Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation

Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation

John H. Hayes, General Editor

K–Z

Abingdon Press
Nashville

Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation

Copyright © 1999 by Abingdon Press

All rights reserved.

No part of this work may be reproduced or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopying and recording. or by means of any information storage or retrieval system, except as may be expressly permitted by the 1976 Copyright Act or in writing from the publisher. Requests for permission should be addressed in writing to Abingdon Press, 201 Eighth Avenue South, Nashville, TN 37203.

This book is printed on recycled, acid-free, elemental-chlorine free paper.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation / John H. Hayes, general editor
p. cm.
Includes bibliographical references.
ISBN 0-687-05531-8 (hardcover: alk. paper)
1. Bible—Criticism, interpretation, etc.—History—Dictionaries. 2. Bible—Hermeneutics—Dictionaries. I. Hayes, John Haralson, 1934–
BS500.D5 1999 98-42795
220.6'03—dc21 CIP

Scripture quotations, unless otherwise indicated, are from the New Revised Standard Version Bible, copyright 1989, by the Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America.

Scripture quotations noted as AT are the author's translation.

Manuscript on title page: The Bodleian Library, Oxford, MS. Digby 226, fol. 96v.

PUBLICATION STAFF
President and Publisher: Neil M. Alexander
Vice President and Editorial Director: Harriett Jane Olson
Director of Bible and Reference Resources: Jack A. Keller, Jr.
Senior Editor: Michael R. Russell
Production Editor: Joan M. Shoup
Editor: Deborah A. Appler
Assistant Editor: Emily Cheney
Production and Design Manager: Walter E. Wynne
Copy Processing Manager: Sylvia S. Street
Composition Specialist: Kathy M. Harding
Publishing Systems Analyst: Glenn R. Hinton
Prepress Manager: Billy W. Murphy
Prepress Systems Technicians: Thomas E. Mullins
J. Calvin Buckner
Director of Production Processes: James E. Leath
Scheduling: Laurene M. Brazzell
Print Procurement Coordinator: Martha K. Taylor

99 00 01 02 03 04 05 06 07 — 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

MANUFACTURED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ABBREVIATIONS

General

abr.	abridged	Heb.	Hebrew
AM	Anno Mundi	hon.	honorable approx.	approximately	ill.	illustration
art(s).	article(s)	intro.	introduction
aug.	augmented	Ital.	Italian
b.	born	KS	Kleine Schriften
BCE	Before the Common Era	Lat.	Latin
Bd(e).	Band(e) (Ger.)	lit.	literally
bib.	biblical	LT	Latin translation
bk(s).	book(s)	LXX	Septuagint
CE	Common Era	masc.	masculine
c.	circa	MS(S)	manuscript(s)
cent(s).	century(ies)	MT	Masoretic Text
cf.	compare	n.	number
chap(s).	chapter(s)	n.d.	no date
comb.	combined	n.s.	new series
contr.	contributor	NT	New Testament
corr.	corrected	OG	Old Greek
d.	died	o.j.	ohne Jahr
dept.	department	OL	Old Latin
dir.	director	o.s.	old series
diss.	dissertation	OT	Old Testament
DH	deuteronomistic history	par.	paragraph
Dtr^1	first deuteronomistic redaction	pl.	plural
Dtr^2	second deuteronomistic redaction	posth.	posthumous
Dtr	deuteronomistic historian	prod.	producer
DtrG	deuteronomistische Geschichte	pt(s).	part(s)
DtrN	nomistic deuteronomist	pub.	published
DtrP	prophetic deuteronomist	R.	Rabbi
ed(s).	editor(s)/edition(s)	repr.	reprint
Eng.	English	repub.	republished
enl.	enlarged	rev. ed.	revised edition
esp.	especially	RGS	Religionsgeschichtliche Schule
est.	established	sec(s).	section(s)
ET	English translation	ser.	series
fem.	feminine	stud.	studies
fl.	flourished	supp.	supplement
frg(s).	fragment(s)	s.v.	sub verbo
FS	Festschrift	tr.	translator/translation
FT	French translation	trans.	transcribed
Ger.	German	u.a.	unter anderem/und andere
Gr.	Greek	v(v).	verse(s)
GS	Gesammelte Schriften	Vg.	Vulgate
GT	German translation	vol(s).	volume(s)
HB	Hebrew Bible

Biblical Books (including the Apocrypha)

Gen	Nah	1–2–3–4 Kgdms	John
Exod	Hab	Add Esth	Acts
Lev	Zeph	Bar	Rom
Num	Hag	Bel	1–2 Cor
Deut	Zech	1–2 Esdr	Gal
Josh	Mal	4 Ezra	Eph
Judg	Ps(s)	Jdt	Phil
1–2 Sam	Job	Ep Jer	Col
1–2 Kgs	Prov	1–2–3–4 Macc	1–2 Thess
Isa	Ruth	Pr Azar	1–2 Tim
Jer	Cant	Pr Man	Titus
Ezek	Eccl	Sir	Phlm
Hos	Lam	Sus	Heb
Joel	Esth	Tob	Jas
Amos	Dan	Wis	1–2 Pet
Obad	Ezra	Matt	1–2–3 John
Jonah	Neh	Mark	Jude
Mic	1–2 Chr	Luke	Rev

Pseudepigraphical and Early Patristic Books

Adam and Eve	Books of Adam and Eve
Acts Pil.	Acts of Pilate
Apoc. Mos.	Apocalypse of Moses
Ap. Zeph.	Apocalypse of Zephaniah
As. Mos.	Assumption of Moses
Barn.	Epistle of Barnabas
Bib. Ant.	Ps.-Philo, Biblical Antiquities
1–2 Clem.	1–2 Clement
Did.	Didache
Diogn.	Epistle to Diognets
1–2–3 Enoch	Ethiopic, Slavonic, Hebrew Enoch
Ep. Arist.	Epistle of Aristeas
Gos. Eb.	Gospel of the Ebionites
Gos. Eg.	Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Heb.	Gospel of the Hebrews
Gos. Naass.	Gospel of the Naassenes
Gos. Pet.	Gospel of Peter
Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
Herm. Man.	Hermas, Mandate(s)
Herm. Sim.	Hermas, Similitude(s)
Herm. Vis.	Hermas, Vision(s)
Ign. Eph.	Ignatius, Letter to the Ephesians
Ign. Magn.	Ignatius, Letter to the Magnesians
Ign. Phld.	Ignatius, Letter to the Philadelphians
Ign. Pol.	Ignatius, Letter to Polycarp
Ign. Rom.	Ignatius, Letter to the Romans
Ign. Smyrn.	Ignatius, Letter to the Smyrnaeans
Ign. Trall.	Ignatius, Letter to the Trallians
Jos. Asen.	Joseph and Aseneth
Jub	Jubilees
Mart. Isa.	Martyrdom of Isaiah
Odes Sol.	Odes of Solomon
Pol. Phil.	Polycarp, Letter to the Philippians
Prot. Jas.	Protevangelium of James
Pss. Sol.	Psalms of Solomon
Shep. Herm.	The Shepherd (Hermas)
Sib. Or.	Sibylline Oracles
T. 12 Patr.	Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs

T. Benj.	Testament of Benjamin
T. Dan	Testament of Dan
T. Iss.	Testament of Issachar
T. Jos	Testament of Joseph
T. Jud.	Testament of Judah
T. Levi	Testament of Levi
T. Mos.	Testament of Moses
T. Naph.	Testament of Naphtali
T. Reuben	Testament of Reuben
T. Sim.	Testament of Simeon
T. Zeb.	Testament of Zebulun

Dead Sea Scrolls and Related Texts

Sites

Ḥev	Naḥal Ḥever
Ḥev/Se	Naḥal Ḥever documents formerly attributed to Seiyal
Mas	Masada
Mird	Khirbet Mird
Mur	Murabba'at
Q	Qumran

Caves

Different caves at each site are denoted with sequential numbers, e.g., 1Q, 2Q.

Texts

1QapGen ar	Genesis Apocryphon
1QH^{a}	Hodayot^{a} or Thanksgiving Hymns^{a}
1QIsa^{a}	Isaiah^{a}
1QIsa^{b}	Isaiah^{b}
1QM	Milḥamah or War Scroll
1QpHab	Pesher on Habakkuk
1QpMi	Pesher on Micah
1QS	Serekh ha-Yaḥad, or Rule of the Community (formerly Manual of Discipline)
4QapocrJosh^{a}	Apocryphon of Joshua^{a}, formerly Psalms of Joshua
4QBeat	Beatitudes
4QCommGen A	Commentary on Genesis A (formerly Patriarchal Blessings or Pesher Genesis)
4QDeut^{j}	Deuteronomy^{j}
4QDeut^{n}	Deuteronomy^{n}
4QDeut^{q}	Deuteronomy^{q}
4QFlor (MidrEschat^{b})	Florilegium, also Midrash on Eschatology^{a}
4QHos^{a}	Hosea^{a}
4QJer^{b}	Jeremiah^{b}
4QJosh^{a}	Joshua^{a}
4QJosh^{b}	Joshua^{b}
4QJubilees^{a}	Jubilees^{a}
4QMess ar	Aramaic "Messianic" text
4QMMT^{a}	Miqṣat Ma'aseh ha-Torah^{a}
4QNum^{b}	Numbers^{b}
4QpaleoExod	Copy of Exodus in paleo-Hebrew script
4QpaleoExod^{jm}	Copy of Exodus in paleo-Hebrew script^{jm}
4QpaleoExod^{m}	Copy of Exodus in paleo-Hebrew script^{m}
4QPhyl	Phylacteries
4QPhyl G	Phylacteries G
4QpIsa^{a}	Pesher on Isaiah^{a}
4QpIsa^{b}	Pesher on Isaiah^{b}
4QpIsa^{c}	Pesher on Isaiah^{c}
4QpMic	Pesher on Micah
4QpNah	Pesher on Nahum
4QpPs^{a}	Pesher on Psalms^{a}
4QPrNab	Prayer of Nabonidus

4QPsDan[a] ar	Pseudo-Daniel[a] Aramaic
4QPsDan[b] ar	Pseudo-Daniel[b] Aramaic
4QPsDan[c] ar	Pseudo-Daniel[c] Aramaic
4QPssJosh	Psalms of Joshua
4QRP[c]	Reworked Pentateuch[c]
4QSam[a]	Samuel[a]
4QShirShabb[a]	Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice[a]
4QTestim	Testimonia
4QtgLev	Targum of Leviticus
4QTLevi	Testament of Levi
5QDeut	Deuteronomy
5QpMal	Pesher on Malachi
8ḤevXiigr	Greek Scroll of the Minor Prophets from Naḥal Ḥever
11QMelch	Melchizedek
11QpaleoLev	Copy of Leviticus in paleo-Hebrew script
11QShirShabb	Songs of the Sabbath Sacrifice
11QT[a]	Temple Scroll[a]
11QT[b]	Temple Scroll[b]
11QtgJob	Targum of Job

Targumic Materials

Tg. Esth I, II	First or Second Targum of Esther
Frg. Tg.	Fragmentary Targum
Tg. Isa	Targum of Isaiah
Tg. Ket.	Targum of the Writings
Tg. Neb.	Targum of the Prophets
Tg. Neof.	Targum Neofiti I
Tg. Onq.	Targum Onquelos
T. Ps.-J.	Targum Pseudo-Jonathan
Sam. Tg.	Samaritan Targum
Yem. Tg.	Yemenite Targum
Tg. Yer. I	Targum Yerušalmi I
Tg. Yer. II	Targum Yerušalmi II

Orders and Tractates in Mishnaic and Related Literature

m.	Mishnah
b.	Babylonian Talmud
y.	Jerusalem Talmud
t.	Tosefta
ʿAbod. Zar.	ʿAboda Zara
ʿAbot	ʿAbot
ʿArak.	ʿArakin
B. Bat.	Baba Batra
Bek.	Bekorot
Ber.	Berakot
Beṣa	Beṣa (= Yom Ṭob)
Bik.	Bikkurim
B. Meṣ.	Baba Meṣiʿa
B. Qam.	Baba Qamma
Dem.	Demai
ʿErub.	ʿErubin
ʿEd.	ʿEduyyot
Git.	Giṭṭin
Ḥag.	Ḥagiga
Ḥal.	Ḥalla
Hor.	Horayot
Ḥul.	Ḥullin
Kelim	Kelim

Ker.	Keritot
Ketub.	Ketubot
Kil.	Kil'ayim
Ma'as.	Ma'aserot
Mak.	Makkot
Makš.	Makširin (= Mašqin)
Meg.	Megilla
Me'il.	Me'ila
Menaḥ.	Menaḥot
Mid.	Middot
Miqw.	*Miqwa'*ot
Mo'ed	Mo'ed
Mo'ed Qaṭ.	Mo'ed Qaṭan
Ma'as. Š.	Ma'aser Šeni
Našim	Našim
Nazir	Nazir
Ned.	Nedarim
Neg.	Nega'im
Nez.	Neziqin
Nid.	Niddah
Ohol.	Oholot
'Or.	'Orla
Para	Para
*Pe'*a	Pe'a
Pesaḥ.	Pesaḥim
Qinnim	Qinnim
Qidd.	Qiddušin
Qod.	Qodašin
Roš Haš.	Roš Haššana
Sanh.	Sanhedrin
Šabb.	Šabbat
Šeb.	Šebi'it
Šebu.	Šebu'ot
Šeqal.	Šeqalim
Soṭa	Soṭa
Sukk.	Sukka
Ta'an.	Ta'anit
Tamid	Tamid
Tem.	Temura
Ter.	Terumot
Ṭohar.	Ṭoharot
T. Yom	Ṭebul Yom
'Uq.	'Uqṣin
Yad.	Yadayim
Yebam.	Yebamot
Yoma	Yoma (= Kippurim)
Zabim	Zabim
Zebaḥ.	Zebaḥim
Zer.	Zera'im

Additional Rabbinic Works

'Abot R. Nat.	'Abot de Rabbi Nathan
'Ag. Ber.	'Aggadat Berešit
Bab.	Babylonian
Der. Er. Rab.	Derek Ereṣ Rabba
Der Er Zuṭ.	Derek Ereṣ Zuṭa
Gem.	Gemara
Mek.	Mekilta
MHG Shem.	Midrash HaGadol Shemot
Midr.	Midraš (cited with abbreviation for biblical book)

Pal.	Palestinian
Pesiq. R.	Pesiqta Rabbati
Pesiq. Rab Kah.	Pesiqta de Rab Kahana
Pirqe R. El.	Pirqe Rabbi Eliezer
Rab.	Rabbah (following abbreviation for biblical book)
Ṣem.	Ṣemaḥot
Sipra	Sipra
Sipre	Sipre
Sop.	Soperim
S. ʿOlam Rab.	Seder ʿOlam Rabbah
Tan. Shem.	Tanchuma Shemot
Talm.	Talmud
Yal.	Yalquṭ

Nag Hammadi Tractates

Acts Pet. 12 Apost	Acts of Peter and the Twelve Apostles
Allogenes	Allogenes
Ap. Jas.	Apocryphon of James
Ap. John	Apocryphon of John
Apoc. Adam	Apocalypse of Adam
1 Apoc. Jas.	First Apocalypse of James
2. Apoc. Jas.	Second Apocalypse of James
Apoc. Paul	Apocalypse of Paul
Apoc. Pet.	Apocalypse of Peter
Asclepius	Asclepius 21–29
Auth. Teach.	Authoritative Teaching
Dial. Sav.	Dialogue of the Savior
Disc. 8–9	Discourse on the Eighth and Ninth
Ep. Pet. Phil.	Letter of Peter to Philip
Eugnostos	Eugnostos the Blessed
Exeg. Soul	Exegesis on the Soul
Gos. Eg.	Gospel of the Egyptians
Gos. Mary	Gospel of Mary
Gos. Phil.	Gospel of Philip
Gos. Thom.	Gospel of Thomas
Gos. Truth	Gospel of Truth
Great Pow.	Concept of Our Great Power
Hyp. Arch.	Hypostasis of the Archons
Hypsiph.	Hypsiphrone
Interp. Know.	Interpretation of Knowledge
Marsanes	Marsanes
Melch.	Melchizedek
Norea	Thought of Norea
On Bap. A	On Baptism A
On Bap. B	On Baptism B
On Bap. C	On Baptism C
On Euch. A	On the Eucharist A
On Euch. B	On the Eucharist B
Orig. World	On the Origin of the World
Paraph. Shem	Paraphrase of Shem
Pr. Paul	Prayer of the Apostle Paul
Pr. Thanks.	Prayer of Thanksgiving
Sent. Sextus	Sentences of Sextus
Soph. Jes. Chr.	Sophia of Jesus Christ
Steles Seth	Three Steles of Seth
Teach. Silv.	Teachings of Silvanus
Testim. Truth	Testimony of Truth
Thom. Cont.	Book of Thomas the Contender
Thund.	Thunder, Perfect Mind
Treat. Res.	Treatise on Resurrection

Treat. Seth	Second Treatise of the Great Seth
Tri. Trac.	Tripartite Tractate
Trim. Prot.	Trimorphic Protennoia
Val. Exp.	A Valentinian Exposition
Zost.	Zostrianos

Institutions and Organizations

AAR	American Academy of Religion
ASOR	American Schools of Oriental Research
ATLA	American Theologicial Library Association
BFBS	British Foreign Bible Society
CBA	Catholic Biblical Association of America
CMS	Church Missionary Society
HUC	Hebrew Union College
IOSCS	International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies
SBL	Society of Biblical Literature
SNTS	Society for New Testament Studies
SUNY	State University of New York
UBS	United Bible Society

Periodicals, Reference Works, and Serials

AA	Archäologischer Anzeiger
AAAbo	Acta Academiae Aboensis
AAAbo.H	Acta Academiae Aboensis. Ser. A. Humaniora
AAR.AS	AAR Academy Series
AAR.DS	AAR Dissertation Series
AAR.SR	AAR Studies in Religion
AARSBLA	American Academy of Religion/Society of Biblical Literature Abstracts
AARSBLVR	AAR/SBL Ventures in Religion
AAS	Acta apostolicae sedis
AASF	Annales Academiae Scientiarum Fennicae
AASOR	Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research
AAWB	Abhandlungen der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin
AAWG.PH	Abhandlungen der K. Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen. Philologisch-historische Klasse
AAWLM.G	Abhandlungen der Geistes- und Sozialwissenschaftlichen Klasse, Akademie des Wissenschaft und der Literatur
AB	Anchor Bible
ABBL	J. G. Eichhorn (ed.), Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Litteratur (10 vols., 1787–1801)
ABD	D. N. Freedman (ed.), Anchor Bible Dictionary (6 vols., 1992)
ABenR	American Benedictine Review
ABG	Archiv für Begriffsgeschichte
ABMA	Auctores Britannici medii aevi
ABQ	American Baptist Quarterly
ABR	Australian Biblical Review
ABRL	Anchor Bible Reference Library
ABRL	Die Arbeiterbewegung in den Rheinlanden
AbrN	Abr-Nahrain
ACCS.NT	Ancient Christian Commentary on Scripture. New Testament
ACEBT	Amsterdamse cahiers voor exegese en bijbelse theologie
ACJD	Abhandlungen zum christlich-jüdischen Dialog
ACNT	Augsburg Commentary on the New Testament
AcOr	Acta orientalia
ACW	Ancient Christian Writers
ADAJ	Annual of the Department of Antiquities of Jordan
ADB	Allgemeine deutsche Biographie
ADPV	Abhandlungen des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins
Aeg	Aegyptus

AES	Archives européennes de sociologie
AEWK	J. S. Ersch et al. (eds.), Allgemeine Encyklopädie der Wissenschaften und Künste (167 vols., 1818–1889)
AF	R. M. Grant (ed.), Apostolic Fathers
AFH	Archivum Franciscanum historicum
AfO	Archiv fur Orientforschung
AFP	Archivum Fratrum Praedicatorum
AGJU	Arbeiten zur Geschichte des antiken Judentums und des Urchristentums
AGL	C. G. Jöcher (ed.), Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexicon (11 vols., 1750–1819, 1897)
AGLB	Aus der Geschichte der lateinischen Bibel
AGPh	Archiv für Geschichte der Philosophie (und Soziologie)
AGTL	Arbeiten zur Geschichte und Theologie des Luthertums
AGWG	Abhandlungen der (K.) Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen
AGWG.PH	Abhandlungen der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften zu Göttingen. Philologisch-historische Klasse
AHAW.PH	Abhandlungen der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philologisch-historische Klasse
AHDLMA	Archives d'histoire doctrinale et littéraire du moyen âge
AHW	W. von Soden, Akkadisches Handworterbuch
AION	Annali dell'Istituto Orientale di Napoli
AISIG	Annali dell'Istituto Storico Italo-Germanico in Trento
AJA	American Journal of Archaeology
AJAS	American Journal of Arabic Studies
AJBA	Australian Journal of Biblical Archaeology
AJBI	Annual of the Japanese Biblical Institute
AJeA	American Jewish Archives
AJP	American Journal of Philology
AJS	American Journal of Sociology
AJSL	American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literature
AJSR	Association for Jewish Studies Review
AJT	American Journal of Theology
AJTh	Asia Journal of Theology
AKAWB	Abhandlungen der königlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin
AKG	Arbeiten zur Kirchengeschichte. Berlin
AKG	Archiv für Kulturgeschichte
AKM	Abhandlungen für die Kunde des Morgenlandes
AKML	Abhandlungen zur Kunst-, Musik- und Literaturwissenschaft
AKuG	Archiv für Kulturgeschichte
AKZ	Allgemeine Kirchenzeitung
AJut	Acta Jutlandica
AJut.T	Acta Jutlandica: Teologisk serie
ALBO	Analecta lovaniensia biblica et orientalia
ALGHJ	Arbeiten zur Literatur und Geschichte des hellenistischen Judentums
ALUOS	Annual of Leeds University Oriental Society
AnBib	Analecta biblica
AnBoll	Analecta Bollandiana
ANCL	Ante-Nicene Christian Library
ANEP	J. B. Pritchard (ed.), Ancient Near East in Pictures
ANESTP	J. B. Pritchard (ed.), Ancient Near East Supplementary Texts and Pictures
ANET	J. B. Pritchard (ed.), Ancient Near Eastern Texts
ANETS	Ancient Near Eastern Texts and Studies
ANF	The Ante-Nicene Fathers
AnGr	Analecta Gregoriana
AnOr	Analecta orientalia
ANQ	Andover Newton Quarterly
ANRW	Aufstieg und Niedergang der römischen Welt
AnSt	Anatolian Studies
ANTC	Abingdon New Testament Commentary
ANTF	Arbeiten zur neutestamentlichen Textforchung
ANTJ	Arbeiten zum Neuen Testament und Judentum
Anton	Antonianum
ANTZ	Arbeiten zur neutestamentlichen Theologie und Zeitgeschichte

AO	Aula orientalis
AOAT	Alter Orient und Altes Testament
AOS	American Oriental Series
AOSTS	American Oriental Society Translation Series
AOT	H. F. D. Sparks (ed.), The Apocryphal OT (1984)
AOx	Athenae Oxonienses
AP	American Presbyterian
APAT	E. Kautzsch (ed.), Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (2 vols., 1900)
APG	Abhandlungen zur Philosophie und ihrer Geschichte. Hg.v. B. Erdmann
APOT	R. H. Charles (ed.), Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT (2 vols., 1913)
AR	D. D. Luckenbill (ed.), Ancient Records of Assyria and Babylonia (2 vols., 1926–27)
ARE	J. H. Breasted (ed.), Ancient Records of Egypt (5 vols., 1906–7)
ARG	Archiv fur Reformationsgeschichte
ARM	Archives royales de Mari
ArOr	Archiv orientální
ARSHLL	Acta Regiae Societatis Humaniorum Litterarum Ludensis
ARW	Archiv fur Religionswissenschaft
ARWAW	Abhandlungen der Rheinisch-Westfälischen Akademie der Wissenschaften
ASNU	Acta seminarii neotestamentici upsaliensis
ASORSVS	American Schools of Oriental Research Special Volume Series
ASS	Acta sanctae sedis
ASSR	Archives des sciences sociales des religions
AStE	Annuario di studi ebraici
ASTI	Annual of the Swedish Theological Institute
ASV	American Standard Version
AT	Arbeiten zur Theologie
ATA	Alttestamentliche Abhandlungen
ATANT	Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments
ATAT	Altorientalische Texte zum Alten Testament
ATB	Auserlesene Theologische Bibliothek
ATD	Das Alte Testament Deutsch
ATDan	Acta theologica danica
ATLA.MS	American Theological Library Association Monograph Series
ATR	Anglican Theological Review
ATSAT	Arbeiten zu Text und Sprache im Alten Testament
Aug	Augustinianum
AusBR	Australian Biblical Review
AUSS	Andrews University Seminary Studies
AUU	Acta Universitatis Upsaliensis
AV	Authorized Version
AWEAT	Archiv für wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testaments
AWR	Aus der Welt der Religion
BA	Biblical Archaeologist
BAAR	Bulletin of the American Academy of Religion
BAC	Biblioteca de autores cristianos
BAG	Beiträge zur alten Geschichte
BAG(D)	W. Bauer, W. F. Arndt, F. W. Gingerich (2nd ed, and F. W. Danker), Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament
BAH	Bibliothéque archéologique et historique
BAM	J. LeClerc (ed.), Bibliothèque ancienne et moderne (29 vols., 1714–30)
BAR	Biblical Archaeologist Reader
BARev	Biblical Archaeology Review
BASOR	Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research
BASP	Bulletin of the American Society of Papyrologists
BAT	Botschaft des Alten Testaments
BB	Biographia Britannica (6 vols., 1747–63; 2nd ed., 5 vols., 1778–93)
BBB	Bonner biblische Beiträge
BBET	Beiträge zur biblischen Exegese und Theologie
BBGW	Basler Beiträge zur Geschichtswissenschaft

BBKL	Biographisch-bibliographisches Kirchenlexikon
BBLAK	Beiträge zur biblischen Landes- und Altertumskunde
BC	J. LeClerc (ed.), Bibliothèque choisie (28 vols., 1703–13)
BC	Biblischer Commentar über das Alte Testament
BCNH.T	Bibliothèque copte de Nag Hammadi. Section textes
BCPE	Bulletin du Centre Protestant d'Études
BCSR	Bulletin of the Council on the Study of Religion
BDB	F. Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs, Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament
BDBR	R. L. Greaves and R. Zaller (eds.), Biographical Dictionary of British Radicals in the Seventeenth Century (3 vols., 1982–84)
BDF	F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and R. W. Funk, A Greek Grammar of the NT
BDR	F. Blass, A. Debrunner, and F. Rehkopf, Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch
Bdt	Biliothèque de théologie
BEATAJ	Beiträge zur Erforschung des Alten Testaments und des antiken Judentum
BEHE	Biliothèque de l'École des Hautes Études
BeO	Bibbia e oriente
BER	Biblisch-exegetisches Repertorium
BETL	Bibliotheca ephemeridum theologicarum lovaniensium
BEvT	Beiträge zur evangelischen Theologie
BFCT	Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie
BFT	Biblical Foundations in Theology
BG	W. Schneemelcher at al. (eds.), Bonner Gelehrte. Beiträge zur Geschichte der Wissenschaften in Bonn. Evangelische Theologie (1968–)
BGBE	Beiträge zur Geschichte der biblischen Exegese
BGBH	Beiträge zur Geschichte der biblischen Hermeneutik
BGLRK	Beiträge zur Geschichte und Lehre der Reformierten Kirche
BGPTM	Beiträge zur Geschichte der Philosophie (und Theologie) des Mittelalters
BHEAT	Bulletin d'histoire et d' exegese de l'Ancien Testament
BHH	B. Reicke and L. Rost (eds.), Biblisch-Historisches Handworterbuch (4 vols., 1962–79)
BHK	R. Kittel, Biblia hebraica
BHPT	Bibliotheca Historico-Philologico-Theologica
BHR	Bibliothèque d'humanisme et renaissance
BHRTD	Bibliothèque d'humanisme et renaissance. Travaux et Documents
BHS	Biblia hebraica stuttgartensia
BHT	Beiträge zur historischen Theologie
BHWJ	Bericht der Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums
BI	J. J. Megivern (ed.), Bible Interpretation (Official Catholic Teachings, 1978)
Bib	Biblica
BibB	Biblische Beiträge
BibInt	Biblical Interpretation
BibLeb	Bibel und Leben
BibOr	Biblica et orientalia
BibRev	Bible Review
BibS	Biblische Studien
BibS(F)	Biblische Studien (Freiburg)
BibS(N)	Biblische Studien (Neukirchen)
BIES	Bulletin of the Israel Exploration Society (= Yediot)
BIFAO	Bulletin de l'institut français d'archéologie orientale
BIOSCS	Bulletin of the International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies
BIRS	Bibliographies and Indexes in Religious Studies
BIS	Biblical Interpretation Series
BiSe	The Biblical Seminar
BiTr	The Bible Translator
BJDN	Biographisches Jahrbuch und deutscher Nekrolog
BJPES	Bulletin of the Jewish Palestine Exploration Society
BJRL	Bulletin of the John Rylands University Library of Manchester
BJS	Brown Judaic Studies
BJuS	Biblical and Judaic Studies
BK	Bibel und Kirche

BKAT	Biblischer Kommentar: Altes Testament
BLE	Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique
BLit	Bibel und Liturgie
BN	Biblische Notizen
BNB	British National Bibliography
BNGKT	Beiträge zur neueren Geschichte der katholischen Theologie
BNTC	Black's New Testament Commentaries
BO	Bibliotheca orientalis
BOT	Boeken van het Oude Testament
BP	Bibliothéque de philosophie
BPCI	Biblical Perspectives on Current Issues
BPhC	Bibliothèque de philosophie contemporaine
BQ	Baptist Quarterly
BR	Biblical Research
BRL	Biblisches Reallexikon
BRQO	Biblical Repository and Quarterly Observer
BSac	Bibliotheca Sacra
BSLR	Beacon Series in Liberal Religion
BSMS	Bulletin of the Society for Mesopotamian Studies
BSNA	Biblical Scholarship in North America
BSO(A)S	Bulletin of the School of Oriental (and African) Studies
BT	Babylonian Talmud
BTA	Bible Through the Ages Series
BTAVO	Beihefte zum Tübinger Atlas des Vorderen Orients
BTB	Biblical Theology Bulletin
BThB	Bibliotek Theologie der Befreiung
BTS	Bible et terre sainte
BTT	Bible de tous les temps
BTZ	Berliner Theologische Zeitschrift
BU	Biblische Untersuchungen
BU	Biographie universelle
BUH	Bibliotheque universelle et historique
BurH	Buried History
BVC	Bible et vie chrétienne
BVSGW	Berichte über die Verhandlungen der Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften
BVSGW.PH	Berichte über die Verhandlungen der Sächsischen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften. Philologisch-historische Klasse
BWANT	Beiträge zur Wissenschaft vom Alten (und Neuen) Testament
BWN	Biografisch woordenboek van Nederland
BWPGN	Biografisch woordenboek van protestantsche godgeleerden in Nederland
BZ	Biblische Zeitschrift
BZAW	Beihefte zur ZAW
BZNW	Beihefte zur ZNW
BZRGG	Beihefte zur ZRGG
BZSF	Biblische Zeit- und Streitfragen
CAD	The Assyrian Dictionary of the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago
CAH	Cambridge Ancient History
CahThéol	Cahiers Théologiques
CAR	Cahiers de l'actualité religieuse
CAT	Commentaire de l'Ancien Testament
CATTA	V. Ferm (ed.), Contemporary American Theology: Theological Autobiographies (2 vols., 1932–33)
CB	Clarendon Bible
CB	Cultura biblica
CBA	Cronaca delle belle arti
CBC	Cambridge Bible Commentary
CBE	Catholic Biblical Encyclopedia
CBET	Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology
CBQ	Catholic Biblical Quarterly
CBQMS	Catholic Biblical Quarterly—Monograph Series
CBSC	Cambridge Bible for School and Colleges

CBTEL	J. McClintock and J. Strong (eds.), Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature (12 vols., 1867–87)
CBW	Cities of the Biblical World
CC	Christian Century
CC	Corpus Christianorum
CCARJ	Central Conference of American Rabbis. Journal
CCath	Corpus Catholicorum
CCCM	Corpus Christianorum, Continuatio Mediaevalis
CCS	The Communicator's Commentary Series
CCSL	Corpus Christianorum. Series Latina
CD	Das christliche Deutschland
CE	P. G. Bietenholz and T. B. Deutscher (eds.), Contemporaries of Erasmus: A Biographical Register of the Renaissance and Reformation (3 vols., 1985–87)
CeB	The Century Bible
CF	Cogitatio fidei
CFr	Collectanea Friburgensia
CG	Coptic Gnostic Library
CGPNT	Catenae Graecorum Patrum in Novum Testamentum
CGTC	Cambridge Greek Testament Commentaries
CH	Cahiers d'histoire
CHB	P. R. Ackroyd et al. (eds.), Cambridge History of the Bible (3 vols., 1963–70)
ChH	Church History
CHR	Catholic Historical Review
ChW	Christliche Welt
CHZFBG	Calwer hefte zur Forderung biblischen Glaubens und christlichen Lebens
CIB	Centre: Informatique et Bible
CID	Comenius-Institut-Dokumentation
CIG	Corpus inscriptionum graecarum
CII	Corpus inscriptionum iudaicarum
CIL	Corpus inscriptionum latinarum
CIS	Corpus inscriptionum semiticarum
CJT	Canadian Journal of Theology
CJud	Conservative Judaism
CMCT	P. E. Hughes (ed.), Creative Minds in Contemporary Theology (1973^2)
CNT	Commentaire du Nouveau Testament
COHP	Contributions to Oriental History and Philology of the Columbia University
ConB	Coniectanea biblica
ConBNT	Coniectanea biblica, New Testament
ConBOT	Coniectanea biblica, Old Testament
Conc(D)	Concilium. Ensiedeln
ConJ	Concordia Journal
ConNT	Coniectanea neotestamentica
COr	Cahiers d'Orientalisme
COT	Commentaar op het Oude Testament
CP	Classical Philology
CPT	Cambridge Patristic Texts
CQ	Church Quarterly
CQR	Church Quarterly Review
CQS	Catholic and Quaker Studies
CR	Corpus reformatorum
CR	Critical Review of Books in Religion
CRAIBL	Comptes rendus de l'Académie des inscriptions et belles-lettres
CR:BS	Currents in Research: Biblical Studies
CRB	Cahiers de la Revue biblique
CRHPR	Cahiers de la Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
CRINT	Compendia rerum iudaicarum ad novum testamentum
CrSoc	Cristianismo y sociedad
CRSS	Classics in Religious Studies (series)
CS	J. G. Herder, Christliche Schriften (4 vols., 1794–98)
CSCO	Corpus scriptorum christianorum orientalium

CSCT	Columbia Studies in the Classical Tradition
CSEL	Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum
CSRCT	Cambridge Studies in Religion and Criticial Thought
CSS	Cursus scripturae sacrae
CTA	A. Herdner, Corpus des tablettes en cunéiformes alphabétiques
CTJ	Calvin Theological Journal
CTM	Concordia Theological Monthly
CTom	Ciencia Tomista
CTP	Cadernos de teologia e pastoral
CTS	Contemporary Theology Series
CurTM	Currents in Theology and Mission
CW	Catholic World
CWS	Classics of Western Spirituality
DAB	Dictionary of American Biography
DACL	Dictionnaire d'archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie
DARB	H. W. Bowden, Dictionary of American Religious Biography (1993^2)
DATDJ	R. Smend, Deutsche Alttestamentler in drei Jahrhunderten (1989)
DB	F. Vigouroux (ed.), Dictionnaire de la Bible (5 vols., 1891–1912)
DBAT	Dielheimer Blätter zum Alten Testament
DBF	Dictionnaire de biographie française
DB(H)	J. Hastings (ed.), Dictionary of the Bible (rev. F. C. Grant and H. H. Rowley, 1963)
DBJ	Deutsches biographisches Jahrbuch
DBSup	Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément
DCB	W. Smith and H. Wace (eds.), Dictionary of Christian Biography (4 vols., 1877–87)
DCH	Dictionary of Classical Hebrew
DDD	K. van der Torn et al. (eds), Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible (1995)
DHGE	Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques
DISO	C.-F. Jean and J. Hoftijzer, Dictionnaire des inscriptions sémitiques de l'ouest (1965)
DJD	Discoveries in the Judaean Desert
DMA	J. R. Strayer (ed.), Dictionary of the Middle Ages (13 vols., 1982–89)
DMMRS	Duke Monographs in Medieval and Renaissance Studies
DMOA	Documenta et monumenta orientis antiqui
DNB	Dictionary of National Biography
DOTT	D.W. Thomas (ed.), Documents from Old Testament Times (1958)
DRu	Deutsche Rundschau
DS	Denzinger-Schönmetzer, Enchiridion symbolorum
DS	Dictionaire de Spiritualité
DSB	Daily Study Bible
DSD	Dead Sea Discoveries
DTC	A. Vacant et al. (eds.), Dictionnaire de théologie catholique
DtPfrBl	Deutsches Pfarrerblatt (15 vols., 1903–50)
DTT	Dansk teologisk tidsskrift
DUJ	Durham University Journal
DunRev	Dunwoodie Review
EAC	Encyclopedia of the Early Church
EAC	Études d'archéologie classique
EAJT	East Asia Journel of Theology
EBB	Elenchus bibliographicus biblicus
Ebib	Études bibliques
ECGNT	J. R. Kohlenberger III et al., Exhaustive Concordance to the Greek New Testament (1995
EDB	L.F. Hartman (ed.), Encyclopedic Dictionary of the Bible
EdF	Erträge der Forschung
EEC	E. Ferguson (ed.), Encyclopedia of Early Christianity (1990)
EET	Einführung in die evangelische Theologie
EETS	Early English Text Society
EF	Enciclopedia filosofica
EGT	Expositor's Greek Testament
EgTh	Église et theologie. Ottawa
EHAT	Exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament
EHPhR	Études d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
EHS	Europäische Hochschulschriften
EHS.T	Europäische Hochschulschriften. Reihe 23. Theologie

EiT	Explorations in Theology
EJ	J. Klatzkin (ed.), Encyclopaedia Judaica (10 vols., 1928–34)
EKKNT	Evangelisch-katholischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
EKL	H. Brunotte and O. Weber (eds.), Evangelisches Kirchenlexikon (4 vols., 1956–62)
EM	Emerita. Madrid
EMMÖ	Erlanger Monographien aus Mission und Ökumene
EncBib	T. K. Cheyne and J. S. Black (eds.), Encyclopaedia Biblica (4 vols., 1899–1903)
EncBrit	Encyclopedia Britannica
EnchBib	Enchiridion biblicum
EncJud	C. Roth (ed.), Encyclopaedia Judaica (16 vols., 1971–72)
ENCPI	Edizione nazionale dei classici del pensiero italiano
EncRel	M. Eliade (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Religion (16 vols., 1987)
EPH	Études de philologie et d'histoire
EPhM	Études de philosophie médiévale
EpRe	Epworth Review
EPRO	Études préliminaires aux religions orientales dans l'empire Romain
EQ	Evangelical Quarterly
ERE	J. Hastings (ed.), Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics (13 vols., 1908–26)
ErIsr	Eretz-Israel: Archaeological, Historical, and Geographical Studies
ErJb	Eranos Jahrbuch
EstBib	Estudios bíblicos
EsTe	Estudos teologicos
ESW	Ecumenical Studies in Worship
ETH	Études de théologie historique
ETHS	Études de théologie et histoire de la spiritualité
ETL	Ephemerides theologicae lovanienses
ETR	Études théologiques et religieuses
ETS	Erfurter theologische Studien
EvErz	Der evangelische Erzieher
EvK	Evangelische Kommentare
EvTh	Evangelische Theologie
EWNT	H. Balz and G. Schneider (eds.), Exegetisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (3 vols., 1980–83)
ExpB	Expositor's Bible
ExpTim	Expository Times
EzAT	Erläuterungen zum Alten Testament
FAB	Für Arbeit und Besinnung
FAT	Forschungen zum Alten Testament
FB	Forschung zur Bibel
FBBS	Facet Books, Biblical Series
FC	Fathers of the Church
FFNT	Foundations and Facets: New Testament
FJCD	Forschungen zum jüdisch-christlichen Dialog
FKDG	Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Dogmengeschichte
FKGG	Forschungen zur Kirchen- und Geistesgeschichte
FMG	Forschungen zur mittelalterlichen Geschichte
FOTC	T. K. Cheyne, Founders of Old Testament Criticism: Biographical, Descriptive, and Critical Studies (1893)
FOTL	Forms of the Old Testament Literature
FRLANT	Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments
FSThR	Forschungen zur systematischen Theologie und Religionsphilosophie
FThL	Forum Theologiae Linguisti
FThSt	Freiburger Theologische Studien
FuF	Forschungen und Fortschritte
FzB	Forschung zur Bibel
GAT	Grundrisse zum Alten Testament
GBS	Guides to Biblical Scholarship
GCP	Graecitas Christianorum Primaeva
GCS	Griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller
GCT	Gender, Culture, Theory
GDEL	Grand Dictionnaire Encyclopedique Larousse
GGA	Göttingische gelehrte Anzeige

GHKEAT	H.-J. Kraus, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments (1988[4])
GKB	Gesenius-Kautzsch-Bergsträsser, Hebräische Grammatik
GKC	Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar (ed. E. Kautzsch, tr. A. E. Cowley)
GNB	Good News Bible (TEV)
GNS	Good News Studies
GNT	Grundrisse zum Neuen Testament
GOF.S	Göttinger Orientforschung. Reihe 1. Syriaca
GOTR	Greek Orthodox Theological Review
GRBS	Greek, Roman, and Byzantine Studies
Greg	Gregorianum
GRLH	Garland Reference Library of the Humanities
GS	Germanische Studien
GSWW	G. W. Meyer, Geschichte der Schrifterklärung seit der Wiederherstellung der Wissenschaften (5 vols., 1802–9)
GT.S	Gesellschaft und Theologie. Systematische Beiträge
GTA	Göttinger theologische Arbeiten
GTS	Gettysburg Theological Studies
GTW	Grundriss der theologischen Wissenschaft
HAR	Hebrew Annual Review
HB	Historische Bibliothek
HBC	J. L. Mays et al. (eds.), Harper's Bible Commentary (1988)
HBD	P. J. Achtemeier et al. (eds.), Harper's Bible Dictionary
HBI	Heritage of Biblical Israel
HBK	Herders Bibelkommentar
HB/OT	M. Saebø (ed.), Hebrew Bible, Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation (1996–)
HBT	Horizons in Biblical Theology
HCNT	Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament
HCT	History of Christian Theology
HDB	J. Hastings (ed.), Dictionary of the Bible (5 vols., 1898–1904)
HDivB	Harvard Divinity Bulletin
HDR	Harvard Dissertations in Religion
Her	Hermathena
HeyJ	Heythrop Journal
HHMBI	D. K. McKim (ed.), Historical Handbook of Major Biblical Interpreters (1998)
HHS	Harvard Historical Studies
HibJ	Hibbert Journal
HJ	Historisches Jahrbuch
HJPAJC	E. Schürer, History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ (3 vols., rev. G. Vermes et al., 1973–87)
HJTM	Harvard Judaic Texts and Monographs
HKAT	Handkommentar zum Alten Testament
HKNT	Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament
HMPEC	Historical Magazine of the Protestant Episcopal Church
HNT	Handbuch zum Neuen Testament
HNTC	Harper's New Testament Commentaries
HNTR	History of New Testament Research
HO	Handbuch der Orientalistik
HR	History of Religions
HRWG	Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe
HS	Hebrew Studies
HS	Historische Studien
HSAT	Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments (ed. H. Herkenne and F. Feldmann)
HSAT(K)	Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments (ed. E. Kautzsch)
HSM	Harvard Semitic Monographs
HSS	Harvard Semitic Studies
HTC	Herder's Theological Commentary on the New Testament
HThK	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
HTIBS	Historic Texts and Interpreters in Biblical Scholarship
HTKNT	Herders theologischer Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
HTR	Harvard Theological Review

HTS	Harvard Theological Studies
HUCA	Hebrew Union College Annual
HUCM	Monographs of the Hebrew Union College
HUT	Hermeneutische Untersuchungen zur Theologie
HVLÅ	K. Humanistiska vetenskapssamfundete i Lund Åraberättelse
HWP	Historisches Wörterbuch der Philosophie
HZ	Historische Zeitschrift
IAHD	International Archives of the History of Ideas
IB	Interpreter's Bible
IBC	Interpretation: A Bible Commentary for Teaching and Preaching
IBS	Irish Biblical Studies
IBT	Interpreting Biblical Texts
ICC	International Critical Commentary
IDB	G. A. Buttrick (ed.), Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible (4 vols., 1962)
IDBSup	K. Crim (ed.), Interpreter's Dictionary of the Bible: Supplementary Volume (1976)
IEJ	Israel Exploration Journal
IER	Irish Ecclesiastical Record
IHE	Indice histórico español
IHE	Introduction à l'histoire de l'exégèse
IMW	Internationale Monatsschrift für Wissenschaft, Kunst, und Technik
InnTS	Innsbrucker theologische Studien
Int	Interpretation
IOS	Israel Oriental Studies
IPAT	Introduction aux pseudépigraphes grecs d'Ancien Testament
IRM	International Review of Missions
IRT	Issues in Religion and Theology
ISBE	G. W. Bromiley et al. (eds.), International Standard Bible Encyclopedia (4 vols., 1979–88)
ISBL	Indiana Studies in Biblical Literature
ITC	International Theological Commentary
IThS	Innsbrucker theologische Studien
ITQ	Irish Theological Quarterly
IUO	Istituto Universitario Orientale
JA	Journal asiatique
JAAR	Journal of the American Academy of Religion
JAC	Jahrbuch für Antike und Christentum
JAF	Journal of American Folklore
JAL	Jewish Apocryphal Literature
JANES	Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society
JANESCU	Journal of the Ancient Near Eastern Society of Columbia University
JAOS	Journal of the American Oriental Society
JAS	Journal of Asian Studies
JB	A. Jones (ed.), Jerusalem Bible
JBC	R. E. Brown, et al. (eds.), The Jerome Biblical Commentary
JBL	Journal of Biblical Literature
JBLMS	Journal of Biblical Literature Monograph Series
JBR	Journal of Bible and Religion
JBS	Jerusalem Biblical Studies
JBS	Journal of British Studies
JBTh	Jahrbuch für biblische Theologie
JBW	Jahrbücher der biblischen Wissenschaft
JCBRF	The Journal of the Christian Brethren Research Fellowship
JC	Jus canonicum
JCS	Journal of Cuneiform Studies
JDS	Judean Desert Series
JDTh	Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie
JE	I. Singer et al. (eds.), The Jewish Encyclopedia (12 vols., 1901–6)
JEA	Journal of Egyptian Archaeology
JEAT	Jahrbuch. Evangelische Akademie Tutzingen
JEH	Journal of Ecclesiastical History
JEOL	Jaarbericht... ex oriente lux
JES	Journal of Ecumenical Studies

JETS	Journal of the Evangelical Theological Society
JFHS	Journal of the Friends' Historical Society
JFSR	Journal of Feminist Studies in Religion
JGNKG	Jahrbuch der Gesellschaft für Niedersächsische Kirchengeschichte
JGPrÖ	Jahrbuch für die Geschichte des Protestantismus in Österreich
JHI	Journal of the History of Ideas
JHMTh	Journal of the History of Modern Theology
JHNES	Johns Hopkins Near Eastern Studies
JHS	Journal of Hellenic Studies
JHSCW	Journal of the Historical Society of the Church in Wales
JIBS	Journal of Indian and Buddhist Studies
JIPh	Journal of Indian Philosophy
JITC	The Journal of the Interdenominational Theological Center
JJS	Journal of Jewish Studies
JLB	Jüdisches Literaturblatt
JLR	Journal of Law and Religion
JLT	Journal of Literature and Theology
JMES	Journal of Middle Eastern Studies
JMRS	Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies
JMS	Journal of Mithraic Studies
JNES	Journal of Near Eastern Studies
JNSL	Journal of Northwest Semitic Languages
JP	Journal of Philology
JPH	Journal of Presbyterian History
JPh	Journal of Philosophy
JPOS	Journal of Palestine Oriental Society
JPSTC	Jewish Publication Society—The JPS Torah Commentary
JPSV	Jewish Publication Society Version
JPT	Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie
JQR	Jewish Quarterly Review
JQRMS	Jewish Quarterly Review Monograph Series
JQRS	Jewish Quarterly Review Supplements
JR	Journal of Religion
JRAS	Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society
JRE	Journal of Religious Ethics
JRelS	Journal of Religious Studies
JRH	Journal of Religious History
JrnlRelAfr	Journal of Religion in Africa
JRS	Journal of Roman Studies
JRT	Journal of Religious Thought
JSHRZ	W. G. Kümmel at al. (eds.), Jüdische Schriften aus hellenistisch-römischer Zeit (1973–)
JSJ	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic, and Roman Period
JSJSup	Journal for the Study of Judaism in the Persian, Hellenistic and Roman Period, Supplement
JSJT	Jerusalem Studies in Jewish Thought
JSL	Journal of Sacred Literature
JSNT	Journal for the Study of the New Testament
JSNTSup	Journal for the Study of the New Testament. Supplement Series
JSOT	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament
JSOTSup	Journal for the Study of the Old Testament. Supplement Series
JSP	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha
JSPSup	Journal for the Study of the Pseudepigrapha. Supplement Series
JSS	Journal of Semitic Studies
JSSR	Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion
JSSSup	Journal of Semitic Studies. Supplement Series
JTC	Journal for Theology and the Church
JTL	Journal für theologische Literatur
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies
JTSA	Journal of Theology for Southern Africa
JudUm	Judentum und Umwelt

JuSS	Judaica Studies Series
JWCI	Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes
JZWL	Jüdische Zeitschrift für Wissenschaft und Leben
KantSt.E	Kantian Studies
KAO	Im Kampf um den Alten Orient
KAT	Kommentar zum Alten Testament
KB	L. Koehler and W. Baumgartner, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti libros
KBANT	Kommentare und Beiträge zum Alten und Neuen Testament
KD	Kerygma und Dogma
KEH	Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament
KEHA	Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zu des Apokryphen des Alten Testaments
KEK	Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar über das Neue Testament (Meyer-Kommentar)
KHC	Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum Alten Testament
KJV	King James Version
KK	Kurzgefasster Kommentar zu den heiligen Schriften Alten und Neuen Testamentes
Klio.B	Klio. Leipzig. Beiheft
KIT	Kleine Texte für (theologische und philologische) Vorlesungen und Übungen
KS	Kirjath-Sepher
KT	Kaiser-Traktate/Kaiser-Taschenbücher
LAPO	Littèratures anciennes du Proche-Orient
LÄS	Leipziger ägyptologische Studien
LB	Linguistica Biblica
LBS	Library of Biblical Studies
LCC	Library of Christian Classics
LCL	Loeb Classical Library
LCT	Library of Constructive Theology
LD	Lectio divina
LEC	Library of Early Christianity
Leš	Lešonénu
LibRel	The Library of Religion
LJS	Lives of Jesus Series
LLAVT	E. Vogt, Lexicon linguae aramaicae Veteris Testamenti (1971)
LLP	Library of Living Philosophers
LouvSt	Louvain Studies
LPGL	G. W. H. Lampe (ed.), Patristic Greek Lexicon (1968)
LPT	Library of Protestant Thought
LQ	Lutheran Quarterly
LR	Lutherische Rundschau
LS	Louvain Studies
LSJ	Liddell-Scott-Jones, Greek-English Lexicon
LSSk.T	Det Laerde selskabs skrifter, Teologiske skrifter
LTK	J. Höfer and K. Rahner (eds.), Lexicon für Theologie und Kirche (2nd ed., 11 vols., 1957–67)
LTP	Laval théologique et philosophique
LUÅ	Lunds universitets årsskrift
LW	J. Pelikan and H. T. Lehman (eds.), Luther's Works
LW	Lutheran World
MBA	Y. Aharoni and M. Avi-Yonah. Macmillan Bible Atlas (1977)
MBM	Münchener Beiträge zur Mediävistik und Renaissance-Forschung
MBTh	Münsterische Beiträge zur Theologie
McCQ	McCormick Quarterly
MDOG	Mitteilungen der deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft
MennEnc	Mennonite Encyclopedia
MennQR	Mennonite Quarterly Review
MethH	Methodist History
MeyerK	H. A. W. Meyer, Kritisch-exegetischer Kommentar uber das Neue Testament
MFC	Message of the Fathers of the Church
MGH	Monumenta Germaniae historica
MGH.L	Monumenta Germaniae historica. Leges
MGH.PL	Monumenta Germaniae historica. Poetae Latinae medii aevi
MGWJ	Monatsschrift für Geschichte und Wissenschaft des Judentums
MM	J.H. Moulton and G. Milligan, The Vocabulary of the Greek Testament

MMHST	Münchner Monographien zur historischen und systematischen Theologie
MMT	The Making of Modern Theology
MNTC	Moffatt NT Commentary
MNDPV	Mitteilungen und Nachrichten des Deutschen Palästina-Vereins
MPAIBL	Mémoires présentés à l'Académie des inscriptions et belles-lettres
MPIL	Monographs of the Peshitta Institute Leiden
MPT	Manuels et précis de théologie
MQR	Methodist Quarterly Review
MRS	Mission de Ras Shamra
MRTS	Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies
MScRel	Mélanges de science religieuse
MSHH	J. P. Nicéron, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des hommes illustres dans la République des Lettres, avec un catologue raisonné des leurs ouvrages (43 vols. in 44, 1727–45)
MSME	Michigan Series on the Middle East
MSU	Mitteilungen des Septuaginta-Unternehmens
MThZ	Münchener theologische Zeitschrift
MTS	Marburger Theologische Studien
MUN	Mémoires de l'Université de Neuchâtel
Mus	Muséon
MUSJ	Mélanges de l'université Saint-Joseph
MVAG	Mitteilungen der vorderasiatisch-ägyptischen Gesellschaft
MW	Muslim World
NAB	New American Bible
NABPR.SS	National Association of Baptist Professors of Religion Special Studies Series
NAKG	Nederlands(ch) archief voor kerkgeschiedenis
NASB	New American Standard Bible
NBC	Nelson's Bible Commentary
NBG	Nouvelle biographie (universelle) générale
NBl	New Blackfriars
NBW	Nationaal biografisch woordenboek
NCB	New Clarendon Bible
NCBC	New Century Bible Commentary
NCCHS	R. D. Fuller et al. (eds.), New Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture (1969)
NCE	M. R. P. McGuire et al. (eds.), New Catholic Encyclopedia (1967–)
NCeB	New Century Bible
NCRTW	N. Smart at al. (eds.), Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West (3 vols., 1985)
NDB	Neue deutsche Biographie
NDIEC	New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity
NEB	Die Neue Echter Bibel
NEB.AT	Neue Echter Bibel. Kommentar zum AT
NedThT	Nederlands theologisch tijdschrift
Neot	Neotestamentica
NFT	New Frontiers in Theology
NGWG	Nachrichten (von) der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften (zu) in Göttingen
NHC	Nag Hammadi Codex
NHCT	D. W. Musser and J. L Price (eds.), A New Handbook of Christian Theologians (1996)
NHS	Nag Hammadi Studies
NIB	New Interpreter's Bible
NICNT	New International Commentary on the New Testament
NICOT	New International Commentary on the Old Testament
NIGTC	The New International Greek Testament Commentary
NIV	New International Version
NJB	H. Wansbrough (ed.), New Jerusalem Bible (1985)
NJBC	R. E. Brown et al. (eds.), The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (1990)
NKJV	New King James Version
NKZ	Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift
NNBW	Nieuw nederlandsch biografisch woordenboek
NND	Neuer Nekrolog der Deutschen
NNM	Numismatic Notes and Monographs

NorTT	Norsk Teologisk Tidsskrift
NovT	Novum Testamentum
NovTSup	Novum Testamentum, Supplements
NPNF	Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers
NRSV	New Revised Standard Version
NRT	La nouvelle revue théologique
NS	Nietzsche-Studien
NSchol	New Scholasticism
NSHERK	S. M. Jackson (ed.), New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (12 vols., 1908–12)
NTA	New Testament Abstracts
NTAbh	Neutestamentliche Abhandlungen
NTD	Das Neue Testament Deutsch
NTF	Neutestamentliche Forschungen
NTG	Neue theologische Grundrisse
NTGu	New Testament Guides
NTHIP	W. G. Kümmel, The NT: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems (1970; ET 1972)
NThJ	Neues theologisches Journal
NThS	Nieuwe theologische studien
NTL	New Testament Literature
NTLi	New Testament Library
NTOA	Novum Testamentum et Orbis Antiquus
NTRG	New Testament Reading Guide
NTS	New Testament Studies
NTT	Norsk teologisk tidsskrift
NTTS	New Testament Tools and Studies
Numen	Numen: International Review for the History of Religions
NUSPEP	Northwestern University Studies in Phenomenology and Existential Philosophy
NZM	Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft
NZST	Neue Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie
OAI	Orient ancien illustré
OBL	Orientalia et biblica lovaniensia
OBO	Orbis biblicus et orientalis
ÖBS	Österreichische biblische Studien
OBT	Overtures to Biblical Theology
OCA	Orientalia Christiana analecta
OCD	M. Cary et al. (eds.), The Oxford Classical Dictionary (1966)
ODCC	F. L. Cross and E. A Livingstone (eds.), Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church (1997)
OEB	J. D. Michaelis (ed.), Orientalische und exegetische Bibliothek (24 vols. in 6, 1771–89)
OECS	Oxford Early Christian Studies
OECT	Oxford Early Christian Texts
ÖEH	Ökuminische Existenz heute
OIP	Oriental Institute Publications
OLA	Orientalia lovaniensia analecta
OLP	Orientalia lovaniensia periodica
OLZ	Orientalische Literaturzeitung
Or	Orientalia (Rome)
OrAnt	Oriens antiquus
OrChr	Oriens christianus
OrSyr	L'orient syrien
OSHT	Oxford Studies in Historical Theology
OstKSt	Ostkirchliche Studien
OTA	Old Testament Abstracts
ÖTBK	Ökumenischer Taschenbuch-kommentar
ÖTBK/NT	Ökumenischer Taschenbuch-kommentar, Neues Testament
OTCNC	J. W. Rogerson, Old Testament Criticism in the Nineteenth Century: England and Germany (1984)
OTE	Old Testament Essays
OTGu	Old Testament Guides

OTL	Old Testament Library
OTM	Oxford Theological Monographs
OTP	J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), The Old Testament Pseudepigrapha (2 vols., 1983)
OTRG	Old Testament Reading Guide
OTS	Oudtestamentische Studiën
OWS	Oxford-Warburg Studies
PAAJR	Proceedings of the American Academy of Jewish Research
PAPS	Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society
PatMS	Patristic Monograph Series
PBA	Proceedings of the British Academy
PBiS	Pamphlet Bible Series
PCB	M. Black and H. H. Rowley (eds.), Peake's Commentary on the Bible (1962)
PEFQS	Palestine Exploration Fund, Quarterly Statement
PEQ	Palestine Exploration Quarterly
PerspRelStud	Perspectives in Religious Studies
PerTeol	Perspectiva theólogica
PG	J. Migne, Patrologia graeca
PGM	K. Preisendanz (ed.), Papyri graecae magicae
PhAnt	Philosophia antiqua
PhEW	Philosophy East and West
PhRev	Philosophical Review
PIASH	Proceedings of the Israel Academy of Sciences and Humanities
PIBA	Proceedings of the Irish Biblical Association
PIOL	Publications de l'Institut Orientaliste de Louvain
PJ	Palästina-Jahrbuch
PL	J. Migne, Patrologia latina
PLO	Porta linguarum orientalium
PMLA	Publications of the Modern Language Association of America
PMS	Publications in Mediaeval Studies
PNTC	Pelican New Testament Commentaries
PO	Patrologia orientalis
POT	Princeton Oriental Texts
PrEc	Presencia ecuménica
PresR	Presbyterian Review
PrM	Protestantische Monatshefte
PRU	Le palais royal d'Ugarit
PSB	Princeton Seminary Bulletin
PSBA	Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology
PSTJ	Perkins (School of Theology) Journal
PTA	Papyrologische Texte und Abhandlungen
PThMS	Pittsburgh Theological Monograph Series
PTMS	Princeton Theological Monograph Series
PTS	Patristische Texte und Studien
PUM.H	Publications of the University of Manchester. Historical Series
PVTG	Pseudepigrapha Veteris Testamenti graece
PW	Pauly-Wissowa, Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Altertumswissenschaft
PWS	Pietist and Wesleyan Studies
PWSup	Supplement to PW
QD	Quaestiones disputatae
QDAP	Quarterly of the Department of Antiquities in Palestine
QFAGG	Quellen und Forschungen zur alten Geschichte und Geographie
QFRG	Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte
QR	Quarterly Review: A Scholarly Journal for Reflection on Ministry
QR	Quellen der Religionsgeschichte
RA	Revue d'assyriologie et d'archéologie orientale
RAC	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum
RACSup	Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum Supplements
RANE	Records of the Ancient Near East
RArch	Revue archéologique
RB	Revue biblique
RBén	Revue bénédictine
RBMA	Repertorium biblicum medii aevi

RBML	Repertorium für biblische und morgenländische Literatur
RCB	Revista de cultura biblica
RdQ	Revue de Qumrán
RE	A. Hauck (ed.), Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche (24 vols., 1896–1913)
REA	Revue des études augustiniennes
REB	Revised English Bible
REB	Revista eclesiástica brasileira
RechBib	Recherches bibliques
REg	Revue d'égyptologie
REJ	Revue des études juives
RelLife	Religion in Life
RelS	Religious Studies
RelSoc	Religion and Society
RenQ	Renaissance Quarterly
RES	Revue des études sémitiques
ResQ	Restoration Quarterly
RevExp	Review and Expositor
RevistB	Revista biblica
RevQ	Revue de Qumran
RevScRel	Revue des sciences religieuses
RevSém	Revue sémitique
RevThom	Revue thomiste
RG	Religion und Geisteskultur
RGG	Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart
RGS	E. Stange (ed.), Die Religionswissenschaft der Gegenwart in Selbstdarstellungen (5 vols., 1925–29)
RgV	Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher
RH	Revue historique
RHA	Revue hittite et asianique
RHE	Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique
RHPR	Revue d'histoire et de philosophie religieuses
RHR	Revue de l'histoire des religions
RiB	Revista interamericana de bibliografia
RICP	Revue de l'Institut Catholique de Paris
RIL.L	Rendiconti. Istituto lombardo di scienze e lettere. Classe di lettere e scienze morali e storiche
RivB	Rivista biblica
RLA	E. Ebeling et al. (eds.), Reallexikon der Assyriologie (1932–)
RLS	Repertorium der lateinischen Sermones des Mittelalters
RMM	B. Feldman and R. D. Richardson (eds.), The Rise of Modern Mythology, 1680–1860 (1972)
RMT	Readings in Moral Theology
RNT	Regensburger Neues Testament
ROMM	Revue de l'occident Musulman et da la mediterraneé
RQ	Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und Kirchengeschichte
RR	Review of Religion
RSO	Revista degli studi orientali
RSPT	Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques
RSR	Recherches de science religieuse
RSS	Rome and the Study of Scripture (1962^7)
RSSH	Recherches et synthèses. Section d'Histoire
RStR	Religious Studies Review
RSV	Revised Standard Version
RT	Rabbinische Texte
RTAM	Recherches de théologie ancienne et médievale
RTL	Revue théologique de Louvain
RTM	Revista di teologia morale
RTP	Revue de théologie et de philosophie
RUO	Revue de l'Université d'Ottawa
RV	Revised Version
SABS	Studies in American Biblical Scholarship

SacEr	Sacris erudiri
SacPag	Sacra Pagina
SANT	Studien zum Alten und Neuen Testament
SAOC	Studies in Ancient Oriental Civilization
SAQ	Sammlung ausgewahlter kirchen-und dogmengeschichtlicher Quellenschriften
SAT	Schriften des Alten Testaments in Auswahl
SB	Sources bibliques
SB(J)	Sainte bible traduite en français sous la direction de l'École Biblique de Jérusalem
SBA	Studies in Biblical Archaeology
SBAW	Sitzungsberichte der bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften
SBB	Stuttgarter biblische Beiträge
SBEC	Studies of the Bible and Early Christianity
SBFLA	Studii biblici franciscani liber annuus
SBJ	La sainte bible de Jérusalem
SBLABS	SBL Archaeology and Biblical Studies
SBLAS	SBL Aramaic Studies
SBLASP	SBL Abstracts and Seminar Papers
SBLBAC	SBL The Bible in American Culture
SBLBMI	SBL The Bible and Its Modern Interpreters
SBLBSNA	SBL Biblical Scholarship in North America
SBLDS	SBL Dissertation Series
SBLEJL	SBL Early Judaism and Its Literature
SBLMasS	SBL Masoretic Studies
SBLMS	SBL Monograph Series
SBLNTGF	SBL The New Testament in the Greek Fathers
SBLRBS	SBL Resources for Biblical Study
SBLSBS	SBL Sources for Biblical Study
SBLSCS	SBL Septuagint and Cognate Studies
SBLSP	SBL Seminar Papers
SBLSPSS	SBL Seminar Papers Series
SBLSS	SBL Semeia Studies
SBLTT	SBL Texts and Translations
SBLWAW	SBL Writings of the Ancient World
SBM	Stuttgarter biblische Monographien
SBONT	Sacred Books of the Old and New Testaments
SBOT	Sacred Books of the Old Testament
SBS	Stuttgarter Bibelstudien
SBT	Studies in Biblical Theology
SbWGF	Sitzungsberichte der Wissenschaftlichen Gesellschaft... Frankfurt a. M.
SC	Sources chrétiennes
ScEccl	Sciences ecclésiastiques
ScEs	Science et esprit
SCES	Sixteenth-century Essays and Studies
SCH	Studies in Church History
SCHNT	Studia ad corpus hellenisticum novi testamenti
SchwR	Schweizer (1,1900–44, 1944: Schweizerische) Rundschau
SCJ	Sixteenth-century Journal
SCM	Studies in the Christian Movement
SCR	Studies in Comparative Religion
ScrB	Scripture Bulletin
ScrHier	Scripta hierosolymitana
SCS	Studies of Church and State
SD	Studies and Documents
SDGSTh	Studien zur Dogmengeschichte und systematischen Theologie
SE	Studia Evangelica I, II, III (= TU 73 [1959]; 87 [1964]; 88 [1964]; etc.)
SEÅ	Svensk exegetisk årsbok
SEAJT	South-east Asia Journal of Theology
SecCent	The Second Century
Sef	Sefarad
Sem	Semitica
SemSup	Semeia Supplements
SFSHJ	South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism

SG	Sammlung Göschen
SGKIO	Studien zur Geschichte und Kultur des islamischen Orients
SGV	Sammlung gemeinverständlicher Vorträge und Schriften
SHANE	Studies in the History of the Ancient Near East
SHAW	Sitzungsberichte der heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften
SHAW.PH	Sitzungsberichte der heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften. Philosophisch-historische Klasse
SHCANE	Studies in the History and Culture of the Ancient Near East
SHCT	Studies in the History of Christian Thought
SHR	Studies in the History of Religions
SHT	Studies in Historical Theology
SHVL	Skrifter utgivna av (K.) Humanistika Vetenskapssamfundet i Lund
SIB	Studies of the Institute Pierre Bayle
SIGC	Studien zur interkulturellen Geschichte des Christentums
SJ	Studia judaica
SJCA	Studies in Judaism and Christianity in Antiquity
SJLA	Studies in Judaism in Late Antiquity
SJOT	Scandinavian Journal of the Old Testament
SJT	Scottish Journal of Theology
SKG.G	Schriften der Königsberger Gelehrten Gesellschaft. Geisteswissenschaftliche Klasse
SKI	Studien zu Kirche und Israel
SLH	Scriptores Latini Hiberniae
SLTGNT	Studies in the Lectionary Text of the Greek New Testament
SMC	Studies in Medieval Culture
SMHVL	Scripta minora. K. Humanistiska Vetenskapssamfundet e Lund
SMRH	Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History
SMRT	Studies in Medieval and Reformation Thought
SMSR	Studi e materiali di storia delle religioni
SNT	Studien zum Neuen Testament
SNTSMS	Society for New Testament Studies Monograph Series
SNumen	Supplements to Numen
SO	Symbolae osloenses
SOR	Studies in Oriental Religions
SOTI	Studies in Old Testament Interpretation
SOTSMS	Society for Old Testament Study Monograph Series
SP	Studies in Philology
SP	Studies in Philosophy
SPap	Studia papyrologica
SPAW	Sitzungsberichte der preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften
SPB	Studia postbiblica
SPCIC	Studiorum Paulinorum Congressus Internationalis Catholicus (2 vols., 1963)
SPhA	Studia Philonica Annual
SPIB	Scripta Pontificii Instituti Biblici
SPMed	Studia patristica Mediolanensia
SPSHS	Scholars Press Studies in the Humanities Series
SQAW	Schriften und Quellen der alten Welt
SR	Studies in Religion/Sciences religieuses
SRC	Studies in Religion and Culture
SSAW	Sitzungsberichte der Sächsischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig
SSAW.PH	Sitzungsberichte der Sächsischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Leipzig. Philosophisch-historische Klasse
SSEA	Schriften der Studiengemeinschaft der Evangelischen Akademien
SSL	Spicilegium sacrum Lovaniense
SSN	Studia semitica neerlandica
SSS	Semitic Study Series
SStLL	Studies in Semitic Language and Linguistics
ST	Studies in Theology
STÅ	Svensk teologisk årsskrift
StABH	Studies in American Biblical Hermeneutics
StB	Studia biblica
StD	Studies and Documents

StDel	Studia Delitzschiana
STDJ	Studies on the Texts of the Desert of Judah
StEv	Studia Evangelica
SThGG	Studien zur theologie und Geistesgeschichte des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts
STK	Svensk teologisk kvartalskrift
STL	Studia theologica Lundensia
StMed	Studi medievali
StPatr	Studia patristica
StPhilo	Studia Philonica
Str-B	[H.Strack and] P. Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament
StRos	Studia Rosenthaliana
STS	Sacrae theologiae summa
StTh	Studia theologica
STU	Schweizerische theologische Umschau
StudNeot	Studia neotestamentica
StudOr	Studia orientalia
StZ	Stimmen der Zeit
SubBi	Subsidia biblica
SUNT	Studien zur Umwelt des Neuen Testaments
SUVK	Videnskapsselskapets skrifter
SVBL	Svenskt biografiskt lexikon
SVEC	Studies on Voltaire and the Eighteenth Century
SVRG	Schriften des Vereins für Reformationsgeschichte
SVTP	Studia in Veteris Testamenti pseudepigrapha
SVTQ	St. Vladimir's Theological Quarterly
SWBA	Social World of Biblical Antiquity
SWR	Studies in Women and Religion
SymBU	Symbolae biblicae upsalienses
TANZ	Texte und Arbeiten zum neutestamentlichen Zeitalter
TAPA	Transactions of the American Philological Association
TARWPV	Theologische Arbeiten aus dem Rheinischen Wissenschaftlichen Prediger-Verein
TAVO	Tübinger Atlas des Vorderen Orients
TAzB	Texte und Arbeiten zur Bibel
TBC	Torch Bible Commentaries
TBei	Theologische Beiträge
TBl	Theologische Blätter
TBT	The Bible Today
TBü	Theologische Bücherei
TCGNT	B. M. Metzger, A Textual Commentary on the Greek New Testament (1975)
TD	Textus et documenta
TD	Theology Digest
TDNT	G. Kittel and G. Friedrich (eds.), Theological Dictionary of the New Testament (10 vols., 1964–76)
TDOT	G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren (eds.), Theological Dictionary of the Old Testament
TdT	H. J. Schultz (ed.), Tendenzen der Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert (1966)
TEAS	Twaynes English Authors Series
TED	Translations of Early Documents
TEH	Theologische Existenz heute
TeU	Tekst en uitleg
TEV	Today's English Version
TF	Theologische Forschung
TG	B. Moeller (ed.), Theologie in Göttingen: Eine Vorlesungsreihe (1987)
TGl	Theologie und Glaube
TH	Theologie historique
ThA	Theologische Arbeiten
ThBer	Theologische Berichte
ThBl	Theologische Blätter
THBW	Theologisch-homiletisches Bibelwerk
TheoDis	Theologische Dissertationen
THFen	Theologia Fennica
ThJb	Theologisches Jahrbuch. Gütersloh

ThJber	Theologischer Jahresbericht. Leipzig
ThJb(T)	Theologische Jahrbücher. Tübingen
THKNT	Theologischer Handkommentar zum Neuen Testament
ThL	Theologische Lehrbücher
ThÖ	Theologie der Ökumene
THR	Travaux d'humanisme et Renaissance
ThStud	Theologische Studien
ThT	Theologisch tijdschrift
ThTh	Themen der Theologie
ThV	Theologische Versuche
TJT	Toronto Journal of Theology
TLNT	C. Spicq, Theological Lexicon of the New Testament (3 vols., 1994)
TLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung
TMLT	Toronto Medieval Latin Texts
TNTC	Tyndale New Testament Commentaries
TOT	A. W. Hastings and E. Hastings (eds.), Theologians of Our Time (1966)
TOTC	Tyndale Old Testament Commentaries
TP	Theologie und Philosophie
TPINTC	Trinty Press International New Testament Commentaries
TPMA	Textes philosophiques du moyen âge
TPNZJ	M. Greschat (ed.), Theologen des Protestantismus im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert (2 vols., 1978)
TPQ	Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift
TQ	Theologische Quartalschrift
TR	Theologická revue
TRE	Theologische Realenzyklopädie
TRev	Theologische Revue
TRHS	Transactions of the Royal Historical Society
TRu	Theologische Rundschau
TS	Texts and Studies
TS	Theological Studies
TSAJ	Texte und Studien zum antiken Judentum
TSB	Theologische Studien. Basel
TSBA	Transactions of the Society of Biblical Archaeology
TSJTSA	Texts and Studies of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America
TSK	Theologische Studien und Kritiken
TSSI	J. C. L. Gibson, Textbook of Syrian Semitic Inscriptions (3 vols., 1971–82)
TSTS	Toronto Semitic Texts and Studies
TT	Teologisk Tidsskrift
TTK	Tidsskrift for teologie og kirke
TToday	Theology Today
TTS	Trierer theologische Studien
TTZ	Trierer theologische Zeitschrift
TU	Texte und Untersuchungen
TUAT	Texte aus der Umwelt des Alten Testament
TübTS	Tübinger theologische Studien
TUMSR	Trinity University Monograph Series in Religion
TW	Theologie und Wirklichkeit
TWAT	G. J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren (eds.), Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament
TWNT	G. Kittel and G. Friedrich (eds.), Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament
TynBul	Tyndale Bulletin
TynNTL	Tyndale New Testament Lecture
TZ	Theologie en zielzorg
TZ	Theologische Zeitschrift
TZT	Texte zur Theologie
TZT	Tübinger Zeitschrift für Theologie
UBL	Ugaritisch-biblische Literatur
UBSGNT	United Bible Societies Greek New Testament
UBS.MS	United Bible Societies. Monograph Series
UCOP	University of Cambridge. Oriental Publication
UF	Ugarit-Forschungen

UNT	Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament
UPATS	University of Pennsylvania Armenian Texts and Studies
USFSHJ	University of South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism
USQR	Union Seminary Quarterly Review
UTB	Uni-Taschenbücher
UTQ	University of Toronto Quarterly
UUÅ	Uppsala universitets årsskrift
VC	Vigiliae christianae
VCaro	Verbum caro
VCSup	Vigiliae christianae Supplements
VD	Verbum domini
VE	Vida e espiritualidad
VF	Verkündigung und Forschung
VIEGM	Veröffentlichungen des Instituts für Europäische Geschichte Mainz
VS	Verbum salutis
VSAT	Verbum Salutis, Ancien Testament
VT	Vetus Testamentum
VTG	Vetus Testamentum Graecum
VTSup	Vetus Testamentum, Supplements
VVAW	Verhandelingen van de koninklijke. Academie voor Wetenschappen, Letteren en Schone Kunsten van België
WA	M. Luther, Kritische Gesamtausgabe (= "Weimar" edition)
WB	Die Welt der Bibel
WBC	Word Biblical Commentary
WC	Westminster Commentaries
WdF	Wege der Forschung
WF	Westfälische Zeitschrift
WHJP	World History of the Jewish People
WiWei	Wissenschaft und Weisheit
WMANT	Wissenschaftliche Monographien zum Alten und Neuen Testament
WMS	Wolfenbütteler Mittelalter Studien
WO	Die Welt des Orients
WSA	Wolfenbütteler Studien zur Aufklärung
WSPL	Warwick Studies in Philosophy and Literature
WTJ	Westminster Theological Journal
WTS	Wijsgerige teksten en studies
WuD	Wort und Dienst
WUNT	Wissenschaftliche Untersuchungen zum Neuen Testament
WVDOG	Wissenschaftliche Veröffentlichungen der deutschen Orientgesellschaft
WW	Word and World
WZ(G)	Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Ernst-Moritz-Arndt-Universität Greifswald
WZ(H)	Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg
WZ(H).GS	Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg. Gesellschafts- und sprachwissenschaftliche Reihe
WZ(J)	Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Friedrich-Schiller-Universität Jena
WZKM	Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes
WZKSO	Wiener Zeitschrift für die Kunde Süd- und Ostasiens und Archiv für indische Philosophie
WZ(L)	Wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift der Karl-Marx-Universität Leipzig
YHP	Yale Historical Publications
YJS	Yale Judaica Series
YNER	Yale Near Eastern Researches
YOS	Yale Oriental Series
YOS.MS	Yale Oriental Series. Manuscript Series
YOS.R	Yale Oriental Series. Researches
YPR	Yale Publications in Religion
YSR	Yale Studies in Religion
ZA	Zeitschrift für Assyriologie
ZAH	Zeitschrift für Althebraistik
ZÄS	Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprache
ZAW	Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft
ZBK	Zürcher Bibelkommentar

ZBNT	Zürcher Bibelkommentar/Neues Testament
ZDMG	Zeitschrift der deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft
ZDPV	Zeitschrift des deutschen Pälastina-Vereins
ZdZ	Die Zeichen der Zeit
ZEE	Zeitschrift für evangelische Ethik
ZfHB	Zeitschrift für hebräische Bibliographie
ZGJD	Zeitschrift für die Geschichte der Juden in Deutschland
ZGSHG	Zeitschrift der Gesellschaft für Schleswig-Holsteinische Geschichte
ZHT	Zeitschrift für historische Theologie
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte
ZKM	Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes
ZKT	Zeitschrift für katholische Theologie
ZKWL	Zeitschrift für kirchliche Wissenschaft und kirchliches Leben
ZLThK	Zeitschrift für die (gesammte) lutherische Theologie und Kirche
ZMR	Zeitschrift für Missionskunde und Religionswissenschaft
ZNThG	Zeitschrift für neuere Theologiegeschichte
ZNW	Zeitschrift für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft
ZPrTh	Zeitschrift für praktische Theologie
ZRG	Zeitschrift für Rechtsgeschichte
ZRGG	Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte
ZRIJ	Zeitschrift für die religiösen Interessen des Judenthums
ZS	Zeitschrift für Semitistik
ZST	Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie
ZTK	Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche
ZWT	Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie

K

KABBALAH

The Hebrew word kabbalah means "reception," connoting a teaching that is handed down by a religious authority. Long applied to the Jewish sacred tradition in general, the term was first associated with specific mystical and theosophic inquiries beginning in the late 1100s in southern France. By the early fourteenth century, the term referred exclusively to such reflections, indicating the consolidation of Kabbalah as a distinct intellectual trend in medieval Judaism alongside Jewish philosophy. Although Kabbalah flourished in the period from the thirteenth to the seventeenth centuries, its origins and influence extended beyond these temporal boundaries.

The origins of medieval Kabbalah are still shrouded in mystery. The early masters of Kabbalah in Provence and Spain viewed themselves as recipients of an esoteric oral tradition going all the way back to Sinai. For the Kabbalists, Kabbalah was oral Torah par excellence. Communicated orally to Moses, this esoteric tradition constituted the inner meaning of the revealed written Torah. To guard the secrets from misinterpretation or misuse, Kabbalah was to be transmitted orally to the select few. Thus the oral nature of the tradition was intrinsically related to its content, claim for AUTHORITY, and mode of transmission.

Kabbalah's claim of divine origin is unverifiable; it makes sense only within the rabbinic myth of oral and written Torahs. Yet the claim of oral origins need not be ahistorical. It is plausible that prior to the public appearance of Kabbalah in the late twelfth century certain teachings concerning the Sinaitic theophany, the meaning of biblical verses, and specific exegetical procedures were transmitted orally from masters to worthy disciples in the privacy of certain learned families. Precisely because Kabbalah was an integral part of text-centered rabbinic Judaism, however, it was governed by textuality: Texts functioned as its reference system whether actual texts were present or not, and whether texts were transmitted orally or in writing.

The kabbalistic approach to the Bible was grounded in ancient Jewish esoterica. Extant in anonymous or pseudoepigraphic treatises (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA), the ancient esoteric tradition included descriptions of mystical journeys to the heavenly palaces (hekhalot), contemplations of Ezekiel's divine chariot (Merkavah), visionary experiences of God and other heavenly beings, and cosmological speculations about the principles of the created universe. Expressing the mystical, theurgic, magical, and mythical impulses of rabbinic Judaism, the ancient esoteric tradition flourished from the second century until the rise of Jewish rationalism in the tenth century. When Jewish intellectuals began to evaluate rabbinic Judaism in light of Greek philosophy, they found the esoteric tradition unacceptable and attempted to suppress it or explain it away. Therefore, the emergence of Kabbalah in the twelfth century signaled the resurgence of trends that medieval Jewish rationalism had rejected.

In line with ancient Jewish esoterica, medieval Kabbalah viewed the Bible as a two-tiered text: Behind the sacrosanct order of the revealed text there is a corresponding noncorporeal, transcendent, linguistic structure. This is the supernal Torah that preexists the created world, functioning as a blueprint for creation. Whereas the revealed Torah tells of mundane events in the realm of nature and history, the concealed Torah is a self-portrait of God. The anonymous Jewish mystics of the Tannaitic period developed this notion out of an allegorical reading of the Song of Songs according to which the male lover represents God and the female beloved is the personification of Israel. By allegorizing the biblical love poetry, the rabbinic mystics could legitimize the inclusion of the Song of Songs in the CANON while cultivating a highly anthropomorphic conception of God.

The esoteric tradition envisioned God as a superhuman being of fantastic magnitude. God was seen as an awesome king seated on the throne of glory (kisse' ha-kābôd) situated in the seventh of the heavenly palaces where the heavenly hosts sing God's praises. The Shiur Qomah (The Measurement of [God's] Stature), the central text of this corpus, describes God's body in great detail on the basis of the Song of Songs. The size of each limb of the divine Anthropos (e.g., forehead, beard, neck, eyes, hands, and fingers) is expressed in grandiose magnitudes. The anthropomorphic conception of God dictated that the supernal Torah itself be given structure by a human form of gigantic proportions. Mirroring God, the anthropomorphic Torah reflects the divine names on its limb, and conversely, the text of the Torah is inscribed on the stature of God.

The bold anthropomorphism of Shiur Qomah is less shocking once it is understood that God's body is composed not of corporeal matter but of energy, i.e., light. For the ancient mystic God was not merely conceived as a powerful and mighty deity but literally as power (kōaḥ) and might (gĕbûrâ). The particles of the divine energy are the Hebrew letters (in their ideal form), and the highest velocity of divine energy is God's name. By properly computing the numerical values of the Hebrew letters that make up the exoteric biblical text the reader can decipher the measurements of both God's stature and the hidden Torah. According to some texts, these computations are said to have been revealed orally by God to Moses at Sinai; according to others, they were revealed to R. Yishmael, the mystical hero of this corpus.

The intrinsic link among God, the Hebrew alphabet, the Torah, and the created universe is spelled out in the second-century text, Sefer Yetzirah (The Book of Formation). According to this pseudepigraphic work, God created the universe in thirty-two paths of wisdom that include the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet and ten numbers called Sefirot. Analogous to Pythagorean ideal numbers, the Hebrew alphabet and the Sefirot constitute the foundational principles of the physical universe. Thus underlying the multiplicity of the created universe is a unity that can be expressed in numerical values. In search of this unity Sefer Yetzirah strings together long lists of Hebrew letters in a quasi-scientific attempt to penetrate the mysteries of creation, about which the Torah speaks exoterically at the beginning of Genesis.

The notion that the revealed Torah stores divine energy has practical ramifications: The one who knows the mysteries of the Torah can benefit from its hidden powers. In some texts of the Hekhalot and Merkavah literature, the spiritual energy of the Torah is deployed for ascent to the heavenly realms in order to envision God, the supernal Torah, the divine throne (kisse' hakābôd) and other heavenly beings. In other texts, the spiritual energy of the biblical text is deployed either for the sake of altering mundane reality (e.g., creating a homunculus) or for the sake of enhancing God's power. Not coincidentally, the rabbis claimed exclusive control of the secret powers of the Torah and transmitted this esoteric knowledge orally to the very few deemed worthy.

For public consumption, the ancient rabbis spelled out the myth of Torah. They specified the normative aspects of the life of holiness—Halakhah—and labored to endear the life of Torah to their followers by means of creative homilies. Like silkworms the rabbis spun their imaginative homiletical webs, creating the texture of Torah as an all-encompassing myth (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). Through rich use of metaphors the rabbis personified the divine Torah as a female figure. She is the daughter of God who was given as a bride to Israel, the groom, in an everlasting marriage consummated at Sinai. By feminizing the Torah, the rabbis enabled all (male) Jews to envision the Torah as the object of their perpetual love, thereby imbuing the act of Torah study with erotic meaning. Medieval Kabbalah would go one step further by hypostatizing the female Torah as an aspect of God.

Medieval Kabbalah elaborated ancient Jewish mythologumena, mysticism magic, and theurgy. Precisely because Kabbalah was now communicated (at least partially) in a written form, it emerged as a cultural trend in medieval Jewish history. The first text associated with the public appearance of Kabbalah was Sefer ha-Bahir (The Book of Brightness). Attributed to R. Nehunya ben Ha-Qanah, one of the heroes of the Hekhalot corpus, this fragmentary, opaque text was apparently composed in a Middle Eastern setting some time between the eighth and eleventh centuries and received its final editing in Provence during the late twelfth century.

In style the Bahir appears to be a rabbinic MIDRASH on the Torah. But instead of the verse-centered, free-flowing, nonmetaphysical homilies of the Midrash, the Bahir presupposed a well-developed theology, thereby indicating the growing theological sophistication of medieval Judaism. While building upon ancient Jewish texts, the Bahir shifted the focus from mysticism to theosophy: Instead of calculating and contemplating God's awesome body, the Bahir focuses on God's soul—i.e., on divine attributes. Termed Sefirot along with a host of other names, the divine attributes are not only the principles through which God's power is manifested in the physical universe, but also ten dynamic stages through which the divine personality is revealed. The Bahir retained the anthropomorphic conception of God by arranging the ten Sefirot in the form of a human body, thus conceptualizing God as a full-fledged person endowed with body and soul.

Personhood entails that God possesses sexuality. On the basis of rabbinic homilies that echoed the Platonic myth of creation, the Bahir imaged God as an androgyne: The upper nine Sefirot constitute the male principle and the last ten the female. What had been suggested in ancient Jewish esoterica was made explicit in the Bahir. The energy that pulsates through the Godhead is sexual in nature, and the processes within the Godhead are governed by the rhythm of sexuality: penetration and withdrawal, union and separation, marriage and divorce. The constant flux of the Sefirotic realm reflects both the ever-changing nature of human psychic and bodily processes as well as the changes in God's relationship with the created world. In particular the supernal drama reflects both the intimacy and the vicissitudes of the eternal love between God and Israel.

Referred to primarily as Shekhinah—the Talmudic term (see TALMUD) for divine presence—the Bahir images the divine female as queen, bride, sister, daughter, wife, matron, mother, earth, sea, moon, field, orchard, and a host of related feminine symbols. The divine female represents the relational dimension of the deity. The Shekhinah is the face that God shows to the created world, especially to Israel. As a liminal boundary between the Godhead and extra-deific reality, she is both the entry gate into the Godhead and the channel through which divine efflux is transmitted to the created universe. Her relationship with the masculine forces of the Godhead is unstable, affected by human deeds. Human sins empower the domain of evil (the reification of profane forces) and induce discord in the supernal world, represented by the sundering of the divine male and female. In contrast, righteous conduct—through the performance of the commandments—reunites the masculine and feminine aspects of the Godhead, restoring the bisexual Godhead to its primordial harmony. In turn, the re-pairing of the Godhead results in an abundance of the divine efflux to the created universe, the sign of redeemed reality. Thus the Bahir insinuated the intrinsic connection between theosophy, theurgy, and eschatology that Spanish Kabbalah would develop further.

The Bahir identifies the Shekhinah with the Torah, which God gave to Israel in an everlasting marriage. Reifying midrashic literary tropes, the Bahir hypostatizes the Torah as a mythological persona that has come down to earth. The connection of this motif with the biblical personification of Wisdom and the GNOSTIC myth of Sophia is quite evident, although the details of the Bahir's conception of Torah are not entirely clear. In some passages it links the Torah with the Shekhinah (i.e., the tenth Sefirah, Malkhut) without differentiating between the written Torah and the oral Torah. In others, the Shekhinah is the supernal manifestation of the oral Torah, and Tiferet (the Sefirah that symbolizes the male principle) is viewed as the symbol of the written Torah. Both the written and the oral Torah are viewed as the unfolding of the primordial Torah, which the Bahir identified with God's wisdom, the second Sefirah, Hokhmah. In the theosophy of the Bahir, God's self-disclosure through the ten Sefirot is a twofold process in which God's Word and God's world come into being.

By making revelation and creation internal processes within the Godhead, the Bahir articulated the central hermeneutical principle (see HERMENEUTICS) of theosophic Kabbalah. The Bible is a symbolic text that speaks exoterically of mundane things and esoterically of supernal events within the divine pleroma. Since the hidden meaning of the biblical text pertains to events within the Godhead, the Bible can be said to be God's biography. Thus God's personal life lends organic unity to the biblical text: All portions and verses of the biblical text are intrinsically linked to each other like the branches and twigs of a tree or the limbs, tissues, and blood vessels of the human body. And precisely because the revealed text makes manifest God's dynamic inner life, the Bible must be read through multiple, simultaneously correct interpretations. As kabbalistic theosophy sharpened its conception of God as the Infinite, it articulated the notion that the revealed text has infinite meanings, none of which can exhaust the infinite reality of God. Most important, kabbalistic exegesis of the multivalent text was said to enable the devotee not only to fathom what God wants one to do but also to participate in the infinite mysteries of God's life.

The circulation of the Bahir indicates the resurgence of myth in medieval Judaism. The scholars who edited and studied it were committed to the anthropomorphic and anthropopathic conception of God characteristic of rabbinic Judaism (both exoteric and esoteric). They wanted to curb the dissemination of Jewish rationalism, especially in its Neoplatonized-Aristotelian version articulated by MAIMONIDES (d. 1204). Maimonideanism rejected the mythic conception of God and its corollary theurgic understanding of Jewish ritual in the name of a philosophical understanding of divine transcendence and an emphasis on the intellectual approach to worship. To the opponents of Maimonides, the religion of the philosophers deviated from the rabbinic tradition.

Anti-Maimonidean sentiment was harbored within the leading rabbinic families of Provençal Judaism. Led by the prominent halachist, R. Abraham ben David of Posqueres (d. 1198), some of these traditionalists cultivated an ascetic, contemplative life, culminating in ecstatic experiences. They attributed their revelatory experiences to the prophet Elijah, the symbol of the Jewish tradition, thereby attesting to their awareness of the tension between loyalty to the tradition and mystical innovation. The Provençal mystics developed the practice of associating segments of Jewish liturgy with specific Sefirot during prayer, thereby manifesting the theurgic meaning of kabbalistic worship.

Writing contributed to the doctrinal consolidation of Kabbalah as a self-conscious Jewish theology. The first systematizer of Kabbalah was R. Isaac the Blind (d. 1235), the son of R. Abraham ben David. Independent of the Bahir, his Commentary on Sefer Yetzirah combined the symbolism of the Sefirot, the mystical impulses of his own circle, and the metaphysics and cosmology of medieval Jewish Neoplatonism. The kabbalistic tendency to reify literary tropes and abstract concepts as processes within the Godhead could be easily reconciled with the ontological premises of Neoplatonic emanationism. Yet to the chagrin of R. Isaac the Blind, as soon as Kabbalah appeared in a written form, it was impossible to prevent its dissemination beyond well-defined kinship boundaries.

In the early thirteenth century, Kabbalah spread to Christian Spain, where it experienced unprecedented creativity. In Gerona, Toledo, Burgos, Soria, and Barcelona small groups of Kabbalists steeped in Talmudic Judaism and familiar to some extent with Jewish philosophy developed their own speculative systems, each claiming to represent "The Kabbalah." Variegated religious interests manifested themselves in a plethora of kabbalistic literary genres: commentaries on the Bible, commentaries on Talmudic homilies, commentaries on Sefer Yetzirah, lists of symbolic codes, systematic expositions of the rationales of the commandments, speculations on the Hebrew alphabet and Torah cantillation, descriptions of the mythic domain of evil, and manuals for the attainment of ecstatic, mystical experiences. The very diversity of thirteenth-century Kabbalah attests both to the centrality of human imagination (notably denigrated by Jewish rationalists) and to the richness of Iberian Jewish culture.

During the last quarter of the thirteenth century the two major trends of Spanish Kabbalah—ecstatic Kabbalah and theosophic Kabbalah—reached their zenith. Phenomenologically, these two trends were radically different from each other: Whereas ecstatic Kabbalah concerns altering the mystic's state of consciousness, theosophic Kabbalah pertains to external reality. Whereas ecstatic Kabbalah is anthropocentric, theosophic Kabbalah is theocentric. Whereas ecstatic Kabbalah developed through close contact with philosophy (Jewish and non-Jewish), theosophic Kabbalah was more confined to inner Jewish traditions. Whereas ecstatic Kabbalah shunned symbolism, theosophic Kabbalah was intrinsically linked to symbolism. And if ecstatic Kabbalah incorporated Maimonidean philosophy, theosophic Kabbalah was essentially mythical. These contrasts can be followed more closely by looking at Abraham Abulafia (d. c. 1295) and MOSES BEN SHEM-TOB DE LEON (d. 1305), the main contributor to the final form of Sefer ha-Zohar (the Book of Splendor), as the major exponents of ecstatic Kabbalah and theosophic Kabbalah respectively.

The ecstatic Kabbalah of Abulafia (known also as "prophetic Kabbalah") cultivated a spiritual path leading to unio mystica with God. By combining ancient Jewish mystical and exegetical practices, non-Jewish mystical techniques, and Maimonidean philosophy, Abulafia devised a unique system of meditations intended to liberate the intellect from its corporeal imprisonment in the body. Transcending human corporeality was necessary for the correct understanding of the revealed text, which (like humanity) exhibited the duality of spirituality and corporeality. Abulafia's hermeneutics was designed to break through the corporeal encasing of the biblical text.

Echoing the linguistic premises of ancient Jewish mysticism, Abulafia broke down the biblical text into its atomistic components—the Hebrew letters—and recombined their numerical values according to his own philosophical code. His ars combinatoria (the inner wisdom of combination) was said to enable the intellectually perfected interpreter to grasp the spiritual, supernal Torah encased in the revealed text. Through deconstruction of the biblical text Abulafia claimed to have achieved a mystical union with God, which he interpreted as a prophecy from God.

Abulafia interpreted his personal mystico-prophetic experiences in messianic terms and engaged in messianic propaganda in Sicily during the early 1290s. With Maimonides, however, Abulafia interpreted redemption in radical spiritual terms: He shifted redemption from the historical to the psychological realm, minimized the catastrophic elements of popular Jewish eschatology, and did not advocate the departure of Jews from the diaspora. Although his messianism was highly individualized and spiritualized, his political activism was rebuffed by the papal authority, and his prophetic Kabbalah was rejected by the leading halakhic authority in Spain, R. Solomon ibn Adret (d. c. 1310). An adherent of theosophic Kabbalah, ibn Adret rejected Abulafia's prophetic Kabbalah as a deviation from the received esoteric tradition.

No less messianic than Abulafia, though devoid of political activism, was the theosophic Kabbalah of Sefer ha-Zohar. In contrast to Abulafia and Maimonides, but in continuity with the Bahir, the Zohar regarded the esoteric truths of the biblical text as biographical rather than conceptual. The hidden, divine truths cannot be reduced to abstract propositions or mathematical equations; they can only be retold in a narrative (i.e., a myth), which alone could capture, or better still, mirror, the life of God sealed and concealed in the revealed text. By telling a tale about a tale, the Zohar provided the key to unlocking the mysteries of the written Torah.

The ingenuity of the Zohar lies in its intricate literary form. It is written as a live discourse between R. Simon bar Yohai and his fellow sages (some are known historical figures, and others are figments of Moses de Leon's imagination) as they stroll through the Holy Land. In their travels, the protagonists undergo mystical experiences that enable them (or more precisely, their creator, Moses de Leon) to reveal the mysteries of Torah sealed and concealed in the biblical text. Because these "revelations" are arranged in accordance with the sequence of the Torah, the Zohar appears to be a Midrash on the Torah composed by the second-century Tanna, R. Simon bar Yohai.

By using a dramatic narrative the author(s) of the Zohar attempted to accomplish the following: First, by ascribing their own creative interpretation and mystical experiences to known rabbinic figures, Moses de Leon and his associates invested the Zohar with the aura of an ancient, authoritative, rabbinic text. Second, the dramatic narrative enabled the Zohar to reenact the actual hermeneutical situation of Spanish Kabbalists. (The study of Kabbalah was a group experience in which a master teacher instructed his disciples in the interpretation of the sacred texts.) And third, by presenting the mystical revelations of the protagonists as the hidden meaning of the written Torah, the Zohar claimed for itself the status of an esoteric text written in a symbolic code that needs decoding. In other words, its structure reflects the structure of the Torah.

Interestingly, the Zohar parallels another medieval text written as a secret key to unlock the secrets of the Torah—Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed. Just as the philosophic reader of the Guide needs to solve its intentional contradictions in order to grasp the hidden philosophic truths of the Torah, so also must the kabbalistic reader of the Zohar decode its symbolic language in order to reveal the mythic truths concealed in the Torah. When the biblical text and the narrative of the Zohar are properly aligned, like two intricate paper cutouts, the literal meaning of the Zohar and the esoteric meaning of the biblical text overlap. At that point, the mythic truth of the divine life emerges out of the corporeal shell of both the biblical text and the zoharic text like the empty space of the two aligned cut-outs. Free from its verbal coverings, the spiritual truth of the hidden Torah radiates in its full brightness, enlightening the interpreter as well as the entire world.

In continuity with the Bahir and with previous Kabbalists, the Zohar sexualized the act of biblical interpretation. Identifying the esoteric, supernal Torah with the female aspect of God, the Shekhinah, it understands biblical exegesis as a sexual act of penetration culminating in a symbolic sexual union of the male interpreter and the female Torah/Shekhinah. In a famous parable that betrays the influence of medieval Hebrew love poetry and perhaps even Christian courtly poetry, the Zohar images the Torah as a beautiful young maiden who is gradually stripped of her clothes with the progression of each exegetical act. Her linguistic veils removed, the Torah/Shekhinah stands denuded and decoded. Her secrets are now wide open to the interpreter, like a blooming rose whose open petals reveal its latent beauty. At that moment the interpreter stands face to face with God, who is known to men in a female form.

Kabbalistic biblical interpretation and kabbalistic performance of the commandments in general are theurgic acts. In what amounts to hieros gamos, successful penetration of the veiled (female) Torah brings about the re-pairing of the Shekhinah and her divine husband, Tiferet. Torn apart from each other because of human sin and the aggressiveness of demonic forces, the divine male and female are now united by virtue of kabbalistic exegesis. As a holy ritual, the act of Torah study must be performed in absolute purity: Only circumcised males who live by the Jewish purity code can penetrate the symbolic text and bring about theurgic results. Whether the Kabbalist must engage in actual sex with his lawful wife in order to accomplish the divine reunion or can merely fantasize about holy sex while engaging in Torah study with his male comrades is still an open question.

The theurgic significance of ritual is linked to the messianic import of the Zohar, with the literary persona of R. Simon bar Yohai serving as a mask for Moses de Leon's messianic self-perception. Even though the bulk of the Zohar does not discuss the Messiah, its intentionally obscure section, the Sifra dezni'uta (The Book of Concealment) is written as a messianic drama in which the revelations of Shimon bar Yohai usher in the coming of the Messiah. Like Abulafia, the authors of the Zohar minimized the catastrophic elements of Jewish eschatology and highlighted instead the messianic import of individual religious activities. However, in contrast to Abulafia, redemptive activity is theosophic-theurgic rather than mystical-cognitive. Done properly (i.e., in accordance with the Zohar's own guidance), kabbalistic performance of the commandments brings about a fourfold repairing (tikkun) of the individual, the Jewish people, the universe, and the Godhead. When the balance between the sacred and the profane is restored, redemption is at hand.

With its engaging plot, vivid dramatization, colorful imagery, hermeneutical inventiveness, highly charged eroticism, and individualized messianism the Zohar was an irresistible text. Although some Kabbalists criticized its departure from the transmitted tradition, most fell under its sway. By the early fourteenth century one anonymous Kabbalist (the author of Tikkuney Zohar and Ra'aya Meheimna) imitated its style in order to make explicit its spiritual, messianic message. The imitation was sufficiently close to be included in the zoharic corpus, even though there were considerable theological differences between the two authors. The spiritualizing tendencies of the anonymous Kabbalist led him to highlight the antinomian potential of kabbalistic theosophy. The revealed Torah is but a corporeal manifestation of a different spiritual Torah. While the former contains prohibitions and limitations in order to address the imperfect conditions of all levels of existence after the fall of man, the spiritual Torah will reign in the messianic, perfected age ushered in by the revelations of the Zohar.

As the fourteenth century came to a close, Kabbalah was exerting increasing influence on mainstream exoteric Judaism, although it remained the primary preoccupation of only a small group of scholars. Kabbalistic expositions of the commandments entered into halakhic literature while kabbalistic traditions were incorporated into ethical texts and commentaries on prayer. Kabbalistic symbolism was increasingly absorbed into Jewish Aristotelianism, the regnant mode of thought among Jewish intellectuals in Spain, Provence, and Italy. A few Jewish theologians hailed Kabbalah as a potential alternative to Jewish Aristotelianism, and some Jewish academies in Castile even included Kabbalah in their curriculum. Despite all this, Kabbalah was hardly a creative force through most of the fifteenth century. The most likely cause was the persecutions of 1391 and the mass apostasy of Spanish Jews thereafter.

Spanish Kabbalah regained its creative edge in the last two decades of the fourteenth century in an anonymous magical and theurgic text, Sefer ha-Meshiv (The Book of the Answering Angel), which captured the messianic impulses of Spanish Jews prior to the expulsion from Spain and outlined specific means for overcoming evil.

After the expulsion of the Jews from Iberia, Kabbalah disseminated throughout the Mediterranean basin wherever Iberian exiles settled. In Italy it attracted the interest of several Christian scholars who correctly recognized the similarity between its theosophy and the Platonic and Neoplatonic metaphysics then in vogue in the Florentine academy. Led by PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, Italian humanists viewed Kabbalah as an integral part of ancient wisdom that culminated in the spiritual truths of Christianity. Italian humanists employed Jewish and apostate scholars to teach them Hebrew and instruct them in Kabbalah and had kabbalistic texts translated into Latin. Fusing Abulafia's mystical techniques with pre-zoharic kabbalistic theosophy, the Italian humanists launched the syncretist movement of Christian Kabbalah in which kabbalistic symbolism, Platonic and Neoplatonic philosophy, Christian theology, and Renaissance occultism peacefully coexisted in one system of thought.

Although the humanists' fascination with Kabbalah reflected a positive Christian attitude toward Jewish theology, it was neither devoid of missionary intent nor inclined to improve the condition of the Jews in Italy. In fact, the popularity of Kabbalah in sixteenth-century Italy stood in sharp relief to the papal condemnation of the Talmud in 1553, which figured prominently in the counteroffensive of the Roman Catholic Church against the Protestant Reformation. Shortly after the Talmud was consigned to the flames, the Zohar was printed in two separate editions (Mantua [1558] and Cremona [1559]) amid a fierce debate within the Jewish community. If the Talmud was perceived as the mark of Jewish perfidy, the Zohar was viewed as a potent text for the attainment of Christian spirituality. For Jews, of course, the primacy of the Talmud could not be challenged, although the printing of the Zohar did contribute to its rising canonical status. Increasingly, the Zohar was viewed by Jews and non-Jews as a text endowed with occult powers whose study could heal the sick, exorcise demons, work miracles, and ultimately hasten the coming of the Messiah.

In the town of Safed in Palestine, then under the control of the Ottoman Turks, medieval Kabbalah reached its final phase. A community of mystics led a rigorous life of frequent fasts, ablutions, night vigils, and intense study of Kabbalah in preparation for the coming of the Messiah. M. Cordovero (d. 1570) systematized kabbalistic theosophy and ethics, I. Luria (d. 1572) articulated the details of God's inner drama, and J. Caro (d. 1575) incorporated kabbalistic doctrines and practices into his comprehensive code of Law, Shulhan Arukh (Prepared Table). With the decline of Maimonideanism by the second half of the sixteenth century, Kabbalah emerged as the dominant theology of Judaism as well as an important influence on popular Jewish piety and practice.

Paradoxically, the systematization of kabbalistic theology marked the end of kabbalistic biblical hermeneutics. In particular, the mystical and visionary activity of Luria and his disciples rendered the kabbalistic interpretation of the revealed text a secondary activity. Lurianic Kabbalah spelled out the physiological processes of divine life, from the first act of internal withdrawal (zimzum) through the traumatic events of divine self-birth—referred to as "the breaking of the vessels" (shevirat ha-kelim)—to the final act of re-pairing the male and female principles of the deity (tikkun). It not only detailed God's inner life with scientific precision, but it also provided specific instruction for the production of theurgic results (i.e., kavanot and yihudim).

Precisely because Lurianic Kabbalah provided a manual of divine sexuality with specific instructions for the human activation of the deity, it left no room for the imagination of the interpreter. As kabbalistic symbolism lost its vitality and suggestive power, the study of the biblical text itself diminished in importance. Where the Zohar succeeded, Lurianic Kabbalah failed. The Zohar could talk openly and inspiringly about divine mysteries because it retained the presumption that the Bible is a symbolic text. In contrast, Lurianic Kabbalah explored biblical symbolism by expounding the details of divine sexual life with utmost literalism. It is no wonder that Luria's students contracted among themselves not to reveal the secrets of their master; misunderstood or misapplied, these secrets could cause great harm. Thus, while the Zohar became an exoteric text of canonical status, Lurianic Kabbalah resorted to actual esotericism.

Notwithstanding the self-imposed ban on the dissemination of Lurianic Kabbalah, variants were popularized during the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Various (and not entirely consistent) versions of kabbalistic theology, PSYCHOLOGY, hermeneutics, ethics, and practice spread throughout the Jewish diaspora to create a worldview and life-style suffused with Kabbalah; it provided the ideational framework for diverse cultural movements in early modern Judaism, ranging from Jewish interest in the natural sciences during the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries in Italy, through the messianic outbursts of Sabbatianism in the mid-seventeenth century, to the revivalist movement of HASIDISM in the eighteenth century.

Through Hasidism, Kabbalah entered the modern period only to encounter the hostility of modernizing forces such as the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah), the scientific study of Judaism (Wissenschaft des Judentums), and Reform Judaism. For these rationalist trends Kabbalah reflected the irrational, obscurantist, superstitious aspect of Judaism that not only deviated from the monotheistic essence of Judaism but also prevented Jews from becoming dignified citizens in the countries of their residence. The scientific study of the Jewish past meant that the existence of Kabbalah could not be ignored; yet because it was perceived as a deviation from the essence of Judaism its centrality in Judaism was diminished and its teachings explained away. Ironically it was precisely the hostile attitude toward Kabbalah and its link to the desire for acceptance in European society that led to the revival of the scientific study of Kabbalah during the twentieth century.

In contrast to the essentialist approach to Judaism of nineteenth-century Jewish scholarship, G. Scholem—the greatest modern historian of Kabbalah—championed a pluralistic, anarchic vision of Judaism. Judaism possesses neither an essence nor a dogma, neither an overarching philosophical principle nor a core idea. Whatever Jews have thought, written, created, and done in history is Jewish and as such must be considered the raw data for the Jewish historian. This position was consistent with Scholem's Zionism, which was the only viable avenue for the modern Jewish intellectual who was too estranged from the world of halakhic Judaism to remain committed to Jewish identity.

Scholem made Kabbalah the focal point of his Zionist "counter-history." In doing so he not only rehabilitated it from its inferior status in Wissenschaft scholarship, but also put it on a pedestal as one of the most vital elements of Judaism, the very secret of its longevity. Rabbinic Judaism would have petrified under its own aridity without Kabbalah; and just as Kabbalah kept rabbinic Judaism alive, so too the historical study of Kabbalah would rejuvenate modern Judaism by exposing the versatility and vitality of rabbinic Judaism.

Scholem made the study of Kabbalah a respectable sub-field within the academic study of Judaism. He surveyed much of the corpus of kabbalistic texts, traced the evolution of major kabbalistic concepts and themes, and outlined the intellectual portraits of leading Kabbalists, mapping out the entire field of kabbalistic literature. Yet in order to do so he systematized Kabbalah into a form of speculative theology, thereby suppressing (consciously or unconsciously) its experiential, mystical, and theurgic dimensions.

Scholem's formidable legacy became a form of orthodoxy in the academic study of Kabbalah. Only the third generation of Scholem's students felt sufficiently confident to challenge some of his assertions, and this stirred great controversy. The revisionist studies of M. Idel, Y. Liebes, and E. Wolfson attest greater awareness of phenomenology of religion, openness to the experiential dimensions of Kabbalah, and application of contemporary LITERARY theories to the study of kabbalistic hermeneutics. Uninhibited by a preconception of Judaism, these studies have situated Kabbalah in the broader context of Jewish mystical, magical, and theurgic lore, thereby lending credence to Kabbalah's self-perception as an ancient Jewish tradition.

Bibliography: J. L. Blau, The Christian Interpretation of the Kabbalah in the Renaissance (1965). J. Dan, "The Religious Experience of the Merkavah," Jewish Spirituality: From the Bible Through the Middle Ages (World Spirituality 13-14, ed. A. Green, 1986) 286-307. M. Idel, "The Conception of Torah in the Hekhalot Literature and Its Transforation in Kabbalah," Jerusalem Studies in Jewish Thought 1 (1981, Hebrew) 23-84; "Infinite of Torah in Kabbalah," Midrash and Literature (ed. G. H. Hartman and S. Budik, 1986) 141-58; Kabbalah: New Perspectives (1988); Studies in Ecstatic Kabbalah (SUNY Series in Judaica, 1988); Language, Torah, and Hermeneutics in Abraham Abulafia (SUNY Series in Judaica, 1989). Y. Liebes, Studies in the Zohar (SUNY Series in Judaica, 1993). D. C. Matt, "The Mystic and the Mitzvot," Jewish Spirituality: From the Bible Through the Middle Ages (ed. A. Green, 1986) 367-404. P. Schäfer, The Hidden and the Manifest God: Some Major Themes in Early Jewish Mysticism (1992). F. Secret, Les Kabbalistes chrétiens de la Renaissance (1964). G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1941, 1954); On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (1964, 1996); Kabbalah (1974). I. Tishby, The Wisdom of the Zohar (Littman Library of Jewish Civilization, 1989, 1991). H. Tirosh-Rothschild, "Continuity and Revision in the Study of Kabbalah," AJS Review 16 (1991) 161-92. C. Wirszubski, Three Studies in Christian Kabblah (1975, Hebrew). E. R. Wolfson, "Circumcision, Vision of God and Textual Interpretation: From Midrashic Trope to Mystical Symbol," History of Religions 27 (1987–88) 189-215; "Circumcision and the Divine Name: A Study in the Transmission of Esoteric Doctrine," JQR 78 (1987) 77-112; "Female Imagining of the Torah: From Literary Metaphor to Religious Symbols," From Ancient Israel to Modern Judaism (ed. J. Neusner, 1989) 2:271-307; "Beautiful Maiden Without Eyes: Peshat and Sod in Zoharic Hermeneutics," The Midrashic Imagination: Essays in Jewish Exegetical Creativity (ed. M. Fishbane, 1993); Through a Speculum That Shines: Vision and Imagination in Medieval Jewish Mysticism (1994).

H. TIROSH-SAMUELSON

KABISCH, RICHARD (1868–1914)

K. studied German and history at Greifswald and theology at Bonn. His licentiate thesis, with F. SPITTA, was on the sources of 4 Esra (2 Esdras 3-14). In 1893 he published a controversial book on the eschatology of PAUL (1893) for his habilitation, arguing that, just as eschatology was the driving motif of early Christianity, so also it was for Paul. Paul did not strive for the good for its own sake or believe only for the sake of belief, love only for the sake of love, hope only for the sake of hope. K. maintained that even more fervently than the original apostles, Paul fixed his eyes on the ends to be attained by the moral and religious life and depicted even more gloriously the crown that awaited the conqueror. All Paul's teachings, even justification by faith, depended on his belief that the great advantage Christians attain by faith in Christ is their ability to give a good account at their resurrection. Paul inherited and used Jewish apocalyptic ideas (see APOCALYPTICISM). Only the righteous will be raised from the dead, because through union with Christ they possess in the Spirit the material basis for their resurrection.

K.'s habilitation was never granted. The book was savagely reviewed by F. WREDE (TLZ 19 [1894] 131-38), who, although later acknowledging that K.'s emphasis was a corrective to the usual view, never withdrew his objections. However, K.'s book greatly influenced A. SCHWEITZER. K. died of wounds while leading a company at Flanders (October 1914).

Works: Das vierte Buch Esra auf seine Quellen untersucht (1889); "Die Quellen der Apokalypse Baruchs," JPT 18 (1891–92) 66-107; Die Eschatologie des Paulus in ihren Zusammenhängen mit dem Gesamtbegriff des Paulinismus (1893); "Die erste Seligpreisung," TSK 69 (1896) 195-215; "Die Entstehungszeit der Apokalypse Mose," ZNW 6 (1905) 109-34; Gottes Heimkehr: Die Geschichte eines Glaubens (autobiography, 1907).

Bibliography: G. Bockwoldt, R. K.: Religionspädagogik zwischen Revolution und Restauration (1976). A. Schweitzer, Paul and His Interpreters: A Critical History (1912) 58-63.

J. C. O'NEILL

KAHLE, PAUL (1875–1964)

Born Jan. 21, 1875 in Hohenstein, East Prussia, K. received his training in oriental and biblical studies at Halle. His 1898 dissertation under F. Praetorious dealt with textual and lexigraphical matters in the TARGUM of the Samaritan Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and established his lifelong interest in the text of the HB. After completing his licentiate in theology (1902), he served as chaplain in Rumania and then as pastor in Cairo (1903–8), where he became thoroughly familiar with Arabic language and culture. After a year in Jerusalem he was appointed Privatdozent for Semitic languages in Halle (1909), and in 1914 went to Giessen as ordinarius. His most productive period was during his tenure at the University of Bonn (1923–38), where he also directed the Bonn Oriental Institute. His protests against Nazi persecution of Jews forced his emigration at age sixty-three to England (1939), where he catalogued Arabic manuscripts in the Chester Beatty Collection, London, and the Bodleian Library, Oxford. His personal library and research materials remained in Bonn and were available to him only after the war. K. was Schweich lecturer of the British Academy in 1941; his well-known book on the Cairo Geniza was drawn from those lectures.

K. combined an extraordinary breadth of knowledge with creative insight and was remembered for his enthusiasm as a scholar and for his cordial hospitality as a teacher and colleague. A recognized authority in several areas of biblical scholarship, in every subject he entered he produced pioneering theories that have often proved fundamental for further work. His research into different systems of vowel pointing led him to identify the Ben Asher recension in Codex Leningradensis and to use it as the basis for the Biblia Hebraica. Since its initial edition in 1937 this standard edition of the HB has borne the inscription "Textus masoreticum curavit Paul E. Kahle." His study of fragments of the Pentateuch Targum from the Cairo Geniza convinced him that they were more representative of the Aramaic of first century Palestine, "the language of Jesus," than Targum Onkelos, whose origin, in K.'s view, was Babylonian. K.'s most controversial theory was his understanding of the origin of the Greek HB by a process similar to the development of the Targums. Contrary to the hypothesis of P. de LAGARDE, there was no Urtext; different geographical areas produced their own authorized translations to accompany readings from the Hebrew text. The more uniform text of the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) was a later product of the church. K.'s volume The Cairo Geniza, revised in 1959, detailed the significance of manuscripts from the Ezra Synagogue in Old Cairo and incorporated a number of K.'s theories; it has become a classic in studies of the history of the HB text.

Works: Textkritische und lexikalische Bemerkungen zum samaritanischen Pentateuchtargum (1898); Der masoretische Text des Alten Testaments nach der Überlieferung der babylonischen Juden (1902, 1996); Die arabischen Bibelübersetzungen (1904); Masoreten des Ostens (1913); Masoreten des Westens (BWANT 3, 2 vols., 1927–30); The Cairo Geniza (1947, rev. ed. 1959); Die hebräischen Hanschriften aus der Höhle (1951); Der hebräische Bibeltext seit Franz Delitzsch (1961).

Bibliography: M. Black, PBA (1965) 485-95. K.-H. Bernhardt, TRE 17 (1988) 524-25. O. Eissfeldt, KS 4 (1968) 215-18. H. S. Nyberg, In Memorian P. K. (BZAW 103, 1968) 1-2.

S. L. MCKENZIE

KÄHLER, MARTIN (1835–1912)

Born in Neuhausen, East Prussia, K. was educated at Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Halle and from 1867 was professor of systematic theology at Halle. In biblical studies his work on the historical JESUS (Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus [1892–1896²])—not mentioned in A. SCHWEITZER's famous work—criticized the life-of-Jesus movement and pointed out the more important concern:

to develop a new approach to the study of Jesus' life that would do justice to the fact that all the sources we have are testimonies of faith. These sources do not seek to portray Jesus as he was but what the authors believed about Jesus. None of them was written before Jesus died and, according to Christian faith, rose from the dead. Through K.'s work the distinction between historical and historic (historisch and geschichtlich) became a part of Jesus research. He also contributed to the theology of mission; his stress on the unfolding of ideas in the history of religions and his introduction of the term supra-historical have contributed to the vitality of biblical exegesis. In 1964 P. TILLICH welcomed the Kähler renaissance and credited him with making it possible for many persons to remain Christian theologians even though they doubted certain statements from the Bible or even harbored "radical doubts."

Works: Die Wissenschaft der christlichen Lehre (1883); The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic, Biblical Christ (1892–1896²; ET and introduction by C. E. Braaten with a foreword by P. Tillich, 1964); Geschichte der protestantischen Dogmatik im 19. Jahrhundert (ed. E. Kähler, 1962), bibliography, 292-307; Aufsätze zur Bibelfrage (ed. E. Kähler, 1967); Theologie und Christ: Erinnerungen und Bekenntnisse von M. K. (ed. A. Kähler, 1926) 1-234 contains K.'s autobiography for the years 1835–67).

Bibliography: C. E. Braaten, "M. K. on the Historic, Biblical Christ," The Historical Jesus and the Kerygmatic Christ: Essays on the Quest of the Historical Jesus (ed. C. E. Braaten and R. A. Harrisville, 1964) 79-105. M. Fischer, TPNZJ, 130-49. R. Hermann, RGG³ 3 (1959) 1081-84. H.-J. Kraus, TRE 17 (1987) 511-15.

W. KLASSEN

KAISER, GOTTLIEB PHILIPP CHRISTIAN (1781–1848)

In 1815 K. became Privatdozent and in 1816 professor at Erlangen. His work at the outset reflected a fairly radical approach to traditional doctrine, but between the appearance of the two parts of volume 2 (1814, 1821) of his Biblische Theologie he assented to Harms's Lutheran revival, which led to a notable incongruity in his work. His biblical THEOLOGY was an attempt to present Jewish and Christian religion in the context of the history of all religions. Starting from the assumption that nowhere is God without a witness, K. saw universalism as the means for overcoming both supernaturalist biblicism and rationalist moralism. In every religion there are stages of development and some truth, but no religion is yet the final religion.

K's use of bizarre terms, his sweeping use of parallels that were recognized as invalid, and the suddenly orthodox tone of the last part of his work meant that he received little attention in his day. However, his work showed solid virtues: a sense of the history of development and change within all religions along with the usefulness of comparative religion for biblical studies, the importance of the cultus for understanding the HB, a sympathetic understanding of MYTHOLOGY, and a rejection of pure moralism as an adequate basis for religion.

Works: Die Biblische Theologie oder Judaismus und Christianismus nach der grammatisch-historischen Interpretationsmethode, und nach einer freymütigen Stellung in die kritisch-vergleichende Universalgeschichte der Religion (vol. 1, 1813; vol. 2.1, 1814; vol. 2.2, 1821).

Bibliography: R. C. Dentan, Preface to OT Theology (1963²) 28-29. L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der Christlichen Kirche (1869) 713. H. J. Kraus, Die Biblische Theologie: Ihre Geschichte und Problematik (1970) 57-58. O. Merk, Die Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments in ihrer Anfangszeit (Marburger theologische Studien 9, 1972) 214-16. J. Sandys-Wunsch "C. P. H. Kaiser: La Théologie biblique et l'histoire des religions," RHPR 59 (1979) 391-96.

J. SANDYS-WUNSCH

KAISER, OTTO (1924–)

Born Nov. 30, 1924, in Prenzlau, north of Berlin, K. was drafted into the army immediately upon completion of gymnasium. Opting for a medical education, he divided his time (1943–45) between short stays at Berlin university and the eastern front, where he served mostly in field hospitals. The horrors of war made him think deeply about life, humanity, and God. After release from an American prison camp in June 1945, he transferred from medicine to theology; the former he thought cures symptoms while neglecting greater human plights. He spent 1946–60 at the university of Tübingen as a student, a professorial assistant, and a teacher. His major teachers in theology were H. Thielicke, G. Ebeling, and H. Rüchert; in philosophy, W. Weishedel; in ancient history and languages, H. Brunner, O. Rössler, and W. Otto; and in HB, E. Würthwein, K. ELLIGER, and A. WEISER. Both his dissertation and his Habilitationschrift were published in 1959.

K. taught at the university of Marburg from 1961 until his retirement in 1993. He engaged in broad academic scholarship with both students and faculty and was energetically involved in university politics and church affairs. From 1982 to 1992, he edited ZAW and BZAW. He supervised over twenty doctoral and habilitation dissertations and was fondly known as "Kaiser Otto." As a LITERARY critic he has influenced research on source and REDACTION CRITICISM of all three parts of the HB. He adhered to the main lines of traditional source analysis of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), although one of his students has dated the J source to the exilic period (C. Levin, Der Jahwist [FRLANT 157, 1993]). K. is known for his work on Isaiah and for his "conversion" to a late dating for Isaiah 6–9, reflected in the fifth edition of his commentary. His HB introductions have aided students and teachers in keeping abreast of scholarship. Throughout his career, K. has given special attention to ancient Near Eastern texts and religious history, an interest climaxing in his editorship of three massive volumes of ancient non-biblical texts (1982–96). Another special interest growing out of his philosophical inclinations, life experiences, and classical learning is wisdom texts and thought, both canonical and extra-canonical (see CANON OF THE BIBLE). This interest is reflected in his work on the books of Job, Qohelet, Sirach, etc. K.'s theological thinking has been liberal and open, yet anchored in Lutheran convictions about sin and atonement.

Works: Die mythische Bedeutung des Meeres in Ägypten, Ugarit, und Israel (BZAW 78, 1959, 1962²); Die königliche Knecht: Eine traditionsgeschichtlich-exegetische Studie über die Ebed-Jahwe-Lieder bei Deuterojesaja (FRLANT 70, 1959, 1970³); Isaiah 1–12 (ATD 17, 1960, 1981⁵; ET, OTL, 1972, 1983²); Isaiah 13–39 (ATD 18, 1973, 1983³; ET, OTL, 1974); Introduction to the OT (1969, 1984⁵; ET 1973); (with W. G. Kümmel), Exegetical Method: A Student's Handbook (1975⁵; ET 1981²); (with E. Lohse), Death and Life (1977; ET 1981); (ed.) Texte aus der Umwelt des Alten Testaments (3 vols., 1982–96); Ideologie und Glaube (1984); Von der Gegenwartsbedeutung des Alten Testamentes: G. S. zur Hermeneutik und zur Redaktionsgeschichte (ed. V. Fritz et al., 1984), contains K.'s bibliography, 201-11; Der Mensch unter dem Schicksal: Studien zur Geschichte, Theologie, und Gegenwartsbedeutung der Weisheit (BZAW 161, 1985); Grundriss der Einleitung in die kanonischen und deuterokanonischen Schriften des Alten Testaments (2 vols., 1992-94); Der Gott des Alten Testaments (1993).

Bibliography: V. Fritz et al. (eds.), Prophet und Prophetenbuch (FS O. K., BZAW 185, 1989). I. Kottsieper et al. (eds.), "Wer ist wie dir, Herr, unter den Göttern?" (FS O. K., 1994).

E. GERSTENBERGER

KAMPHAUSEN, ADOLF HERMANN HEINRICH (1829–1909)

Born Sept. 10, 1829 in Solingen, K. died Sept. 13, 1909 in Bonn. He studied theology in Bonn and habilitated there in 1855. Following some years as secretary to C. von BUNSEN in Heidelberg, he returned to Bonn in 1859, becoming ausserordentlicher professor in 1863, and in 1868 succeeded A. Köhler as full professor of OT. He retired in 1900.

K. was influenced theologically by R. Rothe, but his primary teacher was F. BLEEK. Like Bleek he was an industrious worker, surveying the entire literature of his field and evaluating it comprehensively and fairly; his own originality stood in the background. Because of his dry lectures he was not generally popular with students, but in German professorial chairs he had a series of grateful scholars: K. BUDDE, W. Rothstein, and R. SMEND.

More than some scholars of his generation, he managed to hold an impartial attitude toward the new orientation of HB scholarship, associated before and after 1870 with K. GRAF, A. KUENEN, and J. WELLHAUSEN. Although he recognized Wellhausen's greatness and followed his LITERARY criticism to a considerable extent, K. thought it was not necessary to diverge from the HB description of Israelite history as far as Wellhausen had. He believed the DECALOGUE derived from Moses and many psalms and proverbs from the monarchical period, and he had greater faith in the regnal years assigned the kings of Israel and Judah and also in the historical reliability of the chronicler than had Wellhausen. He maintained that David had been a vassal of Philistia during his reign at Hebron. Although regarding the book of Daniel as entirely unhistorical, supporting his position with the then-known cuneiform material, he assigned to the book a "truly prophetic content."

K's strongest interest lay in making the Bible popular again in relation to scholarship. To this aim he contributed to Bunsen's Vollständiges Bibelwerk für die Gemeinde (1858–70), including a large part of the HB translation and commentary as well as some on the NT. From 1871 to 1900 he belonged to the commission charged with revising LUTHER's translation of the Bible. He argued consistently for all changes he believed reproduced the basic text more accurately than Luther's translation but with limited success.

Works: Das Lied Moses: Deut 32:1-43 (1862); Das Gebet des Herrn (1866); Die Chronologie der hebräischen Könige: Eine geschichtliche Untersuchung (1883); "Philister und Hebräer zur Zeit Davids," ZAW 6 (1866) 43-97; Das Buch Daniel und die neuere Geschichtsforschung (1893); Die berichtigte Lutherbibel (1894); The Book of Daniel (SBOT 18, 1896); Das Verhältnis des Menschenopfers zur israelitischen Religion (1896); "Das zweite Buch der Makkabäer," APAT 1:81-119; "Die Bücher der Könige," HSAT(K) 1 (1909) 458-548.

Bibliography: K. Budde, *RE*³ 23 (1913) 726-31. J. Smend and E. Sachsse, Zur Erinnerung an Dr. A. K. (1909). R. Smend, "Adolf Kamphausen," BG, 92-102 = DATDJ, 85-98.

R. SMEND

KANT, IMMANUEL (1724–1804)

Born April 22, 1724, in Königsberg, East Prussia, the son of a saddler, K. was brought up in a pietistic home (see PIETISM) and was educated at the pious Collegium Fridericianum in his hometown (1732–40). From 1740 to 1746 he studied philosophy, mathematics, and, casually, theology at the University of Königsberg; after 1746 he worked as a tutor to some East Prussian families, until he received his MA and venia legendi in 1755. Appointed to a professorship for logic and metaphysics at the university in 1770, he never left his native Königsberg again. A famous and popular lecturer who served twice as the university's rector, he pursued his duties there until 1796. K. died Feb. 12, 1804. His fame spread during his lifetime, and his influence continues into the present. His critical philosophy changed the intellectual scene of central Europe, stopped the influence of developing skepticism, materialism, and atheism, prepared, against K.'s own intention, the way for German idealistic philosophy, and deeply influenced Protestant theology and biblical HERMENEUTICS.

Based on a statement in the preface to the second edition of K.'s Critique of Pure Reason (1781, 1787[3]), he is widely thought of as the executor of a "Copernican revolution" in the field of philosophy and especially in epistemology and at the same time as the destroyer of metaphysics. Philosophically trained in the context of Leibniz-Wolffian metaphysics, he came under the influence of Newtonian mechanics and the skeptical empiricism of D. HUME, whose discussion of causality roused him from his "dogmatic slumber." His later social and religious philosophy was influenced by J.-J. Rousseau. K. was not satisfied with skepticism and tried to give convincing and rational answers to the three basic questions: What can we know? What must we do? What may we hope?

Through phenomenological reduction and logical analysis K. came to the revolutionary conclusion that the empirical object is shaped by reason and not reason by the object; the object as a thing in itself remains unknowable. Our experience pertains only to phenomena, not to things as they are in themselves. But if the structure and laws of the phenomenological realm (the world of experience) have their basis in the structure and laws of reason, knowledge is possible; there is no need for skepticism. However, transcendence of the boundary of experience through theoretical argumentation is not possible.

Although the world of experience is governed by causality and thus human freedom cannot be proved logically, there remains the binding reality of practical reason. The categorical imperative, which commits one to act in accordance with a principle that one could will for all to follow, is the moral law human beings have to obey. In order to give meaning to human existence despite the lack of correspondence between moral dignity and happiness, K. thought it necessary to postulate the existence of a God who guarantees their correspondence in a future life. God, freedom, and immortality are, therefore, postulates of practical reason. Metaphysically, God is nothing else than a transcendental ideal with a regulative function regarding theoretical reason, an ideal that guarantees the unity of reality. Humanity belongs to two realms or kingdoms, that of causality and that of freedom; the two can coexist only if there is a possibility that the law of causality and the law of freedom can cooperate. The solution of God as transcendental ideal is reached partly by reflection on the necessity of teleology to explain the element of variety in the natural world, which is not explainable on the basis of mechanistic laws alone, and partly by reflection on the presence of harmony and disharmony in the realm of aesthetic experience. Both these indications point to a supersensory, supernatural, rational, and hence supreme and transmundane being.

The means and goals of human destiny are the moral behavior not only of the individual but also of a civil society shaped by a just constitution. Reason demands a republican constitution characterized by the division of power between the legislative and the executive branches of government. National law, international law, and cosmopolitan law limit and supplement one another on the basis of the liberty of the individual as a human being and the equality of independent citizens before the law. Wars and preparations for war force individuals and peoples toward the ultimate goal of a league of nations and toward an approximation of permanent peace. K. did not believe it possible to establish an earthly kingdom of God by social contracts or by power. Rather, a just society is possible only where humanity follows the ideal of an ethical community under a divine moral legislator. Its realization on earth is a visible church, its underlying truth an invisible one.

Throughout his life, K. maintained an ambivalent attitude toward religion. He was convinced of its necessity for a happy life and remained impressed by its moral values and demands, but he was repelled by the church's ceremonies and suspicious of its dogmatic teachings. Although he had doubts about the supranatural origin of the Bible, he thought it unwise to destroy its status in society. He did not develop a comprehensive religious philosophy; he only tried to show that the essence of the Bible is in accord with his own rational, ethical theology. As a result he called for a moral interpretation of the Bible in which the fall of humanity is necessary for the realization of freedom. Job is exemplary of a religion of the heart's honesty, and JESUS is the archetype of moral perfection.

Works: Critique of Pure Reason (1781, 1787[2]; ET ed. and tr. P. Guyer and A. W. Wood, 1998); Prolegomena to Any Future Metaphysics That Will Be Able to Come Forward as Science (1783; ET ed. and tr. G. Hatfield, 1997); Moral Law: Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (1785; ET 1992); Critique of Practical Reason (1787; ET ed., tr. and intro., M. Gregor and A. Reath, 1997); Critique of the Faculty of Judgment (1790; ET 1914[2]); Religion Within the Limits of Reason Alone (1793; ET 1960); Lectures on Ethics (1797; ET ed. and tr., P. Heath and J. B. Schmeerwind, 1996).

Bibliography: J. Bohatec, Die Religionsphilosophie K.s in der "Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft" (1938). P. Byrne, Natural Religion and the Nature of Religion (1989). K. Düsing, Die Teleologie in K.s Weltbegriff (KantSt E 96, 1968, 1986²). H. Heimsoeth, Transzendentale Dialektik: Ein Kommentar zur Kritik der reinen Vernunft (4 vols., 1966–). H. Heubült, Die Gewissenslehre K.s in ihrer Endform von 1797 (Conscientia 8, 1980). O. Kaiser, "K.s Anweisung zur Auslegung die Bibel," NZST 11 (1969) 126-38 = his Von der Gegenwartsbedeutung des Alten Testaments (1984) 47-60. G. Krüger, Philosophie und Moral in der Kantischen Kritik (1931, 1967²). O. Lempp, Das Problem der Theodizee in der Philosophie und Literatur des 18. Jahrhunderts (1910) 241-353. F. Lötzsch, Vernunft und Religion im Denken K.s (Böhlau Philosophica 2, 1976). J. C. O'Neill, The Bible's Authority: A Portrait Gallery of Thinkers from Lessing to Bultmann (1991) 54-65. H. J. Paton, K.'s Metaphysic of Experience (2 vols., 1936); The Categorical Imperative: A Study in K.'s Moral Philosophy (1948). B. M. G. Reardon, K. as Philosophical Theologian (1988). J. Schmucker, Dei Ontotheologie des vorkritischen K. (Kant St. E. 112, 1980). A. Schweitzer, Die Religionsphilosophie K.s (1899). K. Vorländer, I. K.: Der Mann und das Werk (1977²). A. Wood, K.'s Moral Religion (1970).

O. KAISER

KAPLAN, MORDECAI MENAHEM (1881–1983)

A rabbi, theologian, early pioneer in the struggle for the equality of women in Judaism, and founder of the Reconstructionist movement, K. grew up in a liberal orthodox family in New York. He was strongly influenced by E. Durkheim, J. Dewey, and M. ARNOLD, and to some extent by W. James and H. AHAD. Arnold and A. EHRLICH contributed to his approach to the HB. As a theologian, he staunchly rejected any "supernatural" understanding of God and any claim for a revealed text. Instead, he referred to God as the power or process that makes for salvation (i.e., for freedom, for personal and communal responsibility, and for fulfillment of creative potentials); he understood the Torah (including the HB) as a human, historically dependent attempt to reveal/understand God. His acceptance of biblical criticism, including PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, stood in sharp contrast with the positions of S. SCHECHTER and others.

K. held that Judaism, an ever-evolving religious civilization, should not attempt to maintain continuity by ascribing meanings to sacred texts that could not have been contemplated by their authors (i.e., transvaluation) and certainly not by forced harmonizations of texts. He claimed that the biblical text should be first understood "in the light of the total situation of which it was a part," so that the main ideas of the original writers could be abstracted and then translated into contemporary terms. These ideas should be reevaluated on the basis of the present needs for salvation: Some should be incorporated into modern Jewish theology, some relegated to ARCHAEOLOGY or even strongly condemned. (See The Meaning of God [1934, 1994²], particularly the introduction.)

Works: "Isaiah 6:1-11," JBL 45 (1926) 251-59; Judaism as a Civilization: Toward a Reconstruction of American-Jewish Life (1934, 1994⁵); The Meaning of God in Modern Jewish Religion (1937, 1994³); Judaism Without Supernaturalism: The Only Alternative to Orthodoxy and Secularism (1958); The Greater Judaism in the Making: A Study of the Modern Evolution of Judaism (1960); The Religion of Ethical Nationhood: Judaism's Contribution to World Peace (1970).

Bibliography: S. D. Breslauer, M. K.'s Thought in a Postmodern Age (South Florida-Rochester-St. Louis Studies on Religion and the Social Order 8, 1994). G. D. Cohen, "Bibliography of the Writings of Professor M. M. K.," M. M. K. Jubilee Volume (1953) 933. E. S. Goldsmith and M. Scult, Dynamic Judaism: The Essential Writings of M. M. K. (1985, 1991). E. S. Goldsmith, M. Scult, and R. M. Seltzer (eds.) The American Judaism of M. M. K. (1990), complete bibliography 415-52. W. E. Kaufman, Contemporary Jewish Philosophies (1976, 1985). R. Libowitz, M. M. K. and the Development of Reconstructionism (1983). M. Scult, Judaism Faces the Twentieth Century: A Biography of M. M. K. (American Jewish Civilization Series, 1991).

E. BEN ZVI

KARA, JOSEPH (c. 1060–?)

Biographical facts about K. are few. He lived in northern France, where he edited commentaries on the Piyyutim (Jewish liturgical chants) and commented on most of the books of the HB. His surname, Kara, is probably the Hebrew equivalent of the Latin lector—one who studies and teaches the Bible. A colleague-pupil of RASHI, K. was a source of inspiration for the Jewish exegetical school of medieval France, which interpreted sacred texts according to a method of literal exegesis, the peshat.

In a text that has become famous (on 1 Sam 1:17), K. proclaimed that literal exegesis, to live and be developed, ought to be liberated from MIDRASH. Even the midrashic explications of basic texts ought not to obscure the obvious sense of the text (e.g., on Exod 30:13). The essential rule of peshat is hilukh mikraot—the progression of verses, the interpretation that gives, at the end of the process, a coherent and plausible synthesis of the text taken as a whole (on Isa 42:4). K., like his friend and colleague Rashbam (see SAMUEL BEN MEIR), defined the rule of the "prolepsis": Sometimes the text furnishes a detail that is apparently superfluous but later proves to explain another text (e.g., on Exod 3:18). He also held that the chanting (cantillation) of a biblical text has an exegetical value (on Gen 15:13) and that miracles should be explained rationally (e.g., on Exod 17:11). More than his predecessors, K. was sensitive to form (on Ps. 92:3; Isa 34:6; Zechariah 9; 17). He participated actively in the Judeo-Christian religious controversy, sometimes explicitly (e.g., on Isa 33:13-14, according to the handwritten version; censored in the printed version) and often implicitly.

It seems that on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) K. wrote only notes, interpolated in certain manuscripts of Rashi's commentary (published separately by A. Berliner [1892]). The commentary on Job has been published in a critical edition by M. Ahrend (1986). The printed editions of K.'s other commentaries are often faulty and sometimes censored.

Works: Commentary on the Pentateuch (ed. A. Berliner, 1872); commentary on the prophets in Mikraot Gedolot (1897–99); commentary on Job (ed. M. Ahrend, 1986).

Bibliography: M. Ahrend, Le Commentaire sur Job de R. Yoseph Qara' (1978). M. Littmann, J. ben Simeon Kara als Schrifterklärer (1887). S. Japhet and J. M. Green, "The Nature and Distribution of Medieval Compilatory Commentaries in the Light of Rabbi J. K.'s Commentary on the Book of Job," The Midrashic Imagination (ed. M. Fishbane, 1993) 98-130. S. A. Poznanski, Kommentar zu Esechiel und den XII Kleinen Propheten von Eliezer aus Beaugency (1913) XXIII-XXXIX. A. Grossmann, "The Jewish-Christian Polemic and Jewish Biblical Exegesis in the Twelfth Century (on the attitude of R. J. Qara to polemic)," Zion 51 (1986) 29-60 (Hebrew).

E. TOUITOU

KARAITES

This Jewish sect originated in the eighth century CE and bore the name kara'im, which can mean either "scripturalists" or "callers" (propagandists) but more likely the former since they were also known as ba'alei ha-mikra (people of the Scriptures). Their distinctive characteristics were a denial of the AUTHORITY of rabbinic tradition embodied in the oral law and of such rabbinic works as the TALMUD, a reliance on the Bible as the sole valid source of authority in determining religious law, and a rigorously ascetic life-style.

The group traced its origin back to Anan ben David (8th cent.), a rabbinic scholar in Babylonia of aristocratic background who broke with the Rabbanite probably in the 760s. His followers claimed that he was "the first to bring to light a great deal of the truth about the scriptural ordinances" (Jacob al-Kirkisani, a 10th-cent. Karaite), while his opponents argued that his schism began when he was bypassed in favor of his younger brother for the office of exilarch. Attempts to trace a direct connection between his movement and earlier Jewish sects like the Sadducees or the DEAD SEA SCROLLS community have not been very successful, although clearly parallels do exist. Anan's Sepher ha-Mitzvoth (Book of Precepts) became the basis of later Karaite literature and law.

Anan's movement, the Ananites, attracted other dissidents opposed to the authority of the oral law and its official administrators and tradents, many perhaps influenced by dissident non-Jewish political groups opposed to the hegemony of Arab conquerors. By the second quarter of the ninth century, the diverse groups had adopted the name Karaite. The Karaites, still extant but never very numerous, spread throughout the Middle East and established a flourishing community in Jerusalem that was wiped out by the success of the First Crusade in 1099. New Karaite communities were established in the Byzantine Balkans, Cyprus, Spain, the Crimea, Lithuania, and Poland.

The Karaite movement produced a number of scholars and important exegetical works. The golden age of their literary activity was the tenth century, when they not only engaged in heated debate with their opponents but also produced works on religious law, commentaries, lexicography, and translations of the Bible into Arabic. During this period David ben Abraham al-Fasi produced LEXICONS, and Japheth ben Ali translated the Bible into Arabic and commented on the whole, earning the title "the Karaite Ibn Ezra."

During the second half of the thirteenth century, Karaites again produced significant biblical commentaries. The most important was Sepher ha-Mivḥar ve-tov ha-Mishar, completed in 1293 (printed in 1835) by Aaron ben Joseph ha-Rofe the elder (c. 1250–1320), a scholar and physician who lived and worked in Sokhet, the Crimea, and Constantinople. Primarily a literalist, Aaron used RASHI and at times resorted to midrashic interpretations. Another noteworthy Karaite commentary, Keter Torah, was authored by Aaron ben Elijah (c. 1328–69), a philosopher, jurist, and scholar who lived in Nicomedia, Turkey.

Although there was considerable diversity within the Karaite communities, this "protestant" Jewish movement sought as far as possible to base its legal rulings and religious law on Scripture alone. Like Christian Protestants, however, they were forced to recognize that the principle of sola scriptura is difficult to follow. Ideally, each Karaite interpreter was encouraged to personally read and interpret the Bible and to determine its meaning on the basis of the literal sense. However, the consensus of the community, conclusions based on allegory, and the use of human reason were acknowledged in varying degrees. Judah Hadassi, in his Eshkol ha-Kofer (begun c. 1148), sought to formulate hermeneutical rules for interpretation that parallel those attributed to HILLEL and ISHMAEL in the Talmud, although he argued that Ishmael's rules were similar to those found in Greek rhetoric.

The literalness and austerity of the Karaite approach to the Bible can be seen in their adherence to a stringent rather than a lenient interpretation of legal material. The sabbath was not celebrated as a joyous occasion, fires and artificial lights were usually prohibited, and sexual intercourse on the day was taboo. The demands of the lex talionis were understood literally rather than as requiring compensation, as has been characteristic of regular Judaism, except in the case of murder. Some Karaites held that the consumption of meat was prohibited following the destruction of the Temple. The range of prohibited marriages was extended beyond that of regular Judaism to include relatives of the wife as if they were blood kin, and regulations related to purity matters, especially those concerning menstruation, were stringent. Dates and festival celebrations differed somewhat from rabbinic Judaism.

Bibliography: Z. Ankori, Karaites in Byzantium: The Formative Years, 970–1100 (CSSSc 597, 1959). W. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jew (1957) 5:209-85, 388-416. Z. Cahen, The Rise of the Karaite Sect: A New Light on the Halakah and Origin of the Karaites (1937). J. Mann, "Early Karaite Bible Commentaries," JQR NS 12 (1921–22) 257-98; Texts and Studies in Jewish History and Literature, vol. 2, Karaitica (The A. and H. Oppenheim Memorial Publications, 1935). L. Nemoy (ed. and tr.), Karaite Anthology: Excerpts from the Early Literature (1952); EncJud 10 (1971) 761-82. A. Paul, Écrits de Qumran et sectes juives aux premiers siècles de l'Islam: Recherches sur l'origine du qaraïsme (1969). S. Poznanski, The Karaite Literary Opponents of Saadiah Gaon (1908). U. Simon, "The Karaite Approach: The Psalms as Mandatory Prophetic Prayers," Four Approaches to the Book of Psalms: From Saadiah Gaon to A. Ibn Ezra (1991) 59-111. N. Wieder, "The Qumran Sectaries and the Karaites," JQR 47 (1956–57) 97-112, 269-92; "The Dead Sea Scrolls Type of Biblical Exegesis Among the Karaites," Between East and West: Essays Dedicated to the Memory of B. Horovitz (ed. A. Altmann, 1958) 75-106; The Judean Scrolls and Karaism (1962).

J. H. HAYES

KARLSTADT, ANDREAS BODENSTEIN VON

(c. 1480–1541)

A student of arts at Erfurt and of theology at Cologne, K. was deeply influenced by the neo-Thomism of Capreolous. He joined the faculty of theology at Wittenberg in 1505 and was soon established as its leading member, being elected dean of the faculty in 1512. His growing association with LUTHER led to his rediscovery of AUGUSTINE's anti-Pelagian writings in 1517 (see PELAGIUS) and a new interest in the reform of theological studies at Wittenberg; however, K.'s increasing radicalism, evident from 1521 onward, led to alienation between the two Reformers.

K.'s early biblical interpretation as reflected in his theses of May 1518 stressed the priority of the literal sense of Scripture (in contrast to Luther's earlier priority on the tropological sense). K. defined the literal sense with reference to testamentary law: It is not the intention of the author that is of decisive importance (contra J. Gerson), but the text as written. This emphasis on the sensus legibilis can be seen as an important anticipation of the later Protestant tendency to base biblical exegesis rigidly on the written text, without regard to the circumstantiae scribentis. Perhaps his most celebrated biblical interpretation is his explanation of Matt 26:26, hoc est corpus meum. According to K., JESUS pointed to himself when speaking these words, thus "this" refers to the living earthly body of Jesus. K.'s work on the CANON constitutes the first Protestant introduction to the Bible, and in it he defended limiting the OT to the books of the HB, raised questions about Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), and defended the epistle of James against Luther's interpretation.

Works: De canonicis scripturis libellus (1520); De legis litera, sive carne, et spiritu (1521).

Bibliography: U. Bubenheimer, Consonantia Theologiae et Iurisprudentiae: A. B. K. als Theologe und Jurist zwischen Scholastik und Reformation (Jus ecclesiasticum 24, 1977); TRE 17 (1988) 649-57. E. Kähler, K. und Augustin: Der Kommentar des A. B. K. zu Augustin's Schrift "De spiritu et litera" (Hallische Monographien 19, 1952). H. Lietzmann, A. K.: Von Abtuhung der bilder und das Keyn bedtler vrinther den Christen Seyn sollen, 1522, und die Wittenberger beutelordnung (Kleine Texte für Vorlesungen und Übungen 74, 1911). H. P. Rüger, "K. als Hebräist an der Universität Wittenberg," ARG 75 (1984) 297-309. R. J. Sider, A. B. v. K.: The Development of His Thought, 1517–1525 (Studies in Medieval and Reformation Thought, 1974).

A. E. MCGRATH

KÄSEMANN, ERNST (1906–1998)

Born at Dahlhausen bei Bochum, K. studied at Bonn under Petersen, at Marburg under R. BULTMANN, and at Tübingen under A. SCHLATTER before becoming a pastor in the Evangelical Church. His university dissertations concerned the concepts of body and apostleship in Pauline thought (see PAUL). In 1938, after preaching on Isa 26:13 ("O LORD our God, other lords beside you have ruled over us, but we acknowledge your name alone"), he was arrested and detained in prison for four weeks, during which he worked continuously on his book The Wandering People of God. His church, with brass band, sang each Sunday outside the prison, "Awake, awake, O Germany, you have slept long enough!" This theme was to dominate later thinking about the church. During WWII he served as a soldier in France and Greece and afterward was professor at Mainz (1946), Göttingen (1951), and Tübingen (1959), retiring in 1970. His lectures were marked by evangelical passion and incisive thought. After completing his commentary on Romans (1973) he devoted himself to more popular writing and to social and political action. K. died Feb. 17, 1998.

1. History. K. followed the historical-critical method and was foremost in the so-called new quest for the historical JESUS. Against Bultmann he insisted that historical facts about Jesus prevent the church from giving central place to its own experience. The Gospels assert the lordship of Christ over his community. Historical study brings out differences within the NT CANON; therefore, only by critical investigation of historical setting can exegesis begin. There are two limitations: (1) Our limited knowledge of earliest Christianity makes many historical introductions to the NT fall within the genre of fairy tale. The pages of the NT have been finely combed by so many scholars for so long that we can hear the grass growing. (2) History can mislead. The baptism of Jesus implies that Jesus was John's disciple; the crucifixion implies that Jesus was a political activist; the resurrection stories imply that the physical survival of Jesus was central. None of these claims can be reconciled with the known teaching of Jesus and the proclamation of the earliest churches.

2. Theology. Historical criticism without theological reflection (Sachkritik) is merely playing with mirrors. The prime responsibility of the exegete is to think or, as LUTHER claimed, to suffer and to think. No scholar should offer merely a catalog of sources or of the conclusions of others. K.'s essays and his great Romans commentary present a profound analysis of Pauline thought, which may be briefly set out in a series of interrelated ideas and questions since conclusions are less important than the understanding of problems. The righteousness of God is described in antitheses: indicative and imperative, for believers only and for the cosmos, juridical and effective, present and future, sacramental and ethical, gift and service, subjective and objective genitive. The concept of righteousness as a power solves these contradictions and provides the key for Paul's anthropology as well. Paul's first question concerning any person is: What power does he or she serve? Against K. STENDAHL, K. insisted that saving history has a negative, not a constitutive, character. God's presence is seen in signs of the cross. In social action the righteousness of God breaks in on the world, bringing justice for the unjust. Power is always grace, and God's righteousness is effective in the charismata; all persons who believe receive the Spirit, who gives different gifts to each one so that all may find a place within the body. The gift cannot be separated from the Giver. Christian existence is worship in daily life marked by humility, which never ceases to depend on grace.

Whereas eschatology had been seen by others as redundant MYTHOLOGY, K. argued that apocalyptic (see APOCALYPTICISM) was the mother of Christian theology both for the Gospel writers and for Paul, who saw all Christian existence as determined by the crucified Lord, who was on his way to the parousia. The faith of Abraham was directed to the God of hope, a God who, in the great antitheses of Romans 4, justifies the ungodly, creates out of nothing, and raises the dead. The death of Jesus alone has saving power. The cross is not an episode in the story of the resurrection; the resurrection is an episode in the story of the cross. Sacraments, ministry, and ethics are determined by the cross.

In 1967, K. was involved in debate with fundamentalists concerning the resurrection; in Jesus Means Freedom, a small book written during three weeks in the hospital, he drew on the whole of the NT to elucidate the meaning of freedom under the cross. On several occasions he was drawn into ecclesiological controversy, for he found the apparent triumphalism of ecumenical theology inconsistent with the NT. His address "Unity and Variety in NT Ecclesiology" at Montreal in 1963 was taken as a criticism of this tendency, yet he saw the ecumenical movement as a necessary development from the study of the NT.

According to K., Paul's interpretation of Scripture was governed by the antithesis between letter and spirit. Letter is the divine law as the sum of its individual laws, while spirit is the energy of the eschatological new covenant or the divine power in opposition to the law of the old Mosaic covenant. It exercises a critical, discerning function toward Scripture, asking: What does this mean in the presence of Jesus Christ, who died for our sins, was raised for our justification, and is coming to judge us all? Sachkritik discerns the key issue in a mass of exegetical material. It cannot exist apart from logical thought and saves theology from encyclopedic pedantry. Criticism can lead to an insight into Johannine theology that makes sense of the whole: The Christian lives every day as at the first day of creation, totally dependent on the Word by which all things are made.

Major objections to K. have been directed to the historical parts of his non-Pauline work and to his finding Lutheran theology in Paul. The historical objections may be taken seriously; they belong to the enterprise that K. regarded as least secure. The theological objections often spring from the objector's concern for conclusions rather than problems and from deficiencies in the argument. The discussions of a canon within the canon and of the center of the NT have not taken seriously the endless ambiguity of these metaphors.

K.'s use of Sachkritik as a working principle is justified both by the historical fact that "new testament" initially referred to the gospel, not to a set of writings, and by the outstanding exegetical results he has produced. His great influence was acknowledged on his ninetieth birthday: As M. HENGEL put it, K. has dominated NT study in the second half of the twentieth century as Bultmann dominated the field in the first half.

Works: The Wandering People of God: An Investigation of the Letter to the Hebrews (1938; ET 1984); Essays on NT Themes (1960; ET, Studies in Biblical Theology 41, 1964); NT Questions of Today (1966; ET 1969); The Testament of Jesus: A Study of the Gospel of John in the Light of Chapter 17 (1966; ET, NT Library, 1968); Jesus Means Freedom (1968; ET 1969); Perspectives on Paul (1969; ET 1971); Commentary on Romans (1973; ET 1980); Kirchlich Konflikte 1 (1982[4]).

Bibliography: B. Ehler, Die Herrschaft des Gekreuzigten: E. K.s Frage nach der Mitte der Schrift (BZNW 46, 1986). P. Gisel, Vérité et histoire, La théologie dans la modernité E. K. (Theologie Historique 41, 1977). R. P. Martin, HHMBI, 500-505. E. F. Osborn, "Historical Critical Exegesis—Käsemann's Contribution," AusBR 19 (1971) 17-35. D. Way, The Lordship of Christ: E. K.'s Interpretation of Paul's Theology (OTM, 1990).

E. F. OSBORN

KAUFMANN, YEHEZKEL (1889–1963)

Born in the Podolia region of the Ukraine, K. studied at the yeshivah in Odessa and at Leningrad and received his PhD from the University of Berne (1918). Following graduation he lived in Berlin until he emigrated to Palestine in 1928. There he taught at the Re'ali School in Haifa until his appointment as professor of Bible at the Hebrew University (1949), where he served until his death.

K.'s first major work, Golah ve-Nekhar (Exile and Alienation), was a sociological study (see SOCIOLOGY AND HB STUDIES) of the sustaining powers of Jewish identity and religion throughout history under diaspora conditions. Convinced that religion was the motivating and shaping force of Jewish life, he devoted years of scholarly work to the origin of the Jewish religion and its manifestation in history—as the subtitle to his magnum opus (1937–57) indicates: "From the Days of Origin Until the Fall of the Second Temple" (although volume 4/2 on the post-Persian period was never written). This work was a conscious alternative to the conclusions reached by J. WELLHAUSEN and classical historical-literary study of the HB. Nonetheless, K. shared with classical criticism the view that the Torah (Pentateuch) must be studied along the lines of documentary source criticism: "Such of its findings as the analysis of three chief sources in the Torah (JE, P, and D) have stood the test of inquiry and may be considered established" (1960, 1).

While accepting some of the methodological approaches and conclusions of Wellhausenian criticism, K. differed radically on a number of strategic issues. (1) He held that universal monotheism was not a late phenomenon resulting from years of evolutionary development but was rather an early feature of Israelite faith without parallel in contemporary culture. (2) He argued that pagan MYTHOLOGY, in which the god or gods are subject to a meta-realm of being and law, was unknown in Israel. Not only was Israelite faith non-mythological, but also the Israelites had no real understanding of paganism, and the idolatry and foreign cults that appear in the HB are only vestigal or marginal elements. Even in the Hellenistic period Jewish assimilation to foreign religion was practically unknown. (3) While accepting the existence of three collections of laws in the Torah—the JE, P, and D codes—K. denied that these should be understood as dependent upon one another and as reflective of a linear development, arguing instead that they reflect separate and distinct literary growth. Similarly, the Torah and the prophetic literature differ radically and are independent of one another, with the Torah's being impervious to prophetic influence. Although both, like the law codes, have a common source—Mosaic monotheism—the prophets did not influence the formation of legal codes. All are varied, parallel expressions of a shared unified belief. (4) K. argued against the view that P presupposes a centralized cult limited to one locale. He denied the old formula, first expressed by J. GEORGE in 1835, that "what D advocates, P presupposes" and argued that P's wilderness tabernacle was identifable with any Israelite sanctuary and the camp with any sanctuary town. (5) He maintained that the P material in the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) is older than D, whose connection with Josiah's reform he accepted. "With Deuteronomy, the period of Torah literature came to an end, and the formation of the Torah book began" (1960, 175). (6) He believed the prophets represent a new height in Israelite religion, not as the creators of ethical monotheism but as a return to monotheism of the level of Moses and Joshua, with an emphasis on the primacy of morality. While advocating a conservative approach to the authenticity of prophetic material, K. recognized not only a deutero-Isaiah but also a proto- and deutero-Hosea. For K. classical PROPHECY does not develop into apocalyptic (see APOCALYPTICISM); the two are products of different ages and backgrounds.

Rather than completing his history of Israelite religion, K.'s final work was devoted to a renewed study of Joshua and Judges that reflected his lifelong interest in Jewish nationalism and the land. These books he considered to be pre-monarchic in origin, with some later additions and rearrangement, somewhat idealistic in outlook but generally correlating with historical reality. K. denied the existence of a DEUTERONOMISTIC

HISTORY, but he concluded that Joshua and Judges were written in an early deuteronomistic style.

Although K. overstated his theses at points, his work offers penetrating critiques of classical HB criticism as well as illuminating perspectives on many issues. Unfortunately, knowledge and use of his work have been rare among Christian interpreters.

Works: Golah ve-Nekhar (2 vols. in 4, 1929–30); Toledot ha-Emunah ha-Yisre'elit (4 books in 8 vols., 1937–57) = The Religion of Israel from Its Beginnings to the Babylonian Exile (abridgement and tr. by M. Greenberg of the first 7 vols. of 1-3, 1960) and History of the Religion of Israel, vol. 4, From the Babylonian Captivity to the End of Prophecy (1977); The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Canaan (1953; ET 1985²); "The Biblical Age," Great Ages and Ideas of the Jewish People (ed. L. W. Schwarz, 1956) 1-92; commentaries on Joshua (1959) and Judges (1962), Hebrew; Mi-Kivshonah shel ha-Yezirah ha-Mikra'it (1966).

Bibliography: J. Bright, Early Israel in Recent History Writing (SBT 19, 1956) 56-78. E. Green and H. M. L. Gevaryahu, EncJud 16 (1971) 1349-51. M. Greenberg, "Preface to the Reissue," The Biblical Account of the Conquest of Palestine (Y. Kaufmann, 1985²) 9-12. T. Krapf, Y. K.: Ein Lebens- und Erkenntnisweg zur Theologie der hebräischen Bible (SKI 11, 1990); Die Priesterschrift und die vorexilische Zeit: Y. K. vernachlässigter Beitrag zur Geschichte biblischen Religion (OBO 119, 1992). J. Levenson, "Y. K. and Mythology," Conservative Judaism 36, 2 (1982) 36-43. S. Talmon, "Y. K.'s Approach to Biblical Research," Conservative Judaism 25, 2 (1971) 20-28; Y. K. Jubilee Volume: Studies in Bible and Jewish Religion (1960) bibliography, 1-6 of Hebrew section.

J. H. HAYES

KAUTZSCH, EMIL FRIEDRICH (1841–1910)

Born at Plauen, Saxony, Sept. 4, 1841, K. studied at the University of Leipzig (1859–63) with J. TUCH in OT and later taught there (1869–71). He held chairs at Basel (1872–80), Tübingen (1880–88), and Halle (1888–1910). Twice he visited the Holy Land (1876, 1904), and his interest in Palestine led him to help found the Deutsche Verein für die Erforschung Palästinas in 1877. He was also an editor of the TSK (1889–1910). K. died at Halle, May 7, 1910.

Within HB studies K.'s contributions were concentrated in two areas. As a philologist he produced six editions of H. GESENIUS's Hebrew grammar (1878–1909), for which he developed an exercise book and a volume of paradigms and indexes. He published a grammar of biblical Aramaic (1884) and a study of the Aramaisms of the OT (1902); and he authored several word studies, e.g., of the derivatives of the root ṣdq (1881). As a translator of biblical and related materials, K. began with a translation of Genesis that included marginal indications of the sources to which the individual passages belonged (co-authored with A. Socin in 1888). Between 1890 and 1894 he brought out a complete translation of the OT in collaboration with ten leading German-language scholars, to which he contributed Isaiah 36–39, Jonah, Nahum, Psalms, Chronicles, and portions of Genesis–Numbers and Joshua. At the time of his death in 1910, he had almost completed a third edition of this work with greatly expanded notes and introductions. To complement it he also edited a collaborative, two-volume translation of the OT apocrypha and PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (1900), for which he translated 1 and 3 Maccabees and the Hebrew Testament of Naphtali. As an appendix to his OT translation he wrote a compact sketch of the history of the OT writings that he subsequently issued as a separate work (1897). Beyond the two areas just cited, K. also published popular works on biblical criticism and religious education and the OT's abiding religious and ethical values. After his death his son Karl edited his history of the religion of Israel (1911), an earlier English version of which had appeared in vol. 5 of Hasting's Dictionary of the Bible in 1904.

K. strongly aligned himself with J. WELLHAUSEN's conception of the formation of the OT writings, above all his exilic dating of the P material. His approach, like Wellhausen's, might be called literary-historical with a focus on identifying, dating, and characterizing the sources behind the present OT books. In this K., again like Wellhausen, concentrated on data internal to the OT itself, playing down, if not ignoring, the extra-biblical comparative material of which younger scholars of the history of religions school (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) made much more sustained use. In contrast to Wellhausen, however, K., an involved church member, was actively concerned with winning a hearing for the new criticism within the wider German Protestant community.

Works: Die Derivate des Stammes ṣdq im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauch (1881); Grammatik des Biblisch-Aramäisch (1884); (with A. Socin), Die Genesis mit äusserer Unterscheidung der Quellenschriften (1888; 1891²); (ed.), Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments (1894; 1909–10³); Abriss der Geschichte des alttestamentlichen Schrifftums (1897; ET 1899); (ed.), Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (1900); Die Aramäismen im Alten Testament untersucht (1902); Biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments (1911).

Bibliography: J. de Fraine, DBSup 5 (1957) 4-6. H. Guthe, "Zum Gedächtnis an E. K.," Mitteilungen und Nachrichten des Palästina-Vereins 33 (1910) 33-39; *RE*³ 23 (1913) 747-52. F. Kattenbusch, "Nekrolog für E. K.," TSK 83 (1910) 627-42. K. Kautzsch, BJDN 15 (1913) 133-39. H.-J. Zoebel, NDB 11 (1977) 376-77.

C. T. BEGG

KECK, LEANDER EARL (1928–)

K. was born Mar. 3, 1928, on a farm near Washburn, North Dakota, the oldest son of German Baptist immigrants from the Ukraine. A graduate of Linfield College, he attended Andover Newton Theological School (BD 1953), where he was encouraged to undertake advanced study of the NT by P. S. Minear, a major actor in the biblical THEOLOGY movement. At Yale University (PhD 1957; diss. "The Sojourn of the Savior: The Life of Jesus in Christian Gnosticism") he worked under P. Schubert, E. Dinkler, and M. BURROWS, with two semesters in Germany (1955–56), the first in Kiel, the second in Göttingen, where he studied with E. KÄSEMANN. His early formation as a scholar reflects the German influence common among young American theologians in the 1950s and 1960s (see his percipient introduction to the NIB, vol. 1, 1994).

After receiving his doctorate K. taught at Wellesley College, Vanderbilt Divinity School, and Candler School of Theology, where he chaired the division of religion in the graduate school before being called in 1979 to Yale as dean of the divinity school (1979–89) and Winkley Professor of Biblical Theology. Having spent influential sabbaticals in Tübingen, Cambridge, and Manila (where he taught at Union Theological Seminary), and having proved himself simultaneously as a sterling administrator, productive scholar, and dedicated churchman and pedagogue, K. retired from the Yale faculty in December 1997.

In addition to training doctoral students who now occupy chairs in leading universities and divinity schools, K.—ordained both as Baptist and as Disciple of Christ—has made enduring contributions both in technical studies of the NT (e.g., A Future for the Historical Jesus [1971, 1981]; "The Poor Among the Saints in the NT" [1965]; "Toward the Renewal of NT Christology" [1986]) and in books and articles that directly enrich the biblical, theological, and ethical life of the church (e.g., Taking the Bible Seriously [1962, 1969]; The Bible in the Pulpit [1978]; The Church Confident [the Beecher Lectures at Yale, 1993]). The broad range of his seminal publications and the influence of his widespread lecturing and preaching are appropriately reflected in his being elected to the presidency of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (1995) while chairing the editorial board of a major reference tool for preachers, the NIB. Forthcoming books include Jesus in NT Christology (based on the Shaffer Lectures at Yale), a commentary on Romans, and a volume of lectures on JESUS.

Works: Taking the Bible Seriously: An Invitation to Think Theologically (1962, 1969); Mandate to Witness: Studies in the Book of Acts (1964); "The Poor Among the Saints in the NT," ZNW 56 (1965) 100-129; "The Introduction to Mark's Gospel," NTS 12 (1966) 352-70; "The Poor Among the Saints in Jewish Christianity and Qumran," ZNW 57 (1966) 54-78; (ed. with J. L. Martyn), Studies in Luke–Acts (1966, 1980); "Bornkamm's Jesus of Nazareth Revisited," JR 49 (1969) 1-17; A Future for the Historical Jesus: The Place of Jesus in Preaching and Theology (1971, 1981); "Listening To and Listening For: From Text to Sermon," Int 27 (1973) 184-202; "On the Ethos of Early Christians," JAAR 42 (1974) 435-52; The NT Experience of Faith (1976); The Bible in the Pulpit: The Renewal of Biblical Preaching (1978); Paul and His Letters (1979, 1988); "Paul and Apocalyptic Theology," Int 38 (1984); "Toward the Renewal of NT Christology," NTS 32 (1986) 362-77; " 'Jesus' in Romans," JBL 108 (1989) 443-60; The Church Confident (Beecher Lectures, Yale, 1993); "Paul as Thinker: The 'How' and the 'Why' of What He Said About Jesus and Reality," Int 47 (1993) 27-38; "What Makes Romans Tick?" Pauline Theology, vol. 3, Romans (ed. D. M. Hay and E. E. Johnson, 1995) 3-29; "Rethinking 'NT Ethics,' " JBL 115 (1996) 3-16 (1995 SBL presidential address); "Searchable Judgments and Scrutable Ways: A Response to P. J. Achtemeier," Pauline Theology 4 (ed. D. M. Hay and E. E. Johnson, 1997); "What, Then, Is NT Christology?" Who Do You Say That I Am? (ed. M. A. Powell and D. R. Bauer, 1999).

Bibliography: M. E. Boring, The Disciples and the Bible: A History of Disciples Biblical Interpretation in North America From Campbell and Stone to Craddock and Keck (1997). B. S. Childs, "L. E. K.: A Tribute," The Future of Christology: Essays in Honor of L. E. K. (ed. A. J. Malherbe and W. A. Meeks, 1993) xix-xxi. G. Pauls, "Works by L. E. K.," ibid., 239-46.

J. L. MARTYN

KEIL, CARL FRIEDRICH (1807–88)

K. was born Feb. 26, 1807, in Lauterbach (Vogtland/Saxony). He studied theology at the University of Dorpat (Tartu, Estonia, 1827–30), where he was introduced to neo-Lutheran, confessional theology centering around a personal faith in Christ and a supra-naturalistic understanding of divine revelation. He studied at the University of Berlin with E. HENGSTENBERG and A. Neander (diss., "Apologia Mosaicae, Traditionis de Mundi Hominumque Originibus Exponentis," 1838; Dr. theol., 1839). Returning to Dorpat, K. served as Privatdozent (1833–38) and professor of biblical exegesis (1839–59). On retiring he settled in Leipzig and worked with Franz DELITZSCH on the influential Keil-Delitzsch Biblical Commentary. K. died May 5, 1888.

In Dorpat, K. completed H. HÄVERNICK's Handbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1849, 1854, 1856). His dogmatic-confessional approach (kirchlich-konfessionell) is particularly evident in the Pentateuch volume (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), which was to serve as a refutation of the source-hypothesis of J. ASTRUC, J. G. EICHHORN, and K. ILGEN. K. argued that traditional interpretations of the text, especially those standing in closer historical proximity to the depicted events, should be given precedence over evidence that can only indirectly be derived from the text itself. The two names of God (Yahweh and Elohim) could be more simply explained as aspects of the deity and should therefore be viewed as a theological issue rather than a LITERARY-critical problem. K. intended his own introduction to the OT (Manual of Historical-critical Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the OT, published in 3 eds., 1853, 1859, 1873; ET 1870) as a dogmatic-confessional alternative to W. DE WETTE'S textbook and as the OT counterpart to Guericke's NT introduction.

K.'s study of Israel's social and political institutions (called "biblical archaeology" in his time) is represented in his Manual of Biblical Archaeology (1858/59). He argued that, contrary to pagan MYTHOLOGY based on a misguided deification of natural forces, Israel's social and religious institutions reflect a primarily ethical community, guided by rational Mosaic legislation.

The Keil-Delitzsch Biblical Commentary series (1861–75) was an attempt to unite academic and homiletical concerns and to serve as a "positive" alternative to Hirzel's Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch, which dominated much of rationalist biblical scholarship at the time. Although Delitzsch is arguably the better known of the two scholars, K. produced the majority of the volumes: Genesis–Esther and Jeremiah–Malachi. The commentary used philological and historical insights gained by historical-critical exegesis, while remaining faithful to a revelation-based theology and being pragmatically oriented toward homiletical use by Lutheran pastors. K.'s dogmatic-confessional theology is evident in all of his commentaries. He strongly supported Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch and rejected attempts to explain extraordinary events in the history of Israel as anything but miraculous, divine intervention. K. showed much interest in the historical development of divine revelation. Viewing the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) as persons who were able to perceive future trajectories of God's saving acts, he presented history and revelation as interdependent rather than fundamentally dissimilar. Prophetic predictions then find their fulfillment in the historical person of Christ.

The same view of history and revelation is evident in K's commentary on the books of the Maccabees (1875). He did not view 1–2 Maccabees as canonical (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) but nonetheless considered them a valuable historical bridge between the revelations of the OT and the NT.

In his last years K. wrote commentaries on the Gospels and several epistles (1877–85), but unlike his exegesis of the OT, his writings on the NT attracted little attention among scholars. His most lasting contribution to biblical studies remains his work on the Keil-Delitzsch Biblical Commentary series. Translated into English shortly after its publication in German, it was influential for many years in conservative German and English-speaking scholarship.

Works: Apologetischer Versuch über die Bücher der Chronik und die Integrität des Buches Esra (1833); Über die Hiram-Salomonische Schiffahrt nach Ophir und Tarsis: Eine biblisch-archäologische Untersuchung (1834); Der Tempel Salomos: Eine archäologische Untersuchung (1839); Commentary on the Books of Kings (1846; ET 1858); Commentary on the Book of Joshua (1847; ET 1857); Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in die kanonischen und apokryphen Schriften des Alten Testamentes (1853, 1859^2, 1873^3); Handbuch der biblischen Archaologie (2 vols., 1858–59, 1875^2); Commentar über das Evangelium des Matthäus (1877); Commentar über das Evangelium des Markus und Lukas (1879); Commentar über das Evangelium des Johannes (1881); Commentar über die Briefe des Petrus und des Judas (1881); Commentar über den Brief an die Hebräer (1885); "Die Voraussetzungen und die Argumente der neueren Kritik des Alten Testament," ZWL 5 (1885) 169-81, 225-42.

Bibliography: E. Beyreuther, NDB 11 (1977) 406. P. Siemens, C. F. K.: Leben und Werk (1994).

A. SIEDLECKI

KENNICOTT, BENJAMIN (1718–83)

K.'s fame rests principally on the great collation of medieval manuscripts of the HB he achieved as a canon of Christ Church and published as the Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum (2 vols., 1776, 1780). His powers as a Semitic scholar and his critical sharpness had earlier been demonstrated, especially in Two Dissertations (1747).

The annual accounts K. published gave firsthand information on how he conceived his Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum, the stages of its progress from 1760 to 1769, and the final objectives he had in view. He set in motion an ambitious work of international cooperation, so that manuscripts were collated in such places as Rome, Florence, Turin, Milan, Paris, Berlin, Hamburg, and Madrid as well as at Oxford. In his report for the year 1763 he revealed knowledge of 460 manuscripts of the HB, 124 in England and 336 abroad. An even larger number of manuscripts and printed editions, either collated or selectively collated, is given in the second volume of Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum. K.'s collation, like that of G. de ROSSI (Variae Lectiones Veteris Testamenti, 4 vols., 1784–88) was concerned only with the consonantal text, and the text he printed as the foundation for his collation was one that had been published in Amsterdam in 1705, edited by E. Van der Hooght. In omitting points and Masorah he was no doubt influenced by his strong anti-Masoretic bias. However, he was following the example of C. Houbigant's Biblia He- braica of 1753 and the rationale of making the consonantal Hebrew text a point of departure, as opposed to simply accepting the Masoretic vocalization as the only possible interpretation of the consonantal text, fully stated by R. SIMON in his Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament (1678). Although K.'s method of recording variants was free of theological influence, it was critically undiscerning; and S. DAVIDSON seized on the insignificance of most of the variants in his Lectures in Biblical Criticism (1839). K. had unreal expectations of recovering the "original text," essentially because he did not know enough about the history of the MT. Davidson, too, was without this knowledge; but he had had leisure to consider the collations of K. and de Rossi and had discerned that instead of assisting the recovery of a text different from that of J. ben Chaiyim they showed the general conformity of all manuscripts to that text.

K.'s final objective was to recover the original, inerrant HB in the interests of the inspired truth he believed it to contain. He had a fundamentalist view of the inerrancy of the Bible, but he was regarded as a dangerous radical by those who were convinced that biblical truth was fully and finally expressed in the KJV and who viewed his proposal to recover a more perfect Hebrew text and to make an English translation of it as subverting the foundations of their Christian faith.

Works: Two Dissertations (1747); (ed.) Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum (2 vols., 1776, 1780).

Bibliography: W. P. Courtney, DNB 31 (1892) 10-12. W. McKane, "B. K.: An Eighteenth-Century Researcher," JTS 28 (1977) 446-64.

W. MCKANE

KENYON, KATHLEEN MARY (1906–78)

A noted archaeologist, K. was born Jan. 5, 1906. She was educated at Somerville College, Oxford, was lecturer in Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY at the University of London (1948–62), and principal of St. Hugh's College, Oxford (1962–1973). In addition to the BA and MA, she acquired the LittD and LHD degrees; she was a fellow of the British Academy and also of the Society of Antiquaries. K. died Aug. 24, 1978.

K.'s interest in archaeology derived from her excavation of Romano-British sites; however, she is justly famous for her archaeological excavations in Palestine. These started with excavations at Samaria (Sebaṣṭiyeh) from 1931 to 1934, and in this connection she was a contributor to the volumes Samaria-Sebaste 1 (1942) and 3 (1957).

Her most famous work was at Jericho (Tell es-Sultan), where she directed excavations from 1952 to 1958. Earlier scholars had dug at Jericho but none with K.'s thoroughness and precision. Of most relevance to biblical studies was establishing that the wall J. GARSTANG had supposed to be the Late Bronze Age wall that fell to Joshua was in fact an Early Bronze Age wall. There was very little occupation at Jericho during the Late Bronze Age, and certainly no wall. K. produced a good, popular exposition entitled Digging Up Jericho (1957) and two volumes of excavation reports (vols. 1–2, 1960, 1965), but much of the results of her work were to be published posthumously (vols. 3–5, 1981, 1982, 1983).

K.'s last important excavations in Palestine were in Jerusalem (1961–67), especially on the site of Ophel (the original biblical Jerusalem). Here again K. was able to further scholarly understanding. She discovered the original city wall dating from MB II (c. 1800 BCE) halfway down the eastern slope. Accordingly, the entrance to Warren's shaft, leading to the water supply at the Gihon spring, would have been inside the city, as seems natural. It had previously been supposed that the original wall had been at the crest of the hill, where Macalister's "tower of David" and "Jebusite ramp" are to be found. K. established, however, that the former is in fact Hasmonean and is built over seventh-century BCE houses destroyed in 586 BCE. The "Jebusite ramp" she supposed to be even later than the tower, but Y. Shiloh's subsequent excavations have proved that it descends below the seventh-century BCE houses and so must be earlier. K. adopted a "minimalist" view of the size of preexilic Jerusalem, envisioning the city as smaller than N. Avigad, as other Israeli scholars believed; thus, she held the pool of Siloam to be outside the city. She also excavated in the Armenian gardens and the Muristan.

Although K. lacked the philological and biblical scholarship of W. F. ALBRIGHT or R. de VAUX, she was an outstanding field archaeologist. Her precise, careful method of stratigraphical digging, involving deep trenching and balks, which she inherited from M. Wheeler (the Wheeler-Kenyon method), is justly renowned.

Works: (contr.) Samaria-Sebaste 1 (1942) and 3 (1958); Beginning in Archaeology (1952); Digging Up Jericho (1957); Archaeology in the Holy Land (1960, 1979⁴); Excavations at Jericho (vols. 1–2, 1960, 1965; vols. 3–5 ed. T. A. Holland, 1981, 1982, 1983); Amorites and Canaanites (1963 Schweich Lectures, 1966); Jerusalem: Excavating 3,000 Years of History (1968); Royal Cities of the OT (1971); Digging Up Jerusalem (1974); The Bible and Recent Archaeology (1978; rev. by P. R. S. Moorey, 1987); Excavations in Jerusalem, 1961–67 (vol. 1 ed. A. D. Tushingham et al., 1985; vol. 2 ed. H. J. Franken and M. L. Steiner, 1990).

Bibliography: P. R. S. Moorey, "K. K. and Palestinian Archaeology," PEQ 111 (1979) 3-10. P. R. R. Moorey and P. J. Parr, Archaeology in the Levant: Essays for K. K. (1978); P. J. Parr, DNB Sup. 9 (1986) 463-64. A. D. Tushingham, PBA 71 (1985, pub. 1986) 555-82.

J. DAY

KEPLER, JOHANNES (1571–1630)

An astronomer, mystic, and mathematician, K. was born Dec. 27, 1571, at Weil der Stadt in Württemberg. He attended the seminary at Maulbroon, where he displayed proficiency in both Latin and Greek, and was sent to Tübingen. There his intense personal piety and growing interest led him to enroll in the faculty of theology. Thus he came under the tutelage of M. Mastlin, an astronomer, mathematician, and former village pastor.

Matlin privately introduced K. to the thought of Polish astronomer N. Copernicus (1473–1543), whose heliocentric theory of the universe was beginning to draw opposition in various Christian circles. Taking the MA in August 1591, K. emerged from Tübingen convinced of the certainty and mystical perfection of the Copernican system and set out to understand and articulate its precise ramifications. Working with the greatest observational astronomer of the time, T. Brahé (1546–1601), K. the theoretician was able to establish the foundational laws of planetary motion. He died at Ratisbon Nov. 15, 1630.

K.'s deep sense of religious devotion, coupled with his growing assimilation of the Copernican system, led him to attempt the reconciliation of the demands of faith with the rational proofs and empirical evidences of the new science. Amid the controversy, he felt himself poised between the Scylla of holy Scripture and the Charybdis of scientific truth, for such matters were of vital importance to him: "Religion is for me a serious affair, which I cannot treat with levity." He worked to produce a means of demonstrating the compatibility of the Copernican worldview with the Bible. Remaining true to his Lutheran background, he undertook a careful exegesis of several biblical passages that had been used to raise questions about the Copernican theory. On Josh 10:12-15, he suggested that Joshua's situation demanded an active, immediate response from God, not an impromptu lesson in astronomy. Thus he stated that God understood Joshua's wish and stopped the movement of the earth so that to Joshua the sun seemed to stand still. K.'s exegesis of Psalm 104 demonstrated a keen awareness of the problems to be confronted by later critical methods; he moved to demarcate the spheres of the physical and the spiritual, the reasoned from the religious. Psalm 104 had been seen as proof positive of the immobility of the earth and the fixedness of the heavens. However, K. observed that "the Psalter is far removed from the contemplation of physical causes." For him the purpose of Scripture is not physical demonstration of causal relationships, but rather spiritual affirmation of the power and perfection of God the divine geometer. To see the Bible as a scientific text is grossly to miss its purpose—namely, to bring human beings into a proper relationship with God the creator.

K.'s approach was representative of Copernican apologetics for many years to come. True to his mystical sensibilities, he saw a complementary sacredness in the truth of both science and Scripture in their respective testimonies to the creative power of God. Interestingly enough, he felt that astronomy could be of benefit in defending the claims of Scripture. His 1606 work De Jesu Christi Servatoris Nostri Vero Anno Natalino is an excellent example of his synthesizing abilities. Reflecting on the supernova of 1604, he suggested that exactly such a phenomenon could account for the biblical stories of the magi and the star of Bethlehem. He does not seem to have explained the star as the consequence of the conjunction of Mars, Saturn, and Jupiter in the sign of Taurus, as is widely assumed.

Works: J. K.s Gesammelte Werke (5 vols., ed. M. Caspar, 1938–53).

Bibliography: C. Baumgardt, J. K.: Life and Letters (1951). M. Caspar, Bibliographia Kepleriana (1936, 1968²); Johannes Kepler (1948; ET 1959). G. A. Deissmann, J. K. und die Bibel: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Schriftautorität (1894). J. Hubner, Die Theologie J. K. zwischen Orthodoxie und Naturwissenschaft (BHT 50, 1975). D. Hughes, The Star of Bethlehem Mystery (1979). H. Karpp, "Der Beitrag Keplers und Galileis zum neuzeitlichen Schriftverständnis," ZTK 67 (1970) 40-55. T. Kuhn, The Copernican Revolution: Planetary Astronomy in the Development of Western Thought (1957) 209-19. D. C. Lindberg and R. L. Numbers, "Beyond War and Peace: A Reappraisal of the Encounter Between Christianity and Science," CH 55 (1986) 338-54. MSHH 38 (1737) 28-54. A. J. Sachs and C. B. F. Walker, "K.'s View of the Star of Bethlehem and the Babylonian Almanac for 7/6 BC," Iraq 46 (1984) 43-55. K. Scholder, The Birth of Modern Critical Theology: Origins and Problems of Biblical Criticism in the Seventeenth Century (1966; ET 1990) 54-58. G. E. Tauber, Man and the Cosmos (1979) 112-27.

D. HARNDEN-WARWICK

KIERKEGAARD, SØREN AABYE (1812–55)

K. is remembered as a Danish theologian and philosopher, but his life's work is misunderstood if he is not also seen as an exegete. Interpreters have noted his identification with PAUL and JESUS in his self-description as "an exception," "the individual," and a "suffering servant." Although K. never wrote about exegesis or HERMENEUTICS, he practiced a principle of imitation through imaginative identification (see P. Minear and P. Morimoto [1953] 9-10). He read Scripture daily for the purpose of spiritual discernment. In a time when the search for a historically probable element in the Bible influenced hermeneutics, he persisted in seeking the truth in Scripture by identifying with both the writers of books of the Bible and their subjects.

K. intended his philosophical work as a response to Hegelian idealism. It is less well known that he was acutely aware of the effects of idealism on biblical interpretation and preaching. In his early work Fear and Trembling (1843), he castigated the "pious and kindly exegete" who used knowledge to reduce the demand of NT discipleship to the drivel of a "tasteful explanation" (82-83). K. opposed all orators, pastors, philosophers, and theologians who claimed to go "beyond faith." The themes of his books emerged from intellectual and personal issues pursued during an extended period of study at the University of Copenhagen (1830–40) and an intensely personal investigation of the differences between philosophy and Christianity and between Judaism and Christianity.

As early as November 1835 he noted that it is the doctrine of sin that distinguishes Christianity from philosophy. Three months later the observation took on a more personal meaning with his insight that sin, manifest as doubt, is inherent in temptation. He considered it deeply ironic that the philosopher who seeks to reveal the truth about God without reference to Scripture is unaware of his or her own cognitive defects. K. came to this conclusion through an exegesis of Gal 3:19–4:8 that convinced him that Christian faith is known only by going through the motions; hence Christians cannot work out their own salvation by way of a historically prior position, the law of Judaism. Neither can they "go beyond" Christian faith.

Themes pursued in both K.'s philosophical and his biblical studies between 1835 and 1839 indicate that he was simultaneously working out the distinction between Judaism and Christianity and the exegetical relationship between the OT and the NT. The intellectual milieu in which he studied was one with a growing sense that the church and the NT were under attack by exponents of Hegel's system who were engaged in biblical studies. The quest for the historical Jesus crystallized around the 1835 publication of D. F. STRAUSS's Life of Jesus. K. concluded that the resolution to the theological issue posed by the quest was located in the attitude with which a reader approached Scripture. Anyone genuinely concerned with the life-and-death issue of salvation would come to the Bible ready to learn faith through imitation of the Jesus presented in the Gospels. Faithful exegesis of Scripture depended on the same attitude of personal receptivity; this perspective presupposed that Jesus is contemporary to faith in any age through the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit.

A personal experience of "indescribable joy" in May of 1838 confirmed his belief that the Spirit of the Christ is immediately available to faith (the Journals of Kierkegaard [1959] 59). This is the rare but real "instant" of religious experience in which God comes to those who are constant in seeking self-knowledge through immersion in Scripture. Such an experience is not the immediacy of religious intuition assumed by Hegelians to be the basis of faith. Rather, it is the immediacy of faith given to those who follow the Christ through descent into the hell of self-recognition through repentance.

K. concluded from his practice of spiritual discernment that it was not God's will for him to become a pastor. Instead, he wrote a series of books intended to awaken serious spiritual questing among persons unaware that the alienating and distorting power of sin creates a chasm between the human and the divine—i.e., among persons unaware of the truth in Scripture.

Works: Fear and Trembling: A Dialectical Lyric (1843; ET 1939); The Sickness Unto Death (1849; ET 1941); For Self-examination and Judge for Yourselves! And Three Discourses, 1851 (ET 1941); The Journals of K. (ed. and tr. by A. Dru, 1958).

Bibliography: S. M. Emmanuel, K. and the Concept of Revelation (1996). J. F. Fishburn, "S. K., Exegete," Int 39 (1985) 229-45. P. S. Minear and P. S. Morimoto, K. and the Bible: An Index (Princeton Pamphlets 9, 1953). L. J. Ross, HHMBI, 330-36. N. Thulstrup and M. M. Thulstrup (eds.), K.'s View of Christianity (Bibliotheca Kierkegaardiana v.i, 1978). H. C. Wolf, K. and Bultmann: The Quest for the Historical Jesus (Augsburg Publishing House Theological Monograph, 1965).

J. F. FISHBURN

KIMHI, DAVID (c. 1160–c. 1235)

Known by his acronym Radak, K., the son of J. KIMHI, was one of the most outstanding Jewish grammarians, lexicographers, and biblical commentators of his day; his work has exerted important influence on many later Jewish and Christian interpreters. Born in Narbonne, Provence, into a family of significant Jewish scholars and teachers, he became a teacher and engaged in several disputes, primarily in defense of RASHI and MAIMONIDES.

K.'s contribution to biblical studies was in the areas of Hebrew grammar, philology, and biblical exegesis. His philological treatise Mikhlol was divided into two parts (Ḥelek ha-Dikduk, sometimes called Mikhlol, and Ḥelek ha-Inyan, or Sefer ha-Shorashim); the former treated Hebrew grammar, the latter was a LEXICON. In the grammar (first printed in 1525; see W. Comsky's translation [1952]), K. built upon the work of earlier Jewish grammarians, providing better organization of the material, and popularized the work of his father and his older brother M. KIMHI, who was his guardian after his father's death. K.'s contribution included differentiation between waw consecutive and was conjunctive and his description of Hebrew vowels dagesh lene and the niphal stem as passive of the qal. His lexicon (Book of Roots, first printed in 1479; ed. J. Biesenthal and F. Lebrecht, 1847, repr. 1966) like the grammar became the basis of most subsequent Hebrew study and was used by J. REUCHLIN, S. MÜNSTER, and S. PAGNINUS, through them influencing the KJV.

K. wrote commentaries on Chronicles, Psalms, the former prophets (Joshua–2 Kings), and the latter prophets (Isaiah–Malachi). Although K. gave the plain sense of the text (peshat), he also drew upon rabbinic traditions, which stressed more homiletical and theological (derash) interpretations, at least for added interest. Much of his exegesis offers clear and even polemical alternatives to Christian readings, for example on the Immanuel text in Isaiah 7.

K. also wrote esoteric or allegorical interpretations of Ezekiel 1 and Gen 2:7–5:1 (the latter published in an appendix to L. Finkelstein [1926] liii-lxxiv). His other commentaries have been published in various editions of the RABBINIC BIBLE; for example, J. BUXTORF the elder included all the prophets (Joshua–Malachi) and the books of Chronicles in his Biblia Rabbinica (4 vols., 1618–20). Since Rashi's comments on the prophets were not overly extensive, K.'s commentaries on these books were the most popular of the medieval Jewish exegetes. His interest in the Masorah and the preservation and transmission of the text is evident in his Mikhlol, and his remarks on this topic were assembled out of the larger work into Et Sofer as a handbook for copyists. He proposed that qeri/ketib readings represented alternative texual traditions, both of which the members of the Great Synagogue chose to retain.

Works: Preface to the Psalms (n.d.); Commentar zur Genesis von Rabbi D. K. (ed. A. Ginzburg, 1842); K.'s Sefer ha-Shorashim (ed. J. Biesenthal and F. Lebrecht, 1847); The First Book of the Psalms (ed. S. M. Schiller Szinnesy, 1883) Hebrew; Commentary of D. K. on the Book of Psalms (ed. A. W. Greenup, 1918); The Longer Commentary of Rabbi D. K. on the First Book of Psalms (tr. R. G. Finch, 1919); The Commentary of D. K. on Isaiah (Columbia University Oriental Studies 19, ed. L. Finkelstein, 1926) Hebrew; Der Kommentar des D. Qimchi zum Propheten Nahum (ed. W. Windführ, 1927); The Commentary of Rabbi D. K. on Psalms (42–72) (ed. S. I. Esterson, 1935) = HUCA 10 (1937–38) 309-443; Rabbi D. K.'s Commentary on the Prophecies of Zechariah (ed. A. M'Caul, 1937); "Critical Edition of the [K.'s] Book of Amos" (S. Berkowitz, diss., Cambridge, 1939); Die Kommentar von Raschi, Ibn Ezra, Radaq, zu Joel (ed. and tr. G. Widmer, 1945); The Commentary of Rabbi D. K. on the Fifth Book of Psalms (107–150) (ed. J. Bosniak, 1951); D. K.'s Hebrew Grammar (Mikhlol) Systematically Presented and Critically Annotated (ed. W. Chomsky, 1952); "The Commentary of Rabbi D. K. on the Book of Joshua" (N. Goldberg, diss., Columbia University, 1961) Hebrew; The Commentary of Rabbi D. K. on Hosea (ed. H. Cohen, 1966); The Commentary of Rabbi D. K. on Psalms CXX–CL (ed. J. Baker and E. W. Nicholson, 1973).

Bibliography: A. Geiger, Ozar Nehmad 2 (1857) 153-73 (Hebrew) = Gesammelte Abhandlungen in hebräischen Sprache (ed. S. Poznanski, 1910) 231-53. F. E. Talmage, EncJud 10 (1971) 1001-4; D. K.: The Man and the Commentaries (Harvard Judaic Monographs 1, 1975). J. Tauber, Standpunkt und Leistung des Rabbi D. K. als Grammatiker (1867).

J. H. HAYES

KIMHI, JOSEPH (c. 1105–c. 1170)

Known by the acronym Rikam, K. was a native of Spain who migrated to Narbonne in Provence. Writing for non-Arabic speaking Jews, he produced a number of works on Hebrew grammar as well as commentaries. In his Sefer ha-Zikkaron (published by Bacher in 1888) he proposed many informative insights into Hebrew grammar, dividing the vowels into five long and five short and demonstrating that the piel and hophal are distinct conjugations. In his exegetical work he stressed the plain meaning (peshat) of the text as opposed to the more homiletical interpretations characteristic of the French school. He wrote commentaries on the Pentateuch (Sepher ha-Torah, published by Gad), the Prophets (Sepher ha-Miknah, no longer extant), Proverbs (Sepher Ḥikkah, published in 1861), Job (partially published by I. Schwarz in Tikvat Enosh [1868]), and Song of Songs (unpublished). He also engaged in anti-Christian polemic in his Sepher ha-Berit (first published in 1710; ET The Book of the Covenent of J. K. [ed. and tr. F. E. Talmadge, 1972]). Many of his ideas were incorporated into the work of his sons M. KIMHI and D. KIMHI).

Works: Sepher Sikkaron: Grammatik der hebräischen Sprache (ed. W. Bacher, 1888); Sepher Ha-Galui (ed. H. J. Mathews, 1887); The Book of the Covenant of J. K. (ed. and tr. F. E. Talmage, 1972).

Bibliography: A. Geiger, Ozar Nehmad, 1 (1856) 97-119. A. Marx, "Gabirol's Authorship of the Choice of Pearls and the Two Versions of J. K.'s Shekel ha-Kodesh," HUCA 4 (1927) 433-48. F. E. Talmage, EncJud 10 (1971) 1006-7.

J. H. HAYES

KIMHI, MOSES (d. c. 1190)

Known by his acronym Remak, K. was the son of J. and older brother of D. KIMHI. Influenced primarily by his father but also by A. IBN EZRA, K. published both grammatical works and commentaries. In his Mahalakh Shevilei ha-Da'at (pub. in 1508 and tr. by S. Münster [1520]) he proposed the widely used Hebrew verbal conjugations qal, niphal, piel, pual, hiphil, hophal, poel, and hithpael. In MÜNSTER's translation, the work was widely used by Christian Hebraists. His Sekhel Tov dealt with the classification of nouns, particles, and verbs (pub. by D. Castelli in REJ 28 [1894] 212-27; 29 [1894] 100-110). He wrote commentaries on the lesser exegeted books—Proverbs, Ezra, and Nehemiah (repub. in rabbinic Bibles but ascribed to Ibn Ezra) as well as a commentary on Job (pub. by I. Schwarz in Tikvat Enosh [1868]).

Bibliography: A. Geiger, Ozar Nehmad 1 (1856) 118; 2 (1957) 18-24. F. J. Ortuta y Murgoito, M. K. y su obra Sekel Tob (1920). F. E. Talmage, EncJud 10 (1971) 1007-8. J. B. Semoneta, Seritti in Memoria di L. Carpi (1968) 59-100.

J. H. HAYES

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, JR. (1929–68)

An African American clergyman, theologian, and social activist born in Atlanta, Georgia, K. graduated from Morehouse College in 1948 (BA) and Crozer Theological Seminary in 1951 (BD) and completed graduate work in philosophical theology at Boston University in 1955 (PhD). Although he was respected and highly praised as an effective pastor and polished intellectual, he is more widely known as the most important civil rights leader of the twentieth century. The son and grandson of Baptist preachers who pastored Atlanta's Ebenezer Baptist Church, K. was nurtured from his earliest childhood in southern black Baptist fundamentalism. He was exposed to Sunday school teachers who read the Bible conservatively and literally, and he embraced biblical teachings uncritically until age thirteen, when he shocked his peers by denying the bodily resurrection of JESUS. Doubts sprang forth unrelentingly as he moved through college and seminary, forcing him to recognize the gap between his fundamentalist background and the biblical and theological liberalism to which he was being introduced. The shifts in his thinking became glaringly evident as he studied the history and HERMENEUTICS of biblical interpretation and as he embraced insights from Boston personalism and the social gospel of W. Rauschenbusch. Even so, continued exposure to the black church and an extended family network instilled in K. not only noble moral and ethical ideals but also the conviction that behind the legends and myths of the Bible were many profound truths that could not be ignored.

After completing the residential requirements for the PhD in 1954, K. became pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. The move signaled the beginning of his career as a civil rights activist as he was catapulted to national and international fame as a leader in the Montgomery bus boycott in 1955–56. Drawing on the teachings of Jesus and the nonviolent philosophy of M. Gandhi, K. led other civil rights campaigns in Albany, Georgia, in 1961–62; in Birmingham, Alabama, and Washington, DC, in 1963; in Selma, Alabama, in 1965; in Chicago, Illinois, in 1966–67; and in Memphis, Tennessee, in early 1968. In these campaigns, he elevated the politics of civil disobedience and nonviolent confrontation to unprecedented levels, without compromising what he regarded as the essential core of biblical and traditional Christian truths.

K. combined biblical piety, theological liberalism, and sociopolitical analysis in a manner that suited the changing social and cultural climate of the 1950s and 1960s. Convinced that the ancient Hebrew prophets and Jesus preached social salvation and uplift, he employed the biblical themes of "the Exodus out of Egypt" and of "the Cross as a symbol of victory over evil and suffering" to represent the journey of African Americans from slavery and segregation to freedom, justice, and equality of opportunity. Rejecting the idea that the kingdom of God is essentially otherworldly, K. applied the biblical principles of love and justice in a sustained effort to overcome racism, poverty, economic injustice, and war and human destruction. His emphasis on the significance of social ethics in the Scriptures served as a much-needed corrective to the tendency of fundamentalists and evangelicals (see EVANGELICAL INTERPRETATION) to reduce religion essentially to matters of individual salvation and personal ethics.

Heavily influenced by historical-critical studies of the Bible, K. interpreted the Scriptures in the tradition of human liberation (see LIBERATION THEOLOGIES). For him, the Bible was a progressive account of God and humans working together to achieve liberation and wholeness. He found this evolutionary development perfectly illustrated in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (Matthew 5–7), in the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:29-37), and in the profound and timeless words of Amos: "Let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream" (Amos 5:24). However, K. did not subscribe to notions of inevitable progress, largely because his study of R. NIEBUHR's Christian realism tempered his optimism and caused him to view the biblical accounts of sin at all levels of human existence with more sobriety. What is more remarkable is that he took seriously the historical-cultural context of the Bible, even as he related it to the contemporary realities of human existence.

Works: The Measure of a Man (1959); Strength to Love (1963); "A View of the Cross Possessing Biblical and Spiritual Justification," The Papers of M. L. K., Jr. (ed. C. Carson, R. E. Luker, and P. A. Russell, 1992), 1:263-67; "An Autobiography of Religious Development," Papers, 1:359-63; "How to Use the Bible in Modern Theological Construction," Papers, 1:251-56; "Light on the OT from the Ancient Near East," Papers, 1:162-80; "The Significant Contributions of Jeremiah to Religious Thought," Papers, 1:181-95; "Notecards on Books of the OT," Papers (ed. C. Carson, R. E. Luker, P. A. Russell, and P. Holloran, 1994) 2:164-67.

Bibliography: L. V. Baldwin, To Make the Wounded Whole: The Cultural Legacy of M. L. K., Jr. (1992). T. Hoyt, Jr., "The Biblical Tradition of the Poor and M. L. K., Jr.," JITC 4 (1977) 12-32. R. Lischer, The Preacher King: M. L. K., Jr. and the Word that Moved America (1995). K. D. Miller, Voice of Deliverance: The Language of M. L. K., Jr. and Its Sources (1992). J. H. Smylie, "On Jesus, Pharaoh, and the Chosen People: M. L. K. as Biblical Interpreter and Humanist," Int 24 (1970) 74-91.

L. V. BALDWIN

KINGS, BOOKS OF

The history of interpretation of the book(s) of Kings extends over two and a half millennia. At the beginning of that history stand what might be called "interpretative rewritings." Of these, the earliest is the book of Chronicles, more specifically 2 Chronicles, which covers the same period, from the accession of Solomon to the exile, as does 1–2 Kings. Writing sometime in the postexilic era, the chronicler retold the narrative he found in Kings so as to heighten, for example, the cultic factor and the doctrine of "immediate retribution." Subsequently, at the end of the first century CE JOSEPHUS, in his Antiquities of the Jews, compiled the material of both Kings and Chronicles into a composite historical account designed to elicit the interest and sympathy of a Hellenistic audience for the Jewish story. Such rewritings are notable for the freedom with which they handle the content and wording of the book they are "interpreting" for their contemporaries.

1. Patristic Period. The first five centuries of Christian history, both in the East and in the West, are not particularly rich in large-scale, systematic interpretations of Kings. From this period there are, however, two works worthy of special mention. The oldest of these, a more or less verse-by-verse commentary on Kings, is attributed to the preeminent Syrian church father EPHRAEM (d. 373), although the genuineness of the work is questioned. While it does not disregard the historical, literal dimension of the text, the commentary gives primary interest to an allegorical reading of Kings wherein the book's persons and events become symbolic foreshadowings of happenings in the life of Christ and of the church. The procedure of a second patristic author, THEODORET, bishop of Cyrene (d. 457) was quite different. His Greek work on Kings consisted of a series of some 125 mostly brief questions and answers. The questions, virtually always evoked by a literal reading of the text, concern such issues as the localization of sites mentioned, the meaning of particular expressions, and theological/moral difficulties implicit in a given passage. Allegorizing is virtually absent.

2. Medieval Period. Within the exegetical millennium extending from c. 500 to c. 1500 separate Jewish and Christian currents may be distinguished. Included in the former are the outstanding figures of RASHI (d. 1105) and D. KIMHI (d. 1235), whose concise comments evidence a profound knowledge of Hebrew and a command of the entire biblical corpus that enabled them to resolve problems in one text by adducing a parallel passage. A representative figure among the fairly numerous Christian medieval authors on Kings is RABANUS MAURUS (d. 856), whose commentary exemplifies features common to many other writers. First, his exegesis was oriented to the VULGATE; his rudimentary Hebrew is displayed in his (sometimes fanciful) explanations of the meanings of proper names. More noteworthy is his predominantly allegorical approach to the text. Finally, Rabanus's interpretation shows itself to be very much part of a school tradition; he copied out extended sections from such earlier writers as BEDE and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE, just as his own discussions would be taken over in later presentations. However, the picture of medieval Christian exegesis furnished by Hrabanus needs to be complemented by reference to other tendencies at work in the period. RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR (d. 1173), for example, offered an explicitly "literal" reading of the account of Solomon's Temple in 1 Kings 6–7; he likewise authored an attempt to resolve the many chronological problems (see CHRONOLOGY, HB) involved in correlating the reigns of the Israelite and Judean kings. Similarly, at the end of the period NICHOLAS OF LYRA (d. 1349) introduced the Hebrew erudition of Rashi and Kimhi into Christian scholarship.

3. Early Modern Period. Christian exegesis in the period c. 1500–c. 1800 was marked by a variety of developments: confessional antagonisms, greater knowledge of biblical and Semitic languages (e.g., Arabic), the ever-clearer domination of the historical-literal over the allegorical approach, and an emerging consciousness that the Hebrew textus receptus needed to be treated critically. All these features, to some degree, manifested themselves in the three Kings commentaries that may be cited as representative of this period. The earliest of these, dating from 1624, by the Spanish Jesuit G. Sanchez, runs to over 700 folio pages. Sanchez's (Latin) verse-by-verse commentary displays his broad familiarity with the biblical material, classical literature, and the exegetical tradition, both Christian and Jewish. Allegorizing is minimal, although moral/theological problems suggested by the text are discussed in detail.

Protestant interpretation for this period includes the treatment of Kings in the 1708 commentary on the historical books by the Dutch scholar J. LE CLERC (Clericus), who gave his own Latin translation of the original text, with accompanying notes that regularly cite the Hebrew in addition to the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) and Vulgate renditions. Philological rather than theological questions were the primary focus of Le Clerc's attention; occasionally, however, he proposed an emendation of the received Hebrew text. A final early modern author, the French Benedictine A. CALMET, produced a multivolume commentary on the entire Bible. Calmet's work has the character of a summarizing compendium of all previous scholarship and gives a French translation of the Vulgate, with regular reference to the Hebrew where the Vulgate fails to reproduce it accurately. The fact that Calmet's commentary is written in the vernacular rather than in Latin presages later scholarly practice. Of interest, too, is his citation of ethnographic parallels and reports by contemporary Holy Land travelers in elucidating the biblical material.

4. Contemporary Period. The overall exegetical epoch from c. 1800 until the present is designated as the critical period of biblical scholarship. During this period the tendencies of the preceding era have come still more strongly to the fore (e.g., the MT is being subjected to ever more venturesome criticism). At the same time, various more or less novel factors have made themselves felt in contemporary scholarship. Negatively, there has been a marked decline of interest in a theological reading of the text. Positively, archeological discoveries (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and the decipherment of hitherto unknown languages (e.g., Akkadian and Ugaritic; see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE) are providing exegetes with new resources. Scholars have become intensely conscious of the problems surrounding the historical reliability of the biblical reports. Above all, however, the period is characterized by the attempt to reconstruct the history of the formation of the biblical books.

Accordingly, the following survey will concentrate on various views concerning the literary process whereby the books of Kings attained their present form. More particularly, it will focus on divergent conceptions regarding the number and nature of the overarching redactions that produced a "book of Kings" comparable in content and extent to ours. By way of background to this discussion, it may be noted that there are three points about the composition history of Kings that seem beyond dispute: (1) The book is a composite in which one must distinguish between the level of the sources (see the explicit references to these in 1 Kgs 11:41; 14:19, 29, etc.) and that of the compiler-editor. (2) Kings underwent deuteronomistic editing, as the recurring linguistic and thematic affinities with Deuteronomy indicate. (3) Given the reference to Jehoiachin's 561 BCE release in 2 Kgs 25:27-30, the book in its present form cannot be older than the middle of the Babylonian exile. These parameters, however, still allow for much scholarly variation regarding the REDACTION history of Kings, as the following attempt at classification will make clear.

a. A single exilic deuteronomistic edition. The simplest of the views to be examined holds that the book of Kings, in basically its current shape, originated during the exile as the work of a deuteronomist who compiled pre-existing materials, both annalistic compendia and prophetic narratives, and added to these various reflective comments. Naturally, this view allows for later, minor, occasional additions to the deuteronomist's work, just as it recognizes that the materials used had already undergone a process of expansion, combination, etc. The exilic deuteronomistic redactor remains all-important, however, in that previously there existed no "book of Kings" comparable to ours and subsequently the book received only minimal retouching. Today, this view is identified especially with M. NOTH (1943), for whom the exilic deuteronomistic redactor in Kings was the editor of the whole complex of Deuteronomy–Kings, the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY (Dtr). But in fact the Nothian view of the formation of Kings is essentially that of various earlier commentators—e.g., C. KEIL (1846), O. Thenius (1849), K. Bähr (1868), H. KLOSTERMANN (1887), W. BARNES (1908), and S. Landersdorfer (1927)—even though they did not stress the "deuteronomistic" character of the exilic redactor to the degree Noth did. Since 1943 this view has had its advocates both among writers on Kings—Noth (1968), J. Montgomery and H. Gehman (1951), A. van den Born (1958), M. Rehm (1979, 1982), T. Hobbs (1985), and J. McConville (1989)—and among authors on the deuteronomistic history in general—H.-D. Hoffmann (1980) and J. Van Seters (1983). Of these, Hoffmann in particular has provided a detailed restatement of Noth's conception in response to alternative views that have emerged primarily since 1970. In doing so, however, Hoffmann "transfers" to the deuteronomist large amounts of material that for Noth pertained to the deuteronomist's sources.

b. Multiple exilic/postexilic deuteronomistic editions. The next distinct group of authors stands the closest to Noth's view. In particular, they agree with him that it was a deuteronomist, working during the exile, who first assembled a book of Kings like ours. At the same time, these scholars believe that the present book evidences such diverse focal points and perspectives that it cannot derive from a single deuteronomistic editor. Rather, it originated via a process of supplementation in which one or more later deuteronomists inserted material—whether pre-existing or composed by themselves—into the work of the first deuteronomistic editor.

Already A. Sanda (1911–12) distinguished between a first deuteronomistic editor who worked shortly after 587 BCE and a later supplementer from the period 500–400 who interpolated, e.g., 1 Kgs 8:44-51; 2 Kgs 21:7-14; 23:26-27; 25:22-30. In more recent scholarship this conception is associated above all with what might be called the "Göttingen school" of R. Smend, Jr. (1971). Smend and his students distinguish three exilic deuteronomistic redactors (in Kings and in Dtr in general), each having a distinctive interest, i.e., DtrH (the deuteronomistic historian), DtrP (the prophetic deuteronomist who inserted various pre-existing prophetic stories into Kings), and DtrN (the nomistic deuteronomist).

Three major commentators opt for this model in elucidating the redaction history of Kings: E. Würthwein (1977, 1984), G. Jones (1984), and G. Hentschel (1984, 1985). Würthwein and Hentschel further reckon with a large body of "late deuteronomistic" material, while the former likewise emphasizes that both DtrP and DtrN have to be seen as ciphers covering the activities of several related but distinct hands. With Würthwein, Noth's single exilic deuteronomistic editor becomes a whole series of exilic/postexilic deuteronomists.

c. A preexilic deuteronomistic redactor. The next group of scholars agree with Noth that the first, major, encompassing redactional activity that gave us a book of Kings was deuteronomistic. They diverge from him (as well as from the authors cited in sec. b above) on the question of whether that activity started only during the exile (with Noth they admit a deuteronomistic exilic redaction). Against such a supposition, they point to various deuteronomistically formulated passages (see e.g., 1 Kgs 8:8, 14-44; 11:39; 15:4-5; 2 Kgs 8:18-19) that seem to presuppose the continued existence of the Temple and the Davidic dynasty. The resultant theory of an initial, preexilic deuteronomistic edition has a long history and comes in several variants. Among its earlier advocates there is some discrepancy as to how early or late in the preexilic era it is to be dated. I. BENZINGER (1899) ascribed it in general terms to the period 621–597. Other commentators placed it more specifically in the reign of Josiah: R. KITTEL (1900), O. EISSFELDT (1922), N. Snaith (1954), J. ROBINSON (1972, 1976). Still others assigned the preexilic Deuteronomist to late in Jehoiakim's reign: C. BURNEY (1903), A. KAMPHAUSEN (1909), and J. Gray (1964).

However, the notion of a preexilic deuteronomistic redaction of Kings has become closely associated with the wider thesis advocated by the American scholars F. M. CROSS (1973) and R. Nelson (1981) that a first edition of Dtr as a whole was produced under Josiah to support his political and religious initiatives. Contemporary Kings commentaries reflecting the influence of the Cross-Nelson thesis include those of S. De Vries (1985) and M. Cogan and H. Tadmor (1988). The thesis is likewise adopted in the monographs of A. Mayes (1983), I. Provan (1988), M. O'Brien (1989), and S. McKenzie (1991). It must be noted, however, that Provan, unlike the other authors mentioned, holds that, while written in Josiah's time, the initial deuteronomistic redaction did not go beyond 2 Kings 18–20 and that the whole of 2 Kings 21–25 derived from the exilic deuteronomist. O'Brien, who finds the conclusion of the Josianic deuteronomist in 2 Kgs 23:25, approximates the view of the Göttingen school in his identification of a whole series of exilic/postexilic deuteronomistic redactions, the most significant of which is the third, "nomistic" one. For McKenzie, the Josianic book of Kings underwent a variety of disparate amplifications at different times.

d. Pre-deuteronomistic editions. There remains a group of scholars who diverge still more markedly from Noth in that they posit a pre-deuteronomistic "book of Kings" that was subsequently expanded by one or more deuteronomistic editors. This communality aside, however, these scholars go their own ways in their more specific conceptions of the pre-deuteronomistic editorial process. A first, older group held that there existed a "Yahwistic" book of Kings (and of Genesis–Kings as a whole) in which were combined the concluding segments of the earlier sources that begin in Genesis. This theory came to the fore in the early 1920s in Germany. Its advocates disagreed, however, regarding how many sources the Yahwistic book of Kings combined as well as where in Kings the termination points of these sources occur (and hence also the terminus a quo for their datings). Benzinger (1921) and G. HÖLSCHER (1923, 1952) affirmed that the pre-deuteronomistic book of Kings represented a combination of two sources: J and E. For Benzinger, J's strand continues down to Hezekiah, while E's extends to Josiah's reform. But according to Hölscher, J reaches no further than the breakup of the united monarchy, whereas E has its conclusion in 2 Kgs 25:30 and so is to be dated to the exile. R. SMEND, Sr. (1921) and Eissfeldt (1934) both thought in terms, rather, of three sources they designated respectively as J, J^2, and E; and L (the "lay source"), J, and E as the component strands in the pre-deuteronomistic historical book that encompassed Genesis–Kings. In Smend's analysis J^1's final extant occurrence is in 2 Kgs 4:8-37, J^2's in 2 Kings 9–10, and E's in 2 Kgs 6:8-23. Eissfeldt, by contrast, contented himself with arguing that the pre-deuteronomistic sources likely extended into Kings, without making any detailed attempt to partition the book's material among them. Despite its earlier popularity, the theory of Eissfeldt et al. apparently lacks any contemporary advocate.

In its more recent formulations, the theory of a pre-deuteronomistic edition of Kings conceives a redactional stage that might be called "proto-deuteronomistic." According to A. Jepsen (1953, 1956) the deuteronomistic ("Nebiistic") redaction of Kings (c. 560) was preceded by a priestly one (c. 580). This priestly redaction, in turn, incorporated and combined two preexisting works, a "synchronistic chronicle" (from Hezekiah's time) and the "Annals of the Kings of Judah and Israel" (from the reign of Manasseh). The priestly redactor anticipated later deuteronomistic concerns in, for example, his preoccupation with the problem of worship on the high places. In his edition of the commentary of J. Fichtner, K. Fricke (1964, 1972) adopts Jepsen's conception.

Other authors locate the initial deuteronomistic redaction, with its stress on the problem of the high places, in the reign of Hezekiah (H. Weippert [1985], A. Lemaire [1986], and E. Exnikel [1996]). Of these authors, Lemaire identifies a series of further textual blocks put together by still earlier editors in the material of 1 Kings, e.g., a history of the early divided monarchy assembled around 850 with a view to generating support for the political and religious endeavors of Jehoshaphat.

From the above it is apparent that contemporary scholarship is far from having reached unanimity regarding the redaction history of the book of Kings. It is understandable, then, that in a major commentary on the book covering 1 Kings 1–7 (M. Mulder [1987]), the question of how many deuteronomistic redactions can be distinguished is left provisionally open. It is equally comprehensible that such recent works on Kings as those of Nelson (1987, 1988), Provan (1995), and J. Walsh (1996) opt for a synchronic approach in which the focus of attention is the book in its extant form.

Bibliography: K. C. Bähr, The Books of the Kings (1868; ET, Commentary on the Holy Scriptures OT 6, 1986). W. E. Barnes, The First Book of Kings (CBSC, 1908). I. Benzinger, Die Bücher der Könige (KHC 9, 1899), Jahvist und Elohist in den Königsbücher (BWANT NF 2, 1921). A. van den Born, Koningen (BOT, 1958). P. Buis, "Rois (Livre des)," DBSup 10 (1985) 695-740. C. F. Burney, Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings (1903). C. Camp, The Women's Bible Commentary (1992) 96-109. M. Cogan and H. Tadmor, II Kings: A New Translation (AB 11, 1988). R. Coote, Elijah and Elisha in Socio-literary Perspective (Semeia/SBL, 1992). F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (1973). S. De Vries, 1 Kings (WBC 12, 1985). O. Eissfeldt, Die Bücher der Könige (HSAT 1, 1922⁴); The OT: An Introduction Including the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha and also the Works of Similar Type from Qumran. The History of the Formation of the OT (1934; ET 1965). E. Exnikel, The Reform of King Josiah and the Composition of the Deuteronomistic History (OTS 33, 1996). J. Fichtner and K. D. Fricke, Das erste Buch von den Königen (BAT 12:1, 1964); Das zweite Buch von den Königen (BAT 12:2, 1972). J. Gray, I and II Kings: A Commentary (OTL, 1964). G. Hentschel, 1 Könige (NEB 10, 1984); 2 Könige (NEB 11, 1985). T. R. Hobbs, 2 Kings (WBC 13, 1985). G. Hölscher, "Das Buch der Könige, seine Quellen und seine Redaktion," Eucharisterion: Studien zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments (FS H. Gunkel, ed. H. Schmidt, FRLANT NF 19, 1923) 1:159-213; Geschichtsschreibung in Israel: Untersuchungen zum Jahvisten und Elohisten (1952). H.-D. Hoffmann, Reform und Reformen (ATANT 66, 1980). A. Jepsen, Die Quellen des Königbuches (1953, 1956²). G. H. Jones, 1 and 2 Kings: Based on the RSV (2 vols., NCBC, 1984). A. Kamphausen, Die Bücher der Könige (HSAT 1, 1909³). C. F. Keil, Commentar über die Bücher der Könige (1846). R. Kittel, Die Bücher der Könige (HKAT 1:5, 1900). H. A. Klostermann, Die Bücher Samuelis und der Könige (KK A:3, 1887). S. Landersdorfer, Die Bücher der Könige (HS 3:2, 1927). A. Lemaire, "Vers l'histoire de la rédaction des livres des rois," ZAW 98 (1986) 221-36. B. O. Long, 2 Kings (FOTL 10, 1991). J. G. McConville, "Narrative and Meaning in the Book of Kings," Bib 70 (1989) 31-49. S. L. McKenzie, The Trouble with Kings: The Composition of the Book of Kings in the Deuteronomistic History (VTSup. 42, 1991). A. D. H. Mayes, The Story of Israel Between Settlement and Exile: A Redactional Study of the Deuteronomistic History (1983). J. A. Montgomery and H. S. Gehman, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings (ICC, 1951). M. J. Mulder, Koningen 1 (COT, 1987). R. D. Nelson, The Double Redaction of the Deuteronomistic History (JSOTSup 18, 1981); First and Second Kings (Interpretation, 1987); "The Anatomy of the Book of Kings," JSOT 40 (1988) 39-48. M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien (1943; ET, The Deuteronomistic History [JSOTSup 15, 1981]); Könige (BKAT 9:1, 1968). M. A. O'Brien, The Deuteronomistic History Hypothesis: A Reassessment (OBO 92, 1989). I. W. Provan, Hezekiah and the Books of Kings: A Contribution to the Debate About the Composition of the Deuteronomistic History (BZAW 172, 1988); 1 and 2 Kings (NICOT, 1995). M. Rehm, Das erste Buch der Könige: Ein Kommentar (1979); Das zweite Buch der Könige: Ein Kommentar (1982). G. Rice, Nations Under God: A Commentary on the Book of 1 Kings (ITC, 1990). J. Robinson, The First Book of Kings (CBC, 1972); The Second Book of Kings (CBC, 1976). A. Šanda, Die Bücher der Könige (EHAT 9:1-2, 1911–12). R. Smend, Sr., "JE in den geschichtlichen Büchern des Alten Testaments," ZAW 39 (1921) 181-217. R. Smend, Jr., "Das Gesetz und die Völker: Ein Beitrag zur deuteronomistischen Redaktionsgeschichte," Probleme biblischer Theologie (FS G. von Rad, ed. H. W. Wolff, 1971) 494-509. N. H. Snaith, "The First and Second Books of Kings: Introduction and Exegesis," IB (1954) 3:1-18. O. Thenius, Die Bücher der Könige (KEH 9, 1849). J. Van Seters, In Search of History: Historiography in the Ancient World and the Origins of Biblical History (1983). J. T. Walsh, 1 Kings (Berit Olam, 1996). H. Weippert, "Das deuteronomistische Geschichtswerk," TRu 50 (1985) 213-49. D. J. Wiseman, 1 and 2 Kings (TOTC 9, 1993). E. Würthwein, 1 Könige 1–16 (ATD 11:1, 1977); 1 Könige 17–2 Könige 25 (ATD 11:2, 1984).

C. T. BEGG

KIRKPATRICK, ALEXANDER FRANCIS
(1849–1940)

Born June 25, 1849, K. read classics and took the BA at Trinity College, Cambridge in 1871. He was awarded the Tyrwhitt Hebrew scholarship in 1872 and was elected Regius Professor of Hebrew in the university in 1882 at the remarkably early age of thirty-three. K. was not only a distinguished Hebraist but also a keen advocate of the critical methodology of biblical research developed in Germany, which was still little known and strongly resisted in British ecclesiastical circles. In 1903 he transferred to the Lady Margaret's professorship of divinity and held this appointment along with the mastership of Selwyn College, Cambridge, to which he had been elected in 1898. He resigned both offices upon being appointed dean of Ely Cathedral in 1906. He retired in 1936 and died in January 1940, having held his fellowship at Trinity College for sixty-eight years.

K.'s contribution to biblical scholarship was made during the last decades of the nineteenth century through three major writings. The best known of these was a commentary on Psalms in the series The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges, to which he had already contributed a two-volume commentary on the books of Samuel. The Psalms commentary adopted a firm critical approach but avoided the fruitless efforts at dating individual psalm compositions that had hitherto preoccupied critical interest. K. kept open the possibility that many of the individual psalms were of an early date and concentrated on the witness they made to Israelite spirituality and theological understanding.

Also of great interest and value is his work on the HB prophets, which represents the substance of the Warburton lectures of 1886–90. Here K. was able to set out a thoroughly modern critical understanding of Israelite PROPHECY along the lines advocated by A. KUENEN in Holland and B. DUHM in Germany. His work broke with the older christological and messianological approach to prophecy and introduced a very different viewpoint to English readers. Appearing shortly after the popular work of W. R. SMITH in Scotland, it was widely read and did much to show the ethical and spiritual insights that were the fruit of contemporary critical approaches. Along with S. DRIVER, he published a series of popular lectures delivered at Cambridge on the results of biblical criticism.

Works: 1 and 2 Samuel (CBSC, 2 vols, 1880–81; rev. 1930); The Doctrine of the Prophets (1890, 1897, 1901); The Divine Library of the OT (1891); The Psalms (CBSC, 3 vols., 1891–1901, frequently repr. in 1 vol.); (with S. R. Driver), The Higher Criticism (1904, 1905, rev. 1912).

R. E. CLEMENTS

KITTEL, GERHARD (1888–1948)

K. studied at the universities of Leipzig, Tübingen, and Berlin, earning his doctorate in 1913 in Kiel. He taught in Kiel, Leipzig, Greifswald, and again in Kiel, before moving to Tübingen in 1926, where he remained until 1939, when he was sent to the University of Vienna. In 1945 he was imprisoned for about fifteen months as a result of his support of Nazi antisemitism. He did not teach again, and died July 11, 1948.

K. produced substantial contributions to biblical study. His work on Solomon, in which he argues for the unity of the odes and their most probable origin in Christian circles, is still an important treatise. In rabbinics, besides translating and editing an edition of Sifre to Deuteronomy and serving as the editor for a series of German publications of rabbinic texts, he also wrote several books in which he asserted that rabbinic Judaism was the proper context for viewing the origin and development of NT Christianity. K. took exception to such NT scholars as W. BOUSSET who, in K.'s judgment, underemphasized the importance of Talmudic Judaism and overstated the place of pseudepigraphical and apocryphal texts (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA; APOCRYPHA, NT) as representative of the "literature of the masses." While granting that the phenomenon of Hellenistic syncretism had made an impact on all areas of Second Temple Judaism, K. maintained that the learned circles of the rabbis represented a large segment of the Judaism of Palestine, with strong connections to the scripture traditions of preexilic Judaism, and that particularly in the earliest years of Christianity the closest parallels to the incipient Christian movement are to be found here. Thus much of K.'s work from 1914 onward was spent elucidating the various connections of Christianity with Judaism.

After 1933 and his ensuing involvement with National Socialism, he began writing articles on Judaism in the series Forschungen zur Judenfrage, in which he took a harsh and ideologically motivated stance against the Jewish faith. These essays and his book Die Judenfrage brought the sharp criticism of later scholarship.

K. is probably best known for his conceptualizing and initial editing of the Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testaments (ET, Theological Dictionary of the NT [1985]). Despite criticism by more recent scholars of the dictionary's aims and method (e.g., see J. Barr [1961]), it still remains one of the major reference works in the field of NT studies. For K., the work symbolized the close connection between philology and Christian theology, since he believed that the latter was revealed in part by the study of the former.

In his later years, K. wrote some significant articles on the epistle of James and planned to publish a commentary on the letter, but he died before realizing the goal. His last article, published posthumously in 1950, was probably his most important work on the epistle. In it he argued for an early dating of James based on comparison of the letter's eschatology and use of JESUS logia with the similar phenomena in the apostolic fathers.

Works: Die Oden Salomon: Überarbeitet oder Einheitlich? (BWANT 16, 1914); Jesus und die Rabbinen (1914); Die Probleme des palästinischen Spätjudentums und das Urchristentum (BWANT 3, 1926); "Die Stellung des Jakobus zu Judentum und Heiden-christentum," ZNW 30 (1931) 145-57; Die Religionsgeschichte und das Urchristentum (1932); Die Judenfrage (1933); Lexicographia Sacra: Two Lectures on the Making of the "Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament" (1938); "Die geschichtliche Ort des Jakobusbriefes," ZNW 41 (1942) 71-105; (ed.), Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testment (vols. 1–4, 1933–48; ET, Theological Dictionary of the NT [1985]); "Der Jakobusbrief und die Apostolischen Väter," ZNW 43 (1950) 54-112.

Bibliography: J. Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language (1961) 206-62. R. P. Ericksen, Theologians under Hitler (1985) 28-78. G. and J. Friedrich, TRE 19 (1990) 221-25. O.

Michel, RGG[3] 3 (1959) 1626. M. Rese, "Antisemitismus und neutestamentliche Forschung: Anmerkungen zu dem Theme, 'G. K. und die Judenfrage,' " EvTh 39 (1979) 557-70. K. L. Schmidt, "Zum theologisches Briefwechsel zwischen K. Barth und G. K.," ThBl 13 (1934) 328-34. L. Siegele-Wenschkewitz, Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft vor der Judenfrage: G. K.s theologische Arbeit im Wandel deutscher Geschichte (Theologische Existenz heute 208, 1980).

T. C. PENNER

KITTEL, RUDOLF (1853–1929)

The father of the NT scholar G. KITTEL, K. was born at Eningen, Württemburg, Mar. 28, 1853, and studied at Tübingen (1871–76) with J. BECK, L. DIESTEL, and K. Weizsäker. From 1876 to 1888 he worked as a clergyman, a tutor in Tübingen, and a gymnasium teacher in Stuttgart. He received the OT chair at Breslau (1888) and at Leipzig (1889–1924), where as rector in the troubled years 1918–19 he displayed great courage and initiative. A study tour of Palestine in 1907 greatly influenced his subsequent work. He died Oct. 20, 1929.

K.'s voluminous output was in two major areas: the history of Israel and HB TEXTUAL CRITICISM. His first publication on Israelite history surveyed the period from the ancestors to the exile in two volumes (1888, 1892). Underlying this presentation were studies on the source criticism of the HB historical books, e.g., the continuation of J and E into Judges and Samuel (1892). In 1909 a second edition of vol. 2 of his history added a section on pre-Israelite Palestine and gave attention to the archaeological excavations he had come to know during his 1907 tour. The history eventually encompassed three volumes and went through a number of editions. To accompany his history, K. issued a number of shorter and more popular writings concerning the development of Israel's religion, Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY, the BABEL UND BIBEL controversy, and character sketches of great HB figures.

In the realm of HB textual criticism K. edited the Hebrew text of Chronicles in the Polychrome or "Rainbow Bible" (ed. P. Haupt [1895]) and in 1902 issued a programmatic statement on the "necessity and possibility of a new edition of the HB." In collaboration with nine other scholars, he brought out his Biblia Hebraica in two parts (1905–6), contributing the books of Genesis, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Ruth, Lamentations, and Chronicles as well as parts of Exodus and Numbers. In 1929 he published the fascicles of Genesis and Isaiah for the third edition, which was eventually completed (1937) under the editorship of P. KAHLE and which was the first to employ the Codex Leningradensis as its printed text.

Related to his work as textual critic was his activity as translator and commentator. He provided the annotated TRANSLATION for the books of Judges and Samuel in all four editions of E. KAUTZSCH's collaborative rendition of the HB (1894, 1922[4]) as well as Ruth in the first two editions. To Kautzsch's edition of the HB Apocrypha and PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (1900) he contributed a translation of the PSALMS OF SOLOMON with introduction and notes. He likewise authored large-scale commentaries on the books of Kings (1900), Chronicles (1902), and Psalms (1914), the first two in the HKAT series edited by W. NOWACK, the third in E. SELLIN's KAT series.

As a scholar, K. was characterized by independence and openness to new data. Early on he challenged the regnant Wellhausian view (see J. WELLHAUSEN) that P as a whole derives from the exilic/postexilic period as well as the claim that hardly anything historical can be known about the ancestral period. His experiences in Palestine (1907) led him to recast his history drastically in the second and subsequent editions. In his historical publications he likewise gave increasing attention to the extra-biblical comparative material, while breaking with his onetime friend (and Akkadian teacher) Friedrich DELITZSCH over the latter's excessive claims for Babylonian influence on the HB. His emphasis on the importance of the great individual in history and religion, among other things, lay behind his reservations concerning H. GUNKEL's form-critical approach (see FORM CRITICISM) to the psalms, with its stress on the typical and the common.

Works: Geschichte der Hebräer (2 vols., 1888–92; ET 1895–96); "Die pentateuchischen Urkunden in den Büchern Richter und Samuel," TSK 65 (1892) 44-71; Die Anfänge der hebräischen Geschichtsschreibung im Alten Testament (1896); "Cyrus und Deutero-Jesaja," ZAW 17 (1898) 149-62; Die Bücher der Könige (1900); Die Bücher der Chronik (1902); Über die Notwendigkeit und Möglichkeit einer neuen Ausgabe der hebräischen Bibel (1902); Die babylonischen Ausgrabungen und die ältere biblische Geschichte (1903; ET The Babylonian Excavations [1903]); Studien zur hebräischen Archäologie und Religionsgeschichte (1908); Geschichte des Volkes Israel 2 (1909[2], 1925[6-7]); Die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft in ihrer wichtigsten Ergebnissen (1910); Geschichte des Volkes Israel 1 (1912[2], 1923[5-6]); Die Psalmen (1914, 1923[3-4]); Die Religion des Volkes Israel von der Urzeit bis zu Christus (1921, 1929; ET 1925); Die Zukunft der alttestamentlichen Wissenschaft (1921); Die hellenistische Mysterienreligion und das Alte Testament (1924); RGS 1 (1925) 113-42 (autobiography); Gestalten und Gedanken in Israel (1926; ET Great Men and Movements [1929]); Geschichte des Volkes Israels 3:1 (1927); 3:2 (1929).

Bibliography: K.-H. Bernhardt, TRE 19 (1990) 225-26. H. Engel, NDB 11 (1977) 692-93. J. de Fraine, DBSup 5 (1957) 186-88. J. Hempel, ZDMG 84 (1930) 78-93; DBJ 11 (1932) 153-56.

C. T. BEGG

KITTO, JOHN (1804–54)

K. was born into a poor family in Plymouth, England, Dec. 4, 1804. His father, a stonemason, was an abusive alcoholic. In 1817, while apprenticed to his father, K. fell from a roof and was rendered deaf. Neglect from his father and abuse from a shoemaker employer twice resulted in his being placed in a workhouse. K. had received some schooling, learned to read and write, and assiduously cultivated literacy, gaining favor in the workhouse by writing lectures that were read to the other inmates. In 1824 he became associated with an Exeter dentist, A. Groves, under whose influence he joined the Church Missionary Society in 1825 to be trained as a printer. He was posted to Malta in 1827, but his relationship with the CMS deteriorated, and in 1829 he returned to England. While accompanying Groves on a four-year mission to Persia as tutor to Groves's children, K. observed the Middle East first hand, traveling to Baghdad on a caravan from Moscow, seeing the city suffer from plague, flood, and siege, and returning via Tehran and Constantinople.

Back in England, K. supported himself by writing, initially producing pieces for popular magazines that described his travels and drew on the perspective of his deafness. His most successful work, The Pictorial Bible (1835–38), contains the biblical text with annotations and illustrations; it became one of the standard popular reference works of the period. The notes show the incredible breadth and depth of learning of their self-educated author, who was equally at ease discussing weaning customs in the Middle East, points from classical Greek culture, or sources as varied as AKIBA, MAIMONIDES, and H. GESENIUS.

Another comprehensive production was the Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature (1845), which K. edited. He conceived of this work as a replacement for the venerable work of A. CALMET and its derivatives. Contributors from Britain and Europe included H. EWALD and E. HENGSTENBERG. The articles were up-to-date and the coverage broad, e.g., in the article on the Pentateuch H. HÄVERNICK reported on theories current in German criticism, like those of Ewald, J. VATER and W. DE WETTE. A long article on the TALMUD by S. DAVIDSON was omitted from the later "popular" abridged version. In 1848 K. founded The Journal of Sacred Literature, which he edited until 1853 (for a listing of its contents see J. Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica 1 [1854] 1736-38). Like the Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature, the journal covered a wide range of topics.

Driven in part by financial necessity, K. was a prolific writer, especially in the 1840s. He frequently reused material, converting articles into books or re-issuing works in expanded, extracted, or condensed form, often under similar titles. Most of his output targeted a popular audience. The introduction to another successful series, the eight-volume Daily Bible Illustrations (1849–54), expresses an aim common to much of K.'s writing: "To introduce into a family circle a large amount of Biblical Knowledge . . . to present the real fruits of much learned discussion and painstaking research." Theologically, K. might be described as a conservative with a sound knowledge of contemporary scholarship and a sensitivity to other religious positions. He was awarded an honorary DD by the University of Giessen in 1844, and his financial position was eased somewhat by the grant of a civil list pension in 1850.

K.'s health was never good, and as time went on his deafness affected his speech, rendering him almost unintelligible. In 1854 he traveled to Germany to rest and died in Canstadt on Nov. 25.

Works: Essays and Letters, with a Short Memoir of the Author (1825); The Pictorial Bible: Being the OT and NT According to the Authorized Version Illustrated with Steel Engravings After Celebrated Pictures and Many Hundred Wood-Cuts. . . . (4 vols., 1835–38); Uncle Oliver's Travels in Persia (2 vols., 1838); The Illustrated Commentary on the OT and NT, Chiefly Explanatory of the Manners and Customs Mentioned in the Sacred Scriptures. . . . (5 vols., 1840); Pictorial History of Palestine and the Holy Land, Including a Complete History of the Jews (1840); The Christian Traveller (1841); Gallery of Scripture Engravings, Historical and Landscape, with Descriptions, Historical, Geographical, and Critical (3 vols., 1841–43); Palestine, the Bible History of the Holy Land (2 vols., 1841); History of Palestine from the Patriarchal Age to the Present Time (1843); Thoughts Among Flowers (1843); The Lost Senses: Deafness and Blindness (1845); The Pictorial Sunday Book (1845); Ancient Jerusalem (c. 1846); The Tartar Tribes (1846–49); The Court of Persia: Viewed in Connection with Scriptural Usages (1849); The Tabernacle and Its Furniture (1849); The Land of Promise, or a Topographical Description of the Principal Places in Palestine, and of the Country Eastward of Jordan (1850); Scripture Lands: Described in a Series of Historical, Geographical, and Topographical Sketches (1850); Popular Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature: Abridged from the Larger Work (1851); Eastern Habitations: Being the Outline of a Lecture on the Habitations of the Jews and of the Eastern Nations Referred to in the Holy Scriptures (1852); Sunday Reading for Christian Families (1853).

Bibliography: J. Eadie, The Life of J. K. (1858). T. Hamilton, DNB 31 (1892) 233-35. J. E. Ryland, Memoirs of J. K. (1856).

P. TRUDINGER

KLOSTERMANN, ERICH (1870–1963)

Born in Kiel, Germany, Feb. 14, 1870, the son of the OT scholar H. KLOSTERMANN, K. studied classical philology and theology in Neuchâtel and Kiel. He received his PhD in 1892 in Kiel. In 1905 he became a titular professor, in 1907 ausserordentlicher professor, and in 1911 full professor in Strasbourg. He took a position in Münster in 1919 and in Königsberg in 1923 and from 1928 on was professor of NT and ancient Christian literature in Halle. K. retired in 1936 for the first time and in 1954 for the third time. He died Sept. 18, 1963.

K. was a philologist and scholar of patristics. His most important work was on the Patristics Commission of the Berlin Academy's GCS, for which A. von HARNACK engaged him. K. primarily edited the exegetical works of ORIGEN, particularly the commentary to Matthew. Up until the last he worked on the homilies of Macarius-Symeon (the Great). Within biblical scholarship, his commentaries on the Synoptics (1907–19, rev. 1928–29) in the series established by H. LIETZMANN (Handbuch zum Neuen Testament) were influential for decades. To put the reader in a position to draw independent conclusions, K. offered in these commentaries the philological and historical material for exegesis. He discussed both LITERARY-critical topics and issues concerning the history of textual transmission. (For his view of the synoptic Gospels, see his article "Evangelien, Synoptische" in RGG^{2} 2 (1928) 422-33.) A genuinely thorough knowledge of the developing discipline of FORM CRITICISM is not evident beside the strong contours of his literary-critical and historical mode of inquiry (in the tradition of H. Holtzmann). The commentaries to Matthew and Luke offer a plethora of careful individual observations for REDACTION CRITICISM of the two Synoptics' dependence on Mark, but they give no comprehensive view of either book's theology.

Works: Analecta zur Septuaginta, Hexapla, und Patristik (1895); Apocrypha 1-3 (KlT 3, 8, 11, 1903–4, 1908–11^2, and subsequent eds.); Das Markusevangelium (HNT 2, 1, 1907; HNT 3, 1926^2, 1936^3, 1971^5); Das Matthäusevangelium (HNT 2, 2, 1909; HNT 4, 1927^2, 1938,^{3}, 1971^4); Das Lukasevangelium (HNT 2, 3, 1919; HNT 5, 1929^2, 1975^3); "Die adäquate Vergeltung in Rm 1,22-31," ZNW 32 (1933) 1-6; "Zur Apologie des Paulus Galater 1,10–2,21," Gottes ist der Orient (FS O. Eissfeldt, 1959) 84-87; "Noch einmal über Paulus zum Apostelkonvent Galater 2,1-10," WZ(H).GS 13 (1964) 149-50. For a fuller bibliography, see W. Völker, ZNW 39 (1940) 230-36; H. Nitschke, TLZ 75 (1950) 123-24; W. Eltester, TLZ 86 (1960) 313-14; WZ(H).GS 14 (1965) 351.

Bibliography: K. Aland (ed.), Glanz und Niedergang der deutschen Universität (1979), contains many letters from K. to Lietzmann. K. Aland, NDB 12 (1980) 124-25. G. Delling, "Geleitwort," Studien zum Neuen Testament und zur Patristik (FS E. K. zum 90. Geburtstag, TU 77, 1961) VII-VIII. W. Eltester, TLZ 85 (1960) 311-14. H. Lietzmann, FuF 16 (1940) 59-60. E. Schott and W. Eltester, "Zwei Gedenkreden auf E. K. (+ 18.9.1963)," WZ(H).GS 14 (1965) 345-52.

N. WALTER

KLOSTERMANN, HEINRICH AUGUST

(1837–1915).

The father of E. KLOSTERMANN, K. was born May 16, 1837, in Steinhude (Schaumburg-Lippe) and studied theology from 1855 to 1858 in Erlangen and Berlin. His most influential teacher was J. von HOFMANN, a significant representative of the so-called Erlangen school. K. taught in Bückeburg and from 1864 to 1868 was a tutor and Dozent in Göttingen. In 1868 he became professor of OT in Kiel. Although he initially encountered strong opposition from his colleagues, his influence became a significant factor in the expansion of Erlangen theology throughout northern Germany. He died Feb. 12, 1915, in Mölln (Lauenburg).

K. was an independent and versatile scholar. He never rejected the history-of-salvation orientation of the Erlangen school, but he was by no means an uncritical follower. Although K. recognized and affirmed the necessity of literary-critical analysis of the HB, he considered it of secondary importance. He was primarily interested in those theological textual statements that made reference to revelation. The way K. practiced LITERARY criticism also strongly differentiated him from J. WELLHAUSEN and his followers, particularly in the analysis of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM). K.'s work was oriented toward the Bible as a whole, including problems of NT texts. He modestly characterized these philological studies as the attempts of a "hobbyist" that had little to do with the work of the "professionals." Yet he claimed to have achieved a better understanding of the textual passages under question than had previous exegetical specialists.

His commentary on the books of Samuel and Kings was also quite strongly influenced by philology. In a way never practiced before and only seldom since, he pursued TEXTUAL CRITICISM and corrected the Hebrew text, particularly in the books of Samuel, on the basis of the SEPTUAGINT. He singled out 2 Samuel 10–20 and 1 Kings 1–2—currently referred to as the "throne-succession narrative"—declared it to be a special entity, and attributed its authorship to Ahimaaz, the son of the priest Zadok. His commentary was one of the best among the otherwise overly meditative contributions of the commentary series KK edited by H. Strack and L. Zöckler.

K. regarded research into the history of Israel as an expressly theological task and was concerned with disclosing both the natural prerequisites for divine revelation as well as the foundations of spiritual experience and Christian behavior. For this reason he consciously limited his object of investigation to the HB and disregarded the already widely known extra-biblical sources. In the religion of Abraham he saw the preliminary stage; and in the proclamation of Moses, the foundation of HB faith, thought, and life. K. made the clay tablets from Amarna, edited by H. WINCKLER, known to a wider circle through a sketch of their contents and historical significance (Ein diplomatischer Briefwechsel [1892, 1902]).

K. was probably most independent in his explanation of the origin of the Pentateuch. He rejected the source hypothesis of Wellhausen as a grave error, since it failed to recognize the edifying character of the Pentateuch. Instead, he used Deuteronomy as his point of departure, more specifically Deut 4:45–28:69 as proclaimed in 622 BCE by Josiah. He argued that this writing was an addendum to an already extant work (Genesis 1–Numbers 36; Deut 31:14–34:9) and that it represented an expanded edition of a writing that existed during the time of Hezekiah. This latter writing, he maintained, had originated during an earlier period in which statistical notes were combined with the contents of other independent writings with legal stipulations. Understandably, this relatively complicated and rigid explanation did not fare well against the source hypothesis of the Wellhausen school.

K. by no means identified Deuteronomy with the legal book discovered in Josiah's reign, which, he asserted, contained various discourses concerning the contents of a lost book of law. He referred to the corpus of Icelandic communal law, Grágás, as a surprising parallel. This too, he alleged, was not really a book of law but, rather, a collection of legal instructions publicly or privately distributed by the acting "law administrator" (Gesetzessprecher). This reference to the admonishing character of the deuteronomic texts and to the function of the Icelandic "law administrator" was later taken up in different ways by G. von RAD and A. ALT.

Works: Vindiciae Lucanae (1866); Das Markusevangelium nach seinem Quellenwert für die evangelische Geschichte (1867); Untersuchungen zur alttestamentlichen Theologie (1868); Die Gemütsstimmung des Christen in Röm. 5,1-11 (1881); Korrekturen zur bisherigen Erklärung des Römerbriefes (1881); Probleme im Apostelteхte (1883); Ueber deutsche Art bei M. Luther (1884); Die Gottesfurcht als Hauptstück der Weisheit (1885); Die Bücher Samuelis und der Könige (KK A 3, 1887); Zur Theorie der biblischen Weissagung und zur Charakteristik des Hebräerbriefs (1889); Ein diplomatischer Briefwechsel aus dem zweiten Jahrtausend vor Christo (1892, 1902²); Deuterojesaia: Hebräisch und deutsch (1893); Der Pentateuch (1893); Geschichte des Volkes Israel bis zur Restauration unter Esra und Nehemia (1896); Deuteronomium und Grágás (1900); Der Pentateuch: Neue Folge (1907); Schulwesen im alten Israel (1908).

Bibliography: H. Gunkel, *RGG*² 3 (1929) 1097-98. E. Ruprecht, "Eine vergessene Konjektur von A. K. zu 1 Reg 3:27," ZAW 88 (1976) 415-18. H. L. Strack, "Pentateuch," *RE*³ 15 (1904) 113-24, esp. 121-22.

W. THIEL

KNOBEL, AUGUST WILHELM (1807–63)

Born Feb. 7, 1807, in Tzschecheln in Niederlausitz, K. died May 25, 1863, in Giessen. He studied theology as well as oriental studies and classical philology in Breslau (1826–31). Among his teachers, he was most grateful to the rationalistic theologian D. Schulz and to the orientalist M. Habicht. In 1831 he earned the PhD, the lic. theol., and the venia legendi, which he exercised as ausserordentlicher professor at Breslau from 1835 until 1838, when he was called to Giessen as full professor. K. taught most of the theological disciplines in Breslau; in Giessen he confined himself to the HB. Never married, he was devoted to his students and enjoyed great popularity.

After demonstrating in his first writings mastery of the philological-exegetical craft, he attempted in his Commentar über das Buch Koheleth (1836) to achieve a theological-philosophical understanding of this controversial book on a narrow historical foundation; like W. DE WETTE, he dated Qohelet at the end of the Persian or at the beginning of the Hellenistic period. In his work on PROPHECY (1837) he gave an overview that extended from Samuel to Daniel, before the historical portion presenting an equally detailed survey of the relations, the essence, the content, and the form of expression of the prophets. He regarded the mediation between God and the people in the theocracy, especially via instruction and admonition, as a task of the prophets. In his first years in Giessen, where he wrote the Isaiah commentary for the KEH, his work focused on the prophets.

However, K.'s primary work was devoted to the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), together with the book of Joshua and his commentaries on these books in the KEH. In a detailed essay he first treated the table of the nations in Genesis 10, which he had previously thought dealt with only more or less arbitrary combinations made on the basis of the names, rather than reflecting genuine ethnography. The commentaries, which of course had to be formulated more briefly, stood as standard works for decades because of their common sense and the abundance of linguistic and technical material they offered. K.'s proposed thesis of the origin and development of the Pentateuch was a variation of the supplemental hypothesis: the Grundschrift (primary document) that underlies the books from Genesis to Joshua was supplemented by a Yahwist from two sources, a law book, and a war book, which extended to Joshua. Afterward, the deuteronomist inserted his material and produced the final form of the Pentateuch. K. found no support for this thesis because he could not clearly delineate the two "books."

Works: "Jeremias chaldaizans" (diss. phil., Breslau, 1831); "De evangelii Marci origine" (diss. theol., Breslau, 1831); De carminis lobi argumento fine ac dispositione (1835); Commentar über das Buch Koheleth (1836); Der Prophetismus der Hebräer vollständig dargestellt (2 vols., 1837); Der Prophet Jesaja (KEH 5, 1843, 1861[3]); Exegetisches Vademecum für Herrn Professor Ewald in Tübingen (1844); Die Völkertafel der Genesis (1850); Die Genesis (KEH 11, 1852, 1860[2]; ET Genesis [1897]); Die Bücher Exodus und Leviticus (KEH 12, 1857); Die Bücher Numeri, Deuteronomium, und Josua (KEH 13, 1861).

Bibliography: F. H. Hesse, ADB 16 (1882) 300-304. O. Zöckler, RE[3] 10 (1901) 598-99.

R. SMEND

KNOX, JOHN (c. 1514–72)

The leading figure of the Scottish Reformation, K. was a man of the Bible, depending heavily on Scripture for the source of his thought and actions. He believed that the Word of God is primarily the canonical Scriptures—that is, the books found in the OT and the NT, excluding the "apocryphal" writings. For the most part, he made God's Word, as revealed in Scripture, his sole AUTHORITY; and in questions pertaining to the faith, he subordinated all other authorities to Scripture. His theological radicalism and uniqueness, however, developed from his methods of interpreting Scripture, especially from his emphasis on the OT and from his profound literalness. Although he believed that the OT foreshadowed the things revealed in the NT, he did not believe the NT superseded the OT, except, of course, in regard to such matters as the atonement or the new covenant.

K.'s religious thought had the OT as its starting point. More specifically, his major premise, drawn from Deut 12:32, dominated not only his view of Scripture but also his concept of reform. At the onset of his ministry, quoting this text, he stated, " 'All that the Lord thy God commands thee to do, that do thou to the Lord thy God: add nothing to it; diminish nothing from it.' By this rule, think I, that the Kirk of Christ will measure God's religion, and not by that which seems good in their own eyes."

Because K. made this verse the focal point of his biblical interpretation, his theology acquired its own trademark, especially an intense drive to purify religion. In regard to liturgy and ceremony, he was intolerant of anything not positively approved by Scripture. His crusade for purity in worship, drawn largely from the OT, ran the course of his career and dominated not only his ministry but also much of his religious and political thought. In contrast to LUTHER and CALVIN, K. placed the literal forms of Scripture above the substantive content, particularly in regard to purifying worship. In this respect, he largely regarded the Bible as a book of precedents, i.e., as containing instances that served as authoritative examples or patterns for subsequent cases that were similar or analogous. For this reason, he could be called a "radical" reformer who knew no middle way even in what Calvin called "indifferentia." Consequently, in his thinking there was the danger that Scripture could become a set of regulations, although in actual deed he often demonstrated flexibility.

Works: The Works of J. K. (6 vols., ed. D. Laing, 1846–64).

Bibliography: R. Greaves, "The Nature of Authority in the Writings of J. K.," Fides et Historia 10, 2 (1978) 30-51. R. Kyle, The Mind of J. K. (1984); "The Hermeneutical Patterns in J. K.'s Use of Scripture," Pacific Theological Review 17, 3 (1984) 19-32; "J. K.'s Methods of Biblical Interpretation: An Important Source of His Intellectual Radicalness," JRelS 12 (1985) 57-70.

R. KYLE

KNOX, JOHN (1900–1990)

Born in Frankfort, Kentucky, Dec. 30, 1900, K. was educated at Randolph Macon College (BA, 1919), Candler School of Theology (BD, 1925), and the University of Chicago (PhD, 1935). His academic work in theology began to flourish at Emory University and blossomed in the atmosphere of the University of Chicago, where the social emphasis of S. J. CASE, as interpreted by C. Morrison, a close friend, was significant for his later work in christology and ecclesiology. As a student there K. read A. Whitehead's Religion in the Making, and Whitehead's philosophy had an important influence on him. K. taught at Emory University (1924–27), Fisk University (1929–36), Hartford Seminary (1938–39), the University of Chicago (homiletics and NT, 1939–43), Union Seminary in New York (Baldwin Professor of Sacred Literature, 1943–66), and Episcopal Seminary Southwest. He died June 25, 1990.

In his pioneer work on Pauline CHRONOLOGY in Chapters in a Life of Paul (1954, rev. ed. 1987), K. helped set the future course for the historical study of Christian origins. His Early Church and the Coming Great Church (1955), grounded in his study of NT and patristic literature, is prophetic in its promise for ecumenical work at the beginning of the twenty-first century. Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (1936), an intricately sophisticated piece of successful historical reconstruction, may be singled out for the highest praise. In this book K. argued that Onesimus became the bishop of the church at Ephesus and played a prominent role in the collection of the Pauline letters.

K.'s critical interpretation of JESUS Christ and the church has greatly influenced a generation of theologians, who have appreciated the clarity of his thought, the simplicity of his writing style, and the liberal orthodoxy of his critical speculation. His best-known work may be Jesus: Lord and Christ (1958), a trilogy comprising three earlier works: The Man Christ Jesus (1941), Christ the Lord (1945), and On the Meaning of Christ (1947).

K.'s mature christological proposal, rooted in this trilogy, evolved over a number of years and came to fruition in The Church and the Reality of Christ (1962).

During his long teaching career at Union Seminary, he was loved by his students and highly respected by a distinguished set of colleagues including R. NIEBUHR, P. TILLICH, H. Van Dusen, and J. Bennett. A Festschrift in his honor was published by Cambridge University Press in 1967.

Works: He Whom a Dream Hath Possessed: Some Aspects of the Art of Religious Living (1932); Philemon Among the Letters of Paul (1936); Marcion and the NT: An Essay in the Early History of the Canon (1942, 1980); Criticism and Faith (1950, 1953); "The Epistle to the Romans: Introduction and Exegesis," IB (1954) 9:353-668; Chapters in a Life of Paul (1954, rev. ed. 1987); Early Church and the Coming Great Church (1955); The Death of Christ: The Cross in NT History and Faith (1956, 1959); The Integrity of Preaching (1957); Jesus: Lord and Christ (1958); Christ and the Hope of Glory (1960); The Ethic of Jesus in the Teaching of the Church: Its Authority and Relevance (1960); Life in Christ Jesus: Reflection on Romans 5–8 (1961, 1966); The Church and the Reality of Christ (1962); Myth and Truth: An Essay on the Language of Faith (1964); "Romans 15:14-33 and Paul's Conception of His Apostolic Mission," JBL 83 (1964) 1-11; The Humanity and Divinity of Christ: A Study of Pattern in Christology (1967); Limits of Unbelief (1970); "The Pauline Chronology: Buck-Taylor-Hurd Revisited," The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. L. Martyn (ed. R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa, 1990) 258-74.

Bibliography: R. E. Cushman, "Christology or Ecclesiology? A Critical Examination of the Christology of J. K.," RelLife 27 (1957–58) 512-26. W. R. Farmer, C. F. D. Moule, and R. R. Niebuhr (eds.), Christian History and Interpretation: Studies Presented to J. K. (1967). H. Greeven, "Prüfung der Thesen von J. K. zum Philemonbrief," TLZ 79 (1954) 373-78. P. N. Harrison, "Onesimus and Philemon," ATR 32 (1950) 268-94.

W. R. FARMER

KÖHLER, LUDWIG HUGO (1880–1956)

Born Apr. 14, 1880, in the Prussian city of Neuwied am Rhein, K. enrolled at the University of Zurich in 1900. He was ordained in 1904. In 1908 he completed a doctoral dissertation on the TEXTUAL CRITICISM of Jeremiah ("Beobachtungen am hebräischen und griechischen Text von Jeremia Kap. 1–8") and commenced lecturing at the university in OT in addition to pastoral duties. He left parish work in 1916 for a full-time position at the university and became a full professor in 1923. He remained on the faculty at Zurich until his retirement in 1947, serving as Rektor in 1930–32. He died Nov. 25, 1956.

Although primarily involved in the study of the OT, K.'s scholarly interests also included NT studies and pastoral theology. Underlying his biblical research was a vision for providing a complete characterization of Hebrew culture and a methodology that relied heavily on the explication of essential ideas, thoughts, and concepts and their interrelations. No doubt his major and most lasting contribution to biblical studies was his work on a new Hebrew LEXICON. The first edition, appearing in 1953, included parallel German and English translations. After K.'s health began to fail, revision of the lexicon was taken over in 1956 by W. BAUMGARTNER.

Among K.'s other important works is an influential OT THEOLOGY (1936), which reflects his location in the Reformed tradition. Importing a framework from systematic theology, he collected ideas and concepts from the OT under the three heads of theology, anthropology, and soteriology. The cult is treated rather awkwardly under anthropology as an attempt at human self-salvation, with the law having a pedagogical function (Gal 3:24 is noted). The work closes with a study of the term messiah, climaxing in its association with vicarious suffering on the basis of the Servant Songs in Isaiah and pointing to the NT. K.'s lectures Der hebräische Mensch (1953) present his reconstruction of the life and outlook of the typical ancient Israelite. K. also produced form-critical studies (see FORM CRITICISM) of material from both the OT and the NT. In particular, he highlighted the role of prophet (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS) as messenger and argued that this function provided a basic Gattung for prophetic speech. When examining the concepts of justice and righteousness in ancient Israel, he stressed the relationship between the individual and the community, especially with regard to what he viewed as the obligation to respect and to protect the rights of others (e.g., his address as Rektor in 1931: "Die hebräische Rechtsgemeinde").

Works: Amos, der älteste Schriftprophet (1920); Religion und Menschheit (1922); Deuterojesaja (Jesaja 40–55) stilkritisch untersucht (BZAW 37, 1923); Die Offenbarung des Johannes und ihre heutige Deutung (1924); Was sagen wir zu den ernsten Bibelforschen: Ein Vortrag (1924); Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Neuen Testaments (Sammlung gemeinverständlicher Vortrage und Schriften aus dem Gebiet der Theologie und Religionsgeschichte 127, 1927); (with L. Glahn), Der Prophet der Heimkehr (Jesaja 40–66) (2 vols., 1934); OT Theology (1936; ET 1957); Von Weg und Ziel: Eine Handreichung für heimliche Kinder Gottes (1938); (pseudonym H. Ratmich), Zwischen Himmel und Erde (1944); Kleine Lichter: 50 Bibelstellen erklärt (1945); Nöte und Pflege des inneren Lebens: Ein Versuch der Seelsorge (1945); Ein Schweizer wird Schweizer: Jugenderinnerungen, Protestantische Pfarrgemeinschaft (1946), autobiographical; Hebrew Man: With an Appendix on Justice in the Gate (1953; ET 1956); Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti Libros (1953); Eine Handvoll Neues Testament: Ehr- furcht vor dem Leben. A. Schweitzer Freundesgabe (1954); Wahres Leben (1954); Markus Evangelium (1957).

Bibliography: K. Engelken, BBKL 4 (1992) 246-55. F. Maas, RGG[3] 3 (1959) 1690.

P. TRUDINGER

KÖNIG, EDUARD (1846–1936)

Born Nov. 15, 1846, in Reichenbach (Vogtland/Saxony), K. studied philosophy and theology at Leipzig and served there as instructor and ausserordentlicher professor of OT from 1879 to 1888. In the latter year he accepted a full professorship in Rostock and in 1900 moved to Bonn, where he taught OT until his retirement in 1922. He died Feb. 12, 1936.

K.'s foremost contribution to biblical studies was in the field of linguistics. His earliest publications deal with the development of the Hebrew language, often in comparison with other Semitic languages. His philological and linguistic studies culminated in a three-volume work published over a period of sixteen years (1881, 1895, 1897). His Hebrew-Aramaic dictionary (1910, 1936[7]) was published in numerous editions.

Another area of K.'s work was devoted to questions of rhetoric and style. His most significant publications in this field are Stilistik, Rhetorik, Poetik in Bezug auf die biblische Literatur (1900), Die Poesie des Alten Testaments (Wissenschaft und Bildung 11, 1907), and Hebräische Rhythmik (1914). Grounding his analysis firmly on careful linguistic study and comparative Semitic philology, he examined the text of the OT in light of its argumentation and the degree of ambiguity with which the words of the biblical text covey its content. This textual ambiguity and the text's semantic open-endedness, which he saw as being grounded in human language and communication in general, underscored for him the need to engage the text on the level of its RHETORICAL and philological components within their own cultural context.

Theologically, K. maintained a strong confessional attitude toward the Bible and the supernatural origin of Yahwism. This is most evident in his books Der Offenbarungsbegriff des Alten Testamentes (2 vols., 1882), Das alttestamentliche Prophetentum (1910), and Die Wahrheit der alttestamentlichen Religion (1929). He criticized J. WELLHAUSEN's conception of the development of Israel's religious history for its implicit evolutionism, as well as attempts by Friedrich DELITZSCH and others to establish historical-developmental links between the biblical tradition and Babylonian religion in the BABEL UND BIBEL controversy. In addition, K. published commentaries on Deuteronomy (KAT 3, 1917), Genesis (1919), Isaiah (1926), Psalms (1927), and the book of Job (1929).

Works: Gedanke-Laut und Accent als die drei Factoren der Sprachbildung, comparative und physiologisch am Hebräischen dargestellt (1874); Neue Studien über Schrift, Aussprache, und allgemeine Formenlehre des Aethiopischen: Aus den Quellen geschöpft, comparativ und physiologisch erläutert von E. K. (1877); "De criticae sacrae argumento e linguae legibus repetito: ratione ducta maxime Geneseos Capp. 1–11, ejus historiam, naturam, vim examinavit" (diss. 1879); Historischkritisches Lehrgebäude der hebräischen Sprache, mit steter Beziehung auf Qimche und die anderen Auctoritaeten (1881, 1895, 1897); Der Offenbarungsbegriff des Alten Testamentes (2 vols., 1882); The Religious History of Israel: A Discussion of the Chief Problems in OT History as Opposed to the Development Theorists (1884; ET 1885); Falsche Extreme in der neueren Kritik des Alten Testaments (1885); Alttestamentliche Kritik und Christenglaube: Ein Wort zum Frieden (1893); Einleitung in das Alte Testament: Mit Einschluss der Apokryphen und der Pseudepigraphen Alten Testaments (Sammlung theologischer Handbücher, 2, 1, 1893); "The History and Method of Pentateuchal Criticism," Expositor 5, 3 (1896) 81-99; The Exiles' Book of Consolation Contained in Isaiah XL–LXVI: A Critical and Exegetical Study (1899); "The Emphatic State in Aramaic," AJSL 17 (1900–1901) 209-21; Stilistik, Rhetorik, Poetik in Bezug auf die biblische Literatur (1900); Fünf neue arabische Landschaftsnamen im Alten Testament: Mit einem Exkurs über die Paradiesesfrage (1901); Hebräisch und Semitisch: Prolegomena und Grundlinien einer Geschichte der semitischen Sprache. Nebst einem Excurs über die vorjosuanische Sprache Israels und die Pentateuchquelle PC (1901); The Bible and Babylon: A Brief Study in the History of Ancient Civilization (1902; ET 1903); Neueste Prinzipien der alttestamentlichen Kritik (1902); Im Kampf um das Alte Testament (1903); Der ältere Prophetismus: Bis auf die Heldengestalten von Elia und Elisa (Biblische Zeit- und Streitfragen, 1, 9, 1905); "Has the Name 'Jahwe' Been Found Among the Canaanites?" Expositor 17 (1905) 331-33; Die Poesie des Alten Testaments (Wissenschaft und Bildung 11, 1907); Talmud und Neues Testament (Biblische Zeit- und Streitfragen 3, 8, 1907); Geschichte des Reiches Gottes bis auf Jesus Christus (1908); Hebräische Grammatik für den Unterricht mit Übungsstücken und Wörterverzeichnissen methodisch dargestellt (1908); Das alttestamentliche Prophetentum (1910); Hebräisches und aramäisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament: Mit Einschaltung und Analyse aller schwer erkennbaren Formen, Deutung der Eigennamen sowie der massoretischen Randbemerkungen und einem deutsch-hebräischen Wortregister (1910, 1936[7]); "The Significance of the Patriarchs in the History of Religion," Expositor 7, 10 (1910) 193-207; "A Modern Expert's Judgment on the OT Historical Writings," Expositor 8, 1 (1911) 308-19; Geschichte der alttestamentlichen Religion kritisch dargestellt (1912, 1915[2]); "The Consummation of the OT in Jesus Christ," Expositor 8, 4 (1912) 1-19, 97-119; Die Geschichtschreibung im Alten Testament (Biblische Zeit- und Streitfragen, 8, 10, 1913); Hebräische Rhythmik: Die Gesetze des alttestamentlichen Vers- und Strophenbaues (1914); Die moderne Pentateuchkritik und ihre neueste Bekämpfung (1914); Geschichte der alttestamentlichen Religion, kritisch dargestellt (1915²); Hermeneutik des Alten Testaments (1916); Friedrich Delitzsch's "Die grosse Täuschung" kritisch beleuchtet (1921³); Moderne Vergewaltigung des Alten Testaments (1921); Die moderne Babylonisierung der Bibel in ihrer neuesten Erscheinungsform (Delitzschs "Bibel und Bibel," 1921) (1922); Theologie des Alten Testaments, kritisch und vergleichend dargestellt (1922); Die messianischen Weissagungen des Alten Testaments vergleichend, geschichtlich und exegetisch behandelt (1923, 1925²); "Are There Any Messianic Predictions," Theology 9 (1924) 6-13; Der doppelte Wellhausenianismus im Lichte meiner Quellenforschungen: Ein Ruckblick auf meine Mitarbeit im Gebiete der Sprach- und Religionswissenschaft (1927); Die Wahrheit der alttestamentlichen Religion (1929); Zentralkultstätte und Kultuszentralisierung im Alten Testament (BFCT 34, 3, 1931); Ist die moderne Pentateuchkritik auf Tatsachen begründet? Zur Beleuchtung aller neuester Behauptungen (1933).

Bibliography: H. Bardtke, *LTK*² 6 (1961) 446-47. L. A. Bushinski, NCE 8 (1967) 248-49. J. Coppens, DBSup 5 (1957) 189-92. K. Engelken, BBKL 4 (1992) 264-79. H. Gunkel, *RGG*² 3 (1929) 1126.

A. SIEDLECKI

KOPPE, JOHANN BENJAMIN (1750–91)

Born at Danzig, Aug. 19, 1750, K. studied philology and theology at the universities of Leipzig and Göttingen. He served as professor of Greek at Mittau (1774) before becoming superintendent and president of the consistory at Gotha (1784), where he directed the seminary for preachers. He died Feb. 12, 1791.

K. published a number of works and began the Novum Testamentum Graece perpetua annotatione illustratum (10 vols.), to which he contributed Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and Thessalonians. The volumes contain a corrected Greek text (mostly based on J. J. Griesbach), critical and philological notes, excursuses on difficult passages, and prolegomena to each book. K.'s special importance lies in synoptic Gospel study and in the interpretation of Isaiah. In 1783 he published a volume opposing the widely held view that Mark was a summary of Matthew and arguing that the Gospel writers were each dependent on older sources. In addition, he advocated the study of individual units of synoptic materials. His work helped bring the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM into discussion and anticipated later form-critical work (see FORM CRITICISM). His other influential work consisted of annotations to the German translation of R. LOWTH's book on Isaiah (1779–81). In his notes he argued not only that Isaiah 40–66 originated in the Babylonian exile but also that the material in First Isaiah has been redacted incoherently out of numerous small units and that the incoherence can be explained by appeal to the history of the growth of the material. He thus broke radically with the classical RHETORICAL approach to the book of Isaiah, associated with C. VITRINGA, and inaugurated an approach that climaxed in the commentary of B. DUHM (1892).

Works: De critica Veteris Testamenti caute adhibenda (1769); Vindiciae oraculorum a daemonum aeque imperio ac sacerdotum fraudibus (1774); Israelitus non 215 sed 480 annos in Aegypto commoratos esse (1777); R. Lowths . . . Jesaias neu übersetzt nebst einer Einleitung und kritischen philologischen und erläuternden Anmerkungen (4 pts, 1779–81); Interpretatio Isaiae, viii, 23 (1780); Ad Matthaeum, xii, 31, De peccato in Spiritum Sanctum (1781); Super Evangelio Marci (1782); Explicatio Moisis, iii, 14 (1783); Marcus non epitomator Matthaei (1783) = Sylloge commentationum (ed. D. J. Pott and G. A. Ruperti, 1800) 1:35-69; "On the Kingdom of God, etc." The Investigator 2 (1832–33) 207-17.

Bibliography: GSWW 5 (1809) 272-73, 712-13, 731-32. S. Newth, Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature (1866³) 2:759-60. J. A. Wagenmann, ADB 16 (1882) 692-93. B. Wiklander, Prophecy and Literature: A Text-Linguistic and Rhetorical Approach to Isaiah 2–4 (ConBOT 22, 1984) 8-15. J. H. Worman, CBTEL 5 (1873) 148.

J. H. HAYES

KOSTERS, WILLEM HENDRIK (1848–97)

K. was professor of OT at the University of Leiden from 1892 to his sudden death in 1897. During the period from the completion of his doctoral dissertation (1868) to his appointment as A. KUENEN's successor (1892), he served five successive pastorates while continuing to participate in biblical research. In his dissertation "De historiebeschouwing van den Deuteronomist met de berichten in Genesis–Numeri vergeleken" (1868), he argued against K. GRAF's position at that time, contending that the priestly narratives should be dated like the priestly laws to a time after the exile. He persuaded Kuenen to make the same adjustment in his two-volume work De godsdienst van Israel (1869–70), which for the first time spelled out in detail the theory of literary and religious development that later came to be known as the WELLHAUSEN hypothesis. K. was best known abroad for his 1893 work on Israel in the Persian period. In it he argued that the narratives of the return in Ezra and Nehemiah as well as Cyrus's edict were purely legendary and that, in fact, the Temple was rebuilt by the Jews who had remained in Jerusalem during the exile, while an actual return was deferred until the reign of Artaxerxes I, during the time of Ezra. Although creating great interest abroad (see Century Bible [1909]), this thesis was severely criticized by J. Wellhausen, A. van HOONACKER, and others.

Works: Het godsdienstig karakter van Israels historiographie (1892); Het herstel van Israel in het Perzische tijdvak (1893); "De denkbeelden over Jahve's volk ten tijde der ballingschap," ThT 29 (1895) 353-85; "Het tijdvak van Israel's herstel," ThT 29 (1895) 549-75; 30 (1896) 489-504; 31 (1897) 518-54; "Deutero-en Trito-Jesaja," ThT 30 (1896) 577-623.

Bibliography: S. J. DeVries, Bible and Theology in the Netherlands (1968, 1989) 50, 76-77, 79-80. H. Oort, "Levensbericht van W. H. K.," Levensberichten van afgestorven medeleden van de Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (1898) 230-41; ThT 32 (1898) 113-14.

S. J. DEVRIES

KRAELING, CARL HERMANN (1897–1966)

Born in Brooklyn, New York, K. graduated from Columbia University (AB 1918); Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia (BD 1926); and the University of Heidelberg (MST 1924 and ThD 1935). He earned a PhD from Columbia in 1927. K. was ordained to the Lutheran ministry in 1920 and from 1920 to 1929 taught NT at Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia. Between 1929 and 1950 he rose from assistant professor to Buckingham Professor of NT Criticism and Interpretation at Yale Divinity School, where he chaired the department of Near Eastern languages and literatures in the graduate school (1947–50). In 1950 he was appointed director of the Oriental Institute and professor of Hellenistic oriental ARCHAEOLOGY at the University of Chicago, retiring in 1962 as professor emeritus.

K. served as annual professor of the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH, Jerusalem, in 1935–36. After WWII he became resident scholar and director of research at the Dumbarton Oaks Library and Collection at Harvard (1946–47), having delivered the Dumbarton Oaks Symposium lectures in 1945 and the Lowell and Haskell lectures in 1946. His abiding interests in archaeology, Mediterranean art, and the social and cultural context of the NT are reflected in his published works. Of these the most important are probably his reports of the excavations at Dura-Europos, which are noted for their thoroughness.

Works: Ptolemais, City of the Libyan Pentapolis (1916, 1962); (with E. R. Morey and E. K. Rand), The Gospel Book of Landevennec (1931); A Greek Fragment of Tatian's Diatessaron (1935); Anthropos and Son of Man: A Study in the Religious Syncretism of the Hellenistic Orient (1937); (ed.), Gerassa, City of the Decapolis (1938); John the Baptist (1951, 1972); (with R. Adams), City Invincible: A Symposium on Urbanization and Cultural Development in the Ancient Near East (1960); Archaeology: Excavations at Dura Europos VIII: The Synagogue (1956, repr. 1979); (with L. Mowry), "Music in the Bible," New Oxford History of Music (ed E. Wellesz, 1 [1957]) 283-312; The Christian Building (1967).

Bibliography: Who Was Who in America 4 (1969) 542.

J. M. BULLARD

KRAELING, EMIL GOTTLIEB HEINRICH (1892–1956)

From an American Lutheran family noted for accomplishment in biblical scholarship, K. was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1892 and educated at New York University (BS 1915) and at Columbia (PhD 1917). For twenty-four years he taught OT at Union Theological Seminary, seven of which he was visiting professor of Semitic languages at Columbia University. In retirement he continued private biblical research until his death.

K. is perhaps best known for his deciphering and publishing the Brooklyn Museum papyri (1953), which are of considerable importance for the understanding of ancient Jewish law. K. also turned his attention to problems of the NT, producing popular portraits of PAUL, early Christianity, and the disciples of JESUS. His influence on biblical studies, particularly in America, has been considerable: His Bible Atlas is widely used, his commentaries on the Hebrew prophets (1966) are popular, and his OT Since the Reformation (1955) is an indispensible basic survey. However, his major contribution to scholarship is the Brooklyn Elephantine papyri.

Works: Aram and Israel (1918); The Book of the Ways of God (1938); The Rand McNally Bible Atlas (1950, 1962[2], 1966[3]); The New Elephantine Papyrus in the Brooklyn Museum (1953); The OT Since the Reformation (1955, 1969); Rand McNally Bible Atlas (1956, 1962[2]); Rand McNally Historical Atlas of the Holy Land (1959); with M. Avi-Yonah contributed NT text to Our Living Bible (1962); The Four Gospels (1964); The Disciples (1966); "I Have Kept the Faith": The Life of the Apostle Paul (1965); Commentary on the Prophets (2 vols., 1966); The Prophets (1969).

Bibliography: Directory of American Scholars 2 (1951) 520-21.

J. M. BULLARD

KUENEN, ABRAHAM (1828–91)

Born in Haarlem, the Netherlands, K. was both a student and a teacher at Leiden. Since the school had no chair of OT, he received his doctorate under the tutelage of J. Scholten, professor of NT and dogmatic theology, whose work inaugurated the so-called modernist movement in Dutch theology while summoning Dutch biblical study to the critical standards of German scholarship. After writing his doctoral dissertation on an Arabic Pentateuchal manuscript, K. was put in charge of the university's extensive Arabic collection. Two years later (1855) he was given a faculty position in biblical studies and after three years was promoted to full professor. Although a lecturer in NT, his interest turned to OT criticism, for which he quickly gained recognition in Holland and abroad. In 1877 in recognition of his distinction in this field, a special chair of OT was established at Leiden, which K. filled until his death in 1891.

A leader in the modernist movement, K. edited a new journal, Theologisch Tijdschrift, and served the intellectual needs of the progressive laity in the newly formed Protestanten Bond and of the theologically trained in an organization called the Vergadering van Moderne Theologen. The main goal of these efforts was to throw off Calvinistic orthodoxy (see CALVIN), with its doctrine of supernatural revelation, and embrace a naturalistic historicism in its place. Although a strong leader, K. occupied a moderate position compared to the radical empiricism of C. Opzoomer, A. Pierson, and their deeply skeptical Amsterdam school of NT criticism. K. continued to maintain that the Bible is "inspired" (see INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE) in the same way the sacred scriptures of all religions are "inspired." The basic principle of his biblical criticism was that human factors explain the historical emergence of a particular writing; it is not necessary to introduce the element of supernatural dictation or even of divine guidance to gain a scientific understanding of the Bible. Because he self-consciously remained true to what he understood as the spirituality of the Bible, K. was a vigorous defender of the right of modernists to remain in their pulpits despite the reaction of resurgent orthodoxy.

Although he occasionally ventured into such fields as NT and comparative religions (1882), K. was constantly engaged with OT criticism and with the history of ancient Israel. It is unfortunate that many of his LITERARY-critical studies appeared in Dutch and have never been translated, with the exception of those included in K. BUDDE's biographical volume (1894). While J. WELLHAUSEN was attracting a wide readership and laying down the principles of the Hexateuchal criticism that would guide OT criticism for the next hundred years, foreign scholars were rarely capable of following K.'s lengthy, insightful, and detailed studies of difficult passages of Scripture. Thus they had to learn his views—and the extent to which he collaborated with K. GRAF, Wellhausen, and others in establishing the so-called new documentary hypothesis—from his major books, which were translated into one or more foreign languages. Although Graf claimed credit in 1869 for first proposing that the entire priestly code (P) was of postexilic origin, K. had in fact put this view into print as early as 1868 and corresponded with Graf about J. COLENSO's work, which cast doubt on the antiquity and reliability of the narrative in P. When K.'s masterful book on the religion of Israel appeared in 1869, its espousal of this crucial point was interpreted as borrowing from Graf, whereas, in fact, K.'s advocacy of it was first carried out in private correspondence with Graf. K. continued to speak for himself, but his attachment to the Dutch language took its toll in denying him the measure of recognition he deserved.

Works: Historisch-kritsch onderzoek naar het ontstaan en de verzameling van de boeken des Ouden Verbonds (3 vols., 1861–65; 1885–93[2]; partial ET by J. W. Colenso, The Pentateuch and Book of Joshua Critically Examined [1865] with Colenso's notes, and by P. H. Wicksteed, An Historico-critical Inquiry into the Origin and Composition of the Hexateuch [Pentateuch and Book of Joshua] [1886], which contains K.'s informative survey of Hexateuchal studies for the years 1860–85, xi-xl); The Prophets and Prophecy in Israel: An Historical and Critical Enquiry (1875; ET 1877); The Religion of Israel to the Fall of the Jewish State (2 vols., 1869–70; ET 3 vols., 1874–75); "Critical Method," Modern Review 2 (1880) 461-88, 685-713; National Religions and Universal Religions (Hibbert Lectures, 1882); Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur biblischen Wissenschaft von Dr. A. K. (ed. K. Budde, 1894), with full bibliography compiled by W. C. van Manen.

Bibliography: P. Dirksen and A. van der Kooij (eds.), Abraham Kuenen (OTS 29, 1993). A. Kamphausen, RE[3] 11 (1902) 162-70. H. Oort, "Kuenen als godgeleerde," De Gids 3 (1892) 509-65. C. H. Toy, New World 1 (1892) 64-88. S. J. DeVries, "The Hexateuchal Criticism of A. K.," JBL 82 (1963) 51-57; Bible and Theology in the Netherlands (1968) 56-86. P. H. Wicksteed, JQR 4 (1892) 471-89 (K.'s bibliography, 571-605).

S. J. DEVRIES

KUHN, KARL GEORG (1906–76)

Born Mar. 6, 1906, in Thaleischweiler in the Palatinate, K. dedicated himself to theology and to Near Eastern studies, along with rabbinic literature, which he pursued as a guest in the Rabbinerseminar in Breslau. His teacher in Tübingen was the orientalist E. Littmann, under whom he received his PhD in 1931 and his habilitation in Near Eastern languages and history in 1934. In 1942 K. was named ausserordentlicher professor in Tübingen, and in 1949 J. JEREMIAS brought him to Göttingen as professor of NT. In 1954 K. received a call to the University of Heidelberg as full professor in NT. He founded the Qumran Research Center at Heidelberg in 1957, and in 1964 he became a member of the Academy of Sciences. He retired in 1971 and died Sept. 15, 1976.

On the basis of his research on Judaism in late antiquity, K. furthered the understanding of NT writings in essential ways. His most important work on rabbinic literature is his translation of and commentary on the MIDRASH Sipre on Numbers (1959). His study comparing the Jewish prayer of eighteen benedictions in these texts with the Lord's prayer is of primary importance for the NT. For the preaching of JESUS, his article on the kingdom of God in rabbinic literature, which appeared in TWNT (1933), is indispensable. In the area of the Qumran texts (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), K. was the leading scholar in West Germany; his Qumran Research Center attracted many foreign scholars to Heidelberg, sometimes for months. The Konkordanz zu den Qumrantexten (1960), which he published, established itself as the most important international concordance of the Qumran texts. Above all, his studies on the Lord's Supper (1957), the Gospel of John (1962), the letter to the Ephesians (1960), and particularly the essay "New Light on Temptation, Sin, and the Flesh in the NT" (1958), which drew on the Qumran texts, are still influential. K. emphasized the interdependence of strict critical research and consultation of the Jewish sources of late antiquity as scarcely any other NT scholar of his day.

Works: "Basileus etc.," TWNT 1 (1933) 570-73; Die älteste Textgestalt der Psalmen Salomos (BWANT 73, 1937); Achtzehngebet und Vaterunser und der Reim (WUNT 1, 1950); Phylakterien aus Höhle 4 von Qumran (AHAW.PH 1957.1, 1957); "The Lord's Supper and the Communal Meal at Qumran" and "New Light on Temptation, Sin, and Flesh in the NT," The Scrolls and the NT (ed. K. Stendahl, 1957) 65-93, 94-113; Rückläufiges Hebräisches Wörterbuch/Retrograde Hebrew Lexikon (assisted by H. Stegemann and G. Klinzing, 1958); Der tannaitische Midrasch Sifre zu Numeri (Rabbinische Texte 2.3, 1959, 1975); Konkordanz zu den Qumrantexten (in cooperation with A.-M. Denis, R. Deichgräber, W. Eiss, G. Jeremias, and H.-W. Kuhn, 1960); "Johannesevangelium und Qumrantexte," Neotestamentica et Patristica (FS O. Cullmann, 1962) 111-22, "Nachträge zur 'Konkordanz zu den Qumrantexten' " RdQ 4, no. 14 (assisted by U. Müller, W. Schmücker, and H. Stegemann, 1963) 163-234; "Goljonim und Sifre minim," Judentum, Urchristentum, Kirche (FS J. Jeremias, 19642) 24-61; "The Epistle to the Ephesians in the Light of the Qumran Texts," Paul and Qumran (ed. J. Murphy-O'Connor, 1968) 115-31 (ET of NTS 7 [1960/61] 334-46); "Jesus in Gethsemane," Redaktion und Theologie des Passionsberichtes nach den Synoptikern (Wege der Forschung 481, ed. M. Limbeck, 1981) 81-111.

Bibliography: M. Delcor, "Où en sont les études qumrâniennes?" Qumrân: Sa piété, sa théologie et son milieu (ed. M. Delcor, BETL 46, 1978) 11-46, esp. 17-20. G. Jeremias, H.-W. Kuhn and H. Stegemann (eds.), Tradition und Glaube: Das frühe Christentum in seiner Umwelt (FS K. G. K., 1971). H. W. Kuhn, "K. G. K., 70 Jahre," Ruperto Carola: Zeitschrift der Vereinigung der Freunde der Studentenschaft der Universität Heidelberg e.V. 28, Heft 57 (1976) 106-7; 28/29, Heft 58/59 (1976–77) 117; "K. G. K., der Forscher und der Lehrer," ibid., 31, Heft 62/63 (1979) 53-58; "Antrittsrede von Herrn K. G. K.," Jahrbuch der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1963–64 (1965) 61-63 (autobiographical); Meyers Enzyklopädisches Lexikon 14 (1975[9]) 430; 26 (1984[2]) 480. H. Stegemann and G. Jeremias, "Die Qumranforschungsstelle Marburg und ihre Aufgabenstellung: Ein Bericht," Qumrân: Sa piété, sa théologie et son milieu (ed. M. Delcor, BETL 46, 1978) 47-54, esp. 50-51.

H.-W. KUHN

KÜMMEL, WERNER GEORG (1905–95)

Born on May 16, 1905, in Heidelberg, Germany, K. was the son of a professor of medicine. After studying theology in Heidelberg, Berlin, and Marburg, he received his doctorate in 1928 at Heidelberg with a dissertation directed by M. DIBELIUS that was published in 1929 under the title Römer 7 und die Bekehrung des Paulus (UNT 17). From 1930 to 1932 he was an assistant at Marburg to H. von Soden. In 1932 he became ausserordentlicher professor and in 1946 full professor of NT at Zurich. He moved to Mainz in 1951 and the following year succeeded R. BULTMANN at Marburg, where he retired in 1973. He died July 9, 1995, at Mainz.

K. began his more than sixty years of research in a pioneering fashion with a dissertation that was thoroughly grounded both methodologically and exegetically. In a proposal that was widely accepted, he argued that in Romans 7 PAUL is speaking from the perspective of a Christian about persons without Christ. K. was dedicated to historical-critical work, always closely examining the TEXTUAL form and content of the NT writings "judiciously and critically" and avoiding any vague constructions. He profoundly furthered research into the persons of JESUS and Paul and into the problems of primitive Christianity, introductory scholarship, and the history of research itself by means of numerous articles and extensive reviews, above all "by means of exegesis" (Promise and Fulfillment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus [ET 1961[2]] 7).

In the 1930s his focus evolved beyond his research into Paul to Jesus' position and importance within the framework of his Jewish environment. Over the ensuing decades K. worked out the particularities and the essence of Jesus' activity and message through numerous studies. K. sought, existentially and exegetically-theologically, to clarify Jesus' eschatological proclamation on the one hand and the relationship of "Jesus-Paul" on the other hand, most notably in Promise and Fulfillment. Here, too, he remained with the fundamental questions of eschatology and the history of salvation: "One cannot choose between Jesus and Paul, one can only encounter in the witness of Paul that Jesus who is the ground and truth of that witness" (Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte [1965] 1:456).

The larger context is the theological understanding of God's salvation activity as a historical activity that reflects the fundamental persuasion of primitive Christianity. It is within this context that one should view the eschatological proclamation of Jesus (although K's assumption of a brief intermediary period between Jesus' death and the coming of the parousia remains controversial), a proclamation encompassing God's present and future activity in which "he who will bring in the Kingdom of God in the future has appeared in the present" and "the powers of the coming aeon are already at work" (Promise and Fulfillment, 153).

K.'s enduring interests are expressed in his later works. Since 1950 research into the person of Jesus, including individual investigations concerning the question of the historical Jesus and the title "Son of man" as it is traced back to Jesus specifically, has been comprehensively and critically reviewed (1985, 1994). Research into Paul has been exegetically treated in the supplements to H. LIETZMANN's An die Korinther 1.2 (HNT 9, 1949[4], 1969[5]), and the rest—including JOHANNINE research—has been sketched out in the status of scholarship entries on the twentieth century. One comprehensive presentation is the Theology of the NT According to its Major Witnesses: Jesus-Paul-John (NTD, Eränzungsreihe 3, 1969; ET 1973), a work that focuses on reconstruction and, within its own interpretation, also illuminates both the unity and the differences among the NT witnesses. A classic work of introductory scholarship is the completely revised edition of the introduction by P. Feine and J. Behm (ET 1975). Appearing justifiably under K.'s name, it was not conceived as a "literary history of primitive Christianity." Rather, it extensively treats the individual NT writings in canonical order (with Paul's letters organized chronologically).

All these works variously articulate the path of scholarship that K. offered as a commentator on textual extracts in his standard work on the history of NT scholarship (ET 1970). Two collections of his essays contain studies of individual questions (1965, 1978). In addition to his own publications, he also functioned as editor and coeditor of Theologische Rundschau (1957–83), Jüdische Schriften aus hellenistisch-römischer Zeit (1973), and Marburger Theologische Studien (1963–85). Two Festschriften (1975, 1978[2]; 1985), with particular attention given to the important areas of his research, have been dedicated to K., who of the scholars in our century was probably the one best acquainted with NT scholarship.

Works: Die Eschatologie der Evangelien: Ihre Geschichte und ihr Sinn (1936); Kirchenbegriff und Geschichtsbewusstsein in der Urgemeinde und bei Jesus (SymBU 1, 1943, 1968[2]); Promise and Fulfillment: The Eschatological Message of Jesus (1945; ET 1961[2]); Man in the NT (ATANT 13, 1948; rev. and enl. ET 1963); NTHIP (OA 3, 3, 1958, 1970[2]; ET 1970); Introduction to the New Testament (P. Feine and J. Behm, 1963[12], 1983[21]; ET 1975); Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte: Gesammelte Aufsätze 1933–64 (MTS 3, ed. E. Grässer, O. Merk, and A. Fritz, 1965), bibliography for 1929–64; Theology of the NT According to Its Major Witnesses: Jesus-Paul-John (NTD, Ergänzungsreihe 3, 1969; ET 1973=); Das Neue Testament im 20. Jahrhundert: Ein Forschungsbericht (SBS 50, 1970); (ed.), Jüdische Schriften aus hellenistisch-römischer Zeit (1973–); Jesu Antwort and den Johannes den Täufer: Ein Beispiel zum Methodenproblem in der Jesusforschung (SbWGF 11, 4, 1974); Römer 7 und das Bild des Menschen im Neuen Testament (TBü 53, 1974) = repr. of his diss. plus Das Bild des Menschen in the enl. ET; Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte, Bd. 2, Gesammelte Aufsätze 1965–77 (MTS 16, ed. E. Grässer and O. Merk, 1978), bibliography for 1965–78; Jesus der Menschensohn? (SbWGF 20, 3, 1984); Dreissig Jahre Jesusforschung (1950–80) (BBB 60, ed. H. Merklein, 1985); "L'exégèse scientifique au XX[e] siècle: le Nouveau Testament," BTT 8 (1985) 473-515; Vierzig Jahre Jesusforshung (1950–90) (BBB 91, ed. H. Merklein, 1994).

Bibliography: O. Böcher, "W. G. K. zum Gedanken," TLZ 120 (1995) 945-46. E. Earle Ellis and E. Grässer (eds.), Jesus und Paulus: Festschrift für W. G. K. zum 70. Geburtstag (1975, 1978[2]). E. Grässer, Die Naherwartung Jesu (SBS 61, 1973) 102-24; "Verheissung und Erfüllung: W. G. K.s Verständnis der Eschatologie Jesu," Glaube und Eschatologie: Festschrift für W. G. K. zum 80. Geburtstag (ed. E. Grässer und O. Merk, 1985) 33-49; "W. G. K. zum 90. Geburtstag," ZNW 86 (1995) 3-4. O. Merk, "Nestor der Neutestamentler: Professor Kümmel, 90 Jahre alt," Marburger Universitäts-Zeitung 247 (June 1, 1995) 4.

O. MERK

L

LACHMANN, KARL KONRAD FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1793–1851)

Born Mar. 4, 1793, L. studied at Leipzig and Göttingen. He served as Privatdozent (Göttingen, 1815; Berlin, 1816), ausserordentlicher professor (Königsberg, 1818; Berlin, 1825), and professor of classical and German philology at Berlin from 1827 and director of the philological seminar's Latin section from 1829 until his death on Mar. 13, 1851.

Known for his Nibelungenlied scholarship, his editions of W. von Eschenbach and Lucretius, his division of Homer's Iliad into independent lays, and his edition of the work of G. LESSING, L. is also known for his application of rigorous philological methods to the study of the NT. Rejecting the textus receptus, he published two provisional editions of the NT based on the earliest manuscript traditions available. His 1831 edition lists the differences between his text and the textus receptus, and his 1842 edition contains a critical apparatus. L. concluded that the SYNOPTICS relied on an older source (Lessing's Ur-Gospel), which Mark was the first canonical writer (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) to use, and that the canonical Matthew reflected two sources, the hypothetical Ur-Gospel and PAPIAS's Logia (F. Schleiermacher's "sayings" collection). L.'s contributions to classical scholarship were numerous (see J. Sandys, History of Classical Scholarship [1908] 3:127-31).

Works: "Rechenschaft über seine Ausgabe des Neuen Testaments," TSK 3 (1830) 817-45; Novum Testamentum Graece et Latine (1831); "De Ordine Narrationum in Evangelüs Synopticis," TSK 8 (1835) 570-90; (with P. Buttmann), Novum Testamentum Graece et Latine (2 vols., 1842–50).

Bibliography: M. Hertz, K. L.: Eine Biographie (1851). W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (1976) 16-17, 66. W. G. Kümmel, NTHIP, 146-48. J. Kuhnel, NDB 13 (1982) 371-74. B. M. Metzger, The Text of the NT: Its Transmission, Corruption, and Restoration (1968²) 124-26, 157. E. Michels, DB 4 (1908) 27-29. F. X. Pölzl, "Über K. L.," Begründer der neuen Ära der neutestamentlichen Textkritik (1889). A. Rüegg, Die neutestamentliche Textkritik seit L.: Ein Versuch zur Orientierung (1892). T. Timpanaro, La Genesi del metodo del L. (1963).

S. R. MANDELL

LAGARDE, PAUL ANTON DE (1827–91)

Born Paul Bötticher in Berlin, L. was adopted by his great-aunt Ernestine de Lagarde, whose name he took in 1854. Educated in Berlin and Halle, he succeeded H. EWALD as professor of oriental languages in Göttingen (1869–91). L. was a linguistic genius of incredible industry who published and edited texts and studies in Arabic, Aramaic, Armenian, Bactrian, Coptic, Greek, Hebrew, Latin, Persian, and Syriac. He produced political treatises, critiques of religion, pedagogy, finance, and economics; he also wrote poetry. However, he considered his life's mission the production of a critical edition of the SEPTUAGINT (LXX), though he edited a number of NT and non-LXX related HB textual materials as well.

His first publication, Horae aramaicae (1847), shows his interest in and use of the LXX, which for L. was of fundamental importance to the HB since its parent text was a thousand years older than the MT. But the dominant Sixtina of his day was of little use for recreating that parent text since it, as well as all LXX manuscripts, was an eclectic text. Before the LXX could be used a concerted effort would have to be made to rid the text of all eclecticism, i.e., the autographon must be restored insofar as that might be possible.

To that end, not only the old uncial manuscripts, but also all cursive (i.e., the younger) manuscripts would have to be exactly collated. L. traveled to libraries in London, Rome, and Paris and copied a number of these manuscripts out by hand. Furthermore, he maintained that the versions based on the LXX (Latin, Arabic, Armenian, Ethiopic, Coptic, and Syriac) must also be studied and carefully collated for the parent Greek text form on which they were based. Similarly the patristic evidence would have to be gathered and critical editions prepared.

L. knew this could only be done in stages, and although at times he prepared elaborate specimens of such a critical text for a few verses, he realized that he would never be able to complete the final stage of a critical text with full apparatuses of variant readings. In fact he believed that before such a critical text could be isolated the trifaria varietas (see Jerome's preface to Chronicles), i.e., the hexaplaric recension dominant in Palestine, the Lucianic in Syria, and the Hesychian in Egypt would have to be identified. Thus he published the first volume of what he believed to be the Lucianic text, an unfortunate attempt since he failed to realize that the adherence of manuscripts to a text form is often inconsistent.

Although L. never accomplished his purpose, his overall plan was continued by his last disciple, A. RAHLFS, and the Septuaginta-Unternehmen of Göttingen was founded in 1908. Rahlfs completed L.'s unfinished manuscripts after L.'s death in 1891.

Works: Horae aramaicae (1847); Acta apostolorum coptice (1852); Epistulae NT coptice (1852); De NT ad versionem orientalium fidem edendo (1857); Libri VT Apocryphi Syriace (1861); Anmerkungen zur griechischen Übersetzung des Proverbien (1863); Die vier Evangelien arabisch aus der Wiener Handschrift herausgeben (1864); Materialien zur Kritik und Geschichte des Pentateuchs (1867); Der Pentateuch koptisch (1867); Genesis graece (1868); Onomastica sacra (1870); Prophetae chaldaice (1872); Hagiographa chaldaice (1873); Psalterium iuxta Hebraeos Hieronymi (1874); Psalterii versio memphitica . . . e recognitione P. L. (1875); Kritische Anmerkungen zum Buch Isaias (1878); Bruchstücke der koptischen Übersetzung des AT (1879); Die Pariser Blätter des Codex Sarravianus (1879); VT ab Origene recensiti fragmenta apud Syros servata quinque (1880); Ankündigung einer neuen Ausgabe der griechischen Übersetzung des AT (1882); Aegyptiaca (1883); Librorum VT canonicorum pars prior Graece (1883); Catenae in Evangelica Aegyptiacae quae supersunt (1886); Novae Psalterii graeci editionis specimen (1887); Septuaginta-Studien (2 vols., 1890–92); Bibliothecae Syriacae a P. de Lagarde collectae quae ad philologiam sacram pertinent (1892); Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum (1892).

Bibliography: R. Hanhart, "P. A. L. und seine Kritik an der Theologie," Theologie in Göttingen: Eine Vorlesungsreihe (1987) 271-305. A. de Lagarde, P. L.: Erinnerungen aus seiner Leben zusammengestellt (1918). R. W. Lougee, P. L., 1827–91: A Study of Radical Conservatism in Germany (1962), see 323-26 for bibliography. A. Rahlfs, P. L.s wissenschaftliches Lebenswerk im Rahmen einer Geschichte seines Lebens dargestellt (1928). L. Schemann, P. L.: Ein Lebens- und Erinnerungensbild (1919).

J. W. WEVERS

LAGRANGE, MARIE-JOSEPH (1855–1938)

Born Mar. 7, 1855, L. took a doctorate in law at Paris before deciding to become a priest. He entered the Toulouse province of the Dominicans on Oct. 6, 1879, and received the religious name Marie-Joseph. In October 1880 the students of the Toulouse province went into exile in Spain because of French anti-clerical legislation. L.'s study of Thomistic theology at Salamanca gave him a life-long passion for rigorous logic, precise expression, and fine distinctions. Ordained priest Dec. 22, 1883, he was awarded the lectorate in theology (then equivalent to a doctorate) on July 14, 1884. Already proficient in Greek and Latin, he devoted his leisure moments during these four years to Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic.

After teaching church history at Salamanca (1884–86) and Scripture and philosophy at Toulouse (1886–88), he was finally authorized to specialize in Scripture; and in 1888 he enrolled at the University of Vienna, where he concentrated on languages (Egyptian, Assyrian, Arabic) but also studied rabbinic exegesis and the Mishnah. In 1890 he arrived in Jerusalem with orders from his superiors to found a school for biblical studies. Despite immense difficulties, on Nov. 15 he inaugurated the École pratique d'études bibliques with four professors, three students, and no library, in a classroom that had been a slaughterhouse. In 1920 the school became the École biblique et archéologique française.

Not the least aspect of L.'s achievement was his genius at spotting talent in very young students. Within a few years he had recruited and trained scholars of the caliber of A. Jaussen, L.-H. VINCENT, R. Savignac, L. ABEL, and E. DHORME. While he concentrated on the biblical text, he assigned the students to specializations (topography, archaeology, epigraphy, languages) that in teamwork would fulfill his ideal of the historical method, the combination of document and monument. A stream of original research quickly demanded an outlet, so in 1892 he founded the Revue Biblique and in 1900 the monograph series Études Bibliques; both still flourish.

When one considers the amount of time he spent in the field of pioneering research, notably in Sinai and Petra, L.'s literary productivity is without parallel. He published twenty-nine books, 248 articles, and over 1,500 book reviews. In addition to full-scale commentaries on Judges (1903), Mark (1911), Romans (1916), Galatians (1918), Luke (1921), Matthew (1923), and John (1925), which retain much of their value, his research produced major works on the CANON of the NT, messianism, intertestamental Judaism, and NT TEXTUAL CRITICISM. His articles made highly original contributions in areas as diverse as the theology of INSPIRATION, patrology, and Palestinian topography.

During the modernist crisis in the Roman Catholic Church, his rigorously critical approach, crystallized in his programmatic book La méthode historique (1903), won him enemies among the traditionalists, but his finely tuned sense of the responsibilities of faith and the rights of reason enabled him to combine loyal submission to the church with academic freedom. Eventually his vision of authentic research prevailed, and his combination of profound theology and stringent historical criticism became the model and inspiration of all subsequent developments in Roman Catholic biblical studies. Before ill health forced him to leave Jerusalem in 1935, he had initiated a second generation of brilliant scholars, notably P. BENOIT, B. Couroyer, and R. de VAUX. He died at Saint-Maximin in France, Mar. 10, 1938.

Works: Synopsis evangelica: textum graecum quattuor evangeliorum recensuit et iuxta ordinem chronologicum Lucae praesertim et Johannis concinnavit (1926); L'Evangile de Jésus-Christ (1928); M. Loisy et le modernisme (1932); Au service de la Bible: Souvenirs personnels par le Père Lagrange (ed. P. Benoit, 1967; ET Père Lagrange: Personal Reflections and Memoirs [1985]); Exégète à Jérusalem: Nouveaux mélanges d'histoire religieuse (Cahiers de la Revue Biblique 29, 1991).

Bibliography: F.-M. Braun, L'oeuvre du Père Lagrange: Etude et bibliographie (1943). H. Haag, "Wider die Angst vor der Freiheit: Die Geschichte der Pioniers katholischer Bibelwissenschaft M.-J. L. (1855–1938)," Gegenentwürfe: 24 Lebensläufe für eine andere Theologie (ed. H. Häring and K.-J. Kuschel, 1988) 269-81. F. Laplanche et al., Naissance de la méthode critique (1992). J. Murphy-O'Connor, The Ecole Biblique and the NT: A Century of Scholarship (1890–1990) (NTOA 13, 1990). R. de Vaux, Bible et Orient (1967) 9-22. L.-H. Vincent, RB 47 (1938) 321-54.

J. MURPHY-O'CONNOR

LAKE, KIRSOPP (1872–1946)

Born in Southampton, Apr. 7, 1872, L. was educated at St. Paul's School and Lincoln College, Oxford (BA 1895; MA 1897), and entered the clergy. Ordained deacon (1895) and priest (1896), he served as curate at Lumley, Durham (1895–96) and St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford (1897–1904). During the latter appointment he also catalogued Greek manuscripts at the Bodleian Library. He subsequently served as professor of early Christian literature and NT exegesis at Leiden (1904–14), visiting professor at Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge, Massachusetts (1913), professor of early Christian literature at Harvard Divinity School (1915–19, simultaneously lecturer in NT at Union Seminary in New York City), Winn Professor of Ecclesiastical History (1919–32), and professor of history at Harvard (1932–38). He retired in 1938 and died Nov. 10, 1946.

L. visited libraries at Mt. Athos and throughout Europe and the Near East, photographing Greek manuscripts, many of which were eventually published in facsimile (1911, 1922, 1934–39). In addition, he organized archaeological work (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) in the Sinai to investigate the Serabit el-Khadem proto-Semitic inscriptions and to continue the Harvard excavations at Samaria. His primary contributions to biblical scholarship, which received international recognition, were in paleography, TEXTUAL CRITICISM, and the history of the early church and Christian literature. His 1902 work led to the designation "Family 1" or the "Lake group" of NT manuscripts. His magisterial five-volume work on the beginnings of Christianity, contributed to by a number of scholars, retains its usefulness. L. stressed the study of contemporary culture, especially Greco-Roman, for an understanding of the NT. In addition to his biblical studies, he translated The Apostolic Fathers (1912) and the first volume of EUSEBIUS's Ecclesiastical History (1926) in the Loeb Classical Library and founded the series Studies and Documents.

Works: The Text of the NT (1900; rev. by S. New, 1928[6]); Codex 1 of the Gospels and Its Allies (1902); The Historical Evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus Christ (1907); The Earlier Epistles of St. Paul: Their Motive and Origin (1911); (with his wife Helen), Codex Sinaiticus Petropolitanus: The NT, the Epistles of Barnabas, and the Shepherd of Hermas (1911); (ed. with F. J. Foakes Jackson), The Beginnings of Christianity, pt. 1, The Acts of the Apostles (5 vols., 1920–33); (with his wife Helen), Codex Sinaiticus Petropolitanus et Friderico-Augustanus: The OT Preserved (1922); The Religion of Yesterday and Tomorrow (1925); (ed. with S. New), Six Collations of NT Manuscripts (1932); (with his wife Silva), Dated Greek Minuscule Manuscripts to the Year 1200 (10 fascicles, 1934–39); Paul: His Heritage and Legacy (1934); An Introduction to the NT (1937).

Bibliography: R. P. Casey et al. (eds.), Quantulacumque: Studies Presented to K. L. by Pupils, Colleagues, and Friends (1937). F. C. Grant, DNB, 1941–50 (1959) 466-67. B. M. Metzger, DAB Sup. 4 (1946–50) (1974) 467-69.

J. H. HAYES

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF

One of the Five Scrolls (Megilloth) of the Kethubim section of the HB, Lamentations is recited in Jewish services for Tishe'ah be-Ab, the ninth day of the month Ab, as a memorial to the destruction of Jerusalem and the Solomonic and Herodian temples. In the Leningrad and Aleppo codices the Five Scrolls are grouped together, with Lamentations appearing fourth, while in most printed HBs Lamentations appears third among the scrolls according to its place in the annual Jewish liturgical calendar.

The book, named 'êkâ (How?) in the Hebraic tradition for the first word of the book, is also known as qînôtt (Laments) and megillath 'êkâ/qînôth (Scroll of How?/Laments) in rabbinic writings (see Jerome's term Cinoth in his Prologus Galeatus). It is called threnoi (Dirges) or threnoi Ieremíou (Dirges of Jeremiah) in the SEPTUAGINT, Lamentationes in the Latin, and "The Book of Lamentations of Jeremiah the Prophet" in the Syriac PESHITTA.

The five chapters of Lamentations are five alphabetic poems, the first four of which are alphabetic acrostics. (The normal order of 'ayin/pe is reversed in poems 2–4.) The fifth poem is considered to be alphabetic because it contains twenty-two verses, the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, even though it appears not to be an acrostic. (See, however, S. Bergler, "Threni V—nur ein alphabetisierendes Lied? Versuch einer Deutung," VT 27 (1977) 304-20, for a not altogether convincing attempt to read the opening letter of each verse as an acrostic sentence.)

Judging from manuscript evidence and from the versions, the text of Lamentations has not suffered significant deterioration. Moreover, there are no indications of any great difficulty with canonizing the book, in contrast to Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. The problems of interpreting Lamentations have focused on issues of authorship and date, purpose and theology, literary analysis, and interpretation of the dramatis personae.

1. Author and Date. Although the book of Lamentations is anonymous in the HB, Jeremiah was viewed universally as its author before the era of historical and LITERARY criticism. Its date of composition was placed either shortly after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (c. 586 BCE) or at the time of King Josiah's death (see 2 Chr 35:25). In addition to the Septuagint, the TARGUM also attributes Jeremiad authorship, as do Lamentations Rabbah (see, e.g., Petihtoth 12-14, 22, 26, 27, 31, 32, and Parashah One on Lam 1:1) and rabbinic tradition (see, e.g., Babylonian talmud, B. Bat. 15a). In the Septuagint, the Peshitta, and the VULGATE, Lamentations is placed immediately following the book of Jeremiah; in the Septuagint and the Vulgate, Lamentations opens with a prologue or subtitle attributing it to the prophet Jeremiah. The church fathers consistently assumed Jeremiah to be the author. In the Middle Ages RASHI began his commentary by stating that Jeremiah wrote Lamentations and that it was the scroll that King Jehoiakim burned. IBN EZRA accepted Jeremiah as author but denied on textual grounds that Lamentations was the scroll Jehoiakim burned. CALVIN (see, e.g., comments on Lam 1:1; 2:20; 3:1), along with other reform scholars, continued in this tradition.

The first to question Jeremiad authorship seems to have been H. von der HARDT, who in 1712 proposed that the five poems were composed by Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and King Jehoiachin respectively (G. Ricciotti [1924] 35). Most scholars of the nineteenth century (e.g., J. Augusti, C. Conz, H. Ewald, E. Schrader, T. Nöldeke, A. Kuenen, C. Nägelsbach, T. Cheyne) concluded, however, that Jeremiad authorship could not be maintained on the basis of either internal or external evidence. They tended to look to some student(s) of Jeremiah as author(s), although a few continued to support Jeremiah's authorship (see C. Keil [1872] and W. Hornblower [Nägelsbach, 1871]; O. Thenius [1855] held that only chaps. 2 and 4 were from Jeremiah). Most twentieth-century writers find the evidence insufficient to establish authorship or unity of authorship for the five poems. N. GOTTWALD, for example, judged that "the writer(s) could have been a prophet, a priest, or a governmental or private lay figure" (The Hebrew Bible: A Socio-Literary Introduction [1985] 546).

As for the date of composition, most late twentieth-century authorities find no strong reason to date Lamentations later than the sixth century BCE. In earlier times it was thought that Jeremiah composed these five laments as elegies for King Josiah as suggested by 2 Chr 35:25; however, internal evidence militates against this view since the subject matter of Lamentations clearly deals with Jerusalem's collapse, even though the Targum refers the statement in Lam 4:20 to the death of Josiah.

2. Purpose and Theology. The question of why these five poems were composed remains far from settled. Until modern times several verses from Lamentations were viewed as prophetic and messianic, although Lamentations is never cited or paraphrased in the NT. (Some have seen Lam 3:30 reflected in Matt 5:39.) CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (Paidagogos 1:9) cited Lam 1:1-2, 8, while Lam 4:20, which mentions "the Lord's anointed," was applied to JESUS by such church fathers as JUSTIN MARTYR (First Apology 72), IRENAEUS (Demonstration of the Apostolic Preaching 71), TERTULLIAN (Against Marcion 3:6), and Clement of Alexandria (Extracts from the Writings of Theodotus 18:2). J. Daniélou (1966) concluded that Lam 4:20 was included from the earliest times among the Testimonia collections of HB texts bearing witness to Christ. Methodius quoted Lam 3:34 in several preserved references as having christological meaning, while GREGORY THE GREAT cited various Lamentation texts in his Moralia on Job as applying to the tribulations of Christ and the church. The Carolingian commentary of RABANUS MAURUS took the book as a continuation of Jeremiah and saw it as a warning to all kings and kingdoms and to each Christian to wage spiritual war against sin by the power of Christ and the sacraments. In about 850, during a time of great disillusionment, PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, drawing heavily on Hrabanus, chose to comment on Lamentations in order to encourage purification through suffering (E. Matter [1982]). Calvin, while seeking the meaning of specific statements in the text in historical settings known to him, saw the book as an extension of the predictive PROPHECY found in the book of Jeremiah.

Early Jewish interpretation also saw predictions of later events in some Lamentations statements. For example, Lam 1:19 ("my priests and elders perished in the city") was viewed in the Targum as a prediction of Jerusalem's destruction in 70 CE. The Targum to Lam 4:22 looks into the future when the congregation of Zion will be freed from its punishment by the Messiah King and when the persecutors, "wicked Rome built up in Italy," will be afflicted by the Persians and their territory filled with Edomites. Likewise the Targum paraphrases Lam 5:11 ("Women were ravished in Zion.") as "Women who had married husbands in Zion were raped by Romans." By and large, the great MIDRASH on Lamentations focuses on the teachings of the Tanna'im and the Amora'im based on Lamentations; but it does not use the prophecy-fulfillment mode of interpretation evident in the Targum. It rather uses similar midrashic methodologies on Lamentations as employed on other Scripture by Midrash Rabbah, for example.

Modern interpreters have viewed the intention of the book from vastly different perspectives. One approach is to relate its purpose to its theology, which is usually seen to be hope in the face of tragedy (see especially Gottwald [1962]). A. Mintz ("The Rhetoric of Lamentations," Prooftexts 2 [1982] 1-17) argues that the theme of Lamentations is "an exploration of the traumatized relations between Israel and God in the immediate aftermath of the Destruction," in "dramatized speech and not theological statement" (4). He emphasizes the book's theological role as expressing the horror of war and its aftermath of human suffering and notes that there is no hint of an answer from God in the five poems. This marks the difference between lamentation and consolation; lamentation as a genre records the human struggle "to speak in the face of God's silence," while consolation records answers "from outside" in the form of God's word, which "breaks through" to mortals to end the silence.

Some scholars have interpreted Lamentations as a polemic against the pro-Babylonian party at the end of the Davidic monarchy (G. Brunet [1968]). A similar theological view suggests that Lamentations was developed as a paradigm for suffering in all kinds of catastrophes (M. Cohen [1988]). A slightly different theological direction was followed by those who explored the theme of hope in the face of disaster as it relates to deuteronomic theology (Gottwald [1962] and B. Albrektson [1963]).

In the 1980s various writers focused on applying literary analysis to understanding Lamentations' message. B. Johnson ("Form and Message in Lamentations," ZAW 97 [1985] 58-73) connected structure and message and found in the middle of the central chapter a theological answer to the question of whether Jerusalem's destruction and the accompanying human suffering had any meaning: "The distress is a punishment, but a punishment aimed at rehabilitation, not at definite rejection" (73). (See also the interpretation of W. Shea [1979], who draws attention to both the qînâ elegiac structure and the use of chiasmus.) Several writers with cuneiform background have examined Lamentations from the standpoint of Mesopotamian laments and have suggested that its purpose and theology were associated with liturgical use at the Temple site.

3. Literary Analysis. Numerous scholars of the past two hundred years (e.g., R. Lowth, W. de Wette, Keil, and K. Budde) have analyzed the language of Lamentations and associated it with the qînâ—that is, the ancient funeral dirge. Budde, in his article "Das hebräische Klagelied" (ZAW 2 [1882] 1-52), delineated the metrical pattern of the elegy form in which the verse consists usually of two members divided into two parts, the first of usual length, the second shorter. Later analysts have followed Budde's lead (see especially H. Jahnow [1923]). M. Alexiou describes the similiarities between laments for the dead and laments over the fall of cities in Greek culture from ancient to modern times and calls attention to the prominent role of women in performing the laments while men performed ritual acts (The Ritual Lament in Greek Tradition [1974] chaps. 4–6). Shea proposes that the book in its overarching form fits the 3:2 qînâ pattern—that is, that the first three chapters form a unit followed by the last two chapters as the shortened unit.

H. GUNKEL (1929) drew attention to Lamentations' similiarity to the communal lament Gattung in the psalms. Gottwald (1985, 542) and B. Johnson (1985) observed the mixed nature of the poetic forms appearing in Lamentations. Gottwald found elements of the individual lament, the communal lament, wisdom language, thanksgiving idiom, hymnic wording, and prophetic speech, but these patterns are not used in any consistent way. The picture is further complicated by the use of alphabetical acrostics in poems 1–4. Johnson, by reference to the atbash principle displayed in Jer 25:26 and 51:41, concluded that the use of the alphabetic acrostics was meant to suggest the editor's concern for chiasmus, so that the focal point of the message is to be found in the center of chapter 3.

S. Kramer (1959) made the claim that "it was the Sumerian poets who originated and developed the 'lamentation' genre." He later claimed that "there can be little doubt that the biblical Book of Lamentations owes no little of its form and content to its Mesopotamian forerunners." T. McDaniel (1968) raised the issue of possible connections between the Mesopotamian city lament genre and Lamentations, but he concluded that any connection is highly unlikely since the city laments were so far removed from Lamentations in spatial and temporal terms. W. Gwaltney (1983) has explored the broader range of Mesopotamian laments that cover the entire history of cuneiform literature. He concludes that, while the Mesopotamian city laments remained a part of the classical Sumerian literature largely restricted to the school curriculum, the liturgical laments were maintained as an ongoing religious pool of POETRY sung both in special rituals and in daily rituals in the cults of most Mesopotamian deities.

The Mesopotamian lament genre, its history of development, and its place in religious practice are important for the study of Lamentations, since Mesopotamia is the only clear context in which we possess both lament poetry and the details of its liturgical use. A comparison of Mesopotamian practice with the biblical book suggests an alternative mode of interpretation through liturgical analysis.

Mesopotamian lament poetry may be traced over a period of about 2,000 years. The earliest stage of formal laments emerged as early as the twenty-fourth century BCE as a cultic response to the looting of Lagash by Lugalzagessi. No laments remain from the ensuing Akkadian, Gutian, or Ur III eras, but the five extant Sumerian city laments were created about 2000 BCE to memorialize the wholesale destruction brought upon Mesopotamia in this era. These city laments were preserved as canonized material to be copied by generations of student scribes but dropped out of scholastic use in the first millennium.

These classical laments were augmented by the ershemma and balag laments in the Old Babylonian era. Originating shortly after 2000 BCE and composed in the Emesal (feminine) dialect of Sumerian to be performed by gala priests in a high-pitched wailing mode, ershemma and balag laments came to be combined for cultic use in the first millennium BCE. These Balag-ershemmas were performed in at least four ritual circumstances, including rites of daily offerings and sacrifices and special ceremonies, like the ritual for covering the sacred kettle drum. They might also be chanted as a part of the namburbi ritual for warding off portended evil. They continued to be used in their original role—in rituals for the demolishing of damaged walls and sacred buildings—in which their main function was to appease the potentially destructive god so that the building activities could proceed without danger.

A comparison of Lamentations with first millennium Mesopotamian balag-ershemma laments in terms of their content and theology, poetic devices, Sitz im Kultus, and lament form suggests a liturgical origin for Lamentations. These poems continue to be used liturgically in Jewish tradition to mark the tragedies associated with Jerusalem's fall to the Babylonians and to the Romans and in Christian tradition to mark the tenebrae portion of Holy Week. Such an interpretation suggests that these five poems may have been composed by levitical poets/musicians for liturgical use.

4. Interpretation of dramatis personae. Commentators have noted the change in speaking voice throughout Lamentations and have debated who the characters speaking in the first person might be and what meaning is conveyed through this means. At times the "I" is feminine and at times masculine. Frequently the first-person speaker is Jerusalem personified. Reminiscent of Greek tragedy, such changes in speaker point to the dramatic quality of the poems (see Gottwald [1985] 543 and W. Lanahan [1974] 41-49). M. Biddle (1991) has explored the implications of the personification of Jerusalem by the Lamentations poets and concluded that the personification of the city as a lady with the ability to speak in the first person reflects common cultural thought patterns in which the city was viewed as the mother of its inhabitants and the central female mediary in divine/human relations.

Bibliography: B. Albrektson, Studies in the Text and Theology of the Book of Lamentations with a Critical Edition of the Peshitta Text (1963). M. Biddle, "The Figure of Lady Jerusalem: Identification, Deification, and Personification of Cities in the Ancient Near East," The Biblical Canon in Comparative Perspective (Scripture in Context 4, ed. W. Hallo, B. Batto, and K. Lawson Younger, Jr. 1983) 173-194. W. C. Bouzard, Jr., We Have Heard with Our Ears, O God: Sources of Communal Laments in the Psalms (SBLDS 159, 1997). G. Brunet, Le lamentations contre Jérémie: Réinterpretation des quatre premières lamentations (1968). C. Budde, "Das hebräische Klagelied," ZAW 2 (1882) 1-52. H. I. Caro, Beiträge zur ältesten Exegese des Buches Threni mit besonderer Berücksichtigung des Midrash und Targum (1893). M. E. Cohen, The Canonical Lamentations of Ancient Mesopotamia (2 vols., 1988). J. Daniélou, " 'Nous Vivons á son ombre' (Lam 4, 20)," Études d'exégèse judéo-chrétienne (Les Testimonia) (TH 5, 1966) 76-95. F. W. Dodds-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City-lament Genre in the HB (BibOr 44, 1993). P. W. Ferris, Jr., The Genre of Communal Lament in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (SBLDS 127, 1992). R. Gordis, The Song of Songs and Lamentations: A Modern Translation and Commentary (1974). N. K. Gottwald, Studies in the Book of Lamentations (SBT 14, 1962). M. D. Guinon, "Lamentations," The New Jerome Biblical Commentary (1990). H. Gunkel, "Klagelieder Jeremiae" RGG^{2} (1929) 3:1049-52. W. C. Gwaltney, "The Biblical Book of Lamentations in the Context of Near Eastern Lament Literature," More Essays on the Comparative Method (Scripture in Context 2, ed. W. W. Hallo, J. C. Moyer, and L. G. Perdue, 1983) 191-211. D. R. Hillers, Lamentations (AB 7A, 1972, 1992^2). J. Hunter, Faces of a Lamenting City: The Development and Coherence of the Book of Lamentations (BEATAJ 39, 1996). H. Jahnow, Das hebräische Leichenlied im Rahmen der Völkerdichtung (BZAW 36, 1923). B. Johnson, "Form and Message in Lamentations," ZAW 97 (1985) 58-73. C. F. Keil, Biblischer Commentar uber den propheten Jeremia und die Klagelieder (BCAT, 1872). S. N. Kramer, "Sumerian Literature and the Bible," AnBib 12 (1959) 196-97. R. Kutscher, Oh Angry Sea (a-ab-ba hu-luh-ha): The History of a Sumerian Congregational Lament (1975). W. Lanahan, "The Speaking Voice in the Book of Lamentations," JBL 93 (1974) 41-49. E. Levine, The Aramaic Version of Lamentations (1976). T. F. McDaniel, "The Alleged Sumerian Influences upon Lamentations," VT 18 (1968) 198-209. E. A. Matter, "The Lamentations Commentaries of Hrabanus Maurus and Paschasius Radbertus," Traditio 38 (1982) 137-63. C. W. E. Nägelsbach, The Lamentations of Jeremiah: Theologically and Homiletically Expounded (tr., en., and ed. W. Hornblower, 1871). J. Neusner, Lamentations Rabbah: An Analytical Translation (1989); Israel After Calamity: The Book of Lamentations (1995). K. M. O'Connor, "Lamentations," The Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H.

Ringe, 1992) 178-82. I. W. Provan, Lamentations; Based on the RSV (NCBC, 1991). J. Renkema, "The Literary Structure of Lamentations," JSOTSup 74 (1988) 294-396. G. Ricciotti, Le Lamentazioni de Geremia (1924). Y. Sabar, "Lēel-Hūza: Story and History in a Cycle of Lamentations for the Ninth of Ab in the Jewish Neo-Aramaic Dialect of Zakho," JSS 21 (1976) 138-62. R. B. Salters, Jonah and Lamentations (OTGu, 1994). W. H. Shea, "The Qinah Structure of the Book of Lamentations," Bib 60 (1979) 103-7. J. M. Schonfelder, Die Klagelieder des Jeremias nach rabbinischer Auslegung (1887). O. Thenius, Die Klagelieder (1855). C. Westermann, Die Klagelieder: Forschungsgeschichte und Auslegung (1990; ET, Lamentations: Issues and Interpretation [1994]). H. Wiesmann, "Der Kommentar des hl. Thomas von Aquin zu den Klageliedern des Jeremias," Scholastik 4 (1929) 78-91.

W. C. GWALTNEY, JR.

LANFRANC OF BEC (c. 1010–89)

Born in Pavia, Italy, c. 1010, L. was educated in an Italian town school that provided training in rhetoric with something of the classical Roman flavor. About 1030 he traveled through Burgundy and the Loire valley as a "wandering scholar," hearing masters lecture and establishing his own position as a teacher at Avranches about 1039. By 1042 he had become a monk at Bec in Normandy in the newly established abbey of Herluin and served there as prior from c. 1045 to 1063, running a school that attracted numerous pupils from the nobility. After he left Bec, and certainly while he was archbishop, L. ceased to work as a scholar; he told one correspondent that he no longer had time. His former pupil ANSELM OF CANTERBURY sent L. his first book for comment, but he had to wait a long time for L.'s response. In 1063 L. went to Caen as abbot, and in 1070 William I of England, settling his just-conquered kingdom, made him archbishop of Canterbury. He died while archbishop in 1089.

While at Bec, L. lectured on the liberal arts, especially logic and rhetoric; at the time, study of the rhetorical textbooks was relatively uncommon. In his later years there he also lectured on the Bible; he seems to have been best known for his studies of the standard books of the psalms and the Pauline epistles. Two fragments of his Psalms commentary survive in Herbert of Bosham's edition of PETER LOMBARD's Magna Glossa; the commentary on Paul is extant in several copies. L. helped to establish the pattern of the layout of glossed Bibles in the twelfth century, with the text copied in a larger script in the center of the page and the gloss conveniently arranged in the margins for easy access. He brought two things to bear in his exegesis: patristic authorities, especially AUGUSTINE, but also THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA and CHRYSOSTOM, all drawn from Carolingian collections; and technical points of grammar and logic, which he contributed himself. He had an exact, scholarly mind and, although he had no knowledge of Hebrew or Greek, did his best to emend where he sensed corrupt readings. His Pauline commentary was influential in the development of the GLOSSA ORDINARIA; it was used in the school at Laon, where ANSELM OF LAON taught at the end of the eleventh century and the beginning of the twelfth, and at Paris during the Glossa's formative period. L.'s controversial exchanges with the grammarian BERENGAR OF TOURS on the nature of the change that takes place when the bread and wine are consecrated in the Eucharist led to the formation of the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Works: Beati Lanfranci Archiepiscopi Cantuariensis Opera quae supersunt (ed. J. A. Giles, 1844); Opera Omnia (PL 150, 1854).

Bibliography: M. T. Gibson, "L.'s Commentary on the Pauline Epistles," JTS NS 22 (1971) 86-112 (on L.'s exegesis); Lanfranc of Bec (1978). B. Lyon, DMA 7 (1936) 328. J. de Montclos, L. et Bérenger (1971).

G. R. EVANS

LANG, ANDREW (1844–1912)

A classicist and man of letters, L. wrote on MYTHOLOGY, the origin of religion, and the paranormal. He made no direct contribution to biblical scholarship but indirectly prevented the development of comparative mythology within British HB scholarship. He was born Mar. 31, 1844, in Selkirk, Scotland. In November 1861 he entered the University of St. Andrews, moving in 1863 to Glasgow, where he successfully prepared for a scholarship examination at Balliol College, Oxford. Entering Balliol in 1864, he studied classics and philosophy and then in 1868 obtained a fellowship at Merton College. On marrying in 1875, he moved to London, where he spent the rest of his life as a writer, with frequent visits to Scotland, where he died July 20, 1912.

L.'s interest in FOLKLORE, religion, and mythology stemmed from his childhood in a secluded community that was conscious of its folklore and from his study of classical mythology while a student. In Victorian Britain there was considerable general interest in religion as a universal human phenomenon, an interest sustained by such writers as M. Müller, E. Tylor, J. FRAZER, and W. R. SMITH. L.'s most important contribution to the study of mythology was his opposition to Müller's theory that myths were stories based on incompletely understood poetic descriptions of the sun, moon, and stars. This view, which was based on the study of Sanskrit and comparative philology, began to make headway in HB criticism from about 1860 and was responsible for the view that some HB narratives were derived from solar myths. L. advanced the simpler and more convincing theory that myths arose when "primitive" peoples personified the forces of nature in terms of their own savage personality, a view that checked the spread of Müller's theories in Britain.

L. is also famous for his later views on the origin of religion. Against the view that the most primitive form of religion was animism (the worship of spirits believed to inhabit trees or springs), he pointed out that the worship of high gods could be found among Australian aborigines, with or without animism. It was wrongly claimed by the Austrian Catholic anthropologist W. Schmidt that L. was an advocate of ur-monotheism; rather, L.'s intent was to show that the animism theory was an oversimplification. In this he was not heeded by British HB experts, who for the first half of the twentieth century accepted that Israel's earliest worship must have been animistic and who looked for survivals of animism in the HB.

Works: Myth, Ritual, and Religion (1887); Custom and Myth (1884); The Making of Religion (1898).

Bibliography: A. P. L. de Cocq, A. L.: A Nineteenth-century Anthropologist (1968). G. S. Gordon, DNB Supp. 3 (1927) 319-23. R. L. Green, Andrew Lang (1946). J. W. Rogerson, Myth in OT Interpretation (BZAW 134, 1974) 33-56.

J. W. ROGERSON

LANGLAND, WILLIAM (c. 1330–c. 1386)

An English poet, L. was the author of Piers Plowman. With his contemporaries Chaucer and the Pearl poet, he can be regarded as one of the three greatest poets of fourteenth-century England. Nothing is known of his life except what may be inferred from (presumably) autobiographical and topical references within the poem and from various annotations in the manuscripts. He was born and reared among the Malvern hills in Worcestershire, took minor orders, was married and had a daughter, and lived in London, saying prayers and reciting psalms for benefactors and their deceased relatives. Details of his education are unknown, although he was obviously well schooled in the Bible and in patristic exegesis. Much of his life must have been dedicated to writing and revising Piers Plowman in its three versions, A, B, and C, ranging from some 2,500 to over 7,500 alliterative long lines. Although it defies precise generic definition, emulating sermons, biblical commentary, penitential manuals, the summa, and apocalypse, it can most conveniently be called an allegorical dream vision: Characters on literal and spiritual planes, e.g., Scripture, Book, Piers the Plowman, and Will (the ostensible author/dreamer, though also voluntas), freely interact. There is extensive apocryphal, biblical, and theological subject matter like the harrowing of hell, episodes from the life of Christ, the search for truth, the granting of pardons, the seven deadly sins, and the antichrist. Quotations and paraphrases of Scripture appear throughout the poem, often in macaronic Latin/English form, often deriving from such secondary sources as florilegia, service books, and distinctiones rather than from the VULGATE.

L.'s literal use of images influenced his biblical exegesis, in which he associated biblical themes freely and restated theories of salvation and grace in original, often cryptic form. His theological formulations, observations on a dysfunctional society, and concern to instruct and save the common man appealed to leaders of the Peasants' Revolt in 1381, who quoted passages from the poem, and to the Lollards, who sensed a kindred reformist spirit. However, L. seems to have resisted the appropriation of his poem by these parties by editing out certain passages in the C text.

Works: Piers Plowman (3 vols., ed. G. Kane, E. T. Donaldson, and G. Russell, 1988–97).

Bibliography: M. R. Adams, "The Use of the Vulgate in Piers Plowman," SP 24 (1927) 556-66. J. A. Alford (ed.), A Companion to Piers Plowman (1988); Piers Plowman: A Guide to the Quotations (1992). M. W. Bloomfield, Piers Plowman as a Fourteenth-century Apocalypse (1961). R. Hanna, William Langland (1993). D. Pearsall, An Annotated Critical Bibliography of L. (1990). D. W. Robertson, Jr. and B. F. Huppé, Piers Plowman and Scriptural Tradition (1951). J. Wittig, W. L. Revisited (1997).

J. MOREY

LANGTON, STEPHEN (c.1155–1228)

Born in England, L. taught theology at the University of Paris until made cardinal by Pope Innocent III in 1206 and archbishop of Canterbury in 1207. Due to a power struggle between the pope and King John, L. did not assume his see until June 1213. L. helped to negotiate the Magna Carta with King John (1215), promulgated the decrees of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), and organized the Council of Oxford (1222). He is perhaps best known for devising the biblical chapter divisions that replaced previous reference mechanisms and are still in use with minor modifications.

L.'s reputation as political negotiator and archbishop enhanced his reputation as a biblical scholar, established during his earlier career while lecturing at Paris. These lectures were widely studied by later exegetes, notably HUGH OF ST. CHER, though they exist as reportationes (student lecture notes, variously redacted; B. Smalley [1983] 200-206) and await further study and editing. L. was most influenced by the GLOSSA ORDINARIA, the Victorines, PETER LOMBARD, PETER THE CHANTER, and PETER COMESTOR. He apparently glossed the entire Bible, although some commentaries are lost and few have been printed. His commentaries on the Octateuch, the books of Kings, the Minor Prophets, and Lombard's Sentences (L.'s Summa) were the best known.

In keeping with Victorine exegesis, L.'s lectures are marked by a literal interpretation of Scripture, with strong moralizations, allegorizations, and encyclopedic tendencies, including patristic citations, variant readings, Jewish interpretations, bestiary lore, exempla, and explanations of liturgical practices. The classroom atmosphere is evident first in the prologue, where L. outlined the date, authorship, and subject matter of a biblical book, and second in the use of questio and disputatio as points of Scripture are proposed and investigated. Biblical texts are concorded in schematic form—distinctiones—to break down the text and gloss into their constituent parts, whether grammatical, metaphorical, or tropological. L. generally observed the distinction between the materia extrinseca—the literal subject matter—and the materia intrinseca—the spiritual and allegorical significances (A. Minnis [1988] 69-71). The endpoint of the academic exercise was public preaching and curial reform.

L. used allegory, not to prove theological truth, but to confirm the divinely ordered pattern that allegory exposes in Scripture and in the world. A liberality of spirit, combined with a critical evaluation of the text and commentary on the entire Bible, not just individual books, defines his exegesis.

Works: Der Sentenzenkommentar des Kardinals S. L. (BGPTM 37.1, ed. A. M. Landgraf, 1952); Repertorium Biblicum Medii Aevi (F. Stegmüller, 1955) 5:7704-939; (1961) 7:10728-730 (lists L.'s commentaries and manuscripts); Councils and Synods. . . . 2: AD 1205–1313, pt. 1 (ed. F. M. Powicke and C. R. Cheney, 1964) 23-36, 100-125 (diocesan statutes and Oxford constitutions); Repertorium der lateinischen Sermones des Mittelalters für die Zeit von 1150–1350 5 (J. B. Schneyer, 1974) 466-507; Stephanus de Linguatona: Commentary on the Book of Chronicles (ed. A. Saltman, 1978); Selected Sermons (TMLT 10, ed. P. B. Roberts, 1980).

Bibliography: G. Lacombe, A. Landgraf, and A. L. Gregory, New Scholasticism 3 (1929) 1-18, 113-58; 4 (1930) 97-226 (articles on L.'s Summa and Questiones). G. Lacombe, B. Smalley, and A. L. Gregory, "Studies on the Commentaries of Cardinal S. L.," AHDLMA 5 (1930) 5-266 (lists MSS and prints various excerpts). A. J. Minnis, Medieval Theory of Authorship: Scholastic Literary Attitudes in the Later Middle Ages (1988²). F. M. Powicke, Stephen Langton (1927 Ford Lectures, 1928). R. Quinto, "Doctor Nominatissimus," S. L. (1228) e la tradizione delle sue opere (BGPTM, NF 39, 1994). P. B. Roberts, Stephanus de lingua-tonante: Studies in the Sermons of S. L. (1968); (ed.), Selected Sermons (TMLT 10, 1980). B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1983³), chap. 5.

J. MOREY

LAPIDE, CORNELIUS À (1567–1637)

A Flemish biblical scholar, L. (whose Dutch name was Cornelius Cornelissen van den Steen) was born at Bocholt near Liège Dec. 18, 1567. He studied humanities and philosophy at the Jesuit colleges at Maastricht and Cologne and theology at Douai and Louvain. After entering the Jesuit order in 1592 he was ordained in 1595 and taught sacred Scripture at Louvain (1596–1616) and the Jesuit college in Rome (1616–36).

L. was a very pious and popular teacher with a high reputation for learning and sanctity. Except for Job and Psalms, he published commentaries on all the biblical books, several of which appeared posthumously. All of his works were highly popular and went through numerous printings; the commentary on the Pauline epistles appeared in at least eighty printings. The complete series, with Job and Psalms by others, was reissued in various forms from 1681; the twenty-two volume Paris edition of 1859–63 was supplied with extensive updating annotations and a commentary on Job by J. de Pineda and on Psalms by R. BELLARMINE. An ET of the entire work (The Great Commentary of Cornelius à Lapide) was planned under the editorship of T. Mossman, but only the volumes on the Gospels, 1–2 Corinthians, Galatians, and the JOHANNINE EPISTLES appeared (8 vols., 1876–97).

L.'s work was written to appeal to a wide audience, including clergy and laity. It is filled with quotations from and allusions to classical thought, patristic and medieval exegesis, and digressions on interesting legends, antiquities, and so forth. On textual matters L. gave priority to the VULGATE, and his exegesis sought to elucidate various levels and senses in the text.

Works: Epistolae divi pauli (1614); Commentaria in pentateuchum mosis (1617); Commentaria in danielem prophetam (1621); Commentaria in ezechielem prophetam (1621); Commentaria in ieremiam prophetam threnos et baruch (1621); Commentaria in quatuor prophetas maiores (Isaiah plus three preceding, 1622); Duodecim minores prophetas (1625); Commentaria in acta apostolorum, epistolas canonicas, et apocalypsin (1627); Commentarii in ecclesiasticum (2 vols., 1633–34); Commentaria in solomonis proverbia (1635); Commentarii in canticum canticortum (1638); Commentarii in ecclesiasten (1638); Liber sapientiae (1638); Commentarii in evangelia (2 vols., 1639); Commentarius in iosue, iudicum, ruth, IV libros regum, et II Paralipomenon (1642); Commentarius in esdram, nehemiam, tobiam, iudith, esther, et machabae (1645). For complete bibliographical information, see C. Sommervogel (ed.), Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus 4 (1893) 1511-26; 9 (1900) 573.

Bibliography: G. Boss, Die Rechtfertigungslehre in den Bibelkommnetaren des Kornelius a Lapide (KLK 20, 1962). R. Galdos, "De scripturisticis meritis P. Cornelii a Lapide," VD 17 (1937) 39-44, 88-96; "De canonibus exegeticis apud P.

Cornelii a Lapide," ibid., 146-52; "Nel Terzo Centenario della morte de Cornelii a Lapide," CivCatt 88 (1937) 204-14. G. Heinrici, RE[3] 4 (1898) 289-91. J. P. van Kasteren, Catholic Encyclopedia 4 (1908) 377-78. S. Pagano, "Analysis Notionis Inspirationis S. Scripturae apud Cornelium a Lapide," RUO 15 (1945) 65-85.

J. H. HAYES

LARDNER, NATHANIEL (1684–1768)

Born at Hawkhurst, Kent, June 6, 1684, L. was educated at the Presbyterian Academy, Hoxton Square, London, and at Utrecht and Leiden. He was a chaplain and tutor from 1713 to 1721 and assistant to the pastor at Crutched Friars Presbyterian Meetinghouse, London, from 1729 to 1753. Because of deafness, which began as early as 1723, L. refused the opportunity to become pastor. He died July 24, 1768.

One of the leading biblical scholars of his time, L. combined apologetic with scholarship to answer the challenge made by Deists to the Bible's AUTHORITY. In The Credibility of the Gospel History (1727–55) and its Supplement (1756–57) his aim was "to show the truth of the evangelical history, and thereby the truth of the Christian religion" (Works [1838] 5:174). He argued that the biblical records were consistent with information in contemporary writers, especially PHILO and JOSEPHUS. He discussed the date and authorship of NT books, presented the views of patristic writers about their canonicity and authority, and gave a lengthy account of patristic citations from the NT. In a supplement he included a history of the apostles and the evangelists.

L. also compiled a large collection of evidence for NT times from Jewish and gentile sources and endeavored to give a balanced account of the evidence. Though not a highly original writer, he made available a vast amount of important information, drawing on a variety of scholars, including H. GROTIUS, W. Cave, and D. WHITBY. He was inclined to Arianism (see ARIUS); and although opposed to DEISM, he championed toleration, maintaining friendly relations with Anglicans as well as Dissenters.

L.'s work was widely read and used for many years, serving as a mine of information for scholars. J. Priestley called him "the prince of modern divines." His scholarship was esteemed in Europe as well as in Great Britain, and some of his work was translated into Dutch, Latin (by J. Wolff), and German (with a preface by S. Baumgarten).

Works: Works (11 vols., 1788; 5 vols., 1838).

Bibliography: A. Gordon, DNB 32 (1892) 147-51. J. Jennings, Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Late Rev. N. L., DD, Containing a Catalogue of His Works with . . . Eight Sermons (1769) 1-134. A. Kippis, "Life of Dr. N. L." Works (5 vols., N. Lardner, 1838) 1:i-lviii. J. Le Clerc, "N. L., The Credibility of the Gospel History," BAM 27 (1727) 376-88; 28 (1727) 87-133.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

LEAD or LEADE, JANE (1624–1704)

An English mystic, from the age of fifteen L. claimed to receive direct divine revelations. The mystics J. BÖHME and J. Pordage had a powerful influence on her, and after her husband's death in 1670, she devoted herself entirely to the group that had gathered around Pordage in London. When Pordage died in 1681 she became the group's leader and arranged for the publication of his Theologia Mystica (1683). She was a founder of the Philadelphian Society, whose meetings in many ways resembled those of the Quakers. The author of numerous writings, several of which were translated into German, she won a following in both Germany and Holland as well as in England. Her interpretation of the Scriptures was theosophical. It was her belief that everyone would ultimately be saved. She also expected an earthly millennium and thought that a small group like the Philadelphian Society would have to prepare the way for that event. She died August 19, 1704.

Works: The Heavenly Cloud Now Breaking: The Lord Christ's Ascension Ladder (1681); The Revelation of Revelations (1683); Theologia mystica or the Mystic Divinitie of the Aeternal Invisibles (1683); The Ark of Faith (1696); A Fountain of Gardens (1696–1701); The Laws of Paradise (1696); A Message to the Philadelphian Society (1696); The Tree of Faith, or the Tree of Life (1696); Wonders of God's Creation (1696); A Revelation of the Everlasting Gospel Message (1697); Ascent to the Mount of Vision (1699); The Signs of the Time (1699); The Wars of David and the Peaceable Reign of Solomon (1700); A Living Funeral Testimony (1702); The First Resurrection of Christ (1704?).

Bibliography: C. Fell Smith, DNB 32 (1892) 312-13. N. Thune, The Behmenists and the Philadelphians: A Contribution to the Study of English Mysticism in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1948).

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

LE CLERC, JEAN (1657–1736)

Born at Geneva, Mar. 29, 1657, L. studied at Grenoble and Saumur and moved theologically from a strict Calvinism (see CALVIN) to Arminianism (see ARMINIUS). In 1684 he became professor of philosophy and later of church history at the Remonstrant College in Amsterdam. Early in his career he met J. LOCKE, with whom he preserved a close friendship. Before his death, Jan.

8, 1736, L. produced an extensive list of writings, which, although including some superficial material, has seldom been matched in both quantity and quality in the history of religious publishing. In addition to works on theology and Bible, he produced a five-volume collection on philosophy and a history of the early church; translated several works into French (including the NT) and Latin; prepared new annotated editions of works by Petavius, H. GROTIUS, ERASMUS, several Greek and Latin classics, and the apostolic fathers; and edited three series of ninety-three volumes of extensive reviews, excerpts, and original essays: Bibliothèque universelle et historique (26 vols., assisted by J. C. de Lacroze, 1686–93, repr. 1968), Bibliothèque choisie (28 vols., 1703–13, repr. 1968), and Bibliothèque ancienne et moderne (29 vols., assisted by J. Bernard, 1714–27, repr. 1968). (For a list of the contents of these volumes, see J. Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica [1854] 1:1797-803.)

In biblical studies L. published a Latin translation and commentary on the HB (Genesis, 1694; Exodus–Deuteronomy, 1696; historical books, 1708; remainder, 1731). In his Ars critica (1698) and its sequel, Epistolae criticae et ecclesiasticae (1700), he laid out his general program of criticism. He was the first to formulate the text-critical rule (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM), giving priority to the more difficult reading (lectio obscurior vers. clarior glossema).

L. carried on a running debate with R. SIMON and P. BAYLE. In his early writings (1685, 1686) he agreed with Simon that Moses could not have written the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM). Unlike the former's theory of public scribes and documents, however, L. proposed that the Pentateuch was composed from private documents and suggested that the priest mentioned in 2 Kgs 17:27-28 rather than Ezra was the editor of the final form of the books of Moses. In his 1693 work he reverted to the theory of Mosaic authorship. L. stressed that, in order to elucidate the purpose of the authors and the events and opinions alluded to in the works, biblical documents should be traced back to the specific historical events that stimulated the authors to write.

Works: Liberii de sancto amore epistolae theologicae: In quibus varii scholasticorum errores castigantur (1679); Sentimens de quelques théologiens de Hollande: Sur l'histoire critique de Vieux Testament, composée par le P. R. Simon (1685); Defense des sentimens de quelques théologiens de Hollande, sur l'histoire critique du Vieux Testament, contra le réponse du Prieur de Bolleville (1686); Five Letters Concerning the Inspiration of Holy Scriptures (1690); Genesis sive Mosis prophetae liber primus (1694); Twelve Dissertations Out of M. L.'s Genesis (1696); Ars critica (2 vols., 1698, 1712, 1778, 1830); A Treatise of the Causes of Incredulity (ET 1697); Novum Testamentum, ex versione Vulgata, cum paraphrasi et adnotationibus Henrici Hammond (2 vols. in 1, 1699); Parrhasiana ou Pensées diverses sur des matières de critique, d'histoire et de politique (2 vols., 1699–1700, 1701²; 1:341-445 of the 2nd ed. contains L.'s autobiographical "Des Ouvrages de M. L. C."); Harmonia evangelica cui subjecta est historia Christi et quatuor Evangleiis concinnata (1699; ET 1701); Parrhasiana, or Thoughts on Several Subjects (1700), contains L.'s notes on Hammond's work; commentaries on Exodus–Deuteronomy (1696), historical books (1708), and the remainder (1731).

Bibliography: A. Barnes, J. Le Clerc (1657–1736) et la République des lettres (1938). J. H. Bentley, "Erasmus, J. L., and the Principle of the Harder Reading," RenQ 31 (1978) 309-21. R. L. Colie, Light and Enlightenment: A Study of the Cambridge Platonists and the Dutch Arminians (1957) esp. 22-35. S. A. Golden, J. L. (1657–1736) et la république des lettres (1972). H. J. de Jonge, De bestudering van het Nieuwe Testament aan de Noordnederlandse universiteiten en het Remonstrants Seminarie van 1575 tot 1700 (1980). P. J. Lambe, "Critics and Skeptics in the Seventeenth-century Republic of Letters," HTR 83 (1988) 271-96. MSHH, 40 (1739) 294-362. H. G. Reventlow, "Bibelexegese als Aufklärung: Die Bibel im Denken des Johannes Clericus (1657–1736)," Historische Kritik und biblischer Kanon in der deutschen Aufklärung (Wolfenbütteler Forschungen 41, ed. H. G. Reventlow et al., 1988) 1-19. J. Roth, "Le traité de l'inspiration de J. L.," RHPR 36 (1956) 50-60. M. Sina, Vico e L., tra filosofia e filologia (1978). R. Voeltzel, "J. L. (1657–1736) et la critique biblique," Réligion, érudition, et critique à la fin du XVIIe siècle et au début du XVIIIe (1968) 33-52. A. Westphal, Les sources du Pentateuque étude de critique et d'histoire (1888) 1:78-100. J. J. Wettstein, Oratio funebris in obitum . . . Joannis Clerici (1736).

J. H. HAYES

LESLIE, CHARLES (1650–1722)

The son of the bishop of Clogher in Ireland, L. studied law at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the Temple in London. He decided to enter the ministry, was ordained in 1680, and became chancellor of the cathedral of Connor (1687). On losing his church post after 1688, he went to England, where he devoted himself to writing numerous defenses of the Christian religion and the church of England as well as attacks on Quakers and other dissenters, Deists (see DEISM), Jews, Socinians, and Catholics. His attack on the Deists, published in 1698 with a second edition in 1699, bore the title A Short and Easy Method with the Deists, Wherein the Certainty of the Christian Religion Is Demonstrated by Infallible Proof from Four Rules, Which Are Incompatible to Any Imposture That Ever Yet Has Been, or That Can Possibly Be (1699). His four rules were "First, That the matters of Fact be such, as that men's outward senses, their Eyes and Ears, may be judges of it. Secondly, That it be done Publickly, in the face of the world. Thirdly, That not only publick Monuments be kept up in memory of it, but some outward Actions to be performed. Fourthly, That such Monuments and such Actions or Observances be instituted, and do commence from the Time that the matter of Fact was done." L. laid down the basic elements of a method to test the alleged truth of matters of fact that would become one of the major approaches to the defense of the historicity of biblical events, a method that came to dominate British biblical scholarship. Works like those of T. Sherlock, N. LARDNER, and W. PALEY illustrate this evidential-factual approach to Christian and biblical apologetics. L. himself concluded, "There is no book to be confronted with our holy Bible, which was wrote at the time when the facts therein related were done, and the institutions in memory of them were then made by the very actors in the facts—that is, by Moses and Christ."

Works: Theological Works (2 vols., 1721; 7 vols., 1832).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 2917-20. R. J. Leslie, Life and Writings of C. L. (1885). J. M. Rigg, DNB 33 (1893) 77-83. L. Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1902[3]) 163-70.

J. H. HAYES

LESLIE, ELMER ARCHIBALD (1888–1965)

After receiving his formal training at Boston University (STB, PhD), L. spent his early years in various pastorates, becoming a professor at Boston University in 1921. His writings reflect his interest in both academia and pastoral education. He wrote several works for laypersons (especially Christian youth), while his scholarly pursuits resulted in works on Isaiah, Jeremiah, the Psalms, and OT religion. Conversant with and influenced by the European scholarship of his day, his analysis of prophetic pericopes (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) is noteworthy for its attempted chronological arrangement (see CHRONOLOGY, HB). His analysis of the Psalms follows H. GUNKEL and form-critical categories (see FORM CRITICISM). L.'s work manifests two central concerns: (1) a desire to communicate the insights of higher criticism to educated laypersons and (2) a concern to determine the nature and essence of OT religion.

Works: OT Religion in the Light of its Canaanite Background (1936); The Prophets Tell Their Own Story (1939); Origins of the OT (1945); Poetry and Wisdom (1945); The Psalms: Translated and Interpreted in Light of Hebrew Life and Worship (1949); The Intimate Papers of Jeremiah (1953); Jeremiah: Chronologically Arranged, Translated, and Interpreted (1954); Isaiah: Chronologically Arranged, Translated, and Interpreted (1963).

Bibliography: Who Was Who in America 4 (1961–68) 569.

R. R. MARRS

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM (1729–81)

German essayist, dramatist, and LITERARY critic, L. studied theology at Leipzig, where he came under the influence of Enlightenment rationalism. Pursuing a growing interest in the theater, he left theological studies and in 1749 moved to Berlin, where he made such friends as M. MENDELSSOHN and F. Nicolai. During the next two decades he resided in Berlin, Leipzig, Breslau, and Hamburg, earning a precarious living as writer and critic. In 1769 he accepted the post of librarian for the Duke of Brunswick in Wolfenbüttel and devoted himself to more sustained philosophical and theological pursuits, which included editing and publishing the notorious Wolfenbüttel Fragments (1774–78), excerpted from H. S. REIMARUS's Apologie oder Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes (Reimarus's work in its entirety was not published until 1972).

L. is important, not as a systematic or constructive figure, but as a restless and critical thinker who both grasped and gave expression to the problems posed for biblical interpretation by historical criticism. His writings on biblical and religious topics were typically elicited by specific religious controversies, and his tendency to play the role of devil's advocate often makes his own position difficult to detect. But in a lasting and highly influential metaphor, he spoke of an "ugly ditch" between the "accidental truths of history" and the "necessary truths of reason," thereby providing the terms in which much of the modern debate over faith and history would occur ("On the Proof of the Spirit and of Power" [1777]). L.'s "ditch" poses not only the problem of basing Christian faith on the increasingly dubious historical evidence provided by Scripture but also the quite separate problem of moving from a biblical report—however certain—to a dogmatic theological position, such as a christological claim. His "ditch" is not just about the obvious risks involved in tying faith to historical reconstruction; it is also about the more subtle problem of generating a theological truth out of any historical claim. By asking, in effect, whether "events" can ever produce "truths," L. was calling into question the very idea of Christianity as a "historical faith" based on the testimony of Scripture.

Due to the influence of SPINOZA and Leibniz, L. was personally able to escape his ugly ditch by assuming a basically rationalist posture toward religious truth. "True" religion was for him ultimately true whether or not any particular historical event occurred, a position, expressed by its approach to biblical interpretation in the comment that "the letter is not the spirit, and the Bible is not religion. . . . The religion is not true because the evangelists and apostles taught it; but they taught it because it is true" ("Editor's Counterpropositions" appended to the Fragments [1777]). With this principle he paved the way for countless modern hermeneutical strategies (see HERMENEUTICS) that are reductionistic regarding the historical content of Scripture while nevertheless affirming that Scripture is in some deeper sense "true," i.e., the authentic meaning of Scripture is logically independent of its historical accuracy. L.'s reductionism regarding specific events, however, was combined with a positive, constructive attitude toward universal history. Through what he called the divine "education of the human race," he proposed that the whole of history is the locus of revelation, with particular historical events, persons, and books serving as "primers" for a wider moral and religious instruction. Correctly interpreted, Scripture thereby remains crucial but only because it points to truths beyond itself, since "every primer is only for a certain age" (Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts [1780]). This position enabled him to suggest that diverse religious traditions could all be true, whatever their doctrinal or scriptural differences (Nathan der Weise [1779]).

Works: L.s Gesammelte Werke (10 vols., ed. P. Rilla, 1954–58), vols. 7 and 8 contain the key religious works; L.'s Theological Writings: Selections in Translation (ed. and tr. H. Chadwick, 1956).

Bibliography: H. Allison, L. and the Enlightenment: His Philosophy of Religion and Its Relation to Eighteenth-century Thought (1966). K. Aner, Die Theologie der Lessingzeit (1929). G. Hornig, TRE 21 (1991) 20-33. G. E. Michalson, Jr., L.'s "Ugly Ditch": A Study of Theology and History (1985). A. Schilson, Geschichte im Horizont der Vorsehung: G. E. L.s Beitrag zu einer Theologie der Geschichte (1974). H. Thielicke, Offenbarung, Vernunft, und Existenz: Studien zur Religionsphilosophie L.s (1957). L. Wessel, G. E. L.'s Theology: A Reinterpretation (1977).

G. E. MICHALSON

LEVITA, ELIAS (1469–1549)

The greatest Jewish Hebrew language grammarian and philologist of the sixteenth century, L. was also the single most important Jewish teacher of Christian Hebraists; his students included J. REUCHLIN, S. MÜNSTER, P. FAGIUS, Campensis, G. POSTEL, and many other prominent Christian students of Hebrew. Born in Neustadt, for most of his life he lived in Italy, where he found a more open intellectual and social environment. He was in Padua until 1513, then left for Rome, where he was patronized by Cardinal Egidio de Viterbo, in whose house he lived until 1527. After the sack of Rome L. moved to Venice and remained in that city in the employ of D. BOMBERG, the most prominent Christian publisher of Hebrew books, until 1539 when he joined Fagius's press in Isny. He declined Francis I's offer of a lecturship in Hebrew at the College Royal in Paris because he did not wish to live in a country that officially banned Jewish residence.

The scope of L.'s literary production is amazing, including adaptations of secular romances in Yiddish and Hebrew, Hebrew grammars, and important theoretical studies concerning the development of Hebrew linguistics. His early grammars followed the thought of D. KIMHI and include the Sefer ha-Bahur (1518) and Sefer ha-Harcava (1518). These works were translated and published by Münster, who introduced L. to the Christian community of scholars outside Italy. His works of 1538 include Pirkei Eliyahu, Tub-Taam, Masoretha-Masoret, and Sefer ha-Zichronot and deal with difficult theoretical points of Hebrew grammar and the first modern discussions of the importance and origin of Hebrew punctuation and voweling. L. was the first major grammarian to postulate that vowel points and punctuation marks, of major importance in many exegetical systems, were not of divine origin or even from the Sinai period, but of a later date. His dictionaries concentrated on specific scholarly problems and needs. The Meturgeman (1541) was a complete Aramaic dictionary. His Tishbi and Aruch of the same year were alphabetical listings of extremely complex HB terms and expressions. He also produced the first Yiddish-Hebrew dictionary (1542).

Works: Sefer ha-Bahur (1518); Sefer ha-Harcava (1518); Masoretha-Masoret (1538); Pirkei Eliyahu (1538); Sefer ha-Zichronot (1538); Tub-Taam (1538); Aruch (1541); Meturgeman (1541); Tishbi (1541); Shemot Devarim (1542).

Bibliography: J. Friedman, The Most Ancient Testimony: Sixteenth-Century Christian Hebraica in the Age of Renaissance Nostalgia (1983). C. D. Ginsberg, The Masoreth of E. L. (1865). M. Peritz, Ein hebräischer Brief E. L. an Sebastian Münster (1894). B. Pick, "The Vowel-Point Controversy in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries," Hebraica (= AJSL) 8 (1891–92) 150-73. G. Weil, E. L.: Humaniste et Massorète (1469–1549) (1963).

J. FRIEDMAN

LEVITICUS, BOOK OF

Before the modern era interpreters of Leviticus mainly sought to find relevance in its message in order to apply it within living religious traditions that were distanced to varying degrees from the ancient Israelite community originally addressed by the book. Modern critical scholarship has shifted the primary focus to reconstruction of the book's origin(s) and the ancient historical reality reflected in it.

The destruction of the Second Temple in 70 CE and the rise of modern biblical criticism in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries divide the interpretation history of Leviticus into three periods, which can be called Temple Period, Pre-Modern Period, and Modern Period.

1. Temple Period. As long as the Temple and the institutions connected with it remained, the ritual and ethical prescriptions of Leviticus could be carried out within a fully functioning cultic and legal system. At this stage, which probably began before the HB had been completed, interpreters applied and adapted those laws with reference to the developing tradition of the Temple (Hag 2:11-12; cf. Lev 6:20 [Eng. 27]) and attempted to communicate them in an acceptable manner (e.g., Septuagint) to the dispersed Jewish community.

In the Second Temple period differing views regarding the manner in which the instructions of Leviticus should be carried out created disputes between Jewish groups. For example, rabbinic sources report a disagreement between the Sadducees and the Pharisees regarding the manner in which the high priest should bring incense into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:12-13; J. Lauterbach [1927] 173-205). Texts found at Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) reflect dissatisfaction with the Jerusalem priesthood and its practices, including its application of Leviticus. For example, the Temple Scroll (11QTemple) presents a rewritten Torah as a program for reforming the Temple and its institutions in accordance with Pentateuchal laws and extra-canonical prescriptions, which were viewed as coming from God at Mt. Sinai.

Besides literal meaning, other modes of interpretation were employed during the Second Temple period. The book of JUBILEES (2nd cent. BCE) treats the laws of Leviticus as though they were in force during the patriarchal era. The Letter of Aristeas includes a combination of tropology and allegory (145-48): Birds forbidden to be eaten (Lev 11:13-19) are identified as carnivorous and dominating by force, which teaches humans to avoid lording it over others by brute strength. PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA (1st cent. BCE–1st cent. CE) sought to harmonize Torah and philosophy through allegory, explaining, e.g., that the required physical perfection of priests (Lev 21:17-21; 22:4) symbolized the perfection of the soul (The Special Laws, 1:80). The NT found ongoing meaning in the sacrifices of Leviticus by viewing them as typological prefigurations of Christ's sacrificial death on the cross and subsequent priestly mediation in the heavenly temple (Hebrews 7–10). This typology has served as a framework for subsequent Christian interpretation of Leviticus.

2. Pre-Modern Period. After 70 CE Jewish interpretation of Leviticus turned to the question of how the Jewish community could continue to maintain its identity as God's holy people in spite of the loss of the Second Temple. In the Mishnah, Tosefta, and Palestinian and Babylonian Talmuds, the rabbis compiled traditional legal materials explaining and supplementing biblical prescriptions, including those of Leviticus. These works sought to maintain continuity with the Temple through discussion of its form, procedures, and principles of holiness.

To provide an acceptable understanding of the biblical text, the Aramaic TARGUMIM included expansions and interpretive renderings. For example, the Targumim avoid anthropomorphic language, like the idea that Yahweh smelled sacrifices (e.g., Lev 1:9; A. Hurvitz [1982] 55).

Jewish interpretation developed midrashic literature, which relates the biblical text to rabbinic traditions. Sipra is a halakhic MIDRASH to Leviticus that provides legal commentary on the Hebrew text. Leviticus Rabbah (probably 5th cent.) is a homiletical Midrash that presents homilies on topics related to portions of Leviticus.

During late antiquity, Christians developed spiritualizing modes of interpretation. ORIGEN (3rd cent.) believed that proper exposition must go from literal sense to moral and spiritual meaning. For example, he allegorically interprets the priest who removes the animal's hide (Lev 1:6) as "one who removes the veil of the letter from the word of God and uncovers its interior parts which are members of spiritual understanding" (Origen [1990] 35). AUGUSTINE and CYRIL (5th cent.) also presented spiritual meaning along with plain sense. Other fifth- to seventh-century Christian expositors and collectors of interpretation included Hesychius, THEODORET, Procopius, and ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (see W. Yarchin in J. Hartley [1992] xlv-xlvii).

From medieval times through the dawn of the modern era, Jewish scholars working in the rabbinic tradition focused on the literal meaning of the Hebrew text of Leviticus (see J. Milgrom [1991] 63-66). To varying degrees, these exegetes also employed some other modes of interpretation, including Midrash and mysticism.

SAADIA Gaon (10th cent.) sought the plain sense even though his Arabic translation is not literal. IBN JANĀḤ (11th cent.) presented exegetical excursuses along with his DICTIONARY of biblical Hebrew. The influential verse-by-verse commentary of RASHI (11th cent.) blends literal and midrashic interpretation, consulting earlier rabbinic opinions to give multiple explanations of texts.

In the twelfth century, SAMUEL BEN MEIR (Rashbam) concentrated on literal meaning even more than did Rashi, while A. IBN EZRA stressed etymology and grammar, often arriving at original interpretations. BEKHOR SHOR emphasized the rational basis of the commandments and parried Christian allegorical interpretations. MAIMONIDES (Rambam) demonstrated the value of Pentateuchal law. D. KIMHI (Radak, 12th to 13th cents.) used philology, but also presented homiletical interpretations based on rabbinic literature.

In the thirteenth century, NACHMANIDES (Ramban) developed literal interpretation and used the TALMUD, midrashic literature, and the Zohar to give reasons for commandments. Hezekiah ben Manoaḥ based much of his work on that of earlier Jewish exegetes, and Baḥya ben Asher placed mystical interpretations alongside the plain sense.

In the fourteenth century, Aaron ben Joseph Ha-rofe "the elder," a KARAITE, provided strictly literal exegesis with occasional Midrash. Ralbag presented philosophical and theological discourses and hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS). Aaron ben Elijah, another Karaite, concentrated on the plain sense, but also produced some allegorical and metaphysical interpretations, while Jacob ben Asher emphasized the views of Rashi and Ramban.

ABRAVANEL (15th cent.) focused on the moral rationale for the commandments. Isaac ben Moses wrote philosophical homilies based on Leviticus, and O. SFORNO (15th–16th cents.) concentrated on literal meaning. E. Lunshitz (17th cent.) made extensive use of earlier Jewish exegesis.

In the eighteenth century, Ḥayyim ibn Attar used mystical, kabbalistic interpretation (see KABBALAH). Naphtali Herz Wessely addressed historical and philological concerns. MALBIM referred to non-Jewish modern thinkers as well as to Jewish exegetes.

Through medieval and Renaissance-Reformation times, Christian expositors regarded the literal meaning of the so-called old law, including Leviticus, as a source for various kinds of spiritual meaning in addition to typology, e.g., allegory, tropology, and anagogy. In the twelfth century, RUPERT OF DEUTZ used allegorically derived moral meaning to aid the monastic struggle against carnal temptation (see Yarchin in Hartley, xlviii). Ralph of Flaix carried spiritual interpretation to the extreme, regarding the Mosaic laws as a cryptogram in which the inner spiritual meaning was hidden from most Jewish people by the letter of the text. On the other hand, HUGH OF ST. VICTOR and ANDREW OF ST. VICTOR and an anonymous contemporary commentator concentrated on the literal meaning of the Hebrew text and utilized rabbinic sources (see B. Smalley [1974] 13-15).

In the thirteenth century, William of Auvergne reacted against allegorization, using Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed to insist that the ancient Israelites could understand and gain value from the literal meaning of the law. John of La Rochelle countered by emphasizing that the law did have a spiritual sense as a prefiguration of the new Christian law. THOMAS AQUINAS sought to clarify the relationship between literal and spiritual meaning (see Smalley, 25-68).

In the fourteenth century, NICHOLAS OF LYRA cited rabbinic exegesis and concentrated on the plain sense of the Hebrew text more than previous interpreters had. From the sixteenth to eighteenth centuries this focus on the literal meaning of the Hebrew became the trend among such Christian scholars as Dionysius de Ryckel, T. CAJETAN, CALVIN, F. Vatablus, C. Jansen, J. LE CLERC, A. CALMET, and E. ROSENMÜLLER (see Yarchin in Hartley, xlix-li).

3. Modern Period. Modern interpretation of Leviticus has abandoned midrashic and spiritualizing modes of interpretation in favor of the literal meaning of the text. However, some Christian scholars have continued to refer to the concept that the sacrifices typified Christ.

PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, which arose in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, seeks to understand the plain sense in light of historical-critical theory, which differentiates between hypothetical literary sources on the basis of distinctive linguistic and conceptual characteristics. This approach was embraced by both Christian and Jewish scholars, and by the second half of the nineteenth century a number of scholars had come to regard Leviticus as comprising part of a priestly narrative source that was also woven through the narratives of Genesis, Exodus, and Numbers along with Jahwistic (J) and Elohistic (E) sources. Deuteronomy was taken to represent another source (D).

K. GRAF, A. KUENEN, and J. WELLHAUSEN developed the idea that the priestly source (subsequently known as P) was the latest of the Pentateuchal sources and should be dated after the fall of the monarchy, thus eliminating Mosaic authorship of the final form of Leviticus. Wellhausen interpreted the fact that P does not require worship at a central sanctuary, as does D, to mean that after the exile P simply assumed centralization (1885, 34-38). The basic profile of the JEDP documentary hypothesis is still accepted by many scholars today.

Another influential theory was Graf's identification of legal material belonging to Leviticus 18–26 as a discrete literary entity (1886, 75-83). A. Kayser (1874, 64-79) included Leviticus 17 in the corpus, which A. KLOSTERMANN (1893, 385) referred to as Heiligkeitsgesetz, "Holiness Code," subsequently known as "H." Wellhausen argued that an originally independent H corpus was incorporated into P by a priestly revision (376-79). Subsequently, L. Paton, A. BERTHOLET, and B. BAENTSCH sought to reconstruct the redactional process by which the H chapters reached their present form.

A number of commentaries that applied a critical approach to Leviticus appeared in the late nineteenth century. M. Kalisch dealt extensively with comparative religion. A. DILLMANN wrote a revision of A. Krobel's 1857 commentary on Exodus and Leviticus and subsequently updated this work with V. RYSSEL. S. DRIVER and H. White provided brief historical and philological notes along with an English translation that differentiated between literary sources (P, H, later additions) by means of colors.

Some nineteenth-century commentaries were not controlled by the critical approach. S. LUZZATO (Shadal) pursued the plain sense of the text in the tradition of the medieval Jewish exegetes. Christian exegetes who accepted Mosaic authorship of Leviticus include C. KEIL, A. Bonar, F. GARDINER, G. Bush, and S. Kellogg. While Kellogg asserted the basic Mosaic origin of the legislation contained in Leviticus in accordance with the claims of the book, he allowed for the possibility that later persons could have written and edited the Mosaic law (1900, 4-5).

In his OT introduction Driver gathered a number of the strongest late nineteenth-century arguments for a late dating of P (1897, 136-57). Points like these have set the agenda for much of the twentieth-century debate regarding the dating of P relative to that of other Pentateuchal sources: (a) The elaborate legislation of P was not in operation during the preexilic period; (b) Deuteronomy does not presuppose the stricter, more complex legislation of P; (c) at least in some respects, such as the prohibition of priestly officiation for Levites, P appears to be later than Ezekiel; (d) in its religious conceptions, such as emphasis on divine transcendence and focus on statistical and chronological data, P bears the marks of a later age; and (e) P incorporated H at a late date. While the laws of H preceded Ezekiel, the paraenetic framework of H cannot be much earlier than Ezekiel because Leviticus 26 has the exile in view.

Driver did not regard these conclusions as incompatible with the idea that "Moses was the ultimate founder of both the national and the religious life of Israel" (152). While Moses began the ancient traditional basis upon which Leviticus rests, the book reflects a long development leading to its final shape in the age subsequent to Ezekiel (153-57). Other critical scholars have been less ready to affirm a Mosaic origin for Leviticus, but they generally accept the view that the composition of Leviticus was a complex process of accretion involving several stages. Such interpreters have made numerous attempts to reconstruct the composition history of Leviticus in order to shed light on the development of the Israelite religion.

Critical commentaries of the first half of the twentieth century include those of A. Bertholet; B. Baentsch; A. EHRLICH, who was concerned with TEXTUAL CRITICISM and suggested many emendations of the Hebrew text; A. Kennedy; A. Chapman and A. Streane; P. HEINISCH; and A. Clamer.

Y. KAUFMANN accepted the existence of documentary sources but argued that P was older than D, thus the order JEPD. His reasons include the idea that written Torah, which includes P, is the product of the earliest phase of Israelite religion; it was not an outgrowth of literary PROPHECY, as claimed by Wellhausen (Kaufmann [1960] 157-66). The antiquity of P is shown by such factors as its anthropomorphisms, the fact that it presupposes the existence of local altars, its characterization of the prophets as civil and military leaders, and its ignorance of Jerusalem's significance (206).

B. EERDMANS and S. Küchler denied an originally independent existence of H for such reasons as the absence of clear structural and conceptual unity (Eerdmans [1912] 83-87; Küchler [1929] 61-62). Most scholars have not been persuaded by their arguments. The introduction of FORM and TRADITION-historical criticism by G. von RAD and K. Rabast has brought attention to the formation of individual units within H. Von Rad saw H as containing teaching for the community based on older laws and presented in sermonic form (1953, 35).

D. HOFFMANN's commentary is Jewish in the traditional sense. Along with original exegesis, he made extensive use of rabbinic sources; and although he was aware of critical theory, he argued for Mosaic authorship. His reasons for attributing Leviticus to Moses include the wilderness setting of the laws concerning the offering and the argument that Leviticus 8–10 could hardly come from a later priestly writer to benefit priestly interests because it has Moses, a non-priest, officiating at the consecration of the tabernacle, followed by the story of Nadab and Abihu (Hoffmann [1905–6] 1:13-14).

A. Noordtzij, a conservative Protestant, also attributed the contents of Leviticus to the Mosaic period. However, he accepted the idea that the Mosaic legislation would have been adapted and supplemented during subsequent centuries.

In the second half of the twentieth century, scholars were divided into three main groups with regard to the composition of Leviticus: those who held to the former consensus that Leviticus was produced after the fall of the First Temple in 586 BCE, whether during or soon after the exile or as late as Ezra's reform; those who followed Kaufmann in arguing for a preexilic dating of P; and those who maintained a basic Mosaic origin in accordance with the assertions of Leviticus that its laws were transmitted through Moses during the wilderness period.

Although the dates for Leviticus postulated by scholars range over a millennium, their views are not as mutually exclusive as they may appear. Those who believe that the book was completed for the benefit of the postexilic Second Temple community acknowledge the inclusion of early materials; and those who emphasize a Mosaic background allow in varying degrees for later developments in the recording, transmission, supplementation, and adaptation of the legislation.

Critical commentaries with a late date for P include those of H. Schneider; H. Cazelles; M. NOTH; K. ELLIGER (1966), who presents a detailed analysis of literary strata within Leviticus; J. Mays; N. Snaith; J. Porter; W. Kornfeld; B. Levine; E. Gerstenberger; and P. Budd (1996). According to Noth, the history of the traditions behind Leviticus begins with the story of the first great sacrifices in Leviticus 9, which belongs to the original P narrative. Later additions resulted in chaps. 8–10, to which chap. 16 was connected. Chapters 1–7, detailing sacrificial procedure, were added before chap. 8 because the sacrifices of chaps. 8–10 required knowledge of the procedure. The purity laws of chaps. 11–15 were added before chap. 16 to introduce this aspect of cleansing before the great cleansing ritual of the Day of Atonement. The independent Holiness Code book was added as chaps. 17–26, and chap. 27 was appended (Noth [1965] 12-15). R. Rendtorff, however, follows F. M. Cross in viewing the priestly writer(s) as editing earlier tradition rather than producing an originally independent work to which subsequent redactors added (Rendtorff [1985] 138, 146, 162).

Scholars who have supported Kaufmann's view that Leviticus was essentially a preexilic document include J. Milgrom (1991), A. Hurvitz (1982), and M. Paran, whose philological studies have reached the conclusion that the language of P belongs to the preexilic era (see Zevit and J. Blenkinsopp [1996]). M. Weinfeld has pointed out that deuteronomic literature quotes Leviticus but not the reverse, which is understandable only if P precedes D (1972, 180-82). I. Knohl argues that a "Holiness School" (HS) was the redactor of P, which he calls "Priestly Torah" (PT), the opposite of Wellhausen's hypothesis that H was incorporated into P by a priestly redactor. "Since HS originated in the period from the rule of Ahaz to that of Hezekiah, the PT material in the Pentateuch must have been composed earlier" (1995, 220).

Scholars who argue that the basic material in Leviticus originated with Yahweh's revelation to Moses include W. Gispen, M. Segal, R. Harrison, and J. Hartley (1992). G. Wenham, who does not commit himself to a particular composition theory but has difficulty accepting a postexilic date, summarizes the main arguments for the Mosaic view (1979, 8-9): (a) Statements that Yahweh spoke these words to Moses are supported by the fact that the material assumes a setting in the wilderness; (b) comparison with non-Israelite cultic practices shows that the cultic system of Leviticus is not anachronistic for the wilderness period; (c) the laws of Leviticus do not adequately address the setting of the postexilic community, which faced such problems as intermarriage; (d) Ezekiel knew and quoted Leviticus. Investigation of the composition history of H has continued with LITERARY-critical, form-critical, and tradition-critical studies by such scholars as W. Kornfeld; L. Elliott-Binns; H. G. Reventlow, who saw the H material developing in a covenant festival setting (1961, 162-67); R. Kilian; C. Feucht; and W. Thiel (1990).

In the last half of the twentieth century, the consensus that H was an originally independent, self-contained corpus has fallen apart. K. Elliger and A. Cholewinski (1976) see H as a redactional supplement to P (Elliger, 16; Cholewinski, 138-40). H. Sun finds no evidence of a pre-P compositional layer running through the entire H corpus and thereby attesting to its unity (1990, 560-61). V. Wagner argues that H is part of the larger unit comprising Exodus 25–Leviticus 26 (1974, 307-16). I. Knohl regards H as the product of a "Holiness School," which had a distinct theological and liturgical perspective and whose work is found elsewhere in Exodus–Numbers, to the extent that this school should be regarded as the redactor of P (see above).

Other trends in Leviticus scholarship include the following: (a) Scholars are becoming more cautious in their reconstructions of the composition history of Leviticus (see Budd, 8). (b) There is renewed interest in viewing the text of Leviticus synchronically in order to deal with its theological message and relevance for modern readers; e.g., Milgrom has found fresh perspectives by viewing the cultic legislation of Leviticus as a coherent system that reflects priestly theology and values. G. Wenham, R. Harrison, and G. Knight connect commentary with relevance for Christian readers. (c) Tools and data available to exegetes are expanding. In addition to close reading of the text, textual criticism, higher critical methodologies, and comparative linguistics, scholars are making increasing use of anthropological and sociological (see SOCIOLOGY AND HB STUDIES) approaches and sources, e.g. the work of M. Douglas (1966) and D. Wright (1987). At the same time, discoveries of ancient Near Eastern material culture and texts continue to shed light on ancient religious history, language, and culture relevant to study of Leviticus.

Bibliography: J. Blenkinsopp, "An Assessment of the Alleged Pre-Exilic Date of the Priestly Material in the Pentateuch," ZAW 108 (1996) 495-518. P. J. Budd, Leviticus (NCB, 1996). A. Cholewinski, Heiligkeitsgesetz und Deuteronomium: Eine vergleichende Studie (AnBib 66, 1976). M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of the Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (1966). S. R. Driver, An Introduction to the Literature of the OT (International Theological Library, 1897). B. D. Eerdmans, Das Buch Leviticus (Alttestamentliche Studien 4, 1912). K. Elliger, Leviticus (HAT, Erste Reihe 4, 1966). L. L. Grabbe, Leviticus (OTGu, 1993). K. Graf, Die geschichtlichen Bücher des Alten Testaments: Zwei historisch-kritische Untersuchungen (1866). J. Hartley, Leviticus (WBC 4, 1992). R. Hecht, "Patterns of Exegesis in Philo's Interpretation of Leviticus," StPhilo 6 (1979–80) 77-155. D. Z. Hoffmann, Das Buch Leviticus (1905–1906). A. Hurvitz, A Linguistic Study of the Relationship Between the Priestly Source and the Book of Ezekiel (CRB 20, 1982). W. C. Kaiser, Jr., "The Book of Leviticus," NIB (1994) 1:983-1191. Y. Kaufmann, The Religion of Israel (tr. and abr. M. Greenberg, 1960). A. Kayser, Das vorexilische Buch der Urgeschichte Israels und seine Erweiterungen: Ein Beitrag zur Pentateuch-kritik (1874). S. H. Kellogg, The Book of Leviticus (ExpB, 1900). A. Klostermann, Der Pentateuch: Beiträge zu seinem Verständnis und seiner Entstehungsgeschichte (1893). I. Knohl, The Sanctuary of Silence: The Priestly Torah and the Holiness School (1995). S. Küchler, Das Heiligkeitsgesetz Leviticus 17–26: Eine literarkritische Untersuchung (1929). J. Z. Lauterbach, "A Significant Controversy Between the Sadducees and the Pharisees," HUCA 4 (1927) 173-205. J. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16 (AB 3, 1991). M. Noth, Leviticus: A Commentary (OTL, 1965). Origen, Homilies on Leviticus 1–16 (FC 83, 1990). G. von Rad, Studies in Deuteronomy (SBT, 1953). R. Rendtorff, The OT: An Introduction (1985). H. G. Reventlow, Das Heiligkeitsgesetz: Formgeschichtlich Untersucht (WMANT 6, 1961). J. F. A. Sawyer (ed.), Reading Leviticus: A Conversation with Mary Douglas (JSOTSup 227, 1996). B. Smalley, "William of Auvergne, John of La Rochelle and St. Thomas Aquinas on the Old Law," St. Thomas Aquinas, 1274–1974 (ed. A. Maurer, 1974) 11-71. H. T. C. Sun, "An Investigation into the Compositional Integrity of the So-Called Holiness Code (Leviticus 17–26)" (diss., Claremont Graduate School, 1990). V. Wagner, "Zur Existenz des sogenannten 'Heiligkeitsgesetzes,' " ZAW 86 (1974) 307-316. M. Weinfeld, Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomic School (1972). J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1885). G. J. Wenham, The Book of Leviticus (NICOT 3, 1979). D. P. Wright, The Disposal of Impurity: Elimination Rites in the Bible and in Hittite and Mesopotamian Literatures (SBLDS 101, 1987). Z. Zevit, "Converging Lines of Evidence Bearing on the Date of P," ZAW 94 (1982) 481-511.

R. E. GANE

LEWIS, AGNES SMITH (1843–1926)

L., with her twin M. D. Gibson (1843–1920), discovered and photographed the Syriac Sinaiticus palimpsest of the Gospels (sometimes known as the Lewis Codex) at St. Catharine's monastery, Mt. Sinai (1892–93). L. wrote the introduction to the edition by R. Bensly, F. BURKITT, and R. HARRIS (1894) and after a third visit published an independent translation (1896). In the spring of 1896 the twins, while traveling in the plain of Sharon and visiting Cairo, were sold two bundles of Hebrew fragments and realized on their return to Cambridge that some of these contained what appeared to be post-biblical Hebrew items. They asked their friend S. SCHECHTER, university reader in Talmudic studies (see TALMUD), to examine them. He identified one as the lost Hebrew of Ben Sirach (Ecclesiasticus 39:15–40:8) and, with their permission, published the find. This led Schechter to Cairo, where he purchased the rest of the Ben Ezra Cairo Synagogue Geniza, which contained, among much else, the Damascus Document.

Works: Introduction to Four Gospels in Syriac Transcribed from the Sinaitic Palimpsest (R. L. Bensly, J. Rendel Harris, F. Crawford Burkitt, 1894); Some Pages of the Four Gospels Re-transcribed from the Sinaitic Palimpsest, with a Translation of the Whole Text (1896); (with M. D. Gibson and E. Nestle), A Palestinian Syriac Lectionary, Containing Lessons from the Pentateuch, Job, Proverbs, Prophets, Acts and Epistles (1897); (with M. D. Gibson), The Palestinian Syriac Lectionary of the The Gospels Re-Edited from Two Sinai MSS and from P. de Lagarde's Edition of the "Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum," (1899); In the Shadow of Sinai: a Story of Travel and Research from 1895 to 1897 (1898); John the Stylite: Select Narratives of Holy Women (1900); The Old Syriac Gospels or Evangelion Da-Mepharreshe; Being the Text of the Sinai or Syro-Antiochene Palimpsest, Including the Latest Additions and Emendations with the Variants of the Curetonian Text, Corroboration from Many Other MSS and a List of Quotations from Many Other MSS and a List of Quotations from Ancient Authors (1910); Light on the Four Gospels from the Sinai Palimpsest (1913).

Bibliography: A. W. Price, The Ladies of Castlebrae: A Story of Nineteenth-century Travel and Research (1985). S. C. Reif, "Memories of a Momentous Find," Geniza Fragments (Cambridge University Library 31, 1996) 1, 4. S. Schechter, "A Fragment of the Original Text of Ecclesiasticus," The Expositor 5th ser. (1896) 4:1-15.

J. C. O'NEILL

LEWY, JULIUS (1895–1963)

A professor and writer in Semitic languages and biblical history, L. was born in Berlin on Feb. 16, 1895. He began his Assyriological studies at Leipzig under H. Zimmern. After a five-year interruption for military service, L. resumed his studies at Berlin under Friedrich DELITZSCH and E. MEYER. He received the PhD magna cum laude in 1921, became Privatdozent in Semitic philology at Giessen the following year, and was made full professor and director of the oriental department at Giessen in 1927. In 1928 he became contributing editor of MVAG. He held these posts until 1933, when he was dismissed by the National Socialist government and left Germany for Paris, where he taught at the Sorbonne (1933/34). During these early years he focused his attention on the "Cappadocian Tablets" (now called the Old Assyrian texts) and edited collections of these documents in Turkey, Germany, France, and England. In 1934 he came to the United States, lecturing at Johns Hopkins in W. F. ALBRIGHT's absence. He joined the faculty of Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati in 1936 and taught there until his death on June 19, 1963.

During his career L. published in three areas: the Old Assyrian corpus, ancient Semitic culture, and the HB. His chief Assyriological interest lay in reconstructing the political, military, and economic institutions of the Old Assyrian age as reflected in the documentation recovered from central Turkey. Along with his wife, Hildegard, he concentrated on ancient calendar formation and the origin of the seven-day week.

Heavily influenced by the PAN-BABYLONIANISM of Delitzsch and to some extent by the history-of-religions approach (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE), L. applied the results of Near Eastern ARCHAEOLOGY and ASSYRIOLOGY to interpreting the HB and early Israelite religion. He wrote extensively on the relation of Habiru and Hebrew and on the history of the Israelite monarchies.

Works: (with G. Eisser), Die Altassyrischen Rechtsurkunden vom Kültepe (2 vols., 1930, 1935); Die Chronologie der Könige von Israel und Juda (1927); "Influences Hurrites sur Israel," RES (1938) 49-75; "The Feast of the 14th Day of Adar," HUCA 14 (1939) 127-51; "Habiru and Hebrews," HUCA 14 (1939) 587-623; (with H. Lewy), "The Origin of the Week and the Oldest West Asiatic Calendar," HUCA 17 (1943) 1-152; "Tabor, Tibar, Atabyros," HUCA 23 (1950/51) 357-86; "Origin and Signification of the Biblical Term 'Hebrew,' " HUCA 28 (1957) 1-13; "The Biblical Institution of deror in the Light of Akkadian Documents," EI 5 (1958) 21-31.

Bibliography: F. S. Fierman, "The Effort to Rescue Jewish Scholars from Nazi Germany," The El Paso Jewish Historical Review 4 (1987) 1-30. E. Weidner, "Nachruf auf J. L.," AfO 214 (1966) 262-63.

W. C. GWALTNEY, JR.

LEXICONS, HEBREW BIBLE

The earliest reference to a lexical compilation relating to the HB is to a DICTIONARY of proper names ascribed to PHILO of Alexandria. The first major extant work of any consequence is the Onomasticon of EUSEBIUS of Caesarea, a gazetteer of biblical sites listed alphabetically according to the Greek text (ed. E. Klostermann [1904]). For each site Eusebius provided a geographical and historical description of the locality as well as its designation in his day. Popular in the early church, the work was rendered into Latin by JEROME and remains an indispensable source for the study of Palestinian topography. It is, of course, not a general lexicon, but only a specialized ordering and description of a limited word list.

1. Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicons. The first Hebrew lexicon of the Bible was compiled by SAADIA early in the tenth century. (Zemah ben Paltoi of Pumbedita in the late ninth cent. produced a lexicon for the Babylonian Talmud, of which only fragments have been preserved in quotations.) Written in Arabic, Saadia's work, "Agron" (from the verb 'āgar, meaning "to collect"), was arranged according to the alphabetical sequence of the first and final letters of Hebrew words for use in poetic compositions and was not comprehensive. In an enlarged edition, in addition to giving a biblical passage in which the term occurred, he added the Arabic equivalent for each Hebrew term. He also composed a short word list of biblical terms occuring infrequently or only once (hapax legomena).

Saadia's older contemporary Judah ibn Koraish compiled a limited lexical work in which he, in comparative Semitic fashion, made comparisons with neo-Hebrew words in the Mishnah and with Aramaic and Arabic words (ed. J. Bargès and B. Goldberg [1857]). He began a larger lexicon, which was never carried beyond the letter aleph.

David ben Abraham, a tenth-century KARAITE, produced a lexicon in Arabic that has been preserved almost complete, but it is not comprehensive. A peculiar arrangement of Hebrew words occurs in the seventh part of Abu al-Faraj Haun's Al-Mushtamil, completed in 1026. A type of root-lexicon, the work arranges words so that those with the same letters in their triconsonantal roots are treated together regardless of the order of the letters.

The first complete lexical treatment of the words in the HB was Maḥberet (from Exod 26:4) produced in Spain by Menahem ben Saruk (910–c. 970) in 960 (ed. H. Filipowski [1854]). Written in Hebrew rather than Arabic, the work arranges words according to their roots, reducing these to one or two letters, and contains a lengthy grammatical introduction and occasional excursuses. Menahem's pupil Judah ben David Hayyuj (c. 940–c. 1010) determined the future shape of Hebrew lexicography. In two works on Hebrew verbs he developed the view that all Hebrew word roots were triconsonantal. These three-letter roots, however, could be modified when conjugated with a weak letter or elided or assimilated to a letter with a dagesh.

Hayyuj's perspectives were followed by J. IBN JANĀḤ, an early eleventh-century grammarian who, like Hayyuj, wrote in Arabic. His major work consisted of a grammar and a lexicon, the latter of which, called Kitab al-Uṣul in Arabic (Sefer ha-Shorashim in Hebrew = "Book of Roots"), marked a high point in medieval Jewish lexicography. (The Arabic version was edited by A. Neubauer [1875]; HT by W. Bacher [1896].) Ibn Janāḥ's work made numerous comparisons with Arabic, contained extensive grammatical and exegetical comments, and remained influential into the nineteenth century.

One other medieval lexicon is worthy of note—namely, the Sefer ha-Shorashim (Book of Roots) of D. KIMHI (first printed in Naples in 1479). Using Ibn Janāḥ's work, Kimhi produced the most widely used lexicon in the medieval period.

J. REUCHLIN, the first major Christian Hebraist, produced De rudimentis hebraicis in 1506. Primarily lexical material with a short section on grammar, it had enormous influence, especially the grammar portion, which eclipsed Pellicanus's De modo legendi et intelligendi Hebraeum (1504), the first Hebrew grammar written by a Christian.

The Complutensian POLYGLOT, printed in 1517 but not published until 1522, contained in vol. 6 a vocabulary of HB Hebrew and Chaldee (= Aramaic) prepared by A. Zamorensis (dated Mar. 17, 1515). Subsequently the production of Hebrew lexicons became rather common, the most important being those of S. MÜNSTER (1530), S. PAGNINUS (1536), E. Hutter (1586), J. BUXTORF the elder (1607), V. Schindler (1612; a pentaglotton that included Syriac, rabbinic Hebrew, and Arabic material), E. Leigh (1639; English rather than Latin), J. Hottinger (1661), J. COCCEIUS (1669), and E. CASTELL (1669). Of these, Schindler, Hottinger, and Castell drew upon comparative Semitics. The latter's Heptaglotton, published as an auxiliary volume to the London Polyglot, contained lexical material for Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, Samaritan, Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), Arabic, and Persian.

Hebrew lexicography reached a new peak in the early nineteenth century. J. Ben-Ze'eb's Ozar ha-Shorashim (Treasury of Roots) appeared in 1807 (1816[2], 1839–44[3], 1862–64[4]). Pride of place, however, belongs to the work of H. GESENIUS (1786–1842), whose Hebräisch-deutsches Handwörterbuch über die Schriften des Alten Testaments (2 vols.) first appeared in 1810–12. A shorter version was published in 1815 (ET 1824) and was expanded in subsequent editions (1823[2], 1828[3], 1834[4]). In addition, Gesenius produced a Thesaurus philologicus-criticus linguae Hebraeae et Chaldaeae Veteris Testamenti (1829–58; completed after his death by A. Rödiger). His Lexicon manuale Hebraicum et Chaldaicum in Veteris Testamenti libros (1833) was translated into English by E. ROBINSON (1836; the ET was periodically revised by Robinson until 1854); the second edition (rev. by A. Hoffmann [1847]) was translated into English by S. Tregelles (1847, last ed. 1859, repr. 1947). Subsequent editions of Gesenius's lexicon were produced, the most important being those by F. BUHL; from the twelfth edition (1895, 1921[17]) the work was as much Buhl's as Gesenius's. The Hebrew and English Lexicon (= BDB) edited by F. BROWN, S. DRIVER, and C. BRIGGS (1907, corrected ed. 1953, with reprints coded to J. Strong's concordance) was based on Robinson's 1836 translation of Gesenius, "edited with constant reference to the Thesaurus of Gesenius as completed by E. Rödiger, and with authorized use of the latest German editions of Gesenius's Handwörterbuch über das Alte Testament." The first fascicles of BDB were published in 1891, so only limited consideration could be taken of the various editions of Gesenius published at the time under the editorship of Buhl (1895[12], 1899[13], 1905[14]). Like most Hebrew lexicons of the period, BDB classifies words according to their presumed roots or stems rather than alphabetically. However, BDB was the first to isolate and publish HB Aramaic words in a separate section, a practice followed by Buhl from 1895. A German lexicon similar in orientation to BDB is E. König's Hebräisches und aramäisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament (1910, 1936[7]).

Unlike most lexicons the Hebräisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament by C. Siegfried and B. STADE (1893) excludes references to other Semitic languages and forgoes most etymological considerations and hypotheses about primary meanings. Instead, vocabulary and idioms are the primary focus.

A new Hebrew lexicon appeared in 1953, Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti libros (= KB), under the editorship of L. Koehler and W. BAUMGARTNER, with both German and English renderings. The Supplementum ad Lexicon in Veteris Testamenti libros was published in 1958, and this together with the original lexicon was called the second edition. The lexicon draws upon all recent Semitic study, including the Ugaritic texts (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE) and is organized alphabetically. The third edition of KB, Hebräisches und aramäischen Lexikon zum Alten Testament, begun under the editorship of Baumgartner, has now been published and translated into English as Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the OT (4 vols., 1994–98). A Concise Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicon of the OT was published in 1971 by W. Holladay based on the lexicon of Koehler-Baumgartner, utilizing the material of their first and second editions and the third edition through the letter samek.

A number of other Hebrew/Aramaic lexicons should be noted. F. Zorell's Lexicon hebraicum et aramaicum Veteris Testamenti (1940–54, incomplete), in Latin, contains only the Hebrew portion but includes the vocabulary of the Hebrew text of Ecclesiasticus (Sirach). E. Vogt's Lexicon linguae aramaicae Veteris Testamenti documentis antiquis illustratum (1971) contains what was planned as the Aramaic portion of Zorell. It illustrates biblical Aramaic with non-biblical texts and draws extensively on secondary literature. A student's Hebrew and Aramaic Dictionary of the OT (1971; ET 1973) has been edited by G. Fohrer. The Analytical Hebrew and Chaldae Lexicon was published by S. DAVIDSON as a parsing guide (1848, frequently reprinted). Indexes to BDB have been published by B. Einspahr (1976) and M. A. Robinson (1981).

Several HB lexicons are in the process of publication or have been published since the mid 1980s. The eighteenth edition of Gesenius's Hebräisches und aramäisches Handwörterbuch über des Alte Testament is being edited by H. Donner and R. Meyer (1987–). D. Clines is editing The Dictionary of Classical Hebrew (1990–), which is being published under the auspices of the British Society for OT Study. In addition to including all ancient Hebrew texts (the Bible, Sirach, Dead Sea Scrolls, etc.) to c. 200 CE, the DCH will incorporate some basic features of modern linguistics and is intended as a replacement for BDB. A new Hebrew-French lexicon (ed. P. Reymond) and a Hebrew-English lexicon (ed. J. Roberts) are in preparation (see Zeitschrift für Althebraistik 3 [1990] 73-89), while the Diccionario Biblico Hebreo-Espanol has been published under the general editorship of L. Alonso Schökel (1994).

The Academy of the Hebrew Language in Jerusalem is preparing a historical dictionary of the Hebrew language "based on a computer-stored lexical archive of (at least) twenty-five million quotations from thousands of literary and non-literary sources of all periods of the Hebrew language covering almost 3,000 years of recorded history." The work will be based on Hebrew roots; thus far, only a one hundred page specimen of a single root ('rb) has been published.

2. Greek HB Lexicons. Influenced by the Pasor's NT lexicon (see LEXICONS, NT), Z. Rosenback (1595–1638) produced the first lexicon for the Greek HB, Moses omniscuis sive omniscientia Mosaica . . ., which appeared in 1633. Rosenback organized the words thematically rather than alphabetically. In seventy-two sections he brought together the terms according to related fields, e.g., words relating to time, parts of the body, etc. The major standard lexicon on the Greek HB remains the work of J. Schleusner, Novus thesaurus philologico-criticus, sive lexicon in LXX et religuos interpretes Graecos ac scriptores apocryphos Veteris Testamenti (3 vols., 1820–21), based on the work of J. Biel (3 vols., 1779). A Greek-English Lexicon of the Septuagint is currently being published under the general editorship of J. Lust (1992–). A lexicon to the Greek text of the twelve prophets has been published by T. Muraoka (1993).

3. Other Hebrew/Aramaic Lexicons. A number of lexicons not directly concerned with biblical Hebrew and Aramaic are often of service to HB scholars. E. Ben-Yehuda's Millôn hallāšôn ha'ibrît hayyēšānāh wēhaḥadāšāh: Thesaurus totius hebraitatis et veteris et recentioris (1908– ; repr. 8 vols., 1960) is a lexicon of both ancient and modern Hebrew. Although written in Hebrew, the basic meanings of words are also given in English, French, and German.

Numerous lexicons of post-biblical Hebrew/Aramaic have been produced by both Jews and Christians over the centuries. The following works are noteworthy: G. DALMAN, Aramäisch-neuhebräisches Handwörterbuch zu Targum, Talmud und Midrasch (1897, 1938[3], repr. 1967); M. JASTROW, A Dictionary of the Targumim, the Talmud Babli and Yerushalmi, and the Midrashic Literature (1886–1900; frequently repr. in various forms); and J. Levy, Chaldäisches Wörterbuch über die Targummim und einen grossen Teil des rabbinischen Schrifttums (1867–68, 1881[3]) and Neuhebräisches und chaldäisches Wörterbuch über die Talmudim und Midraschim (4 vols., 1876–89), with supplement, Nachträge und Berichtigungen (1924).

4. Word Books, Encyclopedias, and Theological Dictionaries. These often overlap with some of the functions of a lexicon, and a number provide valuable word studies. A detailed multivolume encyclopedia of the HB, written primarily by Israeli scholars, is 'Ensîqlôpedyah miqrā'ît: Thesaurus rerum biblicarum alphabetico ordine digestus (ed. S. Sukenik, 1950–). More theological in nature are E. Jenni and C. WESTERMANN (eds.), Theologisches Handwörterbuch zum Alten Testament (2 vols., 1971–76; ET Theological Lexicon of the OT [3 vols., tr. M. Biddle, 1997]); R. Harris, G. Archer, Jr., and B. Waltke (eds.), Theological Wordbook of the OT (2 vols., 1980); and J. Botterweck and H. Ringgren (eds.), Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testament (1970– ; ET Theological Dictionary of the OT [1977–]). The latter work parallels G. KITTEL's Theological Dictionary of the NT and provides surveys of ancient Near Eastern lexical materials relevant to Hebrew words as well as a discussion of biblical materials.

Bibliography: W. Bacher, "Dictionaries, Hebrew," JE 4 (1903) 579-85. F. W. Danker, Multipurpose Tools for Bible Study (1970[3]) 97-114. G. Delling, "Das erste griechisch-lateinische Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament," NovT 18 (1976) 213-40. J. A. Fitzmyer, An Introductory Bibliography for the Study of Scripture (SubBib 3, 1981[2]) 48-56. G. Friedrich, "Pre-History of the Theological Dictionary of the NT," TDNT 10 (1976) 613-61. J. E. Gates, An Analysis of Lexicographic Resources Used by American Scholars Today (SBLDS 8, 1972. H. Hirschfeld, Literary History of Hebrew Grammarians and Lexicographers (1926). R. A. Kraft (ed.), Septuagintal Lexicography (1972). J. A. L. Lee, A Lexical Study of the Septuagint Version of the Pentateuch (1983). J. Lust, "J. F. Schleusner and the Lexicon of the Septuagint," ZAW 102 (1990) 256-62. E. Mangenot, "Dictionnaires de la bible," DB 2 (1899) 1419-22. R. Merkin, Z. Busharia, and E. Meir, "The Historical Dictionary of the Hebrew Language," Literary and Linguistic Computing 4, 4 (1989) 271-73. C. Mitchell, "The Use of Lexicons and Word Studies in Exegesis," ConJ 11 (1985) 128-33. B. Pick, "The Study of the Hebrew Language Among Jews and Christians," BSac 41 (1884) 450-77; 42 (1885) 470-95. H. Schlosser, "Die erste Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Griechisch und das erste Septuagints-Wörterbuch," Neutestamentliche Studien G. Heinrici (1914) 252-60. J. Schmid, "Bibellexika," LTK 2 (1958) 367-70. S. Segert and T. Sabar, "Hebrew and Aramaic Lexicography," Wörterbücher: Ein internationales Handbuch zur Lexikographie (ed. F. J. Hausmann, 3 vols., 1989–91) 2:424-38. M. Steinschneider, Bibliographisches Handbuch über die theoretische und praktische Literatur für hebräische Sprachkunde (1859).

J. H. HAYES

LEXICONS, NEW TESTAMENT

A lexicon is a DICTIONARY containing the words of a language and their definitions. Specialized lexicons treat the vocabulary of particular fields of knowledge (e.g., biblical criticism), of individual authors (e.g., Aristotle or Plutarch), or of various sets of documents (e.g., the HB and the NT).

1. Ancient and Medieval Greek Lexicography. Greek lexicography evolved out of Greek glossography, which began with the efforts of ancient rhapsodes, sophists, philosophers, and grammarians to explain rare and obsolete epic words, dialectical forms and expressions, technical terms, and various linguistic oddities. Lexical studies flourished during the Hellenistic period, especially at Alexandria, where Philetas of Cos, Zenodotus of Ephesus, Didymus of Alexandria, and Aristophanes of Byzantium were active. The latter has often been called the founder of ancient Greek lexicography because his comprehensive and highly influential Lexeis, which apparently was arranged partly according to dialect and partly according to subject, set a new standard in scholarship and scientific method. During the Roman imperial period Pamphilus of Alexandria (fl. 50 CE) produced a mammoth lexicon in ninety-five books, and the Atticistic revival spawned works by numerous lexicographers, including Eirenaeus of Alexandria, Aelius Dionysius, Pausanias, Phrynichus, Herodian, Moeris, and Harpocration. Some works contained numerous synonyms and rhetorical terms, e.g., the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux, which included a list of thirty-three terms of abuse to apply to tax collectors. Others focused on the works of particular authors, e.g, Timaeus's lexicon of Plato or on the distinctive vocabulary of certain subjects like mathematics, medicine, or cooking. Bilingual glossaries (Greek-Latin, Greek-Coptic, and Latin-Greek) also emerged, many on papyrus (J. Kramer [1983]) and often in the form of simple word lists to facilitate the reading of important Greek and Latin texts like those of Homer, Cicero, and Virgil (R. Gaebel [1969–70]). Of the Greek lexicons produced in later periods, the most important were those of Hesychius of Alexandria, Photius of Constantinople, and Thomas Magister as well as the Etymologicum Magnum and the Suda. The most famous bilingual lexicons were produced by Latin glossographers and included the Greek-Latin Cyrillus glossary, the Latin-Greek Philoxenus glossary, and the Greek-Latin Pseudo-Dositheana Hermeneumata.

2. The Earliest Greek NT Lexicons. Early Christian lexical efforts were undertaken for the purpose of studying, interpreting, and proclaiming both the HB and the NT. The results of these labors appear in a variety of documents, including commentaries, treatises, letters, homilies, liturgical texts, and bilingual biblical manuscripts (e.g., PSI 13.1306 [Seider, 1981] and Codex Claromontanus). Of purely lexical works still extant, the most interesting early lexicon to the NT is a bilingual glossary to parts of four Pauline letters (Romans, 2 Corinthians, Galatians, and Ephesians). Written on papyrus and dated to the fourth/fifth century, it is preserved along with a Greek grammar in Chester Beatty Codex Ac. 1499 (= P^{99}) and provides Latin translations of Pauline words and phrases (A. Wouters [1988]; K. Wachtel and K. Witte [1994]). Curiously, it does not follow the canonical sequence (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) of PAUL's letters but repeatedly jumps from one passage to another.

The first printed Greek-Latin glossary of the NT appears in volume five of the Complutensian POLYGLOT, which also contains the first printed Greek NT. The glossary, which is incomplete and somewhat inaccurate, consists of seventy-five unnumbered pages, with three columns to a page. It lists many inflectional forms in regular alphabetical order and includes the vocabulary of Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon as well as that of the NT. Printed in 1514 and published in 1522, it was designed to assist those who had only an elementary knowledge of Greek. To the same end, the Greek NT and the VULGATE were printed in parallel columns, with each Greek word or group of words coded to its Latin equivalent by means of small supralinear roman letters.

The first person to compile a separate glossary of NT Greek words was J. Lithocomus (Steenhouwer), who, like the editors of the Complutensian Polyglot, included words drawn from the SEPTUAGINT (1552). The Antwerp Polyglot printed by C. Plantin (1572), on the other hand, contained a lexicon that purported to cover the NT as well as all Greek authors. It was not until 1614, exactly one hundred years after the printing of the Complutensian Polyglot, that the first glossary devoted exclusively to the NT was published. The compiler, E. Lubin, provided brief definitions of words but no references to passages where they occur.

The first substantive NT dictionary having true scientific merit was produced by G. Pasor. His Lexicon Graeco-Latinum (1st ed., 1619) was arranged according to word roots. The simple form of the verb usually was listed first, then all the words sharing the same stem. For the words he covered Pasor gave the basic meaning as well as any special meanings or uses, provided biblical references (sometimes with citations of the Greek text accompanied by a Latin translation), discussed some of the more important exegetical questions, gave grammatical information (e.g., the gender and genitive ending of nouns), listed the tense forms of verbs, provided the Hebrew equivalents for words occurring in the Septuagint, and frequently suggested the Hebrew or Aramaic word from which he thought a Greek word derived. Unfortunately, some of his derivations were rather fanciful; for example, he attempted to derive the Greek word for "head" (kephalē) from the Hebrew verb "to double" (kāpal), because the head has two eyes, two ears, and two nostrils. Despite its limitations, the Lexicon was enormously successful and was reprinted or revised for more than 150 years. Pasor personally revised and expanded it three times (1621^2; 1626^3; 1632^4) and appended to it a work on etymology (Etyma nominum propriorum [1622]). A register of Greek words listed in alphabetical order was included in the Lexicon so that the group to which an individual word belonged could be easily determined. The value and utility of the work was also enhanced by an index of Latin words that referred to the pages where the Greek equivalents were discussed. In addition to the Lexicon Pasor also produced two popular abridgments, a medium-sized Manuale (1624) and a miniature Syllabus (1632). For both of these smaller lexicons Pasor presented the individual Greek words in simple alphabetical sequence.

3. NT Lexicography in the Seventeenth to Nineteenth Centuries. Of the Greek-Latin lexicons published in the two centuries following Pasor's pioneering efforts, the more important were those of Ludovicus Lucius (Ludwig Lutz, [1640]); C. Stock (1725); J. Schöttgen (1746); J. Schleusner (1792); C. Wahl (1822); K. Bretschneider (1824); C. WILKE (1841). Important too were the contributions of J. Fischer, who revised Stock's lexicon (1752) and Pasor's Manuale (1755) and judiciously assessed the strengths and weaknesses of other lexicons in his Prolusiones de vitiis lexicorum NT (1791), a work that greatly influenced subsequent NT lexicography. The first Greek-English lexicon was the work of E. Leigh (1639). It was followed by the lexicons of J. Parkhurst (1769) and E. ROBINSON, who in 1825 translated Wahl's work into English and in 1836 produced his own dictionary (rev. ed., 1850).

In the latter half of the nineteenth century, the best Greek-Latin lexicon was provided by C. Grimm, who, using the second edition of Wilke's lexicon (1851) as his basis, produced a vastly improved dictionary that was virtually a new work (1868). Among its many merits was the inclusion of textual readings found in the editions of J. J. GRIESBACH, K. LACHMANN, and C. TISCHENDORF. The second edition (1879) was translated into English and further improved by J. Thayer (1886; corrected ed., 1889), whose work served as the standard Greek-English lexicon until the second half of the twentieth century and is still often reprinted, sometimes with various enhancements (1981).

4. Twentieth-century NT Lexicons. At the turn of the twentieth century, A. DEISSMANN called attention to the importance of papyri, inscriptions, and colloquial Hellenistic Greek for NT lexicography. Although Deissmann never completed the lexicon on which he labored for many years, his emphasis was reflected in many early twentieth-century works on the grammar and vocabulary of the NT. For example, F. Zorell (1911, 1961^3), H. Ebeling (1913, 1929^3) and A. Souter (1916) were among the first to use the papyri in a lexicon. The major contributors in this area were J. Moulton and G. Milligan, who ably illustrated the vocabulary of the NT from both the papyri and other nonliterary sources (1930).

Of the lexicons produced in this century, the most important have been those associated with the name of W. BAUER, whose first effort appeared in 1928 as the fully revised second edition of E. Preuschen's Greek-German lexicon of 1910. The third edition of this dictionary (Bauer's second) appeared in 1937, the fourth in 1952, and the fifth in 1958 (corrected ed., 1963). Bauer shared Deissmann's conviction that the NT represents, in general, the Koinē of the Greco-Roman period; and to demonstrate this he cited (especially in the 4th and 5th editions) a wealth of materials from secular Greek literature. At the same time he argued that the Septuagint outweighed all other influences on early Christian literature and thus frequently cited it as well as other representatives of Hellenistic Judaism.

Bauer's fourth edition was translated into English, with adaptations and additions by W. Arndt and F. Gingrich (1957 = BAG). The fifth edition was similarly translated and significantly augmented by Gingrich and F. Danker (1979 = BAG[D]) and is now the standard Greek-English lexicon of the NT. A sixth edition of Bauer's lexicon, edited by K. ALAND and B. Aland in collaboration with V. Reichmann, was published in 1988 and, despite its considerable shortcomings (R. Borger [1989]; G. Strecker [1991]), is now the standard Greek-German NT lexicon (= BAAR). Based on the Greek text common to the twenty-sixth edition of the Novum Testamentum Graece (1979) and the third edition of the United Bible Societies' Greek NT (1975; corrected ed., 1983), the sixth edition contains approximately 250 new articles not found in previous editions. Most of these stem from the increased citation of words from the apostolic fathers, the second-century apologists, the early NT APOCRYPHA, and other early Christian documents. Elegantly printed, it contains about a third more material than the fifth German edition and includes word-frequency statistics as well as many new references to textual variants, the intertestamental PSEUDEPIGRAPHA, and Hellenistic Jewish texts.

A revision of BAG(D) is in preparation by Danker, with publication planned before the year 2000. The revision will incorporate the contributions of BAAR, but it will also contain such important new features as an emphasis on definition of words, greater attention to semantic field, and the placement of terms within their various cultural contexts. Such features as well as greater attention to inscriptions and the papyri promise to make the revised BAG(D) more useful for addressing contemporary sociological and anthropological concerns.

Finally, in contrast to the standard alphabetical listing of words found in Bauer and in most lexicons, J. Louw and E. Nida in 1988 made available a Greek-English NT lexicon in which the vocabulary of the NT is analyzed according to ninety-three semantic domains, which frequently are further divided into subdomains. All words that have closely related meanings are grouped together, e.g., eighty-three different words are treated in five related groups as part of the semantic domain "know." This lexicon, which contains full descriptive definitions based on distinctive meanings of particular terms, constitutes a valuable supplement to traditional NT lexicons.

5. Theological Dictionaries of the NT. Although its initial articles are already more than sixty years old, the German theological dictionary edited by G. KITTEL and G. Friedrich (= TWNT [1932–1979]) and translated into English by G. Bromiley (= TDNT [1964–76]; abridged ed., 1985) remains the standard against which all others are measured. Its precursors include works by M. FLACIUS ILLYRICUS (1567), W. Teller (1772), F. Oetinger (1776), and especially H. Cremer (1866, 1902[9]), whose biblical-theological dictionary was translated into English by D. Simon and W. Urwick (1872, 1892[4], repr. 1954) and underwent a thorough revision by his student J. Kögel (10th German ed., 1915, 1923[11]). The most important work since the completion of TWNT/TDNT is the Theologisches Begriffslexikon zum NT (1967–71), edited by L. Coenen, E. Beyreuther, and H. Bietenhard. It has been translated into English, with additions and revisions, under the editorship of C. Brown and is entitled The New International Dictionary of NT Theology (1975–78).

Some preliminary discussions have been held about producing a new theological dictionary as a replacement for TWNT/TDNT. Such a replacement is highly desirable for a variety of reasons, many having to do with the deficiencies of TWNT/TDNT: (a) Its articles are not only dated but also uneven in both quality and length; (b) the philological assumptions that underlie many of the earlier (and some of the later) articles are outmoded and problematic (J. Barr [1961]); (c) the dictionary is the product of German Protestant theological scholarship of the mid-twentieth century and does not adequately represent the interests and perspectives of other traditions and continents; and (d) many of the articles represent an overreaction to the excesses of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE and operate with a bias against the relevance of Hellenistic texts and in favor of the pertinence of Jewish materials. Therefore, there is a pressing need for a new theological dictionary that will (a) draw on the results of modern scholarship, (b) be philologically sound, (c) reflect an awareness of and an appreciation for the diverse theological concerns of the contemporary world, and (d) exhibit balance in the use of Jewish and non-Jewish materials. Such a dictionary will necessarily be a collaborative effort and will take decades to produce, but efforts could profitably begin by securing the philological base of the endeavor through an extensive study of the semantic range of early Christian vocabulary.

6. Other Lexicons and Lexical Aids. In addition to the works mentioned in the preceding sections, the following lexicons, lexical aids, and publications are pertinent to the study of the Greek NT and other early Christian literature: (a) the indexes of J. Alsop to both BAG (1964) and BAG(D) (1981); (b) the manual lexicon of G. Abbott-Smith (1921, 1937[3]), which is often useful as a supplement to Bauer's lexicons; (c) C. Spicq's three-volume Notes de lexicographie néo-testamentaire (1978–82), also available in an English translation by J. Ernest under the title Theological Lexicon of the NT (= TLNT [1994]), which contains numerous important references to the papyri and inscriptions; (d) H. Balz and G. Schneider, Exegetisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament (1978–83), also available in English as Exegetical Dictionary of the NT (1990–93), which often contains valuable comments on NT terminology; (e) New Documents Illustrating Early Christianity, which is an informative series of papyrological and epigraphic studies. The first five volumes were edited by G. Horsley (1981–89) and the more recent ones by S. Llewelyn in collaboration with R. Kearsley (1992–). Horsley's volumes in the series were produced as a step toward the "New MM Project," an important endeavor (funded mainly by the Australian Research Council) that aims to produce a replacement volume for the now severely outdated one done by Moulton and Milligan in 1930. The chief investigators are Horsley and J. Lee, who are currently engaged in electronic searching (via the CD-ROM PHI6) for documentary parallels to the NT, systematic new lexical analysis of the words in the NT, and preparation of interim entries for publication. Some of their preliminary results will be exhibited in a forthcoming article entitled "A New Lexicon of Epigraphic and Papyrus Parallels to the NT Vocabulary: Some Interim Entries"; (f) G. Lampe, A Patristic Greek Lexicon (1961–68), which is often useful for NT exegesis as well as the study of patristic literature; and (g) for the Syriac NT, G. Kiraz, Lexical Tools to the Syriac NT (1994).

Works designed especially for those with only a basic knowledge of Greek include the following: (a) S. Kubo, A Reader's Greek-English Lexicon of the NT and a Beginner's Guide for the Translation of NT Greek (1975), which is useful for more rapid reading of the Greek NT; (b) analytical Greek lexicons, which provide a grammatical analysis of every inflection of every word occurring in the Greek NT and include H. Moulton's 1977 revision of a work published by S. Bagster and Sons in 1852, now entitled The Analytical Greek Lexicon Revised; W. Perschbacher, The New Analytical Greek Lexicon (1990); and W. Mounce, The Analytical Lexicon to the Greek NT (1993); (c) parsing information and grammatical analysis is provided by A. Robertson, Word Pictures in the NT (1930–33); N. Han, A Parsing Guide to the Greek NT (1971); F. Rienecker and C. Rogers, Jr., A Linguistic Key to the NT (1980); P. Guillemette, The Greek NT Analyzed (1986); M. Zerwick and M. Grosvenor, A Grammatical Analysis of the Greek NT (1996[5]); and some electronic programs like those produced by the GRAMCORD Institute; (d) J. Greenlee, A NT Greek Morpheme Lexicon (1983), which displays the words in BAG(D) according to their component parts; (e) the word studies of M. Vincent (1887), W. Vine (1900), K. Wuest (1940–55; 3 vol. ed., 1973), W. Barclay (1964) and N. Turner (1980) provide basic information but should be used with an awareness of their limitations; and (f) R. Trench, Synonyms of the NT (1880[9], repr., 1980; rev. ed. by J. Hughes and C. Hughes [1989]).

Of the lexicons and lexical aids not concerned specifically with the vocabulary of early Christianity, the more important are as follows: (a) H. Liddell and R. Scott, A Greek-English Lexicon (rev. H. Jones, with the assistance of R. McKenzie; [1940^9] = LSJ or LSJM); the 1968 supplement edited by E. Barber has now been replaced with a new, extensively revised and expanded supplement, produced under the editorship of P. Glare and the assistance of A. Thompson (1996), that contains more than 20,000 entries and incorporates Linear B forms as well as words and forms from the papyri and inscriptions; (b) R. Renehan, Greek Lexicographical Notes (1975 and 1982), two volumes that supplement LSJ; (c) F. Preisigke and E. Kiessling, Wörterbuch der griechischen Papyrusurkunden (1925–), with its supplement (1969–); (d) E. Sophocles, Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods (1870; corrected ed., 1887; repr. 1983); (e) the Latin dictionaries of C. Lewis and C. Short (1879), A. Souter (1949), and Glare (1982); and (f) for unusual verbal forms, G. Traut, Lexikon über die Formen der griechischen Verba (1867; repr., 1968), and N. Marione and F. Guala, Complete Handbook of Greek Verbs (1961).

Bibliography: J. Barr, The Semantics of Biblical Language (1961). R. Borger, "Zum Stande der neutestamentlichen Lexicographie," Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen 241 (1989) 103-46. L. Cohn, "Griechische Lexikographie," Handbuch für klassischen Altertumswissenschaft (1910^4) 2/1:679-730. F. W. Danker, A Century of Greco-Roman Philology (1988) 43-55; Multipurpose Tools for Bible Study: Revised and Expanded Edition (1993) 109-47. A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East: The NT Illustrated by Recently Discovered Texts of the Graeco-Roman World (1927) 401-9. G. Delling, "Das erste griechisch-lateinische Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament," NovT 18 (1976) 213-40; "G. Pasor als Lexikograph," NovT 22 (1980) 184-92. G. Friedrich, "Das bisher noch fehlende Begriffslexikon zum Neuen Testament," NTS 19 (1972–73) 127-52; "Pre-History of the Theological Dictionary of the NT," TDNT 10 (1976) 613-61. R. E. Gaebel, "The Greek Word-Lists to Virgil and Cicero," BJRL 52 (1969–70) 284-325. F. W. Gingrich, "NT Lexicography and the Future," JR 25 (1945) 179-82; "Lexicons: II. Lexicons of the Greek NT," Twentieth Century Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (ed. L. Loetscher, 1955) 2:657-59. C. L. W. Grimm, "Kritisch-geschichtliche Uebersicht der neutestamentlichen Verballexika seit der Reformation," TSK 48 (1875) 479-515. C. J. Hemer, "Towards a New Moulton and Milligan," NovT 24 (1982) 97-123. G. Horsley, "The Greek Documentary Evidence and NT Lexical Study: Some Soundings," NDIEC 5 (1989) 67-93. J. Kramer, Glossaria bilinguia in papyris et membranis reperta (1983). E. Mangenot, "Dictionnaires de la Bible," DB 2 (1899) 1419-22. M. Naoumides, "The Fragments of Greek Lexicography in the Papyri," Classical Studies Presented to B. E. Perry (1969) 181-202. R. A. Pack, The Greek and Latin Literary Texts from Greco-Roman Egypt (1965^2). O. A. Piper, "NT Lexicography: An Unfinished Task," Festschrift to Honor F. W. Gingrich (1972) 177-204. R. Reitzenstein, Geschichte der griechischen Etymologika (1897). H. and B. Riesenfeld, Repertorium lexicographicum Graecum: A Catalogue of Indexes and Dictionaries to Greek Authors (1954). R. Seider, Paläographie der lateinischen Papyri, vol. 2.2, Literarische Papyri: Juristische und Christliche Texte (1981). G. Strecker, "W. Bauers Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament in neuer Auflage," TLZ 116 (1991) 81-92. J. Tolkiehn, "Lexikographie," PW 12 (1925) 2432-82. K. Wachtel and K. Witte, Das Neue Testament auf Papyrus, vol. 2, Die paulinischen Briefe, Teil 2, Gal, Eph, Phil, Kol, 1 u. 2 Thess, 1 u. 2 Tim, Tit, Phlm, Hebr (1994) LXVII-XC. A. Wouters, The Chester Beatty Codex Ac. 1499: A Graeco-Latin Lexicon on the Pauline Epistles and a Greek Grammar (1988).

J. T. FITZGERALD, JR.

LIBERATION THEOLOGIES

1. Historical Development. The type of biblical interpretation to be described here developed in Latin America in the course of the 1960s and was received and further developed in other parts of the Third World. Within this method of interpretation, one can distinguish two levels: the popular liberation movements and the more theologically oriented liberation theologies.

On the popular level there are scarcely any historical precedents in Latin America. The reading of the Bible was prohibited to the Roman Catholic people for centuries and was propagated only by individual figures (like M. da Conciação) since the 1920s. In most cases the people knew the Bible only from song texts (a method of evangelization used by the Jesuits) and from the worship service (see F. Rolim [1988]; J. Konings [1984]). An illustrative example of the traditional popular understanding of the Bible is the interpretation of Christ: Against the background of the reality of their own lives, the people see him as either the suffering, defeated, powerless one, with whom they can identify, or the heavenly ruler who is depicted with the insignia of the colonial rulers and who legitimates their rule. In the first case, Christ's resurrection plays almost no role; in the second, his saving death is scarcely present (see J. Araújo [1984]; R. Azzi [1985^2]; G. Casalis [1984]; D. Irrarazaval [1986]; S. Trinidad [1984]).

Conversely, the contemporary Latin American liberation theology and its particular form of exegesis have their precursors. The most frequently named is B. de Las Casas (1474–1566), whom E. Dussel goes so far as to designate "the greatest theologian of the sixteenth century" (1985, 72). In contrast to most theologians of his time, Las Casas argued less philosophically and juridically than biblically. For example, he condemned the dispersion, enslavement, and forced christianization of the Indians, noting that God had given the law neither to Abraham (as an individual) nor to the oppressed in Egypt, but only to Israel after the exodus because a free people was the necessary precondition for the giving of the law (Las Casas [1957/58] 2:197). In the extermination of the Indians by the Spanish, Christ is crucified again, "not once, but thousands of times" (2:511).

Similar applications of biblical texts are found in the writings of modern liberation theologians; nevertheless, it is hardly correct when Las Casas's awareness, which is astonishingly critical for its time, is traced back to his biblical orientation (contra J. Pagalday [1988] 49; G. Gutiérrez [1985²] 57-58). His contemporary, for instance, V. de Quiroga (1470–1565; 1538–65, bishop of Michoacán, Mexico) supported his defense of the Indians more with philosophical texts and church doctrine than with biblical texts (J. Moreira [1985] 47). Brazilian clerics took part in the revolutions of 1817 and 1824 primarily because they were influenced by the enlightenment ideas of French philosophers (Azzi [1985²] 29). A. Vieira (mid 17th cent.) on the other hand, justified the enslavement of blacks biblically (see Col 3:22-24; Eph 6:5-9; 1 Pet 2:18-21; Luke 12:37), while G. Leite (1546–1603) condemned this practice philosophically (E. Hoornaert [1982] 36, 54-55, 78-79; 1985, 67).

These examples show that a biblical orientation was neither necessary nor a sufficient condition for non-imperialistic theological thought. Nevertheless, there is a line of emancipatory biblical interpretation that can only be alluded to here with a few names (for individual treatments see the collective works of Faculdade [1985²]; P. Richard [1985]): A. de Montesinos (16th century: defense of the Indians with, e.g., Luke 3:4; Ezekiel 34); P. de Córdoba (16th century: the oppression of the Indians surpasses that of the Israelites in Egypt); M. Lacunza y Diaz (1731–1801: resort to Daniel and the Apocalypse); J. Morelos y Pavón (1765–1815: the liberation of Israel from oppression in Egypt and Babylon as an inspiration for the struggle for liberation in Mexico); and A. Pallais (1884–1954: exodus motif of central significance).

The process through which a strong theological trend emerged from these individual voices who superseded the "theology of development," and within which the popular understanding of the Bible was radically transformed, still has not been completely studied (attempts by Azzi [1985²]; C. Boff [1986³] 83-84; Dussell [1985, 1985²]; [1988] 364-76; A. Garcia Rubio [1983³] 33-75; C. Mesters [1987⁴]; C. Pinto da Silva [1988]; R. Poblette [1979]; S. Silva Gotay [1985²]). One can distinguish between political-economic and ecclesial-theological factors, which stand in reciprocal relationship with each other. To the first group belong the increasing oppression and pauperization in Latin America as well as the interpretation of these processes through the theory of dependence and, further, the success of the Marxist revolution in Cuba. The ecclesial-theological factors (the influence of Vatican II and of theological developments in the First World) are in part independent of these political and economic ones, but they are also in part the answer to the altered social realities (the radicalization of the engagement of laity in the Acción Católica, meetings of theologians, and church documents like those from Medellin and Puebla).

It is true that liberation theology was from the beginning biblically oriented (J. Konings [1984] 85). Nonetheless, the interest in the Bible and its emancipatory interpretation are certainly secondary to the participation of Christians in the revolutionary process and to the adoption of modern sociological categories (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT/HB STUDIES) in theology. A particular exegesis had doubtlessly strengthened and fertilized the development of liberation theology, but this exegesis itself was a consequence. In the new social and theological context, the Bible had something new and interesting to say.

2. Popular Exegesis in Latin America: Forms, Texts, Themes. In Latin America groups of Christians who read the Bible together are formed out of a variety of motives: There may be liturgical causes (e.g., a preparation for Christmas, a campaign for fraternity), external events that concern the community (e.g., expulsions of peasants from their land), or simply the desire for more community. In addition, Bible courses are being offered more frequently (e.g., in Brazil by the Centro de Estudos Biblicos [CEBI], whose central figure is Mesters; see W. Schürger [1995]). Exegetically trained facilitators from such organizations visit the grassroots communities and motivate them to come to grips with the texts on their own, while offering exegetical assistance with restraint. Furthermore, the reading of the Bible plays a significant role at the interregional meetings of agricultural workers, unions, and the like that are organized by the church (Mesters [1988]; A. Steiner [1985]; J. Swetnam [1984]).

On this level, biblical interpretations are mainly oral. If they are documented in writing (instructions to and results of Bible meetings), it is only in duplicated pages and pamphlets of the simplest kind, which never go beyond the boundaries of the respective parish or diocese. Nevertheless, pertinent publications are also available in foreign countries. The best known is E. Cardenal's Das Evangelium der Bauern von Solentiname (1981; ET The Gospel in Solentiname [1976]); others include the anonymous publications "Parables of Today," "Amostras da hermeneûtica dos pobres," "A luta pela Reforma Agrária e a Bíblia" (further: E. Bambamarca [1983³]; M de Barros Souza [1983, 1983]; M. Garcia Gutierrez [1983]; R. McAfee Brown [1988]; Mesters, Leben [1983]; A. Reiser and P. Schoenborn [1981]; Rolim [1988]; C. Rowland and M. Corner [1989]; T. Schmeller [1994]).

In such documents, one discovers a preference for the HB over the NT. This emphasis may in part be due to the more concrete images of the HB, but it derives primarily from the possibility for the people of Latin America to identify with Israel. In Israel's history there is a recognizable "project of God" (Mesters [1984[5]]) that has not yet been completed but that includes the similarly perceived Latin American reality today. It can be seen in Israel's exodus and conquest as God frees the people from oppression in Egypt, desiring equality for them rather than hierarchy, productive autonomy instead of exploitation, etc.

In the following age of the biblical story the project is often darkened, especially through the monarchy, but the prophets continue to point to it. The project is completely realized through JESUS, who as a poor man announced the reign of God to the poor and who fights for it against oppression and exploitation. His message of brother and sisterhood and solidarity with the marginalized of society is confirmed through the resurrection. It is set forth in the practice of the first churches, which presents a clear picture of the project according to the Acts of the Apostles (e.g., in the community's holding of goods in common).

Besides these indicated themes, the psalms play a great role, especially those that reflect the experience of the exile. Jeremiah 22:16 is often quoted in order to bring out the priority of liberating practice over any religious talk. The wisdom books find approval on account of their proximity to Latin American folk wisdom. From Maccabees and Ezra–Nehemiah one gains inspiration for the revolutionary situation today and for the reconstruction that needs to follow the revolution (C. Boff [1986[3]] 46-47).

In the NT, besides Jesus' work in general and the SERMON ON THE MOUNT in particular, his PARABLES are of primary importance because of their rural local color and their simplicity. Also often referred to is Mary, the mother of Jesus, who becomes a figure of identification for the oppressed, and her Magnificat, which is understood literally as a basic text of revolution. While the letters of PAUL play hardly any role, the Apocalypse of John is very important: "The Apocalypse is a writing that shows that God is in the struggle. That there will be no liberation without much suffering beforehand. The Apocalypse explains emphatically that we must be steadfast to the end. What counts is the certainty of the victory. . . . Whether it is the Roman Empire of that age, whether it is the authoritarian state today, the Apocalypse shows the state to be a wild animal. . . . The peasant can struggle from now on because he knows that this new heaven and this new earth are our hope" (Barros Souza, Luta [1983] 86-87).

3. The Exegesis of Liberation Theology in Latin America: Forms, Texts, Themes. Although biblical impulses were important for liberation theology from the beginning, liberation theology went a long time without developing its own academic exegesis. Either it fell back on the exegetical tradition of Europe or North America or it dealt with biblical texts only in the framework of systematic theology. Only in the last decades of the twentieth century has exegesis from the standpoint of liberation theology attained greater significance. The Estudos Biblicos, which previously were only an appendix to the Revista Ecclesiastica Brasileira, have been published independently since 1984 (e.g., "The Bible as the Remembrance of the Poor," 1 [1984]; "The Way of Liberation," 2 [1984]; "Reading the Bible from the Real Conditions of Life," 7 [1985]). Moreover, J. Comblin is publishing a commentary series (Epistola aos Filipenses [1985]) over the whole Bible for which seventy volumes are planned, and since 1988 the Revista de Interpretação Bíblica Latino-Americana has appeared in both Spanish and Portuguese editions.

What was true of popular exegesis is also, though less starkly, true for the more strictly academic exegesis of liberation theology: The HB has rather more significance than the NT. At the same time, however, there is an attempt to consider each text and each theme in the framework of the whole Bible. Two great theme-complexes are central: (a) the biblical witness to liberation in the history of the people of God and (b) the biblical obligation to carry out liberation today.

a. The biblical witness to liberation. This witness is treated, on the one hand, in studies based directly on biblical terminology and conceptions of "liberation" and "oppression" (e.g., T. Hanks [1983]; R. Ortega [1978]; E. Tamez [1982]). On the other hand, it appears in investigations of all sorts of texts and themes from the standpoint of "liberation." In this context, "liberation" can be understood in a variety of ways. Thus one differentiates between (1) "political, economic, social, and cultural liberation"; (2) "anthropological, historical, and communitarian self-discovery of humanity"; and (3) "salvation in a theological sense," all of which represent "different levels of a comprehensive historical process and which mutually condition one another" (H. Goldstein [1977] 67-68). Liberation theology does not, therefore, reduce liberation to the political and economic plane (as is frequently charged), but neither does liberation theology reduce liberation to a spiritual and otherworldly plane (with which liberation theology charges traditional theology). This more comprehensive understanding is based theologically on the denial of the separation of the order of creation from the order of salvation, of nature from the supernatural, of history from salvation history. There is only the one process of liberation, in which different aspects may be relevant depending on the situation. For Latin America today liberation is above all a liberation from hunger, injustice, and oppression.

The HB theme referred to most frequently is the exodus of Israel out of Egypt: Just as God led the chosen people in concrete historical reality, as God freed them from oppression and made them God's people, so God also does today with the marginalized masses in Latin America. The exodus event is one of the many embodiments of the kingdom of God in the HB (G. Pixley [1983²]) that all have in common an overthrow of "social breaches," i.e., an end of marginalization and the disintegration of certain groups through "reconciliations" (covenant and covenant renewals; Konings [1975]).

In the NT the SYNOPTIC Gospels and in particular the praxis of Jesus are of special interest. The historical Jesus is especially referred to (J. Segundo [1985]; J. Sobrino [1978²]), although little attention is given to the reconstruction of his life; most scholars, in fact, do not make a primary distinction between the historical Jesus and the kerygmatic Christ (C. Bussmann [1980] 67-68). Luke 4:18-19 serves as the summation of Jesus' work and for liberation theology is one of the key texts of the NT. The kingdom of God announced by Jesus is not given a unitary explanation but can be described in relatively general terms as a utopian expression of a last, universal sense that represents a comprehensive revolution in the structures of the world (L. Boff [1974, 1979]), or as a liberation of the poor from material and social oppression (Sobrino [1979]), or even more concretely as a classless society without private property (J. Miranda [1982]). The political implications of the work and message of Jesus present themselves in a corresponding variety but are always emphasized. They are either the indirect result of his particularly religious appearance (e.g., Croatto, Exodus [1981]; S. Galilea [1984]), or they are seen as direct political activity after the manner of the Zealots (see Pixley [1983²]). These implications are to be grasped in the conflicts Jesus provokes—conflicts that can be determined to be primarily confrontations with the Jewish religious authorities (theologians, Temple aristocrats), with the apparatus of the Roman state (slave society, Roman totalitarianism), or more generally with the privileged rich. Even more often one finds the interpretation that Jesus' critique of the traditional legitimation of exploitation and oppression through religious ideology led to a political conflict (see Pixley [1983²]; I. Ellacuría [1984]; Croatto, Exodus [1981]; Political Dimension [1984]; see also, A. McGovern [1983]). The execution of Jesus is in any case no mere misunderstanding or blunder; rather, it is the reaction of persons in power to his direct or indirect subversive activity. Seen in this light, Jesus' death seals his life but can still be interpreted as a failure that includes him with all those who have suffered unjustly (Bussmann [1980] 136). Thus the inclusive side of the death of Jesus is stressed more than the exclusive (Sobrino [1986] 296). The resurrection of Jesus only makes the liberation he has brought complete because it guarantees a good end to the process already begun (L. Boff [1979]). It is not simply the "good news," for all people, but rather as the resurrection of the crucified one it represents first of all hope for all persons crucified in history (Sobrino [1986] 296).

Other NT texts are clearly of less interest to liberation theologians than the synoptic Gospels. The Pauline doctrine of justification is understood not only in individual and existential terms but also in political and economic terms: Sin is also (or above all) social injustice and exploitation; the law causes alienation from reality and leads to dependence and an absence of freedom; justification is a process that allows the new person to come into existence, liberating from egoism and participation in oppressive structures to love and comportment in solidarity (Croatto, Exodus [1981]; Miranda [1974]; E. Barreto Cesar [1983]). The Gospel of John is also sometimes read in terms of liberation theology (Miranda [1977]; see S. Phillips [1978] for the use of Scripture by Segundo).

The way in which liberation theologians attempt to answer the pressing question of a specifically Christian bearing as opposed to revolutionary violence on the basis of the NT is also revealing. Here there are essentially three positions, with the third being by far the most widely represented: (1) Jesus' practice of spilling his own blood rather than the blood of others is for Christians today obligatory and must define the particular style of a Christian liberation struggle (see Ortega [1978] 73-74); Jesus himself defended and approved the use of violence (his words on swords, cleansing of the Temple) and is a model for Christians even for a violent revolutionary engagement on behalf of the poor (see Miranda [1982]); (3) Jesus' practice and message were, to be sure, non-violent, but this attitude was tactically conditioned (Pixley [1983²]), prophetic-charismatic (Galilea [1984]), or only one biblical paradigm among many (J. Míguez Bonino [1975]) and is therefore not normative for today; it is the situation in Latin America, not the commandment or the model of Jesus, that urges a policy of nonviolence.

b. The biblical obligation to act for liberation today. This obligation is, according to liberation theology, particularly recognizable in the prophets of the HB. Such texts as Isa 42:5-7; Hos 4:1-2; 6:6; and Mic 3:9-12, but in particular the oft-cited text of Jer 22:13-16, define true knowledge of God as acts of justice and intervention on behalf of the oppressed (see McGovern [1983] 464; G. Gorgulho [1978] 293-94). Furthermore, the salvific future promised by the prophets (as in Zech 8:7-17) is tied to acts that free the poor, the orphans, and the widows (Gorgulho [1978] 294). Just as Jesus understood himself only in connection with the kingdom of God, so also Christians can understand themselves only in connection to Jesus. The Christian must therefore follow his service to the kingdom of God, which means engaging oneself for love and justice. Only this orthopraxy, which today in Latin America is especially important on a political-economic plane, allows Jesus to be understood (Sobrino [1978²]). The kingdom of God has a present and a future aspect: It is given concrete realization in each actual act of liberation (each experience of liberation is resurrection)—however, it cannot be identified with any of these acts of liberation, but rather always remains in the future and only makes possible the construction of imperfectly and provisionally better societies through the promise that this engagement is not senseless (L. Boff [1974]; Míguez Bonino [1975]; A. Fragoso [1971]). An unbroken continuity between human society and the kingdom of God is only rarely postulated (e.g., by Miranda [1982]).

Concerning the determination of the justice brought by Jesus and to be realized by Christians, liberation theology bases its claims with particular alacrity on the Gospel of Matthew and its concept of "righteousness" (dikaiosyne; so Matt 5:10, 20; 6:33; Gorgulho [1978]). The most widely cited NT text in liberation theology (next to Luke 4:18-19; see above) is Matt 25:31-46, the depiction of the last judgment, focused on orthopraxy as opposed to orthodoxy. The decisive acts of mercy it portrays must today in Latin America be understood politically and collectively (G. Gutiérrez [1992¹⁰] 189).

4. Methodology and Hermeneutics. The exegesis of Latin American liberation theology applies about the same range of methods as does the exegesis of the First World. Next to a continuation of historical criticism, structuralist (Croatto; see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION), psychological (Alves; see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), feministic (Tamez; see FEMINIST INTERPRETATION), anthropological (Segundo) and, above all, sociological approaches (Anderson, Barros Souza, Gorgulho, Richard, M. Schwantes) can be recognized. What constitutes the peculiarity of liberation-theological exegesis, however, is its close connection with the reading of the Bible among the people of Latin America.

a. Popular exegesis. A basic methodological feature of Bible study groups in Latin America is to proceed, not from the text, but from one's own life. Because those taking part are not fundamentally concerned with interpretation of the Bible as such but with their own lives, questions from real life must first be formulated before they can be answered from the Bible. The first part of such a study, therefore, consists of a discussion of the actual situation, particularly with regard to the socioeconomic sphere, since the most urgent problems lie here. To this end one can present either a significant story (Mesters, Leben [1983]; E. Bambamarca [1983³]; Anonymous [1985]), or show a picture (Anonymous, Parables), which can then draw the participants into a conversation leading to the expression of their problem. As a second step a biblical text is chosen and described, allowing the given situation to be seen in light of the will of God. In some circumstances the planning of concrete measures results as a third step (so, e.g., by the eleventh national meeting of the grassroots congregations of Mexico; see Garcia Gutierrez [1983]). This schema is spread widely as "Seeing-Judging-Acting."

For the connection between life situation and the text of the Bible there are two fundamental models. The first is older and appears to arise primarily where exegetical assistance is lacking: Persons, actions, and events in the Bible and today are more or less clearly identified. Thus the story of Jesus can be told anew with a leader of campesinos as the protagonist; instead of the magi, a bishop, a professor, and a physician visit the newborn; instead of fleeing into Egypt, the family flees into the slums of a large city; in the place of baptism and anointing appears the free acceptance of the problems of the campesinos (Bambamarca [1983³] 166-71, 182-83; further examples are to be found in Reiser-Schoenborn [1981] 165, 176, 293-98). The second basic model avoids direct identification and attempts to differentiate biblical from contemporary situations through a catalogue of questions that are applied to both sides: The so-called "Readings over Four Sides" (see Anderson-Gorgulho [1987²]) investigate the economic side (Who produces? Who consumes? How is labor divided, etc.?), the political side (Who exercises power? How?), the social side (Which groups are there? What is family life like?), and the ideological side (What do people think of life? Of religion? Of society?). The "twenty-point method" examines contemporary reality and the text of the Bible respectively according to names, titles, groups, places, vocations, conflicts, economic connections, etc.

The fundamental HERMENEUTIC is established on the basis of the "co-naturality," i.e., natural affinity (Mesters [1980] 564) between the people of the Bible and the people of Latin America. The oppressive situation and the liberation process begun in the name of God are in both cases the same; therefore, the people look into the Bible, not as through a window, excited to see what is taking place on the other side, but as into a mirror that reflects one's own life (F. Betto [1988] 126). A "contemporaneity exists between the historical memory of the oppressed of biblical times and the practical memory of the poor in Latin America" (Schwantes [1986] 386). Because the Bible was written by the poor, it can only be legitimately interpreted by poor people (Richard [1987⁴] 25).

The dealing of the people of Latin America with the Bible can be characterized in terms of these categories: immediate, free, subjective, and emancipatory (Schmeller [1987] 158-62; Gorgulho [1988]; C. Gudorf [1987]). The people understand themselves as the immediate addressees of the Bible even when the necessity of translation is strongly recognized. They feel themselves free to appropriate some texts literally and some figuratively. One group of farmers at a Bible convention set forth the hermeneutic principle: "We must not understand the text of Scripture literally (1) if it does not correspond to our reality, and (2) if the force of older texts has been set aside through the command of love given by Jesus" (cited by Mesters [1980] 564). The subjective approach shows itself in the already indicated lack of interest in an understanding of text as text or as a testimony of the past without present consequence—the text serves exclusively to understand one's own life better. "The Bible is the catalogue of the world, which the Christian receives from the Creator, in order to be able to understand the sense of the exhibitions of life . . . An exhibition without a catalogue confuses the visitors. A catalogue without an exhibition is absolute nonsense" (Mesters [1984²] 162). Finally, both the selection and the exegesis of the biblical text are determined by a strong emancipatory interest. Reading in the framework of a political-economic liberation process allows one to discover systematic features in the Bible and thus strengthens the engagement of Christians in this process.

b. Academic exegesis. As stated above, the academic pursuit of liberation theology is not fundamentally different in its exegetical interests and pronouncements from the reading of the Bible among the people. What it contributes is a hermeneutical foundation for this popular style of reading and the provision of exegetical means and knowledge that are not specifically Latin American, but that can work there in a stimulating and corrective fashion.

Concerning the hermeneutical act of Bible reading, according to C. Boff, two models are practiced: "the correspondence of terms," and "the correspondence of relations" ([1986³] 237, 241; similarly Konings [1980]; Rowland and Corner [1989] 54, 78). The first model corresponds to the described identifiable exegesis among the common people. Here such equations are set up as "the power of the Romans" = "imperialism"; "the power of the Sadducees" = "dependent bourgeoisie"; "the political comportment of Jesus" = "participation of Christians in the revolutionary process" (239), without taking into account the changed contemporary context. According to Boff, only the second model is hermeneutically responsible because it does not simply copy biblical pronouncements and solutions but sees them in their historical context and attempts to come to corresponding but not necessarily identical solutions today. Therefore, it is not enough to say merely "the political engagement of Jesus" = "the political engagement of Christians" but rather "the political engagement of Jesus"/"the historical social context at that time" = "the political engagement of Christians"/"the current social context." If the same communication is intended, the alteration of the context necessitates an alteration in the pronouncement (Konings [1980]).

Croatto (1989) takes a different path to similar results. Following Ricoeur he designs a SEMIOTIC hermeneutic. The central term here is "excess of meaning" (Sinnüberschuss). As with any text, the meaning of the biblical text is not determined by the conditions of its historical formation. The text leaves its original context behind with its original meaning (decontextualization) and realizes an aspect of "excess of meaning" whenever it is introduced into a new context by a reader who then "rereads" it ("recontextualization"). This process of a "creation of meaning" (Sinnschöpfung) is found in the Bible; however, one must be careful to read the text within its same "semantic axes" (1989, 55) because not every "creation of meaning" is legitimate.

The problem broached here—that of a criterion of truth for biblical interpretation—is answered with a reference to praxis: Where the biblical interpretation of the community supports the process of liberation on its various levels but particularly in its socioeconomic and political aspects, the interpretation is true and legitimate. A certain risk cannot be excluded in the exegesis, however, because one cannot know whether a particular exegesis was justified before one sees the results (Barreto Cesar [1983] 396; Gudorf, 16).

5. Biblical Exegesis in Liberation Theologies and Grassroots Movements Outside of Latin America. Finally, during the last thirty years of the twentieth century, a similar form of biblical interpretation has developed outside of Latin America in other oppressive situations: In form, preferred texts and themes, methodology, and hermeneutics, one can clearly observe analogies on the popular as well as the academic plane. These cannot be dealt with in detail here, however (for a selection of representative contributions, see R. Sugirtharajah [1991]). These movements go back in part to the influence of Latin American liberation theology but have their own roots in the history and situation of each land concerned. The most important appearances are the minjung theology in Korea (see J. Lee [1988]; A. Mu [1981]; K. Raiser [1988]; of particular interest is Míguez Bonino [1988]), the Black or AFROCENTRIC theology in the United States (C. Felder [1989]; C. Gilkes [1989]; V. Wimbush [1989]), and the liberation theology and liberation movement among Blacks in South Africa (C. Banana [1979]; C. Breytenbach [1989]; B. Goba [1986]; O. de Villiers [1987]; I. Mosala [1986]; W. Vorster [1984]). Of further relevance is the document that appeared in July, 1989, "The Road to Damascus: Kairos and Conversion," to which thousands of Christians from South Africa, Namibia, South Korea, the Philippines, El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Guatemala put their signatures.

Bibliography: L. Alonso Schökel, "Exégesis y hermenéutica en Brasil," Bib 68 (1987) 404-7. L. R. Alves, "Páscoa, a travessia da esperança," EstBib 8 (1987²) 41-9. A. F. Anderson and G. Gorgulho, "A leitura sociológica da Bíblia," Estudos Bíblicos 2 (1987²) 6-10. Anonymous, Parables of Today, n.d.; A luta pela Reforma Agrária e a Bíblia (1985); "Amostras da hermenêutica dos pobres," Por trás da palavra 8, 46 (1988) 16-28. A. Antoniazzi, ABC da Bíblia (1981); La Palabra de

Dios en la vida del pueblo: Manual de pastoral Bíblica (1987). J. D. de Araújo, "Images of Jesus in the Culture of the Brazilian People," Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (ed. J. Míguez Bonino, 1984) 30-38. R. Avila, Biblia y liberación: Lectura de la Biblia desde América Latina (Iglesia liberadora 6, 1976). R. Azzi, "A teologia no Brasil: Considerações históricas," História da teologia na América Latina (ed. Faculdade de teologia N. Senhora da Assunção, 1985²) 21-43. E. P. de Bambamarca, Vamos caminando: Machen wir uns auf den Weg—Glaube, Gefangenschaft, und Befreiung in den peruanischen Anden (1983³). C. Banana, "The Biblical Basis for Liberation Struggles," IRM 68 (1979) 417-23. E. E. Barreto Cesar, "Faith Operating in History: NT Hermeneutics in a Revolutionary Context" (diss., Emory University, 1983); A fé como ação na história: Hermenêutica do Novo Testamento no contexto da América Latina (Libertação e teologia, 1987). M. de Barros Souza, A Bíblia e a luta pela terra (Da base para a base 11, 1983); "La lectura de la Bíblia en las comunidades cristianas populares," Christus 48, 567-68 (1983) 50-53. F. Betto, "A Leitura da Bíblia em Nicaragua," RCB 31 (1988) 126-34. B. Blount, "Beyond the Boundaries: Cultural Perspective and the Interpretation of the NT" (diss., Emory University, 1992). C. Boff, Theologie und Praxis: Die erkenntnistheoretischen Grundlagen der Theologie der Befreiung (GT.S, 1986³). L. Boff, "Rettung in Jesus Christus und Befreiungsprozess," Conc(D) 10 (1974) 419-26; "Christ's Liberation versus Oppression: An Attempt at Theological Construction from the Standpoint of Latin America," Frontiers of Theology in Latin America (ed. R. Gibellini, 1979) 100-132; Jesus Christus, der Befreier (1986). C. Bravo, Jesús hombre en conflicto (Teología actual 1, 1986). C. Breytenbach, "Urchristliches zum heutigen Christsein—Reflexionen zur Rolle der Bibelwissenschaft im Schatten der Apartheid," Freiburger Akademiearbeiten 1979–1989 (ed. D. Bader, 1989) 493-512. C. Bussmann, Befreiung durch Jesus? Die Christologie der lateinamerikanischen Befreiungstheologie (1980). J. L. Caravias, El Dios de Jesús (Iglesia viva, 1986); Dios es bueno (Biblia y pueblo 3, 1990). E. Cardenal (ed.), The Gospel in Solentiname. 4 vols. (1976). G. Casalis, "Jesus—Neither Abject Lord Nor Heavenly Monarch," Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (ed. J. Míguez Bonino, 1984) 72-76. G. Collet (ed.), Der Christus der Armen: Das Christuszeugnis der lateinamerickanischen Befreiungstheologen (1988). J. Comblin, "Critérios para um Comentário da Bíblia," REB 42, 166 (1982) 307-30; Epístola aos Filipenses (Comentário Bíblico NT, 1985); Introdução geral ao Comentário Bíblico: Leitura da Bíblia na perspectiva dos pobres (1985); A novidade de Jesus (8 vols., 1985/86). J. S. Croatto, "Befreiung und Freiheit: Biblische Hermeneutik für die 'Theologie der Befreiung,' " Lateinamerika: Gesellschaft, Kirche, Theologie, vol. 2, Der Steit um die Theologie der Befreiung (ed. H.-J. Prien, 1981) 40-59; Exodus: A Hermeneutics of Freedom (1981); Hermenéutica bíblica: Para una teoría de la lectura como producción de sentido (1984); "Hermenêutica e lingüística: A hermenêutica bíblica à luz da semiótica e frente aos métodos histórico-críticos," EsTe 24, 3 (1984) 214-24; "The Political Dimension of Christ the Liberator," Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (ed. J. Míguez Bonino, 1984) 102-22; Die Bibel gehört den Armen: Perspektiven einer befreiungstheologischen Hermeneutik (ÖEH 5, 1989). F. Crüsemann, "Anstösse: Befreiungstheologische Hermeneutik und die Exegese in Deutschland," EvTh 50 (1990) 535-45. E. Dussel, Herrschaft und Befreiung: Ansatz, Stationen, und Themen einer lateinamerikanischen Theologie der Befreiung (1985); "Hipóteses para uma história da teologia na América Latina (1492–1980)," História da teologia na América Latina (ed. Faculdade de teologia N. Senhora da Assunçãao, 1985²) 165-96; Geschichte der Kirche in Lateinamerika (1988). H. Echegaray, La práctica de Jesús (1989³). I. Ellacuría, "The Political Nature of Jesus' Mission," Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (ed. J. Míguez Bonino, 1984) 79-92; "Historicidad de la salvación cristiana," Mysterium liberationis: Conceptos fundamentales de la teologia de la liberación I (ed. I. Ellacuría and J. Sobrino, 1990) 323-72. I. Ellacuría and J. Sobrino (eds.), Mysterium liberationis: Conceptos fundamentales de la teologia de la liberación (2 vols., 1990). Faculdade de teologia da igreja evangélica de confissão luterana no Brasil (ed.), Proclamar libertação: Auxílios homiléticos XIV (1988). Faculdade de teologia N. Senhora da Assunção (ed.), História da teologia na América Latina (Teologia em diálogo, 1985²). C. H. Felder, Troubling Biblical Waters: Race, Class, and Family (1989). A. Fragoso, Evangelium und soziale Revolution: Ein Kapitel lateinamerikanischer Theologie (1971). S. Galilea, "Jesus' Attitude Toward Politics: Some Working Hypotheses," Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (ed. J. Míguez Bonino, 1984) 93-101. M. Garcia Gutierrez, "La Biblia en la liberacíon del pueblo," Christus 48, 571 (1983) 29-33. A. Garcia Rubio, Teologia da liberação: Política ou profetismo? Visão panorâmica e crítica da teologia política latino-americana (Fé e realidade 3,1983²). E. S. Gerstenberger, "Lectura Bíblica y realidad," RevistB 46, 13-14 (1984) 103-15. R. Gibellini (ed.), Frontiers of Theology in Latin America (1979). C. T. Gilkes, " 'Mother to the Motherless, Father to the Fatherless': Power, Gender, and Community in an Afrocentric Biblical Tradition," Semeia 47 (1989) 57-85. B. Goba, "The Use of Scripture in the Kairos Document: A Biblical Ethical Perspective," JTSA 56 (1986) 61-65. J. Goldingay, "The Hermeneutics of Liberation Theology," HBT 4, 2 (1982); 5, 1 (1983) 133-61. H. Goldstein, "Skizze einer biblischen Begründung der Theologie der Befreiung: Zur spezifisch lateinamerikanischen Hermeneutik," Befreiende Theologie: Der Beitrag Lateinamerkas zur Theologie der Gegenwart (ed. K. Rahner a.o., 1977) 62-76, 161-63; 'Selig ihr Armen': Theologie der Befreiung in Lateinamerika . . . un in Europa? (1989). J. I. Gonzáles Faus, Jesús y los ricos de su tiempo (Série teología actual 2, 1987). G. S. Gorgulho, "Leitura da Bíblia e compromisso com a justiça," REB 38 (1978) 291-99; "Apostolado Bíblico no Brasil," RCB 31 (1988) 113-25; "Hermenéutica bíblica," Mysterium liberationis: Conceptos fundamentales de la teologia de la liberación (ed. I. Ellacuría and J. Sobrino, 1990) 169-200. G. S. Gorgulho and A. F. Anderson, No tengáis miedo: Actualidad del Apocalipsis (1981). N. K. Gottwald (ed.), The Bible and Liberation: Political and Social Hermeneutics (1983). C. E. Gudorf, "Liberation Theology's Use of Scripture: A Response to First World Critics," Int 41 (1987) 5-18. G. Gutiérrez, "A busca dos pobres de Jesus Christo," História da teologia na América Latina (ed. Faculdade de teologia N. Senhora da Assunção, 1985[2]) 45-61; Theologie der Befreiung (Systematische Beiträge 11, 1992[10]). T. D. Hanks, God So Loved the Third World: The Biblical Vocabulary of Oppression (1983). E. Hoornaert, Kirchengeschichte Brasiliens aus der Sicht der Unterdrückten: 1550–1800 (1982). D. Irrarazaval, "Le Christ souffrant, seigneur des maltraités," Jésus et la libération en Amérique Latine (ed. J. van Nieuwenhove, 1986) 125-48. J. A. Kirk, Liberation Theology: An Evangelical View from the Third World (New Foundation Theological Library, 1979). J. Konings, "A revelação Bíblica em face das rupturas sociais," PerTeol 7 (1975) 189-206; "Hermenêutica Bíblica e Teologia da libertação: Uma contribuição para discussão," REB 40 (1980) 5-10; "A leitura da Bíblia na perspectiva da libertação," PerTeol 15 (1983) 261-70; "Umgang mit der Bibel und Polarisierung in der brasilianischen Gesellschaft und Kirche," NZM 40 (1984) 81-91. B. de Las Casas, Obras escogidas (5 vols., Biblioteca de Autores Españoles 95.96.105.106.110, 1957/58). J. Y. Lee, "Minjung Theology: A Critical Introduction," An Emerging Theology in World Perspective: Commentary on Korean Minjung Theology (ed. J. Y. Lee, 1988) 3-29. N. Lohfink, Options for the Poor: The Basic Principle of Liberation Theology in the Light of the Bible (1987). E. Lohse, "Das Evangelium für die Armen," ZNW 72 (1981) 51-64. R. McAfee Brown, Die Bibel neu gelesen: Anstösse aus der Dritten Welt (1988); (ed.), "Kairos Central America: A Challenge to the Churches of the World," Kairos: Three Prophetic Challenges to the Church (1990) 71-107. A. F. McGovern, "The Bible in Latin American Liberation Theology," The Bible and Liberation: Political and Social Hermeneutics (ed. N. K. Gottwald, 1983[2]) 461-72. C. Mesters, A prática libertadora de Jesus (Suplemento do boletim "por trás da Palavra," n.d.); "Das Verständnis der Schrift in einigen brasilianischen Basisgemeinden," Conc(D) 16 (1980) 561-66; "The Use of the Bible in Christian Communities of the Common People," The Challenge of Basic Christian Communities: Papers from the International Ecumenical Congress of Theology, Feb. 20–Mar. 2, 1980 (ed. S. Torres and J. Eagleson, 1981[2]) 197-210; Carta aos Romanos (1983); Vom Leben zur Bibel—von der Bibel zum Leben: Ein Bibelkurs aus Brasilien für uns (2 vols., 1983); Flor sem defesa: Uma explicação da Bíblia a partir do povo (1984[2]); Um Projeto de Deus: A presença de Deus no meio do povo oprimido (1984[5]); "Como se faz teologia Bíblica hoje no Brasil," Estudos Bíblicos 1 (1987[4]) 7-19; Balanço de 20 anos: A Bíblia lido pelo povo na atual renovação da igreja católica no Brasil, 1964–1984 (A Palavra na vida 7), 1988. J. Míguez Bonino, Revolutionary Theology Comes of Age (1975); (ed.) Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (1984); "A Latin American Looks at Minjung Theology," An Emerging Theology in World Perspective: Commentary on Korean Minjung Theology (ed. J. Y. Lee, 1988) 157-68. J. P. Miranda, Marx and the Bible: A Critique of the Philosophy of Oppression (1974); Being and the Messiah: The Message of St. John (1977); Communism in the Bible (1982). J. A. G. Moreira, "El pensamiento teológico de D. Vasco de Quiroga," Raíces de la teología latinoamericana: Nuevos materiales para la historia de la teología (ed. P. Richard, 1985) 37-47. I. J. Mosala, "The Use of the Bible in Black Theology," The Unquestionable Right to Be Free: Black Theology from South Africa (ed. I. J. Mosala, 1986) 175-99. A. B. Mu, "Jesus and the Minjung in the Gospel of Mark," Minjung Theology: People as the Subjects of History (ed. K. Y. Bock, 1981) 136-51. A. Müller and B. Kern, "Die Armen entdecken die Bibel: Grundzüge der Bibellektüre in den lateinamerikanischen Basisgemeinden," Wort und Leben: 500 Jahre Evangelisierung Lateinamerikas: Umkehr und Neubesinnung (Berichte-Dokumente-Kommentare 37, 1988) 43-52. R. Ortega, Liberando la Teología de la Liberación: Aporte Bíblico a la Teología de la Liberacíon (CTP 3, 1978). J. R. J. Pagalday, " Bartolomeu des las Casas e o seu conceito de Evangelização," História da evangelização na América Latina (ed. Faculdade de teologia N. Senhora da Assunção, 1988) 42-54. S. Phillips, "The Use of Scripture in Liberation Theologies: An Examination of Juan Luis Segundo, James H. Cone, and Jurgen Moltmann" (diss., Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, 1978). C. A. Pinto da Silva, "Bíblia: A leitura que o povo faz," RCB 31 (1988) 135-50. G. V. Pixley, "Biblical Embodiments of God's Kingdom: A Study Guide for the Rebel Church," and "God's Kingdom in First-century Palestine: The Strategy of Jesus," The Bible and Liberation: Political and Social Hermeneutics (ed. N. K. Gottwald, 1983[2]) 108-18, 378-93; "The Poor Evangelize Biblical Scholarship," ABQ 2 (1983) 157-67. R. Poblette, "From Medellín to Puebla," Churches and Politics in Latin America (ed. D. H. Levine, 1979) 41-54. K. Raiser, "A New Reading of the Bible? Ecumenical Perspectives from Latin America and Asia," Creative Biblical Exegesis: Christian and Jewish Hermeneutics Through the Centuries (JSOTSup 59, ed. B. Uffenheimer and H. G. Reventlow, 1988) 103-13. A. Reiser and P. G. Schoenborn (eds.), Basisgemeinden und Befreiung: Lesebuch zur Theologie und christlichen Praxis in Lateinamerika (1981). P. Richard (ed.), Raíces de la teología latinoamericana: Nuevos materiales para la historia de la teología (1985); "Bíblia: Memoria Historica dos Pobres," EstBib 1 (1987[4]) 20-30. F. C. Rolim, "A Bíblia nas comunidades ecclesiais de base," RCB 31 (1988) 165-79. C. G. Romero, "A Hermeneutic of Appropriation: A Case Study of Method in the Prophet Jeremiah and Latin American Liberation Theology" (diss., Princeton Theological Seminary, 1982; microfilm 1986). C. Rowland, "Theology of Liberation and Its Gift to Exegesis," NBl 66, 778 (1985) 157-72. C. Rowland and M. Corner, Liberating Exegesis: The Challenge of Liberation Theology to Biblical Studies (1989). J. Saravia, "A palavra de Deus no coração dos pobres," El pueblo hace camino 1, 2 (1988) 15-19; El camino de las parábolas (La buena noticia a los pobres, 1990). T. Schmeller, "Zugänge zum Neuen Testament in lateinamerikanischen Basisgemeinden," MThZ 38 (1987) 153-75; "Gottesreich und Menschenwerk: Ein Blick in Gleichnisse Jesu," WiWei 54 (1992) 81-95; Das Recht der Anderen: Befreiungstheologische Lektüre des Neuen Testaments in Lateinamerika (NTA NF 27, 1994). W. Schürger, Theologie auf dem Weg der Befreiung-Geschichte und Methode des Zentrums für Bibelstudien in Brasilien (EMMÖ 24, 1995). M. Schwantes, "Die Bibel als Buch der Befreiung," EvK 19 (1986) 383-87. J. L. Segundo, Liberation of Theology (1976); The Historical Jesus of the Synoptics (Jesus of Nazareth Yesterday and Today 2, 1985). S. Silva Gotay, "Origem e desenvolvimento do pensamento cristão revolucionário a partir da radicalização da doutrina social cristã nas décadas de 1960 e 1970," História da teologia na América Latina (ed. Faculdade de teologia N. Senhora da Assunção, 1985²) 139-64. J. Sobrino, Christology at the Crossroads: A Latin American Approach (1978²); "Das Verhältnis Jesu zu den Armen und Deklassierten: Bedeutung für die Fundamentalmoral," Conc(D) 15 (1979) 629-34; "Le ressuscité est le crucifié: Lecture de la résurrection de Jésus à partir des crucifiés du monde," Jésus et la libération en Amérique Latine (Jésus et Jésus-Christ 26, ed. J. van Nieuwenhove, 1986) 291-307; "Centralidad del Reino de Dios en la teología de la liberación," Mysterium liberationis: Conceptos fundamentales de la teologia de la liberación I (ed. I. Ellacuría and J. Sobrino, 1990) 467-510. A. Steiner, "Zusammen mit dem Volk die Bibel lesen: Volksnahe Literatur zur Bibel in Brasilien," BK 40 (1985) 26-29. R. S. Sugirtharajah (ed.), Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World (1991). J. Swetnam, "Brazilian Catholics and the Bible," Bible Today 22 (1984) 376-80. E. Tamez, Bible of the Oppressed (1982). S. Trinidad, "Christology, Conquista, Colonization," Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies (ed. J. Míguez Bonino, 1984) 49-65. N. Vélez, "A leitura Bíblica nas Comunidades Ecclesiais da Base," Revista de Interpretação Bíblica Latino-Americana 1 (1988) 26-43. P. G. R. de Villiers (ed.) Liberation Theology and the Bible (1987). W. Vogels, "Biblical Theology for the 'Haves' and the 'Have-Nots,' " ScEs 39 (1987) 193-210. W. S. Vorster, "Apartheid und das Lesen der Bibel," Wenn wir wie Brüder beieinander wohnten. . . . (ed. J. W. DeGruchy and C. Villa-Vicenio, 1984) 117-36. J. E. Weir, "The Bible and Marx: A Discussion of the Hermeneutics of Liberation Theology," SJT 35 (1982) 337-50. V. L. Wimbush, "Historical/Cultural Criticism as Liberation: A Proposal for an African American Biblical Hermeneutic," Semeia 47 (1989) 43-55.

T. SCHMELLER

LIDDELL, HENRY GEORGE (1811–98)

Student (1830), tutor (1836), professor of moral philosophy (1845), censor (1846), and reforming dean (1855–91) of Christ Church, Oxford, L. was also the father of Alice, for whom C. Dodgson (Lewis Carroll [1832–98]) wrote Alice in Wonderland. From about 1834 much of his scholarly life was spent working with R. Scott of Balliol (d. 1873) on the still standard (in the revisions of H. Jones and R. McKenzie) Greek-English Lexicon. The first edition (1843) was largely an English translation of F. Passow's (1786–1833) Greek-German LEXICON, which was itself based on the work of J. G. Schneider (1750–1822), and Passow's name appeared on the title page of the second (1845) and third (1849) editions as well. L.'s improvements and additions climaxed in the major revision of 1883 (7th ed.).

Although he never visited Rome, his History of Ancient Rome (2 vols., 1855) was widely used and was abridged for schools. While headmaster of Westminster School (1846–55), L. served with his friend A. STANLEY on the University Commission (1850) to modernize Oxford, and as T. Gaisford's (1779–1855) successor as dean he personally carried through the transformation of Christ Church (1858), where his statue occupies a prominent position at the northeast entrance to Tom Quad. An isolated liberal, he eschewed with Olympian detachment the ecclesiastical controversies of his day in favor of a deep interest in drains, rowing, the university press, and non-collegiate students.

Works: A Greek-English Lexicon (1843, 1845², 1849³, 1883⁷; new ed. rev. and aug. H. S. Jones and R. McKenzie, 1940, 1996); History of Ancient Rome (2 vols., 1855)

Bibliography: H. L. Thompson, H. G. L.: A Memoir (1899).

R. MORGAN

LIDZBARSKI, MARK (ABRAHAM MORDECAI) (1868–1928)

Having received a strict Orthodox education, at the age of fourteen L. fled Russian Poland for Prussian Poland. At the University of Berlin, he converted to Protestantism. His career as lecturer in oriental languages included the universities of Kiel, Greifswald, and Göttingen (where in 1918 he became a member of the Göttingen Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften).

A proficient scholar in several areas of Semitic studies, L. is regarded as the founder of Semitic epigraphy, with several foundational works. He contributed significantly to the twenty-ninth edition of H. GESENIUS's Hebrew grammar. Although his edition of Mandean texts made them accessible to scholars, his theory of a Palestinian origin of GNOSTIC Mandeans in pre-Christian times has been largely rejected. However, his publication of significant Semitic texts has been of immeasurable importance.

Works: Geschichten und Lieder aus den neuaramaischen Handschriften der königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin (1896); Die neuaramaischen Handschriften der königlichen Bibliothek zu Berlin (1896); Handbuch der nordsemitischen Epigraphik (1898, repr. 1962); Ephemeris für semitische Epigraphik, nebst ausgewählten Inschriften (1900–15); Paradigmen und Register zu Gesenius' Kautzsch hebraischer Grammatik (29th ed., 1902) 518-91; Drasia o Iahia: Das Johannesbuch der Mandaer (1905–15, repr. 1966); Die Namen der Alphabetbuchstaben (1906); Kanaanaische Inschriften (Moabitisch, Althebraisch, Phonizisch, Punisch) (Altsemitische Texte, 1907); Phonizische und aramaische Krugaufschriften aus Elephantine (1912); Mandaische Liturgien (AGWG, 1920, repr. 1962); Altaramaische Urkunden aus Assur (WVDOG, 1921); Ginza, der Schatz, oder das grosse Buch der Mandaer übersetzt und erklärt (1925); Auf rauhem Wege: Jugend Erinnerungen eines deutschen Professers (1927), autobiography.

Bibliography: W. Baumgartner, Neue Zürcher Zeitung (July 14, 1968) 51. D. Diringir, EncJud 11 (1971) 214. A. Spitaler, LTK 6 (1961) 1031.

R. R. MARRS

LIETZMANN, HANS (1875–1942)

Born in Düsseldorf, Germany, Mar. 2, 1875, L. studied Protestant theology and classical philology in Jena and Bonn under the influence of the NT scholar E. Grafe (1855–1922) and the philologists F. Bücheler (1837–1908) and H. Usener (1834–1905). The latter also introduced him to historical-critical methodology. Joining the faculty in Jena in 1905 as a church historian, he became a full professor in 1908 and succeeded A. von HARNACK in Berlin in 1924 in church history, NT, and Christian ARCHAEOLOGY.

L.'s profile as an NT scholar was predicated on the close connection between church history and scholarly biblical work, wherein research in the history of liturgy and archaeology plays a special role. He considered the basis of all textual exegesis to be solid philological and history-of-religions interpretation, although one cannot consider him a member of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE. He created the series Kleine Texte für Vorlesungen und Übungen (KlT, beginning 1902) to serve as a basis for training of students using original source texts. The Handbuch zum Neuen Testament (HNT), which he began and which contains his opening commentaries on Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Galatians (1906–10) offers material for an exegesis striving for a philologically precise, historically vivid explanation of texts without claiming to offer "universal, timeless" or "currently relevant" interpretations. L. by no means denied the validity of such a theological task; he simply wanted the HNT restricted to explanations given in the lecture hall and in actual ecclesiastical/theological practice (which provoked controversy with K. Barth!). Hence he later added an exegetically based interpretation of church pericopes aimed at the sermon (authored by L. Fendt [1931–41] 22-23).

L.'s mastery of vivid historical portrayal manifests itself in the Geschichte der Alten Kirche (4 vols., 1932–44; ET 1937–51), the first volume of which portrays primitive Christianity in its historical setting. Archaeology and the history of liturgy contribute to Petrus und Paulus in Rom (1915, 1927^2). In Messe und Herrenmahl (1926; ET 1953–79) the controversial thesis of the double origin of the Eucharist—significant for the beginnings of primitive Christianity—emerges from a methodology beginning with the history of liturgy and proceeding backward. His Kleine Schriften (3 vols., 1958–62) contains studies on whether Mandean texts can be used in explaining the Gospel of John (1930), on legal aspects of the trial of Jesus (1931), and on the history of the CANON and TEXUTAL CRITICISM. Beginning in 1921 L. edited the ZNW and from 1923 on the BZNW. From 1926 on he helped to edit the TLZ.

Works: Der Menschensohn: Ein Beitrag zur neutestamentlichen Theologie (1896); (ed.), Das muratorische Fragment und die monarchianischen Prologe zu den Evangelien (KlT 1, 1902); (ed.), Die Didache (KlT 6, 1903); An die Römer (HNT 3, 1, 1906; HNT 8, 1928^3; 1933^4; 1971^5); An die Korinther I. II (HNT 3, 2-3, 1907, 1909; HNT 9, 1923^2; 1931^3; 1949^4 [supplemented by W. G. Kümmel]; 1969^5); An die Galater (HNT 3, 4, 1910; HNT 10, 1923^2; 1932^3; 1971^4); Petrus und Paulus in Rom: Liturgische und archäologische Studien (1915, rev. 1927^2); Messe und Herrenmahl: Eine Studie zur Geschichte der Liturgie (AKG 8, 1926; 1967^4; ET, Mass and the Lord's Supper [tr. with appendixes by D. H. G. Reeve; intro. and "Further Inquiry" by R. D. Richardson, 1953–79]); "Autobiographie" (1926) = KS 3 (1962) 331-68; (with R. Knopf and H. Weinel), Einführung in das Neue Testament: Bibelkunde des Neuen Testaments, Geschichte und Religion des Urchristentums (1923^2; 1930^3; 1949^4); (with H. W. Beyer), Die jüdische Katakombe der Villa Torlonia in Rom (Jüdische Denkmäler 1, 1930); Geschichte der Alten Kirche (4 vols., 1932–44; 1975$^{4/5}$; ET 1937–51); Kleine Schriften (3 vols., ed. K. Aland and Kommission für spätantike Religionsgeschichte, TU 67, 68, 74, 1958–62); Glanz und Niedergang der deutschen Universität: 50 Jahre deutscher Wissenschaftsgeschichte in Briefen von and an H. L. (1892–1942) (ed. K. Aland, 1979). For full bibliography, see K. Aland, ZNW 41 (1942) 12-33; repr. in KS 3 (1962) 377-405; rev. in Glanz und Niedergang, 1194-222.

Bibliography: K. Aland, Glanz und Niedergang der deutschen Universität (ed. K. Aland, 1979) 1-155. C. Andresen, NDB 14 (1985) 544-46. H. Bornkamm, ZNW 41 (1942) 1-12. W. Eltester, TLZ 68 (1943) 1-10; RGG^{3} 4 (1960) 375-76. L. Fendt, TLZ 67 (1942) 193-200. W. G. Kümmel, NTHIP, 358-59, 367, 371, 468. G. Kunze, MPT 38 (1949) 56-59. W. Schneemelcher, TRE 21 (1991) 191-196. D. Wyrwa, "H. L. theologisches Verständnis der Kirchengeschichte," 450 Jahre Evangelische Theologie in Berlin (ed. G. Besier and C. Gestrich, 1989) 387-418.

N. WALTER

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN (1602–75)

Born at Stoke-on-Trent, England, Mar. 29, 1602, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, L. became chaplain to R. Cotton, who knew Hebrew and encouraged him to pursue rabbinic studies. He was appointed rector of Much-Munden, Hertfordshire, in 1643, a position he held jointly with the mastership of Catharine Hall, Cambridge, to which he was appointed in 1650. In addition to assisting Walton in the preparation of the POLYGLOT Bible, especially the Samaritan Pentateuch, L. advised E. CASTELL in the compilation of his Heptaglot LEXICON and was consulted by M. POOLE in the preparation of the Synopsis Criticorum. He died at Ely, Dec. 6, 1675.

L.'s most important works were his Horae Hebraicae at Talmudicae (Hebrew and Talmudical Exercitations), in which he commented on Matthew (1658), Mark (1663), 1 Corinthians (1664), John (1671), Luke (1674), and parts of Acts and Romans (date unknown) in the light of the TALMUD and other Jewish writings. He showed great facility in using rabbinic literature to elucidate the Scriptures. His other works include histories of biblical times and accounts of Jewish worship and the geography of Israel. Although he was severely critical of Judaism, he laid great emphasis on the importance of rabbinic writings for NT studies. "The Doctrine of the Gospel hath no more bitter enemies than they, and yet the Text of the Gospel hath no more plain Interpreters" (Works [1684] 2:92). L.'s Horae were pioneer works in a discipline developed further by C. Schoettgen, Franz DELITZSCH, H. Strack, and P. BILLERBECK, all of whom recognized his contribution, and remained a standard resource for many years.

In his A Chronicle of the Times, and the Order of the Texts of the OT (1647) and The Harmony, Chronicle, and Order of the NT (1655) L. placed not only the books but also individual chapters and psalms in what he believed to be their chronological order (see CHRONOLOGY) and related them to the history of their times. He recognized that biblical writings need to be interpreted against the historical background out of which they came and that to do such work the canonical form of the Bible (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) must be superseded. In an annotated edition of the AV (OT, 1821; NT, 1825) G. Townsend arranged most of the OT and some of the NT according to L.'s ordering of the material.

Works: Works (2 vols., 1684); Opera Omnia (2 vols., 1686); The Whole Works (13 vols., ed. J. R. Pitman, 1822–25).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 2931-36. G. Bright, "Life," Works (J. Lightfoot, 1684) 1:i-xxxvii. S. C. Eliezer, "Christian Hebraism in Seventeenth-century England as Reflected in the Works of J. L." (diss., New York University, 1977). T. Hamilton, DNB 33 (1893) 229-31. MSHH 6 (1728) 307. R. A. Muller, HHMBI, 208-12. J. R. Pitman, preface to The Whole Works (J. Lightfoot, 1822–25) 1:v-cvi. J. Strype, "Appendix to Life," Works (J. Lightfoot, 1684) 1:i-xxxvii. D. M. Welton, J. L., the English Hebraist (1878).

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

LIGHTFOOT, JOSEPH BARBER (1828–89)

L. graduated in classics and mathematics in 1851 at Trinity College, Cambridge, receiving the DD in 1864. After being fellow and tutor of his college, he became successively Hulsean (1861) and Lady Margaret's professor (1875) at Cambridge and then bishop of Durham from 1879 until his death in 1889. He was involved in the production of the English RV of the Bible from 1870 to 1880 and wrote a series of commentaries on some of the epistles of PAUL, which included important dissertations on the development of Christianity in the first century and its relation to both Judaism and Hellenism. In these works he broke new ground both linguistically and historically and, with regard to the question of the relation between Acts and Paul's letters, effectively demolished the views of F. C. BAUR and the Tübingen school.

L.'s most significant contribution was his work on the apostolic fathers. Following T. ZAHN, L. firmly established the authenticity and early second-century date of the seven letters of IGNATIUS according to the Vossian text as well as the authenticity of 1 Clement and the letter of Polycarp. Together with his work on John's Gospel, this made possible the dating of most NT books within the first century. L.'s dating of these, except perhaps for the PASTORAL LETTERS, is still largely followed.

L. acknowledged both the human and divine elements of Scripture, recognizing, for example, the redactional work of the author of Acts without implying any falsification of the material. L. also recognized the independent Palestinian tradition along with the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel, dating it at the end of the first century. Although he traced the development of Gnosticism from Jewish roots, evident in Colossians, up to 1 John, he also recognized its essentially anti-Jewish nature, anticipating many results of later discoveries. His "North Galatian" hypothesis is still largely followed today.

L.'s other contributions include his use of archaeological finds, his recognition of the nature of NT Greek in the first century and of the use by Paul of Greco-Roman rhetorical techniques, his work on EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA and on the Egyptian and Coptic versions. But his earlier dating than Baur of the NT books thrust back into the first century the problems and conflicts Baur found in the literature and led to many of the issues of twentieth-century NT interpretation that are still matters of debate.

Works: The Epistles of St. Paul to the Galatians (1865); St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (1868); The Apostolic Fathers, pt. 1, Clement of Rome: The Two Epistles to the Corinthians (2 vols., 1869); pt. 2, St Ignatius and St. Polycarp (3 vols., 1885); On a Fresh Revision of the English NT (1871); St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians and Philemon (1875); "Eusebius of Caesarea," DCB 2 (1880) 308-48; Essays on the Work Entitled Supernatural Religion (1889); Dissertations on the Apostolic Age (1892); Biblical Essays (1893); Notes on the Epistles of Paul (1895); The Christian Ministry (1901).

Bibliography: C. K. Barrett, DUJ 64 (1972) 193-204; "Quomodo historia conscribenda sit," NTS 28 (1982) 303-20.

J. D. G. Dunn (ed.), The Lightfoot Centenary Lectures (DUJ special number, 1992); HHMBI, 336-40. G. R. Eden and F. C. MacDonald, L. of Durham (1932), with appendix C: H. E. Savage, "Dr. L.'s Literary Publications," 174-83. M. E. Glasswell, TRE 21 (1991) 196-98. C. R. Gregory, RE^{3} 11 (1902) 487-89. F. J. A. Hort, DNB 33 (1893) 232-40. B. N. Kaye, "L. and Baur on Early Christianity," NovT 26 (1984) 193-224. S. R. Pointer, "J. B. L. as a Christian Historian of Early Christian Literature," Christian Scholar's Review 23 (1994) 426-44. J. A. T. Robinson, The Roots of a Radical (1980) 155-61; "J. B. Lightfoot" (Durham Cathedral Lecture, 1981).

M. E. GLASSWELL

LIGHTFOOT, ROBERT HENRY (1883–1953)

An Anglican priest and Oxford don, L. was a proponent of FORM CRITICISM of the Gospels and a forerunner in their redaction-critical interpretation. He was born Sept. 30, 1883, at Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, and graduated from Eton and Worcester College, Oxford, where he received early encouragement in the study of theology from the OT scholar C. BURNEY. L. served in various capacities at Wells Theological College (1912–17; 1919) and in numerous chaplaincies, fellowships, and administrative positions at Oxford's Lincoln College (1919–21) and New College (1921–50), climaxed by his election as Dean Ireland's Professor of the Exegesis of Holy Scripture (1934–49).

At the suggestion of C. H. DODD, L. visited Germany in 1931, and after working with R. BULTMANN, M. DIBELIUS, and E. LOHMEYER, returned to England dedicated to the propagation of form-critical insights. In turn, he significantly influenced a group of younger Oxford scholars, including C. EVANS, A. FARRER, and D. Nineham. In his later years L. chaired the International Greek NT Project and the Committee of Direction for the Oxford Lexicon of Patristic Greek as well as editing the Journal of Theological Studies from 1941 until his death, Nov. 24, 1953.

In his Bampton lectures (1934), published in 1935, L. defended the form critic's perception of a pervasive theological purpose in Mark's Gospel, which had been regarded as almost exclusively historical and biographical. L. argued that Mark, no less than the other evangelists, was an author of individual genius and insight whose narrative offered an interpretation of the significance of JESUS under sanction and on behalf of the early church. Although he reckoned its historical value to be considerable, he emphasized that Mark and the other Gospels were fundamentally constructions for religious edification, not plain records of historical fact.

L. explored some implications of this perspective in a second book (1938), in which he suggested that topographical details were not recorded by the evangelists for their own sake. Rather, the different venues of Jesus' ministry and resurrection appearances signify the divergent theological, and especially christological, conceptions of the Gospels' authors. For Mark and Matthew Galilee represents the sphere of salvation and of Jesus' manifestation as Son of man, while Judea and Jerusalem represent the scene of the judgment and the rejection of Jesus. For Luke, Jesus' revelation as Christ progresses from Galilee through Samaria, culminating at Jerusalem. John's complete reinterpretation of Jesus displays doctrinal affinities with Matthew and Mark. Although these deductions issued from independent research, L. acknowledged indebtedness to Lohmeyer's similar, earlier study.

L.'s penultimate book (1950) consisted of occasional papers, the first four of which examined aspects of Mark's Gospel. Also included were studies of the cleansing of the Temple in Mark and John (the former based on an article by Lohmeyer), a painstaking defense for the conclusion of Mark at 16:8, and a crisp apology for form criticism of the Gospels. In general the conclusions drawn in this composite volume are strikingly consistent with L.'s findings during the 1930s: among others, the Gospels' use of historical material for religious, not biographical, purposes; the necessity of discerning and distinguishing their authors' theological conceptions; the artistry with which primitive evangelical traditions, inherited as discrete units, have been interwoven by the evangelists.

Edited by C. Evans, L.'s posthumous commentary on the Fourth Gospel revealed his conservative tendencies: sympathy for John's traditional ascription to the son of Zebedee; dissatisfaction with theories concerning the Gospel's supposed textual dislocations; support for the position that John knew and sought to interpret the SYNOPTIC Gospels. L. evinced minimal interest in the milieu of the Fourth Gospel, the social context of Johannine Christianity or its location within the history of religions. Instead, his emphasis was "always to try to explain St. John by St. John" (1956, vi). Accordingly, his exegesis is distinguished by its minute examination of each part of the Fourth Gospel, viewed within the literary and theological context of the whole.

At its publication, L.'s commentary on John was more warmly received than his earlier works, which for several reasons were either overlooked or dismissed. First, WWII initially prevented his earlier books from becoming widely known in Europe and the United States. Second, many British theologians and clergy were inhospitable to L.'s reserve in regarding the Gospels as sources for knowledge of the historical Jesus. Moreover, unlike Bultmann, L. tended toward reticence in developing the implications of form criticism for the benefit of modern religious faith. He was not oblivious to such concerns (1950, 98-105), however; and while less conservative than those of older contemporaries like F. BURKITT, L.'s views on the historical, even apostolic traditions underlying the Gospels were less skeptical than those of Bultmann. Finally, L.'s earliest works were judged by some reviewers as derivative popularizations of German scholarship. It is now clear, however, that L. anticipated the conceptualization and practice of REDACTION CRITICISM, thus pioneering the mode of Gospel study that would prevail in the second half of the twentieth century.

Works: History and Interpretation in the Gospels (1935); Locality and Doctrine in the Gospels (1938); The Gospel Message of St. Mark (1950); St. John's Gospel: A Commentary (ed. C. F. Evans, 1956).

Bibliography: R. L. P. Milburn, PBA 40 (1954) 253-61. D. E. Nineham, "R. H. L. and the Significance of Biblical Criticism," Theology 88 (1985) 97-105; Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. L. (ed. D. E. Nineham, 1955) vi-xvi. B. G. Powley, "The Place of R. H. L. in British NT Scholarship," ExpTim 93 (1981–82) 72-75.

C. C. BLACK

LINDBLOM, CHRISTIAN JOHANNES

(1882–1974)

L. matriculated at the university of Uppsala in 1900, took an arts degree, which included Greek and Semitic languages, and then studied theology, taking his licentiate degree in 1908. The following year he earned appointment as Docent in exegesis. He worked on a new Swedish translation of the Bible (published in 1917) and was responsible for a large part of the Apocrypha (1921). In 1924 he accepted the chair of exegesis (both OT and NT) in the newly established theology faculty at Åbo Academy (Turku), Finland, the Swedish-language university of Finland. He served as chair of OT exegesis at the university of Lund from 1930 until his retirement in 1947. L. retained a full capacity for work until his death at age ninety-two, only three years earlier publishing a spirited and vigorous monograph on the origin of the Temple document of Josiah.

L.'s early studies almost exclusively concerned the NT and its religious environment, but increasingly he devoted himself to OT problems. He was influenced by the moderate Wellhausenianism (see WELLHAUSEN) of E. Stave, his OT teacher, but also applied the insights of H. GUNKEL and his followers. Wisely eclectic, L. typically did not restrict himself to a single method but used a variety of approaches.

In 1924 L. published a study of the literary genre of OT prophetic literature in which he compared the prophetic books with the apocalyptic literature of medieval mysticism, particularly the revelations of St. Birgitta. Against this background he saw revelation as the basic form of prophetic preaching. In an important excursus he discussed the expression "Thus says Yahweh" simultaneously with Köhler, but independently of him he analyzed the so-called messenger formula, its origin and function. He pursued the line of research begun in this study in two monographs, one on Hosea and one on Micah. L. continued to publish monographs on prophetic texts: an analysis of the Isaiah apocalypse (1938) labeled a "cantata"; a study of the Servant Songs in Deutero-Isaiah (1951), which he sensibly refused to isolate from their immediate context; and an investigation of the Immanuel section in Isaiah (1958). In 1934 he had published a long survey in Swedish, Profetismen i Israel, in which he summed up his own research in OT PROPHECY along with that of other scholars. The English version (1962) is in important respects a new work and became a standard textbook. In a late work on visions and revelations in early Christianity (1968), he followed his studies of OT prophecy into the NT and the early church, again focusing on psychological and LITERARY aspects.

In addition to his investigations of prophecy, L. wrote important works on the composition and interpretation of the book of Job, devoted several studies to the history of Swedish Bible translation, and also published translations of his own: Mark (1963) and Isaiah 1–39 (1965). His clarity and pedagogical skill made him a good popularizer, and he wrote first-rate textbooks in Swedish for schools and universities that are marked by a strictly historical view of the religions of the Bible. He was not one of those pioneers who break entirely new ground; but with his combination of breadth and rigor, of historical perspective and philological precision, of enthusiasm and objectivity he made an impressive contribution to biblical research.

Works: Senjudiskt fromhetslif enligt Salomos psaltare (1909); Om lifvets idé hos Paulus och Johannes samt i de s.k. Salomos oden (UUÅ 1910 Teologi 1, 1911); Das ewige Leben: Eine Studie über die Entstehung der religiösen Lebensidee im Neuen Testament (1914); Studier till en ny provöversättning av Syraks bok: Med särskild hänsyn till 1500-talets svenska bibelöversättningsarbete (1915); Jesu missions- och dopbefallning: Matt 28:18-20. Tillika en studie över det kristna dopets ursprung (1919); Kanon och apokryfer: Studier till den bibliska kanons historia (1920); Skandalon: Eine lexikalisch-exegetische Untersuchung (UUÅ 1921 Teologi 2, 1921); Die literarische Gattung der prophetischen Literatur: Eine literargeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Alten Testament (UUÅ 1924 Teologi 1, 1924); Hosea literarisch untersucht (AAAbo H 5:2, 1928); Micha literarisch untersucht (AAAbo H 6:2, 1929); Der sogennante Bauernkalender von Gezer (AAAbo H 7:5, 1931); Profetismen i Israel (1934); Israels religion i gammaltestamentlig tid (1936); Die Jesaja-Apokalypse: Jes 24–27 (LUÅ NF 1:34:3, 1938); Boken om Job och hans lidande (1940); La composition du livre de Job (HVLÅ 1944–45:1, 1945); The Servant Songs in Deutero-Isaiah: A New Attempt to Solve an Old Problem (LUÅ NF 1:45:5, 1951); A Study on the Immanuel

Section in Isaiah: Isa vii,1–ix,6 (SMHVL 1957–58:4, 1958); Prophecy in Ancient Israel (1962); Markusevangeliet: Ny översättning med anmärkningar (Skrifter utgivna av nämnden för svensk språkvård 27, 1963); Profeten Jesaja: Ny översättning med anmärkningar (Skrifter utgivna av nämnden för svensk språkvård 31, 1965); Gesichte und Offenbarungen: Vorstellungen von göttlichen Weisungen und übernatürlichen Erscheinungen im ältesten Christentum (SHVL 65, 1968); Erwägungen zur Herkunft der Josianischen Tempelurkunde (SMHVL 1970–71:3, 1971).

Bibliography: B. Albrektson, SvBL 23 (1982) 304-8. G. W. Anderson, "J. L.'s Contribution to Biblical Studies," ASTI 6 (1968) 4-19.

B. ALBREKTSON

LITERARY THEORY, LITERARY CRITICISM, AND THE BIBLE

1. Introduction. The state of relations between literary theory, literary criticism, and biblical studies toward the end of the twentieth century may be aptly characterized by a title word from one of J. Derrida's earliest essays: dissemination. That is, the various approaches and theoretical discourses of the present scene often spill over into each other, overlapping and diffusing, and frustrate any strictly genealogical tracing of movements. Indeed, the notion of large-scale movements of biblical studies (e.g., form criticism, the myth and ritual school, etc.) has in many ways been replaced by smaller-scale pockets of activity, no doubt reflecting the dissemination of academic biblical training itself beyond the confines of a few dominant divinity school-related institutions. What follows, therefore, is not a comprehensive glossary or exhaustive presentation of some unified "new literary criticism" of the Bible, which would be entirely fictional anyway, even if that presentation were narrowed to focus on any one particular "movement." Rather, the purpose is to open up, albeit only slightly, several key places, or topoi, of convergence in order to provide an overall sense of how literary theory and literary criticism have found their way into conversations with biblical studies (and sometimes vice-versa) and to encourage reflection on the immensity of challenges and possibilities introduced by these developments. (For a fuller engagement of issues concerning relations between recent literary theory and biblical criticism, see The Bible and Culture Collective [1995], which involves the work of both NT and HB critics, and S. Moore [1989, 1992, 1994] on NT criticism; for more traditional literary approaches, see R. Alter and F. Kermode [1987]; D. Gunn [1987]; Gunn and D. Fewell [1993]; W. Kort [1988]).

Although this essay focuses on literary theory and the Bible, beginning in the 1960s and moving through the last three decades of the twentieth century, it is important to note that the Bible has been read in various ways that can be broadly defined as "literary." Indeed, until very recently scholarship focused on source criticism, and text history (e.g., in the wake of J. Wellhausen's "documentary hypothesis") was commonly called biblical "literary criticism." Also notable, and moving in very different directions, has been the well-known "Bible as literature" movement, which has roots at least as far back as the eighteenth-century scholar R. LOWTH and which gained momentum during the first half of the twentieth century (see D. Norton [1993] and D. L. Jeffrey [1992]). Although these and other earlier approaches are based on literary theory, insofar as they begin with certain assumptions about textuality, writing, and interpretation, only recently has explicit theoretical discourse or self-critical awareness of these assumptions been "exposed" by their critics.

Although the line is permeable, it is important to maintain some distinction between theory and method (see T. Beal [1992] 27-39). Literary theory is not literary-critical method, and in many cases it cannot be easily translated into one. Methodology is inherently practical, aimed at developing a clear approach to and a way through a particular text or set of texts (Greek: meta + hodos = "with way" or "road"). Such aims are not always shared by literary-theoretical discourses, especially in critical theory, which is associated with a kind of intransigent negativity, a "thinking the limits" of any particular construal of reality, textuality, literary history, meaning, etc. This kind of theoretical discourse stands in contrast to more constructive theories, which aim to develop a system of representation for understanding relations between authors, texts, and readers, among other things, and which therefore often lead to the development of an appropriate methodology. In neither critical theory nor more constructive theory, however, is there any single self-evident method to which a particular theory must be attached. Not all literary theory is practical in a methodological sense, a fact that has often been overlooked by biblical scholars. As a result, some theoretical discourses, especially those falling under the name "post-structuralism," often have been either negatively evaluated as confusing and unhelpful or forced into a practical approach aimed at saving biblical studies from its own current (perpetual?) identity crisis and/or at answering every critical question about some text or texts once and for all. Although we will be discussing both literary-critical methods and literary theory as they have pertained to biblical study, we will mostly defer from asserting any particular understanding of the relationship between the two, especially with regard to how particular theoretical discourses should or should not translate into particular literary-critical methodologies. Bibliographical references along the way will offer examples of how relations have been negotiated by particular biblical scholars. (For a more direct introduction to these relations, see S. McKenzie and S. Haynes [1993, esp. pt. 3] and A. Adam [1995].)

2. J. Muilenburg's Rhetorical Criticism. While contemporary literary methodological approaches to the Bible did not originate with MUILENBURG, he offers a convenient starting point for a survey. Muilenburg was enormously influential as a writer and teacher, and his approach—which he called RHETORICAL CRITICISM—produces the type of reading most commonly associated with recent literary criticism. The approach is set out most clearly in his 1968 SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE presidential address, "Form Criticism and Beyond" (published in 1969), although one can see it in practice in his writings from the mid-1950s on. Muilenburg argued that, while FORM CRITICISM as a methodology is certainly crucial and must not be abandoned, there is a need for a focus on the rhetorical intentionality of biblical texts in their present literary form. Modeling the approach on poetic texts in the HB (see POETRY, HB), he suggested that the critic pay close attention to rhetorical markers (like shifts in speaker and the repetition of key words), which he believed give clues to the intentionality of the text itself.

Muilenburg's approach had clear affinities with formalism or, as it came to be known in the United States, "New Criticism" (see also the "rise of English" cultural movement in Great Britain during the first half of the 20th century, discussed in T. Eagleton [1983] 17-53). One of the basic theoretical points of New Criticism is that the meaning and intentionality of a text can be found through a close analysis of the text itself, without extensive research into questions of social, historical, and literary contexts. For example, one need not have knowledge of the psychological state or social circumstance of a poet —or knowledge of, say, cognate poetic texts from UGARIT—in order to understand a poem. The poem, as a self-contained object of study, is all that is needed. Such an approach has often found greater appeal in biblical studies than in English literature studies because research into contexts of influence (political, cultural, environmental, literary, etc.) for biblical literature has been based largely on conjectures and hypotheses built from very limited and ever-changing bodies of data. In this regard, rhetorical criticism and other literary approaches have served as escape routes for many scholars and students in biblical studies who have been frustrated with the historical-critical hegemony that has characterized the field until the end of the twentieth century.

Muilenburg's influence on biblical criticism extended beyond his publications. Among his students were W. Brueggemann, E. Good, P. Trible, and F. Buechner—each of whom has taken Muilenburg's rhetorical criticism in new directions and influenced a new generation of graduate students and biblical scholars.

3. Structuralism and Beyond. Even as Muilenburg gave his SBL address in 1968, there were other conversations in the academy pertaining to literary theory and the Bible. By this time, for example, structuralist readings of biblical texts had begun to be produced, although mostly from outside the field of biblical studies and mostly by those interested in structural anthropology rather than structural linguistics (e.g., studies on family and genealogy in Genesis; Russian formalism and folklore studies earlier this century were also important precursive movements). In other intellectual circles, especially in continental Europe, literary-theoretical discourse was on the verge of a massive revolution due to major developments in Marxism, FEMINIST theory, psychoanalysis (see PSYCHOANALYTIC INTERPRETATION), and linguistics. In 1967, for example, three major works appeared in French by the philosopher J. Derrida, the most well-known theorist of post-structuralism. Indeed, Derrida gave his first address in English at Johns Hopkins University in 1966, two years before Muilenburg's SBL address. Although these developments made no initial splash in biblical studies, the seismic reverberations from their entry into academic space has been felt among biblicists with greater intensity every year since. Some background in structural linguistics, which remains an important field in biblical studies, will provide a helpful entry into these other important literary-theoretical developments of the 1960s and 1970s.

STRUCTURALISM (both within and without biblical studies) constitutes a diverse body of scholarship. The accessibility of the literature is hindered by its often arcane, thickly coded language. What characterizes all structural readings, however, is their debt to F. de Saussure's programmatic treatment of the sign in his posthumously published Course in General Linguistics (1959). Writing just after the turn of the century, Saussure set the grammar for much of twentieth-century scholarship in a variety of fields, including linguistics, psychoanalysis, philosophy, anthropology, and literary theory.

Saussure's fundamental insight was that the relationship between the signifier and the signified is arbitrary. To put it more simply, any word can be chosen to stand for any thing or concept; e.g., a "signified" is the thing we call a "tree" and the "signifier" is the four letters t-r-e-e, there being no necessary relationship between the letters and the object. What is important, then, is not the actual sound of the words or the marks on a page when it is written but, rather, the network of interrelationships in the particular linguistic system of which the word is a part. Structuralist research (in whatever field) is concerned, not with why a particular signifier is connected with a particular signified, but with how that signifier functions within the structure of a given system. This type of research became known as synchronic (i.e., concern for the workings of a single system) as opposed to diachronic (i.e., concern for the significance of language elements before, after, and outside the system through the history of language change and through study of cognate languages). Thus structuralists search not so much for the meaning of a text as for the structures and patterns that make meaning possible—that is, they aim to identify the "deep structures" that function like grammars to govern and determine meaning on the surface of the text and that tend to take the form of codes based on binary oppositions like inside/outside, margin/center, male/female, positive/negative, immanent/transcendent, life/death, etc. (Many structuralists have gone so far as to argue that human thought itself, and perhaps the human unconscious, is ordered by such a binary oppositional code.) Structural critics often rely on charts and diagrams that attempt to delineate the way different pieces of the text fit with one another.

Structuralist biblical criticism seeks to identify organizing codes within the deep structure of the text. The particular "surface" content of a narrative or poem is less important than whatever irreducible codes or structures one can locate beneath it. For example, a structuralist reading of the creation story in Genesis 1 identifies a number of binary oppositions reflected in the concern for division—light/dark, water/land, the human/divine, etc.—culminating in the division between life and death. A similar analysis might then be made of Job's opening curse in Job 3, and thus one might begin to see deeper connections between the two texts. M. Douglas's (1966) analysis of the dietary laws in Leviticus is one of the best examples of structuralist biblical criticism at work. She shows how the internal structuring principle of boundary maintenance (i.e., realms of water, land, and air) might be understood to establish a code for determining whether a particular creature is clean or unclean: Unclean animals are those perceived as anomalous insofar as they possess characteristics that cross over (literally trans-gress) between two or more realms (e.g., a bird with wings that cannot fly, a sea creature with legs instead of fins, etc.). In NT studies one finds prime examples of detailed structuralist readings in the work of D. Patte (1976). Structuralist exegesis experienced a flourish of popularity in the late 1970s and early 1980s (see, e.g., several of the early issues of Semeia) but now has few practitioners who would see themselves, strictly speaking, as structuralists.

While appropriating much of structuralism's language and many of its basic insights, the movement now known as post-structuralism nevertheless challenged some of the presuppositions of structuralist criticism. For example, while accepting Saussure's notion of the arbitrary nature of the sign, post-structuralist thought extends this insight so that meaning is not just a product of the structural relationships between signifiers but is rather endlessly deferred in the chain of signification—that is, a signifier has meaning only in relation to another signifier, but this other signifier cannot serve as an anchor for meaning since it, too, is in relation to other signifiers. (To continue the example above, t-r-e-e refers to a plant with branches, leaves, and a trunk, but each of the words in the definition also refers to other words, ad infinitum.) Rather than a closed system of referral that one can master and work within, there is an open network of deferral over which mastery must remain elusive. Post-structuralism recognizes that structures of meaning are almost never complete and sufficient unto themselves. Instead, they tend to be incomplete and overlapping in nature, thus making their negotiation by the interpreter necessarily tentative.

Many scholars argue that structuralism anticipates its own beyond, its own "post-." Articulation of this point of view was perhaps best provided by Derrida but also by many others writing in the same intellectual circles and at roughly the same time, especially the so-called French feminists, the three most well-known of whom are J. Kristeva, L. Irigaray, and H. Cixous. None of these writers should be considered peripheral to the phenomenon of post-structuralism typically associated with Derrida. It is worth noting in this regard that INTERTEXTUALITY, which has emerged as key in post-structuralist discourse, was first developed by Kristeva (see Beal [1992]). In fact, structuralism's apprehension of its own post-, which is especially clear in its identification of binary codes involving sexual identity and sexual politics, is best exemplified in the writings of such scholars. As Kristeva (1993) suggests, structural (or semiotic) analysis is important for identifying the "systematic constraints" within a given piece of discourse, but one should not stop there; rather, one should then look for what "falls outside" the constraints of that system as well as for the system's rupture points (1986, 26-27). In this sense one might see S. de Beauvoir's classic analysis The Second Sex (1952), which was highly influential on Kristeva, Irigaray, Cixous, and others, as an early structural analysis of how, in politics as in literature, "woman" has been constructed as man's "other" within a system of binary oppositional codes for sexual identity, like self/not-self, subject/object, possession/lack (of a penis), transcendent/immanent, etc. This system, then, forms a Western patriarchal structure. The post-structuralist move made by Kristeva, Irigaray, Cixous, and others is to begin reading closely (even exegetically) for the problematic weak spots, slippages, and indeterminacies within this system that suggest its non-essential character (not biological, not ontological, etc.) and, therefore, its susceptibility to breakdown. The example is also important in showing that post-structuralism is by no means politically innocuous in relation to feminism, as many critics have falsely alleged.

Kristeva and Irigaray are informed by the linguistical approaches of Derrida and Saussure but are grounded in the psychoanalytical approach of J. Lacan, with his concept of language as the symbolic realm and as the realm of the Father (see J. Lacan [1977] and The Bible and Culture Collective [1995]). Kristeva and Irigaray's critique of psychoanalytic discourse, which focuses on the ways language and the symbolic realm are structured around male sexual identity (implied in much of Beauvoir's analysis as well), is likewise best understood as post-structuralist (see esp. the opening essay in Irigaray [1985]; in relation to biblical literature, see I. Rashkow [1993] and The Bible and Culture Collective [1995] 187–224). Although not explicitly engaged with recent literary theory, Trible's powerful and highly influential God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (1978) may be best understood as a brilliant convergence of Muilenburgian rhetorical-critical exegesis with a concern for details within biblical literature that fall outside (and even work to subvert) the literature's overall "patriarchal stamp." This in turn attests to the force and continued life of rhetorical criticism, which, primarily by its close attention to the details (including the cracks and rupture points) of texts, can often call into question conclusions reached by cursory readings across the broader contours of biblical writings.

The most widely recognized name in post-structuralism is Derrida, who was also the first to use the word "deconstruction," which, to his surprise, quickly gained a life and momentum of its own outside his writings. As noted above, three major publications of Derrida's came out in 1967 (ET Speech and Phenomena [1973], Of Grammatology [1977], and Writing and Difference [1978]). While Derrida was by no means solely responsible for the development of post-structuralist thought, much of its basic orientation can be found in these three books, which should perhaps be supplemented by Dissemination (1972; ET 1981). It is striking that these classic texts of Derrida are primarily exegetical—that is, they are close engagements with philosophical and/or literary texts—so close, in fact, that one begins to see how the dominant structuring principles of the texts begin to expose their own problematics and even backfire. It is through attention to details—and refusal to overlook the ambiguities, tensions, puns, afterthoughts, etc., therein—that one is able to challenge the structuralist assumptions about the synchronic unity of systemic wholes.

Post-structuralist engagements of biblical texts began to appear only late in the twentieth century. A particularly lucid account of Derrida's theoretical approach is combined with a creative reading of Leviticus 10 in E. Greenstein's "Deconstruction and Biblical Narrative" (1985; Beal and T. Linafelt [1996] revisit the same text in connection with Derrida's Cinders [1979; ET 1991]). Three issues of the journal Semeia have been devoted to Derrida and post-structuralism, edited by R. Detweiler (1982), G. Phillips (1990; see esp. Phillips's opening article), and D. Jobling and Moore (1992; see esp. Jobling's article, "Deconstruction and Political Analysis of Biblical Texts," 95-127). Very little book-length work by HB scholars has yet appeared. Especially noteworthy are those by M. Bal (1987, 1988a, 1988b), Jobling (1986), and Fewell and Gunn (1993). For interesting new theological directions in dialogue with post-structuralist theory, see also D. Blumenthal (1993), H. Eilberg-Schwartz (1994), and Linafelt (1996). Commentaries by P. Miscall (Isaiah [1993]) and Good (In Turns of Tempest: A Reading of Job, with a Translation [1990]) also make significant forays into post-structuralist writing. With respect to the NT, S. Moore has been most successful at putting post-structuralist writing into conversation with biblical criticism.

Especially with regard to HB studies, it is interesting to note the convergences between rabbinic traditions of MIDRASH and literary-theoretical discourse. S. Handelman (1982) makes a strong case that much of contemporary literary theory evidences an "emergence" of midrashic exegetical practices from the rabbinic period. In fact, many major figures in literary theory at the end of the twentieth century have Jewish backgrounds, and many of them have been explicitly concerned with questions of Jewish identity generally and biblical literature specifically (e.g., Derrida and Cixous). This connection is explored further in the collection of articles edited by G. Hartman and S. Budick (1986) and with a much tighter focus in D. Boyarin's (1990a) book on the relation between Midrash and post-structuralist theories of intertextuality.

4. Other Directions. E. AUERBACH contrasted the art of biblical literature with the art of Homer by the following list of characteristics: "certain parts brought into high relief, others left obscure, abruptness, suggestive influence of the unexpressed, 'background' quality, multiplicity of meanings and the need for interpretation, universal-historical claims, development of the concept of historically becoming, and preoccupation with the problematic" (1953, 23). One quickly recognizes that several characteristics—that which is left obscure, abruptness, influence of the unexpressed, background quality, multiplicity of meanings and the need for interpretation—would be shared by engagements of biblical literature broadly understood as "post-structuralist." The emphasis on "things brought into high relief" and the idea that biblical narrative makes "universal-historical claims," by which Auerbach referred to "its claim to absolute authority" as it seeks to "overcome our reality," have most often been shared by NARRATIVE CRITICISM. When these characteristics are emphasized, the interpretation of the others in Auerbach's list often takes on very different significances, turning the scholar's attention away from what falls outside the constraints, as Kristeva put it, and toward the way these details that seem (on the surface) to be points of indeterminacy, gaps, and so forth might actually be part of the narrative's strategy to "claim" its authority over the reader (i.e., to constrain the reader from reading it wrongly).

Although generally narrative criticism covers a wide variety of approaches (nearly anything focused on the literary qualities and peculiarities of biblical narrative), here we refer to that brand of criticism that often draws its influence from early mid-twentieth-century works by Auerbach and N. Frye (1957, 1971) and from later works by H. Frei (1974) and A. Wilder (1991). Adherents of this approach read biblical narrative as artfully constructed, realistic historical fiction. To a great extent, narrative criticism came to prominence because of growing uneasiness with a prevalent historicism that tended to dissect the text. In contrast, narrative criticism focuses synchronically on the text and understands the biblical narrative as a construction of a "narrative world" to which the reader is subjected. In HB studies one may point to the narrative poetics of M. Sternberg (1985) and Alter (1981) as examples. Gunn helped to pioneer narrative criticism in his analysis of the stories of David and Saul in the books of Samuel and Kings; but like many biblical scholars interested in relations between biblical literature and literary theory, he has since moved in directions more attuned to the questions and issues of post-structuralism. Fewell and Gunn (1991) offer a much-needed critique of Sternberg's approach (see Sternberg's counterattack [1992] and D. Boyarin's comparative analysis [1990]).

In NT studies this type of approach has proliferated, especially in readings of the Gospels and Acts. NT narrative critics have relied heavily on W. Booth's The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961) and S. Chatman's Story and Discourse (1978). Both authors investigate the way in which author and reader relate to each other, using the categories of real author/real reader, implied author/implied reader, and narrator/narratee. For instance, in The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn Mark Twain is the real author, Huck is the narrator, and a third person who does not consider Huck completely reliable is the implied author. A particular person is the real reader, someone who is with Huck is the narratee, and someone who takes Huck's words with a grain of salt is the implied reader. Booth's delineation of these categories with Chatman's subsequent refinement serves as the background for a vast amount of NT scholarship.

Not only does narrative criticism investigate how the text works by asking questions about these narrative levels but it also focuses on such traditional topics as character, plot, and setting. Narrative critics tend to read the Bible as literature and, unlike source or redactional critics, assume that the texts are unified rather than discontinuous. Historical questions, though not ignored, are secondary to questions about the flow and structure of the story. For a discussion of where narrative criticism has been and suggestions for how it might evolve, see Gunn's article in McKenzie and Haynes (1993).

Another important and highly productive interdisciplinary literary engagement has been between biblical studies and philosophical HERMENEUTICS. Although the term hermeneutics has come to connote interpretation in general, it specifically designates a philosophy of interpretation nurtured primarily in Germany during the nineteenth century that has gradually gained influence throughout Europe and the Americas during the latter half of the twentieth century. F. SCHLEIERMACHER is often considered the father of hermeneutics, and other major figures include W. DILTHEY, E. Husserl, M. Heidegger, H.-G. Gadamer, and P. RICOEUR. Each of these scholars explored the dynamics of the hermeneutical circle in which an interpreter with certain experiences and questions approaches a text. The text then addresses the reader and answers those questions, causing the reader to reformulate his or her way of framing those questions. Each time the reader reads the text, this interaction between reader and text occurs, creating a circular dynamism. This approach to and explanation of the mechanics of interpretation usually focuses on the overall meaning of texts rather than on specific details; hermeneuticians are interested in what the text means, not what it says. The most prominent NT scholar of the twentieth century, R. BULTMANN, provides one of the best examples of an exegete influenced by philosophical hermeneutics. His project of demythologizing—seeking the meaning of the text underneath the clothing of mythical language (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES)—fits within the larger stream of hermeneutics. Perhaps the most thorough engagement of philosophical hermeneutics in biblical scholarship is that of A. Thiselton (1992; see also D. Bryant [1989]).

Somewhat related to both narrative criticism and philosophical hermeneutics is READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM. Although using many of the same categories as narrative criticism, reader-response criticism, as the name implies, highlights the reader instead of the text. Reader-response has its roots in German reception theory (especially H. Jauss and W. Iser) and in American pragmatism. The leading figure of reader-response criticism in North America is S. Fish, who has most vigorously argued that the reader completely creates the meaning of a text. Few biblical critics have destabilized the independence of the text as much as he. A reader-response critic will strive to show how the reader reacts to a character rather than how that character develops in the story; the reader replaces the text as a primary locus of meaning. Of course, reader-response theorists will disagree on the extent of the reader's shaping influence (Fish [1980]). Most biblical scholars who focus on the reader still allow that the text has a certain autonomy, but they maintain that it also needs a reader to fill in the gaps. Some of J. D. Crossan's work on the PARABLES (1980) uses insights from reader-response theory to show how the reader/hearer helps to create the meaning of parables (see also Ricoeur [1975]). R. Fowler (1991) has both employed reader-response theory and pointed out some of its shortcomings through studies of Mark. Moore provides a helpful introductory discussion of reader-response theory and biblical studies (1989, 71-130; cf. The Bible and Culture Collective [1995] 20-69), while E. Conrad's Reading Isaiah (1991) is an example of reader-response analysis of HB texts. J. Darr (1992) and K. Pfisterer Darr (1994) draw especially from Iser's writings and focus particularly on the intertextual field that the original author(s) would have expected readers to know. The most important contribution of this genre of literary theory has been its focus on the dynamics of reading, which encourages self-critical awareness of assumptions about relations between texts, readers, and "reading communities."

Future possibilities are innumerable and beyond prediction. More than anything it is hoped that the engagement of literary theory and criticism will enable biblical studies to find its way out of what has often been its own self-made ghetto of extreme disciplinary specialization and into larger academic and intellectual conversations, which have too often both given religious texts a central place and have caricatured them and made simplistic assumptions regarding them.

Bibliography: A. K. M. Adam, What Is Postmodern Biblical Criticism? (1995). R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (1981). R. Alter and F. Kermode (eds.), The Literary Guide to the Bible (1987). E. Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946, 1959²; ET 1953). M. Bal, Lethal Love: Feminist Literary Readings of Biblical Love Stories (1987); Death and Dissymmetry: The Politics of Coherence in the Book of Judges (1988a); Murder and Difference: Gender, Genre, and Scholarship on Sisera's Death (1988b). T. K. Beal, "Glossary" and "Ideology and Intertextuality," Reading Between Texts: Intertextuality and the HB (ed. D. N. Fewell, 1992) 21-24, 27-39. T. K. Beal and T. Linafelt, "Sifting for Cinders: Strange Fires in Lev 10:1-5," Semeia (forthcoming). S. de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (1949; ET 1952). Bible and Culture Collective, The Postmodern Bible (1995). D. Blumenthal, Facing the Abusing God: A Theology of Protest (1993). W. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961). D. Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (1990a); "The Politics of Biblical Narratology: Reading the Bible Like/As a Woman," Diacritics 20 (1990b) 31-42. W. Brueggemann, "The 'Baruch Connection': Reflections on Jer 43:1-7," JBL (1994) 405-20. D. Bryant, Faith and the Play of Imagination: On the Role of Imagination in Religion (1989). S. Chatman, Story and Discourse: Narrative Structure in Fiction and Film (1978). E. W. Conrad, Reading Isaiah (1991). J. D. Crossan, Cliffs of Fall: Paradox and Polyvalence in the Parables of Jesus (1980). J. A. Darr, On Character Building: The Reader and the Rhetoric of Characterization in Luke–Acts (1992). K. P. Darr, Isaiah's Vision and the Family of God (1994). J. Derrida, Speech and Phenomena (1967; ET 1973); Of Grammatology (1967; ET 1977); Writing and Difference (1967; ET 1978); Dissemination (1972; ET 1981); Cinders (1979; ET 1991). R. Detweiler (ed.), Derrida and Biblical Studies (Semeia 23, 1982). M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (1966). T. Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983). H. Eilberg-Schwartz, God's Phallus and Other Problems for Men and Monotheism (1994). D. N. Fewell and D. M. Gunn, "Tipping the Balance: Sternberg's Reader and the Rape of Dinah," JBL 110 (1991) 193-211; Gender, Power, and Promise: The Subject of the Bible's First Story (1993). S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). R. Fowler, Let the Reader Understand: Reader-response Criticism and the Gospel of Mark (1991); "Who Is the Reader in Reader-response Criticism?" Semeia 31 (1985) 31-53. H. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth Century Hermeneutics (1974). N. Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); The Critical Path: An Essay on the Social Context of Literary Criticism (1971); The Great Code: The Bible and Literature (1982). E. Greenstein, "Deconstruction and Biblical Narrative," Prooftexts 9 (1989) 43-71. D. M. Gunn, "New Directions in the Study of Biblical Hebrew Narrative," JSOT 39 (1987) 65-75. D. M. Gunn and D. N. Fewell, Narrative in the HB (1993). S. Handelman, The Slayers of Moses: The Emergence of Rabbinic Interpretation in Modern Literary Theory (1982). G. Hartman and S. Budick (eds.), Midrash and Literature (1986).L. Irigaray, Speculum of the Other Woman (1974; ET 1985). D. Jasper and S. Prickett (eds.), The Bible and Literature: A Reader (1999). D. L. Jeffrey, The Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature (1992). D. Jobling, The Sense of Biblical Narrative: Structural Analysis in the HB (vols. 1 and 2, 1986). D. Jobling and S. D. Moore (eds.), Poststructuralism as Exegesis (Semeia 54, 1992). W. Kort, Story, Text, and Scripture: Literary Interests in Biblical Narrative (1988). J. Kristeva, "The System and the Speaking Subject," The Kristeva Reader (ed. T. Moi, 1986) 25-33. J. Lacan, Ecrits: A Selection (1977). T. Linafelt, "The Undecidability of BRK in the Prologue to Job and Beyond," BibInt 4 (1996) 154-72. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes, To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Application (1993). S. D. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels (1989); Mark and Luke in Poststructuralist Perspectives: Jesus Begins to Write (1992); Poststructuralism and the NT: Derrida and Foucault at the Foot of the Cross (1994). J. Muilenburg, "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18. D. Norton, A History of the Bible as Literature (2 vols., 1993). D. Patte, What Is Structural Exegesis? (1976). G. A. Phillips (ed.), Poststructural Criticism and the Bible: Text/History/Discourse (Semeia 51, 1990). I. N. Rashkow, The Phallacy of Genesis: A Feminist-Psychoanalytic Approach (1993). P. Ricoeur, "Biblical Hermeneutics," Semeia 4 (1975) 29-148. F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics (ed. C. Bally, A. Sechehaye, and A. Reidlinger, 1959). M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (1985); "Biblical Poetics and Sexual Politics," JBL 111 (1992) 463-88. A Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics: The Theory and Practice of Transforming Biblical Reading (1992). A. N. Wilder, The Bible and the Literary Critic (1991).

T. K. BEAL, K. A. KEEFER, and T. LINAFELT

LOCKE, JOHN (1632–1704)

Born at Wrington, Somerset, Aug. 29, 1632, L. was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford, where he became a tutor. From 1667 he was physician and adviser to A. Cooper, one of Charles II's leading ministers, who was made earl of Shaftesbury. Following Shaftesbury's fall from power and death in exile, L. fled to Holland, returning to England in 1689 after the overthrow of James II. From 1696 until 1700 he was active in government as commissioner for trade. He died at Oates, Essex, Oct. 28, 1704.

Not only were L.'s writings highly influential in the fields of epistemology, political theory, and education but they also made important contributions to theology and biblical criticism. L. read widely in the works of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century biblical scholars, including J. LIGHTFOOT, H. GROTIUS, H. HAMMOND, J. Pearson, J. CRELL, C. VITRINGA, and D. Whitby. He conducted an extensive correspondence with J. LE CLERC and P. van Limborch, whom he met in Holland. Theological themes are present in many of L.'s works, including his Essays on the Law of Nature (first published in 1954). His journals and correspondence provide ample evidence of his interest in the subject, and he used biblical texts to substantiate some of his arguments in his Letters concerning Toleration (1689–92) and Two Treatises of Government (1690).

L.'s Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) included discussions of the relationship among revelation, reason, belief, and knowledge. It provoked controversy with E. STILLINGFLEET, bishop of Worcester, who argued that L. undermined the doctrines of the Trinity and the resurrection of the body. L.'s answers to Stillingfleet were published in 1697–99, but controversy about L.'s views continued after his death. He was variously accused of being a Socinian, a Unitarian, and a Deist (see DEISM); but although some of his views were unorthodox, he never aligned himself with any particular school of thought.

During the last ten years of his life L. paid increased attention to theological matters. In The Reasonableness of Christianity, as Delivered in the Scriptures (1695) he reacted against intolerance and excessive dogmatism in religion. He claimed to give an account of Christianity in accordance with reason and based on the teaching of JESUS and the apostles, arguing that faith and a sincere endeavor to obey the teaching of Jesus were all that was needed for salvation. The fundamental article of faith required of all who heard the gospel was Jesus' messiahship, together with "concomitant articles," including the resurrection of Jesus and his second advent. Nonfundamental articles were to be believed insofar as they were understood. Although Reasonableness is not a life of Jesus, part of it endeavors to harmonize the Gospel accounts of Jesus' teaching in chronological order, probably under the influence of Lightfoot. L. explained Jesus' reluctance to publicize his messiahship as a desire to avoid provoking the Jewish and Roman authorities and stirring up a Jewish rebellion. L. also maintained that the account of the last judgment in Matt 25:31-46 offers a way of salvation to non-Christians. Reasonableness was attacked by J. Edwards as rejecting the doctrine of satisfaction and of putting forward Socinian views, accusations to which L. replied in his two Vindications (1695, 1697).

L.'s last book, published posthumously, was his Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul (1705–7), which attempted to understand the epistles "by consulting St. Paul himself." Consisting of paraphrases and explanatory notes on Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Romans, and Ephesians, it included a preface that explained L.'s principles of interpretation. He emphasized the importance of reading each epistle as a unity without regard for chapter and verse divisions and claimed he had freed himself from theological presuppositions and had looked at the epistles in the light of the situation for which teach was written. While stressing the coherent and reasoned nature of PAUL's thought, he affirmed the superiority of revelation to reason. He regarded Paul's chief opponents as Judaizers and rejected attempts to explain the epistles in terms of a Calvinist doctrine (see CALVIN) of predestination and the doctrine of penal substitution. Translated into German and partially into Dutch, the work was highly regarded by J. D. MICHAELIS but was criticized by D. Whitby, R. Jenkin, and others.

L.'s theological writings were widely read and discussed in Great Britain, North America, and Europe during the eighteenth century, and commentaries in his style were written by J. Peirce and G. Benson on the rest of the NT epistles. Living at a time when important developments were taking place in biblical criticism, L. challenged the traditional methods of biblical study with great force and clarity.

Works: Works (3 vols., 1714; 10th ed., 10 vols., 1801; 12th ed., 9 vols., 1824; Clarendon, 1976–).

Bibliography: R. I. Aaron, John Locke (1971³). M. Ayers, Locke (2 vols., 1991). BB 5 (1760) 2992-3009. J. C. Biddle, "J. L. on Christianity: His Context and Text" (diss., Stanford University, 1972). M. W. Cranston, J. L.: A Biography (1957). E. Crous, Die religionsphilosophischen Lehren Lockes und ihre Stellung zu dem Deismus seiner Zeit (1910, repr. 1980). S. G. Hefelblower, The Relation of J. L. to English Deism (1918).

J. Le Clerc, BC 6 (1705) 342-411; 13 (1707) 37-178. J. Marshall, J. L.: Resistance, Religion and Responsibility (1994). G. G. Pahl, "J. L. as Literary Critic and Biblical Interpreter," Essays Critical and Historical Dedicated to L. B. Campbell (1950) 137-57. M. C. Pitassi, Le philosophe et l'Écriture: J. L. exégète de Saint Paul (1990). I. T. Ramsey, introduction to The Reasonableness of Christianity, as Delivered in the Scriptures (1958). H. G. Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (1985) 243-85. P. A. Schouls, The Imposition of Method. A Study of Descartes and Locke (1980). W. M. Spellman, J. L. and the Problem of Depravity (1988). L. Stephen, DNB 34 (1893) 27-36. A. W. Wainwright, introduction to Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul (J. Locke, 2 vols., 1987) 1:1-88. N. Wolterstorff, J. L. and the Ethics of Belief (1996). J. W. Yolton, J. L. and the Way of Ideas (1956).

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

LODS, ADOLPHE (1867–1948)

A French Protestant biblical scholar and historian, L. was born at Courbevoie (Seine) and educated at Paris, Berlin, and Marburg. He served for a time as pastor of the Church of the Redemption, Paris; loved alpine climbing; and was an accomplished watercolor painter. L. became professor of OT in 1891 at the evangelical-theological faculty in Paris, and from 1906 to 1937 taught Hebrew language and literature in the faculty of letters at the Sorbonne.

Although his literary-critical and religion-historical research stands in succession from J. WELLHAUSEN, L. felt he was reclaiming a French perspective that had begun with R. SIMON in the seventeenth century and continued in the eighteenth with J. ASTRUC, but that had been stifled by the Roman Catholic Church's bitter attacks (e.g., J.-B. Bossuet against Simon). Maintaining that the historical-critical method rested on a twofold platform, analytical and synthetic, L. began his celebrated courses with a grammatical analysis of a text, the manner in which units of material came to constitute the OT "canon" (lower criticism), followed by a fresh translation and a close examination of its content (higher criticism). He dealt boldly with every problem: Who is the text's author? When was it written? How was it transmitted and edited? What is its place in the broader context of contemporary documents? What meaning did its author intend for his readers? Of course, L. recognized that subjective factors inevitably play a part; but he taught that a close analysis of texts must lead to a synthesis of all the information they furnish, drawing also on relevant data from ARCHAEOLOGY, linguistics, comparative religion, PSYCHOLOGY, SOCIOLOGY, statistics, demography, and other sciences.

L.'s excellent chapter on oral tradition in his posthumous Histoire de la littérature hébraïque et juive shows a remarkable breadth of spirit and an openmindedness to new perspectives in his field.

Works: L'Ecclésiaste et la philosophie grecque (1890); Le Livre d'Hénoch, fragments grecs découverts à Akhmin (haute-Egypte): publies avec les variantes du texte ethiopien (1892); La croyance à la vie future et le culte des morts dans l'antiquité israélite (2 vols., 1906); Le culte des ancètres dans l'antiquité hébraïque (1906); Jean Astruc et la critique biblique au XVIIIe siècle (1924); Israel from Its Beginning to the Middle of the Eighth Century (1930; ET 1932); The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism (1935; ET 1937); La Religion d'Israél (1939); Histoire de la littérature hébraïque et juive, depuis les origines jusqu'à laruine de l'état juif 135 ap. J.-C. (1950, preface by A. Parrot).

Bibliography: J. Bayet, Comptes Rendus de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres (1957) 315-27. H. F. Hahn, The OT in Modern Research (1956) 166-69. E. Jacob, RGG^{3} 4 (1960) 427. F. Michaéli, "Vies Parallèles: A. L. et M. Goguel," ETR 52 (1977) 385-401; Bulletin de la Faculté libre de Théologie protestante de Paris 42 (March 1953).

J. M. BULLARD

LOHMEYER, ERNST (1890–1946)

In 1912 L. received his ThD under A. DEISSMANN in Berlin and in 1914 his PhD in Erlangen. He became professor of NT in Breslau in 1920 but was removed in 1935 because of his strong anti-Nazi sympathies and was reassigned to Greifswald. Arrested by the Soviet military police on Feb. 1946 for unknown reasons, he was executed Sept. 19, 1946.

L.'s works show both historical-critical exegesis and philosophical interpretation of the NT. His research focused on the SYNOPTIC Gospels, giving particular attention to the history of the primitive Christian church. In contrast to Acts, L. assumed that an original Christian community existed in Galilee as well as in Jerusalem (Galiläa und Jerusalem [1936]) and that one must reckon with two sources of the Eucharist (Mark 6:34-42 and 14:22-25; "Das Abendmahl in der Urgemeinde" [1937]). He considered Mark to be influenced by a positive view of Galilee and a view of Jerusalem as a locus of hostility (Galiläa und Jerusalem; Das Evangelium des Markus [1937]), whereas Luke reduces Jesus' activity in Galilee and views Jerusalem as a holy place. With this insight L. became a precursor of REDACTION CRITICISM.

In addition to his work on John the Baptist, the christological titles "Servant of God" and "Son of David," and the Lord's prayer, L.'s unfinished commentary on Matthew (1956, 1967^4) deserves particular mention. He rejected Matthew's literary dependence on Mark and assumed the correspondence to result from independent access to a similar tradition, maintaining that Matthew is often closer to the source than Mark. L.'s other studies of the NT included commentaries (Philippians, Philemon, Colossians, Revelation) and an explanation of the Pauline syn christo sayings from the apocalyptic tradition. Of particular importance, his treatise Kyrios Jesus (1928) was the first work to show convincingly that Phil 2:6-11 contains a pre-Pauline hymn and thus smoothed the way for research on NT christological hymns.

Works: Diatheke: Ein Beitrag zur Erklärung des neutestamentlichen Begriffs (UNT 2, 1913); Soziale Fragen im Urchristentum (1921); Die Offenbarung des Johannes (HNT 16, 1926, 1970³); "Syn Christo," Festgabe für A. Deissmann (1927) 218-57; Kyrios Jesus: Eine Untersuchung (SHAW.PH 1927/28, 4; 1928); Grundlagen paulinischer Theologie (BHT 1, 1929); Die Briefe an die Philipper, an die Klosser, und an Philemon (MeyerK 9, 1930); Das Urchristentum, vol. 1, Johannes der Täufer (1932); Galiläa und Jerusalem (FRLANT 52, 1936); Das Evangelium des Markus (MeyerK 1, 2, 1937); "Das Abendmahl in der Urgemeinde," JBL 56 (1937) 217-52; Gottesknecht und Davidsohn (FRLANT 61, 1945); Das Vater unser (1946); Das Evangelium des Matthäus (ed. W. Schmauch, MeyerK Sonderband, 1956, 1967⁴); Urchristliche Mystik: Neutestamentliche Studien (1956).

Bibliography: O. Cullmann, TZ (1951) 158-60 = Vorträge und Aufsätze 1925–1962 (ed. K. Fröhlich, 1966) 663-66. E. Esking, Glaube und Geschichte in der theologischen Exegese E. L.s (ASNU 18, 1951). G. Haufe, TRE 21 (1991) 444-47. E. A. Lekai, "The Theology of the People of God in E. L.'s Commentaries on the Gospels of Mark and Matthew" (diss., Catholic University of America, 1974; cf. EBB 56 [1975] 749). G. Otto, "Erinnerung an E. L.," DtPfrBl 81 (1981) 358-62. W. Otto (ed.), Freiheit in der Gebundenheit: Zur Erinnerung an den Theologen E. L. anlässlich seines 100. Geburtstages (1990). Der Rektor der Ernst-Moritz-Arndt Universität (ed.), In memoriam E. L. (Greifswalder Universitätsreden NF 59, 1001). W. Schmauch (ed.), In memoriam E. L. (1951) 19-21 (life and works), 368-75 (bibliography).

B. KOLLMANN

LOISY, ALFRED FIRMIN (1857–1940)

L. was born in Ambrières (Marne), Feb. 28, 1857. In 1874 he entered the diocesan seminary at Châlons-sur-Marne. He was ordained (June 1879) and served in rural parishes for two years, but with the encouragement of the church historian L. Duchesne he resumed studies at the Institut Catholique of Paris, where he obtained his licentiate in theology (June 1882). From 1881 to 1883 he was instructor in Hebrew at the Institut and a member of the faculty from 1883 to 1893, when he was expelled from his position.

In 1882 L. attended lectures in ASSYRIOLOGY at the École Pratique des Hautes Études, and for three years attended the lectures of J. RENAN at the Collège de France. During the 1883–84 academic year the rector of the Institut Catholique rejected L.'s Latin thesis on the doctrine of INSPIRATION according to the Bible and the ecclesiastical writers from the apostolic fathers to Tertullian. The thesis claimed that the PSYCHOLOGY of the inspired authors was visibly the same as that of all who write; that the element of the divine did not change the nature of the writings to which it pertained—for example, did not transform a pseudonymous book, like the Wisdom of Solomon, into an authentic work of Solomon (1913; ET 1924, 97-98). While studying under A. Amiaud at the École Pratique L. produced a reconstruction of the annals of Sargon. In 1890 L.'s new thesis, A History of the OT Canon, was accepted by the Institut.

After teaching and continuing his critical studies for five years while chaplain at a convent school in Neuilly (1894–99), L. was appointed in 1900 to the École Pratique in the science of religion, where he began a series of lectures on "The Babylonian Myths and the First Chapters of Genesis" (1913; ET 1924, 209). In an article on biblical questions (1903) he included such viewpoints as these: In its present form the Pentateuch is not the work of Moses; the first chapters of Genesis are not reliable history; religious doctrine in Scripture undergoes development in all its elements (God, human destiny, moral obligation); and the biblical writings, insofar as they contain the knowledge of nature, do not advance beyond the notions common to the ancient world. These views resulted in his expulsion from the Institut (1913; ET 1924, 147-55).

Due to his problems with the Catholic hierarchy L. resigned his position at the École in 1904 and retired to a cottage in Garnay (1913; ET 1924, 258-60, 280), where he continued preparation of his work on the Synoptics (1907-8; see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM). Five of his works had been placed on the Index (Dec. 19, 1903), and he was excommunicated on Mar. 8, 1908. In 1909, however, the Collège de France appointed L. to the chair of the history of religions; he resigned from this position in 1927 and from his lectureship at the École Pratique, continuing to write until the year before his death on June 6, 1940.

L.'s work in biblical studies and early Christianity was marked by his concern for a historical investigation of religion unrestrained by ecclesiastical traditions. A. von HARNACK's What Is Christianity? (1900; ET 1901) prompted L. to respond with The Gospel and the Early Church (1902; ET 1976), which earned him instant notoriety and a continuing place in NT studies. Responding to von Harnack's argument for a Christianity based on a reconstruction of the simple teachings of the historical JESUS, L. argued that there was a valid continuity of historical development between Jesus and the early church: "We have seen that the gospel of Jesus already contained a rudiment of social organization, and that the kingdom also was announced as a society. Jesus foretold the kingdom, and it was the Church that came;

she came, enlarging the form of the gospel, which it was impossible to preserve as it was, as soon as the Passion closed the ministry of Jesus. There is no institution on the earth or in history whose status and value may not be questioned if the principle is established that nothing may exist except in its original form" (1902; ET 1976, 166).

Thirty years later L. would argue as an independent scholar no longer defending Roman Catholic doctrine that "a religious agitation started in Palestinian Judaism by a Galilean preacher, whose aim was the Kingdom of God, and his end to be crucified as a rebel, comes to its fruit in less than two centuries as a mighty institution established throughout the Roman empire, condemned by the law, but assured of its future and equally sure of victory over the empire which persecuted it. In the whole course of this remarkable evolution nothing happened which cannot be explained by the laws that govern human life" (1933; ET 1962a, 358). For example, the empty tomb story in the Gospels was told by Mark but was invented by the second or third Christian generation. For Peter the conviction that Jesus had not perished in death came first, followed by his vision of the risen Jesus, which was produced by the intense and inward workings of faith (1933; ET 1962a, 45, 103-5).

L.'s critical studies of the Gospels led him to postulate late dates for these writings. John was first composed c. 135–140 CE, with the second edition in 150–160 contemporary with the last editions of Matthew and Luke. The Gospels were foremost catechisms of Christian initiation (1933; ET 1962a, 52-53). In Mark, Jesus is no longer the predestined king of a just Israel but a savior God like Osiris, Adonis, Attis, and Mithra (for the mystery gods with their initiation rituals see Loisy, 1930). Although the "Son of man" formula comes from Daniel, the idea attached to it comes more from PAUL and the pagan mysteries than from Jewish messianism. In Mark the history of Jesus has become a mystery—a divine fact (1912, 32, 38-39). From John alone one could not resolve the problem of whether Jesus was a historical figure (1921, 71); the Gospel's first author was perhaps a pagan convert who was steeped in the mysticism of his time (1921, 66). L. was nonetheless highly critical of those who believed that Mandaean thought could account for the mystery of John's conceptual world, although he did see some common elements between the two. He traced the origins of the Mandaeans to several centuries after the birth of Christianity (1934, 7, 142, 148).

L. published several books with the NT texts in rhythmic prose in strophic form (1921, 1922, 1935; see A. Jones, [1983] 97-105). When asked at a conference by M. GOGUEL to justify his method (not based on length or syntax), L. responded that he did it orally (Jones, 102)!

L.'s commentary on Acts (1920) has been praised as one of the most significant of the twentieth century. In it he attempted to devalue Paul's role in early Christianity, which he pictured (using Acts) as developing from Peter (the first group of Christians in Jerusalem comprising former disciples of Jesus), to Stephen (the formation of the second group, comprising Hellenistic Jews in Jerusalem), to Barnabas (the foundation in Antioch of a primarily Gentile-Christian community). L. claimed that Luke was a fine historian whose work had been travestied by a redactor (1920, 89, 90, 108; see Jones, 83-96).

L. did not have much admiration for Paul. His commentary on Galatians (1916) was an attempt to "deprotestantize" Paul (see Jones, 79). In his doctrines Paul was guilty of arbitrary interpretation, phantasmagoria, and infantile thought (149-50, 154, 161, with reference to Gal 3:13-14, 18, and 29—discussed in Jones, 81), and his teaching about justification by faith in Romans advances from one absurdity to another (1936; ET 1962b, 294). In a work on the epistolary literature of the NT, L. argued that the original Pauline epistles were "skeletons" to which were added many anonymous fragments (1935, 185-89; see Jones's simplified summary, 124-25), e.g., the original Romans consisted of 1:1-7, 8-17; 3:27–4:25 (with the exception of 4:15, 25); 9–11; 15:8-13, 14-33 and was greatly supplemented to produce the present work.

The evaluation of L.'s scholarship is still under consideration. E. Trocmé gives a cautious appraisal when he notes that L. has probably been the impetus for much of twentieth-century French Catholic and Protestant exegesis (1978, 458).

Works: Histoire du canon de l'Ancien Testament (1890); Histoire du canon du Nouveau Testament (1891); Histoire critique du texte et des versions de la Bible (2 vols., 1892–93); Études bibliques (1901, 1903[3]); Les Mythes babyloniens et les premiers chapitres de la Genèse (1901); Études évangéliques (1902); The Gospel and the Church (1902, 1930[5]; ET 1976); Autour d'un petit livre (1903, 1904[2]); Le Quatrième Évangile (1903); The Religion of Israel (1906, rev. ed. 1933; ET 1910); Les Évangeles synoptiques (2 vols., 1907–8); Leçon d'ouverture du cours d'histoire des religions au Collège de France (1909); Jésus et la tradition évangélique (1910); A propos d'histoire des religions (1911); L'Évangile selon Marc (1912); Les Mystères Païens et le Mystère Chrétien (1912, rev. ed. 1930); Choses passées (1913; ET My Duel with the Vatican: The Autobiography of a Catholic Modernist [1924]); L'Epître aux Galates (1916); La Religion (1917, rev. ed. 1924); Les Actes des Apôtres (1920, abbreviated ed. 1925); Essai historique sur le sacrifice (1920); Le Quatriéme Évangile: Les Épîtres dites de Jean (1921); Les livres du Nouveau Testament (1922); L'Apocalypse de Jean (1923); L'Évangile selon Luc (1924); Memoires pour servir à l'histoire religieuse de notre temps (3 vols., 1930–31); The Birth of the Christian Religion (1933; ET 1962a); Le Mandéisme et les origines chrétiennes (1934); Remarques sur la littérature epistolaire du Nouveau Testament (1935); The Origins of the NT (1936; ET 1962b); Histoire et mythe à propos de Jésus-Christ (1938); Autres mythes à propos de la religion (1938); Un mythe apologétique (1939). For a full bibliography of L.'s works, see A. Houtin and F. Sartiaux, A. L.: Sa vie, son oeuvre (ed. E. Poulat, 1960) 304-23.

Bibliography: D. Bader, Der Weg L.s zur Erforschung der christlichen Wahrheit (Freiburger theologische Studien 69, 1974). J. Bonsirven, DBSup 5 (1957) 530-44. L. C. Bozak, "The Problem of Faith and Reason in the Thought of A. L." (diss., Marquette University, 1973). P. Guerin, "La vie et l'oeuvre de Loisy à propos d'un ouvrage récent," RHPR 41 (1961) 334-43. F. Heiler, Der Vater der katholischen Modernismus: A. L. (1947). H. Hill, "La Science Catholique: A. L.'s Program of Historical Theology," ZNThG/JHMTh 3 (1996) 39-59. J. Hulshof, Wahrheit und Geschichte: A. L. zwischen Tradition und Kritik (BNGKT 16, 1973). A. H. Jones, Independence and Exegesis: The Study of Early Christianity in the Work of A. L. (1857–1940), C. Guignebert (1854–1939), and M. Goguel (1880–1955) (BGBE 26, 1983). M.-J. Lagrange, M. Loisy et le modernisme (1932). R. Marlé, Au coeur de la crise modernists: Le dossier inédit d'une controverse. Lettres de M. Blondel, H. Bremond, Fr. von Hügel, A. L., F. Mourret, J. Wehrlé (1960). V. G. Moran, "L.'s Theological Development," TS 40 (1979) 411-52. P. Neuner, TRE 21 (1991) 453-56. M. D. Petre, A. L.: His Religious Significance (1944). N. Provencher, "Une tentative de renouvellement de l'herméneutique biblique: le modernisme d'A. L.," Église et Theologie 7 (1976) 341-66. E. Poulat, Histoire, Dogme, et Critique dans la Crise Moderniste (1962). J. Ratté, Three Modernists: A. L., G. Tyrell, W. L. Sullivan (1968) 43-141. R. J. Resch, "Christology as a Methodological Problem: A Study of the Correspondence Between M. Blondel and A. L., 1902–1903" (diss., University of Notre Dame, 1975). R. de Boyer de Sainte Suzanne, A. L. entre la foi et l'incroyance (1968). B. B. Scott, "Introduction," The Gospel and the Church (1976) xi-lxxiii. É. Trocmé, "Exégèse scientifique et Idéologie: de L'École de Tubingue aux Historiens français des Origines chrétiennes," NTS 24 (1978) 447-62. A. R. Vidler, The Modernist Movement in the Roman Church: Its Origins and Outcome (1934) 67-139; A Variety of Catholic Modernists (Sarum Lectures for 1968–69, 1970).

J. G. COOK

LOWTH, ROBERT (1710–87)

Born Nov. 27, 1710, L. was the son of W. Lowth (1661–1732), an important ecclesiastical and scholarly figure of his day who had published a treatise defending the INSPIRATION and AUTHORITY of the Bible against J. LE CLERC's views as well as commentaries on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel and the Minor Prophets. L. was educated at Winchester College and at New College, Oxford (MA 1737). In 1741 he was appointed professor of poetry at Oxford only days before giving the first lecture in his series on Hebrew POETRY (1741–50). In the early 1750s he was granted various church appointments and was awarded a DD degree from Oxford (1754) and in 1765 was elected to the royal societies of London and Göttingen. He served as bishop of St. David's (1766), Oxford (1766–77), and London (1777–87), where he died Nov. 3, 1787.

The most influential English-speaking OT scholar of his day, L.'s work clearly belongs within the context of various contemporary intellectual discussions: the debate over the nature, history, and role of poetry in Neoclassical and early Romantic studies; the developing tendency in certain circles to view the Bible more in human categories than as a repository of divine revelation, thus emphasizing the Bible's aesthetic and literary qualities; the discussion of the nature and meter of biblical poetry and how the Bible's poetry should be expressed in translation; and the increasing "orientalism" of the time and its use in understanding and illustrating the Bible. His writing on Hebrew poetry and his translation of and comments on Isaiah were widely distributed and reprinted in various editions for almost a century (see the reprint of the lectures on poetry [Anglistica and Americana 43, 1969] with an introduction by V. Freimarck). The poetry lectures were initially delivered and published in Latin, although an English version of the first eighteen lectures was published in the Christian Magazine in 1766–67 before the whole was published in English in 1787 (a German translation appeared in 1793 and a French edition in 1812). J. D. MICHAELIS, who heard the second of the poetry lectures in October 1741, issued an annotated version at Göttingen, and J. KOPPE annotated a German translation of Isaiah published in Leipzig. L.'s lectures on poetry were a direct response to Frances Hare's Psalmorum liber, in versiculos metricè divisus . . . cum dissertatione de antiqua Hebraeorum poesi (2 vols., 1736; ET 1755), and his translation of Isaiah partially grew out of his long-standing concern for an English translation of the Bible based on new LITERARY-critical perspectives and TEXTUAL studies.

L. is most widely known for his theory of parallelismus membrorum (see F. Rehkopf [1980] on the use of terminology), in which he divided biblical parallel statements into synonymous, antithetical, and synthetic as a means for understanding Hebrew poetry (a view, as noted by J. Jebb, that was anticipated by C. Schoettgen [1687–1751] in a fifteen-page essay, "De exergasia sacra," at the end of his Horae hebraicae et talmudicae in universum Novum Testamentum [2 vols., 1733]). In addition, L. argued that prophetic literature was a form of poetry (a view anticipated by H. von der Hardt in his Tres primae Joelis elegiae sacrae, [1706]). Identifying the prophets as poets, L. argued that poetry and PROPHECY had "one common name, one common origin, one common author, the Holy Spirit," thus practically identifying prophetic inspiration with poetic genius. His views, eloquently presented, greatly influenced the study of OT prophecy in both Germany and England.

Works: De sacra poesi Hebraeorum praelectiones academiae Oxonii habitae a Roberto Lowth: Subjicitor metricae Harianae brevis confutatio et oratio Crewiana (1753; 2 vols., 1758–61, with notes by J. D. Michaelis; 2 vols., 1763², rev. with Michaelis's original and additional notes in vol. 2; ed. and with notes by E. F. C. Rosenmüller, 1815, with additional notes by C. F. Richter and C. Weiss; ET Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews [2 vols., 1787], with the principal notes of Michaelis and notes by the translator, G. Gregory, and S. Henley; 1816²; rev. ed. 1829, with additional notes from the 1793 GT); Auszug aus . . . Vorlesungen über die heilige Dichtkunst der Hebräer, mit Herders und [Sir William] Jones's Grundsätzen verbunden . . . Nebst einigen vemischten Anhängen entworfen von C. B. Schmidt (1793); Life of William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester (1758); A Short Introduction to English Grammar (1762); A Letter to the Reverend Author [W. Warburton] of the "Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated. . . . (1765); A Larger Confutation of Bishop Hare's System of Hebrew Metre (1766); Isaiah: A New Translation; with a Preliminary Dissertation, and Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory (2 vols., 1778; 1779²)); D. R. Lowths . . . Jesaias, neu übersetzt nebst einer Einleitung und critischen philologischen und erläuternden Anmerkungen aus dem Englischen: Mit Zusätzen und Anmerkungen, von J. B. Koppe (4 vols., 1779–81); Sermons, and Other Remains of R. L. (ed. P. Hall, 1834, with a memoir by the editor, 1-42).

Bibliography: H. Blair, Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres (2 vols., 1783, repr. 1965) 2:385-405. R. S. Cripps, "Two British Interpreters of the OT: R. L. (1710–1787) and S. Lee (1783–1852)," BJRL 35 (1952/53) 385-404. J. Drury (ed.), Critics of the Bible 1724–1873 (1989) 69-102. B. Hepworth, Robert Lowth (1978). W. Hunt, DNB 34 (1893) 214-16. J. Jebb, Sacred Literature: Comprising a Review of the Principles of Composition Laid Down by the Late R. L . . . in His Praelections and Isaiah, and An Application of the Principles so Reviewed to the Illustration of the NT (1820). T. M. Johnston, "The Neo-classical Background of R. L.'s Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews" (diss., Duke University, 1938). J. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (1981), esp. 274-86. R. Lowth, Jr., Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the Late Right Reverend R. L. (1787). S. Prickett, Words and The Word: Language, Poetics, and Biblical Interpretation (1986) 105-23. F. Rehkopf, "Der 'Parallelismus' im NT: Versuch einer Sprachregelung," ZNW 71 (1980) 46-57. M. Roston, Prophet and Poet: The Bible and the Growth of Romanticism (1965); RMM, 144-50. R. Smend, "L. in Deutschland," Epochen des Bibelkritik (GS 3, 1991) 43-62. C. E. Stowe, preface to Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (R. Lowth, new ed. with expanded notations, 1829) iii-xvii. L. Tannenbaum, Biblical Tradition in Blake's Early Prophecies: The Great Code of Art (1982) 8-54.

R. R. MARRS

LUBAC, HENRI DE (1896–1991)

L. entered the Jesuit order in 1913 and was ordained in 1927 after being decisively influenced by M. Blondel and the revisionist Thomism of P. Rousselot. While teaching fundamental theology and history of religions at the Catholic faculty of Lyons (1930–50), he was in the forefront of the ressourcement movement, which sought to revitalize Christian intellectual and spiritual life by renewed contact with biblical, patristic, and medieval sources. Although controversy surrounding his work Surnaturel (1946) led to the loss of his teaching position in 1950, he was vindicated ten years later when John XXIII appointed him as a theological adviser to the Second Vatican Council. He was a co-founder of the important collections Sources chrétiennes and Concilium and the review Communio. Created a cardinal in 1983 by John Paul II, L. published over fifty volumes and numerous articles on subjects as diverse as HERMENEUTICS, Buddhism, Marxism, ecclesiology, and theological anthropology. He died in Paris on Sept 4, 1991.

In his writings on the history of hermeneutics, L. demonstrated that Christian allegorical interpretation of the HB was initiated not by ORIGEN, following PHILO and the pagan allegorists, as commonly supposed, but rather by the NT authors, especially PAUL. L. showed allegory to be present in the work of virtually all orthodox expositors before the Reformation, even in such habitually literal interpreters as JEROME, the ANTIOCHENES, and THOMAS AQUINAS. Dependent on a thoroughly Christian theology of history, Christian allegorism was, for L., fundamentally different from all other allegorism, regardless of superficial resemblances. Considered revolutionary when first published, these ideas overturned entrenched positions and even succeeded in some cases in engendering a new scholarly consensus.

Given that literal and spiritual interpretation coexisted for centuries without conflict, L. saw no inherent opposition between them. He advocated a contemporary reappropriation of spiritual exegesis that respects and builds on the literal sense as determined by historical-critical exegesis. For him, the scholarly attempt to determine the Bible's meaning in its original historical context is indispensible; nevertheless, it remains merely the preparation for that prayerful, existential encounter with the text that yields life-transforming and perpetually new meaning for Christians today. In this regard he approached the hermeneutical ideas of such contemporary thinkers as P. RICOEUR and H. Gadamer. In his early recognition of the limitations as well as the usefulness of the historical-critical method, L. was, like K. BARTH, a pioneer of post-critical hermeneutics.

Works: Catholicisme (1938); Corpus Mysticum (1944); Surnaturel: Études historiques (1946); Histoire et Ésprit: L'intelligence de l'écriture d'apres Origene (1950); Exégèse Médiévale: Les quatres sens de l'ecriture (4 vols., 1959–64; ET 1998–); L'Écriture dans la tradition (1967); Pic de la Mirandole: Études et discussions (1974); La Postérité spirituelle de Joachim de Flore (2 vols., 1979); "Tu m'as trompé, Seigneur," Recherches dans la foi: Trois études sur Origene, Saint Anselme, et la philosophie chrétienne (1979) 9-78; Rivelazione e senso dell'uomo (1985); Mémoire sur l'occasion de mes écrits (1989); Theological Fragments (1989).

Bibliography: H. Urs von Balthasar, "The Achievement of H. L.," Thought 51 (1976) 7-49. H. Urs von Balthasar and G. Chantraine, Le Cardinal H. L.: L'homme et son oeuvre (1983). G. Chantraine, NCE 18 (1988) 264-66; TRE 21 (1991) 471-73. M. D'Ambrosio, "H. L. and the Recovery of the Traditional Hermeneutic" (diss., Catholic University of America, 1991). M. van Esbroeck, Herméneutique, structuralisme et exégèse: Essai de logique Kerygmatique (1968). A. Gracias, "The Spiritual Sense of Scripture According to H. L.," (diss., Rome, 1975). K. Neufeld, "Bibliographie H. L., S.J., 1970–90," Théologie dans l'Histoire (H. L., 1990). K. Neufeld and M. Sales, Bibliographie H. L., S. J., 1925–70 (1971). S. K. Wood, Spiritual Exegesis and the Church in the Theology of H. L. (1998).

M. D'AMBROSIO

LUCIAN (d. 312)

Presbyter, theologian, teacher, and martyr, L. had a deep influence on early Christianity from his base in Antioch. In biblical exegesis he stressed the literal sense of the text, determining the meaning of metaphorical passages through study of Hebrew and Greek languages and literatures. L. produced a Greek version of the Bible, both Hebrew Scriptures and NT, that, technically speaking, is a revision of earlier translations. The assumption that L. created this Greek version is based on an observation by JEROME in his preface to Chronicles that L.'s text was used in the region between Constantinople and Antioch. The exact relation of L.'s version to the earlier texts is not clear since so many new elements were introduced that the underlying text can be discovered only through meticulous research.

The Lucianic text of the Hebrew Scriptures was rediscovered in the nineteenth century when A. Ceriani, F. Field, and P. LAGARDE successfully indentified the manuscripts containing the Lucianic tradition, most clearly visible in the historical books (MSS borc2^{e} from Ruth 4:11 onward). Usually the revision elaborates on the Hexapla (e.g., in the latter prophets), but in some books it also reflects elements predating the time of the historical L. and ORIGEN's Hexapla. In other books no Lucianic revision can be detected at all.

Scholars have long shown a keen interest in the Lucianic tradition because of the translation tendencies reflected in this text and because of the presence of "proto-Lucianic" readings—that is, so-called Lucianic readings attested from a time prior to the historical L. This pertains especially to the agreements of the Lucianic text and the Hebrew DEAD SEA SCROLLS, particularly the books of Samuel. Because of the fragmentary state of preservation of the textual traditions of the Bible these agreements may be misleading, however. In the historical books the Lucianic tradition may reflect an original Greek translation (thus Barthélemy [1978, 1982–86]), but it is also possible that it is composed of a substratum containing an original translation and a second layer containing a revision by L. (thus E. Tov [1972]). In any case, in these books the Lucianic tradition reflects important Hebrew readings. The Lucianic text is noted in the Cambridge and Göttingen editions of the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT).

Bibliography: D. Barthélemy, Études d'histoire du texte de l'AT (OBO 21, 1978); (ed.) Critique textuelle de l'Ancien Testament (OBO 50, 1-2, 1982–86). H. C. Brennecke, TRE 21 (1991) 474-79. S. Jellicoe, The Septuagint and Modern Study (1968) 157-71. B. Mercati, "Di alcune testimonianze antiche sulle cure bibliche di S. Luciano," Bib 24 (1943) 1-17. B. M. Metzger, Chapters in the History of NT Textual Criticism (NTTS 4, 1963) 1-41. J. Quasten, Patrology 2 (1960) 142-44. M. Spanneutt, "La Bible d'Eustathe d'Antioche: Contribution à l'histoire de la 'versione lucianique,' " StPatr 4 (TU 79, 1961) 171-90. E. Tov, "Lucian and Proto-Lucian: Toward a New Solution of the Problem," RB 79 (1972) 101-13 = F. M. Cross and S. Talmon (eds.), Qumran and the History of the Biblical Text (1975) 293-305. E. C. Ulrich, The Qumran Text of Samuel and Josephus (HSM 19, 1978).

E. TOV

LUKE, GOSPEL OF

1. The Interpretation of Luke in Early Christianity. The interpretation of Luke has generally followed the cultural and religious currents of the times. In the early period the context for interpretation was the church. The occasions were two: the demand for a defense against heresy within the church and the need for an apology directed toward the world outside the church. TERTULLIAN and CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA represent the former, AUGUSTINE the latter.

Luke was early on the object of GNOSTIC and Marcionite interpretation. IRENAEUS complained that Valentinians disregarded the order and connection of the Scriptures and adapted the Gospels to their own positions. For example, there are, they said, three kinds of people: material (Luke 9:57-58), animal (Luke 9:61-62), and spiritual (Luke 9:60; 19:5); Achamoth wandered beyond the pleuroma and was sought by the Savior (Luke 15:4, 8); Simeon (Luke 2:28) is a type of the Demiurge, Anna (Luke 2:36) a type of Achamoth (Against Heresies 1.8.3-4). Marcosians, Irenaeus claimed, also misinterpreted the Gospels, e.g., for them Luke 2:49 speaks of JESUS' announcement of the Unknown God (Against Heresies 1.20.2). CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA further charged that Heracleon, a leading Valentinian, interpreted Luke 12:11-12 in a way that allowed a Gnostic to avoid martyrdom (Miscellanies 4.9). MARCION dispensed with the Law and the Prophets and in their place substituted an abbreviated version of the Gospel of Luke and an expurgated collection of PAUL's letters, supporting thereby his understanding of Christ as one who stood in antithesis to the creator God of the Jews.

Tertullian's Against Marcion, bk. 4 (1957), may be regarded as his commentary on Luke. The work's form is to take up a position of Marcion and then refute it by appeal to the Third Gospel. Its focus is that Jesus is the Christ of the Creator, with proof being derived from Luke's Gospel, since that is the narrative portion of the NT accepted, at least in part, by Marcion. At the end, Tertullian concluded: "Marcion, I pity you; your labor has been in vain. For the Jesus Christ who appears in your Gospel is mine" (4.43). The first full-scale orthodox interpretation of Luke, then, was by an early third-century anti-heretical Latin writer of North Africa who used the Third Gospel to refute Marcion's Antitheses.

The commentary on Luke by Cyril (1983), patriarch of Alexandria from 412 to 444 CE, is a collection of 150 extemporaneous sermons. The opening sentence of Homily Three betrays the sermonic form: "Very numerous indeed is the assembly, and earnest the hearer—for we see the church full." The focus of the commentary is Cyril's opposition to Nestorius amid the christological controversies leading up to Chalcedon (451 CE). For example, in Homily One on Luke 2:4, "because he was of the house and lineage of David," he says: "The natures, however, which combined unto this real union were different, but from the two together is one God the Son, without the diversity of the natures being destroyed by the union." Homily Twelve on Luke 5:14 reads: "Yes, verily, as both to think and say, that the Word of God the Father is one Christ separately by himself, and He who is of the seed of David is another." From the Greek church this early interpretation of Luke, like Tertullian's from the Latin church, had an anti-heretical aim.

Augustine's The Harmony of the Gospels (1956), written c. 400 CE, employs the form of the harmony, a literary type previously produced by TATIAN in the second century, Ammonius of Alexandria in the third, and EUSEBIUS in the fourth. The focus of his Harmony is to vindicate the Gospel against the critical assaults of the heathen who attacked the veracity of the Gospel writers, claiming that the Gospels contradict each other, contradict the HB, and add to Christ's teaching (1.7.10). Using a Latin translation older than the VULGATE, in book 1 Augustine denied that the Gospels go beyond what Jesus taught; in book 2 he examined Matthew, comparing it with Mark, Luke, and John and exhibiting the perfect harmony between them in the narrative down to the Last Supper; in book 3 he completed the project of book 2, dealing with the narrative from the Supper to its end; in book 4 he dealt with passages in Mark, Luke, and John that have no parallel in Matthew. One way Augustine sought to avoid difficulties was by supposing different instances of the same circumstances or repeated utterances of the same words. For example, the different versions of the voice from heaven at Jesus' baptism mean that both voices were heard from heaven (2.14.31); if Matt 20:29-34 has two blind men and Luke 18:35-43 has only one, it is explained by the fact that Luke is narrating a miracle wrought on a blind man as Jesus came near Jericho while Matthew tells of a similar miracle as he was leaving Jericho; Luke 5:4, although similar to John 21:1-11, refers to another, similar incident. Augustine's interpretation of Luke, then, had the practical, churchly aim of displaying the unity and harmony of all Scripture in order to refute the pagans' charges.

2. The Interpretation of Luke in Medieval Christianity. Early medieval exegesis, designed to move its audience, was cast in two forms: that of the sermon, if it was meant to move the hearer, and that of the commentary to be read by monks as part of their ascetic discipline, if it was meant to move the reader. The Venerable BEDE's impact is from the latter. This eighth-century monk's exegetical writings were much in demand in later centuries and were studied and copied in monastic centers all over Europe, with the result that his authority grew to be little inferior to that of the four doctors of the Latin church. His Commentary on the Gospel of Luke is a good example of his exegetical work. In Bede's time to be a scholar meant digesting the learning of earlier thinkers and passing it down in a simpler and more intelligible form. What this meant for exegetical work was that, after the fifth century, for more than one thousand years the task of a biblical commentary was that of compiling and ordering extracts from the exegetical literature of the patristic age. This Bede did. In his commentary on Luke he initiated a system of marginal source marks to indicate which passages he borrowed from AMBROSE, Augustine, JEROME, or GREGORY THE GREAT, "lest I be accused of stealing from my elders, and of proposing their views as if they were my own." The focus of his exegetical work was eminently practical. In his Church History, 5.24, Bede wrote of himself: "I have spent all my life in this monastery, applying myself entirely to the study of the Scriptures. . . . From the time I became a priest until [this] the fifty ninth year of my life, I have made it my business, for my own benefit and that of my brothers, to make brief extracts from the works of the venerable fathers on the holy Scripture, or to add notes of my own to clarify their sense and interpretation." The same point is made in the preface to his Commentary on Acts, where he wrote that the author is Luke the physician and that "all of his words are . . . medicine for the ailing soul." Bede's exegesis tended to be, like monastic exegesis in general, devotional, concerned with living the Christian life and attaining salvation.

3. The Interpretation of Luke in the Renaissance and the Protestant Reformation. ERASMUS produced not only the first printed Greek NT (1516) but also paraphrases and annotations on biblical books. His paraphrase of Luke (In Evangelium Lucae Paraphrasis [1523]) was not a translation but a freer kind of continuous commentary that nevertheless maintained the integrity of the persons speaking. The Annotations, which went through five expanding editions in Erasmus's lifetime, are characterized by two principal features: TEXTUAL CRITICISM (his primary concern) and consideration of the opinions of the fathers (like the medieval exegetes but with greater freedom). Thus he reported the opinions of the fathers who agreed with him, pointed out differences among them to justify his own departures from commonly held views, and criticized their errors. The focus of his interpretation was the moral meaning of Scripture. Humanists like Erasmus used Luke, as they used other Scripture, to expose the folly and corruption of the church. Erasmus's favorite subjects were the tragedy of the institutionalization of religion, the sophistical nature of scholastic theology, and the worldly aspirations of the clergy. Beyond his specific moral interpretation of Luke and other NT documents, he gave the Protestant Reformation a Greek text and a philological method to use in its theological exegesis.

If humanists like Erasmus used Scripture to expose the church's corruption, Reformers like CALVIN employed Scripture as a theological weapon. In his Harmony of the Gospels (1555; ET 1972) Calvin reclaimed an ancient form. Maintaining that no one can comment intelligently or aptly on one of the three synoptic Gospels without comparing it with the other two, he treated Luke in connection with the other synoptic writers, focusing on Reformation theology. For example, when Luke 1:6 says, "They [Zachariah and Elizabeth] were both righteous before God," does it mean that they had no need of Christ? No! They were not perfect. They needed forgiveness. Their righteousness depended on the free kindness of God whereby God did not lay their unrighteousness to their charge because of the covenant God had made with them. On this point Calvin fought against both those who read justification by faith into the passage and those Roman Catholics who claimed to be justified by works. In Luke 1:46-50, did Mary say, "Henceforth all generations shall call me blessed" because she sought renown through her own virtue and efforts? No! She was celebrating God's work alone. Calvin held that this shows how completely Roman Catholics were mistaken in giving her titles like "Queen of Heaven" and in conferring on her the royalty that belongs to Christ, saying, "Ask the Father, bid the Son." The holy Virgin rejects them all, fixing her glory on the grace of God. "It follows that the praises of Mary, where the might and sheer glory of God are not entirely set forth, are perverse and counterfeit." Although Calvin, like Augustine, dealt with such difficulties as the different genealogies of Matthew and Luke, his major concern remained theological; and Luke served as a tool for his aim of the theological reformation of the church.

4. The Interpretation of Luke in the Enlightenment. H. S. REIMARUS (1694–1768), professor of oriental languages at the Hamburg academic gymnasium, worked in the context of developments in the German Enlightenment's understanding of the relation between revelation and reason. The leading German philosopher of the period, C. Wolff (1679–1754), held that (a) revelation may be above reason but not contrary to reason, and (b) reason establishes the criteria by which revelation may be judged. The Wolffian synthesis was attacked from two directions. Neology, the middle phase of the Enlightenment, contended that (a) revelation is real, but its content is not different from that of natural religion in general and that (b) reason may eliminate those doctrines of Christian revelation that are not identical with reason. Rationalism, however, (a) agreed that reason establishes the criteria to judge revelation but (b) contended that reason's criteria prove revelation to be false, leaving reason to exist alone. Publicly Reimarus followed Wolff in saying that natural religion prepares for Christianity; privately he joined rationalism in saying that natural religion replaces Christianity. Wolff held that there are certain criteria by which any alleged revelation must be tested: First, revelation must be necessary, containing knowledge available only by miraculous means. Second, it must be free from contradictions. Privately Reimarus took Wolff's criteria and applied them to Christian origins, as set forth in the four Gospels and Acts, to show that it is possible to trace the natural origins of Christianity and that the supposed revelation is filled with contradictions. Reason's criteria thereby undermine the claims of the alleged Christian revelation.

Reimarus accepted the traditional view that Matthew and John were written by eyewitnesses, while Mark and Luke were not. He claimed that the evangelists constructed their own picture of Jesus after his death, but that they left, unintentionally and through sheer carelessness, traces of the historical reality of Jesus. From these traces one can see that Jesus did not espouse the three central doctrines of Christianity: spiritual deliverance through the suffering and death of Christ (atonement), Christ's bodily resurrection from the dead, and Christ's speedy return for reward and punishment. Jesus saw himself as a worldly Messiah, but his disciples turned him into a spiritual Savior after his death for economic reasons. It requires no miracles to explain the development of Christian origins; furthermore, the historical facts of Jesus' career contradict the claims made for him by his disciples after his death. Other contradictions are everywhere apparent, e.g., Matthew and John make no mention of the appearance on the road to Emmaus as Luke 24:13-32 does; Matthew knows nothing of the appearance in Jerusalem that is found in Luke 24:36-49; John and Matthew do not report Jesus' ascension as Luke 24:51 does; Mark 16:1 says the women buy spices when the feast day is past, whereas Luke 23:56 has them buy the spices in the evening before the feast day; Matthew and Mark report only one angel at the tomb, while Luke 24:4 says there were two. Reimarus used Luke only to illustrate contradictions in the Gospel accounts, contradictions that he believed show the falsity of the alleged Christian revelation.

Reimarus wrote as an academic, not a cleric, expressing his personal doubts in the form of an apology focused, not at the enemies of the church, but at Christianity itself. He sought to disprove its claims to have received truth through revelation. His interpretation of Luke, the other Gospels, and Acts both denied their essential historicity and exposed their creation by Jesus' disciples after his death. Reimarus is so important for biblical interpretation because on these two points his work set the stage for the subsequent interpretation of Luke and the other Gospels up to our day.

5. The Interpretation of Luke in the Modern World. Since 1800, interpretation of the Gospels, including Luke, has followed two very different lines. On the one hand, in response to Reimarus's denial of the essential historicity of the Gospel accounts (later reinforced by D. F. Strauss), there has been a drive to establish the historical basis of the tradition by means of source analysis and by appeals to authorship and ARCHAEOLOGY: the quest of the historians' Jesus. On the other hand, there has also been an attempt to interpret the meaning of the Gospels in their final form by relating the tendency of each to its historical context or occasion: the quest of the evangelists' theology. The different ways Luke has been interpreted since 1800 have depended on which of these two approaches has been applied to the Gospel at any given time.

The impetus to establish the historical basis of the tradition about Jesus was sometimes undertaken on behalf of the aims of orthodox Christianity in the belief that, if the historicity of the tradition was validated, it would confirm the picture of Jesus in the Gospels. Sometimes the impetus came from the desire to overthrow Chalcedonian christology in the belief that the historical tradition behind the Gospels would reveal a Jesus more intelligible to modern times, a Jesus of obvious moral superiority to all others and, therefore, self-validating to the modern conscience. Exponents of the latter approach to scholarship as it applies to Luke include A. von HARNACK (1907, 1908), W. RAMSAY (1905, 1915), B. STREETER (1924), and V. TAYLOR (1926, 1972).

In order to reestablish the value of the Lukan writings as historical authorities, von Harnack (1907) sought to prove that the Third Gospel and Acts were written by a fellow worker of Paul, Luke the physician. Von Harnack then (1908) reconstructed Q from Matthew and Luke, concluding that Q was a document of the apostolic epoch, more ancient than Mark and composed in Palestine. Ramsay took what is perhaps the most historically dubious passage in the NT, Luke 2:1-4, and attempted to establish its essential historicity on the basis of contemporary discoveries in Egypt that seemed to indicate a system of periodic enrollments in Syria and the East generally. Streeter, assuming the two source theory, argued for the existence of Proto-Luke, a synthesis of Q + L that was, in fact, a complete Gospel prior to the composition of the Third Gospel. Proto-Luke appears to have been a document independent of Mark and approximately of the same date—a conclusion Streeter believed to be of considerable moment to the historian. Taylor contended that behind the Third Gospel's passion narrative was a special source, an authority as old as Mark but independent of the Second Gospel. Such an independent pre-Lukan passion narrative would assist the historian in reconstructing the events of Jesus' final days.

The focus of all these efforts was to use the Third Gospel as a window through which to view something other than the Lukan text; interpretation consisted of treating Luke as a mine from which one could dig the ore of pre-Lukan historical tradition. This concern persists—in part at least—in I. Marshall (1978) and J. Nolland (1989, 1993a, 1993b), doubtless due to the authors' evangelical Christian conviction that "faith follows not feeling but fact." Since Luke was regarded as a secondary source by this line of interpretation, moreover, the Third Gospel received considerably less attention from scholars pursuing the quest of the historical Jesus than did Mark.

The attempt to interpret each of the Gospels in its final form was, initially at least, based on the assumption that the true meaning of a Gospel is determined by discerning its place in the historical development of early Christianity, as opposed to its canonical context (see CANON OF THE BIBLE). Interpretation, therefore, took the form of a history of early Christianity. F. C. BAUR, in the first half of the nineteenth century, is the epitome of this approach. Assuming J. J. GRIESBACH's order of the Gospels, with Matthew first, then Luke, and finally Mark, Baur read Luke as a reinterpretation of Matthew from a Pauline perspective. The Gospel of Luke arose in its final form after 70 CE, motivated by the party relationships of that period. Luke's universalistic tendency was a Pauline antithesis to the particularism of the Jewish Christian Matthew; it was related to an alleged occasion in the historical development of early Christianity. Thus interpretation of Luke consists of the act of bringing tendency and occasion together. For Baur, such interpretive activity must be accompanied by indifference to result and freedom from subjectivity, the shining goal toward which every true scholar presses. It never occurred to the university-based Baur that his Hegelian presuppositions were a significant component of his own subjectivity.

R. BULTMANN's view of Luke in his Theology of the NT (1948–53; ET vol. 1, 1951) represents both continuity and discontinuity with the interpretive scheme of Baur. Like Baur, Bultmann was concerned to set the Third Gospel in its historical context. The tendency of Luke and its companion volume, Acts, is to substitute a history of salvation for the primitive Christian imminent eschatology. The occasion is the delay of the parousia in early Christianity at the end of the first century. Faced with disappointments arising from the delay, the Third Evangelist told the story of Jesus as part of a history of salvation in which the gift of the Holy Spirit replaces the imminent end. Unlike Baur, Bultmann then engaged in content criticism: The NT contains two strata, the first embodying the early eschatological kerygma, the second reflecting an early Catholic fall away from the truth. Paul and John's Gospel represent the authentic stratum; Luke, among others, belongs to the early Catholic distortion of the original Gospel and as such does not have the same normative quality for the church that Paul and the Fourth Gospel have. Interpretation for Bultmann began with discerning Luke's alleged tendency and setting it in connection with an alleged occasion; it finished with a critical appraisal of the value of Luke's tendency for Christian faith.

H. Conzelmann (1960) further developed Bultmann's view of Luke as an account of Jesus that eliminates imminent eschatology in response to the delayed parousia, although he refused to relegate Luke to early Catholicism (1969). Conzelmann's contribution lies in the methodology proposed to discern the Lukan tendency. By noting Luke's departures from his primary source, Mark, and by paying special attention to the overall narrative framework or pattern of arrangement, one can discern the Lukan tendency. This became, with some fine-tuning, the method of REDACTION CRITICISM that dominated Lukan studies for more than a generation. Even where the overall Bultmannian picture of Lukan theology is resisted, as in the commentaries by Marshall (1978), J. FITZMYER (1981, 1985), and Nolland (1989, 1993a, 1993b), the German redaction-critical method is assumed. F. Bovon (1987) summarizes the results of such redaction-critical study of Luke under the headings plan of God, the interpretation of the OT, christology, Holy Spirit, salvation, reception of salvation, and church.

At the end of the twentieth century, interpretation of Luke reflects a multiplicity of methods and approaches. In addition to those carried over from the past, five interpretive options may be mentioned in a logical, not chronological, order.

a. Interpreting Luke in light of Mediterranean parallels. From 1973 to 1983 the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE's Luke-Acts Group (1973–78) and Seminar (1979–83) broke with the construct of Conzelmann and developed an approach to Luke more akin to that of H. CADBURY (1927). Like Conzelmann, Cadbury assumed the two source theory and viewed Luke as a reinterpretation of Mark. Unlike Conzelmann, he did not believe it possible to detect a single dominating occasion for Luke's Gospel or a singular purpose formulated consciously in response to it; he was concerned to set Luke's literary techniques, no less than his theology, in relation to parallels from the Mediterranean world. The Luke-Acts working groups likewise eschewed an approach that depended on a dominant conception of the development of early Christianity and opted for a method of interpretation that depended heavily on parallels, especially literary ones, from the Mediterranean world. Perspectives on Luke–Acts (1978) and Luke–Acts: New Perspectives from the Society of Biblical Literature Seminar (1983), both edited by C. Talbert, reflect an approach that sees interpretation primarily as setting what is said in Luke and how it is said by Luke in its immediate context in Mediterranean antiquity. The Mediterranean milieu allows one to determine how Luke would have been heard by an ancient auditor and, therefore, to discern what it would have meant to him or her. The focus is on what Luke meant in the context of his own time. This stream of interpretation has yielded monographs like that of S. Garrett (1989) and a commentary by Talbert (1982).

b. Interpreting Luke in light of non-biblical literary criticism. The older New Criticism has been supplanted by a NARRATIVE CRITICISM based on a communications model like that of R. Jakobson, which regards texts as mirrors rather than windows. This way of reading focuses on the final form of the text and concentrates on such matters as plot, characters, and type of narration by an implied author. Something of the method was presented to historically oriented NT scholars by N. Petersen (1978). This type of literary study is devoid of references to the Mediterranean environment just as was that of the New Criticism; thus the narrative world of the Gospel text is abstracted from its time and place. This type of reading has borne fruit in monographs like that of D. Gowler (1991), which deals with the matter of characterization, and in the commentary by R. Tannehill (1986), a combination of New Criticism and modern narrative criticism in which there is an almost total lack of references to Mediterranean sources outside the Bible. Tannehill's thesis is that the author of Luke–Acts consciously understood the story of Jesus and his followers as unified by the controlling purpose of God.

c. Interpreting Luke in light of anthropological and sociological models. J. Neyrey's edited collection (1991) is concerned with the question, What is the social system assumed by Luke? Issues addressed include: What is the typical economic system in a peasant society? What are the features of patron/client relations? What is the relation between city and countryside? Who benefits from labeling another as deviant? How do honor and shame operate in Mediterranean society? Given these questions and their answers, where does Luke fit and how does he react?

d. Interpreting Luke in the context of ancient liturgical practices. M. Goulder (1978, 1989) contends that Luke wrote his Gospel as a cycle of liturgical/Gospel readings to be used throughout the year in Christian worship as fulfillments of the HB lections then existent in the synagogues.

e. Interpreting Luke in the context of the canon. B. CHILDS (1985) reflects what has come to be called CANONICAL CRITICISM. This approach tries to take account of the fact that as a result of the canonization process a new and larger context has been effected for originally independent material. Luke, for example, cannot be read canonically if it is interpreted in isolation from the other three Gospels. Read in connection with them, Luke can neither become part of a complete harmony of the Gospels (as with Tatian) nor be sifted to discover the real Jesus behind the levels of accretion (as with the quest of the historical Jesus). The plural form remains constitutive for the canonical critic, so the Lukan Gospel must be read as part of the canonical four. A large segment of Childs's book is given over to "A Canonical Harmony of the Gospels," in which he treats the final form of the text of Luke in its individuality but alongside the other Gospels read in the same way. Childs refuses either to harmonize or to attempt to establish the historical events behind the Lukan text.

In large measure the diversity of methods proposed for interpreting Luke today is rooted in biblical scholars' openness to currents in fields outside biblical studies. Their inability to choose among the multiplicity of methods derives largely from the confusion over which community they represent: church or academy. What may be appropriate for the one may not always be appropriate for the other, as F. Dreyfus (1975) has convincingly shown. One's community determines what questions are deemed appropriate to ask of the text; methods of interpretation are chosen and/or developed in order to answer such questions. If there is anything the history of interpretation of Luke teaches us, it is this.

Bibliography: Augustine, The Harmony of the Gospels (NPNF, 1st ser. 6, 1956). F. C. Baur, Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien ihr Verhaltnis zu einander ihren Charakter und Ursprung (1847). F. Bovon, Luke the Theologian: Thirty-Three Years of Research (1950–83) (PTMS 12, rev. ET 1987). H. J. Cadbury, The Making of Luke–Acts (1927). J. Calvin, A Harmony of the Gospels (ed. T. F. Torrance, 3 vols., 1972). B. S. Childs, The NT as Canon: An Introduction (1985). H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke (1960); An Outline of the Theology of the NT (1969). Cyril of Alexandria, Commentary on the Gospel of Luke (ed. R. P. Smith, 1983). F. Dreyfus, "Exégèse en Sorbonne, Exégèse en Église," RB 81 (1975) 321-59. J. A. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I–IX (AB 28, 1981); The Gospel According to Luke XX–XXIV (AB 28a, 1985). S. R. Garrett, The Demise of the Devil: Magic and the Demonic in Luke's Writings (1989). J. A. Giles (ed.), Venerabilis Bedae Commentaria in Scripturas Sacras (1884). M. D. Goulder, The Evangelists' Calendar: A Lectionary Explanation of the Development of Scripture (1978); Luke: A New Paradigm (1989). D. B. Gowler, Host, Guest, Enemy and Friend: Portraits of the Pharisees in Luke and Acts (1991). A. von Harnack, Luke the Physician: The Author of the Third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles (NT Studies, 1907); The Sayings of Jesus: The Second Source of St. Matthew and St. Luke (NT Studies 2, 1908). I. H. Marshall, The Gospel of Luke (NIGTC, 1978). J. Neyrey (ed.), The Social World of Luke–Acts: Models for Interpretation (1991). J. Nolland, Luke 1–9:20 (WBC 35A, 1989); Luke 9:21–18:34 (WBC 35B, 1993a); Luke 18:35–24:53 (WBC 35C, 1993b). N. R. Petersen, Literary Criticism for NT Critics (1978). A. Rabil, Jr., Erasmus and the NT (TUMSR 1, 1972). W. M. Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? A Study of the Credibility of St. Luke (1905); The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the NT (1915). M. Rese, "Das Lukas-Evangelium: Ein Forschungsbericht," ANRW II.25.3 (1986) 2258-328. E. Rummel, Erasmus' Annotations on the NT: From Philologist to Theologian (1986). A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (1910). B. Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins, Treating of the Manuscript Tradition, Sources, Authorship, and Date (1924). C. H. Talbert (ed.), Reimarus: Fragments (1970); Perspectives on Luke–Acts (1978); Reading Luke: A Literary and Theological Commentary on the Third Gospel (1982); Luke–Acts: New Perspectives from the Society of Biblical Literature Seminar (1983). R. C. Tannehill, The Narrative Unity of Luke–Acts: A Literary Interpretation, vol. 1, The Gospel According to Luke (1986). V. Taylor, Behind the Third Gospel: A Study of the Proto-Luke Hypothesis (1926); The Passion Narrative of St. Luke: A Critical and Historical Investigation (1972). Tertullian, Against Marcion (ANF 3, 1957).

C. H. TALBERT

LUTHER, MARTIN (1483–1546)

Born in Eisleben, where he also died, L. studied the liberal arts at the University of Erfurt. In 1505, shortly after his matriculation in the faculty of law, he abandoned legal studies and entered the Observant cloister of the Hermits of St. Augustine. With the encouragement of the vicar-general, J. von Staupitz (c. 1469–1524), L. pursued the study of theology at Erfurt and Wittenberg, inheriting in 1512 Staupitz's chair as professor in Biblia on the theological faculty of the University of Wittenberg.

L. later claimed that the principal influence on his earliest philosophy and theology was Ockamist. Although the evidence for such influence is ambiguous, it is clear that he read two of the chief disciples of William of Ockham (c. 1285–1347): the French theologian P. d'Ailly (1350–1420) and the German Ockamist G. BIEL. Through d'Ailly, L. also read selections from the former general of the Augustinian Hermits, the strongly Augustinian theologian Gregory of Rimini (d. 1358). More important still was the influence of von Staupitz, whose serene Augustinian piety prompted L. to rethink his views on election, temptation, grace, and penance.

Sometime during the course of his early study and teaching (scholars are sharply divided over the exact date of the shift in his theological perspective), L. came to the conclusion that the medieval church's understanding of justification was fundamentally flawed and at odds with biblical teaching, especially the teaching of PAUL. He became convinced that the justification of sinners takes place through faith alone and not through faith and good works. L. did not abandon good works; he did, however, discount them as even a partial ground for justification. The ungodly are justified before God by a righteousness entirely alien to them—that is, by the righteousness of JESUS Christ. This righteousness is reckoned or imputed to them when they abandon their own self-righteousness and put their trust in the gospel. While L.'s teaching represented a break with the Augustinian tradition of the Latin Middle Ages, he nevertheless felt that his insight was confirmed by AUGUSTINE's writings.

L.'s first major exegetical effort was a series of lectures on the psalms, the so-called Dictata super Psalterium (1513–15). These lectures provide early evidence of his changing perspective on the doctrine of justification as well as an unusually complete picture of his HERMENEUTIC at the beginning of his theological career. L. began with the QUADRIGA, or fourfold sense of Scripture; but although he seasoned his lectures with occasional allegorical readings, he was not particularly interested in the allegorical or anagogical senses. His primary concern was the literal and tropological meanings of the various psalms.

By L.'s time the literal sense was understood to include both the unfolding historical narrative (the literal-historical sense) and whatever typological meanings were foreshadowed in the story (the literal-prophetic sense). Since medieval interpreters agreed that David was a prophet (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), they believed that he sang, not only about his own historical circumstances, but also about the coming Christ. For L. as for many earlier exegetes the literal sense that mattered most was the literal-prophetic sense. The psalms were about Christ—unless there was some overwhelming exegetical reason to think a particular psalm was not.

Furthermore, the tropological or moral sense of the text was regarded as the meaning directed toward the individual. Traditional exegesis understood the tropological sense to be the meaning of the text concerned with the nurture and practice of the infused virtue of charity. L. suggested instead that the tropological sense was the meaning of the text concerned with faith, understood, not as correct belief, but as trust in the promises of God. By stressing the tropological sense of the text (the meaning that evokes and nurtures faith) and the literal-prophetic sense (the meaning that centers on Christ), L. concentrated his exegesis on the relationship between Christ and the believing self. While he later abandoned the Quadriga, he continued to emphasize the connection between the Bible—christologically understood—and faith. Scripture is the swaddling clothes of the Christ child, he maintained; no biblical learning is useful if this treasure is missed.

As a principal leader of the emerging Protestant movement, L. continued to lecture, to preach, and to write expositions of Scripture. One of his primary tasks was to translate the Bible into the vernacular, beginning with the NT. He worked from the original Greek and Hebrew, making use of the grammars, editions, and lexical aids provided by the humanists; however, correct TRANSLATION was never for L. a matter of grammar and philology alone. The delicate art of translation could never be safely left by the church to grammarians, who understood the form but not necessarily the substance of the text; nor was it a fit task for a clerical drudge or for translators with a tin ear for the idioms and rhythms of their native tongue. Thus L. set about to make David sing in German like a Christian because the theological meaning of the text as he understood it required him to do so.

The Bible contained for L. both law and gospel, both demand and promise. The law drives sinners toward Christ, but only the gospel can comfort their anxieties with the good news of justification by faith alone. It is not the case that the OT contains only law and the NT only gospel. Law and gospel stand in a dialectical relationship to each other throughout both testaments; in the final analysis the historical situation of sinners before God remains the same in both testaments. Abraham and Sarah stood in exactly the same relationship to God as did Paul and Silas, threatened by the same law and comforted by the same gospel.

Believing that the dialectic of law and gospel links past to present in a direct way, L. felt free to amplify the often spare biblical narratives with details drawn from his own world. One of the most striking characteristics of his preaching (evident also in his magisterial commentary on Genesis) was his imaginative recreation and amplification of the biblical stories. He made the biblical text real by making it local, briefing his readers on the deep background of the stories, suggesting psychological motivations for the actions of the principal characters, and fitting the elements of the plot into the larger narrative of the unfolding purposes of God. Because he believed that the human situation before God remained the same from age to age, L. treated the biblical characters like familiar neighbors from Wittenberg, driven by the same passions, nurtured by the same hopes, and disappointed by the same illusions. By doing so he enfolded the citizens of Wittenberg who heard him preach back into the biblical narrative.

L.'s emphasis on the christological center of Scripture and on the teaching of justification by faith alone led him to reopen briefly the question of CANON. For a time he wanted to separate texts like James that did not teach justification by faith alone from the "really main books" like Romans and 1 Peter. While he soon gave up any thought of revising the canon, he always retained the notion that the biblical books are of unequal value, that the Bible should be interpreted from its christological center, and that sacred Scripture is its own best interpreter and critic.

Works: D. M. L.s Werke: Kritische Gesamtausgabe (1883–); LW (55 vols., 1955–86).

Bibliography: P. Althaus, The Theology of M. L. (1962; ET 1966). H. Bornkamm, Luther and the OT (1948; ET 1969). G. Ebeling, L.: An Introduction to His Thought (1964; ET 1970); Lutherstudien I (1971). K. Hagen, HHMBI, 212-20. E. C. Merkel and R. Kues (eds.), M. L.: Rückblick, Einblick, Ausblick (1997). H. A. Oberman, L.: Man Between God and the Devil (1982; ET 1989). J. S. Preus, From Shadow to Promise: OT Interpretation from Augustine to the Young L. (1969). D. C. Steinmetz, L. and Staupitz: An Essay in the Intellectural Origins of the Protestant Reformation (DMMRS 4, 1980); L. in Context (1986). E. Vogelsang, Die Anfänge von L.'s Christologie nach der ersten Psalmenvorlesung (1929).

D. C. STEINMETZ

LUZZATTO, SAMUEL DAVID (1800–65)

Born in Trieste, Italy, to a scion of Jewish scholars, L. was a child prodigy who mastered Hebrew and Bible early and studied TALMUD, classical and modern languages, and philosophy in his teens. By 1817 he had written a Hebrew treatise arguing the then radical thesis that the Masoretic pointing of the HB was post-biblical. He developed a strong interest in the Aramaic TARGUM (rendering) of the Torah, for which he also learned Syriac, then a unique endeavor for a Jew. In 1825 he published a study of Targum Onqelos's method together with a short Syriac grammar. When the first modern rabbinical seminary was founded in Padua in 1829, L. was appointed to its two-man faculty. He wrote full-length commentaries on the Torah and Isaiah, and other commentaries (on Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Proverbs, and Job) and grammatical works grew largely out of his class notes. Incisive Hebrew philology characterized all his studies. Although hardship prevented him from consolidating his prolific writing in Italian and Hebrew into books, much of his work was collected and printed posthumously.

L. believed in most of the Jewish traditions about the Bible, the Pentateuch in particular. Although quite modern in many respects, he harmonized the Torah's laws with classical Jewish interpretation, supporting most of his positions with critical argumentation. For example, although accepting Moses' authorship of the Torah against the claim of the Roman Catholic scholar R. SIMON that only the Torah's laws were Mosaic, L. pointed to the integration of such laws as those concerning the sabbath with the Pentateuchal narrative. On the other hand, he held that many psalms were post-Davidic and that Ecclesiastes was centuries later than Solomon. He trusted that scribes had conserved the text of the Torah accurately, although he occasionally challenged its Masoretic accentuation. He did not attribute the same surfeit of care to the transmission of the Prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and the Writings. Alert to variants from the MT in the ancient versions, L. became the first Jewish scholar to emend the Bible. For example, to form an apt parallel to Isa 10:25*a*, he divided tblytm in v. 25*b* to read "tēbēl yittōm," "And my anger against the earth will cease." For contextual reasons he read brwk in problematic Ezek 3:12 as brwm, "when [the Lord's aura] lifted," explaining the scribal confusion of k and m on the basis of their similarity in archaic Hebrew script. Through his influence on A. GEIGER and A. EHRLICH, many of L.'s proposals have become standard among scholars.

In the foreword to his Isaiah translation and commentary, L. delineated ten hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) for the believing Jewish exegete. He maintained among other things that the biblicist must not only master Hebrew idiom and style but must also share in the Bible's conceptual framework, including the reality of miracles and prophetic revelation. Thus, L. contended that Isaiah 40–66 was composed prophetically by the late eighth-century Isaiah to be delivered to the sixth-century Babylonian exiles. He opposed rationalistic approaches like those of MAIMONIDES and A. IBN EZRA as contrary to the Bible's spirit. Inclining to the commentaries of RASHI and I. ABRAVANEL, he often reiterated that the Bible rests on faith, not reason.

L. formulated the Torah's theology and didactic program in Yĕsôdê hattôrā(h) and incorporated it in his Pentateuch commentary. The Torah purports to hallow and humanize life through its commandments and to instill precepts and values, not science, through its narratives; Genesis, accordingly, does not teach a timeless scientific account of creation. L. adopted the ancient rabbinic tenet that "the Torah speaks in human idiom" (see on Gen 1:1); and he often drew on his anthropological understanding of the ancient mind, e.g., his teaching that God created light before the sun to remove the grounds on which pagans worshiped the sun as a source of light and warmth. The Torah, in L.'s view, capitalized on the primitive belief that the smoke rising from a sacrifice conveys the offering to heaven and superimposed upon it a ritual system for inculcating ethics and consciousness of God. The cult was centralized, not, as Maimonides contended, to control it, but to strengthen Israel's national unity. While L. saw the sabbath and the pilgrimage festivals as serving the same socioreligious goal, he also held that monotheism would promote world harmony.

Works: 'Ôhēb gēr (1825; repr. 1974); Prolegomeni ad una grammatica ragionata della lingua ebraica (1836); Bêt ha 'ôṣār (3 vols., 1847–89); Wiqqûaḥ 'al ḥokmat haqqabbālā(h) (1852); Grammatica della lingua ebraica (1853–69; HEB 1901); Sēpēr yēś'a'ya(h) mēetûrgām 'îtalqît ûmēpôraś 'ibrît (1855–67); Elementi grammaticali del Caldeo Biblico e del dialetto talmudico Babilonese (1865); Ḥămîśā(h) ḥûmś'ê tôrā(h) mētûrgāmîm 'îtalqît ûmepôrāś'îm 'ibrît (5 vols., 1870–76); Introduzione critica et ermeneotica al Pentateuco (1870; ET "A Crticial and Hermeneutical Introduction to the Pentateuch," Italian Hebrew Literature [S. Morais, 1926] 93-152); Pêrûsîm 'al yirmēyā(h), yēḥezqē'l, mišlê wē'iyyôb (1876); Sēpēr yēsôdê hattôrā(h) (1880, repr. 1947; ET "The Foundations of the Torah," Luzzatto's Ethico Psychological Interpretation of Judaism [tr. N. H. Rosenbloom, 1965] 145-209); Penînê ś'adal (1888); Pêrûs 'al ḥamîś'ā(h) ḥûmś'ê tôrā(h) (ed. P. Schlesinger, 1965); Kĕtûbîm (ed. M. E. Artom, 2 vols., 1976).

Bibliography: I. Abrahams, "S. D. L. as Exegete," JQR 57 (1966) 83-100. M. Bar Yashar, "Parsanût sadal lammigra,' " Maḥaraim 4 (1992) 322-29. I. M. Elbogen, "S. D. L.s Stellung zur Bibelkritik," MGWJ 44 (1900) 460-80. L. Kaplan, "Scholarly Non-Traditional Fundamentalism: On S. D. L.'s Approach to the Bible," CJud 35, 2 (1981/82) 15-25. N. Klotz, S. D. L. als Bibelexeget (1925). M. B. Margolies, S. D. L.: Traditionalist Scholar (1979).

E. L. GREENSTEIN

M

MACCABEES, FIRST BOOK OF

Ta Makkabaika (The Things Maccabean) was the designation for both 1 and 2 Maccabees by the second century CE. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 195 CE) terms 1 Maccabees to Biblion tōn Makkabaikōn (The Book of Things Maccabean), and 2 Maccabees hē tōn Makkabaikōn epitomē (The Epitome of Things Maccabean). Most Greek manuscripts term the books Makkabaiōn A' and Makkabaiōn B'. These are certainly not the original titles. According to ORIGEN (quoted in Eusebius Hist. eccl. 6.25.2), the original Hebrew title of 1 Maccabees was Sarbethsabaniel. This title has been interpreted as śar bêt 'ēl (Official of the House of God), somehow corrupted, or sfar bet sabanai'el. In any case, it is difficult to interpret this title (for possible translations, see E. Schürer [1986] 182).

First Maccabees presents an account of the history of Judea from 175 to 135/34 BCE. It describes the background of the Maccabean revolt against the Seleucid Greeks, the revolt itself, the exploits of Judah the Maccabee, and the efforts of his brothers Jonathan and Simon to reestablish permanently Jewish nationhood and to strengthen religious practice.

The author was clearly a believing Jew who points to the piety of the Hasmoneans (the Maccabean family) and their trust in God. Judah's piety is especially emphasized in his prayers and speeches. At the same time the author gives full credit for the Hasmoneans' success to their sagacity and tenaciousness. He sees this family as specially selected by God to bring about the deliverance of Israel from the Seleucids, and he chronicles their lives as if he were an official historian of the dynasty (called "the state historian of the Maccabean dynasty" by A. GEIGER, Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel [1857] 206]). He represents the Maccabees as emulating various biblical figures, thus enabling them to provide charismatic leadership. In contrast to the heroes, the opponents of the Maccabees are "lawless men," motivated only by the basest of motives and allied against the way of God's Torah.

Numerous documents are included in this work to prove the authenticity of Hasmonean rule within the context of the Seleucid Empire and contemporary international law. In addition, the author has included various poetic extracts from contemporary compositions in circulation (see G. Neuhaus [1974]). Beyond this, the various theories regarding the sources of 1 Maccabees are speculative (for the debate, see K.-D. Shunck [1954] and Neuhaus).

The author of 1 Maccabees was certainly influenced by the style of biblical historiography, and he incorporated certain written sources into his composition. Further, he was extremely familiar with the practices of the Seleucid Empire. He regularly gives dates in accord with the Seleucid era (see L. Grabbe [1991] for issues of chronology). On the other hand, he seems to exaggerate numbers greatly and takes the opportunity, like all historians of his period, to place speeches in the mouths of his heroes. It is generally agreed that 1 Maccabees is earlier and more trustworthy than 2 Maccabees, although in certain respects the evidence and approach of 2 Maccabees must be preferred (see B. Niese [1900]).

Virtually all scholars agree that the book had to have been written before the Roman conquest of Judea in 63 BCE, since the Romans are here presented as friends and allies of the Hasmonean Empire. The author's knowledge of the period of John Hyrcanus requires that he wrote not much before John's death in 104 BCE. The most probable dating for the composition of 1 Maccabees, therefore, is the first decades of the first century BCE. J. Goldstein dates the composition to the reign of Alexander Janneus (103–76 BCE) but not later than 90 BCE (1976, 62-64). S. Zeitlin (1950, 27-33) argued that the last two chapters were late additions made after the fall of the Temple in 70 CE.

First Maccabees was apparently composed in Hebrew in a style imitating that of biblical historiography. JEROME reported seeing a Hebrew version ("Preface to the Books of Samuel and Kings" [in NPNF 2, 6.489]). Translated into Greek, it was known to JOSEPHUS, who used it as the basis of his account in Antiquities. Possibly the end of the book was not available to Josephus, since he seems to have lacked adequate sources for the reign of Simon. Knowledge of this book was widespread among the church fathers; yet, the contents of 1 Maccabees began to circulate among Jews only during the Middle Ages, indirectly through the Latin translation. The book, like 2 Maccabees, must be sharply distinguished from the medieval Megillat Antiochus (Scroll of Antiochus) or Megillat Hashmonaim (Scroll of the Hasmoneans) first mentioned by SAADIA Gaon (882–942 CE).

The books of Maccabees were preserved in the Christian tradition in Greek and were never part of the Jewish CANON. First Maccabees is missing from Codex Vaticanus but present in the other Greek uncial codices. It appears in an OL version in VULGATE texts not produced by Jerome and in two Syriac recensions.

First and Second Maccabees, along with Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, and the additions to Daniel and Esther, part of the canon in Roman Catholic and Orthodox Bibles, are not in the HB and were never considered authoritative by Jews. Differences of opinion already existed in the early church over the issue of including writings in the OT not found in the HB and reached a decisive point in the sixteenth century. In the early patristic period these works were quoted by IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, Cyprian, and others without distinguishing them from books found in the HB—that is, as Scripture. In the fourth century some Greek fathers (Eusebius, Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus, and others) raised questions about the works' status. Jerome came to distinguish the libri canonici (works in the HB) from the libri ecclesiastici (works not in the HB but found in the OL and OG Bibles). He applied the old term Apocrypha (hidden, secret) to the latter and indicated that these works should be read and used for edification but not for establishing doctrine (see his Preface to Solomon's Books).

In the Western church AUGUSTINE (see On Christian Doctrine 2.8.12-13) was a strong supporter of the larger OT canon that was recognized in regional councils at Hippo (393 CE) and at Carthage (397 and 419 CE). Acceptance of the inclusive canon was the dominant view throughout the Middle Ages, although a number of interpreters (W. Strabo, Hugh of St. Victor, Hugh of St. Cher, Nicholas of Lyra, J. Wyclif) had doubts about the AUTHORITY of the libri ecclesiastici. In spite of the confirmation of the inclusive canon by the Council of Florence in 1442, some scholars, e.g., T. CAJETAN and JIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS, still placed the "apocryphal" writings on a secondary level. The latter wrote in the second preface (to the reader) of the Complutensian POLYGLOT that these works were received by the church "only for the edification of the people rather than for confirming the authority of the church's teaching." Catholic Bibles published in Germany (1527) and France (1530) contained only the shorter HB.

Protestants broke with the dominant tradition and declared as canonical OT only those works present in the HB (but in a different order). LUTHER, who opposed the concept of purgatory, and who was defended by J. Maier of Eck (1486–1543) in their 1519 debates using texts from 2 Maccabees (see the following article), supported the shorter OT canon. In 1520 A. von KARLSTADT wrote two works defending what came to be called the Protestant OT canon. In its fourth session (Apr. 8, 1546), the Council of Trent declared 1 and 2 Maccabees along with the other libri ecclesiastici to be canonical and placed under anathema those who objected. Early Protestant Bibles generally contained but separated these works from the OT and NT, often declaring them beneficial for the faithful to read but denying their authoritative status. (The 1648 Westminster Confession declared them of no more value "than any other human writings.") A Jewish convert to Christianity, Sixtus of Siena (1520–69), in his 1566 Bibliotheca sacra, designated these disputed books as "deuterocanonical," a term widely used in modern times.

The books of Maccabees have not received much attention throughout most of history, although the Maccabean rededication of the Temple (1 Macc 4:36-59) forms the basis of the Jewish festival of Hanukkah and Maccabean martyrs were commemorated in the Christian church. The first full commentary on Maccabees was written by RABANUS MAURUS (partially published in PL 109 [1851] 1125-256) and was excerpted for the GLOSSA ORDINARIA.

Luther actually held 1 Maccabees in high regard. In the preface to his 1536 translation he wrote: "This is another of those books not included in the Hebrew Scriptures, although in its discourses and description it almost equals the other sacred books of Scripture, and would not have been unworthy to be reckoned among them, because it is a very necessary and useful book for the understanding of the prophet Daniel in the eleventh chapter."

Between the Reformation and the twentieth century, the books of Maccabees (and the entire apocryphal/deuterocanonical material) received noticeably less attention than the other biblical writings. (For a bibliography of translations, commentaries, etc., see J. Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica 2 [1861] 316-18.) During the 1740s, surprisingly, a lively debate on the historical trustworthiness of and the relationship between the two books led to a flurry of publications: E. Frölich, Annales compendiarii regum et rerum Syriae (1744); E. Wernsdorf, Prolusio de fontibus historiae Syriae in libris Maccabaeorum (1746); E. Frölich, De fontibus historiae Syriae in libris Maccabaeorum (1746); G. Wernsdorf, Commentatio historico-critica de fide librorum Maccabaeorum (1747); and anonymous (J. Khell?), Auctoritas utriusque libri Maccabaici canonico-historica asserta (1749).

Protestant antipathy toward the Apocrypha led to the decision (May 3, 1827) by the British and Foreign Bible Society to omit it from English-language editions. This exclusion lasted for well over a century, during which the general Protestant readership of the Bible did not have ready access to the Apocrypha and thus to the books of Maccabees.

With the development of historical-critical study of the Bible, primarily Protestant, in the late nineteenth century, the Apocrypha came more into purview. J. D. MICHAELIS published a translation and notes on 1 Maccabees in 1778; and J. G. EICHHORN published an introduction to the Apocrypha in 1795, as did W. DE WETTE.

An English translation of all the Maccabean literature was published by H. Cotton in 1835. (What he called "fifth Maccabees" is a late compilation extant in Arabic.) The standard nineteenth-century commentary on 1–2 Maccabees was that of C. Grimm in the Kurzgefasstes exegetisebes Handbuch zu den Apokryphen des Alten Testaments (1851–60). C. KEIL produced a major commentary in 1875, but it did not replace Grimm.

Interest at the turn of the twentieth century in the religious background of the NT led to the production of major works on the Apocrypha and PSEUDEPIGRAPHA: Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (2 vols., ed. E. Kautzsch, 1900) and The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT (2 vols., ed. R. H. Charles, 1912–13). These works remained standard volumes until the last quarter of the twentieth century.

The discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS created a renewed interest in early Jewish life and thought and in the background to Christian origins. With this went a renewed interest in such writings as the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha and their dissemination in modern translations in several languages.

Bibliography: F. M. Abel, Les livres des Maccabées (EB, 1949³). F. M. Abel and J. Starcky, Les livres des Maccabées (1961³). J. R. Bartlett, The First and Second Books of the Maccabees (1973); 1 Maccabees (Guides to the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha 5, 1998). E. J. Bickermann, The God of the Maccabees (1937; ET, SJLA 32, 1979). D. de Bruyne, Les anciennes traductions latines des Machabées (Anecdota Maredsolana 4, 1932). J. C. Dancy, A Commentary on I Maccabees (Blackwell's Theological Texts, 1954). R. Doran, "The First Book of Macabees," NIB (1996) 4:1-178. H. W. Ettelson, "The Integrity of I Maccabees," Transactions of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences 27 (1925) 249-384. T. Fischer, "First and Second Maccabees," ABD (1992) 4:439-50. J. A. Goldstein, 1 Maccabees (AB 43, 1976). L. L. Grabbe, "Maccabean Chronology: 167–164 or 168–165 BCE?" JBL 110 (1991) 59-74; Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian (2 vols., 1992) 439-50. M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in their Encounter in Palestine During the Early Hellenistic Period (WUNT 10 1969, 1973²; ET 1974). S. Meurer (ed.), The Apocrypha in Ecumenical Perspective (UBS.MS 6, 1991). G. O. Neuhaus, Studien zu den poetische Stücken in 1. Makkabäerbuch (FzB 12, 1974), "Quellen im 1. Makkabäerbuch? Eine Entgegnung auf die Analyse von K.-D. Schunck," JSJ 5 (1974) 162-75. B. Niese, Kritik der beiden Makkabäerbücher (1900). R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times with an Introduction to the Apocrypha (1949) 461-98. A. Schalit (ed.), The Hellenistic Age: Political History of Jewish Palestine from 332 BCE to 67 BCE (WHJP 6, 1972). K.-D. Schunck, Die Quellen des I. und II. Makkabäerbuches (1954). E. Schürer, HJPAJC 3.1 (1986) 180-85. S. Stein, "The Liturgy of Hanukkah and the First Two Books of Maccabees," JJS 5 (1954) 100-106, 148-55. V. Tcherikover, Hellenistic Civilization and the Jews (1966). J. C. VanderKam, "Hanukkah: Its Timing and Significance According to 1 and 2 Maccabees," JSP 1(1987) 23-40. S. Zeitlin and S. S. Tedesche, The First Book of Maccabees (Jewish Apocryphal Literature, 1950).

L. H. SCHIFFMAN

MACCABEES, SECOND BOOK OF

Second Maccabees opens with two letters (1:1-9; 1:10–2:18) and then presents a history of the Jewish community from the outbreak of the revolt against the Seleucids until the triumph of Judas over the general Nicanor in 161 BCE (3:1–15:39). The book thus presents a parallel history to the first part of 1 Maccabees (chaps. 1–7). Based on its style and ancient tradition, it was originally written in Greek. Evidence from some OL, but non-VULGATE, texts suggests translation from a text that differed from the standard LXX texts (see SEPTUAGINT).

Early use of 2 Maccabees was somewhat limited. Hebrews 11:35 seems to allude to 2 Maccabees 6–7 (especially 6:19, 28). JOSEPHUS apparently made no use of 2 Maccabees in his description of the period. Fourth Maccabees clearly builds upon the account of the martyrdoms in 2 Maccabees 7. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA cites 2 Macc 1:10 (Strom. 5.14.97).

Second Maccabees was used by early Christian exegetes as a mine for texts to support certain doctrines. ORIGEN appealed to 2 Macc 7:28 to support the idea of creation ex nihilo (Com. Jn. 1:17; On First Principles 2.1.5), and to 15:14 for the idea of the intercession of saints on behalf of the living (Com. Jn. 13:58; Homilies on Canticles 3). The death of the Jewish mother and her seven sons in 7:1-42 led to their extollment as Christian martyrs (see below on 4 Maccabees and J. van Henten [1997]).

The interpretation of 2 Maccabees in church history closely parallels that of 1 Maccabees. LUTHER and other Protestants, however, were more critical of Second than of First Maccabees. In his 1536 preface to the German translation, Luther wrote: "We tolerate it because of the beautiful history of the Maccabean seven martyrs and their mother, and other pieces. It is evident, however, that the writer was no great master, but produced a patchwork of various books; he has likewise a perplexing knot in ch. xiv, in Razis, who committed suicide, which was also troublesome to Augustine and other fathers. For such example is of no use, and is not to be commended, though it may be tolerated and charitably explained. It also describes the death of Antiochus, in ch. i, differently from 1 Macc. To sum it all up: Just as 1 Macc. deserves to be adopted in the number of sacred Scriptures, so 2 Macc. deserves to be thrown out, though there is something good in it." The idea of offering prayers and sacrifices on behalf of the dead (12:40-45) was repudiated by most Protestants.

Since the rise of historical-critical approaches to the study of the Bible, 1 and 2 Maccabees have been the subject of extensive investigation because these two books, plus Josephus's Jewish Antiquities, constitute the primary sources for reconstructing the nature and course of the Maccabean revolt. Differences between the books further complicate matters and indicate that they were not dependent on each other. Second Maccabees claims to be a summary or epitome of a five-volume work by a Jason of Cyrene (2:19-32). Although the vast majority of scholars take this claim seriously, it was challenged in the nineteenth century by W. KOSTERS (1878) and in the twentieth century by W. Richnow (1967, 41-42). The identity of this Jason remains uncertain, although some have proposed the Jason sent to Rome on a diplomatic mission by Judas Maccabeus (1 Macc 8:17). Also uncertain is how much of chaps. 3–15 derive from Jason and how much from the epitomizer.

Although sources probably underlie both books (as well as some eyewitness evidence), they are reconstructed only hypothetically (see K-D. Schunck [1954]; J. Bunge [1971]; and J. Goldstein [1983] 37-41). Goldstein has proposed that the two works were based on a common source. The various official documents quoted in 2 Maccabees are generally assumed to be genuine, though not necessarily correctly placed chronologically (see C. Habicht [1976]).

Second Maccabees offers a fuller and different account of the origin and course of the revolt in 3:1–5:27 (see L. Grabbe [1992] 1:247-56 for a survey of theories regarding the causes and origin of the revolt). Most modern reconstructions of the times rely primarily on 1 Maccabees but recognize that 2 Maccabees, in spite of its strong supernaturalism and miraculous events, is a far better historical source than earlier commentators imagined.

The relationship of the two (or three) letters at the beginning of 2 Maccabees to each other and to the remainder of the book has been a matter of dispute (see C. C. Torrey [1940]; R. Pfeiffer [1949]; B. Wacholder [1978]). Their purpose was to encourage the observance of the festival of the rededication of the Temple (Hanukkah). The date in 1:9 (124/23 BCE) indicates that the book was written after this date if the letter was incorporated by the epitomist, or else that the letter(s) was added by a later editor. A. Momigliano (1975) has proposed that the book was prepared about 124/23 BCE and sent to Alexandria to encourage support for the Jerusalem community and Temple (see R. Doran [1981] for the work's emphasis on the Temple).

Early critical study sought to assign 1 and 2 Maccabees to particular parties in Judaism. A. GEIGER wrote that "the two books . . . are party productions; the author of the first was a Sadducee, and a friend of the Maccabean dynasty, while the author or epitomizer of the second was a Pharisee, who looked upon the Maccabees with suspicion" (Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel [1857] 206). Modern scholars are not so convinced that one can determine party affiliation, although Goldstein argues that Jason wrote about 90 BCE in an effort to counter the pro-Hasmonean tendency of 1 Maccabees.

Bibliography: E. J. Bickermann, "Ein Festbrief vom Jahre 124 v. Chr. (II Macc 1:1-9)," ZNW 32 (1933) 233-54 = his Studies in Jewish and Christian History 2 (1980) 136-58. A. Büchler, Die Tobianden und die Oniaden im II. Makkabäerbuche und in der verwandten jüdische-hellenistischen Litteratur (1899). J. G. Bunge, "Untersuchungen zum zweiten Makkabäerbuch" (diss., Bonn University, 1971). R. Doran, "2 Maccabees and 'Tragic History,' " HUCA 50 (1979) 107-14; Temple Propaganda: The Purpose and Character of 2 Maccabees (CBQMS 12, 1981); "The Second Book of Maccabees," NIB (1996) 4:179-299. T. Fischer, Seleukiden und Makkabäer: Beiträge zur Seleukidengeschichte und zu den politischen Ereignissen in Judäa (1980). J. A. Goldstein, II Maccabees (AB 41A, 1983); "The Origins of the Doctrine of Creation Ex Nihilo," JJS 35 (1984) 127-35. L. L. Grabbe, "Maccabean Chronology: 167–164 or 168–165 BCE?" JBL 110 (1991) 59-74; Judaism from Cyrus to Hadrian (2 vols., 1992). C. Habicht, "Royal Documents in Maccabees II," HSCP 80 (1976) 1-18; JSHRZ 1 (1976) 167-285. J. W. van Henten, The Maccabean Martyrs as Saviours of the Jewish People: A Study of 2 and 4 Maccabees (JSJSup 57, 1997). U. Kellermann, Auferstanden in den Himmel: 2 Makkabäer 7 und die Auferstehung der Märtyrer (SBS 95, 1979). W. H. Kosters, "De Polemiek van het tweede boek der Makkabeën," Theologisch Tijdschrift 12 (1878) 491-558. R. Laqueur, Kritische Untersuchungen zum zweiten Makkabäerbuch (1904). A. Momigliano, "The Second Book of Maccabees," CP 70 (1975) 81-88. R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times with an Introduction to the Apocrypha (1949) 499-522. W. Richnow, Untersuchung zu Sprache und Stil des 2. Makkabäerbuch (1967). K.-D. Schunck, Die Quellen des I. und II. Makkabäerbuches (1954). E. Schürer, HJPAJC 3.1 (1986) 531-37. C. C. Torrey, "The Letters Prefixed to Second Maccabees," JAOS 60 (1940) 119-50. B. Z. Wacholder, "The Letter from Judah Maccabee to Aristobulus: Is 2 Maccabees 1:10b–2:18 Authentic?" HUCA 49 (1978) 89-133. S. Zeitlin and S. Tedesche, The Second Book of Maccabees (JAL, 1954). See also bibliography for 1 Maccabees.

L. H. SCHIFFMAN

MACCABEES, THIRD BOOK OF

This book relates the attempt of Ptolemy IV Philopator (221–205 BCE) to enter the holy of holies of the Jerusalem Temple on his way back from defeating Antiochus III (The Great) at Raphia (217 BCE). Unable to dissuade Ptolemy from his course, the Jews prayed to God, who paralyzed Ptolemy as he attempted to enter. (This account resembles the story of Heliodorus in 2 Macc 3:9-39.) Ptolemy returned to Egypt determined to avenge this affront and immediately enacted a series of severe anti-Jewish measures, culminating in an organized plan to exterminate the Jews. They were imprisoned in the Hippodrome, where elephants were to be intoxicated and incited to trample them to death. The book describes in detail the organization of transport and the attempt to record carefully the names of the Jews to be killed as well as the cooperation of the native population in rounding them up. After some delay, when the plan was to be put into action the prayers of the Jews ascended to heaven and God sent two angelic apparitions to intervene. They turned the animals on the king's army, leading the king to command the release of the Jews, whom he then hosted for a seven-day feast. As a result the Jews declared a permanent festival and were granted permission to put to death some 300 apostates.

Despite its name, the book, as the above summary indicates, has nothing to do with the Maccabees, who flourished several decades after Ptolemy IV. This provides some evidence that the book may have once borne the name Ptolemaica (matters ptolemaic), but the persecution theme led to its association with the Maccabees. The style and vocabulary indicate that the book was written in Greek. It is found in only one of the great uncial Greek manuscripts—Alexandrinus—but also appears in the important eighth-century Greek manuscript Venetus Graecus. It was early on translated into Syriac but not into Latin and thus was never part of the VULGATE. (The first Latin translation was prepared for inclusion in the Complutensian Polyglot. Both the Paris and the London polyglots reproduce the Syriac version.) The fourth-century apostolic canons (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) list it among the scriptural books (canon 85), and the 1672 Orthodox Synod of Jerusalem (actually convened in Bethlehem) declared 3 Maccabees to be canonical. The earliest ET was produced by W. Lynne in 1550; but the book, like 4 Maccabees, is not well known. Later editions of the RSV and the NRSV contain it.

The narrative presented in 3 Maccabees seems to be a fictional expansion based on certain historical information, e.g., the account of the battle of Raphia and a story known from JOSEPHUS (Contra Apion, 2.50-55) to the effect that Ptolemy VIII Physcon (145–116 BCE) attempted to incite intoxicated elephants against the Jews of Alexandria as punishment for their support of his enemy Cleopatra II. Instead, the elephants turned on the king's friends. The festival celebrating deliverance from this scourge probably served as the stimulus for the writing of 3 Maccabees, and credence is possibly to be given to the book's claim that full civil rights were offered to the Jews by Ptolemy IV in exchange for their abandonment of Judaism and acceptance of the Dionysian cult. In general terms the author's characterizations of Ptolemaic Egypt and of Ptolemy IV indicate a familiarity that may have been based on accurate written sources.

The book presupposes the Greek Additions to Daniel, which in their present form were completed in the second century BCE, and perhaps also the Greek translation and expansion of the book of Esther, completed by 77 BCE. Certainly the book of Esther had an impact on the author. Some scholars have argued that the use of the Greek laographia for "census" requires a Roman date, probably between 20 and 15 BCE (M. Hadas [1953]; V. Tcherikover [1961]; F. Parente [1988]). This proposal is based on the census and poll tax undertaken in Egypt in 23/22 BCE that discriminated between citizens of the Hellenistic cities and the native population. Other scholars would date the book much earlier and see its account as containing much historical material (A. Kasher [1985]). At any rate, the book seems to have been written before 70 CE since it presumes that the Temple is still standing and since it was taken over into Christianity. We cannot discount the possibility of a complex literary history, according to which different sections of the book are to be variously dated. Since the plot centers primarily around Alexandria, Egypt, it is likely that the book was composed there. Nonetheless, the Judaism of the book cannot be characterized as Hellenistic.

Jewish tradition preserves no mention of this book or direct use of its contents. Nevertheless, the style of the prayers of the Jews about to be martyred contains striking parallels to similar prayers recorded in the chronicles detailing the persecution of the European Jews during the crusades. Parallels may also be observed with Jewish penitential prayers. The reader cannot help feeling the uncanny similarities between the plan for systematic destruction of Egyptian Jewry and the Holocaust that ravaged the Jewish people in modern times.

Bibliography: H. Anderson, "3 Maccabees," OTP (ed. J. Charlesworth, 1985) 2:509-29. C. W. Emmet, APOT (1913) 1:156-73. C. L. W. Grimm, Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zu den Apokryphen des Alten Testaments (6 vols., ed. O. F. Fritzsche and C. L. W. Grimm, 1851–60). M. Hadas, The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees (JAL, 1953). A. Kasher, The Jews in Hellenistic and Roman Egypt: The Struggle for Equal Rights (TSAJ 7, 1985). F. Parente, "The Third Book of Maccabees as Ideological Document and Historical Source," Henoch 10 (1988) 143-82. A. Paul, "Le Troisième Livre des Maccabées," ANRW 2, 20-21 (1987) 298-336. E. Schürer, HJPAJC 3, 1 (1986) 537-42. V. A. Tcherikover, "The Third Book of Maccabees as a Historical Source of Augustus' Time," ScrHier 7 (1961) 1-26. H. Willrich, "Der historische Kern des III. Makkabäerbuches," Hermes 39 (1904) 244-58.

L. H. SCHIFFMAN

MACCABEES, FOURTH BOOK OF

Fourth Maccabees is essentially a philosophical tract expressing a Hellenistic approach to Judaism. It was written in the first person in the style of a discourse; its original title was probably "On the Sovereignty of Reason," as it was designated by EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 3.10.6), the first writer to refer to the work. It is addressed directly to the Jewish people, "children born of the seed of Abraham," and maintains that reason must be the underlying guide for piety; only through reason can the passions be controlled. This point is illustrated through Jewish history, most notably through the story of the martyrdom of the elderly priest Eleazar and seven brothers and their mother during the persecutions of the Seleucid king Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175–164 BCE) in connection with the Maccabean revolt. The author presents an expanded version of the material he found in 2 Maccabees (or in the original five-volume work of Jason of Cyrene, which is summarized in 2 Maccabees; see 2 Macc 2:23). This relationship to the Maccabees gave rise to the title 4 Maccabees.

The first section of the book (1:1–3:18) presents the basic concepts of reason and its rule over the passions, accomplished only through a life of wisdom. Several biblical examples are given: Joseph facing the advances of Potiphar's wife, Moses controlling his anger against Dathan and Abiram, etc. Then there is a description of the attempt of Apollonius to plunder the Temple treasures and of the persecutions of the Jews (3:19–4:26) that led up to the Maccabean revolt (168–164 BCE), all to set the stage for the description of the martyrs of the Maccabean period. The torture and martyrdom of Eleazar (5:1–7:23) and of the seven sons (8:1–14:10) and their mother (14:11'–17:6) are described in detail; and they are all praised for their courage, virtue, and loyalty to their faith. A discussion follows of the blessings granted to the Jewish people by God on account of the dedication of its martyrs, emphasizing the atonement provided by their deaths (17:7–18:19). A short epilogue concludes the book (18:20-23).

The book's philosophical approach combines elements of middle Platonism and Stoicism. Emphasizing the need for reason to control the passions, the book mentions the four cardinal virtues: prudence, justice, courage, and self-control. The author's concept of reason, however, is a Jewish one—namely, fear of the Word of God. This philosophical description of Judaism indicates only a surface Hellenization since the underlying concepts are Jewish. This fact also explains the eclecticism of the author, who felt free to derive his philosophical underpinnings from whatever sources were available, provided they supported the Jewish concepts he wished to teach.

The book praises the Maccabean martyrs for their adherence to the Torah. The author believed in the immortality of the soul, a view that, as in 2 Maccabees, is adduced to explain the willingness of the martyrs to give their lives. He consistently omitted any mention of bodily resurrection. Further, he saw the death of the righteous as atoning for the transgressions of the people. The author believed in the biblical concept of divine providence—namely, that God takes an interest in human beings and their lives.

Fourth Maccabees, originally written in Greek, is not part of any CANON, although it appears as an appendix in the Orthodox Bible. It is included in two of the early biblical Greek manuscripts, Sinaiticus from the fourth century and Alexandrinus from the fifth, as well as in the eighth-century Venetus Graecus. None of the books of Maccabees is included in Codex Vaticanus. The work was early translated into Syriac; a Latin paraphrase (Passio SS. Machabaeorum) exists but no early Latin translation.

Eusebius and JEROME (De viris illustribus 13) ascribed the book to JOSEPHUS; but this seems unlikely since the work is based on 2 Maccabees, which he did not use. The legend of the martyrs was well known among Christians (see J. Freudenthal [1869] 29-34); their relics were revered at Antioch (see J. Obermann [1931]), and a feast in their honor held August 1 was widely observed in the church. ORIGEN, in his Exhortation to Martyrdom, praised their heroic deaths, while GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS in Oratio 15 (Im laudem Machabaeorum; PG 35.911-54) saw their deaths as anticipating Christian martyrdom, and the mother as a forerunner of Mary. AUGUSTINE's Sermon 300 is entitled In Solemnitate martyrum Machabaeorum (see further Chrysostom [PG 50.617-28; 64.525-50] and Ambrose [PL 14.627-30, 662-63]). Numerous Hebrew versions of stories of the Maccabean martyrs circulated in Judaism during the Middle Ages (see G. Cohen [1953]; G. Stemberger [1992]; and Hadas, 127-35), although no literary dependence on 4 Maccabees can be demonstrated.

ERASMUS popularized the story by publishing a paraphrase of the martyr legend (1524) based on the early Latin paraphrase. The first printed version of the Greek text appeared in the Strasbourg SEPTUAGINT (1526), but scholarly study of the book did not begin until the nineteenth century. C. Grimm's (1851–60) was the first substantial commentary.

The work is most frequently dated to the first half of the first century. C. Bickermann argued for a date between 20 and 54 CE, when Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia were under one governor (see 4 Macc 4:9), although other scholars have dated the book as late as the second century CE (A. Dupont-Sommer [1939]; U. Breitenstein [1978]). Various locations have been proposed as the place of authorship: Alexandria, Antioch, somewhere in Asia Minor, etc. About all that can be said is that it was written by a Greek-speaking Jew in the diaspora. The work may have been written for some special occasion (see 1:10; 3:19; 14:9), such as the commemoration of the martyrs' death, but this too remains uncertain. The book has also been examined in terms of its narrative depiction of Jewish identity, heroic death, martyrdom, and vicarious suffering as well as the parallels to early Christian understandings of the death of JESUS.

Bibliography: H. Anderson, "4 Maccabees," OTP (1985) 2:531-64. R. L. Bensly, The Fourth Book of Maccabees and Kindred Documents in Syriac (1895). E. J. Bickermann, "The Date of IV Maccabees," L. Ginzberg Jubilee Volume (vol. 1, 1945) 105-12 = his Studies in Jewish and Christian History (AGJU 9, 1976) 1:275-81. U. Breitenstein, Beobachtungen zu Sprache, Stil, und Gedankengut des Vierten Makkabäerbuchs (1978). G. D. Cohen, "The Story of Hannah and Her Seven Sons in Hebrew Literature," M. M. Kaplan Jubilee Volume (1953) 109-22 (Hebrew section). H. Cotton, The Five Books of Maccabees in English (1832). A. Dupont-Sommer, Le quatriéme livre des Maccabées (BEHE 274, 1939). C. W. Emmet (tr.), The Fourth Book of Maccabees (TED, ser. 2, Hellenistic-Jewish Texts 6, 1918). J. Freudenthal, Die Flavius Josephus beigelegte Schrift über die Herrschaft der Vernunft (IV Makkabäerbuch): Eine Predigt aus dem ersten nachchristlichen Jahrhundert (1869). C. L. W. Grimm, Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zu den Apokryphen des Alten Testaments (6 vols., ed. O. F. Fritzsche and C. L. W. Grimm, 1851–60) 4:283-370. M. Hadas, The Third and Fourth Books of Maccabees (JAL, 1953). J. W. van Henten, The Maccabean Martyrs as Saviours of the Jewish People: A Study of 2 and 4 Maccabees (JSJSup 57, 1997), with bibliography, 305-34. M. de Jonge, "Jesus' Death for Others and the Death of the Maccabean Martyrs," Text and Testimony: Essays on NT and Apocryphal Literature (ed. T. Baarda, 1988) 142-51. H.-J. Klauck, JSHRZ 3, 6 (1989) 645-763. S. D. Moore and J. C. Anderson, "Taking It Like a Man: Masculinity in 4 Maccabees," JBL 117 (1998) 249-73. J. Obermann, "The Sepulchre of the Maccabean Martyrs," JBL 50 (1931) 250-65. P. L. Reddith, "The Concept of Nomos in Fourth Maccabees," CBQ 45 (1983) 249-70. R. Reneham, "The Greek Philosophical Background of Fourth Maccabees," RMP 115 (1972) 232-38. D. A. de Silva, "The Noble Contest: Honor, Shame, and the Rhetorical Strategy of 4 Maccabees," JSP 13 (1995) 31-57. G. Stemberger, "The Maccabees in Rabbinic Traditions," The Scriptures and the Scrolls (VTSup 49, ed. F. García Martinez et al., 1992) 193-203. E. Schürer, HJPAJC 3, 1 (1986) 588-93. R. B. Townshend, APOT 2 (1913) 653-85. D. F. Winslow, "The Maccabean Martyrs: Early Christian Attitudes," Judaism 23 (1974) 78-86. R. D. Young, " 'The Woman with the Soul of Abraham': Traditions About the Mother of the Maccabean Martyrs," "Women Like This": New Perspectives on Jewish Women in the Greco-Roman World (SBLEJL 1, ed. A.-J. Levine, 1991) 67-81.

L. H. SCHIFFMAN

McCarthy, Dennis Joseph (1924–83)

M. studied Greek at St. Louis University (MA 1951), Semitics at Freie Universität and University of Paris, and Scripture at the Institut Catholique, Paris (STD 1962) and the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome (SSL 1963). He taught at St. Mary's College, St. Mary's, Kansas; at the School of Divinity of St. Louis University; and from 1969 until his death at the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome.

While M.'s studies ranged broadly over the HB, his most important contributions were in the field of treaty and covenant and on Deuteronomy. His detailed studies, both linguistic and historical, of ancient Near Eastern treaties led him to modify the prevailing wisdom on many points concerning HB covenant. He demonstrated that the suzerainty treaty form, far from having been restricted to the period of the Hittite Empire (see HITTITOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), which ended in the thirteenth century BCE, is found well into the first millennium. He found that in the late treaties the characteristic features of Hittite treaties—stipulations, invocation of the gods, curses—always appear; thus the use of this form was not restricted to the early centuries of Israel's history as many had claimed. M. argued that neither the DECALOGUE nor the Exodus account of the Sinai covenant displayed the treaty form, whereas Deuteronomy manifests this influence. M. also contributed important studies in Deuteronomy and the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY and manifested particular interest in Hebrew prose style and the nature of NARRATIVE forms.

Works: Treaty and Covenant: A Study in Form in the Ancient Oriental Documents and in the OT (AB 21, 1963, 1978²); (ed.), Modern Biblical Studies: An Anthology from the Theology Digest (1967); Kings and Prophets (Contemporary College Theology Series, 1968); OT Covenant: A Survey of Current Opinions (Growing Points in Theology, 1972); Institution and Narrative: Collected Essays (AnBib 108, 1985).

Bibliography: F. C. Fensham, JNSL 11 (1983) 1-2. J. Welch, Bib 64 (1984) 591-92.

J. JENSEN

McCurdy, James Frederick (1847–1935)

Born in Chatham, New Brunswick, Canada, M. was educated at the University of New Brunswick (BA 1866) and Princeton Theological College (1867–71), where he studied with W. GREEN. He graduated in 1871 but remained at Princeton for eleven more years, serving as Green's assistant while supervising the school's linguistics program and teaching Hebrew and Sanskrit. In 1878 he received an honorary PhD. An early publication, Aryo-Semitic Speech: A Study in Linguistic Archaeology (1881), is representative of his work while at Princeton and reflects the linguistic focus that was to characterize much of his future research. He left Princeton in 1882 after being criticized by colleagues for a paper read at Johns Hopkins on evolution and the history of language that reflected an interest in Darwinism. He spent the next three years in Göttingen and Leipzig, studying with

Franz DELITZSCH and Friedrich DELITZSCH, E. Schrader, and P. de LAGARDE. While in Germany, M. also developed a strong interest in ASSYRIOLOGY. Returning to Canada in 1885, he became a tutor in oriental languages at University College in Toronto the following year and in 1889 was made professor and head of the department of oriental languages. While there he wrote his most significant work, History, Prophecy, and the Monuments (3 vols. 1894, 1896, 1901), and capped his career by serving as annual director for the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in Jerusalem (1911–12). He died on March 30, 1935.

M.'s work with the department of oriental languages at the University of Toronto was characterized by an insistence on thorough linguistic training, an emphasis that was to set the course for this institution's focus on linguistics and philology as the foundation for reading the biblical text. He also advocated openness to new critical methods in the field of biblical studies and was one of the first North American scholars to adopt the documentary hypothesis developed by J. WELLHAUSEN. Furthermore, his interest in Assyriology helped to broaden the discipline and to recontextualize biblical studies in the larger historical-cultural context of the ancient Near East, while his acceptance of Darwinism contributed to a critical reevaluation of biblical history and THEOLOGY. He also displayed a great interest in the developing discipline of ARCHAEOLOGY, which he believed should not be used to prove the biblical text but rather to illustrate and supplement it. Because of his own contribution to the development of these new methods and because of his work with the department of oriental languages at the University of Toronto, M. may be regarded as the founder of modern biblical studies in Canada. It should also be noted that, while his approach to the biblical text was historical-critical in its methodology and humanist in its basic orientation, he also believed that biblical studies should be an integral part of a sound liberal education. The relationship between science and humanism, on the one hand, and biblical studies, on the other hand, was fully reciprocal for him, and he taught the Bible as a "way of life" rather than as a mere "rule of faith."

Works: The Book of Haggai (A Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, 1874); The Book of Hosea (tr. from the German with additions by J. F. M., 1874).

Bibliography: M. P. Graham, The Utilization of 1 and 2 Chronicles in the Reconstruction of Israelite History in the Nineteenth Century (SBLDS 116, 1990) 218-22. J. S. Moir, "J. F. M.: Christian Humanist," Canadian Society for Presbyterian History Papers (1981); A History of Biblical Studies in Canada: A Sense of Proportion (BSNA, 1982). M. A. Taylor, The OT in the Old Princeton School, 1812–1929 (1992) 259-61.

A. SIEDLECKI

MACDONALD, DUNCAN BLACK (1863–1943)

Educated at Glasgow University (AB 1885; BD 1888) and the University of Berlin (1890–91), M. joined the faculty of Hartford Theological Seminary, where he taught until his retirement in 1932. In addition to teaching Hebrew and OT, he established a department of Islamics at the seminary's affiliate institution, the Kennedy School of Missions, in 1913. Indeed, M. is better known in the scholarly world as an Islamicist (see QURANIC AND ISLAMIC INTERPRETATION) than as a biblical scholar.

Although appreciative of the historical-critical scholarship regnant in his time, he approached the Bible from a perspective that remarkably foreshadows some current trends in biblical scholarship. First, he was keenly interested in reading the Bible from a LITERARY perspective. Second, particularly with respect to Genesis, he was concerned with the impact of the final redactor's shaping of the material rather than in focusing on the sources used. Third, he emphasized the significance of the wisdom material at a time when it was relegated to a secondary role. M.'s overt influence on biblical scholarship remains slight, but it may be of considerable profit to the new directions mentioned above.

Works: Development of Muslim Theology, Jurisprudence, and Constitutional Theory (1903); The Religious Attitude and Life in Islam (Haskell Lectures, 1909); Aspects of Islam (1911); The Hebrew Literary Genius (1933); The Hebrew Philosophical Genius (1936).

Bibliography: J. J. Bodine, The Romanticism of D. B. M. (1973). W. D. Mackenzie, "D. B. M.: Scholar, Teacher, and Author," The Macdonald Presentation Volume (ed. W. G. Shellabear, 1933) 4-9 (full bibliography).

J. F. PRIEST

MACHEN, JOHN GRESHAM (1881–1937)

Born in Baltimore, Maryland, July 28, 1881, M. was educated at Johns Hopkins University (BA 1901; graduate work 1901–2), at Princeton Seminary (BD 1905), and at Marburg and Göttingen (1905–6). An NT scholar and Presbyterian clergyman, he was publicly embroiled in the modernist/fundamentalist debates in the early decades of the twentieth century. In the last decade of his life he resigned his position as professor of NT at Princeton Seminary, where he had served from 1906 to 1929, and helped to form Westminster Theological Seminary, establish the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, and begin an independent mission board. He died suddenly at the age of fifty-six, perhaps the best-known public defender of orthodox Protestantism in his day.

While studying in Europe under such scholars as A. JÜLICHER, E. SCHÜRER, and W. BOUSSET, M. was exposed to a number of theories regarding Christian origins that he would later oppose. He was greatly influenced by two of his seminary teachers, B. B. WARFIELD and W. Armstrong (1874–1944), who helped secure a place for him first as instructor and later as assistant professor of NT. After nearly twenty years he was nominated to be professor of apologetics and Christian ethics in 1926; however, the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church refused to confirm this appointment, and in 1929 he resigned his post as NT professor.

M. wrote several important works during his abbreviated career, including works on the origin of PAUL's religion (1921) and the virgin birth (1930). The latter was the fruit of years of study, parts of which had appeared previously as articles. In it he treated the accounts of Matthew and Luke and early patristic evidence as well, concluding that JESUS' supernatural conception was not an invention of the second century; indeed, the canticles in Luke that presuppose such a belief go back to the earliest apostolic witness. His study of Paul defended a supernatural origin for the apostle's theology. While examining various theories concerned with influences on Paul, such as mysticism or APOCALYPTICISM, M. concluded that Paul held in common with the earliest apostolic witness the conviction that the Lord of glory was none other than the historical Jesus raised from the dead. In this M. denied that Paul represented a major development in early Christianity whereby a purely human Jesus was made the object of unwarranted speculation or worship.

In his book on Christianity and liberalism (1923), M. argued that the liberal theology of his day and what he called orthodox Christianity were two different and incompatible religions. In drawing the lines so sharply between differing confessional options in both academic and ecclesiastical life, his claims became the focus of much public debate. His grammar of NT Greek (1923) continues to be a widely used textbook.

Historically, M. was the last of a series of well-known scholars who, following in the footsteps of C. HODGE and Warfield, represented the Calvinism (see CALVIN) of the old Princeton school. M. once declared Warfield to be the greatest man he had ever known; and he, like Warfield, sought to defend orthodox Calvinism at a time of change in the American theological scene. His passionate and sometimes bitter defense made him widely recognized in intellectual circles as an articulate spokesperson for his cause. His legacy lives on in the life of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church and other Reformed confessions in the United States.

Works: The Origin of Paul's Religion (1921); Christianity and Liberalism (1923); NT Greek for Beginners (1923); What Is Faith? (1925); The Virgin Birth of Christ (1930); "Christianity in Conflict," Contemporary American Theology (ed. B. Ferm, 1932–33) 1:243-74 (autobiography and bibliography); The Christian Faith in the Modern World (1936); The Christian View of Man (1937).

Bibliography: D. G. Hart, Defending the Faith: J. G. M. and the Crisis of Conservative Protestantism in Modern America (1994); HHMBI, 594-98. G. Marsden, "Understanding J. G. M.," PSB 11 (1990) 46-60; WHMBI, 594-98. C. A. Russell, "J. G. M.: Scholarly Fundamentalist," JPH 51 (1973) 41-69. N. B. Stonehouse, J. G. M.: A Biographical Memoir (1954). C. I. K. Story, "J. G. M.: Apologist and Exegete," PSB 2 (1979) 91-103.

J. A. DEARMAN

McKENZIE, JOHN LAWRENCE (1910–91)

Born in Brazil, Indiana, Oct. 9, 1910, M. was one of the leading Roman Catholic biblical scholars of the twentieth century. His achievements as scholar, teacher, and writer are remarkable considering that he was able to devote just one year to doctoral studies and was largely self-taught. Joining the Society of Jesus in 1928, he received the LittB from Xavier University in 1932, studied philosophy at St. Louis University, where he completed an MA in Greek in 1935, continued preparation for ordination at St. Mary's College in Wichita, Kansas, and was ordained a priest in 1939. After ordination he was assigned to begin doctoral studies in Scripture; since WWII made European study impossible, he began graduate work at Weston College. When a professor of biblical studies was needed at West Baden College, a Jesuit seminary in southern Indiana, M. was forced to end his formal studies in Scripture after just one year to take the position. He completed his dissertation while teaching and received the STD from Weston. At West Baden (1941–60) he helped to prepare an entire generation of Jesuits for the priesthood. From 1960 to 1965 he taught at Loyola University of Chicago, and in 1966 he became the first Roman Catholic priest to be a visiting professor at the Divinity School of the University of Chicago. He taught at the University of Notre Dame (1966–71) before joining the faculty of DePaul University, where he concluded his teaching career in 1979. He died Mar. 2, 1991.

M.'s most significant achievements as a biblical scholar were his efforts as a popular lecturer and writer. His contributions to the renewal of biblical studies in the Roman Catholic Church in America are hard to measure, but he was a major force in the American Catholic Church in the twentieth century. Despite his responsibilities as a teacher and his heavy schedule of lectures across the country, he produced fifteen books, dozens of scholarly and popular articles, and scores of book reviews. His most outstanding achievement as a writer was his Dictionary of the Bible; published in 1965, this 900,000-word volume took six years to produce and still retains its usefulness, displaying a mastery of its subject matter.

M.'s Roman Catholic colleagues recognized the quality of his achievements by electing him president of the Catholic Biblical Association. He was the first Catholic to be elected president of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE, and among the honors he received was the Cardinal Spellman Award in theology.

M. did much of his teaching, writing, and lecturing at a time when the work of Roman Catholic scholars was subject to careful scrutiny by ecclesiastical authorities. He helped to shape the renewal in the Roman Catholic Church in America precisely because he was able to work within the strictures that were part of the experience of Roman Catholic biblical scholars before Vatican II. A pacifist, he left the Society of Jesus, one grievance being his superiors' lack of support for Jesuits involved in the anti-war movement during the Vietnam era. However, he remained a Roman Catholic priest in good standing until his death. Even during his retirement, M. never failed to attend the annual meetings of the Catholic Biblical Association and the SBL, remaining a scholar and teacher to the end.

Works: The Two-Edged Sword: An Interpretation of the OT (1956); The Bible in Current Catholic Thought (1962); Myths and Realities in Biblical Theology: Studies in Biblical Theology (1963); Dictionary of the Bible (1965); The Power and the Wisdom: An Interpretation of the NT (1965); Authority in the Church (1966); Mastering the Meaning of the Bible (1966); The World of the Judges (1966); Second Isaiah (AB 20, 1968); Vital Concepts of the Bible (1968); (ed.), The NT for Spiritual Reading (25 vols., 1969–71); The Roman Catholic Church (History of Religion Series, 1969); Did I Say That? (1973); A Theology of the OT (1974); Light on the Epistles (1975).

Bibliography: J. M. Flanagan and A. W. Robinson (eds.), No Famine in the Land: Studies in Honor of J. L. M. (1975), with biographical sketch, letters, and photographs (1-34) and bibliography to 1975 (301-22).

L. J. HOPPE

MACRAE, GEORGE WINSOR, S.J. (1928–85)

Born July 27, 1928, in Lynn, Massachusetts, M. was educated at Boston College, Louvain, Johns Hopkins, Weston College, and Cambridge, where his doctoral dissertation treated the Jewish sources of the GNOSTIC myth of Sophia's fall. A member of the Society of Jesus, he was ordained to the Roman Catholic priesthood in 1960. He served on the faculty of Weston School of Theology (1966–1973) and at Harvard Divinity School from 1973 until his death, Sept. 6, 1985. There he was the first tenured Stillman Professor of Roman Catholic Theological Studies. Active in the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE, he was a leader in its efforts to expand publication opportunities. His principal scholarly contributions were in the religion-historical background of the NT, particularly to John and Hebrews. He was a member of the American team that translated and edited the Nag Hammadi Coptic Gnostic codices.

Works: "The Gospel of Thomas—Logia Iesou?" CBQ 22 (1960) 56-71; "Sleep and Awakening in Gnostic Texts," The Origins of Gnosticism: Colloquium of Messina, 13-18 Apr. 1966 (SHR, Supplements to Numen 12, ed. U. Bianchi, 1967) 496-507; Invitation to John: A Commentary on the Gospel of John with Complete Text from the Jerusalem Bible (Doubleday NT Commentary Series, 1978); "Apocalypse of Paul," Nag Hammadi Codices V,2-5 and VI with Papyrus Berolinensis 8502,1 and 4 (ed. D. M. Parrot, NHS 11, 1979) 47-63; "Apocalypse of Adam," OTP 1:707-19; Hebrews (CBC 10, 1983); "The Gospel of Truth," Nag Hammadi Codex I (The Jung Codex): Introductions, Texts, Translations, Indices (ed. H. W. Attridge, 2 vols., NHS 22-23; 1985) 1:56-117, 2:39-135; (ed. with G. W. E. Nickelsburg), Christians Among Jews and Gentiles: Essays in Honor of K. Stendahl on His Sixty-fifth Birthday (1986) = HTR 79 (1986); "Messiah and Gospel," Judaisms and Their Messiahs at the Turn of the Christian Era (ed. J. Neusner et al., 1987) 169-85; Studies in the NT and Gnosticism (ed. D. J. Harrington and S. B. Marrow, 1987), with biographical and bibliographical notices (7-9, 264-72); (ed. with E. J. Epp), The NT and Its Modern Interpreters (1988).

Bibliography: D. J. Harrington, CBQ 48 (1986) 95; "Tribute to G. W. M.," Dialogue Toward Interfaith Understanding (1986) 39-43.

H. W. ATTRIDGE

MAIMONIDES, MOSES (c. 1135/38–1204)

Mosheh ben Maimon, whose name was Hellenized to Maimonides, is also known by the acronym Rambam. The most significant medieval Jewish theologian as well as an outstanding Talmudist (see TALMUD) and physician, he was born in Córdoba, Spain. He and his family fled the area to avoid persecution when Córdoba fell into the hands of the Islamic Almohads (1148). After a decade of movement through southern Spain and North Africa they settled in Fez in modern Morocco. In 1165 M. set out to settle in the traditional land of Israel, but the area was in upheaval due to the crusades. So after traveling from Acre to Hebron via Jerusalem, he settled in Old Cairo (Fusṭāṭ), where he became the physician to Saladin's vizier. He excelled in medical practice and became the most prominent and important member of the Jewish community in Egypt.

M. wrote many works, including Ma'amar ha'ibbur (on the Jewish calendar) and hundreds of tevshuvot (responsa). His four most significant writings are Peruš ha-Mishnah (Commentary on the Mishnah), Sefer hamitsvot (Book of the Commandments), Mishneh Torah (Code of the Torah), and Moreh Nevukhim (Guide of the Perplexed). The first three are fundamentally books of halakhic jurisprudence written clearly and concisely, although often intermixing philosophical and metaphysical considerations. The fourth book is more overtly theological and philosophical; it is written in a more convoluted style, is sometimes ambiguous, and includes what appear to be deliberately introduced contradictions.

A number of factors are noteworthy about M.'s work: (1) He was committed to the Talmudic-rabbinic belief system, to the Hebrew scriptures as a source of divine revelation, and to the traditional doctrinal and historical positions on the oral law (the latter defended in the introduction to his commentary on the Mishnah). (2) He was simultaneously committed to the integration of faith and reason and of belief and philosophy, seeing both reason and revelation as sources of knowledge. According to his own account, his main philosophical sources were Greek and Muslim: Aristotle (384–322 BCE); commentaries on Aristotle by Alexander of Aphrodisias (fl. c. 200), Themistius (fl. 4th cent.), and Ibn Rushd (Averroës [1126–98]); and the Arabic philosopher al-Fārārbi (c. 870–950). Like his later Christian counterpart THOMAS AQUINAS, who was familiar with and used M.'s thought, M. argued that all truth—biblical, rabbinical, philosophical—must be compatible (although he denied some Aristotelian teachings, e.g., the eternity of the world). Such a view often led M. into rather esoteric, symbolic, and even allegorical interpretation of Scripture that denied the historicity of some biblical depictions, like prophetic narratives, and created controversy even in his own day. (3) Following al-Fārābi, who argued that in human development a philosophical phase preceded the development of religion, jurisprudence, and theology, M. argued for a lost Jewish philosophical lore embodied in Abraham and viewed Moses as something of a philosophical ruler.

(4) In his commentary on the Mishnah, at the opening of chapter 10 of the tractate Sanhedrin, M. formulated the basic tenets of the Torah and its fundamental principles, which he considered to be thirteen in number. These principles, he argued, represent in essence the basic teachings of the Bible or a synopsis of Jewish faith and must be accepted by those who would belong to the community of Israel. (5) He stressed the role and nature of PROPHECY, with Moses being the superior prophet without peer (the true prophet-philosopher), and understood prophecy primarily in terms of a function of the rational faculty as a revelatory overflow from God through the intermediation of the Active Intellect. (6) He frequently expounded on the rationale behind biblical commandments, sometimes describing it in terms of the contingent historical circumstances. For example, he discussed the biblical laws of sacrifice as divine accommodation to the state of Israelite faith and practice at the time. In the days of Abraham and Moses, the Israelites still shared in the polytheistic culture of the Sabeans to such an extent that a purely non-sacrificial cult was historically unachievable. Sacrifice was commanded of the Israelites as a concession but with the ultimate goal of weaning the people completely from idolatry.

Works: The Book of Divine Commandments (tr. and ed. C. B. Chavel, 1940); The Guide of the Perplexed (tr. S. Pines, 1963), with introductory essay by L. Strauss; The Code of Maimonides (YJS 2-5, 8-9, 11-12, 14-16, 19, 21, 1949–); A Maimonides Reader (Library of Jewish Studies, ed. I. Twersky, 1972).

Bibliography: A. Altmann, "Maimonides and Thomas Aquinas: Natural or Divine Prophecy," AJSR 3 (1978) 1-19. W. Bacher, Die Bibelexegese M. M.s (1897). L. V. Berman, "M., the Disciple of Alfārābi," IOS 4 (1974) 154-78. S. D. Breslauer, "Philosophy and Imagination: The Politics of Prophecy in the View of M. M.," JQR 70 (1980) 153-71. J. I. Dienstag (ed.), Studies in M. and St. Thomas Aquinas (Bibliotheca Maimonidica 1, 1975). I. Dobbs-Weinstein, M. and St. Thomas on the Limits of Reason (SUNY Series in Philosophy, 1995). M. Fox, Interpreting M.: Studies in Methodology, Metaphysics, and Moral Philosophy (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism, 1990). A. Funkenstein, Theology and the Scientific Imagination from the Middle Ages to the Seventeenth Century (1986) 213-39; "Getsetz und Geschichte: Zur historisierenden Hermeneutik bei M. M. und Thomas von Aquin," Viator 1 (1970) 147-78. M. Greenberg, "Bible Interpretation as Exhibited in the First Book of M.'s Code," The Judeo-Christian Tradition and the U.S. Constitution (Sup. to JQR, 1989) 29-56. L. Kaplan, "M. and the Miraculous Element in Prophecy," HTR 70 (1977) 233-56. A. L. Katchen, Christian Hebraists and Dutch Rabbis: Seventeenth-century Apologetics and the Study of M.'s "Mishneh Torah" (Harvard Judaic Texts and Studies 3, 1984). M. Kellner, "M. and Gersonides on Mosaic Prophecy," Speculum 58 (1977) 62-79. A. J. Reines, "M.'s Concept of Mosaic Prophecy," HUCA 40 (1969–70) 325-61; M. and Abravanel on Prophecy (1970). S. Rosenberg, "On Biblical Interpretation in the Guide of the Perplexed," Jerusalem Studies in Jewish Thought 1 (1981) 87-157 (Hebrew). D. J. Silver, Maimonidean Criticism and the Maimonidean Controversy, 1180–1240 (1965). C. Sirat, A History of Jewish Philosophy in the Middle Ages (1985) 157-203. I. Twersky, Introduction to the Code of M. (Mishneh Torah) (YJS 22, 1980) esp. 145-50; EncRel 9 (1987) 131-35. H. A. Wolfson, "Hallevi and M. on Prophecy," JQR 32 (1941–42) 345-70; 33 (1942–43) 49-82.

J. H. HAYES

MALACHI, BOOK OF

The short book of Malachi, which closes the prophetic CANON, has received more attention in the last two decades of the twentieth century than in any other period of its existence. While rising interest in the Persian period and its PROPHECY has generated an increase in commentary on Malachi, for centuries only selected features of the book received significant attention.

1. Earliest Evidence. The earliest evidence for the book is its inclusion in the SEPTUAGINT and a fragmentary Minor Prophets scroll from Qumran dated c. 150 BCE (4QXII[a]). Short references appear in several early texts: Sirach 49:10 mentions (but does not identify) twelve prophets; the Cairo Damascus document 6:11-14 cites Mal 1:10; Mal 1:13-14 appears in 5QpMal (= 5Q10); 4QarP alludes to Mal 3:23; and 2 Esdras 3:16 draws upon Mal 1:2-3.

In terms of canonical placement, which may have influenced later assessments of dating, Malachi appears consistently at the end of the Book of the Twelve in early Jewish and Christian lists, including the Murabaʿat and Nahal Ḥever scrolls as well as later Spanish manuscripts. The TALMUD differs in its ordering of the Major Prophets; but it concludes the Prophets with Malachi, as do all early Christian lists. Even Junilius, who arranges the prophetic books chronologically (see CHRONOLOGY, HB), places Malachi last. The fragment 4QXII[a] may prove to be an exception, however, since preliminary studies suggest that in it Jonah may follow Malachi.

2. Early Judaism. Intrigued that Malachi is not a proper name but a title meaning "my messenger," early Jewish commentators on the book sought to identify its author. A gloss in the TARGUM Jonathan identifies this messenger with Ezra; according to BT Megillah 15a, Joshua b. Karḥa also equated Malachi with Ezra, while R. Naḥman believed the messenger to be Mordecai. Further speculation is given in The Lives of the Prophets, which, though dated to the fourth century CE, may be an earlier composition. Here, Malachi is said to have been born in Sopha after the exile. The SEPTUAGINT translates malachi as "his messenger," while leaving the word untranslated in the book's title.

Although Malachi bears no chronological markers and refers to no datable event, ancient writers consistently assumed its postexilic origin. Second Esdras 14:44-47 attributes the writing of the twenty-four books of the canon to Ezra, implying Malachi's completion by this time, as does BT Baba Bathra 14b, which credits the men of the Great Assembly with writing the Book of the Twelve. Similarly, JOSEPHUS (Contra Apion 1.37-43) indicates that prophecy ended in the time of King Artaxerxes; and Tosephta Soṭah 13:2 explains that "when Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi died, the Holy Spirit left Israel." BT Rosh Hashanah 19b names Malachi as one of the three prophets on which the almanac is fixed.

Malachi 3:23-24 (Eng. 4:4-5), which tells of a coming messenger, engendered some messianic interest during this period. M. Baba Meṣia 1:8; 2:8; 3:4-5; and M. Sheqalim 2:5 describe Elijah as a forerunner of the Messiah, perhaps drawing from Malachi. The DEAD SEA SCROLLS fragment 4QarP explicitly cites the book in discussing the Messiah.

3. Early Christianity. The NT quotes Malachi to defend messianic claims for JESUS and the character of emergent Christianity, setting precedents for centuries of Christian interpretation. Combining Mal 3:23-24 with Isa 40:3, the Gospels identify John the Baptist with Elijah in his role as messianic precursor. Mark 1:2 and 9:11 echo the tradition of Elijah, coming first; Luke 1:17 also attributes to John the purification role described in Mal 3:24. Outside of the Gospels, Rom 9:13 finds proof of God's election of Gentiles in Mal 1:2's contrast of the cases of Jacob and Esau.

The church fathers followed the NT in quoting the book to defend Christian rejection of Jewish practices. JUSTIN (Dialogue 117.28.41) quoted 1:11 as proof that Gentiles are also people of God; the Didache 14:3 went further, finding in this passage justification for the Eucharist. Christian writers of the period seldom speculated on the prophet's identity, although Pseudo-Epiphanius (De vitis proph.) suggested that "Malachi is of the tribe of Zebulun, born after the captivity."

4. The Medieval Period. The interpretation of Malachi in the medieval period closely followed contemporary exegetical and doctrinal controversies. While generating little interest in its own right, the book was used to defend divergent positions on messianism and proper biblical interpretation.

a. Jewish. Medieval Jewish interpretation drew on all of Scripture, including Malachi, to counter christological readings of the Tanakh and Christian claims that the coming of Christ had abrogated Mosaic law. With this concern, D. KIMHI quoted Mal 3:22 to argue the eternal validity of Torah and to establish that the Messiah had not come. MAIMONIDES employed the book to defend the logic of sacrificial requirements and, with A. IBN EZRA, to argue the inadequacy of Christian interpretations.

Kimhi and Maimonides also found in Malachi support for their philosophical interpretation of Scripture. Kimhi (MS Bodl. Huntington Don. 24) identified the "fearers" of 3:16 as those who contemplate in the intellect; for Maimonides (Guide 3.19), 3:6 proved the changelessness of the deity, and 3:13-16 defended God's omniscience and omnipotence.

b. Christian. Judaism's scriptural interpretation responded to the fervor of medieval Christian interpretation. Stressing the predictive nature of OT prophecy and armed with inferences drawn from the four senses of Scripture, Christian scholars of the medieval period read Malachi as thoroughly christological. Following the Gospels, THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA explained 3:1 as referring to John the Baptist and 4:4-6 as predicting Elijah's return before Christ's second coming.

In addition to christological readings, medieval writers offered some historical analysis. Although cognizant of traditional Jewish identifications of Malachi with Ezra, JEROME (Prologue to the Vulgate) placed the prophet in the time of Haggai and Zechariah, voicing a historical principle that greatly influenced subsequent assessments of the book's dating: A book that is not explicitly dated is to be dated according to the book that immediately precedes it in the canon. CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA also advanced this principle of dating, which may be reflected in Theodore's description of Malachi as postexilic.

5. Renaissance/Reformation. Numerous forces shaped biblical study during this period. The rise of humanism and the value it granted to antiquity fostered the study of ancient languages to the extent that in 1311 the Council of Vienna called for the establishment of chairs of Greek and Hebrew. Christian scholars engaged Hebraic tutors and gained facility in Talmud and Jewish commentary, forging some ties between Jewish and Christian commentary. The continuation of anti-Jewish sentiment in Christian Europe and the zeal of the Protestant Reformers to undercut ecclesiastical authority, however, reinforced scriptural defenses of various doctrinal positions.

a. Christian. LUTHER and CALVIN demonstrated this blending of the humanistic and the doctrinal. On the one hand, they extolled the value of historical study of Scripture. Denying the canonical approach to dating books employed by Jerome, Luther argued for the necessity of searching out the historical sense of Scripture. Calvin agreed with this assessment; but, like Luther and in keeping with confessional aims, he retained Scripture's christological import by arguing that a passage can have different meanings for the past, the present, and the future. Calvin claimed, e.g., that Malachi's "sons of Levi" refers to the time of Ezra and Nehemiah as well as to the coming of Christ and to the corrupt leadership of his own time. In the case of the book's future promises, however, the meaning can only apply to the coming of Christ (Commentary on Malachi 3:1).

As in earlier times, the book of Malachi provided the period's interpreters a repository of passages for defending their own understandings. The humanist ERASMUS argued that the differing fates of Jacob and Esau in 1:2 refer, not to eternal salvation, but to temporal misfortunes, given the primacy of free will. In the late sixteenth century, as anti-Jewish sentiments grew, the Protestant interpreter Urbanus Rhegius sought to refute Ibn Ezra and D. Kimhi, maintaining that all prophets—including Malachi—foretold the coming of Christ.

b. Jewish. Much Jewish exegesis of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries continued to challenge Christian dogmatic claims. This task grew more onerous as Christians increasingly used and denigrated Jewish tradition in their arguments. Guided by such concerns, ABRAVANEL forcefully argued that the Messiah had not come. He also offered historical commentary, claiming that all prophets except Obadiah are in chronological order and, thus, that Malachi is the latest of the postexilic prophets.

6. Enlightenment. Placing ultimate value on reason and natural religion and eschewing special revelation and particularism, the age of the Enlightenment found little value in a book that demands pure ritual and ends with an admonition to preserve Mosaic law. Such Jewish writers of the Emancipation as M. MENDELSSOHN quoted little from Scripture, instead arguing the universality of Judaism. The first major commentary on Malachi written by a Christian but without an excessive christological emphasis was produced by E. POCOCKE in 1677.

Messianic readings of the book persisted in confessional settings, however. C. Jennens's selection of scriptural passages for Handel's Messiah drew on long-standing messianic interpretation; by placement, the recitative-aria-chorus sequence on Mal 3:1-3 equates the coming messenger of the covenant with Jesus.

7. Early Modern. The rise of historical criticism in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries directed interest in Malachi away from creedal formulations to a concern with the historical information it provided.

a. Dating. While a postexilic composition had long been assumed, turn-of-the-century interpreters offered concrete arguments for Malachi's dating. Few followed the lead of A. von Bulmerincq, who identified each oracle unit in the book by season through the years 485–445 BCE (Einleitung [1921–26] i, 140); most interpreters were content with a more general postexilic date based on the understanding that the book describes the religious and social failures between the tenures of Haggai–Zechariah and Ezra–Nehemiah. Specific arguments used to defend this assessment included the book's reference to Edom as fallen, its supposed criticism of the mixed marriages later outlawed by Ezra and Nehemiah, and its literary style.

Beginning in the mid-nineteenth century the destruction of Edom mentioned in 1:2 was identified with a Nabatean invasion—an identification used to undergird postexilic dating. This interpretation, advanced by Grätz (1875) and adopted by J. WELLHAUSEN (1878), was echoed in numerous twentieth-century commentaries.

Much nineteenth- and twentieth-century scholarship found further evidence for this dating by connecting Mal 2:11-14 with Ezra–Nehemiah's annulment of marriages between Judean men and their foreign wives. In this understanding, Judah's "marrying the daughter of a foreign god" in 2:11 refers to intermarriage, and 2:14 applies covenantal terminology to the marriage relationship. During the century, however, a small number of scholars challenged this view; according to C. C. TORREY (1898) and F. HVIDBERG (1962), the passage concerns worship of a female deity in the Temple; J. Matthews (1931) further associated the "tears and weeping" of 2:13-16 with ritual mourning for Tammuz.

Only a few scholars in the early modern period denied postexilic dating completely. H. Spoer (1908) and O. Holtzmann (1931) placed Malachi in the Maccabean era; Holtzmann greatly advanced the date and identified the "fearers" of 3:16 with the Hasideans of 1 Maccabees 2.

b. Literary. The development of FORM CRITICISM in the early twentieth century encouraged study of the book's LITERARY style. Most interpreters followed H. GUNKEL and later A. Graffy (1984) in labeling the genre of Malachi as "disputation speech." The essential unity of the book was generally assumed, although the authenticity of 1:11 and 4:4-6 was occasionally questioned.

c. Value. Negative evaluations of Malachi dominated most of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Even more so than the other postexilic prophets, Malachi was deemed morally and literarily inferior to giants such as Isaiah and Jeremiah. Wellhausen, for example, argued that Malachi derives from the inferior postexilic age, during which the average person grew estranged from ritual and "Israelite" religion atrophied into "Judaism." Fed both by German scholarship's interest in source criticism and contemporary anti-Judaism, Wellhausen's analyses further traced in the book evidence of development within the Israelite priesthood. Because Malachi follows Deuteronomy in calling priests "sons of Levi" while reflecting some priestly ritual, Wellhausen claimed that it reveals a transitional stage between deuteronomic and priestly legislation.

In the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, bolstered by rising confidence in the ideas of evolution and progressive revelation, such liberal Protestants as H. FOSDICK and such evangelicals as W. R. SMITH adapted Wellhausen's developmental views to confessional applications. They viewed the rituals in Malachi, not so much as a retreat from earlier authentic religion, but as a temporary stage in God's continuing revelation.

8. Late Twentieth Century. The developments of late twentieth-century scholarship have affected Malachi studies in several ways. First, as more has been learned of the Persian experience in the province of Yehud (Judea) after the exile and as more attention turns to the sociological dimensions (see SOCIOLOGY AND HB) of the postexilic community, Malachi has been embraced as precious evidence about the period. P. Hanson (1979²), for example, draws heavily from the book to explain the sociological tensions in the postexilic community between theocratic and hierocratic elements; and studies of the social function of the Second Temple have drawn upon Malachi's description of the priesthood and sacrificial cult.

Concomitant with this surge in information has been growing awareness of how essential the exile and its aftermath were for the formation of biblical writings. Recognizing Malachi's ties to the Haggai–Zechariah corpus (including the recurrence of maśśā' in Zech 9:1; 12:1; and Mal 1:1), such commentators J. Blenkinsopp (1983) have utilized the book in discussions of canonization. Studies concerning how the Book of the Twelve was fashioned into a single volume have directed much attention to Malachi's role as the conclusion to the collection.

Earlier debates about the "daughter of a foreign god" have resurfaced in current discussions. J. O'Brien (1990, 1995), for example, maintains that the marriage described in Malachi is a modification of the marriage metaphor used elsewhere in the Prophets, though G. Hugenberger (1994) devotes a monograph to arguing that the HB in general and Malachi in particular consistently portray human marriage as a covenant.

As in earlier generations, the scholarly interests of the late twentieth century have helped to shape current understandings of the book of Malachi. Carried along by the currents of modern scholarly interest in canon formation, the literary and sociological activity of the Second Temple period, and the rise of messianism, Malachi has moved significantly inward from the periphery of prophetic investigation.

Bibliography: J. Blenkinsopp, A History of Prophecy in Israel (1983). A. von Bulmerincq, Einleitung in das Buch des Propheten Maleachi (Acta et Commentationes Universitatis Dorpantensis b. Humaniora, i, pt. 2; iii, pt. 1; vii, pt. 1; 1921–26); Kommentar (ibid., xv, pt. 1; xix, pt. 1; xxiii, pt. 2; xxvi, pt. 1; xxvii, pt. 2, 1929–32). R. J. Coggins, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi (OTGu, 1987). R. E. Fuller, "The Minor Prophets Manuscripts from Qumran, Cave IV" (diss., Harvard University, 1988). B. Glazier-McDonald, Malachi, the Divine Messenger (SBLDS 98, 1987). A. Graffy, A Prophet Confronts His People: The Disputation Speech in the Prophets (AnBib 104, 1984). H. Grätz, "Die Anfänge der Nabataërherrschaft," Monatsschrift für Wissenschaft und Geschichte des Judentums 24 (1875) 49-67. P. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic (1979²). O. Holtzmann, "Der Prophet Maleachi und der Ursprung des Pharisäerbundes," ARW 29 (1931) 1-21. P. R. House, The Unity of the Twelve (JSOTSup 97, 1991). G. P. Hugenberger, Marriage as Covenant: A Study of Biblical Law and Ethics Governing Marriage, Developed from the Perspective of Malachi (1994). F. F. Hvidberg, Weeping and Laughter in the OT (1962). J. G. Matthews, "Tammuz Worship in the Book of Malachi," Palestine Oriental Society Journal 11 (1931) 42-50. J. Nogalski, Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218, 1993). J. M. O'Brien, Priest and Levite in Malachi (SBLDS 121, 1990); "Malachi in Recent Research," CR:BS 3 (1995) 81-94. D. L. Petersen, Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi (OTL, 1995). E. Pfeiffer, "Die Disputationsworte im Buche Maleachi," EvTh 19 (1959) 546-68. D. A. Schneider, "The Unity of the Book of the Twelve" (diss., Yale University, 1979). E. M. Schuller, "The Book of Malachi," NIB (1996) 7:841-77. H. Spoer, "Some New Considerations Toward Dating the Book of Malachi," JQR 20 (1908) 167-86. D. C. Steinmetz (ed.), The Bible in the Sixteenth Century (1990). C. C. Torrey, "The Prophecy of 'Malachi,' " JBL 17 (1898) 1-15. J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1878; ET 1885).

J. M. O'BRIEN

MALAMAT, ABRAHAM (1922–)

One of the leading scholars of the ancient history of the people of Israel, M. was born in Vienna and immigrated to Palestine with his parents in 1935. In 1941 he began his studies at the Hebrew University, receiving his PhD in 1951 with a dissertation, "The Aramaeans in Aram Naharaim and the Rise of Their States," written under the supervision of B. MAZAR. After spending two years at the Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago (among his teachers were B. Landsberger and T. Jacobsen), he was appointed lecturer in the history of the biblical period in the department of Jewish history at the Hebrew University (1954). Appointed professor in 1964, he retired in 1991.

A captivating speaker, M. gave lectures all over the world. The most prestigious were the Schweich lectures at the British Academy in 1984 (published in expanded form). As a teacher he has awakened interest in generations of students, some of whom have been drawn to his area of inquiry and have made it the subject of their own studies (H. Reviv, B. Oded, M. Elat, S. Ahituv, A. Demsky, T. Ishida, Y. Ikeda, G. Galil, and others). In addition, M. edited Yediot, the bulletin of the Israel Exploration Society (1956–67), and is a member of the international editorial board of ZAW and JSOT and of the advisory board of the IEJ. He also edited four volumes (12, 16, 20, 25) in the Eretz Israel series and two volumes (4, 1 and 4, 2) in the series The World History of the Jewish People (The Age of the Monarchies: Political History and The Age of the Monarchies: Culture and Society [1979]).

M. has published over 250 articles, pamphlets, and books in Hebrew and English and a few in German and French. His Hebrew works include Mari and Israel: Two West Semitic Cultures (1991) and two main collections of essays: Mari and the Bible: A Collection of Studies (1974, 1981); and Israel in Biblical Times: Historical Essays (1983, and further eds.). Many of his writings are concerned with the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites; the period of the Judges; the age of David and Solomon; the last years of the kingdom of Judah; the Arameans; and the relations between the Mari texts and the Bible, an area in which he has made a major contribution, especially to the understanding of the formative period of Israelite history. M. has also written basic papers on the subjects of political covenants, tribal genealogies, kinship, and biblical historiography that laid the groundwork for later research by others in these fields.

Works: (with M. Avi-Jonah), Views of the Biblical World (3 vols., 1961); "Syrien-Palästina in der 2. Hälfte des 2. Jahrtausends," Fischer Weltgeschichte 3 (1966) 177-221, 347-52; "The Aramaeans," Peoples of OT Times (ed. D. J. Wiseman, 1973) 134-55; "The Twilight of Judah: In the Egyptian-Babylonian Maelstrom," VTSup 28 (1975) 123-45; "Origins and the Formative Period," A History of the Jewish People (ed. H. H. Ben-Sasson, 1976) 1-87; "The Monarchy of David and Solomon," Recent Archaeology in the Land of Israel (ed. H. Shanks, 1984) 161-72; Mari and the Early Israelite Experience (1984 Schweich Lectures, 1989). Full bibliography in ErIsr 24 (A. Malamet Volume, 1993) pp. y '-yḥ.

G. GALIL

MALBIM, ME'IR LOEB(USCH) BEN YEHI'EL MICHAEL (1809–79)

Born in Volochinsk (Volhynia) and educated in Warsaw, M. (whose initials formed his surname), held two rabbinical appointments before becoming chief rabbi of Romania in 1858. As an upholder of Talmudic law (see TALMUD) he found himself at loggerheads with assimilationist Jewish lay leadership in Bucharest. Denounced to the government and imprisoned, he was released on condition of his leaving Romania (1864). He later served various communities as rabbi and died in Kiev.

In his commentaries (written in Hebrew and covering the whole Bible) M. reasserted the validity of the oral law as authentic complement to the Pentateuchal text and implicitly combated Haskalah (19th cent. Jewish Enlightenment) as a stepping stone to Reform Judaism and the jettisoning of much institutional observance. M. rehearsed Talmudic and traditional exegesis. For him literal INSPIRATION precludes any word's being superfluous or repetitious or any metaphor's being casually chosen. His 'Ayyeleth Ha-shaḥar (prefixed to his commentary on the early rabbinic Sipra to Leviticus) sets out 613 alleged axioms of biblical Hebrew. Because of his dominant interest in halakhic (i.e., jurisprudential) considerations, he disregarded categorical distinctions but evinced a fine feeling for grammar, word order, nuance, and style.

On Gen 1:6, M. rejected Ptolemaic cosmology but affirmed the four elements "compounded electrically." He acknowledged that the refraction of sunlight in droplets of water creates the rainbow (9:13) but claimed that since antediluvian rain fell at forty-year intervals a thick cloud cover had previously prevented its appearance. The allegory in the Song of Songs describes God's yearning for the soul exiled in the material world. Writing in 1868 on Daniel, M. predicted that the messianic climax would occur in 1913–28.

Works: Ha-torah we-ha-wiṣwah (1874–50), on the Pentateuch; Miqra'ey Qodesh (1874), on the remainder of the HB; Esther (1860); Shirey Ha-nefesh (1860), on Song of Songs; Sifra (1860), on Leviticus.

Bibliography: Y. Horowitz, EncJud 11 (1971) 821-24. N. H. Rosenbloom, "Mysticism and Science in Malbim's Theory of Creation," HUCA 57 (1986), in Hebrew with an English summary, 39-86; "A Post-Enlightenment Exposition of Creationism," Judaism 38 (1989) 460-77. M. M. Yashar, Ha-ga'on Malbim (1975–76).

R. LOEWE

MANASSEH, PRAYER OF

Second Chronicles 33:10-20 records that Manasseh, the most wicked of Judah's kings (see 2 Kgs 21:1-18; 2 Chr 33:1-9), repented while a prisoner in Babylon, prayed to God for mercy, and was restored to his throne in Jerusalem, where he labored to reverse his earlier abominations and promote the true worship of Yahweh. The chronicler indicates further that Manasseh's prayer is preserved in two literary records: the annals of the kings of Israel and the annals of Ḥozai (LXX: "the seers"). Lacking any such extra-biblical records, an unknown Jewish author of a much later time remedied the loss by composing a prayer appropriate for the occasion described in 2 Chronicles 33. The resulting composition, the pseudonymous Prayer of Manasseh, is a brief but beautiful penitential psalm of fifteen verses.

The prayer has close affinities of form, language, and imagery with both the canonical psalms (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) of penitence (especially Psalm 51 [LXX 50]) and apocryphal prayers like the Prayer of Azariah in the Additions to Daniel and that of Aseneth in Joseph and Aseneth. Following an ascription of praise to Yahweh for the divine works of creation (vv. 1-4) and God's mercy to penitent sinners (vv. 5-8), there is a personal confession of sin (vv. 9-10), a plea for mercy and forgiveness (vv. 11-13), an expression of trust in God's mercy (v. 14), and a concluding doxology (v. 15). Permeating the prayer are two emphases: God's abundant mercy and the efficacy of true repentance. Most memorable is the vivid image of contrition in v. 11: "And now I bend the knee of my heart."

Nothing specific is known of the time and place of writing. Composition during the last two centuries BCE or the first century CE seems likely. Since Manasseh's name appears only in the title and since the confession of sins is quite general, some have supposed that the prayer existed long before its attribution to Manasseh. However, several elements in it are reminiscent of the chronicler's account of Manasseh's reign, and the manuscript tradition is consistent in ascribing it to Manasseh. It is likely, therefore, that the title is original and that the work was created to supply the missing prayer mentioned in 2 Chronicles 33. Linking the prayer with the biblical tradition of the wicked but penitent Manasseh enabled the author to ensure his own generation of forgiveness and restoration where there is true repentance. The work is too brief and general to allow a more precise determination of its occasion and purpose.

The Prayer of Manasseh is extant in Syriac, Greek, Latin, Armenian, Old Church Slavonic, Ethiopic, and Arabic. Whether it was composed in Hebrew, Aramaic, or Greek is unknown. If the extant form of the Greek text was translated from a Semitic original, it is a very free and idiomatic rendering. On the other hand, if Greek is the original language, it is heavily influenced by biblical modes of expression.

The work is first attested in the Didascalia, an early third-century church manual written in Greek, but is preserved only in a Syriac translation. From the Didascalia the prayer was included in the fourth-century Apostolic Constitutions, which provides our earliest Greek text. There is no evidence for the inclusion of the prayer in the early form of the SEPTUAGINT; clearly it was not in the manuscripts known to ORIGEN and JEROME. Probably from the Apostolic Constitutions the prayer found its way into some manuscripts of the Septuagint, where it is positioned, not after 2 Chronicles, but among the fourteen canticles or odes appended to the psalter. Although not in Jerome's VULGATE, a Latin translation appears in some medieval Latin manuscripts and on this basis is appended to 2 Chronicles in some early printed editions of the Vulgate. However, since the work was not recognized as canonical by the Council of Trent in 1546, subsequent editions of the Vulgate relegate it to an appendix following the NT. LUTHER translated the prayer into German, first publishing it separately and then as the last work in his version of the APOCRYPHA. Beginning with the Matthew Bible of 1537, most English versions have included it among the apocryphal writings, and most Protestants consider it one of the Apocrypha, although it was not part of the Septuagint. The Roman Catholic Douai Bible of 1609–10 placed it in an appendix at the end of the HB.

Evidence of liturgical or other use is far more abundant in Christianity than in Judaism. Rabbinic legends about Manasseh are numerous but show no trace of the prayer. On the other hand, the appearance of the work in the third-century Didascalia, the fourth-century Apostolic Constitutions, the liturgical canticles appended to the psalter in some manuscripts of the Septuagint, and numerous versions from various times and places attests to its popularity in Christian circles. Other early Christian writers, among them JULIUS AFRICANUS (3rd cent.) and G. Hamartolos (9th cent.) made use of the prayer, but none cites it as Scripture. THOMAS AQUINAS quoted v. 8 in connection with the sacrament of penance, and Luther commended the prayer as a model plea for forgiveness. L. Andrewes (1555–1626), one of the translators of the AV of the Bible, popularized the prayer in the seventeenth century by quoting it extensively in his book of private devotions.

Bibliography: W. Baars and H. Schneider (eds.), The OT in Syriac According to the Peshitta Version (1972), vol. 4.6, i-vii, 1-9. J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), OTP (1983–85) 2:625-33. A.-M. Denis, Introduction aux pseudépigraphes grecs d'Ancien Testament (SVTP 1, 1970) 177-81. B. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apocrypha (1957) 123-28. E. Osswald, Das Gebet Manasses (JSHRZ 4.1, 1974) 15-27. A. Rahlfs, Psalmi cum Odis (Septuaginta, Vetus Testamentum Graecum 10, 1931, 1967²), 361-63. H. Schneider, "Der Vulgata-Text der Oratio Manasse: eine Rezension des Robertus Stephanus," BZ 4 (1960)

277-82. E. Schürer, HJPAJC 3.2 (1987) 730-33. H. Volz, "Zur Überlieferung des Gebetes Manasses," ZKG 70 (1959) 293-307.

R. D. CHESNUTT

MANDELKERN, SOLOMON (1846–1902)

Born in Volhynia, Russia, M. was steeped in classical Jewish texts. Continuing Talmudic study (see TALMUD) in Dubno in 1860, he associated with Hasidic scholars (see HASIDISM) in Kotsk, Poland. During his studies at the rabbinical academies in Zhitomir and Vilna (1865–68), he became enamored of the biblical commentaries of the twelfth-century Spanish exegete A. IBN EZRA and the rationalist religious philosophy of MAIMONIDES. Imbued with a newfound critical spirit, he entered the University of Petersburg, where he earned a PhD in Semitic philology.

From 1873 to 1880, he served as assistant rabbi in Odessa, where he also took a degree in law. However, after being expelled for fabricating a report of a blood libel, he moved to Leipzig and later completed a PhD at the University of Jena, writing on the divergences between the books of Kings and Chronicles. He supported himself by translating and by publishing his own work; already in 1866 he had written a romantic poem, "Bathsheba," dealing with the passion, sin, repentance, and punishment of King David. From the beginning of his move to Leipzig, M. worked feverishly to compile and publish his magnum opus, a complete concordance to the Hebrew and Aramaic of the HB. This monumental research tool of 1,532 folio pages occupied him for twenty years, five on proofreading alone; and in 1899 he traveled to the United States to promote it and an abridged edition.

M. called his concordance Hêkal haqqōdeš, "the Holy Temple," and compared his construction to King Solomon's building of the Temple, quoting 2 Chr 2:8[9], "for the house I am to build will be great and wonderful," in the epigraph. Faulting earlier concordances for omitting function words, pronouns, proper names, and Aramaic as well as for listing citations in their order in the VULGATE rather than in the HB, M. assembled every word of any type according to its grammatical form, introducing each word stem with a concise lexicographical discussion. He noted any Semitic cognates, "for only through them can [Hebrew] concepts and usages become illuminated and clarified." Evincing a Jewish interest in both Hebrew and the history of Jewish exegesis, he cited post-biblical usages and medieval interpretations. Keen to TEXTUAL CRITICISM, he also indicated variants in the ancient versions and responsible emendations. Most useful, he quoted words in context.

The scholarly community showed immediate appreciation of the concordance and began publishing lists of corrections in the ZAW and through S. Herner's monograph (1909). Now in its seventh (1967) edition, M.'s concordance continues to serve as a fundamental tool.

Works: Ḥiṣṣîm šenûnîm (1864); Bat-šeba' 'ô šiqqāyôn ledawîd (1866, 1896[2]); Dibrê yemê rûsyâ (3 pts., 1875); Šîrê śepat 'ēber (3 vols., 1882, 1889, 1901); Diqdûq lešôn rûsyâ (2 pts., 1884); Hêkal haqqōdeš = Veteris Testamenti Concordantiae (1896, 1967[7]); Tabnît hêkal (1897).

Bibliography: D. Frischman, Kol kitbê D. Frischman 1 (1914) 145-58. S. Herner, Verbesserungen zu M.'s grosser Konkordanz (1909). J. Klausner, Histôrîyâ sel hassiprût ha'ibrît hahadasâ 5 (1955) 243-55. H. H. Wellisch, "HB Concordances, with a Biographical Study of S. M.," Jewish Book Annual 43 (1985–86) 56-91. Y. H. Zagoradski, Seper hassanâ 4 (1903) 291-300 (Hebrew).

E. L. GREENSTEIN

MANETTI, GIANNOZZO (1396–1459)

A leader among the Florentine humanists, M. held various positions during his lifetime, including service as apostolic secretary at the court of Pope Nicolas V (1453–55), where his contemporary L. VALLA held a similar office. He was probably the first scholar in Renaissance humanism to possess and use a thorough knowledge of both Greek and Hebrew.

M. began the study of Hebrew c. 1435 under the influence of his teacher A. Traversari (c. 1386–1439) and took into his home a young Jewish scholar whom he later converted (Gianfrancesco di Messer Giannozzo Manetti). In addition, he later studied with a certain Jewish "Manuello" (perhaps Immanuel ben Abraham da San Miniato), with whom he read the HB twice; and he became familiar with medieval Jewish interpreters, copies of whose works survive in his library at the Fondo Vaticano Ebraico. M.'s earliest important writings were De dignitate et excellentia hominis (c. 1452), which expounded a generally favorable and optimistic anthropology, and Contra Iudeos et Gentes (1454), which narrated human history from creation to the death of Christ (bks. 1–4) and presented various Christian biographies (bks. 5–10). The latter work takes a reasonably positive attitude toward pagan culture and favorably assesses the Hebrews before Moses.

In addition to translating works of Aristotle (Nicomachean Ethics, Eudemian Ethics, and Magna Moralia), M. produced a new Latin TRANSLATION of the entire NT from the Greek, unfortunately without notes, and began a translation of the HB, completing only Psalms. In the Psalms manuscript he placed his translation alongside what he called the two versions of JEROME—the Latin based on the SEPTUAGINT and on the Hebraica veritate. The translation is prefaced with an Apologeticus in five books ("On Different Detractors of All Authors," "On Various Translators of Holy Scripture," "On the Many and Great Differences of the Two Most Celebrated Translations of the Entire Psalter," "On Wrong Translations Together with the Different Titles of All the Psalms," and "Some Things Worth Saying on Right Translation"). M. was far more reticent than Valla to draw out the implications of his pioneering biblical work and to support his new translations with notes. Since he had no later ERASMUS to rescue his work from obscurity, his biblical study remains practically unknown and unstudied and his work in the field unpublished.

Works: Apologeticus (Temi e testi 29, ed. A. De Petris) 1981.

Bibliography: U. Cassuto, Gli Ebrei A Firenze nell'età del Rinascimento (1918, repr. 1965). C. Dröge, BBKL 5 (1993) 662-65. E. Garin, Italian Humanism (1965) 56-60. S. Garofalo, "Gli umanisti italiani del secolo XV e la Bibia," Bib 27 (1946) 338-75. L. Martines, The Social World of the Florentine Humanists, 1390–1460 (1963) 131-38. MSHH 36 (1736) 26-32. C. Trinkaus, In Our Image and Likeness: Humanity and Divinity in Italian Humanist Thought (2 vols., 1970) 230-70, 563-601, 722-34.

J. H. HAYES

MANSON, THOMAS WALTER (1893–1958)

M. was born in Tynemouth, England. He studied mental and moral philosophy at the University of Glasgow, then served in WWI. After the war, he trained for the Presbyterian ministry at Westminster College, Cambridge, while simultaneously taking a BA by thesis, and sat the oriental tripos. He also held a research scholarship at Christ's College for work on the Targum to Lamentations. Following his ordination in 1925, M. took charge of the Jewish Mission Institute in Bethnal Green. While working on his classic study, The Teachings of Jesus (1931), he served a congregation in Falstone, Northumberland. The publication of that volume won him a professorship at Mansfield College, Oxford (1932), and then in 1936, the Rylands Professorship of Biblical Criticism and Exegesis at Manchester University. He was still in that post at his untimely death.

M's early work on JESUS' teaching has remained his most influential. It was written to defend a comprehensive thesis—namely, that "the substance of the Gospel" is Jesus' person, not a system of ideas and that "the key to the NT is the notion of the 'saving Remnant' " (1955^2, ix). Both of these themes proved to be outstanding emphases in his own career, but in his book they are developed with sobriety and restraint. Three principles governed his study of Jesus' words: (1) Only the earliest form of a saying would do. Working with B. STREETER's theory of the origin of the Gospels, M. sought to isolate the sources of sayings, allowing for the impact on meaning of the translation from Aramaic to Greek (6-11). (2) Jesus' sayings cannot be understood as a random collection. Their sense is only evident (a) within the context of his ministry and its evolution (above all, as marked by Peter's confession at Caesarea Philippi) and (b) as part of a coherent expression of such leading themes as the kingdom of God and the Son of man (12-15). (3) To have the earliest words in their original context is not enough; to understand them, one must also know to whom they were addressed. The target of a saying might be as determinative of its meaning as its origin (15-21).

If these principles appear self-evident today, it is testimony to M.'s abiding influence. Time has eaten away confidence in the particulars of Streeter's documentary theory, in the Markan outline as representing the actual course of Jesus' ministry, and in the historical reliability of references to audience within the Gospels; yet the program of recovering the earlier form of a saying and relating it both to Jesus' intention and to the world of his hearers has become standard. In order to advance his own procedure, M. needed to define it in comparison to the FORM CRITICISM of W. WREDE and the eschatological interpretation of A. SCHWEITZER. Against the former, M. insisted that a historical interest characterized early Christianity from the beginning; thus material regarding Jesus was not freely invented. Against the latter, he argued that Schweitzer portrayed Jesus as a "deluded fanatic" who vainly tried to force God to hasten the Kingdom. M. maintained that "the thing that really matters in the story of Jesus is not the eschatological theory but the ministerial practice" (commemorative address at Westminster College, 1949; see 1962, 8-9).

The last assertion was for M. no mere debating point. According to the final words of The Teaching of Jesus, "The sense of all morality is to have the same mind which was also in Christ Jesus" (1955^2, 312). In M.'s conception, Jesus wished that he and his followers "together should be the Son of Man, the Remnant that saves by service and self-sacrifice" (231). It is apparent that M.'s Teaching is not merely a technical tour de force, for which it is frequently mistaken, but a profoundly felt theological argument.

M.'s distinctive understanding of Jesus' messianic ministry was more popularly conveyed in The Servant Messiah (1953). The manuscript was based on lectures given at Yale in 1939 and at Cambridge in 1951; the result is a potent statement of his conviction "that Christians do not inherit their task from Christ, they share it with him" (1953, 98). Some discussion has treated M.'s contribution to christology as if the only issue were whether Jesus cited Isaian Servant Songs. It should be acknowledged that M.'s synthesis rested on a comprehensive analysis of the dominical sayings and the pattern of events in Jesus' life. That is what makes M. a scholar who integrated his historical insight and his faith in a reconstruction of Jesus' ministry.

Works: The Teachings of Jesus (1931, 1955², repr. 1959); (with H. D. A. Major and C. J. Wright), The Mission and Message of Jesus, bk. 2, The Sayings of Jesus (1937) 298-639; The Teaching of Jesus: Studies of Its Form and Content (1945); The Servant-Messiah: A Study of the Public Ministry of Jesus (1953); Studies in the Gospels and Epistles (ed. M. Black, 1962).

Bibliography: M. Black, PBA 44 (1959) 325-37. A. J. B. Higgins, "Select Bibliography of the Works of T. W. M.," NT Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. M. (1893–1958) (ed. A. J. B. Higgins, 1959) xi-xiv. H. H. Rowley, "T. W. M.: An Appreciation," Studies in the Gospels and Epistles (ed. M. Black, 1962) vii-xvi; DNB Sup. 7 (1971) 628-29.

B. CHILTON

MANSON, WILLIAM (1882–1958)

M. was educated at the University of Glasgow (1904) and at Oriel College, Oxford (1907). He trained for the ministry at the United Free Church College, Glasgow, and was ordained in 1911. From 1919 to 1925 he served as professor of NT language and literature at Knox College, Toronto; then he became professor of NT language, literature, and theology at New College, Edinburgh, holding that position until 1946. He was professor of biblical criticism at the University of Edinburgh from 1946 until his retirement in 1952. He died on Good Friday in 1958.

Deeply influenced by his teacher J. DENNEY, M. centered his work on the importance of eschatology in the thought of the early church. He rejected J. WEISS's and A. SCHWEITZER's purely apocalyptic view (see APOCALYPTICISM) of JESUS' teaching, on the one hand, and J. WELLHAUSEN's purely realized view, on the other hand, settling for E. von DOBSCHÜTZ's—and before him, H. EWALD's—view, which M. promulgated in Britain in lectures delivered at Oxford during 1908 and 1909. He argued for the thesis that "Jesus represents the Kingdom of God as a matter no longer of purely future interest and expectation but of present experience. . . . The Divine spring has begun, and with it comes the assurance that the harvest will not long be delayed" (Bruce Lectures, 1914). M. followed C. BURNEY in holding that John's Gospel was composed or at least thought out in Aramaic by John the Presbyter, behind whom stood the authority of the beloved disciple. The translation of eschatological into spiritual values is complete, but the roots of this translation are to be found in the teaching of Jesus.

In his Moffatt commentary on Luke (1930) M. defended traditional authorship. He agreed with the form critics (see FORM CRITICISM) that the Gospel tradition was a function of the church's life and faith but insisted, particularly in his Cunningham lectures (1940), "Jesus the Messiah," that this tradition preserved Jesus' spiritual history and the view he had come to adopt concerning his death. Jesus built on Isaiah 53 in expanding the Son of man doctrine to teach that the Son of man's exaltation (Daniel 7) is from a life of suffering on earth. Transmuting the language used by Judaism, Jesus based himself, not on Jewish apocalyptic or on ethnic gnosis, but on the prophetic ideas of the HB.

In his Baird lectures on Hebrews (1949) M. argued that a straight line ran from the teaching of Stephen to the epistle to the Hebrews. Stephen's followers inaugurated the world mission of the church, and the epistle to the Hebrews represents the tradition of Stephen in arguing against Jewish Christians at Rome who were asserting counter claims akin to those of the original "Hebrew" section of the Jerusalem church.

Works: Christ's View of the Kingdom of God: A Study in Jewish Apocalyptic and in the Mind of Jesus Christ (1914 Bruce Lectures, 1918); The Incarnate Glory: An Expository Study of the Gospel According to St. John (1923); The Gospel of Luke (MNTC, 1930); Jesus the Messiah: The Synoptic Tradition of the Revelation of God in Christ: With Special Reference to Form-Criticism (1940 Cunningham Lectures, 1943); The Epistle to the Hebrews: An Historical and Theological Reconsideration (1949 Baird Lectures, 1951); "Principalities and Powers: The Spiritual Background of the Work of Jesus in the Synoptic Gospels," (SNTS Presidential address, 1952) Bulletin SNTS 3; The Way of the Cross: Five Studies Based on Holy Week Addresses on the Form and Structure of the Christian Life (1958); Jesus and the Christian (ed. with an introduction by T. F. Torrance, 1967), collected essays.

Bibliography: W. A. Elwell, "Aspects of the Quest of the Historical Jesus in the Works of W. M. and J. M. Robinson" (diss., Edinburgh, 1970).

J. C. O'NEILL

MAPS OF THE BIBLICAL WORLD

The geographical setting attributed to Abraham in the first pages of the HB has occasioned the earliest maps known to the Western world. Further, the earliest known map of the world would be either the Babylon world map or the Ghassul fresco, which it resembles.

1. Ancient Near East. A clay tablet sketch found at Nuzi in 1931 dates to c. 2200 BCE and shows mountain ranges, rivers, and three city-states, one of which is called "Ebla." However, the area shown by the map is probably an estate near Nuzi. Also in the Old Babylonian language, but representing a stage that follows the Hammurabi dynasty (c. 1600 BCE), are two or more maps found around 1908 at Nippur in southern Iraq. One shows the Euphrates and the Ur and Uruk gates of Nippur; another shows a stream with canals subdividing a dozen cultivation areas.

a. Egypt. The earliest map surviving from Egypt (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) corresponds to the presence of the biblical people there as described in Genesis 47–Exodus 12. This Turin papyrus claims to localize the tomb of Rameses II's father, Seti I, at Luxor (c. 1300 BCE); but the claim seems to be a "disguise," because the map was quickly recognized as showing instead several gold mine sites, probably south of the road to the Red Sea gulf from Qena north of Luxor.

Palestine is the object of another type of early Egyptian cartography that survives, not as maps, but as lists of places; these lists often hint at the location of a place in relation to neighbors. With place lists may be classed the "execration texts" from around 1800 BCE, i.e., names of Canaanite cities inscribed on jars intended to be smashed and thus to magically cause harm. The famed Amarna letters from or to cities in the pharaoh's Canaanite domains date to c. 1370 BCE; important lists show the names of city-states in Canaan written on the waists of captives taken in expeditions of Thutmose III (after 1480), Seti I (after 1295), Rameses II (after 1280), and Solomon's contemporary Shoshenq I (c. 940–915), the Shishak of 1 Kgs 14:25 (see Y. Aharoni's maps [1979²]).

b. Babylon world map. The most famous early map is from c. 500 BCE, although its origins in or beyond Babylon are perhaps much earlier; dates of c. 900 or c. 2300 BCE are variously assigned to the master map it expressly claims to copy. It is called a "map of the world," but this means really a map of the entire cosmos. Babylon is shown as only slightly northwest of the center point of the earth, which floats in an outer ocean called "salt water." Beyond this are irregularly spaced triangles that point outward, one of which is named nagu. Since space enough for another triangle is left empty in the undeteriorated portion of the map, most reconstructions show only seven triangles; yet most experts find evidence of eight triangles in the four directions on the rear of the map tablet. E. Unger (1931) calls attention to the similarity of this map to a wall painting found at Ghassul (three miles northeast of the Dead Sea); dating to 3500 BCE, before the earliest known writing, the painting shows eight triangles pointing out from a circular band enclosing several concentric stars. Although other experts have not agreed that this fresco could have influenced the master map copied at Babylon, it might be that both were highly artistic representations of a "cosmic" outlook inherited from earliest Sumer that also surfaced in the "firmament" of Gen 1:6 and the "pillars of the earth" in Job 9:6. Babylon also contributed a conspicuous feature that survives in all modern maps: the sexagesimal number system, i.e., 360 degrees of sixty minutes of sixty seconds each.

c. Table of Nations. The Bible contains a sort of map in Genesis 10. The author clearly envisioned a diagram of the disposition of Israel's neighbors in the eastern Mediterranean. This "table of nations," like its paraphrase in apocryphal JUBILEES 8–9, has been claimed to be the prose version of a map actually in use among the Phoenicians since Sidon and the Mediterranean islands are surprisingly more prominent than is Israel (see A. Herrmann [1931]). While one would expect the seafaring Phoenicians to have had maps, none survives. Some scholars conclude that they kept their maps secret, circulating falsifications to sidetrack their competitors; others note that seafarers in general have not been outstanding mapmakers.

Genesis 10 is usually dated with the P strand after 400 BCE; but it may well contain elements from before 900, whether connected with J or not. The reliable historical data it gives does not concern the ethnic blood links that arbitrarily make Elam Semitic and Canaan and Babylon otherwise, but rather the geographic and political connections of Israel with its neighbors.

The Exodus route to Sinai and the subsequent Numbers itineraries have the appearance of map data, but they do not clarify either the site of the DECALOGUE theophany or the location of Kadesh-barnea in relation to Eilat; indeed, experts have concluded that the Bible preserves both a northern and a southern tradition of the direction of the exodus. Consequently, the maps of biblical atlases must be used with caution. Joshua 13–19 does indeed provide mapmaking data, even though it combines two disparate documents: a complete listing of cities (mostly for Judah), possibly from the late date of Josiah around 620 BCE, and an enumeration of tribal frontier posts from perhaps as early as David (around 1000 BCE). But as for the "twelve tribes," the brilliant colors in modern atlases indicating their exact location must be used with an awareness that modern experts draw these lines with notable differences, due in part to interpretation of modern excavations and in part to well-justified debate as to the date at which the twelve sons of Jacob were first regarded as separate geographical entities. Asher and Naphtali are already attested in the north during the time "Israel," or Jacob, was in Egypt, and others may have migrated into Canaan from different directions and at different times. One trend sees the tribes, not as invaders, but as elements of a peasant uprising; another notes that both šēbeṭ and maṭṭeh mean "stick" down to postexilic times, when their application to territorial groups may have been invented.

Valuable in a different way for mapmaking are the military campaigns described in 1 Maccabees, especially insofar as these reflect the wholesale Greek renaming of Palestine sites. This Greek toponymy has been made into an illuminating map of Roman Palestine by M. Avi-Yonah (1936).

2. Greco-Roman Map Techniques. From WALAFRID STRABO's Geographica (c. 7 BCE) we learn about his predecessors, "Homer and the philosophers [who] first concerned themselves with geography" (1.1.11).

a. Anaximander. Anaximander is claimed on the authority of Erastosthenes (3rd cent. BCE) to have first published about 600 BCE a "geographical board," or pinax. Sometimes this expression seems to mean only a verbal description, while in other instances it refers to a real map. One such real map, a pinax depicting the whole world and all rivers, is in fact attested as having been brought to Sparta from Miletus, the homeland of Anaximander. The fact that his pioneering, though independent, efforts are roughly contemporary both with the Babylon map and with the chief cartographic formulations of the Bible is striking.

Herodotus (c. 440 BCE) "produced a lovely sketch-map of the world . . . the oldest classical map which we possess," according to B. Beitzel (1985, 199); but his sources may refer to a map later drawn from data furnished by Herodotus. About the same date Parmenides hints of the discovery that the earth is a globe, possibly suggested already by the Shield of Achilles in Homer. At any rate the spherical earth is firmly taken for granted by Eudoxus (391–338 BCE), from whom Aristotle (384–322 BCE) took his formulation that would later inspire Columbus. But the earliest and only map in the shape of a globe in antiquity was produced around 160 BCE by Crates of Pergamum.

b. Eratosthenes. Meanwhile, before 220 BCE Eratosthenes coined the term "geography" and measured the circumference of the earth by noting the angles made by the sun's rays at Alexandria and at Aswan. His 250,000 stadia circumference, depending on controversies over the equivalence of the stadium, amounts to somewhat more than the proper 25,000 miles. However, it was too drastically reduced to 180,000 stadia through subsequent observations by Posidonius c. 150 BCE, which, along with other corrections by Polybius shortly thereafter, would win acceptance by Ptolemaeus in the second century CE and prevail until 1500.

More acceptably, also around 150 BCE, Hipparchus of Samos, the leading astronomer of antiquity, added to Eratosthenes' work the observation that the round earth could be divided into a network or grid of 360 degrees for mapmaking. Alas, no one was able to apply this insight to an actual map until modern times.

c. Rome. Both Eratosthenes and Hipparchus were allegedly used at Rome by the consul Vipsanius Agrippa for a written localization of Mediterranean sites. More notably, in a wide area flanking the Pantheon (which bears his name emblazoned on the front), Vipsanius brought about the construction of a huge billboard-style world map, completed after his death in 12 BCE. This achievement had been to some extent anticipated in 36 BCE by Varro's temple wall map of Italy. No fragments or even undoubted citations of the Vipsanius map survive, although research indicates that both the commentary and the map could have been cited extensively by Pliny in the first century CE and known in part by Strabo. The map followed existing Roman itineraries more closely than it did Greek astronomical calculations; preference of milestones to stars is a clue to Roman versus Greek character (P. Schnabel [1935]).

This wall map furnished data for others that have survived. The first of several works entitled Periplus, "sea-route" (of the Erythrean sea, after 60 CE), included not only the prose description of which we have fragments but also real maps, according to claims not supported by any surviving materials. Later came a periplus "of the world" by Skylax around 400 and another "of the outer sea" by Marcianus. Meanwhile around 124 CE a similar title, Periegesis, "guidebook," was used for an easy-to-memorize geography in verse that was popular in schools for many generations.

d. Ptolemaeus. The swan song of classical mapmaking was the work of Claudius Ptolemaeus in Alexandria (127–145 CE). His Hyphegesis (guide to geography) often cites Martinus of Tyre, though in disagreement. It is not easy to track down the relationship between this surviving prose listing of Ptolemaeus and the two other contributions that constitute his major influence (see R. North [1979] 61-64). He originated what is called "projection," a way to indicate on the flat surface of a page the gridlines of the spherical earth. Some modern reconstructions show the earth, not so much as a globe, but as a cylinder, with an equator as its upper edge and most countries occupying the flat surface of the upper base. Palestine is literally the center of the world, though not as in the pious deformations that later became prominent.

The second enduring contribution of Ptolemaeus was the production of regional maps intended to accompany his manuscript. Some experts hold that he left only twenty-six such maps (the "Omega family," represented by the Florence "omicron" manuscript [Schnabel]). The alternative, sixty-four maps, is available in the Vatican Urbinas 82, whose editor, however, admits that this "family" does not stem from Ptolemaeus himself (see J. Fischer [1932]). We can still draw from these maps important data on such controverted issues as the location of "Modiane" (Midian = Sinai) at the east of the Aqaba gulf. Ptolemaeus was considered so important by medieval Arab geographers that they called his work on astronomy Almagest (The Most, mégistos). He transmitted to the busy Arabic geographical enterprises the cream of classical scholarship that was, meanwhile, being ignored in Christian Europe.

3. Earliest Surviving Palestine Maps. The next milestone, or, more literally, compilation of milestones, the "Peutinger map," depicts the Roman road system. It was discovered by C. Celtes (1459–1508), who entrusted it in 1507 to K. Peutinger (1465–1546) for publication, although it was not published until 1597; the 1618 edition was named Tabula Peutingeriana. From the style of lettering and vignettes, it appears that this map is a copy made about 1100 CE. The autodidact map buff K. Miller (1844–1933) claimed to show that its original was by Castorius in 365 CE (1888), but Pauly-

Wissowa advances the view that as early as 150 CE it served as a pictorialization of the known Roman itineraries (A. von Pauly [1980]). These itineraries have been transmitted in later forms called Antonine 300, Burdigalense 333, Gatitana, and Notitia dignitatum (425 in 16th-cent. copy).

The Peutinger map flattens the whole earth into a long, narrow band by reducing the seas to the width of rivers. Thus Rhodes appears to be no farther from Joppa than is Lydda, and Miletus seems nearer than Jerusalem. Smyrna is just opposite the Nile Delta and nearer to it than is Mt. Sinai. This flattening also plays havoc with the directions. In a general way north is up, but for Syria and Palestine it is straight right; and for the Ionian coast, straight left. Sinai and other segments suggest an awareness of biblical and Christian interest, although the map mostly continues the purely secular Vipsanius tradition. Since there is no "scale" or grid projection, place-names are inserted in every available space.

The oldest existing original map of Palestine is a mosaic on the floor of the Orthodox church in Madaba, south of Amman. It shows the Jordan mouth of the Dead Sea; Jerusalem on a scale ten times larger than the rest of the map, with some of its road stations; and for some cities legends of their biblical events (Gerizim and Gebal are located near Shechem and again near Jericho). It has been published in book and wall map form by Avi-Yonah (1954), and all of its localizations have been studied by R. O'Callaghan (1957).

The Madaba map is a concretization from c. 560 CE of the biblical sites given in EUSEBIUS's Onomasticon (after 300) in alphabetical order. This most important work of early Christian geography was translated and corrected by JEROME around 400. A map made to accompany the Jerome manuscript (Brit.Mus.Add.10049) is of special interest as an example of a long series of curious portrayals of the course of the Jordan River and its connections with real or imagined sources. Also of use from the early Christian era are some pilgrim travelogues, especially those of Burdigalensis and Egeria (Aetheria, c. 385), the "Christian topography" of Cosmas Indicopleustes (522), the Anonymus (not Antonine or martyr) of Piacenza (570), and Arculf (670).

4. Medieval and Renaissance. About 780 the Spanish priest Beatus wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse, preserved in twenty-one magnificently illustrated manuscripts (especially Paris Nat.Lat.8878 from St. Sever, 1050 CE), including notably a map of the world to illustrate the missions of the apostles. These maps embody a widespread medieval tendency to portray Jerusalem as the center of the world (Ezek 5:5). The one in Hereford Cathedral and others have been studied by H. Fischer (1939, 1940).

In many cases the position of Jerusalem in relation to the seas resulted in a "T-O" map, so called because the outer ocean was a circle and the three continents were divided by water flattened to the shape of an inscribed T. A variant of this map is the colorful "clover-leaf" (Beitzel, 203), with Jerusalem as the center and a leaf for each continent, but with only vague subdivisions.

During the entire medieval period only Arabs preserved a widespread interest in geography, centered on the Middle East and transmitting the attainments of Ptolemaeus. The most noteworthy resulting map is by Idrisi (c. 1100–66); its brilliant colors and snakelike mountains have been successfully reproduced and republished, with names in the Latin alphabet (see Miller [1928, 1981]. In the many surviving Crusader memoirs the localizations, while mostly fanciful (e.g., Haifa named after Caiaphas), cannot be wholly ignored. More judicious is the account from 1170 by a Jewish pilgrim, Benjamin of Tudela.

Scholarly cartography was reborn in the West with G. (Kramer =) Mercator (1512–94). His first map, published at Louvain in 1537, was of Palestine; in 1538 he made a world map and in 1541 a globe of the earth. His chief fame is for the 1569 map in which he employed the latitudes and longitudes still referred to as "Mercator's Projection," although he did not invent them. During the half-century after J. Gutenberg's death in 1468, in some fifty printed books on geography, more than one-fourth of all the maps were specifically focused on the Bible lands.

5. British Survey and Since. The trend to know and describe Palestine's terrain at first hand was inaugurated by such scholarly travelers as Adrichomius (1533–85), A. RELAND (1676–1718), C. Niebuhr (1733–1815), and after 1800 U. J. Seetzen (1767—1811), J. Buckingham (1786–1855), and C. Irby (1789–1845). This trend reached a climax in the 1838 exploits of American exegete E. ROBINSON, who in a three-month walkabout with his Arabic-speaking former pupil E. Smith (1801–57), localized more biblical sites than had been known since Eusebius. He again visited Palestine in 1852, and his four resulting volumes (1841, 1856[2]; 1865) are accompanied by a map specially made by H. Kiepert (1818–99).

a. Palestine Exploration Quarterly. Nevertheless, when the British philanthropist A. Burdett-Coutts (1814–1906) convoked a meeting in London in 1864 to promote furnishing drinking water to Jerusalem, it turned out that a more urgent prior need was to map the water sources and contours of Palestine. For this purpose another meeting was called the following year, and the famed PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND and its Quarterly Statement were established (PEFQS, still published as PEQ). The actual toil of preparing the survey fell to British army officers, including C. Conder (1848–1910) and C. Warren (1840–1927), men who proved remarkable for their clairvoyant insights into pottery chronology and for such daredevil exploits as the deep pit dug along the Temple esplanade corner.

The British "Survey Grid" is a map subdivided into squares of one km each in sixteen sheets plus nine Negev, scale 1:100,000. The gridlines are numbered from base points in Egypt, independent of the system of degrees east of "Greenwich," i.e., London (incorporated in the margin), which in 1804 had become universal. This map, whose reference system has become official for all maps of Israel and Jordan, exists also in 125 sheets, scale 1:25,000, and in the more usable 1:250,000 (biblical Palestine almost to Beersheba on the upper sheet) and the "Motor Map," 1:1,000,000 with Dan to Eilat on a single sheet and Sinai in a corner (available chiefly in the numerous editions of Z. Vilnay's The Guide to Israel). The West Bank maps now entitled "Israel" include also the inhabited strip east of the Jordan as far as Amman. The "Survey of Jordan" in three sheets also adds the desert farther east and includes the more important archaeological sites, although Jordan's parallel "Archaeological Map" in three sheets adds many more.

b. Wadi toponymy. The classic Géographie de la Palestine (2 vols., 1933–38) by F.-M. Abel (1878–1953) gave the excavated evidence for most biblical map localizations (although this should have been considerably updated when it was reprinted in 1967). Its maps seem unworthy of so important a work; however, those especially of the first volume on the wadi system are a treasure. All the Arabic names are indicated down to the minor runlets and thus make available to exegetes this part of the Semitic source for localization of HB place names. Arabic names often are corrupted (but according to norms that can be recognized and applied) or (also in the case of town, hill, or spring names often available on the PEQ map) "migrate" to a site four or five miles away. Nevertheless, precisely because they are free from ideological judgments, they frequently preserve the original names more reliably than does the best available scholarship. Needless to say, Israeli research contributes notably to the improving of biblical maps, chiefly by the intense rhythm of excavation and by the synthesis-surveys of various areas. Typical of these researches are those of Aharoni's The Land of the Bible (1979^2), notable also for its maps based on successive Egyptian topographical lists.

c. Aerial and space photography. Already in 1918 Germany made a thirty-seven-sheet Palestine region map with the help of numerous air force photos; one hundred of these were published by G. DALMAN in 1925. At the same time in Syria, A. Poidebard (1878–1955) discovered that ancient walls unrecognizable underfoot in desert sites appear clearly in air photos, and his technique has been further applied to seacoast sites with the help of developing underwater ARCHAEOLOGY. Pinpointing features of the terrain by photos from aircraft, balloon, or even high trestle has now become an indispensable tool of earth research. Among the published sets of air views of biblical Israel and Jordan, the continuing projects of R. Cleave (1993) merit attention. In addition, the United States Topographic Center, part of the Defense Mapping Agency but involved with economic aid programs since 1959, was authorized to produce completely new and improved maps for both Israel and Jordan in some fifty sheets; but it is not clear in what form these can be made available to academic research.

Finally the greatest breakthrough of all times in mapmaking came with the space capsule photographs of the entire Palestine-Sinai area in a single view (Gemini 11 (1967, made available by NASA) or in close-ups of the respective portions (Beitzel, 205). Satellites from the United States and other countries now encircle the globe clicking away each successive square, often with several simultaneous film layers for various depths, and returning to the same spot at the same time every eighteen days (if at 900 km above surface). Reducing this crushing wealth of data to a medium as pedestrian as maps will require a wholly new science. Already it is clear that even in the space age aerial photography will remain an indispensable and more practical way of verifying middle-range details of terrain; but hardly imaginable innovations in biblical mapmaking are on the horizon.

Bibliography. Y. Aharoni, The Land of the Bible: A Historical Geography (1979^2). M. Avi-Yonah, "Map of Roman Palestine," QDAP 5 (1936) 139-93; The Madaba Mosaic Map (1954). B. J. Beitzel, "History of Biblical Map Making," Moody Atlas of Bible Lands (1985) 195-206. R. Cleave, The Holy Land: A Unique Perspective (1993). O. A. W. Dilke, Greek and Roman Maps (1985). H. Donner, The Mosaic Map of Madaba: An Introductory Guide (1992). H. Fischer, "Geschichte der Kartographie von Palästina," ZDPV 62 (1939) 169-89; 63 (1940) 1-111. J. Fischer, C. Ptolemaei Geographiae Codex Urbinas Graecus 82 (1932). J.-B. Harley and D. Woodward (eds.), The History of Cartography, vol. 1, Cartography in Prehistoric, Ancient, and Medieval Europe and the Mediterranean (1987). A. Herrmann, Die Erdkarte der Urbibel mit einem Anhang uber Tartessos und die Etruskerfrage (1931). Y. Janvier, "Les problèmes de métrologie dans l'étude de la cartographie antique," Latomus 52 (1993) 3-22. C. H. Kahn, Anaximander and the Origins of Greek Cosmology (1960). E. Laor, Maps of the Holy Land: Bibliocartography of Printed Maps (1986). S. Mazzini, "La cartografia archeologica nel Vicino Oriente," La cartografia archeologica (ed. M. Pasquinucci, 1988–89) 239-49. A. R. Millard, "Cartography in the Ancient East," The History of Cartography, (J.-B. Harley and D. Woodward, 1987) 107-117. K. Miller, Weltkarte des Castorius (1888); Mappae mundi, die ältesten Weltkarten (6 vols., 1895–99); Mappae arabicae (1926; ed, H. Gaube, TAVO B-65, 1986); Weltkarte des Arabers Idrisi (1928, repr. 1981). K. Nebenzahl, Maps of Bible Lands, Images of Terra Sancta Through Two Millennia (1986). R. North, A History of Biblical Map Making (TAVO, Beiheft B-32, 1979); "Quirks of Jordan River Cartography," Studies in the History and Archaeology of Jordan 2 (1985) 205-13. R. O'Callaghan, "Madaba (Carte de)," DBSup 5 (1957) 627-704. A. F. von Pauly, Paulys Realencyclopadie der classischen Altertumswissenshaft (neue bearbeitung, ed. G. Wissowa et al, 1980). E. Robinson, Biblical Researches in Palestine and the Adjacent Regions (3 vols., 1841, 1856²); Physical Geography of the Holy Land: A Supplement to the Late Author's Biblical Researches in Palestine (1865). R. Rubin, "Fantasy and Reality in Ancient Maps of Jerusalem," Bible Review 9, 2 (1993) 34-42. A. F. Shore, "Egyptian Cartography," The History of Cartography, (ed. J.-B. Harley and D. Woodward, 1987) 1:117-129. C. D. Smith, "Maps as Art and Science: Maps in XVIIth Century Bibles," Imago Mundi 42 (1990) 65-88. P. Schnabel, "Weltkarte des Agrippa," Philologus 90 (1935) 405-40; Karten des Ptolemaeus (1939). J. R. Stone, "The Medieval Mappaemundi: Toward an Archaeology of Sacred Cartography," Religion 23 (1993) 197-216. E. Unger, Babylon, die heilige Stadt nach der Beschreibung der Babylioner (1931, 1970²). E. Weintraub and G. Weintraub, "Medieval Hebrew Manuscript Maps," Imago Mundi 44 (1992) 99-105.

R. NORTH

MARCION (d. c. 154)

M. was born in Sinope in Pontus; according to Hippolytus (c. 170–236) he was the son of a bishop who was excommunicated by his father for having seduced a virgin. While such information is suspect, it is generally agreed by scholars that M. was reared a Christian and was a shipowner by occupation. He was active in Asia Minor in the third–fourth decades of the second century, maintaining a discontinuity between the teaching of PAUL and popular Christian ideas. He apparently went to Rome c. 140, became involved with orthodox Christians in the city, and was excommunicated c. 144. Thereafter, he used his organizational gifts to convey his views and to establish communities throughout much of the Roman Empire.

One of the most important biblical interpreters of the second century, M. is generally credited with having been the first interpreter to give major attention to the relation of the HB and the NT and to the formation of a CANON; he has been accused of editing the Gospels in such a way as to remove all traces of the HB. However, his expulsion from the Roman community makes it difficult to get a precise picture of his position, since his writings are not preserved and what the fathers wrote about him is not always reliable. M.'s central contention seems to have been that Paul's interpretation of Christianity posed a radical dichotomy between a gospel of love and a covenant of law. Further, he argued that this insight had been diluted in Christian teaching as the emerging church stressed the continuity of the HB and the NT, the latter being the fulfillment of the former's prophetic promises (see PROPHECY, HB). As he believed that only Paul had understood the contrast between law and grace, M. maintained that the only canonical writings were the Pauline epistles (excluding the pastorals) and an edited version of the Gospel of Luke. He encouraged his followers to study these writings closely and to reject allegorical methods of interpretation. The effectiveness and appeal of M.'s message and organization are attested by the breadth of opposition among the church fathers to his work .

The pioneering study by A. von HARNACK (1921) put together all the pieces known at that time and "attempted to prove that to reject the OT in the second century was a mistake which the Catholic church rightly avoided" (248). With the development of biblical THEOLOGY and a fuller understanding of Gnosticism (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION) Harnack's evaluation of M.'s role and significance is continuing to be revised. B. BAUER's stress on the fluidity between orthodoxy and heresy in the second century has also contributed to this revision. Above all, a more careful reading of the evidence and a comparative study of the texts available to M. make it far from certain that he took the liberty in transformation of the Gospels often attributed to him (D. Williams [1989]).

Ongoing research will continue to affect the assessment of M. He will, however, certainly retain his position as one of the most notable biblical interpreters of the second century, one who took seriously the differences between the old covenant and the new and the process of giving authoritative status (see AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE) to inspired writings (see INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE).

Bibliography: B. Aland, "M.: Versuch einer Neuen Interpretation," ZTK 70 (1973) 420-47. U. Bianchi, "M: Théologien biblique ou docteur gnostique?" VC 21 (1967) 141-49. E. C. Blackman, M. and His Influence (1948). A. von Harnack, M.: The Gospel of the Alien God (1921, 1924²; ET 1989). R. J. Hoffman, M.: On the Restitution of Christianity (1984); "How Then Know This Troublous Teacher? Further Reflections on M. and His Church," SecCent 6 (1987–88) 173-91. A. Le Boulluec, "The Bible in Use Among the Marginally Orthodox," The Bible in Greek Antiquity (BTA 1, ed. P. M. Blowers, 1997) 197-216. J. Knox, M. and the NT: An Essay in the Early History of the Canon (1942); "M.'s Gospel and the Synoptic Problem," Jesus, the Gospels, and the Church (ed. E. P. Sanders, 1987) 25-32. G. May, "M. in Contemporary Views: Results and Open Questions," SecCent 6 (1987–88) 129-51. J. Quasten, Patrology (1960) 1:268-72. U. Schmidt, M. und sein Apostolos: Rekonstruktion und historische Einordnung der marcionitischen Paulsbriefausgabe (ANTF 25, 1995). D. S. Williams, "Reconsidering M.'s Gospel," JBL 108 (1989) 477-96. R. S. Wilson, M.: A Study of a Second-century Heretic (1933).

W. KLASSEN

MARGOLIS, MAX LEOPOLD (1866–1932)

Born in a Lithuanian village on Oct. 15, 1866, M. was the son of a rabbi who provided him with a broad secular education in addition to instructing him in traditional Jewish learning. His exposure to secular topics, in particular the classics, continued when he enrolled in a Berlin gymnasium, from which he graduated in 1889. That same year he followed the rest of his family to New York City, where he earned an MA (1890) and a PhD (1891) from Columbia University. At that time his work centered on the text-critical study (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM) of the TALMUD.

M.'s first academic employment was at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, where President I. M. Wise (1819–1900) persuaded him to move into biblical studies, a discipline to which few Jewish scholars then turned. He taught at HUC from 1892 to 1897 and again from 1905 to 1907, spending the interim at the University of California at Berkeley. His departure from HUC in 1907 was marked by controversy, and he spent the following academic year traveling in Europe. He returned to the United States in 1908 to assume the position of editor-in-chief of the Jewish Publication Society's Bible translation (which appeared in 1917). In 1909 he was hired by C. Adler (1863–1940), president of Dropsie College, as that institution's first professor, remaining there until his death in April 1932. He spent the 1924–25 academic year as the annual professor at the AMERICAN SCHOOL OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in Jerusalem and as a professor at the newly founded Hebrew University. M.'s magnum opus was his edition of the Greek text of the book of Joshua. Parts 1–4 (up to 19:38) were published in Paris (1931–38). Part 5, found in the archives of Dropsie University, was published in 1992.

M.'s stance on almost all matters related to the Bible is best described as thoughtfully conservative. Although he devoted over two decades to a painstaking analysis of Greek textual traditions in the book of Joshua, it was the received text or MT that he judged superior in the overwhelming majority of cases where the Hebrew and his reconstructed OG differed. In his work as editor-in-chief of the Bible translation, he generally retained the language and style of the KJV, even in making the corrections he thought appropriate for a Jewish version.

While thoroughly familiar with numerous forms of criticism and sympathetic to their goal of freeing biblical studies from the constraints that tradition had imposed, M. was not pleased with the excesses of scholars he branded radical or advanced. As he saw it, they showed little or no respect for the text, which they blithely rewrote and minutely dissected, losing sight of larger issues as criticism imposed on scholarship an "orthodoxy" as stultifying as, and far less respectful than, that imposed by tradition. M. urged scholars to concentrate on the text as it had been transmitted in an effort to learn everything possible about the people and the society who composed the biblical material. Thus, for example, he rejected the prevelant notion that the books of such preexilic prophets as Micah had been heavily interpolated with additional material from the postexilic period. He saw no reason to date many psalms to a late period and was unconvinced that Josiah's book of the law was anything other than Ezra's Torah, which contained the whole Pentateuch.

In arriving at his conclusions M. made extensive use of such disciplines as linguistics and philology. At the same time, he felt that he, as a Jewish scholar, had a unique contribution to make. Exemplified by his commentary on Micah, this contribution consisted largely of extensive quotations from and recourse to Jewish tradition, with the result that modern interpreters were often shown to have their precursors in medieval and other Jewish commentators. In his principled devotion to the study of the biblical text, M. set an example that influenced a generation of scholars and, through their students, succeeding generations as well.

Works: The Holy Scriptures with Commentary: Micah (1908); The Story of Bible Translations (1917); (editor-in-chief), The Holy Scriptures, according to the MT (1917); The Hebrew Scriptures in the Making (1922); "Our Own Future: A Forecast and a Programme (SBL Presidential Address)," JBL 43 (1924) 1–8; "Specimen of a New Edition of the Greek Joshua," Jewish Studies in Memory of I. Abrahams (1927) 307–23; (with A. Marx), A History of the Jewish People (1927); The Book of Joshua in Greek (4 pts., 1931–38); The Book of Joshua in Greek, pt. 5 (ed. E. Tov, 1992), with preface by E. Tov.

Bibliography: R. Gordis, "The Life of Prof. M. L. M.: An Appreciation," M. L. M.: Scholar and Teacher (1952) 1-16. L. Greenspoon, "M. L. M.: A Scholar's Scholar," BA 48 (1985) 103-6; M. L. M.: A Scholar's Scholar (BSNA 15, 1987), with complete bibliography, 135-86. A. Marx, "In Memoriam: Prof. M. L. M.," Proceedings of the Rabbinical Assembly of America 4 (1932) 368-80. H. M. Orlinsky, "Jewish Biblical Scholarship in America," Essays in Biblical Culture and Bible Translation (1974) 305-10.

L. GREENSPOON

MARK, GOSPEL OF

1. Early Church. If Markan priority is assumed, the earliest interpreters of Mark were Matthew and Luke, who used it as the basis of their own work; Matthew, in particular, took Mark's account as the framework of his Gospel. The earliest comment on the Gospel, however, goes back to PAPIAS, bishop of Hierapolis, writing c. 130 CE (possibly a little earlier), whose words are quoted by EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 3.39.15). Papias referred to the testimony of John the Elder to the effect that Mark was Peter's "interpreter" (ermēneutēs) and that he wrote down "accurately" (akpribōs) but "not in order" (ou mentoi taxei), what he remembered of the words and deeds of the Lord as transmitted by Peter. According to Papias, Peter intended to provide instructions to meet the needs of the moment rather than a complete exposition of the Lord's ministry; thus Mark was not guilty of any blunder in writing an incomplete account. That Papias found it necessary to defend Mark against charges of recording events in the wrong order and of incompleteness indicates that he was already receiving an unfavorable comparison with the other evangelists. Unfortunately Papias's Exposition of the Oracles of the Lord in five books has not survived.

Nothing more is known about the author of the Gospel since he is not necessarily to be identified with the John Mark mentioned in Acts. During the next two centuries several writers mention the tradition associating him with Peter: JUSTIN MARTYR (Dial. 106.3); the author of the Anti-Marcionite Prologue (c. 160–180); CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 6.14.6-7); IRENAEUS (Adv. Haer. 3.1.1); and ORIGEN (Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.25.5). Undoubtedly this association preserved the Gospel for posterity, for it was somewhat neglected by commentators and appears to have been used less than the other Gospels. Yet from the beginning it was included in the CANON (although sometimes it was placed last of the four—in Codex Bezae, Codex W, and OL manuscripts) and was sufficiently established to be included by TATIAN in his Diatessaron (c. 170).

In 1958 M. Smith (1973) discovered a copy of a letter claiming to have been written by Clement of Alexandria. This letter refers to a second, "more spiritual gospel" composed by Mark and containing additional material, which the Carpocratians had misused and also supplemented with material. Controversy has raged about the authenticity of the letter and the origin of the additional material (which amounts to only a few sentences). If the letter is genuine, it is evidence for an early gnosticizing interpretation of the Gospel (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION).

Origen wrote a commentary on Mark that unfortunately has not survived, but we know that he used allegory to make the biblical message relevant while insisting that the evangelists had recorded events that had actually transpired. The earliest exposition of the text available to us is that of JEROME (c. 393), whose ten homilies on Mark consist of detailed expositions of various passages from the Gospel. Jerome distinguished between the literal sense and the spiritual message, which he extracted from the text with the help of allegory. He struggled to explain the wrong attribution to Isaiah in 1:2, expounded several passages in terms of the superiority of the Gospel to the law, and noted what Eusebius had observed earlier—that 16:9-20 is missing from many Greek manuscripts. In the late fifth century Victor of Antioch, complaining that there was no commentary on Mark, compiled incidental comments on the Gospel found in the commentaries of earlier writers on the other Gospels. Largely based on CHRYSOSTOM's exposition, Victor's commentary influenced the work of later commentators.

In De Consensu Evangelistarum (c. 400) AUGUSTINE dealt with the problem of inconsistences and examined in detail the question of the relationship between the Gospels. First working through Matthew, he ironed out apparent contradictions with the other Gospels, explaining divergent accounts as records of two similar events and defending the evangelists against any suggestion of error. In the same way he dealt with those few passages in Mark that have no parallel in Matthew. Augustine was well aware of the different emphases in the Gospels, although he seems to have considered Mark as little more than an abbreviation of Matthew. Strangely, he appears to have given no thought to the fact that this last notion clashed with the patristic tradition of Mark as the interpreter of Peter.

2. Middle Ages and Reformation. The close relationship between Mark and Matthew led to the comparative neglect of Mark over the next few centuries. This preference for Matthew is understandable: Its author was believed to be an apostle, while Mark's was not; it contained almost all of Mark and additional material; its arrangement made it easy to remember and comprehend. Comment on Mark at this time is often confined to those brief sections that do not have parallels in Matthew. There are, of course, exceptions, notable among which are the commentaries by BEDE (673–735), who leaned heavily on the Latin fathers, and by Theophylact of Ochryda, who made great use of the Greek fathers.

The work of ERASMUS in publishing the Greek text opened up a new era of interpretation, and he personally published a Latin paraphrase of Mark in 1524. LUTHER, although he wrote no commentary on Mark, often commented on the Gospel in his sermons; rejecting allegorical exegesis, he insisted on "one simple solid sense." CALVIN wrote a commentary on a harmony of the Gospels (1555) in which he suggested that the similarities among them were due to the work of the Holy Spirit, while J. Hoffmeister (an ardent opponent of Luther) wrote a commentary on Mark expounding the literal meaning of the text. A century later J. LIGHTFOOT (1663) made a notable contribution by looking at the Gospels in the light of contemporary Jewish literature.

3. The Ascendancy of Critical Study. Critical study of the text began a new phase when J. BENGEL (1734) and J. WETTSTEIN (1751–52) provided critical editions of the Greek NT. In 1773 J. Elsner published a critical philological commentary on the Gospel of Mark, maintaining that Mark was the companion and interpreter of Peter, not an abbreviator of Matthew. All three editors took the last twelve verses to be genuine in spite of their omission from many manuscripts.

In 1774 J. J. GRIESBACH published the first complete synopsis of the Gospels (in place of earlier harmonies), thus initiating critical investigation of the relationship between the synoptic Gospels. In his subsequent commentary (1789–90) he argued that Mark wrote last of the three synoptic evangelists and used both the other Gospels, aiming to produce a shorter book. Although H. Owen (1764) had already put forward a similar solution, this theory is known by Griesbach's name. Griesbach also suggested that the "original ending of Mark's gospel" (presumed to have followed 16:8) had been accidentally lost. Many scholars in the early nineteenth century accepted Griesbach's theory of synoptic relationships; F. C. BAUR (1851), for example, believed that Mark was written to reconcile the differences between Jews and Gentiles reflected in the other Synoptics.

But rival theories abounded. G. LESSING (1778) argued that the agreements between the three synoptic Gospels could be explained on the assumption that the evangelists had all used a written Aramaic gospel of the Nazarenes. Lessing's theory was developed by J. G. EICHHORN (1794), who maintained that the hypothesis of a common source is the only possible explanation of the fact that none of the Gospels consistently offers the best text in comparison with the others. J. G. HERDER (1796–97) believed the primal gospel had been an oral gospel and had been best reproduced in Mark, whereas K. LACHMANN ("De ordine narrationum in evangliis synopticis," 1835) argued that Mark best preserved the order of the original source. J. KOPPE had already challenged Augustine (1782) by arguing that the shorter Gospel was probably chronologically prior to the longer, although he was still thinking in terms of the evangelists' using common sources. Then in 1786 G. Storr argued that Matthew and Luke had actually used Mark. This idea was not pursued, however, until 1838, when C. WILKE and C. WEISSE independently of each other advocated Markan priority. Both are generally credited as the originators of the Markan hypothesis—namely, that Mark is the earliest Gospel, that Matthew and Luke both used Mark, and that Mark provides a reliable historical basis for the life of JESUS.

The importance of this debate lay in its relevance to the question of the nature of the Gospels and their value as historical documents. The rationalistic interpretations of the Gospel narratives by H. S. REIMARUS (1774–78) and H. Paulus (1800, 1828) were followed by D. F. STRAUSS's (1835–36) argument that the Gospel material was primarily mythological (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). In reaction to Strauss, B. F. WESTCOTT (1851) maintained that Mark was the earliest Gospel and a reliable historical source. Similarly H. HOLTZMANN (1863), who argued for the priority of Mark on the basis of the Gospel's primitive style and diction, and whose advocacy of the two source hypothesis (Mark and sayings source) virtually settled the matter for years, believed that Mark gave a mainly objective account of the historical Jesus, setting out the development of his messianic consciousness. After centuries of neglect Mark became the focus of attention for scholars intent on the quest of the historical Jesus. They felt that they were on firm ground with Mark and Q; the former provided a straightforward, historically reliable narrative while the latter supplemented this with early traditions of Jesus' teaching. Thus F. BURKITT (1906) described Mark as a "historical document . . . in touch with the facts." The Gospel was assumed to be an objective, unsophisticated account of events.

This approach, however, did not go unchallenged. Arguing that the Gospels did not supply sources for the life of Jesus, M. KÄHLER (1892) described them, and Mark in particular, as "passion narratives with extended introductions," while W. WREDE (1901) maintained that Mark does not present us with a "life of Jesus," since the Christ of faith has been superimposed upon the historical Jesus. Wrede was the first to suggest that Mark was a theological work comparable to John, and in many ways Wrede's work foreshadows that of the REDACTION critics half a century later. He examined the "messianic secret" in Mark's Gospel and suggested that it represents a way of handling the tension between the belief of the early church in Jesus as Messiah and the unmessianic nature of Jesus' ministry. Wrede's book was not translated into English until 1971, but his influence in Germany was enormous. Although his explanation of the messianic secret has been found unsatisfactory, his recognition that history has been subject to theology is now widespread.

J. WELLHAUSEN (1903) was the first to suggest that Mark deliberately ended his Gospel at 16:8. Meanwhile B. BACON (1909) and A. LOISY (1912) argued that PAUL influenced Mark. During this time M.-J. LAGRANGE (1910) wrote a notable commentary, the first truly scientific commentary on a Gospel written by a Roman Catholic; he believed that Mark was dependent on Peter and that Matthew used Mark. The problem of synoptic relationships led some scholars (e.g., E. Wendling [1905]) to champion the idea of an Ur-Markus, or earlier version of Mark used by Matthew and Luke, while W. Bussmann (1925–31) suggested that the Gospel had been compiled in three stages.

4. Form Criticism. The most significant development at this time proved to be the rise of FORM CRITICISM, which challenged the use of Mark as the basis of a "life of Jesus." W. BOUSSET (1913) had already emphasized the importance of the oral period for the development of the tradition while suggesting that the passion narrative had taken the form of a connected report from an early stage. Next, the work of K. SCHMIDT (1919), M. DIBELIUS (1919), and R. BULTMANN (1921) turned scholarly attention to the individual pericopae that made up the Gospel. The evangelists were seen as collectors of the tradition whose contribution lay in choosing the material and linking it together. Questions were raised not only about the historicity of individual stories, which were now understood to reflect the beliefs and practices of the early Christian communities, but also concerning the historical value of the Markan outline. Whereas Bultmann and Dibelius analyzed the tradition, Schmidt examined the Markan framework and concluded that it was editorial.

The extreme skepticism of some form critics—notably Bultmann—caused many scholars to reject their views, but the value of their contribution to Markan studies was ultimately immense. It came to be recognized that the believing communities shaped (not necessarily created) the material in the oral period and that the material cannot, therefore, be used immediately as evidence for a "life of Jesus." Equally important was the recognition that the Markan framework did not represent a chronological outline (see CHRONOLOGY, NT) for a biography. Opposing this view, C. H. DODD (1932) argued that Mark's framework is also traditional and similar to the kerygma found in Acts. Although Dodd's view continued to be popular for many years (especially in England, where V. Taylor presented the traditional approach in his scholarly and influential commentary [1952] and where the Papias tradition linking the Gospel with Peter continued to be given great weight), it was subjected to damaging criticism a quarter of a century later. D. Nineham (1957) pointed out that even if Mark's framework were traditional rather than editorial, it would have little historical value since it was simply a summary outlining Jesus' teachings and healings.

5. Redaction Criticism. The recognition that the individual stories reflected the beliefs of the Christian communities and that they were not necessarily arranged in chronological order even when they embodied tradition that went back to Jesus meant that Mark's Gospel could no longer be appealed to as the basic outline for a "life of Jesus" or interpreted as the record of the development of his "messianic self-consciousness." A large part of the Markan hypothesis had thus collapsed. But interest in the testimony of the evangelist was about to revive in a new way. The rise of redaction criticism turned scholarly attention from the small units that comprise the Gospels to the Gospels as wholes. If the framework is editorial, not historical, then perhaps it reflects the personal interests and concerns of Mark. The form critics had compared Mark's Gospel to a haphazard collection of beads on a string; however, if the evangelist Mark had arranged the beads in a particular order, then the evangelist should be seen as an author rather than a mere collector—an author who chose and arranged his material with particular purposes in mind, thereby expressing his own theology. From being regarded as a historian, then a compiler, Mark now came to be treated as a theologian.

In addition to W. Wrede, another precursor of redaction criticism was R. H. LIGHTFOOT, whose primary concern was with the purpose of the evangelists, in particular Mark (1934, 1938, 1950). About the same time E. LOHMEYER (1936, 1937) argued that in Mark's Gospel Galilee and Jerusalem are of crucial importance as places of both redemption and opposition; however, he traced this idea back to the pre-Markan community and believed that Mark was written in Galilee. Lohmeyer suggested that the place of writing influenced the Gospel. Arguing that Mark was totally unconcerned with Jesus' life, H. Ebeling (1939) interpreted the secrecy motif as a foil to the revelation of the truth about Jesus, which is now known to readers of the Gospel. Interest had now shifted from what Mark tells us about Jesus to what he tells us about the faith of his community. Nevertheless, as J. Robinson (1957) pointed out, Mark chose to write a history of Jesus and presumably found meaning in that history. What he records is not objective history, however, but the story of the cosmic struggle between the Spirit and Satan that inaugurates the eschatological reign of God—a struggle that continues in the life of the church.

The term redaction criticism (Redaktionsgeschichte) was coined by W. Marxsen, who is regarded as the initiator of this method in his study of Mark (1956; ET 1969). Redaction criticism is based on the belief that it is possible to distinguish between tradition and redaction and to analyze the way in which an author has arranged, edited, and modified the tradition and composed new material. If we assume Markan priority, then redactional work on Mark is much more difficult than on Matthew or Luke because we have no sources with which to compare it. Redaction critics, therefore, have concentrated on Mark's vocabulary and style (e.g., in the editorial summaries of 1:32-34; 3:7-12; 6:6*b*), on his ordering of the material and compositional technique (e.g., in his use of intercalation, 5:21-43; 11:11-25, etc.), and on his dominant concerns. Investigating the evangelist and his community, the redaction critic attempts to discover the situation at the time the evangelist was writing together with the beliefs, expectations, and problems of his community. The critic's concern is thus no longer primarily with the Sitz im Leben of the tradition or with that of Jesus but with that of the Gospel itself.

Marxsen believed that the Gospel was written shortly before 70 CE to urge the church in Jerusalem to flee to Galilee, where the Lord was to return; the story inevitably breaks off at 16:8 because the parousia had not yet taken place. This interpretation raises countless problems, but Marxsen's importance lies in his championship of a new method and his attempt to discover the original setting of the Gospel, not in the success of his theory.

A spate of redaction-critical studies followed. Many of these concentrated on particular passages (e.g., Mark 6:52: Q. Quesnell [1969]; Mark 13: L. Hartman [1966], J. Lambrecht [1967], and R. Pesch [1968]; Mark 11: W. Telford [1980]) or themes (e.g., E. Best [1965, 1990^2]; D.-A. Koch [1975]; U. Luz [1965]; H. Räisänen [1976; ET 1990]). E. Schweizer presented the redaction-critical approach to the Gospel to non-specialist readers in his masterly commentary (1967; ET 1970). While building on the results of form criticism, these scholars took for granted the creative role of the Evangelist. Questions were now raised concerning the Gattung, or genre, of the Gospel. If Mark could no longer be seen as a biography or as the memoirs of the apostle Peter, was it to be understood as an aretalogy, portraying Jesus as a hero figure? Was it an apology, as suggested by S. Brandon (1969), who argued that it was designed to cover up Jesus' political involvement, or was it an apocalyptic message (see APOCALYPTICISM)? Was it modeled on Greek drama, or was it intended for use as a lectionary? One obvious reply to all these suggestions is that in writing a Gospel, Mark created a new literary genre designed to proclaim the good news. But since nothing can ever be entirely new, attempts to discover partial antecedents in various literary models have continued. Several scholars (e.g., R. Burridge [1992]) have argued that the Gospels would, after all, have been understood in the first century as biographies. Too often it has been forgotten that the Gospel was intended to be read aloud and that a suitable model should suggest hearing rather than reading (see M. Beavis [1989]).

One issue is the nature and purpose of the "prologue." R. Lightfoot (1950) identified it as 1:1-13 and compared it with the JOHANNINE prologue; others have argued that it consists of vv. 1-15 (L. Keck [1966]; J. Drury [1985]). The Gospel as a whole has been compared with Greek tragedy (G. Bilezikian [1977] and B. Standaert [1978]), and the opening verses seem to serve as a dramatic prologue, providing the information necessary for understanding the story that follows.

6. Thematic Interpretations. In trying to discover the genre of the Gospel, critics were searching for its central theme, which for many was basically christological. J. Schreiber (1961), following Bultmann, held that Mark's story was an amalgam of the Jesus tradition with a Hellenistic myth about a divine being who comes to earth. The obvious weakness of Schreiber's interpretation is Mark's omission of any reference to Christ's preexistence. T. Weeden (1971) suggested that the Gospel was an attack on a false christology that depicted Jesus in terms of a theios aner. After presenting this false understanding in the miracles in the first part of the Gospel, Mark then provides his own theologica crucis in the concluding chapters. The disciples, who come under attack throughout the Gospel, represent those who held this false view, playing down the suffering of Jesus and hence the need to suffer themselves. Weeden's interpretation failed to take into account the fact that Mark presents the miracles in a positive light. B. Blackburn (1991) has demonstrated the irrelevance of the idea of the theios aner for Mark. N. PERRIN also understood Mark to be attacking a false christology, which he corrected with his own interpretation of the Son of man. Others (e.g., Schweizer) have pointed to the fact that at crucial points in the story Jesus is declared to be "Son of God" (1:11; 3:11; 9:7; 15:39).

The identity of Jesus is inextricably linked with the story of his passion; it is no accident that he is confessed as "Son of God" at the moment of his death. Mark's story is indeed a "passion narrative with an extended introduction." The question is why there should be such emphasis on the cross. Is it to combat a false christology—or simply because it was necessary for Mark to deal with the scandal of the cross by insisting that it was part of the divine plan? And why is there such emphasis on the need for the disciples to suffer? Was it because there were teachers in Mark's church who had false ideas about discipleship; or was it, as has traditionally been held, because Mark's readers were themselves undergoing persecution? Many scholars have argued that the disciples represented, not opponents of Mark, but members of his community; their reactions mirror the community's response to the call to Christian discipleship. The nature of discipleship is a dominant theme—especially in 8:22–10:52 (see Best [1981, 1986])—and throughout the Gospel the disciples are portrayed as misunderstanding both the activity and the teaching of Jesus.

Linking the themes of christology, suffering, and discipleship is the continuing puzzle of the messianic secret. If the secret is no longer seen as straightforward historical tradition, neither is it supposed, as Wrede suggested, that the ministry of Jesus was wholly "unmessianic." Many scholars stress the fact that the secret is bound up with the passion and that it is only through his suffering that Jesus' identity can be known (e.g., G. Minette de Tillesse [1968]). The secret is perhaps to be seen as a Markan device for revealing the real significance of Jesus to his readers and for explaining the failure of Jesus' contemporaries to grasp the truth about him. Increasingly, it has seemed likely that Mark's ending is not "lost" and that his enigmatic conclusion at 16:8 is deliberate; it is only by responding to the summons to follow Jesus that one learns the secret of who he is (M. Hooker [1983]).

B. Mack (1988), who has portrayed Mark's work as quite creative, has revived the idea that Mark combined two distinct types of material—the one representing memories of Jesus as a teacher of aphorisms, the other representing him as an eschatological Redeemer. Unexamined assumptions and the bypassing of important evidence make Mack's work unconvincing, however (see, e.g., L. Hurtado [1990]).

7. Date and Place of Composition. Concern to discover the original Sitz im Leben of the Gospel and to analyze the beliefs and situation of the Markan community led H. Kee (1977) to apply a sociological approach (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES) to the Gospel. He suggested that it was probably written shortly before 70

CE in Syria. In contrast, W. Kelber (1974) argued that it was written in Galilee some time after 70 CE. M. Hengel (1985) has upheld the traditional belief that it was written in Rome shortly before 70 CE. This debate has largely centered on the interpretation of the eschatological discourse in Mark 13.

8. Sources. The study of Markan redaction is bound up with questions about Mark's sources. If he is the first evangelist, has he taken over previous collections of material? Following the form critics, many commentators have assumed, e.g., that Mark 2:1–3:6 represents a pre-Markan collection of conflict stories. The discovery that Mark was not simply a scissors-and-paste redactor but an author collecting material to make a particular point created the possibility that the sequence of stories might be his own, because he depicted the AUTHORITY of Jesus and the growing opposition of those in power. Because of the overlaps in 4:35–8:26 (two significant miracles on the sea, two feeding miracles, two disputes with Pharisees, extended sections dealing with uncleanness, parallel healings of deaf and blind men, etc.), it has often been suggested that Mark inherited two parallel cycles of tradition, which he incorporated into his Gospel. If he was a careful author placing his material in order, however, then he might have deliberately arranged these stories in parallel. Mark 13 has long been regarded as a clear example of a separate source that Mark incorporated into his Gospel. The theory that he used an apocalyptic fly sheet that originally circulated among Christians warning them about the horrors of the coming Jewish war goes back to T. Colani (1864) and was developed by, among others, Bultmann and Pesch. This theory of a separate eschatological discourse had its origins in the problem of reconciling these sayings with the church's understanding of Jesus. G. Beasley-Murray (1956, 1967) boldly defended the chapter's authenticity as a discourse of Jesus. More recent studies have recognized the large role played by redaction in this chapter and have thus challenged both positions. Finally, the passion narrative, long believed to have had some kind of pre-Markan existence and thus assumed to be an exception to the form-critical analysis of the Gospel as consisting of independent pericopae, has come under scrutiny and has increasingly been regarded as being subject to the same kind of redactional activity as the rest of the Gospel (e.g., L. Schenke [1971]; J. Donahue [1973]).

In deciding whether Mark was a scissors-and-paste collector or a creative author, it is necessary to consider his vocabulary, style, and compositional techniques. F. Neirynck (1972, 1988^2), for example, argued that "duality" is characteristic of Mark's style. It is essential in such discussions to establish that something is either characteristic of the Gospel as a whole or of those sections due to Mark's redaction, since otherwise it could be a feature of his sources.

But what if Mark's sources were in fact neither individual pericopae nor short collections but the other two synoptic Gospels? Even after the two document "solution" to the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM had become generally accepted, some scholars (mainly Roman Catholic) had continued to maintain the priority of Matthew. B. Butler (1951) put forward the most notable defense of this theory. Shortly afterward, the Griesbach hypothesis that Mark was dependent on both Matthew and Luke was revived. The foremost exponent of this view is W. Farmer (1964), although it has received enthusiastic support from others, notably H.-H. Stoldt (1977; ET 1980). Although the majority of scholars still think that the evidence supports Markan priority and that Matthew and Luke expanded the shorter Gospel (e.g., C. Tuckett [1983]), this view has been increasingly challenged, so that it is no longer possible to describe it as an "assured result" of Gospel criticism. The relevance of this debate to the interpretation of Mark has changed dramatically since the nineteenth century: Then, interest in the priority of Mark was linked to the quest for the historical Jesus and concern for establishing reliable information about him; now, its primary importance relates to the search for the evangelist's message and the understanding of the way in which he has handled his tradition. If Mark in fact used Matthew and Luke, then redactional-critical studies have to begin from very different premises than those accepted by the majority of critics.

9. Literary Criticism. The difficulty of ascertaining Mark's sources encouraged the next stage in Markan studies—that of LITERARY criticism, which has no interest in such questions. ("Literary criticism" is used here in the sense familiar to students of literature and not, as has been common among biblical scholars, of the historical study of the text.) Earlier studies had concentrated on the structure of the Gospel. Those by A. FARRER (1951, 1954), who changed his mind several times, illustrate the danger of subjectivity in this approach. P. Carrington had argued that the Gospel was intended as a lectionary (1952). M. Goulder (1978) has argued a similar view, while J. Bowman believed that it was a Passover Haggadah (1965). Then new methods of literary criticism were applied to the Gospel, and these methods were often indifferent to historical questions concerning the Evangelist as well as those relating to Jesus and the faith of the early communities. Interest had now shifted from the Evangelist's intentions and the situation of his community to the Gospel itself. This literary-critical approach has been especially popular in the United States. Composition criticism, RHETORICAL CRITICISM, structural analysis (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION)—the varieties of new approaches seem endless—all have the advantage that they handle the text as it stands and are not dependent on questions about sources and how the Evangelist has handled them. Whereas redaction critics have investigated the ways in which Mark handled the tradition, these new literary critics see him as a creative author; they are interested only in the finished work, and there is thus no need for a painstaking separation of tradition from redaction. What is important is the logic of the narrative as it stands, not the way in which the evangelist has handled the tradition or adapted his sources. This approach is particularly attractive in the case of Mark, since it is impossible to be certain how much we owe to Mark personally.

An example of the application of literary criticism to the Gospel can be seen in the work of a secular literary critic, F. Kermode (1979). Structuralist analysis has been applied by various writers (e.g., D. Via [1975]). Typical of the new methods of literary analysis is the work of J. Dewey (1980), who explored the concentric structure of Mark 2:1–3:6; applying to this section the techniques of rhetorical criticism, she uncovers an intricate chiastic construction that she argues is due to the author's literary creativity. In concentrating on the way in which the stories are arranged and told, she has moved beyond the redaction critical approach. Similarly R. Fowler (1981), who has analyzed the two feeding narratives, maintains that the parallels between them are due to the creative activity of Mark, who used the second narrative as the model for the first. Others have explored the significance of the setting of the various stories—house, sea, desert, etc. (e.g., D. Rhoads and D. Michie [1982]). M. A. Tolbert (1989) offers a literary-critical approach to the whole Gospel. F. Belo (1981) builds his political reading on a literary analysis. C. Myers (1992) uses what he calls a "socio-literary approach" in expounding Mark as a model for nonviolent resistance in the modern world. These are also all good examples of READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM because so much depends on the response of the reader.

Some literary critics have little need to ask questions about authorial intentions; they cut the Gospel loose from its original moorings and examine it in its own right, so that its meaning now depends on its impact on the reader (e.g., S. Moore [1989]). It is easy to see how subjective such interpretations must be: The reader is acknowledged to be more important than the writer. Nevertheless, it is important to remember that all interpretation is to some extent subjective. For example, in his study of the redaction-critical method (1989), C. Black shows how the presuppositions of various redaction critics have influenced their reading of Mark. Methods that claim to be objective are the more dangerous if their true nature is not recognized.

Additional studies have also looked at the way in which Mark constructed his Gospel and at the role of women. Using NARRATIVE CRITICISM, some scholars have examined rhetorical devices (J. Camery-Hoggatt, [1992]); others have considered the way in which one section is integrated into the whole (T. Geddert [1989]); still others have evaluated the way in which Mark tells his story (C. Marshall [1989]). J. Marcus (1992), who examines Mark's christological exegesis of the HB, employs a somewhat different approach. Tolbert (1992), J. Dewey (1994), and others have examined the manner in which women function in the Gospel of Mark.

Bibliography: J. C. Anderson and S. D. Moore (ed.), Mark and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies (1992). B. W. Bacon, The Beginnings of Gospel Story (1909). F. C. Baur, Das Markusevangelium: nach seinem Ursprung und Charakter (1851). G. Beasley-Murray, Jesus and the Future (1956); A Commentary on Mark Thirteen (1957). M. A. Beavis, Mark's Audience: The Literary and Social Setting of Mark 4:11-12 (JSNTSup 33, 1989). F. Belo, A Materialist Reading of the Gospel of Mark (ET 1981). E. Best, The Temptation and the Passion: The Markan Soteriology (SNTSMS 2, 1965, 1990²); Following Jesus: Discipleship in the Gospel of Mark (JSNTSup 4, 1981). G. B. Bilezikian, The Liberated Gospel: A Comparison of the Gospel of Mark and Greek Tragedy (Baker Biblical Monograph, 1977). C. C. Black, The Disciples According to Mark: Markan Redaction in Current Debate (JSNTSup 27, 1989). B. Blackburn, Theios Aner and the Markan Miracle Traditions (WUNT 2, 1991). W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (1913; ET 1970). J. Bowman, The Gospel of Mark: The New Christian Jewish Passover Haggadah (SPB 8, 1965). S. Brandon, Jesus and the Zealots: A Study of the Political Factor in Primitive Christianity (1967). R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (1921, 1931², 1995¹⁰; ET rev. ed. 1976). F. C. Burkitt, The Gospel History and Its Transmission (1906). R. Burridge, What Are the Gospels? A Comparison with Graeco-Roman Biography (SNTSMS 70, 1992). W. Bussmann, Synoptische Studien (1923–31). B. C. Butler, The Originality of St. Matthew: A Critique of the Two-Document Hypothesis (1951). M. Cahill (ed. and tr.), The First Commentary on Mark: An Annotated Translation (1998). J. Calvin, Commentary of a Harmony of the Evangelists Matthew, Mark, and Luke (tr. W. Pringle, 3 vols., 1956). J. Camery-Hoggatt, Irony in Mark's Gospel: Text and Subtext (1992). P. Carrington, The Primitive Christian Calendar: A Study in the Making of the Marcan Gospel (1952). T. Colani, Jésus-Christ et les croyances messianiques de son temps (1864). J. Dewey, Markan Public Debate (SBLDS 48, 1980); "The Gospel of Mark," Searching the Scriptures, vol. 2, A Feminist Commentary (ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, 1994) 470-509. M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1919; ET 1971). C. H. Dodd, "The Framework of the Gospel Narrative," ExpTim 43 (1932) 396-400. J. R. Donahue, Are You the Christ? The Trial Narrative in the Gospel of Mark (SBLDS 10, 1973). J. Drury, "Mark 1:1-15: An Interpretation," Alternative Approaches to NT Study (ed. A. E. Harvey, 1985) 25-36. H. Ebeling, Das Messiasgeheimnis und die Botschaft des Marcus-Evanglisten (BZNW 19, 1939). J. G. Eichhorn, Über die drey ersten Evangelien (1794). W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (1964). A Farrer, A Study in St. Mark (1951); St. Matthew and St. Mark (1953–54 E. Cadbury Lectures, 1954). R. M. Fowler, Loaves and Fishes: The Function of Feeding Stories in the Gospel of Mark (SBLDS 54, 1981). T. Geddert, Watchwords: Mark 13 in Markan Eschatology (1989). M. Goulder, The Evangelists' Calendar (1978). D. J. Harrington, "A Map of Books on Mark (1975–1984)," BTB 15 (1985) 12-16. L. Hartman, Prophecy Interpreted (ConBNT 1, 1966). M. Hengel, Studies in the Gospel of Mark (1985). J. G. Herder, Vom Erlöser der Menschen (CS, 1796–97). H. J. Holtzmann, Die Synoptischen Evangelien: Ihr Ursprung und geschichlicher Charakter (1863). M. Hooker, The Gospel According to St. Mark (BNTC, 1991); The Message of Mark (1983). H. M. Humphrey, A Bibliography for the Gospel of Mark, 1954–80 (1982; ET 1964). L. Hurtado, "The Gospel of Mark: Evolutionary or Revolutionary Document," JSNT 40 (1990) 15-32. M. Kähler, Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus (1892; ET 1964). S. P. Kealey, Mark's Gospel: A History of Its Interpretation (1982). L. E. Keck, "Introduction to Mark's Gospel," NTS 12 (1966) 352-70. H. C. Kee, Community of the New Age: Studies in Mark's Gospel (1977). W. H. Kelber, The Kingdom in Mark: A New Place and a New Time (1974). F. Kermode, The Genesis of Secrecy (1977–78 C. E. Norton Lectures, 1979). A. Koch, Die Bedeutung der Wundererzahlungen fur die Christologie des Markusevangeliums (BZNW, 1975). J. B. Koppe, Marcus non epitomator Matthaei (1782). M.-J. Lagrange, Évangile selon Saint Marc (EBib, 1929). J. Lambrecht, Die Redaktion der Markus-Apocalypse (AnBib 28, 1967). G. E. Lessing, "Neue Hypothese über die Evangelisten" (1778; ET in H. Chadwick, Lessing's Theological Writings: Selections in Translation [Library of Religious Thought, 1956]). J. Lightfoot, Horae hebraicae et talmudicae (1663). R. H. Lightfoot, History and Interpretation in the Gospels (Bampton Lectures, 1934); Locality and Doctrine in the Gospels (1938); "The First Chapter of St. Mark's Gospel," The Gospel Message of St. Mark (1950) 15-30. E. Lohmeyer, Das Evangelium des Markus (KEK, 1937); Galiläa und Jerusalem (FRLANT NF 34, 1936). A. Loisy, L'Évangile selon Marc (1912). U. Luz, "Das Geheimnismotiv und die markinische Christologie," ZNW 56 (1965) 9-30. B. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (1988). J. Marcus, The Way of the Lord: Christological Exegesis of the OT in the Gospel of Mark (1992). C. D. Marshall, Faith as a Theme in Mark's Narrative (SNTSMS 64, 1989). R. P. Martin, Mark: Evangelist and Theologian (1972). W. Marxsen, Der Evangelist Markus: Studien zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Evangeliums (FRLANT NF 49, 1956; ET 1969). C. Meyers, Binding the Strong Man: A Political Reading of Mark's Story of Jesus (1992). G. Minette de Tillesse, Le Secret messianique dans l'évangile de Marc (LD 47, 1968). S. D. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (1989). F. Neirynck, Duality in Mark: Contributions to the Study of the Markan Redaction (BETL 31, 1972, 1988²). F. Neirynck et al., The Gospel of Mark: A Cumulative Bibliography, 1950–90 (1992). D. Nineham, "The Order of Events in St. Mark's Examination of Dr. Dodd's Hypothesis," Studies in the Gospels: Essays in Memory of R. H. Lightfoot (1957) 223-39. T. C. Oden and C. A. Hall (eds.), Mark (ACCS.NT, 1998). H. Owen, Observations on the Four Gospels: Tending Chiefly to Ascertain the Times of Publication (1764). H. E. G. Paulus, Kommentar über die drey ersten Evangelien (1800); Das Leben Jesu als grundlage einer reinen Geschichte des Urchristentums (1828). P. Perkins, "The Gospel of Mark," NIB (1995) 8:507-733. R. Pesch, Naherwartungen: Tradition und Redaktion in Mk 13 (KBANT, 1968). P. Pokorný, "Das Marcus-Evangelium: Literarische und theologische Einleitung mit Forschungsbericht," ANRW II.25.3 (1986) 1969-2035. Q. Quesnell, The Mind of Mark: Interpretation and Method Through the Exegesis of Mark 6:52 (AnBib 38, 1969). H. Räisänen, Das "Messiasgeheimnis" im Markusevangelium: Ein redaktions Kritischer Versuch (Schriften der Finnischen Exegetischen Gesellschaft 28, 1976; ET, The "Messianic Secret" in Mark's Gospel, [Studies on the NT and Its World, 1990]). H. S. Reimarus, Fragmente des wolfenbuttelschen Ungenannten (1774–78). D. Rhoads and D. Michie, Mark as Story: An Introduction to the Narratives of a Gospel (1982). J. M. Robinson, The Problem of History in Mark (SBT 21, 1957). L. Schenke, Studien zur Passionsgeschichte des Markus (Forschung zur Bibel 4, 1971). K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Literar-kritische Untersuchungen (1919). J. Schreiber, "Die Christologie des Markusevangeliums," ZTK 58 (1961) 154-83. E. Schweizer, The Good News According to Mark (1967; ET 1970). M. Smith, The Secret Gospel: The Discovery and Interpretation of the Secret Gospel According to Mark (1973). B. Standaert, L'Évangile selon Marc: Composition et genre littéraire (1978). H.-H. Stoldt, Geschichte und Kritik der Markushypothese (1977; ET 1980). G. C. Storr, Über den Zweck der evangelischen Geschichte und der Briefe Johannis (1786). D. F. Strauss, Life of Jesus (2 vols., 1835–36; ET 1855). W. Telford (ed.), The Barren Temple and the Withered Tree (JSNTSup 1, 1980); The Interpretation of Mark (1995²). M. A. Tolbert, Sowing the Gospel: Mark's World in Literary-historical Perspective (1989); "Mark," The Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992) 263-74. C. Tuckett, The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis (1983). D. Via, Kerygma and Comedy in the NT (1975). G. Wagner (ed.), An Exegetical Bibliography of the NT: Matthew and Mark (1983). T. J. Weeden, Mark: Traditions in Conflict (1971). C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte, kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (1838). J. Wellhausen, Das Evangelium Marci (1903). E. Wendling, Ur-Marcus (1905). B. F. Westcott, Introduction to the Study of the Gospel (1851). C. J. Wilke, Der Urevangelist oder exegetisch-kritische Untersuchung (1838). W. Wrede, Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (1901).

M. D. HOOKER

MARKPECK, PILGRAM (c. 1495–1556)

Born into a prominent family in Rattenberg in the Tirol, M. joined the Protestant Reformation early but, in searching for a community in which freedom and commitment would be balanced, soon became an Anabaptist. He began publishing in 1531 in Strasbourg after being displaced from the Tirol by order of Archduke Ferdinand. Although a fugitive for much of his life, he read widely and sought to incorporate the best of humanistic and biblical learning into his work. His writings, which attempted to distinguish the spiritualizers from the literalists/biblicists who could not see the freedom of the gospel, comprise seventeen letters, statements of his faith, an attempt to establish a biblical basis for a common creedal statement, polemical writings against spiritualizers, and most fascinating, the first attempt to arrive at a biblical THEOLOGY that takes seriously the difference between OT and NT. His Explanation of the Testaments, published on his own printing press in Augsburg about 1544, of which two copies are still extant, is a topical concordance of some 800 pages that treats certain themes from the Bible under the headings "promised yesterday" and "fulfilled today," in each case printing the biblical text and often citing it in full. In the debates between the Reformers and the Anabaptists such a tool had considerable value.

M. held that the sacraments should be treated from biblical and church historical points of view. He believed Christ was clearly present in the gathering of people in the church and in the correct practice of the sacrament. For him this meant mutuality, and he stressed the active participation of people in the sacrament. Above all, he found the meaning of the biblical text rarely attainable when people worked alone: An interpretation was never completed until its meaning had been confirmed by the community and transformed into life. Rejecting both the individualism of LUTHER and the role given to tradition by the Roman Catholic Church, he affirmed that the Holy Spirit could lead into all truth.

Bibliography: S. B. Boyd, "Anabaptism and Social Radicalism in Strasbourg, 1528–32: P. M. on Social Responsibility," MennQR 63 (1989) 58-76; P. M. and the Justice of Christ (1989); P. M.: His Life and Social Theology (DMMRS 12, 1992). W. Klaassen and W. Klassen, The Writings of P. M. (Classics of the Radical Reformation 2, 1978). W. Klassen, Covenant and Community: The Life, Writings, and Hermeneutics of P. M. (1968). J. Rempel, HHMBI, 220-25.

W. KLASSEN

MARSH, HERBERT (1757–1839)

Born at Faversham, Kent, in 1757, M. was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge (1775–79; MA 1782), where he became a fellow of his college in 1779. He was appointed to the Lady Margaret's professorship in theology in 1807 and became bishop of Llandaff, Wales, in 1816 and of Peterborough three years later. From there he continued to maintain a strong, and reputedly aggressive, influence in Cambridge, showing great interest in both national and ecclesiastical politics.

M.'s importance for the development of biblical criticism in England stemmed from his studies in Leipzig, Germany, in 1785 under J. D. MICHAELIS. M. maintained close ties with Michaelis and with J. J. GRIESBACH, both of whom had spent time in England, and was a great admirer of J. SEMLER and the Neologians. M. worked strenuously in his Cambridge lectures, many of which were subsequently published, to promote the grammatical-historical approach as a basis for biblical interpretation. He advocated the newer Gospel criticism, linked to the name of Griesbach, and translated into English Michaelis's Introduction to the NT (4 vols., 1793–1801). The first volume, which included extensive notes and supplements by M., aroused controversy on account of its critical approach to holy Scripture. In the translation of vol. 3, M. published his "Dissertation on the Origin and Composition of the First Three Gospels" (pt. 2, 161-409), in which he discussed the problem of the relationships between the SYNOPTIC Gospels, surveyed previous research on the question, and proposed that behind the first three Gospels lay both a primitive narrative source and a primitive sayings source originally written in Hebrew. The Hebrew narrative source was supplemented to produce the original Hebrew Matthew and, translated into Greek, was used by both Mark and Luke. Both Matthew and Luke used the Hebrew sayings source. M.'s notes and essay were translated into German by E. ROSENMÜLLER (1795, 1803).

M. was an aggressive contender for his views, which aroused hostility from fellow clergy. Nevertheless, his writings and lectures mark the first major British attempt to develop a LITERARY-critical approach to the Gospels and to the Bible generally along the lines adopted in the later period of the German Enlightenment.

Works: The Authenticity of the Five Books of Moses (1792); (tr.), Introduction to the NT (J. D. Michaelis, 4 vols., 1793–1801); The History of Sacred Criticism (1809); The Criticism of the Greek Testament (1810); A History of the Translations Which Have Been Made of the Scriptures (1812); The Interpretation of the Bible (1813); The Interpretation of Prophecy (1816).

Bibliography: W. Baird, History of NT Research (1992) 1:298-301. W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem, A Critical Analysis (1964) 11-15. E. Venables, DNB 36 (1893) 211-15.

R. E. CLEMENTS

MARTI, KARL (1855–1925)

Born near Basel, Apr. 22, 1855, M. studied at Basel, Göttingen, and Leipzig (1873–78). His OT teachers included E. KAUTZSCH (Basel) and Franz DELITZSCH (Leipzig). He served as a Reformed pastor of two Swiss communities (1878–95), while from 1881 also teaching at the University of Basel. In 1895 he accepted a professorship at Bern, which he held for thirty years. He did not live to see the Festschrift his friend K. BUDDE had edited for him, dying on his seventieth birthday, Apr. 22, 1925.

Much of M.'s scholarly energy was expended in editorial and collaborative enterprises. For sixteen years (1907–23) he edited the journal ZAW, to which he contributed a variety of mostly short exegetical pieces, necrologies, comments, and reports. His second great editorial achievement was seeing to completion in a mere seven years the twenty-volume KHC (1897–1904). To this series of concise commentaries he contributed the entries on Isaiah (1900), Daniel (1901), and the Minor Prophets (1904) as well as a comparative study of Israelite and ancient Near Eastern religions intended as an introduction and complement to the whole work (1906). He also edited two major Festschriften, for J. WELLHAUSEN (1914) and for Budde (1920); to the former he contributed a piece on the mission of Zechariah and to the latter, one on the Isaian core of Isa 6:1–9:6. M. likewise was a key contributor to several large collective works edited by others. To Kautzsch's annotated TRANSLATION of the OT (HSAT[K], 1894, 1924) he contributed the books of Deuteronomy, Joel, Obadiah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi, and Daniel in all four editions. For EncBib he provided treatments of "OT Chronology," "Hosea," "Month," and "Year" (1899–1903). He also produced a variety of free-standing works: articles and monographs on the prophets and their books (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), a grammar of biblical Aramaic (1896, 1925), and numerous popular discussions of OT questions in various Swiss church journals.

M. was one of the leading "Wellhausians" of his time, sharing Wellhausen's literary-historical focus, his situating of the law (P) after the prophets, and his conception of the movement of Israelite religion from an original polydemonism, through the prophets' ethical monotheism, to the lawbook religion of Judaism. At the same time he gave more recognition to the ancient Near Eastern context than did Wellhausen, just as he was more concerned to inform and convince a wider public about the critical view of the OT.

Works: "Die Spuren der sogenannten Grundschrift des Hexateuchs in den vorexilischen Propheten des AT," JPT 6 (1880) 127-61, 308-54; Der Prophet Jeremia von Anatot (1889); "Das erste offizielle Bekenntnis," ZTK 2 (1892) 29-73; Der Prophet Sacaria der Zeitgenosse Serubabels (1892); "Zwei Studien zu Sacharja," TSK 65 (1892) 207-45, 716-34; Das Buch Jesaia erklärt (KHC 10, 1900); Das Buch Daniel erklärt (KHC 18, 1901); Das Dodekapropheton erklärt (KHC 13, 1904); Die Religion des AT unter den Religionen des vorderen Orients (1906); Stand und Aufgabe der alttestamentlichen Wissenschaft in der Gegenwart (1912); "Die Zweifel an der prophetischen Sendung Sacharjas," BZAW 27 (1914) 369-88; "Zur Komposition von Amos 1,3–2, 3," BZAW 33 (1918) 323-30; "Der jesianische Kern in Jes 6,1–9,6," BZAW 34 (1920) 113-21; "Zum hundersten Heft der ZAW," ZAW 39 (1921) 100-107.

Bibliography: W. Baumgartner, "Verzeichnis der Schriften K. M.'s," BZAW 41 (1925) 323-31; "Nachtrag zu dem Verzeichnis der Schriften von K. M.," ZAW 46 (1928) 80. H. Haag, DBSup 5 (1957) 937-37. R. Smend, DATDJ (1989) 143-47. S. Uhlig, TRE 22 (1992) 190-91.

C. T. BEGG

MARTYN, J. LOUIS (1925–)

Born in Dallas, Texas, Oct. 11, 1925, M. received the BS degree in electrical engineering from Texas A and M in 1946, the BD from Andover Newton Theological School in 1953, and the PhD from Yale University in 1957. His dissertation on salvation history in the Gospel of John was directed by P. Schubert (1900–1969). As a Fulbright fellow he spent 1957–58 in Göttingen, where he worked with J. JEREMIAS and especially with E. KÄSEMANN, whose interpretation of the Pauline letters formatively influenced M.'s thought.

Returning from Germany, M. taught in the department of biblical history, literature, and interpretation at Wellesley College (1958–59) before being called to Union Theological Seminary (New York City), where he became Edward Robinson Professor of Biblical Theology in 1968, the post he held until his retirement in 1987. At Union M. played a significant role in the formation of parish clergy with a widely elected course in Jesus' PARABLES. In that same period he also directed the doctoral work of young scholars who now occupy university and seminary chairs in the United States and abroad, notably in Japan, the United Kingdom, and Europe.

M.'s early contributions, partly supported by the John S. Guggenheim Foundation, constitute a watershed in JOHANNINE scholarship. In striking contrast to predecessors who found in John the reflection of inner-church disputes in a Hellenistic setting, M. argued that this Gospel emerged in a crisis in which Jewish-Christian preachers were being expelled from their synagogues. Central to this analysis is the contention that the healings narratives in John 5 and 9 are dramatic expansions of miracles stories like those found in the SYNOPTIC Gospels. In John those stories have become "two-level dramas" that speak simultaneously about JESUS of Nazareth and about the risen Lord, redemptively active in the strains and stresses of the Johannine community's present life. Although details of M.'s reconstruction have been challenged, its central thrust and especially its focus on the history and theology of the Johannine community have become standard features of treatments of the Fourth Gospel.

M. has also played a major role in attempts to map the terrain of Pauline theology. In contrast to a growing tendency to emphasize salvation history in the interpretation of PAUL, in which the apostle is credited with holding to a massive and enduring continuity between Israel's history and the gospel of Christ (see, e.g., in the nineteenth century, J. von Hofmann and, in the late twentieth, N. T. Wright), M. draws attention to the thoroughly apocalyptic (i.e., divinely invasive and disjunctive) elements in Paul's theology. Particularly in Galatians, where many interpreters have found little apocalyptic influence (see APOCALYPTICISM), M. discerns "apocalyptic antinomies" that set the new and liberating creation (Christ, the church, the Israel of God) in opposition to the old and enslaving cosmos, its religion, and its epistemology.

Both major foci of M.'s work reveal the influence of a dictum ascribed to Greek lexicographer W. BAUER: "On the way toward ascertaining the intention of an early Christian author, the interpreter is first to ask how the original readers of the author's document understood what he has said in it" (see Galatians [1997] 42; Theological Issues [1997] 209-10). M.'s contributions constitute a persuasive argument for the productive marriage of historical reconstruction and theological analysis.

Works: (Ed. with L. E. Keck), Studies in Luke-Acts: Essays Presented in Honor of P. Schubert (1966, 1980, 1997); History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (1968, rev. 1979); The Gospel of John in Christian History: Essays for Interpreters (1978); Theological Issues in the Letters of Paul (1997); Galatians (AB 33A, 1997).

Bibliography: R. E. Brown, "A Personal Word," Apocalyptic and the NT (1989) 9-12. R. T. Fortna and B. R. Gaventa (eds.), The Conversation Continues: Studies in Paul and John in Honor of J. L. M. (1990). J. Marcus and M. L. Soards (eds.), Apocalyptic and the NT: Essays in Honor of J. L. M. (JSOTSup 24, 1989). D. M. Smith, "The Contribution of J. L. M. to the Understanding of the Gospel of John," The Conversation Continues (1990) 275-94. J. K. Riches, A Century of NT Study (1993) 180-87.

B. R. GAVENTA

MASIUS, ANDREAS (1514–73)

Born near Brussels, M. was a Roman Catholic lay scholar who served as secretary to the bishop of Constance. He was responsible for the Syriac (Peshitta) text of the NT that appeared in volume 5 of C. Plantin's (c. 1520–89) Royal POLYGLOT (published at Antwerp in 1571). For the same work he produced a Syriac grammar (printed in vol. 6) that served as a standard reference for several centuries.

M.'s interest in Syriac led him to an in-depth study of Paul of Tella's early seventh-century Syriac translation (the Syro-Hexaplar) of ORIGEN's important hexaplaric edition of the SEPTUAGINT. M. eventually chose to concentrate his scholarship on the book of Joshua, for which he had access to a now lost eighth-century Syriac manuscript (the second part of which survives as Codex Ambrosianus). His research on Joshua was posthumously published at Antwerp in 1574. His annotations on Deuteronomy 18–34 and Joshua were excerpted in the CRITICI SACRI, and his annotations on Joshua were published in the London Polyglot (vol. 6, sec. 12, 110-20).

In common with many linguists of his day, M. judged that his textual analyses were also exegetically significant. Thus, in addition to a Greek retroversion of the Syriac and a Latin translation of this Greek, M. included copious exegetical notes, annotations, and an elaborate commentary. Among his most far-reaching judgments was the determination that Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM). As transmitted by R. SIMON, this view indirectly shaped the influential theory propounded in the eighteenth century by J. ASTRUC. Although M. was joined by a number of Protestant scholars in this questioning of traditional Mosaic authorship, such doubts were strongly opposed by the Roman Catholic Church, which placed his work on the Index.

Works: Iosuae imperatoris historia illustrata atque explicata (1574).

Bibliography: B. Heurtebize, DB 4 1:537. M. Lossen, ADB 20 (1884) 559-62.

L. GREENSPOON

MATHER, COTTON (1663–1728)

A Puritan clergyman, author, and commentator, M. was born in Boston, Massachusetts. He received the AB (1678) and the MA (1681) from Harvard and was ordained at the Second Church in 1685, where he served as his father's (I. Mather [1639–1723]) colleague until 1723. He published more than 450 items, including several lengthy books and numerous pamphlets.

M.'s premier work as an exegete, and in his view his finest effort, was his six-volume commentary on the whole Bible written between August 1693 and May 1706. For the next twenty-two years he sought a publisher and added material to keep the commentary updated. The manuscript, Biblia Americana, more than 1,000 pages per volume, was never published and is at the Massachusetts Historical Society.

M. made twelve observations about the work's contents in various advertisements: (1) the King James translation revised; (2) a rich collection of antiquities; (3) types collated with antitypes; (4) laws and history of Israel; (5) treasures from the TALMUD and Jewish writers; (6) natural philosophy called into the service of scriptural religion; (7) a correct CHRONOLOGY; (8) the geography of Palestine and Paradise; (9) a twenty-ninth chapter of Acts—that is, a short church history to the present; (10) the eradication of contradictions; (11) history from all nations showing the fulfillment of PROPH-

ECY; and (12) "some essays to illustrate the Scriptures, from experimental piety, or the observations of Christian experience."

M.'s survey of the materials is impressive, but what he accomplished was an updating of medieval glosses. He utilized the text as the occasion for organizing the spectrum of contemporary knowledge but manifested little interest in how it was to be read in light of its own character and milieu. His commentary was not unlike those of the time, except that he dwelt more upon curiosities than did J. LIGHTFOOT, who stressed philology, and M. HENRY, who emphasized Christian nurture.

Works: For a list of Mather's works, see DARB 294-96.

Bibliography: P. Miller, The New England Mind from Colony to Province (1953). T. H. Olbricht, "Biblical Primitivism in American Biblical Scholarship, 1630–1870," The American Quest for the Primitive Church (ed. R. T. Hughes, 1988) 81-98. J. L. Sibley, Biographical Sketches of Graduates of Harvard 3 (1885).

T. H. OLBRICHT

MATHEWS, SHAILER (1863–1941)

Born in Portland, Maine, M. graduated from Colby College in 1884 and from Newton Theological Seminary in 1887. He taught at Colby as assistant professor of rhetoric, then moved to the department of history and political economy, where he also taught SOCIOLOGY. In 1890 he studied history in Berlin and on returning taught at Colby until being invited by E. BURTON, his teacher at Newton, to a position as associate professor of NT history at Chicago in 1894. In 1905 he shifted to systematic theology, and from 1908 to 1933 he served as dean of the divinity school.

M. published several books on the NT with Burton and even more by himself. In The Social Teaching of Jesus (1897) he set out JESUS' perspectives on humankind, society, the family, the state, wealth, social life, forces of human progress, and the process of social regeneration; such depiction is now designated biblical anthropology. He pointed out that while the Gospels contain various corruptions and editorial additions, these may be easily ascertained through criticism, leaving a sizable body of authentic Jesus material. M. argued that "divine sonship and consequent human brotherliness" comprised the core of Jesus' social doctrine. In The Faith of Modernism (1924) M. criticized early Protestantism because it "detached the Bible from history and declared it to be the sole and divinely given basis of revealed truth." He declared that a modernist is one who "implicitly trusts the historical method" and argued that the Bible as understood by grammatical-historical criticism "is a trustworthy record of human experience of God," which includes attitudes and convictions. He rejected the inerrancy of the Scriptures and accepted standard critical positions, but affirmed the INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE in regard to persons—rather than words—who had experienced the Spirit of God.

M. exemplified the Chicago predilection for a scientific approach—that is, the belief that the Scriptures were to be scrutinized from a philological, exegetical, historical, and developing sociological perspective. But also with the Chicago school, he became impressed with the weight of experience as equal with and, later, as more important than the witness of the Scriptures.

Works: The Social Teaching of Jesus, an Essay in Christian Sociology (1897); A History of NT Times in Palestine 175 BC–70 AD (1899); (with E. D. Burton), Constructive Studies in the Life of Christ (1900) and The Life of Christ (1900); The Messianic Hope in the NT (1905); (sectional ed.), HDB (1909); Jesus on Social Institutions (1928); "Theology as Group Belief," Contemporary American Theology: Theological Autobiographies (2 vols., ed. V. Ferm, 1932–33) 2:161-93; New Faith for Old: An Autobiography (1936).

Bibliography: C. H. Arnold, Near the Edge of the Battle: A Short History of the Divinity School and the Chicago School of Theology, 1866–1966 (1966). K. Cauthen, "The Life and Thought of S. M.," Jesus on Social Institutions (reissue, LJS, 1971) xiii-lxxiii. R. W. Funk, "The Watershed of the American Biblical Tradition: The Chicago School, First Phase, 1892–1920," JBL 95 (1976) 4-22. T. H. Olbricht, "NT Studies at the University of Chicago: The First Decade 1892–1902," ResQ 22 (1979) 84-99. K. L. Smith, "S. M.: Theologian of Social Process" (diss., Duke University, 1959).

T. H. OLBRICHT

MATTHES, JAN KAREL (1836–1917)

Professor of oriental literature at the University of Amsterdam from 1877 (the date of its establishment) to 1906, M. taught OT exegesis for the theological faculty after 1890, treating this as an entirely secular subject in the spirit of the radical left-wing of Dutch modernism. He completed his doctoral dissertation under J. Scholten (1811–85) at Leiden on the subject of false PROPHECY in Israel. After the death of A. KUENEN, his father-in-law, M. was called to publish the third volume of the latter's influential Historisch-critische onderzoek naar het ontstaan en de verzameling van de boeken des Ouden Verbonds (1887–92). Strongly under the influence of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE, M. examined dynamism and taboo in ancient Israel in numerous essays as well as the connection of the psalms with the Temple cult, a seventh-century date for the DECALOGUE, and primitive myth (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) in Israel's literary development. He was a popularizer of biblical topics on behalf of the humanistic Vrije Gemeente in Amsterdam.

Works: Het boek Job vertaald en verklaard (1866, 1876²); The False Prophets of Israel (1884); De israelietische wijzen (1911); Een bundel verzamelde opstellen (1913).

Bibliography: Album Academicum van het Athenaeum Illustrae en van de Universiteit van Amsterdam (1913), in loco. S. J. DeVries, Bible and Theology in the Netherlands (1968, 1989²) 82-86.

S. J. DEVRIES

MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF

The evangelist's purposes and the setting of his Gospel within first-century Judaism and Christianity raise numerous questions that have continued to fascinate and bemuse scholars. Was Matthew a conservative Jewish Christian whose community retained its links with contemporary Judaism? Or was he a Gentile whose readers had abandoned completely their earlier links with Judaism? Did he understand "this gospel of the kingdom" (24:14) to be "true Judaism," "fulfilled Judaism," or a "new religion"? Did he intend to counter the views of some extreme Paulists? Why is his anti-Jewish polemic even more ferocious than it is in the sources on which he drew? These questions have been debated keenly since the development of historical criticism at the end of the eighteenth century, which led to a much deeper appreciation of the distinctive features of Matthew's Gospel. Until then Matthew's theological perspective and the historical setting of his Gospel had not been sharply differentiated from those of Mark and Luke.

1. Early Interpretation. Soon after its composition the Gospel of Matthew became the dominant account of the life and teaching of JESUS. Toward the end of the second century, John's Gospel began to rival Matthew's in popularity; but by then Matthew had already created the climate of ordinary Christianity in most parts of the church. In the early centuries Matthew was cited and commented on more frequently than the other Gospels were. With a few exceptions, Matthew heads lists and manuscript copies of the four Gospels. The early widespread use of Matthew is easy to explain: In the early church there was universal acceptance of the tradition that Matthew the apostle had written it. Matthew's stylistic abilities and his full and carefully ordered collections of the sayings of Jesus in five discourses made his Gospel particularly useful for catechetical instruction. Its Jewish features encouraged Jewish Christian groups (of various kinds) to use it, and its pro-Gentile passages ensured its ready acceptance by the gentile church.

The terse comment of PAPIAS on the Gospel's origin was influential from the middle of the second century until the early decades of this century. About 130 CE Papias stated that "Matthew put together in the Hebrew language the discourses and each one translated them as best he could" (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 3.39.14). There is still no agreement on the precise meaning of these words, however. Did Papias think that Matthew was written in Hebrew or in Aramaic? Or was he referring to Matthew's "Jewish forms of expression" in his Greek Gospel? Was he referring to the composition of the five discourses, to Q, or to the whole Gospel? Did Papias mean that the discourses were translated from one language to another or simply interpreted? IRENAEUS probably knew Papias's comment; he certainly accepted this explanation of the Gospel's origin, adding that Matthew was written for "preaching among Hebrews" (Adv. haer. 1; Fragments 29). TATIAN, who composed a harmony of the four Gospels (about 170 CE), thought that Matthew provided the most reliable historical account of the ministry of Jesus before the passion.

Although the differences between the SYNOPTIC Gospels and John were widely appreciated in the early church (and accounted for in a variety of ways), most writers assumed that Matthew's Gospel contained the very words of Jesus. The comments of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA on Matthew's Beatitudes are a particularly interesting exception. In Salvation of the Rich Man (17) he noted that Matthew had added (presumably to an earlier source) "in spirit" to the beatitude about the poor (5:3), and "for God's righteousness" to the beatitude concerning those who hunger and thirst (5:6). Clement was probably the first to appreciate that Matthew had modified earlier traditions, so we may consider him the first REDACTION critic!

About half of ORIGEN's commentary on Matthew (written about 250 CE) has survived; it was the most extensive one written in the early church. He accepted the tradition that Matthew was written by the apostle in Hebrew "for the believers from Judaism," but he did not use this view to explain the differences between Matthew and the other Gospels. Origen readily conceded that there are major disagreements between the four Gospels and that it was difficult to accept the literal meaning of some sayings and stories. At times (esp. in his reply to the shrewd criticisms of the anti-Christian Celsus) he grappled seriously with these problems. More frequently he rejoiced in them because they forced the reader to search for the allegorical or spiritual meaning of the text, which he took to be primary.

Origen's distinction between the literal and the spiritual meanings of the text did not win the day. Later writers rarely matched his grasp of the theological and historical difficulties that confront the interpreter of the Gospels. They almost all assumed (without discussion) the traditional view that Matthew the apostle wrote the first Gospel in Hebrew and that he had provided an accurate account of the life and teaching of Jesus.

2. Reformation. LUTHER frequently quoted verses from Matthew, but in the 1522 preface to his TRANSLATION of the NT, he singled out John, 1 John, Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and 1 Peter as "the true and noblest books of the NT." Luther was aware of some of the problems facing the reader of Matthew. For example, he knew that the infancy narratives in Matthew and Luke could not be harmonized. He also recognized that Matt 27:9 mistakenly cites Jeremiah for Zechariah but commented that "such points do not bother me particularly" (1955, 20:125). Given his distinctive theological criterion for the interpretation of Scripture, his indifference is no surprise.

CALVIN, on the other hand, parted company with the views of the origin of Matthew that were almost universal in the early church. He claimed that since Matthew cited the Greek translation of the HB, he could not have composed his Gospel in Hebrew. He firmly rejected AUGUSTINE's opinion (which he mistakenly attributed to Jerome) that Mark is an abridgement of Matthew and conjectured (cautiously) that Mark had not seen Matthew when he wrote. Calvin did not explore the relationship between Matthew, Mark, and Luke closely; but he insisted that it was impossible to expound properly any one of the evangelists without comparing him with the other two.

Calvin's commentary on his own harmony of the synoptic Gospels followed Matthew's order very closely; yet, he did not suppose that Matthew had provided a verbatim and chronologically accurate account of the life and teaching of Jesus. In several places Calvin suggested that both Matthew and Luke rearranged the traditions to suit their own purposes. In his comments on Matt 23:34, Calvin conceded that Matthew's version of the saying of Jesus is "defective: its meaning must be supplied from the words of Luke" (1956, 3:101). These anticipations of modern Gospel criticism, however, are comparatively infrequent in Calvin's crisp exposition. More often than not he simply noted but did not account for the differences between the synoptic Gospels. Like Luther, and unlike several writers in the early church, he rarely attempted to explain the differences between the synoptic Gospels and John.

3. The Rise of Modern Study of Matthew. The development of historical criticism in the eighteenth century led to a thorough investigation of the origins and distinctive features of the four canonical Gospels. Although the traditional view that Matthew was the first Gospel to be written was frequently challenged in the final decades of the eighteenth century, it was still widely supported in the middle of the nineteenth century. In 1847 F. C. BAUR set out his views on the "tendencies" of the four evangelists as part of his bold reconstruction of the development of earliest Christianity. Baur accepted J. J. GRIESBACH's view (1783) that Luke used Matthew (the first Gospel) and that Mark used both Matthew and Luke. With the exception of passages that expected an imminent parousia, Baur considered Matthew's "Jewish" Gospel as historically reliable. In constrast, just a few years earlier in 1838 C. WILKE and H. WEISSE had independently defended Markan priority, but their case was accepted only slowly. In 1911 the Pontifical Biblical Commission still echoed Papias in its insistence that the apostle Matthew wrote the first Gospel—and not merely a collection of logia. By then (with the notable exception of T. von Zahn [1897-99]) most Protestant scholars, however, had accepted Markan priority.

Abandonment of the traditional view of Matthew's origin led to a reappraisal of its distinctive features and its setting in early Christianity. Once Markan priority was accepted, it became impossible to equate the "Jewishness" of Matthew with its early origin in Palestine and authorship by the apostle. In 1918 B. BACON argued that the evangelist had gathered together teaching material from his sources into five great discourses that correspond to the five books of the commandments of Moses. Ten years later E. von DOBSCHÜTZ (1928) claimed that since Matthew was primarily concerned with catechetical instruction, the evangelist was a converted rabbi who had probably been trained in the school of Johanan ben Zakkai immediately after the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE. The Gospel's structure, its overall purpose, and its relationship to contemporary Judaism have all been high on the agenda of Matthean specialists ever since.

4. Modern Trends in Interpretation. The period immediately after 1945 is particularly important for the modern interpretation of Matthew. G. Kilpatrick, K. STENDAHL, and W. D. DAVIES each wrote influential books. Kilpatrick (1946) wrote a major study of the origins and purposes of Matthew, some parts of which anticipated the later development of redaction criticism. His exposition of Matthean style and of the Gospel's relationship to Judaism stimulated further discussion; however, his claim that Matthew was written to be read liturgically has attracted less attention, although it is a plausible explanation of many of the Gospel's distinctive features. Stendahl (1954) claimed that in Matthew's "formula" quotations of the HB, the biblical text is treated in somewhat the same manner as in the Habakkuk scroll that had recently been discovered at Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). In a lengthy and thorough study of the setting of the SERMON ON THE MOUNT in early Judaism and in early Christianity, Davies (1964) cautiously suggested that the sermon (and by implication, the whole Gospel) was a kind of Christian counterpart to aspects of the reconstruction of Judaism that occurred at Jamnia following the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE.

a. Redaction criticism. In the meantime a fresh approach to the interpretation of Matthew had developed in Germany. G. BORNKAMM's 1948 essay (G. Bornkamm, G. Barth, and H. Held [1960]) on the stilling of the storm pericope marks the beginning of the thoroughgoing redaction-critical approach that dominated Matthean scholarship for more than thirty years. Assuming that Matthew had used Mark's account of the stilling of the storm, Bornkamm paid close attention to the additions, modificiations, and omissions the Evangelist made as well as to the different context in which the pericope had been placed. Bornkamm concluded that Matthew had not merely handed down the Markan story but had expounded its theological significance in his own way. Thus Matthew is the first exegete of the Markan pericope. Matthew's redaction of Mark (which often appears at first to involve changes to purely incidental details) shows "proof of definite theological intentions" with its references to discipleship and to "the little ship of the church."

This essay (which was not translated into English until 1963) paved the way for a number of redactional studies of Matthean themes or sections of the Gospel, all of which drew attention to Matthew's distinctive theological viewpoint. In the first phase of redaction criticism, outstanding monographs were published by W. Trilling (1959), G. Strecker (1962), and R. Hummel (1963). Although they have never been translated into English, in due course they encouraged many English-speaking scholars to use redaction-critical methods. The translation into English in 1968 of J. Rohde's thorough survey of the first phase of redaction-critical work on Matthew stimulated further research from this standpoint. Careful isolation of the evangelist's redaction of his sources has been the basis of numerous expositions of Matthew's christology, his ecclesiology, and the relationship of his community to contemporary Judaism.

In the first phase of redaction criticism, few scholars challenged the presupposition that Matthew wove together Mark, Q, and some special traditions (see, however, A. Butler [1951]). W. FARMER (1964) and C. Tuckett (1983) have also expressed doubts about Markan priority. However, Markan priority remains the basis of most Matthean scholarship in the last decades of the twentieth century. Criticism of Q has been more rigorous. M. Goulder (1974), for example, claimed that apart from a handful of oral traditions Mark was Matthew's only source. Matthew used midrashic methods (see MIDRASH) and freely expanded Mark for liturgical purposes. Goulder's exposition of Matthean style has been warmly welcomed, but his midrashic and lectionary theories have been severely criticized. Goulder (1989) also published a thorough defense of the view that Luke used Matthew and Mark but not Q. If so, then Luke becomes the very first interpreter of Matthew! In order to advance his own particular views, Luke virtually demolished Matthew's carefully constructed discourses and abandoned Matthew's finely honed phrases and distinctive vocabulary.

Many scholars acknowledge that the Q hypothesis has difficulties but consider these minimal in comparison with those faced by rival views of Matthew's and Luke's redactional methods. In their multi-volume commentaries on Matthew, U. Luz (3 vols., 1985, 1990, 1997), J. Gnilka (2 vols., 1986, 1988), and W. D. Davies and D. Allison (3 vols., 1988, 1991, 1997) all accept that Matthew used both Mark and Q and that redaction criticism remains the most fruitful way of uncovering the Evangelist's purposes.

Redaction critics of Matthew must continue to address four important issues. First, they must recognize the possibility that some of the Evangelist's modifications are stylistic rather than theological. For example, Matthew's accounts of the feeding of the five thousand and of the four thousand have been said to reflect more clearly than Mark 6:41; 8:6 the institution of the Eucharist; yet, on closer inspection Matthew's alterations of Mark turn out to be completely consistent with purely stylistic modifications he makes elsewhere. Second, they must be careful not to gloss over inconsistencies too readily and thus set aside one strand of the evidence as "pre-Matthean tradition" and accept another as the Evangelist's own contribution. In 10:5-6, for example, the disciples are forbidden to go to the Gentiles but are sent to "the lost sheep of the house of Israel." How can this passage be related to the universalist, pro-Gentile and anti-Jewish sayings found throughout the Gospel? Matthew's attitude to the law is equally problematic. While most redaction critics agree that it is generally more conservative than Mark's, the evangelist included disparate or even contradictory statements. M. Suggs (1970) echoed the depair of many redaction critics when he concluded that Matthew's presentation of Jesus' attitude to the law makes jugglers of us all!

Third, redaction critics must acknowledge that Matthew frequently used his traditions with little or no modification simply because he accepted them and wished to preserve them and make them part of his portrait of Jesus and of his message to his own Christian communities. Earlier traditions reflect Matthew's theological convictions just as much as his redactional modification; Matthew used material from his tradition in the service of his own major themes and purposes. Fourth, redaction critics must become aware that Matthew is writing a Gospel, not a letter, and that it is most unlikely that he intended to counter the views of a particular group of Christians. Although several scholars have accepted G. Barth's view (Bornkamm, Barth, and Held) that Matthew opposed Christian antinomian heretics who threatened the true life of the congregation, Matthew's references to "lawlessness" and to "false prophets" in key passages are general and not limited specifically to antinomians.

b. Literary-critical approaches. LITERARY-critical and SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC insights have become prominent in interpretation of Matthew, but not as a result of a strong conviction that redaction criticism is a misguided method. Some scholars have felt that since that particular seam has, as it were, now been almost fully worked out, methods that have been fruitful in the study of other biblical writings should be explored. Other scholars, accepting that literary criticism and social-scientific criticism are natural outgrowths of redaction criticism, have used these methods to gain insight into the Gospel of Matthew.

Literary-critical studies have taken several forms, including: STRUCTURALISM, NARRATIVE CRITICISM, and READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM. In 1987 D. Patte published a full structuralist commentary concerned with the evangelist's faith (or "system of convictions") rather than with the Gospel's first-century setting. He works with two basic premises. Since Matthew has set out not only what he wants to say but also what he does not want to say, attention must be paid to "narrative oppositions" in the text. In addition, the interpreter must look for the tensions between the readers' "old knowledge" and the "new knowledge" that the Evangelist is seeking to communicate. Patte lucidly expounds one form of structuralism and shows how it might be used in exegesis. He does not reject traditional methods—they are in fact used in his notes. However, he fails to show how a structuralist approach might be integrated with other methods to provide a fresh reading of the text.

In the mid 1980s, R. Edwards (1985) and J. Kingsbury (1986) used narrative-critical methods in order to elucidate the meaning of Matthew for readers today. Their work has been developed further by a number of younger scholars, several of whom were Kingsbury's doctoral students (D. Bauer [1988]; D. Weaver [1990]). Narrative-critical studies of Matthew have their roots in "composition criticism," a modified form of redaction criticism that set out Matthew's distinctive viewpoint without source-critical presuppositions. Attention was directed away from Matthew's redaction of his sources to his methods of composition, to the overall structure of the Gospel, to the structure of individual sections and sub-sections, and to the order in which traditions are placed. In his study of Matthew's fourth discourse in chap. 18, for example, W. Thompson (1970) insisted that Matthew must be read "in terms of Matthew," a method he dubbed "vertical analysis" in contrast to the "horizontal analysis" of redaction criticism. Narrative criticism also concentrates on the Evangelist's methods of composition, but unlike composition criticism it draws explicitly on the insights of modern literary critics.

Like scholars who use structuralist methods, narrative critics are less interested in the historical context of Matthew than in the ways the text elicits the reader's response. Matthew is understood to be a narrative comprising a story and its discourse. The story of Matthew is of the life of Jesus of Nazareth from conception and birth to death and resurrection. The discourse is the language, including the many devices of plot, characterization, rhetoric, and point of view that are the means by which the story is put across. Kingsbury's earlier redaction-critical study of Matthew (1975) concentrated on the structure, christology, and eschatology of the Gospel. In his narrative-critical study (1986) many of his conclusions are similar, but he does not integrate the two methods.

Edwards's and Kingsbury's (1986) books anticipated the use of reader-response criticism in Matthean scholarship. Howell (1990) used "selected aspects of narrative criticism and a type of reader response criticism" in order to increase appreciation of the way Matthew's narrative shapes one's experience of the story. The word inclusive in the title points to Howell's intention to show the ways readers are involved (i.e., "included") in the story and teaching of the Gospel. Howell's monograph has raised an issue that will almost certainly be keenly debated: the extent to which literary approaches can be combined with more traditional historical methods. Howell has insisted that the intention of the Evangelist and the historical situation in which the text was produced are not a matter of indifference for the biblical literary critic. G. N. Stanton (1992) claims that although modern literary theory is stimulating and helpful, precedence must be given both to the literary conventions that influenced the Evangelist and to the expectations of his first-century readers: Interpretation of a text cannot be carried out in isolation from consideration of the social setting of its readers (whether ancient or modern).

c. Social-scientific approaches. Many NT writings have been studied fruitfully from several social-scientific perspectives. Unfortunately, Matthew's Gospel does not lend itself as readily to a social-historical approach as do many other NT writings. Whereas many details in PAUL's correspondence with the Corinthians, for example, can be set firmly in the social setting of Corinth in the middle of the first century, we do not know for certain where Matthew wrote. Although many writers accept that Matthew was written in Antioch, the evidence is far from conclusive, even though we know a good deal about earliest Christianity in Antioch and also about the city itself. But even if we could be certain about the geographical setting of the Gospel, a further problem would remain. Whereas the social historian's eye often alights on incidental details, it is often difficult to know whether such details in Matthew reflect the social setting of the earlier traditions used by the Evangelist or his own social setting. These problems vitiate several of the essays edited by D. Balch (1991), some of which are written from a social-historical perspective, while others use sociological models (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES).

Sociological and anthropological theory regularly make use of "models" constructed on the basis of CROSS-CULTURAL STUDIES of a wide range of phenomena from different historical periods. These "distant comparisons" are based on sets of similarities in the behavior of individuals, groups, and communities in a range of cultural settings. In spite of obvious differences, striking recurrent patterns can be observed that are not specific to a particular culture or historical setting. They offer students of first-century writings possible fresh ways of reading the text by encouraging them to keep a keen lookout for further relationships, analogies, and resemblances. This general approach is developed effectively by B. Malina and J. Neyrey (1988), who use anthropological models drawn from studies of witchcraft societies to interpret the accusations leveled against Jesus in Matthew 12. In the second part of their book they draw on labeling and deviance theory in a study of Matthew's passion narratives in chaps. 26 and 27. In a stimulating essay in the volume of cross-disciplinary essays edited by Balch (1991), A. Wire employs macro-sociological analysis to reconstruct roles characteristic of scribal communities within advanced agricultural societies.

Sociological models built on the basis of distant comparisons of cross-cultural social settings will rarely be sharply defined. "Close comparisons," however, provide a useful complement to distant comparisons. Careful consideration of communities that have similar cultural and historical settings is often instructive. Here the differences (which are rarely significant when distant comparisons are used) cry out for explanation. The similarities in the social phenomena may provide confirmation of assumptions about a particular writing or community as well as a check against the obvious dangers in transferring insights drawn from studies of modern societies into first-century settings.

J. Overman (1990) and Stanton (1992) both use close comparisons to complement distant comparisons in sociological studies of Matthew. Overman argues that social developments within the Matthean community frequently parallel and are analogous to the social and institutional developments within a range of first-century Jewish groups and sects. Stanton uses the Damascus Document from Qumran as a close comparison and suggests that both Matthew and the Damascus Document come from strikingly similar settings: They were both written for sectarian communities that were in sharp conflict with parent bodies from which they had recently parted company painfully. Both writings functioned as foundation documents for their respective communities; they used several strategies to legitimate the separation. This understanding of the relationship of Matthew's readers to Judaism is in sharp contrast to the conclusions reached by A. Saldarini (1994), who insists that Matthew's Christian-Jewish group remained a deviant community within the diverse Judaism of the day.

Literary and social-scientific approaches have undoubtedly brought new vitality to the study of Matthew's Gospel, however, their strengths and weaknesses for interpreting Matthew will need to be assessed critically, just as the usefulness of redaction criticism for Matthean studies has been reconsidered. Showing promise for the future of Matthean scholarship are studies that have used these approaches to focus on the role of women in this Gospel (J. Anderson [1983, 1987]; E. Cheney [1996, 1998]; A.-J. Levine [1992]; E. Schaberg [1987]; E. Wainwright [1991, 1994]).

Bibliography: J. C. Anderson, "Matthew: Gender and Reading," Semeia 28 (1983) 3-27; "Mary's Difference: Gender and Patriarchy in the Birth Narratives," JR 67 (1987) 183-202; Matthew's Narrative Web: Over, and Over, and Over Again (JSNTSup 91, 1993). B. W. Bacon, Studies in Matthew (1930). D. R. Balch (ed.), Social History of the Matthean Community: Crossdisciplinary Approaches (1991). D. R. Bauer, The Structure of Matthew's Gospel: A Study in Literary Design (JSNTSup 31, 1988). D. R. Bauer and M. A. Powell (eds.), Treasures New and Old: Recent Contributions to Matthean Studies (Symposium Series 1, 1996). F. C. Baur, Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonische Evangelien (1847). M. E. Boring, "The Gospel of Matthew," NIB (1995) 8:87-505. G. Bornkamm, G. Barth, and H. J. Held, Überlieferung und Auslegung im Matthäusevangelium (1960; ET, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew [1963, 1983²]). R. E. Brown, The Birth of the Messiah: A Commentary on the Infancy Narratives in Matthew and Luke (1977). A. B. C. Butler, The Originality of St. Matthew: A Critique of the Two-Document Hypothesis (1951). J. Calvin, Commentary of a Harmony of the Evangelists Matthew, Mark, and Luke (tr. W. Pringle, 1956). W. Carter, Matthew: Storyteller, Interpreter, Evangelist (1996). E. Cheney, She Can Read (1996); "The Mother of the Sons of Zebedee," JSOT (1998) 13-21. W. D. Davies, The Sermon on the Mount (BJS 186, 1964). W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew (ICC, 3 vols., 1988, 1991, 1997). E. von Dobschütz, "Matthäus als Rabbi und Katechet," ZNW 27 (1928) 338-48 (ET; "Matthew as Rabbi and Catechist," The Interpretation of Matthew [ed. G. N. Stanton, 1983]). R. A. Edwards, Matthew's Story of Jesus (1985); Matthew's Narrative Portrait of Disciples (1997). W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (1964). R. T. France, Matthew: Evangelist and Teacher (1988). M. D. Goulder, Midrash and Lection in Matthew: The Speaker's Lectures in Biblical Studies, 1969–71 (1974); Luke, a New Paradigm (2 vols., JSNTSup 20, 1989). J. Gnilka, Das Matthäus-evangelium (HThK, 1986–88). R. H. Gundry, Matthew: A Commentary on His Literary and Theological Art (1982, 1994²). D. A. Hagner, Matthew (WBC 1, 1993; 2, 1995). D. B. Howell, Matthew's Inclusive Rhetoric: A Study in the Narrative Rhetoric of the First Gospel (JSNTSup 42, 1990). R. Hummel, Die Auseinandersetzung zwischen Kirche und Judentum im Matthäusevangelium (BEvT 33, 1963). G. D. Kilpatrick, The Origins of the Gospel According to St. Matthew (1946). J. D. Kingsbury, Matthew: Structure, Christology, and Kingdom (1975); Matthew as Story (1986, 1988²); Gospel Interpretation: Narrative Critical and Social Scientific Approaches (1997). A.-J. Levine, "Matthew," The Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992) 252-62.

M. Luther, Luther's Works 20 (ed. H. C. Oswald, 1955). U. Luz, Das Evangelium nach Matthäus (3 vols., EKKNT 1-3, 1985, 1990, 1997); Matthew in History: Interpretation, Influence, and Effects (1994); The Theology of the Gospel of Matthew (NT Theology, 1995). B. J. Malina and J. H. Neyrey, Calling Jesus Names: The Social Value of Labels in Matthew (Foundations and Facets, Social Facets, 1988). J. A. Overman, Matthew's Gospel and Formative Judaism: The Social World of the Matthean Community (1990). D. Patte, The Gospel According to Matthew: A Structural Commentary on Matthew's Faith (1987). M. A. Powell, God with Us: A Pastoral Theology of Matthew's Gospel (1995). J. Rohde, Die Redaktionsgeschichtliche Methode (1966; ET 1968). A. J. Saldarini, Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (Chicago Studies in the History of Judaism, 1994). J. Schaberg, The Illegitmacy of Jesus: A Feminist Theological Interpretation of the Infancy Narratives (1987). E. Schweizer, The Good News According to Matthew (1975). G. N. Stanton (ed.), The Interpretation of Matthew (IRT 3, 1983, 1995²); A Gospel for a New People: Studies in Matthew (1992). K. Stendahl, The School of St. Matthew and Its Use of the OT (ASNU 20, 1954, 1968²). G. Strecker, Der Weg der Gerechtigkeit Untersuchung zur Theologie des Matthäus (FRLANT 82, 1962). M. J. Suggs, Wisdom, Christology, and Law in Matthew's Gospel (1970). W. G. Thompson, Matthew's Advice to a Divided Community: Matthew 17:22–18:35 (AnBib 44, 1970). W. Trilling, Das wahre Israel: studien zur Theologie des Matthäusevangeliums (1959). C. M. Tuckett, The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis (1983). E. Wainwright, Towards a Feminist Critical Reading of the Gospel According to Matthew (BZMW 60, 1991); "The Gospel of Matthew," Searching the Scriptures, vol. 2, A Feminist Commentary (ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, 1994) 635-77. D. J. Weaver, Matthew's Missionary Discourse (JSNTSup 38, 1990). C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte, kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (2 vols., 1838). T. Zahn, Introduction to the NT (2 vols., 1897–99).

G. N. STANTON

MAZAR (MAISLER), BENJAMIN (1906–75)

Born in Russia, M. received his secondary and higher education in Germany. He completed his PhD at the University of Giessen in 1929 with a dissertation on the ancient history of Syria and Palestine (pub. 1930). After emigrating to Palestine in 1929, he joined the faculty of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 1942, becoming full professor in 1951 and also serving as both rector and president from 1953 to 1961 (emeritus from 1961).

M. was trained as an ancient Near Eastern historian and biblical scholar, and in these fields he attained a status equal to that of W. F. ALBRIGHT, R. de VAUX, A. ALT, and M. NOTH. While he excelled in textual studies, M. also did extensive archaeological field work. His excavations included Beth-yeraḥ (1944, 1945), Tell Qasile (1948–50), Beth-Shearim (1953–59, with N. Avigad), 'Ein-gedi (1961–65), and his principal project, the excavations of the western wall and the Temple mount in Jerusalem (1968–77). Few of these excavations are published in final reports, yet M.'s prominent position in Palestinian and biblical ARCHAEOLOGY is assured by his many brilliant synthetic articles, a number already classics. The interests reflected in these publications include historical geography, the archaeology of Palestine in the Bronze and Iron ages, and virtually all periods in biblical history. In addition to numerous seminal articles, reviews, and books, M. was a principal editor of the Encyclopedia Miqrait, the multi-volume World History of the Jewish People, and the original edition of the Encyclopedia of Archaeological Excavations in the Holy Land.

M.'s influence as a teacher may have superseded the role he had as a scholar. Virtually every Israeli archaeologist and biblical scholar for two generations sat reverently at his feet. His charismatic leadership lay in the combination of sheer intellect, bold ideas and penetrating insights, universal breadth of learning, and a dominant, almost patriarchal personality. Above all, he was innovative, always a leap ahead of even his most advanced students.

Works: Untersuchungen zur altern Geschichte und ethnographie Syriens und Palästinas (Arbeiten aus dem Orientalischen Seminar der Universität Giessen, 1930); History of Palestine Explorations (1935), Hebrew; History of Palestine, pt. 1 (1936), Hebrew; Israel in Biblical Times: A Historical Atlas (1941); (with M. Davis), The Illustrated History of the Jews (1963); (with T. Dothan and I. Dunayevsky), Engedi: The First and Second Season of Excavations, 1961–62 (1966); The Excavations in the Old City of Jerusalem Near the Temple Mount: Preliminary Report of the Second and Third Seasons, 1969–70 (1971); Beth Shearim: Report on the Excavations during 1936–40 1 (1973); (with H. Shanks), Recent Archaeology in the Land of Israel (1984); The Early Biblical Period: Historical Studies (ed. S. Aḥituv and B. A. Levine, 1986); (ed.) Geva': Archaeological Discoveries at Tell Abu-Shusha, Mishmar ha-'Emeq (1988), Hebrew; (with E. Mazar and Y. Nadelman), Excavations in the South of the Temple Mount: The Ophel of Biblical Jerusalem (Qedem 29, 1989); Biblical Israel: State and People (ed. S. Aḥituv, 1992).

Bibliography: Erlsr 5 (Mazar Volume, 1958), with M.'s bibliography, 1-8.

W. G. DEVER

MEDE (or MEAD), JOSEPH (1586–1638)

An English biblical scholar, M. was born at Berden, Essex, in October 1586, and educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he became a fellow in 1613. He declined offers of advancement and remained in that position until his death on Oct. 1, 1638.

Learned in philology, history, mathematics, and physics, M. wrote numerous short discourses on biblical texts, displaying a wide knowledge of Jewish, classical, and patristic writings. His Clavis Apocalyptica and other writings on APOCALYPTICISM had a powerful influence on many subsequent interpreters of Daniel and Revelation. His assertion that the millennium was yet to come contradicted the position taken by the overwhelming majority of scholars since the time of AUGUSTINE. On the assumption that a day could mean a thousand years, M. contended that the day of judgment would in fact be the millennium, beginning with the resurrection of the martyrs and ending with the last judgment. The book of Revelation could only be understood through the recognition of its "synchronisms," a term M. used to indicate the reference of different passages to the same event. His account of Revelation was antipapal, and he believed that the book prophesies (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, NT) the events of history from the time of Christ until the millennium. The visions of the seals and the trumpets deal with the fates of empires. The "little scroll" (Rev 10:8-9), whose contents were described in chaps. 10–20, covers the same period of history, but deals with the destiny of the church.

Recognizing the dramatic nature of the work, M. likened the setting of the vision in Revelation 4 to a theatrical stage, although he did not attempt to divide the book into acts. His writings were highly acclaimed, and an English translation of Clavis Apocalyptica was published in 1643 by authority of Parliament. M., like his German contemporary, J. Alsted, provided a scholarly basis for the millenarian speculation that proliferated during the middle years of the seventeenth century.

Works: Clavis Apocalyptica (1627, rev. ed. 1632; ET, The Key of The Revelation [1643]); In Sancti Joannis Apocalypsin Commentarius (1632); The Works of the Profoundly-Learned J. M. (2 pts, 1648; enl. ed. 2 vols., 1663–64).

Bibliography: Anonymous, "Life" and "Some Additionals," Works (J. Mede, 1663–64) 1:I-LXIII, LXV-LXXVI. BB 5 (1760) 3086-89. R. G. Clouse, "The Rebirth of Millenarianism," Puritans, the Millennium, and the Future of Israel: Puritan Eschatology, 1600 to 1660 (ed. P. Toon, 1970) 56-65. K. R. Firth, The Apocalyptic Tradition in Reformation Britain, 1530–1645 (1979). T. Fuller, History of the Worthies of England 1 (new ed. 1840, repr. 1965) 519-20. A. Gordon, DNB 37 (1894) 178-80. M. Murrin, "Revelation and Two Seventeenth-century Commentators," The Apocalypse in English Renaissance Thought and Literature (ed. C. A. Patrides and J. Wittreich, 1984) 125-46.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

MEEK, THEOPHILE JAMES (1881–1966)

Born on Nov. 17, 1881, on a farm near Port Stanley in southwestern Ontario, Canada, M. graduated from the University of Toronto in 1903 and proceeded to McCormick Theological Seminary in Chicago. On completing his studies there with a traveling fellowship, he passed two years at Marburg and Berlin, attending the lectures of such scholars as K. BUDDE and H. GUNKEL in OT and Friedrich DELITZSCH in ASSYRIOLOGY. After a sojourn in the Holy Land he taught at Millikin University (1909–18) while pursuing further studies at the University of Chicago, obtaining the PhD in 1915 with a thesis on Old Babylonian documents. He subsequently held brief appointments at Meadville Theological School (1918–22) and Bryn Mawr College (1922–23) and in 1923 was invited to the department of oriental languages at the University of Toronto. He died Feb. 19, 1966.

M. specialized in both Assyriology and HB. For one season he served as epigrapher to the excavations at Nuzi. He published a number of cuneiform texts in two volumes (1913, 1935) and several articles on such texts (e.g., 1917, 1920a). Probably his best-known contribution in this field was the fine translation of the Mesopotamian law "codes" and legal documents in ANET. His researches were most productive in the biblical area; he wrote on Hebrew poetic form (1929a; see POETRY, HB). As a philologist he was a strict grammarian, always paying minute attention to details. Hebrew syntactical features particularly engaged his attention and resulted in several articles (e.g., 1929b, 1938, 1940a, 1945). As one of four scholars chosen to undertake a fresh version of the HB, he had an opportunity to demonstrate his mastery of the nuances of Hebrew syntax. His assignment was Genesis through Ruth, Song of Songs, and Lamentations. In 1927 The Old Testament: An American Translation appeared, and in 1935 a revised edition of the whole by M. was issued. Some years later he was requested to make an even more thorough revision, and to this task he devoted much of the rest of his life. Unfortunately the product of his labors was fated never to be printed, although the influence of this TRANSLATION on the panel responsible for the later RSV was considerable.

Early in his career M. was interested in the beginnings of the Hebrew people (1920b, 1921, 1929c), and he chose this theme when invited to deliver the Haskell lectures at Oberlin College in 1933–34. Published in 1936 as Hebrew Origins, they dealt in sequence with the source of the Hebrew people, their laws, deity, cult, prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), and monotheistic faith. As usual, M. plunged boldly into controversial topics, appearing to have been influenced in his views by contact with D. D. Luckenbill (1881–1927) and J. M. P. Smith (1866–1932) while studying at Chicago. The volume generated much interest, and such scholars as H. ROWLEY and W. F. ALBRIGHT took issue with some of his opinions. A second edition in 1950 was extensively revised in the light of criticisms and new evidence.

M. relished controversy and readily engaged in friendly debate, as in some of his articles challenging statements of Albright (1940b, 1942). He contributed to the IB commentaries on Lamentations (1956) and Song of Songs (1956), in the latter favoring the interpretation of the work as a cultic liturgy, a view he had espoused since the discovery of an Akkadian list of incipits of hymns for the cult of Tammuz and Ishtar. In a series of articles (1922, 1924a, 1924b) he had cited similarities between Canticles and the fertility cult, an interpretation that was to have a considerable vogue. Both commentaries were characterized by close attention to syntactical points.

Works: Cuneiform Bilingual Hymns, Prayers, and Penitential Psalms (1913); "Old Babylonian Business and Legal Documents," AJSL 33 (1917) 203-44; "Some Explanatory Lists and Grammatical Texts," RA 17 (1920a) 117-206; "A Proposed Reconstruction of Early Hebrew History," AJT 24 (1920b) 209-16; "Some Religious Origins of the Hebrews," AJSL 37 (1921) 101-31; "Canticles and the Tammuz Cult," AJSL 39 (1922) 1-14; "Babylonian Parallels to the Song of Songs," JBL 43 (1924a) 245-52; "The Song of Songs and the Fertility Cult," The Song of Songs: A Symposium (ed. W. H. Schoff, 1924b) 48-69; (with J. M. P. Smith, L. Waterman, and A. R. Gordon), The OT: An American Translation (1927, rev. ed. 1935); "The Structure of Hebrew Poetry," JR 9 (1929a) 523-50; "The Co-ordinate Adverbial Clause in Hebrew," JAOS 49 (1929b) 156-59; "Aaronites and Zadokites," AJSL 45 (1929c) 149-66; Old Akkadian, Sumerian, and Cappadocian Texts from Nuzi (1935); Hebrew Origins (1933–34 Haskell Lectures, 1936; rev. eds. 1950, 1960); "Lapses of OT Translators," JAOS 58 (1938) 122-29; "The Hebrew Accusative of Time and Place," JAOS 60 (1940a) 224-33; "Primitive Monotheism and the Religion of Moses," RR 4 (1940b) 286-303; "Monotheism and the Religion of Israel," JBL 61 (1942) 21-43; "The Syntax of the Sentence in Hebrew," JBL 64 (1945) 1-13; "The Code of Hammurabi," "The Middle Assyrian Laws," "The Neo-Babylonian Laws," and "Mesopotamian Legal Documents," ANET 163-80, 180-88, 217-22; "The Song of Songs: Introduction and Exegesis," IB (1956) 5:89-148; "The Book of Lamentations: Introduction and Exegesis," IB (1956) 6:1-38.

Bibliography: H. Engel, Die Vorfahren Israels in Ägypten (1979) 120-23. F. V. Winnett, Minutes of Proceedings of the Royal Society of Canada, 1966 (1966) 99-103.

R. J. WILLIAMS

MEINHOLD, JOHANNES (1861–1937)

M. was born Aug. 12, 1861, in Cammin in Pomerania and studied in Leipzig, Berlin, Greifswald, and Tübingen. His teachers in OT were Franz DELITZSCH and A. DILLMANN; in oriental languages Friedrich DELITZSCH, L. Krehl (1825–1901), and A. Socin (1844–99). In 1884 he received his doctorate at Griefswald, where he worked as a Dozent and after 1888 as an ausserordentlicher professor. In 1889 he succeded K. BUDDE as ausserordentlicher professor in Bonn; he was named full professor in 1903, received emeritus status in 1928, and died May 16, 1937.

As a Christian, theologian, and scholar of conservative origins and education, M. joined the liberal and critical camp very quickly. Decisive for him was reading J. WELLHAUSEN's Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels. Sharing Wellhausen's basic positions, M. was, as a historian, sometimes more critical than Wellhausen; as a theologian he put more emphasis on the supernatural aspects of religion.

M. proposed and strengthened the critical view on certain literary and historical questions: Genesis 14 does not belong to any Pentateuchal source; it is a late product that contains no history; with respect to reports on Sennacherib's campaign, only 2 Kgs 18:13*b*-16 and the Taylor Prism are of historical value; Daniel is not a unified work, and the stories in Daniel 2–6 belong to the pre-Maccabean period. M. along with others divided the Jahwist source of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) into two independent strands: J^1 and J^2. He entertained the possibility that the Pentateuchal sources were continued beyond the Hexateuch.

M.'s thesis (deriving from W. Reichel, Über vorhellenische Götterculte [1897], and carried out further by M. Dibelius, Die Lade Jahves [FRLANT 7, 1906]), that Yahweh's ark was not actually a box but a box-shaped throne on which one could imagine Yahweh in a seated position, had its supporters and detractors. The most important opponent was M.'s friend Budde ("Die ursprüngliche Bedeutung der Lade Jahwe's," ZAW 21 [1901] 193-97).

In "Antwort auf J. M.s 'Zur Sabbatfrage' " (ZAW 48 [1930] 138-45) Budde contradicted most strongly M.'s presumption that the sabbath went back only as far as Ezekiel and only later became a firmly established institution, for "sabbath" in earlier Israel was celebration of the day of the full moon abolished by the deuteronomic reform.

M. thought knowledge of the ancient history of Israel was so uncertain that he voided a contract for the publication of a presentation of that history. He published a widely circulated textbook (1919, 1926^2, 1932^3) and an overall presentation of wisdom (1908), whose teaching of retribution he rejected along with PAUL's doctrine of justification that was erected upon it.

Works: Beiträge zue Erklärung des Buches Daniel 1 (1888); "Das Buch Daniel," KK 8 (1889) 255-339; Wider den Kleinglauben: Ein ernstes Wort an die evangelischen Christen aller Parteien (1895); Jesus und das Alte Testament (1896); Die Jesajaerzählungen Jesaja 36–39: Ein historische-kritische Unteruschung (1898); Die "Lade Jahves" (TARWPV NS 4, 1900); Studien zur israelitschen Religionsgeschichte, Band 1, Der heilige Rest, Teil 1, Elias, Amos, Hosea, Jesaja (1903); Die biblische Urgeschichte 1. Mose 1–12 Gemeinverständlich dargestellt (1904); Sabbat und Woche im Alten Testament (FRLANT 5, 1905); Die Weisheit Israels in Spruch, Sage, und Dichtung (1908); "Die Entstehung des Sabbats," ZAW 29 (1909) 81-112; 1. Mose 14: Eine historische-kritische Unter- suchung (BZAW 22, 1911); Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes von seinen Anfängen bis gegen 600 n. Chr. (1916); Einführung in das Alte Testment: Geschichte, Literatur, und Religion Israels (Sammlung Töpelmann 1, 1, 1919, 1926², 1932³): "Die jahwistischen Berichte in Gen 12–50," ZAW 39 (1921) 42-57; Der Dekalog, Rektoratsrede (1927); "Zur Sabbathfrage," ZAW 48 (1930) 121-38; Das Alte Testament und evangelisches Christentum (1931).

Bibliography: F. Haun and G. Hölscher, "Zum Gedächtnis M.s," ChW 51 (1937) 537-41. R. Smend, Bonner Gelehrte: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Wissenschaften in Bonn. Evangelische Theologie (1968) 121-29 = his DATDJ, 148-59.

R. SMEND

MELANCHTHON, PHILIPP (1497–1560)

A grandnephew of the humanist J. REUCHLIN, M. studied at Heidelberg (from 1509) and Tübingen (from 1512). Initially a humanist with strong leanings toward ERASMUS, he became professor of Greek at Wittenberg in 1518, where he was deeply influenced by LUTHER, becoming one of the Lutheran Reformation's most important theorists and biblical exegetes. His Loci Communes (1st ed., 1521; ET 1944), setting forth the main elements of Christian doctrine and "stating a list of topics to which a person roaming through Scripture should be directed," soon established itself as a standard Lutheran dogmatic textbook; and its outline of doctrines formed the basis of many later biblical theologies.

M. wrote commentaries on Romans (1522; ET 1992), John (1523), Paul's letter to the Colossians (1527; ET ed. with intro. by D. Parker, 1990), and Matthew (1558). His biblical exegesis stressed the importance of the literal sense of Scripture. Although he used allegory at points (e.g., in his exposition of John's Gospel), he clearly subordinated the allegorical to the literal or historical sense of Scripture. His most important contribution to sixteenth-century biblical interpretation is the rhetorical foundation for the analysis of biblical texts put forward in his De rhetorica libri tres (1519) and applied particularly well in the 1522 Romans commentary—published by Luther without M.'s permission. M. identified two major modes of discourse within Scripture: historical narration and doctrinal exposition. It is the task of the biblical interpreter to identify these modes of discourse and expound their significance. Thus, in his commentary on John, M. argued that the text is centered on a single unifying topic (locus or scopus): the "benefits of Christ." The exegete is required to identify these central theological concerns and document how the text is related to them.

Works: Corpus Reformatorum, 1-28.

Bibliography: P. F. Barton, "Die exegetische Arbeit des jungen M.," ARG 54 (1963) 52-89. S. Hansjörg, M. als Auslegerdes Alten Testaments (BGBH 2, 1959). S. Hausammann, "Rhetorik im Dienst der reformatorischen Schriftauslegung," KD 20 (1974) 305-14. W. Maurer, Der junge M. zwischen Humanismus und Reformation (1967). R. Schafer, "M.s Hermeneutik im Römerbriefkommentar von 1532," ZTK 60 (1963) 216-35. H. Scheible, CE 2 (1986) 424-29. A. Schirmer, Das Paulus-Verständnis M.s, 1518–22 (VIEGM 44, 1967). J. R. Schneider, HHMBI, 225-31. T. J. Wengert, P. M.'s "Annotations in Johannem" in Relation to Its Predecessors and Contemporaries (THR 220, 1987). T. J. Wengert and M. P. Graham (eds.), P. M. (1497–1560) and the Commentary (1997).

A. E. MCGRATH

MELITO OF SARDIS (d. c. 190)

M. was a skilled preacher and writer of the second century. EUSEBIUS records (Hist. eccl. 4.26) a list of his many tracts and apologies, most of which soon went into oblivion. M. wrote on theological issues of the time: the date of Easter, PROPHECY and the Montanists, the incarnation, the Marcionites (see MARCION), the church, Sunday, baptism, the Apocalypse. His excerpts from the Law and the Prophets, which provide the oldest list of HB books, sought to ground Christian doctrine in the HB.

Undoubtedly M.'s most influential work was the Passover homily, which has taken a prominent role in recent scholarly discussion. It has been used to show the skill of an interpreter who sought to develop a biblical THEOLOGY by using HB themes and history to strengthen the Christian message. At the same time his rhetorical lament, "Why, O Israel, have you done this strange wrong?" (12), and his repeated reference to the "crime" of Israel became a pernicious legacy. M.'s greatest contribution lies in taking seriously one central motif in the HB, the exodus and Passover, and relating it to the death and resurrection of Christ. In spite of rhetorical excesses he emerges as a skilled preacher who used the techniques of ancient rhetoric and spelled out a biblical theology. He stands alongside IRENAEUS in this respect.

Bibliography: R. M. Grant, Greek Apologists of the Second Century (1988) 92-99. S. G. Hall (ed.), Melito of Sardis "On Pascha" and Fragments: Text and Translations (OECT, 1979). B. Lohse, Die Passa-Homilie des Bischoffs Melito von Sardes (1960). G. Salmon, DCB 3 (1882) 874-900. M. Testuz, Papyrus Bodmer xiii, Méliton de Sardes Homélie sur la pâque (1960). S. Wilson, "M. and Israel," Anti-Judaism in Early Christianity, vol. 2, Separation and Polemic (ed. S. Wilson, 1986) 81-102.

W. KLASSEN

MENASSEH BEN ISRAEL (1604–57)

M. was born in Madeira and grew up in Amsterdam, where he became a prominent leader in the Jewish community. An entrepreneur as well as a rabbi, he was the first significant Jewish printer in Amsterdam as well as a productive author and "an apostle to the Gentiles" who associated with and taught many Christian scholars in the area. He had connections with B. SPINOZA, H. GROTIUS, Rembrandt (1606–69), and possibly I. de la PEYRÈRE. M. became involved with the millenarian movement, which was seeking the readmission of Jews to England during Cromwell's reign. He went to London in 1655 to intercede on behalf of Jewish resettlement and was favorably received. After a quarrel with the local Jewish community, he left England in 1657, reaching Middleburg in Zeeland, where he died.

In addition to his Pene Rabbah (1628), which provides an index to the Midrash Rabbah for each of the verses in the Pentateuch, M.'s primary contribution to biblical scholarship was his production of a reconciler or conciliator, widely used instruments in biblical study in the seventeenth century. He sought to reconcile all the "apparent" contradictions in the Hebrew Scriptures. Drawing upon much of past scholarship, Jewish and Christian, he tried to show that all difficulties in the Bible could be overcome since "the Bible being true in the highest degree, it cannot contain any text . . . contradictory of another." For the orthodox and traditional such works as M.'s offered means for overcoming difficulties in the Bible; but for others, like M.'s younger contemporary Spinoza, they offered a storehouse of ammunition to use against the unity and cohesion of the Bible.

Works: Pene Rabbah (1628); Conciliador (1632; LT of the Spanish by D. Vossius, Conciliator [1633]); De creatione problemata xxx (1635); De resurrectione mortuorum (1636); De termino vitae (1639; ET by T. Pocock, On the Term of Life [1709], with an account of M.'s life); Concilador (pt. 2, 1641; ET of both pts. by E. H. Lindo, The Conciliator: A Reconcilement of the Apparent Contradictions in Holy Scripture [2 vols., 1842, repr. 1972]); De fragilitate humana (1642); Esperança de Israel (1650; ET The Hope of Israel [1650]; FT by H. Méchoulan and G. Nahon, Espérance d'Israel [1979] 35-69, with biographical sketch); Nishmat Hayyim (1651); Humble Addresses (1655); Vindiciae Judaeorum (1656).

Bibliography: Y. Kaplan, H. Méchloulan, and R. H. Popkin (eds.), Menasseh ben Israel and His World (Brill's Studies in Intellectual History 15, 1989). A. L. Katchen, Christian Hebraists and Dutch Rabbis (1984) 125-59. D. Katz, Philo-Semitism and the Readmission of the Jews to England, 1603–1655 (1982). R. Popkin, "Manasseh ben Israel and I. La Peyrère," StRos 8 (1974) 59-63; "Manasseh ben Israel and I. La Peyrère II," StRos 18 (1984) 12-20. C. Roth, A Life of Manasseh ben Israel: Rabbi, Printer, and Diplomat (1934); EncJud 11 (1971) 855-57. L. Wolf (ed.), Manasseh ben Israel: Mission to Cromwell (1901).

J. H. HAYES

MENDELSSOHN, MOSES (MOSHE BEN MENAHEM) (1729–1786)

M. is known as the first important rationalist Jewish philosopher of the German Enlightenment and a spiritual leader of eighteenth-century German Jewry. In midcareer (1769) after his prominence as one of the great intellectuals of his age had been established, he was attacked in print by Christian clergyman J. Lavater (1741–1801), who called on him to recognize the truth by converting to Christianity. Thereafter, M. spent a considerable portion of his writing energies defending Judaism and his personal faith against Christian critics. Although he was the author of a number of important philosophical works, he wrote biblical commentaries on Qohelet (1770); the Song of Deborah, Judges 5 (1780); the Pentateuch (1780–83; each volume published separately and subsequently bound as one); the Psalms (1783); the Song of Songs (posthumously, 1788); and another partial commentary on the Psalms (posthumous, 1845).

His introduction to the Megillat Qohelet (The Book of Ecclesiastes), written before the Lavater incident, should not be read as defending Jewish exegesis of Scripture against any specific Christian challenge. M. was, however, aware of Christian uses and misuses of the HB and surely wished to counter this covert influence by offering an enlightened yet more traditional understanding of the biblical text. The connection between this introductory essay and Jewish tradition is borne out by its grounding in the TALMUD, RASHI, A. IBN EZRA, D. KIMHI, MAIMONIDES, and the Zohar as well as on classical philosophical resources. He also exhibited a marked knowledge of the Christian writings of his contemporaries J. D. MICHAELIS and A. Desvoeux (d. 1792). M.'s lack of interest at this point in more directly refuting Christian exegesis is suggested by his writing the Qohelet commentary in Hebrew, a language not widely familiar to Christian scholars of his time, and by his publishing the commentary anonymously.

His introductory essay on Qohelet begins with discussion of the principles of biblical exegesis in which he defends the traditional quadriplex rabbinic scheme of textual interpretation: the literal or plain meaning, the homiletic, the allusive, and the secret (forming the Hebrew acronym PRD"S; see P. Culbertson, A Word Fitly Spoken [1995] chap. 2). Establishing a principle that would continue through the rest of his commentaries, M. argued that while the exegete's primary task is to articulate the plain meaning of the text, the other three levels carry equal validity and must not be ignored. This commentary was not immediately well received by either the Christian or Jewish communities, due in part to his use of wide-ranging sources not familiar to his readers.

His commentary on Psalms is written with a stronger eye to the Christian world, specifically denying that the psalms prophesy Jesus as the Messiah and attacking the prevalent Jewish trend toward assimilation. It is built around a number of interesting artifices, including rhymed translations, antiphonal settings, and experimental punctuation. Particularly M. distinguished between meter (Hellenistic) and rhythm (Hebrew), proving that the popular Christian system of analyzing psalms by counting the metric syllables had nothing to do with the spirit of Hebrew POETRY. As in his commentary on Exodus he referred to God as "The Eternal," thereby avoiding the tetragrammaton and setting a pattern that would influence subsequent commentators, including M. BUBER and F. Rosenzweig (1886–1929).

The five volumes of commentary on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) are each written in the same style: the Hebrew text, a German translation in Hebrew characters, commentary by M. and his co-editors, and reference to the more traditional Jewish commentaries. His collaborators on this project included S. Dubno (1738–1813), H. Wessely (1725–1805), and H. Homberg (1749–1841). Soon reissued as one volume under the title Sefer Netivot HaShalom, with a brilliant new introductory essay ("Or LeNetivah") by M. on biblical LITERARY criticism, this commentary was enormously popular and went through scores of editions during the next century.

By the turn of the twentieth century, M.'s work as a Bible commentator had generally fallen out of favor. However, his sensitivity to the nuances of biblical prose and poetry, his sophisticated fourfold exegetical system, his rationalism, and his wide-ranging use of eclectic source material commend his continuing value as an insightful exegete and literary critic.

Works: M. M. Gesammelte Schriften Jubiläumsaussgabe (ed. H. Borodianski [Bar-Dayan], 1938; repr. 1972), esp. vol. 14.

Bibliography: A. Altmann, M. M.: A Biographical Study (1973). E. Breuer, The Limits of Enlightment: Jews, Germans, and the Eighteenth-century Study of Scripture (1996). P. Culbertson, "Multiplexity in Biblical Exegesis: The Introduction to Megillat Qohelet by M. M.," Cincinnati Journal of Judaica 2 (Spring 1991) 10-18. H. Englander, "M. as Translator and Exegete," HUCA 6 (1929) 327-84. A. Jospe and L. Yahil, EncJud 11 (1971) 1328-42. M. Kayserling, M. M.: Sein Leben und sein Werke (1862). H. M. Z. Meyer, M. M. Bibliographie (1965). T. Preston, The Hebrew Text, and a Latin Version of The Book of Solomon, called Ecclesiastes; with Original Notes. . . . And a Translation of the Commentary of M. from the Rabbinic Hebrew (1845). P. Sandler, M.'s Edition of the Pentateuch (1940; repr. 1984, Hebrew). W. Weinberg, "Language Questions Relating to M. M.'s Pentateuch Translation," HUCA 55 (1984) 197-242; "Les traductions et commentaires de M.," BTT 7 (1986) 599-621.

P. CULBERTSON

MENDENHALL, GEORGE (1916–)

Born in Muscatine, Iowa, Aug. 13, 1916, M. received a BA from Midland College (1936), BD from Lutheran Theological Seminary (1938), and PhD from Johns Hopkins University (1947), where he studied with W. F. ALBRIGHT. M. taught at Hamma Divinity School (1947–51), the University of Michigan (1951–86), and afterward part-time at the Yarmouk University Institute of Archaeology in Jordan. Although his attention has been given to cuneiform studies, ARCHAEOLOGY, ancient inscriptions (1985), and historical linguistics pertaining to the common Bronze Age ancestry of the Hebrew and Arabic languages (1993, 1996), M. is most widely known for his work in HB historical study.

Much of M.'s research focused on the transition from the Bronze Age to the Iron Age and the role Hebrew religion played in shaping an Israelite perspective on and response to this major reconfiguration of culture. Although he was a pioneer in the use of social sciences to elucidate biblical materials (1976), he was never content to think of "religion" merely as a symbol for established social interests. He recognized that in the formative period of a culture the ideological factors that in the first place define legitimate interests are the proper substance of "religion" (1961). Only in subsequent traditional periods does religion become symbolic, and even then not for everyone.

M. became a forceful proponent of the notion that solidarity in early Israel was not political or ethnic but ethical in nature. His study of law and covenant (1955) sought to demonstrate the parallels between the Sinai covenant traditions and Late Bronze Age suzerainty treaties. The point he emphasized repeatedly was that in the absence of political structures in the Early Iron Age, Israelite solidarity waxed and waned, as did the commitments of individual Israelites to the ethic embedded in the Sinai covenant tradition.

M.'s article on the Hebrew conquest of Palestine (1962) fundamentally reshaped the way historians now understand the sudden appearance of Israel in Palestine. He insisted that the destruction of Late Bronze Age sites was causally unrelated to the migration of Israel into the region and that the religion of Yahweh provided a tangible basis for solidarity among villages in the vacuum created by the demise of Bronze Age civilization. He later became extremely uncomfortable that his hypothesis was labeled "the peasant revolt theory" and lumped together with Marxian claims that Yahwism symbolized peasant grievances and justified their violence against Canaanite overlords (e.g., N. Gottwald [1979]).

M. maintained an interest in later biblical history when political structures revived (1975a) and in how the Israelite covenant tradition was transmogrified by later kings, priests, and scribes eager to legitimize their respective agendas. He felt that the integrity of the early covenant tradition was kept functionally intact by the Hebrew prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) as well as later by JESUS and the early Christian movement, a view that other scholars have subsequently developed (see D. Hillers [1969], esp. chap. 9; J. Bailey [1976]).

M. published a collection of essays and specialized studies (1973) that was energized by his belief that the early Israelite ethic urgently commends itself to late twentieth-century Western culture. He insisted that the West is today undergoing the same sort of retrenchment and collapse that demonstrably recurs approximately every three or four centuries in all cultures. He sensed that in such challenging times (as at the end of the Bronze Age) people become preoccupied with the exercise of power and that this preoccupation with social control—which is the antithesis of the value system embedded in the biblical tradition of covenant (1975b)—only worsens the crisis. The proper task of theology is, not to preserve traditional doctrines, but to identify this veneration of power (the modern "Baal") and to embody the alternative articulated in the covenant ethic of the Bible.

Although other scholars have written more prolifically than M., few have inspired more creative lines of research and elicited more discussion and publication from others. M.'s presence has been significant in the scholarly debates of the 1960s–1990s (see M. Weippert [1971] and E. Nicholson [1986], to cite only two representative examples). His work in developing a historical methodology for the study of Semitic languages (1990)—including biblical Hebrew—introduces possible new historical, linguistic, and lexicographic controls for scholars eager to determine the sociocultural provence and date of biblical texts.

Works: Law and Covenant in Israel and the Ancient Near East (1955); "Biblical History in Transition," The Bible and the Ancient Near East: Essays in Honor of W. F. Albright (ed. G. E. Wright, 1961) 32-53; "The Hebrew Conquest of Palestine," BA 25, 3 (1962) 66-87; The Tenth Generation: The Origins of the Biblical Tradition (1973); "The Monarchy," Int 29, 2 (1975a) 155-70; "The Conflict Between Value Systems and Social Control," Unity and Diversity: Essays in the History, Literature, and Religion of the Ancient Near East (JHNES, ed. H. Goedicke and J. J. M. Roberts, 1975b) 169-80; "Social Organization in Early Israel," Magnalia Dei, The Mighty Acts of God: Essays on the Bible and Archaeology in Memory of G. E. Wright (ed. F. M. Cross et al., 1976) 132-51; The Syllabic Inscriptions from Byblos (1985); "Toward a Method for Historical Lexicography of Semitic Languages," Studies in Near Eastern Culture and History: In Memory of E. T. Abdel-Massih (MSME 2, ed. J. Bellamy, 1990) 108-17; "The Northern Origins of Old South Arabic Literacy," Yemen Update (Summer/Fall 1993) 15-19; "Where Was Arabic During the Bronze Age?" Jerusalem's Heritage: Essays in Memory of K. J. Asali (ed. S. al-Hamarinah, 1996) 7-14 (Arabic).

Bibliography: J. Bailey, "Jesus as Reformer," Michigan Oriental Studies in Honor of G. G. Cameron (ed. L. Orlin et al., 1976) 311-29. N. Gottwald, Tribes of Yahweh (1979). D. Hillers, Covenant: History of a Biblical Idea (1969). H. Huffmon et al. (eds.), The Quest for the Kingdom of God: Studies in Honor of G. E. M. (1983). E. W. Nicholson, God and His People: Covenant Theology in the OT (1986). M. Weippert, The Settlement of the Israelite Tribes in Palestine (SBT 2, 21, 1971).

G. HERION

MENNO SIMONS (1496–1561)

A Frisian, M. was ordained priest in 1524, perhaps having been trained at a Premonstratensian monastery. He became an ANABAPTIST elder c. 1536 and in the early 1540s emerged as the most important leader of Dutch Anabaptists. It fell to him to reestablish Anabaptism on a solid basis after the failure of its apocalyptic crusade in 1535. His influence extended from Amsterdam to Danzig, and by the 1550s his followers were known as Mennists.

M.'s twenty-five major and a number of minor writings are saturated with Scripture, frequently being long series of quotations or paraphrases. He adhered passionately to the principle of sola scriptura, interpreting the whole of Scripture from the centrality of Christ, which meant for him that the OT stood in relation to the NT as promise to fulfillment. Only in Scripture was truth to be found, and it was God the Holy Spirit who illumined heart and mind to understand and accept its message. But once the truth of Scripture was known it could be lost again unless it was lived out in obedience. Besides the Bible, M.'s writings were the most important nourishers of faith for Mennonites to the end of the nineteenth century in both Europe and America.

Works: Opera Omnia Theologica (ed. H. J. Herrison, 1681); The Complete Writings of M. S. (tr. L. Verduin, ed. J. C. Wenger, 1956); Dat Fundament des christelychen leers doer M. S. op dat aldercorste geschreven (ed. H. W. Meihuizen, 1967).

Bibliography: C. Bornhäuser, Leben und Lehre M. S. (1973). J. Horsch, Menno Simons (1916). C. Krahn, M. S., 1496–1561: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte und Theologie der Taufgesinnten (1936). H. W. Meihuizen, Menno Simons (1961).

W. KLAASSEN

METZGER, BRUCE MANNING (1914–)

Born Feb. 14, 1914, in Middletown, Pennsylvania, M. attended Lebanon Valley College (AB 1935), where he first studied Greek and TEXTUAL CRITICISM, and Princeton Theological Seminary (ThB 1938; ThM 1939), where his teachers included O. PIPER and E. Brunner (1889–1966), prior to doctoral studies in classics and patristics at Princeton University (MA 1940; PhD 1942). He was ordained in 1939 (Presbytery of New Brunswick [PCUSA]).

In forty-six years (1938–84) at Princeton Theological Seminary, capped by appointment as George L. Collord Professor of NT Language and Literature (1964–84; emeritus, 1984–), M. taught more students than anyone else in the seminary's history. He has also lectured at over one hundred institutions on six continents and delivered more than 2,500 sermons or studies in churches belonging to a wide variety of denominations.

M. may be the greatest textual specialist the United States has produced. Preeminent among his publications is his trilogy on the NT text, versions, and CANON. Probably most influential has been The Text of the NT (1964, 1992[3]), from which two generations of textual critics have learned their craft. It presented with balance and pedagogical concern the essentials of what would later be termed "reasoned eclecticism" (in contrast, e.g., to the "rigorous" eclecticism of G. D. Kilpatrick). This approach, to which the "local-genealogical" method of K. ALAND is similar, proposes that when evaluating variant readings one should "choose the reading which best explains the origin of the others" (Text, 207; his methodological influence was further extended through his frequently referenced Textual Commentary on the Greek NT [1971, 1994[2]]). Without rival in the field is The Early Versions of the NT (1977), which covers both major and lesser-known minor (e.g., Sogdian, Thracian) versions. The Canon of the NT (1987) combines careful and erudite attention to historical matters with a concern for theological questions and implications.

The breadth of M.'s scholarship is evident in his hundreds of articles and reviews, which cover topics including textual criticism, philology, paleography and papyrology, classical topics, Greco-Roman religions, the HB, the APOCRYPHA, the NT, patristics, early church history, and Bible translation. M. played an influential role as a member of the editorial committee responsible for The Greek NT and later for the text of Novum Testamentum Graece and in his leadership of the International Greek NT Project (1948–84).

On both academic and popular levels M. is widely known for his involvement with the RSV and especially NRSV translations (since 1952; committee chair, 1977–), an association given additional visibility by his editorship of various study Bibles and tools based on these translations. More controversial but typical of his concern to promote Bible reading was his editorship of the condensed Reader's Digest Bible (1982).

Academic recognitions bestowed on M. include election to the presidency of four scholarly societies, three Festschriften, election as a corresponding fellow of the British Academy (1978), and in 1994 reception of the academy's Burkitt Medal for Biblical Studies (only the third American so honored).

Works: The Saturday and Sunday Lessons from Luke in the Greek Gospel Lectionary (SLTGNT II:3, 1944); Lexical Aids for Students of NT Greek (1946; enl. ed. 1955; new ed. 1969); Annotated Bibliography of the Textual Criticism of the NT (SD 16, 1955); An Introduction to the Apocrypha (1957); (with H. G. May), The Oxford Annotated Bible, RSV (1962; with the Apocrypha, 1965); Chapters in the History of NT Textual Criticism (NTTS 4, 1963); The NT: Its Background, Growth, and Content (1965; 2d enl. ed., 1983); (with K. Aland, M. Black, C. M. Martini, and A. Wikgren), The Greek NT (1966; 4th rev. ed. with B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, and C. M. Martini, 1993); Historical and Literary Studies: Pagan, Jewish, and Christian (NTTS 8, 1968); (with K. Aland, M. Black, C. M. Martini, and A. Wikgren), Novum Testamentum Graece (26th ed., 1979; 27th ed. with B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, and C. M. Martini, 1993); NT Studies: Philological, Versional, and Patristic (NTTS 10, 1980); Manuscripts of the Greek Bible: An Introduction to Palaeography (1981); (with R. C. Dentan and W. Harrelson), The Making of the NRSV of the Bible (1991); (with R. E. Murphy), The New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocryphal/Deuterocanonical Books, NRSV (1991); Breaking the Code: Understanding the Book of Revelation (1993); (with M. D. Coogan), The Oxford Companion to the Bible (1993); Reminiscences of an Octogenarian (1997), includes vita and bibliography.

Bibliography: J. A. Brooks, "B. M. as Textual Critic," PSB 15 (1994) 156-164 (includes bibliography). E. J. Epp and G. D. Fee (eds.), NT Textual Criticism: Its Significance for Exegesis. Essays in Honour of B. M. M. (1981) v-xxviii (includes full vita and bibliography to 1980). M. W. Holmes, "Reasoned Eclecticism in NT Textual Criticism," The Text of the NT in Contemporary Research: Essays on the Status Quaestionis. A Volume in Honor of B. M. M. (SD 46, ed. B. D. Ehrman and M. W. Holmes, 1995) 336-60. J. H. Petzer and P. J. Hartin (eds.), A South African Perspective on the NT: Essays by South African NT Scholars Presented to B. M. M. (1986).

M. W. HOLMES

MEYER, EDUARD (1855–1930)

Born in Hamburg Jan. 25, 1855, M. was educated at the Johanneum in Hamburg, where he studied both classics and ancient Semitic languages and imbibed a strong dose of German nationalism and anti-Judaism. After a semester at Bonn he went to Leipzig (1872–75), where he received his doctorate at age twenty with a dissertation on the Egyptian god Seth and habilitated in 1879 with a work on the Greek king Pontos. In 1875–76 he served as tutor to the family of the British counsul general in Constantinople and after the latter's death accompanied the body back to England. M. stayed in that country for a time, studying and writing, and developed strong ties with Britain. He returned to Germany, eventually serving as Dozent and later as ausserordentlicher professor of ancient history at Leipzig (1884), then as professor at Breslau (1885–89), Halle (1889–1902), and Berlin (1902–23). He made two lecture trips to the United States (March–April 1904 at the invitation of the University of Chicago, and Sept. 1909–April 1910 to teach at Harvard). However, after WWI he broke off all relationships with Americans and Britons. He served as rector of the University of Berlin in the difficult year of 1919–20 and died in Berlin Aug. 31, 1930.

M. never founded a school, although he was widely recognized as the most eminent historian of his day, a reputation still accorded him. He was at home in numerous ancient languages; wrote on modern as well as on ancient history; and saw himself as a modern Thucydides, whose works, along with those of the historian B. Niebuhr (1776–1831), exerted a strong influence on him. He also contributed articles to general publications, including some semi-popular English-language journals and the eleventh edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

M. wrote several works specifically related to biblical study and ancient Judeo-Christian history. His volume on the origin of Judaism (1896; see the analysis by F. Parente in W. Calder and A. Demandt [1990] 329-43) took a conservative stance toward the decree of Cyrus and other documents and lists in Ezra–Nehemiah. J. WELLHAUSEN wrote a caustic review, leading to M.'s defensive rejoinder (1897). In 1906 M. published a work on the Israelites and their neighbors in which he dealt with the early history of Israel. He gave full recognition to the folk-legend quality (see FOLKLORE) of the stories about Moses; followed Wellhausen in his isolation of the Sinai material from the exodus and settlement traditions; and depicted Moses as a priestly functionary at the sanctuary at Kadesh (see E. Osswald [1962]), arguing that his association with other traditions in the Pentateuch was secondary. In addition, M. argued that the early Israelite tribes did not share a common history and came into being as entities in the land of Canaan; that many Israelite traditions were centered at cult places; and that Shechem played a significant role in early Israelite history, its covenant ritual and festival forming the basis for the depiction of Moses' work at Sinai. (Many of these ideas were later developed by A. Alt, M. Noth, and G. von Rad.)

In his multi-volume Geschichte des Altertums (1884–1902) M. touched on many matters related to biblical study. In his discussion of Israel (see vol. 2, 2, 1953[3], 285-86), he argued that the golden age of the Hebrew monarchy—the period of David and Solomon—witnessed the rise of genuinely historical writing, an achievement without parallel in any ancient culture, an idea that became central to the work of von RAD.

M.'s three-volume work on the origins of Christianity (1921–23; see the analysis by E. Plümacher in W. Calder and A. Demandt [1990] 344-67), which reconstructed the life of JESUS and the origins of the early church based primarily on rather conservative attitudes toward the NT writings, was a product of his old age. It tended to ignore much contemporary scholarship and was criticized severely, perhaps unduly.

Works: Geschichte des Altertums (5 vols. in 8 pts., 1884–1902, 1953[3]); Die Entstehung des Judenthums (1896); J. Wellhausen und meine Schrift "Die Entstehung des Judenthums" (1897); Zur Theorie und Methodik der Geschichte (1902) = KS (1910) 1-78; Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme: Alttestamentliche Untersuchungen (1906, with contributions by B. Luther; repr. 1967); Sumerier und Semiten in Babylonien (1906); Der Papyrusfund von Elephantine (1912, 1912[2]); Reich und Kultur der Chetiter (1914); Ursprung und Anfänge des Christentums (3 vols., 1921–23); KS zur Geschichtstheorie und zur wirtschaftlichen und politischen Geschichte des Alterthums (1910; 2 vols., 1924); Blüte und Niedergang des Hellenismus in Asien (1925).

Bibliography: W. A. Calder and A. Demandt (eds.), E. M.: Leben und Leistung eines Universalhistorikers (Mnemosyne, bibliotheca classica Batava, Supp. 112, 1990). K. Christ, Römische Geschichte und deutsche Geschichtswissenschaft (1982) 93-102. V. Ehrenberg, Historicsche Zeitschrift 143 (1935) 501-11. W. W. Gasque, A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (1975) 158-63. J. Irmscher, Das Altertum 33 (1987) 99-103. H. Marol, E. M.: Bibliographie mit einer autobiographischen Skizze E. M. und der Gedächtnisrede von U. Wilcken (1941), full bibliography. E. Osswald, Das Bild des Mose in der kritischen alttestamentliche Wissenschaft seit J. Wellhausen (Theologische Arbeiten 18, 1962) 128-35. W. Otto, "E. M. und sein Werk," ZDMG NS 10 (1931) 1-24. U. Wilcken and W. Jaeger, E. M. zum Gedächtnis: Zwei Reden (1931).

J. H. HAYES

MEYER, HEINRICH AUGUST WILHELM (1800–73)

Born Jan. 10, 1800, in Gotha, Germany, M. studied Protestant theology in Jena from 1818 to 1820. After working briefly as a teacher he became a pastor in Thuringia in 1822. From 1837 onward he held positions of ecclesiastical leadership within the Hanover state church. Offered a professorship at the university in Giessen in 1841, he did not accept. The theological faculty of the university in Göttingen bestowed on him the doctor of theology honoris causa in 1845. He retired in 1865, dying June 21, 1873.

M. considered his life's work the composition of a multi-volume work in three sections, Kritisch exegetischer Kommentar über das NT. The first section was to contain the text and translation; the second, commentary on the NT writings; and the third, an introduction, history of exegesis, and similar articles. This work, begun in 1929 under the auspices of the Göttingen publisher Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, has through its numerous new editions and revisions become familiar to subsequent exegetes under the name "Meyer's Commentary" (MeyerK).

The commentaries to Matthew, Mark, and Luke appeared in 1832, John in 1834, followed by Acts (1835), Romans (1836), 1 Corinthians (1839), 2 Corinthians (1840), Galatians (1841), Ephesians (1843), Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon (1847). Work on the other sections as well as plans for a didactic summary of the results in a theology of the NT were dropped. Henceforth, M. continued to prepare new editions of the writings already treated and delegated the commentaries of the remaining outstanding volumes to three younger colleagues (J. Huther [1807–80], G. Lünemann [1819–94], F. Düsterdieck [1822–1906]).

After M.'s death the main editorial functions went to B. WEISS. Even M.'s early commentaries were translated into English. Planned as a kind of handbook for students, the commentaries are characterized by strict philological execution, by the "gramamtical-historical principle" (preface, 1832), and by brief references to exegetical history. The continual new editions allow the theological standpoint—one not far from the rationalism personified by A. RITSCHL—to come more strongly and confidently to the fore.

Works: Kritisch exegetischer Kommentar über das NT (1832–52; ET, 20 vols., 1873–95).

Bibliography: D. L. Bock, HHMBI, 340-43. F. Düsterdieck, RE^{3} 13 (1903) 39-42. R. Rasch, "H. A. W. M., der Bergründer des Meyerschen Kommentars: Ein Lebensbild aus 19. Jahrhundert," JGNKG 64 (1966) 129-43. A biographical sketch written by his son appears in the commentary on Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon (KEK 9 [1874^4] V-XVIII).

F. W. HORN

MICAH, BOOK OF

1. Before Stade (1881). Micah 3:12 is quoted in Jer 26:18; 5:1[2]; in Matt 2:6 (cf. John 7:42); 7:6; 10:35-36; and in Luke 12:53 (cf. Matt 10:21; Mark 13:12). Some scholars think there is a relationship between Mic 5:1[2] and Isa 7:14. Two Hebrew fragments of the book of Micah were found in caves near Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) dating from the second to the first centuries BCE: from Cave 1, 1QpMi (1Q14), which cites 1:2-5 and has a sectarian commentary on 1:5-7, 1:8-9, and 6:14-16; and from Cave 4, 4QpMi (4Q168), which has a sectarian commentary on 4:8-12. A long scroll of the Minor Prophets in Hebrew was discovered at Wadi Murabba'at in the Bar Kokhba Caves (Mur 88) dating from the end of the first century CE and containing Mic 1:5–3:4. There is also a scroll of the Minor Prophets in Greek dating from the middle of the first century CE and containing Mic 1:1–5:6 (with lacunae). JEROME and CALVIN both wrote commentaries on the Minor Prophets, including Micah, that do not deal with critical issues but are concerned with theological matters.

In 1782 J. D. MICHAELIS attempted to deal with the apparent anachronisms of Micah 4–5 by arguing that Micah 1–5 embodies a chronological sweep from Micah to Christ. Micah 3:12 announces Nebuchadnezzar's overthrow of Jerusalem in 587 BCE; chap. 4 describes events after the fall of Babylon to Late Judaism; and chap. 5 announces the birth of JESUS at Bethlehem and the coming of the kingdom of Christ. The first attack against the authenticity of passages in the book came in 1800 from A. Hartmann (1774–1838), who argued that Micah preached partly during the reign of Manasseh (contrary to 1:1), that the present book of Micah came into being during the exilic period, and that an editor added 4:9-14 and 7:7-17.

Several scholars rejected Hartmann's position. However, in 1867 H. EWALD contended that whereas Micah 1–5 (except 1:1 and 2:12-13) were from Micah of Moresheth, chaps. 6–7 originated from someone living in the days of Manasseh since the language and tone of these two sections are so different. T. Roorda (1801–74) proposed several textual emendations (1869), over fifteen of which also appear in the apparatus of Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (1968–). In 1871 H. OORT contended that Mic 4:1-10 and 5:1[2] originally announced the fall of the Davidic dynasty and the restoration of Saul's dynasty and that 4:11-13 is a later addition, a view he later renounced. In 1872 M. de Goeje (1836–1909) suggested that Mic 4:1-5 was a quotation from an earlier prophet that Micah's opponents had used against him. Then in 1878 J. WELLHAUSEN declared that Mic 7:7-20 had originated a century after the time of Micah of Moresheth because its language and thought are so similar to that of Deutero-Isaiah.

2. From Stade (1881) to Lindblom (1929). Beginning in 1881 B. STADE published several essays in which he argued that only Mic 1:5*b*–2:11 and chap. 3 are authentic. Micah 1:1-5*a*; 2:12-13; and chaps. 4–7 are late because they refer to events much later than the eighth century BCE (e.g., the nations coming to Jerusalem to learn of Yahweh in 4:1-5). Stade's view has had a great impact on Micah research.

The denial of the genuineness of half or more of the book of Micah raised the question of how the book came to be. Within the next half-century at least five theories arose, each championed by several scholars.

a. The literary-historical solution. A literary-historical critic, Stade contended that as the genuine Mican oracles (1:5*b*–2:11; 3) were handed down, two epigones in different periods added the other material in chaps. 1–5. Jeremiah 26:16-19 shows that the original book ended with 3:12. The first epigone, then, lived after Jeremiah; he added 4:1-4; 4:11–5:3[4]; and 5:6-8, 9-14[7-9, 10-15] to correct the message of doom in chaps. 1–3. Later, a second epigone, assuming that Micah was responsible for the additions of the first epigone, added 4:5-10 and 5:4-5[5-6] to declare that Israel's enemies would be defeated. Stade did not deal with 6:1–7:6 but dated 7:7-20 to the Greek period.

b. The chronological explanation. A. van HOONACKER (1908) argued that the book contains three sets of oracles from Micah dating from different periods in his prophetic career and arranged in chronological order. Chapters 1–3 pertain to Shalmaneser V's invasion of Palestine in 725–722 BCE, thus explaining the announcement of the fall of Samaria in 1:5-7. Jeremiah 26:18 dates Mic 3:12 to the reign of Hezekiah, who became king of Judah in 727 BCE (2 Kgs 18:9-10). Micah delivered the oracles in chaps. 4–5 to encourage Hezekiah's reform, which was inspired by the fall of Samaria and led the Jews to repent, as reported in Jeremiah 26:19. Chapters 6–7 contain a dramatic fiction, couched in the present and future but referring to the past, that is directed at northern Israelites left in the land after the fall of Samaria. "I" is Samaria, who realizes that her punishment is due to her sins. But if she repents, Yahweh will bring her back.

c. The rearrangement proposal. Some scholars thought that the incoherence of the book is due to a disarrangement of the materials during transmission. In 1891 H. Elhorst (1861–1924) proposed that the original order was chaps. 1, 2–3, 6–7, 4–5. The first copyist arranged these chaps. in double columns in certain order. A second copyist misunderstood this order and so copied chaps. 2 and 3 incorrectly. Three other copyists at different times made their own mistakes, resulting in the present form of the book. Elhorst claimed to have restored the "original order."

d. The compilation view. Several critics explained the present form of the book as a compilation of originally independent collections of oracles. For example, W. R. SMITH (1882) thought these collections were chaps. 1–5 and 6–7, while W. BAUDISSIN (1901) regarded them as 1–3; 4–5; 6:1–7:6; and 7:7-20.

e. The anthological analysis. The most widespread view was that Micah is an anthology of prophetic pieces originating at various times with different authors. K. BUDDE (1927) described Zechariah 9–14 and Micah 4–7 as "catch-alls" for late eschatological oracles. An outspoken advocate of this view was J. LINDBLOM (1929), who insisted that each pericope within the book must be interpreted in isolation because the present arrangement of the book is accidental. Thus all attempts to find coherence are doomed to failure.

3. From Lindblom (1929) to Lescow (1972). During the next four decades all five explanations just described were represented. R. Wolfe (1935) contended that thirteen redactors inserted materials into the Book of the Twelve, seven of whom contributed to the book of Micah between 540 and 225 BCE. T. ROBINSON (1936) found no coherence in the book. He maintained that various redactors at different times changed the earlier text and that three collectors pieced together disconnected fragments of originally longer prophetic oracles to produce the final form of the book.

In contrast, S. MOWINCKEL (1944) reasoned that most of 1:2–2:11; 3; and possibly 6:1–7:7 are genuine. The present form of the book was purposefully arranged coherently by combining two originally independent collections: chaps. 1–5 and 6–7, each with a section of doom followed by a section of hope. A. WEISER (1949) believed that most of the book of Micah is genuine and that it was arranged in an orderly fashion. Most of the later additions (1:1; 2:12-13; 4:1-8; 5:6-8, 14[7-9, 15]; 7:8-20) are liturgical responses of the later community to the genuine oracles of Micah.

W. Beyerlin (1959) was concerned with the cultic traditions assumed by Micah and his audiences in the authentic material in the book. He isolated five traditions: "Israel" as a term for the amphictyonic league, the theophany, the amphictyonic laws, exodus-conquest, and David-Jerusalem. Accordingly, most of the material in the book is genuine. A. Kapelrud (1961) declared that virtually all the material in the book is genuine. The structure and terminology fit the cultic drama of Israelite religion in the eighth century BCE.

R. Vuilleumier (1971) attributed most of the material to Micah (except 1:1, 5, 12*b*, 13*b*; 2:12-13; 4:10, 13; 5:4*b*-5*a*, 8, 14[5*b*-6*a*, 9, 15]; 7:8-20) and saw a purposeful structure following a doom (chaps. 1–3)—hope (e.g., 4–5)—doom (6:1–7:7)—hope (7:8-20) pattern. He detected five steps in the book's formation: (a) the authentic material in chaps. 1–5 was collected; (b) a series of later Mican oracles (6:1–7:7) was added; (c) 2:12-13 was added during the exilic period; (d) 7:8-20 was added during the Persian age; (e) brief modifications and additions were made at various times.

T. Lescow (1972) found four stages in the book's growth. Genuine material is limited to chaps. 1–3 (omitting 1:1, 5*b*-7, 13*b*, 16; 2:12-13). During the exilic period interpolations were made in chaps. 1–3, and songs and other material were added (4:6–5:14[5:15]). Between 516 and the beginning of the fourth century BCE, 1:1 and 4:1-5 were added. Finally 1:6-7 and chaps. 6–7 were added as an anti-Samaritan polemic during the Samaritan schism in the fourth century BCE.

4. From 1972 to Present. Since Lescow's study, numerous commentaries, articles, and dissertations have been written on Micah. Several major commentaries deserve serious consideration. W. RUDOLPH (1975) maintains that most of the book is authentic (excepting 1:1; 4:1-4; 5:6-8[5:7-9]; and 7:8-20). Some of the authentic sections (2:12-13; 4:9, 11-13) are by Micah's opponents. The book falls into chaps. 1–2; 3–5; 6–7. However, the redactor(s) had no purpose in mind (theological or otherwise) by this arrangement, except perhaps to temper Micah's harsh proclamations of judgment with words of hope. L. Allen (1976) accepts most of the book as genuine (excepting 4:6-8 and 7:8-20) and analyzes its structure as chaps. 1–2; 3–5; 6–7. The book was handed down and "re-actualized" until 7:8-20 was added during the time of Haggai and Zechariah to reapply Micah's message to a new historical situation.

J. L. Mays (1976) divides the book into two parts, chaps. 1–5 and 6–7, each of which contains judgment followed by salvation. This does not reflect a historical development but the redactor's theology that Yahweh is responsible for both destruction and restoration. Only 1:3-5*a*, 8-15; 2:1-11; and chap. 3 are authentic; preserved orally by Micah himself, they were handed down through his disciples. This collection was later expanded in connection with Josiah's reform. In the exilic period a collection of salvation oracles was added in two stages: Chapters 1–5 were completed after the rebuilding of the Second Temple in 515 BCE. From the late preexilic period onward, chaps. 6–7 grew until they reached their final form and were added to chaps. 1–5 in the early fifth century BCE.

A. van der Woude (1976) argues that the entire book comes from the eighth century BCE but from two different prophets. Chapters 6–7 come from a contemporary of Hosea in northern Israel in the days of Jothan and Ahaz, "Deutero-Micah." Chapters 1–5 are from Micah of Moresheth, who delivered the first chapter before the fall of Samaria, c. 723 BCE, and chaps. 2–5 c. 714 BCE, when Hezekiah joined the Philistines in a rebellion against Sargon II of Assyria. Chapters 1–5 contain several words by Micah's opponents (2:12-13; 4:1-9, 11-13; 5:4-5, 7-14[5-6, 8-15]).

In a lengthy and meticulous treatment, B. Renaud (1977) traces a complicated history of the evolution of the book's growth from genuine material in 1:3–2:11; 3; 6:9-15 in the eighth century to its final form in the second century BCE. The first stage shows that Micah was a prophet of judgment. The second stage occurred during the exilic period when a tradent added material to produce 1:3–2:11; 3; 6:2–7:7, all judgment material. The third stage took place in the Persian period (5th–4th cents. BCE) as Jewish priests sought to encourage their suffering comrades with words of hope. They added 1:2; chaps. 4–5 (including 2:12-13); 6:1; and 7:8-20, giving the book a judgment-salvation structure: chaps. 1–3 and 4–5; 6:1–7:6 and 7:7-20. The fourth stage occurred in the second century BCE when circles related to "Deutero-Zechariah" made some minor changes in 1:5; 3:12; and 6:16 and moved 2:12-13 to its present position. H. WOLFF's approach (1980) is very similar. He sees three stages in the book's growth: The genuine material is 1:6, 7*b*-13*a*, 14-16; 2:1-4, 6-11; 3. Deuteronomists (see DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY) added a commentary consisting of 1:3-5, 7*a*, 13*b*. Then several prophets in the early postexilic period (6th cent. BCE) added additional judgment oracles in 6:1–7:7, hope oracles in 2:12-13 and chaps. 4–5, the liturgical ending in 7:8-20, and the introduction in 1:1-2.

D. Hillers (1984) despairs of any attempt to reconstruct a history of the growth of the book, contends that no meaningful structure is to be ascertained, and thinks that almost all the material is genuine. In response to oppression Micah and his associates launched a "movement of revitalization," condemning the existing order and envisioning a new age. R. L. Smith (1984) believes that most of the book is authentic, with some editing and supplementing in the time of Jeremiah and in the exilic or early postexilic period. The proper arrangement of the book is chaps. 1–2; 3–5; 6–7.

The unity, coherence, and authenticity of the material in Micah have been the subject of several disserations in the last decades of the twentieth century. D. Hagstrom (1982, pub. 1988) argued that "the book of Micah displays an overall literary coherence which renders it capable of meaningful construal as a unit." The two main subunits, chaps. 1–5 and 6–7, correspond in structure, display similar terminology, interlock through common motifs and other linking correspondences, and cohere theologically. L. Luker's dissertation (1985), with an extensive history of research (8-88), focuses on the redactional unity expressed through three pervasive themes: Divine Warrior, lament, and the personification of city/nation as female. K. Cuffey's work (1987), also with a history of interpretation (4-124), stresses the coherence of the four units in the book (1–2; 3:1–4:8; 4:9–5:14; and 6–7), focusing on the oracles of doom followed by the promises of hope. C. Shaw (1990, pub. 1993) has argued that Micah was a pro-Davidic prophet whose six oracles (1:2-16; 2:1-13; 3:1–4:8; 4:9–5:14; 6:1–7:7; 7:8-20) are arranged chronologically, derive from various strategic periods in Judean-Israelite history, and date from the years of Jotham's reign (759/58–744/43 BCE) to the time immediately after the capture of Samaria by Shalmaneser V in 722/21 BCE.

5. The Task Ahead. The research and evaluations of the book of Micah focus attention on five major areas of concern for future work. First, further work needs to be done on the text, especially on 1:10-15; 2:6-11; and 6:9-13, 16. Second, exegesis of specific passages calls for careful and extended attention. Third, the criteria used for determining the date and historical background of the various pericopes require reevaluation. Fourth, the TRADITION-historical question of how the book of Micah came to be and the redactional question of the structure and intention of the present form of the book need further examination. Finally, the theology of the prophet Micah and of the book of Micah deserve careful consideration, along with attempts to discover how these fit into the theological analysis of the entire HB.

Bibliography: L. C. Allen, The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, and Micah (NICOT, 1976) 239-404. W. W. F. Baudissin, Einleitung in die Bücher des Alten Testaments (1901) 518-33. W. Beyerlin, Die Kulttraditionen Israels in der Verkündigung des Propheten Micha (FRLANT NF 54, 1959). K. Budde, "Verfasser und Stelle von Micha iv 1–4 (Jes. ii 2–4)," ZDMG 81 (1927) 152-58. J.-H. Cha, Micha und Jeremia (BBB 107, 1996). K. H. Cuffey, "The Coherence of Micah: A Review of the Proposals and a New Interpretation" (diss., Drew University, 1987). H. J. Elhorst, De Prophetie van Micha (1891). G. H. A. Ewald, Commentary on the Prophets of the OT (1867; ET 1876) 2:289-339. M. J. de Goeje, "Proeve van Verklaring van Micha 4, vs. 1-5, vs. 2," ThT 6 (1872) 279-84. D. G. Hagstrom, The Coherence of the Book of Micah: A Literary Analysis (SBLDS 89, 1988). A. T. Hartmann, Micha neu üversetzt und erläutert (1800). D. R. Hillers, Micah (Hermeneia, 1984). A. van Hoonacker, Les douze petits prophètes (1908) 339-411. K. Jeppesen, "New Aspects of Micah Research," JSOT 8 (1978) 3-32; "How the Book of Micah Lost Its Integrity: Outline of the History of the Criticism of the Book of Micah with Emphasis on the Nineteenth Century," StTh 33 (1979) 101-31. W. C. Kaiser, The Communicator's Commentary: Micah, Malachi (CCSOT 21, 1992). A. S. Kapelrud, "Eschatology in the Book of Micah," VT 11 (1961) 392-405. P. J. King, Amos, Hosea, Micah: An Archaeological Commentary (1988). T. Lescow, "Redaktionsgeschichtliche Analyse von Micha 1–5," ZAW 84 (1972) 46-85; "Redaktionsgeschichtliche Analyse von Micha 6–7," ZAW 84 (1972) 182-212; Worte und Wirkungen des Propheten Micha: Ein kompositionsgeschichtlicher Kommentar (AT 84, 1997). J. Lindblom, Micha literarisch untersucht (1929). L. M. Luker, "Doom and Hope in Micah: The Redaction of the Oracles Attributed to an Eighth-century Prophet" (diss., Vanderbilt University, 1985). W. McKane, The Book of Micah: Introduction and Commentary (1998). R. Mason, Micah, Nahum, and Obadiah (OTGu, 1991). J. L. Mays, Micah: A Commentary (OTL, 1976). J. D. Michaelis, OEB 20 (1782) 169-84. S. Mowinckle, Det Gamle Testamente 3 (1944) 666-94. H. Oort, "Het Beth-Efraat van Micha V:1," ThT 5 (1871) 501-11. E. Otto, TRE 22 (1992) 695-704. B. Renaud, La Formation du Livre de Michée (EB, 1977). T. H. Robinson, Die zwölf kleinen Propheten (HAT 14, 1, 1936) 127-52. T. Roorda, Commentarius in vaticinium Michae (1869). W. Rudolph, Micha, Nahum, Habakuk, Zephanja (KAT 13, 3, 1975) 21-140. C. S. Shaw, The Speeches of Micah: A Rhetorical-historical Analysis (JSOTSup 125, 1993). D. J. Simundson, "The Book of Micah," NIB (1996) 7:531-89. R. L. Smith, Micah–Malachi (WBC 32, 1984) 2-60. W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel and Their Place in History to the Close of the Eighth Century BC (1882). B. Stade, "Bemerkungen über das Buch Micha," ZAW 1 (1881) 161-72. R. Vuilleumier (with C.-A. Keller), Michée, Nahoum, Habacuc, Sophonie (CAT 11b, 1971) 5-92. A. van der Wal, Micah: A Classified Bibliography (Applicatio 8, 1990). A. Weiser, Das Buch der zwölf kleinen Propheten (ATD 24, 1949) 200-61. J. Wellhausen (ed.), Einleitung in das Alte Testament (F. Bleek, 1878). J. T. Willis, "The Structure of the Book of Micah," SEÅ 34 (1969) 5-42; "Thoughts on a Redactional Analysis of the Book of Micah," SBLSP (1978) 87-107. R. E. Wolfe, "The Editing of the Book of the Twelve," ZAW 53 (1935) 90-129. H. W. Wolff, Micah the Prophet (1978, ET 1981); Micah: A Commentary (BKAT 14, 4, 1982; ET 1990). A. S. van der Woude, Micha (De Prediking van het Oude Testament, 1976). B. M. Zapff, Redaktionsgeschichtliche Studien zum Michabuch im Kontext des Dodekapropheten (BZAW 256, 1997).

J. T. WILLIS

MICHAELIS, CHRISTIAN BENEDIKT (1680–1764)

Born Jan. 26, 1680, in Elrich (Grafschaft Hohnstein), M. died Feb. 22, 1764, in Halle. He was a nephew of orientalist J. H. MICHAELIS and father of J. D. MICHAELIS. Educated in Halle, he received a master's degree in philosophy (1706), became ausserordentlicher professor (1713) and full professor (1914) in philosophy, and subsequently became full professor in theology (1731). An orientalist and theologian of great learning but without literary talent and influence, he participated in his uncle's biblical-philological work. M.'s main service to scholarship lay in his methodical exposition of the Syriac language, in his editorial work on the Biblia hebraica Halensia (1720), and in the scholarly and exacting biblical annotations carried out with his uncle.

Works: Uberiores adnotationes philologico-exegeticae in Hagiographos VT libros (3 vols., 1720); Syriasmus id est grammatica linquae syriacae (1741, 1829[2]); Dissertatio de Ebraea et affinibus Orientis linquis. . . . (1764).

Bibliography: ADB 21 (1885) 676-77. L. Diestel, Geschichte des AT in der christlichen Kirche (1869). E. Hirsch, Geschichte der Neuern evangelischen Theologie 2 (1951) 181. R. Kittel, RE[3] 13 (1903) 53-54. J. G. Meusel, Lexikon der von Jahre 1750 bis 1800 verstorbenen teutschen Schriftsteller 9 (1809) 133-38 (with bibliography). J. D. Michaelis, "Einige Anmerkungen über die Hallische Bibel J. H. Michaelis," OEB 1 (1771) 207-22. O. Podszeck, "Die Arbeit am AT in Halle zur Zeit des Pietismus," WZ(H) (G-Reihe, 7, 5, 1958) 1059-78.

B. SEIDEL

MICHAELIS, JOHANN DAVID (1717–91)

Born Feb. 27, 1717, in Halle, M. died Aug. 22, 1791, in Göttingen. Son of C. B. MICHAELIS and grandnephew of J. H. MICHAELIS, M. pursued theological and oriental studies in Halle, completing his masters in philosophy in 1739. He spent 1741–42 in England, then in 1745 moved to the new university at Göttingen, where he became a full professor in 1750. M.'s early writings followed conservative orthodox lines (his dissertation defended the antiquity of the Hebrew vowel points), but in the 1750s he assumed a much more critical stance.

M. exerted enormous influence within the young university, and his reputation as an orientalist and biblical philologist was extraordinary. Throughout his life he maintained contact with British scholars, and he introduced R. LOWTH's work into Germany. A competent Syriac and Arabic scholar, he drew upon Near Eastern literary and contemporary evidence to elucidate the Bible. He produced numerous writings on Hebrew and oriental grammar and on biblical word and cultural studies, although in these works he often digressed into trivial details. His work shows the influence of Enlightenment thought that had penetrated biblical exegetical work, which was developing into a historical science.

M.'s translations of the NT and the OT presented the concerns of critical exegesis with some facility and were apparently quite well known. His historical relativization of OT writings is apparent in his Mosaisches Recht, in which he maintained that the OT legal collections must be understood from the perspective of their historical origin. One of the eighteenth century's fundamental ideas of a cultural-diachronic view of history also appears in this work: The law of Moses reflects the "childhood of the human race," when culture was more primitive but also more pure and conscientious. After his death M. was praised by J. G. EICHHORN as having contributed considerably to the liberation of the OT from "Buxtorf's darkness."

Works: Dissertatio de punctuorum Hebraicarum antiquitate (1739); Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des neuen Bundes (1750, 1787–88[4]; ET of portions of 1st ed., Introductory Lectures to the Sacred Books of the NT [1761]; ET of 4th ed., Introduction to the NT [4 vols. in 6, 1793–1801; tr. and annotated by H. Marsh, containing his "A Dissertation on the Original Composition of Our Three Canonical Gospels" in 3, 2, 161-409]); Compendium antiquitotum Hebraicarum (1753); Beurtheilung der Mittel welche man anwendet, die ausgestorbene hebräische Sprache zu verstehen (1757); Fragen an die Gesellschaft gelehrter Männer, die auf Befehl Ihro Majestät des Königs von Dänemark nach Arabien reisen (1762); Mosaisches Recht (6 vols., 1770–75, 1776–85[2]; ET Commentaries on the Law of Moses [4 vols. 1814]); Orientalische und exegetische Bibliothek (24 pts., 1771–89); Teutsche Uebersetzung des alten Testaments, mit Anmerkungen für Ungelehrte (13 pts., 1769–85); The Burial and Resurrection of Christ According to the Four Evangelists (1783; ET 1827); Neue Orientalische und exegetische Bibliothek (9 pts., 1786–93); Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des alten Bundes (1787, uncompleted); Uebersetzung des Neuen Testaments (2 pts., 1790–92); Anmerkungen für Ungelehrte (to NT; 4 pts., 1790–92, completed by T. C. Tychsen); Lebensbeschreibung von ihm selbt abgefasst, mit Anmerkungen von Hassencamp: Nebst Bermekungen über dessen litterarischen Charakter von Eichhorn, Schulz—und dem Eloguim von Heyne (1793).

Bibliography: ADB 21 (1885) 685-90. W. Baird, History of NT Research, vol. 1, From Deism to Tübingen (1992) 127-38. J. G. Eichhorn, ABBL 3, 5 (1791) 827-906 = ET "An Account of the Life and Writings of J. D. M.," Biblical Repertory 2 (1826) 239-89. R. Kittel, RE[3] 13 (1903) 54-56. H.-J. Kraus, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments (1982[3]) 97-103. A.-R. Löwenbrück, "J. D. M. et les débuts de la critique biblique," Le siècle des lumières et la Bible (BTT 7, ed. Y. Belaval and D. Bourel, 1986) 113-28; "J. D. M.'s Verdienst um die philologisch-historische Bibelkritik," Historische Kritik und biblischer Kanon in der deutschen Aufklärung (ed. H. G. Reventlow et al., 1988) 157-70. J. G. Meusel, Lexikon der von Jahr 1750 bis 1800 verstorbenen teutschen Schriftsteller 9 (1809) 142-54 (with M.'s bibliography). J. C. O'Neil, The Bible's Authority: A Portrait Gallery of Thinkers from Lessing to Bultmann (1991) 28-38. J. W. Rogerson, HHMBI, 343-46. R. Smend (Sr.), J. D. M. Festrede (1898). R. Smend (Jr.) "Aufgeklärte Bemühungen um das Gesetz: J. D. M.'s Mosaisches Recht," "Wenn Nicht jetzt, wann dann?" Aufsätze für H.-J. Kraus (ed. H.-G. Geyer et al., 1983) 129-39 = his Epochen der Bibelkritik (GS 3, BEvT 109, 1991) 63-73; "J. D. M.," Theologie in Göttingen (ed. B. Moeller, 1987) 59-71 = his Deutsche Alttestamentlicher in drei Jahrhunderten (1989) 13-24.

B. SEIDEL

MICHAELIS, JOHANN HEINRICH (1668–1738)

M. was born July 26, 1668, in Klettenberg (Grafschaft Hohnstein). He completed his studies in Frankfurt a. O. and became ausserordentlicher professor of oriental studies at Halle in 1699. In 1709 he was made full professor of theology and in 1717 was awarded the ThD. He died Mar. 10, 1738, in Halle.

M.'s significance for theology in Halle lay, on the one hand, in his collaboration with the collegium orientale theologicum founded by A. FRANCKE and, on the other hand, in his nurture of historical criticism, without which the pietistic exegesis (see PIETISM) of his age would have degenerated into pure edification. His chief academic accomplishment consisted of the publication of the Biblia hebraica Halensia (1720), which was the collaborative production of the collegium. Under M.'s leadership five manuscripts and nineteen printed editions of the Hebrew text were compared over a period of eighteen years and the main variants noted. The academic worth of this work is not contested; its chief weakness is to be found in its lack of attention to detail. The portion of this work devoted to commentary (Uberiores adnotationes [1720]) and stemming from M.'s pen has less value than the contribution by his nephew, C. B. MICHAELIS.

Works: Hebraica grammatica facilior (1702, 1723[5]); Dissertatio philologica de textu Novi Testament: graeco (1707); Biblia hebraica Halensia (1720); Uberiores adnotationes philologico-exegeticae in Hagiographos VT libros (3 vols., 1720); Dissertationem philologico-criticam de codieibus mss. biblico-hebraicis maxime Erffurtensibus . . . praeside . . . placido eruditorum examini sistit Abrahamus Koll (1706).

Bibliography: L. Diestel, Geschichte des AT in der christlichen Kirche (1869), esp. 415-18. E. Hirsch, Geschichte der neuern evangelischen Theologie 2 (1951) 181. R. Kittel, RE[3] 13 (1903) 53-54. J. D. Michaelis, "Einige Anmerkungen über die Hallische Bibel J. H. M.," OEB 1 (1771) 207-22. O. Podczeck, "Die Arbeit am AT in Halle zur Zeit des Pietismus," WZ(H).GS 7, 5 (1958) 1059-78. K. H. Rengstorff, "J. H. M. und seine Biblia Hebraica von 1720," Zentren der Aufklärung 1 (WSA 15, 1989) 15-64.

B. SEIDEL

MIDDLETON, CONYERS (1683–1750)

Born in Yorkshire, M. attended Trinity College, Cambridge (BA, MA), becoming a fellow in 1706, which he surrendered upon his marriage in 1710. Receiving the doctor of divinity degree (1717), he was appointed principal librarian of the University of Cambridge (1721). M. was involved in controversy throughout much of his life, first with R. BENTLEY, master of Trinity, over internal affairs of the school and the latter's proposals for a new edition of the Greek NT, and then with various writers in defense of M. TINDAL and deistic positions (although he retained ecclesiastical preferment until his death; see DEISM).

In his attack on D. Waterland (1683–1740), a staunch defendant of the historicity of everything in the Bible and an opponent of Tindal, M. challenged the traditional views of biblical INSPIRATION and AUTHORITY, argued for an allegorical, non-historical reading of much of the HB, and traced many of its ideas and practices to paganism. He believed that the inconsistencies among the Gospels call inspiration into question.

With his work on miracles (1748) M. entered the great debate on their credibility and produced a book that temporarily overshadowed D. HUME's significant study that appeared the same year. Protestants had long denied Roman Catholic claims regarding miracles in the present, while retaining belief in miracles in biblical and early church times. H. Dodwell (1641–1711) had placed the cessation of miracles in the fourth century, while W. WHISTON had associated their end with the establishment of the Athanasian-Trinitarian heresy (381 CE), although conceding that the devil had moved in to continue some miraculous activity. M. denied that miracles occurred in the developing church, raised questions even about those in the NT (Gospels excluded), and argued that accounts of miracles were based on fraud and imposture fed by the credulity of the times in which the stories developed. Diabolical possession, miracles, speaking in tongues, etc., were part of the ancient pagan world and could not be denied without simultaneously denying Christian claims.

M., like Hume, laid the bases for the claim that narratives of ancient events must be evaluated with the same criteria of authenticity as those applied to contemporary events. This meant that the division between sacred and profane history, or in later terminology Heilsgeschichte and Geschichte, could not be sustained and that the miraculous belongs to the conceptual world of the narrator rather than to the actual course of events themselves. M.'s work was influential and controversial not only in England but also in France and Germany.

Works: A Letter from Rome, Shewing an Exact Conformity Between Popery and Paganism, or the Religion of the Present Romans, Derived from That of Their Heathen Ancestors (1729, 1741[4]); A Letter to Dr. Waterland, Containing Some Remarks on His "Vindication of Scripture. . . ." (1731); The History of the Life of M. Tullius Cicero (2 vols., 1741, 1750[4]); A Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers of the Christian Church (1748); An Examination of the Lord Bishop of London's Discourses Concerning the Use and Intent of Prophecy, with . . . a Further Inquiry into the Mosaic Account of the Fall (1750); Miscellaneous Works (4 vols., 1752; 5 vols., 1755), containing a number of previously unpublished works including: "Some Cursory Reflections on the Dispute or Dissension Which Happened at Antioch Between the Apostles Peter and Paul" (2:255-96), "Reflections on the Variations or Inconsistencies Which Are Found Among the Four Evangelists, in Their Different Accounts of the Same Facts" (2:296-376), and "An Essay on the Gift of Tongues" (2:377-414).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 3092-101. R. M. Burns, The Great Debate on Miracles: From J. Glanvill to D. Hume (1981). N. L. Torrey, "C. M. and the Continuation of the Historical Argument," Voltaire and the English Deists (Yale Romanic Studies, 1930) 154-74. L. Stephens, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (2 vols., 1876, 1902[3]) 1:213-34; DNB 37 (1894) 343-48.

J. H. HAYES

MIDRASH

The Hebrew term Midrash, from drš, "to seek out, investigate, inquire of," refers to (1) the particular mode of scriptural interpretation practiced by the rabbis of the land of Israel and Babylonia in late antiquity, (2) any individual rabbinic interpretation ("a Midrash"), and (3) the corpus of edited literature composed of rabbinic scriptural interpretations.

1. Midrashic Hermeneutics. As a mode of scriptural interpretation Midrash is characterized by its dense overreading of the biblical text. Every lexical element is deemed to bear syntactic meaning. Meaning also is generated associatively through the juxtaposition of superficially similar textual elements (i.e., words, phrases, verses) from throughout Scripture that are construed as indicating substantive similarities and interrelationships among their discrete contexts (intertextual reading; see INTERTEXTUALITY). Underlying these hermeneutical techniques (see HERMENEUTICS) is the conviction that the scriptural text in all its details constitutes the revealed word of God, hence every textual element is significant and conveys a meaning (frequently multiple meanings) intended by the divine Author; there are no redundancies. Moreover, Scripture is treated as a kind of oracle requiring interpretation; many of the techniques employed by the rabbis are common to ancient dream interpretation, oracle interpretation, and divination (see S. Lieberman [1950]). Thus the act of interpretation is deemed to be an encounter with the revealed mind of God.

A Midrash is simultaneously exegesis and eisegesis: The rabbinic value system and worldview are read into the text, but the textual details themselves associatively generate or trigger the reading. In this manner the ongoing religious significance of the biblical text is salvaged for its latter-day rabbinic interpreters.

2. Types of Midrash. The rabbis distinguish between legal (midrash halakhah) and non-legal (midrash haggadah or aggadah) Midrash. Legal Midrash extends and specifies the laws of the Torah, primarily through the hermeneutical techniques of inclusion, exclusion, and analogy. Rhetorically, it seeks to justify and find normative significance in the precise wording of Scripture (see J. Harris [1994]). The so-called Baraita of Rabbi Ishmael (prefaced to Sipra, on which see below) enumerates thirteen hermeneutical techniques for legal exegesis of Scripture. Some of the material in the legal midrashic compilations, however, is a series of post facto exercises artificially pegging to Scripture rabbinic rulings found in apodictic form in the Mishnah and Tosefta. (Many of these rulings, in fact, are derived from Scripture, but through logical extension of biblical law rather than through overreading of isolated lexical elements in the biblical text; see J. Neusner [1977] 63-71.)

Non-legal Midrash exhibits greater interpretive license. Its methods are primarily associative and figurative; its purposes, didactic and hortatory. For the rabbis the biblical narratives in their minutest textual details became a series of timeless paradigms displaying the underlying values and beliefs of rabbinic culture: the primacy and salvific value of Torah study (already engaged in by the patriarchs); the ubiquity of God's providence, ultimately rewarding the righteous and punishing the wicked measure for measure; the persistence of God's love and concern for the divinely chosen people, notwithstanding the destruction of the Temple and Israel's current subjugation to pagan (subsequently, Christian) Rome; and the trustworthiness of Israel's hope for ultimate vindication and redemption in the messianic future. Non-legal midrashic hermeneutical techniques include filling out of ellipses in the biblical text (some of them manufactured by the Midrashists); concretization and historical application of abstract texts, particularly in poetic passages; juxtaposition and mutual interpretation of discrete verses (intertextual readings); and wordplays. The rabbis (and rabbinic redactors) allowed the validity of multiple non-legal interpretations of any verse. As long as basic tenets of the rabbinic worldview and ethos were not violated, a lesson derived by an authorized interpreter was deemed to have been intended by the divine Author.

3. Midrashic Literature. The corpus of midrashic literature was created in the land of Israel between the third and ninth centuries CE. (Additional midrashic materials are found in the Talmuds of Palestine and Babylonia.) This literature displays a variety of styles and editorial strategies. The earliest documents, the so-called Tannaitic, or halakhic Midrashim dating from the third or fourth century CE, contain both legal and non-legal exegesis and take the form of verse-by-verse commentaries, often supplemented by expansive rhetorical constructions, on entire biblical books. These are: Mekhilta de-Rabbi Ishmael (on Exodus, beginning with chap. 12), Mekhilta de-Rabbi Simeon bar Yohai (on Exodus; fragmentarily preserved), Sipra (on Leviticus), Sipre (on Numbers, beginning with 5:1, and Deuteronomy), and Sipre Zuta (on Numbers; fragmentarily preserved). The next documents, from the fourth through sixth centuries, contain only non-legal exegesis and are linguistically and stylistically akin to the TALMUD of Palestine. These are Bereshit Rabbah (on Genesis), Eikha Rabbah (on Lamentations), Wayiqra Rabbah (a series of literary homilies on selected verses from Leviticus), and Pesiqta de-Rab Kahana (a series of literary homilies on the synagogue lections for the holidays and special sabbaths of the liturgical year). These documents characteristically make use of a literary-rhetorical structure called a petiḥta, which is an extended form of intertextual reading. A third group of documents, from the sixth through ninth centuries, is genuinely homiletical. These texts rework non-legal materials from the earlier documents. They are characterized by the use of halakhic petiḥtot, which homiletically connect well-known Mishnaic rulings with the scriptural verse to be expounded. These are Midrash Tanhuma (on the entire Pentateuch), Debarim Rabbah (on Deuteronomy), Pesiqta Rabbati (on synagogue lections for the holidays and special sabbaths), and the second parts of Shemot Rabbah (on Exodus) and Bemidbar Rabbah (on Numbers). Later works include midrashic compilations on Song of Songs, Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Psalms, and Proverbs (see H. Strack and G. Stemberger [1991]).

Bibliography: P. S. Alexander, "Midrash," A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (ed. R. J. Coggins and J. L. Houldin, 1990) 452-59. D. Boyarin, Intertextuality and the Reading of Midrash (1990). M. Fishbane, The Garments of Torah (1989). S. Fraade, From Tradition to Commentary: Torah and Its Interpretation in the Midrash Sifre to Deuteronomy (1991). J. Harris, How Do We Know This? Midrash and the Fragmentation of Modern Judaism (1995). I. Heinemann, Darkhei ha'aggadah (1954²). M. D. Herr, "Midrash," EncJud, 11:1507-14; "Midreshei Halakhah," EncJud, 11:1522-23. L. Jacobs, "Hermeneutics," EncJud, 8:366-72. J. L. Kugel, "Two Introductions to Midrash," Prooftexts 3 (1983) 131-55. J. L. Kugel and R. A. Greer, Early Biblical Interpretation (LEC 3, 1986). S. Lieberman, "Rabbinic Interpretation of Scripture," Hellenism in Jewish Palestine (1950) 66-82. J. Neusner, A History of the Mishnaic Law of Purities. XXII. The Mishnaic System of Uncleanness (SJLA 6, 1977); Judaism and Scripture (1986); What Is Midrash? (GBS, 1987); Introduction to Rabbinic Literature (ABRL 8, 1994). G. G. Porton, "Defining Midrash," The Study of Ancient Judaism (ed. J. Neusner, 1981) 1:55-92; "Midrash," ABD 4:818-22. D. Stern, "Midrash," Contemporary Jewish Religious Thought (ed. A. A. Cohen and P. Mendes-Flohr, 1987) 613-20; "Midrash and Indeterminacy," Critical Inquiry 15 (1988) 132-61; Parables in Midrash: Narrative and Exegesis in Rabbinic Litarature (1991). H. L. Strack and G. Stemberger, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (1982⁷; ET 1991). L. Zunz and H. Albeck, Haderashot beyisrael (1954²).

R. S. SARASON

MILGROM, JACOB (1923–)

Born in New York City, Feb. 1, 1923, M. attended Brooklyn college (BA 1943) and the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City (BHL 1943; MHL 1946; DHL 1953). Ordained as a rabbi, he taught HB at the Graduate School of Religion at Virginia Union University (1954–65) before becoming professor of biblical studies at the University of California at Berkeley (1965–93). After retirement he emigrated to Israel.

Two of M.'s early publications were important contributions to prophetic studies (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). In a 1955 article he argued that Jeremiah 1–2 reflects historical and religious conditions prior to the Josianic reform (c. 622 BCE), thus countering a developing tendency in scholarship to date the prophet's work totally to the Babylonian period (post–609 BCE) or later. In a 1964 article he argued that Isaiah 1–5 reflects conditions during the reign of King Uzziah, thereby challenging the long-held view that Isaiah 6 is a narrative concerning the inaugural call of the prophet.

M. is, however, best known for his study of ancient Israelite religion and cult, as reflected especially in the books of Leviticus and Numbers. His work in this area has been informed by some entirely new perspectives on the issues involved, by a thorough utilization of ancient Near Eastern comparative traditions, by detailed attention to rabbinic and medieval Jewish biblical interpretation, and by insights into rituals and regulations gained from general anthropological studies. He has stressed the monotheistic holiness of the HB's priestly material, a holiness enshrined in the Temple and its sanctums, a holiness in which divine presence is threatened only by the pollution created by humankind's impurities and wrongdoings and which attaches itself to the sanctuary requiring ritual purgation. M. has shown how ethical concerns as well as remorse, repentance, and confession and restitution undergird the various rituals and sacrifices of the Temple cult and how the themes of life and death are reflected in practices relating to bodily impurity and diet. (For a synopsis of his views, see his "Priestly ("P") Source," ABD [1992] 5:454-61.)

M. follows the views of Y. KAUFMANN in dating the P, or Priestly source, prior to D or the book of Deuteronomy. In an 1976 article M. argued that Deuteronomy presupposes and alludes to material found in JE and P and thus postdates them. Within the priestly materials M. distinguishes P from H, the holiness material located primarily in Leviticus 17–26. He views H as part of a priestly or holiness school redaction found throughout the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), but later than the P material and redaction. He considers both P and H to be preexilic, with P's origins probably to be related to pre-monarchic Shiloh.

M.'s commentaries on Leviticus and Numbers are monumental works interspersed with numerous excursuses that are often self-contained essays. M. has also published numerous articles on issues related to the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, especially issues dealing with cultic and priestly matters arising out of the so-called Temple Scroll.

Works: "The Date of Jeremiah, Chapter 2," JNES 14 (1955) 65-69; "Did Isaiah Prophesy during the Reign of Uzziah?" VT 14 (1964) 164-82; Studies in Levitical Terminology, vol. 1, The Encroacher and the Levite: The Term 'Aboda (University of California Publications, Near Eastern Studies 14, 1970); "Profane Slaughter and a Formulaic Key to the Composition of Deuteronomy," HUCA 47 (1976a) 1-17; Cult and Conscience: The 'Asham and the Priestly Doctrine of Repentance (SJLA 18, 1976b); Studies in Cultic Theology and Terminology (SJLA 36, 1977); Numbers (JPSTC, 1990); Leviticus (2 vols., AB 3 and 3a; 1991–).

Bibliography: D. P. Wright et al. (eds.), Pomegranates and Golden Bells: Studies in Biblical, Jewish, and Near Eastern Ritual, Law, and Literature in Honor of J. M. (FS, 1995), with preface by D. N. Freedman (ix-xi) and bibliography of M.'s publications (xiii-xxv).

J. H. HAYES

MILL (MILLS), JOHN (1645?–1707)

An English textual scholar, M. was born at Hardendale (Cumbria), probably in 1645. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, became a fellow in 1670, was appointed rector of Bletchington, Oxfordshire, in 1681, and was elected principal of St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1685. He died June 23, 1707.

M's magnum opus was his edition of the Greek NT, an undertaking encouraged by E. Bernard (1638–96) with the approval of J. FELL, bishop of Oxford, himself a textual scholar. The enterprise took thirty years, the last ten devoted to writing the prolegomenon. The prolegomenon includes a discussion of the dates and historical settings of the earliest Christian writings, an account of the formation of the NT CANON, and a history of the transmission of the text from the earliest times to M.'s own day, together with a detailed description of manuscripts, versions, and patristic evidence. It also explains his method of dealing with the material. M. reproduced the 1550 text of Stephanus, although he eventually concluded that the Complutensian POLYGLOT preserved a better text. He listed alternative readings on each page, collating the principal manuscripts then available and giving the evidence of the versions and patristic writings. His work contains an estimated 30,000 variant readings.

M's edition, published only fourteen days before his death, contained the fullest account then available of the textual evidence for the NT. It aroused vigorous theological controversy. D. WHITBY (Examen Variantium Lectionum Johannis Millii S.T.P. in Novum Testamentum [1710]) argued that its vast number of readings threatened the AUTHORITY of the Scriptures. A. COLLINS, in his Discourse of Free-Thinking (1713), publicized Whitby's arguments, but R. BENTLEY defended M. in Remarks upon a Late Discourse of Free-Thinking (1713).

A revised edition of M.'s NT by L. Küster (1670–1716), which added new variants, was published in Holland in 1710. M's large collection of variant readings raised the possibility of producing a Greek NT that was independent of the textus receptus. Bentley hoped to produce such an edition, but the scheme did not materialize. Such editions were brought out, however, by E. Wells (1667–1727) between 1709 and 1719 and by D. Mace (d. 1753) in 1729, both on the basis of readings M. made available.

Works: Novum Testamentum (1707).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 3102-105. A. Fox, J. M. and R. Bentley: A Study of the Textual Criticism of the NT, 1675–1729 (1954). J. Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Choisie 14 (1708) 350-411. B. M. Metzger, The Text of the NT (1964) 107-13. B. Porter, DNB 32 (1894) 388-90.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

MILMAN, HENRY HART (1791–1868)

Born in Westminster, London, in 1791 and educated at Eton and Brasenose College, Oxford, M. was ordained in the Anglican Church in 1816 and appointed to serve St. Mary's Church, Reading, Berkshire, in 1818. He served as professor of poetry at Oxford from 1821 to 1831; subsequently, he was appointed rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster (1835). In 1849 he was named dean of St. Paul's, London, where he remained until his death. M. wrote poetry, drama, and history in addition to his volumes on religion.

For the development of biblical criticism M.'s one work of significance was a popularly conceived History of the Jews (3 vols., 1829–31). The first volume took the story to the death of Jeremiah; the second, to the end of the Roman-Jewish War of 66–70 CE; and the third outlined a sketch of Jewish history from the end of the biblical period to the Napoleonic era. The first volume, included in the Family Library, aroused a storm of controversy. It represented a first seriously conceived and popular attempt in Great Britain to set out the HB story as a connected history and to do so in terms that fully recognized that it belonged within an identifiable phase of human history. The accusation that he wrote the history "like any other history" was valid, since this was part of his intention. By an effort of imaginative reconstruction he endeavored to explain how miracles may have been thought to have occurred, even though they had in actuality taken place within the confines of the natural order.

Written in great haste, the book was not a major critical work of the kind that was beginning to appear in Germany. But by the time a third, substantially revised edition with a new preface appeared in 1863, an awareness of the writings of H. EWALD and other German scholars was current in Great Britain, together with a recognition that the new science of ARCHAEOLOGY of the biblical lands made possible a fresh approach to the subject. M.'s work prepared the way for more scholarly and critically informed work on biblical history.

Works: History of the Jews (3 vols., 1829–31, 1863[3]); The History of Christianity, from the Birth of Christ to the Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire (2 vols., 1840); History of Latin Christianity (6 vols., 1854–55).

Bibliography: R. E. Clements, Biblical Studies and the Shifting of Paradigms, 1850–1914 (eds. H. G. Reventlow and W. R. Farmer, JSOTSup 192, 1995) 246-71. R. Garnett, DNB 38 (1894) 1-4. J. S. Hawson, Quarterly Review 126 (1869)

218-47. W. E. H. Lecky, Historical and Political Essays (1908) 249-74. A. Milman (son), H. H. M., DD, Dean of St. Paul's: A Biographical Sketch (1900). C. Smyth, Dean Milman (1949). A. P. Stanley, Essays Chiefly on Questions of Church and State (1870) 572-91.

R. E. CLEMENTS

MILTON, JOHN (1608–74)

Born in London, M. was educated at St. Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge (BA 1629; MA 1632). His earliest extant verses are paraphrases of Psalms 114 and 136, school exercises that anticipate his lifelong interest in the psalms. He translated Psalms 80–88 in 1648 and Psalms 1–8 in 1653 and frequently cites psalms in his works, referring to 126 of the 150 psalms in De Doctrina Christiana (1825), his major work of theology.

M. gained notoriety through vehement attacks on the episcopacy, claiming that neither Scripture nor reason authorized the role of Anglican bishops. His divorce tracts attracted so much attention that they were cited in Parliament as a reason for reviving rigid censorship laws. He cited passages from Genesis, Deuteronomy, Matthew, and 1 Corinthians to support his position for allowing divorce on the grounds of incompatibility.

In De Doctrina Christiana (written 1655–61), M. espoused principles of biblical interpretation that include knowledge of the original languages of Scripture, examination of the context of the passage, comparison of similar texts, and reliance on the analogy of faith. He opposed allegorical interpretations and emphasized the importance of the literal sense.

Paradise Lost (10 bks., 1667; 12 bks., 1674) amplifies the creation and fall of humankind as depicted in Genesis. In it the archangel Michael reveals to Adam and Eve that the Son of God will redeem humankind and thus allow their descendants to regain paradise within themselves. M.'s imaginative use of Scripture, designed to "assert Eternal Providence" and "justify the ways of God to men" (1:25-26), has shaped readings of Genesis since his time.

The brief epic Paradise Regained (1671) follows the story of Christ's temptation by Satan as presented in Luke, with details from Matthew and Mark. Christ is depicted as the perfect pattern of Christian virtue, exhibiting endurance in the face of temptation. Samson Agonistes (1671), a portrait of a flawed but heroic human figure, retells the drama of Samson and Delilah in the form of Greek tragedy, elaborating on biblical sources.

Works: The Works of J. M. (18 vols., ed. F. A. Patterson, 1931–38); The Complete Prose Works of J. M. (5 vols., ed. D. M. Wolfe, 1953–71).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 3106-119. G. B. Christopher, M. and the Science of the Saints (1982). G. N. Conklin, Biblical Criticism and Heresy in M. (1949). H. F. Fletcher, The Use of the Bible in M.'s Prose (1929). A. Guibbory, Ceremony and Community from Herbert to M.: Literature, Religion, and Cultural Conflict in Seventeenth-century England (1998). J. M. Kee, "Typology and Tradition: Refiguring the Bible in M.'s Paradise Lost," Semeia 51 (1990) 153-74. J. R. Knott, Jr., The Sword of the Spirit: Puritan Responses to the Bible (1980). M. Krouse, M.'s "Samson" and the Christian Tradition (1949). R. Lejosne, "La Bible et la droit au divorce selon J. M.," BTT (1989) 597-615. C. S. Lewis, A Preface to "Paradise Lost" (Ballard Matthews Lectures, 1942). H. R. MacCallum, "M. and Figurative Interpretation of the Bible," UTQ 31 (1962) 397-415. L. L. Martz, The Paradise Within: Studies in Vaughan, Traherne, and M. (1964). T. J. O'Keeffe, M. and the Pauline Tradition (1982). C. A. Patrides, M. and the Christian Tradition (1966). M. A. Radzinowicz, M.'s Epics and the Book of Psalms (1989). J. H. Sims, The Bible in M.'s Epics (1962); "Bible, M. and the," A Milton Encyclopedia (1978–83) 1:142-63. J. H. Sims and L. Ryken (ed.), M. and Scriptural Tradition: The Bible into Poetry (1984). L. Stephen, DNB 38 (1874) 24-41. E. M. W. Tillyard, Milton (1949²). D. M. Wolfe, M. in the Puritan Revolution (1941).

J. H. AUGUSTINE

MOFFAT, JAMES (1880–1944)

Born July 4, 1880, M. was educated in his native Glasgow (MA, MD). He held a number of posts during his life: clergy of the Free Church of Scotland, Dundonald (1896–1907) and Broughty Ferry (1907–12); Yates Professor of NT, Mansfield College, Oxford (1912–15); professor of church history, Trinity College, Glasgow (1915–27); and Washburn Professor of Church History, Union Theological Seminary, New York (1927–38). He died in New York City June 27, 1944.

M. contributed to biblical studies in several areas, but he is perhaps best known for his work in biblical TRANSLATION. In 1901 he published The Historical NT, a new translation, although largely traditional in wording, with the books arranged according to historical order and including explanations for his judgments and critical notes on authorship. His second and much more freshly worded translation of the Bible (NT 1913; OT 1924) received its final revision in 1935. M. wanted this translation to make the same impact on modern readers as the original had had on its readers. The OT translation was controversial in its use of "The Eternal" for the Tetragrammaton, its rearrangement and amendment of the text, and its use of various devices to indicate sources (e.g. J, E). Its language was direct, vigorous, and simple. Lacking any serious competitor, M.'s translation was widely used; and a series of commentaries (The Moffat NT Commentary), of which M. was the general editor, was based on it. M. also served as executive secretary of the RSV committee from its foundation until his death.

M. also made significant contributions through biblical commentary. Five major commentaries (1 Corinthians, 1–2 Thessalonians, Hebrews, the General Epistles, and Revelation) covered most of the second half of the NT. To their exegesis he brought his vast knowledge of the ancient world and his wide reading in contemporary literature.

A third area in which M. contributed to biblical studies lay in his interpretation of biblical scholarship. His introduction to the NT (1911), through its comprehensiveness, mastery of previous literature, and clear understanding of the basic issues, reigned supreme in the English-speaking world for more than a generation and still remains a valuable source for views expressed in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In his Hibbert lectures (1921) he sought to introduce the non-specialist reader to the importance of the historical-critical method and to demonstrate the light its use could shed on the NT. In his Shaffer lectures (1942) he attempted to show that use of the historical-critical method need not separate the JESUS of history from the Christ of faith. Here he spoke repeatedly of the divine humanity of Jesus and sought to approach the divine through the human. The Christ of the epistles was not, as extreme liberal thought held, a syncretistic creation of the primitive church. Although he wrote mainly on the epistles, his religion centered on the historical Jesus rather than on any theological system as such. Aware of the work of scholars like F. WREDE and R. BULTMANN, he rejected what he believed to be their overly skeptical views.

M. benefited colleagues and students with a translation of A. von HARNACK's history of the early expansion of Christianity (1904). Through his regular critical surveys of theological writing (of religion, HibJ 1912/13–1940/41 and of recent foreign theology, ExpTim 1928/29–1940/41), he drew their attention to important publications (both books and articles in learned journals).

M.'s work in a pastorate for sixteen years led to a series of publications aimed to assist those who led worship. These included collections of illustrations from literature for various biblical books and texts, surveys of material useful to the preacher, and published sermons and addresses. During his academic life he continued to preach regularly and remained faithful to the church.

Works: The Historical NT (1901); (tr), The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries (2 vols., A. von Harnack, 1904); Literary Illustrations of Daniel, Mark. . . . (1905); G. Meredith: A Primer to the Novels (1909); 1 and 2 Thessalonians (1910a) 1-54; Paul and Paulinism (1910b); Revelation (1910c) 279-494; Introduction to the Literature of the NT (1911, 1918³); The Theology of the Gospels (1912); Expositor's Dictionary of Poetical Quotations (1913); The Approach to the NT (Hibbert Lectures, 1921); Jesus on Love to God, Jesus on Love to Man (1922); Hebrews (ICC, 1924); (ed.) The Expositor's Year Book (1925); Handbook to the Church Hymnary (1927); The General Epistles (MNTC, 1928); Love in the NT (1929); Grace in the NT (1931); He and She: A Book of Them (1933); His Gifts and Promises (1934); A New Translation of the Bible (1935, various sects. issued separately); 1 Corinthians (MNTC, 1938); The First Five Centuries of the Church (1938); Jesus Christ, the Same (Shaffer Lectures, 1942); The Thrill of Tradition (1944).

Bibliography: British Weekly (Aug. 10, 1944). A. Gammie, Preachers I Have Heard (1945) 89-91. A. J. Gossip, ExpTim 56 (1944/45) 14-17.E. F. Scott, DNB, 1941–50 (1959) 602-3.

E. BEST

MONTEFIORE, CLAUDE JOSEPH GOLDSMID

(1858–1938)

The classic example of liberal Jewish thought engaging Christian texts, M. studied at the Berlin Hochschule; but B. JOWETT of Balliol College, Oxford, made more of an impact on him than such great Jewish scholars as S. SCHECHTER (1847–1915), I. Abrahams (1858–1925), and H. Loewe (1882–1940), with whom he worked later. One of the founders of Liberal Judaism in Great Britain, M. brought much of the German school of biblical criticism—and German philosophy—into the shaping of a modern, progressive Judaism dominated by reason and focused on ethics. His calm faith turned his study of NT texts into a dialogue that moved outside the area of apologetics, although most Jews saw him as too much of an apologist for Christianity. They also challenged his radical religious ideas, his rejection of Zionism, and his affirmation of the British way of life, which the traditionalists, fleeing pogroms in Eastern Europe, found threatening to their inherited customs and beliefs. Yet it was M., more than most British Jews, who helped to determine the course of Anglo-Jewry through his thought and through his participation in various Anglo-Jewish organizations. His openness to British scholarship involved him with various universities (in 1892 he gave the Hibbert lectures on the religion of the ancient Hebrews); and in his biblical studies he consistently cited the current German scholars, thus using Strack-Billerbeck in preference to rabbinic commentaries. In 1888 he founded the JQR.

M.'s first classic work, indicating his concern for education and his desire to establish Liberal Judaism firmly on the Bible, was his Bible for Home Reading (1896), which went through three editions before the turn of the century. Where he found the text too corrupt for translation (as in Job), he stated so and omitted the lines. His approach was often idiosyncratic and homiletic—he placed the creation story at the end of the book because he felt the moral and religious difficulties in the account needed a gradual approach for the ignorant!

M. stressed the importance of the NT for Jewish readers who live in a Christian environment and who know that "religious truth does not come exclusively through a single channel." He perceived new insights and truths in the Gospels but stated as regards the nature and concept of God, "I see little advance in NT teaching, and least of all in the Synoptic Gospels" (1923). Yet he felt that these texts should be read by Jews, and his study of the SYNOPTIC Gospels (2 vols., 1909) is a Jewish commentary for Jewish readers that anticipated much of the work of S. SANDMEL fifty years later. M. did not want the NT to be used in Jewish devotions but felt it could instruct and enlarge Jewish religious thinking. It was, after all, part of ancient Jewish literature; and his work on rabbinic literature and Gospel teachings (1930) established similar language and thought patterns.

M.'s views on JESUS represent the acceptable non-Christian point of view today but created havoc among Jews almost a century ago. Restated in 1918 (Liberal Judaism and Hellenism, 125-29) it sounds tame enough: "Jesus [was] not perfect, not sinless, but a striking personality . . . not the one and only Master . . . [but] a noble and illustrious Jew . . . of great achievements . . . whose love and pity stop short of his own critics and antagonists."

The irenic personality of this scholar is perhaps best appreciated when one turns to his most enduring and still popular work, A Rabbinic Anthology (1938), edited jointly with the Orthodox scholar H. Loewe, where the Liberal and Orthodox approach confront each other with amiability and mutual respect. Yet M. will be best remembered for his searching examination of Christianity, of Jesus and of PAUL (whom he admired somewhat excessively), and for his openness to a Christian world that he bestrode as a gentleman and a Jew.

Works: Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews (Hibbert Lectures, 1892, repr. 1979); The Bible for Home Reading (1896, 1899[3]); The Book of Psalms (1901); The Synoptic Gospels (2 vols. 1909, 1927[2], repr. 1968); The Religious Teachings of Jesus (Jowett Lectures, 1910); Outlines of Liberal Judaism: For the Use of Parents and Teachers (1912); Judaism and St. Paul: Two Essays (1914, repr. 1973); Liberal Judaism and Hellenism (1918); The OT and After (1923, repr. 1972); IV Ezra: A Study in the Development of Universalism (Arthur Davis Memorial Lecture, 1929); Rabbinic Literature and Gospel Teachings (1930); (with H. Loewe), A Rabbinic Anthology (1938, frequently repr.).

Bibliography: N. Bentwich, C. M. and His Tutor in Rabbinics: Founders of Liberal and Conservative Judaism (Montefiore Lecture, 1966). F. C. Burkitt, Speculum Religiones (Montefiore FS, 1929) 1-17. L. Cohen, Some Recollections of C. G. M. (1940). W. Jacob, Christianity Through Jewish Eyes: The Quest for Common Ground (1974). E. Kessler, An English Jew: The Life and Writings of C. M. (1989). W. R. Matthews, C. M.: The Man and His Thought (1956). J. Rayner, Liberal Judaism: An Introduction (Montefiore Lecture, 1990).

A. H. FRIEDLANDER

MONTGOMERY, JAMES ALAN (1866–1949)

Born in Germantown, Pennsylvania, M. graduated from the University of Pennsylvania (1887) and devoted much of his life to teaching and administration there and at the Philadelphia School of Divinity. He taught Hebrew (1888–90), then studied in Germany (1890–92). Returning to the United States, he taught at the Philadelphia School of Divinity while earning his PhD (1904) from the University of Pennsylvania, where he later (1909) became professor of Hebrew and Aramaic.

M. was a thorough scholar, best judged by the enduring value of his major works. His first book (1907), based on his dissertation, presented a synthesis of four centuries of Western scholarship on the history of the Samaritan religious community. Concluding that the Samaritans were a sect of the Jews and not a remnant of polytheistic immigrants from the time of the exile, he placed their emergence in the Hellenistic period, anticipating the consensus that emerged in the third quarter of the twentieth century. The book has remained the standard text for introduction to the field of Samaritan studies. M. also wrote commentaries on Daniel and Kings for the ICC, both of which remain standard English-language commentaries, showing mastery of philological details, appreciation of contested positions, and respect for the religious nature of Scripture. He worked with the linguist Z. Harris (b. 1909) on one of the first collections of Ugaritic texts (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE).

Works: The Samaritans (Bohlen Lectures, 1907); Aramaic Incantation Texts from Nippur (1913); The Origin of the Gospel According to Saint John (1923); A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Daniel (ICC, 1927); History of Yaballa III (Record of Civilization Sources and Studies 8, 1927); Arabia and the Bible (1934); (with Z. S. Harris), The Ras Shamra Mythological Texts (Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society IV, 1935); The Bible: The Book of God and of Man (1948); A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Kings (ICC, ed. H. S. Gehman, 1951).

Bibliography: BASOR 117 (1950) 8-13, bibliography. C. H. Gordon, "The Montgomery Years," The Pennsylvania Tradition of Semitics (1986) 33-56. E. A. Speiser, BASOR 115 (1949) 4-8.

B. WHALEY

MOORE, GEORGE FOOT (1851–1931)

Born in West Chester, Pennsylvania, Oct. 15, 1851, M. graduated from Yale in 1872. He taught four years while studying privately, then entered the senior class at Union Theological Seminary in New York, graduating in 1877. Ordained in 1878, he served a pastorate at Zanesville, Ohio (1878–83), before becoming professor of OT at Andover Theological Seminary (1883). He moved to Harvard in 1902, becoming professor of religion in 1904, a post he held until his retirement in 1928. He died at Cambridge, Massachusetts, May 16, 1931.

M. served scholarship in a number of ways in addition to his writings: He edited the Andover Review (1884–93), Journal of Biblical Literature (1889–95), Harvard Theological Review (1908–12, 1921–31), and Harvard Theological Studies (1916–31). He served as president of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (1899) and the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Having spent 1895 and 1909–10 in Germany, he was instrumental in transmitting German scholarship to the United States. At Harvard M. was an imposing, influential teacher. He considered religion a universal human phenomenon, with the various religions representing particular instances, a view that paved the way for courses on religion in college curricula.

Early in his career, while he was at Andover, most of his publications were in HB study, including articles in the Andover Review and other journals, the EncBib, and a commentary on the book of Judges (1895), which is still of great value. At Harvard he branched into religious studies in general and crowned his career with his classic study of Judaism (1927–30). This three-volume work, influenced by his broad study and his friendship with many Jewish scholars, is an informed and sympathetic treatment of early Judaism. (In a famous 1921 article M. castigated Christian scholars for their misrepresentation and caricature of Judaism.) His Judaism has remained an authoritative work, although his view that the "normative Judaism" he described had been the culmination of a development begun in the sixth century BCE and that rabbinic Judaism was practically normative throughout the pre-Christian period have proved to be oversimplifications that ignore the diversity of early Judaism. Nonetheless, the work stands as a monument to one of the best scholars in religion ever produced in the United States.

Works: "Alttestamentliche Studien in Amerika," ZAW 8 (1888) 1-42; 9 (1889) 246-302; Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Judges (ICC, 1895); The Literature of the OT (1913); History of Religions (2 vols., 1913–19); "Christian Writers on Judaism," HTR 14 (1921) 197-254; "Intermediaries in Jewish Theology," HTR 15 (1922) 41-61; The Birth and Growth of Religion (1923); Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of the Tannaim (3 vols., 1927–30).

Bibliography: J. Neusner, " 'Judaism' After M.: A Programmatic Statement," JSS 31 (1980) 141-56. F. C. Porter, "Judaism in NT Times," JR 8 (1928) 30-62. J. H. Ropes, DAB 13 (1934) 124-25. M. Smith, "The Work of G. F. M.," Harvard Library Bulletin 15 (1967) 169-79; EncJud 12 (1971) 293-94.

J. H. HAYES

MORE, HENRY (1614–87)

One of the Cambridge Platonists, M. was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and spent his life there as a fellow, even though offered a bishopric in the Church of England. First welcoming, but eventually writing refutations of the work of R. Descartes (1596–1650), he came to feel that the Bible was the surest source of truth, even for truths of reason; and he wrote extensively on biblical interpretation and PROPHECY. In Conjectura Cabalistica he found that Platonism had been taught by Moses before Plato, in accordance with a tradition that went back to PHILO, many church fathers, and the Renaissance Platonists. An admirer of ORIGEN and a student of the Jewish KABBALAH, he called for a spiritual interpretation of the biblical text that would lead to deeper truths (a process he dubbed "a cabbalistical enterprise"). In expositions of Daniel and Revelation he criticized CALVIN for being too cautious and "historical" in dealing with prophecy and preferred the views of the Anglican J. MEDE. Among his apocalyptic conclusions were the belief that history could be divided into seven ages, that the papal hierarchy was the antichrist, that the millennium would be a glorious age of intimate knowledge of God following the return of Christ, and that hell was not eternal.

Works: Conjectura Cabalistica: Or, A Conjectural Essay of Interpreting the Minde of Moses (1653, repr. 1997); An Exposition of the Seven Epistles to the Seven Churches (1669); Apocalypsis Apocalypseos: Or, The Revelation of St. John the Divine Unveiled (1680); A Plain and Continued Expostion of the Several Prophecies or Divine Visions of the Prophet Daniel (1681).

Bibliography: P. C. Almond, "H. M. and the Apocalypse," JHI 54 (1993) 189-200. S. Hutin, H. M.: Essai sur les doctrines théosophiques chez les Platoniciens de Cambridge (1966). A. Lichtenstien, H. M. (1962). J. H. Overton, DNB 38 (1894) 421-23.

D. D. WALLACE, JR.

MORGAN, THOMAS (d. 1743)

A British Deist (see DEISM) of Welsh origin, for some years pastor of a dissenting congregation in Marlborough, M. was removed from office because of his unorthodox views and subsequently studied medicine. He died Jan. 14, 1743.

Although M. based his thought on natural law and reason, he also believed that God was continually active in the world. He argued that original natural religion degenerated into polytheism because rebellious angels persuaded people to worship them. Described as a "modern MARCION," he strongly challenged the AUTHORITY of the HB and rejected typological interpretations. Drawing attention to historical inconsistencies in the HB, he rejected the traditional authorship of the Pentateuch (See PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and Samuel, believed that Daniel was composed from several sources, and questioned the accuracy of miracle stories. He considered both the ritual and moral laws of Moses to be of human origin, and he claimed that Israelite religion was corrupted by Egyptian influence. He gave an unflattering account of Samuel's treatment of Saul, condemned the religious intolerance of prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and kings, and maintained that David was "the most bloody Persecutor that ever had been known" (The Moral Philosopher, 1:334). By contrast, he praised Solomon, Jezebel, and Ahab for their tolerance of other religions.

One of M.'s distinctive theories, which anticipated J. SEMLER and F. C. BAUR, was that early Christianity was divided into two main factions, the Judaizing party led by Peter and the Gentile party led by PAUL, "the great Free-thinker of his Age" (ibid., 1:71). After Nero's persecution, M. argued, the Judaizers prevailed and became the basis for Catholicism. They were intolerant of dissenters, whom they called Gnostics (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION). M. dismissed the traditional doctrines of the sacraments and the atonement as the product of Judaistic influence and regarded JESUS as essentially a moral teacher and example. He was indebted to the ethical rationalism of S. Clarke (1675–1729) and W. Wollaston (1660–1724) and the empiricism of J. LOCKE. His views were attacked by several writers, including W. WARBURTON; some of his work was reviewed at length by S. BAUMGARTEN.

Works: The Moral Philosopher (3 vols., 1738–40, repr. 1969). Physico-Theology (1741).

Bibliography: G. Gawlick, "Einleitung," The Moral Philosopher (T. Morgan, 1969). G. Lechler, Geschichte des englischen Deismus (1841, repr. 1965), 370-95. H. G. Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (1985) 396-406. L. Stephen, DNB 39 (1894) 35-36.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

MORGENSTERN, JULIAN (1881–1976)

The son of Jewish immigrants who settled in Cincinnati, Ohio, at age thirteen, while attending public school, M. enrolled in the program leading to rabbinic ordination at Hebrew Union College. Graduating from the University of Cincinnati (BA 1901), he was ordained rabbi in the Reform Jewish tradition in 1902. He studied at the universities of Berlin and Heidelberg, earning a PhD from the latter (1904) with a dissertation on sin in Babylonian religion. From 1904 to 1907, he served as rabbi in Lafayette, Indiana, then became an instructor in Bible and Semitic languages at Hebrew Union College, where he remained until attaining emeritus status in 1949. In 1921 he became the first American-born president of his alma mater, a position he held until 1947. In addition to his administrative duties he taught and published, contributing a major article to the HUCA from volume 1 (1924) to volume 40-41 (1969–70). He rarely employed medieval Jewish commentaries or the earlier rabbinic sources, and during his tenure as president the school shifted from a traditional doctrinal interpretation of the Bible to a scientific approach characteristic of twentieth-century American Reform Judaism. M. died in Macon, Georgia, at age ninety-five.

M.'s scholarly work focused on the Hexateuch, the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), and the cultural history of Hebrew Scripture. The documentary hypothesis attracted him; he rejected the Mosaic authorship of the Torah in favor of "progressive revelation" and sought to uncover the strata of tradition. He went beyond the basic J, E, D, P of the GRAF-WELLHAUSEN school in at least two particulars: (1) In an article entitled "The Oldest Document of the Hexateuch" (HUCA 4 [1927] 1-138) he proposed the addition of K, what he called the Kenite document, so named after the Kenite descendants of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses according to Num 10:29-31 (see Judg 4:11). This document was a narrative passage in the larger "Oldest Document," which included also the legal section Exod 34:14-26. (2) He sought to refine further the documentary hypothesis by proposing numerous substrata: D^2, D^3, etc. J^2, J^3, etc., including a substratum of J, represented by Genesis 12–13, as late as the time of Deutero-Isaiah. He published detailed studies of the Pentateuchal codes of law: K (for Kenite), C (for covenant), D, and H; and studies on the "Calendars of Ancient Israel" (HUCA 1924, 1935, 1947). He was, at times, responsible for what some might call excessive textual emendation, including the scissors-and-paste technique, as well as a theory to the effect that words were often lost at the ends of lines in manuscripts of biblical POETRY (HUCA 25 [1954] 41-83).

In the area of prophetic literature M.'s interest settled primarily on the book of Amos. His studies, earlier published serially in HUCA (1936, 1937–38, and 1940), were brought together in book form (1941). In the preface he advanced the thesis that Amos delivered "only one single address . . . that did not require more than a half hour at the very most, one of the most logically and artistically perfect and oratorically effective and inspiring addresses in all literature." With no small reconstruction of the received text he presented his version of Amos's address in "Amos Studies Part IV: The Address of Amos—Text and Commentary," in HUCA 32 (1961) 295-350.

Aside from Amos, among the prophets he had a particular interest in Deutero-Isaiah and the "Oracles Against the Nations." He defended a thesis to the effect that nations bordering on Judea sacked Jerusalem under the leadership of Edom in the year 485 BCE, arousing lasting enmity (HUCA for 1956, 1957, and 1960).

An early essay, "Trial by Ordeal Among the Semites and in Ancient Israel" (HUCA Jubilee Volume [1925] 113-43), suggested one life-long interest. Although he had written a dissertation in the field of Babylonian religion, he did not further pursue his study of the languages and culture of the Mesopotamian peoples. However, he kept a card file on the rites and customs of the Semites from antiquity to modern times, part of which he drew on for later works (1945, 1966a).

Works: The Doctrine of Sin in the Babylonian Religion (1905); A Jewish Interpretation of Genesis (1919, 1965²); Amos Studies I (1941, completed as "Amos Studies Part IV," HUCA 32 [1961] 295-350); The Ark, the Ephod, and the "Tent of Meeting" (1945); The Message of Deutero-Isaiah in Its Sequential Unfolding (1961); The Fire Upon the Altar (1963); Rites of Birth, Marriage, Death, and Kindred Occasions Among the Semites (1966a); Some Significant Antecedents to Christianity (SPB 10, 1966b).

Bibliography: B. J. Bamberger, "The Impact of J. M. on American Jewish Life," Central Conference of American Rabbis Journal (April 1957) 1-4; EncJud 12 (1971) 318-19. S. H. Blank, Central Conference of American Rabbis Yearbook (1977) 267-68. M. Lieberman, "J. M., Scholar, Teacher, and Leader," HUCA (1961) 1-9. M. A. Meyer and S. H. Blank, Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion at One Hundred Years (1976) 68-316.

S. H. BLANK

MORIN, JEAN (1591–1659)

Born to Calvinist parents, M. converted to Roman Catholicism in 1617 through the influence of P. de Bérulle (1575–1629), the founder of the French Oratory (1611). He joined the Oratorians in 1618, wrote many works on patristics and the text of the Bible, and served as theological adviser to Pope Urban VIII (1639–40).

M. became an authority on the SEPTUAGINT, editing an edition in 1628, and on the Samaritan Pentateuch, first brought to Europe by P. della Valle (1586–1652) in 1616. M. edited the latter for G. Le Jay's (1588–1674) Paris POLYGLOT (vol. 6, pub. in 1632) from a manuscript presented to the Oratory at Paris. In his Opuscula he included a Samaritan grammar and LEXICON.

M. became a principal figure in the debate over the reliability of the Hebrew text (MT) of the HB and the origin of the Hebrew vowel points. He argued against the antiquity of the vowel points and for the superiority of the Samaritan, Septuagintal, and VULGATE texts over the MT, which he held had been corrupted. On many positions he was joined in his TEXTUAL CRITICISM by the Protestant L. CAPPEL. M. argued that the text and meaning of the Bible were ambiguous, thus requiring people to be subject to the judgment of the church. In speaking of the Bible, employing a common image, he described it as a wax nose that could be shaped to the form desired by the interpreter.

Works: De patiarcharum et primatum origine (1626); Vetus Testamentum secundum LXX (3 vols., 1628, 1641²); Exercitationes ecclesiasticae in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateuchum (1631); mswrt hbryt Excercitations biblicae de Hebraei Graecique textus sinceritate (1633; enl. ed. with life of M. by the Oratorian father Constantine, 1699); Diatribe elenchica de sinceritate Hebraei Graecique textus dignoscenda, adversus insanas quorumdam haereticorum calumnias (1639); Opuscula Hebraeo-Samaritana. . . . (1703).

Bibliography: D. C. Allen, "Reason and the Text of the Bible," The Legend of Noah: Renaissance Rationalism in Art, Science, and Letters (1943) 41-65. P. Aurray, "J. M. (1591–1659)," RB 66 (1959) 397-414. A. Molien, DTC 10, 2 (1929) 2486-89; MSHH 3 (1727) 88-105; 9 (1729) 11-32. B. Pick, "The Vowel-Points Controversy in the XVI. and XVII. Centuries," Hebraica (= AJSL) 8 (1891–92) 150-73. J.-P. Rothschild, "Autour du Pentateuque samaritain: Voyageurs, enthousiastes et savants," Le grand siècle et la Bible (BTT 6, ed. J. Armogath, 1989) 61-74. R. Simon (ed.), Antiquitates ecclesiae orientalis cum notis et vita I. Morini (1682) 1-117.

J. H. HAYES

MOSES BEN SHEM-TOB DE LEON (c. 1240–1305)

Apart from his Castilian birthplace, M.'s origins are obscure. Until 1291 he resided in Guadalajara, thereafter moving around until he finally settled in Avila. In turning from philosophy to mysticism he was influenced particularly by J. Gikatilla (1248–c. 1305).

M. wrote partly in Hebrew but mainly—for pseudepigraphical reasons—in a debased Aramaic. He left commentaries on the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes, but his fame rests on the Zohar, a discursive commentary on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) purportedly originating in the circle of R. Simeon b. Yoḥai (2nd cent. CE); its derivation of Spanish esnoga (synagogue) from Hebrew 'eš nogaḥ (brilliant fire) is one of the anachronistic gaffes it contains. The Zohar became the classical text of kabbalism (see KABBALAH), ranking for many Jews alongside the Bible and the TALMUD. Although M. had circulated parts of the Zohar piecemeal, the first prints (1558–60) fixed its form; academic proof of its late origin awaited G. Scholem's (1897–1982) work in the twentieth century.

Because of the rambling style the Zohar's biblical exegesis is best approached thematically through the generous selections in Anthology (3 vols., 1989), with 378 section headings under the following major topics: the Godhead, the "other side" (i.e., evil), creation, man, worship (including Torah), and practical life (ethics, conjugal relations, etc.). An outstanding example of the Zohar's kabbalistic spiritualization of practical institutions is the metaphorical play that relates the post-menstrual regulations in Leviticus to the fifty-day interval between Passover and Pentecost (Shabu'oth) that, in celebration of the Sinaitic revelation, is pictured as God's taking Israel as bride (I. Tishby and F. Lachower [1989] 3:1242).

Works: Zohar (Mantua, 1558–60[1]; Cremona, 1559–60; partial ET, H. Sperling and M. Simon (5 vols., 1931–34, 1984[2]).

Bibliography: D. C. Matt, Zohar: The Book of Enlightenment (1983). G. Scholem, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (Hilda Shook Lectures, 1946); EncJud 12 (1971) 425-27; 16 (1971) 1193-216. I. Tishby and F. Lachower, The Wisdom of the Zohar: An Anthology of Texts (3 vols., tr. D. Goldstein, 1989).

R. LOEWE

MOULE, CHARLES FRANCIS DIGBY (1908–)

Born in Hangchow, China, to second-generation missionary parents of the (Anglican) Church Missionary Society, M. matriculated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1927. He read classics and became fascinated with Platonism, although during his years of theological study at Ridley Hall, Cambridge (1931–32), he began to realize the distance from Jerusalem to Athens. In 1931–32 he won prizes in patristics (the Evans) and in SEPTUAGINT studies (the Jeremie), and covered the syllabus of an honors degree in theology to win a university scholarship (the Crosse). He served as curate of St. Mark's Church, Cambridge; St. Andrew's Church, Rugby (1934–36); and as dean of Clare College, Cambridge (1944–51). In 1944 he was appointed assistant lecturer in divinity at Cambridge, lecturer in 1947, and Lady Margaret's professor in 1951, where he served for a quarter century.

Throughout his academic career M.'s passion was to show that rigorous historical investigation into the beginnings of Christianity and the NT was a necessary part of Christian devotion, and, if consistently applied, served to substantiate rather than discredit Christian claims about JESUS of Nazareth. He opposed the Leben Jesu Forschung of nineteenth- and early twentieth-century liberal Protestantism and the theological program of R. BULTMANN, both of which distinguished sharply, albeit in very different ways, between the Jesus of history and the Christ of faith. Instead, M. claimed that the Jesus of history and the Jesus of faith must have stood to a large extent in harmony with one another. This is the only plausible way to account for such phenomena as the church, the NT, and the claim throughout the diverse documents of the NT that Jesus was a "supra-individual" person who summed up the Hebrew Scriptures, Israel itself, and the church.

M. preferred to speak, therefore, of "development" rather than "evolution" in the early Christian understanding of Jesus. Evolution implies the emergence of new species with little resemblance to the original. "Development," on the other hand, suggests that the historical Jesus possessed the qualities described by more advanced christologies but that these qualities were not within the grasp of the earliest Christians.

Although M.'s work has had its widest influence in the area of christology, he has written on numerous themes relevant to NT study. One of his most significant contributions outside christology has been his argument that the atonement is best explained using the model of "costly reconciliation" rather than that of "propitiatory sacrifice." The Birth of the NT provides a useful guide to his perspective and summarizes some of his more technical work.

Works: An Idiom Book of NT Greek (1953, 1955); The Sacrifice of Christ (1956); The Epistles of Paul the Apostle to the Colossians and to Philemon: An Introduction and Commentary (CGTC, 1957); Worship in the NT (ESW 9, 1961); The Birth of the NT (HNTC, 1962, 1966, 1981[3]); The Gospel According to Mark (CBC, 1965); The Phenomenon of the NT (SBT 1, 1967); The Holy Spirit (1978); Essays in NT Interpretation (1982).

Bibliography: B. Lindars and S. Smalley (eds.), Christ and the Spirit in the NT (FS, 1973) ix-xvi.

F. S. THIELMAN

MOULE, HANDLEY CARR GLYN (1841–1920)

Born at Fordington, M. pursued classical studies at Trinity College, Cambridge in 1859. In 1867 he wrote describing a determinative event for his future, "I was able to find and to accept pardon and peace through the satisfaction of the Redeemer" (J. Harford and F. MacDonald [1922] 48). From that time he was both pastorally and academically a formidable figure in British evangelicalism. A strong element of classical erudition and historical realism combined in his exegetical approach with a lively sense of personal obligation to JESUS Christ as the only means of access to God. The number of his works that have been reprinted gives testimony to his continuing influence, as does the persistent tendency among senior professors of NT at Cambridge to combine serious scholarly work with more explanatory efforts. During his lifetime his service as the first principal of Ridley Hall, Cambridge, Norrisian Professor of Divinity at the same university, and then as bishop of Durham, succeeding B. F. WESTCOTT, provides ample evidence of the reception given his distinctive views.

Works: Outlines of Christian Doctrine (1889); Veni Creator: Thoughts on the Person and Work of the Holy Spirit of Promise (1890); Charles Simeon (English Leaders of Religion, 1892); The Epistle to the Philippians (1893); Philippian Studies: Lessons in Faith and Love from St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (1897, 1898²); Colossian Studies: Lessons and Faith and Holiness from St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and Philemon (1898); Ephesian Studies (1900); Christus Consolator (1915).

Bibliography: J. Baird, The Spiritual Unfolding of Bishop H. C. G. M. (1926). J. B. Harford and F. C. MacDonald, H. C. G. M., Bishop of Durham: A Biography (1922). W. Lock, DNB, 1912–21 (1927) 390-91.

B. CHILTON

MOULTON, RICHARD GREEN (1849–1924)

A leader of the literary study of the Bible that enjoyed a wide influence in the early twentieth century, M. was born in Preston, England, and educated at the universities of London (AB), Cambridge (AB, MA, hon. LLD), and Pennsylvania (PhD). He lectured in literature both at Cambridge and London before becoming professor of English literature (1892–1901) and of LITERARY THEORY and interpretation and head of the department of general literature (1901–19) at the University of Chicago.

M. believed that the extraordinary literary merit of the Bible was in danger of being lost due to historical-critical and theological concerns. More important, he insisted that the latter interests cannot be pursued adequately unless the biblical texts are understood in terms of their exact literary form. Knowledge of literary morphology ("the inquiry into the foundation forms of literature"), therefore, is essential to historical and theological interpretation. M. believed that the need to assert the fundamental connection between literary structure and meaning was especially acute in the case of the Bible because of the arbitrary way in which rabbinical and medieval commentators had set down the received text in a series of numbered sentences for commentary, by which all traces of biblical drama, lyric, rhetoric, or story form were entirely lost.

In The Literary Study of the Bible (1896) M. produced a learned analysis of the literary morphology of the Bible based on the then-current science of comparative literature. He discussed the unique features of Hebrew literature, then presented a classification of biblical literary forms—e.g., lyric POETRY, epic and history, rhetoric, wisdom, and PROPHECY, with their sub-classes. In his influential The Modern Reader's Bible, M. arranged and printed the text of the RV so as to highlight its literary forms and bring out their connectedness, what he saw as the Bible's "unity of a dramatic plot." Working with a literary rather than a theological HERMENEUTIC, he assumed that the unity of the closed CANON reflected a unique dramatic unity. He believed that the literary study of the Bible would demonstrate that Hebraic literature was equal to the greatest literature of Greece.

Works: Shakespeare as a Dramatic Artist: A Study of Inductive Literary Criticism (1885); The Ancient Classical Drama: A Study of Literary Evolution (1890); (ed.), The Modern Reader's Bible (25 vols., 1895–1923; 1 vol. ed., 1907); The Literary Study of the Bible (1896); A Short Introduction to the Literature of the Bible (1901); The Moral System of Shakespeare (1903); World Literature and Its Place in General Education (1911); The Modern Study of Literature (1915); The World Bible at a Single View (1918).

Bibliography: M. Buss, "The Study of Forms," OT Form Criticism (TUMSR 2, ed. J. H. Hayes, 1974) 40-42. W. Moulton, Richard Green Moulton (1926).

J. C. LIVINGSTON

MOWINCKEL, SIGMUND OLAF PLYTT (1884–1965)

M. graduated from the theological faculty of the University of Oslo (1908; ThD 1916), where he was research fellow in OT (1915–17), dosent (1917–22), professor extraordinarius (1922–33), and professor ordinarius (from 1933 until his retirement in 1954). After graduation he studied HB subjects and ASSYRIOLOGY at Copenhagen, Marburg, and Giessen (1911–13). He explicitly acknowledged the influence of H. GUNKEL at Giessen and of H. GRESSMANN, who was professor in Berlin. Already as a student M. had become interested in the study of Norse sagas; through S. Bugge's (1833–1907) and H. Schück's (1855–1947) studies of Norse MYTHOLOGY he came to see that there was a connection between myth and cult. The works of V. Grønbech (1873–1948) opened his eyes to the unity of the cultic-liturgical and the personally experienced aspects of religion.

In the 1930s M. joined the Buchmanite Oxford Group movement. He was ordained in 1940 and remained an active member of his local (Lutheran) congregation all his life.

M.'s literary production was immense, spanning over half a century, from his first articles on the HB prophets, published in NTT (1909), to the posthumous publication of his last works in 1967. In 1916 he published three books, which together with his studies on the prophets indicated his special spheres of interest. That year he gained his doctorate in theology with a dissertation on Nehemiah; in addition he published works on Ezra and on the royal psalms in the HB.

In his last years M. resumed his studies on Ezra and Nehemiah in a three-volume work (1964–65) in which he maintained and elaborated his previous positions: The memoirs (Denkschrift) of Nehemiah can best be explained against the background of the form and style of oriental royal inscriptions. The appropriate place for Nehemiah 8 is directly after Ezra 10. The memoirs of Ezra were not written by Ezra but by a later author prior to the chronicler. Ezra's "book of the law" is the Pentateuch as we know it.

Above all, M.'s works on the HB psalms made him a world-famous scholar. In Kongesalmerne (1916) he contended, in contrast to Gunkel, that kingship in Israel is to be understood as "sacral" kingship and that the kings referred to in the psalms are the actual Israelite and Judean kings. The composing of psalms was as old as Israel itself and took place in connection with the national religious feasts. M. defined a feast in the ancient Near East, and thus in Israel, as the mythical-sacramental dramatic repetition and reexperience of creation and salvation. These ideas were fully elaborated in his main work, Psalmenstudien (6 vols., 1921–24). In the preface to vol. 1 he emphasized two fundamental points that were revolutionary at the time: (1) the importance of cult in religion and (2) the need for sympathetic understanding of the attitudes and practices of ancient human beings.

The most discussed of M.'s Psalmenstudien was vol. 2, with his hypothesis of the enthronement festival of Yahweh. He contended that certain psalms, including 47, 93, 95–100, and at least twenty others, described the enthronement of Yahweh through the analogy of the enthronement of the Israelite-Judean kings. M. found the prototype for this enthronement outside Israel, notably in Babylon. The enthronement festival was not a new or special festival but functioned as one element in the traditional new year or fall festival. The enthronement of Yahweh in the ritual raised the hope for blessings and prosperity in the year to come.

The second part of Psalmenstudien vol. 2 discusses the origin of Israelite eschatology. M. found that the substance of eschatology originated in the cultic enthronement festival, more specifically in the day of Yahweh, on which the great salvific acts of creaton and exodus were repeated and confirmed. If the substance of eschatology, its ideas and forms, originated in the enthronement festival, then the Jewish hope for the future and eschatology as such originated in a certain historical situation—the breakdown of the national existence of the covenant people. M. later came back to the question of HB eschatology (1951a). His psalms research was summed up in The Psalms in Israel's Worship (1951b). His Psalmenstudien were reprinted in 1961 with a noteworthy new preface.

M. wrote several works on the HB prophets, e.g., on Isaiah (1925) and his disciples (1926), both in Norwegian. Here he was still in line with such previous commentators as B. DUHM, K. MARTI, and G. HÖLSCHER. In his main work on PROPHECY (1946a) he discussed the traditio-historical method (see TRADITION HISTORY) of the Swedish Uppsala school. He admited the importance of oral tradition but at the same time maintained the equally important subsequent literary stage.

In a series of studies M. took up the source problems in the Hexateuch (1946b, 1964a, 1964b): The priestly source is an independent source written in Judah after the exile. E represents a continued oral tradition of material found in J, which is the oldest source and dominates the course of events. In a book on the DECALOGUE (1927), he sought to locate its historical place in Exodus 20, concluding that the oldest decalogues (like Exod 34:14-26) had their place in the cult, while the later ones, although composed according to the ancient pattern, had a more general religious and moral outlook.

M.'s many annotated translations of OT books culminated in a five-volume annotated translation of the entire HB (1929–63), for which he bore primary responsibility; this work proved very helpful to the translators of the Norwegian Church Bible (1978). M. treated more theological questions in The OT as Word of God (1938). In two posthumously edited books in Norwegian, he dealt with the oldest history of Canaan (1965) and of the land of Israel (1967).

Works: Ezra den skriftlaerde (1916a); Kongesalmerne i det Gamle Testamente (1916b); Statholderen Nehemia (1916c); Psalmenstudien (6 vols., 1921–24, repr. 1961); Profeten Jesaja (1925); Jesaja-disiplene (1926); Le Décalogue (EHPhR 16, 1927); Det Gamle Testament som Guds ord (1938; ET, The OT as Word of God [1959]); Prophecy and Tradition (1946a); Zur Frage nach dokumentarischen Quellen in Josua 13–19 (1946b); Religion og kultus (1950; GT 1953; ET, Religion and Cult [1981]); Han som kommer (1951a; ET, He That Cometh [rev. ed., 1956]); Offersang og sangoffer (1951b; ET, The Psalms in Israel's Worship [2 vols., 1962]); Zum israelitischen Neujahr und zur Deutung der Thronbesteigungspsalmen (1952); Real and Apparent Tricola in Hebrew Psalm Poetry (1957); Erwägungen zur Pentateuchquellenfrage (1964a); Studien zu dem Buche Ezra–Nehemia (3 vols., 1964–65); Tetrateuch, Pentateuch, Hexateuch (1964b); Palestina fr Israel (1965); Israels opphav og eldste historie (1967).

Bibliography: D. R. Ap-Thomas, "An Appreciation of S. M.'s Contribution to Biblical Studies," JBL 85 (1966) 315-25. J. Barr, "M., the OT, and the Question of Natural Theology: The Second Mowinckel Lecture—Oslo, 27 November 1987," StTh 42 (1988) 21-38. H. M. Barstad and M. Ottosson (eds.), "The Life and Work of S. M.," SJOT 2 (1988) 1-91 (contains articles by various scholars on different aspects of M.'s work). A. Bentzen, "Om S. M.'s indsats i den gammeltestamentlige forskning," NTT 45 (1944) 163-75. R. E. Clements, HHMBI, 505-10. S. Hjelde, "S. M.'s Lehrjahre in Deutschland," ZAW 109 (1997). G. Hölscher, "S. M. som gammeltestamentlig forsker," NTT 24 (1923) 73-138. A. S. Kapelrud, "Die skandinavische Einleitungswissenschaft zu den Psalmen," VF 11 (1966) 62-93; "S. M. and OT Study," ASTI 5 (1967) 4-29. D. Kvale and D. Rian, S. M.'s Life and Works (1984; repr. in SJOT 2 [1988] 95-168). D. Rian, " 'The Insights I Have Gained': Prof. S. M. as He Saw Himself," Text and Theology: Studies in Honour of Professor DTh Magne Saebø (1994, ed. A. Tångberg) 228-36. M. Saebø, "S. M.'s siste arbeider," TTK 45 (1974) 161-73; "S. M. and His Relation to the Literary Critical School," StTh 40 (1986) 81-93; TRE 23 (1994) 384-88.

D. RIAN

MUILENBURG, JAMES (1896–1974)

Born in Orange City, Iowa, M. grew up in a Dutch Reformed family, majored in classics at Hope College in Holland, Michigan, and graduated magna cum laude in 1920. He then became an instructor in the department of English at the University of Nebraska, completing his MA in English history there in 1922. His thesis, "The Embassy of Everaar van Weede, Lord of Dykvelt, to England in 1687," reflected his European heritage. A second publication, Specimens of Biblical Literature, which appeared the next year, anticipated his future interest. In 1926 Yale University awarded him a PhD in the history and literature of religion. His dissertation, "The Literary Relations of the Epistle of Barnabas and the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," was published in Marburg, Germany, in 1929.

M. continued his teaching career in the department of history and literature of religion at Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts, (1926–32). On sabbatical leave he studied in Germany with K. BUDDE and attended the seminars of H. GUNKEL, who of all biblical scholars influenced M. most. Consequently, the discipline of Gattungsforschung informed his research before many American scholars recognized its value.

In 1932 M. became dean of the college of arts and sciences at the University of Maine. His accomplishments there during an era of depression and unemployment brought him national acclaim as an educator. After four years, however, he resigned to become Billings Professor of OT Literature and Semitic Languages at the Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, California. Concomitant with this change to a theological setting was his ordination in the Congregational Church.

Three emphases marked M.'s early teaching as a biblical scholar: He required students to learn the historical method; he stressed Gattungsforschung both as a corrective to source criticism and as an independent discipline; and he articulated theological dimensions of the Bible to disavow prevailing evolutionary and naturalistic interpretations.

Moving to Union Theological Seminary in 1945, M. occupied the chair of Davenport Professor of Hebrew and the Cognate Languages. Over the years at Union he received international recognition for eloquent teaching and meticulous scholarship. Although his teaching embraced much of the CANON, he developed special affinity for the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). His commentary on Second Isaiah (1956) has remained a landmark in research. While employing the insights of FORM CRITICISM, the commentary altered them significantly, heralding a distinctively LITERARY approach. Another publication, The Way of Israel (1961), which appeared near the end of his tenure at Union, embraced the diversity of Scripture under the single rubric derek (way), providing a prolegomenon to biblical theology.

For many years M. was a member of the committee that produced the RSV, the OT section of which appeared in 1952. He worked on Deuteronomy, Isaiah, Obadiah, and Psalms. In 1953–54 he served as resident director of the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in Jerusalem. During that time he studied the Qumran manuscripts, participated in excavations at Tell es-Sultan (ancient Jericho), and made soundings near Khisket el Mefjir, a site he proposed for ancient Gilgal.

Toward the close of his teaching career, M. chose the designation RHETORICAL CRITICISM to identify his literary-theological slant on Scripture. On retirement from Union in 1963 he continued to develop this approach while serving as Gray Professor of Hebrew Exegesis and OT at San Francisco Theological Seminary (1963–71). His presidential address to the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE in 1968 presented his views under the title "Form Criticism and Beyond." The syntax was carefully crafted; neither a repudiation nor a replacement of form criticism, the "beyond" of rhetorical criticism is rather a supplement. It stresses the particular in literature, whereas form criticism stresses the typical. Rhetorical criticism involves a close reading of texts that articulates structural patterns and stylistic devices for the purpose of theological discernment. M. anchored the approach in the broad context of biblical research, emphasized its lineage in the rhetorical heritage of the Western world, and urged scholars to claim its legitimacy. His challenge has provided a major impetus for current literary studies of the Bible.

The application of rhetorical criticism to the book of Jeremiah occupied M.'s last years. Living in Claremont, California (1971–74), he labored on a full-length commentary that would incorporate rhetorical insights with those of other disciplines. Portions of his research appeared in articles, but the commentary itself was never completed.

Wide-ranging interests and competency characterized M.'s career. Besides his contributions to HB studies he published in church history, NT studies, the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, and homiletics. His pastoral gifts were evident in the churches he served, the sermons he preached, and the prayers he composed. Individuals often sought him out as counselor and confidant, and he was an inspired and inspiring mentor who directed numerous students in doctoral studies. Six honorary doctorates from colleges, universities, and seminaries attest to his stature in academe.

Works: "The History of the Religion of Israel," IB (1952) 1:292-348; "A Study in Hebrew Rhetoric: Repetition and Style," VTSup 1 (1953) 97-111; "The Beginning of the Gospels and the Qumran Manual of Discipline," USQR 10 (1955) 23-29; "Introduction and Exegesis to Isaiah, Chapters 40–66," IB (1956) 5:381-773; "The Form and Structure of the Covenantal Formulations," VT 9 (1959) 347-65; "The Gains of Form Criticism in OT Studies," ExpTim 71 (1960) 229-33; The Way of Israel (Religious Perspectives 5, 1961); "The Linguistic and Rhetorical Usage of the Particle ki in the OT," HUCA 32 (1961) 135-60; "OT Prophecy" and "Ezekiel," PCB 475-83, 568-90; "Jeremiah the Prophet," IDB (1962) 2:823-35; "The Office of the Prophet in Ancient Israel," The Bible in Modern Research (ed. J. P. Hyatt, 1965) 74-97; "A Liturgy on the Triumphs of Yahweh [Exod 15:1-18]," Studia Biblica et Semitica (ed. W. C. van Unnik and A. S. van der Woude, 1966) 233-51; "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18; "The Terminology of Adversity in Jeremiah," Translating and Understanding the OT (ed. T. Frank and W. L. Reed, 1970) 42-63; "Baruch the Scribe," Proclamation and Presence (ed. J. I. Durham and J. R. Porter, 1970) 215-38; Hearing and Speaking the Word: Selections From the Works of J. M. (Scholars Press Homage Series 7, ed. T. F. Best, 1984).

Bibliography: B. W. Anderson, "The New Frontier of Rhetorical Criticism: A Tribute to J. M.," Rhetorical Criticism: Essays in Honor of J. M. (PThMS 1, ed. J. J. Jackson and M. Kessler, 1974) ix-xviii. F. Buechner, Now and Then (1983) 15-21. J. J. Jackson, HHMBI 599-607.

P. TRIBLE

MUJERISTA BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

The actual way Latinas use the Bible provides the starting point for mujerista biblical interpretation. Mujerista (from mujer, meaning "woman") interpretation expresses the struggle of Latina women for liberation. Several key elements enter into mujerista considerations of biblical texts.

First, Latino Christianity has been heavily influenced by the Spanish Roman Catholicism of the sixteenth century, which had limited biblical content. African (see AFROCENTRIC INTERPRETATION) and Amerindian religious understandings and practices, added later, have also contributed to present-day Latino Christianity. Catholicism's current attention to the Bible and the centrality of Scripture in Protestant churches, especially in the evangelical and charismatic traditions (including Pentecostal churches), also influence an increasing number of Latino Christians. These factors, plus the widespread use of the Bible in the dominant American (United States) culture, are taken into account in mujerista biblical HERMENEUTICS.

Second, although Latinas' everyday use of the Bible is the starting point of mujerista hermeneutics, it must be recognized that a great number of Latinas do not consult the Bible in their daily lives. The complexity of the biblical writings, the variety of messages they contain (some of them contradictory), and the difference between the Bible's and Latinas' social-historical contexts make Scripture a difficult source to use appropriately.

Third, the critical lens of mujerista theology is LIBERATION, which for Latinas is a matter of physical and cultural survival. Indeed, in mujerista hermeneutics the Bible is accepted as divine revelation and as authoritative (see AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE) only insofar as it contributes to Latinas' liberation endeavors.

Using Latinas' liberation as the critical lens establishes the primary systematic criterion for use of the Bible: the needs of those engaging Scripture. To understand this, one has to realize that the majority of Latinas know the Bible mostly from hearing it read in their churches, i.e., through a kind of oral tradition rather than through the reading and studying of texts. Latinas listen to and employ biblical stories in their discussions and struggles, not so much because they believe Scripture is the Word of God that tells them what to do or not to do, but because it aids them in understanding what is happening and in gaining courage for their efforts. The Bible stories taken up by Latinas are those that involve characters they can understand, characters who have also struggled for survival. Thus the appropriation of stories from a book Latinas know as important and authoritative often is a highly creative process in which central elements of the stories can be changed while peripheral ones are highlighted. It is not that the integrity of the text is unimportant for Latinas; it is, rather, that the need to survive takes precedence.

Being linked to the people of biblical stories helps Latinas' communities understand that their struggle is an ancient one. The stories appropriated by Latinas put them in contact with their forebears and teach them that they must never grow weary of contesting oppression; for although they may not be able to change oppressive situations, they can provide inspiration for others and can contribute to the favorable conditions others need to become involved in the struggle for liberation. For all oppressed persons, such a struggle involves becoming subjects of their own history. This requires that women and men become strong moral agents capable of making choices, of acting, of challenging, and of creating meaning even in the midst of oppression. Latinas are aware of the dangers presented by the use of the Bible as an authority when they have little or nothing to say about the way it is interpreted. Accepting as legitimate an interpretation of the Bible that is not their own—that is not determined by Latinas—can result in others controlling their lives.

A non-biblical Christianity has been a good vehicle for the inclusion of Amerindian and African beliefs and practices in Latino Christianity, an inclusion that is at the heart of popular religiosity. It is questionable whether this will continue if Latinas do not have a say in how to interpret and apply the Bible. Many Latinas who use the Bible do so under the tutelage of priests and pastors who control its interpretation and utilization in Latino churches. Exclusion from the process of interpretation is not conducive to the development of Latinas' moral agency. Moreover, the majority of Latinas who regularly use the Bible seem to do so in a predominantly individualistic and pietistic way. Although such appropriation is questionable insofar as the development and enhancement of moral agency is concerned, for Latinas it may be an appropriate starting place if they reject interpretation that limits the use of Scripture to personal consolation and salvation.

In mujerista biblical hermeneutics the Bible is intrinsic to a process of conscientization, i.e., a process of critical reflection on action that leads to an awareness of oppression. In this process the Bible should be used to learn how to learn—to involve the people in an "unending process of acquiring new pieces of information that multiply the previous store of information" (J. Segundo [1976] 97-124). The Bible is a treasury of such information: stories of valiant women, of women who found ways to survive in the midst of the worst oppression, of communities of resistance. These stories help to make obvious problems that may have existed for a long time but that Latinas have failed to recognize. Such appropriation of the biblical repository does not apply what the Bible says directly to the situation at hand; rather, it makes use of the Bible an important element in the development of moral agency. Thus, in mujerista biblical interepretation Scripture plays an important role as Latinas reflect on who they are as Christians and on what attitudes, dispositions, goals, values, norms, and decisions they value as they struggle to survive and to liberate themselves.

Bibliography: J. Gonzalez, Mañana: Christian Theology from a Hispanic Perspective (1990) 9-87. A. M. Isasi-Díaz, "La Palabra de Dios en Nosotros: The Word of God in Us," Searching the Scriptures (2 vols., ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, 1993) 1:86-97. J. L. Segundo, The Liberation of Theology (1976) 97-124. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, "Towards a Feminist Biblical Hermeneutics: Biblical Interpretation and Liberation Theology," The Use of Scriptures in Moral Theology (RMT 4, ed. C. E. Curran and R. A. McCormick, 1984) 354-82.

A. M. ISASI-DÍAZ

MUNCK, JOHANNES (1904–65)

Born in Copenhagen Mar. 3, 1904, M. received his ThD from the University of Copenhagen, where he also taught until 1938. In that year he became professor of NT at the University of Aarhus, remaining there until his death, Feb. 22, 1965. He began his scholarly work with studies of the church fathers, especially CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, but became best known for his works on PAUL. He interpreted Paul in terms of his role in the redemptive promises of God (Heilsgeschichte) rather than in terms of the dialectic between Jewish and gentile Christianity (the Tübingen school).

Works: Untersuchungen über Klemens von Alexandria (FKGG 2, 1933); Petrus und Paulus in der Offenbarung Johannis: Ein Beitrag zur Auslegung der Apokalypse (LSSk.T 1, 1950); Paul and the Salvation of Mankind (1954; ET 1959); Christus und Israel: Eine Auslegung von Romans 9–11 (AJut.T 7, 1956); Apostlenes Gerninger i Dansk Oversaettelse med Noter (AJut.T 9, 1964); The Acts of the Apostles (AB 31, 1967).

Bibliography: J. V. Andersen, "Bibliographie de l'oeuvre J. M.," StTh 19 (1965) 3-21. R. Bring, "J. M. in Memorium," STK 41 (1965) 63-64. B. Noack, "J. M., exeget og teolog," DTT 35 (1972) 126-134.

G. F. SNYDER

MÜNSTER, SEBASTIAN (1488–1552)

Born in Ingelheim in 1488, M. died in Basel in 1552. He joined the Franciscans in 1505 and studied with the noted Hebraist C. PELLICAN. After converting to Protestantism in 1524 he taught at the University of Heidelberg, moving to the University of Basel in 1528, where he held the position of professor of theology until his death.

Like P. FAGIUS, M. SERVETUS, and other Christian Hebraists, M. was convinced that there was great intellectual continuity between rabbinic thought and early Christian beliefs. The scope of his Hebraica interest and production was immense: By the end of the sixteenth century many thousands of copies of his almost threescore publications in virtually every aspect of Hebraica were in circulation. In addition to his own fine grammars and POLYGLOT dictionaries (see DICTIONARIES AND ENCYCLOPEDIAS) he compiled and translated the works of E. LEVITA, with whom he often collaborated and whose work he introduced to the community of Christian scholars. After compiling an Aramaic LEXICON in 1523, M. produced a complete Aramaic grammar in 1527. His publication of Hebrew texts of Malachi (1530), Amos (1531), and Isaiah (1535) was significant because of their accuracy and their inclusion of D. KIMHI's rationalist medieval commentaries.

M.'s most important contribution to scriptural studies was his translation of the entire HB from Hebrew to Latin (1534–35). This publication included his own commentaries, a distillation of rabbinic thought and opinion that proved important to the translators of early English versions of the Bible. He also translated the Gospel of Matthew from Greek to Hebrew (1537), to which he appended his own notes in order to demonstrate the intellectual continuity between rabbinic thought and early Christian ideas. In addition, M. published the work of MAIMONIDES, A. IBN EZRA, JOSEPHUS, and Moses ben Jacob of Coucy (fl. 13th cent.) and other rabbinic works as well as missionary treatises.

Work: Epitome hebraicae grammaticae (1520); Dictionarium Chaldaicum (1523); Dictionarium hebraicum (1523, 1546); Institutiones grammaticae in hebraeum linguam (1524); Chaldaica Grammatica (1527); Compendium hebraicae grammaticae (1527);; Dictionarium trilinguae (1530); Catalogus omnium praeceptorum legis Mosaicae (1533); Biblia (1534–35); Evangelium secundum Matthaeum (1537); Fides Christianorum et Judaeorum: Einfürung zum Evang. Matth. (1537, 1582–83); Messias of the Christians and the Jews (1539; ET 1655).

Bibliography: K. H. Burmeister, S. M.: Versuch eines biographischen Gesamtbildes (BBGW 91, 1963); S.M.: Eine Bibliographie mit 22 Abhandlungen (1964). J. Friedman, The Most Ancient Testimony: Sixteenth-century Christian-Hebraica in the Age of Renaissance Nostalgia (1983) full bibliography, xiv–xvi. V. Hantsch, S. M.: Leben, Werk, Wissenschaftlich Bedeuntung (1898). E. I. J. Rosenthal, "S. M.'s Knowledge and Use of Jewish Exegesis," Essays in Honor of the Very Reverend Dr. J. H. Hertz (ed. I. Epstein, et al., 1943) 351-69 = Rosenthal, Studia Semetica (2 vols. 1971) 1:127-45. G. E. Silverman, EncJud 12 (1971) 506.

J. FRIEDMAN

MÜNTZER, THOMAS (c. 1489–1525)

Born in Stolberg and educated in Leipzig and Frankfurt a. O., M. was executed in May 1525 for his alleged leadership in the Mühlhausen uprising of peasants. This ex-priest and erstwhile follower of LUTHER has been labeled a radical revolutionary by historians of the period, obscuring his role as a liturgical innovator. His German office and German mass, introduced in his Allstedt congregation in 1523, were undoubtedly the earliest published attempts at providing a congregation with "evangelically reformed" liturgies in the language of the people. The free use of Scripture M. employed in his liturgical offices shows his familiarity with the VULGATE and with other versions of the Bible.

Although M. did not specifically promote biblical studies, his extensive use of Scripture in corporate worship and in his tracts exemplifies a form of existentialist biblical interpretation. His goal was to prepare the hearts of his hearers for the transforming power of the living Word of God.

In his approach to Scripture M. seems to have used at least five hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS). First, he distinguished the Word of God from Scripture as such. Second, he insisted that corrupt Christendom could not be counseled or helped unless diligent servants of God daily worked through the Scripture by singing, reading, and preaching. Third, he maintained that the HB must be read in light of the incarnation. Fourth, he claimed that Scripture is truly the Word of God when it reveals the mind of Christ, i.e., when it advances a theologia crucis according to which believers accept the cross of Christ in order to be raised with him to newness of life. Finally, he demanded that Christians learn to exercise themselves in the fear of God. By this timor dei alone can false or mere historical faith, which clings to the letter of Scripture, be overcome.

Works: Schriften und Briefe (QFRG 33, ed. G. Franz, 1968); The Collected Works of T. M. (ed. and tr. P. Matheson, 1988).

Bibliography: S. Bräuer and H. Junghans (eds.), Der Theologe T. M. (1987). W. Elliger, T. M.: Leben und Werk (1975). D. Fauth, T. M. in bildungsgeschichtlicher Sicht (1993). H. J. Goertz, Innere und Äussere Ordnung in der Theologie T. M.s (SHCT, 1967). E. W. Gritsch, Reformer Without a Church (1967). M. M. Smirin, Die Volksreformation des T. M. und der grosse Bauernkrieg (1950). J. M. Stayer and W. Packull (eds.), The Anabaptists and T. M. (1980). M. Steinmetz, T. M.s Weg nach Allstedt: Eine Studie ze seiner Frühentwicklung (1988).

E. J. FURCHA

MUSCULUS, WOLFGANG (1497–1563)

In his years of development M. never attended university, instead spending fifteen years (1512–27) as a Benedictine monk in his native Lorraine (birthplace, Dieuze), where he came under the influence of some writings of LUTHER. When he left the monastery he headed for Strasbourg, finding employment as M. BUCER's personal secretary; and he began to preach in some of the outlying villages. He continued his theological and linguistic education by attending the lectures of Bucer and W. Capito (1478–1541); after departing for Augsburg, he studied Greek under the tutelage of a school rector. M.'s extraordinary talents in Greek eventually manifested themselves in a series of translations of patristic literature.

M. played an important role in the reformations of Augsburg and Bern. His career was launched by the Strasbourg Reformers, especially Bucer, who recommended him for a preaching post in Augsburg in 1531. He worked to consolidate the Augsburg Reformation and eventually assumed the prestigious preaching post at the cathedral church. He left the city in 1548 after refusing to accept the terms of the Augsburg Interim, eventually finding employment in Bern as a professor of theology and Bible, a position he held until his death.

Although M. authored numerous theological, polemical, and catechetical treatises, his ten biblical commentaries, produced over a twenty-year period, comprise his most important literary work. All of his commentaries were reprinted numerous times, some well into the seventeenth century, suggesting a significant audience for his exegesis and confirming his reputation as one of the premier biblical expositors of the sixteenth century. His commentaries reflect his debt to the technical scholarship of sixteenth-century biblical humanism, revealing his commitment to the study of the underlying Greek and Hebrew of the biblical texts. Although his grammatical and philological analysis often drew on the work of ERASMUS, he showed independent judgment in developing his own Latin translations of the biblical texts. His commentaries are also indebted to the patristic and medieval exegetical traditions, although he infrequently cited his sources. However, in his Isaiah commentary he included a table of sources consulted, including patristic, medieval (including rabbinic), and contemporary figures. In all his commentaries he displayed a thorough knowledge of the antecedent exegetical tradition.

M. followed a method of commenting that takes the reader through various stages of exposition. He first quoted several verses of the biblical text, offering a general summary and noting any textual difficulties. He then quoted the text again, phrase by phrase, presenting a more detailed explanation of the meaning of each phrase. Finally, he quoted selected phrases once again, enumerating various observations that deal with the theological and moral significance of the quoted material. Although he made use of allegorical exposition in his sections of "observations," his overwhelming preoccupation was with the moral (or tropological) mode of interpretation; he displayed great skill in finding moral imitanda in almost every word of the biblical text.

Works: In Evangelistam Matthaeum commentarii (1544); Commentariorum in Evangelistam Ioannem, heptas prima (1545); Heptas altera, item tertia et postrema in eundem (1548); Commentarii in Psalmos (1550; ET 1586); In decalogum praeceptorum Dei explanatio (1553); Commentarii in Genesim Mosis (1554); In epistolam D. Apostoli Pauli ad Romanos Commentarii (1555); In Esaiam Prophetam Commentarii (1557); In ambas Apostoli Pauli ad Corinthios epistolas commentarii (1559); Loci Communes in usus sacrae theologiae candidatorum parati (1560; new ed., 1561; ET 1563; FT 1577); In epistolas Apostoli Pauli ad Galatas et Ephesios commentarii (1561); In divi epistolas ad Philippenses, Colossenses, Thessalonicences ambas, et primam ad Timotheum, commentarii (1565).

Bibliography: R. Dellsperger, Die Augsburger Kirchenordnung von 1537 und ihr Umfeld (SVRG 196, ed. R. Schwarz, 1988) 91-110. R. Dellsperger, R. Freudenberger, and W. Weber (eds.), W. M. (1497–1563) und die oberdeutsche Reformation (Colloquia Augustana, 1997). C. S. Farmer, "W. M. and the Allegory of Malchus's Ear," WTJ 56 (1994) 285-301; "W. M.'s Commentary on John: Tradition and Innovation in the Story of the Woman Taken in Adultery," Biblical Interpretation in the Era of the Reformation (ed. R. A. Muller and J. L. Thompson, 1996) 216-40; The Gospel of John in the Sixteenth Century: The Johannine Exegesis of W. M. (OSHT, 1997). L. Grote, W. M.: Ein biographischer Versuch (1855). H. Kressner, "Die Weiterbildung des Zwinglischen Systems durch W. M.," Schweizer Ursprünge des anglikanischen Staatskirchentums (SVRG 170, 1953). P. Romane-Musculus, "Catalogue des oeuvres imprimées du théologien W. M.," RHPR 43 (1963) 260-78. P. J. Schwab, The Attitude of W. M. toward Religious Tolerance (YSR 6, 1933). W. T. Streuber, "W. M. oder Müslin: Ein Lebensbild aus der Reformationszeit," Berner Taschenbuch auf das Jahr 1860 (1860). R. Weber, "W. und A. Musculus: Die Sammler der Zofinger Humanistenbriefe," Zofinger Neujahrsblatt 69 (1984) 51-19.

C. S. FARMER

MUSIC, THE BIBLE AND

1. Introduction. The role of music in the interpretation of the Bible is both substantial and significant. Just as a marble statue of Moses or David by Michelangelo or a fresco like Leonardo da Vinci's The Last Supper may be considered an interpretation of biblical characters or scenes, so also works of music like G. F. Handel's (1685–1759) Messiah or F. Mendelssohn's (1809–47) Elijah must be regarded as interpretations of biblical subjects. The art of music joins the arts of literature (see WESTERN LITERATURE AND THE BIBLE), painting, sculpture (see ART AND THE BIBLE), architecture, drama, and the dance in offering sensory representation of biblical motifs.

Music is the most universal and possibly the highest of the fine arts. LUTHER felt that nothing can be more intimately linked with the word of God than music. But music is the least representational of the arts; it is the only one that appeals to the ear instead of to the eye. It thus communicates moods and feelings rather than specific intellectual concepts (except by prior association). Unlike literature and drama, music alone cannot retell a biblical story; it can, however, communicate aural impressions and generate human emotional response to the varying moods and passions elicited by the stories and personages of the biblical narrative. When coupled with words, whether drawn directly from the Bible or from the literary creation of a librettist, music can play an extraordinary role in elucidating the human feelings portrayed and, by employing various modes of compositional technique, can enormously enhance the meaning of the text. Music has contributed to biblical interpretation both through vocal music and through strictly instrumental, but wordless, music that attempts to express or interpret a biblical theme, mood, or impression or to accompany a danced or mimed representation of the text.

2. Vocal Music. Music can provide emphatic stress for key words while retiring subordinate terms and expressions to the background. Portions of the text deemed more important by the composer as biblical interpreter can be placed musically into dramatic relief against a backdrop of less important material. The process of selecting portions of the text to be thus stressed comprises in itself an act of interpretation, and myriad techniques have been used by composers for centuries to enhance the meaning of words. The process of "word-painting" in music is well known and has been extensively studied in the works of J. S. BACH, who was perhaps the greatest interpreter of the Bible in music. His concern was always to elucidate the strictly theological content of the biblical message, but he took pains also to suggest graphic pictorial description. In the Reformation hymn "In Adam's Fall Have We Sinned All," he provided a contorted passage of running sixteenth-notes beneath the stately chorale theme, as if to suggest a twisting serpent, while reminding the listener of the fall of humankind by the repetition of descending scale passages. Rhythm can be accelerated to hasten the pace of words describing the rushing of waters ("Thanks be to God" in Mendelssohn's Elijah) or slowed to a serene calm when accompanying words of peace ("the still, small voice" at the conclusion of the Elijah chorus "Behold, the Lord passeth by").

According to the Hebrew psalter, from biblical times and certainly from the postexilic period forward (after 538 BCE), in Jerusalem, Babylon, and in the diaspora, portions of the Bible were sung (Psalms 33, 40, 42, 96, 98, 144, 149), and musical instruments were clearly employed in accompaniment (1 Chr 15:16-24). There can be no doubt that the earliest Christian congregations sang the great hymns preserved in the NT (e.g., the Magnificat, Luke 1:46-55; the Benedictus, Luke 1:68-79; the Nunc Dimittis, Luke 2:29-32), most probably to Hebrew melodies used in the synagogue or to melodies drawn from other sources (Matt 26:30; Mark 14:26; 1 Cor 14:26). Although no documentation is extant that might identify the music specifically, it is clear that biblical "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" (Eph 5:19; Col 3:16; Acts 16:25) were performed. When any group of words is set to music and performed, interpretation is taking place: Rhythm, variation of musical pitches, and accentuation all give shape and character to the words. The later use of harmony provided additional means of interpretation.

The validity of the claim that setting Scipture to music comprises biblical interpretation can be established by comparing versions of the Magnificat by such diverse composers as Bach, W. Byrd, M. Charpentier, A. Gabrieli, A. Hovhaness, C. Monteverdi, K. Penderecki, G. B. Sammartini, G. P. Telemann, M. Tippett, and A. Vivaldi. The development of Christian liturgy drew portions of Scripture into set forms for sequential use in the mass. By the first quarter of the eleventh century liturgical "tropes" (related musical and/or textual interpolations into a biblical or Gregorian chant composition) were being used, modeled on the NT use of HB texts and on the technique of patristic exegesis and commentary. The tropes literally brought the liturgical biblical readings to life by relating them directly to the choir's celebration of a service, encouraging singers to appropriate what the readings communicate by ritually enacting them. The musical tropes effectively pace the delivery and proportion of the texts and add a level of association between the linguistic tropes, the antiphon, and the texts themselves. Antiphons were used to connect HB texts to specifically Christian use according to the season of the liturgical year; thus music provided biblical texts a reading that could not be supplied by the words alone.

In the liturgy for the Divine Office the entire psalter was recited sequentially each week. Each psalm was chanted straight through to allow its own thematic development, but it was prefaced by an antiphon that created a parallel structure applicable to the season. A good example is Psalm 2 ("Why do the nations conspire?" NRSV), which was used both at Christmas and on Good Friday. The Christmas liturgy took its antiphon from v. 7 ("You are my son; / today I have begotten you," NRSV); the Good Friday liturgy, from v. 2 ("The kings of the earth set themselves, / and the rulers take counsel together, / against the LORD and against his anointed," NRSV). The antiphons have specific NT warrant that connects Psalm 2 equally well with both seasons: Ps 2:7 is quoted in Heb 1:5; Ps 2:2, in Acts 4:27-28.

a. Oratorio. Biblical texts continued to undergo enhancement in ways that became embedded in tradition. Throughout the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries musical settings of HB and NT stories were frequently performed, deriving in all likelihood from the medieval mystery plays. P. Neri (1515–95), founder of the Congregation of the Oratorians, emphasized the advantages of such pieces for instructional and devotional purposes and introduced them both before and after the sermon in the oratory (place of prayer) of his own church in Rome (hence the title for the pieces, in use after 1640). The Oratorians established ceremonies apart from the regular liturgy, stressing the importance of prayer, meditation, preaching, and music (primarily devotional songs that, when cast in dialogue form, were called laudi spirituali). By 1600 elaborate sacred plays were being composed in the new dramatic musical style.

The Jesuits quickly recognized the power of this new music for the purpose of exciting religious passions. G.

Carissimi (1605–74), music director of the Jesuits' German College in Rome, first composed so-called sacred histories, which expanded the laude form (or the dialogue motet) into musical settings of HB narratives. These were in dramatic recitative style, performed during Lent in the Oratorio del Crocifisso. Most famous is Jephte (Judges 11–12), which, although having no part in the Lenten liturgy, stresses the serious nature of making a vow before God. Jonas emphasizes the importance of obedience to God's direction and will (Jonah's lengthy prayer for mercy, chap. 2, sung in the belly of the fish, contains three sections, each ending with the word miserere—a wail Jonah finally leads the Ninevites to echo). The narrative of the last judgment in Matthew's Gospel, read at mass on Monday of the first week in Lent, was set by Carissimi (Judicum extremum Salomonis) as a warning to the penitent to take seriously the responsibilities of this life before it is too late. By the 1660s the term oratorio had become fixed. The Italian oratorio often used a biblical story as text, either in church Latin or Italian. The work was sung but not staged and was either dramatic (the plot unfolding entirely through dialogue among the personages) or narrative-dramatic (plot revealed partially by a narrator designated testo, historicus, or evangelist and partially through dramatic dialogue).

Among other great Italian oratorios of the baroque period (1600–1750) are San Giovanni Battista by A. Stradella (1642?–82) and some 150 oratorios by A. Scarlatti (1660–1725). Prominent in the Neapolitan school, Scarlatti expanded the oratorio's structure by enlarging the roles of the singer and orchestra. In France, M. Charpentier (1636?–1704), a student of Carissimi, wrote twenty oratorios, calling them Histoires sacrées and Tragédies spirituelles. In Germany H. Schütz (1585–1672) became the most significant composer of the seventeenth century, writing oratorios for both Christmas and Easter (he termed them Historia, or retellings of the biblical narratives) and four passions (from each of the Gospels). He was the first composer to fuse all the essential elements of German baroque oratorio: the concerto, the chorale, the opera recitative. His "Little Spiritual Concertos" for four voices and organ are frequently performed today. His works are Protestant in as much as they use the German vernacular following Luther and set both narration and dialogue to free composition instead of to Gregorian chant. As a devout Lutheran musician, Schütz's avowed goal was to use music as a means of interpreting the biblical word. Considered the greatest treasures of Protestant church art, oratorios and cantatas are an elemental interpretation of the words of the Bible, the focus of Protestant thought.

Bach adopted some of the characteristics of the oratorio in his settings of the mass and in his passions and cantatas. Oratorio, for Bach, meant not so much a dramatic retelling of biblical events in an organically developed plot but, in the case of the Christmas Oratorio, a series of independent incidents narrated by a tenor soloist (evangelist) in recitative followed by a succession of reflections and thoughts embodied in arias, ariosos, chorales, and passages for chorus that take far more space than the actual narrative. The intention was to help the worshiper reflect on the theological implications of the story by means of the suggestive correlative poems and chorales; and each of the six cantatas was performed on a different day, beginning on Christmas Day and ending on Epiphany. Bach's Easter Oratorio is a joyous short work lacking both the evangelist and the use of chorales. The story stays in the background, taken for granted and applied figuratively to the soul of the worshiper who offers praise and thanks that Christ lives now. Instead of retelling the biblical story Bach offers a metaphorical parallel or commentary analagous to similar portions of the passion music. The Ascension Oratorio harks back to the passions in the use of recitatives wherein the evangelist (tenor) quotes relevant Gospel passages, solos bring the worshiper figuratively into contact with the immediate situation, and the worshiping congregation sings the theologically suggestive chorales.

The climax of the oratorio form was reached in England in the work of the German-born G. F. Handel (1685–1759), whose dramatic treatment of the oratorio's scriptural content and subject matter has never been surpassed. After the failure of his Italian operas in London he turned to the oratorio, using the English language and serious biblical texts. His contribution was primarily in giving the chorus a powerful role in the dramatic development of the plot. So successful are his oratorios (fourteen or so on strictly biblical themes) that he is justifiably known today as the "musical historian of the Bible." The list is impressive: Esther (1720), Deborah (1733), Athalia (1733), Saul (1739), Israel in Egypt (1739), Messiah (1741, first performed 1742), Samson (1743), Joseph and His Brethren (1744), Belshazzar (1744), Judas Maccabaeus (1746), Joshua (1747), Solomon (1748), Susanna (1749), and Jephtha (1751).

Athalia and Esther are based on retellings of the biblical stories by the French writer Racine. Messiah and Israel in Egypt are the only ones whose words are taken exclusively from the Bible. Belshazzar is considered the grandest of all Handel's oratorios, while Messiah has become the most popular oratorio ever written. (Yet in the words of C. Jennens [1700–1773], the librettist who skillfully selected and arranged the biblical texts, it remains a serious "entertainment," not an act of worship.) In Jephtha the huge chromatic choruses filled with despair and agony exhibit Jephtha's forced submission to inexorable fate, leaving us with a deep impression of his heroic suffering and a movingly tender portrait of his sacrificed daughter. During the baroque era M. Greene (1737) and J. Stanley (1757) composed other settings of Jephtha.

After Handel popularized the oratorio form, many composers joined suit: In England T. Arne (1710–78) composed Judith (1761); J. Worgan (1724–90), Hannah (1764); and J. Stanley (1712–86), The Fall of Egypt (1757). In Germany J. Haydn (1732–1809) produced Return of Tobit (1775), The Seven Last Words of Christ (1794), and Creation (1798); L. van Beethoven (1770–1827), the unusually dramatic Christ on the Mount of Olives (1803); J. Rolle (1718–85), Lazarus, or the Fire of Resurrection (1778); and C. P. E. Bach (1714–88), Israelites in the Wilderness (1769) and Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus (1780). Italy contributed the curious oratorio David poenitans (1775) by F. Bartoni (1725–1813), its story deriving from 2 Samuel 24 and 1 Chronicles 21, wherein David orders a census and is punished for his pride. Bartoni scored for sopranos and altos only: seven personages plus chorus, including King David; Bathsheba; David's general, Joab; the prophet Gad; Zadok the priest; Araunah the Jebusite; an angel of the Lord; and a chorus of Israelites. Only one oratorio appears to have been written in the New World during the eighteenth century: Jonah, by S. Felsted (1743–1802) in Kingston, Jamaica.

The nineteenth century represents a paradox: The composition and performance of oratorios multiplied as the romantic movement grew in influence and popularity, but their quality did not measure up. The British playwright and music critic G. B. Shaw (1856–1950) succinctly, if trenchantly, observed in 1889: "The only Scriptural oratorios worth listening to are those of Bach, Handel, and Haydn. After W. A. Mozart [1756–91] struck the modern secular humanitarian note in The Magic Flute, and Beethoven took it up in his setting of Schiller's Ode to Joy, oratorio degenerated into mere sentiment and claptrap. With the exception of a few cantatas of Mendelssohn, all the biblical music of this century might be burnt without leaving the world any the poorer." Shaw characterized oratorios as "sham religious works"; he even vilified Mendelssohn's St. Paul as "unspeakable boredom." Nonetheless, Mendelssohn's Elijah (1846, setting 1 Kings 17–19) remains a towering masterpiece. Its striking contrasts, use of tone painting, symbolic motific segments (presaging R. Wagner's [1813–83] use of Leitmotif) depicting command, curse, thirst, sorrow, prayer, and righteous indignation, make it the greatest work of its kind produced in the Romantic period.

After Arne's Judith, W. Crotch's (1775–1847) Palestine (1811) was considered the best English oratorio until W. S. Bennett's (1816–75) Woman of Samaria (1867). A movement from Palestine, "Lo, star-led chiefs," continues to be sung in English churches at Epiphany. However apt Shaw's criticism may have been, critical opinion at the end of the twentieth century may not look so harshly on the certainly dated Romantic output. In Germany L. Spohr (1784–1859) produced The Last Judgment in 1825, which was criticized for the appealing music's not rising to the grandeur of the subject. J. Brahms (1833–97) composed A German [i.e., Protestant] Requiem in 1868, using biblical texts he selected in order to have a more universal appeal than the traditional Roman Catholic liturgy (although some passages had previously been set by Schütz); and in 1872 Hungarian-born F. Liszt (1811–86) produced Christus. J. Rheinberger (1839–1901) in Liechtenstein composed the still-performed, beautiful, and intensely personal Christmas cantata The Star of Bethlehem (1890); in Russia A. Rubinstein (1829–94) composed four biblical pieces in a genre of his own creation, a kind of staged hybrid between opera and oratorio: Tower of Babel, Sulamith (Song of Songs), Moses, and Christus (all between 1870 and 1894). These works had to be performed in Germany, because such subjects were outlawed in Russia. Rubinstein's modernity is seen in his treatment of erotic love in Sulamith and in the orgiastic dance around the golden calf in Moses. In France H. Berlioz's (1803–69) sacred trilogy The Childhood of Christ (1850), C. Saint-Saëns's (1835–1921) Noël (1854), C. Gounod's (1818–93) Redemption (1879) and Mors et Vita (1885), and C. Franck's (1822–90) Beatitudes (1879) were frequently performed.

Another work of Saint-Saëns, The Deluge (1876), described as a "biblical poem," seems to straddle the boundary between oratorio/opera and symphonic poem. It uses a libretto that is a paraphrase of Genesis from the fall of humanity to the going forth of the ark. The music shows influences from Wagner with picturesque descriptions of the pouring rain and the flights of the dove announcing the flood's abatement. Part 1 is a choral fugue with an agitated string accompaniment ("I will destroy man whom I have created"). In part 2 the orchestra alone describes the waters prevailing upon the earth, building up in a long crescendo and succeeding decrescendo accompanying (almost engulfing) the choral singing, the whole depicting rising waters and the horrors of eternal night. Part 3 ("I will not again curse the ground") is calmly sung by a chorus of soloists with passages for solo violin playing the work's unifying theme. The flights of the dove and its final non-return are described in a series of gentle phrases that build up to a grandiose fugue exalting God's command that Noah's sons be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth. This work became very popular in the nineteenth century and enjoys performances today. G. Verdi's (1813–1901) monumental Requiem (1874), also seems to be permanently enduring. Like that of Berlioz (1837), it finds its home, not in the church, but in the concert hall. Naturally operatic and theatrical, these quasi-liturgical works stand apart from those with a strictly biblical theme.

With a new nostalgia for the Victorian era emerging in the last decades of the twentieth century, long-neglected oratorios from the late nineteenth century may see new life: In America J. Paine's (1863–1906) St. Peter (1872) and H. Parker's (1863–1919) Hora Novissima (1892), based on Bernard of Cluny's medieval poem describing heaven in the book of Revelation, have already seen successful revivals. In Britain the biblical oratorios by E. Elgar (1857–1934), The Apostles (1903); The Kingdom (1906); and his masterpiece, The Dream of Gerontius (1900), based on a poem by J. H. NEWMAN and exhibiting an emotional intensity unprecedented in British music, have remained popular. While many works popular in English-speaking countries in the nineteenth century have fallen out of favor, J. Stainer's (1840–1901) oratorio The Crucifixion (1887) retains its appeal. Although, strictly speaking, non-liturgical, it continues to serve the church as an occasion for Christian contemplation (Stainer called it a meditation on the passion of Christ). C. Parry's (1848–1918) end-of-the-century biblical settings Judith, De Profundis, Job, and King Saul were regarded as significantly superior to the general lot, thus setting the stage for a more excellent choral future in Britain; but they are too academic and dry to have endured.

Oratorio continued to develop in the twentieth century. The Swiss composer A. Honegger's (1892–1955) King David (1921, 1923) used texts from Samuel and from the psalter, presented by a narrator with chorus, soloists, and orchestra. Divided into three large parts, it follows the main events in David's life: his youth as a shepherd, his fight with the giant Goliath, Saul's enmity, David's kingship, his affair with Bathsheba, Absalom's rebellion, David's death, and finally his son Solomon made king. Using such advanced compositional techniques as irregular rhythms, sharp dissonances, and polytonality (two keys at once), plus Hebraic melodic forms and the interval of the augmented second, Honegger brought the text vividly to life pictorially and programmatically. Another Swiss, F. Martin (1890–1974), also produced oratorios on biblical themes: Golgotha (1948), The Mystery of the Nativity (1959), and Pilate (1964). Austrian American composer A. Schoenberg (1874–1951) wrote Jacob's Ladder in 1917–22, an impressive, albeit unfinished, work. In England W. Walton (1902–83) astonished listeners with the grandeur and massiveness of Belshazzar's Feast (1931), thirty-five minutes of tautly compressed dramatic music. The libretto speeds through the biblical story, portraying the lamentations of the exiled Judahites in Babylon, the great feast with the mysterious writing on the wall, and the final exultation of the Jews, subtly mingled with sad gentile comment. There is no feeling of hurriedness; the work is structured and balanced with the beauty of a closely argued "symphony for chorus and orchestra."

An illustration of applying musical interpretation of a biblical text to a contemporary political issue is Z. Kodály's (1882–1967) Psalmus Hungaricus (1923). Based on a sixteenth-century Hungarian poet's version of Psalm 55, which with the poet's interpolations becomes a plea in song for liberation of the Hungarian people from Turkish domination, Kodaly's work emphasizes the unity of the Hungarian people and, in a final chorus, the unity of the one God who protects and saves.

The middle of the century saw radical new choral compositions. Russian-born I. Stravinsky (1882–1971) turned to the VULGATE for a seventeen-minute choral work commissioned to be performed in the Cathedral of St. Mark, Venice (1956). The Canticum Sacrum is based, though not consistently throughout, on Schoenberg's twelve-tone row (a sequential arrangement of the twelve tones of the chromatic scale in which all twelve have to be sounded before any can be repeated), a method created to abolish music's traditional dependence on tonality (the feeling of a prevailing key) and on conventional expectations of melody, which had characterized music for centuries. Stravinsky drew the text from both the HB and the NT. The first movement, "Go ye into all the world and preach," alternates huge blocks of loud sound with quiet passages for bassoon and organ, thus capitalizing on St. Mark's resonant acoustics and allowing the loud sound to decay quietly. The second movement comes from a sensuous passage in Song of Songs, "Awake, O north wind; and come, thou south." Only a tenor soloist sings, using the tone row accompanied by six instruments. The third movement, central to the whole work, celebrates the three virtues, love, faith, and hope, each introduced with a transposition of the tone row in a new key. The fourth movement, "All things are possible to him who believes," resembles the second in that a soloist (baritone) states the tone row, but here he is echoed and imitated by the choir. The fifth movement, "And they went forth and preached everywhere," is almost a literal copy of the first—but in reverse, going from finish to start! The work is thus perfectly symmetrical with the third movement a kind of keystone, itself internally symmetrical. Did Stravinsky have in mind the five symmetrical domes of St. Mark's, as some musicologists assert?

Stravinsky made the most thorough use of the tone row (dodecaphony) in a choral setting of chapters 1, 3, and 5 of the book of Lamentations, called Threni, "Tears" (1957–58). He used one tone row for the entire work (instead of a different one for each section) and sounded the notes of the row simultaneously as well as sequentially. Most striking, however, is his frequent use of the highly dissonant minor second interval (F and F sharp) both as melody (sequentially) and as harmony (simultaneously), giving concrete reality to the anguish and pain of Jeremiah's laments. Also of interest is the composer's understanding of the Hebrew acrostic POETRY in Lamentations, each section commencing with a consecutive letter of the Hebrew alphabet sung chorally.

Stravinsky's biblical masterpiece in music is undoubtedly the now-famous Symphony of Psalms (1930). Not, in his words, a symphony that includes psalms, "it is the singing of the psalms that I am symphonizing." The work calls for mixed chorus and large orchestra including two pianos (but eliminating violins, violas, and clarinets). The three movements performed without pause set the Latin text of Pss 39:12-13; 40:1-3; and all of Psalm 150 except "Praise him with timbrel and dance." The composer's intent was to set the words in a striking alternative to the lyrical and sentimental interpretations given them by previous composers, thus forcing listeners to hear the familiar words in a completely new way and to gain a fresh understanding of their meaning. Accordingly, the opening "Alleluia" of Psalm 150 is not a joyous shout but a slow wail; the ordinarily exultant "Laudate Dominum" sounds restrained and distant. After building excitement and intensity in the middle section, Stravinsky closed the work by returning to a slower tempo with sopranos singing a quiet four-note repeated figure to the end. Stravinsky also collaborated on an oratorio, Genesis (1944), commissioned by composer N. Shilkret (1895–1982), for which seven different composers wrote seven separate parts. Stravinsky's contribution to the cycle was a cantata, Babel, which sets the words of Gen 11:1-9.

Another masterpiece of twentieth-century choral art is Sacred Service (1933) by E. Bloch (1880–1959), who immigrated to the United States from Switzerland hoping to satisfy a life-long desire to compose a universal work that would reflect the complex, glowing, agitated Jewish soul "that I feel vibrating throughout the Bible." Entitled Avodath hakodesh, the work sets Hebrew texts from Psalms, Deuteronomy, Isaiah, Proverbs, and other sources used in the sabbath morning prayer services of Reform temples in the United States. It emphasizes the idea of the holy, keeping the law of God not simply in a synagogue scroll but also in the heart; the abolishing of hatred; and Israel's contribution to humanity. Admonishing the listener to accept death as one accepts life with "serenity and confidence," the service ends with the traditional three benedictions and three amens.

American-born composer L. Bernstein (1918–90) wrote a famous theater piece entitled Mass (1970) for the opening of the Kennedy Center in Washington, DC. Not intended for the church, it is based on the Roman Catholic mass but infuses elements of Jewish liturgy with jazz, rock, blues, and Southern folk song idioms in an attempt to explore in an ecumenical and universal way the relation of religion to problems plaguing the modern world. Portions of the text derive from the epistles of PAUL and John (see JOHANNINE EPISTLES). The piece attained international popularity but mixed critical reviews.

More distinctly biblical and musically finer is Bernstein's interpretation of portions of the Hebrew psalter, Chichester Psalms (1965), which eschews the avant-garde idiom and sticks to what he honestly preferred, music that is "simple and tonal and tuneful and as pure B-flat as any piece you can think of." Commissioned and premiered by the combined choirs of England's Chichester, Winchester, and Salisbury cathedrals, the work draws on short segments of Psalms 2, 102, 108, 131, 133, and on Psalm 23. It ranges from powerful, ferocious, and explosive to tender, serene, and naive. It concludes with a yearning for peace: "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." Comparison with Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms shows a far more conservative but nevertheless fresh and appealing work.

b. Smaller choral forms. The Protestant Reformation emphasized the participation of the laity in the services of the church and on the accessibility of the Scriptures in the vernacular. Departing from the medieval concept of hymns for the choir alone, Luther wrote congregational hymns and chorales to supplement the singing of the psalms and liturgical set pieces. In England, congregational singing was restricted to vernacular settings of the psalms (T. Sternhold [d. 1549] and J. Hopkins [d. 1570]) until the beginning of the eighteenth century, when I. Watts (1674–1748) brought Luther's spirit into congregational singing by writing purely Christian hymns based largely on the NT. Watts was succeeded by C. Wesley (1707–88) and J. WESLEY, and during this period literally thousands of hymn texts were written for which new tunes had to be composed. Alongside this development lay the evolution and transformation of the medieval Latin motet (solo and choral) into the English anthem. From the sixteenth century to the present day, composers have worked hard to set texts from the Bible to music for performance by church and cathedral choirs. These works, appropriate for use at various points in the liturgy, are generally quite short, from a couple of minutes in duration to fifteen or twenty. The sheer volume of material accumulated over the past four centuries is overwhelming. Renaissance composers C. Tye (1497–1572), T. Tallis (c. 1520–85), T. Morley (1557–1603), J. Dowland (1563–1626), T. Weelkes (1575–1623), and H. Purcell (1659–95), among others, began the torrent. The eighteenth century added especially the cantatas of Bach; the Chandos and coronation anthems and odes of Handel; the anthems of his contemporaries, including W. Croft (1678–1727), who published an entire collection, Musica Sacra (1724); and excerpted movements from the larger works of Haydn and Mozart.

Of considerable interest is the contribution of composers in the eighteenth century belonging to the Unitas Fratrum, or Bohemian Brethren, pre-Lutheran followers of the Czech J. HUS (martyred 1415). Forced underground during the Thirty Years' War (1618–48) and severely persecuted, these early Protestants emerged from Bohemia, Moravia, and elsewhere in 1727 on the protected lower-Saxon estate of a German Lutheran Pietist (see PIETISM) and theologian, N. ZINZENDORF. Zinzendorf, like Watts and the Wesleys, provided his community of faithful with hundreds of hymn texts. As their movement grew, many members removed to England and to the United States where, known as Moravians, they established permanent settlements. Influenced by the style of the classic period, especially C. Gluck (1714–87), Haydn, Mozart, and the young Beethoven, the early Moravian composers contributed an astonishing body of instrumental and vocal service music, producing works of the highest quality between 1740 and 1850. Even in the wilderness of Pennsylvania (Bethlehem, Lititz, Nazareth) and North Carolina (Salem) they maintained a high level of education and culture, bringing from Europe the best and most recent works of Haydn and his contemporaries for local performance and for education of the young.

The simplicity of Moravian worship was complemented with anthems and instrumental chamber music not only brought from Europe but also increasingly composed by resident musicians whose compositions were characterized by homophonic simplicity. While Handel may have been loved, Bach and his baroque contemporaries were apparently considered too complex and contrapuntal in style. The Moravians were influenced by central European rather than English musical traditions; thus their anthems and arias were conceived as extended, concerted compositions encompassing all the stylistic traits of the pre-classical schools of Europe: Mannheim, Berlin, Vienna, Dresden, Prague, and Italy. Beginning with the works of J. Dencke (1725–95), who wrote the first orchestrally accompanied sacred music in North America, the Moravian tradition developed during the eighteenth century with C. Gregor (1723–1801, regarded as the father of Moravian church music), J. C. Geisler (1729–1815), J. Herbst (1735–1812), S. Peter (1743–1819), and J. F. Peter (1746–1813), D. M. Michael (1751–1827), C. I. Latrobe (1758–1836), and G. Müller (1762–1821), among others. It concluded in the nineteenth century with P. Wolle (1792–1871, founder of the Bethlehem Bach Choir), J. C. Bechler (1784–1857), and F. Hagen (1815–1907).

The aim of these composers was to use music to illuminate and enhance the text of the Bible, never to obscure that text with music that might call attention to itself. These writers were modest non-professionals whose education was mostly in the German seminaries, where they had been trained to be pastors and could develop their musical talent only provided that it did not supersede their theological training. Their musical settings were practical and intended for amateur vocalists and instrumentalists. In most of their anthems the overall framework was orchestral in nature: An instrumental introduction of some twelve measures preceding a choral section, during which the instruments would either double the vocal lines or have modest obbligato passages, then an instrumental interlude (ritornello), after which the chorus sang a second section followed by an orchestral conclusion. The form demonstrates that the instruments were used to place a distinctive aura around the religious message of the choristers.

The majority of texts used were taken directly from the Bible, because prose seemed to the age of the Enlightenment more "natural" than poetry (the 1611 KJV was entirely in prose!), and the music needed to be devoid of technical complications. Musicologists today find it remarkable for its orderliness, natural simplicity, and directness in setting into prominence the biblical texts. Moreover, the music seldom approaches subjective sentimentality but seeks to express a spiritual serenity born of faith in God's daily guidance and protection. In musical quality and practicality it towers above the work of most anthem composers of the next century in Great Britain and the United States. Some 10,000 anthems by the early American Moravians are preserved in their archives, many now published in performance editions.

The nineteenth century saw a veritable explosion in the production of English anthems for use in the worship of the Church of England and in all branches of Protestantism. The English historian E. Walker (1870–1949) announced that before 1880 composers had "set with almost complete indiscrimination well nigh every word of the Bible." And the British critic D. Tovey (1875–1940) felt that "had they confined themselves to the second chapter of Ezra they might have avoided the dangers of unconscious humor that lurk in the opportunities for 'naturalness' in declaiming the dialogues and illustrating the wonders of scriptural narrative!" The quality of the output is vastly uneven. The rise of the Oxford movement and the Tractarians in the 1830s brought with it a renewed interest in earlier musical and architectural forms, even going back to the Middle Ages; and this trend was reflected in the music for anthems. But the Victorian anthems in general varied between acerbic austerity and banal sentimentalism. By the end of the century reaction had set in. C. Stanford (1852–1963) and C. Parry worked hard to revive an academic interest in composition for the church, and their efforts led to genuine reform as seen in the work of E. Elgar, H. Gardiner, G. Holst, H. Howells, J. Ireland, K. Leighton, R. Vaughan Williams, W. Walton, and C. Wood.

It is instructive to take a biblical text such as Psalm 23 and compare the way various composers on both sides of the Atlantic interpreted it musically, e.g., E. Bairstow, J. Clokey, F. De Leone, W. Harris, Haydn, G. Jacob, T. Matthews, J. Rutter, F. Schubert, H. Smart, and V. Thompson. Each of these composers interpreted the psalm in a pastoral mode, suggesting pictorially the biblical scene described by the psalmist.

Having experienced the direct theatrical appeal of the Japanese Noh play, B. Britten (1913–76) interpreted biblical stories in his Church Parables during the 1960s. Especially interesting are The Burning Fiery Furnace and The Prodigal Son. His setting of the Chester miracle play Noye's Fludde combined professional with amateur forces in utter simplicity. A. Pärt (b. 1935) and J. Tavener (b. 1944), influenced by Eastern Orthodoxy, have produced almost minimalist pieces; noteworthy are Pärt's St. John Passion and Psalm 51. K. Penderecki's (b. 1933) Lamentationes Jeremiae, St. Luke Passion, Psalms of David, and Canticum Canticorum demonstrate Polish influence, combining subtle delicacy with vehement singing, speaking, and shouting. Other American and Canadian composers of the twentieth century who have contributed short biblical works for church use include V. Archer, R. Bitgood, A. Copland, H. Friedell, A. Jennings, T. Noble, L. Sowerby, R. Thompson, H. Willan, D. A. Williams, and D. H. Williams, writing in a conservative, neo-romantic vein. C. Ives (1874–1954), the United States's most innovative native-born composer, composed settings of Psalm 67, using six voices and two different keys simultaneously, and of Psalm 90, a longer work involving organ and bells that unfolds over a constant C pedal in the organ. Psalm 90 concludes with the voices continually dividing in contrary directions until on the word "wrath" a twenty-two-part tone cluster is sung fortissimo followed by a decrescendo to the softest unison middle-C. Perhaps taking their cue from Ives, N. Lockwood, D. Moe, and D. Pinkham have cleared new paths in musical interpretation. In France F. Schmitt (1870–1958) produced a brilliant choral setting of Psalm 47 that contains great crescendos and dramatic effects illustrating such texts as "God has gone up with a shout . . . with sound of a trumpet . . . clap your hands!"

Another interpretative phenomenon has been the use of biblical themes for commercial theatrical purposes divorced from use in the church. The musicals Joseph and His Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat (1968) and Jesus Christ, Superstar by A. Lloyd Webber (b. 1948) and Godspell (1973) by S. Schwartz (b. 1948) were commercial successes, combining rock and gospel styles. They represent the ultimate in humanization of biblical characters and offer a distinctly secular interpretation of Scripture that might have shocked Christians from the church fathers to the Victorians.

c. Spirituals, blues, gospel, bluegrass. The experience of African Americans, bringing with them African tribal traditions, led to the creation of field songs called "spirituals" (i.e., "spiritual songs"—from Eph 5:19 and Col 3:16). Hebrew Bible and NT texts stressing liberation and joy against a background of hardship became favorites: "Go down, Moses, way down in Egypt's land; tell old Pharaoh to let my people go" is an example of the some 150 such songs known to exist. They contain important images and events from the Bible, from creation, Adam and Eve, Israel's bondage, and the exodus under Moses to Ezekiel's vision and the PROPHECY of Daniel. "Who Built the Ark?" points to labor, and the wailing song "The Prodigal Son" shows links between blues and gospel song. In the twentieth century the tradition has evolved into jazz, blues, and commercial gospel.

A parallel development was the rise of the White spiritual and the attempt to teach rural frontier Christians rudimentary hymns and gospel songs according to "shape-note" theory (an early nineteenth-century invention using the fa-so-la syllables for notes, which are given four to seven different visual shapes to identify the pitch). In 1835 W. Walker (1809–75) published Southern Harmony, a collection of shape-note hymns, which, along with B. White's (1800–79) The Sacred Harp (1840), became the most popular tune book of the century. Southern Harmony was the first compilation to wed the lyrics of "Amazing Grace" to the now customary tune "New Britain"; it was also the first to include hymns by women, e.g. "Promised Land," the tune for "On Jordan's Stormy Banks I Stand," and many more. The melody is usually in the tenor line with the higher voices singing descant above the tune, and the singing style is modal. From this tradition came in modern times bluegrass gospel singing and composing, originating in the folk society of the American South, from the Ozark mountains to east Texas to the Atlantic coast. Working-class farmers and mill workers made the music popular. The songs conform to the British ballad style and consciously look back to a happier time. Five themes form a recurring pattern: (a) individual salvation; (b) life's rocky road; (c) maternal love and home; (d) grief for the deceased; and (e) the efficacy of works in gaining God's grace. Each theme is based on strong biblical passages from Psalms, Proverbs, Mark, John, and Revelation. The familiar biblical allusions in these ballads are the same ones used so often by British and American anthem composers.

d. The solo song. A striking number of songs composed for solo voices to express biblical texts have come from the pens of women composers, especially in the United States. In the seventeenth century the French composer E. La Guerre (1667–1729) wrote the cantata Jephte, which contains solos for both soprano and tenor that were acclaimed for their vital rhythm, stateliness, dignity, and strength. Many women composers were attracted to the psalms as texts for their songs, some to the book of Isaiah, or to other passages. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach (A. M. Cheney, 1867–1944) produced Mass in E, which contains a slow alto solo, "Gratias Agimus," noted for its "mesmerizing modulations." E. Smyth (1858–1944), who was active in suffrage causes, wrote Mass in D, which enjoyed acclaim. M. V. Sandresky (b. 1921) has produced a setting of the Magnificat for organ and voice.

Composers of all nationalities have set biblical texts to be sung in church or concert hall by solo voices. The ten Biblical Songs op. 99 (1894) of A. Dvorák (1841– 1904) and a number of songs by Brahms, notably the Four Serious Songs op. 121 (1896) are outstanding examples. The Dvořák songs, composed in the United States, are known for their sincerity, poignant simplicity, and reverence in setting familiar psalms (23, 121, 137, etc.). The songs of Brahms composed at the end of his life reflect his preoccupation with the meaning of death: The first three, based on Qohelet, express the futility and pessimism of life; but the final song, based on 1 Corinthians 13, celebrates Paul's exaltation of love (agape—not charity) that overcomes all.

e. Opera. The sixteenth-century rediscovery of monody, a style of solo singing suitable for dramatic expression, led to the combination of music, drama, and spectacle into a form known today as opera. The basic idea of monody is to intensify the natural accents of speech in a single vocal line accompanied by a few simple chords. The association of drama with music goes back to antiquity; opera's immediate forerunners before 1600, like those of oratorio, were the aristocratic masques and morality, miracle, and mystery plays, religiously or morally oriented entertainment for the general public. Opera differs from oratorio in using scenery, costumes, and stage action to illustrate the plot and make it more impressive and memorable.

Such treatment of biblical themes, however, was not thought appropriate in a theater or opera house where secular entertainment was expected, nor were singer-actors thought morally ideal for the treatment of lofty moral stories (which is why Handel turned to the oratorio for his biblical representations). However, the Jesuits saw the advantage for instructional purposes of providing dramatic musical interludes between the acts of Latin biblical drama performed without music. Thus Charpentier in 1688 produced David et Jonathas in which Saul consults the witch of Endor, who calls up the spirit of Samuel. The great prophet and leader predicts defeat at the hands of the Philistines; his prediction comes true, and Saul and his sons are killed in battle. The work is a static but vivid series of psychological tableaux of the principal characters, but it lacks dramatic action or recitative. In 1732 M. Montéclair (1667–1737) produced a biblical tragedy, Jephte, and in 1807 E. Méhul (1763–1817) staged Joseph in Egypt, which became his most famous work. Based mostly on the recognition scene in the biblical tale (Genesis 45), it includes Jacob cursing Simeon, who is guilt-ridden for having sold Joseph into slavery. Joseph reveals himself and pleads for Jacob's forgiveness of Simeon, and the opera ends in songs of peace and honor to God.

In 1809 another French biblical opera (the result of a post-Revolution renewal of religion), J. Le Sueur's (1760–1837) La mort d'Adam, depicts the struggle between Satan and God for Adam's soul. R. Kreutzer (1766–1831) wrote Abel in 1810, contrasting the demonic forces tempting Cain with an apotheosis sending Abel heavenward. Kreutzer's finest music accompanies the exhausted Cain's prayer for sleep at the opening of Act 3. In 1818 G. Rossini (1792–1868) produced Moses in Egypt, which, after enthusiastic reception, was revised as Moses and Pharaoh, the Crossing of the Red Sea (1827). Clearly that crossing, thrillingly portrayed, made the opera famous. Verdi's only opera interpreting a biblical story is Nabucco (1842), depicting Nebuchadnezzar's conquest of Jerusalem (586 BCE), the subsequent exile of the Jews, and intrigues at the Babylonian court during which the Jews are threatened with extermination. As they await death they intone the famous chorus "Va Pensiero" (on Psalm 137), which later became a rallying cry of the nineteenth-century Italian people in support of Victor Emmanuel. Verdi's bold use of the chorus as an active protagonist in the drama was innovative.

D. Auber (1782–1871) in France wrote an opera on the story of the prodigal son (1850) that saw moderate success but has not been revived. More enduring has been K. Goldmark's (1830–1915) The Queen of Sheba (1875), which uses rich timbres and oriental-style melodies to dramatize the queen's visit to Solomon. One of the most famous biblical operas is Saint-Saëns's Samson and Delilah (1877), which remains popular, while his Deluge (1876) has survived only as a choral/symphonic set piece. Samson and Delilah presents a distorted interpretation of the biblical episode in Judges, removing its pathos and giving the characters a melodramatic sentimentality. The central theme seems to be Delilah's irresistibly seductive nature, which becomes the psychological justification for Samson's betrayal and the explanation of how the heroic will can succumb to feminine charm.

Two operas still performed deal with the beheading of John the Baptist by Herod Antipas at the request of Herodias's daughter Salome. The first is Massenet's (1842–1912) Hérodiade (1881), a passionate and violent musical interpretation displaying enormous contrasts in the manner of Berlioz and Verdi. The second, R. Strauss's (1864–1949) magnificent Salome (1905), uses as libretto a German translation of the French original of Irishman O. Wilde's (1854–1900) "scandalous" poem. The scandal was Wilde's scene portraying the lusty Salome kissing on the mouth the head of John the Baptist, severed as her reward for entertaining Herod with an equally scandalous and lascivious "Dance of the Seven Veils," each removed in turn until she is nude. Her subsequent death as a result of being crushed by the shields of the palace guards brings the one-act opera to a close.

The Song of Deborah (Judges 5, supplemented by the prose account in chap. 4)) was given operatic treatment by the Italian I. Pizzetti (1880–1968) in Debora e Jaele (1922). Pizzetti developed his own libretto out of the biblical story but tried to improve it by introducing a love interest between Canaanite General Sisera and tent-dwelling Jael, wife of Heber the Kenite, who is portrayed as a spy and a traitor. Deborah has predicted that Sisera's forces can be defeated only if they are attacked in the open. She sends Jael to Sisera to advise him to lead his men to Mt. Tabor, which is not defended. It is a trick, and when the Canaanites are defeated, Sisera flees to Jael's tent. She confesses her trickery and submits to certain punishment, but Sisera wants to make love. Deborah orders Jael to hand him over to the Israelites, but instead Jael kills him herself after hearing a mother sing a mournful lullaby over her children, murdered by Sisera's soldiers. Musically Pizzetti's score ideally balances text and music and reacts against the verismo of R. Leoncavallo (1858–1919) and G. Puccini (1858–1924) and post-romantic opera.

In the twentieth century the apocryphal book of Judith was treated by E. Reznicek (1860–1945), Honegger, E. Goossens (1893–1962), and J. Powell (1882–1963). Reznicek's Holofernes (1923) sets the famous episode in the biblical story wherein Judith cuts off Holofernes' head in his tent after submitting to his sexual desires. She returns to her people at Bethulia carrying his severed head amid shouts of rejoicing, but rather than bear Holofernes' child she kills herself. Reznicek's music is powerful and intense, bearing comparison with Strauss. Honegger's Judith (1926) sticks faithfully to the story: There is no suicide; after decapitating Holofernes, Judith thanks God and puts on a veil of mourning. Goossens's Judith appeared in 1929, Powell's in 1954.

In 1955 C. Floyd (b. 1926) produced an opera based on the apocryphal story of Susanna, the gem of the additions to Daniel. He adapted it as a contemporary morality play, set in the mountains of Tennessee, but faithfully interpreting the biblical themes of character assassination and hypocrisy exposed.

The story of King Saul and the young David was treated by two twentieth-century composers: C. Nielsen (1865–1931) and A. Honegger. Nielsen's Saul and David (1901), like Beethoven's Fidelio, is the single opera of a symphonist. The libretto allows Saul to emerge as a far more sympathetic character than is portrayed in Scripture. Although he curses God before his death, the carefully balanced text allows the listener to understand, through the gradual unfolding of Saul's emotions, how he comes to end his noble life with a curse. The musical challenge appears when David must sing songs that have an almost magical power to calm Saul's bouts of mental doubt and anguish. Nielsen rises to the occasion and in Saul's death scene provides music that is a far cry from the death scenes of romantic opera. The work is a triumph of biblical interpretation through music; the musical development of each character in the story is a marvel of operatic composition.

Seeing the book of Job as an epic of revolt, the Italian L. Dallapiccola (1904–75) wrote his opera Job (1950) using Schoenberg's twelve-tone series over a cantus firmus sounding the notes of the traditional Te Deum. In 1954 D. Milhaud (1892–1974) produced David to celebrate the King David festival in Jerusalem. His astonishing innovation was to introduce into the score a chorus of 1,954 Israelis along with the usual chorus of Hebrews who comment on the scenes being enacted; this inclusion served to stress the analogy between the present-day situation and the past and to give immediacy to the biblical story. The music contains passages of unsurpassed lyric and dramatic richness. The first performance of Schoenberg's Moses und Aron (Moses and Aaron—but Schoenberg was superstitious about a title of thirteen letters) was also given in 1954. Schoenberg had worked on the text for years, writing the first two acts between 1930 and 1932. The advent of Nazism and his emigration to the United States interrupted this magnum opus, which he resumed shortly before his death in 1951. The third act was never completed, many think because of the difficulty of expressing the philosophical contradiction of the theme: the problem of a visionary trying to communicate his uncompromising ideals (the oneness and sovereignty of God) to a people bent on misunderstanding and distorting them. The music is based on the twelve-note series, demanding a full symphony orchestra, a large chorus, a group of six solo voices in the orchestra, and numerous instrumental and vocal soloists. It makes wide use of "speech-song" or "notated" speech: Moses understands God's words, but as a stammerer lacking eloquence he cannot sing them and must use "speech-song." The voice of Aaron, his spokesman, sings lyrically but conventionally, thereby demonstrating the danger of distorting the lofty nature of thought through perfunctory beauty.

In 1995 the San Francisco Opera commissioned jazz singer B. McFerrin (b. 1950) to write a two-act opera to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations charter. The libretto by I. Reed (b. 1938) focuses on the story of JESUS's arrest in the garden of Gethsemane as told by Mary Magdalene.

2. Instrumental. a. Keyboard, organ, violin. Stravinsky wrote that the church knew what the psalmist knew: Music praises God. "Music is as well or better able to praise Him than the building of the church and all its decoration; it is the church's greatest ornament," true of purely instrumental music as well as musical settings of sacred words. Music has power to represent biblical images through literary association and through the evocation of feelings in response to the biblical situations the composer illustrates or interprets.

In the seventeenth century the south German virtuoso H. von Biber (1644–1704) wrote for the church Sixteen Sonatas for Violin and Keyboard (completed 1676). Described as abstract musical meditations on great problems of Christian life, they illustrate fifteen "joyous, painful, and glorious events" in the lives of Jesus and the Virgin Mary. Instead of titles the original edition of these "mystery" or "rosary" sonatas contained copper engravings revealing each sonata's aim and content. The sixteenth sonata is a one-movement piece for unaccompanied violin appended to an engraving of the guardian angel. In order to procure special poignant effects, Biber tuned certain strings slightly off-pitch.

Biber's contemporary J. Kuhnau (1660–1722), Bach's immediate predecessor as cantor of St. Thomas' Church, Leipzig, wrote a curious experiment in the purely musical interpretation of HB stories in his six multimovement Biblical History Sonatas or Bible-story Sonatas (1700) for keyboard (harpsichord or organ). The subjects treated are "The Fight Between David and Goliath," "David Curing Saul of His Melancholy by Music," "The Marriage of Jacob," "Hezekiah's Sickness and Restoration," "Gideon," and "Jacob's Death and Burial." The first sonata begins with a rather pompous prelude ("Goliath's Boast"), using heavy dotted rhythms to proclaim instant bravado. A prayer of the trembling Israelites follows in the form of a chorale prelude on the sixteenth-century German hymn "In Deepest Need." In the third movement, a dance in triple time, David gains courage and puts confidence in God. Then with a grand flourish David hurls the stone in a rapid scale passage, and Goliath falls to the ground in a series of short descending chromatic figures. The "Flight of the Philistines Pursued by the Israelites" is accompanied by rapid runs in thirds and sixths. The joy of the excitedly grateful Israelites is followed by a happy concerto musico by the women honoring David, and the sonata ends in a final allegro maestoso expressing the joyful dances of the people.

In a learned preface Kuhnau emphasized that his experiment in "program music" was not new, for J. J. Froberger (1616–67) and others had attempted it earlier; but he wanted to show that keyboard music without the benefit of a text could capture the emotions associated with the action of a narrative or the descriptive characteristics of a person. His biblical sonatas are dramatically naive and melodically and harmonically simple, but they have survived because of his artistry in providing the biblical stories with a rich variety of rhythms and textures: massive chords in both hands, interplay of motives, poignant dissonances, rapid scale passages, and fugal sections. Such devices make the music illustrative of the narratives; it is in this sense that Kuhnau interprets them. The music alone, of course, cannot tell the tales. But biblical interpretation never merely tells or retells the story; it assumes the story and proceeds to build on it, to draw from it, to illustrate and enhance it in order to make its message clearer.

In the succeeding centuries Kuhnau's Bible-story Sonatas led to an efflorescence of composition for the organ that attempted musically descriptive interpretation of biblical subjects. The most significant and valuable are monuments of the Romantic movement in music, against which many musical purists have rebelled. However, some examples possess such power and effectiveness in stimulating the imagination of sensitive listeners familiar with the biblical material that they must serve as successful models of the type.

J. Reubke (1834–58), a German pupil of Liszt, wrote a large fantasy for organ, Sonata on the 94th Psalm. In three movements based on one theme (idée fixe) in two segments, the first a rhythmic idea, the second a chromatically descending theme, he interpreted nine important verses from Psalm 94 in music. The brooding introduction larghetto, grave, is based on the verses beginning "O God, to whom vengeance belongs, show thyself. . . . " and "how long shall the wicked triumph?" The restlessness and anxiety of the text are illustrated by broken chords (often the diminished seventh), sixteenth-note passages, a variety of rhythms and articulations balanced by a busy pedal part in which the idée fixe frequently appears. A short grave section returns to the mood of the opening section and diminishes in sound and action to prepare for the soft, slow adagio movement that abounds in key modulations and restless chromaticism to interpret v. 19, "In the multitude of my cares within me, Thy comfort delights my soul." The final movement is a brilliant fugue in C minor using the original sonata theme-motive in jagged, dotted rhythms that accelerate to triple rhythm in the più mosso section, racing to a ferocious climax with brisk manual chords punctuating a thrilling virtuoso pedal line to interpret the text "But the Lord is my defense . . . and he shall cut them off in their own wickedness."

Bridging the turn of the nineteenth to the twentiethth century, the great French organist M. Dupré (1886–1971), famous for his preludes, fugues, and other pieces, added two great programmatic works based on the Bible: Symphonie-Passion, op. 23 (1924) and Le Chemin de la Croix (The Way [or Stations] of the Cross), op. 23 (1932). The first deals with the life of Christ, making use of plainsong themes to call up textual associations reflecting on biblical subjects. The opening movement is turbulent, almost barbaric, illustrating its title, "The World Awaiting Its Savior." In the middle section the peaceful plainsong tune Jesu redemptor omnium appears, only to be followed by a third section that returns to the turbulence of the first. The second movement, "Nativity," uses the familiar chant Adeste fideles accompanied by shepherds' pipes and a march. "The Crucifixion" is the third movement, which begins with a persistent ostinato figure, pianissimo, then grows in volume to a huge and terrible crescendo, swiftly dying away to Stabat mater dolorosa. The final movement is "Resurrection"—a typical, brilliant French toccata incorporating the theme of Adoro te devote. The whole work lasts thirty minutes.

The Way of the Cross lasts twice as long and portrays in organ music the fourteen stations of the cross through an appropriately descriptive melodic or rhythmic motif, or else through the creation of a basic mood. At the first station, "Jesus is condemned to death," a piercing dotted rhythmic figure creates the feeling of impending doom; at the second, "Jesus takes up his cross," one can feel its weight in a stumbling rhythm. The three times Jesus falls to the ground are musically painted with descending runs of tied notes. Such intimate scenes as "Jesus meets his mother" and "Jesus comforts the women of Jerusalem" provide sharp contrast. But when the nails are loudly pounded into the cross through his hands, one can hear the hammer blows as clearly as the earthquake, the gloom, and the terror of the people at the crucifixion. The work closes impressively with the poignant comfort motif in slow dotted rhythm in the scene of the entombment. Profoundly immersed in his subject, Dupré created a deeply moving musical interpretation of the Bible's central story.

In 1935 Dupré's pupil O. Messiaen (1908–92), one of the twentieth century's most radical, creative, and innovative composers (using birdsong and Hindu rhythmic and melodic elements) published an acknowledged masterpiece for organ, La Nativité du Seigneur (The Birth of the Lord) composed of nine meditations on various aspects of the nativity: (1) "Virgin and Child," quiet and intimate; (2) "Shepherds," with the characteristic shepherds' pipe tune; (3) "Eternal Purposes," displaying a solo line against a mystical background; (4) "The Word," varying from soft to loud; (5) "God's Children," a single crescendo and decrescendo climaxed by the cry of "Father, father"; (6) "The Angels," high pitched flights of notes representing the heavenly hosts; (7) "Jesus Accepts the Suffering," the premonition of the passion and crucifixion; (8) "The Wise Men," the star leads the procession of magi; (9) "God with Us"—a toccata hymn of praise to God of great brilliance and complex structure suggesting the profoundly sacred incarnational content of the text, John 1:14: "And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth." The whole suite thus depicts various personages present at the nativity and several spiritually significant implications of the event.

Messiaen attempted to communicate from three points of view: theological, instrumental, and musical. He stated that the abundance of technical means he used (unusual timbres, exotic colors, oriental/Indian rhythms, eerie registrations, different modes and keys) "allows the heart to expand freely" in the theological context. He placed musico-theological interpretation far above the merely mystical, even when his writing became highly symbolic; he was concerned not with self-annihilation by ecstatic absorption into the Godhead but with the Christian truth that humankind is redeemed by the incarnation and sacrifice of Christ. For Messiaen it was the expression of God's relationship with humankind that gave his music a theological, rather than a mystical, orientation.

In 1974 J. Langlais (1907–91), another pupil of Dupré, wrote a profound five-movement organ interpretation of the book of Revelation. Following a near-fatal heart attack in 1973, he submerged himself in a sustained search for Revelation's "hidden message." He decided to write a score about death, and the result was Cinq Méditations sur l'Apocalypse (Five Meditations on Revelation). Langlais's complex work differs from Messiaen's nine meditations on the same subject in emphasizing the poetic and instinctive rather than the theological. Langlais titled each movement: "He that has ears, let him hear" (Rev 2:7); "He is, He was and is to come"(1:4); "Prophetic Visions" (1:10); "Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (22:20); "The Fifth Trumpet" (9:1-11). The final movement is the most fascinating: The fifth angel sounds his trumpet, calling from the "bottomless pit" locusts, which are announced by the organ with dark chords at 8' pitch. At once the trumpet enters, accompanied by tonally insistent arabesques of insect song (cf. Messiaen's birdsong) that swell in intensity and insistent stridency to the very end, punctuated by chordal interjections from the full organ thrillingly symbolizing the human race's distress at inevitable calamity. Humankind's terror is symbolized in the final four dissonant dischords, "In those days men shall seek death and shall not find it" (9:6). Langlais's vision of death is a pessimistic nightmare pierced with the infernal swirling of locusts, in contrast to Messiaen's serene birdsong of a yellow-hammer. But M.-L. Jaquet-Langlais believes that "his final shriek of horror has more to do with a sensitive reader's reaction to a terrifying text than with a Christian's revolt at the approach of death."

In a remarkably avant-garde composition, "Black Host" (1967, 1971) by the American W. Bolcom (b. 1938), written for organ, chimes, suspended cymbals, bass drum, and pre-recorded electronic tape, one is surprised to hear quotations of an old Genevan psalter tune. Thus the literature of the Bible continues to find musical expression, even if interpreted in a context of "slow, inflexible rock tempo, 'flat' sound, everything deliberate and brutal," making use of elements of rock and theater organ music performed by a virtuoso organist plus assistant.

The most convincing interpretation of biblical texts through the organ—the church's instrument, with a richer heritage and body of literature than any other—came from Bach's pen. As a working church organist serving the needs of north German Lutheran churches, he accompanied congregational hymn singing and performed chorale preludes during the worship service. The chorale prelude, a form originating long before Bach, is an independent organ piece prefacing, outlining, and explaining the hymn to the church assembly. Sometimes each stanza is interpreted by means of stock devices well known to composers of the baroque era (1600–1750): sixteenth note rhythmic patterns to express joy, slower tied notes or chromatic scales to express sorrow, rising intervals of the fourth or fifth for the resurrection, a descending note passage for the coming down to earth, a descending interval for the fall of humanity, ascending and descending scales for the winged flight of angels—all intended to illustrate aurally and visually. Bach used every subtle technical and rhetorical means characteristic of the baroque era to illustrate or interpret the hymn text, which was nearly always a psalm paraphrase or other biblical text. He offered a musical parallel to the text's meaning, symbolizing it in some way, relating a key word that in itself was literal or symbolic (P. Williams [1984]). In all his works Bach demonstrated consummate artistry in interpreting the text either in a direct and concentrated form or by means of abstract and intimate musical figures, symbolic numbers, contrapuntal techniques, canonical variations, etc. (A. Schweitzer [1905]; C. Parry [1909]; E. Chafe [1991]). He instructed his pupils not to play hymns in an offhand manner but to express the "affect" (i.e., symbolic and emotional content) of each line of the text and each stanza of the chorale.

Since Bach's day organ composers have tried to maintain his tradition but with modern means and techniques like those employed by Dupré and Messiaen. The sheer volume of their output is staggering. Typical of early twentieth-century organ interpretations is J. Weinberger's (1896–1967) Bible Poems (1938) and C. Van Hulse's Biblical Sketches (1958). Especially noteworthy is the work of contemporary Czech composer P. Eben (b. 1929), many of whose chorale partitas and free compositions are based on biblical texts. Two large masterpieces display his genius: Job, an organ cycle (1987), falls into eight richly contrasted movements, each expressing a theme based on a quotation from the book of Job, which is read in Hebrew by a narrator at the commencement of each movement. The overall tone is both introverted and tragic. Eben writes that Job is like Faust, the story of a wager between Satan and God on the fate of a human being. Faust relies on his own human strength and fails; Job humbly accepts his misfortune and triumphs. For Eben the book of Job not only demonstrates the unimportance of personal sorrow in relation to world events but also reveals God, who does not ask Job to approve his sufferings but to accept them. Standing beside Job, God suffers the pain with him, thus helping him overcome it. The music generously quotes Reformation chorales, plainchant, and in the finale a set of chorale variations on a melody of the Bohemian Brethren, "Christ, the model of humility." According to Eben, "Christ is truly the personification of the innocent sufferer to the very end." In 1992 Eben published his second biblical cycle, Four Biblical Dances inspired by specific dances that appear in the Bible: "The Dance of David Before the Ark of the Covenant (2 Samuel 6)," "The Dance of the Shulamite" (Canticles), "The Dance of Jephtha's Daughter (Judges 11)," and "The Wedding in Cana" (John 2). Although a dance per se is not mentioned in the wedding story, Eben "cannot but imagine that with so much good wine there would not have been some dancing." He strives to preserve the organ's "sacred characteristics" in these brilliant pieces, which make a superb complement to the Job cycle. Among numerous others, J. David, H. Distler, M. Drischner, H. Howells, P. Manz, W. Matthias, F. Peeters, E. Pepping, P. Post, and H. Willan have interpreted biblical material for the organ in a wide range of styles.

For the piano the Canadian-born composer R. N. Dett (1882–1943) wrote Eight Bible Vignettes, which are still performed. And the contemporary Finnish composer E. Rautavaara (b. 1928) has written Sonata I: Christ and the Fisherman for the piano, using resonant parallel chords, bitonality, and modal scales. But apparently the great composers for the piano (Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, Rachmaninoff), were not inspired to address biblical themes. Messiaen, however, as a religious ecstatic, set out in 1944 to express "in a language of mystic love, at once varied, powerful and tender, sometimes brutal, in a multi-colored ordering," a cycle of twenty contemplations on the infant Jesus, Vingt Regards sur l'Enfant Jésus, for solo piano. The contemplations include motives representing the cross, the Virgin, the star, the angels, and God, all viewing the infant. The complete work takes two hours to perform; many pianists play excerpts from it. It broke new ground in the evolution of piano timbre and time values, creating a new sense of form no longer based on classic Western standards, indeed, seemingly not bound by time at all. In 1963 he wrote Couleurs de la Cité Céleste for piano and orchestra in which bird songs from New Zealand, Brazil, and Canada are among the elements illuminating five quotations from the book of Revelation.

b. Symphony and ballet. From the time of Bach to the beginning of the twentieth century the relatively small European court orchestra expanded to the enormous 100-plus concert hall ensemble with the new, enlarged, or refined instruments called for by such Romantic composers as Wagner and R. Strauss. Except for oratorio and opera, composers did not turn to the Bible for inspiration for symphonic-orchestral composition (Mendelssohn's 1840 Symphony no. 2, Lobegesang [Hymn of Praise] with chorus is an exception.) In the twentieth century, however, several notable examples of concerted instrumental interpretations of biblical subjects came to life. In 1914 Strauss produced music for a one-act ballet entitled Josefslegende, op. 68, based on the story of Joseph in Genesis 37–50. Strauss found the text difficult because he feared the "good boy Joseph" might be too insipid a character to depict convincingly. The work focuses on Joseph in Egypt, particularly on the episode of Potiphar's wife and subsequent events.

After the opening set dances Strauss abandoned the traditional ballet design and produced what amounts to another of the symphonic poems for which he is celebrated. He used a waltz tune and striking two-part polyphony. The purity and innocence of the youthful Joseph are depicted with harp, celesta, and piano—charmingly piquant orchestral effects (cf. the rose motif in Der Rosenkavalier)—although overused today to the point of banality. Strauss called for the double bass clarinet to illustrate the scene where Potiphar's wife creeps in to find Joseph asleep. In addition Strauss used four harps, four pairs of castanets, a wind machine, and characteristically luxuriant orchestration. His interpretation is neither spiritual nor theological; emphasis is placed squarely on the earthly and thoroughly human, descriptive suggestion for the purpose of entertainment, which Strauss later turned into an orchestral suite.

A finer biblical work for orchestra is Job: A Masque for Dancing (1930) by R. Vaughan Williams (1872–1958). The work is not really a masque; it lacks the requisite speech and singing. Nor is it strictly a ballet since it contains more music than dancing and is relatively static. There are dance forms in the music, however: the ancient sarabande, minuet, galliard, and pavane. Job has become firmly fixed as a concert work for symphony orchestra alone. In addition to the Bible, W. Blake's (1757–1827) Illustrations to the Book of Job, a series of twenty-one engravings, further inspired Vaughan Williams. His scoring, like Strauss's, is for full symphony orchestra with organ and two harps, and a full percussion section to which he added the rarely heard bass flute and tenor saxophone to give an unctuous sound to the voice of Job's comforters. Some writers consider Job to be Vaughan Williams's finest work. Flos Campi (Flowers of the Field [1925]), a ballet suite celebrating the sensuous passion of the Song of Songs, is another of his contributions to biblical interpretation in music.

Two ballets on the story of the prodigal son provide interesting interpretive contrasts. At the request of impressario S. Diaghilev (1872–1929), the Russian composer S. Prokofiev (1891–1953) wrote his famous ballet music in 1929, emphasizing the younger son's journey to "a far country" where he squandered his inheritance on "loose living." Intrigued by the dramatic implications of this theme, Prokofiev divided his score into three scenes: (1) the son falls in with bad company and is introduced to a seductress; (2) he has relations with the temptress, depicted in slow rhythm followed by a "dance of drunkenness," is then robbed, and afterward awakens in great remorse; (3) he returns home to great rejoicing.

In 1957 the Swedish composer H. Alfven (1872–1960) produced his last work, The Prodigal Son ballet. Unlike Prokofiev's cool, transparent version, Alfven employed Swedish folk tunes, including "Swedish Polka," which attained international popularity. Alfven stressed the prodigal's journey to "rich Arabia," a fair and happy land, and his eventual return to a forgiving father. The story of the prodigal son also inspired C. Debussy's (1862–1918) cantata for three voices and orchestra, L'Enfant Prodigue (1884), an oratorio (1869) by A. Sullivan (1842–1900), and Britten's third "Church Parable" (1968).

In 1907 F. Schmitt (1870–1958) of France composed a ballet, subsequently performed only as an orchestral suite, La Tragédie de Salomé. Based on a poem by d'Humières that departs significantly from the sketchy NT story, the setting is Herod's palace overlooking the Dead Sea. Salome dances the "Dance of the Pearls," then the more lascivious "Dance of Lightning," which incites Herod to lustful pursuit, during which he tears off Salome's veils. Stepping in, John the Baptist covers her with his cloak, for which he is decapitated. Salome seizes his head, then in remorse throws it into the Dead Sea. As the sea turns red, she again begins to dance, only to have John's head reappear. The dance becomes a "Dance of Fear," and at the end "evening crashes down on the dancer, who is carried away by a hellish frenzy."

Unlike the programmatic-descriptive works of Strauss and Vaughan Williams, "emotional quality," not storytelling, is the focus of Bernstein's First Symphony, Jeremiah (1942), which brought him international prominence. Bernstein's work focuses on the relationship between the prophet and his wayward and rebellious people rather than on Jeremiah's life. Contemporary humanity's struggle with a crisis of faith always concerned Bernstein, and in Jeremiah he saw parallels and a compelling relevance. Bernstein did not try to solve the crisis but through music attempted to offer comfort leading to peace. Using paraphrases of Hebrew chant, liturgical synagogue sequences belonging to the commemoration of the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem, and ancient Hebrew dirges, he strove to communicate a deep emotional quality. The symphony's three movements are (1) "Prophecy," the prophet's angry sermon begging Jerusalem to repent, ending in a gradual fading away of sound as if to emphasize Jeremiah's failure to get through to the people's hearts and minds; (2) "Profanation," destruction shown as punishment for willful disobedience; and (3) "Lamentation," a mezzo-soprano soloist intoning in Hebrew, "How lonely sits the city that once was full of people! How like a widow she has become. . . . Restore us to yourself, O Lord, that we may be restored; renew our days as of old" (Lam 1:1; 5:21).

Comparable to Bernstein's Jeremiah is Vienna-born R. Starer's (b. 1924) Ariel, Visions of Isaiah for soprano, baritone, chorus, and orchestra (1959). Ariel (lit., Lion of God) is a symbol for Jerusalem (or for sinful humanity at large). The first movement represents the prophet Isaiah warning the people that their sins will bring them down so that they shall "whisper out of the dust" (Isa 29:1-4); the second has the baritone (Isaiah) advising the people to hide themselves until the judgment passes (Isa 24:4; 26:20; 5:8); the third, a mordant scherzo, condemns the haughty daughters of Zion for their wantonness, their mincing steps, their tinkling ornaments (Isa 3:16-24); the fourth, the dramatic turning point "Fear, and the Pit, and the Snare" (Isa 24:17; 22:4-5, 13; 29:15; 20:6; 35:4; 12:1) contains a tender lament by the soprano, "Look away from me," after which different voices from the chorus respond to imminent destruction ("Let us eat and drink. . . ." "Who sees us? Who knows us?" and "Whither shall we flee, how shall we escape?") to which the prophet answers, "Be strong, fear not. The Lord will save you" (Isa 35:4). Two choruses sing the lyrical fifth movement a cappella, "The Lord shall give you rest" (Isa 14:3; 25:8); and the orchestra returns in the jubilant sixth movement finale, "Break forth into joy" (Isa 52:9; 55:12; 2:3-5).

In 1916 the Swiss American composer Bloch composed a Hebrew rhapsody for violoncello and orchestra entitled Schelomo (Solomon). Bloch's musical portrait of the great Israelite king takes the form of an exuberant, almost meandering concerto that depicts him as warrior and ruler; temple builder at Jerusalem; sensual lover and poet of the Song of Songs; keen prophet, sage, and wit of the book of Proverbs; and almost cynical preacher of Qohelet proclaiming that all is vanity and that human pursuits end up finally at the point of spiritual vexation. Luxury, barbarism, and brooding meditation are described with musical flourishes and cello cadenzas contrasting the full orchestra with the cello and the cello's upper register with its lower one. Against an orchestral background of lush opulence the solo cello part is characterized by oriental cantillation, wide leaps, sinewy arabesques, and supple rhythms; pageantry permeates the whole work.

An unusual short concerto for the tuba by American writer F. McBeth (b. 1933) appeared in 1991. Entitled Daniel in the Lion's Den, the one-movement piece is a bravura work for solo tuba and a band of wind instruments, employing contemporary compositional devices and virtuoso technique.

The State of Israel has contributed a number of noteworthy modern interpretations: M. Lavry (1903–67), The Song of Songs oratorio; A. N. Boskovich (1907–64), Ruth and Boaz suite; O. Partos (b. 1907), Rabat Tsraruni (Psalm 129); J. Tal (b. 1910), Saul at Endor opera concertante; M. Seter (b. 1916), The Daughter of Jephthah for orchestra; T. Avni (b. 1927), De Profundis for strings (Psalm 130); and many others.

Traditional literary, historical, and theological interpretations of the Bible have engaged the minds of devout interpreters for centuries. On an intellectual level such interpretations have seemed to satisfy humankind's need to know the message of Scripture. But there is another level. However indispensable these interpretations may be, there remain those who feel that they are ultimately transcended in profundity, strength, sublimity, and communicative power by the art of music.

Bibliography: G. Abraham, The Concise Oxford History of Music (1979); The Age of Beethoven (1982). C. Abravanel and B. Hirshowitz, The Bible in English Music: W. Byrd to H. Purcell (AMLI Studies in Music Bibliography 1, 1970). C. Arnold, Organ Literature: A Comprehensive Survey (1973, 1984[2], 1995[3]). F. Blume, Protestant Church Music: A History (1974). D. Burrows, The Cambridge Companion to Handel (1997). J. Butt, The Cambridge Companion to Bach (1997). B. C. Cannon, A. H. Johnson, and W. G. Waite, The Art of Music: A Short History of Musical Styles and Ideas (1960). E. Chafe, Tonal Allegory in the Vocal Music of J. S. Bach (1991). M. Cooper (ed.), The Modern Age, 1890–1960 (1974). R. Crocker, A History of Musical Style (1966). C. Dahlhaus, Nineteenth-century Music (1989). W. Dean, Handel's Dramatic Oratorios and Masques (1959). W. T. Flynn, Medieval Music as Medieval Scripture Commentary: Music as Exegesis in Eleventh-century Liturgy (1999). K. Geiringer, J. S. Bach: The Culmination of an Era (1966). E. M. Good, "The Bible and American Music," The Bible and American Arts and Letters (The Bible in American Culture 3, ed. G. Gunn, 1983) 129-35. M. Gorali, The OT in World Music (1977). D. J. Grout, A Short History of Opera (rev. H. W. Williams, 1988[3]); History of Western Music (rev. C. Palisca, 1996[5]). H. W. Hitchcock, Music in the United States (1974, 1988[3]). A. Holden et al. (eds.), The Viking Opera Guide (1994). A. Hutchings, Church Music in the Nineteenth Century (1967, repr. 1977). A. Jacobs, Choral Music: A Symposium (1963, 1978). R. S. Johnson, Messiaen (1975, new. ed. 1989). H. Kallmann, A History of Music in Canada, 1534–1914 (1960). N. R. Knouse and C. D. Crews, Moravian Music: An Introduction (1996). A. Lewis and N. Fortune (eds.), The Opera and Church Music, 1630–1750 (1975). V. Lukas, A Guide to Organ Music (1963, 1986). H. W. Marshall, "Open Up Them Pearly Gates: Pattern and Religious Expression in Bluegrass Gospel Music," Folklore Forum 4, 5 (1971) 92-112. P. Minear, Death Set to Music: Masterpieces by Bach, Brahms, Penderecki, Bernstein (1987). C. H. H. Parry, Johann Sebastian Bach (1909). J. Pelikan, Bach Among the Theologians (1986). S. Remmert, Bibeltexte in der Musik: Ein Verzeichnis ihrer Vertonungen (1996). E. Routley, Twentieth-century Church Music (1964, rev. ed. 1966). J. A. Sadie and R. Samuel (eds.), The Norton/Grove Dictionary of Women Composers (1994). S. Sadie (ed.), The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians (20 vols., 1980; repr. 1995); The New Grove Dictionary of Opera (4 vols., 1992). A. Schweitzer, J. S. Bach (1905; ET 1911). G. B. Shaw, The Great Composers (ed. L. Crompton, 1978). H. E. Smither, A History of the Oratorio (vols. 1, 2, 1977; vol. 3, 1987). E. Southern, The Music of Black Americans: A History (1971, 1983[2], 1997[3]). S. Terrien, The Magnificat: Musicians as Biblical Interpreters (1995). E. A. Wienandt and R. H. Young, The Anthem in England and America (1970). P. Williams, The Organ Music of J. S. Bach, vol. 3, A Background (1984). A.

Wilson-Dickson, The Story of Christian Music: From Gregorian Chant to Black Gospel (1992).

J. M. BULLARD

MYTH AND RITUAL SCHOOL

This expression is used primarily to designate the group of scholars who contributed to the two symposia Myth and Ritual (1933) and The Labyrinth (1935), under the editorship of S. HOOKE. It should be noted that Hooke always denied that a clearly defined school had ever existed; and certainly the original authors, who included W. OESTERLEY, T. ROBINSON, and E. James, did not always speak with one voice. In some respects their general outlook derived from the anthropological approach of J. FRAZER, especially his functional view of myth (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), but they differed from him in their understanding of myth as essentially the spoken part of ritual and in their questioning of his purely comparative method. Hooke noted that the roots of the approach lay in the so-called diffusionist movement associated with the British scholars G. E. Smith and W. Perry (Hooke, Myth, Ritual, and Kingship [1958] 1).

Most significantly, the scholars in question postulated the existence of a general myth-and-ritual pattern common to the ancient Near East, which found its fullest expression in a great annual new year celebration fundamental for the community's welfare during the ensuing year. As seen most clearly in the Babylonian new year, or akitu, festival, this celebration had five basic components, which also lay behind many other rites: a dramatic representation of the death and resurrection of the god, a recitation of the creation myth, a ritual combat in which the deity overcomes his enemies, the sacred marriage, and finally a great procession culminating in the god's enthronement. Further, the Myth and Ritual group claimed that a similar and equally significant celebration existed in ancient Israel and was represented by the autumnal complex of celebrations centering on the Feast of Ingathering, or Booths, which was to be understood as a new year festival.

Ancient Near Eastern archaeological discoveries (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) played a major part in this reconstruction, and later discoveries, notably the Ugaritic (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE), were held to confirm it. As far as HB studies are concerned, the work of the Myth and Ritual school marked a revolution of abiding significance. Up to that time modern scholarship had tended to find the distinctive religion of Israel in the great prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), who were anti-cultic and proclaimed a spiritual faith opposed to that represented by the priesthood. By contrast, it could now be seen how central a part the cult played in the nation's religion and that full weight had to be given this aspect in any assessment of ancient Israelite society.

Another new development in HB scholarship largely initiated by the Myth and Ritual writers was the understanding of the religious role of the king. In Hooke's reconstruction of the new year festival, the king took the leading part, even to the extent of representing the deity in the ritual. Hitherto, largely as a result of the concentration on the prophets, the Israelite monarchy had generally been viewed in a negative light, with the king depicted as a secular figure. But in a seminal essay in The Labyrinth and more fully in a subsequent study, A. JOHNSON (1955), one of the younger Myth and Ritual scholars, argued that the king was the chief actor in the great Israelite annual celebration, undergoing a symbolic "death" and "resurrection" in the ritual. Johnson drew his evidence largely from the psalms, building on the work of H. GUNKEL, who had recognized that a number of psalms originially referred, not to a future "messiah," but to the actual Davidic monarch; however, Johnson found indications of the king's cultic role in a much wider range of psalm material, and in this he has been followed by many subsequent writers. It is, perhaps, this Myth and Ritual view of Israel's monarchy that has been most widely acknowledged, as shown by the contents of the final Myth and Ritual collection, Myth, Ritual, and Kingship (1958).

The theories of the school have provoked intense discussion and criticism. Near Eastern specialists have claimed that their postulate of a universal pattern was too theoretical and overlooked fundamental differences between the religious systems of, e.g., Mesopotamia and Egypt. While these differences are important—and the Myth and Ritual scholars were more aware of them than has often been recognized—the demonstration by these scholars of a basic similarity in the religious structure of the whole area over two millennia has not been seriously shaken. Certain of the more imaginative suggestions of some, though not all, of the Myth and Ritual scholars, e.g., Yahweh being a dying and rising god, the existence in Israel of the sacred marriage, or the Davidic king as being in a real sense "divine," have not found wide support among English-speaking authorities. On the other hand, considerable attention has been devoted to the traditions connected with Mount Zion and to the Canaanite elements they incorporated from the pre-Israelite Jebusite sanctuary. As a result, it has become increasingly recognized that there was a festival of the enthronement of Yahweh on the occasion of the autumn celebrations, characterized by a great procession with the ark as the symbol of the divine presence, although its precise significance is still a matter of debate. Theories of a fusion between Yahweh and El Elyon, the old Canaanite deity of Jerusalem, have emphasized Israel's God as Creator and the source of fertility, aspects prominent in the outlook of the Myth and Ritual school.

The ideas of the Myth and Ritual authors have been influential not only in Great Britain but also in other countries; such a standard work as H.-J. Kraus's Worship in Israel (1954) reflects the new developments they inaugurated. But they have had their main effect above all in Scandinavia, where a group of scholars centered at the University of Uppsala enthusiastically embraced them. Indeed, to some degree the views of the Myth and Ritual school were anticipated by the Norwegian scholar S. MOWINCKEL, who in the second volume of his Psalmenstudien (1922) interpreted a number of psalms as the liturgy for a festival of Yahweh's enthronement in connection with the autumnal new year festival. But it was the Swedish scholar I. ENGNELL who gave the most unqualified support to the general Myth and Ritual thesis and pressed it in directions with which its original proponents might not fully have concurred.

Four aspects of Engnell's studies (1943) merit particular mention. First, central to his whole outlook is the basic Myth and Ritual concept of a fundamental religious pattern throughout the ancient Near East that centered on the new year celebration; he held that a thorough knowledge of this pattern was essential for the biblical scholar since the religion of Israel could only be understood as a variant of it. Second, he stressed the fundamental importance of the king in the pattern: He did not hesitate to call the king "divine," as being the earthly embodiment of the deity and the source of blessing and fertility for society through his enactment of the death and resurrection of the god and the sacred marriage. Israelite kingship shared all these characteristics. Other Scandinavian scholars, notably G. Widengren (1955), have more systematically developed this approach with reference to OT monarchy. Third, in a long series of articles in the biblical encylopedia Svenskt Bibliskt Upplagsverk, thirteen of which have been translated into English, Engnell applied his theories to the exegesis of the HB to illustrate how the myth-and-ritual pattern provides the correct understanding for many biblical narratives and concepts like Passover and exodus, of which J. PEDERSON (1940) had already given a cultic interpretation, or Messiah and Son of man. In the case of the last two concepts, the sacral monarch was the determinative factor as well as for the solution of the problem of the Suffering Servant of Second Isaiah. These insights were further worked out in an important study by the Danish scholar A. BENTZEN. Fourth, in his investigation of prophetism, Engnell strongly attacked the common assumption that the great prophets were divorced from the cult: Some of them, like Amos, were actual cultic officials; some of the prophetic books were Temple liturgies or at least close reflections of them; and much in all of them reproduced the themes and language of Israelite worship. Again, other more detailed studies have carried forward this approach, e.g., those by A. Haldar in Sweden (1945) and Johnson in England (1944). Engnell has been the clearest follower of the methods of the Myth and Ritual school and the decisive influence on the younger scholars who may be said to constitute the Uppsala school. Not even in Scandinavia have his more extreme views always won acceptance, but the basic approach of the Myth and Ritual school has been very marked on biblical scholarship there as well as in other countries, including Germany, where the general consensus has often appeared hostile to it.

Bibliography: G. W. Anderson, "Some Aspects of the Uppsala School of OT Study," HTR 43 (1950) 239-56. A. Bentzen, King and Messiah (1948; ET 1955). I. Engnell, Studies in Divine Kingship in the Ancient Near East (1943, 1967²); "The Ebed Yahweh Songs and the Suffering Messiah in 'Deutero-Isaiah,' " BJRL 21 (1948) 54-93; "Methodological Aspects of OT Study," VTSup (1960) 13-30; A Rigid Scrutiny (1969) = Critical Essays on the OT (1970). A. Haldar, Associations of Cult Prophets Among the Ancient Semites (1945). S. H. Hooke (ed.), Myth and Ritual: Essays on the Myth and Ritual of the Hebrews in Relation to the Culture Pattern of the Ancient East (1933); The Labyrinth: Further Studies in the Relation Between Myth and Ritual in the Ancient World (1935); Myth, Ritual, and Kingship: Essays on the Theory and Practice of Kingship in the Ancient Near East and in Israel (1958). A. R. Johnson, The Cultic Prophet in Ancient Israel (1944, 1962²); Sacral Kingship in Ancient Israel (1955, 1967²). H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel: A Cultic History of the OT (1954; ET 1966). S. Mowinckel, He That Cometh (1951; ET 1956); The Psalms in Israel's Worship (1951; ET 1962), vol. 1, chaps. 3 and 4. J. Pedersen, "The Crossing of the Reed Sea and the Paschal Legend," Israel: Its Life and Culture iii-iv (1940) 728-37. J. R. Porter, "Two Presidents of the Folklore Society: S. H. Hooke and E. O. James," Folklore 88 (1977) 131-45. G. Widengren, Sakrales Königtum im Alten Testament und im Judentum (1955).

J. R. PORTER

MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES (to 1800)

"Of all the phenomena of human culture, myth and religion are the most refractory to a merely logical analysis" (E. Cassirer, An Essay on Man [1944] 72). This thought may help to explain differences in terminology and approaches to myth over the years.

In the early centuries of Christianity the myths most familiar were those of Greece and Rome, e.g., in the poems of Homer and Hesiod. In the form in which the myths have come down to us, the Greek gods and heroes often behave in a manner unworthy of civilized people. This posed a problem the Greek philosophers, long before the coming of Christ, solved by allegorizing the legends in terms of philosophy and science (R. Hanson, Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources and Significance of Origen's Interpretation of Scripture [1959] 57-59). When Christian interpreters of the Bible needed an alternative to the literal-historical sense, e.g., in Song of Songs, not surprisingly they preferred allegory to myth, thus following a tradition of the Jews, especially that of PHILO. When CELSUS taunted the Christians with the "fables" of the Bible, ORIGEN retorted that if the Greeks knew how to find a hidden allegorical meaning in the myths, why should he object to Christians doing the same? In any case, if Celsus had understood the intention of the biblical writers he would have known that many biblical narratives were acceptable in their literal sense without allegory, unlike the Greek legends, and that there were other parts where God adapted divine speech to human ways (Origen Con. Cel., 4).

With the coming of the Renaissance and the Enlightenment, implicit faith began to give way to the inquiry of reason: "Man is the measure of all things." Human standards as to what is reasonable took the place of an unquestioning acceptance of a dogmatic tradition. The tide of opinion was running strongly against the use of allegory, which was seen as the vehicle of many unfounded interpretations. The Bible was now coming to be viewed as one literature among many others to which the same principles of interpretation applied; the clear signs of human fallibility in its composition involved a reassessment of its supernatural features, especially divine manifestations and miracles. Thus, for B. SPINOZA, miracles were impossible since Nature was immutable, being itself God's will; as a result the account of a miracle could be seen as a myth that expressed humanity's ignorance of natural causes (Theologico-Political Treatise [1670] chap. 7). On the other hand, the Reformation had brought with it an even more rigid view of the infallible Bible in its literal sense, and thus the struggle over interpretation was to continue.

The Deists (see DEISM) brought matters to a head. By ridiculing the biblical narrative as nothing but a collection of fables and by assuming a developed level of culture on the part of the authors, the Deists accused the biblical authors of deceit and imposture. It was R. LOWTH who indicated the general lines of a reply by analyzing Hebrew POETRY as any other literature, considering it aesthetically, without special reference to its truth (see De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum [1753]). Lowth held that religious poetry, especially Hebrew, was the highest point of all poetry and was able to instill in the human soul principles of morality (see B. Feldman and R. Richardson [1972] 144-50). Though he held that image-full poetry was the earliest form of human expression, he distinguished between poetry derived from nature (like the earliest human speech) and poetry as conscious art. J. G. HERDER, in some ways not unlike Lowth, was the poet rather than the critic, concerning himself with the poetry and spirit of ancient literatures and traditions and urging the need to "live" them in order to understand them and their world. Original traditions were, he thought, poetical. Later, he opined that orally transmitted primitive sagas originated before developed poetical structures. Herder had a deep love of the HB, although he was reluctant to commit himself as to its historical content (Vom Geist der hebräischen Poesie [1782–83]; Werke [Suphan ed., 11, 324]). He regarded Genesis 1–3 as saga with a historical basis, although he considered Adam's naming the animals as something like fable. The tradition as a whole—myth, saga, and fable—expressed truths about the nature of the human species and its existence in the world (see Feldman and Richardson, 224-40).

The first scholar to abandon traditional methods of interpretation and apply critical principles of study was R. Simon (1638–1712), a French Oratorian father who insisted that the composition of the documents embodied the ideas and methods prevalent at the time they were written. The historical context was all-important and had to be taken in conjunction with a proper evaluation of religious tradition. Unfortunately, Simon was before his time, and his writings were condemned (see his Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament [1678]).

It was left to J. G. EICHHORN to work out clear principles for the interpretation of the biblical narratives. In his Urgeschichte: Ein Versuch (1779) he rejected the idea, once shared by Herder and still widely held today, that primitive people lived in a golden age and possessed fully developed faculties. The first age, he maintained, was rather the age of the childhood of humankind, in which faculties were undeveloped, sources for gathering knowledge limited, and experience restricted. It could, however, be regarded as a happy state, at least initially, for primitive people knew no other. They were ignorant of the cause of events and hence ascribed to the direct action of God many things modern persons would attribute to secondary causes. Genesis 2–3 relates the true history of how our first parents desired perpetual youth. Seeing the snake eating the fruit, they did likewise. Their own thoughts were attributed to a talking snake; there is nothing to suggest a devil was tempting them. They were driven out of the garden by thunder and lightning, and when they tried to return, they were always prevented. God speaking was probably thunder, which was known as the voice of Yahweh. Believing as he did in the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), Eichhorn asked whether on so important a matter Moses could have purposefully inserted a mythological memoir into his first book without any guarantee that it would be interpreted correctly. He concluded that at this stage the story was basically factual, transmitted, and of course embellished along the way, from the earliest times.

The idea of the childhood of humankind and its association with myth was developed by C. Heyne, Eichhorn's former professor of classical studies (see Feldman and Richardson, 215-23). We are indebted to him for bringing order to the study of myth and especially for his distinction between the original myth, the stuff of ancient tradition, and the later poetical form, which was usually the result of a long period of development. Thus, without resorting to allegory, a knowledge of which was out of the question in the earliest times, it was now possible to find an explanation for the unacceptable features of the biblical narrative considered to be history. These features should be seen, not as a conscious deception by the authors of the later poetical production, but as an artless and unsophisticated account in oral tradition. Myth is not fiction, but its contents are varied. Heyne distinguished (1) historical myth—about real persons or events, but with mythological additions; (2) philosophical myth—about ethical problems (e.g., evil in the world) and natural phenomena (e.g., creation accounts); and (3) poetical myth—artistic combinations of earlier myths, with the addition of new stories and poetic embellishments. Thus, myth, not poetry, was the earliest stage of human thought and expression. Homer and Hesiod did not make up their stories; they gave them poetic shape.

In 1788 Eichhorn (ABBL 1:984) asked: Need one be surprised if the Semitic nations, like the Greeks, also had their myths? Advances in science and historical research had shown that in Genesis 2–3 the historical link could no longer be defended. The narrative now seemed to him to be a philosophical myth about the loss of the happy days of primitive innocence. As intellect and experience developed people began to desire more than they had ("the grass next door is greener"). Envy awoke, unrest followed, and contentment had left. They desired the "food of the gods." Soon these experiences, expressed in Bildersprache, or metaphorical language, took the form of a saga. As Heyne had shown, primitive humans, unaccustomed to abstract thought, saw and expressed only the material and the individual. Unable to "stand back" from events and lacking the capacity to compare them with other experiences, they tended to "blow up" extraordinary events to more than life size, consequently transforming them into supernatural manifestations. But myths are not fables (fictitious stories that impart a moral); they are, rather, the oldest history and philosophy, passing on the events and experiences of primitive humanity in the sense modes of the thought and speech of those early times (J. G. Eichhorn's "Urgeschichte" [1790–93] 2:260).

By 1790 Eichhorn was collaborating with a former student, J. P. GABLER, then professor at Altdorf, who brought out a new edition of the Urgeschichte (3 vols. 1790–93) comprising "an exact and complete historical-critical review of the different modes of interpretation." Gabler criticized equally the traditional approach, especially allegory, which so often read back Christian doctrine into the text, and the Deists, who ignored historical development. In historical myth events were described, not as a modern person would do, but as the primitive authors conceived them to have happened. Moreover, the mere presence of an event in an account did not define the myth as historical. The event might be included to illustrate an idea, which would then make it a philosophical myth, e.g., the fall of humanity and the Tower of Babel. As historical myth developed through time the names of great men became more prominent in them; but at the same time recollection faded and the actual facts became cloudier. Stories became attached to the names, however, and often etymological meanings in keeping with the role of the person were added. Although fables might, at this later stage, be added to the myth, this would not justify describing the myth as fable. On the other hand, should one regard as unhistorical only those parts that must necessarily be unhistorical? Or should one not rather, in a myth that is clearly philosophical, interpret the details in harmony with the leading idea? Should one not, rather, regard Adam (man) and Eve (woman) as being just as etymological as Prometheus and Pandora?

Gabler's vigorous advocacy of mythological interpretation aroused immediate opposition on the part of traditionalists, who thought that the literal interpretation should not be questioned (even though they never suggested that Greek myths should be taken literally), and Deists, who could not accept the literal meaning. But Eichhorn and Gabler were not arguing about the literal truth of Scripture; they were concerned with the accusation of dishonesty leveled against the biblical authors. The "childhood of mankind" (G. Lessing) applied to all of them. Eichhorn could not envisage a unique Hebrew relationship with the deity. The special character of the Hebrew writings could consist only in their relatively exalted nature, i.e., by comparison with other records from the same period of primitive culture. Nor would Eichhorn and Gabler allow a mixed exposition of the contested chapters—part literal-historical, part allegorical-typological. Principles had to be applied consistently. Gabler held that some form of revelation was necessary if the human species was to progress from passion to reason, but this appeared to resemble truths of natural religion rather than the distinctive Hebrew tradition.

The interpretation of many episodes as mythological now spread, not only throughout the HB (e.g., Balaam and his donkey, Elijah in his fiery chariot) but also into the NT (e.g., the temptation of JESUS, in which the story of his withdrawal into the desert had been embellished with mythological detail to express inner decisions). The supposed lack of time for myth to develop in the NT was countered by the response that it was not the few years of Christ's public ministry that were crucial, but the age-old Jewish tradition, much of which had already been classed as myth (e.g., miracles, divine appearances, diabolical possession, angels, devils, sickness caused by malign influences). One now spoke less about "primitive humans" and more of the "oriental mind" that lay behind these ideas and expressions.

In his Hebräische Mythologie (1802), G. BAUER produced a comprehensive survey of the findings of the mythology school that satisfied Gabler's desire for a Mythologia Sacra. But where Eichhorn and Gabler would have recognized myth in the NT, Bauer suggested that Jesus was merely accommodating the current views and tradition, e.g., "I saw Satan like lightning fall from heaven" (Luke 10:18); "their angels see the face of my father" (Matt 18:10); "Be quiet, come out of him" (to the unclean spirit, Mark 1:25). This concession Bauer would not extend to the disciples, however. Unlike Eichhorn and Gabler, Bauer was preoccupied with distinguishing history from myth. He proposed other criteria for identifying myth: (1) events connected with world origins, which no one witnessed; (2) events attributed directly to the action of God or to heavenly beings; (3) actions and speech where only thought took place, e.g., the temptation of Jesus; Jacob and the angel; and (4) events that could never have occurred in the course of nature. In general, he included all unverifiable assertions, considering verifiability to be essential. One must ask not only whether something could have happened but also how it could be known. Thus the whole of Genesis and parts of the other books of Moses and of Joshua–Judges were mythical. Elohim were originally gods, but as Yahweh came to be recognized as the only God, they became angels ("Where the Hebrews speak of an angel appearing, there, Homer sees a god.") Bauer further noted that similar events produced similar myths: Noah's and Deucalion's floods; the stories of Samson and of Hercules. Bauer classified a number of NT events as myth (e.g., Christ's birth, the angel of the agony), but then went on, illogically it seems, to give "natural" explanations of some details (e.g., a phosphorous light at Christ's birth, a dove flying past at the baptism) where there was no evidence at all. On the whole, however, Bauer's concern for fact made him prefer historical to philosophical myth, even though in doing so he limited the range of meaning.

By 1800 almost all of the work on biblical criticism and mythological studies had been done by Germans. France was in the throes of revolution; and England appeared to have turned her back on all change, whether biblical or political. A. Hartmann of Rostock, writing in 1831, had this to say: "England, once Germany's guide in theological research, now, in the area of biblical higher criticism, appears to have come to a disturbing stand still on which all the illuminating insights and liberal ideas of our learned scholars make hardly any impression, let alone unsettle or overturn" (Historisch-kritische Forschungen über die Bildung, das Zeitalter, und den Plan der fünf Bücher Moses [1831] 58-59).

Bibliography: T. Bowman, Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek (Library of History and Doctrine, 1960). F. W. Farrar, History of Interpretation: Eight Lectures Preached Before the University of Oxford (1886). B. Feldman and R. Richardson, The Rise of Modern Mythology, 1680–1860 (1962). R. C. Fuller, Alexander Geddes, 1737–1802: A Pioneer of Biblical Criticism (HTIBS 3, 1984). J. P. Gabler (ed.), J. G. Eichhorn's "Urgeschichte," mit Einleitung und Anmerkungen (1790–93). C. Hartlich and W. Sachs, Der Ursprung des Mythosbegriffes in der modernen Bibelwissenschaft (SSEA, 1952). N. Lohfink, The Christian Meaning of the OT (1969). J. Rogerson, Myth in OT Interpretation (BZAW 134, 1974). E. S. Shaffer, "Kubla Khan" and the Fall of Jerusalem: The Mythological School in Biblical Criticism and Secular Literature, 1770–1880 (1975).

R. C. FULLER

MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES (1800–1980)

Questions about the nature and function of myth in both the HB and the NT form an important part of biblical studies in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and it is now clear that the critical enterprises of such major critics as D. F. STRAUSS and R. BULTMANN have important roots in the closing decades of the eighteenth century. From the time of J. G. EICHHORN (1752–1827) it was necessary for serious scholars to come to terms with the problem of myth in the Bible. Eichhorn's Einleitung in das Alte Testament (3 vols., 1780–82) treats the Hebrew Scriptures "not merely as the vehicle of a revelation, but as in form Oriental books, to be interpreted in accordance with the habits of mind of Semitic peoples" (T. Cheyne [1893] 14). Eichhorn found a good deal of myth and legend in the books of the HB and brought to the serious and systematic study of biblical texts certain ideas about myth that had been discussed in English and French DEISM for a hundred years. He also drew on R. LOWTH's De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum (1753), a work translated into German and annotated by J. D. MICHAELIS. Lowth, an Englishman, regarded the HB as the incomparably sublime POETRY of a deeply religious people. His work was read in Germany by both Eichhorn and his friend J. G. HERDER, whose Vom Geist der Ebraischen Poesie (1782–83; ET 1833) extends Lowth's position. For Herder the Bible is the primitive poetry of the ancient Hebrews. To be understood it must be looked at through the eyes of its creators and accepted as the local, national utterance of a given people at a given time in a given place. He believed that the Bible contains myths that embody deeply important truths. Indeed, Herder was "the first important expression of the romantic affirmation of myth as creative primal wisdom and sublime spiritual power, of myth as vitally true" (B. Feldman and R. Richardson [1972] 224). Against this new affirmation of myth as the necessary formal expression of primitive spiritual life may be set the negative view of myth often associated with the Enlightenment and with such figures as F. Diderot (1713–84), J. D'Alembert (1717–83), VOL-

TAIRE (1694–1778), P. Holbach (1723–89), and T. PAINE (1737–1809), for whom myth was simply primitive superstition, unworthy and erroneous, something that would vanish when exposed to the light of reason. Eichhorn's detailed and unimpassioned analysis of biblical texts as a diverse collection of legends, oral traditions, earlier books or documents, and fabulous stories may be seen as the beginning of a modern "objective" or "detached" criticism of myth, avoiding as it does the strident denunciations of Voltaire or Paine and the enthusiastic, passionate assent and acceptance of Herder.

The modern biblical study of myth begins, then, at a time when there were in circulation two diametrically opposed evaluations of myth. One group, usually, if not quite fairly, labeled "Enlightenment" thinkers, generally regarded myths as erroneous pre-scientific, savage thought marked by superstition and credulity and of no serious modern interest or value. The other group, often thought of as Romantic or pre-Romantic, affirmed myth as high truth expressed symbolically by a primitive people at a primitive time. In understanding various modern biblical scholars' approaches to myth, it is necessary to understand not only their conception of myth but also their underlying evaluation of myth and mythological habits of mind.

Despite his tone of "objectivity," Eichhorn shared the negative view of myth. In the HB, for example, he found myth and miracle everywhere, but he did not find them valuable or significant; and he uniformly sought to recover the "naturalistic" or historical phenomena that lie behind them. From this point of view, "the appointment of Moses to be the leader of the Israelites was nothing more than the long cherished project of the patriot to emancipate his people, which when presented before his mind with more than usual vividness in his dreams, was believed by him to be a divine inspiration. The flame and smoke which ascended from Mount Sinai at the giving of the law was merely a fire which Moses kindled in order to make a deeper impression upon the imagination of the people, together with an accidental thunderstorm that arose at that particular moment. The shining of his countenance was the natural effect of being overheated; but it was supposed to be a divine manifestation, not only by the people, but by Moses himself, he being ignorant of the true cause" (Strauss [1835] 48). Eichhorn interpreted myth as a process that starts with a nucleus of historical fact; thus any given myth can be reduced to its historical core or kernel. Eichhorn was, then, in Strauss's phrase, a Christian Euhemerus.

In his Einleitung in das Neue Testament (5 vols., 1804–27) Eichhorn argued that the Gospels were also full of supernatural myths, for which he again supplied natural explanations. He also maintained that the canonical Gospels (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) were not original or eyewitness accounts but rested instead on various translations and versions of a primary Aramaic gospel. Eichhorn's work was influential. In Germany J. P. GABLER, the young Schelling, J. SEMLER, and G. BAUER carried on his ideas. In England the regius professor of Hebrew, H. Lloyd, was interested but could not get church or university patronage for a translation of Eichhorn's Introduction to the OT. In the United States A. Norton's Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels (3 vols., 1837–44) was essentially intended as a refutation of Eichhorn.

Among Eichhorn's immediate followers, H. Paulus, also a Christian Euhemerist, sought for naturalistic—that is, non-supernatural—explanations for everything in the NT in his Commentar ueber das Neue Testament (1800). Bauer produced a more sophisticated taxonomy of myths, starting from the position of C. Heyne (see Feldman and Richardson, 215-23) that the earliest records of all people are necessarily myths. In his 1802 volume Bauer provided various ways to identify a myth: A narrative is a myth "first, when it proceeds from an age in which no written records existed, but in which facts were transmitted through the medium of oral tradition alone; secondly, when it presents an historical account of events which are either absolutely or relatively beyond the reach of experience, such as occurrences connected with the spiritual world, and incidents to which, from the nature of the circumstances, no one could have been witness; or thirdly, when it deals in the marvelous and is couched in symbolic language" (Strauss [1835] 52). In 1817 W. DE WETTE published his Lehrbuch der historiche-kristischen Einleitung in die Kanonische und Apocryphischen Bücher des Alten Testaments, the fifth edition (1840) of which was translated into English and nearly doubled in size with annotations by the American T. PARKER in 1843. De Wette followed Bauer in paying especially close attention to the process by which a legend becomes a myth. "But in the popular legend, there came an idealo-poetic element, and mingled itself with the real historical elements. By this means the tradition was gradually transformed into the miraculous and the ideal. The popular songs conduced chiefly to bring about this end; for they, in the bold lyric flights of imagination, represented what was surprising and wonderful in a supernatural light, and a people credulous of miracles easily misunderstood the account. Thus the miracle in Joshua 10:14 arose from the lyric hyperbola of the two preceding verses" (Parker [1843] 2:38-29).

This effort to discriminate between historical fact, or event, on the one hand, and various kinds of myth, on the other hand, was extended and applied to NT studies most famously—indeed, notoriously—by Strauss in his Das Leben Jesu, a book that was said to have made the year 1835 as memorable in theology as 1848 was in politics, and for the same reason. Concentrating on the four Gospels, Strauss found myth everywhere, and he distinguished several kinds: "We distinguish by the name evangelical mythus a narrative relating directly or indirectly to Jesus, which may be considered not as the expression of a fact, but as the product of an idea of his earliest followers." (Strauss, like other German writers of the time, tried to formalize a terminology for myth studies in which "mythus" meant a single mythological narrative, with "mythi" for the plural.) He divided evangelical myths into two kinds, pure and historical. The pure mythus is one "constituting the substance of the narrative" and arising either from "the Messianic ideas and expectations existing according to their several forms in the Jewish mind before Jesus" or from "that peculiar impression which was left by the personal character, actions and fate of Jesus" (86). The historical mythus is "an accidental adjunct to the actual history," having for its basis a "definite individual fact which has been seized upon by religious enthusiasm, and twined around with mythical conceptions culled from the idea of the Christ." Strauss gave as examples of the latter "a saying of Jesus such as that concerning 'fishers of men' or the barren fig tree, which now appear in the Gospels transmuted into marvelous histories" (87), applying these concepts so rigorously to the Gospel narratives that almost nothing of the historical JESUS remained unchallenged. His conclusion was bleak: "The results of this inquiry which we have now brought to a close, have apparently annihilated the greatest and most valuable part of that which the Christian has been wont to believe concerning his saviour Jesus, have uprooted all the animating motives which he has gathered from his faith, and withered all his consolations." He then asserted that it remains "to re-establish dogmatically that which has been destroyed critically" (757).

Strauss tried to do this by claiming that the true meaning of Christ is not as an individual, a god-man, but as Humanity, the human race itself; and he was able to conclude, "by faith in this Christ, especially in his death and resurrection, man is justified before God; that is, by the kindling within him of the idea of Humanity, the individual man participates in the divinely human life of the species" (780). Strauss's work was widely read and reviewed. In the United States T. Parker published a seventy-page review of it in The Christian Examiner (1840). In England Strauss was answered by Voices of the Church in Reply to Dr. D. F. Strauss (1845), and his work was translated by the novelist G. Eliot in 1846. Strauss was widely attacked in Germany, and he ultimately published another Life of Jesus for the German People in 1864 with a somewhat less sweeping conclusion. It has been repeatedly pointed out that he failed to preface his work with a critical discussion of the sources—that is, he failed to evaluate the historical status of each of the Gospel narratives, let alone sift their relationship to each other. Thus much of the seeming cogency of Strauss's mythological hypothesis was undercut when as early as 1838 C. WEISSE put forward the hypothesis that the earliest Gospel is that of Mark, with Matthew and Luke derived from it. At almost the same time L. Feuerbach's The Essence of Christianity (1841) carried Strauss's argument one step further, denying the existence of an abstract divine being and turning theology "completely and finally into anthropology" (K. Barth [1947; ET 1972] 534).

From this point forward the study of myth in the Bible is increasingly complicated because it is often carried on as part of the enterprise of anthropology or one of the newly rising fields of history of religion, comparative religions, or FOLKLORE. The philological school, typified by F. Müller's "Comparative Mythology" (1909), explained myth as a "disease of language" and saw in myths only linguistically distorted accounts of such natural events as the coming of the dawn. The fullest application of this theory to the Bible is I. Goldziher's Mythology Among the Hebrews and Its Historical Development (1877). An opponent of Müller's, A. LANG took up E. Tyler's animist theories about the origin of myth (1871) and found widespread evidence that the earliest religions were, against all previous opinion, both monotheistic and strongly ethical. This view, in which primitive myth establishes primitive monotheism, put forward in Lang's Myth, Ritual, and Religion (1887) and The Making of Religion (1909^3), was taken up and extended to biblical studies by W. Schmidt in Der Ursprung der Gottesidee (1926^2). The so-called ritual school of mythological interpretation viewed all myth as founded solely in primitive ritual. J. Harrison's Themis (1912) is the major early work here, while S. HOOKE's Myth, Ritual, and Kingship (1958) is a late development. J. FRAZER linked biblical stories to folklore traditions in Folklore in the OT (1918), a view that has been revised and revived by T. GASTER in Myth, Legend, and Custom in the OT (1969). The claims for primitive monotheism by Lang and Schmidt had the effect of renewing the positive emphasis on myth as important early religious truth. This is also the effect of those modern writers who may loosely be called the phenomenological school, including E. Cassirer (1946), G. van der Leeuw (1967), M. Eliade, and P. RICOEUR. Van der Leeuw begins with L. Levy-Bruhl's (1922) idea that primitive thought as expressed in myth is "prelogical." Instead of criticizing the primitive mentality as non-scientific, however, van der Leeuw sees it as a valid, worthy mental process in its own right. So does Eliade, who gives the following definition: "Myth narrates a sacred history; it relates an event that took place in primordial time, the fabled time of the beginnings.... Myth, then, is always an account of a 'creation'; it relates how something was produced, began to be... the myth is regarded as a sacred story and hence a 'true history' because it always deals with realities" (Myth and Reality [1964] 5-6). Building upon earlier work of Eliade, Riceour's La Symbolique du Mal (1950) undertakes a detailed study of the HB to show how myths are an attempt to explain the basic human experiences of defilement, guilt, and sin in the presence of the divine. Somewhat analogous are the fragmentary findings of structuralists (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION) stressing the importance of myth as a given in a culture as something that expresses itself through the human, not as something the human can manipulate at will. C. Levi-Strauss's method, as illustrated in "The Structural Study of Myth" (1958), has been taken up by E. Leach in Genesis as Myth (1969) and "The Legitimacy of Solomon" (1966) and by M. Douglas in "The Abominations of Leviticus" (1966).

In biblical studies as such, the later nineteenth century saw an increasingly sophisticated source criticism and a general consensus that was anti-Strauss and interested in expanding, not contracting, the historical Jesus and the historical Moses. This revived historicism reached a peak with J. WELLHAUSEN's Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1885), in which the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) is seen to consist of three strata of law and three strata of tradition coming down to us through four main sources and confirming, e.g., an essentially historical outline of a story of Moses.

Building on Wellhausen was the work of H. GUNKEL, generally regarded as the founder of modern biblical FORM CRITICISM. Gunkel's Schöpfung und Chaos (1895) shows how Babylonian myths about the fight between the creator god and the god of chaos provided a pattern for the authors of Genesis to describe the eschatological victory of God over the chaotic forces of evil. Since this book there have been new discoveries, notably the Canaanite texts from UGARIT in 1929, and many other writers have pursued the Mesopotamian underpinnings and antecedents of parts of the Bible (see B. Childs [1960]; F. M. Cross [1973]; T. Jacobson [1976]; H. Gese [1970]; F. McCurley [1983]).

Gunkel's celebrated taxonomy of legend or saga, the starting point for much modern form criticism, is the introduction to his 1901 commentary on Genesis. He claimed that Genesis is largely made up of sage (sometimes translated "legend," sometimes "saga"), which he divided into two broad classes: primitive sagas "of the origin of the world and of the progenitors of the human race" and patriarchal sagas or "legends of the patriarchs of Israel" (13). It is principally the primitive legends that have a "mythical" character and may be "faded myths." But in general, Gunkel applied a very narrow and specific definition of myth and held that there are no myths in Genesis because monotheism is hostile to myths. Following H. Ewald (1843) and, ultimately, the brothers Grimm, Gunkel defined a myth as a story of the gods. Taken literally, then, no story of just one god qualifies as a myth. There must be two gods in a story for it to be a myth (15). For this reason Gunkel used legend or saga to describe the basic constituent unit of Genesis. And when he classified the sagas according to LITERARY form rather than content into historical, etiological, ethnological, etymological, ceremonial, and mixed, it should be noted that most of what he calls legends or sagas would have been called myths using the older and larger concept of myth that was in use from Eichhorn through Strauss. If Gunkel's definition of myth is accepted, then modern form criticism can be seen as diverging from myth studies because its material is non-mythic; but if a wider conception of myth is admitted, then form criticism is a modern extension and sophistication of nineteenth-century myth criticism.

In NT studies J. WEISS demonstrated in his 1892 work that the kingdom of God of which Jesus spoke was eschatological not historical, that Jesus understood it to stand outside our time and our earth, being instead one of the four "last things." In 1901 W. WREDE called the historical value of Mark into question, and these two developments had the effect of seriously weakening the historical consensus about the life of Jesus. The historical base seemed less sure, the mythological conception stronger.

Just as Wrede's work set the stage for Bultmann's History of the Synoptic Tradition, so also Weiss's argument set the stage for Bultmann's project of de-mythologizing first put forward in an essay on "NT and Mythology" in Offenbarung und Heilsgeschehen (1941) and restated in a series of lectures in 1951 published as Jesus Christ and Mythology (1958). Bultmann began with Weiss's work, pointing out that the "hope of Jesus and of the early Christian community was not fulfilled. The same world still exists and history continues. The course of history has refuted mythology" (14). More broadly, he said, "The whole conception of the world which is pre-supposed in the preaching of Jesus as in the NT generally is mythological; i.e., the conception of the world as being structured in three stories, heaven, earth and hell; the conception of the intervention of supernatural powers in the course of events; and the conception of miracles" (15).

Bultmann abandoned the narrow, technical definition of myth found in Gunkel and his followers and revived and reapplied a much older and broader conception of myth that has strong affinities with the Enlightenment view, as has been noted by R. Johnson (1974). Bultmann indeed defined the world of the NT as "mythological because it is different from the conception of the world which has been formed and developed by science since its inception in ancient Greece and which has been accepted by all modern men" (15). He sounded very much like Eichhorn or Strauss when he said, "Modern men take it for granted that the course of nature and of history, like their own inner life and their practical life, is nowhere interrupted by the intervention of supernatural powers" (16).

The question, then, for Bultmann was whether Jesus' preaching of the kingdom of God has any meaning or importance for modern human beings. Like critics in the Eichhorn tradition, he regarded mythology as a step away from the truth, not, as it is for Herder and those whose work followed, a step toward truth. Bultmann thought that since myth preserves and presents the particular world of a particular people at a particular time, and since the true meaning of Jesus' message is not local but universal, not historical but existential, we must "abandon the mythological conceptions precisely because we want to retain their deeper meaning." Thus Bultmann sought to strip away mythological elements to leave an existential kerygma, the true Christian preaching that is "a proclamation addressed not to the theoretical reason, but to the hearer as a self" (36). He contended that the essence of Christianity is in this kerygma, understood existentially, and that as a result we can dispense with the worldview of the Scriptures, which is "mythological and is therefore unacceptable to modern man whose thinking has been shaped by science and is therefore no longer mythological."

This line of argument has a simplicity and clarity about it reminiscent of the Enlightenment, of Eichhorn and Strauss. Like those critics before him, Bultmann has been elaborately and repeatedly answered. The problem with his view is essentially one of limits. How far can it be carried, and what will be the result? As one of Bultmann's most careful commentators puts it, "Just how irrelevant can the factual content of the gospel become without its ceasing to be a gospel?" (J. McQuarrie [1960] 20).

Bibliography: K. Barth, Protestant Thought in the Nineteenth Century (1947; ET 1972). G. L. Bauer, Hebräische Mythologie des alten und neuen Testaments mit Parallelen aus der Mythologie anderer Völker, vornehmlich der Griechen und Römer(1802). J. R. Beard, Voices of the Church in Reply to Dr. D. F. Strauss (1945). R. Bultmann, "NT and Mythology," Offenbarung und Heilsgeschehen (1941); Jesus Christ and Mythology (1958). E. Cassirer, Language and Myth (1946). T. K. Cheyne, Founders of OT Criticism: Biographical, Descriptive, and Critical Studies (1893). B. Childs, Myth and Reality in the OT (SBT 27, 1960). F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (1973). W. M. L. de Wette, A Critical and Historical Introduction to the Canonical Scriptures of the OT (1817, 1840^5; ET 1843). M. Douglas, "The Abominations of Leviticus," Purity and Danger: An Analysis of the Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (1966). J. G. Eichhorn, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1780–82); Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1804–27). M. Eliade, Myth and Reality (World Perspectives 31, 1964). H. Ewald, Geschichte des Volkes Israel bis Christus (1843). B. Feldman and R. Richardson, The Rise of Modern Mythology, 1660–1860 (1972). L. Feuerbach, The Essence of Christianity (1841). J. Frazer, Folk-Lore in the OT (1918). T. Gaster, Myth, Legend, and Custom in the OT: A Comparative Study with Chapters from Sir J. G. Frazier's Folklore in the OT (1969). H. Gese, Die Religionen Altsyriens, Altarabiens, und der Mandäer (1970). I. Goldziher, Mythology Among the Hebrews and Its Historical Development (1876; ET 1877). J. Grimm, Teutonic Mythology (4 vols., 1819–37; ET 1966). H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit: Eine Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung uber Gen 1 und Ap Joh 12 (1895); The Legends of Genesis (1901). J. E. Harrison, Themis: A Study of the Social Origins of Greek Religion (SSEA, 1912). C. Hartlich and W. Sachs, Der Ursprung des Mythosbegriffes in der modernen Bibelwissenschaft (1952). J. G. Herder, The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (2 vols., 1782–83; ET 1833). S. H. Hooke, Myth, Ritual, and Kingship (1958). T. Jacobsen, The Treasures of Darkness: A History of Mesopotamian Religion (1976). R. Johnson, The Origins of Demythologizing: Philosophy and Historiography in the Theology of R. Bultmann (1974). A. Lang, Myth, Ritual, and Religion (1887); The Making of Religion (1909^3). E. R. Leach, Genesis as Myth and Other Essays (Cape Editions 39, 1969); "The Legitimacy of Solomon," AES 7 (1966) 58-101. G. van der Leeuw, Religion in Essence and Manifestation (1967). L. Levy-Bruhl, Primitive Mentality (1922, ET 1923). C. Levi-Strauss, "The Structural Study of Myth," Myth: A Symposium (ed. T. A. Sebeok, 1958) 50-66. R. Lowth, The Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (1787). F. R. McCurley, Ancient Myths and Biblical Faith: Scriptural Transformations (1983). J. MacQuarrie, The Scope of Demythologizing: Bultmann and His Critics (1960). F. M. Müller, Comparative Mythology: An Essay (1909). A. Norton, Evidences of the Genuineness of the Gospels (3 vols., 1837–44). H. Paulus, Commentar ueber das Neue Testament (1800). P. Riceour, "La Symbolique du Mal," Philosophie de la Volunte, pt. 2, sec. 2, "Finitude et culpabilité" (1950). J. W. Rogerson, Myth in OT Interpretation (BZAW 134, 1974). E. S. Schaffer, "Kubla Khan" and the Fall of Jerusalem: The Mythological School in Biblical Criticism and Secular Literature (1975). W. Schmidt, Der Ursprung des Gottesidee: Eine historische-kritische und positive Studie (1926–55). A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (1906; ET 1910). D. F. Strauss, Das Leben Jesu: Kritisch bearbeitet (1835; ET 1846); A New Life of Jesus (1865). E. B. Tyler, Primitive Culture (1871). J. de Vries, The Study of Religion: A Historical Approach (1967). J. Weiss, Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1892; ET 1971). C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (1838). J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1878; ET 1885). W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret (1901; ET 1971).

R. D. RICHARDSON, JR.

MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES

(1980 to present)

The general study of myth and MYTHOLOGY has received much popular and academic attention in the last two decades of the twentieth century. While the public imagination was engaged by the B. Moyers interviews with J. Campbell and the resulting publication of The Power of Myth (1988), current scholarly analysis of myth is reflected in the introductory text by W. Doty (1986). One of the most influential and methodologically rigorous voices in myth studies since 1980 has been R. Segal, whose 1980 article remains an excellent survey of methodological approaches to the study of myth (see also A. Dundes [1984]). Current discussions of myth can also be found in T. Sienkewicz's 1997 annotated bibliography.

Since J. ROGERSON's Myth and OT Interpretation (1974), the most programmatic discussions of myth and the HB have been written by R. Oden (1987; 1992a; 1992b), B. Batto (1992), M. Smith (1994), and N. Wyatt (1996). Oden's articles in the ABD and a long chapter in his 1987 book offer a conscientiously methodological perspective for biblical scholars. Smith's article is also very helpful in surveying the issues of the identity of myth and the practice of "myth-making" in ancient Israel.

Significant book-length studies of myth and HB interpretation include works by F. McCurley (1983) and especially Batto, who attempts to demonstrate how "myth permeates virtually every level of the biblical tradition from the earliest to the latest" and that myth is "one of the chief mediums by which biblical writers did their theologizing" (1992, 1). Wyatt similarly calls for the recognition of "the pervasive mythological element in the HB" in his provocative book (1996, 423). He contrasts a mythological reading of the HB with the historicist perspective of much contemporary HB scholarship in his study's final chapter, "The Problem of a Biblical Mythology," in which he also explicitly addresses the nature of myth. B. Anderson (1994) revisits the issue of creation and mythopoeic dimensions of biblical faith from a theological perspective, and J. Levenson (1988) similarly uses mythological themes to address the theological issues of theodicy and divine omnipotence in the HB. The collected essays of H.-P. Müller (1991) should be noted for both exegetical and theological topics.

The majority of work from biblical scholars interested in myth is devoted to the relationship between ancient Near Eastern myth and the HB rather than to methodological or theological reflection. Taking a history-of-religion perspective (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) on the religion of ancient Israel, these studies usually trace the influence of Akkadian and Ugaritic myths (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE) on the HB (e.g., J. Bailey [1987]; W. Lambert [1988]; D. Bodi [1991]; Smith [1990]). The most prolific source of such studies has been F. M. CROSS, who has directed studies on mythological topics by E. Mullen (1980), H. Wallace (1985), R. Hendel (1987), W. Propp (1987), P. Day (1988), C. L. Seow (1989), and H. Page (1996). Mullen surveys the mythological image of the divine council in Canaanite and Israelite texts, while other authors analyze specific biblical texts. Page explores the mythological traditions found in Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28.

Much of the discussion of myth and the Bible has naturally centered on Genesis 1–11, with commentaries (C. Westermann [1974; ET 1984]), text studies (Wallace), and comparative perspectives (Dundes [1988]). The relation of these narratives to other ancient Near Eastern cosmogonies and anthropogonies has received much attention (see R. Hess and D. Tsumura [1994]; Batto). R. Clifford has written an important book (1994) and edited another with J. Collins (1992) on this topic. Mythological elements in the psalms have also received consideration (e.g., C. Petersen [1982]). The most influential of the various studies of Yahweh's conflict with primordial forces is the work by J. Day (1985; see also C. Kloos [1986]). N. Forsyth (1987) traces this theme into early Christian literature.

Other sections of the HB have also been considered by scholars interested in myth. Oden calls for the recognition of myth in Genesis beyond chapter 11. The focus of Wyatt's previously mentioned book is on Canaanite and Israelite mythological traditions of kingship (see also T. Mettinger [1987]). The discussion concerning the imagery and mythological allusions in Daniel 7 are summarized by J. Collins in his Daniel commentary (1993) and in his 1993 article, and G. Fuchs (1993) discusses mythological elements in Job. STRUCTURALISM is now a common literary tool of biblical exegesis, but few practitioners consider the mythological quality of the biblical texts. The rarer application of structuralist methods to biblical texts categorized by the authors as myth can be seen in E. Leach and D. Aycock (1983), as well as in the more recent book on Genesis by S. Kunin (1995).

Many studies of ancient Near Eastern deities have been produced since 1980. T. Frymer-Kensky (1992) traces the transformation of goddess traditions into the HB (see also U. Winter [1986]), and the goddess Asherah has received special attention as a possible consort of Yahweh in recent monographs. These and other studies are referenced in K. van der Toorn et al. (1995). Less work has been done on myth in Second Temple Jewish literature. An important exception to this tendency is the work of H. Kvanvig (1988), which explores the Mesopotamian background of both the Enoch figure and the Son of man traditions (cf. M. Barker's [1992] more daring speculations).

In comparison to HB studies, current NT research has exhibited little interest in mythological influences on the NT or the role of myth in biblical THEOLOGY. The debate over R. BULTMANN's demythologizing program has largely subsided (see B. Jaspert [1991]) and the word myth has become increasingly conflicted as scholars turn to discussions of narrative, metaphor, and ideology (see IDEOLOGICAL CRITICISM) rather than mythology. B. Mack (1988) describes the Gospel of Mark as a myth since it functions as a social group's foundational document, but NT studies generally avoid using the term in reference to the Gospels (cf. Dundes [1990]). Similarly, NT scholars have largely neglected the use of myth in Revelation since J. Court's 1979 book, but attention from A. Y. Collins (1981), J. van Henten (1994), and J. Roloff (1993) should be noted. The relevance of myth to eschatology and biblical theology is most fully addressed by T. Schmidt (1996). Finally, the importance of the essays in volumes edited by H. Schmid (1988) and K. Kertelge (1990) should be recognized for their attention to exegetical and theological topics in the NT.

Bibliography: B. W. Anderson, From Creation to New Creation: OT Perspectives (OBT, 1994). J. Bailey, "Initiation and the Primal Woman in Gilgamesh and Genesis 2–3," JBL 89 (1987) 137-50. M. Barker, The Great Angel: A Study of Israel's Second God (1992). B. F. Batto, Slaying the Dragon: Mythmaking in the Biblical Tradition (1992). D. Bodi, The Book of Ezekiel and the Poem of Erra (OBO 104, 1991). R. J. Clifford, Creation Accounts in the Ancient Near East and in the Bible (CBQMS 26, 1994). R. J. Clifford and J. J. Collins (eds.), Creation in the Biblical Traditions (CBQMS 24, 1992). A. Y. Collins, "Myth and History in the Book of Revelation," Traditions in Transformation: Turning Points in Biblical Faith (ed. B. Halpern and J. Levenson, 1981) 337-403. J. J. Collins, Daniel: A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (Hermeneia, 1993); "Stirring up the Great Sea: The Religio-historical Background of Daniel 7," The Book of Daniel in the Light of New Findings (ed. A. S. van der Woude, BETL 106, 1993) 121-36. J. Court, Myth and History in the Book of Revelation (1979). J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the OT (UCOP 35, 1985). P. L. Day, An Adversary in Heaven: śāṭān in the HB (HSM 43, 1988). W. G. Doty, Mythography: The Study of Myths and Rituals (1986). A. Dundes (ed.), Sacred Narrative: Readings in the Theory of Myth (1984); (ed.), The Flood Myth (1988); "The Hero Pattern and the Life of Jesus," In Quest of the Hero (ed. R. A. Segal, 1990) 179-223. N. Forsyth, The Old Enemy: Satan and the Combat Myth (1987). T. Frymer-Kensky, In the Wake of the Goddesses: Women, Culture, and the Biblical Transformation of Pagan Myth (1992). G. Fuchs, Mythos und Hiobdichtung: Aufnahme und Umdeutung altorientalischer Vorstellungen (1993). R. Hendel, "Of Demigods and the Deluge: Toward an Interpretation of Genesis 6:1-4," JBL 106 (1987) 13-26; The Epic of the Patriarch: The Jacob Cycle and the Narrative Traditions of Canaan and Israel (HSM 42, 1987). J. W. van Henten, "Dragon Myth and Imperial Ideology in Rev 12–13," SBLSP 1994, 496-515. R. S. Hess and D. T. Tsumura (eds.), I Studied Inscriptions from Before the Flood: Ancient Near Eastern, Literary, and Linguistic Approaches to Genesis 1–11 (Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 4, 1994). T. Holtz, "Mythos. IV. Neutestamentlich," TRE 23 (1994) 644-50. B. Jaspert (ed.), Bibel und Mythos: Fünfzig Jahre nach R. Bultmanns Entmythologisierungsprogramm (1991). K. Kertelge (ed.), Metaphorik und Mythos im Neuen Testament (QD 126, 1990). C. Kloos, YHWH's Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (1986). S. D. Kunin, The Logic of Incest: A Structuralist Analysis of Hebrew Mythology (JSOTSup 185, 1995). H. Kvanvig, Roots of Apocalyptic: The Mesopotamian Background of the Enoch Figure and of the Son of Man (WMANT 61, 1988). W. G. Lambert, "OT Mythology in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context," VTSup 40 (1988) 126-43. E. Leach and D. Aycock, Structuralist Interpretations of Biblical Myth (1983). J. D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (1988). F. R. McCurley, Ancient Myths and Biblical Faith: Scriptural Transformations (1983). B. L. Mack, A Myth of Innocence: Mark and Christian Origins (1988). T. N. D. Mettinger, King and Messiah (ConBOT 8, 1987). R. H. Moye, "In the Beginning: Myth and History in Genesis and Exodus," JBL 109 (1990) 577-98. E. T. Mullen, Jr., The Divine Council in Canaanite and Early Hebrew Literature (HSM 24, 1980). H.-P. Müller, Mythos—Kerygma—Wahrheit: Gesammelte Aufsätze zum AT in seiner Umwelt und zur biblischen Theologie (BZAW 200, 1991). R. A. Oden, Jr., The Bible Without Theology: The Theological Tradition and Alternatives to It (1987); "Mythology," ABD (1992a) 4:946-56; "Myth in the OT," ABD (1992b) 4:956-60. H. R. Page, Jr., The Myth of Cosmic Rebellion: A Study of Its Reflexes in Ugaritic und Biblical Literature (VTSup 65, 1996). C. Petersen, Mythos im Alten Testament: Bestimmung des Mythosbegriffs und Untersuchung der Mythis den Elemente den Psalmen (BZAW 157, 1982). W. H. Propp, Water in the Wilderness: A Biblical Motif and Its Mythological Background (HSM 40, 1987). J. Roloff, "Myth in the Revelation of John," The Revelation of John (1993) 142-45; H. H. Schmid (ed.), Mythos und Rationalität (1988). T. Schmidt, Das Ende der Zeit: Mythos und Metaphorik als Fundamente einer Hermeneutik biblischer Eschatologie (BBB 109, 1996). W. H. Schmidt, "Mythos. III. Alttestamentlich," TRE 23 (1994) 624-44. R. A. Segal, "In Defense of Mythology: The History of Modern Theories of Myth," Annals of Scholarship 1 (1980) 3-49; (ed.), Theories of Myth: From Ancient Israel and Greece to Freud, Jung, Campbell, and Lévi-Strauss (6 vols., 1996–). C.-L. Seow, Myth, Drama, and the Politics of David's Dance (HSM 44, 1989). T. Sienkewicz, Theories of Myth: An Annotated Bibliography (1997). M. S. Smith, The Early History of God: Yahweh and the Other Deities in Ancient Israel (1990); "Mythology and Myth-making in Ugaritic and Israelite Literatures," Ugarit and the Bible (ed. G. J. Brooke et al., UBL 11, 1994) 293-341. K. van der Toorn et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible (1995). H. Wallace, The Eden Narrative (HSM 32, 1985). C. Westermann, Genesis 1–11: A Commentary (BKAT 1 [1974–82; ET 1984). U. Winter, Frau und Göttin: Exegetische und ikonographische Studien zum weiblichen Gottesbild im alten Israel und in dessen Umwelt (OBO 53, 1986). N. Wyatt, Myths of Power: A Study of Royal Myth and Ideology in Ugaritic and Biblical Tradition (UBL 13, 1996).

N. H. WALLS

N

NACHMANIDES (MOSES BEN NACHMAN GERSONDI—RAMBAN) (1194–1270)

N. was born in Gerona in 1194 into a family of notable rabbis (his grandfather was Simeon ben Zemach Duran). N. served as the rabbi of Gerona, which at that time was the most important center of Jewish mysticism (Kabbalah). Later he became the chief rabbi of all of Catalonia. In this capacity he represented the Jewish community of Aragon against the convert Pablo Christiani in the Christian disputation of 1263, which led to his expulsion from Aragon the following year. In 1267 he settled in Acco, where he died in 1270.

N. was a noted scholar of TALMUD, medicine, and philosophy in addition to Bible. His early writings were on the Talmud and include the Milchamot Adonai (a defense of Alfasi's legal decisions against Zerahiah Ha-Levi of Gerona's criticisms), talmudic glosses, and numerous responsa.) He was noted as a conservative defender of past sages. In philosophy he was one of the major opponents of MAIMONIDES' views in The Guide of the Perplexed during the Maimonidean controversy (1180–1240); however, he never denied Maimonides' personal piety.

N.'s later works consisted of devotional essays and biblical commentaries. His major devotional works were the "Iggeret Ha-Kodesh" (a letter on the holiness of marriage) and the "Torat Ha-Adam" (an essay on Judaism's teaching about death and mourning). His linear commentaries on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), composed at the end of his life in the land of Israel, are his most important contribution to Jewish culture. In them he synthesized his knowledge of classical rabbinic aggadah, philosophy, philology, and Jewish mysticism. In fact, he was the first major rabbinic commentator to use KABBALAH.

His commentaries exhibit the following characteristics: (1) He made frequent, usually critical, references to the commentaries of RASHI (Shelomo ben Isaac, 1040–1105, France) and A. IBN EZRA (1089–1164, Spain) and was particularly critical of the latter's opposition to Kabbalah. (2) He criticized the tendency of Maimonides and his disciples to interpret Scripture allegorically, in particular arguing that miracles are events that defy any natural explanation. At the same time he often presented allegorical interpretations, e.g., claiming that Jacob and Esau are the nations of Israel and Edom, that Edom is Rome, and that the battle of Moses and Joshua against the Amalekites points to the war that Israel would wage under the leadership of the Messiah ben Joseph when the Messiah ben David comes in 1358. (3) He argued that the three basic principles of Judaism are creation out of nothing, divine omniscience, and divine providence. He also claimed that R. Simlai's assertion that Scripture contains 613 commandments was merely a homiletic device. (4) He criticized Jewish philosophers who tended to deprecate physical pleasure, arguing that this view has its source in Greek philosophy and is totally contrary to biblical and rabbinic tradition and that revelation is a more reliable guide to truth and correct behavior than is reason. (5) He believed in both the reincarnation of the soul and the physical resurrection in the messianic age.

Representative of N.'s commentaries is his treatment of the story of Joseph's being sold into slavery by his brothers. Jacob had sent Joseph to find his brothers in Shechem and to see what they were doing. According to Gen 37:15, when Joseph was wandering about "a man found him." N. comments, "[The biblical text] says that [Joseph] had wandered away from his path and did not know where he was going. He entered a field because he was looking for [his brothers] in a pasture. Then Scripture elaborates at length on this [event] to tell us the many proper reasons that [Joseph] had to return [home]. However, he bore all [of this hardship] out of respect for his father. [The passage] also teaches us that the [Divine] decree is true and [human] industry is false, for when The Holy One, Blessed Be He, indicated the way, He did not make known to [Joseph] that He was leading him into the power of [his brothers]. This is what our rabbinic sages meant when they said that these men are angels. It was not for nothing that all of this story was told. Rather, it makes known to us that the council of the Lord is established."

Rashi and Ibn Ezra independently discussed who the "man" was. Ibn Ezra argued that the plain meaning (peshat) of the text is that the man is a fellow traveler in the region. Rashi provided a homiletical interpretation (derash) that identified the man as the angel Gabriel. Rashbam (Samuel ben Meir, Rashi's grandson, 12th cent., France) asked why this story occurs at all, answering that this tale is inserted to teach us something about Joseph's character. Aware of his brothers' dislike for him, Joseph could not have been anxious to find them, and when they failed to be in Shechem where

Jacob said they would be, he could have decided that he had fulfilled his duty and returned home. However, he was so diligent in his obedience that he went out of his way to find his brothers and even asked a stranger if he knew where they were.

N. alluded to these three comments, agreeing with both Rashbam and Rashi in opposition to Ibn Ezra and adding to Rashbam's explanation of why the story is included in the text. It is this explanation at the end of the quotation that is the distinctive part of N.'s commentary. He turned the verse into a theological affirmation of his understanding of the doctrine of divine providence: God, through the intermediacy of the angels, controls all human events. Human beings make choices, but these decisions do not alter the course of human history. No matter how diligent people are in pursuing their own ends, God's will always prevails.

Works: Perush 'al Ha-Torah (1480; included in Mikra'ot Gedolot [1951]), commentary on the Pentateuch; Perush Iyyob (in Biblia Rabbinica, 1517, 1721–24), commentary on Job; Milchamot Adonai (1552); Milchamot Chobah (1710; LT by Wagenseil, 1681; Hebrew ed. by M. Steinschneider, 1860); Perush Shir Ha-Shirim (1764, 1857), commentary on Song of Songs; Chiddushey Ramban (1826); Torah Adonai Temimah (ed. A. Jellinek, 1853); The Writings and Discourses/Ramban (Nachmanides) (ed. C. B. Chavel, 1963; ET by C. B. Chavel, 1978); Gates of Reward (ET by C. B. Chavel, 1983); Law of the Eternal is Perfect (ET by C. B. Chavel, 1983).

Bibliography: J. Dan, Jewish Mysticism and Jewish Ethics (1986). I. Epstein, Studies in the Communal Life of the Jews of Spain (1968). E. L. Greenstein, "Medieval Bible Commentaries," Back to the Sources: Reading the Classic Jewish Texts (ed. Barry W. Holtz, 1984) 213-60. G. Scholem, Ursprung und Anfänge der Kabbalah (1962); Ha-kabbalah be-Gerona (ed. J. Ben-Shlomo, 1964); Kabbalah (1974). D. J. Silver, Maimonidean Criticism and the Maimonidean Controvery, 1180–1240 (1965). F. E. Talmadge (ed.), Disputation and Dialogue: Readings in the Jewish–Christian Encounter (1975). I. Twersky (ed.), Rabbi M. N. (Ramban): Explorations in His Religious and Literary Virtuosity (TS 1, 1983).

N. SAMUELSON

NAHUM, BOOK OF

Interpretation of the book of Nahum through the centuries has focused on the need to trust God in the presence of tyranny. Yahweh remains a dependable refuge for the people of Israel in the face of national injustice, whether at the hands of Assyria (see ASSYRIOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), Babylon, or Rome.

The opening verses of the book witness to the phenomenon of what N. SARNA has called "inner biblical exegesis" (see M. Fishbane [1988] vii-viii; see also INNER-BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION). Original terms of compassion from the so-called attribute formula in Exod 34:6-7 are here transformed into terms of war: "who maintains kindness [nōṣēr]" becomes "who rages [nôtēr] against his enemies"; "assuages anger" becomes "long of anger"; and "great in kindness" becomes "mighty in power" (Fishbane [1977] 280-81). In short, the book of Nahum is a reinterpretation of a central text from the Torah in a moment of need concerning Israel's national security. Though Yahweh is merciful and slow to anger, this time patience toward those who flout Yahweh has run out.

The Qumran pesher 4QpNah (4Q169) interpreted the text of Nahum as a prophecy of impending disaster against the community's enemies, in which the foes of old are identified with contemporary nations (see M. Horgan [1979] 158-59). One Greek tradition of Tobit 14:4 (Codex Sinaiticus), which has its fictional setting in ancient Nineveh, cited the prediction of the fall of Nineveh by Nahum (elsewhere Jonah) that the writer saw fulfilled at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar and Ahasuerus (both names used anachronistically). This reading of Nahum as prophecy from an earlier time that was subsequently fulfilled appears also in Josephus (Ant. Jud. 9.11.3). The Aramaic TARGUM of Nahum emphasizes God's faithfulness toward God's people while expecting the ultimate destruction of the nations who have devastated Israel and its Temple. Nahum is here presented as later than Jonah, which reflects the Hebrew ordering of the individual books within the Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets).

The book of Nahum is quoted only once in the NT (Rom 10:15; cf. Nah 1:15, Isa 52:7). Among the church fathers the book is cited infrequently: TERTULLIAN (twice), CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA (once), ORIGEN (four times), EUSEBIUS (eight times), Epiphanius (c. 315–403; five times), CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA (twice), Hippolytus Romanus (c. 170–c. 236; twice), MELITO OF SARDIS (once), and CHRYSOSTOM (twice). JEROME presented a spiritual interpretation in which the book predicts the certain destruction of those who reject God and remain outside the church (see J. Kelly [1975] 163-66).

The book of Nahum received relatively little attention within Jewish interpretation as well: eight references in the Babylonian TALMUD and thirty-one in MIDRASH Rabbah. The interpretation of the medieval exegetes RASHI, A. IBN EZRA, and D. KIMHI focuses on the judgment of God on Israel's national enemies.

Like the mainstream of Jewish exegesis before him, LUTHER's Lectures on Nahum (1525) assume a historical approach. Nahum is taken as a contemporary of Isaiah who predicted Judah's suffering under Sennacherib, the preservation of a righteous remnant, and the coming destruction of Nineveh. Thus Nahum (meaning "consolation" or "comfort") brought comfort to God's people in time of need. Few interpreters have expressed the essential message of Nahum more clearly than Luther when he wrote: "The book teaches us to trust God and to believe, especially when we despair of all human help, human powers, and counsel, that the Lord stands by those who are His, shields His own against all attacks of the enemy, be they ever so powerful" (see W. Maier [1959] 86). Although CALVIN's commentary is more detailed, it also is theological in orientation.

The book of Nahum was singled out by R. LOWTH (De sacra poesi Hebraeorum [1763] 281) for its aesthetic brilliance. With the subsequent development of historical criticism in the nineteenth century, the question of the historical and geographic origin of the book began to be viewed as the key to its interpretation. Supposed reference to the invasion of Sennacherib and linguistic ties to Isaiah led some scholars to posit a date late in the reign of Hezekiah. But the discovery that Thebes fell to Assyria in 663 BCE (Nah 3:8-10) led most critical scholars to argue for a date of composition closer to the actual fall of Nineveh in 612 BCE. The discovery of what appeared to be a partial acrostic poem in 1:3-7 by a German pastor, G. Frohnmeyer, subsequently attracted attention within the scholarly community, particularly when H. GUNKEL (1893) argued that this "broken acrostic" was added to the book by a postexilic editor. Like many other texts in the HB, Nahum was now regarded as composite.

Although many interpreters continued to read the book as witnessing to God's just rule in history, others noted the non-religious character of the POETRY in chaps. 2–3 and the prophet's failure to address the sins of Judah. Some scholars began to judge Nahum as a nationalistic prophet, perhaps even allied with the "false prophets" condemned by Jeremiah. Such views continue to be held in some circles.

In 1907 P. HAUPT argued that the book was not PROPHECY at all but the festival liturgy composed for the celebration of the Day of Nikanor on the 13th of Adar, 161 BCE. Although the Maccabean date was subsequently rejected, the idea that the book was a festival liturgy had profound influence in academic circles. In 1926 P. HUMBERT argued that the book was a prophetic liturgy used at the new year festival in Jerusalem in 612 BCE to celebrate the fall of Nineveh. In 1946 A. Haldar argued that it was the work of cultic prophets who used the language of ritual combat in the new year festival as a curse on Israel's political enemies, the Assyrians. Subsequent studies placed the book within the sphere of international politics in pre-monarchic Israel, as reflected in the larger tradition of oracles against foreign nations in the prophetic literature. Perhaps the most attractive hypothesis along these lines was made in 1975 by J. Watts, who suggested that the book of Nahum, along with Habakkuk and Obadiah, was a liturgical expression of foreign prophecies that was part of the "Day of Yahweh" section of the Royal Zion Festival in ancient Jerusalem. J. Eaton has shown that no simple distinction exists between what some have called "cultic" and other modes of prophecy in ancient Israel.

Although a date close to the actual fall of Nineveh in 612 BCE is frequently assumed, an earlier date is certainly possible. If the revolt of Manasseh against Assyria cited in 2 Chronicles 33 is not to be dismissed as a figment of the author's imagination, the situation as it existed in Judah c. 652–648 BCE fits the occasion rather well. The basis for such a revolt on Manasseh's part would have been the conviction that Assyria's days were numbered. The book of Nahum presents precisely that message and may have been used to persuade the Judean king to take part in such a revolt—the assurance that Assyria's fall was certain, in fact that it was ordained of God the Divine Warrior. The book would then have taken on deeper meaning as part of the theological basis for the subsequent resurgence of Judean independence under King Josiah, especially after the death of Asshurbanipal in c. 630 BCE. The final destruction of Nineveh in 612 would have been the ultimate fulfillment of this prophecy and would thus explain the book's inclusion in the CANON.

The study of Nahum in relation to holy war in ancient Israel has raised new questions. K. Cathcart (1975) and D. Christensen (1975, 166-175) make a distinction between holy war as a military institution and the "war of Yahweh," which reflects a cultic event within the worship experience of the people of ancient Israel during the preexilic era (i.e., before the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem in 587 BCE). This distinction points the way toward an important new impulse in the study of Nahum—namely, the shift from attempts to recover the historical setting that produced the book to a focus on the received literary text itself within the canonical process that produced the Book of the Twelve as one of the four primary sections of the latter prophets (see J. Nogalski [1993]).

The acrostic hymn in Nahum 1, which is based on at least the first half of the Hebrew alphabet, has apparently been adapted to a new purpose by the author of the book, perhaps to form a cipher (code) from the sequence of letters and/or other opening elements, as A. van der Woude has suggested (1977). This cipher contains a summary of the meaning of the book: "I am the exalted Yahweh; and [I am] in the presence of sin. In a flood [I am] bringing a full end completely" (see Christensen [1988] 51-58).

Later studies suggest that Nahum is to be read in conjunction with the foreign nation oracles of Isaiah 13–23 in particular. The first heading maśśā' Nînĕwēh (Nah 1:1*a*) may well be an invitation to associate the book with this Isaiah material. The book may also be interpreted in relation to the wider oral and literary traditions of HB prophecy (see R. Coggins [1982] 79-85). Moreover, as B. Childs has argued, its final form testifies to God's ultimate triumph over all foes. Traditional critical assessments miss the authoritative hermeneutical role of this "canonical shaping" (see Childs [1979] 440-46).

In its poetic form the book of Nahum has no superior within the prophetic literature of the HB. The vivid and rapid succession of images gives it a peculiar power. It delineates the swift and unerring execution of divine fury against the merciless foes of God and of God's people. At the same time it also points rather sharply to God as the sure refuge and security for those who obey and trust God. Careful analysis of the poetry in the book reveals an elegant literary structure. The best way to explain its remarkable structural symmetry is to posit musical influence (see Christensen [1989] 159-69). The Hebrew text bears the mark of original musical composition and performance within an ancient Israelite liturgical setting; thus it is likely that Nahum was a central prophet functioning within the Temple cult in Jerusalem. The book belongs to the so-called oracles against foreign nations and as such was probably motivated by political aims. In its present canonical form it is closely related to the book of Habakkuk; in fact, the two books may be outlined as a single literary unit as follows:

A—Hymn of theophany (Nahum 1)
  B—Taunt song against Nineveh (Nahum 2–3)
    X—The problem of theodicy (Habakkuk 1)
  B′—Taunt song against the "wicked one" (Habakkuk 2)
A′—Hymn of theophany (Habakkuk 3)

Nahum is primarily a book about God's justice, not about human vengeance, hatred, and military conquest; it is best read as a complement to the book of Jonah. The book of Jonah may be read as a midrashic reflection on Exod 34:6 and God's steadfast love (hesed), whereas the book of Nahum reflects Exod 34:7 and God's wrath. In short, Nahum focuses on the "dark side" of God, while Jonah portrays God's mercy and compassion toward the same wicked city. Both aspects are essential for an understanding of the divine nature.

Bibliography: B. J. Bamberger, "The Changing Image of the Prophet in Jewish Thought," Interpreting the Prophetic Tradition (ed. H. M. Orlinsky, 1969) 301-23. J. Calvin, Commentaries on the Twelve Minor Prophets (1950) 4:183-312. K. Cathcart, Nahum in the Light of Northwest Semitic (BibOr 26, 1973); "Treaty-curses and the Book of Nahum," CBQ 35 (1973) 179-87; "The Divine Warrior and the War of Yahweh in Nahum," Biblical Studies in Contemporary Thought (ed. M. W. Ward, 1975). B. S. Childs, Introduction to the OT as Scripture (1979) 440-46. D. L. Christensen, Transformations of the War Oracle in OT Prophecy: Studies in the Oracles Against the Nations (HDR 3, 1975) 166-75; "The Acrostic of Nahum Once Again: A Prosodic Analysis of Nahum 1, 1-10," ZAW 99 (1987) 409-15; "The Book of Nahum: The Question of Authorship Within the Canonical Process," JETS 31 (1988) 51-58; "Nahum," Harper's Bible Commentary (ed. J. L. Mays, 1988) 736-38; "The Book of Nahum as a Liturgical Composition: A Prosodic Analysis," JETS 32 (1989) 159-69 R. J. Coggins, "An Alternative Prophetic Tradition?" Israel's Prophetic Tradition: Essays in Honour of P. R. Ackroyd (FS, ed. R. J. Coggins et al., 1982) 77-94. J. H. Eaton, Vision in Worship: The Relation of Prophecy and Liturgy in the OT (1981) 14-21. M. Fishbane, "Torah and Tradition," Tradition and Theology in the OT (ed. D. A. Knight, 1977) 275-300; Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (1988). F. O. García-Treto, "The Book of Nahum," NIB (1996) 7:591-619. H. Gunkel, "Nahum 1," ZAW 13 (1893) 223-44. A. Haldar, Studies in the Book of Nahum (1947). P. Haupt, "Eine alttestamentliche Festliturgie für den Nikanortag," ZDMG 61 (1907) 275-97. S. Hieronymi, Comentarii in Prophetas Minores (CCSL, 1970). M. P. Horgan, Pesharim: Qumran Interpretation of Biblical Books (CBQMS 8, 1979). P. Humbert, "Le problème du livre de Nahoum," RHPR 12 (1932) 1-15. J. N. D. Kelly, Jerome (1975) 163-66. M. Luther, Lectures on the Minor Prophets (Luther's Works, vol. 18, 1975). W. A. Maier, The Book of Nahum: A Commentary (1959). J. Mann, The Bible as Read and Preached in the Old Synagogue (1966). N. D. Nogalski, "The Redactional Shaping of Nahum 1 for the Book of the Twelve," Among the Prophets (ed. P. Davies and D. Clines, JSOTSup 144, 1993) 193-202; Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217, 1993); Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218, 1993). R. Patterson, "A Literary Look at Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah," Grace Theological Journal 11 (1990) 17-27. P. E. Pusey (ed.), Cyrilli Archiepiscopi Alexandrini, In XII Prophetas (1868). J. J. M. Roberts, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (OTL, 1991). W. Rudolph, Micha–Nahum–Habakkuk–Zephania (KAT 13, 3, 1975). H. W. F. Saggs, "Nahum and the fall of Nineveh," JTS 20 (1969) 220-25. K. Seybold, Profane Prophetie: Studien zum Buch Nahum (SBS 135, 1989); Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephanja (Zürcher Bibelkommentare, 1991). H. N. Sprenger, Theodori Mopsuesteni Commentarius in XII Prophetas (1977). M. Sweeney, "Concerning the Structure and Generic Character of the Book of Nahum," ZAW 104 (1992) 364-77. A. van der Wal, Nahum, Habakkuk: A Classified Bibliography (1988). J. D. W. Watts, The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (CBC, 1975). A. S. van der Woude, "The Book of Nahum: A Letter Written in Exile," OTS 20 (1977) 108-26.

D. L. CHRISTENSEN

NARRATIVE CRITICISM

Narrative criticism focuses on stories in biblical literature and attempts to read these stories with insights drawn from the secular field of modern LITERARY criticism. The method is eclectic, drawing from such related fields as STRUCTURALISM and RHETORICAL CRITICISM, with the goal of determining the effects the stories are expected to have on their audiences.

Narrative critics grant that biblical stories may function referentially as records of significant history but insist that they also function poetically to fire the imagination, provoke repentance, inspire worship, and so forth. An oft-cited metaphor suggests that historical criticism treats biblical narratives as windows that enable readers to learn something about another time and place, while narrative criticism treats these same texts as mirrors that invite audience participation in the creation of meaning. For the narrative critic, texts shape the way readers understand themselves and their present circumstances.

Narrative criticism is also viewed as compatible with READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM, although it is distinct from this discipline as well. Typically, reader-response methods focus on ways in which interpretation of a text may be shaped to fit the interests or circumstances of diverse readers. Without denying these interpretative possibilities, narrative criticism attempts to determine how various signals within a text guide readers in deciding what the text means. In practice the two approaches often appear to be in conflict, but the distinction is primarily one of degree and emphasis. Only the most extreme reader-response critic would maintain that texts offer no guidance for interpretation, and only the most extreme narrative critic would deny that individual readers make contributions to the interpretative process.

A common paradigm that clarifies these distinctions describes historical criticism as "author-oriented," reader-response criticism as "audience-oriented," and narrative criticism as "text-oriented." The latter orientation is evident in two key constructs of narrative criticism: the "implied author" (or author as known from the text) and the "implied reader" (or audience presupposed by the text).

Narrative criticism seeks to interpret texts with reference to their implied authors rather than with reference to their actual, historical authors. By "implied author," narrative critics mean the perspective from which the work appears to have been written, a perspective that must be reconstructed by readers on the basis of what they find in the narrative. In secular studies the concept of implied authors was first developed by critics who wished to interpret stories without reference to anything extrinsic to the text itself. They claimed that biographical information concerning the author's agenda or personality should not be imposed on the story. Thus modern readers may know that Jonathan Swift was concerned with the relations of Protestants and Catholics in Ireland, but since this issue is not explicitly addressed in Gulliver's Travels the meaning of that work should not be circumscribed by so limited an application. In fact, in literary studies a "classic" is by definition a work that continues to be meaningful in times and places that were not originally envisioned by the historical author.

The concept of implied authors is significant for interpreting works that have multiple authors or that are anonymous. Even a work that has no real author—such as a tale that developed over a period of time as it was passed down from generation to generation—can be studied according to the perspective of its implied author. Regardless of the process through which a narrative comes into being, it will always evince particular values, beliefs, and perceptions that can be described as representative of its implied author. For biblical narrative critics, then, the identification of various source documents (J, E, D, P) that were eventually woven together to form the book of Genesis is largely irrelevant. Narrative critics are not interested in discerning the historical reliability or theological agenda of source strata that lie behind the text but in determining the effect that the text as it now stands has on readers.

To be more precise, narrative criticism seeks to determine the expected effects of stories on implied readers without taking into account all of the possible effects that they may have on actual readers. The concept of implied readers parallels that of implied authors. Implied readers are those who actualize the potential for meaning in texts, who respond to texts in ways consistent with the expectations ascribed to their implied authors. This approach often defines meaning with less specificity than a historical concern for how a document was intended to affect its original audience. If the original readers of Gulliver's Travels were intended to draw lessons from the story regarding a specific crisis, the implied readers are expected to draw lessons appropriate to analogous crises in their own situation, to discern how the story's satirical message concerning the foolishness of war applies to them. Thus narrative criticism is generally more open to polyvalence (plurality of meaning) than is historical criticism, although the idea of implied readers places limits on this concept. An interpretation of Swift's story that failed to regard it as a satire and understood it instead as a literal historical report would lie outside the range of what would be expected for its implied readers.

A common misunderstanding of narrative criticism holds that the discipline somehow privileges the perspective of implied readers such that expected readings are "right" and unexpected readings "wrong." This is not necessarily true. Most narrative critics would grant that texts may legitimately come to affect people in unexpected ways. The reception of Gulliver's Travels as an entertaining children's story probably constitutes an unexpected reading, but few critics would want to say children are wrong to enjoy the story at a level other than that on which it was intended to be received. Likewise, many Christians will defend christological interpretations of OT texts as valid unexpected readings. The point in distinguishing expected and unexpected readings is to increase the self-awareness of the interpreter. The concept of implied readers is a heuristic construct that allows critics to limit the subjectivity of their analysis by distinguishing between their own responses to a narrative and those that the text appears to invite. Thus the textually constructed implied reader may serve a function analogous to that of a control group in a scientific experiment. Readers may compare their own responses to a text with those that seem to be expected of its implied readers and then seek to explain any divergences.

In exploring the expected effects of texts on their implied readers, narrative critics make some assumptions about a normative process of reading. They assume, for instance, that the narrative is to be read sequentially and completely with all of its parts being related to the work as a whole. Thus the expected effects of the biblical story of David and Goliath (1 Samuel 17) cannot be determined by considering the passage as an isolated pericope but only by considering the role the passage plays in the entire narrative. Readers may also be assumed to desire consistency and to make connections necessary to resolve apparent tensions within a text in favor of the most consistent interpretation.

A normative process of reading also assumes that readers know certain things. To determine the effects that Matthew's Gospel is expected to have on its readers we must assume that these readers know what a Pharisee is, what a centurion does, how much a denarius is worth, and so forth. On the other hand, the determination of the expected effects of a work is often contingent upon assuming the readers do not know certain things. Readers of Mark's Gospel, for instance, are not expected to have read the Gospel of Matthew, and, therefore, the implied readers of Mark's Gospel do not think of JESUS as one who has been born of a virgin.

In the same vein, narrative criticism interprets stories from the perspective of readers who accept the beliefs and values that undergird those stories. Normative reading involves an implicit contract by which readers agree to accept the dynamics of the story world that are established by the implied author. If a story features talking animals or flying spaceships, readers are expected to suspend their disbelief and to accept that, in this story, that is the way things are. In the story world of the Bible, God speaks audibly from heaven, fantastic miracles are commonplace, and human beings interact freely with spiritual creatures like angels and demons. Narrative criticism is not interested in questioning the accuracy of such reports or in determining what historical occurrences might have inspired the tales. Rather, the expected effects of the stories can only be determined if we adopt the perspective of readers who accept these and other elements of the story as real, at least as "real" within the world of the story. Since narrative criticism demands that texts be interpreted from the faith perspective their readers are assumed to evince, narrative critics may be required to focus their imagination in the opposite direction of that required for historical critics. Whereas historical critics may be expected to suspend faith commitments temporarily in order to interpret texts from the perspective of objective, disinterested historians, narrative critics may be expected to adopt faith commitments temporarily in order to determine how texts are expected to affect their implied readers.

In practice narrative criticism is a complex process that calls for attention to numerous literary dynamics. For convenience narrative critics usually speak of stories as consisting of events, characters, and settings. They also pay a great deal of attention to what is called the "discourse" of a narrative—that is, the rhetoric through which the story is told.

"Events" are simply the incidents or happenings that occur within a story. The order in which a narrative relates events is important because readers are expected to consider each new episode in light of what has gone before. Sometimes narratives report events "out of order," by presenting flashbacks concerning what happened earlier (Mark 6:17-29) or by including predictions or allusions that foreshadow what is still to come (Luke 2:34-35). Likewise, the duration or frequency of an event as well as the amount of space given to reporting it or the number of times it is referenced in the narrative may indicate its significance. Narrative critics are particularly interested in discerning links between events, indications that one event caused another to happen or at least made the occurrence of a subsequent event possible or likely. Furthermore, the extent to which events contribute to the development or resolution of conflict may be of utmost importance. Practically all narratives contain elements of conflict that drive the plot and involve the readers in adjudication of opposing tendencies.

"Characters" are the actors in the story, and the manner in which they are presented is especially significant for determining the effect the narrative is expected to have on its readers. Characters may be flat and predictable like the Pharisees in most of our gospel stories, or they may exhibit a wide variety of traits, like Jesus' disciples, who are presented as enlightened in one instance and yet as lacking insight in another. Characters may remain pretty much the same throughout the narrative, or they may develop and change in response to what transpires as the story progresses. Readers' perceptions concerning characters may be shaped by comments from the narrator; by reports of the characters' own words, deeds, or perceptions; or by reports of the words, deeds, or perceptions of others.

"Settings" are the spatial, temporal, and social locations for events. Readers may respond differently to a story if an event occurs on a mountain or in a boat, on a sabbath or at a wedding, in private or in a crowd. In the Bible settings are often fraught with symbolic meaning. The Jordan River, for example, becomes an apt symbol for entrance into the Promised Land.

Attention to a narrative's discourse includes recognition of what is called "point of view." Narratives typically present diverse perspectives concerning what is transpiring in the story, and readers are expected to regard some of these as more reliable than others. In biblical narratives the point of view of God is normative for truth, and the perspective of the narrators is always reliable. When God declares that Jesus is the "Beloved Son" (Luke 3:22) or when the narrator of Luke's Gospel says that Jesus is "full of the Holy Spirit" (Luke 4:1), readers are not expected to wonder whether these things are really so. Similarly, the perspectives of angels, prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS), and Jesus himself are all shown to be reliable in the Gospel of Luke because they always concur with the point of view evinced by God and by the narrator. But when the crowds proclaim that Jesus is a prophet (Luke 7:16) readers may be expected to regard this point of view with some ambiguity, for the crowds also think he is John the Baptist risen from the dead, a point of view that is clearly wrong (Luke 9:7, 19).

Narrative critics also study the use of such rhetorical devices as symbolism, irony, structural patterns, and INTERTEXTUALITY (the citation of one text within another). By paying attention to such literary cues, they believe they are able to determine with some accuracy the effects that biblical literature is expected to have on its implied readers.

Bibliography: R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (1981). A. Berlin, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (Bible and Literature Series 9, 1983). R. W. Funk, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative (Foundations and Facets, 1988). J. D. Kingsbury (ed.), Gospel Interpretation: Narrative-critical and Social-scientific Approaches (1997). E. McKnight, The Bible and the Reader: An Introduction to Literary Criticism (1985). P. D. Miscall, "Introduction to Narrative Literature," NIB (1998) 2:539-52. S. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (1989). M. A. Powell, What Is Narrative Criticism? (Guides to Biblical Scholarship. NT Series, 1990). M. A. Powell, C. Gray, and M. Curtis, The Bible and Modern Literary Criticism: A Critical Assessment and Annotated Bibliography (BIRS 22, 1992). M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (ILBS, 1985).

M. A. POWELL

NEBRIJA, ELIO ANTONIO DE (1441–1522)

Perhaps the most distinguished humanist of the Spanish Renaissance, N. contributed to literary scholarship on Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Spanish topics. His Apologia (composed c. 1504–06) argued that scholars should solve textual problems in the VULGATE by examining the original Hebrew and Greek texts. In his Tertia quinquagena (composed c. 1507), N. applied his principles in solving a series of textual problems drawn from both the HB and the NT. He participated on the team that prepared the Complutensian POLYGLOT Bible at the University of Alcalá in the early sixteenth century but resigned c. 1514 when the other collaborators insisted on employing editorial principles he considered antiquated and excessively conservative.

Works: Apologia (1516); Tertia quinquagena (1516); "Epistola del maestro de Librija al Cardenal," Revista de archivos, bibliotecas y museos 8 (1903) 493-96.

Bibliography: M. Bataillon, Erasmo y España: Estudios Sobre la Historia Espiritual del Siglo XVI (1966). J. H. Bentley, Humanists and Holy Writ: NT Scholarship in the Renaissance (1983). P. Lemus y Rubio, "El maestro Elio Antonia de Lebrixa," Revue hispanique 22 (1910) 459-508.

J. H. BENTLEY

NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, BOOKS OF)

NEWMAN, FRANCIS WILLIAM (1805–97).

N. was educated in classics and math at Oxford, receiving the BA (1826) but refusing the MA since he could no longer subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles. After leaving Oxford he fell under the influence of J. Darby (1800–82), founder of the Plymouth Brethern. Later he helped with missionary activity in Baghdad and the Near East and taught classics at Bristol College, Manchester New College, and University College, London.

While his brother, J. H. NEWMAN, left Anglicanism and eventually became a Roman Catholic cardinal, N. moved in the opposite direction through the dissenting churches and rationalism to an alliance with the Unitarians and commitment to an ethical theism with a strong mystical element. Subjecting Scripture to a stringent rational and moral critique, he concluded that the Bible was flawed in matters of history, science, religion, and morality. Drawing on the research of biblical critics, he concluded that the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) was compiled from a variety of sources, that Josiah's lawbook was first produced or regarded as authoritative in the king's own day, that 1–2 Chronicles were of little value for historical reconstruction of the period they described, and that the Gospels did not accurately represent the life and teachings of JESUS. Furthermore, he thought Jesus had not achieved moral perfection (e.g., when confronted by a difficult question, he regularly gave evasive and enigmatic answers to confuse his audiences). N. also rejected as morally offensive many of the commands of God (e.g., that Abraham sacrifice Isaac) and actions of the people (e.g., Abraham's lie about Sarah to Abimelech). N.'s view of Scripture was apparent in his History of the Hebrew Monarchy (first published anonymously in 1847), a work distinguished from earlier English treatments of Israel's history by its author's rigorous use of the historical-critical method and his developmental view of Israelite religion.

N. rejected religious forms and creeds and advocated a mysticism that allowed the believer complete freedom to pursue spiritual truth and the dictates of conscience without being hindered by either the Bible or Christian dogma. He believed human religion developed from a primitive pantheism through the faith of Moses, Samuel, David, and the psalms to the noble expressions of Second Isaiah. Then religion became overlaid with ceremonialism and found relief only with the coming of Jesus, who upset the Jewish conscience and called for a greater spirituality. Jesus' advocacy of a purely inward faith and communion with God was corrupted, however, by PAUL's teaching about faith in Christ, the atonement, and the Trinity.

N. was a prolific writer, publishing in the fields of oriental and classical languages, theology, history, mathematics, politics, and economics. He was also a social activist, advocating women's suffrage, abolitionism, and vegetarianism and opposing vivisection and vaccination. His challenges to traditional thinking were made at a critical period in Britain's intellectual life; although these won for him few converts, he gained renown for his combination of intellect and religious fervor.

Works: A History of the Hebrew Monarchy (1847); The Soul, Her Sorrows and Her Aspirations (1849); Phases of Faith (1850); On the Defective Morality of the NT (1867); Hebrew Theism: The Common Basis of Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedism (1874; rev. of Theism, Doctrinal and Practical [1858]); Hebrew Jesus (1895).

Bibliography: A. Gordon, DNB Supp. 3 (1901) 221-23. J. R. Mozley, HibJ 23 (1925) 345-60. W. Robbins, The Newman Brothers (1966). K. N. Ross, CQR 118 (1934) 231-44. I. G. Sieveking, Memoir and Letters of F. W. N. (1909).

M. P. GRAHAM

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY, CARDINAL (1801–90)

Brought up in the Church of England in a tradition of "Bible Christianity," N. experienced an evangelical conversion in 1816. At Oxford he was influenced by both the liberalism of the Oriel "Noetics" and by the High Anglican tradition, represented most notably by J. Keble (1792–1866); from 1833 until his conversion to Roman Catholicism in 1845 he was one of the recognized leaders of the Oxford movement. Although he was not always appreciated by his fellow Catholics before he was made a cardinal in 1879, his theological thinking has been influential from his death until the present day.

N.'s understanding of the Bible was shaped by both his early evangelicalism and his appreciation of the fathers. As an Anglican he argued that the church and Christian tradition were the proper context for biblical interpretation, maintaining that Scripture was never intended to teach doctrine, only to prove it. Scripture addressed the imagination. To claim that the Bible was inspired was to claim neither verbal inerrancy nor chronological or geographical infallibility. INSPIRATION related to faith and morals, not to other matters. Just as the gift of grace could coexist with sin, so also inspiration was compatible with minor errors. It was necessary, N. believed, to recognize what he called obiter dicta in Scripture—phrases or statements that, whether literal fact or not, were not from the circumstances binding on faith.

N. shared a common sacramental outlook with other Tractarian writers, notably Keble, I. Williams (1802–65), and E. B. PUSEY; thus typology and the patristic distinction of mystical and literal senses of Scripture play an important part in his exegesis. Although references to scriptural interpretation are to be found scattered throughout his writings, there are particularly important discussions in the Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church (1837), Tract 85, and the 1884 essays on inspiration. His sermons provide notable examples of scriptural exposition and the application of his principles.

Works: Lectures on the Prophetical Office of the Church Viewed Relatively to Romanism and Popular Protestantism (1837), chaps. 11–13; "Holy Scripture in Its Relation to the Catholic Creed" (Tracts for the Times, 83 and 85); Parochial and Plain Sermons (8 vols., 1868); Discussion and Arguments on Various Subjects (1872) 109-253; On the Inspiration of Scripture (ed. J. D. Holmes and R. Murray, 1967).

Bibliography: G. Biemer, Newman on Tradition (1966). H. Henderson, The Victorian Self: Autobiography and Biblical Narrative (1989). J. D. Holmes (ed.), The Theological Papers of J. H. N. on Biblical Inspiration and on Infallibility (1979). W. S. Lilly, DNB 40 (1894) 340-51. "Newman's Attitude Toward Historical Criticism and Biblical Inspiration," Downside Review 89 (1971) 22-37. J. Seynaeve, Cardinal Newman's Doctrine on Holy Scripture (1953).

D. G. ROWELL

NEWTON, ISAAC (1642–1727)

A preeminent mathematician, physicist, and natural philosopher, N. was elected a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge (1667), where he succeeded I. Barrow as Lucasian Professor of Mathematics (1669). He represented the university in the House of Commons (1688–89, 1703–5), moving to London in 1694. He served as president of the Royal Society (1703–27), of which he had been a member since it was chartered in 1672. Both in his day and subsequently N. has been one of the most admired persons in history—"the most splendid genius that has yet adorned human nature" (J. Darling, Cyclopaedic Bibliograhica [1854] 2183).

N. appears to have been sincerely pious and religious with an intellectual interest in religion and the Bible. His religious views and biblical interpretation were influenced by his scientific theories, a commitment to millenarianism, a strong interest in CHRONOLOGY and history and the related topic of prophetic fulfillment, and an Arian christology (the latter led him to bypass ordination in 1675 since this would have required endorsing the theology of the Thirty-nine Articles). None of N.'s work on biblical interpretation was published during his lifetime and only portions of his writings after his death. A voluminous quantity of his notes, papers, and incomplete manuscripts was auctioned off at Sotheby's (July 13-14, 1936) and is now located in various places.

Four works were published after his death: (1) The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms Amended (1728), a shorter form of which N. had prepared in manuscript for Caroline, Princess of Wales, in 1716; (2) Observations Upon the Prophecies of Daniel, and the Apocalypse of St. John (1733); (3) "A Dissertation upon the Sacred Cubit of the Jews and the Cubits of the Several Nations; in Which from the Dimensions of the Greatest Pyramid, as Taken by Mr. J. Greaves, the Antient Cubit of Memphis Is Determined" (Miscellaneous Words of J. Greaves [ed. T. Birch, 1737] 2:405-33); and (4) Two Letters of Sir I. N. to Mr. Le Clerc (1754) originally written to J. LOCKE; a third was first published in 1961 (Correspondence 3:83-122, 129-42). The letters raised questions about the authenticity of trinitarian statements in 1 John 5:7, 1 Tim 3:16, and twenty-five other NT texts. About 1671 N. wrote a paper on how to interpret Scripture (partially published in F. Manuel [1974] 107-25). A document extant in various forms in his unpublished papers, entitled Theologiae Gentilis Origines Philosophicae (see R. Westfall [1982]), offers summaries of his main thoughts on religion and religious history. His writings indicate familiarity with contemporary biblical scholarship and an intense interest in church history and theology.

N. accepted the view that much of the HB was compiled from earlier records long after the events recorded and often in a disorderly fashion and that the text had suffered many corruptions. The NT also suffered corruptions with the addition of trinitarian texts. He argued for an early date for Revelation, before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 CE.

N. held that the ancients were astute in natural philosophy and that authentic religion, ritualized around a central altar fire (the prytaneum) reflecting a heliocentric worldview and based on love of God and love of neighbor, was practiced by the sons of Noah in Egypt. This religion was perverted, especially in Egypt, through the introduction of superstitions, the worship of dead ancestors/heroes, and a geocentric natural philosophy. Moses and the other prophets as well as many Gentiles called people back to the fundamentals. JESUS as a prophet belonged to this pattern of cyclical recall, although he was rewarded with a place at God's right hand. The early church and Gospels added a third element to the two basic characteristics of Noachian religion: belief that Jesus was the Messiah foretold in PROPHECY. The great apostasy of the church—the central topic of Revelation—was the acceptance of the trinitarian faith with its worship of a dead hero, an apostasy N. laid especially at the feet of the Egyptian ATHANASIUS. For N. the historical fulfillment of the prophecies in Daniel and Revelation demonstrated the special providence of God in history paralleling the general divine providence operative in the law of gravity and the order of the cosmos.

Works: I. N. opera quae exstant omnia (5 vols., ed. S. Horsley, 1779–85); Sir I. N.'s Theological Manuscripts (ed. H. McLachlan, 1950); The Correspondence of I. N. (7 vols., ed. H. W. Turnbull et al., 1959–77).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 3210-44. B. J. T. Dobbs, The Foundations of N.'s Alchemy: Or, "The Hunting of the Greene Lyon" (1975). J. E. Force and R. H. Popkin, Essays on the Context, Nature, and Influence of I. N.'s Theology (IAHD 129, 1990). R. T. Glazebrook, DNB 40 (1894) 371-93. F. E. Manuel, I. N.: Historian (1963); The Religion of I. N. (Freemantle Lectures, 1974). J. E. McQuire and P. M. Rattansi, "N. and the 'Pipes of Pan,' " Notes and Records of the Royal Society 21 (1966) 108-43. R. Popkin, "N. et l'interprétation des prophéties," BTT 6 (1989) 745-56. R. S. Westfall, Never at Rest: A Biography of I. N. (1980); "I. N.'s Theologiae Gentilis Origines Philosophicae," The Secular Mind: Transformations of Faith in Modern Europe (ed. W. W. Wagar, 1982) 15-34.

J. H. HAYES

NICHOLAS OF LYRA (c. 1270–1349)

Born at Lyra near Evreux, Normandy, N. entered the Franciscan order at Verneuil c. 1300, studied at Paris, perhaps also at Florence (see F. Pelster [1951]), and is mentioned as a regent master in Paris in 1308–9. His commentary on PETER LOMBARD's Sentences survives in a few fragments only. In 1319 he was elected minister provincial for northern France, and in 1325 for Burgundy. In this capacity he witnessed the bitter controversies over the concept of poverty within his order, taking the side of the moderate conventuals, showing sympathy for the spiritual wing, and exhibiting great diplomatic skill. As an executor of the will of the duchess of Burgundy, he co-founded a college for Burgundian students at Paris (1330–32). In 1333, summoned by the king to deal with Pope John XXII's suspected heresy in the matter of the beatific vision, he participated in the Convocation of Vincennes. In the name of the Paris faculty he wrote a treatise on the issue in 1334, refuting the pope's position but opening the way for a compromise. He died in Paris in 1349 and was buried in the Franciscan house there.

According to his own testimony, N.'s ambition was the completion of a commentary on the entire Bible during his lifetime, an achievement that commands lasting respect. His Postilla litteralis covering both testaments was begun in 1322, its final version finished in 1332/33. From 1333 to 1339 he worked on a companion volume, the Postilla moralis, a shorter commentary on major texts of the whole Bible intended for preachers and pastors. His Tractatus de differentia nostrae translationis ab hebraicia littera in veteri testamanto (1333) sums up salient points and examples from the literal Postill for the use of students. The greatest asset for N.'s exegetical work was his familiarity with Jewish sources. He was acquainted with MIDRASH, TALMUD, and recent Jewish exegetes, especially R. Shelomo ben Isaac (see RASHI), whom he cited frequently. As a young man he may have been in touch with the community of Jewish scholars, the "great ones" of Evreux, where he could have learned some Hebrew, mastering at least the lexicographical level; however, his knowledge of Greek was clearly minimal.

Neither his constant recourse to the "Hebrew truth" nor his exegetical principles mark N. as a radical innovator, although his balanced and comprehensive scholarship is unusual for his time. He appropriated all his sources with a sharp, critical mind and pursued his own independent accents. Rejecting the authority of the traditional prologue material, much of it ascribed to JEROME, he refused to comment on it. His own general prologues to the Postills (PL 113, 25-36; ET in J. Kiecker [1978]) spell out his hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS). While not disparaging non-literal interpretations according to the fourfold sense, he insisted on the primacy of the literal sense against arbitrary techniques of spiritual extension and mechanical subdivision of the text, echoing the position of others, especially the Victorines and THOMAS AQUINAS.

N.'s incorporation of Hebrew scholarship did not exclude a parallel insistence on the christological interpretation of the HB. Going beyond both Jewish and Christian interpreters, he pointed out scribal errors and textual corruptions but reckoned also with deliberate Jewish alterations of the original text made in order to avoid the Christian implications of messianic PROPHECY (PL 113, 29D-30C). Two of his treatises focus on refuting contemporary Jewish arguments: Probatio adventus Christi, a revision of a quaestio discussed in 1309, and Responsio ad quendam Iudaeum ex verbis evangelii secundum Matthaeum contra Christum nequiter arguentem (1334). His theory of a double literal sense of prophetic passages—one less perfect, related to the historical situation of the human author, the other perfect, related to Christ and the church (PL 113, 31D-32A)—may not have been new in its substance but was new in the clarity of its formulation.

N. applied these principles in his commentaries, though not in a rigid, inflexible manner. Interpreting the HB books, he concentrated on the literal sense as sensus historicus and showed great interest in historical details. CHRONOLOGY, geography, linguistic observations, natural science, and the realities of life in biblical times play a significant role in his exegesis. In the NT his commentary on Revelation shows that the double literal sense applied to more than HB prophecy; following A. Minorita (D. 1271) and P. Auriol (1280–1322) but avoiding their propagandistic tendencies, he combined a historical interpretation in the framework of the first-century church with an interpretation of the course of church history up to his time and beyond.

N.'s enormous impact on biblical exegesis in the later Middle Ages is evident from the large number of full and partial manuscripts of his Postilla litteralis in many languages, especially in Spain, where the dialogue with Jewish exegesis remained a central concern. His Postills were the first biblical commentaries to be printed (5 vols., 1471/72); the various printings down to the most recent edition in 1634 number close to 180. In most cases they include Additiones, 1,100 thoughtful, but often critical, glosses by Pablo de Santa Maria (d. 1435), a converted Jew who became bishop of Burgos in 1415, and a series of emotional Replicae Defensivae by the German Franciscan M. Döring (d. 1469), who tried to defend N. and to discredit Pablo. LUTHER knew the Postills well and used them freely, although not without reservations. The sixteenth-century aphorism Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset (Had Lyra not the lyre played, Luther his dance would not have made) reveals lingering suspicions but also the perceived continuity of the Reformation with the impulses N. had given to late medieval exegesis.

Works: For manuscripts and printed editions of N.'s works see Répertoire des maîtres en théologie de Paris au XIIIe siécle 2 (P. Glorieux, 1934) 215-31; "Nikolaus von Lyra (d. 1349): Quodlibeta und Quaestiones," Mélanges Joseph de Ghellinck 2 (F. Pelster, 1951) 951-73 (texts from Codex Vaticanus latinus 982); RBMA 4 (1954) nos. 5826-994; "A Listing of the Printed Editions of N.," Traditio 26 (E. A. Gosselin, 1970) 399-426; RLS 4 (1972) 338-57 (list of extracts); "Das Werk des Nicolaus von Lyra im mittelalterlichen Spanien," Traditio 43 (K. Reinhardt, 1987) 321-58; Nicholas of Lyra's Apocalypse Commentary (P. D. Krey, Teaching the Middle Ages Series, 1997). There is no modern edition of the Postills; a reprint of the Strasbourg edition of 1492 was published in 1971.

Bibliography: W. Bunte, Rabbinische Traditionen bei Nicolaus von Lyra: Ein Beitrag zur Schriftauslegung des Spätmittelalters (Judentum und Umwelt 58, 1994). H. Hailperin, Rashi and the Christian Scholars (1963). J. G. Kiecker, "The Hermeneutical Principles and Exegetical Methods of Nicholas of Lyra OFM (c. 1270–1349)," (diss., Marquette University, 1978). P. D. Krey, "Nicholas of Lyra: Apocalypse Commentator, Historian, and Critic," Franciscan Studies 52 (1992) 53-84. P. D. Krey and L. Smith (eds.), Nicholas of Lyra: The Senses of Scripture (Studies in the History of Christian Thought, 1998). H. Labrosse, Études Franciscaines 16 (1906) 383-404; 17 (1907) 489-505, 593-608; 18 (1908) 51-52, 153-75, 368-79; 35 (1923) 171-87, 400-432. H. De Lubac, Exégèse médiévale: Les quatre sens de l'Ecriture 2.2 (1964) 344-367. C. L. Patton, HHMBI, 116-22. M. S. Woodward, "Nicholas of Lyra on Beatific Vision," (diss., University of Notre Dame, 1992); ed. and tr. De visione divinae essentiae.

K. FROEHLICH

NICOLL, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1851–1923)

A religious journalist and editor who exercised wide influence especially on British nonconformity from the 1880s to the 1920s, N. took an MA from Aberdeen University, received a theological degree from the Free Church Divinity Hall, and held a pastorate until ill health forced his resignation in 1885. After moving to London he was invited by the nonconformist publisher Hodder and Stoughton to become editor of its theological monthly, The Expositor. For nearly forty years N. brought to its pages a broad spectrum of leading biblical scholars and theologians while steering a middle course between orthodoxy and modern critical thought. He also edited the widely used Expositor's Greek Testament (5 vols., 1897–1911). In 1886 N. originated and edited a second periodical, The British Weekly, which addressed broad issues of social and political life, theology, and biblical criticism. It won a large circulation for nearly half a century through a blend of conservative religion and liberal social philosophy.

Works: The Incarnate Saviour: A Life of Jesus Christ (1881); The Lamb of God: Expositions in the Writings of St. John (1883); The Church's One Foundation: Christ and Recent Criticism (1901); Sunday Evening: Fifty-two Short Sermons for Home Reading (1910).

Bibliography: T. H. Darlow, W. R. N.: Life and Letters (1925). J. T. Stoddart, DNB 25 (1937) 636-37.

D. L. PALS

NIEBUHR, HELMUT RICHARD (1894–1962)

Brother of K. P. R. NIEBUHR, N. was born Sept. 3, 1894, in Wright City, Missouri. He graduated from Elmhurst College (1912) and Eden Theological Seminary (1915), was ordained in the Evangelical and Reformed Church (1916), and held a pastorate in St. Louis (1916–18). After receiving the MA from Washington University, St. Louis (1917), N. taught at Eden (1919–22) before resuming formal study at Yale University, from which he received both the BD (1923) and the PhD (1924). He served as president of Elmhurst College (1924–27) and was a member of the faculty at Eden (1927–31). In 1931 he returned to Yale Divinity School as professor of Christian ethics and taught there until his death on July 5, 1962. Through his lectures and writings he helped to shape generations of students in theology and ethics, for whom N. represented a compelling alternative to prevailing biblicist, liberal, and neo-orthodox forms of Protestant ethics.

The Bible provided the foundation and basic structure of N.'s understanding of human life in relation to God. The latter, in turn, was the basis for his interpretation of Christian ethics as human response to the threefold pattern of God's action as Creator, Governor, and Redeemer. The Bible does not set forth either a set of ideals or a code of law; instead, it presents a story of God's action and human response to that action. N.'s ethic was neither Bible-centered nor christocentric; rather, it was strongly theocentric: God alone is absolute (Radical Monotheism [1960]).

In his "Introduction to Biblical Ethics" (Christian Ethics [1955] 1973[2]) N. called the Bible "the chief source book for the study of Christian ethics." It is the story of God's self-disclosure of God's nature and will to the community of faith. The Scriptures are thus the indispensable handbook and companion of believers in all of their encounters with God, with Christ, and with their neighbors (Faith on Earth [1989]) and the source of the moral identity of the Christian community. The AUTHORITY of Scripture is mediate and derived: The Bible points beyond itself to God, the ultimate source of its authority. Within the church the Bible has both educational and corroborative authority.

The Bible is also the inescapable source of the fundamental symbols essential for understanding the Christian life (The Responsible Self [1963]). JESUS Christ is both the mediator and the exemplar of radical faith in God. In Christ there is a double movement of humanity toward God and of God toward humanity. Jesus Christ is the primary, but not the exclusive, paradigm of an ethic of responsibility. The practical, concrete meaning of the latter is exemplified in the life of Israel in terms of the covenant.

Works: The Kingdom of God in America (1937); The Meaning of Revelation (1941); Christ and Culture (1951); Christian Ethics: Sources of the Living Tradition (ed. W. Beach and H. R. Niebuhr, 1955); Radical Monotheism and Western Culture (1960); The Responsible Self: An Essay in Christian Moral Philosophy (1963); Faith on Earth (ed. R. R. Niebuhr, 1989); Theology, History, and Culture: Major Unpublished Writings (ed. W. S. Johnson, 1996).

Bibliography: J. W. Fowler, To See the Kingdom (1974). E. C. Gardner, Christocentrism in Christian Social Ethics: A Depth Study of Eight Modern Protestants (1983). J. M. Gustafson, "Introduction," The Responsible Self (H. R. Niebuhr, 1963) 6-41. L. A. Hoedemaker, The Theology of H. R. N. (1970). R. M. Keiser, Roots of Relational Ethics: Responsibility in Origin and Maturity in H. R. N. (1996). P. Ramsey (ed.), Faith and Ethics: The Theology of H. R. N. (1957).

E. C. GARDNER

NIEBUHR, KARL PAUL REINHOLD (1892–1971)

Widely considered the greatest twentieth-century theologian of social Christianity, N., brother of H. R. NIEBUHR, was born June 21, 1892, in Wright City, Missouri. He graduated from Elmhurst College (1910), Eden Seminary (1913), and Yale Divinity School, from which he received the BD (1914) and the MA (1915). He was pastor (1913–28) of an Evangelical (Lutheran) church in Detroit, Michigan, and associate professor of philosophy of religion (1928–30) and professor of applied Christianity (1930–60) at Union Theological Seminary (New York). Social activist, preacher, and editor (Radical Religion, Christianity and Crisis), N. was the fifth American invited to deliver the renowned Gifford lectures at the University of Edinburgh (1939). He died June 1, 1971.

In Beyond Tragedy (1937) N. argued that the Scriptures are true but that they present truth in mythological (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), symbolic, and dialectical forms. Biblical myths and symbols cannot be taken literally because a literal reading states what is rationally absurd and distorts the storied and dialectical representation of scriptural truth. They must be taken seriously, however, because they disclose the truth of the human condition before God—especially the ambiguity of human nature and history and the temptations to idolatry and injustice—and the hope for salvation in ways that transcend the limitations of scientific rationalism and other philosophical and religious efforts to resolve the problem of meaning. These theological motifs are developed magisterially in vol. 1 of his famous Gifford lectures, The Nature and Destiny of Man; vol. 2 presents his reinterpretation of the biblical concepts of messianism, grace, justice, and eschatology.

N. accepted the critical scientific study of the Scriptures as a matter of honesty. In Essays in Applied Christianity (1959) he acknowledged that some texts have more weight than others, often because some are decidedly "time-bound," whereas others reflect perennial and universal human reality. His criterion of comparison and interpretation, especially with regard to the NT, is the "mind of Christ," defined usually as sacrificial love or the "true kerygma," which for him was "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself." He argued further that the meanings of texts often are not self-evident but are brought to expression through the history of their interpretation, which includes rebellion, heresy, and secular protest as sources of insight.

Steeped in Scripture, N. wrote and spoke effortlessly with scriptural illustrations, allusions, and quotations. His use of Scripture was dialectical rather than exegetical and deductive and demonstrated the interaction of scriptural knowledge with historical and scientific knowledge and with experience in the quest for biblical truth in contemporary settings.

Works: Moral Man and Immoral Society: A Study in Ethics and Politics (1932); Beyond Tragedy: Essays on the Christian Interpretation of History (1937); The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation (2 vols., 1941, 1943); The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness (1944); Faith and History (1949); The Irony of American History (1952); Essays in Applied Christianity (ed. D. B. Robertson, 1959).

Bibliography: R. W. Fox, R. N.: A Biography (1985). G. Harland, The Thought of R. N. (1960). H. Hofmann, The Theology of R. N. (1956). C. W. Kegley (ed.), R. N.: His Religious, Social, and Political Thought (rev. ed., 1984). R. W. Lovin, R. N. and Christian Realism (1995). D. B. Robertson (ed.), R. N.'s Works: A Bibliography (rev. ed., 1983). N. A. Scott, R. N.: A Prophetic Voice in Our Time (1975).

T. R. WEBER

NOCK, ARTHUR DARBY (1902–63)

Born in Portsmouth, England, N. was educated in classics and ancient history at Trinity College, Cambridge. At age twenty-four he produced an edition with translation and introduction of Sallustius's Concerning the Gods and the Universe. He was a fellow of Clare College, Cambridge, when he was invited to Harvard in 1929, where he became the Frothingham Professor of the History of Religion (1930–63). A period of great productivity culminated in delivery of the Gifford lectures in 1939 and 1946. Thereafter, he found it increasingly difficult to synthesize his vast learning; and he mainly wrote critical reviews and specialized articles while placing his erudition at the disposal of colleagues and correspondents. He especially valued the work of T. Mommsen (1817–1903) and M. Nilsson (1874–1967).

N. became the acknowledged master of the study of religion in the Hellenistic age and the early Roman Empire. His knowledge of Greco-Roman religion gave special force to his conclusions in Early Gentile Christianity and Its Hellenistic Background (1928) and Hellenistic Mysteries and Christian Sacraments (1952) that, contrary to the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE, Christianity owed most to its Jewish background and at the beginning was little influenced by Hellenistic religion. Ranging over inscriptions, papyri, and coinage without neglecting literary sources, he reconstructed with uncanny insight the religious attitudes of the ordinary person, e.g., in Conversion (1933) and in studies of ruler cult, magic, and symbolism.

Possessing an enormous memory and keen linguistic skill, N. sought comprehensiveness in assembling the evidence on any topic and paid careful attention to historical context. All forms of religious expression found in him a scupulous interpreter; and he was respected for his mastery of detail, cautious generalization, resistance to speculation, and balanced judgments. Many young scholars benefited from his generous help.

In addition to his own writing N. was the editor of the Harvard Theological Review (1932–62) and an associate editor of the Oxford Classical Dictionary (1948) and of Vigiliae Christianae (1947–62). His teaching at Harvard included periodic seminars on the background to PAUL and John; among his works dealing directly with the Bible is his little book St. Paul. His chief contribution to biblical studies, however, lay, not in interpretation of the text, but in establishing the historical context, particularly religious, of early Christianity.

Works: Early Gentile Christianity and Its Hellenistic Background (1928, repr. 1964); Conversion: The Old and the New in Religion from Alexander the Great to Augustine of Hippo (1933); St. Paul (1938); (with A. J. Festugière), Hermès Trismétiste (4 vols., 1945–54); Hellenistic Mysteries and Christian Sacraments (1952); Essays on Religion and the Ancient World (2 vols., ed. Z. Stewart, 1972).

Bibliography: HTR 57 (1964) 65-68. E. R. Dodds and H. Chadwick, JRS 53 (1963) 168-69.

E. FERGUSON

NÖLDEKE, THEODOR (1836–1930)

N. studied oriental languages at Göttingen, completing his doctoral dissertation there in 1856, and continued his studies in Vienna, Leiden, and Berlin. He taught at Göttingen (1861–1864), Kiel (1864–1868), and Strasbourg (1872–1906).

N.'s expertise as an orientalist extended to virtually all Semitic languages as well as to Persian and Turkish. His history of the Quran (see QURANIC INTERPRETATION) was his first major work and won the prize of the French Académie de Inscriptions (1859). His 1868 work on Syriac grammar has been recognized as the first scientific presentation of a modern Semitic language, and his Mandean (1875) and Syriac (1880) handbooks also made important contributions to their respective fields. Among his host of books, articles, and reviews were major entries in the ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica and in Encyclopaedia Biblica. N.'s most substantial contributions to Semitic history and philology were outside the discipline of biblical studies; but in all his work he brought to bear a thorough knowledge of comparative Semitic philology and a critical, historical spirit.

During his tenure at Kiel, N. issued two monographs important for biblical studies: a popular introduction to the OT (1868) and a scholarly work (1869) dealing with the Grundschrift of the Pentateuch, the landing place for Noah's ark, the unhistorical character of Genesis 14, and the CHRONOLOGY of the period of the Judges. Although both volumes appeared before J. WELLHAUSEN's Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels (1878), N. was aware of K. GRAF's proposal that the legal materials in the P source were the latest of the PENTATEUCHAL sources. Nevertheless, he proposed that these sources should be arranged in the order: J, E (10th or early 9th cent.), P (9th cent.), and D (shortly before Josiah's reform). He also published a study on the Mesha inscription and articles on Tobit, Daniel, and Ecclesiasticus.

Works: De origine et compositione Surarum goranicarum ipsiusque Qorani (1856); Geschichte des Qurâns (1860); Das Leben Mohammads (1863); Grammatik der neusyrischen Sprache am Urmia-See und in Kurdistan (1868); Die alttestamentliche Literatur in einer Reihe von Aufsätzen dargestellt (1868); Untersuchungen zur Kritik des Alten Testaments (1869); Die Inschrift des Königs Mesa von Moab (9. Jahrhundert vor Christus) erklärt (1870); Mandäische Grammatik (1875); Geschichte der Perser und Araber zur Zeit der Sasaniden (1879); Kurzgefasste syrische Grammatik (1880); Zur Grammatik der klassischen Arabisch (1896); Beiträge zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft (1904); Neue Beiträge zur semitischen Sprachwissenschaft (1910).

Bibliography: C. Brockelmann, "T. N. zum Gedächnis," Litterae Orientales 46 (1931) 14-18. C. S. Hurgronje, ZDMG 85 (1931) 238-81. E. Kuhn, "Versuch einer übersicht der Schriften T. N.s," Orientalische Studien: FS für N. (1906) 1:xiii-li. E. Littmann, Archiv für Orientforschung 7 (1931) 145-46.

M. P. GRAHAM

NORDEN, EDUARD (1868–1941)

A classical philologist, born in Emden, Germany, N. became Privatdozent in Strasbourg (1892) then professor in Greifswald (1898) and Berlin (1906); he emigrated to Switzerland in 1938. Although not generally considered a member of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE, he shared its research interests and methods. His contribution to religious research earned him an honorary doctorate in theology from the Evangelisch-Theologischen Fakultät of the University of Bonn (1919).

N. contributed most significantly to NT interpretation through two works, Agnostos Theos (1913, 1923[2]) and Die Geburt des Kindes (1924). As the subtitle of Agnostos Theos reveals, he used the term Formengeschichte (FORM CRITICISM) for the investigation of the forms of religious speech almost a decade before the equivalent term, Formgeschichte, became widely used under the influence of M. DIBELIUS (Formgeschichte der Evangeliums [1919]); F. OVERBECK had already used the term in connection with patristic literature ("Über die Anfänge der patristischen Literatur," Historiche Zeitschrift 48 [1882] 417-72; see 423).

The incident that prompted N.'s investigation of the "unknown god" of Acts 17:23 reveals something of the collaboration between philologists and theologians at the time. He reported that in meetings of philologists and theologians in 1910–11 in which they read Acts, a heated discussion arose concerning the interpretation of chapter 17 because the philologists did not want to submit to their theological "fellow-Greeks" about a scene that took place in Athens, as they did otherwise in the reading of a text like Acts. In the end H. Diels (1848–1922), the philologist, formulated the issue with incomparable clarity: "The meaning of the unknown god was unknown; thus worthy of inquiry" (Agnostos Theos, VII).

The fundamental problem with Acts 17:23 was that there was no evidence of an altar to a single god in Athens, as JEROME had already noted: "An inscription such as asserted by Paul did not exist there, but of the gods of Asia, and Europe, and Africa, of unknown and foreign gods" (Ad Tit. 1.12). N.'s thesis that Paul's reference was an adaptation of a reference to altars for "unknown demons" from a speech by Apollonius of Tyana (Agnostos Theos [1923^2] 42), has been shown to be wrong, as he himself concedes (XI), but the main emphasis of his research was confirmed, "particularly the stylistic and form-critical investigations, which constituted the main concern of the work" (XI).

In the course of his research it became clear to N. that he could not pursue his investigation of the unknown god of Acts 17:23 in isolation: "Analysis of the Areopagus speech led me to inquiries concerning the history of forms (Formgeschichte) of religious discourse in general" (Agnostos Theos, VII). In the religious environment of primitive Christianity he uncovered parallels in form and in content to many other NT texts, including parallels to the so-called all-formula of Rom 11:36, "The all is from him [God], and through him, and to him," e.g., in Marcus Aurelius (121–180), "All is from you, all is in you, all is to you" (Meditations 4.23). N. did not claim a direct connection between PAUL and Marcus Aurelius but correctly established a relationship between the two formulas, both giving expression to the unity of everything in the deity, as does, in a different way, the following text by Seneca (c. 4 BCE–65 BCE): "Who is God? All that you see and all that you do not see. In this way thus, if all is one, this magnitude is attributed to one greater than whom nothing can be conceived" (Nat. Quaest. 1, praef. 13); in which, incidentally, the famous formula for ANSELM OF CANTERBURY's proof of God may have appeared for the first time.

In Die Geburt des Kindes N. uncovered the traditions concerning the dawning of a new age at the birth of a divine child that form the religious-linguistic background to the stories of Christ's birth in Matt 1:18–2:23 and Luke 1:26-38 and 2:1-20; e.g., the announcement of the birth of such a child in Virgil's (70–19 BCE) fourth Ecologue, "Enter, dear offspring of the gods, great descendant-to-be of Jupiter, into your splendor—the time is at hand. Behold the world bowing its heavy dome: earth, the vastness of the ocean, and the depth of the heavens. Behold how all things rejoice at the age that is coming" (48-52). As examples of a divine generation through a virgin, N. referred to, among other texts, PHILO's discussion that God, and not their husbands, fathered the sons of Sarah, Leah, Rebekah, and Zipporah (De Cherubim 12-15). That allegorizing may be involved in the Philo text does not alter the fact that it shows such a conception was not unfamiliar in Hellenistic Judaism.

Works: Die antike Kunstprosa vom VI Jahrhundert v. Chr. bis in die Zeit der Renaissance (1898); Agnostos Theos: Untersuchungen zur Formengeschichte religiöser Rede (1913, 1923^2); Josephus und Tacitus über Jesus Christus (1913); Die Geburt des Kindes (1924).

Bibliography: C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule: Darstellung und Kritik ihres Bildes vom gnostischen Erlösermythus (1961) 26-30.

H. BOERS

NORTH, CHRISTOPHER RICHARD (1888–1975)

Born in 1888, N. studied at Didsbury College, served as a Methodist pastor in Bangor, North Wales, obtained the MA with distinction from London University in Hebrew and Aramaic, and received the DLitt from London and the honorary DD from Aberdeen. From 1925 to 1940 he held the Victoria chair of OT languages and literature at Handsworth College, Birmingham. In 1945 he succeeded H. ROWLEY as professor of Hebrew and OT studies at the University College of North Wales (UCNW), serving as dean of the theology faculty from 1948 to 1953. Subsequently, he served for one year (1962) as acting head of the department of OT literature and theology at New College, Edinburgh.

N. was a beloved teacher, one of the great personalities of UCNW in the 1940s and 1950s, a distinguished churchman, and an active scholar. A member of the British Society for OT Study from its inception, he served as secretary (1928–48), president (1949), and treasurer (1952–57). He was a member of the OT panel for the NEB (1948–62) and is perhaps best remembered for his work on Deutero-Isaiah, especially the "Servant Songs."

Works: The OT Interpretation of History (Fernley-Hartley Lecture, 1946); The Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah (1948); The Thought of the OT (1948); Isaiah 40–55: Introduction and Commentary (TBC, 1952); The Second Isaiah: Introduction, Translation, and Commentary to Chapters XL–LV (1964).

Bibliography: Who Was Who (vol. 7, 1981) 586. Y Bangoriad: The Magazine of the Old Students' Association of the University College of North Wales (April 1976) 55-56. University College of North Wales, Bangor, Gazette, vol. 15, 10-11.

S. L. MCKENZIE

NOTH, MARTIN (1902–68)

Born in Dresden Aug. 3, 1902, N. was educated at the universities of Erlangen, Rostock, and Leipzig; at the latter, he studied with R. KITTEL during his last semester and with Kittel's successor, A. ALT. His work on Israelite personal names (1928) partly served as his dissertation, partly as his Habilitationsschrift at Greifswald (1926–27) under J. HEMPEL. N. served for a time as Dozent at Griefswald and Leipzig before going to Königsberg (1930–44). Near the end of WWII he was drafted into military service, afterward teaching at Bonn (1945–65). He was director of the Deutschen Evangelischen Instituts für Altertumswissenschaft des Heiligen Landes in Jerusalem from 1964 until his death, May 30, 1968, at Subeita in the Negeb while on an excursion. He was buried at the evangelical Friedhof in Bethlehem.

N. was an accomplished pianist and a great lover of music, especially Mozart. A loyal churchman, he twice served as rector of the university of Bonn (1947–48, 1957–58). He was editor of ZDPV (1929–64) and associate editor of WO (1947–64), ZTK (1950–62), and VT (1951–59). A leading influence in the inauguration of the BKAT commentary series, he also served as its editor. For over three decades, he was one of the most influential HB scholars in the world.

After publishing several significant articles and numerous reviews as well as his dissertation while in his mid-twenties, N. published what would be one of his most influential works in 1930, a study of the twelve-tribe system of early Israel. In this work he investigated the texts referring to the twelve tribes and reached the conclusion that these lists come from pre-monarchical times and reflect historical reality, with Gen 49:1-27 (including the tribe of Levi) being the earliest and Num 1:5-15; 26:5-51 (without Levi and with Joseph subdivided into Manasseh and Ephraim) being somewhat later. According to N. the early tribes came into existence in the land of Canaan and developed a pre-political entity associated for military and cultic activities that paralleled the tribal amphictyonies in early Greece and Italy. N. argued for two earlier six-tribe amphictyonies, the earliest being composed of the six Leah tribes and a slightly later southern parallel group composed of Judah, Simeon, Caleb, Othniel, Jerahmeel, and Kain. The Joseph group introduced Yahwism into the region when they migrated into Canaan from the Nile delta, and a twelve-tribe confederation was formed around Shechem as the original amphictyonic cult center. The formation of this loosely organized tribal union provided the basis for the later political and religious unity under the monarchy, although N. was subsequently to argue that this early non-political entity "Israel" continued to exist even after the formation of the monarchical state of Israel. The union of the tribes and their commitment to Yahweh were annually celebrated in a covenant renewal service.

In his commentary on Joshua (1938) N. argued that the book's basic contents do not continue the PENTATEUCHAL sources but primarily consist of lists of pre-monarchical tribal boundaries, a Judean town list from the time of Josiah, and a cycle of aetiological tales concerned with Benjamite territory preserved at the Gilgal sanctuary. He followed this work with a study of the non-Pentateuchal historical complexes of the HB (1943). His most innovative conclusions were that no documentary connection existed between the material in Deuteronomy–2 Kings and that in Genesis–Numbers (except for a few sections at the end of Deuteronomy), and that Deuteronomy–2 Kings had been put together by a DEUTERONOMISTIC historian who employed various forms of source material, writing in Palestine after Jerusalem fell to the Babylonians. The opening chapters of Deuteronomy formed the introduction to this history, which incorporated the book of Deuteronomy as a lens for viewing and understanding the people's subsequent tragic history.

N.'s 1948 work investigated the traditions in Genesis–Numbers and the history of their transmission. Accepting the general source analysis of this material with its division into J, E, and P, he focused on the origin, transmission, and enrichment of the traditions behind the sources. This approach he called Überlieferungsgeschichte (history of traditions; see TRADITION HISTORY). He argued that those traditions developed around certain basic themes (guidance out of Egypt, guidance into the arable land, promise to the patriarchs, guidance in the wilderness, and revelation at Sinai), which were originally independent of one another and at home in separate tribal groups. These independent themes and complexes, in which Moses played no original role, were combined already in the pre-monarchical amphictyony to produce a Grundlage (G) and continued to be enriched by additional material, most with particular connections to places or geographical areas (their Ortsgebundenheit), eventually to be edited into the sources J and E.

The culmination of N.'s work was reached in his history of Israel (1950), which marked, along with the work of Alt, a new departure in the treatment of the subject comparable to that of J. WELLHAUSEN. N. drew the full implications of his earlier studies, beginning his history with the Israelite amphictyony settled in the land of Canaan.

Even though many of N.'s positions on issues had already been hinted at by H. GUNKEL, E. MEYER, M. WEBER, G. von RAD, and above all Alt, N. developed and elaborated these in his own way and supported his positions with detailed LITERARY analysis. Criticisms of N., especially those of W. F. ALBRIGHT and his students, alleging a nihilistic attitude toward the HB materials and a failure to take archaeological work (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) into consideration (see J. Bright [1956]) are totally unfounded. Frequently his positions on historical matters and the dating of texts were quite conservative, and many of his archaeological, topographical, and geographical studies remain unexcelled.

Works: Die israelitischen Personnamen im Rahmen der gemeinsemitischen Namengebung (BWANT 3, 10, 1928); Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels (BWANT 4, 1, 1930); Das Buch Josua (HAT 1, 7, 1938, 1953²); The OT World (1940, 1962⁴; ET 1966); Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien, vol. 1, Die sammelnden und bearbeitenden Geschichtswerke im Alten Testament (SKG.G 18, 2, 1943) 43-266 = ET The Deuteronomistic History (JSOTSup 15, 1981, 1991²) and The Chronicler's History (JSOTS 50, 1987); A History of the Pentateuchal Traditions (1948; ET 1972); The History of Israel (1950, 1954²; ET 1958, 1960²); GS zum Alten Testament (TBü 6, 1957, 1960² 1966³; ET The Laws in the Pentateuch and Other Studies, 1966 = 1960²); Exodus (ATD 5, 1960; ET, OTL, 1962); Leviticus (ATD 1962, 1966²; ET, OTL, 1965, 1977²); Könige I, 1-16 (BKAT 9, 1, 1964–68); Numbers (ATD 7, 1966; ET 1968 OTL); GS zum Alten Testament II (ed. H. W. Wolff, TBü 39, 1969), with full bibliography of N.'s works, 166-205; Aufsätze zur biblischen Landes- und Altertumskunde (2 vols., ed. H. W. Wolff, 1970).

Bibliography: B. W. Anderson, "Introduction: M. N.'s Traditio-historical Approach in the Context of Twentieth-century Biblical Research," A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (M. Noth, 1972) xiii-xxxii. O. Bächli, Amphiktyonie im Alten Testament: Forschungsgeschichtliche Studie zur Hypothese von M. N. (Theologische Zeitschrift Sonderband 6, 1977). J. Bright, Early Israel in Recent History Writing (SBT 19, 1956). C. H. J. de Geus, The Tribes of Israel: An Investigation into Some of the Presuppositions of M. N.'s Amphictyony Hypothesis (SSN 18, 1976). D. W. McCreery, HHMBI, 510-14. S. L. McKenzie, The Trouble with Kings: The Composition of the Book of Kings in the Deuteronomistic History (VTSup 42, 1991). S. L. McKenzie and M. P. Graham (eds.), The History of Israel's Traditions: The Heritage of M. N. (JSOTSup 182, 1994). M. A. O'Brien, The Deuteronomistic History Hypothesis: A Reassessment (OBO 92, 1989). R. Smend, "Nachruf auf M. N.," GS zum Alten Testament (TBü 39, 1969) 139-65 = his DATDJ, 225-75 (slightly rev.). W. Zimmerli, VT 18 (1968) 409-13.

J. H. HAYES

NOWACK, WILHELM GUSTAV HERMANN

(1850–1928)

Born Mar. 3, 1850, in Berlin, N. died May 28, 1928, in Leipzig. He pursued theology and oriental studies beginning in 1869 in Berlin, graduating in Halle as PhD in 1872. In 1873 he became a lic. theol. and in 1875 habilitated in Berlin in OT, where he had been appointed tutor for OT studies at the theological Stift Johanneum. In 1877 he assumed the office of pastor, and in 1880 he was named ausserordentlicher professor in Berlin. He entered his main sphere of activity in 1881 by accepting a call to Strasbourg as full professor, succeeding W. BAUDISSIN. Gifted in administration and with an impassioned political temperament, he developed a very active and influential role in the faculty, university, church, and school. With the demise of the German University of Strasbourg he left for Leipzig in 1918, where he lectured for some years.

N.'s most important teacher was A. DILLMANN; however, he crossed over quite early to J. WELLHAUSEN's views, which he made his own and presented to such an extent that Wellhausen himself ridiculed him. His lack of original ideas, however, allowed him to become a good exegete and textbook author. The commentaries, which comprise the majority of his literary output, are solid and sensible presentations of the facts and their possible explanations, almost always along the line of Wellhausen. His independent commentary on Hosea (1880), which he wrote in response to B. DUHM's Theologie der Propheten (1875), marked the beginning of his exegetical work. New revisions of older works followed (Bertheau-Hitizig [1883]; Hupfeld [1888]) and finally his own volumes in the HKAT, of which he served for a time as general editor and the publication of which may have been his greatest scholarly success. His gift for skillful and instructive summaries of voluminous material also characterizes his Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie (1894).

Works: Die Bedeutung des Hieronymus für die alttestamentliche Textkritik (1875); Die assyrisch-babylonischen Keil-Inschriften und das Alte Testament (1878); Der Prophet Hosea (1880); (ed.), Die Sprüche Salomos (E. Bertheau, 1883); (ed.), Der Prediger Salomo's (KEH 7, F. Hitzig, 1883²); (ed.), Die Psalmen (2 vols., H. Hupfeld, 1888³); Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie (2 vols., 1894); Die kleinen Propheten (KEH 3, 4, 1897, 1922³); Die Bücher Chronik (HKAT 1, 6, 1902); Richter, Ruth, und Bücher Samuelis (HKAT 1, 4, 1902); Amos und Hosea (RgV 2, 9, 1908); Schabbat (Sabbat) Text (Die Mischna, ed. G. Beer, O. Holtzmann, and I. Rabin, 2, 1/2, 1924–26).

Bibliography: G. Anrich, DBJ 10 (1931) 202-5.

R. SMEND

NUMBERS, BOOK OF

1. The Foundational Period. a. Numbers. The earliest interpretation of Numbers occurs within the book itself. Commentary on legal judgments clarifies, extends, and even qualifies existing law. Numbers 18:20 clarifies law concerning compensation for priests (18:8-19) and Levites (18:21-24) by stating that priests forfeit land ownership as a consequence of their office. Numbers 19:10*b*-13 extends the law of corpse contamination from native Israelites to include resident aliens. Numbers 36:1-12 qualifies the inheritance rights of daughters (27:1-11) who marry outside of their tribe. Narrative literature is also reinterpreted through commentary. The positive portrayal of Balaam as a foreign seer (Numbers 22–24), for example, is qualified by the story of his ass (22:22-35) when this donkey becomes more clairvoyant than the seer. The negative portrayal of Balaam is extended further with the addition of 31:8, when the seer is killed along with the Midianites for having led Israel into idolatry with the Baal of Peor.

b. HB. Interpretation of Numbers is scattered throughout the HB. First Chronicles 30:2-3, 25 applies the law proscribing a second Passover from Num 9:6, 9-11, 14 in order to add priestly along with lay defilement as a reason for postponing observance of the feast one month. The language of the priestly blessing (Num 6:24-27) is reinterpreted for liturgical use (Psalms 4; 67:2), and the negative interpretation of Balaam continues to be developed. Deuteronomy 23:5-6 states that Balaam wanted to curse Israel but was restrained by God. Joshua 13:22 adds that he was killed for practicing divination.

c. Translations. Interpretation continues in ancient recensions and translations (see TRANSLATION) of the Hebrew text. The Samaritan Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) interpolates passages from Deuteronomy into Numbers (e.g., the incorporation of Deut 3:1-3 into Num 21:33-35 in the account of the defeat of Og). The SEPTUAGINT often interprets the Hebrew in rendering the text into Greek. The protective role of Levites in the campsite (1:53), for example, changes from warding off divine "wrath" in the Hebrew to warding off "sin" in the Greek translation. The Greek translation also replaces all references to God as Yahweh with Elohim in the story of Balaam and his ass (22:22-35). Interpretation continues in the Aramaic TARGUMIM. Anthropomorphisms in the Hebrew are avoided in Targum Onkelos. Reference to "before your face" in the Hebrew version of the song of the ark (10:35-36) is changed to the phrase "before you" (Tg. Onq. 10:35). More extensive interpretation is also evident. Moses' allusion to himself as giving birth to Israel in Num 11:12 is replaced with a paraphrase utilizing masculine imagery: "Am I the father of this whole people. . . ?" (Tg. Onq. Num 11:12). Targum Pseudo-Jonathan exhibits even more extensive interpretation. The final oracles of Balaam, for instance, provide the occasion for messianic speculation along with an apocalyptic interpretation (see APOCALYPTICISM) of world history including Rome and even Constantinople (Tg. Ps.-J. 24:19-25).

2. Formative Jewish and Christian Interpretation. a. Rabbinic interpretation. Rabbinic interpretation is rooted in the teaching of the dual Torah that emerged in the Second Temple period well before the common era. Moses received two forms of revelation on Mount Sinai. The written Torah was the complete revelation from God available for all to read, consisting of the biblical books Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. Moses also received an oral Torah passed on only to rabbinic teachers. Oral Torah provided continuity with the fixed, written Torah, clarifying ambiguities and problems of interpretation for later generations. As such, the oral Torah provided a deeper meaning (derash), while also clarifying the plain sense (peshat) of the written Torah. The rabbinic tradition of oral Torah is codified in Mishnah, TALMUD, and other midrashic writings (see MIDRASH). Rabbinic interpretation of Numbers distinguishes between legal (halakhic) and non-legal (aggadic) texts.

i. Halakhah. The law concerning a wife suspected of adultery illustrates halakhic interpretation (Num 5:11-31). Such a woman was required to undergo an ordeal of drinking a potion to determine guilt or innocence. Numbers 5:14 notes a condition of jealousy in the husband as an essential part of the procedure, but the circumstances and process of expressing jealousy are not stated. Early rabbinic interpretation explored how the husband was to express his jealousy: "R. Josua says, 'He expresses jealousy before two witnesses' " (m. Sota 1:1). The topic of jealousy returns in Sipre Numbers, where the emphasis changes from communication to the conditions of jealousy: "The purpose of Scripture [Num 5:14] . . . is solely to teach you that under no circumstances do people impose the rite of drinking the bitter water unless there is a genuine doubt about the matter" (Sipre Numbers 7:14).

ii. Aggadah. Aggadic interpretation of non-legal lore was a more free-flowing and speculative reflection on Scripture, exploring allusive (remez) and even hidden (sod) meanings in the text. Already in the Mishnah details of the story of Balaam are expanded. The mouth of his donkey was one of ten acts of creation on midnight eve of sabbath (m. ʾAbot 5:6). Balaam and his disciples are compared to Abraham (m. ʾAbot 5:19): They possess a grudging spirit, arrogant demeanor, and a proud soul, which leads them to Gehenna. Reflection on Balaam is expanded further in the Babylonian Talmud. He is unable to enter the world to come, represents hatred, had a crippled foot and a blind eye (b. Sanh. 103b), advised Pharaoh on how to destroy Israel in Egypt, returned to Baal of Peor out of greed for payment, and was killed at age thirty-three (b. Sanh. 106a, b).

b. Philo. PHILO Judaeus of Alexandria introduced Greek allegorical method into the interpretation of Numbers. Ambiguities in the Torah are no longer resolved through plain meanings but in the application of non-literal, symbolic readings arising from Greek conceptions of natural law, virtue, and the centrality of the divine soul in humans as the source of wisdom. Philo's interpretation of the ashes of the red heifer (Numbers 19) provides an illustration of legal interpretation (Spec. Leg. i. 257-79). The purpose of the law is to purify a person's body, but more important, to purify the soul of passion and distemper. The ashes of the red heifer aid in the purification process when mixed with cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet wool, which are symbols requiring an allegorical interpretation; they purge the soul, allowing the mind to contemplate the universe. When Philo recounted Hebrew lore, he tended to rationalize the stories as is evident in his interpretation of Balaam. He continued the tradition of interpreting Balaam negatively; but the divine oracles become fictions, the donkey loses its ability to speak, and Israel's superiority arises from the fact that the people's souls spring forth from divine seed (Mos. i. 263-304).

c. NT. NT literature (1st cent. CE) blends rabbinic and Hellenistic methods of exegesis to interpret the teaching and life of John the Baptist and JESUS in relationship to Torah. For example, the annunciation of the birth of John the Baptist in Luke (1:15) links John with the Nazirites and conforms him to their vows (Num 6:3). Yet in Matthew (5:33-37) Jesus has authority to change Torah law on vowing (Num 30:2). The dual quest of relating the new teachings of Jesus to the Torah and the life of the church to the history of Israel gives rise to typology. "Typological exegesis is the search for linkages between events, persons or things within the historical framework of revelation" (G. Lampe and K. Woolcombe [1957] 40). It emphasizes continuity and unity between Torah, the teachings of Jesus, and the life of the church. PAUL forged the method in 1 Cor 10:1-10 in interpreting the story of water from the rock (Num 20:7-11). He identified Jesus with the rock and Christian sacraments with the water from the rock (baptism) and the manna in the wilderness (Eucharist). Typological reading allowed the church at Corinth to become the wilderness community for Paul. The method was extended in Hebrews where Jesus is not simply identified with Moses but judged to be superior (Heb 3:3; Num 12:7 [LXX]).

3. Patristic and Medieval Interpretation. a. Patristic interpretation. Debate ensued in early Christian interpretation of Numbers over the limits of typology. Two examples illustrate the difference between the ALEXANDRIAN and the ANTIOCHENE methods of interpretion.

i. Origen. ORIGEN illustrates the Alexandrian school's tendency to infuse typology with allegory. In Homilies on Numbers IX, he stated that some written laws should be avoided, others read literally, and still others interpreted allegorically; e.g., in his interpretation of Numbers in the Commentary on the Gospel According to John, he noted geographical locations from Israel's wilderness journey in Num 33:6, where names indicate "facts useful for the interpretation of passages" (Com. Jn. 6.216). But there is also a science (logos) to the study of names that is important for interpreting HB locations. The river Jordan, for example, indicates "the word of God which became flesh and dwelt among us" (Com. Jn. 6.220). The five animals used for sacrifice on the altar (7:77-88) are carefully described according to their type and means of mobility, but there is also a spiritual (logos) significance to the animals as a shadow of heavenly things revealed through Jesus Christ (Com. Jn. 6.263-67).

ii. J. Chrysostom. Allegory was more restricted in the Antiochene tradition of interpretation. CHRYSOSTOM favored the plain sense of Numbers as a source for moral teaching over allegorical significance. The humble character of Moses (Num 12:3) provides an example for all Christians (Homilies on Genesis 34) and priests (Treatise Concerning the Christian Priesthood 4). Moses' acceptance of prophetic activity in Eldad and Medad (11:29) teaches that ministry must not be pursued for personal gain. The suffering of Israel in the wilderness (11:5; 14:4) is part of God's larger design, teaching Christians that a laborious life is meant to encourage longing for a future life rather than satisfaction with the present age (The Homilies on the Statues 6).

b. Jewish medieval commentaries. Rabbinic interpretation extended throughout the patristic period. A rich tradition of Jewish interpretation continued to flourish in the medieval period, ranging geographically from communities in the Middle East to Europe.

i. Saadia Ibn Joseph. SAADIA is considered the preeminent exegete of the gaonic period. Born in Egypt, he rose to become the Gaonate of Sura (head of the academy of Sura) in Babylonia. He wrote a commentary on the Torah as well as the first systematization of Jewish belief, entitled The Book of Belief and Opinions. Interpretation of Numbers is scattered throughout this treatise, e.g., the book's opening words, "The Lord spoke. . . ." indicate that God created speech. Anthropomorphisms (face [6:25], divine ear [11:18], and mouth [16:32]) are interpreted non-literally. Contradictions suggesting the abrogation of law are resolved. Thus, for instance, the two commands to Balaam that he first stay and then go to Balak (Num 22:12, 20) enhance his exalted station—Baalam goes only when Balak sends higher-ranking officials.

ii. Shelomo ben Isaac. Known by his acronym, RASHI, he wrote commentaries on the HB and on the Babylonian Talmud in Provence, France, and is noted for emphasizing the plain or simple meaning of Torah (peshat) as opposed to a deeper or homiletical meaning (derash). His commentary on the home of Balaam in Pethos (Num 22:5) illustrates his method: "The Aramaic word pethor means 'a table,' the same as the Hebrew word šûlḥān, which gives us the word šûlḥānî, 'a money-changer.' So "Balaam was like a money-changer. . . . The plain meaning, however, is that it is the name of a place."

4. Modern Interpretation. a. Reformation and Renaissance. i. Calvin. The Reformer's claim of sola scriptura in opposition to the Roman Catholic Church, the rebirth of classical studies during the Renaissance, and the discovery of Jewish medieval interpreters fueled a renewed quest for the literal sense of Scripture in Protestant biblical interpretation. CALVIN's interpretation of Numbers in his Harmony of the Last Four Books of Moses reflects the new hermeneutical situation (see HERMENEUTICS). The law is central in his interpretation of Torah, requiring knowledge of the original language and historical context for proper interpretation. He explored historical background to interpret the account of the consecration of the Levites in Numbers 8 (Harmony 2:214-19), and the text is further clarified through careful grammatical and linguistic study of Hebrew. He concluded that the permission granted the Levites to eat a portion of the tithe outside the Temple (Num 18:31) is clarified if the particle kî is read adversatively (Harmony 2:287). He also noted that the Hebrew word for "tabernacle" (mô ʿēd), translated as "assemble," "appointment," "church," and "testimony," is better translated "convention," since the verb yāʿad means "to contract or agree with another, or at least to meet for the transaction of mutual business" (2:297-98).

Historical study served polemical purposes, lending authority to the Protestant claim of sola scriptura. Study of the Aaronide priesthood and Levites, for example, refuted the claim of papal authority. According to Calvin, Christ (not the pope) represented Aaron (Harmony 2:221). Focus on the literal meaning of the text also brought contradictions into clearer focus (e.g., accounts of Moses' father-in-law in Exodus 18 [Jethro] and in Numbers 10 [Hobab]). Calvin resolved such literary problems through harmonizing different accounts rather than exploring the possibility of distinctive authorship; thus Hobab was actually the son of Jethro. But repetitions, differences in style, and the death report of Moses led other Reformers, like A. Bodenstein von KARLSTADT, to raise questions concerning the Mosaic authorship of the Torah (De canonicis scripturis Libellus, G1b-3b, G4b-H1b).

ii. B. de Spinoza. SPINOZA solidified modern historical-critical interpretation of the Pentateuch in Tractatus theologico-politicus. His quest to free politics from religion required a reevaluation of scriptural AUTHORITY. He wrote that "the universal rule in interpreting Scripture is to accept nothing as an authoritative Scriptural statement which we do not perceive very clearly when we examine it in the light of its history" (Treatise 7). History for Spinoza meant original language, analysis of the content of each book, and authorship. Such a method requires no special revelation from God, only natural reason. Building on the earlier work of A. IBN EZRA (1089–1164), Spinoza concluded that Moses was not the author of the Pentateuch. Third-person references to Moses throughout Numbers constituted strong evidence for him, e.g., " 'Moses talked with God'; 'The Lord spoke with Moses face to face'; 'Moses was the meekest of men' (12:3)" (Treatise 8). However, he believed that portions of the Pentateuch were authored by Moses, concluding from Num 21:14, for example, that Moses wrote "The Book of the Wars of the Lord." Nevertheless, the application of a rational, historical-critical method led to the conclusion that the book of Numbers, as well as the Pentateuch as a whole, was a compilation by later writers.

b. Advocates and Opponents of Historical Criticism. The rejection of Mosaic authorship called into question the presupposition of past Christian and Jewish interpreters that there was a unity of revelation from Moses to the present time that made Scripture reliable and authoritative. Spinoza stated the new problem: "The history of the Bible is not so much imperfect as untrustworthy: the foundations are not only too scanty for building upon, but are also unsound" (Treatise 8). The ensuing debate over Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch changed the nature of interpretation. Thus the literal sense of Scripture was redefined to mean the historical reliability of Numbers as a book authored by Moses rather than the plain or simple meaning of the text as had been the case in past Jewish and Christian interpretation. Two commentaries, one from the late nineteenth century and the other from the early twentieth century, illustrate the impact of historical criticism of Numbers.

i. C. F. Keil. KEIL's introduction to Numbers, written in 1870, consists of polemical arguments for Mosaic authorship. The influence of Egyptian history (the building of Hebron before Zoan in Egypt [Num 13:22]) and culture (reference to food [11:5]) indicates close contact between the writing of Numbers and the Egyptian life of Moses. The literary style of Numbers and the child-like naivete of the literature, with its immediate contemplation of nature, also signify the book's early origin (11:12; 22:5, 11; 27:17). Numbers 33:2 even states that Moses wrote an account of the different wilderness campsites (repr., 1981, 17-32). The desire to confirm the historical authenticity of the literature also takes over the commentary, thus great care is given to account for the seemingly large figures in the census of Numbers 1 and the need to harmonize these figures with the number of firstborn males (1:1-15). And since the story of the fiery snakes (21:4-9) must also be anchored in history, Keil refuted interpretations that identify the copper snakes as a symbol like the imagery of St. George and the dragon or other ancient imagery of snakes as symbols of healing. The reliability of Numbers requires a literal interpretation of the snakes, and literal means that the event really happened.

ii. G. B. Gray. GRAY's commentary on Numbers, published in 1903, represents the flowering of historical-critical research within the framework of the documentary hypothesis. Mosaic authorship no longer plays a role in interpreting the book; instead portraits of Moses and Israel in the wilderness reflect later periods of Israelite history and religious customs. Gray concluded that Numbers was composed of J, E, and P. The J (Yahwist) source is a tenth- or ninth-century BCE history reflecting the life and customs of the Davidic monarchical period. Examples of J include Israel's departure from Sinai (10:29-32), request for meat (11:4-15, 18-24*a*, 31-35), and a portion of the Balaam narrative (22:22-35). The story of the seventy elders (11:16, 17*a*, 24*b*-30), the vindication of Moses (12:1-15), the embassies to Edom and to the Amorites (20:14-21; 21:21-24*a*), and most of the Balaam narrative (chaps. 22–24) derive from E (the Elohist), an eighth-century BCE history written for the northern kingdom of Israel and advocating a more prophetic view of religion. J and E are separate histories spanning the books of Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, and possibly also Joshua. Gray also concluded that the greatest portion of Numbers (1:1–10:10; 15:17-21, 22-31; 16:8-11; 17:1-7; 19; 26–36) derives from P (Priestly history), which represents a body of literature from the exilic period and later consisting of law and narrative. The result of locating the book's different literary sources within their appropriate historical setting is a history of Israelite religion from the monarchical period into the late Second Temple period.

c. Twentieth-century interpretation. Two effects of historical-critical research on Numbers endure in contemporary research. The first is the conclusion that the book was not written by Moses in the late Bronze Age but instead manifests a history of composition spanning the religious development of Israel. Second, priestly tradition and theology dominate the book. Most twentieth-century interpreters build on these two foundations, although the methods of interpretation vary widely.

i. J. Milgrom. The Jewish Publication Society Torah Commentary is written to reflect advances in Jewish biblical scholarship in the fields of ARCHAEOLOGY, history, language, and religion and to bring this "new world of knowledge" into conversation with "the great tradition of Jewish Bible commentary" (preface). MILGROM's commentary on Numbers (1990) reflects the best of this effort, focusing on the plain sense of the text while weaving in past rabbinic and medieval interpretations. While a history of composition is acknowledged, an early date for the priestly tradition is the central focus. The incorporation of anthropological research on holiness and religious purity is perhaps the most significant advance in contemporary research. Insight into gradations of holiness (chap. 2; 3:5-43), the rationale for biblical impurity (5:1-4), and the danger of encroachment (chaps. 3 and 18), for instance, clarify the danger of pollution and the power of purgation in priestly religion.

ii. B. Levine. The Anchor Bible commentary is a non-ecclesiastical series aimed at "reconstructing the ancient setting of the biblical story, as well as the circumstances of [the text's] transcription and the characteristics of its transcribers." Levine's commentary on Numbers reflects a growing lack of confidence by biblical scholars in source criticism while also demonstrating linguistic advances in comparative Semitic languages. Levine acknowledges the source criticism of Gray's commentary but limits his study of the transmission of Numbers primarily to nonpriestly (JE) and priestly (P) literature. JE designates a composite Torah document fashioned in the seventh century BCE. P is chronologically later. The challenge in interpreting Numbers, according to Levine, is "to explain how priestly writers recast the JE traditions and expanded upon them, thereby reconstructing the record of the wilderness period so as to focus on their central concerns" (Numbers [1993] 49). The morphology of Hebrew words, along with comparison to other Semitic parallels, frequently informs the interpretation of specific texts. Thus analysis of the verbal root nqh in the interpretation of the ritual ordeal of the wife suspected of adultery (5:11-31) leads to the conclusion that "purification is integral to the magical dimension of judicial ordeals" (192-212, esp. 207-8).

iii. Current interpretation. The close of the twentieth century has witnessed a renaissance in the interpretation of Numbers. Jewish commentaries blend traditional and modern forms of interpretation for religious and cultic use (N. Leibowitz [1980]; W. Plaut [1979]). Christian commentaries span the political, confessional, and methodological spectrum. Some are aimed specifically at evangelicals (T. Ashley [1993]), while others target broader audiences for lectionary preaching (D. Olson [1996]) or theological reflection (T. Dozeman [1998]). Methodology ranges from historical-critical (P. Budd [1984]), to theological and literary (K. Sakenfeld [1995]), to anthropological (G. Wenham [1981]; M. Douglas [1996]) forms of interpretation.

Bibliography: T. R. Ashley, The Book of Numbers (1993). J. R. Baskin, Pharaoh's Counsellors: Job, Jethro, and Balaam in Rabbinic and Patristic Tradition (1983). P. J. Budd, Numbers (1984). E. G. Clarke, The Aramaic Bible: Targum Pseudo-Jonathan: Numbers (1995). E. W. Davies, Numbers (1995). M. Douglas, In the Wilderness: The Doctrine of Defilement in the Book of Numbers (JSOTSup 158, 1996). T. B. Dozeman, "The Book of Numbers," NIB (1998) 2:1-268. M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (1985). G. B. Gray, Numbers

(1903). B. Grossfeld, The Aramaic Bible: The Targum Onqelos to Leviticus and the Targum Onqelos to Numbers 8 (1988). P. W. Harkins, St. John Chrysostom: On the Incomprehensible Nature of God (1982). R. E. Heine, Origen: Commentary on the Gospel According to John, Books 1–10 (1989). R. C. Hill, Saint John Chrysostom: Homilies on Genesis 18–45 (1990). C. F. Keil and F. Delitzsch, The Pentateuch (repr., 1981). M. L. Klein, The Fragment-Targums of the Pentateuch According to Their Extant Sources (1980). G. W. H. Lamp and K. J. Woollombe, Essays on Typology (1957). N. Leibowitz, Studies in Bamidbar (1980). B. Levine, Numbers 1–20 (AB 4, 1993). J. Milgrom, The JPS Torah Commentary: Numbers (1990). J. Neusner, Sifré to Numbers (1986); The Mishnah (1988); The Talmud of Babylonia (1994–96). D. Olson, Numbers (1996). W. G. Plaut, Numbers (1979). K. D. Sakenfeld, Numbers (1995). P. Schaff, Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers: Saint Chrysostom (1978). A. Sperber, The Bible in Aramaic (1959). G. J. Wenham, Numbers (1981); Numbers (OTGu 5, 1997). J. W. Wevers, Text History of the Greek Numbers (1982).

T. B. DOZEMAN

NYBERG, HENRIK SAMUEL (1889–1974)

Reared in a clergy household, N. studied in Uppsala, receiving his doctoral degree in Semitic philology in 1919. He was appointed professor of Semitic philology at the University of Uppsala in 1931 and was elected a member of the Swedish Academy in 1948.

His first publications were concerned with Arabic texts related to the history of Islamic theology. Later he turned to the study of Iranian languages, publishing a manual of Pahlavi and a monograph on the ancient religions of Iran that broke new ground and advocated a new interpretation of Zarathustra's role in religious history.

In the biblical field he published a text-critical study of the book of Hosea (1935) in which he defended the reliability of the MT against all kinds of emendations based on the ancient versions or on mere guesses. Using comparative Semitic philology, he managed to reach a new interpretation of the text as it stands. In this respect he secured followers in Sweden (G. Gerleman, A. Haldar, and G. Rignell) and contributed to sober methods of TEXTUAL CRITICISM in general. In the same book he argued, on the basis of his observations concerning the transmission of the Avesta and early Arabic literature, that HB texts were originally transmitted orally and thus it was impossible to go behind the present texts to reach the authentic words of the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). This idea was developed first by H. BIRKELAND and later by I. ENGNELL and the so-called Uppsala school. In addition, N. took the preposition 'al as the name of a god identical with 'Elyôn, "the Most High," and advocated a new understanding of the history of Israelite religion (developed in an article in ARW in 1938–39). He argued that there was an ongoing struggle between Yahweh and 'Elyôn in Israelite religion, which was not definitively settled by David's identification of the two gods.

N.'s insistence on oral tradition also led him to question the documentary hypothesis concerning the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), another point in which he was followed by Engnell and the Uppsala school. It should also be mentioned that he published a Hebrew grammar (in Swedish, 1952), which contains an especially good section on syntax.

Works: Studien zum Hoseabuche: Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Klarung des Problems der Alttestamentlichen Textkritik (1935); "Studien zum Religionskampf im alten Israel" ARW 35 (1938) 329-87; "Deuteronomium 33, 2–3," ZDMG 92 (1938) 320-34); "Smärtornas man" SEÅ 7 (1947) 5-82 (a study of Isaiah 53); "Korahs uppror (Num 16 f.)," SEÅ (1947) 230-52; "Hiskias Danklied Jer 38, 9–20" ASTI 9 (1974) 85-97.

Bibliography: S. Kahle, H.S. N.: En Vetenskapsmans biografi (Svenska akademiens handlingar ifran ar., 16d, 1991), Swedish.

H. RINGGREN

NYSTRÖM, SAMUEL (1903–)

Trained academically at the University of Lund, where he studied OT with C. LINDBLOM and the history of religion with E. Briem, N. defended and published his dissertation in 1946, then returned to his clerical profession. In his dissertation the social structure of the Arabian bedouin and semi-nomads is used in an analogy with ancient Israel. N. felt that after the immigration into Canaan the old nomadic way of life with its code of morals (the vendetta, among other things) was replaced by other ideals: faith, humility, and obedience. Several of the traditions in the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) reflect this change. On the other hand, Israelite religion deliberately accepted parts of the desert culture's sociological ideal in opposition to "new" ideas from urban culture in Mesopotamia. In this view of the struggle between different ideals N. minimized Canaanite influence. His work was influenced in particular by A. CAUSSE and J. PEDERSEN. N.'s dissertation was a fresh and stimulating approach to the history of Israel's religion and for a time was highly influential, although recent studies have challenged the bedouin origins of Israel.

Works: Beduinentum und Jahwismus: Eine soziologisch-religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum Alten Testament (1946).

S. HIDAL

O

OBADIAH, BOOK OF

The shortest book in the HB (twenty-one verses), this PROPHECY concerning Edom has generated discussion primarily in four areas: identity of the prophet, date and historical setting, nature of composition, and message. During the earliest period discussion centered on the identity of Obadiah (worshiper of Yahweh). In rabbinic tradition the prophet was often linked with the Obadiah of Ahab's reign (1 Kgs 18:3-4) who was held to be an Edomite proselyte (b. Sanh. 39b) and descendant of Eliphaz (Yal. ii.549). He was thus a logical choice to deliver an oracle against Edom, since he remained faithful to Yahweh even while living with two such godless persons as Ahab and Jezebel. In contrast, Esau (Edom) had learned nothing of the life of good deeds, although living with pious Isaac and Rebekah. Obadiah received the gift of prophecy for having hidden one hundred prophets of Yahweh during Ahab's purge. Although rich, he exhausted his wealth in caring for these poor prophets until he was forced to borrow money at interest from Ahab's son Jehoram (Exod. Rab., xxxi.3).

Whereas the identity of the prophet was a concern of the pre-critical era, the issue of date and historical setting has been a primary concern of the modern period. Central to this discussion has been the question of the historical referent for vv. 10-14. Three periods have been most frequently suggested: mid-ninth century BCE; early to mid-sixth century BCE; and mid- to late fifth century BCE. Numerous scholars (e.g., C. Keil [1868]; E. Sellin [1929[3]]; J. Theis [1937]; F. Gaebelein [1946]) have linked this prophecy to the period of Jehoram's difficulties with Edom (2 Kgs 8:20-22; 2 Chr 21:8-10). Reasons given in support for this position include (1) the canonical placement of the book within the Twelve (assuming the canonical arrangement reflects chronological reality); (2) the relation of Obadiah to Joel (Joel 2:32 quotes Obadiah 17; Joel is dated c. 830 BCE by many of these scholars); (3) literary style (Obadiah is free of Aramaisms); and (4) the striking "silence" of Obadiah's prophecy regarding the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Temple (thus supposedly precluding the events of 586 BCE from consideration).

Some scholars (e.g., E. Philippe [1912]) have seen the initial fulfillment of Obadiah's prophecy in the Philistine and Arab raids against Judah (2 Chr 21:16-17); it is assumed that these marauders would also have sacked Edom at this time. Not surprisingly, the paucity of historical information regarding this period and the not infrequent speculative reconstruction of events have led most contemporary scholars to reject this early date. The era most frequently suggested in the modern period has been the time surrounding 586 BCE. Since the work of C. Caspari (1842), most scholars have dated the prophecy of Obadiah to the early years of the exile, a date proposed earlier by CALVIN. Although solid historical information is lacking concerning Edom's role and posture during the Babylonian invasion of Judah, it has been assumed from such passages as Ps 137:7; Lam 4:18-22; Ezek 25:12-14; 35:1-15 that Edom at best refused to aid Judah in its struggle against Babylon and at worst exploited the situation. Thus, vv. 2-9 of Obadiah are read as prophetic threat rather than vaticinia ex eventu (so A. Edelkoort [1946–47]; J. Smith [1905–6]; A. Weiser [1967[5]]). Further, the relation of Obadiah to Jer 49:7-22 has been considered significant evidence for its placement in this period.

Not surprisingly, the book of Obadiah has been considered a most valuable source for reconstructing Edom's activity during this historical period. J. WELLHAUSEN suggested a late date that often has been accepted (e.g., W. Nowack [1897]; J. Bewer [1911]). He dated the prophecy to the late fifth century, arguing that vv. 2-9 were not prophetic prediction but narrative description; thus the book reflected the Nabatean displacement of Edom during that period. These scholars also cited the eschatological character of vv. 16-21 and the supposed historical affinity with Mal 1:2-5 as further evidence for this late date. P. McCarter (1976) has suggested that vv. 6-7 provide the clue to the book's historical backdrop. He argues from archaeological data (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) that the Edomites were gradually displaced by the influx of Arabian tribes (Qedarites) during the Persian period and that Obadiah reflects this final expulsion of Edom.

In the modern era considerable energy has been focused on distinguishing between analysis of the present text and reconstruction of the events and sources underlying it. Consequently, determination of the book's date and historical setting is integrally related to the nature of its composition, a topic that has received much attention. Most frequently discussed have been the unity/integrity of the book, its relation to other HB materials (Jer 49:7-22; Joel), and its form and structure.

During the pre-critical era the unity of Obadiah was assumed. However, with the advent of the critical disciplines (especially source and form criticism), this unity was called into question. A simple reading of the text noted that in vv. 1-14 the nations were God's divine instrument of punishment, whereas in vv. 15-21 they were the object of punishment; in vv. 1-14 only Edom was threatened with punishment, whereas in vv. 15-21 all the nations were threatened (with Israel as the punishing agent); in vv. 1-14 Edom was addressed through the prophet's revelation, whereas in vv. 15-21 Israel was addressed. Although unity was argued principally on thematic and literary grounds, challenges arose from several quarters. J. G. EICHHORN (1780–83) was an early opponent to unity, arguing that vv. 17-21 constituted an appendix added during the time of Alexander Janneus (104–78 BCE). Soon thereafter H. EWALD (1841) argued that the book derived from an exilic prophet (to whom he attributed vv. 11-14 and 19-21) who had made use of material from Obadiah (vv. 1-10) and material from another earlier prophet (vv. 15-18), both of whom he dated as contemporary with Isaiah. Noteworthy is the analysis of Wellhausen (1892), who attributed vv. 1-5, 7, 10-11, 13-14, and 15*b* to Obadiah, with the remaining verses being later additions and appendixes. Since the rise of source criticism numerous variations regarding the number of sources and the development of these materials into the present book have been proffered. Although support for unity continues (e.g., A. Condamin [1900]; O. Isopescul [1914]; Theis; Edelkport; G. Aalders [1958]; M. Bic [1953]; J. Scharbert [1967]), most scholars of the modern period have considered Obadiah to be a compilation of units. Given the book's brevity, analysis often has been rather imaginative and speculative. Most frequently Obadiah is divided into two major sections: vv. 1-14 + v. 15*b* and v. 15*a* + vv. 16-21.

Central to this discussion has been the relation of Obadiah to Jer 49:7-22. Three positions have been argued: (1) Obadiah borrowed material from Jeremiah; (2) Jeremiah borrowed material from Obadiah; (3) both prophets borrowed from an earlier unknown source since the material in common appears in a different order and location in the two books. Scholars opting for the third position often have debated which prophet reflected more closely the original source, but such arguments are inconclusive. The literary relationship of Obadiah and Jeremiah has clear ramifications for the dating of Obadiah, since priority or posteriority to Jeremiah could determine historical setting. However, the issue is further complicated by the realization that the Edom oracle in Jeremiah 49 may itself be a late insertion.

With the rise of FORM CRITICISM, the nature of the book's composition was analyzed from another perspective. H. W. WOLFF (1977) has argued vigorously that Obadiah consists of an oracle of assurance delivered by a cult prophet in response to a prayer of lamentation by the worshiping people of Judah shortly after 586 BCE. For Wolff, vv. 1-14 and 15*b* comprise a single, unified discourse in which the prophet quotes earlier oracles, expanding and elaborating on them for his present situation. Conversely, vv. 15*a*, 16-21 are a collection of later additions skillfully linked through lexical and thematic ties. A liturgical setting for Obadiah was argued earlier by Bic, who considered it a liturgically expanded oracle for an annual royal enthronement festival. In another direction, many form critics have seen in Obadiah's oracle various elements of a typical foreign nation oracle (i.e., identification of the enemy to be denounced; a warning to the enemy nation of its impending doom; a description of Yahweh's decisive intervention and punishment; a prediction of Israel's/Judah's future ascendancy over this enemy nation). G. Ogden (1982) has argued in a more balanced way that such passages as Obadiah and Jeremiah 49 reflect prophetic responses to cultic laments (e.g., Psalm 137).

A historical analysis of the meaning and message of Obadiah evidences the sociocultural horizons of the various interpreters. In the patristic period its signficance appears minimal (Obadiah is the only prophet with no citation in the index of the Ante-Nicene Fathers). AUGUSTINE cited vv. 17 and 21 of Obadiah (City of God chap. 31), reading both references messianically: "Mt. Esau" represents the church of the Gentiles, which the apostles "made safe" through the preaching of the gospel. Conversely, Obadiah was apparently utilized in early Jewish anti-Christian polemic. In rabbinic interpretation the Edomites represented Christians and Edom the Roman Catholic Church. Such interpretation continued in D. KIMHI and in the commentary of ABRAVANEL.

For a significant period of the modern era Obadiah, though largely neglected, was either cited by conservative scholars as an example of the fulfillment of prophecy or was considered an embarrassment by critical scholars, representing an inferior ethic of hate and punitive judgment. The former group focused on tracking the instances in which statements of Obadiah were realized negatively (e.g., Babylonian oppression; Nabatean expulsion; Maccabean punishment) and positively (e.g., the Christian church). For the latter group Obadiah reflected an ethic of vengeance and nationalism that was eclipsed and superseded in the ethic of JESUS.

In the last decades of the twentieth century, more serious attention has been given to grappling with the theological significance of prophetic threats like Obadiah's. Contrary to earlier denigrations of the book's purely vindictive and punitive nature, newer assessments suggest the theological backdrop of Yahweh's sovereign rule and passion for justice as the controlling factors in this short prophetic oracle.

Bibliography: G. C. Aalders, Obadja en Jona (1958). J. Alexandre, "Abdias/Ovadia," ETR 54 (1979) 610-18. L. C.

Allen, Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah (1976). M. A. Arroyo, "El profeta Abdias," CB 11 (1954) 32-33. K. Baltzer and H. Koester, "Die Bezeichnung des Jakobus als Oblias = Obdias," ZNW 46 (1955) 141-42. J. R. Bartlett, "The Rise and Fall of the Kingdom of Edom," PEQ 104 (1972) 26-37. G. A. Barton, "Obadiah" JE 9 (1925[2]) 369-70. H. Bekel, "Ein vorexilisches Orakel über Edom in der Klagestrophe: Die gemeinsame Quelle von Obadja 1-9 und Jeremia 49:7-22," TSK 80 (1907) 315-42. E. Ben Zvi, A Historical-Critical Study of the Book of Obadiah (BZAW 242, 1996). J. A. Bewer, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Obadiah, and Joel (ICC, 1911). M. Bic, "Eine verkanntes Thronbesteigungfestorakel im Alten Testament," ArOr 19 (1951) 568-78; "Zur Problematik des Buches Obadja," VTSup 1 (1953) 11-25. E. Bonnard, "Abdias," DBSup 8 (1969) 693-701. A. J. Brawer, "The Name Obadiah: Its Punctuation and Explanation," BethMikra 54 (1973) 418-27. W. W. Cannon, "Israel and Edom: The Oracle of Obadiah 1," Theology 14 (1927) 129-40, 191-200. C. P. Caspari, Der Prophet Obadja (1842). A. Condamin, "L'unité d'Abdias," RB 9 (1900) 261-68. B. C. Cresson, "Israel and Edom: A Study of the Anti-Edom Bias in OT Religion" (diss., Duke University, 1963); "The Condemnation of Edom in Postexilic Judaism," Use of the OT in the New (1972) 125-48. G. I. Davies, "New Solution to a Crux in Obadiah 7," VT 27 (1977) 484-87. F. Delitzsch, "Wann weissagte Obadja?" ZLThK 12 (1851) 91-102. M. B. Dick, "A Syntactic Study of the Book of Obadiah," Semitics 9 (1984) 1-29. B. Diebner and H. Schult, "Edom in alttestamenlichen Texten der Makkabaerzeit," DBAT 8 (1975) 11-17. J. Eaton, Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah: Introduction and Commentary (1961). A. H. Edelkoort, "De profetie van Obadja," NTT 1 (1946–47) 276-93. J. G. Eichhorn, Introduction to the Study of the OT (3 vols., 1780–83, 1803[3], 1823–24[4]; ET 1888). G. H. A. Ewald, Commentary on the Prophets of the OT (1841, 1867–68[2]; ET 1875–81). G. Fohrer, "Die Spruche Obadjas," Studia Biblica et Semitica Theodoro Christiano Vriezen qui munere professoris theologiae per XXV annos functus est, ab amicis, collegis, discipulis dedicata (1966) 81-93. A. J. Freeman, "The Obadiah Problem" (diss., Southern Baptist Seminary, 1950). H. Frey, Das Buch der Kirche in der Weltwende: Die kleinen nachexilischen Propheten (BAT 24, 1948). F. E. Gaebelein, The Servant and the Dove: Obadiah and Jonah, Their Messages and Their Work (1946). N. Glueck, "The Boundaries of Edom," HUCA 11 (1936) 141-57. J. Gray, "The Diaspora of Israel and Judah in Obadiah v. 20," ZAW 65 (1953) 53-59. J. Halevy, "Le Livre d' Obadia," Révue semitique d'épigraphie et d'histoire ancienne 15 (1907) 165-83. M. Haller, "Edom im Urteil der Propheten," Festschrift K. Marti (BZAW 41, 1925) 109-17. O. Isopescul, "Übersetzung und Auslegung des Buches Abdias," Weiner Zeitschrift für die Kunde des Morgenlandes (1914) 149-81. C. Keil, Minor Prophets (1868; ET 1977). C. A. Keller, Abdias (1965). G. Krause, Studien zu Luthers Auslegung der Kleinen Propheten (BHT 33, 1962). E. Lipinski, "Obadiah," EncJud 12 (1971) 1304-6; "Obadiah 20," VT 23 (1973) 368-70. S. Loewinger, "Esau dans Abd. 6," REJ 110 (1951) 93-94. F. Luciani, "Il verbo bo' in Abd. 13," RivB 31 (1983) 209-11. P. K. McCarter, "Obadiah 7 and the Fall of Edom" BASOR 221 (1976) 87-91. J. Maier, " 'Siehe, ich mach(t)e dich klein unter den Volkern . . . ': Zum rabbinischen Assoziationshorizont von Obadja 2," Kunden des Wortes: Beiträge zur Theologie der Propheten, Josef Schreiner zum 60 (1982) 203-16. K. Marti, Der Prophet Obadja (HSAT 2, 1923[4]). J. M. Myers, "Edom and Judah in the Sixth–Fifth Centuries BC," Near Eastern Studies in Honor of W. F. Albright (ed. H. Goedicke, 1971) 377-92. K. Nash, "Obadiah: Past Promises, Future Hope," TBT 25 (1987) 278-82. D. Neiman, "Sefarad: The Name of Spain," JNES 22 (1963) 128-32. W. Nowack, Die kleinen Propheten (KEH 3, 4, 1897, 1922[3]). G. S. Ogden, "Prophetic Oracles Against Foreign Nations and Psalms of Communal Lament: The Relationship of Psalm 137 to Jeremiah 49:7-22 and Obadiah," JSOT 24 (1982) 89-97. M. Ottoson, "Sarafand/Sarepta and Its Phoenician Background," Qadmi-not 13 (1980) 122-26. S. Pagán, "The Book of Obadiah," NIB (1996) 7:433-459. E. Philippe, "Abdias," DB 1 (1912) 20-23. P. R. Raabe, Obadiah (AB 24D, 1996). J. M. Rinaldi, "In librum Abdiae," Verbum Domini 19 (1939) 148-54, 147-79, 201-6. R. B. Robertson, "Levels of Naturalization in Obadiah," JSOT 40 (1988) 83-97. T. H. Robinson, "The Structure of the Book of Obadiah," JTS 17 (1916) 402-8; Obadiah (1964[3]). W. Rudolph, "Joel, Amos, Obadja, Jona," ZAW 49 (1931) 222-31; Obadja (1971). J. Scharbert, Die Propheten Israels um 600 v. Chr. (1967). E. Sellin, Joel, Amos, Obadja, Jona (KAT, 13, 2, 1929[3]). J. M. P. Smith, "The Structure of Obadiah," AJSL 22 (1905–6) 131-38. J. Theis, "Der Prophet Abdias," Die zwölf kleinen Propheten (HSAT 8.3, 1, ed. J. Lippl and J. Theis, 1937). J. D. W. Watts, Obadiah: A Critical Exegetical Commentary (1969). J. Wehrle, "Prophetie und Textanalyse: Die Komposition Obadja 1–21, interpretiert auf der Basis textlinguistischer und semiotischer Konzeptionen" (diss., Freiburg, 1981). P. Weimar, "Obadja: Eine redaktionskritische Analyse," BN 27 (1985) 35-99. K. Weinberg, "Biblische Motive in Stifters Abdias," Horizonte Emuna 7 (1972) 32-38. A. Weiser, Das Buch der zwölf kleinen Propheten I: Die Propheten Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadja, Jona, Micha (1967[5]). J. Wellhausen, Die Kleinen Propheten übersetzt und erklärt (1892, 1898[3]). H. Winckler, "Obadja," Altorientalische Forschungen 2, 3 (1901) 425-32. H. W. Wolff, "Obadja: Ein Kultprophet als Interpret," EvTh 37 (1977) 372-84; Obadiah and Jonah (BKAT XIV, 3, 1977; ET 1986).

R. R. MARRS

OECOLAMPADIUS, JOHANN (1482–1531)

A student at the University of Heidelberg, O. associated with the Rhineland humanists, including P. MELANCHTHON, M. BUCER, J. Wimpfeling (1450–1528), and J. REUCHLIN. After mastering Latin, Greek, and Hebrew at Tübingen, he settled at Basel, assisting ERASMUS (1515) in his editions of JEROME and the Greek–Latin NT and actively promoting the Reformation within both city and university.

O.'s biblical interpretation, although influenced by Erasmus, owes much to Greek patristic writers. (In 1524 he had translated Theophylact's [c. 1050–1108] exposition of the Gospels.) In biblical interpretation O., like ZWINGLI, recognized the importance of original biblical languages and the need to distinguish different figures of speech within the biblical text. One important difference was in interpretation of the highly controverted text of Matt 26:26 hoc est corpus meum (this is my body). Zwingli argued against LUTHER that a figure of speech was employed: est should be understood to mean "signifies," rather than to "is." O. agreed that a figure of speech was involved but appealed to patristic writers like TERTULLIAN to argue that the figure related to corpus, rather than to est. The term should be understood as figura corporis, and translated as "a figure or sign of my body."

Works: De genuina verborum Dei: 'hoc est corpus meum' . . . expositio (1525); commentaries on Isaiah, Romans (1525), Haggai-Zechariah-Malachi (1527), Daniel (1530), Job (1532), Jeremiah and Lamentations (1533), John (1533), Ezekiel (1534), Hebrews (1534), and Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah 1:2–2:13 (1535).

Bibliography: H. R. Guggisberg, CE 3 (1987) 24-27. G. Rupp, Patterns of Reformation (1969) 1-46. L. W. Spitz, The Religious Renaissance of the German Humanists (1963). E. Staehelin, Das theologische Lebenswerk J. O. (1939, repr. 1971).

A. E. MCGRATH

OEHLER, GUSTAV FRIEDRICH VON (1812–72)

A German Lutheran theologian, O. was born at Ebingen, near Stuttgart, June 10, 1812; he died Feb. 19, 1872. He studied at Tübingen under C. Schmid (1794–1852) and J. Steudel (1779–1837) and at Berlin in the area of oriental languages.

In 1834 he began to teach at the missionary institute in Basel and in 1837 went to Tübingen, where he edited Steudel's theological lectures on the OT (1840). In 1840 he was made professor at the seminary and pastor in Württemberg, where he published his Prolegomena zur Theologie des Alten Testaments (1845). In 1852 he returned to Tübingen to accept the directorship of the seminary. He also lectured on OT THEOLOGY, Isaiah, Job, Psalms, messianic PROPHECY, the Minor Prophets, Hebrews, and Christian symbolics. During this period he also contributed forty articles to the first edition of J. Herzog's (1805–82) Realencyklopadie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche. Often his work is viewed as counteracting the negative attitudes against the OT raised by F. SCHLEIERMACHER. His widely used OT theology was edited by his son.

Works: Gesammelte Seminarreden: Gehalten während der Führung des Ephorats (1872); Theologie des Alten Testaments (2 vols., 1873–74, 1888²; ET 1874–75, 1883); Lehrbuch der Symbolik (ed. J. Delitzsch, 1876).

Bibliography: Worte der Erinnerung an G. F. O. (1872). J. H. Hayes and F. C. Prussner, OT Theology: Its History and Development (1985) 114-18. J. Knapp, G. F. O.: Ein Lebensbild (1876).

W. C. KAISER, JR.

OESTERLEY, WILLIAM OSCAR EMIL (1866–1950)

Born in Calcutta, O. was educated at Jesus College, Cambridge, and Wells Theological College. He served as curate and vicar in parishes in the county of Durham, in Colchester, and in London (1891–1923). In 1923 he was awarded an honorary lectureship at King's College, London, and in 1927 became professor of Hebrew and OT exegesis there, retiring in 1936.

O.'s lack of an academic post until relatively late in life—apparently by choice—permitted a prolific output of books. His two major interests were the history of religions and the Judaism of the post-biblical period. Perhaps his most significant contribution in the former is his book The Messianic Idea (1908). Regarding the latter, his influence remains: He produced numerous translations and studies; and together with R. CHARLES, G. Box (1869–1933), and R. Herford (1860–1950), he deserves credit for promoting in Great Britain a sympathetic interest in and study of the Judaism of the intertestamental period, especially through his commentaries on texts, including Ben Sira and the Wisdom of Solomon. In this area he is perhaps best known now for his contributions to Charles's Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT (1913). Nevertheless, O.'s greatest influence on at least two successive generations of OT students was through the three volumes on OT religion and history in which he collaborated with T. ROBINSON (1931–36). Articulate and learned, O. was not a very original scholar; but he played a major, and probably undervalued, role in the shaping, transmission, and promotion of current ideas.

Works: Studies in Greek and Latin Versions of the Book of Amos (1902); The OL Texts of the Minor Prophets (1905); Codex Taurinensis Y (1906); (with G. H. Box), The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue: An Introduction to the Study of Judaism from the NT Period (1907); The Doctrine of the Last Things, Jewish and Christian (1908); The Evolution of the Messianic Idea: A Study in Comparative Religion (1908); Our Bible Text: Some Recently Discovered Biblical Documents (1909); The Jewish Doctrine of Mediation (1910); The Psalms in the Jewish Church (1910); Life, Death, and Immortality: Studies in the Psalms (1911); The First Book of Samuel (1912); The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus in the RV (CBSC, 1912); "1 Maccabees," and "The Book of Sirach," APOT 1:59-124, 268-517; The Books of the Apocrypha: Their Origin and Teaching and Contents (1914); Studies in Isaiah XL–LXVI: With an Introductory Chapter on the Composite Character of Isaiah I–XXXIX (1916); The Wisdom of Ben Sirah (Ecclesiasticus) (1916); The Wisdom of Solomon (1917); The Sayings of the Jewish Fathers (1919); (with G. H. Box), A Short Survey of the Literature of Rabbinical and Mediaeval Judaism 1920); Immortality and the Unseen World (1921); The Sacred Dance: A Study in Comparative Folklore (1923); The Jewish Background of the Christian Liturgy (1925); The Tractate Shabbath Mishnah (1927); The Wisdom of Egypt and the OT: In the Light of the Newly Discovered Teaching of Amen-em-ope (1927); Proverbs (WC, 1929); (with T. H. Robinson), Hebrew Religion: Its Origin and Development (1930, 1936[2]); (with T. H. Robinson), A History of Israel (1932); "Early Hebrew Festival Rituals," Myth and Ritual (ed. S. H. Hooke, 1933) 111-46; II Esdras (WC, 1933); (with T. H. Robinson), An Introduction to the Books of the OT (1934); "The Cult of Sabazios," The Labyrinth: Further Studies in the Relation Between Myth and Ritual in the Ancient World (ed. S. H. Hooke, 1935) 113-58; An Introduction to the Books of the Apocrypha (1935); The Gospel Parables in the Light of Their Jewish Background (1936); The Psalms, Books III and IV: Hebrew Text with Critical Notes (1936); The Song of Songs: Metrical Translation with Introduction and Notes (1936); (ed.), The Age of Transition (Judaism and Christianity, vol. 1, 1937); Ancient Hebrew Poems Metrically Translated, with Introduction and Notes (1937).

Bibliography: Who Was Who (vol. 4, 1952) 862-63.

P. R. DAVIES

OETTLI, SAMUEL (1846–1911)

Born July 29, 1846, at St. Gall, Switzerland, O. studied (1866–70) at Zürich, Basel, and Göttingen, where he was strongly influenced by H. EWALD. He spent 1870–78 in pastoral work, held the OT chair at Bern from 1878 to 1895, and from 1895 held a similar position at Griefswald. O.'s final years were marred by severe depression, which ultimately necessitated his retirement from teaching. He died at a psychiatric facility in Baden, Sept. 23, 1911.

During his Basel period O. produced commentaries on ten of the HB historical and poetical books for the concise commentary series edited by H. Strack (1848–1922) and O. Zöckler (1833–1906). At Greifswald his writing revolved around the religion of Israel as recorded in the HB: its development, relation to those of neighboring peoples (e.g., in comparison with Hammurabi's code), and contemporary significance and AUTHORITY. He synthesized many shorter and popular studies in this area in 1905 with his history of Israel to the time of Alexander the Great.

Within the spectrum of German Protestant OT scholarship at the turn of the century, O. belonged to those who, like H. von ORELLI, sought a middle ground between traditionalism and the excesses of "hypercriticism." Thus O. recognized the presence of four sources in the Hexateuch and the post-Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy. On the other hand, he saw Deuteronomy as much more a unitary work than did many scholars of his time and assigned it to an earlier date, prior to Hezekiah. Similarly, he maintained that a great deal of the priestly legal material predates the deuteronomic code, and argued against J. WELLHAUSEN and others that the narratives of Genesis preserve a historical nucleus concerning the ancestors' culture and religion. While rejecting Solomon's authorship of the Song of Songs, he dated that work to the tenth century. Most of all, however, O. was concerned to uphold the transcendent element in Israel's history against the widespread tendency to dismiss its miraculous and predictive dimensions out of hand.

Works: Das Hohelied und die Klagelieder (1889); Die Bücher der Chronik, Esra, Nehemia (1889); Das Buch Ruth und das Buch Ester (1889); Das Deuteronomium und die Bücher Josua und Richter (1893); Amos und Hosea: Zwei Zeugen gegen die Anwendung der Evolutionstheorie auf die Religion Israels: Drei theologische Ferienkursvorträge mit einem textkritischen Anhang (1901); Der Kampf um Bibel und Babel (1902); Das Gesetz Hamurabis und die Thora Israels: Eine religions- und rechtsgeschichtliche Parallele (1903); Geschichte Israels bis auf Alexander den Grossen (1905); Das Buch Hiob: Erlautert für Bibelleser (1908).

Bibliography: O. Procksch, RE[3] 24 (1913) 290-92. F. Wilcke, BJDN 16 (1914) 140-45.

C. T. BEGG

OLSHAUSEN, JUSTUS (1800–82)

Born May 9, 1800, at Hohenfelde in northern Germany, O. was the brother of NT exegete H. Olshausen (1796–1839). O. studied oriental languages (1816–23) at Kiel, Berlin, and Paris (with S. de Sacy) and in 1823 was appointed ausserordentlicher professor of oriental languages at Kiel, where he taught for three decades. His involvement in the political upheavals of 1848 led to his dismissal by the Danish government in 1852, and thereafter his sphere of activity shifted to Prussia. He served as librarian and professor of oriental languages at Königsberg (1853–58) and then as counselor in the ministry of education in Berlin (1858–74). He died in Berlin, Dec. 28, 1882.

O. was a masterful philologist whose competence extended beyond the Semitic languages to, e.g., Persian and Turkish. Only a relatively small portion of his scholarly works concerned the HB, of which two in particular may be noted. His 1853 commentary on the psalms is distinguished by its grammatical and text-critical discussions as well as by its dating of the majority of the psalms to the Maccabean period. In 1861 he brought out an extensive compendium treating the history of phonology/transcription and the forms of the Hebrew language; however, a projected coverage of the syntax never appeared. He also published various shorter works on HB TEXTUAL CRITICISM and a revision of L. Hirzel's (1801–41) KEH commentary on Job (1852).

Works: Emendationen zum Alten Testament: Mit grammatischen und historischen Erorterungen (1826); Observationes criticae ad Vetus Testamentum (1836); Die Psalmen (1853); Lehrbuch der hebräischen Sprache (1861); Beiträge zur Kritik des überlieferten Textes im Buche Genesis (1870).

Bibliography: A. Bertholet, RGG[1] 4 (1930) 696. A. Kamphausen, RE[3] 14 (1904) 368-71. E. Schrader, "Gedächtnisrede auf J. O.," AKAWB (1884) 1-21.

C. T. BEGG

OORT, HENDRIK (1836–1927)

Professor of oriental literature at the Athenaeum Illustre of Amsterdam (1873–75) and professor of oriental literature and Hebrew at the University of Leiden (1875–1907), O. received the doctorate at Leiden under the tutelage of J. Scholten (1811–85) and A. KUENEN, the two most notable biblical scholars associated with Dutch Modernism, which was just coming to prominence. While serving in two successive parishes before his appointment to the Amsterdam position, O. did much to popularize this new movement both in his own parishes and within the Dutch Reformed (Hervormde) Church. During this time he was already publishing significant works on the HB; and as Kuenen's colleague at Leiden he became even more active, writing on a great variety of topics. He worked, however, under a peculiar psychological and professional hazard—Kuenen's far surpassing genius. Time and again O. would enter into the discussion of one or another controverted topic only to have Kuenen write the final word. Thus O.'s most valuable writing was as a popularizer of the biblical criticism produced by Kuenen's Leiden school, although he eventually opened up a significant scholarly discussion with Dutch Jewish scholars in the field of Talmudic studies (see TALMUD). He lived to the age of ninety-one in good health and vigorously active, producing a long list of scholarly and semi-popular publications.

O.'s most notable work was his editing of the Leiden school's project, the "Leidsche Vertaling" of the Bible, a new translation with copious marginal notes, in which both the translation and the notes articulated the principles of modernist-style biblical criticism (1899–1901). The notes, although highly conjectural with respect to the original text, along with the translation based on them gave this translation a highly individualistic character. Kuenen, the original committee chairman, I. Hooykaas (1837–94), and W. KOSTERS shared in the labor, but only O. lived long enough to bring it to final publication. He published a 150-page brochure listing all the emendations (1901); a separate printing of the Psalms section (1902) and of the section on Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes (1903); an edition with abbreviated notes (1906); an edition without notes (1914); and a companion translation of the NT.

Works: De dienst der Baalim in Israel: Naar aanleiding van het geschrift van Dr. R. Dozy "De Israelieten te Mekka" (1864; ET 1965); Het menschenoffer in Israel (1865); Jeremia in de lijst van zijn tijd (1866); De tegenwoordige toestand der israelietische oudheidkunde (1873); Oud-Israels recrwezen (1892); (with A. Kuenen, I. Hooykaas, and W. H. Kosters). Het Oude Testament ophieuw uit den grondtekst en van inleidingen en aanteekeningen voorzien (2 vols. 1899–1901); Textus Hebraici Emendationis Quibus in Vetere Testamento Neerlandice Vertendo Usi Sunt (1901); Inleiding op den Bijbel in de tekstuitgave der Leidsche Vertaling (1913); De laatste eeuwen van Israels volkbestaan (1915).

Bibliography: S. J. DeVries, Bible and Theology in the Netherlands (1968) 49, 74-76, 80-81, 83-85. C. E. Hooykaas, "Levensbericht van H. O.," Levensberichten van afgestorven medeleden van de Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (1929).

S. J. DEVRIES

ORELLI, CONRAD VON (1846–1912)

Born in Zürich, Jan. 25, 1846, O. studied at Lausanne, Zurich, Erlangen, Tübingen, and Leipzig. Among his teachers Franz DELITZSCH was especially influential. O. served briefly (1871–73) as an orphanage chaplain and Privatdozent at Zurich before accepting a chair at Basel (1873), which he occupied until his death, Nov. 6, 1912.

O.'s energies were by no means limited to the HB. He was involved with the developing history-of-religions field (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) and was a leader of the Orthodox Reformed movement. In the latter capacity he was a longtime editor of and prolific contributor to the journal Der Kirchenfreund. In the area of HB studies O. devoted himself especially to the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). He wrote a history of the messianic predictions (1882) and commentaries on all the major and minor prophets (1887–88), several of which were translated into English. He likewise produced several more popular works concerning the distinctiveness and religious value of the HB.

Like his compatriot S. OETTLI, O. was a leading representative of a moderately conservative tendency within German HB scholarship at the turn of the twentieth century. Thus he ascribed Joel, Obadiah, and Zechariah 9–11 (12–14) to the preexilic period, while recognizing Isaiah 40–66 as an exilic composition. He was especially concerned to uphold the revealed and distinctive character of the HB vis-à-vis other ancient religious literature.

Works: Die hebräischen Synonyma der Zeit und Ewigkeit genetisch und sprachvergleichend dargestellt (1871); Die alt- testamentliche Weissagung von der Vollendung des Gottesreiches in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung dargestellt (1882; ET 1885); Die Propheten Jesaia und Jeremia (1887; ET 1889); Das Buch Ezechiel und die zwölf kleinen Propheten (1888); Handbuch der allgemeinen Religionsgeschichte (1899); La valeur religieuse de l'Ancien Testament (1905); Die Eigenart der biblischen Religion (1906); Der Knecht Jahve's im Jesajabuche (1908).

Bibliography: E. Kappeler, C. O.: Sein Werden und Wirken aus dem Schriftlichen Nachlass dargestellt (1916).

C. T. BEGG

ORIGEN (c. 185–c. 254)

O. was encouraged to study the Bible from an early age by his Christian father, who was martyred when O. was sixteen. O. also received a thorough training in Greek literature and philosophy, studying at Alexandria (see ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL) under the Platonist Ammonius Saccas (c. 175–242), who later taught Plotinus. O. taught Greek literature and gave catechetical instruction, at first informally during a period of persecution; he was later appointed to this task by Demetrius (d. c. 231), bishop of Alexandria. In order to devote himself completely to his Christian studies and instruction he sold his library in return for a small pension and led a strictly ascetic life.

The spread of his fame as a Christian teacher was such that he was summoned for interviews by the provincial governor of Arabia and by Julia Mammaea, the mother of the emperor Alexander Severus (d. 235). O. discussed the Christian faith with heretics (who flourished in Alexandria) and with pagans trained in philosophy, and he speculated on topics disputed by heretics and philosophers in his early writings (in particular Stromateis, On Resurrection, and On First Principles). In his Commentary on Genesis he embarked on the exegesis of a part of the Bible that particularly interested Gnostics (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION), and in his Commentary on the Gospel According to John he refuted the exposition of the Valentinian Heracleon (fl. c. 145–80). O. had converted from Valentinianism his friend Ambrose, who urged him on in his exegesis and supplied him with secretaries. Even before the composition of his earliest commentaries (on Psalms 1–25 and on Lamentations) O. started work on the Hexapla, a bilingual HB arranged in parallel columns containing the Hebrew text, the Hebrew text transliterated in Greek letters, the SEPTUAGINT, and the versions of AQUILA, SYMMACHUS, and THEODOTION, to which he later added two additional translations. Using this he was able to choose between variant readings in the Septuagint manuscripts and to identify differences between the Hebrew and the Septaugint, which he marked with critical signs.

Frictions arose at Alexandria because of his renown and the boldness of his speculations, and after being ordained presbyter at Caesarea in Palestine he was censured by Demetrius in 232. He took up residence at Caesarea and continued his work of biblical exegesis, composing lengthy commentaries on many books of the Bible and supplementing these with scholia (notes on selected passages). While at Caesarea he preached sermons at the meetings of the congregation for instruction and for the Eucharist, at which the books of the HB and the NT were read and expounded in regular succession. These sermons were taken down by shorthand writers during delivery. In 250 O. was imprisoned and tortured in the Decian persecution; denied the martyrdom he passionately desired, he died soon after.

O.'s literary output was enormous; a list of his works based on EUSEBIUS's catalogue of those in the library at Caesarea is given by JEROME (Epistle 33; cf. F. Nautin, 225-61). Apart from fragments, quotations, and numerous extracts, the most important of which are preserved in catenae, in the Philocalia, and in Pamphilus's Apology, there survive of the Commentary on the Gospel According to John eight books expounding parts of John 1, 2, 4, 8, 11, and 13; of the Commentary on Matthew, eight books on Matt 13:36–22:33 and an anonymous Latin translation on Matt 16:13–27:65; of the Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, an abbreviated Latin version by Rufinus; of the Commentary on the Canticle of Canticles, a version by Rufinus as far as 2:15. Of the homilies there survive in Greek twenty on Jeremiah and one on 1 Samuel; in Latin translation by Jerome, two on the Song of Songs, eight on Isaiah, fourteen each on Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and thirty-nine on Luke; and in Latin translation by Rufinus, sixteen each on Genesis and Leviticus, thirteen on Exodus, twenty-eight on Numbers, twenty-six on Joshua, nine on Judges, and nine on Psalms 36–38. There also survive On First Principles (in Rufinus's Latin version), On Prayer, Exhortation to Martyrdom, Against Celsus, Dialogue of Origen with Heraclides, On the Pasch, and two letters.

O. was the first major Christian exegete, the first to attempt to expound the Bible as a whole and to compose both HB and NT commentaries that discussed the text verse by verse and considered general problems connected with the biblical books, their historical background, their themes, and questions of method regarding their exegesis. He applied Greek critical scholarship to the Bible and also drew on Jewish exegesis, consulting Jewish scholars and one or more converted Jews and using the writings of PHILO and a work on the interpretation of Hebrew names. He was also influenced by earlier Christian and Gnostic exegesis (he thought that of Heracleon insufficiently systematic). He knew the Bible virtually by heart.

During O.'s lifetime the main issue facing the church was the correct attitude to be taken to the HB. Mainstream Christianity was in danger of being intellectually outclassed by Gnostics and Marcionites (see MARCION), who claimed that the creator God, depicted in the HB as vengeful, ignorant, and mutable, could not be the same as the supreme God proclaimed by Christ. O. took the view that the coming of Christ has shown the HB to be inspired and has made possible a spiritual understanding of the law (he frequently quoted from 2 Cor 3:6-18 to support this stance). The ceremonial law is obsolete according to the letter but foreshadows spiritual realities. The events of HB history may be seen as symbols that are fulfilled in Christ and in the church. The whole Bible was composed through the INSPIRATION of the Holy Spirit and contains hidden mysteries that can only be understood with aid from the same Spirit. O. distinguished three levels of meaning in Scripture (corresponding to body, soul, and spirit in humans): literal or historical; moral (particularly emphasized in his sermons); and mystical or symbolic. The central principle to be observed in the interpretation of the Bible is its unity. Problem passages are elucidated by means of parallels from elsewhere in Scripture. The Bible has its own usage, sometimes the result of underlying Hebrew idiom, sometimes the vehicle of allegory. To extract allegorical meaning O. used parallels of this kind and also symbolism of names and numbers.

O.'s systematic and scholarly exegesis, his acceptance of the utility of a philosophical training, and his attempted solution of the problems caused by a literal reading of the HB made the church he represented attractive to educated converts. His influence on subsequent exegetes was immense, regardless of whether they agreed with him; and it continued secondhand and by means of Latin translations even after the condemnations of Origenist errors at Alexandria and Rome in 400 and under the Byzantine emperor Justinian in the sixth century. In the West the view of Jerome prevailed that despite the erroneous speculations voiced, particularly in his early works, O. was to be admired as an exegete and his writings were to be used with caution.

Works: PG 11-17. Details of editions of Origen's works and of the extracts and fragments are given in M. Geerard, Clavius Patrum Graecorum 1 (1983) 141-86.

Bibliography: H. Crouzel, Bibliographe critique d'O. (1971; Supplément 1, 1982); O.: The Life and Thought of the First Great Theologian (1989). J. Daniélou, Origène (1948). D. Dawson, Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria (1992). R. Gögler, Zur Theologie des biblischen Wortes bei O. (1963). C. Hammond Bammel, Tradition and Exegesis in Early Christian Writers (1995); Origeniana et Rufiniana (Aus der Geschichte der lateinischen Bibel 29, 1996). R. P. C. Hanson, Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources of Significance of O.'s Interpretation of Scripture (1959); O. et la "Connaissance mystique" (1961). M. Harl, O. et la fonction révélatrice du Verbe incarné (1958). R. Heine, "Reading the Bible with O.," The Bible in Greek Christian Antiquity (BTA 1, ed. P. M. Blowers, 1997) 131-48. C. Jacob, "The Reception of the Origenist Tradition in Latin Exegesis," HB/OT (5 vols., ed. M. Saebo, 1996–) 1, 1:682-700. C. Kannengiesser and W. L. Peterson (eds.), O. of Alexandria: His World and His Legacy (1988). H. de Lubac, Histoire et Espirt: L'intelligence de l'Ecriture d'apres O. (1950). P. Nautin, Origène: Sa vie et son oeuvre (1977). K. J. Torjesen, Hermeneutical Procedure and Theological Method in O.'s Exegesis (1986). J. W. Trigg, O.: The Bible and Philosophy in the Third-century Church (1983); Origen (1998).

C. P. HAMMOND BAMMEL

ORLINSKY, HARRY MEYER (1908–92)

Born in Owen Sound, Ontario, Canada, on Mar. 14, 1908, O. received a traditional Hebrew and Jewish education and obtained a BA from the University of Toronto (1931) and a PhD from Dropsie College in Philadelphia (1935). His dissertation concerned the relationship of the Hebrew and Greek texts of the book of Job. Between 1931 and 1935 he was a fellow at the University of Pennsylvania and in 1935–36 at the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH and at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. He served as professor of biblical literature and Jewish history at the Baltimore Hebrew College (1936–44) and as professor of Bible at the Jewish Institute of Religion-Hebrew Union College in New York City from 1943. O. died Mar. 21, 1992.

O.'s scholarly work was wide ranging and interdisciplinary, combining ARCHAEOLOGY, philology, comparative linguistics, and comparative religion but it was always based on careful study and analysis of ancient texts. His volumes on ancient Israelite history (1954, 1972) were widely used as textbooks. He was among the first to challenge the ALT-NOTH hypothesis of early Israel as an amphictyony. In his 1967 work he emphatically discarded the very notion of a "Suffering Servant" in Isaiah 53 and concluded that the idea that this passage represents vicarious atonement for the sins of others is unfounded.

O.'s most significant work was in the area of textual studies and translation. He published numerous studies on the SEPTUAGINT, especially on the book of Job, as well as important articles on the Hebrew text, some reprinted in his 1974 volume. In these, he exhaustively and critically examined all previous theories about the relationship of the preserved Hebrew text to the Greek and analyzed the character, mannerisms, and peculiarities of the rendering of Hebrew into Greek. He was also interested in the contributions of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS to the history of the HB text and published several studies in this area, especially on the Qumran Isaiah scrolls. In 1954 he was asked by the Israeli government to authenticate clandestinely (as "Mr. Green") four of the scrolls then being offered for sale in New York City; his positive identification resulted in their acquistion by and transference to Israel. He also founded and headed two organizations focused on textual studies: the International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies and the International Organization for Masoretic Studies.

O. was the only Jewish scholar on the committee that produced the Protestant-sponsored RSV translation of the OT (1952) and the more ecumenical NRSV (1989). A strong advocate of a new Jewish-English translation, he served as editor-in-chief of the New Translation of the Torah (1961) and as an editor for the Prophets and megilloth portions of the Tanakh, published in its entirety in 1985. He served in numerous capacities on various boards and organizations: the IEJ, Jewish Apocryphal Literature, Masoretic Studies, and KTAV Press's Library of Biblical Studies, which reprinted several classical studies in the field with modern prolegomena.

Works: (with A. Ben Isaiah and B. Sharfman), The Pentateuch and Rashi's Commentary: A Linear Translation into English (5 vols., 1949); Wanted: A New Bible Translation in English for the Jewish People (1953); Ancient Israel (1954); Studies on the Second Part of the Book of Isaiah: The So-Called "Servant of the Lord" and "Suffering Servant" in Second Isaiah (VTSup 14, 1967); (ed.), Interpreting the Prophetic Tradition (1955–66 Goldenson Lectures, 1969); Notes on the Translation of the Torah (1970); Understanding the Bible through History and Archaeology (1972); Essays in Biblical Culture and Bible Translation (1974); (ed.), Israel Exploration Reader (2 vols., 1981); (with R. G. Bratcher) A History of Bible Translation and the North American Contribution (1991).

Bibliography: ErIsr 16 (H. M. O. Volume, 1982). L. J. Greenspoon BIOSCS 25 (1992) 7-8. S. D. Sperling BAR 18 (1992) 27.

N. SARNA

ORR, JAMES (1844–1913)

Born Apr. 11, 1844, O. was educated at Glasgow University and United Presbyterian (UP) Divinity Hall, Edinburgh. He served as pastor at Irvine and at Hawick and was chair of church history, UP Hall, Edinburgh (1891–1901), and chair of apologetics and systematic theology, United Free Church College, Glasgow (1901–13). He died Sept. 6, 1913.

"If [O.] disliked 'heresy,' he disliked intolerance even more," wrote J. DENNEY. Thus O. promoted the union of the UP and Free Churches (1900) and participated in numerous interdenominational projects. Although his critical conclusions were almost invariably conservative (he contributed to The Fundamentals), he successfully defended F. Ferguson (1824–97), accused of doctrinal laxity, and G. A. SMITH, whose "advanced" biblical criticism was the subject of General Assembly debate in 1902.

O. published scholarly and popular apologetics, biblical commentaries, historical and doctrinal studies, and was ever alive to the practical implications of the gospel for the social and economic conditions of life.

Works: The Christian View of God and the World, as Centering in the Incarnation (1893); The Progress of Dogma (1897 Elliot Lectures, 1901); The Problem of the OT (1906); The Bible Under Trial: Apologetic Papers in View of Present-day Assaults on Holy Scripture (1907); Revelation and Inspiration (1910).

Bibliography: G. G. Scorgie, A Call for Continuity: The Theological Contribution of J. O. (1988). A. P. F. Sell, Defending and Declaring the Faith: Some Scottish Examples, 1860–1920 (1987) 137-71. R. Small, History of the Congregations of the United Presbyterian Church (1904) 2:459.

A. P. F. SELL

ORTHODOX BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

Orthodox biblical interpretation is grounded in the historical tradition of the Orthodox Church and in the various uses of the OT and the NT in worship, preaching, teaching, pastoral guidance, spirituality, and theology. Orthodox biblical interpreters normatively hold to an integral unity between, on the one hand, the AUTHORITY of holy Scripture as the canonical record of divine revelation and, on the other hand, the hermeneutical function (see HERMENEUTICS) of tradition for the actualization of the biblical witness in the concrete ministries of the church through the grace of the Holy Spirit. The Orthodox interpretive tradition has from antiquity produced a variety of methodologies and results, a variety framed by a broad doctrinal consensus and open to incorporating new elements on the basis of the church's faith and critical reason.

1. The Heritage of the Church Fathers. The most creative period of Orthodox biblical interpretation (from the 2nd through the 5th cents.) embraces such figures as JUSTIN MARTYR, IRENAEUS, ORIGEN, ATHANASIUS, BASIL OF CAESAREA, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, GREGORY OF NYSSA, CHRYSOSTOM, and CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, who were primarily biblical theologians and engaged the Scriptures directly according to contemporary exegetical methodologies. For the Orthodox, the works of these church fathers contain normative presuppositions, principles, and patterns of biblical interpretation that are closely bound up with the formation of the biblical CANON and that carry comparable authority to the biblical witness.

Among these normative elements are the following: (1) A christocentric approach to the OT as prophetic testimony to Christ, the new covenant, the church, and the Christian life; (2) Christ as the new criterion of salvation fulfilling and replacing the Mosaic law; (3) the unity of the OT and the NT as opposed to the depreciation or even rejection of the OT by heretical groups; (4) the harmonious coherence and interdependence between the Scriptures and the church's developing evangelistic, liturgical, homiletical, catechetical, and creedal traditions; (5) the hermeneutical role of the church's doctrinal discernment expressed in particular creedal teachings (rule of faith) and significantly operative in the canonization of the church's Scriptures; (6) the creatively free and interrelated use of allegorical, typological, and grammatical exegesis accompanied by an emphasis on the spirit rather than the letter of Scripture; (7) holistic attention to the entire landscape of the larger biblical canon interpreted according to the central aim or unifying purpose (skopos) of particular books and passages; (8) the role of the living tradition as the decisive and final hermeneutical agent, especially in cases of widely disputed matters, expressed through ecumenical councils and reception by the whole church (e.g., the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed as doctrinal summary of biblical truth); (9) and the primacy and centrality of the Bible as the Word of God to be celebrated, read, and obeyed by the church and by all believers.

The patristic exegetical tradition richly drew from all the themes of Scripture, such as election, covenant, PROPHECY, law, incarnation, sacrifice, redemption, atonement, justification, sanctification, resurrection, new creation, and the coming kingdom. It developed a distinct transformative view of salvation as deliverance from the powers of sin, Satan, corruption, and death through union with Christ and the indwelling of the Spirit—that is, true participation in the divine grace and life, the basis of humanity's glorification (theosis or divinization). The primary aims of the church fathers were to advance the gospel of Christ and to serve the practical needs of the church. Their ideal was to achieve a synergistic harmony between the OT and the NT, grace and free will, personal faith and good works, Scripture and tradition, and the church's doctrine and the gift of reason. Confronting internal and external controversies, patristic exegesis combined fidelity to divine revelation with significant openness to the intellectual legacy of antiquity, notably philology, philosophy, and ethics. From Judaism the church fathers inherited a high view of Scripture; yet they developed an awareness of its human language, character, and limitations, thus passing down a dynamic rather than mechanistic view of INSPIRATION and revelation. Historical realism and precision in doctrinal disputes as well as wisdom in practical teaching and guidance necessitated movement toward contextual grammatical exegesis (Athanasius, Basil, Chrysostom). The universality of Christian truth compelled engagement with contemporary intellectual currents, which produced erudite results. However, beyond formal methods and technical principles the church fathers never lost sight of the mystery of the living God behind the witness of Scripture and that authentic exegesis involved charismatic activity—that is, it required a spiritual vision (theoria) in which the Holy Spirit actualized the transformative power of biblical truth in the interpreter and in the life of the church.

2. The Traditionalist Period. The legacy of the church fathers exercised tremendous impact on subsequent Orthodox tradition. Biblical authority remained formally supreme. As a treasure of divine revelation, Scripture became a holy artifact receiving enduring veneration in liturgy and piety. The meditative reading of the Bible, especially in monasticism and through its influence, continued as a pillar of spirituality; and theological works featured generous citations of biblical texts. For the faithful the biblical witness was generally communicated through the ubiquitous use of Scripture in a flowering of liturgical services, hymnology, and iconography. Worship featured ample readings from the OT and the NT. Numerous feasts celebrating biblical events and personages, especially the life and work of Christ, generated countless hymns and prayers rehearsing biblical accounts, images, teachings, and miracles. Sacred art (see ART, THE BIBLE AND) depicted the whole biblical story from creation to final judgment, imprinting the biblical drama on the ecclesial memory.

In terms of actual exegetical work, the long traditionalist period was marked by a paucity of material as a result of a structural shift from direct, concentrated engagement with the Scriptures to overwhelming dependence on the church fathers, a shift already evident in the christological controversies of the fifth and sixth centuries. Maximus the Confessor (6th cent.) viewed the Bible as a lamp on the lampstand of the church and taught that an exegete should depend on the church fathers more than on one's very breath. Canon 19 of the Quinisext Council (691) formally enjoined church leaders and teachers to follow set teachings usually promoted through collections of patristic interpretations (anthologia). A few erudite interpreters who left behind whole commentaries, namely Oikoumenios (6th cent.), Theophylaktos, and Zigabenos (11th–12th cents.), as well as Nikodemos the Haghiorite (17th cent.), are largely dependent on patristic exegetical works, especially those of Chrysostom.

However, faithfulness to tradition and concern for doctrinal security did not in principle imply rigid control or total absence of creativity. In his Amphilochia, Photius the Great (9th cent.), one of the foremost scholars of Byzantium, took up such questions as the Bible's linguistic idiom, errors in the transmission of manuscripts, and problems of translation from Hebrew to Greek as well as obscurities in Scripture with exemplary philological and interpretive skill. Symeon the New Theologian (10th–11th cents.), in numerous works based on direct reading of Scripture and appeals to his own mystical experiences, stirred Byzantine institutionalism with a vibrant call to charismatic renewal, including adult baptism of the Holy Spirit according to JESUS' dialogue with Nicodemus (John 3). Much later Kosmas Aitolos (18th cent.) led an evangelistic revival in northwestern Greece, preaching the gospel and exhorting the people to study the Scriptures in groups.

The Reformation and Western proselytistic activities in Orthodox lands significantly sharpened traditionalist sensibilities. The local councils of Constantinople (1638) and Jerusalem (1672) condemned the Calvinistic teaching (see CALVIN) of Patriarch Cyril Lukaris, who advocated the narrower OT canon and the authority of the Bible over the church. In an isolated instance Patriarch Jeremiah III of Constantinople formally prohibited the reading of the Bible by the faithful (1723). Under these circumstances the church fathers, as holders of the unerring key to the Bible, the infallible authority of the church, and the notion of Scripture and tradition constituting "two sources of revelation," echoing Roman Catholic theology, became hallmarks of traditionalism. Moreover, the lack of education and printed material due to various historical circumstances, the popular concentration on the lives and miracles of saints, and a tendency toward formalism in worship all reinforced traditionalism, which in various ways obscured the prophetic witness and renewing power of God's written word in the church.

3. The Modern Period. The modern period (19th–20th cents.) is marked by a creative, albeit tense, encounter between traditionalism and the "new learning" of liberal ideologies and critical methodologies derived from the West. The most vigorous interaction first occurred in Russia, where long contacts with Western traditions led to systematic theological studies on the basis of critical standards in numerous universities and academies. This course of affairs resulted in calls for and official efforts toward church renewal, but these were cut short by the Bolshevik Revolution (1917). In Greece, after political independence from four hundred years of Ottoman rule (1830) and the establishment of two universities in Athens (1837) and Thessalonike (1926), a significant tradition of theological scholarship, including biblical interpretation, was established, which has continuously matured until today. Similar developments took place in other Orthodox countries, e.g., Romania, Serbia, and Bulgaria; but political conditions and language barriers make it difficult to ascertain their contours.

In the Greek Orthodox Church the traditional use and interpretation of the Bible have been qualified by three creative, if stressful, challenges. First, the translation of the Bible into modern Greek, although not in principle objectionable according to Orthodox theology, was associated with Protestant proselytism and provoked violent traditionalist reactions. Nevertheless, the translation in periodic new editions, accompanied by the required original and officially approved text, has endured with uneasy reception by the church. Second, the establishment of the "Brotherhood of Life" (1907), a biblically oriented and moderately controversial renewal movement, has exercised widespread impact on Greek society through organized evangelical preaching, the systematic publication of catechetical material for children and adults, the establishment of ongoing Bible study groups, and other educational activities directed at parents, students, scientists, educators, and other professionals. Its greatest luminary was P. Trembelas, whose remarkable and diverse scholarly output included full commentaries on the Gospels, Acts, and Pauline epistles as well as publication of the NT with an interpretive paraphrase for the average believer. Third, the academic study of Scripture by specialists trained in critical standards, notably such older scholars as V. Vellas, P. Bratsiotis (1951), V. Ioannidis, and S. Agouridis (1976) as well as more recent scholars like D. Trakatellis, E. Oikonomou, J. Karavidopoulos (1986), J. Panagopoulos (1994), and P. Vasileiadis, has successfully established biblical scholarship as a field in its own right. Although its influence has seemed limited outside of professional circles, this tradition of scientific biblical studies has raised old and new hermeneutical questions in sharper terms.

Contemporary Orthodox hermeneutical discussion usually begins with G. Florovsky's (1960, 1972) concept of "neopatristic synthesis." According to Florovsky, the "neopatristic" task of Orthodox theology must combine inseparable aspects of doctrinal integrity and creative theological vision rooted in the life of faith (i.e., recovering the "mind" of the church fathers rather than merely quoting them). While Florovsky did not pursue the hermeneutical question in its modern context at length, his proposal helped to anchor the use of historical and critical standards in both patristic and biblical fields. Thus all Orthodox biblical scholars have in principle affirmed the value of critical LITERARY and historical methodologies according to international standards and conduct a full range of scholarship within broad doctrinal parameters.

The burning issue concerns what is peculiarly "Orthodox" about Orthodox biblical studies. For Agouridis and others the answer lies in the dynamic vision of the great church fathers working in the ecclesial context, which permits unhindered biblical research and a certain boldness in liberating the voice of Scripture toward the contemporary renewal of a patriarchal society and an institutionalized church. For J. Breck (1986), an American Orthodox biblical scholar, the distinctively Orthodox factor is the actualization of God's Word in worship, where the Holy Spirit bridges the distance between biblical and modern thought. J. Romanides (1978), a Greek Orthodox dogmatic theologian, points to the model of the charismatic saint, one who lives the transfigured life in continuity with the apostles and the saints of all ages, as the unerring guide to biblical interpretation and its application in new circumstances. J. Panagopoulos (1991–97) formulates an ecclesial hermeneutic, combining christological, biblical, and patristic elements, according to which Scripture and church become one in worship, with Scripture witnessing to the soteriological mystery of Christ and the church becoming "the living Bible of Christ."

These positions do not seem entirely adequate to the quest for a uniquely Orthodox approach to the Bible. Freedom of research for the liberation of Scripture's authentic witness is fundamental to international scholarship. Worship as actualization of biblical truth is important for all Christian traditions. The charismatic saint as unerring interpreter of biblical texts lacks wide support even in the patristic literature. An unqualified identity between Scripture and church has usually left little room to the Orthodox for constructive criticism of church life on the basis of Scripture's authority. The exposition of a specifically Orthodox approach to Scripture must be pursued in terms of a richer hermeneutical model that both differentiates and integrates the functions of historical exegesis, doctrinal interpretation, and spiritual appropriation of Scripture's transformative power. A holistic Orthodox hermeneutic will reflect the classic patristic interdependence between Scripture and tradition, granting particularly needed attention to Scripture's authority for the church. The ecumenical persuasiveness of Orthodox biblical interpretation will depend on the continued growth of biblical studies in the Orthodox Church and their essential evangelical impact on both the church's theology and its life.

Bibliography: S. Agouridis, The Bible in the Greek Orthodox Church (1976). G. Barrois, Scripture Readings in Orthodox Worship (1977). P. Bratsiotis, "The Authority of the Bible: An Orthodox Contribution," Biblical Authority for Today (ed. A. Richardson and W. Schweitzer, 1951) 17-29. J. Breck, The Power of the Word in the Worshiping Church (1986). D. Burton-Christie, The Word in the Desert: Scripture and the Quest for Holiness in Early Christianity (1993). H. Chadwick, "The Bible and the Greek Fathers," The Church's Use of the Bible: Past and Present (ed. E. E. Nineham, 1963) 25-39. G. P. Fedotov, "Orthodoxy and Historical Criticism," The Church of God (ed. E. L. Mascall, 1934) 91-104. G. Florovsky, "The Ethos of the Orthodox Church," Orthodoxy: A Faith and Order Dialogue (1960) 36-51; Bible, Church, Tradition: An Eastern Orthodox View (1972). R. M. Grant, "The Appeal to the Early Fathers," JTS 11 (1960) 13-24. T. Hopko, "The Bible in the Orthodox Church," SVTQ 14 (1970) 66-99. J. Karavidopoulos, "Das Studium des Neuen Testaments in der griechisch-orthodoxen Kirche in Vergangenheit und Gegenwart," BTZ (1986) 2-10. V. Kesich, The Gospel Image of Christ (1992). V. Kesich and T. Stylianopoulos, "Biblical Studies in Orthodox Theology," GOTR 17 (1972) 51-85. A. Louth, Discerning the Mystery: An Essay on the Nature of Theology (1993). J. Panagopoulos, He Hermeneia Peso Hagias Graphes sten Ekklesia ton Pateron (2 vols., 1991–97); Eisagoge sten Kaine Diatheke (1994). J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition, vol. 2, The Spirit of Eastern Christendom (1974); Christianity and Classical Culture (1993). J. Romanides, "Critical Examination of the Applications of Theology," Proceedings of the Second Congress of Orthodox Theology (ed. S. Agouridis, 1978) 413-41. M. Santer, "Scripture and the Councils," Sobornost 7 (1995) 99-111. T. Stylianopoulos, The NT: An Orthodox Perspective, vol. 1, Scripture, Tradition, Hermeneutics (1997). P. Valliere, "The Liberal Tradition in Russian Orthodox Tradition," The Legacy of St. Vladimir (ed. J. Breck, 1990) 93-106. N. M. Vaporis, Translating the Scriptures into Modern Greek (1994). N. Zernov, The Russian Religious Renaissance of the Twentieth Century (1963).

T. STYLIANOPOULOS

OVERBECK, FRANZ (1837–1905)

Born in St. Petersburg, O. was the son of a German father who had been brought up in England and a French Catholic mother brought up in Russia. The family moved to Dresden in 1849 so O. could prepare for a career as an academic theologian. He studied at Leipzig, Göttingen, and Berlin before moving to Jena in 1864 to qualify as a university teacher under K. Hase (1800–90). Called to Basel in 1870 by a party of reform, he became a full professor in 1872 and retired in 1897. O. lodged in the same house as F. Nietzsche (1844–1900), whom he befriended; eventually it was O. who had to place Nietzsche in an asylum when the latter lost his sanity (1889).

O. questioned the right of liberal theologians to call themselves Christians because they denied the distinctive belief of Christianity that this world would be destroyed and replaced by the kingdom of God. His Über die Christlichkeit unserer heutigen Theologie (1873, 1903^2) deeply influenced K. BARTH. During his life O. otherwise published only short articles and studies, mostly in patristics, keeping quiet about his belief that condemnation at the last judgment had already been passed upon Christianity by the mere fact that Christianity was now the subject of scholarly research. He left more than 15,000 handwritten sheets of brilliant short reflections on dogmatic, exegetical, and historical questions, which are now in the university library at Basel. Some were published by C. Bernoulli (1868–1937); others are cited in a stream of books about O. and in Overbeckiana; and an edition has appeared in the Stuttgart Werke und Nachlass.

O. argued in his revised and enlarged version of W. DE WETTE's Acts commentary (1870) that although F. C. BAUR and E. Zeller (1814–1908) were right to see Acts as having been written for a purpose, the book did not represent an offer of peace from the Pauline side of the early church to the Jewish Christians that at the same time worked on the Paulinists to make concessions to Judaism (Zeller). Rather, Acts was a saga written no earlier than the time of Trajan (d. 117) that represents a gentile Christianity, strongly influenced by Judaism, that depicted its history as a steady development in which Peter and PAUL agreed in their universalism. Paul's importance in the origin of gentile Christianity is played down. The author of Acts has no understanding of Paul's actual theology. Jewish Christianity as an anti-Pauline party is no problem for him; the interdependence of Christianity on Judaism and the law is acknowledged, but the right attitude of the church to the Roman Empire is far more important an issue. Acts is "an immediate forerunner of the apologetic literature that especially flourished at the time of the Antonines." The author of Acts used his sources, whether oral or written, very freely; the only certain traces of sources that remain are the "we" passages (16:10-17; 20:4-15; 21:5-18; 27:1–28:16), left in their original form to suggest that the author was Paul's companion or to give the appearance of authenticity; the list of stopping places in chaps. 13–14 might also go back to a journey source; otherwise, sources are unknowable (Nachlass A 93). O.'s line on Acts has affinities with that of B. BAUER.

O. paid particular attention to the form of the works he studied: "Every work of literature is a symptom of its public." Early Christianity produced no world literature, only Urliteratur, which flourished for scarcely more than a century and from which the canonical books (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) of the NT were selected. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA produced the first world literature, which is "an acquisition for all ages" (Thucydides' definition).

Works: W. M. L. de Wette: Kurze Erklärung der Apostelgeschichte (rev. and greatly enlarged, 1870; ET of preface in E. Zeller, The Content and Origin of the Acts of the Apostles Critically Investigated 1 [1875] 2-81); "Über das Verhältnis Justins des Märtyrers zur Apostelgeschichte," ZWT 15 (1872) 305-49; "Über die Auffassung des Streits des Paulus mit Petrus in Antiochien (Gal 2,11 ff.) bei den Kirchenvätern," Program zur Rectoratsfeier der Universität Basel (1877); "Die Tradition der alten Kirche über den Hebräerbrief" and "Der neutestamentliche Kanon und das muratorische Fragment," Zur Geschichte des Kanons: Zwei Abhandlungen (1880); "Über die Anfänge der patristischen Literatur," HZ 48 (1882) 417-72; Selbstbekenntnisse (intro. and ed. E. Vischer, 1941; repr. with intro. by J. Taubes, "Entzauberung der Theologie: Zu einem Porträt Overbecks," 1966); Das Johannesevangelium: Studien zur Kritik seiner Erforschung (ed. C. A. Bernoulli, 1911); Werke und Nachlass (9 vols., 1994–).

Bibliography: Overbeckiana: Übersicht über den Franz-Overbeck-Nachlass der Universitätsbibliothek Basel (ed. M. Gabathuler et al., 1962); pt. 1, correspondence including outline of O.'s life and bibliography; pt. 2, the scholarly essays and observations, described by M. Tetz and accompanied by rich excerpts. J.-C. Emmelius, Tendenzkritik und Formengeschichte: Der Beitrag F. O.s zur Auslegung der Apostelgeschichte im 19. Jahrhundert (1975). M. Nese, TPNZJ, 150-65. P. Vielhauer, "F. O. und die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft," Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament (1965) 235-52.

J. C. O'NEILL

OWEN, JOHN (1616–83)

An English Calvinist theologian (see CALVIN) of international reputation, O. was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, served parishes in Essex, advised O. Cromwell (1599–1658) on religious matters, and was appointed vice-chancellor of Oxford University in 1653. With the death of Cromwell in 1658, O. was removed as vice-chancellor and became the leader of the dissenting Congregationalists.

O. was an influential formulator of a strict doctrine of the verbal INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE, maintaining that the "sacred penmen," while exercising their own minds in the choice of the words they wrote, nonetheless wrote exactly the words the Holy Spirit intended; moreover, he thought that God preserved the transmission of the text so that no significant textual errors crept into it. However, he also emphasized the inner witness and illumination of the Holy Spirit in the acceptance and interpretation of Scripture. In A Vindication of the Purity and Integrity of the Hebrew and Greek Texts. . . . (1659) he attacked B. Walton's (c. 1600–1661) Biblia Polyglota, especially its prolegomena, for treating the Hebrew vowel points as late additions and for maintaining that the text could be improved by gathering variant readings from early translations. The accumulation of variants, most of which were insignificant, he thought falsely cast doubt on the Bible's AUTHORITY.

O.'s enormous commentary on Hebrews was published in 1668 in four folio volumes; it was frequently reprinted down to modern times and was translated into Dutch. O. argued that PAUL was the epistle's author, although acknowledging that the authority of Scripture did not depend on a knowledge of its human authors. The commentary emphasized the priestly office of Christ, refuting Socinian views (see SOCINUS) on this point.

Works: The Works of J. O. (ed. W. H. Goold, 24 vols., 1850–53).

Bibliography: J. M. Rigg, DNB 42 (1895) 424-28. P. Seaver, BDBR 2 (1983) 282-84. P. Toon, God's Statesman: The Life and Work of J. O., Pastor, Educator, Theologian (1973). D. D. Wallace, Jr., Puritans and Predestination: Grace in English Protestant Theology (1982) 144-57, 166-75.

D. D. WALLACE, JR.

P

PAGNINUS, SANTES (1470–1536)

Born in Lucca, Tuscany, Oct. 18, 1470, P. entered the Dominican order in 1487 at Fiesole, where he studied with Savonarola (1452–98) before going to Florence, where the study of oriental languages was cultivated. By 1513 he was teaching Semitics in Rome at the request of his friend Giovanni de' Medici, who had become Pope Leo X (Mar. 11, 1513). For a time P. also served as prefect of the Vatican Library. After Leo's death (Dec. 1, 1521), P. accompanied the cardinal legate to Avignon, moving to Lyons in 1524, where he continued to work until his death, Aug. 24, 1536. P. was held in high honor in his adopted city; he worked not only against the incursion of Lutheranism and Waldensianism but also to establish a leper asylum.

P. published a new Latin translation of the Bible (1528), a project encouraged by Leo X and containing letters of approval from popes Hadrian VI (1522–23) and Clement VII (1523–34). The work is noteworthy for several reasons: It was the first translation of the entire Bible made from the original languages (and collated texts) since JEROME; the first division of all the biblical material into chapters and numbered verses (although P.'s versification did not become the standard); a literal, almost wooden, translation of the HB based on Jewish scholarship, which made it an invaluable aid for students learning Hebrew; and a translation that exerted significant influence on later English versions and that was widely respected by Jews. The translation was reprinted several times: by M. SERVETUS (1542), with his annotations; in revised form in the Antwerp POLYGLOT (1572); in later interlinear form (1599); and in various other reprints.

P. produced other valuable aids to HB study, including a Hebrew grammar (1526) and LEXICON (1529), both based on the work of D. KIMHI; an introduction to Scripture (1528); and a six-volume collection of Jewish, Greek, and Latin materials on the Pentateuch (1636).

Works: Habes hoc in libro. . . . Hebraicas institutiones libri quatuor ex Rabbi D. Kimchi priore parte fere transcripti (1526); Isagoges seu introductionis ad sacras litteras liber unus (1528); Veteris et Novi Testamenti nova translatio (1528); Oṣar Leshon ha-Qodesh, hoc est Thesaurus linguae sanctae seu lexicon hebraicum (1529); Catena argentea in pentateuchum (6 vols., 1636).

Bibliography: T. M. Centi, "L'attività letteraria di S. P. nel campo delle scienze bibliche," AFP 15 (1945) 5-51. J. D. Gauthier, CBQ 7 (1945) 175-90. G. L. Jones, The Discovery of Hebrew in Tudor England: A Third Language (1983) 40-44. G. Pagnino, Vita di S. P. Lucchese, dell'ordine de' predicatori (1653).

J. H. HAYES

PAINE, THOMAS (1737–1809)

A political revolutionary and author born in Thetford, England, Jan. 29, 1737, P. was confirmed as an Anglican but was greatly influenced by the Quakers, of whom his father was a member. He was trained in stay-making, spent time at sea, and held minor government posts. In 1774 at the suggestion of B. Franklin (1706–90), he came to America, where he became a spokesman for various movements, including American independence. During the Revolutionary War he served in the Continental army (1776), was secretary to the Continental Congress's committee of foreign affairs (1777–79), and published the pamphlet Common Sense (1776) and a collection of pamplets published together as The Crisis (1792). After the war he returned to England (1787); but after publishing The Rights of Man (1791–92), in which he supported the French revolution in opposition to E. Burke (1729–97), he fled to Paris to avoid arrest. With the fall of the Girondists, he lost favor in France and was temporarily imprisoned.

P.'s work The Age of Reason, Being an Investigation of True and Fabulous (in two parts 1794, 1796) featured his Deist predilections (see DEISM) and dislike for ecclesiastical institutions and "priestcraft." He argued for a religion of reason, concluding that "the Christian theory is little else than the idolatry of the ancient Mythologists, accommodated to the purposes of power and revenue; and it yet remains to reason and philosophy to abolish the amphibious fraud." He denigrated Scripture for its failure to generate universal consent because of unproved authorship and incredible contents. He denied the accepted authorship of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) as well as of Joshua and the books of Samuel on the grounds that they were written in the third person, reported numerous anachronisms, and contained laws and incidents that were inhuman and brutal. He regarded the deity of JESUS as a fable and many of the reported details of his life as contradictory, e.g., the genealogies. Numerous contemporary clergy in Britain and America published rejoinders; and after his return to the United States in 1802, P. spent the rest of his life with few supporters, dying in New York, June 8, 1809.

Works: The Writings of T. P. (ed. M. D. Conway, 4 vols., 1894–96; repr. 1967). Various other editions of his works have been published (ed. D. E. Wheeler, 10 vols., 1908; ed. W. M. Van der Weyde, 10 vols., 1925; ed. P. S. Foner, 2 vols., 1945, with biography, 1:ix-xlvi).

Bibliography: H. W. Bowden, DARB, 345-46. C. Brinton, DAB 14 (1934) 159-66. M. D. Conway, The Life of T. P. (2 vols., 1892). L. Stephens, DNB 43 (1895) 69-79. I. M. Thompson, Jr., The Religious Beliefs of T. P. (1965).

T. H. OLBRICHT

PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND

The PEF was established in 1865 under the patronage of Queen Victoria and with the leadership of G. Grove (1820–1900) as secretary and the Archbishop of York as president. Its aim was to "raise a fund to be applied to the purpose of investigating the Holy Land." These investigations were to be in the areas of ARCHAEOLOGY, manners and customs, topography, geology, and natural history and were to be conducted according to scientific principles. The organization was to avoid controversy and not operate as a religious body. A variety of surveys, excavations, and explorations in Palestine were initiated by the fund, which also issued a number of important reports, maps, and studies in monographic form. It began publishing its journal, the Palestine Exploration Fund Quarterly Statement (now the biannual Palestine Exploration Quarterly) in 1869.

Bibliography: W. Besant, Twenty-one Years' Work in the Holy Land (1886); Thirty Years' Work in the Holy Land (1895). Y. Hodson, "The PEF: Recollections of the Past," Biblical Archaeology Today (1990) 6-8. C. M. Watson, Fifty Years' Work in the Holy Land (1915).

M. P. GRAHAM

PALEY, WILLIAM (1743–1805)

Born at Peterborough, England, P. was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he was elected a fellow in 1766. He taught at Cambridge University and later became archdeacon of Carlisle. His biblical criticism served two purposes. First, it played a crucial role in his popular, if not always original, system of philosophical theology that included his Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785) and Natural Theology (1802). Second, it served as a unified and elaborate response to D. HUME's arguments against miracles. P.'s A View of the Evidences of Christianity (1794) merged two traditions of English orthodoxy, both born of the Deist challenge (see DEISM). The one, theoretical and argumentative, sustained itself on a complicated series of interconnecting analogies between natural and revealed religion. It was this style of argument, best exemplified by J. BUTLER, that P. invoked in his opening discussion of Hume's essay on miracles. The other tradition, empirical and cumulative, which was outlined by C. Leslie (1650–1722) in A Short and Easy Method with the Deists (1697), relied heavily on scrutiny of ancient sources. The seminal assumption here was that consistency disproved fraud and harmony established truth. Since the disciples of JESUS witnessed miracles and recorded their experiences, the validity of Christianity turned on the authenticity of these written testaments. Thus the same standards of harmony and uniformity that led skeptics to dispute the miraculous convinced the orthodox of its existence.

Horae Paulinae (1790) antedated the Evidences by four years; but thematically it was the offspring, not the progenitor, of the later book. Sifting testimony culled from ancient sources, P. argued that the early converts demonstrated their sincerity by their suffering, that they lived and died for the miracles they had witnessed. Moreover, their testimony was not forged, lost, or altered during its transmission through the centuries. In its Cartesian refusal to assume anything essential and its painstaking dissection of the NT, Horae Paulinae anticipated the analytical methods of the Broad Church of the nineteenth century and the New Criticism of the twentieth.

Works: The Works of W. P., DD (7 vols., ed. his son E. Paley, 1825).

Bibliography: M. L. Clarke, P.: Evidences for the Man (1974). D. L. LeMahieu, The Mind of W. P.: A Philosopher and His Age (1976). L. Stephen, DNB 43 (1895) 101-7.

D. L. LEMAHIEU

PAN-BABYLONIANISM

This view of Babylonian cultural domination over the ancient Fertile Crescent arose around 1900 among German cuneiformists, who argued that all ancient cultures and religions with an astral MYTHOLOGY sprang from a common source: Babylon. Their justification grew out of the newfound ability to decipher the thousands of cuneiform texts unearthed throughout the Near East. Among the newly deciphered documents were numerous religio-mythological writings suggesting that the HB reflected the ancient Israelites' dependence on Babylonian culture, mythology, and religion.

The main proponents of this movement were Friedrich DELITZSCH, P. JENSEN, A. JEREMIAS, and H. WINCK-

LER. Delitzsch's three BABEL UND BIBEL lectures (1902) made the public aware of the archaeological (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and philological work and of the conclusions reached by the scholarly world about the HB. Such conservative savants as F. König (1846–1936) challenged these conclusions, and as the controversy intensified, so did public interest. The positions of Delitzsch and his colleagues became increasingly extreme, to the point of claiming that virtually all credit for Western religious thought belonged to the Babylonians and none to the Israelites.

Eventually the theory faltered because of its extravagant and unsubstantiated claims and because it was soon overshadowed by the more modern claims of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE. The movement nevertheless had a significant impact on biblical studies by focusing attention on the vast religious documentation contemporary with the ancient Israelites and on the need to compare Israel's Scripture and religion with these documents.

Bibliography: J. J. Finkelstein, "Bible and Babel: A Comparative Study of the Hebrew and Babylonian Religious Spirit," Commentary 26, 5 (1958) 431-44. H. B. Huffmon, "Babel und Bibel: The Encounter Between Babylon and the Bible," Michigan Quarterly Review 22, 3 (1983) 309-20. A. Jeremias, The OT in the Light of the Ancient East (1904, 1930[4]; ET 1911). J. W. Rogerson, Myth in OT Interpretation (BZAW 134, 1974).

W. C. GWALTNEY, JR.

PAPIAS (60?–130?)

Sources of information on P. are meager. Only fragments of his work have survived, preserved as short quotations by other authors, who also give some brief biographical information. The earliest reference to P. occurs in IRENAEUS's Adversus Haereses (5.33.3-4), but the primary witness is provided by EUSEBIUS in his Historia ecclesiastica (3.39). The dates of P.'s birth and death are not known, with estimates ranging from 60 to 90 CE for his birth and from 110 to 161 CE for his death. Scant information is preserved about his career. He served as bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, Asia Minor; since the name Papias was common in that region, he may have been a native of the area. Both Eusebius and Irenaeus recorded that he wrote one work in five volumes (Hist. eccl. 3.39.1; Adv. Haer. 5.33.4) under the title Exposition of the Sayings of the Lord (Logion Kyriakon Exegeseos). They also asserted that he was a "hearer of John and an associate of Polycarp," although this is frequently disputed. Eusebius claimed that P. held millenarian beliefs (Hist. eccl. 3.39.12).

So little of P.'s Exposition has survived that it is difficult to determine its exact nature. It may have been a collection of sayings, similar to the hypothetical Q source; or it may have been a more overtly theological interpretation of a variety of texts, perhaps along millenarian lines. A fragment of the introduction to this work survives in which P. made reference in a highly formulaic way to his sources (Hist. eccl. 3.39.3-4). His words are sometimes interpreted as indicating that he had access to some of the apostles. On the other hand, he also included non-apostolic elders in his list in a way that has led to the suggestion that they, rather than apostles, were his primary sources. In this fragment P. also stated a preference for oral reports over written ones.

Attempts have been made to distill information on the formation of the NT from these fragments, the most tantalizing of which concern the composition of the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. In two remarks preserved by Eusebius (Hist. eccl. 3.39.15-16), P. is quoted as reporting that "the presbyter [John] said this: that 'Mark, being Peter's translator [or interpreter: hērmēneutes], accurately [akribōs] wrote what he remembered of the things that the Lord had said or done, but not in order [taxei] . . . ' since Peter 'put his teachings in chria form [pros tas chreias], but did not present the sayings of the Lord in an ordered manner [ouch hōsper suntaxin tōn kyriakōn poioumenos logiōn]'; and that 'Matthew preserved the sayings in order [ta logia sunetaxato] in the Hebrew language, and each translated [hērmēneusen] these as able.' " Traditionally these quotations have been taken to imply that Mark was Peter's translator and that Matthew's Gospel was initially composed in Hebrew. More recently the statement has been subjected to critical scrutiny, and ambiguities of expression have been noted. For example, the basis for the judgment on "order" is not known; the extent to which P. is using technical terms (e.g., chreia) is debated; the meaning of the term translator/translate is disputed; and the question is raised as to whether P. was referring to the Gospels as we have them or to some earlier collection. Comments from P. have also been cited as evidence in other discussions surrounding the formation of the NT, e.g., the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, the acceptance of the Revelation of John, and the popularity of the epistles of PAUL. Despite the effort expended on them, the fragments of P. are too slim a resource for substantive conclusions on the composition and formation of the NT.

Bibliography: R. Bauckham, "P. and Polycrates on the Origin of the Fourth Gospel," JTS NS 44 (1993) 24-69. M. Black, "The Use of Rhetorical Terminology in P. on Mark and Matthew," JSNT 37 (1989) 31-41. D. G. Deeks, "P. Revisited," ExpTim 88 (1977) 296-301, 324-29. U. H. J. Körtner, P. von Hierapolis: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des frühen Christentums (FRLANT 133, 1983). J. Kürzinger, P. von Hierapolis und die Evangelien des Neuen Testaments: Gesammelte Aufsätze, Neuausgabe, und Übersetzung der Fragmente, kommentierte Bibliographie (Eichstätter Materialien 4, 1983). A. C. Peru- malil, "Are Not P. and Irenaeus Competent to Report on the Gospels?" ExpTim 91 (1980) 332-37. W. R. Schoedel, Polycarp, Martyrdom of Polycarp, Fragments of P. (The Apostolic Fathers 5, ed, R. M. Grant, 1967); ABD (1992) 5:140-42.

P. L. TRUDINGER

PARABLES OF JESUS

Among the literary genres of the Bible, the parables of JESUS occupy a unique place. While they have antecedents in the HB and in rabbinic literature, they are virtually a new and highly original form in reference to both purpose and content.

The parables of Jesus are confined to the SYNOPTIC Gospels, and they occur in different forms and lengths. Some are brief similes or metaphors, while others, like the parables of the good Samaritan (Luke 10:30-35) and the prodigal son (Luke 15:11-32), are expanded into larger stories. As for the number of parables found in the Gospels, the figure varies depending on how many of Jesus' short, figurative sayings are included: The count has ranged from a low of about thirty to a high of sixty or more.

Historically, allegorization has occupied a central role in parable interpretation. In distinction from the comparative or analogous form of the similitude, an allegory substitutes one thing for another and must be interpreted symbolically; single comparisons are not what they appear to be but must be probed for their deeper meaning. The allegorical method of parable interpretation largely prevailed from the patristic period to the end of the nineteenth century.

1. Ante-Nicene Period. IRENAEUS, the first of the outstanding post-NT theologians, maintained that the Bible can be easily understood by anyone with a sound mind and a devotion to piety and the love of truth. Consequently, he felt that a reasonable and unambiguous approach to the parables would enable one to come to an understanding that is both clear and obvious. Irenaeus was an apologist for the faith; and in spite of his contentions to the contrary, allegorization became his most effective exegetical and apologetic method. However, his use of the method was modest and restrained in comparison to subsequent interpreters.

Although TERTULLIAN did not refer to the parables nearly as often as did Irenaeus, he gave rather detailed attention to the parables of the lost sheep (Matt 18:12-14; Luke 15:1-7), the lost coin (Luke 15:8-10), and the prodigal son. In each instance he made use of allegorization.

The allegorical method of parable interpretation attained its most prominent development with CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN, who were part of the so-called ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL of theology. The Alexandrians attempted to harmonize Christian theology and the Scriptures with Hellenistic philosophy, and in so doing they were drawn to mystical and allegorical exposition.

Clement believed that the style of the Scriptures is parabolic, i.e., its mysteries are veiled and preserved for certain chosen persons endowed with knowledge and faith. Thus the parables have hidden meanings that lie behind what appears to be the principal subject and that are evident only to those who are chosen to comprehend them. In referring to Jesus' statement that he spoke in parables so that "seeing they do not see, and hearing they do not hear or understand" (e.g., Luke 8:10; cf. Isa 6:9-10), Clement wrote that Jesus did not cause the ignorance. Rather, he prophetically exposed the ignorance that existed in his hearers, intimating that they would not understand the things spoken.

Origen succeeded Clement as head of the Alexandrian school, and he proved to be the greatest and most prolific biblical interpreter among the church fathers. Origen believed that the Scriptures were an inspired (see INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE) and infallible repository of truth. However, this truth was not readily evident to the average reader, because it required spiritual discernment to understand the text's hidden and mystical import.

With Origen the allegorical method of parable interpretation attained perhaps its supreme articulation. His exposition of the parable of the good Samaritan is a classic example. The man going down from Jerusalem to Jericho represents Adam, or the doctrine of man, and the fall caused by his disobedience. Jerusalem signifies paradise or heaven; Jericho is the world. The robbers are the powerful adversaries or demons or the false prophets who lived before Christ. The wounds are disobedience and sins. The man stripped of his garments stands for humanity's loss of incorruptibility, immortality, and virtue. He is half dead because his human nature is dead, but his soul is immortal. The priest is the law; the Levite is the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). The Samaritan is Christ; the beast of burden is the body of Christ. The wine is the Word, which instructs and corrects. The oil is the doctrine of charity, of pity or mercy. The inn represents the church and the innkeeper the apostles and their successors, bishops and officials of the church, or the angels assigned to guard the church. The two denarii are the two testaments or love toward God and neighbor or belief in the Father and the Son. The return of the Samaritan is the second coming of Christ.

In addition to the Alexandrian group, there was another school of biblical interpretation, which was centered in Antioch (see ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL). Unlike the Alexandrians, the Antiochenes sought to set forth the literal sense intended by the author, concerning themselves more with the historical and grammatical than with the spiritual and mystical. The two prominent exponents of the school of Antioch were THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA and CHRYSOSTOM.

In his homilies on the Gospel of Matthew, Chrysostom dealt with a number of Jesus' parables. While he tended toward allegorization at times (especially in the parable of the ten virgins [Matt 25:1-13]), his overall emphasis was more restrained, literal, historical than that of the Alexandrians. Chrysostom appears to have been far more interested in the parables' moral emphases than in discerning their hidden spiritual or mystical significance.

It was through the influence of AMBROSE that AUGUSTINE embraced the exegetical tradition of Alexandria. Although he referred often to the parables, especially in his sermons, he seldom offered extended discussions; rather, he made brief comments or cited portions of a given parable. While Augustine believed that the literal and historical meaning was fundamental, he employed allegory when the literal sense of a passage appeared incoherent or obscure. He also drew on the symbolism of numbers in interpretation. For example, in his exposition of the parable of the ten virgins, he asked why the virgins are "five and five" and concluded that it is because the number five denotes the five senses. Augustine admitted that he enjoyed this method of biblical exegesis and that as a preacher he found that it intrigued his hearers and held their attention.

2. Medieval Period. GREGORY THE GREAT, from whose time the beginning of the Middle Ages is often dated, set forth a threefold approach to biblical interpretation. To the traditional historical-allegorical sense he added the moral. The parables are never only bearers of hidden and esoteric meanings; their intention is to call people to repentance and to a life-style becoming to citizens of the kingdom of God. In such parables as those of the laborers in the vineyard (Matt 20:1-15) and the rich man and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), Gregory emphasized the moral virtues of discipline, charity, simplicity, poverty, and mercy.

The allegorical method, together with contemporary theological motifs, was central in medieval parable interpretation. This trend was evident in the work of such writers as the Venerable BEDE and PETER LOMBARD. The latter suggested that the good Samaritan used the bands of the sacraments against the wounds of original and actual sin.

THOMAS AQUINAS gave a new turn to biblical exegesis by minimizing the allegorical and emphasizing the literal sense of the Scriptures. With him, allegorization neared its end as a viable and meaningful method of biblical interpretation.

3. Reformation. The Reformers, particularly LUTHER and CALVIN, centered upon the historical and literal approach to the Bible. Castigating allegorization as "pure jugglery" and "tomfoolery," Luther advocated pursuing the plain and literal sense as far as possible before resorting to hidden or symbolic meanings. His exegesis was also marked by a christological centrality: Everything must be understood and evaluated in relation to Jesus Christ.

The primary emphases of the Reformation can be discerned in Luther's interpretation of the parables. Thus Abraham's words to the rich man in Luke 16 represent Christ's underscoring of the AUTHORITY of the Bible. In opposition to this "true and godly teaching," certain "learned scholars" have devised other ways to learn the truth, including innumerable laws, statutes, and articles like canon law and rules for religious orders.

In expounding the parable of the great banquet (Matt 22:2-14; Luke 14:16-24), Luther commented on the incident of the one who took a place of honor and was later demoted (Luke 14:7-11). He applied this parable to the canon of the mass, which occupied a place of honor; but "it should now get up with shame and give place to Christ, its master, and sit in the lowest place, as it should properly have done in the beginning."

The central Lutheran concept of grace and faith alone is likewise reflected in Luther's parable interpretation. The foolish virgins had "served without oil," which implied for Luther that they had done good works on their own resources and not by virtue of grace. In the parable of the good Samaritan the priest and the Levite were "ministers of the Law." The dichotomy between the actions of the priest and the Levite and those of the Samaritan shows that "the Law makes sin known, but Christ heals through faith and restores man to the grace of God."

With Calvin even more than with Luther there is an absence of allegorizing and a directness that seeks to go immediately to the central point of the parable. In the parables of the good Samaritan and the laborers in the vineyard, which were frequently allegorized, Calvin manifested a marked restraint. He maintained that Jesus' primary purpose in giving the parable of the good Samaritan was to show that neighborliness obliges us to do our duty to each other, duty that is not restricted to friends and relations but is open to the whole human race.

In his analysis of the laborers in the vineyard, Calvin criticized those who would examine the parable's details or who would find the Jews and the Gentiles in it. According to him, such efforts represent "empty curiosity" and a "cleverness that is out of place." There is no hidden symbolism in the denarius or in the various hours when the laborers were hired. Christ's one aim in this parable was to encourage perseverance. However, like Luther, Calvin found theological and doctrinal motifs in the parables. The story of the laborers in the vineyard points to divine sovereignty: God is under obligation to no one and calls whom God wills. Furthermore, God pays those who have been called the reward that seems good to God. The parable of the Pharisee and the publican (Luke 18:9-14) reflects divine sovereignty and grace and human depravity. Jesus condemns human pretention, pride, and a depraved self-trust in the Pharisee, who denies God's grace and places his trust in the merit of his own works.

Although Luther's and Calvin's interpretations are not entirely free of allegorization, the two nevertheless centered their attention on the historical and literal sense of the parables. Their exegesis grounded the sayings in a focused and meaningful theological and ethical framework.

4. Modern Period. The so-called modern period in biblical interpretation can be dated from the advent and development of biblical criticism, from the latter part of the eighteenth century to the present. During this period the Bible has been subjected to the same scrutiny and rigorous analysis as has any other literature. In parable interpretation a number of new methodologies appeared.

An exception to this trend must be noted first, however: R. Trench (1807–86), whose Notes on the Parables of Our Lord was for many years the standard English work on the parables. Published in 1841 and appearing in many subsequent editions, Trench's work set forth a number of principles or guidelines for parable interpretation: e.g., one should distinguish the parable's central truth from all cognate truths that border on it; one must pay careful attention to the introduction and the application of a parable; one should not use the parables as primary sources and bases of theological doctrine. A man of immense learning and erudition, Trench nevertheless was reluctant to employ the new critical methods being developed in his time. He looked back to the church fathers; and in spite of principles seemingly to the contrary, he found allegorization a congenial method of parable interpretation.

Perhaps the first English-language interpreter of the parables to employ higher criticism was A. BRUCE. He rejected allegorization in favor of the historical and linguistic senses of the parables, and he was among the first to propose a scheme of parable classification.

The most influential modern interpreter of the parables was A. JÜLICHER, whose two-volume Die Gleichnisreden Jesu (2 vols., 1888, 1899^2) set a new direction in interpretation, one that had a widespread impact on subsequent scholarship. Jülicher maintained that although the parabolic speech of Jesus may vary in form, the basic unit is always the simile. Unlike metaphor and allegory, simile needs no interpretation; it is clear and self-explanatory. Because the function of simile is to teach, there is no need for questions regarding its meaning and intention. Jülicher's rejection of allegorization was nearly total. He attributed the instances of allegorization in the parables, not to Jesus, but to the early church, maintaining that the parables are characterized by literal speech and are self-explanatory. Parables are related to real life; their intention is to convey a point or moral, and their function is to compel the reader to form a judgment. Jülicher concluded that parables are intended to illuminate one point: a rule, an idea, or an experience that is as valid on the spiritual as on the secular level.

The relationship between Jesus' parables and those in rabbinical writings was explored especially by C. Bugge (1853–1928) and P. Fiebig (1876–1949). Both Bugge (1895) and Fiebig (1904) criticized Jülicher for his non-acquaintance with rabbinical literature and his bias toward Greek and particularly Aristotelian thought. Jesus was a Jew and an oriental, they argued; consequently, he thought concretely and intuitively rather than abstractly. They maintained that Jülicher should have turned to rabbinical writings because these, rather than the Greek, represent the closest approximation to Jesus' parables.

One of the central theme of the parables is the kingdom of God. Protestant liberalism tended to emphasize the imminent, evolutionary, spiritual, and moral aspects of the kingdom. Contrary to this viewpoint, J. WEISS and A. SCHWEITZER emphasized its transcendent and apocalyptic dimensions (see APOCALYPTICISM). Jesus' view of the kingdom of God was radically otherworldly, rather than evolutionary and ethical. This recovery of the eschatological understanding had a marked impact on subsequent parable scholarship.

Emphasizing the eschatological element in Jesus' teaching, C. H. DODD began a new era in parable study (1935). He set forth a twofold purpose: to explore the eschatological dimensions of the parables and to determine the original intention of a given parable in its historical setting.

Dodd followed Jülicher in rejecting allegorization. However, Dodd was not convinced that in the parables Jesus simply intended to teach great and enduring moral and religious truths. While Jülicher laid the foundation for the right understanding of the parables, his method must be supplemented by an attempt to relate them to their particular setting in the eschatological crisis created by Jesus' ministry; that setting should determine their original meaning and application. The parables were given in the context of "realized eschatology" in which the eschaton had moved from the future to the present, from the sphere of expectation into that of realized experience. While parables are works of art and have significance and application beyond their original occasion, one must nevertheless understand them in terms of the realized eschatology in the life and ministry of Jesus.

Acknowledging his indebtedness to Dodd and Jülicher, J. JEREMIAS (1947, 1954^2) thought that an additional approach was needed. The main task that remained was to recover the original meaning of the parables.

Jeremias noted that each of the parables was given in an actual situation of Jesus' life. They were chiefly apologetic in nature, primarily weapons of conflict, and had an existential dimension in that each of them called for immediate response. The task of the interpreter is to recover their distinct historical settings. However, following FORM CRITICISM, Jeremias pointed out that our return to Jesus via the parables must of necessity be from the primitive church. Thus the parables have a double historical location—an original setting in some particular moment of Jesus' activity and another grounded in the life of the primitive church. Before they assumed a written form they "lived" in the early Christian community, which employed them for purposes of preaching and teaching. Jeremias maintained that as we attempt to reconstruct the original setting of the parables we meet with certain "definite principles of transformation," which he grouped under ten headings.

In addition to the ten principles of transformation, Jeremias suggested that the parables and similes fall naturally into ten groups and that the major reference of these ten themes is eschatological. Nonetheless, they also have an existential dimension because it is clear that all of Jesus' parables compel his hearers to come to a decision about his person and mission.

Later parable interpreters have acknowledged their indebtedness to Jeremias, Dodd, and Jülicher but have introduced new motifs. The eschatological setting of the parables that Dodd and Jeremias emphasized became the central focus in the so-called new HERMENEUTIC. Coupled with this has been a new understanding of the nature of language and of the existential aspect of the parables.

The new hermeneutic developed through dialogue between theologians in Germany and in the United States and centered primarily on the writings of E. FUCHS and G. Ebeling (b. 1912), who had been students of R. BULTMANN. It began with the publication of Fuchs's Hermeneutik in 1954. Drawing on motifs found in Bultmann and especially in Heidegger's later works, Fuchs wrote about Jesus' understanding of his own existence and situation, maintaining that the best, though not exclusive, sources for apprehending this understanding are the parables. Fuchs called the parables "language-events," for in them Jesus expressed his understanding of his situation in the world and before God, thus creating the possibility of the hearer's sharing that situation. The pictorial language of parable has the potential to change the hearer's existence and his relationship to reality, e.g., to Jesus, to God, and to the kingdom of God.

Another trend, which developed in the United States, views the parables in their literary and aesthetic dimensions. This approach was especially influenced by the writings of A. WILDER. Among those identified with this movement are N. PERRIN, R. FUNK, D. Via (b. 1928), and J. D. Crossan (b. 1934).

Perrin's (1976) basic concern was to bring to the forefront of contemporary discussion the hermeneutical interaction between author, text, and reader. The "hermeneutical moment" is realized when a text is read and interpreted by an individual and a dynamic relationship ensues between person and text.

The central theme of Funk's analysis (1966; 1982) is the distinction between simile and metaphor, particularly the literary study of the nature of metaphor. While a simile is illustrative, metaphorical language creates meaning. However, the parable or metaphor also has an existential character because it is incomplete until the hearer is drawn into it as a participant.

Perhaps the most significant study of the parables since Jeremias is Via's The Parables: Their Literary and Existential Dimension (1967). Via begins at the literary level and maintains that the parables must be seen as works of art, genuine aesthetic objects that are carefully organized, self-contained, and coherent literary compositions. He emphasizes the non-referential character of the parables: Their revelatory character cannot be traced to their author's biography or environment, for as works of literary art the only important consideration is their internal meaning. By approaching the parables as aesthetic objects, one gains fresh insight into their existential and theological dimensions.

Crossan, like Funk and Via, is interested in the literary and linguistic aspects of the parables. In a succinct definition he states that a parable is a metaphor of normalcy that is intended to create participation in its referent. Unlike Via, Crossan is much concerned about the relationship between the parables and the historical Jesus (1973). The parables provide an avenue to the historical Jesus: They express and contain the temporality of Jesus' experience of God, and they proclaim and establish the historicity of his response to the kingdom.

Crossan uses three terms or categories that he regards as basic for an understanding of all the parables as well as the whole message of Jesus: advent, reversal, and action. He views these categories as "three modes of the Kingdom's temporality." Its advent is a gift of God, which in turn can bring a reversal of the recipient's world; but it also empowers for life and action.

B. Scott's commentary (1989) analyzes Jesus' parables in their literary context within the Gospels (and within the Gospel of Thomas), in their development within the oral tradition of the early church, and in their situation within the life and ministry of Jesus. Informed by the work of several modern interpreters, Scott endeavors to reconstruct an originating structure for each parable and to determine how that structure affects the parable's meaning. He sees a "parabolic effect" in the interaction between the story told and the kingdom referred to. Of particular interest is Scott's use of methods from the social sciences (see SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISM) to clarify the social world in which Jesus' parables arose.

It appears evident that developing trends in parable interpretation reflect a decreasing emphasis on historical, moralistic, and theological concerns and an increasing emphasis on the LITERARY-critical, existential, and social aspects of the parabolic speech of Jesus.

Bibliography: L. Agisi, Gesu et le sue parabole (1963). M. Boucher, The Mysterious Parable (CBQMS 6, 1977). C. A. Bugge, Jesu Hoved Parabler: ud lagate (1895). J. D. Crossan, In Parables: The Challenge of the Historical Jesus (1973); Finding Is the First Act: Trove Folktales and Jesus' Treasure Parable (1979); Cliffs of Fall: Paradox and Polyvalence in the Parables of Jesus (1980). C. H. Dodd, The Parables of the Kingdom (1935; rev. ed. 1948, 1958[3]). P. Fiebig, Altjudische Gleichnisse und die Gleichnisse Jesu (1904). D. Flusser, Die rabbinischen Gleichnisse und der Gliechniserzähler Jesus 1 (1981). E. Fuchs, Hermeneutik (1954; 1958[2], with Ergänzungsheft; 1970[4]); "L'évangile et l'argent: Le parabole de l'intendant intelligent," BCPE 20 (1978) 1-14. R. W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutics, and the Word of God (1966); Parables and Presence (1982). D. M. Granskou, Preaching on the Parables (1972). A. M. Hunter, Interpreting the Parables (1960). J. Jeremias, The Parables of Jesus (1947, 1952[2]; ET rev. ed. 1963). G. V. Jones, The Art and Truth of the Parables: A Study in Their Literary Form and Modern Interpretation (1964). A. Jülicher, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu, pt. 1, Die Gleichnisreden Jesu im Allgemeinen; pt. 2, Auslegung der Gleichnisreden der drei ersten Evangelien (1889, 1899[2]; repr. of both vols., 1910). J. D. Kingsbury, "Major Trends in Parable Interpretation," CTM 42 (1971) 579-96; "The Parables of Jesus in Current Research," Dialog 11 (1972) 101-7. W. S. Kissinger, The Parables of Jesus: A History of Interpretation and Bibliography (1979). N. Perrin, Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom (1976). B. B. Scott, Hear Then the Parables: A Commentary on the Parables of Jesus (1989). C. Thoma and M. Wyschogrod (eds.), Parable and Story in Judaism and Christianity (1989). M. A. Tolbert, Perspectives on the Parables: An Approach to Multiple Interpretations (1979). D. O. Via, The Parables: Their Literary and Existential Dimension (1967); "The Relation of Form to Content in the Parables of the Wedding Feast," Int 25 (1971) 171-85; "Kingdom and Parable: The Search for a New Grasp of Symbol, Metaphor, and Myth," Int 31 (1978) 181-83; S. L. Wailes, Medieval Allegories of Jesus' Parables (1987). A. N. Wilder, Early Christian Rhetoric: The Language of the Gospel (1971).

W. S. KISSINGER

PARACELSUS (1493–1541)

Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus ab Hohenheim was a German alchemist, physician, and mystic; he has become an almost legendary figure who is one of the most bizarre characters in the history of science. He coined the name P. from Latin, claiming thereby to be above the famed Celsus, a first-century Roman physician and encyclopedist. Born near Einsiedeln, Switzerland, of German parentage, he studied medicine at the universities of Basel, Tübingen, Vienna, Wittenberg, Leipzig, Heidelberg, and Cologne but distrusted them all. Although he took a degree in medicine from Vienna in 1510, he always claimed that his doctoral degree had been awarded by the University of Ferrara in 1516, where the faculty was influenced by Renaissance humanism. He also studied under Trithemius, abbot of Sponheim, who instilled in him a deep devotion to both the Bible and the mystical Jewish KABBALAH.

Throughout his life P. traveled extensively, insisting that human experience was a far greater teacher than the "high colleges" that produced so many "high asses." In 1526 he was appointed town physician and (against the wishes of the faculty) university lecturer on medicine at Basel, where he was in contact with, and praised by, the printer Frobenius (c. 1460–1527) and ERASMUS. However, his revolutionary tactics, outrageous behavior, and belligerently argumentative and scathing style led to his dismissal a year later. He openly repudiated the long-accepted views of Aristotle, Galen, and Avicenna, whose textbooks he publicly burned to the delight of his students and the dismay of his colleagues. From 1527 to his death he wandered about southern Germany and Austria until invited in 1541 to settle in Salzburg under the protection of the archbishop. He lived there only a few months before dying.

C. JUNG declared P. "a pioneer not only of chemical medicine but of empirical psychology and psychotherapy." For P. these were the same. He perceived the human body as a "microcosm" corresponding to the "macrocosm" of nature and held that a proper understanding of the relations between these two could cure all disease. Intellectually he was a typically medieval thinker who boldly faced the new humanism of the Renaissance. His opinions were firmly theistic, though unorthodox; at the same time Neoplatonic views, derived from PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA and others, contributed to his thought. Traces of the Corpus Hermeticum and of Gnosticism (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION) can be found throughout his voluminous writings, and his attachment to the mystical power of the Kabbalah led him to delve into the Bible for its insights on humanity and the universe. He saw the world as a mixture of naturalism with supernaturalism and of mysticism with science. As an interpreter of Scripture he placed great reliance on "the creative power of the imagination."

P.'s commentaries on the HB include all the psalms, the Ten Commandments (see DECALOGUE), Daniel, and a portion of Isaiah. His NT commentaries include the Gospels of Matthew and John, the letters of Peter, James, Jude, and the JOHANNINE LETTERS. He also wrote many sermons and meditations on the Virgin Mary, the Trinity, the sacraments, and purgatory. He read the psalms from a Christian point of view: Thus Psalm 105 teaches the missionary enterprise of the church as the true praise of God; Psalm 138 shows where the true church is in relation to theodicy and predestination; Psalm 144 depicts the battle of parents for their children and their future; Psalm 147 presents the new Jerusalem and its relation to prevailing Christianity; and Psalm 150 portrays the ideal image of heavenly Jerusalem as the ultimate praise of God. His exposition of the Ten Commandments found in the first the doctrine of the Trinity and of Christ's deliverance of humankind, and his commentary on Daniel presented the exegetical principle that the book's object is the battle against false Christianity. Thus Dan 3:1 treats of the end of the papacy, and Daniel 4 raises the question of whether Turks and Muscovites are to be heirs of king and pope after the present age. P. expounded the theological position of angels, the purpose of existing kingdoms and states, and the spiritual development of Christianity. In the NT P. saw considerable reference to divine magic: the star announcing the birth of Christ, the visit of the magi, stories of the miracles of Christ, Christ's encounters with the numinous, and demonic stars as signs revealing what was hidden rather than as a causative agent for what occurred on earth.

An independent biblical expositor, P. wrote from decades of practical experience, with Olympian self-confidence. The structure of his thought was conditioned by his career as a physician, and his influence has been great.

Works: P.: Selected Writings (ed. J. Jacobi, tr. N. Guterman, 1951), with preface on life and works; Sämtliche Werke, Zweite Abteilung, Theologische und Religionsphilosophische Schriften, Bd. 3, Dogmatische und polemische Einzelschriften (ed. W. Goldammer, 1986); Bd. 4–7, Auslegung des Psalters Davids (1955–87) 1-115; Bd. 7, Auslegung über die zehn Gebote Gottes (1987) 117-359.

Bibliography: K. Goldammer, P. in neuen Horizonten: Gesammelte Aufsätze (1986). J. G. Hargrave, The Life and Soul of P. (1951). R. Hartmut, "Schriftauslegung und Schriftverständnis bei P.," Medizinhistorisches Journal 16 (1981) 101-24. C. G. Jung, P.: Two Lectures (1942) = "P. as a Spiritual Phenomenon," Collected Works 13 (1951) 109-88. A. Miller-Guinsburg, "Paracelsian Magic and Theology: A Case Study of the Matthew Commentaries," Medizinhistorisches Journal 16 (1981) 125-39. H. M. Pachter, Magic into Science: The Story of P. (1951). W. Pagel, P.: An Introduction to Philosophical Medicine in the Era of the Renaissance (1958). A. Stoddart, The Life of P., Theophrastus von Hohenheim (1911).

J. M. BULLARD

PARKER, THEODORE (1810–60)

Born in Lexington, Massachusetts, May 24, 1810, P. pursued private study, passing non-resident Harvard examinations in 1830–31, and graduated from Harvard Divinity School in 1836. He served as a private teacher in Watertown, Massachusetts (1831–33), as a Unitarian pastor in Roxbury, Massachusetts (1837–46), and at the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society in Boston (1846–59). He died in Florence, Italy, May 10, 1860.

P. was one of the foremost intellectual and social liberals during the pre–Civil War era in the United States. He lectured, wrote, and preached on a number of reformist causes and for years campaigned against slavery. He believed it possible to distinguish between the permanent and the transient aspects of Christianity, opposed creedal declarations, particularly christological ones, and worked to moderate the AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE—"this idol which men have made of the Scripture."

Amassing a private library of over 13,000 volumes, P. helped to disseminate German thought in the United States. As one of the editors of the moderate Scriptural Interpreter (pub. 1831–36), he acquainted its readers with European thought, providing an English summary of J. ASTRUC's 1753 work and introducing W. DE WETTE's work into New England. His translation and expansion of de Wette's OT introduction to the Bible (2 vols., 1843), which went through four English editions (1867^4), was practically a new work; P.'s annotations and additions make up about half of the English version. In his preface, P. stated that he was originally undecided over whether to call the work a translation of de Wette's introduction or an introduction on the basis of de Wette. P. corresponded with and visited de Wette, H. EWALD, and other German scholars, reporting on his meetings with them and offering a somewhat unique, sympathetic evaluation of German scholarship. The work of P. and of other American scholars made de Wette one of the best-known and appreciated foreign scholars in the United States.

Works: "D. F. Strauss's Das Leben Jesu," Christian Examiner 38 (1840) 273-316; A Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion (1842); Sermons of Theism, Atheism, and the Popular Theology (1853); Collected Works (Centenary edition, 15 vols., 1907–13).

Bibliography: J. W. Brown, The Rise of Biblical Criticism in America, 1800–70 (1964) 153-70. J. W. Chadwick, T. P.: Preacher and Reformer (1900); Life of T. P. (1901). H. S. Comager, T. P.: Yankee Crusader (1936); (ed.), T. P.: An Anthology (1948). J. E. Dirks, The Critical Theology of T. P. (1948). O. B. Frothingham, Theodore Parker (1874). S. B. Puknat, "De Wette in New England," PAPS 102 (1958) 376-95. J. Weiss, The Life and Correspondence of T. P., Minister of the Twenty-eighth Congregational Society, Boston (2 vols., 1864, repr. 1969).

J. H. HAYES

PARROT, ANDRÉ (1901–80)

An important French archaeologist, P. was born at Desandans, Doubs, in 1901 and studied at the French School of ARCHAEOLOGY at Jerusalem, remaining there to serve the Lutheran Church as a pastor. From 1931 to 1967 he directed digs at Tello and Larsa in Iraq, then at Mari in Syria (1933–74), for which he is chiefly remembered. In 1936 he was appointed professor in the Protestant theological faculty of Paris; and in 1937, professor at the École du Louvre. He became chief conservator of oriental antiquities of the Louvre Museum in 1946, rising to the post of director in 1968. He died in Paris.

P. recovered more than 20,000 clay tablets from the excavations at Mari on the Euphrates. Principally from the royal palace archives, these tablets were composed mainly during the reign of Zimri-lin (18th cent. BCE), and their texts have significantly amplified the historical understanding of western Asia, especially regarding the social, cultural, and linguistic backgrounds of the HB world. P.'s voluminous works on ancient Near Eastern literature, history, architecture, and philology are marked by clarity, humor, enthusiasm, and authority.

Works: Mari, une ville perdue et retrouvée par l'archeologie française (1936); Malédictions et Violations de Tombes (1939); Tello, vingt campagnes de fouilles (1948); Les Archives Royales de Mari (9 vols., 1950–60); Discovering Buried Worlds (1955); Nineveh and the OT (1955); Studies in Biblical Archaeology: The Flood and Noah's Ark (1955); The Temple at Jerusalem (1955); The Tower of Babel (1955); Mission archéologique de Mari (4 vols., 1956–68); Golgotha and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (1957); Babylon and the OT (1958); Samaria, the Capital of the Kingdom of Israel (1958); Sumer (1960); The Arts of Assyria (ET 1961); Assur (1961); Abraham et son Temps (1962); Les Temples d'Ishtarat et de Ninnizaza (1967); Land of Christ: Archaeology, History, Geography (ET 1968); Les Phénicians: L'expansion phénicienne Carthage (1975); L'Aventure archéologique (1979).

Bibliography: Z. Garber, EncJud 13 (1971–72) 140. Grand Dictionnaire Encyclopédique Larousse 8 (1984) 7854. International Who's Who (1980[44]) 969.

J. M. BULLARD

PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS (c. 790–c. 860)

Little is known of P.'s early life except for the few references in Englemodus of Soissons' laudatory poem, "Ad Ratbertum Abbatem." Apparently left as an infant in the care of the nuns at St. Mary's Abbey at Soissons, where a cousin of Charlemagne, Theodrada, was abbess, he entered the abbey of Corbie while in his early twenties. Here two brothers of Theodrada served as abbots (780–835). Some scholars have hypothesized that P. was related to the royal family or that he served at the royal court for a time before entering Corbie. Never ordained a priest, he was a catechetical instructor at Corbie, where he taught Scripture and for a time served as abbot (c. 843–c. 851). Facing opposition from his monks, he withdrew to the monastery of Saint-Riquier (Centula) but later returned to Corbie, where he died.

P.'s theological writings on the Eucharist and Mariology were significant and highly influential in the medieval church. Three exegetical works survive: an exposition of Psalm 44; a commentary on Lamentations that treated the book as an independent work rather than as an integral part of the book of Jeremiah; and a massive commentary on Matthew in twelve books, initially begun as a by-product of his teaching but written over an extended period of time. In his exegesis he was heavily dependent on earlier sources; the wealth of extracts from the church fathers in the commentary on Matthew was a major source for the later GLOSSA ORDINARIA. Although P. read various levels of meaning into the text, varying between two and three spiritual senses, he nevertheless could understand the text in a very literal fashion as is evidenced by his argument for the physical presence of Christ's body in the Eucharist on the basis of Jesus' statement, "This is my body."

P.'s attraction to Lamentations was perhaps partially stimulated by the troubled times in which he lived, which he saw as analogous to the turmoil reflected in the biblical texts. His Latin text of Lamentations shows affinities to non-VULGATE Spanish texts. Taking a rhetorical approach to the book, he saw chapter 5 as the summation and climax. P.'s eucharistic and Mariological interests clearly pervade the Matthew commentary, and he also incorporated a Mariological reading into his exposition of the Song of Songs. For him, Scripture was a mystery and a sacrament whose comprehension parallels an understanding of the incarnation. Following TYCONIUS's fourth rule of "species and genus," he read events and statements in the text as allegorical pointers and embodiments of higher, especially ecclesiological, truths.

Works: Opera (ed. J. Sirmond, 1618); PL 120; Expositio in Matheo libri XII (CCCM 56a-c, ed. B. Paulus, 1984); Expositio in Lamentationes Hieremiae libri quinque (CCCM 85, ed. B. Paulus, 1988); Expositio in Psalmen XLIV (CCCM 94, ed. B. Paulus, 1991).

Bibliography: E. Choisy, Histoire littéraire de la France 5 (1866) 287-314; Paschase Radbert: Étude historique sur le IXe siècle et sur le dogme de la Cene ithese (1888). A. Hauck, NSHERK 9 (1911) 380-81. M. L. W. Laistner, Thought and Letters in Western Europe, AD 500 to 900 (1957) 298-314. H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale les quartres sens de l'écriture 2, 1 (1960) 199-209. G. Mathon, "Paschase Radbert et l'évolution de l'humanisme carolingien," Corbie Abbaye Royale, volume du XIIIe Centenaire (1963) 135-46. E. A. Matter, "The Lamentations Commentaries of Hrabanus Maurus and P. R.," Traditio 38 (1982) 137-63. C. Maus, A Phenomenology of Revelation: P. R.'s Way of Interpreting Scripture (Pontificium Athenaeum Antonianum, Faculta Theologica, Theses ad Lauream 180, 1970). H. Peltier, Pascase Radbet, abbé de Corbie: Contribution a l'étude de la vie monastique et de la pensée chrétienne aux temps carolingiens (1938). A. E. Schönbach, "Über einige Evangelienkommentare des Mittelalters," Sitzungsberichte der Akademie der Wissenschaften Wien: Philosophisch-historiche Klasse 146, 4 (1903) 1-175, esp. 142-74. E. Steitz, RE 16 (1905³) 394-402. H. Weisweiler, "P. R. als Vermittler des Gedankengutes des karolingischen Renaissance in den Matthäuskommentaren des Kreises um Anselm von Laon," Scholastik 35 (1960) 363-402.

J. H. HAYES

PASTORAL LETTERS

This designation for 1–2 Timothy and Titus is generally accepted as due to P. Anton (1726), although he did not restrict it to these letters alone (see P. Harrison [1921] 13-16).

1. Early Period. These three letters formed a recognized group from the beginning and as letters to individuals were usually followed by Philemon in canonical lists (in the Muratorian canon they follow Philemon) and in manuscripts. They also usually follow the order 1–2 Timothy, Titus, although in both Muratori and Ambrosiaster, Titus precedes 1–2 Timothy; in the latter, Colossians is inserted between them. Found neither in MARCION'S CANON nor in P^{46}, they are first quoted as Pauline by IRENAEUS (Adv. Haer. 1.16.3, 2.14.7, 3.14.1). CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA wrote that some heretics rejected 1–2 Timothy (Strom. 2.11). TERTULLIAN maintained that Marcion accepted Philemon but rejected the Pastorals (Adv. Marc. 5.21), although it may be that he was unaware of their existence. In the prologue to his commentary on Titus, JEROME alleged that TATIAN rejected 1–2 Timothy and that ORIGEN provided a commentary on Titus but none on 1–2 Timothy. Origen's commentary is not extant, but it would have been the earliest on any of these books.

From the beginning of the third century the letters were accepted as canonical. The patristic commentaries rarely went further than a simple expansion of the text, and the letters exercised little influence except in the liturgies and church orders (C. Spiq [1969] 1:11-14; W. Lock [1924] xxxviii-xli). Different views were taken among the fathers as to whom the author attacked. Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 1, preface 1) and Tertullian (Adv. Valent. 3) took the opponents to be Gnostics (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION). Later, when the Gnostic peril had subsided, the letters were regarded as being directed against Jews or Judaizers (e.g., Theodore of Mopsuestia and Chrysostom on 1 Tim 1:14). CHRYSOSTOM, unable to deny their Hellenistic element, suggested that PAUL prophesied about the Gnostics. The purpose of the letters was generally seen as giving directions for church leaders (e.g., Muratori) with the subsidiary aim of defeating heretics (see G. Wohlenberg [1923] 37-41; P. Trummer [1978] 15-19). For lists and discussion of patristic commentaries see Spicq (1969, 1:11-14); Lock (xli-xlii); and C. Turner (1905, 5:489-521).

2. Reformation. During this period no doubts were expressed about the authenticity of the letters. CALVIN viewed them as useful for setting in order the many failings of the church (preface to 1 Timothy). Since many Protestant scholars had begun to regard Scripture as providing the essential basis for their own church order, the letters were examined closely, especially in relation to whether they distinguish between bishops and presbyters (elders). Most denominations used them in their ordinals, although they understood them differently.

3. Modern Period. Although J. Schmidt (1804) had earlier voiced doubts, F. SCHLEIERMACHER (1807) was the first to question directly the authenticity of the letters, though only of 1 Timothy, basing his argument on linguistic considerations. J. G. EICHHORN (1812) was the first to impugn the authenticity of all three letters; he regarded their content as Pauline, but written by a disciple. F. C. BAUR (1835, 8-39) provided the first systematic challenge, arguing that they could be understood only against the background of the second-century Gnostic movement, which they were written to rebut. Since Marcion did not know them they must have been written after his time and were probably directed against him. Many scholars supported Baur in his rejection of Pauline authorship, although they did not always date them as late as he did or accept their anti-Marcionite nature.

a. Holtzmann's interpretation and influence. The classical nineteenth-century treatment opposing Pauline authorship is that of H. HOLTZMANN (1880). He not only provided a history of earlier interpretation during that century (7-15) but set out in great detail the areas on which discussion has centered ever since. Negatively he pointed to: (1) the difficulty of finding a place for the Pastorals in Paul's known lifetime; (2) difficulties in relation to Timothy and Titus; and (3) the un-Pauline nature of their language and style. In his positive development of the thought of the letters he pointed to: (4) the heresy they attack, which fits a period later than Paul's lifetime; (5) their doctrinal teaching; (6) the ecclesiastical organization they depict; and (7) the external evidence.

i. Relation to Paul's lifetime. The letters indicate that Paul was imprisoned when writing 2 Timothy but free at the time of 1 Timothy and Titus. Since in 2 Tim 4:6 he is about to die and the three letters form a unit, all three must have been written toward the end of his life and during his final imprisonment in Rome. Since prior to that imprisonment he is envisaged as making a journey to Macedonia (1 Tim 1:3), leaving Titus in Crete and spending a winter in Nicopolis (Titus 3:12), and since there is no place in Acts into which these and other data can be fitted, some scholars have concluded that after the imprisonment of Acts 28 Paul was set free, traveled in the East, and was imprisoned again in Rome. During this imprisonment he wrote 2 Timothy and shortly thereafter was executed. Those who defend this view differ as to the date of execution, choosing either 64 or 67 CE. The suggestion of a second Roman imprisonment can be traced back as far as EUSEBIUS (Hist. ecc. 2.22.2). However, all this entails a reconstruction of Paul's life for which there is no support in Acts; moreover, Acts 20:25 suggests that Paul did not travel again to the East (on possible journeys by Paul see W. Metzger [1976]). Increasing doubts as to the reliability of Acts have not served to soften this attack since those who defend the authenticity of the Pastorals usually also defend the reliability of Acts (on the question of whether all, some, or none of the historical data are fictitious see A. Hanson [1982] 14-23).

ii. Difficulties regarding Timothy. Holtzmann argued that if we assume a second imprisonment for Paul, Timothy by that time must have been no longer a youth; yet he is bidden to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim 2:22) and to allow no one to despise his youth (1 Tim 4:12). Paul advises him as a catechuman rather than as the mature Christian he must then have been. It is also surprising that Paul should write to him in such detail after just having left him.

iii. Un-Pauline language and style. Holtzmann devoted considerable space to this argument. Harrison (1921, 18-86) extended his line of approach, providing an exhaustive analysis and pointing out that (a) there is a high number of hapax legomena; (b) words appearing in both the Pastorals and in the genuine Paulines are often used differently; (c) the same thing is said with different words; (d) favorite Pauline particles and many words characteristic of Pauline theology are absent; (e) un-Pauline grammatical constructions are used; (f) the letters are generally less vivid, intense, and dynamic than the genuine Paulines; (g) the letters, being similar in these various points, form a distinct group; (h) the language of the letters approximates more closely that of the apostolic fathers and of the apologists than that of Paul. Since Harrison's arguments are based on statistics, statistical experts have refined them and provided a sounder basis than simple enumeration (P. Trummer [1978] 28-34; see K. Grayston and G. Herdan [1959] and the more detailed work of S. Michaelson and A. Morton [1973] with various associates). Ignoring many of the above points, Morton turned the discussion into new areas by examining features characteristic of a writer (sentence length, use of simple words like and, etc.), which he claims are unaffected by an author's age or subject matter. Defenders of Pauline authenticity (e.g., Spicq [1969] 1:179-200) have concentrated their attention on showing errors in Harrison's work (e.g., the fact that words are first found in the apostolic fathers apart from the Pastorals is no proof that they were unknown in Paul's day and that more evidence has turned up since Harrison wrote; see D. Guthrie [1957] 212-28). More positively, it is argued that changes in subject matter ensure the introduction of new words, that writers develop, and that increasing age (Paul would have been an old man when writing the Pastorals) affects vigor of style.

iv. Attack on heresy. The Pastorals reject false teaching, and Holtzmann indicated that scholars had taken its source to lie in one or more of four areas: Gnosticism, Judaism or Judaizers, Samaritan Gnosis (Simon), or Essenism. The last two are no longer taken seriously as direct sources for the alleged heresy, although the teachings of Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) may be seen as part of Judaism and as influencing the growth of Gnosticism. The first two views were held by various church fathers (see sec. 1 above). Some scholars have identified the heresy as that of particular Gnostic sects (Baur, 8-39; thought of Marcion). Such identifications would be difficult if the letters are dated in the earlier part of the second century and impossible if regarded as Pauline. Continuing discussion of the nature and origin of Gnosticism has not completely clarified the issues, nor have the discoveries at Nag Hammadi led to a more precise identification, although J. Sell (1982) sees a connection with Thomas the Contender (CG II 138.1-145.23). Meanwhile, many scholars, especially those wishing to defend Pauline authorship, have seen the heretics as Jewish Christians (e.g., Spicq, 91); this permits their placement in Paul's lifetime, although it is not claimed that the heresy is the same as that encountered by Paul in Galatia. Most scholars, however, appear to view the heresy as linked to the beginning of Gnosticism but as also including strong Jewish elements (e.g., G. Haufe [1973]; see also W. Lütgert [1909], N. Brox [1969] 31-42). It is generally agreed that the heresy was ascetic rather than christological. There is also a growing tendency to use a more neutral term than heresy and speak of a faction within the church that the writer opposes.

v. Doctrinal teaching. Holtzmann's conclusions on the teaching of the letters, although not directly addressing the question of authenticity, entailed an author much later than Paul. In particular he found teaching on the law, christology, justification, and faith that differed from Paul's and an un-Pauline emphasis on piety, together with a stress on good works, to be signs of a growing orthodoxy. Although Holtzmann did not use the term, later critics would describe these emphases, when allied with the stress on church order (see below), as indicating early Catholicism. Since A. DEISSMANN the absence of Christ-mysticism has been emphasized. Those who defend Pauline authorship explain these differences by arguing that genuine Pauline theology is not entirely absent, that his theology was never stereotyped, that a changed situation would lead to new elements, and that an imitator would never omit key Pauline doctrines.

vi. Ecclesiastical organization. In his discussion of the nature of the order of the community envisaged in the Pastorals (he surveyed such matters as bishops, elders, deacons, widows, worship, church discipline), Holtzmann concluded that the form of ministry belongs to the second century rather than to the first. A hardening has taken place; there is an established church; and the spontaneity of the authentic Paulines seen in charismatic activity has almost disappeared. Defenders of Pauline authorship (see, e.g., Guthrie, 24-32) point to Paul's appointment of elders in Acts (14:23; 20:17; these references are taken as historical). As his death approached, Paul necessarily became more interested in arranging the continuance of the church; no actual position is spelled out for him in the church; and the language used of the actual offices is imprecise (Spicq, 70, 73-74). As in earlier years some writers still adopt confessional positions in discussing organization, emphasizing the distinction between laity and hierarchy or the equivalence or non-equivalence of bishops and elders. However, because of the ecumenical movement most commentators no longer attempt to draw from the Pastorals models for church organization today.

The letters themselves do not suggest that the ministerial pattern they set out was intended to be adhered to forever. In comparison with the authentic Pauline letters, the charismatic nature of ministry is minimized in the Pastorals, and its institutional nature is emphasized. This emphasis is in line with a changed view of the nature of the church. The phrases with which Paul linked the church to Christ—body of Christ, bride of Christ—have disappeared, and the church is likened instead to a great household whose head is God. Consequently, much of the instruction on behavior in the church is modeled on the household, and proper conduct is what would be appropriate in a household. This led to the use of the haustafel form of Eph 5:22–6:9 and Col 3:18–4:6. H. Hübner (1990, 1:378) can therefore justly characterize the Pastorals as the domestication of early Christianity.

vii. External evidence. Holtzmann (257-75) argued that CLEMENT OF ROME was not acquainted with the Pastorals but that Polycarp was. Although the letters were not expressly quoted until the last third of the second century, their content was known by its middle. Since Holtzmann's time the realization of their use of common catechetical, liturgical, and creedal material (see below) has made estimations of their dependence on others or of others on them much more difficult.

b. Following Holtzmann. Holtzmann indeed set the agenda for the succeeding discussion, although, of course, as new techniques have developed through the application of modern social theory (see M. MacDonald [1983]; D. Verner [1983]) and culture changes, e.g., the rise of the feminist movement, new questions have arisen and have been addressed. In consequence, the delay in the parousia is no longer seen as the main factor controlling the thought of the letters. Insofar as attention has been given to the place of widows in the letters, their position and evaluation appear different from that in the genuine letters of Paul (see J. Bassler [1984]; J. Dewey [1992]; L. Maloney [1994]). No consensus has yet appeared as to whether 1 Tim 3:11 refers to Roman officials or to wives of male deacons.

Closely linked to the issue of the dependence of the Pastoral letters on catechetical and liturgical material is that of date. Upholders of Pauline authorship adhere to a period just prior to his death. Others vary considerably. Baur's original claim that the Pastorals were anti-Marcionite is still upheld (e.g., W. Bauer, 226; H. von Campenhausen [1963] 205-6, 243-45), necessitating a date near the middle of the second century. Most scholars prefer to place them closer to its beginning because of their similarity of thought to that of other writings from that period, but all recognize that they are particularly difficult to date precisely. Those who do not accept as genuine their historical and geographical data generally agree that their provenance is Asia Minor.

If the letters are not by Paul, then who was their actual author? Many suggestions have been made. Luke's influence has regularly been seen, but not many scholars have gone as far as J. Quinn (1990, 19) in suggesting that Luke intended the Pastorals as a third and concluding volume to his Gospel and Acts. Since Holtzmann's time and in agreement with him, those who reject Pauline authorship customarily take the letters to have been written in the order 2 Timothy, Titus, 1 Timothy (the traditional order accords with length) on the basis of development of ministry, literary standpoint, and lessening of personal references (E. Scott [1936] 17-19).

Apart from their response to the arguments of those attacking Pauline authorship, its defenders say that it is improbable that a devout Christian would compose a forgery in Paul's name (e.g., J. Kelly [1963] 33), that there were better ways of passing on Paul's teaching than writing letters in his name, and that the multitude of personalia make the letters read like genuine letters rather than like fictions. Apart from the simple suggestion that the letters are pseudonymous because Paul did not write them, there is a kind of double pseudonymity, for the letters are not directed to the real Timothy and Titus but to the groups that support them. Their real purpose is to instruct these groups on how the church is to be continued.

The cricitism of Holtzmann and others led to Roman Catholic scholars' being forced by a decision of the Pontifical Biblical Commission of 1913 to defend the authenticity of the letters (see Trummer, 25-26). They were, however, freed from this decision by DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1962); and many now no longer accept Pauline authorship.

It cannot be said that since Holtzmann's time the discussion of authenticity has been much advanced. No substantially new arguments have been produced; however, fresh avenues of study have been opened up, mostly, though not entirely, pioneered by those who view the letters as coming from a time later than Paul. Rejection of Pauline authorship allows the letters to be treated as deriving from a single author who wrote for his own community and not another, and whose thinking should be studied in its own right. This has raised the question of whether the letters' author is merely a compiler of traditional material and views or a consistent theologian (see Trummer, 161-226; L. Donelson [1986] 129-54; H. von Lips [1979] for attempts to set out his thinking), even if one who is not as profound as Paul or the Fourth Evangelist. Much study of the letters in the past was dominated by the quest to show how they repeated, modified, and misunderstood the genuine Paulines. It was always, however, accepted that the Pastorals stood a stage farther away from Paul than Ephesians and Colossians. Before turning to new attempts to understand the Pastorals, it is necessary to point to two approaches that have attempted to find a middle ground for those who wish to retain a connection with Paul while accounting for evidence that suggests he did not write the letters.

First, the letters have been held to contain genuine Pauline fragments. Initially proposed by Credner (1836) and Hitzig (1843; see Harrison, 94), this became a widespread theory after Holtzmann (see J. Moffatt [1918] 402-6). Harrison (86-135), who provided the most detailed presentation of the theory, discovered clusters of Pauline terms and thought that enabled him to separate five fragments, place them in Paul's own lifetime as revealed in Acts, and account for the existence of the personalia. Different scholars identify fragments differently (Harrison later decided that there were only three); this lack of unanimity has led to skepticism about the attempt, as has also the letters' supposed nature and the way the author of the Pastorals is alleged to have dismembered them. As a variation of this theory R. Falconer (1937, 5-19; cf. P. Dornier [1965] 25) held that a disciple of Timothy worked over a number of brief genuine letters to adapt them for his own period.

Second, it is claimed that the use of a secretary would account for linguistic differences from the accepted Paulines (on secretaries in the ancient world see O. Roller [1933] 18-22 and notes 120-40; see also E. Richards [1991]). H. Schott (1830) first suggested this, proposing Luke as the secretary (Silvanus and Tychicus have also been suggested). If Paul was manacled (2 Tim 1:16; 2:9), a secretary would have been essential. (Roller suggested a secretary only for 2 Timothy, but the unitary style and thought of the three letters would necessitate the same secretary for all.) The linguistic differences from Paul, however, require some freedom on the part of the secretary; and linguistic freedom entails a degree of theological freedom. The thought of the letters cannot then be purely Pauline.

Work on the Pastorals as well as on other NT letters has led to a renewed examination of the attitude of the ancient world to pseudonymity. (For the discussion with its particular reference to the Pastorals see Brox, 60-61; Donelson, 1-66; Guthrie [1965]; D. Meade [1986] 118-60.) If the letters are pseudonymous, then the mass of personalia suggests that the writer was consciously aware of what he was doing and that the letters of Paul were well known.

If Paul was not the author, either directly or indirectly, who was? Luke has been regularly suggested (see F. Strobel [1969]), although others have also been proposed (Polycarp, by Campenhausen). Lukan authorship, argued on linguistic, theological, and historical grounds, is attractive to some scholars as preserving a link with Paul, although this attractiveness is lost if the author of Luke–Acts was not Paul's medical companion (so S. Wilson [1979]). Other scholars have followed Morton, using different parameters and methods in applying statistics (e.g., A. Kenny [1986]; K. Neumann [1990]; D. Mealand [1995]), facilitated through the use of computers, although it cannot be said that they have significantly modified his results.

Are they, however, genuine letters? They lack the personal and emotional tone one would expect if writer and recipient knew each other, although it was not uncommon in the ancient world to use letters for the purpose of instruction. The genre of Titus has thus been taken by many to be testamentary (A. Hultgren [1984] 27) rather than epistolary. Without naming an author, attempts have been made to characterize him: not a first-generation Christian, probably Jewish, the holder of a clerical office (Brox, 57); a child of Christian parents, a monarchical bishop, a conventional gentile Christian (Campenhausen, 207-10); influenced by Stoic and Cynic teaching (B. Fiore [1986]); governed by the logic of ancient rhetorical argumentation (Donelson, 67-113).

With the rise of FORM CRITICISM increasing attention has been paid to the traditional material (see A. Hanson [1982] 42-47 for listing) within the letters. The "faithful sayings" (G. Knight [1968]), the creed or hymn of 1 Tim 3:16 (W. Stenger [1977]; W. Metzger [1979]), the vice and virtue lists (N. McEleny [1974]), and the Haustafeln (Verner) have all been examined in detail, as has the genre of the letters (Spicq 34-46; Donelson 67-113). As new tools have come into use in NT criticism, they have been applied to the Pastorals, e.g., concepts of ancient rhetoric (Donelson 67-113; Fiore) and sociological techniques (Verner; see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES). The rise of feminism (see FEMINIST INTER-PRETATION) has led to a clearer delineation of their male-dominated nature. The use of the HB in the letters has also drawn attention (Hanson [1968]). The ethical teaching of the Pastorals is now regularly distinguished from that of Paul as more bourgeois, closer to Hellenistic moral teaching, directed toward eusebeia (piety) and dependent on traditional material (Trummer, 227-40; R. Schwarz [1983] 99-121; Donelson, 171-97).

Freed from denominational influence and the need to make a direct connection with Paul, discussion of the nature of the church and its ministry has not lost its impetus (Lips [1979] 94-288; Schwarz, 19-98, 123-71; A. Sand [1976]; A. Lemaire [1971] 123-38). However, it is now more clearly recognized that the emphasis lies more on the selection of correct candidates than on the correctness of church order.

Those accepting Pauline authorship or authorship directly influenced by him have seen the purpose of the letters in much the same way as did the fathers. All others are forced to ask why they were written in Paul's name; thus the view taken of Paul after his death (see A. Lindemann [1979]) becomes important. If we include the quotations of and allusions to the HB among the traditional material, then there is proportionally more of this material in the Pastorals than in any other NT writings. It is generally recognized that the Pastorals represent a stage in the development of Pauline thought beyond that of Ephesians and Colossians and less faithful to the original Paul. Some of Paul's letters must have been known (opinions differ as to which, but certainly Romans and 1 Corinthians; see Lindemann, 136-47), as also his reputation as a letter writer. If different groups were claiming to be his true disciples, was the author putting in his own claim? (D. MacDonald [1983] 57, 76-77, 96, sees the letters as having been written to oppose a conception of Paul as a social radical.) Was Paul being enlisted against or rescued from the heretics (W. Bauer [1971] 228; this idea goes back as far as Baur, 57-58)? If the collection of Paul's letters was the first step in his actualization for a post-Pauline generation, are the Pastorals a further step (Trummer, 100-105)? Are they intended to guard the Pauline legacy against false interpretation (Lindemann, 147) or to ensure its continued effectiveness (E. Scott [1936] xxv)? Is Paul being presented as a paradigm either for church leaders or for all Christians (Donelson, 105-6)?

The Pastorals present a picture of Paul (see Trummer, 116-32) as he appeared to some group at a period after his death. Paul was known to have persecuted the church yet to have been in prison and died a martyr; and both his pre-Christian failures, excused as having been done in ignorance (1 Tim 1:12-16), and his Christian greatness are emphasized: He is the sole apostle; he prophesies (1 Tim 4:1-5; 2 Tim 3:15-16), is a traveling missionary, is concerned with the life of the church, and courageously faces death.

What value do the letters have? Those who adhere to Pauline authorship see them as providing some information about what happened to Paul after the events of Acts 28. Those not accepting the letters as Pauline see them as throwing light on the church at some point in the post-Pauline period. Since their author chose to issue them in Paul's name there must have been an area of the church where his memory was revered; thus the once commonly held view that with his death Paul passed for a time into oblivion must be revised. A living Pauline tradition must have continued. All in all these letters throw light on the belief, ministry, and heresies of at least one part of the church.

Bibliography: J. Bassler, "The Widow's Tale: A Fresh Look at 1 Tim. 5:3-16," JBL 103 (1984) 23-41; 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, Titus (ANTC, 1996). W. Bauer, Orthodoxy and Heresy in Earliest Christianity (1971). F. C. Baur, Die sogenannten Pastoralbriefe des Apostels Paulus aufs neue kritisch untersucht (1835). L. A. Brown, "Asceticism and Ideology: The Language of Power in the Pastoral Epistles," Discursive Formations, Ascetic Piety, and the Interpretation of Early Christian Literature, pt. 1 (ed. V. L. Wimbush, Semeia 57, 1992) 77-94. N. Brox, Die Pastoralbriefe übersetzt und erklärt (1969). H. von Campenhausen, "Polykarp von Smyrna und die Pastoralbriefe," and "Bearbeitungen und Interpolationen des Polykarpmartyriums," Aus der Frühzeit des Christentums: Studien zur Kirchengeschichte des ersten und zweiten Jahrhunderts (1963) 197-252. R. F. Collins, Letters That Paul Did Not Write (1988). J. Dewey, "1 Timothy," "2 Timothy," and "Titus," Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992) 353-58, 359-60, 361. L. R. Donelson, Pseudepigraphy and Ethical Argument in the Pastoral Epistles (1986). P. Dornier, Les épîtres pastorales (1969). R. A. Falconer, The Pastoral Epistles: Introduction, Translation, and Notes (1937). B. Fiore, The Function of Personal Example in the Socratic and Pastoral Epistles (1986). K. Grayston and G. Herdan, "The Authorship of the Pastorals in the Light of Statistical Linguistics," NTS 6 (1959) 1-15. D. Guthrie, The Pastoral Epistles: An Introduction and Commentary (1957); "The Development of the Idea of Canonical Pseudepigrapha in NT Criticism," The Authorship and Integrity of the NT: Some Recent Studies (SPCK Theological Collections 4, 1965) 14-39. A. T. Hanson, Studies in the Pastoral Epistles (1968); The Pastoral Epistles, Based on the RSV (1982). P. N. Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles (1921). G. Haufe, "Gnostische Irrlehre und ihre Abwehr in den Pastoralbriefen," Gnosis und Neues Testament (ed. K.-W. Tröger, 1973) 325-39. H. J. Holtzmann, Die Pastoralbriefe kritisch und exegetisch behandelt (1880). H. Hübner, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (3 vols., 1990–). A. J. Hultgren, 1–2 Timothy, Titus (1984). R. J. Karris, "The Background and Significance of the Polemic of the Pastoral Epistles," JBL 92 (1973) 549-64. J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles: I Timothy, II Timothy, Titus (1963). A. Kenny, A Stylometric Study of the NT (1986). G. W. Knight, The Faithful Sayings in the Pastoral Epistles (1968). A. Le- maire, Les ministères aux origines de l'église: Naissance de la triple hierarchie ieveques, presbytres, diacres (1971). A. Lindemann, Paulus im ältesten Christentum: Das Bild des Apostels und die Rezeption der paulinischen Theologie in der frühchristlichen Literatur bis Marcion (1979). H. von Lips, Glaube, Geimeinde, Amt: Zum Verständnis der Ordination in den Pastoralbriefen (1979). W. Lock, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Pastoral Epistles (1924). E. Lohse, Theological Ethics of the NT (1988). W. Lütgert, Die Irrlehrer der Pastoralbriefe (1909). D. R. MacDonald, The Legend and the Apostle: The Battle for Paul in Story and Canon (1983). M. Y. MacDonald, The Pauline Churches: A Socio-historical Study of Institutionalization in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline Writings (SNTSMS 60, 1988). N. J. McEleney, "The Vice Lists of the Pastoral Epistles" CBQ 36 (1974) 203-19. L. M. Maloney, "The Pastoral Epistles," Searching the Scriptures, vol. 2, A Feminist Commentary (ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, 1994) 361-80. D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon: An Investigation into the Relationship of Authorship and Authority in Jewish and Early Christian Tradition (1986). D. L. Mealand, "The Extent of the Pauline Corpus: A Multivariate Approach" JSNT 59 (1995) 61-92. W. Metzger, Die letzte Reise des Apostels Paulus: Beobachtungen und Erwagungen zu seinem Itinerar nach den Pastoralbriefen (1976); Der Christushymnus 1. Timotheus 3,16: Fragment einer Homologie der paulinischen Gemeinden (1979). S. Michaelson and A. Q. Morton, "Positional Stylometry," The Computer and Literary Studies (ed. A. J. Aitken, 1973). J. Moffatt, An Introduction to the Literature of the NT (1918). K. J. Neumann, The Authenticity of the Pauline Epistles in the Light of Stylostatistical Analysis (SBLDS 120, 1990). L. Oberlinner, Der Pastoralbrief, 1. Folge, Kommentar zum ersten Timotheusbrief: Auslegung (1994); Der Pastoralbrief, 2. Folge, Kommentar zum zweiten Timotheusbrief: Auslegung (1995); Der Pastoral briefe, 3 Folge, Kommentar zum Titusbrief (1996). J. D. Quinn, The Letter to Titus: A New Translation with Notes and Commentary and an Introduction to Titus, I and II Timothy, the Pastoral Epistles (AB 35, 1990). E. Richards, The Secretary and the Letters of Paul (WUNT, 2. Reihe, 1991). O. Roller, Das Formular der paulinischen Briefe: Ein Beitrag zur Lehre vom antike Briefe (1933). J. Roloff, Der erste Brief an Timotheus (EKKNT 15, 1988); Die Kirche im Neuen Testament (1993) 250-57. A. Sand, "Anfänge einer Koordinierung verschiedener Gemeindeordnungen nach den Pastoralbriefen," Kirchen im Werden (ed. J. Hainz, 1976) 215-37. W. Schenk, "Die Briefe an Timotheus I und II und an Titus (Pastoralbriefe) in der neuerin Forschung (1945–85)," ANRW 2.25.4 (1987) 3404-38. F. Schleiermacher, Sendschreiben an J. C. Gass: Über den sogenannten ersten Brief des Paulos an den Timotheos (1807). R. Schnackenburg, Die sittliche Botschaft des Neuen Testaments (HTKSup, 2 vols., 1986–88) 1:95-109). R. Schwarz, Bürgerliches Christentum im Neuen Testament? Eine Studie zu Ethik, Amt, und Recht in den Pastoralbriefen (1983). E. F. Scott, The Pastoral Epistles (1936). J. Sell, The Knowledge of the Truth—Two Doctrines: The Book of Thomas the Contender (1982). C. Spicq, Les épîtres pastorales (2 vols., 1969). W. Stenger, Der Christushymnus 1 Tim 3,16: Eine strukturanalytische Untersuchung (1977). F. A. Strobel, "Schreiben des Lukas? Zum sprachlichen Problem der Pastoralbriefe," NTS 15 (1969) 191-210. P. Trummer, Die Paulustradition der Pastoralbriefe (1978). C. H. Turner, "Greek Patristic Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles," DB(H) (1905) 5:484-531. D. C. Verner, The Household of God: The Social World of the Pastoral Epistles (1983). S. G. Wilson, Luke and the Pastoral Epistles (1979). G. Wohlenberg, Die Pastoralbriefe (1923). M. Wolter, Die Pastoralbriefe als Paulustradition (1988).

E. BEST

PAUL

1. The Precritical Era. P. has never been easy to understand. From the start, his writings were open to quite different interpretations, even among those who were the most keen on preserving his legacy. In P.'s name Ephesians produced an account of divine mysteries in GNOSTIC language while the PASTORALS made P. conform to the "sound doctrine" of the incipient ecclesiastical tradition. Focusing on the radical elements in P.'s writings, MARCION produced a reading purified of anything that might suggest continuity with Judaism. P. was venerated by Gnostics and hated by Jewish Christians for the same reason: He had done away with HB law. But just that view was denied by mainstream church fathers, who tried to reduce P.'s statements to a self-consistent system that would not contradict HB revelation (M. Wiles [1967]). These very issues—P.'s relation to the legacy of Israel and his consistency—still haunt Pauline interpretation.

P.'s importance to the church was enhanced when his ideas on grace were taken up and developed by AUGUSTINE. P. became a central support for Augustine's doctrines of original sin, human beings' lack of free will, and double predestination.

The Reformation was fought in his name. Holding P.'s teaching of justification by faith to be all important, LUTHER underlined, in the Augustinian vein, that persons can be saved only by divine grace through faith—not by works of the law. "Law" was taken in a very general sense. When P. condemned "works," he had moral activity in general in mind (morality viewed as religious merit). The essence of sin consists in human self-reliance; therefore, those who keep the law are those most opposed to God's will. The purpose of the law is to teach human beings their helplessness and nothingness; it is used by God as "a large and powerful hammer" to crush human "presumption of righteousness" (F. Watson [1986] 2-4; S. Westerholm [1988] 3-12).

While not ignoring P.'s positive statements on the law (it begins to be fulfilled in the believers with the aid of the Spirit), Luther put the main emphasis on P.'s negative assertions. In contrast, CALVIN emphasized P.'s continuity with the HB. P.'s criticisms were not aimed at the biblical revelation itself but rather at a misunderstood "bare law in a narrow sense" as seen "apart from Christ"

(C. Cranfield [1975–79] 859). This inner-Protestant tension still exists in Pauline exegesis.

2. From the Seventeenth to the Nineteenth Centuries. Various Reformation commentators freely exploited P. for their own purposes. Things began to change when such scholars as H. GROTIUS and J. LOCKE emphasized the importance of the literary and historical context of each passage (Kümmel [1970; ET 1973] 33-38, 51-54).

Eighteenth-century scholars made a programmatic distinction between historical exegesis and dogmatic exposition. The result, however, was not yet disinterested historical study but rather a series of attempts to purify Christianity from elements that were temporally conditioned in order to turn it into a timeless ethical belief (J. Semler in A. Schweitzer [1911; ET 1912] 4-7). Slightly later and in the same vein, H. Paulus undertook to demonstrate "the agreement between the Gospel and a rational faith" by way of a purely moral interpretation (Schweitzer [ET 1912] 10-11).

F. C. BAUR's analysis of P.'s relation to the primitive Christian community signaled a new era. An attempt to interpret P.'s thought historically had been made shortly before by L. Usteri (1799–1833; see Kümmel [ET 1973] 75-97), who had been anticipated by J. TOLAND and T. MORGAN. However, Baur was the first to anchor P. in place and time—actually, in the midst of fierce conflict.

While Usteri had still held that P.'s ideas were in full agreement with the rest of the NT, Baur claimed that P. had developed his doctrine in complete opposition to that of the primitive community. Baur was assisted in his perception by G. W. F. Hegel's (1770–1831) dialectic of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis; but Hegel's importance to him has often been exaggerated. Baur described the conflicts in the early church somewhat schematically and was led to give too late a date to many texts that did not correspond to his idea of an early document. Nonetheless, that P. was involved in conflicts is a fact quite independent of Baur's Hegelian perspective.

In Baur's view, P. opposed Jewish exclusivism (held by the Jerusalem apostles), wishing to replace it with Christian universalism. If individuals could attain righteousness only by the works of the law, then it could only be attained by the Jews. P. alone had understood the universal significance of JESUS, and Pauline Christianity removed all that was particularist from the idea of God.

Baur's view conflicts with the standard Lutheran view. Luther and his followers made a bold generalization: P. was attacking not just Judaism but also the universal human error of trying to earn salvation. Baur, in contrast, connected P.'s theology very closely with his concrete circumstances (Watson, 12-13). One looks in vain for a critique of religious hubris in his account of P. Christianity is superior to Judaism just as the absolute and universal is superior to the particularist and local.

H. Lüdemann (1842–1933) discovered in P. two different ideas of salvation (1872). Alongside a juridical/ethical Jewish doctrine of justification by faith there is a realistic or sacramental/mystical Hellenistic doctrine of redemption associated with baptism; the latter is more important to P. With Lüdemann the questions of the unity of P.'s thought and of its rootedness in either Jewish or gentile soil entered the agenda of scholarship and have remained there ever since.

H. HOLTZMANN's textbook (1897, 1912^2) is a classic monument of liberal theology. In it, too, P.'s "doctrine" appears as a combination of several independent, often contradictory, lines of thought, some of Jewish, others of Greek origin (with a preponderance of the latter). P. was engaged in a mental struggle to combat his own past and also to come to terms with it. His thought is a secondary attempt to make sense of his conversion experience (understood as a breakdown under the burden of the law) in theoretical terms; its permanent value consists in the experience-based religious and moral insight that underlies the theory. However, in P.'s generalization of his personal experience lurks the danger of fanaticism. Liberal exegetes (Holtzmann; J. Weiss [1917; ET 1970]; W. Wrede [1904; ET 1907]) felt free to criticize those aspects of the apostle's thought that did not satisfy them intellectually or religiously.

3. The History-of-Religions Perspective. Liberal scholars recognized the existence of strange elements in P.'s thought but generally played them down, finding greater interest in those layers in which P. seemed attuned to Jesus' (supposedly) simple religion of the heart. Yet from the ranks of the liberals arose some scholars who drew attention to the very oddities that made little sense to the modern mind and even claimed that such features lay at the center of P.'s thought.

H. GUNKEL (1888) argued that P. did not conceive of the "Spirit" in a purely ethical sense but, realistically, as God's supernatural, miracle-working power. The early Christian thought world was thus made to appear strange and puzzling. O. Everling's book on angels in the same year had a similar effect, showing that P. stood in the "late Jewish" angelological and demonological tradition; thus P.'s views were not to be modernized or spiritualized. In 1893 R. KABISCH made a strong case that eschatological expectation lies at the center of P.'s thought. More problematic was his view that everything spiritual goes back to something corporeal, e.g., the Spirit is a super-earthly substance that must be found in one's body if one is to be resurrected.

Kabisch interpreted P. in an extremely anti-modern way, paying no attention to the question of the apostle's contemporary relevance. Unlike H. Lüdemann, he traced P.'s doctrine of salvation back to Jewish eschatology rather than to Hellenistic influences. Kabisch's interpretation was enthusiastically taken over by A. SCHWEITZER, who regarded P. as a thoroughly Jewish and a very consistent thinker. However, Schweitzer was only able to publish his views in full in 1930 when Pauline scholarship already found itself in a quite new situation.

A splendid provisory synthesis was given by W. WREDE (1904), who underlined the necessity of interpreting P. in purely historical terms. Like Kabisch he recognized the importance of eschatology. He also called attention to P.'s fundamental pessimism, to his sense of relief at being released from the hostile angelic powers of this world, and to his understanding of salvation as an objective event mediated through baptism. Although Wrede was critical of Kabisch's "materialistic metaphysics," he held fast to a "physical" view of redemption. P.'s thoughts on justification by faith are, in contrast, a secondary theory arising from conflicts in which he became involved. P. was not mainly concerned with the destiny of the individual but with that of humankind, i.e., with salvation history. His theology is based on rabbinism and Gnosticism; thus contradictions and problematic assertions are quite common. But P. created a grand overall vision, so much so that he must be regarded as the second founder of Christianity. Wrede sharply posed the problem of "Jesus and P." Unlike Baur and most liberals, he denied that P. was the authentic interpreter of Jesus and suggested the necessity of choosing between the two "founders."

Soon enough the issues were redefined. W. HEITMÜLLER (1912), followed by W. BOUSSET (1921; ET 1970) and R. BULTMANN (1929, 1934), set out to uncover traces of a pre-Pauline Hellenistic Christianity that had existed between the time of the Jerusalem church and P. and whose views P. had adopted and developed further. The real problem was not "Jesus and P.," but "Jesus and Hellenistic Christianity." It became important to ask how P. had handled the inherited (Palestinian and Hellenistic) Christian traditions: What is their relation to the creative reinterpretation and new insights in P.'s letters?

Along with this reorientation went the discovery of analogies to P.'s (or the Hellenistic community's) ideas and sacramental practices from mystery religions, Gnosticism, and Mandaean texts. Taking his cue from 1 Corinthians, R. REITZENSTEIN interpreted P. consistently in terms of Hellenistic mysticism and Gnosticism. Nonetheless, because he failed to deal adequately with many crucial issues (e.g., the law and eschatology), his picture at best serves to underline the multifaceted nature of P.'s thought.

4. The Epoch of Dialectical Theology. At the beginning of the twentieth century, then, there were strong impulses toward a historical study of P.'s thought in the context of Hellenistic religion and culture. In part these leads were followed up in the next few decades. Bultmann elaborated Reitzenstein's view of a Gnostic myth supposed to underlie P.'s theology and interpreted P. against that backdrop, as did his pupils, notably E. KÄSEMANN. In 1933 the latter interpreted "flesh" and "Spirit" as kinds of Gnostic aeons but did not deny the significance of eschatological expectation for P.

Religion-historical analysis was to stay in the background, however, due to the intervention of K. BARTH and dialectial theology. Even Bultmann and Käsemann pursued their radical history-of-religions work (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) in the theologically charged framework of Barthian neo-orthodoxy. Barth held that contemporary human problems are identical to those P. faced and that P.'s answers should be ours as well. An expositor should wrestle with the text of Romans until all but forgetting that he or she did not write it.

This approach was endorsed by Bultmann, who emphasized the importance of not remaining a detached observer. An interpreter has to clarify the significance of the texts for "me." To do so, one must distinguish between what P. said and what he really meant. Although Bultmann criticized liberal and history-of-religions exegetes for an alleged disinterest in the existential message, his method was structurally similar to theirs. The liberals had found the NT's essential message in the preaching of (a modernized) Jesus and criticized aspects of P.'s theology in its light. Bultmann, by comparison, found the true subject matter of the NT in the human self-understanding manifest in the texts, most clearly in P.'s writing. Thus Bultmann often wrote about "eschatological existence"; but he really meant "authentic existence," as described by the existentialist philosopher M. Heidegger (1889–1976). Temporal eschatological elements in P. were dismissed as mere illustrations of the real message.

For Bultmann, P. was (along with John) a central figure in NT theology; all other formulations were to be gauged by Pauline standards. Yet Bultmann modernized Paul, and his approach was more intellectualist than that of the previous generation. Dialectical theology, turning against "religion" in the name of the kerygma, disliked the category of "experience" that had been central to liberal interpreters. Moreover, it had become easier to deemphasize experience in Pauline interpretation since W. KÜMMEL had shown (1929) that P.'s conversion experience had been misconstrued and that P. did not break down under the burden of the law.

Bultmann presented P.'s theology as a coherent system. Its center was anthropological: human existence "prior to the revelation of faith" and then "under faith." In sound Lutheran fashion the individual's relation to God became central again.

Bultmann elaborated Luther's generalized understanding of P.'s critique of the law: P. was really attacking human self-assertion. In Judaism a specifically human striving had taken on a culturally distinct form, and Bultmann drew a desolate caricature of this Jewish legalism. Human effort to achieve salvation by keeping the law is an expression of human sin, of the need for recognition. Faith is the renunciation of such striving, a new self-understanding in acknowledgment of one's utter dependence on God.

Bultmann was aware of elements that did not rise to the level of P.'s real intentions as Bultmann saw them, e.g., the notion of an eschatological battle with spirit powers or of a "history of salvation" in general. His approach differed from that of his teacher, J. WEISS. Weiss too had discerned different layers in P., maintaining that while the mythico-eschatological level is unimportant to us, P.'s talk of grace and love is seminal. But Weiss had made it clear that the two levels can only be separated in hindsight by modern scholars, and he did not let the separation guide his account of P.'s thought. Bultmann, on the contrary, programmatically refused to distinguish between historical reconstruction and contemporizing interpretation; many exegetes still adhere to this way of seeing the task.

Bultmann's interpretation was rejected by such scholars as O. CULLMANN (1965; ET 1967), J. MUNCK (1954), U. Wilckens (1974), and Kümmel who had a higher view of salvation history and wished to make God's act in Christ, rather than anthropology, the starting point of P.'s theology. Their historical criticism was well founded. However, they failed to see as clearly as Bultmann did how serious a problem it is to make sense of P.'s ancient message in modern times.

The fact that Bultmann's method results in historical distortion was in due course recognized by his own pupils as well. H. Conzelmann followed in Bultmann's footsteps, but he tried to do more justice to the historical component in P.'s thought. His work is beset with a formidable tension: If objectified, many of Paul's statements appear to be simply absurd; when, however, one penetrates through the salvation-historical surface to the underlying existential level, a profound revelation of the human plight emerges (Conzelmann [1967; ET 1969] 225-28).

Käsemann criticized Bultmann for concentrating one-sidedly on the individualistic aspects in P.'s writings and neglecting their communality, concern for creation, and apocalyptic eschatology (see APOCALYPTICISM). The main issue for P. is seen, not as the justification of the individual, but as the necessity that "Christ must reign." God's "righteousness" does not just denote God's gift to humans (so Bultmann); it bespeaks the Creator's right over creation (so also P. Stuhlmacher [1965, 1966^2]). An apocalyptic perspective was important for P. in his battle against enthusiasts who held that everything Christians hoped for had already been realized with the resurrection of Christ and in the baptism of the believer. Käsemann combined his apocalyptic interpretation with a Lutheran-Bultmannian understanding of P.'s attitude to the law, using P.'s attack on legalism polemically "against every form of conservatism, especially theological or ecclesiastical" (Watson, 9).

5. Paul and Judaism. Pauline research has increasingly come to focus on the problem of P.'s relation to Judaism. In 1930 Schweitzer made a powerful, if rather forced, attempt to locate P.'s thought in apocalyptic Judaism. He focused on P.'s "Christ mysticism," contending that the believer's participation in the Lord and deliverance from bondage to hostile spirit powers are to be taken in a realistic sense. Schweitzer traced P.'s mysticism back to eschatology, regarding it as an intellectual attempt to account for the anomaly that although the Messiah had come, the times had not visibly changed.

The discussion was taken further in 1948 by W. D. DAVIES, who interpreted P. as a rabbi who believed that the Messiah had come. Davies' P. is not diametrically opposed to Judaism; in fact there is great continuity, and P. regards his new faith as a fulfillment of Judaism. Since Davies' article, attention to P.'s Jewish background has dominated the scene, and the issue of Hellenistic influences has faded (yet see the work of H.-D. Betz [1979]). The discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS has strengthened this trend; scholars claim to have found precedents at Qumran for some of P.'s deviations from HB or rabbinic ideas. Another source that might seem to mediate between standard Jewish ideas and P.'s has been detected in wisdom traditions.

In painting the portrait of P. in continuity with his Jewish past, Davies did not discuss the structural differences between Pauline and rabbinic religion. These were brought to light by Jewish scholars as early as 1914, when C. MONTEFIORE pointed out that P. paid no attention to the twin rabbinic ideas of repentance and forgiveness. Montefiore sought the reason for this strange omission in P.'s Hellenistic Jewish origins.

Like Davies, H.-J. Shoeps (1959) traced a number of individual Pauline concepts and notions back to rabbinic origins; but as for the essence of the two faiths, he found a crucial difference. P. had severed the law from the context of the covenant to which it belonged in Palestinian Judaism. Like Montefiore, Schoeps found the reason in P.'s rootedness in Hellenistic Judaism, in which a legalistic development had supposedly taken place.

E. P. Sanders (1977) opened up a "new perspective on P." (J. Dunn [1983]). Sanders compared the "pattern" of rabbinic religion with that of P.'s., terming the former "covenantal nomism" (to avoid the somber overtones of "legalism"). A Jew wished to conform to the law, not because of self-assertion (Bultmann), but out of gratitude to God, who had made a covenant with Israel and obliged the people to obey the covenantal order. P. displays a different pattern: "participationist eschatology." The mystical-sacramental union with Christ is the real center of his religion (in this, Schweitzer was right). P. abandoned Judaism because in Christ he had found something better (not because of the supposed inferiority of nomistic piety). Humanity prior to faith (Bultmann) is not P.'s starting-point. Instead, he thinks backward from the solution to the plight. God has provided for universal salvation in Christ; it follows that all persons must be in need of this salvation (Sanders [1977] 474-75).

P. abandoned Judaism because God had made salvation accessible in a new way. That is why P. showed no interest in repentance, the classical Jewish way to salvation (Montefiore's problem). P.'s point was that commands of the Torah such as circumcision and the sabbath are not to be imposed on Gentiles who join the eschatological community (cf. also K. Stendahl [1976]; H. Räisänen [1983, 1987²]). Sanders thus breaks with the standard Lutheran understanding of P.; in a sense, Baur with his emphasis on universalism might be taken as a precursor of this line of thought.

Recent studies by Jewish scholars argue along somewhat similar lines but from wider perspectives. A. Segal (1990) underlines the significance and the mystical nature of P.'s conversion experience, which he elucidates with sociological conversion studies (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES). D. Boyarin (1994) points out that P.'s "universalizing drive" amounts, from a rabbinic perspective, to an eradication of the Jewish value system.

The view that connects P.'s break with Judaism intimately with the inclusion of gentile converts is strongly opposed by interpreters who cling to Bultmann's notion that the universal phenomenon of human pride is at stake (e.g., G. Klein [1973]; H. Hübner [1978, 1980²]). On the other hand, a number of scholars argue that P. did not at all break with Judaism (e.g., Cranfield, Dunn); rather, he only rejected a false interpretation of the law. While the former group of scholars perpetuates Luther's concern, the latter can look to Calvin as their exegetical ancestor.

It was inevitable that at some point the Holocaust would cast its sinister shadow over Pauline studies. Some scholars (notably R. Ruether [1974]) ascribe to P. a share in giving rise to the anti-Jewish sentiment that was to bear such horrendous fruit. Others (J. Gager [1983]; L. Gaston [1987]) try to whitewash P. by claiming that he has nothing negative to say of Israel's covenantal privileges, neither of the law nor of its putative misinterpretation. In their judgment P. did not even regard Jesus as the Messiah of Israel but only as the Savior of the Gentiles. These latter interpreters labor hard to do justice to Judaism, but they are forced to give many Pauline passages a twisted exegesis. In a less extreme vein, F. Mussner (1979) and others infer from Romans 11 that P. reckoned with a special way to salvation for the Jews (in the parousia) independently of the failure of the Christian mission to them. In the eyes of still others even this reading makes P. revoke most of his usual christological preaching, so they are not convinced.

U. Schnelle (1983, 1986²) takes up the concern of the history-of-religions school in his attempt to pinpoint the relation between justification and "being in Christ." P. adopted and developed a Hellenistic theology that connected justification and new life with baptism, which is the experiential background of P.'s talk of justification. Being in Christ and possessing the Spirit are more central than justification by faith.

6. Paul's Consistency. At the turn of the twentieth century, liberal exegetes did not hesitate to assert that P. is often inconsistent. With the upsurge of dialectical theology such criticisms receded, but they have begun to reappear. While some scholars are content with speaking of a dialectic in P.'s thought, others believe that they can discern genuine discrepancies.

One way to account for such discrepancies is to posit that P.'s thought developed over time. H. Hübner argues that P.'s thinking on the law underwent a marked change between Galatians and Romans. In Galatians P. distanced himself from Judaism and the law; in Romans he stressed his continuity with them. In P.'s view of Israel there is an analogous development from the negative statements in 1 Thessalonians and Galatians to the positive ones in Romans 11.

The development theory must face the problem that there are "radical" assertions also in Romans (Romans 9 is no less severe on Israel than is Galatians). Räisänen has revived the liberal approach: P. is inconsistent on many points, for he is wrestling with problems that do not allow for neat solutions. Why should Christ have abolished a law given by God for life? Why is P.'s gospel being rejected by the chosen people? Räisänen sees P.'s theology as secondary to his experience, as did the liberals; but the experience in question includes P.'s social experience of conflict.

Other related attempts to account for the differences include J. Beker's (1984) distinction between the coherent theme of P.'s gospel (God's triumph) and its contingent application according to the circumstances; D. Patte's (1983) differentiation between a convictional and a theological level in P.'s discourse; and G. Klein's (1984) sharp separation, reminiscent of Conzelmann, between basic intentions and objectifications. More radical is Watson's proposal that what is coherent in P. are his practical aims; to reach the same goal he can use quite different argumentative strategies. In all these cases the effect is the same, sometimes against the intention of the interpreter: P. can be seen as consistent only if the interpreter is in possession of a key that enables him or her to tell the kernel from the husk.

In a pioneering synthesis, J. Becker (1989) brings many of the threads in scholarship together, taking pains to trace the movement of P.'s thought from one letter to another. Becker gives special attention to P.'s Antiochian roots (cf. Räisänen [1992] 191-97; E. Rau [1994]). Pre-Pauline Hellenistic Christianity (so termed since Heitmüller) is defined by Becker more precisely as Antiochian. In Antioch the ritual parts of the law were rejected as a consequence of charismatic experiences on the part of the uncircumcised. Baptism and new life in Christ, whose imminent return was eagerly expected, were all-important (cf. Schnelle). The legacy of Antioch is most palpable in 1 Thessalonians, but it constitutes the basis of P.'s argument in subsequent letters as well.

P.'s theology is wholly based on his experience of the gospel and of the Spirit that transforms people. In emphasizing this, Becker differs notably from Bultmann's intellectualist approach; nevertheless, Becker's P. is an eminent thinker. Maintaining that tensions often arise due to P.'s use of blocks of previously shaped material, Becker also distinguishes between P.'s coherent basic decisions and his more situation-bound (often polemical) statements; the apostle developed his arguments with an amazing capacity for variation.

7. The Present Situation. The situation today, then, is somewhat confusing. On a number of key issues a wide range of interpretations is offered. Few of the basic problems that have arisen in the course of the history of interpretation have really been solved; most of them continue to engage modern scholars.

Regarding P.'s attitude toward Israel and the law, either continuity or discontinuity may be stressed. While many scholars take P.'s talk of eschatological expectation literally and regard this expectation as the central incentive for his work (Sanders, Käsemann, Beker), others understand the apocalyptic language in a more symbolical way and deny the importance of a concrete end expectation for P. (most radically Klein).

The center of P.'s thought can be variously located, e.g., in the notion of justification (this concern tends to give the whole an individualistic flavor), in the baptismal union with Christ and the possession of the Spirit (with a preponderance of the corporate dimension in P.'s thought), or in the apocalyptic theme of God's triumph.

Such issues, furthermore, are affected by the problem of the nature of P.'s thought. Was he fundamentally consistent? Did his thought develop? Or did he just take different positions in different situations?

Still, some solutions seem to be advancing more than others. It will be difficult to maintain a thoroughly affirmative view of P.'s attitude toward Judaism and the law. It is hardly possible to explain all of P.'s critical statements in this regard in positive terms. But what is their real import? It would likewise be hard to deny any significance to the apocalyptic-eschatological expectation. But just how central was it to P.? Moreover, what exactly is the relation between eschatology and being in Christ—between the Jewish and the more Hellenistic component (pace, Schweitzer) in P.'s thought? And one may wonder whether the question of Greek influences really has been settled. At least the impact of rhetorical conventions and of popular philosophy (A. Malherbe [1989]) is obvious, and recently there have been efforts to reopen the question of P.'s relation to Greco-Roman religiosity but in a more nuanced way than in the time of Heitmüller and Reitzenstein (Betz; H.-J. Klauck [1986²]; A. Wedderburn [1987]).

Communication is rendered more difficult by the fact that different scholars are guided by different intentions in their interpretation of P. An increasing number of them advocate a separation between a historical and an actualizing interpretation (stressed early on by Wrede), and many would be content to concentrate on the former task alone. Other scholars, however, (in the vein of Barth and Bultmann) are strongly opposed to such a distinction and favor a self-consciously theological exegesis. Such an approach tries to avoid attributing to P. self-contradictions or theologically problematic ideas.

Finally, new methodological perspectives have entered Pauline study, as they have other areas of NT research. RHETORICAL CRITICISM (Betz; S. Stowers [1981]) is used to elucidate the communication between P. and his addressees. P.'s use of the HB can be viewed from the perspective of LITERARY THEORY (intertexuality: R. Hays [1989]). If the danger of anachronism lurks in such readings, psychological interpretations (see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) are even more exposed to it; yet the risk can be reduced by paying close attention to the history of traditions (G. Theissen [1983]; see TRADITION HISTORY). Most promising from the point of view of historical understanding are sociological (G. Theissen [1979]; B. Holmberg [1978]; W. Meeks [1983]; Watson) and anthropological (B. Malina [1981]; J. Neyrey [1990]) approaches.

Bibliography: C. K. Barrett, P.: An Introduction to His Thought (1994). K. Barth, The Epistle to the Romans (1919; ET 1933). F. C. Baur, Vorlesungen über neutestamenliche Theologie (1864, repr. 1973). J. Becker, P.: Der Apostel der Völker (1989). J. C. Beker, P. the Apostle (1984). H.-D. Betz, Galatians: A Commentary on P.'s Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Hermeneia, 1979). W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (FRLANT 4, 1921; ET 1970). D. Boyarin, A Radical Jew: P. and the Politics of Identity (1994). C. Breytenbach, Versöhnung: Eine Studie zue paulinischen Soteriologie (1989). R. Bultmann, "Zur Geschichte der Paulus-Forschung," TRu 1 (1929) 26-59; "Neueste Paulusforschung," TRu 6 (1934) 229-46; 8 (1936) 1-22; Theology of the NT (1948; ET 1951). H. Conzelmann, An Outline of the Theology of the NT (EET 2, 1967; ET 1969). C. E. B. Cranfield, The Epistle to the Romans (2 vols., ICC, 1975–79). O. Cullmann, Savlation in History (1965; ET 1967). W. D. Davies, P. and Rabbinic Judaism: Some Rabbinic Elements in Pauline Theology (1948). J. D. G. Dunn, "The New Perspective on P.," BJRL 65 (1983) 95-122; Romans (WBC 38, 1988); (ed.), P. and the Mosaic Law (1996). T. Engberg-Pedersen (ed.), P. in His Hellenistic Context (1995). O. Everling, Die paulinische Angelologie und Dämonologie: Ein biblisch-theologischer Versuch (1888). J. G. Gager, The Origins of Anti-Semitism: Attitudes Toward Judaism in Pagan and Christian Antiquity (1983). L. Gaston, P. and the Torah (1987). H. Gunkel, The Influence of the Holy Spirit According to the Popular View of the Apostolic Age and the Teaching of the Apostle P.: A Biblical Theological Study (1888; ET 1979). D. Hagner, "P. in Modern Jewish Thought," Pauline Studies: Essays Presented to F. F. Bruce on His 70th Birthday (ed. D. A. Hagner and M. J. Harris, 1980) 143-65. R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture in the Letters of P. (1989). W. Heitmüller, "Zum Problem P. und Jesus," ZNW 13 (1912) 320-37 = Das Paulusbild in der neueren deutschen Forschung (WdF 24, ed. K. H. Rengstorf, 1964, 1969²) 124-43. B. Holmberg, P. and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (1978). H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der neutestamentlichen Theologie, 2 (1897, 1912²). H. Hübner, The Law in P.'s Thought (1978, 1980²; ET 1984); "Paulusforschung seit 1945: Ein kritischer Literaturbericht," ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 2649-840; Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. 2, Die Theologie des P. und ihre neutestamentliche Wirkungsgeschichte (1993). R. Jewett, P.'s Anthropological Terms: A Study of Their Use in Conflict Settings (AGJU 10, 1971). R. Kabisch, Die Eschatologie des P. in ihren Zusammenhängen mit dem Gesamtbegriff des Paulinismus (1893). E. Käsemann, Leib und Leib Christi: Eine Untersuchung zur paulinischen Begrifflichkeit (BHT 9, 1933); Perspectives on P. (1969; ET 1971); Commentary on Romans (1974³; ET 1980). H.-J. Klauck, Herrenmahl und hellenisticher Kult: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung zum ersten Korintherbrief (NTAbh 15, 1986²). G. Klein, "Apokalyptische Naherwartung bei P.," Neues Testament und christliche Existenz: Festschrift für H. Braun zum 70. Geburtstag am 4 Mai 1973 (1973) 241-652; "Gesetz III. Neues Testament," TRE 13 (1984) 58-75. D.-A. Koch, Die Schrift als Zeuge des Evangeliums: Unterschungen zur Verwendung und zum Verständnis der Schrift bei P. (BHT 69, 1986). W. G. Kümmel, Römer 7 und die Bekehrung des P. (UNT 17, 1929); Theology of the NT According to Its Major Witnesses: Jesus—P.—John (1969; ET 1974); The NT: The History of the Investigations of Its Problems (1970; ET 1973). T. Laato, P. und das Judentum: Anthropologische Erwagungen (1991). G. Lüdemann, P. und das Judentum (TEH 215, 1983); P., Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (1984). H. Lüdemann, Die Anthropologie des Apostels P. und ihre Stellung innerhalb seiner Heilslehre nach den vier Hauptbriefen (1872). A. J. Malherbe, P. and the Popular Philosophers (1989). B. J. Malina, The NT World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology (1981). W. A. Meeks, The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (1983). O. Merk, "Paulus-Forschung, 1936–85," TRu 53 (1988) 1-81. C. G. Montefiore, Judaism and St. P.: Two Essays (1914). J. Munck, P. und die Heilsgeschichte (AJut.T 26.1, 6, 1954). F. Mussner, Traktat über die Juden (1979). J. Neyrey, P., in Other Words: A Cultural Reading of His Letters (1990). D. Patte, P.'s Faith and the Power of the Gospel: A Structural Introduction to the Pauline Letters (1983). H. Räisänen, P. and the Law (WUNT 29, 1983, 1987²); Beyond NT Theology: A Story and a Programme (1990); Jesus, P., and Torah: Collected Essays (JSNTSup 43, 1992). E. Rau, Von Jesus zu P.: Entwicklung und Rezeption der antiochenischen Theologie im Urchristentum (1994). W. Rebell, Gehorsam und Unabhängigkeit: Eine sozialpsychologische Studie zu Paulus (1986). R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistic Mystery-Religions: Their Basic Ideas and Significance (1910; ET 1978). K. H. Rengstorf (ed.), Das Paulusbild in der neueren deutschen Forschung (1964, 1969²). R. Ruether, Faith and Fratricide: The Theological Roots of Anti-Semitism (1974). E. P. Sanders, P. and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (1977); P., the Law, and the Jewish People (1983). U. Schnelle, Gerechtigkeit und Christusgegenwart: Vorpaulinische und paulinische Tauftheologie (1983, 1986²). H.-J. Schoeps, P.: Die Theologie des Apostels im Lichte der jüdischen Religionsgeschichte (1959). A. Schweitzer, P. and His Interpreters: A Critical History (1911; ET 1912); Die Mystik des Apostels P. (1930, 1954²). A. F. Segal, P. the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee (1990). K. Stendahl, P. Among Jews and Gentiles and Other Essays (1976). S. K. Stowers, The Diatribe and P.'s Letters to the Romans (SBLMS 57, 1981). P. Stuhlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei P. (FRLANT 87, 1965, 1966²); Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments, vol. 1, Grundlegung: Von Jesus zu P. (1992). G. Theissen, Studien zur Soziologie des Urchristentums (WUNT 19, 1979); Psychologische Aspekte paulinischer Theologie (FRLANT 131, 1983). F. Thielman, From Plight to Solution: A Jewish Framework for Understanding P.'s View of the Law in Galatians and Romans (1989). F. Watson, P., Judaism, and the Gentiles: A Sociological Approach (SNTSMS 56, 1986). A. J. M. Wedderburn, Baptism and Resurrection: Studies in Pauline Theology Against Its Graeco-Roman Background (WUNT 44, 1987). J. Weiss, Earliest Christianity: A History of the Period AD 30–150 (1917; ET 1970). S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: P. and His Recent Interpreters (1988). U. Wilckens, Rechtfertigung als Freiheit: Paulusstudien (1974); Der Brief an die Römer (EKKNT 6, 3 vols., 1978–82). M. Wiles, The Divine Apostle: The Interpretation of St. P.'s Epistles in the Early Church (1967). W. Wrede, Paul (1904; ET 1907).

H. RÄISÄNEN

PAYNE SMITH, ROBERT (1819–95)

Educated at Pembroke College, Oxford, and ordained in 1843, P. became Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford (1865–70). He subsequently served as dean of Canterbury until his death. In addition to doctrinally conservative theological essays, sermons, and his Bampton lectures on HB PROPHECY (1869), P. published semi-popular and generally anti-critical commentaries on Genesis, 1–2 Samuel, Jeremiah, and Daniel. His crowning achievement, which took thirty-five years to complete, was his great Thesaurus Syriacus, a concordantial LEXICON of Syriac based on an exhaustive survey of extant manuscripts.

Works: S. Cyrilli Alexandriae archiepiscope commentarii in Lucae evangelium: quae supersunt syriace e manuscriptis apud Museum Britannicum (2 vols., 1859); The Third Part of the Ecclesiastical History of John, Bishop of Ephesus, Now First Translated from the Original Syriac (1860); The Authenticity and Messianic Interpretation of the Prophecies of Isaiah: Vindicated in a Course of Sermons Preached Before the University of Oxford (1862); Catalogi codicum manuscriptorum bibliothecae Bodleinae pars sexta, codices syriacos, carshunicos, mendaeos complectens (1864); "The Powers and Duties of the Priesthood," Principles at Stake: Essays on Church Questions of the Day (ed. G. H. Sumner, 1868) 65-107; Prophecy, a Preparation for Christ (Bampton Lectures, 1869); "The Book of Jeremiah," The Speaker's Commentary (ed. F. C. Cook, 1875); Thesaurus Syriacus (2 vols., 1879, 1901); "1 and 2 Samuel: Exposition," The Pulpit Commentary (ed. H. D. M. Spence and J. S. Exell 1880–1919); An Exposition of the Historical Portion of Daniel (1886); "Genesis," An OT Commentary for English Readers by Various Writers (ed. C. J. Ellicott, 1897) 1:3-184.

Bibliography: D. S. Margoliouth, DNB 44 (1895) 125-27.

R. J. OWENS, JR.

PEAKE, ARTHUR SAMUEL (1865–1929)

A British Primitive Methodist scholar, P. was born Nov. 24, 1865, at Leek, Staffordshire. Educated at Oxford University, he was a fellow of Merton College (1890–97), a teacher at Mansfield College, and a tutor at Hartley Primitive Methodist College, Manchester (1892–1929). The first Rylands Professor of Biblical Criticism, University of Manchester (1904–29), and editor of the Holborn Review (1919–29), he died Aug. 19, 1929.

P.'s religious outlook was ecumenical, his academic standards high, and his biblical scholarship clear and careful, forward-looking but not extremist. Christians of many denominations found him a trustworthy guide as they endeavored to assimilate newer thought while remaining rooted in the "faith once delivered." C. H. DODD declared that P. "did much to save the Free Church of Britain from the baneful effects of 'Fundamentalist' controversies." Not the least important factor in this respect was the one-volume commentary that bears his name (1919).

Works: Hebrews: Introduction, AV, RV with Notes and Index (CeB, 1902); The Problem of Suffering in the OT (1904); Job (CeB, 1905); Christianity: Its Nature and Its Truth (1908); Jeremiah and Lamentations (CeB, 2 vols., 1911); The Bible: Its Origins, Its Significance, and Its Abiding Worth (1913); (ed.), Peake's Commentary on the Bible (1919); The Servant of Yahweh (1931).

Bibliography: C. H. Dodd, DNB Supp. 4 (1937) 657-58. W. F. Howard (ed.), Recollections and Appreciations (1938), includes some of P.'s minor works. L. S. Peake (son), A. S. P.: A Memoir (1930). J. W. Rogerson, "Progressive Revelation: Its History and Value as a Key to OT Interpretation (A. S. P. Memorial Lecture, 1981)," EpRe 9 (1982) 73-86. J. T. Wilkinson (ed.), A. S. P., 1865–1929: Essays in Commemoration (1958); A. S. P.: A Biography (1971).

A. P. F. SELL

PEDERSEN, JOHANNES PEDER EJLER (1883–1977)

The son of a schoolteacher, P. was born in a small rural Danish community. Strong impressions from his schooling led him to the study of theology in Copenhagen, where he won his cand. theol. degree in 1908. He also studied Semitic philology under F. BUHL and later at various European universities. In 1916 he became assistant professor of OT and in 1922 was appointed professor of Semitic philology at the University of Copenhagen.

P.'s doctoral dissertation (1912; GT 1914) dealt with "the Semitic oath" in comparative perspective (mostly Arabic and Hebrew) but also contained new ideas concerning the meaning of "covenant." Later he published several works on texts of Islamic mysticism and on topics of Arabic culture. In 1915 he published an important article on Ecclesiastes (FT 1931), interpreting the book as the result of the break up of tribal society and the loss of old ideals.

This work was followed by his epoch-making Israel: Its Life and Culture (Danish, vols. 1–2, 1920; vols. 3–4, 1934), in which, influenced by his compatriot V. Grønbeck (1873–1948), whose study on the culture of the Teutons had appeared in Danish between 1904 and 1912, he developed a new approach to the thought world of ancient Israel. Instead of interpreting the thinking of the HB in modern, Westernized categories, he tried to understand it from within and to describe, much in the words of the HB itself, how the Israelites felt, thought, and acted—a method of empathy deliberately opposed to the prevalent objective approach. The first volume centers around such concepts as "soul," "blessing," "peace," and "covenant." The soul is the vital force of the individual or even is the individual himself or herself. Blessing is the strengthening of the vital force and is described more or less as a counterpart of the mana of comparative religion. Peace is the "wholeness" of the life of the individual and the society, while covenant is what binds individuals together. The second volume is built around the idea of holiness: holy persons, holy seasons, holy places, etc. It is a history of the effects of holiness on Israel, in which P. also insisted on the holiness of the king, placing the idea of holiness in the context of the psychological and social totality of the people.

P.'s general approach is also visible in his Hebrew grammar (Danish, 1926), the strength of which lies in the psychological understanding of certain syntactical problems, e.g., tense and plural. Another consequence of this approach was his skeptical attitude toward traditional source criticism, which seemed to him to be based on a lack of understanding of Hebrew narrative art. Several notes in Israel bear witness to this, as does his 1934 article on the Passover legend of Exodus 1–15, which he saw as the core around which the rest of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) crystallized. P.'s analysis of Hebrew mentality was favorably received in the Scandinavian countries and became especially important in the so-called Uppsala school.

Works: Der Eid bei den Semiten in seinem Verhältnis zu Verwandten Erscheinungen sowie die Stellung des Eides im Islam (SGKIO 3, 1914); Israel: Its Life and Culture (vols. 1–2, 1920; vols. 3–4, 1934; ET vols. 1–2, 1926; vols. 3–4, 1940); Hebraeisk Grammatik (1926); "Die Auffassung vom Alten Testament," ZAW 49 (1931) 161-81; Scepticisme israélite (CRHPR 22, 1931); "Passahfest und Passahlegende," ZAW 52 (1934) 161-75; "Die KRT-Legende," Berytus 6 (1939) 63-105; "Canaanite and Israelite Cultus," AcOr 18 (1940) 1-14; "The Fall of Man," Interpretationes ad Vetus Testamentum: Pertinentes S. Mowinckel (ed. N. Dahl and A. S. Kapelrud, 1955) 162-72; "Wisdom and Immortality," Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East (FS H. H. Rowley, ed. M. Noth and D. Winton Thomas, VTSup 3, 1955) 238-46.

Bibliography: E. Nielsen, "J. P.'s Contribution to the Research and Understanding of the OT," ASTI 8 (1972) 4-20. J. R. Porter, "Biblical Classics III. J. Petersen: Israel," ExpTim 90 (1978) 36-40.

H. RINGGREN

PELAGIUS (c. 354–c. 425)

Little is known about P.'s early life. Born in the British Isles, he went to Rome during the 380s, taught there, and advocated moral reform until the threat of Gothic invasion led him to Palestine by way of Carthage, where his associate Celestius remained and was condemned for heresy in 411. This charge began the Pelagian controversy, although P. himself was not initially involved.

In Palestine P. aroused the ire of JEROME. In defense P. wrote the treatise On Nature, to which AUGUSTINE replied with his own treatise, On Nature and Grace. Jerome also began writing against P., notably in the letter To Ctesiphon (Ep. 133) and Dialogue Against the Pelagians. P. was exonerated of heresy by synods in Jerusalem and Diospolis (415), but in 418 he was condemned and banished by Emperor Honorius and excommunicated by Pope Zosimus. Expelled from Jerusalem, P. probably went to Egypt and likely died shortly thereafter.

P.'s chief work as a biblical expositor is a commentary on the entire Pauline corpus, written in Rome. The commentary shows a strong but not slavish adherence to the earlier commentaries of Ambrosiaster, ORIGEN (through the LT of Rufinus), and Jerome as well as of CHRYSOSTOM and, somewhat ironically, the early works of Augustine.

Many scholars have seen an anti-Manichean polemic in P.'s commentary, but other heretical groups are specified as well, notably Arians (see ARIUS), Photinians, Novatians, and Jovinians. One of the purposes of the commentary was to provide an unimpeachably orthodox reading of PAUL. However, a concern with ethics is also evident, both in exhortations to moral improvement and in providing examples of good conduct, notably Paul himself. P. stressed the gratuitous character of salvation and maintained the Pauline emphasis on justification by faith alone. He understood faith as human response to the gospel; he did not presuppose the intervention of special grace to enable this response, holding the capacities given through creation to every human being as sufficient. To represent P. as denying the need for any kind of grace whatsoever for salvation is a caricature. The issue revolved around what form that grace took. For P., the natural endowments of humans are the gifts of grace. Sin is an acquired habit and not a deformation of human character. The capacity to respond to God's work is always present in everyone simply because God gave persons such a capacity in making them human.

The characteristic themes of the later controversy are present in the commentaries. P. denied any notion of original or transmitted sin and held out the possibility that some people described in Scripture had led sinless lives, notably Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. He strictly equated predestination with divine foreknowledge and interpreted Romans 9 as a dialogue with an interloper in which Paul's concern was to defend free will. P. defended the freedom and potency of the will and treated faith as belief and acceptance of forgiveness—a capacity within the power of each individual.

Evidence suggests that respect for P. survived in Great Britain well into the ninth century and was reintroduced to Europe by Irish missionaries (H. Zimmer [1901]). The major source of Pelagian influence during the Middle Ages was an interpolated form of his commentary circulating under Jerome's name, which tended to emphasize the questionable character of the work. Pseudo-Jerome, as it is called, circulated in numerous manuscripts throughout the medieval period.

Another revision of P.'s commentaries was made by CASSIODORUS in the latter part of the sixth century, this time in an Augustinian direction. This revision circulated either anonymously or under a variety of names, including that of P., throughout the Middle Ages. It became associated with Primasius (fl. 6th cent.) during the sixteenth century and is so designated in Migne's Patrologia Latina.

Many of the medieval glosses on the Pauline text can be ultimately traced to P., either directly or through Pseudo-Jerome or Cassiodorus. The ascription to Jerome would have heightened the authority of the commentaries considerably. The actual verse-by-verse influence of P. in medieval commentation awaits further investigation.

Works: P.'s Expositions of the Thirteen Epistles of St. Paul (ed. A. Souter, TS 9.1-3, 1922–31; repr. in PL Supplementum [ed. A. Hamman, 1958] 1:1110-374, without critical apparatus); The Letters of P. and His Followers (ed. and tr. B. R. Rees, 1991); P.'s Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, Translated with Introduction and Notes (T. de Bruyn, 1993).

Bibliography: T. Bohlin, Die Theologie des P. und ihre Genesis (AUU 9, 1957). C. Charlier, "Cassiodore, Pélage et les origines de la Vulgate paulinienne," SPCIC, 1961 (AnBib 17-18, 1963) 461-70. H. Esser, "Das Paulusverständnis des P. nach seinen Pauluskommentar" (diss., University of Bonn, 1961); "Thesen und Anmerkungen zum exegetischen Paulusverständnis des P.," Zwischenstation (FS K. Kupisch, 1963) 27-42. R. Evans, P.: Inquiries and Reappraisals (1968). J. Ferguson, P.: A Historical and Theological Study (1956). H. J. Frede, P.: Der irische Paulustext Sedulius Scottus (Verus latina, Die Reste de altlateinischen Bibel 3, 1961); Ein neuer Paulustext und Kommentar, vol. 1, Untersuchungen (1973). G. Greshake, Gnade als konkrete Freiheit: Eine Untersuchung zur Gnadelehre des P. (1972). V. Grossi, Patrology (ed. A. Di Barardino, 1950–86) 4:465-86. D. W. Johnson, "Purging the Poison: The Revision of P.'s Pauline Commentaries by Cassiodorus and His Students" (diss., Princeton Theological Seminary, 1989). G. de Plinval, Pélage: Ses écrites, sa vie. et sa réform (1943); Essai sur le style et la langue de Pélage: suivi du traite inedit de induratione cordis Pharanis (CF, NS 31, 1947). B. R. Rees, P., A Reluctant Heretic (1988); A. J. Smith, "The Latin Sources of the Commentary of P. on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Romans," JTS 19 (1917–18) 162-230; 20 (1918–19) 55-65, 127-77; "P. and Augustine," JTS 31 (1929–30) 21-35. A. Souter, "The Character and History of P.'s Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul," PBA 7 (1915–16) 261-96; The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St. Paul (1927) 205-30. H. Zimmer, P. in Irland: Texte und Untersuchungen zur patristischen Literatur (1901).

D. W. JOHNSON

PELLICAN, CONRAD (1478–1556)

Born in the Alsatian town of Rouffach, Jan. 8, 1478, P. later surrendered the family name of Kürschner and assumed the surname of an uncle who provided for his education at Heidelberg and Tübingen. At the latter he studied with P. Scriptoris (d. 1504), who stimulated P.'s interest in philology and his opposition to scholasticism. In about 1499 he began the study of Hebrew, for which he was probably dependent on the meager twelve pages of instruction offered by P. Schwarz (Nigri; d. 1481) at the beginning of his Stella Meschiah (1477). P. was aided by the Spanish Jewish convert M. Adrianus, who was to become the first professor of Hebrew at the newly founded collegium Trilingue at Louvain (1517); and P. soon made personal contract with J. REUCHLIN. By 1501 when he took holy orders, he had finished writing an elementary Hebrew grammar (printed at Strasbourg in 1504), which was the first significant manual on the subject prepared by a Renaissance Christian. (A. Manuzio [d. 1515] had printed a primer of twelve pages in 1501, perhaps written by Adrianus.) P.'s work, however, was quickly eclipsed by Reuchlin's De rudimentis Hebraicis (1506). In 1502 P. received the DD degree at Basel and became a lecturer at the Franciscan monastery (1502–7). After teaching at Rouffach (1508–11), spending some years as a wandering scholar, and traveling to Rome, he became warden of the Basel monastery in 1519 and shortly thereafter joined the Reformers. In 1523 he was appointed with OECOLAMPADIUS to a professorship at the university of Basel, where he taught S. MÜNSTER. In 1526 P. was invited by ZWINGLI to Zurich, where he taught Hebrew and Greek until his death, Apr. 6, 1556.

P. had deep roots in the Alsatian humanism represented by J. Wimpfeling (1450–1528) and had aided ERASMUS and the printer J. Amerbac (c. 1443–1513) in editing texts of the church fathers. P. became the first Protestant Reformer to undertake an exposition of the entire Bible, writing commentaries on all the biblical books except Jonah, Zechariah, and the Apocalypse. He incorporated some kabbalistic (see KABBALAH) Christian material with which he was very familiar. He also assisted T. Bibliander (1504–64) in completing L. Judd's (c. 1482–1542) Latin Zurich Bible translation (1543). P. had begun collecting Hebrew volumes in the 1490s and translated several, including Genesis Rabbah and commentaries on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) by A. IBN EZRA and Bahya ben Asher ben Hlava (d. 1340).

Works: De modo legendi et intelligendi Hebraeum (written in 1501; printed as an appendix to G. Reisch, Aepitoma omnis phijlosophiae, Alias Margarita Phylosophica. . . . 1504); Psalterium Davidis ad Hebraicum veritatem interpretatum cum scholiis brevissimis (1527, 1532[2]); Commentaria Bibliorum in libros Veteris ac Novi Testamenti (7 vols., 1532–39); Das Chronikon des Konrad Pellikan (autobiography written in 1544, ed. B. Riggenbach, 1877).

Bibliography: H. R. Guggisberg, CE 3 (1987) 65-66. O. Kluge, "Die hebräische Sprachwissenschaft in Deutschland im Zeitalter des Humanismus," ZGJD 3 (1931) 81-97, 180-93. E. Silberstein, C. P.: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Studiums der hebräischen Sprache in der ersten Hälfte des XVI. Jahrunderts (1900). H. L. Strack, RE[3] 15 (1904) 108-11. G. E. Weil, Élie Lévita, humaniste et Massorète (1469–1549) (1963) 10-25, 248-54. C. Zürcher, Konrad Pellikans Wirken in Zurich, 1526–56 (1975).

J. H. HAYES

PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM

1. Moses Is the Author of the Pentateuch. For centuries the leading belief in Judaism and Christianity, Mosaic authorship was not based on historical and LITERARY investigation of how the Pentateuch arose. Instead, its object was to emphasize the Pentateuch's divine origin and AUTHORITY. During the first centuries CE and the Middle Ages this authority was disputed. In Jewish (see Ḥiwi Al-Balkhi, 9th cent.) and Christian (e.g., Ptolemaeus Letter to Flora; Pseudo-Clementine Homilies) heretical circles and among adversaries of Judaism and Christianity (e.g., Ibn Hazm, 11th cent.) dogmatic and ethical objections to the content of the Pentateuch were formulated, sometimes with the conclusion that it could not be (entirely and throughout) the work of Moses. Partially to answer the question of how the Pentateuch could be dependable despite its long and tumultuous history, the idea that Ezra had taken responsibility for an inspired "new edition" of the Pentateuch (see Photius Amphilochia 101, 816), based on 2 Esdr 14:19-48, found adherents among the church fathers. Already in ancient times the authorship of certain passages was considered to be problematical, for instance Deut 34:5-12 (in Pseudo-Clementine Homilies), a passage that throughout the ages has played a part in this discussion. In the Middle Ages and thereafter others (e.g., Isaac ibn Jasos; A. Ibn Ezra) added additional passages (post- and amosaica; Gen 12:6; 36:31-39; Exod 16:35; Num 12:3; Deut 1:1; 2:12; 3:11, 14; etc.), although these initially did not lead to doubts about Mosaic authorship. Until the eighteenth century some scholars pointed out Moses' prophetic gifts (e.g., Philo of Alexandria [de Vita Mosis 2.291] and Flavius Josephus [Ant. Jud. 4.326]) regarding Deut 34:5-12 (b. Baba Bathra otherwise: Joshua is the author of this passage). Others meddled just as little with Mosaic authorship but were of the opinion that Ezra, whose name continues throughout the centuries to play a part in theories about how the Pentateuch arose (see C. Houtman [1981] 91-115), and/or Joshua and Eleazar or others were responsible for a number of additions.

2. Moses Is Not the Author of the Pentateuch: The Emergence of Historical and Literary Criticism. During the seventeenth century, under the influence of powerful currents of rationalism, several great intellects (e.g., T. Hobbes, I. de la Peyrère, B. Spinoza, R. Simon, J. Le Clerc) placed question marks next to the traditional representation of Mosaic authorship. They not only pointed out items that could not have stemmed from Moses (see sec. 1) but also drew attention to historical errors, inconsistencies, the presence of remarkable repetitions, differences in style, and deficiencies in the arrangement of material. In answering the question of the age and authorship of the Pentateuch, they wanted to rely on the facts of the writings themselves without prejudice. This path did not lead them to a denial of all Mosaic contribution to the Pentateuch—they attached much value to such texts as Exod 17:14; 24:4; Num 33:2; Deut 31:9—but to the position that the Pentateuch arose in a much more complex manner than tradition represented. This position evoked vehement opposition in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and had little influence as far as the more official literature is concerned. It did, however, exert influence among French (e.g., J. Meslier [1664–1729]) and English (e.g., T. Morgan [d. 1743]) free thinkers, whose criticism of the HB was much more far-reaching than simply the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. Under such influence H. S. REIMARUS formulated his criticism of the Bible in the second half of the eighteenth century in Germany, including the issue of Mosaic authorship, while in France VOLTAIRE expressed critical sentiments about this matter. From this time onward, within biblical scholarship itself more detailed and initially more conservative theories than those of the seventeenth century were developed with respect to how the Pentateuch arose.

3. The Older Documentary Hypothesis, the Fragmentary Hypothesis, the Supplementary Hypothesis, and the Newer Documentary Hypothesis. How could Moses have written what is recounted in Genesis? Among other possibilities, opponents and proponents of Mosaic authorship, e.g., J. ASTRUC (1753), have taken the position that Moses utilized written documents. Astruc set himself the objective of refuting the criticism of HOBBES and others (see sec. 2), maintaining that the unevenness ascertained in Genesis need not lead to a denial of Mosaic authorship. An acceptable explanation could be that Moses had written the history from before his time in a kind of tetrapla; later transcribers made this into a continuous story and are responsible for the chaos of the current version. Astruc made it his goal to provide a reconstruction of Moses' work, basing his theory on repetitions and alterations of the divine names YHWH and Elohim in Genesis and Exodus 1–2; from Exodus 3 onward Moses drew on his own experience. Known as the older documentary hypothesis, this theory gained adherents because of J. G. EICHHORN's refinements (1780–83). While also giving attention to the terminology used, Eichhorn demanded as criteria for distinguishing the documents variations in style and characteristic elements in the content, and he had little difficulty in ascribing important portions of the Pentateuch to Moses.

In the first half of the nineteenth century the theory known as the fragmentary hypothesis (the Pentateuch was compiled from larger and smaller fragments that are not interdependent and are often irreconcilable), presented by A. GEDDES (1792, 1800) and developed and expanded by J. VATER (1802–5), captured great interest. With the appearance of Vater's work, a period of intensive reflection on the origins of the Pentateuch began in Germany and resulted in a diversity of positions. Characteristic of this period is that there is no easy way to label individual scholars as adherents of a particular theory with respect to their views on the origin of the Pentateuch. Furthermore, besides defenders of Mosaic authorship (F. Ranke, E. Hengstenberg, C. Keil, H. Hävernick) and scholars who accept the presence of extended Mosaic sections in the Pentateuch (e.g., Franz Delitzsch), a number of writers whose reflections are characterized by radical historical criticism drew attention to themselves (W. de Wette, C. Gramberg, A. Hartmann, P. von Bohlen, J. Vatke, J. George). DE WETTE (1806–7) disputed, among other things, that Moses was the author of the laws in the Pentateuch. Other scholars denied Moses the ability to write and posited that the Pentateuch received its present form only after the exile.

Also characteristic of the first half of the nineteenth century is that a number of scholars (e.g., H. Ewald) considerably modified their positions. De Wette, for instance, who initially defended a form of the fragmentary theory, later accepted the supplementary theory developed by J. STÄHELIN and EWALD and advanced by F. BLEEK and J. TUCH. According to this theory, an elohistic Grundschrift runs from Genesis to Joshua, supplemented by a Jehovist (who utilized not only YHWH, but also Elohim). To a large extent, letting go of the conception that the Pentateuch is the work of Moses and/or contemporaries opened up the possibility of posing questions about whether the literary sources of Genesis reach farther into the Pentateuch. Critical scrutiny of the presumed coherence of Genesis and the following books on the part of adherents of the supplementary hypothesis led H. HUPFELD (1853) to the theory, later known as the newer documentary hypothesis, that the Hexateuch was constructed from a later priestly (P) and an earlier elohistic (E) document, which an editor combined with an even later jehovistic (J) document; and in this work Deuteronomy was given a place. The theory that the Pentateuch was compiled from four sources had now taken shape.

4. The Newer Documentary Hypothesis Defended in a New Form. In the second half of the nineteenth century a growing number of biblical scholars in Germany and beyond (e.g., A. Kuenen and J. Wellhausen) accepted the theory that the Pentateuch was constructed from four documents/sources. They were able to combine and forge into an imposing conception the insights achieved during the nineteenth century in divergent areas of history and historical criticism and in the history of the religion of Israel by such scholars as de Wette, GEORGE, VATKE, Ewald, Hupfeld, J. COLENSO, E. REUSS, and K. GRAF. According to this conception the esteemed ideas of how the HB arose furnished a convincing literary basis for an impressive picture of the religion of Israel, which was described by WELLHAUSEN (1878): The history of Israel was the result of a process characterized by centralization, ritualization, and denaturalization/historicization of the cult; the nomadic and agricultural religion of early Israel developed via the emergence of the law in Josiah's time, in which the religion of the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) exerted great influence, into the priestly legal religion of Judaism. This picture was based on the newer documentary hypothesis in a new guise: P is not the oldest, but the latest source of the Hexateuch, and the literary sources arose in the sequence J, E, D, P. This theory offered a good basis for the idea, voiced previously, that the legal portion of the Pentateuch (P) was vastly later than the prophets and had only been formed during the exile and thereafter. The Archimedian point of the picture sketched of Israel's religion is the idea, advanced by de Wette (1805), who himself shared the conception, that Deuteronomy was not only the law book of Josiah found in 622/621 BCE but was also conceived in order to initiate Josiah's reformation (2 Kings 22–23).

5. Developments After Kuenen/Wellhausen, Ongoing Reflection on the Origins of the Pentateuch, and Divergent Ideas. After 1900 acquaintance with ancient Near Eastern literature uncovered by archaeologists (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) made its impact on Pentateuchal research. Under this influence and that of Germanic studies, H. GUNKEL, and following in his foosteps H. GRESSMANN, intensely examined the preliterary transmission of especially the narrative material in the Pentateuch (see FORM CRITICISM). The result was that J and E were no longer regarded as authors but as schools that gathered orally transmitted folk narratives (see FOLKLORE). The documentary theory obtained features of a fragmentary theory. More generally, acquaintance with the literature of the ancient Near East led to the recognition that later literary texts (P) could contain ancient material. It has even been asserted that archaeological results demonstrate the unsoundness of the documentary theory (e.g., K. Kitchen [1966]).

The new version of the documentary hypothesis was regarded in conservative Protestant circles as undermining the reliability of the Bible (e.g., the W. R. Smith case). Either Mosaic authorship (e.g., W. Green, E. Young, W. Möller) or the thesis that the Pentateuch is a compilation of Mosaic material (e.g., G. Aalders, R. Harrison) was clung to resolutely. This was especially true in Roman Catholic circles until a more liberal climate was created by the encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1943) and the letter of the Pontifical Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard (1948). Before that time there was no room for moderate critical positions (M. Lagrante, F. von Hügel, A. van Hoonacker, H. Poels) because of the decree De Mosaica Authentica Pentateuchi (1906). Although Jewish circles showed some sympathy (e.g., E. Auerbach) for the documentary theory (Wellhausen was preceded by Jewish pioneers L. Zunz and A. Geiger), most Jewish scholars continued to defend Mosaic authorship (e.g., H. Wiener, M. Segal) or accent the unity of the present text while recognizing the diversity of the material contained therein (e.g., B. Jacob, M. Buber, U. Cassuto) and presented a modified version of the documentary theory: P is earlier than D; the Pentateuch is preexilic (Y. Kaufmann; cf. M. Weinfeld, M. Haran).

Certain scholars defended a completely new theory in combating the documentary hypothesis. B. EERDMANS, for example, while fully recognizing the necessity of literary criticism, in conjunction with his concept that Israel's religion had been polytheistic until late times, advocated a kind of crystallization hypothesis. E. Robertson and R. Brinker defended the antiquity of the material in the Pentateuch: It was passed on in the various sanctuaries of ancient Israel after the entry into Canaan; Deuteronomy is the work of Samuel, etc. The new theories obtained little assent, however.

In the school of KUENEN/Wellhausen, the documentary theory was modified on the basis of continuing literary-critical investigation. Taking their cue from remarks in the work of the masters, they investigated the composition of the literary sources in minute detail, resulting in an atomistic analysis reminiscent of the fragmentary hypothesis and undermining the classical picture of the Pentateuch as the work of a limited number of authors, and with it the documentary hypothesis itself. This development evoked different reactions, including the development of a streamlined form of the documentary theory known as the newest documentary hypothesis, in which a fifth ancient source was reconstructed in addition to J, E, D, and P (R. Smend [son], O. Eissfeldt, G. Fohrer; cf. also J. Morgenstern, R. Pfeiffer, C. Simpson; different again J. Hempel); the tendency to limit the number of sources; the characterization of E as revising and supplementing (P. Volz, W. Rudolph, T. Vriezen, S. Mowinckel); and even the allotment to P. of such a status (Volz, Vriezen, I. Engnell; cf. M. Löhr). In this way the supplementary hypothesis was given a new lease on life after a fashion. The presence of the older strata outside the Hexateuch was defended by some authors (O. Eissfeldt, G. Hölscher, H. Schulte).

Gunkel and Gressmann directed their attention especially to the earliest stages of transmission. Inspired by them and by A. ALT, both G. von RAD and M. NOTH have, each with his own emphasis, directed attention to the various stages of the process by which the Pentateuch came into being (Überlieferungsgeschichte [tradition history]). They held to the literary sources theory but gave this new content. Von Rad (1938) assigned J an important place in the Hexateuch's origin: Living at the time of David/Solomon, J expanded the canonical scheme of salvation history (which is rooted in the archaic cultic creed of Deut 25:5-9, itself a Hexateuch in a nutshell) with material from a very different provenance and is responsible for the Einbau of the initially independent Sinai tradition, for the Ausbau of the history of the patriarchs, and for the Vorbau of the pre-history. He made the variety of material serviceable to the theme dominating the scheme of salvation history, that of Landnahme. The addition of the E and P sources has not altered the picture drawn by J. In this fashion von Rad gave the supplementary hypothesis a new form.

Noth (1943; ET 1981) labeled Deuteronomy–Kings as a connected work and limited the presence of J, E, and P to the Tetrateuch. He postulated (1948; ET 1972) a communal substratum (gemeinsame Grundlage [G]) for J and E comprising the five main themes of the Pentateuch that had arisen in his proposed amphictony (1930) as a result of a growing mutual entanglement of the material transmitted by the unified tribes with the crystallization of the exodus tradition. These themes attracted much material from divergent provenance and probably received a settled form in the pre-literary phase of the transmission. J, E, and P were individual authors who each rendered the material with his own emphasis. Their work underlies the Pentateuch, which thus takes on the character of a collection.

Scandinavian scholars (J. Pedersen, I. Engnell) have also emphasized that the Pentateuch is the result of a complicated process of transmission. However, they opposed sharply the interpretatio europeica moderna of literary criticism, asserting that the material in the Pentateuch was transmitted between simultaneously coexisting circles and that in the transmission process archaic and later material congealed together. In connection with this they criticized Wellhausen's evolutionistic concept of Israel's religion. PEDERSEN initially regarded JE, D, and P as collections that obtained their present form in postexilic times but that are of pre- and postexilic date in terms of content. ENGNELL shared H. S. NYBERG's theory that the written HB was the creation of the postexilic Jewish community and that previously the oral transmission had been normative. His tradition-historical approach (see TRADITION HISTORY) resulted in a new sources theory incorporating elements of the supplementary hypothesis: Genesis–Kings is composed of (a) a P work, the Tetrateuch, which has adopted JE material among other things, and (b) a D work, Deuteronomy–Kings, each of which received its definitive form in postexilic times. His views led some people to take into account not only written transmission in the origins of the Pentateuch but oral transmission as well (e.g., S. Mowinckel), and induced others to characterize the sources of the documentary hypothesis as streams of tradition (e.g., A. Bentzen, R. de Vaux).

In view of the fundamental place of Deuteronomy in Wellhausen's conception, it is understandable that much study has been made of this book. Points of investigation have been the problem of the extent of Urdeuteronomium and the relation of Deuteronomy to the Book of the Covenant, the Holiness Code, and the prophetic books (e.g., Jeremiah). The rejection of the identification of Deuteronomy with Josiah's law book already before Wellhausen (e.g., Reimarus, Gramberg, Vatke) was again brought up for discussion. A postexilic origin was defended (e.g., G. Berry, G. Hölscher, S. Mowinckel; O. Kaiser); and the idea that Deuteronomy imposed the centralization of the cult, an all-important point in Wellhausen's conception (T. Oestreicher, A. Welch, W. Stärk), was disputed. De Wette's notion regarding how Deuteronomy came into existence was mitigated before as well as after Wellhausen by the thesis that Deuteronomy had been assuming form since the time of Hezekiah or Manasseh. Ongoing literary-critical examination led to the explanation of Deuteronomy's origin by means of documentary and supplementary hypotheses, while form criticism and tradition criticism led to the conclusion that the book contains archaic material and is the result of a complicated process of transmission. Thus von Rad (1947) asserted that Deuteronomy is the product of a north Israelite restoration movement on the part of Levites, harking back to the traditions of the amphictyony. Other scholars as well abandoned the "classic" position that the book was the work of Jerusalemite priests and prophets in favor of a north Israelite origin. This theory has receded into the background, and M. Weinfeld's (1972) defense of authorship by scribes and wise men from Jerusalem court circles has received support from various quarters.

6. Continuing Developments: Increasing Diversity of Opinion; Established Positions Subjected to Criticism. Many scholars are now distancing themselves from representations initially accepted by those following in the footsteps of Noth and von Rad—e.g., the antiquity of the cultic creed, the institution of the amphictyony, and the independence of the Sinai tradition. Old problems like the character of E and P continue to be points of discussion, with the existence of E sometimes being doubted or denied (J. Van Seters; H. Schmid [1976]; M. Rose [1981]). The conception of P as a Bearbeitungsschicht (redactional layer; see sec. 5) has met with approval from various quarters, but it is also criticized (e.g., by J. Emerton [1988] and K. Koch [1987]); it even has been claimed that P continues as a source right into Kings (W. Resenhöfft [1977]).

The documentary theory is being presented again in new forms. P. Weimar and E. Zenger assign the Jehovist (JE) a prominent place in otherwise divergent conceptions. The suggestion (F. Winnett; cf. D. Redford, N. Wagner) that with regard to the Pentateuch's origin one should consider not merely the possible redactional combination of various sources but also the possibility of consecutive expansions/revisions of the material has found some approval (Van Seters, H. Schmitt, Kaiser). The existence of archaic layers is being denied. Even though there was never a full consensus on the dating of J and E, unanimity existed at least in the twentieth century as to their preexilic origin. This opinion is being surrendered. Van Seters (1975) and H. Schmid (1976), traveling different routes, have come to the conclusion that J ought to be dated in the exilic period. According to Van Seters (1992, 1994), the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY (DtrH) is prior to J, who wrote his work in reaction to DtrH. (In comparison M. Rose [1981] maintains that the deuteronomistic history in older form is earlier than J, while C. Levin [1993] argues that Deuteronomy is while J and that J is earlier than or contemporary with the deuteronomistic history; Levin's J, however, differs from Van Seter's J in many respects). H. Vorländer (1978) advocates a dating in the exilic or postexilic period for the origin of JE.

These positions do not imply a radical break with the documentary theory, however. This is championed by R. Rendtorff (1977), who is of the opinion that consistent application of tradition criticism leads to the conclusion that there are no continuous layers in the Pentateuch and that the material is joined by priestly and deuteronomistic redactional notes (cf. E. Blum [1984]), thereby returning, in fact, to the fragmentary theory. S. Tengström (1976, 1982), in contrast, maintains that a coherent epic underlies the Hexateuch. In his case the supplementary theory returns in a new form: A Grunderzählung (original narrative) from the eleventh century BCE has been supplemented by deuteronomistic and priestly authors (L. Brisman [1990]; B. Renaud [1991]).

The documentary theory is being criticized, often in a fragmentary way. The argumentation on which the source theory rests is often dealt with to a limited degree or only partially, and questions are being left open. The newer positions have not yet crystallized; e.g., the consequences for the picture of Israel's religion are hardly dealt with. A comprehensive new conception has not been presented or has merely been given vague contours. Many elements in the approach and in the conclusions of the new studies are not new; instead, old ideas that were unable to achieve much recognition earlier are being defended in a new context and in sometimes varied forms. It is thus understandable that the documentary theory in its classic form continues to enjoy support as well, at least as far as the main issues are concerned (e.g., A. Gunneweg [1983, 1985]; E. Nicholson [1991]; L. Schmidt; W. Schmidt), since it continues to provide the most satisfactory answer to questions about the manner in which the Pentateuch came to be. Modified versions like the Jewish variant (see sec. 5) also still have their supporters (e.g., A. Hurvitz [1982]; J. Milgrom [1991]).

Next to the methods of textual investigation elicited by questioning the process of how the Pentateuch came into being (diachronic approach), there is a growing interest in new forms of textual analysis in reaction to the atomistic approach, which has played the leading role in HB studies. This shift has taken place under the influence of Jewish biblical interpretation (see sec. 5), literature studies, and linguistics, and as a result of the focus on Scripture as CANON. An important common feature of these new forms of textual analysis, whose great diversity is indicated by the names under which they are presented (rhetorical criticism, canonical criticism, stylistic and structural analysis, the logotechnical method [C. Schedl; C. J. Labuschagne, 1985], etc.), is the extensive consideration of problems of textual form and function in the present form of the Pentateuch, especially in its narrative sections. Sometimes this focus on the Pentateuch in its present form is accompanied by criticism of traditional methods and/or deliberately leaving the results of traditional methods outside of consideration (e.g., K. Deurloo and other members of the Amsterdam School; J. Fokkelman [1975]; R. Alter [1981]; R. Alter and F. Kermode [1988]). Sometimes the intention is to do justice to a neglected aspect of Pentateuch studies, and the idea is (formulated in terms of literary criticism) to draw attention to the redactional activity to which the Pentateuch owes its definitive form (e.g., B. Anderson [1978]; D. Clines [1978]; B. Childs [1974]; G. Coats; I. Kikawada and A. Quinn [1985]; R. Moberly [1983]; G. Rendsburg [1986]). Not only the narrative sections but also Pentateuchal law is made the object of stylistic, structural (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION), and redactional (see REDACTION CRITICISM, HB) analysis (e.g., by E. Otto [1989]; Y. Osumi; L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger [1990]), in combination with a renewed interest in the relation of the Pentateuchal legal collections to each other and to the ancient Near Eastern law traditions (e.g., R. Westbrook [1988]) and with special attention to OT law history (e.g., F. Crüsemann [1992]).

Bibliography: R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (1981). B. W. Anderson, "From Analysis to Synthesis: The Interpretation of Genesis 1–11," JBL 97 (1978) 23-39. J. Astruc, Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux dont il parait que Moise s'est servi pour composer la Genèse, avec des remarques qui appuient ou éclaireissent ces conjectures (1753). A. G. Auld, "Keeping Up with Recent Studies VI: The Pentateuch," ExpTim 91 (1979–80) 297-302. J. Blenkinsopp, The Pentateuch: An Introduction to the First Five Books of the Bible (1992); "Introduction to the Pentateuch," NIB (1994) 1:305-18. E. Blum, Die Komposition der Vätergeschichte (WMANT 57, 1984); Studien zur Komposition des Pentateuch (BZAW 189, 1990). L. Brisman, The Voice of Jacob: On the Composition of Genesis (1990). F. Campbell and M. A. O'Brien, Source of the Pentateuch: Texts, Introductions, Annotations (1993). H. Cazalles, "Pentateuque," DBSup 7, 709-858. B. S. Childs, The Book of Exodus: A Critical, Theological Commentary (OTL, 1974); Introduction to the OT as Scripture (1979). D. J. A. Clines, The Theme of the Pentateuch (JSOTSup 10, 1978). G. W. Coats, From Canaan to Egypt: Structural and Theological Context for the Joseph Story (CBQMS 4, 1976); Moses: Heroic Man, Man of God (JSOTSup, 1988). F. Crüsemann, Das Deuteronomium: Entstehung, Gestalt, und Botschaft (ed. N. Lohfink, BETL 68, 1985); Die Tora: Theologie und Sozialgeschichte des alttestamentlichen Gesetzes (1992). F. H. Cryer, "On the Relationship Between the Yahwistic and the Deuteronomistic Histories," BN 29 (1985) 58-74. S. J. De Vries, "Kuenen's Pentateuchal Research in Comparison with Recent Pentateuchal Studies in North America," Abraham Kuenen (1828–91) (OTS 29, ed. P. Dirksen and A. Kooij, 1993) 128-47. W. de Wette, Beiträge zur Einleitung in das AT (2 vols., 1806–7). L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der christlichen Kirche (1869). T. B. Dozeman, God on the Mountain: A Study of Redaction, Theology, and Canon in Exodus 19–24 (1989). J. G. Eichhorn, Introduction to the Study of the OT (3 vols., 1780–83; ET 1888). J. A. Emerton, "An Examination of Some Attempts to Defend the Unity of the Flood Narrative in Genesis," VT 37 (1987) 401-20; "The Priestly Writer in Genesis," JTS 39 (1988) 381-400. J. P. Fokkelman, Narrative Art in Genesis: Specimens of Stylistic and Structural Analysis (1975). T. E. Fretheim, The Pentateuch (IBT, 1996). R. E. Friedman, "Torah (Pentateuch)," ABD (1992) 6:605-22. G. Garbini, "Torah e Mosè," Pentateucho come Torah (ed. B. G. Boschi, 1991) 83-96. A. Geddes, Genesis-Joshua (1792); Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures: Corresponding with a New Translation of the Bible (1800). A. H. J. Gunneweg, "Ammerkungen und Anfragen zur neueren Pentateuchforschung," TRu 48 (1983) 227-53; 50 (1985) 107-31. C. Houtman, Der Pentateuch: Die Geschichte seiner Erforschung neben einer Auswertung (CBET 9, 1994); Das Bundesbuch: Ein Kommentar (DMOA 24, 1997) 7-48. H. C. K. F. Hupfeld, Die Quellen der Genesis und die Art ihrer Zusammensetzung (1853). A. Hurvitz, A Linguistic Study of the Relationship Between the Priestly Source and the Book of Ezekiel: A New Approach to an Old Problem (1982). I. M. Kikawada and A. Quinn, Before Abraham Was: The Unity of Genesis 1–11 (1985). D. A. Knight, "The Pentateuch," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 263-96. K. Koch, "P—kein Redaktor! Erinnerung an zwei Eckdaten der Quellenscheidung," VT 37 (1987) 446-67. H.-J. Kraus, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments (1982³). C. J. Labuschagne, "The Literary and Theological Function of Divine Speech in the Pentateuch" (VTSup 36, 1985) 154-72; "Neue Wege und Perspektiven in der Pentateuchforschung," VT 36 (1986) 146-62. C. Levin, Der Jahwist (FRLANT 157, 1993). E. McQueen Gray, OT Criticism: Its Rise and Progress (1923). J. Milgrom, Leviticus 1–16 (AB, 1991) 3-51. R. W. L. Moberly, At the Mountain of God: Story and Theology in Exodus 32–34 (JSOTSup 22, 1983). E. W. Nicholson, "The Pentateuch in Recent Research: A Time for Caution," VTSup 43 (1991) 10-21; The Pentateuch in the Twentieth Century: The Legacy of J. Wellhausen (1998). M. Noth, Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels (BWANT 4,1, 1930); The Deuteronomistic History (1943; JSOTSup 15, 1981, 1991²); A History of the Pentateuchal Traditions (1948; ET 1972). Y. Osumi, Die Kompositionsgeschichte des Bundesbuches Exodus 20,22b–23,33 (OBO 105, 1991); Le Pentateuque en question: Les origines et la composition des cinq premiers livres de la Bible à la lumière des recherches récentes (ed. A. de Pury, 1991); Le Pentateuque: Débats et recherches (ed. P. Haudebert, 1992). E. Otto, Wandel der Rechtsbegründungen in der Gesellschaftsgeschichte des Antiken Israel: Eine Rechtsgeschichte des "Bundesbuches" Exod 20:22–23:13 (1988); Rechtsgeschichte der Redaktionen im Kodex Ešnunna und im "Bundesbuch": Eine redaktionsgeschichtliche und rechstvergleichende Studie zu altbabylonischen und altisraelitischen Rechtsüberlieferungen (OBO 85, 1989); Körperverletzungen in den Keilschriftrechten und im Alten Testament: Studien zum Rechtstransfer im Alten Testament (1991); "Vom Bundesbuch zum Deuteronomium: Die deuteronomische Redaktion in Deut 12–26," Biblische Theologie und gesellschaftlicher Wandel: Für N. Lohfink S.J. (ed. G. Braulik et al., 1993); "Gesetzesfortschreibung und Pentateuchredaktion," ZAW 107 (1995) 373-92; "Kritik der Pentateuchkomposition," TRu 60 (1995) 163-91 (on the concepts of Blum and Levin). G. von Rad, Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuch (BWANT 78, 1938; ET 1965). B. Renaud, La théophanie du Sinai: Exod 19–24, exégèse et théologie (1991). G. A. Rendsburg, The Redaction of Genesis (1986). R. Rendtorff, The Problem of the Process of Transmission in the Pentateuch (BSAW 147, 1977; ET, JSOTSup 89, 1990); "The Future of Pentateuchal Criticism," Henoch 6 (1984) 1-15; Leviticus (BKAT 3, 1, 1985) 1-12. W. Resenhöfft, Die Genesis im Wortlaut ihrer drei Quellenschriften: Studien zur Integral-Analyse des Enneateuchs (1974); Die Geschichte Alt-Israels: Die Quellenschriften der Bücher Genesis bis Könige im deutschen Wortlaut isoliert 1-4 (1977); Nachträge zur Textgestaltung der Geschichte Alt-Israels (1979); Die Quellenberichte im Joseph-Sinai-Komplex (Gen 37 bis Exod 24, mit 32–34) (1983). J. W. Rogerson, OT Criticism in the Nineteenth Century: England and Germany (1984); The Pentateuch (BS 39 1996). T. Römer, Israels Väter: Untersuchungen zur Väterthematik im Deuteronomium und in der deuteronomistischen Tradition (OBO 99, 1990). M. Rose, Deuteronomist and Jahwist: Untersuchungen zu den Berührungspunkten beider Literaturwerke (ATANT 67, 1981). H. Rouillard, La péricope de Balaam (Nombres 22–24) (1985). L. Ruppert, "Die Aporie der gegenwärtigen Pentateuchdiskussion und die Josepherzälung der Genesis," BZ 29 (1985) 31-48; "Zur neueren Diskussion um die Josefsgeschichte der Genesis," BZ 33 (1989) 92-97. H. Schmid, Die Gestalt des Mose: Probleme alttestamentlicher Forschung unter Berücksichtigung der Pentateuchkrise (1986). H. H. Schmid, Der sogenannte Jahwist: Beobachtungen und Fragen zur Pentateuchforschung (1976); "Auf der Suche nach neuen Perspektiven für die Pentateuchforschung," VTSup 32 (1981) 375-94. L. Schmidt, Literarische Studien zur Josephsgeschichte (BZAW 167, 1986); "Jakob erschleicht sich den väterlichen Segen: Literarkritik und Redaktion von Genesis 27,1-45," ZAW 100 (1988) 159-83; Beobachtungen zu der Plagenerzählung in Exodus VII 14–XI 10 (1990). W. H. Schmidt, "Ein Theologe in salomonischer Zeit? Plädoyer für den Jahwisten," BZ 25 (1981) 82-102; "Plädoyer für die Quellenscheidung," BZ 32 (1988) 1-14; "Elementare Erwägungen zur Quellenscheidung im Pentateuch," VTSup 43 (1991) 22-45. H.-C. Schmitt, Die nichtpriesterliche Josephsgeschichte: Ein Beitrag zur neuesten Pentateuchkritik (BZAW 154, 1980); "Die Hintergründe der 'neuesten Pentateuchkritik' und der literarische Befund der Josefsgeschichte, Gen 37–50," ZAW 97 (1985) 161-79; "Die Erzählung von der Versuchung Abrahams, Gen 22,1-19 und das Problem einer Theologie der elohistischen Pentateuchtexte," BN 34 (1986) 82-109. B. J. Schwartz, "The Priestly Account of the Theophany and Lawgiving at Sinai," Texts, Temples, and Traditions: A Tribute to M. Haran (ed. M. V. Fox et al., 1996) 103-34. L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger, Das Bundesbuch (Exod 20,22–23,33): Studien zu seiner Entstehung und Theologie (BZAW 188, 1990). R. Smend, "Ein halbes Jahrhundert alttestamentliche Einleitungswissenschaft," TRu 49 (1984) 3-30; Deutsche Alttestamentler in drei Jahrhunderten: Mit 18 Abbildungen (1989); Epochen der Bibelkritik (1991). S. O. Steingrimsson, Vom Zeichen zur Geschichte: Ein literar- und formkritische Untersuchung (1979), on Exod 6:28–11:10; Studies in the Book of Exodus: Redaction, Reception, Interpretation (ed. M. Vervenne, BETL 126, 1996). S. Tengström, Die Hexateucherzählung: Eine literaturgeschichtliche Studie (1976); Die Toledotformel und die literarische Struktur der priesterlichen Erweiterungsschicht im Pentateuch (1981). R. J. Thompson, Moses and the Law in a Century of Criticism Since Graf (VTSup 19, 1970). T. L. Thompson, The Origin of Ancient Israel, vol. 1, The Literary Formation of Genesis and Exodus 1–23 (JSOTSup 55, 1987). J. Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition (1975); Prologue to History: The Yahwist as Historian in Genesis (1992); The Life of Moses: The Yahwist as Historian in Exodus–Numbers (1994). J. S. Vater, Commentar über den Pentateuch (1802–05). J. Vermeylen, "La Formation du Pentateuque à la lumière de l'exégèse historico-critique," RTL 12 (1981) 324-46; Voices from Amsterdam: A Modern Tradition of Reading Biblical Narrative (ed. M. Kessler, 1994). H. Vorländer, Die Entstehungszeit des jehowistischen Geschichtswerkes (1978). P. Weimar, Untersuchungen zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Pentateuch (BZAW 146, 1977); Die Berufung des Mose: Literaturwissenschaftliche Analyse von Exodus 2,23–5,5 (OBO 32, 1980; cf. A. R. Müller, "Der Text als russische Puppe?" BN 17 [1982] 56-72); Die Meerwundererzählung: Eine Redaktionskritische Analyse von Exod 13,17–14,31 (1985). J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1878; ET 1885). G. J. Wenham, "Method in Pentateuchal Criticism," VT 41 (1991) 84-109. R. Westbrook, Studies in Biblical and Cuneiform Law (1988). R. N. Whybray, The Making of the Pentateuch: A Methodological Study (JSOTSup 53, 1987); Introduction to the Pentateuch (1995). E. Zenger, "Wo steht die Pentateuchforschung heute?" BZ 24 (1980) 101-16; "Auf der Suche nach einem Weg aus der Pentateuchkrise," TRev 78 (1982) 353-62; Israel am Sinai: Analysen und Interpretationen zu Exodus 17–34 (1985²).

C. HOUTMAN

PERKINS, WILLIAM (1558–1602)

One of the foremost biblical expositors of his time, P. was educated in the Reformed tradition at Christ's College, Cambridge (BA 1580 or 1581; MA 1584), and joined Christ's College as a fellow at the age of twenty-four. After his ordination he was appointed lecturer at Great St. Andrews Church, Cambridge. An extremely popular preacher, he also served as the public catechist at Corpus Christi College, where he lectured weekly, and was dean of Christ's College (1590–91). Upon his marriage in 1595 he left his Cambridge post; however, he continued to lecture, preach, and write until his death at the age of forty-four.

P. is best known to students of Renaissance literature as the author of the first comprehensive English Protestant manual of casuistry, The Whole Treatise of the Cases of Conscience, Distinguished into Three Bookes (1606). Published after his death, the work provided a practical application of Christian moral ideals to the daily lives of laypersons by appealing to principles derived from Scripture. P. also wrote A Golden Chaine, or the Description of Theologie, Containing the Order of the Causes of Salvation and Damnation, According to God's Word (1590; ET 1591), which places Reformed THEOLOGY and the concept of a step-by-step order of salvation in the context of contemporary English culture. Offering practical and realistic counsel, the Golden Chain is grounded in Scripture and is documented throughout with specific scriptural passages to support its contentions. Although P. regarded the Reformers highly, he relied more on other sources, especially the Bible, as well as on the writings of AUGUSTINE and other church fathers, like JEROME, Polycarp, and Cyprian. His widely circulated biblical commentaries relied on detailed expositions of biblical passages that moved from "doctrine" to "use"; these readings endorsed explicitly the literal sense of interpretation.

Since respect for Scripture stood at the center of P.'s works and because he was a prolific spokesperson for Reformed Protestantism in England, biblical commentary has an important place among his works. He wrote expositions of the Lord's Prayer (1592), A Digest or Harmonie of the Bookes of the Old and NT (1613), and discussions of specific biblical texts: Phil 3:7 (1601), Galatians (1604), Revelation 1–3 (1606), Jude (1606), Heb 11:1–12:1 (1607), and the SERMON ON THE MOUNT (1608). His last work was the Commentary or Exposition upon the First Five Chapters of the Epistles to the Galatians (1604). A mark of his importance to seventeenth-century biblical studies was that his followers edited his sermons and published them as biblical commentary. These works included his commentary on Hebrews 11, A Cloud of Faithful Witnesses (1607), a work considered, with his well-known Treatise on Vocations, or Callings of Men (1603), as particularly influential in extolling and developing the virtues of diligence and thrift in colonial America. P.'s works were once so popular that they appeared in English, Latin, Dutch, Spanish, Welsh, and Irish; their presence in prominent libraries from England to New England testified to their influence.

Works: The Works of That Famous and Worthy Minister of Christ in the Universitie of Cambridge, M. W. P. (3 vols., 1608–9).

Bibliography: I. Breward, "Introduction," The Work of W. P. (1970) 1-131. R. T. Kendall, Calvin and English Calvinism to 1649 (1982). D. K. McKim, Ramism in W. P.'s Theology (1987); HHMBI, 231-35. J. B. Mullinger, DNB 45 (1896) 6-9. H. C. Porter, Reformation and Reaction in Tudor Cambridge (1958). G. T. Sheppard (ed.), A Commentary on Galatians (1617) by W. P. (1989), with introductory essays. L. B. Wright, "W. P.: Elizabethan Apostle of 'Practical Divinity,' " Huntington Library Quarterly 3 (1940) 171-96.

J. H. AUGUSTINE

PEROWNE, JOHN JAMES STEWART (1823–1904)

British ecclesiastic and HB scholar, P. was born in Burdwan, Bengal, on Mar. 13, 1823, into a family of Huguenot origin, the oldest son of missionaries working on behalf of the Church Missionary Society. He was educated at Norwich Grammar School and at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he was a scholar and gained various university awards, including the Tyrwhitt Hebrew Scholarship in 1848. Afterward he became a fellow of Corpus Christi College and a lecturer at King's College, London. From 1862 to 1872 he was vice-principal of St. David's College, Lampeter, in Wales, and during this period also held various ecclesiastical positions. Returning to Cambridge in 1872, he was fellow of Trinity College (1873–75), Hulsean Professor of Divinity, succeeding J. B. LIGHTFOOT (1875–78), dean of Peterborough (1878–79), and finally bishop of Worcester (1891–1901).

P. belonged to the evangelical party in the Church of England but took an independent line. Thus, though not as fully critical in his approach to Scripture as S. DRIVER, he rejected fundamentalism and also took an independent stance on certain other ecclesiastical matters, e.g., his moderate views with regard to ritualism. His most sustained piece of work was a two-volume commentary on the psalms (1864–68, 1886[6]), which is stronger in its philological comments than in its criticism. His philological ability gained him a place on the committee that produced the RV. Other contributions included a noteworthy discussion of E. B. PUSEY's Book of Daniel in the Contemporary Review (January 1866), in which he rebuked Pusey for the tone of his work, even though in the end he accepted Pusey's traditional dating of the work. P. also accepted that there was a variety of sources in the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and that not everything in it could be as early as Moses, although he regarded it as Mosaic in essence. He was the first general editor of the Cambridge Bible for Schools (from 1872) and also published many sermons and a noteworthy study of N. C. THIRLWALL.

Works: "Pentateuch," and "Zechariah," A Dictionary of the Bible (ed. W. Smith, 1863) 514-16, 765-67; The Book of Psalms: A New Translation (2 vols., 1864–68, 1886[6]); Immortality: Four Sermons Preached Before the University of Cambridge (1869); The Remains, Literary and Theological, of Bishop C. Thirlwall (3 vols., 1877–78); "Dr. Pusey on Daniel the Prophet," Contemporary Review 1 (1886) 96-112.

Bibliography: A. R. Buckland, DNB 2nd supp., vol. 3 (1912) 108-9. T. K. Cheyne, FOTC, 210-11 (mistakenly referred to under the name of his brother, E. Perowne).

J. DAY

PERRIN, NORMAN (1920–76)

Born Nov. 29, 1920, in Wellingborough, Northants, England, P. served in the Royal Air Force (1940–45) and later studied theology at Manchester University (BA, 1949), Greek NT and apocryphal studies at London University (BD, 1952; MTh, 1956), and received his DTh at the University of Göttingen (1959). Ordained in 1949 in the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, he served pastorates in London (1949–52) and Swansea, South Wales (1952–56). From 1959 to 1964 he was assistant (later associate) professor of NT at the Candler School of Theology, Emory University, and from 1964 to 1976 he was associate (later full) professor of NT at the Divinity School, University of Chicago. He was president of the Chicago Society of Biblical Research (1971–72) and the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (1972–73). He died at Park Forest, Illinois, on Nov. 25, 1976.

At the time of his death P. was a major influence in NT studies, especially in North America; his relatively short career embodied the major trends and methods of postwar scholarship. Under the early influence of T. MANSON and with J. JEREMIAS as Doktorvater, his early work centered on the historical JESUS, eschatology, and the kingdom sayings. While his first work, The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (1963; a revision of his 1959 disseration), chiefly surveyed the discussion since F. SCHLEIERMACHER, Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (1967) combined a delineation of criteria for authentic Jesus material with form-critical examination of the SYNOPTIC Jesus tradition and theological engagement in the quest for the historical Jesus. R. BULTMANN and the post-Bultmannians now shaped his theology. With Bultmann he made faith independent of historical knowledge, but with E. KÄSEMANN he affirmed material continuity between the historical Jesus and the "faith image" offered in the Gospels. During this early period he also produced important studies on the title "Son of man" (collected in A Modern Pilgrimage). From examination of the literary context and use of Son of man from Dan 7:13 through 1 Enoch and 4 Ezra, he became one of the first scholars to deny its pre-Christian titular or messianic use.

Spelling out the implications of REDACTION CRITICISM and its importance for understanding the Gospel of Mark occupied the second phase of his career. He consistently urged that Mark was not, as generally thought, an artless collector of tradition but a skillful author and creator of the literary form "gospel." In moving away from FORM CRITICISM and concern for the historical Jesus to redaction criticism and the theological differences between the Gospels, he also turned to general LITERARY criticism and HERMENEUTICS; as early as 1965 he urged joining the two (Criterion 4 [1965] 34) and later commented that "it was necessary for redaction criticism to mutate into a genuine literary criticism, which it has done here in America" (Int 30 [1976] 120).

Influenced strongly by A. WILDER and by colleagues at the University of Chicago, especially P. RICOEUR, D. Tracy, and M. Eliade, his later writings (esp. his final major work, Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom [1976]) explore the nature of symbolic language, the relation of myth and PARABLE, and the relationship between text and interpreter.

P. described his life as a pilgrimage, and although he moved quickly between way stations, patterns emerge. His unrealized hope was to do a major study of "the function of the Jesus figure, the Jesus material, the Jesus story in the theological systems developed within the NT" (JR 64 [1984] 431). Careful attention to method and lucid exposition of the history of scholarship are hallmarks of his writings. He was trained as a historian but never minimized the historical specificity of NT texts; and although theologically a Bultmannian, he constantly probed how ancient texts could address modern men and women. Intellectually open, he explored the riches other disciplines offered to the study of the NT.

Works: The Kingdom of God in the Teaching of Jesus (1963); Rediscovering the Teaching of Jesus (1967); The Promise of Bultmann (1969); What Is Redaction Criticism? (1969); A Modern Pilgrimage in NT Christology (1974); The NT: An Introduction; Proclamation and Parenesis, Myth and History (1974; 2nd rev. ed with D. Duling, 1982); Jesus and the Language of the Kingdom: Symbol and Metaphor in NT Interpretation (1976); The Resurrection According to Matthew, Mark, and Luke (1977). For a complete bibliography of P.'s writings along with reviews see JR 64 (1984) 548-57.

Bibliography: D. Duling, "N. P. and the Kingdom of God: Review and Response," JR 64 (1984) 468-83. E. Grässer "N. P.'s Contribution to the Question of the Historical Jesus," JR 64 (1984) 484-500. W. Kelber, "The Work of N. P.: An Intellectual Pilgrimage," JR 64 (1984) 452-67. C. R. Mercer, N. P.'s Interpretation of the NT: From "Exegetical Method" to "Hermeneutical Process" (1987); "N. P.'s Pilgrimage: Releasing the Bible to the Public," CC 103 (1986) 483-86; HHMBI, 602-6. P. Ricoeur, "From Proclamation to Narrative," JR 64

(1984) 501-12. W. O. Seal, "N. P. and His 'School': Retracing a Pilgrimage," JSNT 20 (1984) 87-107. A. N. Wilder, "N. P. and the Relation of Historical Knowledge to Faith," HTR 82 (1989) 201-11.

J. R. DONAHUE

PESHITTA

The Peshitta is the ancient Syriac TRANSLATION of the Bible used by all branches of the Syriac-speaking church; therefore it must have received acceptance before the fifth century CE schism between the Nestorians and the Monophysites. Although the Peshitta is the original Syriac translation of the HB, it is no longer regarded as the oldest Syriac version of the NT. The NT books 2 and 3 John, 2 Peter, and Revelation were not part of the early Syriac CANON solidified at Edessa and thus were not included in the Peshitta.

1. Introduction of the Peshitta into Western Europe. The first printed Syriac NT, that of J. Widmanstadt, appeared in 1555 (Venice), followed by that of Tremellius in 1569 (Geneva). The Paris POLYGLOT of 1645 used MS 17a5, an inferior manuscript related to 12a1, the "Buchanan" Bible. (In the list for the Leiden edition the first number indicates the century; the letter, the contents.) In 1630 E. POCOCKE included the books omitted from the Peshitta NT for the first time (using the Philoxenian version). The text of the Paris Polyglot was basically recopied for the London Polyglot of 1657. While the NT was printed thirty or more times by the end of the nineteenth century, the principal editions of the OT were those of Lee (1823, using the text of the London Polyglot), Urmia (1852, made for the Presbyterian mission there), and Mosul (1887, made by Dominicans). The two latter editions used manuscripts as well as Lee's edition.

Western interest in the Syrian liturgy and language commenced after Maronite clergy attended the Fifth Lateran council (1512–17). Some scholars believed that Mark wrote his Gospel in Latin and then translated it and various other NT books into Syriac. With the printing of the Peshitta, Protestants thought they might have the original of Matthew and Hebrews, indeed the language of JESUS himself; however, in response to their claims that it preceded the VULGATE, Roman Catholics minimized its antiquity. As late as 1851 the English translation of the Peshitta by J. Murdock claimed that the text probably preserved the very words of Jesus and his apostles. Ironically, in 1858 W. Cureton made similar claims for the Old Syriac Gospels when he published an Old Syriac manuscript. Supporters of the priority of the Peshitta were forced to give way to claims for the Old Syriac, although the case was not completely settled until past the end of the century.

Although Elias and J. Assemani brought manuscripts to Rome and Florence from the Wadi Natrun in the early 1700s, the great period of oriental manuscript acquisition was the nineteenth century. C. Rich collected manuscripts around Mosul, and in the early 1840s H. Tattam obtained others at the Wadi Natrun that went to the British Museum. Tattam's collection was not used much until W. Wright's three-volume catalog (1870–72) of the British Museum holdings. Paris acquired manuscripts from Siirt; still others went to Berlin.

2. The OT. One or more monographs, dissertations, or studies have been written on every book of the OT from the mid-nineteenth century to the present. These have typically examined the translation technique, raised the question of the Vorlage and the relations to the TARGUMIM and the SEPTUAGINT, and speculated on the date (e.g. 1st or 2nd cent. CE or even later), location (e.g., Edessa or Adiabene), and authorship (e.g., Jewish, Christian, Jewish-Christian, community changing from Judaism to Christianity) of the translation.

These studies made it clear that a number of translators must have been responsible for different books of the OT Peshitta. The translations range from very free, as in Chronicles, to literal, as with Judges or Kings, but generally have a tendency to make the obvious explicit and to harmonize passages with surrounding verses or occasionally with passages in other books. Where the meaning of a Hebrew word was uncertain, the context usually guided the translator. Storytelling characteristics prevailed over literal renderings.

Beginning with J. Perles in 1859 many studies have explored the relations of the Peshitta with Jewish traditions, including the Targumim, and the related issues of the date and religion of the translators. The strongest illustrations of Jewish exegesis are found in the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), but the case for a targumic origin remains unproved (see P. Dirksen [1984] 258-96; and M. Weitzman [1994] 60-83).

There are certainly readings in various Peshitta books (e.g., frequently in Proverbs, Ezekiel, and the Twelve, and minimally in Samuel and Kings) that have come from the Septuagint, sometimes specifically the Lucianic recension. Yet apart from the revision of Jacob of Edessa, there is no evidence of any revision to conform to the Greek or reason to claim that in difficult passages the Peshitta systematically consulted any other translations. It was generally assumed that manuscripts could be classified as either Nestorian or Monophysite, with distinct textual traditions.

Starting at the end of the nineteenth century, W. BARNES provided critical apparatuses and editions of several OT books (e.g., Chronicles [1897]; Psalms [1904]; 2 Kings [1904/5, 1910]); his pupil Pinkerton (d. 1916) completed the edition of the Gospels printed by the British Foreign Bible Society (BFBS) in 1901. It had come to be recognized that MSS 5b1 and 9a1 often had readings closer to the MT than to the rest of the manuscripts and often differing from the Hebrew and from the rest of the tradition. While Barnes appreciated the value of 7a1, he regarded 9a1 as a peculiar scholar's work sporadically adjusted to the MT and of little critical value. Pinkerton took the opposite position, regarding these manuscripts as preserving the original Peshitta where they agreed with the MT.

A new era in OT Peshitta research began with the creation of the Peshitta Institute in Leiden and the publication of a seventeen-volume critical edition (collated against 7a1, with an extensive apparatus of variants from manuscripts through the 12th cent., and regularly provided with significant introductions), a concordance project (6 vols., with Hebrew equivalents and some grammatical information), symposia, a monograph series, etc. Several studies as well as the introductions to the Leiden edition show that a significant number of ancient manuscripts have texts much closer to the Hebrew than does that of MS 7a1 (specifically 5b1, 6b1, 6k5, 6pj1, 6pk9, 7j3, 7pj2, 8b1, 8h5, 9a1, 10f1). M. Koster (1977) has presented the case for 5b1 in massive detail, and M. Weitzman (in P. Dirksen and M. Mulder [1988] 225-58) and D. Walter (in P. Dirksen and A. van der Kooij [1995] 8, 187-204) have argued for 9a1. These writers differ on how to treat the standard text found in most manuscripts. For Koster a text collateral with 5b1 gradually and unintentionally developed into the textus receptus, while for Weitzman a "virtual edition" evolved. In contrast, after demonstrating that the older text of the Peshitta of Kings made use of the Peshitta of Isaiah, that the revision made further use of it as well as of the Peshitta of Jeremiah, and that by the sixth century the manuscripts of the revision of Kings already differed extensively, Walter postulates an intentional revision for some books made no later than the sixth century.

Weitzman (1995, 217-46) has tentatively identified at least twelve translation units on the basis of vocabulary usage (e.g., changes in vocabulary usage suggests a change in translator with 2 Sam 6:16). The more conservative translators (on the basis of equivalents used) sometimes show a positive attitude toward the Jewish people; the more "modern" translators make more use of LXX readings.

For many of the volumes of the Leiden edition, an older group of manuscripts (pre-9th cent. and 9a1) was identified, along with a younger group of manuscripts found as early as the ninth century that have a very uniform text and, according to D. Lane, typically have a Mosul provenance. Also included are 12a1 and related manuscripts, which are often classified as a separate group. (Psalms presents a different situation, with a distinct Nestorian text tradition dating from the twelfth century.) Lane and K. Jenner (1998) have each offered somewhat different explanations for the uniformity of the younger group of manuscripts in terms of the changed status of Christians under contemporary Muslim rulers. For the older manuscripts in 5b1 the character and handwriting for Genesis and Exodus differ from that of Numbers and Deuteronomy. MSS 8a1 and 9a1 have received detailed studies by Jenner.

With critical texts increasingly available, studies of the Syriac syntax of the Peshitta began in the 1970s. To the ongoing contributions of T. Muraoka and S. Brock (1992) must be added the work of P. Williams (1997) and J. Joosten (1966). Studies of translation style and syntax show that the citations of the Peshitta in BHK and BHS must be used with hesitation, although it is clear that the Peshitta is an important early witness to a Hebrew text very similar to that of the MT. Considerable interest has been shown in the edition of Jacob of Edessa, which is now seen as a revision of the Peshitta rather than of the Syro-Hexapla; several publications and a bibliography (Journal of Syriac Studies [1998]) are in process.

3. The NT. The Syriac texts of the NT, including that of the Peshitta, are invaluable witnesses to the original text of the NT and its development. Attention has focused on the relations among the Syriac versions and on determining the text type of the various Greek manuscripts used in each new revision of the Syriac as the Syriac became increasingly conformed to some Greek text.

Manuscripts preserving the text of the Old Syriac Gospels were discovered in the nineteenth century: the Curetonian (obtained by the British Museum in 1842, and first published in 1858) and the Sinaitic palimpsest (found in 1892 by A. S. Lewis; the standard edition dates from 1910). These somewhat different texts contain significant numbers of Diatessaron readings, however explained. An Old Syriac version of Acts and of Pauline literature (see PAUL) is generally assumed on the basis of the texts quoted by early fathers, although no manuscripts of it exist.

The Peshitta is generally regarded as a revision of an Old Syriac text type, using a Greek text of an Antiochian form but with many readings agreeing with older Greek text types that include Western readings. It may have used Greek manuscripts whose readings nowhere else survive. Joosten (17-21) argues instead that the Peshitta is not based on the Old Syriac at all but on the form of the Diatessaron that had evolved by the fourth century. Early in the twentieth century F. BURKITT attributed the edition to Rabbula, bishop of Edessa (411–35), a position that since the work of A. Vööbus is no longer in favor. Vööbus argues that the Peshitta text was already in existence by the late fourth century, although the Old Syriac remained in circulation for centuries.

Although the language of the Peshitta is less free than that of the Old Syriac, the extent varies from book to book, with the Peshitta occasionally preserving Diatessaronic readings. Studies of mannerisms, style, and vocabulary equivalents for the Greek suggest a number of translators. The Peshitta NT manuscripts are generally in close agreement with each other. Forty-two manuscripts were collated for the 1901 BFBS edition of the Gospels, but only the text of the Gospels was reprinted, with the text of the other NT books, in 1920 (often reprinted).

The Philoxenian version (507–8), used only by Monophysites, revised the Peshitta on the basis of Greek manuscripts, producing a work closer to the Greek and adding NT passages and books not found in the Peshitta. It survives because of those additions and in quotations. The Harclean version with its marginal readings, an important witness to the Western text, was prepared in Egypt by 616, revising the Philoxenian NT to more slavishly follow the Greek.

A number of dissertations (several by students of Vööbus) have studied the relationship among the ancient Syriac versions, translations made from the Syriac, and quotations in the fathers for specific books or the translation equivalents for specific terms. Critical editions important for NT Peshitta work have finally become available. G. Kiraz (1996) has published an edition of the Gospels that provides the Curetonian, Sinaitic, Peshitta, and the Harclean texts in parallel and, separately, a six-volume concordance to the Peshitta. B. Aland and Juckel (1986–95) have provided critical editions with introductions and appendixes for the general epistles and most of the Pauline letters, giving variant readings from the Peshitta manuscripts and, in parallel, citations from the fathers and the Harclean version.

Bibliography: B. Aland and A. Juckel, Das Neue Testament in Syrischer Überlieferung, vol. 1, Die grossen katholischen Briefe (ANTF 7, 1986); vol. 2, Die Paulinischen Briefe, pt. 1, Römer- und 1. Korintherbrief (ANTF 14, 1991); pt. 2, 2. Korintherbrief, Galaterbrief, Epheserbrief, Philipperbrief und Kolosserbrief (ANTF 23, 1995). T. Baarda, "The Syriac Versions of the NT," The Text of the NT in Contemporary Research (StD 46, ed. B. D. Ehrman and M. W. Holmes, 1995) 97-112. M. Black, "The Syriac Versional Tradition," Die alten Übersetzungen des Neuen Testaments, die Kirchenväterzitate und Lektionare (ANTF 5, ed. K. Aland, 1972) 120-59. S. P. Brock, "Syriac Versions," ABD (1992) 6:794-99. P. B. Dirksen, An Annotated Bibliography of the Peshitta of the OT (MPIL 5, 1989); "The OT Peshitta," Mikra (ed. M. J. Mulder, CRINT 2, 1, 1988) 255-97. P. B. Dirksen and M. J. Mulder (eds.), The Peshitta: Its Early Text and History (MPIL 4, 1988). P. B. Dirksen and A. van der Koij (eds.), The Peshitta as a Translation (MPIL 8, 1995). L. Haefeli, Die Peschitta des Alten Testamentes (ATA 11, 1, 1927). K. D. Jenner and D. M. Walter, The Redactional Process Behind the Syriac Text of Kings (MPIL, 1998). J. Joosten, The Syriac Language of the Peshitta and Old Syriac Versions of Matthew (SStLL 22, 1966). G. A. Kiraz, A Computer-generated Concordance to the Syriac NT According to the British and Foreign Bible Society's Edition (6 vols., 1992); Comparative Edition of the Syriac Gospels (NTTS 21:1-4, 1996). M. D. Koster, The Peshitta of Exodus (SSN 19, 1977). B. M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the NT (1977), includes a valuable section, "Limitations of Syriac in Representing Greek," by S. P. Brock. The OT in Syriac According to the Peshitta Version (17 vols., ed. Peshitta Institute, Leiden, pts. 1-4, 1972– ; pt. 5, concordance, 6 vols., 1997– ; pt. 6, 2 vols., addenda, corrigenda, and the updated MSS list). W. Strothmann (ed.), Konkordanz zur syrischen Bibel (GOF.S, 1973–). M. P. Weitzman, "Peshitta, Septuagint, and Targum," VI Symposium Syriacum 1992 (OCA 247, ed. R. Lavenant, 1994) 51-84; "Lexical Clues to the Composition of the OT Peshitta," Studia Aramaica (JSSSup 4, ed. M. J. Geller, J. C. Greenfield, and M. P. Weitzman, 1995) 217-46. P. J. Williams, "Studies in the Syntax of the Peshitta of I Kings" (diss., University of Cambridge, 1997).

D. M. WALTER

PETER, FIRST LETTER OF

1. Early Interpretations. The history of the interpretation of 1 Peter probably begins within the NT CANON. The author of 2 Peter, writing as the apostle Peter, claims, "This is now, beloved, the second letter I am writing to you; in them I am trying to arouse your sincere intention by reminding you that you should remember the words spoken in the past by the holy prophets, and the commandment of the Lord and Savior spoken through your apostles" (2 Pet 3:1-2, NRSV). "Second letter" implies a first, and there is wide agreement that the letter now known as 1 Peter is in the writer's mind. Yet the reference shows little awareness of the actual content of 1 Peter. Second Peter is more interested in describing its own intentions than those of its predecessor (the same is true of the brief reference to the letters of PAUL in 2 Pet 3:15-16). At most it is possible that "the words spoken in the past by the holy prophets" may refer vaguely to 1 Pet 1:10-12. Yet the slender link forged by the reference in 2 Pet 3:1, strengthened by the pairing of the two letters under Peter's name in the NT canon, inevitably affected the interpretation of this letter in the church. In the eighteenth century J. BENGEL outlined 1 Peter and entitled the body of the letter (1 Pet 1:3–5:11), "The stirring up of a pure feeling," on the ground that this is the purpose of both letters according to 2 Pet 3:1 (1877, 5:43).

More extensive allusions to 1 Peter can be found in the early second-century letter of Polycarp of Smyrna to the Philippians. Without referring explicitly to Peter or to any specific source, Polycarp alluded to passages from the letter, especially chapter 1, freely combining elements from different texts to create a new text of his own. His work can hardly be called a commentary even in the most rudimentary sense; yet he provided the earliest known example of what we would call today a "reading" of 1 Peter. He was conscious, for example, of 1:8-12 as a unit, drawing phrases from its beginning and end to make his own new statement (see Phil. 1.3, "in whom, though you did not see him, you believe with inexpressible and glorious joy—into which [joy] many desire to enter"). He then does the same thing with 1:13-21 (Phil. 2.1), in both instances interweaving words from the letter with language drawn from a variety of other early Christian texts and traditions (for other possible allusions, see Phil. 6.3, 8.1-2, 10.1-2).

Much the same thing seems to have taken place in the Hypotyposeis, or "Outlines," of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, mentioned by EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 6.14.1), fragments of which survive in Greek citations by later fathers and in a sixth-century Latin translation by CASSIODORUS entitled Adumbrationes, or "Comments of Clement of Alexandria on the Canonical Epistles" (see GCS 17.195-202; ANF 2.571-73). Most of Clement's comments are not allegorical. Often he contented himself with a sporadic summary of the flow of thought in 1 Peter, illuminated with comments drawn from other texts or traditions (e.g., the first petition of the Lord's Prayer in connection with "sanctify the Lord Christ" in 1 Pet 3:15 and the Johannine "Paraclete" or Counselor of John 14:16 in connection with "the Holy Spirit sent from heaven" in 1 Pet 1:12).

Commentaries on 1 Peter or even on the catholic epistles as a collection are rare in the patristic period (see, e.g., Didymus the Blind in the 4th cent. PG 39.1749-1818; Pseudo-Oecumenius, 6th cent. or later, PG 119.509-78; and the catenae preserved by Theophylact in the 11th cent., PG 125.1189-1252). Citations, however, are abundant, starting in the late second century with IRENAEUS, who was the first to refer explicitly to Peter and to "his epistle" in connection with such passages as 1:8 (Adv. Haer. 4.9.2; 5.7.2) and 2:16 (Adv. Haer. 4.16.5). Eusebius cited an even earlier (mid-2nd cent.) source, PAPIAS of Hierapolis, in support of a close relationship between Peter and Mark on the basis of 5:13 and a metaphorical interpretation of Babylon as Rome in the same verse (Hist. eccl. 2.15.2; cf. 3.39.17). First Peter is freely cited by TERTULLIAN, Clement, ORIGEN, Cyprian, JEROME, and many others.

2. Author and Audience. Eusebius in the fourth century, taking 1 Pet 1:1 at face value, concluded that the epistle is "indisputably Peter's, in which he writes to those of the Hebrews in the Dispersion of Pontus and Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" because he had preached "the Gospel of Christ to those of the circumcision" in those provinces (Hist. eccl. 3.4.2; this is in contrast to "Paul, in his preaching to the Gentiles," 3.4.1; cf. 3.1). This characterization of 1 Peter as a letter to Jewish Christians (probably based as much on Gal 2:7-8 as on 1 Peter) was enormously influential in later centuries—e.g., on 1 Pet 1:1: CALVIN ("This can apply only to the Jews" [1948] 26) and J. WESLEY ("Christians, chiefly those of Jewish extraction" [1755] 872). J. BENGEL's comment was more nuanced ("He addresses the dispersed Jews . . . although he afterwards addresses believers of the Gentiles, who are mixed with them, ch. ii.10, note, iv.3" [1877] 5:45). LUTHER took a different, also nuanced, approach: "It is surprising that while St. Peter was an apostle to the Jews, he is nevertheless writing to the heathen. . . . Accordingly, he is writing to those who had formerly been heathen but had now been converted to the faith and had joined the believing Jews" (LW 30 [1967] 6; cf. W. Tyndale's comment in his Prologue upon the First Epistle of St. Peter that Peter wrote "to the heathen that were converted" [1965] 163).

For the most part the judgment of Eusebius prevailed well into the nineteenth century. A stark contrast between the "Gentile-oriented" Paul and the "Jewish-oriented" Peter is evident in Christian history at least back to the third-century Pseudo-Clementine literature. The historical reconstructions of F. C. BAUR and the Tübingen school in the nineteenth century were built on that assumption; yet at the same time Baur found in 1 Peter "striking points of agreement in language and ideas with the Pauline letters." Consequently he gave up apostolic authorship of the letter, proposing that both 1 and 2 Peter were second-century documents mediating and harmonizing the conflicting views of Peter and Paul (cited in W. Kümmel [1972] 130-31).

Whatever one may think of Baur's reconstruction, it is true that Christian intepreters, both critical and precritical, have seen a considerable measure of agreement between Paul's letters and 1 Peter. Luther stated that Peter in this letter "does the same thing that St. Paul and all the evangelists do; he teaches the true faith and tells us that Christ was given to us to take away our sins and to save us" (30 [1967] 4). Because thirteen canonical letters are attributed to Paul and only two to Peter and because the self-designation in 1 Pet 1:1 seems to echo those of Paul, it seems that 1 Peter was assimilated to Paul and not the other way around.

The full history of the interpretation of 1 Peter up to the nineteenth century remains to be written. In the bibliography to his commentary (1996, 359-61), P. Achtemeier provides some tools for such an undertaking, and T. Martin (1992, 3-39, 277-84) has made a beginning with respect to the compositional analysis of the letter's structure. For the most part, however, scholars have concentrated instead on tracing the interpretation of specific passages, above all passages that became the focus of doctrinal controversies in or between Christian churches.

3. Christ and the Disobedient Spirits. The classic case study by which to illustrate the latter point is the reference in 1 Pet 3:19 to Christ's journey to preach to imprisoned spirits from the time of Noah (see W. Dalton's thorough summary [1989] 27-50). The notion of Christ's "descent into hell" for the redemption of lost souls was a topic of interest in early Christianity almost from the beginning, but not until Clement of Alexandria

(Strom. 6.6.38-39) was this teaching linked in any way to 3:19. This line of interpretation was followed in the Greek church by Origen, CYRIL, and others; and in the Syriac tradition, by the PESHITTA version ("And he preached to those souls detained in Sheol who had once been disobedient in the days of Noah," J. Murdock [1858] 424). AUGUSTINE, by contrast, saw in the passage a reference to the preexistent Christ preaching through Noah to the wicked of his generation (PL 33.708-16). Because it avoided the doctrinal problem of conversion after death, Augustine's view became popular in the West among both Catholics and Protestants. Although it had little basis in the text or context, this view could appeal to 1:11 for a preexisting "spirit of Christ" and to 2 Pet 2:5 for Noah as a "preacher of righteousness." More influential among Roman Catholics since the Counter Reformation was the view of R. BELLARMINE, who linked the passage with Christ's descent but argued that Christ preached to souls from Noah's time who had already repented and, in effect, delivered them from purgatory. He did this by identifying the "spirits" of 3:19 with "the dead" to whom "the gospel was preached" according to 4:6 (see Dalton, 40, 44).

With modern historical criticism came a new awareness of Jewish apocalyptic literature (see APOCALYPTICISM), especially 1 ENOCH, and consequently new interpretations of 3:19. Christ was seen, not as offering salvation to lost souls, but as pronouncing judgment either on the fallen angels of the flood story and their offspring (Gen 6:1-4), or on the wicked who died in the flood, or both. This judicial act was linked either to Christ's "descent into hell" between death and resurrection (E. Selwyn [1946]; B. Reicke [1946]) or, more recently, to his ascension after the resurrection (K. Gschwind [1911]; Dalton; J. Kelly [1969]; N. Brox [1979]; J. Michaels [1988]; Achtemeier). The latter interpretation afforded a link between this controversial passage and the letter's general theme of the vindication of Christians against their "disobedient" oppressors in the Roman Empire (2:8; 3:1; 4:17). Other modern scholars, however, still view the passage as some kind of an offer of salvation, whether to humans or to angels (see K. Schelkle [1970]; F. Beare [1970³]; L. Goppelt [1978; ET 1993]).

4. Modern Interpretations of 1 Peter. The rise of historical criticism affected the interpretation of 1 Peter in other ways as well. Doubts about the Petrine authorship of 2 Peter (and to a lesser extent of 1 Peter) severed the traditional connection between the two canonical letters. First Peter was seen as a self-contained early Christian document in its own right and not as the first of two reminders of "the words spoken in the past by the holy prophets, and the commandment of the Lord and Savior spoken through your apostles" (2 Pet 3:2). Yet this did not exclude the recognition that the letter does contain traditional material. For decades the modern discussion centered on assessing the relationship between 2 Peter and the traditions of 1 Peter. On the matter of authorship, an increasing number of scholars suggested that the work was pseudonymous (that is, written by someone other than Peter in the apostle's name). Still, the traditional view continued to find defenders, at least in the sense of a connection (direct or indirect) with the historical Peter. So far as the letter's readers were concerned, however, the older view that they were Jewish Christians gave way to the theory that they were largely or even exclusively gentile Christians (as Luther and Tyndale had thought and as the language of 1:14, 18, and 4:3-4 suggests).

The years 1946–47 marked a turning point in the study of the letter. In 1946 B. REICKE made extensive use of comparative Jewish and Hellenistic material to shed light on 3:18-22 and 4:6 and at the same time to call attention to the significance of Christian baptism in the letter as a whole. In the same year Selwyn (in an appendix to his commentary, 314-64) independently reached some of the same conclusions about the same two texts. More important, he applied the methods of FORM CRITICISM (previously used only in the study of the Gospels) to argue for 1 Peter's dependence on a common early Christian catechism known to Paul and to other Christian writers and based on the Holiness Code of Leviticus 17–26 (365-466). In 1947 F. W. BEARE (in the first edition of his commentary) raised acutely in the English-speaking world the doubts already current in Germany (going back to Baur, A. von Harnack, and others) about the letter's traditional Petrine authorship and first-century date.

In the decade or so that followed, more attention was given to the traditions behind 1 Peter than to the letter in its present form. First Peter 1:3–4:11 was seen as originally not a letter at all but as a baptismal homily or liturgy. Beare regarded this section as a homily on baptism later placed in an epistolary framework consisting of 1:1-2 and 4:12–5:14. H. Preisker, in his revision of H. WINDISCH's commentary (1951), constructed an elaborate liturgy in which the baptism of candidates was said to have taken place between 1:21 and 1:22. Even 4:12–5:11 was no longer viewed as a letter but as a concluding liturgy for the whole congregation. F. Cross (1954) proposed on the basis of second-century sources (Melito's On the Passover and the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus) a wordplay between the Greek verb paschein (to suffer) in 1 Peter (twelve occurrences) and the Hebrew noun pascha (Passover). Consequently he interpreted the letter in its entirety as a Passover/Easter liturgy centering on baptism (again with the baptism of candidates taking place after 1:21). In contrast, E. Lohse in 1954 maintained the epistolary character of 1 Peter and saw it as an example of early Christian parenesis—that is, as an actual letter using traditional forms of expression in order to encourage its readers in the face of impending persecution (1986). C. F. D. MOULE (1956–57), impressed by the change of tone and apparent break between 4:11 and 4:12, proposed two forms of the letter sent to two different audiences: one (consisting of 1:1–4:11 and 5:12-14) for churches not yet suffering actual persecution, and the other (1:1–2:10 and 4:12–5:14) for those already facing the "fiery trial" signaled in 4:12.

Since the early 1960s the unity and epistolary character of 1 Peter have been strongly reasserted (e.g., in the commentaries of Schelkle; Kelly; E. Best [1971]; Goppelt; Brox; Michaels; and Achtemeier), even though its use of traditional materials continued to be recognized and ever more carefully charted (see, e.g., D. Balch [1981] on the "household code" of 2:13–3:9). This trend followed in the wake of a corresponding shift in the study of the Gospels from form to REDACTION CRITICISM. Just as the Gospel writers had come to be regarded not as mere compilers of tradition but as authors and theologians in their own right, so also 1 Peter (whether written by the apostle Peter or not) was being more and more appreciated for its distinctive contributions to early Christian theology and ethics. It was no longer possible to view the letter as just another "Deutero-Pauline" writing, as if its author were trying to imitate Paul but was not quite succeeding.

In one area at least—the sociological intepretation of NT texts (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES)—studies in 1 Peter showed the way, beginning with W. van Unnik's 1954 article on good works and civic virtue and coming to fruition in L. GOPPELT's commentary and the monographs of J. Elliott (1981) and Balch. In the 1980s the letter's accent on "honor" and "shame" and the contrast between the two captured the attention of those who advocated a sociological approach. Elliott's emphasis was on "boundary maintenance" (that is, on the attempt to preserve Christian distinctives in a hostile Roman culture), while Balch found more significant the interest in "acculturation" (i.e., in conforming as far as possible to dominant Roman values so as to minimize social conflict). Their debate is concisely documented in a volume edited by C. Talbert, who in conclusion recognizes both social goals in the letter: "(1) the social cohesion of the Christian groups, and (2) the social adaptation of the Christian groups to their cultural setting. Without the first, Christian identity would have been lost. Without the second, Christians would have had no social acceptability, which is also necessary for survival and outreach" (1986, 148).

Another factor introduced into the discussion (see Michaels; T. Martin [1992]) is the analogy between the social self-consciousness of these early gentile Christians and that of the Jews in the diaspora. The evidence that misled Eusebius long ago into supposing a Jewish Christian audience (e.g., the language of 1:1) could suggest that 1 Peter, like James, was intended as a Christian "diaspora letter" based on just such an analogy. Comparative studies are needed on the place of Judaism and of gentile Christianity respectively in the Roman Empire of the late first century. Such studies could enrich and be enriched by the continuing investigation of 1 Peter in its historical and social setting.

At least two other tasks remain in connection with the letter. The first task is theological. Despite an ever-widening recognition of 1 Peter's significant place in early Christianity, no major work of NT theology has yet tried to do justice to its distinctive witness to Christ and to the Christian life. The second task has to do with LITERARY and/or RHETORICAL CRITICISM. Aside from questions of genre (i.e., liturgy, homily, or genuine letter), the only major foray into these areas has been the SEMIOTIC analysis of J. Calloud and F. Genuyt (1982). Part of the reason is that the newer methodologies in literary criticism have been applied more frequently to NT narratives than to NT letters; yet rhetorical criticism has been applied to the letters of Paul, James, 2 Peter, Jude, and Hebrews. At this writing, 1 Peter needs more attention from this perspective. Still, a growing number of commentaries and monographs testify that the letter, if never quite "the storm centre of NT studies" that S. Neill claimed it was (1964, 343), is no longer the "exegetical step-child" that Elliott (with some justification) called it in 1976 (see Talbert, 3-16). Slowly but surely this "minor" NT voice distinct from Paul and distinct from the Gospels is making itself heard both in the academy and in the church.

Bibliography: P. J. Achtemeier, 1 Peter: A Commentary on First Peter (Hermeneia, 1996). D. Balch, Let Wives Be Submissive: The Domestic Code in 1 Peter (SBLMS 26, 1981). D. L. Bartlett, "The First Letter of Peter," NIB (1997) 12:227-319. F. W. Beare, The First Epistle of Peter (1947, 1970[3]). J. A. Bengel, Gnomon of the NT (ed. A. R. Fausset, 1877). E. Best, 1 Peter (NCB, 1971). N. Brox, "Der erste Petrusbrief in der literarischen Tradition des Urchristentums," Kairos 20 (1978) 182-92; Der erste Petrusbrief (EKKNT, 1979). J. Calloud and F. Genuyt, La première épître de Pierre: Analyse semiotique (LD 109, 1982). J. Calvin, Catholic Epistles: Calvin's Commentaries (ed. J. Owen, 1948). F. L. Cross, 1 Peter: A Paschal Liturgy (1954). W. J. Dalton, Christ's Proclamation to the Spirits (AnBib 23, 1989[2]). J. H. Elliott, "The Rehabilitation of an Exegetical Step-child: 1 Peter in Recent Research," JBL 95 (1976) 243-54 = Perspectives on First Peter (NABPR.SS 9, ed. C. H. Talbert, 1986) 3-16; A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (1981); ABD (1992) 5:269-78. L. Goppelt, Der erste Petrusbrief (MeyerK, 1978; ET 1993). K. Gschwind, Die Niederfahrt Christi in die Unterwelt: Ein Beitrag zur Exegese des Neuen Testamentes und zur Geshcichte des Taufsymbols (1911). A. von Harnack, Die Chronologie der altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius (1897). U. Holzmeister, Commentarius in Epistulas SS. Petri et Judae Apostolorum (1937). J. N. D.

Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (HNTC, 1969). W. G. Kümmel, The NT: The History of the Investigation of Its Problems (1972). E. Lohse, "Parenesis and Kerygma in 1 Peter," Perspectives on First Peter (NABPR.SS 9, ed. C. H. Talbert, 1986) 37-59. M. Luther, The Catholic Epistles (LW 30, 1967). R. P. Martin, "The Composition of 1 Peter in Recent Study," VE 1 (1962) 29-42. T. W. Martin, Metaphor and Composition in 1 Peter (1992). J. R. Michaels, 1 Peter (WBC 49, 1988). C. F. D. Moule, "The Nature and Purpose of 1 Peter," NTS 3 (1956/57) 1-11. J. Murdock, The NT: A Literal Translation from the Syriac Peshito Version (1858). S. Neill, The Interpretation of the NT, 1861–1961 (1964). B. Reicke, The Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism: A Study of 1 Pet 3:19 and Its Context (1946). K. H. Schelkle, Die Petrusbriefe, der Judasbrief (HKNT 13, 1970). E. G. Selwyn, The First Epistle of St. Peter (1946). C. H. Talbert, "Once Again: The Plan of First Peter," Perspectives on First Peter (NABPR.SS 9, ed. C. H. Talbert, 1986) 141-51. W. Tyndale, Doctrinal Treatises and Introductions to Different Portions of the Holy Scriptures (1848); The Work of W. Tyndale (ed. G. E. Duffield, 1965). W. C. van Unnik, "The Teaching of Good Works in 1 Peter," NTS 1 (1954/55) 92-100. J. Wesley, Explanatory Notes upon the NT (1755). H. Windisch and H. Preisker, Die katholische Briefe (HNT, 1951³).

J. R. MICHAELS

PETER, SECOND LETTER OF

This epistle embodies many typical features of a formal letter: introduction (1:1-2); epistolary thanksgiving (1:3-11); letter occasion (1:12-15); first defense: PROPHECY of the parousia (1:16-21); polemic against heretics (2:1-22); second defense: end of the world (3:1-7); third defense: delay of judgment (3:8-16); conclusion (3:17-18). Simultaneously, it is also cast in the genre of a farewell address of a dying leader/patriarch in which references to the writer's past are drawn upon and exhortations are made about the future (see Genesis 49; Deuteronomy 33; John 13–17; Acts 20; and numerous non-biblical texts; see also A. Kolenkow [1975]). As the leader is about to die the texts generally mention (a) a prediction of death (1:12-15); (b) appointment of a successor (the possessor of this very document); (c) prediction of future troubles and trials (heretics attacking the group, 2:1-22; 3:3-10); and (d) exhortation to virtue (faithfulness to the tradition). The letter is addressed from "Simon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ" (1:1); refers to his eyewitness presence at Jesus' transfiguration (1:16-18); and mentions a previous letter written to the same audience (3:1).

No NT writing is less attested to in the early church than 2 Peter. Specific references to the work or use of it do not appear in the first two centuries. The third-century papyrus Bodmer P^{72} shows that the work was being copied in Egypt at the time, although the Syriac PESHITTA contains only three of the catholic epistles (James, 1 Peter, and 1 John) but not 2 Peter. According to EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 6.25.11), ORIGEN was familiar with the work and was also aware of doubts about its genuineness. Eusebius placed it among the antilegomena or works that were "disputed" (Hist. eccl. 3.25.3-4) although "generally recognized." JEROME noted that Peter "wrote two epistles which are called Catholic, the second of which, on account of its difference from the first in style, is considered by many not to be by him" (Lives of Illustrious Men 1). Jerome also suggested that the difference in style between 1 and 2 Peter might have been due to Peter's use of two different secretaries. AUGUSTINE apparently had no problem with the work and lists two epistles of Peter as canonical (On Christian Doctrine 1.8.13). Second Peter appears in ATHANASIUS's list of biblical books in his Easter letter of 367 CE.

In the medieval period acknowledgment of seven catholic epistles became standard. A basic commentary on these works was that by BEDE, In epistolas VII catholicas (1983).

During the Renaissance and the Reformation the old suspicions about 2 Peter resurfaced, as they did with all the antilegomena. D. ERASMUS, A. von KARLSTADT, and T. CAJETAN all raised doubts about the book. Interestingly, LUTHER was complimentary of this work, "written against those who think that Christian faith can be without works" (35 [1960] 391). H. GROTIUS in his Annotationes (1650) gave widespread circulation to the objections against the book and to the issues of relating 1 and 2 Peter to each other and 2 Peter to Jude. He argued that 2 Peter was probably written by Simeon, who succeeded James as the head of the church in Jerusalem, and that the opponents mentioned in the book were the second-century heretical group called the Carpocratians. Material like the name "Peter" and 1:16-18 he considered interpolations added to the text.

Defenses of the apostolic origin and authenticity of the epistle were published throughout the seventeenth to the nineteenth centuries. The renowned anti-Deist T. Sherlock (1678–1761; see DEISM) argued (1) that Jude and 2 Peter were based on the use of a no longer extant ancient Jewish writing (not 1 Enoch) and (2) that both epistles were based on an earlier communiqué circulated in the church (see 2 Pet. 3:2; Jude 5) warning about false teachers (1725). Their similar depiction of heretics was not based on mutual dependence but on the warning circulated to various churches. Similar arguments were made by others defending the authenticity of the work (see CBTEL 8 [1879] 21-27 for a survey of publications in the 18th–19th cents.).

At the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century, two views on the book came to dominate (see E. Abbot [1882]; F. Chase [1900]; and J. Mayer [1907]): (1) Jude and 2 Peter are literarily related, with 2 Peter dependent on Jude, which is not an apostolic work. Second Peter thus came to be considered the latest book of the NT to have been written. (Few followed F. C. Baur and the Tübingen school, who placed 2 Peter along with the Pastoral Epistles and the Gospel of John in the middle of the 2nd cent.) (2) Second Peter is a pseudonymous work written in Peter's name and reflective of conditions in the early post-apostolic church. (For arguments against both views see B. B. Warfield [1882]; E. Green [1962].)

The lateness of the epistle is indicated by concern with the delay of the parousia (3:3-10), awareness of a collection of PAUL's letters (3:16), and utilization of a rich collection of biblical and Christian traditions (e.g., 1:16-19). The work has affinities with 1 and 2 Clement and the Shepherd of Hermas (R. Bauckham [1983] 145-51, 158-62); it shares in the fascination with Peter reflected in the apocryphal Apocalypse of Peter, Gospel of Peter, Preaching of Peter, and Acts of Peter (see APOCRYPHA, NT), which some scholars have seen as indicative of a Petrine group or school in the early church (see F. Chase [1900]; M. Soards [1987]); and it reflects some of the characteristics of a pluralistic Hellenistic-Jewish context (see T. Fornberg [1977]) in which Epicureanism was a significant factor (see J. Elliott [1992]).

A major impetus to discussion of 2 Peter was a 1952 article by the Lutheran E. KÄSEMANN arguing that the epistle is representative of "early Catholicism" in which the church is "so concerned to defend herself against heretics, that she no longer distinguishes between Spirit and letter; that she identifies the Gospel with her own tradition and further, with a particular world-view; that she regulates exegesis according to her system of teaching authority and makes faith into a mere assent to the dogmas of orthodoxy" (1964, 195). Clearly, Käsemann's views reflect a Protestant/Lutheran approach informed by Reformation perspectives opposed to identifying faith with believing truths, to placing confidence in authoritative tradition, and to playing down private interpretation. Many of these issues, however, are reflected in other NT writings. Reactions to Käsemann have called into question whether he has properly understood the epistle (see Bauckham [1983] 151-54; C. Talbert [1966]), nonetheless, his article renewed interest in the writing.

M. Rosenblatt (1994), examining female imagery and the absence of women in the letter, has attempted to reconstruct the role of women in the congregation of 2 Peter. According to Rosenblatt, reconstruction of women's roles in 2 Peter indicates that women taught and interpreted the Scriptures in the Christian churches in the first century and that ecclesial authority attempted to suppress women's leadership.

Bibliography: E. A. Abbott, "The Second Epistle of St. Peter," Expositor 2nd ser. 3 (1882) 49-63, 139-53, 204-19. R. J. Bauckham, "2 Peter: A Supplementary Bibliography," JETS 25 (1982) 91-93; Jude, 2 Peter (WBC 50, 1983); "2 Peter: An Account of Research," ANRW II.25.5 (1987) 3713-52. Bede, In epistolas VII catholicas (ed. M. L. W. Laistner; CCSL 121, 1983). K. Berger, "Streit um Gottes Vorsehung: Zur Position der Gegner in 2 Petrusbrief," Tradition and Re-interpretation in Jewish and Christian Literature: Essays in Honor of J. C. H. Lebram (ed. J. W. van Henten et al., 1986) 121-35. G. H. Boobyer, "The Indebtedness of 2 Peter to 1 Peter," NT Essays: Studies in Memory of T. W. Manson (ed. A. J. B. Higgins, 1959) 34-53. F. H. Chase, HDB 3 (1900) 796-818. J. Crehan, "New Light on 2 Peter from the Bodmer Papyrus," StEv 7 (1982) 145-49. F. W. Danker, "2 Peter 1: A Solemn Decree," CBQ 40 (1978) 64-82. S. Dowd, "2 Peter," Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992) 373. J. H. Elliott, ABD (1992) 5:282-87. D. Farkasfalvy, "The Ecclesial Setting and Pseudepigraphy in Second Peter and Its Role in the Formation of the Canon," SecCent 5 (1985–86) 3-29. T. Fornberg, An Early Church in a Pluralistic Society: A Study of 2 Peter (ConBNT 9, 1977). E. M. B. Green, 2 Peter Reconsidered (1960 Tyndale NT Lecture, 1962). D. E. Hiebert, "Selected Studies from 2 Peter," BSac 141 (1984) 43-54, 158-68, 255-65, 330-40. W. G. Hupper, "Additions to 'A 2 Peter Bibliography,' " JETS 23 (1980) 65-66. J. Kahmann, "The Second Letter of Peter and the Letter of Jude: Their Mutual Relationship," The NT in Early Christianity (BETL 86, ed. J. M. Sevrin, 1989) 105-21. E. Käsemann, "An Apology for Primitive Eschatology," Essays on NT Themes (SBT 41, 1964) 169-95. J. N. D. Kelly, A Commentary on the Epistles of Peter and Jude (HNTC, 1969). G. Klein, "Der zweite Petrusbrief und der neutestamentliche Kanon, Argernisse," Konfrontation mit dem Neuen Testament (1971) 109-14. J. Klinger, "The Second Epistle of Peter: An Essay in Understanding," SVTQ 17 (1973) 152-69. J. Knight, 2 Peter and Jude (NTGu, 1995). A. B. Kolenkow, "The Genre Testament and Forecasts of the Future in the Hellenistic Jewish Milieu," JSJ 6 (1975) 57-71. M. Luther, Luther's Works 35 (ed. E. T. Bachmann, 1960). J. B. Mayor, The Epistle of St. Jude and the Second Epistle of St. Peter (1907). J. H. Neyrey, "The Form and Background of the Polemic in 2 Peter" (diss., Yale University, 1977); "The Apologetic Use of the Transfiguration in 2 Peter 1:16-21," CBQ 42 (1980) 504-19; "The Form and Background of the Polemic in 2 Peter," JBL 99 (1980) 407-31; 2 Peter, Jude (AB 37C, 1993). M.-E. Rosenblatt, "2 Peter," Searching the Scriptures, vol 2, A Feminist Commentary (ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, 1994), 399-405. J. Schmitt, DBSup 7 (1966) 1455-63. T. Sherlock, The Authority of the Second Epistle of Saint Peter (1725; repr. in his Works [5 vols., ed. T. Hughs, 1830] 4:137-52). T. V. Smith, Petrine Contoversies in Early Christianity: Attitudes Toward Peter in Christian Writings of the First Two Centuries (WUNT 2, 15, 1985). J. Snyder, "A 2 Peter Bibliography," JETS 22 (1979) 265-67. M. L. Soards, "1 Peter, 2 Peter, and Jude as Evidence for a Petrine School," ANRW II.25.5 (1987) 3827-49. C. Spicq, Les Epîtres de Saint Pierre (SB, 1966). F. Spitta, Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas (1895). C. H. Talbert, "II Peter and the Delay of the Parousia," VC 20 (1966) 137-45. B. B. Warfield, "The Canonicity of Second Peter,"

Southern Presbyterian Review 33 (1882) 45-75. D. F. Watson, Invention, Arrangement, and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS 104, 1988); "The Second Letter of Peter," NIB (1997) 12:321-361. H. Windisch, Die Katholischen Briefe (1951³).

J. NEYREY

PETER THE CHANTER (d. 1197)

A lecturer on the Sacred Page in late twelfth-century Paris, P. commented on the whole Bible in a style that combined the methods of earlier twelfth-century masters (notably the Victorines and the compilers of the Glossa Ordinaria) and the technically refined methods of logical and grammatical analysis developed in the course of the century. In this regard his major contribution is the De Tropis Loquendi, an attempt to apply Aristotle's teaching on fallacies to the resolution of apparent contradictions in Scripture, which takes AUGUSTINE and BEDE technically much further. His Verbum Abbreviatum is a manual of material for use in preaching, prefaced by a discussion of the manner in which the Bible should be approached. He thus provided textbooks both for the art of preaching and for schoolroom Bible study that were current and, in some respects, original works. In these fields he holds a place among the principal scholars of his day.

Works: PL 205. De Tropis Loquendi has not been edited.

Bibliography: J. W. Baldwin, Master, Princes, and Merchants (1967). G. R. Evans, Alan of Lille: The Frontiers of Theology in the Later Twelfth Century (1983) appendix.

G. R. EVANS

PETER COMESTOR (d. 1178/79)

After studying in the schools of Paris and Tours, P. was dean of Troyes from 1147. He began to teach in Paris before 1158/59 and was chancellor of Paris from 1168 until his death, spending his last years in the abbey of St. Victor. His wide reading earned him the nickname Comestor or Manducator—"the eater of books." He was a disciple and colleague of PETER LOMBARD (d. 1160), whose oral teaching he reported in his own theological quaestiones. He pioneered the practice of basing the teaching of theology on Lombard's Sentences, which he glossed, as well as on the Gospels and perhaps on Lombard's commentary on the psalter. His School History (Historia Scholastica [1169/73]) became very widely known and read during the Middle Ages; a comprehensive biblical history, it owes much to the continuous GLOSSA ORDINARIA that came into being in the schools of Laon and Paris during his lifetime and to the Victorine emphasis on the literal study of Scripture in the light of Hebraic understanding. For the HB P. used JOSEPHUS and connected Jewish history to general ancient history. The Gospels are surveyed together, not individually; and P. included information drawn from liturgy, pictures, and relics, paying special attention to the history, topography, and antiquities of Palestine. The Genealogy of Christ, which sometimes introduces copies of the History, was provided by Peter of Poitiers (d. 1205).

Works: Historia Scholastica, PL 198, 1053-644; Sermons, PL 171, 339-964 (printed under the name of Hildebert) and PL 198, 1721-844; Quaestiones = questions 228-334 in Quaestiones Magistri Odonis Suessionis (Analecta novissima Spicilegii Solesmensis, Continuatio altera 2, ed. J. B. Pitra, 1888); Sententiae de Sacramentis (ed. R. M. Martin, SSL 17, 1937).

Bibliography: I. Brady, "Peter Manducator and the Oral Teachings of Peter Lombard," Antonianum 41 (1966) 454-90. S. R. Daly, "P. C., Master of Histories," Speculum 32 (1957) 62-73. A. M. Landgraf, "Recherches sur les écrits de Pierre le Mangeur," RTAM 3 (1931) 292-306, 341-72. M. M. Lebreton, "Recherches sur les manuscrits contenant des sermons de Pierre le Mangeur," BHRHT 2 (1953) 25-44; 4 (1955) 35-36. D. E. Luscombe, The Bible in the Medieval World (SCH, Subsidia 4, ed. K. Walsh and D. Wood, 1985) 109-29, includes discussion of works of doubtful authenticity. R. Martin, "Notes sur l'oeuvre littéraire de Pierre le Mangeur," RTAM 3 (1931) 54-66. J. H. Morey, "P. C., Biblical Paraphrase, and the Medieval Popular Bible," Speculum 68 (1993) 6-35. B. Smalley, The Gospels in the Schools c. 1100–c. 1280 (1985). F. Stegmüller, Reportorium Commentariorum in Sententias Petri Lombardi (1947) nos. 669-73; Repertorium Biblicum Medii Aevi (1950–80) nos. 6543-92. P. Tibber, "The Origins of the Scholastic Sermon, 1130–1210" (diss., University of Oxford, 1983). H. Weisweiler, "Eine neue frühe Glosse zum vierten Buch der Sentenzen des Petrus Lombardus," Aus der Geisteswelt des Mittelalters (BGPTM Supp. 3.1, 1935) 360-400. M. A. Zier, DMA 9 (1987) 513-14.

D. E. LUSCOMBE

PETER LOMBARD (c. 1095/1100–1161)

Born in the Novara region, P. entered the historical record in the mid-1130s when BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX met him and advised him to study theology in France. P. did so, first at Reims under Alberic, Lotulph of Novara, and Walter of Mortagne. In 1136 he moved to Paris, where he was probably an extern pupil of HUGH OF ST. VICTOR; in any case P. was thoroughly familiar with Victorine theology and with the work of other recent and contemporary schools and masters. He began teaching c. 1142 and had become a canon of Notre Dame by 1145, subdeacon in 1148, deacon after 1150, and archdeacon by 1156. He taught until 1159, when he became bishop of Paris, an office he held until his death, July 21/22, 1161.

P.'s surviving exegetical works are his commentaries on Psalms (before 1138) and on the Pauline epistles or Collectanea (1139–41, with a second redaction 1155–58). His pupil, Herbert of Bosham put the finishing touches on both glosses. Not extant but attested indirectly are commentaries on most of the other biblical books. Exegetical material, derived especially from the Collectanea, plays a very prominent role in Peter's systematic theology, the Sentences, where he placed it under the appropriate subject-matter headings, and is found also in his sermons.

Although influenced by the GLOSSA ORDINARIA and in particular by GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE's Psalms commentary, P. did more than any other twelfth-century exegete to develop a scholastic, as distinct from a monastic, approach to the Bible. He agreed that the psalms should be read morally, christologically, and ecclesiologically, but his Psalms exegesis had far wider aims. He considered the psalter as a composite text containing different types of psalms whose connection with those in the same subcategory needed to be flagged. He provided an accessus to each psalm and to the book as a whole and noted and tried to resolve textual discrepancies arising from the transmission of the psalms through regional psalters that sometimes predate and differ from the VULGATE. He saw a need to weigh conflicting authoritative readings, although he sometimes found them reconcilable. When this was not the case, he analyzed the authorities and provided principled reasons for preferring one to another. Rather than glossing the psalms to incite devotion, he sought to extract doctrine from them, mainly ethical and sacramental.

These traits also mark the Collectanea; but in glossing PAUL, P. went much farther, viewing the apostle not only as a rich source of authoritative doctrine on many subjects but also as the first working Christian theologian, whose teaching is subject to the same historical and logical criticism as scholastics apply to post-biblical authorities. P. read Paul literally, except for Paul's identification of antichrist with Nero in 2 Thessalonians. P. opposed this interpretation and offered his own moral and allegorical understanding of Antichrist. Other areas in which he thought Paul's authority could be relativized or rejected in the light of the transitory or circumstantial situation in which he preached are the subjection of women in 1 Cor 14:34-36 and 1 Tim 2:11-15 and the preference for celibacy over marriage in 1 Cor 7:1-28.

P.'s medieval reputation as an exegete resulted from the forging of his scholastic method and many substantive positions in his glosses; from his organic connection between exegesis and systematic theology; and from his commentaries' user-friendly format, which supplied the full biblical text, verbatim quotations or extensive paraphrases of authorities cited, and a balance between running commentary and quaestiones derived from the text.

Works: Collectanea in omnes d. Pauli apostoli Epistolae, PL 191-92; Commentarium in Psalmos Davidicos, PL 191; Sermones 4, 7-8, 12-3, 21, 23-5, 32, 35-6, 43, 45, 67-8, 72, 78, 80, 99, 111-2, 115, PL 171, misattributed to Hildebert of Lavardin; "Deux sermons inédits de P. L.," Miscellanea Lombardiana (ed. D. Van den Eynde, 1957) 75-87; Sententiae in IV libris distinctae (ed. I. C. Brady, 1971–81).

Bibliography: E. Bertola, "I commentari paolini di P. L. e la loro duplice redazione," Pier Lombardo 3:2-3 (1959) 75-90. E. M. Buytaert, "St. John Damascene, P. L., and Gerhoh of Reichersberg," Franciscan Studies 10 (1950) 323-43. J. Châtillon, "La Bible dans les écoles du XIIe siècle," Le moyen âge et la Bible (BTT, ed. P. Riché and G. Lobrichon, 1984) 163-97. M. L. Colish, Peter Lombard (1994) 1:15-32, 156-225. M. T. Gibson, "The Glossed Bible" (facsimile reprt. of editio princeps [1480/81] of Biblia latina cum Glossa ordinaria [1992]) 1:vii-xi; "The Place of the Glossa ordinaria in Medieval Exegesis," Authoritative Texts and Their Medieval Readers (ed. M. D. Jordan and K. Emery, Jr., 1992) 5-27. H. H. Glunz, History of the Vulgate in England from Alcuin to R. Bacon: Being an Inquiry into the Text of Some English Manuscripts of the Vulgate Gospels (1933) 214-15, 219-24, 232-58. T. Gross-Diaz, The Psalms Commentary of Gilbert of Poitiers: From lectio divina to the Lecture Room (1996). J. Le Clerc, "Les deux rédactions du prologue de P. L. sur les Épîtres de S. Paul," Miscellanea Lombardiana (1957) 109-12. G. Lobrichon, "Une nouveauté: Les gloses de la Bible," Le moyen âge et la Bible, 93-114. B. Smalley, "Some Gospel Commentaries of the Early Twelfth Century," RTAM 45 (1978) 153-56, 175; "Peter Comestor on the Gospels and His Sources," RTAM 46 (1979) 113. B. Smalley and G. Lacombe, "The Lombard's Commentary on Isaias and Other Fragments," New Scholasticism 5 (1931) 123-62.

M. L. COLISH

PETERS, JOHN PUNNETT (1852–1921)

An American HB scholar, archaeologist, and Episcopal priest, P. completed his PhD in Sanskrit and comparative philology at Yale (1876) and after ordination as priest (1877) studied Semitics in Berlin (1879–81) and Leipzig (1882–83). He taught HB at the Philadelphia Divinity School (1884–91) and Hebrew at the University of Pennsylvania (1885–93). He led two American expeditions to excavate Nippur (1888–89 and 1890), the first such American excavation. He traveled in Palestine in 1890 and 1902 and served as lecturer for the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in 1919–20. In 1919 he accepted a position in NT at the University of the South.

As an archaeologist, P. distinguished himself early on by his work at Nippur; for the rest of his career he promoted the exploration of the Near East and wrote about the relevance of ARCHAEOLOGY for the interpretation of Scripture. However, his primary interest was HB studies. He wrote about the origins and religion of ancient Israel, the psalter, and JESUS' use of the HB. His approach was critical but not radical. In his study of Psalms he was most creative. Scholars of his day interpreted the psalms by the following principles: (1) most psalms are postexilic; (2) each psalm should be interpreted against the most likely historical background scholarship can posit; (3) the original text for a psalm can be recovered only by radical emendation on the basis of metrical considerations; and (4) most psalms are expressions of individual piety. P. rejected these principles, arguing that few psalms may be confidently assigned a precise date or historical circumstance, psalms never conformed to modern ideas of meter, and they are best understood as cultic liturgies. Although these arguments persuaded few scholars, subsequent research has vindicated a number of P.'s positions; and it appears that in many ways he anticipated S. MOWINCKEL's cultic interpretation of the psalms.

Works: Nippur, or Explorations and Adventures on the Euphrates: The Narrative of the University of Pennsylvania Expedition to Babylonia in the Years 1888–90 (1898); The OT and the New Scholarship (1902); Early Hebrew Story: Its Historical Background (1904); The Religion of the Hebrews (1914); The Psalms as Liturgies (1920 Paddock Lectures, 1922).

Bibliography: C. H. Gordon, The Pennsylvania Tradition of Semitics: A Century of Near Eastern and Biblical Studies at the University of Pennsylvania (1986) 29-32. J. P. Peters, Jr., "Personalia," AJSL 38 (1921/22) 150; "Proceedings" and "Selected Bibliography of J. P. P.," JBL 41 (1922) v-vii, 246-48.

M. P. GRAHAM

PETRIE, WILLIAM MATTHEW FLINDERS (1853–1942)

Young P. was often sickly and thus was self-taught at home, with virtually no formal education. He began archaeological walks in England at an early age and became a talented surveyor. His lifelong fascination with Egypt and involvement with the British Egypt Exploration Fund began in 1880–82 with a survey of the pyramids that extended through 1929, resulting in more than fifty excavated sites and nearly a hundred published volumes. Beginning in 1892 and continuing for many years he held the Amelia Edwards Chair for EGYPTOLOGY at University College London. Because of his pioneering fieldwork; his insistence on improved methods of recording and prompt publication, in contrast to the treasure-hunters of his time; and his tireless promotional efforts, he has justly been called the father of modern Egyptology.

P. was also the father of Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY, for it was he who directed the first systematic excavations in that country at Tell el-Hesy on the Wadi Gaza (Lachish) in 1890. It was there that he demonstrated for the first time the twofold principles of stratigraphy and pottery dating that were to become the fundamental techniques of the emerging discipline. After this brief interlude P. returned to Egypt and did not work again in Palestine for more than thirty-five years. His later excavations included Tell Jemmeh (Gerar, 1926–27); Tell el-Far'ah south (Beth-pelet, 1928–30); Tell el-'Ajjûl (ancient Gaza, 1930–34, 1937–38); Sheikh Zowayd in the Sinai (1935–37); and a survey of Transjordan (1938). From 1938 until his death, July 29, 1942, P. resided at the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in Jerusalem.

In his publications on Palestine we see P.'s characteristic habits: intuition, enormous energy, systematic recording (although scant by later, and even some current, standards), amazingly prompt publication, and reliance on a corpus of ceramic types. He prided himself on what he considered to be empirical methods, and his scorn for less "scientific" excavations was well known. He was an authentic pioneer, one of the few true geniuses of Near Eastern archaeology. W. F. ALBRIGHT called him the "beloved Nestor" of Palestinian archaeology, and few would disagree. He was a man of heroic mold.

Works: Tell el-Hesy (Lachish) (1891); Hyksos and Israelite Cities (1906); Beth-Pelet (Tell Farah) (1930); Seventy Years in Archaeology (1931); Ancient Gaza I-IV: Tell el Ajjûl (1931–34); City of Shepherd Kings and Ancient Gaza V (1952).

Bibliography: W. F. Albright, BASOR 87 (1942) 7-8. M. S. Drower, F. P.: A Life in Archaeology (1985, 1995). W. F. Stinespring, BA 5 (1942) 33-36. O. Tufnell, PEQ 75 (1943) 5-8; "Reminiscences of a 'Petrie Pup,' " PEQ 114 (1982) 81-86. L. Woolley, DNB Supp. 6 (1959) 606-67.

W. G. DEVER

PEYRÈRE, ISAAC DE LA (c. 1596–1676)

P. was born in Bordeaux, France. Trained as a lawyer, in 1626 he was accused of and tried for "atheism and impiety" but was acquitted. In 1640 he became secretary to the prince of Condé in Paris, where he came into contact with a circle of writers and philosophers that included such notables as B. Pascal (1623–62), H. GROTIUS, T. HOBBES, M. Mersenne (1588–1648), P. Gassendi (1592–1655), and G. Naudé (1600–1653). Within a year of his arrival in Paris, P. began circulating a rough manuscript version of what was to become his magnum opus on pre-adamic humans. This early version contained at least his pre-adamite theory and his messianic views. The manuscript circulated privately in Paris, and in 1643 Grotius published a refutation of its pre-adamite theory. The same year P. published anonymously only his messianic scheme under the title Du Rappel des Iuifs.

In 1655 P. finally published his Prae-Adamitae in Amsterdam. It went through five editions that year; in 1656 it was published in English, and in Dutch in 1661. P. was arrested in February 1656 and persuaded to apologize, officially to retract his heretical views, and to become a Roman Catholic. In 1665 he retired from public life to the seminary of the Oratorians at Aubervilliers outside Paris, where he remained until his death.

At the center of P.'s theological system was his contention that the history recorded in the HB was only the history of the Jews and not universal history. Adam was not the first human but only the first Jew; there were innumerable humans before Adam. Genesis 1 was a description of the first creation, Genesis 2–3 the description of the creation of the Jewish race. He used Rom 5:12-14 to defend this thesis. Based on information from other ancient civilizations (e.g., Chinese, Babylonian, Egyptian, Aztec) he argued that universal history had been going on for an indefinite period of time.

A crucial element in the formation of P.'s pre-adamite theory was the burgeoning evidence from reports by travelers that other peoples existed who did not easily fit into biblical genealogy (e.g., Eskimos, Native Americans) and who he argued had existed since the first creation. They were not destroyed in the Genesis deluge since it affected only Palestine. Thus, not all races need be accounted for in the genealogy of Noah's family.

Partly as a means of breaking through the historical literalism that fit all of history into the biblical framework, P. attacked the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. He pointed out various anomalies, like the record of Moses' death; the phrase "beyond the Jordan," which indicates a geographical perspective Moses never enjoyed; and various anachronisms showing that some of the writing in the Pentateuch must have come from a later hand. He did not doubt that some genuine words of Moses were contained there; he only asserted that they had sometimes been misplaced or garbled by a later copyist responsible for the Pentateuch's final form, which consisted of ancient sources from Jewish antiquity, the "diaries" of Moses, and some of the copyist's own words. The whole P. referred to as "a heap of Copie confusedly taken." He envisioned a rudimentary form of source criticism but never undertook such a program. However, on the basis of content and style, he stated that it is probable that Moses wrote Genesis 2–3 concerning the creation of Adam and Eve but that a copyist included the material in Genesis 1 and 4–5 from another source.

P. addressed Prae-Adamitae "to all the Synagogues to the Jews, dispersed over the face of the earth," indicating his primary goal of converting the Jews to Christianity in preparation for the millennial reign of the messiah. By reducing the HB exclusively to the record of Jewish history he gave the Jews the central role in the plan of redemption. He believed that when the Jews finally accepted a simplified version of Christianity and were accepted into the Christian church, the Messiah (Jesus Christ in his second appearance) would come and lead the united Jewish nation to Jerusalem, where together they would rule the world.

P.'s most influential ideas were his pre-adamite theory and his biblical criticism. B. SPINOZA was very likely influenced by P. during the latter's stay in Amsterdam in 1655. One of Spinoza's teachers, MENASSEH BEN ISRAEL, had read both Du Rappel des Iuifs and Prae-Adamitae. It is also known that Spinoza had a copy of Prae-Adamitae in his library, and parts of Tractatus seem to be dependent on P.'s work. R. SIMON disagreed with P.'s millenarian and pre-adamic views but made use of many of his remarks on the internal inconsistencies in the Bible. P.'s views were anathematized through much of the eighteenth century; however, when J. ASTRUC listed the three great influences of the previous century on PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, he named P., Hobbes, and Spinoza.

Works: Du Rappel des Iuifs (1643); Relation du Groenland (1647); A Theological Systeme upon That Presuppostion That Men Were Before Adam (1655); Men Before Adam, or a Discourse upon the Twelfth, Thirteenth, and Fourteenth Verses of the Fifth Chapter of the Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Romans. By Which Are Prov'd That the First Men Were Created Before Adam (1656; usually bound together with Theological Systeme); Relation de l'Islande (1663).

Bibliography: A. Grafton, Defenders of the Text (1991) 204-13. MSHH 12 (1730) 65-84. R. H. Popkin, "The Development of Religious Scepticism and the Influence of I. P.'s Pre-Adamism and Bible Criticism," Classical Influences on European Culture, AD 1500–1700 (ed. R. R. Bolgar, 1976) 271-80; I. P. (1596–1676): His Life, His Thought, and His Influence (1987).

B. C. JONES

PFEIFFER, ROBERT HENRY (1892–1958)

A renowned HB scholar and Assyriologist (see ASSYRIOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), P. was born in Italy in 1892 to American parents, grew up in Italian public schools, and studied in Geneva (1911–13), Berlin, and Tübingen (1913–14). He received a theological degree in 1915 from the Faculté Autonome de Théologie of Geneva and the University of Geneva. Emigrating to the United States, he was granted the AM by Harvard in 1912, the PhD in 1922, and the STM in 1923. P. was an accomplished linguist, fluent in Italian, English, French, and German and well versed in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and the languages of the ancient Near East. Joining the Harvard faculty as instructor of Semitic languages and history in 1922, he was Hancock Professor of Hebrew and Other Oriental Languages from 1953 to his death. As curator of the Semitic Museum from 1931, he directed the growth of its collections to its present status as a major center of research. For many years he taught concurrently at Boston University. Editor of the JBL from 1943 to 1947, he was elected president of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE in 1950.

P. is best known for his two major handbooks: Introduction to the OT (1941) and History of NT Times (1949), an introduction to the APOCRYPHA. These displayed an extraordinary knowledge of secondary literature in many languages and quickly became standard manuals for students and scholars in the field. Strongly influenced by his mentors, G. MOORE and W. Arnold, P. was a skillful practitioner of the historical-LITERARY method of analyzing texts. His studies led him to identify the biographer of David as "the father of history" and to regard 2 Samuel 9–20 and 1 Kings 1–2 as the earliest Hebrew source, a Semitic Iliad. His theory of a non-Israelite source in Genesis, symbolized as S, has not been widely accepted; and modern HB research would question his assignment of much HB literature to the postexilic period. Although he was keenly interested in the historical development of Israelite religion, on which he left an incomplete manuscript (published posthumously by his student C. Forman), he was strongly averse to attempts to extract a THEOLOGY of the HB, insisting on the separation of theology from biblical science.

In 1928, while serving as annual professor of the Baghdad School of the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH (1928–29), he directed the school's excavations at Nuzi and published the first two volumes of reports on ancient Assyrian records.

Works: Excavations at Nuzi, vol. 2, The Archives of Shilwateshub, Son of the King (HSS, 1932); State Letters of Assyria (1935); One Hundred New Selected Nuzi Texts (ASOR, 1937); Introduction to the OT (1941, 1952[2]); History of NT Times with an Introduction to the Apocrypha (1949, 1955[2]); "Facts and Faith in Biblical History," JBL 70 (1951) 1-14; "The Literature and Religion of the Apocrypha" and "The Literature and Religion of the Pseudepigrapha," IB (1952) 1:391-436; (tr.), "Akkadian Oracles and Prophecies," ANET (1955[2]) 449-552; (with W. G. Pollard), The Hebrew Iliad: The History of the Rise of Israel Under Saul and David (1957); (with C. C. Forman), Religion in the OT: The History of a Spiritual Triumph (1961), with bibliography, 233-56.

Bibliography: M. V. Anastos et al., "R. H. P.," Harvard University Gazette (Jan. 31, 1959).

E. W. SAUNDERS

PFLEIDERER, OTTO (1839–1908)

One of F. C. BAUR's (d. 1860) last and most devoted students in Tübingen, P. became a Repetent there in 1864. After a period in Jena, where he was appointed professor of practical theology and university preacher in 1871, the liberal minister P. L. A. Falk made him professor of systematic theology in Berlin, against the wishes of that faculty (1875).

P. remained a follower of Baur while denying that the Jewish-Gentile controversy persisted beyond the apostolic period. Setting his historical construction in a right-wing Hegelian framework, he saw in the development of primitive Christianity into the Roman Catholic Church a natural evolution of PAUL's Christian Hellenism as the church left behind the apostle's residual Pharisaism and moved in more speculative (John) and practical (James, 1 Clement) directions. P. maintained this philosophical and theological interpretation of Christian history against the more popular anti-metaphysical theologies of A. RITSCHL and A. von HARNACK.

Although P. is often considered a precursor of the history-of-religion approach (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE), his significance lies more in his development of that approach within theology than in biblical studies. In an age that had lost the vision of the great German idealists, he set Christianity in the wider context of non-Christian religions without abandoning the quest for normative religious truth. His 1869 and 1878 works (discussed in detail by R. Leuze [1908]) brought a knowledge of other religions to bear on the understanding of Christianity but suffer from neglect of JESUS' eschatology. Because of his philosophical theology, P. was more admired in England than in Germany; three of his books were widely read in ET.

Works: Die Religion: Ihr Wesen und ihre Geschichte (2 vols., 1869); Paulinism: A Contribution to the History of Primitive Christian Theology (2 vols., 1873; ET 1877); Religionsphilosophie auf geschichtliche Grundlage (1878; 2 vols., 1883–84[2], 1896[3]); Grundriss der christlichen Glaubens- und Sittenlehre (1880); Primitive Christianity (1885 Hibbert Lectures, 2 vols., 1887; rev. ET, 4 vols., 1906–10); The Development of Theology in Germany Since Kant, and Its Progress in Great Britain Since 1825 (1891, 1893[2]), with appendix; Geschichte der Religionsphilosophie von Spinoza bis auf die Gegenwart (1893[3]); Die Entstehung des Christentums (1905); Religion und Religionen (1906, 1911[2]); Die Entwicklung des Christentums (1907).

Bibliography: E. Hirsch, Geschichte der neuern evangelischen Theologie im Zusammenhang mit den allgemeinen Bewegungen des europaischen Denkens (1964[3]) 5:562-71. R. Leuze, Theologie und Religionsgeschichte: Der Weg O. P.s (1980).

R. MORGAN

PHILEMON, LETTER TO

1. The Fathers. The epistle of Philemon is the shortest of the letters attributed to PAUL. The first Christian author to cite Philemon appears to have been ORIGEN (Hom. in Jer. 19; Comm. in Mt. tract 33,34), but some scholars believe that there are references to the epistle in IGNATIUS (Eph. 2; Magn. 12; Pol. 6).

On three occasions (Eph. 1.3, PG 5.645; 2.1; 6.2) Ignatius cited a tradition identifying Onesimus as a bishop of Ephesus (see also Eusebius Hist. eccl. 3.36.5; PG 20.288), but it is not altogether certain that the bishop is the same person as the runaway slave. If Bishop Onesimus were indeed the same person as the former slave, this would explain why the letter was so readily accepted into the Pauline corpus. Ignatius also indicated that Christians had to defend themselves against the accusation that conversion to Christianity required that slaves be freed (Pol. 4.3), but Philemon is of dubious utility in the discussion because it does not indicate what happened to Onesimus after the the letter was sent.

Philemon does not appear to have been widely read during patristic times. Hippolytus, for example, cited all of the works in the canonical collection of Pauline writings with the exception of Philemon. TERTULLIAN was apparently the first of the Latin fathers to have drawn specific attention to the epistle, noting that it escaped rejection from MARCION's Apostolikon because of its brevity (Adv. Mar. 5.42). When used by the Latin and Greek fathers, it was most valued for the elements of wisdom and virtue it contained.

Philemon was universally attributed to Paul during the patristic era. The letter apparently belonged to the earliest collections of Pauline writings, perhaps dating back to the end of the first century. According to Epiphanius, it appeared in Marcion's list immediately after Colossians (Contra Haer. 1.41). In the Muratorian CANON it appears alongside the PASTORAL LETTERS, a placement apparently due to the fact that all four epistles were considered to have been addressed to individuals.

During the fourth century problems arose because of the paucity of edifying material contained in the letter. As a result some doubted its INSPIRATION or even its Pauline authorship, even to the point of making a claim that it had been rejected by ancient authorities. JEROME replied that Paul treats of similarly mundane matters in all of his epistles and that Philemon would not have been received by all the churches in the world had it not been by Paul (PL 26.599-601). In the East similar defenses of the epistle were made by CHRYSOSTOM (Argum. in Phil.) and THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (Spicil. Solesm. 1).

2. The Medieval Period and the Reformation. The contents of Philemon did not easily lend themselves to allegorical interpretation. Moreover, the brevity of the text as well as its subject matter were such that Philemon was not widely read in medieval times. THOMAS AQUINAS, for example, does not cite Philemon at all in his Summa Theologica, not even in those passages that treat slavery (II-II, q.104, a.5, ad 2; II-II, q.122, a.4, ad 3). The early Reformers, however, valued the brief text. LUTHER saw reflected in the letter "a masterful and tender example of Christian love," noting that all of us are Onesimus in some way. CALVIN praised Paul's willingness to treat a mean subject and extolled the compassion of the apostle who pleaded for one of the lowest of men.

3. Critical Scholarship. The first real attack against the authenticity of Philemon was launched by F. C. BAUR in Paulus, his 1845 classic. Baur had to admit that no serious questions as to the Pauline origin of the letter had been previously raised; nonetheless, its linguistic peculiarities prompted him to reject it, just as he had rejected Ephesians, Philippians, and Colossians. Baur believed that the tale of Onesimus's flight and his meeting with the venerable Paul (v. 9) smacked of a romance. "The letter," he wrote, "is the embryo of a Christian romance like the Clementine Recognitions, intended to illustrate the idea that what man loses in time in this world he regains forever in Christianity."

A few other nineteenth-century critics also rejected Philemon as a genuine Pauline writing. K. von Weizsäcker and O. PFLEIDERER believed that a pun on the name "Onesimus" (v. 11) indicated that the epistle was an allegorical composition. According to R. Steck (1888), the basis of the letter is to be found in a letter addressed by the younger Pliny to his friend Sabinianus in a similar set of circumstances (Ep. 9.21). H. HOLTZMANN accepted the letter's basic authenticity but held that the present text is the work of a redactor who added vv. 4-6 to the original Pauline work. On the other hand, such nineteenth-century critics as J. BENGEL, J. RENAN, and Sabatier praised the work despite its brevity. It was, said Renan, a "chef d'oeuvre of the art of letter-writing," words echoed some years later by M. GOGUEL, who extolled Philemon as "a chef d'oeuvre of tact and cordiality."

The major critical issues in the study of Philemon have focused on its place and date of composition and on its destination. The similarities between Philemon and Colossians have led most scholars (e.g., J. B. Lightfoot [1890]; K. Staab [1959]; C. F. D. Moule [1957]; and H. Gülzow [1969]) to consider that Paul wrote the letter from Rome during his imprisonment there; supporting arguments could be found in Luke's description of Paul's circumstances in Acts 28. Other scholars (e.g., Holtzmann [1873] and H. Meyer [1855–61]; in the twentieth century E. Lohmeyer [1953] and H. Greeven [1954]) have opted for Caesarea as the locale of the letter's composition. Arguments for this position are to be found in Caesarea's geographical proximity to Colossae (facilitating Onesimus's access to the city [v. 10] and making it feasible for Paul to realize his desire to visit [v. 22]) and the letter's silence about the earthquake that probably occurred in Colossae in 60–61 CE. Many commentators (e.g., E. Lohse [1971]; G. Friedrich (1981); L. Jang [1964]; P. Stulhmacher [1975]) have opted for Ephesus (see 1 Cor 15:32; 2 Cor 1:8-9; 11:23-24) as the most likely site. Paul's long stay in Ephesus (Acts 19) and the relative proximity of Ephesus to Colossae are the principal reasons cited in favor of this option.

The location of the recipients of the letter is not explicitly identified in the salutation. The view that the letter was sent to a Colossian household is based on the similarities between Philemon and Colossians and the apparent identification of Colossae as the city of Onesimus (Col 4:9) and Archippus (Col 4:17). Some scholars (e.g., K. Wieseler [1813–83]; E. Goodspeed [1871–1962]; J. Knox [1935]), however, believed that the letter was directed to a community at Laodicea.

KNOX proposed that Philemon was the letter from Laodicea mentioned in Col 4:16 and argued that it was written at approximately the same time as Colossians; that it was really directed to a church community (v. 1) and was intended to be read aloud within the community; that two distinct letters are involved; and that it is highly unlikely that the letter from Laodicea would have been lost. Knox added the suggestion that one of the reasons why Philemon was preserved was that Onesimus was the compiler of the early Pauline corpus. He also held that the letter was addressed to Philemon at Laodicea, urging him to bring the moral weight of his authority to bear upon Archippus, a resident of Colossae, to free his slave Onesimus.

Knox's theory has been strongly criticized, e.g., by Greeven, Moule (1957) and H.-M. Schenke (1978), who attacked its shaky grounds (e.g., Marcion cites both a letter to the Laodiceans [= Ephesians] and a letter to Philemon); but its principal features have been reiterated by L. Cope (1985), who proposed that Archippus was Onesimus's master and that Paul used the entire weight of his moral authority on Onesimus's behalf, not only sending Philemon along with Colossians but also intending that it be read to church leaders in Laodicea.

In 1961 U. Wickert suggested that despite its brevity Philemon should not be considered to be merely a personal letter; it is an apostolic writing of the same genus as that of the other genuine Pauline letters. As an apostolic text, the letter offers an illustration of apostolic freedom (see 1 Cor 9:19-23). Paul pleads for Onesimus, not on the basis of friendship, but on the basis of the gospel. In 1978 Schenke argued that Philemon, an authentic letter of the apostle, was published as a witness to the authenticity of Colossians (which is considered by many scholars to be inauthentic).

4. Late Twentieth Century Trends. Of specific interest in exegesis in the last decades of the twentieth century, with its emphasis on sociological factors (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES), is Onesimus's situation as a runaway slave. Under Roman law, escape from slavery was forbidden and recaptured slaves were severely punished (e.g., by branding, fetters, etc.). Runaway slaves were returned to their masters, while those who harbored runaways were subject to fines. If, however, a slave had run away to avoid maltreatment (legal appeals involved a time-consuming process), he or she was not considered a fugitive. In 1985 P. Lampe argued that the legal category of fugitivus did not apply to Onesimus. Whether Roman law was applicable to the case depends on Philemon's citizenship (Roman or not). On this matter the letter offers insufficient evidence.

Another sociological factor to be considered is the role of the household. Philemon appears to be a leader and patron of the assembly that gathered in his house. Apphia is also a church leader and perhaps the wife of Philemon as well. Philemon's social and ecclesial status are such that Onesimus's situation involves the life as well as the moral and social standards of the entire community (i.e., Philemon's household and the church that gathers in his house).

Following on J. White's earlier work (1971), F. Church's RHETORICAL analysis of Philemon (1978) led him to conclude that the letter was much more than a private plea by Paul on behalf of Onesimus. Onesimus may have been the subject of Paul's plea, but the object of his public letter is love and brotherhood.

An important step forward in research on Philemon was taken by N. Petersen (1985), who used a variety of LITERARY-critical and sociological methods, including the sociology of knowledge, to examine the symbolic forms and social arrangements of the letter's narrative world. For Petersen, the way in which Paul wrote (as an ambassador, v. 9) placed Philemon under an apostolic mandate to receive Onesimus as the brother he had become. Their relationship in the Lord governed their relationship in the secular world, thereby requiring Philemon to release his former slave. Were he not to do so, the church that met in his house would have had no available course of action other than to reject him as a leader and member of the church.

In a doctoral dissertation and related articles, S. Winter argues that Philemon is a letter to a church rather than a private letter and holds that Onesimus is not a runaway. She opines that the contents of the letter are primarily a matter of concern for Archippus insofar as he had sent Onesimus to Paul on behalf of the church at Colossae. The letter to the church meeting in Philemon's house, delivered by a person other than Onesimus, requests that Onesimus be allowed to stay and work with Paul, thereby implying that he is no longer to be considered a slave, a situation that would require his manumission by Archippus. From quite a different vantage point, J. Burtchaell argues that Philemon constitutes a radical demand for the Christian to revolutionize institutions from within.

Bibliography: J. M. Bassler, Pauline Theology (1991). A. D. Callahan, Embassy of Onesimus: The Letter of Paul to Philemon (1997). F. F. Church, "Rhetorical Structure and Design in Paul's Letter to Philemon," HTR 71 (1978) 17-33. L. Cope, "On Rethinking the Philemon and Colossians Connection," BR 30 (1985) 45-50. J. D. G. Dunn, The Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon: A Commentary on the Greek Text (1996). G. Friedrich, "Der Brief an Philemon," Die Briefe an die Galater, Epheser, Philipper, Kolosser, Thessalonischer, und Philemon (1981). M. A. Getty, "The Letter to Philemon," TBT 22 (1984) 137-44. H. Greeven, "Prüfung der Thesen von J. Knox zum Philemonbrief," TLZ 79 (1954) 373-78. H. Gülzow, Christentum und Sklaverei in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (1969). H. J. Holtzmann, "Der Brief an den Philemon, kritisch untersucht," ZWT 16 (1873) 428-41. H. Hübner, An Philemon; An die Kolosser; An die Epheser (1997). L. Jang, Der Philemonbrief im zusammenhang mit dem theologischen Denken des Apostels Paulus (1964). J. Knox, Philemon Among the Letters of Paul: A New View of Its Place and Importance (1935, rev. ed. 1959). P. Lampe, "Keine 'Sklavenflucht' des Onesimus," ZNW 76 (1985) 135-37. J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon: Revised Text with Introduction, Notes, and Dissertations (1890). E. Lohmeyer, Die Brief und die Kolosser und an Philemon (KEK 9, 2, 1953). E. Lohse, Colossians and Philemon (Hermeneia, 1971). H. Meyer, Kritisch exegetischer Kommentar über das NT (1855–61). C. F. D. Moule, Christ's Messengers: Studies in the Acts of the Apostles (World Christian Books 19, 1957). P. Perkins, "Philemon," Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992). N. R. Petersen, Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World (1985). T. Preiss, Life in Christ (SBT 13, 1954) 32-42. W. Schenk, "Der Brief des Paulus an Philemon in der neueren Forschung (1945–87)," ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 3439-95. K. Staab, Die Thessalonicherbriefe, die Gefangenschaftsbriefe (RNT 7, 1959). R. Steck, Der Galaterbrief: Microform, nach seiner Echtheit untersucht, nebst Kritischen Bemerkungen zu den Paulinsichen Hauptbriefen (1888). P. Stuhlmacher, Der Brief an Philemon (EKKNT 18, 1975). J. White, "The Structural Analysis of Philemon: A Point of Departure in the Formal Analysis of the Pauline Letter," SBLSP (1971) 1-47. U. Wickert, "Der Philemonbrief: Privatbrief oder apostoliches Schreiben?" ZNW 52 (1961) 230-38. S. C. Winter, "Paul's Letter to Philemon," NTS 33 (1987) 1-15; "Philemon," Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Commentary (ed. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, 1994) 301-12.

R. F. COLLINS

PHILIPPIANS, LETTER TO THE

The Thrasian town of Krenides was brought under Macedonian control and renamed Philippi in 356 BCE by Philip II of Macedon. The city's importance grew after the Roman conquest of Macedonia in 168–167 BCE. Strategically located on the Roman Via Egnatia and approximately nine miles from the seaport town of Neapolis, Philippi was an important gateway to Europe from Asia. Nearby, Mark Antony decisively defeated Cassius and Brutus in 42 BCE, and later Octavian defeated Mark Antony at Actium in 31 BCE. Populated by significant numbers of Macedonians, Greeks, and a Jewish minority as well as by Roman settlers, Philippi became a truly cosmopolitan city. Although it was "a leading city of the district of Macedonia and a Roman colony" (Acts 16:12 NRSV), it was the tiny Pauline church established there that secured Philippi's place in Western history. That church played an important role in the apostle's mission to Greece and perhaps to Ephesus, and the association with PAUL later gave Philippi a certain status and even authority in the Western world. Crossing over from Asia Minor via Neapolis to Philippi sometime between 49 and 52 CE (if one follows Acts 16:6-40), Paul launched a mission to Europe whose horizon ultimately was to embrace Spain.

Certainly the letter Paul later wrote to the church he founded at Philippi helped to shape the theological language of the post-apostolic church. An early example of the letter's role appears in the work of CLEMENT OF ROME (c. 96). In 1 Clement 21 the words "if we walk not worthily of him" clearly echo Phil 1:27; the phrase "in the beginning of the Gospel" (47) resembles Phil 4:15; and elsewhere 1 Clement 16 seems to draw on Phil 2:6-11. Other early instances appear in the writings of IGNATIUS. Anticipating his martyrdom (c. 107), Ignatius wrote to the Roman church of his desire to be "poured out as a libation to God" (Ign. Rom 2, from Phil 2:17); and in his letter to the Philadelphians he urged them to "do nothing of party-spirit," echoing Phil 2:3. Similarly, Polycarp's (c. 69–c. 155) anticipation of the subjection of all things to God, noted in his own letter to the Philippians (2:16), takes its wording from the hymn in Paul's letter (Phil 2:6-11). To these examples one could add citations from the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (Levi 14, "the luminaries of heaven"), from the Apocryphal Acts of Thomas (the "name of Christ which is above every name"), and from the works of IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, and MARCION. Laodiceans, the mid–second-century pseudepigraph attributed to Paul, contains a string of sentences and phrases taken from Philippians (J. B. Lightfoot [1896])

For centuries theologians regularly appealed to Phil 2:6-11 to support the two natures christology of the Nicene Creed (see Calvin [1948] 56-58). But the nineteenth century witnessed a change with the genesis of kenotic christology. Drawing on Phil 2:7, German theologians were joined by English scholars in arguing that the preexistent Christ surrendered his divinity to become completely human. The only way to affirm the full humanity of JESUS, it was believed, was to insist on the abandonment of the Christ's divine nature during his earthly sojourn. However, kenotic christology was widely assailed, if not refuted, and its influence waned (D. Dawe [1962] 337-49). That issue left behind, modern Philippian research focused on four related issues: (1) the place and date of composition, (2) the occasion and purpose of the letter, (3) the unity of the letter, and (4) the provenance of the Christ hymn in 2:6-11.

1. Place and Date of Composition. Although the Acts account (16:6–17:14) of Paul's crossing over from Asia Minor to Europe, thence to Philippi, and thence south to Thessalonica and Beroea is reliable, the question of the place from which Paul wrote to the Philippian church is much disputed. From the second to the eighteenth centuries, the view that Paul wrote Philippians from Rome went unchallenged. In Paul's own words he wrote the letter during an imprisonment known to the whole praetorium (1:13); and he concluded the letter with greetings from "those of Caesar's household" (4:22). These passages convinced Marcion that the apostle was "writing to them from Rome in prison" (see J. Knox [1942] 170). The praetorium of 1:13 was taken to mean the praetorian guard in Rome, and "those of Caesar's household" was believed to refer to believers from within the imperial household. Paul anticipated a trial, with death as a possible outcome (1:20-26), which fits well into the Roman context.

Since 1799, however, when H. Paulus (1761–1851) first argued against the prevailing position, the Roman hypothesis has lost the support of the majority of Pauline scholars. The difficulties with the Roman hypothesis are manifold. The distance between Rome and Philippi (some 730 miles by land) rules out the frequent exchanges the letter assumes have already taken place (five) or are anticipated (four). Even as Paul writes, Timothy has come to join him (1:1), word of his imprisonment has reached Philippi (4:14), Epaphroditus has been dispatched by the church to offer assistance to Paul (2:25; 4:18), news of Epaphroditus's critical illness has filtered back to Philippi (2:26), and word of the church's grave concern for Epaphroditus has now reached Paul (2:26). In the imminent future Paul plans to dispatch Epaphroditus to Philippi with a letter (2:25, 28); he expects soon after to send Timothy to Philippi (2:19); he looks forward to Timothy's return with news from the congregation (2:19); and he hopes to journey to Philippi himself for a reunion (2:24). Such a number of exchanges over a distance requiring two months to traverse makes a Roman provenance for the letter highly improbable.

Moreover, the references to the praetorium (1:13) and to "Caesar's household" (4:22) do not require a Roman setting. The praetorian guard was present in many provincial capitals throughout the empire, including Ephesus and Caesarea; and imperial servants in the Roman bureaucracy qualify as members of Caesar's household. With the weight of probability against Roman authorship, what conceivable provenance for the letter is left? Although a location at Corinth or Caesarea Maritima would overcome some of the objections, other reservations arise. Paul nowhere mentions a Corinthian imprisonment, and Acts reports no such physical danger as Paul faces in the prison from which he writes. Furthermore, the great distance between Caesarea and Philippi weighs almost as heavily against that location as against Rome. In the absence of any other compelling alternative, most scholars prefer Ephesus as the locus of the imprisonment from which Paul wrote Philippians. Inscriptional evidence supports Ephesus as the location for a proconsular headquarters with a praetorium. "Caesar's household" then could refer to imperial bureaucrats of some type associated with the Roman administration. Moreover, a round trip from Ephesus to Philippi could be covered in less than ten days, allowing for the frequent exchanges anticipated in the letter.

The primary weakness of the Ephesian hypothesis is that neither Paul's letters nor Acts refers to an imprisonment there. Paul himself tells us, however, that he was in prison many times (2 Cor 11:23); he emphasizes that he was the victim of great "affliction . . . in Asia," being so "unbearably crushed" that he despaired of life (2 Cor 1:8 NRSV). Clement of Rome reported that Paul "wore chains seven times" (1 Clement), and the Acts of Paul refers to an Ephesian imprisonment (see E. Hennecke [1963] 2:338). Although these late traditions cannot bear the weight of primary proof, they do offer cumulative evidence that an Ephesian imprisonment is not pure conjecture.

In support of the Ephesian over the Roman provenance one might appeal to Acts and Romans as well. Paul expresses his hopes to return to Philippi for a second visit, which would be possible from Ephesus. However, a visit from Rome does not seem a possibility; for if the Acts CHRONOLOGY is correct, by the time Paul was incarcerated in Rome he had already been in Philippi twice and could only anticipate a third visit. Moreover, as Romans tells us, even before he reached Rome his attention had already turned westward toward Spain. In light of that preoccupation, the hope to visit the Philippians would be strange if he wrote from Rome; such a visit would have required Paul to backtrack to Philippi before launching the Spanish mission. Thus, while the Ephesian provenance of the letter is conjectural, for good reason most Pauline scholars prefer it to the alternatives.

The decision on this question inevitably influences the dating of the letter. A Roman origin would require a date late in the decade (58–60), whereas an Ephesian origin would argue for a date in the mid-fifties (55–56). The decision on the provenance of the letter affects where one places it in relation to Paul's other epistles and has importance for any discussion of development in Paul's theology.

2. The Unity of the Letter. Since J. WEISS noticed the dramatic eruption "Look out for the dogs . . . " in Phil 3:2 in the early part of this century, scholars have disputed the letter's unity. Weiss concluded from his study that 3:2–4:1 "suits the context so badly . . . that one is again led to the hypothesis that this part did not originally belong with the rest of the letter" (1917; ET 1959, 387). E. GOODENOUGH later argued that the break between the first part of the letter and 3:2–4:1 is so jarring that it defies explanation on hypothetical grounds ([1990] 90). The disjuncture is made more severe by the conclusion begun in 3:1: "Finally, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord." The explicitly final admonition appears to cross over from the body of the letter to its termination, yet its genial admonition is interrupted with an acrimonious warning beginning in 3:2 and extending through 4:1. This warning is so at odds with the rest of the letter that in the view of many scholars it indicates an originally separate letter.

Several proposals have arisen to account for the disjuncture. Among the more common reconstructions are those found in W. Schmithals (1972; A: 4:10-23 [a letter of thanksgiving]; B: 1:1–3:1, 4:4-7 [a prison letter]; C: 3:2–4:3, 4:8-9 [a warning letter]); G. BORNKAMM (1962; A: 1:1–3:1, 4:4-7, 4:21-23; B: 3:2–4:3; C: 4:10-20); B. Rahtjen (1959–60; A: 4:10-20; B: 1:1–2:30, 4:21-23; C: 3:1–4:9); and W. Marxsen (1964; A: 4:10-20; B: 1:1–3:1, 4:4-7, 4:21-23; C: 3:2–4:3, 4:8-9). J. Gnilka (1968), H. Koester (1962), and J. Müller-Bardorf (1957–58) have suggested other variations. Because of the widespread disagreement over how chapter 4 is to be divided, the multiple-letter hypothesis has enjoyed less acceptance for Philippians than it has for 2 Corinthians. Moreover, the "finally" in 3:1 followed by a chapter of warning and admonition, is not without parallel; e.g., the "Finally. . . . " of 1 Thess 4:1 is followed by a lengthy exhortation before the letter crosses over irrevocably into its ending.

V. Furnish (1963–64), R. Jewett (1970), and T. Pollard (1966–67), all on different grounds, have accepted the letter as a unity. Furnish argues that 3:1 is a crucial link verse—3:1*a* reaches back to chap. 2, and 3:1*b* stretches forward to chap. 3 and the special warning carried by Epaphroditus and Timothy to the church at Philippi. Pollard and Jewett find sufficient verbal correspondence between chapter 3 and the remainder of the letter to convince them that Philippians was written and delivered as a single unit. But if the letter is a unity, then one must explain the rupture between 3:1 and 3:2. Had Paul suddenly received the unwelcome report of trouble in Philippi? And what caused him to wait until the end of the letter to express his thanksgiving for the help Epaphroditus brought from the church in Philippi?

The pseudepigraph Laodiceans may offer external evidence for the resolution of this dilemma. Although the author of Laodiceans closely follows Philippians in his compilation, he shows no knowledge of Phil 3:2–4:3, suggesting that he was working from a copy of Philippians different from our canonical version (P. Sellew [1994] 20-28). That multiple letters of Paul to the Philippians were known in antiquity is proven by Polycarp's statement in his letter to the Philippians that when Paul was absent, he wrote "letters (epistolas) to you. . . . " (3:2; A. Lindemann, [1990] 41). Philippians 3:2–4:3 may have been one of those letters; perhaps 4:10-20 was another. In the second century these letters probably were combined to form our canonical version of Philippians.

3. The Identity of Paul's Opposition. Some scholars have sought to resolve the question of the letter's unity by identifying Paul's opposition. In 1:28 Paul warns his readers not to fear their "opponents." But who were these "opponents"? What was their quarrel with Paul? And what were they doing? In 1:17 we learn that they were preaching a partisan gospel intended to nettle the apostle. They urged gentile Christians to accept circumcision (3:2); they rejected the importance of the cross in favor of the glory of the resurrected life (3:18); and they made a fetish of self-indulgence: "their god is their belly" (3:19). In the absence of any sustained discussion of the law, it is unlikely that the opponents were Judaizers like those in Galatians; and in light of their proclamation of Christ (1:17), they could hardly have been from the synagogue. If the opposition was unified, then it may well have been a form of Jewish-Christian syncretism. Circumcision was retained as a sign of the covenant, and certain Hellenistic enthusiastic tendencies were embraced, allowing the initiates to pass over directly from death to the glory of the resurrected life. To these were added the emphasis of the gospel on grace and freedom, which allowed a form of indulgence that sounds proto-Gnostic in character. Schmithals has argued that Paul was slow to recognize the character of the opposition and that this tardiness accounts for his confused response. But given the range of Paul's opposition elsewhere it is unlikely that he would have been confused about its nature in Philippi.

An alternative to this view is that Paul faced different groups of opponents in Philippi: Jews intent on reclaiming gentile god-fearers attracted to the church, pagan converts who had relapsed into their morally lax ways, and Hellenistic enthusiasts who were critical of Paul's gospel. R. Martin (1980) argues that the attempt to avoid persecution may best explain the dual emphases in Philippians, i.e., Jewish and Hellenistic. Jewish Christian missionaries, he claims, encouraged Philippian Christians to accept circumcision to avert persecution from Jewish revolutionaries inspired by a surging Jewish nationalism in Palestine. A Christian eschatology of glory sparked by Hellenistic enthusiasm provided the impulse for eluding persecution and suffering. While religious enthusiasm did exist in some of Paul's churches and would explain the libertine tendencies in Philippi, we have no evidence that a feverish "nationalism" penetrated the diaspora in the way Martin suggests. And if Paul faced different groups, why are the lines between them so indistinct?

It would be a mistake to allow the competing claims, internal strife, and external threats to eclipse the genuine warmth and human tenderness in Philippians, especially when these are compared to the acrimonious exchanges in Galatians and Corinthians. We see here that Paul was not always the divine warrior. He was a pastoral figure so confident of the truth of his apocalyptic gospel (see APOCALYPTICISM) that he could look past the immediate disturbances with confidence.

4. The Provenance of 2:6-11. Since the late nineteenth century, scholars have recognized the poetic or hymnic form of Phil 2:6-11 (Weiss, 263); but both the character and the provenance of the hymn have been disputed (Martin [1983] and J. T. Sanders [1971]). The rhythm, parallelism, clearly defined strophes, poetic expression, and non-Pauline language confirm the pre-Pauline quality of this hymn; but whether its provenance was Jewish or Hellenistic has been vigorously debated. The opening verses of the hymn usher the worshiper into the celestial abode to witness Jesus' humble descent and glorious ascent to assume his cosmic lordship as the glorified Christ to whom all powers "in heaven and on earth and under the earth" (2:10) will do obeisance. These opening verses display unmistakable Hellenistic features. The closing doxology, however, echoes Isa 45:23: "To me every knee shall bow,/every tongue shall swear" (NRSV). Possibly the hymn's allusion to Jesus as a slave also draws on Isaiah. With these two emphases established, the hymn's origin cannot be found in either the Jewish or the Hellenistic milieu alone. What the hymn displays instead is a synthesis of both Jewish and Hellenistic elements. Traces of a Jewish background remain, but they have coalesced with a Hellenistic cosmology and soteriology (Sanders). Therefore, the hymn most likely came from a Hellenistic Jewish Christian mission of which we catch a glimpse in Stephen's vision of Christ's cosmic victory at his martyrdom (Martin [1983] 113).

Bibliography: F. W. Beare, Commentary on the Epistle to the Philippians (HNTC, 1959). G. Bornkamm, "Der Philipperbrief als paulinische Briefsammlung," Neotestamentica et Patristica (NovTSup 6, 1962) 192-202. J. Calvin, Commentary on the Epistle of Paul to the Philippians (1948) 56-58. J.-F. Collange, L'épître de Saint Paul aux Philippiens (CNT 10a, 1973). D. G. Dawe, "A Fresh Look at the Kenotic Christologies," SJT 15 (1962) 337-49. V. P. Furnish, "The Place and Purpose of Philippians III," NTS 10 (1963) 80-88. J. Gnilka, Der Philipperbrief: Auslegung (HTKNT 10, 1968). E. Goodenough, Goodenough on the Beginnings of Christianity (BJS 212, ed. A. T. Kraabel, 1990). P. N. Harrison, Polycarp's Two Epistles to the Philippians (1936). E. Hennecke, NT Apocrypha (2 vols., ed. W. Schneemelcher; ET, ed. R. M. Wilson, 1963). R. Jewett, "The Epistolary Thanksgiving and the Integrity of Philippians," NovT 12 (1970) 40-53. J. Knox, Marcion and the NT: An Essay in the Early History of the Canon (1942). H. Koester, "The Purpose of the Polemic of a Pauline Fragment (Phil. III)," NTS 8 (1962) 317-32. J. B. Lightfoot, Saint Paul's Epistle to the Philippians (1896). A. Lindemann, "Paul in the Writings of the Apostolic Fathers," Paul and the Legacies of Paul (1990) 25-45. T. W. Manson, "St. Paul in Ephesus," BJRL 23 (1939) 182-200. R. P. Martin, Philippians (NCB, 1980); Carmen Christi, Philippians 2:5-11 in Recent Interpretation and in the Setting of Early Christian Worship (SNTSMS 4, 1983). W. Marxsen, Introduction to the NT (ET 1964) 59-68. J. Müller-Bardorff, "Zur Frage der literarischen Einheit des Philipperbriefes," WZ(J) 7 (1957–58) 591-604. T. E. Pollard, "The Integrity of Philippians," NTS 13 (1966–67) 57-66. B. D. Rahtjen, "The Three Letters of Paul to the Philippians," NTS 6 (1959–60) 167-73. J. T. Sanders, The NT Christological Hymns: Their Historical Religious Background (SNTSMS 15, 1971). W. Schenk, "Der Philipperbrief in der neueren Forschung (1945–85)," ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 3280-313. W. Schmithals, "The False Teachers of the Epistle to the Philippians," Paul and the Gnostics (1972) 65-122. P. Sellew, "Laodiceans and the Philippians Fragments Hypothesis," HTR 87 (1994) 17-28. J. Weiss, Earliest Christianity: A History of the Period AD 30–150 (2 vols., 1917; ET 1959).

C. J. ROETZEL

PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA (c. 20 BCE–50 CE)

A profoundly Hellenized Jewish thinker who sought to reconcile biblical thought with Greek philosophy, P. was the scion of a wealthy priestly family. He played an important public role by heading a Jewish embassy to Gaius Caligula in 39–40 CE. Although passionately devoted to the pursuit of philosophy and fully open to secular Greek culture, P. was equally fascinated by traditional Jewish wisdom and dedicated to its promulgation and defense.

At home in both the Greek and the Hellenistic Jewish exegetical traditions, P. chose to present his interpretation of Judaism within the framework of an extensive series of commentaries on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM). Considerable evidence suggests, however, that his knowledge of Hebrew was virtually nonexistent. He invariably cited the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT), his work showing no awareness of the Hebrew original; and he occasionally offered interpretations of the Greek that the Hebrew would have precluded. Although P. probably possessed some knowledge of Palestinian traditions, this knowledge was likely channeled to him either orally or through Hellenistic Jewish writings no longer extant. His knowledge of Greek literature, science, and philosophy, on the other hand, was vast and unmediated. He employed a wide variety of Greek rhetorical figures and styles and was especially fond of the diatribe.

P.'s philosophical allegiance was clearly to the Middle Platonic tradition, which was characterized by Stoic and Pythagorean tendencies. He was firmly convinced, however, that this Platonism could be readily assimilated to traditional Jewish thought; he successfully retained in his commentaries biblical terminology and idiom in the very process of transposing its religious worldview into a philosophical framework. The many ambivalences and apparent incoherencies that mark these commentaries are an essential trait of any large-scale attempt to bridge divergent realms of thought rooted in the distinctive genius of two great but very different peoples. P.'s exegetical method, attempting to project philosophical conceptions into Scripture, was preceded by lesser efforts of other Alexandrian Jewish exegetes in the second century BCE. P.'s indebtedness is attested by over seventy references to them, although none by name.

P.'s exegetical works may be subdivided into three Pentateuchal commentaries: (a) a series of treatises that proceed through a verse-by-verse commentary on biblical texts taken from Gen 2:1–41:24, but which constantly incorporate related texts that are in turn investigated at length; (b) an exposition of the Pentateuch as a legal code, constituted by treatises showing the integration of the laws of the Pentateuch with the laws of nature, generally following the CHRONOLOGY of the Pentateuch and referring to its historical and legislative parts, e.g., De opificio mundi, De vita Mosis, and De Decalogo; and (c) Quaestiones et solutiones in Genesin et Exodum (extant only in Armenian and Greek fragments), which begins with a brief literal answer to a scriptural problem, followed by a lengthy allegorical explanation. If R. Marcus's (Supplement I, 1953) hypothesis is correct that in the Quaestiones P. is following a division of the Pentateuch into sections almost identical with those eventually determined to be the readings of the Babylonian annual cycle, then it would seem that P. consciously produced each book of Quaestiones to explicate the difficulties arising in one sabbath lection. In general, one has the impression that the Quaestiones is less sophisticated than the former two groups of commentaries, and it may have served as a rough compilation of material to aid the author in the composition of his more elaborate treatises. In any case, whereas the Legum allegoriae is clearly written from a definite perspective, P.'s aim in the Quaestiones appears to be the presentation of all the options. While there is still no consensus on the chronology of P.'s works, there is a growing tendency to regard the Quaestiones as the earliest of his exegetical writings.

P. was fully aware of the attempts of some of his Middle Platonist contemporaries to foist the Pythagorean doctrines of later thinkers onto Pythagoras (6th cent. BCE); he was quick to follow them in similarly putting Moses forward as the greatest authority of all, as being the teacher of Pythagoras and indeed of all Greek philosophers and lawgivers. P.'s depiction of Moses as the "theologian" par excellence is also analogous to the Stoic and Middle Platonic depiction of Homer as the source of all philosophy and of many other human skills as well. Pseudo-Plutarch, for example, in his Life and Poetry of Homer (2nd cent. CE), often indicated that Homer "hints at" (ainittetai, a term frequently employed by Philo) various doctrines of later thinkers and made it clear that the poems are a vast encyclopedia with a complex structure of meaning.

The chief exegetical tool that allowed P. to find philosophical teaching lurking behind the Mosaic Scriptures and allowed the Greeks to do the same for Homer's poems was the allegorical method of interpretation. The grammarian Theagenes of Rhegium (fl. 525 BCE) is attested by a Porphyrian scholium as having applied physical and moral allegory to the interpretation of the Iliad. The Stoics employed allegory in the interests of a philosophical system and were also prone to etymologize the names of the gods. Some scholars perceive a Pythagorean influence behind the etymologizing adopted ironically by Socrates in Plato's Cratylus (cf. Cicero Tusc. 1.62). The Neoplatonist Proclus (c. 410–85) observed that Pythagoras shared the opinion, expressed by Cratylus in the dialogue, that names are established by an infallible "nomothete" and thus correspond to the nature of things. P. too was very fond of etymologizing but believed that it was Adam who established names (De opificio mundi, 148-49; Legum allegoriae 2.14-15; Quaestiones in Genesin 1.20). This allowed P. to explain Hebrew names according to Greek elements (Legum Allegoriae 1.74; De Cherubim 41; the rabbis sometimes did the same), the assumption no doubt being that Hebrew was the language of Adam and hence the source of all subsequent languages. Although P.'s Hebrew was inadequate for this purpose, he could readily resort to onomastica, or lists of etymologies of Hebrew names.

P.'s preoccupation with the "allegory of the soul," which sees in the biblical heroes prototypes of souls that have abandoned the sensible world for the intelligible realities, is analogous to the Middle and Neoplatonic allegorization of Odysseus, which detected in his adventures the mystical history of the soul on its way to its true homeland. Scholars have noted the essential unity in the tradition of commentary exemplified by P.'s exegetical works and by the Neoplatonic commentaries and have concluded that their common source was the Stoic exegesis of the previous two centuries BCE, especially that of Crates of Mallos and Herodicus of Babylon, although J. Porter (1992) has questioned Crates' Stoic affiliation.

It has also been pointed out that Stoic and Middle Platonic allegory did not include recognition of different levels of interpretation, and P. appears to be the first to have employed what J. Pépin (1958, 1976[2]) has called "polyvalence des symboles"—that is, the interpretation of a text by multiple levels. This approach, used extensively by Neoplatonists, received a detailed analysis in the fourth century by Iamblichus, who pointed out that all levels of reality are interconnected and whatever exists on one level has its analogical counterpart on all others. Finally, it should be noted that P. transferred Greek mythical allegories into his biblical commentary by very skillfully Judaizing them.

Another exegetical device P. used frequently was arithmology, or number symbolism, the discovery of which he ascribed to Moses (De specialibus legibus 4.105). According to Nicomachus (fl. 2nd cent. CE), in the second half of his work On Pythagorean Numbers, Speusippus (fl. c. 350 BCE) showed the decad to be the most perfect number, which had served God as the all-perfect pattern for creation. The purely arithmetical excellences of the number ten are described in detail. The surviving passage from Speusippus's work (frag. 28, Tarán) is the oldest example of the type of number-play so characteristic of P., whose main concern in the use of this device was to demonstrate the mathematical structure and harmony of the cosmos. Arithmology allowed him to lend a scientific aura of universal validity to the Mosaic law and rituals.

Scholars have puzzled over the method of organization behind P.'s apparently rambling interpretations of Scripture. Attempts to discern his method have focused on the fact that the exegetical form of question and answer basic to the Quaestiones can also be observed in P.'s Legum allegoriae. V. Nikiprowetzky (1977) has endeavored to demonstrate this in detail. Within this basically coherent structure, however, there is still room for considerable discontinuity. Other scholars have approached the problem from antithetical extremes, some emphasizing the inherent looseness and repetitiveness of P.'s commentary style, others employing the insights of STRUCTURALISM, insisting on its precise logical structure. The truth is undoubtedly somewhere in the middle. P. is invariably quite clear about where he thinks the biblical text is going; behind the many digressions, repetitions, and occasional exegetical playfulness, which is similar to that often encountered in rabbinic MIDRASH, one can always find a coherent treatment of the text under consideration.

P. deeply influenced the ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL of Christian biblical interpretation. Both CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN drew on him; and through them and such later Latin commentators as AMBROSE, allegorical interpretation became a prominent method of interpreting Scripture among Christian exegetes.

Works: Philo (LCL, 12 vols., Greek and English, tr. F. H. Colson and G. H. Whitaker, 1929–62); Supplement I: Questions and Answers on Genesis (LCL, tr. R. Marcus, 1953); Supplement II: Questions and Answers on Exodus (LCL, tr. R. Marcus, 1953).

Bibliography: Y. Amir, Die hellenistische Gestalt des Judentums bei P. von Alexandrien (FJCD 5, 1983). É. Bréhier, Les Idées philosophiques et réligieuses de P. d'Alexandrie (EPhM 8, 1950[3]). J. Cazeaux, La Trame et la Chaîne, ou, les structures litteraires et l'exégèse dans cinq des traites de P. d'Alexandrie (ALGHJ 15, 1983); La Trame et la Chaîne, II: le cycle de Noe dans P. d'Alexandrie (ALGHJ 20, 1989). Centre national de la recherche scientifique, P. d'Alexandrie, Lyon 1966: Colloque (1967). I. Christiansen, Die Technik der allegorischen Auslegungswissenschaft bei P. von Alexandrien (BGBH 7, 1969). T. M. Conley, P.'s Rhetoric: Studies in Style, Composition, and Exegesis (Center for Hermeneutical Studies in Hellenistic and Modern Culture 1, 1987). D. Dawson, Allegorical Readers and Cultural Revision in Ancient Alexandria (1992) 73-126. L. H. Feldman, Scholarship on P. and Josephus (1937–62) (Studies in Judaica, 1960). E. R. Goodenough, The Politics of P. Judaeus: Practice and Theory (1938, repr. 1967) 125-348. L. Grabbe, Etymology in Early Jewish Interpretation: The Hebrew Names in P. (BJS 115, 1988). F. E. Greenspahn et al. (eds.), Nourished with Peace: Studies in Hellenistic Judaism in Memory of S. Sandmel (1984). D. M. Hay (ed.), Both Literal and Allegorical: Studies in P. of Alexandria's "Questions and Answers on Genesis and Exodus" (BJS 232, 1991). I. Heinemann, P.s griechische und jüdische Bildung: Kulturvergleichende Untersuchungen zu P.s Darstellung der jüdischen Gesetze (1932). P. Katz, P.'s Bible: The Abberant Text of Bible Quotations in Some Philonic Writings and Its Place in the Textual History of the Greek Bible (1950). R. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian: Neoplatonist Allegorical Reading and the Growth of the Epic Tradition (1986) 44-54. A. A. Long, "Stoic Readings of Homer," Homer's Ancient Readers (ed. R. Lamberton and J. J. Keaney, 1992). H. Moehring, "Arithmology as an Exegetical Tool in the Writings of P. of Alexandria," The School of Moses: Studies in P. and Hellenistic Religion (BJS 304, ed. J. P. Kenney, 1995) 141-76. V. Nikiprowetzky, Le commentaire de l'écriture chez P. d'Alexandrie: Son caractere et sa portée, observations philologiques (ALGHJ 11, 1977). J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie: Les origines grecques et les contestation judéo-chrétiennes (1958, 1976[2]). J. I. Porter, "Hermeneutic Lines and Circles: Aristarchus and Crates on the Exegesis of Homer," Homer's Ancient Readers (ed. R. Lamberton and J. J. Keaney, 1992) 67-114. D. T. Runia, P. of Alexandria and the "Timaeus" of Plato (PhAnt 44, 1986); Exegesis and Philosophy: Studies on Philo of Alexandria (1990); P. in Early Christian Literature: A Survey (CRINT 3, 3, 1993); P. and the Church Fathers: A Collection of Papers (VCSup 32, 1995). E. Schürer, HJPAJC, 3:809-89. C. Siegfried, P. von Alexandria als Ausleger des Alten Testaments an sich selbst und nach seinem geschichtlichen Einfluss betrachtet (repr. 1970). E. Stein, Die allegorische Exegese des P. aus Alexandria (BZAW 51, 1929); P. und der Midrasch: P.s Schilderung der Gestalten des Pentateuch verglichen mit der des Midrasch (BZAW 57, 1931). Studia Philonica (Philo Institute, Chicago, vols. 1–6, 1972–80). Studia Philonica Annual (1989–98). T. H. Tobin, The Creation of Man: P. and the History of Interpretation (CBQMS 14, 1983). W. Völker, Fortschritt und Vollendung bei P. von Alexandrien: Eine Studie zur Geschichte der Frömmigkeit (1938). D. Winston, Logos and Mystical Theology in P. of Alexandria (1985); "Aspects of P.'s Linguistic Theory," SPhA 3 (1991) 109-25. D. Winston and J. Dillon, Two Treatises of P. of Alexandria: A Commentary on "De gigantibus" and "Quod Deus sit immutabilis" (BJS 25, 1983). H. A. Wolfson, P.: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (2 vols., 1947; 4th rev. ed. 1968).

D. WINSTON

PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI (1463–94)

P. was born Feb. 24, 1463, youngest son of the prince of the independent principality of Mirandola. His family's status provided him with educational opportunity; his brilliance and devotion to truth and intellectual freedom combined to produce a stimulating, innovative, and influential genius. Intended for an ecclesiastical career, P. began study of canon law at Bologna; but he withdrew upon the death of a brother and subsequently studied at Ferrara (1479) and Padua (1480–82), with stays in Pavia (1482–83), Florence (1484), and Paris (1485). Among his friends, teachers, and associates were a number of humanists: B. Guarini (d. 1513), G. Savonarola (1452–98), A. Poliziano (1454–94), M. Ficino (1433–99), and Lorenzo (II) de'Medici (1449–92). His teachers and associates included three Jewish scholars: E. Delmedigo (1460–97), an Averroist; F. Mithridates (fl. 1470–83), with whom he studied KABBALAH; and J. ben Isaac Alemanno (c. 1435–c. 1504), a student of J. M. Leon (c. 1470–c. 1526). P. was probably the first Christian scholar in the Renaissance to master Hebrew, which provided him access to kabbalistic texts, of which he was the first Christian student. The Christian kabbalist and Hebrew grammarian J. REUCHLIN apparently met P. in Florence in 1490 and was influenced by him.

In 1486, at twenty-three years of age, P. challenged the church with 900 theses (published Dec. 7, 1486) and an offer to debate them with any challengers. Thirteen of these theses were found objectionable; one stated, "There is no science which can more firmly convince us of the divinity of Christ than magic [natural science] and Kabbalah." P.'s Apologia (pub. May 31, 1487) did not convince the church. He was condemned by Pope Innocent VIII (Aug. 5, 1487), although the verdict was later reversed by Pope Alexander VI (June 18, 1493). After his censure, P. became less assertive and spent most of his time after 1488 in Florence, where he died Nov. 17, 1494.

P.'s thought was a creative and innovative synthesis of philosophy and theology, Platonism and Aristotelianism, Christianity and paganism, and Hebraism and Hellenism in an effort to grasp the unity contained in all human intellectual and religious aspirations. On biblical studies per se, P. began writing a commentary on the Psalms (only published fragmentarily) and in 1489 published his Heptaplus, a commentary on Gen 1:1-27.

Works: Joannis Pici Mirandulae omnia opera (vita per Ioannem Franciscum) (1517); De hominis dignitate, Heptaplus, De ente et uno e scritti vari (ENCPI 1, ed. E. Garin, 1942); Ioannis Pici Mirandulae Expositiones in Psalmos (ed. A. Raspanti, 1997), Italian.

Bibliography: I. Abrahams, Hebrew Union College Jubilee Volume (1925) 317-31. G. dell'Aqua and L. Münster, "I rapporti di Giovanni Pico della Mirandola con alcuni filosofi ebrei," Convegno Internazionale (1965) 2:149-68. A. Dulles, Princeps Concordiae: Pico della Mirandola and the Scholastic Tradition (1941). H. Greive, "Die christliche Kabbala des Giovanni Pico della Mirandola," AKuG 57 (1975) 141-61. H. de Lubac, Pic de la Mirandole: Études et discussions (1974). E. Monnerjahn, Giovanni Pico della Mirandola: Ein Beitrag zur philosophischen Theologie des italienischen Humanismus (1960). G. de Napoli, Giovanii Pico della Mirandola e la problematica dottrinale del suo tempo (1965). F. Secret, "Nouvelles précisions sur Flavius Mithridates maître de Pic de la Mirandole et traducteur de commentaires de kabbale," Convegno Internationale (1965) 2:169-87. C. Trinkhaus, CE 3 (1987) 81-84. F. Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (1964) 84-116.

J. H. HAYES

PIEPENBRING, CHARLES (1840–1928)

An Alsatian biblical scholar and Reformed pastor, P. studied under E. REUSS at Strasbourg, where he received his Bacc. theol. degree in 1871, and served Reformed congregations at Fonday (1871–80) and Strasbourg (1880–1914). Although he never held an academic post, he published five major works and wrote a number of articles and reviews for the Revue de l'historie des religions that mediated the results of German biblical criticism to France.

P.'s first book (1886) was essentially a history of religion that followed the main outlines of Reuss's and J. WELLHAUSEN's views of the development of Israelite religion. The work championed the historical-critical method and attempted to show that the scientific study of the Bible enhanced its religious value. Received favorably, the French and English editions established P.'s reputation as a competent HB scholar; he was consequently invited to contribute reviews and articles to the Revue.

His history of Israel (1898) reflected the same developmental understanding of Israelite religion, beginning with primitive Hebrew religion and Moses and extending to the time of the Maccabees and the book of Daniel. Although thoroughly critical, it concluded with "reflections on criticism and faith," reiterating P.'s conviction that biblical criticism could be an asset to Christian faith.

P.'s work on the historical JESUS (1909), printed in the series Bibliothèque de critique religieuse, responded to A. LOISY's commentary on the Gospel of Luke. Accepting most of Loisy's critical conclusions, P. supplemented his reconstruction of Jesus' teaching. P. regarded the HB prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) as Jesus' "chief teachers" and believed Jesus' aim was to recover certain immutable religious values and teachings. He believed that Jesus did not regard himself as Messiah during his own lifetime but predicted that he would be Messiah in the future kingdom of God. P. also wrote on the differences among the genuine teachings of Jesus, Jewish Christianity, and Pauline Christianity (1911); and in La christologie biblique et ses origines, printed first in RHR, he set forth his christology and issued a call to the churches for religious reform.

Works: Théologie de l'Ancien Testament (1886; ET, Theology of the OT [1893]); Histoire du peuple d'Israël (1898); Jésus historique (1909, 1922²; ET, The Historical Jesus [1924]); Jésus et les Apôtres (1911); La christologie biblique et ses origines (1919).

Bibliography: "Biographical Note," The Historical Jesus (1924) 9-10. E. Jung, Dictionnaire du monde religieux dans la France contemporaine 2 (1987) 344. H. G. Mitchell, "Translator's Preface," Theology of the OT (1893) iii-vi.

M. P. GRAHAM

PIETISM

The most significant religious awakening within Protestantism following the Reformation era, Pietism was influenced by English Puritanism and by a number of early seventeenth-century Lutheran and Reformed authors concerned with the practical aspects of Christianity. The Pietist movement proper began in 1675 with the publication of P. J. SPENER's introduction to the postils of J. Arndt (1555–1621), entitled Pia desideria, or Heartfelt Desire for a God-pleasing Reform of the True Evangelical Church. The work went through a number of editions during the next several years. At the center of the Pietist program was a concern for the renewal of Christian life in individuals. People were called to repent of their evil past (Busse); experience a new birth in conversion (Wiedergeburt); and thereafter lead a practical Christian life of "heartfelt" daily devotion, meditation, Bible study, and social action directed toward holiness (Gottseeligkeit). The Pietist program at large was concerned with experiential and practical piety and thus opposed the reigning scholastic theology, which the Pietists believed overemphasized "correct" doctrine and a sterile orthodoxy in its interpretation of Scripture.

1. Pietist Beginnings. In the Pia desideria Spener outlined what he saw as the corrupt conditions of the church in his day and set forth proposals for improvement. First among these was the need for "a more extensive use of the Word of God." Bible reading should be carried out in every Christian family under the direction of the father (reading through the Bible from beginning to end) and in the church. In addition, small groups of reborn Christians (conventicles, or ecclesiolae in ecclesia) were to be organized, and within these groups Bible study was to be a primary concern. Such practices, Spener hoped, would help the growth of practical Christianity, overcome the polemically directed religious controversies of the time, and thus redirect what he saw as the primarily academic direction of pastoral education.

Like LUTHER, Spener insisted on a close relationship between the Holy Spirit and the Word and on the role of Scripture as its own interpreter; but Pietist interest in the new birth and in the life of the Spirit in the believer resulted in an emphasis on the enlightening action of the Spirit. This emphasis gave preeminence to the NT over the OT, and it found in the NT both directives for Christian life and historical examples against which individuals and Christian institutions were to be judged and on which they could be modeled. The directives and examples were often considered within the framework of the virtues of love and simplicity, and the resulting perfectionistic strain within Pietism implied to its enemies that it was Pelagian (see PELAGIUS) or at least synergistic.

2. The Growth of Pietism. By the close of the seventeenth century, Pietist principles had spread throughout almost all Protestant denominations in Germany, Switzerland, and the Lowlands and were carried to the Germanic and Dutch-speaking areas of North America (to which persecuted Pietists fled throughout the eighteenth century) as well as into Scandinavia. Following Spener's death in 1705, the central thrust of the movement was shaped by his colleague A. FRANCKE. At the University of Halle, Francke established numerous institutions for training pastors; for organizing missions, welfare concerns, and Bible study; and for publishing and disseminating Bibles and religious literature. He was aided in his work by a wealthy Brandenburg official, C. Hildebrand, who established a Bibelanstalt that published inexpensive copies of the NT and of the entire Bible. It is estimated that in the eighteenth century some three million copies were printed at Halle alone.

Francke was well known for his theoretical writings on HERMENEUTICS; his expositions of biblical books and passages; and his work on the biblical text, particularly on the revision of the Luther translation. Among his hermeneutical compositions the most important are the Manuductio ad lectionem Scripturae Sacrae (1693), in which he considered approaches to the "husk" of the text (historical, philological, and logical) and to the "seed" (exegetical, dogmatic, and practical); the Einleitung zur Lesung der Heiligen Schrift, insonderheit des Neuen Testaments (1694), in which he pointed out that the objective of reading the text and using external aids should be personal holiness (Seeligkeit); and a number of lectures and introductions, including a dissertation on Hebrew grammar and the Commentatio de scopo librorum Veteris et Novi Testamenti (1724), in which he developed his theory on Christ as the universal "scope" of the Scriptures and on the relationship between the literal and the "mystical" meanings of texts. He also attended closely to the problem of the text of the Bible both in the original languages and in German translation: He proposed an emendation of Luther's version in 1712, ten years after the new edition of the Greek NT (based on over one hundred manuscripts) appeared at Leipzig with Francke's foreword.

3. Radical Pietism. For a number of individuals the Spener-Francke group did not offer an extreme enough approach. These radical Pietists were often influenced by earlier ANABAPTIST, mystical Spiritualist, or Böhmist (see J. BÖHME) groups and/or broke off from established Lutheran and Reformed churches to establish independent bodies. Among them were highly learned individuals like G. ARNOLD, J. Dippel (1673–1734), and the mystically oriented G. Tersteegen (1697–1769). Tersteegen, in typical Pietist style, understood the Scriptures in a practical sense as expressing the laws of God, which provide the means for knowing Christ and living according to his way. Perhaps the most significant biblical work done by radicals was the eight-volume folio edition of the Berleberg Bible (1726–42), edited by J. Haug (d. 1753). Influential in radical circles in Europe and North America throughout the eighteenth century and into the nineteenth, this edition included an elaborate mystical and prophetic commentary (often comprising 80 percent of a page) that introduced Böhmist and Philadelphian interpretations.

4. Pietists in Württemberg and Saxony. Although Pietists in Württemberg were also attracted to mystical and millenarian interpretation, the most influential of these, J. BENGEL, took a much more critical approach to the text. A pioneer in TEXTUAL CRITICISM, Bengel provided in his massive Gnomon of the NT (1742; rev. ET 1857–58) a remarkably good historical and textual introduction to the NT while maintaining a typical Pietist interest in his readers' edification. Bengel's work reflected well his adage Te totum applica ad textum, textum totum applica ad te ("Apply yourself totally to the text; apply the text totally to yourself").

In Saxony yet another form of Pietism developed under the direction of N. Ludwig, Count ZINZENDORF, who had been strongly influenced by Halle Pietism both in his home and during his education at that university. In 1722 he gave protection to the persecuted remnant of the Bohemian Brethren on his estates, and throughout the rest of his life he played an influential role in the group's renewal. In 1734 Zinzendorf summed up his position on the Scriptures, designating them as the canon of faith, "completed by God for all matters relating to belief, and the rule and norm for all action, that is, whatever is necessary for us to gain salvation in knowledge and faith, and whatever pertains to living a life pleasing to God, leading a pious and holy life, or to the internal and external practice of Christians." Rejecting all suggestions that the Spirit speaks directly to believers on matters of faith and life through new revelations or illuminations aside from the Scriptures, he went on to emphasize that "the true interpretation of Scripture is a gift of the Holy Spirit" whose aid is needed "in every way beyond" hermeneutical rules.

The Pietist movement was highly influential from its inception, touching almost all Protestant traditions in its original form, in late eighteenth-century Neo-Pietist developments, and in the nineteenth-century renewal of the Great Awakening. Through Zinzendorf and the Moravians it had an impact on J. WESLEY and the Methodist movement; and it and can be seen as a forerunner of the revivalist, fundamentalist, and EVANGELICAL movements of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries in the United States.

Bibliography: K. Aland (ed.), Pietismus und Bibel (1970); "Der deutsche Pietismus als Wegbereiter für die Arbeit der Bibelgesellschaften," On Language, Culture, and Religion: In Honor of E. A. Nida (Approaches to Semiotics 56, ed. M. Black and W. A. Smalley, 1974) 3-21. M. Brecht et al. (eds.), Geschichte des Pietismus, vol. 1, Der Pietismus vom siebzehnten bis zum frühen achtzehnten Jahrhundert (1993–). P. C. Erb (ed. and tr.), Pietists: Selected Writings (CWS, 1983). M. Hofmann, Theologie und Exegese der Berleburger, 1725–46 (BFCT 39, 2, 1937). E. Peschke, "Zur Hermenutik A. H. Franckes," TLZ 89 (1964) 97-110. P. Schickentanz, C. Hindelbrand von Cansteins Beziehungen zu P. J. Spener (1967). P. J. Spener, Pia desideria (ed. K. Aland, 1964[3]; ET, ed. and tr. T. G. Tappert, 1964). F. E. Stoeffler, The Rise of Evangelical Pietism (SNumen 9, 1965); German Pietism During the Eighteenth Century (SNumen 24, 1973).

P. C. ERB

PIPER, OTTO ALFRED (1891–1982)

Born in Lichte, Germany, Nov. 29, 1891, P. studied at Jena, Marburg, Paris, and Göttingen, where he first began lecturing in 1920. In 1930 he was called to the chair of theology at the University of Münster as successor to K. BARTH. His opposition to Nazism eventually led to his imprisonment and exile from Germany. After three years at the University of Wales, he began teaching at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1937, a position he held until his retirement in 1962. He died in Princeton Feb. 12, 1982.

P. first wrote in the area of theology and ethics. However, his sense of God's action in history (Heilsgeschichte) led him to develop a biblical realism that held that biblical thought-forms and attitudes directly influence present Christian life (politics, sexuality, stewardship, and war and peace).

Works: Das religiöse Erlebnis: Eine kritische Analyse der Schleiermacherschen Reden über die Religion (1920); Weltliches Christentum: Eine Untersuchung über Wesen und Bedeutung der ausserkirchlichen Frömmigkeit der Gegenwart (1924); Theologie und Reine Lehre: Eine dogmatische Grundlegung von Wesen und Aufgabe protestantischer Theologie (1926); Die Grundlagen der evangelischen Ethik (2 vols., 1928–30); Gottes Wahrheit und die Wahrheit der Kirche (1934); Recent Developments in German Protestantism (1934); Sinn und Geheimnis der Geschlechter: Grundzuge einer evangelischen Sexualethik (1935); God in History (1939); The Christian Interpretation of Sex (1941); The Biblical View of Sex and Marriage (1960); The Christian Meaning of Money (1965); Protestantism in an Ecumenical Age: Its Root, Its Right, Its Task (1965).

Bibliography: W. Klassen and G. F. Snyder (eds.), Current Issues in NT Interpretation: Essays in Honor of O. A. P. (1962), bibliography of P.'s works, 247-60; The Princeton Seminary Bulletin 4 NS (1983) 52-55.

G. F. SNYDER

PLUMMER, ALFRED (1841–1926)

Born at Heworth, England, Feb. 17, 1841, P. studied for the Anglican ministry, taking degrees from Lancing and Exeter colleges, Oxford. In 1865 he was elected fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, where he was tutor and later dean until 1874, when he became master of University College, Durham, a post he held until 1902.

As a biblical interpreter P.'s style was harmonistic rather than critical. In his Cambridge Greek Testament volume on Mark, for example, he accepted traditional material on John Mark at face value and assumed that every mention of the name Mark in the NT referred to the author of the Second Gospel. Thus Mark's sources included Peter's preaching and Mark's own memories of JESUS' last week.

P.'s ICC volume on Luke takes the same approach, smoothing out differences between Luke, the other Synoptics, and John. His major critical concerns were the various multiple-document solutions to the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM popular during the period. He disagreed with most of these and held to a slightly modified version of B. STREETER's two source theory: Luke used a Proto-Mark almost equivalent to canonical Mark; Q was a set of documents held in common by Matthew and Luke, some of which were similar, but not identical to each other. Despite all this, P.'s commentaries, particularly Luke, are still cited because of the careful philological data they provide.

Works: A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to St. Luke (ICC, 1902[5]); (with A. Robertson), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the First Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians (ICC, 1911); A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Second Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians (ICC, 1915); Cambridge Greek Testament volumes on the Johannine epistles (1886), the Gospel of John (1877), Second Corinthians (1912), and the Gospel of Mark (1926).

R. B. VINSON

POCOCKE (POCOCK), EDWARD (1604–91)

Regius professor at Oxford, canon of Christ Church, and one of the most eminent orientalists of his day, P. was born Nov. 8, 1604, in Oxford. At age fourteen he entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford (1619), but transferred to Corpus Christi College (1620), graduating BA (1622) and MA (1626), and was elected a fellow (1628). He developed an interest in Semitic languages and studied with M. Pasor of Heidelberg, who had settled in Oxford, and with W. Bedwell, who is described as the only person in England at the time fluent in Arabic, the father of Arabic studies in England. Upon learning that L. DE DIEU (1590–1642) of Holland, with the assistance of D. HEINSIUS (1580–1655), had published a Syriac version of Revelation, P. prepared the Syriac text of 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, and Jude from a Bodleian Library manuscript (providing a transliteration into Hebrew, the Greek text, a Latin translation, and notes), completing what had remained unpublished of a Syriac version of the NT. Through the mediation of G. VOSSIUS (1577–1649), P.'s manuscript was carried to Leiden and published in 1629 by de Dieu.

Ordained in 1629, P. was appointed chaplain at an English factory in Aleppo (1630), which gave him opportunity to improve his Arabic and continue study of other Semitic languages (Hebrew, Syriac, Samaritan, and Ethiopic). He procured manuscripts through friendships with learned Jews and Muslims and translated several Arabic works and Meydani's collection of 6,013 proverbs (unpublished). Appointed by Bishop Laud to a new professorship of Arabic at Oxford (1636), P. returned with Arabic, Hebrew, Ethiopic, and Armenian manuscripts as well as a copy of the Samaritan Pentateuch.

In 1648 after being made professor of Hebrew at Oxford, P. was temporarily suspended because of his royalist sympathies but held the position with the help of learned independents. The following year he published his Specimen historiae Arabum, which contained a translation of an excerpt from the universal history of Bar Hebraeus and studies on Arabic history, literature, science, and religion based on numerous Arabic manuscripts. The work marked a new stage in Arabic studies. He also worked on and contributed manuscripts for the London POLYGLOT. With the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, he was able to carry on his career uninhibited by political crossfire. He died Sept. 10, 1691.

Throughout his career P. was held in high honor as an orientalist and was consulted by numerous scholars. His work established Arabic studies as an academic discipline in England, and students from several countries came to Oxford to study under him. He wrote commentaries on Micah and Malachi (1677), Hosea (1685), and Joel (1691) for a commentary on the HB planned by J. FELL, dean of Christ Church. In these works he took a rather conservative posture toward the text, offered new translations, and utilized Syriac, Arabic, and other Semitic languages in elucidating the text. His commentary on Hosea is one of the finest ever produced and is a mine of philological comments and of the history of the interpretation of the various passages.

Works: The Theological Works of the Learned Dr. P. (2 vols., ed. L. Twells, 1740), contains several works including his commentaries on Micah (1:i-xi, 1-100), Malachi (1:101-206), Joel (1:207-364), and Hosea (2:1-721), as well as his work Porta Mosis: Sive, Dissertationes aliquot (1655) on the first six discourses on the Mishnah by Maimonides. Variae lectiones Arabicae Veteris Testamenti on Arabic translations of the HB appears in vol. 6 of the London Polyglot (80 pp.).

Bibliography: BB (1760) 3370-85. P. M. Holt, "The Study of Arabic Historians in Seventeenth-Century England: The Background and the Work of E. P.," BSO(A)S 19 (1957) 444-55. S. Lane-Poole, DNB 46 (1896) 7-12. MSHH 21 (1733) 404-11. L. Twells, "Life," The Theological Works of the Learned Dr. P. (2 vols., ed. L. Twells, 1740) 1:1-84 = Lives of E. P., the Celebrated Orientalist, by Dr. Twells; of Z. Pearce.... (2 vols. 1816) 1:1-356.

J. H. HAYES

POETRY, HEBREW BIBLE

Poetry is notoriously difficult to define; and so it is not surprising that it has not always been clear—nor is it now—what constitutes biblical poetry. The Bible sometimes employes terms like šîr, mizmôr, and qînâ in reference to songs, hymns, and laments, respectively; but these terms are lacking in many passages that have been deemed poetry by later interpreters. That is to say, the Bible seems to recognize some forms of poetry; but its terminology, and therefore presumably its literary concepts, does not correlate exactly with the modern literary genre of poetry. This article will offer a sketch of the major trends in the identification and analysis of biblical poetry from the post-biblical period to the present.

1. The Graphic Presentation of Poems. There is a scribal tradition, witnessed in manuscripts from Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), in medieval Masoretic manuscripts, and in Talmudic references, of setting off certain poems from the discourse surrounding them. Two visual patterns were used. One is, in rabbinic terminology, "small brick over large brick, large brick over small"—that is, an interlocking construction diagrammed either as:

or as:

The other is "small brick over small, large over large," producing two columns with space between them:

The poems most often presented in one or the other of these graphic forms are Exod 15:1-18; Deuteronomy 32; Judges 5; and 2 Samuel 22. In some manuscripts many more texts are written stichographically, including the books of Psalms, Proverbs, Job, and occasionally Lamentations. Although the writing appears to be stichometric, a line of writing does not always correspond to a poetic line, so that while this scribal tradition may be helpful in adducing what the ancients considered to be poetry, it does not necessarily preserve structural or metrical features of the poems. It is even questionable whether the scribes intended to indicate poetry per se by the use of these patterns, for they also used the second pattern for lists like the kings of Canaan (Josh 12:9-24) and the sons of Haman (Esth 9:7-9). Perhaps these patterns were intended to set off through visual means texts that were in some way felt to be different from what surrounded them, but it is not clear why only certain poems and lists were marked in this manner.

With the advent of printing, the convention changed. Most printed Masoretic Bibles abandoned the stichographic presentation of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job and preserved only those passages the TALMUD required to be written stichographically: the Song of the Sea (Exod 15:1-18), the Song of Deborah (Judges 5), and the lists in Joshua 12 and Esther 9.

Modern scholarly editions of the Bible have reversed this trend. In Biblia Hebraica and Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, not only are the traditionally stichographic sections so printed but in addition everything considered poetic by modern standards, including the speeches of the classical prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and small "poems" within narratives, like 1 Sam 15:22-23, is printed stichographically.

2. The Masoretic Accents. In the Tiberian Masorah the books of Psalms, Proverbs, and Job are accented differently from the other twenty-one books of the HB. It is not clear whether this is a generic distinction or whether the accents have to do only with cantillation. Some scholars feel that some information about poetic meter may be recoverable from the accentual system.

The evidence from ancient times, as preserved in manuscripts and in the Masorah, is inconsistent and inconclusive regarding the recognition of poetry. Yet there arose early in the history of biblical interpretation the notion that the Bible contains poetry. Its definition and description varied from time to time and place to place depending on the investigator's own cultural milieu and stance vis-à-vis the Bible.

3. The Influence of Classical Poetry and Rhetoric. The spread of Greek culture into the Jewish world (and the spread of Jews into the Greek world) inevitably brought readers of the Bible into contact with the Greek idea of poiesis, which was then superimposed onto the Bible. Themes and subjects considered proper to Greek poetry were found to be poetic in the Bible as well; and meter, well defined and developed by the Greeks, was ascribed to biblical poems. The leading exponents of this approach were PHILO and JOSEPHUS, who sought to interpret the Bible as a whole in a way meaningful to a Hellenistic audience.

The early church, which adopted the allegorical method of interpretation prevalent in the Greek period, also adopted much of the appreciation of Greek poetic forms. Church fathers (Origen, Eusebius, and others) spoke of poetic meter and tropes in connection with the psalms and with pericopes like Deuteronomy 32. JEROME, who was schooled in and admired Latin poetry, found its features, especially meter, to be present in, indeed surpassed by, the poetry of the Bible. THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA noted the rhetorical use of certain types of repetition or parallelism, and AUGUSTINE spoke of meter and poetic figures in the Bible. To be sure, much of the church fathers' discussions of biblical poetry was designed to neutralize the tension between the attraction to and the rejection of secular (i.e., pagan) literature and to overcome the perceived lack of aesthetic appeal of the Bible (as judged by classical standards). Nevertheless, this early focus on meter and certain tropes that were later subsumed under parallelism represents a sustained effort at poetic analysis.

4. Medieval Jewish Commentaries. Although early Christian interpreters had no difficulty in seeing rhetorical tropes and figures in the Bible, their rabbinic contemporaries largely ignored these stylistic aspects. This silence regarding biblical poetry continued, for the most part, in the medieval Jewish commentaries, not so much due to literary ignorance as to different HERMENEUTIC principles. For Jewish exegetes every word of Scripture had its own significance; words and phrases were never just "decorative" stylistic devices but always bore some specific meaning. This interpretive approach had the effect of limiting the recognition and analysis of poetry. Medieval Jewish commentators did not seek to distinguish literary genres, let alone to define the essential features of poetry. Nevertheless, one does find among some commentators, especially those from the Sephardic communities, an awareness of stylistic and poetic matters. A. IBN EZRA and Rashbam (see SAMUEL BEN MEIR), the grandson of RASHI and a leading Ashkenazic authority, noted that a certain amount of repetition and/or parallelism was stylistic and did not necessarily add new information. ABRAVANEL, in his commentary on Exodus 15 and Isaiah 5, discussed at some length the types of biblical poems.

5. The Influence of Arabic and Medieval Hebrew Poetry. It is not so much in exegetical works as in separate philosophical and rhetorical treatises that one finds the medieval and Renaissance Jewish perceptions of biblical poetry. These treatises, written by Jews living in the Arab world, reflect the influence of the flourishing tradition of Arabic and medieval Hebrew poetry. Among them are the works of SAADIA Gaon, JUDAH HALEVI, and Moses ibn Habib. The only major work devoted entirely to Hebrew poetics is Moses ibn Ezra's Kitab al-Muḥādarâ wa al-Mudhākarâ, which is concerned mostly with the poetry of his day; but it was only natural that the features valued in Arabic rhetoric and also in medieval Hebrew poetry should be sought in the Bible. They were not always found, however. Ibn Ezra stated that the only poetry in the Bible is Psalms, Job, and Proverbs (the books with a special system of Masoretic accents) and that even these lack meter and rhyme, the two basic characteristics of Arabic poetry. As for stylistic repetition in the Bible, he apologetically noted that it is not bad style in the Bible, even though it was not acceptable in Arabic rhetoric. Jewish writers like ibn Ezra did not feel the same conflict between secular poetry and holy Scripture as the church fathers did, but they strove to prove the superiority of Hebrew poetry to Arabic poetry and of biblical style to the style of the Quran (see QURANIC AND ISLAMIC INTERPRETATION).

It was not only the existence of vibrant contemporary poetic activity that impelled the search for poetry in the Bible. There was also the existence of the biblical term šîr, "song," which was equated with Arabic shi'r, "poetry"; the stichographic writing of certain biblical passages; and the Talmudic references to ten biblical songs. This meant that there must be poetry in the Bible. The problem was to identify it and to explain what made it poetic. Several types of answers were given: Poetry consisted of figurative language; biblical poetry originally had meter, but it was lost; šîr means something sung and does not imply meter; biblical poems do have meter in the sense that the lines are divided into two parts (like Arabic poems), even though the parts do not correspond in terms of long and short syllables (see J. Kugel [1981] 187-200).

These conclusions sound remarkably modern; indeed, they are still being put forth by some contemporary scholars. However, an important part of the modern definition of biblical poetry was yet to come. It was heralded by the work of Azariah dei Rossi.

6. Azariah dei Rossi. An Italian rabbi, dei Rossi exemplifies Renaissance scholarship. The citations in his Meor Enayim (1573) reflect his wide-ranging knowledge of religious and secular literature, including classical and early Christian authors as well as rabbinic texts and the works of the Jewish scholars of medieval Spain. He agreed that the Bible contained poetry and that the poetry was metrical; according to his innovative definition of metrical, however, the meter of biblical poems was not based on the number of syllabic feet, but rather on the number of "ideas" or thought-units in each sentence or clause. Exempting certain words (like the introductory "he said" in Deut 32:20) from the metrical count, he found a general regularity in the number of ideas in the two halves of a verse and also saw that this number could change throughout the poem. Although he did not make extraordinary claims for his system—he admitted that it failed to fit numerous verses—it became one of the forerunners to studies of parallelism (it was known to R. Lowth through J. Buxtorf's translation, appended to his Liber Cosri) and also anticipated systems of thought-unit meter.

7. Christian Schoettgen. Another of LOWTH's precursors was Schoettgen, who in his Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae (1733) laid down a series of rules relating to exergasia, the trope in which sentences with the same meaning are joined together (later known as parallelism). The prominence given to parallelism as opposed to meter and the categories corresponding to "synonymous" and "antithetic" are harbingers of Lowth, while the analysis of forms with ellipses and/or additions anticipates G. GRAY's "complete," "incomplete," and "with/without compensation" forms of parallelism (1915, repr. 1972). But although Schoettgen's view of parallelism was extremely sophisticated, he considered parallelism to be a trope of Hebrew rhetoric, not a basic structural feature of poetry.

8. Robert Lowth. The work of Lowth is generally taken as the starting point in the modern study of biblical poetry. His main contribution was his definition and analysis of parallelismus membrorum in his De sacra poesi hebraeorum (Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews [1753]) and Isaiah: A New Translation with a Preliminary Dissertation and Notes, Critical, Philological, and Exegetical (1778). The introductory chapter of the latter work contains his definition of parallelism, which has become classic: "The correspondence of one Verse, or Line, with another I call Parallelism. When a proposition is delivered, and a second is subjoined to it, or drawn under it, equivalent, or contrasted with it in Sense; or similar to it in the form of Grammatical Construction; these I call Parallel Lines; and the words or phrases answering one to another in the corresponding Lines Parallel Terms" (see Lecture 19 of Lectures).

Lowth subdivided parallelism into three types: synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic. In synonymous parallelism the same sense is expressed in different, but equivalent, terms as in Ps 114:1:

> When Israel went out from Egypt, > the house of Jacob from a strange people.

In antithetic parallelism "a thing is illustrated by its contrary being opposed to it" as in Prov 27:6:

> The blows of a friend are faithful;
> But the kisses of an enemy are treacherous.

Synthetic parallelism consists of similar constructions or a general correspondence of the lines but not a correspondence between all of the terms. Ecclesiastes 11:2 illustrates:

> Give a portion to seven, and also to eight;
> For you do not know what evil shall be upon the earth.

As a result of Lowth's lectures, the study of poetry shifted from the search for meter to the analysis of parallelism. This is not to say that meter was forgotten (Lowth thought that Hebrew poetry had meter but that it was irretrievable), but just that the analysis of parallelism proved more rewarding. Another important contribution by Lowth, which grew out of his concentration on parallelistic expression, was his inclusion of prophetic speech in the genre of poetry.

9. Modern Influences on the Study of Poetry. The study of biblical poetry has usually meant the study of its formal features. But first should be mentioned, however briefly, some of the trends in biblical studies and in LITERARY criticism that have shaped the general stance on poetry and determined which of its aspects were to be examined.

Lowth is included among the Romantics—those whose historical research and critical examination did not prevent them from elevating the imaginative and emotional side of literary expression. For them Hebrew poetry was "sublime"—a term Lowth used repeatedly and defined as "that force of composition . . . which strikes and overpowers the mind, which excites the passions and which expresses ideas at once with perspicuity and elevation" (Lecture 14). The authors of this poetry led a simple pastoral life unencumbered by the "studies and pursuits" of later civilizations (Lecture 7) and thus epitomized the "natural man" idealized in the Romantic period. As for the place of biblical poetry in the study of the history of literature, "the sacred Poetry is undoubtedly entitled to the first rank in this school since from it we are to learn both the origin of the art and how to estimate its excellence" (Lecture 2). Similar thoughts were expressed by Lowth's more influential German contemporary J. G. HERDER in his Vom Geist der ebraischen Poesie (1782). Lowth's lectures, which had inspired Herder, were published in a German translation together with Herder's book in 1793. This attitude toward Hebrew poetry continued in the work of early nineteenth-century scholars and is witnessed in numerous commentaries on Psalms produced during this period.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, a new emphasis can be discerned. The interest in evolutionary development quickened in this post-Darwinian age, and earlier stages were viewed as more "primitive" than later ones. Since most biblicists were also orientalists—i.e., knowledgeable in Arabic and often travelers to the Middle East—and, in addition, were influenced by the newly emerging disciplines of linguistics and FOLKLORE, they could not resist comparisons between "primitive Hebrews" and the Arab culture they witnessed. The comparisons pertained to philology as well as to what T. CHEYNE called "comparative ethnic-psychology." As J. WELLHAUSEN put it: "I have no doubt that the original gifts and ideas of the Primitive Hebrews can most readily be understood by comparing Arabian antiquity" (quoted in Cheyne [1893] 73). The late Victorian view of Hebrew poetry is perhaps best summed up by G. A. SMITH in the 1910 Schweich lectures (pub. 1912): "All these facts of the language and syntax warn us not to expect in Hebrew poetry the regular, intricate and delicate metres of the Aryan styles. We are dealing with a people originally nomadic and to the end unskilled in architecture or any elaborate art. The essential looseness of their life, visible in their language, was bound to affect the highest achievements of their literature. When they did concentrate their minds on utterance, their earnestness would appear less in a passion for beauty than in a sense of urgency and responsibility. Israel was a people of prophets rather than poets" (10). Gone here is the celebration of the simple life and the Hebrew poetic genius.

One cannot discuss the history of the study of biblical poetry without mentioning the work of H. GUNKEL on Psalms (1926, 1933). Gunkel, the father of FORM CRITICISM, was sensitive to the Bible's literary aspects. He proposed a new classification system for the psalms that was to replace the Greek types (lyric, didactic, elegiac, etc.) widely used until then. Based on their content and to some extent on formulaic phrases, five main types of psalms plus a number of subtypes and mixed types were isolated. The main types were hymn, community lament, individual lament, individual thanksgiving song, and royal psalm. Form criticism aims to understand a work in relation to its original life setting, and so this approach stimulated studies of the place of the psalms in Israel's worship, along with a continued interest in the dating of the psalms and other poetry. In addition, because it was intent on finding generic patterns and formulas, it promoted the discovery of recurring phrases and usages and the analysis of the structure of poems.

While form criticism sought the common elements in various poems, RHETORICAL CRITICISM shifted the emphasis to the distinctive usages in each poem. In a separate but similar move, those more familiar with literary criticism applied the approaches of New Criticism and Werkinterpretation, especially the technique of close reading. This produced a number of significant studies of biblical poetry and literary analyses of poetic texts. Notable are those by M. Weiss (1962), L. Alonso-Schökel (1963), and R. Alter (1985). These works not only advanced the interpretation of biblical poetry but also were important landmarks in the rise of literary approaches to the entire Bible. Concurrently, the following theories of oral composition and structural linguistics influenced the study of biblical poetry.

10. Post-Lowthian Descriptions of the Formal Features of Biblical Poetry. The recognition of poetry implies distinguishing it from other forms of literary discourse on the basis of formal criteria. Biblical poetry, at least since the time of Lowth, has been perceived as consisting of two formal features: meter and parallelism. Various descriptions give prominance to one or the other, but both are usually present to some degree. Both require the identification of the poetic line or set of lines (cola). Meter measures units within a line; parallelism describes the relationship between lines.

a. Meter. It has been difficult, if not impossible, for many scholars to conceive of poetry (or, more properly, verse) without meter; but what exactly was to be metered, or measured, in biblical poetry has rarely met with scholarly consensus. Numerous systems have been proposed, each differing from the others in some manner; in general they fall into one of three groups: accentual meter, syllabic meter, or word/thought-unit meter.

Accentual meter is the system advocated by J. Ley, E. Sievers (1901), and K. BUDDE (1882). This system counts only accented syllables, ignoring unaccented ones. Budde's contribution was the identification of qînâ meter, a line of three accented syllables followed by a line of two accented syllables, which is characteristic of laments.

The system in which all syllables are counted regardless of their length is syllabic meter. Associated with W. F. ALBRIGHT and his students F. M. CROSS and D. N. FREEDMAN (1975), this system often involves the reconstruction of the original (pre-Masoretic) pronunciation. A combination of accentual and syllabic meter is alternating meter, proposed by S. Segert (1953, 1957), in which all syllables are counted and the stress is placed on the primary and secondary natural tones. The meter is then found to be one of alternating off/on stresses. None of these metric systems produced a scansion that was consistent throughout a poem or body of poems.

Another group of scholars subordinated meter to parallelism. They found that such meter as existed was really the rhythmic effect created by virtue of the fact that each set of lines (usually forming a parallelism) contained roughly the same number of thought-units or word-units. Thus a system of phonologic regularities, i.e., meter, was seen as deriving from semantic factors rather than from purely phonological ones. This is reminiscent of dei Rossi.

Two newer approaches to the question of meter deserve mention. Both introduce syntax into the search for meter and are thereby witnesses to the growing influence of linguistics on the study of biblical poetry. J. Kurylowicz has suggested that each word-complex, as defined by grammatical criteria, has one metrically significant accent. This is called the accentus dominus. Other accented syllables, called accenti servi, are subordinate. Kurylowicz's system replaces the semantic criteria of thought-unit meter with grammatical criteria. It also differentiates between accented syllables that are metrically significant and those that are not, thereby distinguishing meter, which constitutes a special use of phonology, from the general phonological workings of Hebrew.

In a step even farther removed from the measuring of phonological features, M. O'Connor (1980) has replaced the notion of meter with a system of syntactic constraints by which he defines a line of poetry. He finds that no line contains more than three clause predicators; no line contains fewer than one or more than four consitutents (verb or nominal phrase plus dependent particles); and no line contains fewer than two or more than five units (individual verb or noun plus dependent particles). This description views syntactic regularity as primary and phonologic regularity as secondary. If Kurylowicz can be said to have replaced thought-units with grammatical units, O'Connor can be said to have replaced phonologic measurement with syntactic measurement.

b. Parallelism. Parallelism is often drawn into the search for meter, but it can and should be divorced from it, although not from the description of poetry as a whole. Since Lowth, it has been recognized as the dominant characteristic of biblical poetry; and the analysis of it, until the last decades of the twentieth century, derived directly from Lowth's definition and typology. The correspondence of line with line and word with word of which Lowth spoke was generally understood as sameness or identity by most of Lowth's successors, so the emphasis was put on the synonymity or redundancy in parallelism. At the same time closer inspection showed that within, or in addition to, Lowth's three major categories other categories could be found. Gray introduced the terms "complete" and "incomplete" parallelism "with or without compensation" to describe the lack of exact identity in some parallel terms. Others noted various structural types, e.g., chiastic parallelism, staircase parallelism, emblematic parallelism, janus parallelism. The typologies describing the relationship between parallel lines became more and more refined.

Emphasis turned from the lines to the terms in the wake of the discovery of Ugaritic poetry (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE) and the ascendency of the Parry-Lord theory of oral composition. It was noticed that Ugaritic poetry used many of the same sets of parallel terms that were found in the Bible, e.g., day/night, gold/silver, heaven/earth. Those sets of recurring words came to be known as "fixed word pairs" and were thought to be the functional equivalents of the formulas in Homeric and Yugoslavian poetry as discovered by Parry and Lord, i.e., the device that made oral composition possible. Lists of these pairs were collected, their frequency and the order of their members tabulated, and the semantic relationships between them analyzed. (Noteworthy is the "break-up of stereotyped phrases," first identified by E. Melamed [1961], in which a conventional phrase is divided over two parallel lines.) The bibliography on word pairs is extensive, with the names of M. DAHOOD and several Israeli scholars prominent (see Dahood's lists in Ras Shamra Parallels [1972–81] and Y. Avishur [1984]). In fact, most standard descriptions of biblical poetry from 1950 to 1980 include some discussion of word pairs.

The analyses of parallel lines and parallel word pairs represent increasingly complex typologies to categorize surface variations of underlying synonymity. A shift in perception began to be noticeable around 1980: Emphasis was put on the difference in parallel lines rather than on their sameness. J. Kugel (1981) rejected the notion of the synonymity of parallel lines, replacing it with the notion of continuity, which he expressed as "A, what's more, B." Alter, in a similar vein, spoke of the "consequentiality" of parallel lines. Parallel lines now came to be seen as adding new information containing an intensification or a progression rather than just repeating the same thought in different words. To be sure, the idea of difference or lack of redundancy in parallelism has ancient (especially Jewish) antecedents and is not altogether absent from Lowth's and Gray's discussions; but scholars had by and large lost sight of it.

Contemporaneous with but independent of the shift away from Lowthian approaches by Kugel and Alter came the introduction of linguistic models for the study of biblical parallelism (analogous to those of Kurylowicz and O'Connor for meter). A number of scholars offered grammatical analyses of parallelism (A. Berlin [1985]; T. Collins [1978]; S. Geller [1979]; E. Greenstein [1982]; M. O'Connor, D. Pardee [1988]; W. Watson) in which the relationship between parallel lines is described in terms of syntax instead of semantics. The influence of structural linguistics and especially of R. Jakobson is evident.

The most comprehensive of these studies is Berlin's since it involves not only grammar but also other linguistic aspects. Berlin views parallelism as a linguistic phenomenon involving equivalences and/or contrasts on the level of the word and/or the line. The linguistic aspects that are activated are the grammatical, the lexical, the semantic, and the phonological. In the grammatical aspect the syntax of the lines is equivalent (but not necessarily identical), i.e., the deep structures are the same. On the level of the word the grammatical aspect involves the use of terms that are from different morphological classes but fill the same syntactic function, or terms from the same morphological class that may manifest a constrast in gender, number, verbal form, etc. The lexical aspect is concerned with word pairs, which are seen here as the products of normal word association and are analyzable according to linguistic rules derived from word association games and experiments. The semantic aspect relates to the relationship between the meaning of the parallel lines, which Berlin analyzes as being either paradigmatic or syntagmatic. She finds tension or balance between the synonymity and the difference in the meaning of the lines—both being present to some degree. (This mediates between the position of the Lowth school on the one hand, and Kugel and Alter, on the other hand.) The phonologic aspect is activated in cases where terms with similar sounds or consonants are paired. Berlin's study is an attempt to present a unified linguistic explanation for all the phenomena subsumed under parallelism.

c. The absence of "prose particles." Although parallelism is an important dimension of biblical poetry, it cannot in and of itself serve to identify a poem since non-poetic discourse also contains parallelism. In addition, the existence of a metrical system or systems, sought for centuries, has proved to be a will-o'-the-wisp. In other words, the two generally acknowledged formal features of biblical poetry have not yielded sufficiently objective criteria for the identification of poetry. For this reason a few scholars have tried a different approach. It has been known at least since 1910 (see G. A. Smith, 11) that certain words and particles (the definite article, the relative pronoun 'ašer, the particle 'ēt) appear less frequently in poetry. Modern computer technology now makes the actual counting of these particles relatively easy, and their occurrence in the Bible has been tabulated (see F. Andersen and A. Forbes [1983]). This tabulation often confirms our intuition about what is to be labeled a poem and may indeed provide an objective basis for defining poetry. Unfortunately, it has as yet little to say about the nature of poetry or how it is to be analyzed.

d. Other rhetorical features. Much of the world's poetry utilizes an array of tropes and figures, and the Bible is no exception. Biblical poetry employs imagery, repetition, chiasm, inclusio, assonance, and so forth. Some of these, like chiasm, have been studied extensively; others, like metaphor, could benefit from more sophisticated treatment. There have also been efforts to analyze poetic structures and patterning above the level of the line or bicolon. A summary of poetic structures and figures, including an extensive bibliography, is found in Watson (1983).

In large measure, the study of biblical poetry is conditioned by the time and place of those who study it; yet certain observations seem to recur in almost every period, albeit couched in different frames of reference. The long-standing interest in biblical poetry has produced a fascinating chapter in the history of biblical interpretation.

Bibliography: L. Alonso-Schökel, Estudios de poética hebrea (1963); A Manual of Hebrew Poetics (1988). R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (1985). F. I. Andersen and A. D. Forbes, " 'Prose Particle' Counts of the HB," The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth (ed. C. L. Meyers and M. O'Connor, 1983) 165-83. Y. Avishur, Stylistic Studies of Word-pairs in Biblical and Ancient Semitic Literatures (1984). A. Baker, "Parallelism: England's Contribution to Biblical Studies," CBQ 35 (1973) 429-40. A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (1985); Biblical Poetry Through Medieval Jewish Eyes (1991); "Introduction to Hebrew Poetry," NIB (1996) 4:301-15. D. Broadribb, "A Historical Review of Studies of Hebrew Poetry," Abr-Nahrain 13 (1972–73) 66-87. K. Budde, "Das hebräische Klagelied," ZAW 2 (1882) 1-51; Die Segen Moses (1922). G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (1980). U. Cassuto, Biblical and Oriental Studies (2 vols., 1973–75). T. K. Cheyne, Founders of OT Criticism: Biographical, Descriptive, and Critical Studies (1893). T. Collins, Lineforms in Hebrew Poetry: A Grammatical Approach to the Stylistic Study of the Hebrew Prophets (1978). A. M. Cooper, "Biblical Poetics: A Linguistic Approach" (diss., Yale Theological Seminary, 1976). F. M. Cross and D. N. Freedman, Studies in Ancient Yahwistic Poetry (1975). R. C. Culley, Oral Formulaic Language in the Biblical Psalms (1967). M. Dahood, Psalms (3 vols., AB 16, 17, 17A, 1965–70); "Ugaritic-Hebrew Parallel Pairs," Ras Shamra Parallels 1 (ed. L. Fisher, 1972)

71-382; 2 (1975) 1-39; 3 (ed. S. Rummel, 1981) 1-206. H. Fisch, Poetry with a Purpose (1988). D. N. Freedman, Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy: Studies in Early Hebrew Poetry (1980). W. R. Garr, "The qinah: A Study of Poetic Meter, Syntax, and Style," ZAW 95 (1983) 54-75. S. Geller, Parallelism in Early Biblical Poetry (1979). E. S. Gerstenberger, "The Lyrical Literature," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 409-44. S. Gevirtz, Patterns in the Early Poetry of Israel (1963). J. Gluck, "Assonance in Ancient Hebrew Poetry: Sound Patterns as a Literary Device," De Fructu Oris Sui: Essays in Honour of A. van Selms (ed. I. H. Eybers et al., 1971) 69-84. R. Gordis, "The Structure of Biblical Poetry," Poets, Prophets, and Sages: Essays in Biblical Interpretation (1971) 61-94. G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry Considered with Special Reference to the Criticism and Interpretation of the OT (1915, repr. 1972). E. L. Greenstein, "How Does Parallelism Mean?" A Sense of Text (JQRS, 1982) 41-70. D. Grossberg, Centripetal and Centrifugal Structures in Biblical Poetry (1989). H. Gunkel, Die Psalmen (1926); Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel (1933; ET 1998). J. G. Herder, Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie: Eine Anleitung für die Liebhaber derselben und der ältesten Geschichte des menschlichen Geistes (1782). B. Hrushovski, "Prosody, Hebrew," EncJud 13 (1971) 1195-203. H. Kosmala, "Form and Structure in Ancient Hebrew Poetry," VT 14 (1964) 423-45; 16 (1966) 152-80. J. Krasovec, Antithetic Structure in Biblical Hebrew Poetry (VTSup 35, 1984). J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (1981). J. Kurylowicz, Studies in Semitic Grammar and Metrics (1972); Metrick und Sprachgeschichte (1975). J. Ley, Grundzuge des Rhythmus des Vers- und Strophenbaues in der hebräischen Poesie (1875); Die metrischen Formen der hebräischen Poesie (1886); Leitfaden der Metrik der hebräischen Poesie nebst dem ersten buche der Psalmen nach rhythmischer Vers- und Strophenabteilung mit metrischer Analyse (1887). T. Longman, "A Critique of Two Recent Metrical Systems," Bib 63 (1982) 230-54. J. R. Lundbom, Jeremiah: A Study in Ancient Hebrew Rhetoric (1975). E. Z. Melamed, "Break-up of Stereotype Phrases," ScrHier 8 (1961) 115-53. A. di Marco, "Der Chiasmus in der Bibel," LB 36 (1975) 21-79; 37 (1976) 49-68. J. C. de Moor, "The Art of Versification in Ugarit and Israel," Studies in Bible and the Ancient Near East Presented to S. Loewenstamm on His Seventieth Birthday (ed. Y. Avishur and J. Blau, 1978) 119-39; "II: The Formal Structure," UF 10 (1978) 187-217; "III: Further Illustrations of the Principle of Expansion," UF 12 (1980) 311-15. J. Muilenburg, "A Study in Hebrew Rhetoric: Repetition and Style," (VTSup 1, 1953) 97-111; "Poetry," EncJud 13 (1971) 670-81. M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (1980). D. Pardee, "Ugaritic and Hebrew Metrics," Ugaritic in Retrospect: Fifty Years of Ugarit and Ugaritic (ed. G. D. Young, 1981) 113-30; Ugaritic and Hebrew Poetic Parallelism: A Trial Cut (1988). S. Parker, "Parallelism and Prosody in Ugaritic Narrative Verse," UF 6 (1974) 283-94. T. H. Robinson, The Poetry of the OT (1947); "Hebrew Poetic Form: The English Tradition," (SVT 1, 1953) 128-49. R. Sappan, The Typical Features of the Syntax of Biblical Poetry in Its Classical Period (1981), Hebrew. G. M. Schramm, "Poetic Patterning in Biblical Hebrew," Michigan Oriental Studies in Honor of G. G. Cameron (ed. L. Orlin, 1976) 167-91. S. Segert, "Vorarbeiten zur hebräischen Metrik," ArOr 21 (1953) 481-542; 25 (1957) 190-200. E. Sievers, Metrische Studien, vol. 1, Studien zur hebräischen Metrik (1901); vol. 2, Die Hebräischen Genesis (1904). G. A. Smith, The Early Poetry of Israel in Its Physical and Social Origins (1910); 1910 Schweich Lectures (1912). D. Stuart, Studies in Early Hebrew Meter (1976). W. G. E. Watson, "Trends in the Development of Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Comparative Study," UF 14 (1982) 265-77; Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (1983). W. R. Watters, Formula Criticism and Poetry of the OT (BZAW 138, 1976). M. Weiss, The Bible from Within (1962; ET 1984). P. Yoder, "A–B Pairs and Oral Composition in Hebrew Poetry," VT 21 (1971) 470-89.

A. BERLIN

POLYGLOTS

Polyglot Bibles printed the text of the Bible in three or more languages, usually in parallel columns for the purpose of comparison. Most included the text in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin for the HB and Greek and Latin for the NT, and occasionally a modern language. The scope of these works varied from the complete Bible, including the deuterocanonicals, to a single testament or book (usually Psalms); and their usefulness for exegesis was frequently enhanced by the inclusion of a variety of study aids, like maps, genealogical charts, diagrams, introductions to biblical books, dictionaries, grammars, and critical apparatuses. The predecessors of polyglot Bibles were editions of the Hebrew scripture with a TRANSLATION in Aramaic, Greek, Arabic, Persian, or some European language alongside the Hebrew text. In Christian circles, editions of the Bible had been published with the text in both Greek and Latin or, during the Middle Ages, the VULGATE with a vernacular interlinear.

The four great polyglots of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Complutensian, Antwerp, Paris, and London) eclipsed all others. The Complutensian Polyglot (6 vols., 1522) printed the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin texts of the HB in parallel columns with the TARGUM of the Pentateuch and its Latin translation at the foot of the page. The Greek column included a Latin interlinear, and a system of letters keyed the Vulgate to the Hebrew text. The NT, which was already printed in 1514, two years before ERASMUS's edition of the Greek NT, was presented in parallel columns of Greek and Latin keyed to one another. F. JIMÉNEZ of Spain conceived and funded the project, and D. de ZÚÑIGA (Stunica) supervised a staff of several additional scholars. The work was intended to make the texts in their original languages accessible to theologians so that the latter could "drink of that water which springs up to eternal life at the fountain-head itself" (prologue, v. 1). Received enthusiastically, it served as the textual basis for several later polyglots.

The printer C. Plantin resolved to issue a corrected edition of the Complutensian Polyglot and enlisted the support of Philip II of Spain, who appointed B. Arias Montanus and a group of Spanish, Belgian, and French scholars for the task. The product of their work, the Antwerp Polyglot (8 vols., 1572), moved beyond the Complutensian Polyglot by adding the Targum for the rest of the books in the HB (except Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1–2 Chronicles) and by supplying the Syriac text—printed once in Syriac and once in Hebrew characters—for the NT. The editors relied heavily on the Complutensian Polyglot for text and format. Unfortunately, many copies of the work were lost at sea in transit to Spain.

The Paris Polyglot (9 vols., 1645) was begun by Cardinal du Perron (d. 1617) and financed by G. le Jay. Its editors included G. Sionita, J. Hesronita, P. d'Aquin, J. MORIN, and others. This was the largest and most elegantly printed of the great polyglots, but it was unfortunately the most costly and cumbersome to use. Moreover, it was plagued with errors and lacked the apparatus of the Antwerp Polyglot, on which it relied generally for text and format. Consequently, it sold so poorly and was so overshadowed by the London Polyglot (1657) that many copies were sold eventually as scrap paper. The Paris Polyglot added HB text in Samaritan, Syriac, and Arabic and NT text in Arabic and Syriac—the latter for 2 Peter, 2–3 John, Jude, and Revelation, which was lacking in the Antwerp Polyglot—but deleted the Syriac version in Hebrew characters from the NT. In spite of its magnificent appearance, the Paris Polyglot exerted little influence on scholarship.

The London Polyglot (6 vols., 1657) was the most scholarly and complete and circulated most widely of the four polyglots. The project was directed by B. Walton, who directed the work of E. CASTELL, S. Clarke, T. Greaves, T. Hyde, E. POCOCKE, D. Loftus, A. Weelocke, and other English scholars. It alone of the great polyglots was not issued under the auspices of the Roman Catholic Church. The work was distinguished by the extensive collection of scholarly materials in its prologue that dealt with biblical CHRONOLOGY, weights and measures, Hebrew and Greek idioms, geography, and TEXTUAL CRITICISM. The HB included a Hebrew text (based on the Antwerp and Paris polyglots) with a Latin interlinear and the Vulgate, as well as the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT), Targum (for most HB books), Samaritan Pentateuch, Syriac, and Arabic with Latin translations. In addition, an Ethiopic version (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION) of Psalms and the Song of Solomon was included. The NT volume reproduced the Greek text of R. Stephanus with Latin interlinear, the Vulgate, and the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions, each with Latin translation. A Persian version of the Gospels with Latin translation was also attached, and the last volume contained an extensive critical apparatus. Similar to earlier practices of printing HBs with commentary by KIMHI or RASHI, the nine-volume CRITICI SACRI (1660), a collection of commentaries on the Bible from various sources, was issued as a supplement, as was Castell's Lexicon Heptaglottum (1669).

In addition to these four major polyglots, there was the Heidelberg Polyglot (1587), which printed the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin texts of the HB. Probably edited by B. Bertram, it appears to follow the Complutensian Polyglot, although the Greek text may reprint the Aldine Bible (1518). The Vulgate text is accompanied by the Latin version of S. PAGNINUS and notes from the lectures of F. Vatablus. The Hamburg Polyglot (3 vols., 1596), prepared by D. Wolter, printed the Greek, two Latin versions (Vulgate and Pagninus [HB]/Beza [NT]), and a German text. The Nuremberg Polyglot (1599) was the work of E. Hutter, whose intention to produce a polyglot for the entire Bible never moved beyond Ruth. It was issued in four editions, printing the text in six languages: Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, Latin, German, and either Slovak, Italian, Low German, or French, depending on the edition. Hutter also issued an NT (1599/1600) in twelve languages: Syriac in Hebrew characters, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Bohemian, Italian, Spanish, French, English, Danish, and Polish. The Hebrew of Hutter's HB hexaglot is distinctive in that the root of the Hebrew word is printed in a different style of type from the prefix or suffix attached to the stem. In the case of his NT, Hutter created text that was missing in some versions. Other polyglots worthy of note are the Leipzig Polyglot of C. Reineccius (NT, 1713; OT, 1750–51), the Bielefeld Polyglot of R. Stier and C. Theile (1846–55), the hexaglot of E. de Levante (1874–76), and S. Bagster's Biblia sacra polyglotta (1831).

Bibliography: T. H. Darlow and H. F. Moule, Historical Catalogue of the Printed Editions of Holy Scripture in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1903). F. Delitzsch, Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Polyglottenbibel des Cardinals Ximenes (1871). B. Hall, The Great Polyglot Bibles, Including a Leaf from the Complutensian of Alcala, 1514–17 (1966). J. P. R. Lyell, Cardiniel Ximenes: Statesman, Ecclesiastic, Soldier, and Man of Letters, with an Account of the Complutensian Polyglot Bible (1917). E. Mangenot, "Polyglottes," DB 5, 1 (1922) 513-29. E. Nestle, "Bibles, Polyglot," NSHERK 2 (1908) 167-68. B. Pick, "History of the Printed Editions of the OT, Together with a Description of the Rabbinic and Polyglot Bibles," AJSL 9 (1892–93) 47-116. R. V. G. Tasker, "The Complutensian Polyglot," Church Quarterly Review 154 (1953) 197-210. B. Walton, The Considerator Considered: Or, A Brief View of Certain Considerations upon the Biblia Polyglotta, the Prolegomena, and Appendix Thereof (1659).

M. P. GRAHAM

POOLE (or POLE, [Latin, POLUS]), MATTHEW (1624–79)

Born in York in 1624, P. was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In 1649 he was appointed rector of St. Michael-le-Querne, London, but resigned his living in 1662 because of his Presbyterian beliefs. Fearing for his life after the supposed "popish plot" (1678), he moved to Amsterdam, where he died on Oct. 12, 1679.

P.'s major writing was the Synopsis Criticorum, on which he labored from 1666 until 1676. In this compendious Latin work he summarized and compared the interpretations of a wide selection of commentators on every book of the Bible. His intention was to provide information about critical rather than practical commentaries. He took note of rabbis and Roman Catholics as well as Protestants but made few references to CALVIN and none to LUTHER. The work, which had five editions within forty years, is an invaluable source for the study of biblical interpretation in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. P.'s enterprise was supported by several Anglican bishops, including S. Patrick, J. TILLOTSON, and E. STILLINGFLEET. Although C. Bee, the publisher of CRITICI SACRI, protested that P. was encroaching on his patent, he eventually withdrew his objections. P. also began a shorter and less technical commentary in English, going as far as Isaiah 48. It was finished by other scholars after his death.

Works: Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque Sacrae Scripturae Interpretum (5 vols., 1669–76); Annotations upon the Holy Bible (2 vols., 1683–85).

Bibliography: BB 5 (1760) 3397-401. T. Birch, Life of Dr. J. Tillotson (1752) 36-37. A. Gordon, DNB 46 (1896) 98-100. A. G. Matthews, Calamy Revised: Being a Revision of E. Calamy's Account of the Ministers and Others Ejected and Silenced (1934) 394-95. MSHH 24 (1733) 139-46.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

PORPHYRY (c. 232–c. 303)

Although given the name Malcha, son of Malcha, he is generally known by his nickname "Porphyry" (Greek for the famous Tyrian purple rather than for the Syriac king). Brought up in Tyre, P., whose native tongue was Syriac, knew a great deal about Semitic culture; yet he received a Greek education and became a Neoplatonic philosopher. After studying under Longinus and others at Athens, he became a disciple of Plotinus in Rome. His many published works were written in Greek, the most famous, Against the Christians, a work so threatening that all copies of it were destroyed.

P's outstanding exegetical achievement was his assertion that the book of Daniel is a Maccabean pseudepigraph (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA). Published as part of Against the Christians, his work on Daniel was possible because he relied on the Syrian exegetical tradition, which preserved many details of the author's original interpretation. Syrian exegetes assumed that the book of Daniel was written in the sixth century BCE, but they knew that the fourth kingdom of Daniel 2 and 7 is the Greek, that the little horn of Daniel 7 is Antiochus IV Epiphanes, and that the saints of the Most High are Maccabean Jews. P.'s profound knowledge of contemporary religion, including the custom of pseudepigraphy, allowed him to infer that the book was not a sixth-century PROPHECY but a work written to encourage Maccabean Jews under persecution. This also led him to accept a number of mistakes whose Sitz im Leben is in a tradition that accepted the canonical AUTHORITY of Daniel, e.g., he accepted Dan 11:40-45 as a true account of Antiochus's end.

We owe our knowledge of P.'s work to JEROME, who in his commentary on Daniel quoted P. extensively in the effort to refute him. The few other surviving fragments of P.'s exegesis, scattered in the works of various authors, show the same knowledge of Jewish and Christian Scriptures, sometimes with their exegetical traditions, and demonstrate fierce polemic against them. For example, he criticized the incorrect citation of Scripture at Mark 1:2 (cited by Jerome) and objected to allegorical interpretations of Jewish Scriptures that were meant to be taken literally (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 6.19.4-8).

Works: Against the Christians (15 bks.); Commentary on the Chaldean Oracles; Commentary on the Timaeus; Introduction (Isagoge); On the Book of Zoroaster; On the Categories of Aristotle (7 bks.); On the Cave of the Nymphs; On the Life of Plotinus and the Order of His Books; On the Philosophy of Homer; To Marcella. For an extensive list of works, see J. Bidez, 65-73.

Bibliography: M. W. Anastos, "P.'s Attack on the Bible," The Classical Tradition: Literary and Historical Studies in Honor of H. Caplan (ed. L. Wallach, 1966) 421-50. T. D. Barnes, "P. Against the Christians: Date and Attribution of Fragments," JTS 24 (1973) 424-42. J. Bidez, Vie de P. le Philosophe néo-platonicien, avec les fragments de traites Peri agalmaton et Deregressu animae (1913). W. den Boer, "A Pagan Historian and His Enemies: P. Against the Christians," CP 69 (1974) 198-208. P. M. Casey, "P. and the Origin of the Book of Daniel," JTS 27 (1976) 15-33; "The Syrian Tradition," Son of Man: The Interpretation and Influence of Daniel 7 (1979) chap. 3. B. Croke, "P.'s Anti-Christian Chronology," JTS 34 (1983) 168-85. P. Frassinetti, "Porfirio esegeta del profeta Daniele," RIL.L 86 (1953) 194-210. A. Meredith, "P. and Julian Against the Christians," ANRW II.23.2 (1980) 1119-49. G. Rinaldi, "L'Antico Testamento nella polemica anticristiana di Porforio di Tiro," Aug 22 (1982) 79-111. P. Sellew, "Achilles or Christ? P. and Didymus in Debate Over Allegorical Interpretation," HTR 82 (1989) 79-100. A. Smith, "Porphyrian Studies Since 1913," ANRW II.36.2 (1987) 717-73.

P. M. CASEY

PORTER, FRANK CHAMBERLAIN (1859–1946)

P. was born in Beloit, Wisconsin, Jan. 5, 1859. Prior to undergraduate and graduate theological study at Yale, he earned bachelor's and master's degrees at Beloit College and attended Chicago Theological Seminary and the theological school in Hartford, Connecticut. In 1889 he became an instructor on the Yale divinity faculty and in 1891 was appointed Winckley Professor of Biblical Theology, a post he held until his retirement in 1927.

P. was the first scholar of his generation in the United States to address major modern hermeneutical questions (see HERMENEUTICS). Contending that historical criticism was not the "highest and fittest use" to which the Bible could be put, he strove to mediate between the opposing concerns of history and religion, science and faith, a contest signaled in the conflict between the Ritschlian (see A. RITSCHL) and liberal theological schools. P. wrote that the initial step toward mediation lay in recognition of the literature of the Bible as "poetic." Stimulated by M. ARNOLD's question ("Shall We Enjoy the Bible?"), he turned for his answer to Aristotle, W. Wordsworth (1770–1850), S. T. COLERIDGE, and the ancient rhetorician Longinus, concluding that a synthesis of the two opposing worlds could be achieved through what he called an "appreciative" approach to the Bible.

P. found justification for this aesthetic approach in the theology of PAUL, the subject of his best known and only full-length volume, The Mind of Christ in Paul. According to P., two criteria determined Paul's "Christian thinking": First, it had to be according to the historical JESUS; and second, it had to be "natural," true to, and one with the "mind" of Jesus. P. wrote that the apostle was not the author of the lofty christological utterances found in the NT. Rather, Paul traced the inherited christological categories to the historical Jesus, conforming them to his character. Further, Paul was not concerned with Christ's place in the universe but with the love of Christ in the Christian. The Pauline concept of "oneness with Christ" was thus to be interpreted as moral or ethical, a oneness of imitation. Whatever residue remained after the two Pauline criteria had been applied P. relegated to the sphere of "poetry."

Works: Articles in HDB; The Messages of the Apocalyptical Writers (1905); "The Bearing of Historical Studies on the Religious Use of the Bible," TR 2 (1909) 253-76; "Judaism in NT Times," JR 8 (1928) 30-62, a brilliant critique of G. F. Moore's Judaism; The Mind of Christ in Paul (1930); "Toward a Biblical Theology for the Present," Contemporary American Theology: Theological Autobiographies 2nd ser. (ed. V. Ferm, 1933) 195-242.

Bibliography: R. H. Bainton, Yale and the Ministry (1957). S. J. Case (ed.), "Publications of F. C. P.," Studies in Early Christianity (1926) 440-43. R. A. Harrisville, F. C. P.: Pioneer in American Biblical Interpretation (1976).

R. A. HARRISVILLE

POST-COLONIAL BIBLICAL INTERPRETATIONS

1. Introduction. Post-colonial literary theory is an umbrella term that covers a multitude of literary practices and concerns of diverse races, empires, colonies, geographical centers, times, and genres. One of its defining characteristics is that it emphasizes the pervasiveness of imperialism and relates imperial expansion, impact, and response to certain literary practices and practitioners. To that end, post-colonial theories situate almost all reading and writing of the past three to four hundred years within the parameters of imperial and colonial currents of dominance and resistance, challenging all readers and writers to examine their practices for imperial and colonial currents of domination and suppression.

In literary practice the term post-colonial is used to "cover all the culture affected by imperial process from the moment of colonization to the present day" (B. Ashcroft et al. [1989] 20). This extended meaning recognizes that not all countries have achieved liberation and that various forms of colonialism exist, e.g., military, IDEOLOGICAL, economical, and ecological. The extension of its meaning in a largely post-independence era comes with the shocking realization of continuing domination by the former colonizers and dependence of previously colonized nations. But as H. Bhabha underscores, the "post" in post-colonial gestures to the beyond and embodies an energy that transforms "the present into an expanded and ex-centric site of experience and empowerment" (1994, 4). In short, post-colonial discourse involves both critique and construction.

2. Post-colonial Biblical Readers. The categories of colonizer and colonized can be subdivided into some of the following reading and writing communities: colonizers, settler colonizers, indigenous or natives of settler colonies, oppositional decolonizers, and immigrants who live in former colonizing centers. Many of these groups can be identified with particular geographical areas consistent with the history of imperialism. A strict dividing line between their literary practices is often impossible, given that colonialism is largely about cultural contact and exchange; yet one can outline some of their methods of biblical interpretation.

3. The Colonizers' Reading Practices. Colonizers are historically described as imperial readers from Britain, France, Portugal, Germany, or from any former colonizing country. Their use of literature, especially the Bible, as a colonizing instrument entails imposing foreign literary canons on the colonized; interpreting all foreign places and cultures through the colonizers' texts; and denigrating the colonized peoples and their lands through texts that serve to uplift the colonizer.

First, a foreign literary canon, including the Bible, is transported by the colonizer from its specific cultural context and is marketed to the colonized as a universal standard for all cultures. A post-colonial biblical reader asks: How has the Bible been transported to non-biblical worlds, and how has it been applied to other cultures? When white Western biblical readers maintain a hierarchical and exclusive place for biblical texts and other Western classics above the texts of the colonized, or when they resist developing multi-cultural readings of the Bible, then they participate in colonialism. Furthermore, when schools either ignore or teach the religions of the colonized in such a way as to undermine these dominated cultures, they serve as instruments of oppression.

Second, colonizers interpret foreign lands and claim authority over them through both biblical and Western texts. These texts' ideology inspired their colonial readers and validated their action as just; e.g., the reading of "the great commission" led many readers to regard the colonizing projects of their country as synonymous with the biblical text. Thus missionary D. Livingstone could "beg" his people to move to Africa and spread Christianity.

Third, colonial biblical interpretation involves readers of various backgrounds. Livingstone, for example, was a missionary, a doctor, a geographer, an explorer, an ethnographer, a natural scientist and a writer of travel narratives. Many other readers never traveled abroad, but they were ardent supporters who read and perpetuated the constructions of traveling colonial agents.

Fourth, colonial interpretations of the Bible were often the result of exegetical methods or interpretations hewn from imperial contexts and serving the interest of these empires. One can cite archaeological (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and anthropological paradigms of reading that often bolstered the colonizers' claims of racial superiority by claiming to understand the colonized peoples better than they understood themselves. F. Segovia (1995) exposed the colonizing ideology of historical-critical methods: Assuming that all readers were neutral and objective, this approach insisted on one univocal and universal interpretation of the Bible. Variant interpretations from readers of different social backgrounds were labeled eisegesis. Segovia suggests that the explosion of other methods of interpretation that consider the author, the text, and the reader should be seen within the global struggles of decolonization and liberation.

4. Settler Colonizers' Reading Practices. Settler colonies include white readers from Canada, the United States, Australia, South Africa, and New Zealand who assumed power over the natives of the land and turned the land into their permanent homes. The earliest white settler colonizers of the United States and South Africa claimed that they were the chosen race, that the native lands were their promised lands, and that the native populations were Canaanites who could either be enslaved or be annihilated. The Exodus text was used to claim these lands and to dispossess the natives. G. Tinker (1995, 175) holds that "nineteenth-century German imperialism, along with the prominence of German exegetical research continuing into the twentieth century, gave rise to conquest exegesis that has influenced most if not all Euro-American scholarship." The theoretical reading of such scholars as A. SCHWEITZER who were active colonial agents was widely accepted in biblical interpretation. Not surprisingly, the voice of biblical scholars of former imperial centers and settler colonies remained largely silent during the perpetration of international crimes of colonialism and holocaust.

Because settler colonies are also thoroughly multicultural contexts, it is notable that late twentieth century methods of biblical readings, which move away from colonizing ideologies, are being championed in North America rather than in European biblical schools. The North American context consists of Native Americans, settler colonists, descendants of African slaves, Hispanics (see HISPANIC AMERICAN INTERPRETATION), Holocaust survivors (see HOLOCAUST, BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION AND THE), Asian Americans (see ASIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), political refugees, professional workers who immigrate, and many others who constantly make problematic power relations proposed in methods of reading and writing. It is this diversity that creates a context in which methods of reading for liberation are more acceptable than in former colonizing centers.

5. Indigenous Reading Practices. Native populations living under the rule of settler colonizers do not have the option of political independence. These populations include the Native Americans of North America, the Aborigines in Australia, and the Maori in New Zealand. Since most native populations are still recovering from severe colonization, their voices are just beginning to be heard; yet their nativist and hybrid interpretations of resistance and collaboration were there in every stage of their colonization. The history of their various biblical interpretations still needs to be researched, documented, and analyzed.

R. Warrior (1991, 291), who reads the stories of Israel's wilderness wanderings through Canaanite eyes, notes Yahweh's command to annihilate the indigenous population. That "Canaanites have status only as the people Yahweh removes from the land in order to bring the chosen people in" is a characterization that expounds values authorizing imperialism. Further, since the Canaanites are annihilated for having worshiped different gods, interreligious praxis is equated to betrayal in the Joshua narrative. In short, the narrative not only provides for imperialism but also fails to provide for a multi-cultural reading of the Bible.

6. Decolonizing Reading Practices. Decolonizing readers are oppositional post-colonial readers from Africa, Asia, and Latin America who were colonized but fought and regained their political independence by assuming biblical interpretations of resistance, collaboration, nativism, nationalism, and hybridity. Decolonizing biblical readers of these diverse backgrounds have influenced one another not only at individual levels but also as a deliberate strategy of networking (M. Oduyoye [1993]; R. Sugirtharajah [1991]).

Latin American post-colonial biblical interpretations were perhaps the earliest to make their mark in biblical studies. Unlike Africans and Asians, Latin Americans were subjected to an earlier colonialism that established Christianity as the dominant religion and the languages of the colonizers as the means of communication; yet they fully employed the masters' tools to pull down the masters' houses. Latin Americans apply biblical texts and Western theories of Marxism to articulate interpretations of LIBERATION. First, their biblical interpretations resist dwelling on the ancient context of the text as the normative reference for the "correct" interpretation of the Bible. Latin Americans claim a better understanding of the meaning of biblical texts because of their experiences of poverty and the struggle they share with the exploited masses of JESUS' times. Their biblical interpretations critique oppressive neo-colonial and local structures that continue to exploit them. Further, their readings challenge mainstream biblical interpreters to examine who benefits from their interpretations.

Most Asian and African biblical readers, on the other hand, were subjected to modern imperial and colonial currents that elevated Western cultures, claimed racial superiority, and discounted native cultures, races, and languages. Many, indeed, were Christianized and learned to use the languages of their colonizers. Their religions and languages, however, remained a contending force in their contexts and became unavoidable factors in their post-colonial biblical interpretations.

Examples of these readings include the following: (a) The role of Egypt (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), Ethiopia (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), and Asian nations regarding the birth of the Christian church is emphasized (Oduyoye [1993]; Sugirtharajah [1993]). (b) Biblical stories are read in the context of other local religious texts or cultures. African culture is compared with those described in the HB; Jesus is compared with other sages and religious leaders. Inculturation and contextualization tended to preserve the superiority of Christian faith, but the colonized peoples insisted on the validity of their own cultures (E. Martey [1993] 65-70). The current scene reflects the bold refusal to designate any superiority to biblical religious claims (P. Kwok [1995]; Sugirtharajah [1993]). (c) Decolonizing readers embark on hybrid biblical interpretations from the early days of colonial contact. Many Asian and African intellectuals read biblical stories and legends with their own folktales (see FOLKLORE), myths (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), and songs. Hybrid post-colonial biblical discourse resists the colonizing use of the Bible and seeks liberation by reading the Bible with, and not above, other world cultures. (d) Decolonizing post-colonial biblical readings include the interpretations of subalterns, or the base communities of the poor. This is evident with Asian and African readers as non-academic readers are included in academic anthologies (see Semeia 73). (e) Like Latin American readers, African and Asian readers emphasize their own socioeconomic contexts as they interpret the Bible rather than dwelling on the ancient origins of biblical texts. To this end their methods are largely theological. (f) Oppositional decolonizing biblical readers also question the ideology of biblical texts by asking: How are gender representations used in imperial and colonizing texts of the Bible? Why have the Bible and its readers functioned compatibly with the colonizing powers of their countries? Does the Bible encourage expansion into other nations? Does it authorize Christians to assume power over other cultures and lands? If so, how can we arrest the colonizing perspectives of the Bible and its readers? (See M. Dube Shomanah [1997].) (g) Decolonizing readers engage in a comparative or synoptic reading of secular Western classics with biblical texts. These largely ideological readings interrogate the representations of different cultures, people, and their lands in the Bible and in other Western canons to examine how these constructions legitimate the colonizers' assumption of power over foreign nations.

7. Migrant Reading Practices. These include readings of African Americans, Hispanic Americans, Jewish Holocaust survivors, Asian Americans, refugees, migrant workers, and many other Two-Thirds World peoples who live in Western countries. Biblical readings of migrants differ, reflecting the different types of colonial oppression undergone, different stages of resistance, different methods, and different group interests. African Americans experienced colonization that severed them from their lands, cultures, and languages. To rely on the languages and cultures of their colonizers, therefore, is not optional in their struggles for liberation. For example, D. Walker (see Walker and H. Garnet [1829]) argued for the abolition of slavery by rereading the stories in Genesis and Exodus and in the ancient texts of Rome and Greece. Walker appealed to the biblical attestation that as a slave in Egypt Joseph was given a leadership role (Gen 41:37-45), that the house of Jacob was given the best land in Egypt and leadership (Gen 47:1-6), and that enslaved Israelites owned property (Exod 12:31-32, 37-39). Walker's strategy of using the masters' tools against them helped illustrate how the institution of chattel slavery could not be supported by their canon.

O. Hendricks (1995) has delivered one of the boldest post-colonial biblical readings ever to be published in a Western scholarly journal. The title, "Guerilla Exegesis," alludes to the struggles and strategies of the colonized against the colonizer. It suggests a context where the colonizer is still very much in power but where the colonized peoples refuse to give up the struggle for liberation, instead adopting a persistent undercover strategy of resistance that allows them to hit and run. His essay exemplifies the abrogation of the masters' language, or the use of "english," not English (see Ashcroft et al.). This post-colonial strategy is used by many former victims of colonialism who are now stuck with learning, writing, and reading in the languages of the colonizer. Countering centuries of colonizing art that depicted Jesus, Mary, and all biblical characters as blue-eyed blonds, Bibles produced by and for African Americans feature Black biblical characters. This attempt to recuperate Black presence in the Bible is one of the major steps toward its decolonization.

Biblical interpretations by Hispanic Americans also reflect an engagement with the imperialist currents of the past and present that have alienated them from their countries and cultures. Segovia, who describes himself as "a subject of a number of layers of colonialism" (1995, 3), presents a reading strategy of intercultural criticism framed within the global colonial and post-colonial struggles for power. Although it is a method informed by a bicultural experience of having "no home, no voice, and no face . . . following the dynamics of colonial discourse and practice," it "embraces biculturalism as its very home, voice, and face . . . following in the dynamics of decolonization and liberation" (Segovia [1996] 212). In short, intercultural criticism is a diaspora reading strategy born in the struggle with continuing colonial domination that continues to read texts for decolonization and liberation.

J. González's book (1996) is also an exposition of a Hispanic diaspora reading strategy from a Protestant perspective. A. Isasi-Díaz's works expound on MUJERISTA, or Hispanic American women's reading strategies.

Many Jewish readers of the NT are among the immigrants who have entered the academic and church schools of the West. They challenge Christians to acknowledge that Jesus was a Jew and that biblical texts are Jewish texts. This reclaiming of Jewish heritage in biblical interpretation is a post-colonial response to the claims of racial superiority that characterized white Christian colonizing powers and that contributed to the Holocaust.

8. Problems with Post-colonial Interpretations in Biblical Studies. Turning to biblical studies (and to other sacred canons), there is a lack of comprehensive research on colonial biblical interpretations based on the study of travel narratives, letters, missionary reports, newspapers, novels, etc. The Semeia issue on "Postcolonialism and Scriptural Reading" (ed. L. Donaldson), should go a long way toward introducing a number of post-colonial methods of biblical interpretation. Similarly, the Semeia issue on "Women's Interpretations of the Bible in the Third World" (ed. K. Sakenfeld and S. Ringe) will also provide post-colonial feminist readings (see FEMINIST INTERPRETATION) of the Bible.

The biblical readings of the formerly colonized groups, however, are quite vibrant. African, South African, Asian, Indian, Latin American, Hispanic American, African American, Asian American, Native American, Pacific, or Two-Thirds World readers are actively generating biblical readings that take account of their experiences of colonial domination and seek liberating international relations. Nevertheless, problems still persist. Given the domination of Europeans and Americans in biblical studies, the interpretations of the formerly colonized have by and large occupied a peripheral place. These new interpretations are not always regarded as serious rigorous methods of biblical reading, nor have they been classified as systematic readings that demand engagement. For example, anthologies of biblical reading methods, written mostly by younger generations dedicated to liberation, remain surprisingly silent about post-colonial methods of biblical reading.

To a degree the apathetic response of metropolitan scholars to most post-colonial biblical readings is methodologically related to the traditional separation of biblical studies from theology and church history. Many biblical scholars would rather regard post-colonial readings of Two-Thirds World masses as theological and belonging to church history, not biblical studies. Moreover, the silence of mainstream biblical studies toward post-colonial interpretations reflects the continuing dominance of the so-called developed over the underdeveloped, the First World over the Two-Thirds World masses.

What if mainstream academic and church biblical practitioners allowed themselves to view their interpretative practices under the categories of colonial and post-colonial literary practices? This would greatly enhance the mission of the academy and the church. Readers might assume ethical responsibility for international relations of the past and the present, since interpreters would begin to place themselves within the dynamics of colonizing and decolonizing communities. Readers might examine their biblical expositions to see if they build, maintain, or dismantle imperialism, seeking interpretations that promote international relations of liberating interdependence.

Bibliography: I. Amadiume, Male Daughters, Female Husbands: Gender and Sex in an African Society (1987). G. Anzaldua, Borderlands/La Frontera (1987); B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths, and H. Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-colonial Literatures (1989); (eds.), The Post-colonial Studies Reader (1995). A. Bammer, Displacements: Cultural Identities in Question (1994). C. Banana, "The Case for a New Bible," "Rewriting the Bible": The Real Issues (ed.

I. Mukonyora, 1993) 17-32. H. K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994). R. Chow, Writing Diaspora: Tactics of Intervention in Contemporary Cultural Studies (1993). K. Dickson, Uncompleted Mission: Christianity and Exclusivism (1991). L. E. Donaldson, Decolonizing Feminisims: Race, Gender, and Empire-building (1992). M. W. Dube Shomanah, "Towards a Post-colonial Feminist Interpretation of the Bible" (diss., Vanderbilt University, 1997). V. Fabella and S. A. Lee Park, We Dare to Dream: Doing Theology as Asian Women (1989). V. Fabella and M. Oduyoye (eds.), With Passion and Compassion: Third Worlds Women Doing Theology (1990). F. Fanon, Black Skins, White Masks (1967). C. Felder (ed.), Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation (1991). J. L. Gonzàlez, Santa Biblia: The Bible Through Hispanic Eyes (1996). B. Harlow, Resistance Literature (1987). O. O. Hendricks, "Guerilla Exegesis: Struggle as a Scholarly Vocation," Semeia 72 (1995). A. M. Isasi-Díaz, En la Lucha: In the Struggle. A Hispanic Women's Liberation Theology (1993). K. P. Lan, Discovering the Bible in the Non-Biblical World (1995). V. Lenero, The Gospel of L. Gavilan (1979). E. Martey, African Theology: Inculturation and Liberation (1993). R. Maunier, The Sociology of Colonies: An Introduction to the Study of Race Contact 1 (1948). C. T. Mohanty, "Under Western Eyes: Feminist Scholarships and Colonial Discourses," Third World Women and the Politics of Feminism (ed. T. Mohanty et al., 1991) 51-80. I. Mosala, Biblical Hermeneutics and Black Theology in South Africa (1989). V. Y. Mudimbe, The Invention of Africa: Gnosis, Philosophy, and the Order of Knowledge (1988); The Idea of Africa (1994). M. A. Oduyoye, Hearing and Knowing: Theological Reflections on Christianity in Africa (1993). M. A. Oduyoye and M. R. A. Kanyoro (eds.), The Will to Arise: Women, Tradition, and the Church in Africa (1992). D. Quint, Epic and Empire: Politics and Generic Form from Virgil to Milton (1993). E. Said, Orientalism (1978); Culture and Imperialism (1993). A. J. Saldarini, Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community (1994). F. Segovia and M. A. Tolbert (eds.), Reading from This Place, vol. 1, Social Location and Biblical Interpretation in the United States (1995); vol. 2, Social Location and Biblical Interpretation in Global Perspective (1995). F. Segovia (ed.), What Is John: Readers and Readings of the Fourth Gospel (1996). R. S. Sugirtharajah (ed.), Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World (1991); (ed.), Asian Faces of Jesus (1993). R. S. Sugirtharajah and C. Hargreaves (eds.), Readings in Indian Christian Theology (1993, 1995[3]). T. Swanson, "To Prepare a Place: Johannine Christianity and the Collapse of Ethnic Territory," JAAR 62, 2 (Summer 1994) 241-63. E. Tamez, Bible of the Oppressed (1982). M. Taussig, Shamanism, Colonialism, and the Wild Man: A Study in Terror and Healing (1986). N. wa Thiongo, Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature (1986); Moving the Centre: The Struggle for Cultural Freedoms (1993). C. Tiffin and A. Lawson (eds.), De-scribing Empire: Post-colonialism and Textuality (1994). G. Tinker, "Reading the Bible as Native-Americans," NIB (1995) 1:174-80. D. Walker and H. H. Garnet, Walker's Appeal and Garnet's Address to the Slaves of the United States of America (1994). R. Warrior, "Canaanites, Cowboys, and Indians: Deliverance, Conquest, and Liberation Theology Today," Voices from the Margin: Interpreting the Bible in the Third World (ed. R. S. Sugirtharajah, 1991) 287-95. G. West and M. W. Dube (eds.), " 'Reading With': An Exploration of the Interface Between Critical and Ordinary Readings of the Bible," Semeia 73 (1996). G. Vermes, The Religion of Jesus the Jew (1993). P. Williams and L. Chrisman (eds.), Colonial Discourse and Post-colonial: A Reader (1994).

M. W. DUBE SHOMANAH

POSTEL, GUILLAUME (1510?–81)

Born in Barenton, Normandy, P. was orphaned at age eight. He later labored as a farmworker to finance study at Sainte-Barbe in Paris, where he plunged into the study of languages. From Jews living near the college he secured a Hebrew grammar and a Hebrew-Latin copy of the psalms, with which he taught himself Hebrew. He quickly mastered Greek, Latin, and the vernacular languages of Europe, obtaining a reputation for his linguistic brilliance. At Sainte-Barbe he earned an MA and Bachelor of Medicine and shared in the academic milieu at the University of Paris, with its important scholars and students, including Ignatius Loyola (c. 1491–1556) and the members of his spiritual army, who sought to effect a universal reformation of the world.

P. made two journeys to the Middle East. On the first (1536–37) he improved his knowledge of Arabic and acquired books: the KABBALAH, written in Aramaic, as well as Arabic works on medicine and mathematics and the commentaries of Aristotle. On the second (1549) he traveled widely, visiting Cairo and Damascus; he met with members of various sects, including the Samaritans, and secured copies of the NT in Arabic and Syriac. One of the Syriac texts later formed the basis for the Syriac NT printed in the Antwerp POLYGLOT. He obtained ancient shekels in Acre and Jerusalem and became the first to publish their inscriptions. He acquired Samaritan texts and was the first to publish extracts (in his De Cognitione dei) as well as a Samaritan Hebrew grammar. P. can thus be rightly called the father of Samaritan studies (see J. Fraser [1988]).

P. developed a close friendship with the printer D. BOMBERG in Venice (from 1537), among whose circle he made the acquaintance of E. LEVITA. P. taught A. MASIUS Arabic and assisted J. Widmanstadt in preparing his edition of the Syriac NT (1554). In 1563 P. met the young J. SCALIGER and encouraged him to study ancient Semitic languages. The latter later spoke of P. as "this apparition, a compound of the prophet and the servant, who had been all over the East . . . and who knew more tongues than any man living."

P. had a very checkered career. He was appointed "royal reader" in Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic in Paris by Francis I. In this post (1537–43) his lectures became so popular it became necessary to hold them outdoors.

During this period he published widely on various languages, including a comparative study of twelve languages; he was a great advocate of instruction in Arabic and Hebrew. His manuscript De Orbis terrae concordia, advocating the need for universal harmony under Christ and intended as a guide for missionaries, encountered opposition at the Sorbonne and was not published until 1545 (by Oporinus in Basel). P.'s zeal and demands for reform led to his departure from the king's circle in 1543.

For a few months in 1544–45 P. joined Loyola and his movement in Rome but was given license to leave (Dec. 12, 1545). P., however, remained favorably disposed to the Jesuits, one of whom was present at his death. P. spoke out against the intransigent positions of the Council of Trent and against papal authority over the councils. His tirades against Pope Paul III and the views expressed in his intercepted book, De Restitutione humanae naturae, led to his flight from Rome.

In 1546 P. assumed duties as a priest at the Ospedaletto of Saints John and Paul in Venice. Here he met a mysterious nun named Giovanna, whom he eulogized as the Mother of the World and the Venetian Virgin for her charitable endeavors and for feeding the poor. Giovanna had enormous influence on P., and under her influence he began more serious work on the Zohar, which he twice translated into Latin. Under the impulse of her prophecies P. wrote frantically a number of works proclaiming the restitution of all things (1547), in addition to translating the Bahir and part of Genesis Rabbah into Latin. In 1548 he published a volume in Hebrew and a subsequent Latin translation.

After returning from the Middle East and learning of the death of Giovanna, P. returned to Paris, where he was received at the court of Henry II. He wrote fifteen books in 1551–52 but fell into disfavor after claiming that he had undergone (on Jan. 6, 1552) an "immutation" in which his body was purged and the presence of Mother Giovanna was infused into him, producing a new spiritual person restored to the original perfection before the fall.

Appointed to a chair at the University of Vienna by Emperor Ferdinand, P. left after six months to defend himself in Venice, unsuccessfully, against the Inquisition. He was imprisoned in Ripetta (1555–59), and his works were placed on the index. Accused of founding a new sect, the Postellani, which he denied, P. finally was confined in 1564 to the Monastery of Saint Martin des Champs in Paris since the royal authorities considered his call for universal restitution tantamount to revolution. He also envisioned a universal religion in which no one would be punished for religious beliefs and in which devisive dogma would be eliminated. He believed that each person must be restored to an original unity with God, an earthly state he called restitution.

Because he proclaimed himself to be the "prophet of the restitution of all things," P. was both reviled and revered in his own time. Although he was called the "greatest genius of his age" and was the friend of leading clergy, kings, and scholars throughout Europe (F. Bacon even visited the aging P. while he was in the monastery), his influence and contributions have often been ignored. P. gave us the first comparative grammar of twelve ancient languages. He was a cosmographer and a cartographer, making perhaps the first polar map. He was a printer, a geographer, and author of more than one hundred works on a variety of subjects, many still in manuscript. In addition to his translation of the Zohar, his publication of the Protevangelion of James, his translations of the Gospels into Arabic, his Syriac NT, and his contributions to Samaritan studies, P. wrote commentaries on Genesis, Ruth, and the Apocalypse. His one-world view and his proto-feminism, in which he allocated to the feminine an essential role in the restitution of all things, have a decidedly modern appeal.

Works: Grammatica arabica (1538); Linguarum duodecim characteribus differentium alphabetum introductio (1538); De originibus seu de hebraicae linguae et gentis antiquitate (1538); Syriae descriptio (1540); Alcorani seu Legis Mahometi, et Evangelistarum concordia liber (1543); De rationibus Spiritus sancti (1543); Quatuor librorum de Orbis terrae concordia primus (1545); Absconditorum a constitutione mundi clavis (1547); De nativitate Mediatoris ultima (1547); Panthenosia: compositio omnium dissidiorum circa aeternam veritatem (1547); Candelabri typici in Mosis tabernaculo iusso divino (1548); Or nerot ha-Menorah (1548); Abrahami Patriarchae liber Iezirah (1552); Compendiaria Grammatices Hebraicae introdvctio (1552); L'historie memorable des expeditions depuys le Deluge (1552); Liber de causis seu de principiis et originibus naturae utriusque (1552); De foenicum literis (1552); Protevangelion sive de natalibus Jesu Christi, et ipsius matris Virginis Mariae, sermo historicus divi Iacobi minoris (1552); Resolution eternele destinée au Roy et peuple treschrestien pour obtenir la vraye et finale victoire qui est celle des coeurs de tout le monde (1552); Restitutio rerum omnium conditarum, per manum Eliae prophetae terribilis (1552); Tabula aeternae ordinationis quaternario (1552); Tabula restitutionis omnium constitutionum naturalium et supernaturalium rerum (1552); De universitate liber (1552); Vinculum mundi (1552); Description et charte de la Terre saincte (1553); La doctrine du siecle doré (1553); Des merveilles du monde (1553); De originibus seu . . . maxime Tartarorum, Persaru, Turcarum et omium Abrahami et Noachi alumnorum origines (1553); Signorum coelestium vera configuratio (1553); Les très merveilleuses victories des femmes du nouveau monde (1553); G. Postelli. . . . De linguae phoenicis sive hebraicae excellentia (1554); Il libro della divina ordinatione (1555); Le prime nove del altro mondo (1555); Epistola G. Postelli ad C. Schwenckfeldium (1556); De la république des Turcs (1560); La concordance des quatre Évangiles (1561); Cosmographicae disciplinae compendium (1561); De universitate liber (1563); L'athéoma- chie et discours de l'immortalité de l'âme et résurrection des corps (1564); De . . . miraculo victoriae corporis Christi (1566); Divinationis sive divinae summaeque veritatis discussio. (1571); De nova stella (1573); De peregrina stella (s.l., s. d); Histoires orientales et principalement des Turkes (1575); Quaternariae rei compendium ad disciplinas omnes scientiasve. . . . Tabula aeternae ordinationis (1578); Les premiers éléments d'Euclide chrestien (1579); Polo aptata nova charta universi (1581)

Bibliography: J. Bouwsma, Concordia Mundi: The Career and Thought of G. P. (HHM 33, 1957). G. Cipriani, De Etruriae regionis originibus (1986). J. G. Fraser, "G. P. and Samaritan Studies," Postello, Venezia e il suo mondo (1988) 99-117. M. L. Kuntz, G. P., Prophet of the Restitution of All Things: His Life and Thought (1981); (ed.), Postello, Venezia e il suo mondo (1988). J.-C. Margolin (ed.), G. P. (1581–1981): Actes du Colloque International d'Avranches (1985). F. Secret, Les kabbalistes chrétiens de la Renaissance (Collection Sigma 5, 1964); Bibliographie des manuscrits de G. P. (1970). P. Simoncelli, La Lingua di Adamo (EPH 16, 1984).

M. L. KUNTZ

POST-MODERN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

There is no singular method that can be called "post-modern biblical interpretation," no singular approach, no singular paradigm. Indeed, the impulse to provide a definition for this nonentity introduces a problematic asymmetry in a dictionary that does not also define and delimit "modern biblical interpretation." If, under duress, one were obliged to approximate a definition for "post-modern biblical criticism," one would have to characterize it as the practice of resisting and recentering the assumptions and norms of modern biblical interpretation.

For instance, modern biblical interpretation has typically assumed that time is of the essence in biblical criticism. Time marks the biblical text as ancient, foreign, past, and thereby obliges interpreters (marked in time as "modern" or "contemporary") to adopt academically approved methods to bridge the chronological gulf that separates interpreters from their biblical text. Time also marks specific interpretations in a way that favors the most recent efforts at bridging the abyss. The first of these assumptions rests on the premise that the passage of years generates a gap in understanding between past and present that only academic interpreters can address.

This gap, however, does not exist of itself (otherwise, introductory courses would not have to work hard to inculcate historical-critical sensibilities in students); on the contrary, the succession of commentators, interpreters, and communities of worship establishes broad avenues of continuity between past and present. The existence of a chronological "gap" or a continuous "treasury" depends on the assumptions one brings to bear on interpretation—not on a supposedly natural or necessary condition of temporality. The second assumption is persuasive to the extent that one is already committed to its truth, but it rings hollow to interpreters who hold a different repertoire of interpretive assumptions. How would one prove that contemporary interpretations (various as they are) of Genesis 2–3 are truer than earlier efforts or that they mark a clear progress beyond previous interpretations, especially to someone who does not share modern assumptions about progress?

The myth of progress figures among the "metanarratives" of which post-modern interpreters are dubious. Under the banner of progress (whether that progress aims toward the triumph of liberal democracy and the free market, that of the industrial proletariat, or that of the chosen people of God), dominant social groups have ridden roughshod over reticent dissenters. The modern claim that casualties are necessary in the cause of progress, in the name of the greater good that modernity promises, sounds unconvincing to post-modern ears. Modern critics see no reason to attend to indigenous, "primitive," or simply naive interpretive priorities, except as quaint illustrations of inferior hermeneutical understandings (see HERMENEUTICS). One could even read the later history of biblical criticism as a struggle for hegemony between the theological metanarratives and the metanarrative of Enlightenment rationality's commitment to scientific inquiry. Representatives of each camp anathematize their opponents as "heretics" or "fundamentalists"; in contrast the post-modern observer, who can opt out of such sterile conflicts by noting that the opposing parties derive their legitimation from their respective metanarratives. Rather than living out the dictates of an imperious metanarrative (and excoriating anyone who presumes to live by another metanarrative), the post-modern biblical interpreter may follow a particular line of interpretation because it displays hitherto unnoticed aspects of the biblical text, because it would be useful for one purpose or another, or simply because it is interesting.

A further way that time defines modern biblical criticism is by tempting interpreters to parse the history of interpretation into constituent periods. The "post-" in post-modern sometimes incites scholars to assume that post-modern interpretation has to take place after modern interpretation, consigning modern criticism to a rubble heap of obsolete worldviews much as modernity relegates ancient perspectives to its own closet of intellectual bad dreams. Post-modern biblical interpretation does not surpass, improve, perfect, contravene, or undermine modern biblical interpretation—except when modern interpreters claim the exclusive prerogative to determine interpretive legitimacy on their own modern terms. The impulse to regard post-modernity as a period among others, as an innovation that improves the endeavor of biblical interpretation, partakes of the modern attraction to everything novel and the modern inclination to characterize projects as a succession of phases, each refining its predecessors. Likewise, the advent of post-modern criticism need not represent a new, improved stage in the history of biblical interpretation; modernity thrives on novelty and supersession, whereas a post-modern sensibility can coexist with its alternatives. Debates over whether the post-modern era has begun (or is over or will never start) occlude the extent to which a particular body of critics is actually practicing post-modern interpretation and others are comfortably working out pre-modern interpretations.

Modern biblical critics likewise typically assume that highly trained biblical scholars possess a unique authority for propounding legitimate interpretations. "Don't try this at home," they warn would-be Bible readers, "lest you fall prey to the inevitable pitfalls that await insufficiently trained readers." This interpretive elitism fits the broader modern inclination to define proper fields of expertise by distinguishing them from other fields and limiting the expert's attention to matters pertinent to the proper field. (Even when modern biblical interpreters devise "new" or "interdisciplinary" approaches they deploy these supposed novelties in the interest of familiar modern ends: the quest for sources, the identities of the historical actors, the authors' attitudes, and so on).

Modern biblical interpretation thus fosters a cult of expertise that demands interpretive authority far out of proportion to plausible justification of that authority; while we may see an overwhelming basis for advanced training in (for instance) brain surgery, the necessity of doctoral training in biblical interpretation is less clear. Although the traditional curriculum for expertise in biblical studies is undeniably helpful, its narrow focus has constricted the discourse of biblical interpretation in noteworthy ways. Perhaps most obviously, modern conventions have restricted the genres of biblical interpretation that critics deem legitimate. "Legitimate" biblical interpretation is exclusively discursive and is limited to very few varieties of discourse (preeminently, the commentary and the monograph). Whereas one might once have promulgated academically respectable interpretation in a sermon, now this relatively conventional genre is vulnerable to the suspicion of theological ideology; more unusual media for biblical interpretation—poetry, sculpture, video, graphical representation—need not even hope for an academic nihil obstat. Modern biblical experts simply have not been trained to evaluate such interpretations and consider such efforts at best as "soft" or "unscientific," if they consider them at all.

One further characteristic of modern biblical experts is the adherence to norms—usually unstated—of univocity, objectivity, and universality. Though the number of scholars who adhere publicly to the notion that biblical interpretations can be objective or universally true has probably diminished, there remains a strongly committed core of interpreters who promote the notion that there is one legitimate meaning to each textual unit, that the single legitimate meaning is encoded in the text, and that this meaning remains the same in all circumstances. Modern interpreters' commitment to this goal provides one reason why they so bitterly oppose anything that smacks of the allegorical interpretation by which other interpreters have found many legitimate meanings for each text.

By contrast, post-modern interpreters who have learned their lessons in deconstruction (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION) suspect that any univocity is the product of an interpretive violence that suppresses ambiguity by a will to unity. Such modern assumptions ground the lingering sense that politically active interpreters (say, proponents of lesbian/gay interests) propound interpretations that impose an alien context on the true meaning of the text. Yet post-modern interpreters can comfortably remind their modern colleagues that all interpreters are ideologically entangled (see IDEOLOGICAL CRITICISM); the principal difference is that the dominant ideology has the privilege of making a pretense of objectivity. Whenever social groups change, the standards of objectivity change with them. When modern interpreters profess to seek, not an illusory objectivity, but a more attainable approximation thereof, they run the danger of aggravating the very problem they are trying to avoid. With this gesture they congratulate themselves both for avoiding a discredited positivism and for avoiding partisan advocacy.

In sum, modern biblical criticism reflects the tacit knowledge by which generations of critics have progressed from naivete to the sophistication that enables them to distinguish exegesis (which allegedly "leads out" the meaning from the text) from eisegesis (which "reads in" the meaning an interpreter is already looking for). Post-modern biblical interpretation, on the other hand, flouts the received wisdom of the discipline in the interest of learning those things that modern criticism will not reveal. Post-modern biblical critics operate with a different tacit knowledge. They may know that time is not an absolute horizon for interpretation or that biblical interpretations vary from place to place and time to time without necessarily progressing or that expertise in interpretation may come from imaginative faculties that have not been certified at the bar of higher education. In all these cases modern biblical critics typically respond by claiming that if one disregards the modern criteria for interpretation, no criteria at all will remain—the result will be hermeneutical anarchy. Modern critics disregard the fact that criteria are always inescapably immanent to the audiences, institutions, and social formations within which non-modern interpreters propose their readings.

Post-modern interpreters may enact their freedom from the tyranny of time in any number of ways. They may sit loose to the modern imperative that distinguishes ancient past from hypermodern present, treating PAUL as a contemporary to M. Foucault, characterizing the Gospels in terms translucent to today's concerns, or articulating the persistent traces of the past that live on in present aspects of the Bible. In doing so they do not so much ignore the differences between past and present as they mark those chronological differences as bearing less importance than the lines of continuity they can draw or the urgency of identifying the relevance of a biblical text or the intriguing conclusions they can weave out of discursive threads from many times.

Post-modern interpreters who have been freed from the tyranny of time and the obligation to ascertain single, universal meanings may find that these related amnesties permit them to understand the history of interpretation differently. Since interpretation involves the task of explaining that which is less well-known in terms that are better-known, post-modern interpreters may view each chapter in the history of interpretation as a species of allegorical interpretation whereby Christians have brought the Bible into engagement with the particular concerns of their cultures. At times those concerns have involved the legitimacy of early Christianity as a movement (which elicited an emphasis on topological connections between the OT and the NT); the resolution of doctrinal disputes (which encouraged allegorical exegeses to enlist the Bible as a witness on behalf of dogmatic concerns); the historical accuracy of the biblical accounts (which stimulated interpretations that identify particular figures and sayings in the Bible with particular figures and interests in the histories of Israel and of the first Christian generation); or the individual's growth toward moral and spiritual integrity (which interpreted the Bible as a sourcebook for legal or ethical reasoning). If the formal quality of interpretation is thus always allegorical, a post-modern interpreter is in a much stronger position to appreciate and learn from earlier interpreters than would be a critic who participates in the modern critics' resolute resistance to and defamation of allegory.

Further, post-modern interpreters may productively disregard the modern norms that restrict interpretation to discursive genres. Although such interpretations might not readily be judged by strictly modern criteria, reviewers could draw on the critical wisdom relative to the genre in question to supply what is lacking in the modern repertoire. A film representation of the Davidic monarchy would not be answerable simply to the customary questions relative to historicity, anachronism, verisimilitude, and scholarly integrity but would also be answerable for the quality of lighting, staging, direction, acting, and soundtrack. A modern critic might wince at the thought that exquisite casting and a compelling soundtrack could redeem a filmed interpretation that fell short of a perfectly accurate historical interpretation, but a post-modern critic could articulate a judgment that took account of more dimensions than only the historical foundations.

The work of S. Moore stands as a prominent example of post-modern criticism in practice. (No single practitioner of post-modern OT criticism has emerged as prominently as Moore, though M. Bal, T. Beal, J. C. Exum, and T. Linafelt all have made significant contributions.) Moore's interpretations cross the disciplinary divisions that define the limits of critical-biblical inquiry; reverse relations of temporal priority to illuminate the writing of the NT authors; and set biblical rhetoric in the frame of various contemporary discourses, from deconstruction to post-Freudian psychoanalysis (see PSYCHOANALYTIC INTERPRETATION) to bodybuilding. His work moves comfortably from the judgments of modern exegetes to quotations from tabloid papers back to the biblical text. In Mark and Luke in Poststructualist Perspectives: Jesus Begins to Write (1992), Moore conducts a seminar among the two evangelists, modern biblical scholars, J. Lacan, J. Derrida, Plato, and James Joyce—with cameo appearances by countless other noteworthies. Poststructuralism and the NT (1994) sketches a Derridean perspective on John and a Foucauldian exploration of the theology of the cross. God's Gym (1996) interweaves the biblical discussions of God's body and of the body of Christ with bodybuilders' observations on their own field. Although Moore's contributions do little or nothing to advance the cause of modern biblical scholarship—as modern scholars' consternation at his work shows—he has shown the ballroom dancers of the biblical guild that "there's a whole lot of shakin' goin' on" in other venues. Where the modern judges of biblical scholarship may thunder, "There are no new steps!" Moore's extravagant pasa doble demonstrates that biblical interpretation cannot be constricted to modernity's mannered rumba.

Biblical scholars will not all adopt a markedly post-modern perspective, nor will most "post-modern" interpreters restrict their interpretive practice to obviously post-modern efforts. In this sense post-modernism will not take hold in biblical criticism—at least not in the foreseeable future. More important, however, the field has already registered the impact of post-modern biblical criticism as claims about determinancy, universality, univocity, and legitimacy sound increasingly muted and defensive. As generations of scholars who are accustomed to post-modern sensibilities enter the field of biblical criticism, the field should change from a hegemony of modern authority to a networked, post-modern polyphony of interpreters whose interests and works emphasize different interpretive practices—an appropriately post-modern development.

Bibliography: A. K. M. Adam, "The Future of Our Allusions," SBLSPS (1992) 5-13; What Is Postmodern Biblical Criticism? (1995); "Twisting to Destruction: A Memorandum on the Ethics of Interpretation," Perspectives in Religious Studies 23 (1996) 215-22. G. Aichele, "On Postmodern Biblical Criticism and Exegesis," Forum 5, 3 (1985) 31-35. J. C. Anderson and S. Moore (eds.), Mark and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies (1992). J. C. Anderson and J. Staley (eds.), Taking It Personally (Semeia 72, 1995). J. Arac (ed.), Postmodernism and Politics (1986). S. Aronowitz, Dead Artists, Live Theories, and Other Cultural Problems (1994). D. Attridge, G. Bennington, and R. Young (eds.), Poststructuralism and the Question of History (1987). M. Bal, Lethal Love: Feminist Literary Readings of Biblical Love Stories (1987); Death and Dissymmetry: The Politics of Coherence in the Book of Judges (1988); Murder and Difference: Gender, Genre, and Scholarship on Sisera's Death (1988). Z. Bauman, Modernity and Ambivalence (1991); Imitations of Postmodernity (1992); Postmodern Ethics (1993). T. K. Beal, The Book of Hiding: Gender, Ethnicity, Annihilation, and Esther (1997). T. K. Beal and D. M. Gunn (eds.), Reading Bibles, Writing Bodies: Identity and the Book (1996). W. Beardslee, "Poststructuralist Criticism," To Each Its Own Meaning (ed. S. McKenzie and S. Haynes, 1993) 221-36. C. Belsey, Critical Practice (1980). M. Berman, All That Is Solid Melts Into Air: The Experience of Modernity (1982). The Bible and Culture Collective, The Postmodern Bible (1995). D. Boyarin, A Radical Jew: Paul and the Politics of Identity (1994). F. Burnett, "Postmodern Biblical Exegesis: The Eve of Historical Criticism," Semeia 51 (1990) 51-80. J. Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990). M. Calinescu, Five Faces of Modernity: Modernism, Avant-garde, Decadence, Kitsch, Postmodernism (1987). J. Caputo, Radical Hermeneutics: Repetition, Deconstruction, and the Hermeneutic Project (1987). M. de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life (1984); Heterologies (1986); The Writing of History (1988). D. J. A. Clines, What Does Eve Do to Help? And Other Readerly Questions to the OT (1990). S. Critchley, The Ethics of Deconstruction: Derrida and Levinas (1992). S. Croatto, Biblical Hermeneutics: Toward a Theory of Reading as the Production of Meaning (1987). G. Deleuze and F. Guattari, Anti-Oedipus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia (1985); A Thousand Plateaus: Captialism and Schizophrenia (1987). J. Derrida, Of Grammatology (1976); Writing and Difference (1978); Limited Inc (1988); A Derrida Reader (1991); The Gift of Death (1995); Points (1995). J. C. Exum, Fragmented Women: Feminist Subversions of Biblical Narratives (1993); "Feminist Criticism," Judges and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies (ed. G. A. Yee, 1995) 65-90. D. N. Fewell, "Deconstructive Criticism," Judges and Method: New Approaches in Biblical Studies (ed. G. A. Yee, 1995) 119-45. S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980); Doing What Comes Naturally: Change, Rhetoric, and the Practice of Theory in Literary and Legal Studies (1989). H. Foster (ed.), The Anti-Aesthetic: Essays on Postmodern Culture (1983). M. Foucault, Language, Counter-memory, Practice: Selected Essays and Interviews (1977); Discipline and Punish (1979); The Foucault Reader (1984). S. Fowl, "Texts Don't Have Ideologies," Biblical Interpretation (1995) 15-34. R. Fowler, "Postmodern Biblical Criticism," Forum 5, 3 (1989) 3-30. N. Fraser, Unruly Practices: Power, Discourse, and Gender in Contemporary Social Theory (1989). H. L. Gates, Jr. (ed.), "Race," Writing, and Difference (1986). J. Habermas, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity: Twelve Lectures (1987). I. Hassan, The Postmodern Turn: Essays in Postmodern Theory and Culture (1987). O. O. Hendricks, "Guerrilla Exegesis: 'Struggle' as a Scholarly Vocation—A Post-Modern Approach to African-American Biblical Interpretation," Semeia 72 (1995) 73-90. L. Hutcheon, The Politics of Postmodernism (1989). A. Huyssen, "Mapping the Postmodern," New German Critique (1984) 5-52. L. Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1985); Speculum of the Other Woman (1985); The Irigaray Reader (1991); Sexes and Genealogies (1993). F. Jameson, Postmodernism or the Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1992). D. Jobling (ed.), Ideological Criticism of Biblical Texts (Semeia 59, 1993). D. Jobling and S. Moore (eds.), Poststructuralism as Exegesis (Semeia 54, 1992). L. E. Keck, "The Premodern Bible in the Postmodern World," Int 50 (1996) 130-41. S. Lovibond, "Feminism and Postmodernism," New Left Review (1989) 5-28. J.-F. Lyotard, The Postmodern Condition (1984); The Differend (1988); The Inhuman (1991); The Postmodern Explained (1992); Political Writings (1993). E. V. McKnight, Postmodern Use of the Bible: The Emergence of Reader-oriented Criticism (1988). E. McKnight and E. S. Malbon (eds.), The New Literary Criticism and the NT (1995). P. de Man, Allegories of Reading: Figural Language in Rousseau, Nietzsche, Rilke, and Proust (1979); Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1983²). J. P. Martin, "Towards a Postcritical Paradigm," NTS 33 (1987) 370-85. J. Milbank, Theology and Social Theory: Beyond Secular Reason (1990). S. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (1989); "Postmodernism and Biblical Studies: A Response to R. Fowler," Forum 5, 3 (1989) 36-41; Poststructuralism and the NT: Derrida and Foucault at the Foot of the Cross (1994); God's Gym: Divine Male Bodies of the Bible (1996). T. Nataoli and L. Hutcheon (eds.), A Postmodern Reader (1993). C. Norris, Deconstruction: Theory and Practice (1982); Derrida (1988); The Truth About Postmodernism (1993). D. Olson, "Deuteronomy as De-centering Center: Reflections on Postmodernism and the Quest for a Theological Center of the Hebrew Scriptures," Semeia 71 (1995) 119-32. G. Phillips (ed.), Text/History/Self in Structural and Poststructural Exegesis (Semeia 51, 1990). R. Rorty, Consequences of Pragmatism: Essays, 1972–80 (1985); Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity (1989). A. Ross (ed.) Universal Abandon? The Politics of Postmodernism (1988). E. Said, The World, the Text, and the Critic (1983); Culture and Imperialism (1993). I. Salusinszky (ed.), Criticism in Society (1989). S. Schneiders, "Does the Bible Have a Postmodern Message?" Postmodern Theology (ed. F. B. Burnham, 1989) 56-73. B. H. Smith, Contingencies of Value: Alternative Perspectives for Critical Theory (1988). G. Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1988). H. Staten, "How the Spirit (Almost) Became Flesh: Gospel of John," Representations 41 (1993) 34-57. P. G. P. de Villiers, "The End of Hermeneutics? On NT Studies and Postmodernism," Neotestamentica 25 (1991) 145-56. C. West, "Nietzsche's Prefiguration of Postmodern American Philosophy," boundary 2 (1981) 241-69; "F. Jameson's Marxist Hermeneutics," boundary 2 (1982/83) 177-200. R. Williams, The Politics of Modernism: Against the New Conformists (ed. T. Pinkney, 1996)

A. K. M. ADAM

PRIDEAUX, HUMPHREY (1648–1724)

Born at Padstow, Cornwall, May 3, 1648, P. studied at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford (BA 1672; MA 1675; BD 1682; DD 1686), where he was distinguished for his scholarship and appointed a lecturer in Hebrew (1679). P. subsequently followed an ecclesiastical career, holding church assignments and eventually becoming dean of Norwich (1702) after declining to become E. POCOCKE's successor as professor of Hebrew at Oxford (1691). P. died Nov. 1, 1724.

While still a student P. was involved in editing and writing projects at Oxford with J. FELL—annotating an edition of Florus and publishing an account of the Arundelian marbles. In 1679 he published sections from MAIMONIDES' writings in Hebrew and Latin as an aid for students learning rabbinic Hebrew and reading without vowel points. His work on Mohammed (1697), originally planned as part of a history of the Saracen Empire and Islam, sold vigorously, with three printings the first year, but was not much of a work of scholarship. His scholarly reputation is based on his history of the period between the end of the states of Israel and Judah and the origin of the church. His "connection" (1716–18), as it was called, was a widely used volume—the E. SCHÜRER of the eighteenth century—that was frequently reprinted (the 11th ed. came out in 1749) and was translated into French (1722) and German (1726).

Works: De jure Pauperis et Peregrini apud Judaeos (1679); The True Nature of Imposture Fully Display'd in the Life of Mahomet (1697); The Original Right of Tythes for the Maintenance of the Ministry(1709); The Old and NT Connected in the History of Jews and Neighbouring Nations from the Declension of the Kingdoms of Israel and Judah to the Time of Christ (2 vols., 1716–18; also pub. in other forms).

Bibliography: Anon., Life of P., with Several Tracts and Letters of His upon Various Subjects Never Before Published (1748). BB 5 (1760) 3422-38. A. Gordon, DNB 46 (1896) 352-54. J. Le Clerc, A Critical Examination of the Rev. Dean P.'s Connection of the Old and NT pt. 1 (ET 1722).

J. H. HAYES

PROCKSCH, OTTO (1874–1947)

Born Aug. 9, 1874, at Eisenberg, Thuringia, P. studied at Tübigen, Leipzig, Erlangen, and Göttingen (1893–97); his teachers included F. BUHL, A. Socin, J. WELLHAUSEN, and E. SCHÜRER. He taught at Königsberg as Privatdozent (1901–6) and at Griefswald (1906–25), becoming full professor in 1909 and spending 1907–8 as a fellow of the German Jerusalem Archaeological Institute, and at Erlangen (1925–39). He devoted his retirement to working on his THEOLOGY of the OT and died Apr. 7, 1947, at Alterschrofen, Germany.

P.'s scholarly production was not limited to the OT. He wrote studies on John the Baptist, Peter, and John and collaborated on G. KITTEL's Theological Dictionary of the NT, writing portions of the entries hagios, logos, luō and orgē. In OT studies, P. produced monographs and articles on the prophetic writings, the conception of history, and the historical traditions of the preexilic prophets (1902); the literary stratification and historical content of the prophetic source E (1906); Ezekiel's vision of his call (1920); the prophetic notion of the state (1933); and the prince and the priests in Ezekiel (1940–41). P. also wrote extensively on text-critical matters (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM), editing the Minor Prophets in the third edition of R. KITTEL's Biblia Hebraica (1933). He produced two major commentaries, both in the KAT series edited by E. SELLIN: Genesis, in which he treated the material of the three sources separately (1913), and Proto-Isaiah (1930). His compendious theology of the OT (1950) was published posthumously.

In contrast to many scholars of his day P. put great emphasis on both historical and theological questions in his approach to the OT. He attempted to work out a historically reliable picture of the patriarchs and their religion from the Genesis material rather than treating it as simply the reflection of much later conditions. He likewise insisted on the need for both penetrating the depths of the OT word through faith and reading the OT in conjunction with the NT.

Works: Geschichtbetrachtung und geschichtliche Überlieferung bei den vorexilischen Propheten (1902); Das nordhebräische Sagenbuch, die Elohimquelle (1906); Studien zur Geschichte der Septuaginta: Die Propheten (1910); Die Genesis (1913; 1924[2-3]); Die Septuaginta Hieronymi in Dodekapropheton (1914); "Die Berufsvision Hesekiels," BZAW 34 (1920) 141-48; RGS 2 (1926) 161-94 (autobiography with bibliography); Jesaja 1 (1930); Der Staatsgedanke in der Prophetie (1933); "Fürst und Priester bei Hesekiel," ZAW 58 (1940–41) 99-133; Theologie des Alten Testaments (1950).

Bibliography: F. Baumgärtel, TLZ 73 (1947) 49-52. W. Dommershausen, DBSup 8 (1972) 621-23. J. N. Schofield, "O. P., Theology of the OT," Contemporary OT Theologians (ed. R. B. Laurin, 1970) 91-120.

C. T. BEGG

PROFIAT DURAN (14th–15th cent.)

An astronomer, physician, polemicist, and Hebrew grammarian whose full Hebrew name was Isaac ben Mosheh Halevi, P. lived in Catalonia during the latter half of the fourteenth century. He was born either in Melgeuil or in Perpignan, where his family had lived for several generations, and studied TALMUD briefly in Germany. Whether various events reported about him actually occurred is not certain. He is said to have been forcibly converted to Christianity during the anti-Jewish riots of 1391. Financial records show that P. was living in Perpignan under the Christian name Honoratus de Bonafide as late as 1415.

P. wrote two anti-Christian polemics that mock such dogmas as the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, and the concept of original sin. The sarcastic tone of the first, entitled Al Tehi Ka'avotekha (Do Not Be Like Your Fathers), was well enough disguised that it was cited approvingly by Christians under a garbled version of the Hebrew name (Alteca Boteca). His second polemical work, Kelimat Haggoyim (The Gentiles' Disgrace) is dedicated to the prominent and powerful Jew Ḥasdai Crescas.

P.'s works cover a wide range of topics; their titles often include the word Ephod as an acronym for the Hebrew phrase 'ani Profiat Duran (I am Profiat Duran). He wrote a commentary on MAIMONIDES' Guide of the Perplexed as well as works on astronomy (Ḥeshev Ha'efod) and the history of Jewish persecution (Zikkaron Hashemadot).

Like many medieval Jewish Hebraists and biblicists, P. lamented the poor state of biblical studies among his contemporaries, ascribing partial responsibility to overemphasis on the Talmud and arguing that the Talmudic rabbis themselves would have supported biblical and Hebrew study. His grammar of biblical Hebrew, entitled Ma'aseh Efod, is arranged scientifically and attempts to provide a philosophical rationale for its grammatical principles. One of P.'s few contributions to the understanding of biblical Hebrew is his recognition that the nifal conjugation is fundamentally reflexive rather than passive. The grammar, which S. PAGNINUS translated into Latin, was widely cited by both Jews and non-Jews, and its fifteen pedagogic rules were frequently quoted.

Bibliography: J. Cohen, "P. D.'s The Reproach of the Gentiles and the Development of Jewish Anti-Christian Polemic," S. Simonsohn Jubilee Volume (ed. D. Carpi et al., 1993) 71-84. R. W. Emery, "New Light on P. D., 'the Efodi,' " JQR 58 (1967–68) 328-37. J. Friedländer and J. Kohn, Masse Efod . . . von P. D. (1865).

F. GREENSPAHN

PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HEBREW BIBLE

No general statements or discussions of the nature and function of prophecy appear in the HB. Nonetheless, there do appear some hints regarding how prophecy was understood. (1) The prophets were viewed as "warners" to alert the people to their infidelity, to make them aware of coming judgment, and to call them back to their traditional religion (2 Kgs 17:13-14). (2) The prophets were conceived of as preachers of repentance calling for a return to God (Zech 1:4). (3) The prophets were predictors of the future, and the authenticity of their office and message was to be judged by the fulfillment of their predictions (Deut 18:20-22). (4) The prophets were authors of historiographical works (2 Chr 12:15; 13:22). (5) The prophets were proclaimers of mysteries and messages that they themselves perhaps did not completely understand (see the interpretation in Daniel 9 of the seventy years in Jer 25:1-14; 29:10 as seventy sabbatical, or 490, years).

In Num 12:6-8 and Deut 34:10-12, Moses is declared to be the archetypal prophet, exceeding all others, in spite of Deut 18:18 with its promise of a prophet like him. Thus he is depicted as the prophet by whom all other prophets must be judged; and, with all other prophets in a subordinate position to Moses, the prophetic CANON (Joshua–Malachi) is placed in a secondary position to the Torah. (Note how the conclusions of two divisions of the canon subordinate other prophecy to Mosaic prophecy and Torah: Deut 34:10-12; Mal 4:4.)

In early Judaism and Christianity new directions and additional emphases may be seen in the understanding and interpretation of the prophets. PHILO emphasized the origin, nature, and mode of prophetic revelation and knowledge (an issue already noted in Jer 23:18-22; for the main Philonic texts, see D. Winston, Philo of Alexandria [1981] 153-56). H. Wolfson (1947, 2:3-72) summarized Philo's teaching on the four functions of prophecy as "prediction, propitiation, legislation, vision of things incorporeal" and the three types of prophecy (or revelation) as "prophecy through the Divine Spirit, by the Divine Voice, and through angels." Philo's employment of Plato's conception of inspiration, ecstasy, or frenzy is significant. In the Timaeus Plato had associated the mantic faculty with that part of the soul located in the liver and concluded that true divination occurs only when the power of thought is shackled by sleep or illness or some paroxysm of frenzy. In a similar vein Philo declared: "The prophet utters nothing that is his own, but all his utterances are of alien derivation, the prompting of another." The prompter is God, by whom the prophet's "chords are invisibly plucked and smitten" (Who Is the Heir? 259; Winston's tr. 153). Philo confined such experiences to the just and upright, to those of moral perfection. In his Life of Moses he explored the prophetic role of Moses in detail (2.187-291).

In the Hebrew canon the designation nebiim (prophets) for the books Joshua–Malachi (excluding Daniel) indicates that prophetical works were conceived more broadly than in the Christian (Greek) canon, where only the books Isaiah–Malachi (including Daniel) were designated prophetic. This would suggest that a prophetic book was one written by an inspired person and combined narrative, prediction, moral teaching, and denunciation of sin. This view of prophets and of prophetical books is also suggested by JOSEPHUS, who, in discussing the twenty-two works he called "our books" or "our scriptures," wrote: "Five are the books of Moses, comprising the laws and the traditional history. . . . From the death of Moses until Artaxerxes, who succeeded Xerxes as king of Persia, the prophets subsequent to Moses wrote the history of the events of their own times in thirteen books. The remaining four books contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life" (Cont. Ap. 1.39-41). For Josephus, who emphasized the role of prophets in his history, the exact succession of prophets had failed following Artaxerxes; but prophecy per se had not totally ceased since Josephus even understood himself as performing an aspect of the prophetic role—namely, prediction of the future (see L. Feldman [1990]).

In the early church and at Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), the Prophets and other prophetic literature—in fact, practically all the literature that became the HB—were read through two perspectives: (1) as if it were apocalyptic literature (see APOCALYPTICISM)—that is, as if it were all written as prediction of the last days whose true meaning would be disclosed in the final events of the end time (note Daniel's reading of Jeremiah, already mentioned); and (2) as if the life, history, and destiny of the two respective communities were the objects of the prophetic predictions and descriptions. Such a reading presupposed (1) that the biblical materials or prophecies contain hidden or secondary meanings and frames of reference (something like what has come to be called the sensus plenior in Roman Catholic interpretation) that transcend the simple and commonsense reading, and (2) that this secondary dimension of the text had become evident through its subsequent fulfillment or manifestation. NT and Qumran authors did not discuss whether the original hearers/readers understood this secondary or true referent.

In Mishnaic and Talmudic Judaism (see TALMUD) one finds the following emphases and perspectives on the prophets (see N. Glatzer [1946] and the collection of texts in H. Bialik and Y. Rannitzky [1992]). (1) The prophets are subordinate to Moses, and thus prophetic preaching is subordinate to the law (b. Šabb. 104a). (2) The prophets were a link in the chain of tradition from Moses to later generations: "Moses received the law from Sinai and committed it to Joshua, and Joshua to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets committed it to the men of the Great Synagogue [a legendary group of 120 exiles who returned with Ezra]" (m. ʾAbot 1:1). (3) The prophets made no innovations not covered in the law: "They neither took away from nor added aught to what is written in the Torah save only the reading of the Megillah" (m. Meg. 14a). This perspective is somewhat modified in other traditions, where the prophet is viewed as a rabbi who brings new insights out of old treasures (Glatzer, 129). These first three features mean that prophets were considered more as witnesses to previous revelation than as sources of new revelation; they were fundamentally proclaimers and interpreters of the law. (4) The age of prophecy ended with the fall of the first Temple, or with the age of Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, although revelation continued through the Bath Qol, with the wise men being replacements for the prophets (b. B. Bat. 12a; b. Sanh. 11a). (5) Worthiness and moral uprightness were required of the prophet: "The Holy One, blessed be He, causes His Divine presence to rest only on him who is strong, wealthy, wise, and meek" (b. Ned. 38a). (6) Many prophets arose in Israel; according to one tradition, twice the number of people leaving Egypt. More specifically, it was argued that there were forty-eight prophets (including seven female prophets—Sarah, Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, Abigail, Huldah, and Esther) representing all the tribes (b. Meg. 14a; b. Sukk. 27b). (7) The notion of the prophets as representatives of the "merit of Israel" before God appears in many early medieval Jewish writers as an apologetic against the view that the prophets had proclaimed the end of Israel (see Glatzer, 130-36).

An anonymous work, probably Palestinian in origin (1st cent. CE?), the so-called Lives of the Prophets (for an ET see OTP 2:379-99; for a major study, see A. Schwemer [1995]) contains material about the prophets that supplements the biblical text: "The names of the prophets, and where they are from, and where they died and how, and where they lie." Surviving in ARMENIAN, Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), Greek, Latin, and Syriac versions, the work treats the Major and Minor prophets, Daniel, and the seven nonliterary prophets noted in the HB, giving evidence of an interest in filling out the biographies of the prophets. Hebrews 11:37 may indicate some knowledge of this material.

Within the developing church the ideas of a progressive revelation of the divine will through history, of JESUS and the church as the culmination of OT law and prophecy, and of the fulfillment of prophecy as proof of the authenticity and correctness of the Christian faith became staples in the church's exposition of its theology. The tendencies present in INNER-BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION in the NT became more overt during the patristic period. The entire HB was widely read as prophecy, in the sense of promise and fulfillment, type and anti-type. The author of the Epistle of BARNABAS interpreted ceremonial and cultic regulations and actions as hidden prefigurations and predictions of Christ and the church. JUSTIN MARTYR, especially in his Dialogue with Trypho, argued that the fulfillment of OT prophecies by Jesus and the church proved the truthfulness of Christianity, the transitory nature of the old covenant, and the church's replacement of Israel. In his On First Principles, especially in 4.1, ORIGEN argued that the fulfillment of prophecy confirmed the divinity of Christ and the INSPIRATION of Scripture. The church fathers, like the NT authors, found Psalms to be a storehouse of predictions.

In their debates with Judaism many of the church fathers tended to read texts understood by both Jews and Christians as messianic in a metaphorical sense to make them more applicable to new claims. The debate between church and synagogue over prophecies and their fulfillment often centered around whether the events that gave rise to the church really fulfilled OT prophecies, Jews arguing negatively and Christians arguing affirmatively (see R. Wilken [1993]). The main issue was primarily the question of the reference of the texts—that is, whether the messianic age had begun with Jesus or whether it still lay in the future.

Members of the ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL, especially THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, were more cautious in their finding of prophecies in the HB than were most of the fathers. Theodore tended to limit the texts to those so read in the NT. Thus he considered only a handful of psalms to be predictions about Christ, whereas AUGUSTINE read practically all the psalms prophetically and typologically. (For Augustine's theory of revelation and prophecy, see his The Literal Interpretation of Genesis bk. 12.)

A paradigm shift in the approach to prophecy can be seen among medieval Jewish philosophers, who sought to combine Torah and rational philosophy along the lines of the Muslims who studied Plato and Aristotle (the falasifa). Foremost in this regard were SAADIA, JUDAH HALEVI, and MAIMONIDES (see Wolfson; A. Reines [1969–70, 1970]; A. Altmann [1978]; J. Macy [1986]).

Islamic philosophers had made several deductions about prophecy: (1) Prophecy (revelation) was a natural process; (2) prophecy was effected by God indirectly through an intermediary, the Active Intellect; and (3) certain qualifications were required of the recipient of prophetic revelation, including natural endowments, training in moral and practical virtues, and intellectual virtues and knowledge acquired through instruction in the arts and sciences. Prophetic revelation took place when the soul developed to a state of independence from the body and could reunite with the Active Intellect (sometimes referred to as the Holy Spirit or Gabriel). Jewish philosophers objected to the principle that prophecy was the result of natural causation consequent on one's congenital, moral, and intellectual perfection. For them, God's will was involved, although for Maimonides only indirectly (see Altmann). Maimonides wrote: "The quiddity of prophecy, in truth, is an emanation that flows forth from God through the medium of the Active Intellect, first upon the rational faculty, and then upon the imaginative faculty" (tr. from Reines [1969–70] 327). As in the Bible, Jewish tradition and philosophy assigned Moses a superior status as prophet. Reines has described the differences Maimonides perceived between Mosaic and usual prophecy as follows: "In a well-known passage, Maimonides enumerates four differences between ordinary and Mosaic prophecy. Ordinary prophecy is apprehended in dreams or visions; Mosaic prophecy in full consciousness. Ordinary prophecy comes by means of an angel; Mosaic prophecy without an angel. The apprehension of ordinary prophecy is accompanied by fear and terror; Mosaic prophecy comes peacefully. Ordinary prophecy arrives involuntarily and unexpectedly; Moses' prophecy comes at will. These four differences are derivative, however, and they do not in themselves constitute the fundamental distinction between ordinary prophets and Moses. This distinction is that the ordinary prophets prophesied through the medium of imagination and Moses did not" (1969–70, 328-29). Although Moses received the law through nonimaginative means, he wrote the law in a subprophetic form—that is, as imaginative literature.

The goals of prophecy for Maimonides were the promulgation of divine law, the popular instruction in the law, and the urging of persons to adhere to the law. Like Philo, Maimonides read two senses into scriptural texts: an exoteric sense for the common populace, which could actually be deceptive if interpreted consistently in a literal reading, and an esoteric sense for the learned. For him, some of the "events" associated with the prophets, e.g., Hosea's marriage, were not historical.

Maimonides' synthesis, attempting a harmony between faith and reason, Scripture and philosophy, tradition and Aristotelian thought, had a counterpart in the work of THOMAS AQUINAS, who was familiar with Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed in Latin translation. However, since Thomas freed "the cognitive act from any link with the transcendent," he argued that prophecy was a divine gift, a supernatural experience (Altmann, 9; his article provides references to the main passages in the writings of Maimonides and Thomas).

Major discussions of the nature of prophecy and how prophetic knowledge and revelation were received and related to the divine and to the philosophy of knowledge appear in the writings of many medieval Christian theologians. J.-P. Torrell (1977, 1992) has collected and commented on much of this material. For example, in the prologue to his commentary on Psalms (PL 191.55-62; ET in A. Minnis and A. Scott, Medieval Literary Theory and Criticism c. 1100–c. 1375: The Commentary Tradition [1988, 1991^2] 105-12), PETER LOMBARD described the various forms in which prophecy occurred: "Prophecy, then, is divine inspiration or revelation which proclaims the future outcome of events with immutable truth. Hence, a prophecy is called 'a vision' [visio] and the prophet is 'a seer' [videns]. Prophecy happens in four ways: through actual events or words, and through that which only seems to be said or to happen, that is, through dreams [sommia] and visions [visiones]. . . . There is yet another kind of prophecy over and above these, which has a more honorable status than they have. This happens when prophecy takes place as a result of the pure, unaided inspiration of the Holy Spirit, without any outside help in the form of an event, words, vision, or dream. This was how David prophesied, solely through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit" (108-9).

Jewish rabbis, who were more exegetes than philosophers, e.g., RASHI and A. IBN EZRA, carried out more traditional interpretation. Although Rashi read some of the HB prophecies as being related to the yet unrealized messianic age, he associated many of these with events in the course of Israelite history. The child spoken of in Isa 7:14 was thus interpreted as Isaiah's or as King Ahaz's son (Hezekiah) but was not understood messianically. In this Rashi was followed by ANDREW OF ST. VICTOR.

Later biblical interpreters like NICHOLAS OF LYRA argued that prophetical promises could have a double literal sense, one fulfilled in ancient times and another fulfilled in Jesus or to be realized in the end time. Sometimes HB (and NT) promises/prophecies were combined with non-biblical "prophetic" material like the Hermetic literature (see EGYPTOLOGY) and the SIBYLLINE ORACLES, e.g., by JOACHIM OF FIORE (see R. Southern [1972]). HB prophecies were occasionally read by Jews as indicating a very near dawning of the final age, as in some of the writings of ABRAVANEL, who was more philosopher than exegete (see J. Malherbe [1993]).

The Protestant Reformation witnessed radical readjustments in the overall interpretation of Scripture and in Scripture's role in theology. There was little break, however, in the understanding of the HB prophets. LUTHER's refusal to return to the ordering of the Hebrew canon even when adopting the contents of that canon typifies Christianity's veneration of the Prophets over other portions of the HB. In the Christian canon the ordering of the books ("the canonical intentionality") highlighted the prophetic division so that it became the key for reading the whole. In spite of Luther's emphasis on a literal reading of the text and his break with the use of the QUADRIGA, Christian and christological interest dominated his reading of the HB and especially of the prophetical books. Nonetheless, Luther often made suggestions about interpretation that sound quite modern. In his preface to the book of Isaiah, he wrote: "Two things are necessary to explain the prophet. The first is a knowledge of grammar, and this may be regarded as having the greatest weight. The second is more necessary, namely, a knowledge of the historical background, not only as an understanding of the events themselves as expressed in letters and syllables but as at the same time embracing rhetoric and dialectic, so that the figures of speech and the circumstances may be carefully heeded."

Commenting on Zech 1:7 in his 1526 commentary, Luther declared that "the books of the prophets are . . . to be divided into many discourses"; but he offered no detailed discourse analysis. In his Habakkuk commentary (1525), he stressed the role of the prophet as a preacher of judgment, which is intended to bring some to conversion. In the preface to the same book, Luther noted that the prophets pronounced "many prophecies that pertained only to their own time and served only their time." The futuristic and traditional messianic orientation, however, received the basic emphasis in Luther, as illustrated in his introduction to Joel: "All the prophets have one and the same message, for this is their one aim: they are all looking toward the coming of Christ or to the coming Kingdom of Christ."

CALVIN's view of the prophets and his exposition of their works (see T. Parker [1986] 176-223) was not radically different from Luther's but did focus more on the prophets as preachers of the law. In the preface to his Isaiah commentary, Calvin wrote: "On the office of the Prophets it is usual for commentators to write long essays. But I prefer to summarize and say that we should relate the Prophets to the Law, from which they drew their teaching like streams from a spring. They made it their rule and so may justly be called and declared its interpreters; in nothing were they independent." Calvin's exposition of the prophetical books incorporated detailed analysis of the historical background to the prophets' activity; and he was less prone than other reformers to find predictions of Jesus in some texts, instead seeing many prophecies related to the course of ancient Israelite history.

Many second-generation Protestants compared the great Reformers to the Hebrew prophets and saw them, like Elijah against the Baal worshipers, as fighting the infidelity of the day (for them, the Roman Catholic Church). This drawing of analogies also resulted in the HB prophet's being viewed as if they were ancient Luthers and Calvins.

In his succinct but highly influential Annotationes on the OT, H. GROTIUS related prophetic texts usually understood as christological predictions to events in the normal course of ancient Israelite history. He did acknowledge that these could be applied to NT events and beliefs if given a spiritual or secondary meaning.

While Grotius was providing a detached interpretation of the Bible, other scholars were involved in an impassioned exposition of the prophetical material (especially the books of Daniel and Revelation) to locate the keys and clues to the course and culmination of history (see R. Popkin [1984]). Numerous persons claimed to be modern-day prophets. (M. Nostradamus [1503–66] was already a legend in his own day.) C. Hill (1993) has chronicled the diversity of popular biblical interpretation during the tumultuous period of the English Civil War, which overlapped the Thirty Years War (1618–48). For the first time in history biblical interpretation became truly democratic, and the temporary freedom of publication allowed for a free flow of ideas.

The Cambridge Platonist J. Smith (1618–52), combating the enthusiasts of his day, produced a major work entitled Of Prophesie (published in his Select Discourses [1660]), which drew on a host of medieval Jewish interpreters. He emphasized the rational dimension of the prophetic experience, although recognizing a mantic or ecstatic element, and argued that prophecy ceased in the days of the early church. His work was later translated into Latin and widely circulated by J. LE CLERC.

B. SPINOZA, who along with T. HOBBES was considered one of the main arch-heretics of the seventeenth century, provided extensive discussion of prophecy in his Tractatus Theologico-politicus (1670; ET, R. Elwes [1883]). Spinoza set out to argue against the association of philosophy and theology/religion and for the independence of the two. In the process he, like E. HERBERT, reduced religion and the fundamental dogmas of Scripture to a set of simple doctrines accessible to all, which he summarized as follows: "There exists a God, that is, a Supreme Being, who loves justice and charity, and who must be obeyed by whosoever would be saved; that the worship of this being consists in the practice of justice and love towards one's neighbour" (186-87). In turn, he reduced the prophets and the Bible to the level of the human, concluding that: (a) "The prophets only perceived God's revelation by the aid of imagination . . . by words and figures either real or imaginary" (24-25). "The power of prophecy implies not a peculiarly perfect mind, but a peculiarly vivid imagination" (19). Here he set himself against the view developed by Maimonides and others that prophetic knowledge came through the rational faculty. (b) "Prophecies varied, not only according to the imagination and physical temperament of the prophet, but also according to his particular opinions; and further, that prophecy never rendered the prophet wiser than he was before" (27). A cheerful prophet's words were cheerful; one who was melancholy spoke of wars and massacres. The educated and cultivated prophets perceived the mind of God in a cultivated way, and so forth. (c) "The prophets could be, and in fact were, ignorant" (39). (d) Prophets frequently "held conflicting opinions" (39). (e) The goal of prophetic activity was not knowledge but piety and obedience. (f) Since Spinoza did not believe in miracles—those in the Bible were events whose causes were not known at the time—predictions of the future were not based on supernatural revelation. (For a defense of the rationality of prophecy against Spinoza by E. Stillingfleet [1635–99], see G. Reedy, The Bible and Reason [1985] 145-55.) Spinoza emphasized the necessity of understanding the original context in which Scripture was produced and prophecies were delivered: "who was the speaker, what was the occasion, and to whom were the words addressed" (105).

Throughout the seventeenth and much of the eighteenth century, many British scientists and mathematicians—some associated with the Royal Society (founded in 1662) and most millenarians—worked to produce an analysis of biblical prophecy that would place the subject on a firm scientific basis (see Popkin [1984]). Foremost among this group were J. Napier (1550–1617), H. MORE, R. BOYLE, I. NEWTON, and W. WHISTON. A major catalyst for this approach was J. MEDE's Clavis Apocalyptica (1627); primarily concerned with the interpretation of the book of Revelation, the work had widespread influence. Newton worked on biblical prophecy and CHRONOLOGY throughout much of his adult life and left many unpublished manuscripts on the topic. His successor at Cambridge, Whiston, delivered the 1707 Boyle lectures (established under Newton's influence for the purpose of defending Christianity) on The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (1708), which represents a classical, if somewhat overdrawn, statement of this approach.

In opposition, Deists (see DEISM) called into question the two foundational blocks of traditional Christian apologetics—namely, NT fulfillment of HB prophecies, and miracles as authenticating the truthfulness of the Bible and Christian origins. In A Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724) and The Scheme of Literal Prophecy Considered (1726), A. COLLINS challenged Whiston and the argument from prophecy and denied the possibility of predicting future events. Collins's basic arguments were twofold: (a) The parallels between HB prophecies (predictions) and their supposed fulfillment in Christ and in the early church are arrived at only when the HB texts are understood and applied in secondary, typical, mystical, allegorical, or enigmatic ways—that is, in a sense different from the obvious and literal sense they bear in the HB. (b) Prophecies should be understood in terms that would have made sense in the context of their original employment. Isaiah 7:14, for example, must be understood in terms that would have been comprehensible to King Ahaz, the Judean ruler at the time.

At the same time that Deists and others were attacking traditional Christian apologetic, biblical scholars began focusing more on the ancient referents of the prophecies and playing down the idea that the prophets predicted events far into the future. This new emphasis can be seen in P. Pezron's (1639–1706) Essai d'un commentaire litéral et historique sur les prophétes (1693) and in S. White's (1677/8–1716) Commentary on the Prophet Isaiah (1709).

A further development in the early eighteenth century concerns the order and arrangement of material in the prophetical books. Near the end of the seventeenth century, scholars began to treat the sixth chapter of Isaiah as an account of the prophet's inaugural call, a rather novel idea at the time. This reading meant that the opening chapters (1–5) must belong to some period after the call; thus the order of the materials in the book could not be chronological. There followed attempts at determining the placement of these chapters and the principles around which the books were structured, what today is known as REDACTION CRITICISM. These issues were especially explored by J. KOPPE in his notes to the German edition of R. LOWTH's translation of Isaiah (1780–81), which laid the foundations for the theory of a Deutero-Isaiah and for the division of the book of Isaiah into a multiplicity of independent oracles. The issues were also explored by T. Howes (1783), who was the first to examine how the prophetical books may have been redacted. Howes explored various options: The speeches were ordered chronologically in terms of their original delivery, in terms of when they were fulfilled, or poetically/rhetorically in an order "best suited to the purpose of persuasion and argumentation" (139).

The eighteenth century also witnessed the development of the theory that the prophets were poets and that the prophetical books are generally poetic in form (see POETRY, HB). Lowth gave widespread popularity to this view in his Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (1753; ET 1787), especially in lectures 18-21, and in his translation of Isaiah (1778). He translated most of Isaiah in poetic form and was followed by others who applied his approach to different prophetical books. Nonetheless, the idea of prophetic speech as primarily poetic was not generally accepted by translators until the second half of the twentieth century. The translators of the RV (1885) considered but declined to accept the idea.

Four factors dominated nineteenth-century research on the prophets and led to the development of approaches and methods already present in earlier discussions. In many respects these developments were a modified form of Spinoza's view of the biblical writings as reflections on poetics, morals, and religion produced by particular people, under particular circumstances, to meet particular needs.

First, source or historical-literary criticism of the prophetic books paralleled that of PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, seeking to divide authentic from inauthentic material—that is, material deriving from the prophet whose name the book bore from material deriving from secondary additions, accretions, and editorial activity. Efforts were made to place the various components making up a prophetic book within particular historical and theological contexts. Typical and exemplary of this effort was B. DUHM's Isaiah commentary (1892).

A second factor was a consequence of Pentatuchal research. The theories of K. GRAF, A. KUENEN, and J. WELLHAUSEN led to the conclusion that the prophets preceded the law in the course of Israelite history. The prophets were, therefore, more likely to have been catalysts for the production of law rather than interpreters of preexisting codes. This view was expounded by Duhm (1875), Kuenen (1877), and Wellhausen (1878, 1883^2; ET 1885).

Third, nineteenth-century studies tended to reduce the essence of religion to morality. The prophets thus came to be viewed as the founders and advocates of ethical religion as opposed to cult and priesthood, which propounded a ritualized religion. Kuenen expressed this widely held view when he wrote: "Ethical monotheism is their [the prophets'] creation. They . . . ascended to the belief in one only, holy, and righteous God, who realizes his will, or moral good, in the world, and they have, by preaching and writing, made that belief the inalienable property of our race" (1877, 585).

A fourth and perhaps overarching factor was an emphasis on the prophets as spokespersons to their own times and thus not as predictors of events to come in some indeterminate future. Although the expression became common later, nineteenth-century scholars stressed the prophets as "forthtellers not foretellers." This demanded that the prophet and the prophetic materials must be understood in light of their historical contexts since their messages were intended for a contemporary audience and not for readers centuries later.

In the twentieth century issues in prophetical research have become more variegated and complex. Good surveys of this research, however, have been provided by H. Rowley (1945), O. Eissfeldt (1951), and G. Tucker (1985) and with selected readings, by P. Neumann (1979), D. Petersen (1986), R. Gordon (1995), and Y. Gitay (1997). Seven primary areas have received the greatest amount of attention.

The issue of prophetic speech forms was raised in a significant way by H. GUNKEL in his form-critical studies (see J. Hayes [1973]; see also FORM CRITICISM). He argued that prophets delivered their messages orally and that the original oracles were short, metrical, and sometimes enigmatic and that they were presented in passionate, ecstatic speech. Such speech might be either a promise or a threat. Gunkel also argued that the prophets borrowed speech forms from various areas of Israelite life—the cult, warfare, law courts, popular wisdom, and so forth. C. WESTERMANN (1960; ET 1967) and others have sought to further Gunkel's work in this area but without arriving at any specific and absolute criteria to determine an original prophetic genre. A survey of the variety of prophetic speech materials has been given by M. Sweeney (1996, 1-30).

A second major area of investigation has focused on the PSYCHOLOGY of prophetic experience or what earlier researchers referred to as ecstatic experience. Although this matter had been a long-standing concern, G. HÖLSCHER's 1914 work took transnormal experiences as characteristic of prophetic behavior and activity. For several decades scholars pursued this dimension of prophecy vigorously, but subsequent investigations and studies have tended to minimize this area as a helpful key to understanding the prophets (see Gordon [1995] 5-9, 21).

A third field of investigation has been the relationship of prophets to the cult or to general worship in ancient Israel. Although earlier scholars like W. R. SMITH and Hölscher had given consideration to this area of research (see W. Bellinger [1984]), it was S. MOWINCKEL (1923) who presented a case for placing prophets into the worship life of ancient Israel. A. JOHNSON (1979) was a most consistent defender of a close relationship between the prophets, cult, and psalmody. For a time in the 1960s and 1970s, prophets were understood as mediators in covenant renewal services and/or as guardians of the covenant relationship (see W. Zimmerli [1965]). This position reasserted the old idea that the prophets were preachers of the law.

Fourth, G. von RAD and many of his students drew on the perspectives of TRADITION HISTORY to enlighten prophetic preaching. In the second volume of his OT Theology (1960; ET 1965), von Rad interpreted the prophets in terms of which ancient historical traditions (exodus, wilderness, David, Zion, etc.) they used in their preaching and how they employed these in speaking about both the past and the future.

Fifth, discovery and use of numerous ancient Near Eastern texts have produced what many scholars consider to be numerous parallels to the HB prophets and prophecy. These texts are in Egyptian, Akkadian, and Aramaic; they indicate that biblical prophecy should be studied in light of the ancient Near Eastern background. Assessment of the relevance and content of this material is offered by M. Ellis (1989) and N. Shupak (1989–90; see also the discussions in Gordon [1995] 29-73 and in H. Huffmon, ABD, 5:477-82).

Sixth, one of the blossoming fields of prophetic research has to do with sociocultural and anthropological aspects of prophecy (see J. Kselman [1985]; M. Buss [1980, 1981]; R. Wilson [1980]; R. Culley and T. Overholt [1982]; Gordon [1995] 275-412). Issues in this area focus on the social role of the prophets, their relationships to the contemporary culture and institutions, conflicts with other prophets, and the function of prophetic literature in a culture.

Finally, the origin and editing of the prophetical books has long been a concern of scholarship. In the last decades of the twentieth century, redaction criticism and an interest in the final form of the texts have produced an explosion of study in this area (see T. Collins [1993]; Gordon [1995] 415-522).

Bibliography: A. Altmann, "Maimonides and Thomas Aquinas: Natural or Divine Prophecy?" AJS Review 3 (1978) 1-19. J. Barton, Oracles of God: Perceptions of Ancient Prophecy in Israel After the Exile (1986); "History and Rhetoric in the Prophets," The Bible as Rhetoric: Studies in Biblical Persuasion and Credibility (Warwick Studies in Philosophy and Literature, ed. M. Warner, 1990) 51-64. P.-M. Beaude, "L'Accomplissement des prophéties chez R. Simon," RSPT 60 (1976) 3-35. W. H. Bellinger, Psalmody and Prophecy (JSOTSup 27, 1984). H. N. Bialik and Y. H. Rannitzky, The Book of Legends = Sefer ha-aggadah: Legends from the Talmud and Midrash (1992) 472-81. J. Blenkinsopp, A History of Prophecy in Israel (1983, 1996[2]). L. L. Bronner, "Biblical Prophetesses Through Rabbinic Lenses," Judaism 40 (1991) 171-83. M. J. Buss, "The Social Psychology of Prophecy," Prophecy (BZAW 150, ed. J. A. Emerton, 1980) 1-11; "An Anthropological Perspective upon Prophetic Call Narratives," Semeia 21 (1981) 9-30. R. P. Carroll, When Prophecy Failed: Cognitive Dissonance in the Prophetic Traditions of the OT (1979). R. Coggins et al., Israel's Prophetic Tradition (FS P. R. Ackroyd, 1982). T. Collins, The Mantle of Elijah: The Redaction Criticism of the Prophetical Books (Biblical Seminar 20, 1993). R. C. Culley and T. W. Overholt (eds.), Anthropological Perspectives on OT Prophecy (Semeia 21, 1982). B. Duhm, Die Theologie des Propheten als Grundlage für die innere Entwicklungsgeschichte des israelitschen Religion (1875); Das Buch Jesaia (1892, 1968[5]). O. Eissfeldt, "The Prophetic Literature," The OT and Modern Study: A Generation of Discovery and Research (ed. H. H. Rowley, 1951) 115-61. M. deJ. Ellis, "Observations on Mesopotamian Oracles and Prophetic Texts: Literary and Historiographic Considerations," JCS 41 (1989) 127-86. L. H. Feldman, "Prophets and Prophecy in Josephus," JTS n.s. 41 (1990) 386-422. L. E. Froom, The Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers: The Historical Development of Prophetic Interpretations (4 vols., 1945–54). Y. Gitay (ed.), Prophecy and Prophets: The Diversity of Contemporary Issues in Scholarship (SBL Semeia Studies, 1997). N. N. Glatzer, "A Study of the Talmudic Interpretation of Prophecy," Review of Religion 10 (1946) 115-37. R. P. Gordon (ed.), "The Place Is Too Small for Us": The Israelite Prophets in Recent Scholarship (Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 5, 1995). R. Gray, Prophetic Figures in Late Second Temple Jewish Palestine: The Evidence from Josephus (1993). F. E. Greenspahn, "Why Prophecy Ceased," JBL 108 (1989) 37-49. J. H. Hayes, "The History of the Form-critical Study of Prophecy," SBLSP (ed. G. McRae, 1973) 1:60-99. A. J. Heschel, The Prophets (1962). C. Hill, The English Bible and the Seventeenth-century Revolution (1993). G. Hölscher, Die Propheten: Untersuchungen zur Religionensgeschichte Israels (1914). T. Howes, Doubts Concerning the Translation and Notes of the Bishop of London to Isaiah, Vindicating Ezekiel, Isaiah, and Other Jewish Prophets from Disorder in Arrangement (1783). R. R. Hutton, Charisma and Authority in Israelite Society (1994) 105-37. A. R. Johnson, The Cultic Prophet in Ancient Israel (1944, 1962[2]); The Cultic Prophet and Israel's Psalmody (1979). E. König, "Prophecy," ERE 10 (1919) 384-93. J. S. Kselman, "The Social World of the Israelite Prophets: A Review Article," RStR 11 (1985) 120-29. A. Kuenen, The Prophets and Prophecy in Israel (2 vols., 1875; ET, 1 vol., 1877). J. Lindblom, Prophecy in Ancient Israel (1962). R. Lowth, Isaiah: A New Translation; With a Preliminary Dissertation, and Notes Critical, Philological, and Explanatory (1778). J. Macy, "Prophecy in al-Farabi and Maimonides: The Imaginative and Rational Faculties," Maimonides and Philosophy (ed. S. Pines and Y. Yovel, 1986) 185-201. J. S. Malherbe, "Abravanel's Theory of Prophecy with Special Reference to His Commentary on Deuteronomy 18:9-22" (diss., University of Stellenbosch, 1993). J. L. Mays and P. J. Achtemeier (eds.), Interpreting the Prophets (1987). S. Mowinckel, Psalmenstudien III: Kultprophetie und prophetische Psalmen (1923); Prophecy and Tradition: The Prophetic Books in the Light of the Study of the Growth and History of the Tradition (1946). P. H. A. Neumann (ed.), Das Prophetenverständnis in der deutschsprachigen Forschung seit H. Ewald (Wege der Forschung 307, 1979). T. W. Overholt, Prophecy in Cross-cultural Perspective: A Sourcebook for Biblical Researchers (Sources for Biblical Study 17, 1986). T. H. L. Parker, Calvin's OT Commentaries (1986). D. L. Petersen, The Roles of Israel's Prophets (JSOTSup 17, 1981); (ed.) Prophecy in Israel (IRT 10, 1986). R. H. Popkin, "Predicting, Prophesying, Divining, and Foretelling from Nostradamus to Hume," History of European Ideas 5 (1984) 117-35. L. Ramlot, "Prophétisme," DBSup 8 (1972) 811-1222. A. J. Reines, "Maimonides' Concept of Mosaic Prophecy," HUCA 40-41 (1969–70) 325-61; Maimonides and Abrabanel on Prophecy (1970). H. G. Reventlow, "Die Prophetie im Urteil B. Duhms," ZTK 85 (1988) 259-74. T. H. Robinson, Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel (1923, 1953²). A. Rofé, The Prophetical Stories (1982; ET 1988). H. H. Rowley, "The Nature of OT Prophecy in the Light of Recent Study," HTR 38 (1945) 1-38 = his The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays (1965²) 95-134. A. M. Schwemer, Studien zu Frühjüdischen Prophetenlegenden Vitae Prophetarum (3 vols., TSAJ 49-50, 1995). N. Shupak, "Egyptian 'Prophecy' and Biblical Prophecy: Did the Phenomenon of Prophecy, in the Biblical Sense, Exist in Ancient Egypt?" JEOL 31 (1989-90) 5-40. W. R. Smith, The Prophets of Israel and Their Place in History to the Close of the Eighth Century BC (1882, 1895²), with notes by T. K. Cheyne. R. W. Southern, "Aspects of the European Tradition of History Writing: 3. History as Prophecy," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society 5, 22 (1972) 159-80. M. Sweeney, Isaiah 1–39 with an Introduction to Prophetic Literature (FOTL 16 [1996] 1-30). J.-P. Torrell, Théorie de la prophétie et philosophie de la connaissance aux environs de 1230 (SSL 40, 1977); Recherches sur la théorie de la prophétie au moyen âge XIIe-XIVe siècles: Études et textes (Dokimion 13, 1992). G. M. Tucker, "Prophecy and Prophetic Literature," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 325-68. C. Vitringa, "On the Interpretation of Prophecy," The Investigator 3, 4 (1834–35) 153-76. J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (1878, 1883²; ET 1885). C. Westermann, Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech (1960, 1964²; ET 1967). G. Widengren, Literary and Psychological Aspects of the Hebrew Prophets (UUÅ 10, 1948). R. L. Wilken, "In novissimis diebus: Biblical Promises, Jewish Hopes, and Early Christian Exegesis," Journal of Early Christian Studies 1 (1993) 1-19. R. R. Wilson, Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (1980). H. A. Wolfson, "Hallevi and Maimonides on Prophecy," JQR 32 (1941–42) 345-70; 33 (1942–43) 49-82 = his Studies in the History of Philosophy and Religion (2 vols., 1977) 2:60-119; Philo: Foundations of Religious Philosophy in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam (2 vols., 1947). W. Zimmerli, The Law and the Prophets: A Study of the Meaning of the OT (1965).

J. H. HAYES

PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, NEW TESTAMENT

Many of the references to early Christian prophets and prophecy in the NT have been interpreted in a variety of apologetic, exegetical, homiletical and theological contexts throughout the history of Christian thought, although they are often overshadowed by more numerous and substantive references to HB prophets and prophecy, including commentaries on many of the prophetic books. The NT passages that deal most extensively with early Christian prophetic phenomena include 1 Corinthians 12–14 on the gifts of the Spirit and their place in worship, the early Christian prophetic work called the Revelation of John, the extensive warning against false prophets in Matt 7:15-23, and the prophetic gift of glossolalia on the day of Pentecost narrated in Acts 2. There are also many shorter passages in which prophets are mentioned, including references to JESUS as a prophet (Matt 21:10-11, 46; Mark 6:14-15; 8:28; Luke 7:16; 24:19; John 6:14; 7:40, 52; Acts 3:22; 7:37); early Christian prophets and their oracles (Acts 11:28; 15:32; 21:9-10); prophecy and glossolalia as gifts of the Spirit (Rom 12:6; 1 Cor 12:10; 14:6; Eph 4:11; 1 Pet 4:10-11); and the problem of discerning the spirits (1 John 4:1-3).

The problem of evaluating prophets and their oracles and discerning true from false prophets and prophecies was a subject that continued to exercise Christian churches during the second century and later (Did. 11; Hermas Mand. 11; Acts of Thomas 79). The primary criterion for recognizing false prophecy according to Matt 7:15-23, an important passage referred to frequently in attempts to deal with heresy, was moral rather than doctrinal: False prophets are "wolves in sheep's clothing" (i.e., they are charlatans who say one thing and do another), and they are known by their "fruit" (i.e., by behavior inconsistent with their teaching). Like Matthew, the Didache, which originated early in the second century in northern Syria, also used the criterion of behavior to determine whether itinerant apostles, teachers, and prophets were true or false (Did. 11-13); but it also added other criteria, e.g., staying more than two or three days and asking for food and money (Did. 11:5). The criteria of "wolves in sheep's clothing" and "fruit" of Matt 7:15-23, vague as they are, continued to be important in identifying false prophets. For Roman Catholic theological writers before and after the Reformation, "fruit" was generally understood as immoral behavior. With CALVIN and post-Reformation Protestant interpretation generally, however, the "fruit" was primarily interpreted as doctrine, although later Pietistic writers (see PIETISM) reverted to interpreting it as works (e.g., J. Bengel, H. Grotius).

Through the middle of the second century, Christian writers reflected an awareness that the gifts of the Spirit, including glossolalia and prophecy, continued to be exercised in the church. According to JUSTIN MARYTR the prophetic gifts had been transferred from the Jews to the Christians (Dial. 82.1), and he mentioned men and women in his own day who possessed the Holy Spirit (Dial. 88.1). IRENAEUS regarded the gift of prophecy as valid yet knew of false prophets like Marcus who were possessed by demons (Adv. Haer. 1.13.3-4). In the early second century ORIGEN expressed the belief that the signs of the Spirit, including prophecy and speaking in tongues, so frequent in the time of Jesus and the apostles, had become comparatively rare (Con. Cel. 7.8). The restriction of gifts of the Spirit, including prophecy, to the apostolic period became a common criterion for concluding that all such activity in later periods was a manifestation of heretical teaching and behavior. For many ecclesiastical critics of prophetic tendencies within the Christian church, it was the definition of the biblical CANONS of the HB and the NT, a process completed by the late fourth century, that led to the belief that prophecy was a thing of the past that had ceased with the apostles.

One of the earliest apocalyptic revitalization movements in early Christianity was the "new prophecy" (disparagingly called Montanism and Cataphrygianism by critics), which began in Asia Minor in 156 or 172 and survived until the sixth century. Montanus, the founder, together with two prophetesses, Priscilla and Maximilla were early leaders of the movement and were thought to have received prophetic revelations while in a state of ecstasy, acting as spokespersons for Christ and the Holy Spirit (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 5.16–6-9; 6.20.3; Hippolytus Pan. 7.19.1). Some of their oracles have been preserved (see R. Heine [1989]).

Montanist prophets and prophetesses led a restoration movement inspired in part by the Revelation of John. After 200 CE in North Africa the Gospel of John, particularly the Paraclete passages in chapters 14–16, came to exert a strong influence on the movement, known through TERTULLIAN, one of the most influential converts to Montanism in the Western church. In response to what they perceived as widespread moral laxity within an institutionalized and secularized Christian church, Montanism espoused a rigorist, ascetic ethic; emphasized the value of martyrdom; expected the imminent outpouring of the Paraclete, or Spirit of God, on the church; and lived in expectation of the imminent arrival of the great tribulation and the descent of the heavenly Jerusalem at Pepuza or Timione in Phrygia, some seventy miles east of Philadelphia in the Roman province of Asia. An anonymous critic of the ecstatic, frenzied pronouncements of Montanist prophets argued that no HB or NT prophet ever prophesied in such a manner (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 5.17.3) and predicted the coming of false prophets based on Matt 7:15 (ibid., 5.16.8). One of the oracles attributed to Maximilla reflects a defense against the charge of false prophecy based on Matt 7:15: "I am pursued like a wolf from the sheep. I am not a wolf. I am word, and spirit, and power" (ibid., 5.16.17; Heine [1989] 3). From the end of the second to the beginning of the third centuries, the Asian church argued that the Montanists were false prophets (the Anonymous in Eusebius, the source of Epiphanius, Apollonius), while the Roman church denied the possibility of any prophecy after the apostles (Hippolytus, Muratorian Canon, Gaius).

One aspect of the influence of HB and NT prophecy was the phenomenon of predictive APOCALYPTICISM with its periodization of history. Both Barnabas 15 and Irenaeus (Adv. Haer. 5.28-29) predicted the coming of Christ in the year 6000. Their calculations were based on an interpretation of the six days of creation as symbolizing the entire course of world history, and since "a day with the LORD is as a thousand years" (Ps 90:4), history would last six thousand years. Irenaeus and the author of Barnabas were followed by Hippolytus (c. 170–236), who calculated that Christ's first coming occurred in the year 5500 and predicted the arrival of the millennium in the year 6000 (On Daniel 2.4-5). Eusebius revised the prediction to the year 5228, i.e., c. 800 CE, a time that was far in the future for him. Lactantius (c. 250–325) continued to expect the coming of an earthly messianic kingdom. Predictive apocalypticism is also reflected in the views of Martin of Tours (d. 397), who believed that the antichrist had already been born. AUGUSTINE's refutation of millenarianism was extremely influential, for predictions of the end of the world were generally avoided through the long period from 400 to 1000. The prophecy of the end of the world in seventy weeks of years according to Daniel 9 (based on Jeremiah's prophecy that Jerusalem would lie desolate for seventy years in Jer 25:11-12; 29:10) was adopted in the Revelation of JOACHIM OF FIORE (c. 1132–1202), a Cistercian monk who founded his own order in 1196 and wrote several books imposing a trinitarian pattern on history. According to him, during the Age of the Father (also called the ordo conjugatorum), humanity lived under the law until the end of the HB period. The Age of the Son (also called the ordo clericorum) was the period of grace that began with the NT period and would end c. 1260. The Age of the Spirit (also called the ordo monachorum) would inaugurate the millennium c. 1260, when new religious orders would convert the whole world, including Jews, Muslims, and other "heathen," who would unite in prayer, mystical contemplation, and voluntary poverty.

From the late Middle Ages to the rise of biblical criticism in the early eighteenth century, the subject of NT prophets and prophecy continued to be eclipsed by the study of HB prophets and prophecy and by the continued influence of the exegesis of the Revelation of John. New impetus was given to the subject by the discovery of the ancient church order called the Didache, or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, by Archbishop Bryennios in 1873 and its subsequent publication in 1883. The final form of the compilation of this work probably occurred by the mid-second century CE, suggesting that its constituent traditions reach back into the late first century. Since it is an early non-canonical document, the ensuing discussion exhibited a historical rather than a theological character, extending the interest in early Christian prophetic phenomena beyond the NT into the late first and early second centuries. Didache 11–13 contains instructions regarding itinerant apostles, teachers, and prophets, which encouraged a variety of hypotheses regarding the relationship between those who claimed to possess gifts of the Spirit, particularly Christian prophets, and the regular non-charismatic offices like bishop and presbyter. The rediscovery of the Didache was a major factor that provoked the inner-Lutheran Sohm-Harnack debate before and after the turn of the twentieth century on the essential nature of the church, in which the alternatives were spirit or law. R. Sohm (1841–1917), author of The Nature and Origin of Catholicism (1909), argued that the later development of ecclesiastical law stood in contradiction to the earlier, essentially spiritual and charismatic nature of the church. A. von HARNACK (1910), on the other hand, argued that complementary spiritual and institutional tendencies existed in the church from the very beginning since the church is both the invisible, spiritual people of God and an actual visible, empirical institution.

During the late nineteenth century a renewed interest in the gifts of the Spirit began to permeate some of the more conservative wings of Protestant denominations in the United States and Great Britain, completely uninfluenced by the interest in early Christian prophecy sparked by the Didache. Pentecostalism, a Protestant renewal movement that began in the United States in the late nineteenth century, emphasizes the possibility of experiencing the baptism of the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:5) and receiving the same spiritual gifts as those described in Acts 2 and 1 Corinthians 12–14, including glossolalia or speaking in tongues, the interpretation of tongues, prophecy, healing, and exorcism. Spirit baptism, distinguished from conversion or from sacramental baptism, is a postconversion experience signaled by speaking in unknown languages, or glossolalia. The charismatic movement, related to Pentecostalism, is a transdenominational movement that gained significance in the 1960s and has found general acceptance in mainline Protestant denominations, Roman Catholicism, and Orthodoxy.

With the development of FORM CRITICISM by German NT scholars early in the twentieth century came the recognition on the part of many critics that not all of the sayings attributed to Jesus in the Gospel tradition could in fact be traced back to the historical Jesus. R. BULTMANN (1963, 163) and others proposed that many of the "I" sayings originated as oracles of early Christian prophets who spoke in the name of the risen Lord. "I" sayings of the risen Jesus found in Revelation provided examples of this phenomenon (Rev 1:17-20; 3:20; 16:15). This view has been defended in great detail by M. E. Boring (1991), although others have not been convinced (D. Hill [1974]; D. Aune [1983] 233-45). NT prophets and prophecy were assigned a significant role in the creation of sayings of Jesus, which were then thought to have become assimilated to existing collections of such sayings.

Bultmann was not only a leading form critic but also one of a circle of German biblical scholars (including H. Gunkel, W. Bousset, W. Heitmüller, R. Reitzenstein, and J. Weiss, among others) called the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE (history-of-religions school), who were interested in the influences the Hellenistic environment exerted on early Christianity. H. GUNKEL, in a short book on the Holy Spirit (1979) originally published in 1888, demonstrated that the "Spirit" is not simply the principle of the moral-religious life but that which is irrational and inexplicable, i.e., supernatural; and he related the Pauline concept of the Spirit to that of late Judaism. Influenced by Gunkel, M. DIBELIUS combined an interest in Hellenistic ideas with those of early Judaism as the background for examining the world of spirits in the faith of PAUL (1909). R. REITZENSTEIN focused almost exclusively on the Hellenistic world in his attempt to illuminate the phenomenon of early Christian prophecy and Paul's role as a pneumatic (1978). A renewed interest in the phenomenon of early Christian prophecy, influenced in part by the rise of form criticism, began to manifest itself in E. Fascher's influential book Prophêtês (1927), in which the author (who had already written a critique of form criticism) focused on a philological investigation of the Greek word prophêtês (prophet) and its history-of-religions background.

Following WWII a renewed interest in NT prophets and prophecy arose within the context of the biblical THEOLOGY movement, which tended to focus on the legitimacy of influences from the OT and early Judaism. The first detailed study of NT prophecy was produced by H. Guy in 1947, in which the prophecy of Jesus is presented as the culmination of biblical prophecy. This was followed in 1959 by the influential article by G. Friedrich on early Christian prophecy in the Theological Dictionary of the NT, which was the standard treatment on the subject for several years. Friedrich emphasized the similarities between the HB prophets and John the apocalyptist but regarded the type of prophecy practiced by the Corinthian prophets as inferior to that of John. Friedrich was later followed in this view by W. Grudem (1982). By the 1970s and 1980s a number of important studies treated all aspects of early Christian prophetic phenomena, many recognizing the importance and influence of Hellenistic prophetic phenomena alongside that of Judaism. Studies surveying the subject include works by É. Cothenet (1972), T. Crone (1973), Hill (1979), and Aune (1983), while several studies focus more exclusively on one of the central NT passages on the subject, 1 Corinthians 12–14, including G. Dautzenberg (1975), Grudem (1982), and C. Forbes (1995). An important and neglected feminist perspective is brought to bear in A. Wire's work on the Corinthian women prophets (1990). An attempt to provide a form-critical analysis of the relatively scarce example of early Christian prophetic speech was proposed by B. Müller (1975) and Aune (1983, 317-38).

Bibliography: D. E. Aune, Prophecy in Early Christianity and the Ancient Mediterranean World (1983). M. E. Boring, The Continuing Voice of Jesus: Christian Prophecy and the Gospel Tradition (1991). R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (1931²; ET 1963). S. M. Burgess and G. B. McGee, Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements (1988). H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries (ET 1969). É. Cothenet, "Prophétisme dans le Nouveau Testament," DBSup 8 (1972) 1222-337. T. M. Crone, Early Christian Prophecy: A Study of Its Origin and Function (1973). G. Dautzenberg, Urchristliche Prophetie: Ihre Erforschung, ihre Voraussetzungen im Judentum, und ihre Struktur im ersten Korintherbrief (BWANT 6, 4; 1975). M. Dibelius, Die Geisterwelt im Glauben des Paulus (1909). E. Fascher, Prophêtês: Eine sprach- und religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung (1927). C. Forbes, Prophecy and Inspired Speech in Early Christianity and Its Hellenistic Environment (WUNT 75, 1995). G. Friedrich, TDNT 6 (1959; ET 1968) 781-861. W. Grudem, The Gift of Prophecy in 1 Corinthians (1982). H. Gunkel, The Influence of the Holy Spirit (1888; ET 1979). H. A. Guy, NT Prophecy: Its Origins and Influence (1947). A. von Harnack, The Constitution and Law of the Church in the First Two Centuries (1910). R. E. Heine, "The Role of the Gospel of John in the Montanist Controversy," SecCent 6 (1987–88) 1-19; The Montanist Oracles and Testimonia (PatMS 14, 1989). D. Hill, "On the Evidence for the Creative Role of Christian Prophets," NTS 20 (1974) 262-74; NT Prophecy (New Foundations Theological Library, 1979). U. B. Müller, Prophetie und Predigt im Neuen Testament (Studien zum Neuen Testament 10, 1975). J. Reiling, Hermas and Christian Prophecy: A Study of the Eleventh Mandate (NovTSup 37, 1973). R. Reitzenstein, Hellenistic Mystery-religions: Their Basic Ideas and Significance (PThMS 15, 1978). A. C. Wire, The Corinthian Women Prophets: A Reconstruction Through Paul's Rhetoric (1990).

D. E. AUNE

PROVERBS, BOOK OF

The Masoretic title Proverbs of Solomon (mišlê šelōmōh, subsequently abbreviated to mišlê, as in modern printed editions of the HB), which is already found in Greek translation in the SEPTUAGINT (Codex Alexandrinus), probably indicates that the heading in 1:1 ("The proverbs of Solomon, son of David, king of Israel") was understood quite early to be an attribution of the entire book to Solomon, despite the contrary indications of the sectional headings in 10:1 and 25:1, which might seem to indicate that he wrote only some parts of it, and the statements in 30:1 and 31:1, which appear to deny Solomonic authorship altogether for the final sections. However, this view was not universally accepted by early Jewish scholars, who took seriously the statement in 25:1 that "these also are proverbs of Solomon which the men of Hezekiah copied" (or "edited"). Indeed, in the famous statement about the authorship of the biblical books in the TALMUD (B. Bat. 14b-15a) the Solomonic claim to authorship is ignored: It is there unequivocally stated that it was Hezekiah and his "college" who wrote Proverbs (mišlê) as well as certain other books. Evidently, then, the phrase "proverbs of Solomon" was not always taken at face value—an anticipation of the modern view that, like the phrase "a psalm of David" attached to some of the psalms, it is intended merely to indicate that the book belongs to a particular class of literature, in this case one to which Solomon was traditionally supposed to have contributed (1 Kgs 4:32; Heb 5:12). In later Judaism too the Solomonic attribution was not taken as necessarily foreclosing discussion about authorship: D. KIMHI, for example, in the eleventh century CE suggested that Isaiah might be the author of the book.

According to the Talmud (Šabb. 30b) and 'Abot R. Nat. (chap. 1) some objections were initially raised about the worthiness of Proverbs to be included in the CANON—not, however, on doctrinal grounds, but rather because it contained contradictions (e.g., between 26:4 and 26:5) and also included unduly vivid descriptions (e.g., the seduction scene in 7:7-20) that might be morally harmful to its readers. After the first century CE its canonical status within the Kethubim was not questioned; it was translated, like the other canonical books, into a number of languages. Of these translations the Greek text (see SEPTUAGINT) is noteworthy for a number of additions to the Hebrew, some of which appear to represent deliberate attempts to modify the character of the original by moralistic and pietistic comment and by toning down some of its supposed sensuality.

In the classical and medieval periods Proverbs was frequently cited in both Jewish and Christian literature, especially in the Talmud, the NT, and the early Christian fathers. Passages like Prov 22:20-21 (LXX) provided ORIGEN legitimation for reading multiple meanings into biblical texts. In general, however, the book was prized by both Jews and Christians as a source of simple moral and religious truths and practical advice rather than being used to establish or confirm particular religious doctrines.

In the late Middle Ages, the Reformation period, and the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, various critical theories were proposed by scholars that in many ways anticipated later critical work. Among others, NICHOLAS OF LYRA, whose Postillae (1326) long remained influential, interpreted 25:1 as meaning that Hezekiah's men made a second collection of Solomon's unpublished proverbs and added it to those previously made in Solomon's own time; P. MELANCHTHON (1497–1560) understood the proverb form as specifically designed to function as a teaching device and also compared the book with the works of the Greek authors Theognis and Phocylides; and T. HOBBES (1651) sketched a history of the composition of the book in several stages, of which the latest was to be dated in the postexilic period or in the reign of Josiah at the earliest. But the modern critical interpretation of Proverbs really began with J. G. EICHHORN's Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1783, 1824[4]), in which he employed stylistic criteria to assign the various sections of the book to different preexilic periods. He also put forward a theory of the development of the proverb form from its origins as domestic regulations laid down by heads of families to its formation into collections of pious admonitions for general use.

Throughout the nineteenth century opinion remained divided on the question of whether Proverbs was substantially preexilic or postexilic in date. A. Hartmann's (1774–1838) argument—based partly on the presence of Aramaisms in the book and partly on its supposed identification of wisdom with the law—that the book is an example of late Jewish piety was particularly influential. The pendulum began to swing in the opposite direction with the discovery of texts from Egypt (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and Mesopotamia that were remarkably similar both in form and theme to the biblical book of Proverbs and of great antiquity. The Egyptian Instruction of Ptahhotep, first published in 1847, was described by the French Egyptologist F. Chabas in 1858 as "the oldest book in the world." But it was not until A. Erman and H. Gressmann argued (in 1924) that the recently discovered Instruction of Amenemope had actually been used as a model by the author of an entire section of Proverbs (22:17–24:22) that it began to be recognized that Israel's wisdom literature, and in particular the book of Proverbs, was not the product of the unaided Israelite genius but rather a late flowering of a much older literary tradition common to the peoples of the ancient Near East. Further studies (e.g., that of P. Humbert [1929]) made this abundantly clear.

The implications of these discoveries for the study of Proverbs soon became apparent. There was no doubt that the Egyptian "instructions" were textbooks composed for use in schools connected with the royal court to educate young men of the upper class destined for high civil service. In view of the now-proven dependence of at least part of Proverbs on this type of literature, together with the references in the book to kings and to the royal entourage and the didactic tone of much of the book, it was concluded that its origins were to be looked for in similar circles in preexilic Israel. This remained the prevailing opinion for more than a generation. It was further strengthened by G. von RAD's hypothesis that in the reign of Solomon Israel had passed through a period of rapid cultural change (the so-called Solomonic enlightenment) brought about by contacts with Egypt as a result of Solomon's organization of the new national state of Israel on Egyptian models. Some parts of the book, however, especially chaps. 1–9, were universally believed to be postexilic additions (see sec. 5).

The following topics have been particularly prominent in discussion of the book in the last half of the twentieth century.

1. Provenance. The view that the milieu from which the book emerged was the royal court with its "wisdom school" was challenged, especially by E. Gerstenberger (1965). He argued that the instructional material in the book originated, not in schools, but in rules of conduct that had governed tribal life in pre-monarchical Israel (Sippenweisheit). However, this view was rejected by H.-J. Hermisson (1968) and others on the grounds that the short proverbs in the book are of a highly artistic character quite unlike the "popular" wisdom sayings embedded in the historical and prophetical books of the HB and also that the organization and customs of early Israelite tribal society are extremely obscure. A third view is that the collections of proverbs may have been intended for the edification of a class of educated farmers whose interests were wider than those of the professional scribe or teacher (U. Skladny [1962]; R. Whybray [1974]). It has been pointed out that the "royal" and "court" sayings in the book are far less numerous than those concerned with more general topics. No consensus has been reached on the question of the provenance of the book, but it may be said that these three views are not necessarily mutually exclusive. In this connection there has been a lengthy but also inconclusive discussion about the evidence for the existence of schools in preexilic Israel (Whybray [1974]; B. Lang [1979]; A. Lemaire [1981]; J. Crenshaw [1985]).

2. The Nature and Function of the Proverb. Much of the earlier discussion was impeded by a failure to achieve agreement about the nature and function of the short proverbs that make up most of the book. In retrospect it is arguable that this failure was due to an excessive reliance on form-critical analysis (see FORM CRITICISM) as an interpretative tool. Amid the many different forms capable of classification it was stressed that there is a fundamental distinction between the "sentence" (Aussagewort), which makes a statement about some aspect of life based on observation or experience without drawing an explicit moral (e.g., 14:4; 16:8), and the "admonition" (Mahnwort), which is couched in the form of advice, either positive or negative (warning), often accompanied by a statement of the reason for that advice (e.g., 19:20; 27:1). This difference of form was taken to be an indication of a fundamental difference of origin and function, the admonition being strictly educational in purpose while the sentence was simply a general observation whose purpose was difficult to determine precisely and whose origin was much more problematical (the discussion about its "popular" provenance, already stimulated by O. EISSFELDT in 1913, still continues and seems unlikely to lead to a general consensus of opinion).

In the last decades of the twentieth century, the significance of the formal difference between these two types of proverbs has been questioned. It was observed long ago but not always taken into account by the form critics that the great majority of the sentences are not simply neutral observations about a particular aspect of reality but imply, no less than the direct admonitions, the desirability of adopting specific modes of behavior. It is only their form (indicative rather than imperative) that is different. This is true of popular sayings in every age, including our own: No distinction is perceived between the functions of sentences like "A stitch in time saves nine" and admonitions like "Don't count your chickens before they are hatched."

This observation has led a number of writers (e.g., J. Williams [1981]; C. Fontaine [1985]) to suggest that progress toward understanding the nature and function of the short proverbs in the book can best be made by asking more general questions, in light of the worldwide use of proverbs, about the proverb form as a whole. In other words, why has this brief, encapsulated form of speech been chosen as a vehicle for comment about the world and society? These writers imply that the distinctions usually made between "folk sayings," "rules of conduct," "teaching Proverbs," and the like are too rigid and conceal the fact that the proverb is a natural and universal form of speech not confined to any particular class or situation. It is not a primitive form later superseded by more elaborate philosophical discourse but one that continues to exist side by side with other forms of speech.

Williams, citing a comment made by Paschal about the reason for the brevity and fragmentary character of his Pensées, suggested that the unsystematic form of proverb literature, with its fragmentary commentary on particular, very limited aspects of the world and society, is especially appropriate to a fragmented world—a reply to those scholars who have understood Proverbs as expressing the notion of an all-embracing, divinely established order, of which either Yahweh or Wisdom is the guardian (see sec. 4). Fontaine went further, seeing the proverb as not only springing from a perception of a lack of order but also as having a positive function: It is used to create pockets of order in the world or to restore order where it has broken down. In such a view the admonitions and sentences in Proverbs, although they may have originated in different circumstances, have a common function and are not to be fundamentally distinguished from one another. The real distinction is to be made between proverb literature as a whole and longer poems like those in chaps. 1–9 that do indeed attempt to subsume experience of the world in a systematic theology in which divine wisdom guards and controls a coherent world order.

3. Developments in the Concepts of Wisdom in Proverbs. A somewhat different attempt to distinguish between types of material that make up the mass of proverb literature in the book was made by a number of scholars, including von Rad (1957; ET 1962) and W. McKane (1970), who claimed that in these chapters are to be found two different concepts of wisdom, the one superimposed on the other. In their earliest form these chapters taught a purely pragmatic, amoral kind of wisdom based wholly on human reason and similar to the kind underlying the policies of the politicians in the early Israelite monarchy portrayed in 1 Samuel (McKane called this "old wisdom"). In the course of time this was transformed under the influence of the preexilic prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) into an exposition of a highly moral Yahwism by the addition of new, more religious sayings to the original collections. This estimate of Israel's "old wisdom," however, runs counter to what has long been known about the character of ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature in general, in which all human conduct was regarded as subject to the scrutiny of the gods, who judged it by distinctly moral standards. In the last decades of the twentieth century, most scholars reject the idea of a non-religious and amoral wisdom in early Israel since this would have been a unique phenomenon. It is true that there are contradictory or incompatible statements in these chapters on the moral level, but artibitrarily to classify these as though each were a complete expression of a religious or moral standpoint is to ignore the complexity of the currents of thought present in any given society.

4. The Theology of Proverbs. The theology of the book and its place in the theological world of the OT have been variously assessed. Some scholars (H. Gese [1958]; H. Schmid [1966]) see it as expressing a view of the world as a divinely ordered system within which all things work for the best but which it is folly to transgress. This was believed by C. Kayatz (1966) to be akin to the concept of Maat in Egypt. It must be recognized, however, that chaps. 1–9 (see sec. 5) are on a quite different plane from the rest of the book. As has already been pointed out (sec. 2), it is questionable whether any systematic theological point of view is to be found in chaps. 10–31.

On the whole these chapters take the optimistic position that righteous conduct, which is frequently equated with wisdom and is generally attainable by those who pursue it, reaps its own reward, while the wicked and foolish will perish miserably. This belief is not peculiar to Proverbs but is found elsewhere in the OT and appears to have been generally accepted in Israel, at least during the preexilic period. In these chapters Yahweh is seen as the guarantor of this principle. Whether in this role Yahweh is also regarded as a judge who dispenses retribution personally in the form of rewards and punishments is disputed. K. Koch (1955) maintained that this is not so: These proverbs reflect a belief that human actions contain within themselves the seeds of their own consequences, which ensue by a kind of automatic process. No agreement has been reached on this question, which lies beyond the study of Proverbs per se.

5. Chapters 1–9. The distinctive character of these chapters was recognized from very early times. Instead of the short proverbs predominant in the rest of the book, they consist almost entirely of longer poems. Three of these—1:20-33; 8; 9:1-6 + 13-18—are entirely unique in that they personify wisdom as a woman who claims to have been associated with Yahweh from before the creation of the world, builds a house, and offers life and happiness to men. Biblical feminists (see FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; see also C. Newsom [1989]; C. Camp [1985, 1988]; Fontaine [1992]) have noticed that folly is also personified as a woman. Both Wisdom and Folly cry out in the streets, hoping to lead young men on opposite journeys, one wise, another foolish. Since it is difficult to distinguish between the two women, women in general are suspect.

For a long time modern scholarship was virtually unanimous in regarding these chapters as postexilic and as the latest addition to the book based on considerations of both form and content. In the last half of the twentieth century, it has been recognized that they do not constitute a single block of material. Although the poems in which wisdom is personified represent a relatively late wisdom theology anticipating still later developments in which "the entire theological thinking of later Judaism came more or less under the sway of wisdom" (von Rad), it has not been demonstrated that the remainder of the material consists of a series of instructions from a teacher to a pupil on the pattern of the earlier Egyptian instructions (Whybray [1965]; Kayatz).

In 1986 Lang offered a new explanation of the figure of personified Wisdom that speaks for a preexilic origin of chaps. 1, 8, and 9. These chapters, he argues, have been adapted from poems composed in praise of an Israelite goddess who was worshiped independently of Yahweh as the patroness of scribal education. This thesis, only one of a succession of attempts to derive the figure of personified Wisdom from Near Eastern female divinities, was to some extent anticipated in 1955 by W. F. ALBRIGHT, who proposed a Canaanite goddess of wisdom as the prototype of this figure.

Bibliography: W. F. Albright, "Some Canaanite-Phoenician Sources of Hebrew Wisdom," (VTSup 3, 1955) 1-15. C. V. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (Bible and Literature 11, 1985); "Wise and Strange: An Interpretation of the Female Imagery in Proverbs in the Light of Trickster Mythology," Semeia 42 (1988) 14-36. V. Cottini, La vita futura nel libro dei Proverbi: Contributo alla storia dell'esegesi (1984). J. L. Crenshaw, "Education in Ancient Israel," JBL 104 (1985) 601-15; Education in Ancient Israel (ABRL, 1998). O. Eissfeldt, Der Maschal im Alten Testament (BZAW 24, 1913). A. Erman, "Eine ägyptische Quelle der 'Sprüche Salomos,' " SPAW (1924) 86-93. C. Fontaine, Traditional Sayings in the OT (1982); "Proverb Performance in the HB," JSOT 32 (1985) 87-103; "Proverbs," The Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992) 145-52. E. Gerstenberger, Wesen und Herkunft des "apodiktischen Rechts" (WMANT 20, 1965). H. Gese, Lehre und Wirklichkeit in der alten Weisheit (1958). H. Gressmann, "Die neugefundene Lehre des Amen-em-ope und die vorexilische Spruchdichtung Israels," ZAW 42 (1924) 272-96. H.-J. Hermisson, Studien zur israeliteischen Spruchweisheit (WMANT 28, 1968). T. Hobbes, Leviathan (1651). P. Humbert, Recherches sur les sources égyptiennes de la littérature sapientiale d'Israël (1929). C. Kayatz, Studien zu Proverbian 1–9 (WMANT 22, 1966). K. Koch, "Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im alten Testament?" ZTK 52 (1955) 1-42; Um das Prinzip der Vergeltung in Religion und Recht des Alten Testaments (Wege der Forschung 125, 1972). B. Lang, "Schule und Unterricht im alten Israel," ETL 51 (1979) 186-201; Wisdom and the Book of Proverbs (1986). A. Lemaire, Les écoles et la formation de la Bible dans l'ancien Israël (OBO 39, 1981). W. McKane, Prophets and Wise Men (SBT 44, 1965); Proverbs: A New Approach (1970). C. A. Newsom, "A Woman and the Discourse of Patriarchal Wisdom: A Study of Proverbs 1–9," Gender and Difference in Ancient Israel (ed. P. L. Day, 1989) 142-60. J. B. Pritchard (ed.), Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the OT (1969). G. von Rad, OT Theology 1 (1957; ET 1962); Wisdom in Israel (1970; ET 1972). H. H. Schmid, Wesen und Geschichte der Weisheit (BZAW 101, 1966). U. Skladny, Die ältesten Spruchsammlungen in Israel (1962). R. C. Van Leeuwen, "The Book of Proverbs," NIB (1997) 5:17-264. R. N. Whybray, The Intellectual Tradition in the OT (BZAW 135, 1974); The Composition of the Book of Proverbs (JSOTSup 168, 1994); Proverbs (NCB, 1994); The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (1995). J. G. Williams, Those Who Ponder Proverbs (1981).

R. N. WHYBRAY

PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS

This encyclical letter of Pope Leo XIII on the study of sacred Scripture was issued on Nov. 18, 1893. It was occasioned mainly by a rationalistic exposition of the Bible stemming from the Enlightenment and by many historical and archaeological discoveries (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) in the nineteenth century that affected biblical interpretation, but partly also by the progress in TEXTUAL CRITICISM and the comparative study of ancient religions. In the encyclical Leo XIII sought to offset interpretations that neglected the Bible as the inspired written Word of God (see INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE). He wanted "to give an impulse to the noble science of Holy Scripture and to impart to Scripture study a direction suitable to the needs of the present day" (Prologue, par. 2). After the prologue the encyclical falls into two parts: (a) motives for the study and use of Scripture and (b) a plan for the study of Scripture. A two-paragraph conclusion follows.

The motives proposed include the inspired nature of the Bible (2 Tim 3:16-17); the example of the use of Scripture by JESUS in the Gospels and by the apostles in Acts and in the epistles; Scripture's usefulness in preaching and teaching (as exemplified by the church fathers); and the centuries-long practice of biblical study in both the Eastern and the Western churches.

To offset the rationalistic exposition of the Bible, Leo's plan sets forth directives for the proper training of teachers of Scripture in seminaries and academies; for the use of the "authentic" VULGATE; for advanced study of the biblical text and its languages; for a proper understanding of Scripture according to "the unanimous agreement of the Fathers," the analogy of faith, and the authority of the church; but also for the proper use of natural sciences, history, physics, and philosophy in their relation to the Bible. The directives end with a reminder about biblical inspiration and inerrancy and the need for scholars, both theologians and exegetes, to join in a common defense of the Scriptures. Though Leo's directives were generally sound, their conservative nature was later often exploited in high ecclesiastical circles during the modernistic crisis.

Bibliography: A. M. Ambrozic, "Providentissimus Deus," NCE 11:922-23. BI, 193-220. "Litterae encyclicae Providentissimus Deus de studiis Scripturae Sacrae," ASS 26 (1893–94) 269-92 (ET RSS, 1-29, 81-134). R. T. Murphy, "The Teachings of the Encyclical Providentissimus Deus," CBQ 5 (1943) 125-40.

J. A. FITZMYER

PSALMS, BOOK OF

1. Early Jewish Interpretation. Some of the headings of the psalms reflect a work of exegesis already in HB times. In thirteen of the headings connections are made with episodes in David's life; other examples include the application of an individual's thanksgiving to a communal celebration (Psalm 30). The Greek and Syriac versions attest the fluidity of such headings as interpretation developed, with the Greek showing a marked tendency to tone down the Hebrew's bold depiction of God. The DEAD SEA SCROLLS from both before and during NT times include numerous portions of psalm texts as well as compositions where phrases from the psalms are echoed or applied. David is strongly presented as the author of the psalms in general. Correspondence is assumed between the experiences of the psalmists and those of the Qumran community, and the leader who prays in the Hodayot (hymns) uses phrases from Psalms 22, 41, and 69, as does the NT.

Lines of exegesis can also be followed in the TARGUM, which gives the sense in Aramaic with many turns of interpretation. "You are my son" in Ps 2:7*b*, for example, is rendered as "Beloved as a son to a father are you to me, pure as if this day I had created you." The Targum also subdues the Hebrew's bold portrayals of God and God's activity. Interpretation can further be traced in references to the psalms in the Mishnah and in the TALMUD, where the prophetic aspect is maintained (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). The old Jewish exegesis, however, is most richly represented by the Midrash Tehillim, which has preserved much ancient Palestinian teaching.

Sometimes the MIDRASH comments on every phrase of a psalm; in other cases, only on the opening and on the end. While there are comments on plain matters like the meanings of rare words, most interest is shown in spiritual truths, parables, and hidden meanings. For "I will rejoice in thee" (Ps 9:2), it is noted that the Hebrew spelling of "in thee" has the numerical value of twenty-two, the number of letters of the alphabet in which the Torah is written. Thus a hidden meaning refers to the joy of knowing God through Scripture. By a combination of 1:3 and 119:99 we are led to the case of a rabbi who was forever "transplanting" himself to different circles of Torah sages. Thus he found numerous "channels of water" to nourish his inner life and so "gained understanding from [so min is taken!] the abundance of teachers."

2. Early Christian Interpretation. The NT provided a massive foundation for subsequent exegesis, citing the psalms some seventy times (mostly from the Greek version) as prophetic of the messianic events. As in Jewish tradition, David is taken to be the chief author, by INSPIRATION referring beyond his own life to Christ and his people. In the same tradition the NT writers were usually content to seize on meanings suggested by isolated phrases or verses, though there may be some cases where a larger context was taken into account. The vivid imagery of the psalms provided a potent expression of the vocation, suffering, and exaltation of JESUS as divine Son and Messiah.

Teachers of the second century continued this understanding, citing the psalms in letters and homilies for doctrinal and ethical purposes. ORIGEN, the dominant commentator in the third century, explained the psalms with glosses, homilies, and commentaries. Although most of these have not survived, important examples of his expositions were used by other writers and appear in the popular "chains" compiled from the works of various writers. In such a chain on Psalm 119 (Greek 118), Origen was given pride of place, though no doubt his copious style of commenting on every essential word has been abbreviated. He took this psalm's alphabetic scheme as pointing to the elementary practice of the way of God and (because of the eightfold strophic patterns) to the attainment of contemplative fulfillment; beginning and end go together. Here David speaks for the one who follows the way of union with Christ the eternal Word, who is also named in the psalm's references to God's law, mouth, salvation, mercy, justice, face, hand, and name. Very seldom did Origen refer to the circumstances of David, who became, rather, the prototype of the monk, the spiritual warrior who endures humiliation in his ascetic struggle with Satan. Many commentators were to follow Origen in the exegesis developed by the ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL from PHILO's approach: Like the body and the soul, Scripture had both a plain and a mystical sense; and the latter was given the most attention.

The opposing tendency of stressing the plain meaning, which characterized the tradition of the ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL, produced an exegesis more congenial to modern critics, with emphasis on the text, grammatical sense, and historical setting. The best example is the commentary of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA; an early work, it boldly takes David to be anticipating future Jewish history down to Maccabean times. Also in the Antiochene tradition was CHRYSOSTOM, who wrote enthusiastically of the psalms as coming "first, last and midst" in the life and worship of his day and left fifty-eight eloquent homilies on them. Although BASIL OF CAESAREA later adhered to literal interpretation, his homilies on the psalms are closer to Origen. In Psalm 45 he took the prophet to be addressing Christ, with the myrrh (45:8) alluding to Christ's burial. The queen (45:9) is the church, also the soul joined to the Word. "Hearken O daughter and see" (45:10) enjoins the church to contemplation.

JEROME was a great translator of the psalms, but his contribution to their exegesis is disputed. His collection of brief learned notes (commentarioli) is drawn from Origen's works, as he says himself. The many commentaries on the psalms confidently attributed to him until the last half of the twentieth century were thought to be extempore addresses to his monks in Bethlehem, which a hearer wrote down. It now seems more likely that Jerome translated Origen's homilies, occasionally interposing his own comments (see M.-J.Rondeau [1982–85] 155-61). If so, these commentaries provide samples of the wealth of exposition, vibrant with the love of Christ, that Origen addressed to a daily gathering in the Basilica of Caesarea.

AUGUSTINE was decidedly inclined to go beneath and beyond the mundane sense. His ample and varied discourses on the psalms hardly rank as scientific exegesis, but as spiritual dialogue with the texts they are of towering importance. His conversion had been greatly aided by listening to the singing of the psalms. Just as the antiphons and doxologies constantly oriented them in the Christian service, so also Augustine read them in constant recollection of Christ, while David receded from view. He took "Blessed is the man" of Ps 1:1 to refer to Christ "the Lord Man" (Homine Dominico); "in the LORD's Law" (1:2) means that Christ is not subject to the law and does not need its outer letter; "in his season" (1:3) means after he has been glorified; "the LORD knows his way"—such knowing is true being.

3. The Middle Ages. For much of this period, in East and West, the church was content with compilations from earlier commentators, Augustine being especially influential. "Practice hurried far ahead of theory," commented Franz DELITZSCH, for church and community lived deeply in the constantly recited psalms. J. Neale and R. Littledale, who made a remarkable chain (1860–74) from the works of this period, wrote more warmly, "There is . . . a perfect treasure of mythology locked up in medieval commentaries and breviaries . . . the beauty of which grows upon the student."

Following the achievements of the Masoretes in textual and grammatical work and stimulated by controversy with the "heretical" KARAITES and by Arab civilization, a new era of Jewish exegesis began. SAADIA included the psalms in the commentary with his translation of the HB into Arabic. His was a sober, reasoned approach, respecting context. This line of exegesis continued with RASHI, A. IBN EZRA, and D. KIMHI; later ages would profit from their philological knowledge, their recording of older Jewish lore, and their engagement with the plain sense of the text. Kimhi often took issue with christological interpretations and on Psalm 2 advised his students on how to answer Christians regarding the "Son" in this psalm.

4. The Reformation. LUTHER's first lectures at Wittemberg were expositions of the psalms. His style shows some continuity with tradition, although the standard four levels of sense (literal, symbolic, moral, and mystical) tend to flow into the principal sense of Christ the Word. Luther provided specially printed Latin texts for the students and from his own prepared copy dictated explanatory glosses to be written around and between the lines. According to custom, he supplemented these brief notes with "scholia," more extensive remarks on selected points that connected with issues of theology and garnered scriptural support. Both the glossed texts and the separate manuscript of scholia have been preserved in Luther's hand.

Luther often expounded psalms in later years; and various expositions, given in lectures, sermons, or in the family circle, were published from notes made by his followers. These reveal a great exegete who truly lived both in the psalm and in the struggles of his time. On Psalm 2, the raging of the nations, the apparent weakness of God's cause, and its ultimate triumph all illuminate the suffering and the hopes of the Lutheran movement. On Psalm 51, Luther followed the title, taking good account of David's situation with Bathsheba; yet he was more concerned with the psalm's lessons about "the whole of sin," "the root and tree of sin," and the gospel of forgiveness.

CALVIN's commentary (tr. 1845–49) is of outstanding competence. Marked by orderly and sober argument, it is more akin to modern historical-critical works in its sense of history than with the interpretations of his contemporaries. Calvin was determined to find, not just any truth, but the truth of the passage at hand. To that end the plain sense, indispensable where Scripture is treated as sole AUTHORITY, is applied effectively in ethical and religious teaching, as when he expounded from Psalm 1 the subtle process of moral degeneration. Yet he did not neglect the correspondence of the old and new kingdoms of God. Beyond an immediate circumstance of battle, David through Psalm 20 was understood to be calling for continual prayer for the kingdom of Christ.

Both Luther and Calvin tended to depict the psalms as doctrine and admonition, and their successors were increasingly inclined to make sound doctrine the overriding concern. The flood of Protestant exegesis had its counterpart in Roman Catholic circles; knowledge of Semitic languages flourished, but the detailed expositions of the time tended to be pedantic.

5. Critical Foundations in the Eighteenth Century. With a revival in humanist learning some scholars approached the HB in a more detached spirit, discarding the "papistical" grip of the Protestant churches. The foundations of modern criticism were laid in the advancement of comparative philology, TEXTUAL and LITERARY criticism, and the study of antiquity. R. LOWTH's (1753) analysis of Hebrew poetry was directly important for psalm study, and B. KENNICOTT's (1776–80) collations of Hebrew manuscripts and his notes on the psalms all fed into the work of subsequent commentators.

If the passionate voice of the psalms was somewhat muted during this period of classical elegance, a corrective arose in the work of J. G. HERDER, whose Vom Geist der ebräischen Poesie (1782–83) treats many psalms with understanding and sympathy. With "simplicity of heart" (Einfalt des Herzens) one enters the world of the ancient poet, breathing the good air of primitive origins. Herder greatly influenced the following centuries and not least the key commentators W. DE WETTE and H. GUNKEL.

6. The Nineteenth Century. During this period great strides were made in textual and philological study and in the knowledge of the ancient world and of the development of HB literature. An era of influential German commentaries opened with that of de Wette (1811), and its second edition (1823) was improved philologically by use of H. GESENIUS's new Hebrew dictionary. Unlike most scholars of the century, de Wette thought that few psalms revealed historical circumstances and that it was better to propose nothing of the kind than to overrun the evidence. Instead, he offered an aesthetic criticism, appraising each psalm as a lyrical expression of feeling and intuition, which led him to develop the classification of the poems by placing them in six categories similar to those Gunkel would more thoroughly work out a century later.

Nevertheless, the trend toward supposed historical precision continued. Suggested datings became ever later, and any connection with David seemed increasingly unlikely. Most of the psalms were associated with postexilic, frequently Maccabean, times. The themes of ungodly oppressors, kingship, and love of God's law were taken as sure signs of postexilic conflicts and were placed near the end of the era. Resemblances to the prophets and to other Scriptures indicated the dependence of late writers on hallowed texts. Such views were given incisive expression in the commentary of B. DUHM (1899, 1922); admirable in its scientific clarity, it is marred by its low estimate of the psalms and by scathing remarks about Jewish piety.

E. HENGSTENBERG, "father of the reactionaries" (according to C. Briggs), produced a dogmatic commentary in four volumes (1842–47). Franz Delitzsch only gradually came to terms with modern ideas of the HB's development; his reasoned conservatism and rabbinical learning have given his commentary on Psalms (1859–60; ET 1894) enduring value. F. BAETHGEN's commentary (1892) represents the typical moderate work of the century: Emending the text through comparison of the versions, he took account of the metrical structure, related the texts to history down to Maccabean times, and gave little room to spiritual appreciation.

7. Form Criticism. Characteristic twentieth-century study of the psalms has been based on a method of systematic sorting. The approach is variously referred to as the history or study of forms, classes, or types (Gattungen, genres), and its champion was Gunkel (1862–1932). He explained that the primary law for all science is that an object cannot be understood in isolation but must be seen in its context. In relation to the psalms, this is accomplished by gathering comparable material from the ancient world and by identifying and analyzing the main types of psalms through thorough INNER-BIBLICAL comparisons. Gunkel conceived of each type as having arisen from a recurring situation in worship that determined the type's elements of thought ("motifs") and forms of speech. He believed it possible to trace the history of the types, their development, and in some cases their rebirth in mixed forms, which would give broad guidance for dating a psalm. In cases where the types had grown away from the original ceremonies, they still preserved this fixed wording and patterns of thought.

Gunkel's outline of the types in his commentary (1929, 1X) begins with the hymns used to glorify God during the ceremonies in the sanctuary before the assembly and sung by the choir or expert soloist. A variation of the hymns praising the sanctuary itself he called elsewhere "songs of Zion." Additional types include "songs rendered on the feast-day when they celebrated Yahweh's throne-ascension"; the people's songs of lament (or complaint, Klage), sung with rites at the sanctuary in times of national need to express grief and implore mercy; the king's songs, of various kinds that have in common rendition by a court singer in the festivities for the king and his house; the individual's songs of lament/complaint, sung by an individual (not the corporate figure Israel) in personal need and originally including rites performed in the sanctuary. Corresponding to these are the individual's song of thanks, in which a saved person pours out thanks and praise in the sanctuary while presenting offerings. Smaller types include blessings, curses, songs of pilgrimage, Israel's songs of victory, Israel's songs of thanks, and holy legends (parts of Psalms 78, 105, and 106).

To these Gunkel added some that were not originally from the tradition of psalmody but came to be combined with it: prophetic poems and wisdom poetry. Finally he listed "mixtures," in which later writers freely drew on various types, and "liturgies," in which different types were set side by side because of the alternation of voices in worship.

Gunkel's heartfelt wish that the "dam" holding his fellow scholars from recognizing the forms and their importance would burst was amply granted. In time FORM CRITICISM became fundamental for most commentators, and many works were devoted to revision or refinement of the classes he set out. The very conception of "thanksgiving" was deprecated by C. WESTERMANN (1953; ET 1965), who preferred to see Gunkel's hymns as "descriptive praise" and his song of thanks as "narrative/declarative praise." F. Crüsemann's (1969) thorough study of hymnic forms concluded that although Gunkel's communal thanksgivings should be considered as hymns, the class of individual thanksgivings should be retained. Distinctions among the individual's songs of lament have been proposed: pleas (which praise God), complaints (where God is blamed), protective psalms (anticipating danger), etc. Gunkel's songs from Yahweh's throne-ascension have been differentiated and distributed through a wide range of periods.

The greatness of Gunkel's exposition did not arise solely from this approach. He was above all a passionate and sensitive interpreter. His ambition was to be the mouth of ancients, expressing for our age what the Hebrew poets had felt in the depths of their hearts.

8. The Study of Function. Form criticism took account not only of patterns of expression but also of the functions in society that had molded them. It was especially in regard to these functions that S. MOWINCKEL contributed much to interpretation.

a. Enthronement psalms. Especially fruitful was Mowinckel's view of the songs for Yahweh's throne-ascension, in which he saw, not songs based on prophecies of Second Isaiah, but the expression of an ancient ingredient in worship, the climax of the festal days. Action in worship was first and foremost that of God. As Yahweh had asserted power in the beginning, so now on the festal day these psalms proclaimed that Yahweh was manifested as sovereign over all—Yahweh and no other has "become king." The beginning and the festal day were one, and divine light shone forward on days to come. Renewal touched all aspects of life founded in the classic past: creation, covenant, liberation, settlement. From many other psalms, HB texts, and rabbinic sources, Mowinckel filled out his picture of the annual observances that covered the transition to the agricultural new year in September-October, antecedents of the Jewish festivals of New Year, Atonement, and Booths.

All this offered vivid insights into the HB world. The public religion focused in the festivals was viewed sympathetically at last in its age-long work of nurturing, inspiring, and creating; and the psalmody that expressed it appeared with new importance, no longer as a mere late echo of the prophets. Mowinckel's work, however, met with some hostility. He was said to be reading the HB too mythologically, after the pattern of the Babylonian new year festival through which the creator, Marduk, subjugated chaos and was honored as king of the gods. But Mowinckel's reconstruction has a wide basis in the HB. Striking analogies from surrounding peoples serve to give us a proper perspective of the ancient world.

b. The king's psalms. The function of another type of psalm—the king's songs—now seemed due for reconsideration. Gunkel had strongly argued that nine complete psalms and parts of others were included in this category and had been used in ceremonies of the preexilic kings; they were not later compositions concerning the people (as a royal figure), the Messiah, or Maccabean high priests and kings. Within the framework of the reconstructed autumn festival it seemed that the function of these psalms could be further pursued.

In 1927 H. Schmidt envisaged how, along with Yahweh, the Davidic ruler also symbolically defeated his enemies and entered his kingdom anew. Mowinckel was notably restrained in the use of these psalms for reconstructing the autumn festival; however, he granted the likelihood that the ruler's installation was celebrated and then annually commemorated in the festival through the use of these psalms.

The matter was followed up by A. JOHNSON (1955, 1967). A true interpreter, his method was to present his view through a chain of psalms that he translated and expounded. In this way he traced the lines of sacred drama within the festival, maintaining that it represented Yahweh's defeat of the forces of darkness and death that through the kings of the nations had attacked his city and throne-center, Zion. The Davidic king served Yahweh by leading the defenders but triumphed only after coming near defeat. At first Johnson found the purpose of the drama especially in the annual revitalizing of society. Subsequently he emphasized that it signaled an ultimate reality, the great day to come, which already challenged the contemporary ruler and people.

c. Psalms of lament. Discussion has continued on the function of the individual's songs of lament (see J. Croft [1987]). Whereas Gunkel had thought that the extant examples represented a development away from the original cultic setting, Mowinckel in his early work saw them as still set in rites of cleansing and healing at the Temple, in which their imprecations were a defense against the injurious wishes or spells of the enemies. Schmidt (1928), and later W. Beyerlin (1977), found the cultic situation of some of these psalms in the trials held at the Temple: They were prayers for vindication. L. Delekat (1967) saw the supplicants rather as seekers of asylum at the Temple. E. Gerstenberger (1980) thinks of rites in the sufferer's own locality, amid his primary group but led by a local seer.

Another line of interpretation for these psalms was advocated by H. BIRKELAND in 1933 and soon came to have the weighty support of Mowinckel. The worshiper is generally taken to be Israel's leader, usually a king; prayer is being offered in the Temple or at a field sanctuary in time of crisis—invasion, plotting, and so forth. J. Eaton (1976, 1986) has worked over the materials with more emphasis on the ideas and language of royal traditions and found much that favors the royal interpretation, explaining the interplay of individual and community, of regular cult and sudden crisis, of harsh warfare and tender piety. Others who have favored passing beyond the limits of Gunkel's royal class include A. BENTZEN, M. DAHOOD, J. Gray, Johnson, J. Day, P. CRAIGIE (1983), and M. Goulder (1990).

d. Wisdom psalms. The situations behind the later stages of psalmody have also received attention. The currents of both wisdom schooling and Torah piety seem to run stronger in the psalms during the postexilic era. Mowinckel saw the bulk of psalmody as passing into the care of collectors who were learned sages and scribes, forerunners of Ben Sirah; a few of their own compositions then entered the collection, pieces they had composed in their schools to edify their disciples or to bring to the Temple in thanksgiving. They employed the old proverb forms but also exalted Yahweh's Torah. One school of thought, especially in France and in Catholic Germany, has given the greatest weight to the activity of the scribes in the Persian and Greek periods, seeing most of the psalms as their reuse of older elements.

9. Current Concerns. Progress continues in the publication of such comparable materials as hymns and prayers from Babylonia and Egypt (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), poetry from UGARIT, and evidence of temples and musicians. Dahood's commentary (1966–70) is remarkable for its exploitation of comparisons with Ugaritic, though many of its novel proposals on text and translation must be regarded as only experimental. From Ugaritic studies also, O. Loretz has developed the method of colometry: He divides a psalm into its cola, examines the total number of letters in each colon, and so hopes to identify secondary expansions. The structuralist approach (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION) has produced some minute analyses of psalms; repetitions and parallelisms are taken to mark alternating or concentric patterns. Structure is found also in the interplay of persons; analysis of images and figures contributes to the disclosure of the psalm's shape and movement as well. Interest thus shifts from a psalm's origin to its rhetoric and symbolic world.

The structure of the psalter as a whole has also received close attention. With a fresh respect for the final shape of Scripture, scholars have pondered anew the links of wording and ideas between adjacent psalms, moods characterizing groups of psalms, and the strategic positions of psalms with decisive themes.

H.-J. Kraus (1960, 1979) demonstrated how, after all, a theological appreciation of the psalms could be achieved in harmony with modern study; after an interval of centuries it seemed that the exegetical fullness of the great Reformers was reviving. Several studies have further evaluated the psalms' theology of Temple and royal house, and there are signs of renewed appreciation of the ancient interpreters. Not just the anticipations of modern research are to be valued but also those imaginative encounters where the Origens, Augustines, and Midrashists were prompted by the psalms to see deep into the divine world.

Bibliography: L. C. Allen, Psalms 101–150 (WBC 21, 1983). B. J. L. Baethgen, Die moderne Bibelkritik und die Autorität des Gotteswortes (1892). Basil, St. Basil: Exegetic Homilies (FC 46, tr. A. C. Way, 1963). J. Becker, Wege der Psalmenexegese (SBS 78, 1975). W. Beyerlin, Die Rettung der

Bedrängten in den Feindpsalmen der Einzelnen auf institionelle Zusammenhänge untersucht (FRLANT 99, 1977). H. Birkeland, Die Feinde des Individuums in der israelitischen Psalmenliteratur: Ein Beitrag zur Kenntnis der semitischen Literatur- und Religionsgeschichte (1933); The Evildoers in the Book of Psalms (1955). W. G. Braude, The Midrash on Psalms (2 vols. YJS 13, 1959). J. Calvin, J. Calvin's Commentary on the Book of Psalms (2 vols., tr. J. Anderson, 1845–49). La Chaîne Palestinienne sur le Psaume 118 (SC 189, tr. M. Harl, 1972). A. C. Coxe (ed.), Saint Augustin: Expositions on the Book of Psalms (1888, repr. 1979). P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1–50 (WBC 19, 1983). S. J. L. Croft, The Identity of the Individual in the Psalms (JSOTSup 44, 1987). F. Crüsemann, Studien zur Formgeschichte von Hymnus und Danklied in Israel (WMANT 32, 1969). L. Delekat, Asylie und Schutzorakel am Zionheiligtum: Eine Untersuchung zu den privaten Fiendpsalmen (1967). R. Devreesse (ed.), Le commentaire de Théodore de Mopsueste sur Psaumes (I–LXXX) (1939); Les anciens commentateurs grecs des Psaumes (1970). W. M. L. de Wette, Kommentar über die Psalmen (1811). B. Duhm, Psalms (KEH 14, 1899, 1922²). J. H. Eaton, Kingship and the Psalms (1976, 1986); Psalms of the Way and the Kingdom (JSOTSup 199, 1995). A. C. Feuer, Tehillim: A New Translation with Commentary Anthologized from Talmudic, Midrashic, and Rabbinic Sources (2 vols., 1985). E. Gerstenberger, "Psalms," OT Form Criticism (ed. J. H. Hayes, TUMSR 2, 1974); Der bittende Mensch: Bittritual und Klagelied der Einzelnen im Alten Testament (WMANT 51, 1980). M. Goulder, The Prayers of David: Psalms 51–72 (JSOTSup 102, 1990). H. Gunkel, Die Psalmen (1929); Introduction to Psalms (1933; ET 1998). S. Hendrix, Ecclesia in Via: Ecclesiological Developments in the Medieval Psalms Exegesis and the "Dictata Super Psalterium" of M. Luther (SMRT 8, 1974). E. W. Hengstenberg, Commentary on the Psalms (1842–47; ET 1850). J. G. Herder, The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (2 vols. 1782–83; ET 1833). W. L. Holladay, The Psalms Through Three Thousand Years: Prayerbook of a Cloud of Witnesses (1993). Jerome, The Homilies of St. Jerome (FC 48, 57, tr. M. E. Ewald, 1964, 1965). A. R. Johnson, "The Psalms," The OT and Modern Study: A Generation of Discovery and Research (ed. H. H. Rowley, 1951) 162-209; Sacral Kingship in Ancient Israel (1955, 1967). B. Kennicott, Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum cum variis lectionibus (2 vols., 1776–80). D. Kimhi, The Longer Commentary of Rabbi D. Kimhi on the First Book of Psalms (tr. R. G. Finch, 1919); The Commentary of Rabbi D. Kimchi on Psalms CXX–CL (tr. J. Baker and E. W. Nicholson, 1973). H.-J. Kraus, Psalmen (2 vols., BKAT 15, 1960, 1979; ET 1987–89); Theology of the Psalms (1979; ET 1986). R. de Langhe (ed.), Le Psautier: Ses origines, ses problèmes littéraires, son influence (OBL 4, 1962). M. Luther, Luther's Works: First Lectures on the Psalms (2 vols., tr. H. C. Oswald, 1974). J. C. McCann, A Theological Introduction to The Book of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (1995); "The Book of Psalms," NIB (1996) 4:639-1280. J. L. Mays, The Lord Reigns: A Theological Handbook to the Psalms (1994). S. Mowinckel, Psalmenstudien I–VI (1921–24); The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols., 1962). E. Mühlenberg, Psalmenkommentare aus der Katenenüberlieferung (3 vols., 1975–78). J. M. Neale and R. F. Littledale, A Commentary on the Psalms from Primitive and Medieval Writers (4 vols., 1860–74). R. Lowth, De sacra poesi Hebraeorum Praelectiones Academicae (1753). P. H. A. Neumann (ed.), Zur neueren Psalmenforschung (WF 192, 1976). J. S. Preus, From Shadow to Promise; OT Interpretation from Augustine to the Young Luther (1969), esp. 151-271. M.-J. Rondeau, Les commentaires patristiques du Psautier (IIIe siècles) (2 vols., 1982–85). H. Schmidt, Die Thronfahrt Jahves am Fest der Jahreswende im alten Israel (1927); Das Gebet der Angeklagten im AT (BZAW 49, 1928). H. Spieckermann, Heilsgegenwart: Eine Theologie der Psalmen (FRLANT 148, 1989). D. C. Steinmetz, "Luther as an Interpreter of the Psalms," Luther and Staupitz: An Essay in the Intellectual Origins of the Protestant Reformation (1980) 50-67. M. E. Tate, Psalms 51–100 (WBC 20, 1990). C. Westermann, The Praise of God in the Psalms (1953; ET 1965).

J. H. EATON

PSALMS OF SOLOMON

The so-called Psalms of Solomon, of which eighteen survive, exist in Greek and Syriac. The origin of these writings is obscure. First noted in Codex Alexandrinus (5th cent. CE) under the title the "Eighteen Psalms of Solomon," they are listed sequentially after the HB, NT, and Clementine epistles; however, the actual text is missing from the codex. For instance, Codex Sinaiticus is missing twelve pages that might have contained these psalms (OTP 2.639). Pseudo-Athanasius's Synopsis Sanctae Scripturae listed them with the Odes of Solomon after Maccabees and before Susanna as antilegomena of the HB (6th cent CE). A similar account is offered in the List of Sixty Books. Anastasius Sinaita's (d. c. 700) Quaestiones et Responsiones lists this text among the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA between the Assumption of Moses and the Apocalypse of Elijah in the list of sixty books found at the end of that work. The Stichometry of Nicephorus (9th cent. CE) lists the Psalms of Solomon with the Apocrypha between Esther and Ecclesiastes. According to G. Gray (APOT 2.625-52), the fifty-ninth CANON of the Council of Laodicea and AMBROSE (Praef. in Lib. Psalmorum) appear to argue against the use of these psalms by the church (APOT 2.627); however, this text is not mentioned in the Gelasian Decree. S. Brock notes (AOT 649) that the two surviving Syriac manuscripts begin with the Odes of Solomon and then proceed with the Psalms—under the name Odes and Psalms of Solomon—as though the Odes and the Psalms are two parts of one work. In these manuscripts, PsSol 1 is Psalm 43.

The first edition of the Psalms, published c. 1626 by J. de la Cerda, was marred by the fact that it was based on a faulty copy of one of the principal Greek manuscripts. By the time Gray did his translation, eight Greek manuscripts were known to exist; ten manuscripts and one fragment are now known. Gray regarded Codex (Romanus) Vaticanus Gr. 336 as the oldest and noted that some of the Greek manuscripts appear to be copies of other extant manuscripts (APOT 2.626). Two manuscripts and two fragments are extant in Syriac. It is generally believed that the Syriac is based on the Greek, and Gray held that the Syriac manuscripts are an incomplete version of the Greek (APOT 2.626). Brock agrees, while R. Wright argues that the Syriac is closest to Greek MS 253, although the Syriac also shows close ties to Greek MSS 769 and 336 (OTP 2.640). J. Trafton (1981) argues that the Syriac may descend from the Hebrew.

Likewise, on the basis of the Syriac text, Gray proposed that Hebrew and not Greek was the original language because (1) the Greek shows a number of "strange expressions" that characterize Greek versions of existing Hebrew texts; (2) some of these strange expressions can be explained as blunders in translation from Hebrew to Greek; and (3) in some places the rhythm of the Hebrew can still be heard in the Greek (APOT 2.627 and 625). In varying forms this analysis has been supported by Trafton, H. Ryle and M. James (1891), and R. Hann (1982). D. Flusser, following S. Holm-Nielsen (1977), also argued for a Hebrew original. Only A. HILGENFELD, on the basis of apparent quotes from the SEPTUAGINT in this text, argued for a Greek original.

Ryle and James, citing apparent parallels between 3 BARUCH and PssSol, maintained that this text was translated into Greek before 70 CE (APOT 2.628). According to them, the author was an Essene. Gray dated the Psalms to the first century BCE and is followed by D. Russell (1987), who cites apparent historical allusions in the text (2:3031 = death of Pompey); Flusser; G. Nickelsburg (1981); and Brock. Flusser and Holm-Nielsen, argue that this text was authored in Jerusalem by a latter-day member of the Hasidim (see HASIDISM); Flusser submits that the critique of the Hasmoneans and Pharisees in the text supports this. Nickelsburg holds that the author was a Pharisee (203), and Brock suggests that the text was written in Palestine by an unknown author (AOT 651-52).

Following Russell, Wright points to allusions in the text to the death of Pompey in 48 BCE. Accordingly, he limits the date of authorship to between 125 BCE and the first century CE in broad terms, in more narrow terms to between 70 and 45 BCE (OTP 2.641). These psalms have been so edited that it is not possible to tell if they were originally written by one or many authors; thus Wright considers them the product of a community and concludes that the author was either an Essene or a Pharisee. His analysis is amended by J. Charlesworth, who argues that it is impossible to determine the special socioreligious group to which the author belonged—if the author belonged to one at all (OTP 2.642).

