language was Greek. There doubtless were both written and oral records, probably both in Aramaic and in Greek, which lay behind our Gospels. Proof is lacking, however, that any of the NT books as such were originally written in Aramaic.

An original copy of a NT book was probably written on papyrus sheets, either folded into a codex, which is the modern book form, or possibly on a papyrus roll. It was long thought that the earliest copies of the NT books were written in roll form, since this was the regular form for both the OT and for literary writings of the period. However, even the very oldest NT papyrus mss. or fragments which are now known are from the codex form, not the roll. Although the codex form was used for notes, rough drafts of an author's work, etc., the early Christians were pioneers in using the codex form for "literary" purposes—i.e., for copies of books of the NT and perhaps for the originals of some of the NT books. The codex was far better suited for ready reference to passages and was generally easier to use than the roll.

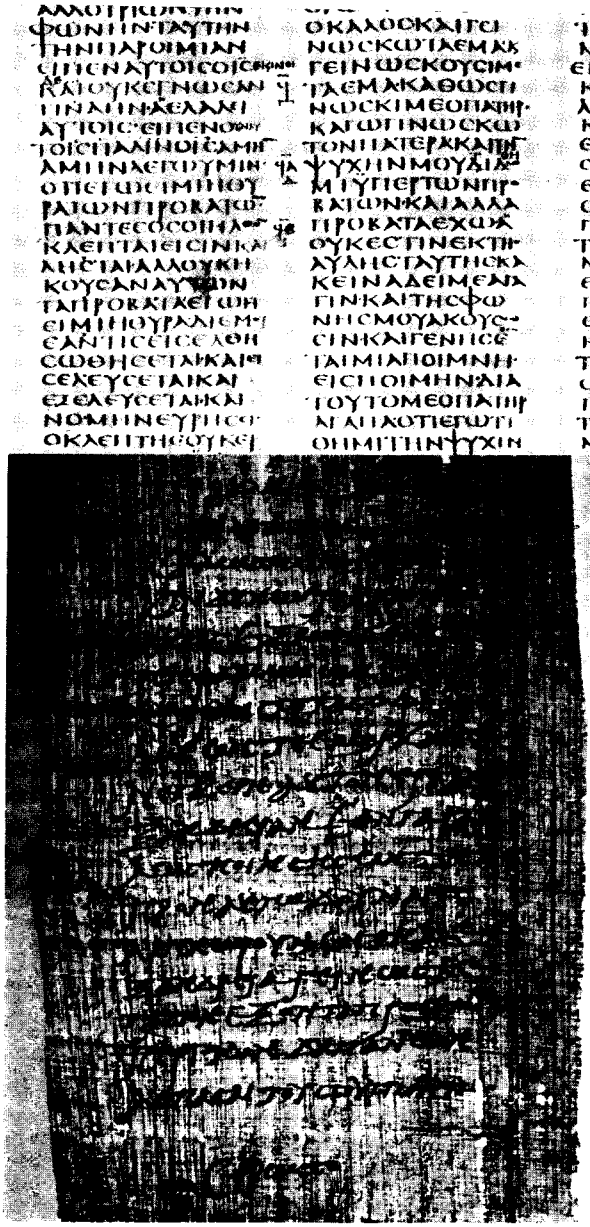
The style of the Greek letters in the original of a NT book may have been one of two in common use. Literary works of the period were written in "uncial" or "majuscule" letters, rounded capitals, the letters not connected to each other. A "cursive" or "minuscule" hand, in which the letters were connected somewhat as in English longhand writing, was used for personal letters, business receipts, and other non-literary materials. The Greek mss. were written with no separation between words. This was not merely in order to save space, because the size of the letters in many mss. indicates that space was not necessarily an important consideration. It was simply an accepted custom. Latin mss. similarly do not separate words, but Hebrew mss. do. The originals of Paul's letters may therefore have been written in the cursive hand as being simply private correspondence; the Gospels would probably have been originally written in uncial letters. Of course, when the Pauline letters began to be copied and recopied they would be thought of as public writings and would doubtless soon be copied in uncial letters. All of the earliest known mss. of the NT are written in uncial letters.

The first three centuries are the period of the use of papyrus as a writing material. Sheets were made from thin strips of the papyrus reed, which grew along the Nile and in a very few other places in the Mediterranean world. The strips were laid side by side, with a second layer placed on top at right angles to the first layer. Pounded together and dried in the sun, these sheets made very serviceable material to receive writing from a reed pen. In a roll, the side which normally received the writing was the side on which the strips were horizontal. In the codex form, both sides would be used, but the "verso," with the strips vertical, would give the writer more difficulty than the "recto."

At the beginning of the fourth century a notable change occurred in the production of NT mss., when vellum or parchment began to displace papyrus as a writing material. The use of tanned skins to receive writing had long been known and was the material commonly used for the Hebrew OT. Vellum and parchment, however, are skins which have been treated with lime and made into a thin material with a smooth, firm writing surface. The term "vellum" was applied to the finer skins of calf, kid, or lamb, and "parchment" (from Pergamene, a city prominent in its manufacture) to ordinary skins; but the two terms are now used synonymously. A few papyrus mss. of the NT from the fifth and sixth centuries are known; but apparently papyrus was quickly displaced by the far more durable parchment, and the fourth century may be called the beginning of the parchment period of NT mss., a period which lasted until the introduction of paper as a writing material in the 14th century.



Above, a portion of the Gospel of John from the Codex Sinaiticus, in uncial letters. Compare with the semi-cursive writing of a private letter on papyrus, below, dated First Century A.D. BM

In the ninth century another significant development occurred, with the development of the cursive style of handwriting into a literary hand called "minuscule." By the end of the tenth century the uncial hand had been completely displaced by the minuscule, which remained the regular style of writing until the invention of printing.

In addition to the mss. containing a continuous NT text, many mss. of lectionaries from these centuries have survived. These are mss. which contain NT passages organized for reading on particular days.

We may summarize as follows: from the first to the fourth centuries, NT mss. were written in uncial letters on papyrus; from the fourth to the tenth, in uncial letters on vellum; from the tenth to the 14th, in minuscule letters on vellum; from the 14th to the invention of printing in the 15th century, in minuscule letters on paper.

Almost 70 papyrus mss. and fragments are known, about 250 uncial mss., 2500 cursive mss., and 1600 lectionaries. Papyri are designated by "P" and a superscript number (e.g., P66). Uncials are designated by capital letters of the English and Greek alphabets plus the Hebrew letter Aleph, so far as these letters permit; but all uncials are also designated by a number with a zero prefixed (e.g., 047). Cursives are designated by a number only (e.g., 565), and lectionaries by a number with a lower-case letter "l" prefixed and sometimes italicized (e.g., *l*299).

2. Variant Readings. While these paleographical developments were taking place, there were other developments concerning the text written on these mss. Since copies were made individually by hand, mistakes and changes inevitably occurred—omissions, additions, changes of words, word order, and spelling—usually unintentionally made, but sometimes intentionally to clarify, explain, or to avoid a doctrinal misunderstanding. In the mss. now known there are thousands of these "variants." The vast majority, however, make no difference in meaning; and the application of accepted principles of textual criticism make it possible to determine the original form of the text for all practical purposes although not to verbal perfection. No fundamental Christian doctrine is left in doubt by any textual variant.

These variants, moreover, tended to group themselves into companies. A ms. would tend to contain the errors of the ms. from which it was copied; and as mss. were carried to various cities and lands, and copies would tend to be made from mss. at hand, the mss. of a given region would tend to contain a similar group of variants, and these would be somewhat different from the variants of mss. in another region. Scholars recognize at least three of these "text types," as they are called, from the fifth century and earlier: "Alexandrian," "Caesarean," and "Western" — names which are only partially significant geographically. After the official recognition of Christianity in the fourth century, with more opportunity to compare mss., these "local texts" were gradually displaced by a type of text which tended to smooth out rough constructions, harmonize parallel passages, and to make for ease of understanding. This text-type, known as "Byzantine," was dominant by the eighth century. It remained the accepted text, becoming known as the "Textus Receptus" after the invention of printing, and was the text which principally underlay the King James version. It was not until the latter part of the 19th century that textual scholarship brought about a return to the older text-types.

3. Patristic Quotations. If every ms. of the NT itself were destroyed, the NT could virtually be reconstructed from another significant source, viz., the thousands of quotations of NT passages in the writings of the ancient Church Fathers, principally in Greek, Latin, and Syriac. These quotations must be consulted with care, as they were often given from memory or simply as a scriptural allusion and hence not verbally exact. Yet many are textually reliable; and these are valuable, because readings quoted by a particular Church Father can usually be assumed to have been current during that Father's lifetime and in the region of his activity.

4. Ancient Versions. In the case of most ancient writings, when the mss. in the original language of the work have been consulted, the limits of the field have been reached. The Bible, especially the NT, is therefore virtually unique in ancient literature in this respect; for not only was it translated into other languages in the earliest centuries of its history, but these translations are sufficiently accurate to be of help in textual criticism in determining the original text of the NT. Of course, no original mss. of these ancient translations remain, and the copies which are known must first be examined to determine the original text of the translation. However, certain types of Greek variants would not be reflected in certain versions (e.g., the presence or absence of a definite article in Greek would not normally be reflected in Latin, as Latin has no definite article); but in many respects the versions are useful, not least in helping to show the regions in which certain textual readings were current.

The NT must have been translated into Latin, the official language of the Roman Empire, very shortly after the books were written and certainly before the second century had passed. The 40 or so extant mss. of this Old Latin differ extensively among themselves, and it is not clear whether they represent one or several translations. As a result of these variations, in 382 Pope Damasus commissioned Jerome to undertake a revision of the Latin Bible. In the NT Jerome worked cautiously, making changes only where he felt they were absolutely necessary. This revision, the Latin Vulgate, became the official Bible of the Western Church and remains the official Roman Catholic Bible. Probably 8,000 mss. are in existence.

Syriac, a dialect related to Aramaic, which was spoken in lands around Palestine, likewise received the NT during the second century. The first such translation seems to have been either the original, or a translation of a Greek original, of a continuous Gospel account known as the Diatessaron (meaning "through the four"), constructed by combining elements from all four Gospels. It was composed about 160 by Tatian and seems to have been the Syriac Gospel in common use for over a century. There was also made, however, perhaps in the second century, a translation of the four Gospels, known as the Old Syriac, which is now known in two mss., the Sinaitic and the Curetonian.

The Syriac which is still the standard version is the Peshitta (meaning "simple"), translated in the fifth century, perhaps by Rabbula, bishop of Edessa. Some 250 mss. are known, none of which contain II Peter, II and III John, Jude, or Revelation. The Peshitta was revised in 508 by authority of Philoxenus, bishop of Mabbog. It is thought by some that this Philoxenian version still exists in or is related to the current Syriac text of the four books named above which were not in the original Peshitta but are now printed in the Syriac NT. The Philoxenian was in turn revised in 616 by Thomas of Harkel. The Harklean Syriac is so extremely literal to the Greek that it even violates Syriac idiom at times to follow the Greek. It is likewise characterized by numerous marginal alternative readings, often in Greek. About 50 mss. of this version are known.

The Palestinian Syriac version was made about the sixth century. It exists in fragmentary mss., including some lectionary material. The so-called Karkaphensian Syriac, which has sometimes been named as a version, is in fact only a collection of Scripture passages accompanied by notes on spelling and pronunciation.

Likewise significant in textual criticism are the two principal versions of Egypt. The earlier of these is the Sahidic, the dialect of southern Egypt, which probably received its NT in the third century. It exists in numerous but fragmentary mss. The Bohairic, the dialect of Alexandria and the Nile delta, was more literary, and later displaced the other dialects to become the current Coptic. About 100 mss. of the Bohairic NT are known. Fragments exist of versions in three other Egyptian dialects: Fayumic, Middle Egyptian, and Akhmimic.

The Gothic version, translated very accurately from the Greek by the Gothic Bishop Ulfilas, dates from the fourth century and is the earliest version representing the Byzantine text-type.

The Armenian version originated about 400, the work of Mesrop and Sahak, using an alphabet created by Mesrop. The version was probably made from Syriac. A revision was made a century or two later. Many mss. of the Armenian version are known but only one is earlier than the tenth century.

Christianity became established in Georgia in the fourth century, and the Georgian version of the NT probably was in existence before the middle of the fifth century, apparently translated from Armenian. A thorough revision, based on Greek mss., was made about the 11th century.

The Ethiopic version originated about 600, perhaps translated from Syriac rather than Greek. About 100 mss. are extant, but the earliest is from the 13th century.

The NT was translated into Arabic by about the seventh century. Several translations were made at various periods from the Syriac, Greek, Coptic, and Latin.

The Persian exists in two versions, the earlier made from the Peshitta and the later from Greek. They are later than the Arabic, the exact date unknown.

The Slavonic version originated in the ninth century, the work of Cyril and Methodius, who translated from Greek into the Macedo-Bulgarian dialect, using an alphabet created by Cyril. This version is only partially extant.

Other translations were made from time to time, but they have virtually no significance for textual study, and are more appropriately dealt with under the subject of Bible translations. J.H.G.

THADDAEUS (thă-dē'ŭs, Gr. Thaddaíos), one of the 12 apostles, mentioned only in two of the four lists (Matt. 10:3; Mark 3:18). The other two lists (Luke 6:14-16 and Acts 1:13) omit this name but insert instead Jude, son of or possibly brother of James. In the first list KJV has "Lebbaeus whose surname was Thaddaeus" but "Lebbaeus" is omitted in the two best manuscripts (Sinaitic and Vatican). Nothing is certainly known beyond the first two references above. At one time a spurious "Gospel of Thaddaeus" was in existence.

THEATER. In spite of a rudimentary dramatic structure discernible in the Book of Job and the Song of Songs, Israel produced no drama, and had therefore no theaters. The name "theater" is Greek, a noun derived from the Greek theaomai, "to view," or "to look upon." The Greek theater, and the Roman theater which followed it, were therefore structures designed to seat the viewers at a dramatic representation. Usually the theater was an open-air structure, a semicircle of stone seats built into the side of a hill, and seating up to five or six thousand people. The seats were cut concentrically, and at the foot of the auditorium a semicircular piece of level pavement provided the "orchestra" or the place where the chorus, indispensable adjunct of all Greek dramas, and the actors performed. In the more primitive theaters a tent backed the diameter of this semicircle, into which the actors retired to change their masks, and by implication, their roles. (There were only three actors in a Greek tragedy, but a longer list of dramatis personae.) On the tent was painted a rough representation of trees, or a temple, or a house, to indicate that the scene of action was town or country and so on. The Greek for "tent" is skené, hence "scenery" in the dramatic sense. Surviving Greek theaters are acoustically remarkable. Theaters were commonly used for public gatherings, since they were likely to provide the largest places of assembly in the city; hence the use of the only theater mentioned in the NT (Acts 19:29), that of Ephesus. The ruins of this theater, a most imposing structure, seating 25,000 people, have been excavated. Roman theaters tended to be more elaborate than those of the Greeks, contained a more finished stage, and, perhaps in conformity with the needs of a severer climate, were at least in part roofed over. THEBES (thēbz, Heb. nō', nō' 'āmôn, from Egyp. niwt, town, village), the capital of Egypt during the imperial splendor of the Eighteenth Dynasty. Situated on the E bank of the Nile, the ancient city is represented today by the ruins of Karnak and Luxor, while across the river is the great necropolis of royalty and nobles as well as the remains of funerary temples and a workmen's village. Thebes was the cult center of the god Amon and the Heb. nō' 'āmôn is derived from the Egyp. "town of Amon." In Jeremiah 46:25 the Lord declares that He is "bringing judgment upon Amon of Thebes." Ezekiel 30 states that the Lord "will execute acts of judgment upon Thebes" (vs. 14) and will "cut off the multitude of Thebes" (vs. 15); "Thebes shall be breached" (vs. 16, RSV). Nahum used the calamity of Thebes as an object lesson for Nineveh (Nahum 3:8ff). C.E.D.

THEBEZ (thē'bĕz, Heb. tēvēts), a city in the tribe of Ephraim approximately half-way from Beth-Shean to Shechem. It is mentioned only in connection with the death of Abimelech, son of Gideon, who wanted to be king (Judg. 9:50; II Sam. 11:21). Abimelech had taken the city except for a central tower, from the top of which a woman dropped a millstone upon him, thus causing his death. It is now called Tubas.

THEOCRACY (thē-ŏk'rà-sē, Gr. theokratía), a government in which God Himself is the ruler. The best and perhaps the only illustration among nations is Israel from the time that God redeemed them from the power of the pharaoh by drying the Red Sea (Exod. 15:13; 19:5,6) and gave them His law at Mt. Sinai, till the time that Samuel acceded to their demand, "Now make us a king to judge us like all the nations" (I Sam. 8:5). During this period, God ruled through Moses (Exod. 19-Deut. 34), then through Joshua (Josh.) and finally through "judges" whom he raised up from time to time to deliver His people. From the human standpoint, the power was largely in the hands of the priests, who acted on the basis of laws issued by God, in whom were united all the powers of the state — legislative, executive and judicial. Such a government was, of course, possible only because of God's special revelation of Himself to the nation. A.B.F.

THEOPHANY, a visible appearance of God, generally in human form. In the early days of humanity, before men had the written Word, before the incarnation, and before the Holy Spirit had come to make His abode in human hearts, God sometimes appeared and talked with men. Before man sinned, he walked and talked with God, but after sin entered, Adam and his wife hid when they heard the voice of the Lord God (Gen. 3:8). God spoke to Cain (Gen. 4); Enoch and Noah "walked with God" (Gen. 5:24; 6:9), and He gave Noah detailed instructions concerning the ark and the flood. One of the loveliest and most instructive of the theophanies is found in Genesis 18. From Abraham's time on, theophanies generally occurred when men were asleep as in the Bethel vision of Jacob (Gen. 28:10-17) and others, but God addressed Moses "face to face" (Exod. 33:11). There is good reason to think that theophanies before the incarnation of Christ were visible manifestations of the pre-incarnate Son of God. It is to be noticed that theophanies ceased with the incarnation of our Lord. A.B.F.

THEOPHILUS (thē-ŏf'ĭ-lŭs, Gr. Theóphilos). It is reasonable to suppose that Theophilus, to whom Luke dedicated both his Gospel (1:3), and the Acts (1:1), was a real person. The title "most excellent" demands this, while the name and title together suggest a person of equestrian rank who became a Christian convert. Theophilus is most probably a baptismal name (see W. M. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, pp. 388, 389). Nothing is known of the man. He was certainly not Seneca, as one rash conjecture would have it. It is impossible to decide whether he was pure Roman, Greek, or Jew, or whether the omission in Acts of the honorable title employed in the Gospel, indicates a deepening friendship when the second book was dedicated, the abandonment of office, or dismissal for Christian profession.

THESSALONIANS, EPISTLES TO THE. With the possible exception of Galatians, I and II Thessalonians are the earliest letters surviving from the correspondence of Paul. They were written to the church in Thessalonica which was founded by Paul on his second journey en route from Philippi to Achaia. His preaching of Jesus as the Messiah aroused such violent controversy in the synagogue at Thessalonica that the opposing Jewish faction brought him before the city magistrates, charging him with fomenting insurrection against Caesar (Acts 17:5-9). Paul's friends were placed under bond for his good behavior, and to protect their own security, they sent him away from the city. He proceeded to Berea, and after a short stay, interrupted by a fanatical group of Jews from Thessalonica, he went on to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy to continue the preaching (17:10-14). From Athens he sent back instructions that they should join him as quickly as possible (17:15). According to I Thessalonians they did so, and it is possible that he sent Timothy back again to encourage the Thessalonians while he continued at Athens (I Thess. 3:2). In the meantime, Paul moved to Corinth, and there Timothy found him when he returned with news of the growth of the Thessalonian church (3:6; Acts 18:5). The first Epistle was prompted by Timothy's report.

I Thessalonians

Authenticity. There can be little doubt of the genuineness of this epistle. Ignatius (Ephesians X) and the Shepherd of Hermas (Visions III, ix, 10) both contain passages that may have been taken from it, and it is listed in the canon of Marcion (A.D. 140). Irenaeus (c. A.D. 180) quotes it by name (Against Heresies V, vi, i); Tertullian attributes it to "the apostle" (On the Resurrection of the Flesh XXIV); and his contemporary, Clement of Alexandria, ascribed it directly to Paul (Instructor I, v). As noted above, the autobiographical allusions in I Thessalonians correspond well with the data on the life of Paul given in Acts. Furthermore, no forger of the second century would have been likely to stress the imminency of the coming of Christ as Paul did.

Date and Place. Paul's stay both in Thessalonica and in Athens was brief, and he probably arrived in Corinth about A.D. 50. According to the narrative in Acts, Paul had begun his ministry there while working at the tentmaker's trade with Aquila and Priscilla (Acts 18:1-3). When Silas and Timothy rejoined him after their stay in Macedonia they brought funds which enabled him to stop working and to devote his entire time to evangelism (Acts 18:5; II Cor. 11:9). Shortly afterward the Jewish opposition to Paul's preaching became so violent that he was forced out of the synagogue. About a year and a half later he was haled before the tribunal of Gallio, the Roman proconsul (18:12). Gallio had taken office only a short time previously, in A.D. 51 or 52. The first epistle, then, must have been written at Corinth about a year prior to that date, in A.D. 50 or 51.

Occasion. Timothy brought a report concerning the problems of the church, with which Paul dealt in this letter. Some of his Jewish enemies had attacked his character, putting him under obligation to defend himself (2:1-6,10,14-16). A few of the converts were still influenced by the lax morality of the paganism from which they had so recently emerged and in which they had to live (4:3-7). Some of the church members had died, causing the rest to worry whether their departed friends would share in the return of Christ (4:13). Still others, anticipating the Second Advent, had given up all regular employment and were idly waiting for the Lord to appear (4:9-12). The epistle was intended to encourage the Thessalonians' growth as Christians and to settle the questions that were troubling them.

I Thessalonians is a friendly personal letter. The persecution in Thessalonica and the uncertainty concerning the coming of Christ which Paul had preached had disturbed the believers. Paul devoted the first half of his letter to reviewing his relationship with them in order to counteract the attacks of his enemies. The body of teaching in the second half of the letter dealt with sexual immorality, by insisting on standards of holiness. The chief doctrinal topic was the second coming of Christ. Paul assured his readers that those who had died would not perish, but that they would be resurrected at the return of Christ. In company with the living believers, who would be translated, all would enter into eternal fellowship with Christ (4:13-18). Since the exact time of the return was not known, they were urged to be watchful, that they might not be taken unawares.

II Thessalonians

Authenticity. The genuineness of II Thessalonians has been challenged because of its difference from I Thessalonians. The warning of signs preceding the day of the Lord (II Thess. 2:1-3) in contrast to a sudden and unannounced appearing (I Thess. 5:1-3); the teaching on the "man of sin" (II Thess. 2:3-9), unique in the Pauline epistles; and the generally more somber tone of the whole epistle have been alleged as reasons for rejecting the Pauline authorship. None of these is convincing, for the two epistles deal with two different aspects of the same general subject, and bear so many resemblances to each other that they are clearly related.

Early evidence for the acceptance of II Thessalonians is almost as full as for that of I Thessalonians. Shadowy references to it appear in the Didache (xvi), Ignatius (Romans X), and possibly Polycarp (Philippians xi). Justin Martyr (A.D. 140) quotes II Thessalonians unmistakably in his Dialogue with Trypho (cx). Irenaeus (A.D. 170) mentions it definitely as one of the epistles of Paul in Against Heresies (III, vii, 2), as does Clement of Alexandria (Stromalia V, iii).

Date and Place. The second epistle was probably sent from Corinth in A.D. 51, not more than a few months after the first epistle. Since Silas and Timothy were still with Paul, it is likely that no great interval elapsed between the writing of the two.

Occasion. Evidently the Thessalonian Christians had been disturbed by the arrival of an epistle purporting to come from Paul, which he had not authorized (II Thess. 2:2). Some of them were suffering harsh persecution (1:4,5); others were apprehensive that the last day was about to arrive (2:2); and there were still a few who were idle and disorderly (3:6-12). The second epistle serves to clarify further the problems of the first epistle, and to confirm the confidence of the readers.

Outline and Content, II Thessalonians

I. Salutation 1:1,2
II. Encouragement in Persecution 1:3-12
III. The Signs of the Day of Christ 2:1-17
  A. Warning of False Rumors 2:1,2
  B. The Apostasy 2:3
  C. The Revelation of the Man of Sin 2:4-12
  D. The Preservation of God's People 2:13-17
IV. Spiritual Counsel 3:1-15
V. Conclusion 3:16-18

Whereas the first epistle heralded the resurrection of the righteous dead and the restoration of the living at the return of Christ, the second epistle described the apostasy preceding the coming of Christ to judgment. Paul stated that the "mystery of iniquity" was already at work, and that its climax would be reached with the removal of the "hinderer" (II Thess. 2:6,7), who has been variously identified with the Holy Spirit, the power of the Roman empire, and with the preaching of Paul himself. With the disappearance of any spiritual restraint, the "man of sin" will be revealed, who will (2:3-10) deceive all men and will be energized by the power of Satan himself.

In view of this prospect, Paul exhorted the Thessalonians to retain their faith and to improve their conduct. He spoke even more vehemently to those who persisted in idleness (3:6-12), recommending that the Christians withdraw fellowship from them.

THESSALONICA (thĕs'ā-lō-nī'kà, Gr. Thessalonike), a Macedonian town founded by Cassander, Alexander's officer, who took control of Greece after Alexander's death in 332 B.C. Thessalonica was probably founded towards the end of the century by consolidating small towns at the head of the Thermaic Gulf. It dominated the junction of the northern trade-route and the road from the Adriatic to Byzantium, which later became the Via Egnatia. Its comparatively sheltered roadstead made it the chief port of Macedonia, after Pella yielded to the silting which was the perennial problem of Greek harbors. It was a fortress which withstood a Roman siege, surrendering only after the battle of Pydna sealed Rome's victory in the Macedonian Wars. In 146 B.C. it became the capital of the Roman province and was Pompey's base a century later in the Civil War with Julius Caesar. Prolific coinage suggests a high level of prosperity. The population included a large Roman element, and a Jewish colony. Paul visited Thessalonica after Philippi, and appears to have worked among a composite group, comprising the Jews of the synagogue and Greek proselytes among whom were some ladies of high social standing. There was a high degree of emancipation among the women of Macedonia. In Acts 17:6 and 8, the officials of the town are called in the original "politarchs." Its use was once dismissed as a mistake of the historian because it was a term unknown elsewhere. Sixteen epigraphical examples now exist in modern Salonica, and one is located in the British Museum. It was evidently a Macedonian term, and Luke's use of it was in line with his habit of using accepted terminology. E.M.B.

THEUDAS (thū'dàs, Gr. Theudás). Josephus (Ant. 20:5:1) mentions a Theudas who led a considerable revolt in A.D. 44 or 45. This cannot have been the Theudas of Gamaliel's speech, which was made some ten years earlier. To suggest that Luke used Josephus, and confused Theudas and Judas (Acts 5:36,37), reversing their chronological order, is to disregard Luke's customary accuracy. There is little correspondence between Luke's definite "four hundred" and Josephus' account of a more extensive rebellion. It is quite possible that the reference in Josephus was rather an interpolation from Acts. There could have been more than one Theudas and our knowledge of the history of the province is far too sketchy to dispute this clear possibility. W. M. Ramsay writes: "The period is very obscure; Josephus is practically our only authority. He does not allude or profess to allude, to every little disturbance on the banks of the Jordan . . ." (Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? pp. 258, 259). Indeed "no testimony could be stronger than that of Josephus himself to the fact that at the time of the Advent Judaea was full of tumults and seditions and pretenders of all kinds" (EGT 2:158). The movements of Theudas and Judas were probably associated, and both took place in the time of Quirinius. E.M.B.

THIEF, THIEVES (Heb. gannāv, steal; Gr. kléptes, lestés, thief). The word is used for anyone who appropriates someone else's property, including petty thieves and highwaymen (Luke 10:30; John 12:6). Under the law of Moses, thieves who were caught were expected to restore twice the amount stolen. The thieves with Jesus on their crosses must have been robbers or brigands, judging by the severity of the punishment and the fact that one of them acknowledged that the death penalty imposed upon them was just (Luke 23:41).

THIGH (Heb. yarekh, shôq, Gr. merós), the upper part of the leg in man; or of a rear leg in a quadruped. To put one's hand under the thigh of another, was to enhance the sacredness of an oath (Gen. 24:2,9; 47:29). To "smite hip and thigh" (Judg. 15:8) implied not only slaughter but slaughter with extreme violence. When the Angel of Jehovah wrestled with Jacob, so that Jacob might know the weakness of his human strength, he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh and threw it out of joint at the hip; thus making him change from struggling to clinging, and when he thus changed, God changed him from Jacob "a supplanter" to Israel "a prince with God" (Gen. 32:24-32); and remembering this event the Israelites "eat not the sinew of the hip which is upon the hollow of the thigh." In Oriental feasts, the shoulder or the thigh of the meat is often placed before an honored guest (cf. I Sam. 9:23,24) and he has the privilege of sharing it with those near him at the feast. The thigh was the place for a man to gird his sword (Judg. 3:16). To smite upon the thigh is a sign of amazement or of great shame (Jer. 31:9; Ezek. 21:12). A.B.F.

THIMNATHAH (thĭm'nà-thà, Heb. timnāthâh), occurs only in Joshua 19:43 (KJV). Properly "Timnah" as elsewhere and in ASV here. See TIMNAH.

THOMAS (tŏm'às, Gr. Thomás, from Aram. te'oma, twin), one of the 12 apostles (Matt. 10:3). He was also called "Didymus" or "the Twin" (cf. John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2). The Gospel of John gives the most information about him. When the other apostles tried to dissuade Jesus from going to Bethany to heal Lazarus because of the danger involved from hositile Jews, Thomas said to them, "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (John 11:16). Shortly before the Passion, Thomas asked, "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; how know we the way?" (John 14:1-6). Thomas was not with the other apostles when Jesus presented Himself to them on the evening of the Resurrection, and told them later that he could not believe in resurrection (John 20:24,25). Eight days later he was with the apostles when Jesus appeared to them again, and he exclaimed "My Lord and my God" (John 20:26-29). He was with the six other disciples when Jesus appeared to them at the Sea of Galilee (John 21:1-8) and was with the rest of the apostles in the upper room at Jerusalem after the ascension (Acts 1:13). According to tradition he afterward labored in Parthia, Persia, and India. A place near Madras is called St. Thomas' Mount. S.B.

THOMAS, GOSPEL OF. This was the major item in a jar of papyri discovered at Naj Hamadi between Cairo and Luxor in 1945. It took some 14 years for the knowledge of the find to reach the West. Some inkling of the Gospel of Thomas had emerged in 1903 from a papyrus discovered by Grenfell and Hunt. The Naj Hamadi document is a collection of one hundred and fourteen sayings of Christ in the form of isolated dicta or brief conversations, some known, some entirely new, the whole work being ascribed to the apostle Thomas. Some of the sayings are inconsiderable and without the edge and patina so characteristic of the Biblical utterances of Christ. Others, on the contrary, are both fresh and pungent, and may well represent a genuine tradition. Consider a few illustrations of the latter sort: "Jesus said: Whoever is near me is near the fire, and whoever is far from me is far from the kingdom." The words coincide with more than one warning of the inevitability of persecution, and the consistent claim that discipleship was the path to God. Again: "They said to Him: Come and let us pray today and let us fast. But Jesus said: which then is the sin I have committed, or in what have I been vanquished?" In the Fourth Gospel the words occur: "Which of you convicts me of sin?" Again: "Jesus said: Become passersby." The words are in tune with a saying of Christ preserved in the arabesques of a Moslem mosque: "Life is a bridge. You pass over it but build no houses on it." The meaning, of course, is that the wise and good avoid entanglements and too great involvement in material things. Such sayings have a ring of authenticity. So do such words as the new Beatitude: "Blessed is the man who suffers. He finds life." And the reproach to the Pharisees, catching up a simile of the Greeks which is still in common usage: "Woe to them, for they are like a dog sleeping in a manger of oxen, for neither does he eat nor allow the oxen to eat." The collection is dated A.D. 140 and it is not perhaps surprising that some well-known sayings have become somewhat worn and altered. Compare, for example, the parable of the Sower and the Seed in the canonical Gospels with the attenuated version in the Gospel of Thomas: "See the sower went out, he filled his hand, he threw. Some seed fell on the road, the birds came, they gathered them. Others fell on the rock, and did not strike root in the earth, and did not produce ears. Others fell in the thorns. They choked the seed and the worm ate them. Others fell on the good earth, and brought forth good fruit. It bore sixty per measure, and one hundred and twenty per measure." This is obviously a different tradition held no doubt by a Christian community in Egypt, perhaps a remnant who escaped from Jerusalem before A.D. 70 to live in some measure of isolation in a foreign land. Thomas may, in fact, have been the author of their original document. E.M.B.

THORN (See Plants)

THORN IN THE FLESH, Paul's description of a physical ailment which afflicted him and from which he prayed to be relieved (II Cor. 12:7). Some hold that there are hints that it was ophthalmia. Paul generally dictated his epistles, but signed them with his own hand (II Thess. 3:17; I Cor. 16:21). He wrote the end of Galatians with his own hand, but apologized for the large handwriting (Gal. 6:11). Not "how large a letter" as in KJV, but "with how large letters" as in ASV. His affliction was apparently not only painful but disfiguring. The Galatians did not despise him for it, and would have plucked out their own eyes and given them to the apostle, were it possible (Gal. 4:13-15). He says he was unable to recognize the high priest (Acts 23:5). Ramsay thought it was some form of recurring malarial fever. A.B.F.

THOUSAND (Heb. eleph, Gr. chílioi), frequently used hyperbolically for a very large but indefinite number, or as the division of a tribe (Num. 31:5; Josh. 22:14). The word was also used as the subdivision of the tribe which was known technically as "a father's house" (Num. 1:2,4,16; Judg. 6:15; I Sam. 10:19,21).

THOUSAND YEARS (See Millennium)

THRACE (thrās, Gr. Thrakía), a kingdom and later a Roman province, in SE Europe, E of Macedonia. The name does not appear in the canonical books, but II Maccabees 12:35 mentions an unnamed Thracian horseman who rescued Gorgias, the governor of Jamnia, from possible Jewish capture.

THREE HOLY CHILDREN, SONG OF (See Apocrypha)

THREE TAVERNS (Lat. Tres Tabernae). This village, which may be rendered "Three Shops," was a stopping place on the Via Appia, some 33 miles from Rome, at the junction of the road from Antium, near modern Cisterna. It was a place of some importance (Acts 28:15; Cic. Ad Att. 2:12).

THRESHING (Heb. dûsh, to trample out; hāvat, to beat out or off; dārakh, to tread; Gr. aloáo, to tread down). It was performed in two ways: (1) by beating the sheaves with a rod or flail; (2) by trampling them under the feet of oxen that pulled a wooden sled around the threshing floor (Isa. 28:27). Threshing was done out-of-doors on a hard surface of ground. The word also had a figurative use (Isa. 21:10; 41:15; Mic. 4:12,13; I Cor. 9:10). See AGRICULTURE, FARMING.

THRESHING FLOOR (Heb. gōren, Gr. hálon), the place where grain was threshed. Usually clay soil was packed to a hard smooth surface. Sheaves of grain were spread on the floor and trampled by oxen which usually drew crude wooden sleds with notched rims (Deut. 25:4; Isa. 28:27; I Cor. 9:9). A shovel and fan were used in winnowing the grain (Isa. 30:24). Since robbers would visit the floor at threshing time (I Sam. 23:1), the laborers slept there (Ruth 3:4-7). Threshing floors were often on hills where the night winds could more easily blow away the chaff.

THRESHOLD (Heb. saph, threshold, entrance; miphtān, threshold, sill), the piece of wood or stone which lies below the bottom of a door, and has to be crossed on entering a house. The sill of a doorway, hence the entrance to a building.

THRONE (Heb. kissē', Gr. thrónos), a chair of state occupied by one in authority or of high position, like a high priest, judge, governor, or king (Gen. 41:40; II Sam. 3:10; Neh. 3:7; Ps. 122:5; Jer. 1:15; Matt. 19:28). Solomon's throne was an elaborate one (I Kings 10:18-20; II Chron. 9:17-19). For ages the throne has been a symbol of authority, exalted position, majesty (Ps. 9:7; 45:6; 94:20; Prov. 16:12).

THUMB, either the great toe of the foot or the thumb of the hand. The Heb. word bōhen, followed by a modifying term, indicates which is meant (Exod. 29:20; Lev. 8:23; 14:14). To cut off these members was to handicap a victim and brand him. A son of Reuben was named Thumb (bōhen) (Josh. 15:6).

THUMMIM (See Urim and Thummim)

THUNDER (Heb. ra'am, qôl, Gr. bronté), the noise that follows a lightning discharge. In Palestine it was a rare phenomenon during summer months, so if it did occur it was considered a sign of divine displeasure (I Sam. 12:17). So unusual was it in summer that it was likened to snow in that season (Prov. 26:1). A spectacular electrical storm accompanied the plague of hail in Egypt (Exod. 9:22-26). Such a display was seen at Sinai (Exod. 19:16-18). Thunder operates according to natural law (Job 28:26; 38:25). Hebrews considered thunder to be a revelation of God's power (Job 37:2-5; 40:9; Ps. 18:13; 29:2-9; Isa. 30:30), and it represented God's anger and chastening (I Sam. 2:10).

THUNDER, SONS OF (huioí brontés), the title given James and John by Jesus (Mark 3:17) apparently because of their bold and sometimes rash natures (Luke 9:54; Matt. 20:20-23).

THUTMOSE (also Tuthmosis, Thotmes), does not appear in the Bible, but is a common personal name and one of the great royal names of Egypt, given to four kings of the eighteenth dynasty. The outstanding Thutmose was Thutmose III, one of the greatest military leaders and administrators of antiquity. Thutmose I made a military expedition beyond the Euphrates and also extended the southern boundary to the Third Cataract. He did some building at Karnak; one of his obelisks still stands there. Thutmose II married his half-sister, Hatshepsut, and their daughter became the wife of Thutmose III. Hatshepsut was regent for a period after the death of Thutmose II and even had herself proclaimed "king"; upon her death, Thutmose III burst from obscurity and attempted to eliminate all references to this aunt and mother-in-law. He began his 17 expeditions to Palestine-Syria with a brilliantly strategic victory over an Asiatic coalition at Megiddo. He reached beyond the Euphrates and set up a stele beside that left by his grandfather (Thutmose I). An ardent sportsman, Thutmose III here engaged in a great elephant hunt. He was also active in the S and pushed the boundary to Gebel Barkal, just below the Fourth Cataract.

The records of his expeditions are preserved in his annals at Karnak. The tribute gained from his successes greatly enriched the priesthood of Amon at Thebes, while the influx of foreign products and peoples effected a cosmopolitanism which eventually contributed to the breakdown of the empire that had been built in large measure by the abilities of Thutmose III. In building activity he is credited with constructions at Karnak: the hall of the annals; building intended to conceal the obelisks of Hatshepsut; the Sixth Pylon; the Seventh Pylon; and the Festival Hall to the E. On the W bank at Thebes, he built at Medinet Habu, and to the N erected a mortuary temple which has not survived. He also built temples at other sites in Egypt and Nubia. For various reasons Thutmose III has been endorsed as the pharaoh of the Oppression, and his successor, Amenhotep II, as the pharaoh of the Exodus. Though this is an attractive hypothesis in many respects, it is burdened with difficulties and the identity of those pharaohs is still problematic. Thutmose IV, the son of Amenhotep II, is the last of the kings of this name. The Dream Stele, which still stands between the forelegs of the Sphinx at Giza, relates how he came to the throne. C.E.D.

THYATIRA (thī'ă-tī'rà, Gr. Thyáteira), a city in the province of Asia, on the boundary of Lydia and Mysia. Thyatira has no illustrious history, and is scarcely mentioned by ancient writers. Coinage suggests that, lying as it did on a great highway linking two river valleys, Thyatira was a garrison town over long centuries. Its ancient Anatolian deity was a warlike figure armed with a battle-axe and mounted on a charger. An odd coin or two shows a female deity wearing a battlemented crown. The city was a center of commerce, and the records preserve references to more trade-guilds than those listed for any other Asian city. Lydia, whom Paul met in Philippi, was a Thyatiran seller of "turkey red," the product of the madder-root (Acts 16: 14). It is curious to find another woman, nicknamed after the princess who sealed Ahab's trading partnership with the Phoenicians, leading a party of compromise in the Thyatiran church (Rev. 2:20,21). Necessity for guild membership in a trading community must have strengthened temptation to compromise. Thyatira played no significant part in the later history of the Church. E.M.B.

TIAMAT (tī'ă-măt), a mythical monster in the Babylonian-Assyrian creation story (Enûma elish), which is primarily an epic honoring the god Marduk. When Tiamat threatened the gods, Marduk, as their champion, defeated and killed her. He then split her into two parts, from which he made the heavens and the earth. Some scholars have seen a reflection of Tiamat in the Hebrew tehom, "the deep," but differences between the terms in form, meaning, and usage have been demonstrated by A. Heidel and others.

TIBERIAS (tī-bē'rĭ-ăs, Gr. Tiberiás), a city of Herod Antipas, built between the years A.D. 16 and 22 on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, or the Sea of Tiberias, as John, writing for non-Jewish readers, calls the lake (John 6:1; 21:1). It was named, of course, after the reigning emperor, Tiberius, reflecting the pro-Roman policy consistently followed by the Herods. The city is said to have occupied the site of Rakkath, an old town of Naphtali, and since Rakkath means "strip" or "coast," this may have been the case. Jewish rumor said Tiberias was built over a graveyard, and the place was therefore dubbed unclean (Josephus. Ant. 18:2:3). Macalister is of the opinion that this proves that no earlier city occupied the site (HDB p. 934), but Herod could easily have included the burial-place of Rakkath in his larger foundation. Herod built ambitiously. The ruins indicate a wall three miles long. There were a palace, a forum, and a great synagogue, for the foundation illustrated strikingly the dual Herodian policy, which sought to combine pro-Roman loyalty with effective patronage of the Jews. Jewish boycott, however, compelled Herod to populate his new town with the lowest elements of the land. Defended by its strong acropolis, Tiberias survived the passing of the other lakeside towns. Saladin, who took Tiberias in 1187, was unable to reduce the citadel until after Hattin. The hot springs and baths lay S of the city wall. Their healthful nature is mentioned by the Elder Pliny (H.N. 5:15), and a coin of Tiberias of Trajan's day shows a figure of Hygeia (Health) feeding a serpent (sign of Aesculapius, god of healing) as she sits on a rock over a spring. TIBERIAS, SEA OF (See Sea of Galilee)

TIBERIUS (tī-bēr'ĭ-ŭs, Gr. Tibérios). Tiberius Julius Caesar Augustus succeeded to the principate on the death of Augustus in A.D. 14, becoming thus the second Roman emperor. He was born in 42 B.C., son of the Empress Livia, wife of Augustus, by her first husband, Tiberius Claudius Nero. He had a distinguished military career in the East and in Germany, and, in the absence of direct heirs to Augustus, was the logical successor. Augustus, however, did not like Tiberius, and Tiberius, over many years, was the passive witness of several attempts to bypass his claims and his abilities. The experience of disapproval and rejection no doubt contributed to the dourness, secretiveness, ambiguity, and suspicious preoccupations which marred the years of Tiberius' power. A morbid fear of disloyalty led to the heavy incidence of treason trials which were a feature of the Roman principate under its worst incumbents. There is no evidence that Tiberius was unduly tyrannous, but aristocrats, and writers of their number, blamed the prince for features of later tyranny, and for manifold precedents for oppression. This, added to the natural unpopularity of a reticent and lonely man, left Tiberius with a reputation which modern scholarship, discounting Tacitus' brilliant and bitter account, has been at some pains to rehabilitate. Tiberius had great ability and some measure of magnanimity; for, in spite of many unhappy memories, he sought loyally to continue Augustus' policy, foreign and domestic. The rumors of senile debauchery on Capri can be listed with the slanders of earlier years, though there is some evidence of mental disturbance in the later period of the principate. Tiberius died on March 16, A.D. 37. He was the reigning emperor at the time of Christ's death.

TIBHATH (tĭb'hăth, Heb. tivhath), a city in the kingdom of Zobah, E of the Anti-Lebanon Mountains. David captured it from Hadarezer, and sent its treasures to Jerusalem (I Chron. 18:7-9, Betah of II Sam. 8:8).

TIBNI (tĭb'nī, Heb. tivnî), a son of Ginath. When Zimri died, he was an unsuccessful competitor for the throne of Israel with Omri (I Kings 16:15-21). Nothing else is known about him.

TIDAL (tī'dăl, Heb. tidh'āl), an unidentified king, mentioned only in Genesis 14:1,9, where he is called "king of Goiim" ("nations," KJV) and is allied with three other kings, with Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, as the leader (see 14:5,17). Invading westward, they defeated the kings of the cities of the plain and took plunder and captives, including Lot. Abraham routed the coalition in a night raid, recovered the goods, and rescued the captives (14:15-16).

TIGLATH-PILESER (tĭg'lăth-pĭ-lē'zêr, Assyr. Tukulti-apil-esharra, Heb. tiglath-pil'eser, tilleghath-pilne'ser), a famous name among Assyrian kings. Tiglath-pileser I (1114-1074 B.C.) was a conqueror whose campaigns extended northward to the vicinity of Lake Van and westward to the Mediterranean. His annals tell of his efforts to establish a world empire, but his reign was followed by several centuries in which Assyria was weak. In 745 a usurper took the Assyrian throne and assumed the name Tiglath-pileser. Tiglath-pileser III (745-727) injected new vigor into the Assyrian empire, which had suffered another decline after a resurgence of power in the ninth century. He engaged in campaigns to E and W and was recognized as king even in Babylon, where he was known as Pulu, from which comes the Biblical name Pul, by which he is referred to in II Kings 15:19 and I Chronicles 5:26. His annals list Azariah of Judah among the kings from whom he received tribute; the OT does not relate this account. (See D.D. Luckenbill, Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1926-27, I, p. 770; hereafter ARAB.) The annals also mention tribute from Menahem of Samaria, who bought him off (II Kings 15:19-20, RSV: "Pul the king of Assyria came against the land; and Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that he might help him to confirm his hold of the royal power. . . . So the king of Assyria turned back, and did not stay there in the land." Cf. ARAB, I, pp. 772, 815).

During the reign of the Judean king Ahaz, Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Syria moved against Judah. Ahaz secured the help of Tiglath-pileser (II Kings 16:5-8), who captured Damascus, deported its people, and killed Rezin. He took a number of Israelite cities and exiled the inhabitants to Assyria (II Kings 15:29; cf. ARAB, I, p. 816: "the land of Bit Humria (= house of Omri = Israel) . . . all its people, together with their goods I carried off to Assyria."). He was also responsible for the deportation of Transjordanian Israelites, whom he brought to "Halah, Habor, Hara, and the river Gozan" (I Chron. 5:6,26). The transfer of peoples to foreign areas was a practical policy which he designed to reduce the possibility of revolts in conquered regions (cf. ARAB, I, pp. 770, 772, 777). Ahaz also requested military aid from him because of invasions by Edomites and Philistines; he "gave tribute to the king of Assyria; but it did not help him" (II Chron. 28:20-21; cf. ARAB, I, p. 801).

TIGRIS (tī'grĭs, Assyr. Idiglat, arrow, Heb. hiddeqel), one of the two great rivers of the Mesopotamian area. It originates in the Taurus Mountains of Armenia; in its 1,150 miles it receives three principal tributaries from the E, the Great Zab, the Little Zab, and the Diyala. It is difficult for navigation, since for some months it is very shallow, yet is subject to flooding and during the rainy season ranges outside its banks. In antiquity the Tigris and the Euphrates entered the Persian Gulf by separate mouths, but today the Tigris joins the Euphrates at Kurna to form the Shatt el-Arab. The rivers of Iran also have been an important factor in the formation of the delta. Through what was Assyria and Babylonia the Tigris flows past famous cities, living and dead: Mosul, on the W bank, looks across the river to the mounds of Nineveh; farther downstream are Asshur, Samarra, and Baghdad. In the Bible the Tigris is mentioned with the Euphrates and two other streams as rivers which watered the garden of Eden (Gen. 2:14). Daniel 10:4 states that it was while the prophet "was standing on the bank of the great river, that is, the Tigris" (RSV), that he saw the vision he subsequently recorded. C.E.D.

TIKVAH (tĭk'vä, Heb. tiqwah). 1. The father-in-law of the prophetess Huldah, the wife of Shallum (II Kings 22:8-14).

2. During the reforms under Ezra a son of another Tikvah was a chief leader (Ezra 10:9-15).

TIKVATH (See Tikvah)

TILE (Heb. levēnâh, brick, Gr. kéramos). Ancient writing was done with a stilus on blocks of soft clay, which varied in size according to need. Ezekiel used such a tile in drawing a prophetic picture of the doom awaiting Jerusalem (Ezek. 4:1-8). When a permanent record was desired the inscribed tile was baked in a furnace. So skilled were scribes of the day that many of their tiles remain in perfect condition after 3,000 years. Roofing tiles are mentioned in Luke 5:19 and Mark 2:4.

TILGATH-PILNESER (See Tiglath-Pileser)

TILING (Gr. kéramos), used only in Luke 5:19, where the reference is apparently to clay roofing — tiles with which the roof was covered. Clay tiles were not commonly used as roofing material for houses in Palestine, roofs usually being covered with a mixture of clay and straw. It may be that Luke uses the expression "through the tiles" to mean "through the roof," without reference to the material used for the roof.

TILON (tī'lŏn, Heb. tîlôn), one of the sons of Shimon (I Chron. 4:1,20), a descendant of Judah.

TIMBREL (See Musical Instruments)

TIME. The history of the development of various measurements for time, and the making of instruments for determining them, is an interesting one. Before the days of Abraham, the Chaldeans had set up a system of days and seasons, and had divided the periods of darkness and light into parts. Their seven-day week had been accepted by Egyptians before the day of Moses. Day and night were determined by the sun. The week, no doubt, was determined by the phases of the moon. The month was based upon the recurrence of the new moon. Thus the new moon was the sign of a new month. In order to provide in the calendar for the extra days of the solar year over the 12 lunar months, the Jews added an intercalary month. They had no way of determining an absolute solar year, so the extra month was added every third year, with adjustments to provide seven extra months each 19 years. It was added after the spring equinox, hence was called a second Adar (the preceding month being Adar). This method of keeping the lunar and the solar years synchronized was probably learned by the Israelites during the Babylonian captivity. For ages, years were not numbered consecutively as we number them, but were counted from some outstanding event, such as the founding of Rome (ab urbe condita). Hebrews had a civil year which began at the vernal equinox, after the custom of Babylon, and a sacred year which began with the harvest or seventh month (Lev. 25:8,9). They divided the year into two seasons, seedtime or wet cold season, winter; and harvest, summer (Gen. 8:22; 45:6; Exod. 34:21; Prov. 10:5).

The Hebrew word for day (yom) means period of daylight, or a period of 24 hours. We have no way of knowing how the period was determined before the solar system was completed (Gen. 1:14-19). The Roman day began at midnight and had 12 hours (John 11:9). The Heb. day was reckoned from sunset. There was the cool of the day (Gen. 3:8) or twilight (Job 24:15). Midmorning was when the sun had become hot (I Sam. 11:9). Noon was the heat of the day (Gen. 18:1). Night was divided into watches, so that the length of each varied with changing seasons. The first watch came about 9:30 p.m. Midnight was the middle watch (Judg. 7:19). Morning watch began about 9:30 a.m. (Exod. 14:24). It was called cockcrow in NT times (Matt. 26:34; Mark 13:35). The watch was so named because of the changing of watchmen and was not a very definite period (Ps. 90:4; 119:148; Jer. 51:12). Roman influence caused a revision of the watches, so in the days of Christ there were four divisions of the night (Matt. 14:25; Mark 6:48), these being approximately 9:30 p.m., midnight, 2:30, and 5:00 a.m.

In the Scriptures the words translated time have varied connotations. Temporal existence is "my time" (Ps. 89:47, called "my life" in Job 7:7). A period allotted for a special object, task, or cause was its time (Eccl. 3:1; 8:6). A special period of life was "a time," as a period of conception (Gen. 18:10,14) and the days of pregnancy (I Sam. 1:20); any special feast or celebration (Ps. 81:3); an occasion for the consummation of divine plans (Job 24:1; Jer. 2:27; John 7:6,8; I Tim. 6:15; Acts 3:21; Rom. 8:22,23); a time for showing affection (Eccl. 3:8; Ezek. 16:8). The dispensation of grace is the time of salvation (Ps. 69:13; Isa. 49:8; II Cor. 6:2).

Ancient people had no method of reckoning long periods of time. The Greeks did develop the idea of eras, or connected time elements. The Olympian era dated from 766 B.C.; the Seleucid era from 312 B.C. Their year began on January 1. In Asia Minor the year began with the autumnal equinox. It is, therefore, difficult to determine any precise date for events occurring during NT days. Luke's dating of events (1:5; 2:1,2; 3:1) when John the Baptist began his ministry is the only definite fact upon which to determine the times of Jesus with any certainty.

The Hebrews used great and well-known events like the Exodus, the Babylonian Exile, the building of the temple, the earthquake (Amos 1:1) as fixed points for indicating the time of other events. In the Maccabean age the beginning of the Seleucid era (312 B.C.) became a starting-point. J.D.F.

TIMES, OBSERVER OF (See Occupations and Professions)

TIMEUS, TIMAEUS (tī-mē'ŭs, Gr. Timaiós), the father of a blind man whose eyes Jesus opened (Mark 10:46-52), the name Bartemaeus meaning "son of Timaeus."

TIMNA (tĭm'nà, Heb. timna', holding in check). 1. A concubine of Esau's son Eliphaz (Gen. 36:12).

2. Horite woman, sister of Lotan, who was a son of Seir (Gen. 36:22).

3. A chief or clan descended from Esau (Gen. 36:40, spelled Timnah).

4. A son of Eliphaz (I Chron. 1:36). (There is some uncertainty regarding the above.)

The Hill of Timnah, now called Tibnah, which site figured in the story of Samson. © MPS

TIMNAH (tĭm'nà, Heb. timnâh). In KJV eight times Timnath (Gen. 38:12-14; Judg. 14:1-5), once Thimnathah (Josh. 19:43). 1. A town on the border of Judah (Josh. 15:10), later given to the tribe of Dan (Josh. 19:43). Its site is at Tibnah, c. three miles SW of Beth-Shemesh.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:57). Its exact location is uncertain.

3. Probably a town in Edom (Gen. 36:12,22,40; I Chron. 1:39,51).

TIMNATH (See Timnah)

TIMNATH-HERES (See Timnath-Serah)

TIMNATH-SERAH (tĭm'năth-hē'rēz, Heb. timnath serah), the same as Timnath-heres (Judg. 2:9). It was a village in Ephraim which Joshua requested as an inheritance (Josh. 19:50), which he rebuilt, and where his remains were buried (Josh. 24:30). It is probably Tibnah, 12 miles NE of Lydda.

TIMNITE (tĭm'nīt, Heb. timnî), a native of Timnah whose daughter was married to Samson (Judg. 15:3-6).

TIMON (tī'mŏn, Gr. Tímon), one of the seven chosen by the church in Jerusalem to relieve the apostles of having to look after the poor (Acts 6:5).

TIMOTHEUS (See Timothy)

TIMOTHY (tĭm'ō-thē, Gr. Timótheos, honoring God), Paul's spiritual child (I Tim. 1:2; II Tim. 1:2), later the apostle's fellow-traveler and official representative. His character was a blend of amiability and faithfulness in spite of natural timidity. Paul loved Timothy and admired his outstanding personality-traits. One must read Philippians 2:19-22 to know how highly the apostle esteemed this young friend. None of Paul's companions is mentioned as often and is with him as constantly as is Timothy. That this relationship was of an enduring nature is clear from II Timothy 4:9,21. Paul knew that he could count on Timothy. He was the kind of person who in spite of his youth — he was Paul's junior by several years (I Tim. 4:12), his natural reserve and timidity (I Cor. 16:10; II Tim. 1:7), and his frequent ailments (I Tim. 5:23), was willing to leave his home to accompany the apostle on dangerous journeys, to be sent on difficult errands, and to remain to the very end Christ's faithful servant.

In the popular mind the distinction between Timothy and Titus is not always clear. Both of these men were Paul's worthy fellow-workers. The difference, however, is as follows. Titus was more of a leader; Timothy, more of a follower. Titus was resourceful, a man of initiative in a good cause. One finds in him something of the aggressiveness of Paul. (See the article on Titus.) Timothy, on the other hand, was shy, reserved. Nevertheless, he was ever obedient, cooperative. He manifested this complete willingness even when he was required to do things which ran counter to his natural shyness.

Timothy is first mentioned in Acts 16:1, from which passage it may be inferred that he was an inhabitant of Lystra (cf. Acts 20:4). He was the offspring of a mixed marriage: a Greek pagan father and a devout Jewish mother, Eunice (Acts 16:1; II Tim. 1:5). From the days of his childhood Timothy had been instructed in the sacred writings of the OT (II Tim. 3:15). In the manner of devout Israelites his grandmother Lois and mother Eunice had nurtured him (II Tim. 1:5). Then came Paul who taught this devout family that Jesus Christ is the fulfilment of the OT. First grandmother Lois and mother Eunice accepted the Christ, then, as a result of their cooperation with Paul, Timothy also did so (II Tim. 1:5). This took place on Paul's first missionary journey. Hence Timothy knew about the persecutions and sufferings which the missionaries (Paul and Barnabas) had experienced on that first journey (II Tim. 3:11), that is, even before Timothy had joined Paul in active missionary labor. When, on the second journey, Paul and Silas came to Derbe and Lystra, Timothy became an active member of the group. Paul took Timothy and circumcised him. Here it must be remembered that Timothy's mother was a Jewess. The case with him was different, therefore, from that of Titus. Timothy's case was not a test case to determine upon what basis Gentiles would be allowed to enter the church. In all probability it was also at this time that by the elders of the local church Timothy was ordained to his new task, Paul himself taking part in this solemn laying on of hands (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6).

Timothy then accompanied the missionaries by crossing over into Europe: Philippi, Thessalonica. He also helped the others in the next place to which they came, Berea. Here he and Silas were left behind to give spiritual support to the infant church, while Paul himself went on to Athens (Acts 17:10-15). At Paul's request Timothy a little later left Berea and found the apostle while the latter was still at Athens. Afterward he was sent back to Thessalonica for the purpose of strengthening the brothers there (I Thess. 3:1,2). After Paul had left Athens and had begun his labors in Corinth, both Silas and Timothy rejoined the apostle (Acts 18:1,5). At Corinth Timothy worked with Paul. On the third missionary journey Timothy was again with the apostle during the lengthy Ephesus ministry. From there he was sent to Macedonia and to Corinth (Acts 19:21,22; I Cor. 4:17; 16:10). When Paul arrived in Macedonia, Timothy rejoined him (II Cor. 1:1). Afterward he accompanied the apostle to Corinth (Rom. 16:21) was with him on the return to Macedonia (Acts 20:3,4), and was waiting for him at Troas (Acts 20:5). He was probably also with Paul in Jerusalem (I Cor. 16:3). During Paul's first imprisonment at Rome the two were again in close contact (Phil. 1:1; Col. 1:1; Philem. 1:1). When the apostle expected to be released shortly, he told the Philippians that he expected to send Timothy to them soon (Phil. 2:19).

Timothy is next found in Ephesus, where the apostle has joined him. Paul, on leaving, asked Timothy to remain at this place (I Tim. 1:3). While there, Timothy one day received a letter from Paul, the letter which we now call I Timothy. Later another letter arrived in which Paul, writing from Rome as a prisoner facing death, urged his friend to come to him before winter (II Tim. 4:9, 21). Whether the two ever actually saw each other's face again is not recorded. That Timothy tried to see the apostle is certain. See TITUS.

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO (See Pastoral Epistles)

TINKLING, the sound of small bells worn by women on a chain fastened to anklets. The picture in Isaiah 3:16 is that of affected pose and short, jerky steps which jingled the chain and bells. I Corinthians 13:1 should be rendered "clanging cymbals."

TIPHSAH (tĭf'sȧ, Heb. tiphsah). 1. A town on the northern border of Solomon's kingdom (I Kings 4:24). It was an important city on the Euphrates River where the caravan route from Egypt and Syria passed en route to countries to the East. Greek and Roman records give it Thapsaeus and indicate that it was strongly fortified. Xenophon tells how Cyrus II crossed the river at this ford (Anab. 1:4:2).

2. A town, apparently not far from Tirzah, the inhabitants of which were massacred by Menahem (II Kings 15:16). It was on the Jordan, and is possibly modern Tappuah.

TIRAS (tī'răs, Heb. tîras), youngest son of Japheth (Gen. 10:2; I Chron. 1:5). He is not mentioned elsewhere. Josephus (Ant. 1:6; 1) held with other ancients that he was founder of the Thracians. Modern scholars do not agree, but make him founder of a race of pirates called Tursenich who once plied the Aegean Sea. The name Thrusa has been found among Egyptian records, which indicates that they invaded the land during the reign of Merneptah about 1250 B.C.

TIRATHITE (tī'răth-īt, Heb. tîr'āthîm), a member of a family of scribes from Tirah who lived in Jabeth (I Chron. 2:55).

TIRE (Heb. pe'ēr, headdress), an ornamental headdress (Ezek. 24:17,23) worn by Aaron (Exod. 39:28; KJV bonnet), women (Isa. 3:20; KJV bonnet), and bridegrooms (Isa. 61:10; KJV ornaments).

TIRHAKAH (tûr'hȧ-kȧ, Heb. tirhāqâh), an Egyptian king, the third and last king of the twenty-fifth or Ethiopian dynasty. He was the son of Piankhi, whose capital was at Napata, just below the Fourth Cataract. This Nubian kingdom was quite Egyptian in character, and late in the eighth century Piankhi conquered all of Egypt. There was much confusion in the Egyptian political situation, as described in Isaiah 19, and Isaiah saw the danger of relying on Egypt. Tirhakah was commander of the army of Shabaka, his uncle and first king of Dyn. 25, and led the Egyptian armies in their initial conflict with Assyria. II Kings 19:9 and Isaiah 37:9 state that Sennacherib, while besieging Judean cities, heard that Tirhakah was coming against him. Sennacherib was successful against Tirhakah, but the loss of his troops forced him back to Assyria (I Kings 19:35-36; Isa. 37:36-37). Becoming king about 689, Tirhakah enjoyed a respite from the Assyrian threat for some years, but was defeated by Esarhaddon and later by Assurbanipal; he was driven S, where he retained rule of Upper Egypt.

C.E.D.

TIRHANAH (tûr'hà-nà, Heb. tirhanâh), a son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah (I Chron. 2:48).

TIRIA (tĭr'ĭ-à, Heb. tireyā'), a son of Jehaleleel (I Chron. 4:16).

TIRSHATHA (tûr-shā'thà, Heb. tirshāthā', revered), the Persian title of the governor of Judah under the Persians. Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65,70), and Nehemiah (Neh. 8:9; 10:1) bore the title.

TIRZAH (tûr'zà, Heb. tirtsâh). 1. The youngest daughter of Zelopehad (Num. 26:33; Josh. 17:3).

2. A town six miles E of Samaria captured by Joshua (Josh. 12:24). It must have been noted for its beauty, since Solomon compared his beautiful Shulamite woman to the beauty of Tirzah (Song 6:4). With the division of the kingdom after the death of Solomon, it became the capital of the northern kingdom (I Kings 14:17). In it reigned Baasha (15:21-33), his son Elah, and Zimri (16:6-15). Omri defeated Tibni and, since Zimri had destroyed the palace in Tirzah (vs. 18) moved the capital to Damascus (vss. 23,24). While Uzziah ruled in Judah, Menahem of Tirzah conspired against Shallum of Israel, slew him, and began a ten-year wicked reign (II Kings 15:16-18). It is probably to be identified with Tell el-Far'ah about seven miles NE of Nablus. J.D.F.

TISHBITE (tĭsh'bīt, Heb. tĭshbî). Elijah is mentioned as a Tishbite in I Kings 17:1. The RSV gives a good reading, "Elijah the Tishbite of Tishbeh in Gilead." The place has been identified, with some probability, with the modern el-Istib, a little W of Mahanaim.

TITHE (tīth, Heb. ma'ăsēr, Gr. dekáte, the tenth). Just when and where the idea arose of making the tenth the rate for paying tribute to rulers and of offering gifts as a religious duty cannot be determined. History reveals that it existed in Babylon in ancient times, also in Persia and Egypt, even in China. It is quite certain that Abraham knew of it when he migrated from Ur (Gen. 14:17-20). Since Melchizedek was a priest of the Most High, it is certain that by Abraham's day the giving of tithes had been recognized as a holy deed (see Heb. 7:4). Dividing the spoils of war with rulers and religious leaders was widespread (I Macc. 10:31). Samuel warned Israel that the king whom they were demanding would exact tithes of their grain and flocks (I Sam. 8:10-18). When Jacob made his covenant with God at Bethel it included payment of tithes (Gen. 28:16-22).

It was a long time before definite legal requirements were set upon tithing, hence customs in paying it varied. At first the tither was entitled to share his tithe with the Levites (Deut. 14:22,23). After the Levitical code had been completed, tithes belonged exclusively to the Levites (Num. 18:21). If a Hebrew lived too far from the temple to make taking his tithes practicable, he could sell them and use the money gained to buy substitutes at the temple (Deut. 14:24-26). This permit eventually led to gross abuses by priests (Matt. 21:12,13; Mark 11:15-17). Tithed animals were shared with the Levites (Deut. 15:19,20).

The methods developed for paying the tithes and for their use became somewhat complicated, when to the tithes of the first fruits (Prov. 3:9) were added the firstlings of the flocks (Exod. 13:12,13). Then when the Levitical system was established, provision for the upkeep of the sons of Levi was made by tithes (Num. 18:21-24). A penalty of 20 percent of the tithe was exacted from one who sold his tithes and refused to use the money to pay for a substitute (Lev. 27:31). The Levites in turn gave a tenth to provide for the priests (Num. 18:25-32). The temple was the place to which tithes were taken (Deut. 12:5-12). One could not partake of his tithes at home, but only when delivered at the temple (Deut. 12:17,18).

To make sure that no deceit would be practiced regarding tithing, each Hebrew was compelled to make a declaration of honesty before the Lord (Deut. 26:13-15). In taking the tithe of the flocks every tenth animal that passed under the rod, regardless of its kind, was taken; no substitution was allowed (Lev. 27:32,33). Was there only one tithe each year or was the third-year tithe an extra one? Confusion exists about this, even among Hebrew scholars themselves. As the needs for funds increased with the expansion of the temple service, a third-year tithe, all for the use of the Levites and those in need was exacted. It seems probable that the increase of temple expenses, due to the number of priests and Levites, made it necessary to impose extra tithes. According to Josephus, even a third tithe was collected (Ant. IV:4;3; VIII:8;22). Malachi (3:8-10) railed at the Jews for refusing to bring their tithes to the temple storehouse. This did not apply to money but to grains, animals, and fowls, money being deposited in the treasury box (Luke 21:1-4).

By the time of Christ, Roman rule had greatly affected the economic life of Judea, hence it was difficult for people to tithe. But that the laws regarding the tenth were still observed is shown by the fact that the Pharisees tithed even the herbs that were used in seasoning food (Matt. 23:23; Luke 11:42). J.D.F.

TITTLE (tĭt'l, Gr. keraía, a horn), a small, horn-shaped mark used to indicate accent in Hebrew (Matt. 5:18; Luke 16:17). In Matthew 5:18 it is used with jot (Gr. iota) to denote a minute requirement of the law.

TITUS (tī'tŭs, Gr. Títos), a convert, friend, and helper of Paul (Titus 1:4), in the NT mentioned only in Paul's epistles, especially in II Corinthians. He was a Greek, a son of Gentile parents (Gal. 2:3). After his conversion he accompanied Paul to Jerusalem, where Paul rejected the demand of the Judaists that Titus be circumcised. Hence, Titus became a person of significance for the principle of Gentile-admission to the Church solely on the basis of faith in Christ. During Paul's third missionary journey Titus was assigned missions to Corinth to solve its vexing problems (I Cor. 1-6; II Cor. 2:13; 7:5-16) and to encourage material assistance to the needy at Jerusalem (II Cor. 8). Much later Titus was in Crete, left behind there by Paul to organize its churches (Titus 1:4,5). He was requested to meet Paul at Nicopolis (Titus 3:12). Titus was consecrated, courageous, resourceful. He knew how to handle the quarrelsome Corinthians, the mendacious Cretans, and the pugnacious Dalmatians (II Tim. 4:10). W.H.

TITUS, EPISTLE TO (See Pastoral Epistles)

TITUS, FLAVIUS VESPASIANUS. Born A.D. 39, the son of the future emperor Vespasian, Titus served in Germany and Britain before proceeding to Palestine as a legate on his father's staff. When Vespasian emerged from the troubled events of A.D. 69 as the successful claimant for the principate, Titus inherited the Jewish war, which he concluded in A.D. 70 by his capture of Jerusalem. On his return to Rome, Titus was associated with his father's government and marked out thus for the succession. He succeeded to the principate on Vespasian's death in A.D. 79. Good-looking, intelligent, open-handed, and the darling of the troops,

Titus was a popular emperor during the two brief years of his principate. Despite the advantage of Vespasian's carefully hoarded wealth, had he not died prematurely in A.D. 81, he might have proved financially incapable of continuing the easy course of generosity which was an element in his popularity. Titus completed the Colosseum. The great eruption of Vesuvius (Aug. 24, 79) occurred at the beginning of Titus' reign. In the latter years of Vespasian, Titus was notorious for his liaison with Bernice, sister of Agrippa II, who listened to Paul's defense at Caesarea (Acts 15:13). E.M.B.

TITUS JUSTUS (See Justus)

TIZITE (tī'zīt, Heb. ha-tîtsî), the designation of Toha, one of the valiant men of David's army (I Chron. 11:45).

TOAH (tō'a, Heb. tôah), an ancestor of Samuel (I Chron. 6:34, Nahath in vs. 26). He is called Tohu in I Samuel 1:1.

TOB (tŏb, Heb. tôv), a fertile district in Syria, extending NE from Gilead. Jephtha, a mighty man of Gilead, took refuge in Tob (Judg. 11:1-3). When Israel was beset by Ammonites, the elders in Gilead begged him to return and take charge of their army (Judg. 11:4-11). When Ammon was being overcome by David, 12,000 men of Tob were hired by David against him (II Sam. 10:6,8).

TOB-ADONIJAH (tŏb-ăd-ō-nī'jà, tôv 'ădhônîyâh, Jehovah is good), a Levite, sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the law to Judah (II Chron. 17:7-9).

TOBIAH, TOBAJAH (tō-bī'a, tō-bī'jà, Heb. tôvîyâh, Jehovah is good). 1. One of the Levites whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the law in Judah (II Chron. 17:7-9).

2. A family among the exiles who returned to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel, who were not able to provide proofs of being Israelites (Ezra 2:59, 60; Neh. 7:61,62).

3. An Ammonite, half Jew, who with Sanballat tried to hinder Nehemiah in repairing Jerusalem (Neh. 2:10,19). Prior to the coming of Nehemiah, Tobiah had connived with a priest named Elisha, and made himself private quarters in the temple. Nehemiah dispossessed him (Neh. 13:4ff).

4. One of the exiles who returned to Jerusalem bringing gold and silver from Babylon from which Zechariah was instructed to make a crown for the high priest (Zech. 6:9-15).

TOBIT, BOOK OF (See Apocrypha)

TOCHEN (tō'kĕn, Heb. tōkhen, a measure), a town included in the heritage of Simeon (I Chron. 4: 32).

TOGARMAH (tō-gà'mà, Heb. tôgharmâh), a man who appears in two genealogies (Gen. 10:3; I Chron. 1:6) as a son of Gomer, who is a descendant of Japheth. Ezekiel 27:14 states that Beth-togarmah traded "horses, war horses, and mules" (RSV) for Tyrian wares. Later the prophet lists among the forces of Gog: "Beth-togarmah from the uttermost parts of the north with all his hordes" (Ezek. 38:6, RSV). Togarmah is found in the Hittite texts from Boghaz Koi and some Assyriologists equate Togarmah with Til-Garimmu, a province between the Euphrates River and the Antitaurus Mountains. It would appear, however, that the prophet may refer to a people or nation more distant from Palestine. C.E.D.

TOHU, an ancestor of Samuel (I Sam. 1:1). See NAHATH 2.

TOI (tō'ĕ, Heb. tō'û), king of Hamath who congratulated David for his victory over their common foe, Hadadezer, king of Zobah (II Sam. 8:9-11).

TOKEN (Heb. 'ôth, sign, token; Gr. éndeigma, éndeixis, sússemon, semeíon), a word which in the OT is used practically synonymously with sign (Exod. 13:9,16). In Numbers 17:10 and Joshua 2:12 it means a memorial of something past. In the NT the word is self-explanatory (Mark 14:44; Phil. 1:28; II Thess. 1:5; 3:17).

TOLA (tō'là, Heb. tôlā'). 1. One of Issachar's sons who migrated to Egypt under Jacob and founded a tribal family (Gen. 46:1-13).

2. Son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar, who judged Israel 23 years (Judg. 10:1,2).

TOLAD (tō'lăd, Heb. tôladh), a city occupied by sons of Simeon (I Chron. 4:29).

TOMB (Gr. táphos). The word tomb is used rather loosely. It may mean a chamber, vault or crypt, either under ground or above. It may refer to a pretentious burying place on a special site. It may be a bee-hive structure wherein many bodies can be placed. In general, any burying place is a tomb.

The so-called Tombs of the Judges, near Jerusalem. Top view is the outside entrance, and below, the interior, showing crypts, or loculi. The character of architecture and decoration indicate a much later date than the time of the Judges. © MPS

The Hebrews were not impressed by the tombs of Egypt, hence their burials remained simple, most burying sites being unmarked. Some kings were interred in a vault in Jerusalem, the "sepulchre of their fathers" or of David (II Sam. 2:32; Neh. 2:3). Just where this burial place was located has not been determined.

Tombs of NT times were either caves or else were dug into stone cliffs. Since only grave clothes are mentioned in connection with tombs, it seems certain that the Jews used neither caskets nor sarcophagi. Tombs carried no inscriptions, no paintings. Embalming, learned in Egypt (Gen. 50:2), was soon a lost art (John 11:39). A general opening gave access to vaults which opened upon ledges to provide support for the stone doors. The door to such a grave weighed from one to three tons, hence the miracle of its being rolled away (Luke 24:2; John 20:1). J.D.F.

TONGS (Heb. melqāhayim). In the Heb. the word usually means snuffers, and is used with snuffdish (Exod. 25:38; Num. 4:9); in Isaiah 6:6 it is tongs. In I Kings 7:49 and II Chronicles 4:21 it could be either. In Isaiah 44:12 (RSV) it is correctly rendered axe.

TONGUE (Heb. lāshôn, Gr. glóssa). 1. An organ of the body, used by Gideon's men in drinking (Judg. 7:5; see also Zech. 14:12; Mark 7:33; Ps. 68:23; Rev. 16:10).

2. An organ of speech (Job 27:4; Ps. 35:28; Prov. 15:2; Mark 7:35).

3. A language or dialect (Gen. 10:5,20; Deut. 28:49; Esth. 1:22, tr. language in the KJV, Dan. 1:4; Acts 1:19; 2:8; 10:46).

4. A people or race having a common language (Isa. 66:18; Dan. 3:4; Rev. 5:9; 10:11, note the repetition, "peoples, nations, tongues").

5. The figurative uses of the word are interesting. The tongue can be sharpened, i.e. made to utter caustic words (Ps. 64:3; 140:3). It is a sharp sword (Ps. 57:4). It is a soft tongue when it uses quieting language (Prov. 25:15). Ranting is a rage of tongues (Ps. 31:20; Hos. 7:16). It is the pen of an eager writer (Ps. 45:1), a shrewd antagonist (Ps. 52:2). The tongue of the just is a treasure (Prov. 10:20; 12:18), and a mark of wisdom (Isa. 50:4). It is like a bow (Jer. 9:3), an arrow (Jer. 9:8), and a lash (18:18). The miracle at Pentecost had cloven tongues (Acts 2:3). The tongue is little but can do great things (James 3:5,8). In Acts 1:19; 2:8; 21:40; 22:2, etc., the original word is dialektos, dialect, which is rendered language in the KJV.

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF. The Tower of Babel presents an answer to an otherwise insoluble mystery, and a revelation regarding God's anger against human vanity and disobedience. That there was originally a common language among men becomes more certain as linguistic research progresses. Many theories have arisen to account for the sudden confusion of tongues at Babel. One is that the whole account is a myth, adapted by Moses to account for the varied speeches which he knew. Another attributes the confusion to a slow change in speech caused by an ancient population explosion resulting in widely scattered peoples who, having no written language, soon developed various forms of speech. But for one to whom miracles exist only to the finite mind, it is easy to understand the account in Genesis 11:1-9, for He who designed the media of speech could have, in an instant, made such modifications in these media as to have caused the confusion. J.D.F.

TONGUES OF FIRE, one of the phenomena which occurred at the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. "Tongues parting asunder like as fire . . . sat upon each one of them" (Acts 2:3 ASV) as they were all filled with the Holy Spirit. The tongues of fire were symbolic of the Holy Spirit who came in power on the Church.

TONGUES, GIFT OF, a spiritual gift mentioned in Mark 16:17; Acts 2:1-13; 10:44-46; 19:6; I Corinthians 12,14. The gift appeared on the day of Pentecost with the outpouring of the Holy Spirit on the assembled believers (Acts 2:1-13). The external phenomena heralding the Spirit's coming were followed by the internal filling of all those assembled. The immediate result was that they "began to speak with other tongues." "Began" implies that the phenomenon recorded was now first imparted and that it was afterwards repeated (cf. Acts 8:17-18; 10:44-46; 19:6). The context makes it clear that "other tongues" means languages different from their own, and by implication, previously unknown to the speakers, for the amazement of the crowd, coming from many lands, was caused by the fact that Galileans could speak these varied languages. Under His control they spoke "as the Spirit gave them utterance"; the utterances were praise to God (2:11; 10:46). The gift was not designed merely to facilitate the preaching of the Gospel; the message in vss. 14-36 was not delivered in more than one language. There is no express NT instance of this gift being used to evangelize others. (At Lystra Paul and Barnabas preached in Greek, not the native Lycaonian which they did not understand). The gift of tongues on Pentecost was a direct witness to God's presence and work in their midst. While the gift came upon all those assembled when the Spirit was poured out (vs. 4), there is no indication that the 3,000 converts at Pentecost received the gift.

It is not stated that the Samaritans received this gift when the Spirit was imparted to them, but the request of Simon to buy the power to bestow the Spirit indicates that some external manifestation did result (Acts 8:14-19). The Pentecostal phenomenon clearly appeared again when the Holy Spirit was poured out upon the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius (Acts 10:44-46). Here again it served as a miraculous token of the divine approval and acceptance of these Gentile believers (11:15-17; 15:7-9). The appearing of the phenomenon in connection with the 12 disciples at Ephesus (Acts 19:6), who dispensationally stood before Pentecost, marked the full incorporation of this group into the Church and authenticated Paul's teaching.

The gift of tongues is mentioned by Paul as one of the spiritual gifts so richly bestowed upon the Corinthian believers. Their reaction to this gift drew forth Paul's discussion of the varied gifts. They are enumerated, compared, and evaluated by their usefulness to the Church. Twice he lists the gifts and places tongues and their interpretation at the very bottom of the scale (12:8-10,28-30), thus rebuking their improper evaluation of this spectacular gift. He emphasized the comparative value of tongues and prophecy by insisting that "five words" intelligibly spoken in the church were of more value than "ten thousand words in a tongue" not understood (14:19). Paul felt it necessary to regulate the use of tongues in their assembly; the ideal place for their exercise was in private (14:28). He insisted that not more than two or three speak in tongues, and that in turn, and one interpret; no one was to speak in tongues if no interpreter was present (14:27-28). Their use was not prohibited (14:39), but intelligent preaching in understandable words was vastly superior. He further insisted that women were not to speak in such meetings (14:34).

Two views are held as to the exact nature of the Corinthian "tongues." One view holds that they were foreign languages which the speakers were miraculously enabled to speak without having previously learned them. This view is demanded by Acts 2:1-13, unless it is admitted that the two phenomena are quite distinct. That they were intelligible utterances is urged from the fact that they could be interpreted and were the vehicle of prayer, praise, and thanksgiving (I Cor. 14:14-17). Modern commentators generally hold that the Corinthian tongues were not identical with the Pentecostal tongues, but were ecstatic outbursts of prayer and praise in which the utterances often became abnormal and incoherent and the connection with the speaker's own conscious intellectual activity was suspended. It is held that the utterances were incomprehensible to the speaker as well as to the audience (14:14) and that the resultant edification was emotional only (14:4). But 14:4 may only mean that his understanding was "unfruitful" to others. Its advocates further hold that this view is indicated in the fact that interpretation was likewise a special gift (12:10). From 14:27-28 it is clear that this speaking in tongues was not uncontrollable: it was very different from the religious frenzy which marked some heathen rites in which the worshiper lost control both of reason and the power of will. Any manifestation of tongues which is not under the control of the speaker is thereby suspect (14:32). D.E.H.

TOOLS. In the Bible a variety of tools used by the ancients are mentioned. These may be grouped into various categories: 1. Cutting tools: knife (Gen. 22:6,10; Judg. 19:29); saw (Isa. 10:15); sickle (Joel 3:13); axe (Deut. 19:5; 20:19); reaping hook (Isa. 44:12); pruning hook (Isa. 2:4; 18:5).

2. Boring tools: the aul (Exod. 21:6; Deut. 15:17).

3. Forks and shovels (I Sam. 13:21; I Kings 7:40,45); tongs (Exod. 25:38).

4. Carpentry tools: hammer (Judg. 5:26); plane (Isa. 44:13); plummet (Amos 7:8); level (II Kings 21:13).

5. Drawing tools: stylus (Isa. 44:13); compass (Isa. 44:13).

6. Measuring tools: line (I Kings 7:23; II Kings 21:13); measuring reed (Ezek. 40:3-8; Rev. 11:1).

7. Tilling tools: ploughshare (I Sam. 13:20,21); mattock (I Sam. 13:20,21).

8. Metal-working tools: anvil (Isa. 41:7); file (I Sam. 13:21).

9. Stone-working tools: chisel (Exod. 20:25); saw (I Kings 7:9).

TOOTH (Heb. shēn, tooth, ivory; Gr. odoús, tooth). These words are used to denote human teeth in Numbers 11:33, also in the following passages: in the law of retaliation, "a tooth for a tooth" (Exod. 21:24; Lev. 24:20; Deut. 19:21; Matt. 5:38; cf. Exod. 21:27); in the common expression: "gnashing of the teeth," in cruel hatred (Job 16:9; Ps. 35:16; 37:12; Lam. 2:16; Acts 7:54), or in anguish and despair (Ps. 112:10; Matt. 8:12; 13:42; 22:13; 24:15; 25:30; Luke 13:28); once gnashing the teeth is mentioned as due to epilepsy (Mark 9:18; ASV "grinding"); Proverbs 10:26 refers to the effect of acid on teeth.

A number of references mention the teeth of animals: of unspecified beasts (Deut. 32:24); of young lions (Job 4:10); of leviathan, probably a crocodile (Job 41:14); two prophetic visions reveal symbolic beasts with teeth: a bear (Dan. 7:5), a terrible beast (Dan. 7:7,19), locusts with teeth like lions' (Rev. 9:8).

The teeth are used in a variety of figurative expressions: Jeremiah and Ezekiel cite a proverb of the people, "the fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Jer. 31:29; Ezek. 18:2), meaning that the children were suffering on account of the sins of their fathers, but the Lord changed this proverb to read: "every man that eateth sour grapes, his teeth shall be set on edge" (Jer. 31:30); a prophetic passage mentions "teeth white with milk" as part of the description of abundant prosperity (Gen. 49:12); the teeth are used to depict evil people, the teeth standing for the person: the unrighteous (Job 29:17), enemies (Ps. 3:7), the wicked (Ps. 124:6), false prophets (Mic. 3:5), an oppressor (Zech. 9:7); conquered Judah has had her teeth broken (Lam. 3:16); metaphorical uses: teeth like spears and arrows (Ps. 57:4), misplaced confidence is like a broken tooth (Prov. 25:19), teeth as swords (Prov. 30:14), teeth like freshly-washed sheep (S. of Sol. 4:2; 6:6); teeth as the weapons of a nation (Joel 1:6); other statements: take his flesh in his teeth, meaning taking his own life (Job 13:14), escaped by the skin of his teeth meaning a narrow escape (Job 19:20), cleanness of teeth, meaning a famine (Amos 4:6). TOPHEL (tō′phĕl, Heb. tōphel, lime, cement), a place in the wilderness where Moses addressed the Israelites (Deut. 1:1). It is identified by some with modern el-Tafeleh, 15 miles SE of the Dead Sea.

TOPHET, TOPETH (tō′phĕt KJV, tō′phĕth ASV, Heb. tōpheth), an area in the valley of Hinnom where human sacrifices were made to Molech (Jer. 7:31; II Kings 23:10). It is first mentioned by Isaiah who declared that a Topheth, a place of burning, was prepared by the Lord for the king of Assyria (30:33). Jeremiah predicted that the name of the place would be changed to the valley of slaughter because of the many people who would be killed there (Jer. 7:32,33; 19:6). Josiah defiled this place so that it no longer could be used for idolatrous practices (II Kings 23:10).

TORAH (tō′rà, Heb. tôrâh, direction, instruction, law), the common Hebrew word for "law," so rendered over 200 times in the OT. It is used for human instruction, but it usually expresses divine law. So tôrâh is direction and guidance from God. Its emphasis is on the purpose of the guidance rather than the origin of it. But authoritative direction means law, thus tôrâh is the law of God. Other words cover special kinds of laws such as judgments and statutes; tôrâh is the overall term, the supreme law. Probably, for this reason the entire Pentateuch became known as the Torah. This section of the OT is constantly referred to in the Scriptures as the "law of Moses" or the "law of the Lord." Torah even became the name of the entire Jewish Scriptures. Jesus, cited Psalm 82:6 as part of the law (John 10:34).

The division of the Hebrew Scriptures into the Law (tôrâh), the Prophets, and the Writings comes from ancient times. The Samaritans have had only the Pentateuch for their Scripture since ancient times. Perhaps that means that only these five books of Moses were in the sacred canon when the Samaritans began their separate worship. The Torah was divided into 154 sections for usage in the synagogue services. It was read through, a section at a time, in three years. C.E.H.

TORMENTOR (Gr. basanistés, torturer). This word occurs only in the NT (Matt. 18:34) where the unforgiving debtor is delivered to tormentors, probably meaning the jailers.

TOU (tō′ōō, Heb. tō′û), king of Hamath who sent presents to David for conquering their common enemy Hadarezer of Zobah (I Chron. 18:9,10). In II Samuel 8:9,10 this name is Toi. See Toi.

TOW (Heb. ne′ōreth), the coarse and broken part of flax ready for spinning. In the OT it is used as an example of easily inflammable material (Judg. 16:9; Isa. 1:31).

TOWEL (Gr. léntion, linen cloth, towel), a word occurring only in John 13:4,5 where Jesus wrapped Himself in a towel and wiped the disciples' feet with it.

TOWER (Heb. mighdāl, mighdōl, bāhan, misgāv, pinnâh; Gr. pýrgos), a lofty structure used for purposes of protection or attack: to defend a city wall, particularly at a gate or a corner in the wall (II Chron. 14:7; 26:9); to protect flocks and herds and to safeguard roads (II Kings 17:9; II Chron. 26:10; 27:4); to observe and to attack a city (Isa. 23:13; to protect a vineyard (Matt. 21:33).

TOWN, the translation of several words used in the OT: bānôth, literally daughters, always in the plural, the towns surrounding a city. Cities listed as having towns are: Heshbon, Jazer (Num. 21:25,32 ASV [KJV has "villages"]), Ekron, Ashdod (Josh. 15:45-47), Bethshean, Ibleam, Dor, Endor, Taanach, Megiddo (Josh. 17:11; Judg. 1:27), Areor (Judg. 11:26), Jair, Kenath (I Chron. 2:23), Bethel, Gezer, Shechem, Azzah (I Chron. 7:28), Ono, Lod (I Chron. 8:12), Gath (I Chron. 18:1), Jeshanah, Ephron (II Chron. 13:19), Soco, Timnah, Ginzo (II Chron. 28:18 ASV [KJV "villages"]), Kiriath-arba, Dibon, Jekabzeel, Beersheba, Meconah, Azekah (Neh. 11:25-30 ASV, KJV "villages"). All the "daughters" of these cities were small towns without walls: hawwôth, village, tent village (Num. 32:41; Josh. 13:30; I Kings 4:13; I Chron. 2:23), sometimes in compound names — Havoth-jair (ASV Havvoth-jair) (Deut. 3:14; Judg. 10:4). These villages may have been the dwelling places of nomads, that is, tent dwellings; hātsēr, settled abode, village (Gen. 25:16 KJV [ASV "village"]). This village was of the Ishmaelites, probably a movable one made up of tents, but this word usually means villages without walls around them; 'îr, city, the common Hebrew word for "city," translated "town" especially where the context indicates an unwalled town (Deut. 3:5 unwalled, I Sam. 16:4 KJV [ASV "city"]); (I Sam. 23:7) town with gates and bars (I Sam. 27:5 KJV [ASV "city"]), unwalled (Jer. 19:15; Hab. 2:12); qîr, wall, once translated "town" (Josh. 2:15; ASV omits); perāzôth, open region, hamlet (Zech. 2:4 KJV [ASV "villages"]). This word denotes villages in the open country in contrast to those located in the mountains.

The NT has only one word which means "town": komó-polis, which denotes a community larger than a village but smaller than a city; it occurs only once (Mark 1:38). Another word: komé, village, is rendered "town" ten times in KJV: (Matt. 10: 11; Mark 8:23,26,27; Luke 5:17; 9:6,12; John 7: 42; 11:1,30). The ASV translates "village" in all three cases.

TOWN CLERK (See Occupations and Professions)

TRACHONITIS (trăk-ō-nī'tĭs, Gr. Trachonítis, rough region), a volcanic region SE of Damascus. It has been identified by inscriptions and is mentioned in Luke 3:1 as a tetrarchy of Philip. The "Rough Region" is still known to the Arabs as "the Refuge" or "the fortress of Allah." It has been likened to "a tempest in stone," or a black, petrified sea. The "region of Argob" (Deut. 3:4), part of the realm of Og of Bashan, probably included this wild infertile part. Josephus, writing in the first century, speaks of the predatory nature of the people of Trachonitis (Ant. 16:9:1, 10:1). Trajan in A.D. 106 made it part of the new province of Arabia, based on Bosra. E.M.B.

TRADE AND TRAVEL. I. Trade in the Old Testament. Abraham came from a trading port, Ur of the Chaldees, which stood in those days at the head of the Persian Gulf, on whose waters man first learned deep-sea navigation. Pottery from Ur has been identified in the ruins of Mohenjo-Daro on the Indus, and Ur was no doubt a trading-station between the sea-borne commerce of the Gulf and the Arabian Sea, and the caravan routes of the Euphrates Valley. The most negotiable route between East and West ran this way. The fact that Abraham was rich in gold and silver, wrought and unwrought, as well as in the nomad wealth of flocks and herds (Gen. 13:2; 24:22,53) is indication of the wealth of his birth-place, and of the commerce which no doubt existed between the desert and the town. The middlemen of this early commerce in the Middle East were the people of the desert.

Egypt, from earliest times, had been a great trading nation. A famous wall painting tells pictorially the story of the exploratory trading expedition sent by Princess Hatshepsut to Punt, on the Somali coast, 14 centuries before Christ, and an interesting papyrus speaks of Wen-Amon's quest for fine cedar on the Lebanese shore, three centuries later. Hatshepsut's venture had been a quest for myrrh trees, for the embalming practices of the Egyptians needed vast imports of spices and incense. Arabia Felix owed its name to the myrrh and frankincense produced there, and the bulk of this commerce followed the caravan routes NW through the Arabian peninsula with Egypt as the chief market. Slave-trading formed a profitable side-line, and it is significant that Joseph was sold to a company of Ishmaelites carrying myrrh into Egypt (Gen. 37:25). The rich imports of the land were balanced by an export trade in corn, and by tribute-money from the neighboring spheres of Egyptian dominance. It is recorded that corn was paid for in weighed silver (Gen. 41:57; 42:3,25, 35; 43:11; 12:21). Egypt was a heavy importer of precious stones and metals, some of which must have been of Indian origin brought up the Red Sea, and through the canal which was periodically open between the head of that waterway and the Nile. Egyptian monuments speak of similar commerce with the North, and with the Minoan thalassocracy of Crete, the Keftiu of the records.

The first organized commerce of the Hebrew people was under Solomon, whose farsighted trading ventures were inspired by the Phoenician mercantile cities of Tyre and Sidon. It is possible that the building of the temple first made the Phoenicians aware of the market to be found in their own hinterland, and of the profit to be gained from a partnership with the people who dominated the land route to the Gulf of Akaba. Cedar for the architectural projects of David and Solomon was collected at Tyre from the lumbermen in the ranges, and rafted down to Joppa, a distance of 74 miles. It was then hauled 32 miles up to Jerusalem (I Kings 5:6,9; II Chron. 2:16). The partnership thus begun was extended in a joint commerce out of Ezion-Geber at the head of the Gulf of Akaba, down the Red Sea to Ophir and India. Hiram, king of Tyre, supplied the pilots (I Kings 9:27,28; 10:11). Ophir was, in all probability, in southern Arabia, but the cargoes mentioned in I Kings 10:22 suggests a trading connection with India. A larger type of vessel was used in this ocean-going commerce, the "ships of Tarshish" mentioned in the verse. Tarshish was probably Tartessos in Spain and for such distant and exacting voyaging the Phoenicians had developed a sturdy type of vessel called by this name. An "Indiaman" or a "China clipper" in the days of more recent sail, did not necessarily journey to the lands embedded in the title. They were types of reliable ocean craft. Similarly the Egyptians called the Phoenician galleys engaged on the Cretan run "Keftiu ships." The text quoted seems to imply that Solomon's traders were speedily throwing off the tutelage of Tyre and venturing forth on their own account. Phoenicia was supplied from Judaea with wheat, honey, oil, and balm (I Kings 5:11).

The interchange of such primary produce can even be traced into NT times (Acts 12:20). Tyrian traders brought fish into Jerusalem and distressed Nehemiah by their sabbath trading (Neh. 13:16). The timber trade, too, continued into post-captivity days, and Ezra was constrained to make arrangements similar to those of Solomon to secure his supplies of Lebanese timber (I Kings 5:6,9; II Chron. 2:16; Ezra 3:7). Oil was also exported to Egypt (Hos. 12:1), and a small domestic export trade in woven goods from Judaea seems to be implied in Proverbs 31:24.

When the Hebrew monarchy fell apart after Solomon's death, it is possible that an interesting commercial situation may have arisen. Israel, the northern kingdom, must have inherited the profitable but seductive alliance with the Phoenician trading towns. Jezebel, daughter of the prince of Sidon, was a seal on this partnership. The southern kingdom, however, lay across communications with Akaba and the Red Sea, and there is every evidence that Judah had reverted, after Solomon, to an agricultural economy with nothing more than petty trading. Apart from a half-hearted attempt by Jehoshaphat to revive it (I Kings 22:48), the eastern trade seems to have vanished with the king who inspired and ordered it. It may have been at this time that the Phoenicians, denied the covenient route down the Red Sea, discovered the sea route to India by way of the Cape of Good Hope. A passage in Herodotus (4:42) seems to imply that the intrepid traders succeeded in this amazing achievement. The prosperity of the Phoenician cities certainly continued, and Ezekiel 27 is an eloquent record of the wide and tireless trading activity of Tyre. Ahab's prosperity is also vouched for by the archeologists' confirmation of the king's "ivory house" (I Kings 22:39).

teresting speculation. Tyre, without great difficulty, could strangle the economic life of Israel. Tyre's dependence on the hinterland for primary produce would provide a strong deterrent, but there is no doubt that the choice on Carmel with which Elijah confronted the people involved economic, as well as theological considerations. The Hebrew kingdoms from this time onward fell into the background as far as commerce was concerned. The captivity brought vast depopulation, and restored Israel was a largely agricultural economy. Internal interchange of goods was vigorous enough from earliest times, and provisions in the Law lay stress on fairness of dealing, and honesty in weights and measures (Lev. 19:35-36; Deut. 25:13-16). The petty trading of the temple, castigated by Christ, was a sample of the seamier side of this internal commerce, but the foreign trade which provoked investment (vid. Moffatt on Eccl. 11:1: "Trust your goods far and wide at sea . . . take shares in several ventures . . .") and brought great wealth, was no more. Palestine at the close of the OT, and in the time of Christ, was a poor land.

II. Trade in the New Testament. Trade and commerce have small place in the Gospels. The people of Palestine were aware of the activities of merchant and of trader, for such parables as those of the talents, and the merchant who found a "pearl of great price" were obviously meant to be understood by those to whom they were addressed. Trade, in the wider sense of the word, all through NT times, was supremely in the hands of Rome and of Italy. There was a growing interference of the State in matters of commerce. The legal machinery by which a "mark in hand or head" could prevent the non-conformist from buying or selling (Rev. 13:16,17) was early apparent.

The foreign trade of the Empire was extensive and varied and one-sided, too, in important cases, for the hoards of Roman coins commonly found in India are an indication of perilously unbalanced trade and great leakage of bullion. Latin and Greek words in early Irish, German, Iranian and even in Indian and Mongolian tongues, suggest the influence of trade. Archeology, especially on the South Indian coast, has a similar word to say. Roman merchants were ubiquitous. There was a Roman market at Delphi outside the sacred precincts, for the prosecution of trade in amulets and souvenirs, and this was probably typical of Italian enterprise abroad wherever crowds were gathered for purposes sacred or profane. From the second century a Roman city stood on Delos, the Aegean center of the slave-trade, and when Mithridates in 88 B.C. massacred the Italian residents of Asia Minor and the surrounding coasts, 25,000 fell in Delos alone out of a total of 100,000, mostly traders and the agents of commerce.

Rome itself was a vast market, and a grim satiric chapter in Revelation (18), constructed after the fashion of an OT taunt-song, and partly in imitation of Ezekiel 27, speaks of the wealth and volume of the capital's trade and the disruption of the world's economy at the fall and passing of a market so rich. Roman trade extended far beyond the boundaries of the Empire. It is certain that merchants from Italy carried their goods into unsubdued Germany, Scandinavia, India, and perhaps China. All this activity sprang from Rome's dominance, the peace which she widely policed, and the absence of political frontiers. There was reason in the merchants' lament imagined in the chapter quoted. Petronius' Trimalchio, the "nouveau riche" of the Satiricon, could make fortunes and lose them, and make them over again. And of Augustus the merchants said that "through him they sailed the seas in safety, through him they could make their wealth, through him they were happy." The fascinating account of the last journey of Paul to Rome, first in a tramp-ship from Adramyttium and then in an Alexandrian freighter, probably under charter to the Roman government for the transport of Egyptian corn to the capital, gives a first-hand picture of the hazards of trade, and of the navigation, the ships, and the management of Mediterranean commerce.

Of the commodities of export trade information is not copious. Oysters came to Rome from Britain in barrels of sea-water. The tin-trade of Cornwall, first exploited by the Phoenicians, doubtless continued under Rome. Northern Gaul seems to have had the rudiments of an exporting textile industry, and Gaul certainly exported Samian pottery. Underwater archeology on wrecked ships has revealed that large cargoes of wine were carried. A monogram device of a double S in a trident seems to indicate that one such freighter, wrecked near Marseilles, was the property of a shipowner domiciled at Delos, one Severus Sestius. On the subject of mass production for such trade there is little information, and none on the business organization involved. Certain localities, however, became famous for special commodities, and the commerce implied was no doubt in the hands of specialist traders working a market of their own choice and creation. Lydia, for example (Acts 16:14), "a seller of purple of the city of Thyatira" in Asia Minor was found at Philippi in Macedonia in pursuit of her trade. Corinthian bronze, and the Cilician cloth which was the raw-material of Paul's "tent-making," were probably distributed, locally or abroad, by similar private enterprise (Acts 18:3). The imagery of John's apocalyptic letter to Laodicea (Rev. 3:14-18) is based partly on the trade and industry of the rich Asian town. An important item of trade in Ephesus, now that the harbor was silting and the port losing its trade and prosperity to Smyrna, was the manufacture of silver shrines of Artemis to sell to the pilgrims and tourists who visited the famous temple.

Ramsay's illuminating researches established the fact of a Laodicean trade in valuable wool garments of various kinds. Glossy black fleeces were produced in this district and the neighboring Colossae by some system of cross-breeding, the genetic effects of which were apparent in the Anatolian flocks of the area until comparatively recent times. There is also evidence of a Laodicean eye-salve, based probably on the thermal mud of the nearby Hierapolis. Hence the taunt in the letter about "white garments," and the anointing of the eyes of the spirit with a more effective medicament. Another of the seven churches of the Apocalypse was a center of trade and commerce. More trade guilds are named in the records of Thyatira than in those of any other Asian city. Lydia, the Thyatiran "seller of purple," was mentioned above, and there are records in inscriptions of wool-workers, linen-workers, dyers, leather-workers, tanners, potters, bakers, slave-dealers, and bronze-smiths. Lydia's trade possibly fell under the category of the dyers. They brewed a red dye, perhaps the modern Turkey red, from the madder root, which grows abundantly in the district. This "purple" was nearer in color to scarlet than blue, and Lydia's presence in Macedonia, 500 miles away, suggests that the commodity was an important export. It is curious to note in this connection that John uses the figure of Jezebel, the ancient seal and symbol of a compromising trade alliance with the pagan world, as a description of a "Nicolaitan" of Thyatira, whose fault may have been some spiritually damaging mode of trade relationship with the surrounding pagan world.

The guilds were a major source of difficulty with Christians who sought to work out that mode of intercourse with the secular world around them by which livelihood could be guarded with a conscience intact. The guilds or collegia are mentioned in the story of Ephesus in Acts 19 as a source of organized opposition to the preaching of Christianity. The guilds were not trade unions in the modern sense of the word. Their functions were primarily social, and they covered all trades and professions. Records exist of guilds of bankers, doctors, architects, producers of linen and woolen goods, workers in metal, stone, or clay, builders, carpenters, farmers, fishers, bakers, pastrycooks, embalmers, and transport workers. Like the modern Rotary Club the guilds satisfied the need for social intercourse, but in the close-knit society of the ancient world they exercised a function, and demonstrated an influence, unlike that of any comparable organization today.

Ephesus saw the guild of the silver smiths and allied trades exert pressure on authority and public opinion enough to check the free activities of Paul in the city. The famous letter of Pliny (Ep. 10.96), in which the repression of vigorous Christian activity in Bithynia in A.D. 112 is vividly described, is fairly clear indication that the guild of the butchers, alarmed at the falling-off in sales of sacrificial meat, was the ally of the pagan priesthoods in rousing the official persecution of the thriving church. Nor was it easy for a Christian to prosper in his trade or business if he went out of his way to demonstrate his unsociability by refraining from membership of the appropriate guild, or participation in its activities. Since those activities included periodical feasts in the temple of the god or goddess whose patronage was traditionally acknowledged by the trade or calling concerned, what was the faithful Christian to do? Hence the activities of the "Nicolaitans," the "followers of Balaam," and of "Jezebel" of Thyatira, castigated by Jude, Peter and John. The simple functions and operations of trade and commerce may thus have proved a source of embarrassment, controversy and division in the early church.

III. Travel. Trade implied travel and many of the great journeys of the ancient world were made in the pursuit of commerce and remain unrecorded. Those who pioneered the trade routes from the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf to the Indus civilization and Ceylon must have been intrepid voyagers. The blazing of the "amber route" from Italy to the Baltic coast, the "incense routes" from Arabia Felix through Petra to Palestine, or the Phoenician seaways to Cornwall and the West African coast, not to mention the circumnavigation of the Continent, must have been by experienced and determined travelers. All this voyaging was in the interests of ultimate commercial gain. But there were other motives:

A. Colonization. Motivated first by the pressure of increasing population on the limited resources of the Greek homeland, Greek colonies spread round the coasts of the Mediterranean and Black Sea, unbroken save for the length of African littoral from the Gulf of Syrtis Major westwards. These colonies, like the "factories" of the East India Company were places of trade as well as of settlement, and the population often remained distinctive and apart from the natives of the area.

Communication was maintained between colony and metropolis and this intercourse was a major occasion of ancient travel. Motives similar to that which sent Abraham's steward to the homeland in search of a bride for Isaac, kept people moving over such routes of folk-migration.

B. Exploration. Curiosity and desire for knowledge have always been important objects for human wandering. Curiosity accounted for the journey of the Queen of Sheba to visit Solomon (I Kings 10), and if the Magi, as their gifts imply, also came from Arabia Felix, it was the same southeastern caravan route which, in a nobler curiosity, brought the Nativity visitors to Bethlehem. Curiosity, with historical ends in view, had been the travel-motive of the Greek Herodotus in the fifth century before Christ. His journeyings covered a wider area even than those of Paul. Exploration was organized by Hatshepsut around the Somali coast, by Alexander around Arabia, and by Nero up the Nile. Trade and conquest were the motives in mind. Less complex were the aims of the daring party from the Bay of Tripoli who, according to Herodotus (4.174), crossed the Sahara, discovered the pygmies, and first saw the Niger.

C. Migration. Great folk movements fill all ancient history from neolithic times onward, and the Bible mentions directly and indirectly, instances of such mass travel. Abraham left Ur by the northwestern caravan routes which followed the Fertile Crescent in a great curve up the Euphrates Valley and around into Canaan. The same route continued down the Jordan Valley and by the coast road into Egypt, or by way of the Arabah into the Sinai triangle or Egypt. It was along this southern route that Jacob's family journeyed on their various movements into and out of Egypt.

The nomad movements of the Israelites after the Egyptian captivity form a record of mass migration like the "folk-wanderings" of the Indo-European tribes which peopled Europe and determined the character of Iranian and Indian ethnology in the second millennium before Christ. When Abraham's tribe moved into Palestine, a colony from Crete was already established on "the Gaza Strip." After the fall of Crete at an undetermined date towards the close of the second millennium before Christ, this movement assumed much more massive shape. A sudden influx of refugees would account for the aggressive imperialism of the Philistines in the time of Saul and David. The movements of conquest and deportation might find a place under this head. It was a policy of Assyria, and of Babylon, its successor, to transfer large masses of subject populations and such travel, arduous and enforced though it was, occasioned much movement geographically. There was some freedom of intercourse between the deportees and those who remained behind, as might be illustrated both from the Books of Nehemiah and Ezra, and from the apocryphal Book of Tobit.

D. Pilgrimage. Religious centers like Jerusalem have always been an occasion of travel. The Gospels mention the annual influx from Galilee into Jerusalem, and the story of the Crucifixion speaks of one Simon from Cyrene in Libya, who was present in the Holy City as a pilgrim. Paul (Acts 20:16) was anxious to be in Jerusalem in time for Pentecost, and was prepared to travel from Greece for the purpose.

E. Preaching. The exigencies of preaching and teaching caused widespread travel in both Greek and Roman times, and this, of course, is most strikingly illustrated in the well-defined and admirably recorded journeys of Paul. The apostle was only one of many. It is traditionally believed that Thomas traveled to India, and a large Christian group in that sub-continent is traditionally believed to have descended from his original foundation. Apollos (Acts 18:24-28) had moved about, no doubt on teaching missions, between Alexandria, Corinth, and Ephesus. The Emperor Claudius, in a stern communication to the Jews of Alexandria, speaks of trouble-makers who had journeyed to the delta town by sea from Syria, and it is likely that this is the first reference in secular literature to the widespread missionary travels of early Christian preachers. Acts 11:19 and 28:15 similarly refer to such unrecorded travelers. It is likely that their journeys were very extensive. The tradition, for example, that Joseph of Arimathea traveled to Glastonbury in Britain, may not be history, but the story could have arisen only in a world which took for granted the widest and most distant traveling.

F. Business. Search of a livelihood, as distinct from the pursuance of trade, took thousands on long journeys in the ancient world. Juvenal, at the end of the first century, complains that the Orontes had long since flowed into the Tiber, that the city had become so cosmopolitan that native merit could find no place, and that the needy and the bad from the ends of the earth had sought refuge there. The inhabitants of the Roman ghetto were Jews whose business had brought them from Palestine and the many provincial centers of the Dispersion, and such uprooted groups were not necessarily static.

G. Service. There were Roman soldiers who had traveled the whole world, and the story of Paul's journey to Rome is an illustration of an official journey of a centurion with an armed escort, engaged on a long and highly responsible courier task. In OT times we find Abraham's steward undertaking a long journey at his master's express command, Tobit acting as Medish agent for the King of Assyria, and Nehemiah adroitly turning a cherished personal project into a royal commission with the travel privileges and facilities such a task conferred.

H. Exile. Moses' flight into Midian was an early instance of a journey undertaken to escape from justice, and more formal banishment was an accepted penalty in ancient penology. After the troubles in the ghetto, associated, if the Nazareth Decree is rightly interpreted, with the first Christian preaching in Rome, Claudius banished all the Jews of the capital (Acts 18:2), and Aquila and Priscilla are found in Corinth. It is interesting to note that Aquila had come originally from Pontus in Asia Minor.

Travel was not without its hazards, and Paul, in an eloquent passage (II Cor. 11:25-27) which finds confirmation in more than one ancient writer, speaks of the perils of road and seaway. Luke's superbly told story of the voyage and wreck of the Alexandrian grainship is further illustration. In NT times, however, travel was rather safer by land than it has been at most periods of history.

Roads were the great contribution of the Romans to Mediterranean civilization, and roads promoted the rapid movement of travelers, and contributed substantially to their safety by facilitating the rapid movement of troops and aiding pacification. The Persians had invented a swift postal system, but it was used mainly for official communications, and no engineering of any major importance was involved. Persia and Babylon relied upon the corvée and local labor for the opening of highways, and the imagery of Isaiah 40:3,4 is based on the call to such contributions of manpower. The Romans, on the other hand, formed and planned their roads, engineered them boldly, and for the most part paved them. Hence a major contribution to rapid travel. In NT times, in spite of the continuing dangers listed by Paul from his own experience, the roading system was speeding up travel, and the Roman Peace was quelling lawlessness.

Regular passenger services by land or sea were unknown, and there is no evidence that the pattern of procedure changed from OT times to New. "Jonah," the records runs (Jonah 1:3), "rose up to flee to Tarshish . . . and went down to Joppa and found a ship going to Tarshish. So he paid the fare thereof and went down into it to go with them to Tarshish." Nine centuries after the approximate date of Jonah's flight a similar record reads: "And we sailed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia and came to Myra a city of Lycia. And there the centurion found a ship of Alexandria sailing to Italy. And he put us therein" (Acts 27:5,6). Travelers evidently made their own arrangements, attached themselves to official parties, accompanied caravans, and coordinated their movements with those of trade and commerce.

The relative convenience of travel by land and sea cannot be estimated. In Claudius' communication to the Alexandrians it is expressly stated that the troublesome envoys who came from Syria came by sea. A perfectly good land route south from Palestine existed, for the Ethiopian eunuch of Queen Candace was using it and riding in a chariot. On the other hand, the centurion in charge of Paul disembarked his party at Puteoli and proceeded to Rome probably via the canal through the Pontine Marshes and certainly by the Via Appia, the route described by the poet Horace who negotiated it a century before. Why Paul decided (Acts 20:13) to go afoot across the base of Cape Lectum by the Roman road to Assos in Mysia is difficult to explain, unless it was because he sought privacy for meditation impossible aboard the crowded ship Discomfort must have been the common lot of travelers by sea. TRADE GUILDS or collegia, are first mentioned in The Acts of the Apostles, chapter 19, as a base of organized opposition to the Christian Church. These societies were not trade unions in the modern sense. Their functions were primarily social. Records exist of guilds of bakers, bankers, doctors, architects, producers of linen and woolen goods, dyers, workers in metal and stone, or clay, builders, carpenters, farmers, pastrycooks, barbers, embalmers, and transport workers. Their ramifications extended to such convivial groups as the "Late Sleepers" and "Late Drinkers" who left their record in the graffiti of Pompeii. "No other age," wrote Dill (Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius, pp. 267, 271) "felt a greater craving for some form of social life, greater than the family and narrower than the State" and the collegia satisfied the need of the humble for the pleasures of social intercourse, and the dignity of self-expression. It was the guild of the silversmiths and associated trades which, adroitly led, forced Paul to withdraw from Ephesus. It was, it appears, the guild of the butchers which precipitated the persecution of A.D. 112 in Bithynia (vid. s.v. Pliny). The guild banquets, with associated worship of the patron deity, and the compromising fellowship involved, were probably the problem of I Corinthians. The attempt of certain groups to work out a form of compromise, so essential to the social comfort, and indeed livelihood of many Christians, led to the strong reproaches of Jude, II Peter, and Revelation 2 and 3. TRADITION (trà-dĭ'shŭn, Gr. parádosis, a giving over, by word of mouth or in writing). This term does not occur in the Heb. OT. There are three types of tradition mentioned in the NT. First, the most common use, is the kind of tradition handed down by the Jewish fathers or elders which constituted the oral law, regarded by many of the Jews as of equal authority with the revealed law of Moses. Indeed, the Pharisees tended to make these traditions of even greater authority than the Scriptures (Matt. 15:2f; Mark 7:3f). The Pharisees were incensed at Christ because He disregarded their traditions and also permitted His disciples to do so. A classic example of their traditions is recorded in the Gospels (Matt. 15:2-6; Mark 7:1-13).

Paul refers to his former zeal for the traditions of his fathers (Gal. 1:14). Josephus says "that the Pharisees have delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from their fathers which are not written in the law of Moses" (Ant. XIII 10 6).

The second type of tradition is mentioned in Colossians 2:8. Some scholars hold that this verse refers to Judaistic heresies, but the emphasis seems to be upon the human, not necessarily Jewish, origin of these teachings.

The third type of tradition is the Gospel truths that the Apostle Paul taught. He uses the word three times (I Cor. 11:2 ASV [KJV "ordinances"]; II Thess. 2:15; 3:6). The meaning of this kind of tradition is "instruction." Paul had taught the believers in Corinth and Thessalonica the doctrines of the Gospel and he urged them to keep these instructions in mind. TRAIN. 1. Heb. hayil, army, a much used word which has the meaning of a train or retinue of a monarch, as in the case of the Queen of Sheba (I Kings 10:2).

2. Heb. shûl, skirt of a robe; this word, in regard to the Lord whom Isaiah saw in his vision, is best rendered "train," as it has been in our versions (Isa. 6:1).

3. Hānak, to train up, used in Proverbs 22:6 in regard to rearing a child.

4. Gr. sophronízo, to discipline, occurs once in the NT (Titus 2:4); translated in KJV "teach," changed in ASV to "train."

TRAJAN (trā'jăn). Marcus Ulpius Traianus held the principate from A.D. 98 to 117. Born in Spain in A.D. 53, Trajan was adopted by Nerva as his heir in A.D. 97, after a distinguished military career. The choice of the able and popular Spanish-born soldier was a wise one. Trajan began his principate by dealing firmly with the growing menace of the Roman garrison, the Praetorian Guard, and succeeded in conciliating the senatorial class, of whose loyalty and regard Pliny's fulsome Panegyric is a document. Trajan proved an able financial organizer and a vigorous builder. A large program of public works was financed largely from the loot of the Dacian war. The principate was marked by wide military activity on the Danube, the Parthian, and the African frontiers. During Trajan's principate, in fact, the Empire reached its widest extent, and stood confidently on frontiers held more firmly than ever before or after that time. Provincial administration was economical, strict, humane, and progressive. A volume of correspondence between Trajan and Pliny, who was governor of Bithynia just before his death, survives, and an interesting reply on the problem of the Christians in the province illustrates strikingly the desire of the emperor to combine firmness with humanity in his legislation (Pliny Ep. 10:79). Conscious of an imperial mission Trajan sought, as few other emperors did so urgently and sincerely, to found a rule of "Felicitas, Securitas, Aequitas, Justitia." He bore, no doubt, too heavy a personal burden, and decided too much from Rome, but the tradition he endeavored to found was a noble one, and shows the Empire at its best, not unconscious of a duty to mankind. E.M.B.

TRANCE (Gr. ékstasis, a throwing of the mind out of its normal state), a mental state in which the senses are partially or wholly suspended and the person is unconscious of his environment while he contemplates some extraordinary object. Peter describes a trance he had in which he saw a vision of unclean animals, and heard a voice bidding him kill and eat them because God had cleansed them (Acts 10:9-16). Paul relates how he fell into a trance while praying in the temple and saw the Lord telling him to leave Jerusalem and go to the Gentiles (Acts 22:17-21). There are other similar experiences recorded in the Scriptures which are not called trances but must have been such. Balaam, son of Beor, in his third and fourth prophecies said he saw the vision of the Almighty as he fell down with his eyes open (Num. 24:4,16). Isaiah saw a vision of the Lord's glory and heard Him call him to be His prophet (Isa. 6:1-13). Also, Ezekiel's visions (Ezek. 8-11; 40-48) must have been given in a trance. In the NT, John, on the island of Patmos, saw the vision of the revelation of Christ (Rev. 4-22). Probably in the case of every vision recorded in the Bible which came to a person while he was awake, that individual was in a trance during the time he beheld it. C.E.H.

TRANSFIGURATION, the name given to that singular event recorded in all the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 17:1-8; Mark 9:2-8; Luke 9:28-36) when Jesus was visibly glorified in the presence of three select disciples. The name is derived from the Latin term used to translate the Gr. metamorphóō, meaning "to change into another form." The accounts portray the transformation as outwardly visible and consisting in an actual physical change in the body of Jesus: "the fashion of his countenance was altered" (Luke 9:29), "his face did shine as the sun" (Matt. 17:2), while "his garments became glistening, exceeding white" (Mark 9:3), having a dazzling supernatural whiteness. The glory was not caused by the falling of a heavenly light upon Him from without but by the flashing forth of the radiant splendor within. He had passed into a higher state of existence, His body assuming properties of the resurrection body.

The place is simply identified as "a high mountain apart" (Mark 9:2). Tradition has identified it with Mt. Tabor, but because of its distance from Caesarea Philippi and the fortification on it at that time, a spur of Mt. Hermon seems more probable. Jebel Jermuk has also been suggested. It was witnessed by Peter, James, and John, and occurred while Jesus "was praying" (Luke 9:29). The natural simplicity of the accounts and their sober insistence upon its detailed features powerfully testify to the reality of the event. Its historical reality is attested by the Apostle Peter (II Pet. 1:16-18).

While recorded without interpretation, the uniform dating as being "after six days" (Matthew and Mark) or inclusively "about eight days after these sayings" (Luke), clearly sets the transfiguration in the context of the crucial events at Caesarea Philippi, Peter's confession and Christ's announcement of His coming death. The experience gave encouragement to Jesus setting His face to the cross. To the shocked disciples it confirmed the necessity of the cross through the conversation of the heavenly visitors about Christ's coming "decease" (Gr. exodus, Luke 9:31) as well as the divine endorsement upon Christ's teaching. It inseparably linked the suffering with the glory. It was the crowning with glory of the perfect human life of Jesus, God's stamp of approval upon His sinless humanity. The divine approval established His fitness to be our Sinbearer on the cross. It was also an entry for Jesus into the glory in which He would reign, thus constituting a typical manifestation of the King coming in His kingdom (Matt. 16:28). D.E.H.

TRANSGRESSION (trăns-grĕ'shŭn, Heb. pesha', rebellion, transgression; Gr. parábasis, transgression), the breaking of a law (Prov. 17:11; Rom. 4:15).

TRANSJORDAN, TRANS-JORDAN (trăns-jôr'dăn), a country included today in the Hashemite Kingdom of the Jordan, which is bordered on the W by Israel, on the N by Syria, on the E by Iraq, and on the S by Egypt and Saudi Arabia. In the OT there is no one name given to this area, though the expressions, "this side of the Jordan" and "the other side of the Jordan," appear frequently, their usage depending on the actual or idealized situation of the speaker. Various sections of Transjordan are called by national or ethnic names. The region is essentially a plateau, and ranges from about 2,000 to 3,000 feet in elevation. Opposite the N end of the Dead Sea, Mt. Nebo, from whose heights Moses viewed the Land of Promise (Deut. 34:1-3), rises to 2,664 feet.

Nelson Glueck made extensive surveys of the archeological sites of Transjordan; the results indicate flourishing civilizations at three main periods: (1) c. 2300-1900 B.C.; (2) c. 1200-700 B.C.; and

(3) c. 100 B.C.-A.D. 600 (Nabatean-Byzantine). Rich deposits of iron and copper have been found in the S (Deut. 8:9), and ancient mines and smelting furnaces have been discovered. E of the Jordan and in Edom to the S was a road the OT calls "the King's Highway," which probably marks the route taken by the eastern kings of Genesis 14. In Numbers 20:17 this road is mentioned as the passageway along which the Israelites requested permission of Edom to traverse its territory. The king of Edom denied this permission and Israel was forced to skirt the region. Edom was in the southern part, S of the Wadi el-Hesa (the brook Zered; see Num. 21:12; Deut. 5:13-14), with its capital at Sela ("the Rock" Petra). This region is also called Seir in the OT (see Deut. 2:4,22). It was here that the copper mines were found; at Ezion-Geber (Tell el-Kheleifeh) Glueck excavated the now-famous smelting center of Solomon. Solomon also used Ezion-Geber as a port (I Kings 9:26-28; II Chron. 8:17-18). Edom was important also because it controlled the trade routes between Arabia and Syria. The Nabateans developed a powerful kingdom (c. 100 B.C.-A.D. 100) with Petra as their capital; during NT times their dominion extended to Damascus (II Cor. 11:32).

Adjoining Edom on the N was Moab; at an earlier period Moab extended farther N, but at the time of the Exodus the Arnon River (Wadi el-Mojib) formed the boundary between Moab and the Amorites (Num. 21:13,26). It was to Moab that Elimelech and Naomi went during the famine in Judah (Ruth 1:1). It was also a place of refuge to which David took his parents while he was dodging Saul (I Sam. 22:3-4). The importance of Moab as a grazing land is indicated by II Kings 3:4; the Moabite view of the conflict between Israel and Mesha of Moab is given by the Moabite Stone, which was found at Dibon in 1868. Between the Arnon and Yarmuk Rivers was Gilead, which was the land of the Amorite king Sihon, whom the Israelites defeated (Num. 21:21-26; Deut. 2:26-37; Josh. 12:12, etc.). This territory was given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad (Deut. 3; Josh. 13). David fled to this region at the time of the rebellion of Absalom (II Sam. 17:22,24,26). A number of the cities of the Decapolis, a confederation of independent Hellenized cities, were located in this area. E of Gilead and the Jabbok River (Nahr ez-Zerka) was the country of the Ammonites, with their capital at Rabbath-Ammon. The northernmost division of Transjordan was Bashan, whose precise northern limits are not certain. Its Amorite king, Og, was also bested by the Israelites (Num. 21:23-35; Deut. 3:1-11; Josh. 12:4-5, etc.). Bashan was allotted to the one-half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. 3; Josh. 13). C.E.D.

TRANSLATE (trănsʹlāt, Heb. 'āvar, to transfer; Gr. metáthesis, a transfer, methístemi, to remove from one place to another). The Hebrew word is rendered once as "translate," "to translate the kingdom from the house of Saul" (II Sam. 3:10 KJV, ASV has "transfer"). The Greek words occur in Hebrews 11:5, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him: for he hath had witness borne to him that before his translation he had been well pleasing to God" ASV. Methístemi is also found in Colossians 1:13 where the believer is described as passing from the kingdom of darkness into that of light.

TRANSPORTATION (See Trade and Travel)

TRAVAIL (trăvʹāl). In the OT the word yalādh, to bear a child, is used a few times for literal travail (Gen. 35:16; 38:27; I Sam. 4:19), and many times figuratively. Also figuratively for toil or trouble hûl, anguish (Isa. 23:4; 54:1; 66:7,8); hālâh, to be weak or sick (Jer. 4:31); 'āmāl, toil (Eccl. 4:4,6; Isa. 53:11); 'invan, occupation, task only in Ecclesiastes (1:13; 2:23,26; 3:10; 4:8; 5:14); hābal, writhe, twist (Ps. 7:14; S. of Sol. 8:5 ASV); telā'âh, weariness, hardship (Exod. 18:8; Num. 20:14; Lam. 3:5).

In the NT the following words occur: odíno (Rev. 12:2) of a figurative woman; (Gal. 4:19,27) sense of care and concern; odín (Matt. 24:8 and Mark 13:8 ASV; Acts 2:24, pains or pangs; I Thess. 5:3); syndíno (Rom. 8:22); tíkto, bring forth a child (John 16:21); móchthos, hard labor, toil (II Cor. 11:27 ASV; I Thess. 2:9; II Thess. 3:8).

TRAVEL (See Trade and Travel)

TREASURE, a word that signifies a collection of objects of value, including stores of provisions (e.g. Jer. 41:8, where RSV renders "stores"). See Ezekiel 28:4, and Daniel 11:43. In Job 38:22 and Psalm 135:7 the word rendered "treasures" in the former case (KJV), and "treasuries" in the latter, appears correctly as "storehouses" in RSV. The "treasure cities" of Exodus 1:11 were arsenals and depots for provisions (cf. Gen. 41:48,56). A similar confusion between the precious store, and the place of its storing, occurs in the NT. For example Matthew 2:11 and 19:21 refer to the store of precious things, but Matthew 12:35 obviously to the storehouse. In Acts 8:27 both notions are incorporated. The word gáza' is a Persian word, and is used only in this place in the NT. In Matthew 27:6 the word is Hebrew. They cannot put the polluted silver into the korbanas, the sacred treasury, into which the corban gifts were paid. This seems to be distinguished from the gazophylákion, the "treasury" of the temple, into which general offerings were cast (Mark 12:41; Luke 21:1). This was simply a collection-box. John 8:20 means that Jesus was teaching in the colonnade, where boxes were placed for the convenient reception of gifts. The metaphorical meaning of treasure is a more common figure of speech in the OT than in the NT (Exod. 19:5; Deut. 28:12; Ps. 17:14; Matt. 13:44; Luke 12:21; II Cor. 4:7). The last reference is to practices such as those illustrated by the Dead Sea Scrolls, the preservation of precious possessions in earthenware jars, sealed for safety.

TREASURER (See Occupations and Professions)

TREE (Heb. 'ēts, tree, wood; Gr. déndron, tree, xýlon, timber, wood, tree). Palestine in ancient times must have been extensively wooded as there are over 300 references to trees and wood in the Bible. Also over 25 different kinds of trees have been identified as having grown in the Holy Land. Most of the wooded areas in Palestine have been cut down.

Trees identified with holy places were permitted to flourish. Trees were venerated by heathen people who believed gods inhabited them. Sacrifices were often offered under trees (Deut. 12:2; I Kings 14:23, etc.). The Hebrews were forbidden to plant a tree near a sacred altar (Deut. 16:21). Trees identified places (Gen. 12:6; Deut. 11:30, etc.; "plain" KJV, "oak" ASV). Tree limbs were used in celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev. 23:40). Jesus used the fruit bearing of trees as an illustration of believers' fruit bearing (Matt. 7:16-19). See PLANTS. C.E.H.

TREE OF KNOWLEDGE, a special tree in the garden of Eden, set apart by the Lord as an instrument to test the obedience of Adam and Eve (Gen. 2:9,17). It must have been a real tree since the test was real, by real people, and with real results. Its fruit probably was not much different from that of the other trees from which they ate. The sin in eating its fruit did not lie in the tree but in the disobedience of the persons who ate.

The phrase "to know good and evil" is used in other places: infants do not know good and evil (Deut. 1:39); nor does an old man of failing mind (II Sam. 19:35); but a king does know good and evil (I Kings 3:9); as do angels (II Sam. 14:17) and God Himself (Gen. 3:5,22). C.E.H.

TREE OF LIFE, was another special tree in the garden of Eden, (Gen. 2:9; 3:22). This tree appears again in Revelation 22:2 as a fruit-bearing tree with leaves. It will have healing in its leaves (Rev. 22:2). The phrase "tree of life" in Proverbs 3:18; 11:30; 13:12; 15:4 is figurative for an exhilarating experience.

TRENCH, the rendering in KJV of two Hebrew words hēl and ma'gāl, translated "trench" (II Sam. 20:15; I Sam. 26:5,7; 17:20), but which mean "rampart" and "intrenchment"; ASV has "the place of the wagons" for ma'gāl. A third word te'ālâh, trench, occurs in I Kings 18:32,35,38; a Greek word chárax, palisade, occurs in Luke 19:43.

TRESPASS (trĕs'păs, Heb. 'ashām, Gr. paráptoma), the violation of the rights of others, whether of God or of man. In Jewish law, acknowledged violation of a man's rights required restoration, plus one-fifth of the amount or value of the thing involved, and the presentation of a trespass offering. Unintentional trespass against God, when the guilty person became aware of it, required a trespass offering to remove guilt. Trespasses against us must be forgiven by us because God has forgiven our trespasses.

TRIAL OF JESUS, the tumultuous proceedings before the Jewish and Roman authorities resulting in His crucifixion. All four Gospels record at least part of the twofold trial (Matt. 26:57-27:31; Mark 14:53-15:20; Luke 22:54-23:25; John 18:12-19:16), but because of the brief and selective nature of their narratives the precise chronological order of events is not always certain. It is clear that both parts of the trial were marked by great irregularities, but the Gospel writers never assert that this or that in the trial was illegal, for they wrote not as lawyers but as witnesses.

Following His arrest in Gethsemane, Jesus was at once taken before the Jewish authorities in Jerusalem. John alone tells us that He was first brought before the ex-high priest Annas, who conducted a preliminary examination by questioning Jesus about His disciples and teaching. With dignity Jesus reminded him of its illegality, only to be basely struck by an attendant (18:12-14, 19-23). Meanwhile the Sanhedrin members had assembled in the palace of Caiaphas, the president of the Sanhedrin, for an illegal night session. To them Annas sent Jesus in fetters (John 18:24 ASV). The attempt to convict Jesus through false witnesses collected and instructed by the Sanhedrin failed because of their contradictory testimony (Matt. 26:59-61; Mark 14:55-59). Before their charges Jesus maintained a dignified silence, even when blustering Caiaphas demanded an answer (Matt. 26:62), thus denying the validity of the process. Aware that their case had collapsed, Caiaphas brushed aside the witnesses and put Jesus under oath to tell the court "whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God" (Matt. 26:63). The answer, in forced self-incrimination, was used to condemn Jesus for blasphemy (Matt. 26:64-66; Mark 14:61-64). The session broke up in disorder, with indignities being heaped upon Jesus (Matt. 26:67-68; Mark 14:65; Luke 22:63-65). After dawn the Sanhedrin assembled in its council chamber and re-enacted a pretense at a trial by questioning Jesus on His messianic claims and deity (Luke 22:66-71). This meeting was held to give a semblance of legality to the condemnation.

Since the Romans had deprived the Sanhedrin of the power of capital punishment, it was necessary to secure a confirmatory death-sentence from the Roman governor, who found it expedient to be in Jerusalem during the Passover seasons. Accordingly "the whole company" (Luke 23:1) in formal procession brought Jesus, bound, to Pilate. When asked their charges, they indicated that they wanted him simply to sanction their condemnation of Jesus without a full trial (John 18:29-32). Upon Pilate's insistence three charges were advanced (Luke 23:2). The charge of treason alone Pilate deemed worthy of investigation. When Jesus explained to him the nature of His kingdom, Pilate concluded that Jesus was harmless and announced a verdict of acquittal (John 18:33-38). This verdict should have ended the trial, but it only evoked a torrent of further charges against Jesus by the Jews, charges which Jesus refused to answer to Pilate's surprise (Matt. 27:12-14). Having learned that He was a Galilean, Pilate decided to be rid of the unpleasant task by sending Jesus to Herod Antipas, also present for the Passover, on the plea that He belonged to Herod's jurisdiction. When Jesus refused to amuse Herod with a miracle, maintaining complete silence toward him, Herod mocked Him and returned Him to Pilate uncondemned (Luke 23:2-12).

With the return of Jesus, Pilate realized that he must handle the case. Summoning the chief priests "and the people," he reviewed the case to prove the innocence of Jesus but weakly proposed a compromise by offering to scourge Jesus before releasing Him (Luke 23:13-16). When the multitude requested the customary release of one prisoner (Mark 15:8), Pilate offered them the choice between the notorious Barabbas and Jesus (Matt. 27:17). He hoped that the crowd would choose Jesus, thus overruling the chief priests. Before the vote was taken Pilate received an impressive warning from his wife (Matt. 27:19-21). Meanwhile the Jewish leaders persuaded the people to vote for Barabbas. When asked their choice the people shouted for Barabbas, demanding that Jesus be crucified (Matt. 27:20-21; Luke 23:18-19). Further remonstrance by Pilate proved useless (Luke 23:20-22).

According to John's Gospel, as a last resort to avoid His crucifixion, Pilate had Jesus scourged, allowing the soldiers to stage a mock coronation, and then brought out the pathetic figure before the people, hoping that the punishment would satisfy them. It only intensified their shouts for His crucifixion (19:1-6). A new charge, that Jesus made Himself the Son of God, aroused the superstitious fears of Pilate, causing further futile efforts to release Him (19:7-12). Using their last weapon, the Jewish leaders threatened to report Pilate to Caesar if he released Jesus (19:12). This threat, because of Pilate's grievous maladministration, broke all further resistance in the vacillating governor. To his last appeal whether he should crucify their king, the Jews gave the blasphemous answer that they had no king but Caesar (19:15). When Pilate sought to absolve himself of the guilt of Christ's death by publicly washing his hands, the people voluntarily accepted the responsibility (Matt. 27:24-26). Keenly conscious of the gross miscarriage of justice, Pilate yielded by releasing Barabbas and sentencing Jesus to the cross. See CHRIST, JESUS. D.E.H.

TRIBE, TRIBES (Heb. matteh, rod, staff, tribe; shēvĕt, rod, scepter, tribe; Gr. phylé, tribe). With two exceptions (Isa. 19:13; Matt. 24:30) these words always denote the tribes of Israel. A tribal group comprised all the individuals descended from the same ancestor. In the case of the Hebrews, each tribe was made up of all the persons descended from one of the sons of the patriarch Jacob. The clan was composed of kinsmen on the father's side. The leaders of the tribes are called "princes" or rulers (Exod. 34:31), heads (Num. 1:16), or chiefs (Gen. 36:15ff).

The 12 tribes of Israel (the name of Jacob [Gen. 32:28]) were first mentioned by Jacob in prophecy (Gen. 49:16,28). While the Hebrews were in Egypt they were grouped according to their fathers' houses (Exod. 6:14). After they left Egypt the whole company was conceived of as the 12 tribes of Israel (Exod. 24:4). The 12 sons of Jacob were Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Zebulun, Issachar, Dan, Gad, Asher, Naphtali, Joseph, and Benjamin. Although they all had a common father, they had four mothers, Leah and Rachel, who were full wives, and Bilhah and Zilpah, who were concubines. The tribes were called by these names. On the breastplate of the high priest were 12 precious stones arranged in four rows; each stone had the name of a tribe engraved on it (Exod. 28:21,29; 39:14).

When the Israelites were numbered to find out the number of the men of war in each group, the tribe of Levi was left out of this census because the Lord selected them to take care of the keeping and transporting of the tabernacle and its furniture (Num. 1). The whole encampment of Israelites at Sinai was organized and each tribe assigned its place in which to march and to camp (Num. 2).

The leadership of Judah among the tribes was prophesied by Jacob (Gen. 49:10), and this tribe was assigned first place in the order of marching (Num. 2:3; 10:14). Judah also was the first tribe to offer an oblation after the setting up of the tabernacle (Num. 7:12).

The withdrawal of the Levites from the group of tribes left 11 of them. In the list of leaders from each tribe who were to take the census, the children of Joseph are represented as divided between the tribe of Ephraim, and the tribe of Manasseh (Num. 1:10).

Before the Israelites entered the Promised Land two tribes, Reuben and Gad, and half of Manasseh chose to settle on the E side of the Jordan (Num. 32:33). After the land of Canaan was subdued, the land was divided among the nine and a half tribes (Josh. chaps. 15-19). Judah was given the first lot, and received the largest area of territory (Josh. 15:1-62). The tribe of Simeon was assigned territory within Judah (Josh. 19:1). Judah had all the land W of the Dead Sea and S to Kadesh-barnea. N of her were Dan and Benjamin. Ephraim was next to them, Manasseh (half tribe) was next; then Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali and Asher were situated N of the valley of Jezreel E of the Sea of Galilee and extended northward to the Lebanon Mountains. Part of the tribe of Dan went N and seized some territory just S of Mount Hermon, thus being the farthest N of all Israelites (Judg. chap. 18).

During the period of the Judges in Israel the tribes were each one a law unto themselves. The Judges' leadership was sectional. When David became king over the whole land the 12 tribes were unified. Jerusalem was conquered and made the capital of the country. There Solomon built the temple. The Lord chose this city as the one place out of all the tribes of Israel where He would put His name (II Chron. 12:13). David appointed a captain over each tribe (I Chron. 27:16-22). He also took a census of the tribes (II Sam. 24:2). Later, when Elijah, in the contest with the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel, built an altar, he used 12 stones to represent the 12 tribes of Israel (I Kings 18:31).

The unity of the tribes had a tendency to be disrupted into two factions. After the death of Saul, David reigned over only Judah at first (II Sam. 2:4), and did not become king of all the tribes until later (II Sam. 5:3). After the death of Solomon this same division occurred again, Judah and Benjamin became one nation, the kingdom of Judah, and all the area N of them became another nation, the kingdom of Israel (I Kings 12:20). This division continued until both kingdoms went into captivity, Israel in 721 B.C. to Assyria and Judah in 586 B.C. to Babylon. These catastrophes wiped out tribal distinctions. The tribes are not mentioned by name again except in the devotional literature of the Psalms and in prophecy.

Jesus says that the apostles of Christ will sit on 12 thrones judging the 12 tribes of Israel (Matt. 19:28; Luke 22:30). The holy city, the New Jerusalem, will have 12 gates, each bearing the name of one of the tribes of Israel (Rev. 21:21).

TRIBULATION, GREAT TRIBULATION (trĭb-ū-lā'shŭn, Heb. tsar, narrow; Gr. thlípsis, pressure). The Hebrew word has a large variety of meanings in the OT, but usually refers to trouble of a general sort (Job 28:33; Ps. 13:4). Likewise the Greek word refers to tribulation of a general sort (Matt. 13:21; John 16:33). Sometimes this suffering is just the natural part of one's life (Rom. 12:12; James 1:27), while at other times it is looked upon as a definite punishment or chastening from the Lord for misbehavior (Rom. 2:9).

The Great Tribulation is a definite period of suffering sent from God upon the earth to accomplish several purposes. According to premillennial eschatology it precedes the millennial reign of Christ. Postmillennial theology places it at the end of the thousand-year reign of Christ. Amillennial theology places it just before the new heavens and the new earth are brought in. This period of suffering will be unlike any other period in the past or future (Dan. 12:1; Matt. 24:21). H.Z.C.

TRIBUTE (Heb. mas, forced laborers; middâh, tribute, toll; Gr. kénsos, tax, census; phóros, tax, burden). The Heb. word mas is incorrectly rendered "tribute," since it means "forced laborers, labor gang." Solomon had a force of taskworkers consisting of 30,000 men, raised by levy upon the people (I Kings 5:13; 9:15,21). David had had a labor gang too (I Kings 4:6; 5:13). Conquered populations were often compelled to render forced labor (Deut. 20:11; Josh. 16:10). In NT times the kénsos was an annual tax levied on persons, houses, or lands paid to a prince or civil governor on behalf of the Roman treasury. The phóros was a tax paid by agriculturists. Customs (téle) were collected by the publicans.

TRINITY. The Biblical doctrine of the Trinity is most distinctly expressed in the words of Christ in the "Great Commission" (Matt. 28:18-20), ". . . baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost . . ." There are many other clear indications of the Trinity. See, for example, the apostolic benediction (II Cor. 13:14). The doctrinal formalization of the Biblical data on the Trinity is satisfactorily worded in the Westminster Shorter Catechism, questions 5 and 6: " 'Are there more Gods than one?' There is but one only, the living and true God. 'How many persons are there in the Godhead?' There are three persons in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; and these three are one God, the same in substance, equal in power and glory."

It is important to realize that the doctrine of the Trinity has not been given to the Church by speculative thought. It is not an a priori concept, nor in any sense derived from "pure reason." This doctrine has come from the data of historical revelation. In the process of history God has revealed Himself as one God, subsisting in three Persons. God as revealed in the Bible is not a simple undifferentiated Subject; but His being is in three objectively distinguished Subjects.

The unity of the Godhead is unanimously attested throughout the entire range of the Judeo-Christian sources (cf. Deut. 6:4,5; Isa. 44:6-8; 45:21-23; I Cor. 8:5,6).

That the being of God is complex, in the sense of objectively distinguished Subjects, is a basic presupposition of many OT passages. Psalm 110:1, "Jehovah saith unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand until I make thine enemies thy footstool." See the comment of Jesus on this verse (Matt. 22:41-45 and parallels in Mark and Luke). See also Hebrews 1:13; 10:12,13. For other OT passages implying personal distinctions in the Godhead see Warfield, Biblical Doctrines, pp. 139ff and other standard extended works on the Trinity, especially Charles Hodge, Systematic Theology Vol. I, Chapters VII and VIII.

That the Jewish mind in NT times saw no problem in the personal distinctions in the being of God is a remarkable fact. It was the idea of God in the flesh to which they objected. "Thou, being a man, makest thyself God" (John 10:33). They sought to kill him because He, a man, "called God his own Father, making himself equal with God" (John 5:18).

That the concept "Son of God," meaning "equal with God," was well defined in the Jewish mind was doubtless due to such OT passages as Psalm 2:6,7. Never did the NT Christians have to meet the objection that there could not be a Son of God equal with God. What Christ and the NT Christians had to meet was the thought that the Son of God could not humble Himself to become a man. This is the argument which Jesus meets in John 10:34-36. He quotes Psalm 82:6 to show that, since man is made in the image of God, the nature of man and the nature of God are not contradictory. The claim that He is the Son of God might be true; it is not necessarily blasphemy. Then He appeals to the evidence (vss. 37, 38) to show that His claim is true.

When the NT Christians apply to Jesus OT passages which relate to Jehovah (Rom. 10:13 quoting Joel 2:32; Rom. 14:10,11 quoting Isa. 45:23), they reflect the OT presupposition that the Messiah would be Jehovah, sent by Jehovah (Jer. 23:5,6; 33:14-16), and they show no awareness of controversy on this latter point. It was not the Jewish mind of the first century which stumbled at the personal distinctions in the Godhead.

The personal deity of the Holy Spirit seems to have been assumed in the horizons of NT Christianity without the least opposition. There was no obstacle to this assumption such as the humiliation of Jesus was to the acceptance of His deity. The Holy Spirit of God, sent forth by God, is frequently referred to in the OT (Ps. 51:11; Isa. 63:10,11; Hag. 2:5. Cf. W. H. Griffith Thomas The Holy Spirit of God, Ch. II). The uncontroverted assumption of the personal deity of the Holy Spirit is illustrated in Peter's words addressed to Ananias, "Why hath Satan filled thy heart to lie to the Holy Spirit . . . Thou has not lied unto men but unto God" (Acts 5:3,4).

That the persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are not merely modes of one Person, as Sabellians hold, is evidenced by the prayer life of Jesus (cf. John 17) in which He speaks objectively to the Father; by the Father's witness to the Son (Mark 1:11; 8:7 and parallels; John 12:28,29); and by numerous objective references to the Holy Spirit (John 15:26; 16:7-15).

The data of revelation, then, established in the minds of NT Christians four convictions: 1. God is One. 2. Jesus is God. 3. The Holy Spirit is God. 4. The three Persons are Subject and Object, "I and Thou," each to the others.

With these convictions well attested by the early apologists and church fathers, the council of Nicea, 325 A.D., brought the Biblical data to focus in a doctrinal expression to which Bible-believing Christians have rather consistently adhered.

Spiritual and philosophical values in the doctrine can only be mentioned. 1. Only in terms of the Trinity, including infinite Subject-Object relationships, can we conceive of the eternal existence of God before the creation of the finite universe. 2. Only in terms of the Trinity can we conceive of God's redemptive program: The Father gave the Son (John 3:16); the Son gave Himself (Gal. 2:20); "through the eternal Spirit" He "offered Himself" (Heb. 9:14). 3. The revelation of the Eternal Son illuminates our finite sonship in the "household" of God (Rom. 8:16,29; I John 3:1,2; 17:21,22). J.O.B.

TRIUMPH (Gr. thriambeúo, to lead in triumph). In the OT the eight Heb. words for triumph all are used with reference to God — in praise and prayer to or in discussion concerning God. Paul uses the word twice in his epistles (II Cor. 2:14; Col. 2:15). In Roman times a triumph was a magnificent procession in honor of a victorious general, the highest military honor he could obtain. He entered the city in a chariot, preceded by the senate and magistrates, musicians, the spoils of his victory, and the captives in chains. Sacrifices were made to Jupiter and incense burned by the priests. It was undoubtedly such a triumphal procession that Paul had in mind when he wrote, "thanks be unto God, who always leadeth us to triumph in Christ" (II Cor. 2:14).

TROAS (trō'ăs, Gr. Troás), a name applied both to a region and a city. 1. The region is the NW corner of Asia Minor, in the district of Mysia, and the Roman province of Asia, fronting the Aegean and the entrance to the Dardanelles, and backed by the Ida massif. In the Troad or Troas, Alexander first defeated the Persians, in the Battle of the Granicus, repeating in recorded history the earlier clash of E and W in the Greek siege of Troy.

2. The city was Alexandria Troas, some ten miles from the ruins of ancient Troy at Hissarlik, and founded by Lysimachus in 300 B.C. on the site of the earlier Antigoneia. Troas was a Roman colony in Augustus' day, and one of the most important cities of NW Asia. It was a port of call on the trade-route between Macedonia and Asia (Acts 16:8; 20:5; II Cor. 2:12). Considerable ruins remain. E.M.B.

TROGYLLIUM (trō-jĭl'ĭ-ŭm, Gr. Trogýllion). The phrase in which Trogyllium is mentioned in Acts 20:15 is the occasion of some textual difficulty, but there is no geographical objection to its retention. (W. M. Ramsay discusses the question in his Church in the Roman Empire, p. 155). Trogyllium is a slender promontory thrusting SW from the Asian mainland N of Miletus, and overlapping the eastern extension of Samos. The narrow strait forms a protected roadstead in which a small coasting vessel would naturally await suitable wind conditions on the last lap to Miletus.

TROPHIMUS (trŏf'ĭ-mŭs, Gr. Tróphimos, nourishing), a Gentile Christian of Ephesus (Acts 21:29) and companion of Paul. He was one of the companions-in-travel, apparently the chosen delegates of the churches to bear the collection (II Cor. 8:19ff), mentioned in Acts 20:4. In Jerusalem he was the innocent cause of the tumult resulting in Paul's imprisonment when hostile Asian Jews hastily supposed that Paul had illegally introduced him into the temple itself (Acts 21:29). He is conjectured to be one of the two brethren sent to Corinth with Titus to complete the collection (II Cor. 8:18-22). Shortly before his final Roman imprisonment Paul left Trophimus sick at Miletus (II Tim. 4:20).

TRUTH. The word "truth," alétheia in the NT, and a variety of words, chiefly 'emeth in the OT, always connotes (1) the interrelated consistency of statements and their correspondence with the facts of reality, and (2) the facts themselves. The former may be called propositional truth, and the latter, ontological truth.

The Biblical usage of the word has rich suggestive meanings which go beyond the literal connotations. When Moses (Exod. 18:21) refers to "able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness," there is suggested an integration of character, and adherence of virtue, a kind of reliability, which includes and goes beyond the literal meaning to include those aspects of personal behavior which seem to be implied by the love of truth. The concept of truth is assumed to be derived from the character of God, and is the exact opposite of the concept of lying. "It is impossible for God to lie" (Heb. 6:18. Cf. Titus 1:2; II Tim. 2:13).

Jesus prayed, "Sanctify them in thy truth; thy word is truth" (John 17:17). And He promised, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free" (John 8:31b,32). In such sayings, "the truth" means the most important truth, that is, the Gospel of the grace of God.

Perhaps the saddest scene in the Bible (John 18:37,38) is that in which Pilate asks Jesus, "What is truth?" and does not even wait for an answer. Jesus had just said, "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Everyone that is of the truth heareth my voice." Jesus' words refer not merely to truth, but to the truth. Pilate's question omits the article, and expresses skepticism, not merely as to the Gospel, but as to the very concept of truth.

The Gospel invitation to "believe" is always based upon the assumption that the evidence is sufficient, and that it is a moral question whether one will accept the grace of God in Christ. Those who disbelieve the Gospel are morally reprehensible in the sight of God (John 3:18,19,36; II Thess. 2:10-12). Christ is the truth, as the sun is the light. Those who turn away from Christ, it is assumed, do so wilfully, and culpably. J.O.B.

TRYPHENA (trī-fē'nà, Gr. Trýphaina, dainty), a Christian woman who lived in Rome and was known to Paul. He asked the Roman believers to greet her and Tryphosa, her close relative (Rom. 16:12). This name has been found on inscriptions of name plates in the burial places of the servants of the royal household of Rome from the time of Paul.

TRYPHOSA (See Tryphena)

TUBAL (tū'-bàl, Heb. tûval), a tribe descended from Japheth (Gen. 10:2). It is mentioned with Javan (Isa. 66:19) as trading in the markets of Tyre. The Libareni or Libarenoi of the classical writers are the descendants of Tubal.

TYCHICUS (tĭk'ĭ-kŭs, Gr. Týchikos, fortuitous), an Asian Christian and close friend and valued helper of Paul. First mentioned in Acts 20:4, he is described as being "of Asia," perhaps a native of Ephesus. As one of the delegates chosen by the churches to bear the collection (II Cor. 8:19ff), he apparently went all the way to Jerusalem with Paul. He was with Paul during the first Roman imprisonment and carried the letters to the Ephesians (Eph. 6:21) and the Colossians (Col. 4:7-9), being delegated to report to them concerning Paul. Onesimus, returning to his master, accompanied him (Col. 4:7-9; Philem.). Paul told Titus that he would send either Artemas or Tychicus to replace him for the difficult work on Crete (Titus 3:12). Tychicus was with Paul during his second Roman imprisonment and was sent to Ephesus by him (II Tim. 4:12), perhaps as bearer of the letter to replace Timothy. Tychicus was a man distinguished for integrity and fidelity; he held the affection and confidence of Paul as an able worker in the service of Christ (Col. 4:7). D.E.H.

TYRANNUS (tī-răn'ŭs, Gr. Týrannos, tyrant). According to the commonly accepted text of Acts 19:9, Paul, at Ephesus, taught in the afternoon in "the school of a certain Tyrannus," which, since instruction was commonly given in the morning (Martial 9:68; 12:57; Juv. 7:222-6), would be vacant for his use later in the day. If this reading is correct, Tyrannus was a living Ephesian schoolmaster. If another well-supported reading is followed, the text would run, "in the school of Tyrannus." This could indicate a public building traditionally named thus, or a school founded by Tyrannus. The name was common enough. W. M. Ramsay discusses the question in The Church in the Roman Empire, p. 152 and St. Paul the Traveller and Roman Citizen, p. 271.

TYRE (tīr, Heb. tsôr, a rock, Gr. Týros), a Phoenician port S of Sidon and N of Carmel. Phoenicia itself is a coastal strip backed by mountains, and Tyre was further defended by rocky promontories (one of them the famous "Ladder of Tyre"), which effectively hampered invasion. Herodotus dates the foundation as early as 2740 B.C.; Josephus, as late as 1217 B.C. Isaiah (23:2,12) implies that Tyre was a colony of Sidon, and Homer's mention of "Sidonian wares," without reference to Tyre, seems to confirm the greater antiquity of the former city. The Tell-el-Amarna letters, apparently refuting Josephus' date, contain an appeal from the ruler of Tyre, dated 1430 B.C., imploring help from Amenhotep IV against the invading Habiri. Joshua assigned Tyre to Asher, but in all probability the city was not occupied (Josh. 19:29; II Sam. 24:7).

An obscure period of some four centuries follows, from which the record emerges with the name of Hiram, friend of David. This able monarch seems to have rebuilt and fortified Tyre, taking within its ambit nearby islands, and providing the city with two harbors. The trade of Tyre at this time included the exploitation of the cedar forests of the Lebanon range. "Tyrian purple," the product of the murex shellfish, was also a famous export. The cedar forests also provided material for the famous Phoenician galleys, and, accepting the challenge of the sea which was the one road to wealth for the narrow little land, the Tyrians, like the rest of their kinsfolk, ranged far and wide in quest of the precious shellfish, and the metals in which they traded. The copper of Cyprus, the silver of Spain, and the tin of Cornwall, were carried in Tyrian ships. Under Solomon, who inherited the partnership with Hiram, the Hebrews participated in Tyrian commerce, provided a southern port at Ezion-geber on the gulf of Akaba, and shared the trade with Ophir and the East. It was probably the loss of this southern outlet to the Red Sea and the East which stimulated the Tyrian exploration of the coast of Africa, and led ultimately to the circumnavigation of the continent. Dynastic troubles followed Hiram's death. One Ethbaal emerged victorious after the assassination of his brother. It was Ethbaal's daughter Jezebel who became Ahab's notorious queen (I Kings 16:31). Renewed troubles after Ethbaal's death led to the emigration of Elissa, the Dido of Vergil's Aeneid IV, and to the foundation of Carthage.

During the 200 years of Assyrian aggression, Tyre suffered with the rest of the Middle East, but owing to the strength of her position and her sea-power, maintained a measure of independence over much of the troubled era. She broke free from Nineveh a generation before that last stronghold of the Assyrians fell (606 B.C.). These years were the greatest years of Tyrian glory. Ezekiel's account (27,28), set though it is in a context of denunciation and prophecy of ruin, gives a vivid picture of the power and wealth of the great trading port. Ruin came. Babylon succeeded Assyria, and although Tyre seems successfully to have resisted the long siege of Nebuchadnezzar, the strain of her resistance to Babylon, and the damage to her commerce, brought the city to poverty. She fell into the power of Egypt briefly, and then became a dependency of Babylon, a status she held until Babylon fell to Persia. Persia inherited Babylon's rule. We read of an order of Cyrus II to Tyre to supply cedar for the restoration of the temple in Jerusalem (Ezra 3:7). Cambyses II conscripted a Tyrian fleet against Egypt, and Tyrian ships fought on the Persian side against the Greeks at Salamis. In 332 B.C., in the course of his conquest of the East, Alexander appeared before Tyre. The island stronghold closed her gates, and Alexander was forced to build a causeway, and after long months of frustration and vast penetration, take the city by costly storming. Tyre was broken, and the causeway still remains, a place, as Ezekiel foretold, on which fishermen might dry their nets (26:5,14; 47:10). Tyre made a measure of political recovery, and for a period functioned as a republic. She struck an early treaty with Rome, and her independence was respected until 20 B.C. when Augustus withdrew it. Remaining history is without significance. E.M.B.

UCAL (ū'kăl, Heb. 'ūkhāl), a word of uncertain meaning found in Proverbs 30:1, regarded as a proper noun by many interpreters. If this is the correct interpretation, it is the name of one of two men to whom Augur addresses his proverbs. Others regard the word as a verb, and render it "I am faint."

UEL (ū'ĕl, Heb. 'û'ēl, will of God), one of Bani's sons whom Ezra mentions as having taken foreign wives (Ezra 10:34).

UGARIT (ū'gà-rĭt), a word not found in the Bible but closely related to its history. It is the name of an ancient city on the North Syrian coast, 40 miles SW of Antioch; also called Ras Shamra. It was a great commercial and religious center. It was founded in the Early Bronze period and was destroyed about 1200 B.C. It was discovered by chance in 1928 and considered one of the great archeological finds of the 20th century. The excavations took place between 1929 and 1939, resulting in the discovery of many objects of great archeological value, including hundreds of tablets known as "The Ras Shamra Tablets." The contributions from this city are unusually important for several reasons. First, they forever silence the old argument that Moses could not have written the Pentateuch because writing was unknown at such an early period. Then too, since they date from the 15th and 14th centuries B.C., they throw a flood of light on the culture and religion of this period. The moral depravity of the Canaanites which these tablets reveal confirms the justice of God in commanding the Israelites to obliterate these cults of Canaan. H.Z.C.

UKNAZ (ŭk'năz, Heb. ûqenaz), Jephunneh's son (I Chron. 4:15). KJV has "even Kenaz"; RV has "and Kenaz." The text is probably corrupt.

ULAI (ū'lī, Heb. 'ûlāy, meaning uncertain), a river which Daniel mentions twice (8:2,16). It ran through the province of Elam, and flowed through Susa.

ULAM (ū'lăm, Heb. 'ûlām). 1. A son of Sheresh from the tribe of Manasseh (I Chron. 7:16,17).

2. A descendant of the Benjamite, Eshek. His two illustrious sons were known as "mighty men of valor" (I Chron. 8:39-40).

ULLA (ŭ'lȧ, Heb. 'ullā', meaning unknown), one of Asher's descendants who became the father of three distinguished men of the tribe (I Chron. 7: 39).

UMMAH (ŭm'ȧ, Heb. 'ummâh, association), one of the cities belonging to the tribe of Asher (Josh. 19:30). Unless it is to be identified with the modern "Akka," which is at best a mere guess, no other identification is known.

UNCIAL LETTERS (See Texts, Writing)

UNCIRCUMCISED (ŭn-sûr'kŭm-sĭzd, Heb. 'ārēl, Gr. akrobystía), a word used in both Old and New Testaments in several ways. Literally it refers to one who has not submitted to the Jewish rite of circumcision. Figuratively, it is used for the heathen (Judg. 14:3; Rom. 4:9). In a similar sense it is used of the heart (Lev. 24:26); the ear (Jer. 6:10).

UNCLE (Heb. dôdh, beloved), a word used in the OT denoting any kinsman on the father's side (Lev. 10:4; Amos 6:10).

UNCLEAN, UNCLEANNESS (Heb. tūm'âh, uncleanness, defilement; niddâh, separation, impurity; 'erwâh, 'erwath dāvār, unclean things; tamē', defiled, unclean; tāmē', to make or declare unclean; Gr. akatharsía; miasmós, pollution; akáthartos, unclean; koinóo, to defile; miaíno, to defile; molýno, to make filthy; spilóo; phtheíro, to corrupt).

Sin arose very early in the history of mankind and brought about changes in both the physical life of man and his spiritual life as well. It has greatly affected the entire universe, making the terms "clean" and "unclean" very common in the thinking of mankind from the earliest times. These words have been factors in determining their diets, friends, and habits, in fact, their entire deportment. These words took on new meaning when God began to call the nation Israel into being. They fall largely into two main divisions: spiritual or moral uncleanness and ceremonial uncleanness.

Some have felt that there is a relation between the forbidden foods of other nations and those which Jehovah forbade to Israel. This could be true, but it does not take away from the fact that the Biblical laws on unclean foods came directly from God. Israel's restricted foods were, unlike those of some other nations, all pertaining to meats. Leviticus, chapter 11, is explicit in declaring the clean from the unclean in animals (Lev. 11:1-8, 26-28); sea creatures (Lev. 11:9-12); birds (Lev. 11:13-25); and creeping things (Lev. 11:29-38). Nothing that died of itself was fit for their food nor were they to eat anything strangled. Blood was a forbidden part of their diet. Animals that did not chew the cud and part the hoof; fish that did not have both fins and scales; birds that were birds of prey or had unclean habits; and insects that did not have legs above the feet for leaping were for Israel unclean.

Certain kinds of uncleanness among the Israelites were connected with death. A dead person, regardless of the cause of his death, made anyone who touched him unclean (Num. 19:22). Likewise anything he touched (Num. 19:22) or the enclosure in which he died was made unclean (Num. 19: 14). Provisions were made for the cleansing of the unclean in this class by sprinkling his body with the ashes of a red heifer on the third and seventh days (Num. 11:17-19). Anyone touching the carcass of an animal became unclean and could only be cleansed by the washing of his clothes in water (Lev. 11:24-28). Certain types of creeping things that died made anything they touched unclean. Some objects thus touched could be cleansed by washing while others had to be destroyed (Lev. 11:29-37).

Leprosy, being a type of sin, was looked upon as unclean whether it was in people, houses, or clothing. God required the person pronounced leprous by the priest to identify himself in a prescribed manner and to separate himself from the rest of the people. Any time anyone drew near to him he was to cry "Unclean, unclean." Since this disease was also very contagious, detailed instructions are given for dealing with it (Lev. 13-15).

Whatever the seminal fluid that issued from the body touched became unclean. This applied also to certain other kinds of issues (Lev. 15:1-18). Issues from women rendered them as well as the things they touched unclean (Lev. 15:19-33). Regulations for the cleansing of such persons or things were carefully laid down in the two passages above. According to the Law childbirth made a woman unclean and this uncleanness lasted for different periods of time depending on whether the child was a male or female. In this case too, special instructions were given for cleansing (Lev. 13).

In the NT one notes the cumbersome systems of defilement developed by the Scribes and Pharisees, which Jesus condemned. Most of the OT regulations passed away with the passing of the Law and when the matter was discussed at the Apostolic Council only four restrictions were placed upon the new believers (Acts 15:28-29). From the Cross on, uncleanness was moral, not ceremonial.

H.Z.C.

UNCTION (ŭngk'shŭn, Gr. chrísma, anointing), the act of anointing, in the KJV found only in I John 2:20. In I John 2:27 the Greek is translated "anointing."

UNDEFILED (Heb. tām, perfect; Gr. amíantos, unsullied), any person or thing not tainted with moral evil (Ps. 119:1; Heb. 7:26; 13:4; I Pet. 1:4).

UNDERSETTERS (kāthēph, shoulder), a word used of the supports of the laver in Solomon's temple (I Kings 7:30,34).

UNICORN (See Animals)

UNITY (Heb. yāhadh, unitedness; Gr. henótes, oneness), used in the OT in the sense of togetherness of persons (Gen. 13:6); fellowship (Judg. 19:6); praise (Ps. 34:3); or of animals (Isa. 11:6-7). The NT word bespeaks the unity of faith that binds together the people of God (Eph. 4:13).

UNKNOWN GOD (Gr. ágnostos theós). These words occur only in Acts 17:23. When Paul came into Athens on his second missionary journey he found the city "wholly given to idolatry." While disputing with the Jews in their synagogues and market places, he was asked by the philosophers concerning his faith. On Mars Hill Paul began his message by saying, "I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God" (Acts 17:23). This was probably a votive altar erected by some worshiper who did not know what god to thank for some benefit he had received. Using this as a starting point, Paul preached the true God unto them. Altars erected to unknown gods were common in Athens.

UNKNOWN TONGUE (Gr. glósse, tongue), an expression found in the KJV but not in the Greek or the ERV (I Cor. 14:2,4,13,14,19,27). It refers to the charismatic gift of speaking in tongues.

UNLEARNED, a word rendering a number of Greek words in the NT: (1) agrámmatos, illiterate, in Acts 4:13 meaning "lacking technical rabbinical instruction"; (2) amathés, ignorant, uninstructed (II Pet. 3:16); (3) apaídeutos, an uneducated person; (4) idiótes, private person, non-professional (I Cor. 14:16,23f).

UNLEAVENED (Heb. matstsâh, sweet; Gr. ázymos), a word often found in both Testaments, usually in a literal but sometimes in a figurative sense. When used literally, it refers to bread unmixed with leaven or to the Passover Feast, when only unleavened bread could be used. When used figuratively it means "unmixed" (I Cor. 5:7,8).

UNLEAVENED BREAD, bread that was made without any fermented dough. It was eaten at the Passover Feast (Exod. 12:8).

UNLEAVENED BREAD, FEAST OF (See Feasts)

UNNI (un'ī, Heb. 'unnî, meaning unknown). 1. One of the Levites whom David appointed to play in connection with the tabernacle service (I Chron. 15:18,20).

2. Another Levite employed in the music service of the temple following the captivity (Neh. 12:9). "Unno" is the corrected spelling.

UNPARDONABLE SIN, not a phrase used in the Bible, but the usual way of referring to the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. 12:31-32; Mark 3:28-29; Luke 12:10). There is much difference of opinion as to the meaning of this sin, but it probably refers to the sin of decisively and finally rejecting the testimony of the Holy Spirit regarding the person and work of Jesus Christ.

UNTEMPERED MORTAR (Heb. tāphēl), mortar made of clay instead of slaked lime. It was smeared on the walls of houses made of small stones or mud bricks so as to prolong the life of the building. Ezekiel uses the term symbolically to refer to the flimsiness of the work of the false prophets.

UPHARSIN (ū-fär'sĭn, Heb. ûpharsîn, and divided), one of the words found written on the wall at Belshazzar's feast (Dan. 5:24-28). It probably means "divisions" or "divided." See MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN.

UPHAZ (ū'făz, Heb. 'ûphāz, meaning unknown), a word used of the famous gold-producing region mentioned in Jeremiah 10:9 and Daniel 10:5. Its location is still unknown. Perhaps "Ophir" or "and fine gold" should be read instead.

The stele of Ur-Nammu, builder of the great ziggurat temple at Ur, which project this limestone slab (5 x 10 ft.) commemorates. The king is shown in prayer at the top, and in the panel below he is shown receiving orders from the goddess Ningal and the god Nannar, to build them a temple. UMP

UPPER CHAMBER, UPPER ROOM (Heb. 'ălîyâh, lofty; Gr. anógeon, a room upstairs; hyperóon, upper), a room frequently built on the roofs of houses and used in summer because it was cooler than the regular living quarters (Mark 14:15; Luke 22:12; Acts 1:13; 20:8). One of these was the scene of our Lord's last supper (Luke 22:12).

UR (ûr, Heb. 'ûr, flame), the father of Eliphal, one of David's mighty men (I Chron. 11:35).

UR OF THE CHALDEES, the early home of Abraham, mentioned in Genesis 11:28,31; 15:7; I Chronicles 11:35; and in Nehemiah 9:7. Through extensive archeological excavations it is now known that this city was located in southern Mesopotamia, about 140 miles SE of the site of old Babylon. The most extensive archeological work has been done by C. Leonard Woolley between 1922 and 1934.

Education was well developed at Ur, for a school was found there with its array of clay tablets. Students learned to read, write, and do varied forms of arithmetic. Further studies have revealed the fact that commerce was well developed and that ships came into Ur from the Persian Gulf bringing diorite and alabaster used in statue making, copper ore, ivory, gold and hard woods.

Much light has been shed on the worship and religious life of Abraham's day. Nanna was the moon-god worshiped there. The temple, ziggurat, and other buildings used in connection with the worship of this pagan deity have been found. Evidences of worship in the homes of that day are revealed by idols found in private niches in the home walls.

From this city of idolatry God called Abraham and sent him by promise to the land of Canaan.

URBANE (ûr'bān, Gr. Ourbanós, polite), a Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom. 16:9).

URI (ū'rī, Heb. 'ûrî, fiery). 1. The father of Bezaleel (Exod. 31:2; 35:30; 38:22; I Chron. 2:20; II Chron. 1:5).

2. The father of Geber, one of the 12 provision officers of Solomon (I Kings 4:19).

3. A porter of the temple who put away his foreign wife (Ezra 10:24).

URIAH, URIAS (ū-rī'à, ū-rī'ăs, Heb. 'ûrîyâh, Jehovah is light). 1. A Hittite, the husband of Bathsheba (II Sam. 11:3). The fact that he had married a Hebrew wife, his Hebrew name, and his loyalty and devotion as a soldier (II Sam. 11:11) all indicate that he probably was a worshiper of Jehovah. After David had committed adultery with Bathsheba, he recalled Uriah from the battle and sent him to his house, trying thus to hide his sin. When Uriah refused to do violence to his religion, David sent him back to the war with special instructions for Joab to place him in the thick of the fight that he might die. When he was finally killed, David took Bathsheba for his own wife.

2. A priest during the kingship of Ahaz. He was one of "the faithful witnesses" (Isa. 8:2) taken by the king to record the matter concerning Maher-shalalhashbaz. It also seems highly probable that he was the one who executed the king's command to build an Assyrian altar in the temple which was to be used for sacrifice (II Kings 16:10-16).

3. A priest who aided Ezra in carrying on his ministry (Neh. 8:4). He may be the Uriah referred to as the father of Meremoth (Ezra 8:33; Neh. 3:4,21).

URIEL (ū'rĭ-ĕl, Heb. 'ûrî'ēl, God is light). 1. A Levite, the son of Tahash and father of Uzziah from the family of Kohath (I Chron. 6:24).

2. A chief of the Kohathites (I Chron. 15:5,11). With his 120 brethren he assisted in bringing the ark from the house of Obed-Edom.

3. The father of Michaiah, wife of Rehoboam. He was from the land of Gibeah (II Chron. 13:2).

URIJAH (ū-rī'jà, Heb. 'ûrîyâh, Jehovah is light). 1. A prophet, the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim. He predicted the destruction of Judah (Jer. 26:20). When the king, angry at his predictions, sought to put him to death, he fled to Egypt, but he was apprehended by the king and slain (Jer. 26:21-23).

2. The KJV refers to two others by this name (II Kings 16:10 and Neh. 3:4,21). For a discussion of these see under Uriah numbers 2 and 3 respectively.

UTHAI (ū'thī, Heb. 'ûthay, meaning uncertain). 1. A descendant of Judah who lived in Jerusalem after the Babylonian captivity (I Chron. 9:4).

2. One of the sons of Bigvai who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:14).

UZ (ŭz, Heb. 'ûts, meaning uncertain). 1. One of Nahor's sons by Milcah (Gen. 22:21). He is called "Huz" (KJV).

2. One of the sons of Aram (Gen. 10:23), the grandson of Shem (I Chron. 1:17).

3. One of the sons of Dishan (Gen. 36:28).

4. The country in which Job lived (Job 1:1). This country is referred to also twice by Jeremiah (Jer. 25:20; Lam. 4:21). There are quite a few details given in the Scripture by which this land can be identified. Eliphaz, one of Job's friends, came from Teman located in Idumea. Uz was exposed to attacks by the Chaldeans and Sabeans (Job 1:15,17). Then it must have been located near a city at the gate of which Job sat. It must also have been good pasture land, for Job had extensive herds of cattle (Job 1:3; 42:12). Delitzsch accepts the tradition that places Uz in Hauran, the scriptural land of Bashan not far from the Sea of Galilee. Others place it in the north Arabian desert about 200 miles E of Petra. URIM AND THUMMIM (ū'rĭm and thŭm'ĭm, Heb. hā'ûrîm wehatûmmîm, lights and perfections), objects not specifically described, perhaps stones, placed in the breastplate of the high priest which he wore when he went into the presence of the Lord and by which he ascertained the will of God in any important matter affecting the nation (Exod. 28:30; Lev. 8:8). It is uncertain what they were or what they looked like, or how they were used. One theory is that they were used as the lot and cast like dice, the manner of their fall somehow revealing the Lord's will (I Sam. 10:19-22; 14:37-42). Another theory is that they served as a symbol of the high priest's authority to seek counsel of Jehovah, God's will being revealed to him through inner illumination.

They are first mentioned in Scripture with no explanations (Exod. 28:30) making certain that Israel was already familiar with them. They seemed to form a necessary part of the equipment of the high priest, for they were passed on from Aaron to Eleazar (Num. 20:28). The last reference to them in the Scripture is in Nehemiah 7:65.

USURY (Heb. neshekh, interest; nāshakh, to bite, to lend on interest; nāshâh, to remove; nash', lead astray; Gr. tókos, interest on money). God gave specific instructions to Israel with regard to interest on money loaned. Any money that a Jew lent to his brother was to be without interest (Exod. 22:25; Deut. 23:19). Money could, however, be lent to a stranger with interest (Deut. 23:20). The main purpose for lending money among the Israelites was for the relief of the poor for which, according to law, no interest was to be demanded (Lev. 25:35-36). During Israel's time in Babylon many abuses arose regarding the lending of money (Ezek. 18:8,17). Because of this, Nehemiah, after the return from exile, took measures to have this practice stopped (Neh. 5:10-12).

In the NT reasonable rates of interest received for money loaned is never condemned. It was a common practice in the days of our Lord, and is referred to in the parable of the talents. The meaning of the English word usury has changed in recent centuries. While it once meant simply the charging of interest on money loaned, it has now come to mean excessive interest. H.Z.C.

UZAI (ū'zī, Heb. 'ûzay, meaning unknown), the father of Palal who aided Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:25).

UZAL (ū'zăl, Heb. 'ûzāl, meaning uncertain), a Shemite, the sixth son of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; I Chron. 1:21). He founded Uzal, the capital of Yemen, probably now the same as Sanaa.

UZZA (ŭz'à, Heb. 'uzzâh, strength). 1. The son of Shimei who became the father of Shimea (I Chron. 6:29).

2. The eldest son of Ehud (I Chron. 8:7).

3. The caretaker of, owner of, or one in whose memory a garden was named in which Manasseh and his son, Amon, were buried (II Kings 21:18, 26).

4. One whose children returned under Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:49; Neh. 7:51).

UZZA, GARDEN OF, a garden mentioned in II Kings 21:18,26. Manasseh and his son Amon were buried here.

UZZAH (ŭz'à, Heb. 'uzzâh, strength). One of Abinadab's sons from Kirjath-jearim. He was one of those who accompanied the ark of the Lord when it was being brought from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem. The ark was being drawn on a cart pulled by oxen and when something happened causing the ark to shake, Uzzah took hold of it, thus displeasing the Lord. As a result, he met instant death (II Sam. 6:3-8; I Chron. 13:6-11).

UZZEN-SHERAH (ŭz'ĕn-shē'ē-rà, Heb. 'uzzēn-she'erâh, plat of Sherah), a town built by Ephraim's daughter Sheerah (I Chron. 7:24).

UZZI (ŭz'ī, Heb. 'uzzî, strong). 1. One of Aaron's descendants who became the father of Zerahiah (I Chron. 6:5,51; Ezra 7:4).

2. Tola's son from the family of Issachar (I Chron. 7:2,3).

3. Bela's son from the tribe of Benjamin (I Chron. 7:7).

4. Another Benjamite, the father of Elah who returned to Jerusalem from the captivity (I Chron. 9:8).

5. The son of Bani living at Jerusalem and an overseer of the Levites (Neh. 11:22).

6. A priest in the family of Jedaiah (Neh. 12:19).

UZZIA (ŭ-zī'à, Heb. 'uzzîyā', strength), one of David's mighty men who was from Ashtaroth (I Chron. 11:24).

UZZIAH (ŭ-zī'à, Heb. 'uzzîyâh, Jehovah is strength). 1. Uzziah, also called Azariah, the son of Amaziah. At the age of 16 he became Judah's 10th king (II Kings 14:21), and ruled 52 years. He came to the throne at a difficult time. His father, because of a military failure, had been slain (II Kings 14:19). Uzziah was the people's choice as his successor (II Kings 14:21). He undertook, very early in his career, an expedition against his father's enemies, and won battles against the Edomites, Philistines, Arabians, and the Mehunims (II Kings 14:22; II Chron. 26:1-7). He strengthened his kingdom (II Chron. 26:2), and made many improvements on his home front (II Chron. 26:9-10). He possessed real ability at organization (II Chron. 26:11-15). The report of his strength spread as far as Egypt (II Chron. 26:8).

In spite of these successes, he strayed far from the Lord at the end of his life. Apparently as long as the Prophet Zechariah lived, his influence was great on the king and "as long as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper" (II Chron. 26:5). However, when he became strong, pride filled his heart, and going into the temple he determined to burn incense unto the Lord, a duty to be performed only by the priest. The chief priest, Azariah, with 80 priests went into the temple to reason with him, but he would not listen. Because of his self will, God struck him with leprosy which stayed with him until his death (II Chron. 26:16-21).

2. A Levite descended from Kohath (I Chron. 6:24).

3. The father of a certain Jehonathan in David's time (I Chron. 27:25).

4. One of the sons of Harim who put away his foreign wife when admonished by Ezra the priest (Ezra 10:16-21).

5. The father of Athaiah who came to Jerusalem after the Exile (Neh. 11:4).

UZZIEL, UZZIELITE (ŭ-zī'ĕl, ŭ-zī'ĕl-īt, Heb. 'uzzî'ēl, God is strength). 1. A Levite, son of Kohath (Exod. 6:18,22; Lev. 10:4; Num. 3:19,30; I Chron. 6:2,18).

2. A captain in the days of Hezekiah from the tribe of Simeon, son of Ishi (I Chron. 4:42).

3. One of Bela's sons and head of a Benjamite family (I Chron. 7:7).

4. One of David's musicians, a son of Heman (I Chron. 25:4).

5. One of the sons of Jeduthun, a Levite, who, heeding King Hezekiah's commandment, assisted in cleansing the temple (II Chron. 29:14-19).

6. The son of Harhaiah, a goldsmith, who aided Nehemiah in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:8).

Anyone who descended from Uzziel, the Levite, was known as a Uzzielite. This group is referred to in several places (Num. 3:27; I Chron. 26:23; 15:10). During David's day Amminadâb was their chief, and those whom he led numbered 112 (I Chron. 15:9).

V

VAGABOND (Heb. nûdh, to wander), a word used in the curse pronounced upon Cain (Gen. 4:12, 14). The plural form is found in the imprecatory prayer in Psalm 109:10. The sorcerers mentioned in Acts 19:13 as "vagabond Jews" were professional exorcists.

VAJEZATHA (vā-jēz'à-thà, Heb. wayzāthā', son of the atmosphere), one of the ten sons of Haman who was hung by the Jews in Shushan (Esth. 9:9).

VALE, VALLEY. 1. Gaye', a gorge. The word is used to describe the place of Moses' burial (Deut. 34:6), the valley of Hinnom (Josh. 15:8; 18:16; II Kings 23:10; Jer. 7:31), a valley of salt (II Sam. 8:13; I Chron. 18:12; II Chron. 25:11), the valley of Hamon-gog (Ezek. 39:11,15), and the great valley formed when Christ returns to the earth to rule (Zech. 14:4-5).

2. Nahal, receiving, today often translated wady. It refers to a valley that is the bed of a brook or river which can be filled quickly by rain, which often happens in the climate of Palestine (Gen. 26:19; Num. 13:23; Josh. 12:1).

3. 'Ēmeq, a deep place. This term describes a number of places such as: Valley of Achor (Josh. 7:24); Valley of Ajalon (Josh. 10:12); of Gibeon (Isa. 28:21); of Hebron (Gen. 37:14); of Jehoshaphat (Joel 3:2); of Jezreel (Josh. 17:16).

4. Biq'âh, a split, a plain between two hills or mountains and in that sense a valley (Deut. 11:11; 34:3; Josh. 11:17).

5. Shephēlâh, lowland. It is in reality not a valley, but the low lying hills that stretch from Israel's coast up to the mountains (Josh. 10:40; Jer. 32:44).

6. Gr. pháragx, a ravine (Luke 3:5).

VALLEY GATE (Heb. sha'ar haggay', gate of the Gai), a gate mentioned in Nehemiah 2:13; 3:13; 12:31,38. There is disagreement as to whether it was in the SW or NW corner of the city.

VANIAH (và-nī'à, Heb. wanyâh, meaning unknown), a son of Bani who in response to Ezra's request gave up his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:36).

VANITY (Heb. hevel, 'āwen, shāw'; Gr. kenós, mataiótes), a word occurring almost 100 times in the KJV, but never in the sense of conceit or undue self-esteem. It means emptiness, evanescence, worthlessness, futility, and is applied to things that are empty or worthless, such as the fruitlessness of human endeavors, the worthlessness of idolatry, and the futility of wickedness. It appears most often (37 times) in the Book of Ecclesiastes. Man's natural life is vanity (Job 7:3; Ps. 39:5,6, etc.). All idolatry is vanity and consequently unprofitable (I Sam. 12:21; II Kings 17:15; Isa. 41:29; 44:9). The proclamation of false prophets is vanity (Jer. 23:16; Ezek. 13:1-23; Zech. 10:2). In the NT the word occurs only three times (Eph. 4:17; II Pet. 2:18; Rom. 8:20). In the KJV the word is sometimes used for one of the Hebrew words which mean iniquity (Job 15:35; Ps. 10:7; Prov. 22:8).

S.B.

VASHNI (vāsh'nī, Heb. washnî, weak), the name of the firstborn of Samuel, according to I Chronicles 6:28. This presents a problem, since Samuel's firstborn was Joel and his second Abijah (I Sam. 8:2). The likelihood is that the Hebrew text is corrupt and that washnî should be translated "and the second," the name of the first son being accidentally omitted by some copyist.

VASHTI (văsh'tī, Heb. washtî, beautiful woman, from the Persian), Xerxes' queen whom he divorced because of her refusal to show herself to the king's guests at a feast and whose place was taken by Esther (Esth. 1:11).

VEIL (See Dress, Temple)

VEIN (Heb. môtsā', source), a word found only in Job 28:1 KJV, "a vein for the silver." The RV "mine" probably conveys the meaning of the Hebrew more accurately. The Hebrew word, however, is found 27 times with a much broader meaning than is indicated in the passage in Job (Num. 30: 12; Deut. 8:3; Ps. 19:6).

VENGEANCE (Heb. nāqam, to grudge), any punishment meted out in the sense of retribution. The word is used in both a bad sense (Judg. 15:7) and a good sense (Jer. 11:20; 20:12). Three Greek words are used for this English term in the NT (KJV): díke is twice rendered vengeance (Acts 23: 4 and Jude 1:7), in both cases in the sense of punishment for wrong done; ekdíkesis is used in much the same sense (Heb. 10:30; Luke 18:7; Rom. 12: 19; II Thess. 1:8); orgé, meaning "impulse," is used especially of God in punishing evil in man (Matt. 3:7; John 3:36; Rom. 1:18; Col. 3:6; Rev. 6:16, 17).

VENISON (Heb. tsayidh, tsēdhâh, game of any kind), properly the flesh of the deer, but as used in Genesis 25:28 and 27:5ff it could mean any game taken in hunting.

VERMILION (Heb. shāshār), a red pigment used for painting walls of palaces (Jer. 22:14) and for coloring the exotic clothing of the Chaldeans (Ezek. 23:14).

VERSIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES (See Bible, also Texts and Versions)

VESSEL (Heb. kelî, Gr. skeúos), any material thing or object which may be used for any purpose, whether it be a tool, implement, weapon, or receptacle. The KJV translates them 146 times by "vessel," but by an almost equal number of times by other terms, including "armor," "artillery," "bag," "carriage," "furniture," "instrument," "jewel," "pot," "sack," "stuff," "thing," "wares," "weapon." The RSV uses "utensils" rather than "vessels" where the context shows that a hollow utensil is meant. Hosea 13:15 has "pleasant vessels" in the KJV; this is more correctly rendered by "precious thing" in the RSV. In Romans 9:20-24 and II Timothy 2:20,21 the term is applied to persons, and in II Corinthians 4:7 it means the person as an instrument of God's will. The "weaker vessel" of I Peter 3:7 is "weaker sex" in the RSV. In I Thessalonians 4:4 "vessel" is used figuratively for either a man's own body or for his wife, more likely the latter.

VESTRY (Heb. meltāhâh), a place where royal or ceremonial vestments were kept (II Kings 10:22).

VESTURE, an archaic word denoting dress which in the KJV is used to render a number of Hebrew and Greek words: Heb. beghedh, cloak, garment, covering (Gen. 41:42); kesûth, a covering (Deut. 22:12); levûsh, clothing, dress, attire (Ps. 22:18; 102:26); Gr. himátion, an outer garment (Rev. 19: 13,16); himatismós, dress, apparel (Matt. 27:35); peribólaion, what is thrown around one (Heb. 1: 12).

VIA DOLOROSA, "the sorrowful way," the traditional route which our Lord traveled on the day of His crucifixion from the judgment seat of Pilate (Matt. 27:26,31; Mark 15:20; Luke 22:25; John 19:16) to the place of His crucifixion on Mount Calvary (Matt. 27:33; Mark 15:22; Luke 23:33; John 19:18). Nothing is surely known of the exact location of Pilate's judgment hall. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans under Titus (A.D. 70), and again at the rebellion of Bar Cochbar (A.D. 135), when it was so thoroughly demolished that the very marks of the ancient streets were obliterated. By monkish tradition, the "fourteen stations of the cross" are marked in the modern city, and also are denoted by pictures or images in many churches and private homes as helps to devotion. The stations are as follows: (1) Christ is condemned to die in Pilate's hall; (2) He receives the cross; (3) He falls under its weight; (4) He meets his mother; (5) Simon of Cyrene is forced to bear the cross (Matt. 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26); (6) His face is wiped by Veronica; (7) He falls again; (8) He meets the women of Jerusalem (Luke 23:28-31); (9) His third fall; (10) He is stripped of His garments (cf. Matt. 27:35); (11) He is nailed to the cross (Matt. 27:35, etc.); (12) He dies (Matt. 27:50; Mark 15:37; Luke 23:46; John 19:30); (13) His body is taken down (Matt. 27:59; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53; John 19:40); (14) and it is laid in the tomb (Matt. 27:60; Mark 15:46; Luke 23:53; John 19:41,42). A.B.F.

VIAL (Heb. pakh, from a root meaning to pour, Gr. phiále), a flask or bottle (I Sam. 10:1), rendered "box" in II Kings 9:1,3 KJV, but "vial" in ASV. In Revelation 5:8, 21:9 "vial" represents a shallow bowl or basin.

VILLAGE. Villages were usually grouped around a fortified town to which the people could flee in time of war. Generally they were unwalled, but in northern Syria even today an agricultural village is often surrounded by a wall, sometimes coinciding with the backs of houses which face inward, and the farmers walk out daily to their fields, some at quite a distance from the village. In the OT, the word frequently renders the Hebrew bath, i.e. "daughter," as in II Chronicles 28:18 three times "with the villages thereof" (ASV "towns"). The usual OT word (hātsēr) signifies an enclosure (Josh. 13:23,28) and is frequently compounded to name a particular village e.g. Hazar-addar (Num. 34:4), Hazar-gaddah (Josh. 15:27), Hazar-susah (Josh. 19:5) and its plural may represent a group of hamlets ("Hazeroth" Num. 11:35). Another frequent root-word is from the verb kāphār, signifying shelter or protection, e.g. "Capernaum" i.e. "Village of Nahum."

VINE (See Plants)

VINEGAR (Heb. hōmets, Gr. óxos), with us, generally a sour fluid obtained by fermentation of cider, but in Bible times from wine. The Nazirite was to abstain from drinking it (Num. 6:3), and it was used as a condiment on bread (Ruth 2:14). Its action on the teeth (Prov. 10:26) and its fizzing with soda (Prov. 25:20) are mentioned by Solomon. Our Lord, upon the cross, was offered vinegar (ASV "wine") mixed with gall or with myrrh (Matt. 27:34, cf. Mark 15:23) in fulfillment of Psalm 69:21, but He refused it. Later He was offered on a sponge a mixture of water and vinegar (Matt. 27:48), a drink very popular among the poor and used by Roman soldiers when in camp.

VINE, VINEYARD (Heb. gephen, usually the cultivated grapevine; sōrēq, dark grapes; nāzîr, undressed vine; Gr. ámpelos, staphylé, bótrys). The common grapevine is mentioned throughout Scripture, often in a figurative sense. It was grown in ancient Egypt and in Canaan prior to the time of Abraham (Gen. 14:18; Num. 13:20,24). The mountain regions of Judaea and Samaria, largely unsuited for cereals, were well adapted for vine growing. A vineyard was usually surrounded with a protecting wall of stones or thorny hedges to keep out destructive animals (Num. 22:24; Ps. 80:8-13; Prov. 24:30,31; Isa. 5:5). A part of every vineyard was a tower for the watchman, a winepress hollowed out of a flat rock, and a vat into which the wine flowed from the winepress (Isa. 1:8; 5:1-7; Matt. 21:33-41). The vine branches were usually allowed to lie along the ground or to fall over the terraces, but sometimes they were raised above the ground with sticks or supported on poles to form a bower.

Vines required constant care to keep them productive. Hence they were pruned every spring, and the ground was ploughed and kept free of weeds. Pruned branches were gathered and burned (John 15:6). During the harvest season watchmen were stationed in the towers, and sometimes the whole family of the owner took their residence in booths as a protection against thieves. The harvest season was always one of special happiness. The treaders of the winepress shouted and sang as they trod the grapes (Judg. 9:27; Isa. 16:10; Jer. 25:30; 48:33). The gleanings were left to the poor (Lev. 19:10; Deut. 24:21; Judg. 8:2). The wine was stored in new goatskin bags (Matt. 9:17) or in large pottery containers. Every seventh year the vines were allowed to lie fallow (Exod. 23:11; Lev. 25:3).

Grapes were an important part of the diet of the Hebrews. A part of the harvest was preserved in the form of raisin cakes (I Sam. 25:18). Grapes were also their only source of sugar. The juice of the grapes was drunk fresh and fermented.

Figuratively, the vine symbolized prosperity and peace among the ancient Hebrews (I Kings 4:25; Mic. 4:4; Zech. 3:10). The vine also symbolized the chosen people, who instead of producing outstanding fruit yielded only wild grapes.

A number of parables of Jesus relate to vines and culture (Luke 13:6-9; Matt. 20:1-6; Matt. 9:17; Matt. 21:28-32; Matt. 21:33). Jesus referred to Himself as the only true vine with whom His disciples are in organic union (John 15). S.B.

VIRGIN. This word renders three Heb. and Gr. terms: 1. bethûlâh, from a root meaning "to separate," is the technical term for "virgin," a young unmarried woman (Gen. 24:16; Exod. 22:16f; II Sam. 13:2). It is also used figuratively to personify a city or a state (Isa. 23:12; 47:1; Amos 5:2).

2. 'almâh, mature, used of a young woman of marriageable age, whether married or not (Gen. 24:43; S. of Sol. 1:3; 6:8; Isa. 7:14, etc.). Only the context can give it the force "virgin".

3. parthénos, used in the LXX chiefly as the rendering of bethûlâh (of 'almâh in Gen. 24:43 and Isa. 7:14). In the NT it is the usual Gr. word for "virgin" (Matt. 1:23, etc.), but in Revelation 14:4 it is used of men, with the emphasis on the idea of chastity. S.B.

VIRGIN BIRTH. Christendom in the Apostles' Creed confesses that its Lord and Saviour was "conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." This formulation of faith, going back to the second century, is based upon two NT passages, Matthew 1:18-25 and Luke 1:26-2:7. The Matthean account is apparently derived from an Antiochean source, the Lukan from a Palestinian; it seems, however, that ultimately the Matthean version came from Joseph, the Lukan from Mary. These two accounts are the only NT passages which deal explicitly with the birth of Jesus. In their monographs on this subject both Orr and Machen have shown by exhaustive analysis that these accounts are first century documents which have been transmitted in unimpeachable integrity; because textual interpolation or corruption is ruled out, this miracle must be accepted as a valid element in the apostolic witness. Though independent, the accounts are complementary; moreover, while they alone definitely teach the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, other NT writings either presuppose that doctrine or are at least completely congruous with it. The two Evangelists affirm this miracle flatly as a matter of history. They represent no arguments to support it; they draw no conclusions from it. They simply state it as an event of indisputable reality. No slightest evidence of apologetic concern can be detected in their narratives. Hence critics of the doctrine are totally unjustified in dismissing it as a piece of illegitimate rationalization, an attempt to support the mystery of the incarnation by a biological wonder.

The Virgin Birth means that Jesus Christ entered into the stream of human life without the mediation of an earthly father, born not as a result of sexual intercourse but as a result of supernatural "overshadowing." To view the Holy Spirit as a male substitute, a sort of apotheosized husband, as Karl Barth puts it, is to miss the central point of this immaterial conception. There was no union, no impregnation; any idea of such a relationship between Creator and creature was quite literally unthinkable to the Jewish mind. Justin Martyr has therefore admirably expressed the Biblical teaching in his comment on Isaiah 7:14, "The words, 'Behold the virgin shall conceive,' signify that the virgin conceived without intercourse; for if she had had intercourse with anyone whatever, she would no longer be a virgin. But the power of God coming upon the virgin overshadowed her and caused her to conceive though she was a virgin. . . . Accordingly, the Spirit and the power which was from God must be understood as nothing else than the Logos, who also is the firstborn of God, as Moses the aforementioned prophet declared; and this, coming upon the virgin and overshadowing her, caused her to be with child not by intercourse but by power" (quoted by Machen, The Virgin Birth of Christ, p. 334).

From a strictly theological perspective, the Virgin Birth has weighty significance. For one thing, it attests the omnipotent grace and creative freedom of God as He inaugurates a new order of redemption by a miracle pure and simple, a miracle which breaks in upon and shatters the old order of sin. Barth in particular emphasizes "the miracle of Christmas" as a demonstration of the Father's saving sovereignty (Church Dogmatics, Vol. I, Pt. 2, pp. 186, 191, 192). Again, the Virgin Birth signifies and establishes an organic connection with mankind, on the one hand, and a radical discontinuity with it, on the other. How else could the double requirement of soteriology, simultaneous connection and discontinuity, be achieved? Once more, the Virgin Birth reveals the heavenly origin and unique status of the Messiah's Person. Orr, for example, vigorously contends that the sinlessness of Jesus, His pre-existence, and his role as the Second Adam require the Virgin Birth: Jesus was a spiritual miracle whose entrance into the human race necessitated a physical miracle (The Virgin Birth of Christ, pp. 200ff).

Yet few Scriptural miracles have been more impugned and controverted. Thus Walter Horton declares that "a very solid contingent of leading Protestant thinkers now accept the orthodox doctrine of the Incarnation while admitting their perplexity over the evidence for the Virgin Birth" (Christian Theology: An Ecumenical Approach, pp. 198-199). Ferré asserts that "it is pious adulation and should honestly be accepted as creative myth to adorn history's most significant Event" (Christ and the Christian, p. 215). The reasons for this attitude are apparently threefold. First, the Virgin Birth is factually suspect: De Wolf marshals the arguments on this score (A Theology of the Living Church, pp. 230-232), but Orr and Machen, and more recently Barth (op. cit., pp. 174-176), rebut the critical case effectively. Second, the doctrine is polemically hazardous. Horton in particular highlights the propensity of Roman Catholic dogmaticians to build a vast structure of Mariology, an inverted pyramid resting upon the apex of the Virgin Birth (op. cit., pp. 199-203). But surely there is no need of throwing out the baby of revelational truth with the bathwater of extravagant superstition. Third, the doctrine is theologically pernicious. Ferré especially is afraid that the Virgin Birth implies a subtle Docetism. "If the Virgin Birth in any way endows Jesus with a predetermined sinlessness or, even more, with some initial presence of God which sets Him off essentially from normal human beings, then the Son of God never took on our human nature. Then we have, in fact, no real doctrine of the Incarnation as the full union of God's and man's nature" (op. cit., p. 104). But Ferré's charge is more than masterfully answered by Barth who maintains "the rightness and importance" of the Virgin Birth theologically (op. cit., pp. 177ff).

If the actuality of the Christmas miracle is denied, how can the origin of this dogma be accounted for? How did this particular belief concerning Jesus Christ ever arise? Allegedly the notion of a Virgin Birth was inspired by OT prophecy or borrowed from paganism. But neither theory is viable, as Machen and Orr have shown. Was the doctrine of the Virgin Birth inspired perhaps by Isaiah 7:14? The Jews never applied that particular passage to the Messiah. Isaiah does indeed predict the Virgin Birth; nevertheless the Jews did not interpret his prediction Messianically. Machen's verdict is judicious: "The actual interpretation of that prophecy which was prevalent among the Jews in the first century after Christ was, unless all indications fail, as far as possible from finding in the prophecy any prediction of the virgin birth of the Messiah" (op. cit., p. 293). Was this notion, then, derived from some pagan source? Let Harnack's magisterial statement suffice: "The oldest Christianity strictly refrained from everything polytheistic and heathen . . . the unreasonable method of collecting from the mythology of all peoples parallels for original Church traditions, whether historical reports or legends, is valueless . . . the Greek or Oriental mythology I should leave entirely out of account; for there is no occasion to suppose that the Gentile congregations in the time up to the middle of the second century adopted, despite their fixed principle, popular mythical representations" (quoted by Orr, op. cit., p. 176). But if the doctrine of the Virgin Birth was derived from neither Judaism nor paganism, how did it arise? It arose because it was grounded in a miraculous fact to which Matthew and Luke bear witness. Thus, though it may be readily acknowledged that the Virgin Birth does not occupy a major place in the kerygma as do the Incarnation and the Resurrection, nevertheless it ought not to be expunged from the great symbols of the faith; it must not be reduced to, in Horton's phrase, "an optional, second-rank position." Involved in its unfeigned acceptance are the issues of orthodox Christology, revelational authority, and of course Biblical infallibility. That is why Barth, himself no believer in verbal inspiration, insists that the Church is not at liberty "to convert the doctrine of the Virgin Birth into an option for specially strong or for specially weak souls. The Church knew well what it was doing when it posted this doctrine on guard, as it were, at the door of the mystery of Christmas. It can never be in favor of anyone thinking he can hurry past this guard. It will remind him that he is walking along a private road at his own cost and risk" (op. cit., p. 181). In short, faith in the miracle of the Virgin Birth still serves as a convenient touchstone of faith in the mystery of God enfleshed.

V.C.G.

VIRTUE (Heb. hayil, strength, ability, often involving moral worth; Gr. areté, any excellence of a person or a thing; dýnamis, power, influence). The phrase, "a virtuous woman" (Ruth 3:11; Prov. 12:4; 31:10,29), is literally "a woman of ability." Sometimes the word is used in its Old English sense of "power" (Mark 5:30; Luke 6:19; 8:46) and "strength" (II Cor. 12:9; Heb. 11:11).

VISION (Heb. hāzôn, hizzāyôn, mar'âh; Gr. hórama, optasía). It is impossible to draw a sharp line of demarcation between dreams and visions. The various Heb. and Gr. words for this word all come from roots having to do with seeing. Visions in the Bible were for the most part given to individuals, and were not apprehended by their companions. Through them God revealed to the seers truth in pictorial form. They came under various circumstances, in men's waking hours (Dan. 10:7; Acts 9:7); by day (Acts 10:3) or by night (Gen. 46:2). In the OT both "writing" and "non-writing" prophets were recipients of visions (Isa. 1:1; Obad. 1; Nah. 1:1; II Sam. 7:17; I Kings 22:17-19; II Chron. 9:29). With perhaps one exception (Num. 24:4) they were given only to holy men in the service of God, and those of a revelatory nature were always recognized as coming from God. In the NT, Luke especially manifests great interest in visions (Luke 1:22; Acts 9:10; 10:3; 10:10ff; 18:9). Biblical visions concerned both immediate situations (Gen. 15:1f; Acts 12:7) and more distant ones connected with the development of the kingdom of God, as may be seen in the writings of Isaiah, Ezekiel, Hosea, Micah, Daniel, and John. In the OT false prophets feigned visions and were denounced by Jeremiah (14:14; 23:16) and Ezekiel (13:7). S.B.

VISITATION (Heb. pekuddâh, Gr. episkopé), a divine visit for the purpose of rewarding or punishing people for their deeds (Jer. 10:15; Luke 19:44; I Pet. 2:12).

VOPHSI (vŏf'sī, Heb. wopsî), a man of Naphtali, one of the spies whom Moses sent to Canaan (Num. 13:14).

VOW (Heb. nedher, Gr. euché), a voluntary promise to God to perform some service or do something pleasing to Him, in return for some hoped for benefits (Gen. 28:20-22; Lev. 27:2,8; Num. 30; Judg. 11:30); or to abstain from certain things (Num. 30:3). In the OT vows were never regarded as a religious duty (Deut. 23:22), but once made they were considered as sacred and binding (Deut. 23:21-23; Judg. 11:35; Eccl. 5:4; Ps. 66:13). Fathers could veto vows made by their daughters; and husbands could veto their wives' vows; but if a husband did not veto a wife's vow, and then caused her to break it, the blame was his, not hers (Num. 30). A vow had to be uttered to be binding (Deut. 23:23). Almost anything — people, possessions, one's self — except what was already the Lord's or was an abomination to the Lord (Deut. 23:18), could be vowed, and all these things could be redeemed with money, with their value to be determined by a priest. Houses, lands, and unclean animals that were redeemed had to have a fifth of their value added to make up the redemption money. In the NT Jesus mentions vows only to condemn the abuse of them (Matt. 15:4-6; Mark 7:10-13). Paul's vow in Acts 18:18 was probably a temporary Nazirite vow. S.B.

VULGATE (See Texts and Versions)

W

WADI (wä'dē), a valley which forms the bed of a stream during the winter, but which dries up in the hot season (Gen. 26:19). The word is Arabic, and does not appear in the Bible, but Palestine contains hundreds of these "wadis." Sometimes "wady."

WAFERS (Heb. rāqîq, tsappîhith), thin cakes. The word in Exodus 16:31 emphasizes the thinness, while that in Exodus 29:2 indicates the process of beating which rendered the cakes thin. The same word is rendered "cakes" in I Chronicles 23:29 KJV.

WAGES (Heb. hinnām, maskōreth, pe'ullâh, sākhar, Gr. misthós, opsónion), pay given for labor, generally reckoned by the day, and distinguished from fees paid for professional service or salaries which may be paid by the month or the year. In civilizations where slavery is a regular institution, the servant or slave necessarily received his living, but not much more, except when the master was kind and loving and made the servant practically a member of the family. The earliest mention of wages is in the bargaining between Laban and his nephew Jacob (Gen. 29). It is implicit in the narrative that he must also have received his living during those 14 years: then he labored for another six years, receiving as his wages considerable herds and flocks (Gen. 29,30). Pharaoh's daughter promised wages to the mother of Moses to act as his nurse (Exod. 2:5-9). In the Mosaic law, a hired servant must be paid at the end of the day (Lev. 19:13; Deut. 24:14,15), thus implying a "hand to mouth" existence. The same sort of poverty is in the parable of the 11th hour laborers (Matt. 20:1-16), but too much emphasis should not be put upon the supposed value of the denarion, for whether "a penny" as in KJV or "a shilling" as in the ASV, the fact remains that the laborer, and presumably his family, could live on it. Mercenary soldiers were advised by John the Baptist to "be content with your wages" (Luke 3:14). The idea of wages is spiritualized in "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23), where it is contrasted with "the gift of God — eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord." Paul speaks of his gifts from churches at Philippi as "wages" (II Cor. 11:8; cf. Phil. 4:15-18), and though he earned his living with his hands, he teaches the right of the laborer to his hire (I Tim. 5:18). A.B.F.

WAGON (Heb. 'āghālâh, from 'aghal, to be round, to roll), a vehicle with wheels (usually two) used for carrying goods as well as persons. Ancient wagons were crude, with wheels made of wood. They were covered or uncovered, usually drawn by oxen, but sometimes horses. Wagons are first mentioned in Genesis 45:19-46:5 when Pharaoh sent wagons to help move Jacob and his family. Covered wagons, each drawn by two oxen, were used for moving the tabernacle (Num. 7:3-9), but not the sacred furniture, which was carried on the shoulders of priests.

WAIL (Heb. mispēdh, nehî, Gr. alalázo, penthéo). In ancient funeral processions wailing relatives, often accompanied by hired female (sometimes male) mourners and musicians, preceded the body to the grave (Jer. 9:17f; Amos 5:16; Matt. 9:23).

WALK, as a verb renders more than a dozen Hebrew and Greek words. To walk is used hundreds of times, generally literally but often figuratively (Ps. 1:1). In the NT epistles the word is used uniformly in the figurative sense and refers to the whole manner of life and conduct (Eph. 2:2,10; 5:2,8,15) and the observance of laws or customs (Acts 21:21).

WALL. In ancient times all over the East the walls of houses were built of crude or sunbaked brick. Stone was used only in certain few localities where it was plentiful. In Chaldea stone was entirely absent; in Assyria it was so rare that it was used only as an accessory. In Palestine houses were constructed of crude brick, although sometimes wood, mud-brick, and stone were used in alternate layers. In Egypt houses were built of crude brick mixed with chopped straw. Every ancient city had enormous walls surrounding it, sometimes containing chambers inside. There still exist some of the stones in the wall of the temple enclosure at Jerusalem. They measure 30 feet long, eight feet wide, and three and a half feet high, weighing over 80 tons. Josephus tells of stones in the temple of Solomon 60 feet long.

WAR (Heb. milhāmâh, from laham, to fight; Gr. pólemos). Every phase of Israel's life, including her warfare, was bound up with her God. War therefore had religious significance. It was customary for priests to accompany Israel's armies into battle (Deut. 20:1-4). Campaigns were begun and engagements entered into with sacrificial rites (I Sam. 7:8-10; 13:9), and after consulting the oracle (Judg. 20:18ff; I Sam. 14:37; 23:2; 28:6; 30:8). Prophets were sometimes asked for guidance before a campaign (I Kings 22:5; II Kings 3:11).

The blowing of a trumpet throughout the land announced the call to arms (Judg. 3:27; I Sam. 13:3; II Sam. 15:10), and priests sounded an alarm with trumpets (II Chron. 13:12-16). Weapons included slings, spears, javelins, bows and arrows, swords, and battering-rams. Strategical movements included the ambush (Josh. 8:3ff); the feint (Judg. 20:20ff); the flank movement (II Sam. 5:22f); the surprise attack (Josh. 11:1f); the raid (I Chron. 14:9); the foray (II Sam. 3:22); and foraging to secure supplies (II Sam. 23:11). Sometimes when opposing armies were drawn up in battle array, champions from each side fought one another (I Sam. 17). Armies engaged in hand to hand combat. Victorious armies pillaged the camp of the enemy, robbed the dead (Judg. 8:24-26; I Sam. 31:9; II Chron. 20:25), and often killed or mutilated prisoners (Josh. 8:23,29; 10:22-27; Judg. 1:6), although prisoners were usually sold into slavery. Booty was divided equally between those who had taken part in the battle and those who had been left behind in camp (Num. 31:27; Josh. 22:8; I Sam. 30:24f), but some of the spoils were reserved for the Levites and for the Lord (Num. 31:28,30).

At left, artist's conception of Romans storming a city during a siege, using a catapult. At right, one of Alexander's siege towers (hele-poleis), as high as a 20-story building. UANT

When a city was besieged, the besiegers cast up huge mounds of earth against the walls from which battering-rams were brought into play against the walls (II Sam. 20:15; Ezek. 4:2). The besieged tried to drive off the enemy by throwing darts and stones and shooting arrows at them from the walls. Captured cities were often completely destroyed, and victory was celebrated with song and dance (Exod. 15:1-21; Judg. 5; I Sam. 18:6).

Jesus accepted war as an inevitable part of the present sinful world order (Matt. 24:6), but warned that those who take the sword must perish by it (Matt. 26:52). In the epistles the Christian is said to be a soldier (II Tim. 2:3; I Pet. 2:11). The Apocalypse uses the figure of battle and war to describe the final triumph of Christ over Satan (Rev. 16:14-16; 17:14; 19:14). S.B.

WASHING (Heb. rāhats, kāvas, Gr. nípto, loúo, loutrón). Frequent bathing was necessary in the warm climate of the East. In Egypt, Syria, and Palestine people washed the dust from their feet when they entered a house (Gen. 18:4; John 13:10). Ceremonial defilement was removed by bathing the body and washing the raiment (Lev. 14:8; Num. 19:7-8). The priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or offering a sacrifice (Exod. 30:19-21). In the time of Christ the Jews did much ceremonial washing of hands before eating (Mark 7:3,4), and used public baths like the Greeks and Romans.

In Jesus' day, ceremonial handwashing among the Jews had degenerated into an empty ritual. UANT

WATCH (Heb. 'ashmurâh, 'ashmōreth, Gr. phylaké), a man or group of men set to guard a city. Nehemiah, when building the walls of Jerusalem, set a watch day and night against his enemies (4:9) and after the walls were completed, he set watches near the gate (7:3). Even today, when the crops are ripening in the fields and vineyards in the East, one may see watchmen on guard day and night. The temporary shelters set up by the watchmen in fields are alluded to in Isaiah 1:8, for they are deserted as soon as the crops have been gathered. Metaphorically, David prays "Set a watch, (a restraint) O Jehovah, before my mouth, Keep the door of my lips" (Ps. 141:3). The Latin word custodia, transliterated into Greek, is used thrice (Matt. 27:25,26; 28:11) for the Roman watch that was set to guard our Lord's tomb. A.B.F.

WATCHES OF THE NIGHT, the divisions into which the 12 hours of the night were divided. The Jews had a threefold division (Judg. 7:19), while the Romans had four watches (Mark 6:48).

WATCHMAN (Heb. tsôpheh, shōmēr, Gr. phýlax, terós), one who guards a city or the headquarters of an army (I Sam. 14:16; II Sam. 18:24-27). Such watchmen were set on city walls or on hilltops (Jer. 31:6). God's prophets and preachers should also be His watchmen to warn His people (Isa. 21:6).

WATER (Heb. mayim, Gr. hýdor). Because of the scarcity of water in Palestine, it is much appreciated there. For its people absence of water is very serious (I Kings 17:1ff; Jer. 14:3; Joel 1:20), and rain is a sign of God's favor. The rivers of Palestine are mostly small and have little if any water in summer. Consequently it depends upon rain as its source of water. This supplies springs and fountains. Cisterns are a necessity for the storing of water, and this if stored too long becomes filthy and a menace to health. In the summer there is no rain, so that vegetation is dependent upon the heavy dews. Irrigation is carried on where there is sufficient water. When water was scarce, as during a time of siege, it had to be rationed. Drinking water, carried in goatskins, was often sold in the streets. Wells and pools, although comparatively scarce, are often mentioned in the Bible (Gen. 21:19; 24:11; John 4:6; 9:7). Water was used not only for refreshment, but for ceremonial washings before meals and in the Jewish temple-ceremony (Lev. 11:32; 16:4; Num. 19:7). The Bible uses it as a symbol of the cleansing of the soul from sin (Ezek. 16:4,9; 36:25; John 3:5; Eph. 5:26; Heb. 10:22; I John 5:6,8). S.B.

WATER OF BITTERNESS, or, as in KJV, "the bitter water that causeth the curse" (Num. 5:12-31), water, mingled with dust from the floor of the sanctuary, which a woman suspected of carnal sin was asked to drink — a sort of "trial by ordeal" but ordered of the Lord. If she were guilty, her body would swell and her "thigh fall away," a statement possibly meaning dire disorder of the generative organs. If she were innocent, the water had no effect.

WATER OF JEALOUSY (See Water of Bitterness)

WATER OF SEPARATION, or, as in ASV, "water for impurity" (Num. 19:9,13,20,21; 31:23). Water for the removal of impurity (Num. 19:9,13,20, 21; 31:23).

WATERPOT (Gr. hydría), earthen jars for carrying or holding water, either for drinking (John 4:28) or for purifying purposes (John 2:6f). The latter were large, holding 18 to 20 gallons each.

WATERSPOUT (Heb. tsinnôr), mentioned only in Psalm 42:7 where ASV has "waterfall." It is used of a large rush of water sent by God, perhaps great floods of rain.

WAVE OFFERING (See Offerings)

WAY. There are about 25 Heb. and Gr. words rendered "way" in the Bible. It is often used metaphorically to describe the conduct or manner of life, whether of God or of man (Exod. 32:8; Deut. 5:33; Job 16:22). In the NT, God's plan of salvation is called "the way of the Lord" (Matt. 3:3, etc.). The term is also used to mean Christianity or Judaism (Acts 9:2; 19:9; 22:4).

WAYFARING MAN (Heb. 'ōrēah, 'āvar 'ōrah, hālakhderekh), one who walks the roads; a traveler (Judg. 19:17; II Sam. 12:4; Isa. 33:8; 35:8).

WEALTH (Heb. hôn, hayil, nekhāsîm, Gr. euporía), abundance of possessions whether material, social or spiritual. In the nomadic civilization of the early Hebrews, wealth consisted largely of flocks and herds, silver and gold, brass, iron and clothing (Josh. 22:8). In the days of Job, his sons had houses, but their wealth consisted largely of camels, asses, flocks and herds and "a very great household" (Job 1:3), no doubt implying many servants. From the beginning of Israel, God taught His people that He was the giver of their wealth (Deut. 8:18): "For it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth." He taught them to be liberal: "There is that scattereth and yet increaseth, and there is which withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty" (Prov. 11:24). NT teaching goes even further: "Let no man seek his own, but every man another's good" (I Cor. 10:24). A careless reading of the Bible gives some the impression that in OT times wealth always went with godliness (Ps. 112:3), that poverty was for the wicked (Prov. 13:18), whereas in NT times blessings are only of a spiritual nature. Cf. Matthew 6:19-33 where good provision is promised to those of a single eye for God's glory and who lay up treasures in heaven. A.B.F.

WEAN, WEANING (Heb. gāmal, to complete, wean). To wean is to accustom a child to depend upon other food than its mother's milk. In the East, weaning is often deferred for as much as three years (I Sam. 1:22; 2:11). The weaning of a child was celebrated by a feast (Gen. 21:8) and with an offering (I Sam. 1:24).

WEATHER. There is no Heb. word corresponding to "weather." The temperature in Palestine varies from that at the top of Hermon (9,000 feet above sea-level) where there is snow on the ground the year around to the oppressive heat of the region near Jericho (1,300 feet below sea-level). The temperature of much of Palestine is comparable to that of California, and so oranges, lemons, and olives are profuse on the coastal plains, figs and grapes a little higher, and most of the hill country is suitable for barley and other crops which mature quickly in a semi-arid climate. From about mid-November to mid-January much rain falls, the "former rain" of Scripture (Jer. 5:24). In late March, if the land is favored, comes the "latter rain" (Joel 2:23), thus assuring good crops. If the latter rain fails, much of the harvest is lost. The Bible clearly teaches that, at least in OT times, there was a close relationship between the spiritual condition of the people and the weather (I Kings 8:35,36; Joel 1:17-20). Sin brought physical punishment in dearth, plagues of insects and storms. In the highlands, as at Jerusalem, it became quite cold in winter (Ezra 10:9,13), especially since the houses were very inadequately heated (Jer. 36:22). One who has lived on the coast of the Mediterranean soon learns to predict weather conditions by looking out over the sea. When the water looks like bright metallic blue, and the horizon is very sharp, he knows that the wind is from the N and he predicts clear, cool weather (Job 37:9,22; read 36:24-38:37). When sea and sky seem to blend together, he predicts pleasant warm weather. The occasional hot sirocco is like the breath of an oven. A.B.F.

WEAVING (Heb. 'āragh), the uniting of threads by crossing each other to produce cloth. The art of weaving is well-nigh universal, even among primitive peoples, and its beginnings are lost in the mists of antiquity. Job complained, "My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle" (7:6), showing that he not only knew of weaving, but that the art had progressed to the point where the weaver's hands were swift in passing the shuttle to and fro. Jabal, an antediluvian, is called "the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle" (Gen. 4:20), implying that the weaving of tents and the taming of cattle had their beginnings nearly at the same time. Weaving, as a fine art, was in the case of Bezalel and Oholiab an enduement from God (Exod. 35:30-35), and their woven work for the tabernacle, the curtains and veils may have surpassed in beauty anything previously known in cloth. Damascus, one of the oldest cities of the world, was long known for its woven work, and "damask" with its beautifully woven figures takes its name from that city. The lovely acrostic poem on the virtuous woman (Prov. 31:10-31) pictures her as acquainted with the work of spinning and weaving, as well as the work of dressmaking; but the heavier work of weaving tentcloth was often done by men. Acts 18:2,3 mentions Paul, with Aquila and his wife Priscilla, as tent-makers. The Oriental tents were generally woven of goats' hair made so well as to be well-nigh water proof and so strong as to last for a lifetime. In the "doom of Egypt" (Isa. 19) the weavers of both linen and cotton cloth are spoken of as "confounded" (vs. 9), indicating the importance of weaving to the economy of Egypt in her prosperity. In Hezekiah's description of his despair in the days of his sickness (Isa. 38:10-18) he speaks of God as cutting off his life as a weaver cuts the thrum when his work is complete (vs. 12). Isaiah speaks of the wicked as weaving the spider's web (59:5), thus indicating the futility of their efforts, and II Kings 23:7 speaks with horror of "the women that wove hangings for the Asherah." A giant had a spear like a weaver's beam (I Chron. 11:23). A.B.F.

WEDDING (Gr. gámos). Marriage customs in the Bible center around the two events of betrothal and wedding. The wedding itself did not include a religious ceremony, although it is probable that the betrothal was ratified by an oath (Ezek. 16:8; Mal. 2:14); and after the Exile written contracts were drawn up and sealed. On the day of the wedding the bride dressed in white, elaborately embroidered robes, bedecked herself with jewels (Isa. 61:10), and put on a veil (Gen. 24:65) and a garland. The bridegroom, attended by friends and accompanied by musicians and singers, went to the bride's house (Matt. 25:7); and then after receiving her from her parents with their blessing he conducted the whole party back to his own house. On the way other friends of the bride and groom joined the party, and there was much music and dancing (Ps. 45:15). A feast was held at the bridegroom's house. Later in the evening the bride's parents escorted her to the nuptial chamber (Gen. 29:23), while he was led there by his friends or the bride's parents. The next day the festivities were resumed and continued for one or two weeks (Gen. 29:27; Judg. 14:12). The wedding festivities included much music and joking. S.B.

WEDGE (Heb. lāshôn zāhāv, tongue of gold). The word occurs only in Joshua 7:21,24, where the word lashon, "tongue," indicates the shape. Its occurrence in Isaiah 13:12 is an error. Cf. ASV which properly renders the adjective as "pure."

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. The modern reader of the Scriptures lives in a world dominated by the scientific method and the reign of "fact" — measurable fact. Meat is weighed in pounds and ounces on scales checked periodically by a bureau of weights and measures. Exact measurements in miles and fractions thereof state the distance between places. Liquids are measured exactly, from the contents of an oil tanker to that of a hypodermic needle. Such exact measurements cannot be expected in the Bible. The ancient Hebrew lived in a different kind of a world. The lack (for most of Biblical times) of a strong, paternalistic central government, the simple life of self-sufficient country folk, and the frequent influence of foreign nations whose standards differed from the Hebrews help to account for the lack of consistent and specific measurements. One must be content with round numbers in the study of the weights and measures of the Bible.

Our information is gained from two sources — written and archeological. Written sources include the Bible and other ancient books such as the works of Josephus, Herodotus, the Talmud, and references in classical literature. Archeological information is uncovered by the excavator in the lands of the Bible — labeled weight-stones, jars, and other objects which will be mentioned in this article, which attempts a synthesis of the information from all the sources.

Measures of Length. Hebrew measures of length arose (as did the English foot) from the simple estimating of distance in terms of the body. Farmers today measure the height of horses by hands. The ancient Hebrews used the terms pace (about a yard), cubit (the length of the forearm), span (of a hand; about half a cubit), palm (handbreath; about ⅓ of a span), and finger (about ¼ of a palm). In Egypt a similar system was used.

The ordinary cubit is equivalent to about 17½ or 18 inches today; it is once referred to as "the cubit of a man" — i.e. the distance which might be measured by a man's forearm (Deut. 3:11; "the common cubit," RSV). There was a longer cubit, just as we today have a land mile (5280 ft.) and a nautical mile (6080 ft). Ezekiel mentions a "long cubit" which he equates with a cubit and a handbreadth (40:5; 43:13 RSV), roughly equivalent to 20½ inches. The Egyptians had two cubits of about the same length (about 17½ and 20½ inches). The usual cubit in the Bible is the shorter one. The longer cubit is used in Ezekiel's measurements and possibly in Solomon's temple (II Chron. 3:3 may be a reference to it). The chart below shows the equivalences.

The Common Cubit

	equals	inches
Finger		¾
Palm	4 fingers	3
Span	3 palms	9
Cubit	2 spans	18

The length of Hezekiah's water tunnel underneath Jerusalem is stated by the inscription in the tunnel to be 1200 cubits. The tunnel is 1749 feet long according to the most reliable measurement. The cubit length thus arrived at is 17.49 inches. This does not mean that the cubit in Hezekiah's time was 17.49 inches long. The figure of 1200 cubits is a round number, nor is it certain at what point the ancient measuring of the tunnel began. The Siloam inscription indicates only that our approximate length for the cubit — a little less than 18 inches — is not too far off, which is as positive a conclusion as can be hoped for under the circumstances.

Confirmatory evidence for this length of the cubit is also seen in the fact that many ancient buildings have been found upon excavation to be measurable in terms of a cubit of about 17½ inches, or in reeds equivalent to six such cubits.

Some other terms of measurement in the Bible are the reed, the gōmedh, and the fathom. The reed, mainly an instrument for measuring rather than a unit of measurement, was six cubits long (Ezek. 40:5). The term gōmedh, which occurs only in Judges 3:16 and is translated "cubit," is thought by present scholars to refer to a shorter distance — ⅔ of a cubit at most — for a dagger rather than a sword is referred to. The fathom (armstretch; Acts 27:28) was about six feet.

Measurements of Distance and Area. In OT times distance was usually measured by the length of time necessary to traverse it. Thus we read of "three days journey" (Gen. 30:36) and "seven days journey" (Gen. 31:23). In the NT these terms are used: stadium ("furlong" KJV, Luke 24:13; John 6:19), about 606 feet. Mile (Matt. 5:41), about 4860 feet. About the Sabbath day's journey there is some uncertainty. The term, used to indicate the distance one might walk without breaking the Sabbath law, seems to have been an elastic one. Josephus calls it five stadia in one place and six in another, which would make it equal 3000 or 3600 feet. This is about the distance from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives (Acts 1:12).

Land measurements were indicated in terms of the area which a team of oxen could plow in one day (I Sam. 14:14). This is the meaning of "acres" in Isaiah 5:10, where the Hebrew is semedh — "yoke (of oxen)." In Mesopotamia this area equaled 2/5 of an acre. Elsewhere area was stated as that part of a field which could be seeded with barley in one day (Lev. 27:16).

Measures of Capacity. Our uncertainty about the units of capacity is understandable when one considers the origin of these terms. They seem to have arisen from common household pots (all handmade locally), or from the farmer's estimate of the carrying ability of man or beast. The hin was a pot and the ephah a basket (both words are of Egyptian origin). The omer was a sheaf and the homer a donkey load. The word bath means "daughter"; could this jar be the one the daughters carried home from the well (Gen. 24:15)?

The student of the English Bible will have difficulty in following this discussion in his Bible because of the untechnical character of his translation. Many of the terms mentioned below are translated "measure" in quite a few places in the standard English versions. The best way to discover to which unit the Hebrew or Greek text refers is to use a comprehensive concordance (such as Strong's or Young's), where the Hebrew and Greek terms are clearly distinguished.

The bath was the standard liquid measure in OT times. Its value is a matter of dispute. At present scholars regard it as equal to about six US gallons, rather than 10 gallons as formerly. The finding of fragments of large jars, inscribed "bath of the king" (perhaps an attempt to standardize the bath for use in tax payments) or simply "bath" have helped to bring about this reduction in size. Unfortunately, these jars cannot be completely restored, hence there is still some uncertainty. Subdivisions of the bath are hin (1/6 bath) and log (1/12 hin).

The liquid measures of NT times are difficult to equate with those of the OT. The English "measure" may equal a kōr, as in Luke 16:7, or a bath, as in Luke 16:6. The firkin of John 2:6 (KJV) held about 10.3 US gallons.

The homer was the standard dry measure of the OT. Homer means "donkey," and therefore a donkey-load, or about 6¼ bushels. It is to be equated with the cor. The ephah (about 3/5 bushel) is the dry opposite of the liquid measure bath (Ezek. 45:10). The lethekh is mentioned only in Hosea 3:2 and is probably given its correct value in the KJV, which translates it "half homer."

Three smaller dry measures are: the se'âh, about 1/5 bushel; the 'ōmer, 4 dry pints; the 'issārôn ("tenth deal," KJV, "tenth measure," RSV), evidently equivalent to the omer; and the cab, a little more than two dry pints. It must be added that modern authorities differ greatly as to the value of the dry measures, some inclining toward a substantially higher value for each. The system followed here is substantially that of R. B. Y. Scott in the article referred to at the end of this subject.

NT dry measures are: bushel (Matt. 5:15), about 7½ dry quarts or slightly less than ½ US bushel; measure ("quart" RSV), about 1 dry quart; pot (Mark 7:4), about 1 dry pint.

Weights. It must be remembered that coinage was not used in Palestine until after the Exile. Ezra 2:69 is probably the first mention of coined money in the Bible ("drams," KJV, "daries," RSV). During most of OT times, barter (Gen. 30:27-34; 31:8; II Kings 3:4) or precious metal weighed out was the means of exchange. The shekel is a weight in the OT, not a coin (Ezek. 4:10), and the verb shāqal means "to weigh out," as in Jeremiah 32:10. Simple balance scales were used, and stones of certain weight (often shekels) were used to determine the weight of the silver or gold involved in the transaction. Proverbs 16:11 reads literally

"The stones (English Bible 'weights') in the bag." In the Canaanite poem (found at Ras Shamra in Syria) describing the wedding of Nikkal and the Moon, occurs a description of the weighing of the marriage price, a good illustration of an ancient business transaction:

Her father sets the beam of the balances
Her mother, the trays of the balances
Her brothers arrange the ingots(?)
Her sisters (attend) to the stones of the balances (77:34-39).

In addition to the Biblical references to weights, quite a few stone weight-pieces (especially shekels) have been found in the excavations in Palestine, many of them labeled. There is a certain amount of disparity among these. Some have speculated that this is graphic evidence for the necessity of the prophetic indictment of the dishonest merchants who "make the ephah small and the shekel great, and deal deceitfully with false balances" (Amos 8:5 RSV). While this explanation is not to be ruled out completely, it must never be forgotten that life in ancient Palestine was simple, rural and predominantly agricultural. Most of the time there was no strong central government, and certainly no bureau of weights and measures. To some extent, the period of David and Solomon is an exception to this. David seems to have had a "king's weight" (II Sam. 14:26). That standardization which controls every aspect of modern life and makes modern men so much alike in all their ways was almost completely lacking. In the summer of 1958 the writer of this article found farmers in eastern Jordan selling grapes and melons by simple balance scales, with roughly cut stones for weights. No doubt such simple arrangements usually sufficed in Bible times. Estimates of values of ancient weights must therefore be rather general, and figures taken to two decimal places represent a futile attempt to reduce ancient men to the monotony of modern uniformity.

The Hebrews used a modified sexagesimal system of weights modeled on that of the Babylonians. The shekel (called by the Babylonians shiqlu) was the basic unit. Fifty shekels equaled a maneh (or mina; Babylonian manû), and 60 manehs a talent (Hebrew kikkār; Babylonian biltu). A shekel was made up of 20 gerahs. A bekah was half a shekel.

The Babylonians had 60 shekels in their maneh, but from Exodus 38:25,26 it appears that the Hebrew maneh consisted of only 50. Half a shekel was paid by 603,550 men, and totaled 100 talents and 1,775 shekels, which means that the talent here equaled 3,000 shekels. Since the talent was almost always 60 manehs, the maneh here equals 50 shekels. Ezekiel uses a different system, with 60 shekels to the maneh (45:12).

When one attempts to define the shekel in terms of presently understood weights the difficulties are formidable. One of the best recent treatments of the problem is R. B. Y. Scott's (see Bibliography at end of article), which takes into account the many stone weights found in Palestine and computes values in great detail. The weight-pieces discovered vary greatly. In addition to the double standard mentioned above and the generally unregimented way of ancient Israelite life, the standards themselves may have tended to depreciate, as standards do. The influence of foreign systems may also have been a disturbing factor. The larger weights seem to indicate smaller shekel units than do the smaller weights.

The beqa' or half shekel is the only weight the name of which is mentioned both in the OT and on discovered weights, and of which the relationship to the shekel is given (Exod. 38:26). Several stone weights have been found with the Hebrew consonants BQ' (beqa') cut on them, weighing on an average about 6 grams (actual weights vary from 5.8 to 6.65 gm.). One thing these beqa' weights indicated: the shekel weighed about 12 grams. Therefore the numerous stones bearing a symbol resembling a figure 8 with an open loop, weighing about 12 grams, must be shekel weights. This symbol seems to be a representation of a tied bundle of lump silver (see illustration).

Scott concludes that there were three standards for a shekel: the temple shekel of 10 grams (about .35 oz.), the common or commercial shekel of about 11½ grams (.4 oz.), and a "heavy" shekel of about 13 grams (.45 oz.). The last of these was probably used in weighing some special commodity.

Certain recent excavations have yielded weights inscribed pim, weighing about 2/3 of a shekel. Thus the name of another unit of Hebrew weight is recovered and light is shed on a difficult statement in I Samuel 13:21. This verse contains the word pim, which was unknown elsewhere and believed to be a textual corruption. Now that pim is known to be the name of a weight, the RSV is able to give an improved translation, which indicates that the Philistines, to keep the Hebrews in subjection, made it difficult for the Hebrews to get iron implements and probably overcharged them for repairing them.

The Common Shekel

Name	Comparative value	Value today
talent	60 minehs	75.5 lbs.
mineh	50 shekels	20 oz.
bekah	10 gerahs	88 gr.
gerah		9 gr.

Few weights are mentioned in the NT. Talent and pound in Luke 19:13-25 are sums of money. Pound in John 12:3 and 19:39 represents another Greek word, litra, a weight of some 7/10 pound avoirdupois.

Wells are extremely important in the arid regions of Palestine. At left is a busy scene at a desert well. At right, a large goatskin bucket is being drawn up by a pulley and camel power. © MPS

WELL (Heb. be'ēr, Gr. phréar), a pit or hole dug in the earth down to the water-table, i.e., the level at which the ground is permanently saturated with water. For purposes of safety as well as permanence, the well is generally surrounded by a wall of stone, and in the case of some famous wells, like that of Jacob at Sychar (John 4) the walls were beautifully constructed with dressed stone. A well is generally to be distinguished from a cistern (Jer. 2:13), which is merely for storing water, a spring, which is found at the surface of the ground, and a fountain, from which the water is actively flowing (Josh. 15:9).

WEST (Heb. yām, sea; māvô', setting of the sun; ma'ărāv, west; Gr. dysmé). Yam, sea, is the Heb. word usually used for "west," because the Mediterranean Sea lies to the W of Palestine. The word is sometimes used figuratively with "east" to denote great distance (Ps. 103:12).

WHALE (See Animals)

WHEAT (See Plants)

WHEEL (Heb. 'ôphan, galgal, gilgal, 'ovnayim, pa'am, Gr. trochós), probably at first just a disk of wood cut from a log, but quite early developed into something resembling the modern device. When the Egyptians with their chariots pursued the Israelites at the Red Sea (Exod. 14:24,25), the Lord took off their chariot wheels. In I Kings 7: 30-33 where the bases of the great "sea" of Solomon's temple are described, reference is made to wheels with their axle-trees, their naves, spokes and felloes, showing that by Solomon's time (c. 1000 B.C.) the wheel was quite developed and was similar to modern wagonwheels. Cart-wheels were used for threshing some kinds of grain, but not cummin (Isa. 28:27). The word for "potter's wheel" means literally "two stones" (Jer. 18:3). In ancient times two circular stone disks were joined by a short shaft, and so spun. Today, the shaft is longer and the wheels are of wood.

WHELP (Heb. gūr or gôr), one of the young of a dog or a beast of prey; a cub. In the Bible the term is always used figuratively (Gen. 49:9; Deut. 33: 22; Jer. 51:38; Nah. 2:11,12).

WHIP (Heb. shôt), an instrument of punishment or inciting to work; generally a lash attached to a handle. Used figuratively by Rehoboam of his father (I Kings 12:14).

WHIRLWIND (Heb. sûphâh, se'ārâh, sa'ar), in Biblical usage does not exactly conform to our modern idea of a violent whirling as at the vortex of a tornado; but rather emphasizes the idea of being tossed about. These Hebrew words are often rendered "storm" or "tempest," which is a more accurate translation; and they are used figuratively of swift and terrible destruction (Prov. 1:27; Isa. 5:28; Jer. 4:13; Hos. 8:7). Elijah was carried to heaven by a whirlwind (II Kings 2:1,11).

WHORE (Heb. zānâh, Gr. pórne), a woman who habitually commits adultery or fornication, especially for hire; a prostitute, harlot. It is noteworthy that in a very large proportion of cases, the word is used for idolatry. The two words "adultery" and "idolatry" can be identically defined as "taking the love which belongs to one and giving it to another." In the former case, the one wronged is the wife or husband who has been deserted; in the latter it is God. The practice of selling daughters into whoredom was not unknown in Israel (Lev. 19: 29), but was forbidden of the Lord. Whoredom was a capital crime (Gen. 38:24).

WIDOW (Heb. 'almānâh, Gr. chéra). Widows in the OT are regarded as being under God's special care (Ps. 68:5; 146:9; Prov. 15:25). From early times they wore a distinctive garb. The Hebrews were commanded to treat them with special consideration and they were punished if they did otherwise (Exod. 22:22; Deut. 14:29; Isa. 1:17; Jer. 7:6). The church looked after poor widows in apostolic times (Acts 6:1; James 1:27). Paul gives instructions to Timothy about the care of widows by the church (I Tim. 5:4); but only those were taken care of who were at least 60 years of age, had been married only once, and had a reputation for good works (vs. 9,10). In the second and third centuries there was an order of widows in the church. Its members looked after the women of the congregation. This order was abolished by the synod of Laodicea, A.D. 364. WILD VINE OR GRAPE (See Plants, Vine)

WILDERNESS. In Scripture this word refers either to a barren desert or to an uncultivated region suitable for pasturage and occupied by nomads. (1) The most common Heb. word rendered "wilderness" is midhbār, a place for the driving of cattle (Num. 14:33; Judg. 1:16; Deut. 2:8). The word may refer to grassy pastures (Ps. 65:12; Joel 2:22) or a waste of rock and sand (Deut. 32:10; Job 38:26); (2) yeshîmôn; sometimes rendered as a proper name "Yeshimon" in the KJV (Num. 21:20) refers to a dry or riverless region (Isa. 43:19,20); (3) 'ărāvâh, arid, barren (Isa. 33:9; 51:3) when used with the definite article denotes the plain of the Jordan and Dead Sea (Ezek. 47:8; II Sam. 2:29) and is rendered "Arabah" in the RV; (4) tsiyyâh, land of drought (Hos. 2:3); (5) tohû, empty waste (Job. 6:18; 12:24; Ps. 107:40) refers to barren deserts; (6) Gr. éremos, a word which like midhbār above is used with considerable latitude (Matt. 14:13; Heb. 11:38).

WILLOW (See Plants)

WILLOWS, BROOK OF THE, a brook on the boundary of Moab (Isa. 15:7); generally identified with the Zered (Wâdi el-Hesā) which flows into the southern end of the Dead Sea and forms the boundary between Edom and Moab.

WILLS, or testaments, are statements, oral or written in form, to which law courts give effect, by which property may be disposed of after death. Covenants between living persons might be bilateral, each party making promises, or unilateral, an agreement by one party which the other may accept or reject, but may not alter. Wills grew out of the latter. In early times among the Hebrews as elsewhere, property descended according to laws of inheritance without wills. The only distinct Bible reference to a will is in Hebrews 9:16, 17, and the meaning of this is disputed. The context (9:11-22) seems to assimilate the testament to a unilateral covenant of God with His people: Greek diathéke always primarily meant a will, but was used in the LXX for Heb. berîth, covenant. The fact that here an instrument effective only after the death of the one who made it is in question, justifies RSV in translating it as "will."

WINDOW (See House)

WINDS are important in the Bible, both literally and figuratively. God causes them, He created them (Gen. 8:1; Exod. 13:10; Num. 11:31; Ps. 107:25; 135:7; 147:18; Jer. 10:13=51:16; Jonah 1:4). The four winds are limits of distance or direction (Jer. 49:36; Ezek. 37:9; Dan. 7:2; 8:8; 11:4; Zech. 2:6; Matt. 24:31=Mark 13:27; Rev. 7:1). Of the cardinal directions, the east wind is most frequently mentioned (Exod. 10:13; 14:21; Job 15:2; Ps. 48:7; Isa. 27:8; Jer. 18:17; Ezek. 17:10; 19:12; 27:26; Hos. 12:1; 13:15; Jonah 4:8; Gen. 41:6,23,27; Job 27:21; 38:14; Ps. 78:26; Hab. 1:9). It is stormy, wrecks ships, withers growing things. The north wind brings rain (Prov. 25:23), is refreshing (S. of Sol. 4:16) or stormy (Ezek. 1:4). The south wind is gentle, helps growth (S. of Sol. 4:16; Ps. 78:26; Job 37:17). The west wind blew away the plague of locusts (Exod. 10:19). Winds figure in notable storms (I Kings 18:45; 19:11; Job 1:9; Matt. 8:26,27=Mark 4:35,37, 39,41=Luke 8:23-25; Matt. 14:24,30,32=Mark 6:48,51=John 6:18; Acts 27:4,7,14,15). In Acts 27:13; 28:13 the south wind (Gr. nótos), in 27:12 the northwest wind (chóros) and the southwest wind (líps) are named; in 27:14 the northeaster (RSV), Gr. eurakúlon. Whirlwinds are mentioned several times. Wind blows chaff (Ps. 1:4; 35:5; 83:13; Isa. 17:14; 41:16; Jer. 13:24; Dan. 2:35; Job 21:18); fulfils God's commands (Ps. 148:8; 104:4 RSV); reveals weakness, transitoriness, worthlessness (Job 7:7; 15:2; 30:15,22; 6:26; 8:2; Ps. 18:42; 78:39; 103:16; Prov. 11:29; 25:14; 27:16; 30:4; Eccl. 5:16; 11:4; Isa. 7:2; 26:18; 41:8; 57:13; 64:6; Jer. 5:11; 22:22; 49:32); clears the sky (Job 37:21); drives ships (James 3:4). Elisha promises water not brought by wind (II Kings 3:17). God rides on the wings of the wind (II Sam. 22:11=Ps. 18:10; 104:3). The circulation of the wind is recognized (Eccl. 1:6). Wind has a drying effect (Isa. 11:15; Jer. 4:11,12). Princes are to be a hiding place from the wind (Isa. 32:2). An observation of animal life (Jer. 2:24; 14:16 RSV). Ezekiel scattered hair to symbolize scattering of the people (Ezek. 5:2,10,12; 12:14; 17:21). Strong, destructive winds (Jer. 51:1; Ezek. 13:11,13; Hos. 4:19; 13:15). A proverbial expression: "sow the wind, reap the whirlwind" (Hos. 8:7). The weight of the wind (Job 28:25). Believers are warned against evil winds of false doctrine (Eph. 4:4; Jude 12). Stars will fall like figs shaken from a tree by the wind (Rev. 6:13). Wind moved the wings of women carrying an ephah (Zech. 5:9). Wind in Heb. is usually rûah, translated also breath, spirit, etc.; in Gr. ánemos, always wind. Once each, Gr. pneúma, breath, wind, spirit (John 3:8); pnoé, breath (Acts 2:2); the verb pnéo, blow (Acts 27:40). E.R.

WINE. Several Heb. words occur, of which two are frequent. Yayin, wine; as a common drink (Gen. 14:18); as a drink-offering (Lev. 23:13); intoxicating (Gen. 9:21); figuratively, of wisdom (Prov. 9:2,5), of wrath (Jer. 25:15), of love (S. of Sol. 1:2; 4:10). Tîrôsh, must, fresh or sweet wine; with approval (Gen. 27:28; Judg. 9:13; II Kings 18:32; Zech. 9:17); once with disapproval (Hos. 4:11). Priests were forbidden to drink wine on duty (Lev. 10:9; Ezek. 44:21). Nazirites were not even to touch grapes while under a vow (Num. 6:5,20; Judg. 13:4-14; Luke 1:15). Abuse of wine is condemned in Proverbs (4:17-31:6), also in the prophets (Isa. 5:11), but God offers wine of His Word (Isa. 55:1). In the NT, Gr. oínos, wine; once gleúkos, new, sweet wine; or grape juice; which may imply that the disciples, known to drink only unfermented grape juice, in their exuberant enthusiasm appeared intoxicated. New wine fermenting would burst old wineskins (Matt. 9:17). Jesus refused the wine offered Him on the cross because it was drugged (Mark 15:25). Jesus contrasts Himself with John the Baptist (Luke 7:33, 34) as one who ate and drank with others. In OT times wine was not diluted. Before NT times, the Hellenistic practice of mixing it with much water was common in Palestine. Wine was a disinfectant (Luke 10:34) and medicine (I Tim. 5:23). It is right for a Christian not to drink wine, if it causes his brother to stumble (Rom. 14:21). Men (I Tim. 3:8) and women (Titus 2:3) church officers were warned against over-indulgence. Jesus made water into wine at Cana (John 2:2-11).

Means for preserving grape-juice were well known: Cato, De Agri Cultura CXX has this recipe: "If you wish to have must (grape-juice) all year, put grape-juice in an amphora and seal the cork with pitch; sink it in a fishpond. After 30 days take it out. It will be grape-juice for a whole year." At the Last Supper Jesus spoke of "the fruit of the vine" (Matt. 26:29), as in the Passover liturgy; it may be a studied avoidance of the term wine, indicating that the drink was unfermented, as the bread was unleavened. Whatever use Jesus or others made of wine is no proof that its use in our tense age is wise. The Bible gives more space to the danger than to the benefit of wine. E.R.

WINEPRESS, Heb. gath (Judg. 6:11; Neh. 13:15; Isa. 63:2,3), Gr. lenós (Matt. 21:33), a trough, usually of stone, cement-lined, from which juice flowed through a hole near the bottom into a vat (Heb. yeqev; Num. 18:27,30; Judg. 7:25; Isa. 5:2; Gr. hypolénion, Mark 12:1). The grapes were pressed by men treading them, holding to ropes suspended overhead. The process is compared to the execution of the wrath of God (Lam. 1:15; Rev. 14:19,20; 19:15).

WINESKIN (See Bottles)

WING (Heb. kānāph, Gr. ptéryx). Birds (Lev. 1:17); cherubim (I Kings 6:24) or "living creatures" (Ezek. 16; 10:5; Rev. 4:8) have wings. Migration is suggested in Job 39:26. The most significant Bible uses of wings are figurative: wings of the wind (Ps. 18:10); to seek rest (Ps. 55:6); refuge in God (Ps. 17:8; 91:4); emblem of prosperity (Ps. 68:13; vanishing, Prov. 23:5); rays of the rising sun (Ps. 139:9; Mal. 4:2); renewed strength (Isa. 40:31); compassion (Matt. 23:37). Note two symbolic women (Zech. 5:9; cf. Rev. 12:4).

WINTER, Heb. hōreph, harvest-time, autumn; and the cold, rainy season following (Gen. 8:22; Ps. 74:17; Zech. 14:8); verb "to winter" (Isa. 18:6). Heb. sethāw, winter (S. of Sol. 2:11). Gr. cheimón, winter; the cold, stormy season (Matt. 24:20; Mark 13:18; John 10:22; II Tim. 4:21) and related verbs (Acts 27:12; 28:11; I Cor. 16:6; Titus 3:12).

WINTERHOUSE (Heb. bēth ha-hōreph). Kings and the wealthy had separate residences for the hot and cold seasons (Amos 3:15). King Jehoiakim had a fire in the brazier in his winterhouse (Jer. 36:20).

WISDOM. The commonest OT words for wisdom are Heb. hākham and related forms; Gr. sophía. In God, the infinite, perfect comprehension of all that is or might be (Rom. 11:33-36). In man, an eminently practical attribute, including technical skill (Exod. 28:3, RSV an able mind); military prowess (Isa. 10:13); shrewdness for questionable ends (I Kings 2:6). Wisdom is shown in getting desired ends by effective means. Men of the world are often wiser in their generation than the children of light (Luke 16:8). Yet God is the source of wisdom as of power, and wisdom is given to men through the fear of the Lord (Ps. 111:10; Job 28:28). The wisdom of Solomon was far-ranging in statecraft (I Kings 10:23,24), understanding of human nature (I Kings 3:16-25), in natural history, literature, and popular proverbs (I Kings 4:29-34). Wisdom is personified (Prov. 8) in terms related to the concept of the Word in John 1:1-18, and became one of the names of God the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit being the Spirit of Wisdom.

Wisdom Literature in the OT consists of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and Job, with Psalms 19, 37, 104, 107, 147, 148 and short passages in other books; in the OT Apocrypha, Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom of Solomon. Heb. wisdom was not all religious: it dealt, as in Proverbs, with everyday conduct in business, family and social relations, elementary morality. Ecclesiastes ranges farther afield to consider the ultimate value of life. Wise men, unlike prophets, claimed no special inspiration. They exercised no priestly functions, and were not, like the scribes, devoted exclusively to the study of the sacred writings. Eventually wise men and scribes coalesced into one class. With worsening political conditions and a deepening sense of moral problems in the period of the prophets and later kings, men came to despise worldly wisdom as irreligious and as characteristic of the heathen, who might be superior in secular culture, but were inferior from a moral and religious point of view (Isa. 10:12-19). Wisdom is bound up with doing the will of the Lord (Deut. 4:6); to forsake His Word is to forfeit one's wisdom (Jer. 8:8,9). Though wisdom literature often seems to equate right with advantage (profit, Eccl. 1:5), there is clear evidence of the controlling hand and moral interest of God in human affairs. The sayings of Jesus, largely proverbial and parabolical, are the crown of Biblical wisdom. Paul calls Jesus "the wisdom of God" (I Cor. 1:24,30), and says that in Him all the treasures of wisdom are hidden (Col. 2:3). When Paul compares the wisdom of men with the wisdom of God (I Cor. 2), he is thinking of the former as that of Greek philosophers rather than OT Biblical wisdom. James' letter is wisdom literature at its best, a clear mirror of the teaching of Jesus. E.R.

WISDOM OF JESUS, SON OF SIRACH (See Apocrypha)

WISDOM OF SOLOMON (See Apocrypha)

WISE MEN. The name is often applied to men of understanding and skill in ordinary affairs (Prov. 1:5; Job 15:2; Ps. 49:10; Eccl. 2:4; I Cor. 1:26; 10:15; James 3:13); to Solomon superlatively (I Kings 2:9; 5:7; II Chron. 2:12); there are wise ladies (Judg. 5:29) or court women (II Sam. 14:2; 20:16). In a more specialized sense in Israel, the builders of the tabernacle (Exod. 34:8); the leaders of the tribes (Deut. 1:13,15). Wise, understanding, experienced older men came to be recognized as a distinct class, widely esteemed by the discerning. In heathen nations the wise men, grouped with and identified as magicians, sorcerers, enchanters, astrologers, Chaldeans, appear in Egypt (Gen. 41:8; Exod. 7:11), Babylon (Dan. 2:12-5:15), and Persia (Esth. 1:13, men "who knew the times" RSV; 6:13 Haman's friends). The wise men of Matthew 2:1-16, the Magi, Gr. magoi, are shadowy figures, except for this one incident. Magoi originally referred to the Median priestly caste in Persia, who were both religious leaders and philosophical teachers. While this meaning continued throughout Greek history, the word developed the further meaning, any "possessors of supernatural knowledge and power." From this the descent to "magician" was easy, and thence to "deceiver," still with a religious reference. This development was aided by confusion of the word magos, borrowed from Persian, with another Greek word, maganon, always associated with charms and sorceries. Among the Jews, rabbinic literature applies the name to both magicians and Persian priests. In Philo it refers to a man something less than truly religious or philosophical. In the LXX, magoi are linked with "astrologers, sorcerers and Chaldeans" (Dan. 2:1). The clues to the meaning Matthew intended are the facts that the wise men are from the East, that is, Mesopotamia, Persia, or possibly farther E; and that they followed a star; that is, they were astrologers. Astrology was more respectable in ancient times than it is today. It was inextricably mixed with astronomy. Theirs was both the best science of the day, and the purest religion outside of the most spiritual strain of Judaism. Legend says there were three, gives them names and countries of origin, mounts them on camels. We know only that there were at least two, and that they came from the East. E.R.

WITCH, a woman, in early England, also a man, in league with evil spirits. Heb. kāshaph, to practice sorcery, is sometimes so translated in ASV, often in RSV (Exod. 22:18; Deut. 18:10; II Chron. 33:6; II Kings 9:22; Mic. 5:12; Nah. 3:4 ASV charms). Heb. qesem, divination, is once translated "witchcraft" (I Sam. 15:23 KJV, ASV) otherwise "divination." Greek pharmakeía (Gal. 5:20 ASV, RSV sorcery) means the use of drugs, charms or magic words. In Acts 8:9,11, "bewitch" renders Greek exístemi, to amaze; in Galatians 3:1, Greek baskaíno, to use the evil eye on one. The famous witch of Endor (I Sam. 28:7-25) is not called a witch in the Bible; KJV, ASV "a woman that hath a familiar spirit," RSV "a woman who is a medium." By whatever name, all such practices are strongly condemned (Exod. 22:18; Deut. 18:9-14; I Sam. 28:3,9; II Kings 23:24; Isa. 8:19; Acts 19:18,19).

WITHE (wĭth, wīth, Heb. yether, bowstring, cord), a strong, flexible willow or other twig. The "green withes" with which Samson was bound (Judg. 16:7-9) were probably new (ASV margin) or fresh (RSV) bowstrings.

WITHERED HAND (See Diseases)

WITNESS (Heb. 'ēdh and related forms; Gr. mártys and related words and combinations), one who may be called to testify to an event at which he was present. Things may be witnesses; a heap of stones (Gen. 31:44-52), as a sign that God witnessed Jacob and Laban's covenant; a song (Deut. 31:19-21); the Law (Deut. 31:26); an altar (Josh. 22:27-34); a stone which has "heard" God speak (Josh. 24:27); an altar and a pillar on the border of Egypt (Isa. 19:20). Bearing false witness is condemned (Exod. 20:16; 23:2; Deut. 5:20) and punished as for the crime of which one accused another (Deut. 19:16-18). True and false witnesses are contrasted (Prov. 14:5). Two or three witnesses were required in legal proceedings (Deut. 19:15; Matt. 18:16; II Cor. 13:1; I Tim. 5:19; Heb. 10:28). Jeremiah (32:6-25,44) describes the use of witnesses in a conveyance of real property. The tabernacle of witness or testimony (Num. 17:7,8; 10:2; II Chron. 24:6) was so named because in it was the witness of God's presence, the tables of the Law and the Shekinah. God is called upon as a witness (Gen. 31:50; Job 16:19; Jer. 29:23; 42:5; Mic. 1:2; Mal. 3:5; Rom. 1:9; I Thess. 2:5, 10). On solemn occasions men acknowledged themselves witnesses (Josh. 24:22; Ruth 4:9-11). God called His people His witnesses (Isa. 43:10, 12; 44:8; Luke 24:48; Acts 1:8) and the apostles acknowledged themselves to be such (Acts 2:32; 3:15; 5:32; 10:39,41; I Thess. 2:10). Peter thought that Judas must be replaced as a witness (Acts 1:22). Paul had a special appointment as witness (Acts 22:15; 26:16). He reminds Timothy of many witnesses (I Tim. 6:12; II Tim. 2:2). Peter exhorts as a witness of the sufferings of Christ (I Pet. 5:1). John calls Jesus Christ the "faithful witness" (Rev. 1:5; 3:14). The cloud of witnesses (Heb. 12:1) resemble the crowd of spectators at athletic games.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT. "When we cry, 'Abba! Father!' it is the Spirit himself bearing witness with our spirit that we are children of God" (Rom. 8:15b,16). Verses 17-27 develop the work of the Holy Spirit in and for us in consequence of this new, intimate, filial relationship to God. The origin of this witness in the work of Christ, and its operation in the believer, is further spelled out in I John 5:6-13. The content of the witness of the Spirit appears in John 14:16,17,26; 15:26; 16:7-15; Romans 5:5; I Corinthians 2 and wherever the work of the Holy Spirit in relation to the believer is spoken of. The Spirit witnesses through Scripture (Heb. 10:15-18), sometimes expressly on particular subjects (I Tim. 4:1; Acts 20:23). The witness of the Spirit, though direct, immediate and personal, is always in harmony with the written Word: we are to test the spirits, for many spirits other than the Spirit of God seek to get our attention (I John 4:1-6). This is the test: the Spirit of God witnesses to the incarnate humanity of God's only-begotten Son. The Holy Spirit talks about Jesus, not about Himself (John 16:13-15). E.R.

WIZARD (wĭz'ĕrd, Heb. yidde'ōnî, one who knows), a male or female magician or sorcerer; one acquainted with the secrets of the unseen world, or an intimate acquaintance of soothsayers (Lev. 19:31; 20:6,27; Deut. 18:11; I Sam. 28:3,9; II Kings 21:6; 23:24; II Chron. 33:6; Isa. 8:19; 19:3).

WOMAN (Heb. 'ishshâh, Gr. gýné). Genesis (1:26,27) asserts the full humanity of woman. The special account of her creation (Gen. 2:18-24) emphasizes woman's superiority to all lower animals; man's need of her as helper; her intimate relationship to him as part of his inmost being; and the indissoluble nature of marriage. Though many OT women were shadowy, subordinate figures, the patriarchal wives Sarah, Rebekah and Rachel were outstanding; likewise Moses' sister Miriam (Exod. 2:1-9; 15:21; Num. 12). In the period of the Judges Deborah exercised unusual leadership (Judg. 4,5) and the Moabitess Ruth became a chaste blessing to Israel. Hannah (I Sam. 1:1-2:11) illustrates both the despair of a childless woman and the grace of godly motherhood. The advice of Lemuel's mother to her son (Prov. 31) pictures the tireless life of woman in even a prosperous family. Queens good and bad, and evil women of lesser degree are frankly portrayed in the Bible. The ancient world was a man's world: such prominence as women attained was achieved by force of character; sometimes, as in the case of Esther, aided by circumstances not of her seeking. The teaching of Jesus stressed the original nature of marriage; the obligation of purity toward women (Matt. 5:27-32). His example in healing (Matt. 9:18-26) and social intercourse (Luke 10:38-42) reinforced His words. The Gospel of Luke is full of evidence of Jesus' understanding of and sympathy with women, which set a pattern for normal Christian living. Godly women were influential in Jesus' background: Elizabeth, mother of His forerunner (Luke 1); the Virgin Mary; Anna (Luke 2:36-38); the sinner of Luke 7:36-40: Mary Magdalene; Martha and Mary of Bethany; the women who accompanied the disciples on missionary journeys and who provided for them out of their means (Luke 8:3 RSV). Women remained at the crucifixion until the burial, and were first at the empty tomb. Between the Ascension and Pentecost women joined the men in prayer (Acts 1:14). The disciples met in the house of Mary, mother of John Mark in Jerusalem (Acts 12:12). Women were the first converts in Europe, including the prosperous business woman Lydia at Philippi (Acts 16:13-15). Phoebe, a deaconess, and many other women are greeted in Romans 16. Paul (I Cor. 11:2-16; 14:34,35) urges subordination for women, in the immoral atmosphere of Corinth, but exalts her as a type of the Church, the Bride of Christ (Eph. 5:21-33). He sets high standards for the wives of church officers, and for women in official position (I Tim. 3:11; Titus 2:3-5). I Peter 3:1-6 urges a subordinate but noble role for married women. To evaluate Bible teaching with regard to women, it is necessary to consider carefully all the pertinent material, and to hold firmly to the normative and authoritative character of the words, deeds and attitude of Jesus Christ. WOOL (Heb. tsemer, Gr. érion), the fleece of sheep and some other animals. A first fruit to the priests (Deut. 18:4). Israelites were forbidden to wear mixed woolen and linen stuff (Deut. 22:11). It symbolizes purity (Isa. 1:18), "as wool," restored to its original undyed whiteness. It was woven into cloth from which woolen garments were made. It was used principally for the outside garments. Snow is compared to it (Ps. 147:16).

WORD, WORD OF THE LORD. Of several Heb. words translated "word" the commonest is dāvār, a thing said. Greek lógos, a thing to be said, stresses the thought in the mind of the speaker; rhéma, the thing said, the expression; but the choice is often one of emphasis rather than of meaning. Lógos is used of Jesus as the Revelation of God (John 1:1; I John 1:1; Rev. 19:13; Heb. 1:2). He is the supreme and definitive Word or Revelation of God. Before He came into the world, the Word of God came to men through patriarchs (Gen. 15:1), through the lawgiver Moses (Exod. 4:30; 20:1), and through prophets (Num. 22:38; II Kings 7:1; Isa. 1:10; Jer. 1:2). The Word of the Lord is creative (Ps. 33:6; Gen. 1:3,6,9,11,14,20,24,26; Heb. 11:3). The Word of God is sure (Ps. 119:89; Isa. 40:8) forever, and cannot be broken (John 10:35). Words are distinguished from power (I Cor. 4:20; I Thess. 1:5) and from deeds (Mal. 2:17; I Cor. 4:20; I John 3:18), for the Word of God is to be done as well as heard and talked about (James 1:22-25).

WORLD. The Biblical meanings are best described under the several Heb. and Gr. words. Heb. 'erets, earth, land, country, ground, is rendered "world" when speaking of the kingdoms of the world (Isa. 23:17; Jer. 23:26). Heb. hedhel occurs once (Isa. 38:11 and is thought to mean "land of cessation" (of earthly existence), i.e., Sheol. Heb. heledh, short duration (Ps. 17:14; 49:1) refers to the ephemeral character of life. Heb. 'ôlām, long duration, past or future (usually translated "ever," etc.) always referring to time: ASV, RSV "eternity" (Eccl. 3:11), RSV "eternity" (Isa. 45:17), ASV, RSV "of old" (Isa. 64:4). The commonest Heb. word for world is tēvēl, the habitable earth, the earth as made for man, often parallel and synonymous with "earth."

In the NT, Greek gé, earth, land, ground, country, is rendered "world" once in KJV (Rev. 13:3 ASV, RSV earth). Greek aión and derivatives developed in meaning from "life-force, lifetime" to "age, period of time, eternity." Where KJV has "world," ASV sometimes, margin usually, RSV, have "age, forever, of old" or the like. Present and future are contrasted (Matt. 13:22; Mark 10:30; Luke 18:30; 20:34,35; Eph. 1:21). Aión and derivatives primarily refer to limited but long periods of time; also, especially in phrases where the word is repeated, to endless time, eternity. Greek oikouméne is first geographical (the inhabited earth: Matt. 24:14; Luke 4:5; 21:26; Acts 17:31; Rom. 10:18; Heb. 1:6); then cultural (the Hellenistic world: Acts 19:27); then political (the Roman Empire: Luke 2:1; Acts 11:28; 24:5); though a first century man felt them practically coëxtensive (Rev. 3:10; 12:9; 16:14). ASV margin has "inhabited earth" in all cases. Hebrews 2:5 uses oikouméne of the world to come. Greek kósmos and derivatives range over the meanings "order, beauty, world, universe," never losing their connotation of harmony and beauty. Kósmos is a favorite word with John, used of Jesus as Creator (John 1:10; 17:5), Redeemer (1:29; 3:16,17; 4:42; 6:35,51; 12:47; I John 2:2; 4:9,14), Light of the world (John 1:9; 3:19; 8:12; 9:5; 12:46), Prophet (6:14), He that cometh, Christ (11:27), Judge (9:39; 12:31; 16:11). The contrast between Jesus and His disciples on the one hand, and the world on the other, is drawn in John 8:23; 14:17-22; 15:18, 19; 17:9; 18:36, and often in I John. John 17 is rich in references to the relation of believers to the world, considered as a fallen universe hostile to God. In the epistles the ethical meaning prevails (e.g., I Cor. 1:20-28). Other uses are: "since the world began" (John 9:35); the sun as the light of the world (11:9); the prince of this world (14:30). Heb. cosmology is not tied in with the concept "world" so much as with "heaven and earth" (Gen. 1:1), which embraces the God-oriented universe of sun, moon, planets, stars and earth, with the abode of God above and Sheol beneath. The Heb. words for "world" refer either to the earth itself, or as formed for and inhabited by man. Greek cosmology must be reckoned with in the use of such terms as aión and kósmos in the LXX and in the NT. Aión denotes the temporal or durative aspect of that which exists; kósmos the ordered arrangement, though disordered by sin, of all that is, except God. The kósmos includes angels, spiritual principalities and powers, men, beasts, earth, heavenly bodies, Hades. In the NT, kósmos commonly refers to man and his affairs, especially in an evil sense, over against the new life in Christ, the kingdom of God, the Body of Christ, the Church. As God is in the world but not of it, so are we: God's mode of being penetrates without mixture the world's mode of being. A physical analogy would be the penetration of iron by magnetism, or of copper by electricity. Cf. John 17:14-18. E.R.

WORM (See Insects)

WORMWOOD (See Plants)

WORSHIP (Heb. shāhâh, bow down, prostrate, Gr. proskynéo, to prostrate, do obeisance to), the honor, reverence, and homage paid to superior beings or powers, whether men, angels, or God. The English word means "worthship," and denotes the worthiness of the individual receiving the special honor due to his worth. While the word is used of men, it is especially used of the divine honors paid to a deity, whether of the heathen religions or the true and living God.

When given to God, worship involves an acknowledgement of Divine perfections. It may express itself in the form of direct address, as in adoration or thanksgiving, or in service to God; and may be private or public, involving a cultus. Worship presupposes that God is, that He can be known by man, and that His perfections set Him far above man.

In the Bible public worship is found in four stages of development. The first is the somewhat primitive mode practiced until the building of the Temple. During this time no sharp line was drawn between private and public worship. In the second stage it became highly organized in the Temple ritual, which indeed had its origin in the Tabernacle set up in the wilderness. It was led by the priests assisted by the Levites, and included a complex ritual and system of sacrifices. The third stage was that of the synagogue, which began during the Exile. This greatly differed from worship in the Temple. Whereas the latter was centralized in Jerusalem, the former was found wherever there were Jews. In the synagogues, however, the emphasis was more upon instruction than upon worship, although the latter was not neglected. The fourth stage was that of the early Christian churches. Jewish Christians continued, as long as they were permitted, to worship in the Temple and in the synagogue, although for them the whole ceremonial and sacrificial system ended with the death and resurrection of Jesus. Public Christian worship developed along the lines of the synagogue. It appears that from the first, Christians met in homes for private brotherhood meetings, and the time was the Lord's Day (John 20:19,26; Acts 20:7; I Cor. 16:2). Christian public worship consisted of preaching (Acts 20:7; I Cor. 14:19), reading of Scripture (James 1:22; Col. 4:16), prayer (I Cor. 14:14-16), singing (Eph. 5:19; Col. 3:16), baptism and the Lord's Supper (Acts 2:41; I Cor. 11:18-34), and almsgiving (I Cor. 16:1,2). Sometimes there were also prophesyings and tongues. S.B.

WRATH, the translation of many Heb. and Gr. words, and ranges widely in tone, intensity and effects (Ps. 85:4; II Chron. 26:19; Esth. 1:12; Gen. 27:25; Matt. 2:16). The first display of human wrath recorded in the Bible (Gen. 4:5-6) is followed by many more frank accounts of disaster wrought by the wrath of man, which never works the righteousness of God (James 1:20) and is never more than tolerated (Eph. 4:26; Ps. 37:8; Rom. 12:19). The wrath of God, just, pure and holy, is dreadful to evildoers (Num. 11:1-10; Heb. 10:26-31), yet God is slow to anger and eager to forgive (Ps. 103:8,9) and so should we be (Eph. 4:31,32). Less frequently mentioned in the NT than in the OT, the wrath of God is no less terrible, most so as the wrath of the Lamb (Rev. 6:16; John 1:29), and abides on him who does not obey the Son of God (John 3:36).

WRESTLE, Heb. pāthal, root meaning "twist" (Gen. 30:8); of Rachel's wrestling (emotional and vocal rather than literal) with Leah, which led Rachel to name her handmaid's son Naphtali, my wrestlings. Heb. 'āvaq, get dusty, wrestle (Gen. 32:24,25); of Jacob's wrestling with the angel (physical effect, the dislocation of Jacob's thigh). Greek pále, wrestling; later any kind of fighting; used (Eph. 6:12) of the Christian's spiritual conflict with the powers of evil.

WRITING. The earliest forms of writing were not phonetic but pictographic. That is to say, the ideas were recorded by means of pictures or sense-symbols, rather than by sound-symbols such as are used in most modern languages today. Primitive man resorted to a picture of the idea he wished to represent, rather than using any type of sign to show how the word in question was to be pronounced. Thus the circle of the sun-disk might indicate either the sun itself (in Egyptian the word re', in Sumerian ud) or else the word "day" (in Egyptian heru, in Sumerian u or ud) as the span of time during which the sun would shine. The concept of "man" was conveyed in Egyptian by the picture of a man sitting with one leg curled under him and the other bent with the knee upright. This figure would be accompanied by a single vertical stroke to indicate that only one man was involved, or by more strokes according to the number of men referred to. In Sumerian the idea of man (lu) was conveyed by a triangular head and a turnip-shaped torso; at first it stood up on end, facing right, but later it lay flat on its back facing upward (for all Sumerian signs underwent a 90-degree shift in direction from vertical to horizontal sometime between 3000 and 2500 B.C.). This earliest stage in writing was marked by the use of the pure ideogram. (This same principle was operative in primitive Chinese, which developed a system of sign-language that has endured to the present day; nearly all of its basic characters or "radicals" represent pictures of the type of object being referred to. This picture may or may not be accompanied by other strokes which indicate the sound-value of the word.)

The next stage in the history of writing was the introduction of the phonogram, or the type of sign which indicates a sound. At first this was achieved by the rebus principle, that is, by the use of objects which have a name sounding like the sound of the word which the writer wishes to convey, even though the meaning of the object portrayed is entirely different. Thus in English rebus one may indicate that a man became pale with fear by drawing a picture of a pail. Similarly in Egyptian the sign for "duck" could also represent "son," because in both cases the word was pronounced sa. The Sumerian city of Girsu was spelled by a picture of a dagger (gir) followed by a piece of hide or skin (su).

Both in Sumerian and Egyptian there was a very early development of this rebus principle, so that the writing system became equipped with a large number of signs which could convey syllabic sounds, independent of meaning, and thus furnish building-blocks for words of two or more syllables. Naturally the number of signs necessary to indicate all possible syllables which could occur in the spoken language was very numerous indeed. Both Egyptian and Sumerian writing retained both ideograms and syllabic phonograms right to the end of their history. Both of them also used signs known as determinatives which had no sound value at all, but which simply indicated the class of object referred to. In Sumerian the name of a city would often be preceded by the sign for "city" (even though it was not to be pronounced aloud as a separate word); similarly a star (standing for dingir or "god") would precede the name of any deity. Or else these determinatives would follow the rest of the word, rather than preceding it; thus the Sumerian name of Babylon was written ka-dingir-ra KI. Ka was an ideogram for "gate," dingir was an ideogram for "god," ra was a phonogram indicating that dingir ended in an r sound and was followed by the genitive particle -a(k); the final KI was the sign for "earth" or "land," and served simply as a determinative.

Observe that in this last example the Sumerian name for Babylon (or Babylonia) meant "The Gate of God." When the Semitic-speaking Akkadians and Babylonians conquered the Mesopotamian valley, they took over the writing-system of the Sumerians and adapted it to their own language. In some cases they took the Sumerian ideograms and gave them the pronunciation of the word in their own language. Thus the Babylonian for "gate" was babum ("gate of" being pronounced bab); the word for "god" was ilu (in the genitive ili). Hence the very same signs which the Sumerians pronounced as ka-dingirrak the Babylonians pronounced as bab-ili (which came into Hebrew as Babel). Operating upon this principle the Babylonians contrived ways of expressing all the necessary sounds in their own language. They would either use the Sumerian phonograms to express the same sound in Akkadian (the language spoken by the Babylonians and Assyrians), or else they would assign new sound-values to them. Thus the Sumerian word for "wood" or "tree" was gish and was written by four wedges forming a rectangle; the corresponding Akkadian word was isu. Hence in Akkadian the sign could furnish the phonetic syllable gish (as it did in Sumerian) or else the syllable is (derived from the Akkadian word), as for example in the word is-su-ru "bird." Thus it was by ingenious adaptation that the Sumerian system of writing was taken over by a nation speaking an entirely different language and employed — still in the mixed ideographic and phonographic form — to give written expression to their Semitic tongue. Incidentally, if Abraham's family was residing in Ur back in the Twentieth Century B.C., this would have coincided with the brilliant Sumerian culture that flourished under the Third Dynasty of Ur. Quite possibly he would have learned to speak Sumerian and also to read it, and it is quite possible that this was the only type of writing with which he had any acquaintance, except for that period when he lived in Egypt.

The Egyptian system of writing — at least in its monumental form — remained in an artistic pictorial form from its earliest rise about 3000 B.C. until its slow demise in the Roman period, 3200 years later. Its characters never degenerated into combinations of wedges bearing little resemblance to the original pictographs, as was the case in Sumerian and Akkadian. Of course Egyptian was also (at least as early as the Sixth Dynasty) written in a cursive, hieratic form, especially in business documents, correspondence, and secular literature. But apart from esthetic considerations, Egyptian writing developed peculiarities of its own which were quite foreign to the Sumerian-Akkadian system. In the first place, it recorded only the consonants of the spoken language, not its vowels. Some of these consonants were like the so-called vowel-letters of Hebrew, Aramaic and Arabic; that is, the aleph or glottal catch, the y indicating a neighboring i sound, and the w indicating a u sound before it. On the other hand, the transcriptions of Egyptian names into Akkadian cuneiform and into Greek furnish important evidence as to how Egyptian was vocalized, and these transcriptions do not come out to any consistent pattern of correspondence with these Egyptian "vowel-letters." Neither is there any standard relationship between them and their descendants in the Coptic language (which was written in the Greek alphabet and preserved the form of Egyptian as it was spoken in the early Christian centuries). And so it must be recognized that Egyptian hieroglyphic is essentially as consonantal as were the Semitic languages which used the Phoenician alphabet.

A second noteworthy contrast between Egyptian and Sumerian is that it developed genuine alphabetic signs, as well as two-consonant (or three-consonant) syllabic signs. Therefore to the Egyptians goes the credit for being the first to develop an alphabetic system of writing. However they did not see any need of abandoning their ideograms, determinative signs and syllabic characters just because they had alphabetic letters; and so they simply employed all four types of sign in the writing out of their language. Even the more cursive, shorthand type of writing referred to above as hieratic introduced virtually no changes in this complicated and cumbersome system; it simply enabled the scribe to write out his four kinds of hieroglyphic signs with a fair degree of rapidity. The same was true of a still more cursive and simplified form of hieratic known as demotic, used after 1000 B.C. Not until Egypt was conquered by Alexander the Great (about 332 B.C.) did the influence of a foreign system of writing become decisive upon Egyptian conservatism. By the third century A.D. (the period of the earliest Coptic glosses in the Oxyrynchus Papyri) the Egyptians were writing out their vernacular, vowels and all, in the letters of the Greek alphabet, to which they soon added seven more alphabetic signs of their own invention, to represent sounds not found in Greek.

The fact that the Egyptians did develop a full set of alphabetic signs has led some scholars to conclude that the most primitive form of the so-called "Phoenician" alphabet consisted of modifications of various Egyptian consonantal or syllabic signs. This was a reasonable inference, perhaps, but no convincing list of correspondences could be made up by even the most ingenious advocates of this theory. The true origin of the "Phoenician" alphabet is to be sought rather in the alphabetic hieroglyphs of the Sinaitic Inscriptions of Serabit el-Khadim (written some time between 1900 and 1500 B.C. — for the scholars' estimates vary). These signs are tabulated on Plate A (according to R.H. Pfeiffer's analysis of them). Since they were inscribed by Semitic miners in the employ of Egypt, and since these documents are found side by side with Egyptian hieroglyphic inscriptions (on statues dedicated to the goddess Hathor), it is fair to conclude that these miners got the idea for their alphabet from the Egyptians themselves. But instead of resorting to ideograms and syllabic signs, they contented themselves with alphabetic symbols chosen on the basis of acrophony. That is to say, the first sound of the name of the object represented conveyed the alphabetic unit intended. In Egyptian a sign for "hand" was used as the alphabetic sign for d, since the word for "hand" was dert. Following this principle, the Semitic miner chose the picture of a hand extended as a sign for y (since the word for "hand" was yadu in his language). The head of an ox was used for the sound of aleph (the glottal catch) because the word for "ox" was 'alpu (a name which was preserved in the later Heb. aleph and in the still later Greek alpha). Interestingly enough, this particular letter has been quite well preserved from 1900 B.C. until the present, for if our capital A is turned upside down, it bears a fairly close similarity to that ancient Sinaitic sign for aleph, the ox's head.

During the ensuing centuries this Sinaitic type of script (or modifications of it) was cultivated in Canaan, for household objects like daggers, rings, ewers, pots and plaques have been found with short inscriptions, mostly of very uncertain interpretation. But a totally different form of alphabetic writing assumed great importance during this period (1800-1400 B.C.), namely the cuneiform alphabet associated with Ras-shamra or Ugarit. Unlike the cuneiform of Babylonia and Assyria, this kind of cuneiform represented an alphabet of about 29 or 30 characters, all of them consonantal (except that three of them indicated the type of vowel occurring after aleph, whether a, i (or e) or u). This very early dialect of Canaanite (for Ugaritic is much closer to Biblical Hebrew than to any other known Semitic language) contained several consonants not appearing in any of the Northwest Semitic scripts, in some cases sounds still preserved only in Arabic (such as rough heth, z as in Arabic nazara "to see," th as in thalāthun "three"), and others apparently different from any sound found in Arabic (such as zh like the English s in pleasure). The shapes of the characters formed by these wedges bear no consistent similarity to the signs either of Sinaitic letters or of the Akkadian syllabary. They are very simple in structure and seem to have no pictographic origin whatever. This type of alphabet flourished not only at Ugarit but also in more southerly localities as well. But after the violent destruction of Ras Shamra in the 15th century, the use of the Ugaritic alphabet seems to have declined in favor of the Phoenician.

Several so-called Proto-phoenician inscriptions have been discovered in Palestinian localities such as Gezer, Lachish and Shechem, exhibiting forms which could be transitional between the Sinaitic and the authentic Phoenician of the 11th century B.C. Unfortunately, however, these short lines of writing do not fall into a consistent pattern and they cannot be deciphered with real certainty. As to the earliest Phoenician inscriptions, those of Shaphatbaal and Ahiram found at Gebal (Byblos) on the coast north of Sidon, there is still much dispute as to the time when they were written. The inscription on the sarcophagus of King Ahiram is dated by various authorities from before 1250 to as late as 1000 B.C. (the later date being advocated by Dunand, who maintained that the Shaphatbaal inscription was centuries earlier — cf. Driver p. 104, Février pp. 206-27). Here we have the 22-letter alphabet which is to hold the stage from then on in all the Northwest Semitic languages (Phoenician, Hebrew, Moabite, Aramaic and Syriac). The early form of it appears in the right-hand column of Plate A, as well as in the left-most column of Plate B. It can be easily seen from Plate B how closely related to it were all the forms of the alphabet used in Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time (second column), in Carthage (where a dialect of Phoenician was spoken) 400 years later, and in Aramaic-speaking Syria in the time of Amos. The earliest Israelite document which has survived in this script is the Gezer Calendar of about 900 B.C. or a few decades earlier. It is a small limestone tablet inscribed with the irregular hand of a schoolboy and containing a list of the successive phases of the agricultural year from season to season. The discovery of this schoolboy's exercise witnesses to the extent of literacy in the reign of Solomon. Unfortunately we have no documents from an earlier period to serve as a reliable guide, but it is most likely that Moses used a Proto-phoenician type of script rather than any kind of cuneiform (although the use of Akkadian cuneiform for international correspondence is well attested for the time of Joshua in Palestine). Even in the Tell el-Amarna correspondence, consisting of letters in Akkadian addressed by Canaanite princes to the Egyptian court, there were numerous glosses (or explanatory synonyms) in Canaanite or Hebrew, written out in Akkadian cuneiform syllabic signs. Hence this type of writing would also have been known to Moses and available to him. (See article, HEBREW LANGUAGE)

PLATE B

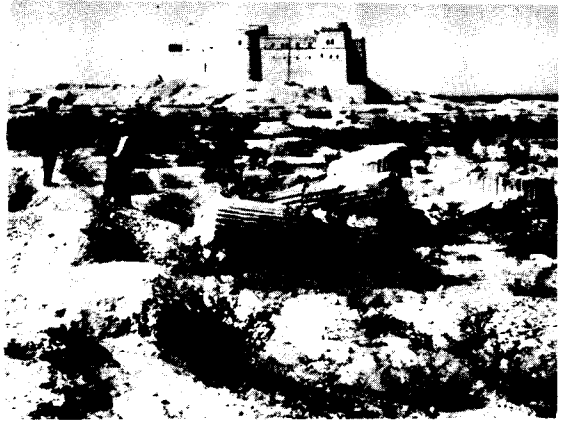
The next important Hebrew inscription after the Gezer Calendar was the Siloam Inscription, incised on the wall of the underground tunnel dug through to the Pool of Siloam in preparation (probably) for the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Here we see a trend toward the more freely flowing style of manuscript writing, rather than the stern angularity of monumental style. In particular some of the long-tailed letters (like mem, nun and kaph) curve with a bottom swoop to the left. Examples of the rapid brush-stroked type of script are furnished by the Samaritan Ostraca of about 770 B.C. (containing tax-receipts paid to the government of Jeroboam II) and the Lachish Ostraca of 588 B.C. These last consist of letters written by the captain of a Jewish outpost to Yaosh, commander of Zedekiah's troops in Lachish. Here the letters are formed in a very compressed or flattened form, but are still of essentially the same pattern as the old Phoenician. For some time after the Babylonian Exile this Paleo-Hebrew script (as it is called) was retained for some types of text, such as the books of the Pentateuch, for fragments of Leviticus and Exodus have been discovered in the Qumran Caves, dating from the late fourth century (according to the estimate of some scholars). The Samaritan sect, which originated from the schism of 535 (when Zerubbabel refused to allow the Samaritan heretics to participate in rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem) for some reason developed a special form of this Paleo-Hebrew script all their own, and retained it for all their religious literature down through the time of the Moslem conquest, and even to this day. Palaeo-Hebrew was employed on Jewish coinage of the Maccabean period (second century B.C.) and also of the First and Second Revolts (67-70 A.D. and 132-135 A.D., respectively). By and large the Aramaic-speaking peoples of Damascus, Hamath and parts north used the same style of alphabet, although with minor regional peculiarities.

The so-called Square Hebrew character seems to have developed first on Aramaic soil, possibly during the sixth century. Yet early examples of this script are regrettably sparse and it remains impossible to trace its rise and development very much prior to the second century B.C. At all events it does not seem to have derived from the epistolary cursive of the Elephantine Papyri (400 B.C.) a set of legal documents and letters written in Aramaic by Jewish mercenaries stationed on an island near the southern border of Egypt. As can be seen from the fifth column in Plate B, it was an extremely cursive script, but still bore stronger affinity to the Palaeo-Hebrew than to the Square Hebrew of the Dead Sea Caves. A monumental form of Square Hebrew is exhibited in the eighth column of the same plate, but this dates from a much later period. For examples of the type of Square Hebrew used by the scribes of the Maccabean (Qumran) period, see TEXTS, VERSIONS, O.T.

It is important to observe that the Greeks received their alphabet from the Phoenicians and Aramaeans, perhaps through contact with their merchants. (Through the investigations of Michael Ventris and his co-laborers it has now been quite well established that Cretan Linear B, used in Crete during the latter half of the Second Millennium B.C., consisted of a syllabary somewhat similar to the syllabic writing anciently employed on the island of Cyprus. It was an independent invention, so far as we know, and has no relation to any system of writing employed in the Semitic Near East. The inscriptions themselves were written in a sort of Mycenean dialect of Greek. But these constituted an isolated development without any lasting influence upon later times). Apart from these special developments in Crete and Cyprus, the Hellenic tribal groups found written expression for their languages through the Phoenician alphabet, which supplied the first 22 letters of the Greek alphabet (i.e. alpha through tau). Those Semitic letters which expressed sounds not employed by the Greeks were adapted to express vowels. The glottal catch, aleph, was used to convey the sound a; the soft h-sound of the Semitic hē was redesigned for the Greek e; the rough aspirate of the Semitic heth was employed by the Western Greeks to express their soft aspirate (the English h), but by the Ionians to convey the long e sound (pronounced like French e-acute). The Athenians at first followed the Western practice, using epsilon to express long e as well as short e, but later adopted the Ionic employment of the H as ēta, using the broken halves of aspirate-H to express the rough breathing (equivalent to h) and the smooth breathing (which was without sound). The Semitic y of yodh was simplified to a single vertical stroke as the letter i or iota, while the guttural Semitic 'ayin was adapted to express the sound of o (at first either long o or short, but later specialized as short o or omicron). From the Semitic waw or w the Greeks of the West used one form to express the w-sound; as such it resembled a modern F. The other form of waw, that shaped like a Y, was employed to express the u-sound (later modified in pronunciation to a French u or German ü). Besides this last-mentioned letter, the üpsilon, the Greeks added four more letters, the phi (at first pronounced like ph in "uphill," but later sounded like f); the khi (at first pronounced like kh in "workhouse," but later pronounced like German or Scotch ch); psi, which rendered the consonant-cluster p-s as in "capsule"; and omega, a modification of omicron designed to express long o only. This, then, was the writing medium which in the providence of God came to be used to convey the redeeming message of the NT Scriptures. From the Western form of the Greek alphabet the Romans derived their Latin alphabet, omitting from it those letters used by the Eastern Greeks which were unnecessary to express the sounds of the Latin tongue. This, then, is the alphabet which has descended to us at the present day, ultimately derived from the Semites of the Holy Land. G.L.A.



Ruins, possibly of the palace of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) at Susa, ancient Shushan. This is very likely the place of the great banquet of the Book of Esther, and where Queen Esther lived. (The modern building on the horizon is an archaeological expedition headquarters.) SHH

X

XERXES (zûrk'sēz, Gr. Xérxes, meaning unknown), king of the Persian Empire from 486-465 B.C. He is the same as Ahasuerus, mentioned in the books of Ezra, Esther, and Daniel. The main support for this identification is to be found in the linguistic equivalence of the names, and a close similarity has been noted between the character of Xerxes and the character of the king of the Persians portrayed in the book of Esther. There are also historical correlations. Thus, the feast which was held in the third year of the reign of Ahasuerus at Shushan (Esth. 1:3) corresponds to an assembly held by Xerxes in his third year in preparation for the invasion of Greece. Herodotus states that Xerxes, following his defeat at Salamis and Plataea, consoled himself in his seventh year with the pleasures of the harem (Herodotus IX, 108). This parallels the Biblical account which relates that Ahasuerus replaced Vashti by marrying Esther in his seventh year (Esth. 2:16) after gathering all the fair young virgins to Shushan.

Y

YAHWEH (See God, also YHWH below)

YARMUK, WADI EL. This word, though not found in the Bible itself, is the name given to one of the three important streams to the SE of the Sea of Galilee. Located six miles to the SE of this sea, it contributes large quantities of water to the Jordan. It is now the site of a large hydro-electric plant. It marked the southern boundary of the ancient kingdom of Bashan.

YARN (värn. Heb. miqweh), the KJV translation of the Hebrew word which occurs in I Kings 10:28 and II Chronicles 1:16. In each of these cases "linen yarn" seems to convey the wrong meaning. It is correctly rendered in the RSV by the proper name "Kue," the old Assyrian name given to Cilicia, the land located in the southeastern portion of Asia Minor.

YEAR (See Calendar)

YHWH. This is not in reality a word, but is known as the "tetragrammaton," the four consonants standing for the ancient Hebrew name for God commonly referred to as "Jehovah" or "Yahweh." The original Hebrew text was not vocalized. YHWH was considered too sacred to pronounce; so 'adonai (my Lord) was substituted in reading. When eventually a vowel system was invented, since the Hebrews had forgotten how to pronounce YHWH, they substituted the vowels for 'adonai, making "Jehovah," a form first attested at the beginning of the 12th century A.D.

YODH (See Jot)

YOKE (Heb. môtâh, an oxbow; 'ôl, a yoke; tsemedh, yoke of oxen, an acre, i.e., as much land as a yoke of oxen could plow in a day; Gr. zeúgos, a team and zygós, yoke). In the literal sense, a bar of wood so constructed as to unite two animals, usually oxen, enabling them to work in the fields. Drawing loads and pulling instruments used in farming, such as the plow, were the two chief works the yoke made possible. Archeological studies have shown that the yoke was variously constructed in different periods of history. It was commonly used all over the ancient world. Also used figuratively in the sense of servitude (Jer. 27,28) and "the law of God."

YOKEFELLOW (Gr. sýnzygos, yoked together), a common word among Greek writers referring to those united by close bonds, as in marriage, labor, etc. It is found only once in the NT (Phil. 4:3) and the meaning here is not clear. Some feel that Paul refers here to a fellow worker; others think the word is a proper noun, Sunzugos.

YOM KIPPUR (See Feasts)

Z

ZAANAIM (zā'ā-nā'ĭm, Heb. text uncertain), a word found only in Judges 4:11, but it is probably the same place referred to as Zaanannim in Joshua 19:33. This place was located on Naphtali's southern border near to the spot where Sisera lost his life at the hands of Heber the Kenite. It is the same as the modern Khan et-Tujjar, located about three miles NE of Mount Tabor.

ZAANAN (za ā-năn, Heb. tsa'ănān), a place mentioned by Micah (1:11) in the Shephelah of Judah. The place has never been certainly identified, but it may be Zenan.

ZAANANNIM (See Zaanaim)

ZAAVAN (zā'ā-văn, Heb. za'ăwān, not quiet), one of the three sons of Ezer (Gen. 36:27; I Chron. 1:42).

ZABAD (zā'băd, Heb. zāvādh, Jehovah has given). 1. The son of Nathan, who was the son of Attai, who was the son of Ahlai. Hence this man is called the son of Nathan (I Chron. 2:36) and the son of Ahlai (I Chron. 11:41). Note also I Chronicles 2:31-37.

2. One from the tribe of Ephraim, son of Tahath (I Chron. 7:21).

3. The son of Shimeath, the Ammonitess. He conspired against King Joash and was later killed by Amaziah (II Chron. 24:26; cf. 25:3-4).

4-6. Three Israelites are given this name, all of them sons of Zattu (Ezra 10:27), Hashum (Ezra 10:33), and Nebo (Ezra 10:43) respectively. In response to Ezra's plea after the captivity, they put away their Gentile wives.

ZABBAI (zăb'ā-ī, Heb. zabbay, meaning unknown). 1. One of the sons of Bebai who put away his foreign wife at the request of Ezra (Ezra 10:28).

2. The father of Baruch (Neh. 3:20).

ZABBUD (zăb'ŭd, Heb. zabbûdh, given), the son of Bigvai who accompanied Ezra to Jerusalem from Babylon (Ezra 8:14).

ZABDI (zăb'dī, Heb. zavdî, he (God) has given). 1. Achan's grandfather, from the tribe of Judah. His father's name was Zerah (Josh. 7:1,17).

2. Son of Shimei from the tribe of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:19).

3. One of the officers of David listed as having charge of the wine cellars (I Chron. 27:27). He is called "the Shiphmite."

4. One of the ancestors of Mattaniah, who aided in worship in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:17).

ZABDIEL (zăb'dī-ĕl, Heb. zavdî'ēl, God has given). 1. The father of Jashobeam (I Chron. 27:2).

2. A temple overseer (Neh. 11:14).

3. An Arabian who, after beheading Alexander Balas, sent his head to Ptolemy (I Macc. 11:17).

ZABUD (zā'bŭd, Heb. zāvûdh, bestowed), the son of Nathan; a principal officer of Solomon and his best friend (I Kings 4:5).

ZABULON (See Zebulun)

ZACCAI (zăk'ā-ī, Heb. zakkay), the ancestral head of a post-Exilic family whose 760 descendants returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Neh. 7:14 and Ezra 2:9).

ZACCHAEUS (zā-kē'ŭs, Gr. Zakchaíos, from the Hebrew zakkay, pure), a publican, referred to only in Luke, who resided at Jericho. He is described as a "chief" publican, and therefore had charge of collecting taxes. When Jesus was passing through Jericho on one occasion, Zacchaeus became very desirous of seeing Him, and being small in stature, climbed a tree to accomplish his mission. He must have been quite surprised, therefore, when Jesus paused in His journey beneath this very tree and, looking up, urged Zacchaeus to come down, for He had decided to abide at his house (Luke 19:5). With joy he made haste to comply. The salvation he experienced that day was evident because of his change of life (Luke 19:8).

ZACCUR (zăk'ûr, Heb. zakkûr, remembered). 1. The father of the Reubenite spy, Shammua (Num. 13:4).

2. The son of Hamuel, a Simeonite (I Chron. 4:26), Zacchur in AV.

3. One of the sons of Merari (I Chron. 24:27).

4. One of the sons of Asaph set apart by David for musical service (I Chron. 25:1-2; Neh. 12:35).

5. The son of Imri who aided in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:2).

6. One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. 10:12).

7. One of the treasurers, father of Hanan (Neh. 13:13).

ZACCHUR (See Zaccur)

ZACHARIAH (zăk'ā-rī'ā, Heb. zekharyâh, Jehovah has remembered), the 14th king of Israel, the son of Jeroboam II. In fulfillment of II Kings 10:30, he was the last of the house of Jehu. After a brief reign of six months, he was slain by Shallum, his successor (II Kings 15:8-10).

ZACHARIAS (zăk'ā-rī'ăs, Gr. Zacharías, Jehovah has remembered). 1. The name of the father of John the Baptist (Luke 1:5). He was a priest of the course of Abijah who was childless in his old age. Both he and his wife were righteous, and while Zacharias was performing his services in the temple, an angel appeared and reported to him that he was to have a son whom he was to name John. Because of doubt, he was stricken dumb until his son was named, at which time his speech was restored (Luke 1:67-69).

2. The son of Barachias, mentioned in Matthew 23:35 and in Luke 11:51, by Christ as having been slain between the altar and the temple. His true identity has not been fully determined.

ZACHER (zā'kêr, Heb. zākher, memorial), one of Jehiel's sons (I Chron. 8:31; 9:37).

ZADOK (zā'dŏk, Heb. tsādhōq, righteous). 1. The most familiar Bible character bearing this name is the son of Ahitub. He was a priest in the time of David (II Sam. 8:17), and came to minister to David in Hebron after the death of King Saul (I Chron. 12:23-28). After the death of Uzza, David called Zadok and asked him to assist, as a Levite, in bringing the ark into its prepared place in Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:11-13). So faithful was he to David that he accompanied him with the ark when he fled from Jerusalem at the rebellion of Absalom and abode with him until commanded by David to return to Jerusalem to act for him as a spy (II Sam. 15:24-36; 17:15,17-21).

His continued loyalty was further seen when, at the end of David's life, Adonijah aspired to be king. He followed out the instructions of King David and anointed Solomon, David's son, king in Gihon (I Kings 1:8-45). His loyalty was not forgotten even after David's death, for Solomon favored him by making him the high priest, demoting Abiathar who had been sharing this role with him (I Kings 2:26-35).

2. The son of another Ahitub who is the father of Shallum (I Chron. 6:12).

3. Jerusha's father (II Kings 15:33; II Chron. 27:1).

4. The son of Baana who aided in the construction of the wall at Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 3:4). He is also probably one of those listed as signers of the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:21), especially since in both of these instances his name follows the name of Meshezabeel.

5. The son of Immer, another priest who also shared in the labor of rebuilding the Jerusalem walls under Nehemiah (Neh. 3:29).

6. One appointed by Nehemiah to be a scribe (Neh. 13:13). There is probably nothing to hinder this scribe from being also one of the two wall-builders mentioned.

ZAHAM (zā'hăm, Heb. zāham, odious fool), Rehoboam's youngest son (II Chron. 11:19).

ZAIR (zā'ĭr, Heb. tsā'ĭr, small), a village somewhere E of the Dead Sea in Idumea, which to date has not been identified for certain, where Joram smote the Edomites (II Kings 8:21).

ZALAPH (zā'lăf, Heb. tsālāph, caper-plant), the father of Hanun who aided Nehemiah in repairing the Jerusalem walls (Neh. 3:30).

ZALMON (zăl'mŏn, Heb. tsalmôn, dark). 1. A Benjamite who was one of David's mighty men (II Sam. 23:28). He is also called "Ilai" (I Chron. 11:29), and in both passages "The Ahohite."

2. A forest near Shechem (Judg. 9:48) from which wood was taken by Abimelech in the destruction of Shechem. Its identity has not been determined with certainty.

ZALMONAH (zăl-mō'nà, Heb. tsalmōnâh, gloomy), one of the places in the wilderness where Israel camped. It lay SE of Edom.

ZALMUNNA (zăl-mŭn'à, Heb. tsalmunnā', deprived of shade), one of the two kings of Midian whom Gideon captured and killed during his bold raid on the Midianites (Judg. 8:4-21; Ps. 83:11).

ZAMZUMMIM (zăm-zŭm'ĭm, Heb. zamzummîm, murmurers), a name found only in Deuteronomy 2:20. It is used of the race of giants, called Rephaim (II Sam. 5:18,22), who lived in a spot E of the Jordan. Later on the Ammonites captured them and occupied their land. They are described as "a people, great, and many, and tall" (Deut. 2:21). They may be the same as the Zuzims (Gen. 14:5).

ZANOAH (zà-nō'à, Heb. zānôah, rejected). 1. A town located in the low-lying hills of Judah (Josh. 15:34). After the Babylonian captivity some Jews returned to live there (Neh. 11:30), and assisted in the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. 3:13). It has been identified with Khirbet Zanu', and is situated 10 miles W of Jerusalem.

2. A town located in the mountains of Judah (Josh. 15:56) 10 or 12 miles SW of Hebron. It was built or rebuilt by Jekuthiel who is called its "father" (I Chron. 4:18). It is identified with Zenuta.

ZAPHENATH-PANEAH (zăf'ē-năth-pà-nē'à, Heb. tsaphenath-pa'ănēah, the one who furnishes the sustenance of the land), the name given to Joseph by the pharaoh on the occasion of his promotion for showing the pharaoh the meaning of his dream (Gen. 41:45).

ZAPHON (zā'fŏn, Heb. tsāphôn, north), a territory E of the Jordan allotted by Moses to Gad (Josh. 13:27). It is the modern Amateh.

ZAREAH (See Zorah)

ZAREATHITE (See Zorah)

ZARED (See Zered)

ZAREDA (See Zarethan)

ZAREPHATH (zăr'ē-făth, Heb. tsārephath, refinement), an OT town remembered chiefly because Elijah resided here during the latter half of the famine caused by the drought (I Kings 17:9ff). Its Greek equivalent "Sarepta" is mentioned in Luke 4:26, where it is described as being in the land of Sidon. Here God miraculously sustained the prophet through the widow. Ruins of the ancient town survive S of the modern village of Sarafand, about 8 miles S of Sidon, 14 miles N of Tyre.

The town of Sarafand, ancient Zarephath (Sarepta) on the Mediterranean coast. SHH

ZARETHAN (zăr'ē-thăn, Heb. tsārethān), a place near Beth-shean and Adam mentioned in connection with Israel's crossing of the Jordan (Josh. 3:16); spelled Zaretan in KJV. Bronze castings for the temple were made there (I Kings 7:46). In II Chronicles 4:17 the name is given as Zeredah. Its exact site has not been ascertained.

ZARETH-SHAHAR (zā'rĕth-shā'hàr, Heb. tsereth hashahar, the glory of dawn), a city located in the land belonging to Reuben "in the mount of the valley" (Josh. 13:19). It has not been identified.

ZARHITES, THE (zàr'hīts, Heb. zarhī, those who shine), members of the tribe of Judah descended from Judah's son, Zerah (Num. 26:13,20; Josh. 7:17; I Chron. 27:11,13).

ZARTANAH (zàr-tā'nà, Heb. tsarethanâh), a place referred to only in I Kings 4:12 as a means of locating Bethshean. Its location is uncertain.

ZARTHAN (zàr'thăn, Heb. tsārethān, meaning uncertain). 1. A place between Succoth and Zarthan where Hiram cast the copper vessels of the temple which he gave to King Solomon (I Kings 7:46). The clay soil in this area was the reason for choosing this place (I Kings 7:45-46). It is called "Zeredathah" in II Chronicles 4:17.

2. Another place by this name is cited in connection with the passage of the children of Israel across the Jordan. It is used as a means of locating the city of Adam (Josh. 3:16).

ZATTHU (See Zattu)

ZATTU (zăt'tū, Heb. zattû'), head of a large family of children (Ezra 2:8; Neh. 7:13) who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem from the Babylonian captivity and signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. 10:14). Several of his children were among those who put away their Gentile wives (Ezra 10:27).

ZAVAN (See Zaavan)

ZAZA (zā'zà, Heb. zāzā'), a Jerahmelite (I Chron. 2:33).

ZEALOT (zĕl'ŭt, Gr. zelotés, zealous one), a member of a Jewish patriotic party started in the time of Cyrenius to resist Roman aggression. According to Josephus (BJ, IV, iii, 9; v,1; VII, viii,1), the Zealots resorted to violence and assassination in their hatred of the Romans, their fanatical violence eventually provoking the Roman war. Simon the Zealot was distinguished from Simon Peter by this epithet (Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13).

ZEBADIAH (zĕb'à-dī'à, Heb. zevadhyāhû, Jehovah has bestowed). 1. A descendant of Benjamin through Beriah (I Chron. 8:15).

2. Another Benjamite descending from the line of Elpaal (I Chron. 8:17).

3. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag to assist him in his defense from Saul. He used bows and arrows as well as stones and was just as adept with his left as with his right hand. He descended through Jeroham of Gedor (I Chron. 12:1-7).

4. One of the Korahite door keepers of David's time, son of Meshelemiah (I Chron. 26:2).

5. One of the officers of David's army, son of Joab's brother, Asahel (I Chron. 27:7).

6. A Levite sent by King Jehoshaphat to teach the law to the residents of Judah (II Chron. 17:8).

7. Ishmael's son who was head of the house of Judah in all matters that pertained to King Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 19:11).

8. One of those who returned with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem with 80 men. He was the son of Michael (Ezra 8:8).

9. A priest who had married a foreign wife after the return from the Babylonian captivity. He was a son of Immer (Ezra 10:20).

ZEBAH (zē'bà, Heb. zevah, sacrifice), one of the two kings of Midian whom Gideon overthrew, the other being Zalmunna (Judg. 8:10,12; Ps. 83:11). The Ephraimites had destroyed the large majority of the Midianites, 120,000 warriors (Judg. 8:10), but these two kings escaped. Gideon captured them and completely routed the rest. Having heard their personal confession that they had killed some of the Israelites (Judg. 8:18-19), he ordered them slain. The son to whom this command was given, being but a youth, refused, and when these kings asked Gideon to kill them, he did so (Judg. 8:19-21).

ZEBAIM (zē-bā'ĭm, Heb. tsebayim, gazelles), the native dwelling place of Solomon's slaves, "sons of Pochereth" who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:57; Neh. 7:59).

ZEBEDEE (zĕb'ĕ-dē, Gr. Zebedaíos, meaning uncertain), a fisherman on the Sea of Galilee (Mark 1:20), the father of James and John (Matt. 4:21; Mark 1:19). He was the husband of Salome and in all probability lived in the vicinity of Bethsaida (Matt. 27:56; Mark 15:40). Because of Mark's reference to his hired servants, one would judge him to be a man of means and influence (Mark 1:20). Our only glimpse of him in the Bible is with his sons in their boat mending their nets (Matt. 4:21,22; Mark 1:19-20).

ZEBINA (zē-bī'nà, Heb. zevîna', purchased), a descendant of Nebo who put away his strange wife after the captivity (Ezra 10:43).

ZEBOIIM, ZEBOIM (zē-boi'ĭm, zēbō'ĭm, Heb. tsevō'îm, gazelles, hyena). 1. One of the five cities in the vale of Siddim that God destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. 10:19; 14:2,8; Deut. 29:23; Hos. 11:8).

2. A ravine in Benjamin not far from Michmash (I Sam. 13:18; Neh. 11:34).

ZEBOIM, VALLEY OF (zē-bō'ĭm, Heb. tsevō'îm, hyena), see under ZEBOIIM, No. 2.

ZEBUDAH (zē-bū'dà, Heb. zevûdhâh, given), Josiah's wife, the daughter of Pedaiah, the mother of Jehoiakim the king (II Kings 23:36).

ZEBUL (zē'bŭl, Heb. zevul, dwelling), one who, under Abimelech, ruled the city of Shechem (Judg. 9:28,30,38). He aided in the overthrow of the enemy led by Gaal and acted as adviser to Abimelech in behalf of the affairs of Shechem.

ZEBULONITE (See Zebulun)

ZEBULUN (zĕb'ū-lŭn, Heb. zevûlûn, habitation). 1. The sixth and last son that Leah produced through Jacob, his tenth, was named Zebulun (Gen. 30:19-20). Three sons were born to him in the land of his birth (Gen. 46:14). Aside from this, little is recorded in the Scripture of his personal history.

2. One of the 12 tribes of Israel springing from Zebulun. When God asked Moses to number the able-bodied men at Sinai, the tribe of Zebulun had 57,400 (Num. 1:31). The place assigned to this tribe at this period was on the E side of the tabernacle with the standard of Judah (Num. 2:7). While the exact boundaries of Zebulun's territory are unknown, its portion lay between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean. This area included many points at which Christ later carried on His ministry, and Matthew records that He thus fulfilled the ancient prophecy of Isaiah (Isa. 9:1-2; Matt. 4:12-16).

3. The city of Zebulun was located in the tribe of Asher between Bethdagon and the valley of Jiphthahel (Josh. 19:27).

ZEBULUNITE (See Zebulun)

ZECHARIAH (zĕk'à-rī'à, Heb. zekharyāhû, Jehovah remembers). 1. A Reubenite chief (I Chron. 5:7).

2. A Korhite, son of Meshelemiah who is described as "a porter of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation" (I Chron. 9:21), and as "a wise counsellor" (I Chron. 26:2,14).

3. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel, brother of Kish (I Chron. 9:37).

4. A Levitical doorkeeper in the time of David (I Chron. 15:17-18) appointed to play with psalteries (I Chron. 15:20; 16:5).

5. One of the Davidic priests who was used as a trumpeter to help in bringing the ark from the house of Obededom back to Jerusalem (I Chron. 15:24).

6. A Levite from Uzziel, son of Isshiah (I Chron. 24:25).

7. A Merarite in David's day, son of Hosah (I Chron. 26:11).

8. A Manassite in the time of David. He was the chief of his tribe and the father of Iddo (I Chron. 27:21).

9. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (II Chron. 17:7).

10. The father of the Prophet Jahaziel, son of Benaiah (II Chron. 20:14).

11. The third son of Jehoshaphat whom Jehoram killed (II Chron. 21:2-4).

12. A son of Jehoiada, the high priest, who lived in the days of King Joash of Judah. Acting in some official capacity, he sought to check the rising tide of idolatry. A conspiracy was formed against him and, on the king's orders, he was stoned (II Chron. 24:20-22).

13. A prophet whose good influence on King Uzziah was outstanding (II Chron. 26:5).

14. The father of Abijah. Perhaps "Abijah" should be "Abi," thus making him Hezekiah's grandfather through Abi, Hezekiah's mother (II Chron. 29:1).

15. A Levite, the son of Asaph, who in King Hezekiah's day assisted in the purification of the temple (II Chron. 29:13).

16. A Kohathite, from among the Levites, who was one of the overseers who faithfully assisted in the repair of the temple in the days of King Josiah (II Chron. 34:12).

17. One of the temple rulers in the time of King Josiah (II Chron. 35:8).

18. One "of the sons of Parosh" who with 150 men returned to Jerusalem with Ezra (Ezra 8:3).

19. The son of Bebai who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:11).

20. One of those who stood by Ezra as he read the law to the people (Neh. 8:4); a chief whom he had summoned by the river Ahava, and with whom he entered into counsel (Ezra 8:15-16).

21. A son of Elam who at Ezra's suggestion, divorced his Gentile wife (Ezra 10:26).

22. One from the tribe of Judah, son of Amariah, who dwelt in Jerusalem (Neh. 11:4).

23. "The son of the Shilonite" dwelling at Jerusalem (Neh. 11:5).

24. The son of Pashhur, who with others aided in the work at Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. 11:12).

25. Son of Iddo, one of the priests in the days of Joiakim (Neh. 12:8,16). This man may possibly be identical with the author of the book of Zechariah mentioned in both Ezra 5:1 and in 6:14.

26. A priest, the son of Jonathan, one of the trumpeters at the dedication of the wall at Jerusalem under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. 12:35,41).

27. The son of Jeberechiah, contemporary of Isaiah. He was found faithful in the ministry of recording (Isa. 8:1-2).

28. The next to the last of the 12 minor prophets. He came from a line of priests, being the son of Berechiah and grandson of Iddo (Zech. 1:1). He was a prophet as well as a priest (Zech. 1:7). He returned from the Babylonian captivity to Jerusalem under the leadership of Zerubbabel. It was during the eighth month of the second year of the Persian king, Darius, that he began his prophetic ministry (Zech. 1:1). He was contemporary with Haggai, beginning his ministry just two months after the latter prophet.

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF. 1. Historical Background. Zechariah was the grandson of Iddo, the head of one of the priestly families that returned from the Exile (Neh. 12:4,16). Twenty years after the return, the temple still lay a blackened ruin, and the discouraged people did not see how it could be restored. At this critical moment God raised up the prophets Haggai and Zechariah to encourage the Jews to rebuild the temple. The prophecies of the two men were delivered almost at the same time. Haggai appeared first, in August 520 B.C., and within a month after his appeal was made the foundation of the temple was laid. Soon after, Zechariah uttered his first prophecy (Zech. 1:1-6). Haggai finished his recorded prophecies the same year. The following year Zechariah gave a message consisting of eight symbolic visions, with an appendix (1:7-6:15). Two years later he gave a third message in answer to an inquiry by the men of Bethel regarding the observance of a fast. The two prophecies found in chapters 9-14 are not dated, and were probably given at a much later period.

2. Contents. I. Chapters 1-8. Messages delivered on three separate occasions.

A. 1:1-6. A general introduction.

B. A series of eight symbolic night-visions, followed by a coronation scene. 1:7-6:15. These visions were intended to encourage the Israelites to complete the temple.

1. The horsemen among the myrtle trees. They patrol the earth for the Lord and bring Him tidings from all parts of the earth. 1:8-17. The purpose of the vision is to assure the Israelites of God's special care for and interest in them.

2. The four horns and the four smiths (1:18-21), teaching that Israel's enemies are now destroyed and there is no longer any opposition to the building of God's house.

3. The man with a measuring line (chap. 2), teaching that Jerusalem will expand till it outgrows its walls, and God will be its best defense.

4. Joshua, the high priest, clad in filthy garments which represent the sins of himself and the people is cleansed and given charge of the temple. He is a type of the Messiah-Branch to come who will take away all iniquity. Chap. 3.

5. A seven-branched candlestick fed by two olive trees, teaching that the people of God will receive God's grace through their spiritual and temporal leaders, through whose efforts the prosperity of the nation will be accomplished. Chap. 4.

6. A flying roll (5:1-4), teaching that the land shall be purified from wickedness when the temple is built and God's law taught.

7. A woman (typifying the besetting sins of Israel) is carried off in an ephah-measure to the land of Babylon (5:5-11), teaching that God not only forgives the sins of His people, but carries them away from their land.

8. Four war-chariots go forth to protect God's people (6:1-8), teaching God's protective providence.

These visions are followed by a scene in which a party of Jews have just come from Babylon with silver and gold for the temple. Zechariah is instructed to take part of it and make a crown for the high priest, a type of the Messiah-Branch who is to be both Priest and King to His people.

C. Chapters 7 and 8 were spoken two years later than the series of visions described above, and represent Zechariah's answer to questions put to him by certain visitors as to whether the fasts observed in memory of the destruction of Jerusalem should still be kept. The reply is No; for God demands not fasts, but observance of moral laws. God has come to dwell with His people; and even the heathen will desire to worship God in Jerusalem.

II. Chapters 9-14. This is made up of two distinct prophecies, without dates.

A. Chaps. 9-11. God will visit the nations in judgment and His people in mercy. The Prince of Peace will come and confound the evil shepherds, but He will be rejected by the flock, and they will consequently again experience suffering.

B. Chaps. 12-14. A prophecy describing the victories of the new age and the coming day of the Lord. Three apocalyptic pictures are presented. 1. Jerusalem will be saved from a siege by her enemies by the intervention of Jehovah. 2. A remnant of Israel shall be saved. 3. The nations will come to Jerusalem to share in the joyous Feast of Tabernacles, and all will enjoy the blessings of God's kingdom.

3. Unity of the Book. Many scholars hold that chapters 9-14 are not the work of Zechariah and therefore are not a part of his prophecy. Some suggest a pre-Exilic date; others, a post-Zecharian, as late as 160 B.C. The main arguments against Zechariah's authorship are the difference in atmosphere between 1-8 and 9-14, the reference to Greece as an important power in 9:13, and the supposed derogatory reference to prophecy in chap. 13. The first objection may be answered by the likelihood that the two sections of the prophecy were given at widely-separated times — the second when Zechariah was an old man; the second, by the realization that Greece is mentioned long before the time of Zechariah in Isaiah 66:19 and Ezekiel 27:13,19, and in Zechariah's time was a source of trouble to Persia; and the third, by the realization that it would be impossible for a prophet to belittle prophecy. According to Jewish tradition, these prophecies were written by Zechariah himself, and this is corroborated by internal evidence. It is difficult to see how the makers of the OT canon added these chapters to Zechariah's work if he had nothing to do with them. S.B.

ZEDAD (zē'dăd, Heb. tsedhādhâh, a siding), a city located on the ideal northern boundary of Palestine (Num. 34:8; Ezek. 47:15).

ZEDEKIAH (zĕd'ē-kī'a, Heb. tsidhqîyāhû, Jehovah is righteous). 1. The son of Chanaanah, the leader and voice for the 400 prophets whom Ahab consulted to learn the outcome of his proposed expedition against Ramoth-gilead. In reply to Ahab's question, Zedekiah said that Ahab would be successful in winning a victory over the Syrians. Apparently these were all false prophets, judging from the question raised by Jehoshaphat: "Is there not here a prophet of the Lord besides . . .?" (I Kings 22:7). When the true prophet was finally called and asked as to the outcome of this planned battle, he revealed the truth and was consequently struck by Zedekiah (I Kings 22:19-24; II Chron. 18:10).

2. The last king of Judah, son of Josiah and Hamutal (II Kings 24:18). Because of the wickedness of Judah, God finally brought on the predicted Babylonian captivity. Nebuchadnezzar came to Jerusalem, took Judah's king, Jehoiachin, to Babylon and made Mattaniah, whose name he changed to Zedekiah, king in his stead. Having taken away the men of influence from Judah, he felt the remaining Jews would be easily subdued (Ezek. 17:11-14). Zedekiah, however, rebelled against the king of Babylon, and as a result, he was taken by Nebuchadnezzar and bound. His sons were killed before his eyes and his own eyes put out. He was then taken to Babylon where he died (II Kings 24,25). Because of his evil he was permitted only 11 years of reign, many details of which are given in Jeremiah chaps. 34-37.

3. The son of Jeconiah (I Chron. 3:16).

4. The son of Maaseiah. He was a false prophet who carried on his ruinous work among those who had been deported to Babylon. He was singled out by Jeremiah and publicly denounced for having prophesied lies. His death by being "roasted in the fire" was foretold by Jeremiah as a warning to the rest (Jer. 29:21-23).

5. The son of Hananiah. He was a prince of Israel in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. 36:12).

6. A high official who sealed the renewed covenant (Neh. 10:1).

ZEEB (zē'ĕb, Heb. ze'ev, wolf), one of the two princes of Midian slain by Gideon's men at a winepress named for him (Judg. 7:25ff).

ZELAH (zē'la, Heb. tsēla'), a town in Benjamin probably close to Jerusalem (Josh. 18:28). Here David reinterred the bones of Saul and Jonathan in the family sepulchre which had belonged to Kish (II Sam. 21:14). "Zela" (ASV) is closer to the Hebrew.

ZELEK (zē'lĕk, Heb. tseleq, a fissure), an Ammonite who served in David's inner circle of mighty men (II Sam. 23:37; I Chron. 11:39).

ZELOPHEHAD (zē-lō'fē-hăd, Heb. tselophādh, meaning unknown), a Manassite who died in the wilderness leaving five daughters but no sons; and in the division of the land, they begged a share in the inheritance (Num. 27:1-11). This Jehovah granted, and when their tribesmen feared that their property might be alienated from the tribe by marriage (Num. 36:1-12) he commanded that they should marry only within their tribe, and this became a general law regarding heiresses.

ZELOTES (See Zealot)

ZELZAH (zĕl'za, Heb. tseltsah), a town in the southern border of Benjamin near Rachel's tomb (Gen. 35:19,20; 48:7; I Sam. 10:2).

ZEMARAIM (zĕm'a-rā'ĭm, Heb. tsemārayim). 1. An ancient town allotted to the tribe of Benjamin, about four miles N of Jericho in the Arabah, and long since merely a ruin (Josh. 18:22).

2. A mountain in the hill country of Ephraim upon which King Abijah stood and rebuked Jeroboam and Israel for their rebellion against Judah and for their idolatry (II Chron. 13:4ff). Though Jeroboam's army was twice the size of Abijah's, God gave the victory.

ZEMARITES (zĕm'a-rīts, Heb. ha-tsemārî), a tribe of Canaanites mentioned in the "table of the nations" (Gen. 10:18) in the Hamite list between the Arvadites and the Hamathites. The site was probably modern Sumra, on the coast between Arvad and Tripolis.

ZEMIRA (zē-mī'ra, Heb. zemîrâh), a grandson of Benjamin through his son Becher (I Chron. 7:8).

ZENAN (zē'năn, Heb. tsenān, tsa'ănān), a place in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15:37), the same as Zaanan q.v. See Micah 1:11.

ZENAS (zē'năs, Gr. Zenás), a Christian lawyer in Crete whom Paul asked to be sent to him, with Apollos, in Nicopolis (Titus 3:13).

ZEPHANIAH (zĕf'a-nī'a, Heb. tsephanyâh, hidden of Jehovah). 1. An ancestor of the prophet Samuel (I Chron. 6:36).

2. Author of the book of Zephaniah and very probably related to the kings of Judah as follows (Zeph. 1:1): Amariah and King Manasseh were brothers, Gedaliah and King Amon were cousins, Cushi and King Josiah were second cousins, and Zephaniah was third cousin of the three kings Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim and Zechariah; thus putting the prophet into familiar relationship with the court, to which his message seems to be specially directed (e.g. 1:8). His principal work seems to have been early in Josiah's reign, like that of his contemporaries Nahum and Habakkuk and before the greater prophecies of his other contemporary, Jeremiah.

3. A priest, son of Maaseiah, whom Zedekiah sent to inquire of Jeremiah (II Kings 25:18-21; Jer. 21:1). The Babylonian captain of the guard took him to Riblah where Nebuchadnezzar had him slain.

4. Father of a Josiah in the days of Darius to whom God sent the Prophet Zechariah with a message of comfort and encouragement (Zech. 6:9-15).

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF, the ninth of the Minor Prophets and the last before the Seventy Years' Captivity of Judah. Zephaniah's ministry was probably aided by his social position, as he was very probably related to the kings of the day, and he certainly was fearless in his denunciation of the evils of his time. He was hopeful in his outlook, for though he dreaded the horrors of the Day of Jehovah which he saw fast approaching, he could look beyond and rejoice in the Restoration message. The prophecy is dated in 1:1 in the reign of Josiah, that is, between 639 and 608 B.C.

The book divides naturally into 14 paragraphs (12 in ASV) as follows: 1. Title, author, and date (1:1). 2. Apostates to be destroyed (1:2-6), including the idolatrous priests. 3. Announcement of the great "Day of Jehovah" (1:7-13). 4. The Day of Jehovah described (1:14-18). 5. A plea for repentance (2:1-3). 6. Philistia to be destroyed (2:4,5). 7. The Philistine coast will some day belong to Israel (2:6,7). 8. Moab and the Ammonites denounced for their pride (2:8-11). 9. Ruin predicted from Ethiopia to Assyria (2:12-15). 10. Woe also to rebellious Jerusalem (3:1-7). 11. The judgment of the nations (3:8). 12. Restoration of Israel promised (3:9-11). 13. A remnant to be blessed (3:12,13). 14. Jehovah in the midst of Zion (3:14-20). A.B.F.

ZEPHATH (zē'făth, Heb. tsephath, watch-tower), a Canaanite city about 22 miles SW of the southern end of the Dead Sea, in the territory later occupied by the tribe of Simeon. It was utterly destroyed in the time of the Conquest by the tribes of Judah and Simeon and renamed "Hormah," i.e. "devoted to God" in the sense of being laid waste (Judg. 1:17). Cf. "Hormah" in Numbers 21:3 for the use of the word.

ZEPHATHAH (zĕf'à-thà, Heb. tsephāthâh, watch-tower), a valley near Mareshah in the western part of Judah, where King Asa met the hosts of Zerah the Ethiopian, and where, in answer to prayer, God gave a great victory to Judah (II Chron. 14:9-12).

ZEPHI (zē'fī, Heb. tsephî, watchtower), a grandson of Esau through Eliphaz (I Chron. 1:36); in Genesis 36:11,15, "Zepho."

ZEPHO (See Zephi)

ZEPHON (zē'fŏn, Heb. tsephôn, watching), a Gadite from whom the family of Zephonites descended (Num. 26:15). In Genesis 46:16 he is called "Ziphion."

ZEPHONITES (See Zepho)

ZER (zêr, Heb. tsēr), a fenced city, NW of the Lake of Galilee, given in Joshua's time to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35).

ZERAH (zē'rà, Heb. zerah, rising). 1. One of twin sons born to Judah (Gen. 38:30). Of him came the Zarhite family of Numbers 26:20 (ASV "Zerahites"). He was great-grandfather of Achan, "the Troubler of Israel" (Josh. 7).

2. A cousin of the preceding; son of Simeon (Num. 26:13) and head of another Zarhite family.

3. A Gershonite Levite of the sixth generation (I Chron. 6:21).

4. Another Gershonite Levite, but later (I Chron. 6:41).

5. A grandson of Esau through Reuel, son of Basemath (Gen. 36:13). He was a chief (Gen. 36:17 in KJV "duke").

6. Father of Jobab, the second of the early kings of Edom (Gen. 36:33). He lived at Bozrah several miles S of the Dead Sea.

7. A king of Ethiopia (II Chron. 14:9) in the latter part of the tenth century B.C. who invaded Judah with an immense army during the reign of Asa, but Asa prayed and the Lord smote the Ethiopians and gave Asa victory.

ZERAHIAH (zĕr-à-hī'à, Heb. zerahyâh, Jehovah is risen). 1. A Levite in the ancestry of Ezra (I Chron. 6:6,51).

2. A leader of 200 men who returned with Ezra (Ezra 8:4).

ZERED (zē'rĕd, Heb. zeredh), a valley running north-westward on the border between Moab and Edom and debouching at the southern end of the Dead Sea; also the brook which follows the valley. A camping place of Israel at the end of their long wanderings (Num. 21:12, KJV Zared; Deut. 2:13, 14). In Isaiah 15:7 it is called "the brook of the willows"; in Amos 6:14 the "river of the wilderness."

ZEREDA (zĕr-ē'dà, Heb. tserēdhah), the birthplace of Jeroboam of Ephraim (I Kings 11:26). ASV properly has Zeredah. Metal work for the temple was cast there. It was located somewhere in the Jordan valley, but the exact site is unknown.

ZEREDATHAH (See Zarthan)

ZERERATH (zĕr'ĕ-răth, Heb. tserērāthâh), a part of the valley of Jezreel to which the Midianites fled from Gideon (Judg. 7:22). ASV has "Zererah," but some MSS of the Hebrew have "Zeredah" which is more probably correct.

ZERESH (zē'rĕsh, Heb. zeresh, golden), the wife of Haman the Agagite, the enemy of the Jews, who advised him to build a gallows for Mordecai, but later saw her error (Esth. 5:10,14; 6:13). Her name is Persian.

ZERETH (zē'rĕth, Heb. tsereth, splendor (?)), an early descendant of Judah through Helah, second wife of Ashhur (I Chron. 4:7).

ZERI (zē'rī, Heb. tserî), one of the sons of Jeduthun in the days of David, who with harp and voice praised the Lord (I Chron. 25:3); perhaps the same as Izri, vs. 11.

ZEROR (zē'rôr, Heb. tserôr), a Benjamite, great-grandfather of King Saul (I Sam. 9:1).

ZERQA (zêr'kà), a wadi running westward to the Jordan and corresponding to the ancient river Jabbok. Also "Zerka." See JABBOK.

ZERUAH (zê-rōō'à, Heb. tserû'âh, leprous), the widow of Nebat, father of Jeroboam of Israel (I Kings 11:26).

ZERUBBABEL (zĕ-rŭb'à-bĕl, Heb. zerubbāvel, shoot of Babylon), the son of Shealtiel and the grandson of King Jehoiachin (Ezra 3:2; Hag. 1:1; Matt. 1:12). In I Chronicles 3:19 he is declared to be the son of Pedaiah, Shealtiel's brother. The explanation for this apparent discrepancy is very likely that Shealtiel died without issue; and either his nephew was his legal heir and therefore called his son (Exod. 2:10) or else Pedaiah married his brother's widow and thus Zerubbabel became Shealtiel's son by levirate law (Deut. 25:5-10). He was heir to the throne of Judah (I Chron. 3:17-19) and is listed in the genealogy of our Lord (Matt. 1:13; Luke 3:27).

When Cyrus allowed the Jews to return to their own land, he appointed Zerubbabel governor of the colony (Ezra 1:8,11; 5:14). Joshua the high priest was the religious leader. When they reached Jerusalem, they first set up the altar of burnt offerings, then they proceeded to lay the foundation of the new temple. Soon, however, opposition arose. The adversaries of the Jews made an apparently friendly offer of assistance (Ezra 4), but Zerubbabel and the other leaders rebuffed them; whereupon they wrote to the king and succeeded in stopping the work during the reigns of Cambyses (the "Ahasuerus" of Ezra 4:6) and the pseudo-Smerdis (the "Artaxerxes" of Ezra 4:7ff). In 520 B.C. the work was resumed and completed four years later. A great celebration was held at the dedication of the new temple (Zech. 6:16-22), and so far as the record tells, the work of Zerubbabel was complete. It is not known when he died.

ZERUIAH (zêr'o͞o-ī'ȧ, Heb. tserûyâh), sister of David and mother of Joab, Abishai and Asahel. She was probably not a daughter of Jesse, but a daughter of David's mother by an earlier marriage with Nahash (II Sam. 17:25).

ZETHAM (zē'thăm, Heb. zethām, olive tree), a Gershonite Levite in David's time. He was son of Ladan (I Chron. 23:8), or, according to 26:22, his grandson through Jehieli. KJV calls his father "Laadan."

ZETHAN (zē'thăn, Heb. zethān, olive tree), a Benjamite, son of Jediael (I Chron. 7:10).

ZETHAR (zē'thȧr, Heb. zēthar), one of the seven chamberlains of Xerxes (Ahasuerus, Esth. 1:10).

ZEUS (zūs, Gr. Zeús), the chief of the Olympian gods, corresponding to the Roman Jupiter (see Acts 14:12,13; 19:35). His ancestry was as follows: Chaos, a heterogenous mass containing all the seeds of nature produced Gaea (Earth) who in turn produced Uranus (Heaven) and married him. Among their numerous progeny were Cronos (Saturn) who married his sister Rhea and they became "Father and mother of the gods." Chief of their children was Zeus, head of the Olympian gods and by various marriages and illicit unions the father of most of the greater gods of the Greek pantheon. One of the crowning insults which Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria 176-164 B.C., offered to the Jews was his dedication of the temple at Jerusalem to Zeus (II Macc. 6). A.B.F.

ZIA (zī'ȧ, Heb. zia'), an early Gadite (I Chron. 5:13).

ZIBA (zī'bȧ, Heb. tsîvā', tsivā', a plant), a servant or slave of King Saul (II Sam. 9:2). He had 15 sons and 20 servants. David, desiring to show kindness to the house of his departed friend, Jonathan, appointed Ziba to work for Mephibosheth, Jonathan's crippled son. When David was in trouble, Ziba offered him service (II Sam. 19), but ascribed treachery to his master Mephibosheth. David thereupon gave Ziba his master's property; but later (19:24-30) when Mephibosheth declared his innocence, David altered the decree.

ZIBEON (zĭb'ē-ŭn, Heb. tsiv'ôn, hyena), a Hivite, grandfather of Oholibama, a wife of Esau (Gen. 36:2,14). The text should probably be amended to "Horite."

ZIBIA (zĭb'ĭ-ȧ, Heb. tsivyā', gazelle), an early descendant of Benjamin (I Chron. 8:9).

ZIBIAH (zĭb'ĭ-ȧ, Heb. tsivyâh, gazelle), a woman of Beersheba who married King Ahaziah and was mother of Joash, king of Judah (II Kings 12:1; II Chron. 24:1).

ZIDDIM (zĭd'ĭm, Heb. ha-tsiddîm, sides), a fortified city in Naphtali (Josh. 19:35), perhaps less than one-half mile N of the Horns of Hattin, W of the Sea of Galilee.

ZIDKIJAH (See Zedekiah)

ZIDON (zī'dŏn, Heb. tsîdhôn, a fishery), the ancient Phoenician city in the Lebanon. In the KJV usually Zidon in the OT, and always Sidon in the NT. It was a Canaanite city (Gen. 10:15,19), 22 miles N of Tyre. Homer often mentions it, but never Tyre. It was near Zebulun (Gen. 49:13); and Asher reached it (Josh. 19:28), although the Asherites never expelled its inhabitants (Judg. 1:31). Baal and Ashtoreth, a goddess of fertility, were its chief gods (I Kings 11:5,33; II Kings 23:13). The father of Jezebel was a king of Sidon (I Kings 16:31). It has a checkered history, times of great prosperity alternating with periods when the city was under foreign control; and more than once it was destroyed. In 64 B.C. it passed to the Romans. People from Tyre came to hear Jesus preach in Galilee (Mark 3:8; Luke 6:17), and once Jesus visited the city (Matt. 15:21; Mark 7:24,31). Paul stopped off there (Acts 27:3). One of the most ancient of cities, it still survives in the modern Saida, on the NW slope of a small promontory jutting out into the sea. S.B.

ZIDONIANS (See Zidon)

ZIF (zĭf, Heb. ziw), the second month of the old Hebrew calendar, corresponding to Iyyar in the later Jewish calendar (I Kings 6:1,37).

ZIGGURAT (zĭg'o͝o-răt, Assyr-Bab. ziqquratu, from the verb zaqaru, meaning to be high or raised up; hence the top of a mountain, or a staged tower). A temple tower of the Babylonians, consisting of a lofty structure in the form of a pyramid, built in successive stages, with staircases on the outside, and a shrine at the top. These structures are the most characteristic feature of temple architecture in Mesopotamia, and the locations of more than two dozen are known today. The oldest one known is at Uruk in Mesopotamia. It measured 140 by 150 feet and stood about 30 feet high. At the top was the shrine, 65 feet long, 50 feet wide, and built about a narrow court. It was made of packed clay strengthened with layers of asphalt and unburnt bricks. The ziggurat at Ur was 200 feet long, 150 feet wide, and some 70 feet high. The inside was made of unbaked brick; the outside consisted of about eight feet of baked brick set in bitumen. The Stele of Ur-Nammu is a contemporary record of the building of this ziggurat. The tower of Babel was a ziggurat (Gen. 11:1-9). S.B.

One of the most famous ziggurats, or temple towers, of the ancient world was the ziggurat at Ur, of which these ruins remain. SHH

ZIHA (zī'hà, Heb. tsîhā'). 1. Head of a family of temple servants, "Nethinim," who returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:43; Neh. 7:46).

2. A ruler of the Nethinim in Ophel in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. 11:21).

ZIKLAG (zĭk'lăg, Heb. tsiqelagh), a city in the south of Palestine, given to Judah in Joshua's day (Josh. 15:31) but subsequently given to or shared by Simeon (Josh. 19:5). Later it was ruled by the Philistines; Achish, king of Gath, assigned it to David and his men who were fleeing from Saul (I Sam. 27:1-7). During their occupation of the city, David offered to go with Achish against Saul, but the Philistines sent him back, and on reaching Ziklag he found that the Amalekites had raided it, burned it and had carried off the women and children. David recovered his property, returned to Ziklag and from there began to recruit men of Judah to take his side when they would be needed. Later Ziklag became the property of the kings of Judah till the captivity.

ZIKRI (zĭk'rī, Heb. zikhrî). 1. A Levite, first cousin of Aaron and Moses (Exod. 6:21).

2. A Benjamite of the family of Shemei or Shema (KJV Shimhi) (I Chron. 8:19, cf. vs. 13, 21).

3. Another Benjamite, son of Shashak (I Chron. 8:23).

4. Still another Benjamite, son of Jeroham (I Chron. 8:27). All these mentioned were heads of "fathers' houses" and so of some renown in their day.

5. A Levite ancestor of Mattaniah who returned from captivity (I Chron. 9:15, but called "Zabdi" in Nehemiah 11:17).

6. A descendant of Eliezer, younger son of Moses, in the days of King David (I Chron. 26:25).

7. The father of Eliezer, ruler of the tribe of Reuben in David's time (I Chron. 27:16).

8. Father of Amasiah, the leader of 200,000 men of valor of Judah in the time of Jehoshaphat (II Chron. 17:16).

9. Father of Elishaphat who covenanted with Jehoiada to put Joash on the throne (II Chron. 23:1).

10. A mighty man of Ephraim who, in Pekah's war against Judah, killed the son of Ahaz and other leaders (II Chron. 28:7).

11. Father of Joel, the overseer of the Benjamites under Nehemiah (Neh. 11:9).

12. Head of a fathers' house of priests in the days of Nehemiah 12:17, a descendant of Abijah.

ZILLAH (zĭl'à, Heb. tsillâh, shadow), one of the two wives of the Cainite Lamech, the first known polygamist; and mother of Tubal-cain the patriarch of all workers in brass and iron (Gen. 4:19-22).

ZILPAH (zĭl'pà, Heb. zilpâh, meaning uncertain), handmaid of Leah, given to her by her father Laban, and later through Jacob, the mother of Gad and Asher (Gen. 29:24; 30:9-13).

ZILTHAI (zĭl'thī, Heb. tsillethay, shadow of Jehovah). 1. An early Benjamite, and descended from Shema (I Chron. 8:20; in ASV Zillethai).

2. Captain of a thousand of the tribe of Manasseh who joined David at Ziklag (I Chron. 12:20).

ZIMMAH (zĭm'à, Heb. zimmâh), a Gershonite Levite (I Chron. 6:20,42,43; and perhaps II Chron. 29:12).

ZIMRAN (zĭm'răn, Heb. zimrān), a son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. 25:2; I Chron. 1:32).

ZIMRI (zĭm'rī, Heb. zimrî). 1. A prince of the tribe of Simeon who shamelessly brought a Midianite woman into the camp of Israel to commit adultery with her, even while God was dealing with Israel for its sin in this way (Num. 25:14). Phinehas, grandson of Aaron, slew the two of them.

2. The fifth king of the northern kingdom. He had been captain of half the chariots of his master Elah (I Kings 16:9-20). He assassinated Elah, who was in a drunken condition, and reigned for seven days, when he himself was besieged by Omri, and committed suicide by burning the king's house over himself. His capital was at Tirzah in the hills of Samaria and his "reign" was short, wicked and inglorious.

3. Son of Zerah, and grandson of Judah (I Chron. 2:6), possibly the same as the Zabdi of Joshua 7:1.

4. Son of Jehoaddah or Jarah of the tribe of Benjamin and father of Moza (I Chron. 8:36; 9:42).

5. An unknown tribe in the East (Jer. 25:25), but apparently important because its kings were listed with the kings of Elam and of the Medes.

ZIN (zĭn, Heb. tsin), a wilderness the Israelites traversed on their way to Canaan. It was close to the borders of Canaan (Num. 13:21) and included Kadesh-barnea within its bounds (Num. 20:1; 27:14; 33:36). Edom bordered it on the E, Judah on the SE (Josh. 15:1-3), and the wilderness of Paran on the S. It was not the same as the wilderness of Sin, Zin and Sin being quite different Hebrew words.

ZINA (zī'nȧ, Heb. zîzâh), a Levite of the family of Gershom (I Chron. 23:10). The correct spelling is Zizah, as in verse 11.

ZION (zī'ŭn, Heb. tsîyôn, Gr. Sión, meaning of word uncertain, but probably citadel), one of the hills on which Jerusalem stood. It is first mentioned in the OT as a Jebusite fortress (II Sam. 5:6-9). David captured it and called it the city of David. At this time the citadel stood on the long ridge running S of the temple, although not all scholars are agreed on this. This location is near the only known spring; it is suitable for defense; its size is about that of other fortified towns; archeological remains show that it was inhabited long before David's time; and certain Bible references (I Kings 8:1; II Chron. 5:2; 32:30; 33:14) indicate that this was the original Zion. David brought the Ark to Zion, and the hill henceforth became sacred (II Sam. 6:10-12). When Solomon later removed the Ark to the temple on nearby Mount Moriah, the name Zion was extended to take in the temple (Isa. 8:18; 18:7; 24:23; Joel 3:17; Micah 4:7). Zion came to be used for the whole of Jerusalem (II Kings 19:21; Ps. 48; 69:35; 133:3; Isa. 1:8, etc.). The name is frequently used figuratively for the Jewish Church and polity (Ps. 126:1; 129:5; Isa. 33:14; 34:8; 49:14; 52:8) and for heaven (Heb. 12:22; cf. Rev. 14:1). S.B.

ZIOR (zī'ôr, Heb. tsî'ōr, smallness), a town in the S of the Promised Land given to Judah in the days of Joshua (Josh. 15:54). It was probably near Hebron.

ZIPH (zĭf, Heb. zīph, meaning unknown). 1. A city in the Negeb "toward the border of Edom" given to the tribe of Judah in Joshua's division of the land. Probably about four miles S by E from Hebron.

2. The wilderness named from #1 which was in the southern part of Jeshimon, and where David hid from Saul till the Ziphites betrayed him (I Sam. 23:14-24; 26:1,2).

3. A city in the western part of Judah which Rehoboam fortified (II Chron. 11:8).

4. Possibly the same as #1 though mentioned separately in Joshua 15:55.

5. A Calebite family name (I Chron. 2:42).

6. A son of Jehallelel of the tribe of Judah (I Chron. 4:16). In KJV his father is Jehaleleel.

ZIPHAH (zĭ'fà, Heb. zīphâh, fem. of ziph), one of the sons of Jehaleleel (I Chron. 4:16).

ZIPHIMS (See Ziphites)

ZIPHION (See Zephon)

ZIPHITES (zĭf'īts, Heb. zîphî), the inhabitants of Ziph, whether the town or the wilderness surrounding it (I Sam. 23:14-23; 26:1-5). Twice, apparently, David, being pursued by King Saul, hid in their vicinity and each time the Ziphites, though of David's tribe, told Saul of his location. They seemed to think it best to support the reigning king than to be kind to David, whom they considered a rebel.

ZIPHRON (zĭf'rŏn, Heb. ziphrôn), a place on the ideal northern border of the land of Canaan. It is mentioned between Zedad and Hazar-enan and is probably not far from the city of Homs (Num. 34:9;

ZIPPOR (zĭp'ôr, Heb. tsippôr, bird), the father of Balak, king of Moab, and apparently of the Midianites (Num. 22:3,4).

ZIPPORAH (zĭ-pō'rà, Heb. tsippōrâh, bird, fem. of Zippor), daughter of Jethro or Reuel, the priest of Midian, who became the first wife of Moses (Exod. 2:21). She was the mother of Gershom and of Eliezer (Exod. 18:1-6). Apparently Moses sent her back to her father during the stirring times connected with the Exodus, though she had at least started to Egypt with him (cf. Exod. 4:20; 18:2).

ZITHRI (zĭth'rī, Heb. sithrî, my protection), a Kohathite Levite, first cousin of Aaron and Moses (Exod. 6:22). Sithri in ASV.

ZIV (See Zif)

ZIZ (zĭz, Heb. tsîts, shining), a cliff mentioned only in II Chronicles 20:16, which stood near the W side of the Red Sea on the way from Engedi to Tekoa. A great horde of Moabites, Ammonites and apparently some Syrians had assembled against Judah at Engedi. When Jehoshaphat heard of their approach, he feared, but being a godly man he prayed, and God through a prophet cheered him and told him where to find the enemy, "at the ascent (KJV "cliff") of Ziz," and that they would not need to fight, "for Jehovah is with you." Trusting the Lord, Jehoshaphat set his musicians before the army, and when "they began to sing and to praise," the Lord dispersed the enemy, and the Jews gathered the spoil.

ZIZA (zĭ'zà, Heb. zîzā', abundance). 1. Son of Shiphi (KJV "Ziphi") a Simeonite who with others, in the days of King Hezekiah, drove out the ancient inhabitants of Gedor, SW of Bethlehem, and took their land for pasture (I Chron. 4:37-41).

2. A son of Rehoboam and brother of Abijah, kings of Judah (II Chron. 11:20). His mother was Maacah (KJV Maachah), the favorite wife of his father.

ZIZAH (zī'zà, Heb. zîzâh), second son of Shimei, a leading Gershonite Levite in the days of David (I Chron. 23:11). Called Zina in the preceding verse.

ZOAN (zō'ăn, Heb. tsō'an), an ancient Egyptian city, built seven years later than Hebron (Num. 13:22) on the E part of the Delta. The first kings of Dynasty XII made it their capital; the Hyksos fortified it and changed the name to Avaris. When the Hyksos were driven out, the city was neglected, but it was re-established by Sethi I. The Egyptian god Seth had a center of worship there. Moses met the pharaoh at Zoan (Ps. 78:12,43). Isaiah and Ezekiel refer to it as an important city (Isa. 19:11,13; Ezek. 30:14). For a time the Assyrians were in control of it. The Greeks called it "Tanis." Eventually it was superseded by the new city of Alexandria. Extensive ruins survive near the modern village of San (i.e., Zoan), about 18 miles SE of Damietta.

ZOAR (zō'êr, Heb. tsō'ar, little), an ancient Canaanite city now probably under the waters of the bay at the SE part of the Dead Sea. Formerly called "Bela" (Gen. 14:2), it was saved from immediate destruction with Sodom and Gomorrah in answer to the prayer of Lot, "is it not a little one?" (Gen. 19:20-22). When Moses stood on Mt. Pisgah to view the Promised Land, Zoar was at the southern limit of his view (Deut. 34:3). In the "Doom of Moab" (Isa. 15) the fleeing Moabites were to go to Zoar (vs. 5) and in its later doom (Jer. 48:34) we read again of Zoar. During the Middle Ages it was an important point between Elath and Jerusalem.

ZOBA, ZOBAH (zō'bà, Heb. tsôvâh), a region in central Syria, sometimes under one king (II Sam. 8:3), but in its first occurrence (I Sam. 14:47) we read that Saul of Israel fought against the kings of Zobah, which may indicate more than one kingdom, or possibly successive kings. The kings of Zobah were persistent enemies of Israel, not only fighting against Saul, but against David (II Sam. 8) and Solomon. Solomon prevailed against Hamath-zobah (II Chron. 8:3) and we hear no more of this kingdom. The servants of Hadadezer in the days of David had shields of gold (II Sam. 8:3-12) and a large army all of which David captured. Later the Ammonites, in warring against David, hired mercenary troops from Zobah, and these too were badly defeated (II Sam. 10). It lay between Hamath and Damascus. Zoba in Hebrew and KJV.

ZOBEBAH (zō-bē'bà, Heb. tsōvēvâh), a Judahite name referring either to a place, person, or a clan (I Chron. 4:8).

ZOHAR (zō'hàr, Heb. tsōhar). 1. A noble Hittite, father of Ephron from whom Abraham purchased the field of Machpelah where he buried the body of Sarah in a cave (Gen. 23:8; 25:9).

2. A son of Simeon, second son of Jacob (Gen. 46:10; Exod. 6:15), called "Zerah" in Numbers 26:13 and I Chronicles 4:24.

3. A man of Judah (I Chron. 4:7).

ZOHELETH (zō'hē-lĕth, Heb. zōheleth, serpent) a stone beside En-rogel where Adonijah, fourth son of David, and older than Solomon, gathered his conspirators before David's death, slaying sheep and oxen, in order to make himself king at or before the death of his father. The plot was revealed to David, who caused Solomon to be anointed and thus the plot was foiled (I Kings 1, esp. vs. 9). Its exact site is unknown.

ZOHETH (zō'hĕth, Heb. zohēth), son of Ishi, a Judahite (I Chron. 4:20).

ZOPHAH (zō'fà, Heb. tsōphah), an Asherite, son of Helem (I Chron. 7:35,36).

ZOPHAI (zō'fī, Heb. tsōphay), an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (I Chron. 6:26; called "Zuph" in vs. 35).

ZOPHAR (zō'fêr, Heb. tsōphar), one of Job's friends who came to comfort him in his affliction (Job 2:11).

ZOPHIM (zō'fĭm, Heb. tsōphîm, watchers), a field near the top of Pisgah (Num. 23:14). The exact site is unknown.

ZORAH (zō'ra, Heb. tsorâh), a city about 15 miles W of Jerusalem on the borders of Judah and Dan (Josh. 15:33; 19:41), the home of Manoah, father of Samson (Judg. 13:2). Samson was buried near there (Judg. 16:31). From Zorah the Danites sent spies to seek a new home for their tribe (Judg. 18:2).

ZORATHITES (zō'rà-thīts, Heb. tsor'āthî), the inhabitants of Zorah (I Chron. 2:53 — KJV has Zoreathites; 4:2).

ZOREAH (See Zorah)

ZORITES (zō'rīts, Heb. tsor'î). In I Chronicles 2:54 "Zorathites" should probably be read; otherwise the reference is to a man of some unknown place.

ZOROBABEL (See Zerubbabel)

ZUAR (zū'êr, Heb. tsû'ār, small), the father of Nethaneel of the tribe of Issachar, who was a prince of his tribe (Num. 1:8; 2:5).

ZUPH (zŭf, Heb. tsûph, honeycomb). 1. An ancestor of the Prophet Samuel. He was a Levite descended from Kohath (I Chron. 6:35). Called "Zophai" in I Chronicles 6:26.

2. A district in Benjamin, near its northern border (I Sam. 9:5). Location unknown.

ZUR (zûr, Heb. tsûr, rock). 1. One of the five kings of the Midianites slain by Israel (Num. 25:15; 31:8. Cozbi, his daughter, was slain by Phinehas, grandson of Aaron.

2. An inhabitant of Gibeon in Benjamin; son of Jeiel (I Chron. 8:30,33).

ZURIEL (zū'rĭ-ĕl, Heb. tsûrî'ēl, whose rock is God), son of Abihail, prince of the Merarite Levites in the wildnerness (Num. 3:35).

ZURISHADDAI (zū'rĭ-shăd'ī, Heb. tsûrîshadday, whose rock is the Almighty), father of Shelumiel, head of the tribe of Simeon in the wilderness (Num. 1:6; 2:12; 7:36,41; 10:19).

ZUZIM (zū'zĭm, Heb. zûzîm), a primitive race of giants, smitten by Chedorlaomer and his allies at an unknown place called Ham, E of the Jordan, in the days of Abraham (Gen. 14:5); erroneously called "Zuzims" in the KJV.
