Because of strong similarities between PssSol and the biblical psalter Wright holds that the Psalms of Solomon are a "conscious imitation" of the Davidic psalter (OTP 2.646). There are certain stylistic and formal parallels. For example the "patina" that is the mark of liturgical use is missing; instead a thin veneer covers historical allusions. Furthermore, parallels to Psalms 28 and 72, Isaiah, Ezekiel, Lamentations, Proverbs, and perhaps Luke have been noted. Following O. EISSFELDT (1887–1973) and A. Dupont-Sommer (1987), Wright maintains that there are strong parallels to Qumran (OTP 2.642; see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and points out that 1 BARUCH quotes these psalms. Gray has noted parallels to Pistis Sophia.

Bibliography: W. Baars, "A New Fragment of the Greek Version of the Psalms of Solomon," VT 11 (1961) 441-44; "An Additional Fragment of the Syriac Version of the Psalms of Solomon," VT 11 (1961) 222-23; "Psalms of Solomon," The OT in Syriac According to the Peshitta Version (1972) pt. 4, fasc. 6, i-vi, 1-27. S. P. Brock, "The Psalms of Solomon," AOT 649-82. A.-M. Denis, "Les Psaumes de Salomon," IPAT (1970) 60-64. D. Flusser, Bermerkungen eines Juden zur christlichen Theologie (ACJD 16, 1984); Jewish Sources in Early Christianity (ET 1989). O. von Gebhardt, Psalmoi Solomontos: Die Psalmen Salomo's zum ersten Male mit Benutzung der Athoshandschriften und des Codex Casanatensis herausgegeben (TU 13.2, 1895). G. B. Gray, "The Psalms of Solomon," APOT 2.625-52. R. R. Hann, The Manuscript History of the Psalms of Solomon (SBLSCS 13, 1982). J. R. Harris, The Odes and Psalms of Solomon, Now First Published from the Syriac Version (1909, 1911). J. R. Harris and A. Mingana, The Odes and Psalms of Solomon, Re-edited for the Governors of the John Rylands Library (2 vols., 1916–20). A. Hilgenfeld, Die jüdische Apokalyptik in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwickelung (1857); Novum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum (4 vols., 1866). S. Holm-Nielsen, "Die Psalmen Salomos," JSHRZ 4 (1977) 51-112. R. Kittel, "Die Psalmen Salomo," APAT (1900) 2:127-48. K. G. Kuhn, "Die alteste Textgestalt der Psalmen Salomos" (BWANT 73, 1937). J. La Cerda, Adversaria sacra . . . accessit . . . Psalterium Salomonis (1626). G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature Between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction (1981) 203-12. J. O'Dell, "The Religious Background of the Psalms of Solomon (Re-evaluated in the Light of the Qumran Texts)," RdQ 3 (1961) 241-57. A. Rahlfs, Septuaginta (2 vols., 1935, 1952^5) 2:471-89. D. S. Russell, The OT Pseudepigrapha: Patriarchs and Prophets in Early Judaism (1987). H. E. Ryle and M. R. James, Psalmoi Solomontos: Psalms of the Pharisees, Commonly Called the Psalms of Solomon. The Text Newly Revised from All the Manuscripts (1891). E. Schürer, HJPAJC (1986) 3:192-97. J. L. Trafton, "A Critical Examination of the Syriac Version of the Psalms of Solomon" (diss., Duke University, 1981); The Syriac Version of the Psalms of Solomon: A Critical Evaluation (c. 1985). J. Viteau, Les Psaumes de Salomon (1911). R. B. Wright, "Psalms of Solomon," OTP 2:639-70;

"The Psalms of Solomon, the Pharisees, and the Essenes," IOSCS (SBLSCS 2, 1972) 136-47.

G. T. MILAZZO

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA

The history of biblical interpretation includes an examination of a large body of ancient apocryphal writings. The authors of these works frequently claimed them to be equal in AUTHORITY to any book now canonized within the Bible. Understood in broad categories, the OT Pseudepigrapha (OTP) comprises about sixty-five quasi-biblical documents. Many of these developed out of interpretations by Jews or Jewish Christians of earlier biblical books and were exegetical or expository expansions of biblical narratives or psalms. The most important of them were written between 250 BCE and 200 CE in Palestine.

The interpretation of the OTP has been markedly diverse during the last 2,250 years. In essence, a large body of literature cherished in antiquity fell from favor for centuries but has been recovered by modern scholarship and restored to a position of significance.

1. Early Period. From approximately 250 BCE to 200 CE Jewish and Christian scholars, many of whom were erudite and skilled scribes, composed apocalypses, testaments, psalms, odes, histories, and ethical tracts, attributing them to ancient biblical heroes or sages like Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, Solomon, and Ezra. This literature was born out of biblical interpretation.

Reflection on Scripture demanded not only adoration but also creative dialogue with the text. Questions abounded. For example, the famous account of Jephthah's sacrifice of his beloved and only daughter raised numerous issues. Why did he kill her? What was her name? Did she resist? PSEUDO-PHILO, a Jewish Palestinian writing probably dating from the first century CE, presents an expanded account of the incident. Her name is Seila, probably because in Hebrew the meaning would be "she who was requested." She accepts her father's vow obediently, requesting permission only to retreat to the mountains and vent her laments. For the author and his commentary these were prized and apparently authentic stories. For modern critics they are an example of first-century exegesis of Judg 11:30-40.

During the early period of interpretation many Jewish and Christian groups highly revered the documents in the OTP as authentically inspired writings equal in every way to other biblical works. Even some documents in the Christian CANON reflect a high evaluation of some of the OTP. The classic example is Jude, which alludes to more than one of these writings and quotes from so-called 1 ENOCH, prefacing the quotation by saying that Enoch "prophesied" these words. Later, perhaps under the influence of the developing orthodoxy, the author of 2 Peter quoted Jude but felt compelled to remove all allusions to, and the quotation from, the OTP.

2. Medieval Period. As in the early period, in the Middle Ages there was no collection of the OTP. Instead the documents were treated individually. Jews no longer were characteristically interested in reading or interpreting it, and although a few works, like 3 ENOCH show that in some Jewish circles the interest in Pseudepigrapha continued, the widespread fascination by Jews with the documents in the OTP ended before this period. Three main reasons for this paradigm shift in biblical interpretation seem obvious: The documents in the MISHNAH had been codified by Judah the Prince around 200 CE, and it then came to dominate the life of the religious Jew. Second, the disastrous Jewish revolts against the Romans in 66–70 CE and 132–135 CE were judged to be caused in part by the apocalyptic fervor seen to be typical of many documents in the OTP. Third, this APOCALYPTICISM had given rise to rabbinic Judaism's rival, Christianity.

Many of the greatest thinkers in early Christianity—e.g., TERTULLIAN, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, ORIGEN, EUSEBIUS—highly valued many of the OTP. The administrators of the church, however, were less interested in ancient writings than in the current social, political, ideological, and theological crises. They saw the need to combat heresy; to clarify, defend, and strengthen orthodox faith; and to define a closed canon of Scripture. During the early centuries of the common era, works like Hebrews and Revelation, eventually included in the canon, and apocryphal works (see APOCRYPHA, NT), like the Shepherd of Hermas and the Birth of Mary, were intermittently shunted aside or away from the shelter of the canon's umbrella. During the same period the documents in the OTP were falling out of favor or had ceased to circulate.

The relegation of the OTP to a very subordinate status was, not the consequence of deliberate and overt action, but resulted from a preoccupation with the survival of what was perceived to be the purity of the holy apostolic faith. This orthodox faith was clarified through an exegesis and exposition of those works that slowly, and initially without any vote of the great councils, emerged as canonical. It is imperative to correct the fallacious notion that the synagogue and the church examined and then discarded the OTP.

The works in the OTP thus gradually were ignored in the major centers of rabbinic Judaism and Western Christianity. Fortunately, scribes in monastic centers throughout the world devoted years to copying ancient manuscripts that contained one or more of the OTP. For these scribes worship and interpretation of holy Scripture involved preserving sacred writings; interpretation was repetition, and God's Word was often defined in terms of a prime facie acceptance of the claims in the document lying open on the desk. No other description can explain the presence of the thousands of manuscripts in Greek, Latin, Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), ARMENIAN, Syriac, Slavonic, and Coptic that now can be read in the major monasteries and European and American libraries. Copying one of the OTP, as we learn from the colophons at the end of manuscripts, was an act of devotion to God. The art and adoration poured into preserving God's sacred Word, the canon, ebbed over into other related words.

3. Renaissance and Reformation. The Renaissance opened the eyes of Western European scholars and leaders to the world of antiquity and to the cultures of the Near East. It might be expected that a renewed interest in the OTP would result from this reawakening to antiquity and Eastern cultures, but this did not occur.

In spite of the emphasis on the Bible by the Protestant Reformers, the para-biblical books, the APOCRYPHA and the Pseudepigrapha, were not rediscovered. Perhaps the emphasis on interpreting the NT, especially PAUL's letters, in terms of the concept of righteousness by faith alone may explain this fact. This explanation may also clarify LUTHER's desire to cast 4 Ezra (2 Esdras) into the Elba River, but it does not explain why he was so attracted to the Prayer of Manasseh. Both documents are in the OTP.

4. Enlightenment. The OTP writings were rediscovered during the European Enlightenment of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Some OTP were included in the famous POLYGLOTS, especially the nine-volume Paris Polyglot (1629–42) and the six-volume London Polyglot (1655–57). For the first time in history a collection of the OTP was prepared and published: J. FABRICIUS's edition of the OTP in Latin translation, Codex Pseudepigraphus Veteris Testamenti (1713–14), rendered the OTP available to scholars and to the learned.

The interpretation of the OTP during this period was certainly pre-critical. No recognition of the composite natures of many Jewish Pseudepigrapha or of the Christian expansions of earlier Jewish documents accompanied attempts to understand such writings. No perception of the complex world of early Judaism supported interpretations, which were essentially literal. No clear distinction was drawn between the medieval pseudepigraphical titles and the pseudepigraphical intent of the authors. The tendency was to assume that if a document was attributed to Enoch, it had been written by him.

5. Modern Period. The modern study of the OTP occupies the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Five periods can be isolated for examination.

a. Nineteenth century. The first phase began in the early nineteenth century. In 1812 F. Muenter discovered quotations from the lost Odes of Solomon in the Pistis Sophia. From 1819 to 1838 R. Laurence published translations or editions of the Ascension of Isaiah (the editio princeps), 4 Ezra (the editio princeps of the Ethopic), and 1 Enoch (first an ET and then the editio princeps of the Ethiopic).

The perception arose that the documents in the OTP were composed by early Jews or Christians and do not predate 500 BCE. Laurence, for example, argued that Enoch did not write the Book of Enoch (= 1 Enoch): "Its allusions to the Lord, or rather to the Son of man exalted on his throne of glory and of judgment by the Ancient of days, may demonstrate, that it was written after the book of Daniel; but not, surely, that it was the production of Enoch before the flood" (Laurence, xviii).

The rest of the nineteenth century witnessed an unprecedented preoccupation with the OTP. Vast advances were made from 1850 to 1900, especially in terms of the production of texts, LEXICONS, CONCORDANCES, and grammars. In the middle of the nineteenth century J. Migne, who was greatly indebted to Laurence, published the first modern collection of the OTP, Dictionnaire des apocryphes, ou collection de tous les livres apocryphes relatifs a l'ancien et au nouveau testament (Paris, 1856–58). Since the work reflected the Roman Catholic view of the canon, which incorporates as deuterocanonical the Protestant Apocrypha, the Pseudepigrapha were labeled "apocryphes."

With editions, translations, and at least one collection of the OTP, scholars could now—virtually for the first time—focus on this amorphous corpus and attempt to interpret the documents in it. Gradually recognition of the vast differences between the modern European and ancient Near Eastern cultures began to surface, undoubtedly inspired by the knowledge of the East that resulted from French and British conquests of Egypt (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and Palestine. The interpreters of the biblical and apocryphal books, however, continued to attribute European norms to the ancient authors. As JESUS was habitually portrayed as a teacher uninfluenced by the eschatological and apocalyptic movements in early Judaism, so also the authors of the Pseudepigrapha were assumed to think logically and systematically like Europeans influenced by the Enlightenment.

When the OTP were interpreted they were considered inferior to the canonical works, important only because of the knowledge they provided of the intertestamental period and for an understanding of the sacred canon. This limited appreciation of the OTP was due to the fact that Christian scholars were interested in Christian Scriptures. An ignorance of Christian origins, therefore, impeded fruitful interpretation. Scholars did not take seriously the insights that Jesus was a Jew, that his earliest followers were Jews, and that for decades Christianity was only one of many groups within pre-70 CE Palestinian Judaism, an understanding that was widely shared only after 1970. Even more serious, there was a tendency to deny that Jesus was a Jew. Christianity was considered distinct from and far superior to Judaism; thus it is no wonder that such beautiful Jewish Pseudepigrapha as Joseph and Aseneth and the Prayer of Manasseh were singled out and elevated as Christian and that the profound wisdom of early Judaism was minimized. Unfortunately, but understandably in such a Zeitgeist, E. SCHÜRER in his voluminous A History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (ET, 5 vols., 1890–91) cast aspersions on early Jewish prayer and piety. Interpretation of the OTP was often warped by such polemics.

b. Early twentieth century. The twentieth century began on a very promising note with the first German collection of the OTP, published under the editorshop of E. KAUTZSCH in 1900. This valuable work was followed in 1913 by the first English collection, under the editorship of R. CHARLES. Now it was possible, or much easier, to read the great Jewish apocalypses like 4 Ezra, 1 Enoch, 2 ENOCH, and related apocalyptic writings like the TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS. The presence of the OTP in individual translations, editions, or collections produced an awareness of—if not an appreciation of—Jewish apocalypticism. It is understandable that during this period numerous NT scholars, most notably A. SCHWEITZER, stressed the importance of apocalypticism and eschatology in the life of Jesus and of his earliest followers.

The best interpreters of the documents in the OTP saw that they witnessed to a complex yet not chaotic or disoriented group of theologies. Charles tended to see two main types of early Jewish theology: apocalyptic Judaism and legalistic Judaism. One of his significant contributions is the insight that "to all Jewish apocalyptic writers the Law was of eternal validity, but they also clung fast to the validity of the prophetic teaching as the source of new truth and the right of apocalyptic as its successor in this respect" (1913, 2:vii).

c. Post WWI. After 1913 the feverish study of the OTP came to a temporary halt. World War I wracked Western culture, which since the time of the Reformation had supported biblical studies, draining it of energy and resources. Crises degenerated into chaos as world depression and the rise of Communism rocked the West, shattering the dream of achieving peace on earth through progress in industry and technology.

Biblical interpretation, too, was deeply affected by the resulting disorientation and disillusionment. One result was the demise of the study of the OTP. Another was a denigration of the importance of history in biblical interpretation and the correlative stress on existentialism. Jewish documents were no longer considered important. Antisemitism seeped into biblical interpretation, and an aversion to anything Jewish gripped many sectors in Europe.

The most influential and perhaps greatest NT scholar of the period, R. BULTMANN, stressed the need to remove Jewish myth (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) from the NT and to interpret the message of the gospel in existential terms since the gospel was primarily a call to decision in the present. Bultmann was indeed preoccupied with history, but his interests were theological, not historical. Examples of his interpretation of the OTP and his theological reconstruction of Jewish history may be found in the following excerpts from his Primitive Christianity in Its Contemporary Setting (1949; ET 1956): "Israel (apart from Hellenistic Judaism) cut herself off from the outside world and lived in extraordinary isolation" (60). In early Judaism God "was a superior cosmic power, spatially distant and ontologically distinct from all worldly phenomena. The apocalypses provide fantastic pictures of his cosmic rule, with his hosts of angels and blinding glory of heaven" (61). The scribes' "method of exegesis was primitive, and, despite certain variations, stereotype" (64). For Bultmann, pre-70 Palestinian Judaism was intolerably burdened by a rigid legalism, yet he was far more sensitive to early Judaism than was Schürer, who influenced him. Contrary to the popular sentiment in Germany, Bultmann placed Jesus squarely within Palestinian Judaism as a Jew. However, even though Bultmann was far more aware than his colleagues of the need for historical research in the study of earliest Christianity, he nevertheless devoted years to the Greek NT but little time to the Semitic OTP.

d. Post WWII. After WWII interest in history and the OTP once again rose in biblical circles, partly due to the discovery of the Qumran manuscripts (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Among these scrolls were found fragments of several documents of the OTP, notably early versions of at least two of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, fragments from more than a dozen manuscripts of JUBILEES, and numerous manuscripts of the Book of Enoch. At least these documents from the OTP clearly predate the destruction of the Qumran monastery in 68 CE.

New sensitivities to the traditions and complexities of the NT Gospels, the refinement of NT FORM CRITICISM, and the development of REDACTION CRITICISM cumulatively led to a "new quest of the historical Jesus." The call for research in this area was heard in France and Israel (P. Benoit), in Norway (N. Dahl), and especially in Germany among Bultmann's students (esp. E. Käsemann). A renewed interest in history and in ancient texts was in the air.

The study and interpretation of the OTP lagged behind as attention initially focused on the documents unique to and supposedly produced by the Qumran community. However, the interpretation of these scrolls eventually revolutionized the understanding of pre-70 Palestinian Judaism and paved the way for an unprecedented devotion to the study of the OTP.

e. 1970 to present. Beginning around 1970 the OTP was restored to a place of honor in biblical research. Groups were organized in the United States, Germany, Holland, and elsewhere for an intensive examination of these writings; and in the 1980s new collections appeared in English, German, French, Dutch, Danish, Spanish, Italian, modern Greek, and Japanese.

For the first time in over 1,500 years, the OTP is now recognized as a major witness to the origins of modern Judaism and Christianity. No longer are these documents interpreted only in terms of a closed Jewish or Christian canon. Pre-70 Palestinian Judaism is no longer denigrated as "Late Judaism" or "Intertestamental Judaism"; it is correctly labeled "Early Judaism." Moreover, it is increasingly difficult to distinguish between Jewish and Christian thought; and discussions turn on what makes an ethical tract like the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs Jewish or Christian. First Enoch 37–71, which J. Milik and some scholars interpreted to be Christian, perhaps from the third century CE, is now acknowledged to be clearly Jewish and probably earlier than 70 CE. Other documents are being similarly reinterpreted and redated.

Hence early Judaism is interpreted differently. It is no longer seen as orthodox, closed, and monolithic but is recognized to be diverse and creatively alive, open to the scientific, linguistic, and philosophical advances of other cultures. It is not seen as simply divided into four clearly defined sects but is characterized by more than a dozen groups and by many more subgroups, one of them the Palestinian Jesus movement. The documents in the OTP are no longer interpreted as if they were insignificant compositions by insignificant groups on the fringes of a dominant normative Judaism.

Formerly the origins of Christianity were often seen to be tied to the pagan mystery religions and perhaps in some ways to some forms of Judaism. Now the tide has turned. Both rabbinic Judaism and early Christianity are seen to have developed out of the same religion—actually religions—namely, early Judaism. It is now recognized that while rabbinic Judaism tended to reject the apocalyptic elements in its forerunner (pre-70 Palestinian Judaism), it nevertheless preserved some elements from earlier Jewish apocalypticism, which profoundly affected the origins of earliest Christianity. The renewed appreciation and interpretation of the OTP has been the main catalyst for this paradigm shift.

Obviously the interpretation of the OTP is just beginning. No systematic presentation of the materials is possible at present. The documents are diverse, often composite, even self-contradictory; however, their interpretation opens our eyes to the vast range of meanings of biblical interpretation and ushers us into the brilliant, informed, and creative reflections of early Jews and Christians.

Bibliography: R. H. Charles (ed.), The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the OT in English (1913). J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), The OT Pseudepigrapha (2 vols., 1983–85); "A History of Pseudepigrapha Research: The Re-emerging Importance of the Pseudepigrapha," ANRW II.19.1, 54-88. A.-M. Denis, Introduction aux pseudépigraphes grecs d'Ancien Testament (SVTP 1, 1970). A. Díez Macho (ed.), Apócrifos del Antiguo Testamento (1982–). A. Dupont-Sommer and M. Philonenko (eds.), La Bible: Écrits intertestamentaires (1987). E. Kautzsch (ed.), Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments (1900, repr. 1975). R. A. Kraft and G. W. E. Nickelsburg (eds.), Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters (1986). W. G. Kümmel (ed.), Jüdische Schriften aus hellenistisch-römischer Zeit (1973–). R. Laurence, The Book of Enoch the Prophet: An Apocryphal Production (1833). P. Sacchi (ed.), Apocrifi dell'Antico Testamento (1981). H. F. D. Sparks (ed.), The Apocryphal OT (1984). M. E. Stone (ed.), Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran, Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus (CRINT 2, 2, 1984).

J. H. CHARLESWORTH

PSEUDO-PHILO

The Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum of Pseudo-Philo is a retelling of the biblical narrative from Adam to Saul's death, focusing particularly on Israel's leaders. It is extant only in Latin; but its original language was Hebrew, which was translated into Greek and then into Latin (D. Harrington [1970]). The text survives in eighteen full and three fragmentary copies dating from the eleventh to the fifteenth centuries. Harrington supplies a critical text and apparatus (1976), and this text has been translated into English (Harrington [1985]) and French (J. Cazeaux [1976]). Earlier translations were by M. James (Eng., 1971) and C. Dietzfelbinger (Ger., 1975). H. Jacobson (1996) presents a translation based on his reconstruction of the Hebrew original.

Scholars disagree over whether the extant text is complete. Since the narrative breaks off abruptly in the middle of a dialogue between Saul and the son of the Amalekite king in chapter 65, some scholars think that the original ending, perhaps including David's accession to the throne, has been lost; others disagree. There are other places where text may be missing as well.

There is general consensus that Pseudo-Philo was written in the first or early second century CE, with debate centering on whether it was written before or after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE. In 1996 Jacobson argued that it was written after the destruction, while Harrington has consistently maintained that it was written before. It is most likely that Pseudo-Philo was written in Palestine, given its use of a Palestinian text-type (Harrington [1971]), the similarities of some of its ideas to those of 2 BARUCH and 4 Ezra (both originating in Palestine at a time just after the destruction), and its knowledge of Palestinian geography.

The term Pseudo-Philo is due to the fact that the text was transmitted in a Latin translation of the works of PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA. Philo is not the author, however, since this document's approach to the Bible is very unlike his allegorical interpretation, it conflicts with him on specific points, and it seems to have been written in Palestine in Hebrew. The specific identity of the author is unknown, but it is clear that he was learned in biblical and extra-biblical traditions. There have been many attempts to assign Pseudo-Philo to a particular group within first-century Judaism, but such studies have not won acceptance. Thus Pseudo-Philo's importance is as a witness to the thought and methods of biblical interpretation of mainstream Palestinian Judaism, perhaps as found in Palestinian synagogues of the first century.

Pseudo-Philo's genre is a rewriting of the biblical story (see G. Vermes [1961]) similar to that of JOSEPHUS's Antiquities (see also Jubilees and the Genesis Apocryphon). It was perhaps because of this similarity that the work was called Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum, a title that is not original. Pseudo-Philo does not pursue later midrashic methodology (see MIDRASH) of providing verse-by-verse commentary on the biblical text; rather, it freely adapts the biblical story to its own purposes. In the process of retelling it liberally adds, subtracts, condenses, and rewrites, sometimes using existing traditions and at other times apparently exercising some creativity. The degree to which details of the retelling depend on the Bible is debated, with Jacobson and R. Bauckham (1983) seeing a maximum of such use. Pseudo-Philo is important as a source of extra-biblical Jewish traditions, some unique to this work, and as an example of how the Bible was interpreted by Palestinian Jews of the first century.

Modern interest in Pseudo-Philo was sparked in 1898 with the publication of L. Cohn's article. Important commentaries include L. Feldman's prolegomenon to James's 1917 work (1971), C. Perrot and P.-M. Bogaert (1976), and Jacobson. Literary and theological issues are treated by F. Murphy (1993) and E. Reinmuth (1994), who provides an extensive comparison with Luke–Acts.

Pseudo-Philo's main themes and concerns are assurance that God is faithful to Israel despite its sins and despite Israel's sufferings; moral causality, where good is consistently rewarded and evil punished; condemnation of idolatry and of mixed marriages; repentance; leadership in Israel (see G. Nickelsburg [1980]); and eschatology, particularly as it bears on moral causality. There is no messianic interest.

Bibliography: R. Bauckham, "The Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum of Pseudo-Philo and the Gospels as 'Midrash,' " Gospel Perspectives III: Studies in Midrash and Historiography (ed. R. T. France and D. Wenham, 1983) 33-76. L. Cohn, "An Apocryphal Work Ascribed to Philo of Alexandria," JQR o.s. 10 (1898) 277-332. C. Dietzfelbinger, "Pseudo-Philo: Antiquitates Biblicae (Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum)," JSHRZ (ed. W. G. Kümmel, 1975) 2:91-271. L. Feldman, "Prolegomenon," The Biblical Antiquities of Philo (ed. M. R. James, 1971). D. J. Harrington, "The Original Language of Pseudo-Philo's Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum," HTR 63 (1970) 503-14; "The Biblical Text of Pseudo-Philo's Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum," CBQ 33 (1971) 1-17; "Pseudo-Philo," OTP 2 (ed. J. H. Charlesworth, 1985) 297-377. D. J. Harrington and J. Cazeaux, Pseudo-Philon: Les Antiquités Bibliques, vol. 1, Introduction et Texte Critiques (SC, 1976). H. Jacobson, A Commentary on Pseudo-Philo's "Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum" (1996). M. R. James, The Biblical Antiquities of Philo (1971). F. J. Murphy, Pseudo-Philo: Rewriting the Bible (1993). G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Good and Bad Leaders in Pseudo-Philo's Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum," Ideal Figures in Ancient Judaism: Profiles and Paradigms (ed. J. J. Collins and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, 1980) 49-65. C. Perrot and P.-M. Bogaert, Pseudo-Philon: Les Antiquités Bibliques, vol. 2, Introduction Littéraire, Commentaire et Index (SC, 1976). E. Reinmuth, Pseudo-Philo und Lukas: Studien zum "Liber Antiquitatum Biblicarum" und seiner Bedeutung für die Interpretation des Lukanischen Doppelwerks (1994). G. Vermes, Scripture and Tradition in Judaism: Haggadic Studies (1961).

F. J. MURPHY

PSYCHOANALYTIC INTERPRETATION

S. FREUD once acknowledged that most of his discoveries about the unconscious mind had been anticipated by the poets of the past. Thus it should not be surprising that PSYCHOLOGY has been used in an effort to explain the origins, character, and effects of literature.

What makes a reading of a literary work "psychoanalytic"? To call a reading "psychoanalytic" or "Freudian" immediately introduces ambiguity because such an expression can refer to the use either of Freudian themes or of Freudian methods—that is, an interpretation of a literary work can be called "Freudian" or "psychoanalytic" with respect either to the substance of the text (what it reads) or to the interpretive procedures and techniques a reader uses (how it reads).

Generally speaking, there are three points at which psychoanalysis can enter the study of a literary work: examining the mind of the author, examining the minds of the author's characters, or examining the minds of the readers. There is a long tradition of Freudian criticism that examines the text for buried motives and hidden neurotic conflicts that generated the writer's art: In writing Hamlet, for example, it is claimed that Shakespeare was working through the death of his son (E. Jones [1949]), or that in writing The Gambler Dostoevski was drawing on the prohibitions placed upon masturbation in his childhood (S. Freud [1928b]). Because the hazards of examing an author's mind are inversely proportional to the amount of material available on the writer's life and private thoughts, it is never completely safe to guess at the psychoanalytic significance of a work of art, even that of a candid living author. For some major writers (like Chaucer, Shakespeare, and the biblical writers) we have only the most minimal sense of what their private lives may have been—often, none at all. Thus this form of psychoanalytic LITERARY criticism is generally viewed as speculative.

Most of Freud's own ventures into literature involved the analyses of literary characters. His initial remarks on the Oedipus complex were literary, involving both Hamlet and Oedipus. Hamlet, according to Freud, is "the hysteric" who delays action because he is paralyzed by guilt over Claudius's enactment of his own unconscious desires (1916–17, 335). A stream of essays by other analysts followed, mostly on other figures in fiction. They wrote what might be described as case studies of literature, works dealing with characters they categorized as neurotic. Most of these analysts emphasized Freudian themes like the Oedipus complex, anality, schizoid tendencies, latent or expressed homosexuality, guilt, etc. and the roles they played in literary characterizations.

Psychoanalytic fictional character analysis has not fallen into as deep a disrepute as concentration on the writer, in great part because fictional characters are viewed as representatives of life and as such can be understood only if we assume that they are "telling a truth." This assumption allows readers to find unconscious motivations, albeit in literary characters. For example, Abraham's actions and language reveal a great deal about him despite the fact that all we will ever know is contained in the 1,534 verses of Genesis.

On the other hand, literary characters are both more and less than human. This presents a problem. While one aspect of narrative characterization is to provide a mimetic function (to represent human action and motivation), another aspect is primarily textual (to reveal information to a reader or to conceal it). This situation has no precise parallel in life (although it can be argued that people often resemble literary characters in the masks they present to the world). As a result, examining a narrative character is not risk free either. For instance, contradictions in Abraham's character may result from the psychic complexities the biblical writer imagined or from the fact that Abraham is an agent in a literary narrative that has a highly developed system of conventions—i.e., his traits may be more a function of the requirements of the story line than of his personality.

Since authors may not provide much material for the theorists and since characters are not people, many scholars have shifted their focus from the interpretation of meanings embedded within a text to the processes of writing and reading. Rather than attempting to determine objective meanings hidden within a text (meanings a reader needs to extricate), these scholars concentrate on the subjective experience of the reader (interactions between reader/text/author) and the values and premises with which a reader approaches interpretation of a text (see READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM). As within psychoanalysis, their foci are problems of indeterminacy, uncertainty, perspective, HERMENEUTICS, and subjective (and communal) assumptions and agreements.

Until the twentieth century, reading the Bible was thought to be a rather straightforward procedure. The goal was to respond "properly" by trying to understand the text and grasp the meaning. This changed once literary theory in general and psychoanalytic literary theory in particular gained acceptance within biblical studies.

Of course, psychoanalytic literary theory is no more a conceptually unified critical position among biblical scholars than among other literary theorists. The term is associated with those who examine the writer (D. Halperin [1993]), the biblical characters (D. Clines [1990]; Y. Feldman [1994]; I. Rashkow [1993]; D. Zeligs [1988]), or the reader (Clines et al.). Further, the approaches are neither monolithic nor mutually exclusive. But biblical exegetes who use psychoanalytic literary theory seem to agree that meaning does not inhere completely and exclusively in the text and that the "effects" of reading Scripture, psychological and otherwise, are essential to its meaning. Ultimately, this type of literary criticism yields a way of looking at biblical narratives and readers that reorganizes both their interrelationships and the distinctions between them. As a result, recognizing the relationship of a reader to a text leads to a more profound awareness that no one biblical interpretation is intrinsically "true"—that is, the meaning of biblical narratives does not wait to be uncovered but evolves, actualized by readers (and interpreters).

The primary objection to psychoanalytic literary theory by biblical scholars and others seems to be among feminists (see FEMINIST INTERPRETATION), who critique the Freudian idea of penis envy. (For a number of different perspectives on the current state of the debate between feminists and various kinds of psychoanalysis see E. Wright [1992].) M. Torok (1964), for example, argues that a common phallic phase does not characterize the infantile development of both sexes; therefore, "penis envy" is not based on biological fact but is a misconception. Similarly, many feminist theorists read J. Lacan (who shifted from Freud's biological penis to the phallus as signifier) as more productive for feminist thinking. In addition, a number of French feminists have reevaluated the experience of the female body. In general, a major question for dissenting scholars is how to read various texts of psychoanalyses—simply "take the best and leave the rest" or "argue back" (J. Still and M. Worton [1993]).

Clines has observed that "what has happened . . . in the last three decades can be represented . . . as a shift in focus that has moved from author to text to reader" (1990, 9-10); and E. McKnight notes that readers "use the Bible today . . . in terms of their values, attitudes, and responses" (1988, 14-15). Thus, whether wittingly or otherwise, more biblical scholars seem to be using some form of psychoanalytic literary theory in their reading, dissenters notwithstanding.

Bibliography: D. J. A. Clines, What Does Eve Do to Help? And Other Readerly Questions to the OT (JSOTSup, 1990). M. Eigen, "The Fire That Never Goes Out," Psychoanalytic Review 79 (1992) 271-87. Y. S. Feldman, "And Rebecca Loved Jacob: But Freud Did Not," Freud and Forbidden Knowledge (1994) 7-25. S. Freud, The Standard Works of S. Freud, vol. 9, Creative Writers and Day-Dreaming (ed. and tr. J. Strachey, 1908e) 143-56; vols. 15 and 16, Introductory Lectures on Psycho-Analysis (ed. and tr. J. Strachey, 1916–17) 15:15-239, 16:243-463; vol. 21, Dostoevsky and Patricide (ed. and tr. J. Strachey, 1928b) 177-94. S. R. Garrett, "The 'Weaker Sex' in the Testament of Job," JBL 112 (1993) 55-70. H. Haas, How to Psychoanalyze the Bible (1939). D. Halperin, Seeking Ezekiel: Text and Psychology (1993). U. Haselstein, "Poets and Prophets: The Hebrew and the Hellene in Freud's Cultural Theory," German Life and Letters 45 (1992) 50-65. N. Holland, Five Readers Reading (1975). E. Jones, Hamlet and Oedipus (1949). E. V. McKnight, Postmodern Use of the Bible: The Emergence of Reader-oriented Criticism (1988). S. D. Moore, " 'Mirror, Mirror . . . ': A Psychoanalytic Approach to Textual Determinacy Within Biblical Readings. Lacanian Reflections on E. S. Malbon's 'Text and Context: Interpreting the Disciples in Mark,' " Semeia 62 (1993) 165-83. M. Ostow, "S. and J. Freud and the Philippson Bible," International Review of Psychoanalysis 16 (1989) 483-92. P. R. Raabe, "Deliberate Ambiguity in the Psalter," JBL 110 (1991) 213-27. I. N. Rashkow, The Phallacy of Genesis: A Feminist- Psychoanalytic Approach (1993). J. R. Sauve, "Joshua: A Story of Individuation," Journal of Religion and Health 31, 4 (Winter 1992) 265-71. J. Still and M. Worton (eds.), Textuality and Sexuality: Reading Theories and Practices (1993). W. R. Tate, Reading Mark from the Outside: Eco and Iser Leave Their Mark (1995). M. Torok, " 'L'envie du Pénis' Sous la Femme," La Sexualité Féminine: Nouvelle Recherche Psychanalyse (1964). R. E. Watts, "Biblical Agape as a Model of Social Interest," Individual Psychology: Journal of Adlerian Theory, Research, and Practice 48 (1992) 35-40. F. Wittels, "Psychoanalysis and History: The Nibelungs and the Bible," Psychoanalytic Quarterly 15 (1946) 88-103. W. Wolff, Changing Concepts of the Bible: A Psychological Analysis of Its Words, Symbols, Beliefs (1951). E. Wright (ed.), Feminism and Psychoanalysis: A Critical Dictionary (1992). D. F. Zeligs, Psychoanalysis and the Bible: A Study in Depth of Seven Leaders (1988).

I. N. RASHKOW

PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES

The history of the application of psychological inquiry and insight to the Bible and to biblical studies unfolds in four phases: (1) the early church to 1700: the study of the psyche as a branch of biblical anthropology and Christian apologetics; (2) 1700 to 1915: biblical psychology as a critical theological discipline; (3) 1900 to 1970: the depth psychologist and the Bible; and (4) 1970 to the present: psychological criticism as a tool of biblical scholarship.

1. The Early Church to 1700: The Study of the Psyche as a Branch of Biblical Anthropology and Christian Apologetics. Franz DELITZSCH opened the second edition of his classic study A System of Biblical Psychology (1861; ET 1867) with the statement "Biblical Psychology is no science of yesterday. It is one of the oldest sciences of the church." He was correct in observing that the nature and destiny of the human psyche (soul) as delineated in scriptural tradition constitute a continuing area of theological inquiry within Christian theology from the early church to the nineteenth century, even though it was not labeled as psichologia until 1530 (P. Melanchthon), and even though it was informed as much, if not more, by the Greek philosophical schools than by the Bible up to the time of the Reformation.

Before the Reformation the study of the psyche was marked by a twofold interest: (a) the need to elaborate a doctrine of the origin, life, purpose, and destiny of the self as a construct of soul (psyché), spirit (pneuma), and body (sōma) expressive of the Christian revelation set forth in Scripture and elaborated in tradition and (b) the need to relate this doctrine to the prevailing Platonic, Aristotelian, and Stoic "psychologies." It is no accident that the third-century tractate of TERTULLIAN, the sixth-century treatise of CASSIODORUS, and the sixteenth-century commentary of MELANCHTHON should all adopt the title of Aristotle's De Anima for their works.

AUGUSTINE in the fourth century continued this tradition with numerous "psychological" works (e.g., De anima et eius origine [Concerning the Soul and Its Origin], De Quantitate Animae [Concerning the Greatness of the Soul], and De Duabus Animabus [Concerning the Two Souls]) in which he defended a Platonic trichotomous view of the soul (soul, spirit, body) over the dichotomous view of the Stoics (body, soul). However, at the same time he introduced an introspective dimension that anticipated modern psychological analysis with an emphasis on the self as the starting point of all knowledge and with a searching analysis of the inner person, human motives, and the threefold faculties of the soul: memory, understanding, and will.

By the late medieval period a doctrine of soul (anima, psyche) had come to be regarded as essential to any summa (complete doctrine), as evidenced in the work of John Scottus ERIUGENA, HUGH OF ST. VICTOR, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Duns Scotus, BONAVENTURE, and the "angelic doctor" THOMAS AQUINAS. Aquinas patterned his analysis of the soul on a model developed by the Muslim scholar Avicenna, who in turn was informed by the rediscovery of Aristotle's De Anima. The soul for Aquinas is tripartite, consisting of a vegetative soul (governing bodily growth and reproduction), a sensitive soul (governing perception, appetites, emotions, and "common sense"), and a rational soul (governing reason and faith).

With the advent of the Protestant Reformation in the sixteenth century, subscription to the authority of Greek philosophy waned in favor of the AUTHORITY of Scripture, as evidenced in Manuductio ad veram psychologiam e sacris literis (Guide to a True Psychology from Sacred Scriptures), the 1619 treatise of C. Bartholinus, teacher of medicine and theology at the University of Copenhagen, which anticipated the biblical psychologies of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

2. 1700 to 1915: Biblical Psychology as a Critical Theological Discipline. The eighteenth century marks the beginning of a new era of scriptural interpretation that expanded the general work of biblical studies to include historical-critical concerns. Contemporary with the new "scientific" approach to the Bible was the burgeoning acceptance of psychology as a bona fide field of study. The combination of these two elements resulted in four major works on biblical psychology: M. Roos, Fundamenta psychologiae ex sacra Scriptura sic collecta (1769); J. BECK, Outlines of Biblical Psychology (1843; ET 1877); J. Haussmann, Die biblische Lehre vom Menschen als Grundlage wahrer Menschenkenntnis (1848), which subsumed psychology under the broader category of biblical anthropology; and the landmark work of Franz Delitzsch, A System of Biblical Psychology (1861^2; ET 1869), a work that warrants special elaboration.

The table of contents in Delitzsch's work provides a paradigm of topics typical of biblical or Christian psychologies of the period: (a) the question of the preexistence of the soul; (b) creation and the trichotomous constitution of persons as a unity of spirit, soul, and body; (c) the fall and the emergence of sin, shame, and conscience; (d) the "natural condition" of the "I" (ego) as characterized by freedom, reason, spirit, the "seven powers of the soul," sleeping, waking, dreaming, health, and sickness; (e) the regeneration of the self and the phenomena of conscious and unconscious processes of grace, new life in the spirit, ecstacy, and theopneustia; (f) death; and (g) resurrection, as opposed to the extrabiblical doctrine of metempsychosis.

Four features of Delitzsch's approach merit special attention for their relevance to issues and terms that characterize subsequent work on psychology and biblical studies. (1) He insisted on "biblical psychology" as an "independent science" discrete from (though closely related to) biblical theology and dogmatics. (2) He differentiated "general psychology" from "biblical psychology," the former proceeding analytically from "psychical phenomena" to their causes, and the latter proceeding synthetically from the "psychology" in the biblical text to its application to the human condition. (3) He risked the use of "newly-coined words and daring ideas" that surprisingly proved to be harbingers of twentieth-century issues and terminology, e.g., his references to dreams, archetypes (Urbild), the "I" (ego), and to conscious and unconscious (bewusste, unbewusste) dimensions of experience. (4) With an eye to his profession as theologian, scholar, and clergy, he defended the inclusion of psychology within the ranks of critical biblical research as a God-given capacity "granted to the human soul . . . of raising itself above itself by self-investigation."

One of the last of the biblical psychologies prior to the emergence of depth psychology is M. Fletcher's The Psychology of the NT (1912). Fletcher cited the need to update the earlier work of Beck and Delitzsch, noting that "psychology [as well as historical criticism] is a science 'still in the making.' " Turning to the research of W. James (1902), J. Leuba (1912), and E. Starbuck (1914^4), he praised the "new modern scientific psychology" for having "furnished the biblical student with a new instrument," first, to "analyze . . . the scriptural terms which describe the mental and moral nature of man"; second, to identify "the psychological conceptions of the NT writers"; and third, to enumerate, describe, classify, and if possible explain "all conscious states and processes" and to "seek to determine the conditions . . . under which they arise."

3. 1900 to 1970: Depth Psychological Approaches to the Bible. The development of depth psychology in the first half of the twentieth century (S. Freud, C. Jung), with its exploration of the "unconscious," gave birth to a rich spectrum of psychological theories and methods that have been applied to biblical studies—first by psychologists, therapists, clinically trained pastors, and theologians; and second, beginning around 1970, by biblical scholars. (The countervailing appearance of behaviorism, with its empiricist aversion to acknowledging an "inner life," made little impact on biblical HERMENEUTICS, with the exception of works like R. Bufford's The Human Reflex: Behavioral Psychology in Biblical Perspective (1982).

a. S. Freud. Freud's last work, Moses and Monotheism (1938), was the only work he dedicated exclusively to a biblical topic, although he had planned it as part of a vast undertaking that would apply psychological theory to the entire Bible. His influence on biblical hermeneutics, however, stems only in part from this work, which was a PSYCHOANALYTIC study of the hidden (i.e., repressed) meanings behind the religious symbols, stories, and rituals that originated with the exodus.

Of equal, if not greater, significance for later applications to biblical studies is Freud's general theory of unconscious factors operative in human behavior and expression (e.g., obsessive-compulsive behavior, paranoia, infantile wish-fulfillment, repression, projection, neurosis, psychosis, super-ego-oriented behavior informed by the conformity principle vs. ego-oriented behavior informed by the reality principle) and the psychological insight it might provide into biblical narratives, personalities, theological concepts, religious phenomena, stories, symbols, and rituals. Freud's hermeneutical goal was to enable humanity to achieve psychic health as exemplified for him in the figure of Michelangelo's Moses, which for Freud "becomes the bodily expression of the highest psychic achievement that is possible for a human being, the overpowering of one's own passions in favor of and in fulfillment of a destiny to which one has committed oneself."

From the 1920s to the present, beginning with the correspondence of Swiss theologian O. Pfister with Freud, an array of pastoral counselors, analysts, LITERARY critics, and theologians have turned to Freudian theory and method for psychological insight into biblical personalities, narratives, rituals, doctrine, and religious phenomena (F. Dolto and G. Sévérin [1979]; C. Healer [1972]; T. Reik [1960]; R. Rubenstein [1972]; D. Zeligs [1974]; cf. bibliographic essays in M. Sales [1979] and A. Vergote [1979]).

b. C. Jung. The Bible plays a comprehensive role in JUNG's life and thought. The twenty volumes of his Collected Works contain allusions to dozens of biblical figures and to all but thirteen of the canonical writings (see CANON OF THE BIBLE). In addition, his writings demonstrate broad familiarity with the HB and NT APOCRYPHA, second-century GNOSTIC literature, and critical biblical methods.

Although Jung nowhere sets forth a systematic psychological hermeneutic, he does demonstrate the presuppositions and approach of such a hermeneutic in "Answer to Job" (1952), his sole essay on a biblical text, in which he proposes that the biblical text is, among other things, an "utterance of the psyche." That is to say, the text is to be seen not only as part of a historical or literary process (as biblical criticism has pointed out) but also as part of a psychic process in which unconscious as well as conscious factors are at work. The function of such a text as the voice of the unconscious is to complement or correct the one-sidedness of conscious life either for the individual reader or for the entire culture. The mode in which these "truths anchored deep in the psyche" are expressed is the language of symbol and archetypal image like those found not only in Scripture but also in dreams, myths, fairy tales, MUSIC, ART, and literature from around the world.

The hermeneutical task for a psychological approach to the text involves a two stage process: (1) an objective recognition of the unconscious as well as the conscious origin, nature, and function of the language and symbolism of the text and (2) a method of bringing the "complementary" message of the text to consciousness, which for Jung involves the twofold work of "amplification" and "active imagination." Amplification is the process of identifying, exploring, and "amplifying" the meanings the text evokes in hearers, past or present. Within the context of the church or synagogue this hermeneutical process is seen at work in sermons, Bible study groups, pastoral counseling, and private Bible meditation. Active imagination is the process of "translating" the text into a new medium, much in the same way traditional religious communities have sought to "ex-press" the text in painting, sculpture, stained-glass windows, liturgy, poetry, drama, or song. The goal of a psychological hermeneutic is not to displace but to complement the work of historical-literary criticism by going beyond the literal-historical content of the text to focus on the value the text actually or potentially evokes in the conscious or unconscious life of individual readers or communities and to examine the significance of these values for human development.

From the mid-twentieth century to the present a succession of Jungian-trained analysts, theologians, and counselors (E. Drewermann [1984]; E. Edinger [1986]; E. Howes and S. Moon [1973]; M. Kelsey [1968]; F. Kunkel [1947; ET 1988]; J. Sanford [1970, 1985]; and H. Westman [1961]) have amply demonstrated the application of a Jungian hermeneutic to a variety of biblical texts.

c. Post-Freudian and post-Jungian developments. On the basis of the pioneering work of Freud and Jung, combined with subsequent analytical and clinical approaches developed by such figures as A. Boisen, V. Frankl, K. Horney, C. Rogers, K. Menninger, and H. Sullivan, a body of literature has emerged relating psychology to the Bible in a variety of ways: (i) the psychological analysis of biblical phenomena, e.g., demon possession (S. McCasland [1951]), miracles (E. Micklem [1922]), PROPHECY, audition, ecstacy, vision, INSPIRATION (G. Joyce [1910]; J. Kaplan [1908]; W. Klein [1956]; J. Povah [1925]), conscience (J. Rozell [1974]), atonement (D. Browning [1966]), and revelation (R. Frayn [1940]); (ii) psychological studies of key biblical figures, e.g., JESUS (G. Berguer [1923]; G. Hall [1917]; cf. A. Schweitzer [1913; ET 1938]), PAUL (J. Bishop [1975]; D. Cox [1959]; Healer; Pfister [1920]; Rubenstein), Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, Saul, David, Solomon (Zeligs, Sanford), Satan (R. Kluger [1967]), Judas (A. Nicole [1924]), and the Holy Spirit (L. Dewar 1960]); (iii) analysis of biblical symbols (e.g., E. Goodenough [1953–68]; Diel; P. Henry [1979]); (iv) research on parapsychological phenomena reported in the Bible (L. Heron [1974]); (v) the psychology of biblical interpretation (C. Johnson [1983]); (vi) biblical approaches to pastoral counseling (e.g., D. Capps [1981]; W. Oates [1950]); (vii) psychological analyses of biblical literature (J. Bruns [1959]; Doloto and Sévérin; Drewermann;

I. Gerber [1951]; H. Harsch [1977]; J. Henderson and M. Oakes [1963]; R. Leslie [1965]; Reik; P. Riceour [1980]; Y. Spiegel [1972]; E. Wellisch [1954]; Westman; W. Wolff [1951]).

4. 1970 to the Present: Psychological Criticism as a Discipline Within Biblical Studies. In his 1968 Festschrift article in honor of E. GOODENOUGH, "The Psychological Study of the Bible," F. GRANT broke ranks with a long-standing suspicion of psychology among twentieth-century biblical scholars and issued a call for "a new kind of Biblical criticism," one that would heed Goodenough's suggestions concerning "the value and importance, even the necessity, of the psychological interpretation of the Bible." The "earlier disciplines are all necessary and important," Grant insisted, but "beyond the historical and exegetical interpretation of the Bible lies the whole new field of depth psychology and psychoanalysis."

Grant was not the first biblical scholar to consider the possibility of and need for applying the insights of psychology to biblical texts. W. BOUSSET, H. CADBURY, A. DEISSMANN, H. GUNKEL, V. TAYLOR (1959), and W. SANDAY can all be cited in varying degrees to similar effect. Bousset, for example, suggested that the source of the NT concept of preexistence is ultimately to be found not only in history-of-religions processes (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) but also "in the unconscious, in the uncontrollable depth of the overall psyche of the human community." Taylor, in his 1959 classic, The Person of Christ in NT Teaching, included a seldom-noted chapter on christology and psychology in which he directed attention to Freud's and Jung's research into the nature of the unconscious. More recently the writings of S. Brown (1995), M. Buss (1980), A. Y. Collins (1984), D. Halperin (1993), D. Kille (1995), D. Miller (1995), J. Miller (1983), R. Moore (1978), W. Rollins (1983, 1985), R. Scroggs (1977, 1982), G. Theissen (1987), M. A. Tolbert (1978), M. Willett-Newheart (1995), W. Wink (1978), and W. Wuellner and R. Leslie (1984) represent attempts by biblical scholars (as opposed to psychologists or psychoanalysts) to apply psychological insight to biblical interpretation.

Theissen's Psychological Aspects of Pauline Theology (1987) merits special elaboration as a landmark volume in this tradition by virtue of its being the first "methodically disciplined" attempt by a biblical scholar to integrate and apply the insights of three major psychological schools (learning theory, psychodynamic theory, and cognitive psychology) to the exegesis of five sets of Pauline texts. Learning theory examines the new images in the symbolic world of early Christianity that lead to new experience and behavior; psychodynamic theory focuses on the unconscious archetypes awakened by the Christian kerygma (Jung) or the unconscious conflicts it helps bring to light (Freud); and cognitive psychology is concerned with the cognitive restructuring of reality occasioned by the Christ event.

Theissen identifies his agenda as "psychological exegesis" (or alternatively, "a hermeneutically oriented psychology of religion"). He sees the goal of psychological exegesis coterminous with that of historical-critical exegesis—namely, "to make texts intelligible on the basis of their context in life." The special objective of psychological exegesis is to clarify the "psychic factors and aspects" involved, focusing specifically on the "new patterns of experience and behavior that appeared with ancient Christianity" as evidenced and expressed in the NT text.

Theissen concludes with the following apologia for the extended application of psychology to biblical studies: "We do not yet grasp what historical forces brought forth and determined early Christianity. . . . But beside and within this external history there is an inner history of humanity. . . . This internal history is no less important than the external. . . . Anyone who thinks that this religion can be illumined historically and factually without psychological reflection is just as much in error as one who pretends that everything about this religion can be said in this fashion."

5. Summary. The contribution of psychology and psychological criticism to biblical studies lies in two areas: (a) in the research undertaken from the early church through the twentieth century in the biblical understanding of the human psyche, its origin, nature, purpose, and destiny and the religious and moral implications of such an understanding and (b) in the new research undertaken in the twentieth century in response to depth psychology and its developments, leading to the development of a psychologically informed exegetical and hermeneutic theory and method still in the making that can cast new light from a psychological perspective on the nature and relationship of the biblical text and its interpreters in the context of a broader humanity characterized by unconscious as well as conscious factors.

Bibliography: G. Berguer, Some Aspects of the Life of Jesus: From the Psychological and Psycho-analytic Point of View (1923). J. G. Bishop, "Psychological Insights in St. Paul's Mysticism," Theology 78 (1975) 318-24. W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos: A History of the Belief in Christ from the Beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus (1970). S. Brown, "The Myth of Sophia," Jung and the Interpretation of the Bible (ed. D. L. Miller, 1995) 92-101. D. S. Browning, Atonement and Psychotherapy (1966). J. E. Bruns, "Depth Psychology and the Fall: Jungian Interpretation of Genesis 3," CBQ 21 (1959) 78-82. R. K. Bufford, The Human Reflex: Behavioral Psychology in Biblical Perspective (1982). M. Buss, "The Social Psychology of Prophecy," Prophecy: Essays Presented to G. Fohrer on His Sixty-fifth Birthday (ed. J. Emerton, 1980) 1-11. D. Capps, Biblical Approaches to Pastoral Counseling (1981). A. Y. Collins, Crisis and Catharsis: The Power of the Apocalypse (1984).

D. Cox, Jung and St. Paul: A Study of the Doctrine of Justification by Faith and Its Relation to the Conception of Individuation (1959). F. Delitzsch, A System of Biblical Psychology (1867). L. Dewar, The Holy Spirit and Modern Thought: An Inquiry into the Historical, Theological, and Psychological Aspects of the Christian Doctrine of the Holy Spirit (1960). F. Dolto and G. Sévérin, The Jesus of Psychoanalysis: A Freudian Interpretation of the Gospel (1979). E. Drewermann, Tiefenpsychologie und Exegese (1984). E. Edinger, The Bible and the Psyche: Individuation Symbolism in the OT (1986). M. S. Fletcher, The Psychology of the NT (1912²). R. S. Frayn, Revelation and the Unconscious (1940). S. Freud, Moses and Monotheism (1939). J. G. Gager, "Some Notes on Paul's Conversion," NTS 27 (1981) 697-703. I. J. Gerber, The Psychology of the Suffering Mind (1951). E. R. Goodenough, Jewish Symbols in the Greco-Roman Period 4 (1953–68). F. C. Grant, "Psychological Study of the Bible," Religions in Antiquity: Essays in Memory of E. R. Goodenough (ed. J. Neusner, 1969) 107-24. G. S. Hall, Jesus, the Christ, in the Light of Psychology (2 vols., 1917). J. Halperin, Seeking Ezekiel: Text and Psychology (1993). H. Hark, Der Traum als Gottes vergessene Sprache: Symbolpsychologische Deutung biblischer und heutiger Träume (1982). H. Harsch, "Psychologische Interpretation biblischer Texte," Una Sancta (1977) 39-45. C. T. Healer, Freud and St. Paul (1972). J. L. Henderson and M. Oakes, The Wisdom of the Serpent: The Myths of Death, Rebirth, and Resurrection (1963). P. Henry, "Water, Bread, Wine: Patterns in Religion," New Directions in NT Study (1979) 203-24. L. Heron, ESP in the Bible (1974). E. B. Howes and S. Moon, Man the Choicemaker (1973). W. James, The Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature (Gifford Lectures 1901-2, 1902). C. B. Johnson, The Psychology of Biblical Interpretation (1983); Journal of Psychology and Theology (1973–). G. C. Joyce, The Inspiration of Prophecy: An Essay in the Psychology of Revelation (1910). C. G. Jung, "Answer to Job," Collected Works 11 (1952). J. H. Kaplan, Psychology of Prophecy: A Study of the Prophetic Mind as Manifested by the Ancient Hebrew Prophets (1908). M. Kassel, Biblische Urbilder: Tiefenpsychologische Auslegung nach C. G. Jung (1982). M. Kelsey, Dreams: The Dark Speech of the Spirit (1968). D. A. Kille, "Jacob: A Study in Individuation," Jung and the Interpretation of the Bible (ed. D. L. Miller, 1995) 40-54, 117-21. W. C. Klein, The Psychological Pattern of OT Prophecy (1956). R. S. Kluger, Satan in the OT (1967). F. Kunkel, Creation Continues: A Psychological Interpretation of the First Gospel (1947; ET 1988). F. H. Lapointé, "Origin and Evolution of the Term Psychology," American Psychologist 25 (1970) 640-46. R. Leslie, Jesus and Logotherapy: The Ministry of Jesus as Interpreted Through the Psychotherapy of V. Frankl (1965). J. H. Leuba, A Psychological Study of Religion, Its Origin, Function, and Future (1912). S. V. McCasland, By the Finger of God: Demon Possessions and Exorcism in Early Christianity in Light of Modern Views of Mental Illness (1951). D. McGann, Journeying Within Transcendence: A Jungian Perspective on the Gospel of John (1988). E. R. Micklem, Miracles and the New Psychology: A Study in the Healing Miracles of the NT (1922). D. L. Miller (ed.), Jung and the Interpretation of the Bible (1995). J. Miller, "Psychoanalytic Approaches to Biblical Religion," Journal of Religion and Health 22 (1983) 19-29. R. L. Moore, "Pauline Theology and the Return of the Repressed," Zygon 13 (1978) 158-68. A. Nicole, Judas the Betrayer: A Psychological Study of Judas Iscariot (1924). W. E. Oates, "The Diagnostic Use of the Bible: What a Man Sees in the Bible is a Projection of His Inner Self," Pastoral Psychology 1, 9 (December 1950) 43-46. O. Pfister, "Die Entwicklung des Apostels Paulus: Eine religionsgeschichtliche und psychologische Skizze," Imago 6 (1920) 243-90. J. W. Povah, The New Psychology and the Hebrew Prophets (1925). T. Reik, Mystery on the Mountain: The Drama of the Sinai Revelation (1959); The Creation of Woman: A Psychoanalytic Inquiry into the Myth of Eve (1960). P. Ricoeur, Essays on Biblical Interpretation (ed. L. Mudge, 1980). W. G. Rollins, Jung and the Bible (1983); "Jung on Scripture and Hermeneutics: Retrospect and Prospect," Essays on Jung and the Study of Religion (ed. L. H. Martin and J. Gross, 1985) 81-94. J. V. Rozell, "Implications of the NT Concept of Conscience," Biblical and Psychological Perspectives for Christian Counselors (ed. R. Bower, 1974) 151-209. R. Rubenstein, My Brother Paul (1972). M. Sales, S. J., "Possibilités et limites d'une lecture psychoanalytique de la Bible," Nouvelle Revue Theologique (Tournai) 101 (1979) 699-723. J. Sanford, The Kingdom Within: A Study of the Inner Meaning of Jesus' Sayings (1970); King Saul, the Tragic Hero: A Study in Individuation (1985). A. Schweitzer, The Psychiatric Study of Jesus: Exposition and Criticism (1913; ET 1948). R. Scroggs, Paul for a New Day (1977); "Psychology as a Tool to Interpret the Text: Emerging Trends in Biblical Thought," Christian Century 99 (1982) 335-38. Y. Spiegel, Psychoanalytische Interpretationen biblischer Texte (1972); Doppeldeutlich: Tiefendimensionen biblischer Texte (1978). E. D. Starbuck, The Psychology of Religion: An Empirical Study of the Growth of Religious Consciousness (1914⁴). V. Taylor, "Christology and Psychology," The Person of Christ in NT Teaching (1959). G. Theissen, Psychological Aspects of Pauline Theology (1987). M. A. Tolbert, Perspectives on the Parables: An Approach to Multiple Interpretations (1978). H. Vande Kemp, "Origin and Evolution of the Term 'Psychology': Addenda," The American Psychologist 35 (1980) 774; Psychology and Theology in Western Thought, 1672–1965: A Historical and Annotated Bibliography (1984). A. Vergote, "Psychoanalyse et interprétation biblique," DBSup 9 (1979) 252-60. E. Wellisch, Isaac and Oedipus: A Study in Biblical Psychology of the Sacrifice of Isaac, the Akedah (1954). H. Westman, The Springs of Creativity: The Bible and the Creative Process of the Psyche (1961). M. Willett-Newheart, "Johannine Symbolism," Jung and the Interpretation of the Bible (1995) 71-91. W. Wink, "On Wrestling with God: Using Psychological Insights in Biblical Study," RelLife 47 (1978) 136-47. C. Wise, Psychiatry and the Bible (1956). W. Wolff, Changing Concepts of the Bible: A Psychological Analysis of Its Words, Symbols, and Beliefs (1951). W. H. Wuellner and R. C. Leslie, The Surprising Gospel: Intriguing Psychological Insights from the NT (1984). D. Zeligs, Psychoanalysis and the Bible: A Study in Depth of Seven Leaders (1974).

W. G. ROLLINS

PUSEY, EDWARD BOUVERIE (1800–1882)

Born Aug. 22, 1800, at Pusey, Berkshire, P. was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, obtaining a degree in classics in 1822. In 1823 he gained a fellowship at Oriel College, Oxford, where J. Keble and J. H. NEWMAN were also fellows. From 1825 to 1827 he studied theology and oriental languages (Hebrew, Arabic, Aramaic, and Syriac) in Germany, familiarizing himself with German scholarship and becoming a competent Semitist. On returning to England he wrote a book analyzing and condemning the rationalistic character of German theology and advocating a high view of biblical INSPIRATION (1828–30).

In 1828 he was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford and canon of Christ Church, a position he held until his death in 1882. His two principal books on the HB, both strongly anti-critical in their approach, were on Daniel (1864) and the Minor Prophets (1860–67). In the former he argued at great length against the critical view that the book of Daniel is a second-century BCE pseudepigraph (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) and accused the proponents of this view of unbelief. The latter, although less blatantly apologetic, is marked by the same combination of learning and conservatism. P. also initiated and wrote an introduction to Isaiah 53.

It is as a leader of the Anglo-Catholic Tractarian (or Oxford) movement, along with Keble and Newman, that P. is most famous. Associated with the movement from 1833, he wrote tracts on its behalf, the most noteworthy being those on baptism and the Eucharist. P.'s private life was characterized by austere asceticism and intense personal religion. He died on Sept. 16, 1882; however, his memory lives on in Pusey House, a theological and religious center founded at Oxford two years after his death.

Works: An Historical Enquiry into the Probable Causes of the Rationalist Character Lately Predominant in the Theology of Germany (2 parts, 1828–30); Minor Prophets with a Commentary, Explanatory and Practical, and Introduction to the Several Books (1860–67); Daniel the Prophet: Nine Lectures Delivered in the Divinity School (1864); The Fifty-third Chapter of Isaiah According to the Jewish Interpreters (2 vols., ed. S. Driver and A. Neubauer, 1877).

Bibliography: P. Butler (ed.), P. Rediscovered (1983), esp. 71-118 on P. as a Hebrew scholar. J. D. Johnston, DNB 47 (1896) 53-61. H. P. Liddon, Life of E. B. P. (4 vols., 1894–97), includes a complete list of P.'s ecclesiastical works and sermons. A. G. Lough, Dr. P.: Restorer of the Church (1981). G. I. Prestige, Pusey (1933). G. C. Richards, Dr. Pusey (1933). G. W. E. Russell, Dr. Pusey (1907). M. Trench, The Story of Dr. P.'s Life (1900).

J. DAY

PUUKKO, ANTTI FILEMON (1875–1954)

A Finnish HB scholar, P. studied Semitic languages under K. Tallqvist in Helsinki but was most influenced by R. KITTEL, with whom he studied in Leipzig in 1906–9, 1912, 1921, and 1925. He graduated from Helsinki in 1909 with a doctorate in philosophy and theology with his dissertation Das Deuteronomium (1910). At the University of Helsinki he was a Dozent for Hebrew language and literature (1910–18), assistant professor of biblical languages (1918–27), and professor of OT from 1927 to his retirement in 1945. He served as editor in chief of the Finnish theological journal (TAik) from 1934 to 1954 and president of the Finnish Academy of Sciences (1947–48).

P.'s name has continued to live in international scholarship because of Das Deuteronomium. Starting with the critical study of Josiah's reform in 2 Kgs 22:3–23:25, he used LITERARY criticism in an attempt to reconstruct Josiah's lawbook and from there an Ur-Deuteronomy. According to P., this lawbook was a purely cultic code that had come into existence during the seventh century in priestly circles and still lacked, among other things, all of the humanitarian laws. Although P.'s starting point was too narrow to support his results, his acute literary-critical observations are still valid and make the work one of the classics of deuteronomic research. In a 1913 essay P. examined Jeremiah's relationship to Deuteronomy and reached the conclusion that Jeremiah had at first bided his time because of his enmity toward the cult but later had taken a critical stand against Deuteronomy.

P., who began as a purely literary critic, later turned to the ancient Near Eastern legal codes, stressing the necessity for a comparative legal- and cultural-historical approach. In light of the ancient Near Eastern parallels to HB law he was prepared to ascribe to Ur-Deuteronomy a somewhat wider scope than he had proposed in his dissertation. He contributed decisively to the breakthrough of historical-critical biblical studies in his homeland through his broad writing activities in the Finnish language and also played an influential role in the modern translation of the Finnish Bible, OT (1933) and NT (1938).

Works: Das Deuteronomium: Eine literarkritische Untersuchung (BWANT 5, 1910); "Jeremias Stellung zum Deuteronomium," (BWANT 13, 1913) 126-53; "Die altassyrischen und hethitischen Gesetze und das Alte Testament," StudOr 1 (1925) 125-66; "Paulus und das Judentum," StudOr 2 (1928) 1-87; Vanhan Testamentin johdanto-oppi (= Introduction to the OT, 1945); Raamatun selitysteos (= Commentary to the Bible) 1-4 (1952–56).

Bibliography: E. Haapa, "Exegetics," Finnish Theology Past and Present (ThFen 7, ed. L. Pinomaa, 1963) 5-27. A. Lauha, Suomalainen Tiedeakatemia, Esitelmät ja Pöytäkirjat, 1955 (1956) 71-78; DBSup (1979) 565-66.

T. K. VEIJOLA

Q

Q (The Sayings Gospel)

1. Nature and Extent. Q (from the German Quelle, "source") is a hypothetical source entailed in the two document hypothesis, which holds that Mark is prior to Matthew and Luke and that Matthew and Luke independently used Mark. In order to account for the approximately 4,500 words of non-Markan (double tradition) material that Matthew shares with Luke, it is necessary to posit a second common source consisting mainly of sayings of JESUS. The fact that there is high verbal agreement between Matthew and Luke in much of the double tradition, coupled with the fact that more than one-third of the sayings occur in the same relative order in Matthew and Luke (even though they are fused with different Markan contexts), makes the conclusion virtually inescapable that Q was a written document rather than simply a body of oral tradition (J. Kloppenborg [1987] 72-80). Matthew and Luke independently combined Mark with Q and hence do not agree on the specific ways Q was attached to Markan contexts; but since they used a written document, both were influenced by Q's order of sayings and hence display significant agreements in the relative ordering of sayings.

The idea of a collection of sayings can be traced back as far as H. MARSH (1801), who argued that the Synoptics derived from two sources: א, a Semitic proto-gospel and a sayings collection, and ב, containing both the material common to Matthew and Luke and many of the parables and sayings used only by Matthew or by Luke. F. SCHLEIERMACHER (1832) later posited an Aramaic sayings collection used by Matthew to compose his five discourses (Matthew 5–7; 10; 13:1-52; 18; 23–25) and argued that this collection was the Hebrew logia (oracles) to which PAPIAS referred (see Eusebius Hist. eccl. 3.39.16). The origins of the modern two document hypothesis can be found in the work of K. LACHMANN (1835), who argued that since it is easier to suggest reasons for Matthew altering Mark's order of pericopae than vice versa, Mark probably stood closer to a now-lost primitive gospel narrative than did Matthew or Luke. In 1838 C. WEISSE took the step of identifying canonical Mark (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) with Lachmann's primitive gospel narrative, since Mark was the common denominator between Matthew and Luke and appeared to be more primitive than the other two Gospels. In order to account for the shared non-Markan material, Weisse invoked Papias's logia as a common source that Matthew and Luke independently consulted. With this, the two document hypothesis was born.

During the nineteenth century several variations of this hypothesis were proposed, each implying a different profile for the sayings source. Some scholars hypothesized a primitive version of Mark (Ur-Markus) that included some of the double tradition (e.g., Luke 3:7-9, 16-17; 4:1-13; 6:20-49; 7:1-10) and, therefore, a sayings source that was reduced in size (Weisse [1856]; H. Holtzmann [1863]); others posited a much expanded sayings source that contained Markan material (H. Wendt [1886]; A. Resch [1898]). The appeal of such speculative hypotheses declined significantly following P. Wernle's analysis of the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM (1899), which argued that an Ur-Markus was quite unnecessary to account for the form of Matthew and Luke. This insight meant that the sayings source, by that time known simply as "Q" (J. Weiss [1890]), became more or less coextensive with the double tradition and with the few instances where Matthew and Luke have a longer version of a story that is also preserved in Mark (e.g., the preaching of John the Baptist, the temptation story, the Beelzebul accusation, and the parables of the mustard seed and leaven).

In the early part of the twentieth century several reconstructions of Q in Greek were published (A. von Harnack [1907]; B. Weiss [1907]; W. Haupt [1913]), of which the most important and least idiosyncratic was von HARNACK's. Important discussions of the extent, order, style, and characteristics of Q followed (G. Castor [1918]; C. Patton [1915]; B. Streeter [1911, 1924]); and in 1937 T. MANSON produced what would be the first commentary on Q. However, the rise of FORM CRITICISM and its attention to oral tradition put Q as a document into eclipse, especially in Germany. The two document hypothesis continued to be affirmed, but little attention was paid to Q's LITERARY and editorial features; there were even occasional, if ultimately unconvincing, suggestions that Q might have been oral (M. Dibelius [1935] 235; J. Jeremias [1930]).

With the success of REDACTION CRITICISM following WWII, efforts were rekindled to describe Q's literary organization and theology and to situate it on the landscape of primitive Christianity (D. Lührmann [1969]; P. Hoffmann [1972]; S. Schulz [1972]; A. Polag [1977]). Since the 1980s, a large number of studies have appeared examining the theology, genre, literary history, and social setting of the document (see D. Scholer [1989], with yearly supplements). Renewed interest in Q highlighted the need for a critical text to replace the sometimes ad hoc and idiosyncratic reconstructions previously used. The International Q Project (IQP), begun in 1989, is producing a critical edition of Q (J. Robinson et al. [1999]) along with a multivolume database of reconstructions of Q from 1838 to the present (Robinson et al. [1996–]).

The IQP text of Q contains 251 verses, some (unbracketed) assigned to Q with a high probability and others (bracketed) with less probability. Texts in braces {24-26} probably do not belong to Q. The resultant text, in Lukan versification, includes: 3:2*b*-3, 7-9, 16*b*-17, [21-22]; 4:1-13, 16; 6:20*b*-23, {24-26}, 27-28, 35*c*, 29, [Q/Matt 5:41], 30, 31, 32-33/34, {35*ab*}, 36, 37, {38*ab*}, 38*c*, 39-45, 46-49; 7:1*b*, 3, {4-6*a*}, 6*b*-10, 18-19, {20-21}, 22-23, 24-28, {29-30}, 31-35; 9:{1-2}, 57-60; 10:2-3, 4-6, [7*a*], 7*b*-[8], 9-11, 12-15, {Matt 11:23*b*-24}, 16, 21-22, {Matt 11:28-30}, 23-24, {25-28}; 11:2-4, {5-8}, 9-13, 14-15, 17-20, [21-22], 23, 24-26, [27-28], 16, 29-32, 33-35, [36], 39*a*, 42, 39*b*-41, 43-44, 46, 52, 47-51; 12:2-12, {Matt 10:23}, {12:13-14, 16-21}, 22-31, {32} 33-34, {35-38}, 39-40, 42*b*-46, [49], {50}, 51-53, [54-56], 58-59; 13:18-19, 20-21, 24, 25, 26-27, 28-29, [30], 34-35; 14:{1-4}, [5], {6}; 14:11/18:14; 14:[16-24], 26-27; 17:33; 14:34-35; 15:4-7, 8-10; 16:13, 16, 17, 18; 17:1*b*-2, 3*b*-4, 6*b*, {20-21}, 23-24, 37*b*, 26-27, {28-29}, 30, {31-32}, 34-35; 19:12-13, 15*b*-26; 22:28-30.

2. History of the Interpretation of Q. Although a sayings source approximating modern reconstructions of Q was posited as early as the 1830s, it had little impact on NT studies during the nineteenth century, being used instead, rather, as an algebraic variable for solving the problem of Mark's relation to Matthew and Luke. Only at the beginning of the twentieth century did Q gain importance, first in relation to the quest of the historical Jesus and later for reconstructions of the history and theology of the Jesus movement. After W. WREDE demolished confidence in the narrative framework and secrecy motif of Mark as reliable indexes of historical tradition, von Harnack turned to Q, declaring that it was uncontaminated by editorial bias and afforded access to the historical Jesus (1908, 171). The effort to base reconstructions of the historical Jesus on Q was short-lived, however. J. WELLHAUSEN (1905) attacked von Harnack's analysis, arguing that Q also displayed secondary editorial features and might be posterior to Mark.

With the rise of form criticism, attention quickly shifted from Jesus to the character of the early Jesus tradition, with R. BULTMANN appealing to Q as an instance of the intersection of two distinct streams of primitive Christian tradition, one heavily apocalyptic (see APOCALYPTICISM) and the other characterized by "thoroughly secular proverbial wisdom" (1913, 40). In the period between the world wars, Q was treated within the conceptual framework of form criticism. From a literary point of view, Q was paraenetic (Dibelius [1971^3] 233-65) or catechetical (Streeter [1924] 187-91; Manson 13-17); theologically it served as a supplement to the Easter kerygma. With the rise of redaction criticism, both the literary and the theological assessments of Q were revised. H. Tödt (1959) noted the distinctive lack of paraenetic and catechetical materials in Q and argued that Q's representation of Jesus' proclamation of the Kingdom amounted to a kerygma parallel to, but independent of, the Easter kerygma. J. Robinson (1964) advanced the thesis that Q represented an independent stream of theology focusing on the sapiential character of Q's christology. As an instance of the genre logoi sophōn (words of the sages), Q tended to associate the speaker of the wise sayings (Jesus) with heavenly Sophia (Wisdom) and ultimately displayed a GNOSTIC proclivity that was neutralized only when Q was recast within the framework of Mark's Gospel. H. Koester (1965, 1971) likewise saw a Gnostic tendency in Q but located a decisive shift away from Gnosticism within the redaction history of Q itself: Q's original depiction of Jesus as a wisdom teacher was modified by the insertion of apocalyptic Son of man sayings.

The studies of Robinson and Koester catalyzed a discussion of Q's genre. While a few scholars took the view that Q is sui generis (F. Neirynck [1976]), the dominant stream of interpretation has taken seriously Q's significant component of wisdom sayings and their topical organization, the lack of a strong narrative framework, and the lack of a passion and resurrection narrative. Developing more casual suggestions by Streeter (1924), Robinson (1964) located Q on a trajectory of sapiential genres extending from Near Eastern wisdom collections to Gnostic dialogue collections (see also M. Küchler [1979]). Kloppenborg (1987) combined a compositional and a generic analysis, suggesting that the earliest compositional stratum consisted of (in Lukan versification) 6:20*b*-49; 9:57-60, 61-62; 10:2-11, 16 (23-24?); 11:2-4, 9-13; 12:2-7, 11-12, (13-14, 15-20?), 22-31, 33-34; 13:18-19, 20-21, 24; 14:26-27; 17:33; 14:34-35. This stratum displayed strong affinities with the didactic genre of wisdom instruction, a common genre of Near Eastern wisdom (see also R. Piper [1989]). It was later augmented by prophetic and other materials, most framed as chriae and eventually prefaced by the temptation story. Thus the shift toward a loose biographical presentation of Jesus' sayings is already evidenced within Q's compositional history.

M. Sato took a different view, also offering a compositional analysis of Q but suggesting that Q was composed as a prophetic book (similarly, C. Tuckett [1996]). Sato included the baptism of Jesus in Q, treating it as a prophetic call story, but could find no place in this genre for most of the Q material in Luke 14–18 and so treated these as later accretions. Likewise, Sato considered Q 11:2-4, 9-13; 11:33-35; 12:2-12, 22-31, 33-34 as "unmotivated additions" to the original prophetic collection.

Other genres have been proposed. Based on an analysis of the use of verbs denoting speech, the allocation of space, topical organization, length, and general character, F. Downing (1994) has suggested that Q most closely resembles the philosophical "lives" (bioi), especially Cynic bioi like Lucian's Demonax.

In spite of differences in the assessment of Q's genre, there is wide agreement that the editing of Q has been strongly influenced by DEUTERONOMISTIC theology, which regarded the history of Israel as a repetitive cycle of sinfulness, prophetic calls to repentance, punishment by God, and renewed calls to repentance with threats of judgment (A. Jacobson [1992]). In this schema the prophets are depicted as repentance preachers who are inevitably rejected, persecuted, and even killed. Q opens with an oracle of coming judgment (Q 3:7-9, 16-17); it privileges repentance as a central theological category (Q 3:8; 10:13; 11:32); and it views the rejection of Jesus (and John) through the lens of the deuteronomistic theology of the sorry fate of the prophets (Q 7:33-34; 11:47-51; 13:34-35). The story of Lot, invoked at several points (Q 3:2*b*-3, 7-9; 10:12; 17:28-29, 34-35), further dramatizes Q's announcement of an imminent fiery judgment (Kloppenborg [1991]).

Q can be said to have a christology; but it lacks the terms Messiah (Christos), Son of David, and King of Israel. The temptation account uses "Son of God" twice, but the main designation of Jesus is "Son of man." This term occurs in reference to Jesus (Q 6:22; 7:34; 9:58; 11:30) and to a coming advocate or judge (Q 12:8, 10, 40; 17:24, 26, 30) but never in relation to Jesus as a suffering figure (contrast Mark). The Son of man is treated in Q 7:33-35 as a child of heavenly Sophia along with John the Baptist. The depiction of Sophia as sending (Q 11:49-51; cf. 13:34-35) and vindicating prophetic figures, including John and Jesus, has led to suggestions that Q has a Sophia christology or sophialogy (cf. Wis 7:27). Q 10:21-22 comes close to depicting Jesus ("the Son") in the same exclusive relation to God that Sophia in Second Temple wisdom literature enjoyed. In this regard, Q anticipates the most vigorous development of wisdom christology, evidenced in the Fourth Gospel.

A number of unresolved problems regarding Q's theology remain. Q's eschatology—whether it is fundamentally apocalyptic or not—is the topic of debate but turns largely on definitional issues rather than on the interpretation of individual sayings and is fueled by the agenda of historical Jesus scholarship. The lack of a passion account (and even direct references to Jesus' death) and a resurrection story raises the issue of Q's relationship to the Easter kerygma. Although it is obvious that Q presupposes Jesus' death, there is no evidence that his death is accorded specifically redemptive significance. Similarly, while Q assumes some form of vindication of Jesus by Sophia (Q 7:35; 13:35*b*), it does not employ the metaphor of resurrection to articulate that vindication.

Galilee is normally suggested as the provenance of Q (J. Reed [1995]). The document is variously associated with a scribal (Kloppenborg [1991]; Piper [1995]), prophetic (Tuckett; R. Horsley [1991]), or Cynic (L. Vaage [1994]; B. Mack [1993]) ethos. Q's attention to basic issues of subsistence, local violence and conflict, and debt and its negative representation of cities, judicial processes, rulers, and the priestly hierarchy suggest an origin in towns and villages of lower Galilee, probably before the first revolt but achieving its final form near the time of the revolt (Hoffmann [1995]) or even slightly after it (M. Myllykoski [1996]).

Since von Harnack, Q has been used in scholarship on Jesus and has in recent years become the focus of special attention. The stratigraphic analysis of Q proposed by Kloppenborg (1987) was employed in J. D. Crossan's book on Jesus (1991) in a larger effort to create a comprehensive stratigraphic analysis of the entire Jesus tradition. In contrast, J. Meier (1991) treats Q as an essentially unedited grab bag of sayings. Much remains to be done to clarify how the results of compositional analysis might be employed in the reconstruction of the historical Jesus. A naive understanding of literary stratigraphy has led to the misapplication of conclusions that pertain only to Q's documentary features, and to equally simplistic rejections of Q's significance for historical Jesus scholarship (see Kosch [1992]; Kloppenborg [1996]).

Bibliography: R. Bultmann, "Was lässt die Spruchquelle über die Urgemeinde erkennen?" Oldenburgisches Kirchenblatt 19 (1913) 35-37, 41-44; ET: "What the Saying Source Reveals About the Early Church," The Shape of Q: Signal Essays on the Sayings Gospel (ed. J. S. Kloppenborg, 1994) 23-34. G. D. Castor, Matthew's Sayings of Jesus (1918). J. D. Crossan, The Historical Jesus: The Life of a Mediterranean Peasant (1991). M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1919; ET From Tradition to Gospel, 1971[3]). F. G. Downing, "A Genre for Q and a Socio-Cultural Context for Q," JSNT 55 (1994) 3-26. A. von Harnack, Sprüche und Reden Jesu (1907; ET, The Sayings of Jesus [1908]). W. Haupt, Worte Jesu und Gemeindeüberlieferung (UNT 3, 1913). P. Hoffmann, Studien zur Theologie der Logienquelle (NTAbh NF 8, 1972); "The Redaction of Q and the Son of Man: A Preliminary Sketch," The Gospel Behind the Gospels: Current Studies on Q (ed. R. A. Piper, NovTSup 75, 1995) 159-198. H. J. Holtzmann, Die synoptischen Evangelien (1863). R. A. Horsley, "The Q People: Renovation, not Radicalism," Continuum 1, 3 (1991) 49-63. A. D. Jacobson, The First Gospel: An Introduction to Q (Foundations and Facets, 1992). J. Jeremias, "Zur Hypothese einer schriftlichen Logienquelle Q," ZNW 29 (1930) 147-49. J. S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Literature (Studies in Antiquity and Christianity, 1987); "City and Wasteland: Narrative World and the Beginning of the Sayings Gospel (Q)," Semeia 52 (1991) 145-60; "Literary Convention, Self-Evidence, and the Social History of the Q People," Semeia 55 (1991) 77-102; "The Sayings Gospel Q and the Quest of the Historical Jesus," HTR 89 (1996) 307-44. H. Koester, "ΓΝΩΜΑΙ ΔΙΑΦΟΡΟΙ: The Origin and Nature of Diversification in the History of Early Christianity," HTR 58 (1965) 279-318; repr., Trajectories Through Early Christianity (ed. J. M. Robinson and H. Koester, 1971) 114-57. D. Kosch, "Q und Jesus," BZ NF 36 (1992) 30-58. M. Küchler, Frühjüdische Weisheitstraditionen (OBO 26, 1979). K. Lachmann, "De ordine narrationum in evangeliis synopticis," TSK 8 (1835) 570-90. D. Lührmann, Die Redaktion der Logienquelle (WMANT 33, 1969). B. L. Mack, The Lost Gospel: The Book of Q and Christian Origins (1993). T. W. Manson, "The Sayings of Jesus," The Mission and Message of Jesus (1937) 299-639; repr. The Sayings of Jesus (1949). H. Marsh, A Dissertation on the Origin and Composition of Our Three First Canonical Gospels (1801). J. P. Meier, A Marginal Jew: Rethinking the Historical Jesus, vol. 2, Mentor, Message, and Miracles (ABRL, 1991). M. Myllykoski, "The Social History of Q and the Jewish War," Symbols and Strata: Essays on the Sayings Gospel Q (ed. R. Uro; Publications of the Finnish Exegetical Society 65, 1996) 143-99. F. Neirynck, "Q," IDBSup (1962) 715-16. C. S. Patton, Sources of the Synoptic Gospels (University of Michigan Studies, Humanistic Series 5, 1915). R. A. Piper, Wisdom in the Q-tradition: The Aphoristic Teaching of Jesus (SNTSMS 61, 1989); "The Language of Violence and the Aphoristic Sayings in Q," Conflict and Invention (ed. J. S. Kloppenborg, 1995) 53-72. A. Polag, Die Christologie der Logienquelle (WMANT 45, 1977). J. Reed, "The Social Map of Q," Conflict and Invention (ed. J. S. Kloppenborg, 1995) 17-36. A. Resch, Die Logia Jesu (1898). J. M. Robinson, "ΛΟΓΟΙ ΣΟΦΩΝ: Zur Gattung der Spruchquelle Q," Zeit und Geschichte: Dankesgabe an R. Bultmann (ed. E. Dinkler, 1964) 77-96; ET "Logoi Sophōn: On the Gattung of Q," In the Future of Our Religious Past (1971) 84-130. J. M. Robinson, P. Hoffmann, and J. S. Kloppenborg (eds.), The Critical Edition of Q (1999). J. M. Robinson, J. S. Kloppenborg, and P. Hoffmann (eds.), Documenta Q (1996–). M. Sato, Q und Prophetie (WUNT 2, 29, 1988). F. Schleiermacher, "Über die Zeugnisse des Papias von unsern beiden ersten Evangelien," TSK 5 (1832) 735-68. D. Scholer, "Q Bibliography, 1981–89," SBLSP (ed. D. J. Lull, 1989) 23-37. S. Schulz, Q: Die Spruchquelle der Evangelisten (1972). B. H. Streeter, "On the Original Order of Q," "St. Mark's Knowledge and Use of Q," and "The Original Extent of Q," Oxford Studies in the Synoptic Problem (ed. W. Sanday, 1911) 141-64, 165-83, 185-208; The Four Gospels (1924). H. E. Tödt, Der Menschensohn in der synoptischen Überlieferung (1959; ET, The Son of Man in the Synoptic Tradition [1965]). C. M. Tuckett, Q and the History of Early Christianity (1996). L. E. Vaage, Galilean Upstarts: Jesus' First Followers According to Q (1994). B. Weiss, Die Quellen des Lukasevangeliums (1907). J. Weiss, "Die Verteidigung Jesu gegen den Vorwurf des Bündnisses mit Beelzebul," TSK 63 (1890) 555-69. C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte, kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (1838); Die Evangelienfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigen Stadium (1856). J. Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (1905). H. H. Wendt, Die Lehre Jesu (1886). P. Wernle, Die synoptische Frage (1899). W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret (1901; ET 1971).

J. S. KLOPPENBORG

QOHELET

1. Authorship and Date. Virtually all commentators until modern times ascribed the book to Solomon. A. IBN EZRA (12th cent.), however, mentioned (and rejected) an opinion that the author was an "assembly" (understanding the name qôhelet as qĕhillâ) of Solomon's disciples who included their own, often contradictory, opinions.

MAIMONIDES (middle 12th cent.) ascribed the epilogue to "those who edited the book," indicating that he considered Qohelet to be a later collection of Solomon's teachings (see Japhet and Salters). LUTHER judged the book to be non-Solomonic on grounds of literary unevenness. H. GROTIUS (1644, 1:258) determined, on the basis of the book's haphazard composition and late language, that Qohelet is not Solomonic but rather a postexilic collection of various opinions. By the middle of the nineteenth century scholars commonly accepted the book's postexilic (and thus non-Solomonic) dating.

With few exceptions commentators since the late nineteenth century place Qohelet in the Hellenistic period (4th–3rd cent.). The arguments are linguistic (the book shows late usages and numerous Aramaisms; see sec. 2) and conceptual (Qohelet shows a late stage in the development of wisdom thought; see, e.g., S. Blank [1970] xv-xxv). Some scholars also base this dating on presumed Greek influence in language and thought (see sec. 5) as well as on various putative historical references. C. Whitley (1979, 122-46) places Qohelet after Ben Sira in the middle of the second century (but see Reif [1981]). H. GRAETZ proposed a Herodian dating, but such dating has been excluded by the discovery of second-century fragments of Qohelet among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (J. Muilenburg [1954]).

2. Language. Grotius was apparently the first to remark on the late character of Qohelet's language, observing that it contains many Aramaisms and postexilic locutions. Franz DELITZSCH catalogued these features and characterized Qohelet's language as bearing a mishnaic stamp and being no earlier than Ezra–Nehemiah. Most recent commentators have affirmed this assessment (for a survey of late locutions see Delitzsch [1875] 190-206; and Gordis [1968] 59-68). R. GORDIS describes Qohelet's language as a transition between classical biblical and mishnaic Hebrew (see also Whitley, 119-

48). D. Fredericks (1987) argues that the evidence usually adduced for a postexilic dating can be explained in other ways and favors an exilic or preexilic date. B. Isaksson suggests that Qohelet's language may be a popular dialect of the First Temple period. C.-L. Seow (1997, 11-20) places it specifically in the Persian period.

Two theories try to explain the strangeness of Qohelet's language as literally foreign. M. DAHOOD (1952, 1958, 1962, 1966) claimed that Qohelet's language and orthography are northern (Phoenician) in character and point to a northern locale for its authorship. F. Zimmermann (1945–46; 1949–50; 1973, 98-122) and H. GINSBERG (1961), developing a suggestion of F. BURKITT (1922), argued that Qohelet is a mechanical, often erroneous and awkward, translation from Aramaic. They contend that numerous awkward locutions make better sense if retroverted to Aramaic then translated correctly back to Hebrew (sometimes after emendation as well). Gordis (1952; 1968, 399-403), Whitley (42-49, 106-10), and F. Piotti argued against both theories in detail, claiming that better explanations for the difficult words and phrases are available. A. Schoors's detailed examination of Qohelet's morphology and syntax (1992) argues that the language is late biblical Hebrew and that the other theories either treat the data atomistically (Fredericks), assume too many mistranslations (Ginsberg), or misinterpret the epigraphic and linguistic evidence (Dahood). (See further the survey by F. Bianchi [1993].)

Special mention should be made of F. Ellermeier's studies of Qohelet's syntax (1967, 161-306) and Ginsberg's insights into Qohelet's idiosyncratic vocabulary (1961, 13-18). D. Michel (1989) examines the literary functions of Qohelet's linguistic usages, and W. Delsman (1982) brings together data on Qohelet's language. Isaksson (1989) applies structural and discourse analysis to aspects of Qohelet's syntax, particularly the verbal system, and explains the distinctive series of qatal verbs as characteristic of the "autobiographical" genre. Schoors surveys Qohelet's orthography, morphology, and syntax in detail.

3. Unity of Composition. The inconsistencies in Qohelet (e.g., he both affirms divine justice [8:12b-13] and points to its violation [9:11-12a, 14]), which have been at the center of Qohelet exegesis since at least the first century CE, have given rise to theories that posit additional voices besides Qohelet's in the book.

An older approach—followed, e.g., by JEROME, J. G. HERDER, J. G. EICHHORN, and J. K. C. Nachtigal (1753–1819)—saw the book as a dialogue between Qohelet and one or more people of lesser wisdom such as a pupil or a fool. (See also the paragraph on Perry [1993] below.) Alternatively, the unorthodox opinions were considered as statements of erroneous ideas that Qohelet quotes in order to refute them. (This approach is common in traditional Jewish commentary; A. Ibn Ezra, for example, says that 9:4b and 9:10 are claims of others that Qohelet rejects.) L. Levy and, most extensively, Gordis have maintained the book's unity by regarding the orthodox opinions as unmarked quotations of various sorts that Qohelet opposes or refutes; this suggestion has been widely accepted.

Another line of interpretation finds various secondary additions (always of orthodox glossators) imbedded in Qohelet's words. K. Siegfried's analysis is often mentioned because it represents the extreme of fragmentation: two "Qohelets," two glossators, a group of glossators of indefinite number, two editors, and two epiologists. More moderate and widely accepted are the analyses of A. McNeile, L. Podechard, and G. A. BARTON, who distributed various orthodox passages between a Ḥāsîd (a pietist, whose additions speak of God's justice and the need for human piety [e.g., Eccl. 2:26*ab*; 3:17; 7:26*b*; 8:11-13; and the "second epilogue," 12:13-14]) and a Ḥākām (a wise man, whose additions defend the value of wisdom [e.g., Eccl 1:2; 7:27-28; 12:8; and the "first epilogue," 12:9-11]). In this way Qohelet is made to appear as consistently skeptical as he is consistently pious in most traditional commentaries. Most of the recent commentators hypothesize a few additions, usually without identifying the group affiliation of their authors. For example, K. GALLING, W. ZIMMERLI, and Ellermeier identify a few phrases and sentences as secondary (e.g., Eccl 1:16*a*; 2:7*b*; 4:17*b*; 11:9*b*; plus two epilogues). Gordis marks no interpolations in the body of the book (1:2–12:8).

Virtually all modern scholars assign the epilogue, 12:8-14 (or 9-14), to a later glossator, whom they commonly identify as the book's editor (Maimonides was the first to do this). Many discern two (12:9-11 + 12-14) or three epilogues (12:9-11 + 12 + 13-14). Delitzsch and M. Fox (1977; 1987, 311-27) see in the epilogue a shift to the voice of the author, who has previously quoted Qohelet, a persona.

4. Literary Structure and Form. The structure of Qohelet has been placed everywhere on a continuum from a more or less random collection of sayings and meditations to a well-organized discourse whose parts are subordinated to a single design. On the latter end of the continuum, various interpreters, e.g., M. Thilo (1923), A. Miller (1934), Ginsberg, G. Castellino (1968), and most notably, A. Wright (1968) have proposed different well-conceived designs to describe the book's structure. Wright emphasized formal characteristics, in particular repetitions, as an approach to discovering the book's structure, which he saw as an intricate, well-articulated, hierarchical design. In subsequent studies (1980, 1983) he found intricate numerical patterns coordinated with the design (e.g., hbl, "vanity," has the numerical value of thirty-seven and occurs this number of times). N. Lohfink (1980) finds a palindromic structure in the book as a whole. Most commentators since the end of the last century regard the book as a collection of aphorisms and longer units without much overall organization; e.g., Delitzsch, Zimmerli, H. Hertzberg, Gordis, O. Loretz, A. Lauha, and most emphatically, K. Galling (1932, 1969). Ellermeier (1967, 131-41) provides a useful tabulation of the unit demarcation according to the major modern commentaries and attempts to isolate the editorial means (22-124)—namely, thematic concepts and key words—used to order the originally independent units (fifty-six, according to his analysis). Michel (1989) argues that 1:3–3:15 is a coherent unit expressing the basics of Qohelet's thought. Statements later in the book that do not agree with the message of that unit are citations of other opinions, which Qohelet rejects or relativizes.

Commentators who deny the presence of an overall structure see the book's unity as residing in the cohesiveness of the author's thought, attitudes, tone, and style (Delitzsch, Galling, Hertzberg, Gordis, and many others; on style see in particular Loretz [1980] 135-217). Loretz also identifies a group of recurrent topoi as a source of cohesiveness (1980, 196-212). Zimmerli (1974) argued that the book of Qohelet, while not a well-structured tractate on a single theme, is not a mere collection of sayings; for there are relations in content among contiguous units.

The genre of the book as a whole has been variously identified. The view implicit in much of traditional exegesis is that the book is or consists of preachment since it is words Solomon preached in his wanderings ("Qohelet" is understood as maghîl, "assembler" of the congregation). Others, understanding the name qôhelet to allude to an assembly of sayings, regarded the book as a collection of teachings. Some interpreters of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries (e.g., M. Mendelssohn and J. Döderlein), spoke of the book as a philosophical discourse or treatise. Others of that period, most notably Herder, described the book as a philosophical dialogue or symposium. The latest representative of that view is Miller (1934), who argued that the book is a condensed literary rendering of a school disputation or discussion and that this form is the principle of its structure. Miller (1934), A. Allgeier (1925), and Lohfink (1980) have classified Qohelet as a diatribe. It has also been compared to a journal or "confession," like Pascal's Pensées (Murphy [1955]) or Marcus Aurelius's Meditations (Rudolph [1959]).

Various literary forms within the book have been described in greatest detail by Ellermeier (1967, 48-93). He labels the basic form the mashal, a broad grouping he subdivides into "sentences" (including proverbs and artistic sayings) and "reflections" of various sorts, the latter composed of various form elements (statements, questions, self-presentation). R. Murphy (1981, 127-30) identifies the following forms: wisdom saying, instruction, reflection, example story, woe oracle, blessing. Loader (1979) says that the book is composed of thirty-eight chiastic structures and sixty polar structures, the latter being patterns of tension between an idea of "general hokmâ and another view (i.e., Qohelet's) or a contrary fact."

5. Foreign Influence. The peculiarity of Qohelet's thought and style has led some scholars to look to foreign influences as the sources of his special character.

a. Greek. G. Zirkel (1792) was the first to propose that Qohelet was influenced by Greek thought, language, and literature. He was followed by numerous commentators, especially in the late nineteenth to early twentieth centuries, including Graetz, Allgeier, G. Wildeboer, and Levy. Certain phrases were thought to be Grecisms (e.g., "under the sun," hypo ton hēlion = "do good," la 'asôt tob or eu prattein). Ranston (1923, 1925) emphasized the indirect influence of Theognis and Hesiod (noting especially the latter's doctrine of the "right time"). More recently, Braun (1973) has argued for extensive stylistic, structural, and philosophical parallels between Qohelet and a broad range of Greek writers, in particular Homer, Theognis, Euripides, and Menander. Whitley (165-75) emphasizes Epicurean influence (e.g., God's remoteness, reluctance to communicate with man; life ends with the body; hedonistic advice). M. Hengel sees Qohelet as responding to the impact of the spiritual crisis of early Hellenism and as fusing the popular views of the Greek "bourgeoisie" with traditional wisdom and with Qohelet's own observations (1974, 125). Lohfink finds Greek influence in Qohelet's motifs, ideas, language, and style. He maintains that the inspiration for the book was Greek education, but that the background and values were Hebrew wisdom (1980, 10). Other writers, e.g., Podechard, Hertzberg, Gordis, and M. Fox, grant only a vague and general contact of Qohelet with his Hellenistic environment (against the theory of Greek influence, see Loretz [1964] 45-57). In contrast, Schwienhorst-Schönberger (1996) examines Qohelet's thought in its Hellenistic and Jewish contexts to determine the ways in which it draws upon and is in tension with both. The pivotal question of both Hellenistic philosophy and Qohelet is the nature of human happiness and the limitations of its possibilities, especially with respect to the individual life. In contrast to Greek wisdom, Qohelet does not believe in the absolute autonomy of the inner realm. Man cannot create happiness but can only receive it from God.

b. Mesopotamian. H. Grimme (1905) was the first to observe the similarity of 9:7-10 to Gilgamesh X, iii (ANET 90a; Old Babylonian), the alewife's advice to Gilgamesh to enjoy life in the face of inevitable mortality. Loretz (1964, 90-134) made the case for a Mesopotamian background (to the exclusion of other influences) most thoroughly. He emphasized certain parallels with Babylonian literature, in particular Ludlul (ANET 435-37), the "Pessimistic Dialogue" (ANET 437-38), the Babylonian Theodicy (ANET 438-40), and above all Gilgamesh (ANET 72-99). Among the parallels he noted are the concern with the problem of divine justice; the motif of "wind/breath" (hebel; Babylonian saru), in the sense of nothingness, transience; and the problem of "name" and memory. A. Shaffer (1967, 1969) found Qohelet's "threefold cord" saying (4:12) in "Gilgamesh and Hubaba."

c. Egyptian. P. Humbert (1929) almost alone strongly advocated an Egyptian background (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) for Qohelet, even suggesting that the author had traveled to Egypt. The parallels he noted include the theme of royal authorship (as in Amenemhet [ANET 418-19] and the instruction for Merikare [ANET 414-18]); pessimistic and skeptical texts, e.g., the "Dispute Over Suicide" (ANET 405-10) and the "Song of the Harper" (ANET 467; this includes a carpe diem comparable to Eccl 9:7-9); complaints about old age (cf. Ptahhotep [ANET 412a, Eccl 12:1-6]). B. Gemser (1960) pointed to parallels with the Demotic Instructions of Onchsheshonqy, including the near-identity of Onchsheshonqy 19.10 (advice to cast one's bread upon the water) with Eccl 11:1. Loretz (1964, 57-89) disputes Egyptian influence altogether.

6. Teaching. The major divide in Qohelet interpretation lies between the traditional exegesis of this book (from the 1st cent. to the 18th or 19th, together with that of many modern religious conservatives) and its modern exegesis (18th–20th cents.). Most of the main ideas that modern interpretation ascribes to Qohelet can be found, with different emphases, in the interpretations of the earliest exegetes—a fact that seems to show that the essential themes of the book are clear. Traditional interpreters, believing that the book was Solomon's, found in it an affirmation of such orthodox beliefs as Solomon could be assumed to teach. Modern interpreters emphasize the book's skepticism and pessimism and commonly view it both as an attack on earlier orthodoxies (of the wisdom school) and as evidence for the failure of the regnant intellectual and religious systems. The following survey looks at a sampling of significant commentators, with emphasis on the modern period. C. GINSBURG's commentary includes an extensive survey of all exegesis until 1860. For early and medieval Jewish commentary see Schiffer (1884). For patristic commentaries see E. Plumptre (1881, 83-97), S. Holm-Nielsen (1974), and Murphy (1982). For later works see Galling (1934), Blank (1970), S. Breton (1973), and J. Crenshaw (1983).

a. Traditional interpretations. Three presuppositions common to all early Qohelet exegesis are: (1) Solomon is the author; (2) "vanity of vanities" is to be understood against the perspective of a belief in immortality; and (3) tensions in the book show that Solomon was in dialogue with others (Murphy [1982] 331-32).

The earliest statement of Qohelet interpretation is found in the epilogue (12:9-12), which appraises Qohelet's teachings, along with the other words of the wise, cautiously but appreciatively. The epilogue speaks of Qohelet as one sage among many, not as intolerably skeptical or heterodox. (Sheppard [1977] discusses the epilogist's concept of canon, arguing that he thematizes the book in order to include it within a canon-conscious definition of sacred wisdom.)

It seems that Ben Sira knows of Qohelet and uses his teachings, as he does other inspired writings, often giving a characteristic twist to Qohelet's words but showing no awareness of heterodoxy in them (e.g., Eccl 3:11 and Sir 39:16, 33; Eccl 3:15 and Sir 5:3; Eccl 8:1 and Sir 13:24; Eccl 9:10 and Sir 14:11-12). According to many scholars, the Wisdom of Solomon refers to Qohelet when it castigates the "ungodly" for advocating hedonism (as well as oppression of the righteous) as a response to mortality (Wis 1:16–2:24). However, if the description of the ungodly in that passage were meant to represent Qohelet's teaching, it would be such a distortion that it would be ineffective even as polemic.

The translation of Qohelet in the SEPTUAGINT is extremely literalistic and may even be Aquilan (Graetz, McNeile, Barthélemy [1963]; but see Hyvärinen [1977] 88-99, 112). The translation (and later glossators within the Greek tradition) shows some attempts at moralistic improvement, as in adding a "do not" in the advice of 11:9a. According to G. Bertram (1952), the Greek translation tends to make Qohelet's teaching more abstract, theological, and psychological than does the MT. Humans are regarded as burdened by a sense of sin and spiritual unrest. The theme of the book becomes the complaint against the vanity and willfulness of the human spirit, and Qohelet acquires a unified theological meaning it lacked before. (Many of the qualities Bertram sees in the Greek translation may, in fact, be in the original. For a study of the text of the Greek and its relation to the Hebrew, see McNeile [1904] 115-69.)

The Syriac too (see Kamenetzky [1904]; Schoors [1985]) is highly literalistic. It reveals little of an underlying interpretation except in its understanding of the sense of individual sentences.

According to a later account, at the end of the first century CE the Tannaim, troubled by contradictions in the book, debated Qohelet's status as inspired Scripture (see INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE). They accepted its legitimacy because it begins and ends in words of Torah (b. Šabb. 30b). The rabbis also considered withdrawing Qohelet because some of its words—they mention 11:9a and 1:3—might "cause an inclination to heresy" (Qoh. Rab. i. 4). In both cases the danger envisioned lay in the susceptibility of these verses to misinterpretations that might have practical consequences rather than in actual ideological skepticism.

There is virtual unanimity among the pre-modern Jewish interpretations (in the Talmud, the Midrash, the Targum, and the medieval commentaries) on the basic teachings of the book: All works of this world are trivial; humans and their works are ephemeral. One must be resigned to God's will, for all God's works are good. All that is worthwhile is quiet enjoyment of one's lot, good deeds, and study of Torah. People will receive appropriate recompense for their deeds, if not in this life, then in the next.

The highly paraphrastic Aramaic translation, the TARGUM (c. 6th cent.), weaves Qohelet's words into a coherent moralistic homily and interprets his teachings as lessons drawn from Israel's history (viewed prophetically). It opens by relating that when Solomon grew arrogant because of his wealth, God sent Ashmodai, king of demons, to depose him. Solomon went wandering through the land preaching repentance and obedience to the commandments. In his preaching he prophesied the division of the kingdom, the destruction of the Temple, and Israel's exile and said, "Vanity of vanities. . . ." In other words, Solomon's pessimistic statements are thought to address specific historical crises rather than the nature of the world itself. The paraphrase consistently imposes an orthodox assertion of divine justice on the text; for example: "And indeed I have seen sinners who are buried and blotted out of this world, from the holy place where the righteous dwell" (8:10a). Similarly 8:15 is made to praise the joy of obedience to Torah. Misfortunes in this life are explained by astrological influences and by God's decrees.

Qohelet is one of the books most frequently quoted in midrashic literature. Individual verses are quoted for homiletical purposes with little reference to the message of the book as a whole. The way the book is quoted shows that it is understood as a repudiation of the value of earthly matters in favor of a life of Torah study.

The MIDRASH Qohelet Rabba (c. 7th cent.) is more exegetical than most Midrashim. As exegesis it is atomistic, but in general it understands Qohelet as teaching that humanity is ephemeral and without substance, that one should devote one's life to good deeds and to the study of Torah, and that reward and punishment await in the next life.

The early Christian commentators took essentially the same approach. However, they placed greater emphasis on the devaluation of this life and its pleasures and believed that salvation through Christ is Qohelet's implied solution to the failure of temporal values.

Ibn Ezra (12th cent.) may be taken as representative of medieval Jewish Qohelet exegesis. Like most traditional commentators, Ibn Ezra was disturbed less by the apparently unorthodox character of Qohelet's teachings than by the apparent contradictions in the book, which he systematically undertook to resolve (see his comment on 7:3). He understood Solomon as teaching that all human works are transient and insignificant. Only the fear of God, reached through the acquisition of wisdom (= Torah) can bring happiness. God's work is perfect, but there are imperfections in the world due to imperfections in the recipients of God's goodness. Ibn Ezra's commentary is infused with philosophical and astronomical ideas as well as with careful grammatical observations.

BONAVENTURE (13th cent.) may be taken as a representative medieval Christian commentator. He wrote that Qohelet maintains the vanity of earthly creatures—who are vain insofar as they are changeable—in order to teach contempt for this world. Still, earthly creatures have some reality and goodness. Since God alone possesses intransmutable repose, true life and happiness can be found in God only (summary in Ginsburg [1970] 109).

b. Modern interpretations. One may summarize the core of Qohelet's teaching as perceived by most commentators since the end of the nineteenth century—excluding religious and homiletical expositors—as follows: Qohelet is pessimistic and skeptical. He declares the futility of human labor, the triviality of wealth, the transience of human life, and the impossibility of true wisdom. He attacks the doctrine of reward and punishment. All this constitutes a polemic against the wisdom school, which had become overconfident, rigid, and dogmatic and which had made unjustified claims to possess knowledge. Qohelet commends wisdom for its relative practical value and urges fear of God and moderate enjoyment of life's pleasures.

Modern interpreters commonly regard Qohelet as representing (or initiating) a general crisis in the wisdom school and in Judaism as a whole. (There is some vacillation as to whether he is responding to a crisis in wisdom literature—unattested elsewhere, except perhaps in Job—or initiating a crisis, which shows no signs of persistence beyond him.) Qohelet's negativism is then often taken as demonstrating the inadequacy of HB religion and clearing the way for the new message of Christianity. A few commentators, however, find a message more affirmative of God's goodness and of the value of human life.

The following epitomes of a sampling of modern interpreters highlight the themes the commentators consider most significant:

Delitzsch (1875, 179-90): All things on earth are vanity; humanity's labor achieves nothing enduring. The striving after secular knowledge, pleasure, riches, and wisdom is unsatisfactory. God is just, but things happen contrary to his justice. The most desirable thing for humanity is to enjoy life, but only within the limits of the fear of God, which is the highest duty. Qohelet testifies both to the power of revealed religion, grounded in an unshakable faith, and to the inadequacy of HB religion.

J. PEDERSEN (1930, 344-70): Qohelet is symptomatic of a crisis in Israel's late period, when earlier harmonies between nature and humanity and between God and humanity had broken down. The interior and the exterior no longer correspond: One may have all the external blessings but lack happiness. God becomes more and more sublime, while humans become more and more lowly and lacking influence on events, which are under God's arbitrary control. The principal virtue is now fear of God and resignation to the divine will. Qohelet nevertheless recommends enjoyment of life as well as perseverance in trying all possibilities. In this way his skepticism is inseparable from his piety.

Ginsberg (1955; 1961; 1963, 21-27): All is futility, zero. Death renders nugatory the advantages of wisdom and other talents. The same emotions, experiences, and activities recur endlessly. God determines the time when every event will occur. Humans may try to discover this time, but they cannot succeed. The only real value in life is the use of material goods for enjoyment.

Gordis (1955, 112-14): Qohelet believes in God but cannot accept the platitudes of the conventional wisdom teachers. He thinks that justice in human affairs is elusive and that truth is unattainable. All that is certain is that human beings desire happiness; since God created them, the furthering of their pleasure must be the divine purpose.

H. Gese (1963): Wisdom undergoes a crisis in Qohelet. Earlier wisdom assumed that the good or evil a person experiences is just another aspect of the good or evil he or she does. Qohelet recognizes no such connection. The result is a structural change of outlook, consisting of the distancing of the person—the "I"—from the event, i.e., the estrangement of individuals from all that happens to them and about them. Time—the passage of "right moments"—is hidden from humans, to whom life is now opaque. But through fear of God the estrangement may be replaced by an openness to time, meaning an acceptance of whatever comes upon one. This openness includes accepting enjoyment of life, not as an automatic consequence of virtue, but as the direct gift of God.

Hertzberg (1963, 222-38): Qohelet presents three recurrent and decisive ideas: (1) God's exclusivity. God, who is a sort of fatum devoid of personal characteristics, determines everything. (2) Earthly vanity. All strivings for wisdom, wealth, happiness—all human activity—is nothing. (This idea is shaped in direct dependency on Genesis 2–4.) (3) Pleasure. The only human possibility is to accept the present as it is and to take passively whatever happiness is given. The main point of the book is (2)—humanity's utter nothingness. This complete negation makes Qohelet the most disturbing messianic PROPHECY of the HB.

Lohfink (1980): Man is an ephemeral being in an unchanging world, with whose oppressive fullness he cannot cope (cosmology, Eccl 1:4-11). Happiness is powerful, but in the face of death all human abilities and achievements are a "vapor." Happiness is allotted by God, not securely produced by man, who must enjoy what he is given in the fear of God (anthropology, 1:12–3:15). Observations of social injustice and fragmentation reinforce the anthropology of "vapor" and "fear of God" (social criticism, 3:16–4:16; 5:7–6:10). In the middle of the book, Qohelet also offers a critical evaluation of piety (religious criticism, 4:17–5:6). The basic dogmas of wisdom, in particular that of just recompense, are undermined (ideological criticism, 6:11–9:6). The fear of God alone can guide humankind. Humans cannot comprehend God's work, hence they may think it arbitrary and amoral. Humans must manage the best they can, accept what the moment brings, and enjoy God's gifts (ethics, 9:7–12:7). The book ends with two orthodox appendices (12:8-11, 12-14).

Crenshaw (1987): Qohelet directs a radical, unrelentingly negative attack on the traditional beliefs of the sages. He repudiates wisdom's claim to secure one's existence and denies that there is any moral order. Chance determines everything, including the time of death; and the future—indeed, all of reality—remains utterly hidden. Divine justice is not in evidence. Qohelet can merely recommend enjoying life's little pleasures in order to soothe the troubled spirit; this, at least, has God's approval.

Murphy (1992): A variety of attitudes are heard in Qohelet. These are sometimes contradictory, sometimes in dialogue. Qohelet affirms the values of life, wealth, toil, and wisdom; but these values prove inadequate when seen under the shadow of death. Qohelet is often in conflict with traditional wisdom teaching, especially its claim to provide security; yet he affirms wisdom and remains within its traditions, employing its methods and literary genres. It is because Qohelet loved life and wisdom that he was grieved by death and by life's vanity.

Fredericks (1993): Qohelet speaks of the transient human realm of reality, not the eternal. He is not skeptical or pessimistic, though he recognizes the evanescence (hebel) of human labor and its products. He offers ways of coping with transience, finding value in wisdom, in the joy of work, and above all, in simple pleasures, which are humananity's major consolation. The duty of humans is to resign themselves to God's will and to accept circumstances beyond their control.

T. Perry (1993): The book is a dialogue between a pious sage-narrator, the "Presenter" (P), who transmits and debates the wisdom of the skeptical persona, Kohelet (K). K is the man of experience. He is deterministic and skeptical and rejects wisdom and faith, except insofar as they emerge from his own experience. He teaches that we should embrace pleasure because it is within our power to do so and should fear God because of human ignorance. P, the man of faith, uses K's words to provoke thought and as the basis for argument. P affirms the value of labor, pleasure, and wisdom. God is to be feared because God is unpredictable; divine justice and freedom are not bound by human conceptions of justice. At the end, P modifies his own position by recognizing that life is vanity; but we are to fear God as the ground of our transience.

C.-L. Seow (1997): Humans cannot control events or their destiny, for everything is hebel, meaning that everything is beyond human apprehension and comprehension. (The full meaning of hebel is anything that is superficial, ephemeral, insubstantial, incomprehensible, enigmatic, inconsistent, or contradictory.) In spite of God's distance, he is related to humanity and has given it the possibilities of each moment. Hence people must accept what happens to them and respond spontaneously to life, even in the midst of uncertainties, and accept both the possibilities and limitations of being human.

T. Longman (1998): Qohelet (a fictional persona) is distinguished from the book of Ecclesiastes. Qohelet's message is skeptical and pessimistic; but the message of the book is determined by the authorial voice in 12:9-14, which is an affirmation of faith: Life is meaningless without God. Verses 13-14, moreover, introduce an eschatological perspective. Longman places Qohelet's words in the genre of fictional autobiographies found elsewhere in ancient Near Eastern literature.

Fox (1999): The central concern of the book of Ecclesiastes is meaning. What unites all of Qohelet's specific complaints is the collapse of meaning, which is revealed in the contradictions that pervade life. Qohelet fully intends the contradictions he describes (which exegesis has usually tried to eliminate); they demonstrate to him life's absurdity. Qohelet is frustrated that life cannot be "read," that the multiplicity of disjointed deeds and events cannot be drawn together into a coherent narrative with its own significance. Qohelet also tries to reconstruct and recover meanings, albeit local and restricted ones. Even if the world as a whole lacks meaning and purpose, humans have the potential to possess passing moments of goodness and clarity. These are brief, limited, and uncertain; but they are enough to make life worth living.

Bibliography: A. Allgeier, Das Buch des Predigers oder Koheleth (HSAT 6, 2, 1925). D. Barthélemy, Les Devanciers d'Aquila (VTSup 10, 1963). G. A. Barton, The Book of Ecclesiastes (ICC, 1908). A. Barucq, Ecclésiaste (1968). G. Bertram, "Hebräischer und griechischer Qohelet," ZAW 64 (1952) 26-49. F. Bianchi, "The Language of Qohelet: A Bibliographical Survey," ZAW 105 (1993) 210-23. G. Bickell, Der Prediger über den Wert des Daseins (1884). E. Bickerman, Four Strange Books of the Bible (1967). S. H. Blank, "Prolegomenon," The Song of Songs and Coheleth (C. D. Ginsburg, 1970). R. Braun, Kohelet und die frühhellenistische Popularphilosophie (BZAW 130, 1973). S. Breton, "Qoheleth Studies," BTB 3 (1973) 22-50. K. Budde, Der Prediger (KEH 18, 1922). F. C. Burkitt, "Is Ecclesiastes a Translation?" JTS 23 (1922) 22-28. D. Buzy, "La Notion du bonheur dans l'Ecclésiaste," RB 43 (1934) 494-511; L'Ecclésiaste (1946). G. Castellino, "Qohelet and His Wisdom," CBQ 30 (1968) 15-28. J. L. Crenshaw, Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom (1976), with prolegomenon by Crenshaw; "The Shadow of Death in Qoheleth," Israelite Wisdom: Samuel Terrien Festschrift (ed. J. G. Gammie et al., 1978) 205-16; (ed.), Theodicy in the OT (1983), with intro. by Crenshaw; Ecclesiastes (OTL, 1987). M. J. Dahood, "Canaanite-Phoenician Influence in Qoheleth," Bib 33 (1952) 30-52, 191-221; "Qoheleth and Recent Discoveries (Qumran)," Bib 39 (1958) 302-18; "Qoheleth and Northwest Semitic Philology," Bib 43 (1962) 349-65; "The Phoenician Background of Qoheleth," Bib 47 (1966) 264-82; "The Phoenician Contribution to Biblical Wisdom literature," The Role of the Phoenicians in the Interaction of Mediterranean Civilizations (ed. W. A. Ward, 1968) 123-48. F. S. Delitzsch, Koheleth (1875; ET 1877). K. J. Dell, "Ecclesiastes as Wisdom: Consulting Early Interpreters," VT 44 (1994) 301-29. W. C. Delsman, "Zur Sprach des Buches Koheleth," Von Kanaan bis Kerala (ed. W. C. Delsman et al., 1982) 341-65. J. C. Döderlein, Salomons Prediger und Hohes Lied (1784). A. B. Ehrlich, Randglossen zur hebräischen Bibel 7 (1914, repr. 1968) 55-108. F. Ellermeier, "Die Entmachtung der Weisheit im Denken Qohelets," ZTK 60 (1963b) 1-20; Qohelet, Teil 1, Abschnitt 1 (1967). S. Eppenstein, Aus dem Kohelet-Kommentar des Tanchum Jerushalmi (1888). S. Euringer, Der Masorahtext des Koheleth kritisch untersucht (1890). J. Fichner, Die altorientalische Weisheit in ihrer israelitisch-jüdischen Ausprägung (BZAW 62, 1933); Gottes Weisheit (1965). M. V. Fox, "Frame-narrative and Composition in the Book of Qohelet," HUCA 48 (1977) 83-106; "Aging and Death in Qohelet 12:1-7: A Threefold Interpretation," JSOT 41 (1988) 55-77; Qohelet and His Contradictions (BLS 18, 1989); "Wisdom in Qoheleth," In Search of Wisdom (ed. L. G Perdue et al., 1993) 115-32; Tearing Down and Building Up: A Rereading of Qohelet (1998); A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (1999). D. C. Fredericks, Qohelet's Language (1987); Coping with Transience: Ecclesiastes on Brevity in Life (1993). K. Galling, "Kohelet-Studien," ZAW 50 (1932) 276-99; "Stand und Aufgabe der Kohelet-Forschung," TRu 6 (1934) 355-73; Prediger Salomo (HAT I, 18, 1940, 1969²); Die Krise der Aufklärung in Israel (1952). B. Gemser, "The Instructions of Onchsheshonqy and Biblical Wisdom Literature," Congress Volume, Oxford, 1959 (VTSup 7, 1960) 102-28 (= Crenshaw [1976] 134-60). H. Gese, "Die Krisis der Weisheit bei Kohelet," Les Sagesses du Proche-Orient ancient (1963) 139-51 (ET in Crenshaw [1983] 141-53). H. L. Ginsberg, "The Structure and Contents of the Book of Koheleth," Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East (VTSup 3, 1955) 138-49; Kohelet (1961), Hebrew; "The Quintessence of Koheleth," Biblical and Other Studies (ed. A. Altmann, 1963) 47-59. C. D. Ginsburg, The Song of Songs and Coheleth (1861, repr. 1970). E. Glasser, Le Procès du bonheur par Qohelet (1970). R. Gordis, "Quotations as a Literary Usage in Biblical, Oriental, and Rabbinic Literature," HUCA 22 (1949) 157-219; "Koheleth: Hebrew or Aramaic?" JBL

71 (1952) 93-109; Koheleth: The Man and His Word (1955, 1968³); "Was Koheleth a Phoenician?" JBL 74 (1955) 103-14. H. Graetz, Kohélet (1871). H. Grimme, "Babel und Qoheleth—Jojakhin," OLZ 8 (1905) 432-38. H. Grotius, Opera (1644, 1679). A. P. Hayman, "Qohelet, the Rabbis, and the Wisdom Text from the Cairo Genizah," Understanding Poets and Prophets (ed. A. G. Auld, JSOTSup 152, 1993). M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism, (tr. J. Bowden, 1974). J. G. Herder, Briefe das Studium der Theologie betreffend 11 (1780–90). H. W. Hertzberg, Der Prediger (KAT NF 17, 4, 1963²). S. Holm-Nielsen, "On the Interpretation of Qoheleth in Early Christianity," VT 24 (1974) 168-77. P. Humbert, Recherches sur les sources égyptiennes de la littérature sapientiale d'Israël (1929). K. Hyvärinen, Die Übersetzung von Aquila (ConBOT, 1977). B. Isaksson, Studies in the Language of Qoheleth (1987). S. Japhet and R. Salters, The Commentary of R. Samuel ben Meir, Rashbam, on Qoheleth (1985). J. Jarick, Gregory Thaumaturgos' Paraphrase of Ecclesiastes (1990); A Comprehensive Bilingual Concordance of the Hebrew and Greek Texts of Ecclesiastes (1993). O. Kaiser, "Beiträge zur Kohelet-Forschung," TRu 60 (1995) 1-31; "Die Botschaft des Buches Kohelet," ETL 71 (1995) 48-70. A. S. Kamenetzky, "Die P'sita zu Koheleth," ZAW 24 (1904) 181-239. P. Kleinert, "Sind im Buche Koheleth ausserhebräische Einflüsse anzuerkennen?" TSK 56 (1883) 761-82. M. A. Klopfenstein, "Die Skepsis des Qohelet," TZ 28 (1972) 97-109. R. Kroeber, Der Prediger (1963). G. Kuhn, Erklärung des Buches Koheleth (BZAW 43, 1926). D. J. Lane, "Peshitta Institute Communication XV: 'Lilies that fester . . . ': The Peshitta Text of Qoheleth," VT 29 (1979) 481-89. A. Lauha, Kohelet (BKAT 19, 1978); "Die Krise des religiösen Glaubens bei Kohelet," Congress Volume, Oxford, 1959 (VTSup 7, 1960) 183-91. M. Leahy, "The Meaning of Ecclesiastes [12:2-5]," ITQ 19 (1952) 297-300. L. Levy, Das Buch Qoheleth: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Sadduzäismus, kritisch untersucht (1912). J. A. Loader, Polar Structures in the Book of Qohelet (BZAW 152, 1979). N. Lohfink, Kohelet (Die Neue Echter Bibel, 1980); "Melek, sallît und môsel bei Kohelet und die Abfassungszeit des Buchs," Bib 62 (1981) 535-43; "Grenzen und Einbindung des Kohelet-Schlussgedichts," AT Forschung und Wirkung (FS H. G. Reventlow, 1994); "Freu dich, Jüngling—doch nicht, weil du jung bist. . . . (Koh 11,9-12, 8)," BibInt 3 (1995) 158-89; "Les Épilogues du livre de Qohélet et les débuts du canon," Ouvrir les Écritures (FS P. Beauchamp, ed. P. Bovati and R. Meynet, 1995). T. Longman, III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT, 1998). O. Loretz, "Zur Darbietungsform der 'Ich-Erzählung' im Buche Qohelet," CBQ 25 (1963) 46-59; Qohelet und der alte Orient (1964); "Altorientalische und kanaanäische Topoi im Buche Kohelet," UF 12 (1980) 267-86. D. Lys, L'Ecclésiaste ou que vaut la vie? (1977). D. B. MacDonald, "Eccl 3:11," JBL 18 (1899) 212-15; The Hebrew Philosophical Genius (1936). A. H. McNeile, An Introduction to Ecclesiastes (1904). M. Mendelssohn, Koheleth (1787; ET 1845). D. Michel, Qohelet (EdF 258, 1988); Untersuchungen zur Eigenart des Buches Qohelet (1989). Midrash Rabba, vol. 8, Ecclesiastes (ET ed. H. Freedman and M. Simon, tr. A. Cohen, 1983³). A. Miller, "Aufbau und Grundproblem des Predigers," Miscellanea Bib 2 (1934) 104-22. H. G. Mitchell, " 'Work' in Ecclesiastes," JBL 32 (1913) 123-38. J. A. Montgomery, "Notes on Ecclesiastes," JBL 43 (1924) 241-44. J. Muilenburg, "A Qohelet Scroll from Qumran," BASOR 135 (1954) 20-28. H.-P. Müller, "Wie sprach Qohälät von Gott?" VT 18 (1968) 507-21. R. E. Murphy, "The Pensées of Coheleth," CBQ 17 (1955) 304-12; "Form Criticism and Wisdom Literature," CBQ 31 (1969) 475-83; "Qohelet's 'Quarrel' with the Fathers," From Faith to Faith (FS D. G. Miller, ed. D. Y. Hadidian, 1979) 235-45; Wisdom Literature: Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, and Esther (FOTL 13, 1981); "Qohelet Interpreted: The Bearing of the Past on the Present," VT 32 (1982) 331-37; Ecclesiastes (WBC, 1992). A. Neher, Notes sur Qohélét (1951). F. Nötscher, Kohelet (1954); "Schicksal und Freiheit," Bib 40 (1959) 446-62. G. S. Ogden, Qohelet (1987). T. A. Perry, Dialogues with Kohelet (1993). J. Pedersen, "Scepticisme israélite," RHPR 10 (1930) 317-70. B. Pennacchini, "Qohelet ovvero il libro degli assurdi," Euntes Docete 30 (1977) 491-510. E. Pfeiffer, "Die Gottesfurcht im Buche Kohelet," (FS H. W. Hertzberg, 1965) 133-58. F. Piotti, "Osservazioni su alcuni usi linguistici dell'Ecclesiaste," BeO 19 (1977a) 49-57. O. Plöger, "Wahre die richtige Mitte; solch Mass ist in allem das Beste!" (FS H. W. Hertzberg, 1965) 159-73. E. H. Plumptre, Ecclesiastes (1881). L. Podechard, L'Ecclésiaste (1912). G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (1972). O. S. Rankin, "The Book of Ecclesiastes," IB (1956) 5:3-88. H. Ranston, "Koheleth and the Early Greeks," JTS 24 (1923) 160-69; Ecclesiastes and the Early Greek Wisdom Literature (1925). S. Reif, review of Koheleth: His Language and Thought by C. F. Whitley, VT 31 (1981) 120-26. F. Rousseau, "Structure de Qohelet I 4-11 et Plan du Livre," VT 31 (1981) 200-217. W. Rudolph, Vom Buch Kohelet (1959). J. C. Rylaarsdam, Revelation in Jewish Wisdom Literature (1946). J. F. A. Sawyer, "The Ruined House in Ecclesiastes 12: A Reconstruction of the Original Parable," JBL 94 (1975) 519-31. S. Schiffer, Das Buch Kohelet, nach der Auffassung der Weisen des Talmud und Midrasch und der jüdischen Erklärer des Mittelalters I (1884). H. H. Schmid, Wesen und Geschichte der Weisheit (BZAW 101, 1966) 186-96. A. Schoors, "Kethibh-Qere in Ecclesiastes," OLA 13 (1982) 215-22; "The Peshitta of Kohelet and Its Relation to the Septuagint," OLA 18 (1985) 347-57; The Preacher Sought to Find Pleasing Words, pt. 1, Grammar (OLA 41, 1992). L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger, "Kohelet: Stand und Perspektiven der Forschung," Das Buch Kohelet: Studien zur Struktur, Geschichte, Rezeption, und Theologie (ed. L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger, 1977) 5-38; "Nicht im Menschen gründet das Glück" (1996). R. B. Y. Scott, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes (AB 18, 1965). C.-L. Seow, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C, 1997). J. J. Serrano, "I Saw the Wicked Buried (Eccl 8, 10)," CBQ 16 (1954) 168-70. A. Shaffer, "The Mesopotamian Background of Qohelet 4:9-12," EI 8 (1967) 246-50; "New Light on the 'Three Ply Cord,' " EI 9 (1969) 159-60. G. T. Sheppard, "The Epilogue to Qoheleth as Theological Commentary," CBQ 39 (1977) 182-89. K. Siegfried, Prediger und Hoheslied (HAT 2, 3, 2, 1898). J. Steinmann, Ainsi Parlait Qohèlèt (1955). A. Strobel, Das Buch Prediger (Kohelet) (1967). C. Taylor, The Dirge of Coheleth (1874). M. Thilo, Der Prediger Salomo (1923). C. C. Torrey, "The Question of the Original Language of Qoheleth," JQR 39 (1948–49) 151-60. W. Sibley Towner, "The Book of Ecclesiastes," NIB (1997) 5:265-360. N.

H. Tur-Sinai, The Literal Meaning of Scripture 4b (1962). T. Tyler, Ecclesiastes (1899). P. Volz, "Koheleth," Hiob und Weisheit (1921). C. F. Whitley, Koheleth: His Language and Thought (1979). G. Wildeboer, "Der Prediger," Die Fünf Megillot (K. Budde et al., 1898) 109-68. J. G. Williams, Those Who Ponder Proverbs (1981); "What does It Profit a Man? The Wisdom of Koheleth," Judaism 20 (1971) 179-93 = Crenshaw (1976) 375-89. H. Witzenrath, Süss ist das Licht (1979). E. Wölfel, Luther und die Skepsis (1958). A. G. Wright, "The Riddle of the Sphinx: The Structure of the Book of Qoheleth," CBQ 30 (1968) 313-34; "The Riddle of the Sphinx Revisited: Numerical Patterns in the Book of Qoheleth," CBQ 42 (1980) 38-51; "Additional Numerical Patterns in Qohelet," CBQ 45 (1983) 32-43. Yahya (Yosef ben David ibn Yahya), Perus Hames Hammegillot (1539), Hebrew. M. Zer-Kavod, Qohelet (1973), Hebrew. W. Zimmerli, "Zur Struktur der alttestamentlichen Weisheit," ZAW 51 (1933) 177-204 (= Crenshaw [1976] 175-207); Das Buch des Predigers Salomo (ATD 16, 1, 1962); "Ort und Grenze der Weisheit im Rahmen der alttestamentlich Theologie," Les Sagesse du Proche-Orient Ancien (1963) 121-38 (= Crenshaw [1976] 314-26); "Das Buch Kohelet—Traktat oder Sentenzensammlung?" VT 24 (1974) 221-30. F. Zimmermann, "The Aramaic Provenence of Qohelet," JQR 36 (1945–46) 17-45; "The Question of Hebrew in Qohelet," JQR 40 (1949–50) 79-102; The Inner World of Qohelet (1973). G. Zirkel, Untersuchungen über den Prediger mit philosophischen und kritischen Bemerkungen (1792). R. B. Zuck, Reflecting with Solomon (1994), anthology of articles.

M. V. FOX

QUADRIGA

Originally used of a chariot pulled by four horses abreast, the term Quadriga is employed to refer to the medieval pattern of biblical interpretation that expounded a fourfold meaning of the text. This approach assumed that a text could have more than a literal or straightforward meaning. Through INNER-BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION writers found secondary meanings in earlier texts by assuming that they said more than appeared obvious or that they were deliberately symbolic or figurative. For example, the seventy years of exile predicted by Jeremiah (Jer 25:11-12; 29:10) was interpreted in Daniel 9 as meaning seventy weeks of, or 490, years; and PAUL understood the "rock" from which the Israelites drank in the wilderness as Christ (1 Cor 10:1-4).

Interpreting a text to give a more-than-literal reading was common in Hellenistic attempts to preserve the value and relevance of Homer's writings by means of allegory. Heraclitus (1st cent. BCE) explained allegory as "speaking one thing and signifying something other than what is said" (Homeric Questions 5.2).

Within early Judaism, readings that went beyond the plain meaning of a text also developed, although rabbis argued that "no verse could ever lose its plain sense [peshat]" (b. Šabb. 63a). PHILO engaged in radical allegorizing and even argued that the plain meaning of some texts was absurd.

In the patristic period Christians found various forms of more-than-literal meanings in HB texts. Because God was the author of both the HB and the Christian faith, the latter must be taught or prefigured in the former, for truth is unified. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA declared that "the mysteries of the word are not to be expounded to the profane" and noted that "all things that shine through a veil show the truth grander and more imposing" (Strom. 5.9). The first major Christian treatise on biblical interpretation is found in book 4 of On First Principles by ORIGEN. Drawing on such texts as the Greek of Prov 22:20-21 and a tripartite anthropology, Origen argued that Scripture has a body, a soul, and a spirit, i.e., a literal and a twofold spiritual sense. Some texts contain no literal sense because their statements are absurd; difficulties in the text serve to challenge the interpreter. The spiritual meaning is intended to be appropriated by Christians as they grow toward the heavenly world and as an aid in that growth. Knowledge easily acquired was not greatly esteemed; to delve into the mystery of the text was more rewarding. The deep truth was often hidden, to be imparted only to special persons. Thus EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA wrote: "Moses ordered the Jewish plebs to be committed to all of the rites which were included in the words of their laws. But he wished that the others, whose mind and virtue were stronger as they were liberated from this exterior shell, should accustom themselves to a philosophy more divine and superior to common man, and should penetrate with the eye of the mind into the higher meaning of the laws" (Praep. Evang. 7.10.378).

Christian exegetes advanced various expressions to delineate the multifold levels of meaning in, and means for, the understanding of Scripture, sometimes threefold, sometimes fourfold. JEROME spoke of historia, tropologica, and intelligentia spiritualis (Epistolae 120.12); AUGUSTINE, of historia, allegoria, analogia, and aetiologia (De Genesi ad litteram 1.1.1; and De utilitate credendi 3.5-9); and GREGORY THE GREAT, of historia, significatio typica, and moralitas (Moralium libri Epistula missoria 3). Augustine's terminology—etiology and analogy—was never especially used either by himself or by others (see Thomas Aquinas Summa Theologiae Ia.1, 10). Nevertheless, Augustine, along with Gregory, greatly influenced the medieval exegetes' search for more than one "higher" meaning in Scripture. At the beginning of his unfinished literal commentary on Genesis, he wrote: "Four ways of expounding the Law are handed down by certain men who treat the Scriptures . . . in accord with history, allegory, analogy, and etiology. It is a matter of history when deeds done—whether by men or by God—are reported. It is a matter of allegory when things spoken in figures are understood. It is a matter of analogy when the conformity of the Old and New Testaments is shown. It is a matter of etiology when the causes of what is said or done are reported" (De Genesi ad litteram liber imperfectus 2.5).

Both Augustine and Gregory stressed the association of the spiritual senses of the text with the theological virtues of faith, hope, and love. The terminology and scheme of multiple meanings in Scripture that were to become almost standard in medieval times were formulated by J. Cassian (c. 360–435): "History embraces the knowledge of things which are past and which are perceptible. . . . What follows is allegorical, because the things which actually happened are said to have prefigured another mystery. . . . Anagoge climbs up from spiritual mysteries to the higher and more august secrets of heaven. . . . Tropology is moral teaching designed for the amendment of life and for instruction in asceticism. . . . And if we wish it, these four modes of interpretation flow into a unity so that the one Jerusalem can be understood in four different ways, in the historical sense as the city of the Jews, in allegory as the church of Christ, in anagoge as the heavenly city of God . . . in the tropological sense as the human soul" (Conferences 14.8).

In the later Middle Ages this fourfold interpretation was expressed in a widely used rhyme first attested in the Rotulus pugillaris, an aid to preaching by the Dominican Augustine of Dacia (d. 1285): Littera gesta docet; quid credas allegoria; moralitas quid agas; quid speres anagogia (The letter teaches what happened; allegory, what to believe; morality, how to behave; anagogy, what to hope for).

In medieval Judaism multi levels of meaning in a biblical text were also described as being fourfold. These were spoken of as peshat (simple or plain), remez (allegorical or philosophical), derash (traditional or haggadic), and sod (mysterious or kabbalistic). These terms were used not only to designate four levels of meaning but also four exegetical methods (see W. Bacher [1891, 1893]; A. van der Heide [1983]); they were referred to by the mnemonic PARDES (paradise).

Uneasiness with the Quadriga approach was expressed by many exegetes beginning in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, by both Christians and Jews (see K. Froehlich [1977]; M. Signer [1992–93]). ALAN OF LILLE described the Bible as a "nose of wax" (an image frequently used in later discussions; see H. Porter [1964]), which could be shaped to fit one's conceptions and beliefs. THOMAS AQUINAS argued that theological conclusions should be based on the sensus literalis since everything necessary for faith is conveyed through the literal sense (Summa Theologiae Ia. Q1.aa. 8-10).

Renaissance and reformation exegetes tended to break with the Quadriga pattern, although still adherring to the idea that some form of spiritual or mystical meaning lay beneath the literal meaning, especially in HB promises (see G. Evans [1985]). This secondary sense might not have been intended by the human writer but was intended by God, the divine author. This issue continued to impinge on the interpretation of PROPHECY in the HB. W. Lowth (1660–1732), father of R. LOWTH, in the preface to his 1714 commentary on Isaiah, wrote: "The Christian Interpretation of the Prophecies is called the Mystical Sense, because it helps to unfold the Mysteries of the Gospel, not as if it were always opposed to a literal Sense. For in many cases what we call the Mystical Sense, more exactly answers the natural and genuine Import of the Words, than any other Interpretation that can be given of them" (x).

In the twentieth century, Roman Catholic scholars have come to speak of the more-than-literal meaning of a text as the sensus plenior, an expression coined by A. Fernández in 1925. The method associated with this expression seeks to preserve some of the values of the old Quadriga. The sensus plenior is defined as "the deeper meaning, intended by God but not clearly intended by the human author, that is seen to exist in the Words of Scripture when they are studied in the light of further revelation or of development in the understanding of revelation" (R. Brown, New Jerome Biblical Commentary [1990] 1157).

Bibliography: W. Bacher, "L'exegèse biblique dans le Zohar," REJ 22 (1891) 33-46, 219-29; "Das Merkwort Pardes in der judischen Bibelexegese," ZAW 13 (1893) 294-305. R. E. Brown, The Sensus Plenior of Sacred Scripture (1955). H. Caplan, "The Four Senses of Scriptural Interpretation and the Medieval Theory of Preaching," Speculum 4 (1929) 282-90. F. Châtillon, "Vocabulaire et prosodie du distique attributé à Augustin de Dacie sur les quatre sens de l'Écriture," L'homme devant Dieu: Mélanges H. de Lubac (3 vols., 1964) 2:17-28. B. S. Childs, "The Sensus Literalis of Scripture: An Ancient and Modern Problem," Beiträge zur Alttestamentlichen Theologie (FS W. Zimmerli, ed. H. Donner, 1977) 80-93. J. Daniélou, "Les divers sens de l'Écriture dans la tradition chrétienne primitive," ETL 24 (1948) 119-26. E. von Dobschütz, "Vom vierfachen Schriftsinn: Die Geschichte einer Theorie," Harnack-Ehrung (1921) 1-13. G. Dorival et al., "Sens de l'Écriture," DBSup 12 (1996) 423-536. H. Dörrie, "Zur Methodik antiker Exegese," ZNW 65 (1974) 121-38. A. d'Esneval, "Les quatre sens l'Écriture à l'époque de Pierre le Mangeur et de Hugues de Saint-Cher," *Mediaevalia Christiana, XI*e*-XIII*e siècles: Hommage à R. Foreville (ed. C. E. Viola, 1989) 355-69. G. R. Evans, The Language and Logic of the Bible: The Earlier Middle Ages (1984); The Language and Logic of the Bible: The Road to Reformation (1985). K. Froehlich, " 'Always to Keep the Literal Sense in Holy Scripture Means to Kill One's Soul': The State of Biblical Hermeneutics at the Beginning of the Fifteenth Century," Literary Uses of Typology: From the Late Middle Ages to the Present (ed. E. Minor, 1977) 20-48; "J. Trithemius on the Fourfold Sense of Scripture: The Tractatus de Inuestigatione Sacrae Scripturae, 1486," Biblical Interpretation in the Era of the Reformation (FS D. Steinmetz, ed. R. A. Muller and J. L. Thompson, 1996) 23-60. L. Goppelt, Typos: The Typological Interpretation of the OT in the New (1982). R. M. Grant, The Letter and the Spirit (1957). K.

Guth, "Zum Verhältnis von Exegese und Philosophie im Zeitalter der Frühscholastik," RTAM 38 (1971) 128-36. R. P. C. Hanson, Allegory and Event: A Study of the Sources and Significance of Origen's Interpretation of Scripture (1959). V. Harris, "Allegory to Analogy in the Interpretation of Scripture," Philological Quarterly 45 (1966) 1-23. A. van der Heide, "PARDES: Methodological Reflections on the Theory of the Four Senses," JJS 34 (1983) 147-59. L. Jacobs, Jewish Biblical Exegesis (Chain of Tradition Ser. 4, 1973). R. Lamberton, Homer the Theologian: Neoplatonist Allegorical Reading and the Growth of the Epic Tradition (Transformation of the Classical Heritage 9, 1986). H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale: Les quatre sens de l'Écriture (2 vols. in 4, 1959–64). J. Pépin, Mythe et allégorie: Les origines qrecques et les contestations judéo-chrétiennes (1976²); La Tradition de l'allégorie de Philon d'Alexandrie à Dante (1987). H. C. Porter, "The Nose of Wax: Scripture and the Spirit from Erasmus to Milton," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society 5th ser., 14 (1964) 155-74. J. S. Preus, From Shadow to Promise: OT Interpretation from Augustine to the Young Luther (1969). P. Sellew, "Achilles or Christ? Porphyry and Didymus in Debate over Allegorical Interpretation," HTR 82 (1989) 79-100. M. A. Signer, "Peshat, Sensus Litteralis, and Sequential Narrative: Jewish Exegesis and the School of St. Victor in the Twelfth Century," The F. Talmage Memorial Volume (2 vols., ed. B. Walfish, 1992–93) 1:203-16. B. Smalley, "S. Langton and the Four Senses of Scripture," Speculum 6 (1934) 60-76; "Use of the 'Spiritual' Senses of Scripture in Persuasion and Argument by Scholars in the Middle Ages," RTAM 52 (1985) 44-63. H.-J. Spitz, Die Metaphorik des geistigen Schriftsinns: Ein Beitrag zur allegorischen Bibelauslegung des ersten christlichen Jahrtausends (Münstersche Mittelalter-Schriften 12, 1972). J. Tate, "On the History of Allegorism," Classical Quarterly 28 (1934) 105-14. F. M. Young, Biblical Exegesis and the Formation of Christian Culture (1997).

J. H. HAYES

QURANIC AND ISLAMIC INTERPRETATION OF BIBLICAL MATERIALS

Understanding the use of biblical materials in Islamic writings is dependent on an analysis of the history of relations between Muslims, Jews, and Christians and on judgments about what constitutes biblical material. As will be clear, Muslims, Jews, and Christians have had varying attitudes about the relationship between what is found in the Torah or Gospels, on the one hand, and the Quran, on the other hand. Often such discussions have hinged on the decision about which text is primary or "original," as well as what constitutes the biblical CANON. It should also be remembered that there is no certain evidence that the Bible was translated into Arabic during the formative period of Islam. Most instances of quotation of biblical verses by Muslims before the tenth century appear to be mediated by oral rather than by written sources and to be interpretations rather than translations.

1. Pre-Islamic Arabia. Traditionally, discussions about the relationship between Islamic writings and the Bible have started with considerations about the existence of the Bible in Arabia, the birthplace of Muḥammad (570–632 CE), the founding prophet of the religion of Islam. The presence of Jewish communities from before the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE in both Yemen and the Hijâz (northwest Arabia) as well as such Christian communities as Nestorians and Monophysites around the periphery of the peninsula has led to the conclusion that Jewish and Christian Scriptures were known to some people in Arabia before Muhammad's birth. Evidence for this is indirect and scanty and comes primarily through Islamic sources. Muslim historians reported, for example, that the Jews of the city of Medina used to read the Torah in Hebrew and explain it to the Arabs in Arabic. There is also some evidence that at least portions of the Gospels were known in Arabia in the pre-Islamic periods. But most of the evidence for pre-Islamic Arabian knowledge of biblical materials comes from interpreting Islam's scripture, the Quran. Pre-Islamic Arabic poetry yields little information about the Bible, but this is to be expected, given the secular content of that highly formalized genre.

2. The Quran and the Life of Muhammad. According to Muslim tradition, Muhammad was born in the city of Mecca around 570 CE. Muslim traditions portray Mecca as the center of a pagan religious empire supported by international trade. The Meccan empire was dominated by the tribe of Qureish, which was divided into several clans. Muhammad's Hashimite clan was the poorest of all the clans, but it possessed great nobility from both Arab and biblical lines. Muslim genealogists place Muhammad in a line of descent from Adam through Abraham and his son by Hagar, Ishmael, down through the line of North Arabs. This genealogy does not appear in the Quran, nor are extensive details about Muhammad's life given in Muslim scripture.

At the age of forty Muhammad is said to have had the first of a series of religious experiences in which the Quran was brought down to him from an exemplar in heaven by the archangel Gabriel. From 610 to his death in 632 Muhammad received verses and portions of the Quran. According to the traditional Muslim view, only after Muhammad's death did 'Uthmân, the third successor or Caliph, order a commission to put the scattered verses (Arabic, 'ayah) into their present form of 114 chapters (Arabic, sûrah). Islamic histories of the Quran regard the 'Uthmânic recension as a faithful compilation of the known oral and written sources and a faithful replica of the heavenly original. Western scholars have noted that the process of compilation started during the lifetime of Muhammad and took much longer than the first two decades after his death. They point out that there are variant spellings of words and different textual traditions, some of which are tolerated by Islamic religious law. Attempts by Western scholars at producing a critical variorum edition have been unsuccessful.

At first glance there appears to be little underlying organization within and among the chapters, but both Muslim and non-Muslim scholars have offered numerous theories about the principles of composition. For Muslims, the Quran is a unique, inimitable book that contains the authentic words of God (Arabic, 'Allâh). Its counterpart in heaven, the 'Umm al-Kitâb, is what God writes in and can be abrogated or confirmed at God's will (Q. 13:39). Some of the verses are clear and unambiguous, while others have ambiguous or indiscernible meanings (Q. 3:7). The notion that some verses in the Quran are abrogated by other verses mostly figures in legal discussions; but some commentators hold that various tellings of the stories in the Quran fit within an extension of that principle, thus accounting for what non-Muslim scholars have termed inconsistencies.

Muhammad's career as prophet and community leader was divided into two distinct periods. The first period (610–22) was in the city of Mecca, when Muhammad seems to have had only limited initial success in winning his fellow Meccans to his religion. His message of moral and social reform caused considerable antagonism among the power elite, and he was forced to leave Mecca in 622 and move to the city of Medina, also called Yathrib. This migration, called the Hijrah, in which Muhammad was preceded by those of his followers who could get away from Mecca, is reckoned as the beginning of the political establishment of the Muslim community; thus the year 622 CE is the first year of the Muslim calendar.

Western scholars, noting that there were few, if any, Jews and Christians in Mecca, date the Quran's use of biblical figures chiefly to the period of Muhammad's sojourn in the strongly Jewish city of Medina. To be sure, some biblical names are cited in the Meccan period, but most of the rich details are dated to the Medinan period. Determining the dates of the origins of the stories in the Quran raises some methodological problems, for some passages are counted as from the Medinan period due to the inclusion of biblical figures. Despite the dating problems, it is generally agreed that the later portions of the Quran contain the most detailed information about biblical figures. What is most problematic is the source of these stories.

As mentioned above, for believing Muslims the source of the Quran is God's eternal word, preserved in the heavenly prototype, the 'Umm al-Kitâb. This was the source for all of God's revelations to those known as Ahl al-Kitâb, the "People of the Book," usually meaning Jews and Christians, who were recipients of God's prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). Differences between the Quranic stories and those found in the Bible are accounted for by the charge made against Jews and Christians that they corrupted God's message (Arabic, tahrîf [see Q. 2:75, 4:46, 5:13] or tabdîl [Q. 2:59]), thus necessitating the series of prophets who brought corrections from God. For Muslims, the Quran stands as the corrective to errors that had come into the Scriptures of Jews and Christians. Even though the Quran is the last of the series of revelations chronologically, Muslims contend that its versions of the common stories are true, represent the original, and should be privileged over Jewish and Christian versions.

From the perspective of Western scholarship the stories in the Quran that mention biblical names and themes are adaptations either from the Bible or from extrabiblical literature. The quest for the original source from which the version was borrowed has characterized much Western research on Islam. Some scholars, following the lead of A. GEIGER (1902), have found mainly Jewish influence, while others, e.g., R. Bell (1926), ascribe the greatest influence on Muhammad and Islam to Christianity. Both views rely on the techniques and presuppositions of philology and are heavily text dependent. But for the most part scholars have had difficulty in finding exact textual matches between Quranic and biblical stories, even when they take cognizance of extrabiblical material. Thus, for example, the differences between the biblical story of Joseph and the Joseph of the twelfth chapter of the Quran are not fully accounted for even in rabbinic lore. The name of the tempting woman, Bilqis, the details of Joseph's shirt having been torn from behind, etc. are not found in any extant pre-Quranic literature. This has sometimes led to assumptions that Muhammad invented the details, that he "made mistakes" in his transmission of the information, or, only slightly more charitable, that he had poorly informed teachers, which led, for example, to the Quranic assertion that some Christians regarded the Trinity as God, Jesus, and Mary (Q. 5:116) or that Jews held Ezra to be the son of God (Q. 9:30).

Recent Western scholarship has tried to avoid the polemical position of determining the correct ur-version and has turned to techniques of FOLKLORE and LITERARY THEORY to investigate the relationship between Quranic and Islamic stories of biblical characters and Jewish and Christian versions. H. Schwarzbaum (1982), while avoiding a judgment about whether the stories in the Quran derive from folk literature or literary sources, places the bulk of extra-Quranic writings in the genre of folk literature. This allows for multiple versions and variations without having to decide which one is privileged or "correct." From the perspective of literary theory, M. Waldman (1985) adapts the theories of B. Smith (1981), which reject the search for "originals." Rather, each telling of a story is examined in relationship to other versions, and each version will be a product of the motives, interests, and context of its telling. By analyzing the story of Joseph (Q. 12), Waldman shows that, although there are certain surface similarities between the Quranic and biblical versions (e.g., names, some key events, and major narrative sequences), the underlying structure, and hence what the details mean, is quite different. While the biblical story of Joseph is connected with the narrative history of the Jewish people, the Quranic Joseph is presented as a model prophet and a paradigm for reliance on God's will. In addition, she contends, as have many Muslim scholars, that one does not need to make reference to the Bible or extra-biblical writings to "make sense" of the Quranic narrative; it stands on its own and has its own universe of discourse.

3. From the Death of Muhammad to the Tenth Century. The political and social context of Islam and the Quran changed after the death of Muhammad, when Muslims moved out of Arabia into the territories of the Persian and Byzantine empires. Arab Muslims found themselves in the ambiguous position of being simultaneously the ruling elite and a religious minority. In most cities where Arab Muslims established administrative centers, they were outnumbered by Jews and Christians well skilled in religious polemic and argument. The inevitable contacts accelerated the need among some Muslims to produce extensive commentaries on the Quran for apologetic and polemical purposes, and many early commentators relied on Jewish and Christian writings and oral traditions to supplement their understanding of the Quran. In addition, converts to Islam often brought with them ideas from their former religions and knowledge of biblical interpretations that became part of Muslim scholarship.

Muslim scholars in the first Islamic century (from the death of Muhammad in 632 to the founding of the Abbasid Empire in the middle of the 8th cent.) collected stories from Jews, Christians, and others to fill out the Quran and to satisfy the growing need among Muslims to have a full explanation of the history of the world. The result was that a rich store of Jewish and Christian stories became incorporated in early Islamic literature. Some of the stories were used as Quran commentary, some formed the basis for universal histories, and some were used as background for the biographies of Muhammad. The genre of Tales of the Prophets (Arabic: Qusas al-Anbiyâ') or Israelite Stories (Arabic: Isrâ'îlîyât) expounded on biblical figures as moral exemplars and as forerunners of Muhammad.

The Quran mentions many names known from the Bible, but the names are all in Arabic adaptations, indicating that their stories were known prior to the time of Islam. Moses is Mûsâ, Abraham is Ibrahîm, Jesus is 'Isâ, etc. Most of the names are mentioned only briefly in the Quran, with few details about their lives or deeds. The Quran lists Aaron, Abel, Abraham, Adam, Cain, David, Elias, Elisha, Ezra, Gabriel, Goliath, Gog and Magog, Haman, Ishmael, Israel, Jacob, Jesus, Job, John the Baptist, Jonah, Joseph, Lot, Mary mother of Jesus, Michael, Miriam, Noah, Pharaoh, Saul, Sheba, Solomon, and Zechariah as well as the disciples of Jesus, God's Spirit, Mount Sinai, the twelve tribes of Israel, heaven, hell, etc. Biblical figures were transformed by the Muslim commentators into proto-Muslims. Abraham, for example, was said by Muslims to have been born before the giving of the Torah; he was, therefore, not Jewish. When Jews encountered that polemic, they countercharged that Ishmael did not possess sufficient intellect to know God or enough piety to be chosen for the Binding, as the Muslims contend. Most of the biblical figures are regarded by the classical Quranic commentaries as proto-Muslims (Arabic, Ḥanîf) and strict monotheists. Thus Jesus is, for Muslims, only a man who was chosen to be a prophet.

The most lasting and influential use of biblical materials from this period is in Muhammad b. Isḥâq's (d. 767) biography of Muhammad, the Sirat Rasûl Allâh, which traces the course of world history from creation to the death of Muhammad, following the model of the Bible. It uses Jewish and Christian stories about biblical and extra-biblical religious figures of Judaism and Christianity to portray Muhammad as the last of God's prophets and the embodiment of all of them. Just as the biblical figures are Islamized, Muhammad's life and that of his family recapitulate the lives of the biblical patriarchs. His grandfather 'Abdu-l-muṭṭalib becomes the new Abraham as the restorer of the Ka'ba built by Abraham; his father, Isaac/Ishmael, is saved from his father's sacrifice by divine intervention; and Muhammad is the new Jacob, but a Jacob who ascends to heaven on the ladder. Muhammad is also said to have fed a multitude, but with barley and roast mutton. The obvious parallel between Muhammad and Moses with the receipt of the law is only one of many correlations that can be made between Muhammad and biblical figures. Ibn Isḥâq made use of materials from Jewish and Christian oral and written sources to develop his image of Muhammad and became the chief proponent of the method of using Isrâ'îlîyât.

Beginning in the second Islamic century (mid-8th cent. CE), some Muslims began to react negatively to using Jewish and Christian materials for commenting on the Quran and for explicating the life of Muhammad. Those in the Muslim community who held that each individual Muslim's life should be under the direct governance of God's law began to devalue and then finally to reject Jewish and Christian materials as a basis for their religious and social vision. Rationalist schools, e.g., the Mu'tazilites, developed, gained political power, and rejected most of the narrative elements of the biblically oriented stories. In many places Jews and Christians revolted against Islamic rule, bringing Jewish and Christian sources into political discredit. Scholars who collected Jewish and Christian stories for Quran commentary were supplanted by those whose interests were less historical, more theological, and more centered on internal Islamic themes. Elaboration of biblically based stories became, for a time, the fare of the popular storytellers who entertained the crowds but whose scholarly methods were suspect. For example, one storyteller is supposed to have been commenting on the Joseph story and said that the name of the wolf who ate Joseph was.... He was interrupted by the crowd, who reminded him that Joseph was not eaten by a wolf. Recovering quickly, he said that what he had meant to say was that the name of the wolf who did not eat Joseph was....

The monumental Quran commentary by Muḥammad b. Jarîr at-Tabarî (d. 923), Jâmi' al-Bayân fî Tafsîr al-Qur'ân, and his history of the world, Ta'rîkh ar-Rusul wa-l-Mulûk, set a standard for the collection of stories from Jews and Christians; in many ways these works closed the door on additional Muslim collections. The history, and to an extent the Quran commentary, were built on the framework of Ibn Isḥâq's biography of Muḥammad. Aṭ-Ṭabarî not only collected biblical materials but he also tried to correlate the biblical CHRONOLOGY with Iranian traditions. The result is a thorough assimilation of biblical stories based on Jewish and Christian sources into an Islamic worldview, so that after him few Muslims felt the need to look outside existing Islamic scholarship for explanations of biblical figures.

4. Tenth to Nineteenth Centuries CE. Among Muslim scholars, interest in Jews and Christians after the tenth century CE was primarily in the field of heresiography. Most Quran scholars either rejected the fanciful Isrâ'îlîyât stories as irrational, as did the Mu'tazilite az-Zamakhshari (d. 1144), or were satisfied to remain within the then-considerable Islamic intellectual tradition. Before the tenth century most heresiographers were converts to Islam from Judaism or Christianity and tended to regard the Bible as partially valid, although superseded by the Quran. After the tenth century Muslims came to regard Jewish and Christian Scriptures as not only wrong in some details or interpretation but also as fundamentally wrong and evil.

Probably the most influential writer to advance the view that the surviving versions of the Torah, the Psalms, or the Gospels were in fundamental error was Ibn Ḥazm (d. 1064), the first heresiographer in the Muslim world to be born a Muslim. He possessed a powerful intellect and a sharp tongue, which he turned on all who did not agree with him, Muslim and non-Muslim alike. In his Kitâb al-Fasl fil-Milal wa-l-'Ahwâ' wa-l-Nihal, Ibn Ḥazm linked errors in Jewish scripture with a particularly vicious polemic against Jews themselves, calling them "stinking," "foul," "vile," "dirty," and "villainous." While such negative attitudes can be seen to have a Quranic base, Ibn Ḥazm represents a major departure from previous Muslim writings. He contended that Jewish and Christian Scriptures are known to Muslims only because they are mentioned in the Quran, but that the Quran regards them as in error, hence the need for the new scripture. Muslims, therefore, should not be bothered with previous scripture except as a warning not to let happen to the Quran what happened to the Torah and to the Gospels—namely, that they became corrupted or partially lost.

After Ibn Ḥazm there were only a few Muslim scholars who sought out Jewish and Christian Scripture. Biblical themes and characters were elaborated only because they were part of the Islamic tradition. Stories abounded about the prophets, some eventually making it into Western story traditions as Muslims and Europeans met. The magical and fantastic adventures of King Solomon and his ability to talk with the animals is a good example, with the stories of King Solomon and the Butterfly That Stamped, or King Solomon and the Talking Hoopoe as just two of many such narratives. For Muslims, the fanciful story was both an entertainment that orbited sometimes closely and sometimes distantly around the text of the Quran and an edifying text to show a moral value. All the biblical figures were precedent setting, though to a lesser degree than was Muhammad; and their teachings were never raised to the status of law.

5. Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries. Sustained contact between Muslims and Europeans, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, has produced varied and sometimes ambiguous reactions to Western culture on the part of the Muslims. Since the Bible was regarded as part of Western culture because of its identification with European Christians, some Muslims tried to reconcile the Quran with the Bible, while others rejected the Bible as they rejected the culture of Western imperialism. The Egyptian nationalist and theologian Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905) and his pupil Rashîd Riḍâ' rejected all so-called Isrâ'îlîyât stories as having been made up in order to subvert God's true religion. This, of course, continues Ibn Ḥazm's perspective of vilification by attributing evil motives to the variances between the Bible and the Quran.

Syed Abul 'Alâ Maudoodi (1903–79), in his Tafhîm al-Qur'ân, treated the biblical text seriously, although it is interpreted in the light of the Quran. He invoked some biblical verses in support of his argument but rejected others as not "worthy of the high character" of the prophet under discussion. Maulana Muhammad Ali (1875–1951), the prolific Aḥmadîya writer, made use of the results of biblical higher criticism to demonstrate his point that, while the Bible is inaccurate, the individuals mentioned in the Bible and in the Quran were historical figures. In neither author, however, is there a significant attempt to reinterpret the "biblical" figures in any way differently from that of the classical Islamic Quran commentaries.

Biblical themes appear outside of religious literature as Muslims have adopted the secular literary forms of plays and novels. Najib Mahfuz (b. 1912), for example, in his novel Awlâd Hâratinâ, depicts three thinly disguised prophets representing Moses, Jesus, and Muhammad to voice his own critique of modern Egyptian life and the nature of the modern world.

Bibliography: K. Ahrens, "Christliches im Qoran," ZDMG 84 (1930) 15-68, 148-90. Al-Kisâ'î, Muhammad b. 'Abdullâh, Vita Prophetarum (ed. Isaac Eisenberg, 1922–23). T. Andrae, Der Ursprung des Islam und das Christentum (1926). Ath-Tha'labî, Ahmad b. Muhammad, Qisas al-Abinyâ' (1950). At-Tabarî, Muhammad b. Jarîr, Ta'rîkh al-Rusul wa-al-Mulûk (ed. M. J. de Goeje et al., 16 vols. 1879–98); Jâmi' al-Bayân fî Tafsîr 'Ayy al-Qur'ân (30 vols., 1954). R. Bell, The Origin of Islam in Its Christian Environment (Gunning Lectures, 1926); "Muhammad's Knowledge of the OT," Presentation Volume to W. B. Stevenson (ed. C. J. M. Weir, 1945), 1-20. W. M. Brinner, The History of al-Tabarî, vol. 2, Prophets and Patriarchs (1987). J. Burton, "Quranic Exegesis," Religion, Learning, and Science (ed. M. Young, 1990) 40-55. P. O. Cate, "Each Other's Scripture: The Muslims' View of the Bible and the Christians' Views of the Qura'ân" (diss., Hartford Seminary Foundation, 1974). B. Chapira, "Légendes Bibliques Attribuées a Ka'b al-Aḥbâr," REJ 69 (1919) 86-107; 70 (1920) 37-43. K. Cragg, The Pen and the Faith: Eight Modern Muslim Writers and the Quran (1985). P. Crone and M. Cook, Hagarism: The Making of the Islamic World (1977). R. Dozy, Die Israeliten zu Mekka: Ein Beitrag zur Alttestamentlichen Kritik und zur Erforschung des Ursprungs des Islam (1864). J. Finkel, "An Arabic Story of Abraham," HUCA 12-13 (1938) 387-409. W. J. Fischel, "Ibn Khaldun on the Bible, Judaism, and the Jews," I. Goldziher Memorial Volume, pt. 2 (1958) 147-71. R. D. Freedman, "The Father of Modern Biblical Scholarship," JANES 19 (1989) 31-38. A. Geiger, Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthum aufgenommen (1902²). J. C. L. Gibson, "John the Baptist in Muslim Writings," Muslim World 45 (1955) 334-45. A. Guillaume, "The Version of the Gospel Used in Medina circa 700 AD," Al-Andalus 15 (1950) 289-96. Hamidullah Muhammad, "Die Bibel als eine kanonische Quelle des islamischen Rechts," Der Orient in der Forschung: Festschrift für O. Spies (1967) 247-53. B. Heller, "Récits et Personnages Biblique das la Légende Mahométane," REJ 85 (1928) 113-36; "La légende biblique dans l'Islam," REJ 98 (1934) 1-18. J. Horovitz, "Biblische Nachwirkungen in der Sîra," Der Islam 12 (1922) 184-89. H. Horst, "Israelitische Propheten im Koran," ZRGG 16 (1964) 42-57. E. J. Jenkinson, "Jesus in Moslem Tradition," Muslim World 18 (1928) 263-67. A. I. Katsch, Judaism in Islâm: Biblical and Talmudic Backgrounds of the Koran and Its Commentaries (1954). R. G. Khoury, "Quelques Réflexions sur les Citations de la Bible dans les Premières Générations Islamiques du Premier et du Deuxième Siècles de l'Hégire," Bulletin d'études orientales 29 (1977–78) 269-78. M. Lidzbarski, De Propheticis, quae dicuntur, Legendis Arabicis; prolegomena (1893). J. D. McAuliffe, "Quranic Hermeneutics: The Views of al-Tabari and Ibn Kathir," Approaches to the History of the Interpretation (ed. A. Rippin, 1988) 42-62. N. Mahfuz, Children of Gebelawi (1981). Y. Moubarac, Abraham dans le Coran (1958). G. D. Newby, A History of the Jews of Arabia: From Ancient Times to Their Eclipse Under Islam (1989); The Making of the Last Prophet: A Reconstruction of the Earliest Biography of Muhammad (1989). G. Parrinder, Jesus in the Qur'ân (1965). M. Perlmann, "Eleventh-century Andalusian Authors on the Jews of Granada," PAAJR 18 (1949) 269-71. F. Rosenthal, "The Influence of Biblical Tradition on Muslim Historiography," Historians of the Middle East (ed. B. Lewis, 1962) 35-45. J. Schacht, "Une citation de l'Evangile de St. Jean dans la Sîra d'Ibn Ishâq," Al-Andalus 16 (1951) 489-90. H. Schwarzbaum, Biblical and Extra-Biblical Legends in Islamic Folk-literature (1982). M. S. Seale, Qur'an and Bible (1978). B. H. Smith, "Narrative Versions, Narrative Theories," On Narrative (ed. W. J. T. Mitchell, 1981) 209-32. H. P. Smith, The Bible and Islam (1897). J. Somogyi, "Biblical Figures in ad-Damirî's Hayat al Hayawân," E. Mahler Jubilee Volume (1937) 263-99. H. Speyer, "Bibel im Islam," Jüdisches Lexicon 1 (1927) 989-91. H. Speyer, Die Biblischen Erzählungen im Qoran (1971). N. A. Stillman, "The Story of Cain and Abel in the Qur'ân and the Muslim Commentators," JSS 19 (1974) 231-39. W. M. Thackston, The Tales of the Prophets of al-Kisâ'î (1978). C. C. Torrey, The Jewish Foundation of Islam (1967). M. Waldman, Toward a Theory of Historical Narrative: A Case Study in Perso-Islamicate Historiography (1980); "New Approaches to 'Biblical' Materials in the Qur'ân," Muslim World 75 (1985) 1-16. W. M. Watt, "The Early Development of the Muslim Attitude to the Bible," Transactions of the Glasgow University Oriental Society 16 (1955–56) 50-62. S. Wild, The Qu'ran as Text (1996).

G. D. NEWBY

R

RABANUS MAURUS (c. 780–856)

R. was educated and became a Benedictine monk at the important abbey of Fulda. He studied under ALCUIN at Tours, returning to Fulda to teach before Alcuin's death in 804. Ordained a priest in 814, he became abbot at Fulda in 822. His twenty years of leadership were marked by good administration, an increase in physical facilities, the founding of churches, the collection of relics, and the abbey's expanding role as an educational center. After retiring as abbot, R. was called back into administration in 847, when he was consecrated bishop of Mainz, a post he held until his death, Feb. 4, 856.

R. produced commentaries on most of the biblical books—the Heptateuch, Ruth, 1–2 Samuel, 1–2 Kings, 1–2 Chronicles, Esther, Judith, 1–4 Maccabees, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Proverbs, Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lamentations, Ezekiel, Daniel, Matthew, John, Acts, and the Pauline epistles—many dedicated to important political and ecclesiastical leaders, which ensured their circulation. Isaiah, Daniel, and John remain unprinted. R. drew upon the patristic sources that were available to him, especially JEROME, AUGUSTINE, BEDE, and GREGORY THE GREAT, and reported that he had produced a compilation of quotations on biblical passages by Gregory.

R.'s literary output was enormous. In additon to poetry and his De institutione clericorum (a manual for clergy in 3 books), two other works related to biblical interpretation should be noted. His encyclopedic work De rerum naturis (later referred to as De universo) parallels ISIDORE's Etymologies. Its twenty-two books cover a wide variety of learning and many subjects (most of R.'s material on the liberal arts was incorporated in book three of De institutione), but it is fundamentally a collection of excerpts with new allegorical and mystical interpretations supplied by R. The work was intended as a reference, especially for use in Scripture study. Allegoriae in universam sacram Scripturam is a collection of allegories derived from patristic biblical interpretations and writings.

Works: Opera (6 vols., ed. J. Pamelius, A. de Henin, and G. Colvenerius, 1626–27); PL 107-12; Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Epistolae 5 (ed. and tr. E. Dümmler, 1898) 379-533.

Bibliography: E. Dümmler, "Hrabanstudien," SPAW 54, 3 (1898) 124-43. J. B. Habiltzel, Hrabanus Maurus: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Exegese (Biblische Studien 11, 2, 1906). A. Hauck, RE[3] 8 (1900) 403-9. E. Heyse, Hrabanus Maurus' Enzyklopädie "De rerum naturis": Untersuchungen zu den Quellen und zur Methode der Kompilation (MBM 4, 1969). R. Kottje and H. Zimmermann (eds.), Hrabanus Maurus: Lehrer, Abt, und Bischof (AAWLM.G, Einzelveröffentlichung 4, 1982). F. Kunstmann, Hrabanus Magnentius Maurus: Eine historische Monographie (1841). W. L. W. Laistner, Thoughts and Letters in Western Europe, AD 500–900 (1957) 298-306. J. McCulloh, "Introduction," R. M. Martyrologium—de Computo (CCCM 44, 1979) xi-xxiv. R. E. McNally, The Bible in the Early Middle Ages (1959). E. A. Matter, "The Lamentations Commentaries of Hrabanus Maurus and Paschasius Radbertus," Traditio 38 (1982) 137-63; "Exegesis and Christian Education: The Carolingian Model," Schools of Thought in the Christian Tradition (ed. P. Henry, 1984) 90-105. H. Peltier, DTC 12, 2 (1937) 1601-620. J. Szövérffy, DMA 6 (1985) 306-8. W. Weber (ed.), R. M. in seiner Zeit, 780–1980 (1980). L. Wenger, "Hrabanus Maurus, Fulda, and Carolingian Spirituality" (diss., Harvard University, 1973). M. A. Zier, "The Medieval Latin Interpretation of Daniel: Antecedents to Andrew of St. Victor," RTAM 58 (1991) 48-78, esp. 54-62.

J. H. HAYES

RABBINIC BIBLE

At the end of 1517 the first edition of the Rabbinic Bible (RB) in four volumes edited by the convert Felix Pratensis (d. 1539) was published by the Christian publisher D. BOMBERG in Venice; the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and Megillot had been published at the end of 1516. (Since at least the nineteenth century the RB has been referred to as Miqra'ot Gedolot [see title page RB1808; photo EncJud 2, 783], although in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it was referred to as Miqra Gedola [MS Parma 130/7, f. 43b, dated 1573; Responsa of R. Jacob of the House of Levi, 1614, f. 56a] or 'Arba Ve' Esrim Gadol [title page RB1548], i.e., a folio-size Bible.) Several features mark the originality and importance of this 1517 Bible edition. Compared to the more than sixty Bibles that were printed between 1477 and 1517 (mostly parts of the Bible, some with a commentary and/or a Targum; four or five complete editions with text alone), RB1517 was the first complete Bible edition to include at least one commentary and an Aramaic TARGUM (excluding Daniel, Ezra–Nehemiah, and 1–2 Chronicles) on every book. Many of these commentaries and Targums, including (at the end of vol. 4) the Jerusalem Targum to the Pentateuch and the Second Targum to Esther, were printed here for the first time.

RB1517 was, in fact, the first printed edition of the HB. Unlike his predecessors, Pratensis did not simply copy the manuscripts before him. Rather, as befitting a humanist, he gathered several manuscripts for use in determining the Bible text, including vocalization and accentuation. For the first time in any printed Bible, he noted in the margins variants that he found in the manuscripts (variants in plene-defective spelling, variants in vocalization and accentuation, and other textual variants), beginning with Joshua (excluding five cases in Genesis and one in Deuteronomy). Unlike his predecessors, who printed the ketiv in cases of "qeri and ketiv" with the vocalization of the qeri, Pratensis was the first to include also the qeri in the margin.

In an appendix to the edition, he was the first to print A. BEN ASHER's Sha' ar Diqduqei Ha-Teamim as well as two non-Masoretic treatises, all three based on a faulty manuscript (MS Berne Burgerbibliotek 419, as shown by A. Dotan), which he, together with the Venetian rabbis, tried to correct (not altogether successfully). This manuscript also served as the basis for the massorah magna lists he was the first to print, along with a list of the variants between Ben Asher and BEN NAPHTALI in the Pentateuch and the Megillot (this latter list was useless because it lacked the vocalization and accentuation in all the examples).

In spite of the understandable pride in this edition noted by Bomberg and Pratensis (the former, in the colophon to the edition; the latter, in his dedication to Pope Leo X on the verso of the title page in some copies), only eight years later Bomberg made the effort to hire another editor and publish a new edition of the RB, also in four folio volumes (c. August–October 1525). To understand this unusual decision to not simply publish a second print of RB1517, we must first consider JACOB BEN ḤAYYIM IBN ADONIYAHU, the editor of the second RB, who convinced Bomberg to invest in a new edition. His motivation was twofold: He wanted to edit the Masorah for publication, and he felt that RB1517—contrary to the judgment of its publisher and editor—did not restore the Bible text to its original splendor. Therefore, unlike editions of other works that Bomberg had printed, RB1517 could not serve as an exemplary edition.

Ben Ḥayyim's interest in the Masorah stemmed from his learning in TALMUD, Halakhah, and KABBALAH. From his predecessors in these disciplines he had learned of the great value of the Masorah as guardian of the Bible text and as a source for homiletical explanations. Seeing that his contemporaries, including various scholars, neglected the Masorah and that it was "almost forgotten and lost," Ben Ḥayyim wanted to restore its importance. He therefore convinced Bomberg—as explicitly stated in the RB1525 introduction—of the great value of the Masorah and spared no effort in preparing it for print.

Ben Ḥayyim valued the work of the Masoretes, especially in the light of his kabbalistic outlook: The Masoretes preserved the text of the Pentateuch and thereby preserved "the divine edifice hewn with the name of God." Indeed, Ben Ḥayyim valued the correct text of the Bible in its entirety, for it serves as the basis for kabbalistic mysteries (e.g., he noted in the introduction to RB1525 that the qeri and ketiv system refers to mysteries of the Torah). In some unusual comments in the massorah parva and massorah magna in RB1525, he expanded the concept to include vocalization and accentuation, explaining—by allusion only—unusual vocalization or accentuation according to the Kabbalah, specifically following the Zohar. His kabbalistic conception of the Torah and of the work of the Masoretes can be seen in his unique note in the massorah magna of RB1525 (Exod 10:5), where he chose between two conflicting Masorahs concerning plene-defective spelling on the basis of a kabbalistic explanation.

It appears that in convincing Bomberg to print the Masorah Ben Ḥayyim also explained to the publisher the value of the Masorah according to Kabbalah. In those days kabbalistic studies were popular among various Christian Hebraists. Bomberg was aware of this enthusiasm and, indeed, explicitly said in his Latin introduction to the Miqneh Avram of R. Abraham de Balmes—published at Bomberg's press in 1523—that he wanted to publish kabbalistic books, which were important to every Christian. (Similar thoughts were already expressed in the Pratensis-Bomberg Apr. 23, 1515, request to the Venetian authorities for exclusive rights to print Pratensis's Latin translation of kabbalistic works as well as the RB in Venice.) Thus Ben Ḥayyim's kabbalistic reasoning did not fall on deaf ears.

The second reason for the publication of RB1525—Ben Ḥayyim's evaluation that RB1517 did not restore the Bible text to its original splendor—is not explicitly stated; however, it becomes apparent through a careful comparison of the two editions. RB1517 and RB1525 differ in four areas (aside from the number of commentaries): (1) unusual letters (puncta, suspensae, majuscular, etc.); (2) marking of the qeri and of the apparatus of the massorah parva in general; (3) the apparatus of the massorah magna and of the massorah finalis; and (4) the Bible text, its accentuation and vocalization. In the first three categories, although Pratensis made pioneering efforts, Ben Ḥayyim was more accurate and comprehensive in reflecting the Masorah. In the fourth category, a comparison of the text in Genesis, Joshua, and Proverbs in both editions and of the vocalization and accentuation of the first four chapters of these books shows that these editions differ regarding the text (mostly plene-defective spellings) as well as the vocalization and accentuation (mostly concerning ga'ayot, the sign for the qamaṣ qatan [Pratensis with qamaṣ and shewa], and variants in accents). Projecting the results for the entire Bible, one can estimate that the editions differ in about one percent of the text and in about one percent of the biblical accents and vocalization. These results allow us to deduce that the editor of RB1525 thought that RB1517 was faulty not only in matters of Masorah but also in matters of unusual letters, biblical text, and accents and vocalization. We can assume that Ben Ḥayyim persuaded Bomberg that there was a need to correct these other faults and to publish a new edition of the RB based on accurate biblical manuscripts accompanied by Masorah. Ben Ḥayyim was not proposing just to supplement RB1517 but, rather, to make all the necessary corrections.

An analysis of Ben Ḥayyim's introduction to RB1525, which was the first printed work devoted entirely to Masoretic topics (qeri and ketiv; variants between the Masorah and the Talmud concerning the biblical text; tiqqun soferim and itur soferim; the value of the Masorah as guardian of the Bible text and as a basis for derashot) as well as its influence on Ben Ḥayyim's contemporaries and on the following generations can be found in J. Penkower's study (1982). The latter also contains a detailed analysis of Ben Ḥayyim's conception of the biblical text and of the Masorah, based on his numerous notes throughout RB1525 in the massorah parva, massorah magna, and massorah finalis, which deal with the conflicts in the sources at his disposal. Furthermore, an analysis of Ben Ḥayyim as editor of RB1525 is undertaken there, based on several types of conflicts within RB1525 (not noted by Ben Ḥayyim).

A comparison of the textual, vocalization, and accentuation variants between RB1517 and RB1525, noted above with the accurate Tiberian manuscripts, Spanish manuscripts, and Ashkenazi manuscripts (the latter are farthest from the accurate Tiberian manuscripts, differing widely, especially regarding plene-defective spellings) yields the following results (for further details, see Penkower). Both RB1517 and RB1525 are essentially based on what have been identified as "accurate Spanish manuscripts" (fairly close to the accurate Tiberian manuscripts, although there exist a certain number of variants between them, mostly in plene-defective spelling; these variants are apparently no more than 1 percent of the text). However, in editing RB1517 Pratensis did not follow these manuscripts exclusively. Rather, he chose to include several phenomena based on Ashkenazi sources, e.g., a subsystem of accentuation in Proverbs (and Psalms); the systematic marking of "light" ga'ayot, including in the Hagiographa; the marking of qamaṣ qatan with qamaṣ and shewa; and the vocalizing of bin-Nun with dagesh in the first letter of the second word. Similarly, RB1517 contains a group of twenty-four textual variants in Joshua (non–plene-defective variants) based on Ashkenazi sources. Pratensis thought he was restoring the text to its correct state in all matters—text, vocalization, accentuation, and ga'ayot. In fact, his edition was a new hybrid not found in the manuscripts. Ben Ḥayyim, on the other hand, relied on accurate Spanish manuscripts in all their details—text (though there is some sporadic influence from other types), vocalization, and accentuation—in order to achieve a correct edition of the Bible. In matters of ga'ayot in the Pentateuch and the Prophets, however, he relied on RB1517, even though this disagreed with the accurate manuscripts. In the Hagiographa, he reverted to his original procedure and relied on the Spanish manuscripts concerning ga'ayot as well.

RB1525 became the standard for generations and was regarded as the textus receptus. When there was a renewed demand for the RB, a new edition was not undertaken. Rather, additional printings of RB1525 were published, sometimes with the addition of a commentary and sometimes with corrections concerning the Masorah. Thus, we find RB1548 (Bomberg); RB1568 (G. Di Gara [fl. 1564–1610]); RB1617–18 (Braggadin, Venice; corrected by R. Leon de Modena [1571–1648]); and RB1618–19 (L. König, Basel; corrected by J. Buxtorf). The position achieved by Ben Ḥayyim's RB can further be seen by the fact that RB1548 was the Bible held up to scrutiny by the two Bible text critics (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM) R. Menaḥem di Lonzano ('Or Tora [1618]) and R. Yedidya Norẓi (Minḥat Shai [1626]). Later generations right into the twentieth century have continued to print the RB, often adding commentaries without attempting a major revision of the text and the Masorah. A reduced-size photo edition of RB1525 was published in Jerusalem in 1972 with an introduction by M. GOSHEN-GOTTSTEIN (note that the Jerusalem Targum at the end of vol. 1 actually comes from RB1548; Ibn Ezra's introduction to his commentary is missing at the beginning of vol. 1; at the beginning of vol. 2, pp. 5-6 should be placed after p. 18; at the end of vol. 2, the order should be: pp. 396, 398, 397 = 399 [2 Kgs 19:23*b*–20:11*a* is missing], 400).

A new edition of the Pentateuch with Targum and commentaries, Torat Ḥayyim, was published by M. Kook (7 vols., Jerusalem, 1986–93). This edition brings together several elements that had been published earlier separately: The Pentateuch text was edited anew (M. Breuer [c. 1992]) and is meant to reflect the Aleppo Codex and the manuscripts close to its tradition (though certain liberties were taken concerning vocalization and accentuation); Targum Onqelos was edited based on the Yemenite tradition (Y. Qapaḥ); and the commentaries were also edited anew (various editors). This edition, however, completely lacks the Masorah (even though it includes the medieval midrashic commentary of R. Meir of Rothenberg on the Masorah), one of the essential elements of the RB since 1525, and therefore should not be considered a classic RB.

Recently an entirely new edition of the RB has been planned, edited by M. Cohen of Bar-Ilan University. In this edition, the text and Masorah, which is explained in a separate apparatus, will be based on the Aleppo Codex—the most accurate of all Tiberian manuscripts (on the editorial policy concerning the parts missing in the Aleppo Codex see the introduction in the volume on Joshua [44-77] and in the volume on 1–2 Kings); and the Targum and commentaries (with punctuation and sources added) will be edited anew based on manuscripts. To date five volumes have appeared: Joshua and Judges (1992, with a detailed introduction by the editor); 1–2 Samuel (1993); 1–2 Kings (1995, with further introductory material); Isaiah (1996); and Genesis (vol. 1 to 25:18, 1997). Genesis (vol. 2) is now in press. When completed, the edition will also be available on CD ROM, allowing for searches on all its components.

Bibliography: M. Breuer, Masorah Magna to the Pentateuch (c. 1992). M. Cohen, Miqra'ot Gedolot Ha-Keter, Joshua and Judges (1992) 1-100 (Hebrew); 1 and 2 Kings (1995) 1-26 (Hebrew). J. S. Penkower, "Jacob ben Ḥayyim and the Rise of the Biblia Rabbinica" (diss., Hebrew University, 1982) Hebrew with extensive summary in English and detailed bibliography.

J. S. PENKOWER

RAD, GERHARD VON (1901–71)

Born Oct. 21, 1901, in Nuremburg, R. died Oct. 31, 1971, in Heidelberg. He studied theology at Erlangen and Tübingen (1921–25) and completed his doctorate at Erlangen (1928) and his habilitation at Leipzig (1930). He served as tutor at Erlangen (1929–30), as Dozent and as ausserordentlicher professor at Leipzig (1930–34), and as full professor at Jena (from 1934). On his return in 1945 from military service, including time served as a prisoner of war, he went first to Göttingen, then to Heidelberg (1949), where he became professor emeritus in 1967.

R.'s ecclesiastical home was Franconian-Bavarian Lutheranism; K. Heim (1874–1958) and P. Althaus (1888–1966) were the theological teachers who most influenced him. As a student he had read K. BARTH's Letter to the Romans as a new book; and Barth's thinking and works were a constant presence with him, especially as mediated by G. Merz (1892–1959). The German church's difficulties in the 1920s and the dangerous church struggle of the Hitler era pushed R. toward the HB. Isolated in Jena during the Third Reich in a theological faculty occupied primarily by "German Christians," R. served the Confessing Church through his exegesis of the HB among German congregations, traveling and lecturing extensively. Such exegesis and above all his preaching were the goal of his entire scholarly life's work.

R. received inspiration from his great teacher at Leipzig A. ALT and also profited from the works of M. NOTH, another of Alt's students and R.'s predecessor at Leipzig. R. was personally less attuned to the historical craft as practiced by Alt and Noth. Rather, his great charisma resulted from his ability to feel his way into the text with artistic power and thus bring it to life and allow it to speak, always in conjunction with the application of sound exegetical methods and in the framework of his comprehensive literary erudition. His greatest contribution was not so much his frequently controversial scholarly theses as his expectant approach to the texts. As an academic teacher, he understood himself as sharing this approach with his students, an attitude that can still be detected in his books. Thus it is no accident that his commentary on Genesis remains his most read book, having been shaped under the influence of his personal experiences during the war.

In his first publications R. sought the key to the important literary works of the HB. His 1929 dissertation grasped Deuteronomy as a unity impressed with the idea of the people of God. In his 1930 Habilitationschrift he maintained that the view of history in the chronicler's work derived more from DEUTERONOMISTIC historical writing than from the priestly document. In 1934 he described the design of salvation history in P (which he did not consider a literary unity) in the form of three concentric circles: the world circle, the Noah circle, and the Abrahamic circle. He dared at the same time to posit a surprisingly novel key to understanding the Hexateuch as a whole, offering a form-critical hypothesis (see FORM CRITICISM): In the beginning there had been the "small historical credo" of Deut 26:5-9 and related texts. The recitation of this credo at the feast of weeks, in combination with the recitation of the Sinai tradition at the feast of booths (Succoth), developed through numerous stages (the most important of which had been the writing down of the story in literary form by the Yahwist) and achieved its final form while retaining the decisive basic motifs preserved in the small historical credo. R. traced HB traditions back to cultic rites and institutions—in this he was influenced by S. MOWINCKEL—but he employed his own historical and form-critical ideas. Thus he derived the structure of Deuteronomy from the liturgy of the "covenant-renewal festival" of the "amphictyony," celebrated annually in Shechem (1947), and also interpreted "holy war in ancient Israel" as an institution of this amphictyony (1951).

In his culminating work, the two-volume OT Theology, R.'s goal was not the reconstruction of a historical or systematic synthesis (e.g., he denied a "center of the OT") but, rather, the retelling of the HB witnesses naturally, through critical reflection, in their theological dimension. In something of a contradiction to this intent, the first volume (1957) begins with "a history of Yahwism and of the sacral institutions in Israel in outline," which is extremely informative in terms of the state of contemporary research. After this introduction, "the theology of Israel's historical traditions" (the Hexateuch and the historical books) follows. A section on Psalms and Wisdom is subsumed under the heading "Israel before Yahweh (Israel's answer)." The second volume (1960) treating "the theology of Israel's prophetic traditions" separates these traditions with unexpected sharpness from the rest of the HB. However, the roots of the prophets in earlier traditions are strongly postulated in the first volume. The second volume concludes with a discussion of the relationship between the HB and the NT.

For most of his life R. had understood the HB primarily in terms of the traditions of history and cult. During the last years of his life he consciously applied himself to the correction of the one-sidedness of his earlier work by the study of Wisdom, which he had earlier considered a fringe phenomenon. His 1970 book surprised many scholars. Still, the fundamental problem that stood behind the rich and vital presentation of this thought-world was the one that had motivated R. in his work on the historical biblical witnesses and that had imprinted his entire theological existence: the relationship of faith to reality.

Works: Das Gottesvolk im Deuteronomium (BWANT 47, 1929); Das Geschichtsbild des chronistischen Werkes (BWANT 54, 1930); Die Priesterschrift im Hexateuch (BWANT 65, 1934); Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuch (BWANT 78, 1938; ET 1965); Mose (1940; ET 1959); Deuteronomium-Studien (FRLANT 58, 1947, 1948^2; ET, SBT 9, 1953); Das erste Buch Mose: Genesis (ATD 204, 1949–53, 1981^{11}; ET, OTL, 1972, 1976^2); Der heilige Krieg im alten Israel (1951, 1969^5; ET, Holy War in Ancient Israel [1991] with intro. by B. C. Ollenburger [1-33] and "War, Peace, and Justice in the HB: A Representative Bibliography," by J. E. Sanderson [135-66]); Theologie des Alten Testaments 1 (1957, 1982^8; ET 1962), 2 (1960, 1984^8; ET 1965); Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament (TBü 8, 1958, 1971^4); Das fünfte Buch Mose: Deuteronomium (ATD 8, 1964, 1968^2; ET, OTL, 1966); The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays (1965); Die Botschaft der Propheten (1967; ET, The Message of the Prophets [1968]); Weisheit in Israel (1970, 1985^3; ET, Wisdom in Israel [1972]); Das Opfer des Abraham (1971, 1976^2); Predigten (ed. U. von Rad, 1972); Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament 2 (TBü 48, ed. R. Smend, 1973); Predigt-Meditationen (1973; ET Biblical Interpretations in Preaching [1977]); Gottes Wirken in Israel: Vorträge zum Alten Testament (ed. O. H. Steck, 1974; ET, God at Work in Israel [1980]); Erinnerungen aus der Kriegsgefangeschaft Frühjahr 1945 (1976). For additional bibliography see K. von Rabenau, Probleme biblischer Theologie: G. R. zum 70. Geburstag (ed. H. W. Wolff, 1971) 665-81.

Bibliography: M. E. Andrew, "G. R.: A Personal Memoir," ExpTim 81 (1972) 296-300. F. Baumgärtel, "G. R.'s 'Theologie des Alten Testaments,' " TLZ 86 (1961) 801-16, 896-908. J. L. Crenshaw, Gerhard von Rad (Makers of the Modern Theological Mind, 1978); HHMBI, 526-31. G. H. Davies, "G. v. R.: OT Theology," Contemporary OT Theologians (ed. R. B. Laurin, 1970) 63-90. M. Honecker, "Zum Verständnis der Geschichte in G. R.s Theologie des alten Testaments," EvTh 23 (1963) 143-68. K. Koch, Tendenzen der Theologie im 20. Jahrhundert: Eine Geschichte in Porträts (ed. H. J. Schultz, 1966) 483-87. W. H. Schmidt, " 'Theologie des Alten Testaments' vor und nach G. R.," VF 17 (1972) 1-25. R. Smend, DATDJ, 226-54. D. C. Spriggs, Two OT Theologies: A Comparative Evaluation of the Contributions of Eichrodt and R. to Our Understanding of the Nature of OT Theology (1974). H. W. Wolff, "Gespräch mit G. R.," Probleme biblischer Theologie: G. R. zum 70. Geburtstag (1971) 648-58. H. W. Wolff, R. Rentorff, and W. Pannenberg, G. R.: Seine Bedeutung für die Theologie (1973). W. Zimmerli, "G. R., 'Theologie des Alten Testaments,' " VT 13 (1963) 100-111.

R. SMEND

RAHLFS, OTTO GUSTAV ALFRED (1865–1935)

Born in Linden, R. enrolled at Göttingen (1883), where, except for one semester in Halle, he remained all his life, serving successively as Privatdozent (1891), ausserordentlicher professor (1901), and full professor (1919). He studied oriental languages mainly under P. de LAGARDE, whose visionary program for restoring a prerecensional SEPTUAGINT (LXX) text became the central focus of R.'s academic life. After Lagarde's death in 1891 R. completed and saw through the press Lagarde's Septuaginta-Studien (vol. 2, 1892) and his Bibliothecae Syriacae a Paulo de Lagarde collectae (1892). R.'s own career as LXX scholar was firmly established by his Septuaginta-Studien (3 vols., 1904–11).

In 1908 on the insistence of R. SMEND and J. WELLHAUSEN, the Septuaginta-Unternehmen was established to promote LXX studies, with the end of producing critical texts with full apparatuses for all the books of the Greek HB. The formation and development of the Unternehmen was entrusted to R., who remained its director until shortly before his death.

R. collected photographs of LXX manuscripts in libraries throughout the world for eventual collation (the Unternehmen currently has an almost complete collection of photographs and microfilms of pre-Gutenberg LXX manuscripts) and catalogued extant manuscripts (including Catena manuscripts), which appeared as vol. 2 of the Mitteilungen des Septuaginta-Unternehmens (MSU) in 1914 and remains the basis for all work in LXX manuscripts.

World War I and the economic collapse in postwar Germany meant that instead of independent recollations of manuscripts R. prepared a small critical pocket edition of Ruth (1922) as well as of Genesis (1926), based on the collations of the Cambridge Septuagint. Psalmi cum Odis, which appeared as the first volume of the Göttingen Septuaginta, is based on a new collation of the older materials only; the work did not include a collation of hexaplaric materials.

The work for which R. is best known is his two-volume Handausgabe of the entire LXX, based almost exclusively on a collation of the old uncials—Vaticanus, Alexandrinus, and Sinaiticus—but embodying the careful and mature philological judgments of the major LXX scholar of the twentieth century. Only the volumes of the Göttingen Septuaginta, which without R.'s preparations would be unthinkable, purport to improve on his texts.

Works: Die Berliner-Handschrift des sahidischen Psalters herausgegeben (AGWG.PH, 1901); Septuaginta-Studien, vol. 1, Studien zu Königsbüchern (1904); vol. 2, Der Text des Septuaginta-Psalters (1907); vol. 3, Lucians Rezension der Königsbücher (1911); (with P. Glaue), "Fragmente einer grischisechen Übersetzung des samaritanischen Pentateuchs," MSU 1 (1911) 29-68; (with W. Gerhauser), "Münchener Septuaginta-Fragmente," MSU 1 (1913) 101-18; Verzeichnis der griechischen Handschriften des AT (MSU 2, 1914); "Die alttestamentlichen Lektionen der griechischen Kirche," MSU 1 (1915) 119-230; (with L. Lütkemann), "Hexaplarische Randnoten zu Isaias 1–16, aus einer Sinai-Handschrift," MSU 1 (1915) 231-386; "Über einige alttestamentliche Handschriften des Abessinierklosters S. Stefano zu Rom," MSU 3 (1918) 1-46; "Studie über den griechischen Text des Buches Ruth," MSU 3 (1922) 47-164; Das Buch Ruth griechische als Probe einer kritischen Handausgabe der Septuaginta (1922); Genesis, Septuaginta Societatis Scientiarum Gottingensis auctoritate edidit 1 (1926); "P. de Lagardes wissenschaftliches Lebenswerk im Rahmen einer Geschichte seines Lebens dargestellt," MSU 4 (1928) 1-98; Psalmi cum Odis, Septuaginta Societatis Scientarium Gottingensis auctoritate edidit 10 (1931); Septuaginta id est VT Graeca iuxta LXX interpretes edidit 2 (1935). For full biography see repr. of Septuaginta-Studient 1–3 (1965) 682-88.

Bibliography: W. Bauer, Nachrichten der Gesellschaft der Wissenschaft in Göttingen Jahresbericht (1935) 60-65 = Septuaginta-Studien 1–3 (1965) 11-16. J. Hempel, FuF 11 (1935) 192. G. Lüdemann and M. Schröder, Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule in Göttingen (1987) esp. 79-80.

J. W. WEVERS

RAINOLDS (or REYNOLDS), JOHN (1549–1607)

An English Bible translator, R. was born at Pinhoe, near Exeter, in 1549 and attended Merton College and Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he became a fellow. In 1593 he was made dean of Lincoln and in 1598 was elected president of Corpus. James I chose him to be one of the Puritan participants in the Hampton Court Conference of 1604. and it was he who moved that there should be a new TRANSLATION of the Bible. The king favored the proposal; and work was begun on the translation, which came to be known as the Authorized (or King James) Version. The translators were divided into six companies, two at Oxford, two at Cambridge, and two at Westminster. R. was a member of the Oxford company that translated the HB, beginning with Isaiah and ending with Malachi. He seems to have been the dominant member of his company until his death, by which time most of its work was done. He died May 21, 1607, four years before the AV appeared in print.

Bibliography: T. Fowler, DNB 47 (1896) 180-82; University of Oxford, College Histories: Corpus Christi (1898). T. Fuller, The Church History of Britain 3 (new ed. 1837) 172, 182-83, 230-31. O. S. Opfell, The King James Bible Translators (1982). G. S. Paine, The Learned Men (1959). A. à Wood, Athenae Oxonienses 2 (new ed. 1815) 12-19.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

RAMSAY, WILLIAM MITCHELL (1851–1939)

Born in Glasgow, Scotland, Mar. 15, 1851, R. attended the University of Aberdeen and St. John's College, Oxford, where he studied classics and humanities. He spent the summer of 1874 at Göttingen studying Sanskrit. Elected a fellow successively of Exeter (1882) and Lincoln (1885) colleges, he served as Regius Professor of Humanities at Aberdeen from 1886 until his retirement in 1911. As a student he traveled in Greece and in Asia Minor (1880), which became the focus of his lifetime work; throughout his career he visited and worked extensively there. He delivered the Gifford lectures at Edinburgh in 1915–16 (published in 1927) and authored numerous articles for HASTINGS's Dictionary of the Bible. He died at Bournemouth, Apr. 20, 1939.

R.'s interests were the topography, geography, inscriptions, and overall history of Asia Minor in the Roman period and their relationship to early church history. His knowledge of the region was without peer, and his lasting contribution to NT studies lies in the coordination of his research with biblical interpretation of texts related to the early church in Asia Minor. Through studies on Luke he attempted to demonstrate that Luke was a reliable and accurate historian. He also elucidated the work of PAUL through a study of the cities in which the apostle labored. R. was a strong advocate of the so-called South Galatian theory—namely, that Paul had addressed the letter to the Galatians to Christians living in southern Asia Minor rather than in the old northern province of Galatia. In his later works R. tended to become more extravagant in his claims regarding the trustworthiness of the NT writings.

Works: The Historical Geography of Asia Minor (1890); The Church in the Roman Empire Before AD 170 (1893); St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen (1895); The Cities and Bishoprics of Phyrgia (vol. 1, 2 pts., 1895–97); Was Christ Born at Bethelehem? A Study of the Credibility of St. Luke (1898); A Historical Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians (1899); Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia (1904); Pauline and Other Studies in Early Christian History (1906); The Cities of St. Paul: Their Influence on His Life and Thought (1907); Luke the Physician and Other Studies in the History of Religion (1908); Pictures of the Apostolic Church: Studies in the Book of Acts (1910); The Teaching of Paul in Terms of the Present Day (1913); The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the NT (1915); Asianic Elements in Greek Civilization (1927); The Social Basis of Roman Power in Asia Minor (ed. J. G. C. Anderson, 1941).

Bibliography: J. G. C. Anderson, DNB 1931–40 (1949) 727-28. W. H. Buckler and W. M. Calder (eds.), Anatolian Studies Presented to Sir W. M. R. (1923). W. W. Gasque, Sir W. M. R.: Archaeologist and NT Scholar (1966) with bibliography of R.'s works, 86-91; A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (1975) esp. 136-43. W. F. Howard, "W. M. R.: Archaeologist and Historian," RelLife 8 (1939) 580-90 = his The Romance of NT Scholarship (1949) 138-55. S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the NT, 1861–1986 (1988) 151-57.

J. H. HAYES

RAMSEY, PAUL (1913–88)

Born in Mendenhall, Mississippi, R. graduated from Millsaps College (1935) and received the BD (1940) and PhD (1943) from Yale University. After brief teaching assignments at Millsaps, Garrett Biblical Institute, and Yale Divinity School, he joined the faculty of Princeton University in 1944. He was named Harrington Spear Paine Professor of Religion in 1957. One of the most influential theological ethicists in the United States in the period following WWII, R. remained at the forefront of debate concerning the most critical and complex moral issues of the day, including modern warfare, medical ethics, and genetic control over human reproduction.

The biblical notion of God's covenant with humanity provides the fundamental structure for R.'s interpretation of Christian ethics and for his concepts of human nature and of community. Human beings are created in and for covenant relationships with their fellow humans (1950): They are created for community based on "obedient love," which includes human justice (mišpāṭ) modeled after the righteousness of God (ṣedeq). Although the full meaning of the biblical concept of agape is disclosed in the life and teachings of JESUS, the idea itself is grounded in and informed by the fundamental biblical conceptions of the righteousness of God and the reign of God, both ultimately rooted in the covenant. For R., love is neighbor centered, primarily concerned with right relations (faithfulness, fidelity) among persons and only secondarily with the consequences of moral choices. In this respect R.'s ethic is basically deontological rather than teleological, especially in his later works (1967).

As the basic norm of Christian ethics, agape needs the resources of natural justice, particularly in the area of social policy. In all such relationships love remains sovereign and free, seeking to meet the needs of the neighbor through enlisting and transforming natural justice, not apart from it. Like the virtues of patience, kindness, and courage, justice based on reason and directed toward the neighbor is a form of neighbor-love.

R.'s attempt to relate the biblical concept of agape to problems in social ethics led in his later works to a shift from agape to covenant as the basic norm of Christian ethics. In The Patient as Person he appealed to covenant as the basis for the claims of faithfulness and fidelity implicit in the practice of medicine. Covenant is more precise than agape as a symbol of the relationship of individuals to community, and it provides a broader basis for moral discourse in a pluralistic society.

Works: Basic Christian Ethics (1950); War and the Christian Conscience (1961); Deeds and Rules in Christian Ethics (1967); The Just War: Force and Political Responsibility (1968); Fabricated Man (1970); The Patient as Person (1970); Ethics at the Edges of Life (1978).

Bibliography: D. Attwood, P. R.'s Political Ethics (1992). C. E. Curran, Politics, Medicine, and Christian Ethics: A Dialogue with P. R. (1973). E. C. Gardner, Christocentrism in Christian Social Ethics: A Depth Study of Eight Modern Protestants (1983). J. M. Gustafson, Ethics from a Theocentric Perspective 2 (1984). J. T. Johnson and D. H. Smith (eds.), Love and Society: Essays in the Ethics of P. R. (1974).

E. C. GARDNER

RAMUS, PETER (PIERRE DE LA RAMÉE) (1515–72)

R. was a French logician and philosopher whose reforms of logic and education sought an alternative to reigning scholastic methods. His career was marked by quarrels within the universities where he taught and throughout his tours of European centers of learning. By 1570 he had espoused Protestantism and adopted a modified form of Zwinglian theology. This faith endangered his position at the Collège de Presles and his regius professorship. His prominence in the university made him a target for the Parisian mob in search of victims when King Charles IX ordered the assassinations of French Protestant political leaders in the St. Bartholomew's Day massacre (Aug. 23, 1572). R. was seized while praying, shot, and stabbed, and his body was thrown into the Seine.

R. wanted to reorganize and reform dialectic and rhetoric in line with emerging sixteenth-century humanism. He is reputed to have defended the proposition "All that Aristotle taught is 'artificial' [commentitia]" for his master's thesis. Although the incident is false, it reflects his desire for education to be practical and directed away from the contemporary complicated Aristotelian logic.

R. simplified Aristotelian categories into "arguments" or "concepts." Logicians were to classify and arrange concepts so that they become understandable and memorable. "Method" meant the orderly presentation of a subject, most often in the form of dichotomies; a subject thus analyzed produced a visual skeletal blueprint resembling a branching tree, in which all elements were divided and subdivided, moving from general to particular. The alternative form of reasoning, the syllogism, was used heavily by Aristotelians but sparingly by Ramists, who instead stressed self-evidencing axioms, which they categorized according to method so the constitutive parts of any subject could be clearly seen.

Ramism was particularly useful to leading English Puritans, including W. PERKINS, W. Ames (1576–1633), G. Downame (d. 1634), J. Downame (d. 1652), W. Gouge (1578–1653), and J. Yates. Puritan Ramists used grammatical, rhetorical, and logical analysis for the "resolution" of Scripture passages. Placing texts in their biblical contexts, they defined words then "divided" the text by Ramist logic through definition, division, and classification from general to specific. This produced a Ramist chart with "branches" that served as "topics" or "commonplaces" to show quickly the text's lineaments and their interrelationships. Biblical interpretation could be eminently practical in drawing out both a text's theological and ethical meanings (application, use) along the usual lines of Ramist dichotomy of theory/practice or doctrine/life. This unified theology and ethics, thus fitting the pattern for Puritan "plain style preaching." Puritan Ramists believed that this method uncovered the mind of the Holy Spirit, which stood behind the texts of Scripture.

Works: Dialecticae institutiones (1543); Commentariorum de religione Christiana (1576); MSHH 13 (1730) 259-304 contains a full listing of R.'s fifty works.

Bibliography: D. K. McKim, Ramism in W. Perkins's Theology (1987). W. Ong, Ramus, Method, and the Decay of Dialogue: From the Art of Discourse to the Art of Reason (1958).

D. K. MCKIM

RASHI (RABBI SHELOMO BEN ISAAC) (1040–1105)

R. was born in Troyes, France, and completed solid Talmudic studies in the famous academies of Mayence and Worms. At the age of twenty-five he returned to Troyes, where he founded an important school. His disciples also began schools, and in time the academies of northern France exceeded in reputation those of the Rhine. R. died in Troyes, his last years saddened by illness and by the massacres perpetrated in several Jewish communities in Europe during the first crusade. His exegesis, reflected in commentaries on the TALMUD and the Bible, knew immediate and lasting success and is today still basic to Jewish studies of sacred texts.

Until the middle of the eleventh century, the teaching of the Bible in the Jewish schools of western Europe was almost exclusively based on the MIDRASH. At the beginning of the second half of the eleventh century, the Renaissance swept across Christian Europe affecting Jewish communities as well. The essential characteristic of this intellectual revival was the search for a suitable balance between the authority of tradition and the exigencies of reason. The young intellectuals of the time were no longer satisified with the old commentaries, which too often moved far away from the obvious sense of the sacred texts. Thus there simultaneously emerged among Christians and Jews a movement in exegesis that sought to emphasize the literal meaning of the Scripture without devaluing the traditional spiritual sense. For Christians, the school of St. Victor tackled this task; for Jews, the school of Rashi.

Another factor in the development of literal exegesis in the Middle Ages was the Judeo-Christian religious controversy. Christian scholars attempted to prove that the Christian faith and its dogmas were rooted in the text of the HB. Conversely, Jewish exegetes tried to show that a clear reading of these same texts dismissed all christological interpretation. It is against this historical background that one must examine R.'s exegetical work.

R. explained his method in his commentary on Gen 3:8: "The Midrashim are numerous. . . . As for me, I am only explaining peshuto shel mikra and introducing all Haggadah which illumines the words of the text and established the sense of it in a suitable manner." Peshuto shel mikra is the interpretation of difficult words, complicated grammatical forms, and dubious contructions of syntax. For this, R. drew from TARGUM Onkelos (e.g., on Gen 2:8; 18:15). All the same, he was inspired by the philological works of Menahem ben Saruk (10th cent.) and Dunash ben Labrat (10th cent.), e.g., on Gen 31:41-42 and Exod 28:28. Often he proposed a translation of Hebrew words in the French vernacular, e.g., Gen 1:2. The translation constitutes about one-fourth of the commentary, followed by an interpretation of the biblical message completely based on midrashic texts. R. proceeded in the following manner: First he worked out a very strict selection among the Midrashim according to criteria of literal exegesis, then he elaborated these Midrashim so as to develop a doctrine that could meet the needs of the times. His biblical exegesis is thus an exegesis of engagement. He believed the major direction of Scripture to be anthropocentric, not theocentric. "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18) is "the fundamental rule of the Torah." The primary goal of the Bible is didactic: to educate humankind in unpretentiousness, as when God, consulting the angels, said: "Let us make humankind in our image" (Gen 1:26) in spite of the theological danger of using the plural "let us make." R. joined midrashic and grammatical explanations in order to establish that Adam and Eve would sin after the birth of their children (on Gen 3:8; 4:1). In maintaining that the offspring of Adam were originally pure and that every man is alone responsible for his own behavior, R.'s commentary implicitly rejects the idea of original sin.

The didactic tendency of R.'s exegesis is expressed most clearly in his doctrine on angels. To combat this belief in the existence of intermediaries between God and humanity, R. retained from the various rabbinical traditions the one relating that the angels were created on the second day, which made it clear that God alone created the world. He stressed that angels acted only on behalf of God and often anonymously, even when speaking in the first person (on Gen 18:10; 19:13; 32:29).

Much of R.'s energy was focused on his commentary on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) rather than on any other book of the Bible. The impact this commentary had on Jewish communities throughout the diaspora and throughout the generations is well attested by the more than two hundred super-commentaries it generated, of which the most recent was published in 1988. Nevertheless, special note should be taken of R.'s commentaries on the Song of Songs and on the book of Psalms. His influence affected Christian exegesis as well; NICHOLAS OF LYRA (1279–1340), in particular, often referred to him.

The manuscripts and printed editions of R.'s commentaries contain many interpolations. However, the critical editions of A. Berliner (1866) and others constitute an important step toward the reconstruction of the original text, although more remains to be done in this area.

Works: Critical editions of R.'s commentaries include Pentateuch (ed. A. Berliner, 1866, 1905²; ed H. D. Shevel, 1981); Twelve Prophets, Isaiah, and the Psalms (ed. J. Maarsen, 1930, 1933, 1936); "Song of Songs," S. K. Mirsky's Jubilee Volume (ed. J. Rosenthal, 1958). ET of some of R.'s commentary may be found in R. on Genesis (L. Loewe, 1928); Pentateuch, with Targum Onkelos, Haphtaroth and Prayers for Sabbath, and R.'s Commentary (5 vols., tr. and annotated by M. Rosenbaum and A. M. Silberbmann, 1929–34); R. on Ezekiel xl-xlviii (ed. A. J. Levy, 1931); R.: Commentaries on the Pentateuch (selected and tr. C. Pearl, 1970); The Mystery of Creation According to R.: A New Translation and Interpretation of R. on Genesis I–VI (P. Doron, 1982).

Bibliography: M. Banitt, R.: Interpreter of the Biblical Letter (1985). B. J. Gelles, Peshat and Derash in the Exegesis of R. (1981). E. L. Greenstein, "Medieval Bible Commentaries," Back to the Sources: Reading the Classic Jewish Texts (ed. B. W. Holtz, 1984) 228-42. M. I. Gruber, R.'s Commentary on Psalms (SFSHJ 161, 1998). H. Hailperin, R. and the Christian Scholars (1963). S. Kamin, "R.'s Exegetical Categorization with Respect to the Distinction between Peshat and Derash," Immanuel 11 (1980) 16-32; R.'s Exegetical Categorization, with Respect to the Distinction Between Peshat and Derash (1986), Hebrew. M. Liber, Rashi (1905; ET 1906). A. Marx, "The Life and Work of R.," Texts and Studies 1 (ed. H. L. Ginsberg, 1941) 9-30. E. I. J. Rosenthal, "R. and the English Bible," BJRL 24 (1940) 138-67 = his Studia Semitica (1971) 1:56-85. E. Shereshevsky, R.: The Man and His World (1982). B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1984³). E. Touitou, "Concerning the Presumed Original Version of R.'s Commentary on the Pentateuch," Tarbiz 56 (1987) 211-42 (Hebrew).

E. TOUITOU

RATRAMNUS OF CORBIE (d. 868)

Involved in controversy over the Eucharist with PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS, R. was condemned for teaching a doctrine of double predestination in another contemporary controversy. He is the author of treatises rather than biblical commentary, but his use of scriptural and patristic authorities in support of his arguments exemplifies a technique that developed significantly among Carolingian authors.

Works: PL 121; "Treatise on the Nature of the Soul," Analecta Medievalia Namurcensia 2 (ed. C. Lambot, 1952).

Bibliography: T. R. Roberts, DMA 10 (1988) 261.

G. R. EVANS

RAWLINSON, ALFRED EDWARD JOHN (1884–1960)

A tutor at Keble College (1909) and Christ Church (1914), Oxford, and university lecturer (1927), archdeacon of Auckland (1929), and bishop of Derby (1936–59), R. was, prior to his elevation to high office and redirection to ecumenical affairs, among the ablest of the younger Anglican theologians of his day, contributing significantly to Foundations (1912), Essays Catholic and Critical (1926), Mysterium Christi (1930), and Essays on the Trinity and Incarnation (1928), which he also edited. As an intelligent traditionalist he was initially more impressed by Roman Catholic modernism than by liberal Protestantism. He wrote a series of short books (1915, 1918, 1922, 1924), but his serious biblical works are the Westminster Commentary on Mark (1925) and his Bampton lectures on NT christology (1926), the best British response to W. BOUSSET's Kyrios Christos.

Both of these latter works are models of sober exegesis backed by sound history-of-religions research (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE), guided by an admitted theological interest, and reverently written.

Works: "The Interpretation of Christ in the NT" and "The Principle of Authority," Foundations: A Statement of Christian Belief in Terms of Modern Thought (ed. B. H. Streeter et al., 1912) 147-210, 361-422; Dogma, Fact, and Experience (1915); Religious Reality: A Book for Men (1918); Catholicism with Freedom (1922); Authority and Freedom (1924); The Gospel According to St. Mark (1925); "Authority as a Ground of Belief," Essays Catholic and Critical (ed. E. G. Selwyn, 1926) 83-97; The NT Doctrine of the Christ (1926); "Hebraic Theism as Presupposed by the Christian Movement," Essays on the Trinity and the Incarnation (1928) 3-22.

R. MORGAN

RAWLINSON, GEORGE (1812–1902)

Brother of the distinguished soldier and orientalist, H. Rawlinson, R. was born in Oxfordshire and studied classics at Trinity College, Oxford (BA 1838; MA 1841). Ordained in the Anglican Church, he was named Camden Professor of Ancient History (1861). W. E. Gladstone secured his appointment as canon of Canterbury (1872), and in 1888 he received charge of the rectory of All Hallows, Lombard Street, which created a controversy, since he still held his post as canon of Canterbury. Consequently, he resigned his Oxford professorship.

R.'s academic career was devoted to the study of ancient history and to the defense of the historical reliability of the Bible. His survey of ancient Near Eastern history, The Five Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World (3 vols., 1862–67), and his work, The History of Herodotus (1858), were important contributions. Many of his other publications were summaries of information from science and history intended to verify the historical accuracy of Scripture. His first major publication of this sort was the 1859 Bampton lectures, in which he dealt with new archaeological discoveries in the Near East and which many regarded as his attempt to refute his "rationalist" colleagues at Oxford. The following year saw the publication of Essays and Reviews by some of his ideological opponents, to which R. responded with "On the Genuineness and Authenticity of the Pentateuch." Later, he wrote for Men of the Bible (volumes on Isaac and Jacob, Moses, the kings of Israel and Judah, and Ezra and Nehemiah) and Present Day Tracts series (The Antiquity of Man Historically Considered [1883]; The Early Prevalence of Monotheistic Beliefs [1883]; The Religious Teachings of the Sublime and Beautiful in Nature [1883]). In addition, he wrote for The Pulpit Commentary, the Speaker's Commentary, and Smith's Bible Dictionary.

R. set forth his convictions that (1) modern religious skepticism should be traced back to W. DE WETTE, D. F. STRAUSS, and other advocates of German "Noelogy"; (2) study of ancient history and the latest ancient Near Eastern ARCHAEOLOGY showed the biblical account of history to be entirely accurate; (3) it was likely that reliable, antediluvian documents lay behind Genesis; (4) the earliest human religion, monotheistic in nature and including expiatory sacrifice, gradually deteriorated into idolatry, except among the Hebrews; and (5) the priestly code of laws in the Pentateuch derived from Moses.

Works: The Historical Evidences of the Truth of the Scripture Records Stated Anew (1859); "On the Genuineness and Authenticity of the Pentateuch," Aids to Faith (ed. W. Thomson, 1861) 273-327; A Manual of Ancient History: From Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire (1869); "The Alleged Historical Difficulties of the OT and NT," Modern Scepticism: A Course of Lectures Delivered at the Request of the Christian Evidence Society (1871) 265-305; Historical Illustrations of the OT (1871); The Heathen World and St. Paul (1877); The Religions of the Ancient World, Including Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, Persia, India, Phoenicia, Etheria, Greece, and Rome (1882); Biblical Topography (1887); "Moses the Author of the Levitical Code of Laws," Lex Mosaica, or the Law of Moses and the Higher Criticism (ed. R. V. French, 1894) 21-52.

Bibliography: R. Bayne, DNB, 2nd sup. 3 (1912) 165-67.

M. P. GRAHAM

READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM

This approach views literature in terms of its readers and their values, attitudes, and responses, thus supplementing or displacing approaches to literature that focus on either the universe imitated in the work, the author, the original audience, or the work itself. The nature and role assigned the reader, however, vary according to the critical theory being used and the explicit or implicit worldview of which the theory is an integral part.

1. Factors in Reader-response Criticism. Developments in the critical theory of S. Fish illustrate reader-response criticism and introduce significant factors in this approach. The background for his work is New Criticism and its argument that only the text is stable, since the intentions of the author are unavailable and the responses of the reader are too variable. As Fish first focused the issue, the source of meaning has to be either the text or the reader; and since the temporal dimension of reading rather than the spatial form of the text is the essential factor in meaning, he argued in favor of the reader rather than the text.

In his early emphasis on the reader, Fish viewed the variability of readers' responses negatively, as did New Criticism. To maintain a concept of validity, he distinguished two levels of experience in reading—a level shared by all readers regardless of differences in education and culture and a secondary level that could be seen as a reaction (emotional or intellectual) to the experience of the primary level. For Fish, the proper practice of LITERARY criticism involved the suppression of the subjective and idiosyncratic in favor of the response shared by all readers.

From a later perspective, Fish acknowledged that the argument for a common reading experience required an object (the text) in relation to which readers' experiences could be seen as uniform. He was in reality retaining the most basic of new critical principles—the integrity of the text—in order to claim universality and objectivity for his method. The radical move away from new critical assumptions came when he discerned that literature is a conventional category dependent on subjective perception. This involves the denial of a basic or neutral language unrelated to perception and response. The conclusion is that "it is the reader who 'makes' literature." Fish qualifies this subjectivism by defining the reader as a member of a community that determines the attention given by the reader and the kind of literature made by the reader. "Thus the act of recognizing literature is not constrained by something in the text, nor does it issue from an independent and arbitrary will; rather, it proceeds from a collective decision as to what will count as literature, a decision that will be in force only so long as a community of readers or believers continues to abide by it" (1980, 11).

The later work of Fish redefines the activity of criticism as a matter of persuasion rather than of demonstration. The business of criticism is the determination of the perspective from which reading will proceed. This determination is not one that is made once and for all by some objective standard. The decision must be made and remade "whenever the interests and tacitly understood goals of one interpretive community replace or dislodge the interests and goals of another" (16).

2. Theoretical Context of Reader-response Criticism. Theoretical considerations enter most obviously when Fish questions the status of the knowledge involved in literature and the nature of the self or the subject in the reading process. A careful look at these considerations indicates that in reader-response criticism we do not have minor revisions of some previous system; in fact, a revolution is taking place. An indirect, but powerful, influence on this revolution is the philosophical questioning of the intrinsic limits of epistemology. The limits of knowledge have been emphasized in a dramatic fashion in the skeptical deconstruction associated with the name of J. Derrida and the failure to establish some final foundation for knowledge. Skepticism, however, is not the only possible conclusion. G. W. F. Hegel's (1770–1831) anti-foundational epistemology, for example, was accompanied by an attempt to justify knowledge in a non-linear, circular fashion through the relationship of the results obtained to the beginning point. This circular epistemology was expanded to include ontology. Thought is not sovereign; it is dependent on being. And this being against which thought is tested is being revealed in experience.

Reader-response criticism has been directly influenced by fields of study intimately related to both epistemology and TEXTUAL interpretation: HERMENEUTICS, STRUCTURALISM and post-structuralism, and phenomenology. Long before the advent of reader-response criticism, hermeneutics transformed the question of interpretation into the question of knowledge (How do we know?) and the question of being (What is the mode of being of that being who only exists through understanding?).

R. BULTMANN and the New Hermeneutic used the relationship between being, language, and humankind postulated by M. Heidegger. But the theological framework and the lack of an appropriate concept of language caused the New Hermeneutic to stagnate. Some forms of reader-response criticism, however, move back to Heidegger's idea that the understanding of a text does not simply involve the discovery of an inner meaning contained in the text but also that to understand a text is to unfold the possibility of being that is indicated by that text.

The structural tradition has also become important for reader-response criticism. French literary structuralism became popular in the 1960s and 1970s, with its emphasis on order and necessity rather than on human choice and freedom—factors emphasized by the existentialism that was its background. In post-structural developments associated with Derrida, order is replaced with a radical disordering. The structural linguistics of Saussure, then, was used for both French structuralism's positivism and post-structuralism's emphasis on the differential nature of meaning and the continual deferring of any final meaning.

The opposition between French structuralism and post-structuralism or deconstruction was actually mediated in the application of structuralism to literary study prior to French structuralism. By the late 1920s, Russian formalism as a whole had integrated the structural view of a work with history and with the individual. The structural view of the literary work as an organized whole influenced the way culture and the individual were related to the literary work by such scholars as J. Tynjanov (1894–1943) and J. Mukarovsky (20th cent.). Tynjanov viewed literature as a system standing in correlation with other systems that define literature. Literature in general and also specific works of literature, therefore, are influenced by changes in culture. The individual was first seen by Tynjanov and Mukarovsky as defined by culture, but Mukarovsky eventually shifted attention from impersonal cultural codes to human beings as the subject and ultimate source of aesthetic interaction. The individual is then seen as the crucial aspect of aesthetic interaction; no longer an irrelevant individual superimposing private associations on a social meaning, the reader is an active force indispensable to meaning from the beginning.

The phenomenological tradition conceives of the literary work of art in such a way as to emphasize the role of the reader. In the phenomenological approach of R. Ingarden (1920–), the work of art is distinguished from the work as an aesthetic object that is constituted or concretized through the intentional act of reading. The complexity of a literary work and its apprehension are such that the reader cannot give himself or herself equally to all the components of the total apprehension. Only a few of the multiplicity of experienced and interwoven acts become central, while the rest are only co-experienced. This means that there is constant change with regard to which component acts are central at any particular moment. The same literary work is apprehended, then, in a variety of changing aspects.

3. Varieties of Reader-response Criticism. The pluralism of contemporary reader-response theory results from the lack of domination of any one worldview and critical theory. The various methodologies depend on views taken of language, self, world, text, and meaning and the relationships between all of these and other factors. Moreover, no one tradition is "pure," for wave after wave of influence has swept over literary criticism; and criticism has responded in different ways.

a. The autonomous reader. Although the concept of an autonomous reader determining the meaning of an autonomous text has been severely relativized, this conventional critical approach has not been completely displaced. "Post-modern" approaches (including radical reader-response approaches) are still dependent on the "modern" critical model.

b. The implied reader. The concept of implied reader does not really move away from the text and the author as the source of meaning. W. Booth speaks of implied authors and readers as rhetorical devices of the actual author that are to be discerned by the reader on the basis of such elements as the explicit commentary of the narrator, the kind of tale being told by the author, the meanings that can be extracted, and the moral and emotional content of the characters' actions. The goal of a real reader is to become the implied reader and to find the implied author.

c. Reader-reception criticism. The history of readers' reception is the concern of H. Jauss (1982). This approach attempts to situate a literary work within the cultural context of its production and then to explore the shifting relations between this context and the changing contexts of historical readers. The work of Jauss is an attempt to rehabilitate literary history in the tradition of Mukarovsky, and Jauss is credited with making the reader a central factor in the study of literature in West Germany.

d. Aesthetic-response criticism. W. Iser (1978), a colleague of Jauss at the University of Constance, has emphasized the process by which a reader actualizes a text. Iser's work falls within the hermeneutical tradition but more directly within the phenomenological tradition of Ingarden. Iser is not concerned with Jauss's goal of formulating "a theory of the aesthetics of reception" arising from the history of the readers' judgments but with the formulation of "a theory of aesthetic response" that "has its roots in the text" (1978, x). Iser makes the "gaps" and their completion by the reader a central factor in literary communication. A text is seen as a system of processes whereby language is broken up and reconstituted. This process is marked by gaps that must be completed and blanks that must be filled in. Communication begins when the reader fills in the blanks and bridges the gaps.

e. Psychological approaches. Psychological approaches to the reader emphasize the stages of development of individual readers or (as in the case of N. Holland [1973]) the role played by the "psychological set" of readers. In an early period Holland saw the literary text as providing readers with a fantasy that they introjected and experienced as their own, supplying their own associations to it. In a later period he acknowledged the limitations of viewing the literary text as an embodiment of the psychological process and moved to a description of the interdynamics of the reading experience on the basis of the four principles of expectation, defense, fantasy, and transformation.

f. Radical views of reader-response. Radical reader-response approaches see the result of reading, not in terms of interpretation or the specification of meaning, but in terms of an effect on the reader. This is visualized in different ways. J. Culler (1982), for example, suggests that the process of reading shows the reader the problems of his condition as maker and reader of signs and that this is the meaning of a work. Iser views the process of reading as the coming together of text and imagination in an experience of continual modification closely akin to our experience in life. Because of the nature of the process, the reality of the experience of reading illuminates the basic pattern of real experiences. G. Poulet (1977) emphasizes the achievement of self-transcendence. In reading, the object of the reader's thought is the thought of another; yet it is the reader who is the subject in the act of reading. The subject exists in the work. In reading, there is a movement beyond the objective elements of a work, with the purpose (or at least result) of elevating criticism "to the apprehension of a subjectivity without objectivity."

Radical reader-oriented approaches are foreign to the experience of historically oriented biblical critics because of different views of the use of language and of the nature of biblical literature. It is difficult to overcome this strangeness because conventional views of language and life reinforce one another. Both are governed by the Enlightenment model in which subject and object—humankind and nature—are distinct, with the subject—humankind—dominating. Language is a tool of reference used by humans, and the truth of the reference is validated by the human subject through establishment of correspondence between the statement and that to which it refers. In radical reader-response criticism the subject-object dichotomy is dissolved, the subject even becoming the object in the process of reading. This may be a return to an earlier view of language, in which humankind and nature were not separated but were united by a common power. In this view, language can affect nature. In reader-response criticism, of course, language is seen as affecting the reader rather than nature.

R. Fowler suggests that "in arguing for a temporal model of reading, rather than a spatial one, we are actually returning to an understanding of language that has affinities with the language of oral culture." Different modes of consciousness are involved. The spatial written word "constitutes a literate/visual mode of consciousness," while the temporal spoken word "constitutes an oral/aural mode" (1985, 20). This may not be the only or the best way to reimage the use of biblical language, but it supports the view that the nature and function of biblical language and literature must be reconsidered before reader-response criticism can have its fullest effect.

Bibliography: A. Bach, Women, Seduction, and Betrayal in Biblical Narrative (1997). The Bible and Culture Collective, "Reader-response Criticism," The Postmodern Bible (1995) 20-69. S. Brown, "Reader Response: Demythologizing the Text," NTS 34 (1988) 232-37. E. Cheney, She Can Read: Feminist Reading Strategies for Biblical Narrative (1996). D. J. A. Clines, Interested Parties: The Ideology of Writers and Readers of the HB (GCT 1, 1995). J. D. Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982). J. A. Darr, On Character Building: The Reader and the Rhetoric of Characterization in Luke–Acts (1992) R. Detweiler (ed.), "Reader Response Approaches to Biblical and Secular Texts," Semeia 31 (1985). J. C. Exum, Plotted, Shot, and Painted: Cultural Representations of Biblical Women (JSOTSup 215, 1996). J. Fetterley, The Resisting Reader: A Feminist Approach to American Fiction (1978). S. Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). R. W. Fowler, "Who Is the 'Reader' in Reader Response Criticism?" Semeia 31 (1985) 5-23; Let the Reader Understand: Reader Response Criticism and the Gospel of Mark (1991). E. Freund, The Return of the Reader: Reader-response Criticism (1987). P. Harner, Relation Analysis of the Fourth Gospel: A Study in Reader-response Criticism (1993). N. N. Holland, Poems and Persons: An Introduction to the Psychoanalysis of Literature (1973). W. Iser, The Act of Reading: A Theory of Aesthetic Response (1978). H. R. Jauss, Towards an Aesthetic of Reception (1982). J. G. Lodge, Romans 9–11: A Reader-response Analysis (1996). E. V. McKnight, The Bible and the Reader: An Introduction to Literary Criticism (1985); Postmodern Use of the Bible: The Emergence of Reader-oriented Criticism (1988); "Reader-response Criticism," To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Application (ed. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes, 1993) 197-220. S. D. Moore, Literary Criticism and the Gospels: The Theoretical Challenge (1989); Let the Reader Understand: Reader Response Criticism and the Gospel of Mark (1991). G. Poulet, Entre Moi et Moi: Esai critiques sur la conscience (1977). T. Rockmore, Hegel's Circular Epistemology (1986). E. Struthers Malbon and E. V. Knight (eds.), The New Literary Criticism and the NT (1994). J. P. Tompkins (ed.), Reader-response Criticism: From Formalism to Post-structuralism (1980). R. C. Webber, Reader Response Analysis of the Epistle of James (1996).

E. V. MCKNIGHT

REDACTION CRITICISM, HEBREW BIBLE

Redaction criticism analyzes the techniques by which a redactor (or redactors) assembled, shaped, and supplemented preexistent materials to form a new work, seeking insight into the literary dynamics of the product. While LITERARY criticism focuses on documentary sources and FORM CRITICISM on oral genres, redaction criticism concentrates on the formation of the final text. Recognizing that a redactor may have had any number of written and oral sources, redaction criticism examines the redactor's creative role.

Although the term was coined only recently by an NT scholar (W. Marxsen, Der Evangelist Markus: Studien zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Evangeliums [FRLANT NS 49, 1954]), redaction criticism has significant antecedents in HB studies, reaching back at least to the observations of the medieval rabbinic scholars RASHI and A. IBN EZRA (11th and 12th cents., respectively) concerning late editorial activity in the Torah. A. MASIUS (Josuae imperatoris historia illustrata atque explicata [1574]) distinguished between the apparently older materials in the book of Joshua and the younger materials that frame them. He described a process of "compilation" and "redaction" by which Ezra combined these older "annals" and "diaries." A century later the Mennonite scholar A. van Dale (Dissertationes de Origine ac Progressu Idolatriae et superstitionum [1696] 685-88) hypothesized that the narrative and legal portions of the Torah were authored by Ezra and Moses respectively and that Ezra incorporated the Mosaic material into the narrative framework.

Methodologies and programs of inquiry in HB studies have generally been developed and sharpened first with regard to the Pentateuch. Classical PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM pursued earlier insights concerning the composite nature of the Torah and sought to identify and charac-terize these components. For the most part, eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Pentateuchal critics hoped that critical tools would enable them to strip accretions from the text, identify the ancient documentary witnesses to Israel's early history, and thus gain a historically reliable vantage point. Consequently, they did not credit the redactor(s) responsible for shaping the Pentateuch with any creative role. One notable exception, H. HUPFELD (Die Quellen der Genesis und die Art ihrer Zusammensetzung [1853]), prefigured the viewpoint of redaction criticism. Although his identification of three documentary sources for Genesis paralleled the emerging source-critical consensus in many respects, he also argued that these documents were not compiled in a purely mechanical fashion. Instead, they were skillfully harmonized according to a well-conceived plan in the service of an independent theological program.

Pentateuchal studies did not focus significantly on the assessment of the final shape of the Torah, however, until the middle of the twentieth century. Several calls went out in the 1920s and 1930s for a true history of HB literature that would overcome the deficits of source criticism's fragmentation of the text by attending to the constructive process of selection, arrangement, and supplementation that produced complete literary works (see, e.g., W. Staerk [1924]; O. Eissfeldt [1927, 1928]; J. Hempel [1930–34]; and H. Hertzberg [1936]).

The first extensive attempts at a new approach were made by G. von RAD (1938) and M. NOTH (1948). Both sought to understand how the authors of the final source documents shaped the traditions at their disposal. Von Rad was first to note that neither source nor form analysis had accounted for the organic structure and overall unity of the final form of the source documents. In order to examine these questions, he employed TRADITION criticism, an extension of the form-critical interest, to include the history of the combination of discrete traditions into lengthier blocks of material. Second, he noted the widespread occurrence of "brief historical creeds" throughout the Pentateuch and beyond, which he regarded as the simplest and most ancient forms of Israel's cultic confession of salvation history. Positing that this simplicity reflects a phase in the history of the cult when the various traditions concerning Israel's beginnings had not yet been systematically interrelated, he concluded that the Yahwist must be seen as a creative author/theologian who combined these originally distinct themes into a continuous history.

Although differing with von Rad on several details, Noth's 1948 study of the Pentateuch agreed that the authors of the source documents engaged in creative theological reflection. Indeed, theological creativity continued, in his view, in the combination of the source documents into the finished Pentateuch: "The juxtaposition of the two creation stories can be considered most readily as theologically significant. . . . These stories, by mutually supplementing one another, reach a new unity" (1948, 251).

In attempting to correct further the static viewpoint of the documentary hypothesis, a number of scholars have sought to address the question of the formation of the tradition from fresh redactional perspectives. F. WINNETT (1965) and J. Van Seters (1975) argued that the components of the Pentateuch may be described more accurately as redactional layers rather than as documentary sources, emphasizing the dynamic process of growth behind the final form. Similarly, H. Schmid (1976) argued that the so-called J material in the Pentateuch is not unified to the degree that might be expected of a single author but that it represents a layer of materials related to the deuteronomistic movement. R. Rendtorff (1976) argued that a number of tradition complexes (i.e., Genesis 1–11) with separate histories were combined by a Dtr redactor into the present Pentateuch. This line of inquiry has been continued by others (i.e., E. Blum, Die Komposition der Vätergeschichte [WMANT 57, 1984] and G. Rendsburg, The Redaction of Genesis [1988]).

With regard to the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), S. MOWINCKEL suggested as early as 1913 (similarly in 1933 and more systematically in 1946) a redactional model for understanding the formation of the prophetic corpus. He rejected Scandinavian tradition criticism, which regarded prophetic books as the product of verbatim oral transmission of prophetic preaching so that the documents virtually represented the ipsissima verba of the prophets. Rather, he envisioned a dynamic process of growth throughout a long period of oral transmission of prophetical sayings; the accretion of tradition complexes; and finally, the production of the extant prophetic books. Mowinckel's dynamic model of selection, reinterpretation, and redaction also questioned the "authentic/inauthentic" categories of earlier source analyses of the prophets. Like source criticism of the Pentateuch, such analyses had primarily sought to identify later glosses and insertions in order to reconstruct a pristine original. In place of this interest in originality, redaction critics after Mowinckel came to regard the prophetic books as testimony to a living tradition that continually actualizes the prophetic message (see W. Zimmerli [1979]; J. Jeremias [1983]; and M. Biddle [1990]).

Redactional studies of the prophets have continued to struggle with models of prophetic activity and with the formation of prophetic books. Representative studies include H. W. WOLFF's commentary on the book of Amos (1969), which posited a long process of growth, reception, reinterpretation, and actualization of the Amos tradition lasting into the postexilic period. The phenomenon of the Isaiah scroll is perhaps the most incontrovertible evidence of the capacity of prophetic traditions to generate new statements; consequently, it has lent itself to a number of redactional studies. O. KAISER (1963, 1973) subjected the book of Isaiah to a stringent redactional examination, rejecting any attempt to identify genuine texts in favor of a model of redactional composition by an Isaianic school. J. Vermeylen (Du prophète Isaïe à l'Apocalyptique [2 vols., EB, 1977–78]) identified successive redactions of the book of Isaiah, revealing the continuing interest of later eras in appropriating the message of the prophet. Several other scholars have pursued the question of prophetic books as archives of living traditions (e.g., P.-E. Bonnard, Le Second Isaïe [EB, 1972]; E. Sehmsdorf, "Studien zur Redaktionsgeschichte von Jes 56–66," ZAW 84 [1972] 517-76; B. Renaud, La formation du livre de Michee: Tradition et actualisation [1977]; R. Carroll, From Chaos to Covenant [1981]; Jeremiah: A Commentary [OTL, 1986]; W. Brueggemann, "Unity and Dynamic in the Isaiah Tradition," JSOT 29 [1984] 89-107; and J. Vermeylen [ed.], Le livre d'Isaïe [BETL 81, 1989]).

Such analyses of prophetic books have occasioned questions and criticism regarding the historical connections of later reinterpretation to the prophetic message. In response to J. Garscha (Studien zum Ezechielbuch [1974]), G. FOHRER (ZAW 87 [1975], 396) raised the objection, for example, that approaches that regard virtually an entire prophetic book as a redactional product are tantamount to assurances of inauthenticity. Some scholars have addressed this issue by questioning the fidelity of prophetic tradition to prophetic message. In an examination of the prose sermon material in the book of Jeremiah, material noted for its affinities with deuteronomisticism, E. Nicholson (1970) has emphasized, for example, the fact that the authors of this material were motivated to actualize faithfully the message of the prophet. The redactional process, the reapplication and restatement of the message given impetus by the prophet, ought not be considered a pious fiction, therefore, but a genuine expression of the prophetic message. From a different perspective, JEREMIAS in his Hosea commentary suggested that the very existence of certain prophetic books may best be attributed to the reception of the prophetic message by a first generation of tradents and redactors. If the prophets saw themselves as God's messengers in a specific context, interest in preserving this message in a more universally applicable form best explains the collection of the prophet's oracles. In Jeremias's view, then, no "authentic" form of certain prophetic books—in the sense in which source critics would have used the term—may have ever existed.

The historical books of the HB have also been a focus of redaction-critical studies. As von Rad did with respect to the Yahwist, Noth portrayed the deuteronomistic historian as an author/redactor who did not simply compile sources but who creatively selected and arranged materials and freely composed supplementary sections of the history. Although his characterization of the process as a creative endeavor and not simply as mechanical compilation has been widely accepted, Noth's suggestion that the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY is the work of one author/redactor has essentially been abandoned. A number of redaction critics have seen stylistic and, more significantly, IDEOLOGICAL and theological tensions as evidence for two or more redactions of the work (see von Rad; Wolff; R. Nelson [1981]; E. Jenni; A. Radjawane; M. Rose; and R. E. Friedman [1981]). Issues include (1) whether the deuteronomistic history is, as Noth argued, basically pessimistic with regard to a future for Israel after the fall of Jerusalem, or whether there are texts (from the hand of a later deuteronomist) that suggest the possibility of restoration, as von Rad, Wolff, and others suggest and (2) whether the books of Deuteronomy, Joshua, and Judges in particular ever existed apart from the deuteronomistic history as a whole, so that differing assessments of the monarchy in different sections of the history, for example, may be attributed to the sources instead of to multiple redactions.

Many other portions of the HB have been subjected to redactional analyses. The books of Chronicles theoretically offer a unique opportunity for redaction criticism in that the major documentary source of the chronicler, the deuteronomistic history, is also available to the modern critic, so that the chronicler's selection, arrangement, and correction may be assessed more transparently. There are, however, vexing questions regarding the text of 1–2 Samuel and 1–2 Kings available to the chronicler (W. Lemke, "The Synoptic Problem in the Chronicler's History," HTR [1965] 349-63) and the degree to which additions to the chronicler's history may be identified (W. Rudolph, Chronikbücher [HAT, 1955]; J. Botterweck, "Zur Eigenart der chronistischen Davidgeschichte," FS Viktor Christian [1956] 12-31). Redaction-critical studies have also been fruitfully undertaken for the book of Esther, extant in three clearly distinct editions (D. Clines, The Esther Scroll [JSOTSup 30, 1984]), Proverbs, Psalms, and Job.

Several issues face redaction criticism at this juncture. First, there is some disagreement among practitioners as to the proper scope of the method and the precise definition of the central term. R. Knierim (1985) has identified three basic approaches: One distinguishes between redactor and author in an approach resembling the classical distinction between original and secondary materials; another terms the penultimate operation "composition" and reserves "redaction" for the ultimate editorial procedure; and a third considers the entire history of a written text as successive phases of redaction. This disunity reflects more than terminological imprecision; it corresponds to various models of the process of literary fixation. No clear boundaries among redaction, composition, and tradition have been established; any solution must incorporate an awareness that the literary history of many HB texts seems to have been a truly fluid phenomenon. How does the reworking of documents differ from the reworking of oral traditions at the moment of literary fixation? Which stage of the process should be considered the basis for evaluating later additions/alterations/redactions? Is a text immune to the continued influence of the circle that produced and preserved it?

Second, recent advocates of newer methods informed by linguistics and literary theory have questioned the fruitfulness of diachronic investigation altogether. Reasserting the canonical priority of the final form, they have attempted to expose the ideology and subjectivity of any reading of a text. It remains to be seen whether redaction critics will champion the method's potential to combine diachronic and synchronic concerns. After all, redaction criticism was initiated in response to a perceived need to appreciate the text, not simply as a repository of older sources but also as a finished product. To deny the historical processes that produced the final text, however, is to force symphonic voices into unison.

A related third issue concerns how the questions of AUTHORITY, authenticity, and individual readings of texts are to be resolved. Newer methods often shift the locus of meaning even beyond the final form of the text to the reader (see READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM). Can the perspective of redaction criticism provide a means for appreciating the authority of tradition? The process of reception, reinterpretation, and actualization may not only provide a model for hermeneutical method (see HERMENEUTICS), but may also establish directions for contemporary interpretation. Redactors and tradents stood within received traditions. They did not offer replacements; they preserved, reinterpreted, and actualized traditions that were authoritative for them. Similarly, modern interpreters may reapply and actualize; but the basis for this activity remains the received tradition, including interpretive and intertextual movements (see INTERTEXTUALITY) contained within it.

Bibliography: G. W. Anderson (ed.), Tradition and Interpretation: Essays by Members of the Society for OT Study (1979). U. Becker, Richterzeit und Königtum: Redaktionsgeschichtliche Studien zum Richterbuch (BZAW 192, 1990). M. Biddle, A Redaction History of Jeremiah 2:1–4:2 (ATANT 47, 1990); Polyphony and Symphony in Prophetic Literature: Rereading Jeremiah 7–20 (SOTI 2, 1996). E. Blum, Studien zur Komposition des Pentateuch (BZAW 189, 1990). O. Eissfeldt, "Die kleinste literarische Einheit in den Erzählungsbüchern des AT," TBl 6 (1927) 333-37 = OT Essays (ed. D. C. Simpson, 1927) 85-93; "Text-, Stil-, und Literarkritik in den Samuelisbüchern," OLZ 31 (1928) 801-12. R. E. Friedman, The Exile and Biblical Narrative: The Formation of the Deuteronomistic and Priestly Works (HSM 22, 1981). M. Fox, The Redaction of the Books of Esther: On Reading Composite Texts (SBLMS 40, 1991). J. H. Hayes, An Introduction to OT Study (1979). J. Hempel, Die althebräische Literatur und ihr hellenistisch-jüdisches Nachleben (Handbuch der Literaturwissenschaft 21, 1930–34). H. W. Hertzberg, "Die Nachgeschichte alttestamentlicher Texte innerhalb des Alten Testaments," BZAW 66 (1936) 110-13. J. Jeremias, Der Prophet Hosea (ATD 24, 1, 1983). O. Kaiser, Isaiah 1–12 (1963, 1983[5]; ET, OTL, 1983); Isaiah 13–39 (1973, OTL 1974). R. Knierim, "Criticism of Literary Features: Form, Tradition, and Redaction," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 123-66. K. Koch, The Growth of the Biblical Tradition: The Form-critical Method (1967; ET 1969). H.-J. Kraus, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des Alten Testaments (1982[3]). S. McKenzie, The Trouble with Kings: The Composition of the Book of Kings in the Deuteronomistic History (VTSup 42, 1991). S. Mowinckel, Zur Komposition des Buches Jeremiah (1913); Die Komposition des Jesajabuches (AcOr 11, 1933); Prophecy and Tradition: The Prophetic Book in the Light of the Study of the Growth and History of the Tradition (1946). R. D. Nelson, The Double Redaction of the Deuteronomistic History (JSOTSup 18, 1981). E. Nicholson, Preaching to the Exiles: A Study of the Prose Tradition in the Book of Jeremiah (1970). J. Nogalski, Literary Precursors to the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217, 1993); Redactional Processes in the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 218, 1993). M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien (1943) = The Deuteronomistic History (JSOTSup 15, 1981) and The Chronicler's History (JSOTSup 50, 1987); A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (1948; ET 1972). G. von Rad, The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays (1938; ET 1966). R. Rendtorff, The Problem of the Process of Transmission in the Pentateuch (1976; ET, JSOTSup 89, 1990). H. H. Schmid, Der sogenannte Jahwist: Beobachtungen und Fragen zur Pentateuchforschung (1976). W. Staerk, "Zur alttestamentlichen Literarkritik," ZAW 42 (1924) 34-74. O. H. Steck, Gottesknecht und Zion: Gesammelte Aufsatze zu Deuterojesaja (FAT 4, 1992). W. Thiel, Die deuteronomistische Redaktion von Jeremia 1–25 (WMANT 41, 1973). R. Thompson, Moses and the Law in a Century of Criticism since Graf (VTSup 19, 1970). J. Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition (1975). P. Weimar, Untersuchungen zur Redaktionsgeschichte des Pentateuch (BZAW 122, 1971). J. Wharton, "Redaction Criticism, OT," IDBSup (1976) 729-32. F. V. Winnett, "Re-Examining the Foundations," JBL 84 (1965) 1-19. H. W. Wolff, Joel und Amos (1969; ET, Hermeneia, 1977); "The Kerygma of the Deuteronomic Historical Work," The Vitality of OT Traditions (ed. W. Brueggemann and H. W. Wolff [1975] 83-100 = ZAW 73 [1961] 171-86). W. Zimmerli, Ezekiel: A Commentary on the Prophet Ezekiel (1979; ET Hermeneia, 2 vols, 1979–83).

M. E. BIDDLE

REDACTION CRITICISM, NEW TESTAMENT

As a literary and historical method associated mainly with gospel research, redaction criticism is "concerned with the theological motivation of an author as revealed in the collection, arrangement, editing, and modification of traditional material and in the composition of new material or the creation of new forms within the traditions of early Christianity" (N. Perrin [1969] 1). The method has evolved to comprise distinct operations: collection of the editorial alterations of a tradition; attention to the literary context of every pericope, its immediate context as well as its location in the structure of a given Gospel; comparison of this context to that in other Gospels; attempts to define verses or whole pericopes that were "composed," i.e., written by the final author/redactor; and synthesis of these results with suggestions about the theological purpose of a given pericope or of the Gospel as a whole. Although admitting that much of the Gospel material may reflect the historical situation of JESUS' ministry as well as other situations in the early church (e.g., the delay of the parousia), redaction critics are primarily interested in the final shape of the material. Along with analysis of the text to uncover the literary activity of the final editors, redaction critics postulate theological reasons for this activity and suggest a community context for this theology (the Sitz-im-Leben of the Gospel).

1. Origin of the Method. From the 1920s until the mid-1950s, gospel research was dominated by FORM CRITICISM, the attempt to define the literary forms and shape of the traditions that were incorporated into the SYNOPTIC Gospels as well to suggest a social context (Sitz-im-Leben) for the origin and development of traditional material. The evangelists were seen primarily as collectors who arranged material with minimal editorial changes. Although R. BULTMANN (1921) spoke of the editing (Redaktion) and composition of traditional material and of the theological character of the Gospels, this theology was that of the tradition rather than a creative contribution of the evangelists.

The term Redaktionsgeschichte (lit., history of the editing) was first coined by W. Marxsen in a review of H. Conzelmann's Die Mitte der Zeit (1954; ET, The Theology of St. Luke [1960]) in Monatsschrift fur Pastoraltheologie 6 (1954) 254. Conzelmann's work, along with Marxsen's studies and the essays of G. BORNKAMM, G. Barth, and H.-J. Held (1960) are seminal works that initially defined the method and determined the shape of future research. In contrast to form criticism's interest in the pre-gospel tradition, these authors studied the alterations and arrangement of traditional material by the evangelists. Along with concern for the editing of traditional material, special attention was given to the arrangement or composition of material in a given Gospel, often called composition criticism. The term composition, however, became ambiguous, designating the arrangement of blocks of material as well as the writing of new material. As the method has evolved, redaction criticism has become an umbrella concept involving all the activities mentioned in PERRIN's definition.

2. Precursors of the Method. Study of the Gospels with concern for the theology of the final redaction and as an entree to the life of a community behind a specific Gospel, rather than as sources for the quest for the historical JESUS, has antecedents prior to the 1950s. In the nineteenth century F. C. BAUR sought the "tendency" of each Gospel and situated it within his developmental schema of early church history (Tendenzkritik). According to Baur, Mark was the latest of the synoptic Gospels and represented a synthesis of the Jewish Matthew with gentile Luke. While neither Baur's late dating of the Gospels (mid 2nd cent.) nor his theory of synoptic relationships has prevailed, the desire to correlate the theology of the Gospels with social, historical, and theological developments within early Christianity remains normative.

Three figures stand out in the early twentieth century. Against the background of the Markan hypothesis (i.e., Mark as a primitive Gospel that provides the best access to the Jesus of history), F. WREDE (1901) argued that the "Messianic secret" in Mark (i.e., places where Jesus enjoins silence about his mighty works or divine status, e.g., 1:34, 44; 3:12; 5:43; 7:36; 8:26; 9:9) was not historical but a Markan theological construct. Mark, according to Wrede, like the Gospel of John, belongs to the history of Christian dogma. In two insightful volumes (1903, 1905) J. WELLHAUSEN anticipated both form and redaction criticism, arguing that the sources of the Gospels were oral traditions that circulated in small units and that the combining of such material was the work of an author "with literary ambitions" (1905, 3). Although often overlooked in the history of redaction criticism, B. BACON, best known for his theory of the five-book structure of Matthew (1930), is a seminal figure. Under the strong influence of Baur, Bacon constructed an elaborate theory of sources for the Gospels and correlated these with other streams (e.g., Pauline and Petrine) in the development of early Christianity. He described his method as aetiological, i.e., "the effort retrospectively to account for and justify existing practice and beliefs" as reflected in the Gospel narratives (1910, 56). For Bacon, the pre-Gospel tradition consisted of "loosely connected anecdotes strung together for the purpose of explaining or defending beliefs and practices of the contemporary church" (see R. Harrisville [1976] 11).

These early attempts to take the gospel writers seriously as theologians concerned with problems of their communities were overshadowed by the rise of form criticism, by the ongoing quest for the historical Jesus, and by the rise of dialectical theology. However, such scholars as E. LOHMEYER (1936) and R. H. LIGHTFOOT (1934, 1938) continued to argue that on the basis of its topical and geographical references the Gospel of Mark embodied theological perspectives distinctive from the traditions received.

3. The Flowering of Redaction Criticism. In the mid-sixties when redaction criticism took hold, Perrin, one of its chief practitioners and chroniclers, described it as a "lusty infant" (1966, 298). It soon developed into the dominant method of Gospel research, with multiple contributions, and took on distinct emphases in different settings. German scholarship stressed the difference between tradition and redaction and the need to write a careful history of the tradition. At the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome, important studies appeared (see Q. Quesnell [1969]; W. Thompsom [1970]) focusing less on the distinction between tradition and redaction and more on the literary style and composition of a given Gospel. In North America early redaction-critical studies worked with the tradition/redaction model, but the method soon developed into full-scale LITERARY criticism (understood, not as source criticism, but as the application to biblical material of a wide variety of methods used by secular literary critics).

The synoptic Gospels became the major area for application of the method, yielding fruitful understandings of their distinctive theologies and communities. The synoptic evangelists were called theologians as readily as an earlier generation had so named PAUL and John. Each Gospel has a distinctive christology; important elements of the tradition, e.g., Jesus' proclamation of the kingdom and his summons to discipleship, are interpreted differently in each. Redaction criticism underscored the pluralism among and within the different communities that received the Gospels and, on the basis of evidence in the text, sketched out conflicts faced by them (see R. Brown [1979]; T. Weeden [1971]).

a. Redaction criticism of Q. Various attempts have been made to distinguish levels in the composition of Q, that collection of material, mostly sayings, shared by Matthew and Luke but not found in Mark, and to describe the groups or community that preserved and adapted it (see J. Kloppenborg [1984]; F. Neirynck [1982]). Although no consensus exists on the precise content or evolution of the traditions contained in Q, collections of wisdom sayings traceable to the historical Jesus are generally thought to have been supplemented by apocalyptic (see APOCALYPTICISM) and prophetic (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS) material. G. Theissen (1978) traced much of the Q material to the "Jesus movement," itinerant preachers who lived the radical life-style commended in many Q sayings (e.g., Luke 10:5-12). Such material was then supplemented by apocalyptic material in which the community expressed its hope of vindication by the returning Son of man. By incorporating this material into their Gospels, Matthew and Luke simultaneously preserved and reinterpreted the radical prophetic strain within early Christianity.

b. Redaction criticism of the Gospel of John. The Fourth Gospel also provided fertile ground for redaction criticism. Bultmann (1941; ET 1971) proposed that the evangelist incorporated and edited a "signs source" (behind the miracles of chaps. 1–12); "revelatory discourses," characterized by their poetic structure and GNOSTIC motifs (the core of which are found in such chapters as John 10, 15, and 17); and a "passion source" (John 18–20). The content and structure of the canonical Gospel is due to an "ecclesiastical redactor" who also added John 21 and select verses throughout (e.g., John 5:28-29; 6:51*c*-58). Although Bultmann's suggestions have rarely been accepted in toto, most subsequent studies are strongly influenced by them. R. Fortna (1979) and W. Nicol (1972) attempted further description of the signs source and its relation to the final text. W. Langbrandtner (1977) postulated an early Gnostic "foundation gospel" (Grundschrift) that was expanded by the redaction. There then emerged a "nearly hopeless disarray of proposals for what the tradition [behind the Gospel] was and how the evangelist employed it" (Kysar [1983] 315). Subsequent research attempted to trace the history of the JOHANNINE community without giving an exact description of sources and traditions. J. L. MARTYN (1968) argued that John produced a "two-level" drama in which much of the controversial material (e.g., John 9:1-40) reflects the separation of the community from Judaism toward the end of the first century. Brown pursued the same approach with an elaborate developmental schema of the Johannine community from its inception through the letters of John.

4. Assessing Redaction Criticism. Although dominant and fruitful, the method is attended with problems. When there is no clear document, as in the case of Q or the Johannine signs source, or no clear source for a given document (e.g., for Mark, according to the generally accepted two source theory, or for John), the separation of tradition from redaction is always problematic, as is the designation of a particular passage or literary technique as typical of the final redactor. R. Pesch, the author of a seminal work distinguishing tradition and redaction (1968), later criticized such attempts as arbitrary (TRev 72 [1976] 102) and proposed a radical composition criticism according to which virtually everything in Mark is tradition, with the theological creativity of the Evangelist discernible only in the arrangement (see Markusevangelium [HTKNT 2, 1, 2, 1976, 1977]). Likewise, ascribing a theological intention to an editor on the basis of literary phenomena is disputed and can be easily intertwined with the theological perspective of the interpreter.

From its origin, redaction criticism was a counter to the fragmentation of a text into traditional units to the detriment of a holistic look at the individual Gospels. It provided a way for both the specialist and lay readers to engage the text at hand. Although still an important method in NT study, other methods have developed from redaction criticism and taken on lives of their own. Concern for the text as a literary unit has spawned full-scale literary criticism, which embraces virtually every movement within secular literary criticism from the New Criticism to deconstructionism (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION). The other major transformation of redaction criticism has been in the direction of social analysis of NT documents, a natural outgrowth of interest in the community behind the given Gospel. Like its literary counterpart, it brought biblical scholarship into dialogue with other secular disciplines (sociology, cultural anthropology).

Redaction criticism continues to be enhanced by other emerging concerns of NT studies. In assessing the difference between tradition and redaction, more attention must be given to the manner in which ancient writers take over preexisting traditions. Such ancient historians as Thucydides and JOSEPHUS extensively rewrote their sources and traditions in their own style. In the absence of clear sources it is problematic whether the paring off of editorial accretions (as is still customary in much German redaction criticism) can ever disclose a "tradition." Renewed interest in the literary forms of antiquity (e.g., the chreia) and in ancient rhetoric will more accurately disclose the literary activity and social location of a given author. The diverse communities behind the Gospels will be better understood in light of the expansion of knowledge about the diversity within first-century Judaism both in Palestine and in the diaspora.

Bibliography: J. Ashton, Studying John: Approaches to the Fourth Gospel (1994). B. W. Bacon, The Beginnings of the Gospel Story (1909); "The Purpose of Mark's Gospel," JBL 29 (1910) 41-60; Is Mark a Roman Gospel? (1919); Studies in Matthew (1930). C. K. Barrett, Luke the Historian in Recent Study (1961). G. Bornkamm, G. Barth, and H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (1960; ET 1963). J. Becker, "Aus der Literatur zum Johannesevangelium (1978–80)," TRu 47 (1982) 279-301, 305-47; "Das Evangelium in Streit der Methoden (1980–84)," TRu 51 (1986) 1-78. F. Bovon, Luke the Theologian: Thirty-three Years of Research (1950–83) (1978; rev. ET 1987). R. E. Brown, The Community of the Beloved Disciple (1979). R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (1921; 1931²; ET of 1931² [1963]); Evangelium des Johannes (1941; ET 1971). H. Conzelmann, "Literaturbericht zu den Synoptischen Evangelien," TRu 37 (1972) 220-72; 43 (1978) 3-51, 321-27. N. A. Dahl, "Wellhausen on the NT," Semeia 25 (1982) 89-110. J. R. Donahue, "Redaction Criticism? Has the Hauptstrasse Become a Sackgasse?" The New Literary Criticism and the NT (ed. E. S. Malbon and E. McKnight, 1994) 27-57. J. Dewey, "Recent Studies on Mark," RStR 17 (1991) 12-16. J. Fitzmyer, The Gospel According to Luke I–IX (AB 28, 1981) 1-283 (extensive survey of all aspects of Lukan studies). R. Fortna, "Redaction Criticism, NT," IDBSup (1962) 733-34; The Gospel of Signs: A Reconstruction of the Narrative Source Underlying the Fourth Gospel (1979). D. Harrington, "Matthean Studies Since J. Rohde," Light of All Nations: Essays on the Church in NT Research (1982) 375-88; "A Map of Books on Mark (1975–84)," BTB 15 (1985) 12-16. R. A. Harrisville, B. W. Bacon: Pioneer in American Biblical Criticism (1976). S. Kealy, Mark's Gospel: A History of Its Interpretation from the Beginning Until 1979 (1982). J. Kloppenborg, "Tradition and Redaction in the Synoptic Sayings Source," CBQ 46 (1984) 34-62. R. Kysar, The Fourth Evangelist and His Gospel: An Examination of Contemporary Scholarship (1975); "The Gospel of John in Current Research," RStR 9 (1983) 314-23. W. Langbrandtner, Weltferner God oder Gott der Liebe: Der Ketzerstreit in der johanneischen Kirche (1977). R. H. Lightfoot, History and Interpretation in the Gospels (1934); Locality and Doctrine in the Gospels (1938). A. Lindemann, "Literaturbericht zu den Synoptischen Evangelien, 1978–83," TRu 49 (1984) 223-76; "Literaturbericht zu den Synoptischen Evangelien, 1984–91," TRu 59 (1994) 41-100, 113-85. E. Lohmeyer, Galiläa und Jerusalem (1936). J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (1968). W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist: Studies on the Redaction History of the Gospel (1956; ET 1969). J. L. Mays (ed.), Interpreting the Gospels (1981). F. Neirynck, "Recent Developments in the Study of Q and Q Bibliography," Logia: Les Paroles de Jesus—The Sayings of Jesus (Memorial J. Coppens, ed. J. Delobel, BETL 59, 1982) 29-75, 561-86; "Q Bibliography: Additional List," ETL 62 (1986) 157-65. W. Nicol, The Semeia in the Fourth Gospel: Tradition and Redaction (1972). N. Perrin, "The Wredestrasse Becomes the Hauptstrasse," JR 46 (1966) 296-300; What Is Redaction Criticism? (1969). R. Pesch, Naherwartungen: Tradition und Redaktion in Mark 13 (1968). Q. Quesnell, The Mind of Mark: Interpretation and Method Through the Exegesis of Mark 6:52 (1969). V. Robbins, "Text and Context in Recent Studies of the Gospel of Mark," RStR 17 (1991) 16-23. J. Rohde, Rediscovering the Teaching of the Evangelists (1968). W. Schmithals, "Redaktionsgeschichte," TRE 10 (1982) 609-26. G. Sloyan, What Are They Saying About John? (1991). S. Smalley, "Redaction Criticism," NT Interpretation (ed. I. H. Marshall, 1977) 181-95. D. M. Smith, "Johannine Studies," The NT and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. E. J. Epp and G. W. MacRae, 1989) 271-76. G. Stanton, "The Origin and Purpose of Matthean Scholarship from 1945–80," ANRW II.25.3 (1984) 1889-1951. G. Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (1978). W. Thompson, Matthew's Advice to a Divided Community (1970). H. Thyen, "Aus der Literatur zum Johannesevangelium," TRu 39 (1974) 295-355; 42 (1977) 211-70; 43 (1978) 328-59; 44 (1979) 97-134. T. Weeden, Mark: Traditions in Conflict (1971). J. Wellhausen, Das Evangelium Marci (1903); Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (1905). W. Wrede, The Messianic Secret (1901; ET, 1971). H. Zimmermann, Neutestamentliche Methodenlehre (1978).

J. R. DONAHUE

REDPATH, HENRY ADENEY (1848–1908)

Born at Sydenham, England, June 19, 1848, R. was educated at Merchant Taylor's School and at Queen's College, Oxford (BA 1871; MA 1874; DLitt 1901). He was ordained deacon in 1872 and priest in 1874, served as vicar of Wolvercote (1880–83), rector of Holwell (1883–90), vicar of Sparsholt (1890–98), and rector of St. Dunstan in the East, London (1898–1908). He died Sept. 24, 1908.

From 1901 to 1905 R. was Grinfield Lecturer in the SEPTUAGINT at Oxford. His greatest claim to fame was his completion of the concordance to the Septuagint started by E. HATCH (1835–89). R.'s important work is encapsulated in the name by which this standard reference book is popularly known, "Hatch and Redpath." Hatch had gathered around him a group of scholars to work on the project under his direction. When he died in 1889 nearly half of the concordance had been compiled, but it was in need of revision. R. took over the work, which appeared in six fascicles between 1892 and 1897, and also produced a supplement, which appeared in two fascicles in 1902 and 1906. The first fascicle contained a concordance of Greek proper names, with Hebrew or Aramaic equivalents. The second fascicle contained a Greek-Hebrew concordance of Ecclesiasticus, the Hebrew of which had recently been discovered; a concordance of words from newly discovered hexaplaric fragments; and a Hebrew-Greek index to the entire concordance.

In 1905 R. published a study of Genesis that expressed his conservative stance and opposed the critical approach to the HB. His commentary on Ezekiel was an abler piece of work. Finally, he wrote Christ, the Fulfillment of Prophecy (1907), in which he encouraged Jews to recognize Christ as the fulfillment of HB prophecies.

Works: (with E. Hatch), A Concordance to the Septuagint and Other Greek Versions of the OT (3 vols., 1892–1906; 1998²); Modern Criticism and the Book of Genesis (1905, 1906²); Book of the Prophet Ezekiel (Westminster Commentaries, 1907); Christ, the Fulfillment of Prophecy (1907).

Bibliography: P.-M. Bogaert, DBSup 9 (1979) 1479–80. E. H. Pearce, DNB 2d. Supp. 3 (1912) 171. Who Was Who 1897–1915 (4th ed., 1953) 590.

J. DAY

REICKE, BO IVAR (1914–87)

Born in Stockholm, Sweden, July 31, 1914, R. studied Greek and history of religions at the University of Uppsala, completed a doctorate in theology (1946), and taught NT there (1946–53). He was professor of NT at the University of Basel (1953–84), editor of TZ (1955–79), and president of SNTS (1982). Although never an adherent of any school and known for his independent approach to issues, he embraced some of the ideas of such Scandinavian scholars as A. FRIDRICHSEN and S. MOWINCKEL, particularly on the role of oral tradition and the cultus in shaping the form and content of NT books. LUTHER was also a pervasive influence on his conviction that Christ formed the center of both testaments and that faith-inspired communities were responsible for the overall unity and diversity in the NT.

In Diakonie, Festfreude, und Zelos (1951) R. argued that the agape and the Eucharist were originally the same meal. He showed how the cluster of motifs that characterize the agape of the late first- to fourth-century Christian texts was also descriptive of HB Jewish festival and testamentary meals. Eucharistic texts in the NT are thus illuminated both by this Jewish context and by Hellenistic influences. In The NT Era: The World of the Bible from 500 BC to AD 100 (1965), R. demonstrated his mastery of ancient Near Eastern and Greco-Roman backgrounds in order to locate and nuance historical events and personages of the NT. This NT history is distinguished by the vast amount of Roman political and social history R. brought to bear on the exegesis of NT texts.

R.'s The Roots of the Synoptic Gospels (1986), one of the most extensive comparisons of all the SYNOPTIC traditions since that of B. STREETER, includes patristic evidence for the genetic relations of the Gospels. R. concluded that living oral traditions and smaller written traditions, rather than a strict literary dependence, are not only possible but are also the best historical and literary explanations for the parallels of the three Synoptics. Especially telling is the almost complete lack of parallel contexts for the common Q material and the linguistic divergencies within those parallels, both of which R. attributed to the two parallel and overlapping apostolic Aramaic- and Hellenist Greek-speaking communities in Jerusalem.

Works: The Disobedient Spirits and Christian Baptism: A Study of 1 Pet. III. 19 and Its Context (ASNU 13, 1946); The Jewish "Damascus Documents" and the NT (SymBU 6, 1946); Diakonie, Festfreude, und Zelos in Verbindung mit der altchristlichen Agapenfeier (AUU 5, 1951); Handskrifterna fran Qumran (SymBU 14, 1952); The Gospel of Luke (1962; ET 1964); The Epistle of James, Peter, and Jude (AB, 1964); The NT Era: The World of the Bible from 500 BC to AD 100 (1965; ET 1968); Luthers Thesen und Basler Buckdruck (1967); Die zehn Worte in Geschichte und Gegenwart: Zählung und Bedeutung der Gebote in den verschiedenen Konfessionen (BGBE 13, 1973); The Roots of the Synoptic Gospels (1986).

Bibliography: O. Cullmann, "Prof. B. R. zum Gedenken," Uni Nova 47 (1987) 17-18. L. Miller and B. Kaye (eds.), Good News in History: Essays in Honor of Prof. B. R. (1993). W. C. Weinrich (ed.), The NT Age: Essays in Honor of B. R. (2 vols., 1984), with bibliography to 1983.

D. P. MOESSNER

REIMARUS, HERMANN SAMUEL (1694–1768)

Born Dec. 22, 1694, in Hamburg, Germany, R. died there Mar. 1, 1768. He studied theology, philosophy, and ancient languages at Jena (1714–16) and Wittenberg (1716–19). Receiving his MA in 1716, he became an adjunct to the philosophical faculty at Wittenberg in 1719. During a study tour in England and Holland in 1720–21, he became acquainted with DEISM. From 1723 to 1727 he served as rector in Wismar; and after 1727 he was professor of Hebrew and oriental languages at the academic gymnasium in Hamburg, where he also lectured on philosophy, mathematics, and natural sciences. He was especially influenced by the philosophy of C. Wolff (1679–1754) with its correlation of revelation and reason, although he had not studied with Wolff.

R.'s biblical exegesis was closely tied to his religion-philosophical outlook. A lecture from his early years in Hamburg is still extant; written in line with the orthodox hermeneutica sacra, according to which there is a multiplicity of meanings within Scripture, it defends the NT interpretation of HB messianic prophecy (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) as fulfilled in JESUS. It is possible that at the time (1731) he had still not embraced Deism (P. Stemmer [1983]). Around 1736, however, he secretly began the preparatory work for his Apologie. Three later works written for a wide circle of readers demonstrate that R. was a champion of the cause of (reasonable-moral) natural religion (or, as the case may be, physico-theology): Die vornehmsten Wahrheiten (1754), Vernunftlehre (1756), and Betrachtungen (1760). In these publications he represented natural religion as sufficient in itself, though not in open opposition to Christian faith.

R. worked on the Apologie until shortly before his death, but its final recension was not printed in complete form until 1972. Excerpts from a now lost earlier version were published by G. LESSING as Fragmente eines Ungenannten (1774–78), unleashing the "fragment controversy," with the orthodox attack led primarily by Hamburg pastor J. M. Goeze (1717–86).

R.'s purpose in the Apologie can only be recognized in the final recension (used by D. F. Strauss). In part 1, proceeding from the tenets of reasonable religion ("a reasonable worship of God, and the practice of humanitarian love and virtue," 1:41), which are suppressed in Christianity (bk. 1, 1:65-180), R. sought to test the witnesses to revelation. His basic principle was that Scripture was "a human witness of a divine revelation. . . . Thus it must be tested according to the rules by which one examines the truth of a human witness" (1:74). His standards of critique were (a) the moral quality of the messengers; (b) the content of the teachings—"whatever contradicts itself or other obvious truths, particularly divine perfection and natural law, cannot be a divine revelation"—and their usefulness in promoting the perfectability of humankind and human happiness; and (c) the unbiased stance of the critic with regard to his ancestral religion (1:74-75). The rest of part 1 treats the HB, disqualifying the Hebrew patriarchs as messengers of the divine revelation on moral grounds, discarding miracles, dismissing the law as largely ceremonial, and raising questions about such ideas as inherited sin and the immortality of the soul.

Part 2 deals with the NT (bk. 1, 2:9-118). The most important principle is the fundamental distinction to be made between the teachings of Jesus and the teachings of the apostles (2:20-24). In Jesus' teachings one must differentiate between those that are valid for all people in general and those that conform to the Jewish religion (2:25-26). R. regards the first of these as superb. It is summed up in the call, "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand!" Jesus did not intend to teach supernatural secrets, but he besmirched his call by striving for a worldly messianic dominion (bk. 2, 2:119-76). Thus, when the apostles' hopes for such a dominion were disappointed, they bolstered their cause by preaching the alleged resurrection. This doctrine is nonetheless incapable of proof, not even from the HB, and the doctrine of Jesus' return is in the same category (bk. 3, 2:177-301). Thus the entire structure of apostolic teaching collapses.

Book 4 (2:303-420) treats the means by which early Christianity spread (enthusiasm, imminent expectation of the end, belief in miracles as well as "the fear of God, virtue, and charity"). Book 5 (2:421-520) deals with the Christian doctrinal system. Originally, the teaching of the apostles comprised only a single claim—Jesus is the Christ. Nevertheless, the later tendency to deify Jesus, compounded by greater inconsistency and vagueness in doctrine and by the incomplete regulation of external rules, left the apostles' successors much room for disorderly systems, errors, schisms, and quarrels. The Protestant system of theology with its doctrine of inherited sin is absurd, turning every moral principle on its head (2:451-75). Thus Protestantism is unworthy of a just and loving God (the exchange of the vicarious guilt of Adam for the vicarious atonement of Christ). For this reason, moreover, the understanding of salvation in more recent Christianity does not improve humanity; a more worthy image of God must stand in the background of a truly Christian religion of reason (2:475-520).

An appendix (2:521-85) treats the CANON of the NT. Here R. collected and presented all of the critical objections to the Gospels that were known at the time, sharply criticized the content of Pauline theology (see PAUL), and argued that the NT authors held only the HB to be canonical, not their own writings.

R. brought together the most comprehensive compendium available of contemporaneous biblical criticism. He was the first scholar to formulate clearly the principle of the humanity of the Bible and to distinguish between the teachings of Jesus and those of his disciples. Ironically, however, he juxtaposed to orthodox dogmatics a system of moral, reasonable religion that was just as inflexible and lacking in history as the one he opposed. Methodological advances are interwoven in R.'s work with crass misjudgments of substance. The essence of the biblical message was foreign to him.

Works: Vorrede zur Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes (facsmilie repr., 1967); Fragments (ed. with intro., C. T. Talbert, 1970); The Goal of Jesus and His Disciples (tr. with intro., G. W. Buchanan, 1970); Apologie, oder, Schutzschrift für die vernünftigen Verehrer Gottes (2 vols., ed. G. Alexander, 1972); Die Vernunftlehre (ed. F. Lötzsch, 1979); Allgemeine Betrachtungen über die Triebe der Thiere, hauptsächlich über ihre Kunst-Triebe (2 vols., ed. J. von Kempski, 1982); Vindicatio dictorum Veteris Testamenti in Novo allegatorum (ed. P. Stemmer, 1983); Die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der natürlichen Religion (2 vols., ed. G. Gawlick, 1985).

Bibliography: G. Alexander, "Neue Erkenntnisse zur 'Apologie' von H. S. R.," Zeitschrift für Hamburgische Geschichte 65 (1979) 145-59. W. Alter and L. Borinski (eds.), Logik im Zeitalter der Aufklärung: Studien zur "Vernunftlehre" von H. S. R. (1980). C. Brown, HHMBI, 346-49. G. Gawlick, "R., Religionskritik, und Religiosität in der deutschen Aufklärung," WSA 11 (1989) 43-54. W. Gericke, "Zur theologischen Entwicklung von H. S. R.," TLZ 114 (1989) 859-62. H. J. de Jonge, "The Loss of Faith in the Historicity of the Gospels: H. S. R. (c. 1750) on John and the Synoptics," BETL 101 (1992) 409-21. R. Lachner, BBKL 7 (1994) 1514-20. M. H. de Lang, "J. Toland en H. S. R. over de wonderen in het Oude Testament," NedThT 46 (1992) 1-9. J. A. H. Schetelig (ed.), Auktionskatalog der Bibliothek von H. S. R. (1978). W. Schmidt-Biggemann (ed.), Handschriftenverzeichnis und Bibliographie (1979). H. Schultze, "Religionskritik in der deutschen Aufklärung: Das Hauptwerk des R. im 200. Jahre des Fragmentenstreits," TLZ 103 (1978) 705-13. P. Stemmer, Weissagung und Kritik: Eine Studie zur Hermeneutik bei H. S. R. (1983).

H. G. REVENTLOW

REITZENSTEIN, RICHARD (1861–1931)

Born in Breslau, R. became a Privatdozent in classical philology there (1888), ausserordentlicher professor in Rostock (1889), and professor in Giessen (1892), Strasbourg (1893), Freiburg (1911), and Göttingen (1914). He began his academic career as a classical philologist with a dissertation on Latin authors on agriculture, and in 1897 he published a major work on Greek etymology (Geschichte der griechischen Etymologika). Already in 1903, however, in a two-page summary at a congress of German philologists, Zur religionsgeschichtlichen Literatur des Hellenismus (Concerning the Religious Literature of Hellenism), he gave an indication of the area in which he was to concentrate his life's work, the religions of Hellenistic antiquity. He confirmed this intention the following year with Poimandres: Studien zur griechisch-ägyptischen und frühchristlichen Literatur, with which he placed himself in the company of other classical philologists who engaged in the study of Hellenistic religions: H. Usener (1834–1905), A. Dieterich (1866–1908), R. Wunsch (1869–1915), and F. Cumont (1868–1947).

The quest to understand the meaning and origins of Gnosticism (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION) on which R. launched his research with Poimandres took him all over the ancient world, reaching finally to east Turkestan in northwestern China (the present region of Xinjiang), where manuscript and other archaeological discoveries (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) were made during the first decades of the twentieth century. The discoveries covered an area from Kaschgar in the west to Komul (present-day Hami) in the east but are generally referred to as the Turfan discoveries from the name of the locality explored by the first of four German expeditions sponsored by the Museum für Völkerkunde in Berlin (1902–14), along with expeditions from England, France, Russia, and Japan. The area lies on the silk route once traveled by Buddhist, Nestorian, and Manichaean missionaries; it contributed to a culture in which these religions, and possibly also Zoroastrianism, mingled, challenging scholars with the difficult task of distinguishing between the traditions represented by these mainly eighth-century materials and those of the contributing religions. In the meantime, a wealth of other manuscripts had been slumbering in libraries in Paris, London, Oxford, Leiden, Berlin, and Münich since as early as 1767, when C. Niebuhr (1733–1815) returned from the oriental journey on which he had been sent by Frederick V of Denmark. These manuscripts became the subject of investigation by a large number of scholars, including J. D. MICHAELIS, C. Walch (1726–84), M. Norberg (1747–1826), J. Petermann (1801–76), J. Euting (1839–1913), and W. Brandt (1855–1915), resulting in the collection of texts that has become known as the Mandaean Corpus.

R. always valued the stimulation he received from interaction with colleagues, and so when called to Göttingen he found himself in the extremely favorable situation of close contact with the orientalists F. Andreas (1846–1930) and F. Müller (1863–1931), who were working on the editions of the Turfan manuscripts (F. Andreas and W. Henning, Mitteliranische Manichaica aus Chinesisch-Turkestan [3 vols., 1932–34]), and M. LIDZBARSKI, who worked on editions of the Mandaean texts (Das Johannesbuch der Mandäer [2 vols., 1905–15]; Ginza: Das grosse Buch der Mandäer [1925]). In Poimandres R. considered the main constituents of Gnosticism to have come from Egypt; these texts made him seek its origins in Iran.

R.'s guiding principle in his quest to understand Gnosticism was the hypothesis of a redeemer myth, the conception of a divine savior sent from heaven to rescue the sparks of light imprisoned on earth, which became well known in NT scholarship through the work of R. BULTMANN. It has now become clear that this redeemer myth was not a characteristic feature of Gnosticism but was imposed on the material by R. in his attempt to extract its secret. As C. Colpe (b. 1929) has pointed out, E. NORDEN's work has shown "in a, for current research, exemplary way that the proof of pre-Christian gnosticism does not have to be bound to evidence of an 'oriental' 'primeval man, redeemer myth' " (1961, 30). And yet it was precisely this almost obsession with the redeemer myth that assured R. success in his pioneering research to uncover the secrets of Gnosticism, for which he constantly drew from the insights of his colleagues, especially—in the case of Gnostic thought—those of W. BOUSSET (Hauptprobleme der Gnosis [1907]).

Of immediate significance for the student of the NT is R.'s chapter on PAUL in Die hellenistische Mysterienreligionen (1910). Although not an interpretation of Paul, this work provides the background from which the apostle becomes understandable in a way that is unsurpassed, even by specifically NT interpretations.

R.'s research odyssey reveals the best qualities of a scholar who was willing to risk hypotheses, then to revise and correct them as new information brought him closer to an understanding of the phenomenon he was trying to clarify: the religious outlook and longings that found expression in the movement now known as Gnosticism. In the conclusion of his study, Colpe formulated the issue well by pointing out that although the the redeemer myth is fundamentally a modern interpretation that is not present in the sources, this "formula of a 'saved savior' does catch correctly a definite feature of the subject matter" (174).

Works: Poimandres: Studien zur griechisch-ägyptischen und frühchristlicher Literatur (1904); Hellenistische Wundererzählungen (1906); Hellenistic Mystery-Religions: Their Basic Ideas and Significance (1910; ET 1978); Die Göttin Psyche in der hellenistischen und frühchristlichen Literatur (1917); Das mandäische Buch des Herrn der Grösse, und die Evangelienüberlieferung (1919); Das iranische Erlösungsmysterium: Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen (1921); (with H. H. Schaeder), Studien zum antiken Synkretismus aus Iran und Griechenland, Teil 1, Griechische Lehren (1926); Die Vorgeschichte der Christlichen Taufe (1929).

Bibliography: C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule: Darstellung und Kritik ihres Bildes vom gnostischen Erlösermythus (1961). K. Prümm, DBSup 10 (1985) 200-210. O. Rühle, *RGG*² 4 (1930) 1852-53.

H. BOERS

RELAND, ADRIAN (1676–1718)

A Dutch orientalist and geographer, R. was born at Rijp, July 17, 1676. He studied at Amsterdam (1686–88), Utrecht (1688–93), and Leiden. In 1699 he became professor of physics and metaphysics at Harderwijk and subsequently professor of oriental languages and antiquities at Utrecht (1701), where he remained until his death Feb. 5, 1718.

R.'s studies included classical philology, Persian and Arabic literature, and Far Eastern and South American studies. His special interest, however, was in biblical antiquities and related subjects. His reputation in biblical studies rested largely on his 1714 work, which constituted a major development in the study of Palestinian geography. Illustrated with maps and engravings, the work was divided into three parts: the first treated general geographical features; the second, distances and locations of various places; and the third, cities and villages. In the mid-nineteenth century it was still described as "a most elaborate and valuable work on biblical geography" and at the turn of the century was considered "indispensable." Many of R.'s works and even the geography were reprinted in B. UGOLINUS's Thesaurus antiquitatum (34 vols., 1744–69).

Works: Analecta Rabbinica (1702); De incriptione nummorum quorundam Samaritanorum (1702); De religione Mohammedica libri duo (1705; ET 1712); Decas exercitationum philologicarum de vera pronuntiatione nominis Jehovah (1707); Antiquitates sacrae veterum Hebraeorum (1708); Dissertationes quinque de nummis veterum Hebraeorum, qui ab inscriptorum litterarum forma Samaritani appellantur (1709); Palaestina ex monumentis veteribus illustrata (2 vols., 1714); De spoliis templi Hierosoymitani in arcu Titiano (1716).

Bibliography: A. J. van der Aa, BWN 10 (1874) 45-47. H. Guthe, NSHERK 9 (1911) 451. J. Le Clerc, "H. Relandi Dissertationum pars prima," Bibliothèque choisie 11 (1707) 260-76; "H. Relandi Dissertationum pars altera," Bibliothèque choisie 13 (1707) 396-400. MSHH 1 (1727) 339-49; 10, 2 (1730) 62-63; 10, 2 (1730) 77-78.

J. H. HAYES

RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE

This designation (RGS) originally denoted a group of scholars in Göttingen, also referred to as die kleine Göttinger Fakultät (none of whom were full professors at the time), who found themselves unified in the interpretation of the origins of Christianity as a religious-historical movement of Hellenistic Christianity. K. A. A. L. EICHHORN, as primus inter pares, H. GUNKEL, W. WREDE, and W. BOUSSET could be considered as the founders of the school. Other members of the original generation included J. WEISS, E. TROELTSCH, W. HEITMÜLLER, and P. Wernle (1872–1939). Important collaborators from outside biblical studies and theology included R. REITZENSTEIN and P. Wendland (1864–1915) from the area of classical philology. To a second generation belonged, among others, H. GRESSMANN, M. DIBELIUS, R. BULTMANN, and S. MOWINCKEL.

It should be noted that some members of this second generation were open to other influences that caused them to move in significant ways from the original intentions of the RGS. Bultmann's comment in the introduction to the fifth edition of Bousset's Kyrios Christos expresses this movement: "A word should be said about the intention of the [RGS] to present the religion of primitive Christianity and to use the NT as a source for this. Today we can ask whether this intention can do justice to the NT, and whether we are not rather to turn back again to the old question about the theology of the NT" (1913, VI; ET 1970, 9). With that statement Bultmann abandoned a key assumption of the RGS—namely, that primitive Christianity could be interpreted adequately, not as a theology, but, rather, as a religion that developed in a "world which was certainly not made up solely of writers and books" (Gunkel [1899] 588).

The RGS was not primarily concerned with non-biblical religions or with first-century Judaism, but with Christianity. The concern with other religions arose only secondarily, as a means to a better historical understanding of Christianity. Likewise, investigations of early Christian history could not remain within the limits of the NT CANON, as Wrede argued (1897; ET 1973). Wrede outlined programmatically the task for a so-called NT THEOLOGY: the description of the history of primitive Christianity as a developing religion. He set the temporal limit for such a history before the time of the apologists, who mark a turning point in Christianity. Bousset went even further, including the apologists as well as IRENAEUS in his "history of the belief in Christ" (1913; ET 1970).

The RGS scholars focused on Christianity as a developing religion of Hellenistic antiquity, a religion they understood to have been influenced primarily by Hellenistic Judaism and only secondarily by pagan Hellenistic religions. In that regard it would be better to translate the name of the movement as the "history-of-religion school" in the singular, in contrast to the distinctively different concerns of the discipline known as "history of religions." Central to the RGS was the understanding of NT faith as an inner-historical phenomenon, based on the conviction that the NT documents were rarely the original products of their final authors but mostly resulted from long, complex developments. In considering the RGS, the issue is less that the school made use of non-biblical materials to interpret the Bible than it is how the school did so. What made the RGS come to look at its task in this particular way?

With the publication in 1895 of Gunkel's Schöpfung und Chaos and Bousset's Der Antichrist, the method of interpretation that characterized the RGS made its first public appearance, following such antecedents as Bousset's Jesu Predigt (1892). J. WELLHAUSEN's (1899) largely negative reaction to Schöpfung und Chaos provided Gunkel with the opportunity to defend the religionsgeschichtliche method at some of its most crucial points. Wellhausen rejected Gunkel's tracing of large parts of Jewish APOCALYPTICISM back to Babylonian origins; but his main objection, Gunkel's proton pseudos, was to attaching so much weight to the question of origins. According to Wellhausen the task of the interpreter is not to uncover the origins of apocalyptic statements but to determine the meanings the author expressed through them. The origins, Wellhausen observed, are of purely antiquarian interest; yet Gunkel had set his TRADITION-historical approach in opposition to a contemporary-historical (zeitgeschichtliche) method in such a way that the one excludes the other.

In his reply (1899) Gunkel drew attention to many places in Schöpfung und Chaos where he discussed "with special devotion" the particular meanings the apocalyptic materials received in later Jewish and also Christian understanding; but he maintained that such interpretations do not exhaust their meanings. He pointed out how much of the apocalyptic material Wellhausen discarded without further ado as "fantastic chaff," with the result that his interpretation in terms of contemporary events remained hanging in the air. The search for the origins of the meanings of certain features of a text is not out of antiquarian interest but out of recognition that a purely contemporary-historical interpretation fails to clarify a text at so many points. Moreover, the issue is not errors in tradition-historical details—Gunkel admitted that he may have erred frequently—but the procedure itself, which demands that justice be sought for every detail of a text in its own terms.

The key to the problem is that, although Wellhausen admitted that there is material in the apocalypses "that is not absorbed into the conception of a writer . . . and frequently leaves our interpretation with an unintelligible residue" (1899, 233), he did not recognize that the biblical writers themselves were participants in the history of that material and remain unintelligible if some of that history is excluded from the interpretation. As Gunkel stated, "In [his declarations that the origins of such materials have at the most an antiquarian interest] Wellhausen falls into conflict with fundamental principles which are everywhere recognised in historical science, and which are conceded and followed in other fields by Wellhausen himself. The cardinal principle of historical study is this: That we are unable to comprehend a person, a period, or a thought dissociated from its antecedents, but that we can speak of a real living understanding only when we have the antecedent history" (ET 1903, 404).

A widespread misunderstanding of the RGS is that it was biased in favor of a pagan Hellenistic interpretation of primitive Christianity. What may have contributed to this misunderstanding is that one of the school's best-known works, Bousset's Kyrios Christos, traces "the history of the belief in Christ from the beginnings to Irenaeus" largely within the framework of the pagan Hellenistic environment of the NT. In that same work Bousset nevertheless expressed greater appreciation for the Palestinian Christian community than for the later Greek-speaking churches. "Thus the [Palestinian] community embellished and decorated the life portrait of its master. But by doing so it accomplished more: It preserved a good bit of the authentic and original life. It preserved for us the beauty and wisdom of his parables in their crystalline form—a Greek community would no longer have been able to do so" (74; ET, 116). One merely needs to look at Bousset's list of publications to verify how much more he had been involved in research concerning the Jewish origins of Christianity than with work on the influence of the pagan Hellenistic religions in its further development, beginning with Jesu Predigt (1892), continuing with Der Antichrist (1895) and Die Religion des Judentums im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter (1903), and five years before his death, Jüdisch-Christlicher Schulbetrieb in Alexandrien und Rom (1915).

This concern with the Jewish thought of NT times does not make things easier for a traditional understanding of the origins of Christianity, however. The effect is indeed far more devastating: Christianity was not merely influenced in its further development by Hellenistic religions; it came from their bosom in the form of Judaism as a Hellenistic religion in the broader sense of the term. It is noteworthy that in Jesu Predigt Bousset tried to negate the decisive influence of Judaism on JESUS, in contrast to the famous work of a fellow member of the school, J. Weiss's Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (published earlier in the same year). Weiss interpreted the conception of the kingdom of God in the preaching of Jesus as a product of Jewish apocalypticism. Bousset's negative reaction shows clearly that the interpretation of primitive Christianity within the framework of Hellenistic Judaism and pagan religions was not a point of departure for the school.

One of the most crucial factors in the development of the RGS was the influence of A. RITSCHL. He drew to Göttingen those scholars who subsequently constituted its membership. From him they learned to understand Christianity historically; but it was against his particular understanding of history that they found themselves united as a group, subsequently as a school.

Ritschl was one of the rare scholars who followed J. P. GABLER's call for a separate biblical THEOLOGY as preparation for a dogmatic theology. The second volume of his Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung (3 vols., 1870–74), the only volume not translated into English, is a biblical, more specifically an NT, theology, which prepared for the systematic presentation of his own thought in the third volume. His treatment of the NT materials is at the same time appealing and unsatisfactory. His insistence that the NT writings are to be understood religiously, not doctrinally, is appealing; but this approach is overshadowed by a lack of sensitivity for the historical setting of the NT, notwithstanding his claim to offer a historical interpretation. The frustration of the young scholars who had come to Göttingen to study under him becomes understandable when one notes these opposing features of his work: on the one hand, the charm of an undogmatic interpretation; on the other, the disappointment in a lack of historical sensitivity.

In their rejection of Ritschl the young scholars were influenced by P. de LAGARDE and encouraged by Eichhorn. Their rejection was not complete, however; Ritschl's theological system remained an important influence in their understanding of the Christian faith. Weiss made this clear in Die Predigt Jesus vom Reiche Gottes, the work in which he broke historically with Ritschl's conception of the kingdom of God. In the preface he pointed out that even though the kingdom of God in the thought of Ritschl had nothing in common with the same expression in the preaching of Jesus, he nevertheless remained convinced that Ritschl's system of thought—especially his conception of the kingdom of God—remained most appropriate for a vital contemporary Christianity. Even though they may not have offered such an explicit comment, the understanding of Christianity found in other members of the RGS was not basically different from that of Ritschl, including his emphasis on Christianity as fundamentally a religion of ethical values. So, for example, Bousset wrote concerning the Palestinian community: "It bowed down before the stark heroism of [the] ethical demands [of Jesus] which were rooted in an equally daring faith in God" (Kyrios Christos, 74; ET 116).

Secure in their religious convictions derived from Ritschl, the members of the RGS were unfettered by the concern for a historical confirmation of their faith. So, for example, the truth of Christianity was established for Bousset already in the first two chapters of Kyrios Christos. In the rest of the book he made it relevant in changing historical circumstances. Thus he was not the least put off by what may seem strange ideas. He wrote of the Palestinian community: "Only by using the figure of the heavenly Son of Man, the Lord and Judge of the world, to back up the gospel of Jesus . . . did the community make the picture of Jesus of Nazareth influential. An age which did not live solely on the simply ethical and simply religious, but on all sorts of more or less fantastic eschatological expectations . . . needed just such a picture of Jesus as the first disciples of Jesus had created, and accepted the Eternal proclaimed in it, in the colorful wrappings of temporal clothing" (Kyrios Christos, 75; ET, 117-18).

For the RGS the truth of Christianity was dependent neither on its historical manifestation nor on the biblical religion—and strictly speaking, not even on Jesus' message. The result was that the members of the RGS were very relaxed about what they found in history and about historical details; it was the larger picture that counted. This attitude was well illustrated by Gunkel in a remark concerning fundamental differences between himself and Bousset on the interpretation of Revelation 12, particularly on its religious background (Babylonian according to Gunkel, Egyptian and subsequently Iranian according to Bousset). Gunkel argued that such differences may be set aside in favor of the one fundamental point, "that this chapter is based on mythical traditions. . . . Whether the myths were originally Babylonian or Egyptian is secondary; subsequent generations may break their heads on that" (1903, 55).

The difference between the RGS and its opponents may best be illustrated with regard to Bousset's wavering on the interpretation of maranatha. He gave one explanation in Kyrios Christos (1913), that it originated in the bilingual area of Antioch, Damascus, and Tarsus; another in Jesus der Herr (1916), that it was an oath directed to God; and then returned to the former explanation in the second edition of Kyrios Christos (1921), never wavering in his conviction that it could not have originated in Palestinian Christianity. This was identified as the Achilles heel of his understanding of the development of the cult of Christ the Lord by A. RAWLINSON (The NT Doctrine of the Christ [1926]), a critique endorsed by O. CULLMANN (Die Christologie des Neuen Testaments [1957] 219-20; ET, 213-14). Nothing can reveal more clearly the difference between the RGS and its critics than this controversy. For Bousset all that was at stake was the best possible historical interpretation. If someone would have been able to make historically plausible a cult of Christ in the Temple in Jerusalem, it could only have contributed to the clarification of the historical picture of the development of the cult of Christ the Lord. Nothing was at stake theologically for him, and future generations could continue to struggle with the details. For Rawlinson and Cullmann, however, the historical explanation carried considerable theological weight.

At the same time it must be said that this historical openness sometimes came at the cost of religious sensitivity. Troeltsch formulated the issue well: "Every act of religious devotion considers itself within its own realm fundamentally and self-evidently as absolute, and each universal religion does the same for every possible sphere" (1912, 110; ET 1971, 132). Gunkel may have been right when he claimed that "the insatiable hunger of the human heart after God and the ineradicable search after Truth . . . come from one and the same Divine source" (1926–27, 535), but not when he concluded that they "can therefore never contradict each other" (535). Troeltsch's statement contradicts Gunkel's assertion that "We are not entitled to select from the course of history some isolated facts or some entire periods and declare that these and these alone are of God and supernatural" (535-36). Whatever else may be said about Gunkel's claim, most scholars would agree that religious conviction elevates precisely some relative historical fact to absoluteness by taking it as more than history, by understanding it as myth.

In arguments with opponents the RGS had an advantage religiously in not being bound in principle to a purely historical framework. Because its conceptions did not depend on historical proof, it remained open to a course leading to the mythological formulation (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) of religious truth as a radicalizing of history. By contrast, interpretations that depend on historical verification must remain within the bounds of the historical.

An important element of the RGS was its conviction that the final purpose of biblical interpretation is the meaning it has for the individual modern believer. This conviction was expressed in extensive lectures by members of the RGS, lectures of a more popular nature offered in local congregations. It was also expressed by the founding of a series of generally accessible interpretations of Christianity for educated laypersons, the Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher für die deutsche christlicher Gegenwart, inaugurated with Bousset's Jesus (1904), and by publication of Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (1909–13, 1927–32[2], 1957–62[3]) as counterpart to the more academically oriented Realencyklopädie für protestantische Theologie und Kirche.

The RGS's program of biblical interpretation never came to a conclusion; it was interrupted by the rise of dialectical theology, to which even such an eminent second-generation member as Bultmann was attracted. The misfortune of this for biblical scholarship is not that the answers of the RGS have been lost—to the contrary, they have been refined by sympathizers and opponents alike. The misfortune is rather that their questions have been forgotten without having been fully addressed.

Bibliography: H. Boers, What is NT Theology: The Rise of Criticism and the Problem of a Theology of the NT (GBS, 1979) 39-66. W. Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum: Ein religionsgeschichtlicher Vergleich (1892); Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums, des Neuen Testaments, und der alten Kirche (1895); Die Religion des Judentums im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter (1903); Jesus (Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher für die deutsche christlicher Gegenwart, 1904); Kyrios Christos: Geschichte des Christusglaubens von den Anfangen des Christentums bis Irenaeus (1913; ET 1970); Jüdisch-Christlicher Schulbetrieb in Alexandrien und Rom: Literarische Untersuchungen zu Philo und Clemens von Alexandria, Justin, und Irenaus (1915); Jesus der Herr: Nachtrage und Auseinandersetzungen zu "Kyrios Christos" (1916). C. Colpe, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule: Darstellung und Kritik ihres Bildes vom gnostischen Erlösermythus (FRLANT 78, 1961). O. Eissfeldt, "Religionsgeschichtliche Schule," RGG[2] 4 (1930) 1898-905. H. Gressmann, A. Eichhorn und die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (1914). H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen 1 und Ap Joh 12 (1895); "Aus Wellhausen's neuesten apokalyptischen Forschungen," ZWT NF 7 [1899] 581-611; "The Religio-Historical Interpretation of the NT," The Monist 13 (1903) 398-455 = Zum religionsgeschichtlichen Verständnis des Neuen Testaments (FRLANT 2, 1903); "The 'Historical Movement' in the Study in Religion," Exp Tim 38 [1926–27] 532-36). J. Hempel, "Religionsgeschichtliche Schule," RGG[3] 5 (1961) 991-94. G. W. Ittel, Urchristentum und Fremdreligionen im Urteil der religionsgeschichtliche Schule (1956); "Die Hauptgedanken der 'religionsgeschichtliche Schule,' " ZRGG 10 (1958) 61-78. W. Klatt, H. Gunkel: Zu seiner "Theologie der Religionsgeschichte" und zur Entstehung der formgeschichtlichen Methode (FRLANT 100, 1969). W. Kümmel, Das Neue Testament: Geschichte der Erforschung seiner Probleme ([1958] 259-414; ET [1972] 206-324). G. Lüdemann, "Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule," Theologie in Göttingen: Eine Vorlesungsreihe (Göttinger Universitätsschriften A/1, ed. B. Moeller, 1987) 325-61. G. Lüdemann and M. Schröder, Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule in Göttingen: Eine Dokumentation (1987). R. Morgan, "Introduction: The Nature of NT Theology," The Nature of NT Theology: The Contributions of W. Wrede and A. Schlatter (SBT 2d. ser. 25, 1973) 2-26. R. Morgan with J. Barton, Biblical Interpretation (Oxford Bible Series, 1988) 93-110. H. Paulsen, "Traditionsgeschichte und religionsgeschichtliche Schule," ZTK 75 (1958) 22-55. H. Räisänen, Beyond NT Theology: A Story and a Programme (1990) 13-31. K. Rudolph, "Religionsgeschichtliche Schule," EncRel 12 (1987) 293-96. E. Troeltsch, Die Absolutheit des Christentums und die Religionsgeschichte (1912; ET, The Absoluteness of Christianity and the History of Religions [1971]); "Die 'kleine Göttinger Fakultät' von 1890," ChW 18 (1920) 281-83. J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (1892; ET 1971). J. Wellhausen, "Zur apokalyptischen Literatur," Skizzen und Vorarbeiten (1899, repr. 1985) 215-49. W. Wrede, Über Aufgabe und Methode der sogenannten neutestamentlichen Theologie (1897; ET 1973).

H. BOERS

RENAN, JOSEPH ERNEST (1823–92)

Born in 1823 in Treguier, Brittany, R. died Oct. 2, 1892, in Paris. Although he is best known among biblical scholars as the author of a life of JESUS (1869), he was also a prolific historian and philologist. His initial training was for the Roman Catholic priesthood. While at seminary, however, he became aware of scientific approaches to ancient texts and creeds and subsequently decided that the major tenets of the Christian faith could not be maintained. Intellectually committed to historical-critical methods and convinced of the incompatibility of their results with orthodoxy, R. no longer considered himself a believer in the traditional sense; and in 1845 he left the St. Sulpice seminary and his initial calling.

Upon leaving the seminary he continued his work with essays on religious history and moral criticism, demonstrating the humanistic and historical approach to religious studies. In 1861 he traveled to the Holy Land to begin his work on the origins of Christianity. A draft of Vie de Jésus was finished during this time. R.'s reconstruction was fanciful in the extreme and his portrait correspondingly romanticized. Shortly after his return he was elected to the chair of Hebrew at the College de France, but with the publication of Vie de Jésus he was relieved of his position.

Much of what R. wrote concerning Jesus is not more than pure speculation and fantasy. Precisely this excess is what precipitated A. SCHWEITZER's scathing critique in The Quest for the Historical Jesus. R. is better understood as a philosopher or social commentator than as a biblical theologian or historian. When that is remembered, his excesses and penchant for imaginative reconstructions can be much better received; his conceptions of God and attempts at recasting religious thought in social forms can be seen as efforts to integrate the truths of religion with truth in science.

Works: The History of the Origins of Christianity (7 vols., 1863–83; ET 1889–90); Vie de Jésus (1863; ET 1864); Philosophical Dialogues and Fragments (1876; ET 1883); Recollections of My Youth (1883; ET 1883); Histoire du peuple d'Israël (5 vols., 1887–94; ET 1888–96); The Future of Science: Ideas of 1848 (1890; ET 1891); Oeuvres complètes (10 vols., ed. H. Psichari, 1947–61).

Bibliography: I. Babbitt, Masters of Modern French Criticism (1912) 257-97. R. M. Chadbourne, E. R. as an Essayist (1957). R. Dussard, L'oeuvre scientifique d'E. R. (1951). F. Espinasse, The Life of E. R. (1895, repr. 1980). K. Gore, L'Idée de progrés dans la pensèe de R. (1970). Y. Marchasson, DBSup 10 (1985) 277-344 (with complete bibliography). L. Mott, Ernest Renan (1921). J. M. Pommier, R., d'après des documents inédits (1923). B. M. G. Reardon, "E. R. and the Religion of Science," The Critical Spirit and the Will to Believe: Essays in Nineteenth-century Literature and Religion (ed. D. Jasper and T. Wright, 1989) 191-205. H. Wardman, E. R.: A Critical Biography (1964).

S. J. KRAFTCHICK

REUCHLIN, JOHANNES (1455–1522)

Called "Rabbi Capnion," R. was the father of Renaissance Hebrew study. He was born in Pforzheim and attended the universities of Freiberg, Paris, and Basel, where he studied law, Latin, and Greek. He began studying Hebrew in the 1480s but experienced difficulty in locating Jewish teachers willing to instruct Christians. For this reason his first publications were devoted to teaching basic Hebrew grammar suited to elementary Christian students. His introduction to Hebrew (1506) was the best Hebrew grammar in Latin then available. In 1512 he published a small book of psalms with translations and grammatical notes to help new students of Hebrew who knew enough grammar to read the HB text. Several years later he addressed more difficult aspects of Hebrew grammar and treated the complex problem of voweling and punctuation (1518). His students included some of the most important intellectuals of the early sixteenth century: J. Eck, J. Forester, J. Ceporinus, R. Wakefield, P. MELANCHTHON, and many others.

R.'s contribution to kabbalistic studies (see KABBALAH) and scriptural exegesis proved seminal throughout the early modern period. His first treatise (1494) was a general study of kabbalistic lore. His later study (1517) was far more intellectually significant and of greater value to Christian students of Scripture. Because Hebrew uses the same symbols for both letters and numbers, Kabbalists believed every word represented a numerological equivalent that might be substituted for other words with equal numerological value, hence the Bible was both a mathematical code as well as a literary account of God's relationship with humankind. R. attempted to prove the existence of the Trinity and the unity of the Godhead and also applied this method to various difficult terms and verses in Scripture in order to demonstrate its general orthodox viability. He believed this esoteric numerology represented a secret oral tradition granted to Moses on Mount Sinai, through which the written HB might be interpreted. Although his writings had little impact on Jewish scholars, they were very influential with Christians.

R.'s views proved controversial, and he was charged with heresy by the Dominican order in Cologne in 1509 when he defended the legal right of Jews in Frankfurt and Cologne to make use of rabbinic literature. The Reuchlin controversy, as it was called, soon became a Europe-wide contest between those humanists championing scholarly use of ancient languages to better understand Scripture and more conservative scholastics for whom an appeal to ancient language sources represented a challenge to papal authority. The conflict ended in 1520 with Pope Leo upholding the Dominican condemnation. Broken in health and spirit, R. died two years later. Many scholars maintain that this battle was the most significant intellectual conflict leading to the Protestant Reformation.

Works: Vocabularius (1478); De Verbo Mirifico (1494); De Rudimentis Hebraicis (1506); Augenspiegel (1511); De Arte Cabbalistica (1517; ET with intro. by G. L. Jones, 1993); De Accentibus et Orthographia Linguae Hebraicae (1518).

Bibliography: M. Brod, J. R. und sein Kampf: Eine historische Monographie (1965). J. Friedman, The Most Ancient Testimony: Sixteenth-century Christian Hebraica in the Age of Renaissance Nostalgia (1983). L. Geiger, J. R.: Sein Leben und sein Werke (1871). S. A Hirsch, "J. R., the Father of Hebrew Study Among Christians," A Book of Essays (1905) 116-50. G. Kawerau, RE^{3} 16 (1905) 680-88. M. Maurer, "R. und das Judentum," TLZ 77 (1952) 533-44. H. A. Oberman, "Three Sixteenth-century Attitudes to Judaism: R., Erasmus, and Luther," Jewish Thought in the Sixteenth Century (ed. B. D. Cooperman, 1983) 326-64. J. H. Overfield, "A New Look at the Reuchlin Affair," SMRH 8 (1971) 165-207. H. Scheible, CE (1987) 145-50.

J. FRIEDMAN

REUSS, EDUARD GUILLAUME EUGÈNE (1804–91)

An Alsatian, R. was born in Strasbourg, July 8, 1804. Partially educated at home, he received good instruction in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew and was bilingual in French and German. After presenting his dissertation (De statu literarum theologicarum per saecula VII. et VIII. [1825]) at Strasbourg, he studied at Göttingen (1825–26), where he heard J. G. EICHHORN's lectures on Isaiah, and at Halle (1826), where H. GESENIUS and F. THOLUCK were active. At Paris (1827–28) he studied intensely in Semitic languages, including Syriac and Aramaic, and Arabic with Sylvester de Sacy. He absorbed much from such French scholars as B. Constant (1767–1830) who were interested in the origin, development, and PSYCHOLOGY of religion in general and of the Judeo-Christian faith in particular. In 1828 R. became a Dozent at Strasbourg; in 1829, licentiate in theology with his De libris Veteris Testamenti apocryphis perperam plebi negatis; in 1834, associate professor; in 1836, professor; and in 1838, professor in theology. He died Apr. 15, 1891.

R. was active in several fields, teaching and writing on various subjects—HB, NT, early church history, French Protestantism—and producing a new French TRANSLATION of the entire Bible with commentary. In his biblical work he saw his objectives in primarily historical terms: the production of a reliable history of Israel and of the early church, based on a psychologically understandable process of development, and a description of the origin and nature of biblical literature within the framework of Israelite and Christian history. He understood biblical THEOLOGY as essentially a historical discipline. His NT work thus paralleled that of his contemporary, F. C. BAUR, but with a more conservative posture and a more positive ecclesiastical concern in the treatment of the literature.

As early as 1833–34 R. taught that the HB "prophets are older than the law and the Psalms are later than both." In a footnote in the introduction to his L'Histoire sainte et la loi (1879, 23-24), he reported that as early as 1833 he had formulated certain fundamental theses regarding the HB that he did not then publish because they differed so widely from common opinion and needed further development. These theses were: (1) The historical element in the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) can and must be examined apart from, and not be confused with, the legal element. (2) Both history and law were able to exist without a written form; a nation can have a customary law without having a written code. (3) The national traditions of the Israelites appeared earlier and were written down earlier than the laws of the Pentateuch. (4) The historian should focus on the date of the laws because this is the area in which there is the best chance of arriving at certain results. (5) The narrated history in the books of Judges and Samuel and part of that comprising the books of Kings is in contradiction with Mosaic law; thus Mosaic law was unknown at the time of the composition of these books. (6) The prophets of the eighth and seventh centuries did not know the Mosaic code. (7) Jeremiah is the first prophet who knew of the written law, and his quotations agree with Deuteronomy. (8) Deuteronomy (4:45–28:68) is the book the priests pretended to have found in the Temple at the time of King Josiah and is the oldest part of the edited legislation of the Pentateuch. (9) Israelite history, insofar as it is a question of national development determined by the written law, may be divided into two periods: before and after Josiah. (10) Ezekiel is older than the composition of the ritual code and the law that organized the hierocracy. (11) The book of Joshua is not, as far as can be known, the most recent part of the entire work. (12) The author of the Pentateuch is to be clearly distinguished from the ancient prophet Moses.

These views are reflected in various unpublished lectures (see J. Vincent [1990]), book reviews, short articles, and above all in R.'s 1850 article. His students K. GRAF and A. Kayser (1821–85) were the first to develop R.'s positions systematically. Only in 1879 and 1881 did R. finally produce the work on Israelite literary history he had envisioned in the early 1830s.

Works: History of the Sacred Scriptures of the NT (1842, 1853², 1860³, 1864⁴, 1874⁵, 1887⁵; ET of 5th ed. with bibliographical additions, 2 vols., 1884); "Die johanneische Theologie: Eine exegetische Studie," Beiträge zu den theologischen Wissenschaft 1 (1847) 1-84; "Judenthum," Allgemeine Encyklopädie der Wissenschaften und Kunste (ed. J. S. Ersch, J. G. Gruber et al., 1850) sec. 2, pt. 27, 324-47; Der acht und sechzigste Psalm: Ein exegetischer Noth und Kunst Denkmal zu Ehren unserer ganzen Zunft (1851); Fragments littéraires et critiques sur l'histoire de la Bible française (1851); History of Christian Theology in the Apostolic Age (2 vols., 1852, 1860², 1864³; ET with preface and notes by R. W. Dale, 2 vols. 1872–74); Die deutsche Historienbibel vor der Erfindung des Bücherdrucks (1855); History of the Canon of the Holy Scriptures in the Christian Church (1863, 1863²; ET 1884 with R.'s corrections and revisions, 1891²); Das Buch Hiob: Vortrag gehalten in der Nicolaikirche der 8 Februar 1869 (1869); Bibliotheca Novi Testamenti Graeci (1872); La Bible, traduction nouvelle avec introductions et commentaires (16 vols., 1874–81; GT of OT portion, 7 vols., 1892–94); L'Histoire sainte et la loi (La Bible, 1879); Die Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften Alten Testaments (1881, 1890²); Hiob (1888); Notitia codicis quatuor evangeliorum Graeci (1889).

Bibliography: G. Anrich, ADB 55 (1910) 579-90. K. Budde, "Meister und Schüler, E. R. und K. H. Graf," ChW 18 (1904) 904-7. K. Budde and H. J. Holtzmann (eds.), E. R.s Briefwechsel mit seinem Schüler und Freunde K. H. Graf, zur Hundertjahrfeier seiner Geburt (1904). A. Caquot, "R. et Renan," RHPR 71 (1991) 437-42. A. Causse, "La Bible de Reuss et la Renaissance des études d'histoire réligieuse en France," RHPR 9 (1929) 1-31. T. Gerold, Edouard Reuss (1804–91) (1891); E. R.—notice biographique (1892). J.-G. Heintz "E. Reuss, K. H. Graf, et le Pentateuque," RHPR 71 (1991) 443-57. E. Jacob, "E. R. et l'Alsace," Bulletin de la Société d'Histoire du Protestantisme Français 128 (1982) 517-36; "E. R., un théologien indépendant," RHPR 71 (1991) 427-35; W. Kümmel, NTHIP, 155-61. U. Kusche, Die unterlegene Religion: Das Judentum im Urteil deutscher Alttestamentler (Studien zu Kirche und Israel 12, 1991) 9-23. P. Lobstein, *RE*³ 16 (1905) 691-96; "E. R. (1804–91)—Notes et Souvenirs," RHPR 1 (1921) 428-45. J. M. Vincent, Leben und Werk des frühen E. R.: Ein Beitrag zu den geistesgeschichtlichen Voraussetzungen der Bibelkritik im zweiten Viertel des 19. Jahrhunderts (BEvT 106, 1990), full bibliography of R.'s works 353-91. W. Westphal, "E. R., Directeur du Gymnase Protestant (1859–1865)," RHPR 71 (1991) 459-71.

J. H. HAYES

REVELATION, BOOK OF

Also known as the Apocalypse, the last book of the Bible is one of the most controversial. From the time of the early church onward, its date, authorship, and meaning have been disputed; and for many years its right to a place in the NT CANON was also debated. Apparently written when Christians feared persecution by Rome, Revelation has exercised through its visions and prophecies an unceasing fascination both within and beyond the Christian church; its interpretation has been linked with that of other apocalyptic writings (see APOCALYPTICISM), especially Daniel.

1. Early Interpretations to 300. a. Chiliasm. The prevailing interpretation in early days was that of the Chiliasts, who regarded Rev 20:1-6 as a prediction of Christ's coming reign on earth for a millennium, i.e., a thousand years. One of them, PAPIAS, was probably acquainted with Revelation; and others, JUSTIN (Dial. Tryph. 81), IRENAEUS (Adv. Haer. 5.28-36), TERTULLIAN (Adv. Marc. 3.13, 24; De Res. Carn. 25), and Hippolytus

(De Christo et Antichristo 47-49), expressly referred to it. Victorinus wrote a commentary on it; Commodianus seems to have been aware of it. Some of these writers outlined the material pleasures of life in the millennium; but Methodius, who was inclined to spiritual interpretations, spoke of a "millennium of rest" (Symp. 9.5). A widespread expectation was that the fall of Rome, symbolized by Babylon, would precede the millennium; and the connection between Antichrist and the beasts mentioned in the Apocalypse was much discussed.

b. Opposition to Chiliasm. Most writers believed that John, the son of Zebedee, had written Revelation; Irenaeus dated it in the reign of Domitian (c. 96). But Caius, an opponent of Chiliasm, regarded Cerinthus as its author and refused to accept it as Scripture (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 3.28); MARCION (Tertullian Adv. Marc. 4.5) and the Alogoi (Epiphanius Haer. 51.3) also rejected its canonical status. ORIGEN, who accepted apostolic authorship (In Ioann. 1.14), rejected the materialistic hopes characteristic of Chiliasm (De Prin. 2.11). DIONYSIUS OF ALEXANDRIA advocated a spiritual interpretation and rejected apostolic authorship because its thought and linguistic style were different from that of John's Gospel; he suggested that the author was another John (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 7.24-25). Some scholia on Revelation, probably from Origen's school, do not comment on the millennium but give a spiritual interpretation of other passages.

2. From 300 to 1100. a. Canonicity, authorship, and date. At the beginning of the fourth century, opinion was divided about the book's canonical status (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 3.25), and hesitation continued in the East. Cyril of Jerusalem did not include it in his canon. The Syrian church was reluctant to accept it; it was not included in the PESHITTA, although it appeared in some later Syriac NTs. ATHANASIUS and several other Greek writers, however, accepted it. In the West there was less uncertainty, and in 397 the Synod of Carthage recognized Revelation as canonical.

In general, both traditional authorship and Irenaeus's date were accepted, although EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 3.39) suggested that the book was written by John the Elder. Epiphanius (Haer. 51. 12, 33) dated it in the reign of Claudius Caesar, although his source may have meant Nero. A writing ascribed to Dorotheus of Tyre (see R. Charles [1920] 1:xcii) placed it in the reign of Trajan.

b. Tyconius and Augustine. Chiliasm was accepted by Lactantius and Apollinarius of Laodicea (Basil Epist. 263.4) in the fourth century. But with the end of pagan Rome and the absence of any visible return of Christ, its popularity declined; and JEROME removed all chiliastic tendencies from his edition of Victorinus. The Donatist TYCONIUS was responsible for an important development in the book's interpretation. Although his commentary is lost, there is evidence that he understood the millennium as Christ's reign in the church between the first and second advents, the latter of which he seems to have expected in the near future. He explained the first resurrection of Revelation 20 as spiritual, not physical, and, like Victorinus, regarded some of the book's later visions as predictions of the same events as previous ones, a characteristic known as recapitulation (G. Maier [1981] 108-29). AUGUSTINE, who had formerly accepted Chiliasm (Serm. 259), later rejected it and gave an account of the millennium and the first resurrection similar to that of Tyconius but without the suggestion that the second advent was near (Civ. Dei 20.7-9, 17).

c. Other Western interpreters. Between 500 and 1100 the Apocalypse aroused great interest in the West. Primasius and Apringius (6th cent.), BEDE, Ambrosius Autpertus, and Beatus (8th cent.), Haymo of Auxerre (9th cent.), and Bruno of Segni (12th cent.) were the authors of commentaries based on the principles of Tyconius and Augustine that explained the millennium as the period between the first and second advents of Christ, not literally a period of a thousand years. The same kind of interpretation is found in the Complexiones of CASSIODORUS and the Pseudo-Augustinian Homilies (attributed by some scholars to Caesarius of Arles, 6th cent.). It is also found in the commentaries ascribed to ALCUIN and Berengaud and in the GLOSSA ORDINARIA, all of which are ninth century or later. The work ascribed to Berengaud claimed that Revelation alludes repeatedly to historical events both before and after the birth of Jesus.

d. Eastern interpreters. Less attention was given to the book in the East than in the West. It was the subject of three Greek commentaries. Two of them, by Andreas (6th cent.) and Arethas (10th cent.), accepted an approach to the millennium like Augustine's but also regarded the book as prophetic of events in their own day. The other Greek commentator, Oecumenius (6th cent.), made the unusual claim that the millennium coincided with the earthly life of Jesus. The influence of Revelation is also likely to be present in the Greek Apocalypse of Daniel (9th cent.; J. Charlesworth [1983] 1:755-70).

3. From 1100 to 1500. a. Joachim of Fiore. The older types of interpretation were perpetuated by several commentators, including ANSELM OF LAON, RUPERT OF DEUTZ, and RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR. In the East, the Syrian Dionysius Bar Salibi (12th cent.) taught that the millennium was yet to come and would, in fact, be the day of judgment. JOACHIM OF FIORE, the most important writer on Revelation in this period, laid the foundation for a renewal of millenarian teaching with his doctrine of the three ages of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit. The age of the Spirit was already dawning, and the millennium, which began with Christ's first advent, would come in its fullness after the destruction of the beast and the false prophet. His remarkable assertion that the witnesses of Revelation 11 would be two religious orders soon appeared to be fulfilled in the Dominicans and Franciscans. He also explained the visions in Revelation as allusions to the course of history from ancient Israel to his own day.

b. After Joachim. The writings of Joachim had a powerful effect on Franciscan Spirituals, including P. Olivi and Ubertino of Casale. According to Olivi (d. 1298), the angel of Rev 10:1-3 was Francis of Assisi, worldly Christians were the beast from the sea, and a false pope would persecute those who kept the Franciscan Rule. In the opinion of Ubertino (c. 1305) the two witnesses were Francis and Dominic, and the two beasts (Rev 13:1, 11) were the popes Boniface VIII and Benedict XI. Like Joachim, these writers saw the course of history predicted in the book. A new kind of historical interpretation, however, was given by Alexander the Minorite (A. Minorita [1955]) and NICHOLAS OF LYRA (1471–72), who abandoned the principle of recapitulation and explained Revelation as a PROPHECY of events in chronological sequence. Antipapal interpretations were given by Matthias of Janow, J. WYCLIF, the Lollards, and J. HUS. Revelation was the theme of sermons by Savonarola, who aspired to make a New Jerusalem of Florence.

4. From 1500 to 1770. a. The Reformation. ERASMUS (1527) expressed doubts about the authorship of the Apocalypse. Although LUTHER questioned its divine INSPIRATION in his NT (1522), he withdrew the criticism in a later edition and was prepared to use the book as ammunition in his conflict with the papacy. CALVIN wrote no commentary on Revelation, and ZWINGLI (1982) had a negative opinion of it.

In spite of these hesitations, Revelation became a rallying point for opponents of the papacy. Antipapal writings on the book during the sixteenth century include the sermons of J. BULLINGER and the commentaries of D. Chytraeus (1563), J. Bale (1548), J. Foxe (1587), and J. Napier (1593). Many of these writers saw references in the book to the Turks, especially in the vision of 200 million cavalry in Rev 9:16. The most spectacular treatment of the Apocalypse is to be seen in the Chiliasm of extremists like T. MÜNTZER and John of Leyden, who tried to facilitate the fulfillment of prophecy by the use of force. The Augsburg Confession of the Lutherans and the Second Helvetic Confession of the Calvinists, however, denounced Chiliasm.

b. Roman Catholic reactions and Protestant replies. Eventually there was a Roman Catholic reaction to the antipapal interpretation of the book, led by the Jesuits R. BELLARMINE, Ribera, and Alcazar. Ribera, a pioneer of futurist interpretation (1591), accepted the Augustinian idea of the millennium but rejected world- and church-historical approaches. Most of the book's prophecies, he contended, had not yet been fulfilled; and Rome, symbolized by Babylon, would eventually break away from the pope. Alcazar, following J. Hentennius, gave a preterist interpretation (1614), the beginning of a contemporary-historical approach. Most of the book, he claimed, referred to the judgment on Judaism and Rome in the first three centuries. The beast from the sea was pagan Rome, and the millennium was the life of the church ever since the time of Constantine.

Two Protestants, H. GROTIUS (1644) and H. HAMMOND (1653), produced modified versions of Alcazar's interpretation, dating the millennium from Constantine until about 1300 and explaining Gog and Magog (Rev 20:8) as the Turks and Syrians. They suggested that John received his revelations on several different occasions, beginning in the reign of Claudius. A preterist interpretation was also advocated by the Roman Catholic J.-B. Bossuet (1689). Further Protestant responses came from T. BRIGHTMAN (1609) and D. Pareus (1618), both of whom restated the antipapal interpretation. A distinctive feature of Pareus was his explanation of Revelation as a drama, which led to J. MILTON's description of the book as "the majestick image of a high and stately Tragedy."

c. Millenarian interpretations. In the seventeenth century the chiliastic type of interpretation won great popularity. J. Alsted (1627) predicted that the millennium would begin in 1694. J. MEDE (1627, 1632) expected it in the near future but refused to give a precise date; according to his theory of synchronisms, different passages in the book referred to the same event. Both Alsted and Mede combined their expectations with a church-historical interpretation. Their works provided a scholarly justification for speculation about a future millennium and were very popular during the upheavals of the Thirty Years' War and the English Civil War.

During this period prophets appeared both in Great Britain and in Europe. In Great Britain, L. Muggleton and J. Reeve claimed to be the witnesses of Revelation 11, and J. Robins wanted to lead the 144,000 of the Apocalypse to the Holy Land. In Europe, P. Felgenhauer, J. Warner, and C. Kotter were among the prophetic interpreters of Revelation and of other apocalyptic books. Developments in France had their impact on the treatment of the book: The revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685 led the Protestant P. Jurieu (1687) to see in that event the death of the two witnesses; it also led to the rise of French prophets whose visions showed the influence of the Apocalypse.

The impact of scientific discoveries can be seen in the writings of T. BURNET (1684–90) and W. WHISTON (1737), both of whom expected the fulfillment of the prophecies through such natural events as volcanic eruptions and the approach of comets. I. NEWTON, on the other hand, preferred to confine his attention to the ways in which he thought prophecy had already been fulfilled.

There was strong opposition to millenarian teaching in orthodox Lutheran and Calvinistic circles, but mediating views emerged. J. COCCEIUS (1665) regarded the millennium as already past but expected an earthly New Jerusalem. According to P. J. SPENER (1693) there would be a future millennium on earth, but it would not be preceded by the visible return of Christ.

d. Eighteenth-century developments. Views similar to Spener's were developed by D. WHITBY (1702), who argued that the millennium would be a period of great prosperity for the church, followed by the visible return of Christ. This interpretation, known as postmillennial, was adopted by C. VITRINGA (1705), M. Lowman (1747), and J. EDWARDS (1774). It was a form of interpretation congenial to the advocates of missionary expansion.

An unusual account of the book was given by J. BENGEL (1740), who claimed that there would be two millennia. The first would be a period of prosperity for the church, beginning with the fall of the papacy in 1836. During the second, a false sense of prosperity on earth would be followed by the glorious coming of Christ. Bengel's interpretation was influential in Germany and at one stage was given sympathetic consideration by J. WESLEY.

The eighteenth century was conspicuous for the emergence of open criticism of the book. The Deist (see DEISM) T. MORGAN (1738–40) accepted traditional authorship but regarded Revelation as an example of Judaizing. Another Deist, H. St. John, Viscount BOLINGBROKE (1754), dismissed it as "the reveries of a mad Judaizing Christian" and ascribed it to Cerinthus; and VOLTAIRE made some characteristically caustic remarks about it. At the same time the preterist contemporary-historical approach gained momentum, counting among its practitioners F. Abauzit (1770) and J. WETTSTEIN (1752). According to Abauzit, Revelation was written during the reign of Nero and predicted the fall of the Jewish state, symbolized by the seven-headed beast. Wettstein thought that the beast stood for the emperors before Vespasian and that the millennium had lasted just over sixty years from 70 CE until the time of Bar Kochba.

e. Mystical interpretations. Mystical approaches to the book gained popularity in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. These writers referred to historical events, but they were primarily concerned with explaining the Apocalypse in terms of the inner life. J.-M. GUYON (1713) wrote a commentary relating the book to stages of spiritual development. J. LEAD (1683), J. E. Petersen (1696), and J. W. Petersen (1706) gave accounts based on claims to special revelations. E. Swedenborg (1766) was one of the most famous interpreters in this tradition.

f. Russia. Although most of the writings on Revelation were produced in the West, both sides in the controversy that split the Russian Church in the seventeenth century used its prophecies with those of other apocalyptic writings as weapons to argue their views. Patriarch Nikon described his monastery as the New Jerusalem, while his opponents, the Old Believers, regarded it as the kingdom of the Antichrist and used the number 666 (Rev 13:18) to calculate 1666 as the time of Antichrist's arrival. The use of apocalyptic imagery in Russian church conflict continued in the eighteenth century.

5. 1770 to the Present. a. The rise of modern criticism. At first the world- and church-historical method of interpretation continued to flourish. Among its advocates were J. Bicheno (1793) and J. Priestley (1803–4), both of whom saw the French Revolution as the earthquake of Rev 11:13. Often used in the nineteenth century, the detailed church-historical method ceased to exercise much influence in academic circles by the twentieth century.

During this period important developments took place in academic research on the Apocalypse. Questions about the nature of its theology and the accuracy of its prophecies led scholars to make adverse criticisms. J. SEMLER (1771–76) thought it unfit for inclusion in the Bible, while J. D. MICHAELIS (1788) questioned its authorship and inspiration. However, the most skeptical approach came from C. Dupuis (1795), who regarded it as a Phrygian cultic document based on an ancient solar myth.

Contemporary-historical interpretation was widely practiced. G. Herder (1779) followed Abauzit in explaining Revelation as a prediction of the downfall of Judaism. J. G. EICHHORN (1791) saw it as a prophecy of both the destruction of the Jewish state and the fall of the Roman Empire, and F. Lücke (1832) examined it in relation to other writings belonging to the genre of what he called "apocalyptic." In the 1840s C. Fritzsche, F. Benary, F. HITZIG, and E. REUSS (see W. Bousset [1906] 105-6) argued that 666, the number of the beast, signified Nero Caesar. F. C. BAUR (1864) contended that Revelation was written in opposition to Pauline teaching (see PAUL). In a modified form of the church-historical method, C. Auberlen (1854) argued that the book prophesied the great epochs in the development of the kingdom of God. E. HENGSTENBERG (1849–50) combined that modified approach with preterism.

In the late nineteenth century, theories about sources and REDACTION were developed. E. Vischer (1886) and F. SPITTA (1889) argued that Jewish sources lay behind Revelation, and even more complex theories were put forward by D. Völter (1886) and others. W. BOUSSET (1896) claimed that the book was a unified work that had assimilated various apocalyptic fragments. According to R. CHARLES (1920), it contains earlier sources but in its present form is mostly the work of one author, although a redactor has worked on the text. H. SWETE (1951) maintained that Revelation is a unity, a viewpoint that became more fashionable later in the twentieth century.

There was growing interest in the book's relationship to myth, a theme developed earlier by Dupuis. Both Bousset and Charles were influenced by H. GUNKEL (1895), who stressed Revelation's debt to Near Eastern, especially Babylonian, MYTHOLOGY. Others scholars, including F. Boll (1914), related its visions to universal astral myths.

Most subsequent commentators have used a combination of critical methods, giving serious consideration to the mythological background, the possibility of sources and redaction, the influence of the first-century situation, and the relationship to Judaism and to other apocalyptic literature (e.g., W. Hadorn [1928]; E. Lohse [1960]; G. CAIRD [1966]; G. Beasley-Murray [1974]; H. Kraft [1974]; R. Mounce [1977]; J. Sweet [1979]; and J. Roloff [1993]). E. Allo (1921) and P. Prigent (1981) maintained both an Augustinian theory of the millennium and the principle of recapitulation. E. LOHMEYER (1926) and J. Sickenberger (1940) rejected the notion that the book is related directly to Roman persecution. E. Corsini (1983) claims that it describes events from the creation to the fall of Jerusalem. P. Minear (1968) thinks that it alludes to opposition from false teachers. A. FARRER (1949) and Prigent (1964) have given attention to its liturgical setting.

According to E. Schüssler Fiorenza (1985), its author belonged to a Christian prophetic-apocalyptic school. R. Bauckham (1993b) made a detailed study of the book's theology, and T. Holtz (1971) investigated its christology. M. Rissi (1965) interpreted it in relation to salvation history, while W. RAMSAY (1904), P. Touilleux (1935), and C. Hemer (1986) examined its background in Asia Minor. Among the many popular works that have taken serious account of modern scholarship are those by H. Lilje (1940) and W. BARCLAY (1976). In addition to taking account of scholarship, A. Boesak (1987) in South Africa and R. Foulkes (1989), D. Ramírez (1989–90), and P. Richard (1995) in Latin America interpret the Apocalypse in light of the social injustices of their own times.

b. Literary criticism and the social sciences. The poetic and dramatic qualities of the book have been recognized for a long time. Herder emphasized its poetic excellence. M. STUART (1851) argued that it was an epic, and Lohmeyer attempted to divide it into strophes. Following in Pareus's footsteps, F. Hartwig (1780–83), Eichhorn, F. Palmer (1903), J. Bowman (1955), and J. Blevins (1984) have explained it as a drama. The second half of the twentieth century has seen an intensification of interest in its literary qualities. There have been discussions of the book's genre and function (J. Collins [1979]; F. Mazzaferri [1989]), while other scholars have combined the insights of the social sciences (see SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISM) with those of LITERARY criticism. RHETORICAL CRITICISM has been applied to the book as well; its structure has been closely examined and attention has been paid in varying degrees to the insights of SOCIOLOGY, anthropology, PSYCHOLOGY (J. Gager [1975]; A. Y. Collins [1984]; Schüssler Fiorenza), and the role of gender (T. Pippin [1992]).

Writers from disciplines other than biblical criticism have reflected on issues connected with the Apocalypse. F. Engels (1964) compared the community depicted in the book with socialist movements of his day. N. Cohn (1957) and E. Tuveson (1964, 1968), studying the impact of millenarian thought on society, also included discussions of Revelation's impact. C. JUNG (1954) made observations from the viewpoint of psychology. Prominent in the writings of such literary critics as F. Kermode (1967) and N. Frye (1982), Revelation has also given rise to reflections by the philosopher and critic J. Derrida (1983).

c. Authorship and date. Many scholars in the nineteenth century and most in the twentieth rejected traditional authorship. F. HITZIG (1843) argued for John Mark as the author, and Lohmeyer (1926) suggested John the Elder. According to J. Ford (1975), most of the book is a product of the John the Baptist circle, to which a Christian redactor has made additions; however, some scholars, including Allo and I. Beckwith (1919), have favored the traditional view. Although rejecting apostolic authorship, Lohmeyer argued that its author also wrote John's Gospel and the JOHANNINE LETTERS. Most scholars have dated the work in the reign of Domitian, but others, especially in the nineteenth century, preferred 66–70, while A. Farrer (1964) assigned it to the reign of Trajan.

d. Other interpretations. The theosophist J. Pryse (1906) and the anthroposophist R. Steiner (1943) have given esoteric interpretations of Revelation. The book has also played an important part in formulating the expectations of several popular religious movements. Reflected in the oracles of the visionaries R. Brothers and J. Southcott in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, it has figured prominently in the teaching of Mormons, Seventh-Day Adventists, Jehovah's Witnesses, and many popular interpreters who have affirmed the imminence of the second advent. Dispensationalism, which can be traced back to J. Darby in the mid-nineteenth century, has attracted an enormous number of supporters. Their position, stated in the SCOFIELD Reference Bible (1909 and 1917) and in the work of H. Lindsey (1970), is that the redeemed will be snatched to heaven in the "rapture," escaping the seven-year tribulation that will precede the millennium. Millenarianism is also advocated by those who believe that Great Britain and the United States are the lost tribes of Israel (e.g., E. Hine [1874]; H. Armstrong [1959]) and appeared in a violent form in the activities of D. Koresh's Branch Davidians.

The impact of the Apocalypse has extended far beyond the sphere of organized religion. Its language and images have been adopted by the advocates of social change and have been enlisted in the service of nationalism. Not confined to traditional Western culture, it has influenced millenarian-type movements in other cultures as well.

6. Worship, the Inner Life, Art, and Literature. The Apocalypse has had a powerful influence on Christian worship. In addition to its inclusion in lectionaries, it has been the inspiration for many hymns. Portions of the book have often been used in anthems, prominently in G. F. Handel's (1685–1759) Messiah (see MUSIC, THE BIBLE AND). From the fifth century on, the Apocalypse has played an important part in Christian art as well (see ART, THE BIBLE AND). Illuminated manuscripts, sculptures, stained glass windows, tapestries, paintings, woodcuts, drawings, and frescoes in the apses of ancient churches have been based on its visions; and it has attracted artists as diverse as Giotto (c. 1266–1337), Correggio (1494–1534), A. Dürer (1471–1528), El Greco (1541–1615), W. Blake (1757–1827), W. Kandinsky (1866–1944), and S. Dali (1904–89).

The book has frequently appealed to men and women of letters. It was the subject of a devotional commentary by C. Rossetti (1896) but also inspired a not so devotional but intensely passionate commentary by D. Lawrence (1931), who, although entranced by its echoes of ancient myth, denounced it as "the Judas of the NT." It is the theme of several works by P. Claudel. Essayists, novelists, playwrights, filmmakers, and such poets as Dante, Spenser, J. MILTON, and Blake have used its imagery as they have reacted to the upheavals and calamities of their age.

Few books have generated such diverse interpretations or awakened the interest of as wide a variety of people as the Apocalypse. On many occasions the book seems to have been at the mercy of the personal concerns and expectations of its interpreters; nevertheless, its vivid and evocative imagery and the power and passion with which it gives expression to the hopes and fears of individuals have made their mark on the way people think and feel about their present predicaments and their ultimate destiny.

Bibliography: F. Abauzit, Oeuvres diverses (1770). L. de Alcazar, Vestigatio arcani sensus in Apocalypsi (1614). Alcuin, Commentariorum in Apocalypsin libri quinque (PL 100). E. B. Allo, Saint Jean, L'Apocalypse (1921). J. H. Alsted, Diatribe de mille annis apocalypticis (1627). Ambrosius Autpertus, Expositio in Apocalypsin (CCCM 27, 27a). Andreas, Commentarius in Apocalypsin (PG 106, MThS, 1955). Anselm of Laon, Enarrationes in Apocalypsin (PG 106). Apringius, Commentaire sur l'apocalypse (1900). Arethas, Commentarius in Apocalypsin (PG 106). H. W. Armstrong, The Book of Revelation Unveiled at Last! (1959). C. A. Auberlen, Der Prophet Daniel und die Offenbarung Johannis (1854). Augustine, Sermones (PL 38); De civitate Dei (PL 41; CSEL 40; CCSL 48). J. Bale, The Image of Bothe Churches After the Most Wonderfull and Heavenly Revelacion of Sainct John the Evangelist (1548). B. W. Ball, A Great Expectation: Eschatological Thought in English Protestantism to 1660 (1975). W. Barclay, The Revelation of John (2 vols., 1976). R. Bauckham, Tudor Apocalypse: Sixteenth-century Apocalypticism, Millenarianism, and the English Reformation (1978); The Climax of Prophecy: Studies on the Book of Revelation (1993a); The Theology of the Book of Revelation (1993b). F. C. Baur, Vorlesungen über neutestamentliche Theologie (1864). G. R. Beasley-Murray, The Book of Revelation (1974). Beatus, Beati in Apocalypsin libri duodecim (1930). I. Beckwith, The Apocalypse of John (1919). Bede, Explanatio Apocalypsis (PL 93). R. Bellarmine, Controversiae Generales 3.1 (Opera 2, 1870; repr. 1965) 5-75. J. A. Bengel, Erklärte Offenbarung (1740). Berengaud, Expositio super septem visiones libri Apocalypsis (PL 17, among works of Ambrose). J. Bicheno, Signs of the Times (1793). J. H. Billington, The Icon and the Axe: An Interpretive History of Russian Culture (1966). J. L. Blevins, Revelation as Drama (1984). O. Böcher, Die Johannesapokalypse (1975); "Die Johannes-Apokalypse in der neueren Forschung," ANRW II. 25.5 (1988) 3850-93. A. Boesak, Comfort and Protest: Reflections on the Apocalypse of John of Patmos (1987). Viscount Bolingbroke (Henry St. John), Philosophical Works 2 (1754, repr. 1977) 337. F. Boll, Aus der Offenbarung Johannis: Hellenistische Studien zum Weltbild der Apokalypse (1914). J. B. Bossuet, L'Apocalypse avec une explication (1689). W. Bousset, Die Offenbarung Johannis (1896, rev. ed. 1906). J. W. Bowman, The Drama of the Book of Revelation: An Account of the Book, with a New Translation in the Language of Today (1955). T. Brightman, Apocalypsis Apocalypseos (1609). Bruno of Segni, Expositio in Apocalypsim (PL 165). T. Burnet, The Theory of the Earth (2 vols., 1684–90). G. B. Caird, A Commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine (1966). Cassiodorus, Complexiones Actuum Apostolorum et Apocalypsis Joannis (PL 70). R. H. Charles, Studies in the Apocalypse: Being Lectures Delivered Before the University of London (1913); The Revelation of St. John (2 vols., 1920). J. H. Charlesworth (ed.), OTP 1 (1983). D. Chytraeus, Commentarius in Apocalypsin (1563). P. Claudel, Oeuvres complètes 21 (1963); 25 (1965); 26 (1967). J. Cocceius, Cogitationes de Apocalypsi Johannis (1665). N. Cohn, The Pursuit of the Millennium (1957). A. Y. Collins, Crisis and Catharsis: The Power of the Apocalypse (1984). J. J. Collins (ed.), Apocalypse: the Morphology of a Genre (Semeia 14, 1979). Commodianus, Carmina (PL 5; CSEL 15; CCSL 128). E. Corsini, The Apocalypse: The Perennial Revelation of Jesus Christ (1983). J. W. Davidson, The Logic of Millennial Thought: Eighteenth-century New England (1977). J. Derrida, D'un ton apocalyptique adopté naguère en philosophie (1983). C. Diobouniotis and A. von Harnack (ed.), Der Scholien-Kommentar des Origenes zur Apokalypse Johannis nebst einem Stuck aus Irenaeus, lib. V. Graece (TU 38, 1911). Dionysius Bar Salibi, In Apocalypsim Johannis (CSCO, 53, 60). C. F. Dupuis, Origine de tous les cultes (4 vols., 1795). J. Edwards, History of the Work of Redemption (1774). J. G. Eichhorn, Commentarius in Apocalypsin Joannis (1791). E. B. Elliott, Horae Apocalypticae: Or a Commentary on the Apocalypse, Critical and Historical 4 (1862). J. Ellul, Apocalypse: The der Hoffnung künftiger besserer Zeiten (1693). F. Spitta, Die Offenbarung des Johannes untersucht (1889). E. Stauffer, Christ and the Caesars (1952). R. Steiner, The Apocalypse (1943). M. Stuart, Commentary on the Apocalypse (2 vols., 1851). E. Swedenborg, Apocalypse Revealed (1766). J. P. M. Sweet, Revelation (1979). H. B. Swete, The Apocalypse of St. John (1951). P. Toon (ed.), Puritans, the Millennium, and the Future of Israel: Puritan Eschatology, 1600–1660. A Collection of Essays (1970). P. Touilleux, L'Apocalypse et les cultes de Domitien et de Cybèle (1935). E. E. Tuveson, Millennium and Utopia: A Study in the Background of the Idea of Progress (1964); Redeemer Nation: The Idea of America's Millennial Role (1968). Ubertino of Casale, Arbor vitae crucifixae Jesu (1485, repr. 1961). Victorinus, Scholia in Apocalypsim (CSEL 49). E. Vischer, Die Offenbarung Johannis: Eine jüdische Apokalypse in christlicher Bearbeitung (1886). C. Vitringa, ANAKRII apocalypsios Joannis Apostoli (1705). F. M. A. de Voltaire, Dictionnaire philosophique (1765). D. Völter, Die Entstehung der Apokalypse (1882); Die Offenbarung Johannis (1904). A. W. Wainwright, Mysterious Apocalypse: Interpreting the Book of Revelation (1993). J. J. Wettstein, Novum Testamentum Graecum 2 (1752, repr. 1962). W. Whiston, A New Theory of the Earth (1737). D. Whitby, Paraphrase and Commentary on the NT (1702). B. R. Wilson, Magic and the Millennium: A Sociological Study of Religious Movements of Protest Among Tribal and Third-world Peoples (1973). T. von Zahn, Die Offenbarung des Johannes 1 (1924) 100-28. U. Zwingli, Werke 6, 1 (1982) 395.

Book of Revelation (1977). F. Engels, On Religion (K. Marx and F. Engels, 1964) 205-12, 316-47. D. Erasmus, Annotationes in Novum Testamentum (1527). M. J. Erickson, Contemporary Options in Eschatology: A Study of the Millennium (1977). A. Farrer, A Rebirth of Images: The Making of St. John's Apocalypse (1949); The Revelation of St. John the Divine (1964). A. Feuillet, The Apocalypse (1965). K. R. Firth, The Apocalyptic Tradition in Reformation Britain, 1530–1645 (1979). J. M. Ford, Revelation (1975). R. Foulkes, El Apocalypsis de San Juan: Una lectura desde America Latina (1989). J. Foxe, Eicasmi, seu meditationes in sacram Apocalypsin (1587). L. E. Froom, The Prophetic Faith of Our Fathers: The Historical Development of Prophetic Interpretation (4 vols., 1950–54). N. Frye, The Great Code: The Bible and Literature (1982). J. G. Gager, Kingdom and Community: The Early World of Early Christianity (1975). H. Grotius, Annotationes in Vetus Testamentum (1644). H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit: Eine Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen 1 und Ap Joh 12 (1895). J.-M. Guyon, La sainte Bible ou le Vieux et le Nouveau Testament, avec des explications et réflexions qui regardent la vie intérieure 20 (20 vols., 1790). W. Hadorn, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (1928). H. Hammond, Paraphrase and Annotations on the NT (1653). J. F. C. Harrison, The Second Coming: Popular Millenarianism, 1780–1850 (1979). F. G. Hartwig, Apologie der Apokalypse (4 pts., 1780–83). Haymo, Expositio in Apocalypsim (PL 117). C. J. Hemer, The Letters to the Seven Churches in Their Local Setting (1986). E. W. Hengstenberg, Die Offenbarung des heiligen Johannes (2 vols., 1849–50). G. F. Herder, Maranatha (1779). E. Hine, Forty-seven Identifications of the British Nation with the Lost Ten Tribes of Israel (1874). F. Hitzig, Über Johannes Markus (1843). T. Holtz, Die Christologie der Apokalypse des Johannes und seine Schriften, oder: Welcher Johannes hat die Offenbarung verfasst? (1971). James I, Works (1616). M. R. James, The Apocalypse in Art (1931). Joachim of Fiore, Concordia novi et veteris Testamenti (1519, repr. 1964); Expositio in Apocalypsim (1527, repr. 1964). C. G. Jung, Answer to Job (1954). P. Jurieu, The Accomplishment of the Scripture Prophecies or the Approaching Deliverance of the Church (1687). W. Kamlah, Apokalypse und Geschichtstheologie: Die mittelalterliche Auslegung der Apokalypse vor Joachim von Fiore (1935). F. Kermode, The Sense of an Ending: Studies in the Theory of Fiction (1967). H. Kraft, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (1974); Die Bilder der Offenbarung des Johannes (1994). G. Kretschmar, Die Offenbarung des Johannes: Die Geschichte ihrer Auslegung im 1 Jahrtausend (1985). A. Kuyper, The Revelation of St. John (1964). Lactantius, Institutiones divinae (PL 6, CSEL 19). D. H. Lawrence, Apocalypse (1931). J. Lead, A Revelation of the Revelations (1683). H. Lilje, Das letzte Buch der Bibel (1940). H. Lindsey, The Late Great Planet Earth (1970). E. Lohmeyer, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (1926). E. Lohse, Die Offenbarung des Johannes (1960). M. Lowman, A Paraphrase and Notes on the Revelation of St. John (1747). F. Lücke, Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung in die Offenbarung Johannis und in die gesammelte apokalyptische Literatur (1832). M. Luther, Das Neue Testament Deutsch (1522). B. W. McGinn, Visions of the End: Apocalyptic Traditions in the Middle Ages (1979). B. W. McGinn et al. (eds.), The Encyclopedia of Apocalypticism (3 vols., 1998). G. Maier, Die Johannesoffenbarung und die Kirche (1981). F. D. Mazzaferri, The Genre of the Book of Revelation from a Source-critical Perspective (1989). J. Mede, Clavis Apocalyptica (1627, rev. ed. 1632). F. van de Meer, Apocalypse: Visions from the Book of Revelation in Western Art (1978). J. D. Michaelis, Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des Neuen Bundes (2 vols., 1788). J. Milton, Complete Prose Works 1 (1953) 815. P. S. Minear, I Saw a New Earth: An Introduction to the Visions of the Apocalypse (1968). A. Minorita, Expositio in Apocalypsim (1955). T. Morgan, The Moral Philosopher in a Dialogue Between Philalethes, a Christian Deist, and Theophanes, a Christian Jew (1738–40) 1:364-82. R. H. Mounce, The Book of Revelation (1977). J. Napier, A Plaine Discovery of the Whole Revelation of Saint John (1593). I. Newton, Observations upon the Prophecies (1733). Nicolas of Lyra, Postillae perpetuae (1471–72). Oecumenius, Complete Commentary of Oecumenius on the Apocalypse (1928). P. Olivi, Postillae (excerpts in I. von Döllinger, Beiträge zur Sektengeschichte 2 [1890, repr. 1968] 527-85). F. Palmer, The Drama of the Apocalypse in Relation to the Literary and Political Circumstances of Its Time (1903). D. Pareus, In divinam Apocalypsin S. Apostoli et evangelistae Johannis Commentarius (1618). C. A. Patrides and J. Wittreich (ed.), The Apocalypse in English Renaissance Thought and Literature: Patterns, Antecedents, and Repercussions (1985), includes extensive bibliography from the third century onward. J. E. Petersen, Anleitung zu gründlicher Verständnis der heiligen Offenbarung (1696). J. W. Petersen, Die Verklärte Offenbarung Jesu Christi: nach dem Zusammenhang . . . des Geistes (1706). T. Pippin, Death and Desire: The Rhetoric of Gender in the Apocalypse of John (1992). J. Priestley, Notes on all the Books of Scripture for the Use of the Pulpit and Private Families (4 vols., 1803–4). P. Prigent, L'Apocalypse et Liturgie (1964); L'Apocalypse de Saint Jean (1981). Primasius, Commentarius in Apocalypsim (PL 68, CCSL 92, 1985). J. M. Pryse, The Apocalypse Unsealed (1906). Pseudo-Augustine (Caesarius?), Expositio in Apocalypsim Beati Joannis (PL 35). D. Ramírez Fernández "La idolatría del poder," Revista de Interpretación Bíblica Latinoamericana 4 (1989) 109-28; "El juicio de Dios a las transnacionales," Revista de Interpretación Bíblica Latinoamericana 5-6 (1990) 55-74. W. M. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia and Their Place in the Plan of the Apocalypse (1904). F. Ribera, Commentarius in Apocalypsin (1591). Richard of St. Victor, In Apocalypsim Johannis libri septem (PL 196). P. Richard, Apocalypse: A People's Commentary on the Book of Revelation (1995). M. Rissi, Was ist und was geschehen soll danach: Die Zeit- und Geschichtsauffassung der Offenbarung des Johannes (1965); Die Hure Babylon und die Verführung der Heiligen: Eine Studie zur Apokalypse des Johannes (c. 1995). J. Roloff, The Revelation of John (1993). C. G. Rossetti, The Face of the Deep (1896). C. Rowland, "Revelation," NIB (1997) 12:501-736. Rupert of Deutz, Commentarius in Apocalypsim (PL 169). E. Schüssler Fiorenza, The Book of Revelation: Justice and Judgment (1985). J. S. Semler, Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canons (4 pts., 1771–76). J. Sickenberger, Erklärung der Johannesapokalypse (1940). P. J. Spener, Behauptung

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

RHETORICAL CRITICISM, HEBREW BIBLE

1. Rhetorical Competence in the Hebrew Scriptures. "One who knows how to speak. . . ." Rhetorical competence is one of the qualities that commends the young David to Saul's court, and several speeches put into the mouth of Jesse's son bear out the judgment (1 Sam 16:18; cf. 1 Sam 17:45-47; 24:8-15; 25:21-22; 2 Sam 1:19-27). Not surprisingly, HB narrative literature offers many examples of persuasive speechmaking: Judah's pleading with Joseph not to keep Benjamin as hostage (Gen 44:18-34); Moses' sermon-like conclusion of his farewell discourse, setting before Israel the choice between life and death (Deuteronomy 29–30); Samuel's sobering lecture on "the ways of the king . . . over you" (1 Sam 8:10-18); Abigail's honed words restraining David from rash action (1 Sam 25:23-31); Nathan's surprise-charged parable of the ewe lamb (2 Sam 12:1-6); not to mention the alluring argumentations through which two royal counselors compete for Absalom's ear (2 Sam 16:15–17:14). Also, narrative epilogues to the fall of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah (2 Kgs 17:7-23; Jer 44:1-14) as well as the story of Jerusalem's rescue from Sennacherib's siege (Isaiah 36–37) show persuasive pens at work, as do Abijah's self-assured sermon addressed to his wayward Israelite opponents (2 Chr 13:4-12) and the narrative of Ruth, the model of a biblical short story. In short, vivid and varied vocabulary, appealing style, pronounced point of view, functional character portrayal, and unity as well as variation in design characterize these examples of biblical eloquence, which, like that of Homer or of the ancient Egyptian sages (M. Fox [1983]), is "preconceptual" (G. Kennedy [1980] 120).

Rhetorical competence is made the subject of reflection in Proverbs: "The mind of the wise makes his speech judicious and adds persuasiveness to his lips" (Prov 16:23). Various aspects of the art of speaking well are noted: the need to listen with care and to react at the right time (15:23; 18:13); the necessity to ponder an issue in depth and to respond dispassionately (17:27*b*); the urging to be brief and to the point (17:27*a*); and the importance of fitting words and persuasive arguments (16:21). In short, "death and life are in the power of the tongue," and "a gentle tongue is a tree of life" (18:21*a*; 15:4*a*).

However, in the story of Moses' call, his lack of rhetorical competence is the retarding, yet essential, element: He responds to the divine call to speak on God's behalf with the statement that he is "not eloquent [but] slow of speech and of tongue." However, he finds himself overruled by the divine affirmation that God will teach him what to say (Exod 4:10-12). The revelation he then proceeds to convey is thus a divine rhetoric that is not mediated to its human addressees through any human rhetorical competence. It is this antithesis that eventually set Jewish and Christian canonical writings, as divine revelation, apart from human eloquence. Holy writ is by definition not subject to standards of rhetorical competence.

2. Classical Rhetorical Criticism and Biblical Interpretation. This embedded tension accounts for the nearly complete absence of formally conceptualized Greek and Roman rhetorical criticism from biblical interpretation until the last decades of the twentieth century. In their formative centuries, church and synagogue tended to define themselves in contrast to Roman-Hellenistic culture; thus only writers who sought to bring Jerusalem and Athens together drew on classical rhetorical theory in the service of their cause, e.g., AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO (see J. Murphy [1974] for his significant impact). Some theologians and Midrashists (see MIDRASH), in fact, adopted certain classical rhetorical practices; note for instance TERTULLIAN's persuasion-driven treatises or the use of Hellenistic rhetoric in rabbinic exegesis (D. Daube [1949]).

In the Middle Ages and until the Enlightenment, teachers and homilists in synagogue and church carried out biblical interpretation within institutionally defined parameters and in support of then-prevalent conceptualizations of the religious heritage. This state of affairs changed, especially in Western Christianity, with the Renaissance and the Enlightenment. Thus J. M. Leon's The Book of the Honeycomb's Flow (1475/76) shows how a kind of rhetorical analysis was used in Judaism in the late fifteenth century. Another example is J. Alting's (1685) use of rhetorical categories in his "theoretical-practical" commentary, written some two centuries later. For instance, he concludes the introduction to Deut 32:1-43 with the identification of its four parts of a speech as defined in Greek and Roman rhetorical theory: exordium (vv. 1-2), propositio (vv. 3-6), narratio (vv. 7-42), and conclusio (v. 43).

From the mid-eighteenth century onward exegetes were increasingly unwilling to see themselves as suppliers of proof texts to dogmaticians and began to embark on exegesis as an interpretive enterprise in its own right. In the course of the two centuries since then, various critical methods of LITERARY analysis and synthesis practiced in the disciplines of the humanities were adopted and, as needed, adapted to meet institutional limitations. Occasionally, however, rhetorical considerations were explicitly made part of interpretive approaches. Thus, C. BRIGGS (1900, 478) briefly discussed "logical and rhetorical interpretations" as part of interpretation generally; and E. KÖNIG discussed at length "the nature of the style" in biblical literature, covering many of the traditional topics within a psychologically-defined framework (see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). The papal encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (1942) removed for the Roman Catholic Church the taint of "modernism" from the new methods of interpretation and affirmed their validity for church-related exegesis. The same is now largely true for all but orthodox Judaism. The range and variety of approaches is considerable and defined by linguistic, sociological (see SOCIOLOGY AND HB STUDIES), psychological, or philosophical perspectives (see the survey by A. Suelzer and J. Kselman [1990]).

3. The "New" Rhetorical Criticism. The emergence of HB rhetorical criticism as an identifiable approach is usually based on J. MUILENBURG's 1969 paper "Form Criticism and Beyond" (W. Wuellner [1987] 451; Suelzer-Kselman, 1127). The title suggests what his argumentation lays out: FORM CRITICISM, proceeding as it does analytically, needs to be followed by a synthetically oriented examination of "literary composition . . . exhibiting . . . structural patterns . . . discerning the many and various devices by which the predictions are formulated and ordered into a unified whole." This method Muilenburg described as "rhetorical criticism" (8).

Muilenburg's identification of this step beyond form criticism is, however, problematic in that it introduces as a separate move beyond form criticism the kind of inquiry that H. GUNKEL, the father of form criticism, considered an integral part of the method. More important, the suggested term "rhetorical criticism" refers to a scholarly discipline practiced since Aristotle, Cicero, Quintilian, and Augustine that may be defined as the study and practice of the art of speaking/writing well.

Ancient rhetorics identify three kinds of speeches: judicial speeches, related to the past and in its positive formulation constituted as defense, in its negative form as accusation; deliberative or political speeches, related to the future either as exhortation or warning; and demonstrative speeches, related to the present either as praise or reproach. The process of composition moves through three stages: The conception of the line of argumentation (inventio) is followed by the selection of the fitting style (elocutio), then the composition of its structure (dispositio). The argument is supported by two kinds of proofs: non-technical, like documents or oaths, and technical, based on such considerations as probability. Important aspects of the speech are the speaker's stature (ethos), the rationality of the speech (logos), and the emotional element with which the audience of the speech is addressed (pathos). The parts of the speech usually include an introduction (exordium); a narration (narratio), which may appear throughout the work; positive or negative lines of proof (confirmatio/confutatio); and a conclusion (peroratio). Based on K. Ziegler (1979), this incomplete survey shows that classical rhetoric deals only with prose; poetry is discussed separately as "poetics."

The terminological difficulty introduced by Muilenburg into HB interpretation is illustrated by the different way in which the 1984 work by Kennedy programmatically defines and practices NT RHETORICAL CRITICISM in terms of the classical system based on Aristotle. Kennedy's brief discussion (1980) notes that although "rhetorical consciousness is entirely foreign to the nature of biblical Judaism," it is nevertheless "fairly obvious that both as a whole and in its various books there are signs of oral, persuasive intent" (120-21). As far as a definition of HB rhetorical criticism is concerned, the summary of an emerging consensus by C. Black (1989) commends itself: Rhetorical criticism is "the study of the characteristic linguistic and structural features of a particular text in its present form, apart from its generic rootage, social usage, or historical development" (1988–89, 253; similarly M. Kessler [1982] 14).

Given this definition, literary-critical analyses that are not expressly identified as rhetorical criticism are equally of importance, e.g., D. Robertson's discussion of "the OT and the literary critic" (1977) or R. Alter's two books on "the art of biblical narrative and of biblical poetry" (1981, 1985). By the same token discussions of such topics as "the rhetoric of sexuality" (P. Trible [1978, 1984]) also need to be included because they not only combine rhetorical analysis with a specific hermeneutical perspective (see HERMENEUTICS) but also illustrate the range and variety of approaches presently being practiced. The latter is documented in an instructive discussion of contemporary "ways of analysing text" in D. Birch's survey of "language, literature and critical practice" (1989).

4. Perspectives and Representative Publications. Muilenburg's move to rhetorical criticism was not meant to discard form criticism—on the contrary, it perceived the former as a logical step beyond the latter. However, his commentary on Deutero-Isaiah proceeded synchronically—that is, made the text as it stands the basis of exegesis. As expected, the relation between the diachronic nature of earlier critical approaches and the synchronic character of rhetorical criticism has become a matter of debate. M. Weiss (1967), for instance, considered form criticism "irrelevant to biblical criticism," while others assume continuity between diachronic and synchronic approaches (M. Kessler [1982] 5, 12).

In the practice of rhetorical interpretation the most important decision is made at its inception: What is the extent of the unit to be analyzed? An intentionally conceived and formulated composition is not only structured and plotted but also defined by its beginning and ending. Thus analysis begins with the definition of the extent of the unit; rhetorical interpretation, at least in its basic sense, is concerned only with integral and complete units that expressly present themselves as such, e.g., the books of Ruth, Amos, or Job. Book chapters or lectionary pericopes are rarely primary units; also sections of relative conceptual and literary integrity like Genesis 24 or 2 Kings 22–23 are part of larger texts that constitute the primary parameters of rhetorical analysis. This consideration locates exegesis of subunits in a larger interpretive perspective but by the same token does not rule it out (note the fruitful exegeses of small text units in the collections edited by J. Jackson and M. Kellers [1974]; D. Clines, D. Gunn, and A. Hauser [1982]; and D. Patrick and A. Scult [1990]).

Rhetorical criticism cannot help but surface the social nature of all discourse. The search for the rhetoric of non-Western culture—and that of the Jewish scriptures is indeed so categorized—reveals, in the words of a recent reviewer, "a significant fact both about rhetoric and about the nature of its Western tradition: the true rhetoric of any age and of any people is to be found deep within what might be called attitudinizing conventions, precepts that condition one's stance toward experience, knowledge, tradition, language, and other people" (T. Sloan and C. Perelman [1974] 802). It comes as no surprise, then, when rhetorical criticism takes readers "away from a traditional message—or content-oriented reading of Scripture—to a reading which generates and strengthens ever-deepening personal, social, and cultural values" and leads its practitioners to "personal or social identification and transformation" (Wuellner [1987] 460-61, with reference to K. Burke's approach).

Representative publications include several monographs that deal with both theory and practice of rhetorical approaches generally, e.g., Alter, S. Bar-Efrat (1989), A. Berlin (1983), N. Frye (1957), L. Alonso Schökel (1965), M. Sternberg (1985), and Weiss. Other publications are concerned with certain parts of the Bible, e.g., J. Fokkelman (1975, 1981), M. Garsiel (1983), D. Jobling (1978, 1986), and R. Polzin (1980, 1989), with parts of the Law and the former prophets; F. Andersen and D. N. FREEDMAN (1980), M. Fox (1980), Y. Gitay (1981), W. Holladay (1976), and J. Lundblom (1975), with the latter prophets. Fox (1983) provides an instructive example of (preconceptual) rhetorical competence in ancient Egypt. The collections by Jackson and Kellers and Clines, Gunn, and Hauser as well as M. Fishbane's book (1979) interpret smaller text units. On the other hand, Trible is an example of rhetorical interpretation from the perspective of FEMINIST hermeneutics.

5. Method in Rhetorical Criticism: An Emerging Consensus? Three review articles include descriptions of steps to be followed in rhetorical criticism (Kessler, 8-9; Wuellner [1987] 455-58; Black, 254-55). On the basis of these works, five stages are suggested: (a) Determination of the extent of the unit. What are the opening and closing paragraphs, strophes, or sentences? How is the unit they delimit marked by compositional completeness and conceptual integrity? If the unit is a subunit of a larger text, what is its place and function within that macro-structure? In turn, if the unit is extensive and anthological or otherwise composite, what considerations need to qualify rhetorical analysis? (b) Identification of the rhetorical situation. What constellation of persons, circumstances, and events led to the composition of the text? How does the unit as a persuasion-oriented composition relate to the historical, social, and psychological setting of the composer? What options were available to the composer, and what is the creative, inventive element in the unit? (c) Identification of the rhetorical disposition. What encompassing strategy carries the argument? What is the latter, and how do the composer's stature, the perspicuity of the presentation, and the appeal to the expectations of the audience serve it? How is the text structured as a unified whole? (d) Determination of rhetorical technique. What style is used? What supporting proofs and clarifying illustrations are employed? What techniques, such as repetition, type-scenes, and reticence, are used? What is the nature of the imagery, and in what manner are social and historical legacies drawn into the presentation? (e) Review of the analysis. In what manner do the insights gathered in analysis fit into a consistent and substantial understanding of the passage? How does the analysis of the whole unit lead to an understanding that is more than the sum of its individual stages?

Bibliography: L. Alonso Schökel, The Inspired Word: Scripture in the Light of Language and Literature (ET 1965). R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (1981); The Art of Biblical Poetry (1985); J. Alting, Operum Tomus Secundus . . . Commentarii Theorico-Practici in loca quaedam selecta VT (1685). F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman, Hosea: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (1980). Aristotle, The Rhetoric and the Poetic of Aristotle (ed. E. P. J. Corbett, 1954, 1988). S. Bar-Efrat, Narrative Art in the Bible (JSOTSup 70, Bible and Literature Series 17, 1989). A. Berlin, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (Bible and Literature Series 9, 1983). D. Birch, Language, Literature, and Critical Practice: Ways of Analysing Text (The Interface Series, 1989). C. C. Black, "Keeping Up with Recent Studies, pt. 16: Rhetorical Criticism and Biblical Interpretation," ET 100 (1989) 252-58. C. A. Briggs, General Introduction to the Study of Holy Scripture (1899). K. Burke, A Rhetoric of Motives (1950). D. J. A. Clines, D. M. Gunn, and A. J. Hauser (eds.), Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature (JSOTSup 19, 1982). E. P. J. Corbett, Classical Rhetoric for the Modern Student (1965). D. Daube, "Rabbinic Methods of Interpretation and Hellenistic Rhetoric," HUCA 22 (1949) 239-64. T. B. Dozeman, "OT Rhetorical Criticism," ABD (1992) 5:712-715. R. K. Duke, The Persuasive Appeal of the Chronicler: A Rhetorical Analysis (JSOTSup 88, Bible and Literature Series 25, 1990). M. Fishbane, Text and Texture: Close Readings of Selected Biblical Texts (1979). J. P. Fokkelman, Narrative Art in Genesis: Specimens of Stylistic and Structural Analysis (SSN 17, 1975); Narrative Art and Poetry in the Books of Samuel: A Full Interpretation Based on Stylistic and Structural Analyses (SSN 20, 23, 27, 31, 1981). M. V. Fox, "The Rhetoric of Ezekiel's Vision of the Valley of the Bones," HUCA 51 (1980) 1-15; "Ancient Egyptian Rhetoric," Rhetorica 1 (1983) 9-22. N. Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); The Great Code: The Bible and Literature (1982). M. Garsiel, The First Book of Samuel: A Literary Study of Comparative Structures, Analogies, and Parallels (1983; ET 1985). Y. Gitay, Prophecy and Persuasion: A Study of Isaiah 40–48 (FThL 14, 1981). W. L. Holladay, The Architecture of Jeremiah 1–20 (1975). J. J. Jackson and M. Kessler (eds.), Rhetoric Criticism: Essays in Honor of J. Muilenburg (PTMS 1, 1974). D. Jobling, The Sense of Biblical Narrative 1, 2 (JSOTSup 7, 39, 1978, 1986). G. A. Kennedy, Classical Rhetoric and Its Christian and Secular Tradition from Ancient to Modern Times (1980); NT Interpretation Through Rhetorical Criticism (Studies in Religion, 1984). M. Kessler, "A Methodological Setting for Rhetorical Criticism," Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature (ed. D. J. A. Clines et al., 1982) 1-19. E. König, Stilistik, Rhetorik, Poetik in Bezug auf die biblische Literatur (1900). J. M. Leon, The Book of the Honeycomb's Flow (Hebrew, 1475/76; ET, ed. I. Rabinowitz, 1983). J. R. Lundblom, Jeremiah: A Study in Ancient Hebrew Rhetoric (SBLDS 18, 1975). R. Meynet, "Histoire de 'l'analyse rhétorique' en exégèse biblique," Rhetorica 8 (1990) 291-320. J. Muilenburg, "Isaiah 40–66 (Exegesis)," IB (1956) 5:422-773; "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18. J. J. Murphy, Rhetoric in the Middle Ages: A History of Rhetorical Theory from St. Augustine to the Renaissance (1974). D. Patrick and A. Scult, Rhetoric and Biblical Interpretation (JSOTSup 82, Bible and Literature 26, 1990). R. Polzin, Moses and the Deuteronomist: Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges (1980); Samuel and the Deuteronomist (1989). I. Rabinowitz, "Pre-modern Jewish Study of Rhetoric: An Introductory Bibliography," Rhetorica 3 (1985) 137-44. D. Robertson, The OT and the Literary Critic (Guides to Biblical Scholarship, 1977). T. O. Sloan and C. Perelman, "Rhetoric," EncBrit (1974[15]) 798-805. M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (Indiana Literary Biblical Series, 1985). A. Suelzer and J. S. Kselman, "Modern OT Criticism," NJBC (1990) 1113-29. P. Trible, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (Overtures to Biblical Theology, 1978); Texts of Terror (Overtures to Biblical Theology, 1984). D. F. Watson and A. J. Hauser, Rhetorical Criticism of the Bible (Biblical Interpretation Series, 1994). M. Weiss, The Bible From Within: The Method of Total Interpretation (1962; ET 1984). W. Wuellner, "Where Is Rhetorical Criticism Taking Us?" CBQ 49 (1987) 448-63; "Hermeneutics and Rhetorics," Scripture (Journal of Bible and Theology in Southern Africa S 3, 1989). K. Ziegler, "Rhetorik," Der Kleine Pauly: Lexikon der Antike in fünf Bänden (ed. K. Ziegler and W. Sontheimer, 1979) 4:1396-414. M. Zulick, "The Active Force of Hearing: The Ancient Hebrew Language of Persuasion," Rhetorica 10 (1992) 367-80.

W. M. W. ROTH

RHETORICAL CRITICISM, NEW TESTAMENT

1. Origins and History. In his De doctrina Christiana (bk. 4), AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO used rhetorical conventions outlined in Cicero's De Inventione and Orator to analyze PAUL's letters. He found them to uphold classical standards of style, while having a distinct and qualitative rhetoric of their own. The Venerable BEDE analyzed figures and tropes in both testaments in his De schematibus et tropis.

The rhetoric of Paul was also of great interest to the Reformers. ERASMUS analyzed 1–2 Corinthians rhetorically in his Paraphrasis in duas epistolas Pauli ad Corinthios (1519). CALVIN gave a rhetorical analysis of Romans in his Testamenti Epistolas, atque eti in Epistol ad Hebraeos commentaria luculentissima (1551). Of special note is the work of P. MELANCHTHON, whose commentaries on Romans and Galatians use classical conventions of invention, arrangement, and style as well as more contemporary rhetorical conventions (e.g., Commentarii in epistolam ad Romanos hoc anno MDXL recogniti et locupletati [1540]).

After the Reformation, rhetorical analysis of the NT did not cease but was limited until German scholarship of the late eighteenth to early twentieth centuries revitalized the discipline. Very influential was K. Bauer's two-volume study of Paul's use of classical rhetorical techniques, entitled Rhetoricae Paullinae, vel, Quid ora- torium sit in oratione Paulli (1782). In his Die neutestamentliche Rhetorik: Ein Seitenstück zur Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms, the German lexicographer C. WILKE analyzed the stylistic features, sentence structure, and argumentation of the NT (1843). Other important works were written by F. Blass, E. KÖNIG, J. WEISS, R. BULTMANN, and H. WINDISCH.

Despite this important stream of tradition at the turn of the twentieth century, NT studies largely became isolated from rhetoric. E. NORDEN (1898) measured the Pauline epistles according to the classical canons of artistic prose style and found them unhellenic. This assessment remained dominant, and its influence was undergirded by the diminishing role of rhetorical instruction in Western school curricula. In NT studies a subsequent trickle of works reduced rhetorical analysis to matters of style, neglecting the more substantial aspects of invention and arrangement.

In the last three decades of the twentieth century, rhetorical criticism of the NT has been revived, partly due to dissatisfaction with FORM and REDACTION CRITICISM and to the renewed interest in rhetoric in the humanities, philosophy, and classics, as seen in the work of C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca (1969). In NT studies A. Wilder (1964) and R. Funk (1966) noted the rhetorical qualities of forms and genres and their relationship to their socio-historical settings. However, the major turning point for reintroducing rhetorical criticism to biblical studies was J. MUILENBURG's 1968 presidential address to the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (1969), in which he urged that biblical studies move beyond form criticism through the use of rhetorical criticism.

This reintroduction came in earnest with the work of H. Betz on Galatians (1975, 1979). He argued that Paul's epistles were composed with classical categories of invention, arrangement, and style in mind and that these could be used as a tool of interpretation. Although Betz has been challenged on several points, he reemphasized interpreting the Pauline epistles by using Greco-Roman rhetorical and epistolary theory in their complete form. At about the same time W. Wuellner was bringing Greco-Roman and more modern rhetorical theory to bear on Romans, arguing that the Pauline epistles should be approached primarily as argumentative and rhetorical (1976). Since these beginnings, hundreds of works have been produced (D. Watson and A. Hauser [1994]).

2. Contemporary Methodologies. Currently a wide variety of methodologies are being used in rhetorical criticism of the NT. These methodologies are based on Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions, on modern rhetorical theories, or on a mixture of both. Even within these broader categories variety abounds. The field is currently occupied with the refinement of methodology (D. Stamps [1992]).

a. Using Greco-Roman rhetoric. Rhetorical criticism can analyze the NT using Jewish and Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions, thereby helping to place the NT texts amid their oral and written cultures. It is a historical enterprise standing between ahistorical LITERARY criticism and historical criticism. This approach assumes that the NT authors were familiar with rhetoric either from formal education or through interaction with oral and written Hellenistic culture, which was permeated with rhetorical practice, and that the biblical documents are argumentative in nature.

The classicist G. Kennedy (1984, 33-38) was the first scholar to provide a methodology for rhetorical criticism of the Gospels and the epistles of the NT according to Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions. His methodology has five interrelated steps: (1) Determine the rhetorical unit. (2) Define the rhetorical situation. (3) Determine the rhetorical problem or stasis and the species of rhetoric, whether judicial (accusation and defense), deliberative (persuasion and dissuasion), or epideictic (praise and blame); (4) Analyze the invention, arrangement, and style. Invention is argumentation by ethos, pathos, and logos. Arrangement is the ordering of the various components, such as the exordium (introduction), narratio (statement of facts), probatio (main body), and peroratio (conclusion). Style is fitting the language to the needs of invention and includes such things as figures of speech and thought. And (5) evaluate the rhetorical effectiveness of the rhetorical unit in meeting the exigence.

This approach to rhetorical criticism of the NT has been very fruitful but has raised several questions: (1) Did rhetorical convention influence the epistolary genre to the extent that these conventions can be used to analyze an epistle? (2) To what the extent did Greco-Roman rhetoric influence Jewish culture by the first century CE? Can such rhetoric be used to analyze texts from a predominantly Jewish context? (3) What role does Jewish rhetoric play in early Christian rhetoric?

Besides these questions there are possible pitfalls in using the method, such as the temptation to rigidly apply rhetorical categories to biblical texts. Also, this approach has depended largely on rhetorical theory alone. Such theory is an abstraction from rhetorical practice, so practice reflected in extant letters and speeches composed by orators of Greece and Rome must also be brought to bear in analysis.

b. Using modern rhetoric. Many interpreters consider rhetorical analysis of the NT solely using Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions to be too limited and in need of supplementation with modern rhetorical theory (J. Botha [1989] 14-31; L. Thurén [1990] 41-78; Wuellner [1991] 171-85). Ancient rhetoric does not address all theoretical, practical, and philosophical questions posed by speech; and since the NT texts are rhetorical, they are capable of being analyzed by the principles of both Greco-Roman and modern rhetoric. Greco-Roman rhetorical theory is primarily interested in the creation of communication as oriented to the speaker, although some consideration of the audience reaction is present; whereas modern rhetoric concentrates on the effect of rhetoric on the speaker and the audience and on the larger social context of communication, which includes speaker and audience. Rhetorical criticism using modern rhetorical theory is a philosophical reconceptualization of Greco-Roman rhetoric, a synchronic approach to argumentation that does not suit purely historical investigation.

Use of the "new rhetoric" represented by Perelman and Olbrechts-Tyteca and others has been prominent. It redefines rhetoric as argumentation with a persuasive intent and focuses on the audience/readers of the rhetoric. The historical and social situation that produced speech and in which it was enacted becomes central. Rhetoric is a liaison between text and social context, assessing the latter through the former.

Wuellner identifies four features of theory and practice using modern rhetoric: (1) "the turn toward argumentation . . . and the designation of arguments as a text-type distinct from narrative and description"; (2) a "focus on the text's rhetorical intentionality or exigency"; (3) "the social, cultural, ideological values imbedded in the argument's premises, topoi, and hierarchies"; and (4) "the rhetorical or stylistic techniques . . . are seen as means to an end, and not as merely formal, decorative features" (1991, 176-77). Also, modern rhetorical analysis of the NT often enlists literary criticism, text linguistics, SEMIOTICS, stylistics, READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM, discourse analysis, and/or speech act theory.

3. Rhetorical Criticism of the Gospels. Many individual rhetorical features of the Gospels have been studied, but a thorough assessment of the rhetoric of an entire Gospel is as yet rare. Although Kennedy's method has been applied to portions of the Gospels, it fails to account for more elaborate argumentative schemes or for overall rhetorical structure. Ancient rhetoric did not have a theory of narrative that discussed plot development and would have aided in Gospel analysis.

The study of the ancient chreia has illumined the rhetoric of the Gospels (B. Mack [1987]; Mack and V. Robbins [1989]). A chreia (pl. chreiai) is "a saying or action that is expressed concisely, attributed to a character, and regarded as useful for living" (R. Hock and E. O'Neil [1986] 26); e.g., "Diogenes the philosopher, on being asked by someone how he could become famous, responded: 'By worrying as little as possible about fame' " (85). Chreiai were central to oral and written communication and to argumentation in the Greco-Roman world and were the basis of many rhetorical exercises described in the progymnasmata (preliminary exercises) used in rhetorical instruction in post-secondary education. These exercises taught students to work out the meaning of the saying or action in the chreia using long-established topics, including paraphrase, expansion, condensation, refutation, and confirmation.

Chreiai were used by the rabbis in the time of JESUS and can be found in contemporary literature from a Jewish provenance. The works of Plutarch and Diogenes Laertius show that they were also collected and expanded for use in biographies. As expected by their Jewish provenance and similarities to ancient biography, chreiai elaborations are basic literary units of the Gospels and include the words and deeds of Jesus (e.g., Matt 8:18-20), which were transmitted as oral and written chreiai. Teachers, preachers, and the Gospel writers elaborated them according to rhetorical conventions to suit their polemical, theological, and literary needs. This is demonstrated by the fact that a chreia in one Gospel is elaborated in its parallel account; e.g., Mark 10:13-16 is an elaborated chreia that is found in a more condensed form in Matt 19:13-15. The traditional understanding of form criticism that the sayings of Jesus were preserved separately in an oral tradition independent of a narrative context is no longer tenable (Mack [1987] 29-41; Mack and Robbins, chaps. 1–2).

Besides the use of chreiai in rhetorical criticism, there are studies showing that portions of the Gospels were written according to rhetorical imitation of texts and narrative paradigms. Alongside rhetorical analysis primarily based on Greco-Roman rhetoric there are also many important studies that use varying degrees of modern rhetorical theory, literary criticism, NARRATIVE CRITICISM, and SOCIOLOGY.

4. Rhetorical Criticism of the Epistles. Currently there is great debate about the extent to which Greco-Roman rhetorical theory influenced the epistolary genre in antiquity. Specifically, the debate concerns the relationship between rhetoric and the epistles of the NT, particularly those of Paul (R. Anderson [1996]; G. Hansen [1989] chaps. 1–2; Thurén, 57-64). Some interpreters limit rhetoric's influence on NT epistles to matters of style and some invention (C. Classen [1993]), while others view the epistles of the NT as speeches in epistolary form that can be analyzed using Greco-Roman rhetorical theory (K. Berger [1974]; Watson [1988]). Still others recognize that both rhetorical and epistolary theory affect the epistle to varying degrees or at different levels (Thurén, 58).

Epistolary and rhetorical theory were developed separately in antiquity; however, there are functional parallels between rhetorical and epistolary classifications and arrangement and some shared stylistic features. Regardless of this lack of articulated integration, by the first century rhetoric had exerted a strong influence on epistolary composition (e.g., the epistles of Demosthenes). Rhetorical handbooks may not have addressed letter writing because they were dominated by the concerns of oral delivery in judicial contexts.

To what extent did Paul receive rhetorical training, and did he employ rhetorical conventions in a conscious manner when writing his epistles? Opinions range from studied and conscious, to merely imitating or functionally related, and to unconsciously borrowing from the experience of oratory. Entire Pauline epistles or significant portions have been successfully analyzed according to the conventions of invention, arrangement, and style. Since Paul's epistles were to be read in the churches, it is logical to assume that they were fashioned like speeches.

Rhetorical criticism of the NT epistles that examines Greco-Roman rhetorical conventions has been used in conjunction with traditional historical-critical methodologies to define more precisely rhetorical strategies and specific types of argumentation as well as more intricate elaboration of arguments and themes, amplification techniques, and much more. The use of modern rhetoric in this analysis has been extremely interdisciplinary, employing discourse analysis, text-linguistics, and reader-response theory, to name a few other disciplines.

The future of rhetorical criticism of the NT will be interdisciplinary. This future is glimpsed in the development of socio-rhetorical criticism (Robbins [1996]), which uses a variety of methodologies to examine the inner texture, intertexture, social and cultural texture, IDEOLOGICAL texture, and sacred texture of the NT texts.

Bibliography: R. D. Anderson Jr., Ancient Rhetorical Theory and Paul (Contributions to Biblical Exegesis and Theology 18, 1996). K. Berger, "Apostelbrief und apostolische Rede: Zum Formular frühchristlicher Briefe," ZNW 65 (1974) 190-231. H. D. Betz, "The Literary Composition and Function of Paul's Letter to the Galatians," NTS 21 (1975) 353-79; Galatians: A Commentary on Paul's Letter to the Churches in Galatia (Hermeneia, 1979); "The Problem of Rhetoric and Theology According to the Apostle Paul," L'apôtre Paul: Personnalité, style et conception du ministère (BETL 73, ed. A. Vanhoye, 1986) 16-48. C. C. Black, "Rhetorical Criticism and Biblical Interpretation," ExpTim 100 (1989) 252-58. J. Botha, "On the 'Reinvention' of Rhetoric," Scriptura 31 (1989) 14-31. C. J. Classen, "St. Paul's Epistles and Ancient Greek and Roman Rhetoric," Rhetoric and the NT: Essays from the 1992 Heidelberg Conference (JSNTSup 90, ed. S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht, 1993) 265-91. R. W. Funk, Language, Hermeneutic, and Word of God (1966). G. W. Hansen, Abraham in Galatians: Epistolary and Rhetorical Contexts (JSNTSup 29, 1989). R. F. Hock, and E. N. O'Neil, The Chreia in Ancient Rhetoric, vol. 1, The Progymnasmata (Text and Translations 27, Graeco-Roman Religion Series 9, 1986). G. A. Kennedy, NT Interpretation Through Rhetorical Criticism (1984). J. Lambrecht, "Rhetorical Criticism and the NT," Bijdragen 50 (1989) 239-53. B. L. Mack, Anecdotes and Arguments: The Chreia in Antiquity and Early Christianity (Occasional Papers of the Institute for Antiquity and Christianity 10, 1987); Rhetoric and the NT (GBS, 1990). B. L. Mack and V. K. Robbins, Patterns of Persuasion in the Gospels (Foundations and Facets: Literary Facets, 1989). J. Muilenburg, "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18. E. Norden, Die antike Kunstprosa vom VI. Jahrhundert vor Christus bis in die Zeit der Renaissance (1898). C. Perelman and L. Olbrechts-Tyteca, La Nouvelle Rhétorique: Traité l'argumentation (1958; ET, tr. J. Wilkinson and P. Weaver, The New Rhetoric: A Treatise on Argumentation [1969]). V. K. Robbins, The Tapestry of Early Christian Discourse: Rhetoric, Society, and Ideology (1996). D. Stamps, "Rhetorical Criticism and the Rhetoric of NT Criticism," JTL 6 (1992) 268-79. L. Thurén, The Rhetorical Strategy of 1 Peter with Special Regard to Ambiguous Expressions (1990). D. F. Watson, Invention, Arrangement, and Style: Rhetorical Criticism of Jude and 2 Peter (SBLDS 104, 1988). D. F. Watson and A. J. Hauser, Rhetorical Criticism of the Bible: A Comprehensive Bibliography With Notes on History and Method (BIS 4, 1994). A. Wilder, The Language of the Gospel: Early Christian Rhetoric (1964). W. Wuellner, "Paul's Rhetoric of Argumentation in Romans: An Alternative to the Donfried-Karris Debate Over Romans," CBQ 38 (1976) 330-51; "Where Is Rhetorical Criticism Taking Us?" CBQ 49 (1987) 448-63; "Rhetorical Criticism and Its Theory in Culture-critical Perspective: The Narrative Rhetoric of John 11," Text and Interpretation: New Approaches in the Criticism of the NT (NTTS 15, eds. P. J. Hartin and J. H. Petzer, 1991) 171-85.

D. F. WATSON

RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR (c. 1123–73)

Born probably in Scotland, R. came to the abbey of St. Victor sometime in the 1150s. He was made subprior in 1159 and prior in 1162, dying in 1173. He is best known for his mystical treatises, generally known as the Benjamin minor (The Twelve Patriarchs) and Benjamin major (The Mystical Ark), exegetical contemplations of biblical persons and themes, the latter describing a sixfold progress in the mystical ascent that was to influence especially BONAVENTURE in the next century (Itinerarium mentis in deum).

R. also composed mystical commentaries on the Song of Songs and on Nebuchadnezzar's dream in Daniel 2 (De eruditione hominis interioris). His Liber exceptionum contains a running allegorization of the biblical story and demonstrates how closely related the allegorical interpretation of Scripture was to the preaching of the time, especially as exemplified in the sermons of the likes of PETER COMESTOR. It may well have been part of a larger, encyclopedic project to provide an aid for study along the lines of HUGH's Didascalicon.

In addition, R. composed literal commentaries on Ezekiel and on the Apocalypse, which in the inherited tradition had generally been given a spiritual interpretation—another demonstration of the Victorine insistence that the literal, historical meaning of Scripture could never be dismissed. Yet even here R. displayed his taste, not so much for the historical as for the aesthetic: In describing the visions of the Throne Chariot and the Temple he gave minute, graphic detail that evinces a keen interest in and appreciation for the artistic qualities of his subject. As B. Smalley (1983³) notes, "What attracted him in the letter of Scripture was not the movement of human history, but the jewels, the songs, the flowers."

R. wrote works of a more dogmatic nature, the most important of which is De Trinitate, in which his unique interpretation of the interior life of God, founded on the necessity of the character of love, requires not only Lover and Beloved but also a third who shares in that love—a model for a spirituality that involves interpersonal community, as G. Zinn (1979) notes.

Works: Opera omnia (PL 196); Selected Writings on Contemplation (ed. and tr. C. Kirchberger, 1957); Liber exceptionum: Text critique avec introduction (TPMA 5, ed. J. Châtillon, 1958); De Trinitate (ed. J. Ribaillier, 1958); Richard of St. Victor: The Twelve Patriarchs, The Mystical Ark, Book Three of the Trinity (tr. G. Zinn, 1979).

Bibliography: B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1983³). M. Zier, "Preaching by Distinction: Peter Comestor and the Communication of the Gospel," Ephemerides Liturigae 105 (1991) 301-29. See also the studies accompanying R.'s published works.

M. A. ZIER

RICHARDSON, ALAN (1905–75)

A prominent English theologian, ecumenist, apologist, and outstanding, widely read popularizer, R. developed a particularly Anglican blend of biblical THEOLOGY in the decades following WWII, best seen in his volume on NT theology (1958). Having worked for the Student Christian Movement, he became canon of Durham in 1943, professor of Christian theology at Nottingham in 1953, and dean of York in 1964. His popular biblical works were widely read. He also edited a theological wordbook of the Bible (1950) and a dictionary of Christian theology (1969), both published by SCM Press, of which he was chair. His more systematic work, Christian Apologetics (1948), was followed by History Sacred and Profane (1964), which espoused a perspectival view of history. His English insistence on the apologetic value of history and his strong Anglican ties made him hostile to European thought, especially to K. BARTH and R. BULTMANN.

Works: The Miracle-stories of the Gospels (1941); Preface to Bible Study (1943); Christian Apologetics (1948); A Theological Workbook of the Bible (1950); Genesis 1–11: An Introduction and Commentary (1953); An Introduction to the Theology of the NT (1958); John (1959); History Sacred and Profane (1964); A Dictionary of Christian Theology (1969).

Bibliography: V. A. Harvey, The Historian and the Believer: The Morality of Historical Knowledge and Christian Belief (1966) chap. 7. J. J. Navone, History and Faith in the Thought of A. R. (1966). R. Preston, DNB, 1971–80 (1986) 722-23.

R. MORGAN

RICOEUR, PAUL (1913–)

R. was born in Valence, France, on Feb. 27, 1913, and was raised by his paternal grandparents in Brittany in the tradition of the Protestant Huguenots. In 1935 he graduated from the Sorbonne, where he attended seminars conducted by G. Marcel. While interned in a German POW camp from 1940 to 1945 he was allowed to study German philosophy and theology, including the writings of I. KANT, E. Husserl (1859–1938), M. Heidegger (1889–1976), R. BULTMANN, and K. BARTH. These thinkers have had an abiding impact on his work.

After the war, R. first taught at a secondary school in Chambon-sur-Lignon, a village known for its aid to Jewish refugees during the Nazi occupation. He moved to the University of Strasbourg in 1948 and eventually returned to the Sorbonne to occupy the chair of general philosophy (1957–67). He was active in the Parisian socialist movement and in the promotion of social democracy against the threat of market-driven capitalism. In 1967 he left the Sorbonne and joined the faculty of the University of Paris in Nanterre. As dean, he was instrumental in mediating conflicts between faculty and students over the cries for reform in the French university system during the Paris uprisings of 1968. During this time he did collaborative work with E. Levinas and was one of J. Derrida's teachers; he also became a permanent faculty member of the University of Chicago, with appointments in the divinity school, the department of philosophy, and the Committee on Social Thought. Having resigned from Nanterre in 1980, he became professor emeritus at Chicago in 1991. He lives in the Paris suburb of Catenay-Malabry, his permanent residence since 1957.

R.'s contribution to biblical studies can be noted by summarizing the contents of three of his most seminal writings on biblical HERMENEUTICS, each stemming from a different period in his life. The Symbolism of Evil (1960) consists of philosophically informed exegetical readings of the phenomenon of evil, as presented in Greek and biblical texts. By way of these founding texts R. argues that to be human is to be estranged from oneself because all humans, though destined for fulfillment, are inevitably captive to an "adversary" greater than themselves. The bitter irony of this predicament is most effectively symbolized by the myth of Adam's fall (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). Although the story is putatively about historical origins, it functions as an etiological myth concerning a cosmic battle between good and evil anterior to Adam's decision. R.'s point in this volume is that human beings enter consciousness as denizens of a world of prior symbols and myths. Thus figurative language interprets us before we interpret it. Since there are no shortcuts to selfhood, it is only when the subject traverses a hermeneutical "long route" through the revealing power of the symbol that he or she can arrive at an adequate self-understanding. This route follows a path from the loss of original belief in the sacred to a critical recovery of the power of myth in a world seemingly empty of meaning and hope. Along this interpretive path the voice of the sacred can be heard again, not in the mode of a pre-critical naïveté, but through an interpretive gesture, what R. refers to as a "second naïveté," that wagers on the power of myth and symbol to elucidate the nature of human being.

"Biblical Hermeneutics" (1975), an exercise in analyzing the discourse of JESUS' parables, is central to the second period in R.'s writings on biblical interpretation. The PARABLES employ extravagantly transgressive language to refigure time at its limits. R. stresses how the parables' power to reorient by subverting the reader's presuppositions about reality allows the Bible's zones of indeterminacy to come fully to light. His study of the iconoclastic nature of parabolic discourse clarifies the importance of attention to the diversity of biblical genres for a multifaceted understanding of the Bible's message. Some theologians and biblical scholars ignore parabolic discourse in favor of narrative modes of expression, reading the Bible as a seamless whole. However, such an interpretation ignores the Bible's irruptions of radical discontinuity. R.'s point in "Biblical Hermeneutics" is that only as narrative is interanimated by cross-fertilizations with other modes of discourse—e.g., Jesus' parables—can it effectively create meaning.

"Interpretative Narrative" (1990) in Figuring the Sacred reflects the progression in R.'s hermeneutics from discourse analysis to post-structuralism (especially through his use of the work of F. Kermode and J. D. Crossan). This piece characterizes the third stage in R.'s biblical scholarship. In an interpretation of the secrecy motif in the Gospel of Mark, he shows that the Markan story both creates meaning in recombination with other modes of discourse and, in its cross-pollinations with the counter-narrative stress on the enigmatic, also subverts literary and theological coherence by obfuscating what it purports to elucidate. In a POST-MODERN culture the pathos and the promise of a Ricoeurian hermeneutic is its ability to bring to light the darkness and opacity that shadows the Bible's most prized stories.

Taken as a whole, R.'s contribution to biblical studies has been to help move the field away from being a historical mode of study divorced from wider philosophical discussion toward being a thoroughgoing hermeneutical discipline informed by contemporary intellectual life. While his hope has been to engender a productive dialogue between the tasks of biblical hermeneutics and of philosophical inquiry, R. has not sought to subordinate the former to the latter (however, see K. Vanhoozer [1990] 190-289). Rather, he has endeavored to avoid theory-heavy methods of biblical reading in favor of a text-immanent approach. With other contemporary philosophical and literary readers of the Bible, he maintains that biblical meaning is produced through an interpretation of the diverse genres that constitute the intertext of the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures.

Works: The Symbolism of Evil (Religious Perspectives 17, tr. E. Buchanan, 1967); Freud and Philosophy: An Essay on Interpretation (1970); "Sur l'exégèse de Genèse 1,1-2,4a," Exégèse et herméneutique: Parole de Dieu (ed. X. L. Dufour, 1971) 67-84; The Conflict of Interpretations: Essays in Hermeneutics (NUSPEP, ed. D. Ihde, 1974); "Biblical Hermeneutics," Semeia 4 (1975) 27-148; Interpretation Theory: Discourse and the Surplus of Meaning (1976); The Philosophy of P. R.: An Anthology of His Work (ed. C. Regan and D. Stewart, 1978); Rule of Metaphor: Multi-Disciplinary Studies of the Creation of Meaning in Languages (1977); Essays on Biblical Interpretation (ed. L. S. Mudge, 1980); Critical Hermeneutics: A Study in the Thought of P. R. and J. Habermas (ed. and tr. J. B. Thompson, 1981); Time and Narrative (3 vols., 1984–88); Fallible Man (1965; rev. tr., 1986); Lectures on Ideology and Utopia (ed. G. H. Taylor, 1986); From Text to Action (Essays in Hermeneutics 2, 1991); Lectures (3 vols., 1991–94); A Ricoeur Reader: Reflection and Imagination (Theory/Culture Series 2, ed. M. Valdés, 1991); Oneself as Another (1992); Figuring the Sacred: Religion, Narrative, and Imagination (ed. M. I. Wallace, 1995).

Bibliography: P. S. Anderson, R. and Kant: Philosophy of the Will (1993). S. H. Clark, Paul Ricoeur (1990). J. D. Crossan (ed.), "The Book of Job and R.'s Hermeneutics," Semeia 19 (1981) 3-123. J. Dicenso, Hermeneutics and the Disclosure of Truth: A Study of the Work of Heidegger, Gadamer, and R. (SRC, 1990). M. Gerhart, The Question of Belief in Literary Criticism: An Introduction to the Hermeneutical Theory of P. R. (1979). L. E. Hahn (ed.), The Philosophy of P. R. (Library of Living Philosophers 22, 1995). D. Ihde, Hermeneutical Phenomenology: The Philosophy of P. R. (NUSPUP, 1971). P. Kemp and D. Rasmussen (eds.), The Narrative Path: The Later Works of P. R. (1989). D. E. Klemm, The Hermeneutical Theory of P. R. (1983). D. E. Klemm and W. Schweiker (eds.), Meaning in Texts and Actions: Questioning P. R. (SRC, 1993). L. Lawlor, Imagination and Chance: The Difference Between the Thought of R. and Derrida (Intersections, 1992). W. J. Lowe, Mystery of the Unconscious: A Study in the Thought of P. R. (ATLA.MS 9, 1977). C. E. Reagan, Studies in the Philosophy of P. R. (1979); P. R.: His Life and Work (1996). J. Van Den Hengel, The Home of Meaning: The Hermeneutics of the Subject of P. R. (1982). K. J. Vanhoozer, Biblical Narrative in the Philosophy of P. R.: A Study in Hermeneutics and Theology (1990). F. D. Vansina, P. R.: A Primary and Secondary Systematic Bibliography (1935–84) (1985). M. I. Wallace, The Second Naiveté: Barth, R., and the New Yale Theology (1990). D. Wood, On P. R.: Narrative and Interpretation (WSPL, 1991).

M. I. WALLACE

RIEHM, EDUARD KARL AUGUST (1830–88)

Born Dec. 20, 1830, in Diersburg, Germany, R. studied theology in Heidelberg and Halle. In 1853 he received his doctorate and in 1858 habilitated in OT THEOLOGY, becoming an ausserordentlicher professor in Heidelberg (1861) and a full professor in Halle after H. HUPFELD's death (1866). He died Apr. 5, 1888, in Giebichenstein.

R.'s work belonged to what has been called mediation theology. Combining scholarly work with south German church devotion, R. remained in serious, open-minded dialogue with new scholarly developments in HB studies, tending always to draw conservative conclusions. His dissertation Die Gesetzgebung Mosis im Lande Moab (1854) is a careful investigation of the state of the question since W. DE WETTE's Disstertatio critico-exegetica (1805), with a focus on theological interpretation. R.'s dating of Deuteronomy to the middle of the seventh century BCE dominated the coming period of scholarship. He was so certain that Deuteronomy was later than the bulk of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) that he did not bother in 1854 to address the opposing view of J. VATKE, P. von BOHLEN, and J. GEORGE that placed much of the Pentateuch after Deuteronomy. However, with K. GRAF in 1866, he was forced at least to concede that the priestly legislation did not become influential until the period of the Second Temple.

Just as significant was his argument with A. RITSCHL over the latter's neglect of the biblical view of God's wrath. R.'s basic biblical and theological concern was especially clear in Die messianische Weissagung (1875), in which he explained the individual predictions in their historical settings and as parts of a divine work of education until the onset of NT salvation truth. In Der Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefes (1858–59), a systematic presentation dependent on the latest commentaries (especially on that of F. Bleek), he treated the same subject from an NT point of view.

R.'s work reached a broad audience through his Handwörterbuch des biblischen Altertums (1884) and his contributions to the revision of LUTHER's TRANSLATION of the Bible. In 1865 he began coediting TSK, contributing studies and critical remarks that were respected because of their sober meticulousness.

Works: Die Gesetzgebung Mosis im Lande Moab: Ein Beitrag zur Einleitung ins Alte Testament (1854); Der Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefes (2 vols., 1858–59, 1867²); De natura et notione symbolica cheruborum (1864); "Die geschichtlichen Bücher des Alten Testments: Zwei Historisch-kritische Untersuchungen," review of K. H. Graf in TSK 41 (1868) 350-70; "Die sogenannte Grundschrift des Pentateuchs," TSK 45 (1872) 283-307; Die Messianische Weissagung (1875, 1885²; ET 1876); "Der Begriff der Sühne im Alten Testament," TSK 50 (1877) 7-92; Religion und Wissenschaft (Rektoratsrede Halle, 1881); Zur Revision der Lutherbibel: Oster Programm der vereinigten Friedrichs-Universität (1882); Handwörterbuch des Biblischen Altertums (2 vols., 1884); Luther als Bibelübersetzer (1884); Alttestamentliche Theologie (ed. K. Pahncke, 1889); Einleitung in das Alte Testament (2 vols., ed. A. Brandt, 1889–90).

Bibliography: E. Kautzsch, ADB 30 (1890) 72-74. K. H. Pahncke, *RE*³ 16 (1905) 776-83. H. Riehm, Erinnerungen an unseren Vater, den ordentlichen Professor der Theologie D. E. R. (1905).

R. SMEND

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT BENJAMIN (1822–89)

Born Mar. 25, 1822, in Berlin, son of a pastor and bishop in the Evangelical Church, R. was reared in Stellin and educated at the universities of Bonn (1839–41) and Halle (1841–43). He received his doctorate from Halle with a dissertation entitled Expositio doctrinae Augustini de creatione, mundi, peccato, gratia (1843), which raised some issues that would be the focus of his later work. He studied at Heidelberg (1845) and Tübingen (1845–46), where he became an enthusiastic disciple of F. C. BAUR. In 1846 he became a Dozent in NT THEOLOGY at Bonn, ausserordentlicher professor in 1852, and full professor in 1859, gradually moving after 1848 into the teaching of church history and the history of dogma. In 1864 he accepted a position at Göttingen, where he taught until his death Mar. 20, 1889, lecturing both in NT and in systematic theology.

Having given up the PIETISM and supernaturalism of his background, R.'s first published works reflect Baur's view of the early church as dominated by strife between Jewish-oriented (Petrine) and universalist Gentile-oriented (Pauline) parties, whose compromise produced the early Roman Catholic Church. Like Baur he argued for the late dating of much of the NT, in his 1846 work maintaining that MARCION's version of Luke was the source of the Gospel. By 1856, however, he had completely broken with Baur and in the 1857 revision of his work on the early church regarded both the early church and the NT as more homogenous and basically "uncontaminated" by either rabbinic Judaism or Hellenistic philosophy.

In R.'s great work on justification and reconciliation, several characteristics of his work become clear: (1) He saw himself as attempting to recover the essence of the gospel as embodied in the NT and in the early writings of LUTHER and to bring to completion elements of the faith recovered but undeveloped in the "unfinished" Reformation and later deformed by neo-scholasticism, pietistic mysticism, natural religion, and other developments. (2) His exposition of Christianity (never completely presented systematically) addressed polemical concerns against resurgent Roman Catholicism and those who repudiated Christianity's relevance to the modern world. (3) He sought to base his theological use of the NT on the results of NT historical research (perhaps the first theologian to do so), thus emphasizing the synoptics (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM) rather than John and stressing the kingdom of God as the major element in the preaching of JESUS. (4) He held that faith rests, not on the apprehension of facts or on the arguments of reason, but on the making of value judgments and on the acceptance of the revelational value Christ has for the consciousness of the community that trusts in him as God. Thus, the believing community, in contrast to the individual's faith position, plays a decisive role in theological exposition and at the same time allows theology to avoid supernaturalistic or purely reductionist claims.

R. stressed the importance of the historical Jesus for Christian faith, considering him to be the one who functioned not only in priestly, prophetic, and royal roles but also as the founder of the kingdom of God, which R. understood primarily in ethical terms as "the uninterrupted reciprocation of action springing from the motive of love—a Kingdom in which all are known together in union with everyone who can show the marks of a neighbor . . . in which all goods are appropriated in their proper subordination to the highest good."

R. was the most influential theologian of his day, and his theology greatly influenced the so-called liberal theology of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, especially in its focus on love, ethics, and community. He was criticized for the subjectivism of his theology (O. Pfleiderer), for his reduction of Christian faith (later neo-orthodoxy), for failure to recognize the apocalyptic character of the kingdom of God (J. Weiss), and for his isolation of Christian origins from their Judeo-Hellenistic roots (Religionsgeschichtliche Schule).

Works: Das Evangelium Marcions und das kanonische Evangelium des Lucas: Eine kirchen- und dogmengeschichtliche Monographie (1846); Die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche (1850, 1857[2]); Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, vol. 1, Die Geschichte der Lehre (1870, 1882[2]; ET, A Critical History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation [1872]); vol. 2, Die biblische Stoff der Lehre (1874, 1882[2], 1889[3]); vol. 3, Die positive Entwicklung der Lehre (1874, 1883[2], 1888[3]; ET, The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation: The Positive Development of the Doctrine [1900, repr. 1966]); Schleiermachers Reden über die Religion und ihre Nachwirkungen auf die evangelische Kirche Deutschlands (1874); Über die christliche Volkommenheit (1874); Unterricht in der christlichen Religion (1875; ET in P. Hefner [1972]); Geschichte des Pietismus (3 vols., 1880–86; ET of "Prolegomena" in P. Hefner [1972]); Gesammelte Aufsätze (2 vols., ed. O. Ritschl, 1893–96); A. R.: Three Essays (ed. and tr. P. J. Hefner, 1972).

Bibliography: J. Baur, "A. R.—Herrschaft und Versöhnung," Theologie in Göttingen: Eine Vorlesungsreihe (ed. B. Moeller, 1987) 256-70. D. L. Deegan, "A. R. on the Historical Jesus," SJT 15 (1962) 133-50; "The Ritschlian School, the Essence of Christianity, and K. Barth," SJT 16 (1963) 390-414; "Critical Empiricism in the Theology of A. R.," SJT 18 (1965) 40-56. C. Fabricius, Die Entwicklung in A. R.s Theologie von 1874 bis 1889 nach der verschiedenen Auflagen seiner Hauptwerke dargestellt und beurteilt (1909). A. E. Garvie, The Ritschlian Theology: Critical and Constructive. An Exposition and an Estimate (1902[2]). P. J. Hefner, Faith and the Vitalities of History: A Theological Study Based on the Work of A. R. (1966). G. Hök, Die elliptische Theologie A. R.s: Nach Ursprung und innerem Zusammenhang (1942). D. J. Jodok, "F. C. Baur and A. R. on Historical Theology" (diss., Yale University, 1969). D. W. Lotz, R. and Luther: A Fresh Perspective on A. R.'s Theology in the Light of His Luther Study (1974). "A. R. and the Unfinished Reformation," HTR 73 (1980) 337-72; EncRel 12, 403-5. D. L. Mueller, An Introduction to the Theology of A. R. (1969). J. Orr, The Ritschlian Theology and the Evangelical Faith (1897); Ritschlianism: Expository and Critical Essays (1903). A. S. Peake, "The History of Theology," Germany in the Nineteenth Century 2d ser. (PUM.H 24, 1915) 169-84. J. Richmond, R.: A Reappraisal (1978). O. Ritschl, A. R.s Leben (2 vols., 1892–96); NSHERK 10 (1911) 43-46. R. Schäfer, Ritschl: Grundlinien eines fast verschollenen dogmatischen Systems (1968). J. Weiss, Die Idee des Reiches Gottes in der Theologie (1901).

J. H. HAYES

ROBERT OF MELUN (d. 1167)

A pupil of P. ABELARD and one of his successors as a master in Paris, R. was a significant transitional figure in the development of twelfth-century methods of Bible study. His Questions on the Pauline Epistles demonstrates the way in which the study of specific topics was beginning to be isolated from sequential commentary on the text. He was conscious of the need to revise old procedures; he discussed the value of extensive glossing, the best way to make excerpts from the authorities, and how to abridge and paraphrase while retaining the sense. He died as bishop of Hereford in 1167.

Works: Oeuvres de Robert de Melun (SSL 13, 18, 21, 25, ed. R. M. Martin, 1932–).

Bibliography: D. E. Luscumbe, The School of Peter Abelard: The Influence of Abelard's thought in the Early Scholastic Period (1972), an account of R. and full bibliography of earlier work. E. G. Robison, DMA 10 (1988) 434-35.

G. R. EVANS

ROBINSON, EDWARD (1794–1863)

R. was born at Southington, Connecticut, Apr. 10, 1794, and educated at Hamilton College (1812–16). He fell under the influence of M. STUART at the theological seminary in Andover, Massachusetts, and in less than two years had become Stuart's teaching assistant in Hebrew and his partner in the translation of lexical works into English for theological students.

In 1826 R. went to Europe to further his study of languages and theology, primarily at Halle and Berlin. He worked on Semitic languages, Greek, Latin, and German while developing close friendships with his instructors, particularly with H. GESENIUS and E. Rödiger in Semitics, F. THOLUCK and Neander in NT and church history, and K. Ritter, the internationally distinguished geographer. Each of these individuals possessed strong historical, philological, and analytical abilities, which R. both possessed and admired.

In 1830 R. returned to Andover to become associate professor of biblical literature and librarian. While at Andover and during the years immediately following, he founded a scholarly journal, The Biblical Repository (1831), published a revised edition of D. CALMET'S Dictionary of the Bible (1832), translated P. Buttmann's Greek grammar (1833) and Gesenius's Hebrew LEXICON (1836) into English, and published his own Greek lexicon of the NT (1836). This latter work, updated fifteen years later, is the first biblical lexicon produced by an American that compared in quality and scope with its European counterparts. It sold rapidly on both sides of the Atlantic and along with his translation of Gesenius's lexicon set him in the forefront of biblical scholarship in the United States. His translation of Gesenius included major sections from Gesenius's thesaurus, so that the single-volume English edition was an advance on the European editions.

In 1836 the newly formed Union Seminary in New York called R. to be professor of Bible, a position he accepted on the condition that he be allowed first to travel to Europe, Syria, and Palestine for research purposes. There he met a former student, E. Smith, a missionary stationed in Beirut who spoke fluent Arabic. They traveled together in the Galilee region, carefully recording distances and monuments observed as well as the names of local villages. Diverging from the main roads used by pilgrims from the West, they discovered the previously unknown extent to which Arab place-names preserve a cognate to older place-names from biblical times. It was an epoch-making discovery that for the first time reliably located dozens of places recorded in Scripture. R. returned to Europe in October 1838 and researched the records of earlier travelers to the Holy Land in the best libraries available. In 1841 he published a three-volume work on his travels simultaneously in New York, Boston, London, and Germany (in a German translation prepared by his wife) that won him international acclaim.

From 1841 until his death R. taught at Union, making a brief second trip to the Middle East in 1851. He concentrated on scholarly resources for biblical study, whether writing journal articles; updating the translation of Gesenius's lexicon, Buttmann's grammar, or his own NT lexicon; or compiling a critical edition of the Greek NT or a Greek harmony of the Gospels with extensive historical commentary. This latter work was enthusiastically received and is still used in certain circles. R. died Jan. 27, 1863, without completing what he had hoped would be the climax of his work—a physical, topographical, and historical geography of the Holy Land. In 1865 his wife published in English and German the unfinished manuscript of this projected work.

Works: A Greek and English Lexicon of the NT, from the "Clavis philogica" of C. A. Wahl (1825); A Dictionary of the Holy Bible for the Use of Schools and Young Persons (1833); A Harmony of the Gospels in Greek (1835); Greek and English Lexicon of the NT (1836, 1850[4]); Biblical Researches in Palestine and the Adjacent Regions (3 vols., 1841, 1856[2]); Bibliotheca Sacra: Or Tracts and Essays on Topics Connected with Biblical Literature and Theology (1843); Harmony of the Gospels in Greek (1845); Harmony of the Gospels in English (1846); Physical Geography of the Holy Land: A Supplement to the Late Author's Biblical Researches in Palestine (1865).

Bibliography: F. J. Bliss, The Development of Palestine Exploration (1903 Ely Lectures, 1906). J. W. Brown, The Rise of Biblical Criticism in America, 1800–70: The New England Scholars (1969) 111-24. J. A. Dearman, "E. R.: Scholar and Presbyterian Educator," AP 69 (1991) 163-74. P. J. King, "E. R.: Biblical Scholar," BA 46 (1983) 230-32. P. Schaff, CBTEL 9 (1880) 50-53. H. B. Smith and R. D. Hitchcock, The Life, Writings, and Character of E. R. (1863).

J. A. DEARMAN

ROBINSON, HENRY WHEELER (1872–1945)

An English Baptist pastor, theologian, and scholar of Hebrew Scriptures, R. was born Feb. 7, 1872, in Northampton and died May 12, 1945, in Oxford. He studied at Regent's Park College, London (1890), Edinburgh University (1891–95), Mansfield College, Oxford (1895–98), and the universities of Marburg (1898) and Strasbourg (1899) under such notable scholars as G. GRAY, S. DRIVER, T. CHEYNE, D. S. Margoliouth (1858–1940), K. BUDDE, W. NOWACK, and T. NÖLDEKE.

R.'s major contributions were in Hebrew PSYCHOLOGY and biblical THEOLOGY. Early in his career he developed the theory that in Hebrew thought the "breath-soul" was conceived as permeating all bodily organs, enabling them to have independent physical and psychical functions; thus each organ of the human body possessed a physical-psychical-ethical life of its own. He called this phenomenon "a diffused consciousness," a concept he employed especially in his study of the Hebrew prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), where revelation is received through the eyes and ears and in turn is conveyed through cleansed lips.

The Hebrew conception of corporate personality is his most distinctive contribution to biblical studies. Extending the concept of diffused consciousness to the community, he believed that the Hebrew people regarded the family, clan, and nation, rather than the individual, as the basic unit of society. Individuals received their identity through the group to which they belonged. R. employed this concept extensively as an exegetical tool: (1) It enabled the Hebrew people of preexilic times, without a belief in an existence beyond the grave, to transcend their limitations by extension into the past and the future through participation in the group; (2) it explained the fluidity between the singular and the plural in certain psalms; and (3) it offered a possible solution to the individual and corporate nature of the Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah.

R. also contributed to prophetic studies through his analysis of "prophetic symbolism." He maintained that the Hebrew people believed that the symbolic acts of the prophets were partial realizations of what would come to pass and that by performing these deeds the prophets actually affected the course of future events. He also maintained that the Hebrew people believed that just as an earthly king had his court of advisers so also God was surrounded by the "Council of Yahweh," heavenly spirits who offered counsel and did God's bidding. The prophets believed that they were qualified to speak for God because they had access to the divine will by admission to the council meeting.

In the field of theology of Hebrew Scriptures, R. devoted most of his attention to three topics: (1) The problem of innocent suffering in a world governed by a beneficent deity. His writings on the cross in Hosea, Jeremiah, Deutero-Isaiah, and Job as well as his The Veil of God (1936) and Suffering: Human and Divine (1939) provide both an intellectual and a spiritual approach to the subject. (2) The interpretation of Scripture texts from within. Although he fully accepted the use of the historical-critical approach to Scripture, he believed that this "religious approach," which he regarded as the truly scientific method of analysis, was necessary if a text's full meaning was to be grasped. (3) The problem of organizing a theology of the Hebrew scriptures that would do justice to the historical nature of revelation. R. came to the conclusion that such a theology must be organized into a series of propositions (e.g., God, humankind, sin, and grace) developed around certain poles that reveal God's activity and human response. His Speaker's lectures (Oxford), posthumously published as Inspiration and Revelation in the OT (1946), are the prolegomena to a theology of the Hebrew scriptures he did not live to write.

Works: The Christian Doctrine of Man (1911); The Cross of Job (1916); "The Psychology and Metaphysic of 'Thus saith Yahweh,' " ZAW 41 (1923) 1-15; The Cross of Jeremiah (1925); The Cross of the Servant: A Study of Deutero-Isaiah (1926); "Prophetic Symbolism," OT Essays (ed. D. C. Simpson, 1927) 1-17; The Christian Experience of the Holy Spirit (1928); "The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality," Werden und Wesen des Alten Testament (BZAW 66, 1936) 49-62; Redemption and Revelation in the Actuality of History (1942); "The Nature-miracles of the OT," JTS 45 (1944) 1-12; Inspiration and Revelation in the OT (1946); Two Hebrew Prophets: Studies in Hosea and Ezekiel (1948).

Bibliography: R. A. Coughenour, HHMBI, 514-18. E. A. Payne, H. W. R.: Scholar, Teacher, Principal. A Memoir (1946); DNB Sup. 6 (1959) 727-29; "Colleague and Erector of Buildings: H. W. R.," BQ 24 (April 1972) 260-64.

M. E. POLLEY

ROBINSON, JOHN ARTHUR THOMAS (1919–83)

R. took his degree in classics and theology (1942) and PhD (1946) from Cambridge. Ordained in the Church of England, he became tutor at Wells Theological College (1948–51) and dean of Clare College, Cambridge (1951–59). The direction of much of his later work was mapped out from this time in his Twelve NT Studies. He also served on the NT panel of the NEB. In 1959 he was consecrated bishop of Woolwich, and after the publication of Honest to God (1963) he became identified with all that seemed threatening in the theology and ethics of the 1960s. He resumed his work on the NT on his return to Cambridge as dean of Trinity in 1969 and continued it until his early death.

One concern of R.'s early work was NT eschatology. In Jesus and His Coming (1957, 1979[2]) he argued that the doctrine of the parousia derived, not from authentic words of JESUS, but from "an unresolved crisis in the Christology of the primitive church centering in the problem whether or not the messianic event had yet taken place." The Fourth Gospel escaped the effects of this crisis and presents an eschatology more authentically that of Jesus (3:18-19; 14:23; 16:16, etc.).

R. entered the debate on NT christology in 1973 in The Human Face of God (143-79), asserting that no NT author operated with a doctrine of Christ's personal preexistence. The view has since gained currency where PAUL and the author of Hebrews are concerned, but R. insisted that John be interpreted in the same way. The impression John gives of describing a docetic Jesus is the result of his literary technique of deliberately mixing theological truth with historical reporting. (See also The Priority of John [1985] 343-97.)

In Redating the NT (1976) R. attempted to show that all the NT books could be fitted into the period before 70 CE, surprising many non-specialists who knew only his reputation as a theological radical. Provocative as a whole—although not uniformly cogent—much of the argument was not new. Indeed, R. saw the work partially as a rehabilitation of some nineteenth-century positions, e.g., A. von HARNACK's on the date of Acts (early 1960s) and J. B. LIGHTFOOT's and F. HORT's on Revelation.

While never narrowing his interest to the Fourth Gospel—two of his books were sets of lectures on Paul—the interpretation of this Gospel was a theme running throughout R.'s career. He never changed his view, set out in 1957 in "The New Look on the Fourth Gospel" (Twelve NT Studies, 94-106), that John was the apostle's eyewitness account, composed at an early date and embodying, on the whole, better historical tradition than the SYNOPTICS. The case was comprehensively argued in The Priority of John, published posthumously, which took the evidence from John so far as to reconstruct the course of Jesus' career by precise dates, a conclusion of religious as well as of academic importance: "I do not accept that excessive scepticism is a matter of indifference. It is corrosive, at this and many other points, of our confidence in possessing any firm knowledge about the Jesus of history, who, I am convinced, in the twentieth century as in the first, remains an integral part of the Christ of faith" (124).

Works: In the End God (1950, 1968²); The Body: A Study in Pauline Theology (1952); Jesus and His Coming (1957, 1979²); Twelve NT Studies (1962); Honest to God (1963); The Human Face of God (1973); Redating the NT (1976); Wrestling with Romans (1979); Twelve More NT Studies (1984); The Priority of John (1985); Where Three Ways Meet (1987).

Bibliography: E. James, A Life of Bishop J. A. T. R.: Scholar, Pastor, Prophet (1987); (ed.), God's Truth: Essays to Commemorate the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Publication of "Honest to God" (1988). J. Knox, "J. A. T. R. and the Meaning of NT Scholarship," Theology 92 (1989) 251-68.

J. F. COAKLEY

ROBINSON, THEODORE HENRY (1881–1964)

Born at Edenbridge, Kent, Aug. 9, 1881, R. was educated at Mill Hill School and at St. John's College, Cambridge (1901–4), where he read classical studies and history and included T. Glover among his distinguished teachers. At Regent's Park College, London, he studied Semitic languages and theology and was briefly a student at Göttingen. After lecturing at Woodbrooke Settlement, Birmingham (1905–8), he spent the next seven years as professor of Hebrew and Syriac at Serampore College, India, during which time he published his much-used Paradigms and Exercises in Syriac Grammar (1915, 1939). In 1915 he returned to Great Britain to become lecturer in Semitic languages at University College, Cardiff, becoming full professor in 1927; he remained there until his retirement due to ill health in 1944.

At Cardiff R. began the extensive series of researches and publications that marked his career as a historian and biblical exegete. He also trained many distinguished pupils, including G. Davies, H. ROWLEY, and A. JOHNSON; the last two later became his colleagues at Cardiff. R. was a founding member of the Society for OT Study (1917) and its first secretary. Throughout his years in Cardiff he built up close ties with European, especially German, scholars and worked to forge closer relationships in research across national frontiers. He particularly encouraged German scholars to visit Great Britain.

R.'s major research was in the field of Israelite history in the preexilic period, concentrating particularly on the CHRONOLOGY of the exodus and conquest, which culminated in the publication in 1932 of the first volume of A History of Israel. His foremost contribution was in defining the nature of many of the relevant problems and in outlining resources for their resolution. He regarded the patriarchal age as no longer susceptible to definition based on firm chronological data and looked for the date of the exodus as the basic starting point for historical research into ancient Israelite history. He drew extensively on the results of contemporary archaeological work (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) on Palestinian sites, an indebtedness that is also reflected in Rowley's publications, although with significant differences over the dating of the exodus event.

With W. OESTERLEY, R. published a basic introduction to Hebrew religion (1930), although his most significant and influential writings were published in the field of HB PROPHECY. Becoming convinced at an early stage that the emphasis on the ecstatic element in Hebrew prophecy advocated by J. GUNKEL and G. HÖLSCHER was correct, R. sought both to popularize this position and to examine its relevance to the study of the formation of the prophetic literature. His interest is already evident in an article published in The Expositor (8th ser., 21 [1921] 217-38) and in his book on Israelite prophets (1923). The high international regard for his work and research in this field, with its special focus on the short units of oracular prophetic utterance, is to be seen in his commentary on six Minor Prophets (Hosea–Micah) in the series HAT (ed. O. Eissfeldt [1936]). A primary goal of such examination was to probe back to the original utterance of the prophet, stripping off the editorial additions made in the process of literary preservation.

R. wrote extensively, including commentaries on the Gospel of Matthew and on the epistle to the Hebrews (MNTC 1928, 1933). Due to health problems, he retired from his professorship in 1944 and gave up major scholarly research.

Works: Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel (1923); The Decline and Fall of the Hebrew Kingdoms: Israel in the Eighth and Seventh Centuries BC (CB 3, 1926); (with W. O. E. Oesterley), Hebrew Religion: Its Origin and Development (1930; rev. and enlarged ed., 1937); A History of Israel, vol. 1, The Exodus to the Fall of Jerusalem (1932); (with W. O. E. Oesterley), An Introduction to the Books of the OT (1934); Die Zwölf Kleinen Propheten: Hosea bis Micha (HAT 1.14, 1936).

Bibliography: H. H. Rowley (ed.), Studies in OT Prophecy Presented to T. H. R. by the Society for OT Study on His Sixty-fifth Birthday, Aug. 9th, 1946 (1950) with R.'s bibliography, 201-6; ZAW 76 (1964) 244.

R. E. CLEMENTS

ROLLE, RICHARD (c.1300–1349)

Called the "father of English prose," R. is best known of the five great fourteenth-century English mystics, who included W. Hilton, Julian of Norwich, M. Kempe, and the author of Cloud of Unknowing. According to the materials prepared for R.'s canonization, which never took place, he was born in Yorkshire, studied at Oxford, and became a hermit at the age of eighteen. His output was vast, including Latin commentaries on the psalter, Job, Canticles, Lamentations of Jeremiah, the Apocalypse, the Lord's Prayer, and the Magnificat, among other treatises, and the Canticum Amoris, a poem addressed to the Virgin Mary. He was influenced by AUGUSTINE, PETER LOMBARD, the Victorines, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, and GREGORY THE GREAT. His reputation for learning and holiness was such that many devotional works have been falsely attributed to him. His authentic works often recount personal experiences corresponding to biblical models (J. Alford [1973]). During the last years of his life, R. advised a community of Cistercian nuns at Hampole, for whom he produced a variety of biblical translations, commentaries, and spiritual epistles: The English Psalter and Form of Living are dedicated to M. Kirkeby; The Commandment is dedicated to another Hampole nun; and the Ego dormio (Cant. 5:2), to a Benedictine nun at Yedingham.

R.'s basic premise was that meditation on Scripture, especially the events of the passion and the holy name of JESUS (see Phil. 2:10), can lead to union with God—a union obtainable by all Christians, although R. represented himself as an inspired interpreter. Incendium Amoris explains that divine union may be obtained by experiencing the mystical states of fervor (heat), dulcor (sweetness), and canor (song); Emendatio vitae outlines the three degrees of love: inseparable, insuperable, and singular. Many of his works, including lyrics, were written in Middle English expressly for lay folk or were translated from Latin by various hands (e.g., R. Misyn) and formed part of a vast body of vernacular religious literature meant to educate and save the men and women of England. Alternatively, the translation into Latin of English works like Ego Dormio and Form of Living indicates a clerical audience. The Judica me Deus adapts William of Pagula's (d. c. 1332) influential pastoral guide, Oculus Sacerdotis.

Despite his eremitic lifestyle, R. was not a recluse or an ascetic; although neither a monk nor a priest, he expressed controversial opinions on church reform. Later in the century the Lollards were drawn to his outspokenness and interpolated many of his writings, particularly his English Psalter, a complete verse-by-verse prose translation with commentary and liturgical canticles. The commentary derives from Peter Lombard, although R. omitted the spiritual interpretations and reproduced only the literal, to which he added exhortations and personal experiences. His Meditations on the Passion, in two versions, presents a graphic account of the crucifixion in a highly affective style influenced by ANSELM and by the pseudo-Bonaventurian Meditationes vitae Christi (see BONAVENTURE). Another biblically based work in English is the thousand-word Commentary on the Decalogue.

Works: The Psalter or Psalms of David and Certain Canticles (ed. H. R. Bramley, 1884); Incendium Amoris (ed. M. Deanesly, 1915); English Writings of R. R. (ed. H. E. Allen, 1931); Canticum Amoris, Traditio 12 (ed. G. M. Liegey, 1956) 369-91; Contra Amatores Mundi [Liber de amore Dei] (P. F. Theiner, 1968); R. R. de Hampole (1300–49): Vie et oeuvres suivies du Tractatus super Apocalypsim (ed. N. Marzac, 1968); Le Chant d'Amour [Melos Amoris] (2 vols., ed. E. J. F. Arnould and F. Vandenbroucke, 1971; with FT); The Fire of Love and the Mending of Life (tr. M. L. del Mastro, 1981); Judica me Deus (ed. J. P. Daly, 1984); Expositio super Novem Lectiones Mortuorum (ed. M. R. Moyes, 1988); R. R.: The English Writings (tr. R. S. Allen, 1988); R. R.: Prose and Verse Texts (EETS 293, ed. S. J. Ogilvie-Thomson, 1988); Tractatus Super Psalmum Vicesimum (ed. J. C. Dolan, 1991); "Emendatio vitae" and "Orationes ad honorem nominis Ihesu" (N. Watson, 1995).

Bibliography: J. A. Alford, "Biblical Imitatio in the Writings of R. R.," Journal of English Literary History 40 (1973) 1-23; "R. R. and Related Works," Middle English Prose (ed. A. S. G. Edwards, 1984) 34-60. H. E. Allen, Writings Ascribed to R. R., Hermit of Hampole, and Materials for His Biography (1927). M. P. Kuczynski, Prophetic Song: The Psalms as Moral Discourse in Late Medieval England (1995). V. Lagorio and M. Sargent, "English Mystical Writings," A Manual of the Writings in Middle English (1993) 9:3049-68, 3405-25 (with extensive bibliography). N. Watson, R. R. and the Invention of Authority (1991).

J. MOREY

ROMANS, LETTER TO THE

This epistle was apparently written around 56 CE as PAUL and representatives of his gentile congregations were about to bring their offerings to Jerusalem (15:25). It was intended (1) to prepare the way for Paul's projected visit and mission in the West (1:5-6; 15:17-29); (2) (presumably) to ensure some wider understanding of his gospel and law-free gentile mission at that critical moment (15:25-31); and (3) to help foster good relations between Jewish and gentile believers in Rome (14:1–15:12, esp. 15:7). Copies of the epistle may possibly have been sent elsewhere, e.g., Ephesus, accounting for the occasional absence of "in Rome" at 1:7, 15, late in the manuscript tradition, and the varying position of the final doxology (16:25-27). The absence of chaps. 15 and 16 from some manuscripts probably stems from MARCION's having omitted them.

In Romans, even more than elsewhere, Paul's practical aims led him to articulate his understanding of the gospel; and from the end of the first century, when the epistle began to be treated as Christian Scripture, its influence has been incalculable. In the second century Paul was already for most gentile Christians the apostle par excellence; and in the Western church since AUGUSTINE, Romans has been the most important single source of the Christian tradition's theological vocabulary. Even earlier, its scriptural status and evident theological depth made it a prime quarry for doctrinal construction; its use in liturgy, preaching, apologetics, and polemic was supported by a rich exegetical tradition, most of which is now lost, although some fragments have been preserved in the surviving catenae.

To Western eyes focused on the themes of law, sin, and grace, or faith and works, the Greek fathers' understandings of the epistle have generally seemed inadequate. Despite some fine exegetical observations, Paul's statements have been read into very different theological contexts and so have been misread. But even the more appropriate Western interpretative models now appear remote from the historical Paul. The relativization of all theological interpretations opens a door to more positive assessments of Romans' reception by the fathers and by heretics alike. Every age has read the epistle from its own perspective, relating this classic to contemporary understandings of the gospel or to other cultural preoccupations, such as the historical and SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC study of religions or the wider study of literature. Paul's historical intentions are rightly prominent in Western interpretation today, but larger and more personal questions also influence how this literary text from the Christian CANON of Scripture is read.

1. Antiquity. The early history of the epistles is uncertain; but Romans was apparently known to the authors of Ephesians and 1 Peter, arguably (the minority view) to Luke–Acts, possibly even to Hebrews and James, and certainly to CLEMENT OF ROME, IGNATIUS, and Polycarp (c. 69–155). But apart from Ephesians, a thematic presentation of Paul's concern for the unity of Jews and Gentiles in the church, and despite Ignatius, whose devotion to Paul was not matched by much theological affinity, the influence of the apostle's thought on early "orthodox" writers is surprisingly slight. Since Paul's missionary policy on the Mosaic law prevailed and since some of his Jewish presuppositions were no longer shared, his arguments were no longer necessary or fully intelligible. His apocalyptic dualism (see APOCALYPTICISM) and dialectical relating of law and gospel caused problems for early Roman Catholic writers when seized on by theologians they judged to be heretical.

The Christian GNOSTIC Valentinus (2nd cent.) and his disciples Ptolemy, Heraclean, and Theodotus found support in Paul's language for their quite different (metaphysical) dualism. We know from their orthodox opponents that Basilides, the Ophites, Naasenes, and other Gnostic sects also used Paul; discoveries from Nag Hammadi have provided evidence in the Gospel of Truth, the Epistle of Rheginus, and the Gospel of Philip for an appreciation of Paul in these circles. But the greatest and most notorious interpreter of Paul in early Christianity was Marcion. He excised those parts of Romans (1:3; 1:19–2:1; 3:31–4:25; 9; 10:5–11:32; 12:1; 15–16) that were positive about Judaism and central to Paul's conciliatory aim, but it was to his expurgated version of Galatians and Romans that he could above all appeal in defining the gospel as the antithesis of the Jewish law. As deeply as he misunderstood the historical Jew Paul, he took the apostle's most crucial argument more seriously than anyone before LUTHER and was a catalyst, perhaps even the pioneer, in the formation of the NT canon. Ptolemy's Epistle to Flora comes closer to what Paul says about the law in Romans, but Marcion caught more of the apostle's religious power.

Paul's popularity among the so-called heretics (see 2 Pet 3:16), together with the hostility to him among some Jewish Christians (see the Pseudo-Clementine literature) and the slow emergence of an NT canon account for the limited appeal to Paul in the second century. The task facing emergent Roman Catholicism was to reclaim Paul from under the Gnostic cloud by building the anti-Gnostic elements in his writings into its own doctrinal structure. This was decisively achieved by IRENAEUS in the earliest surviving long presentation of Christianity, directed especially against Valentinians.

Irenaeus found support in Romans as he reaffirmed the unity of creation and redemption against Gnostic dualism and the unity of OT and NT in a salvation-history theology. He developed Paul's Adam-Christ typology; and although he lost the antithetical thrust of Paul's argument, the resulting biblical THEOLOGY had some of its roots in this epistle.

Like the earliest apologists, TERTULLIAN owed much less to the theology of Romans. He regularly quoted it as Scripture and referred to the apostle, but his single-issue discussion of this epistle in Adv. Marc. 5.13-14 is relatively brief and concerned only to refute Marcion. Cyprian (d. 258) seems likewise untouched by Paul's understanding of the gospel, while frequently citing Romans in his Testimonia. In Rome, Hippolytus (c. 170–c. 236) likewise echoed Irenaeus's use of the Adam-Christ typology, but it was at Alexandria (see ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL) that Christian exegesis, like systematic theology, made its major advance.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN were both enthusiastic admirers of Paul and interpreted him in the framework of their Christian Platonism. By asserting the unity of OT and NT against Gnostic dualism, they minimized Paul's ambivalence about the Jewish law; in defending free will they weakened Paul's teaching on predestination (Romans 9) to divine foreknowledge. Origen's commentary, written around 247 in Caesarea, was hugely influential in shaping interpretation not only in the East but also in the West up to Augustine. In his exegesis of Romans 5, Origen moved away from his earlier speculation on the fall and closer to the later Western debate on original sin; but in general his theology owes more to Romans 8.

Eastern concern with the doctrine of God and with the person of Christ saw little of what the West was to find in Romans. Individual texts played a greater role than the epistle's theological themes: Rom 1:3 was used against Docetism and was also claimed by Apollinaris (c. 310–90); Rom 8:3 confirmed Origen in his subordinationism and was both used by and defended against the Arians (see ARIUS); Rom 9:5 was widely taken to refer to Christ and to support his divinity. After Origen, the only Alexandrine commentator on Romans whose work has to any extent survived in the catenae is CYRIL; but there is also a long fragment from DIDYMUS, probably from Against the Manichaeans, discussing Rom. 7. Methodius (d. c. 311) quoted extensively from Romans 7 and 8 in his criticism of Origen in a treatise on the resurrection. Among the few remaining fragments on Romans from the Arian controversy, those from Acacius of Caesarea (d. 365) deserve mention. Very little from Eusebius of Emesa's (d. c. 360) commentary survives.

ANTIOCHENE exegesis was more strongly historical, but it was no less theological than was Origen's spiritual exegesis of the text. The differences between them are less sharp in the epistles than in the narrative parts of Scripture. Fragments on Romans survive from Diodore (30 pages in K. Staab [1926]) and his pupil Severian of Gabala (fl. c. 400; 12 pages). THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA's understanding of Paul is clearer, with sixty pages of his Romans and a Latin translation of his commentary on the ten shorter epistles. He found his own theology in Paul, but Paul had already helped shape his doctrine of the two ages and of adoption as sons. The finest biblical exposition from this school is CHRYSOSTOM's thirty-two homilies on Romans, written at Antioch before 398. The discussion of Romans 13 in Homily 23 makes a significant contribution to political theory, but these eloquent sermons are mostly moral and ascetical in character. Homily 4 attacks homosexual practices (not homoerotic love) as unnatural, in an echo of Rom 1:26-27 that stretches from Clement of Alexandria (Paid. 2.10) to the present day. THEODORET's commentary, written in Greek rather than in his native Syriac, and substantial fragments from that of Gennadius of Constantinople (d. 471) are the other main surviving writings representing Antiochene exegesis of Romans. Later Greek writings on Scripture are derivative. Comments by Photius of Constantinople (c. 810–c. 895) survive on a scale that invites attention, but the catenae are in general valuable only for what they preserve of earlier patristic authorities.

Turning to the West, nothing on Romans survives from Marius Victorinus (fl. 4th cent.), but the great landmark of the Pelagian controversy is antedated by the peerless commentary (c. 365–80) of "Ambrosiaster," whose practical historical sense and understanding of Judaism anticipate modern scholarship. Critical of the Greeks, he influenced PELAGIUS's brief, but incisive, expositions, which were widely read in the belief that they stemmed from JEROME. More important, Ambrosiaster also influenced Augustine, who quoted his comment on Rom 5:12 (in quo omnes peccaverunt) that everyone has sinned in Adam. This exegesis of what became the key text for the doctrine of original sin highlights the role of TRANSLATION in biblical interpretation. The OL rendering that suggested the mistaken exegesis was adopted by the VULGATE and held sway in both Roman Catholic and Protestant exegesis long after being challenged by ERASMUS in 1516.

This passage also exemplifies how Augustine's theological engagement with Paul, and especially with Romans, has had an incalculable influence on Western culture. A passage from Romans (13:13-14) was instrumental in his conversion (Conf. 8), and while studying the epistle in the 390s he wrote the short anti-Manichean Expositio quarundam Propositionum ex Epistula ad Romanos (394) and began the rambling Inchoata Exposito. The Propositions defend free will, but the perplexity of Simplicianus (d. 400) over God's hating Esau (Romans 9) led Augustine in 396 to a longer treatment of Rom 9:10-29, in which he accepted that God's election precedes justification. By relating these issues he made predestination for the first time a problem for Christian doctrine. When Pelagius protested Augustine's doctrine of grace, predestination increasingly provided its bulwark, at whatever cost to human freedom.

The centrality of Romans for Augustine's theology is clearest in his initial response to Pelagius, De Spiritu et Littera (412), which argues that God's help in effecting righteousness consists, not in the gift of the law (the letter), but in our will being aided and uplifted by the Spirit (cf. Rom 7:6). This focus on human incapacity, based on Romans 7 and explained by a doctrine of original sin drawn from Romans 5 (v. 19, if not v. 12), is rather remote from Paul's own concerns; but it yielded a profound reading of the epistle and informed subsequent theological anthropology. Although tangential to the author's intentions, it echoes much that is central to the apostle's religion: Righteousness and faith are God's gift; the law, which gives knowledge of sin, contributes nothing to this saving act; ethics flow from the new life in the Spirit.

Guided by his study of Paul, Augustine refocused Western theology on the human subject. His interpretation of Romans 7 proved crucial. In the early Propositions he referred vv. 7-25 to the person still under the law, a position he later retracted, referring these verses in Contra Duas Epistulas Pelagianorum (1:8) to Christian experience and so foreshadowing Luther's view of the Christian as simul iustus et peccator.

2. Middle Ages. Augustine's understanding of Romans was passed on by monastic compilers, who excerpted his discussions of particular passages. When CASSIODORUS revised Pelagius's commentary in the mid-sixth century, he corrected him with some passages from Augustine. Peter of Tripoli's sixth-century compilation is lost, and BEDE's from the eighth century was not printed. Claudius of Turin and Florus of Lyons from the ninth century added nothing to the understanding of Romans, but they preserved the patristic tradition. The early medieval glosses on the epistles also derive from older authorities, but with BERENGAR; LANFRANC; Bruno of Chartreaux (c. 1032–1101); and especially ANSELM OF LAON, who was responsible for the GLOSSA ORDINARIA on Paul, a new and independent exegesis began to emerge.

The exegetical debates given powerful impetus by Augustine remain unabated. They no longer carry the same theological weight, but for centuries Augustine's interpretation of chap. 7 nourished "the introspective conscience of the West" (K. Stendahl [1976]) even as his reading of chaps. 9–11 informed its bleak view of human history. The human condition as interpreted by Augustine's pessimistic Paulinism was offered healing in the Middle Ages and beyond by a sacramental system that mediated grace and gradually made believers righteous. Paul's discussion of baptism and ethics in Romans 6 provided a foundation for this sacramental theology, but it was another phrase from Romans that under Augustine's influence became central to both medieval and Reformation theology and so to most of Western Christianity. The phrase "the righteousness of God" is scarcely found outside this epistle, but it is presupposed throughout the most intensively read book in Scripture, the psalter. The monastic conjunction of Paul with the psalter at this point, represented brilliantly if one-sidedly by the Augustinian monk Luther, arguably penetrated to the religious roots of what Paul intended; and it did so more successfully than could a critical exegesis that limits itself to literary and historical issues.

Augustine's predestinarianism was less influential and, despite Romans 9, perhaps less true to Paul. It later became central in much Protestant theology, but it was never accepted by the Roman Catholic Church. Even Augustine declined to draw its logical consequences in a doctrine of double predestination or to make quite explicit his view of irresistible grace, conclusions that were condemned at the second Council of Orange (529) and again in the ninth century in opposition to Gottschalk. The different strands in medieval theology could all appeal to Augustine. His introduction of predestination as a doctrinal topic provided a fence protecting medieval views of grace and free will from the Pelagianism that often beckons the morally serious. But Augustine insisted with Paul (Rom 3:5) that God's judgment is always just, never an arbitrary fiat; and the renewal of theology in the late eleventh century was able to build on an exegetical tradition in which the Vulgate of Romans, filtered through Augustine's doctrine of grace, was shaping the Western theological vocabulary. Romans 1:17 and 3:21 were much discussed. Some followed Ambrosiaster, who (guided by Rom 3:3-5) understood "the righteousness of God" as a subjective genitive; others accepted Augustine's conclusion, based on Rom 4:5, that it was "not the righteousness of God by which God himself is just, but by which he justifies the ungodly." Atto of Vercelli (d. 961) wisely followed Ambrosiaster on 1:17, on account of v. 18; but he followed Augustine on 3:21, which looks like an action of God.

The more strongly legal flavor of the Latin phrase iustitia Dei had been apparent as early as Tertullian, and the question of its relationship to God's mercy became urgent when ANSELM OF CANTERBURY shifted the discussion of human salvation from mythological to moral and legal categories. Proslogion 9 understands God's justice to include his mercy. This medieval attempt to root God's saving act (justifying grace) in philosophical reflection on God's nature is foreign to Paul; but by rejecting any idea of God's justice as rendering to all people their due, Anselm was true to the main thrust of Paul's statements in Romans. Rather more of Paul's religion is reflected in the "subjective" theory of the atonement propounded by ABELARD, who referred Rom 3:21 to God's love revealed in Christ, which evokes human faith and love, drawing believers into a loving relationship with God. That this theory is unfolded directly through an exposition of Romans is evidence of the epistle's centrality in medieval theology. Second only to Origen, Augustine's Pauline theology of grace also rings through the monastic meditation on Scripture (e.g., Bernard of Clairvaux's sermons on the Song of Songs). Again, the close association of Paul and the psalter arguably echoed chords in Romans that modern exegesis has been slow to recover.

Early medieval commentaries on Paul's epistles helped shape the theological language of the productive period that followed; but a new development is evident in the more analytic exegesis of the scholastics, who worked through entire texts posing quaestiones. The scientific exactitude of THOMAS AQUINAS's commentary on Paul represents a high point and feeds into his Summa. Romans 1:19-20 provided Aquinas and subsequent Roman Catholic theologians with clear support for their teaching that God can be known through the light of reason, and Romans 4 provided material for their salvation-history framework of Christian belief. Romans 13:1-7 was discussed in political theory and held by Aquinas (ST 2.2.42, art. 2), following John of Salisbury (c. 1115–80; Policraticus 8), not to forbid tyrannicide; however, the Council of Constance (1415) decided otherwise. Verses 3-4 were often combined with the two swords text (Luke 22:38) to justify the church's exercising political power.

3. Renaissance and Reformation. In the opinion of Aquinas, God acts rationally, i.e., in accordance with wisdom, in saving humanity. Other scholars, like ERIUGENA and later G. BIEL, stressed the sovereignty of the divine will. The combination of this voluntarism with Cicero's understanding of iustitia as rendering to each what is due led to the position of the via moderna, which Luther inherited from his teachers and still accepted in his Dictata super Psalterium (1513–15), but then (in 1515) rejected, as he explained in his autobiographical preface to his Latin writings (1545).

In his Lectures on Romans (1515–16), Luther the Roman Catholic monk still understood grace as healing, similar to Augustine. His understanding of Romans, reached independently but confirmed by reading Augustine, caused his break with his teachers, although not the break with Rome. Even his new and distinctive understanding of justification, already emerging here in his claim that the Christian is simul iustus et peccator, i.e., extrinsically (in God's reckoning) justified but intrinsically (as we are in ourselves and in our own estimation) sinners, might have remained within the limits of legitimate theological argument within Roman Catholicism had not other factors contributed to the rupture. Luther's interpretation of Romans contributed massively to the development of doctrine and to the reform in the church but cannot be held responsible for the divisions of Western Christianity. It is conveniently summarized in his 1522 preface to the epistle. The sermons "Two Kinds of Righteousness" (1519) and "On Good Works" (1520) also reflect it and show how the early chapters of 1 Corinthians informed Luther's reading of Romans and (historically and exegetically, if not theologically) distorted it. The notion of Christ's righteousness becoming the believer's, for example, derives from 1 Cor 1:30, not from Romans.

Luther's insistence that justification is on the basis of faith alone "without the works of the law" (Rom 3:28) is as old as Origen, whereas his understanding of faith and his polemical application of the doctrine of justification against "the law" mark an epoch. Paul was generally thinking of Torah observance, especially the circumcision of gentile converts; but Luther's generalization of this to include morality and all human achievement radicalized Augustine's anti-Pelagian stance and made it the heart of the gospel for a large part of Western Christianity.

In his response to Erasmus in De Servo Arbitrio (1525), Luther drew heavily on Romans 9 to support his insistence on the doctrine of predestination. This controversy again reveals Luther as the radical Augustinian breaking with his late medieval teachers. The Renaissance was simultaneously breaking with scholastic exegesis in other ways. J. COLET's Oxford lectures on Romans in the 1490s had offered a plain running exegesis of the Vulgate text, influenced not only by Augustine but also by M. Ficino's (1433–99) Neoplatonic commentary on this epistle. FABER STAPULENSIS made a fresh Latin translation and exegesis of Paul's epistles (1512), which was used by Luther; but it did not advance philological research as L. VALLA's notes had done. Erasmus published Valla's Adnotationes in 1505 before himself carrying through the exegetical achievements of Renaissance humanism, especially in his own lengthy Annotations. These notes accompanied the successive editions of his Greek NT from 1516 to 1535, justifying his editorial decisions and both citing and criticizing much patristic and medieval exegesis and even his humanist predecessors. They include TEXTUAL CRITICISM, exegesis, corrections of inaccurate Latin translations, and comparison of SEPTUAGINT citations with the Hebrew. His corrections of the Vulgate at Rom 5:12 (quatenus for in quo) followed the Greek fathers and withdrew one support from the doctrine of original sin, while his introduction at Rom 4:5 of the verb imputare with its forensic implications apparently contributed to P. MELANCHTHON's forensic doctrine of justification. Erasmus never wrote his promised commentary on Romans, but his Paraphrases (1518) were a form of commentary with a future. They owe much to Origen, something to Ambrosiaster, Chrysostom, and Theophylact (c. 1050–c. 1125)—and they contradict Augustine.

The controversies excited by Erasmus's notes (e.g., on Rom 5:12 and 9:5) account for a proportion of the intense exegetical activity of this period. Although the invention of printing was a stimulus, the main factor behind the activity was the centrality of Romans for the new religious movements, movements that hinged on their interpretation of Scripture and that made Scripture available in the vernacular.

Luther the Augustinian monk remains the fountainhead of Reformation exegesis of Paul, but he left his Roman Catholic Lectures on Romans unprinted and undiscussed. They were rarely read and not published until 1908. His dialectic of law and gospel and his correlation of the Word and faith, however, placed Romans at the heart of Protestant theology and was closely followed, e.g., by W. TYNDALE. The other Reformers were deeply indebted to humanism as well as to Luther, and of these Melanchthon had the most direct influence on Protestant readings of Romans. His widely used Loci Communes of 1521, the first Protestant dogmatics, draws much of its form and content from this epistle; his lecture notes (Annotationes) on Romans were published in 1522. His 1529 commentary reveals more of the humanist and friend of Erasmus in its use of classical rhetoric. The climax of Melanchthon's work on the epistle, however, is the commentary of 1532 (revised 1540). His Apology to the Augsburg Confession (1530) made his forensic understanding of justification the standard Protestant view, introducing the idea of imputation on account of the alien merit of Christ (Art. 21, par. 19). Instead of the Roman Catholic (Augustinian) "making righteous," we have here the Protestant "pronouncing righteous" (Art. 4, par. 252).

The centrality of this doctrine and the importance of predestination for some Reformers led to intensive exegeses of Romans by Roman Catholic as well as by Protestant humanists during this period. All used the Greek text and Erasmus's Annotationes, whether producing their own translations into Latin and the vernacular or retaining the Vulgate. The leading scholastic theologian of the day, T. CAJETAN, undertook to rescue the Bible from the heretics and published a major commentary on Paul's epistles in 1529. In the same year the Louvain friar F. Titelmann (1502–37) followed up his Elucidatio of all the NT epistles (1528) with his Collatio on Romans (1529); and in 1533 J. Gagny of Paris (d. 1549) published his paraphrase (Epitome Paraphrastica), to be followed by his Scholia on Paul's epistles in 1539. Although the humanist bishop J. Sadoleto's (1477–1547) Tres Libri Commentariorum (1535) were suspected of Pelagianism and of affinities with M. BUCER, the denominational divisions were not yet hardened. Many scholars on both sides were looking for reconciliation through open-minded study of Scripture, e.g., M. Grimani's (1488–1546) commentary (1542), which maintains the medieval emphasis on "grace alone."

Of those who became Protestants, J. BULLINGER had lectured on Romans in 1525 while in the Cistercian monastery at Kappel. In writing his commentary (1533) he used Origen, Ambrosiaster, and Theophylact and was deeply influenced by Melanchthon and Erasmus. The largest and most learned Romans commentary was that of Bucer (1536), which was then much used by lesser figures like the Hebraist C. PELLICAN (1539) and the Roman Catholic C. Guilliaud (1493–1551; pub. 1542).

But the greatest Romans commentary of the whole period is the taut work of CALVIN (1540). In this, his first biblical commentary, Calvin was still strongly influenced by Erasmus's Latin text and notes. Like Melanchthon for Lutheranism, Calvin made Romans central for subsequent Reformed Christianity through both his commentary and his complementary systematic theology. The theology of Institutes (1536) and especially of the greatly enlarged edition of 1539 and its French translation (1541), which included a chapter on justification by faith and one on predestination, owed much to Romans. Where Melanchthon was critical of the law, Calvin defended it. He was, like Luther, more true to Augustine than the other Reformers were, but he was also indebted to other fathers and to scholasticism. Unlike Luther, whose lectures retained the medieval format of gloss and scholia, and Melanchthon, who self-consciously pursued Renaissance "method," Calvin used humanist grammatical and rhetorical insights in the service of a profound yet concise theological exposition that sought to clarify the intention of the author.

This short period of astonishing creativity in the interpretation of Romans, when humanist scholarship combined with the Augustinian revival in a Reformation theology centered on Paul's most doctrinal epistle, was followed by three centuries and more in which its interpretation reflected rather than propelled the history of doctrine. Justification remained characteristic of Lutheranism; Romans was read for its doctrinal content, with the emphasis on chaps. 1–8, understood with reference to the individual. There were disagreements among Lutherans, e.g., A. Osiander's (c. 1496–1552) rejection of the forensic character of justification, and marked differences of emphasis between Lutherans and Reformed within a shared Protestant framework. As in the Middle Ages, Romans was central but variously interpreted.

Luther had transferred Christian political responsibility to the state, and Rom 13:1-7 reinforced a more conservative political stance. The Calvinist doctrine of predestination (see Rom 8:28-30; 9:15, 18; 11:7) was challenged by J. ARMINIUS as a result of his study of Romans (1612); and this disagreement has persisted, with H. GROTIUS, the Laudians, and later J. WESLEY also rejecting the deterministic Calvinism of the Puritans. That use of Romans 9 had sustained both Reformers and Puritans under siege, as it had Augustine; but in England their revolution was defeated, with the later Caroline divines preferring the more conservative political thought of Augustine to that of the radical Reformers. G. Bull's (1634–1710) reconciliation of Paul and James indicates an unwillingness to let the apostle rock the boat. In Europe the scholasticism of German and Swiss Protestant orthodoxy multiplied but did not advance the study of this epistle. Neither did the "biblical theology" that first bolstered this orthodoxy and then through PIETISM challenged it. The modern critical study of the Bible had different roots.

The religious potential of Paul's doctrine, evident in the Reformation, was discovered by both Lutherans and Reformed in Pietism and by the Anglican Wesley, whose heart was "strangely warmed" in 1738 at the reading of Luther's preface to Romans. All these revivalists set such store by holiness or perfection as to be accused by Calvinists of relapsing into "works righteousness." But their moral seriousness was true to Paul, even if their separation of sanctification from justification and consequent division of Romans between chaps. 1–5 and 6–8 was a misreading of the epistle. Wesley's recovery of justification by faith for English Christianity was true to Romans as understood by T. CRANMER, whose homilies he abridged and used as a summary of doctrine.

In Roman Catholicism, the decree on justification at the Council of Trent (1546–47) marked the end of compromise with Protestantism and of convergence in both sides' understanding of Romans. The Augustinian revival in Jansenism brought some Roman Catholic interpretation on Romans closer to Protestantism, but Jansenism's defeat contributed to the decline of this Pauline language within Roman Catholicism.

4. Modern Period. Modern historical interpretation of Romans grew out of Renaissance humanism. Grotius's posthumous Annotationes (vol. 2, 1646) took the decisive step of clarifying the NT by drawing on classical and Hellenistic Jewish materials. Grotius influenced H. HAMMOND (1653), the father of English biblical criticism, who studied Paul's language closely and also set the epistles in their historical contexts. Both men stand behind J. LOCKE, whose brilliant preface, paraphrase, and notes (1705–7) on the epistles are unsurpassed. These hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) were later introduced into Germany by J. ERNESTI, whose Institutio appeared in 1761 (rev. 1765). The tradition made popular by Erasmus of interpreting Romans by paraphrasing it into Latin was continued in Germany by J. SEMLER (1769).

More important, Semler was a conduit introducing English DEISM into Germany, including T. MORGAN's theory about the difference between Pauline and Petrine Christianity, as developed in Morgan's The Moral Philosopher (1738–40). This theory proved decisive for the historical study of early Christianity. In 1831 F. C. BAUR made the theory pivotal for his understanding of Christianity's development and in 1836 applied it to the interpretation of Romans. By then the Enlightenment scholarship of Semler and J. D. MICHAELIS, joined by the new historical biblical theology of J. P. GABLER and G. BAUER, had inaugurated the great surge of modern German scholarship accumulating in textbooks of NT introduction and theology as well as in commentaries, scholarship soon to explode in historical monographs, articles, and reviews.

The application of Baur's historical method to Romans is best seen in his early essay on the epistle's "purpose and occasion" (1836), which broke with the "doctrinal" interpretation that had guided Protestant theology since Melanchthon (1521). W. DE WETTE (1835) had already recognized an argument going on in Romans; but he had identified the opposition in general terms as Judaism, making the epistle a battle of ideas and subordinating its polemical aspect to the traditional doctrinal perspective. Baur saw Paul's argumentative intention in relation to the inner-Christian dispute about the inclusion of Gentiles in the church. He was possibly mistaken about the composition of the Roman church, which he thought predominantly Jewish-Christian; but he achieved a much sharper historical profile. His interpretation made sense of chaps. 9–11 as the climax of the apostle's argument, not merely as an appendix to its doctrinal heart in chaps. 1–8, as most Protestant exegesis has done. This new historical perspective signaled an interpretative shift away from the Augustinian and Protestant emphasis on the individual's sin and salvation, with chaps. 1–8 becoming doctrinal prologue rather than doctrinal center. But Baur still read Romans in anthropological and doctrinal terms, even though the doctrine now reflected more of Enlightenment and idealism than of Augustine and Luther. Baur's Paul asserted salvation for all believers, i.e., Jews and Gentiles, on a basis of faith ("universalism") as opposed to Jewish "particularism." The theory we call justification by faith was hammered out in the forge of social conflict and answered a practical question; but it was still a doctrine, one the theologian Baur thought true about God and the world and the historian Baur thought true to Paul. The epistle's arguments are a principled exploration of "the truth of the gospel" (Gal 2:5, 14) occasioned by disputes about the admission of Gentiles without requiring conformity to the law, not merely a pragmatic justification of Paul's missionary policy.

In his early essay and thereafter Baur disputed the authenticity of Romans 15 and 16. Some scholars, like the eighteenth-century vicar of Tewkesbury E. EVANSON, would go further. B. BAUER (1851) denied the authenticity of the whole epistle and was followed by the Dutch school, e.g., A. Loman (1823–97), S. Naber (1828–1913), A. Pierson (1831–96), and W. van Manen (1842–1905). Others, from C. WEISSE and F. SPITTA to J. O'Neill (1975), have thought it extensively interpolated; and a few, e.g., W. Schmithals (1975, 1988), composite. Chapter 16 is now generally agreed to be Pauline, but many scholars, e.g., T. MANSON (1948), have doubted whether it was directed to Rome. The doxology of 16:25-27 is still widely thought inauthentic; but of R. BULTMANN's (1947) eight proposed glosses, only 7:25*b* has found many supporters.

These literary questions have been marginal to the history of exegesis; although attempts to relate Romans to other Greek literature (J. Weiss [1897]; P. Wendland [1907]; Bultmann [1910]) have become more central in modern times, the interpretation of Romans has always been mainly the study of its ideas. Baur's classic monograph on Paul (1845) analyzes them brilliantly in terms of the Christian's spiritual self-consciousness. Bultmann later (1929) saw in Baur's analysis an anticipation of his own existential interpretation, but the decline of Hegelianism allowed the metaphysics of spirit only a weak echo in the contrast liberal interpreters drew between the spiritual and the material ("flesh") in Paul's thought (cf. the NEB translation of sarx as "lower nature"). Baur's analysis of Paul's terms nevertheless contributed significantly to the biblical theology of German liberal Protestantism, where Paulinism remained central; and Romans, the main quarry for that doctrinal type. Baur's admirer C. Holsten (1825–97) introduced the dichotomy found in many subsequent accounts of Paul's theology by contrasting his negative view of "flesh" in Romans 7 and 8, based on Greek dualism, with his more neutral Hebraic usage elsewhere. H. Lüdemann's (1842–1933) classic study of Paul's anthopology (1872) extended this distinction to two different doctrines of human nature and so of redemption: the Jewish juridical subjective idea found in Romans 1–4 and the Greek dualistic ethical and "physical" concepts present in chaps. 5–8. This dichotomy within Romans was widely explained in terms of Paul's double background in Jewish Hellenism, with more weight being given to the Greek influence, e.g., by O. PFLEIDERER (1873). Lüdemann and E. REUSS (1864^4) before him also thought the ethico-physical strand more characteristic of Paul than the juridical and so prepared for the denial by W. WREDE (1904) and later A. SCHWEITZER (1930) that justification was central to Paul's theology. Most Protestant exegesis and theology remained more traditional, however; and the Reformation interpretation of Romans was defended and updated by more conservative scholars and by systematic theologians, e.g., in A. RITSCHL's Die christliche Lehre der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung 2 (1872).

The main stimulus to new understandings of Romans in this period came from history-of-religion research (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) on Judaism and on the wider Hellenistic milieu. Like Grotius, Baur had recognized the importance of the religious context; but J. Droysen's (1808–84) discovery of the Hellenistic age and advances in the understanding of first-century Judaism rendered some of his conclusions obsolete. In 1888 H. GUNKEL's monograph on Paul's understanding of the Spirit undercut modern idealist assumptions and placed Paul more accurately in his religious environment. Also in 1888 O. Everling clarified Paul's apocalyptic cosmology (see Romans 8) by reference to Jewish apocalyptic (see APOCALYPTICISM), showing that redemption meant liberation from demonic powers. R. KABISCH's monograph on Paul's eschatology (1893) credited him with a "physical" view of redemption, as had Lüdemann, but derived this from Jewish apocalyptic, adumbrating Schweitzer's theory of Paul's "eschatological mysticism" (1911, 1930). H. HOLTZMANN's preference, shared by E. Teichmann (1869–1919), for the non-Jewish elements in Paul was reinforced in the 1890s and 1900s by the debate about the influence of the mystery religions on Paul's baptismal ideas in Rom 6:3-5 (W. Heitmüller [1903, 1911]; R. Reitzenstein [1910]; and many others). REITZENSTEIN (1904) dated the Poimandres myth to the first century, and W. BOUSSET (1913) followed him in looking there for the religious milieu of Hellenistic gentile Christianity and (granted the apostle's modifications) Paul's Christ mysticism, his talk of spirit, his idea of dying and rising with Christ (Romans 6), and the Adam myth he offers in Romans 5. Bultmann and his pupils followed this derivation of Paul's ecclesiology and christology from the supposed Gnostic milieu of early Hellenistic Christianity; but they found his distinctive contribution, most clearly visible in Romans, elsewhere.

All these representative studies of Paul's "system" have affected how Paul's most systematic letter has been read within NT scholarship. They are reflected in critical commentaries, histories of Christianity, accounts of "Paulinism," and NT theologies. Biographical studies (e.g., Deissmann [1911; 1925^2]) were also popular among liberals, for whom Paul's religion was more interesting and admirable than his theology. Romans 7 was sometimes interpreted as Pauline autobiography, and Paul's divided mind was understood to explain his conversion in psychological terms until W. KÜMMEL (1929) provided a more convincing account of the passage. The focus of history-of-religion research shifted from intertestamental Judaism to the mystery religions and Gnosticism before drawing the interpretation of Romans back to Paul's religious heritage and locating him more firmly on the map of first-century Judaism, now illuminated by Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) as well as by the APOCRYPHA, PSEUDEPIGRAPHA, PHILO, and later rabbinic sources. C. H. DODD, among others, clarified the importance of the Septuagint for understanding Romans (1932, 1935); and Schweitzer's insistence on the centrality of apocalyptic has, with modifications, been maintained for Romans by E. KÄSEMANN (1973) and Beker (1980). Yet other factors revolutionized the German study of Romans in the 1920s. The Luther renaissance was fueled by the rediscovery of Luther's early lectures on Romans, and the "dialectical theology" of K. BARTH and F. Gogarten (1887–1967) began with the study of Romans and the Reformers. Both these and A. SCHLATTER's NT interpretation contributed to the new Romans-based syntheses of Paul's theology forged by Bultmann and Käsemann and still echoing in the writings of J. Dunn, H. Hübner, and P. Stühlmacher, among many others.

Barth's contribution (1919, 1921–22[2]) was to sharpen the hermeneutical question of how to interpret Paul's talk of God. His Pauline and Reformation understanding of revelation taking place in and through proclamation encouraged him to "speak with" Paul and articulate in his own modern way what the text of Romans is saying. This approach went beyond historical exegesis and gained little support in biblical scholarship apart from Bultmann's appreciative review article (1922); however, its contribution to conservative biblical theology makes it part of the larger story of the impact of Romans on Christian history. Barth's aim was carried through in NT scholarship by Bultmann's account (1948) of man prior to faith (see Romans 1–3) and man under faith (see Rom 3:21–8:39 and 10).

This distillation of Paul's (mainly Romans') anthropological ideas corresponded to Bultmann's theory that God-talk is at the same time talk of human existence, and it formed one of the two planks of his existential interpretation of the NT. The process was continued by his pupils, notably by H. Conzelmann (1967), G. BORNKAMM (1969), and G. Klein (1969). But another pupil, Käsemann (1969), was critical of Bultmann's idealistic and individualistic account of Paul's theology. To do justice to the physicality of human beings; to Paul's futurist and cosmic eschatology; and to the lordship of Christ, the sacraments, and the salvation-historical element in Romans, Käsemann insisted on the realism of Paul's soma language and the primacy of christology, giving more weight to the mythological language of Romans 5–8 and to the historical and ecclesiological dimensions of Romans 9–11. Some of Käsemann's exegesis, notably his apocalyptic interpretation of the righteousness of God, has been challenged (e.g., E. Lohse [1973]; Klein [1976]), and some has been developed (C. Müller [1964]; Stühlmacher [1965]). But this synthesis integrates the history-of-religion school's research with a Luther-inspired (iustificatio impii) interpretation of Romans and illuminates many aspects of Paul's theology, worship, and ethics.

The discussion of Romans within twentieth-century German exegesis, notably in the Bultmann school but since O. Kuss (1957–78) also in ecumenical Roman Catholic scholarship, has thus combined historical exegesis with strong theological interests, again reflecting the centrality of Romans to Christian (especially Lutheran) theology and proclamation. Elsewhere, a larger space between the interpretation of Paul and theologians' own understanding of Christianity has permitted a less directly theological engagement with Romans. In Christian practice, the themes of the epistle have usually been read in the light of traditional belief, e.g., 1:3-4 in terms of Chalcedon and 3:24-26 as related to atonement doctrine; and that interaction survives in German NT theology, even though historical exegesis provides controls and stimulates new reflection. However, historical research in a pluralist society has relativized that tradition of Christian theological exegesis. While it can be defended as a legitimate set of options for reading Romans, persuasive to some persons whose religion is largely shaped by Paul and Luther, it is scarcely the only historically responsible way of interpreting the epistle today.

More sympathetic and better-informed studies of early Judaism, sometimes motivated by a laudable desire to improve Jewish-Christian relations (e.g., W. D. Davies [1948, 1978]; K. Stendahl [1976]), have reoriented research on Romans in North America, Great Britain, and Scandinavia. In 1963 and 1976 STENDAHL again set Romans firmly in the context of Paul's gentile mission. He agreed with Baur that chaps. 9–11 form the climax of the epistle and echoed Wrede and Schweitzer in rejecting Luther's preoccupation with justification; but he followed J. MUNCK (1954) against all three in denying that Romans was primarily a polemic against Jewish Christianity. Instead, Stendahl maintained that it was apologetic in function: Romans defended Paul's gentile mission by showing how the mission fitted into God's plan. The apostle was not attacking other people or positions, as Luther later attacked the Roman Catholic system by means of the Pauline antithesis of faith and works.

Whether Luther's reading of the epistle was legitimate in his time or is defensible now are further questions that involve more than Paul's authorial intentions; but these intentions are usually agreed to be at least relevant to, and perhaps decisive for, theological interpretation. Modern critical advocates of traditional readings of Romans assumed that the readings were broadly true to the apostle's intentions. Stendahl's persuasive historical contextualization of Romans in Paul's mission was therefore provocative. It initiated the conflict of interpretations that has surrounded Romans since the 1970s.

Historical understanding of the circumstances in which any ancient document, but especially a letter, was written solves some problems and improves a modern reader's understanding of the text. Stendahl's suggestions received strong independent support from E. P. Sanders's account of Palestinian Judaism (1977). Sanders demonstrated that Judaism is not about merit and earning salvation through good works and that therefore Paul could not have been opposing such a system. A significant portion of traditional Pauline interpretation was thus rendered implausible. Still, Sanders was more willing than Stendahl to admit that Paul was critical of his former pharisaic Judaism for its failure to recognize Jesus as Messiah. Christology and soteriology, i.e., salvation in Christ, was Paul's ultimate concern, even though this salvation comes from membership in the people of God. The faith/works antithesis concerns "getting in" rather than describing different ways of relating to God. Justification by faith, according to Sanders, was neither Paul's christology (as Bultmann thought) nor his central idea. But it was connected with salvation in Christ; and it was not simply a missionary tactic, as F. Watson (1986) later argued. Sanders thus stands closer to the traditional view than Stendahl or Watson do because he takes Paul's antithesis seriously. The phrase "not by works," however, is not about what Luther had thought. Sanders (1983) made sense of Paul's conflicting statements about the law (aside from Romans 2) by seeing them in context. H. Räisänen (1983) reached broadly similar conclusions but expressed them more negatively. Watson, through a fresh reconstruction of the situation in Rome (1986, 94-105), was able to incorporate Romans 2 into the new perception of Romans's theology initiated by Baur and revived by Stendahl. This "Romans debate" (K. Donfried [1977, 1991^2]) about the character and purpose of the epistle and the situation addressed (see also P. Minear [1971]) is evidence of Baur's methods and mapwork being followed and his conclusions being modified (see, e.g., Hübner [1978]; Dunn [1988a, 1988b]; Wedderburn [1988]). The variety of possible conclusions shows how much is uncertain at the historical level, as also in the exegetical debates, on account of the epistle's many grammatical and syntactical ambiguities.

The interpretation of Romans at the close of the twentieth century, however, is more complicated than that "Romans debate" suggests because both historical and exegetical enquiries are a means to an interpretive end, not the goal of most attempts to make sense of the epistle. Knowledge of the language is a necessary but not a sufficient condition of genuine understanding; knowledge of the literary conventions prevalent at the time of writing and of other historical information also provides aids to understanding and supports arguments in favor of one interpretation and against another. A more important issue still is the kind of understanding aimed at. Diversity is evident in the various ways the subject matter is defined. Different interpretative aims and different assessments of Paul's subject matter may well affect how the epistle is read. Such diversity reveals another dimension of the interpretation of Romans, one arising from secularism and religious pluralism: Biblical scholars disagree about Paul's subject matter and its possible truth or bearing on their lives.

In this situation interpreters can be questioned regarding the theological stances (if any) that inform their respective proposals, not only about their historical understanding of some first-century ideas and conflicts. Stendahl and Käsemann have contemporary interests at heart in their conflicting interpretations of the Pauline antithesis of faith and works: the one in fostering better relations between Christians and Jews, the other in maintaining a particular understanding of the gospel of salvation. Käsemann sees the world, rather than the church, as the stage of God's saving activity: God justifies the ungodly (Rom 4:5). Thus the authentic response to this gospel proclaimed is personal existential faith in Christ rather than membership in a pious club. Käsemann's Pauline theology of the cross subjects the necessary corporate, ecclesial, "horizontal" dimension of Christian commitment to a christological criterion. Both he and Stendahl include historical and exegetical components in their proposals that might be falsified or lose plausibility in the course of argument. But theological insights can survive the destruction of some historical and exegetical supports. The validity of Luther's criticism of late medieval theology and practice, for example, is not wholly dependent on the historical accuracy of his understanding of Paul. Luther applied the text with its powerful antithesis to a new situation and in doing so changed the point at issue. That application is not history, but it may be more true in some sense to Paul than would be a more historically correct interpretation that fails to echo the religious power of the text.

Similar observations may be made regarding attempts by LIBERATION theologians to achieve a socially relevant interpretation of the text (e.g., J. Miranda [1974]). Such atttempts, along with the use of psychological categories to clarify the transformation of self-understanding intended by Paul's soteriological language (R. Scroggs [1977]; G. Theissen [1983]), raise again the question, posed most challengingly by Baur and Bultmann, of what conceptualities are appropriate to interpret Romans in one's own day. The answers will depend on what kind of interpretation is wanted. Theological interpretations are no longer the only options, and what counts as a theological interpretation today is itself disputed. Political and psychological readings of Romans may be deeply theological.

The majority of readers of Romans are Christian believers who share some of Paul's assumptions. But other readers are not believers, and some believers choose to cultivate the ground they share with their non-Christian contemporaries rather than to explore what they share with Paul. The various approaches have led to new insights. NT scholars' specialism directs them back to the first-century context of the epistle in order to make their particular contributions to how it is appropriately read both within Christianity and in the broader culture. The epistle's historical context includes ancient literature and rhetoric. The debate about Paul's use of the "cynic-stoic diatribe" in Romans continues (S. Stowers [1981]), and RHETORICAL CRITICISM promises further illumination of Paul's literary activity. The historical aspect of history-of-traditions research has been most fruitful for the exegesis of Romans, identifying liturgical traditions quoted or echoed and commented on by Paul. Identifying these traditions, especially in Rom 3:24-25, has allowed some interpreters (Bultmann [1948]; Käsemann [1960]) to deny that Jewish-Christian atonement theology is characteristic of Paul, whereas others (Stühlmacher [1981]) have given special weight to what Paul takes over from early Christian tradition. However, the literary aspects of Paul's use of earlier traditions are proving most fascinating. Scholars agree on the importance of Scripture for Paul, and the extent of his scriptural quotation in Romans 3–4; 9–11; 15 has attracted increasing attention (F. Umbreit [1856]; O. Michel [1929]; L. Goppelt [1939]; Dodd [1952]; E. Ellis [1957]; R. Hays [1989]). Among the methods and approaches of modern LITERARY THEORY, debates about INTERTEXTUALITY (Hays) and READER-RESPONSE (A. Thiselton [1992]) have seemed more illuminating than has structuralist exegesis (D. Via [1975]; D. Patte [1983]; see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION).

These brief indications confirm how the interpretation of Romans has exploded in several new directions at the close of the twentieth century, while historical exegesis continues to wrestle with central ideas and key phrases such as "in Christ" (A. Deissmann [1892]; F. Neugebauer [1961]; C. F. D. Moule [1977]). A dramatic new interpretation of a small ambiguous phrase "the faith of Jesus (Christ)" at Rom 3:22, 26, etc., still has the capacity to stimulate contrary understandings of Paul's theology and therefore conflicting readings of Romans. The translation of a single word, hilasterion (3:25), has similarly caused or reflected conflicting interpretations in the past. Historical and linguistic study exercises some control over the diversity of interpretations but less than most theologians could wish. Religious interests have always been present in theological interpretation, and this no longer appears disreputable. They are sometimes present in historical exegesis too, and anti-religious interests are also sometimes present in biblical scholarship. Modern historical and other newer approaches continue to stimulate a conversation that has always included diverse and conflicting interpretations of this powerfully ambiguous text.

Bibliography: P. Abelard, PL 178:783-978; ET, LCC 10, 276-87. W. Affeldt, "Verzeichnis de Römerbriefkommentare bis zu Nikolaus v. Lyra," Traditio 13 (1957) 369-407. E. Aleith, Das Paulusverständnis in der alten Kirche (BZNW 18, 1937); "Das Paulusverständnis des J. Chrystostomus," ZNW 38 (1939) 181-88. B. Altaner, Patrologie (1963[6]; ET 1960[5]). P. Althaus, Paulus und Luther über den Menschen (1938, 1963[4]). Ambrosiaster, CSEL 81.1, 224-38. Anselm of Laon, PL 114:469-520. Atto of Vercelli, PL 134:125-288. J. Auer, Die Entwicklung der Gnadenlehre in der Hochscholastic (2 vols., 1942–51). Augustine, Expositio quarundam Propositionum ex Epistula ad Romanos, PL 35:2063-87, CSEL 84:3-52, cf. 183-85 (Retractiones); Inchoata expositio, PL 35:2088-106, CSEL 84:145-81 and 186 (Retractiones); De div. Quaestiones Ad Simplicianum (ET, LCC 6, 1953) 376-406; De Spiritu et Littera, CSEL 60:155-229; ET, LCC 8 (1955) 182-250; De peccato originalis, CSEL 42:167-206. W. S. Babcock, "Augustine's Interpretation of Romans (AD 394–396)," Augustinian Studies 10 (1979) 55-74; (ed.), Paul and the Legacies of Paul (1990). R. Badenas, Christ the End of the Law (1985). C. K. Barrett, From First Adam to Last (1952). K. Barth, Der Römerbrief (1919, 1921[2]; ET 1933); Kurze Erklärung des Römerbriefes (1956). J. Bassler, Divine Impartiality: Paul and a Theological Axiom (SBLDS 59, 1982). B. Bauer, Kritik der paulinischen Briefe (3 vols., 1851). F. C. Baur, Die Christuspartei in der korinthischen Gemeinde (1831); "Über Zweck und Veranlassung des Römerbriefes," TZT (1836, repr. 1963); Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi (2 vols., 1845; 1866–67[2]; ET 1875–76). R. Baxter Paraphrase (1685). J. C. Beker, Paul the Apostle: The Triumph of God in Life and Thought (1980). J. A. Bengel, Gnomon NT (1742; ET 1855). J. H. Bentley, Humanists and Holy Writ (1983). T. Beza, Annotationes 2:3-152 (1556). H. Boers, The Justification of the Gentiles (1994). G. Bornkamm, Early Christian Experience (1969); Paulus (1969; ET 1971). W. Bousset, Kyrios Christos (1913; ET 1970). E. Brandenburger, Adam und Christus (1962). F. F. Bruce, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (1963). Bruno of Chartreaux, PL 153:15-122. J. Bugenhagen, Interpretatio (1527). G. Bull, Harmonia Apostolica (1669–70). H. Bullinger, De gratia Dei justicante (1554). R. Bultmann, Der Stil der paulinischen Predigt und die kynisch-stoische Diatribe (1910); "K. Barths Römerbrief in seiner 2. Ausgabe," Die Christliche Welt 36 (1922) 320-23, 330-34, 358-61, 369-73; "Zur Geschichte der Paulus-Forschung," TRu NF 1 (1929) 26-59; "Glossen im Römerbrief," TLZ 72 (1947) 197-202; Theologie des NTs 1 (1948; ET 1952). J. Cambier, L'Évangile de Dieu selon L'Épître aux Romains (1967). C. P. Carlson, Jr., Justification in Earlier Medieval Theology (1974). Chrysostom, PG 60:391-682. J. Colet, Enarratio in Ep. S. Pauli ad Rom (c. 1497; ET, ed. J. Lupton, 1873 repr. 1965). H. Conzelmann, Grundriss der Theologie des NTs (1967; ET 1968). J. A. Cramer, Catenae Graecorum Patrum in NT (3 vols., 1838–44, repr. 1967). Cyril of Alexandria, PG 74:773-856. N. A. Dahl, Studies in Paul (1977). W. D. Davies, Paul and Rabbinic Judaism (1948); "Paul and the People of Israel," NTS 24 (1978) 4-39. A. Deissmann, Die neutestamentliche Formel "in Christo Jesu" (1892); Paulus: Eine kultur- und religionsgeschichtliche Skizze (1911; 1925[2]). D. Demmer, Lutherus interpres, der theol. Neuansatz in den Römerbriefexegese (1958). H. Denifle, Die abendländischen

Schriftausleger bei Luther über Iustitia Dei (Rom 1.17) und Iustificatio (1905). W. M. L De Wette, Kurze Erklärung des Briefes an die Römer (1835; 1847⁴). C. H. Dodd, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (1932, rev. ed. 1959); The Bible and the Greeks (1935); According to the Scriptures: The Sub-structure of NT Theology (1952). K. P. Donfried, The Romans Debate (1977, 1991²). R. M. Douglas, J. Sadoleto, 1477–1547, Humanist and Reformer (1958). J. D. G. Dunn, Romans 1–8 (WBC 38A, 1988a); Romans 9–16 (WBC 38B, 1988b). G. Ebeling, Lutherstudien 3 (1985). G. Eichholz, Die Theologie des Paulus im Umriss (1972, rev. ed. 1975). N. Elliott, The Rhetoric of Romans (1990). E. E. Ellis, Paul's Use of the OT (1957). Erasmus, Annotationes (1516, 1527) 318-92 (ET, ed. A. Reeve and M. A. Screech, 1990); Paraphrasis NT (1622; ET, ed. R. D. Sider, 1984). O. Everling, Die paulinische Angelologie und Damonologie (1888). O. Fatio and P. Fraenkel (ed.), Histoire de l'exégèse au XIVe siècle (1978). M. Ficino, Opera Omnia 1:425-91 (1561, repr. 1959). J. A. Fitzmyer, Romans (AB 33, 1993). Florus of Lyons, PL 119:279-318. K. Froehlich, "Romans 8.1-11: Pauline Theology in Medieval Interpretation," Faith and History (ed. J. T. Carroll et al., 1991) 239-60. K. Froehlich and M. Gibson (eds.), Biblical Latina cum Glossa Ordinaria (1480 fac., 1992). J. Gagny, Epitome Paraphrastica (1533); Scholia (1539). H. Gamble, The Textual History of the Letter to the Romans (SD 42, 1977). L. Gaston, Paul and the Torah (1987). B. Girardin, Rhétorique et théologique: Calvin, le commentaire de l'épître aux Romains (1979). L. Goppelt, Typos: The Typological Interpretation of the OT in the New (1939; ET 1982). P. Gorday, Principles of Patristic Exegesis (1983). L. Grane, Modus loquendi theologicus (1975). H. Grotius, Annotationes (3 vols., 1641–50). W. Grundmann, Der Römerbriefauslegung zu Gum. und Ref.: Eine Studie zu H. Bullingers Römerbrief von 1525 (1970). A. J. Guerra, Romans and the Apologetic Tradition (1995). C. Guillaud, Collatio (1542). W. Gutbrod, Paulinische Anthropologie (1934). H. Gunkel, The Influence of the Holy Spirit (1888; ET 1979). W. Gutbrod, Paulinische Anthropologie (1934). H. Hammond, A Paraphrase with Annotations (1653, repr. 1845). A. von Harnack, Marcion (1921). V. E. Hasler, Gesetz und Evangelium in der alten Kirche bis Origines (1953). R. B. Hays, Echoes of Scripture (1989). W. Heitmüller, Taufe und Abendmahl bei Paulus (1903); Taufe und Abendmahl im Urchristentum (1911). A. Hilgenfeld, "Der Römerbrief," ZWT 35-36 (1892–93), 5 articles. R. J. Hoffmann, Marcion (1984). H. H. Holfelder, Solus Christus (1981). K. Holl, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kirchengeschichte (vols. 1 and 3, 1923–28). H. Hübner, Rechtfertigung und Heiligung in Luthers Römerbriefvorlesung (1965); Das Gesetz bei Paulus (1978; ET 1984); Interpretation 34 (1980) 1; "Paulusforschung seit 1945," ANRW II, 25.4 (1987) 2699-840. R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms (1971). R. Kabisch, Die Eschatologie des Paulus (1893). E. Käsemann, Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen 1-2 (1960; ET 1964, 1969); Paulinische Perspektiven (1969; ET 1971); An die Römer (HNT 8a, 1973; 1980⁴; ET 1980). L. Keck, Paul and His Letters (1979). K. Kertelge, "Rechtfertigung" bei Paulus (1969). W. Keuck, "Sünder und Gerechter: Rom 7.14-25 in der Auslegung der grieschischen Väter" (diss., Tübingen, 1955). G. Klein, Rekonstruktion und Interpretation (1969); "Righteousness in the NT," IDBSup, 750-52; "Romans, Letter to the," IDBSup, 752-54. W. G. Kümmel, Römer 7 und die Bekehrung des Paulus (1929, repr. 1974). O. Kuss, Der Römerbrief (3 vols., 1957–78). P. F. Landes, Augustine on Romans (Texts and Translations 23, 1982). A. M. Landgraf, Einfrühscholastik (1948). Lanfranc of Bec, PL 150:105-56. Lefèvre d'Étaples, S. Pauli ep xiv ex vulgata ed. (1512). A. Lekkerkerker, "Römer 7 und Römer 9 bei Augstin" (diss., Amsterdam, 1942). J. B. Lightfoot, Biblical Essays (1895). A. Lindemann, Paulus in ältesten Christentum (1979). R. A. Lipsius, Die paulinische Rechtfertigungslehre (1853). J. Locke, A Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians, I and II Corinthians, Romans, Ephesians (1707, repr. 1987; GT 1768–69), preface by Michaelis and includes "An Essay for the Understanding of Paul's Epistles, by Consulting St. Paul Himself." W. von Loewenich, Von Augustin zu Luther (1959). E. Lohmeyer, Grundlagen paulinische Theologie (1929). E. Lohse, "Die Gerechtigkeit Gottes in der paulinischen Theologie," Die Einheit des Neuen Testaments (1973) 209-27. A. D. Loman, "Quaestiones paulinae," TT 16 (1882) 141-85; TT 20 (1886) 42-113; "Paulus en de kanon," TT 20 (1886) 387-406. H. Lüdemann, Die Anthropologie des Apostels Paulus (1872). W. Lütgert, Der Röm. als hist. Problem (1913). M. Luther, Lectures on Romans (1515/16; LT, ed. J. Ficker, 1960); WA 56 (ET, ed. W. Pauch, LCC 15, 1961); Der Servo Arbitrio, WA 18, 600-787 (ET, P. S. Watson, LCC 17, 1969). S. Lyonnett, Questiones in Ep. ad Rom. (2 vols., 1962–75). A. E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei (2 vols., 1986). W. C. van Manen, Paulus, vol. 2, De Brief aan de Romeinen (1891). T. W. Manson, "St. Paul's Letter to the Romans—and Others," BJRL 31 (1948) 224-40. F.-W. Marquardt, Die Juden im Römerbrief (1971). R. M. Martin, La controverse sur le péché originel au debut du XIVe siècle (1930). C. Martini, Ambrosiaster (1944). W. Maurer, Melanchthon-Studien (1964). W. Meeks, The First Urban Christians (1983). P. Melanchthon, Loci Communes (1521, 1535², 1559); Annotationes (1522); Dispositio orationes, CR 15:441-92; Commentarii in Epistolam Pauli ad Romanos (1540); Enarratio, CR 15:797-1052; Studienausgabe (ed. H. Engelland, 1952; ET, ed. W. Pauck, LCC 19, 1969). B. Metzger, Index to Periodical Literature on the Apostle Paul (1960). O. Michel, Paulus und seine Bibel (1929, 1972²). J. D. Michaelis, Einleitung (1750; ET 1790). P. Minear, The Obedience of Faith (1971). J. P. Miranda, Marx and the Bible: A Critique of the Philosophy of Oppression (1974). E. Molland, The Conception of the Gospel in Alexandrian Theology (1938). D. Moo, The Epistle to the Romans (NICNT, 1996). J. D. Moores, Wrestling with Rationality in Paul (1995). C. F. D. Moule, The Origin of Christology (1977). C. Müller, Gottes Gerechigkeit und Gottes Volk (1964). J. Müller, M. Bucers Hermeneutik (1965). J. Munck, Paulus und die Heilsgeschichte (1954; ET 1959); Christus und Israel (1956; ET 1967). W. Mundle, "Die Exegese der paulinischen Briefe im Kommentar des Ambrostiaster" (diss., Marburg, 1919). F. Neugebauer, In Christus: "En Christo." Eine Untersuchung zum paulinischen Glaubensverständnis (1961). A. Nygren, Commentary on Romans (1949). G. Nygren, Das Prädestinationproblem in der Theologie Augustins (1956). Oecolampadius, Adnotationes (1525). J. C. O'Neill, Paul's Letter to the Romans (PNTC, 1975). Origen, Origenis opera omnia (ed. E. Lommatzsch, 1831–48) vols. 6–7; PG 14:837-1291. E. Pagels, The Gnostic Paul (1975). W. Paley, Horae Paulinae (1790). T. H. L. Parker, Calvin's NT Commentaries (1971); Commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans, 1532–42 (1986). P. M. Parvis, "Theodoret's Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul" (diss., University of Oxford, 1975). D. Patte, Paul's Faith and the Power of the Gospel: A Structural Introduction to the Pauline Letters (1983). J. B. Payne, "Erasmus: Interpreter of Romans," Sixteenth-century Essays and Studies 2 (1971) 1-35; "Erasmus and Lefèvre d'Étaples as Interpreters of Paul," ARG 65 (1974) 54-82. O. Pfleiderer, Der Paulinismus (1873; ET 1877). A. Pierson and S. A. Naber, Verisimilia laceram conditionem Novi Testamenti (1886). P. Platz, "Der Römerbrief in der Gnadenlehre Augustins," Cassiciacum 5 (1938). J. F. Quasten, Patrology (3 vols., 1950–60). H. Räisänen, Paul and the Law (1983); The Torah and Christ (1986); "Römer 9–11: Analyse eines geistigen Ringens," ANRW II.25.4 (1987) 2891-939. R. Reitzenstein, Poimandres (1904); Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (1910). K. H. Rengstorf, Das Paulusbild in der neueren Deutschen Forschung (1964). E. Reuss, Die Geschichte der Heiligen Schriften Neuen Testaments (1864⁴); Les Épîtres pauliniennes (1878). H. Ridderbos, Paulus 1970; ET 1975). B. Rigaux, The Letters of St Paul: The State of Research (1962; GT 1964; ET 1968). H. Rückert, Die Rechtfertigungslehre auf die Tridentischen Konzil (1925). E. Rummel, Erasmus' "Annotations" on the NT (1986). E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism (1977); Paul, the Law, and the Jewish People (1983). A. Scaino, Paraphrasis (1589). M. Schar, Das Machleben des Origines im Zeitalter des Humanismus (1979). C. Schäublin, Untersuchungen zu Methode und Herkunft des antiochenischen Exegese (1974). K. H. Schelkle, Paulus, Lehrer der Väter (1959²). A. Schirmer, Das Paulusverständnis Melanchthons, 1518–22 (1944). A. Schlatter, Luthers Deutung des Röm. (1917). W. Schmithals, Der Römerbrief als historische Problem (SNT 9, 1975); Der Römerbrief: Ein Kommentar (1988). P. Schoeps, Paulus (1959). J. Schupp, Die Gnadenlehre des Petrus Lombardus (1952). R. Scroggs, Paul for a New Day (1977). A. Schweitzer, Geschichte der paulinischen Forschung (1911; ET 1912); Die Mystik des Apostels Paulus (1930; ET 1931). H. Seesemann, "Das Paulusverständnis des Clemens Alexandrinus," TSK 107 (1936) 312-46. J. S. Semler, Paraphrasis (1769). F. Siegert, Argumentation bei Paulus (1985). R. Simon, Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du NT (1693). B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1952, rev. ed. 1964). A. Souter, Pelagius' Expositions of Thirteen Epistles of St Paul (TS 9, 3 vols., 1922–31); The Earliest Latin Commentaries on the Epistles of St Paul: A Study (1927). C. Spicq, Esquisse d'une histoire de l'exégèse latine au moyen âge (1944). K. Staab, Die Pauluskatenen, nach den handschriftlichen Quellen untersucht (1926); Pauluskommentare aus der griechischen Kirche, aus Katenenhandschriften (NTAbh 15, 1933) includes Didymus (1–6), Acacius (53–56), Apollinaris (57–82), Diodore (83–112), Theodore of Mopsuestia (113–172), Severian (213–225), Gennadius (352–418), Photius (457-570). F. Stegmüller, Repertorium Biblicum Medii Aevi (11 vols., 1950–80). D. C. Steinmetz (ed), The Bible in the Sixteenth Century (1990). K. Stendahl, Paul Among Jews and Gentiles (1976), includes 1963 essay. S. K. Stowers, The Diatribe and Paul's Letter to the Romans (1981); A Rereading of Romans: Justice, Jews, and Gentiles (1994). P. Stühlmacher, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus (1965); Das paulinische Evangelium (1968); Der Brief an die Römer (1989; ET 1994). J. Taylor, Paraphrase (1745). E. Teichmann, Die paulinische Vorstellungen von Auferstehung und Gericht und ihre Beziehung zur jüdischen Apokalyptik (1896). G. Theissen, Psychological Aspects of Pauline Theology (1983: ET 1987). M. Theobald, Römerbrief (2 vols., 1992). Theodoret, PG 82:43-226. Theophylact, PG 124:335-560. A. C. Thiselton, New Horizons in Hermeneutics (1992). Thomas Aquinas, Expositio in ep. omnes Divi Pauli Apostol (1593, repr. 1948-50. T. Titelmann, Collatio (1529); Elucidatio (1532, repr. 1540). K. J. Torjesen, Hermeneutical Procedure and Theological Method in Origen's Exegesis (1986). J. W. Trigg, Biblical Interpretation: Message of the Fathers of the Church (1986). C. H. Turner, "Greek Patristic Commentaries on the Pauline Epistles," DBSup (1904) 484-531. W. Tyndale, Prologue on Romans (1526; ed. G. E. Duffield, 1964). F. W. C. Umbreit, Der Brief an die Römer auf dem Grunde des Alten Testamentes ausgelegt (1856). L. Usteri, Entwicklung des paulinischen Lehrbegriffs (1824, 1851⁶). L. Valla, Collatio NT (1444; ed. A. Perosa, 1970); "In ep. ad Rom," Opera Omnia (1540, repr. 1962). C. Verfaillie, "La doctrine de la justification dans Originème d'après son commentaire de l'Épître aux Romains" (diss., Strasbourg, 1926). D. O. Via, Kerygma and Comedy in the NT: A Structuralist Approach to Hermeneutic (1975). W. Völker, "Paulus bei Origines," TSK 102 (1930) 258-79. F. Watson, Paul, Judaism, and the Gentiles: A Sociological Approach (SNTSMS 56, 1986). V. Weber, Kritische Geschichte der Exegeses des 9 Kapitels, resp. der Verse 14-23 des Römerbriefs bis auf Chrysostomus und Augustinus einschliesslich (1899). A. G. M. Wedderburn, The Reasons for Romans (1988). J. Weiss, "Beiträge zur paulinischen Rhetorik" (FS B. Weiss, 1897). C. H. Weisse, Beiträge zur Kritik der paulinischen Briefe an die Galater, Römer, Philipper, und Kolosser (1867). H. D. Wendland, Die Mitte der paulinischen Botschaft (1935). P. Wendland, Die hellenistisch-romische Kultur in ihren Beziehungen zu Judentum und Christentum (HNT Bd. 1, T. 2, 1907). J. Werner, Der Paulinismus des Irenaeus (TU 6.2, 1889). S. Westerholm, Israel's Law and the Church's Faith: Paul and His Recent Interpreters (1988). U. Wilckens, Rechtfertigung als Freiheit (1974); Der Brief an die Römer (3 vols., 1978–82). W. F. Wiles, The Divine Apostle (1967). W. Wrede, Paulus (1904, repr. 1964; ET 1907). K. Zickendraht, Der Streit zwischen Erasmus und Luther über die Willensfreiheit (1909). J. A. Ziesler, The Meaning of Righteousness in Paul (1972); Paul's Letter to the Romans (TPINTC, 1989).

R. MORGAN

ROSENMÜLLER, ERNST FRIEDRICH KARL
(1768–1835)

Described as more of a collector than a researcher, R. made no lasting original contribution to HB study. Nevertheless, he earned the gratitude of several generations of scholars in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries by making available historical and other material relevant to biblical criticism. Born Dec. 10, 1768, in Hessberg, he was the son of NT scholar J. Rosenmüller. After attending the Paidagogicum in Giessen, he entered the University of Leipzig in 1785, gaining his doctorate in 1788 and becoming a Privatdozent in 1792. In 1796 he became ausserordentlicher professor of Arabic at Leipzig and in 1813 full professor of oriental languages. He died in Leipzig, Sept. 17, 1835.

The first volume of R.'s greatest work, the Scholia in Vetus Testamentum, appeared in 1788. Intended to be a commentary on the whole of the HB, it used the interpretations of great scholars back to the rabbis but also included R.'s own opinions. Volumes appeared regularly for the rest of his life, although the project was never quite completed. Of the twenty-four volumes of the Scholia, L. DIESTEL wrote in 1869 that, although the work lacked depth and independence, its position was relevant, clear, and sound. Its wide circulation indicated that it met a genuine need. R.'s own opinions in the work were of a mildly critical and rationalizing nature. Natural explanations were sought for some miracles; on critical matters he interpreted the psalms historically, not messianically, denied the unity of Isaiah, and was one of the earliest writers to link what were later designated as "Servant Songs" in Isaiah 40–66. Toward the end of his life R. issued revised editions of several of the volumes in which he modified his critical views in favor of more traditional positions. This was taken as partial evidence by conservative scholars that the day of critical scholarship was over.

R.'s other publications included a history of biblical criticism since the Reformation (1797–1800); an Arabic grammar (1818); an exegetical handbook on Joshua to Kings (1797–1800; these were not treated in the Scholia); a collection of descriptions of the Orient based on accounts of travelers (1818–20); and a handbook of the geography and cultural background of the Bible (1823–31). Several of his books were translated into English, including three on the geography, mineralogy, and botany of the lands of the Bible, and the Annotations on Some Messianic Psalms (1841). R. was one of the last of the "encyclopedic" scholars, and what he collected is still of interest and value.

Works: Scholia in Vetus Testamentum (1785–1835; a selection in 5 vols. on the Pentateuch, Isaiah, Psalms, Job, and Ezekiel appeared in 1828–33); Handbuch für die Litteratur der biblischen Kritik und Exegese (1797–1800); Handbuch der biblischen Alterthumskunde (1823–31).

Bibliography: L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der christlichen Kirche (1869) 643. C. Siegfried, ADB 29 (1889) 215-17.

J. W. ROGERSON

ROSSI, GIOVANNI BERNARDO DE (1742–1831)

Among the most important Roman Catholic apologists and biblical critics of his day, R. made his greatest contributions to scholarship in the field of HB TEXTUAL CRITICISM. He was born in Castel Nuovo, Italy, and studied theology at Turin, receiving ordination to the priesthood and the doctor of theology degree in 1766. He became proficient in Hebrew, Aramaic, Syriac, and several other oriental languages and spent his career teaching these at the Royal University of Parma (1769–1821).

Although several of R.'s earliest works were apologetical (e.g., 1772, 1773), most of his publications were related to the text, TRANSLATION, and interpretation of the HB. In 1778 he scoured Italy for HB manuscripts, consulting and collecting hundreds of them for his Variae lectiones Veteris Testamenti, which offered variant readings for the HB that substantially augmented the work of B. KENNICOTT. R. held to the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and a high view of the INSPIRATION of Scripture but did not advocate a mechanistic understanding of the latter. At R.'s wish, his excellent library remained at Parma, bought for 100,000 francs by Maria Louisa of Austria.

Works: Della lingua propria di Cristo e degli Ebrei nazionali della Palestina da'tempi de'Maccabei (1772); Della vana aspettazione degli Ebrei del loro re Messia dal compimento di tutte le epoche trattato (1773); Variae lectiones Veteris Testamenti (1784–1788); Scholia critica in VT libros, seu Supplementa ad varias sacri textus lectiones (1798); Introduzione alla Sacra Scrittura (1817).

Bibliography: G. Allison, "G. B. R. (1742–1831): A Sketch of His Life and Works, with Particular Attention Given to His Contributions to the Field of Biblical Criticism," Trinity Journal 12 (1991) 15-38. A. Vaccari, "Il Più Grande Ebraista Dell' Italia Cristiana: G. B. R.," Scritti di Erudizione e di Filologia 2 (1958) 449-69.

M. P. GRAHAM

ROWLEY, HAROLD HENRY (1890–1969)

Born in Leicester, England, Mar. 24, 1890, R. studied at Bristol Baptist College, Bristol University (BA), London University (BD), and Mansfield College, Oxford, taking Semitic languages under G. GRAY and C. BURNEY. He took the BLitt degree at Oxford and served with the Baptist Missionary Society in China (1922–29). R.'s major interest remained the study of the HB, especially problems of Israelite history, which was undergoing major revision in light of archaeological research (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). He held an assistant lectureship at University College, Cardiff (1929), became a full lecturer (1932), professor of Semitic languages at University College of N. Wales (1935–45), and professor of Semitic languages at the University of Manchester (1945–59).

An energetic writer, R. made his major contributions to biblical research in the subjects of Israelite history and Jewish APOCALYPTICISM. In 1929 he published his dissertation on the date of the Aramaic in the HB (especially in the book of Daniel) and in 1935 a further detailed study of Daniel. His popular writing on apocalypticism (1944) did much to reawaken interest in apocalyptic thought and literature. He argued forcefully for the unity of the book of Daniel, giving it a second century BCE date, and for an understanding of apocalyptic thought as having its primary origin as a development of PROPHECY. (See particularly "The Unity of the Book of Daniel" HUCA 23, 1 [1950–51] 233-73 = The Servant of the Lord [1952–65] 247-80.)

The second major area of R.'s research concerned the early history of Israel—particularly that surrounding the work of Moses, the exodus and Sinai events, and the settlement in the land of Canaan. This research culminated in his Schweich lectures (pub. 1950), a primary feature of which was his insistence on the primary historical significance of Moses' achievements, the ability of archaeological research from the Late Bronze Age to illuminate this without providing explicit formal confirmation, and the Mosaic origin of the DECALOGUE in its original, briefer (Urdekalog) form.

R.'s conclusions concerning the Mosaic origin of the Decalogue provided a central basis for his reconstructions of early Israelite religious and theological development that found fullest expression in his book on the faith of Israel (1956), in which he presented a short outline of OT THEOLOGY. R. took a deep interest in the discovery of the Qumran scrolls (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and the origin of the Qumran sectaries. In the Qumran patterns of biblical interpretation, he found a strong support for his understanding of the central importance of apocalyptic for late Judaism in the HB period.

Alongside these specific areas of research, R. profoundly affected British HB scholarship by promoting international cooperation and consultation among biblical scholars of all nations and confessions and by his profound love of books and the detailed bibliographical information he provided. His extensive footnotes, mediated through a comprehensive card index system, benefited a whole generation of scholarship as access to international literature became more readily available. He instituted the annual Society for OT Study Book List, a scholarly aid of international reputation.

Works: The Aramaic of the OT: A Grammatical and Lexical Study of Its Relations with Other Early Aramaic Dialects (1929); Darius the Mede and the Four World Empires in the Book of Daniel (1935); Israel's Mission to the World (1939); The Relevance of the Bible (1942); Submission in Suffering: A Comparative Study of Eastern Thought (1942); The Relevance of Apocalyptic: A Study of Jewish and Christian Apocalypses from Daniel to Revelation (1944, 1947, 1963); The Missionary Message of the OT (1945); An Outline of the Teaching of Jesus (1945); The Re-discovery of the OT (1946); The Authority of the Bible (1950); The Biblical Doctrine of Election (1950); The Growth of the OT (1950); From Joseph to Joshua: Biblical Traditions in the Light of Archaeology (1950); (ed.), Studies in OT Prophecy (1950); (ed.), The OT and Modern Study: A Generation of Discovery and Research (1951); The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the OT (1952, 1962); The Zadokite Fragments and the Dead Sea Scrolls (1952); The Unity of the Bible (1953); The Faith of Israel: Aspects of OT Thought (1956); Prophecy and Religion in Ancient China and Israel (1956); From Moses to Qumran: Studies in the OT (1963); Men of God: Studies in OT History and Prophecy (1963); Worship in Ancient Israel: Its Forms and Meaning (1967); Job (NCBC, 1970).

Bibliography: M. Noth and D. W. Thomas (eds.), Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East, Presented to H. H. R. (VTSup 3, 1960) with bibliography, xi-xix.

R. E. CLEMENTS

RÜCKERT, LEOPOLD IMMANUEL (1797–1871)

Born Feb. 1, 1797, in Grosshennersdorf/Oberlausitz, Germany, R. studied theology and philosophy at Leipzig (1814–17), was a deacon in Grosshennersdorf (1819–25), a secondary school teacher in Zittau (1825–44), and professor of NT exegesis and systematics in Jena (from 1844), remaining active as a teacher and preacher until his death Apr. 9, 1871.

As an NT scholar, R. can be best characterized by the specific demands he formulated for exegesis in the foreword to the first edition of his commentary on Romans, in the Magazin (1838), and in a vice-chancellor's speech (1858): The task of exegesis is to discover and clarify what the author thinks and says. R. listed four concrete tasks: (1) philologically appropriate interpretation, which includes linguistic analysis (attention to grammar and word usage); history (consideration of the historical situation of the text and its contents); logic (strict adherence to the train of thought and reasoning in the text); and imagination (total empathy with the thoughts and concerns of the author); (2) openness, understood as a release of the exegete from any dogmatic system that might limit the inquiry and recording of results; (3) limitation of the exegesis to what is really necessary; (4) "methodical" reproduction of what is found so that one can recreate and examine the author's concerns.

The content of Scripture is to be treated only as something historically given. Since such material may well be "diffused and in part only presented as an allusion," it needs methodical and scholarly processing and presentation, ordering of what is not ordered, and enlightenment of what is dark. In such an endeavor alone can the biblical theologian, who is interested only in scholarly, scientific knowledge, work toward the biblical dogmatician, who is determined by his personal Christian faith. The dogmatician then grounds Christian faith from the perspective of biblical doctrine.

R. was praised as a promoter of thorough exegesis. His demand for open-minded interpretation was repeatedly renewed, even though his own position as a rationalistic dogmatician ultimately influenced him as a biblical theologian and prevented him from viewing the NT through genuinely unprejudiced eyes. R.'s efforts at conceiving NT exegesis as fundamentally a task of knowledge, with the NT seen as an object of investigation, is worthy of attention.

Works: Christliche Philosophie oder Philosophie, Geschichte, und Bibel nach ihren wahren Beziehungen zu einander: Nicht für Glaubende, sondern für wiss. Zweifler zur Belehrung (2 vols., 1825); Commentar über den Brief Pauli an die Römer (2 vols., 1831–32); Commentar über den Brief Pauli an die Galater (1833); Der Brief Pauli an die Epheser (1834); Der erste Brief Pauli an die Korinther (1836); Der zweite Brief Pauli an die Korinther (1837); Magazin für Exegese und Theologie des NT (1838); "De officio interpretis librorum Novi Foederis," Antrittsvorlesung (1844); Theologie (2 vols., 1851); Das Abendmahl: Sein Wesen und seine Geschichte in der alten Kirche (1856); "Die Aufabe der jenaer Theologie im vierten Jahrhundert der Hochschule," Prorektoratsrede (1858); Der Rationalismus (1858).

Bibliography: G. Frank, *RE*³ 17 (1906) 186-91; ADB 53 (1907) 573-76. K. Heussi, Geschichte der Theologischen Fakultät zu Jena (1954). J. Wach, Das Verstehen: Grundzüge einer Geschichte der Hemeneutischen Theorie 2, 3 (1929–33).

C. BERGER

RUDOLPH, WILHELM (1891–1987)

Born in Weikersheim, Germany, in 1891, R. began his theological and philological training in the seminary schools of Maulbronn (where he learned Hebrew from E. Nestle), and Blaubeuren, not far from Tübingen, where beginning in 1909 he spent nine semesters (a tenth in Halle) studying oriental languages and theology. From 1914 to 1918 he pastored eight different churches. By 1920 he had received his doctorate; and in the summer of 1922 he was officially appointed professor of OT at Tübingen, where he had already taken up teaching duties without having produced a Habilitationsschrift. He moved to Giessen in 1930, remaining there until the end of WWII. After a short stay at the Kirchlichen Hochschule in Berlin in 1948, he accepted a position in Münster.

R. is perhaps best known to the English-speaking world as editor, with K. ELLIGER, of the BHS, a work inherited from A. ALT and O. EISSFELDT. R. had early demonstrated his text-critical abilities (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM), preparing both Jeremiah (1931) and Numbers (1935) for R. KITTEL's BHK, while producing several other studies dealing with textual matters. R. published works on a variety of topics ranging from the Servant Songs of Isaiah to Sennacherib's invasion of Palestine to the problem of the Pentateuchal sources. In his 1938 work, building on an earlier work undertaken with his Tübingen colleague P. VOLZ, he argued against contemporary manifestations of the documentary hypothesis, suggesting that the Pentateuch (or Hexateuch), rather than receiving its shape from two fairly coherent narratives, actually drew its structure and content largely from one source. This document, the Yahwist, was shaped over the course of time into the Pentateuch by the addition of a variety of material and by editorial activity. Although such a position did not carry R.'s day, it has found support at various points in the history of PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM and is recognizable in some recent contributions. The greatest portion of R.'s scholarly energy was devoted to his commentaries, which reflect solid and substantial exegetical skill.

Works: Die Abhängigkeit des Qorans von Judentum und Christentum (1922); "Die Ebed-Jahwe Lieder als geschichtliche Wirklichkeit," ZAW 46 (1928) 156-66; "Sennacherib in Palestina," PJB 25 (1929) 59-80; Der Elohist als Erzähler: Ein Irrweg der Pentateuchkritik? An der Genesis erläutert von P. Volz und W. R. (BZAW 63, 1933); Der "Elohist" von Exodus bis Josua (BZAW 68, 1938); Das Buch Ruth übersetzt und erklärt (1939); Die Klagelieder übersetzt und erklärt (1939); Jeremia (HAT 1, 12, 1947); Esra und Nehemiah samt 3 Esra (HAT 1, 20, 1949); Chronikbücher (HAT 1, 21, 1955); Jeremia (HAT 1, 12, 1958); Das Buch Kohelet (1959); Hosea (KAT 13, 1, 1966); Joel, Amos, Obadja, Jona (KAT 13, 2, 1971); Micha, Nahum, Habakuk, Zephanja (KAT 13, 3, 1975); Haggai, Sacharja I–VIII, Sacharja IX-XIV, Maleachi (KAT 13, 4, 1976).

Bibliography: A. Kuschke (ed.), Verbannung und Heimkehr: Beiträge zur Geschichte und Theologie Israels im 6. und 5. Jahrhundert: W. R. zum 70. Geburtstage (1961). R. Smend, DATDJ (1989) 208-25.

T. J. SANDOVAL

RUPERT OF DEUTZ (c. 1075–1129)

Probably born near Liège, R. was presented as an oblate to the Benedictine abbey of St. Lawrence in that city, where he remained most of his life. As a young man he had a conversion experience in the form of a series of visions that called him to uncover and preach the mysteries of sacred Scripture. He was an uncompromising adherent to the Gregorian reform that sought to reinvigorate the church of his day by purging it of abuses, the most blatant being simony. His attacks on simoniac clergy were so intense that twice he was exiled. In 1120 the archbishop of Cologne appointed him abbot of Deutz, where he remained until his death in 1129.

R. is often portrayed as an advocate of conservative theology; his theology might more accurately be called idiosyncratic. He was involved in disputes with several of his contemporaries (Alger of Liège, Anselm of Laon, Norbert of Xanten, and William of Champeaux, to name a few) and became embroiled in controversies over christology, the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, and predestination. His teaching on the divine and human natures in Christ bordered on adoptionism, based as it was on his reading of John's Gospel. His reading of Scripture led him to resist any suggestion that "God willed evil," however Augustinian (see AUGUSTINE) such a concept of predestination might be.

In all of these controversies R.'s principal starting point was his interpretation of Scripture, especially his De sancta Trinitate et operibus eius and his commentary on John's Gospel. Begun in 1114, De sancta Trinitate sets forth the goal of providing a spiritual (largely allegorical and doctrinal) commentary on the entire course of Scripture from creation to Apocalypse, the history of salvation as it revealed the works of the three persons of the Trinity: God the Father, known through the works of the seven days of creation; God the Son, known through the works of the seven world ages from Adam's fall to Christ's passion; the Holy Spirit, known through the Spirit's seven gifts, given from the incarnation to the last judgment. One of the distinguishing features of R.'s commentary is that he brought into view events that are more nearly contemporary to him; for R., contemporary history was still very much a part of sacred history. Completed in 1117, De sancta Trinitate was interrupted by his commentary on John, completed in 1116 and written in part to work out his understanding of christology and the Eucharist as a way to correct what he perceived to be the errors of his adversaries.

R. also wrote commentaries on the Song of Songs (the first to give it a consistently Marian interpretation), the Minor Prophets, Matthew, and the Apocalypse. As J. van Engen writes, "Thoroughly grounded in the received tradition, he took constant delight in finding new and 'more useful' meanings" in Scripture (1983). R.'s work was written primarily for a monastic audience. His thought is described by modern scholars as symbolic or figurative.

Works: Opera (PL 167-70); Liber de diuinis officiis (CCCM 7, ed. R. Haacke, 1967); Commentaria in euangelium sancti Iohannis (CCCM 9, ed. R. Haacke, 1969); De victoria verbi dei (MGH, Geistesgeschichte 5, ed. R. Haacke, 1970); De sancta Trinitate et operibus eius (CCCM 21-24, ed. R. Haacke, 1971–72); Commentaria in Canticum Canticorum De incarnatione Domini (CCCM 26, ed. R. Haacke, 1974); Anulus sive Dialogus inter Christianum et Iudaeum (ed. R. Haacke, Ruperto di Deutz e la controversia tra cristiani ed ebrei nel secolo XII, 1979); De gloria et honore Filii hominis super Matthaeum (CCCM 29, ed. R. Haacke, 1979).

Bibliography: J. H. van Engen, Rupert of Deutz (1983) with bibliography and review of the status quaestionis. M. Magrassi, Teologia e storia nel pensiero di Ruperto di Deutz (1959). H. G. Reventlow, Epochen der Bibelauslegung 2 (1994) 161-70.

M. A. ZIER

RUSSELL, MICHAEL (1781–1848)

A Scotsman of Presbyterian background, born in Edinburgh, R. attended the University of Glasgow (MA 1806) and after teaching school for a time became an Episcopalian. He served the church for some years before becoming dean of the diocese of Edinburgh (1831) and finally bishop of Glasgow and Galloway. A prolific writer on diverse topics, he died suddenly on Apr. 2, 1848. His significance for biblical studies lies in his history of Israel, written to supplement the works of H. PRIDEAUX and S. SHUCKFORD.

Works: Connection of Sacred and Profane History, from the Death of Joshua to the Decline of the Kingdoms of Israel and Judah: Intended to Complete the Works of Shuckford and Prideaux (3 vols., 1827–37); Observations on the Advantages of Classical Learning (1830).

Bibliography: T. F. Henderson, DNB 49 (1897) 467-68.

J. H. HAYES

RUTH, BOOK OF

The book of Ruth tells the story of a Moabite woman who marries into an Israelite family fleeing from a famine in Judah. Subsequently becoming a widow, she returns with her widowed mother-in-law to Bethlehem and while gleaning in the fields at harvest time meets and eventually marries a wealthy relative, later giving birth to King David's grandfather.

From the earliest period down to the time of the medieval Jewish commentators, the primary interest of exegesis was in telling the biblical story and, to this end, in explaining any difficulties in the biblical text. Thus, in the ancient versions the text was expanded at various points by the introduction of comments that provided reasons for occurrences or actions or otherwise filled in perceived gaps in the story. This process reached its apogee in the TARGUM, which as a result of these expansions is more than twice as long as the Hebrew text of the HB.

In rabbinic literature there was also an interest in locating the events of the biblical story in history. Some early rabbis took the use of the plural "judges" in Ruth 1:1 to indicate the period of Deborah and Barak (Ruth Rab. 1.1), whereas in the Targum and in the TALMUD (b. B. Bat. 91a) Boaz was identified with the judge Ibzan. Ruth was given a royal genealogy and said to be a daughter or granddaughter of Eglon (Judges 3), king of Moab (Ruth Rab. 2.9.).

Various passages in the story were used for didactic and homiletic purposes, a major interest in this area being the derivation of rules for proselytes. Especially in the Targum, where Ruth's declaration of fidelity to Naomi (Ruth 1:16-17) is expanded into a catechism, in each phrase of which Ruth indicates her acknowledgment and acceptance of some consequence of her conversion, Ruth was seen as a model proselyte. Perhaps this accounts for the custom of reading the book at the festival of Shavuot, first recorded in the post-Talmudic tractate Sopherim. Or perhaps the development of Ruth as a model proselyte may have occurred in parallel with the development of Shavuot from a harvest festival to a commemoration of the giving of the law. The traditional explanation, that Ruth is read at Shavuot because that is when King David died (Ruth Rab. 3.2), is hardly realistic, while the fact that the main action in the story takes place at the time of harvest is hardly in itself a sufficient basis for the custom's origin.

Aside from the statement in the baraita of b. B. Bat. 14b-15a that Samuel wrote Ruth, no interest was displayed during this period in the question of authorship. One opinion on the purpose of the book is recorded (Ruth Rab. 2.14): "R. Ze'ira said, 'This scroll tells us nothing of cleanliness or of uncleanliness, either of prohibition or permission. For what purpose then was it written? To teach how great is the reward of those who do deeds of kindness.' "

For the major part of the modern period, the main focus of interest has been on the book's date and purpose. To date it on the basis of its language has proved difficult. On the whole, the language is good classical Hebrew, which has often been taken to indicate a preexilic date; however, it includes some Aramaisms and other features generally considered to be late. Several specimens of archaic forms are found only in the speech of Boaz and Naomi, and the suggestion has been made that they represent a literary device that has these older people speak in an old-fashioned way, rather than being an indication of when the book was composed.

The question of date has usually been considered in conjunction with that of purpose, and a wide range of conclusions have been reached. The theory that gained the widest currency—that the book was written as a protest against the policy of Ezra and Nehemiah on intermarriage between the people of Judah and those of surrounding territories—suffers from the problem that not only is there no hint of polemic in the book but that it may equally well be read as propaganda in support of that policy, saying in effect that marriage with foreigners is permissible if they first become proselytes. This problem of the book's ambivalence was recognized already when the idea that the book opposes Ezra and Nehemiah's policy was first broached (see L. Bertholdt [1812–19] 2:2356); notwithstanding its widespread currency, it is doubtful whether the theory will hold.

Many of the proposals made in the present century have proved (or will undoubtedly prove) to be ephemeral and must be seen as monuments to passing fashions in biblical studies. Attempts to explain the story as a fertility cult drama (W. Staples [1936–37]); H. May [1939]) found no lasting acceptance. The proposal that the origin of the book should be located in the Solomonic enlightenment (R. Hals [1969]), which was based on a comparison of the book's theological ideas with those found in other writings attributed to that period, was deprived of its foundation when the concept of the Solomonic enlightenment passed out of fashion. Some other suggestions are that Ruth was written possibly by Jehoiada the priest in order to compare its heroine with another foreign widow, Athaliah, to the disadvantage of the latter (M. Crook [1948]) or that the book's origin should be associated with Jehoshaphat's reformation (E. Campbell [1975]).

The theory that the book had the historical purpose of providing King David with a genealogy has proved a little more durable than most, but the often-stated opinion that the connection with David is secondary (most recently, A. Phillips [1986] 2) would mean that the original composition must have had another purpose. This opinion, which relies on the supposition that because the birth of Ruth's child is greeted with the saying "A son has been born to Naomi" (Ruth 4:17), the child's name should have some connection with the name Naomi, is not necessarily sound, for the statement is not precisely identical in form with any of the other texts in which a child's name is explained by a saying of the person who bestows the name. It remains plausible that the connection with David made in 4:17 is original, although many scholars believe the genealogy of 4:18-22 to be secondary. However, it does not follow from this that the name and nationality of Ruth, at the very least, must be accurate historical data (see A. Anderson [1978] 172). That conclusion, resting on the assumption that Moabite ancestry would have carried a stigma, is questionable in view of the fact that the law of Deut 23:3-4, which is the basis of this thinking, was clearly never applied to the Davidic dynasty, as it ought to have been, on account of Rehoboam's mother, who was an Ammonite (1 Kgs 14:21).

The suggestion that the purpose of the book was to register a legal precedent goes back to the beginning of the modern period. Bertholdt, who has been credited with the invention of the "anti-Ezra" theory, actually thought that the book's purpose was to extend the obligation to marry a childless widow to kinsmen other than the nearest and the rights to such marriage to foreign women who had embraced the Israelite religion. Even if it is not considered to constitute the purpose of the book, the juridical background to the story has attracted a great deal of interest. The chief exegetical problem is the relation between the situation reflected in chap. 4 and the HB laws on marriage, inheritance, and the redemption of property. There was for a time a widespread tendency to understand Ruth's remarriage as a form of levirate marriage that applied to a more distant relative than the brother-in-law specified in the law of Deut 25:5-10; and the concept of a redeemer-marriage, in which the obligation to marry a widowed kinswoman was combined with the right to redeem the property of her first husband, gained some currency.

More recently, however, the trend has been to move away from the search for juridical precision and to see that the connection between marriage and redemption was created by the storyteller and did not necessarily have any existence as a legal institution. Questions have also been raised as to whether there is any levirate element in Ruth's second marriage. This has been increasingly denied in recent years, especially by those who have examined the textual problem posed by the existence of the kĕtîb and qĕrê form, representing respectively a first person and a second person singular verb, in Ruth 4:5 (see D. Beattie [1971]; J. Sasson [1979]; B. Green [1982]). Scholars who have recognized in this phenomenon two alternative readings have decided that the kĕtîb must represent the original reading and that no obligation to marry Ruth was imposed on the nameless redeemer. Although others continue to follow the tradition of reading the qĕrê, which had hitherto been all but unanimous, no one has yet offered any considered argument in its support. The presence of a levirate element has also been denied on other grounds (see R. Gordis [1974] 246; Anderson, 183).

These developments should be seen as part of the trend toward a greater concern with LITERARY values, which may be said to have begun with H. GUNKEL. One of the earliest exercises in detecting symmetrical structures in biblical literature dealt with Ruth (see S. Bertman [1965]), and it soon attracted the attention of FEMINIST literary critics (see P. Trible [1978]). A notable development was the application to Ruth of V. Propp's morphological analysis of Russian fairy tales (see Sasson; P. Milne [1986]), while a number of other significant contributions to understanding the literary art of Ruth have been made in recent years (e.g., M. Bernstein [1991]; D. Fewell and D. Gunn [1988, 1989]; Fewell [1990]).

Bibliography: A. A. Anderson, "The Marriage of Ruth," JSS 23 (1978) 171-83. D. R. G. Beattie, "Kethibh and Qere in Ruth 4:5," VT 21 (1971) 490-94; Jewish Exegesis of the Book of Ruth (JSOTSup 2, 1977). M. J. Bernstein, "Two Multivalent Readings in the Ruth Narrative," JSOT 50 (1991) 15-26. L. Bertholdt, Historisch-kritische Einleitung in die sämmtlichen kanonischen und apokryphischen Schriften des Alten und Neuen Testaments (6 vols., 1812–19). S. Bertman, "Symmetrical Design in the Book of Ruth," JBL 84 (1965) 165-68. J. Bos, Ruth, Esther, Jonah (1986). E. F. Campbell, Jr., Ruth: A New Translation with Introduction, Notes, and Commentary (AB 7, 1975). M. B. Crook, "The Book of Ruth: A New Solution," JBR 16 (1948) 155-60. K. Farmer, "The Book of Ruth," NIB (1998) 2:889-946. D. N. Fewell, Compromising Redemption: Relating Characters in the Book of Ruth (1990); D. N. Fewell with D. M. Gunn, " 'A Son Is Born to Naomi!': Literary Allusions and Interpretation in the Book of Ruth," JSOT 40 (1988) 99-108; "Boaz, Pillar of Society: Measures of Worth in the Book of Ruth," JSOT 45 (1989) 45-59. R. Gordis, "Love, Marriage, and Business in the Book of Ruth," A Light Unto My Path: OT Studies in Honor of J. M. Myers (ed. H. N. Bream et al., 1974) 241-64. B. Green, "The Plot of the Biblical Story of Ruth," JSOT 23 (1982) 55-68. H. Gunkel, Reden und Aufsätze (1913). R. M. Hals, The Theology of the Book of Ruth (1969). A. LaCoque, "Ruth," The Feminine Unconventional: Four Subversive Figures in Israel's Tradition (1990). A.-J. Levine, "Ruth," Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992). H. G. May, "Ruth's Visit to the High Place at Bethlehem," JRAS (1939) 75-78. P. J. Milne, "Folktales and Fairy Tales: An Evaluation of Two Proppian Analyses of Biblical Narrative," JSOT 34 (1986) 35-60. J. M. Myers, The Linguistic and Literary Form of the Book of Ruth (1955). K. Nielsen, Ruth (OTL, 1997). A. Phillips, "The Book of Ruth: Deception and Shame," JJS 37 (1986) 1-17. J. M. Sasson, Ruth: A New Translation with a Philological Commentary and a Formalist-Folklorist Interpretation (1979). W. E. Staples, "The Book of Ruth," AJSL 53 (1936–37) 145-47. T. and D. Thompson, "Some Legal Problems in the Book of Ruth," VT 18 (1968) 79-99. P. Trible, "A Human Comedy," God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (OBT 2, 1978) chap. 6.

D. R. G. BEATTIE

RYLE, HERBERT EDWARD (1856–1925)

Born in London, May 25, 1856, R. was educated at Eton and at Cambridge, where he taught (1887–1900) as Hulsean Professor of Divinity. He served as bishop of Exeter (1901–3) and Winchester (1903–11) and as dean of Westminster (1911–25). He died in London, Aug. 20, 1925, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

With his contemporaries S. DRIVER and A. KIRKPATRICK, R. played a leading role in winning acceptance for HB criticism among English Anglicans at the turn of the twentieth century by his emphasis that the approach need not militate against belief in revelation and INSPIRATION. Virtually all of his HB works were written in the 1890s and have a deliberately semi-popular character.

Works: (with M. R. James), Psalms of the Pharisees (1891); The Canon of the OT (1892); The Early Narratives of Genesis: A Brief Introduction to the Study of Genesis I–XI (1892); The Books of Ezra and Nehemiah with Introductory Notes and Maps (1893); Philo and Holy Scripture: Or the Quotations of Philo from the Books of the OT with an Introduction and Notes (1895); On Holy Scripture and Criticism: Addresses and Sermons (1904); "The Prayer of Manasses," APOT 1:612-24; The Book of Genesis (1914).

Bibliography: M. H. Fitzgerald, A Memoir of H. E. R. (1928); DNB, 1822–1930 (1937) 733-35.

C. T. BEGG

RYSSEL, VICTOR (1849–1905)

R. was born in Reinsberg, Saxony, Dec. 18, 1849. He studied at Leipzig (1868–89) with Friedrich DELITZSCH, taught at a gymnasium, and advanced to ausserordentlicher professor at the university. In 1889 he accepted the chair for OT and oriental languages at Zürich, where he died Mar. 2, 1905.

R. was above all a philologist. In HB studies he authored monographs on the language of the P source as a criterion for its dating (1878) and on the text and authenticity of the book of Micah (1887). He was a key participant in several great collaborative enterprises in German HB scholarship of his time. In E. KAUTZSCH's HB TRANSLATION (1894) he provided Isaiah 40–66, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther; and in the same scholar's edition of the HB Apocrypha and PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (1900), he rendered the Prayer of Manasseh, the Additions to Esther, Sirach, and the Greek and Syriac BARUCH apocalypses, together with introductions and notes. For R. KITTEL's BHK (1905), he prepared Leviticus and parts of Exodus and Numbers. One of his final productions was a lengthy series of articles on the recently discovered Hebrew fragments of the book of Sirach.

Given his philological focus and innate caution, R. was not strongly identified with any of the opposing schools in the HB scholarship of his day. Although he wrote no commentaries, he produced updated editions of those on Ezra–Nehemiah–Esther by E. BERTHEAU (1884) and on Exodus–Leviticus by A. DILLMANN (1897) in the KEH series. He was also responsible for the third edition of J. Fürst's dictionary of HB Hebrew and Aramaic.

Works: Die Synonyma des Wahren und Guten in den semitischen Sprachen (1872); De Elohistae pentateuchi Sermone: Commentatio historico-critica (1878); Untersuchungen über die Textgestalt und die Echtheit des Buches Micha (1887); "Die neuen hebräischen Fragmente des Buches Jesus Sirach und ihre Herkunft," TSK 73 (1900) 363-400, 505-41; 74 (1901) 75-109, 269-94, 547-92; 75 (1902) 205-61, 347-420.

Bibliography: H. Guthe, RE^{3} 24 (1913) 441-45.

C. T. BEGG

S

SAADIA IBN JOSEPH AL-FAYYUMI (882–942)

The first rabbinic scholar neither from Babylonia nor from Judea to be made a gaon (head of a Babylonian rabbinic academy), S. was also the first rabbinic philosopher of note and the first rabbinic scholar to use philology in his interpretations of Scripture. Egyptian-born, he was appointed gaon of Sura in 928 by the exilarch David ben Zaccai. A major conflict soon broke out between them in a case involving the settlement of a large estate. The exilarch invited the gaon Cohen-Zedek of Pumpeditha and S. to countersign his decision. Cohen-Zedek complied and S. refused. In the resulting conflict S. was deposed, and Joseph ben Jacob Bar Satia was appointed gaon in his place. However, after a short retirement to Baghdad S. was reconciled with the exilarch and in 937 returned to his office, which he held until his death in 942.

S.'s most important work was the Book of Beliefs and Opinions (Emunot V'deot), written as a philosophical, theological polemic against the KARAITES. It has two main sections, the first dealing with God's unity and the second dealing with God's justice. He then listed and discussed what he thought to be the fundamental or root beliefs (ikkarim) of rabbinic Judaism and the basic categories of Jewish law.

In connection with his studies of the Bible, S. wrote a grammar and LEXICON of biblical Hebrew and an Arabic translation of the Bible. His students made important contributions to the study of the Hebrew language, and they in turn taught J. IBN JANAH, whose two-volume study of biblical Hebrew—The Book of Roots and The Book of Embroidery—are generally regarded as classics in the field.

S. had an important political motive for his philosophical writings and biblical studies. He was a major rabbinic leader at the time of the Karaite schism, and most of his work in these two fields was intended as a polemic supporting traditional rabbinic interpretation of Scripture and opposing the criticisms of the Karaites. For example, rabbinic Judaism always took the phrase "a life for a life, an eye for an eye . . . an injury for an injury" (Exod 21:23-25) to mean monetary compensation rather than physical retribution. However, Anan ben David, the founder of the Karaite movement, rejected the rabbinic interpretation in favor of the physical punishment that he believed to be the simple meaning (peshat) of the text. Against Anan, S. argued that in this case the literal meaning could not be what God intended to communicate to Israel. He offered both a logical argument and a proof text in support of the rabbinic interpretation taken from Lev. 24:20, which says, "wound for wound, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: As he maimed a man, so shall it be given [yitēn] to him." S. read the second clause in the verse as a question: "As he maimed a man, should the same be given to him?" The implied answer is "Certainly not; instead he should make financial restitution." S.'s logical argument was a form of reductio ad absurdum. Suppose one man, A, injures another man, B, and that B loses one-third of his vision. According to the literal meaning, the court would be obligated either to put out A's eye or do nothing at all to him. However, in neither case would the decision be just. In the first case, A would lose all of his sight and not just a third; in the second case nothing would happen to A at all. The situation would be worse in other similar cases where the injured party would have been burned or wounded but lived, and the attempt to render equal punishment would result in the unjust death of the injurer.

The principle underlying S.'s reading of the biblical text is made explicit in The Book of Beliefs and Opinions, in which he argues that God makes God's truth known to humankind through both reason and revelation. Because God is one, God's will is one. Since God's will is one, there can be only one truth. Therefore, in principle there can be no contradiction between the correct use of reason and the true meaning of the Torah, which is the record of God's revelation. Consequently, if an interpretation of Scripture contradicts the correct use of reason, that interpretation must be wrong.

In this way S. introduced the pure use of logic as a valid tool for interpreting Scripture. The critical premise in S.'s argument for the use of reason in determining the meaning of Scripture was that Scripture is of divine origin; therefore, whatever Scripture says must be true. Thus any interpretation that is not true could not be what Scripture says. There would be no serious doubt about the use of this method until the seventeenth century, when B. SPINOZA (1632–77) argued in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus that the Torah was written by human beings.

Works: Sifrei R. Saadia Gaon (ed. J. Derenbourg and M. Lambert (1849–93), Arabic tr. of and commentary on the Bible in the Polyglot Bibles of Constantinople (1546), Paris (1645), London (1657), and Yemen (1894–1901); Kitab Al-Amant Wa-li-ṭaqada (Hebrew tr. by Judah Ibn Tibbon); Emunot VeDe'ot (1864; ET by S. Rosenblatt, The Book of Beliefs and Opinions [1948]; ET of selections by A. Altmann in The Book of Doctrines and Beliefs [1969]).

Bibliography: E. L. Greenstein, "Medieval Bible Commentaries," Back to the Sources: Reading the Classic Jewish Texts (ed. B. W. Holtz, 1984) 213-60. H. Malter, S. Gaon: His Life and Works (1921). S. Munk, Notice sur R. S. Gaeon (1838). E. I. J. Rosenthal, S. Studies in Commemoration of the One Thousandth Anniversary of the Death of S. Gaon (1943); "Medieval Jewish Exegesis: Its Character and Significance," JJS 9 (1964) 265-81. S. Schechter, Saadyana: Genizah Fragments of Writings of R. S. Gaon and Others (1903). S. L. Skoss, S. Gaon: The Earliest Hebrew Grammarian (1955).

N. SAMUELSON

SAMUEL BEN MEIR (RASHBAM) (c. 1080–c. 1174)

S. was born and died at Ramerupt, in the Champagne region of France. He was the grandson and pupil of RASHI, and like his grandfather commented on the TALMUD and the Bible. Of his biblical exegesis only the commentary on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) has survived (minus the material on Genesis 2–17). One unique handwritten copy, buried for centuries in a library, was discovered and printed in 1705 in Berlin. Some scholars also attribute an anonymous medieval commentary on Ecclesiastes to S.

The Renaissance of the twelfth century and Judeo-Christian religious controversy formed the historical background of S.'s biblical exegesis. Developing the tendency initiated by Rashi, he emphasized literal exegesis even more strongly; many of his commentaries seem to be a literal backlash to Rashi's midrashic exegesis. He several times affirmed the primacy of MIDRASH since it dictated Jewish religious conduct, but he recognized the right of the new generation to a free literal exegesis—the peshat. He proposed a differentiation of method between Midrash and peshat (on Gen 1:1; 37:2), indicating several times that he explained the Bible according to derekh erez. In the ancient rabbinical texts derekh erez signifies habitual human conduct, and S. enlarged this to include the idea of the common laws of nature, corresponding to the secundum physicam of THIERRY OF CHARTRES.

S. had an acute sense of LITERARY criticism. He was one of the first to discover the rule of parallelism in biblical poetry (on Exod 15:6). He also extensively exploited the rule of "premises": Often the biblical author furnishes apparently superfluous details, but they are revealed as important for the elucidation of other texts. He sought to explain the Bible by the Bible, without reference—philological or otherwise—to ancient rabbinical texts.

S. knew the Latin version of the Pentateuch and rejected its translation of Exod 20:13. Several of his comments are explicitly proposed as responses to Christian interpretations; this appears very clearly in his comments on legal texts. Even implicitly his comments often seem to reject christological interpretations, as when he writes that rûaḥ 'elōhîm (Gen 1:2) is the natural wind—i.e., not the Holy Spirit.

Works: Commentarium Quem in Pentateuchem Composuit S. ben Meir (ed., D. Rossin, 1882); The Commentary of R. S. ben Meir Rashbam on Qoheleth (ed. and tr. S. Japhet and R. B. Salters, 1985).

Bibliography: S. Japhet and R. B. Salters (eds.), "Rashbam: His Life and Works," The Commentary of R. S. ben Meir Rashbam on Qoheleth (1985) 11-17. S. A. Poznanski, Kommentar zu Esechiel und den XII Kleinen Propheten von Eliezer aus Beaugency (1913) XXXIX-LI. D. Rosin, R. S. b. Meier (Rashbam) als Schriftkerklärer (1880). E. Touitou, "Concerning the Methodology of R. S. b. Meir in His Commentary to the Pentateuch," Tarbiz 48 (1978–79) 248-73 (Hebrew); "Rashbam's Exegetical Method Against the Background of His Times," Studies in Rabbinic Literature, Bible, and Jewish History (E. Z. Melamed Jubilee Volume, 1982) 48-72 (Hebrew).

E. TOUITOU

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF

1. Pre-modern Interpretations. Originally, there was one book called Samuel. The SEPTUAGINT divided both it and the book of Kings into two, creating four books of "Kingdoms." The VULGATE followed this designation, but the division did not enter into manuscripts of HBs until 1488 and not into printed editions until D. BOMBERG'S RABBINIC BIBLE of 1516/17. The Babylonian TALMUD (b. B. Bat. 14b) ascribed the authorship of this one book to Samuel; 1 Chr 29:29 attributes authorship to Samuel, Gad, and Nathan. This view of authorship was widely called into question in the eighteenth century.

The NT cites a number of passages from the books of Samuel (1 Sam 12:22; 2 Sam 5:2; 7:8, 14; 22:3, 50), in addition to many other allusions to the text. Among the Greek fathers, commentaries and/or sermons were written by ORIGEN, CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, and Pseudo-Gregory the Great. AMBROSE wrote an apology dealing with David's relationship to Bathsheba and Uriah, while Charlemagne's identification of himself with King David gave new popularity to the books of Samuel and Kings. An anonymous and widely used commentary on the Vulgate, Quaestiones Hebraicae in Libros Regum (9th cent.), was falsely attributed to JEROME in the eleventh century. The author of this commentary was probably brought up as a Jew but had converted to Christianity. Pseudo-Jerome rejects the standard Christian interpretation of 1 Sam 13:1 (Ish-bosheth was one year old when Saul began his reign, and he reigned over Israel for two years after Saul's death) and then cites the standard Jewish interpretation: Saul began his reign when he was as innocent as a year-old infant and continued in that state for two years. This commentary was used by RABANUS MAURUS in the ninth century and by ANDREW OF ST. VICTOR and S. LANGTON in the twelfth century.

During the Renaissance and the Reformation NICHOLAS OF LYRA and T. CAJETAN wrote commentaries, and CALVIN authored a series of sermons on 1 Samuel. J. Bugenhagen (1485–1558), LUTHER's pastor and a theologian in his own right, published a commentary on Samuel in 1524. In the seventeenth century there were commentaries by Sanctius, I. Menochius (1575–1655), Malvenda, and C. à LAPIDE, all Roman Catholic, as well as by E. Schmid, a Protestant. H. GROTIUS also commented on Samuel in his Annotate ad Vetus Testamentum (1644).

2. Modern Interpretations. The nineteenth and twentieth centuries have seen vigorous critical study of the book that can be summarized under six major categories.

a. The text of Samuel. The MT of Samuel seems to have been severely damaged by homoioteleuton and other similar mistakes in antiquity. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, O. Thenius (1842; ET 1898), J. WELLHAUSEN (1871), and S. DRIVER (1913) attempted to improve the text, relying primarily on evidence from the Septuagint. When it was discovered that the DEAD SEA SCROLLS often preserved Hebrew readings that previously had only been conjectured on the basis of the Greek (F. M. Cross [1973]), TEXTUAL critics collated the Qumran texts with the MT and studied the Septuagint with renewed seriousness. Several commentaries and monographs have advanced the discussion significantly on the basis of the Qumran scrolls and the Septuagint (P. McCarter [1980–84]; R. Klein [1983]; E. Ulrich [1978]).

Within the Greek manuscript tradition, textual critics now distinguish between the OG, a second-century BCE translation made in Egypt on the basis of a Hebrew text; the proto-Lucianic recension, a revision of the OG toward the Hebrew text as preserved in Palestine in the first-century BCE; and the kaige recension, a first-century CE revision of the Greek on the basis of a Hebrew text very close to the MT. The kaige has now replaced the OG in standard copies of the LXX for 2 Sam 10:1–24:25.

b. Source criticism. During the nineteenth century the influence of PENTATEUCHAL studies and the search for continuous sources extended to the books of Samuel. C. GRAMBERG detected two sources, Ra and Rb; Thenius increased these to five. Wellhausen described the two sources in the story of Saul's rise to power as pro-monarchical and anti-monarchical. The pro-monarchical source (1 Sam 9:1–10:16, early joined to 11:1-11, 15 and chaps. 13–14) portrayed kingship as the high point of Israel's history and the greatest blessing of Yahweh, while for the writer of the postexilic anti-monarchical source (1 Sam 7:1–8:22; 10:17-27; 12:1-25, with 11:13-14 serving as a bridge between the two sources), the request for a king was sinful, and Israel was conceived as a theocracy. In his 1902 commentary Die Bucher Samuel erklärt, K. BUDDE placed these sources in an earlier period and attributed them to the sanctuaries of Gilgal and Mizpah. The pro-monarchical source he considered J (Yahwist); the anti-monarchical, E (Elohist). R. SMEND and O. EISSFELDT (1966) traced the L (Laienquelle, or lay source), J, and E sources throughout Samuel. In last decades of the twentieth century, this search for sources continuing (or similar to) the Pentateuchal sources has been eclipsed by other concerns, although a source-critical interpretation was revived by B. Halpern (1981, 171).

c. Pre-deuteronomistic documents. H. GRESSMANN raised doubts about the existence of extended sources running throughout the books of Samuel (see the ET of his article in D. Gunn [1991]). Subsequently, other scholars have identified coherent pre-canonical documents dealing with specific issues, written for one situation but given a new interpretation by inclusion in the structure of the books we call 1 and 2 Samuel. Contemporary scholarship has sought to determine the original limits of these documents, their date, and their original intention, although some scholars would deny that such sources can be easily isolated from the final Dtr forms of one material (see R. Carlson [1964]).

i. Samuel at Shiloh. These materials, while not as unified as some of the other pre-canonical documents discussed below, antedate the composition of the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY. They consist of an account of Samuel's marvelous birth (chap. 1), the sins of the sons of Eli (chap. 2), and the vocation of Samuel (chap. 3). The Song of Hannah (2:1-10) was originally a poem sung after a national military victory before it was ascribed to Hannah and is later echoed in Mary's song in Luke 2:46-55. Deuteronomistic notices have been added in 2:27-36 and 3:11-14. It is difficult to determine the function of most of this material outside of its present context, although McCarter considers chapter 1 an original part of the Saul cycle because of the pun in v. 20 and attributes large portions of chap. 2 to the ark narrative.

ii. The ark narrative. L. Rost (1926; ET 1982) identified an ark narrative in 1 Sam 4:1*b*–7:1 and in 2 Samuel 6 that described the loss of the ark to the Philistines, the havoc it caused when deposited in Dagon's temple, its restoration to Israel, and its eventual procession to and deposit in Jerusalem. He thought this narrative was a cultic myth for the Jerusalem Temple written by a priest active in the reign of David or Solomon. A. Campbell (1975) accepted the identification of the limits for this document proposed by Rost, although he believed that its central theological idea was a reflection on the end of the pre-monarchical epoch. P. Miller and J. Roberts (1977), followed in large part by McCarter, believe that the ark narrative did not originally include 2 Samuel 6 (note the tension between Kiriath-jearim in 1 Sam 7:1 and Baale-Judah in 2 Sam 6:2) but that it did include portions of 1 Samuel 2 (vv. 12-17, 22-25; possibly vv. 27-36). In this understanding the narrative shows that God's displeasure with the priests of Shiloh led to the defeat at Ebenezer but also reaffirms Yahweh's power in a time of apparent defeat. The God of Israel does not go into eclipse with God's people but uses their calamities as a foil for God's mightiest acts. These scholars date the ark narrative to an early period in David's reign before his defeat of the Philistines. During the exilic period this narrative showed what God could do with the broken community of Israel (R. Gordon [1984]).

iii. The rise of Saul. The story of Saul's search for the lost asses of his father, Kish, which leads to his anointing as "prince" (nāgîd) by Samuel (1 Sam 9:1–10:16), comes, at least in large part, from early tradition, while the reports of his judge-like victory over the Ammonites and his deliverance of Jabesh-gilead in 1 Sam 10:27*b*–11:15 describe an alternative route by which he became king. The other parts of chaps. 7–12 may have undergone deuteronomistic editing (see below), but the underlying stories of prophetic denunciation of royal self-aggrandizement (1 Sam 8:11-18) or of Saul's being chosen by lot or because of his stature (1 Sam 10:17-27) also have the ring of primary traditions. I. Mendelsohn (1956) dated the prophetic denunciation to Samuel's own time, whereas F. Crüsemann (1978) located it in the early monarchical period. While chap. 12 is clearly a deuteronomistic editorial speech (see below), D. McCarthy (1978) and others have detected older traditions lying within and behind the present text. Anecdotes from Saul's Philistine wars are preserved in 13:2-7*a*, 15*b*-23; 14:1-46.

iv. History of David's rise. The history of David's rise has also been considered an independent document and extends, in one common understanding, from 1 Sam 16:14 to 2 Sam 5:10. McCarter dates this document to the time of David and proposes that it testifies to the legitimacy of David as Saul's successor and attempts to allay the fears of the tribe of Benjamin, which was suspicious of this new king (cf. the Shimei incident and Sheba's revolt). The dynastic idea, which developed under Solomon, is not yet present. McCarter cites the Hittite Apology of Hattushilish, which sought to legitimize the rule of a king who had usurped the power of his predecessor. T. Mettinger (1976) dates this document to the period after Solomon's death when the king in Jerusalem tried to assert control over all Israel after the breakup of the national unity that had existed during the time of David and Solomon. J. Grønbaek (1971) locates it in the era of Baasha of the northern kingdom. Both Mettinger and Grønbaek believe that it begins with 1 Sam 15:1, while Mettinger and A. Weiser (1966) include parts of 2 Samuel 6–7.

v. The succession narrative. This document, commonly identified as 2 Samuel 9–20 and 1 Kings 1–2, recounts the court history of David and of Solomon's ascension to the throne despite the fact that Adonijah was older than he. Rost also included in this account 2 Sam 6:16, 20-23; 7:11*b*, and 16 and dated it to the time of Solomon. McCarter considers only 1 Kings 1–2 as a succession narrative, attributing parts of 2 Samuel 9–20 to other documents from the time of David (the story of Absalom's revolt in 2 Samuel 13–20, the revenge of the Gibeonites in 2 Sam 21:1-14, and David's patronage of Meribbaal in 2 Sam 9:1-13). E. Würthwein (1974), T. Veijola (1975, 1977), and F. Langamet (1981) believe that the materials favorable to Solomon are secondary and that the document was originally critical of Solomon. J. Van Seters (1983) places this material very late and sees it as an anti-messianic insertion.

vi. The appendix in 2 Samuel 21–24. The diverse materials in these chapters have often received inadequate attention or have been dismissed as miscellaneous accretions to the end of the books of Samuel. Recent studies have called attention to the significant and orderly arrangement of these chapters:

21:1-14 famine story
  21:15-22 warrior exploits
    22:1-51 psalm dealing with mighty acts of God for and through David
    23:1-7 oracle about enduring dynasty
  23:8-39 warrior exploits and warrior list
24:1-25 plague story

The psalm in 2 Samuel 22 (cf. Psalm 18) celebrates divine deliverance, contrasting with accounts of human weakness in the lists of warrior exploits that precede and follow it. According to this psalm David was blameless, while 2 Sam 23:1-7 reports the everlasting covenant God made with him and his dynasty.

d. A prophetic redaction. A number of scholars (Weiser; B. Birch [1976]; McCarter) detect a redactional layer within the books of Samuel that gave the stories a prophetic interpretation before their inclusion in the deuteronomistic history. According to McCarter this eighth-century prophetic history viewed the advent of kingship as a concession to the wanton demands of the people. This northern writer, prepared to acknowledge the legitimacy of David, also felt that kings should be subject to the instruction of a prophet (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). Birch ascribes the following passages dealing with Saul to prophetic circles writing after the fall of the northern kingdom: 1 Sam 9:15-17, 20-21, 27–10:1, 5-8, 16*b*; 10:17-19, 25; 11:12-14; 12:1-5; 13:7*b*-15; 15:1-35. He also argues that the contribution of this redactor was more important than that of the deuteronomistic historian.

e. The deuteronomistic history. In 1943 M. NOTH portrayed Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings as part of a deuteronomistic history written in Judah after 562 BCE (the last date mentioned in 2 Kgs 25:27) and before the return from the Babylonian exile in 538 BCE. According to him this document attempted to justify to the exilic generation the destruction of the northern and the southern kingdoms. Israel had sought after other gods and had not held to the ideal of one central sanctuary, despite frequent warnings by the prophets.

Noth and most subsequent commentators have found fewer deuteronomistic comments in Samuel than elsewhere in the deuteronomistic history (Veijola is an exception). The date and unity of this redaction as well as its purpose are now understood quite differently from Noth's original proposal.

Cross identified a preexilic deuteronomistic redaction (Dtr^1), completed before the death of Josiah. The writer of this document called the remnants of the northern kingdom to return to Judah and to Yahweh's sole legitimate shrine in Jerusalem and extended the claims of the Davidic monarchy to all Israel. The final form of the deuteronomistic history was completed in mid-exile (Dtr^2; for details see R. Nelson [1981]). The Göttingen school (Smend; W. Dietrich [1972]; and Veijola) has detected three layers of redaction in this history, ascribing all of them to the time of the exile: A prophetic redaction (DtrP) added certain prophetic emphases to the original history (DtrG or DtrH). A final, nomistic redaction (DtrN) stressed compliance with the requirements of the Mosaic law.

In the last decades of the twentieth century, almost all studies have differed from Noth in finding positive elements in Dtr. H. W. WOLFF (1975) thought that Dtr meant to challenge its audience to repent and so experience Yahweh's favor anew. The repentance initiated by Samuel in 1 Sam 7:3 led to defeat of the Philistines, whereas the confession of sins in 1 Sam 12:19 persuaded Samuel to promise that God would not abandon the people and that he, Samuel, would continue to pray for them. Cross believed Dtr^1 celebrated the promises to David in addition to its judgment on the sin of Jeroboam. For him Dtr^1 was a propaganda document for the Josianic reform. Although G. von RAD probably erred in attributing almost a messianic significance to the release of Jehoiachin, many other scholars see this release as a signal that the promise to David was still alive as far as the deuteronomistic historian was concerned.

Samuel's farewell speech in 1 Samuel 12 and the oracle of Nathan and David's response in 2 Samuel 7 serve as indicators of the historian's own point of view, even if one or both of these chapters may have existed prior to their incorporation in Dtr. In 1 Samuel 12 Samuel shows that he and Yahweh are innocent, while the request for a king is categorized as a failure to look to Yahweh for help in time of need. Still, life under a king could have been blessed if Israel's conduct had been obedient. The righteousness of Yahweh could thus adjust itself to the new condition of monarchy. Yahweh would also show the divine righteousness by sending prophets like Samuel to pray and teach. The threat in the final verse of this chapter had no doubt become reality by the time the deuteronomistic historian wrote, "If, however, you persist in acting wickedly, both you and your king will be swept away."

The final forms of the oracle of Nathan (2 Sam 7:1-17) and of David's prayer (2 Sam 7:18-29) provide another great deuteronomistic interpretation, whatever role earlier versions of this chapter may have played (see McCarter, 224-31, who finds a primitive document from the court of Solomon in vv. 1*a*, 2-3, 11*b*-12, and 13-15*a*; a prophetic editing in vv. 4-9*a* and v. 15*b*; and a deuteronomistic redaction in vv. 1*b*, 9*b*-11*a*, 13*a*, and 16). The dynastic promise to David is frequently referred to throughout the rest of Samuel and the books of Kings (e.g., 1 Kgs 11:34-36); it is also anticipated in passages contained in the history of David's rise (e.g., 1 Sam 24:20; 25:28). Yahweh established a permanent sacred site for the Israelites in order to give them rest. With the establishment of the monarchy also came the erection of the Temple. The themes of kingship and Temple persist until the end of the deuteronomistic history.

f. A literary reading of the books of Samuel. The methods summarized in sections a-e are primarily diachronic attempts to interpret the text of 1–2 Samuel either through its prehistory (sources or identifiable pre-deuteronomistic documents), through one or more redactions (prophetic and/or deuteronomistic), or through recovering a superior text from one damaged by haplography and other vicissitudes of textual transmission. Many later studies of Samuel, however, have focused more on the present shape of the MT and on NARRATIVE method. Some of these provide a synchronic reading of the text; other readings have attempted to blend modern LITERARY analysis with diachronic observations. D. Damrosch (1987), for example, argues for the mutually beneficial interplay of historical and literary study and even hopes to integrate comparative, text-historical, and literary study. McCarter, by way of contrast, divided his discussion of the Goliath story into two sections: (a) 17:1-11, 32-40, 42-48*a*, 49, 51-54 and (b) 17:12-31, 41, 48*b*, 50, 55-58; 18:1-5, 10-11, 17-19, 29*b*-30. The second section (b) is lacking in Codex Vaticanus and is interpreted by McCarter as an alternative account of David's arrival and early days in court, which has been interpolated into the primitive narrative. He considers it excursus material. Damrosch argues that the second section (b) is in fact older and once served as a structuring device for the pre-deuteronomistic version of the history of David's rise. When the deuteronomistic historian constructed a new story (a), he had two choices, both of which he tried: He threw out the old story, putting only (a) in the text (cf. the text presumed by LXX), and he inserted his new story (a) into the old (b), resulting in the MT. Damrosch bases these conjectures on sensitive literary analysis of the narrative.

The great variety of modern literary-critical or structuralist readings (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION) of Samuel cannot be described in the space here provided (see the review article by R. Polzin [1989] dealing with biblical studies and the humanities). The studies on Samuel by C. Conroy (1978), J. Fokkelman (1986), Gunn (1991), J. Jackson (1965), B. Long (1981), Polzin (1989), and J. Rosenberg (1987) illustrate these approaches. In addition FEMINIST literary biblical scholars have sought to reveal how issues of gender affect the interpretation of the text (see A. Brenner [1994]).

Synchronic and diachronic approaches have made great advances in the understanding of the books of Samuel. While some scholars have stressed one or more methods to the virtual exclusion of the others, there is an increasing awareness that both approaches, with all their sub-disciplines, need to be used in creative tension as the history of the interpretation of the books of Samuel moves on into the twenty-first century.

Bibliography: A. A. Anderson, 2 Samuel (WBC 11, 1989). B. C. Birch, The Rise of the Israelite Monarchy: The Growth and Development of 1 Samuel 7–15 (SBLDS 27, 1976); "The First and Second Books of Samuel," NIB (1998) 2:947-1383. A. Brenner (ed.), A Feminist Companion to Samuel and Kings (1994). K. Budde, Die Bücher Samuel (KHC 8, 1902). A. Campbell, The Ark Narrative (1 Samuel 4–6; 2 Samuel 6): A Form-critical and Traditio-historical Study (SBLDS 16, 1975). R. A. Carlson, David, the Chosen King: A Traditio-historical Approach to the Second Book of Samuel (1964). C. C. Conroy, Absalom! Absalom! Narrative and Language in 2 Samuel 13–20 (AnBib 81, 1978). F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (1973); F. M. Cross and S. Talmon (eds.), Qumran and the History of the Biblical Text (1975). F. Crüsemann, Der Widerstand Gegen das Königtum (WMANT 49, 1978). D. Damrosch, The Narrative Covenant: Transformations of Genre in the Growth of Biblical Literature (1987). W. Dietrich, Prophetie und Geschichte: Eine Redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung Zum Deuteronomistischen Geschichtswwerk (FRLANT 108, 1972). S. R. Driver, Notes on the Hebrew Text and the Topography of the Books of Samuel (1913). O. Eissfeldt, The OT: An Introduction (1966). M. Elat, Samuel and the Foundation of Kingship in Ancient Israel (1998). J. P. Fokkelman, Narrative Art and Poetry in the Books of Samuel: A Full Interpretation Based on Stylistic and Structural Analyses, vol. 2, The Crossing Fates (1986). R. P. Gordon, 1 and 2 Samuel (1984). J. H. Grønbaek, Die Geschichte Von Aufstieg Davids (1. Sam 15–2 Sam 5): Tradition und Composition (1971). D. M. Gunn, The Story of King David: Genre and Interpretation (JSOTSup 6, 1978); (ed.), Narrative and Novelle in Samuel: Studies by H. Gressmann and Other Scholars, 1906–23 (1991). B. Halpern, The Constitution of the Monarchy in Israel (HSM 25, 1981). G. Hens-Piazza, Of Methods, Monarchs, and Meanings: A Socio-rhetorical Approach to Exegesis (1996). J. J. Jackson, "David's Throne: Patterns in the Succession Story," CJT 11 (1965) 183-95. R. W. Klein, 1 Samuel (WBC 10, 1983); Textual Criticism of the OT: The Septuagint After Qumran (1974). F. Langamet, "Affinités Sacerdotales, Deutéronomiques, Élohistes dans l'histoire de la Succession (2 S 9-20; 1 R 1-2)," Mélanges Bibliques et Orientaux en l'honneur de M. H. Cazelles (ed. A. Caquot and M. Delcor, 1981) 223-46. B. O. Long, "Wounded Beginnings: David and Two Sons," Images of Man and God: OT Short Stories in Literary Focus (ed. B. O. Long, 1981) 26-34. P. K. McCarter, Jr., 1 and 2 Samuel (AB 8-9, 1980–84). D. J. McCarthy, Treaty and Covenant (1978). I. Mendelsohn, "Samuel's Denunciation of Kingship in the Light of Accadian Documents from Ugarit," BASOR 143 (1956) 17-22. T. N. D. Mettinger, King and Messiah: The Civil and Sacral Legitimation of the Israelite Kings (ConBOT 8, 1976). P. D. Miller, Jr., and J. J. M. Roberts, The Hand of the Lord: A Reassessment of the "Ark Narrative" of 1 Samuel (1977). P. D. Miscall, 1 Samuel: A Literary Reading (1986). R. D. Nelson, The Double Redaction of the Deuteronomistic History (JSOTSup 18, 1981). M. Noth, The Deuteronomistic History (1943; ET, JSOTSup 15, 1981). R. Polzin, "1 Samuel: Biblical Studies and the Humanities," RSTR 15 (1989) 297-313; Samuel and the Deuteronomist: 2 Samuel (1989). J. Rosenberg, "1 and 2 Samuel," The Literary Guide to the Bible (ed. R. Alter and F. Kermode, 1987). L. Rost, The Succession to the Throne of David (1926; ET 1982). A. Saltman, Pseudo-Jerome: Quaestiones on the Book of Samuel (SPB 26, 1975). H. J. Stoebe, Das Erste Buch Samuelis (KAT 8, 1, 1973). O. Thenius, Die Bücher Samuels (KEH 4, 1842; ET 1898). E. C. Ulrich, Jr., The Qumram Text of Samuel and Josephus (HSM 19, 1978). J. Van Seters, In Search of History (1983). T. Veijola, Die Ewige Dynastie: David und die Enstehung Seiner Dynastie Nach der Deuteronomistischen Darstellung (1975); Das Königtum in der Beurteilung der Deuteronomistischen Historigraphie: Eine Redaktionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung (1977). A. Weiser, "Die Legitimation des Königs David: Zur Eigenart und Enstehung der Sogenannten Geschichte vom David's Aufstieg," VT 16 (1966) 325-54. J. Wellhausen, Der Text der Bücher Samuelis Untersucht (1871). H. W. Wolff, "The Kergyma of the Deuteronomic Historical Work," The Vitality of OT Traditions (1975) 83-100. E. Würthwein, Die Erzählung von der Thronfolge Davids—theologische oder Politische Geschichtsschreibung? (ThStud 115, 1974).

R. W. KLEIN

SANCTA MATER ECCLESIA

This document, also called "Instructio de historica evangeliorum veritate" (Instruction on the Historical Truth of the Gospels), was issued by the Biblical Commission of the Roman Catholic Church on Apr. 21, 1964. In it the commission issued directives about the proper understanding of the Gospels for (a) exegetes, (b) professors of Scripture in seminaries, (c) preachers, (d) those who publish for the faithful, and (e) directors of biblical associations.

The important affirmations of the Instruction are found in the directives for exegetes (pars. IV-XI), who are counseled to use all norms of "rational" and "Catholic" HERMENEUTICS, i.e., norms of LITERARY and historical criticism that guide any interpretation of ancient documents, but also Roman Catholic norms (that the Bible is a collection of inspired writings containing divine revelation, and that it is intended for the spiritual upbuilding of God's people). Particularly recommended are the study of the "literary forms" the evangelist has used and the "reasonable elements" of form-critical study (see FORM CRITICISM) of the Gospels.

In addition, the commission insisted that Gospel interpreters must distinguish three stages of the gospel tradition: (1) What Jesus did and said or what his chosen disciples saw and heard. (2) What the apostles preached as they "faithfully explained his life and words" and accommodated their message to their audiences, aided by post-resurrection faith, which did not deform their impression of him or transform him into some "mythical" person. (3) What the evangelists recorded about Jesus, each with an individual literary purpose, as they selected material from the foregoing stages, synthesized it, explicated it, and suited it to the needs of their Christian audiences.

The commission thus stressed that "from the results of new investigations it is apparent that the doctrine and life of Jesus were not simply reported for the sole purpose of being remembered but were 'preached' so as to offer the church a basis of faith and morals" (par. X). In this way, the Instruction undercuts any tendency to fundamentalistic literalness that might equate stage 3 with stage 1.

This Instruction was summarized in the Dogmatic Constitution of Vatican Council II, Dei verbum 19, which begins with Sancta Mater Ecclesia, leaving no doubt about its source.

Bibliography: "Instructio Sancta Mater Ecclesia de historica evangeliorum veritate," AAS 56 (1964) 712-18; 58 (1966) 826-27. BI, 390-98, 413. J. A. Fitzmyer, A Christological Catechism: NT Answers (rev. ed., 1991) 119-64.

J. A. FITZMYER

SANDAY, WILLIAM (1843–1920)

S. was educated at Repton and Balliol College, Oxford. Following ordination he was elected a fellow of Trinity College (1866) and served in several churches administered by the college. Principal of Hatfield Hall in Durham (1876–83), he became Dean Ireland's Professor of Exegesis at Oxford, where he was an influential presence in the university. By 1895 he was Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity and chair of the seminar on the relationship among the SYNOPTIC Gospels, which began its discussions in 1894; he subsequently edited Studies in the Synoptic Problem (1911). Perhaps the surest index of the seminar's deep influence is that three of its principal members were W. Allen, J. HAWKINS, and B. STREETER.

S. was no mere organizer, however; he formulated his own opinions and encouraged others in the seminar to do the same (Studies [1911] viii, xxvi, xxvii). In 1872 he had indicated his provisional acceptance of H. HOLTZMANN's theory of the priority of Mark and the use of another source in Matthew and Luke (essay on John's Gospel, ix). In the seminar he emerged as a doughty defender of the two document hypothesis (xi, xii, 3), opposing the view that the form of Mark known to Luke was an earlier version of the Gospel (x, xi, xv, 3, 21). Although he disagreed with Hawkins's appeal to oral tradition to account for variants from Mark in Luke's account of the passion (xiii, xiv), he sided with Hawkins in the description of Q as an actual document (1911, xiv, xv, xix, xx, 3).

S.'s position is represented not only in his adjudication among competing theories of synoptic development but also in his essay on the conditions under which the Gospels were written (Studies, 1-26). In a brief prolegomenon (3-5) he explained the challenge: to develop a theory that accounts for both resemblances and variations among the Synoptics. He pointed out that the strength of a documentary theory is that it accounts for agreements; the strength of an oral theory, that it accounts for differences (5); and that the differences found in the Synoptics are of a kind that could be accounted for by oral transmission. Nonetheless, S. operated under the hypothesis (and only that) of Markan priority and literary dependence among the synoptic Gospels; the program of his article (and of his seminar generally) was to test and refine that assumption. Notably, neither he nor any of his colleagues appear to have speculated on the shape a comprehensive oral theory might take.

S. described what he called the "psychological" and "external" conditions under which the evangelists functioned, including under "psychological conditions" their intentions (see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). He described the evangelists as historians rather than copyists (Studies, 12): They intended to render their essentially reliable sources faithfully and, in part, their aim was homiletic (13-16). The outstanding feature of S.'s approach is its synthesis of disparate elements. He was, therefore, no mere conduit of Holtzmann's hypothesis but a careful and creative recipient who considered technical data within a horizon of historical probabilities. He established such an engagement with German scholarship that after him responsible NT scholarship in English had to be international in scope in order to be taken seriously.

A. Souter's bibliography (1921) suggests the breadth of S.'s concerns. He wrote on John's Gospel (1892), arguing vehemently for JOHANNINE authorship, but later, using an inductive approach, justified Johannine authorship only as an inference (Morse lectures at Union Seminary [1905] 248). This inductive approach also characterized his collaboration with A. Headlam in their classic commentary on Romans (1895). S. was no less concerned with the speculative, offering a psychological account of christology. He also acknowledged his fascination with miracle (1920, 60), concluding that "the element of the abnormal" was introduced into accounts of miracles, "not so much in the facts as in the telling" (75). Although willing to use the term miracle in reference to spiritual power (65-66), S. openly called himself a modernist (67). In both the agenda of his career and the mix of the authoritative and the unorthodox in his results, S. stands as a paradigm of British biblical scholarship in the twentieth century.

Works: The Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel Considered in Reference to the Contents of the Gospel Itself: A Critical Essay (1872); (with A. C. Headlam), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (ICC, 1895); The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel: Eight Lectures on the Morse Foundation, Delivered in the Union Seminary, New York, in October and November 1904 (1905); "The Conditions Under Which the Gospels Were Written, in Their Bearing upon Some Difficulties of the Synoptic Problem," Studies in the Synoptic Problem: By Members of The University of Oxford (ed. W. Sanday, with intro., 1911) 1-26; Personality in Christ and in Ourselves (1911); "On the Nature of Miracle," Divine Overruling (1920) 53-81.

Bibliography: W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (1976). W. Locke, JTS 22 (1921) 97-104. A. Souter, "A Bibliography of Dr. S.," JTS 22 (1921) 193-205. C. H. Turner, DNB Sup. 3 (1927) 482-84.

B. CHILTON

SANDERS, JAMES A. (1927–)

Born and reared in Memphis, Tennessee, S. received a BA in Romance languages and philosophy from Vanderbilt in 1948. He went on to Vanderbilt Divinity School, where he was encouraged in biblical studies by J. P. HYATT. S. was ordained in the Presbyterian Church and received a BD with distinction from Vanderbilt Divinity School in 1951, just after finishing one year of study of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS and the NT with A. Dupont-Sommer and O. CULLMANN in Paris on a Fulbright grant (1950–51). Intending to go on to Yale to study NT, S. followed Hyatt's advice to study Jewish backgrounds to NT at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. What was intended to be one year of preparation turned into a full doctoral program, and he earned a PhD at HUC with a dissertation written under the direction of S. SANDMEL, "Suffering as Divine Discipline in the OT and Post-biblical Judaism."

While teaching at Colgate Rochester Divinity School (1954–65), S. was called upon to unroll and publish the Psalms scroll from cave 11 at Qumran. Moving to Union Theological Seminary in New York (1965–77), he began publishing increasingly on textual history, canonical HERMENEUTICS, and the interface between the two, including his Torah and Canon (1972) and several essays collected in From Sacred Story to Sacred Text (1987). In addition, he joined the Hebrew OT Text Project in 1969 and began a decades-long research and writing collaboration with D. Barthélemy of Fribourg, Switzerland. In 1977 S. moved on to a dual position at the School of Theology at Claremont and Claremont Graduate School, where he taught until his retirement in 1997. A central focus for him throughout the Claremont years was the co-founding and nurture of the Ancient Biblical Manuscripts Center, a repository of microfilms of biblical manuscripts, Dead Sea Scrolls, and related texts.

Throughout his career S. has resolutely refused to be confined in typical disciplinary boxes, focusing in particular on trajectories of textual development and interpretation extending from the "First Testament" (as he has come to call the HB) through Second Temple Jewish writings to the "Second Testament." Where other streams of canonical studies in the United States have tended to stress the shape and final redaction of the CANON (e.g., B. Childs), S. has been just as interested in what he terms the "canonical process"—that is, the ways in which communities of faith use Scripture to inform their lives.

Out of his study of this process, S. has argued that the Christian Bible is a magnificent joining of different communities' attempts to pursue "God's ontological and ethical oneness" in opposition to various forms of contemporary polytheism and complacency. When one takes the Bible's parts separately, one misses the majesty of the whole. When one focuses on biblical texts to the exclusion of the multiple communities who formed them, one risks turning Scripture into an idol. But when one attends to how biblical traditions are the product of an intensely intertextual process (see INTERTEXTUALITY) of discernment of a God far beyond any textual representation, one begins to perceive what it means to call a text "biblical."

Works: The Psalms Scroll of Qumrân Cave 11. 11 Q Psa (DJD 4, 1965); Torah and Canon (1972); Canon and Community: A Guide to Canonical Criticism (1984); From Sacred Story to Sacred Text: Canon as Paradigm (1987).

Bibliography: D. Barthélemy, "La critique canonique." RICP (1991) 211-20. J. E. Brenneman, Canons in Conflict: Negotiating Texts in True and False Prophecy (1997). C. A. Evans and S. Talmon (eds.), The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of J. A. S. (1997). P. Flint, The Dead Sea Psalms Scrolls and the Book of Psalms (1997). R. Weis and D. Carr (eds.), A Gift of God in Due Season: Essays on Scripture and Community in Honor of J. A. S. (1996). G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (1985).

D. M. CARR

SANDMEL, SAMUEL (1911–79)

A Jewish specialist in NT, S. published more than 200 essays and twenty books on the interrelationship of Judaism and Christianity in both the Hellenistic and modern worlds, with particular focus on PHILO and PAUL. He served as president of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (1961) and general editor of the New English Bible with Apocrypha: Oxford Study Edition (1976).

Born in Dayton, Ohio, S. received his BA from the University of Missouri (1932) and rabbinical ordination from Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati (1937). Following a Hillel directorship at the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill and four years as a Navy chaplain, he earned a PhD from Yale (1949). He served on the faculties of Vanderbilt University (1949–52), Hebrew Union College (1952–79), and the University of Chicago's Divinity School.

In the late 1930s B. H. Branscomb of Duke University prevailed on S. to enter NT rather than HB study, and E. GOODENOUGH at Yale opened vistas of Greek religion and Hellenistic Judaism. During these years S. assessed many treatments of Philo, Paul, and early Christianity as deficient because scholars had underestimated the degree of dissimilarity between diaspora and Palestinian Judaism. When in the late 1960s and 1970s many scholars virtually homogenized diaspora and Palestinian Judaism, construing the latter as a product of the Hellenism characteristic of the general Mediterranean world, S. urged that Hellenism's penetration of Palestine be resolved into three categories of possible influence: language only; Greek ways of living; and Greek modes of thought (the content of Greek philosophy and religion). He concluded that, despite undeniable evidence of some Hellenistic overtones, Hellenism's permeation of Palestine was hardly thoroughgoing, especially compared to its thorough penetration of diaspora Judaism (detailed in S.'s Philonic studies). He became critical of scholars using Palestinian and Babylonian rabbinic literature as a primary tool in studying such Hellenistic figures as Philo or Paul and was troubled by "parallelomania" (the indiscriminate heaping up of seemingly parallel texts culled from fundamentally unrelated corpora of literature).

More than any Jewish predecessor, S. succeeded in persuading fellow Jews that NT study was a legitimate and vital field for Jewish endeavor. He was instrumental as well in facilitating and accelerating progress in Jewish-Christian discourse in both national and international arenas from the 1950s onward.

Works: A Jewish Understanding of the NT (1956); Philo's Place in Judaism (1956); The Genius of Paul: A Study in History (1958); "Parallelomania," JBL 81 (1962) 1-13; We Jews and Jesus (1969); The First Christian Century in Judaism and Christianity: Certainties and Uncertainties (1969); Two Living Traditions: Essays on Religion and the Bible (1972); Anti-Semitism in the NT? (1978); "Palestinian and Hellenistic Judaism and Christianity: The Question of the Comfortable Theory," HUCA 50 (1979) 137-48; Philo of Alexandria: An Introduction (1979).

Bibliography: R. M. Grant, J. Smith, and M. Marty, Criterion 19 (1980) 27-31. F. E. Greenspahn, E. Hilgeret, and B. L. Mack (eds.), Nourished with Peace: Studies in Hellenistic Judaism in Memory of S. S. (1984) x-14, 51-52, 117-18, 213-37.

M. J. COOK

SARNA, NAHUM (1923–)

S. was born Mar. 27, 1923, in London, into a traditional Jewish Zionist family. He was educated broadly in Jewish Studies at University College London (BA 1944; MA 1946) and Jews' College (Minister's Diploma 1947). In 1949 he traveled to Israel to continue his studies; however, postwar conditions there did not allow him to pursue the PhD, so he came to the United States, where he completed his PhD at Dropsie College in 1955. Influenced by the writings of Y. KAUFMANN, his interests had shifted from rabbinics to biblical studies and Semitics.

S. taught briefly at University College, London, then at Gratz College in Philadelphia (1951–57). He spent most of his career at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York (1957–63 as librarian; 1963–65 as associate professor of Bible) and at Brandeis University in the department of Near Eastern and Judaic studies as Dora Golding Professor of Biblical Studies (1965–85). He was involved in the training of many leading scholars, including M. Fishbane, C. Meyers, S. Paul, L. Schiffman, and J. Tigay. After his retirement from Brandeis he held several visiting professorships and served as academic consultant at the Jewish Publication Society, where he initiated and edited the JPS Torah commentary, to which he contributed Genesis (1989) and Exodus (1991).

A love of literature, a deep understanding of Jewish civilization, and a firm knowledge of the languages and civilizations of the ancient Near East—interests S. developed in London and at Dropsie—have continued to inform his biblical scholarship. His work is extremely wide-ranging: He served as a departmental editor for EncJud. His early work, influenced by C. Gordon of Dropsie, dealt with various ways Ugaritic texts (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE) clarify the meaning of biblical passages. At the Jewish Theological Seminary, he began to engage in scholarly projects that were connected to the needs of the Jewish community, including Understanding Genesis (1966) and various studies on Psalms. This "Jewish" focus continued with several studies on medieval Jewish interpretation (see esp. "Hebrew and Bible Studies in Medieval Spain" [1971]) and its use for contemporary critical scholarship, and various works that use rabbinic texts to shed light on the process of canonization (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) and text-critical issues (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM). He also served on the JPS Kethubim (Writings) Translation Committee along with M. GREENBERG and J. Greenfield. Yet, S.'s work is not parochial or centered on specifically Jewish interests; he was also commissioned to write the general articles on the HB for the fifteenth edition of the EncBrit and for M. Eliade's EncRel.

His study of Psalms culminated in the 1993 volume Songs of the Heart: An Introduction to the Book of Psalms (repr. as On the Book of Psalms). This book typifies his methodology: It shows extreme literary sensitivity, is full of philological insights based on Semitic languages and medieval Jewish interpretation, and balances an interest in the meaning of words and of the psalm as a whole. It is somewhat conservative, emphasizing the canonical text and largely ignoring FORM CRITICISM and other perspectives S. feels to be more conjectural. These features characterize much of his work, including Exploring Exodus (1986) and his two JPS Torah commentaries. These all play down source criticism, emphasizing holistic readings instead, and take a relatively conservative view on the historicity of biblical accounts, in which S. is influenced by the works of Kaufmann and W. F. ALBRIGHT.

A most significant scholarly writing is S.'s 1963 article "Psalm 89: A Study in Inner Biblical Exegesis," which shows how the biblical and rabbinic corpora are similar in that later biblical texts may use rabbinic-like midrashic techniques in expositing earlier biblical texts. This article is one of the earliest and most influential for the field that later developed into INNER-BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION or MIDRASH, a field that S. has continued to develop in other studies and that some of his students have promoted and advanced.

Works: "Psalm 89: A Study in Inner Biblical Exegesis," Biblical and Other Studies (P. W. Lown Institute of Advanced Judaic Studies 1, ed. A. Altmann, 1963) 29-46; Understanding Genesis (HBI 1, 1966); "Hebrew and Biblical Studies in Medieval Spain," The Shephardi Heritage (ed. R. D. Barnett, 1971) 323-66; (tr. with M. Greenberg and J. Greenfield), The Writings (Kethubim) (1982); Exploring Exodus: The Heritage of Biblical Israel (1986); Ancient Libraries and the Ordering of the Biblical Books (1989); Genesis: The JPS Torah Commentary (1989); Exodus: The JPS Torah Commentary (1991); Songs of the Heart: An Introduction to the Book of Psalms (1993).

Bibliography: M. Brettler and M. Fishbane, "Editors' Preface" Minhah le-Nahum: Biblical and Other Studies Presented to N. M. S. in Honour of His 70th Birthday (JSOTSup 154, ed. M. Brettler and M. Fishbane, 1993) 9-11. B. A. Levine, "The Second Wave," Students of the Covenant: A History of Jewish Biblical Scholarship in North America (ed. S. D. Sperling, 1992) 96-97.

M. BRETTLER

SAYCE, ARCHIBALD HENRY (1845–1933)

The son of an Anglican clergyman, S. showed an aptitude for languages. By age eighteen he had become proficient in Latin and Greek and had begun reading Egyptian, Hebrew, and Sanskrit. He studied classics at Queen's College, Oxford, attended lectures by F. Max Müller and E. B. PUSEY, was made fellow in 1869, and the next year was ordained and became a tutor. From 1876 to 1890 he served as deputy professor of comparative philology under Max Müller and from 1891 to 1919 as professor of ASSYRIOLOGY. From 1870 to 1900 he published an average of one book each year as well as articles, notes, and reviews.

S. contributed to scholarship primarily in philology, publishing the first Assyrian grammar and reading book in English as well as a number of important articles and books on Assyrian language, history, and religion. He discovered the value of at least a dozen Hittite signs (see HITTITOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), translated a number of Hittite inscriptions, and deciphered the Vannic cuneiform inscriptions without the aid of a bilingual text. Because of his archaeological interests he traveled extensively throughout the Near East and for almost two decades spent his winters on the Nile in his houseboat, the Istar, outfitted with a two-thousand-volume library. His travel and broad linguistic ability equipped him to follow developments in the study of the languages and the history of the ancient Near East.

S.'s contribution to biblical studies was primarily as a popularizer concerned to show how the findings of ancient Near Eastern ARCHAEOLOGY impinged on the study of the HB. In the 1880s his publications revealed a growing interest in the HB and in Near Eastern archaeology. The tone of his works became more polemical with his Fresh Light from the Ancient Monuments (1883), in which he vigorously attacked German

HB source criticism. He believed the source critics had inadequate material on which to base their theories and that their method was essentially subjective. In contrast, he viewed archaeology as providing objective data for the study of the Bible and as a valuable check on the excesses of the source critics. His arguments were sometimes illogical and often unfairly caricatured his opponents, leaving his readers with the impression that archaeological discoveries had completely disproved their theories and that he and others of like mind were the champions of the apostolic Christian faith being threatened by the "higher critics."

S. was not a literalist, however. He was convinced that there was a historical basis for biblical narratives, but he did not believe the narratives were without error. He found errors of historical fact in the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles and thought the editor of the book of Daniel was mistaken in his references to Belshazzar as Nebuchadnezzar's son and to Darius the Mede as the conqueror of Babylon. Furthermore, he believed the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) had been composed from a variety of sources and that the Genesis stories about creation and the flood were based on earlier Babylonian accounts.

S. showed little interest in specialization—whether in Assyriology or in biblical studies—but was always distracted by the latest archaeological discovery. In addition, his imagination often led him to suggest solutions that had not been adequately considered or tested (e.g., his assignment of the Siloam inscription to Solomon's day and his conviction that the Amorites were the white race of Palestine from whom the current inhabitants with blue eyes and fair hair descended).

Works: An Assyrian Grammar for Comparative Purposes (1872); The Principles of Comparative Philology (1874); Introduction to the Science of Language (1880); Fresh Light from the Ancient Monuments: A Sketch of the Most Striking Confirmations of the Bible from Recent Discoveries in Egypt, Palestine, Assyria, Babylonia, Asia Minor (By-Paths of Bible Knowledge 2, 1883); An Introduction to the Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther (1885); Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as Illustrated by the Religion of the Ancient Babylonians (Hibbert Lectures, 1887); The "Higher Criticism" and the Verdict of the Monuments (1893); Patriarchal Palestine (1895); The Early History of the Hebrews (1897); Early Israel and the Surrounding Nations (1898); The Religions of Ancient Egypt and Babylonia (Gifford Lectures, 1902); Monument Facts and Higher Critical Fancies (By-Paths of Bible Knowledge 23, 1904); The Archaeology of the Cuneiform Inscriptions (1907); Reminiscences (1923).

Bibliography: F. L. Griffith, JRAS (1933) 497-99. B. Gunn, DNB 1931–40 (1949) 786-88. S. Langdon, "A. H. S. as Assyriologist," JRAS (1933) 499-503. B. Z. MacHaffie, "Monument Facts and Higher Critical Fancies: Archaeology and the Popularzation of OT Criticism in Nineteenth-century Britain," CH 50 (1981) 316-28.

M. P. GRAHAM

SCALIGER, JOSEPH JUSTUS (1540–1609)

The preeminent classicist of his day, S. was born in Agen, the tenth child of the eminent scholar Julius C. Scaliger (1484–1558). He studied Greek and oriental languages at Paris, becoming a Calvinist in 1562 (see CALVIN). At about age twenty he met G. POSTEL, who encouraged him to study Hebrew, Syriac, and other Semitic languages. After travel in Italy (1565) and Scotland and England (1566), he fought on the side of the Huguenots and later studied law at Valence under Cujas. He taught in Geneva (1572–74) and spent time in private research before succeeding J. Lipsius as professor of belles-lettres without lecturing responsibilities at Leiden University (1593), which he made into a center of philological learning.

Stressing the need for good critical, well-commented editions of the classics, S. published editions of various Latin authors: Festus (1575), Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius (1577), and others, contributing enormously to TEXTUAL CRITICISM. His commentaries were succinctly and informatively written, and that on Manilius could still be praised in the twentieth century as "without forerunner and without successor" (A. E. Housman). He was also one of the first to attempt reconstruction of the lost older copy of a text and to explain the origin of errors common to several manuscripts. In De Doctrina Temporum (1606) he provided a partial reconstruction of EUSEBIUS's Chronicon. He sought to apply the same philological method to classical, ancient Near Eastern, and biblical texts.

In the area of history and CHRONOLOGY, in which he had great interest, his De emendatione temporum (1583) was not only an attack on the Gregorian calendar and the genuineness of Dionysius the Pseudo-Areopagite but also a milestone in chronological studies. Having argued for the value of oriental chronicles in reconstructing ancient history and chronology, he brought back from Cairo the first copy of the Samaritan book of Joshua. He also inaugurated corespondence with the Palestinian Samarian colony, a practice continued by later scholars (see S. de Sacy [1831]).

S.'s contributions to biblical studies lay primarily in philology and in textual criticism. His annotations to the NT did not appear until after his death and then only after being gleaned from several sources, including his notes in T. BEZA's edition of the NT. His annotations were printed in various editions of the Greek NT and were included in the CRITICI SACRI (1660). He was not hesitant to emend the text, argued that Revelation was originally written in Hebrew, drew upon antiquities and ancient inscriptions in his work, considered a number of NT writings to be spurious (Hebrews; James; 2 Peter; 1, 2, 3 John; Jude; and Revelation), and sought to place early church history and chronology on a sound footing. He explored the pseudepigraphical and apocryphal texts (see APOCRYPHA, NT and PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) of both testaments but was generally disdainful of these writings. S. was the first to collect and edit the Apocalypse of Enoch material from Syncellus.

Works: Autobiography of J. S.: With Autobiographical Selections from His Letters, His Testament, and the Funeral Orations by D. Heinsius and D. Baudius (tr. and annotated by G. W. Robinson, 1927).

Bibliography: J. Bernays, Joseph Justus Scaliger (1855, repr. 1965). C. M. Bruehl, "J. J. S.: Ein Beitrag zur geistesgeschichtlichen Bedeutung der Altestumsweissenschaft," ZRG 12 (1960) 201-18; 13 (1961) 45-65. R. C. Christie and J. E. Sandys, EncBrit 24 (1911[11]) 284-86. A. T. Grafton, J. S.: A Study in the History of Classical Scholarship (2 vols., 1983–93). A. Grafton and H. J. de Jonge, S.: A Bibliography, 1852–1982 (1982). H. J. de Jonge, "The Study of the NT," Leiden University in the Seventeenth Century (ed. T. H. Lunsingh Scheurleer and G. H. M. Posthumus Meyjes, 1975) 76-87; De bestudering van het Nieuwe Testament aan de Noordnederlandse universiteiten en het Remonstrants Seminarie van 1575 tot 1700 (1980), esp. 77-81. P. des Maizeaus (ed.), Prima Scaligerana (1740); Secunda Scaligerana (1740). MSHH 23 (1733) 279-315. M. Pattison, Quarterly Review 108 (1860) 34-81; Essays (2 vols., 1889) 1:132-243. S. de Sacy, "Correspondence des Samaritains de Naplous, pendant années 1808 et suiv," Notices et extraits des manuscripts de la bibliothèque de roi et autres bibliothèques (1831) 1-235. J. E. Sandys, History of Classical Scholarship (1908) 2:199-204.

G. E. SCHWERDTFEGER

SCHECHTER, SOLOMON (1847–1915)

Born to a Polish Hasidic family (see HASIDISM) in Romania, S. learned Hebrew and Bible as a child. He grew proficient in Talmudic studies (see TALMUD), which he pursued further in Vienna together with theology and philology. Ordained a rabbi (1879), he studied at the University of Berlin and at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, developing into a master of scientific rabbinic research. After moving to England in 1882 he published a model edition of Avot de-Rabbi Natan (1887) and became reader in rabbinics at Cambridge (1892), professor of Hebrew at London University (1897), and curator of Cambridge Library's oriental department (1900). In 1902 he was appointed president of Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, where he became a leader in the American Jewish community. In 1905 he reorganized the committee that produced the 1917 Jewish Publication Society translation of the HB.

Although he excelled in writing syntheses of rabbinic thought in popular lecture form, S. achieved fame for recovering over 100,000 manuscripts and fragments from the Cairo Geniza (synagogue repository), beginning in 1896. The Geniza contained a mine of data relating to medieval Jewish life in the Mediterranean world and housed the remains of numerous lost rabbinic works and documents, including Bible commentaries by SAADIA Gaon. Among the fragments he brought to the Cambridge Library, S. discovered portions of the Hebrew original of the apocryphal Wisdom of Ben Sira (Ecclesiasticus) and the so-called Zadokite Document, parts of which have subsequently turned up among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. In 1910 S. published "Fragments of a Zadokite Work" from two medieval manuscripts, astutely identifying their sources as a Jewish sectarian document differing from Pharisaic Judaism and resembling such pseudepigraphic books (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) as JUBILEES, ENOCH, and the TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS. Remarkably, recensions of the Damascus Document, as it is now known, have been discovered at Qumran.

Not primarily a biblicist, S. accepted many results of critical scholarship, e.g., that Isaiah contains the work of more than one prophet and that David and Solomon did not author the books traditionally attributed to them. But he suspected that much of higher criticism was motivated by anti-Jewish sentiment that aimed to cast aspersions on the originality of the HB. In editing the Hebrew Ben Sira from the second century BCE, he noted its literary dependence on the entire book of Psalms and on the wisdom books. Accordingly, he rebutted scholars who dated those and other biblical works to a late period and challenged higher critical judgments altogether. With eleven leaves of the Hebrew Ben Sira before him, S. also identified examples of proto-rabbinic MIDRASH and liturgical style in the text. He sensed an inevitable Christian bias in the biblical scholarship of his day and fostered a committed yet scientific Jewish biblical criticism.

Works: Studies in Judaism (3 ser., 1896–1924); (with C. Taylor), The Wisdom of Ben Sira: Portions of the Book Ecclesiasticus (1899, repr. 1979); Saadyana: Genizah Fragments of Writings of R. Saadya Gaon and Others (1903); Some Aspects of Rabbinic Theology (1909); Documents of Jewish Sectaries (2 vols., 1910, repr. 1970); Seminary Addresses and Other Papers (1915).

Bibliography: N. Bentwich, Solomon Schechter (1931). A. L. Eisenberg, Fill a Blank Page: A Biography of S. S. (1965). J. A. Fitzmyer, "Prolegomenon," Documents of Jewish Sectaries (S. Schechter, repr. 1970) 9-37. L. Ginzberg, Students, Scholars, and Saints (1928) 241-51. B. Mandelbaum, The Wisdom of S. S. (1963). A. Marx, Essays in Jewish Biography (1948) 229-50. A. S. Oko, S. S.: A Biography (1938).

E. L. GREENSTEIN

SCHLATTER, ADOLF (1852–1938)

Born in Sankt Gallen, Switzerland, Aug. 16, 1852, S. died in Tübingen May 19, 1938. He and his mother belonged to the Swiss Reformed Church, his father to a free church, which helps to account for the son's somewhat independent stance in the German Protestant exegesis of his time. S. was productive; many-sided; prodigiously learned; and an exacting, historically conservative NT exegete who had a great influence through his publications and his teaching.

S. studied theology in Basel and Tübingen (1871–75) and was pastor for five years. He taught as Privatdozent at Bern (1880–88), professor at Greifswald (1888–93), and professor of systematic theology at Berlin (1893–98), where he was called to counter the government's appointment of A. von HARNACK, whom the church judged heterodox. Although S. extracted the right to teach NT as well, he was not happy in this awkward, competitive position as Strafprofessor and gladly accepted a chair at Tübingen (1898–1922), where he taught until 1930, counting among his students R. BULTMANN, K. BARTH, and K. Rengstorf.

S.'s independent position in the exegesis of his day resulted from many factors, e.g., his anti-idealistic philosophical stance, which anticipated and paved the way for Barth's dialectical theology. With a devotion to JESUS as Savior, he refused to acknowledge a distinction between a non-messianic Jesus of history and a Christ of faith, thus setting himself against W. WREDE. In exegesis he stressed a combination of observation (Sehakt), theological reflection (Denkakt), and life or piety (Lebensakt). The first is defined in the preface to his commentary on Matthew (xi): "I call scholarship the observing of what is present to hand, not the attempt to imagine what is not visible." In practice this entailed an extreme concern for philological exactitude, which for S. meant striving to find exact verbal parallels for every verse of the Gospel in JOSEPHUS or in rabbinic literature. He first gave citations from rabbinic literature in Hebrew or Aramaic and then translated into Greek so that the verbal parallel became more evident. This tour de force necessitated an almost photographic knowledge of these sources and an informal concordance to Josephus, which culminated in the published concordance edited by Rengstorf. Because of S.'s philological sensitivity, G. KITTEL dedicated his TDNT to him.

Despite his knowledge of the arguments to the contrary, S. held to Matthean priority among the canonical Gospels. His commentary on John directly influenced that of E. HOSKYNS. Besides voluminous NT commentaries, S. published works on dogmatics, ethics, philosophy, biblical THEOLOGY, and devotion.

Works: Der Glaube im Neuen Testament (1885); Erläuterungen zum Neuen Testament (3 vols., 1887–1904); Die philosophische Arbeit seit Cartesius (1906); Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1909; rev. in 2 vols. as Die Geschichte des Christus; ET, The History of the Christian: The Foundation for NT Theology [1997] and Die Theologie der Apostel [1921–23]; repr. 1977); "The Theology of the NT and Dogmatics," The Nature of NT Theology (ed. R. Morgan, 1973) 117-66 (Ger. original in BFTC 13, 2 [1909] 7-82); Das christliche Dogma (1911); Geschichte Israels (1925); RGS 1 (1925) 145-71 (autobiographical); Geschichte der ersten Christenheit (1926; ET, The Church in the NT Period [1955]); Andachten (1927); Der Evangelist Matthäus (1929); Die Kirche des Matthäus (1929); Die Theologie des Judentums (1932); Gottes Gerechtigkeit: Ein Kommentar zum Römerbrief (1935; ET, Romans: The Righteousness of God [1995]); Rückblick auf meine Lebensarbeit (1952, repr. 1977), autobiography; Kleine Schriften (ed. U. Luck, 1969; partial ET by R. Morgan). Further commentaries on John, Luke, James, the Corinthian letters, Mark, the letters to Timothy and Titus, and 1 Peter.

Bibliography: S. Dintaman, Creative Grace: Faith and History in the Theology of A. S. (1993). R. Morgan, The Nature of NT Theology: The Contributions of W. Wrede and A. S. (SBT 2, 25, 1973) 1-67. W. Neuer, Adolf Schlatter (ET 1995); A. S.: ein Leben für Theologie und Kirche (1996). P. Stuhlmacher, "A. S.'s Interpretation of Scripture," NTS 24 (1978) 433-46 = ZTK Beiheft 4 (1978) 81-111; TPNZJ, 219-40. R. Stupperich, "A. S.s Berufungen," ZTK 76 (1979) 100-117. R. W. Yarbrough, HHMBI, 518-23.

B. T. VIVIANO

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH DANIEL ERNST (1768–1834)

A German pastor, philologist, theologian, and philosopher, S. was a man of many talents, recognized as one of the principal shapers of modern religious thought. In his own self-estimation, he was above all a minister of the Word of God. Born into a family of preachers and educated first among the Moravians, then at the University of Halle, he was ordained to the ministry of the Reformed Church and after briefly serving as an assistant pastor was appointed Reformed chaplain at the Charité Hospital in Berlin (1796). While there he wrote his first book, On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (1799). A further brief pastorate ended when he received his first academic post at the University of Halle (1804). The climax of his career followed his return to Berlin, where he became pastor of Trinity Church (1809) and professor of theology at the new university (1810).

S. was not primarily a biblical scholar. His greatest literary achievement was his dogmatic masterpiece, The Christian Faith (1821–22, 1830–31^2), which has earned him the title "father of modern theology." But his total theological program reserved a much higher place for biblical interpretation than is commonly recognized, and he engaged directly in both NT research and biblical exposition from the pulpit. His critical work on the NT included studies of the PASTORAL LETTERS and of the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, to which must be added his posthumously published lectures on NT introduction and on the life of JESUS. Of his voluminous published sermons, all based on biblical texts, many consist of continuous, week-by-week expositions of individual NT books.

S.'s dogmatics is often described as a theology of experience, sometimes with the added comment that its method is subjective and psychologizing in contrast to an objective theology of the Word. However, the more basic feature of his theology is that he approached Christianity as a historical phenomenon. Under historical theology, which he held to be the actual body of theological studies, he included not just church history but also exegetical theology and dogmatic theology. Dogmatics is the coherent presentation of the teaching that prevails in the church or in a particular church at a given time (the present). It is not the science of timeless dogmas but of belief (Glaubenslehre), and its companion discipline is the science of Christian behavior (Sittenlehre).

S. wrote his dogmatics expressly for the Evangelical Church of the Prussian Union. He therefore argued that Scripture could not be his only source because other churches, including the Roman Catholic Church, also appeal to the Bible; and it is impossible to differentiate them simply as correct and incorrect interpretations of the NT. The immediate sources for a distinctively EVANGELICAL dogmatics must be the Protestant confessions of faith, although it belongs to the dogmatic theologian's task to test the adequacy of their language as expressions of the evangelical religious affections. In this sense dogmatics is certainly a theology of experience (i.e., of a specific way of believing); but it is the experience of a particular religious community, not some private religious experience, that provides the subject matter of the discipline. Furthermore, it is a fundamental mark of this community that it seeks to determine its life in every respect, including its doctrine, by the Word of God.

Exegetical, as distinct from dogmatic, theology in this scheme cannot be merely subordinate or preparatory to dogmatics; rather, the two stand side by side as coordinate disciplines. Biblical exegesis alone cannot tell us what the faith of a believing community is today because no church can simply reproduce the apostolic age. But neither can the Christian character of present belief, as an authentic variety of Christianity, be determined in any other way than by reference to the NT. This is not so much an appeal to supernatural AUTHORITY as recognition of a historical principle: The purest view of any movement that has expanded over time and mingled with other historical forces can be attained only by examining its earliest expression.

Once this principle is grasped as the reason for the NT's normative value, it follows that the HB cannot have a comparable, direct value in the church (The Christian Faith [1821–22; ET 1928] 132, 27) and that the boundaries of the NT CANON must be recognized as fluid—that is, precisely as relative to each individual writing's adequacy as an expression of the original faith. "The interpretation of Christian faith which validates itself in each age as having been evoked by Scripture is the development, suited to that moment, of the genuine original interpretation of Christ and His work, and constitutes the common Christian orthodoxy for that time and place" (The Christian Faith, 131.2).

S. recognized that the entire theological enterprise rests on the interpretation of texts (i.e., written historical sources). Not only biblical theology but also church history and dogmatics are exegetical, even though we reserve the term exegetical theology for interpretation of the primitive Christian documents, hence the need for an explicit method of interpretation. S.'s pioneering work on HERMENEUTICS acknowledges no specific rules for understanding the Bible, only the special application of general rules of understanding that arise directly out of the nature of thought and language. He perceived the heart of the hermeneutic enterprise in two operations: first, a delicate balancing of part and whole, of the individual text and the literature to which it belongs; second, a continual dialectic between linguistic skill and psychological grasp of the author's intention.

In general, S. was an astute and independent NT critic; his arguments, e.g., against the Pauline authorship of 1 Timothy, and his doubts about the authenticity of Ephesians have stood the test of time. His view of the synoptic problem was quickly superseded, and his heavy reliance on the Fourth Gospel found little support. His hermeneutic theory, on the other hand, remains at the center of discussion even when rejected, and his understanding of the NT's place in the life of the church remains theologically significant. A doctrine of biblical INSPIRATION, he held, is not the foundation of faith in Christ; rather, the faith awakened by Christ is the reason why the Scriptures, which proclaim him, have their unique, normative function in the believing community.

Works: On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (1799, 1821[3]; ET 1988, 1894[3]); Christmas Eve: Dialogue on the Incarnation (1806, 1827[2]; ET 1967); Über den sogenannten ersten Brief des Paulos an den Timotheos (1807); Brief Outline on the Study of Theology (1811, 1830[2]; ET 1966); A Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke (1817; ET 1825); The Christian Faith (1821–22, 1830-31[2]; ET 1928); On the Glaubenslehre: Two Letters to Dr. Lücke (1829, 1908[2]; ET 1981); The Life of Jesus (1832, 1864; ET 1975); Hermeneutics: The Handwritten Manuscripts (1838; ed. H. Kimmerle, 1959, 1974[2]; ET 1977); Einleitung ins neue Testament (1845); Servant of the Word: Selected Sermons of F. S. (ET 1987).

Bibliography: D. DeVries, Jesus Christ in the Preaching of Calvin and S. (1996). B. A. Gerrish, Nineteenth-century Religious Thought in the West (3 vols., ed. N. Smart et al., 1985) 1:123-56 (bibliographical essay, 153-56). B. A. Gerrish, A Prince of the Church: S. and the Beginnings of Modern Theology (1984). R. R. Niebuhr, S. on Christ and Religion: A New Introduction (1964). D. F. Strauss, The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History: A Critique of S.'s Life of Jesus (1865; ET 1977). T. N. Tice, S. Bibliography (1966), supplement (1985) lists 2,628 entries.

B. A. GERRISH

SCHMIDT, KARL LUDWIG (1891–1956)

Born in Frankfurt a. M., Feb. 5, 1891, S. studied philology and theology in Marburg under W. HERRMANN and became assistant to A. DEISSMANN in Berlin and Privatdozent in 1918. He was made professor of NT at Giessen (1921), Jena (1925), and Bonn (1929–33), but because of his opposition to the National Socialists, he was one of the first to be deposed from his post and was compelled to leave Germany. In 1935, after serving Swiss pastorates, he was appointed professor of NT at Basel, where he stayed until illness forced his retirement in 1953. From 1922 to 1937 he edited TBl and in 1945 founded Basel's TZ, which he edited until 1952.

S.'s books, articles, and sermons cluster about two dynamic poles: the Gospels and the church. In his groundbreaking Habilitationsschrift, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (1919), he pioneered insights that became fundamental to the emerging form-critical method (see FORM CRITICISM). Confirming the position of J. WELLHAUSEN that the canonical Gospels are collections of independent smaller units, S. demonstrated further that the introductory topographical and chronological details (see CHRONOLOGY, NT) of these more or less fixed units were the "framing" formulations of the collectors of these pericopes, i.e., the evangelists. In general, the frames contain little of historical value and the resulting composite of JESUS' words and deeds is a secondary, non-historical life portrait. Thus Rahmen, along with the studies of M. DIBELIUS (1919) and R. BULTMANN (1921), further discredited the "life of Jesus movement." According to S., the Gospels must be regarded as essentially church productions from living oral tradition units tied to the particular life forms and functions (esp. worship) of the various church communities (i.e., the Sitz im Leben). The Gospels as a whole then should be construed as folk literature (Kleinliteratur), not counterparts to ancient "lives" (bioi/vitae) and memoirs (apomnēmoneumata).

S. asserted (1923) that the nondescript links between the smaller units tend to psychologize the relation of one incident to the next (as Luke does with Mark). Hence corresponding to this folk form or format, the Gospels are communal productions of faith, cultically and kerygmatically generated, shaped, and refined, whose authors are more editors than distinct literary personalities. S. thus turned W. WREDE's thesis on its head: Mark is not a product of an autonomous ideological development but, rather, a reflection of the multilayered experiences of the church in which the Evangelist stands. Although layers of these traditions (esp. written sources) can be chronologically delineated, they bear no intrinsic relation to what is more or less historical, for it is the very nature of folk literature to transcend the objective/subjective continuum of historical authenticity. In his "Jesus Christ" article in RGG^{2} (1929) S. added a theological touchstone: All the Gospel traditions are stamped by church folk convinced that God through the death and resurrection of Israel's Messiah has appeared on earth to establish the eschatological people of the old and new covenants. S. thus initiated much that was to be pursued in later sociological approaches (see SOCIOLOGY AND NT STUDIES) and approximated certain insights of the subsequent "new quest of the historical Jesus."

Of his many lexiconographical-theological studies of biblical concepts, S.'s greatest contribution came in the notion of the "church" (Die Kirche des Urchristentums [1927] and subsequent articles). Ecclesia, taken primarily from the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT), represents the Hebrew qāhāl (Aramaic kenischta) of Yahweh, the people of God, of which the NT church is the fulfilled HB assembly. Building on F. Kattenbusch's analysis, S. showed that in the NT in general a local congregation embodied the whole people of God. This means that the NT church presented itself as a remnant that remained solidly within Israel, yet as its fulfillment. Jesus as Messiah gathered his representatives of the twelve tribes and ultimately gave this "remnant" self-understanding over to them and to the subsequent church. PAUL acknowledged the priority of the twelve and of Jerusalem but inveighed against the excessive honoring of human personalities coordinated with the hierarchical structuring of authority. These concepts, through which S. made the church a critical theological category for NT scholarship, remained central in all of his subsequent work on the "city" and "state" and in his dialogue with M. BUBER, and provided a potent counter to the theologians of the Third Reich.

Works: Die Pfingsterzählung und das Pfingstereignis (Arbeiten zur Religionsgeschichte des Urchristentums 1, 2, 1919); Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Literarkritische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (1919, repr. 1964, 1967); "Die Stellung der Evangelien in der allgemeinen Literaturgeschichte," Eucharisterion: H. Gunkel zum 60. Geburtstage (FRLANT NF 19, ed. H. Schmidt, 1923) 2:50-134; "Die Stellung des Apostels Paulus im Urchristentum," Vorträge der theologischen Konferenz zu Giessen (39. Folge, 1924) 3-17; "Der Apostel Paulus und die antike Welt," Bibliothek Warburg, Vorträge 1924–25 (1927) 38-64; Die Kirche des Urchristentums: Festgabe für A. Deissmann (ed. K. L. Schmidt, 1927) 258-319; "Formgeschichte," RGG^{2} (1928) 2:638-40; "Geschichtsschreibung II: Im NT," RGG^{2} (1928) 2:1115-17; "Jesus Christus," RGG^{2} (1929) 3:110-51 (ET in Twentieth Century Theology in the Making [ed. J. Pelikan, 1969] 1:93-168); "Zusatz des Herausgebers der TBl zu: Evangelische Kirche und Völkerberständigung. Eine Erklärung. Von P. Althaus und E. Hirsch," TBl 10 (1931) 178-79; "basileus, basileia, etc.," TDNT (1933; ET 1964) 1:564-93; (with M. Buber), "Kirche, Staat, Volk, Judentum: Zwiegespräch im jüdischen Lehrhaus in Stuttgart im 14. Januar 1933," TBl 12 (1933) 257-74; "Zum theologischen Briefwechsel zwischen K. Barth und G. Kittel," TBl 13 (1934) 328-34; "Das Gegenüber von Kirche und Staat in der Gemeinde des Neuen Testaments: Öffentliche Antrittsvorlesung an der Universität Basel am 2. Dez. 1936," TBl 16 (1937) 1-16; "Le Ministère et les ministères dans l'église du Nouveau Testament: Les données bibliques et celles de la tradition," RHPR 17 (1937) 313-36 (GT in Neues Testament, Judentum, Kirche: Kleine Schriften (TBü 69, ed. G. Sauter 1981); "ecclesia," TDNT (1938; ET 1965) 3:501-36 = The Church: Bible Key Words (1950); Die Polis in Kirche und Welt (1939); "Der Sinn der neutestamentlichen Apostelgeschichte," In Extremis 6 (1940) 33-48; Kanonische und apokryphe Evangelien und Apostelgeschichten (ATANT 5, 1944); "Das Pneuma Hagion als Person und als Charisma," ErJb 13 (1945) 187-235; Aus der Johannes-Apokalypse, dem letzten Buch der Bibel (1946^2); Die Judenfrage im Lichte der Kapitel 9–11 des Römerbriefes (TSB 13, 1946^2); "Die Natur- und Geistkräfte im paulinischen Erkennen und Glauben," ErJb 14 (1946) 87-143; Ein Gang durch den Galaterbrief (TSB 11, 12, 1947^2); "Homo imago Dei im Alten und Neuen Testament," ErJb 15 (1947) 149-95; "Die Bildersprache in der Johannes-Apokalypse," Universitas 3 (1948) 1153-58, 1281-85; "Jerusalem als Urbild und Abbild," ErJb 18 (1950) 207-48; "Nicht über das hinaus, was geschrieben steht!" (1 Kor 4,6)," In memoriam E. Lohmeyer (ed. W. Schmauch, 1951) 101-9; Neues Testament, Judentum, Kirche: Kleine Schriften (TBü 69, ed. G. Sauter, 1981), 7 articles repr. with biographical sketch and complete bibliography.

Bibliography: O. Cullmann, TZS 12 (1956) 1-9; "K. L. S. zum 100. Geburtstag," TZ 47 (1991) 1-2. D. R. Hall, The Gospel Framework: Fact or Fiction? A Critical Evaluation of "Der Rahmen der Geschichte" by K. L. S. (1998). W. G. Kümmel, NTHIP (1970; ET 1972) 327-30, 394-95, 398, 450, 489. J. Schmid, LTK 9 (1964) 434. P. Vielhauer, 150 Jahre Rheinische Friedrich Wilhelms-Universität zu Bonn 1818–1968 (1968) 190-214 (shortened version in Neues Testament, Judentum, Kirche: Kleine Schriften (TBü 69, ed. G. Sauter, 1981) 13-36.

D. P. MOESSNER

SCHNECKENBURGER, MATTHIAS (1804–48)

Born in Thalheim b. Tuttlingen in Württemburg, Jan. 17, 1804, S. studied theology in Tübingen (1823–26), where F. C. BAUR was one of his later teachers, and in Berlin (1826–27), where F. SCHLEIERMACHER, G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), J. A. W. Neander (1789–1850), and P. Marheineke (1780–1846) were influences. From 1834 to his untimely death in 1848, S. was professor of church history and dogmatics in the newly formed university at Bern and lectured extensively in NT as well.

Although studying under some of the leading thinkers of his day, S. never belonged to a particular school of thought but steered his own course between historical skepticism and conservative PIETISM. In S.'s most influential contribution to biblical studies and the first extensive critical treatment of the purpose of Acts (1841), he broke rank with most of Acts scholarship by viewing Luke's aims as other than essentially a historical portrayal of the beginnings of the church. Rather, Luke, PAUL's coworker, wrote Acts to defend his friend against charges by Jewish Christians that Paul was destroying the law of Moses.

S.'s observations about Luke's presentation include the following: (a) Paul's confrontations throughout are with Jews who refuse his repeated appeals to them, whereas Luke avoids all mention of Paul's disputes with Jewish Christians like those in Galatia and Corinth and is virtually silent about his collection for the saints in Jerusalem (see Acts 24:17). (b) Paul lived in strict conformity to the law, even participating in and encouraging ritual observation in the Temple (e.g., Acts 21:17-27). (c) The dual visions surrounding the first gentile convert (Cornelius) through Peter's mission intersect and confirm the dual visions of Paul's calling to Jews and Gentiles. Paul thus fulfilled what JESUS commanded (Luke 24:47; Acts 1:8) and Peter enacted. (d) The extensive Peter/Paul parallels (miracles, speeches, rejections by Jews, visions, etc.) not only conform Paul to Peter but also demonstrate the continuity of the one God working equally through both. In all, what is initiated by the primitive Jerusalem community (chaps. 1–12) is completed by Paul (chaps. 13–28).

Baur hailed S.'s findings but argued that he did not go far enough in seeing that his evidence pointed to Acts as an unhistorical, conciliatory attempt to bridge the warring Petrine and Pauline parties in the second century. For S., Luke's basic historical reliability was never in question. For both S. and Baur, however, Acts must now be construed as fundamentally an apologetic Tendenzschrift.

Works: Ueber Glauben, Tradition, und Kirche (1827); Ueber das Alter der jüdischen Proselyten: Taufe und deren Zusammenhang mit dem johanneischen und christlichen Ritus. Nebst einer Beilage über die Irrlehrer zu Colossä (1828); Annotatio ad Epistolam Jacobi perpetua cum brevi tractatione isagogica (1832); Beiträge zur Einleitung ins Neue Testament und zur Erklärung seiner schwierigen Stellen (1832); Ueber das Evangelium der Aegyptier: Ein historischkritischer Versuch (1834); Ueber den Ursprung des ersten kanonischen Evangeliums: Ein kritischer Versuch (1834); Ueber den Zweck der Apostelgeschichte: Zugleich eine Ergäzung der neueren Commentare (1841); R. A. Stapferi, Theologi Bernensis, Christologia, cum appendice cognationem philosophiae Kantianae cum ecclesiae Reformatae doctrina sistente (1842); Die orthodoxe Lehre von dem doppelten Stande Christi nach lutherischer und reformierter Fassung (Tübingen Theologische Jahrbücher, 1844); De falsi Neronis fama e remore Christiano orta (1846); Zur kirchlichen Christologie: Die orthodoxe Lehre von doppelten Stande Christi nach lutherischer und reformierter Fassung (1848); "Beiträge zur Erklärung und Kritik der Apostelgeschichte," TSK 28 (1855) 498-570; Vergleichende Darstellung des lutherischen und reformierten Lehrbegriffs (ed. E. Güder, 1855); Vorlesungen über Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte (ed. T. Löhlein, 1862); Vorlesungen über die Lehrbegriffe der kleineren protestantischen Kirchenparteien (ed. C. B. Hungdeshagen, 1863).

Bibliography: E. E. Blösch, ADB 32 (1891) 86-88. E. Gelpke, Gedächtnissrede auf M. S., gehalten bei der Leichenfeier, nebst einer Grabrede von C. Wyss (1848). C. B. Hundeshagen, RE[3] 17 (1906) 666-70. A. J. Mattill, Jr., "The Purpose of Acts: S. Reconsidered," Apostolic History and the Gospel: Studies in Honor of F. F. Bruce (ed. W. W. Gasque and R. P. Martin, 1970) 108-22. E. Müller, Die Hochschule Bern 34 (FS 1884).

D. P. MOESSNER

SCHNIEWIND, JULIUS (1883–1948)

Born May 28, 1883, in Elberfeld, Germany, S. was reared in the spirit of the Rhine Lutheran revival movement. From 1901 to 1906 he studied Protestant theology in Bonn, Halle, Berlin, and Marburg. He was influenced by W. HERRMANN in Marburg and especially by F. Loofs, Lütgert, Reischle, and K. Heim in Halle; but M. KÄHLER exercised the greatest influence. In 1910 S. was promoted to lic. theol. with his dissertation, "The Concepts 'Word' and 'Gospel' in Paul," a thematic-historical study. His inaugural dissertation in 1914 analyzed "The Parallel Pericopes in Luke and John." In 1921 he became ausserordentlicher professor in Halle and in 1927 full professor in Greifswald. He went to Königsberg in 1929 but in 1935 was forced to move to Kiel; the following year he accepted a position in Halle. After 1946 he served not only as professor but also as prior of Halle and Merseberg. He died Sept. 7, 1948.

Concern with the NT concept of gospel stands at the center of S.'s scholarly work, a concern already present in his dissertation but never really brought to a conclusion. The first installment of the monograph "Evangelion" appeared in 1927 and the second in 1931 (see also his contribution in TWNT 1:56-71 and 2:573-83). The third, NT part was not printed, although G. Friedrich employed it in TWNT 2:705-35. S. achieved general recognition through his exegesis of the Gospels of Mark (1933) and Matthew (1937) in the series NTD.

Works: Die Begriffe Wort und Evangelion bei Paulus (1910); Die Parallelperikopen bei Lukas und Johannes (1914); "Evangelion: Ursprung und erste Gestalt des Begriffes Evangelium" (BFCT 2, 13.25, 1927, 1931); "Zur Synoptikerexegese," TRu 2 (1930) 129-89; Nachgelassene Reden und Aufsätze (ed. E. Kähler, 1952).

Bibliography: H.-J. Kraus, J. S.: Charisma der Theologie (1965). W. Wiefel, KD 29 (1983) 182-96.

F. W. HORN

SCHULTENS, ALBERT (1686–1750)

Born in Groningen, Aug. 22, 1686, S. began his theological study in the university there at age fourteen and moved from the study of Hebrew, Aramaic, and Syriac to Arabic. In 1706 he defended a disputation on the use of Arabic in understanding the languages of the Bible (De utilitate linguae Arabicae in interpretanda Sacra Scriptura, printed in his Opera minora). He received his doctorate in 1709 after studying at Leiden with A. RELAND, who aided in publishing his first book, a volume on Job (1708). After two years of work on manuscripts at Leiden, S. pastored at Wassenaer (1711–13) before becoming professor of oriental languages at Franeker. He returned to Leiden (1729) as rector of the Collegium theologicum, assumed a new chair in Arabic studies at the university (1732), and after 1740 was also professor of Hebrew antiquities. He died Jan. 26, 1750. Both his son Johann Jacob (1716–78) and grandson Heinrich Albert (1749–93) became orientalists and occupied the chair S. had held.

S.'s major contributions to biblical studies were linguistic and philological. Although others had used Arabic philology in biblical studies, including some medieval Jewish scholars and more recent orientalists like E. POCOCKE, S. stressed its importance to the point that he may be considered a founder of comparative Semitic linguistics. He placed Hebrew within the larger family of Semitic languages and decisively disposed of the view, widely held in the seventeenth century and even by some of his contemporaries, that Hebrew had been the primordial language of humanity. Many subsequent scholars shared his emphasis on the use of Arabic for understanding biblical Hebrew. J. D. MICHAELIS considered S. the greatest orientalist of his day.

In addition to works in Arabic studies, S. published several works in biblical studies. He edited T. Erpenius's Rudimenta lingua Arabicae (1733) and Grammatica (1748), adding a Clavis to the former, and a new edition of C. VITRINGA's commentary on Isaiah (1732). Sylloge dissertationum philologico-exegeticarum (2 vols., 1772–75) contains twenty-four dissertations directed by S., his son, and N. G. Schroeder (who taught at Groningen) that illustrate S.'s influence and the use of Arabic in biblical interpretation.

Works: Origines Hebraeae sive Hebraeae linguae antiquissima natura et indoles ex Arabiae penetralibus revocata (2 vols., 1724–38, 1761²); Institutiones ad fundamenta linguae Hebraeae (1737); Liber Jobi cum nova versione et Hebraeum fontem et commentario perpetuo (2 vols., 1737); Proverbia Salomonis (1748); Opera minora (ed. J. J. Schultens, 1769).

Bibliography: J. Brugman and F. Schröder, Arabic Studies in the Netherlands (1979). W. Genesius, Geschichte der hebräischen Sprache und Schrift (1815, repr. 1973) 126-29. H. L. Strack, NSHERK 10 (1911) 276. A. J. Wensinck, NNBW 5 (1921) 707-11.

J. H. HAYES

SCHULTZ, HERMANN (1836–1903)

Born Dec. 30, 1836, in Lüchow in Niedersachsen, S. died May 15, 1903, in Göttingen. He studied theology and philosophy at the universities of Göttingen and Erlangen (1853–56), where he heard J. von HOFMANN. After graduating with a PhD (1858), he became a Stiftsrepetent (1859) and lic. theol. as well as a Privatdozent in Göttingen (1861). In 1864 he became an ausserordentlicher professor at Basel and held professorial positions in Strasbourg (1872), Heidelberg (1874), and Göttingen (1876), where from 1890 he also held the honorary office of the abbot of Bursfelde.

S. had wide interests and was a skilled author, preacher, and Dozent, teaching not only HB and NT but also systematic and practical theology. As an HB scholar he was not original, deriving his themes from systematic theology; but he was an independent thinker, took into account the research of his day, and was apologetically responsive to the present. As a dogmatic theologian he stood, albeit cautiously, nearest to A. RITSCHL. Because he regarded Christianity as the "perfect revelation," he was interested in other religions and had influence in the developing RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE at Göttingen.

The various editions of his major work on OT THEOLOGY moderately reflected (more in terms of disposition than of substance) the dramatic history of contemporary HB scholarship, especially PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, from H. EWALD and A. KUENEN to B. DUHM and J. WELLHAUSEN. It was first published in 1869, and two new editions followed. In the first edition S. presented in three major sections the religious "fundamental facts" and "views" or "directions" of Mosaism, prophetism, and Levitism. In 1878 the section on Mosaism had become the development of the religion of Israel until the time of Ezra. The new second and third sections described the "consciousness of salvation" and the "religious view of the world," both at the end of the prophetic period. The "Levitical period," previously the third section, followed as an appendix. In 1889 this appendix was dropped and the entire work consisted of two sections: historical ("development") and systematic ("consciousness of salvation," "religious view of the world," and "hope of Israel"), in which S. intended to delineate the "quintessence of biblical religious development." The subtitle "The Religion of Revelation in Its Pre-Christian Stage of Development," indirectly characterizes the relationship not only to other religions but also to Christianity, which stands as the religion of the completed kingdom of God, i.e., the destination as opposed to the way.

The wide dissemination of S.'s work shows how strong the need was for a balance between the new historical criticism and the customary ecclesiastical theological picture of the HB. In the area of the NT he relativized the results of scholarship by proposing the thesis that faith in Christ is fully independent of the historical examination of his life.

Works: "Veteris Testamenti de hominis immortalitate sententia illustrata" (diss., Göttingen, 1860); Voraussetzungen der christlichen Lehre von der Unsterblichkeit (1861); "Die Lehre von der Gerechtigkeit aus dem Glauben im alten und neuen Bunde," JDTh 7 (1862) 510-72; "Über doppelten Schriftsinn: Eine Abhandlung zur Geschichte der Psalmen," TSK 39 (1866) 7-52; Alttestamentliche Theologie: Die Offenbarungsreligion auf ihrer vorchristlichen Entwickelungsstufe (1869, 1889⁴; ET of 4th ed., OT Theology [1892]); "Der christliche Glaube und die geschichtliche Frage des Lebens Jesu," Wissenschaftliche Vorträge über religiöse Fragen (1877) 16-48; Die Lehre von der Gottheit Christi (1881); Predigten (1882); Grundriss der Evangelischen Dogmatik (1890); Grundriss der Evangelischen Ethik (1891); Das Alte Testament und die evangelische Gemeinde (ACW 7, 1893); Grundriss der Christlichen Apologetik (1894, 1902²; ET of 2d ed., Outlines of Christian Apologetics [1905]).

Bibliography: J. H. Hayes and F. C. Prussner, OT Theology: Its History and Development (1985) 110-14. P. Ulrich, "H. S.s Alttetestamentliche Theologie im Zusammenhang seines Lebens und Werkes" (diss. theol., Göttingen, 1988). E. Vischer, *RE*³ 17 (1906) 799-804.

R. SMEND

SCHÜRER, EMIL (1844–1910)

Born May 2, 1844, in Augsburg, S. began his university studies at Erlangen and his doctoral studies at Leipzig. Sparked by the Heidelberg theologian R. Rothe, he developed a keen interest in the work of F. SCHLEIERMACHER and F. C. BAUR and in 1868 garnered his university lecturing qualifications with a thesis on Schleiermacher's theology. S. was also influenced by A. RITSCHL. In 1873 S. became a professor in Leipzig and in 1878 took a position in NT at Giessen. After spending some time at Kiel (1890) he came to Göttingen in 1895 and remained there until his death Apr. 30, 1910. He developed close ties with H. HOLTZMANN and A. von HARNACK, both major proponents of serious historical-critical investigation of the NT and of early Christian history. In 1876 he founded the important journal TLZ, which he edited (later with von Harnack) until his death.

S.'s major achievement and lifetime work was his History of the Jewish People in the Age of Jesus Christ. Arguably one of the most significant and ambitious works in NT criticism ever to be undertaken, this work established late Second Temple Judaism as a major area of study. S.'s basic premise was that the Jewish environment of late antiquity was the soil in which early Christianity grew and developed; thus any thorough understanding of the NT must be grounded in meticulous study of the Judaism of the NT period, beginning with the Maccabean era and continuing to the Bar Kochba revolt under Hadrian (175 BCE–135 CE). In contrast to many other NT scholars, S. did not deal with the Greco-Roman background of the NT but focused solely on the Jewish context. S.'s liberal Protestant theology placed great stress on JESUS and the Gospels, thus his overall concern was to explicate the background of the Jesus history, every word of which he believed to be incomprehensible apart from its Jewish framework.

S.'s History went through a series of revisions, growing considerably in the process primarily through the addition and expansion of copious footnotes and indexes. This highly acclaimed work not only became popular with Christian NT critics but was also used by Jewish scholars. Finally, between 1973 and 1987 the entire third/fourth edition was translated, revised, updated, and corrected by a team of scholars under the editorship of G. Vermes, F. Millar, and M. Black. This final edition remains fundamentally S.'s scholarship, and although references to new discoveries have been added and the discussion has been brought up to date on numerous points, the basic thrust and structure of the original History are intact.

The History has three main sections: political history, cultural and spiritual life of the Jews, and life among the Jews in the diaspora and the extant Jewish literature of the era, concluding with an extended discussion of PHILO. S.'s work was a significant advance in the scholarship of the period; he used the full range of available Jewish texts, including not only rabbinic sources but also the pseudepigraphic Jewish works (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA), a move that gave impetus to this growing area of Jewish studies. He made extensive use of papyrology, ARCHAEOLOGY, and numismatics. His detailed work resulted in a virtual compendium of research on late Judaism, giving the History an encyclopedic quality.

The History has been criticized: S. was too systematic and as a result failed to take note of the inner connections between events. He used rabbinic sources with questionable relevance at times and, while familiar with the Mishnah, was dependent on other scholars for his Talmudic references (see TALMUD). He limited his discussions of the religious aspects of Judaism of the NT period to the law and messianism. S. responded that these two aspects captured the fundamental nature of late Judaism and that the growth of the Pharisaic movement, the most significant religious development in the Judaism of this period, argued for the primacy of the law in his treatment. Furthermore, and perhaps most important, he was most concerned with the aspects of Judaism that helped illuminate the Gospels. This meant that discussion of law and messianism was paramount since both were focal points for the ministry and conception of Jesus.

S. had a particular nineteenth-century Protestant conception of Judaism as being ultimately grounded in legalism, and his work in the History is fundamentally a history of Judaism given from his perspective of NT studies. His overall interests in the history of Judaism are expressed more clearly in two short studies: Jesus' connection to the OT and to Judaism (1882) and Jesus' messianic self-consciousness (1903). S. argued that, on the one hand, Jesus was firmly grounded in the Jewish world of his time and took on specific messianic conceptions. On the other hand, with Jesus there was also a new ethical reevaluation of the political messianic categories, which were infused with the consciousness that he was a "child of God." Here S.'s liberal Ritschlian theology met his historical-critical study. For him the JOHANNINE portrayal of Jesus was crucial; in his 1889 study of the Gospel the discussion of the Johannine Jesus is clearly influenced by S.'s own liberal agenda. This article provides not only a good summary of nineteenth-century scholarship on John but also links S. with Tübingen Tendenz criticism in his treatment of the apostle John's movement from a law-observant to a law-critical position.

Works: Schleiermacher's Religionsbegriff und die philosophischen Voraussetzungen desselben (1868); Die Predigt Jesu Christi in ihrem Verhältnis zum Alten Testament und zum Judenthum (1882); Über den gegenwärtigen Stand der johanneischen Frage (1889); Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi (3d/4th ed., 1901–9; ET, HJPAJC [3 vols. in 4, rev. G. Vermes, F. Millar, M. Black, 1973–87]); Das messianische Selbstbewusstsein Jesu Christi (1903).

Bibliography: E. Bammel, "E. S.: Der Begünder der Wissenschaft vom Spätjudentum," Deutsches Pfarrerblatt 60 (1960) 225-26. M. Hengel, "Der Alte und der Neue 'Schürer,' " JSS 35 (1990) 19-72 (see 20-31 for good biography of S.). S. B. Hoenig, "The New S.," JQR 67 (1976) 47-54. G. F. Moore, "Christian Writers on Judaism," HTR 14 (1921) 237-41. M. Stern, "A New English S.," JJS 25 (1974) 419-24. A. Titius, RE[3] 24 (1913) 460-66.

T. C. PENNER

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT (1875–1965)

Born Jan. 14, 1875, in Kaysersberg, Alsace, S. was the son of a liberal Protestant pastor who settled in Günsbach, a farming village between Colmar and Münster, which became S.'s beloved home. In 1928 he built a house there that today contains the Schweitzer-Zentralarchiv and a museum.

Upon completion of his Abitur in 1893, S. attended the University of Strasbourg, where he studied theology and philosophy, spending a semester each in Paris and Berlin. His philosophy teachers were W. Windelband and T. Ziegler. In theology the noteworthy NT scholar H. HOLTZMANN was a dominant influence. S. also pursued his great musical talent, taking instruction in the organ with C. Widor in Paris; as a virtuoso artist S. later gave concerts in all the great cities of Europe. On Pentecost 1896, however, he made a decision to follow a vocation of humanitarian service after reaching thirty years of age, without yet knowing what that would be.

S. held doctorates from three Strasbourg faculties: philosophical (with a dissertation on I. Kant's philosophy of religion [1899]), theological (with a dissertation on the problem of the Lord's Supper [1901]), and medical (with a dissertation on the psychiatric study of Jesus [1913]). He became a Dozent in 1902 on the strength of his Habilitationschrift Das Messianitäts-und Leidensgeheimnis Jesu (1901); after 1912 he became a professor. With two theological exams (1898 and 1900) he had become eligible to pastor in the Protestant church of Alsace. The multitude of his interests and an unbelievable capacity for work permitted him between 1900 and 1912 to fulfill simultaneously the duties of vicar of St. Nicholas in Strasbourg, Dozent in the evangelical theological faculty, director of the Thomasstift, organist for the Bach society in Paris with regular concerts, and student of medicine (1905–12). In addition, he wrote his most important books during this period.

In the autumn of 1904 S. decided to go to Gabun in central Africa as a medical doctor in the service of the Paris Mission Society in response to an appeal over the distress of the Congo Mission. On his first trip there in 1913 with his wife, Helene, a trained medical nurse, he built and financed a hospital in Lambarene on the Ogowe River that would become a symbol of humanity and that still exists. This work ended temporarily with WWI but was begun again after 1924 with steadily growing success. On his trip to the United States in 1949 and on many European trips, S. collected money for his work through lectures, concerts, and record sales, which soon made him world famous. He received a great number of awards and turned down calls to the universities in Leipzig and Zürich. He worked as the chief doctor in Lambarene for approximately fifty years, where he died at age ninety, Sept. 4, 1965.

S. was and remained at the center of his existence a theologian (see E. Grässer [1979]; conversely, H. Gross [1974]). He held fast to and carried out his office of pastor throughout his life, regarding preaching as an "inner need" (Werke [1971, 1974^2] 1:44; 5:472). His going to Africa as a medical doctor was no flight from theology; he understood his mission work as a call to follow JESUS. Even his philosophy, "the ethic of reverence for life," he termed "the universal, encompassing ethic of love. It is the perceived ethic of Jesus expressed in necessarily thoughtful form" (Werke 1:241). He was distrustful of confessional faith. "Piety, not 'faith,' is the foundation of religion. Piety is the energy of faith" (letter of Nov. 11, 1960, to H. Casparis). Piety for S. was the lived thought of the kingdom of God, the commission to work in the spirit of Jesus in such a way as to realize the Kingdom (see Grässer, 206). He was persuaded that he was fulfilling this commission in Lambarene.

S. was unwilling to serve a scientific, academic quest for knowledge by means of abstract thought. Instead he always asked of what and to whom was knowledge of use. Knowledge should dispense with the "dangerous questions," which in the case of the Lord's Supper meant that HERMENEUTICS had to ensure that modern Christians could celebrate communion without ceasing to think (see Grässer, 38). This pastoral responsibility of the academic theologian S. knitted seamlessly into his view of the philosopher, musician, and physician. Here, too, appropriateness was the actual goal of knowledge (see W. Picht [1960; ET 1964] 43); thus it is no accident that S. the philosopher turned to I. KANT, in whose work the concept of "moral humanity" emerges. There S. recognized his life's theme, and the young doctoral candidate brought out in his first literary work how Kant, on the one hand, capitulated in the face of the riddle of the ethical and how, on the other hand, he grasped ethics as the possibility of human beings' coming to self-fulfillment (see E. Grässer [1979] 35).

Ethics dominated S.'s thought throughout his life. After winning the Nobel Peace Prize in 1952, he became the spokesperson for humanity through passionate appeals for the abolishment of all atomic testing and weapons. Although this stand cost him much respect among politicians, it raised his moral authority with the world population.

As a theologian S. was above all a scholar of Jesus and of PAUL. With his Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung from 1906 and 1913, his name was forever listed with the great scholars. The book is a brilliantly written settling of accounts with the fabricated lives of Jesus from H. S. REIMARUS (1694–1768) to W. WREDE (1859–1906). Into their place steps the historical Jesus, who announces the imminence of the kingdom of God and then takes this immediate eschatological expectation with him to his death, thus setting free for us the ethical motivation to preach the kingdom of God: Insofar as we act in the spirit of Jesus, we build on his kingdom. This thesis did not, however, gain acceptance.

In his books on Paul, S. developed a thoroughgoing eschatological interpretation of the NT with two results. First, Paul is misunderstood if one explains him from the standpoint of Hellenism; instead, he stands completely under the influence of early Jewish APOCALYPTICISM, a realization that today has become widely accepted. Second, one does not have to choose between Jesus and Paul. After Easter, Paul thought through objectively the message of Jesus as an "ethical Christ mysticism," thereby making Christianity historically viable. The easily misunderstood term mysticism was for S. "only another expression of the eschatological concept of salvation" (Werke 4:166). This idea was central to Paul; the theology of justification was only a secondary doctrine. Paul even intended that one's salvation through Christ result in action. "Action-eschatology" is the catchword (Werke 4:307) that points to the fact that the Christian message is ethics.

Works: Die Religionsphilosophie Kants von der Kritik der reinen Vernunft bis zur Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft (1899, repr. 1974; ET, The Essence of Faith: Philosophy of Religion [1966]); Das Abendmahlsproblem auf Grund der wissenschaftlichen Forschung des 19. Jahrhunderts und der historischen Berichte (1901, 1929[2]; ET, The Problem of the Lord's Supper According to the Scholarly Research of the Nineteenth Century and the Historical Accounts [1982]); Das Messianitäts- und Leidensgeheimnis: Eine Skizze des Lebens Jesu (1901, 1956[3]; ET The Mystery of the Kingdom of God: The Secret of Jesus' Messiahship and Passion [1914]); (with H. Gillot), J. S. Bach, le musicien-poète (1905); Deutsche und französische Orgelbaukunst und Orgelkunst (1906, 1968[3]); Von Reimarus zu Wrede: Eine Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1906; ET The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede [1910, 1968], with intro. by J. M. Robinson, xi-xxxiii; 2nd. Ger. ed. expanded, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung [1913, 1951[6]], with new Vorrede; UTB 1302 [2 vols., 1966[7]], with "Einführung" by J. M. Robinson); Johann Sebastian Bach (1908, 1977[13]; ET 1911); Geschichte der Paulinischen Forschung von der Reformation bis auf die Gegenwart (1911, 1933[2]; ET Paul and His Interpreters [1912]); J. S. Bach: Complete Organ Works. A Critico-practical Edition (8 vols., 1912–67); Die psychiatrische Beurteilung Jesu (1913; ET The Psychiatric Study of Jesus [1948]); Das Christentum und die Weltreligionen (1923; ET Christianity and the Religions of the World [1923]); Verfall und Wiederaufbau der Kultur: Kulturphilosophie I (1923; ET, The Decay and Restoration of Civilization [1923, 1932[2]]); Kultur und Ethik: Kulturphilosophie II (1923; ET Civilization and Ethics [1946]); Aus meiner Kindheit und Jugendzeit (1924; ET Memoirs of Childhood and Youth [1924]); Selbstdarstellung (1929); Die Mystik des Apostels Paulus (1930, 1981), with "Einführung" by W. G. Kümmel (ET, The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle [1931]); Aus meinem Leben und Denken (1931; ET, My Life and Thought [1933]); Die Weltanschauung der indischen Denker (1935, 1965[2]; ET, Indian Thought and Its Development [1936]); Goethe: Vier Reden (1950, 1970[2]; ET, Goethe: Four Studies [1949]); Das Problem des Friedens in der heutigen Welt (1954; ET, The Problem of Peace in the World Today [1954]); Friede oder Atomkrieg: Drei Appelle (1958, enl. 1984[3]; ET, Peace or Atomic War [1958]); Strassburger Predigten (ed. U. Neuenschwander, 1966; ET, Reverence for Life [1970]); Reich Gottes und Christentum (ed. U. Neuenschwander, 1967, expanded ed. 1995; ET, The Kingdom of God and Primitive Christianity [1968]); Ausgewählte Werke (5 vols., ed. R. Grabs, 1971, 1974[2]); Was sollen wir tun? Zwölf Predigten über ethische Probleme (ed. M. Strege and L. Stiehm, 1974; ET, A Place for Revelation: Sermons on the Reverence for Life [1988]); A. S.: Leben, Werk und Denken, 1905–65. Mitgeteilt in seinen Briefen (ed. H. W. Bähr, 1987); Gespräche über das Neue Testament (ed. W. Döbertin, 1988); A. S., H. Bresslau: Die Jahre von Lambarene. Briefe 1902–12 (ed. R. Schweitzer Miller, G. Woytt, 1992).

Bibliography: H. W. Bähr, A. S.: Sein Denken und sein Weg (1962). H. Clark, The Ethical Mysticism of A. S.: A Study of the Sources and Significance of S.'s Philosophy of Civilization (1962). E. Grässer, A. S. als Theologe (1979); "A. S. und R. Bultmann: Ein Beitrag zur historischen Jesusfrage," R. Bultmanns Werk und Wirkung (ed. B. Jaspert, 1984) 53-69. N. S. Griffith and L. Pearson, A. S.: An International Bibliography (1981). H. Gross, A. S.: Grösse und Grenzen. Eine kritische Würdigung des Forschers und Denkers (1974). C. Guenzler, A. S.: Einführung in sein Denken (1996). J. L. Ice, S.: Prophet of Radical Theology (1971). O. Kraus, A. S.: Sein Werk und seine Weltanschauung (1926). W. G. Kümmel, "A. S. als Jesus- und Paulusforscher," Heilsgeschehen und Geschichte: Gesammelte Aufsätze 1965–77 (1978) 1-11. D. E. Nineham, "S. Revisited," Explorations in Theology 1 (1977) 112-33. W. Picht, A. S.: Wesen und Bedeutung (1960; ET, The Life and Thought of A. S. [1964]). G. Seavers, A. S.: The Man and His Mind (1969[6]). H. Steffahn, A. S. in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten (1979).

E. GRÄSSER

SCHWENCKFELD, CASPAR VON (1489–1561)

A Silesian noble turned lay theologian, S. was one of the first serious critics of LUTHER and a significant Quietist Reformer. For much of his adult life he traveled from place to place disseminating his brand of spirituality. In addition, he wrote some 1,250 tracts circulated in print or manuscript form. He is generally counted a spiritualist; nonetheless, Scripture was central in shaping his thought—whether as a text to be studied and used as a norm for Christian belief and conduct or in its internal force as the life-giving Word of God. Numerous citations in almost all of his tracts attest to the significance of Scripture, which he accepted as "records of the word which has been prompted" by God.

Under the influence of AUGUSTINE and J. Tauler, S. distinguished between external and internal word, arguing that the spoken or transitory word is Word of God in a derived sense only. By contrast, the inner Word, i.e., Christ in his celestial nature, is life-giving seed, bread of the soul, water, or spirit. To unregenerate persons Scripture remains a closed book, while to a believing and regenerate heart the Holy Spirit will unveil its mystery unto "edification, discipline, improvement, and punishment." In debate with ANABAPTISTS during the 1540s, S. increasingly upheld Scripture as norm giving, authoritative, and christocentric; but he continued to stress its spiritual, internal dimension. Several of his tracts were devoted exclusively to the place and AUTHORITY of Scripture: De Cursu Verbi Dei (1527), Von der hailigen Schrifft (1551), Vom Evangelio Christi (1552).

Works: The Piety of C. S. (tr. E. J. Furcha, 1969); Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum (19 vols. ed. C. D. Hartranft et al., 1907–61).

Bibliography: P. Erb (ed.), S. and Early Schwenkfeldianism (1986). E. J. Furcha, S.'s Concept of the New Man (1970). R. E. McLaughlin, C. S.: Reluctant Radical. His Life to 1540 (1986). P. L. Maier, C. S. on the Person and Work of Christ (1959). S. G. Schultz, C. S. von Ossig (1489–1561): Spiritual Interpreter of Christianity, Apostle of the Middle Way, Pioneer in Modern Religious Thought (1977).

E. J. FURCHA

SCOFIELD, CYRUS INGERSON (1843–1921)

Born near Clinton, Michigan, Aug. 19, 1843, S. was reared as an Episcopalian in Lebanon, Tennessee. After service in the Civil War (1861–65) he moved to St. Louis, Missouri, where he studied law, and then to Atchison, Kansas (1869–75), where he practiced law and was involved in politics. Leaving his family, he returned to St. Louis, where he later experienced a conversion (1879), became associated with the D. Moody revival movement, and joined the Congregational Church. His church and religious work took him to Dallas, Texas, where he served a church (1882–95), organized mission work, began a correspondence Bible course, participated in Bible conferences, and wrote Rightly Dividing the Word of Truth (1888), a dispensational premillennial work. After a pastorate in Northfield, Massachusetts (1895–1902), and a return to the Dallas church (1902–7), he settled on Long Island near New York City, continuing correspondence programs and work at Bible conferences until his death, July 24, 1921.

S.'s major impact on biblical interpretation was the publication of his reference Bible (by Oxford University Press) in 1909 (expanded ed. 1917, rev. 1967). The Scofield Reference Bible was based on a theory of seven dispensations through which history providentially unfolds: the dispensations of (1) innocence (Gen 1:28–3:13); (2) conscience (Gen 3:23–7:23); (3) human government (Gen 8:20–11:9); (4) promise (Gen 12:1–Exod 19:8); (5) law (Exod 19:8–); (6) grace, inaugurated with the death and resurrection of JESUS; and (7) the final dispensation to be inaugurated with the pretribulation rapture of the church, the great tribulation, and the return of Christ to establish the millennial kingdom. S.'s Bible was a major publishing success. In addition, he edited the tercentenary edition of the Bible for Oxford University Press (1911).

Works: Rightly Dividing the Word of Truth (1888 and frequent later eds.); No Room in the Inn (1913); The New Life in Christ (1915); What Do the Prophets Say? (1918); Things New and Old (1920); In Many Pulpits (1922).

Bibliography: J. M. Cranfield, The Incredible S. and His Book (1988). A. C. Gaebelein, "The Story of the Scofield Reference Bible," Moody Monthly (October 1942–March 1943). S. R. Spencer, HHMBI, 610-615. C. G. Trumbull, The Life Story of C. I. S. (1920).

J. H. HAYES

SEELEY, JOHN ROBERT (1834–95)

A secular historian and essayist with a keen interest in religion, S. studied classics at Cambridge. He became professor of Latin at University College, London, and after 1869 professor of modern history at Cambridge, where he wrote chiefly on European politics and the British Empire.

In 1865 S. published the anonymous Ecce Homo, and it was mainly through the controversy associated with this book that he came to exert an influence on Victorian biblical study. Unacquainted with German criticism and skillfully postponing questions about miracles or the deity of Christ to a promised but never completed second volume, he drew selectively on the Gospels to present Christ as a sublime moralist animated by "the enthusiasm of humanity." Coming after the skeptical works of D. F. STRAUSS and J. RENAN, Ecce Homo demonstrated that a purportedly historical, non-dogmatic portrait of Christ need not inevitably clash with the claims of orthodoxy.

Works: David and Samuel, with Other Poems (1859); Ecce Homo: A Survey of the Life and Work of Christ (1865); Lectures and Essays (1870); Natural Religion (1882).

Bibliography: D. L. Pals, "The Reception of Ecce Homo," HMPEC 46 (1977) 63-84. G. W. Prothero, DNB 17 (1897) 1128-31. D. Wormell, Sir J. S. and the Uses of History (1980) 12-47.

D. L. PALS

SEELIGMANN, ISAC LEO (1907–82)

A Jewish and Israeli historian and biblicist, S. was born in Amsterdam and studied classics at Leiden and Judaica at the Amsterdam Rabbinical Seminary, where he later taught. During WWII he escaped Nazi extermination through the intervention of his teacher F. de Liagre Böhl but was imprisoned with his family in Theresienstadt. In 1950 he settled in Jerusalem and taught at the Hebrew University until his retirement in 1976.

S.'s primary field of research was the SEPTUAGINT (LXX), which he studied as documents of Hellenistic Judaism. From it he recovered original and secondary Hebrew readings that attest to the development of biblical literature and religion. Studying Hebrew mentality, he detected in the Bible the beginnings of MIDRASH exegesis, pointing out its awareness of the double meaning of words and its use of wordplay. He studied the semantics of key terms in biblical thought (e.g., yš'), tracing their secular origin and subsequent theological application.

S. maintained that the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY was never a unified work but grew out of repeated editorial interventions and interpolations. He disproved the mechanistic use of formulas as indicators of literary genres and considered many etiological elements to be secondary accretions to biblical narratives. As a text critic (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM) he upheld the legitimacy of emendation by conjecture, if founded on ascertained phenomena of corruption, contextual interpretation, and history of thought. Within Jewish scholarship, S. opposed theological attitudes to the Bible, apologetics, harmonistic interpretations, and philosophical deductions. His approach was philological in the European sense and historical throughout.

Works: "Problemen en perspectieven in het moderne Septuaginta onderzoek," JEOL 7 (1939–42) 359-90, 763-76 (ET: "Problems and Perspectives in Modern Septuagint Research," Textus 15 [1990] 163-232); The Septuagint Version of Isaiah: A Discussion of Its Problems (1948); "Voraussetzungen der Midraschexegese," VTSup 1 (1953) 150-81; "Hebräische Erzählung und biblische Geschichtesschreibung," TZ 18 (1962) 305-25; "Menschliches Heldentum und göttliche Hilfe: Die doppelte Kausalität im alttestamentliche Geschichtsdenken," TZ 19 (1963) 385-411; "Zur Terminologie für das Gerichtsverfahren im Wortschatz des biblischen Hebräisch," VTSup 17 (1967) 251-78; I. L. S. Volume (3 vols., ed. Y. Zakovitch and A. Rofé, 1982) 1:11-18 (complete bibliography to 1982); Collected Essays (ed. A. Hurvitz et al., 1992) Hebrew.

Bibliography: R. Hanhart, "In memoriam I. L. S.," BIOSCS 16 (Fall 1983) 1. A. Rofé, "I. L. S.: Teacher and Scholar," I. L. S. Volume (3 vols., ed. Y. Zakovitch and A. Rofé, 1982) 1:1-9 (Hebrew). In Memory of Prof. I. L. S. (Institute of Jewish Studies at the Hebrew University, 1983) Hebrew.

A. ROFÉ

SELDEN, JOHN (1584–1654)

Educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, S. was called to the bar in 1612. He sat in several Parliaments, where he was often called upon to give legal opinions. An irenic Puritan, in 1643 he became one of the thirty lay accessors of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, often confounding his fellow members by appealing to the Hebrew and Greek text of Scripture. His skills as lawyer, historian, linguist, and orientalist, together with his concern for contemporary politics were all used in his many writings.

As an orientalist S. wrote on the background to Israelite religion, partly in dialogue with the humanist assumptions of European scholars like H. GROTIUS. His widely acclaimed work on idolatry, De Dis Syris (1617), a catalog of references in classical sources, was supposedly neutral; but his allegorizing of some ancient deities showed the superiority of the God of Israel. Much of S.'s writing on the Bible was an attempt to show how decisions, both legal and ecclesiastical, on such subjects as church organization, marriage and divorce, the calendar, and inheritance should be consistent with biblical legal texts understood in their own contexts and in their plain meaning, thus creating an effective methodology for refuting partisan interpretations.

S. was familiar with variant readings, especially between the MT and the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT), and was able to exploit them for his own exegetical purposes. He also knew the TARGUMIM and later rabbinic sources, especially the legal codification of MAIMONIDES (whom he quoted, e.g., tithing to the Temple ceased at its destruction in 70 CE [1618, 21]). His History of Tithes was suppressed because he proposed that tithes were not a continuing divine prerogative, although tithing should still be practiced. In Table Talk he spoke in favor of contextual exegesis that takes account of the author's original intention and, with delightful anti-clericalism, noted that "laymen have best interpreted the hard places in the Bible." His valuable collection of books went to the Bodleian Library.

Works: De Dis Syris syntagmata duo (1617); Historie of Tithes (1618); De successionibus in bona defuncti ad leges Ebraeorum (1631); De successione in pontificatum Ebraeorum (1636); De jure naturali et gentium iuxta disciplinam Ebraeorum (1640); De anno civili et calendario veteris ecclesiae seu reipublicae Judaicae (1644); Uxor ebraica seu de nuptiis et divortiis ex iura civili, id est, divino et talmudico, veterum Ebraeorum (1646); De synedriis et praefecturis iuridicis veterum Ebraeorum (1650–55); Table Talk (1689; ed. F. Pollock, 1927); Opera Omnia (3 vols. in 6, ed. D. Wilkins, 1726), includes a biography in 1, 1, i-lvi and indexes of scriptural references.

Bibliography: J. Aikin, The Lives of J. S., Esq., and Archbishop Usher (1812). BB 6 (1763) 3605-624. D. S. Berkowitz, J. S.'s Formative Years (1988). E. G. M. Fletcher, John Selden, 1584–1654 (Selden Society Lecture, 1969). E. Fry, DNB 51 (1897) 212-24. I. Herzog, "J. S. and Jewish Law," Journal of Comparative Legislation 3 (1931) 236-45 = his Judaism: Law and Ethics (1974) 67-79. G. W. Johnson, Memoirs of the Life of J. S. and Notices of the Political Contest During His Time (1835). J. Le Clerc, "J. S., De diis Syris syntagmata," BC 7 (1705) 80-288; "J. S., Table Talk," BAM 6 (1716) 251-324; "J. S., Opera omnia," BAM 25 (1726) 331-414; MSHH, 5 (1728) 21-41. M. J. Mulder, "Von S. bis Schaeffer: Die Erforschung der kanaanäischen Götterwelt," UF 11 (1979) 655-71. J. R. Ziskind, J. S. on Jewish Marriage Law: The "Uxor Hebraica" (1991).

G. J. BROOKE

SELLIN, ERNST FRANZ MAX JOHANNES FRIEDRICH WILHELM (1867–1946)

A German OT scholar and archaeologist, born Mar. 26, 1867, S. was the son of a pastor in Altschwerin. He studied theology and oriental languages in Rostock, Erlangen, and Leipzig. Among his most important teachers were the orientalists F. Philippi, F. von Spiegel, L. Krehl, and Friedrich DELITZSCH and the HB scholar A. Köhler. S. received a PhD in Leipzig (1888) and his lic. theol. in Erlangen (1890). In 1894 he became a tutor in Erlangen, where in 1895 he habilitated in theology. He was called to the evangelical theological faculty in Vienna as an ausserordentlicher professor of HB in 1897 and in 1899 was named full professor. In 1908 he went to Rostock, in 1913 to Kiel, and in 1921 to Berlin. He edited KAT from 1913.

S. had a reputation as an impressive instructor and lecturer. He attained emeritus status in 1935 but was prevented from further public service because of his opposition to National Socialism. After Berlin was bombed in 1943 he returned to Thuringia. In 1945 he was asked to take up his professorial duties again but died Jan. 1, 1946.

S. was an archaeologist, a commentator, a historian, a theologian, a scholar of introductory studies, and an apologist for the HB. Coming from a theologically conservative Lutheran background, he practiced historical-critical research with a preference for genre analysis and the comparative study of religious history. Given to the construction of hypotheses, he was sensitive to changes in the state of research, and was able to relinquish some of his views quickly or to modify them, as reflected in the different editions of his works. He was especially concerned with the identity of the servant of God in Deutero-Isaiah, identifying this figure alternatively with Zerubbabel, Jehoiachin, and Moses before finally accepting K. ELLIGER's view (dominant in the last half of the twentieth century) that the servant was the prophet himself.

S. was the main German representative in Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY in the first half of the twentieth century. In 1902 he dug at Tel Ta' annek (Taanach). The discovery of clay tablets in the final season led to an additional season in 1904 that brought to light further texts. Together with C. Watzinger, S. carried out excavations in 1907 at Tell es-Sultan, the HB city of Jericho. His archaeological methods were pre-stratigraphic and for that reason were often criticized, but they were "pioneer efforts of great importance" (G. E. Wright, [1967] 84).

S. wrote a number of studies that became standard works. Besides a commentary on the Minor Prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), his introduction, all seven editions of which were done by S., document a large portion of the history of research. His presentation of Israelite-Judean history, which was preceded by several special investigations, relied very much on extrabiblical sources and archaeological finds, following the model of R. KITTEL. S. found the theological dimension of Israel's history in the unique appearance of personalities like Moses and the prophets, by means of whom divine revelation entered into history. A third volume intended to present the history of the Hellenistic-Roman period remained unwritten. S.'s OT THEOLOGY consisted of historical and systematic parts in order to be consistent with the inseparable unity of the history of religion and theology. Within the HB S. argued for the coexistence of a national cultic religion and a prophetic-moral-universal religion that would find its goal in the revelation in Jesus Christ.

More than once S. argued decisively against those who doubted the canonical status (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) of the HB, whether from a theological point of view (see A. von Harnack; Friedrich Delitsch) or from antisemitic and racist ideology. Even in this case he argued in a hermeneutically questionable fashion, distinguishing between a dispensable national Jewish religion of the cult and a relevant moral-prophetic religion. He proved to be correct in his observation that the National Socialistic campaign against the HB was essentially anti-Christian.

Works: Die verbal-nominale Doppelnatur der hebräischen Participien und Infinitive (1889); Disputatio de origine carminum, quae primus psalterii liber continet (1892); Beiträge zur israelitischen und jüdischen Religionsgeschichte (2 vols., 1896–97); Serubbabel (1898); Studien zur Entstehungsgeschichte der jüdischen Gemeinde nach dem babylonischen Exil (2 vols., 1901); Tell ta' annek (1904); Die biblische Urgeschichte (1905, 1913²); Der Ertrag der Ausgrabungen im Orient für die Erkenntnis der Entwicklung der Religion Israels (1905); Eine Nachlese auf dem tell Ta' annek in Palästina (1905); Die Spuren griechischer Philosophie im Alten Testament (1905); Das israelitsche Ephod (1906); Die alttestamentliche Religion im Rahmen der andern altorientalischen (1908); Das Rätsel des deuterojesajanischen Buches (1908); Die israelitisch-jüdische Heilandserwartung (1909); Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1910; ET 1923, 1935⁷; from 1950⁸ reworked by L. Rost; from 1965¹⁰, fully rewritten by G. Fohrer); Der alttestamentliche Prophetismus (1912); Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1912); (with C. Watzinger), Jericho (1913); Gilgal: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Einwanderung Israels in Palästina (1917); Das Problem des Hiobbuches (1919); Das Alte Testament und die evangelische Kirche der Gegenwart (1921); Mose und seine Bedeutung für die israelitisch-jüdische Religionsgeschichte (1922); Das Zwölfprophetenbuch I. II (KAT 12, 1922, 1929/30$^{2-3}$); Wie wurde Sichem eine israelitische Stadt? (n.d. [1922]); Geschichte des israelitisch-jüdischen Volkes I (1924, 1935^{2}); Das Hiobproblem (1931); Abschaffung des Alten Testaments? (1932); Alttestamentliche Theologie auf religionsgeschichtlicher Grundlage, vol. 1, Israelitisch-jüdische Religionsgeschichte (1933); vol. 2, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1933, 1936^{2}); Das Alte Testament im christlichen Gottesdienst und Unterricht (1936).

Bibliography: H. Gunkel, RGG^{2} 5 (1931) 417-18. O. Eissfeldt, Af0 15 (1945–51) 189 = his "Die Komposition der Sinai-Erzählung, Exod 19–34," KS 3 (1966) 129-30. L. Rost, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (E. Sellin and L. Rost, 1950^{8}) III-IV. F. Maass, RGG^{3} 5 (1961) 1688; EKL 4 (1961) 804. G. E. Wright, ZDPV 83 (1967) 84-85. G. Sauer, "E. S. in Wien," JGPrÖ 96 (1980) 138-46; S.-Festschrift: Beiträge zur Religionsgeschichte und Archäologie Palästinas (1927).

W. THIEL

SEMIOTICS

The British philosopher J. LOCKE was apparently the first modern philosopher to use the word semeiotike for the doctrine of signs and in particular for the study of words (1690, 1959, 4.21.4). C. Peirce first brought the term into general use in his work on logic (1932, 2:227). Semeiotikos was used by the Greeks to refer to a person skilled in interpreting signs, and medical writers used the term for diagnosis and prognosis. The philosopher Sextus Empiricus (Adv. Log. 1.25) wrote of a person who was a "semiotician" and therefore claimed to be able to make inferences from observable signs. "Semiotics" has been adopted by the International Association of Semiotic Studies for the study of any sign system with no necessary dependence on linguistics (U. Eco [1979] 30). Eco (9-13) notes that the discipline can concern itself with such fields as the communicative behavior of animals, olfactory signs, tactile communication (e.g., a kiss), musical codes, natural and formalized languages, and cultural codes (e.g., etiquette systems).

The Stoics, as described by Sextus (Adv. Log. 2.11, 12), made some basic distinctions that remain in use by many semioticians today: "They [the Stoics] say three things correspond to one another: what is signified, what signifies and what is the reality [happening—object or event]. Of these, on the one hand, the signifier is the sound such as 'Dion.' The signified, on the other hand, is the thing itself made known by the sound which [i.e., the thing] we perceive as corresponding to our understanding. But the barbarians do not understand even though they hear the sound. The reality is that which exists outside—e.g., Dion himself."

Peirce spoke of a sign as "something that stands to somebody for something in some respect or capacity" (2:228). The object is what the sign stands for (e.g., Dion himself in the quote above). The interpretant is what the sign creates in the mind of another person (what is "signified" in the example above). A sign stands for an object, not in all respects, but in reference to an idea that Peirce called the "ground" of a sign. A sign cannot describe all the characteristics of an object but has to make a selection of those characteristics. Peirce related the interpretant to human conduct (see N. Kretzmann [1967] 395-96).

F. de Saussure, one of the pioneers of modern linguistics, similarly distinguished between signifier (the imprint the sign makes on our senses) and signified. The relation between the two is arbitrary. In other words, a word can mean whatever the users of a language choose it to mean (1928^{2}, 98-100). De Saussure also distinguished between langue (the system of a language) and parole (the use of a language in a given situation; 37). A word like parable can be investigated on the abstract level of its use in English (langue). It can also be investigated as to its use in a particular sentence of the English language as uttered by a person at a specific time (parole).

K. Bühler, the German linguist and psychologist, developed a model of language understood as an organum (tool; cf. Plato Cratylus 388b) with which a person communicates something about things to another person (1932, 1982^{2}, 24-25). In his model Bühler includes the sign, the sender, the receiver, and the realm of objects and relations. The sign is a "symbol" of the objects and relations that it expresses. It is a "symptom" because of its dependence on a sender whose inner state it expresses. It is also a "signal" because of its appeal to the hearer, whose outer and inner behavior it guides (like traffic signals; 28). Corresponding to the concepts symbol, symptom, and signal, Bühler also uses the equivalent terms representation, expression, and appeal.

The behavioral psychologist C. Morris used a semiotics similar to Bühler's. He defined pragmatics as the study of "the relation of signs to interpreters." Semantics is the study of the "relations of signs to the objects to which the signs are applicable," and syntactics is the study of the "formal relations of signs to one another" (1946, 217-18). Morris gave a behavioral interpretation of the sign process: A sign sets up in an interpreter the disposition to react in a certain kind of way (the interpretant) to a certain kind of object (the signification) under certain conditions (the context). Taking the dance of bees as an example Morris called the dance itself the sign; the other bees influenced by the dance are interpreters; the disposition of the bees to react in a certain way to the dance is the interpretant; the object (e.g., food or exploring new hive locations) toward which the bees are prepared to react is the signification; and the context is the position of the hive (1964, 2-3; see 1946, 17-18).

The philosopher G. Klaus included four categories in his semiotic model (1973, 47, 56): the objects of mental reflection (things, qualities, relations), linguistic signs, mental images, and people who use and understand signs. The objects are what are referred to by the signs. For example a word like angel can refer to the angel Gabriel (the object). The word angel has a conceptual meaning—what Klaus calls a mental image. He defines syntax as the relation of one sign to another or R(S,S′), where R stands for relation, S stands for sign, and S′ stands for other signs. Sigmatics is the relation between signs and the objects of mental reflection or R(S,O), where O stands for objects. Semantics is the relation between signs and mental images or R(S,I), where I is the mental image. Pragmatics is the relation between signs and people R(S,U), where U is the user. Klaus integrated the above categories in another article (1969, 978) in which he defined pragmatics to be a four-place relation between the senders (or receivers) of the sign, the sign itself, its meaning, and its reference. If one abstracts from the sender and the receiver, then semantics is the relation between signs and meanings and sigmatics is the relation between signs and their references. If one abstracts from users and meanings, then syntax is the relationship of signs to each other. D. Hellholm (1980, 23) simplifies the schema by including sigmatics in the discipline of semantics and by replacing O and I with D for designatum, or "meaning."

Semiotics has gone in a very different direction in the work of A. Greimas. One of his important contributions is his semiotic square, which he describes as the logical articulation of a semantic category (1982, 308-10). His semiotics concentrates on what has been called semantics above. His square is presented in a simplified form here:

A	non-A
not non-A	not A

A and non-A are contraries. A and not A are contradictories, as are non-A and not non-A. As an example Greimas gives this square:

being	seeming
non-seeming	non-being

The examples from biblical scholars that follow will be divided into syntax, semantics, and pragmatics. Hellholm uses the concept of text-syntax (1980, 12, 29, 30) to illuminate the Visions of Hermas. One aspect of syntax is anaphora, or pointing back in a text, and kataphora, or pointing forward in a text. One of Hellholm's arguments for making a break between the fourth and fifth visions of Hermas uses this aspect of text-syntax. In the Book of Visions there are several examples of kataphora to following visions (Vis. 2.4.2; 3.13.4b), but none of them point to texts beyond Vision 4. Anaphora is also found in the references to the three visions in 3.10.7–3.13.4 and finally in 4.3.6. None of the examples of anaphora point to the other books of Hermas either. In the Book of Mandates, on the other hand, there is an example of anaphora to the books of visions (Vis. 5.5). There is another similar example in the Book of Similitudes 9.1 (these last two examples may be secondary). These examples discussed by Hellholm are an example of syntax, i.e., the relation of signs to other signs.

Word studies are a well-known technique in biblical studies. What is more unusual is the use of semiotic categories in such studies. G. Caird (1980, 54), for example, claims that the word mystērion used in both Ephesians and Colossians has the identical sense of "secret" and uses that hypothesis to question the arguments against Pauline authorship (see PAUL) based on the different uses of the word in each letter. However, the referent of mystērion is different in the two letters, and Caird does not consider the possibility that this could be an indication of different authors. In a similar approach J. Louw (1982, 50) notes that in Revelation drakōn means "dragon" and refers to the devil. Paraklētos in 1 John 2:1 has the meaning "helper" and the reference Christ.

Scholars can also use semantics to look at larger units of text, as in the investigation of H. Boers. Employing the work of Greimas, Boers uses semiotic squares to analyze John 4. Interpreting John 4:39-42 by means of one of the squares, he states that when the villagers recognized JESUS as a universal savior, they affirmed salvation for all people (1988, 129, 180, 199), whereas their earlier belief in Jesus as Messiah through the woman's testimony did not affirm universal salvation. In Boers's square the contrary of universal salvation is partisan salvation. His square (slightly simplified) is as follows (129): S (the subject) stands for the villagers; O (the object) stands for the concept of universal salvation; and non-O stands for the concept of partisan salvation.

S is conjoined with non-O	S is conjoined with O
S is disjoined with O	S is disjoined with non-O

Boers employs these squares to clarify the logical relationships of the values in the text.

Pragmatics (the relation of signs, meaning, and users) surfaces in the work of many scholars in different forms. P. Maartens, in a discussion of Mark 4:24-25, notes that "watch what you hear" is a perlocutionary speech act. A speech act such as a warning (as in Mark 4:24-25) may have an effect on a hearer, and this effect is the perlocution. If a reader actually heeded the warning, the perlocutionary act would be successful. Maartens (1991, 77) writes: "Mark 16:8 confronts the reader with the rule of the resurrected Lord. The real reader concretises the speech act in a situational frame which encompasses himself. His faith produces hope. The text re-enacts this hope: Even in times of persecution, oppression and suffering, the hope of the implied reader perseveres." This attention to the effect of signs on a reader is an example of pragmatics. In a discussion of irony in John 4, G. O'Day (1986, 95) remarks that "Johannine irony creates the revelation experience for the reader as a result of the imaginative participation in the text which it encourages." Approaches that concentrate on the reader are semiotic in character (cf. G. Stibbe [1990] 418).

Semiotics overlaps with many other fields of research, e.g., work in INTERTEXTUALITY. The semiotician J. Kristeva describes a horizontal dimension of a word in which a word concerns both the subject of the writing (or author) and the receiver of the text. At the same time there is a vertical dimension of a word in a text and its orientation to a preceding or contemporary literary corpus. A word (or text) then is a crossing of words (or texts), where one reads at least another word (or text). Kristeva writes, "Every text is constructed as a mosaic of citations, every text is an absorption and transformation of another text." She bases her understanding of intertextuality on this model (1969, 84-85). Elsewhere she defines intertextuality: "The term inter-textuality denotes this transposition of one (or several) sign system(s) into another" (quoted in P. Maartens [1991] 75). Semiotics also overlaps with STRUCTURALISM. The American-German tradition of semiotics described above concerns itself with syntax, semantics, and pragmatics. The French tradition of semiotics is concerned mainly with issues of semantics, as in the work of the structuralist Greimas. Semiotic methods in biblical studies will stand or fall on their perceived usefulness in illuminating aspects of the text. The exegetical results may not be totally new, but the different questions such methods ask may throw new and exciting light on old questions.

Bibliography: K. Baldinger, Semantic Theory: Towards a Modern Semantics (1980). H. Boers, Neither on this Mountain nor in Jerusalem: A Study of John 4 (SBLMS 35, 1988). K. Bühler, Sprachtheorie: Die Darstellungsfunction der Sprache (1934, 19822). G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (1980). U. Eco, A Theory of Semiotics (1979). A. J. Greimas and J. Courtés, Semiotics and Language: An Analytical Dictionary (Advances in Semiotics, 1982). D. Hellholm, Das Visionenbuch des Hermas als Apokalypse: Formgeschichtliche und texttheoretische Studien zu einer literarischen Gattung (ConNT 13, 1, 1980). G. Klaus, "Semiotik," Philosophisches Wörterbuch (ed. G. Klaus and M. Buhr, 1969[6]) 978; Semiotik und Erkenntnistheorie (1973). N. Kretzmann, "Semantics, History of," Encyclopedia of Philosophy 7 (1967) 358-406. J. Kristeva, Semeiotike: Recherches pour une sémanalyse (1969). J. Locke, An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690; ed. A. C. Fraser, 1959). J. P. Louw, Semantics of NT Greek (1982). P. J. Maartens, " 'Sign' and 'Significance' in the Theory and Practice of Ongoing Literary Critical Interpretation with Reference to Mark 4:24 and 25: A Study of Semiotic Relations in the Text," Text and Interpretation: New Approaches in the Criticism of the NT (ed. P. J. Hartin and J. H. Petzer, 1991) 63-79. C. Morris, Signs, Language, and Behavior (1946); Signification and Significance: A Study of the Relations of Signs and Values (1964). G. R. O'Day, Revelation in the Fourth Gospel: Narrative Mode and Theological Claim (1986). C. S. Peirce, Collected Papers of C. S. Peirce, vol. 2, Elements of Logic (ed. C. Hartshorne and P. Weiss, 1932). F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics (1928[2]; ET 1959). M. W. G. Stibbe, "Semiotics," A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (ed. R.J. Coggins and J. L. Houlden, 1990) 618-20.

J. G. COOK

SEMLER, JOHANN SALOMO (1725–91)

Born Dec. 18, 1725, in Saalfeld in Thuringia, S. grew up under the influence of Lutheran PIETISM and the Enlightenment and became an important proponent of historical-critical Enlightenment theology in Germany. He was supported by S. BAUMGARTEN (1706–57) when he studied at the University of Halle (1743–50). His Latin master's thesis was directed against the NT TEXTUAL CRITICISM of the Cambridge mathematician and theologian W. WHISTON (1667–1752), whose views in part he later accepted. After a short stint as editor of the Coburg Staats und Gelehrten-Zeitung, in 1751 he was named professor of history and Latin poetry at the university of Altdorf near Nuremberg, where he primarily gave lectures on the history of the German Reich. In 1753 he went to the Prussian university at Halle as professor of theology. Recognized as an international scholar, he worked there until his death in 1791, repeatedly serving as dean of the theological faculty and three times as rector (prorector).

S. enjoyed a close friendship with Baumgarten and published the latter's extensive scholarly literary remains after his premature death. Following Baumgarten's suggestions, S. helped to produce a breakthrough in the role of historical thought in theology. The chief focus of his work was NT exegesis, textual criticism, HERMENEUTICS, and the history of the church and its doctrines. From 1756 on he lectured regularly on Christian dogmatics and in his works critically discussed contemporary Pietism and the thought of Lutheran orthodoxy. With the Hamburg pastor J. Goeze (1718–86) he disputed the value of the Complutensian POLYGLOT edition of the Bible as a textual source. He was intensively concerned with determining "the essence of Christianity," and in the famous "fragment" debate unleashed by G. LESSING (1729–81), he argued against the deception theory of the "unknown writer" (H. S. Reimarus) and for the credibility of the NT's message about the crucifixion and the resurrection.

S.'s extensive source investigations and sagacious observations gave biblical exegesis, hermeneutics, and textual criticism important impulses. He distanced himself from both contemporary Pietism and the scriptural teachings of late orthodoxy. Countering Pietism, he demanded that attempts to discover the historical meaning of the biblical writings should take precedence over edifying uses that served religious devotion.

For biblical exegesis S. demanded a historical reading based strictly on the wording (sensus literalis) of the biblical texts and attempted to understand them as the biblical authors had at the time when they were written down. Inadmissible were both the theory of a fourfold sense in the Scriptures and the application of allegory, which attempts to find a spiritual or mystical sense behind the words of a text. On the basis of this historical interpretation, S. recognized that the previous practice of finding Christ in the psalms and in other HB texts could not be maintained scientifically. The HB and the NT must be understood as sources for two different religions. However, even the NT does not represent a rigidly uniform teaching because it gives evidence of a clear theological contrast between the freethinking direction of the followers of PAUL and the strictly legal approach of Jewish Christianity. S.'s theory of accommodation assisted him in arriving at a history-of-religions perspective (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE). He recognized that a mythological way of thinking and the religious convictions of early Judaism had influenced the apostolic message.

In the field of NT textual criticism, S. observed the distinction between the large body of younger manuscripts and the small number of valuable, older witnesses. He tried thoroughly to explain the interpolation in 1 John 5:7 (the Comma Johanneum). Because this passage is missing in the oldest Greek manuscripts and is not even mentioned in the church fathers of the first centuries, he denied its authenticity and for that reason attacked the dependability of the Complutensian edition of the Bible by Spanish scholars. He held that 1 John 5:7 may not be used as proof for the doctrine of the Trinity and, in contrast to the predominant exegetical view, advocated the thesis that Rom 9:5 can only refer to God the Father, not to JESUS Christ. Nevertheless, he maintained Jesus' divinity on the basis of the statements in the prologue to John and in the Pauline writings.

S. can be called the founder of CANONICAL CRITICISM. In his four-volume work Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canon (1771–75), he proved historically that the Christian faith was originally disseminated verbally before the individual writings were collected for preaching in the various communities and were subsequently included in canonical lists of differing extents. The present NT CANON of twenty-seven writings is the result of a long process of development and should not be set up as a legal standard for Christian thinking and behavior. Text-critical and substantive reasons suggest that a distinction should be made between Word of God and Holy Scripture. Important for the Christian faith are the message of the cross and the resurrection of Jesus Christ and the personal appropriation of the message of atonement and salvation.

S. vigorously supported the distinction between theology and religion. Theology was for him a subject for scholarly investigation, something that changes and can develop, and it would be the task of future teachers and scholars. In contrast, religion refers to the conviction of faith, religious devotion, and human love to be found in the practical life of all Christians.

Works: Vorbereitung zur theologischen Hermeneutik (4 vols., 1760–69); Paraphrasis epistolae ad Romanos (1769); Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canon (4 vols., 1771–75; 2d ed. of vol. 1, 1776); Versuch einer freiern theologischen Lehrart (1777); Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten (1780²); Lebensbeschreibung von ihm selbst abgefasst (2 vols., 1781–82); Versuch die gemeinnützige Auslegung und Anwendung des Neuen Testaments zu befördern (1786).

Bibliography: H.-E. Hess, "Theologie und Religion bei J. S. S." (diss., Kirchlichen Hochschule Berlin, Augsburg, 1974). G. Hornig, Die Angänge der historisch-kritischen Theologie: J. S. S.s Schriftverständnis und seine Stellung zu Luther (1961); Die Aufklärung (ed. M. Greschat, 1983) 267-79; "S.s Lehre von der Heilsordnung: Eine Studie zur Rezeption und Kritik des halleschen Pietismus," Pietismus und Neuzeit 10 (1984) 152-89; J. S. S.: Studien zu Leben und Werk des Hallenser Aufklärungstheologen (1996). A. Lüder, Historie und Dogmatik: Ein Beitrag zur Genese und Entfaltung von J. S. S.s Verständnis des Alten Testaments (1995). D. Ritschl, "J. S. S.: The Rise of the Historical-critical Method in Eighteenth-century Theology on the Continent," Introduction to Modernity: A Symposium on Eighteenth-century Thought (ed. R. Mollenaur, 1965) 107-33. H. Rollmann, HHMBI, 355-59.

G. HORNIG

SEPTUAGINT

Palestinian dissatisfaction with the adequacy of parts of the LXX as a TRANSLATION of the HB eventually led to their revision and/or new translations in the first centuries of the Christian era. Rules for the proper exegesis of the Hebrew text were prepared by R. HILLEL (d. c. 20 CE) and his contemporary R. Shammai and in much greater detail a century later by R. AKIBA and R. ISHMAEL BEN ELISHA. These rules were intended to restrict individual interpretations of Scripture and to channel such interpretations in accordance with prescribed exegetical principles. This gradually evolving emphasis on a strict literalist interpretation made an impact on the text of the LXX as well, particularly in Palestine. Early evidence for such revisions has been found in small fragments at Qumran (e.g., 4Q LXX Num; see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and particularly in the Greek scroll of the Minor Prophets found in a cave in the Wadi Murabba'at and published by D. Barthélemy in Les Devanciers d'Aquila (1963). Similarly literalistic texts reflecting some of these exegetical principles formulated by the rabbis are to be found in the Greek HB as accepted by the Christian church as well, Ecclesiastes being the prime example (see below).

When the Christian church emerged from its Jewish background after 70 CE and became a gentile institution it quite naturally adopted the LXX as its Bible. Its use of the LXX as CANON formed in turn its basis for discussion and argument with the Jews; this made Jewish dissatisfaction with the LXX even more intense, with the result that new attempts at rendering the Bible into Greek were made during the second century. The most Jewish of these was that of AQUILA (Aq), a disciple of R. Akiba, whose exegetical rules he attempted to apply in his translation. The result was a brilliant but bizarre piece of work that only someone thoroughly familiar with the Hebrew text could possibly understand. SYMMACHUS (Sym) also rendered the Hebrew text carefully into Greek, but for him the demands of the target language were paramount; thus his translation, though on the whole rendering the sense of the original, is not literalistic. Sym was extensively used by JEROME in his VULGATE translation of the HB. A third translation designated as THEODOTION (Th) is a Palestinian revision of the LXX text, parts of which must be much earlier than the second century since this text is sometimes cited in the NT, particularly in Revelation. In fact for Daniel it is the Th text rather than that of the LXX that was adopted by the Christian church.

By the third century arguments between Christians and Jews had reached such intensity that ORIGEN undertook the task of writing the Hexapla, a massive scholarly attempt to present all the evidence available to him whereby Christian scholars could assess the "correctness" of the LXX translation. As its name implies, it consisted in the main of six columns (occasionally more, as in the psalter). The first column presented the Hebrew text of Origen's day in Hebrew script; the second, in a Greek transcription. The purpose of this second column is not clear and is much debated by modern scholars. The third column was devoted to the text of Aq as the most literalistic rendering of the Hebrew; the fourth was that of Sym; the fifth, of the LXX text; and the last, of Th, although for Psalms the text used for the sixth column has been identified as that of Quinta. (Readings from Quinta, Sexta, and Septima, revisions of unknown origin, are occasionally cited in the fathers or in manuscripts.)

It is the fifth column that had an impact on the later LXX text. Since the work was arranged in columns only one or at most two Hebrew words could appear on a line, and the corresponding words in the translations would be placed on the same line. When the word order of the LXX did not correspond to that of the Hebrew, Origen was compelled to adapt it, i.e., the word order was "corrected." More seriously, the text of the LXX was sometimes longer than that of the Hebrew, sometimes shorter. When the LXX contained text without an equivalent in the Hebrew, Origen marked the onset with an obelus and its end with a metobelus; when the LXX had nothing to correspond to the Hebrew he borrowed from one of the other three, preferably from Th, using an asterisk to show its onset and a metobelus for its end (see Origen Comm. in Mt. 15:14). These signs are known as Aristarchian signs because they were presumably first used (although with a different meaning) by Aristarchus of Alexandria in the late third century BCE for his edition of Homer.

Unfortunately the Hexapla did not survive the Muslim onslaught of Syria in the seventh century, and its size precluded its being copied in full. Parts of it, however, were copied; a fragmentary codex found by Mercati in the Ambrosiana in Milan, containing in palimpsest columns two to six of the Hexapla of parts of Psalms 17, 23–31, 34–35, 45, 48 and 88, has been published.

The fifth column could be copied more easily alone, and according to EUSEBIUS (Vita Const. 4.35ff.) fifty copies were prepared by him and Pamphilus on orders from Emperor Constantine. Later copyists of this text were not as careful as these fathers presumably had been and, not understanding what the Aristarchian signs meant, often omitted them or placed them incorrectly, thereby creating textual chaos rather than the well-ordered scholarly aid intended by Origen.

According to Jerome (Praef. in Lib. Paralip.), Eusebius and Pamphilus promulgated this text throughout the Palestinian provinces, whereas Alexandria and Egypt lauded Hesychius as the author of their LXX; and the text of LUCIAN the Martyr was approved from Constantinople to Antioch. In fact, Jerome maintained that the entire world was at odds by reason of this threefold variety (trifaria varietate).

Of these three recensions the Origenian or hexaplaric is the best defined. The Lucianic recension is usually attributed to the Lucian who suffered martyrdom in 311/312. Commonly thought to be somewhat more Atticistic than the old LXX, its text is longer, i.e., it contains numerous doublets; its identification has been severely questioned for certain parts of the HB. This recension is usually identified by its use in the works of CHRYSOSTOM and THEODORET.

The third recension is most problematic. It is not even clear who Hesychius was, although Eusebius speaks of him as a martyr-bishop, an identification by no means certain. Nothing is known of his recension, although J.

Grabe's identification of the text of Codex B (Vaticanus) as Hesychian has received some scattered support. A critical edition of the text of CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA might shed some light, though even this is quite uncertain.

Meanwhile, as Christianity spread the Bible could no longer serve universally as canon for the faithful in its Greek dress. Already in the second century the LXX was being translated into Latin as a North African vulgate form of the Scriptures. This OL text underwent constant revision, particularly when it spread to the European continent, since most well-educated speakers of Latin were also acquainted with Greek. Latin writers like AUGUSTINE often "corrected" their OL texts, with the result that one can quite properly speak of OL versions. In Egypt the LXX was being rendered into Coptic dialects by the early third century. Of these the Bohairic is still used in the modern Coptic Church, whereas the Sahidic (from upper Egypt) is substantially extant in fragmentary manuscripts. At least parts of the HB were also rendered into Achmimic and Fayyumic, but these have almost completely disappeared.

During the fourth century the HB was also translated into Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), probably by Frumentius of Tyre. This text underwent at least two revisions, both represented in manuscripts that require careful evaluation for use in LXX studies. For ARMENIAN, translated under the inspiration of Mesrop (d. 440), the textual evidence is much more of one piece in spite of the large number of manuscripts extant. Based on Greek manuscript(s) from Constantinople, for much of the HB its text is a good witness to the hexaplaric recension, and for some books, to the Lucianic/Byzantine tradition. The best hexaplaric evidence among the versions is the Syrohexaplar (Syh) translated during the second decade of the seventh century under the supervision of Paul, bishop of Tella. Much of the HB is extant, and for many books it is the best extant source for the hexaplaric signs as well. Other late versions of less importance for LXX studies are Arabic, Georgian, Gothic, and Slavonic.

Since the LXX and its versions constituted the canonical text for a large part of the Christian church up to modern times (i.e., the 16th cent.), commentaries, questiones, and homilies on books of the HB are all in theory part of LXX studies; in practice, patristic evidence is largely limited to textual rather than to exegetical collations and, for practical reasons, to the early centuries. One form of LXX studies needing separate mention is the evolution of catena texts. Catena manuscripts contain not only the biblical text as lemata but also large numbers of catenae or extracts from the fathers. Since many of the catenae come from works no longer extant, they constitute a valuable source of information, containing both homiletical/exegetical comments and textual notes that often give lexical information as well as non-LXX readings, especially from Aq, Sym, and Th.

Modern LXX studies may be said to begin with the rediscovery of Hebrew as the original language of most of the HB during the Renaissance. The appearance of J. REUCHLIN's De Rudimentis Linguae Hebraicae in 1506 meant that Christian scholars could now compare the LXX with the "original" Hebrew text and in turn use the Greek for both understanding and at times correcting the Hebrew. It is no exaggeration to state that with the appearance of Reuchlin's work HB TEXTUAL CRITICISM, in the modern sense of the term, was born.

Evidence for this new trend in biblical scholarship came with the appearance of the Complutensian POLYGLOT (HB in 4 vols.), printed 1514–17 but issued 1520–22 under the sponsorship of JIMÉNEZ DE CISNEROS. This Polyglot contained the Hebrew, the Vulgate, and the LXX as well as Tg. Onqelos for the Pentateuch. According to the preface a large number of manuscripts were used (mainly Spanish), including some on loan from the Vatican Library. Unfortunately the LXX text is not always trustworthy since corrections based on the Hebrew text rather than on Greek manuscripts do occur.

Appearing at approximately the same time (1518–19) was the Aldine edition. The editor, A. Asolanus, used manuscripts from the Bibl. Marciana in Venice for his edition, and its text is free of emendations. The finest edition of the LXX was, however, the Sixtine edition, appearing in Rome in 1587 under the editorship of A. Carafa. The text was primarily based on Codex B, an excellent fourth-century uncial, supplemented by a number of cursives not only from the Vatican Library but also from other Italian libraries. Notes with readings from the fathers as well as readings from Aq, Sym and Th were also provided by P. Morinus at the end of individual chapters and in supplements by F. Nobilius. The Sixtina became extremely popular and was reprinted repeatedly, including such a well-known edition as the London (or Walton) Polyglot of 1655–57 and those by L. Bos (1709); Holmes-Parsons (1798–1827); and C. von TISCHENDORF (1850). An early edition of the LXX that ought not to be overlooked is that of J. Grabe (1707–20) based on Codex A (Alexandrinus), a fifth-century uncial housed in the British Museum. Grabe's edition contains a number of corrections or emendations still accepted by most modern scholars as correct.

Early works in which the LXX is used extensively that are worth reading even today include A. MASIUS, Josuae imperatoris historia illustrata atque explicata (1574); J. DRUSIUS, Veterum interpretum graecorum in totum VT fragmenta (1622) and the earlier pamphlet In Psalmos Davidis veterum interpretum quae extant fragmenta (1581), both extensive collections of hexaplaric materials; L. CAPPEL, Critica sacra (1651; see CRITICI SACRI); I. Voss, De LXX interpretibus (1661–63); J. MORIN, Exercitationum biblicarum de hebraei graecique textus sinceritate (1669); and J. CARPZOV, Critica sacra VT (1728).

The year 1705 marked a turning point in the perception of LXX origins. Prior to the publication of H. HODY's essay Contra historiam LXX interpretum Aristeas nomine inscriptam in his De bibliorum textibus originalibus, few questioned the historicity of the Letter of ARISTEAS; afterward few accepted it as anything but a legendary apology for the LXX. The letter attributes the origin of the LXX Pentateuch to the desire of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–247 BCE) to have the Hebrew Torah rendered into Greek for his library at Alexandria. Accordingly, he sent a delegation to the high priest in Jerusalem, who acceded to his request for a good copy of the Torah as well as for seventy-two translators (six from each tribe). On their arrival at Alexandria they were feted and interrogated by the king and thereupon taken to the island of Pharos, where in seventy-two days they finished their task. The result was first read to the Jewish community in Alexandria and then presented to the king, who ordered it deposited in the library. Hody demonstrated conclusively that the story is pure fiction. The only item that might be deemed factual is that the letter originated in the third century BCE in Alexandria.

The nineteenth century was propaedeutic to modern LXX studies; it saw the publication of numerous tools useful for detailed LXX research. The old LEXICON by G. BIEL and E. Mutzenbecher (1779–80), was superseded by that of J. Schleusner (1820). A first CONCORDANCE had already appeared in 1607 (K. Kircher), to be replaced by that of A. Trommius (1718), and finally by that of E. HATCH and H. REDPATH (1892–1906). Collections of hexaplaric materials were made by B. de Montfaucon (Originis Hexaplorum quae supersunt [1713]), and in 1875 F. Field published a new collection with the same name and based on, but enlarging, the earlier collections of Nobilius, Drusius, and Montfaucon. The century also saw the publication of editions and/or facsimiles of most of the uncial texts as well as the discovery of Codex Sinaiticus by Tischendorf at Mt. Sinai.

Modern approaches to LXX studies largely center around two scholars of the nineteenth century. The first, Z. Frankel (d. 1875), set forth his principles in his Vorstudien zu der Septuaginta (1841) and ten years later illustrated them for the Pentateuch in his Über den Einfluss der palästinischen Exegese auf die alexandrinische Hermeneutik. Frankel maintained that each book of the LXX had to be examined individually as a reflection of the context in which it was created. The work of each translator had to be studied in order to understand his attitudes, prejudices, and understanding, i.e., the translation technique, as well as the translator's cultural milieu before any decisions on glosses, secondary readings, emendations, etc., could be made.

The second was P. de LAGARDE, whose approach was a textual one. Beginning with Jerome's trifaria varietas, the three recensions of the LXX prevailing in the Christian church of the fourth century, he attempted to identify the manuscript and the fathers representing each recension. Once each recension was identified and all the recensional elements were removed, he believed, the pre-recensional, i.e., the original, LXX would emerge as the critical text. In 1883 he prematurely published the first part of what he regarded to be the Lucianic recension as Librorum VT canon: Pars prior graece.

This approach presupposes that the entire Greek HB manuscript tradition is a lineal descendant of a single Urseptuaginta that can be recovered by stripping it of all secondary elements. In order to accomplish this task all relevant materials had to be assembled, i.e., all manuscripts had to be collated, the fathers read and their readings gathered, all the versions first restored to their autographa insofar as this was possible and then collated to the Greek. Lagarde was never able to realize this gigantic project even for one book of the HB, and it was left for later generations to bring to fruition in the Göttingen Septuagint.

Meanwhile, in Great Britain this programmatic vision was being realized in compromise fashion. A manual edition of the LXX was prepared by H. SWETE (1887–94), consisting of a reproduction of the text of Codex B (with only gross errors removed) and, where B was lacking, of the text of the next oldest manuscript. Then for the large Cambridge LXX a selection of well-chosen representative manuscripts, a number of Greek and Latin fathers, and the principal versions were all collated to the text of Codex B; the readings were presented without further classifications in an apparatus. A further apparatus with hexaplaric readings also appeared at the bottom of each page, while the appropriate text of B (or its substitute) appeared at the top of each page, as in the case of the manual edition. The first editors were A. Brooke, N. McLean, and subsequently H. Thackeray. The first fascicle appeared in 1906 and the last (3, pt. 1) in 1940, with no further fascicles envisioned.

The death of Lagarde in 1891 did not end interest in the recovery of the original or at least of the oldest recoverable LXX text. Lagarde's student O. RAHLFS continued the work of his mentor, and in 1908 a proposal by R. SMEND and J. WELLHAUSEN of the Göttingen Academy of Sciences led to the establishment of the LXX Unternehmen for the express purpose of preparing the way for the eventual publication of critical editions. Rahlfs was appointed the first Leiter of the Unternehem, a position he occupied until his death in 1935. He personally prepared an editio minor for the Göttingen Septuagint in Psalmi cum Odis (1931).

The Lagardian program, however, was not universally accepted. In 1925 F. Wutz revived an old theory first proposed by O. Tychsen (1734–1815) that the LXX was a translation based on a Hebrew text in Greek transcription (cf. BWANT, 2nd ser., 9 [1925] as well as his Systematische Wege von der Septuaginta zum hebr. Urtext [1937]). By clever manipulation of different transcription systems, he recovered what he believed to be an original text that was often at variance with the MT. Since the Greek alphabet badly reproduces the phonemes of Hebrew, Wutz reconstructed hypothetical Urtexte that no one but he could accept. Although his theory was initially greeted with some enthusiasm, its bizarre results soon lost all support; in his last major work, a Joban commentary, it was no longer applied.

Much more serious a challenge to the Lagardian program was that by P. KAHLE. First proposed in 1915 (TSK 85, 399-439) and reiterated and expanded in various publications throughout his life, his theory directly contradicted Lagarde's reconstruction of the textual history of the LXX. Kahle maintained that the LXX text as adopted by the Christian church evolved out of a plethora of translations or TARGUMIM that existed in the first century CE. To Kahle a single standard text could only be an end product, and the isolation of the strands in the trifaria varietas does not bring one closer to the original text of the Greek. Kahle used the analogy of Tg. Onqelos and Tg. Jonathan, where, he maintained, the stilted and literal renderings into Aramaic betray revision from earlier Targumim now largely lost. Kahle was a learned man, a fascinating speaker and writer, and many scholars fell under his spell, but his reconstructions were largely theoretical and based on extremely slender evidence easily admitting other and more plausible interpretations. Since his death his theories have been largely abandoned, and no serious LXX scholar today consistently follows his lead.

Meanwhile, serious work on the grammar of LXX literature was stimulated by A. DEISSMANN's identification of biblical Greek (which naturally includes LXX Greek as well as NT) as koine, or ordinary Hellenistic Greek. LXX grammars were published by R. Helbing (1907), Thackeray (1909), and Hlubovskyj (1927). A number of detailed grammatical studies were made by M. Johannessohn; see also Helbing, Die Kasussyntax der Verba bei der LXX (1928) and J. Psichari (REJ 55 [1908] 161-208). Modern grammatical studies focusing on specific syntactic problems are especially centered in Helsinki around I. Soisalon-Soininen and his students.

The establishment of critical texts of LXX books has now been made much more difficult by the appearance of Barthélemy's book on Aquila's predecessors (1963). The Murabba'at Scroll of the Greek Minor Prophets shows a text with a number of recensional characteristics, the most obvious of which is the rendering of the Hebrew particle (wĕ) gam by kaige and now popularly, but unfortunately, called the kaige recension. Barthélemy noted that these characteristics reflect the influence of the Palestinian rabbinate "in a time when a scrupulous literalism was flourishing." He then extended his study to translations and/or recensions that showed similar characteristics, finding these particularly in two parts of the kingdoms (2 Sam 11:2–1 Kgs 2:11; and 1 Kgs 22:1–2, Kings fin libri) and in varying degrees of correspondence in Lamentations, Canticles, Ruth, Judges, and Nehemiah as well as in Th and Quinta.

What Barthélemy demonstrated clearly is that Palestinian exegesis of the first and second centuries CE exerted an enormous influence on the Greek HB in a variety of ways: by translations, by thoroughgoing revisions of existing texts, by occasional or sporadic intrusions into the text, and even at times by substituting new translations for existing ones, as in the case of Daniel. The impact of Palestinian rules of exegesis on the Greek tradition was a gradually evolving one that eventually found its high point in the work of Aquila, which won the day in the case of Ecclesiastes. It constituted a reassertion of dominance by Palestinian Jewry over the Egyptian diaspora, an assertion that has immeasurably complicated the task of recovering the earliest possible text. One thing is clear: No single designation for the kaige group (the neutral term used by Barthélemy) is adequate; it is neither a recension nor a translation, although either may fit into this category.

What is also clear from this study is that one must reassess some of the more facile identifications of earlier times. The textual history of the books of the LXX cannot be solely based on Jerome's trifaria but begins much earlier and is much more complex than Lagarde could imagine over a century ago.

The current situation with respect to LXX studies shows a great deal of activity. Septuagint dissertations are appearing in various centers, e.g., Oxford, Helsinki, Harvard, Notre Dame, Philadelphia, Toronto, to mention but a few. Some work on critical editions of the versions is being carried on, though it is limited. The Vetus Latina Institut at Beuron continues its work on the OL with renewed vigor, with B. Fischer's Genesis (1951), W. Thiele's Sapientia Salomonis (1977) and Sirach Ecclesiasticus (1987), and R. Gryson's Esaias (1987) complete. A number of other books have been assigned to various scholars; the introduction of one, Gregorius Eliberritanus: Epithalamium sive explanatio in Canticis Canticorum by E. Schulz-Flügel, has also been published. For Armenian, the editions of Deuteronomy (C. Cox [1979]) and of Genesis (A. Zeytounian) have appeared. M. Peters has edited some of the volumes of the Bohairic Pentateuch (1983), and P. Nagel is working on an edition of the Sahidic HB, whereas M. Goshen-Gottstein published the remains of the Syropalestinian version of the Pentateuch and the Prophets.

The International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies (IOSCS) was founded in 1968, and its annual Bulletin has provided a focus for information on activity and bibliography. It has also led to interest in the application of computer technology to HB textual criticism in general and to LXX problems in particular. It has embarked on an ambitious long-term project of translating the LXX into English, the New English Translation of the Septuagint (NETS), for which a translators' manual has been issued as well as a model rendering of the Greek psalter (both by A. Pietersma). Most, if not all, the books have been assigned to various translators.

Meanwhile, critical editions of the books of the LXX as the sine qua non for basic LXX studies continue to appear in the Göttingen Septuaginta series. The following major editions have been published: W. Keppler, Maccabaeorum book 1 (original ed. 1936); R. Hanhart, Maccabaeorum book 2 (1959) and 3 (1960), Esther (1966), Esdrae I (1974), Judith (1979), Tobit (1983), Esdrae II (1993); J. Ziegler, Isaias (1939), Duodecim Prophetae (1943), Ezechiel (1952), Susanna, Daniel, Bel et Draco (1954), Jeremias, Baruch, Threni, Epistula Jeremiae (1957), Sapientia Salomonis (1962), Sapientia Jesu Filii Sirach (1965), Iob (1982); and J. W. Wevers, Genesis (1974), Deuteronomium (1977), Numeri (1982), Leviticus (1986), Exodus (1991). The following are actively in preparation: Ruth (U. Quast), Iosue (U. Quast), Daniel (revision of LXX; O. Munich), Regnorum I et II (= 1 and 2 Samuel; A. Aejemlaeus) and Paralipomenon I et II (R. Hanhart).

Bibliography: S. P. Brock, C. T. Fritsch and S. Jellicoe, A Classified Bibliography of the Septuagint (1973), up to 1972. C. Dogniez, Bibliography of the Septuagint/Bibliographie de la Septante 1970–93 (from 1972). For up-to-date lists of recent literature, see the various issues of the IOSCS Bulletin.

J. W. WEVERS

SERMON ON THE MOUNT

The Sermon on the Mount, found in Matthew 5–7 with parallels in Luke 6:17-49 (Sermon on the Plain), contains such well-known passages as the Beatitudes, the Lord's Prayer, and the Golden Rule. It has engendered a body of literature more vast than any other segment of the NT.

1. Composition. The relationship between the Sermon on the Mount in Matthew and the Sermon on the Plain in Luke represents a problem that has been frequently addressed. Those who are skeptical of biblical criticism have suggested that JESUS preached the sermon on more than one occasion and that this accounts for the differences in the length, content, and setting of the respective sermons in Matthew and Luke.

Critical scholarship, however, has attempted to explain the literary relationship between Matthew and Luke and to analyze the sources of the respective sermons. The scholarly consensus is that the passages are not independent but bear a close relationship to each other. Except for minor discrepancies in order and phrasing, Luke's Sermon on the Plain is contained almost entirely in Matthew's Sermon on the Mount. There are about twenty-eight verses in Matthew with parallels in Luke 6, while forty-seven verses are peculiar to Matthew.

One possible explanation for these similarities is that Matthew's Sermon on the Mount represents Jesus' original discourse, which Luke shortened by omitting some material and dispersing other portions throughout his Gospel. A more widely held view, following the conclusions of the four document hypothesis, FORM CRITICISM, and REDACTION CRITICISM, is that both Matthew and Luke drew on a common written source or sources. This source consisted of three major sections: It began with the Beatitudes, followed with a series of admonitions, and concluded with the parable of the two builders. The evangelists were redactors who compiled their sermons from traditional units that originally circulated orally and later were written down by the early Christian community. Moreover, the material was written for a specific purpose: the community's catechetical needs. According to this view, the sermons in Matthew and Luke are not discourses of Jesus that they "remembered" but, rather, compilations of Jesus' sayings that were preserved separately, first in an oral and later in a written tradition. Thus the Sermon on the Mount and the Sermon on the Plain are not sermons preached by Jesus on one or even two occasions; rather, they represent the post-Easter modification of the evangelists' sources according to their respective purposes and those of the primitive Christian community. Critical scholars differ among themselves on the nuances of the process, and the rift between conservative and liberal biblical exegesis persists.

2. Relevance and Application. While there is widespread agreement that the Sermon on the Mount represents a compendium of Jesus' teachings and that it is one of the most lofty and powerful ethical expressions ever put forth, there is considerable disagreement as to its meaning and relevance. Did Jesus institute a new law that is as binding for Christians as the Torah is for Judaism? What are the implications of Jesus' eschatological outlook for our understanding of the sermon's application? How can we relate the sermon to problems and conditions strikingly different from those that prevailed in first-century Palestine? These are only a few of the problems that confront those who seek to interpret and apply the Sermon on the Mount.

3. Ante-Nicene Period. An examination of the ante-Nicene writers shows that references to Matthew's Sermon on the Mount appear more frequently than those to any other segment of Scripture. These early writers often spoke of Jesus' relationship to the Mosaic law and concluded that his message is not contrary to past laws or an abrogation of them but a fulfillment and extension. There is ample evidence that such writers as JUSTIN MARTYR, IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, and CHRYSOSTOM employed the sermon for apologetic purposes; it defined Jesus' teaching and became a concise statement of Christian ethics. Jesus' respect for the Torah as expressed in the sermon served to counteract the Marcionite heresy (see MARCION) regarding the discontinuity between the HB and the NT. The early Christian writers, including AUGUSTINE, assumed that the Sermon on the Mount was a perfect rule and pattern for the Christian life and that it was relevant and applicable to their situation; they did not regard the sermon's counsel as reserved for some future application.

Augustine was probably the first to speak of Jesus' sermon as the "Sermon on the Mount." However, this designation was not generally used until after the Reformation.

4. Medieval Period. In the medieval period a new way of understanding the ethic of the Sermon on the Mount developed, which subsequently became basic for Roman Catholic moral theology. In his Summa Theologica, THOMAS AQUINAS drew the distinction between "precepts" and "counsels of perfection." Evangelical counsels, as distinguished from moral precepts or commandments, are advisory directives of Christ, given as guides that lead to a closer approximation to perfection and an imitation of Christ himself. They have traditionally been associated with the virtues of poverty, chastity, and obedience. While obedience to precepts or commandments is necessary for salvation, adherence to the evangelical counsels is essential for perfection and to obtain greater merit and favor with God. C. LAPIDE, a late medieval exegete, suggested that Jesus' statement about fulfilling the law consisted of his adding evangelical counsels of perfection to matters of precept. Thus the medieval period introduced a new way of understanding the Sermon on the Mount: In it (and in the rest of the NT) one finds both precepts, or commandments, and evangelical counsels; and these in effect become two paths leading to salvation.

5. Reformation. The Reformation produced three movements, related to LUTHER, CALVIN, and the ANABAPTISTS, respectively, that have influenced interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount to the present time. In a series of sermons on Matthew 5–7, Luther set forth his doctrine of the two kingdoms, by which he sought to maintain the validity of the Sermon on the Mount for all Christians. One must, he argued, distinguish between the secular and the spiritual, between the kingdom of Christ and the kingdom of the world. Christians can participate in government—as soldiers, judges, lawyers, etc.—because there is a difference between the person and the office. They may engage in all sorts of secular business, not as Christians, but as secular persons. All the while, their hearts remain pure in their Christianity, as Christ demands.

The relationship between faith and works posed another problem for Luther's understanding of the Sermon on the Mount. The sermon appears to emphasize works, merit, and reward; but it is speaking about works and fruit that are manifestations of the state of grace. The passages on reward and merit are simply intended to comfort Christians. The insistence on grace alone must be preserved, Luther maintained, and then terms like merit and reward can be applied to the fruit that follows.

Calvin, with his insistence on the unity of the Bible, viewed Jesus, not as a new legislator, but as the one who restored the law to its integrity and cleansed it from the falsehoods of the Pharisees. Jesus was a faithful expounder who showed us the law's nature, object, and extent. There is a sacred tie between the law and the gospel; the latter fulfills the former so that both declare God to be their author.

Like Luther and ZWINGLI, Calvin criticized the Anabaptists for their "misunderstanding" of Jesus' teaching about oaths, nonresistance, and lawsuits. They were misguided in their "ethical radicalism," just like the schoolmen, who perverted Jesus' teachings by turning them into evangelical counsels.

The Anabaptists are often referred to as the left wing of the Reformation, or the radical Reformation. Their radical stance was to a significant degree dependent on their understanding of the Sermon on the Mount. Taking the ethic of the sermon literally, they made it incumbent on all Christians, finding in it an ideal that led them to view the kingdom of God as being in radical opposition to all secular interests. The Anabaptists believed that the essence of the Christian life was discipleship—a following after Jesus (Nachfolge Christi)—and their directive or charter for such a life-style was best expressed in the sermon. Their rejection of infant baptism, their insistence on the strict separation of church and state, their commitment to nonresistance and to loving their enemies, their refusal to swear oaths—all these were grounded in the teachings and example of Jesus as found in the Sermon on the Mount.

6. Protestant Scholasticism. In contrast to the Anabaptists, the post-Reformation followers of Luther and Calvin (Protestant scholastics) viewed the Sermon on the Mount as an impossible ideal representing the uncompromising expression of God's righteousness to which no human could attain. They believed that to make the sermon the essence of the gospel or of the Christian life is to embrace a new legalism, or works righteousness. In reality, the sermon serves to expose human sin and finitude and thus prepares the way for justification by faith alone. It throws believers upon the grace of God in Christ; its intent is to expose human failure and despair and to prepare persons for the message of salvation through the cross alone. Widely held by orthodox Protestants, this view has been restated by C. Stange (1870–1959) and G. KITTEL.

7. Modern Period. In the modern period, with the advent of biblical criticism, increasing diversity and complexity are discernible in the interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount. The literal or absolutistic understanding that the Anabaptists espoused was restated by L. Tolstoy (1828–1910), who summarized the sermon's central teaching in five rules: Be not angry; commit no adultery; swear not; go not to law; war not. For Tolstoy the central reality was Jesus' teaching about nonresistance in Matt 5:38-39. The Sermon on the Mount, and especially the command of nonviolence, is an ethical ideal that is possible for both individuals and society. If it is taken literally, one cannot go to court, take part in government, use violence against one's neighbor, or participate in military service.

Tolstoy's absolutism was set in a different context by L. Ragaz (1868–1945), the father of Christian socialism. Jesus' teachings apply, not merely to the personal realm, but to the social arena, where the struggle for freedom, justice, and peace takes place. While Ragaz did not equate the kingdom of God with socialism, he nevertheless viewed the Sermon on the Mount as the Magna Carta of Christian socialism and held that the whole of socialism is contained in the kingdom of God.

The predominant theological temper of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was characterized by Protestant liberalism or liberal theology. Among its later exponents were A. von HARNACK and W. HERRMANN, who tended to view the kingdom of God as a present and inner reality. It was Herrmann who developed a widely influential understanding of the Sermon on the Mount, according to which the most serious and widespread mistake is to regard it as a set of laws to be fulfilled in every case. This is impossible, he argued. If Jesus had intended his teaching to be general rules, he would have been much worse than the teachers of the law he attacked. Rather, the meaning of his teaching lies in the fact that he wished to open the way for a right disposition (Gesinnung). The sermon is a Gesinnungsethik (an ethic of disposition); its teachings lead to a renewal of the mind and the will, directing us to freedom, moral power, and development grounded in Jesus. Consequently, the Sermon on the Mount relates more to what we should be than to what we should do.

A. SCHWEITZER, going beyond the proposals of J. WEISS, introduced the concept of "consistent eschatology" as the key to understanding Jesus' life and message. The nineteenth-century quest of the historical Jesus had produced a teacher of morality who sought to establish the spiritual reign of God in people's hearts and thus induce the reign of the kingdom of God on earth. But the Jesus presented in the Gospels is a quite different figure—mysterious, otherworldly, unknown—whose worldview is foreign to ours because it is steeped in the eschatology and APOCALYPTICISM of late Judaism. Jesus believed that the consummation of the Kingdom was imminent, that it would occur in his lifetime; and the urgency of the situation demanded a radical ethic, i.e., an ethic of repentance that would prepare and equip persons for the crisis confronting them. The ethics of the Sermon on the Mount is "interim ethics," relevant only for that brief interim before the eschaton. Those who adopted this radical ethic would be members of the coming Kingdom. Schweitzer believed that it is possible that later Christians can find meaning and relevance in the sermon, but this was not Jesus' intention. His entire horizon was permeated by eschatology, and it is only in this milieu that we can understand his teachings and his mission.

One of the most thorough twentieth-century studies of the Sermon on the Mount is that of H. WINDISCH (1929; ET 1951). Throughout his work, Windisch insisted on a strict differentiation between historical exegesis and theological interpretation. His purpose was to examine the sermon and to show what historical and critical exegesis has taught us to see. The biblical interpreter dare not jump to theological and philosophical conclusions without first doing the prerequisite historical exegesis. Thus Windisch criticized Herrmann, M. DIBELIUS, and R. BULTMANN for modernizing the teachings of Jesus, and Stange and Kittel for superimposing a Pauline, or dogmatic, framework on them. The Pauline dogmatic is absent from the Sermon on the Mount; from the standpoint of PAUL, Luther, and Calvin, its soteriology is hopelessly heretical.

Windisch maintained that the Sermon on the Mount stands wholly within the framework of Jewish religion. Like the Torah, the sermon is essentially a collection of commandments that are to be obeyed. Its teaching is characterized by an ethic of obedience. The intent of the Evangelist is to portray Jesus as a new lawgiver who intends to both fulfill the Mosaic law and improve on it. The sermon, however, has no political reference. It is individualistic in the sense that it deals with relationships between individuals; although political and social implications may derive from it, the sermon does not consider conmmunity, economic, and national organizations and their ethical ramifications. The entire social ethic of the sermon is couched in individual sayings that are to be understood literally and interpreted literally.

Dibelius, one of the original exponents of form criticism, produced an important study of the Sermon on the Mount (1940). Applying the form-critical method, he held that the sermon was not one that Jesus preached on a single occasion but, rather, a collection of individual sayings spoken by Jesus on a variety of occasions and brought together to form a kind of Christian law. For Dibelius, the Sermon on the Mount must be understood as the "pure will of God." It is not an interim ethic, valid only for the period before the end of the world; it is given for eternity because it represents the will of the eternal God. Jesus did not consider the circumstances of our life and the conditions of this world but looked only to the coming world, to the kingdom of heaven. Thus the Sermon on the Mount has a definite eschatological reference. Jesus' words are "signs of the kingdom of God" and consequently cannot be carried out in this life. He intended them to be signs of hope, but after Easter they became laws of conduct. Today Jesus' directives seem impractical because we have lost the eschatological outlook. According to Dibelius, the sermon should not be viewed as an ideal of religion or ethics. It has no validity for the workaday life, since it was not given as a body of instruction for this life or as a program of reform for this world. Rather, it is an "eschatological stimulus" intended to make persons well acquainted with the pure will of God. Although we cannot perform the sermon's demands fully, nevertheless, we can be transformed by it; the most important thing is that it become effective in our hearts. For the Christian, law does not demand that we do something, but that we be something.

Of twentieth-century interpretations, perhaps none is more impressive, provocative, and controversial than D. BONHOEFFER's Nachfolge (The Cost of Discipleship [1940[2]; ET 1959[2]]). Its popularity and significance stem to a great degree from the time in which it was written and from the subsequent martyrdom of its author. Bonhoeffer's chief interest was not in dealing with the usual philological and critical problems relating to the sermon but in confronting the church with the life of discipleship—with the imperative of uncompromising, unmitigated, single-minded obedience to Jesus Christ. More important than the critical questions are the ones that ask what Christ's will is for Christians today. The Sermon on the Mount calls believers to a life of surrender and obedience. Bonhoeffer observed that, humanly speaking, the sermon could be understood and interpreted in a thousand different ways. However, Jesus intended only one possibility: obedience.

An interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount that has been influential in certain conservative movements is that of the dispensationalists. The basic premise of dispensationalism is that sacred history is divided into a number of dispensations (usually seven), in each of which God deals with people on a different basis. Dispensationalists maintain that the sermon is pure law and does not contain the gospel; consequently, it does not apply to the church age, the dispensation of grace, but to the coming Kingdom age, the final dispensation. Thus the Sermon on the Mount is the code of laws of the kingdom of heaven.

Two noteworthy Jewish interpreters of the Sermon on the Mount are C. MONTEFIORE and G. Friedlander (1871–1923). Montefiore pointed out that the sermon is individualistic and ignores social questions due to Jesus' eschatological view that the old order was approaching a catastrophic end. One of Montefiore's major concerns was the relationship between the Sermon on the Mount and the HB, and he drew a parallel between Jesus on the "mount" and Moses on Mt. Sinai. Matthew wanted to contrast the two laws: the one old, imperfect, and transitory, and the other new, perfect, and definitive. Montefiore concluded that in spite of the sermon's antitheses, Jesus had no deliberate intention of teaching a new religion or a new righteousness. Comparing the sermon with rabbinic teaching, Montefiore stated that the sermon is more enthusiastic, while the rabbinic literature is more sober; and although it is not very extensive, the Sermon on the Mount contains some original materials not found in Judaism.

Montefiore believed the sermon could be a meeting ground for Jew and Christian because of its lack of christology. It contains no article of faith concerning the person of Jesus; thus the Jew can live in its spirit without acknowledging anyone as lord and/or savior. Furthermore, the sermon makes a rapprochement between Jew and Christian possible because it contains nothing essentially antagonistic to Judaism. According to Montefiore, the sermon remains for all time a religious document of "immense importance and significance, and mostly of a high greatness and nobility."

While Montefiore was conciliatory in his evaluation of the Sermon on the Mount, Friedlander (1911) took a polemical and apologetic position, concluding that four-fifths of the sermon is exclusively Jewish. Those parts that are original are insignificant, and Judaism has nothing to learn from them. Indeed, the Pharisaic teaching is infinitely superior to that of the gospel. Friedlander was more outspoken than Montefiore on the "unfair" treatment of the Pharisees in the Sermon on the Mount, maintaining that the NT view of the Pharisees is one-sided, prejudiced, and neither charitable nor just. In Jesus' teaching about wealth, anxiety, and nonresistance, Friedlander discerned an un-Jewish asceticism. Jesus' views are world-denying, while the stance of Judaism is world-affirming.

Friedlander rejected Montefiore's suggestion that the Sermon on the Mount could be the ideal meeting ground and bond of union between Jews and Christians. He affirmed that Gentiles have been unwilling to accept the heavy yoke of the Torah and have instead taken up the easy yoke of the gospel. Nevertheless, he stated: "This is not to condemn the teaching of the Sermon. It has its part to play in the religious training of the world."

Bibliography: C. Bauman, The Sermon on the Mount: The Modern Quest for Its Meaning (1985). U. Berner, Die Bergpredigt: Rezeption und Auslegung im 20. Jahrhundert (1979). H. D. Betz, ABD, 5:1106-12; The Sermon on the Mount (1995). T. D. Bonham, The Demands of Discipleship: The Relevance of the Sermon on the Mount (1967). D. Bonhoeffer,

The Cost of Discipleship (1940²; ET 1959²). W. D. Davies, The Setting of the Sermon on the Mount (1966). M. Dibelius, The Sermon on the Mount (1940). J. Dupont, Les béatitudes (3 vols., 1954). G. Friedlander, The Jewish Sources of the Sermon on the Mount (1911, repr. 1969). R. Grant, "The Sermon on the Mount in Early Christianity," Semeia 12 (1978) 215-31. J. Lambrecht, The Sermon on the Mount (OBO 26, 1985). W. S. Kissinger, The Sermon on the Mount: A History of Interpretation and Bibliography (1975). H. K. McArthur, Understanding the Sermon on the Mount (1960). I. A. Massey, Interpreting the Sermon on the Mount in the Light of Jewish Tradition as Evidenced in the Palestinian Targums of the Pentateuch (SBEC 25, 1991). C. Montefiore, The Synoptic Gospels (2 vols., 1909, 1927²); Some Elements of the Religious Teaching of Jesus (1910). D. Patte, Discipleship According to the Sermon on the Mount (1996). L. Ragaz, Die Bergpredigt Jesu (1945). A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to Wrede (1906, 1913²; ET 1910, 1966, 1998). T. Soiron, Die Bergpredigt Jesu: Formgeschichtliche exegetische und theologische Erklärung (1941). G. Strecker, The Sermon on the Mount: An Exegetical Commentary (1984; ET 1988). H. Windisch, The Meaning of the Sermon on the Mount (UNT 16, 1929, 1937²; ET 1951). R. H. Worth, The Sermon on the Mount: Its OT Roots (1997).

W. S. KISSINGER

SERVETUS, MICHAEL (1511–53)

Possibly the most celebrated and notorious heretic of the early sixteenth century, S. was born in Villanueva de Sijena in Spain. Little is known about his youth or formative education, although it is clear that he was well educated and learned Greek and Hebrew at an early age. His two major works, De Trinitatis Erroribus (1531) and Christianismi Restitutio (1553), were virtual compendia of contemporary heretical thought; but S. is best known as a spiritual godparent of Socinian Unitarianism (see SOCINUS). He also made significant intellectual contributions in ethno-cultural geography and in medicine before his execution in Geneva, Oct. 27, 1553. Less well known is his considerable contribution to scriptural exegesis, in which he pioneered an approach best described as cultural relativism.

S.'s scriptural interests developed largely to oppose the Trinity and to provide a scriptural basis for his modalism and millenarianism. He called the Trinity a "three-headed Cerberus" and a gross intellectual perversion innocently accepted by later Greek Christians who were ignorant of Hebrew. "Because of the poverty in divine names, the apostles could not express this matter to the Greeks," he complained, adding, "nor should they have caused us so much trouble had the Greeks learned Hebrew." Repeatedly he insisted, "You must bear in mind that all things written about Christ took place in Judea and in the Hebrew language," and advised the reader "to get a knowledge of Hebrew in the first place and thereafter diligently apply yourself to the study of Jewish history." He relied heavily on such medieval Jewish sources as A. IBN EZRA, D. KIMHI, and others of a Jewish rationalist orientation.

S. believed the many HB names for God, including El, Elohim, Shaddai, Yah, Yahweh, Sabbaoth, Oz, and others, including the name Christ, referred to various aspects of God's multifold personality rather than to differentiated persons in the godhead. In turn, he placed these modalist expressions in a larger millenarian framework, arguing that these names constituted a progression of divine self-disclosure beginning at the time of creation and ending with God's complete self-disclosure in Christ. Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, and the prophets each represented one phase in this entire process of God's self-disclosure; but "the prophets pursued their history as the course of their history led them." Hence the Bible constituted a string of separate works, and scholars should understand Scripture by first understanding the cultural and historical milieu in which each author wrote. To this end, S. used the rationalist exegesis of such Jewish authors as Kimhi, Ibn Ezra, and NACHMANIDES. He believed the world would end in 1588 and hinted that he was his generation's spokesman for God and would initiate the reign of the archangel Michael, when the evil reign of the antichrist would be destroyed.

Works: De Trinitatis Erroribus, libri septem (1531); Dialogorum de Trinitate (1532); De Iusticia Regni Christ (1532); Christianismi Restitutio (1553); Declarationis Jesu Christi Filii dei, libri V (n.d.).

Bibliography: R. H. Bainton, Hunted Heretic: The Life and Death of M. S., 1511–53 (1953). J. Friedman, M. S.: A Case Study in Total Heresy (1978). C. Manzoni, Umanesimo ed Erasia (1974). M. Rivera and T. B. Deutcher, CE 3 (1987) 242-43.

J. FRIEDMAN

SFORNO, OBADIAH BEN JACOB (c. 1470–1550)

An Italian Jewish humanist, physician, and Bible commentator, S. was born in Cesena and educated in Rome, where he taught Hebrew to J. REUCHLIN, father of German Hebraism. He later settled in Bologna as head of a rabbinic school and became a much-consulted Talmudic authority (see TALMUD).

Using Aristotelian methods, S. refuted Aristotelianism where incompatible with Judaism (ʾOr ʿammim [1537, Hebrew; repr. 1969/70] = Lumen Gentium [1548]). His scriptural commentaries in Hebrew include the Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Psalms, Jonah, Habakkuk, and Zechariah; but his reputation rests on his PENTATEUCHAL commentary posthumously edited by his brother Ḥananel. Ignoring philology and (generally) allegory, he drew on medical science (e.g., at Gen 43:27, the balance of humours) and Renaissance humanism to explain the inherent logic and textual structure of Scripture. Exodus 19:5, "mine is all the earth," means that Israel's privilege is quantitative, not qualitative, since God loves all humankind and particularly righteous Gentiles. Demonology was as serious a matter for him as for Marlowe, and he treated biblical references to it "scientifically." He understood Lev 17:7, which condemns sacrifice to "goat-demons," as referring, not to worship, but to conjuring them up for magical purposes. Since demons feed on the fine substance evaporating from the blood, wherein resides the soul (life force), and since they frequent lonely places, hunters must cover the blood of game with earth (Lev 17:13-14). He held that the tower of Babel (Gen 11:4) was built to make Nimrod world ruler; the height of this idolatrous temple would establish the "name," i.e., reputation, of its city as the religious center of the world and bring universal recognition to its ruler. This is a clear reference to the plan of Bramante (d. 1514) for St. Peter's in Rome as modified by Michelangelo, the dome of which was completed in 1546.

Works: Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes (1567); Psalms (1586; ed. J. Heilprin, 1952–53; also Hebrew text of Psalms [1972/73]); Jonah, Habakkuk, Zechariah (ed. D. Ibn Hin, 1602); commentary on the Pentateuch in Rabbinic Bible (1724 and many subsequent eds.); Mishnah Aboth (Ethics of the Fathers; ed. E. W. Rosenberg, 1965–66); commentary to Deuteronomy (ET S. M. Stahl, 1975).

Bibliography: E. Finkel, O. S. als Exeget (1896). C. Roth, Jews in the Renaissance (1959) see index. A. Toaff, EncJud 14 (1971) 1209-11.

R. LOEWE

SHUCKFORD, SAMUEL (c. 1694–1754)

Born in Norwich, England, from 1712 to 1719 S. attended Caius College, Cambridge (BA 1716; MA 1720), subsequently obtaining the DD at Lambuth. He served various churches, last of which was All Saints, Lombard Street, London, and died July 14, 1754. S.'s significance in the history of biblical scholarship rests on his widely used and frequently reprinted history of Israel, which, although intended to complement that of H. PRIDEAUX, only covered the time down to Joshua, a desideratum M. RUSSELL sought to correct.

Works: The Sacred and Profane History of the World (2 vols., 1728, repr. in various forms; 4 vols., ed. A. Clarke, 1808; 2 vols., ed. J. T. Wheeler, 1858).

Bibliography: T. Cooper, DNB 52 (1897) 168.

J. H. HAYES

SIBYLLINE ORACLES

These texts constitute a corpus of Jewish and Christian writings ranging from the second century BCE to the seventh century CE. Since they are presented as oracles of the pagan sibyl, there is no overt appeal to Scripture; the degree of actual dependence on the Bible varies considerably. There is virtually none in books 11–14, which consist of political prophecy and commentary from the Roman period. In the earlier books the influence of the Bible appears in three ways: paraphrase of biblical accounts; adherence to biblical ethical norms; and use of biblical motifs, especially in eschatological passages.

The most extensive biblical paraphrase is found in Sib. Or. 1, a Jewish work from around the turn of the era that was updated by a Christian in the second century. The Jewish stratum contains a lengthy paraphrase of Genesis retelling the stories of Adam and Eve and, in greater detail, the flood. Two modifications of the biblical account are typical of the oracles: Noah is presented as a preacher of repentance (150-198), and the narrative contains some details that diverge from Genesis but correspond to Babylonian myth (233-257). The interest in primeval history is also typical: The flood is featured again in Sib. Or. 7:7-15; and Sib. Or. 3:97-109 tells of the tower of Babel, which is recalled again in Sib. Or. 8:4-5. In contrast, the summary of Israelite history in Sib. Or. 3:218-94 is exceptional. The Christian stratum contains a synthetic presentation of the life of Christ (324-84). Similar summaries of the gospel story are found in Sib. Or. 6, a short, twenty-eight-verse hymn to Christ, and in 8:251-336. There is a reference to the baptism of Christ in 7:66-67.

The ethics of the oracles are representative of the Hellenistic Jewish diaspora. Little attention is paid to the ritual requirements of Judaism. The primary emphasis falls on polemic against idolatry and against sexual abuses (adultery and homosexuality). The attacks on idolatry and the emphatic monotheism are often reminiscent of Second Isaiah (e.g., Sib. Or. 3:13-14; 6:29; 8:377) but are not so much indebted to specific biblical texts as to the common understanding of biblical law in Hellenistic Judaism. The oracles also contain a tradition of criticism of Rome on grounds of injustice (Sib. Or. 3:350-380; 5:162-178; 8:73-109), which is informed in a general way by the prophetic tradition (e.g., by allusions to Isaiah 14 and 47; see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB).

Biblical influence is also apparent in the eschatological passages of the oracles. Sibylline Oracle 3 draws on the motifs of the Gentile assault on Jerusalem (3:660-668; cf. Psalms 2, 48), the eschatological transformation of the earth (3:785-795; cf. Isaiah 11), and the eschatological pilgrimage of the Gentiles to Jerusalem (3:710-723; cf. Isaiah 2; Micah 4). Other books adopt the apocalyptic belief (see APOCALYPTICISM) in resurrection.

In Sib. Or. 2:221-226 and 4:181 the formulation echoes Ezekiel 37. Sibylline Oracle 2:154-213 has lengthy accounts of the signs of the end that partially parallel those of Mark 13, etc., while the scene of Christ enthroned for judgment, Sib. Or. 2:241-243, is reminiscent of Matt 25:31. In all these cases, however, the biblical references are intertwined with a wealth of other allusions to traditions attested in the PSEUDEPIGRAPHA and in pagan sources. The sibyl speaks with an independent prophetic voice and is never simply an interpreter of inherited Scripture.

Bibliography: J. J. Collins, "Sibylline Oracles," OTP, 1:317-472 (with ET and bibliography, 1983); "The Sibylline Oracles," Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran, Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus (ed. M. E. Stone, CRINT 2, 2, 1984) 357-81; "The Development of the Sibylline Tradition," ANRW II.20.1 (1987) 421-59; "Sibylline Oracles," ABD (1992) 6:2-7. V. Nikiprowetzky, "La Sibylle juive et le 'Troisième Livre' des 'Pseudo-Oracles Sibyllins' depuis Charles Alexandre," ANRW II.20.1 (1987) 460-542.

J. J. COLLINS

SIMON, RICHARD (1638–1712)

Born May 13, 1638, in Dieppe, France, S. was educated by the local Oratorians, whose educational program stressed natural sciences, French literature, and Greek and Latin. After a year's study at the Jesuit school at Rouen, he spent the next three years at the Sorbonne, where he began the study of Hebrew, Syriac, and later Arabic. In 1662 he entered the Oratorian novitiate at Dieppe, reading widely in both Roman Catholic and Protestant biblical scholarship. Prior to his ordination in Paris in 1670, he cataloged and studied the order's library collection, which contained a manuscript of the Samaritan Pentateuch and the works of several medieval Jewish commentators. He also sought out Parisian collections containing oriental and Jewish works, engaged in significant discussions with and received instruction from the learned Jewish merchant J. Salvador, and became friends with several important Protestants.

S.'s earliest publications championed the cause of Jews after R. Levi was burned at the stake in Metz (1670), favorably depicted the theology of the Eastern church (1671), compared Roman Catholic and Jewish ceremonies (1674), and provided a study of Lebanon that included a description of Islam (1675). In 1676–77, through his friendship with Protestants, including H. Justel (secretary to King Louis XIV), he became involved in planning an unbiased, interdenominational French TRANSLATION of the Bible. The boldness of his critique and the novelty of his ideas on textual matters contributed to the breakup of the joint project, eventually rendered impossible by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685).

S.'s most controversial and perhaps most significant work was his Critical History of the OT. Printed in 1678 (1,300 copies), the book had been approved by a Sorbonne censor, the superior general of the Oratory, and given a royal privilège; however, when J.-B. Boussuet, bishop of Condom, was sent a copy of the preface, he intervened with the chancellor to halt publication. The print run was confiscated except for fifteen to twenty copies, the privilège was rescinded, S. was expelled from the Oratory, and the edition was pulped. A poorly executed manuscript copy of one of the volumes, dispatched to England by Justel, was published in Amsterdam by D. Elzevier in 1680; a Latin translation of this French edition followed in 1681. Attacks on the book were published by C. M. De Veil in the form of a letter to R. BOYLE (London, dated May 14, 1678) and F. Spanheim the younger (Amsterdam, dated Dec. 10, 1678). W. Davies published an English translation by H. Dickinson in London in late 1681 or early 1682. Later in the year Tonson issued part of the original printing, which contained an English translation of S.'s reply to Spanheim's critique as well as poems by R. Duke, N. Lee, and N. Tate praising the translator and author. (Details of this publishing history of the ET are preserved in records of a lawsuit of Tonson against Dickinson; see C. Ward [1946].) In 1685 the Rotterdam publisher R. Leers reprinted the 1678 French edition supplemented by a new preface by S., marginal notes, the critiques by De Veil and Spanheim and S.'s responses, a discussion of the book written by S. under the name P. Ambrun, and Elzevier's original advertisement for the 1680 edition.

Several factors motivated the opposition to S. and to his work in France: strict censorship of materials the state considered controversial and a challenge to authority; Bossuet's high view of the authority of the church fathers and his adherence to the principle of the unchangeability of Roman Catholic doctrine; the strained relationship between such Port Royalists as A. Arnauld and S.; the internal tensions within the Congregation of the Oratory; and the penetrating sharpness of S.'s critiques, the acerbity in his expression, and his unwillingness to grant immunity from criticism to the venerated interpreters of the church's past.

Although J. D. MICHAELIS (1765), J. G. HERDER (1780), and J. SEMLER (1780) later proclaimed S. the founder or father of biblical criticism, S. was simply the best qualified and most empirically oriented of the biblical interpreters of his day. His work is firmly anchored in the developing ars critica of the seventeenth century, which had already embraced biblical study.

Three issues dominated S.'s writings on the Bible: (1) The history of the biblical text from its origins to contemporary times was his primary concern, as it was for much of contemporary scholarship. The relationship, value, and AUTHORITY of the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and other versions of the Bible—even the origin and inspiration of the Hebrew vowel points—were discussed throughout the century by the BUXTORFS, J. MORIN, L. CAPPEL, and those responsible for the London POLYGLOT. S. worked with empirical evidence reflected in the existing texts and manuscripts to offer realistic theories to explain this evidence. Thus he denied that Moses wrote the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), hypothesizing the existence of national archives preserved by prophets and scribes, from which the books were produced long after the times of the traditional authors. Such difficulties in the text as omissions, repetitions, and illogical arrangement he attributed to the activity of scribes working with multiple texts, often abridged material, and other difficulty producing factors. Given this history of origin and transmission, one could never expect to reconstruct the original text, already a secondary scribal product, from the existing manuscripts. Difficulties in the text and its lack of clarity meant that Christian theology could not be derived from or based totally on sola scriptura but must rely on the traditional faith of the church, which in its earliest form was already existent before the NT came into being. (2) The INSPIRATION of the Scriptures must be reconceived so that the process and the scribes producing the texts share in divine inspiration (see D. Barthélemy [1982]). This position had the effect of both broadening and making more superficial the doctrine of inspiration and removed the ability to point to prophecies and miracles as the final divine substantiation of a writer's inspiration and the Bible's uniqueness. (3) Translation and commentary on the Bible were for S. the goals of biblical study. One could produce a final translation no more than one could recover the original text. Translation must be made by comparison of texts, primarily the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin; thus S. valued polyglots, although he criticized the London Polyglot for printing such secondary texts as the Persian. His 1702 NT translation with extensive notes based on the VULGATE was condemned by Bossuet for its novelty and Socinian leanings (e.g., S. had annotated Matt 12:8 to note that "Son of man" means "man"; see SOCINUS). S. published little commentary but left behind a commentary manuscript on the Pentateuch eventually owned by S. BAUMGARTEN (see his 1756 review) and recently rediscovered.

S. died Apr. 11, 1712. His influence on his contemporaries was probably more significant than initially recognized. In Germany there was early dialogue with his work even though none of his writings appeared in German translation before 1713. The popularity of his work is indicated by Leers's reference in 1685 to the seventh edition of the Critical History. In England, J. Dryden's poem Religio Laici (1682) was occasioned by the English translation of S.'s volume, and J. LOCKE and others were strongly influenced by S. (see P. Harth [1968]; G. Reedy [1985]).

Works: Factum pour les Juifs de Metz, accusés d'avoir tué un petit enfant Chrétien (1670); Fides Ecclesia Orientalis (1671); Ceremonies et Coutumes que s'observent aujourd'hui parmi les Juifs (1674); Voyage du Mont-Liban (1675); A Critical History of the OT (1678; ET 1682); Critical Enquiries into the Various Editions of the Bible, Printed in Divers Places and at Several Times: Together with Animadversions Upon a Treatise of Vossius Concerning the Oracles of the Sibylls (1684; ET 1684); The Critical History of the Religions and Customs of the Eastern Nations (1684; ET 1685); The History of the Original and Progress of Ecclesiastical Revenues (1684; ET 1685); Novorum Bibliorum Polyglottorum Synopsis (1684); Résponse au livre intitulé Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande sur l'Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament (1686); De l'inspiration des livres sacrés (1687); A Critical History of the Text of the NT (1689; ET 1689); A Critical History of the Versions of the NT (1690; ET 1692); Historie Critique des principaux Commentateurs du Nouveau Testament depuis le commencement du Christianisme, jusqu' a notre temps (1692); Nouvelles observations sur le texte et les versions du Nouveau Testament (1695); Lettres choisies (3 vols., 1700–1705; 4 vols., 1730) vol. 1 contains a memoir of S. by his grand-nephew De la Martinière; The NT according to the Ancient Latin, with Critical Remarks upon the Literal Meaning in Difficult Places (2 vols., 1702; ET 1730); Bibliotheque critique, ou Recüeil de diverses pièces critiques (4 vols., 1708–10); Nouvelle bibliotheque choisie (2 vols., 1714); Critique de la bibliothèque des auteurs ecclesiastiques et des Prolegomènes de la Bible (4 vols., ed. M. E. Du-Pin, 1730); Additions aux Recherches curieuses sur la diversité de langues et religions de'E. Brerewood (ed. J. Le Brun and J. Woodbridge, 1983).

Bibliography: P. Auvray, R. S., 1638–1712: Étude biobibliographique avec des textes inedits (1974). D. Barthélemy, Critique textuelle de l'Ancien Testament (OBO 50, 1, 1982) 40-63. L. Batterel, Mémoires domestiques pour servir à l'histoire de la congregation de l'Oratoire (5 vols., ed. A. M. P. Ingold and E. Bonnardet, 1901–11) 4:233-95. S. J. Baumgarten, Nachrichten von merkwürdigen Büchern (1756) 471-76. A. Bernus, R. S. et son Histoire critique du Vieux Testament: La critique biblique au siècle de Louix XIV (1869, repr. 1969). L. I. Bredvold, The Intellectual Milieu of J. Dryden (1934) 98-107. M. A. Fahey, "R. S., Biblical Exegete," IER 99 (1963) 236-47. H. Fréville, "R. S. et les Protestants d'apres sa correspondance," Revue d'histoire moderne 6 (1931) 30-55. K. H. Graf, Beiträge zu den theologischen Wissenschaften 1 (1847) 158-242. P. Harth, Contexts of Dryden's Thought (1968) 174-225. P. Hazard, The European Mind: The Critical Years (1680–1715) (1935; ET 1953) 180-97. P. J. Lambe, "Biblical Criticism and Censorship in Ancien Régime France: The Case of R. S.," HTR 78 (1985) 149-77. J. Le Brun, "Meaning and Scope of the Return to Origins in R. S.'s Work," Trinity Journal 3 NS (1982) 57-70. W. McKane, Selected Christian Hebraists (1989) 111-50. H. Margival, Essai sur R. S. et la critique biblique au XVIIe siècle (1900). F. S. Mirri, R. S. e il methodo storico-critico di B. Spinoza (1972).

A. Molien, DTC 14, 2 (1941) 2094-118. A. Monod, La controverse de Bossuet et de R. S. au sujet de la version de Trévoux (CRHPhR, 1922). MSHH 1 (1727) 237-51; 10, B (1731) 58-75. G. Reedy, The Bible and Reason: Anglicans and Scripture in Late Seventeenth-century England (1985) 89-118. H. G. Reventlow, "R. S. und seine Bedeutung für die kritische Erforschung der Bibel," Historische Kritik in der Theologie (ed. G. Schwaiger, 1980) 11-36. B. E. Schwarzbach, "Les sources de la critique biblique de R. S.," (BTT 6, 1989) 207-31. J. Steinmann, R. S. et les origines de l'exégèse biblique (1960). F. Stummer, Die Bedeutung R. S. für die Pentateuchkritik (AA 3, 4, 1912). C. E. Ward, "Religio Laici and Father S.," Modern Language Notes 61 (1946) 407-12. J. Woodbridge, "Censure royale et censure épiscopale: le conflit de 1702," Dix-huitieme Siècle 8 (1976) 333-55; "R. S.'s Reaction to Spinoza's Tractatus Theologico-Politicus," Spinoza in der Frühzeit seiner religiösen Wirkung (ed. K. Gründer and W. Schmidt-Biggemann, 1984) 201-26; "German Responses to the Biblical Critic R. S.: From Leibniz to J. S. Semler," Historische Kritik und biblischer Kanon in der deutschen Aufklärung (ed. H. G. Reventlow et al., Wolfenbütteler Forschungen 41, 1988) 65-87; "R. S. le 'père de la critique biblique,' " (BTT 6, 1989) 193-206. M. Yardini, "La vision des Juifs et du judaïsme dans l'oeuvre de R. S.," REJ 129 (1970) 179-203.

F. H. GORMAN, JR.

SIMPSON, CUTHBERT AIKMAN (1892–1969)

Born on Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, in 1892, S. studied at King's University, Windsor, and won a Rhodes scholarship to Oxford, where he read history at Christ Church and then earned a diploma in theology. He returned to Canada as a rector in Woodside, Nova Scotia, and in 1928 began a long career as a teacher and scholar of OT at General Theological Seminary, New York. In 1954 he was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew at the University of Oxford and canon of Christ Church. On retiring from the chair in 1959, he became dean of Christ Church, where he remained until his death in 1969.

Among his students and colleagues, S. was popular for his consideration, directness, and wit. His reputation as an OT scholar rests chiefly on two books that demonstrate a rigorous adherence to the documentary hypothesis and a meticulous application of the source-critical method. This task was undertaken specifically with the aim of recovering the earliest records of Israelite tradition and hence confined itself to pre-deuteronomic material. Perhaps the most eminent exponent of this approach outside Germany, S. interacted especially with the source-critical reconstruction of O. EISSFELDT. The Early Traditions of Israel (1948) is a documentary analysis of all the J and E material in the Hexateuch and in Judges 1. Three documents were identified: J^1, J^2, and E. The earliest, J^1, the earliest, represents the traditions of Israelites who had entered Canaan from the south; J^2, using J^1 as a nucleus, and E, in turn using J^2, were the traditions of Israelites who had entered from the east. Several minor redactions were also posited. The Composition of the Book of Judges (1957) forms a sequel, tracing the course of these three documents throughout the book of Judges. The promised extension of the project as far as 1 Kings 13 did not materialize. S.'s earlier works, which exhibit his concern for religious and theological exegesis, are largely forgotten.

Works: Jeremiah, the Prophet of "My People" (1947); Revelation and Response in the OT (1947); The Early Traditions of Israel: A Critical Analysis of the Pre-deuteronomic Narrative of the Hexateuch (1948); The Composition of the Book of Judges (1957).

P. R. DAVIES

SKEHAN, PATRICK WILLIAM (1909–80)

A native New Yorker, Skehan received his BA from Fordham University (1929) and studied theology at St. Joseph's Seminary, Yonkers, New York (ordained 1933), and Scripture and Semitic languages at Catholic University, Washington, DC (STD, 1938), where he taught in the department of Semitic languages from 1938 until retirement in August 1980. He was several times visiting lecturer/professor to the oriental seminary of Johns Hopkins University and was annual professor (1954–55) and director (1955–56) at the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH, Jerusalem; CBA visiting professor to the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome (1969–70); and consultor to the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1965–71). A charter member of the CBA, he served as its president (1946–47) and treasurer and as associate editor of OTA (1978–80), editor of CBQMS (1973–75), and frequently as associate editor of CBQ.

S. wrote extensively on the psalms and the wisdom books, much of his work relating to structure, prosody, and TRANSLATION problems, areas in which he effectively applied his vast erudition in biblical and related languages. He is perhaps best known for his work on the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, some of which he edited for publication; many of his published articles were spawned by this work. Over a twenty-five-year period S.'s scholarly efforts were dedicated to the NAB translation (in its early stages known as the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine translation). He edited all parts of the OT and translated extensive sections; his work on this important project also resulted in a number of published articles.

Works: The Literary Relationship Between the Book of Wisdom and the Protocanonical Wisdom Books of the OT (1938); Studies in Israelite Wisdom and Poetry (1971) includes a bibliography of Skehan's publications up to 1971; (with A. A. Di Lella), The Wisdom of Ben Sira (1987).

Bibliography: CBQ 43 (1981) 96-98 (S.'s bibliography from 1971 until his death). A. A. Di Lella, O.F.M., "P. W. S.: A Tribute," CBQ 42 (1980) 435-37.

J. JENSEN

SKINNER, JOHN (1851–1925)

A British OT scholar, S. was born July 18, 1851, in Scotland. He was educated at Aberdeen University and the Free Church College, Aberdeen, and also studied at Edinburgh, Leipzig, and Göttingen. Ordained as a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, he served at St. Fergus (1880–86) and Kelso (1886–90). The rest of his life was spent as professor of OT language and literature at the Theological College of the Presbyterian Church of England (1890–1922). Originally located in London, the college moved to Cambridge in 1899 and took the name Westminster College; from 1908 to 1922 S. also served as its principal.

S. was an OT scholar of considerable note. His most substantive work was the commentary on Genesis in the ICC series (1910), which is marked by thorough, careful attention to the text and its exegesis; it is still eminently worth reading. An offshoot of this commentary was his study The Divine Name in Genesis (1914), in which he showed conclusively that the arguments of J. Dahse were invalid. Dahse had claimed on the basis of the variants in the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) and other ancient versions and Hebrew manuscripts that the divine names were not reliably preserved in the MT and were therefore inappropriate as a basis for PENTATEUCHAL source analysis.

S.'s Prophecy and Religion: Studies in the Life of Jeremiah (1922, 1926[2]) is something of a classic. A vivid biographical portrait of the prophet (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), it gives special emphasis to the prophet's personal religion. Throughout one can sense S.'s liberal evangelical piety, but his overly biographical and psychological approach would be criticized today for taking insufficient account of the DEUTERONOMISTIC redaction the book of Jeremiah has undergone. In addition to his magisterial work on Genesis, S. also wrote commentaries of a more popular character on Kings, Isaiah, and Ezekiel.

Works: The Book of Ezekiel (ExpB, 1895); The Book of the Prophet Isaiah (CBC, 2 vols., 1896–98); I and II Kings (Century Bible, 1904); A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Genesis (ICC, 1910); The Divine Name in Genesis (1914); Prophecy and Religion: Studies in the Life of Jeremiah (1922, 1926[2]).

Bibliography: P. R. Ackroyd, "Biblical Classics, 1, J. S.: Prophecy and Religion," ExpTim 89 (1978) 356-58. W. S. Towner, "Interpretations and Reinterpretations of the Fall," Modern Biblical Scholarship (ed. F. Eigo, 1984) 53-85. Who Was Who, 1916–28 (1947[2]) 965.

J. DAY

SMALLEY, BERYL (1905–84)

Born June 3, 1905, S. was educated at Cheltenham Ladies' College and beginning in 1924 at St. Hilda's College, Oxford, where she studied history (MA 1927). Under the influence of F. Powicke, under whom she studied at Manchester (PhD 1930), she began her work on the medieval biblical commentary tradition with a study of S. LANGTON's commentaries (published in articles in 1931). Before she gained a full-time teaching position in 1943, she served as assistant lecturer at Royal Holloway College, London (1931–35), research fellow at Girton College, Cambridge (1935–40), and temporary assistant in the department of Western manuscripts at the Bodleian Library (1940–43). She was history tutor at St. Hilda's (1943–69) as well as vice principal (1957–69). After retirement she continued to write until her death, Apr. 6, 1984.

After her work on Langton, S. explored in various phases the whole range of pre-fourteenth-century medieval biblical scholarship. The special topics of her research were the origins of the GLOSSA ORDINARIA and the literal interpretation of the Bible, especially the HB, by commentators throughout the period. Her 1941 book was a pioneering work that quickly became established as a standard work; greatly expanded in the second edition (1952), it still focused primarily on HB interpretation. Much of her work subsequently focused on NT interpretation, culminating in her collection of studies published in 1985. In the third edition of Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1983), she offered not only a supplement to but also an evaluation of her work in its second edition (preface, vii-xvii). Perhaps more than any other scholar she created an interest in medieval Bible study and made "all medievalists aware of the presence of the Bible in their midst" (R. Southern [1985] 1).

Works: The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1941, 1952[2], 1983[3]); English Friars and Antiquity in the Early Fourteenth Century (1960); "The Bible in the Middle Ages," The Church's Use of the Bible Past and Present (ed. D. E. Nineham, 1963) 57-71; "The Bible in the Medieval Schools," CHB 2 (1969) 197-220; The Becket Conflict and the Schools: A Study of Intellectuals in Politics in the Twelfth Century (1973); Historians of the Middle Ages (1974); Studies in Medieval Thought and Learning from Abelard to Wyclif (1981); "Glossa Ordinaria," TRE 13 (1984) 452-57; The Gospels in the Schools c. 1100–c. 1280 (1985); Medieval Exegesis of Wisdom Literature (ed. R. E. Murphy, 1986).

Bibliography: R. W. Southern, "B. S. and the Place of the Bible in Medieval Studies, 1927–84," The Bible in the Medieval World: Studies in Memory of B. S. (ed. K. Walsh and D. Wood, SCH Subsidia 4, 1985) 1-16 (bibliography of S.'s writings, 317-21); PBA 72 (1986) 454-71.

J. H. HAYES

SMEND, RUDOLF (1851–1913)

Born Nov. 5, 1851, in Lengerich, Germany, S. died Dec. 27, 1913, in Ballenstedt. He studied theology and Semitic languages at Göttingen, Berlin, and Bonn beginning in 1870, receiving the PhD from Bonn (1874) and the lic. theol. at Halle (1875). In 1880 he went to Basel as successor to E. KAUTZSCH and in 1889 to Göttingen, succedding E. BERTHEAU.

S. came from a family of Reformed pastors with pietistic leanings (see PIETISM) and throughout his life maintained a conservative-ecclesiastical piety. In his scholarship, however, he considered himself not so much a theologian as a philologist in the broadest sense. Hence he welcomed the fact that the Göttingen OT chair was situated in the philosophy faculty, not the theology faculty, a tradition that ended with S.'s death. His model as a scholar was J. Gildemeister in Bonn (1812–90), who had transferred from theology to oriental studies, and under whom S. had received his doctorate in Arabic studies. S.'s later major achievement in the philological field was an edition of and commentary on the Hebrew version of Ben Sira, which he had attempted to reconstruct from the old translations before the discovery of the Cairo Geniza Hebrew manuscripts (1896); thus he was prepared for the task. In his text-critical work on the HB as a whole, he ascribed greatest importance to the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT). It was due to his initative that the Göttingen Akademie der Wissenschaften in 1908 founded the Septuaginta-Unternehmen by resuming the life work of P. de LAGARDE, whom S. revered.

At Bonn, S.'s first teacher in OT was A. KAMPHAUSEN, whom S. resembled in his fastidious erudition and uncompromising attitude toward what he felt was right. S.'s dissertation at Halle, "Moses apud prophetas," was influenced by Kamphausen and E. RIEHM. In it S. presented the traditional opinion that the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) is older than the Prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). He soon surrendered this opinion, not only because of the arguments of J. WELLHAUSEN, with whom he became friends, but also as a result of his work on his Ezekiel commentary. He approached Ezekiel expecting to discover traces of the priestly writing; but in many places he found quite the opposite, a factor that supported the Grafian hypothesis (see K. GRAF). S. depicted Ezekiel more as a pastor and a lawgiver than as a prophet, as the "spiritual father of Judaism," and appraised his role more positively than did Wellhausen. S. regarded the book of Ezekiel as authentic and as a unity; indeed, he believed that it had been written in one sitting. In his later Lehrbuch der alttestamentlichen Religionsgeschichte, whose title signified a somewhat problematic compromise between a THEOLOGY of the OT and a history of Israelite religion, S. worked in terms of three periods (preprophetic, prophetic, and post-prophetic religion) in line with Wellhausen but, with a comprehensiveness untypical of Wellhausen, sharply demarcating pre-Maccabean from post-Maccabean times in the third period. In the former he saw the prophetic faith acting as a balance against the law.

S. spent his last years analyzing the narrative sources of the Hexateuch, an area that, in his view, had achieved little progress since Wellhausen. He had no taste for the work of H. GUNKEL and E. MEYER in its LITERARY-critical or FORM-critical and TRADITION-historical dimensions. S. divided the narrative of the entire Hexateuch almost completely into four original, independent sources: J^1, J^2, E, and P, going far beyond the older attempts of Wellhausen, K. BUDDE, Gunkel, and others by not confining himself to the Urgeschichte, by describing both Yahwistic sources as literary works (and not the product of a school) clearly distinguishable from one another, and by reckoning little with later supplements. The source E he regarded as a unity—which presupposed J, especially J^2—and as originating in Judah rather than in northern Israel. His thesis won acceptance in its modified form in the work of O. EISSFELDT (who designated J^1 and J^2 as L and J). Due to S.'s death, the implications of his thesis for the books of 1–2 Samuel and 1–2 Kings were not pursued beyond the level of aphorism.

Works: "De Dsu r'Rumma poeta Arabico et carmine eius" (diss. phil., Bonn, 1874); "Moses apud prophetas" (diss. theol., Halle, 1875); Der Prophet Ezechiel (KEH 8, 1880); Die Listen der Bücher Esra und Nehemia (1881); Lehrbuch der alttestamentlichen Religiongeschichte (1893); J. D. Michaelis: Festrede im Namen der Georg-August Universität (1898); Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach erklärt (1906); Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach, hebäisch und deutsch (1906); Griechisch-syrisch-hebräischer Index zur Weisheit des Jesus Sirach (1907); "Alter und Herkunft des Achikar-Romans und sein Verhältnis zu Aesop," BZAW 13 (1908) 55-125; "JE in den geschichtlichen Büchern des AT," ZAW 39 (1921) 181-217.

Bibliography: R. Smend, "Der geistige Vater des Septuaginta-Unternehmens," Studien zur Septuaginta—R. Hanhart zu Ehren (AAWG.PH 3, 190, 1990) 332-44. J. Wellhausen, Chronik der Georg-August-Universität zu Göttingen für das Jahr 1913 (1914) 8-9.

R. SMEND

SMITH, GEORGE (1840–76)

Born Mar. 26, 1840, S. ended his schooling at age fifteen when he was apprenticed as an engraver of banknotes. He developed an interest in the nascent field of ancient Near Eastern studies and educated himself, often spending his meal breaks in the British Museum, where he came to the notice of H. Rawlinson. In 1867

he was appointed assistant to Rawlinson for the preparation of the third volume of The Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia (1870) and was promoted to senior assistant to the keeper of the department of oriental antiquities.

Along with his passion for Mesopotamia, S. had an exceptional memory and an intuitive grasp of the Akkadian language. Sifting and collating the relatively unordered collection at the British Museum, his early successes included determining the date of Jehu's tribute to Shalmeneser II and discovery of an inscription dating the solar eclipse of 763 BCE, an important fixed point for biblical CHRONOLOGY. In his short career he published many translations of material from the collection as well as books and articles on the history, culture, politics, and language of the ancient Near East. He was a regular contributor to TSBA and ZÄS.

His most famous work, however, is associated with the discovery and publication of the Gilgamesh epic. In December 1872 he announced in a paper read to the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY (pub. in TSBA 2 [1873]) that he had pieced together a fragmentary set of legends that included "a copy of the story of the Flood"; he also presented a translation and short comparison of that story with the accounts in Genesis and Berossus. The parallels caught the public fancy; in spring 1873 the Daily Telegraph sponsored S.'s expedition to discover the missing fragments of the epic, with a further expedition following in 1874. An account of these expeditions appeared in 1875 under the title Assyrian Discoveries, along with a book-length study of Mesopotamian mythological material (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), including Gilgamesh and Enuma Elish, entitled The Chaldean Account of Genesis. A third expedition proved fatal. S. collapsed near Aleppo, where he died Aug. 19, 1876.

The Chaldean Account of Genesis was an immensely popular and influential work. At the time of S.'s death it had entered its fourth edition; a German translation had also been prepared, edited by Friedrich DELITZSCH, with whom S. had formed a friendship, and translated by his brother H. Delitzsch. In addition to disseminating the translations of such works as Gilgamesh and Enuma Elish, S. argued that these dated from the early second millennium and interpreted them as precursors to the biblical accounts. Thus he may be seen as an early representative of the schools of thought that saw Mesopotamia as the source of inspiration for the culture and traditions of Israel (e.g., Pan-Babylonianism and the Babel und Bibel controversy).

Works: History of Assurbanipal: Translated from the Cuneiform Inscriptions (1871); The Phonetic Value of Cuneiform Characters (1871); Notes on the Early History of Assyria and Babylonia (1872); Assyria: From the Earliest Times to the Fall of Nineveh (Ancient History from the Monuments Series, 1875); Assyrian Discoveries: An Account of Explorations and Discoveries on the Site of Nineveh, During 1873 and 1874 (1875); The Assyrian Eponym Canon: Containing Translations of the Documents (1875); The Chaldean Account of Genesis (1875; rev. ed. by A. H. Sayce, 1880; GT, G. S.'s chaldäische Genesis [1876]); The History of Babylonia (ed. A. H. Sayce, Ancient History from the Monuments Series, 1877); The History of Sennacherib (ed. by A. H. Sayce, 1878).

Bibliography: A. H. Sayce, Nature (Sept. 14, 1876) 421-22. T. Seccombe, DNB 53 (1898) 39-41. J. Sweek, "The Monuments, the Babel-Bibel Streit, and Responses to Historical Criticism," The Pitcher Is Broken: Memorial Essays for G. W. Ahlstrom (ed. W. Holloway and L. K. Handy, 1995), 401-19; The Times Newspaper (Dec. 4, 1875) 4A; (Sept. 5, 1876) 4C; (Sept. 7, 1876) 10F; (Sept. 9, 1876) 6A; (Sept. 11, 1876) 11C; (Sept. 13, 1876) 10A; (Sept. 15, 1876) 8F.

P. L. TRUDINGER

SMITH, GEORGE ADAM (1856–1942)

After graduating from the University of Edinburgh in 1875, S. prepared for ordained ministry in the Free Church of Scotland at New College, Edinburgh. His interest in biblical scholarship was aroused by the Hebrew scholar A. DAVIDSON and by summers in Leipzig and Tübingen, where he came into contact with Franz DELITZSCH and A. von HARNACK. He came to regard W. R. SMITH as a kindred spirit in the Free Church. S. accepted a parish appointment in Aberdeen (1882). Ten years later he was appointed professor of OT language, literature, and theology at the Free Church College in Glasgow. His reputation as a preacher and teacher and his growing list of publications brought him numerous honors on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1910 he became principal of Aberdeen University, and his burgeoning responsibilities as a university administrator gradually took precedence over biblical scholarship.

It is against the background of the parish ministry that much of S.'s early scholarship must be viewed. A gifted expositor, he helped to convince many English-speaking Protestants that EVANGELICAL Christianity and critical scholarship were not incompatible and that the reader who is fully informed about the historical context of a biblical text will be most likely to touch the divine truth embedded within. His popular commentaries on Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the Minor Prophets, making cautious use of LITERARY criticism, highlighted the social and political contexts of the material. This approach enabled S. to turn the attention of his audiences to contemporary social and political issues and provided him with a biblical foundation for his extensive involvement in the Scottish labor movement and the debate over socialism. The lectures collected in Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the OT both described the critical movement and acclaimed it as a valuable tool for spreading the gospel because of its emphasis on the evolutionary character of Israel's faith and on the ethical character of the prophets. His enthusiasm for German criticism, however, did not always meet with approval, as is evidenced by the abortive attempt to try him for heresy in the United Free Church Assembly in 1902.

A burning desire to educate laypeople is especially prominent in S.'s publications on Palestine. He made several ambitious tours of the Holy Lands, eventually publishing detailed accounts of the customs, topography, and natural life relevant to the biblical record. Of these, his Historical Geography of the Holy Land was most widely read; repeatedly reprinted, it remains a valuable, classical tool. An extensive knowledge of Hebrew culture led him to refute contemporary opinion on the meter of Hebrew POETRY and later in his career to produce numerous short studies that attempted to help others see "the Bible's earthly stage and background."

Works: Book of Isaiah (2 vols., 1888–90); Historical Geography of the Holy Land (1894); The Book of the Twelve Prophets (2 vols., 1896–98); Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the OT (1901); Jerusalem (2 vols., 1908); The Early Poetry of Israel in Its Physical and Social Origins (1913); Deuteronomy (1918); Jeremiah (1923).

Bibliography: S. A. Cook, PBA 28 (1942) 325-46. W. Manson, DNB Sup. 6 (1959) 792-94. R. A. Riesen, Criticism and Faith in Late Victorian Scotland: A. B. Davidson, W. R. Smith, and G. A. S. (1985). L. A. Smith, G. A. S.: A Personal Memoir and Family Chronicle (1943).

B. J. MACHAFFIE

SMITH, HENRY PRESERVED (1847–1927)

Born Oct. 23, 1847, in Troy, Ohio, S. studied at Marietta College (1864–66) and received the BA from Amherst (1869) and the BD from Lane Theological Seminary (1872). He spent time in Berlin, studied OT THEOLOGY in Leipzig under Franz DELITZSCH, and taught at Lane (1874–93), becoming professor of OT exegesis in 1877. He was professor of biblical literature, Amherst College (1898–1906); professor of OT literature and history of religions, Meadville Seminary (1907–13); and librarian and professor of theology, Union Seminary, New York (1913–25). Retiring in 1925, he died Feb. 26, 1927.

S. began his career as a theological conservative, unconcerned with issues of critical exegesis. His intellectual integrity, however, compelled him to face textual problems and the questions raised by the historical methods of critical scholarship. A turning point for him was his generally favorable review of J. WELLHAUSEN's critical theories (Presbyterian Review 3 [1882] 357-88), which was moderately controversial in Presbyterian circles. Serious opposition to S. arose a decade later when he defended C. BRIGGS, who was being tried for heresy by Presbyterian authorities. S. was then tried for heresy on the grounds that his adopting historical-critical methods of biblical scholarship denied the doctrine of verbal INSPIRATION as set forth especially by B. B. WARFIELD. In 1892 S. was condemned and removed from the ministry; from 1893 to 1898 he was without an academic position.

Chiefly an OT scholar, S. not only helped introduce critical scholarship into the United States but was also a major contributor. Among his works, the commentary on the books of Samuel (1899), his OT history (1903), and a history of Israel's religion (1914) have been most influential.

Works: Inspiration and Inerrancy (1893); The Bible and Islam; or, The Influence of the Old and New Testaments on the Religion of Mohammed (1897); A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Books of Samuel (ICC, 1899); OT History (1903); The Religion of Israel: An Historical Study (1914); Essays in Biblical Interpretation (1921); The Heretic's Defense: A Footnote to History (1926), autobiography.

Bibliography: H. W. Bowden, DARB, 410-11. J. A. Brewer, AJSL 43 (1927) 249-54. J. D. Campbell, "Biblical Criticism in America, 1858–92: The Emergence of the Historical Critic" (diss., University of Denver, 1982) 225-48. DAB 17 (1935) 278-79.

G. E. SCHWERDTFEGER

SMITH, JOSEPH (1805–44)

The founder of Mormonism, S. was born Dec. 23, 1805, in Sharon, Vermont, and spent his youth in the Bible-drenched environs of New England and upstate New York. He came of age in the new United States precisely as unmediated Scripture, theoretically unencumbered by clerical, creedal, or scholarly interpretation, was approaching its historical apex among citizens increasingly aware of their sovereignty. Although creeds and clergy remained important in some sectors, "The Bible alone!" was the ascendant watchword. Reacting to the crisis in spiritual authority emerging from this context and possessed of but a rudimentary education, S. in 1830 launched what became perhaps the most colorful, controversial, complex, and successful religious movement native to North America. Crucial to this development was S.'s use of the Bible, which, prior to his murder June 27, 1844, in Carthage, Illinois, took extraordinary turns.

In some ways S.'s scriptural perspectives were conventional for his time, place, and station. Like his contemporaries, his religious conceptions and everyday speech were saturated in biblical language and images. He shared many of his culture's assumptions about the literality, historicity, and INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE. He read its narratives with presuppositions about the immutability of truth and the direct relevance of PROPHECY (the imminent millennium, America as chosen) common to his era. He viewed the OT through an NT lens, was influenced by a contemporaneous Christian primitivism, and embraced both a long tradition of typological thought and an emerging train of dispensational thought.

But while participating fully in his culture, S. also struggled against it and even changed it. Eventually his views complicated ordinary issues of interpretation with such distinctive dimensions as oral scripture, private scripture, temporary scripture, noncanonized scripture, and an extra-biblical CANON. In 1830 S. published The Book of Mormon, translated with divine assistance, he said, from ancient records telling principally of a Hebrew civilization (Nephites, Lamanites) originally transplanted to North America prior to the Babylonian conquest. Thus appeared in the antebellum United States a new scripture built with biblical language that at once challenged yet reinforced biblical AUTHORITY, echoed biblical themes, interpreted biblical passages, shared biblical content, corrected biblical errors, filled biblical gaps, and restored biblical methods—i.e., the prophetic process.

Immediately after completing The Book of Mormon and organizing "The Church of Christ," S. undertook a revision of the Bible and continued to receive revelations formulated "after the manner of [human] language" and conceptions. The recorded revelations, many of which were adopted into the Mormon canon, were filled with biblical themes, phrases, and figures yet were themselves independent, coherent religious creations. They show S.'s understanding of Scripture to have been expansive. For him, Scripture was not the static, final, untouchable Word of God that it was for many of his contemporaries. Although his allegiance to it was basic, Scripture was for S. provisional, adaptable, progressive, relivable, subject to refinement and addition, spoken as well as written, varied in its inspiration, and subordinate to direct experience with God.

While dimensions of S.'s use of the Bible have amused, outraged, or inspired various religionists, several aspects invite scholars' notice. For example, half a century before theories about the multiple authorship and the ancient redaction of biblical books gained currency in the United States among any but a handful of specialists at Harvard and at Andover Seminary, S. offered a forthright and dramatic picture of the documentary hypothesis at work: The Book of Mormon depicted the fourth-century prophet-historian Mormon freely abridging, editing, and appropriating the records of earlier writers in his account of the ancient Nephite civilization. Again, S.'s early sensitivities to the limits of human communication, deriving from his attempt to record his revelations, anticipated by almost twenty years H. BUSHNELL's influential "Dissertation on Language" (1849), which explored the limitations of human discourse and had profound implications for the meaning of sacred texts. "O, Lord," lamented the twenty-six-year-old S. in 1832, "deliver us in due time from the little, narrow prison, almost as it were, total darkness of paper, pen and ink—and a crooked, broken, scattered and imperfect language."

A certain tension evolved between the Bible and S., although he continued to understand himself and his people as Bible loyalists—indeed, as embodiments of biblical prophecy—yet the limitations he put on biblical authority were substantial and singular. His deeply biblical consciousness, literalism, and inherited notions of "verbal inspiration" were in conflict with his own prophetic experiences, which invaded and altered his earlier assumptions. Not only was revelation filtered through human capacities, as many Bible believers of his day allowed, but revelation was also ongoing, open-ended, and involved active human participation, even experimentation, in a kind of divine/human dialectic. How to balance the authority of Scripture with his own prophetic authority was a problem. Often when a biblical assertion did not seem consonant with his own views, S. suggested that transmission errors had marred the received texts.

S.'s followers inherited these tensions. B. Young, who construed himself as a Bible loyalist, nonetheless insisted on the primacy of living prophets and on the importance of common sense and the truths revealed by science and by human experience. He dismissed parts of the Bible as folktales (see FOLKLORE). Other leaders have worked harder to hold the Bible together with Mormon views. With considerable internal diversity and a measure of inconsistency, the general Mormon tendency since S.'s death has been, relative to other Christians, both to elevate and to lower the Bible's status: Because they believe that they have so vividly recapitulated biblical narratives and have seen the process of revelation occur in their midst, biblical reality and authority have been renewed for Mormons against a secularizing culture. In the process, however, their contemporary prophets and distinctively Mormon scriptures have overshadowed the Bible.

Works: The Book of Mormon (1830); The Doctrine and Covenants (in various forms and dates); The Pearl of Great Price (1851); The Holy Scriptures (1867); The Words of J. S. (ed. A. F. Ehat and L. W. Cook, 1980); The Personal Writings of J. S. (ed. D. Jessee, 1984); An American Prophet's Record: The Diaries and Journals of J. S. (ed. A. H. Faulring, 1987); (ed.), The Papers of J. S., vol. 1, Autobiographical and Historical Writings (ed. D. Jessee, 1989); vol. 2, Journal, 1832–42 (1992).

Bibliography: P. L. Barlow, Mormons and the Bible: The Place of the Latter-day Saints in American Religion (1991). F.

Brodie, No Man Knows My History: The Life of J. S., The Mormon Prophet (1971). R. Bushman, J. S. and the Beginnings of Mormonism (1984). D. Hill, J. S.: The First Mormon (1977). A. Hutchinson, "A Mormon Midrash? Latter-day Saints Creation Narratives Reconsidered," Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 21 (Winter 1988) 11-74. R. Matthews, "A Plainer Translation": J. S.'s Translation of the Bible: A History and Commentary (1975). K. Sandberg, "Knowing Brother Joseph Again: The Book of Abraham and J. S. as Translator," Dialogue: A Journal of Mormon Thought 22 (Winter 1989) 19-37.

P. L. BARLOW

SMITH, JULIA EVELINA (1792–1886)

The first woman to publish her own TRANSLATION of the Bible (1876), S. was one of five daughters of Hannah and Zephaniah Hollister, a Yale graduate who left the Congregational ministry and went into law. By 1869 she and her sister Abby were the family's surviving members. Convinced women's rights advocates, they protested taxation without suffrage in their local town meeting. Their refusal to pay taxes led to repeated auctions of their prized Alderney cows. It became a cause célèbre.

S., the scholar of the two, decided in 1876 to capitalize on their notoriety by publishing her own translation of the Bible. Always a careful student of Scripture, she had first turned to the original Greek to check W. Miller's (1782–1849) apocalyptic predictions in the 1840s. Finding many KJV passages unsatisfactorily translated, she began in about 1843 a literal, word-by-word translation of both testaments. She made five different translations: from a Greek NT, from the SEPTUAGINT, from the VULGATE, and, still dissatisfied, taught herself Hebrew and completed two more translations from that language. She spent seven years on the project. Her 1876 Bible was the first translation "by a woman, unaided and alone," as an ad for the Bible attests.

Bibliography: S. J. Shaw, A Religious History of J. E. S.'s 1876 Translation of the Holy Bible 1993). M. B. Stern, "The First Feminist's Bible: The 'Alderney' Edition, 1876," Quarterly Journal of the Library of Congress 34 (January 1977) 23-31.

N. A. HARDESTY

SMITH, LOUISE PETTIBONE (1887–1981)

Born at Ogdensburg, New York, Oct. 4, 1887, S. grew up in a family that valued education. She was also heir to strong Protestant convictions and maintained a lifelong interest in theology, ethics, and the church. (S.'s maternal grandfather, a Congregational and Presbyterian cleric, was one of the founders of the Abolitionist Society in central New York and organized schools in Georgia for the Freedman's Bureau.) S. called herself a Calvinist and summarized her career by quoting CALVIN: "It is not enough to teach faithfully, unless we also contend" (People's World). A Bryn Mawr graduate of 1908 with a major in classics, S. earned an MA and a PhD in Semitics and in Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY (1912, 1917). In 1914 she was a Thayer fellow at the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in Jerusalem. For most of her career she taught at Wellesley College, beginning in 1915; at her retirement in 1953, she held the John Stewart Kennedy Professorship of Biblical History. She was secretary of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (1950–52) and from 1952 to 1970 achieved national prominence as co-chair of the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born.

Known for her careful studies of the biblical prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), S. followed the classic models of philological and source-critical analysis as pioneered by German scholars and developed in the United States. Her works on Isaiah and Ezekiel are noteworthy in this regard, and she later published theologically sensitive works on Micah and Ruth. S. was a little-recognized force in making German evangelical theology known to American audiences. Very early, recognizing R. BULTMANN's importance, she translated his Jesus and the Word (1934) and later the first volume of Faith and Understanding (1969); she also translated K. BARTH's Theology and the Church: Shorter Writings, 1920–28. As co-chair of the American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born, S. took up the biblical prophetic spirit of social critique (see her study of Micah). Deriving her activism from the biblical teaching of one law for the alien and the native born (Lev 24:22), she stood against the excesses of McCarthyism, traveling the country to defend resident aliens and naturalized citizens who were being summarily deported or otherwise denied those basic rights enjoyed by native-born Americans. She wrote a history of the commitee and its struggles (A Torch of Liberty [1959]). On her seventy-fifth birthday one thousand civil libertarians honored her at a testimonial dinner.

Works: "The Messianic Ideal of Isaiah," JBL 36 (1917) 158-211; "The Use of the Word twrh in Isaiah, Chapters 1–39," AJSL 46 (1929–30) 1-21; "The Eagle(s) of Ezekiel 17," JBL 58 (1939) 43-50; "The Book of Micah," Int 6 (1952) 210-27; "The Book of Ruth," IB (1953) 2:829-52; Torch of Liberty (1959).

Bibliography: M. Canright, "The Creed of a 'Subversive' Yankee" People's World (Sept. 20, 1958) 10. P. Lehmann, "L. P. S., R. Bultmann, and Wellesley," Bultmann: Retrospect and Prospect (ed. E. Hobbs, 1985). R. F. Norrick, "L. P. S. Diamond Jubilee Testimonial Dinner" (The American Committee for the Protection of Foreign Born, 1962; materials related to S.'s work with the Committee are deposited in the Labadie Collection, the University of Michigan); "Daughter of Liberty," World Magazine (Oct. 8, 1977) 6.

B. O. LONG

SMITH, MORTON (1915–91)

S. was born in Philadelphia May 28, 1915, received an AB from Harvard (1936), an STB from Harvard Divinity School (1940), a PhD from Hebrew University, Jerusalem (1948), and a ThD from Harvard Divinity School. At Harvard he studied with H. CADBURY, A. D. NOCK, and H. Wolfson. He taught at Brown University (1950–55), Drew University (1956–57), and Columbia University (1957–85). He died July 11, 1991.

Early in his career S. left the church, characterizing the position he came to adopt as atheism: Belief in divine intervention in human affairs is not a valid basis for historical scholarship (1996, 1:3-11, esp. 7). He enjoyed provoking the conventionally faithful, proposing reconstructions of the past that opposed the narrative promoted by Jewish and Christian orthodoxies, and delighted in denouncing pseudo-orthodoxy—statements of faith masquerading as scholarship (1996, 1:37-54). His wide range of interests facilitated comparisons he believed essential: Religions should not be studied in isolation. This commitment is expressed in the title of his Festschrift: Christianity, Judaism, and Other Greco-Roman Cults. Examples of his synthetic view are the criteria he proposed for identifying the significant in the theology of the ancient Near East (1996, 1:15-27), the similarities between Second Isaiah and contemporary Persian sources (1:73-83), the analysis of Nehemiah as the tyrant of Jerusalem (1971, 1987², 126-47), or the investigation of JESUS in the light of the magical papyri that culminated in Jesus the Magician.

Many of S.'s articles represent turning points in the history of scholarship. His explanation of the variation of JOSEPHUS'S assessment of the Pharisees throughout his works is a prime instance (1996, 1:104-15). Also important are the studies of the variety of messianic figures in ancient Judaism (1:161-67) and the DEAD SEA sect (1:168-83), the discussion of Zealots and Sicarii (1:211-26), and the analysis of aretalogies (2:3-27).

In 1957 at the monastery of Mar Saba near Jerusalem, S. happened on an unknown letter of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA written on the back blank pages of a seventeenth-century edition of the works of IGNATIUS. The letter warned against and quoted from a "secret gospel of Mark." S. argued that the letter was authentic and that this secret gospel was of great significance for understanding the history of Christianity. These claims generated much controversy, with some scholars implying that S. had forged the whole business and S. repeatedly defending his conclusions (S. Cohen, "Writings of M. S.," nos. 149, 168, 173, 221, 238).

Works: "Psychiatric Practice and Christian Dogma," Journal of Pastoral Care 3 (1949) 12-20; Tannaitic Parallels to the Gospels (JBLMS 6, 1951); (with M. Hadas), Heroes and Gods: Spiritual Biographies in Antiquity (Religious Perspectives 13, 1965); Palestinian Parties and Politics that Shaped the OT (Lectures on the History of Religions 9, 1971, 1987²); Clement of Alexandria and a Secret Gospel of Mark (1973); (with E. J. Bickerman), The Ancient History of Western Civilization (1976); Jesus the Magician (1978); Studies in the Cult of Yahweh (2 vols., Religions in the Graeco-Roman World 130, 1-2, ed. S. J. D. Cohen, 1996), includes full bibliography by Cohen, 2:257-78.

Bibliography: W. M. Calder, Gnomen 64 (1992) 382-84. S. J. D. Cohen (ed.), "Are there Tannaitic Parallels to the Gospels?" JAOS 116 (1996) 85-89; "In Memoriam M. S.," Studies in the Cult of Yahweh (M. Smith, 1996) 2:279-85. J. Neusner (ed.), Christianity, Judaism, and Other Greco-Roman Cults: Studies for M. S. at Sixty (4. vols., SJLA 12, 1975); Are There Really Tannaitic Parallels to the Gospels? A Refutation of M. S. (South Florida Studies in the History of Judaism 80, 1993). F. Parente and J. Sievers (eds.), Josephus and the History of the Greco-Roman Period: Essays in Memory of M. S. (SPB 41, 1994). H. Shanks, "Annual Meetings Offer Intellectual Bazaar and Moments of High Drama," BARev 11, 2 (March/April 1985) 12-16.

A. BAUMGARTEN

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (1846–94)

At the cost of considerable personal suffering, S. did more than anyone else to establish historical criticism as a permanent feature of biblical study in Great Britain. Born Nov. 8, 1846, in Keig, near Aberdeen, he was educated at the universities in Aberdeen (1861–65) and Edinburgh (1866–68) and held the chair of Hebrew and OT at Free Church College, Aberdeen, from November 1870 to May 1881, when he was dismissed on a charge of heresy. He then worked for EncBrit, becoming sole editor. In 1883 he moved to Cambridge as reader in Arabic and member of Trinity College, and became a fellow of Christ's College (1885), university librarian (1886), and Sir Thomas Adams Professor of Arabic (1889). He died in Cambridge, Mar. 31, 1894.

The education S. received from his father, a cleric of the breakaway conservative Free Church of Scotland, enabled him to combine deep EVANGELICAL commitment with a fearless quest for learning and truth. At age fourteen he went to Aberdeen University, excelling in both sciences and humanities. While at New College, Edinburgh, where his chief mentor, A. DAVIDSON, had a cautious respect for biblical criticism, S. made the first of the many visits to Germany that were to make him an advocate of European historical criticism. From 1870 his Aberdeen students were almost unique in having a British OT professor who spent time in Bonn, Göttingen, and Heidelberg and who valued the theology of R. Rothe and A. RITSCHL.

Brilliant and controversial, S. was dramatically affected by a commission to write some articles for the ninth edition of the EncBrit. (Many of his articles for this work were revised and published in Encyclopaedia Biblica [ed. T. CHEYNE and J. Black, 1899–1903].) The article "Bible," which appeared in December 1875, led to an enquiry by the General Assembly of the Free Church in 1878 and 1880 into whether S. was undermining belief in the INSPIRATION and infallible truth of the Bible. In 1880 a small majority of members favored dropping the charges and admonishing S. However, two weeks after this acquittal his article "Hebrew Language and Literature" appeared in the eleventh volume of Britannica to be followed by his article "Animal Worship and Animal Tribes Among the Arabs and in the OT" in JP 19 (1880) 75-100 (repr. in his Lectures and Essays [1902] 455-83). The former article reiterated positions about which he had been admonished, while the second presaged his later work on comparative Semitic religion and argued that the HB contained evidence that Israel's religion had passed through a totemic phase. (His idea of totemism as a feature of primitive religions was taken from the earlier writings of J. McLennan.)

Suspended until his case could be considered by the General Assembly, S. used the intervening period to deliver public lectures in his own defense (The OT in the Jewish Church [1881]). For one on trial for heresy these lectures were very bold, amounting to an impassioned exposition of S.'s unique version of the position argued in J. WELLHAUSEN's epoch-making History of Israel, a view S. had reached independently. He argued that access to God in the early religion of Israel was not hedged about with cultic requirements and that the elaborate levitical system attributed to Moses was a later development. However, these scholarly findings were no threat to Christian faith; in fact, in confirming evangelical belief in the availability of God's grace directly to the believer, biblical criticism was a necessary expression of the true spirit of the Reformation. But although the lectures were reprinted twice within months of original publication, they did not save S. from dismissal in May 1881.

For the remainder of his career he devoted his time to Arabic and comparative Semitic religious studies. His work on the prophets (1882; see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) was based on a series of popular lectures and followed B. DUHM and Wellhausen in arguing for a vital prophetic contribution to the development of Israelite religion. His 1885 work expanded his earlier article on animal tribes, using Arabic materials to reconstruct the primitive forms of Semitic social organization and arguing that primitive Semitic society had been organized on the basis of totemism. On four occasions (1875–79, 1879–80, 1889, 1890), S. visited the Middle Eastern lands about which he wrote.

In 1888 at Marischal College, Aberdeen, S. delivered the first series of Burnett lectures, which were to form the basis of his greatest work (1889), arguing that fundamental to Semitic understanding of sacrifice was communion, not expiation. It was not just the conclusion that was novel but also the method, which tried to understand Semitic sacrifice in terms of social organization. Often called a father of modern social science, S. directly influenced such sociologists as E. Durkheim. Reprinted many times and enlarged into new editions, S.'s books exercised great influence on thinking about ancient Semitic social life and religious practices for three or four generations after his death.

Works: The OT in the Jewish Church (1881, 1892[2]); Prophets of Israel (1882; ed. T. K. Cheyne, 1895[2]); Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia (1885); Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (1st ser. 1889, 1894[2]; ed. S. A. Cook, 1927[3]; 2nd and 3rd ser. ed. J. Day, JSOTSup 183, 1995); Lectures and Essays (ed. J. S. Black and G. Chrystal, 1902).

Bibliography: Anonymous, A. and C. Black, 1807–1957 (1957) 35-47. W. M. Bailey, "W. R. S. and American Biblical Studies," JPH 51 (1973) 285-308. T. O. Beidelman, W. R. S. and the Sociological Study of Religion (1974), with full bibliography, 69-92. J. S. Black, DNB 53 (1898) 160-62. J. S. Black and G. Chrystal, The Life of W. R. S. (1912). J. A. Dearman, HHMBI, 359-63. W. Johnstone (ed.), W. R. S.: Essays in Reassessment (JSOTSup 189, 1995). R. R. Nelson, "The Theological Development of the Young R. S.," EQ 45 (1973) 81-99. R. A. Riesen, Criticism and Faith in Late Victorian Scotland: A. B. Davidson, W. R. S., and G. A. Smith (1985) 94-251. J. W. Rogerson, Anthropology and the OT (1978) 24-27, 30-31, 35-38; "W. R. S.: Religion of the Semites," ExpTim 90 (1979) 228-33; The Bible and Criticism in Victorian Britain: Profiles of F. D. Maurice and W. R. S. (JSOTSup 201, 1995).

J. W. ROGERSON

SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC CRITICISM

Social-scientific criticism, in its broadest sense, applies methods and theories to biblical texts in an attempt to reconstruct the social worlds behind these texts (e.g., ancient Israel) while simultaneously illuminating the lives of the people living in these worlds. The implementation of this method reflects a paradigm shift away from the questions asked by historical critics and biblical theologians, recognizing the limited ability of the older models to shed light on these ancient social worlds. New theories generated through the social sciences provide biblical scholars with models for understanding social and religious phenomena that are different from those found in the dynamics of modern life.

The models and approaches of social-scientific criticism include a variety of subdisciplines of the social sciences whose relevance for analyzing the Bible as a social document is still being tested. Most important among these subdisciplines are SOCIOLOGY, which is interested in locating and analyzing patterns of social behavior that provide generalizations about social change; and anthropology and its subdisciplines, such as ARCHAEOLOGY and structural anthropology, which are less concerned with generalizations, focusing instead on the comparative study of human behavior. The combined application of these methods allows the researcher to reconstruct various social dimensions of the biblical text.

Although social-scientific criticism is regarded by many scholars as a recent addition to the list of paradigms employed for interpreting the Bible, interest in analyzing the social processes that gave rise to the biblical texts has historical roots. Scholars in the Middle Ages, e.g., RASHI, SAMUEL BEN MEIR, J. BEKHOR SHOR, and HUGH OF ST. VICTOR, were interested in understanding the culture surrounding the text rather than in relying solely on the then popular allegorical method of interpretation (R. Wilson [1984] 2-3). Later, Renaissance scholars became interested in the CROSS-CULTURAL connections between ancient Israel and the rest of the ancient Near East.

Representative of early anthropological studies that attempted to understand the social structure and religious customs of ancient Israel and that served as precursors for contemporary social-scientific criticism are those of W. R. SMITH (1889) and J. WELLHAUSEN (1897). These two scholars employed an evolutionary model to explain social phenomena in the HB, using a general comparative method that linked early Israel to the pre-Islamic bedouin Arabs as well as to elements of contemporary Arabic culture. By examining these elements alongside classical Arabic texts, Wellhausen and Smith believed that it was possible to reconstruct the religion and society of ancient Israel. Their anthropological approaches were accepted by later scholars like J. PEDERSEN (1920–34; ET 1926–40) and R. de VAUX (1958–60; ET 1961), whose studies of social life in ancient Israel followed, and whose works are also considered classics. However, the methods employed in these studies are now recognized as relying on comparative data whose relevance to the study of ancient Israel is questionable.

Pioneering studies in historical-critical methods provided examples of both the importance and the limits of other approaches in relationship to social-scientific criticism. For example, the TRADITION-historical research of M. NOTH (1948) builds on comparative evidence from Greek amphictyonies, whose social organization centered around a common religious shrine maintained by members of the tribal confederation. H. GUNKEL's form-critical studies (see FORM CRITICISM) explored the social location of the biblical text in order to understand the social processes that fostered its development from oral tradition to literary production. These studies (and the work of Wellhausen and Smith) understood ancient Israel to be a pastoral nomadic society. Yet this pastoral nomadic model, the basic assumption on which these earlier studies were grounded, is no longer tenable; it neglects to take into consideration the dynamic of change in social structures over time or from one social setting to another. Moreover, statements regarding behavioral patterns are descriptive (subjective) rather than analytic (objective).

By contrast, in Ancient Judaism (1952; originally published as journal articles, 1917–19) social scientist M. WEBER presented a sustained sociological analysis of the HB as evidence for his theories of capitalism, anticipating theories currently embraced by biblical scholars. His reconstruction of early Israel depicted a society dependent on two economic bases: seminomadic groups and settled agriculturalists. According to Weber, the bond between these groups was cemented by their common commitment to a covenant and to the authority of charismatic individuals who arose at particular junctures in history. This loosely organized mixed multitude evolved over time into a hierarchical structure that slowly eroded the freedom and the authority of the family unit, usurping power for itself. The onset of the monarchy, Weber argued, led to the stratification of society into the landowners and the landless. This economic distinction and the corruption and exploitation to which it gave rise were the focus of the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), who opposed this system of injustice, drawing on the covenant tradition and on the social equality that existed before the monarchy. Thus Weber's reconstruction of ancient Israel explored the changing institutions of society and related these changes to both political and economic conditions. His theories of the history of ancient Israel were developed further by A. LODS (1930) and A. CAUSSE (1934, 1937), who noted tensions between the indigenous Canaanites and the nomadic Israelites.

The 1960s and 1970s marked a watershed as increasing numbers of scholars applied the methods and theories of social-scientific criticism in reconstructing their histories of ancient Israel. Focusing on socioeconomic conditions, G. MENDENHALL (1973) rejected Noth's thesis of the amphictyonic social organization in ancient Israel because the biblical tradition does not support the theory that ancient Israel had a central shrine. Moreover, Noth's argument located the amphictyony in an urban setting, while Mendenhall argued that early Israel was a peasant-based tribal federation that revolted against its Canaanite overlords and bound itself together through a covenant tradition with God. Ultimately, Mendenhall's reconstruction moves from a socioeconomic perspective to one that emphasizes the ethical dimensions of this revolution at the expense of political forces.

Using an explicitly sociological model for analyzing biblical data, N. GOTTWALD—independently of Mendenhall—focused on pre-monarchical Israel (1979).

His writings refute the pastoral, nomadic societal model for early Israel and interpret the so-called conquest as a retribalization effort by a peasant population. Gottwald's theory relies on sociologist K. Marx (1818–83), who argued that the roots of historical change lie in economic and social forces. Gottwald suggested that Israel emerged from a retribalization movement within the hierarchical Canaanite social structure. He then examined the process by which disaffected, disenfranchised peasants revolted against a hierarchical power structure and retribalized along egalitarian lines. (Note: The distinction between a peasant who controls the products of his or her labor and sells them in a free economy and a peasant whose labor and produce are subject to hierarchical political systems is crucial in this analysis.) Gottwald's study exemplifies the sociological perspective that connects socioeconomic processes and IDEOLOGICAL analysis for the purpose of reconstructing the social history of biblical periods.

Social-scientific studies that have provided a greater understanding of the social life of ancient Israel have focused on kinship and family, marriage, kingship, the queen mother, and sacred prostitution. Although earlier studies of these topics cannot be ignored, they are of limited usefulness, being based on comparative data of questionable relevance for interpreting ancient Israel. Nonetheless, scholarly investigation builds on comparative data whose relevance for understanding the biblical tradition are continually being tested. For example, Wilson (1980) applied anthropological and sociological methods to gather data on the social roles of Israel's prophets. He referred to the entire spectrum of prophetic activity in ancient Israel by the general term "intermediary." Thus he employed terminology that he believed would not oversimplify the ancient or modern data on prophecy but would instead relate the individuals being analyzed to their cultural settings and not to the supernatural. Wilson distinguished between two types of intermediaries, central and peripheral. Central intermediaries seek to maintain the status quo of the society; peripheral intermediaries seek social change, since they tend to lack social status and to function on the fringes of society. Wilson maintained that central and peripheral intermediaries are not opposites but lie along a continuum where movement is possible; a shift from one category of intermediary to the other usually indicates a shift in the nature of the intermediary's social role (1980, 27-28).

While Wilson's study of prophecy drew on comparative anthropological and sociological data, D. Petersen (1981) applied sociological role theory in order to understand the prophetic function. B. Long (1982) and T. Overholt (1989) represent biblical scholars who have turned to British structural anthropology (the study of social phenomena in terms of how the phenomena function within the larger social structure) and ethnographies (descriptions rather than analyses) of Native Americans for their studies of Israelite prophecy.

Thus the current theoretical scene is made up of diverse social-scientific paradigms. Concurrent with the rise of social-scientific criticism in the 1960s was the beginning of women's studies in North America, which resulted in scholarship that focused on gender issues in the Bible (see FEMINIST INTERPRETATION). Approaches from the social sciences provided biblical scholars with an avenue to explore the power and danger (due to their polyvalence of meanings) of biblical stories that inform contemporary attitudes about women's social roles. C. Meyers (1988) relied on comparative data to contextualize gender issues within the pre-industrialized non-Western peasant society of the HB. Her research centered on the social analysis of early Israel developed by Gottwald but focused specifically on women's role in the central highlands in pre-monarchical Israel. She argued that equality between the sexes existed in Israel's formative years and that the institution of the monarchy and the development of hierarchical political structures saw the erosion of women's power and authority vis-à-vis those of men. The impact of hierarchical social control under the monarchy as the context for the limitation of women's roles (as well as those of men) has found corroboration in studies of the deuteronomic law code as an institutionalized means for change in family organization. These studies show that the power of the nuclear family was expanded at the expense of the power of the extended kinship group (C. Pressler [1993]).

The social world of family and kinship in ancient Israel is a topic whose importance is recognized by theorists from diverse social-scientific perspectives. Comparative anthropological data has helped scholars to reconstruct the kinship basis of ancient Israelite social organization, making it possible to locate the interconnection between the family household, the clan, and the lineage, while recognizing that these terms may hold different meanings in different periods. For example, the bêʾāb (father's house) referred in the postexilic period to individuals able to trace their ancestry to those who took part in the Babylonian exile, while earlier in Israelite history the term referred to a co-residential unit composed of related individuals and servants. Precision in analyzing residential units cannot always be found in Hebrew terminology because the same Hebrew term is often used to delineate more than one of the groupings analyzed by social scientists.

The analysis of kinship organization in light of cross-cultural data provides the opportunity for the integration of social-scientific research paradigms. For example, the topics of family structure, gender, and political organization converge in N. Steinberg's analysis of Genesis (1993). Her work reveals the patrilineal basis for marriage and family in ancient Israel, with a preference for patrilineal endogamy as the genealogical skeleton of the family line of Terah through his son Abraham. Of related interest, N. Jay's (1992) sociological and anthropological investigation of sacrifice leads her to argue that the ancient Israelite emphasis on patrilineage required a ritualization process that shifted reproductive emphasis away from the mother who biologically bore a son to the father in whose patrilineage the son takes his place. The conclusions of Steinberg and Jay complement Wilson's earlier study (1977) of the anthropological significance of genealogies in social and political organization. Moreover, social anthropologist J. Goody's (1990) cross-cultural analysis of kinship and family frequently includes examples from the HB, illustrating that ancient Israel can be understood in light of pre-industrialized non-Western patrilineally based societies.

Finally, of particular interest to scholars is the social world of Israelite religion. Social anthropologist M. Douglas (1966) studied dietary practices as a reflection of Israelite social organization. Her research revealed that the ancient Israelite distinction between clean and unclean symbolizes the biblical world's attempt to classify and organize the disorderly natural world around it. Douglas's interpretation of Israelite religion has been influential in the writings of biblical scholars, who now understand the meaning and function of the ritual laws of the Bible as expressions of Israelite social concerns. Just as Douglas's work has been embraced by biblical scholarship, so also the approach of structural anthropologist C. Lévi-Strauss has been employed by E. Leach (1969) to analyze the biblical narratives. Leach's work, comparing biblical narratives and mythological traditions (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), serves to undermine the putative dichotomy between the biblical tradition and the so-called primitive narrative tradition emphasized by earlier theological approaches to the texts.

To realize the potential of social-scientific criticism, biblical scholarship must move toward integration of the results of social-scientific research paradigms. After this has been accomplished there must be a synthesis of the findings of social-scientific criticism with the conclusions of historical-critical study and theology as well as those of archaeology (an enterprise presently under way). Finally, this synthesis must be accomplished with methodological sensitivity to the biblical material and proper use of appropriate comparative data.

Bibliography: R. P. Carroll, When Prophecy Failed: Cognitive Dissonance in the Prophetic Traditions of the OT (1979). C. E. Carter and C. L. Meyers, Community, Identity, and Ideology: Social-scientific Approaches to the HB (Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 6, 1996). A. Causse, "Du Groupe ethnique a la communauté religieuse: Les Problèmes Sociologique du Judaisme," RHPR 14 (1934) 285-335; Du Groupe ethnique a la communauté religieuse: Les Problèmes Sociologique de la religion d'Israel (EHPhR 33, 1937). A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (1908; ET, rev. ed. 1927). M. Douglas, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo (1966). H. Eilberg-Schwartz, The Savage in Judaism: An Anthropology of Israelite Religion and Ancient Judaism (1990). J. Flanagan, David's Social Drama: A Hologram of Israel's Early Iron Age (JSOTSup 73, 1988). J. Goody, The Oriental, the Ancient, and the Primitive: Systems of Marriage and the Family in the Pre-industrial Societies of Eurasia (1990). N. K. Gottwald, The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250–1050 BCE (1979). N. Jay, Throughout Your Generations Forever: Sacrifice, Religion, and Paternity (1992). E. Leach, "The Legitimation of Solomon," Genesis as Myth and Other Essays (1969). N. P. Lemche, Ancient Israel: A New History of Israelite Society (BiSe 5, 1988). A. Lods, Israel, des origines au milieu du VIIIe siècle (1930). B. O. Long, "The Social World of Ancient Israel," Int 37 (1982) 243-55. D. B. Martin, "Social-scientific Criticism," To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Application (ed. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes, 1993) 103-19. G. Mendenhall, The Tenth Generation: The Origins of the Biblical Tradition (1973). C. Meyers, Discovering Eve: Ancient Israelite Women in Context (1988). M. Noth, A History of Pentateuchal Traditions (1948; ET 1972). T. W. Overholt, Channels of Prophecy: The Social Dynamics of Prophetic Activity (1989). J. Pedersen, Israel: Its Life and Culture (1920–34; ET 1926–40). D. L. Petersen, The Roles of Israel's Prophets (JSOTSup 17, 1981). C. Pressler, The View of Women Found in the Deuteronomic Family Laws (1993). J. W. Rogerson, Anthropology and the OT (1979). D. L. Smith, The Religion of the Landless: The Social Context of the Babylonian Exile (1989). W. R. Smith, The Religion of the Semites (1889, 1894², repr. 1972). L. Stager, "The Archaeology of the Family in Ancient Israel," BASOR 260 (1985) 1-35. N. Steinberg, Kinship and Marriage in Genesis: A Household Economics Perspective (1993). R. de Vaux, Ancient Israel: Social Institutions (1958–60; ET 1961). J. Wellhausen, Reste arabischem Heidentums (1897). R. R. Wilson, Genealogy and History in the Biblical World (YNER 7, 1977); Prophecy and Society in Ancient Israel (1980); Sociological Approaches to the OT (GBS, OT Ser., 1984).

N. STEINBERG

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY

The SBA was organized in 1870 by S. Birch, H. Rawlinson, H. Fox-Talbot, and others to investigate and publish papers about the "Archaeology, History, Arts, and Chronology of Ancient and Modern Assyria, Palestine, Egypt, Arabia, and other Biblical Lands" and to establish a fund and library to support this activity. The society met monthly to hear and discuss scholarly papers, publishing these and other studies in its Transactions (1872–93) and Proceedings (1878–1918). The outbreak of WWI brought a dramatic decline in SBA memberships and subscriptions, with consequent financial troubles, and led to the merger of the organization in 1918 with the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland.

Bibliography: F. Legge, "The Society of Biblical Archaeology," JRAS (1919) 25-36.

M. P. GRAHAM

SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE

In 1880 F. GARDINER, P. Schaff, and C. BRIGGS organized the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis (shortened to the SBL in 1962). Its purpose was to "stimulate the critical study of the Scriptures by presenting, discussing, and publishing original papers on Biblical topics." In 1881 the society began issuing the Journal of Biblical Literature and Exegesis (now JBL) and in 1946, the first of over a dozen monographic series that it has undertaken. In addition to these publications the SBL sponsors international, national, and regional conferences at which its members present research papers. Membership has grown from the forty-five enrolled at the end of its first year to more than 8,000 individuals and institutions in 1996.

Bibliography: E. W. Saunders, "A Century of Service to American Biblical Scholarship," BCSR 11 (1980) 59-76; Searching the Scriptures (1982). N. Schmidt, "Memoir on the History of the Society," JBL 50 (1931) xiv-xxiii.

M. P. GRAHAM

SOCINUS, FAUSTUS (FAUSTO SOZZINI)

(1539–1604)

Born Dec. 5, 1539, in Siena, Tuscany, S. died Mar. 4, 1604, in Poland. His family was related to three popes (Pius II, Pius III, and Paul V) and to prominent jurists. S. became interested in radical religious thought through the influence of his uncle Laelius (1525–62), a prominent radical whose papers S. inherited upon the uncle's death, May 14, 1562. Laelius, who traveled widely, was acquainted with several of the second-generation Reformers, some of whom questioned his orthodoxy. In c. 1561 (first printed 1568) he wrote a work on the opening chapter of the Fourth Gospel, Brevis explicatio in primum Iohannis caput (repr. in A. Rotondò [ed.], Lelio Sozzini, Opere [1986] 103-28, 340-71), in which he denied that the text refers to the premundane existence of the Christ and denied the traditional doctrine of the Trinity. S. rewrote his uncle's work as Explicatio primae partis primi capitis Iohannis (1562), arguing that Christ was divine by reason of his office, not his nature.

From 1563 to 1574 S. served at the court of Grand Duke Cosimo I of Tuscany in Florence. He spent time in Basel, where he wrote an important tract on JESUS Christ the Savior (De Jesu Christo servatore [1578]) and on the condition of the first human before the fall (De statu primi hominis ante lapsum disputatio [1578]). In the former he argued that the virgin-born Jesus was totally human, had no existence prior to his birth, and was exalted to divine status by God at the ascension; he also denied the traditional satisfaction theory of the atonement. In the latter work he denied the immortality of the soul, arguing for the natural mortality of the first humans apart from the fall.

S. eventually settled in Poland, one of the most tolerant countries in Europe at the time, where he spent the rest of his life, often under persecution and duress. After initial disputes over his opposition to rebaptism, he gradually rose to prominence among the Polish Brethren. In 1580 he began writing his work on Scripture (1588; ET, E. Combe, 1731), which reiterated and expanded on his biblically based anti-trinitarianism, affirmed the unique role of the Bible in theology, and emphasized its reasonableness. He also argued that Christ ascended to heaven during the forty days in the wilderness following his baptism, at which time he, like Moses, received a divine message.

S.'s approach to theology and biblical studies was a combination of rationalism, supernaturalism, and mysticism. A humanistic optimism undergirded his assumption that the Bible could be read and understood in a straightforward sense. He denied that it taught the traditional view of original sin, predestination, the preexistence of Christ, and the Trinity. Although accepting the doctrine of Jesus' virgin birth, he argued that Jesus was the Son of God on the basis of his likeness to the deity. S. strongly emphasized the moral teachings of the NT and ethical behavior as imitation of Christ but argued that only through a personal revelation from God was it possible to be guided to the knowledge of God and thus salvation and immortality. S. and his followers tended to view the HB as subordinate to the NT.

Many of S.'s ideas were incorporated into the Racovian Catechism (Polish 1605; Ger. 1608; Lat., with notes and additions, 1609; ET, J. Biddle, 1652). The Socinian movement was suppressed in Poland in the middle of the seventeenth century primarily through Roman Catholic reaction led by the Jesuits. Socinian thought gave expression to widespread sentiments, however, and its influence spread widely. Its real or assumed threat to more orthodox theology can be seen in the fact that over seven hundred polemical dissertations were produced on the movement between 1595 and 1797 (E. Wilbur [1945] 525).

Works: Explicatio primae partis primi capitis Iohannis (1562); De Jesu Christo servatore (1578, pr. in c. 1594); De statu primi hominis ante lapsum disputatio (1578, pr. in 1610); De Sacrae Scripturae auctoritate (1588; ET, An Argument for the Authority of Holy Scriptures [1731]; repr. in S. Lubieniecki, History of the Polish Reformation and Nine Related Documents [tr. G. H. Williams, HTS 37, 1995]); Praelectiones theologicae (1592); Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum quos Unitarios vocant, vols. 1–2, Fausti Socini Senensis Opera Omnia in Duos Tomos Distincta (1656).

Bibliography: L. Chmaj, Faust Socyn, 1539–1604 (1963), Polish. R. Dán and A. Pirnát (eds.), Antitrinitarianism in the Second Half of the Sixteenth Century (Studia Humanitatis/ Center for Renaissance Research 5, 1982). J. C. Godbey, "A Study of F. S.' De Jesu Christo Servatore" (diss., University of Chicago, 1968); (ed.), Unitarianism in Its Sixteenth- and Seventeenth-century Settings (Proceedings of the Unitarian Universalist Historical Society 20, 2, 1985–86). S. Lubieniecki, History of the Polish Reformation and Nine Related Documents (ed. and tr. G. H. Huntston et al., HTS 37, 1995). M. Martini, F. S. et al Pensée Socienne (1967). Z. Ogonowski, Shapers of Religious Traditions in Germany, Switzerland, and Poland, 1560–1600 (ed. J. Raitt, 1981) 195-209. J.-P. Osier, "F. S. et la Bible," Le Grand Siècle et la Bible (ed. J. Armogathe, 1989) 643-65. K. Scholder, The Birth of Modern Critical Theology: Origins and Problems of Biblical Criticism in the Seventeenth Century (1990). J. A. Tedeschi, Italian Reformation Studies in Honor of Laelius Socinus (Universita di Sienna, Facolta di Giurisprudenza collana di Studi "Pietro Rossi," Nuova Serie 4, 1965). E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism: Socinianism and Its Antecedents (1945). G. H. Williams, The Radical Reformation (1914, 1992³).

J. H. HAYES

SOCIOLOGY AND HEBREW BIBLE STUDIES

Although some social scientists define sociology as one among other SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC specialisms, it will be used here as a cover term for the whole body of the social sciences as they are used in a systematic study of the structure and development of the totality of a given society. Sociological studies may be divided into three broad categories that may at times be intertwined: (1) social description, (2) social history, and (3) social theory.

Social description is essentially the explanation and elucidation of the institutions and customs of the biblical community. Its primary source is the biblical text, augmented and illuminated by archaeological evidence. Judicious but limited use is made of information derived from ancient, and occasionally modern, societies deemed comparable to the biblical community; but the biblical texts are the controlling factor. Social history may be understood in two ways. First, it takes into account the changes that took place in the long history of the biblical community. Social descriptions of one era may be vastly different from those of another period, since there is recognition that the life of the biblical community was dynamic, not static. Social historians as a rule, however, restrict themselves to a description of the changes—what happened—and bracket consideration of the reasons for those changes—why it happened. Second, social history may refer to attempts to pay more attention to factors often omitted or minimized in traditional histories, which tend to focus on politics, rulers, aristocrats, and the producers and transmitters of high culture. The social historian attempts to adduce evidence, often sparse in the preserved texts, that delineates as broad a picture as possible of the total life of the society. Family structures, the means of economic production, daily life of the mass of the population, etc. are used to provide a picture of the social unit as a whole and to describe the changes that took place in that unit. The emphasis remains, however, on the description of change and not on an explanation of the causes of change.

An increasing number of scholars contend that social description and social history as defined above are inadequate for the sociological task. Although these scholars use social description and social history, they maintain that sociological study must also attempt to account for social change. A primary feature of their program is the use of macro-social theory. Macro-theory, which will be discussed more fully below, concentrates on the total life of a given society, often uses CROSS-CULTURAL models to illuminate data from that society and/or to fill in lacunae in the data, and relies on the generalizing conclusions of one or more recognized social theorists. The extent to which macro-theory may be appropriate for study of the HB is perhaps the most important, and as yet unresolved, issue to be confronted. Before addressing the contemporary state of the discussion, however, it is appropriate to give a brief overview of sociological interpretation prior to the middle of the twentieth century.

1. Brief History of Sociological Study to the Mid-twentieth Century. Occasional references that may be called social description are to be found in the HB itself and in scattered comments in Jewish and Christian interpreters in the succeeding centuries. Concentrated and more systematic sociological study of the HB, however, began in the mid-nineteenth century as a response to the finds of Near Eastern ARCHAEOLOGY and the emergence of the social-scientific disciplines of cultural anthropology and sociological theory. (H. Hahn [1954] provides a covenient summary of the period 1850–1950; for anthropology, 44-82; sociology, 157-84; and archaeology, 185-225. A briefer but useful account is that of R. Wilson [1984] 1-25.)

The anthropologist who most influenced HB studies was E. Tylor, who assumed that a universal primitive mentality lay behind all cultural forms, including religion, and that these forms developed through a common evolutionary process. Since there was a common beginning and a common process, material from widely separated societies could be used in comparative studies. HB scholars, led by W. R. SMITH, quickly began to use Tylor's method. Smith restricted his comparative studies primarily to early Arab societies, with occasional material from contemporary bedouin groups; but J. FRAZER expanded this approach by including, somewhat unsystematically, evidence for all societies, ancient and modern, that seemed to have some bearing on the beliefs and customs of the biblical community.

Cultural anthropologists following Tylor abandoned the broad comparative approach and insisted that anthropology should focus on the total life of one society. Comparative materials could be used only in a secondary illustrative manner. Most, although not all, biblical scholars responded to this change by withdrawing from overt use of anthropology for biblical study.

The most significant social theorist for HB studies was, and in modified forms continues to be, M. WEBER. Many of his specific conclusions, limited as they were by his dependence on the biblical scholarship of his day, are today abandoned or radically revised. However, two of his major points—that religion provided the uniting bond for the people called Israel (covenant), and that leadership of this covenant people originally resided in charismatic figures not located in an established political setting—continue to have considerable influence in biblical studies, albeit in a number of divergent forms.

Two of his general theses also remain of central importance in sociological study. First, he insisted that a macro-social theory must make use of ideal types, hypothetical constructs that may be used to compare and elicidate actual situations; and these ideal types, when expanded, may then provide a macro-social model. Second, he rejected the Marxist view, which saw religion arising solely from the material conditions of life. It is too much to maintain, as has often been said, that Weber gave religion the earlier role in shaping societal structures. It is more accurate to understand his position as affirming a dynamic interaction between the spiritual values of a society and the socio-cultural matrix in which those values are operative. Full attention must be given to each and not in isolation from the other. Each influenced and was influenced by the other.

A number of scholars in the 1920s and 1930s, both in larger works like the histories of A. CAUSSE and A. LODS and in more limited, specialized studies, directly or indirectly used Weber's insights regarding the interaction of religion and society. A potentially promising but ultimately abortive foray into sociological study was made by the Chicago school, represented in HB studies especially by W. C. Graham and H. G. May (see also L. Wallis). Graham and May attempted to trace the development of religious concepts in the context of the changing social process. Their primary concern was not with Israelite society as such but with the aspects of that society that might contribute to a fuller understanding of the nature and the development of Israelite religion.

2. Contemporary Sociological Study. The "new" sociological study of the HB is, as was noted above, not altogether new. Attention to the importance of economics, social organization, and social PSYCHOLOGY appeared in the works of, e.g., A. ALT, M. NOTH, W. F. ALBRIGHT, J. PEDERSEN, and others who followed their leads. Further, form-critical studies (see FORM CRITICISM) by their very nature were required, in theory at least, to take seriously the social setting. It is fair to say, however, that for the most part sociological observations were of an unsystematic nature and paid little if any attention to sociological theory as such.

While recognizing that there are threads of continuity in sociological study of the HB from the mid-nineteenth century to the present, two features may be deemed distinctive of the contemporary period: (a) a more systematic use of macro-theory and (b) more attention to the role of techno-economic factors in the study of society. Macro-theory, as mentioned earlier, concentrates on the total life of a society and may use cross-cultural models to fill in lacunae in the data directly available from that society. To this extent it is akin to one of the definitions of social history discussed earlier. The new approach, however, makes more refined use of techno-economic data.

Archaeology, particularly as it has shifted from emphasis on description to explanation; physical anthropology; geography; climatology; demography; and other disciplines, techniques, and methods not ordinarily included in the social sciences are increasingly employed. Use of such information is, of course, not altogether new in sociological study; but it is now more pervasive and more refined. It seems evident that as more data become available and as existing data are evaluated by more rigid macro-theoretical methods a more comprehensive social history of Israel, although certainly not a complete one, can be written. (For more detailed discussion of specific contemporary contributions to sociological study of the HB, see the excellent bibliographies in N. Gottwald [1983, 168-84; 1985, 1612-65], a good overview of a number of the most important works through 1983 in Wilson, and a succinct summary of the state of the field through 1985 in R. Culley [1985].)

The following areas of HB study have received extensive attention from scholars using sociological methods.

a. Israel's origins and the formation of the state. The problem that has thus far been most broadly addressed is the question of Israel's origins and the formation of the state. It has long been a commonplace of biblical study that Israel's origins are to be found in a nomadic or semi-nomadic society. This was true whether a conquest model or a settlement model for Israel's emergence in Canaan was adopted. This view also underlay Weber's starting point that early Israelite society is to be understood as a result of the inner tension between those Israelites who reflected the institutions and ideals of a desert society and those who were rooted in an agricultural society.

This prevailing, though not unanimous, view was directly challenged by G. MENDENHALL (1962), who proposed a more appropriate model, which, although recognizing the catalyst supplied by a small group of Yahweh worshipers, stressed the central role of disaffected Canaanite serfs. (Wallis had, much earlier, made a strikingly similar proposal.) GOTTWALD, although operating from an ideological perspective quite different from Mendenhall's, has developed the general thesis with massive sociological data. Techno-economic studies by Mendenhall, Gottwald, and many others have attempted to provide evidence for the model popularly called "peasant revolt," which has found favor with a number of HB historians and has found its way into many popular textbooks. On the other hand, it has also been sharply criticized as being a pure construct with no biblical evidence to support it.

It is too early to judge whether the semi-nomadic theory has been dealt a fatal, or even a serious, blow; however, two significant items for a broader contribution of sociological study of the HB emerge from the debate as it has been carried on thus far. First, it has highlighted the necessity of using techno-economic data available both in the biblical texts and in cogent cross-cultural models. Further research on such data may support or refute the theory, but such research is now seen to be mandatory. Second, and perhaps more important, although the use of a new sociological model may or may not provide new answers, it poses new questions that must be addressed to the biblical texts. That in itself is a not insignificant contribution.

b. The emergence of the monarchy. Closely related to and in part congruent with the issues of Israel's origins is analysis of the emergence of the monarchy. Two major issues have largely dominated sociological study of this question. The first is an attempt to give a social description of the structure of Israelite society in the period prior to the formation of the nation state; the second, to propose reasons for the social change from confederacy (tribal league) to monarchy. With respect to the former, most proposals have used the anthropological model of movement from family to extended family based on genuine kinship, to tribe (clan), to chiefdom, to state (geographical, though stereotypically related to kinship.) Some scholars, however, question whether the biblical evidence or cross-cultural anthropological data will permit so stylized a description. Further study is mandatory before a more precise description than the admittedly uneven and inconsistent picture given in Judges and in the early chapters of 1 Samuel can be affirmed with confidence.

The most attractive feature of the preceding model is that of chiefdom, which seems to provide the best explanation of the reign of Saul and of the early reign of David (see J. Flanagan [1988]). It is proposed that even before Saul larger or smaller geographical areas were under the sway of local chiefs, who had displaced familial units for purposes of military defense and regulation of trade. Thus the development of chieftaincy paved the way for the emergence of the state.

Most historians, accepting the biblical evidence at face value, assert that military and political pressure from the Philistines was the single factor that precipitated the rise of the nation state. Certain recent studies maintain that the picture is much more complicated; although agreeing that the Philistines were a, if not the, critical factor, they insist that fuller recognition needs to be given to the economic collapse, especially of international trade, that characterized the late Bronze Age. It is not yet clear whether the data adduced are compelling. It may well be that the older view focusing on Philistine military pressure is more cogent; but at the very least the new sociological studies are valuable in posing new questions, if not necessarily providing new answers.

c. Prophecy. A third area that has received considerable sociological attention is PROPHECY. Social theory, social psychology, and cross-cultural anthropological studies have been used to examine anew a wide variety of issues, the first dealing with the social location of prophecy and the prophets. While earlier scholars were primarily concerned with the relationship between the prophets and the cult, recent studies have extended this issue to include not only the cult but also the establishment as a whole, distinguishing between prophets who worked within the establishment and those who were outside it. This is a useful perspective but should be tempered by the recognition that the same prophet could from time to time be cast now in one role, now in another.

Another aspect of social location is the attempt to refine and sharpen the social setting (Sitz im Leben) of prophetic oracles. The most promising result thus far is the awareness that the quest for the original setting, valuable as it was, is not adequate. One should consider not only the setting in which the genre arose (and not all genres may be related to a specific setting) but also the variety of settings in which specific oracles might be used. Further, attention should be given to the broader cultural environment within which prophetic oracles were pronounced or later circulated. The interlocking of a broad variety of matrices within society constitutes the most valuable vantage point for determining the interaction between oracle and hearer/reader.

Social function is closely related to social location. The older view of the prophets as isolated religious geniuses proclaiming beautiful spiritual and moral truths has largely been abandoned. The prophets were intimately involved in societal life, and recent sociological study has emphasized that this involvement took two opposing forms: social maintenance and social change. Prophets located within the establishment buttressed the legitimations of that establishment while the outsiders condemned existing social conditions and called for radical change. This paradigm is useful but not exhaustive; some aspects of prophecy cannot be reduced to social concerns.

Sociological study has also addressed the question of prophetic authority and legitimacy, making use of cross-cultural anthropological studies. Although legitimacy and authority may derive from institutional structures, it is societal consensus about how a prophet should behave and acceptance of the general contours of his/her message that ultimately bestow legitimacy and authority.

Anthropological studies have been used to illuminate prophetic behavior in both its physiological and its psychological manifestations. The nature and social impact of ecstatic behavior and stereotypical speech patterns in a number of cultures have been evaluated by socio-psychological criteria. The extent to which such cross-cultural data may be useful in the study of biblical prophets is not yet clear, but a promising beginning has been made (see Wilson, 26-27, 67-80).

d. Apocalypticism. A number of studies have examined the sociological factors that contributed to the ebbing (cessation is too strong a word) of prophecy and the emergence of APOCALYPTICISM. On the theoretical level, it is proposed that the seedbed of apocalypticism lies in an experience of group alienation and/or a sense of felt deprivation. Anthropological studies of current or recent messianic/millenarian movements have been used to explicate the social setting of apocalypticism in the biblical texts. Sociological studies have also attempted to contribute to the much-discussed issues of the date of apocalypticism's origin and of its literary and ideational sources.

P. Hanson (1985), drawing primarily on the so-called sociology of knowledge, has dated the dawn of apocalypticism in the early postexilic period, which he has depicted in terms of a polarity between realists and visionaries. The sociological contribution to delineating the sources of apocalypticism has, to this point, been minimal. It is increasingly clear that apocalypticism has no univocal source; further sociological investigations may clarify the interactions among prophecy, royal cult, myth-wisdom, and Hellenistic sources that coalesced to form its shape and content.

e. Law and wisdom. Finally, cultural anthropologists outside the field of biblical studies have devoted considerable attention to biblical laws, especially those relating to purity and sacrifice, and responses by biblical scholars have been forthcoming. It is probable that new sociological studies will review the still-classic treatments of Alt and Noth on the origins of Israelite law. In the last decades of the twentieth century, there has also been considerable scholarly debate on the locus of Israelite wisdom, with clan ethic, royal court, or school being most prominently proposed. It seems likely that no single social setting provides a comprehensive explanation, but reinvestigation of the germane texts from a sociological perspective, as yet in a nascent form, may shed light on the issue. The few studies available thus far tend to indicate that our present wisdom texts, as distinguished from the origins of wisdom as such, come from a relatively well-to-do socio-economic group. Whether further study will confirm or negate this provisional conclusion remains moot.

3. Problems and Prospects. Sociological study of the HB has been criticized even by scholars who accept in principle its potential contribution. (A more fundamental criticism by some anthropologists who maintain that social science methods can legitimately be used only for living societies ["social scientists study living people not books"] is too sweeping and hardly represents a substantive position in the social sciences.) Criticisms vary in scope and intensity but fall into three major categories.

First, considerable caution must be exercised in choosing a particular macro-theory as a paradigm for assessing the data; e.g., adoption of a Marxist perspective will yield quite different results from the use of Weberian or one of the many neo-Weberian approaches. Biblical scholars engaged in the sociological enterprise need to be aware of the enormous diversity existing among social scientists and to keep abreast of developments in the social sciences. Pluralistic use of social theory is desirable, although it should not be diluted to an eclecticism that selects from here and there social theories and comparative examples that seem to elucidate a particular issue. Sociological rigor is mandatory.

Second, cross-cultural materials may be useful in a supplementary manner but should not be used in an extensive and indiscriminate way when evidence in the biblical texts is sparse or lacking altogether. The biblical texts must remain the primary source. And third, there is the question of the centrality of sociological methods for interpretation. Does sociological study, as some of its practitioners seem to imply, provide a paradigmatic breakthrough, or is it a useful, but auxiliary, discipline for historical study as it was for Weber? It is probable that most HB scholars, at least for the foreseeable future, will adopt the latter option (see Wilson, 28-29).

What, then, are the prospects for the future of sociological study? Some of the problems already addressed in this article, e.g., early Israelite history, prophecy, and apocalypticism, will surely be expanded and refined. Two others, law and wisdom, seem ripe for detailed investigation. Two further areas of study may be suggested. The first is the sociology of literature, not to be confused with the "new" LITERARY criticism, whose relationship with sociological study remains problematical. Investigations in this area will not be simply an extension and refinement of the social setting in which biblical texts emerged, although this is legitimate and necessary. Sociology of literature, as used here, while paying careful attention to the original setting and function of a text, focuses on the continuing sociological impact of the text in the ongoing life of the communities that preserved it. Ultimately such study will embrace the whole question of the origin and significance of CANON. The second area is the complex issue of the sociological setting of early Christianity and its interaction with Judaism. Intense study of both canonical and non-canonical literature of that period has yielded fruitful results.

It might be expected that sociological study will issue in new textboooks that take much more seriously the sociological dimensions of the HB (Gottwald [1985, 1993] is already an example). Finally, as the results of sociological study become more pervasive, covering the whole of the biblical period, it may become possible to produce a genuine social history that will take due account of the total structure of the biblical community, the nature of the literature it produced, and the social worlds underlying both its structure and its literature.

Bibliography: C. E. Carter and C. L. Meyers (eds.), Community, Identity and Ideology: Social Science Approaches to the HB (Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 6, 1996). D. J. Chalcraft, Social-Scientific OT Criticism (Biblical Seminar 47, 1997). R. E. Clements (ed.), The World of Ancient Israel: Sociological, Anthropological, and Political Perspectives (1989). R. C. Culley, "Exploring New Directions," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 167-200. J. W. Flanagan, David's Social Drama: A Hologram of Israel's Early Iron Age (SWBA 35, 1988). N. H. Gottwald, "Sociological Method in Biblical Research and Contemporary Peace Studies," ABQ 2 (1983) 142-84; The HB (1985); The HB in Its Social World and in Ours (Semeia Studies, 1993). H. F. Hahn, The OT in Modern Research (1954; rev. ed. 1966). P. D. Hanson, "Apocalyptic Literature," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 465-88. B. Lang (ed.), Anthropological Approaches to the OT (IRT 8, 1985). N. P. Lemche, Early Israel: Anthropological and Historical Studies on the Israelite Society Before the Monarchy (VTSup, 1985). A. D. H. Mayes, The OT in Sociological Perspective (1989). G. E. Mendenhall, "The Hebrew Conquest of Palestine," BA 25 (1962) 66-87. L. G. Perdue, Families in Ancient Israel (The Family, Religion, and Culture Series, 1997). J. W. Rogerson, Anthropology and the OT (1978); "The Use of Sociology in OT Studies," VTSup 36 (1985) 245-56; (ed.), The Bible in Ethics: The Second Sheffield Colloquium (1995). W. Schottroff, "Soziologie und Alten Testament," VF 19 (1974) 46-66. R. R. Wilson, Sociological Approaches to the OT (1984).

J. F. PRIEST

SOCIOLOGY AND NEW TESTAMENT STUDIES

1. Interest in Knowledge. Sociologically oriented exegesis has two different interests in knowledge of the biblical text, one historical and the other hemeneutical (see HERMENEUTICS). The historical interest consists in understanding through SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC or, more specifically, sociological categories the reality a text represented or constituted at the time of its origin. Theological, philological, psychological (see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), and other categories are not dismissed as improper but, rather, as insufficient. This insufficiency can be addressed by including the social world of the NT age in the interpretative process. One must ask what typical interpersonal behavior was like both in the Christian communities and in their larger environment, e.g., who had regular social interaction with whom? Who commanded? Who obeyed? Who was economically dependent upon whom? Beyond this, one must investigate the causal and functional relationships in which these social actualities took place. For example, the relationship between early Christianity and slavery is not sufficiently grasped until one asks not only what the social position of slaves was in the primitive Christian communities but also which external social influences appeared in this arrangement, and what influence this arrangement had on the greater social reality. The historical interest directing such questions can be focused on individual NT texts as well as on an array of these texts.

The hermeneutical interest in knowledge begins with the insight that communication requires that communicants share a common social world. Thus not only is knowledge of the social world of the NT necessary for communication with NT texts but also knowledge of the place of the interpreter in his or her social world. In its full sense, therefore, sociologically oriented exegesis requires mediation between diverse social worlds.

2. Types. Sociologically oriented exegesis is not a unitary method. A distinction can be made between socio-historical, sociological, and materialistic exegesis. Such a differentiation has some justification, but it is nonetheless problematic.

The relationship between socio-historical and sociological exegesis is often laid out as one between description and explanation, i.e., between the collection of historical material and the interpretation of that material with the help of sociological theory. It is reasonable to ascribe to social history the depiction of typical interpersonal behavior, and to sociology the interpretation of the broader social functions of this behavior. Thus socio-historical exegesis can be seen as the necessary precondition for actual sociological exegesis. To be sure, this distinction is not absolute: No assembling of material is free of theory, and not every theory is applicable to all forms of material. Accordingly, it is impossible to engage in only one of the two endeavors to the exclusion of the other, though different emphases are permissible.

Materialistic exegesis fits the framework of a sociologically oriented exegesis in its stress on the significance of social actualities and processes for the origin as well as for the understanding of NT texts. Materialistic exegesis also shares the concern to uncover the societal and political relevance of the NT for our time. In what has become its classical form in the work of F. Belo (1975; ET 1981) and M. Clévénot (1976; ET 1985), materialistic exegesis, however, exhibits two peculiarities: It uses structural methods (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION) to interpret texts, and it is based on a materialistic hermeneutic that makes use, above all, of K. Marx (1818–83) and L. Althusser and consciously asserts a fixed philosophical, psychological, political, and economic worldview as the interpretative horizon of the NT.

The often-raised objections to materialistic exegesis—that it has an inadequate historical orientation (structuralism), an insufficient capacity for self-correction, and an unfounded denial of the relative autonomy of the text in relation to the means of production (historical materialism)—are too severe. While of some merit regarding the classical representatives of this approach, such objections are invalid for later attempts, e.g., that of C. Myers (1988), to develop a political reading that stands between materialistic and sociological exegesis and attempts to draw on elements of modern LITERARY criticism.

Apart from Myers's socio-literary approach and related methods (see S. Freyne [1988]), two other methodologies cannot be brought under the tripartite schema of socio-historical, sociological, and materialistic exegesis. The first of these is the cultural-anthropological method, represented above all by B. Malina and based on the work of M. Douglas, in which the social experience is the central focus, i.e., the evaluative interpretation of social conditions by the society at large. Of primary interest in this approach is how the interpretation expresses itself in the formation of symbols and in the communication of the respective societies. The second approach is the socio-rhetorical method, which employs a combination of elements from diverse disciplines (rhetoric, modern literary criticism, and the sociology of literature). According to V. Robbins, "A socio-rhetorical approach . . . analyzes the text as a strategic statement in a situation characterized by 'webs of significance' containing an intermingling of social, cultural, religious, and literary traditions and conventions in the Mediterranean world" (1984, 6).

3. History of Research. The history of sociologically oriented exegesis of the NT can be divided into two phases. The first extends from 1880 to 1930; the second, from 1970 to the present. Before 1880, NT exegesis showed scarcely any interest in the social realities of early Christianity and its environment.

a. 1880–1930. During this period a series of books and articles appeared (E. Hatch [1883]; C. Heinrici [1887]; A. von Harnack [1884, 1893², 1902]; E. von Dobschütz [1902]; E. Lohmeyer [1921, 1925]; J. Jeremias [1923]; R. Schumacher [1924]; C. Cadoux [1925]; F. Grant [1926]; W. Bauer [1927]) that were concerned with the social aspects of early Christianity (the forms of the community, the life of the community, its mission, its environment). The reconstruction of the life of the lower classes of imperial Rome by A. DEISSMANN (1908, 1923⁴) based on papyri and inscriptions, became extremely well known. Deissmann's intention was to uncover the social background of the NT. The rise of NT FORM CRITICISM after 1919 (K. Schmidt [1919]; M. Dibelius [1919]; R. Bultmann [1921]), with its search for the Sitz im Leben of NT genres, displayed a sociological interest in the wider sense. Such an interest was more specific in one movement of the so-called Chicago school, particularly in the works of S. J. CASE and S. MATHEWS, who, from the standpoint of functionalism, interpreted early Christianity as an answer to the needs of society.

b. After 1970. After its practical disappearance for forty years (for a variety of reasons: dialectical theology, existential interpretation, redaction criticism, structuralism), the sociological approach to exegesis experienced a spectacular comeback in the seventies (also for various reasons: the crisis in historical-critical exegesis, a general interest in the social sciences in the sixties). This development led to a host of relevant investigations and to a confusing differentiation of approaches and methods (see sec. 4).

c. The relation of sociologically oriented exegesis and historical-critical exegesis. The sociological orientation is not a break with traditional historical criticism; it is, rather, (at least in many forms) a discharging of claims long-since made but still unfulfilled by historical criticism. Programmatic assertions relative to the history of NT times, the history of religions (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE), form criticism, and even REDACTION CRITICISM have long included references to the necessary consideration of the social dimension, e.g., social history, sociological determination of the Sitz im Leben, the connection between religious concepts and collective living conditions, and the connection between the evangelists' redaction and the situation of their communities. Such purposes were first realized in specifically social-scientific research and in some sociological investigations.

4. Selected Approaches. a. Socio-historical approaches. M. HENGEL's (1968; ET 1981) approach can be understood as socio-historical research with a strong orientation toward historical criticism. In this treatment the social circumstances of the succession to the historical JESUS were set off from the teacher-pupil relationship of the late rabbinate and from the succession of apocalyptic prophets (see APOCALYPTICISM; also PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). The closest parallel to the calls of the disciples is, according to Hengel, "the call of the OT prophets through the God of Israel himself" (ET, 98).

A. Malherbe (1977, 1983[2]) was as socio-historically oriented as Hengel. Malherbe stressed that "we should strive to know as much as possible about the actual social circumstances . . . before venturing theoretical descriptions or explanations of them" (1983[2], 20). In this work, based on lectures, he largely limited himself to the former: illuminating the relationship between PAUL and the church in Thessalonica by a comparison of 1 Thessalonians with texts from philosophical communities, especially from the Epicureans; investigating the social status of the early Christians and supporting a "new emerging consensus" (1983[2], 118; cf. 31), according to which this status is set clearly higher than in the earlier communis opinio; and discussing the issues of house-churches and hospitality in the early church.

P. Lampe offered a significant study in local social history (1987, 1989[2]). He made use of mainly literary but also epigraphic and archaeological sources in order to (among other things) reconstruct the distribution of Christians in Rome and the fractionalization of the Christian community. He pursued general as well as prosopographical information and characterized the relationship between both as the attempt "to color with concrete instances, generalizations which the sources themselves make" rather than to "project individual cases drawn from the sources onto a representative level—and by what method, even?" (1989[2], XI). Lampe came close to a sociology of knowledge when he went beyond the socio-historical explanation of the daily life of Christians in Roman cities to suggest "correlations between the situation and the expression of faith" (347; italics original), e.g., in the Shepherd of Hermas, in MARCION, in the Valentinians, etc. In doing so he protected himself against social history's monocausal explanations of theology: "Not static (e.g., super/substructure), but only more complex dynamic models will, in my estimation, help us further, if we want to uncover something of the mutual correlations between theology and social reality" (348; italics original). Lampe did not, however, present such models in his socio-historically oriented study.

Several studies in the 1990s focused on the question of egalitarian communities in early Christianity. Both A. Clarke (1993) and J. Chow (1992) tried to explain many of the problems Paul dealt with in 1 Corinthians by comparing the pattern of leadership in the Corinthian community to that of non-Christian Greco-Roman leadership. In their view, Paul struggled to replace secular hierarchical models of patronage and friendship that continued to shape the minds of the Corinthian community with truly Christian, egalitarian ones. This thesis has been countered by T. Schmeller (1995), whose comparison between Pauline communities and Greco-Roman associations offers a more nuanced view: Both kinds of groups show mixtures of hierarchical and egalitarian elements; what seems to be specific of Christian communities, however, is that solidarity forms part of their group-identity.

b. Specifically sociological approaches. Various exegetes have made use of M. WEBER's verstehender Soziologie, in particular of his concept of charismatic authority and its routinization, in order to illuminate the structures of authority in the Jesus movement and in the early Christian communities. B. Holmberg (1978) showed how in the early church, and especially with Paul, a process of institutionalization took place in which the purely charismatic relationship of authority between Jesus and his circle of disciples was gradually intermingled with rational and traditional elements. What is new in Holmberg's reconstruction is that this institutionalization is not understood as the inevitable fall from an original peak but as an intended and much longed-for manifestation of the authenticity of the charisma (166). With this move Holmberg seizes on the further inner-sociological development of the Weberian model. A charismatic movement not only calls the existing society into question but also is "in principle nothing less than the founding anew of society" (146). A primary institutionalization is already introduced by the charismatic leader (here the historical Jesus), then a secondary institutionalization is established by the administrative or leadership staff (here Paul in particular). In the early church the last development leads to such forms of authority as "the literal Jesus-tradition, the Christian moral teachings and code of behavior, the cult, and the all-powerful group of leaders" (201).

Probably the most influential contributions to the sociological exegesis of the NT stem from G. Theissen. Depending on the subject matter, Theissen combines Weber's charisma model with conflict or functionalistic theories. His best-known work, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (1977, 1985[4]; ET 1978), has been expanded via some essays in his collected volume, Social Reality and the Early Christians (1979, 1989[3]; ET 1992). "The Jesus movement is . . . the renewal movement which Jesus called forth within Judaism in the Syro-Palestinian region from c. 30 to 70 CE" (1985[4], 9). Its "inner structure was determined by the interaction of three roles: the wandering charismatics, their sympathizers in the local communities, and the revealer" (1985, 14). Jesus, the founder of the movement and its first wandering charismatic, remained after Easter as the transcendent revealer, its charismatic leader. The locally settled followers of the movement still did not form proper communities but, rather, as individual sympathizers and material supporters were the charismatically governed. In between the wandering charismatics and their sympathizers stood the disciples of Jesus in the narrower sense, who even before Easter constituted the charismatically qualified leadership staff of the movement and who after Easter, as wandering charismatics, became the actual bearers of the movement. Jesus' radical teachings of the renunciation of homeland, family, and possessions were meant only for the circle of wandering charismatics and were passed on by them. Their message of reconciliation was not drawn upon for the solution of the social crisis in Palestine, which was too sharply torn between class and political factions. While the Jesus movement was a failure there, it enjoyed great success in the Hellenistic cities. This transition brought with it, to be sure, a clear transformation: Local communities became the center of the movement, and the radical teachings, which could not be realized under sedentary conditions, were replaced by a socially conservative patriarchalism of love.

In addition to its expression in Weber's models, the sociology of knowledge has found repeated application in NT exegesis, e.g., in the work of J. Elliott (1981). According to Elliott's analysis, it is an aim of 1 Peter to reconcile the community it addresses with their status as outsiders in society. They are encouraged to not give in to hostility and persecutions, which are to be understood as society's pressure to conform. To this end 1 Peter makes use of the image of the house: The house of the saints is cut off from the world, and as oikos pneumatikos (a spiritual house) the saints live in the paroikia (foreign parts). Precisely because they appear to the world as eccentrics, they prove themselves the elect. Thus a theological idea is used to legitimize a social reality. The image of the house is particularly good for this purpose because the community was, in fact, organized in house-churches; consequently, the social reality to be legitimized itself provides the image-material for theological reflection.

A broad palette of sociological lines and models was applied by both J. Gager (1975) and W. Meeks (1983). Gager's was concerned to apply tentatively to early Christianity sociological and anthropological models that are standard in the study of other religions in order to find new insight on old issues: "the relationship between religion and social status, the enthusiastic character of the earliest Christian communities, their gradual transformation into a formidable religious and social institution, and the emergence of Christianity as the dominant religion of the later Roman Empire" (1975, 2). Gager has gone farther than many other scholars: He investigates not only the social position of the early Christians and applies Weber's charisma model to the structures of authority in the early church, as is usual, but also interprets early Christianity as a millenarian movement. Further, he explains the Christian mission, active despite the delay of the parousia, through use of L. Festinger's theory of cognitive dissonance. Gager adheres to the view that study of other religious movements (e.g., the Melanesian cargo cult) may fill in much data otherwise lacking in the NT, as long as these movements belong to the same sociological type as early Christianity.

More cautious but no less multi-faceted is Meeks's study. He has presented a broad spectrum of analyses of Pauline Christianity, from social history (e.g., city life and mobility in the Roman Empire), to theoretical sociological approaches relating to status, the distribution of power, etc., to questions regarding the sociology of knowledge. Meeks has described himself as a sociological eclectic and a moderate functionalist (1983, 6-7). His differentiated investigations regarding social status show that the Pauline communities offer a social cross section of urban society from which only the highest and lowest levels are absent. The members of these communities who most stand out are those with a higher inconsistency of status. Also of high interest are the correlations between faith convictions and social situation, which Meeks depicts without attempting to trace the one causally back to the other. Thus, for example, the experience of social contradictions in the community corresponds to faith in the crucified Messiah, who is then raised to the status of co-ruler with God: "They are weak in terms of social power and status . . . yet they are exhilarated by experiences of power in their meetings" (191).

c. Combinations of new exegetical approaches. While the interpreters presented up to this point have remained more or less within the framework of historical criticism and sociology, S. Freyne (1988) has included other new exegetical approaches in his work. In particular, he has attempted to link sociological interest with literary criticism. Although, as the author confirms, a sociological reading is interested in the "extra-textual referent," and literary criticism is, conversely, interested in the "intra-textual, fictional world" (7), Freyne sees a compatibility nonetheless: "We cannot a priori exclude the possibility that some realistic features of the narrative dimension of our texts may have a genuine contribution to make in recovering the presumed actual world behind these texts" (12). Such realistic elements spring from the concern of the author to persuade the reader via the probability of the presentation. Narrative analysis of the text can therefore be helpful for a historical and sociological concern. Freyne further sees a hermeneutical advantage in allowing the texts to speak first, instead of immediately analyzing them historically with specific interests. Consequently, he raises first of all the narrative picture of Galilee in the individual Gospels (according to places, persons, and plot) and tries in a second step to reconstruct Galilee as a social world (politically, ecologically, economically, culturally, religiously) and as the context of the Jesus movement. The resulting analysis shows how Galilee, with its mix of traditional religious and progressive, barrier-breaking features became fertile ground for the Jesus movement.

d. Conclusion. In summary, one can recognize three trends in sociologically oriented exegesis of the NT: (1)

The original excitement over the discovery of sociological models appears to have given way to a more critical stance. Socio-historical investigations again enjoy great interest, with few theoretical handicaps. (2) The connection between social reality and symbol-building, especially with regard to ideology (see IDEOLOGICAL CRITICISM), is becoming increasingly important. The "social world" is understood more and more as a "symbolic universe." (3) Combinations of the sociological with other novel approaches, especially with modern literary criticism, are gaining in importance.

Bibliography: U. Bail (ed.), Gott an den Rändern: Sozialgeschichtliche Perspektiven auf die Bibel (1996). D. L. Balch (ed.), Social History of the Matthean Community: Cross-disciplinary Approaches (1991). W. Bauer, "Jesus der Galiläer," Festschrift A. Jülicher (1927) 16-34. F. Belo, A Materialist Reading of the Gospel of Mark (1975; ET 1981). K. Berger, "Wissenssoziologie und Exegese des Neuen Testaments," Kairos 19 (1977) 124-33. R. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (FRLANT 29, 1921, 1979[9]; ET 1963, 1968[2]). C. J. Cadoux, The Early Church and the World: A History of the Christian Attitude to Pagan Society and the State down to the Time of Constantius (1925). S. J. Case, The Evolution of Early Christianity: A Genetic Study of First-century Christianity in Relation to Its Religious Environment (1914); The Social Origins of Christianity (1923); The Social Triumph of the Ancient Church (1934). J. K. Chow, Patronage and Power: A Study of Social Networks in Corinth (JSNTSup 75, 1992). A. D. Clarke, Secular and Christian Leadership in Corinth: A Socio-historical and Exegetical Study of 1 Corinthians 1–6 (AGJU 19, 1993). M. Clévénot, Materialist Approaches to the Bible (1976; ET 1985). F. Crüsemann, "Grandfragen sozialgeschichtlicher Exegese," EvErz 35 (1983) 273-86. A. Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East: The NT Illustrated by Recently Discovered Texts of the Graeco-Roman World (1908, 1923[4]; ET 1927). M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (1919; ET 1971). E. von Dobschütz, Die urchristlichen Geimeinden: Sittengeschichtliche Bilder (1902). M. N. Ebertz, Das Charisma des Gekreuzigten: Zur Soziologie der Jesusbewegung (WUNT 45, 1987). J. H. Elliott, A Home for the Homeless: A Sociological Exegesis of 1 Peter, Its Situation and Strategy (1981). S. Freyne, Galilee, Jesus, and the Gospels: Literary Approaches and Historical Investigations (1988). A. Funk, Status und Rollen in den Paulusbriefen: Eine inhaltsanalytische Untersuchung zur Religionssoziologie (IThS 7, 1981). J. G. Gager, Kingdom and Community: The Social World of Early Christianity (1975). N. K. Gottwald (ed.), The Bible and Liberation: Political and Social Hermeneutics (1983); (ed.), "Social-scientific Criticism of the HB and Its Social World: The Israelite Monarchy," Semeia 37 (1986) 1-147. F. C. Grant, The Economic Background of the Gospels (1926). A. von Harnack, Lehre der zwölf Apostel nebst Untersuchungen zur ältesten Geschichte der Kirchenverfassung und des Kirchenrechts (TU, 2, 1-2, 1884, 1893[2]); Die Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums in den ersten drei Jahrhunderten (1902). D. J. Harrington, "Second Testament Exegesis and the Social Sciences: A Bibliography," BTB 18 (1988) 75-85. E. Hatch, Die Gesellschaftsverfassung der christlichen Kirchen im Alterthum: Acht Vorlesungen (1883). C. F. G. Heinrici, Erklärung der Korinthierbriefe in 2 Bänden, vol. 2, Das zeite Sendschreiben des Apostels Paulus an die Korinthier (1887). M. Hengel, The Charismatic Leader and His Followers (BZNW 34, 1968; ET 1981); Property and Riches in the Early Church: Aspects of a Social History of Early Christianity (1973; ET 1974). R. F. Hock, The Social Context of Paul's Ministry, Tentmaking, and Apostleship (1980). B. Holmberg, Paul and Power: The Structure of Authority in the Primitive Church as Reflected in the Pauline Epistles (ConBNT 11, 1978); Sociology and the NT: An Appraisal (1990). R. A. Horsley, Jesus and the Spiral of Violence: Popular Jewish Resistance in Roman Palestine (1987); Sociology and the Jesus Movement (1989). R. A. Horsley and J. S. Hanson, Bandits, Prophets, and Messiahs: Popular Movements in the Time of Jesus (1985). J. Jeremias, Jerusalem in the Time of Jesus: An Investigation into Economic and Social Conditions During the NT Period (1923; ET 1969). E. A. Judge, "The Social Identity of the First Christians: A Question of Method in Religious History," JRH 11 (1980/81) 201-17; Rank and Status in the World of the Caesars and St. Paul (1982). H. C. Kee, Community of the New Age: Studies in Mark's Gospel (1977, 1983[2]); Christian Origins in Sociological Perspective: Methods and Resources (1980); Knowing the Truth: A Sociological Approach to NT Interpretation (1989). H. G. Kippenberg, Religion und Klassenbildung im antiken Judäa: Eine religionssoziologische Studie zum Verhältnis von Tradition und gesellschaftlicher Entwicklung (1978). H.-J. Klauck, Hausgemeinde und Hauskirche im frühen Christentum (SBS 103, 1981). W. G. Kümmel, "Das Urchristentum II: Arbeiten zu Spezialproblemen. b: Zur Sozialgeschichte und Soziologie der Urkirche," TRu 50 (1985) 327-63. P. Lampe, Die stadtrömischen Christen in den ersten beiden Jahrhunderten: Untersuchungen zur Sozialgeschichte (WUNT 2, 18, 1987, 1989[2]). E. Lohmeyer, Soziale Fragen im Urchristentum (Wissenschaft und Bildung 172, 1921); Vom Begriff der religiösen Gemeinschaft: Eine problemgeschichtliche Untersuchung über die Grundlagen des Urchristentums (1925). A. Malherbe, Social Aspects of Early Christianity (Rockwell Lectures, 1977, 1983[2]). B. J. Malina, The NT World: Insights from Cultural Anthropology (1981); Christian Origins and Cultural Anthropology: Practical Models for Biblical Interpretation (1986). S. Mathews, The Social Teaching of Jesus: An Essay in Christian Sociology (1897); The Atonement and the Social Process (1930). W. A. Meeks (ed.), Zur Soziologie des Urchristentums: Ausgewählte Beiträge zum frühchristlichen Gemeinschaftsleben in seiner gesellschaftlichen Umwelt (TBü 62, 1979); "The Social Context of Pauline Theology," Int 36 (1982) 226-77; The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul (1983). H. Mödritzer, Stigma und Chrisma im Neuen Testament und seiner Umwelt: Zur Soziologie des Urchristentums (NTOA 28, 1994). C. Myers, Binding the Strong Man: A Political Reading of Mark's Story of Jesus (1988). C. Osiek, "The Social Sciences and the Second Testament: Problems and Challenges," BThB 22 (1992) 88-95. V. Robbins, Jesus the Teacher: A Socio-Rhetorical Interpretation of Mark (1984). R. L. Rohrbaugh, "Methodological Considerations in the Debate over the Social Class of Early Christians," JAAR 52 (1984) 519-46; " 'Social Location of Thought' as a Heuristic Construct in NT Study," JSNT 30 (1987) 103-19; (ed.) The Social Sciences and NT Interpretation (1996). T. Schmeller, Brechungen: Urchristliche Wandercharimatiker im Prisma soziologisch orientieter Exegese (SBS 136, 1989); "Soziologisch orientierte Exegese des Neuen Testaments," BK 44 (1989) 103-10; "Sociological Exegesis of the NT," TD 37, 3 (1990) 231-34; Hierarchie und Egalität: Eine sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchung paulinischer Gemeinden und griechisch-römischer Vereine (SBS 162, 1995). K. L. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu: Literarkritische Untersuchungen zur ältesten Jesusüberlieferung (1919). L. Schottroff, Befreiungserfahrungen: Studien zur Sozialgeschichte des Neuen Testaments (TBü 82, 1990). W. Schottroff and W. Stegemann (ed.), Der Gott der kleinen Leute: Sozialgeschichtliche Bibel Auslegungen (2 vols., 1979²); Traditionen der Befreiung: Sozialgeschichtliche Bibelauslegungen (2 vols., 1980). R. Schumacher, Die soziale Lage der Christen im apostolischen Zeitalter (1924). J. H. Schütz, Paul and the Anatomy of Apostolic Authority (1975). J. E. Stambaugh and D. L. Balch, The NT in Its Social Environment (LEC 2, 1986). E. and W. Stegemann, Urchristliche Sozialgeschichte: Die Anfange im Judentum und die Christusgemeinden in der mediterranen Welt (1993). W. Stenger, "Sozialgeschichtliche Wende und historischer Jesus," Kairos 28 (1986) 11-22; "Gebt dem Kaiser, was des Kaisers ist. . . .": Eine sozialgeschichtliche Untersuchung zur Besteurerung Palästinas in neutestamentlicher Zeit (BBB 68, 1988). G. Theissen, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity (TEH 194, 1977, 1985⁴; ET 1978); Social Reality and the Early Christians: Theology, Ethics, and the World of the NT (WUNT 19, 1979, 1989³; ET 1992); "Die pragmatische Bedeutung der Geheimnismotive im Markusevangelium: Ein wissenssoziologischer Versuch," Secrecy and Concealment: Studies in the History of Mediterranean and Near Eastern Religions (ed. H. G. Kippenberg and G. G. Stroumsa, 1995) 225-45; "Vers une théorie de l'historie sociale du christianisme primitif," ETR 63 (1988) 199-225. D. Tidball, An Introduction to the Sociology of the NT (1983); The Social Context of the NT: A Sociological Analysis (1984). E. Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches 1 (1912; ET 1931). H.-J. Venetz, "Der Beitrag der Soziologie zur Lektüre des Neuen Testaments: Ein Bericht," Methoden der Evangelienexegese (ed. J. Pfamatter, ThBer 13, 1985) 87-121.

T. SCHMELLER

SONG OF SONGS, BOOK OF

The Song of Songs is one of the oddest books of the Bible. Eight chapters of love lyrics, including many repeating phrases and images that seem to hint at an underlying structure, it nevertheless contains no readily apparent narrative. Instead, a series of amorous images speak of the love between a man (identified as "the king" or "Solomon") and his beloved (named only as "my spouse" or occasionally "the Shulamite"). Nor is the inclusion of this text in the CANON of the Bible readily understandable, for it tells no sacred history, makes no theological points, and does not mention God. In spite of these peculiarities, Song of Songs is part of all known versions of the biblical text. The MT has many examples of hapax legomena; consequently, the SEPTUAGINT, based on an undiscovered Hebrew original, contains divergent readings. Subsequent translations into Latin and modern vernaculars are also variant at a number of points, depending on the text from which they were translated (see TRANSLATION). In response to this textual confusion Greek and Latin manuscripts used by Christians show a number of strategies for making sense of the poetry, notably inserting rubrics identifying the speakers as "God," "the church," "the synagogue." This scribal custom is perhaps the first instance of interpretation.

It is equally clear that Song of Songs is included in the Bible because of an ancient tradition, common to Judaism and Christianity, of reading the text allegorically. Rabbi AKIBA defended the book at the discussions of the canon held by Jewish scholars at Jamnia in the first century CE with the much-quoted words: "The whole world is not worth the day on which the Song of Songs was given to Israel, for all the Scriptures are holy, but the Song of Songs is the Holy of Holies" (m. Yadayim 3:5). Rabbinic interpretation, as found in the Midrashim (see MIDRASH) and the TARGUMIM, tends to follow one of two basic readings: The book is understood as the song of love between God and Israel given to Moses with the law at Mount Sinai or as the song of love revealed at the building of the ark of the covenant. These interpretations were the basis for an extremely rich tradition of Jewish commentary and provided important clues for the Christian understanding of the text.

1. Early Interpretations. The first important Christian commentator on Song of Songs was ORIGEN of Alexandria, who was widely acclaimed as the author of two interpretations, although these survive only in part and in Latin translation. Extant are two homilies on Cant 1:1–2:14 translated by JEROME and parts of a commentary (to Cant 2:15) in the Latin version of Rufinus (fl. 399–401). Both works show the clear influence of Jewish interpretation and have been linked to Origen's study with rabbis in Alexandria (see ALEXANDRIAN SCHOOL) and especially in Caesarea of Palestine. The most striking evidence of this influence is Origen's assumption that Song of Songs tells a divine love story. Like Jewish interpreters he understood the book's deeper meaning with great flexibility as the love between God and the soul, or Christ and the church, or both. This ease with multiple, non-systematic understandings of a sacred text is congruent with his discussion of the fundamentals of biblical interpretation in bk. 4 of his De Principiis.

Origen's homilies and commentary differ at some points but in general provide a consistent interpretation. Both works stress that the title evokes the "Holy of Holies," as evidence of the book's importance. Both describe the text as an epithalamium, a wedding song written to celebrate the spiritual marriage of God and the Christian soul or the Christian people. The commentary is more detailed and explicit about the nature of this spiritual love than are the homilies and refers more evidently to Jewish teachers. Both texts, but especially the homilies, were widely circulated and quoted in the Middle Ages in spite of doubts about Origen's orthodoxy that reached a peak with his condemnation by the Second Council of Constantinople in 553, 300 years after his death.

The Origenistic approach to biblical exegesis in general was greatly boosted in the West by its incorporation in the works of the fourth-century bishop AMBROSE of Milan. Ambrose wrote no commentary on Song of Songs but cited the text frequently in his writings, with spiritual understandings taken from Origen. These comments were gathered into one book by the twelfth-century Cistercian author William of St. Thierry. An otherwise unknown contemporary of Ambrose named Aponius, thought to be of Syrian origin, is the author of a Song of Songs commentary with many similarities to Origen's. In the Greek-speaking Christian world Origen's allegorical interpretation was widely spread through the work of the Cappadocian bishop GREGORY OF NYSSA, whose commentary presented an allegorical reading through Cant 6:9.

Origen's allegorical understanding of Song of Songs, however influential, did not receive universal acceptance in the early Christian exegetical tradition. The fifth-century Syrian exegete THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, a member of the independent theological tradition known as the ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL, is credited with an interpretation that denied any spiritualizing of the text, reading it instead as Solomon's defense of his marriage to an Egyptian princess in the face of the criticism of his people. Theodore apparently understood the Song to be literally carnal and worthy of inclusion (at best) among the deuterocanonical books of the Bible. Unfortunately, this intriguing minority opinion has been lost. Only hints of Theodore's interpretation remain in the writings of his opponents, who were many and powerful: His views may have provoked the attack of THEODORET OF CYRRHUS on those who do not believe in the spiritual meaning of the poems and certainly played a role in Theodore's condemnation at the first Council of Constantinope in 550 (over a century after his death and three years before Origen's condemnation). His literal or "carnal" interpretation seems to have influenced another lost Song of Songs commentary, that of Julius of Aeclanum (d. 454), the Pelagian foe (see PELAGIUS) of AUGUSTINE's waning years.

2. The Early Middle Ages. From the sixth through the twelfth centuries, Song of Songs enjoyed an unmatched flowering of interest. Nearly one hundred commentaries and a series of homilies on the text are extant, many still in unprinted manuscripts. The book's popularity during this period is a result of the relevance of Origen's allegorical interpretation to the dominant monastic culture. Why a spiritual understanding of these biblical love poems struck such a chord has yet to be fully explored, but the wealth and variety of interpretations of the love between God and the church or God and the soul suggests a multifaceted answer.

Three Song of Songs commentaries written before the Carolingian period set the tone for this tradition. That of Justus of Urguel, written in northern Spain before 546, gives an essentially ecclesiological interpretation but understands several verses, notably Cant 4:12, "a garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse," as references to the Virgin Mary. GREGORY THE GREAT, openly following Origen, wrote two homilies on the first eight verses that were widely admired by later medieval exegetes. Gregory took advantage of the difficulties of his text to theorize on the nature of allegorical representations of truth; his dictum that allegory is "a sort of machine which draws one up to God" is a favorite tag of later medieval interpreters. His interpretation was most widely circulated, not as an independent text, but as part of the compendium of his writings assembled by his disciple Paterius. The third early medieval expositor of Song of Songs is the eighth-century Northumbrian BEDE. The middle five books of his seven-part commentary constitute a complete verse-by-verse explication. Book one is a refutation of the Pelagian position on free will, directed against the teachings of Julius of Aeclanum. Book seven presents a collection of comments on Song of Songs taken from the writings of Gregory the Great. The central five books are solidly ecclesiological; the whole taken together should be understood as an educational treatise on the sanctity of the church and on the lack of saving grace outside it. Bede's interpretation was known to later centuries mostly through the abridgement of ALCUIN of York, another English scholar, whom Charlemagne put in charge of ninth-century school reforms.

Biblical exegesis was the major form of theological writing in the Carolingian age. Song of Songs did not figure prominently in this intellectual enterprise, but one treatise from that period proved to be very important for the subsequent tradition of the book's interpretation. The commentary of Haymo (also Haimo or Aimo) of Auxerre, Commentarium in Cantica Canticorum (PL 117, 295-358) stressed that the text represents a relationship between the church and God, although Haymo allowed for the possibility that it may represent God's relationship with the individual Christian soul, perhaps showing in this the influence of Origen. Haymo's commentary also shows at some points readings having to do with the end times, thus giving evidence of the application of the famous "four senses of scripture" of J. Cassian (historical, allegorical, tropological, anagogical) that were widely applied to biblical texts in the later Middle Ages. This treatise was held in high regard for many centuries and was avidly read and copied even after the great flowering of interest in Song of Songs in the twelfth century because it reflects so well the spirit of early medieval biblical commentary. The Middle High German paraphrase of William of Ebersberg in the eleventh century was the first interpretation of the book to enter the tradition of vernacular literature.

Haymo was also the basis for two very different Latin Song of Songs commentaries from the eleventh century, those of John of Mantua and Robert of Tombelinia. John's commentary, primarily concerned with the soul as the beloved of God, characterizes the book as a "doctrine of contemplation." Robert concentrated his interpretation almost exclusively on the spiritual marriage of God and the soul, a union besieged by the corruption found in both the world and the church. This shift from ecclesiological to spiritual interpretation anticipates the later medieval tradition.

3. The Twelfth Century. Twelfth-century commentaries on Song of Songs are extremely numerous and varied. This is seen very clearly in the GLOSSA ORDINARIA, the popular running gloss on the Bible that became increasingly standardized in the later Middle Ages. The most important version of the gloss on Song of Songs names wide-ranging sources, including Jerome, Theodoret, RUPERT OF DEUTZ (a contemporary author), and Origen. This marks both the explicit reentry of Origen into the tradition and the common acceptance of the Mariological interpretation found in Rupert's treatise. Both Origen's and Rupert's versions of the gloss make clear the predominance of spiritual over ecclesiological interpretations in this century.

No interpretation of the book is more famous than the eighty-six homilies by the Cistercian abbot BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX. Probably intended for study by fellow monks rather than for preaching in a liturgical setting, this series of homilies treats the text only to Cant 3:1; but this eloquent description of the love between God and the human soul approaches the language of mystical union. Bernard understood the book on three levels equivalent to three stages of spiritual ascent, opening the possibility for a literal, or carnal, reading of the text. But this reading is in some ways the most metaphoric of all the possible interpretations, since it minimalizes human love, portraying it as a cheap imitation of the love of God, which passes all understanding (Phil 4:7). Bernard's influence on his age can be seen in a wave of Cistercian commentaries that followed and complemented his treatment. A commentary by the English Cistercian Gilbert of Hoyland begins at Cant 3:1, where Bernard's homilies end. Bernard's secretary, Geoffrey of Auxerre was also solicited by the order to finish Bernard's truncated work; he declined the task but did compose a commentary on the complete text that includes a short gloss for each verse for those who needed to quickly find an interpretation.

A more systematic attempt to relate levels of meaning in Scripture to Song of Songs is found in the commentaries of Honorious Augustoduniensis (Expositio in Cantica canticorum, PL 172, 347-495; Sigillum Beatae Mariae ubi exponuntur Cantica Canticorum, PL 172, 496-518). The two prefaces of his treatise deal at length with the question of levels of understanding. In the first, Cassian's fourfold sense is invoked: Historically, the book speaks of Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter; allegorically, it depicts the incarnation and the love between Christ and the church; tropologically, it shows either the mystical union of Christ and the soul or the marriage of human will to divine laws; anagogically, it speaks of the union of the heavenly and the earthly church at the resurrection of the dead. In the second preface the allegorical and moral senses are conflated into a drama of redemption, making Song of Songs the nuptial poem that celebrates the elevation of humanity (as individuals but also collectively as the church) to be the bride of God. All four of Cassian's senses function together in this understanding, and again human sexual passion is understood as a metaphor for the love of God. Honorius's lengthy exposition begins with four senses for each verse; but by the middle of the second chapter this cumbersome method is cast aside in favor of an ecclesiological reading with occasional references to the other senses.

Another important twelfth-century tradition, Mariological interpretation, is also ultimately linked to an ecclesiological understanding. Single verses had been adapted for use in liturgies of the Virgin Mary as early as the fourth century; by the twelfth, the propers for the Feast of the Assumption were taken directly from the text. Commentaries on the book's liturgical use for Marian feasts were written by Honorius and by the Parisian Augustinian canon HUGH OF ST. VICTOR. Several systematic explications that understood the bride as the Virgin Mary also date from this period, notably those of Rupert of Deutz, William of Newburgh, and ALAN OF LILLE, all stressing the role of the Virgin in the incarnation of Christ and so as the mother of the church. An anonymous Middle High German commentary known as the St. Trudpert Song of Songs, addressed to a community of nuns, offered a Mariological interpretation as a model of a pious soul. As the last of the medieval traditions of Song of Songs interpretation, Mariological readings may seem more innovative than they really were, for the primary Christian understanding of the book continued to be that it depicts the love between God and the church and/or God and the soul.

4. The Scholastic Period. With the waning of monastic culture and the rise of the scholastic tradition in the thirteenth century, Song of Songs commentaries were adapted to the scholastic method. An early example is found in the Aurora, a versified Bible begun in Reims before 1200 by the canon Peter Riga and completed by the deacon Aegidius of Paris about a decade later, which drew on entirely traditional sources, including Origen. William of Auvergne (c. 1180–1249), a master of theology at the University of Paris, used the scholastic posing of antitheses to present a dark twist on the traditional ecclesiological reading, stressing the corruption of the church of his day. Even mystical and Mariological interpretations were subjected to the rigors of the scholastic method in the commentaries of the Franciscan P. Olivi and of the Oxford scholar A. Neckham. The Postilla of NICHOLAS OF LYRA, a fourteenth-century Franciscan, acknowledged that Jewish scholars understood the bride to be the people of Israel, even as Christians understood her to be the Roman Catholic Church. This is one of the few references since Origen to the tradition of Jewish commentary on the text, although the celebrated commentary of RASHI, who wrote in the late eleventh century, and that of his grandson, SAMUEL BEN MEIR, were known by medieval Christians.

5. The Early Modern Period. The disavowal of both monastic and scholastic exegesis by the biblical scholars of the Protestant Reformation is the beginning of a split in Song of Songs interpretation. LUTHER tried to tread a thin line between unacceptable medieval allegorizing and the equally disturbing literal sense. His commentary reflects political concerns: The bridegroom is God, but the bride is the Christian state in harmonious union with secular and divine powers. Other Protestant exegetes were willing to go further. S. CASTELLIO claimed that the poems only celebrated human sexual love and were not worthy of a place in the canon, a position that led him into conflict with CALVIN and to expulsion from Geneva. Calvin took Song of Songs to portray human love, if divinely inspired. Later Protestant authors often read it as showing the love between Christ and the church, as did T. Wilcocks (1624) and J. Durham (1723), or followed Nicholas of Lyra's historical/allegorical reading, as did T. BRIGHTMAN, J. COTTON, and J. COCCEIUS. By the end of the seventeenth century, this Protestant reading had also influenced such Roman Catholic interpreters as J. Bossuet (1693), whose claim that the text should be read as a historical narrative of Solomon's wedding feast contrasts to the mystical explications of John of the Cross and Teresa of Avila in the sixteenth century, and of his contemporary Françis de Sales.

6. Modern Interpretations. Allegorical readings of Song of Songs, Protestant and Roman Catholic, are found in the eighteenth century in such authors as J. WESLEY, who read the text as describing the love between God and the church, and J.-M. GUYON, who read it as representing the love between God and the soul. But an emerging critical consensus, of which J. G. HERDER is an important representative, focused attention on the poems as literature, emphasizing structural and linguistic analysis. By the middle of the nineteenth century the tools of "scientific" biblical study and the discovery of ancient Near Eastern literature enabled scholars to ask new questions about the book.

Several nineteenth-century scholars cited similarities between the Song and Syrian wedding poetry as the key to its meaning, but this has not been widely accepted. Also controversial but far more established is the position that Song of Songs is related to ancient cultic rituals, especially those connected with divinities of fertility that flourished in the ancient Near East. The similarities between the book and cultic literature of Mesopotamia, Egypt (see EGYPTOLOGY), and UGARIT has been elaborated by such twentieth-century scholars as E. Ebeling, T. MEEK, S. Kramer, and M. Fox (1985). M. Pope (1977) has given a complex summary of these parallels and suggested others. Clues to the book's meaning found in Jewish mystical texts, especially the Zohar, have been presented by G. Scholem and elaborated by R. Patai (1967). Although not universally accepted, this work has been influential for more traditional Christian expositors.

Roman Catholic commentators have taken a number of different positions on questions of both the origin and the allegorical understandings of the text. A. Robert (1963) argued that the poems are a Midrash on the history of Israel and are therefore essentially allegorical in nature, not just according to a tradition of interpretation. P. Parente (1944), citing many examples from the long tradition of Christian exegesis, characterized the Song of Songs as "an allegorical representation of various mystical states." A. Rivera (1951) revived the Mariological interpretation as the literal meaning, since the description of the bride fits the Virgin Mary singularly well, especially in her relation to the church. It is striking that none of these interpretations is particular to the modern era. Another contemporary Roman Catholic scholar, R. Murphy, has argued strongly against allegorizing on any level, citing the precedent of Theodore of Mopsuestia. For R. Murphy the Song celebrates the sanctity of human love and the virtues of devotion and fidelity.

Most Protestant commentary in the last half of the twentieth century also agrees that these are songs of human love. E. Young, H. ROWLEY, and R. Laurin (1962) all describe the book as an affirmation of the goodness and dignity of human love, while stressing that the same details of sexuality can be understood as profane or pure, depending on one's spiritual state. Reading the Song as human love poems is also common in modern Jewish commentaries, notably those of I. Bettan (1950), R. GORDIS, and H. GINSBERG. W. Phipps (1974) has issued a scathing denunciation of traditional allegories, blaming them for "the plight of the Song of Songs." The interpretation of D. Lys (1968) portrays the book as sexual and sacred, its eroticism a deliberate reminder that sexuality is part of both creation and covenant. Lys thus follows K. BARTH in reading the Song as a commentary on Genesis 2. The FEMINIST INTERPRETATION of P. Trible (1978) understands the book as expanding and completing the creation of sexuality described in Genesis 2–3 by describing human love without male dominance, female subordination, or sexual stereotyping.

What is clear from both this biblical book and all of its many interpretations is that Song of Songs speaks of the power and mystery of love. Perhaps the true meaning of the text is destined to remain complex, controversial, and elusive.

Bibliography: A. W. Astell, The Song of Songs in the Middle Ages (1990). I. Bettan, The Five Scrolls: A Commentary on the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther (1950). J. B. Bossuet, Libri Salomonis, Canticum Canticorum (1693). J. Durham, Clavis Cantici, or an Exposition of the Song of Solomon (1624). M. Engammare, Le Cantique de Cantiques à la Renaissance: Étude et Bibliographie (1993). M. V. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (1985). R. Gordis, The Song of Songs and Lamentations: A Study, Modern Translation, Commentary (1974). R. B. Laurin, "The Life of True Love: The Song of Songs and Its Modern Message," Christianity Today 6 (1962) 10/1062-11/1063. R. F. Littledale, A Commentary on the Song of Songs from Ancient and Mediaeval Sources (1869). D. Lys, Le plus beau chant de la creation: Commentaire du Cantique des Cantiques (LD 41, 1968). E. A. Matter, The Voice of My Beloved: The Song of Songs in Western Medieval Christianity (1990). F. Ohly, Hohelied-Studien: Grundzüge einer Geschichte der Hoheliedauslegung des Abendlandes bis um 1200 (1958). P. P. Parente, "The Canticle of Canticles in Mystical Theology," CBQ 6 (1944) 142-58. R. Patai, Man and Temple in Ancient Jewish Myth and Ritual (1967²); The Hebrew Goddess (1968). W. E. Phipps, "The Plight of the Song of Songs," JAAR 42 (1974) 82-100. M. H. Pope, Song of Songs: A New Translation and Commentary (AB, 1977). W. Riedl, Die Auslegung des Hohenliedes in der jüdischen Gemeinde und der griechischen Kirche (1898). H. Riedlinger, Die Makellosigkeit der Kirche in den lateinischen Hoheliedkommentaren des Mittelalters (BGPTM 37, 1958). P. A. Rivera, "Sentido mariologico del Cantar de los Cantos," EM 1 (1951) 437-468. A. Robert and R. Tournay, La Cantique des Cantiques: Traduction et commentaire (1963). G. Scholem, Jewish Gnosticism, Merkabah Mysticism, and Talmudic Tradition (1960); Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism (1961); On the Kabbalah and Its Symbolism (1965). P. Trible, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (1978). D. Turner, Eros and Allegory: Medieval Exegesis of the Song of Songs (1995). R. J. Weems, "Song of Songs," Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992); "Song of Songs," NIB (1997) 5:361-434. T. Wilcocks, An Exposition Upon the Book of Canticles (1624).

E. A. MATTER

SPEISER, EPHRAIM AVIGDOR (1902–65)

Born in Skalat, Galicia, S. emigrated to the United States in 1920. He was an ethno-linguist and an archeologist (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), an assyriologist (see ASSYRIOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), an expert in the modern Near East, and a Bible translator and commentator. From 1928 onward his academic berth was the department of oriental studies of the University of Pennsylvania, where he was chair from 1947.

S. applied to the study of the Bible his profound expertise in linguistic analysis and in the languages and cultures of the ancient Near East. Beginning with his MA thesis on the Hebrew origin of the first part of the book of Wisdom (1923) and his doctoral work on the pronunciation of Hebrew according to the Hexapla (1924)—under J. MONTGOMERY and M. MARGOLIS—he produced a steady flow of studies on Hebrew and biblical topics. Much of his last decade was devoted to work on the Bible TRANSLATION committee of the Jewish Publication Society of America; its first product, The Torah (1962), bears his imprint throughout. His biblical scholarship culminated in his Genesis commentary (1965). As a translator, he aimed "to translate not just a text but a civilization" (Genesis, lxvi); as a commentator, "not to say whether a statement was true or false, but what it means" (ibid., lv). For that, a knowledge of the historical-cultural setting of the Bible story was indispensable.

S. was convinced of the overall authenticity of the traditions in Genesis. His proficiency in Mesopotamian law and literature enabled him to draw from them frequent parallels in structure, theme, and legal practice. He laid particular stress on cases in which the ancient meaning of biblical traditions can be restored only from extra-biblical sources, e.g. the wife/sister motif in the patriarchal stories and the importance of the teraphim—both illuminated, he argued, by Nuzi texts (for critiques, see B. Eichler [1977, 1989]; M. Greenberg [1962]; T. Thompson [1974]). Holding the documentary theory to be the key to the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), S. regarded the documents as independent retellings of a common Israelite tradition. The duplications, variations, and divergences between them show that they had early acquired an aura of sanctity as Israel's spiritual history and so could not be freely manipulated by compilers in order to achieve a harmony.

S. was interested in the history of ideas. He identified the beginning of the biblical process—the development of monotheism—with Abraham's call and migration from Mesopotamia. That act "altered the course of history irrevocably . . . the detour became the main road" (Genesis, lxi). S. accounted for such typical features of biblical THEOLOGY as the result of two simultaneous planes, divine and human, on which biblical events move (ibid., 256). In all his work he strove to integrate philological details into larger conceptual wholes, to show continuities in successive cultures of the Near East, and to reflect on their enduring impact, in the process proving that scholarship can be clothed in a witty and elegant style.

Works: "Akkadian Myths and Epics," ANET[2] (1995) 60-119, 514-16; (ed. and chief contributor), At the Dawn of Civilization: A Background of Biblical History (1963); Genesis (AB 1, 1965); Oriental and Biblical Studies: Collected Writings of E. A. S. (ed. M. Greenberg and J. J. Finkelstein, 1967).

Bibliography: B. Eichler, "Another Look at the Nuzi Sistership Contracts," Essays on the Ancient Near East in Memory of J. J. Finkelstein (ed. M. de-J. Ellis, 1977) 45-59; "Nuzi and the Bible: A Retrospective," DUMU-E'-DUB-BA-A: Studies in Honor of A. Sjöberg (ed. H. Behrens et al., 1989) 107-19. J. J. Finkelstein, "E. A. S.: An Appreciation," Oriental and Biblical Studies (E. A. Speiser, 1967) 605-16. M. Greenberg, "Another Look at Rachel's Theft of the Teraphim," JBL 81 (1962) 239-48; "In Memory of E. A. S.," JAOS 88 (1968) 1-2. T. L. Thompson, The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives: The Quest for the Historical Abraham (BZAW 133, 1974).

M. GREENBERG

SPENCER, JOHN (1630–93)

A Christian Hebraist born at Bocton, Kent, S. earned his BA and MA degrees at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and was chosen fellow in 1655. He began his career as a tutor and was later appointed a university preacher; he obtained his BD and DD degrees in 1659 and 1665 respectively. A man of great distinction, he became the rector of Landbeach, Cambridgeshire, master of his college, and archdeacon of Sudbury all in the same year (1667). He later became prebendary (1672) and dean (1677) in the church of Ely. He died May 27, 1693.

S. was one of the earliest pioneers of the comparative study of religion. In his De Urim et Thummim (1669), he traced the connection between the sacred institutions of Israel and those of its neighbors, concluding that the Israelites had borrowed much from the Egyptians. (In opposition, H. Witsius argued in his Ægyptiaca [1683] that the Egyptians had borrowed from the Israelites.) In many respects S. was greatly influenced by MAIMONIDES. Reacting against the contemporary tinker prophets and ranters who spoke in tongues, he adopted Maimonides' portrait of the prophet (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) as a learned, rational, and moral person who possessed soundness of mind both before and at the time of the prophetic utterance (1663). In his magnum opus, De legibus Hebræorum (1685), again following Maimonides, he suggested that the greater part of the Israelite ceremonial and cultic laws was instituted as a concession to the Hebrews but in opposition to the practices of the idolatrous nations around them. This work includes treatments on the Mosaic laws and the theocracy (bk. 1); laws occasioned by the customs of the Zabeans and the apostolic decree in Acts 15 (bk. 2); the rites transferred from gentile customs to the law, the origin of sacrifice, purification, new moons, the ark and cherubim, the Temple, the origin of the Urim and Thummim, and the scapegoat (bk. 3); the rites and customs the Hebrews borrowed from the Gentiles, and phylacteries (bk. 4).

Works: A Discourse Concerning Prodigies: Wherein the Vanity of Presages by Them Is Reprehended, and Their True and Proper Use Asserted and Vindicated (1663; 1665[2] includes A Discourse Concerning Vulgar Prophecies: Wherein the Vanity of Receiving Them as the Certain Indications of Any Future Event, Is Discovered, and Some Characters of Distinction Between True and Pretended Prophets, Are Laid Down); Dissertatio de Urim et Thummim (1669); De legibus Hebræorum ritualibus, et earum rationibus libri tres (1685; 1727[2], ed. L. Chappelow, was expanded by the addition of a fourth book; the Tübingen ed. of 1732 includes a biography by C. M. Pfaff).

Bibliography: J. Assmann, "Before the Law: J. S. as Egyptologist," Moses the Egyptian: The Memory of Egypt in Western Monotheism (1997) 55-90. BB 6 (1763) 3793-802. R. Buddensieg, RE[3] 18 (1906) 607-9. T. Cooper, DNB 53 (1898) 359-60. J. Guttman, "J. S.s Erklärung der biblischen Gesetze in ihrer Beziehung zu Maimonides," Festskrift i anledning af Prof. D. Simonsens 70-aarige fødselsdag (ed. C. H. Melchior et al., 1923) 259-76. G. V. Lechler, Geschichte des englischen Deismus (1965) 137-40.

J. KUAN

SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB (1635–1705)

Born Jan. 13, 1635, of Alsatian descent, S. died Feb. 5, 1705. He studied Greek and Hebrew philology, geography, and theology at the University of Strasbourg. In 1666 he was appointed pastor and senior of the Lutheran ministerium at Frankfurt am Main, where in 1670 he initiated the formation of conventicles within the church for the mutual edification and education of individual believers. In 1675 he published Pia desideria, a preface to the postils of J. Arndt, which, published separately in various editions, stimulated the spiritual awakening known as PIETISM.

An active pastor and prolific writer, S. published over one hundred individual sermons and collections, catechetical works, hymns, and wider-ranging devotional and theological treatises. Most of these follow the patterns for Bible reading and exposition outlined in Pia desideria. In Spiritual Priesthood (1677) he emphasized each believer's need for the new birth and a new life in Christ and the need for the renewal of Reformation principles on the centrality of the Scriptures in the life of the individual and of the Christian community. Insisting that the Scriptures are not obscure, he called on all believers regardless of their "simplicity" to attend to them. Although the ancient languages can help in interpretation, all "simple, pious" Christians can understand Scripture by the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit, if they approach daily Bible reading in sincere prayer, with close attention to individual texts and their relationship to the whole, applying what is read to personal situations and bypassing what is obscure.

Works: Pia desideria (ed. K. Aland, 1964); Pia Desideria (ed. and tr. T. G. Tappert, 1964); Spiritual Priesthood (1677).

Bibliography: M. Brecht, "P. J. S.: Sein Programm und dessen Auswirkungen," Der Pietesmus vom Siebzehnten bis zum früher achtzehnten Jahrhundert (M. Brecht, 1993) 281-90. P. Grunberg, Philipp Jakob Spener (3 vols., 1893–1906). J. Wallmann, P. J. S. und die Anfänge des Pietismus (1966).

P. C. ERB

SPINOZA, BENEDICT (or BARUCH) DE (1632–77)

A Dutch philosopher, S. was born Nov. 24, 1632, and died Feb. 21, 1677. He is best known now for his Ethics (1677), an attempt to work out a system of philosophy "geometrically" by formal proofs from axioms and definitions, beginning with a demonstration of the existence and nature of God, proceeding through an account of human nature, and culminating in a theory of human conduct and well-being. S.'s God is a philosopher's god, an impersonal first cause of everything that happens (though not first in a temporal sense, since S. conceived the world as eternal); God acts, not to achieve any purpose, but simply out of necessity. Since affirming God's existence amounts to affirming that everything in nature happens because of immutable natural laws, in his own time S. was held to be an atheist; now commentators are more inclined to regard his view as religious, even if unconventional. His theory of human nature is egoistic and attempts to show that enlightened egoism leads to much the same rules of conduct as does traditional religion. Although he identified mind and body, the Ethics concludes with an almost mystical affirmation of the mind's ability to achieve eternity through the intellectual love of God.

In his own time S. was at least as well known for his Theological-Political Treatise (1670), a landmark in the history of biblical criticism that argued for extensive freedom of thought and expression. He was reared in the Jewish community in Amsterdam, most of whose members were formerly from the Iberian peninsula, where they had been forcibly converted to (at least a nominal) Christianity. In Amsterdam they found freedom to practice their religion openly but were not always prepared to allow equal freedom to dissenters in their midst. As a youth S. was trained in theology but became dissatisfied with the rabbis' teachings and turned to philosophy, in which he was influenced particularly by the work of Descartes and T. HOBBES. By 1656 he had departed sufficiently from orthodoxy to be expelled from the community. The reasons are obscure, but a report in the files of the Inquisition from an informant who talked to S. shortly afterward says that he held that God exists only philosophically, that the mind dies with the body, and that the Jewish law is not the true law. On excommunication S. wrote a defense of his opinions, now lost, although contemporary accounts report that some of its contents survive in the Theological-Political Treatise.

At the heart of S.'s biblical scholarship is the doctrine that in interpreting Scripture we must not start from the assumption that it is true in every passage. To do that leads inevitably to reading our own views into Scripture. If we think that Scripture must be true in every respect, and we find it to be in prima facie conflict with what, on other grounds, we are convinced is true, then we will find ourselves drawn into reinterpretations of Scripture guided by whatever ideas are current in our society. The meaning of Scripture will change as our ideas about the truth change. S. was particularly opposed to those who, like MAIMONIDES, interpreted Scripture in the light of Greek philosophy.

The proper procedure, S. argued, was to attribute no doctrine to Scripture that we cannot clearly discover from its "history." A history of Scripture, in his sense, will contain an account of the nature of the language the books of Scripture were written in that establishes the ordinary use of its terms and possible sources of ambiguity (e.g., the absence of vowel markings in ancient Hebrew); a thoroughly organized collection of passages on various topics, noting all those that are ambiguous or obscure or seem inconsistent with one another; an account of the life and mentality of the author of each book; when and for whom the author wrote; how the book was preserved, transmitted, and accepted as canonical (see CANON OF THE BIBLE); and how many variant readings there are.

S. contended that for much of Scripture we lack the historical information necessary to discover its true meaning, particularly when it deals with speculative matters or historical narratives. But he insisted that the central moral teaching of the Bible—to obey God through the practice of justice and love—is clear and consistent throughout. Other prescriptions of the law are not essential for salvation; they were designed only to provide for the political stability of the Jewish state. S.'s biblical criticism deals almost exclusively with the HB. He excused himself from commenting extensively on the NT on the ground that he lacked adequate Greek, but he did have some brief and suggestive remarks to make about it.

S. shocked many of his contemporaries by holding that (a) the Bible frequently shows an inadequate conception of God, insofar as the prophets think of God as a lawgiver or attribute to him such emotions as jealousy and anger, love and mercy; (b) miracles are impossible, the miracle narratives reflecting either a misunderstanding of a natural event or a deliberate falsification of the historical record; (c) most of the historical sequence from Genesis through Kings was written by one person (probably Ezra), who worked in the postexilic period from sources now largely lost to tell a story with a political moral (obedience to the law brings prosperity; disobedience, disaster); (d) among the lost works was the original text of the covenant between God and the people of Israel; and (e) many of the difficulties in this narrative arise from Ezra's not having been able to smooth out all the inconsistencies in his sources.

Although his contemporaries thought his work intolerably bold and moved quickly to suppress it, the principal controversy today is whether S. concealed much of his radicalism in an attempt to avoid persecution.

Works: Opera (4 vols., ed. C. Gebhardt), the standard ed. in the original languages. A new English language edition is being published: The Collected Works of Spinoza (ed. E. M. Curley, vol. 1, 1985; vol. 2, forthcoming). Volume 1 contains the Ethics and other works, including the earlier correspondence. Volume 2 will include The Theological-Political Treatise, correspondence relating to it, and the Hebrew Grammar. In the interim the best English translations of the Theological-Political Treatise and the complete Letters are those of S. Shirley (1991).

Bibliography: E. Curley, "Homo audax: Leibniz, Oldenburg, and the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus," Studia Leibnitiana (1990); "S. and the Science of Hermeneutics," S.: The Enduring Questions (ed. G. Hunter and J. R. Brown, 1993). J. Force and R. Popkin (eds.), The Books of Nature and Scripture (1994). E. Harris, "Is There an Esoteric Doctine in the Tractatus Theologico-Politicus?" Mededelingen vanwege het Spinozahuis 38 (1978), reply to L. Strauss. R. Mason, The God of S.: A Philosophical Study (1997). A. Matheron, Le Christ et le salut des ignorants (1971). K. O. Meinsma, S. et son cercle (1896; rev. and tr. H. Mechoulan, P.-F. Moreau et al., S. en zijn Kring [1983]). S. Smith, S., Liberalism, and the Question of Jewish Identity (1997). L. Strauss, "How to study S.'s Theological-Political Treatise," Persecution and the Art of Writing (ed. L. Straus, 1952); S.'s Critique of Religion (1965) commentary on the religious aspects of the Theological-Political Treatise. S. Zac, S. et l'interprétation de l'Écriture (BP, 1965).

E. M. CURLEY

SPIRITUS PARACLITUS

This encyclical letter of Pope Benedict XV was issued Sept. 15, 1920, on the fifteenth centenary of the death of JEROME. As a memorial encyclical it is more hortatory (recommending Jerome's zeal in the study and interpretation of Scripture as a model for twentieth-century Roman Catholics) than doctrinal.

Following a three-paragraph prologue, the encyclical is divided into eight parts: (1) Jerome's life and labors; (2) Jerome's teaching about Scripture; (3) modern views about Scripture compared with Jerome's teaching; (4) practical counsels; (5) Scripture and priestly education; (6) purpose of biblical knowledge; (7) fruits of biblical study; and (8) Jerome's continuing influence.

What was new in Benedict XV's instruction was his ultraconservative interpretation of Leo XIII's teaching about INSPIRATION and inerrancy, proposed in light of Jerome's teaching. Moreover, in part 3 Benedict rejected views then current among some progressive Roman Catholic interpreters distinguishing between the Bible's primary (religious) affirmations and its secondary (secular) assertions, finding only the former to be guaranteed; or between relative and absolute truths in the Bible's historical accounts, i.e., between popular conceptions of events, or "historical appearances," and what actually took place. Benedict also rejected "tacit quotations" (cited without acknowledgement or assumption of responsibility for content), "pseudo-historical accounts," and diverse "literary forms" because recourse to such interpretative devices whittles away the trust human beings should have in the Bible. Such modern views were said to be incompatible with Jerome's teaching, the church's tradition, and Christ's own method of teaching.

Although this encyclical was meant to honor Jerome, its hidden agenda was a papal reaction to modernism in the first two decades of the twentieth century as this error affected biblical interpretation. It echoes condemnations of Pius X's Pascendi, negative responsa of the Biblical Commission about "tacit quotations" and "historical appearances" (RSS 117 [160-61]), and the decree Lamentabili of the Sacred Inquisition. Its effect on Roman Catholic biblical study was stifling. Interestingly, both the encyclical of Pius XII (1943) and the Biblical Commission's document The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church (1993) pass over it in silence while commemorating Leo XIII's Providentissimus Deus (1893).

Bibliography: "Litterae encyclicae Spiritus Paraclitus. . . ." AAS 12 (1920) 385-422; ET RSS, 43-78 (440-95). BI, 267-302.

J. A. FITZMYER

SPITTA, FRIEDRICH (1852–1924)

In 1880 S. became a Dozent in Bonn; in 1887, professor of NT and practical theology at Strasbourg; and in 1919, professor of NT at Göttingen. He interpreted the writings of the NT against the background of Jewish religious history. Taking his cue from PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, he rather one-sidedly employed LITERARY-critical methodology in attempting to isolate older sources within numerous NT writings, for which he received scant scholarly acceptance.

S. was a decisive opponent of the two source theory and particularly of the priority of Mark. Instead, he considered the Gospel of Luke to be the most dependable source of the story of JESUS. S. considered the parallels between the Gospels to be the result of collective dependence on a historically dependable writing composed c. 40 CE, a writing that was most faithfully preserved in Luke, whereas Mark and Matthew—independently of one another—were based on a secondary edition of this original piece. He also detected traces of a comprehensively reworked original writing in the Gospel of John, a writing approximately as old as that behind the Synoptics (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM).

On the basis of alleged duplications within Acts, S. inferred the existence of two largely parallel original written sources. He considered Romans to be the synthesis of two different Pauline epistles (the first, Rom 1:1–11:36; 15:8-33; 16:21-27; and the second, 12:1–15:7; 16:1-20) and James to be a Jewish piece that was rendered Christian merely by the addition of James 1:1 and 2:1. Finally, he asserted that a single editor created Revelation out of two Jewish apocalypses and one primitive Christian writing. S. defended the authenticity of 2 Peter. He denied any funerary celebration of the Eucharist by Jesus and suspected instead that the prefactory words introduce Jesus' allusions to the idea of a meal of redemption or salvation in which one partakes of the gifts of the Messiah and of the Messiah himself.

Works: Der Brief des Julius Africanus an Aristides (1877); Der zweite Brief des Petrus und der Brief des Judas (1885); Die Offenbarung des Johannes (1889); Die Apostelgeschichte, ihre Quellen, und deren geschichtlicher Wert (1891); Zur Geschichte und Litteratur des Urchristentums, vol. 1, Die zweimalige römische Gefangenschaft des Paulus. Der zweite Brief an die Thessalonicher. Unordnungen im Texte des vierten Evangeliums. Die urchristlichen Traditionen über Ursprung und Sinn des Abendmahls (1893); vol. 2, Der Brief des Jakobus: Studien zum Hirten des Hermas (1896); vol. 3.1, Untersuchungen über den Brief des Paulus an die Römer (1901); vol. 3.2, Die Versuchung Jesu. Lücken im Markusevengelium. Das Testament Hiobs und das Neue Testament (1907); Streitfragen der Geschichte Jesu (1907); Das Johannes-Evangelium als Quelle der Geschichte Jesu (1910); Die synoptische Grundschrift in ihrer Überlieferung durch das Lukasevangelium (UNT 1, 1912).

Bibliography: O. Böcher, *RGG*³ 6 (1962) 258-59. R. Hupfeld, "Zum Gedächtnis F. S.," DtPfrBl 52 (1952) 268-70. A. Meyer, *RGG*² 5 (1931) 704. A. Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (UTB 1302, 1984⁹) 591-95.

B. KOLLMANN

SPURGEON, CHARLES HADDON (1834–92)

Born June 19, 1834, at Kelvedon, Essex, S. became a Baptist in 1850, was pastor at Waterbeach (1852–54) and at New Park Street, Southwark, where the congregation soon exceeded its building and the replacement facility. He excelled as a preacher, with oratory punctuated by humor and enlivened by social comment, and drew huge crowds to the Surrey Gardens Music Hall and eventually to the Metropolitan Tabernacle, opened in 1861. Theologically a Calvinist (see CALVIN) and a stickler for pure doctrine, he opposed liberal methods of biblical exegesis. Citing the influence of higher criticism, Arminianism (see J. ARMINIUS), and Arianism (see ARIUS) on his denomination, he resigned from the Baptist Union, Oct. 26, 1887. He died Jan. 31, 1892.

Works: John Ploughman's Talks (1869); The Treasury of David (1870–76); Lectures to My Students (2 ser., 1875, 1877); Commenting and Commentaries (1876); plus numerous volumes of sermons; Autobiography (compiled by S. Spurgeon [wife] and W. J. Harrald, 4 vols., 1897–1900; rev. in 2 vols., 1962, 1973); Letters (ed. C. Spurgeon [son], 1923).

Bibliography: E. W. Bacon, S., Heir of the Puritans (1967). A. R. Buckland, DNB 53 (1898) 433-35. I. Murray, The Forgotten S. (1966). G. H. Pike, Life of C. H. S. (3 vols., 1892–93). H. Thielicke, Encounter With S. (1961; ET 1963).

A. P. F. SELL

STADE, BERNHARD (1848–1906)

Born May 11, 1848, in Arnstadt, S. pursued theological, Semitic language, and Arabic studies under L. Krehl and H. Fleischer at Leipzig and Ethiopic under A. DILLMANN at Berlin. At Leipzig he was awarded the PhD (1871) and lic. theol. (1873). After completing his habilitation in 1873, he assumed a chair in HB at the University of Giessen as successor to A. Merx (1875), reorganizing the theological faculty so that it soon attracted such scholars as E. SCHÜRER, A. von HARNACK, and F. Kattenbusch. S. was founding editor of ZAW (1881), commonly known as "Stade's journal," and an important contributor. He made it the leading scholarly journal, carefully revising each issue, compiling a bibliography, and placing great importance on impartiality to all scholarly positions. He died suddenly Dec. 6, 1906.

S.'s first works dealt primarily with Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION), although his habilitation lecture concerned the significance of ASSYRIOLOGY for research on the HB. Influenced by J. OLSHAUSEN, S.'s Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Grammatik consistently drew from other Semitic languages. In his attempt to describe the Hebrew language as an organic whole with tangible rules, S. regarded H. EWALD as a model; but he contributed much of his own: criticism of secondary elements in Masoretic vocalization and the thesis that several groups of weak verbs consist of two, not of three, radicals. Unfortunately, the second volume on Hebrew syntax was never produced, and his Hebräisches Wörterbuch suffered from the inferior quality of his collaborator's work. S. strove for completeness in linguistic matters, taking into full account TEXTUAL CRITICISM and—contrary to his Semitic schooling—letting linguistic comparisons, etymology, and general "root meanings" recede into the background. He regarded the contemporaneous revisions of H. GESENIUS's Lexicon as too speculative.

Long before J. WELLHAUSEN followed up his analysis of HB historiography in Die Geschichte Israels (1878) with his synthesis Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte (1894), S. had undertaken such a synthesis in his Geschichte des Volkes Israel, which began to appear in fascicles in 1881. In the second volume he extended his presentation only to the Greek period, with O. Holtzmann completing the work to the end of the Jewish state and the rise of Christianity. In an effort to produce a factual presentation for a broad audience, the work discusses in great detail both the biblical tradition and its historical value. The main emphasis lies on the development of Israelite religion, with Christianity as its goal. Its scholarly viewpoint is, for the most part, that of Wellhausen; some points, however, advance further. As many of his articles and especially his edition of the Books of Kings show, S. was an independent and provocative textual and LITERARY critic who succeeded in making many discoveries in his subtle analysis of the text.

In theological matters S. represented an open liberalism, appealing to the Lutheran Reformation in contrast to orthodoxy, PIETISM, and especially Roman Catholicism. He was influenced by his experience of the Prussian "cultural struggle" and by the theologian A. RITSCHL. His intention of pursuing theology as a critical exegete is evident in the title of his last major work, unfortunately unfinished: Biblische Theologie des alten Testaments. Instead of a history of Israelite religion, as was common at that time, he offered a very lucid and rich account of the history of religion, in the first section treating the pre-prophetic religion of Israel; and in the second, the transformation of Israel's religion in the age of PROPHECY, which he considered to have lasted until Ezra and Nehemiah, where he located the caesura between Israel and Judaism. Following S.'s death, A. BERTHOLET wrote the depiction of Jewish religion after Ezra. S. did not succeed in completing his presentation of biblical THEOLOGY or his discussion of the proper relationship of HB and NT, which he saw joined too easily in traditional theology and split too far apart in modern criticism.

Works: Über den Ursprung der mehrlautigen Thatwörter der Gecezsprache (1871); De Isaiae vaticiniis aethiopicis diatribe (1873); Lehrbuch der hebräischen Grammatik, vol. 1, Schriftlehre. Lautlehre. Formenlehr (1879); Über die Lage der evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands (1883); Geschichte des Volkes Israel 1 (1887, 1889²; with O. Holtzmann, 2 [1888]; Allgemeine Geschichte in Einzeldarstellungen, ed. W. Oncken, 1.6); (with C. Siegfried), Hebräisches Wörterbuch zum Alten Testamente (1893); Die Reorganisation der Theologischen Fakultät zu Giessen in den Jahren 1878–82 (1894); Ausgewählte akademische Reden und Abhandlungen (1899, 1907²); Die Entstehung des Volkes Israel (1899); (assisted by F. Schwally), The Books of Kings (SBOT 9, 1904); Biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments, vol. 1, Die Religion Israels und die Entstehung des Judentums (GTW 2.2, 1905); Einst und jetzt: Rückblicke und Ausblicke (1905).

Bibliography: Am Grabe B. S.: Reden und Ansprachen (1906). G. Beer, *RE*³ 24 (1913) 525-28. A. F. von Gall, "Verzeischnis der Schriften von B. S.," ZAW 27 (1907) xvi-xix; "B. S.: Ein Nachruf," ZAW 27 (1907) i-xv. H. Gunkel, "B. S.: Charakterbild eines modernen Theologen," Reden und Aufsätze (1913) 1-10. R. Smend, Giessener Gelehrte in der ersten Hälfte des 20. Jahrhunderts (ed. H. G. Gundel et al., 1982) 913-24 = DATDJ, 129-42.

R. SMEND

STAERK, WILLY OTTO ALEXANDER (1866–1946)

Born in Berlin, Dec. 15, 1866, S. studied at Berlin, Marburg, and Halle (1887–94) under P. Kleinert, A. DILLMANN, H. Strack, J. WELLHAUSEN, and E. KAUTZSCH. He taught school while continuing private studies (1894–1904). His single university post was at Jena (1905–34), where he died Dec. 3, 1946.

S.'s earliest writings were literary-critical analyses of Zechariah and Deuteronomy. Rather quickly, however, he came to question both LITERARY criticism and the associated concept of the evolution of Israel's religion, exemplified by B. STADE and K. MARTI, on such matters as preexilic prophetic eschatology (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and the existence of E as an independent source. S.'s later work went in several directions: FORM CRITICISM (particularly in his translation of the psalms in Die Schriften des Alten Testmaents [1910, 1920²]), comparative religion (e.g., the soteriological concepts of the Eastern religions), the study of post- and extrabiblical materials (the Odes of Solomon, the Elephantine papyri, the Damascus Document, the Mishna, and medieval Yiddish biblical translations), and special problem areas in the HB (the Servant Songs, Deuteronomy). Above all, S. was increasingly concerned to read the Bible theologically and thereby to counteract a "secularizing" approach to it.

Works: Untersuchungen über die Komposition von Zach. 9–14 (1891); Das Deuteronomium: Sein Inhalt und seine literarische Form (1894); Sünde und Gnade nach den Vorstellungen des älteren Judentums (1905); Das assyrische Weltreich im Urteil der Propheten (1908); Die Ebed-Jahwe-Lieder in Jes. 40ff. (1913); Das Problem des Deuteronomiums: Ein Beitrag zur neuesten pentateuch Kritik (1923); "Zur alttestamentlichen Literarkritik," ZAW 42 (1924) 37-74; RGS 5 (1929) 159-206 (autobiography with bibliography); Versehung und Vergeltung (1931); "Zum alttestamentlichen Erwählungsglauben," ZAW 55 (1937) 1-35; Die Erlösererwartung in den östlichen Religionen Untersuchungen (1938).

C. T. BEGG

STÄHELIN, JOHANN JAKOB (1797–1875)

Born in Basel in 1797, S. studied HB and oriental languages at Tübingen under J. C. F. Steudel (1779–1837). In 1823 he returned to Basel, where he was tutored privately for a year by E. HENGSTENBERG. In 1824, following W. DE WETTE's reorganization of the Basel theological faculty, S. became a Privatdozent responsible for oriental languages, although he also taught HB. He became ausserordentlicher professor in 1829 and gained a full chair in 1835. He died in Basel in 1875.

Although S. did not belong to the first rank of biblical scholars, his work contains observations that still deserve attention. His most important work was his Kritische Untersuchungen (1843), in which he attempted to trace the literary history of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and Joshua to 2 Kings. He argued that the final form of these books was the work of one author, the writer of the books of Kings, who had used ancient sources. The oldest was the Elohim source (similar to what was later called P), which could be traced through Genesis–Numbers and which was also found in the second half of Joshua. This source had been expanded by a Jehovist who wrote in the time of Saul, possibly Samuel or an associate. The Jehovist's work, also to be found in Genesis–Numbers, included most of Deuteronomy and continued into Joshua. Judges 1–16 and the first half of 1 Samuel were written slightly later by a different author. The remainder of 1 Samuel and most of 2 Samuel came from the reign of Hezekiah, and 1–2 Kings was written during the exile. These datings enabled S. to maintain the antiquity of the Mosaic religion and its sacrificial system.

His two other main works were on the messianic prophecies of the HB (1847), a book that owed much to J. von HOFMANN's great work on PROPHECY and fulfillment, and an HB introduction (1862), which represented a conservative critical viewpoint, although S. argued for an exilic date for Isaiah 40–66 and placed Daniel in the Maccabean period. S.'s professed aim was to undertake biblical criticism in an objective, historical, and philological manner. His position owed something to orthodox writers like Hengstenberg as well as to critics like de Wette.

Works: Kritische Untersuchungen über den Pentateuch, die Bücher Josua, Richter, Samuels, und der Könige (1843); De messianischen Weissagungen des Alten Testaments in ihrer Entstehung, Entwicklung, und Ausbildung (1847); Specielle Einleitung in die kanonischen Bücher des Alten Testaments (1862).

Bibliography: E. Stähelin, Dewettiana: Forschungen und Text zu W. M. L. de Wettes Leben und Werk (1952) 196-98.

J. W. ROGERSON

STANLEY, ARTHUR PENRHYN (1815–81)

The son of a bishop of Norwich, England, S. was born Dec. 13, 1815. At Rugby (1829) he came under the spell of T. ARNOLD and eventually became his biographer. S. went to Balliol College, Oxford, in 1834, where he read classics. He was ordained in 1839, became a canon of Canterbury Cathedral in 1851, professor of ecclesiastical history at Oxford in 1856, and dean of Westminster in 1864. He died July 18, 1881.

An enthusiastic traveler and a great communicator, S. contributed to biblical scholarship through his lively powers of description and illustration and through his preaching, which employed knowledge of the geographical, cultural, and archaeological backgrounds (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) of the Bible. He was not a profound or orignal thinker, and church contemporaries regarded him as unreliable on matters of doctrine. (He opposed efforts [1861–66] to remove and excommunicate Bishop J. Colenso of Natal even though he did not subscribe to Colenso's views.) Nevertheless, through the positions he held and his persuasive preaching and writing, his advocacy of critical study of the Bible became an important factor in winning its popular acceptance among the clergy.

S. undertook two major tours of Palestine. From the first emerged a substantial volume (1856) containing many homilies based on reconstructions of biblical events, together with observations and reflections on geographical features of the biblical lands (especially, "The Connection of Sacred History and Sacred Geography," xi-xxviii), thus bringing popular appreciation for the research of C. Ritter and E. ROBINSON.

Having learned from Arnold a respect for the newer critical approaches to ancient history current in Germany, S. endeavored to apply similar methods to biblical history and to interpret Israel's religious experience as a truly historical one. His commendation of H. EWALD'S The History of Israel did much to ensure its acceptance among English readers and was important for the development of critical biblical studies in Great Britain. S. published a three-volume study of biblical history, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, that was strongly influenced by Ewald. Although lacking effective source evaluation, these lectures illustrate S.'s power to recreate a sense of the actuality of biblical history and to arouse serious interest in ancient Israel. They prepared a wide readership for the more rigorous assessments made later by J. WELLHAUSEN, R. KITTEL, and W. R. SMITH. Overall, S.'s work exemplifies the critical approach to biblical research by the more liberal stream of ecclesiastical leadership in England and stands as an important bridge between older and newer insights.

Works: Life and Correspondence of T. Arnold (2 vols., 1844); The Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians; with Critical Notes and Dissertations (2 vols., 1855, 1882); Sinai and Palestine: In Connection with Their History (1856, rev. ed. 1887); The Bible: Its Form and Its Substance (1862); Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, pt. 1, Abraham to Samuel (1863); pt. 2, From Samuel to the Captivity (1865); pt. 3, From the Captivity to the Christian Era (1876).

Bibliography: G. G. Bradley, Recollections of A. P. S. (1883); EncBrit 22 (1889) 451-53. R. E. Prothero and G. G. Bradley, The Life and Correspondence of A. P. S. (2 vols, 1893). R. E. Prothero, DNB 54 (1898) 44-48.

R. E. CLEMENTS

STANTON, ELIZABETH CADY (1815–1902)

Born Elizabeth Cady Nov. 12, 1815, in Johnstown, New York, S. was raised in a strict Presbyterian household. Her father, a judge, allowed her access to his library of law books and encouraged her early studies but would not allow her to attend college. However, she learned Greek from her pastor, S. Hosack, and attended Emma Willard's Female Seminary (i.e., finishing school) in Troy, New York, where she heard the preaching of C. Finney and was swept up in the fervor of the Great Troy Revival of 1831 that Finney so masterfully stoked. S. experienced a personal conversion; or, as she wrote, "became one of the first victims" (E. Griffith [1984] 19), but her newfound faith did not last long. She wrote in her memoirs that fear of judgment seized her soul, visions of the lost haunted her dreams, and mental anguish prostrated her health (Eighty Years, 43). She was so distressed that she left school and returned to her family; later, a period of travel seemed to counteract the more emotional effects of Finney's preaching.

In 1840 S. married H. Stanton, who was ten years her senior and already very much involved in anti-slavery and other reform movements. For their honeymoon they traveled to London for the British and Foreign Anti-slavery Convention, where S. met L. Mott with whom she organized the Seneca Falls Women's Rights Convention in 1848. In addition to giving birth to and rearing seven children, S. remained active in a number of social and political reform movements, not the least of which was women's suffrage. She worked closely with S. B. Anthony and served as first president of the National Women's Suffrage Association. She died Oct. 26, 1902, in New York.

S. is best known in the field of biblical studies as the driving force behind THE WOMAN'S BIBLE, published in two volumes in 1895 and 1898 "that we might have women's commentaries on women's position in the OT and NT" (1:9). The plan was to include only those texts and chapters that refer directly to women and those in which women are made prominent by exclusion, which S. estimated as one-tenth of the Scriptures (1:5). Although she felt strongly that women's political and social degradation were an outgrowth of women's status in the Bible, she recognized also that the hegemony of male interpretation played no small part in the use of the Bible against women's emancipation. She also recognized that many women found the Bible—when rightly interpreted—to be both a source of spiritual strength and an affirmation of the equality of the sexes.

S. recruited a revising committee of thirty members to participate in the project. They represented various religious and political orientations, but all were committed to women's suffrage. S. had hoped to persuade the few women biblical scholars of the time to participate but failed because, in her words, "they are afraid that their high reputation and scholarly attainments might be compromised" by the controversial project (WB, 1:9). In fact, S. wrote the bulk of the commentary herself—147 out of 198 essays bear her initials.

Even a century after its publication the WB is fascinating. S. was fairly well versed in the tenets of the higher criticism of the late nineteenth century; besides frequent reference to the work of A. CLARKE and J. COLENSO, she mentioned the German scholars K. GRAF and J. MEINHOLD. Other contributors brought in the work of J. ASTRUC, such traditional Jewish sources as the TALMUD and the KABBALAH (an entire chapter is devoted to it), as well as scholarship on Norse mythology and archaeological discoveries in the Yucatan (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES).

What gives the WB its particular character, however, is the sharp wit S. employed in the service of women's interests. Noting the lack of interest 1–2 Chronicles and Ezra–Nehemiah show in women, she wrote, "During that long, eventful period the men must have sprung, Minerva-like, from the brains of their fathers, fully armed and equipped for the battle of life" (2:83). She noted that 1 Kings uses women only as plot devices to better exhibit the accomplishments of Elijah: "He raises the dead, surpasses our Standard Oil Company in the production of that valuable article of commerce, cures one man of leprosy and cruelly fastens the disease on his servant for being guilty of a pardonable prevarication" (2:77). She did not reserve her criticisms for the HB alone, as many women of that period did; she wrote that woman's "inferior position is more clearly and emphatically set forth by the Apostles than by the Prophets and the Patriarchs" (2:113). On PAUL's preoccupation with how women wear their hair, she wrote, "It appears very trifling for men, commissioned to do so great a work on earth, to give so much thought to the toilets of women" (2:162).

The WB predictably aroused the ire of the Christian clergy, but it received positive reviews from those outside the church and rapidly went through a number of printings both in the United States and abroad. No doubt most painful to S. was the repudiation of the WB (by a vote of fifty-three to forty-one) by the National American Woman's Suffrage Association, not primarily because the members disagreed with its content, but, rather, because they felt it expedient to avoid unnecessary conflict until women had achieved the power to vote. The WB was largely ignored by biblical scholarship until E. Thomsen's 1991 dissertation demonstrated its influence on contemporary FEMINIST interpreters. The title of The Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. Newsom and S. Ringe, 1992) was chosen in conscious "tribute to Elizabeth Cady Stanton's pioneering work" (xv), and the centennial of the WB was celebrated at the 1995 annual meeting of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE.

Works: (with S. B. Anthony and M. J. Gage), History of Woman Suffrage (3 vols., 1887); (with the Revising Committee), The Woman's Bible (2 vols., 1895–98; repr., 1 vol., 1974, by Coalition Task Force on Women and Religion; also in 1974 as The Original Feminist Attack on the Bible by Arno Press; and with a foreward by M. Fitzgerald [iv-xxiv] in 1993); Eighty Years and More: Reminiscences, 1815–97 (1898, repr. 1971); E. C. S. as Revealed in Her Letters, Diary, and Reminiscences (ed. T. Stanton and H. S. Blatch, 1922).

Bibliography: D. C. Bass, "Women's Studies and Biblical Studies: An Historical Perspective," JSOT 22 (1982) 3-17. A. M. Bennett, "The Woman's Bible—A Nineteenth-Century Approach," Woman-Pain to Woman-Vision (1989) 71-77. E. C. DuBois, E. C. S., S. B. Anthony: Correspondence, Writings, Speeches (1981). M. Fortune and J. Haugerud, A Study Guide to The Woman's Bible (1975). E. Griffith, In Her Own Right: The Life of E. C. S. (1984). C. De Swarte Gifford, "American Women and the Bible: The Nature of Woman as a Hermeneutical Issue," Feminist Perspectives in Biblical Scholarship (ed. A. Y. Collins, 1985) 11-33. S. E. Hill, "The Woman's Bible: Reformulating Tradition," Radical Religion 3:2 (1977) 23-30. E. C. Huber, "They Weren't Prepared to Hear: A Closer Look at The Woman's Bible," Andover Newton Quarterly 16 (1976) 271-76. A. Lutz, Created Equal: A Biography of E. C. S., 1815–1902 (1940). R. Page, "E. C. S.'s The Woman's Bible," Feminist Theology: A Reader (ed. A. Loades, 1990) 16-20. M. D. Pellauer, Toward a Tradition of Feminist Theology: The Religious Social Thought of E. C. S., S. B. Anthony, and A. H. Shaw (1991). J. H. Smylie, "The Woman's Bible and the Spiritual Crisis," Soundings 59 (1976) 305-28. E. L. Thomsen, "The Woman's Bible: Heritage and Harbinger of Hope for Feminist Biblical Hermeneutics" (diss., Graduate Theological Union, 1991).

T. LINAFELT

STANTON, VINCENT HENRY (1846–1924)

Born in Hong Kong, the son of the colonial chaplain, S. was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, receiving an MA (1873), a BD (1890), and a DD (1891). After ordination in 1874 he served Trinity College and Cambridge University in various capacities and became Ely Professor of Divinity in 1889.

S.'s most significant contribution to biblical scholarship is a study of belief in JESUS as Messiah from the perspective of early Judaism (1886), a work characterized by thorough discussion of the primary sources and familiarity with German scholarship. S. also wrote to establish the admissibility of belief in the supernatural (1886, 15), arguing that historical inquiry generally draws links between cause and effect but that there are instances in which the historian must acknowledge the presence of the inexplicable (19): Anomaly may justify the assumption of the supernatural. Proceeding in a manner diametrically opposed to his Oxford contemporary W. SANDAY, S. argued that Jesus understood himself to be the bringer of God's kingdom, the divine "Viceregent," and as such described himself as the Danielic Son of man. Jesus' own messianic consciousness, confirmed by the resurrection, seemed to S. the best explanation of the faith of the first generation of Christians in Jesus as a supernatural Christ (266). By construing the interpretative task as that of explaining how belief in Jesus arose, not merely how individual stories and sayings emerged, S. used Jesus' self-consciousness and the resurrection together as the best and the supernatural explanation of Christian faith (271). The historian and the believer were at one in his exposition.

Works: The Jewish and the Christian Messiah: A Study in the Earliest History of Christianity (1886); The Place of Authority in Matters of Religious Belief (1891); The Gospels as Historical Documents (3 pts., 1903–20).

Bibliography: A. and C. Black, Who Was Who? 1916–28 (1929) 989.

B. CHILTON

STÄUDLIN, CARL FRIEDRICH (1761–1826)

Born in Stuttgart, July 25, 1761, S. studied at the Tübingen Stift from 1779 to 1784. In 1785 he published a joint work on biblical PROPHECY that anticipated later form-critical work (see FORM CRITICISM) in this area. In 1790 he was appointed professor of theology at Göttingen in preference to J. G. HERDER, and he remained at Göttingen until his death July 5, 1826. He was a prolific writer in the encyclopedic tradition of Göttingen; his history of ethics included the treatment of this subject in regard to the theater, suicide, prayer, conscience, and marriage. His best-known work was on the history of JESUS' moral teaching (1799–1822). He also wrote a textbook on dogmatics (1809) and a history of skepticism (1794) in addition to co-editing the Bibliothek der neuesten theologischen Litteratur (1794–81).

S. was a great admirer of I. KANT, with whom he corresponded and whom Kant honored by dedicating to him his Der Streit der Fakultäten. In his history of skepticism S. praised Kant's philosophy as providing a defense against skepticism, materialism, fatalism, and atheism as well as against fanaticism and superstition. At the same time S. did not equate Christianity with Kantianism. He believed that Christ and the Bible gave to faith a certainty that was higher than could be provided by reason and that reason had no right to reject revelation. On the other hand, the results of Kant's critical philosophy were in accordance with S.'s interpretation of the teaching of Jesus. In HB studies S. wrote a history of Hebrew ethics prior to the time of Christ (1794) as well as his work on HB prophecy.

Works: Beiträge zur Erläuterung der biblischen Prophetie und zur Geschichte ihrer Auslegung (1785); Theologie moralis Ebraeorum ante Christum historia (1794); Geschichte und Geist des Skepticismus, vorzüglich in Rücksicht auf Moral und Religion (2 vols., 1794); Geschichte der Sittenlehre Jesu (4 vols., 1799–1822); Lehrbuch der Dogmatik und Dogmengeschichte (1809); Geschichte des Rationalismus und Supernaturalismus (1826); History of Theological Knowledge (1835).

Bibliography: ADB 35 (1893) 516-20. H. Doering, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands 4 (1835) 287-99 (with list of sixty-five of S.'s works). J. T. Hemsen, Zur Erinnerung an D. C. F. S. (1826), contains S.'s autobiography. E. Hirsch, Geschichte der neuern evangelischen Theologie 5 (1964³) 59-60. J. M. Schmidt, "K. F. S.: Ein Wegbereiter der formgeschichtlichen Erforschung des Alten Testaments," EvTh 27 (1967) 200-218. J. Ringleben, "Göttingen und Königsberg," Theologie in Göttingen 1 (ed. B. Moeller, 1987) 104-7.

J. W. ROGERSON

STENDAHL, KRISTER (1921–)

Born in 1921 in Stockholm, Sweden, S. did his doctoral work in Uppsala under the direction of A. FRIDRICHSEN and H. Riesenfeld (completed in 1954). Ordained a priest of the (Lutheran) Church of Sweden in 1944, he later served as bishop of Stockholm (1984–88). He has been married to literary scholar B. Johnsson Stendahl since 1946. At Harvard Divinity School he served as professor, dean, and later chaplain (1954–84; 1989–91). He has also taught at the University of Uppsala (1951–54) and at Brandeis University (1991–93). In addition, he has been a leader in the World Council of Churches, in other international organizations, and in inter-religious dialogue.

The Uppsala School shaped S.'s thought. Whereas liberal theology (e.g., A. von Harnack) found in the Bible ethical monotheism and JESUS as a teacher of the Golden Rule, the Uppsala School focused on ancient Near Eastern myths and rituals (see MYTH AND RITUAL SCHOOL) to explain the biblical text, stressing their strangeness and primitiveness. Fridrichsen developed "realistic interpretation," i.e., descriptive, empathetic history of religions that stressed the gap between antiquity and the present as a response to liberal theology's tendency to cull eternal truths from the biblical text. Unlike, e.g., R. REITZENSTEIN in Germany, who drew mainly on non-Jewish Hellenistic sources to interpret the NT, the Uppsala School looked to Judaism and to the HB.

In his published doctoral dissertation, The School of St. Matthew, S. argued that Matthew's use of the HB parallels the pesher method of exegesis evident in the Qumran commentary (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) on Habakkuk (1QpHab), which he had studied with A. Dupont-Sommer during a research visit to Paris in 1951. S. posited that a Greek-speaking Christian exegetical school had access to both the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) and to a Hebrew text of the HB and that the fourteen quotations preceded by a fulfillment formula (Matt 2:17-18) derive from a Hebrew text; his theory has remained foundational for all further Matthean research. In S.'s view Matthew bears testimony to an exegetical school tradition shared by Christians and Jews, but one in which Jesus did not participate. S.'s study makes clear that the HB was a living document at the time of Qumran and of Matthew, open to multiple interpretations.

In 1951 nearly all of the Swedish universities' NT faculty members signed a statement opposing the ordination of women as "incompatible with NT thought." The statement—not signed by S.—caused him to rethink realistic interpretation. In a 1958 essay he argued in favor of women's ordination that realistic interpretation helps to identify the gap between biblical and contemporary culture but that describing NT views on women does not answer how churches should behave today. Historical description does not automatically yield eternal truths because the Bible is a living document. After describing the text and its world empathetically, scholars then need to evaluate the biblical text. S. interpreted the NT texts that call for female subordination (e.g., 1 Cor 14:34-35; 1 Tim 2:11-15; 1 Pet 3:7) as symptomatic for their culture but stressed countervailing glimpses and insights found in 1 Cor 11:11-12 and Gal 3:28 that point beyond the practices of the earliest churches. S.'s work has helped to convince many churches to ordain women and continues to have an impact today.

In a highly influential 1962 IDB article, "Contemporary Biblical Theology," S. further outlined the two stages of interpretation required for church use: description and TRANSLATION. He opposed all attempts to interpret the Bible in such a way that it "square[s] well with the ideals of the modern age." He argued that both believers and agnostics are competent to describe the sometimes strange biblical world accurately, a view unusual in its time that helped to pave the way for collaboration among Jewish, Christian, and non-religious NT scholars. S. called for a distinction between "what it meant" and "what it means." The preacher must be a "bilingual translator," neither anachronistically projecting our ethical ideals onto the Bible nor passing off arcane Hebraisms as homily. Because S. sees the Holy Spirit as guiding the church in this task, he can leave space for the church to take a different path today than did the NT, as in the case of women's leadership or the treatment of Jews.

Standahl's thinking on PAUL and on the Jews was inspired by his experiences as a young cleric hearing confessions in Uppsala, in which individual guilt, especially about common sexual infractions, figured prominently. In contrast to this individualistic Lutheran piety, S. found Paul to be concerned with groups of people, with how to bring the Gentiles in and yet to keep them from behaving arrogantly toward Jews. Paul did not focus on individual sin and guilt but, rather, on the question of the Jewish law's ongoing validity for Jews and for Gentiles.

S. summarizes theology's "public health" task in this way: "The Christian Bible includes sayings that have caused much pain both to Jews and to women. Thus I have felt called to seek forms of interpretation which can counteract such undesirable side effects of the Holy Scriptures." Alternatively, S.'s concern with theology's "public health" task has led him to recognize the Christian Scriptures' detrimental effects on women and Jews, to promote equality between women and men, and to improve Jewish-Christian relations.

Works: The School of St. Matthew and Its Use of the OT (ASNU 20, 1954, 1968²); "Prayer and Forgivenes," SEÅ 22, 23 (1957/58) 75-86 = Meanings: The Bible as Document and as Guide (1984) 115-25; (ed.), The Scrolls and the NT (1957, 1992²), esp. chap. 1, "The Scrolls and the NT: An Introduction and Perspective," 1-17; "Quis et Unde: An Analysis of Matthew 1–2," Judentum-Christentum-Kirche (FS J. Jeremias, ed. W. Eltester, BZNW 26, 1960) 94-105 (repr. in The Interpretation of Matthew [ed. G. Standon, 1983] 56-66) = Meanings, 71-83; "Biblical Theology, Contemporary," IDB 1 (1962) 418-32 = Meanings, 11-44; "Hate, Non-Retaliation, and Love: 1QS x, 17-20 and Romans 12:19-21," HTR 55 (1962) 343-55 = Meanings, 137-49; "Matthew," PCB (ed. M. Black and H. H. Rowley, 1962) 769-98; The Bible and the Role of Women: A Case Study in Hermeneutics (FBBS 15, 1966); "Immortality Is Too Much and Too Little," The End of Life: A Discussion at the Nobel Conference Organized by Gustavus Adolphus College, St. Peter, Minnesota, 1972 (ed. J. D. Roslansky, 1973) = Meanings, 193-202; Paul Among Jews and Gentiles—and Other Essays (1976); Meanings: The Bible as Document and as Guide (1984); Energy for Life: Reflections on the Theme "Come, Holy Spirit—Renew the Whole Creation" (Risk Book Series 45, 1990); "From God's Perspective We Are All Minorities," Journal of Religious Pluralism 2 (1993) 1-13; Final Account: Paul's Letter to the Romans (1995).

Bibliography: J. Barr, "Biblical Theology," IDBSup (1962, 1976) 104-11. E. Käsemann, "Justification and Salvation History in the Epistle to the Romans," Perspectives on Paul (1969; ET 1971) 60-78. G. W. E. Nickelsburg and G. W. MacRae (eds.), Christians Among Jews and Gentiles: Essays in Honor of K. S. on His Sixty-fifth Birthday (1986) = HTR 79 (3 vols., 1986), with extensive bibliography through 1984.

B. BROOTEN

STEUERNAGEL, CARL (1869–1958)

Born Feb. 17, 1869, at Hardegsen, Germany, near Göttingen, S. studied at Halle (1887–91) and at the Wittenberg Preachers' Seminary. For almost twenty years (1895–1914) he taught at Halle, first as Privatdozent (1895), then as ausserordentlicher professor (1907). From 1914 to his retirement in 1935, he held the OT chair at Breslau. Fleeing the Russian advance in 1945, he went to Greifswald, where, at age seventy-six, he resumed teaching for several years. He died Mar. 4, 1958, in Greifswald.

S.'s publications evidence the range of his interests in HB studies. A focal point of his scholarship was the Hexateuch. In his work on Deuteronomy, initially in several monographs, then in a first and second edition of his HKAT commentary, he developed an elaborate (and evolving) account of the book's literary history, making systematic use of the recurring Numeruswechsel phenomenon. He authored a commentary on Joshua (1899), a concise general introduction to the Hexateuch (1900), both in the HKAT series, as well as review articles on new hexateuchal publications for TRu (1897–1908). A second area to which S. devoted much attention was the ARCHAEOLOGY and topography of the Holy Land. For a quarter of a century (1903–28) he edited ZDPV, the leading German journal in the field, publishing in it as well as in other periodicals reports concerning current excavations and discussions on site identifications. Closely connected with his archaeological interests were his writings on particular questions relating to the history of early Israel and its religion, e.g., the Sinai covenant, the entry into the land, the title "Yahweh, God of Israel" and Yahweh and "the gods of the fathers." In linguistics he produced a Hebrew grammar that went through eleven editions (1903–48). In addition, he contributed the volumes of Proverbs, Job, and Esther to the third (1910) and fourth (1922) editions of E. KAUTZSCH'S TRANSLATION of the HB. In 1935 he addressed the urgent question of German Protestantism and the HB in a brochure reprinted three times in the years 1936–39. An enduring monument to S.'s wide erudition is his massive 1912 introduction to the HB (including the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha).

Works: Der Rahmen des Deuteronomiums (1894); Die Entstehung des deuteronomischen Gesetzes (1895); Das Deuteronomium (1898, 1923²); Das Buch Josua (1899); "Der jehovistische Bericht über den Bundesschluss am Sinai," TSK 72 (1899) 319-50; Allgemeine Enleitung in den Hexateuch (1900); Die Einwanderung der israelitischen Stämme in Kanaan (1901); Hebräische Grammatik (1903, 1948¹¹); Lehrbuch der Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1912); "Jahwe Gott Israels," BZAW 27 (1914) 329-50; "Bemerkungen zu Gen 17," BZAW 34 (1920) 172-79; "Jahve und die Vätergötter," FS G. Beer (1935) 62-71; Der deutsche Evangelische Christ und das Alte Testament (1935).

Bibliography: "Bibliographie C. S.," TLZ 74 (1949) 113-15. M. Noth, ZDPV 74 (1958) 1-3. W. Schmauch, "In Memoriam C. S.," TLZ 83 (1958) 547-50.

C. T. BEGG

STILLINGFLEET, EDWARD (1635–99)

Born Apr. 17, 1635, at Cranbourne, Dorset, S. was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow in 1653. Famous as a controversialist and preacher, in 1678 he became dean of St. Paul's and in 1689 was made bishop of Worcester. He died Mar. 27, 1699.

S.'s earliest major work, Irenicum (1659), advocated episcopacy and monarchy but did not claim that these forms of government were divine necessities. Always an opponent of Roman Catholicism, in later life he also became very critical of Protestant dissenters. In Origines sacrae (1662) he argued that the Hebrew Scriptures are more historically accurate than are other ancient histories. He defended the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), which had been challenged by T. HOBBES and B. SPINOZA. A Latitudinarian, S. did not want a complex system of doctrine but desired a comprehensive national church. Christianity, he argued, was based on revelation, and that revelation was reasonable. He engaged in controversy with Roman Catholics and Deists (see DEISM) and toward the end of his life exchanged published correspondence with J. LOCKE, whom he accused of opening the door to the rejection of the doctrines of the Trinity and the resurrection.

Works: Origines sacrae, or a Rational Account of the Christian Faith as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures and the Matters Therein Contained (1662); A Discourse in Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity (1696); An Answer to Mr. Locke's Letter (1697); An Answer to Mr. Locke's Second Letter (1698); Works (6 vols., 1709–10).

Bibliography: BB 6 (1763) 3836-42. R. T. Carroll, The Common-sense Philosophy of Religion of Bishop E. S., 1635–99 (1975). W. Dahrendorf, Lockes Kontroverse mit Stillingfleet und ihre Bedeutung für seine Stellung zur anglikanischen Kirche (1932). W. H. Hutton, DNB 54 (1898) 375-78. G. Reedy, The Bible and Reason: Anglicans and Scripture in Late Seventeenth-century England (1985).

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH (1808–74)

Born Jan. 29, 1808, in Ludwigsburg, Germany, S. died there, Feb. 8, 1874. He studied at the University of Tübingen (1825–30), where his most important teacher was the eminent church historian F. C. BAUR. Through him S. became acquainted with F. W. J. von Schelling's (1775–1854) and F. SCHLEIERMACHER's writings. But soon G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), through his Phenomenology of the Spirit and Encyclopaedia, became the dominant figure in S.'s intellectual biography. After taking his doctorate he was granted one semester's leave in Berlin (1831–32) to hear Hegel's lectures. Hegel died, however, Nov. 14, so S. studied instead under Schleiermacher and P. Marheineke (1780–1846), a Hegelian professor of theology. S.'s friendship with the HB scholar W. VATKE became equally important. Upon returning to Tübingen S. became instructor of philosophy at the seminary and wrote his Life of Jesus (1835). This book brought its author immediate renown, but its radical conclusions precipitated his dismissal. In 1839 he was called to a theological professorship in Zürich, but when the clergy there organized a mass petition to the city council threatening revolt, S. had to retire before being inaugurated. He remained a private scholar, living on his Zürich pension and on the revenues from his books, including his Dogmatics (2 vols., 1840–41), The Life of Jesus for the German People (GS 3, 4, 1864), biographies of U. von Hutten (3 vols., GS 7, 1858–60)) and VOLTAIRE (GS 11), and The Old Faith and the New (GS 6, 1872; ET 1873).

S.'s principal exegetical book is The Life of Jesus, originally planned as a work preparatory to his Dogmatics. That connection is evident from the outline related in an 1832 letter (see J. Sandberger [1972] 192-97). It has three sections: a description of the tradition, its critical destruction, and its essential restitution on the speculative level. The actual book replaced the first section with a brief history of the "mythical" view and reduced the third to a short "Concluding Dissertation," reserving most of its pages (ET 95-756) for historical criticism. Yet its overriding concern was to have the philosophical truth emerge unscathed.

The exegetical method presents supernaturalism and rationalism as mutually destructive: The assertion of miracles as facts is refuted by the law of nature; their reduction to commonplace events violates the texts. Schleiermacher's synthesis of the two, combining the doctrine of a prototypical Christ with historical criticism, constituted the most sophisticated non-speculative position and seems to have been the decisive challenge for S. By empirically demonstrating the impossibility of God's manifestation in a historical individual, interpreted as his self-estrangement, S. hoped to clear the ground for a philosophically adequate and historically incontestable view of revelation (a method analogous to Vatke's interpretation of the HB in his Biblical Theology [1835]).

S.'s main conceptual tool for achieving his purpose was myth (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), i.e., a "quasi-historical clothing of early Christian ideas, formed in the unintentionally feigning saga" (1:75; explained more fully, ET 86-87), not a fraudulent invention, but the spiritual product of a primitive community's imagination. The eternal idea is represented by stories that glorify the community's heroes. Thus, JESUS, incorporating the HB idea of the Messiah, is exalted above Moses and the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). The eternal idea's true expression, however, is a concept in which it is mediated by itself with itself. (While this thinking points to Hegel, the term myth and its connotation as prescientific link S. to the eighteenth-century rationalistic mythological school.)

For S., the mythological view must be overcome, not aufgehoben in Hegel's sense (nearest equivalent: "subsumed"; see H. Harris [1973] 53, n. 13, implying an element of truth preserved), but discarded (see Schelling's Method of Academic Study [1803]). The reappearance of the eternal idea in the form of subjective faith ("Concluding Dissertation") therefore underlies the further criticism exacted by the history of doctrine (Glaubenslehre [1840–41] 1:71). Thus non-speculative positions are annihilated (a task inadequately performed by the Right-Hegelians, 2:729-32; ET 777-78): "This is indeed not the mode in which Idea realizes itself; it is not wont to lavish all its fulness on one exemplar, and be niggardly towards all others . . . : it rather loves to distribute its riches among a multiplicity of exemplars which reciprocally complete each other" (2:734; ET 779-80). No single individual, but humanity as a whole, is "God become man" (2:737; ET 780). While claiming for this philosophical proposition essential identity with the Christian faith, S. seems to surmise their incompatibility when he admits that preaching is now bogged down in a "Last Dilemma" (2:732-44; ET 779-81). His Glaubenslehre consequently abandons Christianity and also parts from Hegel, who had insisted that the Spirit's manifestation in an individual person, while lacking adequacy, was nonetheless a fact.

S.'s contribution to Gospel research lies in exhibiting the crucial role and kerygmatic character of oral tradition. He was the first scholar who thoroughly attempted to disprove the factuality of the miracle stories and consistently explained them "mythically." He left the SYNOPTIC sermons intact except for Jesus' predictions of his passion and resurrection, since the tools for their LITERARY analysis had not yet been developed. He did, however, support K. Bretschneider's (1776–1848) insight that the Gospel of John, because of its sermons, was even farther removed from historical reality than the Synoptics. He also came close to FORM CRITICISM's conception of small units as the origin of tradition. On the other hand, he failed to further the progress of source analysis, adopting J. J. GRIESBACH's hypothesis of Matthew's primacy and assuming with Schleiermacher several prior collections of material.

S. definitively proved the impossibility of writing Jesus' biography, dooming in advance the scores of such efforts subsequently made. On the other hand, his predominant interest in the collective process of tradition left him, after removing all glorifying gilt, with but a scant collection of facts about Jesus: his birth in Nazareth, his baptism as a disciple of John the Baptist, his preaching in Palestine, and his crucifixion. One is left with a preacher of morals not unlike the rationalist Jesus, hardly one to inspire religious reverence. (S. recognized this problem after attacks from all quarters and in the third edition of his Life of Jesus stressed the uniqueness of Jesus' personality—only to restore the original text in the fourth.) Nevertheless, the problem he formulated has yet to be satisfactorily resolved.

Works: Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet (2 vols., 1835–36, 1837², 1838–39³, 1840⁴ [quotations without title from the 1st ed.]; ET The Life of Jesus Critically Examined, of 4th ed. by G. Eliot; of 5th ed. [1906]; ed. with intro., P. C. Hodgson, LJS, 1972); Die christliche Glaubenslehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampfe mit der modernen Wissenschaft dargestellt (2 vols., 1840–41); The Christ of Faith and the Jesus of History (1864; ET with intro., L. E. Keck, LJS, 1977); Gesammelte Schriften (12 vols., ed. E. Zeller, 1876–77); Ausgewählte Briefe (ed. E. Zeller, 1895).

Bibliography: H. Frei, Nineteenth Century Religious Thought in the West (ed. N. Smart et al., 1985) 1:215-60. F. W. Graf, Kritik und Pseudo-Spekulation: D. F. S. als Dogmatiker im Kontext der positionellen Theologie seiner Zeit (MMHST 7, 1982). H. Harris, D. F. S. and His Theology (1973). A. Hausrath, D. F. S.: Sein Leben und seine Schriften unter Heranziehung seiner Briefe dargestellt (2 vols., 1876–78). D. Lange, Historischer Jesus oder mythischer Christus: Untersuchungen zu dem Gegensatz zwischen F. Schleiermacher und D. F. S. (1975). M. C. Massey, Christ Unmasked: The Meaning of the "Life of Jesus" in German Politics (1983). R. Morgan, HHMBI, 364-68. J. F. Sandberger, D. F. S. als theologischer Hegelianer (SThGG 5, 1972); TPNZJ (1978) 84-98. A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (ET 1910, repr. 1968). T. Ziegler, D. F. Strauss (2 vols., 1908).

D. LANGE

STREETER, BURNETT HILLMAN (1874–1937)

S. was born Nov. 17, 1874, in Croydon, England, and was killed in an airplane crash in Switzerland, Sept. 10, 1937. He was educated at King's College and at Queen's College, Oxford, where he served as a fellow (1905–33) and as provost (1933–37).

At Oxford S. joined W. SANDAY's seminar on the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM. His contributions to the volume edited by Sanday as the final communication of the seminar focus on the hypothetical document Q. S. concluded that (1) the order of the document is better preserved in Luke than in Matthew; (2) Matthew had carved the document up to serve the literary structure of five discourses of Jesus (1911, 151, 157-58); and (3) Mark also knew Q as a written source (165-66, 176-77; Sanday reluctantly came around to that point of view, xvi). Because S. considered Q a written source, probably by an original eyewitness (185; cf. 216), its delineation appeared important to him. Assuming that Q would have been treated by the evangelists much as Matthew and Luke treated Mark (185), he argued that matter peculiar to later Gospels might originally have been part of Q (184). He offered Luke 9:51–15:10 and 17:1–18:8 as highly speculative candidates for inclusion in Q (206).

In "The Literary Evolution of the Gospels" (1911, 210-31) he argued that initially witnesses wrote down only what might be forgotten. Q is intelligble as a document written to supplement the living tradition of a generation that had known Christ (215). Mark, on the other hand, wrote to supplement Q, which is why his Gospel so often mentions Jesus' teaching without citing it (219). Matthew and Luke were written with an aim for completeness (200) but with distinctive purposes: Matthew is a discursive account of Jesus' teaching (222); and Luke, an inspirational biography (222-23).

S.'s greatest work, The Four Gospels (1924), represents his concern with historical development. He built on the work of B. F. WESTCOTT and F. HORT to develop a theory of "local texts": The ancient manuscripts of the NT were witnesses to the geographical variety among early Christians. His account of how variants arose and were later homogenized remains illuminating; and his designations of major groups of variants as Alexandrian, Western, Caesarean, and Byzantine continue to be used. Analysis by locality led to his sketch "The Fundamental Solution" of the synoptic interrelationship (1924, 149-98): Mark was located at Rome (c. 60 CE); Q, at Antioch (c. 50 CE); Matthew, at Antioch (c. 85 CE); and Luke, at Corinth (c. 80 CE). In this work S. also proposed a four document hypothesis, including a Proto-Luke, as a solution to the synoptic problem (223-79).

In certain crucial respects, this work refines the picture S. offered in 1911, viewing Mark as "taken down from rapid dictation by word of mouth" (163) and as stylistically more primitive than Matthew and Luke (164). The distribution of Markan matter in the later Gospels seemed to him "only explicable on the theory that each author had before him the Marcan material already embodied in one single document" (165). However, he was far more ambivalent about Q than in 1911. He was no longer certain Q was a written document (184; cf. 237), changed his position on Q's relationship to Luke (199-222) and Matthew (251-52), and insisted that efforts to specify the precise contents of Q—including his own—were fruitless (185; cf. 239-42). Increasingly, S. thought in terms of cycles of tradition rather than in terms of documentary dependency.

S. has been faulted chiefly for his acceptance of Markan priority (W. Farmer [1976] 118-77); but when his analysis is taken within its own terms of reference, his understanding of what constitutes a document appears to be the primary difficulty. Of attempts to discern sources in John, he remarked, "As well hope to start with a string of sausages and reconstruct the pig" (377). Increasingly, he appeared impatient with precise construals of sources and more concerned with the religious sense of documents. Notably, he insisted that religion requires a metaphysical basis. For him, the sources of the Synoptics were not merely of literary or historical interest; they were the most primitive articulations of what was eternally and absolutely true.

Works: "On the Original Order of Q," "St. Mark's Knowledge and Use of Q," "The Original Extent of Q," "The Literary Evolution of the Gospels," "On the Trial of Our Lord before Herod: A Suggestion," Studies in the Synoptic Problem (ed. W. Sanday, 1911), cf. "Appendix: Synoptic Criticism and the Eschatological Problem," 423-36; (with A. J. Appasamy), The Sadhu: A Study in Mysticism and Practical Religion (1921); The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins, Treating of the Manuscript Tradition, Sources, Authorship, and Date (1924); Reality: A New Correlation of Science and Religion (1926); The Primitive Church, Studied with Special Reference to the Origins of the Christian Ministry (1929).

Bibliography: W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (1976). L. W. Grensted, DNB Sup. 5 (1949) 836-38. W. Sanday, "Introductory," Studies in the Synoptic Problem (1911) vii-xxvii. A. Thornhill, One Fight More (1943).

B. CHILTON

STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION

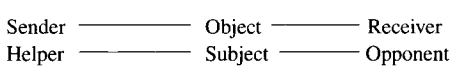
The term structuralism, which came into vogue in the 1950s and 1960s, refers properly to a set of techniques for the analysis of literary texts and other human productions, together with the specific theory on which the techniques are based. Construed more broadly, it has become a focusing term (almost a code word) for a wide-ranging theoretical rejection of historicism. A human production is to be analyzed primarily in terms of the rules of its internal organization, not primarily in terms of the process that produced it. As the theoretical debate has developed and as the early structuralist claims have become more muted, other focusing terms have appeared, including deconstruction. The latter sometimes indicates a technique for LITERARY analysis but more often denotes a way of looking at current critical theory, particularly at the debate over structuralism. While it does not reverse structuralism's rejection of historicism, deconstruction suggests the reopening of the question of history in a new framework.

Within biblical studies structuralism has developed in the context of a revolt that began to gain power in the 1960s and continues with increasing vigor against the predominance of historical criticism in biblical studies. Despite the vast accomplishments of historical criticism, it has been widely felt that there are significant dimensions of biblical meaning that historical criticism is unable to illuminate, in particular, literary dimensions. In response, a wide range of literary approaches has been proposed and tried out, many of them simply refinements of age-old sensitivity to the Bible as literature. But some biblical scholars have found in the extra-biblical debate over structuralism and deconstruction a much more radical approach to the literary analysis of texts and to the whole question of meaning in texts, pointing eventually to a rethinking of the whole enterprise of biblical studies.

1. Extra-biblical Developments. a. Stages of development. There are three main stages in the development of structuralism that have become significant for biblical studies.

i. Linguistics: F. de Saussure. The first is the linguistics of F. de Saussure. When we hear an English sentence, such as "Yesterday I got into my car and drove to work," we automatically process it as a piece of information about the speaker. What remains almost always unconscious is our processing it as a piece of language, yet this is the precondition of its having any meaning for us. In constructing the sentence, the speaker has used numerous linguistic rules that we also use to decode it; some are very general (e.g. the order of elements in a syntactically well-formed English sentence); others, detailed and subtle (e.g. the verb get must be treated in this case as part of an irreducible combination "get into," hence "enter," rather than "acquire").

Saussure contrasted parole, any actual linguistic event (e.g., a spoken sentence), with langue, the underlying system of relationships among the elements of a language (the French words are usually retained in English discussion). The system is more basic than the event, but it is an abstraction to which we have access only through the study of utterances the linguistic community deems acceptable. Knowledge of the system is by no means necessary in order to use the language. Langue is an abstraction in another sense too. It implies that we can stop language at a moment in time and examine its structure, whereas, in fact, language is in constant flux. This suggests the distinction, of the utmost importance to all of structuralism, between synchronic and diachronic method. Saussure stresses synchronic linguistics, the study of the language at one point in time, at the expense of diachronic, the study of its development over time. One other tenet of his system is of key importance—namely, that the elements of a language do not have intrinsic meaning but, rather, have meaning only as a result of their place in the system, of their relations with other elements. (A classic example is the non-correspondence of color terms in different languages. What the majority of French-speakers call bleu will not exactly correspond to what the majority of English-speakers call blue. The meaning of blue is "what the majority of English-speakers do not regard as better described by some other color term"!)



ii. Generalization of linguistics to other systems: C. Lévi-Strauss. The second stage involves a generalization of these insights to human systems other than natural languages. (A glance at an anthology like that of J. Ehrmann [1970] or M. Lane [1970] will show in how wide a variety of disciplines structural methods have been tried.) The most important figure, indeed the founder of structuralism as a self-conscious method, is Lévi-Strauss. In his anthropological work he has analyzed subsystems (or "codes") of primitive societies as having a quasi-linguistic structure. Examples are dietary or kinship rules (thus permissible versus impermissible marriages in a kinship system are analogous to syntactical versus asyntactical sequences of words). In each case members of the society have so internalized the system that they can differentiate between acceptable and unacceptable combinations without being consciously aware of the underlying logic. All these codes are ways in which a society organizes reality, and Lévi-Strauss believes in an innate human necessity to organize the world in this way. The message encoded by each subsystem in a given society is ultimately the same (see esp. Lévi-Strauss [1967]).

Lévi-Strauss's most extensive and important work has been on myth (for a programmatic statement, see Lévi-Strauss [1963]), culminating in a four-volume magnum opus on Amerindian mythology (1970, 1973, 1978, 1981). A primitive society deals with the irresoluble contradictions it experiences in the world through myth (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), which creates the illusion of resolution so that the world can be experienced otherwise than as merely incomprehensible. Lévi-Strauss reads a myth as a set of logical operations that bring the terms of experience into relation with one another. The various myths of a culture (and, eventually, all myths) are "transformations" of each other, any change in a single term being correlative with changes in other terms of the system. All these operations, however complex, can be reduced analytically to binary oppositions (life versus death, animal versus vegetable food, etc.), which the myth posits and mediates. For example, the total contradiction between life and death can be displaced into an opposition between this world and a world beyond this one; and various beings can then be introduced who (although they cannot be both alive and dead) can move between one world and the other.

iii. Structural analysis of narrative: A. Greimas. The third stage is the structural analysis of narrative, especially the work of Greimas (1983, 1987, 1988). Narrative is language, and one way of thinking of such analysis is as an extension of Saussurean linguistics beyond the scope of sentences to whole narrative sequences. Greimas has tried to define the most elementary units of narrative and to frame laws governing their acceptable combination. An important precursor in this enterprise was V. Propp (1968), who analyzed about one hundred Russian folktales into their sequential plot elements, or "functions" (e.g., "the hero is pursued," "the villain is exposed"). He defined thirty-one such functions and found that, although a given tale never included all of them, those it did contain proved always to be in the same order. This strongly suggests that the community producing these tales screened them for "syntactical" structure by a process analogous to the construction of sentences in a natural language.

Greimas builds consciously on Propp but finds Propp's functions too diffuse and repetitive. Many of them are simply logical transformations of one another (e.g., the finding and equipping of the hero has the same logical structure as the hero's combat with the villain) and can be reduced to relatively few binary oppositions and their mediation. Thus Greimas looks for schemata of maximum abstraction and generality as the linguistic rules for all human narrative. The best known of these is his "actantial model" for anything done (or intended) in narrative: A sender transfers an object to a receiver by the agency of a subject whom other agents may help or oppose:

This scheme can be used to map a whole story, but it can also map units of story action down to the most elementary so that the story can be analyzed as an interlocking set of actantial models.

b. Issues. Because of its large claims, structuralism has from its inception brought to the fore a mass of theoretical questions. Many contemporary commentators consider that, having failed to answer such questions, it is already passé. Certainly the early structuralist proposals cannot survive unchanged, but a truer assessment would be that structuralism has been extraordinarily fecund in initiating theoretical debate (literary and other). It retains its vibrancy in this sense even if fewer researchers now call themselves structuralists. But it is senseless any longer to discuss structuralism in isolation from the larger theoretical field. (For an excellent discussion, see P. Caws [1988].) Four issues, which cannot be cleanly separated from one another, may be highlighted.

i. The relation of structural and historical methods. The most persistent problem has been the relation of structural to historical methods of research. Are the "deep structures" of human productions changeless over time? To the extent that they apparently are not, to what historical variables are they correlative? How can structural and historical methods combine to give a theoretical account of stability and change? What, in this connection, are the historical conditions for the rise of structuralism itself?

ii. The relation of structural methods to literature. To what kinds of literature are structural methods appropriate? Lévi-Strauss confines himself to "primitive" texts (myths) and doubts that his methods are at all applicable to texts generated out of a historical consciousness. Propp worked with folktales, and it was largely with these that Greimas and other narrative structuralists preferred to work at the outset. But what of modern literature? Insofar as early structuralism took it up at all, it was in its most highly stereotyped genres, the detective novel or even the strip cartoon. Is there something about modern literature that resists the application of structural methods? R. Barthes devoted a whole book, the influential S/Z (1974), to the analysis of a short story by Balzac (cf. Greimas [1988] on Maupassant). But the most characteristic modern form, the novel, has not been much taken up by structuralists (see, however, G. Genette [1980] on Proust).

iii. The relation of structural analysis to textual laws. A directly related question is how structural analysis of the individual text is related to positing general laws that govern texts. Barthes (already in S/Z) moved beyond structuralism into what he called textualism to stress the uniqueness of the single text. However, when Greimas devotes a study to a single text it is with an eye to the potential for generalizing the results. But his effort to formulate elementary laws governing all narrative does not imply that all narrative texts are essentially the same. Rather, it is necessary to think of a hierarchy of structures: The analysis of a text may demonstrate universal structures but also ones specific to the text's culture, its literary genre, etc., as well as ones specific to itself. The text partakes of various "universes of meaning" out of which its own particular universe is created.

iv. Structuralism in relation to the reader. Structuralism has tried to pattern itself on the model of an objective natural science. Its theoretical claim that any reader using its techniques would discover the same structure is not the case in practice. One reason is that the text is only a part of the whole process of communication (or "enunciation") in which, in particular, the reader has a role to play (see READER-RESPONSE CRITICISM). Theory is being developed regarding the reader as an interactive participant in the creation of the structures of meaning that literary analysis discovers (J. Tompkins [1980]). Another theoretical development that has forced structuralism out of its objective mode is a growing insistence (in part under the influence of the American philosopher C. Peirce) that it is one part of a pervasive and fluid human need to create systems of signs. Proponents of this development prefer the term SEMIOTICS to structuralism (see U. Eco [1976]).

c. Deconstruction: J. Derrida. The theoretical issues surrounding structuralism must now be pursued in relation to deconstruction (for valuable surveys, see J. Culler [1982]; R. Harland [1987]; V. Leitch [1983]). Derrida, with whom this term is most associated, developed his ideas in a French context dominated by structuralism and directed much of his early critique to the structuralist pioneers Saussure and Lévi-Strauss (1976, 27-73, 101-40). As a philosopher, Derrida takes up nothing less than the whole metaphysical tradition in Western philosophy, which he sees (1978) as the attempt to posit a fixed center (God, human, consciousness, reason, etc.; the comprehensive term for all such systems is logocentric) from which the rest of reality can be reliably organized. But the history of modern thought is simply the story of the forced abandonment of each proposed center (the earth as center in the Copernican revolution; consciousness as center in the Freudian, etc.). Deconstruction attempts a radical decentering by unearthing and subverting the unquestioned assumptions on which the metaphysical tradition is based.

The relationship of this kind of deconstruction to structuralism is a double one. On the one hand, it is by structural analysis that deconstruction most characteristically proceeds. The metaphysical tradition works by positing binary oppositions (some common ones are rational/irrational, clear/obscure, original/imitation, central/peripheral, simple/complex, serious/frivolous) and by systematically affirming the superiority of the first over the second term. The work of deconstruction can be thought of as the careful demonstration of the arbitrariness of these procedures, of the inner contradiction they cannot avoid (e.g., anything affirmed as original can always be shown to be imitative). On the other hand, Derrida sees structuralism as belonging to, even as a culmination of, this same Western metaphysical tradition, creating binary oppositions of its own and affirming the superiority of one term over the other (langue over parole, synchronic over diachronic). Structuralism becomes yet another logocentric attempt to control reality through a system.

The positive interest shown in the structuralism-deconstruction debate by feminists (see FEMINIST INTERPRETATION) and Marxists is extremely significant. Previously, structuralism was seen as outmoded, at least in the North American context. Deconstruction was taking on the very narrow connotation of a method of literary criticism that stresses the limitless plurality, or "undecidability," of meaning in the literary text. From the perspective of political engagement, this approach seemed irrelevant or retrograde. But the implications of the development of structuralism and deconstruction in France, in a highly charged political context, have now been taken more seriously in the United States. It is increasingly understood that the metaphysical tradition's striving for structure and hierarchy has always gone along with accumulating and hierarchizing political power, thus Derrida's deconstruction of metaphysics is also the deconstruction of the structures of real power.

There are many examples of the politicization of the current debate, including the structural Marxism of L. Althusser (ET 1969), with its extension into literary criticism by P. Macherey (1978), or the analysis by M. Foucault (ET 1978) of how power operates in scientific discourse. But the most obvious example is provided by feminism, where there a clear link between the male/female opposition in Western metaphysics (with its endless correlates: rational/irrational, domination/submission, etc.) and the political oppression of women. This philosophical and linguistic creation of the categories of male and female has been much analyzed in French feminism (T. Moi [1985]), and recently a flood of feminist literary criticism in North America has taken up related issues (e.g., G. Greene and C. Kahn [1985]; for more generally on feminism and post-structuralism, see C. Weedon [1987]).

Among the most interesting examples of the new trend is the work of F. Jameson (1981), who attempts a Marxist analysis of texts from FOLKLORE to the modern novel, informed by the entire structuralism-deconstruction debate, notably by Greimas (see his foreword to Greimas [1987]). He insists on the question of the relation of text to history, although not in the sense of facile correspondence between the text and some history independent of the text. Rather, the "world of meaning" in the text (what Jameson calls its "political unconscious") is correlated with the ideology under which it was produced. Specifically, study of the text's inner contradictions can help discern the contradictions inherent in the ideology. But if all texts need, in this sense, to be historicized, so also all history needs to be "textualized," deconstructed, read in terms of the arbitrary relationship of its language to meaning. Jameson both draws structuralism into the service of IDEOLOGICAL analysis and performs an ideological analysis of structuralism itself. (On Marxism and deconstruction, see also M. Ryan [1982].)

2. Biblical Developments. The response within biblical studies has been diverse, with theoretical boundaries not always clearly drawn. Only recently have biblical scholars engaged the critical issues raised by deconstruction. Significant developments have usually been first announced in the periodical Semeia, founded as a direct result of structuralist interest in the Bible. The range of topics Semeia now takes up is a good index of the range of theoretical debate in which biblical structuralism is involved (see also The Bible and Culture Collective [1995] and D. Jobling [1995]).

a. Structural analysis. The first application of structural analysis to the Bible was an essay by the anthropologist E. Leach (1969) on Genesis 7–23. In it and elsewhere Leach follows closely Lévi-Strauss's procedures for myth analysis. Biblical specialists find this essay facile, but another of Leach's analyses, "The Legitimacy of Solomon" (25-83), based on Lévi-Strauss's work on kinship, is widely conceded to have opened up quite unexpected and important horizons. The main problem is that Leach treats the Bible as a concatenation of quasi-mythic fragments, paying no attention to its character as sequential narrative. (On the impact within biblical studies of Lévi-Strauss's work on kinship, see also M. Donaldson [1981] and T. Prewitt [1990]. While not a follower of Lévi-Strauss, M. Douglas [1966] also applies structural anthropology to the Bible, e.g., to the levitical prohibitions.)

b. Literary and textual issues. Most biblical structuralists have pursued specifically literary/textual issues. The main inspiration has been Greimas, although many scholars have continued to find Lévi-Strauss's techniques for myth analysis useful in dealing with the deep structural elements that narrative analysis posits. A considerable school of French scholars (notably J. Calloud [1976]) has since the 1960s pursued a Greimasian approach to biblical texts (for a more idiosyncratic use of Greimas, see Barthes [1988]), which has had a decisive impact on biblical structuralism in America through the ongoing work of D. Patte and his associates (1978, 1991).

The first organized work in North America, devoted to the synoptic PARABLES (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM), was issued in Semeia 1 and 2. It was the result of a convergence of interest between Patte, in his attempt to establish structuralism within American biblical studies, and a group interested in the literary reading of the parables (especially J. D. Crossan [1995]; R. Funk [1982]; and D. Via [1967]). This early work was rather eclectic, but it provided an important impulse and is still interesting for opening up a variety of structural possibilities. But it is in Patte's own developing work that structuralism has decisively moved beyond a marginal position in biblical studies. In 1978 he and A. Patte proposed a precise method of structural analysis that they claimed anyone could apply to biblical texts with controllable results (11-38). They defined procedures by which the reader can move from the complex Gospel narrative, through the system of simple subnarratives that underlie it and the symbolic system these subnarratives imply, to the text's "semantic universe" or world of meaning. This method underlies D. Patte's books on PAUL (1983) and Matthew (1987), in which he sets out to display the structure of the biblical authors' convictions, or faith. This structure constrains the way the author organizes his material, whatever its source (e.g., Matthew's convictions shape what he may take from Mark or Q). In later works (1990a, 1990b) Patte has considerably refined his method.

Through the 1970s and 1980s a number of other important contributions emerged from the circle around Patte. E. Malbon's 1986 work on the "geographical code" in Mark demonstrates the continuing vibrancy of Lévi-Strauss's impulse; she shows how the structural organization of spaces (Galilee and Judea, sea and land, inhabited land and desert, etc.) provides a major key to what is going on in this Gospel. D. Jobling (1986), working in the HB, pursues a line more loosely adapted from Lévi-Strauss and Greimas. R. Polzin (1980) explores a very different and important direction in applying the methods of the Russian formalists to a part of the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY. Of particular interest is Semeia 18, which offers a large collection of alternative structural exegeses of a single text (Genesis 2–3); in his introduction, Patte takes up the issue of how there can be a variety of valid structural methods.

c. Deconstruction. Biblical scholars, including many structuralists, were initially slow to become involved in the debate over deconstruction. This may be because in the United States this debate was largely carried on by specialists in modern literature. This was false to Derrida's initiative since it is precisely the foundational documents of Western culture that he has taken up—e.g., Plato; but also, on several occasions, biblical texts (e.g., Semeia 23:63-97, 54:3-34).

After the breakthrough in Semeia 23 (Derrida and Biblical Studies), contributions began to appear steadily: Crossan's deconstructive reading of John (Semeia 26:3-21); G. Phillips's reading of Matthew 13 in the light of Derrida and Foucault (Semeia 31:111-38); and major collections of essays in Semeia 51 (Poststructural Criticism and the Bible) and 54 (Poststructuralism as Exegesis); and, at book length, P. Miscall (1986, on 1 Samuel) and S. Moore (1992, on Mark and Luke; for a survey and critique of contributions, see The Bible and Culture Collective, 119-48). S. Handelman (1982) has probed the historical links between rabbinic biblical interpretation and deconstruction. Phillips (Semeia 51:7-49) and H. White (1991) have taken a lead in broadening the theoretical framework of biblical structuralism by considering developments in semiotics. All these works demonstrate the possibility and necessity of a fully critical reading of the Bible, a reading that takes current critical debate with full seriousness and intends to make its own contribution to that debate. But such a reading is threatening to traditional views of the Bible, since it starts to unpack the Bible's AUTHORITY, uniqueness, sacredness, and so on, forcing the question of how the Bible's centrality in Western culture has been implicated in the establishment of the logocentric metaphysical tradition. The Fourth Gospel's programmatic statement that "the Word was God" sounds, from a deconstructionist point of view, like a summary of the whole problem!

Several of the above authors and collections work on the boundary between deconstruction and the political or ideological analysis of texts. An important precursor was the materialist reading of F. Belo (1981). Drawing on both French structuralism (especially Barthes's textualism) and Marxist theory, he has produced an astonishing reading of the Gospel of Mark in which he analyzes how this text unravels the two incompatible systems whereby Judaism understands sin as pollution and as debt (Belo's work is not so much a deconstruction of Mark as a claim that Mark deconstructs the Torah). Contributions include a representative collection of essays in Semeia 59 (Ideological Criticism of Biblical Texts), R. Boer's (1996) definitive treatment of the relevance (both theoretical and exegetical) of Jameson's work to biblical studies, and the pursuit of related issues of pedagogy by Patte and Phillips (see also Patte [1995]). Feminist writers informed by deconstruction, particularly M. Bal (1987, 1988a, 1988b), press the issue of the Bible's implication in entrenched structures of oppression (on Bal, see Jobling [1991]; further on critical feminist reading, see J. C. Exum [1995] and D. Fewell [1995], who provide annotated bibliography; and Exum [1993]).

3. Conclusion. Structuralism and deconstruction, in conjunction with other literary approaches, have played a large role in demonstrating the narrowness and arbitrariness of the previously dominant historical-critical method in biblical studies. They have helped create a climate in which attention to the biblical text in its final form takes precedence over hypothetical reconstruction of its possible earlier forms. They have altered the grounds on which debate over appropriate biblical methodology is conducted. Although they still need greater representation in introductions and commentaries, they have already generated major works of biblical scholarship.

Bibliography: L. Althusser, For Marx (ET 1969). M. Bal, Lethal Love (1987); Death and Dissymmetry (1988a); Murder and Difference (1988b). R. Barthes, S/Z (1974); "The Struggle with the Angel," The Semiotic Challenge (1988) 246-60. F. Belo, A Materialist Reading of the Gospel of Mark (1981). The Bible and Culture Collective, The Postmodern Bible (1995). R. Boer, Jameson and Jeroboam (1996). P. Caws, Structuralism: The Art of the Intelligible (1988). J. Colloud, Structural Analysis of the Narrative (SemSup 4, 1976). J. D. Crossan, The Dark Interval: Towards a Theology of Story (1975). J. Culler, On Deconstruction (1982). J. Derrida, Of Grammatology (1976); "Structure, Sign, and Play in the Discourse of the Human Sciences," Writing and Difference (1978) 278-93. M. E. Donaldson, "Kinship Theory in the Patriarchal Narratives: The Case of the Barren Wife," JAAR 49 (1981) 77-87. M. Douglas, Purity and Danger (1966). U. Eco, A Theory of Semiotics (1976). J. Ehrmann, Structuralism (1970). J. C. Exum, Fragmented Women (1993); "Feminist Criticism," Judges and Method (ed. G. A. Yee, 1995) 65-90. D. N. Fewell, "Deconstructive Criticism," Judges and Method (1995) 119-45. M. Foucault, The History of Sexuality (ET 1978). R. Funk, Parables and Presence: Forms of NT Tradition (1982). G. Genette, Narrative Discourse (1980). G. Greene and C. Kahn, Making a Difference: Feminist Literary Criticism (1985). A. J. Greimas, Structural Semantics: An Attempt at a Method (1983); On Meaning (1987); Maupassant (1988). S. A. Handelman, The Slayers of Moses (1982). R. Harland, Superstructuralism: The Philosophy of Structuralism and Post-structuralism (1987). F. Jameson, The Political Unconscious (1981). D. Jobling, The Sense of Biblical Narrative: Structural Analysis in the HB (2 vols., 1986); "M. Bal on Biblical Narrative," RStR 17 (1991) 1-9; "Structuralist Criticism," Judges and Method (1995) 91-118. M. Lane (ed.), Introduction to Structuralism (1970). E. Leach, Genesis as Myth and Other Essays (1969). V. B. Leitch, Deconstructive Criticism (1983). C. Lévi-Strauss, "The Structural Study of Myth," Structural Anthropology (1963) 206-31; "The Story of Asdiwal," The Structural Study of Myth and Totemism (ed. E. Leach, 1967) 1-47; The Raw and the Cooked (1970); From Honey to Ashes (1973); The Origin of Table Manners (1978); The Naked Man (1981). P. Macherey, A Theory of Literary Production (1978). E. S. Malbon, Narrative Space and Mythic Meaning in Mark (1986). P. D. Miscall, 1 Samuel: A Literary Reading (1986). T. Moi, Sexual/Textual Politics (1985). S. D. Moore, Mark and Luke in Poststructuralist Perspectives (1992). D. Patte, Paul's Faith and the Power of the Gospel (1983); The Gospel According to Matthew (1987); The Religious Dimensions of Biblical Texts (1990a); Structural Exegesis for NT Critics (1990b); Ethics of Biblical Interpretation (1995). D. Patte and A. Patte, Structural Exegesis (1978). D. Patte and G. A. Phillips, "A Fundamental Condition for Ethical Accountability in the Teaching of the Bible by White Male Exegetes," Scriptura 9 (1991) 7-28. R. Polzin, Moses and the Deuteronomist (1980). T. J. Prewitt, The Elusive Covenant (1990). V. Propp, Morphology of the Folktale (1968). M. Ryan, Marxism and Deconstruction (1982). F. de Saussure, Course in General Linguistics (ET 1959); Semeia 1, 2 (1974); 18 (1980); 23 (1982); 26 (1983); 31 (1985); 51 (1990); 54 (1991); 59 (1992). J. P. Tompkins (ed.), Reader-response Criticism (1980). D. O. Via, The Parables (1967). C. Weedon, Feminist Practice and Poststructuralist Theory (1987, 1997²). H. C. White, Narration and Discourse in the Book of Genesis (1991).

D. JOBLING

STUART, MOSES (1780–1852)

Born in Wilton, Connecticut, Mar. 26, 1780, S. trained for the law at Yale and on graduation in 1799 taught school before being admitted to the bar in 1802. That fall he was invited back to Yale as a tutor and fell under the influence of Yale president and theologian T. Dwight (1752–1817), converting to evangelical Christianity before the year was out. In 1804 he was called as assistant pastor of the First (Center) Church of New Haven and in 1806 as full pastor. In 1810 he became professor of sacred literature at the recently founded Congregational Seminary at Andover, Massachusetts, where he remained until he retired in 1848. He died Jan. 4, 1852.

Unprepared to teach at Andover, S. immediately began private study of Hebrew and German; German especially enabled him to keep abreast of advances in biblical scholarship. Although he never abandoned his evangelical persuasions, by 1820 he had appropriated much of contemporary European scholarship, particularly the grammatico-historical school of HERMENEUTICS that informed all of his later biblical interpretation. He was an inspiring teacher. Several of America's important nineteenth-century biblical scholars, including E. ROBINSON, J. Gibbs (1790–1861), and C. Stowe (1802–86) were among his pupils; and Andover graduates on the mission fields perpetuated his principles of biblical scholarship in notable vernacular Bible translations (see TRANSLATION).

S. was a prolific writer, and his primary theological work was his biblical defense of the doctrine of the Trinity to counter the growing influence of American Unitarianism. Equally important was his grammatical-historical reading of the first chapters of Genesis against the less literal interpretations of America's leading geologists. His most lasting achievements, however, were in the disciplines of philology and exegesis. His Hebrew and Greek grammars, though reworkings of European prototypes, were the earliest thorough works of their kind in America. His exhaustive commentary on Hebrews (1827–28) was a landmark in American biblical science and was followed by five other commentaries of similar stature, each an invaluable mine of contemporary biblical scholarship. He also wrote extensively on the relevance of the Bible to social problems, particularly alcoholism and slavery.

Works: A Hebrew Grammar Without the Points: Designed as an Introduction to the Knowledge of the Inflections and Idiom of the Hebrew Tongue (1813); Letters to the Rev. W. E. Channing (1819); A Hebrew Grammar with a Copious Syntax and Praxis (1821); Elements of Interpretation, Translated from the Latin of J. A. Ernesti, and Accompanied by Notes and an Appendix Containing Extracts from Morus, Beck, and Keil (1822); A Greek Grammar of the NT, Translated From the German of G. B. Winer, Professor of Theology at Erlangen (1825); A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (1827–28); A Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1832); A Grammar of the NT Dialect (1834); A Commentary on the Apocalypse (1845); A Critical History and Defense on the OT Canon (1845); Hebrew Grammar of Gesenius as Edited by Roediger, Translated, with Additions and Also a Hebrew Chrestomathy (1846); A Commentary on the Book of Daniel (1850); A Commentary on Ecclesiastes (1851); A Commentary on the Book of Proverbs (1852).

Bibliography: J. H. Giltner, M. S.: The Father of Biblical Science in America (BSNA 14, 1988). R. W. Yarbrough, HHMBI, 368-72.

J. H. GILTNER

SUKENIK, ELIEZER LIPA (1889–1953)

Born in Bialystok, Poland, S. emigrated to Palestine in 1912 as a teacher. After doing graduate work at Dropsie College, Philadelphia, he joined the staff of the newly established Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1927 as field archaeologist and was promoted to lecturer in 1935 and to professor in 1938. In 1938 he also became director of the University Museum of Jewish Antiquities, putting together the nucleus of the archaeological Museum on the Mt. Scopus campus.

S. was in many ways the father of Jewish ARCHAEOLOGY in Mandatory Palestine. Assisted by such scholars as N. Avigad, R. Amiran, and S. Ben-Dor, he directed and published the results of many excavations, including the synagogues of Beth Alpha (1929); Hammath Gader (1932); Yafia; and She'albim (1949). Most of these discoveries were reported in the 1931 Schweich lectures of the British Academy and in other publications. S. also cleared numerous Jewish ossuary burials in the vicinity of Jerusalem. He carried out soundings at the mounds of Affuleh and Tell Jerishe and with L. Mayer cleared part of the famous "Third Wall" of Jerusalem (1925–27). Finally, he headed the Hebrew University contingent in the joint excavations at Samaria.

S. will be remembered especially for his courageous role in securing for the Hebrew University the first group of eleven of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS in 1947 during Arab-Jewish hostilities leading to the establishment of the State of Israel—a task completed shortly thereafter by his even more illustrious son, Y. (Sukenik) YADIN. S. died in 1953 while engaged in the publication of these scrolls.

Works: (with L. A. Mayer), The Third Wall of Jerusalem (1930); The Ancient Synagogue of Beth-Alpha (1932); Ancient Synagogues in Palestine and Greece (1934); The Ancient Synagogue of El Hammeh (Hamath by Gadara) (1935); (with J. W. Crawford and K. K. Kenyon), The Buildings at Samaria (1942); "History of Jewish Archaeology," The Jewish People, Past and Present (1946) 1:48-77; The Earliest Records of Christianity (1947); The Dead Sea Scrolls of the Hebrew University (1955).

Bibliography: A. Aharoni, EncJud 15 (1971) 491-92. ErIsr 8 (Sukenik vol., 1967). IEJ 3 (1953) 135-36.

W. G. DEVER

SWETE, HENRY BARCLAY (1835–1917)

Born at Bristol, England, Mar. 14, 1875, S. was educated at King's College, London, and at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. He was ordained in 1858, served as dean of Gonville and Caius (1865–68), as professor at King's College (1882 to 1890), and in 1890 followed B. F. WESTCOTT as Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. He died May 10, 1917.

S. edited THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA's commentary on Galatians–Colossians (1880) and 1 Thessalonians–Philemon (1882). His monumental textual project was the Cambridge edition of the SEPTUAGINT. Commissioned in 1883, the three volumes were published in remarkably short order (1887–94). S.'s program was to follow the Codex Vaticanus where possible and to supplement its readings with the Codices Alexandrinus, Sinaiticus, Bodleianus, Cottonianus, Ambrosianus, and Ephraemi Rescriptus. He also cited ancient psalters as well as other witnesses of Hosea–4 Maccabees (1894). His complementary mastery of septuagintal, early Christian, and patristic literature is evident through the great majority of his contributions. He was a moving figure in founding JTS and the CPT series and in preparing a LEXICON of patristic Greek.

S. published a commentary on Mark's Gospel in 1898 that opens with a "Personal History of St. Mark" that is remarkable for its grasp of classical philology and patristic evidence but also for its naïve assumption that an identifiable individual authored the Gospel. He dealt with the church's reception of the Gospel (1913^3, xxix-xxxviii), its language and dating (xxxix-l), structure (l-lxv), and content (lxvi-lxxxix). Although he strengthened the emerging consensus that the longer ending of Mark is secondary (xcvi-cxiii), his assertion that Mark did not write with a dogmatic purpose (xciv) is astonishing in a work contemporaneous with that of W. WREDE. The failure to cite Wrede's Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (1901) seems espcially egregious considering that S. did refer to the work of H. HOLTZMANN, H. GRESSMANN, E. KLOSTERMANN, J. WELLHAUSEN, and G. Wohlenberg (1862–1917). Instead of reckoning seriously with the most important challenge to his assumptions, however, S. perpetuated the nineteenth-century insistence on Mark's portrait as intimate, vivid, and primitive (xcv).

S.'s commentary on Revelation (1906) is certainly his finest. It has the virtues of the earlier work: attention to contemporaneous literature (includinig apocalyptic writings), care for textual and stylistic matters, and high regard for the document's reception by the church. He also remained true to his historical interests, drawing particularly on the work of W. RAMSAY. In two crucial ways S. anticipated recent approaches to Revelation. First, his inductive analysis of an integral document received as a unity (xlii) represents an early and critical challenge to the assumption that interpreters should deal with the fragments behind texts rather than with the consciousness the texts themselves represent. Second, S.'s concern with the work's intended readers was so great that two of his introductory essays deal with the document's historical and social milieu (li-lxxxix). These essays give the foundation for his two firm conclusions: Revelation was written to address the special needs of a particular group of Christian societies (xc), and it was composed during the last years of Domitian's imperium (c). Challenged in the twentieth century, both views have been confirmed by most scholars. S.'s commentary reached beyond its own presuppositions through a steady, reasoned exegesis that gave modern scholarship a model of the genre rarely attained.

Works: What Is the Right Method of Conducting the Defence of the OT in the Rationalistic Controversy Which Has Come upon the Church? (1863); England Versus Rome: A Brief Handbook of the Roman Catholic Controversy for the Use of Members of the English Church (1868); Theodori Episcopi Mopsuesteni in Epistolas B. Pauli Commentarii: The Latin Version with the Greek Fragments; with an Introduction, Notes, and Indices (2 vols., 1880–82); Church Services and Service-books Before the Reformation (1896, 1920^2); The OT in Greek According to the Septuagint (3 vols., 1887–94); The Gospel According to St. Mark: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes, and Indices (1898, 1902^2, 1913^3, repr. 1977); An Introduction to the OT in Greek (1900, repr. 1968); The Apocalypse of St. John: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes, and Indices (1906).

Bibliography: H. B. S., D.D., F.B.A., Sometime Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge: A Remembrance (1918). J. H. Strawley, DNB Sup. 3 (1927) 520-22. C. H. Turner and A. Rogers, "A Bibliography of the Published Works of the Late H. B. S.," JTS 19 (1918) 1-19.

B. CHILTON

SYMMACHUS (late 2nd cent.)

Conflicting data have been transmitted concerning S.'s biographical details and religious affiliation. In the fourth century, Epiphanius (De Mensuris et Ponderibus, xvi) wrote that S. was a Samaritan who had become a proselyte; but according to EUSEBIUS (Hist. eccl. 6.17) and JEROME (De Ver. Ill. 16) he belonged to the Jewish-Christian Ebionite sect. A. GEIGER maintained that S. was Jewish; and D. Barthélemy (1974) has identified him with Somchos, a disciple of Rabbi Meir, mentioned in the TALMUD (b. Erubin 13b).

S. produced a Greek version of the Hebrew scriptures that technically speaking is a revision of an earlier TRANSLATION, but actually amounted to a new translation, since S. inserted so many new elements that the underlying base text can be discovered only after minute research. This revision is usually dated to the end of the second century or the beginning of the third century CE.

Fragments of S.'s translation of most biblical books have been preserved and are known, especially since they were included in ORIGEN's Hexapla.

Two tendencies in direct opposition to each other are visible in S.'s revision. On the one hand, he was very precise (like Aquila, he based his revision on kaige-Theodotion); but on the other hand, he very often translated ad sensum rather than representing the Hebrew words with their stereotyped renderings. The revisions of AQUILA and S. are based on the text of kaige-Theodotion, rather than on that of the so-called OG translation. This dependence explains the background of the many readings that Aquila, S. and THEODOTION have in common. Ancient quotations from these sources are often recorded as "the Three."

S.'s readings are recorded in the Göttingen and Cambridge editions of the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) and in Field's edition of the Hexapla. The Hebrew text from which the translation was made was virtually identical with the MT.

Bibliography: D. Barthélemy, "Qui est Symmaque," CBQ 36 (1974) 451-65. J. R. Busto Saíz, La Traducción de Símaco en el libro de los Salmos (Textos y estudios "Cardenal Cisneros" 22, 1978). S. Jellicoe, The Septuagint and Modern Study (1968) 94-99. G. Mercati, L'eta di Simmaco l'interprete e S. Epifanio (1892). H. J. Schoeps, "Symmachus-studien, I., Der Bibelübersetzer Symmachus als ebionitischer Theologe," ConNT 6 (1942) 65-93; II., "Mythologisches bei Symmachus," Bib 26 (1945) 100-111; III., "Symmachus und der Midrasch," Bib 29 (1948) 31-51 (all repr. in his Aus frühchristlicher Zeit [1950] 82-119).

E. TOV

SYNOPTIC PROBLEM

The Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are called synoptic because their similarities and differences make it possible and desirable to study them in a synopsis (from a Greek word meaning "seen together"), an instrument that presents the texts of these Gospels in parallel columns and eventually even on parallel lines. The first adequate synopsis was created by J. J. GRIESBACH in 1774 as part of his critical edition of the Greek NT and was published in 1776 as a separate book entitled Synopsis evangeliorum Matthaei, Marci, et Lucae. These publications became the starting point for all modern studies of the synoptic problem, which have included investigations of the historical, literary, and theological relationships between and among these Gospels.

1. The Synoptic Problem in Antiquity. The synoptic problem was already being discussed by scholars in antiquity who were first concerned that the four canonical Gospels (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) did not always narrate the sayings and deeds of JESUS in the same order. PAPIAS, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, made investigations into the Gospel traditions around 110 CE; and although his five books on the Interpretation of the Logia of the Lord are not now extant, some of his statements about the Gospels of Matthew and Mark have been preserved in EUSEBIUS's Church History, written between 300 and 325 CE.

IRENAEUS, bishop of Lyons after 178 CE, also referred to Papias but stressed the divine revelation that he believed was imparted to each of the authors of the four canonical Gospels (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 3.39.1-17). Also during the second century CE, TATIAN, a Syrian theologian, constructed a harmonized and combined text of the canonical Gospels, which he called the Diatessaron ([One Gospel] Through Four). Although his attempt to compose a single Gospel did not supplant the AUTHORITY of the four separate canonical Gospels in most regions of the church, his Diatessaron was transmitted to the later church in several languages, as extant fragments demonstrate.

Another product of early study of the Gospels was the similarly entitled work, "the dia tessaron gospel," which a certain Ammonius produced in Alexandria around 250 CE, as Eusebius stated in a letter to one Carpianus. In this letter, which later served as a preface for Eusebius's own tables of ten "canons" for the Gospels, Eusebius wrote that Ammonius excerpted and applied parallel sections from the other three canonical Gospels to the running text of Matthew, thus disturbing the order of materials in Mark, Luke, and John. In order to preserve the order of pericopes in all four of the canonical Gospels, Eusebius later numbered Ammonius's sections and collected these numbers into tables of various canons, with which one could cross-reference sections of the Gospels according to the categories of agreements among and between them. Eusebius's canons included tables for agreements among all four canonical Gospels, among any three, and between any two except Mark and John as well as tables displaying sections that are unique to each Gospel. These Eusebian canons were often added to the texts of the Gospels, and the numbers of the sections in the tables were copied into the margins. The canons remained important for centuries as aids for comparative study of the Gospels. (See Nestle-Aland 27, 84-89 for Eusebius's letter to Carpianus and his tables of canons, and consult the inner margins of the canonical Gospels for the corresponding numbers of the Ammonian/Eusebian sections).

The oldest explicit reference to the sequence in which the Gospels were composed is attributed to CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, who claimed, in turn, to be quoting a tradition of the primitive elders. According to Eusebius, Clement wrote, "those gospels were first written which include the genealogies [i. e., Matthew and Luke and perhaps others with genealogies]" (Hypotyposeis 6, as quoted in Eusebius, Hist. eccl. 6.14.5-7.).

The first detailed and explicitly literary attempt to explain the agreements and differences among the canonical Gospels is found in AUGUSTINE's De consensu evangelistarum, written around 400 CE. In book 1 of this work, Augustine asserted that Mark had followed and epitomized Matthew, but in book 4 he declared it more probable that Mark had been influenced by both Matthew and Luke. Augustine's first, but implicitly less probable, source theory about the Gospels, implying the order Matthew, Mark, Luke as the order of composition was adopted by many later scholars and eventually became known as the Augustinian hypothesis.

2. Middle Ages, Reformation, and Enlightenment. J. GERSON made a remarkable endeavor to harmonize the four Gospels in his Harmonia evangelica (c. 1420), and during the Reformation A. Osiander (c. 1496–1552) offered a very detailed exposition of this kind in his Harmonia evangelica (1537). During the Enlightenment, scholars gradually replaced apologetic harmonies of the Gospels with critical presentations that simply juxtaposed the texts more or less in their own sequence. J. LE CLERC prepared the way for a transition to a new era in synoptic study with his Harmonia evangelica (1699), which contained Greek and Latin texts of the canonical Gospels in four parallel columns. However, the decisive step into this new era of synoptic presentation, as distinct from harmonization of the Gospels, was taken by Griesbach, whose critical edition of the Greek NT (1774) arranged the entire Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke and selected sections of John in parallel columns. Griesbach intended to facilitate comparative analysis of the Gospels, not their harmonization, which he rejected as impossible. His synoptic arrangement, published as a separate volume in 1776, became the model for all later multi-columned synopses.

3. 1780–1820. Griesbach's synopsis inspired him and other Protestant theologians in Germany to intensified studies of the synoptic problem. Prior to 1800 Griesbach and his competitors had developed four main source theories about the Gospels, descendants of which can be found in all later contributions to the problem. These four classical theories have been described, particularly in the German literature, as: (a) the utilization hypothesis; (b) the proto-gospel theory; (c) the multiple source theory; and (d) the oral tradition hypothesis.

a. The utilization hypothesis. This hypothesis implies that one canonical Gospel was a source for one or more of the others, although their interrelationships and order of composition have been understood in different, sometimes even opposite, ways by different scholars.

At least between the time of THOMAS AQUINAS and the second half of the eighteenth century, most scholars accepted the generally received canonical sequence—Matthew, Mark, Luke—as the order of composition. In antiquity this sequence was affirmed by ORIGEN (Eusebius Hist. eccl. 6.25.3-6); by JEROME (Prologus quattuor evangeliorum [praefatio in comm. in Mattheum]); and, at one stage of his work, by Augustine (De consensu evangelistarum 1.2.4, 1.3.6). This Augustinian hypothesis was later advocated by the Dutch jurist and theologian H. GROTIUS (1641), among many others.

This hypothesis, however, included the view that Mark was the abbreviator of Matthew (De consensu 1.3.6), a view called into question at least since the time of CALVIN. Calvin and some other scholars argued that there was no literary relationship among the canonical Gospels at all; but others, e.g., J. MILL and J. WETTSTEIN, accepted the generally received canonical order as the order of composition while denying that the relevant literary evidence supported the view that Mark was an abbreviator of Matthew.

Then in 1764 an English scholar, H. Owen (1716–95), advocated that the sequence of composition was Matthew, Luke, and Mark. Owen argued that Mark was a conflation of Matthew and Luke rather than an abbreviation of Matthew.

Somewhat later, at Jena in Germany, F. Stroth (1750–85), in an anonymously published article (1781), came to similar conclusions. Griesbach, Stroth's colleague at Jena, then advocated this source theory in three speeches delivered at the university at Easter 1783 and at Whitsunday 1789 and 1790. Inspired by the intermediary function of Mark presented in his synopsis, Griesbach first argued that Luke had made use of Matthew, and then demonstrated in more detail that Mark alternately depended on Matthew or Luke or both. Known as the Griesbach hypothesis, this form of the utilization hypothesis became the most popular source theory about the Gospels from his time into the middle decades of the nineteenth century. A brilliant discussion of a modified form of Griesbach's theory was published in 1826 by his former student, W. DE WETTE.

No decisive evidence has yet been presented by modern scholars that Stroth or Griesbach knew of Owen's earlier work on the synoptic problem, but it is a fact that Griesbach's extended visit to London (September 1769 to June 1770) overlapped the three-year period (1769–71) when Owen was Boyle lecturer. In deference to this possible connection and for other reasons, some scholars today refer to the Owen-Griesbach hypothesis. A few scholars on both sides of the English Channel during this same period, e.g., A. F. Büsching (1724-1793) and E. EVANSON, agreed that Mark was a conflation of Matthew and Luke but gave priority to Luke rather than to Matthew.

The view opposing the Augustinian hypothesis, that Mark had been a source of Matthew and Luke, was advocated in 1786 by G. Storr (1746–1805) of Tübingen. Storr's theory does not seem to have influenced his contemporaries, and although the priority of Mark was suggested again in the years 1836–38 (see sec. 4), its advocates did not base their arguments on Storr's. Nevertheless, this founder of the so-called first Tübingen school anticipated the Markan form of the utilization hypothesis that rose to popularity from the middle decades of the nineteenth century.

Thus already in the eighteenth century the utilization hypothesis included advocates of the priority of Matthew (Mill, Wettstein, Owen, Stroth, Griesbach), the priority of Luke (Büsching, Evans), and the priority of Mark (Storr).

b. The proto-gospel theory. This theory is characterized by the view that the extant Gospels derive from an earlier source rather than from one or more of the other canonical Gospels. This idea had its origins in Papias's statement that Matthew had "composed the Logia in hebraidi dialektw," understood to mean "in the Hebrew language" or "in the Hebrew dialect," i. e., Aramaic. In the fourth century, Epiphanius and Jerome referred these Logia to an older Hebrew gospel assumed to lie behind the Jewish-Christian gospel of the Nazarenes. In 1689 R. SIMON, a pioneer of TEXTUAL CRITICISM, described this presumed older gospel as an Aramaic proto-gospel, a hypothesis popularized in 1778 by G. LESSING, whose brilliant little study was published posthumously in 1784. Lessing regarded the Aramaic gospel of the Nazarenes as the common source of all canonical and apocryphal gospels (see APOCRYPHA, NT). His thesis was accepted in 1794 by J. G. EICHHORN; but since this polyhistor combined it with the assumption of multiple sources (see sec. 3c), it seemed much too complicated in the eyes of his contemporaries. In 1832 F. SCHLEIERMACHER suggested that the sayings of Jesus as quoted in Matthew derived from Papias's proto-Matthew, which contained Logia (see sec. 4). Since Schleiermacher believed Logia included only sayings, this suggestion developed into a reduced form of Lessing's proto-gospel theory.

c. The multiple source theory. This theory was initiated by J. KOPPE in 1782. Drawing attention to the many authors mentioned in Luke 1:1, he assumed that Matthew, Mark, and Luke had collected a number of circulating units structured in oral and written form as narratives, speeches, parables, sayings, etc. A similar fragment theory assuming short written notes was developed by Schleiermacher in a book on Luke (1817). This monograph had no great influence on later scholars, but Koppe's suggestion that the Gospels developed from earlier and smaller literary units containing differing literary forms anticipated the form-critical approach (see FORM CRITICISM) that developed in the twentieth century (see sec. 5).

d. The oral tradition hypothesis. This hypothesis was created by J. G. HERDER and made public in 1796–97. Repudiating the utilization and the proto-gospel theories, Herder called a common oral tradition the "protoplasm" from which the later written Gospels grew. He presumed that on this basis an oral, Aramaic proto-Mark was developed in the period 34–40 CE and that some years after 60 CE it became the source of the written Nazarean proto-Matthew, which, supported by proto-Mark, gave rise to the Greek synoptic Gospels. Herder's enthusiastic occupation with FOLKLORE made him emphasize living traditions instead of fixed documents, and he found all ideas about redactional manipulations in the composition of the Gospels to be anachronistic. The Gospel writers, in Herder's view, should look more like first-century composers and less like eighteenth-century authors, publishers, and bookmen. Arguments in favor of living oral traditions and against literary traditions were also adduced in a monograph by J. GIESELER (1818).

4. 1830–70. Synoptic Gospel studies during this period were dominated by contributions from German Protestant scholars, and their opinions influenced later scholars of different nationalities and confessions throughout the world. As Germany forged a unified political identity, middle-class standards, liberalism, and nationalism rose in popularity. German professors were held in high esteem and thus were able to advance even radical suggestions about the development of earliest Christian history without restraint. In general, Protestant theologians in Germany during this period showed a preference either for bourgeois realism or for philosophical idealism, two views characteristic of the time.

a. The influence of realism. Around the year 1830 Griesbach's and Herder's synoptic theories were dominant among German divines. Soon, however, interest in realism prompted reactions against the more elaborate theology believed to be found in Matthew and Luke and against the uncontrolled development that was supposed to characterize the growth of oral traditions. These reactions were intensified when D. F. STRAUSS published his provocative two-volume work on Jesus in 1835–36. Influenced by G. W. F. Hegel's (1770–1831) idealist philosophy, Strauss replaced history with MYTHOLOGY in his interpretation of the Gospels, while presupposing Griesbach's and Herder's theories.

Other German scholars who preferred middle-class empiricism sought to reconstruct the life and teachings of Jesus based on documents that seemed the most primitive. They claimed to possess two such witnesses: Mark, whose narrative was neglected by Strauss even though it had been positively reevaluated by the well-known philologist K. LACHMANN in 1835; and the Logia of Matthew, about which Papias had commented but which Schleiermacher in an 1832 article understood in the limited sense of "sayings."

Impressed by Lachmann and Schleiermacher, although not yet by Strauss, in 1836 K. Credner (1797–1857) of Giessen proposed a source theory based on the priority of Mark and a Logia source. More detailed than Credner and in explicit opposition to Strauss, the empirical philosopher C. WEISSE also developed a two document hypothesis (1838). Weisse praised the simplicity of Mark and extended the influence of the presumed Logia source to Luke. In the same year, but without any knowledge of the works by Strauss and Weisse, a pastor in Saxony, C. WILKE, also argued for the priority of Mark. Credner's and Weisse's attempts to prove the historical nature of Mark's account were not immediately successful, but some of their arguments were taken up again ten years later.

b. The influence of Hegel's dialectic. Until the revolution of 1848 the idealism of the Prussian philosopher Hegel inspired several German theologians. They also found Griesbach's contention that Matthew and Luke had provided source material for Mark most in harmony with Hegel's dialectic pattern of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. This perspective especially characterized work by F. C. BAUR, leader of the second Tübingen school. He and his followers understood the evangelists to represent dialectic principles and tendencies, which they characterized as Judaism, Hellenism, and Syncretism (early Roman Catholicism). To accommodate his schematic view of the development of earliest Christianity, Baur and other members of this school dated Luke and Mark sometime in the second century. This philosophical overlay on the synoptic theory of Griesbach and the results to which the second Tübingen school came in reconstructing early Christian origins did not enhance the popularity of Griesbach's source theory.

c. The resurgence of realism. After the revolution of 1848, liberal realism took command again in Germany, and Hegel's idealism became less popular. This led to another advancement of the Mark-and-Logia theory by the Göttingen professor H. EWALD. In articles published between 1848 and 1850 and in an 1850 commentary, Ewald expressed the conviction that his revision of the theory would restore true religion and unify Germany; he was, in fact, followed by several of his countrymen in the 1850s.

In 1863 Heidelberg professor H. HOLTZMANN summarized earlier proposals about the sources of the Gospels and commented on the synoptic Gospels on the basis of his own distinctive two document theory. Major critiques of Holtzmann's work were offered by the German advocate of the Augustinian hypothesis, A. HILGENFELD of Jena (1863), and by a Dutch advocate of the Griesbach hypothesis, H. Meyboom (1842–1933) in his doctoral dissertation (1866). A distinctive contribution of Meyboom's dissertation was to call attention to the work done on the synoptic problem by members of the Strasbourg school, including T. Colani (1824–88), M. Nicolas (1810–86), E. REUSS, A. Réville (1826–1906), and E. Scherer (1815–89). Although each of these scholars advocated some form of the Markan hypothesis, none affirmed the priority of canonical Mark. Reuss, Réville, and Nicolas advocated a proto-Mark hypothesis (Meyboom claimed that Réville coined the term proto-Mark). Because of the singular literary style Scherer found in canonical Mark, he published his doubts about the Markan hypothesis, particularly about Reuss's view that the canonical text of Mark had developed through several earlier stages at the hands of several authors and editors.

In spite of the cautious work of these French scholars, shortly after its appearance the 1863 work by Holtzmann came to be regarded by most European scholars as the definitive answer to the synoptic question. However, Holtzmann's names for the two oldest sources, Alpha and Lambda, did not replace the terms Ur-Marcus and Logia, which later developed into canonical Mark and Q. (Following the Franco-Prussian War of 1870–71 and the subsequent annexation of Alsace-Lorraine into a newly unified German nation, Holtzmann was appointed professor in Strasbourg to represent German NT scholarship there.)

5. 1870–1950. Holtzmann's two source theory influenced scholars in all countries and denominations during the subsequent period of synoptic research. A former student and one time colleague on the Strasbourg faculty, A. SCHWEITZER, wrote that the two source hypothesis "is carried by Holtzmann to such a degree of demonstration that it can no longer be called a mere hypothesis, but it does not succeed in winning an assured position in the critical study of the Life of Jesus" (1906).

a. The spread of the Mark and Q hypothesis. The respect other scholars had for Holtzmann's detailed work during this period accelerated the spread of the Mark-and-Q version of the utilization hypothesis to Great Britain. A. Abbott discussed the Gospels in accord with Holtzmann's views in the 1879 EncBrit. At Oxford a group of scholars under the leadership of W. SANDAY met for years to study the importance of Mark and Q, publishing their results in 1911. One of the participants in Sanday's seminar was B. STREETER, whose 1924 monograph became a standard treatise on the synoptic problem throughout the English-speaking world.

The transmission of the work of Holtzmann and of other German Protestant biblical scholars to French, English, German, and Italian Roman Catholic circles, particularly among modernists, was often expedited through the efforts of the wealthy, scholarly, and influential Roman Catholic layman F. von Hügel (1852–1925). After delivering a paper on Luke to the Society for Biblical Studies in Rome in 1896, von Hügel corresponded for several months with the young E. Pacelli (1876–1958), the future Pope Pius XII, about historical-critical biblical interpretation as practiced by such Roman Catholic modernists as G. Tyrrell (1861–1909) and by German Protestants, like J. WELLHAUSEN and Holtzmann. After the promulgation of the Roman Catholic encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU by Pope Pius XII in 1943, Roman Catholic theologians were no longer expected to suppress modernism; they developed a biblical scholarship in parallel with Protestants, which has mostly included a preference for the Mark-and-Q hypothesis, although other suggestions have also been made (see sec. 6b).

b. The rise of form criticism. Within the period 1870–1950 an important complement to the dominating LITERARY criticism of the synoptic Gospels, based as it was on Mark and Q, emerged in 1919, when M. DIBELIUS developed a method called FORM CRITICISM. His leading idea was to study the synoptic pericopes as preliterary units of tradition, like tales and sayings occurring as oral traditions in folklore. Historically, this method shared features of Koppe's and Schleiermacher's fragment theory combined with Herder's and Gieseler's oral gospel theory, although Dibelius presupposed neither written fragments nor a comprehensive tradition. Essential for him was the distinction of forms like "paradigm" (short narrative ending in a point), "novel story" (longer narrative with concrete details), "parenesis" (quotation of Jesus implying admonition), and "myth" (revelation of Christ's Messiahship). The common "life setting" of these various forms was "preaching," by which Dibelius meant both sermons and teaching.

Following WWI, German theologians found this approach stimulating; and Dibelius was followed by several young scholars, among whom R. BULTMANN was the most influential through his 1921 book. These and many later contributors to form criticism, however, presupposed the two source theory. Accordingly, they concentrated form criticism on Mark and on the presumed Logia while exposing Matthew and Luke to literary criticism in order to highlight alleged redactional changes of Mark and Q by the later Gospel writers. Such exclusion of other source-critical possibilities was not compatible with the significant declaration of Luke that he, like other persons who had also undertaken to report on Jesus, had access to the oral traditions of eye-witnesses (Luke 1:2). The routine combination of form criticism with literary criticism based on Mark and Q implied a change to a different method and prevented the fresh approach of form criticism from becoming as fruitful as it might have been. Yet scholars generally accepted the source-critical presuppositions of Dibelius and Bultmann along with the form-critical method.

6. 1950–84. a. Redaction criticism and structuralism. Two of the new trends that developed during this period posited new understandings of the theology of the synoptic evangelists while presupposing the inherited two source theory or ignoring source criticism altogether. REDACTION CRITICISM, which started in western Germany just after WWII, was intended to explain in detail what message the redactors of each Gospel wanted to communicate. Early German pioneers of this method included H. Conzelmann on Luke, W. Marxsen (1919–93) on Mark, and G. BORNKAMM, G. Barth, and H. Held on Matthew. The application of this method produced a rich literature on the Gospels by scholars in many countries, and new theological insights have been gained. However, redaction criticism as it is often practiced is flawed because most redaction critics of Matthew and Luke draw conclusions about the theology of these evangelists only from evidence provided by the alleged supplements and changes these authors are assumed to have made to the texts of Mark and Q, rather than from evidence provided in the complete texts of these Gospels.

The synoptic texts have also been interpreted on the basis of STRUCTURALISM, a system of linguistic principles developed in Geneva and Paris. Its aim is the logical and structural analysis of texts without primary concern for whether they reveal something historical. A synchronic instead of a diachronic view is taken. Source criticism of the Gospels has scarcely interested the structuralists, but their skepticism contributed to the discussion of the synoptic problem after WWII.

b. Source theories. The years after 1950 have also included some positive contributions to the question of gospel origins, and they have led to a useful revival of the discussion of the synoptic problem. Most source theories currently advocated had counterparts or precursors among the classical theories created in Germany before 1800, although the new theories also comprise modifications, elaborations, and sometimes combinations of the earlier theories, often due to new discoveries of relevant material. Thus one will find contemporary forms or combinations of (i) the utilization hypothesis, ascribing priority to Matthew, Mark, or Luke; (ii) the proto-gospel hypothesis, usually in the form of a proto-Mark; (iii) multiple source hypotheses; and (iv) oral tradition hypotheses.

i. The utilization hypothesis. A scholarly attack on the Mark-and-Q form of the utilization hypothesis, which had been most popular since the time of Holtzmann, was delivered in 1951 by a Roman Catholic theologian in London, B. Butler, who wanted to revive the Augustinian hypothesis. He found a receptive following among a few scholars in the United States (J. Ludlum, Jr.) and England (B. Orchard, prior to 1970, and J. Wenham).

More attention, however, was paid to W. FARMER, who recommended Griesbach's hypothesis (1964). A group of scholars has continued to work together with this hypothesis, and since 1964 Farmer has coauthored works advocating the two Gospel hypothesis with L. Cope, D. Dungan, T. Longstaff, A. McNicol, Orchard, D. Peabody, and P. Shuler. Other contemporary scholars who have come to advocate the neo-Griesbach (two Gospel) hypothesis include G. Buchanan, N. Elliott, H. Hoehner, L. Maluf, C. Mann, and D. Tevis in the United States; A. Leske in Canada; H. Riley in England; D. Neville (1994) and B. Powers in Australia; H.-H. Stoldt in Germany; F. Collison and S. Samuel in India; G. Gamba in Italy; Y. Kim and J. Lee in Korea; and S. Abogunrin in Nigeria.

Adherents of the two source theory have generally found no reason to give up their position or, in some cases, even to discuss the synoptic problem. Two exceptional advocates who have played major roles in the contemporary discussion are C. Tuckett (1983), formerly at Manchester but now at Oxford; and F. Neirynck of Louvain, who contributed to the defense of Markan priority with major publications in 1972 and 1974. Neirynck later summarized his defense of the two source hypothesis in the IDBSup (1976) and in the NJBC (1990). Tuckett's major critique of the Griesbach hypothesis and defense of the two document hypothesis appeared in the published version of his doctoral dissertation in 1983. In 1995 he also provided his own summary of the current state of Gospel study in volume 8 of the NIB.

ii. The proto-gospel hypothesis. The University of Louvain was once a center of attempts to revive Lessing's proto-gospel theory, beginning in 1952 with lectures by L. Vaganay and L. CERFAUX, who started again from Papias's reference to a Hebrew or Aramaic proto-Matthew. However, since intermediary sources and stages were also included, these Roman Catholic scholars and their supporters have partly approached the multiple source theory.

iii. Multiple source hypotheses. Koppe's and Eichhorn's multiple source theories have found modern analogies in work by scholars connected with the Ecole Biblique in Jerusalem. In a synopsis published in 1972 M.-E. Boismard gave up the assumption of a common proto-gospel and preferred to regard multiple earlier stages of Matthew, Mark, and Luke as the more original sources of the Gospels. His former student P. Rolland (1982, 1983a, 1983b, 1984) has reconstructed more sources and placed them in a complicated sequence on the basis of minute observations concerning double expressions in Mark, now interpreted as combinations of single expressions in Matthew and Luke.

iv. The oral tradition hypothesis. Contemporary synoptic discussions have also resulted in a renascence of Herder's and Gieseler's oral tradition hypothesis. Its advocates have collected supporting arguments partly from Judaism, partly from folklore.

Jewish analogies have especially occupied Swedish scholars inspired by the Uppsala orientalist H. S. NYBERG's Studien zum Hoseabuche (1935), in which he attacked literary criticism and pointed out the importance of the living traditions behind oriental texts. Similar approaches were taken in gospel studies by H. Riesenfeld in 1957 and by B. Gerhardsson, who in a 1964 work emphasized the use of memorization within the apostles' Jewish environment.

Folklore analogies have interested American theologians in recent years, especially under the influence of Harvard philologists who have studied the memorization technique of village minstrels in Bosnia and in parts of Yugoslavia. In addition, a symposium on the Gospels was held in San Antonio, Texas, in 1977, at which A. Lord (1978) of Harvard delivered the first lecture. Oral traditions behind the Gospels have been strongly emphasized also by W. Kelber (1983); and B. REICKE (1986) attempted to find reflections of living oral traditions in the extant texts of all three synoptic Gospels.

7. 1984–98. The classical synoptic theories of the years before 1800 are still represented in modified or combined forms; and exchanges of views among the advocates of these theories have taken place, especially at meetings of international societies like the Studiorum Novi Testamenti Societas and the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE. Another forum for such discussions was a symposium in Jerusalem at Easter 1984 at which leading representatives of three source hypotheses had rich opportunities for discussion and debate over a two-week period. Although the assembled scholars did not reach much agreement, one of the points of consensus has helped to shape some of the most recent publications. That consensus affirmed that "a literary, historical and theological explanation of the evangelists' compositional activity, giving a coherent and reasonable picture of the whole of each Gospel, is the most important method of argumentation in defense of a source hypothesis."

The classical utilization hypothesis was represented in Jerusalem by advocates of the two source hypothesis and the two gospel (neo-Griesbach) hypotheses. Several multiple source hypotheses were also represented, and at least one representative of the oral tradition hypothesis was present. After the Jerusalem conference the discussion of the importance of oral traditions for a complete understanding of the development of the synoptic Gospels continued at conferences in Dublin, Ireland (1989), and Varese, Italy (1990).

Experts in the synoptic problem gathered again in 1991 at the Georg-August Universität in Göttingen to discuss the significance of the "minor agreements" for a variety of competing source theories. Advocates of two other contemporary source theories not represented in Jerusalem engaged in the debate: Supporters for the Deutero-Markus theory (Matthew and Luke independently used a form of Mark later than canonical Mark as well as Q in composing their Gospels) included A. Fuchs, U. Luz, C. Niemand, and G. Strecker (1993), the conference host; and M. Goulder ably advocated and defended A. FARRER's source theory (Matthew and Luke independently used canonical Mark, but Luke also made direct use of Matthew for material not found in Mark. There was no Q source). Other modern defenders of the J. H. Ropes-A. Farrer-M. Goulder hypothesis include Goulder's student, M. Goodacre as well as J. Drury, E. Franklin, H. Green, E. Hobbs, E. P. Sanders, and D.

Schmidt. The few contemporary advocates of the Augustinian hypothesis (Ludlum and Wenham) and of a form of the utilization hypothesis that gives priority to Luke (R. Lindsey) did not share in this particular international discussion.

A volume of essays, Biblical Studies and the Shifting of Paradigms, 1850–1914 (H. G. Reventlow and W. Farmer [1995]), that came out of conferences held in La Trobe, Pennsylvania, in 1990 and at the University of the Ruhr in Bochum, Germany, in 1992 has also helped to advance contemporary understanding of the history of the discussion of the synoptic problem.

Public awareness and understanding of the synoptic problem has increased recently through the appearance of several related sites on the World Wide Web. The most comprehensive of these is "The Synoptic Problem" maintained by S. Carlson (http://www.mindspring.com/scarlson/synopt/), who also provides links to several other sites.

In 1994 Farmer provided his answer to every clergy and lay person's fundamental question about the synoptic problem: Does one solution or another really make a difference? Farmer maintained that it makes a great deal of difference and illustrated his answer with comparative discussions, one presupposing the two source hypothesis and another presupposing the two gospel hypothesis, for understanding the Lord's Prayer, the Lord's Supper, justification by faith, the faithful witness of women, God's special commitment to the poor, and the keys to the Kingdom.

Bibliography: F. C. Baur, Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien, ihr Verhältniss zu einander, ihren Charakter und Ursprung (1847). A. J. Bellinzoni, Jr. et al. (eds.), The Two-Source Hypothesis: A Critical Appraisal (1985). M.-E. Boismard et al., Synopse des quatre Évangiles en français 2 (1972) 15-59. G. Bornkamm et al., Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (1960, 1968[5]; ET, NTL, 1963). R. K. Bultmann, The History of the Synoptic Tradition (FRLANT 29, 1921, 1931[2], 1961[5]; ET 1963, 1968[2], rev. 1994). A. F. Büsching, Die vier Evangelisten mit ihren eigenen Worten zusammengesetzt und mit Erklärungen versehen (1766). B. C. Butler, The Originality of Matthew: A Critique of the Two-Document Hypothesis (1951). L. Cerfaux, La mission de Galilée dans la tradition synoptique (ALBO 2, 36, 1952). H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke (BHT 17, 1954, 1962[4]; ET 1960, 1982). K. A. Credner, Einleitung in das Neue Testament (2 vols., 1836) 1:201-5. W. M. L. de Wette, An Historico-critical Introduction to the Canonical Books of the NT (1826, 1848[5]; ET 1858) 129-86. M. Dibelius, From Tradition to Gospel (1919, 1933[2]; ET 1934). D. L. Dungan (ed.), The Interrelations of the Gospels: A Symposium Led by M. E. Boismard, W. R. Farmer, and F. Neirynck; Jerusalem 1984 (BETL 95, 1990). J. G. Eichhorn, "Über die drei ersten Evangelien," ABBL 5 (1794) 759-996. E. Evanson, The Dissonance of the Four Generally Received Evangelists and the Evidence of Their Respective Authenticity Examined (1792). G. H. A. Ewald, "Ursprung und Wesen der Evangelien," JBW 1 (1848) 113-54; 2 (1849) 180-224; 3 (1850) 140-77; Die drei ersten Evangelien übersetzt und erklärt (1850) xviii-xix. W. R. Farmer, The Synoptic Problem: A Critical Analysis (1964); The Gospel of Jesus: The Pastoral Relevance of the Synoptic Problem (1994). B. Gerhardsson, Memory and Manuscript: Oral Tradition and Written Transmission in Rabbinic Judaism and Early Christianity (tr. E. J. Sharpe, ASNU 22, 1961); Tradition and Transmission in Early Christianity (ConNT 20, 1964; repr. with Memory and Manuscript, 1997); Origins of the Gospel Traditions (1979). J. K. L. Gieseler, Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung und die frühesten Schicksale der schriftlichen Evangelien (1818). J. J. Griesbach, Libri historici Novi Testamenti graece 1 (1774); Synopsis evangeliorum Matthaei, Marci, et Lucae (1776); Fontes unde evangelistae suas de resurrectione domini narrationes hauserint (1783; repr. in his Opuscula academica 2 [ed. J. P. Gabler, 1825]); Commentatio qua Marci evangelium totum e Matthaei et Lucae commentariis decerptum esse demonstratur (1789–90; repr. in Commentationes theologicae [ed. J. K. Velthusen, C. T. Kuihnoel, and G. A. Ruperti, 1794]; repr. in Griesbach's Opuscula academica 2 [ed. J. P. Gabler, 1825]; ET, J. J. Griesbach: Synoptic and Text Critical Studies [SNTSMS 34, 1978] 103-35). H. Grotius, Annotationes in libros evangeliorum (1641). J. G. Herder, Vom Erlöser der Menschen, nach unsern drei ersten Evangelien (CS 2, 1796) 149-233; Von Gottes Sohn, der Welt Heiland, nach Johannes Evangelium: Nebst einer Regel der Zusammenstimmung unserer Evangelien aus ihrer Entstehung und Ordnung (CS 3, 1797) 301-416. A. Hilgenfeld, "Die Evangelien und die geschichtliche Gestalt Jesu," ZWT 7 (1863) 311-40, esp. 311-27. H. J. Holtzmann, Die synoptischen Evangelien (1863). H. J. de Jonge, "Augustine on the Interrelations of the Gospels," The Four Gospels, 1992 (FS F. Neirynck, BETL 100, 3 vols., ed. F. Van Segbroeck et al., 1992) 3:2409-417. W. H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in Synoptic Tradition, Mark, Paul, and Q (1983). R. Kieffer, "Die Bedeutung der modernen Linguistik für die Auslegung biblischer Texte" TZ 30 (1974) 223-33. J. B. Koppe, Marcus non epitomator Matthaei (1782; repr. in Sylloge commentationum theologicarum [ed. D. J. Pott and G. A. Ruperti, 1800] 1:35-69). K. Lachmann, "De ordine narrationum in Evangeliis synopticis," TSK 8 (1835) 570-90 (partial ET in The Two-Source Hypothesis: A Critical Appraisal [1985] 123-39). G. E. Lessing, "New Hypothesis Concerning the Evangelists Regarded as Merely Human Historians" (1778; repr. in his Theologischer Nachlass [1784] 45-82; ET in Lessing's Theological Writings [ed. H. Chadwick, 1956] 65-81). T. R. W. Longstaff and A. Thomas, The Synoptic Problem: A Bibliography, 1716–1988 (New Gospel Studies 4, 1988). A. B. Lord, "The Gospels as Oral Traditional Literature," The Relationships Among the Gospels: An Interdisciplinary Dialogue (TUMS 5, 1978) 33-91. A. J. McNicol, D. L. Dungan, and D. B. Peabody (eds.), Beyond the Q Impasse: Luke's Use of Matthew. A Demonstration by the Research Team of the International Institute for Gospel Studies (1996). W. Marxsen, Mark the Evangelist (FRLANT 67, 1956; ET 1969). H. U.

Meyboom, A History and Critique of the Origin of the Marcan Hypothesis (1866; ET New Gospel Studies 8, ed. and tr. J. Kiwet, 1993). F. Neirynck, Duality in Mark (BETL 31, 1972); Minor Agreements of Matthew and Luke Against Mark with a Cumulative List (BETL 37, 1974). D. J. Neville, Arguments from Order in Synoptic Source Criticism: A History and Critique (New Gospel Studies 7, 1994). H. H. Oliver, "The Epistle of Eusebius to Carpianus: Textual Tradition and Translation," NovT 3 (1959) 138-145. B. Orchard, "The Historical Tradition," The Order of the Synoptics: Why Three Synoptic Gospels? (1987) 111-226. B. Orchard and T. R. W. Longstaff (eds.), J. J. Griesbach: Synoptic and Text-critical Studies, 1776–1976 (SNTSMS 34, 1978). H. Owen, Observations on the Four Gospels Tending Chiefly to Ascertain the Times of the Publication and to Illustrate the Form and Manner of Their Composition (1764); The Intent and Propriety of the Scripture Miracles Considered and Explained, in a Series of Sermons Preached in the Parish Church of St. Mary Le-Bow in the Years 1769, 1770, and 1771 (Boyle Lectures, 2 vols., 1773). N. H. Palmer, "Lachmann's Argument," NTS 13 (1967) 368-78. D. B. Peabody, "Augustine and the Augustinian Hypothesis: A Reexamination of Augustine's Thought in De consensu evangelistarum," New Synoptic Studies (ed. W. R. Farmer, 1983) 37-64; "Chapters in the History of the Linguistic Argument for Solving the Synoptic Problem: The Nineteenth Century in Context," Jesus, the Gospels, and the Church: Essays in Honor of W. R. Farmer (ed. E. P. Sanders, 1987) 47-68; "H. J. Holtzmann and His European Colleagues: Aspects of the Nineteenth-century European Discussion of Gospel Origins," Biblical Studies and the Shifting of Paradigms, 1850–1914 (ed. H. G. Reventlow and W. R. Farmer, JSOTSup 192, 1995) 50-131. B. Reicke, The Roots of the Synoptic Gospels (1986); "From Strauss to Holtzmann and Meijboom," NovT 29 (1987) 1-21. H. G. Reventlow and W. R. Farmer (eds.), Biblical Studies and the Shifting of Paradigms, 1850–1914 (JSOTSup 192, 1995). H. Riesenfeld, The Gospel Tradition and Its Beginnings (1957). J. Rohde, Rediscovering the Teaching of the Evangelists (1966; ET, NTL, 1968). P. Rolland, Les premiers évangiles: Un nouveau regard sur le probléme synoptique (LD 116, 1984). H. Rollmann, "Baron F. von Hügel and the Conveyance of German Protestant Biblical Criticism in Roman Catholic Modernism," Biblical Studies and the Shifting of Paradigms, 1850–1914 (1995) 197-222. E. P. Sanders and M. Davies, Studying the Synoptic Gospels (1989) 51-119. W. Sanday (ed.), Oxford Studies in the Synoptic Problem (1911). F. Schleiermacher, A Critical Essay on the Gospel of Luke (1817; ET 1825, repr. as Luke: A Critical Study [Schleiermacher Studies and Translations 13, 1993]); "Über die Zeugnisse des Papias von unsern ersten beiden Evangelien," TSK 5 (1832) 735-68. A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906; ET, 1910). R. Simon, A Critical History of the Text of the NT (1689; ET 1689) chaps. 7–9. R. H. Stein, The Synoptic Problem: An Introduction (1987). G. C. Storr, Ueber den Zweck der evangelischen Geschichte und der Briefe Johannis (1786) 274-307. D. F. Strauss, The Life of Jesus, Critically Examined (2 vols., 1835–36; ET, 3 vols., 1846, repr. with additional material, LJS, 1972). G. Strecker (ed.), Minor Agreements: Symposium Göttingen, 1991 (Göttinger theologische Arbeiten 50, 1993). B. H. Streeter, The Four Gospels: A Study of Origins (1924). F. A. Stroth, "Von Interpolationen im Evangelium Matthaei," RBML 9 (1781) 99-156. C. M. Tuckett, The Revival of the Griesbach Hypothesis: An Analysis and Appraisal (SNTSMS 44, 1983). L. Vaganay, La problème synoptique: Une hypothèse de travail (Bdt 3, 1, 1954); Jesus and the Oral Gospel Tradition (ed. H. Wansbrough, 1991). C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (2 vols., 1838) 56-87. C. G. Wilke, Der Urevangelist, oder, exegetisch kritische Untersuchung über das Verwandtschaftsverhältniss der drei ersten Evangelien (1838) 4-17, 656-91.

B. REICKE and D. B. PEABODY

T

TAEUBLER, EUGEN (1879–1953)

T. was one of the last great classical scholars produced by the symbiosis of German letters and traditional Jewish studies. Born in Hussite Gostyn (Posen) and reared in Lissa, he was trained in traditional Jewish texts before moving to the progressive Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums. At the University of Berlin he was influenced by Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, E. MEYER, and T. Mommsen, who took him as his assistant and whom he later succeeded. T.'s first contributions as a historian were done for Mommsen, for whom he edited the Codex Theodosianus and other texts, ultimately being responsible for producing the missing volume of Mommsen's Roman history. T. then published his Imperium Romanum (1913), which challenged some of Mommsen's conclusions, and a history of the second Punic war (1921), then turned to the field of biblical history. Before that, in 1906, he founded the Gesamtarchiv der deutschen Juden (1906) and divided his work between Jewish and classical studies, teaching at the Berlin Lehranstalt and also at the University of Berlin, in Zurich, and then from 1925 to 1935 as professor at Heidelberg, where he achieved the distinction of membership in its academy of sciences. When the Nazis took power, he returned to the Jewish Lehranstalt in Berlin, eventually escaping to Cincinnati and the Hebrew Union College. There he became professor of Hellenistic and biblical studies while his wife, the great historian and novelist S. Stern-Taeubler, became a research librarian at the same institution.

T.'s uniqueness rested in the broad span of his knowledge, which permitted him to be an outstanding lecturer and scholar in the fields of ancient, medieval, and modern history and to bring this knowledge to biblical texts. Striving for clarity, T. traced institutions to their earliest origins and had W. DILTHEY's perception for the Lebensbewusstsein within the social structure out of which these institutions emerged. Often T. dealt with the beginnings of a people, a constitution, an idea, or a state, as in "The Beginnings of Jewish Historiography" (1926), "Habiru-Ibhrim" (1950), "The First Mention of Israel" (1942), and "Terramare and Rome" (1932). After his death one volume of his biblical studies was published, which dealt with the period of the Judges. In it his sense for literature searched out the structure of the novella and moved beyond it to the biblical realities.

In his lectures at the Lehranstalt he attempted to make the rabbinic students in that harsh period confront the "tragic existence" of the Jew with an inbuilt tension and a self-imposed task that denies normality. He tried to link them to a prophetic vision and to a special mission. In his Cincinnati classes he presented Job as an existential text and made the prophets come to life by bringing all of European culture into the class, so that the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel became as relevant as the commentaries of RASHI and MAIMONIDES. His total knowledge of all classical texts and awareness of ancient history enabled him to place biblical history in a universal context, where it became part of a pattern that could be used to solve internal problems. T.'s erudition and breadth of knowledge have probably not been equaled in any modern scholar.

Works: Imperium Romanum (1913); Vorgeschichte des zweiten punischen Kriegs (1921); Tyche (1926); Biblische Studien: Die Epoche der Richter (1958).

Bibliography: A. H. Friedlander, "Umbra Vitae: Zum 10. Totestage E. T.s," Yearbook of the Leo Baeck Institute 3 (ed., S. Stern-Taeubler, 1958) 40-59.

A. H. FRIEDLANDER

TALMON, SHEMARYAHU (1920–)

Born in Skierniwice, Poland, in 1920, T. was reared in a Jewish-Zionist home. His childhood and youth were spent in Breslau (then Germany), where he attended gymnasium. In 1939 he emigrated to Israel and began his studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he received the MA (1945) and the PhD (1955). He attended a wide range of lectures but with concentration on HB and Hebrew language, SOCIOLOGY, and education. Among his renowned teachers were M. Segal, M. CASSUTO, N. Tur-Sinai (Torczyner), M. BUBER, and E. Simon. His dissertation was on doublets in the transmission of the biblical text. He taught at the Hebrew University from 1955 until his retirement in 1988. During his career he served as visiting professor at various universities (Brandeis, Haifa, Harvard), aided in founding and organizing new academic institutions, and played an active role in shaping Israeli higher education.

T.'s research and publication have focused primarily on three areas of biblical studies: TEXTUAL and LITERARY character of the HB, Jewish sects in Second Temple

Judaism (including the Samaritans and the Qumran community), and the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. His early work, already manifest in his doctoral dissertation, centered on the textual character of the various witnesses to the HB and the transition from literary and editorial dynamics to variants of the authoritative text. Studies of textual matters led to consideration of the literary and stylistic character of the HB. One of the first scholars to publish in Hebrew on the biblical narrative technique, he published a Hebrew brochure bearing his dissertation's title in 1965, excerpts of which appear in ET in The HB in Literary Criticism (ed. A. Preminger and E. Greenstein [1986] 28-30, 48-50, 137-38, 246-47, 366-68). He also contributed to Studies in Hebrew Narrative Art Throughout the Ages (SH 27 [1978] 9-26). In addition, he has discussed wisdom elements in late biblical books as well as biblical motifs and their use and development. Most of these studies are reprinted in his 1993 volume.

Preoccupation with the form of the biblical text and its transmission focused his attention on the late biblical books. He surveyed Ezra–Nehemiah, Chronicles, and Daniel in The Literary Guide to the Bible (ed. R. Alter and F. Kermode [1987] 343-72).

T. was well qualified to use the new data that became available with the discovery and publication of the Qumran scrolls. Several of his articles on textual studies as well as his synthetic survey of the OT text (CHB 1 [1970] 159-99) have been reprinted in the volume he edited with F. M. CROSS (1975).

Along with M. GOSHEN-GOTTSTEIN and C. Rabin, T. helped establish and direct the Hebrew University Bible Project, which aimed at publishing the HB text according to the eleventh-century Codex Aleppo, with full collation of variants culled from all the ancient witnesses: ancient Bible versions, Dead Sea Scrolls, rabbinic literature, and medieval HB manuscripts. The project was instrumental in forging the Jerusalem school of biblical textual criticism, characterized by a cautious and balanced approach to the transmitted biblical text, with attention to the grammatical, lexical, and exegetical aspects of its transmission. Between 1964 and 1982 T. edited Textus: Annual of the HB Project (vols. 4–10), an official publication created to publish side products of the work on the project. He was also one of the editors of The Book of Jeremiah (1997).

A second area of T.'s main research has been the social background and historical context of the Qumran community and other sects in Second Temple Judaism. His article on the emergence of Jewish sectarianism (repr. 1986) has become a foundational work in this area.

Perhaps best known is T.'s work on the Dead Sea Scrolls. Among the first Israeli scholars to take an interest in the recently discovered scrolls, he published an article arguing that the Qumran community followed a solar calendar (Biblica 32 [1951] 186-99). His views have been subsequently vindicated, especially by the various calendrical texts from Cave 4, which he is editing for official publication in the DJD series. In addition to his work on the scrolls from Qumran, T. has edited the textual fragments from Masada left unpublished by the excavator Y. YADIN.

Works: "Yom Hakippurim in the Habakkuk Scroll," Biblica 32 (1951) 186-99; "Doublets: A Fundamental Phenomenon in the Transmission of the Biblica Text" (Hebrew University of Jerusalem, 1957); "The Calendar Reckoning of the Sect from the Judaean Desert," Aspects of the Dead Sea Scrolls (ed. C. Rabin and Y. Yadin, ScrHier 4, 1958) 162-99; "Aspects of the Textual Transmission of the Bible in the Light of Qumran Manuscripts," Textus 4 (1964) 95-132 = Qumran and the History of the Biblical Text (ed. with F. M. Cross, 1975); "The 'Desert Motif' in Bible and in Qumran Literature," Biblical Motifs: Origins and Transformations (ed. A. Altmann, 1966) 31-63; "The Presentation of Synchroneity and Simultaneity in Biblical Narrative," Studies in Hebrew Narrative Art Throughout the Ages (ScrHier 27, ed., J. Heinemann and S. Werses, 1978) 9-26; (with J. Emanuel and K. Yaron), The Social and Religious Thought of M. Buber (1982), Hebrew; (ed. with A. Falaturi and W. Strolz), Zukunftshoffnung und Heilserwartung in den monotheistischen Religionen (1983); "The Emergence of Jewish Sectarianism in Early Second Temple Period," (repr. in King, Cult, and Calendar in Ancient Israel, 165-201; King, Cult, and Calendar in Ancient Israel: Collected Studies (1986); "Literary Motifs and Speculative Thought," Hebrew University Studies in Literature and the Arts 16 (1988) 150-68; "The Emergence of Institutionalized Prayer in Israel in the Light of the Qumran Literature," The World of Qumran from Within: Collected Studies (1989) 200-243; The HB in the Making: Form and Content. Collected Studies (1991), includes many of T.'s contributions in these areas; Jewish Civilization in the Helenistic-Roman Period (JSPSup 10, 1991); Literary Studies in the HB: Form and Content. Collected Studies (1993); (ed. with C. A. Evans), The Quest for Context and Meaning: Studies in Biblical Intertextuality in Honor of J. A. Sanders (Biblical Interpretation Series 18, 1997).

D. DIMANT

TALMUD

As conventionally understood, the Talmud consists of the Mishnah (compiled c. 220 CE) and the Talmud proper (also called the Gemara), consisting of the Palestinian Talmud (compiled c. 400 CE) and the Babylonian Talmud (compiled c. 500 CE). For the study of biblical interpretation in the Talmudic period (the first five centuries in Palestine and Babylon), however, the works known as the Midrashim (see MIDRASH), containing much material from the same period, must be referred to, since there are no basic differences between Talmud and Midrashim in the matter of interpretation. This article, consequently, considers biblical interpretation in the whole of the Talmudic literature.

1. Canonization and Authorship. The biblical books are divided into three sections: (a) the Torah, the Pentateuch; (b) the Neviim, the Prophets; and (c) the Ketuvim, the Hagiographa; hence the name Tanakh for the HB as a whole. The Torah, as the very Word of God to Moses, is the most sacred of the biblical books. The Prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), conceived of as the product of the intense form of divine INSPIRATION known as prophetic vision, is next in degree of sanctity. The Hagiographa, conceived of as the product of a lower degree of inspiration, that of ruaḥ ha-kodesh, "the Holy Spirit," is the least sacred of the three divisions of Scripture. Thus if a scroll of the Torah has been sold, the money may not be used to purchase a book of the Prophets or of the Hagiographa, for that would result in a diminuation of sanctity (m. Meg. 3:1).

The term used to denote that a book is sacred and belongs in the CANON (though this term is Christian and occurs nowhere in the Talmudic literature) is that it "contaminates the hands"—that is, the hands have to be ritually cleansed after having touched the book. The reason for this curious rule is, evidently, that a taboo was placed on a sacred book in order to prevent it being treated in an over-familiar manner. Long before the Talmudic period, the Torah and the Prophets had been accepted as sacred writ ("the Law and the Prophets"), but there were debates among the rabbis about the sanctity of some of the books in the third division, notably Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes (m. Yad. 3:5 and 4:5-6). It was eventually decided, however, that all the books of the Ketuvim do contaminate the hands.

The locus classicus for the order and authorship of the biblical books is in b. B. Bat. 14b-15a, where the order of the prophetic books is given as: Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, and The Twelve. The order of the Hagiographa is: Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra, and Chronicles. This makes a total of nineteen books (The Twelve counted as a single book). With the addition of the five books of the Torah, this makes a total of twenty-four sacred books, a number that appears frequently in the literature in this context.

The passage continues with a statement regarding the authorship of the books: "Moses wrote his book, the Pentateuch, the portion of Balaam (Numbers 23 and 24) and Job. Samuel wrote his book, Judges and Ruth. David wrote the book of Psalms using the work of ten elders, namely, Adam, Melchizedek, Abraham, Moses, Heman, Yeduthan, Asaph, and the three sons of Korah. Jeremiah wrote his book, the book of Kings, and Lamentations. Hezekiah and his associates wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes. The men of the Great Synagogue (the postexilic teachers) wrote Ezekiel, The Twelve, Daniel, and Esther. Ezra wrote his book and the genealogies to his own." This second-century source is supplemented in the same passage by editorial material probably dating from the late fifth century CE, which notes that the second-century source also states: "Joshua wrote his book and the last eight verses of the Torah" (Deut 34:5-11, dealing with Moses' death). It points out that R. Simeon (2nd cent.) disagreed and held that Moses wrote the last eight verses as well, but "with tears in his eyes" at the thought of his demise, and further states that the opinion that Moses wrote the book of Job is a minority opinion, with others holding that the book was compiled by a much later author whose identity is hard to determine. This is followed by a Midrash on Job in which a view is recorded that Job is not a historical person at all and that the book is a work of inspired fiction.

That Moses wrote the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) at the dictation of God is taken for granted thoughout the Talmudic literature. It must be appreciated that even the heretics in Talmudic times believed that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, although they maintained that he made it up out of his own head. The issue was not that of the Mosaic authorship; that was accepted by all, unbelievers as well as believers. The real, dogmatic question was whether the "Torah is from Heaven" (Sanh. 99a)—that is, whether it was Moses' own work or whether Moses acted simply as a scribe taking down the divine dictation. In a similar vein in another passage (t. Yad. 2:14, ed. M. Zuckermandel [1882] 683; and b. Meg. 7a), there is a debate on whether Ecclesiastes contaminates the hands. Those who held that it does believed that it was compiled by Solomon under the influence of the Holy Spirit. Those who held it does not were of the opinion that the work was not compiled under the influence of the Holy Spirit but is purely "the wisdom of Solomon." Both accepted without question that Solomon was the author of the book (although it was not actually written down by him). The dogmatic, doctrinal element in the Talmudic discussions regarding the authorship of the biblical books has to do with the question of inspiration, not with the very different question of who actually compiled the books and who recorded them in writing.

The statement that Moses wrote the Pentateuchal portion of Balaam seems odd since this is part of Moses' book in any event. The parallel passage in the Palestinian Talmud (Soṭa 5:6, 20a) puts it rather more clearly: "Moses wrote the five books of the Torah then he wrote the book of Balak and Balaam and then he wrote the book of Job." That the portion of Balaam is described as a separate book is no doubt because it is an account of the oracles of a prophet other than Moses, even though recorded by Moses in "his" book. All six books belong to the divinely dictated book of the Torah, unlike the book of Job, which even on the opinion that it was compiled by Moses possesses no more than the lesser degree of sanctity possessed by the Ketuvim. On the manner in which the Pentateuch was written, there was a debate (Git. 60a) between the early third-century teachers, R. Johanan and Resh Lakish, one holding that each part of the Torah was "given," i.e., dictated by God to Moses for him to record in writing at the time the events actually took place; the other holding that it was all dictated and written down toward the end of the forty-year journey through the wilderness.

The ten elders said to have contributed to the book of Psalms are either the persons mentioned in the superscriptions to certain psalms or those whose identity is arrived at by the application of the midrashic process. Thus Adam is "found" in Ps 139:16, "Thine eyes did see mine imperfect substance," referring to the clay from which Adam was formed. Melchizedek appears in Ps 110:4—'al divrātî malkhîṣedeq, read as "by my word, I, Melchizedek." To Moses is attributed Psalm 90 because of the superscription "A Prayer of Moses the man of God." As for Abraham, the Talmudic editors point to the midrashic identification of Ethan the Ezrahite with the patriarch Abraham in the superscription to Psalm 89. Heman appears in the superscription to Psalm 88; Yeduthan to Psalms 39, 61, and 72; Asaph to Psalms 50 and 73–83; the three sons of Korah to Psalms 42, 44, 48, 85, 87, and 88. That there are three sons of Korah is based on their identification with the three sons of Korah in the book of Exodus (6:24). The artificiality of all this and of a good deal of midrashic interpretation generally is startling until one realizes that it is intentionally homiletical. The statement about the ten elders on whose work David drew in his composition of the psalms is not intended as an established tradition or a real historical reconstruction. The aim is, rather, to discover in the book instances of the sacred number ten. The Midrash to Psalms (on Ps 1:6; ed. S. Buber [1891] 9) observes, "Just as the Psalms bear the names of ten authors, so do they bear the names of ten kinds of song."

Although it is acknowledged that the book of Psalms is of a composite nature, all the elders who are said to have contributed to the book lived before David. Throughout the Talmudic literature the possibility is accepted unquestioningly that there can be a prophetic telling of the future in detail. Thus David is held to be the author of Psalm 137, foretelling not only the destruction of the first Temple but also of the second (Git. 57b). The statement in one source (Midr. Eccl. Rab. 1:17) that Ezra is one of the ten elders is due in all probability to a scribal error (perhaps a confusion with Ethan the Ezrahite who, in fact, is not mentioned in the list of the ten given in this Midrash).

Throughout the Talmudic literature, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs are the words of Solomon, i.e., he was the author of the inspired words, although the books were not recorded in writing by him but by Hezekiah and his associates. This is obviously based on the title of Proverbs 25: "These are the proverbs, which the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah, copied down."

2. Halakhic Interpretation. Halakhah is that branch of teaching dealing with the law in all its ramifications. Aggadah consists of the non-legal side—preachments, theology, ethics, history, FOLKLORE, science, medicine, and so forth. Talmudic-midrashic interpretation of the Bible is twofold: (a) halakhic, the drawing out of rules and regulations from biblical texts, mainly from the Pentateuch and (b) aggadic, the use of the Bible to convey more general ideas and teachings on the conduct of life. The halakhic interpretation predominates. It is more hard and fast, far more categorical than the is fluid aggadic interpretation, which is more poetry than prose, often a reading into the text rather than real exegesis.

Halakhic exegesis proceeds by the application of hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) known as middot, "measures." Seven of these are attributed to HILLEL in the first century BCE (Sipra, Introduction 1:7), and these were extended to thirteen by R. ISHMAEL in the second century CE (Sipra, Introduction 1-6). Behind these principles is the idea that all parts of the Pentateuch, the written Torah (in contradistinction to the oral Torah, the traditional interpretation of the former), form a unified whole, so that it is possible to draw out its fullest implications by careful examination of each word and by comparing what is said in one portion with what is said in another.

Of R. Ishmael's thirteen principles, the ones chiefly employed throughout the Talmudic literature are kal va-ḥomer; gezerah shavah; and kelal u-ferat. The Kal va-ḥomer (lit. from the light to the severe) is the argument from the minor to the major, and its use is found by the rabbis in the Bible itself (Midr. Gen. Rab. 92:7, referring to Gen 44:8; Exod 6:12; Deut 31:27; 1 Sam 23:3; Jer 12:5; Ezek 15:5). For example, Deut 31:27 states that the corpse of a criminal executed by the court must not be left on the gibbet overnight, which R. Meir (2nd cent.) took to mean that God is distressed at the criminal's death. Hence this teacher argued, "If God is troubled at the shedding of blood of the ungodly, how much more (kal va-ḥomer) at the blood of the righteous" (m. Sanh. 6:5). This is a halakhic use of the argument, "If priests, who are not disqualified from serving in the Temple by reason of age, are disqualified by reason of bodily defects [Lev 21:16-21], then Levites who are disqualified by reason of age [Num 8:24-25] are certainly disqualified by reason of bodily defects" (Ḥul. 24a).

The gezerah shavah (similar expression) means that if the same or a similar word occurs in two separate passages, then any elaboration found in one of the passages can be applied to the other. For example, the word bemô'ădô (in its appointed time) is used both in connection with the perpetual offering (Num 18:2) and with regard to the paschal lamb (Num 9:2). Now of the former it is stated explicitly that it has to be offered even on the sabbath, when work is forbidden; and this demonstrates that the term bĕmô'adô denotes "even on the sabbath," yielding the rule that if the day when the paschal lamb is to be offered falls on the sabbath, it must be offered on that day (Pesaḥ. 66a).

Kelal u-ferat (general and particular) denotes that if a law is first stated in general terms and then specific instances are given, the law embraces only those instances. "Ye shall bring an offering of the cattle, even of the herd and flock" (Lev 1:2). Even though the term cattle might have included non-domesticated cattle, these are excluded by the particular instances that follow the general rule, only "from the herd and the flock" (Sipra, Introduction). Perat u-kelal (particular and general), on the other hand, means that where a specific instance is followed by a general statement, it is all-inclusive, e.g., "if a man deliver unto his neighbor an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast . . . " (Exod 22:10). Here the general statement "or any beast" follows on the statement of the particulars, so that beasts other than those specified are also included (Sipra, Introduction).

A combination of the above two principles is kelal u-ferat u-kelal (general, particular, general). Here the rule is: You may derive other things than those specified but only if they resemble those specified. "Thou shalt bestow the money for whatsoever thy soul desireth [general], for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink [particular], or for whatsoever thy soul asketh of thee [general]" (Deut 14:26). Other things than those specified may be purchased but only if they are items of foods and drink like those specified, garments being excluded (Sipra, Introduction).

Frequently, new laws are derived by logical extension of the laws stated. For example, the law that a man is responsible for damage done by his pit (Exod 21:33-34) is extended to include his responsibility for damage done by a stone he has placed where it can do damage; or the law that a man is responsible for damage done by a fire that spreads from his field (Exod 22:5) is extended to damage done by an object that fell from his roof (B. Qam. 2b-5b). The prohibition of placing a stumbling block in front of a blind man (Lev 19:14) is extended to one who gives another bad advice (Sipra to the verse); to giving wine to a Nazirite (Pesaḥ. 22b), and to hitting a grownup son who might be tempted to retaliate (Mo'ed Qaṭ. 17a).

The method of deriving laws through the type of biblical exegesis mentioned above is known as a derashah or a Midrash (both from the root darash, "to search, to inquire"). A major problem, much discussed by modern scholars (see H. Albeck [1959]; I. Heinemann [1976]; D. Weiss-Halivni [1986]), is which came first, the halakhah, the particular law, or the midrash or derashah on which it is said to be based. Did the rabbis really derive the law from their close examination of Scripture, or did the law develop independently, the derashah being no more than an attempt to find scriptural support for what had been developed? In many instances it is obvious that the law came first. For instance, one of the plants to be used in worship during the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23:40) is described as "the fruit of hadar," a word of uncertain meaning. The Talmud (Sukk. 35a) gives a number of extremely far-fetched attempts at proving, by the application of midrashic method, that the etrog, the citron, is meant. Yet there was a tradition that it is the citron long before any of the attempts at proving it were made. On the other hand, the derashah does seem to be the actual source of the law in the many instances where debates on what the law is depend on the different ways of understanding the scriptural verse.

3. Aggadic Interpretation. The main feature to be noted of aggadic interpretation of Scripture is the effort to apply the texts to the contemporary scene. Like preachers everywhere, the rabbis used the Bible to convey what they believed the people they were addressing needed to hear in the particular circumstances in which they found themselves. Eisegesis, rather than exegesis, is at work in aggadic interpretation. Ideas are often read into a text with not the slightest suggestion that this is what the text really means. MAIMONIDES (Guide 3.43.573) saw this feature when he referred to the Talmudic interpretation (Ketub. 5a) of the verse: "And thou shalt have a peg [yātēd] upon thy weapon ['ăzēnekā]" (Deut 23:14). The comment reads the word 'ăzēnekā as if it were 'oznekā (thine ear). The "peg" is further taken to be the peg-shaped finger, yielding the thought "If a man hears an unworthy matter let him plug his ears with his fingers." Maimonides, followed by the majority of modern scholars, saw this type of Midrash as poetic fancy, "a witty conceit by which to instill some noble, moral quality."

Yet in addition to this ubiquitous poetic element, the Talmudic aggadah allows itself great freedom in the belief that Scripture, in its richness as the Word of God, can have levels of meaning other than the plain surface meaning. In the school of R. Ishmael it was taught (Sanh. 34a): " 'Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?' (Jer 23:29). Just as the rock is split into many splinters so also one biblical verse may convey many teachings." In this Midrash the Word of the Lord is identified with the text of Scripture, and this leads to its extension to the students of the Torah who peruse God's Word. "Rava said, 'If a young scholar flies into a rage it is because the Torah inflames him, as it is said: "Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord" ' " (Ta'an. 4a). Similarly, the verse "Ho, everyone that thirsteth come ye for water" (Isa 55:1) is made to yield the thought that the Torah is compared to water to teach that just as water flows from a higher to a lower level so also the words of Torah only endure in one who is meek (Ta'an. 7a). And once the verse in Isaiah has been interpreted to identify water with the Torah, the midrashic authors allowed themselves homiletical license to interpret every reference in Scripture to water as applying to the Torah, even if to do this is to take a verse entirely out of context. "And they went three days in the wilderness and found no water" (Exod 15:22) is interpreted to mean that when the people go for three days without hearing the reading of the Torah in the synagogue, they become exhausted (B. Qam. 82a). Again, since the verse says, "The waters wear away the stones" (Job 14:19), and since "water" refers to the Torah, the thought emerges that the way to overcome the stony heart is to engage in the study of the Torah (Qidd. 30b).

By the Talmudic period, the doctrine of the hereafter, on which the Bible is comparatively silent, had become so thoroughly developed and accepted in rabbinic Judaism that it was natural for the rabbis to read it into the biblical verses. The verse "Thou makest darkness and it is night; wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth" (Ps 104:20) is made to refer to this world of darkness, where the wicked pursue their nefarious schemes. A following verse (v. 23): "Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening" is made to refer to the righteous, who are given the reward of eternal bliss after their life on earth has come to its close (B. Meṣ. 83b).

From the examples quoted, and they could easily be multiplied many times, it can be seen that the aggadic teachers treated the biblical verses piecemeal, as it were, using the texts in isolation in a consciously fanciful way to suit their purposes. In this, although each aggadist had his own individual application of the ideas, certain key concepts are used by all of them—e.g., "water is Torah." Thus everywhere in the literature the divine name Elohim is made to refer to God's judgment, while the Tetragrammaton, YHWH, is made to refer to God's mercy. For example, the change from Elohim in the first chapter of Genesis to YHWH in the second is explained (Gen. Rab. 12:15) on the basis of the idea that God created the world in his quality of judgment but then added the quality of mercy that the world might endure. Everywhere, too, "wisdom" in the book of Proverbs refers to "the wisdom of the Torah," and the Song of Songs is seen as a dialogue between God and the community of Israel.

Religious polemics is also a prominent feature of aggadah. For instance, while the plural form is used in the verse "Let us make man" (Gen 1:26), the next verse, "And God created man in His image," is in the singular in order to refute any dualistic notions (Sanh. 38b). A dualist, quoting the verse "For lo, He that formeth the mountains and He that createth the wind" (Amos 4:13), said to R. Judah the Prince, "He who created the mountains did not create the wind." "Fool," replied the rabbi, "look to the end of the verse: 'The Lord of Hosts is His name' " (Ḥul. 87a). The third-century Palestinian teacher, R. Abbahu, evidently preaching against both dualistic philosophies and Christian doctrine, quoted the verse "I am the first, I am the last, and beside Me there is no God" (Isa 44:6) and commented: "I am the first, for I have no father; I am the last, for I have no son; and beside Me there is no God, for I have no brother" (Exod. Rab. 29:5). In all this there is without doubt a background of actual debates between the rabbis and those they considered to be engaging in heretical interpretation of Scripture.

Bibliography: H. Albeck, Mevo la-Mishnah (1959) 3-62. S. Buber (ed.), Midrash Psalms (1891). H. Danby (tr.), The Mishnah (1933). I. Epstein (ed. and tr.), The Babylonian Talmud (1948). M. Friedmann (ed.), Sifre (1864). D. W. Halivni, Peshat and Derash: Plain and Applied Meaning in Rabbinic Exegesis (1990). I. Heinemann, Darkhe ha-Agadah (1976). J. Heinemann, Aggadot ve-toledotehen (1974). I. Jacobs, The Midrashic Process (1995). L. Jacobs, "Hermeneutics," EncJud 8 (1971) 366-72. N. Krochmal, Moreh nevukhey ha-zeman in Kitve Rabi Nahman Krochmal: Arukhim 'al yede Shimòn Ravidovitz (ed. S. Ravidovitsh, 1961) 189-256. Krotoschin (ed.), The Palestinian Talmud (1866). S. Lieberman, Hellenism in Jewish Palestine: Studies in the Literary Transmission, Beliefs, and Manners of Palestine in the First Century (1950) 47-82. R. Loewe, "The 'Plain' Meaning of Scripture in Early Jewish Exegesis," Papers of the Institute of Jewish Studies, London (ed. J. G. Weiss, 1964) 140-85. Maimonides, The Guide of the Perplexed (tr. S. Pines, 1963). G. F. Moore, Judaism in the First Centuries of the Christian Era: The Age of Tannaim (1958) 161-78, 235-50. J. Roth, DMA 11 (1988) 583-87. J. Schachter, The Students' Guide Through the Talmud by Z. H. Chajes (1952). H. L. Strack, Introduction to the Talmud and Midrash (1982[7]; ET 1996[2]). Vilna (ed.), Midrash Rabbah (1911); (ed.), The Babylonian Talmud (1922). I. H. Weiss (ed.), Sifra (1863). D. Weiss-Halivni, Midrash, Mishnah, and Gemara: The Jewish Predilection for Justified Law (1986). M. S. Zuckermandel (ed.), Tosefta (1882).

L. JACOBS

TANY, THOMAS (fl. 1649–55)

A goldsmith from Eltham, Surrey, T. proclaimed himself prophet (under the name Theauraujon), scribe, priest, and king of the Jews. Believing that God had commanded him to gather together the lost tribes of Israel and lead them back to Jerusalem, he died at sea on a voyage to meet the Jews in Amsterdam. T. also believed that in seven days God had told him how to translate the Bible properly and had given him all the oriental languages in their uncorrupted forms, even the original language spoken by Adam and Eve in Paradise. In consequence, his own writings are a remarkable visionary attempt to write the languages of Adam and of God. His words make little or no grammatical sense, but they are instructive examples of an early modern autodidactic, eclectic comprehension of the relationship between human and divine languages.

Works: The Nations Right in Magna Charta Discussed with the Thing Called Parliament, with Other Writings (ed. A. Hopton, 1988).

Bibliography: D. S. Katz, Philo-Semitism and the Readmission of the Jews to England, 1603–55 (1982). N. Smith, Perfection Proclaimed: Language and Literature in English Radical Religion, 1640–60 (1989).

N. SMITH

TARGUMIM

Targumim is the plural (and Hebraized) form of the Aramaic noun targum, which means simply "translation." As a result of the diaspora and of Persian domination, Aramaic became the lingua franca of Judaism; and scriptural rendering into that language became convenient and for many Jews increasingly necessary. The actual shape of Targumim between the Persian and Herodian periods, however, is a matter of conjecture. Such written documents as are presently attested cannot be dated until after the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, and the vast majority of extant manuscripts are much later than that.

Aramaic renderings of Leviticus and Job have been discovered among the DEAD SEA SCROLLS (in caves 4 and 11), but they do not present those paraphrastic explanations, composed for the purpose of worship in synagogues, that are programmatically a part of the classical Targumim (J. Fitzmyer [1979] 167-75). According to a haggadah contained in b. Šabb. 115a, Gamaliel ordered a written Aramaic version of Job buried within a construction of the Temple during the period of its Herodian extension. Whether, as has been conjectured, that document may be identified with 11QtgJob, the story may provide confirmation of the rabbinic ethos of the early period, according to which Targumim were to be promulgated in synagogues orally from memory, not from written scrolls (cf. m. Meg. 4:4-10, with b. Meg. 23b-25b and D. Barthélemy [1963] 151-52).

Equally, the story about Gamaliel indicates that the rabbis were familiar with precisely those materials they formally proscribed. They actively sought to regulate how Scripture was translated (see TRANSLATION), as in the case of Lev 18:21; m. Meg. 4:9 states that this verse should not be related to intercourse with Gentiles, a proscription Pseudo-Jonathan (described below) violates. The rabbis even sought to prevent the rendering of certain passages, like the reference to Reuben's taking his father's concubine (see Meg. 4:10 and Gen 35:22; and for a discussion of both examples of the apparent contradiction of the Mishnah by the Targumim, M. McNamara [1966] 46-51). However great their efforts may have been, other forces seem to have been greater: All extant Targumim to the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) render the offending verse, although Tg. Neofiti I (also characterized below) does so in a truncated fashion, perhaps out of a partial deference to the Mishnaic prescription.

Sipre (Deuteronomy 161) describes Targum as a discipline between Bible and Mishnah, and many of the existing versions uphold this conclusion. The rabbis granted that Targumim were to be used in synagogal meetings but insisted they should be oral, and they developed guidance for their formulation. On the other hand, they refered appreciatively to the written Targum to the Pentateuch, known as Onqelos, as "our Targum" (e.g., b. Qidd. 49a) and so conspire in the abrogation of their own halakhah. If nothing else is clear in targumic study, the pluralism of early and rabbinic Judaism at least becomes apparent beyond any reasonable contradiction.

The rabbis refer to Targumim as already being produced by Ezra and describe the author of the Targum of the Prophets as taught by Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi (b. Meg. 3a). The first claim is evidently anachronistic, since no extant Targum dates from the period of Ezra, but it does suggest that the perception of the antiquity of the Targumim influenced their reception as authoritative (or at least as quotable). The second claim is patently anachronistic, since the author of the Targum of the Prophets is said in the same haggadah to have been Jonathan ben Uzziel, a first-century rabbi. The haggadah may be referring, with its apparently inept CHRONOLOGY, to the quasi-prophetic authority of the work, which sometimes offers considerable expansions of its Hebrew Vorlage among other substantive deviations. Whatever their directly historical value, such haggadoth serve to illustrate the rabbinic understanding that the practice of explaining Scripture in synagogue is warranted by Scripture itself, as in the case of Ezra (cf. Neh 8:8, cited in Meg. 3a), and that targumic authority was not merely a function of rabbinic authority but was in some sense prior to it. It is notable that in the present haggadah after Jonathan translates the Prophets, a divine voice says, "Who has revealed my secrets to the sons of men?" The Targumim appear to have carried considerable weight even as they skirted the boundaries of what it is prudent to say in the name of Scripture; they might be partially tamed, but neither complete domestication nor suppression appears to have been practicable.

1. Targumim to the Pentateuch. The Targum called Onqelos after its putative author appears best to represent the rabbinic ideal for the practice of the meturge- man (the Aramaic term for interpreter). Its most obvious feature is its relatively faithful representation of the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch once allowance is made for the usual, paraphrastic efforts of all Targumim to speak of God and divine revelation with due reverence. It was once argued that Tg. Onqelos did not emerge as an authoritative Targum in Palestine until as late as 1000 CE (M. Black [1978] 18), but the discovery of Aramaic documents at Qumran, Naḥal Ḥever, Murabba'at, and elsewhere (Fitzmyer [1979] 57-84) has brought about a revolution in the study of Aramaic dialects. The idiom of Onqelos now appears much more primitive than was once supposed, and it has been suggested that the Targum is as early as the second century. There was clearly a concerted effort by rabbis at that time to standardize translations according to the emerging Hebrew text, as is shown in revisions of the SEPTUAGINT (Aquila, Theodotion, and the fragments of the Minor Prophets found at Murabba'at; cf. Barthélemy [1963] 163-270). On the other hand, that was also a period in which the orality of Targumim was insisted upon; a dating of Onqelos in the third century has therefore seemed more plausible to many scholars. Such a dating would also accord with the considerable interest displayed in targumic matters by rabbis of that period (B. Grossfeld [1971] 841-44).

The Targum known as Neofiti I after the library in the Vatican where it was discovered (miscataloged) by A. Díez Macho presents a very different profile (Díez Macho 6 [1968–79] 1:19-20). Although it corresponds in a formal way to its Hebrew Vorlage, Neofiti I paraphrases and offers considerable expansions, often of a haggadic nature. It is written in a dialect of Aramaic known as Palestinian, comparable to the language reflected in the Palestinian (or Jerusalem) TALMUD. Once dated as early as the second century BCE, the newer understanding of dialects would place it in the third century of our era, contemporaneous with Onqelos but produced nearer Tiberias than Babylon. In it the figure of Cain denies the resurrection, judgment, and divine justice overall (Gen 4:8) in a manner reminiscent of the rabbinic perception of heterodoxy (J. Bassler [1986] 56-64). Such considerations support the later dating of the document, which in any case (like Onqelos) is not attested textually until well after the Talmudic period.

Targum Pseudo-Jonathan is the last of the complete Targums to the Pentateuch. Its mention in Gen 21:21 of Muhammed's wife and daughter (under the names Adesha and Fatima; see R. LeDéaut [1978] 211) provides a rather obvious terminus post quem for the document as a whole. (It owes its curious name to the belief that an abbreviation for "Jerusalem" [its proper name] was misunderstood for "Jonathan," the supposed author of the Targum of the Prophets. But the name Jonathan has been used since the document became known in the medieval period, and so the designation has lived on, albeit in its amended form.) Also to be associated with Pseudo-Jonathan and of somewhat later periods (between the 7th and the 11th cents.) are the fragments from the Cairo Geniza (M. Klein [1986]). Last, the Fragmentary Targum is not a fragmentary version of an original whole but a collection of occasional alternatives cited during the Middle Ages and of the same expansionistic nature of Neofiti I, Pseudo-Jonathan, and the fragments from the Cairo Geniza (Klein [1980] 1:12-42). Indeed, these Targumim are so closely related to one another that their relationship sometimes appears synoptic, and in view of their common traits (both linguistic and substantive) they are styled "Palestinian Targumim."

2. Targumim to the Prophets. The Prophets, both former and latter, are ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, the disciple of the elder HILLEL. Linguistically that attribution is not impossible, since Jonathan has close affinities with Onqelos. But in addition to the caution expressed in respect to dating the latter Targum, certain factors demand an even greater skepticism. As has long been recognized (see Z. Frankel [1872] 13-16), certain dialectical features of Tg. Jonathan (in constrast to Onqelos) present an affinity with Pseudo-Jonathan. Moreover, although the former prophets in Jonathan sometimes approximate to Onqelos in a formal correspondence to the Hebrew text, there is also a greater freedom in offering explanatory additions. In the case of the latter prophets, Jonathan becomes paraphrastic and expansionistic, and unevenly so. This uneven development is such that each Targum within Jonathan must be dated separately according to its exegetical and thematic interests as these can be correlated with rabbinic literature (B. Chilton [1982]). The Talmud ascribes targumic activity to Joseph bar Ḥiyya, the fourth-century sage of Pumbeditha, a plausible period for the collection as a whole. The Codex Reuchlinianus to Jonathan (and a newly identified manuscript in the Bibliotheque Nationale; Chilton [1997]) represents expansionistic versions from the medieval period that serve a function analogous to that of the Fragmentary Targum to the Pentateuch.

3. Targumim to the Writings. Targumim to the Writings are even less coherent than Jonathan. In the case of Psalms they appear more midrashic (see MIDRASH) than targumic, and Proverbs is widely held to have been retroverted from the Syriac of the PESHITTA (M. Goshen-Gottstein [1983] xix). Contemporary study of these documents may well alter scholarly assessment, but they appear to reflect the late, almost esoteric vogue for targumic production as represented in the Fragmentary Targum and in Codex Reuchlinianus. Ironically, the genre of Targum, which had initially been designed for general consumption and was influenced by folk usage of Scripture, became the appropriate milieu of academic play for the simple reason that Aramaic had been supplanted by Arabic and survived as an academic tongue.

4. Use in Biblical Interpretation. Once the purposes, dates, and exegetical tendencies of the Targumim are appreciated, their usefulness in biblical interpretation becomes evident. In the first place, there is no question of any extant Targum providing immediate access to a more primitive HB than we would otherwise know. Because most of them do not undertake the direct representation of a Hebrew Vorlage, immediate retroversion from Aramaic to Hebrew by textual critics is less likely to provide a primitive text than an artifact of modern erudition. Nonetheless, once the characteristics of a Targum are known, it may be of use in assessing the Hebrew text presupposed by it. In any case, every Targum does directly represent some community's understanding of Scripture. The nature of a particular Targum is cognate to its function for reading in synagogue, reflection in rabbinic discussion, esoteric speculation, or some combination of the three. To that extent Targumim are useful sources of the history of scriptural interpretation within Judaism. Indeed, their relatively straightforward format as translations of familiar texts makes them more accessible to most non-expert readers than are the Midrashim, Talmud, and Mishnah. A project to publish all extant Targumim in English is now nearly completed and may promote a more general understanding of and sympathy for the place of Scripture in early and rabbinic Judaism.

In recent years increasing attention has focused on the Targumim from the perspective of understanding the NT (see McNamara). Although the thesis of a coherent pre-Christian version of the Bible in Aramaic available in the Palestinian witnesses has been put to rest, the fact remains that certain readings from extant Targumim are strikingly similar to passages in the NT. Examples from JESUS' sayings include Luke 6:36, which is comparable to Tg. Ps.-J. Lev 22:28, and Mark 4:11-12, which appears to reflect an understanding of Isa 6:9-10 such as Jonathan preserves (Chilton [1984] 44, 90-98). Even an elementary knowledge of targumic development precludes any argument that Jesus and/or his followers had actual access to the documents we can read today. On the other hand, it is even more difficult to sustain the argument that the meturgemanim (Aramaic, interpreter) simply appropriated Christian teaching. Rather, it would appear that the Targumim took shape over so long a period that they sporadically preserve early Jewish materials from the first century. Sometimes they are of a proverbial nature and may have been unattached to any Targum originally, as may be the case in Tg. Ps.-J. Lev 22:28. But on other occasions, as in Mark 4:11-12, the NT accords with targumic readings as a rendering of the HB. In such instances it is all but impossible to resist the argument that Jonathan at least partially reflects the appropriation of Scripture in the first century, whatever else it may do.

Among the latest developments in the study of the Targumim, two may be singled out (see Chilton [1986] 1-14). The first is that in rendering the Scripture into Aramaic the meturgemanim gave voice to the theology of their day; here is open reference to the messiah, the kingdom of God, the Holy Spirit, PROPHECY, the covenant, the Temple, and other central concepts of interest equally to scholars of Judaism and of early Christianity. The second, related, development is that attention is now being given to the fact that the Targumim present their theologies as construals of the meaning of Scripture. They give us direct access to the manner in which Scripture was appropriated, transformed, and conveyed to others in a way that might prove to be of vital significance in appreciating how the HB and the NT were understood by the many communities that used them.

Bibliography: D. Barthélemy, Les devanciers d'Aquila: Première publication intégrale du texte des fragments du Dodécaprophéton trouvés dans le désert de Juda. . . . (VTSup 10, 1963). J. M. Bassler, "Cain and Abel in the Palestinian Targums: A Brief Note on an Old Controversy," JSJ 17 (1986) 56-64. B. D. Chilton, The Glory of Israel: The Theology and Provenience of the Isaiah Targum (JSOTSup 23, 1982); A Galilean Rabbi and His Bible: Jesus' Use of the Interpreted Scripture of His Time (1984); Targumic Approaches to the Gospels: Essays in the Mutual Definition of Judaism and Christianity (1986); The Isaiah Targum (The Aramaic Bible, 1987); " 'HEBR. 75' in the Bibliothèque Nationale," Targum Studies. M. Black, "Aramaic Studies and the Language of Jesus," In Memoriam P. Kahle (BZAW 103, 1978) 17-28. E. G. Clarke et al., Targum Pseudo-Jonathan of the Pentateuch: Text and Concordance (1984). A. Díez Macho, Neophyti 1: Targum Palestinense MS de la Biblioteca Vaticana (6 vols., 1968–79). J. W. Etheridge, The Targums of Onqelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel on the Pentateuch with the Fragments of the Jerusalem Targum from the Chaldee (1862, repr. 1968). J. A. Fitzmyer, "The First-century Targum of Job from Qumran Cave XI," A Wandering Aramean: Collected Aramaic Essays (SBLMS 25, 1979) 161-82; "The Phases of the Aramaic Language," ibid., 57-84. Z. Frankel, Zu den Targum der Propheten (1872). M. Goshen-Gottstein, Fragments of Lost Targumim, pt. 1 (1983). B. Grossfeld, "Bible. Translations. Ancient Versions. Aramaic: The Targumim," EncJud 4 (1971) 842-51. D. Harrington and A. J. Saldarini, Targum Jonathan of the Former Prophets (The Aramaic Bible, 1987). C. T. R. Hayward, The Targum of Jeremiah (The Aramaic Bible, 1987). M. L. Klein, "Nine Fragments of Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch from the Cairo Geniza (Additions to MS A)," HUCA 50 (1979) 149-64; The Fragment-Targums of the Pentateuch According to Their Extant Sources (2 vols., AnBib 76, 1980); Geniza Manuscripts of Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch (1986). R. LeDéaut, Targum du Pentateuque: Traduction des deux recensions palestiniennes complètes avec introduction, parallèles, notes et index (SC, 1978), a continuing series. S. H. Levey, The Targum of Ezekiel (The Aramaic Bible, 1987). M. McNamara, The NT and the Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch (AnBib 27, 1966); Targum and Testament, Aramaic Paraphrases of the HB: A Light on the NT (1972). A. Sperber, The Bible in Aramaic Based on Old Manuscripts and Printed Texts (5 vols., 1959–73).

B. CHILTON

TATIAN (d. c. 185)

Little is known about T. except for a few biographical notes in his only extant work Oratio ad Graecos and occasional references in the early church fathers. He was born in "the land of the Assyrians," perhaps east of the Euphrates River, but more likely in Syria. While exploring various philosophical schools, he became a Christian after reading the SEPTUAGINT. In Rome he became a student of JUSTIN MARTYR; however he was forced out of the Roman Christian community (c. 172) because of Encratite and GNOSTIC tendencies. He returned to the East, but nothing more is known about him other than that his influence was great in the region.

T.'s significance in the history of biblical study is due to the fact that he produced the first influential harmony of the four Gospels. Although reference is made to harmonies produced by Ammonius of Alexandria and by Justin, it was only T.'s Diatessaron ("through four [Gospels]"), or Diapente ("through five [Gospels]"), as it was once denoted in the sixth century, that had important influence and has survived in significant witnesses. No copy of the work, probably originally written in Syriac, survives; but important witnesses to it exist. The most important is the commentary on it by EPHRAEM THE SYRIAN (d. 373), which survives entire in an ARMENIAN version (pub. by L. Leloir in CSCO 137, 145, 1953–54) and partially in Syriac (Leloir [1963, 1987]); but witnesses to the text "range in genre from poems to commentaries, in language from Middle Dutch to Middle Persian, in extent from fragments to codices, in date from the third to nineteenth century, in provenance from England to China" (W. Petersen [1990] 408).

In the harmony, T. combined the four Gospels so as to remove duplications, reconcile contradictions, and integrate slightly differing parallel passages. The work constitutes the most extensive and earliest collection of second-century Gospel texts known, illustrates the prominence the four Gospels had in the second century, affords insight into how the four Gospels were being harmonized at the time, and is perhaps the earliest of the NT versions. Evidence in the witnesses indicates that T. had access to either an apocryphal gospel or to early non-biblical traditions of Jewish-Christian origin. He relied heavily on the Gospel of Matthew, but apparently the harmony lacked any reference to the genealogies of Jesus or to the account of the ascension. The work remained standard in the Syriac church until replaced in the fifth century by the PESHITTA translation through the influence of Rabbula of Edessa.

Bibliography: T. Baarda, Early Transmission of the Words of Jesus: Thomas, T., and the Text of the NT (1983). L. Leloir (ed. and tr.), S. Éphrem, Commentaire de l'Évangile concordant: Texte syriaque (MS Chester Beatty 709, 1963); Éphrem de Nisibe, Commentaire de l'Évangile concordant ou Diatessaron (SC 121, 1966); "Le Commentaire d'Éphrem sur le Diatessaron, Quarante et un folios retrouvés," RB 94 (1987) 481-518. B. M. Metzger, "T.'s Diatessaron and a Persian Harmony of the Chapters," Chapters in the History of NT Textual Criticism (B. M. Metzger, NTTS 4, 1963) 42-72; The Early Versions of the NT (1977) 10-36. G. F. Moore, "T.'s Diatessaron and the Analysis of the Pentateuch," JBL 9 (1890) 201-15. W. L. Petersen, The Diatessaron and Ephrem Syrus as Sources of Romanos the Melodist (CSCO 475, 1985); "New Evidence for the Question of the Original Language of the Diatessaron," Studien zum Text und zur Ethik des Neuen Testaments (FS H. Greeven, ed. W. Shrage, BZNW 47, 1986) 325-43; "T.'s Diatessaron," Ancient Christian Gospels: Their History and Development (H. Koester, 1990) 403-30; T.'s Diatessaron: Its Creation, Dissemination, Significance, and History in Scholarship (VCSup 25, 1994). M. Whittaker (ed. with intro.), Oratio ad Graecos and Fragments (Oxford Early Christian Texts, 1982).

J. H. HAYES

TAYLOR, JEREMY (1613–67)

An English theologian, T. was educated at Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, was a fellow of All Soul's, Oxford, and was chaplain to Archbishop Laud and to Charles I. He was influenced by W. CHILLINGWORTH, J. Hales (1584–1656), and J. Daillé (1594–1670). After imprisonment during the civil war, T. became bishop of Down and Connor and vice-chancellor of the University of Dublin. He died Aug. 13, 1667.

In The Liberty of Prophesying (1647) T. argued for religious toleration. He held that the necessary articles of faith are summarized in the Apostles' Creed and are plainly set down in Scripture. Apart from those few fundamental points, Scripture leaves people uncertain about religious truth. There are no infallible methods of interpretation. Other authorities, such as tradition, the church fathers, and general councils, are of no help. Human beings must judge by reason illuminated by faith, using the best evidence available. In his other writings, however, T. relied heavily on the AUTHORITY of Scripture and on "universal tradition."

T. influenced a wide variety of people. J. WESLEY was impressed by the deep piety and faith shown in Holy Living (1650) and Holy Dying (1651). A. COLLINS used T.'s views about the uncertainty of religious truth to claim that all of Scripture is uncertain.

Works: The Whole Works of the Right Rev. J. T. (ed. R. Heber and C. P. Eden, 10 vols., 1861–65).

Bibliography: BB 6 (1763) 3910-14. L. Clert-Rolland, "J. T. et la Tolérance Religieuse au XVIIe Siècle," RHPR 49 (1969) 257-64. A. Gordon, DNB 55 (1898) 422-29. H. T. Hughes, The Piety of J. T. (1960). H. R. McAdoo, The Spirit of Anglicanism: A Survey of Anglican Theological Method in the Seventeenth Century (1965); The Eucharistic Theology of J. T. Today (1988). C. J. Stranks, The Life and Writings of J. T. (1952).

S. J. JONES

TAYLOR, JOHN (1694–1761)

An English dissenting clergyman and Hebrew scholar, T. was educated at a dissenting academy. He served a Presbyterian chapel at Norwich for many years before becoming head of the academy of Warrington in Lancashire, by which time his views had become Arminian (see ARMINIUS) and Antitrinitarian. He spent many years preparing a combined Hebrew CONCORDANCE and LEXICON, which he based on the work of the Basel Hebraist J. BUXTORF, Sr. In addition, he wrote a number of theological works, taking as his own the method of J. LOCKE and S. Clarke wherein one examines exactly what the Bible teaches apart from later orthodox interpretations, an approach that in some respects prefigured later biblical THEOLOGY.

Works: The Scripture Doctrine of Original Sin (1740); A Paraphrase with Notes on the Epistle to the Romans (1745); The Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement (1751); The Hebrew Concordance, Adapted to the English Bible; Disposed After the Manner of Buxtorf (2 vols., 1754–57); The Lord's Supper Explained Upon Scripture Principles (1756); The Scripture Account of Prayer (1761).

Bibliography: A. Gordon, DNB 55 (1898) 439-40.

D. D. WALLACE, JR.

TAYLOR, VINCENT (1887–1968)

Born in Edenfield, Lancashire, T. studied for the Methodist ministry at Richmond College, concentrating on pastoral training, and served circuits from 1909. He took a BD from London University (1911), later a BD with honors, a PhD (1922), and the first of many DDs (1926). In 1930 he was appointed to the chair of NT studies at Wesley College in Leeds. He retired in 1953 but continued to be actively engaged in scholarship.

T. attested the influence of W. SANDAY, admiring Sanday's use of a refined exegetical technique to address theological issues (1970, 31-32). In considering NT traditions of JESUS' birth, T. added to Sanday's keen focus a diffident restraint in distinguishing exegetical conclusions from theological considerations. He concluded that the tradition of virginal conception is at issue only in Matthew and Luke; therefore, the virgin birth was not the subject of apostolic preaching (1920, 115). Matthew presupposed and defended the tradition (104), but the Gospel offers so much midrashic embellishment (see MIDRASH) as to vitiate its value as historical evidence. Matthew is of historical interest more for the belief it implies than for the data it offers. T. held that the crucial passage, Luke 1:34-35, is at odds with the Davidic descent of Jesus, which is of such central importance within the Lukan scheme as to suggest that 1:34-35 is a later insertion. The insertion, however, was provided by Luke himself, who T. believed "taught the Virgin Birth." These considerations led T. to the view that the doctrine of virginal conception is historically not provable (128).

When T. began a LITERARY study of Luke's Gospel (1926), his understanding of the birth narrative already suggested that stages of composition lie behind the Gospel. B. STREETER's theory of a proto-Luke independent of Mark suited T.'s earlier impression. He posited that document as the foundation and framework of Luke (1926, 182) and tentatively identified the author with the companion of PAUL, who gathered his materials in Caesarea and Jerusalem, perhaps from the daughters of Philip during the 70s.

In 1932 in a series of public lectures at the University of Leeds, T. gave a presentation of FORM CRITICISM (pub. 1933). The volume was important not simply for making form criticism known in Britain but also for offering refinements in the technique: form criticism with an English face. T. focused on the mechanics of oral TRADITION in the earliest period but still engaged questions of historical value and inquired into the emergence of written sources prior to the Gospels. He suggested that the Gospels emerged in three stages: (1) the development of oral traditions to meet the practical needs of early Christian communities (30–50 CE); (2) the gathering of traditions in written and oral sources (50–65 CE); and (3) the actual compilation of gospels (65–100 CE).

In Jesus and His Sacrifice T. argued cogently that Jesus saw his suffering as representative and vicarious, a conscious sacrifice, and that he intended for his followers to participate in his self-offering (265). He strongly urged Eucharistic worship as the means of such participation.

T.'s commentary on Mark was an attempt to supplement the work of H. SWETE. He engaged directly the work of W. WREDE, where Swete had not; incorporated Streeter's contributions on the SYNOPTIC PROBLEM and the grouping of textual witnesses; and used a form-critical procedure to discuss the tradition prior to Mark. The resulting synthesis, however, had more similarities to Swete's work than differences. T. argued for the identity of the Evangelist as Peter's companion John Mark and decided that Mark was faithful to Peter's oral tradition. Wrede's "messianic secret" is for T. an element integral to the tradition, not imposed on Mark's material (123).

On the whole, T. appears to have retreated into a form of historicism; and for all its informed reference to modern scholarship, its form criticism, and its exegetical acumen, his commentary marks a persistent tendency in British scholarship to retain the historiography of the previous century while attempting to speak the language of a new generation of German critics.

Works: The Historical Evidence for the Virgin Birth (1920); Behind the Third Gospel: A Study of the Proto-Luke Hypothesis (1926); The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (1933); Jesus and His Sacrifice: A Study of the Passion-sayings in the Gospels (1937); The Gospel According to St. Mark: The Greek Text with Introduction, Notes, and Indices (1952); The Person of Christ in NT Teaching (1958); "Milestones in Books," NT Essays (1970) 31-35; The Passion Narrative of St. Luke: A Critical and Historical Investigation (1972).

Bibliography: C. K. Barrett, PBA 56 (1972) 283-92. O. E. Evans, "A List of the Published Writings of V. T.," NT Essays (1970) 141-46. A. R. George, NT Essays (1970) 1-4. C. L. Mitton, ibid., 5-30. S. Tassore, V. T.'s Understanding of the Ministry of Jesus as the Son of Man and the Servant: Excerta ex dissertatione ad Lauream in Facultate Theologica Pontificiae Universitatis Gregorianae (1968).

B. CHILTON

TENNEY, MERRILL CHAPIN (1904–85)

A Greek and NT scholar, T. was born in Chelsea, a suburb of Boston, Apr. 16, 1904. His father oversaw the religion department of the still-extant Goodspeed's Bookstore in Boston and passed on a love of books to his son; his grandmother taught him Latin and passed on her love of languages; and a tent meeting provided the setting for a conversion experience during his adolescence. From this foundation, T. went on to receive a diploma from Nyack Missionary Training Institute (1924), a ThB degree from Gordon College (1927), and a master's degree from Boston University (1930). He received his PhD in biblical and patristic Greek from Harvard University (1944), where he completed his dissertation under H. CADBURY. He then joined the faculty of Wheaton College, where he taught from 1943 to 1971 and also served as dean of the graduate school for over two decades. He was known as a brilliant and open-minded professor, with many of his students completing their doctorates in related fields (G. Hawthorne [1975]).

T. was the author or editor of over twenty-five books, many of them translated into a variety of languages, including Bengali, Chinese, German, Japanese, Portuguese, and Spanish. His commitment to excellence in scholarship significantly advanced the maturity of contemporary worldwide Reformed-conservative NT studies. His special area of research involved quotations from Luke in TERTULLIAN as related to the texts of the second and third centuries. More broadly, his integrative scholarship contributed to a more sufficient understanding of the political and sociocultural setting of the NT. His scholarship proceeded on the confidence that understanding the political and religious forces that made up the first-century sociocultural setting of the Mediterranean world would enhance understanding of the NT and help in interpreting its message for modern readers. In the process, his intellectual precision and incisiveness shed light on almost every puzzle of NT CHRONOLOGY. When T. died at age eighty, Mar. 18, 1985, he was working on a new study of Luke–Acts.

Works: John: The Gospel of Belief (1948); Galatians: The Character of Christian Liberty (1950); NT Survey (1953–85); Philippians: The Gospel at Work (1956); Interpreting Revelation (1957–88); NT Times (1965–88); "A New Approach to the Book of Hebrews," BSac 123 (1966) 230-36; "Topics from the Gospel of John," BSac 132 (1975) 37-46, 145-60, 229-41, 343-57; "Historical Verities in the Gospel of Luke," BSac 135 (1978) 126-38.

Bibliography: G. Hawthorne, Current Issues in Biblical and Patristic Interpretation: Studies in Honor of M. C. T. (1975) with T.'s bibliography (19-20); "Educator and Scholar M. C. T. is Dead at 80," Christianity Today 29 (Apr. 19, 1985) 54; JETS 29 (1986) 127-28.

J. SNAREY

TERTULLIAN, QUINTUS SEPTIMIUS FLORENS (c. 160–c. 225)

T. founded theology and exegesis in the Latin tradition. What little we know of him must be inferred from his works, which can be dated from 196/197 to 212 (T. Barnes [1971] 30-56). A Carthaginian convert to Christianity, T. in later years became a Montanist. He was evidently trained in classical rhetoric and Roman law and philosophy and knew the works of JUSTIN MARTYR and of IRENAEUS. The author of such familiar sayings as "What has Athens to do with Jerusalem?" T. employed masterful literary artistry in fierce polemics against pagans, heretics, Jews, and ethically lax Christians.

Because he was bilingual in Latin and Greek, we cannot fully determine to what extent T. used existing biblical translations. Although his only commentary is a brief exposition of the Lord's Prayer in his treatise On Prayer, exegesis pervades his works. In keeping with his legal training, he thought of the witness of Scripture in forensic terms. Thus it was a fundamental principle for him in interpretation, as in the law, that "the few are to be understood in the light of the many" (Adv. Praxean 20; see J. Waszink [1979]). He also argued that heretics had no legal right to use Scripture because it belonged exclusively to the church (Prescription, 15-17). Other hermeneutical principles (see HERMENEUTICS) are that the literal sense is the basis of interpretation, that context should be considered, and that the church's rule of faith guides interpretation. T. allowed for allegory but decried seeking esoteric meanings as curiositas and the source of heresy; "seek and ye shall find" (Matt 7:7; Luke 11:9) does not justify continual seeking once one has found Catholic doctrine (Prescription, 9). His most sustained exegetical argument is in books 4 and 5 of Adversus Marcionem, which treat continuously most of Luke and the Pauline corpus in order to demonstrate their compatibility with the moral teaching of the HB.

Works: CC 1-2; ANF 3-4 (tr. A. C. Coxe); The Prescriptions Against the Heretics and On Idolatry, (tr. S. L. Greenslade, LCC 5); Adversus Marcionem (ed. and tr. E. Evans, 1972).

Bibliography: C. Aziza, T. et le judaïsme (1977). T. D. Barnes, T.: A Historical and Literary Study (1971). J. E. L. van der Geest, Le Christ et l'Ancien Testament chez T. (1972). D. E. Groh, "Utterance and Exegesis: Biblical Interpretation in the Montanist Crisis," The Living Text: Essays in Honor of E. W. Saunders (ed. D. E. Groh and R. Jewett, 1985) 73-95. R. P. J. Hanson, "Notes on T.'s Interpretation of Scripture," JTS 12 (1961) 273-79; IHE 2 (1983) 23-64. H. Karpp, Schrift und Geist bei T. (1955) 287-301. R. Kearsley, HHMBI, 60-65. T. P. O'Malley, T. and the Bible: Language—Imagery—Exegesis (1967). J. Quasten, Patrology (1950) 1:246-339. V. Saxer, "La Bible chez le Pères latin du IIIe siècle," BTT 2 (1985) 339-69. J. H. Waszink, "T.'s Principles and Methods of Exegesis," Early Christian Literature and the Classical Intellectual Tradition (ed. W. R. Schoedel and R. L. Wilken, 1979) 17-31. G. Zimmerman, Die hermeneutischen Prinzipien T.s (1937).

J. W. TRIGG

TESTAMENT OF MOSES

The Testament of Moses is a pseudepigraph (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA) extant in a single poorly preserved, incomplete, and at times illegible Latin palimpsest discovered in the Ambrosian Library of Milan and published by A. Ceriani in 1861. The manuscript dates from the sixth century CE, but orthography and style indicate that it is a copy of an early fifth-century writing. The Latin text is clearly a translation from a Greek document that may be as early as the late first or early second century CE. Most early editors assumed that Greek was the original language, but it is now universally agreed that the Greek text available to the Latin translator was itself a translation of a Semitic writing. Whether the Semitic text was Aramaic or Hebrew remains a matter of dispute, but the latter is more probable.

Ceriani, on the basis of quotations in the Acts of the Council of Nicea and in scattered patristic references (Origen De principiis 3.2.1), entitled the manuscript The Assumption of Moses, an account of Moses' being taken directly to heaven rather than dying a natural death. This story is well known in many Jewish writings and is probably referred to in the letter of Jude (v. 9). The present text, however, knows nothing of an assumption and clearly indicates that Moses died a natural death (1:15; 10:11-14). Some ancient quotations and stichometries (lists of books and the number of lines contained in each) refer to both an Assumption and a Testament of Moses, although the relationship between them is not clear. It has been proposed that they were two distinct works, a single work consisting of two sections, or two separate works that were subsequently joined together. It is more prudent, lacking manuscript evidence, to refer to the present manuscript as the Testament of Moses and leave open the question as to whether a section following the mutilated ending of 12:13 did contain an account of Moses' assumption.

The Testament of Moses belongs to the well-known testament genre, the last words of an ancient worthy to his people, family, or successor (see TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS). Moses reveals to Joshua the history of the community from his day until the end time, which in the present form of the text is the immediately post-Herodian age, i.e., the first half of the first century CE. The theology of the book is not particularly original, combining in a somewhat awkward fashion the apocalyptic emphasis (see APOCALYPTICISM) on God's predestination of all things with the deuteronomic formula that the fate of the community results from their obedience or disobedience to God's laws. The former is dominant, in accord with the pragmatic purpose of apocalyptic to give hope to people living in a dying age.

From the time of the manuscript's discovery, scholars have differed widely as to its date of composition and its religious provenance (see R. Charles [1897] for discussion to his time). Dates from the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (175–164/163 BCE) to the Bar Kokhba revolt (132–135 CE) and religious groups as varied as the Sadducees and the Samaritans have had proponents. CHARLES's conclusion that the work was written in the first half of the first century CE and represented a "quietistic Pharisaism" reflects a general consensus that prevailed until the recent contention for an Antiochan dating, with the consequent location of the work in the somewhat amorphous group of Hasidim (see HASIDISM) who figured in the Maccabean revolt (168–165 BCE).

Both Charles's arguments for a first-century CE date and arguments for an Antiochian date must come to terms with an internal chronological inconsistency in the present form of the manuscript. Chapter 6 clearly alludes to Herodian times, but chaps. 7 and 8 are best understood within an Antiochian context. Charles solved the problem by assuming that there had been a dislocation in the transmission of the manuscript, while proponents of an essentially Antiochian dating maintain that chap. 6 is a first-century CE interpolation into an earlier document. Both dislocation and interpolation are well attested elsewhere, and no a priori conclusion may be drawn. It seems more prudent to suggest that the Testament of Moses is a first-century CE document, with the recognition that some of its contents may have had a considerable earlier history in either oral or written form. Increasing awareness of the complex nature of Judaism in this period mitigates against attempting to identify precisely the group within which the document arose. We may conclude, at most, that it has affinities most clearly with the Pharisees, the Essenes, and other groups that evolved from the broader circles of the Hasidim.

Some recent scholars, following J. Licht (1961), have proposed that a distinctive theological theme is to be found in the story of the Levite Taxo and his seven sons, who chose to die rather than abandon their faith (chap. 9), and in the following eschatological hymn depicting the divine visitation (10:1-10). They propose that the vow of martyrdom is designed to provoke God to intervene on behalf of his people and thus to inaugurate the eschatological era. This is a possible conclusion, but the story of Taxo and his sons may also be understood as a typical martyrdom story well known elsewhere in the literature of the period (e.g., 2 Macc 6:18–7:42).

The Testament of Moses may have been known and used by several NT writers. Attention is called most often to Matt 24:19-21 (with parallels); Acts 7:36-43; 2 Pet 2:13; and Jude 9, 12-13, 16. The clearest allusion is Jude 9, but it apparently refers to the assumption of Moses, which is not found in the extant testament. Although definite dependence cannot be proven, the possible use of the work in some Christian circles as scripture underlines the fluidity of CANON in the late first and early second centuries CE.

Bibliography: E. Brandenburger, "Die Himmelfahrt des Moses," JSHRZ 5.2 (1976) 57-84. R. Carlson, "Vengeance and Angelic Mediation in Testament of Moses 9 and 10," JBL 101 (1982) 85-95. R. H. Charles, The Assumption of Moses (1897); "The Assumption of Moses," APOT, 2:407-24. A.-M. Denis, Introduction aux pseudepigraphes grecs d'Ancien Testament (1970) 128-41; Fragmenta pseudepigraphorum quae supersunt graeca (PVTG 3, 1970) 63-67. E. M. Laperrousaz, Le Testament de Moïse (généralment appelé "Assomption de Moïse": Traduction avec introduction et notes (Semitica 19, 1970). C. J. Lattey, "The Messianic Expectation in The Assumption of Moses," CBQ 4 (1942) 9-21. J. Licht, "Taxo, or the Apocalyptic Doctrine of Vengeance," JJS 12 (1961) 95-103. D. P. Moessner, "Suffering, Intercession, and Eschatological Atonement: An Uncommon Common View in the Testament of Moses and in Luke–Acts," The Pseudepigrapha and Early Biblical Interpretation (ed. J. Charlesworth, 1993) 202-27. G. E. W. Nickelsburg (ed.), Studies on the "Testament of Moses" (1973). J. Priest, "Some Reflections on The Assumption of Moses," Perspectives in Religious Studies 4 (1977) 92-111; "The Testament of Moses," OTP, 1:919-34. H. H. Rowley, The Relevance of Apocalyptic: A Study of Jewish and Christian Apocalypses from Daniel to the Revelation (1963) 106-10, 149-56. E. Schürer, HJPAJC 3 (1986) 278-88. J. P. M. Sweet, "The Assumption of Moses," OTA, 600-616. D. H. Wallace, "The Semitic Origin of the Testament of Moses," TZ 11 (1955) 321-28. S. Zeitlin, "The Assumption of Moses and the Bar Kokhba Revolt," JQR 38 (1947–48) 1-45.

J. F. PRIEST

TESTAMENTS OF THE TWELVE PATRIARCHS

1. Introduction. Since the discovery of Hebrew and Aramaic testamentary texts in the Cairo Geniza (T. Levi), in the medieval manuscripts of the Chronicle of Jerahmeel (T. Naph.), in the Midrash Wa-yissa'u (T. Jud.), and in the Qumran caves (T. Levi, T. Naph., etc.), it has become increasingly important to distinguish between the composition and transmission of separate testaments and their compilation as the document known as the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs (T. 12 Patr.). Some of the testaments may have been composed at the same time they were compiled in the T. 12 Patr.; others appear to be redacted forms of earlier works.

2. Interpretation of the Bible in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. a. The use of Genesis. Some of the characteristics associated with each patriarch are derived from Jacob's blessing of his sons (Gen 49:2-27); e.g., Judah recalls Gen 49:10 in T. Jud. 22:3. Jacob's blessings are explicitly referred to in T. Sim. 5:6 (see Gen 49:7). More often the exhortation of each patriarch is linked to an incident narrated in Genesis; e.g., Reuben's act of immorality with Bilhah (Gen 35:22) is used as the basis for his instruction against sexual promiscuity. Several details in T. 12 Patr. reflect the Genesis traditions as they were adapted in other texts; e.g., the twelve trees to be presented to God are mentioned in T. Levi 9:12 (expanding Gen 28:10-11) and enumerated in JUBILEES 21:12.

b. Other biblical interpretation. The T. 12 Patr. barely alludes to specific commandments of the law, being more concerned with universal values and virtues, which are sometimes expressed in phraseology that echoes the wisdom literature. Pentateuchal texts are occasionally used: e.g., T. Levi 8:2-10 adapts Exod 28:3-43 in its description of the priestly garments; and T. Iss. 5:2 echoes Deut 6:5 and Lev 19:18 in its formulation of what the law involves. There are some allusions to prophetic texts: e.g., the description of Joseph being in the cistern for three days and nights (T. Zeb. 4:4) recalls Jonah 1:17; and Naphtali's vision on the Mount of Olives (T. Naph. 5:1) recalls Zech 14:4-7. M. de Jonge (1953) has discerned two literary patterns in several of the testaments: One is sin-exile-return, an eschatological variant of the DEUTERONOMISTIC view of history; the other is the juxtaposition of Levi and Judah based on Gen 49:5-12 and prophetic texts that link priesthood and kingship (e.g., Jer 33:17-18; Zech 4:14).

c. Biblical models. The principal models within the Bible for the testaments are the farewell blessings of Jacob (Gen 49:2-27) and Moses (Deut 33:2-29); both of these also link all the tribes together, as does T. 12 Patr. In the Second Temple period the genre of testament, a farewell speech in a deathbed scene, began to emerge in its own right (Tob 4:2-21; 14:3-11; 1 Macc 2:49-70). It was very adaptable, providing a form for many kinds of exhortatory and predictive content.

d. The NT. Many of the allusions in the T. 12 Patr. to the prophetic books occur in passages that may be Christian interpolations, since similar prophetic passages feature in various NT writings: e.g., Joel's PROPHECY of the pouring out of the Spirit (Joel 2:28-29; cf. Acts 2:17-21) is used in association with the star from Jacob and the shoot of God (T. Jud. 24:1-5; cf. Rev 22:16). Some possible allusions to the NT apart from the interpolations support the position of those who see the whole work as a Christian composition.

On the other hand, those who argue for Jewish authorship point to how phrases from the non-interpolated passages are cited in the NT. J. Grabe used the possible citation of T. Levi 6:11 in 1 Thess 2:16 to support his 1698 proposal that T. 12 Patr. was pre-Christian.

e. Enoch. Several times in T. 12 Patr. there are references to the books of ENOCH, which clearly possessed scriptural AUTHORITY for the compiler. Yet few of the allusions can be matched to Enoch materials known in Aramaic, Greek, or Ethiopic; e.g., in T. Dan 5:6 Dan's sons are aligned with Satan, according to the Book of Enoch the Righteous, an association perhaps based on Judg 18:11-31 and Jer 8:16-17. R. CHARLES thought the phrasing might reflect 2 Enoch 18:3, but this is unlikely. This use of Enoch drew the attention of several medieval and Renaissance scholars to T. 12 Patr. as they attempted to explain the similar authoritative use of Enoch in Jude.

3. The Interpretation of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. a. Early redaction. If the T. 12 Patr. are not regarded as a coherent composition by a single author, then their earliest interpretation is found in the process of redaction through which they assumed their present form. If some or all of the testaments were originally Jewish compositions, then it could be that the first stage of redaction was undertaken by Jews who added apocalyptic passages (see APOCALYPTICISM), perhaps to make the testaments relate more directly to their own religious and political experiences. These same passages contain the most explicit Christian material, which perhaps belongs to a second redactional stage in the early Christian period when Christian interpolations were added: e.g., T. Jos. 19:8 reads, "And I saw that a virgin was born from Judah, wearing a linen stole; and from her was born a spotless lamb"; T. Ben. 9:3 reads, "The Lord will be abused and will be raised up on wood. And the temple curtain shall be torn." J. Jervell has proposed (1969) that some of these Christian interpolations reflect a theological concern with the salvation of Israel and so should be dated to the first century CE. ORIGEN appears to cite from T. 12 Patr. in his Homilies on Joshua, thus providing a likely terminus ad quem for its composition, although the text known to him may have been different from the Byzantine one established by modern scholars. And T. Dan 7:3, which notes how Dan's predictions came true, may be an even later gloss.

b. Thirteenth to seventeenth centuries. M. Paris (c. 1200–1259) recorded how R. GROSSETESTE, bishop of Lincoln, translated the T. 12 Patr. from Greek into Latin in 1242; Grosseteste probably acquired the Greek manuscript from the library of M. Choniates, who until 1204 was archbishop of Athens. Paris noted that the work had been hidden by the Jews but that Greeks had discovered and translated it from Hebrew.

R. BACON, writing in 1266–68, noted that each patriarch describes what Christ must fulfill and what should be believed about him. He believed that the testaments are not authentically patriarchal but have an authority based in their wide use as a non-Christian witness to Christian belief, particularly to convert Jews.

Although featured in several sixteenth-century collections, the T. 12 Patr. appears to have been commented on only seldom. In 1566 Sixtus of Siena, a converted Jew, referred to them to illuminate the use of Enoch in Jude and noted that they were very old (he may have considered them authentic) and had been translated from Hebrew.

J. Salianus used T. 12 Patr. to supplement his history of the period 1770–1625 BCE, published in Paris (1619–24). In 1631 the Puritan J. SELDEN commented on the priority of Levi over his brother Judah (T. Jud. 21:1-4) and noted that such disorders were clearly not just a recent phenomenon. In the mid-seventeenth century, S. Sgambati, a Jesuit from Naples, was the first to remark explicitly on the work's literary purpose as moral exhortation. The Zurich theologian J. Heidegger (1633–98) not only called into question Salianus's use of the testaments, arguing like several scholars before him that they were inauthentic, but also seems to have been the first to propose that T. 12 Patr. was a Christian work falsely ascribed in order to convert Jews, just as the SIBYLLINE ORACLES were intended to convert non-Jews. Much of Heidegger's approach is paralleled in the seventeenth-century work of Dutch scholar J. de Mey, who also provided a four-page summary of the testaments and concluded that they were originally written in Greek, not Hebrew. R. SIMON, writing pseudonymously (1687; see H. de Jonge [1975]), argued for the work's stylistic unity and for its composition by a Jewish Christian or sectarian; he was the first to propose that it had originally been written in Aramaic (reading Jamnia at T. Naph. 6:1 as Aramaic for "sea," preserved as a doublet in the Greek).

The first printed edition of the Greek text appeared in 1698. Its editor, Grabe, argued that the work was Jewish, composed in Hebrew, translated into Greek in the third century BCE, and subsequently (1st or 2nd cent. CE) interpolated by a Christian.

c. Eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The interpretation of the T. 12 Patr. in these two centuries was dominated by consideration of its Christian authorship. In 1713 J. FABRICIUS argued on stylistic grounds that the testaments were composed by a Christian in Greek and should be associated with The Shepherd of Hermas and the Sybylline Oracles; he was supported by A. Gallandi (1709–79). H. Corrodi (1781–83) proposed that T. 12 Patr. was a Jewish Christian document, since its militaristic messiah was similar to that of Revelation. This ascription was developed further by C. Nitzsch (1787–1868), who linked the work with early second-century Alexandria, and by I. DORNER, whose work provoked a flurry of studies on whether T. 12 Patr. was really Jewish Christian or gentile Christian (or both). The most detailed study was by R. Sinker, who in 1869 published an extensive introduction, concluding that it was a product of Nazarene Jewish Christianity at Pella.

d. F. Schnapp. In 1884, through a rigorous application of LITERARY criticism, F. Schnapp proposed that the original T. 12 Patr. had consisted of brief narratives about the patriarchs together with corresponding exhortations on virtues and vices; that these had been redacted, first by a Jewish hand, at which stage several passages were added, largely of apocalyptic or messianic character; and second, by a Christian, who altered those same passages with Christian additions. A variation of this view has remained influential, partly because it was popularized by E. SCHÜRER (1886–90) and by Schnapp in E. KAUTZSCH's German collection of PSEUDEPIGRAPHA (1900), and partly because it appeared to be confirmed by F. Conybeare's work (1856–1924) on the ARMENIAN Edschmiadzen manuscript., by M. GASTER's claim (1894) that the Hebrew original of T. Naph. was to be found in the Chronicles of Jerahmeel, and by the publication in 1900 of the Cairo Geniza Aramaic text parallel to T. Levi 9–13.

e. R. Charles and after. In 1908 Charles published both a critical text of T. 12 Patr. and the first complete commentary on it. His position was similar to Schnapp's, as refined especially by W. BOUSSET (1900): He believed there had been an original coherent work authored by an early pro-Maccabean Pharisee into which were interpolated various Jewish additions, mostly from the first century BCE, many of which were anti-Maccabean; last, at various times the work was given dogmatic Christian additions.

For over forty years Charles was widely followed. Challenges to the theory of a Jewish origin came only from J. Hunkin (1887–1950) and N. Messel (b. 1877). In his extensive literary-critical approach, J. Becker (1970) has outlined in theory what the original Jewish form of the T. 12 Patr. might have looked like; to that consistent base text (dated 200–175 BCE) many additions were made, the last being the Christian elements. Through motif analysis A. Hultgard has described (1977–81) three stages: the first is based on anti-Hasmonean Levi material (c. 100 BCE); the second, on additional levitical traditions (1st cent. BCE); the third, on Christian traditions.

f. The Dead Sea Scrolls. The DEAD SEA SCROLLS stimulated some scholars, notably A. Dupont-Sommer (1953) and M. Philonenko (1960s), to associate the T. 12 Patr. directly with the Qumran community. No direct historical connection can be proved, but the scrolls show that many of the testaments' theological interests, e.g., certain forms of messianic expectation, eschatology, ethical dualism, and angelology, are at home in Judaism and need not be attributed to early Christianity. None of the extant Aramaic (T. Levi, T. Jud., T. Jos.) and Hebrew (T. Naph., T. Jud.) testaments among the scrolls is the Semitic source for its Greek counterpart in T. 12 Patr., but each provides evidence for the likely Jewish source material available to the compiler and shows that some of the testaments may have had a long compositional and redactional history before all twelve were compiled and edited together. In particular, several different forms of testamentary material are associated with Levi (1Q21, 4Q213, 214, 540, 541), at least one of which is close to T. Levi from the Cairo Geniza.

g. M. de Jonge. In 1953 de Jonge showed that there was no textual basis for the removal of Christian interpolations. He proposed that T. 12 Patr. had received such thorough Christian redaction, with several major sections (e.g., T. Levi 3:5-9) being Christian compositions, that the whole is better described as the work of a Christian of the second century CE who used much Jewish material (especially in T. Levi, T. Naph., T. Jud., and T. Reub.). Although he has revised his position somewhat, he and H. Hollander (1985) still deny the usefulness of literary criticism for understanding the history of the text's redaction. Rather, they insist on a formal approach to the Greek text as it is known now and stress that the diversity of the testaments is largely the result of the wide variety of source material used. De Jonge has also been the driving force behind a new critical edition of the Greek text (1978) in which the reclassification of the extant witnesses is supported by recent study of the Armenian version.

h. Continuing research. Further work on the Armenian manuscripts may provide information on the early transmission of the text. The eventual principal editions of all the Dead Sea Scrolls texts will aid in the study of the Jewish sources that indirectly lie behind the Greek

T. 12 Patr. However, deciding whether T. 12 Patr. is a Jewish work with Christian additions or a Christian composition using Jewish sources, and determining its original language, provenance, and date will most likely be answered only after further study of all the APOCRYPHA and Pseudepigrapha.

Bibliography: J. Becker, Untersuchungen zur Entstehungsgeschichte der Testamente der zwölf Patriarchen (1970). J. J. Collins, "The Testamentary Literature in Recent Scholarship," Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. R. A. Kraft and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, 1986) 268-78. H. Corrodi, Kritische Geschichte des Chiliasmus (1781–83). A. Dupont-Sommer, Nouveaux aperçus sur les manuscrits de la mer Morte (OAI 5, 1953). H. W. Hollander and M. de Jonge, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: A Commentary (SVTP 8, 1985). A. Hultgard, L'eschatologie des Testaments des douze patriarches (AUU 6-7). J. Jervell, "Ein Interpolator interpretiert: Zu der christlichen Bearbeitung der Testamente der zwölf Patriarchen," Studien zu den Testamenten der Zwölf Patriarchen (ed. W. Eltester, BZNW 36, 1969). H. J. de Jonge, "Die Patriarchtestamente von R. Bacon bis R. Simon," Studies on the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: Text and Interpretation (ed. M. de Jonge, SVTP 3, 1975) 3-42. M. de Jonge, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: A Study of Their Text, Composition, and Origin (1953); "The Interpretation of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs in Recent Years," Studies on the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: Text and Interpretation (ed. M. de Jonge, SVTP 3, 1975) 183-92; review of The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, by H. D. Slingerland, JSJ 9 (1978) 108-11; "The Main Issues in the Study of the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs," NTS 26 (1980) 508-24; "The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: Central Problems and Essential Viewpoints," ANRW II.20.1 (1987) 359-420. E. Puech, "Fragments d'un apocryphe de Lévi et le personnage eschatologique: 4QTestLévi$^{c\text{-}d}$ et 4QAJa," The Madrid Qumran Congress (ed. J. Trebolle Barrera and L. Vegas Montaner, STDJ 11, 1992) 449-501. H. D. Slingerland, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: A Critical History of Research (SBLMS 21, 1977). G. Vermes and M. Goodman, "The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs," HJPAJC 2 (ed. E. Schürer, 1986) 767-81.

G. J. BROOKE

TEXTUAL CRITICISM, HEBREW BIBLE

Textual criticism of the HB can be divided into two types: (a) LITERARY criticism, or content criticism, and REDACTION CRITICISM and (b) TEXTUAL CRITICISM of the NT. The main difference between the two types of textual criticism is that the text of the HB is generally much more remote from the event described, which in terms of textual criticism means that there were many more occasions for the text to become corrupted. Moreover, the story may be even more complicated since there may have been additional stages at which the text could have changed or suffered damage. We do not have any evidence for intermediary stages, however; therefore, all such stages are pure speculation.

This kind of introductory remark to our survey may seem somewhat unorthodox, since in the past textual critics used to operate on the tacit assumption that a written text had always existed and that the critic could work with changes of forms and letters, as was assumed in the monograph by Friedrich DELITZCH on Die Lese- und Schreibfehler im AT (1920). To be sure, at the beginning of this century scholars mainly held that there had been interchanges between the square letters of the type used since the Second Temple period generally and tended to ignore the fact that there could have been interchanges of letters in the paleo-Hebrew script, which by that time had almost disappeared. On the other hand, changes could also have arisen out of mishearings, or else copyists did not always work directly from written sources, since one may have read the text aloud and another have written it down. These considerations, however, do not acknowledge earlier stages of oral tradition.

As in any other area of scholarship, one should always ask what the philosophy is on which textual criticism is based. It is based on the assumption that our procedure enables us to find the primary text (Urtext), if we are lucky, or at least get near it. If the biblical text brings us, indeed, the message of God, that message should be retrievable in its original clarity. While in former times the textual picture suffered from theological prejudices, since the time of L. VALLA (15th cent.) sacred literature was judged in the same way as profane literature. In other words, special consideration because of the nature of a sacred text would today be unacceptable.

The beginnings of the history of textual (or lower) criticism as a discipline of biblical studies almost coincide with the changes in European thinking in post-medieval times, i.e., the period of Renaissance humanism. At that time the former theological certainties began to disintegrate, and their unique position inside the church became shaky. Part of the humanist revolution was that two additional major classical languages broadened the horizon, i.e., Greek and Hebrew. Within a few years around 1500, clergy started using the original Hebrew text of the Bible as well as the Greek of the SEPTUAGINT, apart from the Latin of the VULGATE. As soon as the three textual forms were available, the issue of correctness came up. The first scholar who remarked on the differences of texts was a Carmelite monk in Italy Baptista Spagnuoli (Beato Mantovano) in his treatise Epistola de causa diversitatis inter interpretes sacrae scripturae (1476). The main question that emerged later was that, if the Vulgate indeed reflected the hebraica veritas, how was it that the Hebrew text transmitted by Jews was different? And how much could a Christian rely on the rabbis and their exegesis if these differed from those of the church? To what extent could these variants be attributed to different HERMENEUTICS? To be sure, in the sixteenth century, clergy hardly argued in terms of differences in hermeneutics. In general, the attitude was that Jews were suspect of having changed the text of the Bible so as to expunge any reference to Christ. Nobody cared at all in how many cases such a possibility could exist.

No sooner had this problem been solved than the church split between believers in Roman Catholic doctrine and the Vulgate and those who followed one of the Protestant denominations and the Jewish CANON. Also, humanists became aware of the way the commonly used Latin had lost the elegance of classical diction and the hitherto neglected vernaculars had become respectable for transmission of the biblical message. It is no coincidence that editions of the classical biblical text were published roughly at the same time the first Bible translations (see TRANSLATION) into European languages started to appear. However, for biblical studies there was one positive aspect: The church cared only minimally about the so-called OT and the character of its text. The major clashes between denominations concerned issues of cult and church custom; the question of how the mass should be celebrated was much more important than issues of the Bible text. For the church, it was the practical side that was generally of interest.

In the upheavals of the early days of the Reformation, another issue developed that had pronounced theological overtones. Protestants (each faction in its own way) refused on principle to acknowledge the superior position of what had been taken throughout the Middle Ages as hebraica veritas, as rendered into Latin by JEROME in the fourth century, based on the hermeneutics of his Jewish teachers—which itself had undergone textual developments inside the Western church. That attitude remained significant in the subsequent conflict between Protestants and the Roman Catholic Counter-Reformation. However, it seemed impossible to assume that the message of God was beset by ambiguities, and for centuries textual criticism stood under the influence of inner-Christian disputes, in which the Jews played no role. Each faction mobilized evidence from Jewish sources, but due to the Jews' inferior status, only pseudonyms of Jews were allowed to appear as evidence in the ecclesiastical court.

This state of affairs continued from the sixteenth to the nineteenth centuries, when historic positivism became a major feature of European thinking. Scholars needed a model of historical development, and an idea such as "original text" was as necessary as "original language." After all, once there must have been one original text; and it was the task of the textual critic to retrieve it.

Modern textual criticism was based on the assumption that scholars had forged the necessary tools to find their way out of the labyrinth of conflicting textual traditions back to the original text from which all later textual forms could be explained satisfactorily. The foundation for all later critical work was laid in the seventeenth century by J. MORIN, a French Oratorian priest with his Exercitiones biblicae e hebraei graecique textus sinceritate (1633), in which he maintained the superiority of the Septuagint and the inferiority of the MT, which he claimed had been tampered with by the Jews. Basically this argument renewed the age-old polemic of the church. Whereas Protestants had accepted the HB as a secure basis, Morin claimed that the Septuagint had been taken ex purissimis hebraeorum fontibus. It is important that the Roman Catholic Morin praised the Septuagint so highly, and on that basis the Vulgate was reaffirmed in circles of the Counter-Reformation. To be sure, in the seventeenth century nobody bothered with the later Greek translations and how the available Greek text had been influenced by them. The work of Morin was not simply a new stage in the growth of textual criticism, however, but rather a mixture of critical attitude and old-time misconceptions.

Although Morin was aware of the textual differences between the Samaritan text of the Pentateuch and other texts, it is not quite clear how he viewed the position of that text. In any case, in his Exercitationes ecclestasticae in utrumque Samaritanorum Pentateucho (1631), he hardly dealt with text-critical issues, including only a paragraph regarding agreements between the texts of Jews and of Samaritans (230). Morin remains for many modern scholars the founder of modern textual criticism, whereas for others he is the embodiment of Roman Catholic prejudice against the MT. Because of this ambiguous position, some modern scholars prefer to view L. CAPPEL as the real founder of modern textual criticism. In contrast to the Oratorian Morin, Cappel belonged to the French branch of the Calvinist church (see CALVIN) and taught at the Reformed theological school of Saumure. His outstanding works were Critica sacra, sive de variis quae in sacris veteris testamenti libris occurunt lectionibus (1650) and Annotata et commentaria in VT, published at the end of that century, together with a reedition of his Arcanum, this time under his own name.

Whereas Morin started off with a prejudice against the Jewish text that had become the basis of Calvinist orthodoxy, Cappel felt impelled to find out how the original text of the Bible could best be reconstructed from whatever texts were at his disposal. Cappel composed his Critica sacra (see CRITICI SACRI) a few decades after attacking the position of the master Hebraist of the Reformed Church, J. BUXTORF. The starting point for this notorious feud was the claim of Cappel that the dominant Reformed orthodoxy had given the Hebrew vowel signs the same authority as the letters, an issue that had occupied Christian scholars since they had first encountered the phenomenon that Hebrew vowel signs are not part of normal orthography. In fact, around 1500, more than a century before Buxtorf, the most important Hebrew grammarian, E. LEVITA, had argued against the early existence of vowel signs; however, he had directed his remarks to his Jewish coreligionists—even though he was driven to the discussion by the then new guard of Christian Hebraists. Buxtorf, in his time the leading Hebraist of the Swiss Reformed Church, maintained that if vowel signs are not part of the authoritative Hebrew text, one cannot take the Hebrew vowels as authoritative. Later stages of the events that had started with the publication of the attack by Cappel, Arcanum punctationis revelatum (1624), subtitled de punctorum vocalium et accentuum hebraeorum vera et germana antiquitate, published anonymously though T. Erpenius as intermediary and only later under his name, are outside the limits of this survey. Since Morin and Cappel flourished almost at the same time, it makes no sense to debate whose contribution was more significant for the development of textual criticism. Suffice it to say that, although today textual criticism is often judged to be secondary in position, it was the initial step toward biblical criticism in general. Whatever the philosophical trimmings, the undermining of the AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE began with the undermining of the integrity of its text.

A word is in order on the development of different theories with regard to different parts of the Bible. In the early stages, scholars of the Torah text were not quite aware that the division into three traditions—Hebrew, Samaritan, and Greek—only fit the Pentateuch. Actually, all three texts were different manifestations of the Old Palestinian text tradition; nobody paid attention to what a text of Babylonian provenance might have looked like.

In the seventeenth century the facts of the movement of Jewish groups during the time of the Second Temple were as yet not quite clear, and although the story of the Babylonian exile and the involvement of Ezra in guarding the Torah was general knowledge, the details of the movement of Jewish communities from Babylonia to Palestine were not all clear. The picture painted by Morin was not only tainted by theological prejudice but also did not pay attention to the facts of history. For this reason the division into those three textual traditions has never been discounted until modern times.

Even in the eighteenth century scholars still tried to determine the correct facts regarding the Hebrew text. The most representative step was that taken by B. KENNICOTT, who in the 1770s announced a major collation of all Hebrew manuscripts then available in European public libraries, which became the basis for his Vetus Testamentum cum variis lectionibus (1776–80). Kennicott believed that since each printed HB claimed that it offered the correct MT, the authoritative text could only be identified by checking all manuscripts. A few years later J. de Rossi prepared another printing of collations on the basis of manuscripts and editions, Variae lectiones veteris testamenti (1784–88), followed by his notes Scholia critica in v.t. libros (1798). Both undertakings started off with the enthusiastic assertion that through this collation the correct HB text could be determined, yet both ended in a whimper. The reason was simple: In European libraries only rather late HB manuscripts were extant, thus this great enterprise had an inbuilt flaw. The text was too uniform and no conclusions could be drawn from it. Of course, no one could realize this in the eighteenth century; the reasons only became obvious once real textual differences emerged from the Qumran scrolls (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), which were over a thousand years older than the run-of-the-mill medieval manuscripts used in the collations of Kennicott and de Rossi.

Yet there was an additional fallacy that marred the work of Kennicott. Hebrew Masoretic codices are characterized by the exactitude of Masoretic notation, chiefly marks of vowels and accents. Those notations were treated rather cavalierly by Christian Hebraists. The reason for this attitude is at present of no importance, but the fact is that both Kennicott and de Rossi did not include notes on differences in vocalization and accentuation. Such notations entered textual criticism only in the editions of S. Baer (1869–) and C. GINSBURG (1908), although only Ginsburg's edition was intended for the textual critic.

As intimated before, when the Qumran scrolls became known, textual critics were at first at a loss how to fit the new facts into the existing framework. Up to that time the differing theories of P. de LAGARDE and P. KAHLE—neither of whom had ever dealt with the raw facts of the MT—provided the framework into which textual criticism was fitted. Only the Qumran scrolls finally showed that up to the end of the Second Temple period there was a much larger variety of textual facts than had been assumed previously. Some texts were almost identical with what was later to become the MT, some were nearer to the prototype of the Septuagint, and still others preserved in the Pentateuch similarities with the Samaritan Torah. This diversity persisted roughly until the middle of the second century CE—the very time that had long been assumed to be the date of the final fixation of the Torah text, which needed stabilization so as to offer a secure basis for rabbinic halakhic MIDRASH.

Moreover, we must not forget that the destruction of the Second Temple seemed a far from auspicious time for the survival of Judaism. The textual tradition, which had suffered badly in the time of the Hasmonean wars, seemed now to be in danger of becoming completely destablilized. Thus both external and internal reasons brought about the final effort for stabilization of the Bible text.

At this juncture one must deal with the issue of changes in the Greek text. What is commonly known as the Septuagint referred originally only to the Greek text of the Pentateuch, the only part of the Bible whose exact text and interpretation were decisive for the strict observance of the letter of the law. Since the days of Ezra the reading of the law had become incumbent on all adult men, but the Jews of Egypt were unable to fulfill that duty because they did not understand Hebrew. The so-called OG text represented the form in which the Hebrew Pentateuch was known, at least in Egypt, at about 300 BCE, yet we have not even one piece of written evidence from that time. Due to the subsequent development of the Hebrew text, the OG had become obsolete by the second century CE, and a more up-to-date Greek text was needed. Thus the later Greek forms emerged, connected to AQUILA, SYMMACHUS, and THEODOTION.

The question remains open as to whether these actually were separate new renderings—as assumed in the nineteenth century—or, rather, secondary revisions of the OG text. For this reason, one must always remember that all biblical textual criticism must be based on previous analysis by Septuagint textual criticism. In fact, the state of extant Greek manuscripts is such that there is great difficulty in reconstructing the OG text, since the manuscripts mostly contain some texual mixture. Perhaps the model of ARCHAEOLOGY will be found helpful. Just as the archaeologist has to uncover layer after layer, so also must the textual critic. And just as the archaeologist cannot be sure of the outcome, neither can the texual critic. Over the decades, previously unknown stages have been uncovered; the formerly assumed textual model has largely broken down. This is not to say that the current picture of textual development is absolutely without basis, but one has to be aware of the fact that textual history never stands still.

Since in modern scholarship the rules of textual criticism of sacred texts are not different from that of profane literature, the various reasons for the types of development should not be mixed up. Obviously there were different reasons that finally necessitated the crystallization of one stable text acceptable to all. Thus, in discussions among the rabbis on what the text means, there was no dispute regarding the facts used by each of them.

The issue of canonization is intimately connected to the issue of the text and in the history of modern biblical studies has probably played a more important role than the issue of textual criticism. The stabilization of the text meant that one first had to decide which books properly belong to the recognized Jewish canon and which do not. Are such books as Ecclesiasticus (Ben Sira), ENOCH, or JUBILEES included? The manner in which quotes from Ecclesiasticus are introduced in Talmudic contexts goes a long way to show that their status was in doubt. As it happened, such writings were finally excluded from the Jewish canon, a judgment taken over after the Reformation by Protestants. The most prominent document prepared by one of the outstanding early representatives of German reform was the treatise by A. von KARLSTADT De canonicis scripturis libellus (1520), which was the first product of CANONICAL CRITICISM and precedes all other critical statements. Much of what later became part of higher and lower criticism can already be found here.

It is no coincidence that the so-called Council of Yamnia in the days of R. AKIBA (135 CE) served as the decisive point for both the end of the canonization process and the final stabilization of the text. Long the position of modern scholars, this was in the end affirmed by the evidence of textual history, as it emerged from the Qumran scrolls. Again, it is no coincidence that the revisions of the Greek text—whether they were actual revisions or more correct new translations—lead us back to roughly the same date.

Much of what can be said about this early state of textual history fits what one can find in older literature, but much has undergone dramatic changes. The old lines between the disputants had to be redrawn; thus today the dispute between Lagarde, Kahle, and their followers only has historic importance.

Regarding other versions, the Septuagint and its derivatives served as Bible only for the Eastern church. In the West a Latin derivative known as Vetus Latina, which was superseded in the fourth century CE by the Latin revision connected to the name of Jerome, served first. Since Jerome worked out his translation with the help of Jewish teachers in the area of Bethlehem, this version served as a proper substitute for the HB and was known throughout the Middle Ages as hebraica veritas; however, starting only with the humanist revival in Renaissance times were scholars able to peruse the different texts side by side. Theological, not philological, differences between the texts used by the church and by the synagogue had caused long polemics throughout the ages, with Jews at the receiving end, since their status was inferior.

Modern textual criticism deals not only with differences among the MT, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate but also with Bible versions in other languages finalized much later, such as the TARGUMIM, the PESHITTA, and even the Arabic Tafsir. This last version is of special interest since Rav SAADIA's Tafsir dates roughly to the same time as that of the Masorah text arranged by A. BEN ASHER. In other words, it was prepared roughly at the same time as the Aleppo Codex, the earliest codex of the complete Masoretic Tiberian text, and thus can serve as corroborating or corrective evidence.

This leads us directly to this codex, which is being used as the basic text of the Hebrew University Bible and is at present available in facsimile form to every scholar. The textual critic has to be able not only to handle all primary Bible versions and deal with their history but also to deal with the intricacies of the Masoretic system. Moreover, he or she should also be able to evaluate the biblical quotations that abound in the entire rabbinic literature.

To be sure, in the common evaluation of various types of biblical criticism, textual criticism—not dealing with the major issues of authorship, source, history, and literature—is still thought of as "lower criticism" in contrast to other areas, which together are thought of as "higher criticism." But in spite of this terminology, textual criticism stands very much at center stage next to the inquiry into the nature of the biblical canon and its history.

Textual criticism has been at the center of exegetical endeavor for a long time, consequently its sub-areas have expanded to such an extent that at present there exists hardly a modern general introduction to the Bible that can still deal properly with all of them. Whereas previously most introductions included a discussion of textual criticism, today various specialized introductory treatises deal with the details. In the exegetical tradition up to the twentieth century, almost every commentary dealing with a given part of the text started off with a textual discussion leading to the interpretation of the text—of course, not always of the same quality. This was the system of the major commentary series in Protestant Germany and in Anglican England and often also in Roman Catholic France and Italy.

It was quite an innovation when in 1906 R. KITTEL published the first edition of his Biblia Hebraica, which did not focus on exegesis at all but on the text. As an aid for the average student of theology, Kittel's edition did not even pretend to deal exclusively with textual facts but mixed textual corrections based on old versions with conjectural emendation, so much so that the usual type of student, untrained in the exactness of textual criticism, had a difficult time differentiating between textual facts and hypothetical fiction. This basic attitude has hardly changed in later editions up to the latest Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (1967–77) and continues, in fact, to prevail in the planned new edition, BHQ(uinta). This mixture of textual facts and hypothetical emendations has been avoided in the latest attempt to prepare a proper text-critical edition, the Hebrew University Bible, which began publication in Jerusalem in 1965, with the complete volume of the book of Isaiah appearing in 1995 and that of Jeremiah in 1997. Only the future will show which type of edition will ultimately best serve biblical scholarship.

Bibliography: J. Barr, Comparative Philology and the Text of the OT (1968); The Variable Spellings of the HB (Schweich Lectures 1986, 1989). D. Barthélemy, "Les Tiqquné Sopherim et la critique textuelle d l'Ancien Testament," VTSup 9 (1963) 285-304; Etudes d'histoire du texte de l'AT (OBO 21, 1978); (ed.) Critique textuelle de l'Ancien Testament (OBO 50, 1-2, 1982–86). M. B. Cohen, The System of Accentuation in the HB (1969); "Massoretic Accents as a Biblical Commentary," JANES 4 (1972) 2-11. F. M. Cross, The Ancient Library of Qumran and Modern Biblical Studies (1958, 1982²). F. M. Cross and S. Talmon (eds.), Qumran and the History of the Biblical Text (1975). R. le Díaut, Introduction a la littérature targumique (1966). A. Diez-Macho, Ms. Neophyti I, Targum Palestinense (6 vols., 1968–81); El Targum: Introducción a las Traducciones Aramaicas de la Biblia (1972). A. Dothan, "The Relative Chronology of Hebrew Vocalizaton," PAAJR 48 (1981). M. Goshen-Gottstein, "Prolegomena to a Critical Edition of the Peshitta" (ScrHier 8, 1960) 26-48; Text and Language in Bible and Qumran (1960); "The Rise of the Tiberian Bible Text," Biblical and Other Studies (ed. A. Altmann, 1963) 79-122; "Theory and Practice of Textual Criticism," Textus 3 (1963) 130-58; "Introduction," The Book of Isaiah: Sample Edition with Introduction (1965); "Hebrew Biblical Manuscripts," Bib 48 (1967) 243-90; "Introduction," Biblia Rabbinica (repr. 1972); The Bible in the Syropalestinian Version 1 (1973); "Peshitta and Its Manuscripts," Bibliotheca Orientalis 37 (1980) 13-16; "Biblical Exegesis and Textual Criticism," Mélanges Dominique Barthélemy (OBO 38, 1981) 91-107; "Textual Criticism of the OT: Rise, Decline, Rebirth," JBL 102 (1983) 365-99; "The Book of Samuel—Hebrew and Greek," Textus 14 (1988) 147-61; (ed.), The Book of Isaiah (HUB, 1995). M. Greenberg, "The Use of the Ancient Versions in Interpreting the HB," VTSup 29 (1978) 131-48. S. Jellicoe, The Septuagint and Modern Study (1968). P. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza (1947, 1959²); Der hebräische Bibeltext seit Franz Delitzsch (1961). M. L. Klein, The Fragment-Targums of the Pentateuch According to Their Extant Sources (2 vols., AnBib 76, 1980); Genizah Manuscripts of Palestinian Targum to the Pentateuch (1986). R. W. Klein, Textual Criticism of the OT: The Septuagint After Qumran (1974). S. Z. Leiman, The Canonization of Hebrew Scripture: The Talmudic and Midrashic Evidence (1974); (ed.) Canon and Masorah of the HB (1978). E. Levine, Aramaic Versions of the Bible (BZAW 174, 1988). P. K. McCarter, Textual Criticism: Recovering the Text of the HB (GBS, 1986). G. Marquis, "The Text-critical Relevance of the Three in the Book of Jeremiah: An Examination of the Critical Apparatus of the Hebrew Uinversity Bible Project Edition," Origen's Hexapla and Fragments (ed. A. Salvesen, TSAJ, 1997) 241-59. M. J. Mulder (ed.), Miqra (CRINT 2, 1, 1988). M. J. Mulder and P. B. Dirksen (eds.), The Peshitta (1988). H. Orlinsky, "The Origin of the Ketibh-Qere System," VTSup 7 (1960) 184-92. F. Perez Castro (ed.), El Codice de la Cairo (1979–). J. S. Penkower, "Jacob ben Ḥayyim and the Rise of the Biblia Rabbinica" (diss., Hebrew University, 1982). C. Rabin, S. Talmon, and E. Tov (eds.), The Book of Jeremiah (HUB, 1997). B. J. Roberts, The OT Text and Versions: The Hebrew Text in Transmission and the History of the Ancient Versions (1951). J. A. Sanders, "Hermeneutics of Text Criticism," Textus 18 (1995) 1-26. P. W. Skehan, "The Qumran Manuscripts and Textual Criticism," VTSup 4 (1957) 148-60. S. Talmon, "The OT Text," CHB 1 (1970) 159-99. E. Tov, "A Modern Outlook Based on the Qumran Scrolls," HUCA 53 (1982) 11-27; "The Text of the OT," The World of the Bible (ed. A. A. van der Woude, 1986) 156-90; "Die griechischen Bibelübersetzungen," ANRW 2.20 1 (1989) 121-89; The Greek Minor Prophets Scroll from Nahal Hever (DJD 8, 1990); The Text-critical Use of the Septuagint in Biblical Research (2nd enl. ed. 1997). E. C. Ulrich, The Qumran Text of Samuel and Josephus (HSM 19, 1978); "Horizons of OT Textual Research at the Thirtieth Anniversary of Qumran Cave 4," CBQ 46 (1984) 613-36. I. Yeivin, Introduction to the Tiberian Masorah (ed. J. Revell, 1980). A. van der Koij, Die alten Textzeugen des Jesajabuches: Ein Beitrag zur Textgeschichte des Alten Testaments (OBO 35, 1981). E. Würthwein, Der Text des Alten Testaments: Eine Einführung in die Biblia Hebraica (1952, 1988[5]; ET of 1974[4] in 1979).

M. GOSHEN-GOTTSTEIN

TEXTUAL CRITICISM, NEW TESTAMENT

Since the preserved writings of the NT are all written in Greek, NT textual criticism remains within the framework of the rules and methods worked out by classical philologians over the course of many generations. Nevertheless, NT textual criticism finds itself in a special situation compared with classical philology. Complete copies of texts in classical Greek literature can only be dated back to the ninth century CE. Numerous fragments from the preceding centuries exist; however, the quality of these fragments is often questionable, making reconstruction of complete copies a very difficult task. In the case of the NT we have a continuous manuscript tradition from its beginnings to the invention of printing. Three papyri are preserved from the second century (one of them, P^{52}, located in Manchester, containing John 18 from the first half of the 2nd cent., not long after the writing of the Gospel of John). About 200 CE, an extensive transmission of papyrus writings began: Up to the third/fourth centuries there are more than fifty preserved examples (a total of 115 up to the 8th cent.). Named after those who purchased them, the most important of these are the Chester Beatty papyri, P^{45}, P^{46}, P^{47}, and P^{97} (known since the 1930s; currently in Dublin) and the Bodmer papyri, P^{66}, P^{72}, P^{73}, P^{74}, and P^{75} (known since the 1950s; currently in Cologny near Geneva). Supplementing one another, they preserve almost a complete text of the NT: P^{45} (3rd cent.), preserving large parts of the Gospels and Acts; P^{46} (c. 200), large parts of the letters of PAUL; P^{47} (end of the 3rd cent.), Revelation 9–17; P^{66} (c. 200), John 1–14 still in the original book block (the rest of the Gospel preserved in fragmentary form); P^{72} (3rd and 4th cents.), 1–2 Peter and Jude; P^{75} (beginning of the 3rd cent.), large portions of Luke and John (up to 15:10 with few gaps).

Alongside the papyri are the so-called majuscules from the fourth century on (only five are known from the previous period) or uncials, so named because they are written in capital letters, in contrast to the minuscules (small letters) that began to appear in the ninth century. Parchment was the writing material for both majuscules and minuscules until paper came to be used in the ninth century. The latest majuscules derive from the eleventh century; afterward the field is dominated by minuscules. There are more than 300 majuscules and c. 2,860 minuscules, along with 115 papyri, which is c. 3,270 manuscripts of texts. To these has to be added the group of c. 2,400 lectionaries—that is, liturgical readings—in which the NT writings do not appear in consecutive order but, rather, in pericopes divided up for church services. Thus far that makes c. 5,670 manuscripts of the NT.

The extraordinary number of manuscripts is significant and points up another difference between NT textual criticism and classical philology: There is simply an oppressive surplus of material for the former. In addition to the Greek manuscripts there are ancient translations (see TRANSLATION) of the NT, e.g., the Latin; the Syriac; the Coptic, which originated at the close of the second century; and the innumerable NT citations in the church fathers. The sheer breadth of the material presents one of the greatest and most difficult problems for NT textual criticism.

The same can be said about the differences among the manuscripts themselves. The manuscripts of texts were copied countless times from one another over the course of many centuries (the losses from normal wear and tear, persecution, war, fire, and other causes must be estimated as considerable). They were at first copied totally independently. However, from the time of Constantine on, a period when the church had won its freedom (and governmental support), the bishops were able to guide the text, which had been growing freely until then, in a certain direction. They could choose a model text for the official scriptoria (writing factories) they had set up, and this text served as the basis for the copies of the NT.

From the sixth century on, the expanding imperial Byzantine church tried to establish a uniform NT text. There are, for example, ornamented parchment manuscripts from the sixth century (the so-called Purple uncials N 022, O 023, Φ043), whose parchment pages are dyed purple, with the text written in silver and gold ink. Moreover, there is Codex Rossanensis (Σ042) accompanied by numerous miniatures. The production of a normal parchment manuscript is expensive (a large herd of goats or sheep must have died for this purpose) and could only have been commissioned and paid for by high church or governmental offices, undoubtedly intended for important occasions and churches. Since all of them present the so-called Koine, imperial Byzantine HB majority text, it is clear that the text of the official church was moving in this direction; however, in spite of official support, the text was certainly not smooth. From the beginning the copiers tenaciously tried to preserve what they found in their NT Vorlagen. The medieval Byzantine church's attempt (the continuation in the 9th and 12th cents. of a process started in the 6th cent.) to create a uniform NT text resulted in the oppressive plurality of preserved NT manuscripts (more than 2,000 come from the 9th cent. and later) containing the standard Byzantine text. Still, elements of the older text, deriving from the earliest days of the church, were preserved even in these manuscripts. The older text is witnessed to by several hundred manuscripts, even if these have often fallen under the influence of the Byzantine text.

Nonetheless, one can assume that the manuscripts that emerged and were used in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries preserved the Byzantine text. The misfortune for the history of the NT text lay in the fact that in his editio princeps of the NT (1516) ERASMUS used only a few manuscripts (probably five), which he found in the library of Basel. In its five editions and numerous other reprintings, Erasmus's edition and method were directly determinative for the subsequent period. They also had an indirect effect because every edition in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Colinaeus [1534]; Stephanus [1546, 1550 (Regia), 1551]; Beza [10 eds., 1565–1611]; Elzevier [7 eds., 1624–78]) was based on late medieval minuscules—although their editors had access to old majuscule manuscripts or even owned them (Beza owned D 05 and D 06!). Along with Erasmus and the Complutensian POLYGLOT (1514, pub. 1522), these editions were based on a growing number of minuscules predominantly found in their editors' environs. In the apparatus to his 1675 edition, the Oxford bishop J. FELL named more than one hundred minuscules and noted readings from the ancient translations. The text of this period was called the textus receptus, according to the effective publicity slogan of Elzevier's second edition in 1633, which allowed the users to presume that they had before them a text accepted by everyone (textum ab omnibus receptum), in which nothing was changed or spoiled.

Although NT textual criticism as a discipline did not begin until the eighteenth century, J. Caryophilus and St. de Courcelles were its precursors in the seventeenth century. Also, J. MILL's edition (1707) had signified a major step forward, since it printed no fewer than 30,000 variants to the text of Stephanus (1550). Likewise, R. BENTLEY had announced (1720) a radical intervention into the textus receptus based solely on manuscripts that were at least 900 years old (not carried out). There were also editions by G. von Maastricht in 1711 and D. Mace in 1729. NT textual criticism was actually initiated by J. BENGEL, who in 1725 proposed the plan for his 1734 edition. In it the textus receptus served as a critical basis (he switched from one Vorlage to another), and the Codex Alexandrinus was used for the text of Revelation. The notes, which divided the readings into five categories, were decisive: Three of the five categories are to be preferred to the textus receptus or are equally justified. An extensive commentary accompanied his decisions. Although Bengel's edition was greatly surpassed by that of J. WETTSTEIN (1751–52) in inclusiveness and penetration of the material, it continued to be influential. Bengel advanced for the first time the detailed genealogical penetration of the manuscript tradition. His overall structure was further developed by J. SEMLER and especially by J. J. GRIESBACH, who had already distinguished the Western, Alexandrian, and Byzantine textual forms, thereby laying out the fundamental lines of the discussion still current.

The decisive turning point occurred when a classical philologist from Berlin, K. LACHMANN, who in 1830 supported the abandonment of the late textus receptus, argued for a return to the fourth-century text, which at that time was the oldest form that could be reconstructed. Thus he pioneered the way for establishing the original text of the NT, which since then has been at the forefront of the text-critical debate. The most important textual critics of the nineteenth century were C. von TISCHENDORF, B. F. WESTCOTT, and F. HORT. Without Tischendorf's Editio octava critica maior (1869–72), it is impossible even today to work text-critically. He offered in this work all the materials (and dependably, which is not the rule in many editions) that were known in his day, including about sixty majuscules, twenty-one of which he had discovered on his journeys in search of manuscripts. The most significant of these is Codex Sinaiticus (S 01), whose discovery was the sensation of the century, and which to a large extent influenced the text presented by Tischendorf. The latter had little and only belated access to Codex Vaticanus (B 03), which had just become known to the public. With Westcott and Hort, whose NT in the Original Greek appeared in 1881, it was a different story; for them Codex Vaticanus played a decisive role.

With these two editions (as well as that of S. Tregelles [1857–72], which took a backseat to Tischendorf's because of their contemporaneity), the age of the textus receptus came to a close—at least in scholarly circles. It became the least valuable textual form, as had been the judgment of Bengel and Griesbach. One would think that the battle had been decided after 200 years of controversy, but the textus receptus was firmly anchored in the consciousness of the Anglican Church and in English-speaking areas, where it remained the official text until 1880. Even the British and Foreign Bible Society took it as the basis for their editions until 1904, when they began to use the Nestle text, which had been published six years earlier. Up to that time the English Bible circulated only in the KJV. In 1881 this "authorized version" was followed by the "revised version," which ran parallel to the text of Westcott-Hort. Thus even the layperson could clearly recognize the changing situation. J. Burgon's (1813–88) campaign against Westcott-Hort and in favor of the Byzantine text found corresponding support. It was unsuccessful, however, because textual critics were acutely aware of the secondary character of the Byzantine text: its linguistic and stylistic adjustments (which may seem insignificant to us but which were extraordinarily meaningful in the first millennium); formulations influenced by the church, with inclusions of edifying additions; etc.

In the modern period Burgon's views are experiencing a resurgence, especially in the United States. His polemical writings are being reprinted and repeated in recent publications. Moreover, a new edition of the majority text has been presented (Z. Hodges and A. Farstad [1982]), with a justification that violates all philological and historical knowledge. The proponents of this text, as had earlier generations, base their arguments on the great number of manuscripts coming from every ecclesiastical province. (The bulk of them come from the 9th century and later!) The main argument, which impressed many people, that this text was the "text of the church" is easily countered by asking, "Which church?" The answer is, of course, the Byzantine church of the Middle Ages, which is merely a historical phenomenon for us; it has no binding influence. For the textual critic, only the earliest text can serve this authoritative function. (For details, see K. Aland [1987].)

The Westcott-Hort edition exerted an extraordinary influence on textual criticism late into the twentieth century, and rightly so, for the wisdom of its theoretical expositions (especially in the accompanying volume written by Hort, but even in the appendix to vol. 1 with its discussion of selected passages) is remarkable. Still, from a current perspective questions remain. Westcott and Hort explained that their edition reflects the NT "in the original Greek," but in fact they present only the fourth-century text (a goal announced by Lachmann fifty years earlier). Their manuscript witnesses do not go beyond that date. In order to reconstruct the text of the earlier period, they laboriously appealed to the OL and to the Old Syriac traditions, their chief support being Codex Bezae Cantabrigiensis (D 05). They believed that "the text of D presents a truer image of the form in which the Gospels and Acts were most widely read in the third and probably a great part of the second century than any other extant Greek manuscript" (1881, 149). This claim is now inaccurate, since none of the papyri, original witnesses from the second and third centuries, confirm this assumption. (Only two or three of them, dating from the second half of the 3rd cent., should be considered as representing the early stages of D.)

To the textual forms assumed since the time of Bengel and Griesbach—the Syrian, the Constantinopalitan (Byzantine), the Alexandrian, and the Western texts—Westcott and Hort added the so-called neutral text, represented by Codex Vaticanus (B), which correspondingly played a decisive role in their edition. However, there is no "neutral" text. Without doubt, Codex Vaticanus B presents the most important majuscule manuscript of the NT (this position is strengthened even more since P^{75} pushes its text for Luke and John back at least to the beginning of the third century—perhaps even farther). However, the theory of a neutral text is obviated by the fact that the letters of Paul illustrate a different textual character in Codex Vaticanus than do the remaining writings.

In the twentieth century the situation changed completely. For the first time textual criticism could deal with the NT text "in the original Greek"—specifically with the Chester Beatty and Bodmer papyri. Moreover, for the first time the complete Greek tradition became available to textual critics. Both circumstances changed the situation fundamentally.

The publication of Eberhard Nestle's (1851–1913) Novum Testamentum Graece (1898) at the Württemberg Bibelanstalt introduced twentieth-century textual criticism. This NT provides nothing more than an average text established according to the majority principle from Tischendorf's and Westcott-Hort's editions. Where divergences were involved, the edition of R. Weymouth was initially used as a standard; from 1901 on B. WEISS's edition served this purpose for deciding what belonged in the text and what belonged in the apparatus. This edition's text was not, strictly speaking, a scholarly work. Nevertheless, it acquired a decisive significance because it summarized text-critical work in the nineteenth century and because the majority principle had eliminated the unique readings of S 01 (Tischendorf) and B (Westcott-Hort). This edition has dominated the scene, especially since 1904, when it was appropriated by the British Bible Society, and since Erwin Nestle (1883–1972) supplemented it from the thirteenth printing in 1927 on with an increasingly improved text-critical apparatus. In comparison, the contemporary pocket editions of H. Vogels (1922, 1955^4), A. Merk (1933, 1984^{10}; repeated in a Greek-Italian ed., 1990), J. Bover (1943, 1968^5), and J. O'Callaghan (1977, 1988^2) played only a limited role because as a rule they allocated too much space to the Byzantine text (dependent on H. von Soden). The following editions are also worth mentioning: (1) A. Souter's first edition appeared in 1910, the second in 1947, with both being reprinted numerous times. Its significance lies in its critical apparatus, not in its text, which accommodates the textus receptus to the 1881 RV. (2) R. Tasker attempted to establish the Greek text underlying the NEB (1964). (3) In 1981 G. Nolli presented an edition (proceeding from Merk) that is inadequate in every respect.

Von Soden's (1852–1914) edition (1902–13) is currently the only completed attempt to establish a "great edition" comparable to those of the nineteenth century. Its goal was announced in the title: "The Writings of the NT in Their Oldest Attainable Textual Form Based on the History of the Text." The decisive weakness of von Soden's work is also addressed in this title. He proposed the scheme of three text types: K (Koine text, Byzantine text), H (Hesychian text, Egyptian text), and I (Jerusalem text). Where two of these three types preserve the same text, we have the archetype still used by ORIGEN. In other words, we have the original text, assuming it had not been corrupted by the influence of TATIAN (the Gospels) or MARCION (Paul).

Even in this case there are considerable doubts. The decisive weakness of von Soden's theory is his assumption of a Jerusalem text, to which he subordinated everything that did not fit elsewhere. Overlooking the fact that Jerusalem was not a great textual center and considering the facts of ecclesiastical history, some decisive consequences arise from von Soden's proposal. If K should emerge as a witness of equal value, and if two text types are sufficient to establish the Urtext, then the combination of the secondary textual form (K) with an empirically nonexistent one (I) must lead to a text that cannot be understood as the Urtext. Nevertheless, von Soden's edition has remained significant because its critical apparatus provides the most complete collection of variants, even though its complicated designations for manuscripts and its arrangement make it difficult to use. (Unfortunately, it evidences many inadmissible printing errors.) The volumes of this edition represent a gold mine that has not yet been fully exploited, although many sensational text-critical discoveries have been culled from it.

S. Legg's editions of Mark (1935) and Matthew (1940) were planned as competitors to the great editions of the nineteenth century, although Legg did not present a critical text, instead using the text of Westcott-Hort. The editions were so severely criticized that the publisher did not accept Legg's already finished manuscript of Luke. In its place an American-British "International Greek NT Project" was initiated, which after forty years of work presented a two-volume edition of Luke (1984–87) and later an edition of John (vol. 1, The Papyry, 1995). This work's significance lies in its inclusive apparatus, which, nevertheless, is not easy to use. The textus receptus was chosen as its text base; thus it must be used as a mirror image, so to speak, if one desires to reconstruct the original text. The textus receptus was not selected on its own merits but (long before an attempt was made to revive it) in order to keep the apparatus briefer by not listing the Byzantine manuscripts.

In comparison to the nineteenth century, changes have occurred with reference to the NT text. Nestle's text (through its 25th ed.), with its mechanical origin and its basis in the understanding and information of the nineteenth century, has increasingly come to be viewed in a critical light. The Württemberg Bibelanstalt (with the express approval of Erwin Nestle) commissioned K. Aland to review the existing text critically in light of new discoveries. He was already involved in this task when the American Bible Society came up with a plan to create its own edition of the NT for its 150th anniversary in 1966. The result was the Greek NT and the Novum Testamentum Graece by Nestle-Aland (present eds.: 4th rev. ed. of Greek NT [1993] and 27th rev. ed. of Novum Testamentum Graece [1993], both edited by B. Aland, K. Aland, J. Karavidopoulos, C. Martini, and B. Metzger). Both editions have the same text; even the punctuation is identical. They differ in their critical apparatus and their goals. The Greek NT is intended for translators. Its critical apparatus preserves two or three variants per page, which are especially important in translating; and the beginning of each apparatus item is marked by capital letters (A, B, C, D) in order to indicate the evaluation of evidence for the text. Novum Testmentum Graece is directed toward students and theologians; therefore, it offers many more variants in its apparatus (up to twenty or more per page). According to an agreement between the Vatican and the United Bible Societies, both editions are to be used as the basis for every translation into different languages or revisions.

Undoubtedly, the text as presented in *Greek NT*3a and Novum Testamentum Graece[26] represents a great advance over the nineteenth-century text. The new papyri were used in establishing it; other manuscript discoveries and connections made between them in the twentieth century, the new editions of the (ancient) translations, and the works of the church fathers were also used. Yet the "new Tischendorf" (an edition with a new text and all the evidence in the critical apparatus deriving from the Greek manuscripts, along with the ancient translations and the church fathers, all of which is necessary for the establishment of the Urtext and of major dates in textual history), which was discussed from the beginning of the twentieth century, did not come to fruition until the end of the century.

After a long time of preparation (special eds.: Das Neue Testament auf Papyrus [1986, 1989, 1994], Das Neue Testament in syrischer Überlieferung [1986, 1991, 1995]; special studies: Text und Textwert der griechischen Handschriften des Neuen Testaments [K. Aland et al., 1987, 1991, 1993, 1998]), in 1997 the Institute for NT Studies in Münster published the first fascicle of the Editio Critica Maior (ECM) of the NT: vol. 4, The Catholic Epistles, installment 1, "The Epistle of James," edited by B. Aland, K. Aland, G. Mink, and K. Wachtel. The Acts of the Apostles will follow the catholic epistles as vol. 2. The ECM offers the full range of textual source materials that is of great significance for first-millennium CE NT text history, including the Greek manuscripts, quotations up to the seventh- and eighth-century Christian writers, and early renderings of the Greek (i.e., Latin, Coptic, Syriac). The ECM, therefore, presents all variant readings that emerged during the first millennium CE and thus allows for the possibility of NT research in the area of textual criticism as well as in transmission history.

For the first time in the history of NT textual study, the selection of Greek manuscripts has been based on an assessment of all preserved manuscript materials. In order to determine the textual value of various manuscripts, the entire NT was covered with a net made up of over 1,200 test passages intended to reveal the distinct characteristics of each manuscript. As a result the vast majority of manuscripts appeared to be of the Byzantine type; only about 500 manuscripts contain larger portions of the ancient text and are, therefore, of special significance for establishing the original NT text. Those manuscripts selected through this procedure will be registered in the ECM together with their variants. The large number of Byzantine manuscripts, which are to a great extent identical, will be represented by a relatively small selection. The complete representation of textual material will not only create a new base for the constitution of the text but will also invite further insights into the history of the NT. Consequently, the text of the NT as we have it today (Novum Testamentum Graece, Greek NT) will be further supported, its base having become much more solid than before.

With each new installment of the ECM will appear supplementary material that will contain a great deal of information expanding the critical apparatus itself: the location of patristic quotations, details as to the readings of the ancient translations, and information about the lacunae of each given manuscript. In addition, each volume of the ECM will be accompanied by supplementary studies in which, among other things, the entire scope of the material will be assessed in a text-critical commentary. All manuscript material will be critically evaluated and further transmission-historical research will be proposed.

The text of the Novum Testamentum Graece and the Greek NT, as it appears to be supported by the ECM, at least in the epistle of James, profited from the decisive transformation that the twentieth century brought to textual criticism, in particular as a result of access to the early papyri but also (even if only partially) because it is now possible to penetrate the entire body of Greek manuscripts. Because of the publications of the institute at Münster, it is possible for anyone to gain access to the materials for the catholic epistles, the letters of Paul, Acts, and the SYNOPTIC Gospels. By using these publications each manuscript can be compared with the others. Thus a new phase of text-critical work has begun—assuming that the experts will take advantage of the currently available possibilities. Thousands of NT manuscripts have not yet been studied with respect to their textual character and value. Until the late twentieth century every judgment made about the placement of manuscripts into families, groups, etc. rested only on the manuscripts that by accident came into the hands of those who discovered them. That type of analysis is now in the past. The volumes in Text und Textwert der griechischen Handschriften des Neuen Testaments (K. Aland et al.) are fully neutral and consciously limited to a presentation of the evidence (see also K. Aland and B. Aland's list of manuscripts [handbook, 1989^2]).

Without reference to the previously established or hypothesized groupings, the manuscripts can be placed into five categories. Category 1 includes manuscripts of special quality, which should always be considered when establishing the original text. Category 2 consists of manuscripts of special quality, which are distinguished from the manuscripts of Category 1 by foreign influence (especially the Byzantine text), but which are important for the establishment of the original text. Category 3 includes manuscripts with an independent text, often significant for the establishment of the original text but especially for textual history. Category 4 consists of manuscripts of the D text. Category 5 includes manuscripts with a purely or predominantly Byzantine text. Readings are assigned to Categories 1-2, which have been adopted from manuscripts with an "ancient" text into manuscripts with the Byzantine text, i.e., the Byzantine text at these places has preserved the original text. This position does not deny the previous results of scholarly investigation (except for von Soden's Jerusalem text) or even question them but makes possible a method of controlling and supplementing them while exhausting the whole material. Thus a path would be open for the systematic classification of all the evidence.

It can be said that only the Byzantine and D text-types are absolutely certain, but no longer should one refer to a "Western" text. The Egyptian papyri from the second half of the third century reveal that the D text developed in stages, and D 05 from the fifth century or its precursor presents only the conclusion of a continuing process of development. The same is true for the Byzantine text and its early manifestation, the Koine, which is not LUCIAN's creation ex nihilo. This text also grew in stages, for it is clear that tendencies characteristic of the Byzantine text could be found in the church at an early period.

The following distinctions may be made for manuscripts preserving an Egyptian text that have heretofore had diverse designations: the Alexandrian text (e.g., P^{75} and B 03) and the Egyptian text (for manuscripts whose text came from Alexandria but especially for those infiltrated by the Byzantine text). As long as the so-called Caesarean text has not been studied extensively, and as long as it has not been discovered widely in the writings of Origen and EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, its existence remains doubtful. Its character might be demonstrated in light of the entire body of existing manuscripts.

The general fundamentals and principles of NT textual criticism can perhaps be summarized as follows: (1) Only one reading can be original, no matter how many variants may exist for a passage. (2) A reading is most probably original if it easily explains the emergence of the other readings (the genealogical principle). It can only be original if the external and internal criteria are in optimal agreement. (3) Textual criticism must always begin with the findings in regard to manuscript transmission. Only then can internal criteria (the context of a passage, the style and vocabulary, the theological ideas of the author, etc.) be considered, for they alone cannot substantiate a text-critical decision. (4) The weight of a text-critical decision depends on the Greek tradition, whereas transmission in the versions and in the church fathers in general only has a controlling and supplemental function. (5) Manuscripts should be weighed not counted, with the specific peculiarities of each manuscript being taken into account. No single manuscript or group of manuscripts should be followed mechanically, even if certain combinations of witnesses deserve to be trusted more than others at the outset. Instead, text-critical decisions must be made on a case-by-case basis (the local principle). (6) Variants may not be dealt with in isolation. The context of the tradition must always be considered. (7) The lectio difficilior is the lectio potior. Nevertheless, this principle may not be applied mechanically. The old maxim lectio brevior = lectio potior is correct in many cases, but likewise it should not be used rigidly. This principle loses its force when the text of certain witnesses does not fit into the framework of the normal rules of textual transmission but instead constantly deviates from them because of a redactor's willful abbreviations and expansions (e.g., D 05). (8) These rules may not be applied in isolation, only in the proper combination. Experience is the best teacher in NT textual criticism. Anyone who has completely collated a single manuscript (preferably more), whether it be an early papyrus, an important majuscule or a minuscule, will acquire a point of view different from the person who only makes spot investigations.

Additional studies of the history of the ancient church are urgently needed. Many text-critical judgments of the past can be explained as arising from a neglect of this premise (the dating of the emergence and development of the lectionaries is typical). The textual history of the NT did not happen in a vacuum but, rather, within the history of the church.

Bibliography: B. Aland and A. Juckel, Das Neue Testament in syrischer Überlieferung (ANTT 7, 14, 1991; 23, 1986, 1995). B. Aland and J. Delobel (eds.), NT Textual Criticism and Church History: A Discussion of Methods (CBET 7, 1994). K. Aland, "The Text of the Church?" Trinity Journal 8 NS (1987) 131-44. K. Aland et al., Studien zur Überlieferung des Neuen Testaments und seines Textes (ANTT 2, 1967); (ed., with others), Die alten Übersetzungen des Neuen Testaments, die Kirchenväterzitate und Lektionare (ANTT 5, 1972); Repertorium der griechischen christlichen Papyri, vol., 1, Biblische Papyri (PTS 18, 1976); Kurzgefasste Liste der griechischen Handschriften des Neuen Testaments (ANTT 1, 1994²). K. Aland and B. Aland, The Text of the NT: An Introduction to the Critical Editions and to the Theory and Practice of Modern Textual Criticism (1989²). K. Aland et al, Text und Textwert der grieschischen Handschriften des Neuen Testaments (ANTT 9-11, 16-19, 20-21, 26-27, 1987, 1991, 1993, 1998). D. A. Black, NT Textual Criticism: A Concise Guide (1994). E. C. Colwell, Studies in Methodology in Textual Criticism of the NT (NTTS 9, 1969). (Various eds.), Das Neue Testament auf Papyrus (ANTT 6, 12, 22, 1986, 1989, 1994). E. von Dobschütz, Eberhard Nestle's Einführung in das Griechische Neue Testament (1923⁴). J. K. Elliott, A Survey of the Manuscripts Used in Editions of the Greek NT (NovTSup 57, 1987); A Bibliography of Greek NT Manuscripts (SNTSMS 62, 1989); (ed.), The Principles and Practice of NT Textual Criticism: Collected Essays of G. D. Kilpatrick (BETL 96, 1990); Essays and Studies in NT Textual Criticism (Estudios de Filogogía Neotestamentaria 3, 1992). K. Elliott and I. Moir, Manuscripts and the Text of the NT (1995). C. R. Gregory, Textkritik des Neuen Testamentes (3 vols., 1900–1909, repr. 1976). Z. Hodges and A. Farstad (eds.), The Greek NT According to the Majority Text (1982). F. G. Kenyon, Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the NT (1912²); The Text of the Greek Bible (1937). B. M. Metzger, The Early Versions of the NT: Their Origin, Transmission, and Limitations (1977); NT Studies: Philological, Versional, and Patristic (NTTS 10, 1980); The Text of the NT: Its Transmission, Corruption, and Restoration (1992³). F. H. A. Scrivener, A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the NT (2 vols., 1894⁴). H. A. Sturz, The Byzantine Text-type and NT Textual Criticism (1984). L. Vaganay and C.-B. Amphoux, An Introduction to NT Textual Criticism (1991²). B. F. Westcott and F. J. A. Hort, NT in the Original Greek (1881).

K. ALAND (rev. B. KÖSTER)

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (c. 350–428)

Known as "the Interpreter," T. is said to have expounded Scripture "in all the churches of the East." However, in the christological controversies he was identified, together with Diodore of Tarsus, as the source of Nestorian error and eventually was condemned in the sixth century. As a result almost all his works have been lost, apart from hostile quotation and some Latin and Syriac translations. Evidence suggests that he commented on almost all the books of the Bible; yet all that survives is the Commentary on the Ten Epistles of St. Paul, which escaped destruction by being attributed to AMBROSE, and the Commentary on John in Syriac. In addition, quite extensive Greek fragments of his commentaries on Genesis, Psalms, and the Gospel of John have been gleaned from the catenae.

T. was the most important and most extreme representative of the ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL. On the whole, his commentaries are brief and consist largely of basic exegetical notes. He discussed linguistic and textual points where difficulties arise about the correct reading or construal of sentences. He commented on the meanings of words and phrases, especially where it is necessary to draw attention to specific biblical meanings. He noted where metaphor and other figures of speech are used and occasionally indulged in etymological explanations. In other words, he was interested in the philological questions raised by the text.

Also characteristic of his commentaries are summaries and paraphrases elucidating the argument in the text (hypotheseis) and introductory notes explaining the situation or background of the material. Often his comments are biographical or historical, e.g., whether PAUL had visited Colossae. Thus it is hardly surprising that modern scholars have stressed T.'s literal or historical approach to Scripture—indeed, in his own day he was accused of treating Scripture as the Jews did, which in Christian parlance meant literally.

However, T. was no modern historical critic. He accepted that David composed the psalms, despite his recognition that some of them referred to events of a later period (David was prophesying). The apostle John was the author of the Fourth Gospel and wrote to ensure that people did not lose sight of Christ's divinity. T. assumed that the NT writers taught what he regarded as orthodoxy, and for him the principal purpose of a commentary was to deal with problem texts, particularly those twisted by the heretics.

On the other hand, T. did insist on distinguishing between OT and NT, interpreting the words of the prophets as sermons and warnings for the prophet's hearers, not simply as messianic predictions. He could not accept christological interpretation of the OT uncritically and denied many of the prophecies and types traditional in Christian exegesis. T. appreciated the eschatological dimension of the NT Scriptures as no one else in this period did. One explanation of the characteristics of his exegesis can be found in his fundamental theological perception of the "two ages": The NT is new, and to find it already present in the OT is to undermine the radical character of the gospel. Another explanation would appear to lie in the area of LITERARY-critical method: T. and the other Antiochene exegetes adopted the techniques of comment practiced in grammatical and rhetorical schools. They were concerned with philology and with the narrative logic of the text rather than with verbal allegory. This background in literary criticism perhaps explains why T. admitted one or two cases where the OT prefigured NT events by mimesis, for here he seems to be accepting the literary-critical commonplace that literature imitates life and adapting it to the traditional Christian way of reading the OT as PROPHECY. Thus Jonah prefigured JESUS, the extraordinary events of his life signifying by mimesis Christ's rejection, his resurrection, and the conversion of the Gentiles.

Works: Theodori episcopi Mopsuesteni in epistolas S. Pauli commentarii (ed. H. B. Swete, 2 vols., 1880–82); Le Commentaire de Théodore de Mopsueste sur le Psaumes (I–LXXX) (ed. R. Devreesee, 1939); Theodori Mopsuesteni Commentarius in evangelium Iohannis Apostoli (ed. J. M. Vost, CSCO 116, 1940), with LT; Commentarius in XII Prophetas (ed. H. N. Sprenger, 1977).

Bibliography: R. Bultmann, Die Exegese des Theodor von Mopsuestia (Habilitationsschrift, postumously pub. 1984). R. Devreesse, Essai sur Théodore de Mopsueste (1948). R. Greer, Theodore of Mopsuestia: Exegete and Theologian (1961). B. A. McDonald, HHMBI, 65-69. J. Quasten, Patrology (1960) 3:401-23. G. J. Reinink, "Die Exegese des Theodor von Mopsuestia in einem anonymen nestorianischen Kommentar zum Neuen Testament," StPatr 19 (1989) 381-91. M. F. Wiles, "Theodore of Mopsuestia as Representative of the Antiochene School," CHB 1 (1970) 489-510. F. M. Young, From Nicaea to Chalcedon: A Guide to Literature and Its Background (1983) 199-213, 393-94. D. Z. Zaharopoulos, Theodore of Mopsuestia on the Bible: A Study of His OT Exegesis (1989).

F. M. YOUNG

THEODORET OF CYRRHUS (c. 393–c. 466)

A leading ANTIOCHENE theologian, exegete, and historian, T. benefited from an upbringing both in Syriac monasticism and in Greek paideia. Although he may not have actually studied with THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, he was thoroughly steeped in his ideas.

T. became the leading spokesman for the Antiochene school at the time of the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, both of which he attended, and was the principal architect of the Symbol of Union in 433, which reconciled moderate Antiochenes to Ephesus. He was deposed in 449 by the "robber council" of Ephesus but returned in triumph to participate in Chalcedon, where he agreed reluctantly to condemn Nestorius. T. authored theological treatises, most of them against CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA; exegetical works covering most of the OT and the epistles of PAUL; and histories of the church and of Syrian monasticism and carried on an extensive correspondence.

In exegesis as in theology T. was Antiochene, but not rigidly so. Like Theodore, he saw type and antitype as the key to an understanding of the relationship between the two testaments and sought to understand HB PROPHECY in its own historical context, following the dictum that "it is proper to prophesy, not just to predict the future, but also to speak of the present and the past" (PG 80:861A). Nonetheless, his first work, a commentary on the Song of Solomon, relied on ORIGEN; and he rejected as "Judaizing" Theodore's denial of any direct applicability of most HB prophecies to Christ.

Probably because of their conciseness, clarity, and moderation, his commentaries, in contrast to those of more celebrated exegetes, have survived intact. Although accepting the SEPTUAGINT as normative, he took an interest in TEXTUAL CRITICISM; a knowledge of Syriac enabled him to use the PESHITTA and gave him some access to the Hebrew text.

Works: PG 80-84; Quaestiones in Octateuchum (ed. W. F. Mardos and A. Saenz-Badillos, 1979); Commentaire sur Isaie (3 vols., ed. J.-N. Guinot, SC 276, 295, 315, 1980–84).

Bibliography: G. W. Ashby, T. of C. as Exegete of the OT (1972). J.-N. Guinot, "T. of C.: Bishop and Exegete," The Bible in Greek Christian Antiquity, (BTA 1, ed. P. M. Blowers, 1997) 163-93; "Présence d'Apollinaire dans l'oeuvre exégètique de T.," StPatr 19 (1989) 166-72. H. J. Lehmann, "Evidence of Syriac Bible Translation in Greek Fathers of the Fourth and Fifth Centuries," StPatr 19 (1989) 366-71. J. Quasten, Patrology (1960) 3:536-54. M.-J. Rondeau, Commentaires patristiques du Psautier 2 (1985) 275-321. F. M. Young, From Nicaea to Chalcedon: A Guide to Literature and Its Background (1983) 265-89, 354-55, 397-98; "Exegetical Method and Scriptural Proof: The Bible in Doctrinal Debate," StPatr 19 (1989) 291-304.

J. W. TRIGG

THEODOTION (2nd cent.)

T. produced a Greek version of the Hebrew scriptures that, technically speaking, is a revision of an earlier TRANSLATION but actually amounts to a new one, since he inserted so many new elements that the underlying base text can be discovered only after minute research. Fragments of his translations of most biblical books have been preserved, in some cases amounting to a complete translation. Large segments were included in ORIGEN's Hexapla.

The background of T.'s translation has become known only in recent years. The Greek scroll of the Minor Prophets, found in Naḥal Ḥever (1952) and published in DJD 7 (1990), contains an early revision of the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) named kaige by D. Barthélemy (1963), and a similar revision is reflected in the following sources: the sixth column of the Hexapla (attributed to T.) and the Quinta (fifth) column of the same work; several segments of the LXX of Samuel–Kings (2 Sam 11:1[10:1]–1 Kgs 2:11; 1 Kings 22–2 Kings); part of the manuscript tradition of the LXX of Judges and the LXX of Lamentations.

In antiquity this anonymous revision was ascribed to T., who apparently lived at the end of the second century CE; hence the translational units ascribed to him also belong to this revision. Consequently the revision is now designated kaige-Theodotion, but it should be noted that this revision's various sources are not uniform in their character. Its presumed early date, toward the end of the first century BCE, solves the so-called proto-Theodotion problem that has long preoccupied scholars.

Barthélemy named the anonymous revision kaige because one of its distinctive features is that the Hebrew particle gam is usually translated with kaige (at least), apparently following the rabbinic hermeneutical rule (see HERMENEUTICS) that each gam in the Bible refers not only to the word(s) occurring after it but also to one additional word (one of the 32 hermeneutical rules [middot] of R. Eliezer ben Yose ha-Gelili, called "inclusion and exclusion").

The revisions of AQUILA and SYMMACHUS are based on the text of kaige-Theodotion rather than on that of the so-called OG translation. This dependence explains the background of the many readings Aquila, Symmacus, and Theodotion have in common. Ancient quotations from these sources are often recorded as "the Three."

T.'s readings are recorded in the Göttingen and Cambridge editions of the LXX and in Field's edition of the Hexapla. The Hebrew text from which the translation was made was virtually identical with the MT.

Bibliography: D. Barthélemy, Les devanciers d'Aquila (VTSup 10, 1963). W. R. Bodine, The Greek Text of Judges: Recensional Developments (HSM 23, 1980). L. J. Greenspoon, Textual Studies in the Book of Joshua (HSM 28, 1983). K. Koch, "Der Herkunft der Proto-Theodotion-Übersetzung des Danielbuches," VT 23 (1973) 362-65. K. G. O'Connell, The Theodotionic Revision of the Book of Exodus: A Contribution to the Study of the Early History of the Transmission of the OT in Greek (HSM 3, 1972). J. D. Shenkel, Chronology and Recensional Development in the Greek Text of Kings (HSM 1, 1968). E. Tov, "Die griechischen Bibelübersetzungen," ANRW II.20.1 (1987) 121-89; The Greek Minor Prophets Scroll from Nahal Hever (DJD 8, 1990).

E. TOV

THEOLOGY, BIBLICAL (to 1800)

While it may be argued that in the seventeenth century J. COCCEIUS's Summa doctrinae de foedere et testamento Dei (1673) or even B. SPINOZA's Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (1670) were types of biblical theology, the technical use of the term biblical theology to describe a new approach to biblical exegesis first entered general use at the end of the eighteenth century. Even then its essence was in some doubt; J. Thiess (1797, 185) commented: "One might well give up the idea of realizing a biblical theology even theoretically, given such different attempts which by their very nature contradict each other. Still the putting together of the true notions of religion which are scattered in the Bible is a worthwhile undertaking, especially for the instruction of the general populace and youth." This comment might almost be made about biblical theology ever since for, unlike certain exegetical disciplines like TEXTUAL or PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM, where the method tends to define the investigation, in biblical theology wide divergences in method and result are typical.

In essence, biblical theology was (and largely still is) an attempt to winnow out of the Bible what is important by the application of standards and techniques that are not necessarily part of the biblical tradition. Before the eighteenth century, exegesis was approached in this manner; however, in the eighteenth century this procedure became both self-conscious and systematic. In order to understand how this development came about as part of a revolution in theological thinking, it is necessary to be aware of how exegesis was affected by both changes in the intellectual climate and new developments in the theory and technique of scholarly work.

Unlike the nineteenth century, the eighteenth century was a period when social discourse ran ahead of social change. Although society as a whole appeared stable, those who moved in the world of ideas felt a growing unease over the separation of things that had been thought to go together. Thus religion and tradition were separated by the new scientific method's demand for proofs even in religion; elite and popular religion were separated by the problem of how to reconcile personal religion with established religion; religion and citizenship were separated by the question of how to belong to two spheres, each with a claim to ultimate authority; and religion and community were separated by the new emphasis on personal responsibility.

Yet despite the upsets these new developments produced in the area of religion, the eighteenth century was characterized, especially in Germany, not so much by growing secularism as by attempts to formulate a religious position less vulnerable to the factors that made the older theologies obsolete. Whatever their opponents may have suggested, even such major critics of orthodoxy as Edelmann, J. Dippel (1673–1734), H. S. REIMARUS, G. LESSING, K. F. Bahrdt (1741–92), and J. B. Basedow (1724–90) all aimed at reforming religion rather than destroying it; and some even appealed to the AUTHORITY OF THE BIBLE for their programs. Inevitably the Bible, considered to be the center of Protestant doctrine, was brought into the day-to-day debates, whether as the object of serious moral objection, thanks to Spinoza and the English Deists (see DEISM), or as the answer to the dislocating effect of new ideas on the structure of society as a whole.

In the theory and technique of scholarly work, several developments were important. First, a new sense of history emerged as it gradually became clear that the people of past ages did not think and act in the same way as their modern successors. Just as historians began to trace the changes that had taken place in church doctrine so also biblical scholars became more aware of the historically conditioned nature of many passages in the Scriptures. It was also realized that different ways of thinking were to be found in the Bible and that an appreciation of these perspectives was necessary before one could begin interpretation, even if one did not wish to follow J. G. HERDER's advice that the only way to understand Hebrew POETRY was to recite it to the rays of the rising sun. By the end of the century the importance of comparative material from other religions began to be felt. Furthermore, technical methods in exegesis were refined, especially in the areas of philology and textual studies. These developments were a source of self-conscious satisfaction among the learned, for in the last quarter of the eighteenth century many scholars agreed that theology had made great strides and that even more astonishing and certain results could be expected.

During the eighteenth century the term biblical theology could be used either conventionally to describe a division of theology as it existed, or exceptionally to make a claim for a radically different departure in theology. In conventional use, "biblical theology" was generally employed with approval, for, in Protestant circles at least, there was a strong sense that all theology must be biblical. "Biblical theology" could also be used to distinguish exegesis from other theological undertakings like systematics or church history. It was generally assumed at the outset of the century that within Scripture there were no inconsistencies (analogia fidei) and that therefore the work of exegesis was to set out the unified system that was to be found there despite appearances to the contrary. It was from this standpoint that collections of biblical texts were made to prove various doctrines like the oneness of God, the nature of the Trinity, or the INSPIRATION of Scripture. Such important texts were known collectively as dicta classica. Perhaps the best-known collection was S. Schmidt's work Collegium Biblicum (1671, 1676^2), whose influence can still be seen in C. von AMMON's choice of texts for comment. In these collections texts were arranged according to the traditional forms of Lutheran orthodox theology with little attention being paid to the circumstances of their origins.

In non-conventional use, "biblical theology" was employed to seize the high ground in controversy; for this purpose it could be invoked by people of very different outlooks. Two examples from much the same time illustrate how the term could be given different associations. In the middle of the eighteenth century, C. Döderlein (not to be confused with the more important J.

Döderlein), writing from the Pietist tradition (1758; see PIETISM), argued that the use of philosophy has always had a deleterious effect on the correct interpretation of the Bible. Although he began with HILLEL, it is clear that his main target was theologians who made use of the new philosophy of the Enlightenment, in particular S. BAUMGARTEN. In fact Döderlein was echoing P. J. SPENER's use of the term biblical theology; the difference is that Spener's target was a moribund Lutheran orthodoxy while Döderlein's was the new impulses set loose by Baumgarten and others.

That biblical theology could almost simultaneously be used to support the opposite position is shown by A. Büsching, a student of Baumgarten's who had lost faith in his master's system. Büsching's inaugural dissertation (1756) appears to be an unremarkable, even pedestrian, work; but in two later editions, published in Lemgo (1757; GT 1758), he showed his rationalist leanings, thinly disguised as a series of questions appended to the texts he listed.

It tended to be the radicals who appealed to the Bible to justify their position. For example, although Bahrdt (1769/70) claimed to interpret the Bible, in reality he presented his own radical Enlightenment view of religion with very little attention to the evidence. J. HOFMANN (1770) provided one possible answer to Bahrdt's sort of radicalism and perhaps to Bahrdt himself. An able, if somewhat conservative, representative of orthodoxy, Hofmann criticized those who extol the Bible only to disparage theology and who proclaim the words of Scripture only to proscribe the meaning of Scripture from the church of Christ. For Hofmann, apart from popularizing it for the unlearned, there were two ways of treating theology, one that is drawn from the Bible alone and the other that includes the writings of theologians who have translated into their own words what Scripture teaches. The first, biblical theology, is better for winning the minds of learners; the second, for seeing the totality of religion at a single glance. Both are to be done together. Hofmann then went on to deplore the neglect by those who call themselves theologians of the study of Scripture.

In many disputes the difficulty lies, not with the clarity of the argument, but with the pertinency of the evidence. By the latter part of the eighteenth century, it was no longer possible to overlook the fact that, as well as being unsystematic, the Bible does not lend itself easily to systematization; there are simply too many passages that are inconsistent, irrelevant, or offensive. In theory the arguments of Hofmann or even of Döderlein are most attractive, and similar arguments are still offered today. But apart from the philosophical difficulties involved, the fact is that the radicals were right about individual passages far too often to be ignored. The question was whether a new synthesis could be found that would allow for both the value of the Bible and honesty about moral convictions and exegetical insights.

Biblical theology emerged as a response to the factors discussed above; the ensuing disagreements among its four most prominent advocates (G. Zachariae, J. P. Gabler, Ammon, and G. Bauer) about its nature sprang from the particular factors each author was responding to. All four would have agreed that it was necessary to combine new methods of exegesis and the new awareness of biblical thought-worlds in the work of interpretation, while at the same time they had no doubt that the Bible's essential significance was to be defended. All four would have echoed in some way the general feeling that the Bible is best suited for the instruction of the unlearned (note the views of J. Theiss and of Hofmann, above); all would also have agreed that not everything in the Bible is suitable for this purpose. Their differences begin after this point.

ZACHARIAE belonged to an earlier generation for whom philosophy was much less problematical in matters of religion. The defense and explanation of revelation could be left in the hands of the philosophers. Biblical theology should distinguish between what was only of historical importance in the Bible and what was meant as a message to all people of all times; here the eighteenth-century emphasis on universality is apparent. In the wake of the new emphasis on system as part of science, Zachariae felt that some sort of order, albeit not the strict order of dogmatics, should be produced in a biblical theology; just the collection of random evidence was not enough.

GABLER agreed to a great extent with Zachariae but introduced more strongly the distinction between religion and theology: Religion is the minimum knowledge necessary to live a Christian life, whereas theology is the preserve of the learned. The eighteenth-century worry about the danger to public order if common people did not have adequate beliefs is apparent here. For Gabler, the work of biblical theology was to seek out the universal truths embedded in the historical circumstances of Scripture; in effect, such a biblical theology was identical with religion and was to be distinguished from dogmatic theology, although it formed the basis of the latter. Gabler also emphasized that Israel's religion should be seen as a historical entity entitled to study in its own right.

Ammon refused to find any sort of intermediate doctrinal order in the Bible, arguing that the Easterners who wrote the Bible were more attracted to the products of fantasy than to the demonstrations of reason. However, he saw a virtue in the diversity within the Bible, for, whereas a systematic presentation of religion was the product of a single mind, in the Bible different people could find images appropriate to their own view of religion. In this respect Ammon is almost in complete opposition to Gabler's emphasis on finding universal truths behind the diversity of Scripture. Rather than being a throwback to the older collegium biblicum, however, it is apparent that Ammon's work reflects another eighteenth-century concern: How does one reconcile the reality of private religion with the need for public statements, such as creeds? It was also Ammon's conviction that God's gradual revelation to humanity is reflected in the documents of the Bible.

Of all the early biblical theologians, G. BAUER was the most prolific, writing various books around the theme of biblical theology. He came much closer than Ammon to Gabler's demand for a historical treatment of Israel's religion; but Gabler felt that although Bauer was methodologically more correct, Ammon was frequently the deeper commentator on individual passages. In fact, Bauer was already beginning to move into a type of biblical theology that is simply a history of Israel's religion focused on scholarship, without concern for the relevance of the Bible to current religion. Here his area of concern was very different in emphasis from that of the other three writers.

The emergence of biblical theology in the eighteenth century, then, should be seen not as a simple linear development of a desire to separate biblical theology from the dominance of systematics but, rather, as the result of a parallelogram of forces, social, philosophical, religious, and scholarly. It had as much to do with the society of its writers as with the society of the Bible; as such it was a curious amalgam destined by its very nature to be unstable. On the other hand, without some interplay with the world of its readers, the Bible would have become a dead letter, as irrelevant to society in general as the soon to be recovered Babylonian or Egyptian religion (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES).

Bibliography: C. F. von Ammon, Entwurf einer reinen biblischen Theologie (1792); Entwurf einer Christologie des alten Testaments (1794); Biblische Theologie (3 vols., 1801–22). K. Bahrdt, Versuch eines biblischen Systems der Dogmatik (2 vols., 1769/70). G. L. Bauer, Theologie des alten Testaments (1796); Theologie des Neuen Testaments (4 vols., 1800–1802); Beylagen zur Theologie des alten Testaments (1801); Biblische Moral des Alten Testaments (2 pts., 1804–5). A. Büsching, Theologiae e solis Sacris Litteris concinnatae et ab omnibus rebus et verbis scholasticis purgatae (1756, 1757; GT, Gedanken von der Beschaffenheit und dem Vorzug der biblisch-dogmatischen Theologie vor der scholastischen [1758]). C. Döderlein, Feyerliche Rede von den hohen Vorzügen der biblischen Theologie vor der Scholastischen (1758). H. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth and Nineteenth-century Hermeneutics (1974) 165-82. J. P. Gabler, "De justo discrimine theologiae biblicae et dogmaticae regundisque recte utriusque finibus," Kleinere Theologische Schriften (1831) 2:179-98. J. Hofmann, Oratio de Theologiae biblicae praestantia (1770). G. Hornig, Die Anfänge der historisch-kritischen Theologie: J. S. Semlers Schriftverständnis und seine Stellung zu Luther (1961). W. F. Hufnagel, Handbuch der biblischen Theologie (2 vols. [vol. 2 incomplete], 1785, 1789). H.-J. Kraus, Die Biblische Theologie: Ihre Geschichte und Problematik (1970). K. Leder, Universität Altdorf: Zur Theologie der Aufklärung in Franken. Die Theologische Fakultät in Altdorf, 1750–1809 (1965). O. Merk, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments in ihrer Anfangszeit (1972). M. Saebø, "J. P. Gablers Bedeutung für die Biblische Theologie," ZAW 99 (1987) 1-16. J. Sandys-Wunsch, "G. T. Zachariae's Contribution to Biblical Theology," ZAW 92 (1980) 1-23. J. Sandys-Wunsch and L. Eldredge, "J. P. Gabler and the Distinction Between Biblical and Dogmatic Theology: Translation, Commentary, and Discussion of His Originality," SJT 33 (1980) 133-58. R. Smend, "J. P. Gablers Begrundung der biblischen Theologie," EvTh 22 (1962) 345-57. J. O. Theiss, Einleitung in die neuere Geschichte der Religion, der Kirche, und der theoligischen Wissenchaft (1797). G. T. Zachariae, Biblische Theologie oder Untersuchung des biblischen Grundes der vornehmsten theologischen Lehren (5 vols., 1771–85).

J. SANDYS-WUNSCH

THEOLOGY, NEW TESTAMENT

The roots of a critical understanding of NT theology are to be found in the Reformation principle of sola scriptura. In the attempt to free the Bible from the authority of the church, the Bible itself, having to stand on its own, became the subject of critical scrutiny. The work of R. SIMON illustrates the development of the critical process: Simon showed, especially through TEXTUAL CRITICISM, that at many points the Bible is textually unreliable; e.g., the ending of Mark (16:9-20) and the story of the adulteress (John 7:53–8:11) are not supported by the earliest manuscripts. In both Lutheran and Reformed orthodoxy, however, the Bible came under a new form of church dominance in the compendia of biblical texts, referred to as biblical theologies, that were supposed to form the foundation of church dogma.

The crucial breakthrough to a theology of the NT as we know it came with the programmatic inaugural address of J. P. GABLER on Mar. 30, 1787, in Altdorf in Bavaria, in which he called for a clear distinction between the tasks of biblical and dogmatic theology. For him, biblical theology had to be free from determination by dogmatic theology so that theologians had a sound biblical basis for the production of a dogmatic theology. The purpose of biblical theology is to mediate between the plain teachings of biblical religion and the subtle, sophisticated formulations of dogmatic theology. To enable biblical theology to accomplish its task effectively, Gabler further divided it into two distinct steps: "true" biblical theology, which presents biblical religion in a historical, systematic fashion, and "pure" biblical theology, which distinguishes between contingent features that are valid only in particular historical circumstances and truths that are valid for all times.

Gabler's program, further divided into HB and NT theology, has been praised for establishing biblical theology as a separate discipline. In the new discipline's subsequent history this independence was misconceived as meaning that HB and NT theology had no relationship to dogmatic theology. Consequently, HB and NT scholars took upon themselves the task of dogmatic theology as well, no longer distinguishing between what Gabler identified as the distinctive tasks of biblical and dogmatic theology.

It was left to F. C. BAUR to define what it means to provide a thoroughly historical interpretation of the NT. He showed that it is insufficient to clarify the historical circumstances of individual writings; what is needed is a clarification of the history by which the various writings are interconnected. He came to this understanding for the first time in his famous article "Die Christuspartei der korintischen Gemeinde, der Gegensatz des paulinischen und petrinischen Christentums in der ältesten Kirche, der Apostel Petrus in Rom" (1831, repr. 1963). In this study he recognized the interaction of three religious forms, the first two of which—natural religion and Judaism—continued to function after their absorption into the third—the developing Christian religion. In the course of his future work, he increasingly fixated on a schema of NT history characterized by the opposed tendencies of a Petrine-Jewish and a Pauline-pagan form of Christianity that moved toward a synthesis in the developing Roman Catholic Church. However, whatever objections may be raised against Baur's highly schematized understanding of the history of primitive Christianity, he must be credited with making it inescapably clear that no NT writing can be understood adequately unless it is interpreted in terms of its place in the development of primitive Christian history.

Baur's student D. F. STRAUSS had a different understanding of history. In contrast to the opposition between a supernaturalist and a naturalist form of interpretation (the latter had one of its most eminent interpreters in H. S. Reimarus), Strauss proposed a mythological interpretation, drawing on the insights of the MYTHOLOGY school of J. G. EICHHORN, Gabler, G. BAUER, and W. DE WETTE. In his famous Das Leben Jesu (1835), he played off the supernaturalist and naturalist interpretations of the Gospels against each other to show that only a mythological interpretation could do them justice. In this interpretation he was inspired by the conviction that the NT expresses universal ideas, not of a single individual, but of primitive Christian communities over a longer period of time: "By NT myths nothing else is to be understood than the expression of primitive Christian ideas formulated in spontaneously poeticizing legends" (Ger., 1:75). With regard to JESUS, Strauss wrote, on the one hand, that Jesus "held and expressed the conviction that he was the Messiah; this is an indisputable fact" (ET 1846, 2:6; 1972, 284; Ger., 2:469), although Strauss developed the idea only gradually (ET 1846, 2:6-13; 1972, 284-88; Ger., 2:469-75). On the other hand, he wrote, "The author is aware that the essence of the Christian faith is perfectly independent of his criticism. The supernatural birth of Christ, his miracles, his resurrection and ascension, remain eternal truths, whatever doubts may be cast on their reality as historical facts" (ET 1846, 1:xi; 1972, lii; Ger., 1:VII).

Baur complained that in his inquiry Strauss had ignored historical factors, e.g., the interrelationships between the Synoptics (see SYNOPTIC PROBLEM) and the history of their origins. Strauss did indeed ignore that aspect of NT history; but he drew attention to another equally, if not more important, aspect—namely, that history takes place, not at the level of literature, but in the reflections of ordinary believers from whom emerged the conceptions that subsequently became the subject matter of the NT writings. The impetus Strauss gave to the investigation of that aspect of history was taken up later in the century in the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE (RGS).

J. WEISS indicated the direction the RGS would take in his study of the kingdom of God in Jesus' preaching (1892; ET 1971). W. BOUSSET, a fellow member of the RGS, replied critically to Weiss (1892), stating in his preface that, although he admired A. RITSCHL's understanding of the kingdom of God as an ethical ideal, that concept of the divine kingdom had nothing in common with the similarly named concept in Jesus' teaching. Jesus' teaching was grounded in the Jewish apocalyptic idea of two world orders, the present evil age and the future age of the kingdom of God, which would be inaugurated by a cataclysmic event. Jesus could be understood only in terms of the Jewish apocalyptic thought-world in which he lived.

Weiss's conception was subsequently popularized by A. SCHWEITZER (1906; ET 1910, 1913, repr. 1966), who called an end to the liberal quest for the historical Jesus. This quest, according to Schweitzer, sought Jesus, "believing that when it had found Him it could bring Him straight into our time as a Teacher and Saviour. It loosed the bands by which He had been riveted for centuries to the stony rocks of ecclesiastical doctrine, and rejoiced to see life and movement coming into the figure once more, and the historical Jesus advancing, so it seemed, to meet it. But he does not stay; He passes by our time and returns to his own" (ET 1910, 397; Ger. 1966, 620). All that remains that is relevant for the present is the Spirit, through whom we can still encounter Jesus. "He comes to us as One unknown, without a name, as of old, by the lake-side, He came to those men who knew Him not. He speaks to us the same word: 'follow me!' and sets us to the tasks which He has to fulfill for our time" (ET 1910, 401; Ger. 1966, 630).

Schweitzer (1913) had brought the liberal quest for the historical Jesus to a close as a negation, not of its feasibility, but of Jesus' compatibility with nineteenth-century liberal thought. In Schweitzer's interpretation Jesus was willing to take on himself the burden of the suffering that preceded the transition between the two apocalyptic ages after it became clear to him that suffering was demanded of him to fulfill for the rest of humanity the petition he had taught his followers, "Lead us not into temptation (travail)." Consequently, because Jesus provoked the Jewish authorities into executing him in order to usher in the kingdom of God, he could be understood only within the framework of Jewish APOCALYPTICISM. Here Schweitzer did not discuss the work of M. KÄHLER (1892; ET 1964), who brought the liberal quest for the historical Jesus to an end in a different, more radical way by showing that the "historical" Jesus was purely a product of the historians and had nothing to do with the Jesus who actually lived. The Gospels do not provide the kind of information on which a life of Jesus could be reconstructed; they could more appropriately be understood in the category of sermon.

In response to Weiss's study, Bousset, evidently remaining in this regard within the bounds of nineteenth-century liberalism, argued that even though Jesus was a participant in first-century Judaism he could not be comprehended fully in terms of that thought-world. Another reason, however, may have motivated Bousset's negative reaction. The conception of apocalypticism with which Weiss (1892) operated and, similarly, Schweitzer (1913), was relatively mild. When Weiss was writing his book, Bousset and H. GUNKEL, another member of the RGS, were involved in more far-reaching investigations of Jewish apocalypticism, resulting in Gunkel's (1895) and Bousset's (1895) works that inaugurated the RGS's new method of interpretation in which NT Christianity was understood as a development within the framework of first-century Hellenistic religions. In both of these writings, the world of Jewish apocalypticism was no longer considered alien to the NT but as the thought-world out of which it emerged. The bizarre nature of the Jewish apocalypticism described by Gunkel and Bousset may explain why Bousset was unwilling to accept Weiss's claim that Jesus is understandable only within such a framework.

Other important works also reflect the method of the RGS. Bousset (1913; ET 1970) traced the "history of the belief in Christ from the beginnings of Christianity to Irenaeus." W. WREDE (1897; ET 1973) outlined the task for a so-called NT theology as the description of the history of primitive Christianity as a developing religion, for which the NT writings and all of primitive Christian literature are relevant up to the time of the apologists, who mark a new turn in Christianity's development. Wrede (1901; ET 1971) also argued that the motif of a messianic secret in Mark's thought determined the structure of the Gospel, thus anticipating what in the middle of the twentieth century became popularly known as REDACTION CRITICISM.

The influence of the RGS came to an end with the rise of dialectic theology, initiated by K. BARTH (1919; ET 1933). The change in atmosphere in theological thinking is clearly expressed by R. BULTMANN, who can be considered as belonging to a second generation of the RGS, in the introduction to the fifth edition of Bousset's Kyrios Christos (1913; ET 1970): "Today we can ask whether [the intention of the RGS to present the religion of primitive Christianity and to use the NT as a source for this] can do justice to the NT, and whether we are not rather to turn back again to the old question about the theology of the NT" (VI; ET, 9).

What sparked dialectic theology was the collapse of confidence in Western culture brought about by WWI, ushering in a mood of existential anxiety and alienation that lasted into the middle of the twentieth century. Barth (1921; ET 1933) argued that in 1 Corinthians 15 PAUL was not concerned with the "last things," which are expected to happen apocalyptically at the end of the present age and so effectively remain on the plane of history, but with the "end things," which occur whenever a person becomes aware of standing before the Almighty. Bultmann accepted Barth's interpretation of what Paul tried to communicate in the chapter but maintained that in expressing the meaning of the end, as understood by Barth, Paul used the apocalyptic language of his own time. In that way Bultmann accepted simultaneously the fundamental insights of both Barth's dialectical approach and those of the RGS. Through Sachkritik, a critique of an author's forms of expression on the basis of the intended subject matter, it was possible to distinguish between the subject matter and the means of its expression. Bultmann elaborated this method of interpretation with great care in his program of demythologizing (1941), where he translated the meanings that were expressed in mythological language in the NT into existentialist language. Bultmann used the existential concepts developed by his colleague M. Heidegger (1889–1976) to translate into contemporary language the meanings expressed in mythological language in the NT. This method of interpretation did not derive from the philosophy of Heidegger, nor did it peel off the mythological shell to get at the kernel of the intended meaning; but, as in the German Entmythologisieren (cf. the English "demythologize"), it delved into the meanings through mythological language and reformulated them in existentialist language.

Through the work of the philologist C. Lachmann (1935), C. WILKE (1838), the philosopher C. WEISSE (1838), and H. HOLTZMANN (1892), the problem of the relationship between the Synoptics found a solution that has become standard in NT scholarship: the so-called two source theory, according to which Mark was the oldest Gospel, and in an earlier version, one of the sources of the other two Synoptics. The remaining common material in Matthew and Luke, almost exclusively sayings, comes from a second shared source, referred to by the abbreviation Q for the German word for source, Quelle. In the same year as the appearance of Barth's Der Römerbrief, two works appeared that signaled a new approach to the study of the Synoptics that had significant implications for NT theology. K. SCHMIDT (1919) argued that Mark reveals that the oldest Jesus tradition "was not a continuous report, but a multitude of individual anecdotes that have been arranged generally according to a material point of view" (317); and M. DIBELIUS (1959[3]; ET 1965) investigated the forms of the synoptic tradition. These works were followed by Bultmann's study (1921, 1958[4]; ET 1968[2]), in which he focused on the layers of development of the traditions in the Synoptics. Each of these works questioned the ability of NT scholars to reconstruct a life and the thought of the historical Jesus and highlighted the role of the church in the formulation of the Gospel materials.

Bultmann subsequently wrote a book in which he claimed to do no more than present a picture of Jesus as he was seen in the earliest layers of the tradition (1926; ET 1934). In a later work (1948–53; ET 1951–55) he presented Jesus' teaching as being only a presupposition for the theology of the NT (1; ET, 3) because the Christian faith emerged only with the early church's faith in Christ, which originated in the post-resurrection appearances of Jesus. Bultmann carried out his program of existentialist interpretation of the NT with incomparable skill and consistency in this work, an achievement that remains without rival as a theological interpretation of the NT.

Bultmann's understanding that Jesus' teaching was only the presupposition for an NT theology, that the history of Jesus, except for the mere fact of his having existed, was of no significance for the development of the Christian faith, led to opposition among his own followers, initiated by an address by E. KÄSEMANN (1954; ET 1982) at the annual meeting of Bultmann's students, "die alte Marburger," in 1953. Schweitzer had brought the liberal quest of the historical Jesus to a conclusion with a Jesus who returned to his own time without relevance for the present, except when we discover his Spirit as the disciples did of old "by the lake-side." Liberal theology wanted to move back from Jesus the Hellenistic Savior, as presented especially by Paul, to Jesus the teacher of simple ethical truths. In dialectic theology and what followed in Bultmann's existentialist interpretation, it was precisely Jesus the Christ, the Lord, as presented in the writings of Paul and John, who was in the foreground. In the new quest of the historical Jesus, the movement was once more back to the historical Jesus, but now no longer by abandoning the Christ, as he was understood in the developing Christian church; to the contrary, there was an attempt to find the Christ of the church in the Jesus of history. Expressing what was at stake theologically, Käsemann (1964; ET 1969) assessed a decade of investigation of the relationship of the Christ of the church to the historical Jesus that produced works by G. BORNKAMM (1956) and H. Conzelmann (1959), a collection of essays on the historical Jesus by E. FUCHS (1960; ET 1964), and another "alte Marburger" address, in this case by H. BRAUN (1957).

Käsemann especially took issue with Bultmann's assertion that only the fact of Jesus' existence was decisive for NT theology, which Bultmann reasserted in his Heidelberger address (1960; ET 1964), in which he assessed with a certain skepticism the so-called new quest of the historical Jesus. Käsemann also took issue with Braun's claims that the only continuity between Jesus and the early church was the constancy of the self-understanding and that there was no historical continuity, especially not in the christology, positions for which Bultmann commended Braun in his address because he was the only one who carried out "the intention of an existentialist interpretation most consistently" (21). Käsemann objected that "with the predicate 'Christian' [in such interpretations] we bring to expression an understanding of existence of the world for which Jesus is merely the spark, and Christ the mythological cipher." What was at stake in the quest launched by Käsemann's 1953 address (1954) was the grounding of the early church's proclamation in Jesus' teaching. According to Käsemann, anything short of that would be a surrender to docetism.

Käsemann objected to Bultmann's program of interpretation on two more crucial points: eschatology and the understanding of God's justice. A key feature of Bultmann's existentialist interpretation was the dehistoricizing of eschatology, as Barth had already done (1921; ET 1933). Eschatology was to be understood in the sense of an encounter with God at every moment, not as something that lay, apocalyptically, at the end of history. Käsemann found this devaluation of history untrue to the NT and appealed to apocalypticism, which Bultmann had taken to be the mere form of Paul's expression in 1 Corinthians 15, to reaffirm the importance of history. By means of apocalyptic imagery, Paul expressed his understanding that salvation does not merely concern the individual but also all of creation. This concern for the world as God's creation was already present in Käsemann's return to a quest for the historical Jesus and is stated succinctly in his formulation that for Paul the body meant "this piece of the world that I am," signifying the human being's intricate binding to the world. Käsemann was unwilling to surrender the world as God's creation to godless powers, and in this sense he wrote that he learned theology from the Nazis—that is, in his rejection of the Nazi claim that theology belonged in the church; and the world, to the Nazis. In a similar way he interpreted the justice of God in Paul, not as a limitation to the existential justification of the individual sinner, but as an expression of God's concern for all of creation.

For his protests Käsemann received qualified support but also opposition from within the school, e.g., Conzelmann's polemic against his comment that apocalypticism was the "mother of theology" (1965; ET 1966). Since these controversies in the Bultmann school, very little of theological interest has happened in NT interpretation.

Anglo-Saxon, specifically British, NT interpretation has gone its own way, using methods developed to counter deistic arguments (see DEISM). This approach, summarized by C. LESLIE, reached its apogee with W. PALEY (1790, 1794). Paley defined the tasks of the interpreter as establishing the truth of the biblical evidence and basing interpretation on that evidence; i.e., the task of the interpreter is to evaluate and interpret the evidence, not to substitute alternative information. From that point of view, the concern of German scholarship to uncover what lies behind the biblical evidence, particularly as practiced by the RGS, becomes incomprehensible. This is nowhere clearer than in the work of J. Dunn, in which the term evidence recurs (1985). In an earlier work (1980) Dunn musters an incredible amount of information from the environment of the NT only to conclude: "We cannot claim that Jesus believed himself to be the incarnate Son of God; but we can claim that the teaching to that effect as it came to expression in the later first-century Christian thought was, in the light of the whole Christ-event, an appropriate reflection on and elaboration of Jesus' own sense of sonship and eschatological mission" (254). This reminds one of M. Hooker's (1959) conclusion that the influence of Isaiah 53 as an interpretation of Jesus' suffering was relatively late and that, therefore, the idea of the suffering messiah could have originated only from Jesus, not in terms of the concept of the messiah, but of the Son of man. "Jesus realized that the Son of Man himself must suffer with his people, since he alone was the perfectly righteous man" (162).

Similar claims for the reliability of the evidence characterize the work of W. MANSON: "The nerve of the argument is that when we examine the early Christian convictions . . . we find a singular unanimity. It is natural to infer that such close agreement between men as different as Peter and Paul is the result neither of accident nor design; that their claims for Jesus tally because they are founded on facts" (1956, 215-16). C. H. DODD may have provided the most precise formulation of this principle: "[A Christian philosophy of history] must in the end account for all the facts accessible to our observation, but it starts from the Christian valuation of a particular set of facts" (1938, 25). British interpretation has remained inductive throughout its history, which has the advantage of allowing the biblical material to speak for itself without the interpreter trying to control it through critical inquiry. In that regard even where there was agreement between British and German scholars concerning the results of their research, they were still worlds apart in what it meant. For British scholars, the results confirmed their evidence; for German scholars, it was the results themselves on which one had to rely.

Over the past decades a large number of new methodologies have been developed, most of the time going begging for questions to which they might be able to provide the answers: LITERARY interpretation (A. Wilder, W. Beardslee, R. Funk, J. D. Crossan, D. Via, R. Tannehill, N. Peterson, S. Moore), the social background of the NT (G. Theissen, W. Meeks, A. Malherbe, J. Gager), linguistics/semantics (E. Güttgemanns, E. Nida, J. Louw, D. Hellholm), STRUCTURALISM/SEMIOTICS (D. Patte, J. Delorme), rhetoric (H. Betz; W. Wüllner; G. Kennedy), to mention only a few. Significant other work concerning NT interpretation in this period was the expansion of what has traditionally been called introduction to the NT to a history of early Christian literature, as had been proposed by Wrede (1901), P. VIELHAUER (1975), and H. Koester (1982; ET 1982). Furthermore, E. P. Sanders (1977) corrected the mistaken understanding of works righteousness as a characteristic feature of rabbinic Judaism, an insight crucial for the interpretation of Paul.

Among significant NT theologies that have appeared since the late nineteenth century, apart from Bultmann's in 1948–53, the following are worth mentioning: H. Holtzmann (1896–97), A. SCHLATTER (1909–10); P. FEINE (1910, 1951[8]); H. WEINEL (1911); M. Meinertz (1950); J. BONSIRVEN (1951; ET 1963); H. Conzelmann (1967; ET 1967); K. Schelkle (1968–76; ET 1971–78); J. JEREMIAS (1971; ET 1971, the first volume of an uncompleted NT theology); W. KÜMMEL (1969; ET 1973); E. Lohse (1974); L. GOPPELT (1975–76; ET 1981–82); H. Hübner (1990–95); P. Stuhlmacher (1992); A. WEISER (1993); J. Gnilka (1994). Other significant works related to the issue of an NT theology are O. CULLMANN (1946, ET 1964; 1965, ET 1967) in which he posed, in opposition to Bultmann's dehistorisizing existentialist approach, an understanding of the NT as the culmination of the history of salvation. The above list reveals a remarkable absence of significant comprehensive works on NT theology in the almost three decades between Weinel (1911) and Bultmann (1948–53), whereas the four decades beginning with Bultmann saw thirteen major new works.

An important development in recent study is the inclusion of the input and circumstances of "marginals" (blacks, women, the poor) in the interpretive process, thereby expanding the hermeneutical horizon (although that frequently results in a corresponding tendency to include only in the horizon a limited number of these groups). The most promising of these may be the reappropriation of the Bible by Latin American LIBERATION THEOLOGY at a popular level (from where the impetus came) as well as in scholarly circles. In Latin America the distance between the NT and the contemporary situation, which was created by historical criticism, has been reversed by placing primary focus on the situation of the interpreter who addresses the biblical texts for answers. The immediacy of the situations of the interpreter and of the biblical text, which sometimes border on the naïve, nevertheless produces new hermeneutical insights. At the scholarly level the implications of these insights are being investigated, e.g., by C. Boff (ET 1987) and J. Croatto (1987) in order to establish sound principles through which they can be made more fruitful.

Bibliography: W. Baird, History of NT Research (1992). K. Barth, Der Römerbrief (1919; ET 1933); Die Auferstehung der Toten (1921; ET 1933). F. C. Baur, "Die Christuspartei der korintischen Gemeinde, der Gegensatz des paulinischen und petrinischen Christentums in der ältesten Kirche, der Apostel Petrus in Rom," TZT (1831) 61-206 (repr. in K. Scholder, ed., F. C. Baur: Ausgewählte Werke in Einzelausgaben 1 [1963] 1-146). H. Boers, What is NT Theology? The Rise of Criticism and the Problem of a Theology of the NT (1979). C. Boff, Theology and Praxis: Epistemological Foundations (ET 1987). J. Bonsirven, Théologie du nouveau testament (1951; ET 1963). G. Bornkamm, Jesus von Nazareth (1956). W. Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum (1892); Der Antichrist in der Überlieferung des Judentums, des Neuen Testaments, und der alten Kirche (1895); Kyrios Christos (1913; ET 1970). H. Braun, "Der Sinn der neutestamentlichen Christologie," ZTK 54 (1957) 341-77. R. Bultmann, Die Geschichte der synoptischen Tradition (1921, 1958[4]; ET 1968[2]); Jesus (1926; ET 1934); "Neues Testament und Mythologie," Offenbarung und Heilsgeschehen (1941) 27-69 (repr. in H.-W. Bartsch, ed., Kerygma und Mythos [1951] 15-53; ET [1953] 1-44); Theologie des Neuen Testaments (2 vols., 1948–53; ET, 2 vols., 1951–55); Das Verhältnis der urchristlichen Christusbotschaft zum historischen Jesus (1960; ET 1964). H. Conzelmann, "Jesus Christus," RGG[3] 3 (1959) 619-53; "Zur Analyse der Bekenntnisformel I. Kor. 15, 3-5," EvTh 1, 2 (1965) 1-11 (ET, Int 20 [1966] 15-25); Grundriss der Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1967; ET 1967). J. Croatto, Biblical Hermeneutics: Toward a Theory of Reading as the Production of Meaning (1987). O. Cullmann, Christus und die Zeit: Die urchristliche Zeit- und Geschichtsauffassung (1946; ET 1964); Heil als Geschichte (1965; ET 1967). M. Dibelius, Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (1959[3]; ET 1965). C. H. Dodd, History and the Gospel (1938). W. Doty, Contemporary NT Interpretation (1972). J. Dunn, Christology in the Making (1980); The Evidence for Jesus (1985). P. Feine, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1910, 1951[8]). E. Fuchs, Zur Frage nach dem historischen Jesus (1960; ET of a selection in Studies on the Historical Jesus [1964]). J. Gnilka, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1994). L. Goppelt, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (2 vols., 1975–76; ET 1981–82). H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit: Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen 1 und Ap Joh 12 (1895). H. J. Holtzmann, Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1892); Lehrbuch der neutestamentlichen Theologie (2 vols., 1896–97). M. Hooker, Jesus and the Servant: The Influence of the Servant Concept of Deutero-Isaiah in the NT (1959). H. Hübner, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (3 vols. 1990–95). J. Jeremias, Neutestamentliche Theologie (1971; ET 1971, 1st vol. of an uncompleted NT theology). M. Kähler, Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche biblische Christus (1892; ET 1964). E. Käsemann, "Das Problem des historischen Jesus," ZTK 51 (1954) 125-53 (ET in Essays on NT Themes [1982] 15-47); Das Verhältnis der urchristlichen Christusbotschaft zum historischen Jesus (1960; ET 1964); "Sackgassen im Streit um den historischen Jesus," Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen 2 (1964) 31-68 (ET, NT Questions of Today [1969] 23-65). H. Koester, Einführung in das Neue Testament (1982; ET 1982). W. Kümmel, NTHIP (1958; ET 1972); Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments nach seinen Hauptzeugen (1969; ET 1973); Das Neue Testament im 20. Jahrhundert (1970). C. Lachmann, "De ordine narrationum in evangeliis synopticis," TSK 8 (1935). E. Lohse, Grundriss der neutestamentlichen Theologie (1974). W. Manson, "The Life of Jesus: Some Tendencies in Present-day Research," The Background of the NT and Its Eschatology (ed. W. D. Davies and D. Daube, 1956) 215-16. M. Meinertz, Einleitung in das Neue Testament (2 vols., 1950). O. Merk, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments in ihrer Anfangszeit (1972). R. Morgan, "Introduction: The Nature of NT Theology," The Nature of NT Theology (1973) 1-67. R. Morgan with J. Barton, Biblical Interpretation (1988). W. Paley, Horae Paulinae, or The Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul Evinced (1790); A View of the Evidences of Christianity (1794). H. Räisänen, Beyond NT Theology: A Story and a Programme (1990). E. P. Sanders, Paul and Palestinian Judaism: A Comparison of Patterns of Religion (1977). K. Schelkle, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (4 vols. 1968–76; ET 1971–78). A. Schlatter, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments und die Dogmatik (2 vols., 1909–10). K. Schmidt, Der Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (1919, repr. 1964). A. Schweitzer, Geschichte der Leben-Jesu-Forschung (1913, repr. 1966); Von Reimarus zu Wrede (1906; ET 1910). D. F. Strauss, Das Leben Jesu (1835; ET, The Life of Jesus Critically Examined [tr. G. Elliot, 1846; new ed. 1972]). G. Strecker (ed.), Das Problem der Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1975). P. Stuhlmacher, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1992). P. Vielhauer, Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur (1975). H. Weinel, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments: Die Religion Jesu und des Urchristentums (1911). A. Weiser, Theologie des Neuen Testaments II: Die Theologie der Evangelien (1993). J. Weiss, Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes (1892; ET 1971). C. H. Weisse, Die evangelische Geschichte, kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (2 vols., 1838). C. Wilke, Der Urevangelist oder exegetisch kritische Untersuchung über das Verwandschaftsverhältnis der drei ersten Evangelien (1838). W. Wrede, Über Aufgabe und Methode der sogenannten neutestamentlichen

Theologie (1897; ET 1973); Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien: Zugleich ein Beitrag zum Verständnis des Markusevangeliums (1901; ET 1971).

H. BOERS

THEOLOGY, OLD TESTAMENT

Biblical theology emerged as an independent area of inquiry in the eighteenth century together with, and as a consequence of, historical study of the Bible (L. Baumgarten-Crusius [1828] 4). Historical-critical study also posed the principal problems confronting the discipline it helped to create. These problems were seen to center on determining what in the Bible was of abiding validity in view of its irreducibly historical character. J. P. GABLER's solution was to join the "grammatical-historical" interpretation of Scripture to a theory of human reason's "development by stages" (C. Hartlich and W. Sachs [1952] 46). He made it the task of OT and biblical theology to extract from historically determined modes of expression the unchanging truth contained in them so that it could be delivered to dogmatics for contemporary elaboration (Hartlich-Sachs, 22-46; B. Ollenburger [1985]).

One implication of Gabler's proposal is that the HB is lower than the NT on reason's developmental scale. G. BAUER adopted this view already in 1796 when he published the first OT theology. In arguing that OT and NT theology must be distinguished from each other and carried out independently from dogmatics, and in his emphasis on religious ideas or concepts and their historical development from particular to universal, Bauer set the tone for the nineteenth-century discussion. The following briefly sketches the main lines of this discussion during and after the nineteenth century, especially as carried on in German Protestant circles (Ollenburger [1992]).

1. From Philosophy to History. The first OT theologies of the nineteenth century, contained in the biblical theologies of C. AMMON, W. DE WETTE, and G. Kaiser (1781–1847), were set within a philosophical framework. For Ammon the task of biblical theology was to provide a more adequate foundation for dogmatic theology through a critical study of the texts in order to free them from the "nimbus of illusory ideas" (1801). Thus he cited the traditional proof texts of doctrinal loci and tested them against the criterion of rationality. That criterion, understood in a Kantian moral sense (see I. KANT), Ammon regarded as crucial because only what is judged rational can be carried over into dogmatics.

De Wette's approach was somewhat more historically oriented, but the method of his Biblische Dogmatik (1813[1]) is grounded in the Kantian anthropology of J. Fries (J. Rogerson [1984] 36-41). This anthropology provided de Wette a hermeneutical foundation (see HERMENEUTICS) for understanding the HB's religious ideas in their purity, distinguished from the mixed historical forms that clothe them (1831). The first task of OT theology, then, is to identify the "fundamental idea on which everything depends" (38), which is "the moral idea, free of myth, of one God as a holy will" (63). This idea is expressed in Hebraism's "ideal universalism" and in its "symbolic particularism," which de Wette identified with the theocracy. He claimed that Israel was prone to misunderstand this particularism by reducing the universal character of God's rule to nationalism, thus preparing the way for Judaism. Unfortunately, this claim appeared in various forms in many subsequent HB theologies.

Kaiser provided a different kind of framework, subsuming the HB under "the universal history of religion" and ultimately, under "the universal religion." The particularity of HB religion (Judaism) is to be understood only in relation to religion in general, and then, together with Christianity and all other particular religions, taken up into a genuine catholicism (1813, 12). By describing the "principal moments" of religion in a dialectical fashion and drawing random insights from philosophy, Kaiser pared from the HB the temporal ideas that must be left behind in the universal religion of humanity. In the process he invented new categories for this task, such as geofetishology, anthropotheology, cosmocraty, demonophany, using this monstrous vocabulary much as Ammon and de Wette used the vocabulary of philosophy and dogmatics to get beyond the HB's particularity but producing in his case a vacant universalism.

Alongside and occasionally in response to those philosophically grounded presentations were others that sought to proceed in a purely historical manner. Baumgarten-Crusius made the first attempt in 1828, followed immediately by C. GRAMBERG. However, they were overshadowed in both methodological clarity and influence by D. von COELLN, who modeled his presentation of OT theology on de Wette's but claimed that neither de Wette nor anyone else had fulfilled the strictly historical requirements of OT theology. From Coelln's work it is clear that what he really opposed was the use of philosophical categories. His understanding of OT theology's task—to differentiate the universal from the particular or the "inexact forms of representation" from the "pure concepts" hidden in them (1836, 1:11)—was otherwise hardly different from de Wette's. Following Bauer, Coelln argued that these judgments can and must be made by historical criticism, which follows the HB's religious ideas in their process of formation through the NT, where they are deepened and broadened to form the basis of a universal religion (1:4). OT theology was for him, as it was for de Wette and Baumgarten-Crusius, the first chapter of historical theology (R. Dentan [1963] 33) and one foundation of dogmatic theology.

The methodological tension between the philosophical and historical approaches was resolved in a higher unity—aufgehoben, as he put it—by W. VATKE, whose Biblische Theologie (1835) was the only part of a proposed six-part biblical theology he was permitted to publish (M. Brömse [1984]). OT theology must be historical, Vatke argued, because it pursues the idea of HB religion, expressed in its various religious representations, through the "principal moments" of its historical development. But historical criticism by itself is subjective; it is not concerned with truth because it is not properly scientific (Vatke, 156). It can only achieve scientific status and relative objectivity by being taken up into a philosophically grounded conceptual analysis. G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831) provided the tools for such an analysis, which is scientific because it comprehends the most universal horizon possible, history as a whole. Conceptual analysis will necessarily be historical because the concept of a religion is unfolded in a historical dialectic: The subjectivity of the concept and the objectivity of its manifestations are resolved in the idea of Israel's religion. Hegel's philosophy was thus Vatke's hermeneutical foundation for a theological understanding of the history of HB religion.

While Vatke's OT theology was grounded in a philosophical method, it was also the first to have a thoroughly historical character, thus exhibiting a remarkable harmony of method and form. The most notable of his historical observations was that the system of legislation in the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) came after and not before the prophets (204). That observation had its effect in the later elevation of the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) to the pinnacle of HB religion (J. Blenkinsopp [1984] 8-9). Vatke also presaged later developments by emphasizing the need to understand Israel's religion from the perspective of its completed history. His philosophical language is as dense as Kaiser's is monstrous, but Vatke's methodological rigor and consistency remain unexcelled.

2. From Salvation History to History of Religion. Vatke's synthesis did not survive him—B. BAUER's equally Hegelian work (1838) took no account of historical criticism—but his historical organicism was taken up, apart from a Hegelian framework, by a series of conservative scholars oriented to salvation history (Heilsgeschichte): J. Steudel (1840), H. HÄVERNICK (1848), G. OEHLER (1845), J. von HOFMANN, and H. SCHULTZ (1869). They were influenced to greater or lesser extents by a tradition of mystical PIETISM and speculative history rooted in Württemberg and Tübingen (L. Diestel [1869] 698-708) and absorbed by Hegel and by F. Schelling (1775–1854) as well (J. Toews [1980] 13-26). Salvation historians put particular emphasis on the facts (Tatsachen) of God's activity in Israel, which constitute its history as an organic whole. They further assumed that the history narrated in the HB corresponds more or less to an actual course of events within world history and should be the central subject matter of OT theology, and that participation in the spirit of revelation is a condition for understanding this history (Oehler 32-34; Schultz, 1:72). Steudel, Hävernick, and Oehler were unable, however, to display their historical emphases in the body of their OT theologies, which thus reflect a certain inconsistency between theory and execution.

This inconsistency was overcome by von Hofmann, particularly in his Schriftbeweis. He wrote no separate OT theology but conceived biblical and historical theology to be engaged in testing systematic theology's exposition of what each (Protestant) Christian is absolutely certain: reconciliation with God through JESUS Christ. According to Hofmann, the trinitarian life of God unfolded first into the world's history and then into Israel's, giving each biblical fact and each text its necessary place within the organic sequence of salvation history. The power and consistency of Hofmann's thought is as awesome as his language is forbidding. In that and other respects he resembles Vatke.

The salvation historians were soon overshadowed by the historians of religion, particularly by J. WELLHAUSEN, as is demonstrated in Schultz's career. In 1848 Schultz edited Hävernick's work, and the first edition of his own Alttestamentliche Theologie (1869) reflects the influence both of the salvation historians and of H. EWALD. In the second edition (1878), however, he accepted Wellhausen's late dating of the law and in subsequent editions (through 1896) moved still further toward history of religion. The first to conceive OT theology purely as the history of Israel's religion was A. Kayser in 1886 (the third and following editions of his work, titled Geschichte der Israelitischen Religion, were written by K. Marti).

H. GUNKEL and the history-of-religion school (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE) brought the writing of OT theologies to a temporary halt, not because they were not theologians—"Biblical exegesis is theological exegesis" (Gunkel [1913] 24)—but because they conceived theology to be concerned with religion as opposed to dogmatics. Religion, Gunkel declared, is fundamentally piety, to be discovered in the HB by penetrating to the inner life of its authors (25). Gunkel wanted to go behind the religious representations and concepts of the HB in order "to be present at the birth of its deepest thoughts" (1926–27, 533). B. STADE, a friend and follower of Wellhausen, wrote an OT theology as late as 1905, even though Gunkel and his circle had already made it an anachronism. Stade defined OT theology in a way reminiscent of G. Bauer: It has the task of tracing the origin and progressive development of those religious ideas that formed the content of Jewish faith and are "for that reason the historical presupposition of Christianity" (1905, 2). He also wanted to distinguish those HB religious concepts whose development can be traced into Judaism but were not taken up by Jesus and his apostles. Consequently,

"the NT is the best source for the theology of the OT" (1893, 93).

The stalemate to which Wellhausen and Gunkel helped bring OT theology eventually spawned a series of reflections on method from different points of view by HB scholars united only in their agreement that OT theology had to be conceived anew (J. Hayes and F. Prussner [1985] 151-66). J. Köberle (1906) repudiated the history-of-religion movement and suggested a return to salvation history, beginning from the NT and a concept of revelation adequate to Christian faith. W. STAERK granted history of religion its due but called for systematic and philsophical reflection on the historical data from a phenomenological point of view so that OT theology may "come to its fulfillment as a component of systematic theology, which it was from the beginning and which it must remain" (1923, 390). R. KITTEL complained that in the contemporary academic climate of fascination with Mesopotamian parallels (see PAN-BABYLONIANISM), it was as if extra babylonem nulla salus (outside of Babylon there is no salvation; 1921, 96). History-of-religion research must be expanded into OT theology, he argued, by employing a philosophy of dogmatics of religion in order to penetrate to the HB's essence and truth. C. STEUERNAGEL (1925) proposed the systematic presentation of HB religion in categories drawn from its historical analysis, without borrowing either these categories or OT theology's methods from philosophy or dogmatics.

This methodological discussion concluded with a debate between O. EISSFELDT (1926; ET 1992) and W. EICHRODT (1929; ET 1992). Eissfeldt claimed that the history of Israelite and Jewish religion should be sharply distinguished from OT theology, since they employ two different approaches that correspond to different functions of the human spirit: active knowing and passive believing. History of religion is objective, although it depends on an "empathetic reliving" of its object (20), and it makes no judgments about validity or truth. OT theology, on the other hand, cannot be a historical inquiry because it is concerned with what is timelessly true as determined by a particular confession. Eissfeldt assumed that historical-critical research could not penetrate to the "proper essence" of HB religion and was thus unable to answer the questions of faith assigned to OT theology. In Eichrodt's judgment, this view preserved the integrity of history of religion but compromised that of OT theology by moving it outside the framework of HB scholarship and of historical inquiry generally.

Eichrodt argued in response that historical investigation could reach the essence of HB religion, but he redefined the essence of the HB as that "deepest meaning of its religious thought world which historical investigation can discover" through an analysis that cuts across the various historical levels of the HB (1992, 33). He argued further that all historical research presupposes a subjective moment and that the interpreter's Christian confession provides the content of that moment in OT theology, which must be considered a legitimate part of historical scholarship.

3. From Eichrodt to von Rad. Eichrodt went beyond these arguments in his Theology of the OT (1933–39; ET 1961–67). In both his theological understanding of history and his threefold division of OT theology—God and the people, God and the world, God and the human—he drew heavily on his teacher, O. PROCKSCH, whose own treatment was published posthumously in 1950. Eichrodt's decisive innovation was his proposal to center all of OT theology around the idea of covenant as the concept that "enshrines Israel's most fundamental conviction—namely, its sense of a unique relationship with God" (17). While the term covenant appears infrequently or not at all in some parts of the HB and has various meanings elsewhere, Eichrodt appealed to a "stock of spiritual values firmly established at the outset," which lies behind the OT's diversity and attends its "incessant growth" (32) and which is historically expressed through covenant. Criticisms of Eichrodt often fail to attend to the particular way in which he spoke of covenant and especially the importance he attached to Moses as the founder of Israel's religion; it was through Moses' direct and unmediated "intercourse with God" (293) that Israel was introduced to "a new understanding of the whole nature of God" (290) in the opening moment of its history. Thus the structure of Israel's religion was the product of the charismatic endowment of one personality, Moses the mediator; and to understand the forces at work at its beginning is to grasp its enduring essence—and the NT as its fulfillment (26). It is in these terms that Eichrodt understood the concept of covenant and for these reasons that he insisted on its historical origin with Moses.

The coherence Eichrodt achieved between the historical and the systematic components of OT theology marked his work as an advance over the earlier contemporary efforts by E. KÖNIG (1923) and E. SELLIN (1933); and it was not superseded by the later ones of L. KÖHLER (ET 1957), E. Jacob (ET 1958), and T. VRIEZEN (ET 1958). While Eichrodt finally broke through the methodological impasse in OT theology brought about by the history-of-religion school, his work may also be seen as the crowning achievement of history of religion in OT theology, especially when it is compared with E. TROELTSCH's comments in "The 'Dogmatics' of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule" (1913).

After Eichrodt, the methodological debate addressed the question of what, if not covenant, constituted the center (Mitte) of OT theology (R. Smend [1970]). G. von RAD concluded that such a debate was beyond resolution, since there is no unifying center to the various theologies within the HB. He argued that both the history-of-religion approaches and the more recent systematic efforts had failed to identify and to carry out the theological task of OT theology, whose proper subject matter is neither the reconstructed history of Israelite religion nor the HB's thought-world but "Israel's own explicit assertions about Jahweh" (1962, 105). These assertions were made primarily in the form of historical confessions, whose growth and development provided the key to both the growth of the Hexateuch (1966) and OT theology's method. Israel reshaped its historical confessions, its saving history, in a continuing "process of actualization" (1962, 119) that enabled each generation to understand itself as Israel, God's people. OT theology, according to von Rad, has the task of interpreting Israel's history as Israel presented it, not as critical scholars are able to reconstruct it, because in this confessed and narrated history is to be found "what Israel herself regarded as the proper subject-matter of her faith, namely, the revelation in word and deed of Jahweh in history" (114). From this it followed for von Rad that the TRADITION-historical method has the best fit with OT theology (1965, 321) and that "re-telling [Nacherzählen] remains the most legitimate form of theological discourse on the OT" (1962, 121).

In this way von Rad gave the Hexateuch and the historical books central place in OT theology; the prophets required separate treatment because they proclaimed an interruption in the saving history (1962, vii), while the psalms and wisdom literature were treated under the category of "Israel's answer." This arrangement of the presentation follows consistently from von Rad's premises. Since "Israel's faith is grounded in a theology of history" (1962, 106), the traditions that give foundational testimony to that faith are theologically prior to others that judge Israel's life in relation to its confession or that engage in reflection in relation to it or in independence from it. In thus demonstrating his own priorities von Rad claimed merely to be following those of the HB.

Even though von Rad was heavily influenced by a line of HB theologians reaching from Hofmann to Procksch, his Theology marked a radical departure in the history of the discipline (R. Martin-Achard [1984] 14). By identifying OT theology's subject matter with the HB's historical confessions, he wanted to avoid either confusing salvation history with some objective history or resolving theological diversity by appealing to a putative center, a dogmatic scheme, or some underlying piety. At the same time, his sharp differentiation of the history of Israel, as reconstructed by scholars, from the history narrated in the HB and his refusal to identify a principle of unity (prior to the NT) were seen by critics to constitute major problems for OT theology. Consequently, his Theology prompted a vigorous reassessment of the method and task of OT theology (H. G. Reventlow [1985] 59-133).

4. The Discussion After von Rad. The methodological reassessment has not yet been concluded, and no new consensus has emerged. The problem of the relation between OT theology and history remains unresolved and is perhaps insoluble in the way it has often been cast (G. Michalson [1985]). Efforts have been made to go beyond von Rad's distinction between "narrated" and "objective" history by insisting on the priority of objective history (F. Hesse [1958]; G. E. Wright [1970]; R. de Vaux [1972]) by uniting history and tradition (R. Rendtorff; Smend [1977] 49-68), by challenging the Enlightenment conception of history (C. Westermann [1985]), or by concentrating on a philosophical hermeneutics that dissolves the problem (Reventlow [1979]). H. Gese, on the other hand, attempted to expand von Rad's method by giving it an ontological grounding that identifies the history of tradition with revelation (1974, 11-30; 1977, 301-26). In a similarly idealistic vein, P. Hanson has taken Israel's confessional tradition to be a response to historical events understood in terms of a divinely guided dialectical expansion of reality (1978, 1986). In quite a different direction, J. BARR (1976) and J. Collins (1979) suggest turning to the notion of story or "history-like" narrative (see H. Frei [1974]); similarly, D. Patrick (1981) pursues a literary-dramatic approach centering on the identity of Yahweh. More recently, Collins (1990) has proposed a historically critical biblical theology that examines biblical assertions about God for their functional role in motivating behavior, while L. Perdue announces "the collapse of history"—the erosion of historical categories as dominant within OT theology—in light of both internal problems and the emergence of diverse questions, issues, and methods.

Meanwhile, proposals to resolve the second major problem presented by von Rad—that of OT theology's center or simply the organizaton of its material—have been equally diverse. Some scholars have suggested that Yahweh, or the concept of God, should serve as a center (G. Hasel [1974]; J. McKenzie [1974] 23-28; R. Clements [1978] 23-24); but it is not clear that this solves or even addresses the problem. W. ZIMMERLI went further by proposing the name Yahweh as OT theology's center but understanding "center" in a dynamic way that emphasizes God's freedom in revealing the divine self to Israel through act and word as witnessed in the HB (see G. Coats [1985] 245). In this way he could emphasize with von Rad the narrative character of Israel's confession and could at the same time accept the insight of Wellhausen and of Smend that "Yahweh the God of Israel" must be taken along with "Israel the people of Yahweh" (1980, 445-47; Smend [1970]; see G. Fohrer [1972]). Westermann reflects even more clearly the influence of von Rad in giving central place to the historical, verbal character of OT theology (1982), but he goes beyond von Rad by contrasting the "saving God" to the "blessing God" in the HB and locating the dimension of blessing within the comprehensive framework of creation. H. Schmid has carried this last point still further by proposing that it is creation, and not history or saving history, that constitutes the comprehensive horizon of OT theology.

H. Preuss's recent work returns to Eichrodt's more systematic conception of OT theology, which has to offer "an overview of the world of faith and witness of the OT" (1995, 1). Preuss argues that the center and fundamental structure of that faith is "YHWH's historical activity of electing Israel for communion with his world," which obligates Israel and the nations (25). O. KAISER pursues a similar course but claims that the Torah is the HB's center, while its theological unity lies in the "basic relation" of Yahweh to Israel and the "basic equation" of righteousness and life, which the first commandment brings together (1993, 350).

5. New Departures. Several scholars in North America, working in the wake of the biblical theology movement's collapse (B. Childs [1970]), have departed radically from Eichrodt and von Rad. E. Martens (1981) organizes OT theology around Yahweh's programmatic promises in Exod 5:22–6:8. S. Terrien (1978) brings together the variety of HB (and NT) materials under a number of dialectically related motifs governed by God's elusive presence, thereby integrating dimensions of Israelite faith left peripheral by Eichrodt and von Rad. W. Brueggemann has suggested reducing the dialectic to two poles: "God's omnipotence and God's pathos" (corresponding to "structure legitimation" and "the embrace of pain"; 1986, 70; 1992). For P. Hanson the dialectic is between the visionary and the pragmatic dimensions of the community (1978, 1986), while for J. Sanders it is the dynamic of stability and adaptability in the canonical process (1976, 1984). CHILDS, prescinding from bipolar dialectics, also ascribes central importance to the CANON; he differs from Sanders in his emphasis on the canonical (final) shape of the text as providing the proper context and object of theological inquiry (1985). R. Knierim, in his proposal for a systematic OT theology, claims that neither tradition-historical nor CANONICAL approaches are adequate; rather than providing a solution, they raise acutely the problem of the HB's plural theologies. Knierim seeks to discern semantic priorities among the various theologies in the HB in order to correlate them systematically while preserving their individual character.

If OT theologians in the early and mid-nineteenth century worried about giving the discipline a properly historical character, some scholars at the end of the twentieth century are concerned with its theological character. For Childs this has meant joining the OT and NT of the Christian Bible, as canonical witness to Jesus Christ, in a biblical theology that converses freely and critically with dogmatic theology (1992; similarly, F. Watson [1997]). Brueggemann intends his Theology of the OT to be both Christian and theological but not strictly confessional: A Christian reading of the HB respects the availability of its theology to other than Christian construals (1997, 199). R. Rendtorff (1993), recently appreciative of Childs's emphasis on the canon, has a particular concern for Christian conversation with Judaism, a concern that intensifies with O. Kaiser's invocation of Bultmann's reference to Israel's history as a disaster (Kaiser [1993] 86) and with A. Gunneweg's insistence on the NT as the criterion for Christian reception of the HB (1993, 36; contrast M. Oeming [1987] 237). While, or because, Gunneweg reads the HB in this manner, he conducts his OT theology as a history of Israel's religion. For different reasons R. Albertz (1994–96), among others, argues that in the current situation the history of Israel's religion has greater merit for the discipline than does OT theology. The debate between Eissfeld and Eichrodt still lives.

6. Conclusion. The situation at the end of the twentieth century is marked by great variety and also by debate about OT theology's appropriate aims, the way it should conceive its material, and the strategies it should employ—signs of ill health, perhaps, or possibly of vitality (Ollenburger [1995]). Brueggemann, whose Theology adopts a courtroom metaphor, argues that the HB is disputatious, offering both testimony and counter-testimony (1997, 317). P. Trible's FEMINIST proposal, which puts issues of gender and sex at the forefront, articulates a counter-testimony to prevailing models and interests, as does I. Mosala's work from South Africa, which critically interrogates biblical texts and their interpreters. Jewish scholars have offered constructive proposals (for Tanakh theology, M. Goshen-Gottstein [1987]), trenchant criticism of past and current practice, and substantive theological interpretation (J. Levenson [1993]). OT theology, with its increasing diversity, has not evolved into the kind of stable, foundationalist discipline that Gabler envisioned. We may regard this as the secret of its life and of its several resurrections.

Bibliography: R. Albertz, A History of Israelite Religion in the OT Period (2 vols., 1994–96). C. F. Ammon, Biblische Theologie (3 vols., 1792, 1801–22). J. Barr, "Story and History in Biblical Theology," JR 56 (1976) 1-17. B. Bauer, Die Religion des Alten Testamentes in der geschichtlichen Entwicklung ihrer Principien (Kritik der Geschichte der Offenbarung, 1838). G. L. Bauer, Theologie des alten Testaments, oder, Abriss der Religion Begriffe der Alten Hebraer (1796). L. F. O. Baumgarten-Crusius, Grundzüge der biblischen Theologie (1828). J. Blenkinsopp, "OT Theology and the Jewish-Christian Connection," JSOT 28 (1984) 3-15. M. Brömse, "W. Vatkes philosophische Theologie im Streit der Polemik und Apologie," Vergessene Theologen des 19. und frühen 20. Jahrhunderts (ed. E. Herms and J. Ringleben, 1984) 129-45. W. Brueggemann, "The Costly Loss of Lament," JSOT 36 (1986) 57-71; OT Theology: Essays on Structure, Theme, and Text (ed. P. D. Miller, 1992); Theology of the OT: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (1997). B. S. Childs, OT Theology in a Canonical Context (1985); Biblical Theology of the Old and New Testaments (1992). R. E. Clements, OT Theology: A Fresh Approach (1978). G. W. Coats, "Theology of the HB," The HB and Its Modern Interpreters (The Bible and Its Modern Interpreters 1, ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker, 1985) 239-62. J. J. Collins, "The 'Historical Character' of the OT in Recent Biblical Theology," CBQ 41 (1979) 185-204; "Is a Critical Biblical Theology Possible?" The HB and Its Interpreters (Biblical and Judaic Studies 1, ed. W. H. Propp et al., 1990) 1-17. D. G. C. von Cölln, Die biblische Theologie (1836). W. M. L. De Wette, Lehrbuch der christlichen Dogmatik in ihrer historischen Entwicklung dargestellt (1831[3]). R. C. Dentan, Preface to OT Theology (1963). L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testamentes in der christlichen Kirche (1869). W. Eichrodt, Theology of the OT (3 vols., 1933–39; ET, 2 vols., 1961–67); "Does OT Theology Still Have Independent Significance Within OT Scholarship?" The Flowering of OT Theology (ed. B. C. Ollenburger et al., 1992) 30-39. O. Eissfeldt, "The History of Israelite-Jewish Religion and OT Theology," The Flowering of OT Theology (ed. B. C. Ollenburger et al., 1992) 20-29. G. Fohrer, Theologische Grundstrukturen des Alten Testaments (1972). H. W. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative (1974). J. P. Gabler, "An Oration on the Proper Distinction Between Biblical and Dogmatic Theology and the Specific Objectives of Each," The Flowering of OT Theology (ed. B. C. Ollenburger et al., 1992) 489-502. H. Gese, Vom Sinai zum Zion: Alttestament (BEvT 64, 1974); "Tradition and Biblical Theology," Tradition and Theology in the OT (ed. D. A. Knight, 1977) 301-26. J. Goldingay, Theological Diversity and the Authority of the OT (1987). M. H. Goshen-Gottstein, "Tanakh Theology: The Religion of the OT and the Place of Jewish Biblical Theology," Ancient Israelite Religion (ed. P. D. Miller et al., 1987) 617-44. C. P. W. Gramberg, Kritische Geschichte der Relgionsideen des Alten Testaments (2 vols., 1829–30). H. Gunkel, Reden und Aufsätze (1913); "The 'Historical Movement' in the Study of Religion," ExpTim 38 (1926–27) 532-36. A. H. J. Gunneweg, Biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments: Eine Religionsgeschichte Israels in biblisch-theologischer Sicht (1993). P. D. Hanson, Dynamic Transcendence (1978); The People Called: The Growth of Community in the Bible (1986). C. Hartlich and W. Sachs, Der Ursprung des Mythosbegriffes in der modernen Bibelwissenschaft (1952). G. F. Hasel, "The Problem of the Center in the OT Theology Debate," ZAW 86 (1974) 65-82; OT Theology: Basic Issues in the Current Debate (1991[4]). H. A. C. Hävernick, Vorlesungen über die Theologie des Alten Testaments (1848). J. H. Hayes and F. Prussner, OT Theology: Its History and Development (1985). F. Hesse, "Die Erforschung der Geschichte Israels als theologische Aufgabe," KD 4 (1958) 1-19. J. C. K. Hofmann, Der Schriftbeweis (1852–55); Interpreting the Bible (1860; ET 1959). E. Jacob, Theology of the OT (ET 1958). G. P. C. Kaiser, Die biblische Theologie (1813–21). O. Kaiser, Der Gott des Alten Testaments: Theologie des AT, vol. 1, Grundlegung (1993). A. Kayser, Die Theologie des alten Testaments (1886). R. Kittel, "Die Zukunft der alttestamentlichen Wissenschaft," ZAW 39 (1921) 84-99. R. P. Knierim, "The Task of OT Theology," The Task of OT Theology: Substance, Method, and Cases (1995) 1-20. J. Köberle, "Heilsgeschichtliche und religionsgeschichtliche Betrachtungsweise des Alten Testaments," NKZ 17 (1906) 200-222. L. Köhler, OT Theology (ET 1957). E. König, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1923). J. D. Levenson, Sinai and Zion: An Entry into the Jewish Bible (1985); Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (1988); The HB, the OT, and Historical Criticism (1993). J. L. McKenzie, A Theology of the OT (Doubleday Image Book, 1974). E. A. Martens, God's Design: A Focus on OT Theology (1981). K. Marti, Geschichte der Israelitischen Religion (1897). R. Martin-Achard, Permanence de l'Ancien Testament (1984). G. E. Michalson, Jr., Lessing's "Ugly Ditch": A Study of Theology and History (1985). I. J. Mosala, Biblical Hermeneutics and Black Theology in South Africa (1989). G. F. Oehler, Prolegomena zur Theologie des Alten Testaments (1845). M. Oeming, Gesamtbiblische Theologien der Gegenwart (1987[2]). B. C. Ollenburger, "Biblical Theology: Situating the Discipline," Understanding the Word (ed. J. T. Butler et al., 1985) 37-62; "From Timeless Ideas to the Essence of Religion: Method in OT Theology Before 1930," The Flowering of OT Theology (Sources for Biblical and Theological Study 1, ed. B. C. Ollenburger et al., 1992) 3-19; "OT Theology: A Discourse on Method," Biblical Theology: Problems and Perspectives (ed. S. J. Kraftchick et al., 1995) 81-103. D. Patrick, The Rendering of God in the OT (OBT 10, 1981). L. G. Perdue, The Collapse of History: Reconstructing OT Theology (OBT, 1994). H. D. Preuss, OT Theology (OTL, 2 vols., 1995–96). O. Procksch, Theologie des Alten Testaments (1950). G. von Rad, OT Theology (2 vols., 1962–65); The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays (1966). R. Rendtorff, "Alttestamentliche Theologie und israelitisch-jüdische Religionsgeschichte," Zwischenstation: FS fur K. Kupisch 60 (ed. H. Gollwitzer and J. H. E. Wolf, 1963) 208-22; Canon and Theology: Overtures to an OT Theology (OBT, 1993). H. G. Reventlow, "Basic Problems in OT Theology," JSOT 11 (1979) 2-22; Problems of OT Theology in the Twentieth Century (ET 1985). J. W. Rogerson, OT Criticism in the Nineteenth Century (1984). J. A. Sanders, "Adaptable for Life: The Nature and Function of Canon," Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God (ed. F. M. Cross et al., 1976) 531-60; Canon and Community: A Guide to Canonical Criticism (GBS, 1984). H. H. Schmid, "Creation, Righteousness, and Salvation: 'Creation Theology' as the Broad Horizon of Biblical Theology," Creation in the OT (IRT 6, ed. B. W. Anderson, 1984) 102-17. H. Schultz, Alttestamentliche Theologie (1869, 1878; ET, 2 vols., 1892). E. Sellin, Israelitisch-Judische Religionsgeschichte (Alttestamentliche Theologie auf religionsgeschichtlicher Grundlage, 1933). R. Smend, Die Mitte des Alten Testaments (ThStud 101, 1970); "Tradition and History: A Complex Relation," Tradition and Theology in the OT (ed. D. A. Knight, 1977) 49-68. B. Stade, "Über die Aufgaben der biblischen Theologie des Alten Testaments," ZTK 3 (1893) 31-51; Biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments (Grundriss der theologische Wissenschaften, 1905). W. Staerk, "Religionsgeschichte und Religionsphilosophie in ihrer Bedeutung für die biblische Theologie des Alten Testaments," ZTK 21 (1923) 389-400. J. C.

F. Steudel, Vorlesungen über die Theologie des Alten Testaments (1840). C. Steuernagel, "Alttestamentliche Theologie und alttestamentliche Religionsgeschichte," Vom Alten Testament (ed. K. Budde, 1925) 266-73. S. Terrien, The Elusive Presence: Toward a New Biblical Theology (Religious Perspectives 26, 1978). J. E. Toews, Hegelianism: The Path Toward Dialectical Humanism (1980). P. Trible, "Five Loaves and Two Fishes: Feminist Hermeneutics and Biblical Theology," TextsS 50 (1989) 279-95. E. Troeltsch, "The 'Dogmatics' of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule," AJT 17 (1913) 1-21. W. Vatke, Die Biblische Theologie wissenschaftlich dargestellt (1835). R. de Vaux, "Is It Possible to Write a 'Theology of the OT?' " The Bible and the Ancient Near East (1972) 49-62. T. C. Vriezen, An Outline of OT Theology (1958). C. Westermann, Elements of OT Theology (1982); "The OT's Understanding of History in Relation to that of the Enlightenment," Understanding the Word (ed. J. T. Butler et al., 1985) 207-19. G. E. Wright, "Historical Knowledge and Revelation," Translating and Understanding the OT (ed. H. T. Frank and W. L. Reed, 1970) 279-303. W. Zimmerli, OT Theology in Outline (1978); "Biblische Theologie: 1. Altes Testament," TRE (1980) 6:426-55.

B. C. OLLENBURGER

THEOPHILOS OF ANTIOCH (late 2nd cent.)

A second-century bishop of Antioch in Syria, T. wrote three apologetic books to a certain Autolycus. The first contains echoes of HB cosmology in materials related to prayers (1:6-7). The second provides the earliest Christian commentary on the creation stories (2:11-28). T. followed Hellenistic Jewish models, not the fanciful allegorizations of PHILO, but a more sober, almost literal exegesis like that of JOSEPHUS, whose works he used. His main points on Genesis are like the literal exegesis noted by Philo and found among rabbis, although he insisted that God's voice, not the actual transcendent God, was heard walking in Eden and found special meanings in the days of creation, the third of which refers to the divine triad of God, the Logos, and the Sophia. Although also fond of fanciful etymologies, T. was not an allegorizer of the ALEXANDRIAN type.

His third book contains selections proving the agreement of the Law with the Prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and the Gospels on moral themes (3:9-14) and in addition a world CHRONOLOGY (without reference to Christ) from creation to the year 5695 = 180 CE (3:16-29). T. never mentioned Christ but seems to have used the description of JESUS' childhood obedience in Luke 1–2 to interpret Adam's disobedience in Eden, which kept him from becoming a god. Such sub-surface exegesis also occurred when T. refused to give an example of someone raised from the dead because it would not be credible (1.13), an allusion to Luke 16:31-32. Presumably this reticence is apologetic.

Bibliography: R. M. Grant, "Notes on the Text of Theophilus, Ad Autolycum III," VC 12 (1958) 136-44; Greek Apologists of the Second Century (1988) 140-74; Theophilus of Antioch: Ad Autolycum (1970). J. Quasten, Patrology (1950) 1:236-42. M. Simonetti, "La sacra scrittura in Teofilo d'Antiochia," Epektasis: Mélanges Patristiques (1972) 197-207.

R. M. GRANT

THESSALONIANS, FIRST AND SECOND LETTERS TO THE

1. Place in Early Christian Literature. The epistolary prescripts of these works claim authorship by the apostle PAUL. The letters were alluded to and quoted by various early Christian writers and documents in the late first century to early second century CE (Ignatius of Antioch, Didache, Polycarp of Smyrna, and the Shepherd of Hermas). Parts of 1 Thessalonians (but not 2 Thessalonians) are found in P^{46}, the earliest manuscript of the Pauline corpus, which dates from about 200 CE. Second Thessalonians is also discussed along with other biblical apocalyptic literature (see APOCALYPTICISM) in Hippolytus of Rome's (c. 170–c. 236) De antichristo. Dozens of patristic and medieval commentaries exist for both Thessalonian letters, including those by CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, THEODORET OF CYRRHUS, John of Damascus (c. 655–c. 750), Theophylact (c. 1050–c. 1125), and Euthymius Zigabenus (fl. 12th cent.) in the East, along with those of Ambrosiaster, JEROME, Florus Diaconus (d. c. 860), RABANUS MAURUS, PETER LOMBARD, THOMAS AQUINAS, Dionysius Cartusianus (1402–71), and L. VALLA in the West. Sadly, ORIGEN's commentary exists only in Latin in a fragment quoted by Jerome.

2. The Renaissance and the Reformation. Although LUTHER wrote no commentary on the Thessalonian letters, several other Reformers did, including CALVIN and T. BEZA. Calvin's interpretation is notable for his descriptions of present sufferings as evidence of the Thessalonians' being made worthy of the kingdom of God (2 Thess 1:5) as well as for his discussion of attacks from the enemies of Christians as indicating the seal of the Christians' adoption by God.

3. Modern Interpretation. The central problems dealt with by modern interpretation of the Thessalonian letters are their relation to each other and their authorship. Modern scholarship on 2 Thessalonians began with H. GROTIUS in the seventeenth century. Grotius examined both letters and argued that Paul could not have written 1 Thessalonians with no mention of the "sign" referred to in 2 Thess 3:17, then shortly thereafter have referred to such a sign in 2 Thessalonians (2 Thess 2:2) and warned against a forged Pauline letter that lacked it. Since Grotius believed Paul wrote both letters, he concluded that 2 Thessalonians was written first. Grotius also recognized the strongly inflammatory character of the rhetoric of 2 Thessalonians, which he believed made it likely that the early church would not have made the letter public until it became politically safer (during the reign of Vespasian). Thus the conventional position of 2 Thessalonians in the CANON relates to when it was published rather than to when it was written.

J. Schmidt (1772–1831) was the first to argue against Pauline authorship for 2 Thessalonians (1801), showing inconsistencies between the two letters if taken at face value as Pauline. Schmidt reasoned that 2 Thess 2:1-2 presupposed an earlier letter purporting to be by Paul that taught a speedy arrival of Christ's second coming, which letter 2 Thessalonians attacks as a forgery. However, the most plausible candidate for such a letter bearing Paul's name was, in Schmidt's view, 1 Thessalonians (assuming that it had been written first). He held that there were insuperable problems associated with the maintenance of Pauline authorship for both of the Thessalonian epistles because the conflict of the eschatologies espoused in the two letters mitigated against their having the same author—especially given the warnings against forged Pauline letters in 2 Thess 2:1-2 and the "authentication" in 3:17. Hence, Schmidt concluded against Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians.

F. Kern (1839) made a detailed analysis of 2 Thess 2:1-2, sketching the history of interpretation of that passage as organized around possible interpretations of the parousia of Christ. He stressed that the man of lawlessness was a real person, an insight that led Kern to look for the man's identity among the Roman emperors of the first century CE. The most likely candidate, Kern thought, was Nero; hence the prophecy of the man of lawlessness belongs to a time (68–70 CE) that would make Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians impossible.

F. C. BAUR (1845) argued against the authenticity of 1 Thessalonians primarily by showing the similarities between 1 Thessalonians and the material about Paul's Thessalonian ministry in Acts 17; he also believed that the similarities between 1 Thessalonians and 1 Corinthians were too great. Baur likewise attacked the Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians, noting that the theology of the apocalyptic section in chap. 2 is too Jewish-Christian and in his view not classically Pauline enough for Paul to have written the letter. For the true Pauline view of the second coming of Christ, Baur turned exclusively to 1 Corinthians 15, finding the differences between that chapter and 2 Thessalonians 2 simply too great for 2 Thessalonians to be genuinely Pauline.

R. Lipsius (1830–92) held that Baur's objections to Pauline authorship of 1 Thessalonians were groundless, since the audience to which 1 Thessalonians was addressed included "enthusiastic, eccentric prophets" (1854). Therefore, because the situation in Thessalonika was in some ways similar to that in Corinth, similarities between 1 Thessalonians and 1 Corinthians are not surprising. Responding in 1855 with an article in which he attempted to identify the situation that evoked both of the letters to the Thessalonians, Baur concluded not only that Paul did not write either letter but also that 1 Thessalonians was literarily dependent on 2 Thessalonians; thus the latter must have been written first.

A. HILGENFELD (1862) was very critical of Baur for his treatment of 1 Thessalonians but agreed with him in opposing Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians. Regarding Baur's statement that in 1 Thessalonians "there is so little for criticism to lay hold of," Hilgenfeld found the information about the Thessalonian community in the letter to be essentially consistent with that in Acts 17. The reason that 1 Thessalonians is so different from other genuinely Pauline letters is that "the relationship of the apostle to the Christians in Thessalonika was in no way strained." Hence Hilgenfeld held that "Paul appears here, in fact, not yet at the height of his dialectic and his apostolic consciousness, as we see that his struggle against a Christian Judaism, which was forced into the Churches he had planted, made him; but Paul appears in this letter in the total kindness of his affectionate care for a young community of Christians, in their depression requiring fatherly words of encouragement" (1862, 242). Thus the reason for the great differences between 1 Thessalonians and the Hauptbriefe is that Paul had not yet risen to the occasions that produced the lofty and powerful letters to the Romans, the Corinthians, and the Galatians. However, 1 Thessalonians is appropriate to the earlier occasion.

The fine commentary by W. Bornemann (1894) includes an exhaustive history of scholarship on and interpretation of both epistles, especially as regards the eschatology of 2 Thess 2:1-12, from the early patristic period to 1894. Bornemann accepted Pauline authorship for both epistles, arguing that their similarities, along with the lack of personal and local information in 2 Thessalonians, are due to the fact that Paul had practically nothing new to say to the Thessalonians. Bornemann noted an impersonal and objective character in 2 Thessalonians due to its being, not a personal letter, but a hortatory, official letter to the community. The two letters are similar in their common eschatological orientation as well as in form. They differ in that several sections in 2 Thessalonians are not found in 1 Thessalonians: the mention of punitive judgment at the parousia of Christ in 1:8-12; the eschatological section of 2:1-12 with the request for prayer by the writer for the spread of the gospel despite those who are opposed to the faith; the discipline of work commanded in 3:13-16; and finally, the remark about the peculiar attestation of letters truly by Paul. Bornemann admitted that these peculiarities raise a number of questions about the authenticity of 2 Thessalonians; but he offered a psychological explanation (see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) to account for the differences, rather than appealing to a misunderstanding of Paul's earlier letter or to Paul's own unclarity or lack of certainty.

H. HOLTZMANN (1901), writing in favor of Pauline authorship of 2 Thessalonians, pointed out the difference in tone between "we thank God" and "we are obliged to thank God" in the two letters. He concluded that 2 Thess 2:1-12 is a new section (without parallel in 1 Thessalonians) but that the rest of the letter consists of paraphrases and variations of 1 Thessalonians. Holtzmann agreed with Bornemann that the author of the second letter had known the first letter and was somehow dependent on it. However, he argued that one can understand 2 Thessalonians only in light of Paul's intention to replace the first, longer letter, which accounts for what Holtzmann termed the Ersatzcharakter (replacement character) of 2 Thessalonians.

W. WREDE's 1903 monograph marks a watershed in interpretation of 2 Thessalonians. Wrede explored several issues, most notably that of the literary dependency of 2 Thessalonians on 1 Thessalonians. Comparing the texts of the two letters in parallel columns, he found that there were major parallels to 1 Thess 1:2-12 in 2 Thess 1:3-12. Other parallels were found at 2 Thess 2:13-14 (parallel to 1 Thess 2:12-13) and 2 Thess 3:6-15 (parallel to 1 Thess 4:1–5:23). Most notably, parallels to 1 Thessalonians were lacking at 2 Thess 2:1-12, the much-debated eschatological section. The similarities between 1 and 2 Thessalonians were striking to Wrede, particularly if Paul was the author of both epistles and if they were supposed to have been written within about three months of each other, especially since whole phrases seem to have been taken over from 1 Thessalonians to 2 Thessalonians without change. Wrede concluded that the parallels between the letters were simply too close for Paul to have been the author of both. Also, he held the eschatological differences between the two letters to be quite sharp, since 1 Thess 5:1-4 advises that the day of the Lord is coming at an unknown time, as a "thief in the night," whereas 2 Thess 2:1-12 gives detailed instructions as to when the day of the Lord is to come. Wrede also held that 2 Thessalonians presupposed Paul's having become a figure of unquestioned authority; thus 2 Thessalonians could not have been written by Paul.

The reaction to Wrede was sharp. J. Wrzol (1916) attacked Wrede and other scholars by arguing in favor of the truly Pauline character of 2 Thessalonians' eschatology and against the alleged impersonal character of the epistle. He maintained that the developing situation in the Thessalonian church could account for the differences in the letters. In his commentary E. von DOBSCHÜTZ (1909) expressed strong doubts about the reliability of material from Acts concerning Paul's activity and rejected as impossibly short the account of Paul's stay in Thessalonika (Acts 17), a conclusion more recent Pauline chronologists have also reached. Dobschütz did not accept the reversal of the canonical order of 1 and 2 Thessalonians, nor was it clear to him whether 2 Thess 2:2 opposed a misunderstanding of Pauline theology or a forged Pauline letter. Analyzing vocabulary in the two letters, he concluded that word frequencies did not point away from Pauline authorship, although he admitted that many parts of 2 Thessalonians read like rewritings of 1 Thessalonians. Nonetheless, he decided in favor of Pauline authorship.

A. von HARNACK also responded (1910), stating that 2 Thessalonians was written to a different, Jewish-Christian group within the Thessalonian church rather than to the group to which 1 Thessalonians was written. This explanation accounts for the fact that the language in 2 Thessalonians is not as personal as that in 1 Thessalonians, since Paul usually identified with the gentile Christians. The apocalyptic was especially designed to appeal to the Jewish-Christian minority in Thessalonika, as were the strong words about endurance under persecution in chap. 1. Thus, von Harnack argued, Paul identified the real addressees of 2 Thessalonians in 1:13, where the Jewish-Christians are described as the "firstfruits unto salvation." Von Harnack's conclusion that 2 Thessalonians was written by Paul but to a different group in the same Thessalonian church from the one for whom 1 Thessalonians was intended was followed by M. DIBELIUS in his commentary (1911, 1925^2, 1937^3).

J. Frame's (1868–1956) substantial commentary (1912) on the letters included, along with a detailed philological analysis, a thorough sifting of issues and of the previous secondary literature. Frame made correlations to extra-biblical historical documents and especially to Acts. Accepting Pauline authorship for both epistles, he read 1 Thessalonians as Paul's response to serious problems within the Thessalonian community. Like other commentators, Frame identified the "disorderly" persons of 1 Thess 5:14 with those acting "in a disorderly way" in 2 Thess 3:6, which then allowed him to understand the ataktoi in 1 Thessalonians as "idle brethern" whose enthusiastic activities and rebelliousness caused the trouble that evoked the two letters. According to Frame, the disorderly ones stirred up the church in Thessalonika by misinterpreting 1 Thessalonians, teaching that the day of the Lord had already arrived, which caused the fainthearted to think that their salvation was no longer possible. Hence Frame found the differences between 1 and 2 Thessalonians to be, on the one hand, not very great and, on the other hand, well accounted for by rapid changes in the community.

In 1945 E. Schweizer pointed out that the earliest patristic quotation of or allusion to 2 Thessalonians, Polycarp's letter to the Philippians (3.12 and 11.3), mentions "letters" that Paul had written to the Philippians. Schweizer argued that Polycarp understood the letter he quoted (2 Thessalonians) as having been originally written by Paul to the church at Philippi, a plausible possibility since Philippi and Thessalonika are relatively near to each other in Macedonia. Further, Schweizer reasoned, 1 and 2 Thessalonians are so similar to each other because Paul wrote them within a short time span. And, deducing no motive for a supposed forger to have written 2 Thessalonians, Schweizer contended that the mention of the same addressees in 1 and 2 Thessalonians was from force of habit.

The most complete commentary on 1–2 Thessalonians from the second half of the twentieth century is that of B. Rigaux (1956). This learned but cautious work is filled with philological and theological notes drawing many parallels between Pauline language and Jewish literature.

According to R. Jewett (1971), the Thessalonian church was being overrun by a libertinistic, enthusiastic group; the congregation was also shocked by the deaths of some of its members. Jewett also believed that the Thessalonians radically misinterpreted the apocalyptic of 1 Thessalonians, making it necessary for Paul to write a second letter, much cooler in tone. In a later monograph (1986) Jewett has attempted to correlate the letters with a rapidly changing social situation within the city of Thessalonika, supporting his interpretation by drawing parallels from the practices of various millenarian communities.

Several more recent scholars have interpreted 2 Thessalonians as a pseudo-Pauline letter. W. Trilling (1972, 1980) has put together various form-critical (see FORM CRITICISM) and linguistic arguments against Pauline authorship. W. Marxsen (1982) maintained that 2 Thessalonians argues against a kind of Pauline Gnosticism (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION) that held that the day of the Lord has already come (2:2). F. Hughes (1989) has made a RHETORICAL analysis of 2 Thessalonians and argues that the letter's theological rhetoric opposed the theology spread by a letter or letters claiming to be by Paul that advanced a particular form of fulfilled eschatology. Hughes maintains that the theology 2 Thessalonians attacks is the same as that underlying Ephesians and particularly Colossians. A. Malherbe (1987) has interpreted both letters in terms of Greek philosophical tradition, and B. Johanson (1987) has analyzed 1 Thessalonians using the text-linguistic method popular in Scandinavia.

Most contemporary interpreters believe that 1 Thessalonians is the earliest of the extant Pauline letters, written before the Jerusalem conference and before Galatians. The chronological placement of 1 Thessalonians before Galatians is historically and theologically crucial because 1 Thessalonians then displays Paul acting as a pastor and theologian to a congregation evidently untroubled by Judaizers. One sees clearly in 1 Thessalonians the roots of Pauline theology in early Christian traditions about the imminently expected second coming of Jesus. Therefore, in 1 Thessalonians at least, Pauline theology is centered around faith in Jesus as a returning heavenly redeemer, "Jesus who saves us from the coming wrath" (1:10). The Pauline categories of flesh vs. spirit and the opposition to the imposition of Torah observance in gentile congregations, so well attested in Galatians, do not appear in 1 Thessalonians, leading Jewett (1971) to argue that these categories were developed as part of Paul's conflict with Jewish-Christian agitators. If it is desirable to posit a "center" of Pauline theology, 1 Thessalonians raises the question of whether justification by faith can be that center, since it seems to several interpreters to be absent from the letter.

Drawing on the chronologies of G. Lüdemann (1984) and Jewett (1986), K. Donfried (1993) has suggested that the whole issue of the early Paul needs to be revisited, arguing that much of the tradition in Acts 17 about Paul's founding visit to the church in Thessalonika may be correct. Donfried contends that the reference to three sabbaths in Acts 17:2 may not include the total length of time of Paul's ministry in Thessalonika. He also gives an excellent summary of historical and theological issues, along with cogent proposals for the contemporary relevance of 1–2 Thessalonians.

4. Literary Integrity of 1–2 Thessalonians. Some scholars have argued against the literary integrity of 1–2 Thessalonians either in favor of understanding 1 Thess 2:14-16 as an interpolation (B. Pearson [1971]) or positing the existence of several Thessalonian letters that were subsequently edited into the present collection (W. Schmithals [1984]; R. Pesch [1984]). A strong consensus is that 1 Thessalonians is an integral letter (Donfried, Hughes, Jewett, Johanson, Lüdemann, among others).

Bibliography: J. A. Bailey, "Who Wrote II Thessalonians?" NTS 25 (1978–79) 131-45. F. C. Baur, Paul, the Apostle of Jesus Christ (1845, 1866–67²; ET 1876); "Die beiden Briefe an die Thessalonicher, ihre Unechtheit und Bedeutung für die Lehre der Parusie Christi," ThJb(T) 14 (1855) 141-68. W. Bornemann, Die Thessalonicherbriefe (KEK 10, 1894). R. F. Collins, Studies on the First Letter to the Thessalonians (BETL 66, 1984); (ed.), The Thessalonian Correspondence (BETL 87, 1990). M. Dibelius, An die Thessalonicher I–II, An die Philipper (HNT, 1911, 1925², 1937³). E. von Dobschütz, Die Thessalonicher-Briefe (KEK 10, 1909). K. P. Donfried, "Paul and Judaism: 1 Thess 2:13-16 as a Test Case," Int 38 (1984) 242-53; "The Cults of Thessalonica and the Thessalonian Correspondence," NTS 31 (1985) 335-56. K. P. Donfried and I. H. Marshall, The Theology of the Shorter Pauline Letters (NT Theology, 1993). J. E. Frame, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians (ICC, 1912). C. H. Giblin, The Threat to Faith: An Exegetical and Theological Re-examination of 2 Thessalonians 2 (AnBib 31, 1967). C. L. W. Grimm, "Die Echtheit der Briefe and die Thessalonicher," TSK 23 (1850) 753-813. H. Grotius, Annotationes in Novum Testamentum (1641–50). A. von Harnack, "Das Problem des 2. Thessalonicherbriefes," Sitzungsberichte der Preussischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin (1910)

560-78. A. Hilgenfeld, "Die beiden Briefe an die Thessalonicher nach Inhalt und Ursprung," ZWT 5 (1862) 225-64. T. Holtz, Der erste Brief an die Thessalonicher (EKKNT 13, 1986). H. J. Holtzmann, "Zum zweiten Thessalonicherbrief," ZNW 2 (1901) 97-108. F. W. Hughes, Early Christian Rhetoric and 2 Thessalonians (JSNTSup 30, 1989). R. Jewett, Paul's Anthropological Terms: A Study of Their Use in Conflict Settings (AGJU 10, 1971); The Thessalonian Correspondence: Pauline Rhetoric and Millenarian Piety (FFNT, 1986). B. C. Johanson, To All the Brethern: A Text-linguistic and Rhetorical Approach to I Thessalonians (ConBNT 16, 1987). F. H. Kern, "Über 2. Thess 2,1-12: Nebst Andeutungen über den Ursprung des zweiten Briefs an die Thessalonicher," TZT 2 (1839) 145-214. W. G. Kümmel, "Das literarische und geschichtliche Problem des ersten Thessalonicherbriefes," Neotestamentica et Patristica (NovTSup 6, 1962) 213-27. A. Lindemann, "Zum Abfassungszweck des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefes," ZNW 68 (1977) 35-47. R. A. Lipsius, "Über Zweck und Veranlassung des ersten Thessalonicherbrief," TSK 27 (1854) 905-34. G. Lüdemann, Paul, Apostle to the Gentiles: Studies in Chronology (1984). A. J. Malherbe, " 'Gentle as a Nurse': The Cynic Background to 1 Thess ii," NovT 12 (1970) 203-17; "Exhortation in First Thessalonians," NovT 25 (1983) 238-56; Paul and the Thessalonians: The Philosophic Tradition of Pastoral Care (1987). I. H. Marshall, 1 and 2 Thessalonians (NCB, 1983). W. Marxsen, Der erste Brief an die Thessalonicher (ZBNT 11.1, 1979); Der zweite Thessalonicherbrief (ZBNT 11.2, 1982). B. Pearson, "1 Thessalonians 2:13-16: A Deutero-Pauline Interpolation," HTR 64 (1971) 79-94. R. Pesch, Die Entdeckung des ältesten Paules-Briefes (Herderbücherei 1167, 1984). E. J. Richard, First and Second Thessalonians (SacPag 11, ed. D. J. Harrington, 1995) B. Rigaux, Saint Paul: Les Épîtres aux Thessaloniciens (Ebib, 1956). J. E. C. Schmidt, "Vermuthungen über die beyden Briefe an die Thessalonicher," Bibliothek für Kritik und Exegese des Neuen Testaments und ältesten Christengeschichte 2, 3 (J. E. C. Schmidt, 1801) 380-86. W. Schmithals, Paul and the Gnostics (1972); Die Briefe des Paulus in ihrer ursprünglichen Form (Zürcher Werkkomentare zur Bibel, 1984). E. Schweizer, "Der zweite Thessalonicher ein Philipperbrief?" TZ 1 (1945) 90-105. W. Trilling, Untersuchungen zum zweiten Thessalonicherbrief (ETS 27, 1972); Der zweite Brief an die Thessalonicher (EKKNT 14, 1980); "Die beiden Briefe des Apostels Paulus an die Thessalonicher: Eine Forschungsbericht," ANRW 2.25.4 (1987) 3365-403. W. Wrede, Die Echtheit des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefs (TU NF 9, 2, 1903). J. Wrzol, Die Echtheit des zweiten Thessalonicherbrief (BibS(F) 19, 1916).

F. W. HUGHES

THIERRY OF CHARTRES (d. after 1151)

A teacher at Chartres and in Paris in the 1120s and early 1130s, T. was made archdeacon of Dreux c. 1137. In 1141 he followed GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE as archdeacon and chancellor of Chartres and was present at the Synod of Reims, where Gilbert was tried for heresy in 1148. In the 1150s he retired, as did many masters of the twelfth century, to the monastic life. The date of his death is uncertain. The only biblical commentary to survive that can be securely attributed to him is his work on the creation narratives in Genesis, mentioned by his pupil Clarembald of Arras (fl. 1130–70). This work is an important attempt to apply to exegesis T.'s studies of the liberal arts, especially the mathematical subjects of the quadrivium, and to synthesize the Genesis account with Plato (with whose Timaeus T. was familiar through Calcidius's [fl. c. 400] commentary).

Works: Commentaries on Boethius by Thierry of Chartres and His School (ed N. M. Häring, 1971) contains the Tractatus de sex dierum operibus and T.'s other theological writings as well as full bibliography.

Bibliography: N. M. Häring, "The Creation and Creator of the World According to Thierry of Chartres and Clarenbaldus of Arras," AHDLMA 22 (1955) 137-286. A. Vanderjagt, DMA 12 (1989) 27.

G. R. EVANS

THIRLWALL, NEWELL CONNOP (1797–1875)

Born in London in 1797, T. entered Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1814, where he read classics and graduated (BA 1818). In the same year he was elected to a fellowship of his college and traveled to Europe, where he met the German diplomat and biblical scholar C. von BUNSEN. This aroused in him a strong interest in contemporary German theology, particularly that of F. SCHLEIERMACHER, and also in ancient history through the work of B. Niebuhr (1776–1831).

In 1825 T. published an English translation of Schleiermacher's Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, to which he added a long introduction to Schleiermacher's thought. After a brief period practicing law (1825–27), he returned to Cambridge in 1827 and began working consistently in the field of ancient history. Ordained and appointed bishop of St. David's, Lampeter, Wales, in 1840, he subsequently became chairman of the TRANSLATION committee that led to the publication of the RV in 1881.

After the early eagerness to spread a knowledge of Schleiermacher's ideas in Great Britain, T. promoted a critical approach to the study of ancient history along the lines developed by Niebuhr. His major work was History of Greece (8 vols., 1835–44); along with his major British contemporary G. Grote (1794–1871), T. pioneered important work in this field, fully recognizing the relevance and desirability of a comparable critical approach to biblical history. Deeply involved in church and national affairs, especially in promoting reforms in education, he was closely linked with T. ARNOLD, A. STANLEY, and B. F. WESTCOTT.

Works: Letters, Literary and Theological (ed. J. J. S. Perowne and L. Stokes, 1881); Letters to a Friend (ed. A. P. Stanley, 1881).

Bibliography: J. W. Clark, DNB 56 (1898) 138-41. G. Rees, "C. T.: Liberal Anglican," JHSCW 14 (1964) 66-76. J. C. Thirlwall, Jr., C. T.: Historian and Theologian (1936).

R. E. CLEMENTS

THOLUCK, FRIEDRICH AUGUST GOTTREU (1799–1877)

Born in Breslau, T. studied Near Eastern languages and theology at the universities of Berlin and Jena, where he was influenced by J. Neander (1789–1850), F. SCHLEIERMACHER, and G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831). In 1825 he traveled to Holland and England and later served as embassy chaplain in Rome (1827–29). He experienced a Pietistic conversion (see PIETISM) at Berlin that guided his lifelong theological perspectives. In 1826 he accepted a position at Halle, which he held until his death. When he arrived, the school was permeated with German rationalism; but after a decade, and with support from Prussian officials, he helped bring about substantial change. His book Die Lehre von der Sünde und vom Versöhner (1823), directed against W. DE WETTE, retarded the spread of rationalism throughout Germany.

One of the most prominent theologians of his day, T. was especially interested in students, often inviting them to accompany him on daily two-hour walks. Because of his facility in English and his more acceptable theology, he befriended and influenced several English and American students including J. A. ALEXANDER, J. W. Alexander (1804–59), C. HODGE, E. Park (1808–1900), R. Patton (1794–1839), G. Prentiss (1816–1903), E. B. PUSEY, E. ROBINSON, and H. P. SMITH. He was one of the best-known and most respected German theologians in his mature years.

Along with his numerous works on theology and church history, T. published many commentaries (Romans [1824]; John [1827]; Sermon on the Mount [1833]; Hebrews [1836]; Psalms [1843]), a response to D. F. STRAUSS's writings on the Gospels (1837), and a work on the prophets (1861; see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). His commentaries, which were widely circulated in the English world, impressed M. STUART and his numerous students, in addition to Americans who came to Halle. Thus T. uniquely influenced those who laid the groundwork for biblical studies in the United States during the latter half of the nineteenth century.

As a theologian T. adopted, according to his own account, N. ZINZENDORF's motto, "I have had but one passion, and that is Christ, and Christ alone." As a member of the mediating school of theology (Vermittlungstheologie), he eschewed creeds and dogmatic theology along with censure of minor defections from orthodoxy. He was a master of many languages, having studied nineteen before he was seventeen. He spoke English, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, and other languages fluently and brought works in all of them to bear on his exegesis, especially his insights into Near Eastern literature, both Jewish and Islamic. However, despite his influence on American and British biblical scholarship, T. pioneered no major innovations.

Works: Hints on the Importance of the Study of the OT (1821; ET 1833); Die Lehre von der Sünde und vom Versöhner, oder die wahre Weihe des Zweiflers (1823; partial ET, Guido and Julius: The Doctrine of Sin and the Propitiator (1936); Exposition of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (1824, 1831[3]; ET 1833–36); Blütensammlung aus der morgenländischen Mystik (1825); A Commentary on the Gospel of St. John (1827, 1857[7]; ET 1836); Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount (1833, 1856[4]; ET 1837–43); A Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews (1836, 1850[3]; ET 1842); Gesammelte Werke (11 vols., 1837–43); Die Glaubwürdigkeit der evangelischen Geschichte (1837); A Translation and Commentary of the Book of Psalms (1843; ET 1858); Die Propheten und ihre Weissagungen (1861); Geschichte des Rationalismus (1865).

Bibliography: M. Käler, RE[3] 19 (1907) 695-702. T. H. Olbricht, "C. Hodge as an American NT Interpreter," JPH 57 (1979) 117-33; HHMBI, 372-76. J. Rogerson, OTCNC, 83-85. W. Schrader, Geschichte der Friedrichs-Universität zu Halle (2 vols., 1894) 2:144-65. K. Toivianen, A. T. in Teologinen antropologia (1968). L. Witte, Das Leben F. A. G. T.s (2 vols., 1884–86). W. Zilz, A. T.: Professor, Prediger, Seelsorger (1962).

T. H. OLBRICHT

THOMAS AQUINAS (1225–74)

Born at the castle of Roccasecca near Naples, T. was the youngest son of an Italian lord. At the age of five or six, he was sent as an oblate to the Benedictine abbey at Monte Casino. Due to military struggles the students were sent to Naples in 1239, where T. attended the recently founded imperial university and was introduced to Aristotle's philosophy by Peter of Ireland. In April 1244, against family desires and opposition, he entered the Dominican order. In 1245 he settled at the priory of St. Jacques in Paris, where he studied at the university with Albertus Magnus (1245–48), whom he accompanied to Cologne as student and lecturer (1248–52). There he lectured on Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations. He completed his studies at Paris while teaching as a bachelor (1252–56) and was regent-master (1256–59). Returning to Italy (1259–68), he lectured on Job and began his glossed compilation on the Gospels (Catena aurea). He spent 1268–72 back in Paris, where he continued lecturing on the Bible along with other topics and finished his teaching and writing career as Master of Theology at the University of Naples and the Dominican House of Studies. He died Mar. 7, 1274, after having undergone a "heavenly revelation" or "traumatic experience" while celebrating mass in the chapel of St. Nicholas (Dec. 6, 1273), which left him in something of a stupor.

As Master of Theology, T. was expected to expound the Bible together with other set texts and to decide public disputations on theological topics. As a Dominican Master, he was responsible for educating future preachers and confessors, not least by integrating academic theology with the demands of pastoral outreach. He achieved some academic renown in his lifetime but also faced growing criticism. For half a century after his death, his teachings were considered generally suspect by many outside the Dominican order; some of his particular tenets were formally condemned by local bishops.

From his canonization in 1323 T.'s reputation grew, with support from the papacy. At the Council of Trent (1545–60) his texts were accorded unique authority as a common language for Roman Catholic theology and afterward were sometimes treated as the standard of orthodoxy. Of course, there have been dozens of competing interpretations of T. in the seven centuries since his death as there have been recurring Thomistic revivals. The most recent of these, the neo-Thomism endorsed by Pope Leo XIII in 1879, dominated official Roman Catholic teaching through the Second Vatican Council.

The many ideological Thomisms of Roman Catholic history make it difficult to find the original T.; but he is seen best through his writings, the most important of which can be divided into four categories. The first comprises various experiments with original genres for presenting Christian doctrine comprehensively, including On the Truth of the Catholic Faith (commonly and mistakenly known as Summa Against the Gentiles [1259–65]) and Summa of Theology (1267–73). The second category consists of published versions of T.'s public disputations, especially On Truth (1256–59) and On the Power of God (1265–66). The third category contains T.'s literal commentaries on selected works of Aristotle, written over a period of fewer than seven years (1267–72/73) for different purposes. T. left about half of them incomplete to pursue other projects.

The fourth and most neglected category of T.'s writings contains his biblical commentaries, which together make up about a quarter of his corpus. Biblical exposition was the central teaching task for thirteenth-century Masters of Theology; and exegesis took many forms, including rapid or "cursive" readings aimed at giving the shape of the literal sense, with only a few meditations on its significance, and "reports" of a Master's fuller reading of a biblical book. T. began his theological writing with cursive expositions of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations (all by 1252). We also have reports of T.'s doctrinal expositions of Matthew (1269–70); John (1270–72); the Pauline epistles with Hebrews (in various redactions, 1265–68/1272–73?); and Psalms (1272–73), complete only through Psalm 54, which was T.'s last work. His cursive and reported exegeses are characterized by simplicity in allegorization, irenic disposition of controversies, and steady insistence on essential doctrine. Although willing to accept multi-layered meanings in a text (see QUADRIGA), T. insisted that doctrine must be based on the literal sense.

T.'s more original contributions to biblical exegesis are a literal exposition of Job (1261–65) and a continuous gloss on the Gospels (1262–64/1265–68). GREGORY THE GREAT's Moral Readings of Job was considered the definitive allegorical reading, and T. sought to offer instead literal commentary that attended to the arguments of Job and his interlocutors. Job became for him a sustained and sophisticated exploration of questions about divine providence. The continuous gloss—or Golden Chain, as it came to be called—was a verse-by-verse arrangement of abridged extracts from the fathers stitched together to make up a running patristic commentary on the four Gospels. The work is remarkable for its use of newly translated Greek fathers and for its distillation of the various views represented.

Works: Lectura super Matthaeum (complete text in MS, Basel, Bibl. Univ. B. V. 12 to be published in Leonine ed.); Super Ieremiam et Threnos (Parma ed., 14:577-658); Catena aurea: Commentary on the Four Gospels (4 vols., 1841–45); Expositio et Lectura super Epistolas Pauli Apostoli (ET, Aquinas Scripture Series, Galatians [1966]; Ephesians [1966]; First Thessalonians [1969]; Philippians [1969]; Romans commentary to appear as vol. 32 of Leonine ed.); Lectura super Ioannem (chaps. 1–8 in Commentary on the Gospel of Saint John, pt. 1 [1980]); Postilla super Psalmos (ed. R. Busa, St. T. A. Opera [7 vols., 1980] 6:48-130); The Literal Exposition on Job: A Scriptural Commentary Concerning Providence (Classics in Religious Studies 7, 1989); Expositio super Isaiam ad litteram (Leonine ed., vol. 28; see also D. Bouthillier and J.-P. Torrell, "Quand saint T. méditait sur le prophète Isaïe," Revue thomiste 90 [1990] 5-47).

Bibliography: M. Arias Reyero, T. A. als Exeget: Die Prinzipien seiner Schriftdeutung und seine Lehre von den Schriftsinnen (Sammlung Horizonte, Neue Reihe 3, 1971). T. Domanyi, Der Römerbriefkommentar des T. A.: Ein Beitrag zur Untersuchung seiner Auslegungsmethoden (Basler und Berner Studia zur historischen und systematischen Theologie 39, 1979). A. J. Minnis and A. B. Scott, Medieval Literary Theory and Criticism c. 1100–c. 1375: The Commentary-tradition (1988) 197-212, 239-43. J. van der Ploeg, "The Place of Holy Scripture in the Theology of St. T.," The Thomist 10 (1947) 398-422. J. S. Preus, From Shadow to Promise: OT Interpretation from Augustine to the Young Luther (1969) 46-60. H. V. Schooner, "La Lectura in Mattaeum de St. T. (Deux fragments inédits et la Reportatio de Pierre d'Andria)," Angelicum 33 (1956) 9-142; "La Lectura super Mattaeum V, 2-48 de T. d'Aquin," RTAM 50 (1983) 145-90. E. Stump, "Biblical Commentary and Philosophy," The Cambridge Companion to Aquinas (ed. N. Kretzmann and E. Stump, 1993) 252-68. P. Synave, "La Doctrine de St. T. d'Aquin sur le sens littéral des Ecritures," RB 35 (1926) 40-65; T. F. Torrance, "Scientific Hermeneutics According to St. T. A.," JTS 13 (1962) 259-89. J.-P. Torrell, Saint T. A., vol. 1, The Person and His Work (1993; ET 1996) esp. 337-41 for description of the biblical commentaries and other editions and publications.

M. D. JORDAN

THURMAN, HOWARD WASHINGTON (1900–1981)

T. was born Nov. 18, 1900, in Daytona, Florida. Discrimination against Blacks forced him to leave Daytona to receive a high school education in a private school for Blacks in Jacksonville, Florida. In 1923 he completed his undergraduate education at Morehouse College in Atlanta, where he majored in economics and government. After graduating with a BD degree from Rochester Theological Seminary in 1926, he became pastor of a Baptist church in Oberlin, Ohio, returning to Atlanta in 1929 to become director of religious life and professor of religion for both Morehouse and Spelman colleges. In 1932 he joined Howard University (Washington, DC) as professor of Christian theology and later became dean of Howard's chapel. On a lecture tour (1935–36) through India, Ceylon, and Burma, T. and his wife had extensive conversations with M. Gandhi on religion and social change. In 1944 T. co-founded the Church for the Fellowship of All Peoples in San Francisco—the first interracial church in leadership and membership in the United States. From 1953 to 1965 he was professor of spiritual resources and disciplines and dean of Marsh Chapel at Boston University. After retiring in 1965 he continued a rigorous schedule of lecturing and preaching until his death in San Francisco, Apr. 10, 1981.

T.'s Jesus and the Disinherited (1949) argued that a disinherited JESUS sought, through teaching and demonstrating the love ethic, to empower the disinherited to overcome social and political oppression. Jesus' method for social transformation was nonviolent engagement, which affirmed the worth of both oppressed and oppressor. T. wrote, "The striking similarity between the social position of Jesus in Palestine and that of the vast majority of American Negroes is obvious to anyone who tarries long over the facts" (34). The book became a major resource for civil rights activists (including M. L. King, Jr.), religious leaders involved in social change, and J. Cone in his development of Black theology (see AFROCENTRIC INTERPRETATION; WOMANIST INTERPRETATION). T.'s writings on the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and on Jesus stressed the importance of religious experience as their source of INSPIRATION, wisdom, power, and courage. T. interpreted the Bible as proclaiming God's ultimate desire for an inclusive and reconciled community of all God's creation.

Works: The Greatest of These (1944); The Negro Spiritual Speaks of Life and Death (1947); Jesus and the Disinherited (1949); The Creative Encounter (1954); The Inward Journey (1961); The Luminous Darkness (1965); "Exposition to the Book of Habakkuk" and "Exposition to the Book of Zephaniah," IB 6 (1956); The Search for Common Ground (1971); With Head and Heart (1979).

Bibliography: W. E. Fluker, They Looked for a City (1989). A. Johnson, Good News for the Disinherited (1997). M. G. Mitchell, Spiritual Dynamics of H. T.'s Theology (1985). L. E. Smith, Jr., H. T.: The Mystic as Prophet (1981). C. F. Stewart III, God, Being, and Liberation (1989).

L. E. SMITH, JR.

TILLICH, PAUL JOHANNES (1886–1965)

Born in Starzeddel, Germany, Aug. 20, 1886, T. studied at Berlin and Tübingen and received his PhD from Breslau in 1911 and his lic. theol. from Halle in 1912. His thesis was on F. W. J. von Schelling (1775–1854), who was an important influence on his thought. T. taught at the universities of Berlin, Marburg, Dresden, and Leipzig and was professor of philosophy at the University of Frankfurt from 1929 until 1933, when he became the first non-Jew to be dismissed from a university post by the Nazis. His subsequent career in the United States was spent at Union Theological Seminary in New York (1933–55), Harvard (1955–62), and the University of Chicago (1962–65). Widely regarded as one of the most influential Protestant thinkers of the twentieth century, he is best known for his three-volume Systematic Theology. He died Oct. 22, 1965.

T.'s understanding of the meaning and significance of the Bible was rooted in his orientation as a philosophical theologian. He was interested in how the claims and language of philosophy (e.g., "the Ultimate," "the One," "Being") relate to the testimony of the Bible about God as Creator, Sustainer, and Redeemer. More interested in ontology than in technical biblical scholarship, he felt that theological language emerges because people have a special encounter with reality that enables them to become ultimately concerned about that reality. As a "boundary thinker," he viewed his task as speaking to those who stand on the boundaries or outside of the community of faith. He described his work as apologetic theology and addressed much of his writing to those who wonder if the Bible has any significance in a secularized and technological age.

T. viewed the Bible as a confessional document of the Christian community. Although he respected the integrity of Judaism, he felt that Christians could legitimately read the HB in light of how it prepared early Christians to understand and respond to JESUS as the which the "new reality" of Jesus was received and interpreted. The NT is important because it tells how Jesus was perceived and received as the Christ, with every NT writer in some sense a witness. The critical feature of the Christ event is its decisive manifestation of the "Ground of Being" (T.'s favorite term for the holy). Jesus is the "New Being" in whom humanity finds reunion, reconciliation, and restoration. The Bible is the primary source of help for understanding the meaning of New Being. The concept of new being can therefore be said to be T.'s hermeneutical principle (see HERMENEUTICS).

T. rejected all literal interpretations of the Bible as well as the exalted sense of the Bible as the Word of God as championed by K. BARTH. T. felt modern interpreters need to use the historical-critical method but also to show "devotional-interpretive" sensitivity, since the Bible deals with matters of ultimate concern: "Only such free historical work, united with the attitude of ultimate concern, can open the Bible to the systematic theologian as his basic source" (1951, 1:36).

The Bible, then, is not important for its history, ceremonies, liturgical materials, apocalyptical visions, or wisdom documents. Historical inaccuracies or omissions do not negate its AUTHORITY. It has significance because it points to a saving reality that has appeared in history to manifest a new way of being. Biblical language is symbolic and powerful because symbols participate in that to which they point.

T. believed all interpreters of biblical texts are influenced by their own times, by their denominational histories, and by what previous exegetes have done. It is impossible to leap across two thousand years and neatly transpose biblical terminology and ideas into the present. Understanding the Bible and the truth of the Christian proclamation comes through experiencing the reality of New Being. T. has been called the most experience-oriented Protestant theologian since F. SCHLEIERMACHER. His experiential and meditative hermeneutic enabled him to preach powerfully from biblical texts. His three books of sermons—The Shaking of the Foundations (1948), The New Being (1955), and The Eternal Now (1963)—are regarded by many scholars as some of his finest work.

Works: "The Problem of Theological Method," JR 27 (1947) 16-26 = Writings in the Philosophy of Religion (Main Works Hauptwerke 4.4, ed. J. Clayton, 1987) 301-12; Systematic Theology 1 (1951); Biblical Religion and the Search for Ultimate Reality (1955); Dynamics of Faith (1957), esp. chap. 3, "Symbols of Faith."

Bibliography: D. G. A. Calvert, "P. T. and Biblical Theology," SJT 29 (1976) 517-34. R. Price, "Homiletical Hermeneutics in P. T.," The Drew Gateway 50 (1979) 15-24. C.-H. Ratschow, TPNZJ (1978) 303-330.

J. J. CAREY

TILLOTSON, JOHN (1630–94)

An Anglican archbishop and preacher, T. was reared in a family with Puritan convictions and was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he was deeply influenced by W. CHILLINGWORTH's Religion of Protestants. One of the most popular preachers in London, T. became dean of St. Paul's and in 1691 archbishop of Canterbury. He died Nov. 22, 1694.

T. is a leading representative of Latitudinarian theology, which dominated Anglican thought at the end of the seventeenth century. His Rule of Faith asserts against the Roman Catholics that Scripture alone is the rule of Christian faith. He emphasized plainness and simplicity in both preaching and biblical interpretation, and his sermons are marked by a strong appeal to reason and by an optimistic assessment of what "natural religion" teaches about God and morality. Alleged revelations must be tested by their conformity to God's "essential perfections," as understood by reason. T. emphasized the moral character of Christian life over "obscure" doctrines and religious ceremonies. His rational theology was welcomed by the Deists (see DEISM) and decried by the evangelicals (see EVANGELICAL INTERPRETATION) of the following century.

Works: The Works of the Most Reverend Dr. J. T. . . . Containing 54 Sermons . . . Together with the Rule of Faith (1704); The Works of the Most Rev. Dr. J. T. . . . Containing Two Hundred Sermons . . . Published by R. Barker (1717).

Bibliography: A. Gordon, DNB 56 (1898) 392-98. J. O'Higgins, "Archbishop T. and the Religion of Nature," JTS NS 24 (1973) 123-42. G. Reedy, The Bible and Reason: Anglicans and Scripture in Late Seventeenth-century England (1985). I. Simon, Three Restoration Divines: Barrow, South, T. Selected Sermons (1967). N. Sykes, "The Sermons of Archbishop T.," Theology 58 (1955) 297-302.

S. J. JONES

TIMOTHY, FIRST AND SECOND LETTERS TO (see PASTORAL LETTERS)

TINDAL, MATTHEW (1655–1733)

Educated at Oxford, T. became a fellow of All Souls College in 1678. A Deist (see DEISM), he argued in his chief work (1730), published when he was past seventy, that the gospel is merely "a republication of the religion of nature" and adds nothing new. In discussing the Bible he proceeded according to the hermeneutical rule (see HERMENEUTICS) that one should "admit all for divine Scripture, that tends to the Honour of God, and the Good of Man; and nothing which does not." T. sharply distinguished the HB from the NT, finding in the former little more than a catalog of cruelty (e.g., Jephtha and his daughter, the extermination of the Canaanites) and absurdity (e.g., the talking snake of Genesis 3, Balaam and his ass). The holier the men of the HB are supposed to be, the more cruel they are. The NT is written in a gentler spirit, but here, too, evidence of human fallibility abounds. The best interpreters accept that JESUS and the apostles were mistaken about the Second Coming, and even Jesus' ethical teaching cannot be taken literally. The estimated 30,000 NT textual variants do not inspire confidence in its reliability. In summary, Scripture would lead people completely astray if they were unable to judge it by the light of reason; we must assert our freedom to assent or dissent, knowing that the letter kills. T.'s volume (GT 1741) had a significant influence on European as well as on English thought. He died Aug. 16, 1733.

Works: Christianity as Old as the Creation: Or, the Gospel a Republication of the Religion of Nature (1730).

Bibliography: BB 6 (1763) 3960-65. G. Gawlick, introduction to facsimile edition of Christianity (1967) 5-43. H. G. Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (ET 1984) 321-27, 374-83. L. Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876) 1:134-63; DNB 46 (1898) 403-5.

F. WATSON

TISCHENDORF, LOBEGOTT FRIEDRICH CONSTANTIN VON (1815–74)

T. was born in Legenfeld, near Leipzig, Germany, Jan. 18, 1815, and died Dec. 7, 1874. He studied at Leipzig (1834–38), where he was influenced by the Greek grammarian J. Winer and joined the theological faculty in 1840, being promoted to full professor in 1859. He traveled widely in Europe and the Near East to study and collect biblical manuscripts. During visits to the monastery of St. Catherine at Mount Sinai in 1844 and 1859, he discovered the important fourth-century manuscript of the Bible Codex Sinaiticus.

T. was primarily a NT text critic (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM). Conservative in theology, he believed that faith required a reliable text. In 1841 he published a Greek NT that showed dependence on the earlier work of K. LACHMANN. His second Leipzig edition included an extensive critical apparatus and the prolegomena that presented his principles of criticism. In general, T. relied on the oldest Greek manuscripts together with evidence from early versions and patristic sources. He classified the material into two groups: Alexandrian and Latin, and Asiatic and Byzantine. The eighth edition (Novum Testamentum Graece) was published in two volumes (1869–72). It shows great reliance on Sinaiticus and contains one of the largest collections of variants found in any edition of the NT. In higher criticism T. published a short popular work (1896) that argued that all four Gospels were authentic and were accepted as canonical (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) by the beginning of the second century.

Works: Wann wurden unsere Evangelien verfasst (1880⁴; ET, Origin of the Four Gospels [1867]); When Were Our Gospels Written? (1896); Novum Testamentum Graece (2 vols., 1869–72⁸); vol. 3, Prolegomena (ed. C. R. Gregory, 1884).

Bibliography: W. Baird, History of NT Research 1 (1992) 322-28. J. Bentley, Secrets of Mount Sinai: The Story of the Codex Sinaiticus (1986). M. Black and R. Davidson, C. T. and the Greek NT (1981).

W. R. BAIRD

TITUS, LETTER TO (see PASTORAL LETTERS)

TOBIT, BOOK OF

Because the book of Tobit presents such a well-told story, it has been read and interpreted on many levels among Jews and Christians despite its disputed status in the CANON. Its narrative presents an answer to the problem of how the God of Israel, who is merciful and righteous, rewards the righteous and kind Jew who suffers persecution in the diaspora. Its characters, themes, and plot tell this message by using the everyday concerns of family, honor, sickness, money, death, and marriage along with the extraordinary elements of angels, demons, exorcism, healing, and prophecies (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB).

Although Tobit appears as an Israelite from the tribe of Naphtali in Assyrian exile, he; Anna, his wife; Tobias, his son; and Sarah, his daughter-in-law represent pious Jews caught in the problems of diaspora life. A story of postexilic life for Jews, it seems to have been composed sometime between 250 and 170 BCE (R. Doran [1986] 299; but see M. Rabenau [1994] 175-90). Its earliest use is indicated by four Aramaic fragments and one Hebrew fragment from Qumran (J. Milik [1966] 523, no. 3; G. Vermes [1986] 225; J. VanderKam [1994] 35; J. Fitzmyer [1994] 220-23; F. García-Martínez [1996] 293-99, 487-88). Its presence and likely use among these scrolls show also how Tobit connects with other postexilic Jewish literature that "employed canonical novels for the final shaping of the book, with additional influences being exerted from other factors (sources, new beliefs, needs of the community for which the book was written)" (W. Soll [1989] 220, no. 38).

Tobit was not recognized as canonical in rabbinic Judaism, yet manuscripts and references to it indicate its continued popularity into the medieval period. Although no commentaries were written on it, Jewish copiers and editors showed ongoing interest by making changes in the texts to conform to later Jewish practices (D. Simpson; R. Pfeiffer [1949] 266).

Early Christian authors also used Tobit: Polycarp 10:2 and 2 Clem. 16:4 correspond to Tob 4:10 and 12:8-9 but do not cite Tobit on the subject of almsgiving and love (J. Gamberoni [1969] 19-20). Later Christian writers tended not to comment in full on the work but used it as a practical and popular resource. CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, ORIGEN, Cyprian, DIONYSUS OF ALEXANDRIA, EPHRAEM THE SYRIAN, AUGUSTINE, and Hilary used it on such topics as alms, prayer, sexuality, marriage, patience, parental guidance, angels, demons, exorcisms, persecution, the ideal Christian, and resurrection status (Gamberoni, 19-61). The use and interpretation of Tobit in the early church and in the West until 1600 have been carefully presented by Gamberoni; this article follows his work to show some major developments.

Clement of Alexandria was the first Christian author to show that he understood the story of Tobit as a historical account, as part of the overall development of HB history (Gamberoni, 26). Later Origen stated that he knew of no Hebrew text for the book and that the Jews known to him did not recognize it as canonical—yet he stated that Christians did hold it as part of their HB Scriptures (Gamberoni, 30-33).

While this difference between Jewish and Christian Scriptures was recognized by Christian authors, the popularity of Tobit and its practical, moral, and even doctrinal use ensured its acceptance by the church. This basic position was held by Origen, ATHANASIUS, Rufinus, and Augustine and gave Tobit its deuterocanonical or ecclesiastical status (E. Ellis [1988] 667-74; Gamberoni, 39-55).

While Rufinus accepted Tobit as ecclesiastical, but not canonical, Scripture, JEROME was torn between recognizing that the book was not in the Jewish canon, which he esteemed highly, but had been ecclesiastically used and accepted, which was also important to him (Gamberoni, 72-80). At the request of several Western bishops, he nevertheless translated Tobit into Latin, he said, from a Hebrew TRANSLATION made by an assistant who knew both "Chaldee" (Aramaic) and Hebrew. How Jerome translated what he received or what he had to translate from becomes important not only for manuscript evidence (D. Simpson [1913a] 178; Pfeiffer, 271-72) but also for the influence that his VULGATE translation had on the life of the Western church. Jerome became an interpreter of Tobit because his translation was "fuller" than the important Sinaiticus version (Gamberoni, 83-84; VanderKam, 35), and these expansions (by Jerome or his sources) often accentuate moral, ethical, and religious themes in a way that gives the Jewish material a Christian coloring. One influential expansion, given the growth of Christian asceticism at this time, was that Sarah and Tobit practiced three nights of abstinence after their wedding (Gamberoni, 83-87).

Similar variations of the story for popular Christian use are found in the fifth-century speculum called Audi Israhel, which cites a version of Tobit on all manner of topics for Christian living (honor of parents, alms, etc.; Gamberoni, 62-64). This sort of practical Christian use also led to finding examples or images in the book for dogmatic purposes, so that ISIDORE OF SEVILLE had father and son symbolize the law and Christ (Gamberoni, 107).

BEDE interpreted Tobit as an allegory concerning Christ and the church; e.g., the end of the book showed the conversion of the Jews (Gamberoni, 115-16) and Tobit and the fish became Christ overcoming Satan, a theme that entered medieval iconography (G. Schiller [1971] 107; H. Weskott [1972] 320-26). NICHOLAS OF LYRA wrote practical sermons (postilla) on Tobit with attention to the littera, the story, characters, words used, locations, etc. He addressed the book's problems as well as its teachings (Gamberoni, 147-50).

In the medieval period Tobit became the patron of gravediggers and intercessors for the blind. He was the model for young travelers setting out into the world as journeymen after their years of apprenticeship (Réau [1956] 320).

In the late Middle Ages few commentaries were written on Tobit as a whole. But because it was popular and was used in moral, theological, and even canon law issues, exegetical traditions on the book were gathered and transmitted, including discussions of the problems it presented for history, geography, the supernatural, and the canon (Gamberoni, 181-95).

Humanistic scholarship by Christians led to the publication of two medieval Jewish manuscripts printed earlier in Constantinople, one by S. MÜNSTER and one by P. FAGIUS, both in 1542 (Simpson, 178-80; Gamberoni, 250-52). These texts and a very shortened version of Tobit in the medieval homiletical MIDRASH Tanhuma Yeladammedenu show continuing Jewish use of the story.

Humanistic education and the Reformation aroused new interest in Tobit, beginning with the question of canonicity. While ERASMUS was aware of the problems from Jerome and others, he did not take the step that A. von KARLSTADT did in viewing canonicity as something the church recognized, not established. Hence, for Karlstadt, books like Tobit that were not in the Jewish canon were valuable but not on the same level and became apocryphal, not ecclesiastical or deuterocanonical (Gamboni, 201-8).

LUTHER gave his view in the 1534 German Bible: "Apocrypha: That is, books not equal to the Holy Scriptures but yet useful and good to read." His preface to Tobit spoke highly of its value for Christian behavior, especially in marriage, and he considered it a pious comedy (WA Bibel 12, 108-11). During the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, interest in the book blossomed into numerous literary and musical works (C. Roth and B. Bayer [1971] 1186-87; see WESTERN LITERATURE, THE BIBLE AND; and MUSIC, THE BIBLE AND).

Following Luther, some commentators (C. Pellican, Flacius Illyricus, Osiander) adapted Tobit to new theological and social views on such topics as alms and faith (vs. good works), abstention and marriage. A. Osiander (1496/98–1552) raised questions about Tobit's genre, and C. PELLICAN considered chaps. 13 and 14 as secondary (Gamberoni, 257-73). All these commentaries assumed a basic historicity and probability for the story, whereas ZWINGLI and other writers latched onto Jerome's doubts and began to talk of fables. The Reformed scholar F. Junius the elder went further: Since the book was non-canonical, it was human and open to error. Aware of other versions of Tobit, he pondered its manuscript history, original language (Chaldean, i.e., Aramaic), author, and location, finding moral, theological, and historical errors. It was a bad Jewish sort of fable now safely outside the Bible (Gamberoni, 278-80). This view generally prevailed among Protestants, and scholarly interest in Tobit declined. The wedding service in the 1549 Book of Common Prayer referred to Tobias and Sarah, following the older Sarum rite; and other Protestant groups, like the Old Order Amish, continued this mention of the book (B. Metzger [1957] 40). Roman Catholic writers, following Trent's favorable decision on Tobit's canonicity, used it in popular works and commentaries (Gamberoni, 281-93) but with a new sense of the problems in the book.

Attempts at dating Tobit and attention to its literary structure began in the nineteenth century and have influenced all subsequent interpretations. Both of these aspects concerned PENTATEUCHAL source critic K. ILGEN in 1800, who proposed several stages of composition (dating from the 7th to the 1st cents. BCE), based partly on changes in style and on manuscript evidence (Pfeiffer, 276). German literary historian K. Simrock (1802–76) suggested on the basis of his work in folktales (see FOLKLORE) that Tobit's plot in part came from the folktale theme often called "The Grateful Dead," although this insight was developed only later (for biblical literature in general and for Tobit specifically) by J. RENAN in 1879 (Pfeiffer, 269). Aside from scholarly interest, the story of Tobit continued to engage such readers as S. KIERKEGAARD, who pondered it in Fear and Trembling, proposing Sarah as the real hero.

Despite the protests of some scholars defending Tobit's historicity or priority, by the end of the nineteenth century Tobit was seen as a didactic tale drawing on at least three sources or influences: "The Grateful Dead," "The Dangerous Bride," and "The Story of Ahikar." Recognition of Tobit's connection to Ahikar came before access to the Ahikar text from Elephantine in 1911; in addition to earlier questions about written or oral dependence, interpretation has more recently looked at how the Ahikar material is used in the overall aims of Tobit (P. Deselaers [1982] 424-48; J. Lindenberger [1985] 488-90; Soll, 221). Persian influence was also detected but was disputed (Pfeiffer, 271, no. 40; Soll, 225, no. 46). Egyptian influence (Simpson, 187-88) is now considered unlikely (Pfeiffer, 271).

Besides the Ahikar manuscript discovery, discovery of the Sinaiticus version of Tobit (pub. 1862) and of Tobit fragments from Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) have given new directions to interpretation: Codex Sinaiticus with its Semiticisms (Thomas) and longer version seems favored now over Codices Alexandrinus and Vaticinus as the superior Greek version of the book (backed by the OL); and this in turn has been supported by study of the Qumran fragments, which largely agree with the longer version of Sinaiticus and also represent all fourteen chapters (VanderKam, 35). Aramaic may still be the likely original language (Vermes, 225; Doran, 296; VanderKam, 35; Rabenau, 7).

Work on source analysis (Simpson, 187-96) or the use of sources in Tobit (M. Plath [1901] 404-14) continued in the early twentieth century alongside interest in the book as a source for historical reconstruction of early Judaism and Christianity—as can be seen in the early editions of E. SCHÜRER (RGG) and later in Pfeiffer's history and F. Zimmermann's commentary (1958).

Yet beside this more historical approach, literary study grew in new directions with the aid of work on folktales by G. Gerould (1908, 1973), S. Thompson (1933), and V. Propp (1968). S. Liljeblad (1927) proposed to move from the motif of "The Grateful Dead" to the story of "The Dangerous Bride" as the core of Tobit's plot; T. Glasson (1959) agreed but wished to connect the plot to the Admetus story in Apollodorus. Other literary research moved from listing biblical literary connections (Simpson, 192, nos. 6-7; Zimmermann, 12-13) to investigating how biblical themes or stories had been models for Tobit. L. Ruppert (1972) looked to the Joseph story; A. Di Lella (1979) found connections to themes in Deuteronomy; Deselaers proposed the Isaac and Rebekah story in Genesis 24. J. Blenkinsopp (1981) drew these two directions closer in his 1981 work by comparing Tobit as a sort of biography (along with the Jacob stories) with Propp's grid of folktale functions (actually fairytale functions, as P. Milne [1986] has pointed out). Blenkinsopp claimed to find enough similarities to Propp's functions to question the best genre description of Tobit and also whether Tobit has a pattern similar to other lives told in biblical narratives.

Tobit has often carried the tag "didactic" or "paraenetic" story, or Novelle, with that sort of flavor (Deselaers, 271, no. 460; Vermes, 222); but like Blenkinsopp, Deselaer challenged this. His Das Buch Tobit impressively combined literary, historical, and theological research comparable to G. Nickelsburg's work. While Deselaers investigated the book's divisions, details, and development, giving some recognition to its totality, Nickelsburg invited the reader to consider it as a totality while appreciating its many constituent parts and complexities. Deselaers began with a LITERARY-critical investigation of the frame story (chaps. 1–3; 14) and of the internal story (chaps 4–14:1), which led him to propose that Tobit originated in a basic didactic story, which was expanded three times (Deselaers, 48-56). After examining all its parts he concluded that the genre of Novelle fits for the internal story; but the fuller final shape is better described as a sort of novel (Roman) that has incorporated elements from some other genres (Deselaers, 273-79). Rabenau's studies on Tobit enter into conversation with Deselaer's work by proposing a basic narrative focused on the theme of guidance involving various subthemes (Rabenau, 94-147), with expansions (Rabenau, 8-26; 148-74).

The briefer treatments of Tobit by Nickelsburg (1984, 1988) emphasize the present shape of the book as "an integrated literary whole" that contains a complex, yet well-told story employing various literary forms, such as testaments, prayers, hymns, etc. (Nickelsburg [1984] 40; see also the index on Tobit). In his brief commentary he first analyzed the whole text as a "sophisticated and carefully crafted narrative," the plot (especially the parallels of Tobit and Sarah), and the complex forms and motifs woven into the total story (Nickelsburg [1988] 791-92).

On religious dimensions in Tobit, Deselaers and Nickelsburg are in general agreement. Nickelsburg shows a development from pious life to despair in sufferings, followed by God's actions, and finally doxology; he points to the theme that divine help is imperceptible to humans. Deselaers views the terms hodos, eleēmosynē, and eulogein (blessing) as important for Tobit's overall message. Nickelsburg speaks of the doxological and didactic tones and intention and points out social aspects of Tobit: concern with family, marriage, burial, diaspora, etc. This Deselaers does in greater length and depth in his investigation of theological and sociological aspects, connecting family and kinship with mobility (hodos) and almsgiving (eleēmosynē) in diaspora life (Deselaers, 309-73).

Both Deselaers and Rabenau propose stages for Tobit's development. Deselaers's three stages occur in 220, 195, and 185 BCE; Tobit was started in Alexandria and enlarged there and in Jerusalem (cf. Doran, 299). Rabenau argues for a Samaritan beginning in the third century BCE, with additions in the 140s and later in the last half of the second century among Jews, while recognizing interest in it in the diaspora (Rabenau, 175-90).

J. Craghan's brief commentary on parts of Tobit (1982) shows agreement with Di Lella's deuteronomic connections and attention to the story line (see Tobit 11:15). I. Nowell's commentary (1990) combines recent discussion on Tobit with a sensitivity to literary points and structure (inclusio device, themes of journey, and healing) in its short scope. H. Gross's longer commentary (1987) tends to follow some of the directions set by Deselaers.

Soll's article has drawn together folktale research and refinements and biblical scholarship of the late twentieth century, developing an interesting analysis of one important function of fairytale plots (villainy or lack; Soll calls it misfortune). A brief introduction and overview of Tobit incorporating an interest in the effect of the whole complex story line with attention to literary technique has appeared in N. Petersen's essay (1990). Nowell (1995) and D. McCracken (1995) point to humor in Tobit.

Interpretation of Tobit (indeed of the Apocrypha and beyond) has again begun from interest in social and religious history (B. Bow and G. Nickelsburg [1991]; A.-J. Levine [1992]; H. Engel [1993]; M. Oeming [1994]) and also for tracing literary and theological connections with canonical Jewish and early Christian writing (Nickelsburg [1984] 45-56; [1988] 792).

Bibliography: K. Beyer, Die aramäischen Texte vom Toten Meer: Ergänzungsband (1994) 134-47. J. Blenkinsopp, "Biographical Patterns in Biblical Literature," JSOT 20 (1981) 27-46. B. Bow and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, "Patriarchy with a Twist: Men and Women in Tobit," Women like This: New Perspectives on Jewish Women in the Greco-Roman World (ed. A.-J. Levine, 1991) 127-43. J. Cragan, Esther, Judith, Tobit, Jonah, Ruth (OT Message 16, 1982). P. Deselaers, Das Buch Tobit: Studien zu seiner Entstehung, Komposition, und Theologie (1982). A. A. Di Lella, "The Deuteronomic Background of the Farewell Discourse in Tob 14:3-11," CBQ 41 (1979) 380-89. R. Doran, "Narrative Literature," Early Judaism and Its Modern Interpreters (ed. R. A. Kraft and G. W. E. Nickelsburg, 1986) 287-310. E. E. Ellis, "The OT Canon in the Early Church," Mikra (ed. M. J. Mulder and H. Sysling, 1988) 653-90. H. Engel, "Auf zuverlässigen Wegen und in Gerechtigkeit: Religiöses Ethos in der Diaspora nach dem Buch Tobit," Biblische Theologie und gesellschaftlicher Wandel (ed. G. Braulik, 1993) 8-100. J. A. Fitzmyer, "Preliminary Publication of pap 4Qtob[a] ar," Biblica 75 (1994) 220-24. J. Gamberoni, Die Auslegung des Buches Tobias in der griechisch-lateinischen Kirche der Antike und der Christenheit des Westens bis um 1600 (1969). F. García Martínez, The Dead Sea Scrolls Translated (1996) 293-99, 487-88. G. H. Gerould, The Grateful Dead (1908, 1973). T. F. Glasson, "The Main Source of Tobit," ZAW 71 (1959) 275-77. H. Gross, Tobit/Judit (NEB.AT 19, 1987). K. Ilgen, Das Buch Tobias: Die Geschichte Tobi's nach drey verschiedenen Originalen dem Griechischen dem Lateinischen des Hieronymus und einem Syrischen (1800). A.-J. Levine, "Tobit: Teaching Jews how to Live in the Diaspora," BibRev 8 (1992) 42-51, 64. S. Liljeblad, Die Tobiasgeschichte und andere Märchen mit toten Helfern (1927). J. M. Lindenberger, "Ahiqar,"

OTP 2 (1985) 479-93. D. McCracken, "Narration and Comedy in the Book of Tobit," JBL 114 (1995) 401-18. B. M. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apocrypha (1957). J. T. Milik, "La Patrie de Tobie," RB 73 (1966) 522-30. P. J. Milne, "Folktales and Fairy Tales: An Evaluation of Two Proppian Analyses of Biblical Narratives," JSOT 34 (1986) 35-60; V. Propp and the Study of Structure in Hebrew Biblical Narrative (1988). J. Müller, Beiträge zur Erklärung und Kritik des Buches Tobit (BZAW 13, 1908). G. W. E. Nickelsburg, Jewish Literature Between the Bible and the Mishnah: A Historical and Literary Introduction (1981); "Tobit," Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period: Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha, Qumran, Sectarian Writings, Philo, Josephus (ed. M. E. Stone, 1984) 40-46; "Tobit," HBC (1988) 791-803. I. Nowell, "Irony in the Book of Tobit," TBT 33 (1995) 79-83. M. Oeming, "Ethik in der Spätzeit des Alten Testaments am Beispiel von Hiob 31 und Tobit 4," Altes Testament Forschung und Wirkung (eds. P. Mommer and W. Thiel, 1994) 159-73. N. R. Petersen, "Tobit," Books of the Bible (ed. B. W. Anderson, 1990) 2, 35-42. R. H. Pfeiffer, History of the NT Times with an Introduction to the Apocrypha (1949). M. Plath, "Zum Buch Tobit," TSK 74 (1901) 377-414. V. Propp, Morphology of the Folktale (1968). M. Rabenau, Studien zum Buch Tobit (BZAW 220, 1994). L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétien 2, 1 (1956). C. Roth and B. Beyer, "Book of Tobit: In the Arts," EncJud 15 (1971) 1186-87. L. Ruppert, "Das Buch Tobias: Ein Modelfall nachgestaltender Erzählung," Wort, Lied, und Gottesspruch: Septuaginta (ed. J. Schreiner, 1972) 109-19. G. Schiller, Iconography of Christian Art 1 (1971). D. C. Simpson, "The Book of Tobit," APOT 1 (1913a) 174-201; "The Chief Recensions of the Book of Tobit," JTS 14 (1913b) 516-30. W. Soll, "Misfortune and Exile in Tobit: The Juncture of a Fairy Tale Source and Deuteronomic Theology," CBQ 51 (1989) 209-31. J. D. Thomas, "The Greek Text of Tobit," JBL 91 (1972) 463-71. S. Thompson, Motif-index of Folk-literature 2 (1933); The Folktale (1951). J. C. VanderKam, The Dead Sea Scrolls Today (1994). G. Vermes, "The Book of Tobit," HJPAJC 3, 1 (1986) 222-32. H. Weskott, "Tobias," Lexikon der christlichen Ikonographie: Allgemeine Ikonographie 4 (1972) 320-26. F. Zimmermann, The Book of Tobit (1958).

W. POEHLMANN

TOLAND, JOHN (1670–1722)

Born in County Donegal, Ireland, Nov. 30, 1670, T. was "educated from the cradle in the grossest superstition and idolatry," as he put it in 1696. He threw off Roman Catholicism in 1685 with a conversion seemingly to Presbyterianism. From 1687 to 1690 he attended the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh. Supported by the Dissenters, he then went to Holland, where he studied under F. Spanheim (1632–1701) and J. LE CLERC and became a Latitudinarian.

Returning to England, T. published his best-known work Christianity not Mysterious (1696). He based his argument partly on philosophy, particularly J. LOCKE's theories of meaning and nominal essence, and partly on an examination of the term mystery in the NT. T.'s bold conclusion—in the words of his subtitle—was that "there is nothing in the Gospel contrary to reason, nor above it: and that no Christian doctrine can be properly called a mystery." The book created a sensation and is often said to have started the Deist controversy (see DEISM). It made T. notorious. Many thought—probably rightly—that T.'s actual position was even more radical than the non-mysterious biblical Christianity for which he argued in the book. His 1698 and 1699 works did much to confirm these suspicions. The first suggested that acceptance of a recent forgery helped to explain the acceptance in earlier times of "superstitious pieces under the name of Christ and his apostles," a thesis he defended in the second work by listing over seventy spurious gospels, epistles, and acts. (An even more extensive list was printed in his 1726 posthumous work.) Although T. denied that he was calling into question the CANON of the NT, few of his critics took his disavowal seriously. In his 1709 work he suggested that WALAFRID STRABO was a sounder historian of the Jews than was Moses.

T.'s chief contribution to biblical scholarship was Nazarenus (1718), in which he placed early Christianity firmly within a Jewish context. He argued that the first Christians—the Nazarenes, Ebionites, or, as he also called them, Jewish Christians—were obliged to keep the levitical law and that original Christianity was perverted by the heathenism of the gentile Christians (who were not meant to keep the law). He tried to show that the distinction between Jewish and gentile Christianity is able to resolve important perplexities in the NT, e.g., the apparently conflicting claims about faith and/or works being necessary for salvation. T. defended Nazarenus in the fourth essay of Tetradymas, which also contains (in the 1st essay) a naturalistic account of the pillar of cloud and fire mentioned in Exodus 14.

T. died Mar. 11, 1722, "without the least perturbation of mind" according to his biographer, Desmaizeaux.

Works: Christianity not Mysterious (1696); Life of Milton (1698); Amyntor, or a Defense of Milton's Life (1699); Origines Judaicae (1709); Nazarenus: Or, Jewish, Gentile, and Mahometan Christianity (1718); Tetradymas (1720); A Collection of Several Pieces of Mr. J. T. (2 vols., 1726).

Bibliography: BB 6 (1763) 3965-77. D. Berman, "Enlightenment and Counter-Enlightenment in Irish Philosophy," AGPh 64 (1982) 148-65. G. Carabelli, Tolandiana (2 vols., 1975–78), lists nearly 200 items by or attributed to him, as well as works on him. H. Daniel, J. T.: His Methods, Manners, and Mind (1984). C. Giuntini, Pantheismo e ideologia republicana: J. T. (1670–1722) (1979). MSHH 1 (1727) 252-71; 10, 1 (1730) 23-46. H. F. Nicholl, "Religion Without Mystery," Her 100

(1965) 54-65. H. G. Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (1984) 294-308; RMM, 25-33. L. Stephen, DNB 46 (1898) 438-42. R. Sullivan, J. T. and the Deist Controversy: A Study in Adaptations (1982).

D. BERMAN

TORREY, CHARLES CUTLER (1863–1956)

Known for his accomplishments in amateur athletics (baseball, tennis, wrestling) and for his talent as a musician (flute), T. was arguably the most brilliant and original biblical interpreter the United States has yet produced. Born at East Hardwick, Vermont, in 1863, he was educated at Bowdoin College (AB 1884), Andover Theological Seminary (BD 1889), and the University of Strasbourg (PhD 1892), where he was greatly influenced by T. NÖLDEKE, P. JENSEN, and J. Euting (1839–1913). He taught Latin at Bowdoin (1885–86), then Semitic languages at Andover (1892–1900). In 1900 he was appointed professor of Semitic philosophy and comparative grammar (later Sterling professor) at Yale, where he became chairman of the department of Semitic and biblical languages, literature, and history, serving until his retirement in 1932.

T. was regarded as the dean of Semitic language scholars in the United States, being versed in Arabic, Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN INTERPRETATION), Hebrew, Phoenician, Aramaic, Syriac, Accadian, and Persian languages and literatures. He founded and was first director of the American School of Archaeology in Jerusalem (1900–1901), later the Jerusalem research center of the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH. He served twice as editor of JAOS (1900–1907, 1911–16). In 1915 he was elected president of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE and in 1917 of the AOS. He was a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, the Medieval Academy of America, and the Deutsche Morgenländisches Gesellschaft and director of the Egypt Exploration Fund and of the Palestine Oriental Society. Bowdoin, Yale, Jewish Institute of Religion, Jewish Theological Seminary, and Chicago College of Jewish Studies all bestowed honorary doctorates on him.

Throughout his career and in retirement T. regularly contributed articles to professional journals and to Encyclopedia Biblica, the Jewish Encyclopedia, and the Encyclopaedia of Islam. He carried out his pioneering archaeological excavation (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) at Sidon, Lebanon (1900–1901), adding an understanding of this important science to his interests in history and philology. He maintained a special interest in numismatics and epigraphy throughout his long and sometimes controversial career. He died in 1956 in Chicago, where he was a director of the Oriental Institute.

T. became famous for promulgating certain controversial opinions. Chief among these is undoubtedly his view that the SYNOPTIC Gospels, John, and Revelation are for the most part straightforward translations of Aramaic originals. He was so convinced of this idea that he actually translated the four Greek Gospels back into Aramaic, then from his hypothetical Aramaic "original" into English. Regarding the HB, T. held that the prophetic books of Jeremiah, Second Isaiah, and Ezekiel were part of a "sacred library of prophets" compiled in the third century BCE and that Jeremiah's connection with the seventh century BCE was purely imaginary and literary. Moreover, he averred that the exile and the restoration were fictions created by the chronicler in his polemic against the Samaritans. Similarly, he believed the bulk of Ezekiel to be pseudepigraphic (see PSEUDEPIGRAPHA), composed c. 230 BCE as a Jewish response to Alexander the Great's conquest of the East. T. concluded it was edited later, c. 200 BCE, but so as to appear to be an exilic work. In his classic study of Second Isaiah (1928), following E. KÖNIG's commentary T. argued for the unity of Isaiah 40–66 and considered Isaiah 34–35 as an introduction to that body of PROPHECY; the latter point has won adherents. His forceful, sometimes combative style occasionally manifested itself in debate at annual meetings of the SBL; his arguments on behalf of his independent and stimulating views were considered formidable and are still taken seriously, despite the lack of general acceptance of his conclusions.

Works: The Commercial-theological Terms in the Koran (1892); Composition and Historical Value of Ezra-Nehemiah (BZAW 2, 1896); (tr.), The Mohammedan Conquest of Egypt and North Africa (Ibn 'Abd al-Hakam, 1901); (ed. and tr.), Selections from the Sahih of al-Bokkari (SSS, 1906); Notes on the Aramaic Part of Daniel (1909); Ezra Studies (1910; repr. LBS, 1970); The Composition and Date of Acts (HTS 1, 1916); (ed.), The Futuh Misr of Ibn Abd al-Hakam (YOS.R 3, 1922), Arabic; The Second Isaiah: A New Interpretation (1928); Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy (YOS.R 18, 1930; repr. LBS, 1970); The Four Gospels: A New Translation (1933, 1947²); The Jewish Foundation of Islam (1933, repr. 1967); Our Translated Gospels: Some New Evidence (1936); Aramaic Graffiti on Coins of the Demanhur Hoard (1937); Documents of the Primitive Church (1941); The Apocryphal Literature: A Brief Introduction (1945; repr. 1963); The Lives of the Prophets: Greek Text and Translation (JBLMS 1, 1946); Gold Coins of Khokand and Bukhara (NNM 117, 1950); The Chronicler's History of Israel: Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah Restored to Its Original Form (1954); The Apocalypse of John (1958).

Bibliography: M. Burrows, "A Sketch of C. C. T.'s Career," BASOR 132 (1953) 6-8, also JBL 76 (1957) viii-ix. Z. Garber, EncJud 15 (1971) 1267. M. Greenberg, "Prolegomenon," Pseudo-Ezekiel and the Original Prophecy (C. C. Torrey, 1970) xi-xxxv. F. Rosenthal, "Introduction," Jewish Foundations to Islam (1967) v-xxiii. E. W. Saunders, Searching the Scriptures: History of the SBL (1982) 35, 37, 95-96. W. F.

Stinespring, "Prolegomenon," Ezra-Studies (C. C. Torrey, 1970) xi-xxviii.

J. M. BULLARD

TOY, CRAWFORD HOWELL (1836–1919)

Born in Norfolk, Virginia, T. studied at the University of Virginia and at Southern Baptist Seminary in Greenville, South Carolina. After serving in the Civil War he spent two years in Berlin studying OT and Semitic languages. In 1869 he became professor of OT interpretation at his alma mater, SBS, which in 1877 moved to Louisville, Kentucky. In 1879 he resigned because of controversies over INSPIRATION and biblical criticism, and in 1880 he was appointed Hancock Professor of Hebrew and Other Oriental Languages at Harvard Divinity School.

T. published numerous works, including two volumes in the Polychrome Bible series on Ezekiel, one a critical text, the other a TRANSLATION. He incorporated the results of critical scholarship judiciously, including the Wellhausenian perspectives (see J. WELLHAUSEN) on the development of Israel's faith. In the Proverbs (1899) commentary he cited Jewish and rabbinic sources and German scholars but made no reference to international wisdom materials.

Works: The History of the Religion of Israel: An OT Primer (1882, 1905[15]); Quotations in the NT (1884); Judaism and Christianity (1890); (ed.), The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel (SBOT 12, 1899); (tr.), The Book of the Prophet Ezekiel (SBONT 12, 1899); A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Proverbs (ICC, 1899; repr. 1948).

Bibliography: P. A. Duncan, "C. H. T.: Heresy at Louisville," American Religious Heretics (ed. G. H. Shriver, 1966) 56-88. D. G. Lyon, HTR 13 (1920) 1-22. D. G. Lyon and G. F. Moore (eds.), Studies in the History of Religions: Presented to C. H. T. (1912), with bibliography of T.'s writings. G. F. Moore, "An Appreciation of Prof. T.," AJSL 36 (1919–20) 1-17. T. H. Olbricht, "Intellectual Ferment and Instruction in the Scriptures: The Bible in Higher Education," The Bible in American Education (ed. D. L. Barr and N. Piediscalzi, 1982) 103-7. C. C. Torrey, DAB 18 (1936) 621-22.

T. H. OLBRICHT

TRADITION HISTORY

This method of analysis is known by several names, including the tradition-history method and tradition-historical criticism, all of which are English translations of German terms: Traditionsgeschichtliche Studien and Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien. In NT scholarship the preferred term is REDACTION CRITICISM, especially in reference to the critical evaluation of the Gospels. This diversity in nomenclature parallels the even greater range in approaches exhibited by individual scholars in their evaluation of particular texts. Thus one must make a very broad definition of the method to encompass the range of exegetical studies available.

In general terms, those using the method seek to reconstruct hypothetically the evolution of a biblical text, set of texts, or theme and the ways this text or theme may have communicated different messages to its ancient audience over the years. The scholar hypothesizes this evolutionary trajectory through both oral and written stages of development. In addition, the method is used to study how a text relates to its greater literary context in our present CANON. The scholar wishes to rediscover how cycles of texts grew into even larger cycles in the process of oral and written transmission. Once these stages of development have been discerned, creative suggestions can be made concerning the social and religious needs of the audiences addressed by the evolving text at each significant stage of growth. This provides the modern reader with deeper insight into the overall meaning of that biblical text.

1. History. The tradition-historical method grew out of the form-critical method (see FORM CRITICISM) in the 1930s and 1940s. The form-critical method had arisen in 1900–1930 through the work of H. GUNKEL (1895, 1901), H. GRESSMANN (1913), H. KLOSTERMANN, A. ALT (1953–59), and others who sought to reconstruct the theoretical oral prehistory and original oral form of a literary biblical text. The later tradition-historical critics, many of whom were already form critics, extended their evaluation to include all the hypothetical stages of development for a biblical text, from its original oral form to the final written canonical text.

The first serious tradition-history scholarship was contributed by G. von RAD and M. NOTH. Von Rad's seminal work (1938; ET 1966) suggested that the Pentateuch evolved out of short oral creeds and that the Yahwistic historian was the first to combine the Sinai traditions with the accounts of the wilderness wanderings and conquest. Von Rad also articulated a significant OT THEOLOGY based on tradition-historical reconstruction. Noth (1948; ET 1972) advanced the theory that great cycles of oral tradition (patriarchs, exodus, wilderness, Sinai, and entrance into arable land) and some shorter cycles evolved into the Pentateuchal sources (Yahwist, Elohist, and priestly source) and that the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY was composed by one creative author, not out of Pentateuchal sources, but out of diverse and fragmentary traditions (1943; ET 1981).

Scandinavian scholars (referred to loosely as the Uppsala school) contributed greatly to the development of this method. In contrast to their German counterparts, many Scandinavians rejected LITERARY or source criticism, maintaining that the development of biblical traditions occurred primarily in the oral stage before their precipitation into writing during the Babylonian exile—and hence that the method was concerned only with oral tradition. H. S. NYBERG may have begun this movement with a study of oral tradition in Hosea (1935). Significant scholars included I. ENGNELL (1960, 1969), who wrote numerous essays in critical methodology; and S. MOWINCKEL (1946), who moderated between Scandinavian emphasis on oral tradition and German source criticism. Other Scandinavian contributions include the work of I. Hylander on 1 Samuel (1932); H. BIRKELAND on the prophets (1938); A. Haldar on the prophets (1945); E. Nielsen on oral tradition and the Ten Commandments (1950, 1965); G. AHLSTRÖM on Psalm 89 (1959); R. Carlson on 2 Samuel (1964); and M. Saebø on Second Zechariah (1969).

More recent practitioners have combined the German and Scandinavian approaches by surveying the development of a text, set of texts, or theme through both oral and written stages. Significant works have included those of H. Gese on Ezekiel 40–48 (1958); W. Richter on Judges 3–9 (1964); K. Koch on methodology (1967; ET 1969); R. Rendtorf on the Pentateuchal sources (1977; ET 1990); M. Fishbane on INNER-BIBLICAL exegesis (1985); and C. Dohmen on the prohibition against images (1987). R. Gnuse (1996) has even used the method to analyze texts in the writings of JOSEPHUS. D. Knight has provided an excellent history of the tradition-historical method (1975); W. Rast has generated a text on the method (1972); and further collections of essays outlining the method's history (see K. Jeppesen and B. Otzen [1984]) and probing its wider implications (see Knight [1977]) have appeared.

The comparable discipline in NT studies is redaction criticism, which seeks to trace the evolution of oral tradition from the JESUS sayings down to their final literary form as written Gospels. R. BULTMANN (1931; ET 1963) was a pioneer in this regard. Scholars who have analyzed the theological assumptions of Gospel authors in their use of the Jesus tradition include G. BORNKAMM (1960; ET 1963); W. Marxsen (1956; ET 1969); H. Conzelmann (1953; ET 1960); J. L. MARTYN (1968); and W. Kelber (1983). Emphasizing the creative work of the final author, NT scholars pay more attention to the final stage of transmission, since the NT oral tradition is much shorter than that of HB texts. Hence NT scholars use the term redaction, which refers more directly to that final stage, whereas HB scholars prefer a term like tradition history. A fine introduction to the NT method was provided by N. Perrin (1969).

Criticism of tradition history has emerged among HB scholars. J. Van Seters (1975, 1992, 1994), T. Thompson (1987), and R. Whybray (1987) have questioned whether an extensive oral tradition really lies behind biblical narratives, and if so, whether it can be reconstructed out of the final literary text. They and other critics suggest a process of literary creation during the Babylonian exile and thereafter out of little or no prior traditions. In the future, scholarly discussion may rage concerning the actual viability of tradition history as an exegetical method.

2. Steps in the Method. In studying a text, set of texts, or theme, the tradition-historical critic will have a particular agenda for the analysis, which will vary depending upon the text's genre, e.g., narrative, legal text, prophetic oracle, psalm, wisdom saying, novella, etc. Certain texts lend themselves to a full tradition-historical scrutiny, especially if they appear to have a long evolutionary pre-history, as might be the case with narrative passages. In assessing a particular passage the critical scholar might envision five stages of development worthy of consideration and, depending on the text, might focus intensely on one or more of these stages.

The first area of consideration would be ancient Near Eastern or Hellenistic parallels to the biblical passage(s). The critic considers comparable texts that may have influenced biblical authors in the oral or written formation of the biblical text. Even if these comparable texts were not directly available to the biblical authors, they may have been part of a familiar genre. Biblical authors used well-established formulas and stereotypic language to communicate with their audience, sometimes employing analogous language and literary genres to communicate similar ideas and sometimes evoking imagery used by their foreign contemporaries in order to critique or reject ideas advanced by those contemporaries. Examples of the former include prophetic oracles, which adapted the messenger formula of ancient Near Eastern diplomatic correspondence, "Thus says the king," to become "Thus says the Lord." Examples of the latter are the biblical accounts of creation and the flood in Genesis 1–3 and 6–9, which reworked the Babylonian and Egyptian mythic accounts (see EGYPTOLOGY).

Critics must be cautious, however, when searching for parallel ancient Near Eastern and classical texts, lest they engage in "parallel-mania"—that is, finding ancient texts that bear only a superficial resemblance to biblical texts. The parallel texts must share significant modes of expression, format, and purpose with the biblical passage in order to be helpful in comparative analysis. Furthermore, in the subjective opinion of the critical scholar, the parallel text or a similar genre must have been reasonably accessible to the biblical author either directly from the foreign culture or through the mediation of other biblical texts. Too often modern scholars have dredged up inappropriate parallel texts from the ancient world and obtained skewed results from their analysis of biblical passages.

The second area of consideration is the possible oral pre-history of the biblical text being studied. Not every biblical passage passed through a significant oral stage of transmission, but scholars generally assume that Pentateuchal and deuteronomistic narratives as well as prophetic oracles and some psalms had an oral pre-history.

Careful scrutiny of our present literary text may discern some of the stages of this developmental process, including the original form, message, and social setting. Thus the tradition-historical critic seeks to answer several questions: (1) What was the original extent of the oral form in contrast to the present written text? What lines have been added secondarily in the later oral and written transmission? (2) What was the shape of the original oral form? Is there a discernible outline or pattern? Does this pattern conform to a genre that would have been recognized by its audience, e.g., epic, hero-tale, legend, myth, chronicle, fable, song, etc. (as in the narratives) or lament, parable, lawsuit, disputation, salvation oracle, taunt, etc. (as in prophetic oracles)? The form communicated as much to the ancient audience as the actual content. (3) What was the original message, and how might it be different from the messages communicated in later oral and written stages? (4) Who spoke the original oral form (priests, Levites, bards, prophets, etc.), and why did this form originate with them? (5) To whom was the oral form addressed, and what were the needs to which this form spoke? This analysis is form criticism, which early form critics used exclusively in analyzing texts (especially psalms). For tradition-historical critics, form criticism is only one stage in the process of exegesis.

The third area of investigation is envisioning how the biblical text might have grown into its present literary context. How did the passage become connected with other texts, and how did that process evolve through various stages? The critic is interested not only in the transformation of meaning experienced by that passage as other texts are connected to it but also in how the passage fits into the greater cycle of texts in terms of meaning. Early literary or source critics assumed that this amalgamation of texts occurred in written or literary fashion; but since the rise of form and tradition-historical criticisms, scholars assume that these early collections, or cycles, arose in oral form.

Once the oral narrative became part of a larger cycle, it functioned in a larger theological tradition with overarching themes that united a number of texts. The individual narrative was subordinate to the themes of the greater cycle, and whoever crafted the larger oral or written corpus often changed some of the language in the shorter forms to conform to these greater themes. The scholar seeks to observe how the original form now relates to passages around it and to discover which of those passages might have been woven together in a separate oral or written cycle at some point of transmission. Diverse texts are associated with one another on the basis of common vocabulary, themes, and theological ideas; they are distinguished from other passages that might have belonged to a separate cycle of traditions because the latter are duplicate accounts of those in the first cycle or because the latter share their own common language. Once this distinct larger cycle of texts has been isolated, the critic seeks to articulate its distinct characteristic theology or ideology (see IDEOLOGICAL CRITICISM).

At this stage the tradition-historical critic engages in what traditionally has been called source or literary criticism. In PENTATEUCHAL studies this would be the point where scholars evaluate texts as being part of the Yahwist, Elohist, or priestly tradition. In the deuteronomistic history scholars delineate cycles, such as the rise of David (1 Samuel 16–2 Samuel 8), the succession narrative (2 Samuel 9–20; 1 Kings 1–2), or the court history of Solomon (1 Kings 3–11). In legal corpora one would isolate the book of the covenant (Exodus 21–23), the holiness code (Leviticus 17–26), or the deuteronomic laws (Deuteronomy 12–26). In the prophetic tradition (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) one would isolate early editions of each prophet's oracles, which contain the core of the prophet's original oracles and early additions by disciples.

The fourth area of evaluation is reflection on how the great cycle of narratives was connected to an even larger segment of literature. At this point the biblical texts most likely precipitated into written form. The tradition-historical critic asks how the original form and its larger cycle now fit into a much larger entity, e.g., the deuteronomistic history (c. 620–550 BCE); the priestly edited version of the Pentateuchal narratives (c. 550–400 BCE); the final written form of a prophetic book like Isaiah (with Proto-, Deutero-, and Trito-Isaiah brought together); or even the prophetic corpus as a whole. Again, the critic inquires subjectively as to how the even greater context affects the original passage and how that passage adds to the message of the greater corpus.

At this stage the scholar is interested in an editorial process, observing additions to the text that appear literary in origin and may be from scribal hands. These additions, as well as the way sources are woven together, reflect sophisticated theological assumptions; and clever literary style and intellectual depth is observable in the allusions, foreshadowings, genealogies, thematic speeches, editorial comments, and other literary links that unite large sections of literature. Early source critics often denigrated these later editorial additions, but in the past two generations scholars have come to respect these final editors as perhaps the most theologically profound contributors to the process.

At this point the tradition-historical critic has engaged in redaction criticism, the study of the literary and editorial process that created the final text. In NT scholarship redaction criticism is done on the Gospels when critical scholars inquire how the Gospel writers theologically formulated the literary text of each Gospel.

The final area of scholarly reflection is one in which tradition-historical critics too often have been remiss: consideration of how the individual text fits into the message of the entire biblical canon and into biblical theology as a whole. This analysis would consider how the original text(s) under consideration might have been used and reinterpreted by the later biblical tradition, e.g., by books in the Kethubim (Writings) generated during the postexilic era or by writings in the NT. This inner-biblical exegesis has been developed recently by such scholars as Fishbane (1985).

This level of reflection has been called CANONICAL CRITICISM by scholars who have advocated it in the last generation, including B. CHILDS (1970, 1974) and J. SANDERS (1972, 1984). Although sometimes considered a methodology separate from the other critical methods described above, it actually is the final and theologically culminating stage of the tradition-historical method. At this point the biblical exegete attempts to discern the ultimate religious message of the biblical text for people today.

In retrospect, tradition history or the tradition-historical method evaluates the theoretical evolution of a biblical passage and in so doing absorbs the techniques of several other methods. In seeking to understand the message of a text at each stage of its evolution, tradition history demonstrates the dynamic growth of the biblical tradition as each generation reinterprets and develops its past traditions.

3. Representative Exegesis. Given the complexity of the tradition history method as outlined above, it may be helpful to consider a text for analysis using the method. In analyzing 1 Samuel 3, the theophany of Yahweh to Samuel at Shiloh (see Gnuse [1984]), the five stages of evaluation would be as follows: (a) A review of ancient Near Eastern literature would focus on comparable prophetic narratives and dream reports. Mesopotamian sources offer many suggestive parallels, especially nighttime prophetic dream reports received in shrines at Mari (c. 1800 BCE). Even more relevant are dream reports from Egypt and Mesopotamia that fall into patterns of "auditory message dreams" and "visual symbolic dreams." Comparison with 1 Samuel 3 demonstrates striking similarities with auditory message dreams.

(b) Form-critical evaluation of 1 Sam 3:1-21 leads to a sense that the original form of the text was vv. 1-18. In the plot development of the narrative are sensitive literary devices, including the artistic contrast of innocent young Samuel and the old priest Eli, who had failed to control his evil sons, and the threefold call of Samuel by Yahweh designed to heighten the suspense of an impending theophany in an age when the "Word of the Lord" was rare. At this point the scholar observes form-critical similarities between this text and other biblical prophetic call narratives (Moses, Exodus 3; Gideon, Judges 6; Saul, 1 Samuel 9; Jeremiah, Jeremiah 1; and Ezekiel, Ezekiel 1–2), as well as the auditory message dreams of Assyria (see ASSYRIOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and Chaldean Babylon (c. 700–550 BCE). The account appears crafted to conform to both formats.

(c) The scholar then observes how 1 Samuel 3 fits into the greater Samuel idyll in 1 Samuel 1–3, which as a whole contrasts the young prophet with the evil priests. This cycle shares themes with the larger cycle in the Pentateuch called the Elohist, which likewise has auditory message dreams in the patriarchal accounts, a positive attitude toward prophets, and a distrust of priests (Exodus 32–33, the golden calf incident). How the Samuel idyll is connected to the Elohist tradition is highly debated, however.

(d) The critical scholar expands the observation of how 1 Samuel 3 fits into its greater context by observing further redaction. First Samuel 1–3 became part of the narrative cycle concerning the rise of the monarchy in 1 Samuel 1–15, wherein old narratives sympathetic to the monarchy (1 Sam 9:1–10:16; 11; 13–14) appear woven together with later (perhaps deuteronomistic) texts critical of kingship (1 Samuel 7–8; 10:17-27; 12; 15). The Samuel idyll reinforces a pejorative perception of Saul and kingship by stressing the sufficiency of Samuel as Israel's leader and the general superiority of prophets over kings. This editorial work appears to come from deuteronomistic historians. The same editors then connected 1 Samuel 1–15 with other major sections of literature to create the books of 1–2 Samuel, wherein the decline of Saul before David is justified and David becomes a standard by which to evaluate other kings in the history of 1–2 Kings. First Samuel 3 plays a pivotal role in preparing for the unfolding of later history and for stressing the prophetic word as an ultimate AUTHORITY.

(e) On a canonical level the critic may observe how the deuteronomistic history fits into the greater biblical theological message of the OT, especially in regard to such themes as covenant, obedience, divine revelation, and prophetic calling. First Samuel 3 contributes to all these themes. Canonical criticism also draws the tradition-historical critic into reflection on how 1 Samuel 3 foreshadows Jesus in the infancy narratives of Matthew 1–2 (where auditory message dreams occur again) and Luke 1–2. The prophet Samuel foreshadows the prophetic ministry of Jesus, who also opposed corrupt priests. Hence 1 Samuel 3 ultimately unites with other texts that proclaim the nature of the prophetic calling that all Jews and Christians seek to heed.

4. Theological Significance. The importance of the tradition-history method is found not only in its ability to attempt a reconstruction of the oral and literary evolution of biblical texts. Above all, the method implies that the biblical text is not a static repository of absolute truths revealed by God but the record of a dynamic process of human and divine interaction over many generations, in which sacred texts were received and reinterpreted by subsequent generations. It may imply that the tradition-making process is part of revelation itself (see Knight [1977]). It further implies that sacred texts may contain several levels of meaning, as those meanings have been imparted by successive generations of transmitters—the sacred texts are polyvalent, capable of multiple interpretations even today. Consequently, the critical scholar may suggest creatively that a wealth of meaning lies beneath a surface reading of the text, on which the modern reader may draw for use in contemporary theology, pedagogy, preaching, and piety.

Critics have assailed the tradition-history method for being too historicistic—i.e., for attempting to reconstruct the history of Israel from the subjective analysis of literary texts. Much of this criticism is deserved, for too often biblical scholars have attempted to reconstruct history on the basis of too little evidence. The history of Israel may be reconstructed only through a subtle interplay of archaeological data (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), critical analysis of literary texts, and the application of appropriate SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC and anthropological models. In actuality the tradition-historical method as well as the other methods (source, form, redaction, etc.) are not historical in the sense that a historian would recognize. Rather, they seek to trace ideational and religious development in a sacred text and to perceive its growth in relationship to other texts in the canon.

In general, the tradition-history method should be seen as primarily a subjective and creative art, not an empirical, scientific method. It is scientific only in that it rigorously analyzes a text by setting aside theological and denominational beliefs and the assumptions of modern interpreters and by temporarily suspending the meaning imparted by the rest of the biblical tradition—i.e., the interpreter tries to be rigorously objective. Also, it may be scientific in that occasionally historical, archaeological, and social-scientific data can be used to facilitate understanding the biblical passage under scrutiny. Yet ultimately the reconstruction of the previous evolutionary development of a literary text is a subjective and hypothetical task. This is evidenced by the multitude of diverse interpretations rendered by scholars on any given biblical text. However, even in the face of such interpretative uncertainty, we should not disparage the method. Its purpose is neither to ascertain ultimate truth nor to determine the perfect reconstruction of a process that can no longer be empirically observed. Rather, the method is suggestive and creative, offering possibilities for understanding latent meanings in the biblical text. The scholar offers new possibilities for understanding texts to the theologian, the preacher, the student of the Bible, and the person of faith in order to enhance their insight and appreciation of the biblical text.

Bibliography: G. Ahlström, Psalm 89: Eine Liturgie aus dem Ritual des leidenden Königs (1959). A. Alt, Kleine Schriften zur Geschichte des Volkes Israel (3 vols., 1953–59). H. Birkeland, Zum hebräischen Traditionswesen (1938). R. Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition (1931; ET 1963). G. Bornkamm, G. Barth, H. J. Held, Tradition and Interpretation in Matthew (1960; ET 1963). R. A. Carlson, David, the Chosen King: A Traditio-historical Approach to the Second Book of Samuel (1964). B. Childs, Biblical Theology in Crisis (1970); Exodus (OTL, 1974). G. Coats, "Tradition Criticism, OT," IDBSup 912-14. H. Conzelmann, The Theology of St. Luke (1953; ET 1960). C. Dohmen, Das Bilderverbot: Seine Entstehung und seine Entwicklung im Alten Testament (BBB 62, rev. ed., 1987). I. Engnell, "Methodological Aspects of OT Study," VTSup 7 (1960) 13-30; A Rigid Scrutiny: Critical Essays on the OT (1969). C. A. Evans and J. A. Sanders (eds.), Early Christian Interpretation of the Scriptures of Israel: Investigations and Proposals (JSNTSup 148, 1977); The Function of Scripture in Early Jewish and Christian Tradition (JSOTSup 154, 1998). M. Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (1985). H. Gese, Der Verfassungsentwurf des Ezechiel (Kap. 40–48) traditionsgeschichtlich untersucht (BHT 25, 1958). R. Gnuse, The Dream Theophany of Samuel: Its Structure in Relation to Ancient Near Eastern Dreams and Its Theological Significance (1984); Dreams and Dream Reports in the Writings of Josepus (AGJU 36, 1996). H. Gressmann, Mose und seine Zeit (1913). H. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (1895); Genesis (1901, 1910[3]; ET 1997). A. Haldar, Associations of Cult Prophets Among the Ancient Semites (1945). I. Hylander, Der literarische Samuel-Saul-Komplex (I. Sam 1–15) traditionsgeschichtlich untersucht (1932). K. Jeppesen and B. Otzen, The Productions of Time: Tradition History in OT Scholarship (1984). W. H. Kelber, The Oral and the Written Gospel: The Hermeneutics of Speaking and Writing in the Synoptic Tradition (1983). D. Knight, Rediscovering the Traditions of Israel (SBLDS 9, rev. ed., 1975); (ed.), Tradition and Theology in the OT (1977); "Tradition History," ABD (1992) 6:633-38. K. Koch, The Growth of the Biblical Tradition: The Form-critical Method (1967; ET 1969). J. L. Martyn, History and Theology in the Fourth Gospel (1968, 1979[2]). W. Marxsen, Mark, the Evangelist: Studies on the Redaction History of the Gospel (1956; ET 1969). S. Mowinckel, Prophecy and Tradition (1946). E. Nielsen, Oral Tradition (1950; ET, SBT 11, 1954); The Ten Commandments in New Perspective (1965; ET, SBT 2nd ser. 7, 1968). M. Noth, The Deuteronomistic History (1943; ET JSOTSup 15, 1981); A History of the Pentateuchal Traditions (1948; ET 1972). H. S. Nyberg, Studien zum Hoseabuch (1935). N. Perrin, What Is Redaction Criticism? (GBS, 1969). G. von Rad, "The Form-critical Problem of the Hexateuch," The Problem of the Hexateuch and Other Essays (1938; ET 1966) 1-78; OT Theology (2 vols., 1957, 1960; ET 1962, 1965). W. Rast, Tradition History and the OT (1972). R. Rendtorff, The Problem of the Process of Transmission in the Pentateuch (BZAW 147, 1977; ET JSOTSup 89, 1990). W. Richter, Die Bearbeitungen des "Retterbuches" in der deuteronomischen Epoche (BBB 21, 1964). M. Saebø, Sacharja 9–14 (1969). J. A. Sanders, Torah and Canon (1972); Canon and Community: A Guide to Canonical Criticism (GBS, 1984). T. Thompson, The Origin Tradition of Ancient Israel (JSOTSup 55, 1987). J. Van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition (1975); Prologue to History: The Yahwist as Historian in Genesis (1992); The Life of Moses: The Yahwist as Historian in Exodus–Numbers (1994). R. N. Whybray, The Making of the Pentateuch (JSOTSup 53, 1987).

R. GNUSE

TRANSLATION

Translation is the science—and the art—that attempts to represent with the least possible distortion the meaning and the impact of a text in a language different from the one in which it was originally written. In the case of Bible translation this process involves not only original languages that are vastly different from most modern languages but also, more importantly, ancient cultures that have little in common with modern cultures.

The King James translators (1611) expressed the matter eloquently: "Translation it is that openeth the window to let in the light; that breaketh the shell, that we may eat the kernel; that putteth aside the curtain, that we may look into the most Holy place; that removeth the cover of the well, that we may come by the water."

A translation aims at an impossible goal—namely, to make it possible for the readers of the translated text to understand it in the same way that the readers of the original understood their text. Not only that: The translator also wants the readers of the translation to react to it as did the readers of the original. It is obvious that this cannot be done. E. GOODSPEED expressed it well in the preface of his translation of the NT (1923): "It has been truly said that any translation of a masterpiece must be a failure."

The tractate Kiddushin 49a of the Babylonian TALMUD succinctly states the translator's dilemma: "He lies, who renders a verse as it is, with strict literalness; he blasphemes, who makes additions." And the grandson of Ben Sira, translating his grandfather's book from Hebrew to Greek, begged the reader's indulgence: "You are invited therefore to read it with goodwill and attention, and to be indulgent in cases where, despite our diligence in translating, we may seem to have rendered some phrases imperfectly. For what was originally expressed in Hebrew does not have exactly the same sense when translated into another language. Not only this book, but even the Law itself, the Prophets, and the rest of the books differ not a little when read in the original."

A translator wants above everything else to be faithful to the meaning and impact of the original, vowing to translate the text, the whole text, and nothing but the text. How is this vow kept?

AQUILA, whose translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek appeared in 130 CE, apparently thought that strict literalness would ensure faithfulness. In translating Gen 1:1, for example, he rendered the Hebrew accusative particle 'et (followed by the articular noun) by the Greek preposition sun, "with," so that the verse reads: "At the beginning created God sun the heaven and sun the earth." Very few translators will go to such extremes; but even the NRSV (1989), whose motto is "As literal as possible, as free as necessary," translates Acts 27:9: "Since much time had been lost and sailing was now dangerous, because even the Fast had already gone by." There is an appropriate Italian maxim: Traduttori, traditori.

Bible translators often complain about the difficulty, not to say the impossibility, of their task. LUTHER exclaimed: "O God, what a hard and difficult task it is to force these writers, quite against their wills, to speak German. They have no desire to give up their native Hebrew in order to imitate our barbaric German. It is as though one were to force a nightingale to imitate a cuckoo, to give up his own glorious melody for a monotonous song he must certainly hate" (cf. J. Reumann [1965] 70). And JEROME somewhat peevishly complained about the reception of his new translation into Latin: "If I correct errors in the sacred text, I am denounced as a falsifier. If I do not correct them, I am pilloried as a disseminator of error."

Some scholars argue that translation is actually impossible, i.e., that one can understand the Scriptures only by reading the original Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek texts. This attitude is like that of pious Muslims who maintain that the Quran (see QURANIC AND ISLAMIC INTERPRETATION) cannot be translated; any so-called translation is really a commentary on the text, not the text itself.

1. The Task of Translation. The Bible translator's task is threefold: (a) Determine the form of the original text; (b) ascertain the meaning of the original text; and (c) transfer the meaning to the target language in such a way that the readers of the translation understand it as did the readers of the original.

a. The biblical text. There is general agreement on the form of the biblical text. For Jewish and Christian translators the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia (1977) is widely regarded as the best available edition of the standard Hebrew text, the MT. This does not mean that the MT will be slavishly followed at all times. In a book like 1 Samuel, for example, modern translations, largely on the basis of the Qumran texts (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS), freely depart from the MT. One recent count showed that while the NIV departs from the MT only fifteen times, the NAB departs 230 times. In between come the GNB (fifty-one times); the NRSV (110 times), and the NEB (160 times). The NRSV's inclusion at the end of 1 Samuel 10 of a fairly long passage from a Qumran manuscript is an example of such a departure.

The MT copyists often placed in the margin a reading that they thought should replace the text: The marginal reading was called qere (to be read); the text, kethiv (it is written). There are around 1,300 such marginal notes.

In addition there is what is called the qere perpetuum—that is, the marginal "the Lord" to be read instead of the text's YHWH, the holy name of God, a total of 6,283 times. Traditionally, Bible translations have preferred the kethiv, usually in the form of small capital letters, the LORD. But the ASV, the various editions of the Jerusalem Bible (French, English, Spanish, Portuguese), and a number of Bibles in Portuguese, Spanish, and other languages all use a form of the tetragrammaton: Jehovah, Yahweh, Javé, Iahweh. It seems certain that future translations will do the same.

Translators also differ in their handling of the tiqqune sopherim (the corrections of the scribes), passages in which scribes deliberately changed texts that seemed offensive to God (traditionally there were eighteen such passages). In Gen 18:22, for example, the text read: "Yahweh continued to stand before Abraham"; this was changed to "Abraham continued to stand before Yahweh." Psalm 106:20 was changed from "they exchanged the glory of God" to "they exchanged their glory"; and in Job 32:3 the change was made from "they declared God to be wrong" to "they declared Job to be wrong."

It should be noticed that the Greek Orthodox Church still prefers the SEPTUAGINT for the OT and the Greek textus receptus NT. The Syriac churches hold to the Syriac PESHITTA (5th cent. CE) as their Bible.

For the NT the vast majority of translators use the United Bible Societies' Greek NT (1993^4), whose text is the same as the Nestle-Aland Greek NT (1993^{29}). But there are many passages in which important witnesses to the text vary; in such passages the UBS text provides variant readings and rates them according to the degree of probability that the preferred variant is correct. The rating varies from A (the text is certain) to D (the committee had great difficulty deciding which text is original). In such instances (especially in passages that are rated C and D) a translator may prefer a variant reading. In John 7:8 did Jesus say to his brothers, "I am not [ouk] going to this festival" or "I am not yet [oupo] going to this festival"?

b. The meaning of the text. There is widespread consensus on the meaning of the greater part of the biblical text. Differences of opinion will always exist as to the intent and meaning of a given passage—else why the appearance, almost yearly it seems, of a new set of commentaries and additional biblical DICTIONARIES AND ENCYCLOPEDIAS? But agreement does prevail about the surface meaning of the greater part of the text, as a comparison of any number of modern translations will show. Some passages, however, are not easily exegeted. What does the first verse of the Bible mean? Most translations will say it means: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." Other translations, however, such as the NRSV and the New Jewish Version (the Tanakh), take it to mean "when God began to create the heavens and the earth."

c. Translating the text. This is the translator's most daunting task. At first sight it might appear to be very simple indeed. All the translator has to do is to ascertain the meaning of the biblical text and then express that meaning in the target language in such a way that the readers will understand the text in the same way that the readers of the original did. To take one of the simplest passages in the Greek NT, the opening words of the Gospel of John, "In the beginning was the Word." Will today's English-speaking reader understand "the Word" in the same way as did the original readers of the Greek ho Logos? Most likely not. And what can a modern businesswoman in Melbourne, or London, or New York, get from Ps 23:1, "The LORD is my shepherd"?

R. Knox (1888–1957) expressed it thus: "A translation is a good one in proportion as you can forget, while reading it, that it is a translation at all" (1949, 94). And the English man of letters H. Belloc (1870–1953) defined translation as "the resurrection of an alien thing in a native body; not the dressing up of it in native clothes, but the giving to it of native flesh and blood."

Semantic differences are difficult to solve. Languages work in a variety of ways, and a translator has to be aware of the differences between the biblical languages and the target language. Rhetorical questions are a fairly simple problem to overcome. The question, "Did I not choose you, the twelve?" (John 6:70), if translated literally in many languages, will mean that Jesus in fact did not choose the twelve; in such cases, the translation must express the meaning with a statement, "I chose you, the twelve."

Figures of speech must be handled with care. Many biblical figures are part of current language for native speakers of English: "a hard heart," "an evil eye," "Abraham's bosom," "the salt of the earth"—but the biblical meaning of these figures is quite different from the meaning assigned them in current English. The widely used NIV still conserves the figure "the horn of salvation" (2 Sam 22:3; Ps 18:2; Luke 1:69) as well as "He will . . . exalt the horn of his anointed" (1 Sam 2:10). Does the reader of this translation have a clear notion of what the writer is talking about? And what does the reader of the NRSV make of the statement that the distance between the Mount of Olives and Jerusalem was "a sabbath day's journey" (Acts 1:12)?

Cultural equivalents have to be provided in languages where biblical cultural items are unknown. In Isa 1:18 God promises the people that their sins "will be like snow . . . will be like wool." In areas of the world where snow is unknown, a cultural equivalent must be found, e.g., in some cultures it will be the egret's feather. And in some places sheep have only brown or black wool, so the biblical "wool" must be replaced with its cultural equivalent in that language. Hope is spoken of as "an anchor of the soul" in Heb 6:18-19; in one translation in a landlocked region of Africa, it became "the picketing-peg of the soul," inasmuch as in that culture a picketing-peg does for animals what an anchor does for a ship.

Connotative equivalents must also be dealt with. In Matt 5:45 Jesus praises the indiscriminate goodness of God, who sends rain to all, the just and the unjust alike. In the rain jungles of the Amazon region, rain is not a blessing—it is a curse. Jesus' statement in John 6:35, "I am the bread of life" could not be translated literally in the Chol language of Mexico. Bread is known and there is a word for it; but it is a delicacy, to be served only on special occasions. The corn cake waj in that culture is the equivalent of "bread" in the biblical culture; so in Chol Jesus says, "I am the waj that sustains life."

Many languages have a precise system of honorifics—that is, different ways of addressing people depending on their relation to the speaker, whether equal, inferior, or superior. Does Pilate address Jesus as an equal? Does Jesus address Nicodemus as an equal? Do the disciples treat Jesus as an equal? The relation between siblings must be respected: One brother, for example, is always referred to as older or younger than the other. Who was the older: Simon or Andrew? James or John? Many languages make a difference between the inclusive and exclusive use of the first plural pronouns "we," "us," and "our." These are formal distinctions, and in dialogue the translator must determine whether the person being addressed is included. For example, in Mark 4:38 the disciples say to Jesus, "Teacher, do you not care that we are perishing?" Is Jesus included in that "we"? Was he also in danger of drowning? A language like English need not bother to answer the question; but in languages where such distinctions are mandatory, the translator must say, "Do you not care that we, your disciples, are perishing?" or "Do you not care that all of us are perishing?" Some languages are very precise in certain activities. John 19:17 states that Jesus went out "carrying his cross." How did he carry it? In his arms? On his shoulder? On his head? On his back? The translation must say specifically how he carried it. A bizarre instance arose in the Akha language in northern Myanmar (Burma) when the translators came to Heb 11:37, "They were sawn in two." "Which way?" they asked. "Lengthwise or across?"

2. Current Trends. Increasingly sensitive to the readers' reaction to the biblical text, translators are more and more willing to translate in such a way as not to offend potential readers. Usually this willingness falls under the rubric of reader sensitivity.

a. Inclusive language. This means the use of language that includes females as well as males when this is what the biblical text means (see B. Metzger's statement in "To the Reader" in NRSV). There are several ways this can be done: (1) by shifting from the singular (his) to the plural (their); (2) by using "people" or "humans" or "humankind" instead of "man" or "men"; or (3) by shifting from the third person to the second person.

Some biblical words both in Hebrew and Greek, such as "man," "sons," and "brothers," are often obviously inclusive—that is, they do not, in a given context, restrict themselves to male human beings. It is right and accurate that current translations use inclusive words, e.g., "humankind" instead of "man" in Gen 1:27 and 5:1. In his letters PAUL often addressed his readers as adelphoi, which traditionally has been translated "brothers"; but it is evident that Paul is addressing all his readers, women and men alike. So faithfulness in translation demands that the word be translated "brothers and sisters," as the NRSV does consistently.

This practice has been going on for quite a long time (see TEV [1992^2]). So it came as a great surprise when many users of the NIV raised strong objections to the International Bible Society's plan to distribute in the United States the gender-inclusive edition it had been distributing in Great Britain (see esp. Christianity Today, Oct. 27, 1997). The protests were so vehement that the society dropped its plans and recalled all copies of the gender-inclusive edition still extant.

One published translation (The Inclusive NT [1994]) has gone so far as to obscure or even obliterate the sexual identity of biblical characters. Further, instead of "the Son of God" it has "God's Own." In the place of "Father," used of God, it reads "Abba God." Whether this is the wave of the future remains to be seen.

b. Antisemitism in the NT. This is a particularly sensitive matter, and translators have wrestled with it for a number of years. The third edition of the TEV NT (1976) tried to translate the frequently occurring hoi Ioudaioi (the Jews) in the Gospel of John in such a way as not to imply that all the Jewish people (especially the citizens of Jerusalem) were fierce enemies of Jesus and his followers (see The Bible Translator 26 [October 1975] 401-9). The CEV (1995) has done much the same, but in some instances it goes even further (see its handling of Luke 21:12; Acts 6:9; 19:14). Such scholars as H. Kee and J. SANDERS posit that the Gospels and Acts, written decades after the events they are reporting, retrojected into the events that took place in the thirties of the first century the conditions that prevailed at the time these books were written, particularly the deep animosity between the Jewish community and the Christian community. So they propose that somehow translators dismantle this unhistorical framework so that the accounts accurately reflect the current situations and not those that developed decades later. How this can be done remains to be seen, but certainly the debate will continue.

c. Reader sensitivity. Besides antisemitism and androcentric language, both of which are deeply offensive to many readers, the translation of Isa 7:14 is a particular instance of how the readers' reaction can affect the translation. Current Jewish and Christian scholarship is practically unanimous that in this passage the Hebrew ha-almah means "the young woman [is pregnant]." In Matt 1:23 the passage is quoted as it appears in the Septuagint: "The virgin [he parthenos] will become pregnant." In light of this, the NIV, among others, translates the verse "The virgin will be with child and give birth to a son." The CEV is similar: "A virgin is pregnant; she will have a son." The foonote that accompanies this verse contradicts the plain meaning of the English translation: "In this context the difficult Hebrew word did not imply a virgin birth." But the note goes on to justify the rendering by appealing to Matt 1:23.

3. The Future of Bible Translation. Given the present trends it is reasonable to expect that a "scholars' translation"—prepared by and for biblical scholars—will soon be published. Other than that, it would seem that for language communities that have a large number of Bible readers, different kinds of translations are called for: (1) a traditional translation appropriate for church and liturgical usage; (2) a common-language translation especially suitable for people with a limited amount of formal education, for children, and for people who speak and read the language as a second language; and (3) perhaps a literary translation using the full range of the language in matters of vocabulary and style, such as the NEB (and, to a lesser degree, the REB).

Bibliography: R. A. Bullard, "Texts/Manuscripts/Versions," Mercer Dicionary of the Bible (ed. W. E. Mills, 1990) 890-96. R. A. Knox, On Englishing the Bible (1949). B. M. Newman, Creating and Crafting the CEV (1996). E. A. Nida, "Theories of Translation," ABD 6:512-15; "Translations: Theory and Practice," The Oxford Companion to the Bible (ed. B. M. Metzger and M. D. Coogan, 1993) 750-52. H. M. Orlinsky and R. G. Bratcher, A History of Bible Translation and the North American Contribution (1991). J. H. P. Reumann, The Romance of Bible Scripts and Scholars: Chapters in the History of Bible Transmission and Translation (1965). W. M. Smalley, Translation as Mission (1991). P. G. Stine (ed.), Bible Translation and the Spread of the Church: The Last 200 Years (Studies in Christian Mission 2, 1990).

R. G. BRATCHER

TROELTSCH, ERNST PETER WILHELM

(1865–1923)

A student friend of W. BOUSSET at Erlangen and at Göttingen, as a graduate student T. also associated with other members of the so-called RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE that around 1890 was reacting against A. RITSCHL's biblical THEOLOGY. In 1892 T. became ausserordentlicher professor for systematics at Bonn; and in 1894, full professor at Heidelberg, where he became known as the systematic theologian of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule. He moved to a chair of philosophy in Berlin (1915), continuing his work for a new "cultural synthesis" by reworking the Christian tradition for the modern Western world. After a dissertation in the history of doctrine, "Vernunft und Offenbarung bei J. Gerhard und Melanchthon" (1891), most of his theological writings were historical and philosophical in character, increasingly informed by the social sciences and always aiming at social, ethical, and religious reconstruction. Many are long essays engaging the intellectual situation of the day (see esp. Gesammelte Schriften [1912–25] vols. 2 and 4). His rich and insightful work Der Historismus und seine Probleme (GS 3 [1922]) is a rambling and probing first part of a projected synthesis whose shape can only be partly gauged from the lectures written for England and edited by von Hügel (1923).

T.'s place in the history of biblical interpretation owes more to his methodological reflections and his bringing a sociological imagination to bear on Christian history than to any original historical research of his own in this area. His great work on the history of Christian social teaching (2 vols., 1908–10, 1912^2, 1923^3, 1961^4; ET, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches [2 vols., 1931]) contains a long chapter on the foundations in the early church. As a liberal Protestant theologian the ethical idealist, T. was deeply affected by his historical understanding of the OT "prophetic ethos" and the teaching of JESUS, while realizing by 1913 that as a Ritschlian he had laid too much weight on the personality of Jesus and neglected his eschatology (GS, 2:322-24). But his sense of the subsequent development and recognition of its contribution to the essence of Christianity allowed him to give due weight also to the Pauline strain (see PAUL) in the NT and to early Catholicism (see Social Teaching, 1:39-200). His early personal association with the sector of German biblical research that was to determine the course of twentieth-century scholarship (history of religions and history of traditions) meant that he was perhaps the first major systematic theologian to grapple with the new results. He was not fully persuaded by the new historical skepticism concerning the Gospels as found, e.g., in W. WREDE; but after some hesitation he accepted the views of J. WEISS on Jesus' eschatology. The questions of syncretism (H. Gunkel), sacramentalism (W. Heitmuller), and Christ-mysticism (A. Deissmann and others) were equally familiar to him.

T.'s accounts of modern historical method and consciousness and their implications for Christian theology remain unsurpassed. His early essay "Historische und dogmatische Methode in der Theologie" (1898; ET 1991) opposed supernaturalism, showing how modern history's insistence on the three principles of criticism of sources, analogy with one's own experience, and correlation with the larger web of events relativizes everything and demands a new method in theology. He found his own bridge to this new method in the philosophy of history; from his article "Historiography" in Hastings's ERE (1914), it looms ever larger in his work. The best answers he gave to the problem of theological method, however, are found in the quite Schleiermacherian (see F. Schleiermacher, Brief Outline of Theology as a Field of Study [1988]) essay "What Does 'Essence of Christianity' Mean?" (1903; ET in Writings [1977] 124-81) and in the more metaphysical Glaubenslehre (1925; ET, The Christian Faith [1991]). His sociological research (see SOCIOLOGY AND HB/NT STUDIES) has often been recalled in recent socio-historical and sociological study of the Bible, e.g., by G. Theissen. Finally, after a period of eclipse lasting several decades, T.'s understanding of the importance of ethics, especially social ethics, in Christian history and for theology is now generally acknowledged. His recourse to I. KANT, G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), and F. SCHLEIERMACHER as the main guides for modern theology has also found a few supporters among biblical interpreters.

Works: The Absoluteness of Christianity and the History of Religions (1902, 1921[2]; ET 1971); Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (2 vols., 1908–10, 1912[2], 1923[3], 1961[4]; ET, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches [2 vols., 1931]); Gesammelte Schriften (4 vols., 1912–25); "The Dogmatics of the 'Religionsgeschichtliche Schule,' " AJT 17 (1913; repr. 1991) 1-21; "Historiography," ERE 6 (1914) 716-23 (repr. in Contemporary Religious Thinkers [ed. J. Macquarrie, 1968] 76-97); Christian Thought (ed. F. F. von Hügel, 1923); Writings on Theology and Religion (ed. and tr. R. Morgan and M. Pye, 1977, 1990[2]) includes "The Significance of the Historical Existence of Jesus for Faith" (182-207) and an appendix on "Troeltsch in ET"; Religion in History (ed. T. L. Adams and W. Bense, 1991).

Bibliography: J. L. Adams, "Why the T. Revival?" Unitarian Universalist Christian 29 (1974) 4-15. W. F. Bense, "The Ethic of Jesus in the Liberal Christianity of E. T.," Unitarian Universalist Christian 29 (1974) 16-26. J. P. Clayton (ed.), E. T. and the Future of Theology (1976). S. Coakley, Christ Without Absolutes: A Study of the Christology of E. T. (1986). F. W. Graf, EncRel 15 (1987) 58-61. F. W. Graf and H. Ruddies, E. T. Bibliographie (1982). T. Rendtorff and F. W. Graf, NCRTW 3 (1985) 305-32. J. Séguy, Christianisme et société: Introduction à la sociologie de E. T. (1980). T. Yasukata, E. T.: Systematic Theologian of Radical Historicality (1986).

R. MORGAN

TRUTH, SOJOURNER (c. 1779–1883)

Born a slave, Isabella, in Hurley, Ulster County, New York, T. claimed her own freedom in 1827 before the 1817 state emancipation laws legally took effect. In 1843 she felt God speaking to her and claimed her own name, "Sojourner because I am a wanderer, Truth because God is Truth." She became an itinerant preacher, speaking against slavery wherever anyone would listen. She spoke at the 1851 Convention on Women's Rights in Akron, Ohio, and became well known as an anti-slavery and FEMINIST activist. As a slave she had never learned to read and write, but so forceful and compelling were her messages that O. Gilbert wrote a narrative of her words. T. was a contemporary of H. Tubman, a former slave from the South, a black feminist, and a leader in the underground railroad. T. died at age 105, Nov. 26, 1883, in Battle Creek, Michigan.

T.'s tradition was oral and aural. She memorized Scripture, meditated on it, and quoted it in her sermons and speeches, relying on personal communion with God for her interpretation. She said, "You read books; I talk to God." When she examined the Scriptures she relied on children to read to her because adults tended to explain passages if she asked to hear them again. She wanted to see what her own mind could make out of the record and to compare the teachings of the Bible with her own inner witness. A critical interpreter, she concluded that the Spirit of truth spoke in Scripture but that the recorders of those truths had intermingled their own ideas and suppositions.

T. questioned literal interpretations of the Bible, contrasting Scripture with her religious experience of God and her everyday work experience. At first she took the book of Genesis literally. But to conceive of God as working by day, getting tired, and resting conflicted with her intuitive, experiential knowledge of God's inconceivable greatness. She reasoned, "Why, if God works by the day, and one day's work tires him, and he is obliged to rest, either from weariness or on account of darkness, or if he waited for the 'cool of the day to walk in the garden' because he was inconvenienced by the heat of the sun, why, then it seems that God cannot do as much as I can; for I can bear the sun at noon, and work several days and nights in succession without being much tired. . . . No, God does not stop to rest, for he is a spirit and cannot tire; he cannot want for light, for he hath all light in himself" (M. Washington [1993] 86). In her famous "Arn't I a Woman?" speech she questioned arguments against women's right to vote: "I can't read, but I can hear. I have heard the Bible and have learned that Eve caused man to sin. Well, if woman upset the world, do give her a chance to set it right side up again. The Lady has spoken about Jesus, how he never spurned woman from him and she was right. . . . And how came Jesus into the world? Through God who created him and a woman who bore him. Man, where is your part?" (Washington, 118). In her interpretation, Mary's role as the mother of Christ pointed to women's ability to be public leaders who could "set the world right side up again."

Bibliography: O. Gilbert, Narrative of S. T. (ed. J. C. Stewart, 1991). N. I. Painter, S. T.: A Life, a Symbol (1996). M. Washington (ed.), Narrative of S. T. (1993).

K. BAKER-FLETCHER

TUCH, JOHANN CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (1806–67)

The author of only one major book on the HB, T. was born Dec. 17, 1806, in Quedlinburg, Germany. In 1825 he entered the university of Halle, where he became a Privatdozent (1830). His links with H. EWALD made for a difficult relationship with H. GESENIUS, and he was unable to support himself by academic work alone. In 1838 he published his commentary on Genesis, a rare combination of literary, historical, and philosophical skills, which was so well received that he was appointed ausserordentlicher professor in Halle. In 1841 he obtained a full professorship in Leipzig, where he continued his research in Genesis, although he never succeeded in producing a second edition of the commentary. His main interest, however, was palaeography and sacred geography; and he published many articles in the ZDMG. His writings from the Leipzig period include an edition of twenty-one Sinaitic inscriptions, a review of the topography of Jerusalem, a discussion of the site of Jesus' ascension, and work on the vocal system of Ethiopic (see ETHIOPIAN BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION). He died in Leipzig Apr. 12, 1867.

T.'s commentary on Genesis is famous as an example of the supplementary hypothesis. Against the documentary theory of J. G. EICHHORN and the fragmentary theory of J. VATER and others, T. held that the basic source of Genesis through Numbers was an Elohist document composed in the time of Samuel, possibly by Samuel himself. This document had been added to by a writer in the period of Solomon who mostly used the divine name Yahweh. The supplements did not amount to a separate source but were based on oral tradition. T. was not the inventor of the supplement theory and acknowledged his debt to Ewald and to F. BLEEK among others, but he gave it a classical expression. An important feature of his work was the attention paid to the pre-history of the units that constitute the basic source and the supplements, done in light of a careful discussion of the nature of myths and sagas (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), their processes of formation, and their difference from history. The commentary also had a strong philosophical tendency. T. interpreted Genesis 1–3 as a story about the progress of humankind to freedom and humanity and held that writers like I. KANT had provided the best standpoint from which to interpret the passage. Although the Genesis commentary was overtaken by the reemergence of the documentary theory from the 1850s, it was regarded as valuable for its detailed exegesis and enjoyed a second edition in 1871 with T.'s additional comments.

Works: Kommentar über der Genesis (1838; 2nd ed. by A. Arnold and A. Merx, 1871).

Bibliography: C. Siegfried, ADB 38 (1894) 754-56.

J. W. ROGERSON

TYCONIUS (4th cent.)

T. was a biblical commentator and theologian of Roman Africa during the second half of the fourth century. He was a layman of the Donatist church; but little is known of his life beyond his writings and his celebrated clash in the early 380s with his powerful bishop, Parmenian of Carthage, on the question of the holiness of the church. However, T.'s continuing influence in both exegesis and ecclesiology was assured by AUGUSTINE's respectful attention to his thought. Augustine's inclusion of an extensive summary of and commentary on T.'s Book of Rules in book 3 of On Christian Doctrine is perhaps the single instance of a leading authority in the church recommending the study of a schismatic theologian's work. The Book of Rules was also passed on through the medieval period in a series of epitomes and in a memoria technica of the seven Tyconian rules of scriptural interpretation, the first systematic treatise on HERMENEUTICS in the Latin church.

In his Lives of Illustrious Men Gennadius of Massilia mentions two other works, now lost, that were authored by T.: De bello intestino Libri Tres and a commentary on the Apocalypse. The contents of the former are a matter of speculation, but the influence of the latter can be traced through JEROME, Caesarius of Arles, Primasius of Hadrumetum, CASSIODORUS, BEDE, Ambrosius Autpretus, and Beatus of Liebana. Gennadius noted that in Rev 20:6 T. interpreted the "first resurrection" as baptism and the "second resurrection" as the Second Coming of Christ. This interpretation was accepted by Augustine and became the standard revision of the literal interpretation of the thousand-year reign of the saints found in such earlier commentators as IRENAEUS, TERTULLIAN, Hipploytus, and Victorinus of Pettau. Jerome used the Tyconian commentary to revise the earlier Victorine commentary.

Rigorously systematic and original in his hermeneutics, T. was at the same time a product of the North African exegetical tradition and of the scholarly norms of classical rhetorics. He explored the "double" interpretation of certain types, e.g., Jerusalem as the holy city in some contexts and as an unfaithful city in other contexts. This "doubleness" of interpretation can also be seen in a transitus of textual reference that crosses over from Christ as the Head of the church to Christ as the Body of the church, according to the context. This theory of the transitus of the reference is linked with his ecclesiology, in which this independent-minded Do-natist insisted that the church is bipartite, with both saints and sinners in its membership, thus rejecting the key Donatist teaching of the exclusive holiness of the church.

T. was noteworthy for his integration of hermeneutics and ecclesiology. The true nature of the "septiform" church (a reference to the seven angels who are both rebuked and praised in the letters to the churches in the Apocalypse) is that of one body in which are both saints and sinners, who will be revealed to all in the Judgment. But "now" in the time of the church there is no separation from sinners. Although T., like his fellow Africans, focused much attention on the antichrist references in 2 Thessalonians and in 1 John, he urged that "now" is a privileged time of repentance for a church that is not confined to a holy (Donatist) remnant in Africa.

Works: PL 18, 15-66; The Turin Fragments of T.'s Commentary on Revelation (ed. F. Lo Bue and G. G. Willis, TS, 1963); The Book of Rules of T.: An Introduction and Translation with Commentary (tr. D. L. Anderson, 1974); Biblical Interpretation in the Early Church (tr. K. Froelich, Sources of Early Christian Thought, 1984); The Book of Rules of T. (ed. F. C. Burkitt, TextsS 3, 1, 1967); T.: The Book of Rules (ed. and tr. W. Babcock, Texts and Translations 31, 1989).

Bibliography: P. Bright, The Book of Rules of T.: Its Structure and Inner Logic (1988). W. H. C. Frend, The Donatist Church: A Movement of Protest in Roman North Africa (1952); The Rise of Christianity (1985). T. Hahn, Tyconius-Studien: Ein Beitrag zur Kirchen und Dogmengeschichte des 4. Jahrhunderts (1900). C. Kannengiesser and P. Bright, A Conflict of Christian Hermeneutics in Roman Africa: T. and Augustine (Berkeley Protocol 58, 1988). P. Monceaux, Histoire Litteraire de l'Afrique chretienne depuis les origines jusquä l'invasion arabe (1920) 5:165-219. A. Pincherle, "Da Ticonio a Sant'Agostino," Richerche Religiose 1 (1925) 443-66. K. Steinhauser, The Apocalypse Commentary of T.: A History of Its Reception and Influence (1987). M. A. Tilley, The Bible In Christian North Africa: The Donatist World (1998).

P. BRIGHT

TYNDALE, WILLIAM (c. 1494–1536)

A Bible translator and Protestant Reformer, T. was the first of the English translators (see TRANSLATION) in the sixteenth century whose translations (1525–35) formed the basis of the later versions of Coverdale (1535, 1536), "Thomas Matthew" (1537), and the Great Bible (1539) and profoundly influenced the KJV (1611). Little is definitely known of the early influences on him; but the "new learning" of classical and biblical humanism, hostility toward scholasticism, Lutheranism, and even traces of late medieval Lollardy were likely factors in his development. Born in Gloucestershire, he studied at Magdalen Hall, Oxford (1510–15), taking the arts course (BA 1512; MA 1515) and probably beginning divinity before moving to Cambridge, where he may have studied Greek and encountered Lutheran and humanist ideas. From c. 1521–23, he was in the service of J. Walsh at Little Sodbury, where he translated ERASMUS's Enchiridion and found his vocation as a translator of Scripture. Failing to enlist the support of Tunstall, bishop of London, he left England (1524) for Germany with the backing of a sympathetic London merchant, H. Monmouth, staying at Hamburg, Wittenberg, and Cologne, where the printing of his English NT (1525), with the assistance of W. Roye, was interrupted by the authorities at the instigation of J. Dobneck. Only a fragment of this quarto edition survived. His first complete NT (octavo) was printed at Worms in c. 1526. Its appearance in England attracted condemnation from Warham, Tunstall, and More for its tendentious renderings and Lutheran bias, and a royal ban in 1530. Besides polemical works (notably against More), his remaining years (mainly based at Antwerp) were occupied with revising his NT (1534, 1535); translating the Pentateuch (1530, 1534, with a revised Genesis), Jonah (1531), the liturgical "epistles" from the OT (1534), and Joshua–2 Chronicles (unpub., though probably incorporated in "Matthew's" Bible by his literary associate J. Rogers); and issuing expositions of 1 John (1531) and Matthew 5–7 (1533). Increasingly at risk from the authorities, he was arrested in 1535, imprisoned at Vilvorde near Brussels, condemned for heresy, and strangled and burned at the stake Oct. 6, 1536.

For literary merit and pioneering scholarship the biblical translations remain T.'s enduring legacy. His NT reveals much independent study of the Greek text (Erasmus [1522 ed.]) despite his debt to Luther's German version (1522), the Latin of Erasmus, and the VULGATE. The OT translations show that while his primary source was Luther and, to a lesser extent, S. PAGNINUS (1528), he had sufficient competence in Hebrew, acquired probably in Germany, to make his own decisions between these versions and to respond to the demands of Hebrew vocabulary, syntax, and idiom.

T. accepted sola scriptura and justification by faith; he adopted Luther's rearrangement of the NT books and drew freely on his writings, especially for the prologue to Romans. But by c. 1529 he had developed his own distinctive covenant theology, stressing the conditional nature of the covenant promises and the normative use of the divine law. This point of view became a dominant hermeneutical principle in his Pentateuch and revised NT, akin to early Reformed thought and, as some have argued, anticipating later Puritan ideas. Rejecting the exegetical methods of the scholastics, he insisted that Scripture has but one sense (literal); and this is spiritual and edifying to the one who has "feeling faith," whether as promise, law, or example. T. did not exclude topical application or even allegorical interpretation once the literal sense had been determined, provided they kept "within the compass of faith," did not contradict the literal sense, and were not used as proof. Despite his belief in the clarity of Scripture, he recognized the need to provide aids to remove obstacles to its true meaning; to this end he included explanatory prefaces, exegetical, and sometimes polemical annotations in his NT and Pentateuch.

Works: NT (Cologne fragment [Matthew 1–22] 1525; 1st complete version, 1526; rev. 1534, 1535; modern eds.: 1525 [E. Arber, 1871; A. W. Pollard, 1926]; 1526 [Paradine repr., 1976]; 1534 [N. H. Wallis, 1938; D. Daniell, 1989, 1995, modern spelling]); Prologue to Romans (1526, adapted from Luther's Preface [1522] and 1523 LT of J. Jonas [facsimile, 1975]); Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1528; adapted from Luther's sermon of Aug. 17, 1522, rev. and LT 1525); Pentateuch (1530; 1534 with rev. Genesis; modern eds.: J. I. Mombert [1884, repr. 1967]; D. Daniell [1992, modern spelling]); The Prophet Jonas (1531?; facsimile ed. F. Fry, 1863); A Pathway into the Holy Scripture (1530/31?; London 1536?, expanded version of his Prologue to the NT adapted from Luther's 1522 Preface); Exposition of I John (1531; modern ed. by T. H. L. Parker [1966] and D. J. Millus [diss. Yale University, 1973]); Exposition of Matthew 5–7 (1533?, adapted from Luther's 1532 sermons); Liturgical "Epistles" from the OT (Sarum Use, issued with 1534 NT); Joshua to II Chronicles (unpub. in T.'s lifetime; probably used in "Matthew's" [= J. Rogers] Bible, 1537); Works (3 vols., ed. H. Walter, 1848–50), excludes the biblical translations.

Bibliography: F. F. Bruce, History of the Bible in English (1961, 1979³). C. C. Butterworth, The Literary Lineage of the King James Bible, 1340–1611 (1941). W. A. Clebsch, England's Earliest Protestants (1964). J. R. Coates, "T.'s Influence on English Literature," T. Commemoration Volume (ed. R. M. Wilson, 1939) 241-55. D. Daniell, Life of W. T. (1994). T. H. Darlow and H. F. Moule, Historical Catalogue of Printed Editions of the English Bible, 1525–1961 (rev. A. S. Herbert, 1968). G. E. Duffield (ed.), The Work of W. T. (1965). N. P. Feldmeth, HHMBI, 235-39. E. Flesseman-van Leer, "The Controversy about Scripture and Tradition between T. More and W. T.," Nederlands Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis 43 (1959) 143-65. S. L. Greenslade, The Work of W. T. (1938); "English Versions of the Bible, 1525–1611," CHB 3 (1963) 141-74. G. Hammond, "The Evolution of English Bible Narrative: A Study of T.'s Translation Methods in the Book of Genesis," English Studies 33 (1980) 114-18; "W. T.'s Pentateuch: Its Relation to Luther's German Bible and the Hebrew Original," Renaissance Quarterly 33 (1980) 351-85. J. Isaacs, "The Sixteenth-century English Versions," The Bible in Its Ancient and English Versions (ed. H. W. Robinson, 1940) 146-95. J. E. M. McGiffert, "W. T.'s Conception of Covenant," JEH 32 (1981) 167-84. McGoldrick, Luther's English Connection (1979). J. F. Mozley, Life of W. T. (1937). A. W. Pollard, Records of the English Bible (1911). D. D. Smeeton, Lollard Themes in the Reformation Theology of W. T. (1987). L. J. Trinterud, "A Reappraisal of W. T.'s Debt to M. Luther," CH 31 (1962) 24-45. C. R. Trueman, Luther's Legacy: Salvation and English Reformers, 1525–56 (1994). B. F. Westcott, A General View of the History of the English Bible (rev. W. A. Wright, 1905³). C. H. Williams, Life of W. T. (1969). J. K. Yost, "W. T. and the Renaissance Humanist Origins of the English Via Media," Nederlands Archief voor Kerkegeschiedenis NS 51 (1971) 167-86.

D. G. SELWYN

U

UGARIT AND THE BIBLE

1. Introduction. Ugarit is the name of a city buried in a tell called Ras Shamra situated on the coast of Syria, almost opposite the "finger" of Cyprus. Since 1928 the French have been excavating the tell. Ugarit was the capital of a kingdom of the same name that flourished in the Bronze Age, especially between 1400–1190 BCE. Among the spectacular finds were not only tablets written in the syllabic Babylonian cuneiform script but also tablets with a hitherto unknown cuneiform script. As soon as scholars had succeeded in deciphering the script, which turned out to employ a Semitic alphabet, they realized that these Canaanite texts would have an enormous impact on biblical studies. Since then, numerous studies have confirmed this early expectation, and it has become impossible to review all the parallels that have been drawn between Ugarit and the Bible.

Nowadays Ugaritic is frequently invoked even in Bible commentaries and articles of a popular nature. Therefore, it is fitting to start this short survey with a serious warning to the non-specialist. Ugaritic is still a very difficult language that is only partially understood, and scholars differ widely with regard to the interpretation of texts. Consequently, it is often hard to decide whether or not a parallel to some passage in the Bible has been claimed legitimately. One should always consult several different translations.

Scholars also have urged caution because the Ugaritic texts are presumably two or three centuries older than even the earliest parts of the HB, and they come from a city hundreds of miles removed from Jerusalem. Moreover, the texts reflect a polytheistic religion that was expressly rejected by the mainstream of Israelite religious tradition.

To some extent such warnings are entirely appropriate, and any rash equalizing of the two cultures should be avoided. However, recent discoveries tend to confirm that there did exist direct contacts between the Proto-Israelites and the ruling class of Ugarit. The Ugaritic texts testify to intimate contacts with cities in the south, including cities like Ashtaroth, Edrei, Adam, and Kinnereth that are situated in Bashan and Galilee, areas where the early Israelites settled first, precisely at the time when Ugarit flourished. The two peoples share a number of religious traditions that are too specific to dismiss as accidental. Almost half of the metaphors describing God in the HB are also found in the Ugaritic literature, and the nature of the differences one finds suggests that Israelite religion is the result of a schism in the religion of Canaan rather than a totally different faith developed in splendid isolation.

One Ugaritic text even seems to betray knowledge about the struggle for ultimate power between Yahweh/El and Baal (see below). The ruling class of Ugarit and the Proto-Israelites were both of Amorite-Aramaic extraction and therefore may have had a common ancestral background. Moreover, it has been argued that several Ugaritic letters indicate that Ugarit took the side of Moses in his conflict with Pharaoh, which would imply a politico-religious pact between the two peoples (see below). In addition, a number of very old Israelite traditions, e.g., some verses of Genesis 49, the first half of Psalm 68, and Habakkuk 3, are so close to Ugaritic religious traditions that some scholars consider them to be contemporaneous with the Ugaritic texts.

Even if further research should disprove some of these new and exciting theories, they illustrate sufficiently the enormous impact of Ugaritic studies on biblical scholarship. The Ugaritic tablets indicate that Israel was not a foreign element that at the end of the Bronze Age was suddenly and violently introduced into a predominantly hostile Canaanite environment, as is the impression created by the account of the conquest in the book of Joshua. Early Israel must have been an integral part of the Canaanite world from its very beginning. Linguistically, culturally, and even religiously Israel was an offshoot of Canaan.

This conclusion agrees to a large extent with the results of archaeological research (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), indicating an unbroken transition from the Canaanite to the (presumably) Israelite occupation of a large number of sites in Jordan and Israel. It is also more in line with the picture of a relatively peaceful coexistence drawn in the book of Judges.

Of course, all this has necessitated a radical reorientation of HB research. Some scholars still believe that the late redactors of the HB have more or less successfully obscured the fact that the early Israelites were polytheistic Canaanites. Others agree with W. F. ALBRIGHT (1968) in assuming that some form of "monotheism" (if defined as intolerant monolatry) was a major constitutive factor in the early formation of the national entity customarily called "Israel." This concentration on one deity who eclipsed all others proves to be a fairly widespread phenomenon in the ancient Near East at the end of the second millennium BCE. It becomes increasingly clear that this movement started in Egypt; and because southern Canaan was an Egyptian colony at that time, the region was influenced most deeply by this fundamental change in religious outlook.

Even with the latter view, it must be granted that next to the monotheistic mainstream there existed in Israel a syncretistic or even polytheistic strand of Canaanite folk religion often tolerated in the private family sphere and sometimes openly favored by the rulers of Samaria and Jerusalem. It is this type of popular religion that is attacked again and again in the HB, especially by the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). However, polemics tend to distort. It is not the intention of the polemicist to give a fair representation of the beliefs under attack but to deliberately ridicule, exaggerate, and manipulate the facts. Hitherto it has been difficult to understand what exactly was being attacked; however, the Ugaritic tablets now furnish us with reliable information from the other side.

2. Ugarit and the HB. a. The language. Apparently Ugaritic belongs to the same family of Northwest Semitic or "Canaanite" languages as Hebrew. Being somewhat older and representing a northern branch of that family, Ugaritic has helped grammarians to gain a better insight into the development of the Hebrew language. In its long history certain grammatical phenomena became outdated and were no longer understood by later generations, as, e.g., with the so-called enclitic mêm, which was often erroneously read as a plural ending or as a personal suffix. Its frequent use in Ugaritic has helped scholars to discover a number of convincing examples of this kind of misunderstanding. Rare forms like 'š for normal yš (2 Sam 14:19; Mic 6:10; MSS Prov 18:24), masculine infinitives of tertiae W/Y-verbs (e.g., Gen 18:18; 26:28; 48:11), rare functions of the verb like the narrative yiqtol and the optative perfect all found a reasonable explanation on the basis of Ugaritic.

In many other respects, however, standard Ugaritic is quite different from standard Hebrew. The causative stem of the verb, for example, is not the Hiphil, but a Shaphil, as in Akkadian. The relative particle d is closer to Arabic and Aramaic than to Hebrew. However, in both cases rare examples of the same morphemes do occur in Hebrew. Other grammatical phenomena that are quite common in Hebrew, e.g., matres lectionis, the article, the consecutive perfect, start to appear only in nonliterary Ugaritic texts.

From a lexical point of view, biblical Hebrew has always presented the exegete with formidable difficulties. The total number of different words in the spoken language of ancient Israel may be estimated at 24,000. Only 8,000 of them eventually found their way into the CANON, and about one-third of these are words occurring only once. As a result, the meaning of words and expressions found only rarely in the HB was often forgotten, and in such cases even the earliest translations are guesswork. Ugaritic has proved to be extremely helpful in solving such puzzles.

The verb šṭ' in Isa 41:10 for example, which the SEPTUAGINT translates "to wander," actually means "to be afraid" and is attested with this meaning in Ugarit. In Ps 89:20 'zr should not be rendered "help" (so the Septuagint) but "hero," since it is clearly related to the Ugaritic ġzr. The apparently corrupted Hebrew text of Prov 26:23 could be restored with the help of Ugaritic: For ksp sygym, "like silver of dross," should be read kspsgm, "like glaze" (the same Ugaritic word may also denote a vessel, like our "glass" or "delft blue"). In 2 Kgs 4:42 the unintelligible bṣqlnw appears to be a corruption of bṣqlnm, "bulging fresh ears of grain," as found in Ugaritic (confusion of -nw and -m is a fairly common error in Hebrew manuscripts). In this case the correct interpretation happens to have been still known to a learned medieval glossator of a manuscript of the VULGATE, a coincidence illustrating once again how much modern Hebraists are dependent on data preserved by chance.

b. Textual criticism. In a number of cases like those dealt with in the preceding paragraph, Ugaritic can be adduced to emend a difficult Hebrew text; but it may also help to defend an odd reading in the transmitted text. In Ruth 4:5 there appears to be no need to change wm into gm because the conjunction with enclitic mem is also attested in Ugaritic.

Great care should be taken in making use of Ugaritic for text-critical purposes, however (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM). The Rome school of M. DAHOOD was all too apt to disregard the traditional interpretation of the Hebrew text and felt free to rearrange the consonantal text arbitrarily in a persistent search for Ugaritic forms and words, a method that produces very unreliable results.

c. Style and prosody. Even though most of the extant Ugaritic poetry is of the epic, narrative type, whereas the POETRY of the HB is predominantly of the lyrical type, it cannot be doubted any longer that there existed an unbroken poetic tradition between Canaan and Israel. The structure of cola, verse lines, strophes, and larger units is essentially the same. Numerous stereotyped expressions, metaphors, and similes apparently belonged to a common stock from which both the Ugaritic and Hebrew poets drew. The pairs of words used in parallelism are very often identical, as scholars like Dahood and Y. Avishur (1984) have demonstrated. Such stylistic devices as chiastic arrangements, numerical sayings, ellipsis of self-evident words, expansion of cola, and inclusion and responsion as markers of poetic units are found both in Ugarit and in Israel.

In this way it has been demonstrated that poems like the songs of Miriam, Moses, and Deborah contain many archaic "Ugaritic" elements. What has not yet been fully appreciated is the necessity to review the entire HB in search of passages of narrative poetry similar to that of Ugarit. Repetitions that LITERARY critics commonly held to represent "doublets" originating from different sources may have had a stylistic function, as they have in Ugaritic literature.

d. Onomastics. Many biblical place names are attested in the Ugaritic texts. This is important, as we have seen, in assessing possible historical links between the two cultures. Geographical names containing divine names from the Canaanite pantheon were often maintained during the Israelite period, apparently for practical reasons. Such cities usually harbored a shrine for the eponymous deity; it is remarkable that later tradition often assigns these cities to the Levites, pointing to the fact that the sanctuary had been taken over by Yahwism. Thus far, Jerusalem is not attested in the Ugaritic texts, but this is accidental because the city is referred to in the Amarna letters.

Even more important are the personal names. The rich and ever-growing material from Ugarit helps us to understand Israelite personal names much better than before. Many names are identical, e.g., Abram, Caleb, Elimelech, Israel, Gilead; but just as interesting are the differences. Whereas many different deities are honored in Ugaritic theophoric personal names, including several goddesses, the great majority of Israelite personal names, found also in epigraphic sources, are Yahwistic or Elohistic; female elements are all but absent. In this way the names testify to a radical differentiation from existing religious practice.

e. Administration and correspondence. Non-literary Ugaritic texts afford us a precious insight into the administration of a Canaanite city-state. Although some of the names of institutions and officers are the same as in Israel, the differences are large enough to postulate a conscious effort on the part of the Israelites to steer away from the social and economic system of their neighbors. Given the fact that religion and society were so much intertwined in the ancient world, this too is understandable as the outcome of the choice of a new type of religion.

Ugaritic kingship evokes some of the more ambitious aspirations of the Davidic dynasty: the king as "son" of God (cf. Psalm 2) or perhaps even "god" himself (cf. Psalms 45; 110). The Ugaritic kings received a "divine" name next to their own name when after their death they were united with their divine patron. It is not impossible that such ideas were still en vogue in the early Israelite monarchy. But the early opposition against the earthly kingship in Israel is undoubtedly rooted in the tension between the supreme kingship of the one God and divine status for his mandatory on earth. The kings of both nations also share a number of other honorific titles, like nś'u (Heb., nśy', "exalted one, leader"; tpṭ (Heb., špṭ), "judge"; šmh, "sprout."

Letters, treaties, and administrative texts offer an invaluable opportunity to study the causes of the collapse of Ugarit and of many other city-states around 1190 BCE. Among them is a letter from Beya, a powerful Semitic chancellor at the Egyptian court, whom J. de Moor (1990, 1997[2]) has proposed to identify with the biblical leader whose Egyptian name contains the element Moses. If this identification is accepted, several elements in the Exodus story appear to echo historical events.

f. Gods and myths. All the major gods of Ugarit appear in the HB (cf. DDD); however, the polytheistic pantheon is reduced to a heavenly household, and Psalm 82 mocks the whole idea. Yet traces of the Canaanite concept of a divine congregation in which special human beings could also participate can still be found. Like the kings Keret and Daniel of the Ugaritic epics, the biblical Job was allowed to enter into such meetings (Job 29:4). Perhaps the original text of Gen 31:53 read bpḥr 'byw yṣḥq, "by the assembly of his father Isaac," in which case there must have been nighttime encounters between the living and dead members of the clan in early Israel, just as are described in the Ugaritic ritual KTU 1.161, a text in many respects comparable to 1 Samuel 28. In Gen 49:6 the dying patriarch Jacob threatens that his soul will not enter into such meetings with his sons Simeon and Levi. Another trace of a pantheon is found in the original text of Deut 31:8-9, which is still preserved in some manuscripts from Qumran (see DEAD SEA SCROLLS) and in the Septuagint but was purged before the MT was established. Here we find the Canaanite idea, also attested in Mari, that every god has been allotted his or her "heritage" on earth, and that every nation received its land as a divine gift.

El is the supreme god of the Ugaritic pantheon, the creator of heaven and earth. Like the Babylonian god Marduk and Yahweh/El of Israel (cf. Gen 1:6; 2 Sam 22:16; Job 28:11; 38:16; Ps 36:7; Prov 3:19-20), El of Ugarit was responsible for the separation of the cosmic waters, i.e., the upper and lower flood (Ugar., thmt; Heb., thm; related to Babylonian Tiamat). El dwells at the confluence of the two, i.e., at the horizon of the habitable cosmos (cf. Ps 29:10); is the "father" of gods and of humanity (cf. Deut 32:6); and creates new beings in different ways, sometimes fashioning them from clay (cf. Gen 2:7; Job 4:19; 33:6), sometimes engendering them physically, and sometimes creating them by his authoritative word alone. As the potent creator-god, he often receives the epithet "bull," like Amun-Re in Egypt. This concept, too, was taken over in early Israel (original text of Gen 49:24; Num 23:22; 24:8; Hos 8:6, all reinterpreted later when this imagery was experienced as too daring).

El is extremely old (cf. Job 10:5; 36:26; Pss 90:2-4; 102:25, 28) and wise (cf. 1 Kgs 3:28; Isa 31:2, etc.), the supreme king of the universe. Nevertheless, his authority is clearly challenged by his son-in-law Baal, the young rain-god. The tension between the two gods reflects a deep crisis in the polytheism of Ugarit that, if it can be regarded as typical of the Canaanite world as a whole at that time, certainly throws light on the reasons why monotheism was received favorably in southern Canaan.

Whereas El was accepted in Israel, Baal was not. His combat with the sea, extensively described in a Ugaritic myth, is claimed for the God of Israel (cf. Job 9:13; 26:12; Ps 89:11; Isa 51:9; also Pss 29:3; 74:13-14; 93:4). Baal is not the great "Healer" or "Savior" (Ugar., rp'u), but Yahweh (cf. Exod 15:26; Deut 31:39; Hos 7:1; 11:3). The HB declares time and again that it is Yahweh, not Baal, who commands the weather; the Rider on the Clouds (Ugar., rkb ʿrpt) is not Baal, but Yahweh (Deut 33:26; Pss 68:5, 34; 104:3; Isa 19:1). According to the Ugaritic texts both El and Baal are called ʾadn, "lord" (Adonay; cf. Isa 51:22). Both are king; but even though the kingship of Baal is described as "everlasting" (cf. Ps 145:13; Dan 3:33; 4:31; 7:14, 18, 27), he is nothing but a vassal of El and must give up his kingship at El's command.

In several Ugaritic myths Baal transforms himself into a bull calf in order to mount a cow. Obviously this expresses his ambition to depose the "bull" El. The theriomorphic representation of Baal may explain why attempts to represent Yahweh as a young bull (Jeroboam) were frowned on later. It is remarkable that Baal never succeeded in defeating the forces of evil in any definitive way. As a result Death, Sea, marine monsters like Leviathan and Tannin, and many others, remained demonic powers threatening life on earth. In their prayers the Ugaritians asked Baal and his belligerent wife Anat to ward such powers off again and again, but of course they knew that Baal once suffered defeat at the hands of these forces. Whereas Baal once "died," the HB proclaims from very early times on that Yahweh is the living God who is stronger than death (Gen 16:13; Deut 32:39; Job 19:25; Ps 68:21; Hab 3:4-5).

Occasionally the Ugaritic texts help us to gain a better understanding of obscure gods, demons, and spirits mentioned in the HB. This is the case with the beneficial healer-spirits (Ugar., rpʾum) that became powerless ghosts in the HB (Heb., rpʾym, revocalized so that it did not mean "healers" but "powerless ones"). Hyll in Isa 14:12 is not the "Morning Star" but Hilal, the Canaanite god of the crescent moon. The "Sting" (Heb., qṭb) in Deut 32:34; Ps 91:6; Isa 28:2; Hos 13:14 appears to be a son of the Ugaritic god of death Mot (see also Job 18:13).

One Ugaritic myth narrates how El appoints his own son Yw as the successor of Baal (KTU 1.1:IV). On that occasion Yw is renamed Ym (Sea). Although many scholars doubt whether this god Yw may be equated with Yahweh, nothing can be said against the proposal from a philological point of view. Moreover, the equation has gained in force now that some of the earliest epigraphic attestations of the name of the God of Israel appear to be in the same form Yw = Yawê. Strangely, according to the Ugaritic myth the envoys of this god Yw/Ym have the nerve not to bow to other gods, bringing to mind the second commandment (Exod 20:5; 34:14; Deut 5:9, etc.). In another tablet Yw/Ym is ridiculed for having neither a wife nor a son; in a polytheistic context a god without a wife must have looked odd. El allows his son Yw/Ym to take over Baal's mountain Zaphon. The so-called Job stele found in Bashan indicates that this mountain range was also called Zaphon at that time and was regarded as the property of El. Abundant biblical testimony confirms that Yahweh/El took over the mountain Bashan/Zaphon (e.g., Ps 68:16-17, 23; the Gadite tribe of the Zaphonites, Gen 46:16; Num 26:15; the border of ideal Israel in Pss 48:3; 89:13; Isa 14:13-14; Ezek 47:17; Micah 7:14; probably also Exod 15:13-18; Ps 78:54). In other words, the Ugaritic myth seems to ridicule the god Yawê, who with the help of his "father," El, would have taken over Baal's mountain Zaphon/Bashan. It looks like an outside testimony of the taking hold of the "strange" religion of Yahweh/El in Bashan.

The relation of the gods to humankind is described in terms that express a feeling of skepticism and tragic impotence on the part of the latter. Especially in the legends of Keret and Aqhat, the heroes are described as righteous sufferers who are at the mercy of the caprices of the deities. It is exactly for that reason that Ezekiel mentions the main character of the Legend of Aqhatu, Daniel, next to other righteous sufferers like Noah and Job (Ezek 14:14, 20; 28:3). It is significant that a Hebrew prophet was apparently acquainted with this Canaanite tradition.

The words for "sin" are identical in Hebrew and Ugaritic, as are the words for righteous behavior. Perhaps the Canaanites of Ugarit were also acquainted with the concept of original sin; they seem to have known some version of the paradise story. Fragments of it are preserved in charms against snakes and other demonic forces; and the location of the garden, the hybrid nature of its tree, and the grave consequences for procreation caused by the sin of man (Ugar., ʾadm) agree with the biblical narrative. In other respects, however, the Ugaritic story is far removed from the Hebrew tradition. Man has a name (presumably Sharrughaziz), and he is bitten by the serpent hidden in the tree. In the extant fragments no role is attributed to an "Eve." Eventually the snake's poison is neutralized when all the other gods force the master of demons, the god Horon, who dwelt in "the city of the East," to give in. It seems that in the Israelite tradition Horon's role was partially transferred to Cain (cf. Gen 3:24; 4:16-17).

g. Cult. As in the Bible, most Ugaritic rituals are of the prescriptive type; only a few may be termed descriptive. Whereas in Ugarit there is often an ostensive link between MYTH AND RITUAL, this is not the case in Israel (unless one would cite the Passover as an exception; Exod 12). The king was the pivot of the Ugaritic ritual, as in the days of David, Solomon, and Jeroboam (see also Saul's sacrificing in 1 Samuel 13). Because the king could not attend all the services in person, the Ugaritic chief priest often acted as his stand-in. In Ugarit the queen also performed an important task in the ritual.

Ugarit shares certain cultic functionaries with Israel, e.g., the chief priest (Ugar., rb khnm; Heb. hakkōhēn haggādôl), normal priests (kōhanîm), and singers (šārîm). Other functionaries are expressly condemned in the HB (e.g., qedēšôt and qdšt, perhaps cultic prostitutes). No Levites are attested in Ugarit.

Many terms for sacrifices are identical or very similar. Others differ, but the sacrifices are nevertheless the same, e.g., the burnt offerings (šrp in Ugaritic; 'ōlâ in Hebrew). Certain types of sacrifices were unacceptable: No sacrifices of pigs are attested. Baal hates sacrifices of foul meat or sacrifices with improper behavior (cf. Prov 17:1; Mal 1:7, 12). In general, the number of sacrifices brought is much higher than in Jerusalem, probably because every deity demanded its share. Yahweh did not ask for "thousands of rams" (Mic 6:7).

Purification by ablutions was normal in both cults. The ritual blessings of the newly wed Keret and his bride resemble the blessings pronounced in Ruth 4. The rites of mourning were also more or less the same. Later on gashing and shaving of the head were forbidden in Israel, probably because these rites were practiced in connection with ritual mourning for Baal. A ritual of expiation strongly resembles Leviticus 16; it is interesting that in both cases the stranger (gēr) was allowed to partake in the ceremonies.

In connection with the ancestor cult, the people of Ugarit held spiritualistic sessions at night. The relevant texts vindicate the authenticity of 1 Samuel 28, although the medium is depicted as belonging to a clandestine circle of superstition, whereas in Ugarit the chief priest was proud to call himself a medium. Both in Ugarit and in early Israel, standing stones were thought to represent the ancestors. Since some scholars think that originally Yahweh too was an ancestral deity, it is significant that in Gen 49:24 the God of Israel is called "the Stone of Israel."

The most important Ugaritic festival was the autumn new year. Lasting seven days, it was celebrated about the time of the equinox in memory of Baal's victory over death and of his reenthronement on his holy mountain. It is more than likely that the Israelite Festival of Booths was directly derived from this festival after the abolishment of its more orgiastic aspects, like the sacred marriage rite and the excessive consumption of new wine processed during the festival.

3. Ugarit and the NT. No comprehensive study of the relevance of the Ugaritic tablets to the NT is available, yet the parallels are impressive enough. JESUS' healing powers, his quieting of the sea (a stele depicts Baal walking on the waves), and above all his ability to throw out demons resemble functions of Baal. It is quite understandable, therefore, that the Pharisees said of Jesus, "It is only by Beelzebul, the prince of demons, that this man casts out demons" (Matt 12:24; zbl is a title of the Ugaritic Baal).

The death and resurrection of Baal, god of life-giving water, are the closest parallels to the central theme of the Christian gospel that comparative religion has yet been able to offer. In the cultic reenactment of his vicissitudes, Baal's return was expected "on the third day" and prominent dead persons were supposed to rise from the netherworld with him (cf. Matt 27:53-54, 63).

The NT parallels are not confined to the Gospels. PAUL's description of the resurrection in 1 Corinthians 15 and his account of someone who was taken up into the third heaven in 2 Corinthians 12 have fairly close parallels in Ugarit. The book of Revelation also contains passages that can be clarified with the help of Ugaritic.

How did these unexpected correspondencies between sources separated from each other by more than a millennium arise? The most likely answer is that they were transmitted through the channel of folk religion. Despite official Judaism, Jewish-Aramaic incantation bowls and amulets from the first millennium contain relics similar to those of Canaanite practice. (And certain ostensibly Canaanite beliefs are perpetuated in present-day Palestinian folk religion in spite of Islam.)

4. Epilogue. Obviously the Ugaritic tablets are of prime importance to biblical scholars, who have come to realize more clearly than ever how intimately the Bible is connected with its Canaanite background. Verses like Isa 9:19 and 27:1 are virtual quotations from texts discovered at Ugarit. When the last additions to the HB canon were written down, Israelites must have been acquainted with a literature of the Canaanites that still closely resembled what has been found at Ugarit. Yet the same texts received a radically different interpretation in the Bible. The selection the scribes made involved a conscious break with Canaanite tradition motivated by a fundamental change in religious outlook, a "revelation." Whoever would attempt to lump together Canaanite and Hebrew religious traditions into one new "canon" seriously underestimates the theological relevance of the distinctiveness of the two religions.

Bibliography W. F. Albright, Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan: A Historical Analysis of Two Contrasting Faiths (Jordan Lectures 7, 1968, repr. 1994). Y. Avishur, Stylistic Studies of Word-pairs in Biblical and Ancient Semitic Literatures (AOAT 210, 1984); Studies in Hebrew and Ugaritic Psalms (1989; ET 1994). G. J. Brooke et al. (eds.), Ugarit and the Bible (UBL 11, 1994). P. C. Craigie, Ugarit and the OT (1983). A. Curtis, Ugarit (Ras Shamra) (1985). M. Dahood, Ugaritic-Hebrew Philology (BibOr 17, 1965; 1989²). J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the OT (Cambridge Oriental Publications 35, 1985). L. R. Fisher and S. Rummel (eds.), Ras Shamra Parallels (AnOr 49-51, 3 vols., 1972–81). J. C. L. Gibson, Canaanite Myths and Legends (1978²). J. Gray, The Legacy of Canaan: The Ras Shamra Texts and Their Relevance to the OT (VTSup 5, 1957; 1965²). W. J. Jobling, "Canaan, Ugarit, and the OT" (diss., University of Sydney, 1974). L. K. Handy, Among the Host of Heaven: A Syro-Palestinian Pantheon as Bureaucracy (1994). M. Heltzer, The Rural Community in Ancient Ugarit (1976); Goods, Prices, and the Organization of Trade in Ugarit (1978); The Internal Organization of the Kingdom of Ugarit (1982). A. S. Kapelrud, The Ras Shamra Discoveries and the OT (1965). C. Kloos, YHWH's Combat with the Sea (1986). M. C. A. Korpel, A Rift in the Clouds: Ugaritic and Hebrew Descriptions of the Divine (UBL 8, 1990). M. C. Korpel and J. C. de Moor, The Structure of Classical Hebrew Poetry: Second Isaiah (1998). T. J. Lewis, Cults of the Dead in Ancient Israel and Ugarit (HSM 39, 1989). S. E. Loewenstamm, Comparative Studies in Biblical and Ancient Oriental Literature (AOAT 204, 1980). O. Loretz and J. Kottsieper, Colometry in Ugaritic and Biblical Poetry (UBL 5, 1987). P. van der Lugt and J. C. de Moor, BO 31 (1974) 3-26. E. R. Martinez, Hebrew-Ugaritic Index to the Writings of M. J. Dahood (SPIB 116, 2 vols., 1967–81). W. van der Meer and J. C. de Moor (eds.), The Structural Analysis of Biblical and Canaanite Poetry (JSOTSup 74, 1988. J. C. de Moor, New Year with Canaanites and Israelites (2 vols., 1972); An Anthology of Religious Texts from Ugarit (Nisaba 16, 1987); "East of Eden," ZAW 100 (1988) 105-11; The Rise of Yahwism (BETL 91, 1990; rev. and enl. 1997²); (ed.) Intertextuality in Ugarit and Israel (OTS 40, 1998). J. C. de Moor, in collaboration with M. Dijkstra and M. C. A. Korpel, Religious Ugaritic Texts (1999). J. C. de Moor and W. G. E. Watson (eds.), Verse in Ancient Near Eastern Prose (AOAT 42, 1993). D. Pardee, Ugaritic and Hebrew Poetic Parallelism: A Trial Cut (VTSup 39, 1988). A. F. Rainey, "The Social Stratification of Ugarit" (diss., Brandeis University, 1962). D. A. Robertson, Linguistic Evidence in Dating Early Hebrew Poetry (SBLDS 3, 1972). P. Sanders, The Provenance of Deuteronomy 32 (OTS 37, 1996). D. Sivan, A Grammar of the Ugaritic Language (HO 28, 1997). M. S. Smith, The Early History of God: Yahweh and the Other Deities in Ancient Israel (1990). K. Spronk, Beatific Afterlife in Ancient Israel and in the Ancient Near East (AOAT 219, 1986). S. Talmon, Scripta Hierosolymitana 31 (1986) 279-300. K. van der Toorn, Family Religion in Babylonia, Syria, and Israel: Continuity and Change in the Forms of Religious Life (SHCANE 7, 1996). K. van der Toorn et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Deities and Demons in the Bible (DDD, 1995). W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26, 1984); Traditional Techniques in Classical Hebrew Verse (JSOTSup 170, 1994). N. Wyatt, Myths of Power: A Study of Royal Myth and Ideology in Ugaritic and Biblical Tradition (UBL 13, 1996); Religious Texts from Ugarit: The Words of Ilimilku and His Colleagues (1998). N. Wyatt et al. (eds.), Ugarit, Religion, and Culture (UBL 12, 1996). G. D. Young (ed.), Ugarit in Retrospect: Fifty Years of Ugarit and Ugaritic (1981).

J. C. DE MOOR

UGOLINUS, BLASIUS (18th cent.)

Little is known of U., who appears to have been an Italian Roman Catholic convert of Jewish background. His importance in the field of scholarship lies in his massive series of thirty-four folio volumes published in Venice, most of over 1,000 pages each. In these volumes U. reprinted excerpts and complete works on biblical ARCHAEOLOGY and antiquities written by practically every important person in the republic of letters. In addition, he published many original contributions and translations of his own in the series; the latter include numerous rabbinic writings from the Tosefta, the TALMUD, MIDRASHIM, and MAIMONIDES. A complete listing of the volumes' contents is given in J. Darling, Cyclopaedia Bibliographica 1 (1854) 3015-26.

Works: Thesaurus antiquitatum complectens selectissima clarissimorum virorum opuscula, in quibus veterum Hebraeorum mores, leges, instituta, ritus sacri et civiles illustrantur (34 vols., 1744–69).

Bibliography: H. L. Strack, NSHERK 12 (1912) 54.

J. H. HAYES

UMBREIT, FRIEDRICH WILHELM KARL (1795–1860)

U. was born in Sonneborn near Gotha, Apr. 11, 1795, where his father, who had been taught by one of J. S. BACH's last pupils, was an organist. U.'s upbringing in a musical home engendered a sensitivity to aesthetic experience that was to influence his career. He studied oriental languages at Göttingen under J. G. EICHHORN (1814–17) and in Vienna (1819) and was ready to accept the philological and mildly rationalizing position of his teachers until he attended lectures by F. Lücke (1791–1855) on the book of Revelation. Lücke introduced him to theology in the spirit of F. SCHLEIERMACHER and set him on a new course through the assertion that the Bible was more than a repository of ancient languages. Completing his church examinations at Gotha in 1818, U. continued his quest for a full and satisfying theology, culminating in his study of Schleiermacher's dogmatics. In 1820 he became a Privatdozent at Heidelberg and held full professorships in the philosophical faculty (1823–29) and theological faculty (from 1829) until his death Apr. 26, 1860.

U.'s publications dealt mainly with exegesis and displayed an aesthetic-romantic spirit in conscious imitation of J. G. HERDER. His position moderated between extreme criticism and literalism. Although he accepted many critical results, he was not satisfied that a text had been properly handled once it had been examined at the critical level: To be fully understood it needed poetic, aesthetic criticism. U.'s most fitting memorial is probably his contribution as co-founder and co-editor of the TSK from 1828 until his death. The purpose of the journal was to give expression to the new mediating theology, whose leading lights were Schleiermacher, J. Neander (1789–1850), and Lücke. Thus U. repaid his debt to a theology that had enabled him to do justice to his aesthetic sensitivity.

Works: Lied der Liebe, das älteste und schönste aus dem Morgenlande (1820); Das Buch Hiob (1824, 1828; ET 2 vols., 1836–37); Philologisch-kritischer und philosophischer Commentar über die Sprüche Salomo's (1826); "Über den Knecht Gottes im letzten Abschnitt der jesajanischen Sammlung, Kap. 40–66," TSK (1828) 295-330; "Jesus Christus in den Weissagungen des Propheten Jesaja nach der Auslegung von Kap. 9,1-6 und 11,1-10," TSK (1835) 551-69, 869-81; "Ist Jesus Christus in dem 22. Psalme?" TSK (1840) 697-708; Praktischer Kommentar über die Propheten des Alten Bundes (4 vols., 1841–46); Der Brief an die Römer auf dem Grunde des Alten Testments ausgelegt (1856).

Bibliography: E. Riehm, "Die literärische Wirksamkeit Umbreits, nach ihren Haupterzeugnissen geschildert," TSK (1861) 479-511; ADB 30 (1875) 273-77. J. W. Rogerson, OTCNC (1984) 136-37. C. Ullmann, "F. W. C. U.: Blätter der Erinnerung," TSK (1861) 435-79.

J. W. ROGERSON

USSHER, JAMES (1581–1656)

Born in Dublin, Jan. 4, 1581, U. was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he became a fellow in 1599 and was appointed professor of divinity in 1607. In 1601 he was ordained in the Church of Ireland (part of the Anglican communion) and in 1625 became archbishop of Armagh. A strict Calvinist (see CALVIN) and a bitter opponent of Roman Catholicism, U. was in England at the time of the Irish Rebellion of 1641 and remained there until his death March 20, 1656.

U. was a scholar of immense learning and an authority on such diverse topics as the early history of Ireland and the letters of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH. His chief contribution to biblical studies was in the area of CHRONOLOGY. It is said that he had already worked out a chronology of the HB to the end of the Hebrew monarchy when he graduated with a BA at Trinity College, but his major works on chronology were published at the end of his life. The Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti, a chronological digest of events from creation to the Maccabean period, appeared in 1650 and was followed by Annalium Pars Posterior in 1654. A third work, Chronologia Sacra, published posthumously, presents a defense of the chronology set out in the annals, including such crucial matters as U.'s dependence on the figures of the MT. He was well aware that different figures were given by the SEPTUAGINT and Samaritan traditions.

U.'s chronological calculations received quasi-canonical status through their insertion into the margins of English Bibles published after 1701. In particular, he has become famous for dating the creation of the world to 4004 BCE, actually one of the least original features of his chronology. Forty years before the first volume of the Annales appeared, T. Lydiat (1572–1646) had published a chronological study, Emendatio temporum (1609), in which the creation of the world was similarly dated to 4004 BCE. U. was introduced to Lydiat and invited him to stay with him in Dublin, where Lydiat apparently assisted U. in his own chronological researches. Comparison of Lydiat's study with U.'s work reveals a number of striking similarities, and the latter's chronology could almost be described as a revision of Lydiat's.

There were also several important differences, however. U. dated the creation of the world to Oct. 23, 4004 BCE; this precision characterizes the whole of his work. The original edition of the Annales comprises 1,356 pages in two folio volumes, whereas Lydiat's book was a mere 334 pages of octavo. U.'s overall chronological scheme also differed fundamentally from Lydiat's. Both scholars dated the creation of the world to 4004 BCE, but Lydiat dated the birth of Christ in the year 4007 Anno Mundi (= 3 CE), whereas U. dated it seven years earlier in 4000 AM (= 4 BCE), thereby correcting a weak point in Lydiat's chronology (Herod the Great had died in 4 BCE) as well as achieving a schematic round figure for the date of Christ's birth. U. drew attention to this schematism in his preface to the Annales (7) and also commented on another aspect of his chronology. According to his calculations, the Solomonic Temple was founded in 2993 AM and completed in 3000 AM; Christ, of whom the Temple was a type, was thus born exactly one thousand years after the completion of the Temple.

U. also adapted the traditional division of history into seven ages. In the earliest versions of this scheme, history was divided into six ages preceding the second coming of Christ and a seventh millennial age following the return of Christ. But in U.'s chronology there were six ages from creation to the birth of Christ and a seventh age starting with the birth of Christ. This is shown in the following table, based on U.'s table in Chronologia Sacra (1). Lydiat's figures for these periods have been added in brackets.

	yrs	mos	days	[yrs]
1. Creation to flood	1656	0	0	[1656]
2. Flood to Abraham's migration	426	6	14	[422]
3. Abraham's migration to exodus	430	0	0	[430]
4. Exodus to foundation of Temple	479	0	17	[479]
5. Foundation of Temple to its destruction	424	3	8	[429]
6. Destruction of Temple to birth of Christ	583	3	25	[590]

Works: De Macedonum et Asianorum Anno Solari Dissertatio (1648); Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti (1650); Annales Pars Posterior (1654; ET, The Annals of the World [1658]); Chronologia Sacra (Oxford, 1660); Whole Works (ed. C. R. Elrington and J. H. Todd, Dublin, 1864).

Bibliography: J. Barr, "Why the World Was Created in 4004 BC: Archbishop Ussher and Biblical Chronology," BJRL 67 (1984) 575-608; "Luther and Biblical Chronology," Bulletin of the J. Rylands University Library of Manchester 72 (1990) 51-67. J. A. Carr, The Life and Times of J. U., Archbishop of Armagh (1895). C. R. Elrington, "Life of J. U.," Whole Works, 1:1-324. A Gordon, DNB 48 (1899) 64-72. S. J. Gould, "Fall in the House of Ussher: How Foolish was the Archbishop's Precise Date for Creation?" Natural History 12 (1991) 14-16, 18-21. R. B. Knox, J. U., Archbishop of Armagh (1967).

J. R. A. HUGHES

V

VALETON, JOZUA JAN PHILLIPUS, JR.

(1848–1912)

Professor of OT on the theological faculty at the University of Utrecht (1877–1912), V. received his doctorate at Utrecht in 1871 and did post-doctoral work in Geneva. He is known as the leading OT scholar in the Ethical Movement during the era of modernism's dominance (c. 1860–c. 1900). Standing between orthodoxy and modernism, the Ethicals, whose theological leaders were D. Chantepie de la Saussaye and J. Gunning, Sr., believed in a truly scientific biblical criticism and followed the methods of A. KUENEN and the Leiden school while accepting the idea of a special supernatural revelation at certain points in Israel's history. In this mediating position the Ethicals came under severe criticism from the modernists on the left and the orthodox on the right.

Firmly defending the scientific quality of his biblical criticism against the prejudicial reproofs of the Leiden scholars, V. did not hesitate to participate in the analysis of controverted sections of Scripture, where writers like Kuenen dominated the field. One such area was the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM). In the Ethical journal Studien, V. presented the most extensive treatment of Deuteronomy ever produced by a Dutch scholar in modern times (1879–81). He maintained that Deuteronomy was not a deliberate attempt at deception but, rather, a collection of early laws by various writers, compiled and provided with a historical introduction by a redactor in the time of King Manasseh. In other studies V. claimed that Yahwism was a supernaturally revealed religion, monotheistic in principle at its very inception, even though only partially so in practice until the eighth century BCE, and that biblical monotheism was no intellectual dogma but the true and vital religion of Israel that came to its full development amid a heathen environment. He also maintained that the Garden of Eden tradition in Genesis 2–3 was not an allegory but a poetical construction of actual historical origins. It can be fairly said that V.'s type of criticism has enjoyed more lasting influence on contemporary Dutch biblical scholarship than either the historicism of the modernists or the rationalistic supernaturalism of the orthodox.

Works: Jesaja volgens zijne algemeen als echt erkende schriften (1871); "Deuteronomium," Studien 5 (1879) 69-206, 291-313; 6 (1880) 133-74; 7 (1881) 1-27, 81-120; Voorlezingen over Jesaja, Jeremia, Ezechiel, en II Jesaja (1886, 1908²); Amos en Hosea (1894; GT 1898); Christus in het Oude Testament (1895; GT 1896); Oud-testamentische voordrachten (1899–1900, 1909²); De Psalmen (3 vols., 1902–5, 1912²); "Die Israeliten," Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte (ed. P. D. Chantepie de la Saussaye, 1905³); "Karakter en literairische opzet van het Sinai-verhaal," Verslagen en mededeelingen der Knoinkliche Akademie van Wetenschappen, Afdeeling Letterkunde (1909) 67-113.

Bibliography: S. J. De Vries, Bible and Theology in the Netherlands (1968) 95-98, 101-4. I. van Dijk, "Levensbericht van J. J. P. V., Jr.," Levensberichten van afgestorven medeleden van de Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (1911–12) 76-119.

S. J. DEVRIES

VALLA, LORENZO (1407–57)

One of the most original, creative, and influential humanists of the Italian Renaissance, V. studied in Rome, was ordained in 1431, became involved in many conflicts, and from 1448 was apostolic secretary under Pope Nicholas V. V. startled contemporaries with unorthodox approaches to ethical, philosophical, and philological problems. Among his best-known works were his dialogue arguing that Epicurean was superior to Stoic morality and his Declamation on the Donation of Constantine, which relied heavily on philological evidence in proving the Donation a forgery. V. died Aug. 1, 1457, in Rome.

V.'s NT scholarship displayed the same originality of approach and intellectual independence that mark his other works. In an age when NT exegetes depended almost exclusively on the VULGATE, V. insisted that scholars and interpreters must learn Greek and base their works on the Greek NT text. He prepared two drafts of annotations comparing the Vulgate TRANSLATION of the NT with the Greek text, drawing up the first set in Naples between 1442 and 1443 and revising them extensively after consulting new manuscripts in Rome after 1453. He did not consider either draft a finished product, however, and allowed them to circulate only in a small, select circle of scholarly friends. As a result, his work long remained poorly known. In 1505 ERASMUS discovered a manuscript of V.'s notes, which he immediately published. V.'s work exercised deep influence on Erasmus and other Renaissance humanists who pioneered the development of critical philological scholarship on the NT.

V. examined only a few Greek manuscripts of the NT—probably no more than seven—but he brought a fresh eye as well as a new text to his work. He identified a small number of textual problems—passages where variant readings obscured the language intended by the authors. More notably, he showed that in several cases the language of the Greek NT did not support doctrine or interpretations that medieval theologians had developed on the basis of the Vulgate. Most of his annotations dealt with technical points of little theological consequence, although some of them touched on matters of large doctrinal import. In all cases his work pointed the way toward a more accurate and sensitive Latin representation of the Greek NT and served an important function by inaugurating the modern tradition of critical philological scholarship on the NT.

Works: In latinam novi testamentam interpretationem ex collatione graecorum exemplarium adnotationes (1505); Collatio novi testamenti (ed. A. Perosa, 1970); Opera omnia (2 vols., ed. E. Garin, 1962).

Bibliography: J. H. Bentley, Humanists and Holy Writ: NT Scholarship in the Renaissance (1983) esp. 32-69. S. Camporeale, L. V.: Umanesimo e teologia (1972); "Renaissance Humanism and the Origins of Humanist Theology," Humanity and Divinity in Renaissance and Reformation (ed. J. O. Malley et al., 1993) 101-24. M. Fois, Il pensiero cristiano di L. V. (1969). D. R. Kelley (ed.), "L. V.: A Symposium," JHI 57 (1996) 1-86. C. Trinkaus, In Our Image and Likeness (2 vols., 1970); CE 3 (1987) 379.

J. H. BENTLEY

VATER, JOHANN SEVERIN (1771–1826)

One of the last great polymaths of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, V. was born May 27, 1771, in Altenburg, Germany, and from 1790 to 1794 attended the universities of Jena and Halle. His doctorate at Halle (1794) was on Aristotle's writings on rhetoric, and the first of his many books on language was the Hebräische Sprachlehre (1797). In 1799 he became professor of theology and oriental languages at Halle, and although he published his commentary on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) during his first Halle period (up to 1809), most of his writings concerned the science of language and included Polish and Russian grammars. In 1809, because of the political situation in Halle following the victories of Napoleon, V. moved to Königsberg, where he continued his work on ethnolinguistics and completed a four-volume work on the Lord's Prayer in five hundred languages and dialects. Returning to Halle in 1820, he devoted himself to church history. He died in Halle, Mar. 15, 1826.

V.'s commentary on the Pentateuch (1802–5) was the most extensive presentation of the fragment hypothesis concerning its authorship. In opposition to the documentary theory of J. G. EICHHORN and others, V. held that it was unlikely that separate documents had been combined and argued instead that a collector had assembled the Pentateuch from many distinct fragments. A feature of the commentary was that it brought to the attention of the German public the work of the Scottish Roman Catholic A. GEDDES, another pioneer of the fragment view. In the third volume (1805) V. argued that Deuteronomy had had a different author or collector from the remainder of the Pentateuch, thus independently reaching a conclusion that W. DE WETTE had defended in his doctoral thesis the same year. However, V. used this view differently than did de Wette. Since the majority of references to the Pentateuch in the remainder of the HB were to Deuteronomy, he concluded that a substantial part of Deuteronomy existed from the time of David or Solomon but that the remainder of the Pentateuch did not reach its final form until the time of the exile. Although Moses may have written some of the fragments, there was no knowledge of a Mosaic law book until the reign of Josiah.

V.'s quest for encyclopedic knowledge, especially in the field of the languages of humankind, meant that he did not follow up and build on his commentary on the Pentateuch. The most important effect of his commentary was to cause the young de Wette to rewrite and expand a book based upon his doctoral dissertation, since V.'s 1805 volume preempted much of what de Wette wanted to say. The result was de Wette's epoch-making attack on Chronicles, which opened the way for a radically new interpretation of the history of Israelite religion.

V. was highly regarded by scholars in general. It was to him that H. GESENIUS sent the first volume of his Hebrew-German LEXICON in 1810, seeking help in finding a publisher. V.'s general position was that of a moderate supernaturalist who combined a personal piety with philological criticism.

Works: Versuch einer allgemeinen Sprachenlehre (1801); Handbuch der Hebräischen, Syrischen, Chaldäischen, und Arabischen Grammatik (1802); Commentar über den Pentateuch, mit Einleitungen zu den einzelnen Abschnitten, der eingeschalteten Uebersetzung von Dr. A. Geddes's merkwürdigeren critischen und exegetischen Anmerkungen, und einer Abhandlung über Moses und die Verfasser des Pentateuchs (3 vols., 1802–5).

Bibliography: G. Kuhn, ADB 39 (1895) 503-8. J. W. Rogerson, OTCNC.

J. W. ROGERSON

VATKE, JOHANN KARL WILHELM (1806–82)

Born Mar. 14, 1806, in Behndorf near Helmstedt, Germany, V. studied at Halle under H. GESENIUS and at Göttingen under H. EWALD. He then went to Berlin, where he found himself increasingly attracted to the philosophy of G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831) and soon became convinced that Hegel had discovered the vital clue to understanding the history of religion. In 1830 he became a Privatdozent in Berlin and in 1831 began a lifelong friendship with D. F. STRAUSS, whose controversial Leben Jesu appeared the same year as V.'s masterpiece (1835). V.'s book was the first part of a projected biblical THEOLOGY in which he planned to deal with the OT, the Apocrypha, and the NT. Unfortunately, in 1835 the conservative E. HENGSTENBERG was beginning to assert his power in Berlin. Die biblische Theologie was badly reviewed by the conservative press and even such critics as W. DE WETTE expressed reservations. The minister of state, von Altenstein, advised V. not to complete the project, and Hengstenberg saw to it that V. was never appointed to a full professorship. In 1841 V. published Die menschliche Freiheit but after 1850 wrote nothing further, although an OT introduction compiled from his lecture notes was published posthumously. Toward the end of his life he turned from his adherence to Hegel's philosophy and recognized that discoveries in the natural sciences were important for theology. He ceased teaching in 1875 and died Apr. 19, 1882, in Berlin.

V.'s biblical theology was an attempt to elucidate the history of HB religion according to Hegelian principles, but he did not merely read into or impose on the HB a Hegelian scheme. His philosophical stance affected what he saw to be significant, but in his very penetrating analysis he also drew attention to many problems inherent in the text.

Basing his ideas on a general theory of religious development, V. believed that the religion of the Israelites in Egypt was star worship (see Amos 5:25-26). Moses introduced the worship of Yahweh, banishing from it all elements of nature worship and setting up a conflict with the popular religion of the people. The period of the Judges saw a conflict between the worship of Yahweh and belief in the Canaanite gods Baal and Astarte; but the building of the Temple introduced a new and more transcendent element, the worship of the sun god. During the monarchy the rise of prophetic religion (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) placed more stress on the holiness and transcendence of Yahweh; there developed also the notion of a theocracy in which Yahweh was seen as lawgiver, lord, and protector of his people. Josiah's prophetic reform was backed by increasing use of laws to regulate the common life, while the exile resulted in greater stress on the holiness of Yahweh and saw the strengthening of a legally sustained theocracy. The religion of Israel reached its high point in the Persian period with the disappearance of idolatry and the final development of ritual and law.

The importance of Die biblische Theologie was that it anticipated J. WELLHAUSEN's view of Israel's religious history in denying that Moses was the founder of the full-blown theocracy, in ascribing to the prophets an important role in the development of Yahwism, and in placing in the postexilic period the completion of Israel's legal and cultic system. Wellhausen acknowledged his indebtedness to Vatke for "the most and the best" of his own work.

Works: Die biblische Theologie wissenschaftlich dargestellt, vol. 1, Die Religion des Alte Testments (1835); Die menschliche Freiheit in ihrem Verhältnis zur Sünde und zur göttlichen Gnade (1841); Historisch-kritische Einleitung ins Alte Testament (1886).

Bibliography: H. Benecke, W. V. in seinem Leben und seine Schriften (1883). M. Brömse, Studien zur "Biblischen Theologie" W. V.s (1973). E. M. Geldart, Modern Review 5 (1884) 500-518. L. Perlitt, V. und Wellhausen (BZAW 94, 1965). J. W. Rogerson, OTCNC (1984) 69-78.

J. W. ROGERSON

VAUX, ROLAND ETIENNE GUÉRIN DE (1903–71)

Born in Paris, Dec. 17, 1903, V. received a licence ès lettres from the Sorbonne, specializing in history. After his priestly formation at the seminary of St. Sulpice at Issy, he was ordained for the archdiocese of Paris, June 29, 1929. He entered the Dominican novitiate at Amiens, making simple profession of vows Sept. 23, 1930. While waiting the three years to take his solemn vows and begin his public ministry, he pursued historical research in orientalism at the Saulchoir (Kain, Tournai, Belgium). Having been recruited by P. Synave for the École Biblique et Archéologique in Jerusalem, he left for Palestine immediately after final vows in September 1933 and spent the rest of his life there until his death, Sept. 10, 1971.

At the École, after two years of study under M.-J. LAGRANGE, L.-H. VINCENT, and L. ABEL and acquiring his Roman Scripture license (1935), he became a professor and taught biblical history and ARCHAEOLOGY (1935–37); Assyrian (1935–40); and exegesis of HB historical books (1946–49), on which he later published short commentaries. He had been trained as a historian but trained himself to be an archaeologist, helped by his friendships with Vincent, W. F. ALBRIGHT, K. KENYON, B. MAZAR, and many others.

V. learned archaeology by doing it. Before 1946 his excavations were modest practice digs: the uncovering of a Byzantine mosaic church floor at Ma'in in Jordan in 1937 (with Savignac); an Arab caravanserai at Abu Gosh (biblical Kireath Jearim) with Stève in 1944 (final report 1950); a Byzantine shrine to John the Baptist at el-Ma'mudiyeh near Hebron in 1945–46. Thus prepared, he tackled Tell el Far'ah in Samaria, devoting nine seasons to this site between 1946 and 1960. Albright had identified the site with biblical Tirzah, the first capital of the northern kingdom of Israel before Omri transferred it to Samaria. V. accepted this identification but was not able to prove it absolutely (preliminary reports in RB).

V. gained international renown as a result of the discovery of the DEAD SEA SCROLLS in 1947 (and due to the romantic descriptions of him by E. Wilson in his popular book on the scrolls). V. was involved in three ways: (1) He helped to negotiate with the bedouin who had found the scrolls to acquire them for the Palestine Archaeological (Rockefeller) Museum. (2) He excavated at the site of the scrolls' production as well as at Wadi Murabba'at and Ain Feshkha (1949–58), publishing the results in preliminary reports in RB and in a book (but not the final reports or the pottery). (3) He became editor-in-chief of the team for publication of the fragments. He was succeeded as editor by his colleague P. BENOIT.

After Tirzah and Qumran V. participated in the excavations of Jerusalem directed by Kenyon (1961–63). His sector was the el-Khatuniyeh quarter south of the el-Aqsa mosque, later taken over by B. Mazar. When he decided that the École should resume excavations after the Six Day War, he enthusiastically supported J. Prignaud's first season at Tell Keisan near Akko in 1971 but was too infirm to direct it.

V. served as editor of the RB from 1938 to 1953, as director of the École from 1945 to 1965, as prior of the Dominican community from 1949 to 1952, and as consultor of the Pontifical Biblical Commission from 1956 until his death. He was named a member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres in 1952, of the Legion of Honor in 1953, and of the British Academy in 1961, receiving a master of sacred theology in 1958. In 1964–65 he was visiting professor at Harvard and during that time gave over 130 lectures throughout the United States.

Among V.'s most successful works was the Jerusalem Bible project (1956), for which he served as general and OT editor as well as translator and commentator on Genesis, 1–2 Samuel and 1–2 Kings; this work was translated into many languages. His 1958–60 volumes related archaeological finds to the biblical text and covered the social institutions of Israel under four headings: family, state, military, and religion. In a follow-up work on sacrifices (1964), he went deeper into this aspect of the Israelite religion. His Schweich lectures on the archaeology of Qumran, while not settling every question, firmly fixed the stratigraphy and dates of inhabitation of the site. The last years of his life were devoted to composing a projected three-volume history of Israel; however, his health and luck began to desert him. He was able to complete only the first volume on the Canaanite setting, the patriarchs, the sojourn in Egypt, the exodus, Sinai, and the settlement in Canaan (1971). A part of the second volume on the period of the Judges was published posthumously (1973), reconstructed from his notes by F. Langlamet. This work represents an excellent synthesis of the state of research on the early history of Israel up to 1970 and contributes an acute judgment from a historicist point of view; however, scholarly consensus turned to a more skeptical approach soon after it appeared. V. is remembered as a charming and dynamic teacher and colleague with sound archaeological judgment.

Works: Notes et textes sur l'avicennisme latin aux confins des XIIe-XIIIe siècles (1934); Rois (1949); Genèse (1951); Samuel (1953); Les Institutions de l'Ancien Testament (1958–60; ET 1961); Die hebräischen Patriarchen und die modernen Entdeckungen (1959); L'archéologie et les manuscrits de la Mer Morte (1961; ET 1973); Les sacrifices de l'Ancien Testament (1964; ET 1964); Bible et Orient (1967; ET 1972), essays; "Palestine during the Neolithic and Chalcolithic Periods" and "Palestine in the Early Bronze Age," CAH 1, 1 (1970) 499-538; 1, 2 (1971) 208-37; Histoire ancienne d'Israël (1971, 1973; ET 1978); Fouilles de Khirbet Qumran et de Aïn Feshkha (NTOA Series Archaeologica 1, 1994), the first of 5 vols. of the posthumous Final Report of the Qumran Excavations (ed. J.-B. Humbert and A. Chambon; Ger. ed., F. Rohrhirsch and B. Hofmeir; ET S. Pfann, forthcoming).

Bibliography: P. Benoit, Lettre de Jérusalem 37 (1971) 1-7. T. A. Collins, CBQ 33 (1971) 547-48; BAR 3 (1977) 37-39. J. Hubert, CRAIBL (1971) 541-42. K. M. Kenyon, Levant 4 (1972) v-x. A. Parrot, Syria 49 (1972) 277-78. N. M. Sarna, BAR 6 (1980) 14-21. R. J. Tournay, RB 79 (1972) 5-6.

B. T. VIVIANO

VAWTER, BRUCE FRANCIS (1921–86)

Born in Fort Worth, Texas, V. studied at St. Thomas Seminary College, Denver; the Pontifical University of St. Thomas, Rome (STL); the Pontifical Biblical Institute, Rome (SSL); and the Eberhard-Karls-Universität, Tübingen (post-doctoral work). He taught at St. Mary's Seminary, Perryville; Kendrick Seminary, St. Louis; St. Thomas Seminary, Denver; and DePaul University, Chicago, where he chaired the theology department (1968–86). He was CBA visiting professor to the Pontifical Biblical Institute Rome in 1973 and CBA president 1961–62.

V.'s main contributions to biblical studies were his writings on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). Although he specialized in HB, he moved easily in the NT, and many of his contributions are in that area.

He published significant pieces on christology, INSPIRATION, and HERMENEUTICS and was equally at home in scholarly and popular writing, contributing much to making advances in biblical studies available and acceptable to lay persons of faith.

V. wrote more than a dozen books, several of which were translated into other languages (including Chinese), numerous articles for scholarly journals, and more popular articles for DICTIONARIES AND ENCYCLOPEDIAS and newspapers. He also contributed through his editorial activity. At various times he served as general editor, associate editor, and book review editor of CBQ, and as general editor of CBQMS; he was general editor of OTA from its initial planning (1976) until his death. He served in an executive or editorial capacity for nine different scholarly biblical publishing houses. At the 1980 SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE meeting in Dallas, he received the Herbert Gordon May Award for outstanding contributions to the field of biblical studies as a distinguished editor.

Works: A Popular Explanation of the Four Gospels (1955); A Path Through Genesis (1956); Social Justice in the Prophet Isaiah (1958); The Bible in the Church (1959); The Conscience of Israel: Pre-exilic Prophets and Prophecy (1961); The Four Gospels: An Introduction (1967); New Paths Through the Bible: Some Essays in Biblical Theology (1968); Biblical Inspiration (1972); This Man Jesus: An Essay Toward a NT Christology (1973); On Genesis: A New Reading (1977); Amos, Hosea, Micah, With an Introduction to Classical Prophecy (1981); Job and Jonah: Questioning the Hidden God (1983); The Path of Wisdom: Biblical Investigations (1986), twenty of V.'s most important articles; A New Heart: A Commentary on the Book of Ezekiel (1991).

Bibliography: J. Jensen, OTA 10 (1987) 1-2; CBQ 49 (1987) 291-92.

J. JENSEN

VENEMA, HERMAN (1697–1787)

Born at Wildervant, the Netherlands, June 2, 1697, V. studied at Groningen and Franeker (1711–18) under both VITRINGA and A. SCHULTENS. After several years of pastoral activity he was appointed professor at Franeker, where he taught from 1724 to 1774. He died at Leeuwarden, May 25, 1787.

Much of V.'s output deals with theological controversies of his day (he was a strong advocate of religious toleration) and church history. As a biblicist, he is important for his series of Latin commentaries on the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and on the psalms, which began appearing in 1745, several being published posthumously. These commentaries evidence V.'s concern to recover the literal, direct sense of the scriptural word in its historical context with the help of cognate languages (Arabic in particular) and of TEXTUAL CRITICISM. At the same time V. gave considerable attention to the secondary messianic and ecclesial senses, which he admitted for many of the prophets' predictions. V.'s exegetical work thus manifests a complex interplay of factors: Dutch humanistic tradition, Reformed orthodoxy, and emerging Enlightenment consciousness.

Works: Dissertationes ad vaticinia Danielis emblematica cap. II, VII et VIII (1745); Commentarius ad librum Malachiae (1759); Commentarius in Psalmos (6 vols., 1762–67); Commentarius in librum Jeremiae (1765); Praelectiones de mothode prophetica (1775); Sermones academici ad librum Zachariae (1787); Lectiones academicae ad Ezechielem (1790–91); Praelectiones ad Obadjam (1810).

Bibliography: J. C. de Brüne, Herman Venema (1973).

C. T. BEGG

VERMIGLI, PETER MARTYR (1499–1562)

Born in Florence, May 8, 1499, V. assumed the name of Peter of Verona, who had been martyred in 1252. V. studied Aristotle at the University of Padua, took his doctorate, and was ordained a priest in 1525. After teaching philosophy and Scripture in Augustinian houses (1526–33), he served as abbot of Spoleto (1533–36) and of S. Pietro ad Aram, Naples (1537–40). Impressed by the writings of M. BUCER and ZWINGLI, he was suspended from preaching in 1540 because of his sympathy with the Reformers; but powerful friends in Rome overturned the local prohibition.

Elected prior of S. Frediano at Lucca in 1541, V. lectured on the Pauline epistles (see PAUL) and on the psalms. When the Inquisition was established in Italy on July 21, 1542, he fled to Zurich and Basel, then went to Strasbourg at Bucer's invitation. During his five years there he lectured on the HB and on Romans, publishing comments on the Apostles' Creed (1544) that clearly deny Roman Catholic teaching on the papacy and on the Eucharist and display his biblical THEOLOGY and humanism.

At T. CRANMER's invitation, V. went to England in 1548 as Regius Professor at Christ Church, Oxford, where he gave lectures on Romans. After Edward VI's death, V. returned to Strasbourg late in 1553, lectured on Judges to the Marian exiles, and was pressed by the Lutheran J. Marbach to conform to doctrinal constraints on baptism and Eucharist. He left in 1556 for Zurich, where he became professor of Hebrew and lectured on 1–2 Samuel and 1–2 Kings. He dedicated his 1558 Romans commentary to Queen Elizabeth. His Judges and Romans commentaries were translated into English in 1564 and 1568. His biblical commentaries are extant in thirty-two editions from Corinthians (1551) to Lamentations (1629). He died Nov. 12, 1562.

Bibliography: M. W. Anderson, P. M., a Reformer in Exile (1542–62): A Chronology of Biblical Writings in England and Europe (1975). S. Corda, Veritas Sacramenti: A Study in V.'s Doctrine of the Lord's Supper (1975). J. P. Donnelly (ed.), Calvinism and Scholasticism in V.'s Doctrine of Man and Grace (1976); (with R. M. Kingdon), A Bibliography of the Works of P. M. V. (1990), includes a register of letters compiled by M. W. Anderson. F. A. James, HHMBI, 239-45. R. M. Kingdon, The Political Thought of P. M. V.: Selected Texts and Commentary (1980). J. C. McLelland The Visible Words of God: An Exposition of the Sacramental Theology of P. M. V, AD 1500–62 (1957); P. M. V. and Italian Reform (1980). J. C. McLelland and G. E. Duffield, The Life, Early Letters, and Eucharistic Writings of P. M. (1989). P. McNair, P. M. in Italy: The Anatomy of an Apostasy (1967). K. Sturm, Die Theologie P. M. V.s während seines ersten Aufenthalts in Strassburg, 1542–47 (1971).

M. ANDERSON

VICO, GIAMBATTISTA (GIOVANNI BATTISTA) (1668–1744)

Born in Naples, June 23, 1668, V. was educated in a Jesuit school and at the University of Naples, where he became professor of Latin eloquence in 1697. His early works were published in Latin; but his most significant writings (after 1722), in Italian. In 1734 he was appointed historiographer to Charles III. V. died Jan. 23, 1744.

His most important work was New Science, which in early manuscript form apparently bore the title New Science Concerning the Principles of Humanity. The work went through three editions (1725, 1730, 1744), the last, appearing six months after his death, titled Principles of New Science of G. V. Concerning the Common Nature of Nations. Countering the Cartesian deprecation of historical study and the natural law theories of H. GROTIUS, J. SELDEN, and S. Pafendorf (1632–94), V. expounded a philosophy of history based on the argument that human history, society, and institutions are human made. Although he wrote of divine providence working in the course of human history, this was something of a concession to contemporary thought rather than a working hypothesis. Similarly, he "bracketed out" consideration of the Hebrew-Christian traditions and institutions from the new science (after all, his work was dedicated to the pope), although his assessments and evaluations of gentile nations could be, and probably were intended to be, applied to the Bible and to sacred history and institutions.

V. opposed the interpretation of ancient traditions based on what he called "the conceit of nations" and "the conceit of scholars." By the former he meant the ethnocentrism of any human community regarding its origins and special status. By the latter he referred to scholarly interpretations of traditions and myths (see MYTHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) based on the assumption that the ancients were primitive philosophers who thought the same things as modern scholars—that is, "what they [modern scholars] know is as old as the world." V. argued instead that ancient traditions, myths, and mythological worldviews should be understood as prerational and imaginative constructs produced through human responses to their environment. Primitive peoples were poets who spoke in poetic characters and out of their imaginative responses created institutions and culture. These primitive poetic worldviews thus served social needs and utilities. The earliest human creations were religion, marriage, and burial (with the associated concept of immortality). Human history and society are conceived of as human products capable of human understanding. V.'s study of history thus pointed to a detheologizing and secularizing of history and a historicizing of providence that identified the latter with the course of history.

Much of what V. wrote about Homer and his two epic poems—the Iliad and the Odyssey—could be applied to the Bible (bk. 3 of New Science is called "Discovery of the True Homer"). V. doubted the existence of a historical Homer, viewed the Homeric works as "two great treasure houses of the customs of early Greece" ("the Greek peoples were themselves Homer"), and saw them, not as philosophical documents, but as poetic expressions of Greek history and life.

Works: Opere (8 vols. in 11, ed. F. Nicolini, 1911–41); The Autobiography of G. V. (tr. and intro. by M. H. Fisch and T. G. Bergin, 1944, 1963[2]); The New Science of G. V. (tr. and intro. by M. H. Fisch and T. G. Bergin, 1948; rev. ed. 1984); V.: Selected Writings (tr. and intro. by L. Pompa, 1982); On the Most Ancient Wisdom of the Italians (tr. and intro. by L. M. Palmer, 1988).

Bibliography: I. Berlin, V. and Herder: Two Studies in the History of Ideas (1976). P. Burke, Vico (1985). F. E. Manuel, The Eighteenth Century Confronts the Gods (1967); The Changing of the Gods (1983). J. C. Morrison, "V. and Spinoza," JHI 41 (1980) 49-68. J. S. Preuss, Explaining Religion: Criticism and Theory from Bodin to Freud (1987), esp. 59-83; "Spinoza, V., and the Imagination of Religion," JHI 50 (1989) 71-93; RMM, 50-61. G. Tagliacozzo (ed.), V., Past and Present (1981). F. Vaughan, The Political Philosophy of G. V. (1972).

J. H. HAYES

VIELHAUER, PHILIPP (1914–77)

The son of a missionary from Basel, Switzerland, V. was born in Cameroon on Dec. 3, 1914. His parents reared him in the tradition of pietistic biblicism (in its German variety). He began gymnasium in Durlach near Karlsruhe in 1925. When he was in tenth grade a teacher gave him a book by the poet R. Huch entitled Luther's

Faith (1916) that became fundamental in V.'s life; he later wrote Huch a letter and included a copy of his dissertation (W. Schneemelcher [1978] 25). The book depicted LUTHER's struggle for "faith" and against "morality" (Schneemelcher, 12). Schneemelcher, in his speech honoring V.'s life, noted that the book (along with the strong influence of F. Overbeck) led V. to the understanding of the message of the gospel as utterly different from a worldview at human disposal (Schneemelcher, 13). Both influences also seem to have led V. to his sharp distinction between "early Christianity" and "Christianity."

V. spent two semesters studying theology in Basel, five semesters in Marburg, where he studied under R. BULTMANN and H. von Soden, and three semesters in practical theology in Heidelberg, completing his doctoral dissertation under M. DIBELIUS ("Oikodome: The Image of Building in Christian Literature from the NT to Clement of Alexandria" [1939]). A member of the Confessing Church since the Marburg years, he was put out of the Baden regional church for refusing to take the Hitler oath but was received (October 1935) by the church in Württemberg, where he served until he was drafted in January 1941. He was grievously wounded in Russia in 1942 and suffered for the rest of his life (with a plate in his head).

In 1944 V. returned to the parish. He felt the parish years were important in his life because there he learned to translate his scientific work into praxis—that is, proclamation. In 1947 he became ausserordentlicher professor in the theology faculty in Göttingen and completed his inaugural dissertation ("The Figure of the Forerunner and the Importance of the Eschatological Pathfinder in the NT and Its World" [1950]). He was immediately given the chair in NT in Bonn, where he remained until his death, Dec. 23, 1977.

V.'s published writings include a set of essays and a magisterial history of early Christian literature. (The bibliography of his other published articles, sermons, and book reviews may be found in Schneemelcher's commemorative address.) His essays are elegantly and carefully written. "On the Paulinism of the Acts of the Apostles," for example, examines the speeches of PAUL and Peter and compares them with the uncontested letters of Paul, concluding that "The author of Acts is in his Christology pre-Pauline, and in his natural theology, conception of the law, and eschatology post-Pauline. One finds no specifically Pauline thought in his work. His 'Paulinism' consists of his zeal for the universal mission to the pagans and in his veneration for the greatest missionary to the pagans" (1965, 26). His essay "Clothing and Food of John the Baptist" attacks the thesis that John's clothing (Mark 1:1-8) was a deliberate attempt to imitate Elijah (2 Kgs 1:8). To decide whether John could have associated his clothing with Elijah's, V. noted, one must use the Hebrew text of 1 Kgs 1:8 (1965, 49), in which Elijah is described as a hairy man (as in Gen 27:11) with a waistcloth of skin (ezor or) on his thighs. There is no mention of a hairy mantle (as in Zech 13:4; cf. Elijah's mantle in 1 Kgs 19:13, 19 and 2 Kgs 2:8, 13 with the mantle [same word] of royal quality in Josh 7:21 and Jonah 3:6 [1965, 51]). V. concluded that John did not see himself as Elijah redivivus (resurrected), noting that the bedouin wear leather on their bare bodies covered with a garment of camel hair and also eat locusts and honey. John is a man of the wilderness—a region for which the Jews had eschatological expectations (1965, 53).

In V.'s well-known essay "Kingdom of God and Son of Man in the Proclamation of Jesus," he argued that the historical JESUS preached the kingdom of God but did not use the apocalyptic term Son of man (see APOCALYPTICISM). Both concepts never appear together in Jesus' words (1965, 58). V. used various sorts of arguments to make his case. With regard to Mark 14:61-62, for example, the identity of Christ and Son of man was not asserted in ancient Judaism. So Jesus would have made the identification himself for the first time, and the disciples would have heard about his statement from the people at the trial who later converted to Christianity. V. found that improbable and believed that one should attribute the scene to the christological confession of the later Christian community (1965, 72). With regard to Mark 13:26, on the other hand, V. summarized arguments holding that it and other sayings belong to Jewish apocalyptic conceptions and not to the specific situation of Jesus or of the early Christian community (1965, 73). The emphasis in Jesus' preaching on the eschatological proclamation (kingdom of God) makes it probable that texts like Mark 13:26 are not statements of the historical Jesus. The saying in Luke 17:23 (which presupposes false pretenders who claim to be Son of man—"here and there") cannot be historical because such frauds are not present in Jewish apocalyptic conceptions and so could not have been used by Jesus (1965, 75). These arguments can be summarized thus: If the saying can be attributed to the early Christian community or to ancient Judaism, it is not to be attributed to the historical Jesus. On the other hand, if the saying has elements not present in ancient Jewish conceptions, then it cannot be from the historical Jesus either.

For his history of early Christian literature, V. adopted a distinction between early Christianity and Christianity, made earlier by OVERBECK. In his essay "F. Overbeck and NT Research," V. noted that the beginnings of patristic literature do not lie in the NT and that there is not a literary-historical relation between the NT and patristic literature. The letters of the NT are not a form of high literature but are genuine correspondence. The Gospels, Apocalypse, and Acts of the Apostles are true literary forms that died out early before the existence of a "church literature." They are "primitive Christian literature." In this category Overbeck (and V.) also included the apostolic fathers, Hegessipus' Hypomnemata (Memoirs), and PAPIAS' Exegeses. The formation of the NT CANON is the temporal limit of this literature. Early Christian literature was created by the interests of the Christian community before any interaction with the surrounding world. Even though the forms (other than that of the Gospels) were not new and had existed in the religious literature of earlier times, the early Christians did not use the forms of "pagan world literature" (1965, 247-48). This position of Overbeck and V. can be illustrated by V.'s claim in his history that the Gospels were a unique literary genre and not an example of Hellenistic biography (1975, 256, 283, 408, 409).

Works: Aufsätze zum Neuen Testament (TBü 31, 1965); Geschichte der urchristlichen Literatur: Einleitung in das Neue Testament, die Apokryphen, und die Apostolischen Väter (1975).

Bibliography: U. Hutter-Wolandt, BBKL 12 (1997) 1367-75. W. Schneemelcher, "P. V. Gedenkrede," In memoriam P. V. (W. Schrage and W. Schneemelcher, Alma Mater, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Universität 44, 1978).

J. G. COOK

VINCENT, LOUIS-HUGUES (1872–1960)

Born Aug. 31, 1872, at Saint-Alban-de-Varaize in France, V. entered the Lyons province of the Dominicans in 1890 and received the religious name of Hugues. After his novitiate at Ryckolt in Holland, he was sent to Jerusalem in August 1891 for his theological studies and was ordained a priest, Dec. 21, 1895. His ambition was to be a missionary, but his unusual ability as a draftsman convinced M.-J. LAGRANGE that his talents would be better employed as an archaeologist. In 1895 he was appointed to the faculty of the fledgling École pratique d'études bibliques, where he remained as a professor until his death, Dec. 30, 1960.

V. began his career just as the exploration of the Holy Land was developing into the scientific discipline of ARCHAEOLOGY. He was one of the first to appreciate the importance of the ceramic typology formulated by W. F. PETRIE in his excavation of Tel el-Hesi in 1890, and V. developed unrivaled expertise in this field. His draftsman's eye gave him exceptional insight into architectural problems, skills complemented by an incredible assiduity in visiting every excavation, whether archaeological dig, cistern, or foundation of a new house. He saw, read, and remembered everything, developing an encyclopedic knowledge that became the basis for the first scientific synthesis of the results of Palestinian archaeology (1907). For over half a century, in 200 articles in the RB, he reported and critically evaluated every new discovery.

V.'s mastery of his subject made him "the tutor of all" (W. F. Albright) for the new generation of archaeologists who came to Palestine after WWI. Not only was he a living link with the past, but his capacity for warm friendship and his readiness to make his vast experience available to others did much to foster a climate of cooperation between scholars of various nations and different religions. In 1922 he was part of the group directed by J. GARSTANG who officially fixed the division and names of the archaeological periods for Palestine.

At Lagrange's insistence, V. was made responsible for the publication of the important finds made incidentally in the bizarre quest of the Parker expedition for buried treasure on the Ophel ridge (1911). V. also recorded the discoveries made beneath the Ecce Homo convent in Jerusalem, which he interpreted as the courtyard of the Antonia fortress (1933). Lacking funds, his own excavations at Ain Douq (1920) and Amwas-Nicopolis (1932) were no more than salvage operations. His major contribution, however, is a series of studies devoted to monumental complexes in Hebron, Bethlehem, and Jerusalem. His attention to detail and phenomenal powers of observation enabled him to distinguish different construction phases, and he ensured a complete picture by enlisting the collaboration of his colleague L. ABEL, whose knowledge of the textual data concerning Palestine was without equal. Minute studies of every ancient structure in Jerusalem coalesced into a class trilogy describing the history of the holy city from its foundation to the Middle Ages.

V. could not excavate on these sites; and more recent discoveries have demanded reconsideration of some of his hypotheses, notably the size of the Antonia fortress, the location of the praetorium of Pilate, and the original form of the holy sepulchre. But the quality of V.'s drawings, which record evidence that has now disappeared, and the sheer amount of data he assembled has made his books fundamental to all subsequent study of Jerusalem. He was always concerned to provide all information necessary to permit an independent assessment.

Fidelity to Lagrange's program, the combination of document and monument, dictated V.'s concentration on biblical sites. But his objective was never to prove the Bible true; his intention was, where possible, to give a fuller dimension to the text by fixing the physical conditions of the events there described.

Works: Canaan d'après l'exploration récente (1907); Jérusalem sous terre (1911); Jérusalem antique (1912); (with F. M. Abel), Bethléem: Le sanctuaire de la Nativité (1914); (with F. M. Abel), Jérusalem nouvelle (1914–22, 1924); (with F. M. Abel), Hébron: Le Haram el-Khalil, Sépulture des patriarches (1923); (with F. M. Abel), Emmaüs, sa basilique et son historie (1932); Jérusalem de l'Ancien Testament: Recherches d'archéologie et d'histoire (2 vols. 1954, 1956).

Bibliography: W. F. Albright, "In Memory of L.-H. V.," BASOR 164 (1961) 2-4. A. Parrot, "Le R. P. L.-H. V.," Syria 38 (1961) 217-19. O. R. Sellers, BA 24 (1961) 62-64. E. Weidner, AfO 20 (1963) 307-8.

J. MURPHY-O'CONNOR

VISCHER, WILHELM (1895–1988)

Born Apr. 30, 1895, in Basel, Switzerland, V. studied at the universities of Lausanne, Basel, and Marburg and became Privatdozent at Bethel Theologische Hochschule in 1928. Expelled from Germany in 1933, he became pastor of St. Jacob's Church and Privatdozent at the University of Basel in 1936. In 1947 he was called to the OT chair at the University of Montpelier, where he remained until his retirement. He died Nov. 27, 1988.

In his early years V. was associated with the group around K. BARTH and wrote several widely read articles in ZdZ calling for a renewed theological interpetation of the OT. His most significant contribution was his book on the witness of the OT to Christ, which brought him into the center of a major theological controversy. His provocative formulation, "The OT tells us what Christ is; the New, who He is," raised a storm of protest from those who thought his christological interpretation was a repudiation of the historical-critical method.

Nevertheless, even his strongest critics (e.g., G. von Rad) admitted that V. had had a major influence in the rebirth of OT THEOLOGY in Germany and that his book had been greatly welcomed by many in the church during the Nazi period. H.-J. Kraus spoke of his "sounding the alarm." In England and America V. was largely understood and dismissed as a simplistic and even fundamentalist preacher. Actually he was a highly sophisticated and well-trained theologian, solidly within the classic Reformed tradition, whose serious contribution to the field has only recently begun to receive reevaluation (see H. G. Reventlow [1979]).

Works: "Das AT als Gottes Word," ZdZ 5 (1927) 379-95; Jahve der Gott Kains (1929); "Das AT und die Verkündigung," TBl 10 (1931) 1-12; "Das AT und die Geschichte," ZdZ 10 (1932) 22-42; Hiob, Ein Zeuge Jesu Christ (1933, 1947[6]); Das Christuszeugnis des Alten Testament, vol. 1, Das Gesetz (1934; ET, The Witness of the OT to Christ [1949]); vol. 2, Die früheren Propheten (1942); Esther (TEH 48, 1937); Die Bedeutung des AT für das christliche Leben (ThStud 3, 1938, 1947[2]); Die Evangelische Gemeindeordnung (1946); Die Immanuel-Botschaft im Rahmen des königlichen Zionfestes (ThStud 45, 1955); Der Prophet Habakuk (BibS(N) 19, 1958); Valeur de l'Ancien Testament (1958); L'Écriture et la Parole (1985).

Bibliography: J. Cadier et al. (ed.), Maqqél shâqédh, La Branche d'Amandier: Hommage a W. V. (1960). B. S. Childs, "OT in Germany, 1920–1940: The Search for a New Paradigm," Altes Testament Forschung und Wirkung (FS H. G. Reventlow, ed. P. Mommer and W. Thiel, 1994) 233-46. W. Eichrodt, "Zur Frage des theologischen Exegese des AT," TBl 17 (1938) 73-87. V. Herntrich, Theologische Auslegung des AT? Zum Gespräch mit W. V. (1936). H.-J. Kraus, Geschichte der historisch-kritischen Erforschung des AT (1969[3]) 426-32. N. W. Porteous, "OT Theology," The OT and Modern Study: A Generation of Discovery and Research (ed. H. H. Rowley, 1951) 311-45. G. von Rad, "Das Christuszeugnis des AT," TBl 14 (1935) 249-54. H. G. Reventlow, "Der Konflict zwischen Exegese und Dogmatik: W. V.s Ringen um den 'Christus im Alten Testament,' " Textgemäss (FS E. Würthwein, ed. A. H. J. Gunneweg and O. Kaiser, 1979) 110-22. B. Schroven, Theologie des AT zwischen Anpassung und Widerspruch (1995).

B. S. CHILDS

VITRINGA, CAMPEGIUS (1659–1722)

Born at Leeuwarden in Friesland, May 16, 1659, V. was educated at the universities of Franeker (1675–78) and Leiden (1678–79), becoming professor of oriental languages at Franeker (1680) and subsequently professor of theology (1682) and church history (1693). He was one of the most productive, creative, and influential scholars of his day. Two of his sons were also publishing theologians; both died young, however, Horatius at nineteen (Oct. 8, 1704) and Campegius the younger at twenty-nine (Jan. 11, 1723). V. died Mar. 31, 1722.

Although primarily an OT scholar, V. published works on the NT and also wrote a number of theological works, including the multivolume Doctrina Christianae (9 vols. in 10 in the 1761–89 ed.) and a volume on practical theology. His greatest work was his commentary on Isaiah (1714–20), which formed the basis of many subsequent Isaiah commentaries until the work of R. LOWTH and H. GESENIUS. In this volume Isaiah's prophecies (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) are treated with literary skill as genuine orations and are related to specific historical circumstances. V. planned a similar volume on Zechariah, portions of which were published posthumously (1734). In his works on the synagogue and early church (1685, 1687b, 1696), he sought to show the similarities between the two. His two works on Ezekiel and the temple (1687a, 1693) argued that Ezekiel's temple corresponded to Solomon's and that its plan was followed in the second and Herodian rebuilds. Much of the material on Ezekiel as well as V.'s Observationum were the results of controversies and public disputations. His work on the NT included a volume on the PARABLES (1715) and one on the Apocalypse (1705), which was strongly anti-Roman Catholic. Works on geography and CHRONOLOGY illustrate two of his continuing interests.

Works: Observationum sacrarum libri vii (1683–1708); Archisynagogue observationibus novis illustratus (1685; 2nd ed., De synagoga vetere libri tres [2 vols., 1696]; ET, The Synagogue and the Church [1842]); Anleidinge tot het reclite verstand van den tempel, die de prophet Ezechiel gezien en beschreeven heeft (2 vols., 1687a); De decem viris otiosis (1687b); t'Rechte verstand van dem tempel Ezechiels verdeedigt en bevestigt (1693); Hypotyposis historiae et chronologiae sacrae (1698, enl. ed. 1708); Anakrisis apocalypsios Joannis Apostoli (1705); Commentarius in librum prophetiarum Iesaiae, quo sensus orationis ejus sedulo investigatur (2 vols., 1714–20); Verklaeringe van de evangelischer parabalen (ed. J. d'Outrein, 1715); Hypotyposis historiae et chronologiae sacrae . . . Accedit typus doctrinae propheticae (1716; portion in ET as "On the Interpretation of Prophecy," The Investigator 4 [1834–35] 153-76); Geographia sacra (ed. D. G. Werner, 1723); Commentarii ad librum porphetiarum Zachariae quae supersunt [i.e., ad c. iv. v.6] (ed. H. Venema, 1734).

Bibliography: J. Le Clerc, "C. V., Observationum liber duo," BUH 12 (1689) 512-32; "C. V., Observationum liber tertius," BUH 21 (1691) 51-71; "C. V., Observationum sacrarum libri 5 et 6," Bibliothèque choisie 16 (1708) 356-70; "C. V., Commentarius in Iesaiam," Bibliothèque choisie 27 (1713) 378-423; "C. V., Commentarius in Iesaiam," BAM 15 (1721) 1-100. E. Kautzsch, NSHERK 12 (1912) 218-19. MSHH 35 (1736) 30-40. E. G. E. van der Wall, "Between Grotius and Cocceius: The theologia prophetica of C. V.," H. Grotius, Theologian (ed. H. Nellen et al., 1994) 195-215. B. Wiklander, Prophecy as Literature: A Text-linguistic and Rhetorical Approach to Isaiah 2–4 (ConBOT 22, 1984) 8-10. K. M. Witteveen, C. V. und die prophetische Theologie in Reformiertes Erbe 2 (ed. H. Oberman et al., 1993) 343-59.

J. H. HAYES

VIVES, JUAN LUIS (1492–1540)

Born in Valencia, Spain, Mar. 6, 1492, to converted Jewish parents, V. died May 6, 1540. At the academy of Valencia he learned Latin and Greek; after pursuing university studies in Paris (1509–14), he settled in Bruges. In 1517 he became private tutor to young Cardinal Guillaume (II) de Croy, who took him to Louvain, where even without academic degrees V. was licensed to teach. On Croy's death in 1521, V. sought a post in England.

In 1522 V. was informed that the Spanish inquisition had charged his father with apostasy. (He was executed [1524] and the body of his wife, who had died in 1509, was exhumed and burned). V. accepted Wolsey's invitation to teach at Oxford (1523). He found favor with Henry VIII and made friends with H. MORE, Fisher, and Linacre but lost the king's patronage when he opposed his divorce from Catherine. V. spent the rest of his life in Bruges as a freelance humanist, supported by influential patrons, including Charles V.

V. influenced biblical exegesis of the sixteenth century indirectly but considerably in that he introduced (like L. Valla, R. Agricola, and Erasmus) the RHETORICAL method of interpretation. Advocating the Italian liberal arts tradition of Cicero and Quintilian, he endeavored to replace the abstract logic of scholastic disputations with a humanist rhetoric of persuasion aimed at moral use and religious renewal (1519, 1531). He redefined dialectic by associating it with the rhetorical invention of topoi for utilitarian rather than demonstrative purposes. He produced commentaries on Augustine's De civitate Dei (1522) and other theological works (1519, 1524, 1539).

Works: Mediationes in septem psalmos quos vocant penitentiae (1519); In pseudodialecticoes: A Critical Edition (1519; ed., intro., and commentary by C. Fantazzi, 1979); De institutione feminae Christianae (1524); De disciplinis (1531); De veritate fidei christianae (1539); Opera omnia (1555, 1782–90, repr. 1964); Obras completas (tr. and ed. L. Riber, 1947–48); Selected Works (gen. ed. C. Matheeussen, 1987–).

Bibliography: M. Bataillon, Erasmo y España (1956). A. Bonilla y San Martin, L. V. y la filosofía del renacimiento (1929). T. B. Deutscher, CE, 3:409-13. R. Guerlac, J. V. Against the Pseudodialecticians: A Humanist Attack on Medieval Logic (1979). A. Guy, V. ou l'humanisme engagé (1972). MSHH 21 (1733) 172-85. C. Noreña, J. L. V. and the Emotions (1970). P. Sainz Rodríguez, Homenaje a L. V. (1977). F. Watson, V. On Education: A Translation of the De tradendis disciplinis of J. L. V. (1913).

M. HOFFMANN

VOLTAIRE (1694–1778)

François-Marie Arouet, who created his own pseudonym, was born Nov. 21, 1694. He reacted strongly against the Jesuit education his father forced him to receive at the Paris Collège Louis-le-Grand but even more strongly against the church, which he considered to be filled with institutional deceit, superstitious fanaticism, intellectual intolerance, and theological scholasticism. After time in the Bastille for his critical satire and free thought, V. spent 1726–28 in exile in London, where he became acquainted with Newtonian (see I. NEWTON) natural philosophy and science; British religious toleration and social institutions; many of the major poets; Latitudinarian-Arian theology (see ARIUS); and, to a limited extent, radical deistic thought (see DEISM), while mastering the English language. After he returned to France, his book Lettres philosophiques (or Lettres sur les Anglais [1734]), praising British life and thinkers and containing an appendix attacking Pascal, led to his flight to Cirey, where he took residence with Madame du Châlet and joined the Cirey circle in which biblical interpretation was one among many interests. After du Châlet's death (1749) he served for a time at the court of Frederick II of Prussia (1750–52), eventually acquiring the estate of Ferney on the Swiss border, where he lived the last twenty years of his life.

V. was an indefatigable writer, producing works from his early youth until his death in Paris (May 30, 1778). His complete works and correspondence take up over 250 volumes. Religious issues and institutions were the object of his concern throughout his career; but most of V.'s more caustic, scurrilous attacks and witty analyses of the Bible and religion were published after 1760. As his writings and the marked volumes in his private library (taken to Russia by his secretary, Wagnière, and now in the Leningrad public library) indicate, V. was reasonably well acquainted with the biblical scholarship of his day and heavily dependent on D. CALMET as well as on the more radical English Deists, A. COLLINS, T. WOOLSTON, C. MIDDLETON, and P. ANNET, both in the English originals and in French translations by D'Holbach, whom V. refused to follow into atheistic positions. V.'s attribution in his writings of material to various authors, however, is seldom accurate, often revamped and restated, and frequently falsely ascribed and patently created.

From his pamphlet Sermon des cicquante (1762) to his book-length commentary on the Bible, La Bible enfin expliquée (1776), and his history of early Christianity, Histoire de l'établissement du christianisme (1777), V. challenged the INSPIRATION and content of the Bible, wittily reformulating all the arguments leveled against its historicity, miraculous events, CHRONOLOGY, and ethics, often under the pretense of defending it against its detractors. Everywhere his dislike of and disgust with the institutional church and his virulent anti-Judaism are apparent. He is most brilliant and devastating in his Les Questions de Zapata and Examen important de milord Bolingbroke (both 1767).

The significance of V.'s writings does not lie in any scholarly innovations or in new hypotheses, but elsewhere: (1) He summarized and popularized in an entertaining and engaging fashion the arsenal of questions and difficulties associated with the Bible. (2) He introduced the general reading public to the biblical apocryphal materials, relying heavily on the collections of J. FABRICIUS, and in the process cast further doubt on the traditional authorship and character of the biblical writings. (3) His commentary on "the Bible finally explained" (which does not treat many of the HB books and contains only sixteen pages on the NT, covering only the synoptic Gospels) offered for the first time a biblical commentary that did not set out to prove the value of the material being treated.

Works: V. on Religion: Selected Writings (tr. and intro. by K. W. Applegate, 1974), contains "Zapata's Questions" (20-38), "Homilies" (39-92), and "An Important Study by Lord Bolingbroke" (93-214).

Bibliography: A. Ages, "V.'s Critical Notes in the OT Portion of La Bible Enfin Expliquée" (diss., Ohio State University, 1963); V., Calmet, and the OT (1966). C. J. Betts, Early Deism in France: From the So-called "Déistes" of Lyon (1564) to V.'s 'Lettres philosophiques' (1734) (1984). A. Bingham, "V. and the NT," Studies on V. and the Eighteenth Century 24 (1963) 183-218. M.-H. Contoni, L'exégèse du Nouveau Testament dans la philosophie française de XVIIIe siècle (Studies on V. 220, 1984); "V., Rousseau, Diderot," BTT 7, (1986) 799-803. C. Dedeyan, V. et la pensée anglaise (1956). G. R. Havens and N. L. Torrey, "The Private Library of V. at Leningrad," PMLA 43 (1928) 990-1009. A. Hertzberg, The French Enlightenment and the Jews (1968). D. Lévy, V. et son exégèse du Pentateuque: Critique et polémique (Studies on V. 130, 1975). F. Manuel, "Israel and the Enlightenment," Daedalus 111 (1982) 231-45 = his The Changing of the Gods (1983) 105-34. A. R. Morehouse, V. and J. Meslier (1936). R. Mortier, "V. et la Bible, ou les ruses du polémiste," Colloque 76 V. (1983) 17-28. R. Pomeau, La religion de V. (1956, 1969²). P. Sakman, "V. als Kritiker der Bibel und des Christentums," ZWT 49 (1906) 398-421, 494-571. B. E. Schwarzbach, V.'s OT Criticism (1971). J. S. Spink, French Freethought from Gassendi to V. (1960). N. L. Torrey, V. and the English Deists (1930). I. O. Wade, The Intellectual Development of V. (1969).

J. H. HAYES

VOLZ, PAUL (1871–1941)

Born in Lichtenstern (Württemberg), Oct. 14, 1871, V. studied at the universities of Tübingen and Berlin, where his most influential teacher was the Tübingen HB scholar J. von Grill. In 1899 V. became a Repetent in Tübingen, in 1903 graduated lic. theol., and in 1907 habilitated as a Privatdozent in HB at Tübingen. He became an ausserordentlicher professor in 1909 and full professor in 1914. He died May 30, 1941.

An outspoken, theologically oriented HB scholar, V. was more interested in the religious message of the text than in the solution to LITERARY-critical problems. The major areas of his research were the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and HB-Jewish eschatology, but he also dealt with the beginnings of Yahwistic religion connected with Moses and with various HB theological themes. V. produced popular commentaries on HB wisdom literature and published works on Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY. His editorship of the Biblischen Altertümer, based on his own views and rich with tables and sketches, became a popular textbook.

V. considered eschatological faith to be of genuine Israelite origin, not derived from Israel's environment. Present in the time of Moses, it was developed during the early prophetic movement and, in opposition to popular expectation, was raised by the classical prophets to a new level in which religion and morality were joined. V. denied the existence of a messianic expectation in the preexilic prophets and sought to prove the incompatibility of this hope with the total character of the judgment prophets.

V. devoted much effort to interpreting the book of Jeremiah. His commentary (1918) written for KAT focuses mostly on Jeremiah's prophetic experience and piety. V. also produced a basic overview of the TEXTUAL condition of the book (1920) which, according to him was essentially composed by Baruch and consists of three parts (chaps. 1–25; 26–36; 37–45). However, V. completely separated the texts dealing with foreign nations (25:15-38; 46–51) from the Jeremianic tradition, attributing them to an anonymous author (Deutero-Jeremiah), who wrote in Babylon in the context of Nebuchadnezzar's death around 560 BCE. The original Jeremianic traditions received many additions due to their use in worship and to the effort to make them contemporaneous.

In his later commentary Jesaja II, V. described Deutero-Isaiah as the spiritual leader of the exiles and the first missionary. He did not separate the Servant Songs from the book or from the message of the prophet as B. DUHM did but appraised them as "a piece of autobiography of Deutero-Isaiah" (166). Nevertheless, he removed Isa 52:13–53:12, regarding it as a thoroughly eschatological song that has nothing to do with the other Servant Songs or with Deutero-Isaiah. With regard to Isaiah 56–66, V. followed Duhm in separating the chapters from Deutero-Isaiah but not in assigning them to Trito-Isaiah. Considering any unity as out of the question, he regarded the chapters as a compilation of disparate texts during a period from the seventh to the third centuries BCE. This view, apart from the individual dating, has found widespread acceptance.

V. recognized the great significance of worship for the formation and shaping of tradition. In his work on the new year's festival of Yahweh (1912), he reconstructed the festival after Babylon and Assyrian models (see ASSYRIOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and equated it with the Festival of Tabernacles. He regarded it as a celebration of the day of the world's beginning, of the commencement of the Kingdom, and of repentance as well as the harvest festival during which the people expressed gratitude for rain and fertility and reflected on the law. Independent of V., S. MOWINCKEL later formulated and consistently developed an analogous conception (Yahweh's enthronement festival).

Finally, V. participated in the discussion of source criticism of the Pentateuch (1933; see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM). In investigating Genesis 15–36 he allowed for only one narrator, whom he called J, and claimed that the Elohist is a fiction, at best a supplementer and redactor of J's work. He also disputed the existence of a priestly narrative, regarding P as a work of legislation whose author here and there (e.g., in the flood story) revised earlier material.

Work: Die vorexilische Jahweprophetie und der Messias (1897); Jüdische Eschatologie von Daniel bis Akiba (1903; as Die Eschatologie der jüdischen Gemeinde im neutestamentlichen Zeitalter [1934²], repr. 1966); Mose (1907; as Moses und sein Werk [1932²]); Der Geist Gottes und die verwandten Erscheinungen im Alten Testament und im anschliessenden Judentum (1910); Weisheit (Das Buch Hiob, Sprüche und Jesus Sirach, Prediger) (SAT 3.2, 1911, 1921²); Das Neujahrsfest Jahwes (Laubhüttenfest) (SGV 67, 1912); Die biblischen Altertümer (1914, 1925²); Der Prophet Jeremia (1918, 1931³); Studien zum Text des Jeremia (BWANT 25, 1920); Der Prophet Jeremia (KAT 10, 1922, 1928²); Das Dämonische in Jahwe (SGV 110, 1924); Jesaia II (KAT 9, 1932); Der Kampf um das Alte Testament (1932, 1933²); (with W. Rudolph), Der Elohist als Erzähler: Ein Irrweg der Pentateuchkritik? (BZAW 63, 1933); Der eschatologische Glaube im Alten Testament (1935); Prophetengestalten des Alten Testaments (1938, 1944³, repr. 1949). Bibliography in "Das Alte Testament," ThJber 23 for 1903 (1904); 28 for 1908 (1909).

Bibliography: J. Annandale, "Die eliminering van die Elohis as symptoom van 'n nuwe benadering tot die Pentateugprobleem by V., Von Rad, en Van Seters" (diss., Universiteit van Suid-Afrika, 1984). EKL 4 (1961) 879. H. Gunkel, *RGG*² 5 (1931) 1715.

W. THIEL

VOS, GEERHARDUS (1862–1949)

Born Mar. 14, 1862, in Heerenveen, the Netherlands, where his father was a pastor, V. graduated from the theological school of the Christian Reformed Church in Grand Rapids, Michigan (1883). At Princeton Theological Seminary (1883–85) his thesis, "The Mosaic Origin of the Pentateuchal Codes," won him a fellowship to spend three years at the University of Berlin and at Strasbourg University, where he received a PhD (1888). After teaching at the theological school (now Calvin Theological Seminary) in Grand Rapids (1888–93), he accepted an appointment at Princeton to fill the newly created chair of biblical THEOLOGY, where he taught for the remainder of his career (1893–1931). Although these were turbulent years at Princeton, he apparently did not become deeply involved in the controversies. He died Aug. 13, 1949.

V. is best known for his contributions to biblical theology. He accepted the conservative Reformed theology of his colleagues at Princeton, rejecting the conclusions of critical scholars; but he investigated the Scriptures more from the historical perspective of biblical theology than from the dogmatic viewpoint of systematic theology. He defined his area of study (which, he thought, should be called the history of special revelation) as the science that "attempts . . . to exhibit the organic growth or development of the truths of Special Revelation from the primitive preredemptive Special Revelation given in Eden to the close of the NT canon" (1948, preface). In his treatment he followed the biblical order (Eden, Noah, the patriarchs, Moses, etc.) and showed at each stage the developments in special revelation, which was designed to interpret the historical process of redemption. "Revelation is the interpretation of redemption. It must, therefore, unfold itself in installments as redemption does" (1948, 14).

V. also made a notable contribution to the study of PAUL's eschatology, arguing for its centrality to the apostle's thought. But he also anticipated later twentieth-century students of Paul by perceiving that in Paul's two-aeon view the new age was divided into the "world to come, realized in principle" (beginning with Jesus' resurrection) and, after the Second Coming, the "future age and world fully realized in solid existence" (1952, 38).

Works: The Mosaic Origin of the Pentateuchal Codes (1886); Die Kämpfe und Streitigkeiten zwischen den banū 'umajja und den banū hāšim (1888); De verbonds leer in de Gereformeerde theologie (1891); The Teaching of Jesus Concerning the Kingdom of God and the Church (1903); Gereformeerde Dogmatiek (3 vols. [typewritten], 1910); The Eschatological Aspect of the Pauline Conception of the Spirit (1912); Grace and Glory: Sermons Preached in the Chapel of Princeton Theological Seminary (1922); The Self-disclosure of Jesus: The Modern Debate about the Messianic Consciousness (1926, rev. ed. 1954); The Pauline Eschatology (1930, 1952); Biblical Theology: Old and New Testaments (1948); Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of G. V. (ed. R. B. Gaffin, 1980).

Bibliography: R. B. Gaffin, "G. V. and the Interpretation of Paul," Jerusalem and Athens (ed. E. R. Geehan, 1971), 228-37; "Introduction," Redemptive History and Biblical Interpretation: The Shorter Writings of G. V. (ed. R. B. Gaffin, 1980) ix-xxiii. J. F. Jansen, "The Biblical Theology of G. V.," PSB 66 (1974) 23-34. M. Noll, Between Faith and Criticism: Evangelicals, Scholarship, and the Bible in America (1986) 55-56. M. Taylor, "The OT in the Old Princeton School" (diss., Yale University, 1988) 499-511. J. G. Vanden Bosch, The Reformed Journal 4 (1954) 11-14.

J. C. VANDERKAM

VOSSIUS (or VOSS), GERHARD JOHANNES (1577–1649)

Born near Heidelberg, Germany, V. moved to Holland at an early age and was left an orphan in 1585. He studied at Dort and Leiden. In 1599 he was made director of the College of Dort and in 1614 became director of the theological college at Leiden. Although he remained a Calvinist (see CALVIN), he was excommunicated by the Synod of Gouda in 1620 because he seemed to favor Arminianism (see ARMENIUS) in his Historia Pelagiana. Two years later he was restored to communion and appointed a professor at Leiden. He refused a position at Cambridge but in 1632 accepted a professorship of history at Amsterdam. He was befriended by Laud, who gave him a prebend at Canterbury even though he continued to live in Holland. V. died in Amsterdam, Mar. 19, 1649.

V. was internationally esteemed as a scholar, with students from England and France coming to Holland to study under him. One of the first writers to examine Christian theology and other religions from a historical point of view, he convincingly argued against the traditional authorship of the Apostles' and the Athanasian creeds. According to the Journal de Trévoux (January 1713, repr. 1968) 178-79, he was a man of great erudition, judgment, and integrity who worked slowly, formed his opinions on the basis of what he read, and attempted to penetrate the thought of the authors he cited. His works included treatises on grammar, rhetoric, etymology, and Greek and Latin historians and poets.

Works: Historia Pelagiana, sive Historiae de Controversiis quas Pelagius eiusque Reliiquiae Moverunt Libri Septem (1618); De Historicis Graecis Libri Tres (1624); De Historicis Latinis Libri Tres (1627); De Theologia Gentili (1642); Aristarchus, sive de Arte Grammatica (1662); Etymologicum Linguae Latinae (1662); Dissertationes Tres de Tribus Symbolis, Apostolico, Athanasiano et Constantinapolitano (1663); Opera (6 vols., 1695–1701).

Bibliography: A. L. Katchen, Christian Hebraists and Dutch Rabbis (1984). Koldewey, ADB 40 (1896) 370-72. MSHH 13 (1730) 92-127.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

VOSSIUS (or VOSS), ISAAC (1618–89)

A biblical, patristic, and classical scholar, V. was born at Leiden in 1618, the seventh son of G. VOSSIUS, and was educated by his father and a private tutor. He was befriended by Queen Christina of Sweden and spent 1649–51 at her court in Stockholm but fell out of favor after entering into controversy with Salmasius (Saumaise). At one stage he received financial help from Louis XIV. Through the initiative of J. Pearson he moved to England in 1670, and in 1673 Charles II made him a canon of Windsor. A controversial figure, V. had a reputation for bawdiness and was thought to be a skeptic. Charles II is reputed to have said that V. would believe anything except what was in the Bible. V., who accumulated a very large library, died in England, Feb. 21, 1689.

V.'s main contribution to biblical studies was his work on the SEPTUAGINT and on biblical CHRONOLOGY based on the Septuagint, which led him into controversy with Horn and provoked adverse criticism from R. SIMON. V.

was the first person to publish an edition (known as "Vossian") of the seven genuine Ignatian epistles (see IGNATIUS), based on a manuscript in Florence and confirming views held by J. USSHER. V. wrote on a variety of scientific, classical, and theological subjects: the nature of light; the movement of winds; and the sources of rivers, especially the Nile. He produced an edition of Catullus, annotations to Juvenal's Satires and Pliny's Natural History, and also edited his father's works.

According to Journal de Trévoux 13 (January 1713, repr. 1968) 178-79, V. was remarkably different from his father. In the father, judgment ruled; in the son, imagination. While the father was a "man of integrity," the son was a "libertine in heart and spirit."

Works: Epistolae Genuinae S. Ignatii Martyris (1646); Dissertatio de Vera Aetate Mundi, qua ostenditur natale mundi tempus annis minimum 1440 vulgarem aeram anticipare (1659); De Septuaginta Interpretibus eorumque Tralatione et Chronologia Dissertationes (1661); De Poematum Cantu et Viribus Rhythmi (1673); Variorum Observationum Liber (1685).

Bibliography: Koldewey, ADB 40 (1896) 370-72. MSHH 13 (1730) 127-43. T. Seccombe, DNB 58 (1899) 392-96. R. Simon, Opuscula critica adversus I. V. (1685).

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

VRIEZEN, THEODORUS CHRISTIAAN (1899–1981)

A Dutch biblical scholar and Semitist, V. was born in Dinxperlo. He received his doctorate under the tutelage of H. Obbink at Utrecht in 1937 and was a teacher of religion at The Hague from 1929 to 1941. Professor of OT in the theological faculty at the University of Groningen from 1941 to 1956, V. occupied the equivalent chair at the University of Utrecht after 1956. He followed the true line of the Dutch Ethicals, who have had a firm hold in the twentieth century both in Groningen and Utrecht. Following a scientific method of biblical criticism, V. studiously avoided the historicism of the Leiden scholars. Of all Dutch HB scholars of the twentieth century, he has gained the greatest fame abroad, chiefly through his influential work on OT THEOLOGY, which has been favorably compared with the works of W. EICHRODT and G. von RAD. In Holland V. was also known as an influential supporter of the state of Israel and of Jewish-Christian dialogue.

Works: Onderzoek naar de paradigjsvorstelling bij de oude Semietische volken (1937); Oud-Isarelietische geschriften (1948); An Outline of OT Theology (1950; ET 1970[2]); (with J. H. Hospers), Palestine Inscriptions (1951); Die Erwählung Israels nach dem Alten Testament (1953); "Prophecy and Eschatology," VTSup 1 (1953) 199-229; "De ontwikkeling van het moderne Hebreeuws," Medeleelingen der Koninklijke Akademie van Wetenschapen, Afdeling Letterkunde (1956); De Literatuur van Oud-Israel (1961); The Religion of Ancient Israel (1963; ET 1967).

Bibliography: G. W. Anderson, "Recent Biblical Theologies V.: T. C. V.'s Outline of OT Theology," ExpTim 73 (1961–62) 113-16. R. E. Clements, "T. C. V.: An Outline of OT Theology," Contemporary OT Theologians (ed. R. B. Laurin, 1970) 121-40. Studia Biblica et Semitica, T. C. V. . . . dedicata (1966) including bibliography of V.'s works (13-17).

S. J. DEVRIES

VULGATE

The history of the Latin Bible is surely one of the most complex histories of any Western text. Indeed, it is at least as much a history of the interaction of the intellectual currents carried forward by the dominant personalities and authorities of Christian history as it is of any one text type. Even the history of JEROME's work, which is commonly described as the "Vulgate," is complicated by the fact that Jerome did not edit the entire Bible: Some books were revised only slightly, others underwent multiple revisions, and still others he left entirely untouched in the OL. Beyond that, the contributions of CASSIODORUS, ISIDORE, the Irish, the Anglo-Saxons of Northumbria, Theodulf (c. 750–821), ALCUIN, and the anonymous stationers who compiled the Paris text in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, together with their "correctors," do not exist in independent exemplars but, rather, almost invariably in mixed text types in which many characteristics and readings are shared. This state of affairs is in no small measure due to the fact that the physical transmission of the text rarely took the form of a complete copy from a single-volume exemplar (pandect). Generally speaking, any given copy of the Bible would consist in a collection of codices, each containing a subset of the biblical CANON (Pentateuch, Gospels, Prophets, etc.). The quality and provenance of any one of these collections could conceivably be (and sometimes was) as heterogeneous as the textual tradition as a whole. Moreover, the project of the church in the first few centuries following Constantine was governed, not primarily by the canons of TEXTUAL CRITICISM, but rather by the needs of preachers and missionaries, who would choose the version of the text best suited to moral exhortation and the teaching of the faith.

1. The Starting Point: Jerome. Jerome, who served as secretary to Pope Damasus from 382 to 385, was charged by him with the revision of the Gospels. Prior to Jerome there had been no consistent version of the OL text, and yet it was the OL that had become enshrined in the liturgical use of the church. Consequently, his revision, which followed the most ancient Greek manuscripts available to him, was limited to correcting only those passages that departed from the meaning of the original Greek. Jerome may have extended this revision to the balance of the NT, although there is evidence that suggests an anonymous reviser for this part of the Bible. Jerome also prepared at this time a revision of the OL psalter, corrected against its source, the SEPTUAGINT. Although this first revision of Psalms appears now to be lost, the Roman psalter, so-called by virtue of its popularity throughout Italy and with the papacy until modern times, is likely to be very close to Jerome's work. Following the death of Damasus in 384, Jerome settled in Palestine, where he undertook a revision of the OL TRANSLATION of the HB with the aid of ORIGEN's Hexapla. His most influential work of this period was his second revision of the psalter, called the Gallican probably through the influence of Gregory of Tours (538/39–94) and the significant number of manuscripts of it that derive from southern Gaul. (No doubt local liturgical custom later influenced Alcuin, who chose this version for his edition.) Jerome occasionally corrected the Latin against the Hebrew and added Origen's diacritical marks to note what was present in the Greek but not in the Hebrew and to note what had been added from the Hebrew in THEODOTION's version. In this stage of his work he also prepared revisions of Job, Chronicles, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Songs, and probably the rest of the HB as well. But his studies, particularly of the Hebrew language, in which he had become proficient, led him ultimately to undertake a new translation from the Hebraica veritas, the Hebrew text from Genesis to Chronicles, including the Aramaic portions of Ezra and Daniel. Of the Apocrypha, he translated the Greek portions of Daniel and Esther as well as the Aramaic versions of Tobit and Judith. The deuterocanonical books, Wisdom, Sirach, the first two books of the Maccabees and Baruch, he left in their OL versions. This, then, is the version of the Latin Bible that came to be called the Vulgate in the sixteenth century.

2. Diffusion of Jerome's Text. The editio vulgata of Jerome's day was, of course, the OL version of the text; and it was only in the seventh century that Jerome's text began to dominate. Over the course of the next four hundred years, Jerome's version (especially in its better witnesses) spread from Italy and southern Gaul, refracted though liturgical use and through the authority of local versions (especially in Spain). We are fortunate that Cassiodorus described the nature of the Bibles he had with him at his monastery at Vivarium: a working copy of the OL text in nine volumes, the Codex grandior (brought to Northumbria by Ceolfrid at the beginning of the 8th cent.) containing Jerome's earlier hexaplaric revision of the HB, his revision of the Gospels and the balance of the NT in the OL, and a smaller one-volume Bible containing the Vulgate text throughout. It would seem that Cassiodorus restricted his editorial work to external features of the text and did not attempt a critical analysis of manuscript witnesses or textual traditions in the modern sense. His goal was to produce manuscripts of the sacred text that conformed to the most ancient and reliable witnesses, punctuated throughout by cola and commata, provided with chapter headings, and modified orthographically only rather modestly. The canons of the Latin language rarely if ever entered into the emendation of the text, and throughout the Middle Ages these guidelines dominated all attempts at improving the biblical text. Although Vivarium was destroyed not long after Cassiodorus's death, his library had an enduring influence through the cartloads of books that were sent from Vivarium to the Lateran palace in Rome.

The dissemination of the Vulgate text, however, had begun long before Cassiodorus. Even in Jerome's lifetime, scribes had come from Spain with the specific task of copying his work. The development of the early Spanish text is sometimes linked to Peregrinus, about whom little is known. The version of the text associated with his name shows the typical signs of additional material from the OL grafted into Jerome's Vulgate together with prefaces intended for Jerome's hexaplaric revision of other books. For his own part, the scholar and encyclopedist Isidore, bishop of Seville (c. 599–636), produced an edition of the text much closer to Jerome's original and followed more closely the canonical order of the Hebrew. But over the course of the seventh century, there inevitably arose a conflated "Peregrinus-Isidore" text type that dominated the Iberian peninsula and had some impact beyond it.

Spanish traditions found their way north of the Pyrenees perhaps most significantly in the person of Theodulf. Born and educated in northern Spain, he fled north from the Moors, taking his library with him. Late in the eighth century Charlemagne appointed him to the see at Orleans. The textual version associated with Theodulf follows Isidore's canon and exhibits prefatory material taken from Isidore and Peregrinus but follows essentially an Italian text type. Theodulf adopted Jerome's Hebrew psalter, and his work evidences corrections directly from the Hebrew. Unfortunately, his efforts to provide a rudimentary apparatus in the form of marginal notations of variant readings inevitably led in later manuscripts to the introduction of the variants into the text itself.

The influences that converged on Carolingian efforts to revise the biblical text came not only, or even principally, from Spain but, rather, from Italy by way of the north. Here again Hieronymean traditions jostled with the OL. Irish monks, whose presence was ubiquitous throughout Europe, often brought with them a mixed text, although a purer form of Jerome's text can be found in the Book of Armagh and in the Book of Durrow (both Gospel books). It is not impossible that the latter was produced at Iona, whence Irish monks established Lindisfarne, whose Gospels bear a close affinity to the Codex Amiatinus produced by Ceolfrid at Jarrow before 716 and modeled after, though not copied directly from, Cassiodorus' Codex grandior. The Northumbrian traditions, represented in the Codex Amiatinus, together with Irish traditions had spread to Europe by mid-century, as witnessed in the Codex Fuldensis, a missionary Bible left at Fulda by the Anglo-Saxon Boniface.

Augustine of Canterbury (d. 604) had brought from Rome a mixed text type, which by the time of Alcuin had reached Northumbria and together with the version represented by the Codex Amiatinus and the Lindisfarne Gospels became the basis of the text he used at Tours. Alcuin, who had received his education at York and had taken charge of Charlemagne's palace school at Aachen around 782, was abbot of St. Martin's at Tours from 796 until his death in 804; it was there that he produced a corrected text of the Bible and published it in a sumptuous presentation copy that Charlemagne had commissioned to present to the pope in 800. As with Cassiodorus, Alcuin's editorial goals were conservative, limited to punctuation, grammar, and orthography. But it was not strictly the quality of the text of Alcuin's Bible—rather poor at the beginning of the ninth century but improved over the decades—so much as the external circumstances surrounding its production that gave it prominence throughout the empire. Although not officially sponsored by the crown, by the end of the ninth century it had become the norm.

Up to this time, practical and sometimes pastoral concerns governed the correction of the textual tradition. But from Carolingian times down to the Renaissance, there was an increasing tendency to emend the text to harmonize it with the fathers. Already in the ninth century, and especially in the twelfth and thirteenth, the development of the Vulgate text was influenced by the growing authority of patristic authors, both in their use of Scripture and in their articulation of doctrine. With the ascendence of the GLOSSA ORDINARIA in the first half of the twelfth century and the appearance of the Sentences (1155–58) of PETER LOMBARD, the patristic witness that they marshaled made an impact on the copying of the Vulgate in subtle ways, especially as the stationers of Paris, who were largely responsible for the diffusion of the Paris text, were not governed by any particular form of the text. This is especially obvious in the case of the Gloss, where discrepancies between the reading of the biblical display text and the patristic usage in the marginal commentary would stand side by side on the same page. There were occasional attempts to purge the Vulgate text of accretions, especially among the early Cistercians. S. Harding (d. 1134) and N. Majacoria (d. 1145) represent this movement, but their efforts run counter to the general trend.

3. Corrections and Revisions of the Vulgate Text. The plethora of alternative readings, especially as found in the fathers, led to the publication of correctoria in the thirteenth century by both Dominicans and Franciscans, which generally suggested alternative Latin translations from the original languages and occasionally proposed variants from authoritative Latin manuscripts. This led to a confusion that some scholars, like R. BACON, complained was worse than the problem the correctors sought to remedy. This intensified interest in the biblical text also led to the production of such aids for study as CONCORDANCES, the first of which was produced at the Dominican convent of St. Jacques in Paris under the direction of HUGH OF ST. CHER, and standardized chapter divisions (c. 1225), which go back to S. LANGTON.

Under the stimulus of the philological advances of the fifteenth century, the impulse to correct the Vulgate text against the Hebrew and Greek intensified. But as confessional lines hardened in the sixteenth century, this approach became untenable for the Roman Catholic Church. And with the decree of Trent that only the Vulgate was to be used in public reading, disputations, and sermons (1546), the efforts of several scholars to produce new translations from the original languages were circumscribed. Yet the attempts to produce a corrected, scholarly edition of the Vulgate also met with considerable resistance. Between 1528 and 1540 R. Estienne produced under royal privilege (but with the opprobrium of many Paris theologians) three editions based increasingly on manuscript witnesses. (In a later edition [1555] he introduced the verse divisions still in use). The official revision of the Vulgate was finally undertaken by the Dominican Henten at Louvain based on Estienne's 1540 edition and was published at Antwerp in 1547. A revision of this Louvain Bible by A. Montanus was published in 1574. But it was only at the instigation of Sixtus V that yet another edition was prepared, this time at Rome, to be published at the Vatican in 1590 together with the papal injunction that no other edition was to be used. Yet its errors were sufficiently numerous that shortly after Sixtus's death the copies of the 1590 edition were recalled and a corrected edition was prepared under the impetus of R. BELLARMINE and published in 1592 under the name of Sixtus but in the pontificate of Clement VIII. Until the late nineteenth century this Sixto-Clementine edition was the only edition of the Vulgate in official public use.

4. Critical Editions and New Translations. With the advent of new photographic technologies and the stimulus they gave to other arenas of textual research, not to mention the unending attempts over the centuries to produce new and improved Latin translations of the Bible, Pope Pius X established a commission in 1907 to produce a critical edition of the Vulgate. The first fascicle appeared in 1926 under the direction of H. Quentin (1872–1935); and the last, only in 1995. Concomittantly in 1969 there appeared from the Württembergische Bibelanstalt a new version (now in its 3rd ed.) under the direction of Weber, B. Fischer, and J. Gribomont together with an ecumenical team of scholars that was, rather than simply the Clementine text with variants, an edition based on a substantial number of witnesses and closely paralleling the critical edition.

While this work on the Vulgate was proceeding, new Latin translations of various parts of the Bible began to be authorized and put into circulation, with the aim of emending obscurities and barbarisms. This development culminated in the the promulgation in 1969 of a Biblia vulgata nova under the direction of Cardinal Bea. Completed in 1977, this new Latin version should not be confused with the critical edition of the Vulgate. The twentieth century has also seen the undertaking of a critical edition of the OL Bible, the Vetus Latina, in many ways a much more difficult task, since it does not owe its origin to a single author, as does so much of the Vulgate. Publications associated with the Vetus Latina began to appear in 1949 under the editorship of B. Fischer and will continue well into the twenty-first century.

Editions: Biblia Sacra iuxta vulgatam versionem ad codicum fidem, cura et studio monachorum Abbatiae pontificiae Sancti Hieronymi in Urbe O.S.B. edita 1-18 (1926–95); Vetus Latina (1949–); Biblia vulgata nova (1969–77); Biblia Sacra iuxta vulgatam versionem (ed. B. Fischer, 1983[3]).

Bibliography: S. Berger, Histoire de la Vulgate pendant les premiers siècles du moyen age (1893). F. J. Crehan, "The Bible in the Roman Catholic Church from Trent to the Present Day," CHB 3 (1963). B. Fischer, Lateinische Bibelhandschriften im Frühen Mittelalter (1985). B. Hall, "Biblical Scholarship: Editions and Commentaries," CHB 3 (1963). R. Loewe, "The Medieval History of the Latin Vulgate," CHB 2 (1969). B. M. Peebles, "Bible IV.13: Latin Versions," NCE 2 (1965). E. F. Rice, Saint Jerome in the Renaissance (1985). E. F. Sutcliffe, "Jerome," CHB 2 (1969). For further bibliography see especially the articles in CHB and NCE.

M. A. ZIER

W

WALAFRID STRABO (STRABUS = THE SQUINTER) (c. 808–49)

A theological writer and poet of the Carolingian age, W. was a Swabian of humble birth. He received his education at the abbey of Richenau under the monks Tatto, Wetti, and Grimald. Sent to Fulda soon after 825, he studied under RABANUS MAURUS and served at the court of Louis the Pious (829–38) as educator of the future king, Charles the Bald. He returned to Richenau in 838 as its abbot, was briefly exiled in 840/41, and died Aug. 18, 849, while on a political mission to King Charles in France.

W. was a precocious student, an accomplished Latin stylist at an early age, and one of the best poets of the period. A personal notebook (Cod. Sangall. 878) with entries from his teenage years onward reveals a warm, sensitive personality and a brilliant, creative mind. His poems, many of them styled as letters, his lives of saints in verse and prose, his Dantesque Visio Wettini, and the famous Hortulus (Liber de cultura hortorum, a description of his abbatial garden and its plants) witness to his versatility as a writer.

W.'s theological works include a handbook of liturgical customs, De exordiis et incrementis quarundam in observationibus ecclesiasticis rerum. The exegetical works, most of them from his earlier years, are less original. He produced an abbreviated version of Rabanus's commentary on the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), which enjoyed considerable success, a thorough digest of AUGUSTINE and of CASSIODORUS on the psalter, an interpretation of the catholic epistles excerpted mainly from BEDE, and some short poems on biblical themes. Of the extensive early High German biblical glosses of the ninth century, probably only a few notes in Cod. Sangall. 283 (Rabanus on the Pentateuch) are his. His abbreviation of Rabanus was used in the GLOSSA ORDINARIA on Genesis and Exodus, but W.'s alleged authorship of the Glossa ordinaria as a whole or at least of its marginal gloss is a later suggestion first advanced by J. Trithemius in his De scriptoribus ecclesiasticis (1494).

Works: PL 113-14; MGH.PL 2 (1884) 259-423 (poetic works); MGH.L 2, 2 (1897) 280-337 (De exordiis).

Bibliography: B. Bischoff, "Eine Sammelhandschrift W. S.s (Cod. Sangall. 878)," Mittelalterliche Studien 2 (1967) 34-51. J. de Blic, "L'oeuvre exégètique de W. S. et la glosse ordinaire," RTAM 16 (1949) 5-28. M. Brooke, "The Prose and Verse Hagiography of W. S.," Charlemagne's Heir: New Perspectives on the Reign of Louis the Pious (ed. P. Godman and R. Collins, 1990) 551-64. F. Brunhölzl, Geschichte der lateinischen Literatur des Mittelalters 1 (1975) 345-58, 557-59. K. Froehlich, "W. S. and the Glossa Ordinaria: The Making of a Myth," StPatr 28 (1993) 192-96. A. Önnerfors, "Über W. S.s Psalter-Kommentar," Literatur und Sprache im europäischen Mittelalter (ed. A. Önnerfors et al., 1973) 75-121 (with texts); "W. S. als Dichter," Die Abtei Richenau: Neue Beiträge zur Geschichte und Kultur des Inselklosters (ed. H. Maurer, 1974) 83-113. D. A. Traill, W. S.'s "Visio Wettini": Text, Translation, and Commentary (Lateinische Sprache und Literatur des Mittelalters, 2, 1974).

K. FROEHLICH

WALLIS, LOUIS (1876–d. after 1950)

Educated at Ohio Medical University (1895–1900) and the University of Chicago (1909–14), W. held only an academic post as lecturer in sociology and economics at Ohio State University (1908–9). He was a freelance author and lecturer and served for many years as the executive secretary of the J. A. Fels Foundation.

W. is often referred to as a pioneer of sociological study of the Bible (see SOCIOLOGY AND HB STUDIES), particularly the HB. Three of his many writings (1912, 1935, 1942) are esssentially one thesis in three books; the major theme, refined and expanded, remains the same. He maintained that the biblical view of God and of religion emerged from the interaction of belief with the social process that affected it and was in turn influenced by it. Some critics have maintained that his conclusions are a form of sociological reductionism; but however close he may have come to this position at times, he always returned to the transcendental implications of a universe dominated by unfolding moral purposes.

Writing when sociological method was in its nascent stage, W. understandably often drew specious conclusions. He paid little overt attention to the critical biblical scholarship of his day, much of which would have supported his intuitive judgments. In particular, his view of the settlement in Canaan has become a commonplace of contemporary scholarship, although his contribution is seldom mentioned in the literature. His insights warrant reexamination in the sociological study of the Bible.

Works: "The Capitalization of Social Development," AJS 7 (1902) 763-96; An Examination of Society (1903); Egoism: A Study in the Social Premises of Religion (1905); A Sociology Study of the Bible (1912); The Struggle for Justice (1916); By the Waters of Babylon: A Story of Ancient Israel (1931); God and the Social Process: A Study in Hebrew History (1935); The Bible Is Human: A Study in Secular History (1942); The Bible and Modern Belief (1949); Young People's Hebrew History (1953).

Bibliography: L. Epsztein, Social Justice in the Ancient Near East and the People of the Bible (1983; ET 1984, 1986) 54-57. F. Hahn, The OT in Modern Research (1956) 173-76. H. G. May, "A Sociological Approach to Hebrew Religion," JBR 12 (1944) 98-106.

J. F. PRIEST

WALWYN, WILLIAM (1600–1680)

A religious radical, a spokesman for extreme religious toleration, and a Leveller, W. was a successful London merchant whose mother was the daughter of a bishop. He was an active debater in London churches during the 1640s and published works advocating a near complete religious toleration. In the late 1640s after becoming associated with the Leveller movement, he was imprisoned as one of its more prominent figures. He advocated legal and trade reforms in the 1650s but from 1654 onward practiced and published as a physician.

In a remarkable, not yet fully appreciated way, W. merged a secular skepticism derived from classical texts and from Montaigne with a religious radicalism that is part antinomian and part "left" Arminian (see ARMINIUS). He doubted, or is said to have doubted, scriptural infallibility and certainly emphasized the experience of the Spirit over the letter of the Scriptures. For this reason he disapproved of laborious biblical commentary and elaborate, formalistic scriptural interpretation in sermons.

W. was consistently misunderstood: "I have been most uncharitably slandered to deny the Scriptures to be the word of God, because I have opposed insufficient arguments produced to prove them such." Equally, although he made public profession of his belief that the Bible is the Word of God, there is no surviving evidence of his private beliefs, which may not have been so affirmative. His importance was in encouraging, as part of his critique of orthodox Puritanism and its ethics, a probing of the defenses of scriptural fundamentalism without rejecting the "comforts" of Bible reading under the auspices of the Spirit.

Works: Divine Right and Democracy: An Anthology of Political Writing (ed. D. Wootton, 1987); The Writings of W. W. (ed. J. R. McMichael and B. Taft, 1989).

Bibliography: H. N. Brailsford, The Levellers and the English Revolution (1961). J. McGregor and B. Reay (eds.), "The Levellers and Religion," Radical Religion (1984) 65-90. L. Mulligan, "The Religious Roots of W. W.'s Radicalism," JRH 12 (1982) 162-79. N. Smith, "The Charge of Atheism and the Language of Radical Speculation, 1640–80," Atheism from the Reformation to the Enlightenment (ed. M. Hunter and D. Wootton, 1992).

N. SMITH

WARBURTON, WILLIAM (1698–1779)

Although educated in law, W. chose a career in the Church of England, was ordained in 1727, and became bishop of Gloucester in 1759. His importance for biblical studies comes from his massive and controversial The Divine Legation of Moses, most of which was published in 1737–41; a ninth book appeared posthumously in 1788. An eccentric defense of Christianity against Deists (see DEISM) and skeptics, replete with arcane learning and shrill polemics, it emphasized such matters of importance for biblical studies as the theocratic nature of ancient Israelite polity (which W. thought did not end with the judges but continued to NT times), the absence from the HB of a developed notion of immortality with rewards and punishments (which W. held proved God's guidance of ancient Israel, since no people could long survive without a belief in divine judgment in the afterlife to buttress morality), and the alphabetical and linguistic rather than mystical character of Egyptian hieroglyphics (see EGYPTOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). W. was one of the first to advocate that hieroglyphics were not intended to conceal secrets. The section dealing with this subject was translated into French and published as Essay sur les Hierglyphes (1744). He studied the Bible in the context of the religious and philosophical world contemporary with it.

Works: The Divine Legation of Moses Demonstrated (4 vols., repr. 1978); Works (12 vols. ed. with a life of the author by R. Hurd, 1811).

Bibliography: A. W. Evans, Warburton and the Warburtonians (1932). L. Stephen, DNB 59 (1899) 301-11; History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century 1 (1902) 292-315. S. Taylor, "W. W. and the Alliance of Church and State," JEH 43 (1992) 271-86.

D. D. WALLACE, JR.

WARFIELD, BENJAMIN BRECKENRIDGE (1851–1921)

Born near Lexington, Kentucky, Nov. 5, 1851, to devout Presbyterian parents, W. was educated at the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University) and at Princeton Seminary (1871, 1876). After a study trip to Europe (Leipzig, 1876–77) and a brief pastorate (1877–78), he became professor of NT at Western Seminary in Pennsylvania (1878–87). His inaugural address concerned the INSPIRATION of the NT in light of philosophical and historical criticism. Later he moved to Princeton Seminary, where he taught for over thirty years (1887–1921). He died Feb. 17, 1921, in Princeton.

W.'s title at Princeton was professor of didactic and polemical theology, which appropriately defined his own sense of vocation. He was a proponent of the "old Princeton theology" and defended a strictly confessional Calvinism (see CALVIN) vigorously in the face of perceived rationalistic criticism tempting scholar and layperson alike to abandon orthodox Christianity. He served as editor of PresR (1890–1903) and during his distinguished career wrote hundreds of articles and reviews, ranging from scientific and philosophical trends through the traditional theological disciplines of biblical studies, church history, and theology, many of which have been reprinted several times since his death.

Although a prolific writer, W. wrote neither a biblical commentary nor a text in theology, apparently regarding C. HODGE's systematic theology as a definitive text in the latter category. He spent most of his efforts in biblical studies in defending the theory of biblical infallibility and AUTHORITY rather than on sustained exposition of the texts. His shorter expositions display his exegetical skill, and it is unfortunate that he produced no sustained commentary on a biblical book.

The key to W.'s work is summed up in his introduction to his book on biblical authority and inspiration (1948): "There is the exegetical evidence that the doctrine held . . . by the Church is held by the biblical writers themselves. . . . There is the whole mass of evidence—internal and external, objective and subjective, historical and philosophical, human and divine—which goes to show that the biblical writers are trustworthy as doctrinal guides" (1948, 174). Defense of this position was his life's work.

Augustinian (see AUGUSTINE) in approach, W. was convinced that the Westminster Confession and Standards contained the essential system of doctrine taught in Scripture. Yet the great debates of his day forced him to offer a reasoned defense of orthodoxy based on an inductive assessment of evidence (what he called "the facts"). He was no foe of higher criticism as such and believed that "the facts," correctly interpreted, supported orthodox Christianity. Increasingly, however, he argued that a rationalistic, antisupernaturalistic bias influenced many historical critics so that they moved deductively from presuppositions in conflict with his own view that the Bible contained an infallible system of revealed truth. This approach has occasioned debate among scholars, some of whom have seen in his efforts the assumption of an inductive scientific method that can be objective in dealing with truth claims (perhaps an assumption inherited from the theology of the old Princeton school in its dependence on the philosophy of Scottish realism). Other scholars have seen in his arguments an attempt to demonstrate that human experience and the claims of theology cohere most consistently in a Calvinistic worldview (what he would call the necessary interrelationship between facts and doctrine).

During W.'s lifetime the Presbyterian Church held ecclesiastical trials concerning the theological views of some of its seminary professors. W. did not resort to personal vendetta, but he did seek to draw the lines sharply between historic Christianity (which he saw himself defending) and the views of such scholars as H. P. SMITH and C. BRIGGS.

Works: An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the NT (1886); Works, vol. 1, Revelation and Inspiration (1927); vol. 2, Biblical Doctrines (1929); vol. 3, Christology and Criticism (1931); The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible (1948); Biblical and Theological Studies (1952).

Bibliography: W. A. Hoeffecker, Reformed Theology in America: A History of Its Modern Development (ed. D. F. Wells, 1985) 60-86. M. A. Knoll, The Princeton Theology, 1812–1921 (1983) 239-307 (with full bibliographical listings). A. N. S. Lane, "B. B. W. on the Humanity of Scripture," Vox Evangelica 16 (1986) 77-94. T. P. Letis, "B. B. W.: Commonsense Philosophy and Biblical Criticism," American Presbyterian 69 (1991) 175-90. J. S. McClanahan, "B. B. W.: Historian of Doctrine in Defense of Orthodoxy, 1881–1921," Affirmation 6 (1993) 89-111.

J. A. DEARMAN

WARREN, CHARLES (1840–1927)

Born Feb. 7, 1840, the son of Major-General Sir Charles Warren, W. was educated at Cheltenham College, Sandhurst, and Woolwich and joined the royal engineers in 1857. For the next half-century he distinguished himself as an engineer and soldier, serving in Europe, Africa, Palestine, and the Far East. He died Jan. 21, 1927.

W.'s major contributions to the field of biblical studies were through his archaeological explorations (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES). From 1867 to 1870 the royal engineers lent him to the PALESTINE EXPLORATION FUND for survey work. He was commissioned to determine the locations in Jerusalem of the ancient Jewish Temple, the three defensive walls mentioned by JOSEPHUS, the city of David, Herod's palace, the Antonia, and the tomb of JESUS. In spite of official Ottoman resistance and a lack of adequate financial support by the fund (W. said that it should be called the "Debt"), he set about his work with courage, determination, and resourcefulness. Using his training in military mining he sank a series of shafts and ran tunnels from them to explore the extent of the ancient masonry around the Haram esh-Sherif. At the southeastern corner he found a wall that he followed for eight hundred feet to the southwest, concluding that it had enclosed part of the ancient city. He also examined the Dome of the Rock and the nearby cisterns and in the Tyropoean Valley found what has come to be known as Hezekiah's Tunnel. On the east his explorations uncovered a wall, a water shaft that ran from the city of David to the Gihon Spring ("Warren's Shaft"), and an ancient Hebrew seal inscribed with the name "Haggai." W. also explored the Judean desert, the Dead Sea region, and Masada, becoming the first European in modern times to ascend the mountain fortress by way of the snake path on the eastern side. He also played an important role in the recovery of the fragments of the Moabite Stone.

Since archaeological techniques of his day were still primitive, the pottery and walls that W. uncovered could not be dated accurately. Consequently, his excavations sometimes revealed little more than the depth of the debris around the Temple Mount; however, he preserved and registered every object he uncovered—a new departure at that time. His interpretations of archaeological data were often in error (e.g., he assigned the Herodian walls of the Temple Mount to Solomon and the Maccabean fortress at Tell el-Ful to the Crusaders). W. was able, however, to disprove J. Ferguson's widely circulated theory that the Dome of the Rock was the original Church of the Holy Sepulchre and that Solomon's Temple was located at the southwestern corner of the Haram esh-Sherif. W. had little interest in biblical criticism per se; his views in that area were traditional, and he believed that the archaeological investigation of Palestine supported the Christian faith.

Works: (with C. W. Wilson), The Recovery of Jerusalem (1871); "Orientation of Ancient Temples and Places of Worship," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society 4 (1876) 188-230; Underground Jerusalem (1876); "Lydda and Ramleh" and "Philistia," Picturesque Palestine, Sinai, and Egypt 3 (1880) 145-48, 149-66; The Temple or the Tomb (1880); Plans, Elevations, Sections, etc., Showing the Results of the Excavations at Jerusalem, 1867–70 (1884); (with C. R. Conder), The Survey of Western Palestine (1884); The Ancient Cubit and Our Weights and Measures (1903); The Holy Land and How a Knowledge of It Helps to Confirm Our Faith (1905); The Early Weights and Measures of Mankind (1913).

Bibliography: R. W. A. Onslow, DNB, 1922–30 (1937) 889-91.

M. P. GRAHAM

WEBER, MAX (1864–1920)

W. was born Apr. 21, 1864. From 1869 the family lived in Berlin, where his father was a successful politician among right-wing liberals; his mother, a woman of pious and humanitarian concerns, was of Calvinistic extraction (see CALVIN). W. attended the University of Heidelberg in 1882 and the universities of Berlin and Göttingen. Having taken his law examinations in 1886, he became Privatdozent at Berlin and professor of economics at Freiburg (1894), returning to Heidelberg in 1896. With the onset of illness in 1897 he ceased regular academic duties. His gradual recovery from 1901 onward enabled him to return to scholarly work, and in 1903 he became associate editor of the Archiv für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. In the summer of 1918 he gave a series of lectures at the University of Vienna on "a positive critique of the materialist conception of history." He accepted a professorship at Munich in 1919 but contracted influenza and died there June 14, 1920.

W. created no comprehensive philosophical or sociological system, and his work cannot be summarized in a generalizing way as can that of K. Marx or E. Durkheim. Rather, he contributed significantly to a wide variety of economic, social, and historical questions; and here his influence remains pervasive. His SOCIOLOGY is distinct in being concerned, not with society as a given entity, but with individuals and groups who act in it and, through their subjective interpretations of reality, create it.

Insofar as he saw society as a balance between opposing groups acting on the basis of their own material and ideal interests, W. may be classified with Marx as a conflict theorist. Moreover, his rejection of historical materialism, particularly well known from The Protestant Ethic (ET 1930), is, in part at least, a disagreement with a vulgar Marxism rather than with Marx himself; like Marx, W. allowed for the causative influence of material as well as ideal factors in historical events and social formations. However, W. rejected Marx's determinism; what he adopted from the Marxist analysis of society he considerably refined, especially by introducing the concept of "status group." Unlike class, which is economically determined, the status group is a community bound together by shared ideas as well as by material interests. Through this concept W. allowed for the formative influence of ideas in the creation of social groups without assigning absolute priority to either ideal or material causes.

The other side of W.'s work is his analysis of the phenomenon of authority in which, as in his study of social formations, he constructed "ideal types" as models through which the particular tendencies of actual historical manifestations of authority might be understood. Society is comprehended through an analysis of social structure and authority in terms of its charismatic, traditional, and legal types. Both come together in his historical reconstruction Ancient Judaism (originally published as journal articles in 1917–19), a study that reflects many typical Weberian concepts and ideas.

W. approached Judaism, as he did other religious institutions, through the concept of the status group. When the typical characteristics of the status group are carried to their fullest extent, they result in a closed caste in which the group is segregated by ritual, conventional, and legal restrictions. The postexilic Jewish community is considered such a group. Because of its social and political disprivilege and its economic distinctiveness, it may be further characterized as a pariah people.

In W.'s description, Israel originated in the social context of different mutually antagonistic social structures in Palestine, of which the most relevant types are the city dweller, the peasant farmer, and the semi-nomad. Identified totally with none of these types, Israel must be seen to have originated in the creation of a new order that overcame the divisions of existing social structures. The HB law codes reflect the diversity and instability of Israel's social composition and were drawn up to meet the social tensions and antagonisms in Israelite society. At the same time, these law codes with their increasingly theological elaboration also indicate the foundation on which Israel's existence lay, i.e., the covenant relationship that bound different social groups together in union with Yahweh. Israel's breakthrough to a new order is not to be explained in historical-materialist terms but "was determined by quite concrete religious-historical and often highly personal circumstances and vicissitudes" (1952, 80).

This presentation of the basic role of religion in Israel's foundation is consistent with W.'s general understanding of the contribution of religion to social change. Such change represents a breakthrough within an ongoing historical process of "rationalization," and its agent is the charismatic. The new view introduced by the charismatic is "routinized" by his followers in the creation of law and institutions for the life of the new society. This pattern describes both the origin of Israel and its history up to the emergence of the pariah people. The process in Israel was much influenced by the geographical position of Palestine on the periphery of great powers and by the fact that Palestine is not a homogeneous geographical area within which total control by state bureaucracy was possible. Thus, at a time of crisis in world politics, free religious prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) could arise with questions to put to their situation. Drawing on the old covenant ethic handed down by levitical teachers, these prophets represented a charismatic breakthrough to new religious perceptions. Their ethical teaching with its emphasis on humility and absolute obedience as the only mode of relationship to God was routinized in the teaching of the priests and led to the emergence of the postexilic pariah community.

Works: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie 1–3 (1920–21); Gesammelte politische Schriften (1921); Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft (1922); Gesammelte Aufstäze zur Sozial und Wirtschaftsgeschichte (1924); Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Soziologie und Sozialpolitik (1924); The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (ET 1930); The Theory of Social and Economic Organization (ET 1947); From M. W.: Essays in Sociology (ET, ed. H. H. Gerth and G. W. Mills, 1946); M. W. on the Methodology of the Social Sciences (ET 1949); Ancient Judaism (ET 1952); The Sociology of Religion (ET 1963); Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology 1–3 (1968).

Bibliography: R. Aron, Main Currents in Sociological Thought 2 (1967). R. Bendix, M. W.: An Intellectual Portrait (1960). R. Collins, Three Sociological Traditions (1985). T. Fahey, "M. W.'s Ancient Judaism," AJS 88 (1982) 62-87. A. Giddens, Capitalism and Modern Social Theory: An Analysis of the Writings of Marx, Durkheim and M. W. (1971). J. Guttmann, "M. W.s Soziologie des antiken Judentums," MGWJ 69 (1925) 195-223. H. F. Hahn, The OT in Modern Research (1954). P. Honigsheim, "M. W.: His Religious and Ethical Background and Development," CH 19 (1950) 219-39. B. Lang, "M. W. und Israels Propheten: Eine kritische Stellungnahme," ZRGG 36 (1984) 156-65. K. Lowith, M. W. and K. Marx (1982). D. G. MacRae, Max Weber (1974). A. D. H. Mayes, The OT in Sociological Perspective (1989). E. W. Nicholson, God and His People: Covenant and Theology in the OT (1986) 37-44. R. A. Nisbet, The Sociological Tradition (1966). T. Parsons, "The Theoretical Development of the Sociology of Religion," JHI 5 (1944) 176-90. C. S. Rodd, "M. W. and Ancient Judaism," SJT 32 (1979) 457-69. C. Schafer-Lichtenberger, Stadt und Eidgenossenschaft im Alten Testament: Eine Auseinandersetzung mit M. W. Studie "Das antike Judentum" (BZAW 156, 1983). W. Schluchter, M. W.s Studie über das antike Judentum: Interpretation und Kritik (1981); (ed.) M. W.s Sicht des antiken Christentums (1985). W. Schottroff, "Soziologie und Altes Testament," VF 19 (1974) 45-66. S. Talmon, "The Emergence of Jewish Sectarianism in the Early Second Temple Period," Ancient Israelite Religion (ed. P. D. Miller et al., 1987) 587-616 = his King, Cult, and Calendar in Ancient Israel (1986) 165-201. J. J. R. Thomas, "Ideology and Elective Affinity," Sociology 19 (1985) 39-54. R. R. Wilson, Sociological Approaches to the OT (1984). D. H. Wrong, Skeptical Sociology (1976).

A. D. H. MAYES

WEINEL, HEINRICH (1874–1936)

Born Apr. 29, 1874, in Vonhausen (Hesse), W. studied Protestant theology at Giessen and at Berlin, where he was decisively influenced by Ritschlianism (see A. RITSCHL) and history-of-religion teachers (see RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE). After completing his inaugural dissertation in NT studies in 1899 in Berlin, he became a Dozent and inspector in the Protestant theological seminary in Bonn (1900) and was appointed to the faculty in Jena in NT (1904), changing to systematic theology in 1925. He died Sept. 29, 1936.

W. was a representative of the controversial "modern" critical theology that sought to make its findings accessible to laypersons in order to win them to a "true Christianity" corresponding to JESUS' ideal of discipleship. This goal is reflected in many of W.'s popular treatises and publications. He left an impression both through his writing and through his piety and concern for social and peace-related issues.

As an NT scholar W. sought to combine Ritschlian concerns and history-of-religions research, viewing Christianity in a rigorous and consistent fashion as a religion (1906, 1911, 1928[4]). He understood theology as the "ordering of experienced human ideals into a methodically organized world view" and as the "discussion between the religious inner life and the current world view" consciously open to the latest scientific methodologies. Religion concerns the inner life, but W. distinguished between "passive religion" (the feeling of infinity and of the mysteriously living element within and around us) and "actual religion" (the driving force of our lives). He extracted the following morphology of religion from factual elements of historical religions, including Christianity: faith in God, valuation of the world, ethos or conscious ideals of human beings and human community, and the relationships between these various characteristics. He also distinguished between lower (polytheistic) and higher (monotheistic) religions. The religion of salvation (defined as the overcoming of suffering and guilt) is considered the highest religion.

Thus NT THEOLOGY, emphatically oriented toward the Bible (not toward dogmatic doctrinal concepts), is conceived as the comparison of Christianity with other religions for the sake of revealing its essence. In the process, Jesus is revealed as the bringer of the ethical religion of salvation (a view relativizing any NT tendency toward an eschatological religion of salvation and rejecting signs of a mystical, aesthetic-sacramental religion of salvation), and the essential concern of the NT is revealed as "ethical life in God in his saving power" (see A. von Harnack [1912] 177). Jesus' uniqueness is his faith—determined by steadfast expectation of the coming of the kingdom of God—in knowing the will of God and God's demands on human beings. As an example of life "full of the power of conscious humanity," Jesus brought a new ethos: the conviction that human beings, with faith in a Father in heaven, can be pure in heart and even love their enemies. Yet even PAUL departed from this ethos and, by accommodating it to customary notions, altered it.

W.'s interpretation of the NT as the expression of an "empathetic re-experience" found no direct heirs. It was, however, a striking attempt to inquire intensively into the specific elements of NT concerns and to articulate those concerns in appropriate categories, although the categories and the criteria chosen are problematical and limit W.'s significance as an NT interpreter.

Works: Die Wirkungen des Geistes und der Geister im nachapostolischen Zeitalter bis auf Irenäus (1899); Die Bildersprache Jesu in ihrere Bedeutung für die Erforschung seines inneren Lebens (1900); "Die Gleichnisse Jesu: Zugleich eine Anleitung zu einem quellenmässigen Verständnis der Evangelien," Aus Natur und Geisteswelt 46 (1904, 1929[5]); Jesus im neunzehnten Jahrhundert 1904, 1914[3]); "Paulus, Der Mensch und sein Werk: Die Anfänge des Christentums, der Kirche, und des Dogmas," Lebensfragen 3 (1904, 1915[2]); "Die moderne Theologie," Deutsche Monatsschrift für das gesamte Leben der Gegenwart 6 (1906) 173-83; "Ibsen, Björnson, Nietzsche: Individualismus und Christentum," Lebensfragen 20 (1908); Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments: Die Religion Jesu und des Urchristentums (1911, 1928[4]); "Jesus," Die Klassiker der Religion 1 (1912); "Die Bergpredigt: Ihr Aufbau, ihr ursprünglicher Sinn und ihre Echtheit, ihre Stellung in der Religionsgeschichte, und ihre Bedeutung für die Gegenwart," Aus Natur und Geisteswelt 710 (1920).

Bibliography: W. Bousset, "W., H.: Biblische Theologie des NT," TLZ 36 (1912) 325-32. A. von Harnack, "W.s Biblische Theologie des NT," ChW 26 (1912) 177-79. K. Heussi, Geschichte der Theologischen Fakultät zu Jena (1954). H. Räisänen, Beyond NT Theology (1990) 20-21. K. Steiner, "H. W.s Jesusbild" (diss., Jena, 1971), with bibliography; "H. W. zum 60. Geburtstag," Freie Volkskirche 9 (1934) 71-84.

C. BERGER

WEISER, ARTUR (1893–1978)

W. was born Nov. 18, 1893, in Karlsruhe, Germany, and in 1922 completed his habilitation in OT at the University of Heidelberg under G. Beer. He taught there as a Privatdozent and after 1928 as an ausserordentlicher professor, at the same time serving as pastor of the Baden Landeskirche in Gaiberg. In 1930 he accepted a call as OT professor at Tübingen, where he taught until his retirement in 1962. He died Aug. 5, 1978.

In W.'s early years his research focused on the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB). He stressed that every prophet is to be considered for his own sake and each prophetic book understood individually in order to highlight the distinctive quality of the prophet's religious thought. For W., prophets were more men of words than of the text, since their words resulted from the living events of their time and could only be understood through history. W. developed this picture of the prophets in his still influential work on Amos (1929) as well as in his commentaries on Jeremiah and on the Minor Prophets in the ATD series.

In addition to the prophets, W. worked intensely on TRADITION- and cultic-historical research on Psalms. He pursued his interest along the lines of P. VOLZ and S. MOWINCKEL, emphasizing the development of traditions brought to light in the psalms and in the history of the HB cult that preserved these traditions. The cult was for him the foundation of HB psalm POETRY: The majority of the psalms derive from the festival cults of the tribal confederation, integrally connected with the Yahweh covenant festival observed at the autumn new year. W. described this festival as a sacred, continually repeated meeting of God (actio dei) with his people (reactio hominum), with the aim of renewing the Sinai covenant. At its center stood the celebration of God's theophany involving God's self-predication, recapitulation of salvation history, declaration of God's will, acts of covenant renewal, renunciation of foreign gods, and judgment on Israel and on foreign nations (see W.'s Psalms commentary).

W. was always interested in theological questions regarding the HB, especially in questions concerning the relationship of faith and history. He stressed that history influences the formation of faith and that faith must be recognized as a historically formative factor. History is inconceivable without an all-encompassing faith in God because such faith invests the events at their very outset with meaning and connection. The major elements of the HB conception of history are confidence in the historical rule of God, in election, and in covenant as well as in the law. W. understood the theological significance of the HB only from the foundation of historical-critical work, to which he assigned the tasks both of understanding the development of faith in light of its historical background and making God's word accessible. For him, historical-critical work on the HB was possible only within the church because theological understanding is by necessity grounded in faith.

In his later years W. turned his attention to the early history of Israel; his investigation of Samuel is most noteworthy (1962). He understood Samuel as a mediator between the people and God whose task was to unite the people's desire for a king, which grew out of historical necessity, with the axiom of Yahweh's exclusive reign. The crowning glory of Samuel's work was the successful incorporation of the Israelite monarchy into the framework of the traditional Yahwistic faith.

Works: Die Bedeutung des Alten Testments für den Religionsunterricht (1925); Religion und Sittlichkeit der Genesis in ihrem Verhältnis zur alttestamentlichen Religionsgeschichte (1928); Die Profetie des Amos (BZAW 53, 1929); Glaube und Geschichte im Alten Testament (BWANT 4, 1931); Die Psalmen (ATD 14.15, 1935, 1979[9]; ET, OTL, 1962); Die theologische Aufgabe der alttestamentlichen Wissenschaft (1935); Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1939; ET, Introduction to the OT [1961]); Das Buch der zwölf kleinen Propheten 1 (ATD 24, 1949, 1979[7]); Klagelieder (ATD 24, 1949); Das Buch Hiob (ATD 13, 1951, 1980[7]); Das Buch des Propheten Jeremia (ATD 20.21, 1, 1951, 1981[8]; 2, 1955, 1982[7]); Glaube und Geschichte im Alten Testament und andere ausgewählte Schriften (1961); Samuel (FRLANT 81, 1962).

Bibliography: O. Kaiser, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (1984[5]). A. S. Kapelrud, NTT 80 (1979) 1:55. H.-J. Kraus, GHKEAT. E. Würthwein, "Amos Studien," Wort und Existenz (1970) 68-110. E. Würthwein and O. Kaiser (eds.), Tradition and Situation: Studien zur alttestamentlichen Prophetie. A. W. zum 70. Gerburtstag am 18.11.1963 (1963).

H.-D. NEEF

WEISS, BERNHARD (1827–1918)

Born in Königsberg, Germany, in 1827, W. was educated at the universities of Königsberg, Halle, and Berlin and in 1852 became Dozent at Königsberg, where in 1857 he was promoted to ausserordentlicher professor in NT. He later served as professor of NT at Keil (1863–77) and Berlin (1877–1908).

W. was a transitional figure in German NT studies, aware of and committed to critical-historical exegesis but advocating the historical veracity of the NT and the reliability of traditional claims of authorship paralleling those of orthodox ecclesial authorities. This perspective is seen in his attitude toward the Tübingen school. Although he was extremely critical of the historical decisions proposed by F. C. BAUR and the school, which he perceived as unnecessarily radical, W. recognized that Baur correctly understood NT studies as an essentially historical enterprise and concurred in maintaining that biblical THEOLOGY should be a consistently historical discipline: Conditioned by their authors and by the historical circumstances in which they were written, biblical materials resulted from forces operative within the emerging church. Thus the unity of the NT could be found, not in a basic and universally accepted orthodoxy, but in the diverse expressions of God's saving action expressed through JESUS. Although W.'s construction was not as radical as Baur's, it shows by its reliance on historical analysis and reconstructed history that he followed the Tübingen school in method if not in detail.

Moreover, following J. P. GABLER, W. argued that biblical theology should be a scientific representation of the ideas and doctrines of the NT and not simply a compendium of its texts. Therefore, biblical theology could not allow dogmatic theology to control either its process or its findings. By asserting its independence, biblical theology demonstrated the varied nature of the NT expressions, allowing them to come to the fore and avoiding the unifying procedures that plagued most efforts controlled by dogmatic categories.

W. was an extremely prolific author, publishing commentaries on the Gospels and critical editions of the NT in both Greek and German and assuming responsibility for critical editions of commentaries on Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Romans, Hebrews, the PASTORAL LETTERS, and the JOHANNINE LETTERS in the MeyerK series. He also published a life of Jesus (which A. Schweitzer classified as one of the liberal lives). Finally, the designation Q for the common source of Matthew and Luke may have originated with him. Writing to counter a British tradition that held D. Robinson to be the originator, W. HOWARD cited a reference in Studien und Kritiken (1891) suggesting that W. used the term long before Robinson.

Works: Biblical Theology of the NT (2 vols., 1868; ET 1882–83); The Life of Christ (1882; ET 1883); A Manual Introduction to the NT (1886; ET 1887); A Commentary on the NT (4 vols., 1902; ET 1906); The Religion of the NT (1903; ET 1905). Commentaries in the MeyerK series: Matthew (1883^7, 1911^{10}); Mark (1878^6, 1901^9); Luke (1878^6, 1892^8); John (1880^6, 1902^9); Romans (1881^6, 1899^9); Hebrews (1885^5, 1897^6); Timothy and Titus (1886^5, 1902^7); Johannine Letters (1885^5, 1894^6).

Bibliography: A. Deissmann, TBl 6 (1927) 241-51. W. F. Howard, "The Origin of the Symbol Q," ExpTim 50 (1938–39) 379-80. W. Kümmel, NTHIP, 172-73. H. O. Metzger, RGG^{3} 6 (1957) 1582. W. Scheffen (ed.), Zum Gedächtnis von D. Dr. B. W. (1918).

S. J. KRAFTCHICK

WEISS, JOHANNES (1863–1914)

The son of NT scholar B. WEISS, W. was born in Kiel, Germany, educated at the universities of Marburg, Berlin, Göttingen, and Breslau (1882–88), and served as Dozent at Göttingen in 1888 and ausserordentlicher professor in 1890. He was a full professor in Marburg from 1895 and in Heidelberg from 1908 until his untimely death Aug. 24, 1914. He was the son-in-law of A. RITSCHL, under whom he had studied in Göttingen. W. was a member of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE; like others in the school, much of his work was a critical response to the liberalism of Ritschlian thought, but also to his father's conservative work on the NT. W. published widely in the area of NT exegesis, including works on the SYNOPTIC Gospels, PAUL, and the history of early Christianity, and edited a highly successful series (Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments [1906–7], later edited by W. BOUSSET and W. HEITMÜLLER) that presented the results of critical scholarship in a form accessible to the broader public.

W. is best known for his work on the kingdom of God in the preaching of JESUS (1892; 1900^2 contains W.'s response to critics), which is marked by its strong argument for the eschatological nature of Jesus' preaching: Jesus referred to the kingdom of God, not as the individual or corporate ethical concepts W.'s contemporaries thought important, but as real territory in which the reign of God would be evident. Jesus viewed himself as initiating the future reign of God through his role as a ransom for the sins of the world. Only after this role was fulfilled could the Kingdom come in its full manifestation. Thus W. dialogued with and refuted the efforts of liberal theology to incorporate the thought of early Christianity into a universal truth or ethic. He argued that by not recognizing the strong eschatological nature of Jesus' preaching, its radical dualism and end-time orientation, and Jesus' belief that his death was a necessary part of this schema, liberal theology had mistaken its own conceptions for those of Jesus.

However, the eschatological form of the proclamation marks Jesus off from his followers both past and present. Not directly applicable to subsequent generations of Christians, the distinguishing characteristic of Jesus' preaching is unusable unless it is reinterpreted. In order to use the preaching of Jesus, the church, from the first followers to the present, must employ some form of hermeneutical appropriation. This principle guided W.'s historical examination of the Gospel materials, in which one perceives the beginnings of FORM CRITICISM applied to the NT. His attempts at modern interpretation and appropriation of the NT, however, differed only slightly from those of the liberal movement. In his view, the thought of Jesus was normative only insofar as it supported the ethical and religious fellowship of humanity. Thus in theological formulation W. remained consonant with his forebears; he separated from them in disallowing a historical link between contemporary conceptions of the kingdom of God and those held by Jesus.

W.'s position is reflected consistently in his commentaries. It culminates in his articles on the task of exegesis and in initial volumes on the history of primitive Christianity, completed after his death by R. Knopf, which show W.'s recognition of early Christianity as a religious, rather than an economic or social, movement. His resistance to taking Christianity out of its historical milieu marks him as a forerunner of much contemporary exegesis and makes his work a turning point in discussions of NT HERMENEUTICS and THEOLOGY later reflected in the work of A. SCHWEITZER, his pupil R. BULTMANN, and E. KÄSEMANN.

Works: Der Barnabas Brief kritisch untersucht (1888); Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1892, 1900^2; ET of first ed. 1971, with bibliography of W.'s major writings, 138-42); Luke (MeyerK, 1892); Beiträge zur paulinischen Rhetorik (1897); Das älteste Evangelium: Ein Beitrag zum Verständnis des Markus-Evangeliums und der ältesten evangelischen Überlieferung (1903); Die Offenbarung des Johannes (FRLANT 3, 1903); Die Aufgaben der neutestamentlichen Wissenschaft in der Gegenwart (1908); Der erste Korintherbrief (MeyerK, 1910); "Literaturgeschichte des N.T.s," RGG^3 (1912) 2175-2215; The History of Primitive Christianity (2 vols., 1914; ET 1937).

Bibliography: R. Bultmann, "J. W. zum Gedächtnis," TBl 18 (1939) 242-46. C. Brown, HHMBI, 531-35. F. C. Burkitt, "J. W.: In Memoriam," HTR 8 (1915) 291-97. F. C. Grant, preface to the Torchbook ed. of Primitive Christianity reissued as Earliest Christianity: A History of the Period AD 30–150 (1959) 1:i-vi. R. Hiers and D. L. Holland, "Introduction," Jesus' Proclamation of the Kingdom of God (1971) 1-54. D. L. Holland "History, Theology, and the Kingdom of God: A Contribution of J. W. to Twentieth-century Theology," BR 13 (1968) 54-66. W. Kümmel, NTHIP (1972) 226-30, 276-81. B. Lannert Die Wiederentdeckung der Neutestamentlichen Eschatologie durch J. W. (1989). G. Lüdemann and M. Schröder, Die religionsgeschichtliche Schule: Eine Dokumentation (1989) 88-89. F. Regner, "J. W.: 'Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes' gegen eine theologiegeschichtliche fable convenue," ZKG 4 (1973) 82-92.

S. J. KRAFTCHICK

WEISSE, CHRISTIAN HERMANN (1801–66)

Born Oct. 8, 1801, in Leipzig, Germany, W. initially studied jurisprudence, then philosophy, art, and literature. In 1828 he became ausserordentlicher professor and in 1845 full professor of philosophy, although he withdrew from university life between 1828 and 1837 to pursue philological-historical, philosophical, and theological studies. As a consequence of his 1838 work, indirectly prompted by D. F. STRAUSS, the theological faculty in Jena bestowed on W. an honorary theological doctorate. His inaugural dissertation in Leipzig (1847) dealt with LUTHER's christology; in the same year his inaugural dissertation in philosophy dealt with Plato. In keeping with W.'s varied interests, the main focus of his work has been described as the reconciliation of Christianity and education. In NT scholarship his name is inextricably bound to the establishment of the two source theory regarding the origins of the SYNOPTIC Gospels. In addition to the priority of Mark already postulated by K. LACHMANN, W. referred to a written collection of sayings as a source available to Matthew and Luke, although he left the question open as to whether it was composed in Aramaic or Greek (Evangelische Geschichte [1838] 1:83). In his 1856 book he again took a position on the question of exegesis of the Synoptics.

Works: Die evangelische Geschichte, kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet (2 vols., 1838); Die Evangelienfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigen Stadium (1856).

Bibliography: ADB 41 (1896) 590-94. M. Horstmeier, Die Idee der Persönlichkeit bei I. H. Fichte und C. H. W. (1930). K. Leese, Philosophie und Theologie in Spätidealismus (1929). R. Seydel, Christian Hermann Weisse (1866).

F. W. HORN

WELCH, ADAM CLEGHORN (1864–1943)

Born in Jamaica of Scottish missionary parents, W. was raised in Scotland following his parents' death in 1870. Educated at Edinburgh University, the United Presbyterian Hall, and Erlangen University, he served in pastoral ministry for a number of years (and wrote his first book—on Anselm) before being called to the chair of Hebrew and OT exegesis at New College, Edinburgh, in 1913, largely in recognition of his 1911–12 Kerr lectures (pub. 1912). He retired in 1934.

W. was an impressive teacher. Some of his finest work remains the legacy of his lectures on HB characters and religion, which showed his exegetical abilities to best advantage, and in which he sought to integrate the different strands of religious life in ancient Israel frequently polarized by other scholars. Nevertheless, he is most widely known for his advocacy of minority critical opinions and in particular for his opposition to the standard views on the date and setting of Deuteronomy. Believing that centralization was not a cornerstone of the deuteronomic law, he argued that the origins of Deuteronomy should be traced to the days of Samuel and that the book owed much to its development in the northern (Ephraimite) kingdom; the latter opinion has featured more prominently in more recent work. Similarly, in his work on Chronicles he anticipated some later lines of research (though for completely different reasons) by arguing for its separation from Ezra and Nehemiah and its early (6th cent.) date.

W.'s views seem extreme, which may be why his work has not received the attention it deserves. Few of his conclusions have been adopted in the form or for the reasons he advocated, but he had an eye for material that did not fit into the dominant critical theories of his day. Consequently, many scholars since have found great stimulation in reading his work and in seeking to integrate his observations into more palatable reconstructions of their own. It is thus not surprising to find that a number of his opinions (sometimes unacknowledged) have since been actively developed.

Works: Anselm and His Work (1901); The Religion of Israel Under the Kingdom (1912); Visions of the End: A Study in Daniel and Revelation (1922); The Code of Deuteronomy: A New Theory of Its Origin (1924); The Psalter in Life, Worship, and History (1926); Jeremiah: His Time and His Work (1928); Deuteronomy: The Framework to the Code (1932); Post-exilic Judaism (1935); Prophet and Priest in Old Israel (1936); The Work of the Chronicler: Its Purpose and Its Date (1939); Kings and Prophets of Israel (ed. N. E. Porteus, 1952).

Bibliography: G. S. Gunn, "A. C. W.: A Memoir of His Life," Kings and Prophets of Israel (A.C. Welch, 1952) 13-44.

H. G. M. WILLIAMSON

WELLHAUSEN, JULIUS (1844–1918)

Born May 17, 1844, in Hameln, Germany, W. died Jan. 7, 1918, in Göttingen. He began his study of theology in 1862 at Göttingen, where he received his

lic. theol. in 1870. In 1872 he became full professor in OT on the theological faculty of Greifswald, a position he gave up in 1882 to become Privatdozent in Semitic languages on the philosophic faculty at Halle. Within this discipline he moved to Marburg as full professor in 1885 and to Göttingen in 1892.

W.'s father was an orthodox Lutheran pastor who belonged to a confessional restoration movement. Perhaps in reaction, W. developed a strong sense of independence at an early age that enabled him to work freely, unhindered by traditions and institutions. Although he remained a pious Christian throughout his life, he did not consider his work as a university professor to be a suitable preparation of students for service in the church; hence his move from the faculty of OT to that of Semitic languages. His most important academic teacher was H. EWALD, who broke with him after the 1866 Prussian conquest of Hannover (and Göttingen). Ewald remained committed to the Hannoverian-Welfian cause, while W. was a supporter of Prussia and Bismarck. Moreover, Ewald did not approve of the academic direction W. chose: PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM along the lines laid down by W. DE WETTE, W. VATKE, E. REUSS, K. GRAF, and A. KUENEN, whose work W. would perfect.

Following his early works, among which his study of the text of Samuel (1871) and his treatment of the lively opposition between the Pharisees and Sadducees (1874) are preeminent, he published his 1876/77 work analyzing the composition of the Hexateuch in conjunction with H. HUPFELD's new documentary hypothesis. W. turned the CHRONOLOGY of the hexateuchal documents around in the sense of the Grafian hypothesis. The priestly document (P, which W. designated Q = liber quattuor foederum), heretofore held to be the earliest source, was now considered to presuppose the Babylonian exile, thus to be the latest source. W. spelled out the consequences of this theory for Israelite historiography in his analysis of the books of Judges–Kings in his 1878 revision of the fourth edition of F. BLEEK's introduction: P and Chronicles were not sources for preexilic Israel but, rather, for postexilic Judaism. The law formed the natural break between the two periods: It first emerged as a factor in Deuteronomy and then became formative for Judaism through the further composition of ritual laws in P. Only in the postexilic period, when the law had finally taken shape, did the theocracy emerge as an actual institution; ancient Israel had only known it as an idea. In 1878 W. presented only his source-critical studies and the general starting points for the positive historical reconstruction he published as a "sketch" in 1881 and did not complete until 1894, when he released his Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte. He developed his reconstruction of Israelite and Judean history in close connection with the history of religions and on the basis of the maxim "Yahweh the God of Israel, Israel the people of Yahweh," which he considered the foundation of Israelite national consciousness. His treatment led to JESUS of Nazareth and ended with W.'s own confession of delight in the free development of human individuality, "the noblest individualism, the freedom of the children of God."

W. made the transition to the study of the ancient Arabians "with the intent of becoming familiar with the wild stock onto which the sprig of the torah of Yahweh had been grafted by priests and prophets" (1882, 5). Through his collection and interpretation of the remains of pre-Islamic Arabic religion, he reached ever deeper into the Islamic period, whose sources he investigated for their historical worth and treated down to the end of the Umayyid period. He was stimulated in this work by the Leiden edition of the works of the early tenth-century Muslim historian Tabari (1879–93).

Even in his work on the NT, W. focused on the narrative books, paying particular attention to their Semitic background. He represented the two source hypothesis in his own way in his work on the SYNOPTIC Gospels but at the same time anticipated later FORM CRITICISM as he worked to extricate the earlier individual traditions from their literary contexts. The more he worked, however, the more a recovery of the historical JESUS appeared impossible to him. His secret antipode was the conservative A. von HARNACK; most fruitful, however, was his exchange with E. Schwartz (particularly in the analysis of the Gospel of John). During the last years of his life, W. studied the letters of PAUL but unfortunately was never in a position to bring his work to literary completion.

W. was and is simultaneously the most venerated and the most attacked HB scholar of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Attempts to discredit him as a Hegelian or an antisemite have had no success. His work naturally has its intellectual-historical presuppositions in the nineteenth century and has been modified in many respects by further scholarship (e.g., the opening up of the ancient Near East and form criticism). However, because W. was not only a great scholar but also a great writer, his work has continued to live on as that of no other.

Works: "De gentibus et familiis Judaeis quae 1. Chr. 2.4. enumerantur" (diss., Göttingen, 1870); Der Text der Bücher Samuelis untersucht (1871); Die Pharisäer und die Sadducäer: Eine Untersuchung zur inneren jüdischen Geschichte (1874, 1967[3]); "Die Composition des Hexateuchs," JDTh 21 (1876) 392-450, 531-602; 22 (1877) 407-79; (1899[3], repr. 1963); (rev.), Einleitung in die Heilige Schrift. vol. 1, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (F. Bleek, 1878[4], 1893[6]); Geschichte Israels 1 (1878); "Israel," EncBrit[9] (1881) 13:396-431 (= Sketch of the History of Israel and Juda [1891[3]]); Muhammed in Medina: Das ist Vakidi's Kitab al-Maghazi in verkürzter deutscher Wiedergabe (1882); Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels (2nd ed. of Geschichte Israel 1, 1883, 1905[6]; repr. 1981; ET Prolegomena to the History of Israel [1885; repr. 1957 and subsequently]); Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, vol. 1, Abriss der Geschichte Israels und Judas: Lieder der Hudhailiten (1884, repr. 1985); vol. 2, Die Composition des Hexateuchs (1885); vol. 3, Reste arabischen Heidentums (1887, 1897[2], repr. 1961); vol. 4, Medina vor dem Islam: Muhammads Gemeindeordnung von Medina. Seine Schreiben und die Gesandtschaften an ihn (1889, repr. 1985); vol. 5, Die Kleinen Propheten (1892, 1898[3], repr. 1963); vol. 6, Prolegomena zur ältesten Geschichte des Islams: Verschiedenes (1899, repr. 1985); "Pentateuch and Joshua," EncBrit[9] 18 (1885) 505-14; Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte (1894, 1914[7], repr. 1981); The Book of Psalms (SBOT 14, 1895); Der arabische Josippus (AGWG.PH 1, 4, 1897); The Book of Psalms (SBONT 14, 1898); Ein Gemeinwesen ohne Obrigkeit (1900); Das arabische Reich und sein Sturz (1902, repr. 1960; ET, The Arab Kingdom and Its Fall [1927]); Das Evangelium Marci (1903, 1909[2]); Das Evangelium Lucae (1904); Das Evangelium Matthaei (1904); Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien (1905, 1911[2]); "Israelitisch-jüdische Religion," Geschichte der christlichen Religion (Die Kulture der Gegenwart, ed. P. Hinneberg, 1, 4, 1, 1905) 1-40; Analyse der Offenbarung Johannis (AGWG.PH 9, 4, 1907); Das Evangelium Johannis (1908); Kritische Analyse der Apostelgeschichte (AGWG.PH 15, 2, 1914); Grundrisse zum Alten Testament (ed. R. Smend, TBü 27, 1965); Evangelienkommentar (repr. of his works on the Gospels, with intro. by M. Hengel, 1987). Further bibliography to 1914 in Studien zur semitischen Philologie und Religionsgeschichte (FS J. W., BZAW 27, 1914) 353-68.

Bibliography: E. Bammel, "Judentum, Christentum, und Heidentum: J. W.s Briefe an T. Mommsen, 1881–1902," ZKG 80 (1969) 221-54. J. Barton, "W.'s Prolegomena to the History of Israel: Influences and Effects," Text and Experience: Towards a Cultural Exegesis of the Bible (ed. D. Smith-Christopher, 1995). C. H. Becker, Islam 9 (1918) 95-99 = his Islamstudien 2 (1932, repr. 1967) 474-80. H. D. Betz, "W.'s Dictum 'Jesus was not a Christian, but a Jew,' in Light of Present Scholarship," StTh 45 (1991) 83-110. F. Boschwitz, "J. W.: Motive und Maßstäbe seiner Geschichtsschreibung" (diss., Marburg, 1938, 1968[2]). R. E. Clements, HHMBI, 380-85. O. Eissfeldt, IMW 14 (1920) 193-208, 325-38 = his KS 1 (1962) 56-71. H. Hoffmann, "J. W.: Die Frage des absoluten Maßstäbes seiner Geschichtsschreibung" (diss., Marburg, 1967). W. A. Irwin, "The Significance of J. W.," JBR 12 (1944) 160-73. A. Jepsen, "W. in Greifswald," FS zur 500-Jahrfeier der Universität Greifswald 2 (1956) 47-56 = his Der Herr ist Gott (1978) 254-70. W. Johnstone (ed.), "W. R. Smith and J. W.," William Robertson Smith (1994) 226-42. D. A. Knight (ed.), J. W. and His Prolegomena to the History of Israel (Semeia 25, 1983, with contributions by B. S. Childs, N. A. Dahl, J. H. Hayes, D. A. Knight, P. D. Miller, K. Rudolph, L. H. Silberman, and R. Smend); "J. W. and His Prolegomena to the History of Israel," Concordia Journal (1989) 15:382-83. J. C. O'Neill, The Bible's Authority: A Portrait Gallery of Thinkers from Lessing to Bultmann (1991) 198-213. L. Perlitt, Vatke and W. (BZAW 94, 1965). K. Rudolph, W. als Arabist (SSAW.PH 123, 5, 1983). E. Schwartz, "Rede auf J. W.," NGWG (Geschäftliche Mitteilungen, 1918) 43-73 = his GS 1 (1938, 1963[2]) 326-61. R. Smend, TPNZJ (1978) 166-80 = his DATDJ (1989) 99-113; "W. in Greifswald," ZTK 78 (1981) 141-76; "W. und das Judentum," ZTK 79 (1982) 249-82 = his Epochen der Bibelkritik (GS 3, BEvT 109, 1991) 186-215; "W. in Göttingen," Theologie in Göttingen (Göttinger Universitätsschriften A 1, ed. B. Moeller, 1987) 306-24; "W. und die Kirche," Wissenschaft und Kirche (FS E. Lohse, TAzB 4, ed. K. Aland and S. Meurer, 1989) 225-31. J. Timmer, "J. W. and the Synoptic Gospels" (diss., Amsterdam, 1970).

R. SMEND

WENDT, HANS HINRICH (1853–1928)

Born June 18, 1853, in Hamburg, Germany, W. studied Protestant theology at Liepzig under Franz DELITZSCH; at Göttingen; and at Tübingen under J. BECK, where W. received his PhD in 1876 under C. Sigwart. He became a follower of A. RITSCHL at Göttingen, completing his inaugural dissertation in 1877. In 1881 he became an ausserordentlicher professor at Göttingen and in 1883 a full professor at Kiel. In 1885 he moved to Heidelberg, and from 1893 to 1925 he was professor of systematic theology at Jena. He died Jan. 19, 1928.

Against initial opposition, W. established Ritschl's theology at Jena in combination with his own research and teaching in systematics and NT. Instead of a rigid scriptural principle, he considered the teachings of JESUS, as historically experienced divine revelation, to be the standard for dogmatic assertions (1886/90, 1901[2]). For him, religion and ethics were inseparable. He considered the center of Christian faith to be neither speculative christology nor mysticism that turns away from the world but, rather, the possibility of genuine morality emerging from freedom of conscience, a morality founded on liberation from the coercion of the world (particularly from the fear of death) effected by Christ and grounded religiously, not rationally.

Eschatology, understood in the JOHANNINE, rather than in the apocalyptic, sense as the teaching of eternal life as an otherworldly purpose of salvation, characterized W.'s doctrine of God. He considered the Johannine writings—especially the letters, a collection of Johannine speeches by Jesus, and John 1:1-18—to be the real center of the NT. W. claimed to trace the basic collection from the Gospel of John through the disciple John back to Jesus, but he used chiefly the Q source to explain the transmission of the ethical teaching of Jesus. W. considered the narrative source of the Fourth Gospel to be a later redaction.

W.'s exegesis of Acts (MeyerK 3, 1880[5]) was the first internally complete historical-critical commentary since F. C. BAUR's time. In the 1899 and 1913 editions he developed a position more critical than that of A. von HARNACK concerning questions of authors and sources. According to W., the author of the "we" sections and that of the overall work are not identical, although Acts offers genuinely useful historical material.

Works: Die Begriffe Fleisch und Geist im biblischen Sprachgebrauch untersucht (1878); Die Apostelgeschichte (MeyerK 3, 1880[5], 1899[8], 1913[9]); Die christliche Lehre von der menschlichen Vollkommenheit (1882); Die Lehre Jesu, vol. 1, Die evangelischen Quellenberichte über die Lehre Jesu (1886); vol. 2, Der Inhalt der Lehre Jesu (1890, 1901[2]); Das Johannesevangelium: Eine Untersuchung seiner Entstehung und seines geschichtlichen Wertes (1900); System der christlichen Lehre (1907, 1920[2]); Die Schichten im vierten Evangelium (1911); Die Johannesbriefe und das johanneische Christentum (1925).

Bibliography: W. Gasque, A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (BGBE 17, 1975) 102-6. K. Heussi, Geschichte der Theologischen Fakultät zu Jena (1954) 352-62, 371-72, 379. K. Schöppe, "Leben und Werk von H. H. W.," TSK 101 (1929) 421-46. F. Taub, RGG[2] 5 (1931) 1858.

N. WALTER

WESLEY, JOHN (1703–91)

An Anglican clergyman and founder of the Methodist movement, W. was born in England, June 27, 1703, to Samuel and Susannah Wesley. Educated at Oxford and a fellow of Lincoln College, he was influenced by Anglican, patristic, Puritan, non-juror, and Roman Catholic writers. He left Oxford in 1735 for the British colony of Georgia, where he was deeply impressed by the Moravians. Back in England, in 1738–39 he underwent a significant spiritual transition in life and ministry, preaching and publishing extensively and supervising the Methodist revival in Great Britain and North America. He died Mar. 2, 1791.

W. serves as a bridge in the history of biblical interpretation. On the one hand, his conceptions of biblical INSPIRATION and infallibility were completely precritical. He saw no errors in the Bible, understood God to be the Author of Scripture, and felt that to argue with the Bible was to argue with a God who could not lie. On the other hand, his conception of Scripture also pointed the way toward modern interpretation, both EVANGELICAL and critical.

First, W. held an evangelical view of the wholeness of Scripture. The Bible was a unit whose "scope and tenor" was the analogy of faith, the "grand scheme of doctrine" covering original sin, justification, and sanctification (1764, Rom 12:6). Unclear passages were to be interpreted in light of this theme. Like many of his contemporaries, W. emphasized the plain, literal sense of Scripture unless it led to an apparent contradiction with another passage. This emphasis, combined with his understanding of the analogy of faith, led to some of his most controversial interpretations, e.g., the witness of the Spirit (Rom 8:16) and Christian perfection (Matt 5:48).

Second, W. gave a high value to the role of reason in the interpretation of Scripture. He wrote, "All irrational religion is false religion" (Letters, 5:364). He understood reason as a faculty of the mind active in apprehension, judgment, and discourse (Works, 2:590). Largely ignoring the deistic controversy (see DEISM), he saw reason as an ally to true religion. He acknowledged a fivefold locus of religious AUTHORITY: Scripture, reason, Christian antiquity, the Church of England, and experience. (By Christian antiquity he meant the purest ages of the church, i.e., before the rise of Constantine; by the Church of England he meant the Thirty-nine Articles, the Book of Common Prayer, and the Homilies.) The authority of Scripture was supreme. He desired to be homo unius libri, a man of one book (Works, 1:105). However, his appeals to these five authorities in various combinations are understandable only because he thought they all made the same point.

Third, W. saw the experience of salvation—the growth of the individual from sin to perfection in love—as the goal of Christian teaching. Experience was not sufficient to establish Christian doctrine, but it did confirm it by showing that real people experienced its teachings. Commandments are seen as "covered promises" (Works, 1:554-55) showing both God's expectations and God's activity in individual lives. For W., the Bible was primarily a means of grace given by God to show human beings the way to heaven (Works, 1:105).

Fourth, W.'s TRANSLATION of the NT shows an awareness of the need for TEXTUAL CRITICISM and the modernization of the AV. Using J. BENGEL's Greek text, he made thousands of emendations in his NT translation. Some, notably the use of "happy" in the beatitudes in Matthew 5 and "love" instead of "charity" in 1 Corinthians 13, anticipated the 1881 RV and subsequent translations. Relying on Bengel, J. Guyse (1680–1761), P. Heylyn (1600–1662), and P. DODDRIDGE, W. added short notes to the text aimed at "plain, unlettered men" (Notes, preface).

Works: Explanatory Notes on the Old and NT (4 vols., 1764); The NT, with an Analysis of the Several Books and Chapters (1790); The Letters of J. W. (8 vols., ed. J. Telford, 1931); The Works of J. W. (bicentennial ed., 35 vols., 1975–).

Bibliography: W. Arnett, "J. W.: Man of One Book" (diss., Drew University, 1954). F. Baker, "J. W., Biblical Commentator," BJRL 71 (1989) 110-20. R. M. Casto, "Exegetical Method in J. W.'s Explanatory Notes Upon the OT" (diss., Duke University, 1977). D. S. Ferguson, "J. W. on Scripture: The Hermeneutics of Pietism," MethH 22 (1984) 234-45. R. P.

Heitzenrater, Wesley and the People Called Methodists (1995). S. J. Jones, J. W.'s Conception and Use of Scripture (1995); HHMBI, 385-88. T. C. Oden and R. L. Leiceser, The Wesleyan Theological Heritage: Essays of A. C. Outler (1991). T. L. Smith, "J. W. and the Wholeness of Scripture," Int 39 (1985) 246-62.

S. J. JONES

WESTCOTT, BROOKE FOSS (1825–1901)

Born in Birmingham, England, Jan. 12, 1825, W. attended King Edward VI's School, where he came under the influence of the headmaster, J. Lee. W. received a degree from Trinity College, Cambridge (1848), where he was elected a fellow in 1849 and formed friendships with J. B. LIGHTFOOT and F. HORT. Later serving as professors, the three formed a triumvirate of enormous influence. W. left Cambridge in 1852 to take a position at Harrow School, where during his eighteen-year stay he published several major studies. In 1869 he was appointed canon of Peterborough Cathedral and in 1870 was elected Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. Consecrated bishop of Durham in 1890, he entered into conflicts not usually associated with the office of bishop, e.g., mediating a coal strike. He died July 27, 1901.

In his works on the CANON W. showed a mastery of primary sources and argued his case with careful regard to alternative theories, statistical evidence, and exegetical considerations. Against the Tübingen school he maintained that the canon attests the unity of the church and referred to the apostolic faith as authoritative (1855). Opposing theories of literary dependence, he set out a vigorous defense of the relative independence of the Gospels, maintaining that the oral gospel was remolded according to the requirements of different classes of hearers and that an apostolic gospel shaped to suit the needs of particular evangelists was the natural inference to draw from the interrelationship among the first three Gospels (1860). His understanding of apostolic preaching was not that it constitued an oral phase in transmission superseded by the written word but that the unfolding of JESUS' message by his successors assured that the image of the incarnation would be reflected in the Christian Scriptures. The apostolic faith as the environment and interior self-consciousness of the NT elicits an answering response from believers. W. treated the resurrection both as a historical fact in the perception of Jesus' contemporaries and as a hermeneutical key (see HERMENEUTICS) of human existence.

The Westcott-Hort Greek text of the NT, first published in 1881, continues to be a standard. Although specific judgments, applications of principle, and the range of evidence cited have been revised by subsequent critics, this text carried the day against considerable opposition. W. and Hort rightly argued that readers should not put great weight on what they think an author likely to have written or a scribe likely to have mistaken. Primary attention must be given to the character of witnesses attesting a variant. In order to characterize the manuscripts and trace their histories, W. and Hort grouped them into families. The Antiochian or Syrian texts, a harmonious and relatively homogeneous family, accorded with quotations of the fathers during the latter part of the fourth century and were precursers of the textus receptus of the Middle Ages. Earlier text families were an Alexandrian and a Western family and a Neutral group mediating between the two. The Neutral family became W. and Hort's preference against the paraphrastic character of the Western text and the scribal corrections of the Alexandrian.

The Gospel of John and the Letter to the Hebrews each occupied a special place in W.'s interests and affections. His commentaries on them as well as his commentary on the JOHANNINE LETTERS grew out of public lectures. W.'s writing was more convoluted than even the Victorian norm, and his qualifications sometimes threatened to overcome the gist of his theses. But he understood the work of an exegete to include, together with the elucidation of texts, an account of what is—in the proper sense—revealed in them.

Works: A General Survey of the History of the Canon of the NT (1855); An Introduction to the Study of the Gospels with Historical and Explanatory Notes (1860); The Bible in the Church (1864); The Gospel of the Resurrection: Thought on Its Relation to Reason and History (1866); A General View of the History of the English Bible (1868); The Paragraph Psalter (1879); (with F. J. A. Hort), The NT in the Original Greek (2 vols., 1881); The Gospel According to St. John (1882); The Epistles of St. John (1883); Christus Consummator (1886); Social Aspects of Christianity (1887); The Victory of the Cross (1888); The Epistle to the Hebrews (1889); The Gospel of Life: Thoughts Introductory to the Study of Christian Doctrine (1892); The Incarnation and the Common Life (1893).

Bibliography: C. K. Barrett, W. as Commentator (1959). H. Chadwick, The Vindication of Christianity in W.'s Thought (1961). O. Chadwick, W. and the University (1963). C. L. Church, HHMBI, 389-94. J. Clayton, Bishop W. (1906). D. Newsome, Bishop W. and the Platonic Tradition (1969). F. T. Olofsson, Christus redemptor et consummator: A Study in the Theology of B. F. W. (1979). V. H. Stanton, DNB 2nd sup. 3 (1912) 635-41. A. Westcott (son), Life and Letters of . . . W. (2 vols., 1903), with bibliography, 2:441-48.

B. CHILTON

WESTERMANN, CLAUS (1909–)

Born Oct. 7, 1909, in Berlin, W. was the son of a professor of African studies. As a young pastor, W.'s theological perspective and scholarly passion were formed and nurtured through the German church crisis. Completing his studies at Zürich with a dissertation on the praise of God in the psalms, he began his teaching career at the Kirchliche Hochschule in Berlin. He eventually became a distinguished member of the post-WWII circle of German HB scholars (which included G. von Rad, M. Noth, W. Zimmerli, H.-J. Kraus, and H. W. Wolff) who conceived the magisterial BKAT and for several decades dominated much of HB scholarship through their scholarly imagination and theological passion. W.'s career culminated in a long and prolific tenure at the University of Heidelberg beginning in 1958, where he was the colleague of von RAD, WOLFF, and R. Rendtorff. From a methodological perspective, he is the primary heir of the work of H. GUNKEL, both in his commitment to a rigorous form-critical approach (see FORM CRITICISM) and in his sustained attention to Genesis and the psalms. Because of his commitment to the faith and ministry of the church, however, W. regularly has pushed beyond Gunkel's form-critical concerns to the theological issues present in the text.

While his research and publications cover every area of HB literature, W. is best known for work in four areas. (1) His exhaustive commentary on Genesis, which takes full account of form-critical issues as well as Near Eastern parallels while moving in the direction of narrative theology, now stands as a major reference point for all subsequent work. (2) As a German prisoner of war with only a copy of the psalms and no secondary literature at hand, W. wrote the RHETORICAL-critical analysis of the psalms of praise and lament that is now the assumed consensus among many scholars. He has shown that the psalms characteristically move from an acute crisis (plea) to a resolution in faith (praise) and established that this single rhetorical pattern is decisive for most of the psalms, which voice only elements of the pattern, as well as decisive for the faith of Israel. (3) His commentary on Isaiah 40–66 is one of the most widely used commentaries both in Europe and in the English-speaking world, a model of sober judgment, attention to detail, and theological sensitivity. (4) In an attempt to move beyond the theological models of W. EICHRODT and von Rad, W. was among the first to articulate a model of theology around a polarity that holds together two quite distinctive emphases. Alongside the regnant interpretive power of "deliverance in history," he has placed "blessing in creation" as a way of thinking about God's rule that is not intrusive or confined to Israel. Thus he has provided an interpretive frame for subsequent attention to "creation" as a system of blessing, a theme congenial to contemporary concern for the environment.

Works: The Praise of God in the Psalms (1953; ET 1965); A Thousand Years and a Day (1957; ET 1962, 1964²); The Psalms: Structure, Content, and Message (1959; ET 1980); Basic Forms of Prophetic Speech (1960, 1964²; ET 1967); (ed.), Essays on OT Interpretation (1960; ET 1963); Forschung am Alten Testament: Gesammelte Studien (TBü 24, 1964); Isaiah 40–66 (1966; ET 1969); Blessing in the Bible and the Life of the Church (1968; ET 1978); The OT and Jesus Christ (1968; ET 1971); Forschung am Alten Testament: Gesammelte Studien II (TBü 55, 1974), with bibliography, 319-26; Genesis: A Commentary (3 vols., 1974–82; ET 1984–86); The Promises to the Fathers: Studies on the Patriarchal Narratives (1976; ET 1979); Praise and Lament in the Psalms (1977⁵; ET 1981); The Structure of the Book of Job: A Form-critical Analysis (1977; ET 1981); Elements of OT Theology (1978; ET 1982); Sprache und Struktur der Prophetie Deuterojesajas (1981); Erträge der Forschung am Alten Testament (TBü 73, 1984); The Living Psalms (1984; ET 1989); Genesis: A Practical Commentary (1986; ET 1987); Prophetic Oracles of Salvation in the OT (FRLANT 145, 1987; ET 1991); Lamentations: Issues and Interpretation (1990; ET 1994); Roots of Wisdom: The Oldest Proverbs of Israel and Other People (1990; ET 1995); "The Bible and the Life of Faith: A Personal Reflection," WW 13 (1993) 337-44; Die Geschichtsbücher des ATs: Gab es ein deuteronomistiches Geschichtswerk? (TBü 87, 1994); Das Johannesevangelium aus der Sicht des ATs (AT 77, 1994); Das mündliche Wort: Erkundungen im AT (AT 82, ed. R. Landau, 1996); (ed. with E. Jenni), Theological Lexicon of the OT (3 vols., 1971; ET 1997); Erzählungen in den Schriften des ATs (AT 86, 1998).

Bibliography: R. Albertz et al. (eds.), Werden und Wirken des Alten Testaments: FS für C. W. zum 70. Geburtstag (1980), with bibliography for 1974–79, 471-73; Schöpfung und Befreiung: Für C. W. zum 80. Geburtstag (1989) 284. J. Limburg, HHMBI, 535-40.

W. BRUEGGEMANN

WESTERN LITERATURE, THE BIBLE AND

In Western European culture the birth of literacy and literature are essentially, not accidentally, coincident with the evangelization of Europe by Christian missionaries. Nor did the influence of the Scripture they brought and translated fade away after a few generations. Indeed, the Bible is so much a foundational text for Western literature that a great deal of it would be unimaginable in its present form without the scriptural precedent. It is for this reason that the critic N. Frye (1912–91) could speak of the intertextual relations and principal literary traditions of Western culture as a kind of secular scripture, the conventions of which the sacred Scripture has in a sense generated (1976).

1. Mediterranean Literary Origins. To be sure, not all Western European literatures share equally in the profundity of this influence. Moreover, Christian literature's indebtedness to the NT is not generally shared by Jewish European literature, although to both Christian and Jewish literature the principal narratives and wisdom literature of the Hebrew scriptures are a wellspring of plot and aphorism, character type and moral precept.

Jewish tradition has since ancient times valued the auxiliary or ancillary narrative as an aid to biblical understanding. Thus Midrashim, stories that cast light on a biblical story that prompts their telling, are a fundamental aspect of Jewish biblical interpretation. JESUS also used such stories to vivify scriptural precept, and his PARABLES were within a recognizable tradition for his audience. But MIDRASH, like the aphoristic maśal (Yid. mushel) that can accompany it, continues as a medieval and even modern technique in Jewish exposition. Hence Western secular literature, owing to a Jewish biblical influence, has characteristic informing strategies drawn from centuries of midrashic narration and apothegm, in which divergent or tangential stories can predictably key for the Jewish reader a central covenant narrative or tenet of Torah, yet in a fashion that often resists analysis by those outside Jewish tradition.

In Christian literary practice, the dominant filter for biblical influence in Western literature, the relation of biblical exposition and fictional narrative is more transparent—that is, there is a more visible interlineation of the two, in which the ancillary narrative labors to provide an explicit analogy. Since later antiquity Christian readers have come to expect the dominant mode of textual relations between the canonical and extra-canonical text (see CANON OF THE BIBLE) to be allegorical, proximate, or near proximate one-to-one relationships by which the secular text can be recognized as a "sign" referring to a given text of the Bible. In this evident proximity the referentiality of Christian allegory is somewhat closer in method to the expository HERMENEUTIC embodied in the relationship of the NT to the HB, the strategies of Christian typology, than is the interrogative subtlety of Jewish midrashic tale-telling to the rabbinic exposition of Torah. Another way of putting the difference might be to say that, whereas the midrashic literature of Judaism preeminently questions the bibical text so as to enrich as intricately as possible the ramifications of the questioning, Christian literature built upon biblical foundations often seeks more obviously to answer a question it takes to be already explicit in the biblical text. Both traditions of extra-canonical narrative are, of course, a species of interpretation of a canonical passage. Yet it is an inherent property of the dominant biblical tradition in Western literature that it is somewhat less subtle in its advertisement of this purpose; accordingly, for purposes of theological controversy and apologetic enterprise, Christian literary reflection can seem to obtrude more demonstratively into the ostensibly secular sphere of literary endeavor.

2. Patristic and Medieval Literary Theory. In fact, according to the most important early Christian theorist of literature—a former teacher of classical rhetoric who became also the single most influential Christian expositor of Scripture—the Christian ought not to make too sanctimonious a scruple about dividing secular from sacred wisdom in any case. Following his teacher AMBROSE, AUGUSTINE averred that all truth is God's truth, wherever it may be found (On Christian Doctrine 2.18.28). Or, as he put it elsewhere in this enormously influential treatise, even the resources of pagan literature, preeminently classical Greek and Roman authors, ought not to be scorned by the good and true Christian but, where found to contain truth, ought to be brought readily into the service of the Scripture to which it is shown to conform. Even as the children of Israel were commanded to take with them out of Egypt the vessels of gold and silver belonging to their captors but to then put them to a holy use, so also ought Christians to appropriate the vessels of secular literature in the holy work of the gospel (On Christian Doctrine 2.40.60). In much the same way JEROME defended his use of classical literature through an exegesis of Deut 21:10-13 that makes classical literature a "beautiful captive" to be "taken into the tent" of the covenant family, there not only to be received with honor but also to become a bride and honored mother.

Augustine's own extensive and approving (though not uncritical) use of Cicero (106–43 BCE) and Virgil (70–19 BCE), his favorite Roman authors, modeled the precept and encouraged imitation. Moreover, the exegetical methods he elaborated in On Christian Doctrine and elsewhere were accordingly approved by subsequent medieval theorists as appropriate to all Christian use of literature. The basic assumption was that the purpose of fiction is to veil truth in such a way as to invite a disclosure, or, however ironic it might seem, an unveiling. Or, as in the figure regularly employed by Augustine, GREGORY THE GREAT, Pseudo-Fulgentius (fl. late 5th cent.), and a host of subsequent theorists, the appeal of fiction is like that of a visually pleasing rind, a husk or chaff surrounding the fruit. When one is in pursuit of nourishment, the outer layer attracts the eye; this is then stripped away to lay bare the intrinsic value. In this way literary texts were held by medieval Christian readers and poets to be inherently, not accidentally, referential. What ought to motivate their interpretation is persistence in referential application of the secular text to Scripture until a "charitable" relationship of the two is established—one in which the purpose of Scripture to teach "the enjoyment of God for his own sake, and the enjoyment of one's self and of one's neighbour for the sake of God" (On Christian Doctrine 3.10.16) is made relevant to the extra-canonical literary work. Valid readings are thus "baptized" readings, ones in which reference proceeds directly from the secular text to the text of the Bible.

In the twelfth century, from which time the exponential growth of Western vernacular literature may be dated, convenient summaries of these earlier ideas about the relationship of the Bible to literature may be found in works as various as HUGH OF ST. VICTOR's famous Didascalicon, a general treatise on education; John of Salisbury's (c. 1115–80) Policraticus, a book on the equipment of wise political leadership; and in the theologian and poet Alanus de Insulis's (c. 1128–1202) poem Anticlaudianus, in which it is "given" to the pedagogue Natura to explain the function of poetry. In the rich twelfth-century outpouring of romance (romans = "of the Romans") literature based on classical epic loosely translated into French (e.g., Aneas, Benoit de St. Maur's [fl. twelfth cent.] Roman de Troie [c. 1184]) offers versions of pagan narrative subjected to charitable Christian interlineation. A crude model for this may be found in Bernard of Silvestris's (fl. c. 1150) Christian allegorization of Virgil's Aeneid, where, for example, the Dido episode is made to parallel both the Edenic fall (Genesis 2–3) and Israel's captivity or even cupiditous entrapment in the city of mammon, Babylon. Romance texts generally, from C. de Troye's (fl. 1170) Erec et Enid to Lazamon's (fl. 12th cent.) and W. Eschenbach's (c. 1170–c. 1220) Arthuriads on to the fourteenth-century English masterpiece Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, make the themes of fallenness, alienation and exile, quest and journey, and testing and triumph typologically analogous to Exodus, among other biblical narratives of exile, pilgrimage, and homecoming.

By the fourteenth century, biblically directed allegorizations of other kinds of classical texts, e.g., the moralizations of Ovid (43 BCE–17 CE), in both Latin and the vernacular (Ovidus Moralizatus of Berchorius [d. 1362]; Ovide Moralisée) help, with a host of other mythographical commentaries (e.g., those of Albericus of London, the "Third Vatican Mythographer"), to expand the repertory of allusion within which biblical influence might shape the writing of widely diversified literary works. In this way, allusion to classical Greek and Roman texts as employed by Dante (1265–1321) in his Vita Nuova, Convivio and Comedia was already contextualized in the scriptural tradition by the time Dante made use of it. He declared this in his guidelines to interpretation (e.g., the famous Epistle to Can Grande della Scala) in which he adduced the fourfold elaboration of medieval allegory by such biblical expositors and theologians as BONAVENTURE (e.g., his De Reductione Artium ad Theologiam) as equally appropriate to his poetry. It may even be claimed, as Bonaventure did, that literary art is uniquely poised to translate the human condition that the illumination of Scripture transforms or, as in the formulations of their Italian countryman the sonneteer Petrarch (1304–74), that, spiritually speaking, poetry is effectually grounded in biblical precedent. In Petrarch's view not only should we read "philosophy, poetry and history so that the gospel of Christ echoes in our hearts . . . [and so that] to it, as to the highest truth, all else is to be referred" (Epistolae de rebus familiaribus 6.2.4) but also we should recognize further that theology itself is a "literary" activity, as Scripture shows: "Is it not enough," he wrote in defense of his writing poetry, "that I affirm theology to be poetry concerning God? To speak of Christ as a lion, lamb, etc. What is this if not poetry? Indeed, how else do the parables of the Saviour in the Gospels operate except, if I may express it in one word, by alieniloquium, which we are accustomed to call 'allegory'? And with words of this kind the whole realm of poetry is clothed" (Epistol. 10.4). If not all of the parables of Jesus are in the medieval Christian sense allegory—existing in a one-to-one analogical relationship to the text—this was not evident to Petrarch and his contemporaries: Enough of them worked in an allegorical way for Petrarch to sustain his apologetic principle.

Both principle and apologetic were, according to this logic, open to certain distortions in practice. In his De Genealogia Deorum Gentilium (14.7), for example, Boccaccio (1313–75) wrote that poetry is a gift of God and that its very genesis lies in sacred Scripture; he also wrote that the writings of the Hebrews, notably the Prophets, were his favorite source. Yet a charitable reading of his own licentious poetry has proven for most readers an unrealizable goal, and in the end many of Boccaccio's best-known poems appear less prophetic than profane.

3. European Biblical Paraphrase and Free Translation. In all Western countries there was, of course, a more direct and, in general, theoretically unmediated influence of the Bible on literature. The typical form was loose vernacular paraphrase, lyric, or dramatic retellings of biblical narrative. English literature, for example, can be properly said to begin with such poetry. The Venerable BEDE's story of Caedmon (fl. 658–80), the illiterate cowherd who is miraculously given the gift of poetry and immediately writes, not a pagan epic, but a poem on creation, is metonymic for the genesis of European vernacular literature in written form. Missionaries brought literacy, and their stories from the Bible radically transformed the native stock of story.

Among the best-known examples of loose biblical paraphrase are the fourteenth- to fifteenth-century vernacular passion plays or the French and English Corpus Christi cycles of such cities as York, Wakefield, and Chester. These are pageants of the whole historia humanae salvationis from creation to doomsday, the last judgment. In them the biblical narratives basic to the plan of redemption (as represented in the lections of the medieval Christian liturgical year) are adeptly, often powerfully, fleshed out and dramatized in such a way that illiterate audiences could acquire a general narrative knowledge of the Bible. Paradigm narratives of alienation, discord, and loss of community (Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, Noah and his family) are typically succeeded in these cycles by highlights of the covenant story, especially Abraham and Isaac, sometimes Moses and Pharaoh, a "procession of prophets" (ordo prophetarum) in which, as also in the twelfth-century Anglo-Norman Jeu D'Adam, the messianic promise is declared. Then follow the gospel stories of the annunciation, the birth of John the Baptist, nativity, shepherds and magi, Herod's slaughter of the innocents, elements of the life and ministry of Jesus, his crucifixion, harrowing of hell (based on the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus), resurrection, the events of Pentecost recorded in the Acts, and, typically, a last judgment play based on Matthew 24–25 and Revelation. Apocalyptic themes, like those exemplified in the twelfth-century Bavarian Ludus de Antichristo, bring the influence of the book of Daniel especially to bear on some of the European cycles.

These plays were supplemented by morality plays, allegories based on NT teachings, and by saints' plays, which might concern biblical saints and involve considerable spiritual and psychological elaboration of the original narratives as a means of Christian pedagogy (e.g., the English Digby Mary Magdalene and Conversion of St. Paul). There are numerous European saints' plays of the same period, like the French Jeu de St. Nicholas; as late as J. Racine's (1639–99) play Esther (1689), the tradition remained vigorous in Latin Europe. Most of these dramatic works, like the biblical histories of the world popular in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries (e.g., the English Cursor Mundi), were essentially vernacular presentations of Scripture with incorporated traditional exposition. As in Spanish and Flemish biblical plays, the French passion play at Valenciennes (1547) or even the Dutch morality play of the sixteenth century, Elkerlyck (probable prototype for the English Everyman), their purpose was straightforwardly catechetical. Following especially the influence of St. Francis (1181/82–1226) and Franciscans like Jacopone da Todi (c. 1230–1306), vernacular lyrics in Italy, like the flowering of vernacular religious lyricism in Germany (e.g., the anonymous 12th-cent. "Oberestiu magenschraft," a poem on the divinity of Christ, and Walther von der Vogelweide's [c. 1170–c. 1230] "Nu alrerst lebe ich mir werde," a song of a pilgrim rejoicing at being able to retrace in the Holy Land the steps of Jesus' life and ministry), offer a meditative focus that is typically christocentric. This can be true even in cases where the apparent dedication of a poem is to the Virgin (e.g., Jacopone's "Stabat mater dolorosa"). Here the passion narrative is of primary influence, followed more distantly by the nativity narrative from Luke's Gospel; but in either case the confessional purpose is typically an inculcation of repentance and/or a renewed spiritual and moral dedication.

4. English Literature and the Bible. The literature of England undoubtedly offers the most extensive example in Western Europe of a formative influence of the Bible. From the earliest records of the literature of the Anglo-Saxons to the modern period, the Bible has been by far the most important of foundational literary texts for English-speaking peoples, even those in many parts of the Third World for whom British missions and later colonization were the means of their introduction to both Christianity and Western culture. (By contrast, classical Greek and Roman literature has been the more important influence in romance language and Germanic literary traditions, including the literature of former colonies of those European nations.)

In part this dramatic effect on English literature owes to the formative role free TRANSLATION of the Bible had in the development of a self-consciously English narrative style. The earliest missionaries to Britain naturally wished to make knowledge of the Scriptures available in the language of the people to whom they ministered. The miraculous gift to Caedmon of poetry in praise of creation is told by Bede (Ecclesiastical History) to illustrate a pattern whereby the coming of God's Word to illiterate pagans liberated their language in thankful response. The Caedmonian Genesis A and B, Exodus, Daniel (chaps. 1–5), and dramatic Christ and Satan are all expanded paraphrases of biblical sources. The Exeter Harrowing of Hell draws on the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, while the beautiful Advent Lyrics offers a more direct translation of the psalter and of Gospel passages. This taste for biblical narrative did not diminish in the late Middle Ages but continued to flourish in both the biblical drama and the universal histories already discussed and also in romance-styled narratives like Patience (a retelling of the story of Jonah) and Cleanness (a fierce denunciation of sin based on the biblical stories of Babel, Sodom and Gomorrah, Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, and the parable of the wedding feast, Matt 22:11-13) by the fourteenth-century Pearl poet. The appetite for vernacular translation of the Scriptures, which becomes evident in R. ROLLE's Psalter (c. 1337) and most fully in the Wycliffite Bible (1382, 1396) was, in this sense, amply precedented in popular vernacular adaptation, or "loose" translation.

A second stage in the growth of biblical influence in English literature may be observed in the works of a popular reformist poet like W. LANGLAND, in whose Piers Plowman (1369, 1378, 1386) simple moral and political allegories are projected from the Gospels and Pauline epistles onto contemporary crises in church and state. Political counsel—in this case directly to the court—also prompted G. CHAUCER's extensive use of the Bible in his poetry. As a contemporary of J. WYCLIF, Chaucer was well aware of the controversy at Oxford concerning the direct AUTHORITY of Scripture. As an astute reader of the Bible and one knowledgeable of its rich traditions of commentary, he was able to enrich and encode his Canterbury Tales with a profoundly biblical INTERTEXTUALITY demonstrating not only his own mature knowledge of Scripture but also an expectation that considerable familiarity would be shared by his courtly audience.

The Renaissance and Reformation period witnessed a reinvigoration of biblical influence that had seemed to wane dramatically in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries. With the translations of W. TYNDALE (1525–30), M. COVERDALE (1535), J. Rogers (c. 1500–1555; Bible pub. in 1537), R. Taverner (c. 1505–75; Bible pub. in 1539), the "Great Bible" (1539), the Geneva Bible (1560), and the Bishop's Bible (1568) as well as T. CRANMER's preparation in English of the Book of Common Prayer (1564), intimate textual knowledge of the Bible among the laity grew steadily until the seventeenth century. With the enormous success of the KJV (1611), rightly regarded as the acme of English literary prose, widespread literary enjoyment of the Bible was assured, and its status as the foundational repository of English wisdom literature was guaranteed. Thus, although there were examples of selected literary translations and paraphrases like P. Sidney (1554–86) and the Countess of Pembroke's (1561–1621) rendition of the psalms (1586, 1589) and J. Sylvester's (1563–1618) translation of the Frenchman G. Du Bartas's (1544–90) Divine Weeks and Works (a Protestantized medieval hexaemeron), the impact of the Bible in this period is one marked by a thorough popular ingestion, or internalization. This, along with the influence of Calvinist (see CALVIN) covenant theology resulted in the emergence to literary prominence of previously neglected themes, narratives, and characters (like Jephthah, Samson, Ruth, and Deborah). More significantly perhaps, biblical influence reveals itself everywhere in the cadence, phrase, and idiom of the Tyndale, Coverdale, Geneva, and finally 1611 versions, locutions that effectively become the mother tongue of seventeenth-century English poets and prose writers like Shakespeare (1564–1616; e.g., Measure for Measure, The Merchant of Venice), J. DONNE, G. Herbert (1593–1633), R. HOOKER (Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity), and J. TAYLOR (Holy Living and Holy Dying). The playwright C. Marlowe (c. 1564–93) in the opening speeches of his The Tragicall Historie of Doctor Faustus (1604) can foreshadow his protagonist's incipient self-damnation by showing him obstinately misquoting biblical texts (robbing them of their context), knowing that his audience will readily recognize this abuse of Bible reading as symptomatic of the Wittenberg theologian's rejection of Scripture's authority.

Biblical allusion after the Reformation remained the stock-in-trade of English poets, at least until the time of J. MILTON and J. Bunyan (1628–88). Even as Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, The Holy War, and other poems are allegories dependent on a thoroughgoing biblical literacy in its readers, so also Milton's Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes are overtly biblical poems dependent on a high degree of literacy in classical literature and biblical commentary. It is also clear that the success of such works as Pilgrim's Progress and Paradise Lost helped ensure a self-perpetuating character for biblical influence, even as these works shaped in distinctive ways the nature of that influence. The gospel according to Milton, so to speak, became a dominating form of subsequent influence on English literature; and the same is true in the case of Bunyan. But between 1480 and 1660 more than half of all books printed in England were devoted to theological or religious subjects, and typically they were copiously indebted to biblical proof texts and discourse. No period in any European culture has witnessed such a pervasive influence of the Bible on all other types of literature. A comparable influence would only occur for a relatively brief period in England's American colonies.

5. North American Literature of the Bible. North American literature branched off from English literature just at that point in the seventeenth century when the power of the Bible as a literary source was at its zenith. The Puritans who settled in North America were, moreover, some of the most biblically literate of Englishmen. Yet early American literature is not typically characterized by Miltonic or quasi-medieval retellings of biblical narrative. Rather, given the established typological hermeneutics of Puritan theology, the American tendency was to draw the stuff of literary narrative from frontier experience and then to shape and structure its claim to enduring, even eternal significance by encoding current events with explicit reference to biblical typology. From the early triumphalist chronicles and journals of settlers, like C. MATHER's Magnalia Christi Americana (1702) to modern American mythography in such texts as W. Percy's (1916–90) Love in the Ruins: The Adventures of a Bad Catholic at a Time Near the End of the World (1971) or anti-mythography as in J. Agee's (1909–55) Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941), there is a tendency to privilege for purposes of plot the here and the now while charging its elements, nonetheless, with a transvaluing typology drawn on biblical prototypes. In the early period, as S. Bercovitch (1978) and others have shown, biblical typology provided a means whereby a marginalized life in the colonies could become the literal realization of central scriptural metaphors: Fall, exile, exodus, pilgrim history, promised land, and even millennial kingdom are woven almost seamlessly into the narratives of W. Bradford (1590–1657), J. Winthrop (1588–1649), R. Williams (c. 1603–83), M. Wiggleworth (1631–1705; The Day of Doom [1662]), Mather, S. Sewall (1652–1730), and J. EDWARDS. Writers like E. Johnson (1599–1672) in his Wonder-working Providence of Sion's Saviour (1654) saw America as the literal promised land and American experience as a biblically foreshadowed text about God's unfolding plan for human redemption. Indeed, both the APOCALYPTICISM and millennialism characteristic of much American literature can seem to assume, as G. Gunn puts it (1983), that "the Bible was proleptically American."

By the eighteenth century, however, this style of writing had begun to grow archaic: T. Dwight's (1752–1817) Miltonic allegorical epic The Conquest of Canaan (1775), populated with eighteenth-century Americans bearing Hebrew names, was unsuccessfully biblical, a relic of his grandfather J. Edwards's day. This Puritan style of writing was to persevere for the time being only in emergent Arican American literature like P. Wheatley's (c. 1753–84) "Thoughts on the Works of Providence" (1770). Yet it was to reemerge in mainstream North American literature of the nineteenth century as a kind of palinode, a use of biblical codes, typology, and language to call biblical theology into question. H. Melville's (1818–91) Moby Dick (1851), Pierre (1852), The Confidence Man (1857), and Billy Budd (posthumous) exhibit a fierce resistance to Calvinist readings of Scripture yet display in their antagonism a rich synthesis of biblical narrative and typology that few European writers could match. N. Hawthorne's (1804–64) use of biblical allusion is likewise parodic and antagonistic, and R. Emerson's (1803–82) triumphant self-actualism and antinomian pursuit of the "God within" inverts or redefines the biblical material it borrows. Yet these writers also came to discover, as Emerson put it, that "Out from the heart of nature rolled / The burdens of the Bible old" ("The Problem"). As with Melville, E. Poe (1809–49), Hawthorne, and others, Emerson was forced in his own jeremiad essay "On Self-Reliance" (1841) to use biblical rhetoric to oppose biblical values, anticipating in this way W. Whitman's (1819–92) famous "Song of Myself." The latter poem, the thirty-third section of Whitman's Leaves of Grass (1855), is a protest against the triumphant self, or "old Adam," ironically grounded, he later admits, in the language of both testaments ("A Backward Glance O'er Travelled Roads").

Subsequently, the American jeremiad, a political sermon in which social criticism is joined to calls for spiritual renewal, has come to be recognized as a foundational and mythopoeic North American literary genre indebted to biblical modeling. Frontier outpost sermons, like those of P. Bulkeley (1583–1659) in the seventeenth century, take their place on a continuum with those of televangelists of the twentieth century in tending to read contemporary events as though they were written down in an unfolding text to which the Bible is the master code. Characterized not only by biblical rhetoric and diction but also formed on biblical narrative and dependent for its wide appeal on extensive popular knowledge of the Bible, the jeremiad has in turn had a powerful influence on other North American literary genres. Included here must be the novel of protest, many of which have been written not only by nominally Christian but also by Jewish writers in North America. Portnoy's Complaint (1969) by P. Roth (1933–); Herzog (1964) by S. Bellow (1915–); Joshua Then and Now (1980) by M. Richler (1931–); and, although less paradigmatically, My Name Is Asher Lev (1984) by C. Potok (1929–) each share something of the jeremiad tradition in America with novels of such gentile writers as J. Steinbeck's (1902–68) The Grapes of Wrath (1934); J. Baldwin's (1924–87) The Fire Next Time (1963); and W. Faulkner's (1897–1962) Go Down, Moses (1942) and also with plays like A. MacLeish's (1892–1982) J. B. (1958), a modernization of the story of Job; or R. Jeffers' (1887–1962) dramatic poem Dear Judas (1929).

But the force of biblical influence has in these works largely shifted away from biblical narrative and diction to vestigial religious tradition, which is almost invariably depicted as a pale shadow of its biblical fountainhead. Where the biblical narrative more directly informs plot and action, it can well be, as in G. Vidal's (1925–) Messiah (1954) or J. Barth's (1930–) Giles Goat Boy (1966), in a form that T. Ziolkowski (1972) calls "demonic parodies of the life of Christ."

By the late twentieth century, North American fiction within a biblical tradition, with a few notable exceptions (e.g., W. Percy's The Second Coming [1980]; R. Wiebe's [1934–] The Blue Mountains of China [1970]), has come to use its scriptural heritage in an overtly antagonistic fashion. Nowhere is this more explicitly declared, perhaps, than in M. Atwood's (1939–) The Handmaid's Tale (1985), a horrific dystopia in which American arch-conservatives have erected a society based on a rigid implementation of perverted but recognizably Puritan OT laws and social customs. Atwood's tale is an anti-jeremiad expressing fears of a right-wing and "biblicist" United States declaring itself the only "chosen" nation. A popular Canadian novel, T. Findley's (1930–) Not Wanted on the Voyage (1984), is a dark recasting of the story of Noah and the ark in demonic parody of the biblical narrative and angry rejection of the Bible's central motifs of covenant and promise to the faithful.

In North American literature generally, the age of "soft" allusion to the Bible—so comfortable for genteel nineteenth-century writers like H. Longfellow (1807–82), E. Dickinson (1830–86), J. Whittier (1807–92), or later, S. Leacock (1869–1944) and R. Frost (1874–1963)—is apparently over. Engaging the Bible as a foundational text now more clearly than ever addresses the question of its authority—not merely in the literary but also in the religious sense. In such a context it is notably writers marginal to the general culture (Mennonite R. Wiebe; Roman Catholic convert W. Percy; black feminist T. Morrison [1931–]) in whose work there is a vigorous recrudescence of the former power of biblical literature for the secular text. More notably perseverant are a number of Jewish authors living in North America. In powerful novels, like C. Potok's The Chosen (1967) and The Promise (1969), A. Klein's (1909–72) The Second Scroll (1951), Adele Wiseman's (1928–92) The Sacrifice (1956), and I. Singer's (1904–91) The Penitent (written in Yiddish and translated in 1983), to take a few examples, there is a keenly renewed sense of the pertinence of biblical foundations to the creation of modern literature with ethical power. L. Cohen's (1934–) collection of prose poems Book of Mercy (1984) is an explicitly penitential, confessional responsorium to the psalms, conveying a diary of the secular Jewish writer who, in despair of rootless writing, has turned back to the wellsprings of his literary tradition as a baal tshuve, a penitent. It is the themes of repentance and homecoming from spiritual exile that, in fact, dominate this recent strain of North American literature in the biblical tradition, although in recent American Jewish fiction (e.g., E. Doctorow's [1931–] The Book of Daniel [1971]; B. Malamud's [1914–86] God's Grace [1982]) typology and apocalypticism emerge in ways reminiscent of earlier Christian readings of biblical PROPHECY.

6. Modern European Literature. During the Enlightenment in Europe, an eclipse of Puritan influence by a latitudinarian or deistic theology (see DEISM), coupled with the ascendency of humanist skepticism and rationalism, significantly blunted biblical influence in the secular literature of nominally Christian cultures. The English Restoration poet J. Dryden (1631–1700) illustrates a general pattern. Relatively early in his career, while still a member of the established (Anglican) church, he wrote a political allegory based on the Bible, Absalom and Achitophel (1681). Here, however, the traditional allegorical reference is reversed so that in its retelling the biblical story is not the key but, rather, the surface narrative masking a contemporary saga of political treason. Later, exposed to such works of modernist biblical criticism as R. SIMON's Critical History of the Bible (tr. 1682), Dryden was driven to skeptical fideism; joining the Roman Catholic Church, he became increasingly distrustful of literary employments of the Bible and of Protestant typological readings in particular (The Hind and the Panther [1687]). Ecclesiastical controversy in this period also tended to reduce the frequency of biblical allusion; it is, rather, ecclesiological allusion that dominates, even in such clerical writers as J. Swift (1667–1745; Tale of a Tub [1704]).

The period of the Great Evangelical Revival in England produced a flurry of biblically influenced lyricism (e.g., E. Rowe [1674–1737]; H. More [1745–1833]; C. Wesley [1707–78]; W. Cowper [1731–1800]; C. Smart [1722–71]). The novels of H. Fielding (1707–54; e.g., Joseph Andrews [1742]; Tom Jones [1749]) offer, however, an atypical measure of residual biblical influence in this increasingly popular romance/epic genre. By the time of W. Blake (1757–1827; The Marriage of Heaven and Hell [1793]; Jerusalem [1820]), and the Romantic poets of Germany and England, the Bible was still of great literary and philosophical interest (e.g., J. von Goethe (1749–1832), S. T. COLERIDGE), but it was being subjected to a process of often radical reconstitution by the poets who used it (L. Damrosh [1980]; R. Stock [1982]). This period witnessed, effectively, the commencement of modernist hermeneutics in both biblical and LITERARY criticism (H. Frei [1982]; S. Prickett [1986]).

French, Italian, and Spanish literature in the nineteenth century, perhaps in part because of Roman Catholic association of the Bible with Protestant polemicism, eschewed HB allusion almost altogether while being almost as circumspect with the NT. E. Sue (1804–57), in his La Sept pêches capitaux (1847–49), a series of short stories illustrating each of the seven deadly sins, made use of biblical allusion; but he owed much more directly to the catechetical tradition of medieval morality plays or the autos sacramentales of P. Calderon (1600–1681) and his contemporaries. The Bible is more central, however, in the poetry of symboliste A. Vigny (1797–1863), who used biblical symbol and archetype to paradigm problematic human nature in his long poems La Colere de Samson (1839) and Le Mont des Oliviers (1843–44).

In Germany the nineteenth-century lyric poetry of F. Ruckert (1788–1866), drawing heavily on biblical wisdom literature and on Lutheran NT typology, is complemented by the poetry of F. Schiller (1759–1805). Both writers are indebted to the mystical biblicism of seventeenth-century Silesian lyricist J. Scheffler (1624–77). (This vein of Germanic biblical lyricism, drawing heavily on the passion narratives and their themes of atonement and resurrection, flows powerfully into modern times, as in the poetry of Austrian G. Trakl [1887–1914].) Goethe's extensive, if perverse, familiarity with the Bible and its traditions of commentary is evident both in his Faust (1790, 1808, 1832) and in his romantic hymns (e.g., "Christ ist erstanden"). Nineteenth-century poets living in Germany also made significant contributions but departed from the mystical and romantic coloration of their countrymen; H. Heine (1797–1856) in "Belshazzar" and "Die Passion Blume" shows biblical influence vigorously contesting with Hellenic tradition and holding its own. Heine's work may be seen as heralding a revival of biblical character and subject that was to parallel historical interest in biblical narrative among German theologians in the early twentieth century. Mennonite H. Suderman's (1857–1928) novel Das höhe Lied (1908) and earlier play Sodoms Ende (1891) were later to enjoy considerable popularity; F. Werfel's (1890–1945) play Paulus unter den Jüden (1926) evokes similar reflections ecumenically; and another Jewish writer, novelist L. Feuchtwanger (1884–1958), published a widely read historical novel about Josephus and the Maccabean wars, Der Judische Krieg (1932).

The success of this type of historical fictionalizing of biblical narrative is seen in the large number of examples that have appeared in northern Europe and especially in North America. S. Lagerlof's (1858–1940) Kristuslegender (1904), offering legendary adaptations of apocryphal Gospel narrative, and her fellow Swede P. Lagerkvist's (1891–1974) novel Barrabas (1953), a look at the passion of Christ from the perspective of the released brigand, are part of a rich genre of modern biblical fiction. Also included are works like T. Mann's (1875–1955) landmark four-part novelization Joseph und seine Brüder (1930–43) and his novella on the giving of the law Das Gesetz (1944), Polish novelist H. Sienkiewicz's (1846–1916) Quo Vadis? (1896), concerning the life and ministry of Peter, O. Wilde's (1854–1900) provocative fictionalization of the life and death of John the Baptist in his play Salome (1893), and Polish-born Yiddish novelist S. Asch's (1880–1957) The Nazarene (1939); The Apostle (1943); Moses (1951); and The Prophet (1955), a perspective on Isaiah. The Last Temptation of Christ (1955) by Greek novelist N. Kazantzakis (1885–1957) is a revisionist demythologizing presentation of Jesus in the tradition of Lagerkvist. In France H. Barbusse (1873–1935) made extensive allusions to the Bible in his L'Enfer (1908), but he most clearly contributed to the modern literary rediscovery of the Bible in his historical biography Jesus (1927). Nobel Prize–winning French novelist F. Mauriac (1885–1970), whose familiarity with the Gospels, in particular, informs such novels as La Pharisienne (1941) and L'Agneau (1954), also wrote Vie de Jesus (1936).

This fashion continued more or less until after WWII, when central biblical narratives could further become the basis for philosophical fiction. Exemplary here are R. Abellio (1907–), with La Fosse de Babel (1984) and Les Yeux d'Ezechiel sont ouverts (1950), and the Polish expatriate C. Milosz (1911–) in both his poems and his novels, notably The Issa Valley (1978). Milosz, a Nobel laureate who now lives and teaches in the United States, has, in fact, translated the Bible into modern Polish; consequently a rich resonance of biblical idiom occurs quite naturally in his creative work. A similarly direct relation between biblical translation and literary idiom is afforded by J. Tolkien (1892–1973), whose The Lord of the Rings (1954–56) contains passages strikingly reminiscent of locutions he employs in his portion of the translation of the Jerusalem Bible (1966).

The power of biblical mythos to generate the patterns of personal and community life is persistent in all Western literatures. The Bible's central tropes, themes, and symbols continue to provide, as Frye has suggested (following Blake), "the Great Code" of Western art and literature. In the modern period this is perhaps most especially true in regional literatures. Norwegian expatriate O. Rolvaag (1876–1931) offered a powerful American example in Giants in the Earth (1927), aspects of which are mirrored in Icelandic novelist G. Gunnarson's (1889–1975) Kirken paa Bjerget (1924–28) and Canadian Mennonite Wiebe's Peace Shall Destroy Many (1962). In this genre one would also want to place Moravian G. Hauptman's (1862–1946) Der Narr in Christo, Emmanuel Quint (1910). But biblical encoding as an aspect of ethnic identity became a major theme in African literature in the later twentieth century not only among European Africans, like South African A. Paton (1903–88; Cry, the Beloved Country [1949]) but also in post-colonial African writing as well (e.g., C. Achebe's [1930–] The Arrow of God [1964]).

Although no longer growing from within a coherent theoretical structure, like the referential analogies of the medieval period or the covenant typology of post-Reformation and especially Puritan writers, the Bible continues to provide a vital stimulus for modern fiction, drama, and poetry. The historic influence of the Bible on Western literature is foundational and remains clearly pervasive far beyond what this minuscule and necessarily fragmentary summary can indicate. Indeed, it has become the subject of a major field of study in the West not merely for students of the history of biblical interpretation (see D. L. Jeffrey [1992]) but also for literary scholars in all the major Western European languages. From the patient efforts of Christian missionaries, Bible translators, and teachers who lived as much as fifteen centuries ago has sprung up a vast flowering of cultural literacy and textual tradition, a large part of which remains as a legacy of the coming of the Bible to the European heartland and the evangelization of its diverse peoples.

Bibliography: P.-M. Beaude (ed.), La Bible en littérature (1997). S. Bercovitch, The American Jeremiad (1978). U. Brumm, American Thought and Religious Typology (1963; ET 1970). E. Coleman, The Bible in English Drama: An Annotated List of Plays Including Translations from Other Languages from the Beginnings to 1931 (1968). L. Damrosch, Symbol and Truth in Blake's Myth (1980). D. Fowler, The Bible in Early English Literature (1976); The Bible in Middle English Literature (1984). H. Frei, The Eclipse of Biblical Narrative: A Study in Eighteenth- and Nineteenth-century Hermeneutics (1974). N. Frye, The Secular Scripture: A Study of the Structure of Romance (1976); The Great Code: The Bible and Literature (1982). G. Gunn (ed.), The Bible and American Arts and Letters (Bible in American Culture 3, 1983); D. L. Jeffrey (ed.), A Dictionary of Biblical Tradition in English Literature (1992); People of the Book: Christian Identity and Literary Culture (1996). F. Kermode, The Genesis of Secrecy: On the Interpretation of Narrative (1979). S. Liptzin, Biblical Themes in World Literature (1985). S. Prickett, Words and the Word: Language, Poetics, and Biblical Interpretation (1986). M. Ros- ton, Biblical Drama in England from the Middle Ages to the Present (1968). H. Schneidau, Sacred Discontent: The Bible and Western Tradition (1976). H. Schwartz, Reimagining the Bible: The Storytelling of the Rabbis (1997). R. Schwartz (ed.), The Book and the Text: The Bible and Literary Theory (1990). R. D. Stock, The Holy and the Daemonic from Sir T. Browne to W. Blake (1982). T. Ziolkowski, Fictional Transfigurations of Jesus (1972). S. Zemka, Victorian Testaments: The Bible, Christology, and Literary Authority in Early Nineteenth-century British Culture (1997).

D. L. JEFFREY

WETTSTEIN, JOHANN JACOB (1693–1754)

Born in Basel, Switzerland, where he studied at the university, W. traveled to Paris and London in 1714 to visit scholars and to collate manuscripts. In 1715 he served as the chaplain of Swiss troops stationed in England. Returning to Basel, he was appointed assistant to his father at St. Leonhard's church. He was summoned before Basel's theological committee in 1729 for interrogation about his theological views, and in 1730 the town council removed him from ministerial office. He then moved to Amsterdam, where the Remonstrants (Dutch Arminians) offered him a teaching position in their seminary. However, the municipal council insisted that the Basel charges be cleared before he could teach in Amsterdam. He spent 1731–33 in Basel seeking reinstatement, which he finally achieved, and returned to Amsterdam for the balance of his career.

W.'s major contribution to biblical studies is in NT TEXTUAL CRITICISM. In 1730 he published anonymously Prolegomena for a new edition of the NT and presented his text-critical principles (e.g., he valued the number and antiquity of the manuscripts). His Greek text of the NT consists of two large folio volumes. The text itself is not a revision but a copy of the textus receptus. The text is printed at the top of the page followed by a critical apparatus, which includes a large number of variants identified by a system (e.g., D = Claramontanus) that is still in use. The lower part of the page contains W.'s notes. A modern version of W.'s annotated Greek NT was begun in 1996, edited by G. Strecker and U. Schnelle.

W.'s text-critical judgments were advanced: He opposed the reading "God" in 1 Tim 3:16 and rejected the three heavenly witnesses of 1 John 5:7. His notes offer a valuable collection of classical and rabbinic references; his critical judgments are conservative (e.g., he believed Paul wrote Hebrews).

Works: Novum Testamentum Graecum (2 vols., 1751–52); Prolegomena ad Novi Testamenti Graeci editionem accuratissimam (1730).

Bibliography: W. Baird, History of NT Research 1 (1992) 101-7. P. W. van der Horst, "J. J. W. nach 300 Jahren: Erbe und Anfang," TZ 49 (1993) 267-80. C. L. Hulbert-Powell, J. J. W., 1693–1754: An Account of His Life, Work, and Some of His Contemporaries (1938). G. Strecker, "Das Göttinger Projekt 'Neuer Wettstein,' " ZNW 83 (1992) 245-52.

W. R. BAIRD

WEVERS, JOHN WILLIAM (1919–)

Born in Baldwin, Wisconsin, June 4, 1919, W. was educated at Calvin College (BA 1940) and Calvin Theological Seminary (ThB 1943), Grand Rapids, Michigan, then at Princeton Theological Seminary (ThD 1945) and Princeton University, where he pursued postdoctoral studies in Arabic, Islamic history, Indo-European philology, and Sanskrit (1945–47). He subsquently studied Akkadian, Aramaic dialects, and Ugaritic (see UGARIT AND THE BIBLE) at Dropsie College from 1947 to 1948. After a brief teaching career at Princeton Theological Seminary, he accepted an appointment to the University of Toronto (1951), where he has been ever since. Retirement from active teaching duty (1984) has meant even greater emphasis on research and scholarly output.

W. has taught a wide variety of subjects on the ancient Near East, but he has gained an international reputation chiefly on the strength of his text-critical work (see TEXTUAL CRITICISM) on the SEPTUAGINT. Formative influences in this regard have been his Princeton "father" H. Gehman (1888–1981) and "grandfather" J. MONTGOMERY (1866–1949). W.'s doctoral dissertation, "The Relation of the Hebrew Variants of the Books of Kings to the OG and the Other Greek Recensions," although never published, spawned a series of articles propaedeutic to his life's work, including critical survey articles on Septuagint studies, which he wrote in 1954 and 1968 for TRu.

In 1966 W. was appointed editor of the Greek Pentateuch for the Septuaginta-Unternehmen of the Akademie der Wissenschaften, Göttingen; in 1972 he was elected corresponding member of the Akademie. He brought to this task a wealth of linguistic knowledge, both practical and theoretical; as the need arose to mine the daughter versions of the Septuagint for text-critical information on the Greek, he learned additional languages. In his text-critical work he has been a major proponent of the Lagardian (see P. de LAGARDE) dictum that a modern editor who seeks to reconstruct, out of the conflicting evidence of hundreds of Greek manuscripts, the pristine text created by the Greek translator must have an intimate knowledge of the methods of that translator (see TRANSLATION). Internal criticism, therefore, must always take precedence over external criticism and is to be practiced with all one's mind and might. The Göttingen Pentateuch stands as a monument to the best in textual criticism.

Aware, however, that a critical (modern) reconstruction of an ancient text must necessarily be an approximation of the original rather than the original itself, W. has not only produced a critical edition for each of the five books but has also detailed the reasons for many of his text-critical judgments in companion volumes devoted to text history. A third set of volumes that might be described as philological commentaries has been completed (1998). Not only do these commentaries contain a wealth of detailed information on philogical matters but also from time to time W. suggests changes to the critical text—a vivid illustration of his scholarly modus operandi.

Works: "Septuaginta-Forschungen," TRu 22 (1954) 85-138, 171-190; "Proto-Septuagint Studies," The Seed of Wisdom (ed. W. S. McCullough et al., 1964) 58-77; "Septuaginta-Forschungen seit 1954," TRu 33 (1968) 18-76; "A Lucianic Recension in Genesis?" BIOSCS 6 (1973) 22-35; (ed.) Genesis, Septuaginta (VTG, vol. 1, 1974a); Text History of the Greek Genesis (MSU 11, 1974b); (ed.) Deuteronomium, Septuaginta (VTG, vol. 3, pt. 2, 1977); "Text History and Text Criticism of the Septuagint," IOSOT Congress Volume (VTSup 29, 1978a) 392-402; Text History of the Greek Deuteronomy (MSU 13, 1978b); (ed.) Numeri, Septuaginta (VTG vol. 3, pt. 1, 1982a); Text History of the Greek Numbers (MSU 16, 1982b); (ed.) Leviticus, Septuaginta (VTG, vol. 2, pt. 2, 1986a); Text History of the Greek Leviticus (MSU 19, 1986b); Notes on the Greek Text of Exodus (SCS 30, 1990); (ed.) Exodus, Septuaginta (VTG, vol. 2, pt. 1, 1991); Text History of the Greek Exodus (MSU 21, 1992); Notes on the Greek Text of Genesis (SCS 35, 1993); Notes on the Greek Text of Deuteronomy (SCS 39, 1995); Notes on the Greek Text of Leviticus (SCS 44, 1997); Notes on the Greek Text of Numbers (1998).

Bibliography: A. Pietersma and C. Cox (eds.), De Septuaginta: Studies in Honour of J. W. W. on His Sixty-fifth Birthday (1984).

A. PIETERSMA

WHISTON, WILLIAM (1667–1752)

Born at Norton in Leicestershire, England, Dec. 9, 1667, W. was the son of a Presbyterian clergyman who preserved his post by conforming to the conditions of the Restoration but regretted his actions for the rest of his life. W. attended Clare Hall, Cambridge (BA 1690; MA 1693), where he excelled in mathematics and was elected a fellow in 1691. Ordained in 1693, he served as chaplain to Bishop Moore of Norwich (1694–98) and vicar in Suffolk (1698–1701). In 1701 he was appointed I. NEWTON's assistant at Cambridge at the latter's request and succeeded him as Lucasian Professor of Mathematics. W.'s publications in religion reflecting his Arian (or as he called it, Eusebian) anti-trinitarian christology led to the loss of his professorship, Oct. 30, 1710. He moved to London, where he lectured on a wide variety of topics and championed numerous causes until his death Aug. 22, 1752.

A unique figure in his time, W. was perhaps the model for Dr. Primrose as the example of comic integrity in O. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield. His age witnessed the growing tensions between science and religion and the challenges to Christianity and supernatural revelation posed by Deists (see DEISM) and freethinkers. Among W.'s associates were the leading philosophers and scientists of his day and the "coffeehouse freethinkers" like A. COLLINS and T. CHUBB. W. espoused distinctive approaches to biblical interpretation and to the relationship of religion and science and was also an advocate of individual freedom, liberty of expression, and limited governmental authority.

Three overarching concerns related to biblical interpretation are evident in W.'s life and writings: the reconciliation of science and religion, or natural and revealed theology; the perceived trinitarian (or Athanasian) distortion of the original Christian faith; and a millennial approach to history. All of these he shared with his mentor, Newton, although W.'s outspokenness on issues led to a break between them. The following general postulates on which W.'s biblical work was founded are spelled out in his first publication (1696), which was read and approved by Newton and acclaimed by such an influential figure as J. LOCKE: "I. The Obvious or Literal Sense of Scripture is the True and Real one, where no evident Reason can be given to the contrary. II. That which is clearly accountable in a natural way, is not without reason to be ascribed to a Miraculous Power. III. What Ancient Tradition asserts of the constitution of Nature, or of the Origin and Primitive States of the World, is to be allowed for True, where 'tis fully agreeable to Scripture, Reason, and Philosophy" (1696, 95).

W.'s 1696 volume was written to counter a work by T. BURNET that W. felt allegorized the Genesis primeval history to the point of denying special divine providence, and to counter the use the Deist C. BLOUNT made of Burnet to deny divine revelation. W. argued that the Mosaic account of creation in which one day equals a year (or a thousand years; see Ps 90:4) is understandable in literal terms if one assumes that Moses was discussing only the formation of the earth, not the creation of the universe, and if one seeks for the secondary causes (and thus scientific explanations) not described by Moses. W. concluded that the earth was formed by the change of orbit of a comet, which in its settling process became the earth; only the creation of humans necessitates a special divine intervention. The flood was caused when the earth passed through the vaporous tail of a comet, identified in the 1714 edition with Halley's comet, which had appeared in 1680, thus allowing W. to date the flood to 2349 BCE.

In 1707 W.'s Boyle lectures on the fulfillment of OT prophecies (pub. in 1708; see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) sought to demonstrate how a multitude of OT prophecies had been fulfilled in JESUS. For Newtonians like W., the fulfillment of prophetic predictions demonstrated the special providence of God active in history, just as the law of gravity illustrated God's general providence. Concluding that the Hebrew text of the OT had been corrupted by the Jews to confuse or eliminate many of the predictions fulfilled by Jesus, W. argued that the true text should be restored on the basis of early versions, NT quotations, and patristic references and that a search should be made for uncorrupted copies of the Hebrew text. In addition, he argued that numerous nonbiblical ancient sources, including the SIBYLLINE ORACLES, could be used to prove fulfillment of prophetic predictions. Like most of the millennialists of his day, W. was convinced that the millennium was to begin in the immediate future. He lectured and wrote on the coming accomplishment of the unfulfilled biblical prophecies, illustrating his lectures on the return of the Jews to Palestine, the rebuilding of the Temple, and the Second Coming with scale models of the tabernacle of Moses and Ezekiel's futuristic temple.

Like many of his contemporaries, W. held to a christology that differed radically from traditional trinitarianism, and he sought to restore primitive Christianity. For him, ATHANASIUS was the great perverter of the Christian faith and such works as the Apostolic Constitutions should be considered canonical. He hoped that his portrayal of primitive Christianity would become the basis of a restored faith that could achieve the union of all Christians. In 1715 he founded the Society for Promoting Primitive Christianity, which met weekly at his home until 1717. For the background of early Christianity, W. published in 1737 an English translation of the complete works of JOSEPHUS, who according to W. had become a Christian in his last years. His translation remains in print today and has been reprinted at least 217 times since its original issue.

Works: A New Theory of the Earth, From Its Original, to the Consummation of All Things (1696, 1714[2], 1736[5]); Short View of the Chronology of the OT, and of the Harmony of the Four Evangelists (1702); Essays on the Revelation of St. John (1706); The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (Boyle Lectures, 1708); Sermons and Essays upon Several Subjects (1709); Primitive Christianity Revived (5 vols., 1711–12); Reflexions on an Anonymous Pamphlet (1712), on Collins's Discourse of Freethinking; A Vindication of the Sibylline Oracles (1715); Astronomical Principles of Religion (1717); Scripture Politiks (1717); Commentary on the Three Catholic Epistles of St. John (1719); A Chronological Table, Containing the Hebrew, Phoenician, Egyptian, and Chaldean Antiquities (1721); An Essay Towards Restoring the True Text of the OT, and for Vindicating the Citations Made Thence in the NT (1722; Supplement [1723]); The Literal Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (1724; Supplement [1725]); A Collection of Authentik Records, Belonging to the Old and New Testaments (1727); Athanasian Forgeries, Impositions, and Interpolations (1736); The Primitive NT in English (1745); Sacred History of the Old and NT (1748); Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Mr. W. W., Containing Several of His Friends also, and Written by Himself (1749, 1753[2]).

Bibliography: M. Farrell, William Whiston (1981). J. E. Force, W. W.: Honest Newtonian (1985). M. C. Jacob, The Newtonians and the English Revolution, 1689–1720 (1976). C. Kaiser, Creation and the History of Science (History of Christian Theology 3, 1991) 188-209. J. Redwood, Reason, Ridicule, and Religion: The Age of Enlightenment in England, 1660–1750 (1976). L. Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (2 vols., 1876, 1902[3]) 1:179-92; DNB 61 (1900) 10-14.

J. H. HAYES

WHITBY, DANIEL (1638–1726)

An English biblical scholar and controversialist, W. was born at Rushden, England, Mar. 24, 1638, and was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, becoming a fellow in 1664. He was appointed rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, in 1669 and precentor of Salisbury in 1672. Famed for his antipapal polemics, he later directed attacks at Socinians (see SOCINIUS) and Calvinists (see CALVIN) as well. In earlier years he wrote in defense of the divinity of Christ, but his posthumous Last Thoughts reflect Unitarian views. He died on his eighty-eighth birthday.

W.'s most important work is A Paraphrase and Commentary on the NT, which went through several editions in the eighteenth century and was reprinted in the nineteenth. He used the AV as a basic text and included his own amplifications in parentheses. The work shows great learning and discusses the situation in which the NT books were written. It has some lengthy appendixes, mainly on doctrinal issues. J. LOCKE criticized some of its aspects in his Paraphrase and Notes on the Epistles of St. Paul (1705–7), and W.'s reply was incorporated into later editions. The work has no commentary on the book of Revelation but includes a "Treatise on the Millennium," giving a postmillennial interpretation of Revelation 20 that proved to be very influential.

W. wrote a criticism of J. MILL's Greek NT, claiming that its publication of thousands of variant readings would undermine the Bible's AUTHORITY. A. COLLINS reproduced W.'s arguments in his Discourse of Freethinking (1713), but R. BENTLEY defended Mill in his Remarks upon a Late Discourse of Free-thinking (1713).

Works: Tractatus de Vera Christi Deitate (1691); A Paraphrase and Commentary on the NT (2 vols., 1703); Additional Annotations on the NT (1710); Examen Variantium Lectionum Johannis Millii S.T.P. in Novum Testamentum (1710); Last Thoughts (1727).

Bibliography: BB 6 (1760) 4216. A. Fox, J. Mill and R. Bentley: A Study of the Textual Criticism of the NT, 1675–1729

(1954) 105-14. A. Gordon, DNB 61 (1900) 28-30. MSHH 21 (1733) 248-64.

A. W. WAINWRIGHT

WILDEBOER, GERRIT (1855–1912)

W. was professor of OT in the Groningen theological faculty from 1884 to 1907 and professor in the University of Leiden literary faculty from 1907 until his death. Although his doctoral dissertation at Leiden was on NT TEXTUAL CRITICISM, his scholarly career was directed to the study of the HB. His 1889 work on the CANON had four editions and was translated into English. His 1893 work, a synthesizing popularization, had three editions and was translated into English, French, and German but scarcely deserves comparison with the highly original and penetratingly analytical work of the great Leiden scholar A. KUENEN. In his work W. stressed that absolutely nothing in the HB is later than the end of the exile and arranged every HB pericope in a precise chronological order. Many of his writings gained W. popularity in Holland and international distinction as a linguistic technician. He was called on to contribute to K. MARTI's influential book (1897–98). With J. VALETON and other Ethicals, W. repudiated the evolutionism and historicism of the Leiden school, stressing the need to treat seriously the Bible's claim to offer an objective and authoritative revelation. It was his good fortune to work at a time when church and society were turning away from modernism to a highly theological biblical scholarship. His widely used works, however, have not retained their interest to the present.

Works: De profetie onder Israël in hare grondbeteekenis voor christendom en theologie (1884); Origin of the Canon of the OT: An Historical-critical Enquiry (1889; ET 1895); De letterkunde des Ouden Verbonds naar de tijdsorde van haar ontstaan (1893); Karakter en beginselen van het historisch-kritisch onderzoek des Ouden Verbonds (1897); Jahwedienst en volksreligie in Israel (1898; GT 1899); Het Oude Testament van historisch standpunkt toegelicht (1908); Nieuw licht op het Oude Testament: Verspreide opstellen (1911).

Bibliography: L. H. K. Bleeker, "Prof. W.: In memoriam en literatuurlijst," ThStud 30 (1912) 81-96. S. J. DeVries, Bible and Theology in The Netherlands: Dutch OT Criticism Under Modernist and Conservative Auspices, 1850 to WWI (1968) 99-102. J. Domela Nieuwenhuis, Levensberichten van afgestorven medeleden van de Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde (1916–17).

S. J. DEVRIES

WILDER, AMOS NIVEN (1895–1993)

Born Sept. 18, 1895, in Madison, Wisconsin, W. attended Oberlin College (1913–15) and Yale University (1916). From 1916 to 1919 he served in France with the American Ambulance Field Service (awarded the Croix de Guerre, 1917) and the Seventeenth United States Field Artillery. While there he studied at the Faculté de Théologie, Montauban (1919) and returned to Yale (AB 1920), where he wrote his senior thesis under B. BACON, "Eschatology: The Rationale of Redemption." After study at the University of Brussels (1920–21) and Mansfield College, Oxford (1921–23), he returned to Yale Divinity School (BD 1924). He studied in Berlin and then served as pastor of the First Church of Christ (Congregational), North Conway, New Hampshire (1925–28; ordained 1926). From 1928 to 1930 he pursued graduate study at Yale (at Harvard, 1929–30) and received his PhD from Yale in 1933 with his dissertation "The Relation of Eschatology to Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus as Represented in Matthew."

W. taught at Hamilton College (1930–33) and at Andover Newton Theological School (1933–43) as Norris Professor of NT. In 1943 he went to Chicago Theological Seminary to join the newly inaugurated Federated Theological Faculty, and in 1954 to Harvard, where from 1955 he was Hollis Professor of Divinity and after 1963 Hollis Professor, emeritus. He was active in the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE (president, 1955), the Studiorum Novi Testament Societas, the American Academy of Religion, and the Society for Religion in Higher Education. He was acting editor of JR (1945–46), on the editorial board of Christianity and Crisis (1952–65), and was awarded numerous honorary doctorates. Active into his nineties, he died in Cambridge May 1, 1993.

During W.'s long career as scholar, teacher, and poet, the panorama of North American biblical scholarship unfolded. Trained under its early leaders (e.g., Bacon, F. Porter, K. Lake, and A. D. Nock) and influenced through personal contact by such leading European scholars as C. H. DODD and A. SCHWEITZER, W. greatly influenced the shape of NT studies. Despite W. Lowrie's counsel, "If you would have a long life and see good days, keep mum on the subject of eschatology" (Wilder [1984] 442), W. manifested an initial and continuing interest in NT eschatology and the challenge it poses to ethics. In opposition to those who claimed that the expectation of future hope or judgment reduced ethics to an interim code or encouraged fanciful otherworldliness, W. argued that JESUS transforms into the form of myth "the epoch making, world transforming significance of his own life" (1939, 35). Visions of the future motivate present repentance, and true Christian ethics is a "new covenant" ethics in which Jesus' teaching expresses a way of life made possible by the experience of the Kingdom (162).

W. was a major influence on the emergence of theology and literature and LITERARY criticism of the Bible as vigorous movements within religious studies. Having published two volumes of poetry before completing his dissertation and a corpus of poetry and literary criticism along with major works in NT interpretation, he was uniquely equipped to plumb the literary riches of the Bible. He voiced the conviction that both scholars and general readers have failed to do justice to the operations of the imagination in Scripture—to poetry, imagery, and symbolism (1982, 15)—and attributed this failure to an "occupational cramp" due to a philological interest in minutiae that reduces poetry to prose and to a theological tradition that is interested only in ideas. By imagination W. meant "a total apprehension" of the world, in which we are engaged with the world through our senses. "When imagination fails," he wrote, "doctrine becomes ossified, witness and proclamation wooden, doxologies and litanies empty, consolations hollow and ethics legalistic" (1973, 593).

W.'s own extensive writings have a poetic quality—engaging, crisp, and fresh after many decades and after many readings. His 1964 landmark work brought together different threads of his own thought—reflections on genre, the literary texture of PARABLE, the importance of narrative—and inaugurated, along with R. FUNK's Language, Hermeneutic, and the Word of God (1966), a new era of parable research. W. stressed both the poetic quality and the secularity of the parables: The reader does not meet Jesus "the cloudy visionary" but the "layman" for whom human destiny is at stake in "ordinary creaturely existence, domestic, economic, social" (1964, 82).

Throughout his long career W. was engaged in everyday academic and church life. His books and articles explored biblical studies, literary criticism, and social and religious concerns of modern society. He fostered understanding between European and American scholars, was committed to ecumenism in scholarship and church life, and addressed the widening gulf between religion and contemporary culture. While not reducing religion to art or literature, since "faith has its own rhetoric" (1958, 8), his engagement with the Bible is a reminder that "before the message there must be the vision, before the sermon the hymn, before the prose the poem" (1976, 1).

Works: Battle-retrospect and Other Poems (1923); Archane: Poems (1928); Eschatology and Ethics in the Teaching of Jesus (1939, rev. ed. 1950, repr. 1978); The Spiritual Aspects of the New Poetry (1940, repr. 1968); The Healing of the Waters: Poems (1943); Liberal Learning and Religion (1951, repr. 1969); Modern Poetry and the Christian Tradition (1952); Otherworldliness and the NT (1954; GT, Weltfremdes Christentum? [1958]); NT Faith For Today (1955); "The First, Second and Third Epistles of John: Introduction and Exegesis" IB 12 (1957) 209-313; Theology and Modern Literature (1958); The Language of the Gospel: Early Christian Rhetoric (1964; repr. with new preface as Early Christian Rhetoric [1971]); Kerygma, Eschatology, and Social Ethics (1966); The New Voice: Religion Literature and Hermeneutics (1969); Grace Confounding: Poems (1972); "Theology and Theopoetic," Christian Century 90 (1973) 593-96; Theopoetic: Theology and the Religious Imagination (1976); Imagining the Real (1978); T. Wilder and His Public (1980); Jesus' Parables and the War of Myths: Essays on Imagination in the Scriptures (1982); The Bible and the Literary Critic (1991). For autobiographical reflections, see preface to Jesus' Parables and the War of Myths, 15-38, and "NT Studies 1920–50: Reminiscences of a Changing Discipline," JR 64 (1984) 432-51.

Bibliography: W. Beardslee, "A. N. W.: Poet and Scholar," Semeia 12 (1978) 1-40. J. Cox, "Religious Literary Criticism: A Search for Definition in the Work of A. W. and G. Vahanian" (diss., Florida State University, 1970). J. D. Crossan, A Fragile Craft: The Work of A. N. W. (1981). A. J. Dewey, "A. N. W.: Bibliography and Vita," Semeia 13 (1978), complete bibliography to 1978, 263-87. H. Hunter, "A. N. W. and the Processes of Poetry," Semeia 13 (1978) 1-8. W. McDonald, "The Literary Criticism of A. W.," Soundings 52 (1969) 99-109. J. A. Mirro, "A. N. W.: A Theopoet," BTB 10 (1980) 118-23. C. Sleeper, "Some Contributions to NT American Criticism," Int 20 (1966) 322-39. K. Stendahl, "Imagining the Real," HDivB 23 (1994) 13-15 (on W.'s life and work).

J. R. DONAHUE

WILKE, CHRISTIAN GOTTLOB (1788–1854)

Born May 13, 1788, in Badrina, Germany, W. studied Protestant theology and philosophy in Leipzig (1809–14). He served as an army chaplain (1814–18) and after 1821 was pastor in Hermannsdorf but was dismissed in 1836. As an army chaplain in France he had become acquainted with Roman Catholicism, and in August 1846 he made a Roman Catholic confession of faith. Although he received his PhD in Freiburg in 1847, the Würzburg university senate denied his inauguration into a full academic career after his dissertation was criticized as being unscholarly. He died Nov. 11, 1854, in Würzburg.

Among W.'s scholarly works, two deserve particular attention. The fourth edition of his NT dictionary (see DICTIONARIES AND ENCYCLOPEDIAS) was reworked by W. Grimm (thence known as Wilke-Grimm), making it really useful for the first time. More significant for the development of NT scholarship, however, was W.'s source-critical work published in 1838. C. WEISSE in the same year defended the priority of Mark from a historian's perspective. W. established that same priority in the narrative material strictly from a LITERARY perspective (684), although he simultaneously asserted a two source theory diverging from Weisse: Matthew was dependent on Luke in his rhetorical material but on Mark in his narrative material (691). An important preliminary work in this context was W.'s 1826 essay.

Works: "Über die Parabel von den Arbeitern im Weinberg, Matt 20,1-16," ZWT 1 (ed. G. B. Winer, 1826) 71-109; Der Urevangelist oder exegetisch kritische Untersuchung über das Verwandschaftsverhältnis der drei ersten Evangelien (1838); Clavis Novi Testamenti philologica (1840–41; Wilke-Grimm, 1888[4]; ET 1886); Die neutestamentliche Rhetorik (1843); Die Hermeneutik des Neuen Testaments systematisch dargestellt (2 vols., 1843–44).

Bibliography: H. Mulert, "Zur Lebensgeschichte C. G. W.s," TSK 90 (1917) 198-206. D. A. Rosenthal, Konvertitenbilder aus dem 19. Jahrhundert 1, 2 (1892[3]) 344. H.-H. Stoldt, History and Criticism of the Marcan Hypothesis (1977; ET 1980) 27-46.

F. W. HORN

WILLET, ANDREW (1562–1621)

A Calvinist theologian (see CALVIN) of the Church of England, W. was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and spent most of his life as a rural parson, authoring major works in refutation of Roman Catholic claims. Renowned for his textual knowledge of the HB, he published a number of commentaries, beginning with one on Genesis in 1605 and continuing with similar works on Exodus, Leviticus, Daniel, and Romans, which he called Hexapla because they compared six translations with the original Hebrew (the Septuagint, the Syriac, the Vulgate, the LT of Tremellius, and two English versions—the Great Bible and the Geneva Bible). Each volume provided a sixfold commentary, which for each text (usually by chapter) treated the argument, variant readings, difficult questions, doctrines, controversies involved, and moral observations. W. also treated the same matters more briefly in commentaries on 1–2 Samuel. While he acknowledged the help of Roman Catholic commentators, his comments included much anti-Roman Catholic polemic.

Works: Hexapla in Genesin (1605); Hexapla in Exodum (1608); Hexapla in Danielem (1610); Hexapla . . . upon . . . Romanes (1611); An Harmonie upon the First Booke of Samuel (1614); An Harmonie upon the Second Booke of Samuel (1614); Hexapla in Leviticum (1631).

Bibliography: J. F. Wilkinson, DNB 61 (1900) 288-92.

D. D. WALLACE, JR.

WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX (c. 1070–1121)

Born at Champeaux near Melun, France, W. studied under ANSELM OF LAON and perhaps under Roscelin of Compiègne. He was one of P. ABELARD's masters. Driven from his own teaching by Abelard's competition, he retired to the house of St. Victor, where he founded the order of Victorine canons, opening a school of theology that laid the foundations of the Victorine school. In 1112 he became bishop of Châlons.

W.'s principle teaching activity seems to have been in the liberal arts, with some reference to their application in exegesis. He is the author of a treatise on the Eucharist (De Sacramento Altaris), which makes a contribution to the debate on transubstantiation begun by BERENGAR OF TOURS and LANFRANC OF BEC in the previous generation. He is the probable author of an abbreviation of GREGORY THE GREAT's Moralia in Job. W. died at Châlons-sur-Marne.

Works: PL 163.

Bibliography: O. Lottin, Psychologie et morale aux xiie et xiiie siècles 5 (1959). H. Weisweiler, "L'école de'Anselm de Laon et de Gillaume de Champeaux," RATM 4 (1932) 237-69, 371-91.

G. R. EVANS

WILLIAM OF CONCHES (c. 1080–c. 1154)

A pupil of Bernard of Chartres, W. has won a reputation for bringing the scientific aspects of contemporary scholarship to some prominence. He commented on Calcidius's commentary on Plato's Timaeus and on the Somnium Scipionis commentary of Macrobius. His Philosophia Mundi and Dragmaticon are concerned with physical and metaphysical aspects of the study of the natural world. His importance for the history of exegesis lies chiefly in the influence of his ideas on commentary on the Genesis story of the six days of creation. Much of his work remains unedited or without modern critical editions, and there are problems of attribution still to be resolved.

Works: PL 90.1127-78 and PL 171.39-102 contain his Philosophia Mundi among the works of Bede and Honorius of Autum respectively.

Bibliography: M. D. Chenu, "Une controverse exégètique sur la création au xii[e] siècle," AHDL 20 (1953–54) 25-30. T. Gregory, Amina Mundi: La filosofia de Guglielmo di Conches e la scuola di Chartres (1955).

G. R. EVANS

WINCKLER, HUGO (1863–1913)

Born in Graefenhainichen, Germany, W. excelled early in language study and in 1881 entered the University of Berlin to study Semitic philology under E. Schrader, E. Sachau, and J. Barth. Cuneiform studies won his devotion, and by 1889 he had produced major publications on the Amarna letters and on the inscriptions of Sargon. He continued his academic career at Berlin, becoming an ausserordentlicher professor in 1904. Apart from cuneiform studies and his many works of historical and cultural analysis, he is well known for his leadership of the excavations at Boghazkoy (1906–12), the ancient Hittite capital (see HITTITOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES), including the discovery of a major official archive that greatly expanded the range of historical sources.

Ably seconded by A. JEREMIAS and others, W. focused on the character and cultural influence of the Mesopotamian worldview, a perspective labeled PAN-BABYLONIANISM. He held that the worldview of Mesopotamia, the cultural leader of the ancient Near East, significantly influenced all the world's higher cultures and religions (and especially biblical religion). Central in his judgment were the astral myths and the organized system they reflected. He reconstructed a Babylonian cosmic theory he believed fundamental to all Babylonian religion and historiography, in which the everyday historical world was merely a reflection of the astral realities (a microcosm mirroring the astral macrocosm). He viewed the narratives about the biblical patriarchs as heavily influenced by Israel's perception in them of the characteristics of the moon god. Abraham's actual history, therefore, is not accessible, for all the associations (e.g., Ur, Haran, Terah, the 318 attendants) testify to the dominance of Babylonian astral conceptions.

In contrast to J. WELLHAUSEN's reconstruction of Israel's history (in particular the evolutionary development and the comparisons with pre-Islamic Arabia), W. urged the antiquity and complexity of the cultural world (Mesopotamia) out of which Israel developed as well as the way in which the sources reflected ideas much older than the actual date of writing. Some opponents of Wellhausenism supported W. as an alternative, although his astral theories were vigorously opposed by such scholars as H. GRESSMANN and H. GUNKEL. W.'s work with the texts remains of value, but his theoretical reconstructions are now either rejected or ignored.

Works: (with L. Abel), Die Keilschrifttexte Sargons (2 vols., 1889); (with L. Abel), Der Thontafelfund von Tell-el-Amarna (1889–90); Keilschriftliches Textbuch zum Alten Testament (3 eds., 1891–1909); Alttestamentliche Untersuchungen (1892); Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens (1892); Altorientalischen Forschungen (3rd ser., 1893–1906); Geschichte Israels in Einzeldarstellungen (1895–1900); Die Thontafeln von Tell-el-Amarna (1896); (with H. Zimmern), Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament (1902–3[3]; 1st-2nd ed., E. Schrader); Der alte Orient und die Bibel (1906); Die babylonische Geisteskultur in ihren Beziehungen zur Kulturentwicklung der Menschheit (1907); Die jüngsten Kämpfer wider den Panbabylonismus (1907).

Bibliography: A. Jeremias and O. Weber, Hugo Winckler (MVAG 20, 1, 1916, with bibliography). K. Johanning, Der Bibel-Babel-Streit: Eine forschungsgeschichtliche Studie (1988) 265-74. H.-J. Kraus, GHKEAT (1982[3]) 305-9. R. G. Lehmann, Friedrich Delitzsch und der Babel-Bibel-Streit (OBO 133, 1994) 40-43. H. Weidmann, Die Patriarchen und ihre Religion im Licht der Forschung seit J. Wellhausen (FRLANT 94, 1968) 69-81.

H. B. HUFFMON

WINDISCH, HANS (1881–1935)

W. became a Dozent at Leipzig in 1908 and professor of NT at Leiden (1914–29), at Kiel (1929–35), and at Halle (1935). His works show him to be a liberal theologian and an adherent of the RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE.

W. devoted a great deal of attention to the relationship between JESUS—whom he saw as a theios aner marked by a consciousness of his own messianic mission, who after his baptism understood himself to be a prophetic pneumatic—and PAUL. W. detected differences in their respective understanding of the law. The demands of the law in the SERMON ON THE MOUNT are not to be taken as unfulfillable in the Pauline sense of Romans 3–8. On the contrary, Jesus elevated strict adherence to the law's ethical demands as the entry requirement for the kingdom of God. However, Pauline christology was able to employ Jesus' words in Mark 14:22-25 in which Jesus, referring to Isaiah 53, invested his own death with messianic significance. W. also perceived extensive similarities in Jesus and Paul as individuals; both are similar theioi andres with the characteristics of martyrs.

W. was interested in the problem of sin in baptized Christians. He detected contradictions in Paul between statements concerning the sacramental removal of sins by grace (Rom 6:1-14; 1 Cor 6:11) and the fact that Christians nonetheless sin (1 Cor 8:12). This contradiction between ideal and reality generates an unresolved tension between the indicative and the imperative in Paul. The theory of sinlessness corresponds to reality only with qualification; empirical acts of sin by Christians lead to the imperative to avoid sin (Rom 6:15-23). W. considered these Pauline views that baptized Christians were, according to their real essence, sinless and that the church could claim to be a community of saints to be representative for all of primitive Christianity and to have determined the various measures of additional atonement and church discipline. This rigorist viewpoint confronted the Roman Catholic understanding that the sin of baptized Christians was from the very beginning never viewed as extraordinary and that the forgiveness of even the most grievous sins was possible through the church's institution of penance.

Johannes und die Synoptiker deals with the sources and editorial intention of the Gospel of John. W. assumed a JOHANNINE acquaintance with all three SYNOPTIC Gospels. The goal of the Gospel of John was to correct the Synoptics' presentation of Jesus and to dislodge them as normative writings in the Christian communities.

Works: Die Entsündigung des Christen nach Paulus (1908); Taufe und Sünde im ältesten Christentum bis auf Origenes (1908); Die katholischen Briefe (HNT 4, 2, 1911; HNT 15, 1951[3] bearbeitet von H. Preisker); Der Hebräerbrief (HNT 4, 3, 1913; HNT 14 1931[2]); Der Barnabasbrief (HNT-Erg. 3, 1920); "Das Problem des paulinischen Imperativs," ZNW 23 (1924) 265-81; Der zweite Korintherbrief (MeyerK 4, 1924; repr. 1970 ed. G. Strecker); Johannes und die Synoptiker: Wollte der vierte Evangelist die älteren Evangelien ergänzen oder ersetzen? (UNT 12, 1926); "Jesus und der Geist nach synoptischer Überlieferung," Studies in Early Christianity (ed. S. J. Case, 1928) 207-36; Der Sinn der Bergpredigt (UNT 16, 1929, 1937[2]); Paulus und Christus: Ein biblische-religionsgeschichtlicher Vergleich (UNT 24, 1934); "Paulus und Jesus," TSK NS 1 (1934/35) 432-68.

Bibliography: E. Beijer, "H. W. und seine Bedeutung für die neutestamentliche Wissenschaft," ZNW 48 (1957) 22-49. G. Delling and M. J. Fiedler, "In memoriam H. W.: Bibliographie H. W.," TLZ 81 (1956) 499-510. A. Meyer, RGG[2] 5 (1931) 1952. K. Prümm, "Zur Früh- und Spätform der religionsgeschichtlichen Christusdeutung von H. W.," Bib 42 (1961) 391-422; 43 (1962) 22-56.

B. KOLLMANN

WINNETT, FREDERICK VICTOR (1903–89)

Born in Oil Springs, Ontario, Canada, May 25, 1903, W. graduated in oriental languages at the University of Toronto in 1923 and pursued theological studies at Knox College until 1927. Concurrently he continued postgraduate work at Toronto, obtaining the PhD in 1928 with a thesis on a thirteenth-century Syriac text. A postdoctoral fellowship enabled him to spend a further year of study at Hartford Theological Seminary, where he profited from the erudition of D. MACDONALD. W.'s teaching career, begun in 1929, was spent entirely at the University of Toronto. He retired in 1971 and died Jan. 22, 1989.

W.'s reputation as a leading authority on pre-Islamic Arabic began with a volume on Lihyanite and Thamudic inscriptions (1937). Expeditions in Jordan during 1950–51 and 1958–59 produced many Safaitic inscriptions and texts, published in 1957 and 1978 respectively. In 1962 and 1967 trips through northern Arabia led to yet another volume (1970) and several articles.

Another of W.'s interests was Palestinian ARCHAEOLOGY. Closely associated with the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH, he was made an honorary fellow of the Jerusalem school (1938–39) and served as director (1950–51, 1958–59). He also participated in excavations at Jericho, Dibon, Gibeon, and Elealeh.

W.'s third interest was biblical literature, particularly the problems connected with the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM), on which he conducted a graduate seminar for many years. His 1949 volume offers an original approach, maintaining that Exodus and Numbers exhibit a continuous account of Moses that was composed in the northern kingdom. Two later recensions were made: the first in Judah after the fall of Samaria, resulting in Deuteronomy, and a priestly harmonization of the two following the exile. W. finally ventured a reconstruction of the original tradition. In a presidential address to the hundredth meeting of the SOCIETY OF BIBLICAL LITERATURE, he argued that revisions in Genesis were the work of a late Yahwistic source. His conclusions have been politely received but have not yet been taken with the seriousness they deserve.

Works: A Study of the Lihyanite and Thamudic Inscriptions (1937); The Mosaic Tradition (1949); Safaitic Inscriptions from Jordan (1957); "Re-examining the Foundations," JBL 84 (1965) 1-19; (with W. L. Reed), Ancient Records from North Arabia (1970); (with L. Harding), Inscriptions from Fifty Safaitic Cairns (1978).

Bibliography: A. D. Tushingham, BASOR 279 (1990) 1-4. J. W. Wevers and D. B. Redford (eds.), "Studies on the Ancient Palestinean World: Presented to Prof. F. V. W. on the Occasion of His Retirement, 1 July 1971," TSTS 2 (1972) x, 171.

R. J. WILLIAMS

WINSTANLEY, GERRARD (1609–c. 1660)

A leader and chief spokesman of the Diggers, or True Levellers, W. was born at Wigan, England, was apprenticed to the cloth trade in London in 1630, and became a freeman of Merchant Taylor's Company in 1637. After 1640 his business failed, and he worked as a hired cowherd in Surrey. In the late 1640s he published mystical, pantheistic works whose ideas took a practical shape in the cultivation of common land by the Diggers, described by W. as a return to humankind's state of oneness with God. The colony lasted from April 1649 into 1650, when the Diggers were dispersed by local landowners. W. defended his actions and program in print, and in The Law of Freedom in a Platform (1652) outlined a reorganization of society along Digger lines. He then drifted into obscurity, perhaps becoming a Quaker.

At the heart of W.'s mysticism and communism was a reading of the Bible as an internal (personal) and external (in nature) allegory of the operation of God ("Reason"). Thus, the Garden of Eden is "man's heart." Genesis 1 becomes a source for an elaborate personal and natural interpretation of good and evil: "In this garden are five rivers: hearing, seeing, tasting, smelling, feeling; which we in our age of the world call five senses. And these five water springs do refresh and preserve the whole creation, both of the out-coasts [nature itself] and of the garden [man]." W. understood the books of Daniel and Revelation as representations of the tyrannies of clerisy, formal education, and private property, which hold people in bondage. The Bible was written by "shepherds, husbandmen, fishermen and such inferior men of the world" who had an "experimental" (direct and personal) experience of God, Christ, and the Spirit. Typically, W. used an economic metaphor to complain that "in opposition to the righteous spirit" the "learned ones . . . engross" poor people's spiritual experiences to themselves.

The True Levellers' Standard Advanced (1649) and The Law of Freedom (1652) contain a more broadly based HB justification for the common "enjoyment" of the land, designed to merge the ideals of commonwealth magistracy with Digger communism against the yoke of kingship. W. was disputed by other sectarians for his interpretation of Eden, largely to render a positive picture of the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil. This in itself is an indication of the wide degree of interest among sectarians in Genesis 1. W.'s large-scale moral allegorizings developed from biblical symbols; his puns prefigure Quaker discourse, although his linking of pantheistic mysticism with economic complaint results in a unique language of visionary penetration.

Works: The Works of G. W. (ed. G. H. Sabine, 1941); The Law of Freedom and Other Writings (ed. C. Hill, 1973).

Bibliography: J. C. Davis, Utopia and the Ideal Society: A Study of English Utopian Writing, 1516–1700 (1981). C. Hill, The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas During the English Revolution (1972); The Religion of G. W. (Past and Present Supplement 5, 1978). T. Kenyon, Utopian Communism and Political Thought in Early Modern England (1989). G. M. Shulman, Radicalism and Reverence: The Political Thought of G. W. (1989). N. Smith, Perfection Proclaimed: Language and Literature in English Radical Religion, 1640–60 (1989).

N. SMITH

WISDOM OF SOLOMON

This apocryphal book is a product of Jewish wisdom composed in Greek thought patterns and literary style. It is not included in Jewish and Protestant biblical canons (see CANON OF THE BIBLE), but it is retained among canonical books by the Roman Catholic Church. Scholarship in major commentaries has centered its critical approach principally around several issues—namely, division of contents, purpose, authorship, origin, original language, and date.

1. Early Interest in the Book. There are five uncial manuscripts: Codex Alexandrinus (A; 5th cent.); Codex Vaticanus (B; 4th cent.); Codex Ephraemi Syri Rescriptus (C; 5th cent.), containing only part of the text; Codex Sinaiticus (S; 4th cent.); and Codex Venetus (V; 8th cent.), important for its witness to many Origenic readings (see ORIGEN). Sapientia Salomonis in the Göttingen Septuaginta edited by J. Ziegler (1962) is the first critical edition of Wisdom based on all pertinent available recorded evidence. In Ziegler's view the original form of the text is best transmitted in the fourth-century codices Vaticanus and Sinaiticus and in the fifth-century Codex Alexandrinus. A more complete reading is achieved from the agreement among the manuscripts and the minuscules that depend on them. Ziegler also lists the secondary uncials Ephraemi and Venetus, which contain large gaps and scribal errors, and forty-five cursive minuscules of later age and inferior quality. There are also several papyrus fragments (3rd and 4th–5th cents.), a fragment from Khirbet Mird, and two Greek commentaries. The earlier commentary of M. Monachus (14th cent.) is important because of its use of Greek manuscripts no longer extant, while the work of M. Cantacuzenus (16th cent.) has no special significance. Early documents have variations in the title of the book, all with principal emphasis on the theme of wisdom.

2. Interpretations Before the Nineteenth Century. Scholarship from early times through the eighteenth century includes the homilies of AMBROSE and of AUGUSTINE, which have been lost. The first extant commentary is that of RABANUS MAURUS (856 CE), which shared the scene with the GLOSSA ORDINARIA, attributed to WALAFRID STRABO (c. 808–849), although now many doubt that the work was his. ANSELM, HUGO OF ST. CHER (1260), and BONAVENTURE wrote in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries; and the work of NICHOLAS OF LYRA (1341) and R. Holcot (d. 1349) appeared during the following century. Post-Reformation viewpoints come from both Roman Catholic and Protestant scholarship. P. Nannius (1500–1557) and V. Strigel (1524–69) taught in the sixteenth century, followed by H. GROTIUS (in Critici sacri [1660]), Lorinus, and C. à LAPIDE in the seventeenth. Increased interest appeared in the eighteenth century with D. CALMET (1724), C. Houbigant's contributions of 1753 and 1777, and Klenker and Hasse in 1785. J. Nachtigal (1798) held that Wisdom is a mosaic to which seventy-nine sages contributed, a view termed bizarre by D. Winston (1979, 12). In the same work Winston gives detailed information on manuscripts and versions as well as on the book's status and influence (64-69).

3. Scholarship from the Nineteenth Century. In the critical study of Wisdom, the basic approach to understanding its structure is either in terms of subject matter or in terms of LITERARY characteristics. The majority of commentators divide the text into two or three parts, with variations as to their composition. A few scholars have proposed a four-part division. Subject matter includes general and hortatory considerations (Wisdom 1–5); praise of wisdom and its role in human destiny (Wisdom 6–9); and wisdom in the history of God's people (Wisdom 10–19). Among literary characteristics are differences in style of the first part (Wisdom 1–9) and the second part (Wisdom 10–19) as well as the author's structuring of his work by using such rhetorical devices as inclusio or kyklos to mark off sections of the material.

a. Two-part division. W. Deane (1881), J. Harris (1929), and B. Metzger (1957) proposed a simple two-part division. The span of the dates of their works shows a continuing recurrence of this plan over a period of time. Interspersed with these works are others that agree substantially but incorporate variations on the basic two divisions and offer different subdivisions, e.g., W. Wright (1968) who followed J. Reese (1965 and 1970) in identifying the sections of Wisdom on the basis of literary genre but contributed his own intricate outline with two main parts and many subdivisions.

b. Three-part division. At the beginning of the nineteenth century, K. Bretschneider (1804) presented three distinct parts: 1:1–6:8; 6:9–10:21; 11–19. The landmark commentary of K. Grimm (1860) modified the arrangement to 1–5; 6–9; 10–19, and argued for the unity of the book. This position had continuing impact on subsequent scholars, who either accepted the views exactly or made minor modifications, from E. Bissell (1880) to R. Dentan (1971). W. Kohler (1906) laid out three independent parts of the book but disputed Grimm's conclusion on unity, while E. Stein (1936) proposed Wisdom as a compilation of three, or possibly four, books on the basis of sources. M. Hadas (1976) offers an interplay between a two-part and a three-part division by calling for two parts on the basis of theme and three parts on the basis of content. Winston (1979) retains the three-part division but marks the first part as 1:1–6:21 and the second as 6:22–10:21. For him the second part is the core of the book, where the author is at his best. While E. Clarke (1973) spoke of four subdivisions, each with a different theme but dependent on one another, his divisions basically followed Grimm.

c. Four-part division. Reese made a significant breakthrough by first presenting a true four-part division on the basis of the literary genre protreptic, and he provided a scientific approach to unraveling the message of the sage. His methodology was followed by A. Wright (1965, 1990), who nevertheless reverted to a two-part structure. M. Gilbert (1984) shares interest in literary characteristics and patterns but uses a three-part division of the book, which he sees as encomium.

d. Purpose of the book. The plan of the book is closely connected with its purpose and is a key factor in understanding it. There is substantial agreement as to the author's basic objective. Standing at one of the turning points in scholarship, Grimm described the purpose as hortatory-apologetic-polemic. In line with him was Deane, who emphasized the Greek influence. Although Bissell accepted this point, he did not follow Deane's positive view of the book's presentation of the Hebrew faith. E. SCHÜRER (1885) noted that Wisdom was directed as much to those outside Judaism as to those within it and aimed to offset the objections of heathen critics. Through the years other scholars have followed similar reasoning with one emphasis or another. Reese drew the sage's purpose into sharper focus by attributing a twofold purpose: (1) to glorify God's mercy in calling people to actively participate in his eternal reign (3:8 and 6:21) and (2) to urge all people to the righteousness that would provide an eternal inheritance among the saints (5:5). Reese's statement (1965) is at once specific and universal. The sage wished to enable future intellectual leaders of his people to view their situation positively, while he extended an orientation toward righteousness to all people who looked to eternity. Winston corroborates the prevailing view and adds that the sagacious author of Wisdom points a finger at pagan kings who have abandoned the principles of divine justice.

Some divergent views have had little following. C. Siegfried (1875) seemed to regard the reconciliation of Jewish and Greek philosophy as the book's main purpose. E. Plumptre (1821–91) thought it was a correction of the teaching of Qohelet or a current misrepresentation of it.

e. Authorship. Early critics hypothesized a wide range of authors including Zerubbabel, Aristobulus, PHILO, and Apollos. Others have suggested a translator of the SEPTUAGINT, one of the Therapeutae, a Christian, or a Samaritan patriot. Some church fathers, e.g., CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, TERTULLIAN, Cyprian (d. 258), Hippolytus (c. 170–c. 236), and Lactantius (c. 250–c. 325), advanced Solomonic authorship and thus opened the issue of a Hebrew original. Augustine denied it, and JEROME dropped the name of Solomon from the title. Solomonic authorship was also advanced by such medieval rabbis as Gedaliah ben Joseph Ibn Yahya (Shalshelet ha Kabbalah, 104) and Azariah dei Rossi (Meor Ennayim, 175). Whereas many scholars believe that the context makes use of Solomon only as a literary fiction, others allege that at least part of the book can be attributed to him. The discussion of Solomonic authorship continued into the twentieth century, but it receives little support.

i. Unity of authorship. Those who follow Grimm, reflected in F. FARRAR (1888), argue for unity of authorship and generally characterize the author as an Alexandrian Jew. D. Margoliouth (1890) differed in arguing for a Palestinian writer, but J. Freudenthal's (1891) response devastated this hypothesis. Such scholars as J. Reider (1957) basically argue for unity of authorship while suggesting that the various parts of the book may have been composed at different times in the author's life. Stein held a somewhat different view, proposing three or four parts redacted by one editor; however, his view does not have strong support. On the other hand, Reese's breakthrough represents careful scholarship and concludes that the book is a unified composition with a consistent theological outlook.

ii. Composite authorship. In the eighteenth century Houbigant (1777) and J. G. EICHHORN (1795) argued for composite authorship, as did J. Nachtigal (1798) with his Mosaic theory. From the nineteenth century onward, scholarship was dotted with variations on the subject. R. PFEIFFER (1949) and Winston (1979) cited the arguments of F. Focke (1913) as the most plausible, although they believed his reasons either unfounded or inconclusive. Reider placed in the same category theories that trace four hands in the work. Thus the stronger and more prevalent position is in favor of unity of authorship.

f. Origin of Wisdom. Discussion of authorship raises questions about the book's place of origin. A preponderance of scholarship has favored an Egyptian location, probably in the area of Alexandria. The writer's handling of HB doctrines shows contact with Western philosophy, which most plausibly would have occurred in Alexandria and could best have been expressed in Greek by an educated Jew who integrated his beliefs with those of the heathen culture. Grimm's influence is seen in a long line of scholars who advocated a totally Alexandrian-Jewish character for the book. This position was thus well established and remains so even into the twentieth century, although a few scholars advance a Palestinian locus of composition. The classic debate between Margoliouth and Freudenthal about original language turned in part on place of origin, with Margoliouth's Palestinian hypothesis (263-97) being refuted by Freudenthal (722-53). Focke attributed Wisdom 1–5 and 6–19 to different authors, with the first part being written in Hebrew by a Palestinian author and subsequently being translated into Greek and used as an introduction to the second part by a Greek writer. Focke's theory was refuted by Pfeiffer as based entirely on conjecture. Winston further dismantled Focke's arguments, showing that his position has no foundation. Stein called for a Hebrew and a Palestinian original for the first two of his divisions of the book and a Greek original for the third part; the book would then have been compiled by one hand outside of Israel (467-69). Opinions favoring Palestinian origin have a sparse following, however.

g. Original language. From the discussion of place of origin arise two possibilities about the work's original language: Greek or Hebrew. Scholars who followed Grimm's thought found the book abounding in Hebrew expressions, yet showing mastery of the Greek of the later epoch. Hebrew coloring is found chiefly in the earlier chapters and is due to the use of HB phrases that are heavily Septuagintal, whereas the later chapters reflect a mastery of the Greek language and style and the use of unrestrained rhetoric. From Freudenthal to Reese, scholarship on original language generally took on the air of review. The notion of a Greek original is integral to Reese's analysis of the Hellenistic influence in Wisdom; he argues from detailed examination of vocabulary and style that the sage was trained in Greek rhetoric and was subject to a wide spectrum of Hellenistic influences (1970, 25-31). The preponderance of scholarship accepts Greek as the original language of the book.

The few scholars who favor a Hebrew original have also preferred a Palestinian locus of composition, e.g., Margoliouth, who argued against a Greek original on all points. Focke was refuted by Pfeiffer and Winston. Stein's theory of a final editor for three different sections, each with a different origin and language, has received little credence.

h. Dating of the book. The exact date of the book's composition cannot be determined with certainty. Calculations are based on such issues as persecution of the Jews, which seems to be mentioned and may be taken as some specific time of oppression or as persecution in general; the relation, or lack thereof, between Wisdom and PHILO OF ALEXANDRIA; and literary style. Conjectures span a period from the third century BCE to the first century CE. On the basis of internal evidence, Deane felt he could arrive at a certain date of 217–145 BCE. Grimm took up where Deane left off and situated the book at 145–50 BCE. As in other matters a large number of scholars hover in and around the same time period as Grimm, and even Stein placed the final editing at 145–130 BCE.

Another group of scholars has opted for the first century BCE as the date of origin. Among them is A. Holmes (1872–1940), who opined that the book was early enough to have been used by PAUL. Harris (1929) placed it before Philo and after the Septuagint of Ecclesiastes, as have others who maintain Septuagintal dependence and NT use. Reese prefers this time period; but basing his conclusions on the education of the day and on the literary characteristics reflected in the text, he sees a time before the accession of Augustus as the proper situation for the book's protreptic literary form (1970, 146-51). Gilbert (312) also works from the point of view of literary form, calling it encomium, and places the book between 30 BCE and the first decades of the first century CE. Hadas accepts a time near 30 BCE but reverts to the often-repeated themes of persecution and idolatry for determining his date.

Scholars who assign a date in the first century CE connect the writing with the tumults of Caligula's reign. Among these are Winston, who places it around 40 CE; and also Farrar, who on this point only took exception with Grimm and posited a date in the decade after the death of Christ. Because internal historical evidence is limited in Wisdom, various interpretations are possible; they recur repeatedly without the emergence of universal consensus on a date for the writing.

4. Conclusion. In all of the scholarship on Wisdom there is no definite certainty on most issues. The sage's reflections on Jewish traditions show wisdom to be active in creation and carrying history to its goal. From whatever frame of reference one views the book, it is an enriching contribution to evolving religious thought in the intertestamental period. For full treatment and bibliography see especially the works of B. J. Lillie, Reider, Winston, and Ziegler.

Bibliography: E. C. Bissell, The Apocrypha of the OT: With Historical Introductions (THBW 15, 1880). E. G. Clarke, The Wisdom of Solomon: A Commentary (CBC, 1973). W. J. Deane, The Book of Wisdom (1881). J. G. Eichhorn, Einleitung in die Apokryphischen schriften des AT (J. G. Eichhorn Kritische Schriften 4, 1795). F. W. Farrar, "The Wisdom of Solomon," The Holy Bible with an Explanatory and Critical Commentary (ed. H. Wace, 1888). F. Focke, Die Entstehung der Weisheit Salomos: Ein Beitrage zur Geschichte des jüdischen hellenismus (FRLANT 5, 22) 1913. J. Freudenthal, "What was the Original Language of the Wisdom of Solomon?" JQR 8 (1891) 722-53. M. Gilbert, "The Wisdom of Solomon," Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period (ed. M. E. Stone, 1984) 301-13. K. L. W. Grimm, Das Buch der Weisheit (1860). M. Hadas, "Wisdom of Solomon," IDB (1962) 4:861-63. J. R. Harris, "Stoic Origins of the Prologue to St. John's Gospel," BJRL 6 (1921–22) 439-51; "Athena, Sophia, and the Logos," BJRL (1922–23) 56-72. C. Houbigant, Veteris Testamenti versio nova ad hebraicom veritatem facta; acedunt libri deuterocanonici ex Graeca editione translati (1713); Caroli Francisci Houbigantii. . . . Notae criticae in universos Veteris Testamenti libros (1777). W. Kohler, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Mystik in der Reformationszeit (Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte, 1906). M. Kolarcik, "The Book of Wisdom," NIB (1997) 5:435-600. B. J. Lillie, "A History of the Scholarship on the Wisdom of Solomon from the Nineteenth Century to Our Time" (diss., Hebrew Union College, 1983). D. S. Margoliouth, "Was the Book of Wisdom Written in Hebrew?" JRAS (April 1890) 263-97. B. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apocrypha (1957). J. K. C. Nachtigal, Koheleth, oder Die Versammlung der Weisen, gewohnlich genannt der Prediger Salomos (1798). R. H. Pfeiffer, History of NT Times, with an Introduction to the Apocrypha (1949). J. M. Reese, "Plan and Structure in the Book of Wisdom," CBQ 27 (1965) 391-99; Hellenistic Influence on the Book of Wisdom and Its Consequences (1970). J. Reider, The Book of Wisdom (1957). E. Schürer, HJPAJC (1885). C. A. Siegfried, Analecta Rabbinica ad NT et Patres ecclesiasticus spectantia (1875). E. M. Stein, "Sefer Hokmah Shlomo," Sefarim Ha-Hitzonim (ed. A. Kahana, 1936) 463-514. D. Winston, The Wisdom of Solomon (AB 43, 1979); "Solomon, Wisdom of," ABD (1992) 6:120-27. A. G. Wright, "Wisdom," NJBC 33 (1965, 1990) 510-22. W. Wright, Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles (1968). J. Ziegler (ed.), Sapientia Salomonis: Septuaginta (1962).

B. J. LILLIE

WITSIUS, HERMAN (1636–1708)

A Dutch Reformed biblical theologian, properly Herman Wits but always known by the Latinized form of his name, since Latin was the language of his writings, W. studied at Groningen, Leiden, and Utrecht. After holding pastorates from 1656 to 1675, he taught at Franeker, Utrecht, and Leiden until his last illness. A man of great piety and learning, he attempted to mediate in the controversy between the biblical THEOLOGY of J. COCCEIUS, based on the concept of covenant and following a chronological method (see CHRONOLOGY), and the dogmatic theology of the so-called Reformed scholastics, following a topical method and based on the concept of predestination. The result was his wide-ranging and thoughtful book De oeconomia Foederum Dei cum hominibus (1685) dedicated to the future King William III and more than once translated into English. He also tried to mediate in the English Antinomian and Neonomian controversy: See his Miscellanea Sacra (1692–1700), which includes dissertations on many other subjects, mostly biblical. Further works include expositions of the Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer. W. strongly opposed the biblical criticism of B. SPINOZA, J. LE CLERC, and R. SIMON.

Works: The Oeconomy of the Covenants Between God and Man: Contemplating a Complete Body of Divinity (ET 1763).

Bibliography: J. Marckius, Oratio funebris in obitum H. W. (1710); the memoirs prefixed to English editions of the Oeconomy are based on this work.

R. T. BECKWITH

WITTER, HENNING BERNHARD (1683–1715)

Born May 7, 1683, in Hildesheim, W. died there May 8, 1715. The son of a Lutheran pastor, he studied biblical and oriental languages as well as rabbinical literature and mathematics in Jena (1701–4). After 1704 he studied primarily theology in Helmstedt and graduated as PhD and MA under H. von der HARDT. In 1706 he undertook a study trip to Holland. From 1707 until his early death from an epidemic, he was a pastor in Hildesheim.

After a series of shorter articles and polemical pamphlets in academic and ecclesiastical circles, W. wrote a commentary on Genesis but published only the first volume; the manuscript of the second volume disappeared after his death. Reflecting the basic approach and method of his time, the work seeks to accentuate moderate critical principles within the orthodox Lutheran church. Its uniqueness consists in the fact that it deals with the overall meaning of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) as intimated in its title: It discusses the legitimate claims of the Israelites to Palestine and gives a compendium of their laws as well as of divine teachings.

With regard to an area that was later to become of special interest, W. viewed Gen 1:1–2:3 as an ancient song that Moses placed at the beginning of his own work. The song is distinguished by its use of the divine name Elohim, a different style from the writing that follows, and its doublets with the continuation of the creation story. W. was criticized sharply by the Wittenberg theologian H. von Elswich, and his thesis was later forgotten in favor of that of J. ASTRUC. It was not until A. LODS that W.'s proposal was resurrected.

Works: Jura Israelitarum in Palaestinam terram Chananaeam commentatione in Genesin perpetua sic demonstrata, ut idiomatis authentici nativus sensus fideliter detegatur, Mosis Autoris primaeva intentio sollicitè definiatur, adeoque corpus doctrinae et juris cùm antiquissimum, tùm consummatissimum tandem eruatur (1711).

Bibliography: H. Bardtke, ZAW 66 (1954) 153-81. A. Lods, "Un précurseur allemand de J. Astruc: H. B. W.," ZAW 43 (1925) 134-35.

R. SMEND

WOLFF, HANS WALTER (1911–93)

Born in Barmen, Germany, Dec. 17, 1911, W. studied theology and ancient Near Eastern languages and history at Bethel, Göttingen, and Bonn. His graduate studies, undertaken while a vicar in Munster/W. and Solingen (1937–47), were interrupted by WWII; he was drafted into the Luftwaffe but continued to serve as pastor of a Confessing congregation on the weekends.

W.'s scholarly publishing career began early. A seminar paper written when he was twenty-one years old, "Die Begründigungen der prophetischen Heils- und Unheilsprüche" (ZAW 52 [1934] 1-22), is still frequently cited. His first dissertation, not submitted to his Doktorvater because of the latter's pro-Nazi sympathies, was published in 1937. A second dissertation on Isaiah in early Christianity, submitted to the theological faculty at Halle (1942) was also published (1950^2, 1952^3) and was reprinted as late as 1984.

W. began his teaching career at the Kirchliche Hochschule in Wuppertal in 1947 while continuing as a pastor in Solingen-Wald (1947–59) and became professor of HB there in 1951. He later taught at Mainz (1959–67) and then succeeded his mentor and friend, G. von RAD, at the University of Heidelberg, where he taught until his retirement in 1978. He died Oct. 22, 1993.

Throughout his career W. sought to educate the general reading public in biblical studies, to produce works that would aid proclamation and preaching, and to engage in critical biblical scholarship. He is best known for his commentaries on seven of the Minor Prophets written for the BKAT series, of which he was a co-founder and editor after the death of M. NOTH. Form-critical (see FORM CRITICISM), TRADITION-historical, and REDACTION interests were characteristics of his exegesis. He wrote special studies on the intellectual background (geistige Heimat) of Amos (wisdom circles), Hosea (northern levitical groups), and Micah (Judean rural community). In three articles W. sought to highlight the central thrust or message (kerygma) of the Yahwist and Elohist sources of the Pentateuch (see PENTATEUCHAL CRITICISM) and the DEUTERONOMISTIC HISTORY (collected in ET in W. Brueggemann's The Vitality of the OT Traditions [1975]). His study of the anthropology of the HB sought to enlighten the issue of "how in the OT human beings are initiated into a knowledge of themselves." In addition to his own writings W. edited collected essays by F. HORST, G. von Rad, and M. Noth as well as Festschriften for von Rad and C. WESTERMANN.

Works: Das Zitat im Prophetenspruch: Eine Studie zur prophetischen Verkündigungsweise (BEvT 4, 1937); Jesaja 53 im Urchristentum (1950); Vom Leben des Volkes Gottes: Drei Bibelarbeiten nach dem 2. Buch Mose und eine Predigt vom Stuttgarter Kirchentag, 1952 (BibS 4, 1952); Alttestamentliche Predigten, mit hermeneutischen Erwägugen (1956); Das befreiende Wort: Sieben Bibelauslegungen (1956); Immanuel, das Zeichen, dem widersprochen wird: Eine Auslegung von Jesaja 7,1-17 (BibS 23, 1959); Hosea (BKAT 14, 1, 1961; ET Hermeneia [1974]); Hosea 8–14: Der Gemeinde ausgelegt (Alttestamentliche Predigten 5, 1961); Frieden ohne Ende: Jesaja 7,1-17 und 9,1-6 ausgelegt (Schriftenreihe Biblische Studien 35, 1962); Die Botschaft des Buches Joel (TEH, 1963); Amos the Prophet: The Man and His Background (WMANT 18, 1964; ET 1973); Gesammelte Studien zum Alten Testament (TBü 22, 1964, 1973^2); Studien zum Jonabuch (BibS 47, 1965, 1975^2); Wegweisung: Gottes Wirken im Alten Testament. Vorträge zum Bibelverständnis (1965); Joel and Amos (BKAT 14, 2, 1969; ET, Hermeneia [1977]); Die Stunde des Amos: Prophetie und Protest (1969); The OT: A Guide to Its Writings (1970; ET 1973); Menschliches: Vier Reden über das Herz, den Ruhetag, die Ehe, und den Tod im Alten Testment (KT 5, 1971); Anthropology of the OT (1973, 1974^2, 1977^3, 1984^4; ET 1974); Prophetie in Bibel und Koran (Christentum und Islam 5, 1974); Obadiah and Jonah (BKAT 14, 3, 1977; ET 1981); Jonah: Church in Revolt (1978); Micah the Prophet (1978; ET 1981); Die Hochzeit der Hure: Hosea heute (1979); OT and Christian Preaching (1980; ET 1986); Confrontations with Prophets: Discovering the OT's New and Contemporary Significance (1982; ET 1983); Studien zur Prophetie: Probleme und Erträge, mit einer Werkbibliographie von J. Miltenberger (TBü 76, 1987); Haggai (BKAT 14, 6; ET 1988); Zugang zur Bibel: Eine Einführung in die Schriften des Alten und Neuen Testaments (ThTh 7, 9, 1988^3); Micah (BKAT 14, 4; ET 1990).

Bibliography: M. Augustin and J. Kegler (eds.), Das Alte Testament als geistige Heimat: Festgabe für H. W. W. zum 70. Geburtstag (1982). F. Crüsemann et al. (eds.), "Was ist der Mensch?" Beiträge zur Anthropologie des Alten Testaments: H. W. W. zum 80. Geburtstag (1992). J. Jeremias and L. Perlitt (eds.), Die Botschaft und die Boten: FS für H. W. W. zum 70. Geburtstag (1981).

G. STANSELL

WOMANIST BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION

1. Historical Overview. a. The Black theology movement. Womanist biblical interpretation arises from the groundbreaking and creative development in African American theological thought (see AFROCENTRIC BIBLICAL INTERPRETATION) called womanist theology. Womanist theology emerged out of the watershed Black theology movement of the 1960s and 1970s that ratified emphatically what theologians acceded theoretically—the ideologically and culturally conditioned roots and character of all theology—thus exploding the myth of a presumed rational objectivity and critiquing the Eurocentric IDEOLOGICAL and racial hegemony that has historically permeated traditional theology. Affirming the thesis that theology in the Christian tradition refers to the critical investigation of a person's or a community's belief in the divine and that the ultimate values of a religion should (and will) be viewed and interpreted from a people's own experience and social location, pioneering theologians J. Cone, J. Grant, J. Roberts, G. Wilmore, and other African American Christian theologians in major divinity schools and seminaries throughout the United States for the first time attempted to construct systematic theologies from the Black perspective; thus the African American experience, with its legacy of struggle arising from slavery, oppression, resistance, and survival in the New World—in sum, the lived experience of black peoples, including the Black church and Black culture—is necessarily a starting point for doing theology (see Cone [1969]; J. Evans [1987]; Grant [1989]; D. Hopkins [1993]; C. Lincoln [1990]).

b. Womanist theology. Like black male theologians, womanist theologians disavow the still-pervasive mythological tenet of Christian theology and biblical interpretation as disciplinarily, ideologically, and culturally disinterested (i.e., devoid of methodologically and practically "interested" or advocacy presuppositions and agendas; see R. Bultmann [1948–53; ET 1952–55] 289-96). Like other LIBERATION theology movements, black male, womanist, and FEMINIST theologies make explicit their starting point for doing theology (see E. Schüssler Fiorenza [1993] 1-21; R. Sugirtharajah [1991] 1-70).

Womanist theology begins with the experience of black women as its point of departure. Like feminist theologians, womanist theologians critique the hegemony of male-articulated understandings of the Christian faith and authenticate the significance of the gospel as read within the context of women's experience, validating in particular black women's experience as the primary source and context for understanding the nature of God and God's Word to humanity (see Grant [1989] ix). Womanist theologians also affirm the struggle against the evil of androcentrism and patriarchy that fosters gender subordination and oppression. Similarly, like black male theologians, womanist theologians critique the pervasiveness of White supremacy in traditional religion that fosters the evil of racial domination and oppression. But womanist theologians recognize the dynamics and politics of gender, race, and class as interlocking systems in an overarching structure of domination in their lives (F. Steady [c. 1981] 7-42); as such, the phenomenology of womanist theological analysis (and biblical interpretation) is multidimensional, inclusive of multiple anthropological referents in both genesis and scope.

Womanist theology privileges African American women's historic and contemporary experiences, voices, and perspectives purposefully, self-consciously, and practically as both a starting point and as a resource for doing theology. The theological expressions "womanist," "womanist theology," and "womanist biblical interpretation" arise from A. Walker's definition of the term, as found in her book, In Search of Our Mother's Gardens (1983): "Womanist 1. From womanish. (Opp. of 'girlish,' i.e., frivolous, irresponsible, not serious.) A black feminist of color. From the black folk expression of mothers to female children, 'You acting womanish,' i.e., like a woman. Usually referring to outrageous, audacious, courageous or willful behavior. Wanting to know more and in greater depth than is considered 'good' for one. Interested in grown-up doings. Acting grown up. Being grown up. Interchangeable with another black folk expression: 'You trying to be grown.' Responsible. In charge. Serious" (xi). Walker's culturally coded womanist concept provides significant clues for work undertaken by womanist theologians, with direct implications for the work of womanist biblical interpreters, in at least three ways.

First, Walker's womanist concept suggests that a womanist is a black feminist who is self-identified and constructively assertive—able to interpret reality and define her objectives in order to secure the well-being of herself and others (recalling heroines like H. Tubman), accenting the quality of life and survival interests of black women (see D. Williams [1993] 20-21). As a theology that is a critical and constructive reflection on the Christian faith, womanist theology validates black women's intellectual and generative knowledge base and their functions as creators, models, and purveyors of wide-ranging and transformative theological discourses and praxes, subjugated knowledge, and emancipatory traditions that effect revolutionary and liberating personal, communal, ecclesial, and sociopolitical change for women and men alike (a womanist is a universalist by temperament; see Walker, xi-xii).

Second, whereas traditional Eurocentric masculinist and feminist theological worldviews and discourses and the early writings of black male liberation theologians have historically fostered black women's invisibility and subordination, womanist theology renders black women's experiences decisively visible and their contributions in the formation, assessment, and critique of religious and theological meaning inestimable in the academic study of religion.

Third, Walker's allusion to the rich and historic tradition of the transmission of "mother wit" (wisdom) between mother and daughter in the definition comprises one of many cultural codes pointing to the primacy and crystallization of such values as mutuality, relationality, kinship and friendship networks, and familial and communal empowerment in women-centered activities and formed traditions in the African American community. Whereas some feminist theorizing more normatively privileges an individualistic worldview and various degrees of female separation in the face of inequality (see D. King [1988] 58; P. Couture [1996] 94-104), the effectiveness and resiliency of women-centered networks of resistance and care and the well-being of black women, men, families, and communities comprise a recurrent motif in womanist theological discourses (see K. Cannon [1995] 47-56; C. J. Sanders [1995] 84-94; Williams [1993] xiv).

2. The Project and Tasks of Womanist Biblical Interpretation. a. The Bible in womanist biblical interpretation. Womanist biblical interpretation is premised on at least three assumptions about the centrality and function of the Bible in the African American community. First, the Bible remains for a significant number of African American women and men the primary (though not exclusive) conduit of the community's understanding of God's being and acts—the church's book—and a plumb line for the life and practice of the Christian community (Evans [1987] 33).

For black women, God's revelation as witnessed in the Bible and read and heard within the context of their experience constitutes a primary source for their understanding of God—this, in spite of the fact that for several centuries black slave women were prohibited from reading the Bible. As HB scholar R. Weems so cogently observes: "For African-American (Protestant) women the Bible has been the only book passed down from her ancestors, and it has been presented to her as the medium for experiencing and knowing the will of the Christian God" (1991, 63; see Grant [1993] 279).

Unwilling to jettison the Bible in spite of its uses and abuses against African Americans by proslavery jurists, apologists, and others in the dominant European culture of seventeenth-, eighteenth-, and nineteenth-century America to provide the argumentum and invidium par excellence (a definite and supreme appeal to prejudices) in support of chattel slavery, womanist biblical interpreters and generations of African Americans have found in many of its traditions, stories, and themes affirmation of enduring ancestral traditions; the valuation of communal solidarity motifs and biblical mandates enjoining love, mercy, and justice; and the critical paradigms that informed their quest for freedom and inspired hope (cf. God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt, Exod 1:1-15; and the description of Jesus in his earthly ministry as vested with power to deliver women and men from the death-dealing effects of individual and structural sin and oppression to a new life of redemptive and communal wholeness, Luke 4:16-20; 8:40-48; also see Williams [1993] 148-52). Similarly, stories of female and male personalities in the HB and in the Christian Scriptures, inclusive of black Africans in the ancient Near East and in the Greco-Roman world (e.g., the Queen of Sheba in 1 Kgs 10:1-10, 13; Ebed-Melech in Jer 38:7-13; and the Ethiopian eunuch in Acts 8:26-40) inspire unyielding perseverence, strength in weakness, hope in the face of despair, the possibilities of a radically transformed and renewed life in the face of a multiplicity of death-dealing forces.

The previously cited biblical motifs and others hold special interest for African Americans continually assailed by the racial Moloch that sought to circumscribe the integrity of their lives and the promise of their potential on the American landscape. In short, black people have developed an experiential sympathy with much of the Bible, for they have found within its stories ancient symbols of their own predicament and of their own struggle for liberation (C. Felder [1989] 6).

Second, if womanist biblical interpreters have corroborated that the Bible has functioned as a historic, life-giving, and empowering resource for both African Americans and the larger human community because they find their story in the biblical story, they also acknowledge the problematics of the Bible as a pervasively androcentric, patriarchal text. As such, womanist biblical scholars impart a HERMENEUTIC of suspicion to the interpretative task (see Schüssler Fiorenza [1984]), recognizing, for example, that recovering the religious beliefs, experiences, and history of women in the HB and in the Christian Scriptures is methodologically problematic, as much because the Scriptures were written and mediated by males and male-dominated institutions and interests as because the larger interests of the biblical writers often display a dialectic of concealment, redacted traditional interests encased in artistically and rhetorically nuanced figures and symbols. Thus biblical traditions necessarily require critical analysis to assess their meanings within their own socio-historical and ideological context, and critical discernment regarding their possible use and relevance in emancipatory struggles.

Third, womanist biblical interpreters have consistently heralded the need to identify and demystify the reality and effects of multiple, interlocking ideologies and systems of hegemony and domination inscribed within the biblical traditions and stories and within traditional male and female (including feminist) Eurocentric critical exegetical theories and practices.

b. Tasks of womanist interpreters. The multiple tasks of womanist biblical interpreters in the production of womanist religious scholarship are informed as much by their training in the standard and traditionalist methodologies and practices of biblical criticism in the academic guild as they are by the discourses, values, and sociopolitical and religious experiences and cosmological worldview of African American culture. While the tasks of womanist biblical interpreters are richly diverse and eclectically wide-ranging, four tasks are briefly noted here.

First, womanist interpreters expand on earlier works and on the appropriate recovery, analysis, and reconstruction of the texts and of their worlds as well as on the history of the HB and the Christian Scriptures, including an analysis of their symbolic universes, rhetorical character, and the luminous depths and the ideological complexities of their sacred histories. The reconstruction of the historic faith traditions embedded within both the HB and the Christian Scriptures must necessarily include a recovery of the history of women within the biblical traditions, including a recognition of the methodological complexities attending such reconstructions (see B. Brooten [c. 1985]).

Biblical scholar R. Weems has shown that the recovery and excavation of women's history can yield unsettling historical conundrums about the complexities of women's experience of, e.g., the social constructions of violence and gender including the role of religious language in reinforcing domination (1989). It can likewise provide a blueprint for the possibilities of enhanced emancipatory practices and commitments (1988). Weems aptly demonstrates that even when the hermeneutic aim is the recovery of women's history and agency in biblical texts, the interpreter must always have in view the persons for whom the text is interpreted—that is, given a range of possible audiences, womanist consciousness notably has in view the multiple ways in which the interpretive strategy "arouses, manipulates, and harnesses African American women's deepest yearnings (1991, 59)."

Second, in addition to recovering women's history in the Judeo-Christian tradition, womanist biblical interpreters seek to reclaim the neglected histories and stories of the presence and function of black peoples within divergent biblical traditions, including an assessment of the significance for the respective biblical writer of the African Blacks as active participants in the salvation dramas of ancient Israel (see Gen 16:1-15; 21:8-21; 1 Kgs 10:1-10; Jer 38:7; 39:16) and in the early Christian movement (see Matt 12:42; Luke 11:31; Acts 8:26-40; for a detailed explanation of the significance of ethnographic identity for a biblical writer, see C. Martin [1989]). In a related task, womanist biblical interpretation includes within its purview the need for critical exploration of the origin and evolution of religiously sanctioned and mythological ideas about "blacker" and "blackness" in the history of ideas in both Christian and Western social thought. Topics for analysis include the historic antecedents and expressions of "Blacks" and "blackness" in Greco-Roman thought, within the writings and ideas of patristic theologians (the early church fathers and mothers), and within medieval Christendom (Martin [1989]; see also the important work of R. Hood [1994]).

Third, while attending to such issues as gender, subjectivity in interpretation, the construction of power in social relation, and the possibilities of liberatory intellectual, social, and ecclesial transformations arising from critical exegetical practices in collaboration with white North American and European feminist interpreters, womanist biblical interpreters must nevertheless continue to challenge the persistent and still normative narrowness of vision of feminist theologians and biblical interpreters on the subject of race. The still negligible attention given to issues of ethnicity and race in feminist theological discourses and practices ignores the reality of race and ethnicity as legitimate sites of dialogic exchange and contestation in biblical interpretation and diminishes the significance of the power and the effects of the simultaneity of gender, race, and class variants in their assessment of biblical meaning. Womanist biblical interpreters and theorists who have examined the politics of ethnicity, class, equality, and difference in the Hagar and Sarah traditions in the HB (Gen 16:1-15; 21:1-21) and the consequential historical and political effects of traditionalist interpretations of these texts on generations of black and white women (see Gal 4:21-31), have demonstrated that the "technologies of race" must be taken as seriously as gender in biblical interpretation. For the most extensive and erudite analysis of the Hagar and Sarah story in this regard, see D. Williams (1993) and Weems's useful explanation of the implication of these biblical traditions for contemporary women (1988).

A fourth task of womanist biblical interpretion is the retrieval and documentary analysis of the effective history of the HB and the Christian Scriptures in Western culture in general and on peoples of African descent in Black diasporic communities in particular. The sociohistorical and political effects of exegetical readings and practices on generations of African Americans, for example, continues to be documented by womanist scholars (for a "metalanguage of race" in feminist theory see E. Higginbotham [1995]). Ethicist K. Cannon (1985) contrasts the effects of the oppressive use of the Bible by proslavery apologists with the liberation hermeneutic upheld by women and men in the Black churches during the antebellum period of American history. Similarly in her story of the origin and function of the household codes, Martin contrasts the glaring contradictions in the strategic use of the domestic codes to provide philosophical legitimation for the subordination of women (through the use of a literalist hermeneutics) with the abandonment of the literalist hermeneutic strategy to advance the argument for the abolution of chattel slavery by nineteenth-century abolitionists (Martin [1991] 206-31).

Bibliography: B. J. Brooten, "Early Christian Women in the Cultural Context: Issues of Method in Historical Reconstruction," Feminist Perspectives on Biblical Scholarship (BSNA 10, ed. A. Y. Collins, 1985). K. D. Brown, "God Is as Christ Does: Toward a Womanist Theology," JRT 46 (1989) 7-16. R. Bultmann, The Theology of the NT (1948–53; ET 1952–55). K. Cannon, "The Emergence of Black Feminist Consciousness," Feminist Interpretation of the Bible (ed. L. Russell, 1985) 30-40; Black Womanist Ethics (AAR.AS 60, 1988); Katie's Canon: Womanism and the Soul of the Black Community (1995) 47-56. P. H. Collins, Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and the Politics of Empowerment (1990). J. H. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power (1969). J. H. Cone and G. S. Wilmore, Black Theology: A Documentary History (1979, 1993²). P. D. Couture, Blessed Are the Poor? Women's Poverty, Family Policy, and Practical Theology (1991); "Weaving the Web: Pastoral Care in an Individualistic Society," Through the Eyes of Women: Insights for Pastoral Care (ed. J. S. Moessner, 1996). T. M. Eugene, "Moral Values and Black Womanists," JRT 14 (1988) 23-34. J. H. Evans, Black Theology: A Critical Assessment and Annotated Bibliography (1987); We Have Been Believers: An African-American Systematic Theology (1992). C. H. Felder, Troubling Biblical Waters: Race, Class, and Family (1989); (ed.), Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation (1991). E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Bread Not Stone: The Challenges of Feminist Biblical Interpretation (1984) 1-22; Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Introduction (1993). J. Grant, White Woman's Christ and Black Woman's Jesus: Feminist Christology and Womanist Response (1989); "Womanist Theology: Black Women's Experience as a Source for Doing Theology, with Special Reference to Christology," Black Theology: A Documentary History (ed. J. H. Cone and G. S. Wilmore, 1993) 2:273-89; Perspectives on Womanist Theology (1995). D. L. Hayes, Hagar's Daughters: Womanist Ways of Being in the World (1995). C. M. Haywood, Prophesying Daughters: Nineteenth-century Black Women Preachers, Religious Conviction, and Resistance (1998). E. B. Higginbotham, "African American Women's History and the Metalanguage of Race," We Specialize in the Wholly Impossible: A Reader in Black Women's History (ed. D. C. Hine, W. King, and L. Reedy, 1995) 3-24. R. E. Hood, Begrimed and Black: Christian Traditions on Blacks and Blackness (1994). D. N. Hopkins, Black Theology USA and South Africa: Political and Cultural Liberation (1988); Shoes That Fit Our Feet: Sources for a Constructive Black Theology (1993). D. K. King, "Multiple Jeopardy, Multiple Consciousness: The Context of a Black Feminist Ideology," Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society 14 (1988) 42-72. C. E. Lincoln, The Black Church in the African American Experience (1990). C. J. Martin, "A Chamberlain's Journey and the Challenge of Interpretation for Liberation [Acts 8:26-40]," Semeia 47 (1989) 105-35; "The Haustafeln (Household Codes) in African American Biblical Interpretation: 'Free Slaves' and 'Subordinate Women,' " Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation (ed. C. H. Felder, 1991) 206-31. D. Patte, Ethics and Biblical Interpretation: A Reevaluation (1995). J. D. Roberts, Black Theology Today (1983); The Prophethood of Black Believers: An African American Political Theology for Ministry (1994). C. J. Sanders, Empowerment Ethics for Liberated People: A Path to African American Social Transformation (1995); Living the Intersection: Womanism and Afrocentrism in Theology (1995). F. C. Steady, The Black Woman Cross-culturally (1981). R. S. Sugirtharajah, Interpreting the Bible in the Third World (1991). E. M. Townes, Womanist Justice, Womanist Hope (1993). A. Walker, In Search of Our Mother's Gardens: Womanist Prose (1983); In a Blaze of Glory: Womanist Spirituality as Social Witness (1995). R. J. Weems, Just a Sister Away (1988); "Gomer: Victim of Violence or Victim of Metaphor?" Semeia 47 (1989) 87-104; "Reading Her Way Through the Struggle: African American Women and the Bible," Stony the Road We Trod: African American Biblical Interpretation (ed. C. H. Felder, 1991) 57-77. D. S. Williams, "Womanist Theology: Black Woman's Voices," Christianity and Crisis 47 (1987) 66-70; Sisters in the Wilderness: The Challenge of Womanist God-talk (1993).

C. J. MARTIN

WOMAN'S BIBLE, THE

This two-volume commentary was written primarily by E. C. STANTON on those parts of the Bible that either directly refer to women or conspicuously—in Stanton's view—omit them. It grew out of Stanton's conviction that the church and its interpretation of the Bible were the chief obstacles to improving women's lot. As the daughter of a judge, she learned early that women's legal disabilities were often based on biblical interpretations. At age eleven she asked her Presbyterian pastor to tutor her in Greek, and he later willed her his Greek LEXICON, testament, grammar, and four volumes of Scott's commentaries. She also studied Greek at the Johnstown (New York) Academy and received a Greek NT as a prize for her achievements. Stanton spoke out against the religious oppression of women and the use of the Bible in that effort at the first women's rights convention at Senaca Falls in 1848.

Publicity surrounding the revision of the KJV that resulted in the British RV (1881, 1885) prompted Stanton to begin The Woman's Bible in 1886, although she soon laid the project aside until 1894. The Woman's Bible came out in paper in two volumes: part 1 on the Pentateuch (1895) and part 2 from Joshua through Revelation (1896).

Stanton formed her own "Revising Committee" of twenty American and five European women. In her introduction she admitted that some distinguished women scholars refused to join the committee, "afraid that their high reputation and scholarly attainments might be compromised by taking part in an enterprise that for a time may prove very unpopular" (1:9). Even those on the committee contributed less than one-third of the final work (seven women besides Stanton wrote something for vol. 1 and eight for vol. 2). Contributors included L. Blake, F. Burr, L. Chandler, C. Colby, E. Dietrick, M. Gage, U. Gestefeld, P. Hanaford (a Universalist minister), C. Neyman, and L. Southworth. Most were associated with liberal religion and new thought. Few had any expertise in biblical interpretation.

Stanton and her friends worked almost exclusively from the English Bible and from a few standard commentaries. Thus they had difficulty differentiating between text and interpretation. "The canon law, church ordinances, and Scriptures, are homogeneous, and all reflect the same spirit and sentiments," said Stanton.

Two thirds of The Woman's Bible is devoted to the HB, much of it to the Pentateuch (Genesis receives twice the space devoted to any other book. The approach was to quote a short passage and then to make random comments. Stanton gave surprisingly little attention to what she would have termed the "Pauline" epistles (see PAUL). There is only one paragraph on 1 Cor 14:34-35; nothing on Ephesians 5 or on Gal 3:28.

The first volume received extensive criticism, and in 1896 the National Woman's Suffrage Association passed a resolution dissociating itself from the project. Leaders felt that their cause was better served by political rather than by religious arguments.

Bibliography: L. W. Banner, E. C. Stanton: A Radical for Woman's Rights (1980). C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (eds.), The Women's Bible Commentary (1992) xiii-xix. E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Searching the Scriptures: A Feminist Interpretation 2 (1993) 1-26. E. L. Thomsen, "The Women's Bible: Heritage and Harbinger of Hope for Feminist Hermeneutics" (diss., Graduate Theological Union, 1991).

N. A. HARDESTY

WOOLSTON, THOMAS (1670–1733)

Born at Northampton, England, W. was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and was a fellow of the college from 1691. In his first published work (1705) he argued for a revival of an allegorical reading of the Scriptures. Following A. COLLINS's attack on the apologetic argument from the fulfillment of PROPHECY (1724), W. wrote a series of pamphlets denying the historical truth of the Gospel miracle stories and asserting that their true meaning is allegorical, as ORIGEN and the fathers taught. W.'s "allegorical sense" is generally anticlerical. His criterion for rejecting the literal sense is often moral: The stories of the Gadarene swine, the withering of the fig tree, and the transformation of water into wine are declared inconsistent with the rule that a genuine miracle must manifest the divine benevolence. The Gospels' claims about JESUS' resurrection are clearly the product of apostolic fraud, and the apostles must have stolen his body—a claim that anticipated the work of H. S. REIMARUS and evoked T. Sherlock's well-known Tryal of the Witnesses (1729) in reply. W. was deprived of his fellowship in 1721 and died Jan. 27, 1733, while technically a prisoner for failing to pay the £100 fine that followed his pamphlets.

Works: An Old Apology for the Truth of the Christian Religion Against the Jews and Gentiles, Revived (1705); Six Discourses on the Miracles of Our Saviour (1727–29); Two Defenses of His Discourses (1729–30).

Bibliography: R. M. Burns, The Great Debate on Miracles: From J. Glanville to D. Hume (1981). H. J. Hillerbrand, "The Historicity of Miracles: The Early Eighteenth-century Debate Among W., Annet, Sherlock, and West," SR 3 (1973–74) 132-51. MSHH 40 (1739) 274-91. H. G. Reventlow, The Authority of the Bible and the Rise of the Modern World (ET 1984) 369-72. L. Stephen, History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century (1876) 1:228-42. N. L. Torrey, "Voltaire and T. W.: The Argument Against Miracles," Voltaire and the English Deists (1930) 59-103.

F. WATSON

WREDE, FRIEDRICH GEORG EDUARD WILLIAM (1859–1906)

Born in Bücken, Hannover, May 10, 1859, W. studied at Leipzig (1877–79) under K. Kahnis (1814–88), C. Luthardt (1823–1902), and Franz DELITZSCH and—after being greatly disappointed by the famous Lutherans—chose A. von HARNACK as his guide. He was introduced to the theology of A. RITSCHL, which he pursued in Göttingen (1879–80) under Ritschl himself, also studying with H. SCHULTZ and B. DUHM. W. became a seminarian at the elite theological institution of Loccum (1882–84) governed by G. Uhlhorn, who followed an educational philosophy of independent inquiry and teamwork. While inspector at the Göttingen Theologische Stift (1884–86) he formed a lasting friendship with K. A. A. L. EICHHORN, who directed W. away from Ritschl to a more autonomous historical-critical study. From 1887 to 1889 W. served a pastorate in Langenholzen-Hörsum. He received the lic. theol. at Göttingen (1891) with a dissertation on 1 Clement. As Privatdozent in Göttingen he was among the young biblical scholars and theologians who in the 1890s were known as the RE-

LIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE, among them W. BOUSSET, H. GUNKEL, J. WEISS, and E. TROELTSCH.

In 1892 W. became extraordinarius in Breslau and in 1895 ordinarius. During his tenure in Breslau he published two works of abiding theological significance—his 1897 critique of NT theology and the seminal study on the messianic secret (1901)—but also other works that sought new directions in biblical studies. His rigorous critique and radical historical conclusions led to constant tension among the theological faculty and with the conservative Silesian church. W. was a master teacher and sensitive musician who actively participated in the musical life of Breslau; he also served for several years as director of the Institute of Church Music at Breslau University. He died Nov. 23, 1906, of a heart ailment at age forty-six.

Consistent with his identification with the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule, W. demanded in his critique of contemporaneous biblical and NT theology that only factual historical criteria govern the reconstruction of the religion and theology of the biblical writings and that this task be undertaken free from any dependence on church and theology. As a historical discipline, NT THEOLOGY was not to be limited to canonical writings, since only contextual and factual requirements, not theological delimitations (e.g., the notion of the canon of Scripture) determine the scope of the field. And since the religious historian was concerned with the living religion and theology of early Christianity, not with its doctrinal extract, only their concrete historical meaning and effects became the focus of inquiry. W. wanted to see treated within a TRADITION-historical framework sensitive to all relevant disciplines that might help elucidate the religio-historical context: the critically reconstructed proclamation of JESUS; the faith of the early church in its different geographical locales and distinct Jewish and gentile setting; and a special consideration of the theologies of PAUL and of John as well as their effects on subsequent theological developments.

W.'s Messianic Secret in the Gospels was directed especially against the psychological conjectures (see PSYCHOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) and developmental assumptions underlying the liberal "life of Jesus" genre. Following Eichhorn's maxim that both the genuine sayings of Jesus and the early Christian traditions about him were legitimate objects of historical inquiry, W. aimed to trace and understand the growth of the messianic secret in the Gospel of Mark and in other relevant literature. W. understood the "messianic secret" (which for him combined several features, e.g., disciple incomprehension and esoteric teachings by Jesus, into one motif already existent in oral tradition), not as actual events in the life of Jesus, but as a theological construct used by Mark to reconcile the primitive view of Jesus as human with the messianic view of Jesus' life and person after the resurrection. In doing so he dealt a death blow to the confidence of the liberals in the historical reliability of Mark. He drew attention to the need to understand the traditions in the Gospels primarily as theological products of the community's faith and with his tradition-historical inquiry prepared the way for subsequent approaches, notably FORM CRITICISM and REDACTION CRITICISM.

Other publications by W. raised significant critical issues. His study on 1 Clement broke with the naive realism that had reconstructed from the letter the Corinthian situation. W. used 1 Clement instead as a document that illustrated Roman Christianity at the turn of the first century. His study on Paul—besides underscoring in dramatic fashion the contrast between the proclamation of Jesus and the theology of Paul—raised the question about the origin of the savior myth and the polemical significance of the justification doctrine within Paul's theology. In his brief study of the Gospel of John, W. specified Gnosticism (see GNOSTIC INTERPRETATION) as an appropriate religion-historical context as well as an anti-Jewish polemical setting. His LITERARY studies of 1 Thessalonians and Hebrews prepared the way for a form-critical consideration of the epistolary genre.

Works: Untersuchungen zum Ersten Klemensbriefe (1891); "Über Aufgabe und Methode der sogenannten Neutestamentlichen Theologie" (1897; ET "The Task and Methods of 'NT Theology,' " The Nature of NT Theology: The Contribution of W. W. and A. Schlatter [R. Morgan, SBT 2, 25 1973] 68-116, 182-93); Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien: Zugleich ein Beitrag zum Verständnis des Markusevangeliums (1901; ET, The Messianic Secret [1971]); Charakter und Tendenz des Johannesevangeliums (SGV 37, 1903); Die Echtheit des zweiten Thessalonicherbriefes (TU new ser. 9, 2, 1903); Paulus (Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, 1st ser. 5-6, 1904; ET, Paul [1907]); Das literarische Rätsel des Hebräerbriefes: Mit einem Anhang über den literarischen Charakter des Barnabasbriefes (FRLANT 8, 1906); Die Entstehung der Schriften des Neuen Testaments (1907; ET, The Origin of the NT [1909]); Vorträge und Studien (1907).

Bibliography: J. L. Bevins, The Messianic Secret in Markan Research, 1901–76 (1981). W. Bousset, Paulus (W. Wrede, 1907²) 3-10. H. Gressmann, A. Eichhorn und die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule in Göttingen (1914). G. Lüdemann, "Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule," Theologie in Göttingen: Eine Vorlesungsreihe (ed. B. Moeller, 1987) 325-61. G. Lüdemann and M. Schröder, Die Religionsgeschichtliche Schule in Göttingen: Eine Dokumentation (1987). H. Renz and F. W. Graf, Troeltsch Studien: Untersuchungen zur Biographie und Werkgeschichte (1982). H. Rollmann, "Paulus alienus: W. R. on Comparing Jesus and Paul," From Jesus to Paul: Studies in Honour of F. W. Beare (ed. P. Richardson and J. C. Hurd, 1984) 23-45; "Theologie und Religionsgeschichte: Zeitgenössische Stimmen zur Diskussion um die religionsgeschichtliche Methode und die Einführung relig-ionsgeschichtlicher Lehrstühle in den theologischen Fakultäten um die Jahrhundertwende," ZTK 80 (1983) 69-84; HHMBI, 394-98. A. Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus: A Critical Study of Its Progress from Reimarus to W. (1911). G. Strecker, "W. W.: Zur hundertsten Wiederkehr seines Geburtstages," ZTK 57 (1960) 67-91. K. Weidel, "W. W. in memoriam," Chronik des Wissenschaftlich-theologischen Vereins zu Breslau in den Jahren 1861–1911 (ed. K. Lillge, 1911). W. Wiefel, "Zur Würdigung W. W.," ZRGG (1971) 60-83.

H. ROLLMANN

WRIGHT, GEORGE ERNEST (1909–74)

Born Sept. 5, 1909, the son of a Presbyterian clergyman in Zanesville, Ohio, W. graduated from the College of Wooster in 1931, completed his BD at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Chicago (1943), and was ordained to the Presbyterian ministry. He received his MA and PhD from the Johns Hopkins University (1937) with a dissertation under W. F. ALBRIGHT on early Palestinian pottery (pub. 1937). When the situation in Palestine on the eve of war in 1937 prevented his serving as field secretary of the AMERICAN SCHOOLS OF ORIENTAL RESEARCH in Jerusalem, he spent the year on a fellowship at Haverford College, completing publications on the Ain Shems excavations. In 1938 he began his teaching career at McCormick Theological Seminary, remaining there to become professor of OT history and theology in 1945. In 1958 he became Parkman Professor of Divinity and Curator of the Semitic Museum at Harvard, posts he held until his death Aug. 29, 1974.

W.'s career as a field archaeologist (see ARCHAEOLOGY AND BIBLICAL STUDIES) began in the summer of 1934 when he accompanied Albright to Bethel. He resumed excavation in 1956 when he launched the Drew-McCormick-ASOR expedition to Shechem in the hill country near Nablus and directed these excavations roughly every other season through 1964, remaining an adviser through the 1966–73 seasons. In 1964–65 while visiting archaeological director of the newly opened Hebrew Union College Biblical and Archaeological School in Jerusalem, he collaborated with President N. GLUECK to begin at Gezer a ten-year project of the Hebrew Union College and the Harvard Semitic Museum. After directing the 1964–65 seasons, he turned the project over to his doctoral students W. Dever, H. Lance, J. Seger, and others, who directed annual seasons through 1974. Gezer, the largest and longest-running American excavation in Israel in that period, had a considerable impact on field and research methods and became the major training ground for the next generation of Syro-Palestinian archaeologists.

W. moved to Cyprus in 1971 to resume excavations begun at Idalion by P. Lapp. Subsequent work was carried on after W.'s death by his students L. Stager, A. Walker, and P. Gaber in 1974, 1976, and 1978. In his later years W. was also actively involved in many other American excavations in the Middle East and was president of ASOR from 1966 until his death. His archaeological influence continued and multiplied through numerous field directors, younger scholars in teaching posts, and ASOR's senior officers—almost all of whom were his students in the classroom and in the field. Finally, he was a widely read popular spokesman for archaeology as founder and editor for twenty-five years of the BA.

W.'s publications were extensive, both in biblical studies and in Palestinian and biblical archaeology. In biblical studies he published several significant works (1944, 1950, 1952, 1969). These books were supplemented by numerous articles in nearly all the leading journals on such subjects as the patriarchal and conquest eras, FORM CRITICISM, HERMENEUTICS, Israelite religion and cult, general trends in biblical interpretation, and especially OT THEOLOGY. W.'s activity as a layperson and participant in the ecumenical movement resulted in numerous semi-popular handbooks, published lectures, sermons, and reviews.

In archaeology, W.'s early volumes on Palestinian pottery and on the Ain Shems excavation were followed during the war years and during his theological focus at McCormick in the late 1940s and 1950s by a series of brilliant review articles on major excavation reports that kept his archaeological reputation alive. Then, beginning with the Shechem project in 1956, and especially with his founding of the leading graduate program in Palestinian archaeology at Harvard in 1959, he turned to a series of seminal, specialized works in archaeology. These included numerous articles, several of them classics, and several books (1957, 1965, 1970, 1974). The final reports of his Shechem excavations unfortunately did not appear during his lifetime, but the staff he left in place continued the momentum of the project and began full publication with D. Cole's Shechem I: The Middle Bronze IIB Pottery (1984).

W.'s dual career as prominent biblical scholar and layperson and simultaneously the leading Palestinian archaeologist of his generation was unusual, perhaps unique—even in the heyday of the biblical archaeology movement (the latter very much his own creation, more so than Albright's). As an HB scholar he will be best remembered for numerous articles mediating the methods and results of continental scholarship to an American audience, for his lively concern with hermeneutical issues, and for his insistence on the constructive role of archaeology in biblical criticism. His coupling of the latter with his lifelong theological interests, however, emerged in a distinctly American, neo-orthodox style of biblical archaeology that made him a rather controversial figure, especially in Europe. Perhaps the most outspoken advocacy of his views on the "faith and history" theme came in his God Who Acts (1952) and then again in a late (and rather poorly received) work, The OT and Theology (1969).

W.'s role as a leading spokesperson for the biblical theology movement waned in the 1960s along with that movement, but also as a result of his increasing involvement with his first love, archaeology. The Shechem, Gezer, and Idalion projects (1956–73) and the presidency of ASOR (1966–74) absorbed his last and perhaps best energies. It could be argued that as a Syro-Palestinian archaeologist he even surpassed his mentor Albright. In methodology his acknowledged mastery of pottery was later supplemented by pioneering experimentation in adapting British stratigraphic methods. In his last article, published posthumously (1974), he even came out unequivocally for the still-controversial "new archaeology." Indeed, much of the momentum behind the revolution in North American Palestinian archaeology in the 1980s was directly due to his initiatives, especially through his students and through his prescient vision for the future of ASOR in the Middle East. As a human, a scholar, and a teacher he was characterized by a rare sense of vocation, an absolute commitment to the refinements of methodology, a remarkable candor and modesty, and above all the courage of his convictions.

Works: The Pottery of Palestine from Earliest Times to the End of the Early Bronze Age (1937); (with E. Grant), Ain Shems Excavations, pts. 4, 5 (1938–39); The Challenge of Israel's Faith (1944); The OT Against Its Environment (SBT 2, 1950); God Who Acts: Biblical Theology as Recital (SBT 8, 1952); (ed. with F. V. Filson), The Westminister Historical Atlas to the Bible (1956); Biblical Archaeology (1957); Shechem: The Biography of a Biblical City (1965); The OT and Theology (1969); (with W. G. Dever and H. D. Lance), Gezer I: Preliminary Report of the 1964–66 Seasons in Fields I and II (1970); (with L. E. Stager and A. Walker), American Expedition to Idalion, Cyprus: First Preliminary Reports. Seasons of 1971 and 1972 (1974).

Bibliography: BA 50, 2 (1987) fiftieth anniversary issue with tributes. BASOR 220-21 (1975–76), memorial issue, esp. D. N. Freedman, "In Memoriam G. E. W.," 220, 3-4. F. M. Cross, W. E. Lemke, and P. M. Miller (eds.), Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God. Essays on the Bible and Archaeology in Memory of G. E. W. (1976) 577–93 (complete bibliography). R. L. Hicks, HHMBI, 618-23.

W. G. DEVER

WRITER (or WRIGHTER), CLEMENT (fl. 1645–60)

A radical religious thinker, sometime General Baptist, and sometimes regarded as a Seeker, W. was originally a clothier from Worcester, but he was known in London and was a friend of the Leveller W. WALWYN. He was responsible for introducing scriptural skepticism rather early (1646) into English radical publication. Since all biblical language and translations were riddled with errors, no belief could be founded on them: "Can Any Make Fundamentals of Uncertainties" (An Apologeticall Narration [1658] 76). Instead, conviction must come from "divine evidence," the presence of the Holy Spirit in the individual. Biblical TEXTUAL CRITICISM was a tyranny imposed by the clerisy on simple people, who should be allowed liberty of interpretation according to their own experience of the Spirit. There are Leveller tones in W.'s tracts (scriptural interpretation, he said, should never go against the law of nature), and the defeat of the Levellers may be reflected in the pessimism of his later writings. His humane skepticism, well informed by a wide variety of sources, is a defense against personal hypocrisy: "In a Scripture-sense a man at one and the same time may be said to believe, and not to believe, (that is) to believe intellectually, and not to believe obedientially, whereby he becomes a self-condemner" (Fides Divina [1657] 77).

Works: The Jus Divinum of Presbyterie (1646, 1655[2]); Fides Divina (1657); An Apologeticall Narration (1658[2]).

Bibliography: C. Hill, The World Turned Upside Down: Radical Ideas During the English Revolution (1972). N. Smith, "The Charge of Atheism and the Language of Radical Speculation, 1640–80," Atheism from the Reformation to the Enlightenment (ed. M. Hunter and D. Wootton, 1992).

N. SMITH

WYCLIF, JOHN (c. 1333–84)

Born about 1333 near Richmond in Yorkshire, W. went to Oxford about 1350, at first as a student at Baliol, later (1356) as a fellow of Merton. In 1360 he became master at Baliol, although his ordination duties officially remained in the diocese of York. In 1371 he took his doctorate in theology and gave his Principium or inaugural lecture. During the following thirteen years until his death by a stroke during the Eucharist at his Lutterworth parish church Dec. 31, 1384, he was responsible for more than forty major works of theological reflection and scriptural commentary in Latin (no verifiable writing of his own in English remains), besides inspiring and probably in some measure directing the English TRANSLATION of the Bible that still bears his name.

W.'s Principium provides a succinct introduction to his principal preoccupations as a student of Scripture. He argued that one who would interpret the Bible so as to acquire the divine Author's intentions must have three prerequisites: first, a sound moral disposition—an inclination of the heart to spiritual truth; second, rigorous philosophical training; third, the actual practice of virtue—an obedient life of faith. Without these, he argued, the interpreter cannot oppose world, flesh, and devil as they enter into the very arena of interpretation (B. Smalley [1964] 276). It is evident that heretics, infidels, and persons living in mortal sin can all study theology, but they do not in that state gain true spiritual wisdom by their efforts. The first condition for a student of Scripture, exceeding in value any capacity for academic disputation or logical analysis, is a basic godly morality such as will prompt searching for a just interpretation of the text (D. L. Jeffrey [1985]). This application of AUGUSTINE's goal of "reading charitably" corresponds in W.'s thought to his emphasis on the moral basis in Christian obedience for holding office in church or state, his theory of "true dominion."

For students of the history of biblical HERMENEUTICS, the most important of W.'s works is his De Veritate Sacrae Scripturae, a series of lectures on the primacy of Scripture's AUTHORITY in matters of faith and conscience written and delivered at Oxford in 1377–78. In them he argued that sacred Scripture, God's law (lex Dei, lex Christi), is entirely sufficient for the guidance of the body of Christ (De Veritate 1:55, 148, 183, 245, 343); canon law, which has had the lamentable, if unintentional, effect of turning people away from Scripture, is of a distinctly secondary order of authority. Inversion of the proper order of authority, he maintained, produces gross confusion in the church. Scripture, moveover, is possessed of its own distinctive logic and ought not to be automatically subjected to conventions of logic imposed exclusively from outside without first attending to the special character of biblical logic as well as its own sense of intrinsic genre. These can only be learned from studying Scripture in its canonical entirety (see CANON OF THE BIBLE), out of which totum integrum these matters emerge perceptibly (G. Evans [1985]; Jeffrey). Consistently, W. was the only Oxford theologian in this era to lecture and comment on the whole Bible.

A consequence of the general ignorance of Scripture among the clergy was erroneous teaching, and with it, pastoral infidelity. Since most parish clergy were insufficiently competent in Latin to make effective use of the VULGATE—itself a relatively rare item in any case—it seemed to W. that a primary need for ordinands and pastors was translation of the Scriptures into the vernacular. Evidently admiring fragmentary but pioneering efforts in this regard by his countryman R. ROLLE and sometime colleague Trevisa as well as by earlier Franciscans, he instigated and apparently organized the remarkable translation known as The Wycliffite Bible. The first portion of translation—up to the third chapter of the apocryphal book of Baruch—was done by N. Hereford, W.'s assistant. In May 1382 Hereford had to flee from persecution by the church hierarchy, leaving the task to be completed by J. Purvey. Purvey's more elegant translation, finished in 1395/96, a dozen years after W.'s death, was from the point of view of W.'s most fervent ecclesiastical enemies and supporters alike the natural culmination of his resistance to the political power of the church hierarchy and an emphasis on the responsibility of each individual soul for its relationship to God. "The NT," W. had written, "is of full authority, and yet open to the understanding of simple persons in all points necessary for salvation" (De Veritate 2:201).

In his approach to Scripture, W. was actually far more conservative than novel: His models and champions in exegesis are Augustine and CHRYSOSTOM, and when he identified "faithful interpreters" (e.g., BONAVENTURE; T. Bradwardine [c. 1295–1349]; R. FitzRalph [c. 1295–1360]) they were notably within the Augustinian tradition. In his own mind W. was actually traditional in insisting on the absolute primacy of Scripture as the standard by which all other authority in the church is to be tested. He was bitterly opposed in his lifetime by the Roman curia and its supporters but never formally declared a heretic until 1415. Yet only in 1428 had English support for W. and his followers died down to the point that orders that his bones be dug up and burned could be safely carried out. In the meantime Bohemian courtiers of Richard's Queen Anne (herself a devotee of the Wycliffite NT), W.'s erstwhile students at Oxford, traveled home with manuscripts of his works, there directly to influence J. HUS, whose indebtedness to W.'s consuming commitment to Scripture was, of course, to be transmitted in time to later Reformers, especially to LUTHER.

Works: J. W. Sermones (4 vols., ed. J. Loserth, 1887–90); J. W.'s De Veritate Sacrae Scripturae (3 vols., ed. R. Buddenseig, 1905, repr. 1966).

Bibliography: G. R. Evans, "W.'s Logic and W.'s Exegesis: The Context," The Bible in the Medieval World: Essays in Memory of B. Smalley (ed. K. Walsh and D. Woods, 1985) 287-300. D. L. Jeffrey, "J. W. and the Hermeneutics of Reader Response," Int 39 (1985) 272-87. A. Kenney, Wyclif (1985); (ed.), W. in His Times (1986). T. Oey, "W.'s Doctrine of Scripture Within the Context of His Doctrinal and Social Ideas" (diss., Vanderbilt University, 1991). J. A. Robson, W. and the Oxford Schools (1961). B. Smalley, "J. W.'s Postilla super total Bibliam," Bodleian Library Record 4 (1953) 186-204; "W.'s Postilla on the OT and His Principium," Oxford Studies Presented to D. Callus, OP (1964) 253-96. W. Thomson, The Latin Writings of J. W.: An Annotated Catalogue (1983). M. Treskow, "J. W.'s Metaphysics of Scriptural Integrity in the De Veritate Sacrae Scripturae," Dionysius 13 (1989) 153-96.

D. L. JEFFREY

Y

YADIN (SUKENIK), YIGAEL (1917–84)

Born in Jerusalem, the son of the pioneer Jewish archaeologist E. Sukenik, Y. was active in the Haganah from his early days; during the war of independence he was chief of operations (thereafter chief of staff of the Israeli defense forces, 1949–52). After winning his Hebrew University doctorate in 1955 with a dissertation on the War Scroll from Qumran (pub. 1955), Y. immediately launched the large and superbly organized Hazor excavations (1955–58). This project became the primary training ground for the postwar Israeli school of ARCHAEOLOGY. Y. rose rapidly in his academic career at the Hebrew University, becoming associate professor in 1959, Sukenik professor of archaeology in 1963, and head of first the department and then (1969) the institute of archaeology. Meanwhile he pursued an active program of field archaeology: the Bar-Kokhba caves in the Judean Desert (1960–61), the massive Masada project (1963–65), several productive small seasons at Megiddo (1960–71), returning to the water system at Hazor (1968–69), and finally beginning a new project at Bethshean (1983). At the time of his death on July 28, 1984, he was planning to return to Hazor for another series of campaigns.

Throughout this period Y. continued his (and his father's) interest in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS. He played a pivotal role in securing the Qumran Cave I manuscripts that had found their way to the United States—much as he personally acquired the long-lost Temple Scroll after the 1967 war. These interests resulted in the publication of the Genesis Apocryphon (1956), many shorter studies, and especially his magisterial edition of the Temple Scroll (1977). The latter was a ten-year project, completed while Y. was on partial leave from the Hebrew University as military adviser in 1967, member of the Agranat Commission of Inquiry in 1973–74, and deputy prime minister in 1977–81.

Y. was easily the most prominent Israeli archaeologist of his generation at home and worldwide. He was renowned for his field exploits, his celebrated archaeological intuition and powers of synthesis, his tireless energy, his style both in teaching and in popular lectures and writings, and his formidable ability in organizing and promoting Israeli archaeology. He was a unique combination of soldier, statesman, scholar of immense talent, and one who served his country and his profession brilliantly.

Works: War of the Sons of Light Against the Sons of Darkness (1955; ET 1962); (with N. Avigad), The Genesis Apocryphon (1956); Hazor I-IV (1958–61); The Finds from the Bar Kokhba Period in the Cave of Letters (1963); The Ben Sira Scroll from Masada (1965); Masada: Herod's Fortress and the Zealots' Last Stand (1966); Bar-Kokhba: The Rediscovery of the Legendary Hero of the Last Jewish Revolt Against Imperial Rome (1971); Hazor: With a Chapter on Israelite Megiddo (1970 Schweich Lectures, 1972); Hazor: Rediscovery of a Great Citadel of the Bible (1975); (ed.) Jerusalem Revealed: Archaeology in the Holy City, 1968–74 (1975); The Temple Scroll (1977; ET, 3 vols., 1983); (with S. Geva), Investigations at Beth Shean: The Early Iron Strata (Qedem 23, 1986).

Bibliography: N. A. Silberman, A Prophet from Amongst You: The Life of Y. Y. (1993). G. Vermes and J. Neusner (eds.), Essays in Honour of Y. Y. (JJS 33, 1-2, 1982). W. G. Dever, BASOR 256 (1984) 3-5; IEJ 34 (1984) 73-76; ErIsr 20 (1988 Yadin Memorial Volume, 1988).

W. G. DEVER

Z

ZACHARIAE, GOTTHELF TRAUGOTT (1729–77)

Educated at the universities of Königsberg and Halle, Z. held teaching positions in both school and university. He was appointed professor at Bützow in 1760 and at Göttingen in 1765, and in 1775 he received an administrative post at Kiel. Z., rather than J. P. GABLER, first laid down many of the basic principles of the modern approach to biblical theology; unlike Gabler he put his theories into practice in an extensive work. A pupil of S. BAUMGARTEN, Z. was able to move beyond the internal contradictions of his teacher's hermeneutical thought (see HERMENEUTICS) to take account of new insights being developed, thanks to the extensive study of history in eighteenth-century Germany. Z. was also influenced by J. ERNESTI, whom he considered the greatest exegete of the time.

Two factors lie behind Z's work. First, he was dissatisfied with the preparation of teachers and pastors. Too many were not studying the Bible in and for itself but, rather, were relying on compendia of texts pulled out of Scripture without regard for context. Second, attacks were being made on the biblical basis for many doctrinal statements in the official documents of orthodox Lutheranism, in particular F. Lüdke's Vom Falschen Religionseifer (1767), which raised the question of personal integrity versus one's duty to teach according to the doctrines of the church. Presumably because of these problems, Z. went beyond his original intention of writing a commentary on the traditional proof texts (dicta classica) and produced a work that was an extensive treatment of the biblical basis of all important doctrines.

Z. pointed out that words that appear in both doctrinal statements and Scripture do not necessarily mean the same thing in both contexts. The writers of the Bible often had difficulty in expressing spiritual ideas in the materialist (sinnliche) terminology of their day. Many biblical writers had no idea they were writing for posterity; their main concern was for their own times. One must distinguish between what was meant for their day alone and what was meant for the guidance of the church in all ages. Z. also meant his readers to take seriously new developments in the historical-critical study of Scripture like the existence of two accounts of creation in Genesis.

As a matter of principle Z. was firm about approaching the Bible carefully with a mastery of all the relevant skills plus the intention of not reading one's own ideas into the text. Primary duty to the sense of Scripture comes before loyalty to confessional statements, but one does not have the right to challenge the latter before carefully interpreting the former. A doctrine can be declared biblical in three ways: It may be clearly stated in the Bible; it may exist in the Bible, but not in wording we might prefer; or it may not exist in Scripture but can be derived from it logically. However, some traditional beliefs may be discovered to have less importance than had previously been thought, e.g., biblical cosmology (as opposed to the Copernican system) and the factual nature of the story of the tower of Babel.

Z. had several faults. His criterion for distinguishing between the temporal and the eternal in Scripture (any sentence ascribed to Jesus or God or to a person who was self-consciously speaking under the influence of the Holy Spirit) is too mechanical and not worthy of his understanding of the thought world of the Bible. He did not account satisfactorily for how some historical statements in the Bible fit in with his emphasis on timeless truths. His writing was too prolix even by the standards of his day. However, he had several solid virtues. He was able to take into account new methods of study and new understandings of the cultural setting of the Bible and yet retain the importance of the Bible for the church. His emphasis on integrity, competence, and tolerant understanding as virtues of exegesis is still relevant. Undoubtedly he opened up a new area of discussion by declaring the independence of the biblical world and its right to be understood on its own terms before being used as evidence in contemporary arguments. He recognized that one must distinguish between the important and the unimportant in the Bible.

Works: Biblische Theologie oder Untersuchung des Biblischen Grundes der vornehmsten theologischen Lehre (4 vols., 1771–75; vol. 5, ed. J. C. Vollborth, 1785); Philosophisch-Theologische Abhandlungen als Beilagen zur biblische Theologie zu gebrauchen (ed. C. G. Perschke, 1776); Christliche Religionsgeschichte und Lehre zum Unterricht vernünftig zu erziehenden Kinder (1774).

Bibliography: L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der Christlichen Kirche (1869) 711. H. J. Kraus, Die Biblische Theologie: Ihre Geschichte und Problematik (1970) 31-39. O. Merk, Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments in ihrer Anfangszeit: Ihre methodischen bei J. P. Gabler und G. L. Bauer und deren Nachwirkungen (1972) 24-26. J. Sandys-Wunsch, "G. T. Z.'s Contribution to Biblical Theology." ZAW 92 (1980) 1-23.

J. SANDYS-WUNSCH

ZAHN, THEODOR (1838–1933)

A Lutheran NT and patristic scholar of conservative bent, Z. was born at Mörs in the Rhineland, Oct. 10, 1838, and educated at the universities of Basel, Erlangen, and Berlin (1854–58). He was greatly influenced by his Erlangen professor, J. HOFMANN. After teaching at the gymnasium in Neustrelitz (1861–65), Z. served as Dozent (1868) and ausserordentlicher professor at Göttingen (1871), and full professor at Kiel (1877), Erlangen (1878), Leipzig (1888), and again at Erlangen (1892), retiring in 1909. He died Mar. 15, 1933.

Like Hofmann, Z. was a strong Lutheran confessionalist, toward whom his contemporaries (see A. von Harnack [1889] 4) and later scholars (see S. Neill and T. Wright [1988²] 51) have been perhaps unduly judgmental. In all his work, Z. was motivated to prove an early date for the NT writings and to support their theological reliability and historical trustworthiness. Much of his work has as its background the positions of F. C. BAUR and his followers regarding a late dating for the NT documents and the early history of the church as a struggle between Pauline and Petrine factions. In his work on early apostolic literature, Z., like J. B. LIGHTFOOT, defended the authenticity of seven letters of IGNATIUS and argued that the genuineness of these letters and those of CLEMENT OF ROME made it impossible to follow the two central tenets of Baur's reconstruction.

Questions regarding the NT CANON, which occupied him throughout his career, were answered in terms of an early conscious collection by the church (by c. 80–85) of the thirteen letters of PAUL that subsequently made up the nucleus of the canon. In addition, he supported most of the traditional ecclesiastical views regarding the composition, authorship, and dating of the NT writings. In defending the historical value of the book of Acts and its lack of conflict with the Pauline epistles, Z. argued distinctive positions. The difference between the ALEXANDRIAN textual tradition of Acts and the "Western" tradition, which is about ten percent longer, he explained as traceable to Luke. The longer textual tradition represented the author's first draft, from which he subsequently excised unnecessary or misleading material; thus two forms of Acts by the same author circulated. Z. argued that the author of Luke–Acts had intended to produce a third volume, which helps explain the conclusion of our present Acts.

Z. edited the commentary series KNT, to which he contributed the volumes on Matthew (1903), Galatians (1905), John (1908), Romans (1910), Luke (1913), Acts (2 vols., 1919–21), and Revelation (2 vols., 1924–26); most went through several editions. He was honored with two Festschriften (1908, 1928).

Works: Die Voraussetzungen rechter Weihnachtsfeier (1865); Marcellus von Ancyra (1867); Der Hirt des Hermas untersucht (1868); Ignatius von Antiochen (1873); (ed. with A. von Harnack and O. von Gebhardt), Patrum Apostolicorum Opera (3 vols., 1875–77); Acta Joannis (1880); Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons und der altkirchlichen Literatur (10 pts., 1881–1929); Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons (2 vols. in 4, 1888–92); Das apostolische Symbolum: Eine Skizze seiner Geschichte und eine Prüfung seines Inhalts (1893); Der Kampf um das Apostolikum (1893); Introduction to the NT (2 vols., 1897–99, 1905–7³; ET, 3 vols., 1909; 3 vols. in 1, 1917²); Die bleibende Bedeutung des neutestamentlichen Kanons (1898); Grundriss der Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons (1901); "Kanon des Neuen Testaments," *RE*³ (1901) 768-96; "Canon of Scripture," NSHERK 2 (1908) 388-400; Das Evangelium des Johannes unter den Händen seiner neuesten Kritiker (1910); J. C. von Hofmann (1911); Grundriss der Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1918); Grundriss der Geschichte der Lebens Jesu (1928); Grundriss der neutestamentlichen Theologie (1928).

Bibliography: A. J. Bandstra, HHMBI, 398-402. W. W. Gasque, A History of the Criticism of the Acts of the Apostles (1975) 142-45. A. von Harnack, Das Neue Testament um das Jahr 100: T. Z.s Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons (Erster Band, erste Hälfte) geprüft (1889). W. Kümmel, NTHIP, 197-99. A. Meyer, *RGG*² 5 (1931) 2070-71. S. Neill and T. Wright, The Interpretation of the NT (1988²) 44-59. RGS 1 (1925) 220-48 (autobiographical, with bibliographical references in footnotes). U. Swarat, Alte Kirche und Neues Testament: T. Z. als Patristiker (1991), with complete bibliography, 505-42.

J. H. HAYES

ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF

The history of Christian interpretation of the book of Zechariah commenced with the interpretative references to the book in the preaching of the early church, as testified in the NT. These references, including both quotations and allusions, are more frequent than to any other book among the Minor Prophets, most notably due to the book's alleged apocalyptic character (C. H. Dodd [1952] 61-74, with special reference to Joel 2–3[3–4], Zechariah 9–14, and parts of Daniel). There are some differences between the references to Zechariah 1–8 and 9–14 respectively. Only two quotations from Zechariah 1–8 occur (a minor one in Jude v. 9 to Zech 3:2 and a longer one in Eph 4:25 to Zech 8:16), as compared to forty-one allusions, out of which twenty-three are found in Revelation and twelve in the Gospels. Among forty-one references to Zechariah 9–14, on the other hand, seven are quotations (six in the Gospels and one in Rev 1:7); there are a total of twenty-five references in the Gospels, ten in Revelation, four in Paul, and two in Hebrews.

Special significance may be claimed for the quotations in Matt 21:5 and John 12:15 of Zech 9:9 (Dodd, 48-49); in Matt 27:9 of Zech 11:13; in John 19:37 of Zech 12:10; and in Matt 26:31 and Mark 14:27 of Zech 13:7. All of these instances have a clear christological interpretation. The NT interpretation of the book of Zechariah, generally eschatological (or apocalyptic) with an especially christological focus, became imperative for subsequent interpretations in the church (Dodd, 119, 124, 127-28; F. F. Bruce [1961]; L. Hartman [1966] 235-52).

Not only in the Christian interpretation of the church but also to a lesser degree in the Jewish interpretation of the synagogue, the messianic—like the christological—understanding of the book was a focal point: For the church, Jesus of Nazareth was the fulfillment of the OT's messianic expectations; for the synagogue, there still remained a living hope for fulfillment. These different foci have made the interpretation of many HB texts, especially prophetical ones including the book of Zechariah, variegated and complex.

There was greater continuity with HB messianic belief and expectation in Jewish interpretation than in Christian interpretation (K. Kuhn [1958]). Generally the Jewish messianic belief did not focus as much on the person of the messiah as on a broader eschatological hope for God's final renewal in the messianic era (J. Klausner, The Messianic Idea in Israel [1955]). Therefore, no great distance existed in Jewish tradition between a messianic and a historical interpretation or even a haggadic exposition in this case. In Zechariah, for example, passages like 11:10, 12-13; 13:7-9 that often have been regarded as belonging together were interpreted basically in messianic terms in some major works like Bereshit Rabba on Gen 49:10 or in the Tosephta (Ta'an. 3:1) and by leading commentators like RASHI, A. IBN EZRA, or ABRAVANEL; while for others these texts—and especially 11:12-13—were thought to refer to one or another historical situation or person. The TARGUM, being very interpretative here, is in this respect ambiguous; but it has had a decisive influence, e.g., on Rashi (J. Bonsirven [1939] 72-74, 140-41, 174-76; G. Vermes, CHB 1:199-231).

Christian interpreters mainly pursued the hermeneutical pattern (see HERMENEUTICS) of the NT, focusing first of all on JESUS' personal fulfillment of the messianic expectations. This perspective brought into focus specific passages in the HB, especially from the Prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) and Psalms. Included with passages of this kind were texts like Zech 2:10-15; 3:1-8; 6:12; 9:9; 11:4-17; 12:10-12; 13:7, which became important proof texts to demonstrate from the Jews' own Holy Writ Jesus' legitimacy as the true Messiah and the fulfillment of the kingdom of God. To some extent these proof texts formed specific traditions of "testimonies" in the old church, as may be seen in the writings of church fathers like JUSTIN (see esp. O. Skarsaune [1987]) or Cyprian (M. Fahey [1971] 254-55, 623-27). In the course of time the church developed an exegetical tradition through commenting on the individual books of the HB, combined with a doctrinal tradition in which the christological interpretation of the HB was prevalent. However, the exegetical tradition was not uniform but was divided into schools of different hermeneutical interpretations. For example, THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA of the ANTIOCHENE SCHOOL stressed the literal sense and historical aspects of a text and read into Zech 9:9 or 11:4-17, not Christ, but Zerubbabel, the governor of Judah (L. Diestel [1869] 133; G. Diettrich [1902] 74-101; B. Smalley [1984] 356-58, who parallels the Antiochenes of the 5th cent. with the Victorines of Paris around the 12th cent.). LUTHER's lectures on the Minor Prophets (1524–26) demonstrate a balanced focus on the literal and historical sense and on the christological interpretation of passages like Zech 3:8; 6:12-13; 9:9; 11:4-17; 13:7-9; 12:10.

In Christian as well as in Jewish interpretation of the book—what JEROME called liber obscurissimus—there was a permanent tension between a theological (especially messianic, i.e., christological) and a historical understanding of the text. A turning point to a more decisive historical understanding came in the seventeenth century when H. GROTIUS (Annotata ad VT 2 [1644]) revitalized the older historical approach (M. Saebø, StTh [1969] 119-221) but especially when J. MEDE (c. 1630) maintained that Zechariah 9–11 could not have been written by the prophet Zechariah but was older and originated with Jeremiah. The argument was premised, surprisingly enough, on the orthodox doctrine of the INSPIRATION OF THE BIBLE: Matthew 27:9 ascribes to Jeremiah the quote that comes from Zech 11:12-13; thus the author of Zechariah 9–11 had to be Jeremiah since the Holy Spirit could not be in error. This was one solution to the many possible interpretations of Matt 27:9 that had been widely debated for centuries.

The effect of such discussions, however, was to open historical-critical observations that not only often ran contrary to the traditional doctrinal position but also led to different divisions and datings of the book based on its historical content. Such was the case among English scholars who succeeded Mede (H. Hammond [1653]; W. Whiston [1722]; R. Kidder [1699], who also extended Jeremiah's authorship to Zechariah 12–14; W. Newcome [1785], who dated 9–11 to the time of Hosea and 12–14 to after the death of Josiah but before the exile).

Among German scholars B. Flügge (1784) divided Zechariah 9–14 into nine parts of preexilic origin. L.

Bertholdt (1814) argued successfully for a preexilic authorship and, like Newcome, dated Zechariah 9–11 to the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic War. Although he regarded chaps. 12–14, which are restricted to Judah and Jerusalem, as later preexilic fragments that had been added to earlier Zechariah texts, he also maintained that Zechariah 9–11 originated from Zechariah ben Jeberechiah (Isa 8:2), who had become confused with the later prophet Zechariah ben Berechiah (Zech 1:1). The majority of critical scholars followed him (e.g., A. Knoble [1837]; H. Ewald [1840]; F. Bleek [1852]; E. von Ortenberg [1859]; S. Davidson [1863]; B. Duhm [1875]); but some (like E. Rosenmüller [1816] and F. Hitzig [1930]) extended the preexilic dating to the whole of Zechariah 9–14, while still others supposed a late postexilic date. In this respect, J. G. EICHHORN shifted from a preexilic to a postexilic view of the dating of Zechariah 9–14 from the first (1783) to the fourth (1823/24) edition of his Einleitung in das AT. In his first edition he suggested that Zech 9:1-8 referred to the time of Alexander the Great, based on his assumption that a prophet primarily addresses, not future, but contemporary events. Therefore, it appeared only logical that he later changed his dating of Zechariah 9–10 to the time after Alexander, although for the rest of the book he was not so specific but implied that 13:1–14:21 might refer to Maccabean times.

Finally, some scholars consistently defended the traditional view of Zecharian authorship of 9–14 (e.g., M. Beckhaus [1796]; E. Hengstenberg [1831]; W. de Wette [1833]; J. Burger [1841]; and, most comprehensively, C. Wright [1879]). But as their defense mostly meant criticism of the preexilic position, they were later used by scholars who, maintaining a late postexilic dating, had to attack the preexilic view (see below).

Thus in modern critical study of the book of Zechariah up to 1880, three main theories were in contention, among which the preexilic view was most generally held. Many scholars were in favor of the traditional position ascribing the whole book to the early postexilic prophet Zechariah, and some argued for a late postexilic dating (for all references see B. Otzen [1964] 11-25; Saebø, StTh [1969] 118-23).

A second turning point came with B. STADE (1848–1906), who in 1881/82 published an article in which he argued successfully for a late postexilic dating of Zechariah 9–14. His position became the dominant one for generations, although among his successors there were many variations in dating other parts of the text. Yet the preexilic theory faded almost totally after 1920 (with the exception of M. Segal [1935] and Otzen), and the defenders of the traditional view held a much less favorable status than before (Otzen, 26-34; Saebø, 123-32).

Stade, who renewed the debate on the book of Zechariah, combined some of the concerns of the earlier rival positions: Recognizing the necessity for finding the historical background of the text, he agreed that Zechariah 9–14 appeared to be dependent on earlier prophets. On the other hand, he was not as preoccupied with the details as his forerunners had been but sought to find a totality in which they would most likely fit within the framework of the prophetical movement's development. He found behind Zechariah 9–14 one eschatological author, Deutero-Zechariah, who around 280 BCE used older prophetical material to create "in free reproduction" an "eschatological compendium" in response to the spiritual needs of his own time.

After Stade, the dating of Deutero-Zechariah to the later postexilic period was well established, but scholars have differed to some degree regarding the book's unity as well as on the dating of a Deutero-Zechariah (generally including 9–11 and 13:7-9) and of a Trito-Zechariah (12:1–13:6; 14; cf. e.g., Duhm [1911]) or of even smaller fragments or collections. Often Zechariah 12–14, or parts of it, was placed in Maccabean times (Saebø, StTh [1969] 125-32). Also the earlier assignment of Zech 9:1-8 to the time of Alexander the Great has been renewed (K. Elliger, ZAW 62 [1949/50] 63-115; M. Delcor, VT 1 [1951] 110-24). Although there seems to be a consensus on a postexilic dating, there is still great variety in the specific details. In recent research, however, the question of historical location is not seen as much in regard to political-historical conditions as in the living process of prophetical form history and TRADITION HISTORY (e.g., M. Haller [1914]; A. Jepsen [1939]; F. Horst [1954]; Saebø [1969]; H. Birkeland, Zum hebräischen Traditionswesen [1938] 90-93). Structural viewpoints (see STRUCTURALISM AND DECONSTRUCTION) have also been brought to the table (P. Lamarche [1961]; Otzen, 213-29). The present situation of study on the book of Zechariah, especially 9–14, is complex.

In summary, there are some significant tendencies in the study of Zechariah: (a) In the traditional theological (messianic, i.e., christological) and in the modern historical-critical study on the book with its strong focus on dating texts, there has been much selective reading and research. Thus the material's complex totality has not come to the fore in a sufficient way. (b) Theologically and historically Zechariah 1–8 has to a great extent been overshadowed by Zechariah 9–14. Especially in the past two centuries the question of whether there exists a Deutero-Zechariah seems to have engaged most of the interest of scholars. Usually the two parts are discussed in more or less complete isolation; but recent research may indicate new possibilities for handling the delicate question of the relationship of the books' two parts in a new way, paying more attention to TRADITION-historical aspects (R. Mason [1976]). (c) In the case of Zechariah's unique "night visions" in 1:7–6:8 (see, e.g., H. May [1938]; C. Jeremias [1930]; L. Rignell [1950]) and of his different prophetical oracles (see A. Petitjean [1969]), recent tradition-historical and redactional work (see REDACTION CRITICISM) has shown a levitical interest by the author together with a style related to that of the chronicler (see W. Beuken [1967]). (d) Regarding Zechariah 9–14, many questions are still open; but it seems that the strong LITERARY-critical and historical interest in its dating has in some degree diminished and that a new tradition-historical interest in the specific forms and the theological (and partly apocalyptic) content of the chapters has increased (P. Hanson [1979]; H. Lutz [1968]; R. North [1972]; O. Plöger [1959]; Saebø; I. Willi-Plein [1974]). (e) Presumably further study of the book of Zechariah will have to be pursued along these lines in the framework of the development of late prophecy and apocalyptic (see APOCALYPTICISM) not only with regard to the two main parts of the book respectively but also for the book as a whole.

Bibliography: W. A. M. Beuken, Haggai–Sacharja 1–8: Studien zur Überlieferungsgeschichte der frühnachexilischen Prophetie (SSN 10, 1967). S. H. Blank, "The Death of Zechariah in Rabbinic Literature," HUCA 12, 13 (1937/38) 327-46. J. Bonsirven, Exégèse rabbinique et exégèse paulinienne (1939). F. F. Bruce, "The Book of Zechariah and the Passion Narrative," BJRL 43 (1961) 336-53. W. M. L. De Wette, Lehrbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in die Bibel Alten und Neuen Testaments (1833). G. Diettrich, Išo'dadh's Stellung in der Auslegungsgeschichte des Alten Testaments an seinen Kommentaren zu . . . Sach 9–14 . . . veranschaulicht (BZAW 6, 1902). L. Diestel, Geschichte des Alten Testaments in der christlichen Kirche (1869). L. Doutreleau (ed.), Didyme l'Aveugle, sur Zacharie 1–3 (SC 83-85, 1962). C. H. Dodd, According to the Scriptures: The Sub-structure of NT Theology (1952). B. Duhm, The Ever-coming Kingdom of God: A Discussion on Religious Progress (1911). M. A. Fahey, Cyprian and the Bible: A Study in Third-century Exegesis (BGBH 9, 1971). L. Hartman, Prophecy Interpreted: The Formation of Some Jewish Apocalyptic Texts and of the Eschatological Discourse Mark 13 Par. (ConBNT 1, 1966). K. Galling, Studien zur Geschichte Israels im persischen Zeitalter (1964) 109-48. P. D. Hanson, The Dawn of Apocalyptic (1979). C. Jeremias, Die Nachtgesichte des Sacaria: Unters zu ihrer Stellung im Zusammenhang der Visionsberichte im Alten Testament und zu ihrem Bildmaterial (FRLANT 117, 1977). G. Krause, Studien zu Luthers Auslegung der Kleinen Propheten (BHT 33, 1962). J. Kremer, Die Hirtenallegorie im Buche Zacharias auf ihre Messianität hin untersucht: Zugleich ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Exegese (ATA 11, 2, 1930). K. G. Kuhn, "Die beiden Messias in den Qumrantexten und die Messiasvorstellung in der rabbinischen Literatur," ZAW 70 (1958) 200-208. P. Lamarche, Zacharie IX–XIV: Structure litteraire et messianisme (1961). H.-M. Lutz, Jahwe, Jerusalem, und die Völker: Zur Vorgeschichte von Sach 12,1-8 und 14,1-5 (WMANT 27, 1968). R. A. Mason, "The Relation of Zechariah 9–14 to Proto-Zechariah," ZAW 88 (1976) 227-39. H. G. May, "A Key to the Interpretation of Zachariah's Visions," JBL 57 (1938) 173-84. A. M'Caul, Rabbi D. Kimchi's Commentary on the Prophecies of Zechariah (1837). C. L. and E. M. Meyers, Haggai, Zechariah 1–8, (AB 25B, 1, 1987). R. North, "Prophecy to Apocalyptic via Zechariah," VTSup 22 (1972) 47-71. B. C. Ollenburger, "The Book of Zechariah," NIB (1996) 7:733-840. B. Otzen, Studien über Deuterosacharja (ATD 6, 1964). D. L. Petersen, Zechariah 9–14 and Malachi: A Commentary (OTL, 1995). A. Petitjean, Les oracles du Proto-Zacharie: Un programme de restauration pour la communauté juive après l'exil (1969). O. Plöger, Theokratie und Eschatologie (WMANT 2, 1959; ET 1968). H. G. Reventlow, Die Propheten Haggai, Sacharja, und Maleachi (ATD 25, 2, 1993). L. G. Rignell, Die Nachtgesichte des Sacharja: Eine exegetische Studie (1950). G. L. Robinson, "The Prophecies of Zechariah with Special Reference to the Origin and Date of Chapters 9–14," AJSL 12 (1895–96) 1-92. J. W. Rothstein, Die Nachtgesichte des Sacharja (BWANT 8, 1910). M. Saebø, "Die deuterosacharjanische Frage: Eine forschungsgeschichtliche Studie," StTh 23 (1969) 115-40; Sacharja 9–14: Untersuchungen von Text und Form (WMANT 34, 1969). O. Skarsaune, The Proof from Prophecy: A Study in Justin Martyr's Proof-Text Tradition (NovTSup 56, 1987). B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (1984[3]). B. Stade, "Deuterozacharja: Eine kritische Studie," ZAW 1 (1881) 1-96; 2 (1882) 151-72, 275-309. S. J. De Vries, From Old Revelation to New: A Tradition-historical and Redaction-critical Study of Temporal Transitions in Prophetic Prediction (1995). I. Willi-Plein, Prophetie am Ende: Untersuchungen zu Sacharja 9–14 (BBB 42, 1974). C. H. H. Wright, Zechariah and His Prophecies Considered in Relation to Modern Criticism (1879).

M. SAEBØ

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF

The first clearly attested interpretation of the message of the prophet Zephaniah (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB) is in Sir 49:10, which refers to Zephaniah as one of the twelve prophets who were a source of comfort and hope for Israel. This stress on comfort and hope is already suggested by the present form of these books, for they all conclude with a note pointing to either salvation or hope or both.

Zephaniah joins other Qumranic pesharim on prophetic books (e.g., 4QpIsa[a], 4QpHos[a], 1QpMic, 4QpNah, 1QpHab) and on Psalms (e.g., 1QPs). These pesharim point to relatively early exegetical activity aimed at decoding the true meaning of the text in a way strongly governed by the theological discourse of the interpretative community and by the implied claim that the mentioned meaning is not to be found in the "plain meaning" of the text.

Zephaniah was also considered an apocalyptic figure (see APOCALYPTICISM), at least in certain circles during the late Second Temple period, as evidenced by the so-called Apocalypse of Zephaniah (see OTP 1:497-507). Significantly, in one of the few times in which CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA cited Zephaniah, he actually quoted from ApZeph (Strom. 5.77). Furthermore, Zephaniah is assigned a role at the coming of the messianic era in b. Sukk. 52b.

Most of the Jewish traditions about the prophet Zephaniah, however, concern certain aspects of his life and preaching. For instance, according to Pesiq. R. 26, 129b and Yalkut Shimoni, Jeremiah, Huldah, and Zephaniah prophesied to the same generation but in different social environments: Huldah prophesied among the women; Jeremiah, in the streets and markets; and Zephaniah, in the synagogues. And according to b. Meg. 15a, Zephaniah was a Jerusalemite and a scion of a family of prophets (Lives of the Prophets [OTP 2:379-99], where Zephaniah is said to be a Simeonite from Sabaratha).

It should be mentioned, however, that the book of Zephaniah was not among the most popular prophetic books in the first centuries CE. In fact, there are relatively few quotations of the book in Christian and Jewish literature of the time (B. Ben Zvi [1971] 25-28).

Early exegetical works on Zephaniah took three different forms: (a) proof texts, (b) translations and textual versions, and (c) commentaries. Zephaniah was used as a source of proof texts for different theological issues that concerned the living interpretative communities. A variant of the proof text pattern is the communal reading of certain passages. For instance, according to the triennial cycle of Torah readings, the Haftarah to Gen 11:1 ("the whole world had one language and the same words") was Zeph 3:9-17, 20, which begins with "certainly, I will change the speech of the peoples to a pure speech, so all of them may invoke the name YHWH and serve YHWH with one accord," but whose reading immediately after Gen 1:11 suggests to the community one universal language and a reversal to the ideal situation that existed before the building of the tower of Babel (Gen 11:2-9). Ancient translations are also exegetical works; e.g., TgNeb, by choice of words and paraphrastic interpretation, tends to stress the transcendence of God, ethical concerns, and the issue of alien cults in Zephaniah, while the VULGATE stresses eschatological understandings (see Zeph 3:8). Hebrew texts may also reflect and communicate exegetical choices. Thus the division into paragraphs attested to by the Hebrew text of Zephaniah from Muraba'at suggests, for instance, that Zeph 2:1-3 and Zeph 3:1 are more closely related to the following verses than to the preceding ones. (See also the division markers in 8HevXIIgr.)

Unlike proof text references—but somewhat similar to translations—commentaries analyze the entire book verse by verse. Perhaps the most influential early commentary was JEROME's. Among Jewish medieval commentaries of Zephaniah are those written by RASHI, D. KIMHI, A. IBN EZRA, J. KARA, and ABRAVANEL (see also Tanhum HaYerushalmi). Two of the main features of these commentaries are their emphasis on grammatical and philological issues and the attempt to understand the historical circumstances referred to in the book. The most influential Reformation commentaries are those by LUTHER and CALVIN; these, especially the latter, may be considered direct precursors of the modern historical-critical commentaries. Although Luther wrote in his commentary that "among the minor prophets, he [Zephaniah] makes the clearest prophecies about the kingdom of Christ" (1975, 319), he did not often refer to Zephaniah in his sermons. Zephaniah was among the less studied prophets in the following centuries.

In modern research the tendency until recently was to give a low value to both Zephaniah and the book (e.g., "Zephaniah can hardly be considered great as a poet," J. Smith [1911] 176). Several scholars claimed that neither the book nor the prophet reflect any "new ideas," that the book echoes ideas found elsewhere in the prophetic literature. Against this background it is not surprising to find only a few references to Zephaniah in the now-classical OT theologies (see THEOLOGY, OT) of this century.

Change is easily perceptible in more recent work. Theological tendencies, whose influence has been on the rise in recent years, generally find Zephaniah relevant for the development of a biblical theological stance concerning poverty (e.g., N. Lohfink [1987]). The supposed African origin of Zephaniah has also evoked special interest in the United States (e.g., G. Rice [1979]).

Several comprehensive studies on Zephaniah have been published in the last decades, and they point to keen interest in the "historical prophet" and/or in the book (e.g., I. Ball [1988]; Ben Zvi; A. Berlin [1994]; R. Edler [1984]; P. House [1988]; H. Irsigler [1977]; G. Krinetzki [1977]; J. Roberts [1991]). Although some recent works have focused on LITERARY aspects (e.g., House) and this trend may grow, the main question in Zephanic studies in this century as a whole has concerned the message of the historical prophet. Accordingly, questions about the social location of the prophet and his audience, and especially about the historical circumstances of his time, have come to the forefront. These circumstances have also provided the background against which scholars have attempted to elucidate the book's message concerning such issues as the Day of Yahweh and the poor ('aniyyîm). Of course, since it has been assumed that Zephaniah's message can be abstracted only from the authentic words of the prophet, the starting point has most often been the delimitation of the original text.

Although there is general agreement about the existence of small glosses in the text (e.g., 1:4), there is no scholarly consensus over which parts of the book are authentic. An overall view of the literature shows that the discussion has been centered on three blocks of material: 1:2-3; 2:7-11; and 3:8[14]-20.

Zephaniah 1:2-3, or certain parts of it, has been considered late, mainly because of its eschatological, or universal, outlook. Most scholars, including the vast majority of those who consider most of 1:2-3 authentic, consider v. 3 ("make the wicked stumble") to be an explanatory gloss introducing an ethical reason for the punishment and/or a reflection of the glossator's misunderstanding of the text (Roberts).

The main arguments for the lateness of 2:8-11, or most of these verses, involve stylistic differences: the mention of "remainder" (śe'ērît) and "to remain" (yātar) pointing to the remnant; the eschatological contents of v. 11; and historical improbability, i.e., the described situation of Moab and Ammon scorning Judah and taking advantage of its disgrace does not fit the historical data concerning the days of Josiah but those of the first decades of the sixth century. Those who attribute most or all of these verses to the Josianic period (and to the historical prophet Zephaniah) answer these objections by pointing to rhetorical and literary devices that unify the text; by asserting that objections based on contents are unconvincing; and by arguing that the announcement of judgment against Moab and Ammon is not impossible in Josiah's days, or that they, along with the other oracles against the nations in this book correspond exactly to the political situation in the time of Josiah (c. 628–621).

Concerning v. 7, expressions like "restore their fortunes" and "remnant of the house of Judah" and the theme of restoration are considered clear signs of lateness by some scholars; but others deny that these expressions are necessarily exilic or postexilic or that the prophet Zephaniah was devoid of nationalistic feelings. If all these verses are assigned to the historical prophet, then his message included an announcement of territorial expansion beyond the Judahite limits for the future Judahite remnant (or, according to another position, for his contemporaneous Judahites) and an announcement that Yahweh will cause the other gods to shrivel and all the peoples will bow down to Yahweh. If none of these verses are assigned to the historical prophet, then the remaining text includes two main oracles against the nations—namely, those against Assyria and Philistia. These countries are considered by many scholars to be the main enemies of Judah in the Josianic era. Those who follow this approach tend, accordingly, to stress the relative weight of the political and earthly elements in the prophet's message. If vv. 8-9*a* are to be attributed to the prophet, however, then there may be grounds for understanding the message in terms less dependent on concrete political-historical circumstances.

Many scholars have considered the unit 3:8-20 to be a late text that cannot be attributed to the historical prophet Zephaniah nor dated to the Josianic period. The basic assumption underlying this position is that words of salvation or comfort, and especially the motif of universal salvation, occur mainly (or only?) in exilic and postexilic literature. If 3:8-20 is late, the message of the prophet would have no (or almost no) words of salvation or comfort. The issue concerns the basic character of the prophet's message. If these two verses are removed, then 2:3 would probably have the same fate; therefore, the social-ethical message of Zephaniah would be removed as well. Other scholars consider 3:9-13 "Zephanic," mainly on the basis of its relation to vv. 1-8, or because they consider the idea that the peoples will serve Yahweh to be preexilic, or both. If these verses do belong to the historical prophet, then his message would also have included the image of a universal salvation and the universalistic image of all the peoples serving one God, Yahweh. Finally, if 3:14-20 or most of this material is authentic, then these verses receive a totally different meaning from what the address in the second person may suggest. They would not be a call of joy for the prophet's audience (like many psalms) but a call of joy for the future Jerusalem envisaged by the prophet, a Jerusalem that will come only for the "poor and humble" and only after the awesome judgment of the Day of Yahweh. It is noteworthy that these analyses stand or fall on the assumption that any part of the book of Zephaniah is "Zephanic" unless the opposite is proved (for a critique and a different proposal, see Ben Zvi).

On the basis of 1:1 most modern scholars claim that Zephaniah prophesied in the days of Josiah. There is no agreement, however, on the exact time frame during this period: before the reform, at the time of the reform, or after it? The arguments brought on behalf of the idea that he prophesied before the reform are basically: (a) Since the king is not mentioned in 1:4-9, even in v. 8, where the officers and the sons of the king are mentioned, then one may infer that the king had no real influence and power, i.e., Josiah was a minor (cf. 2 Kgs 22:1). (b) The cultic notice in 1:5 reflects the situation before the reform but not after. (c) The harsh words of Zephaniah make sense if addressed to such a syncretistic community. If this picture is correct, the message of Zephaniah may have prepared the ground for Josiah's reform.

Arguments (b) and (c) may also be interpreted as pointing to the time of the reform, in which case Zephaniah's message reflects the ideas of the group that welcomed and advanced the deuteronomic reform in Josiah's days. However, it should be noted that the message of the prophet, if taken at face value, was not "mend your ways and reform the cult and live." Rather, it was "the day of judgment will come regardless of what you or the community do, and only those 'humble' people who seek Yahweh will perhaps live." This literal understanding seems difficult to reconcile with Deuteronomy or with a real policy of reform. Alternatively, if Zephaniah was active in the reform, then his sayings should not be understood in a literal sense.

The proposal that Zephaniah prophesied after the reform is based on understanding śe'ār haba'al in 1:4 as "the remnant of Baal." If this is correct, one may assume that Zephaniah knew about the reform, and in spite of it (or because its success was only partial) prophesied the coming judgment. After the reform may also mean after Josiah. J. P. Hyatt (1948), for instance, proposed the days of Jehoiakim. A different position has been taken by G. Smith (1929) and E. Lacheman (1950). They found many expressions pointing to an exilic or postexilic date and on the basis of the contents of chapter 3 concluded that the book was written c. 200 BCE. Ben Zvi proposes a post-monarchic date and maintains that neither the original message of a historical, seventh-century Zephaniah nor even his actual sayings can be convincingly reconstructed on the basis of the book bearing his name. He advances an understanding in terms of a post-monarchic community.

Questions about the composition and dating of the book and its main sections, the search for the historical Zephaniah and his message, and the study of the book against its historical circumstances are all likely to continue to be a focal point of Zephanic studies in the future. Berlin's statement that "the time of Josiah is not necessarily the time that the book was written, but it is the time in which the book is set" (38; emphasis in the original) may well serve as a starting point for many of these new studies. Of course, one may also expect a flourishing interest in works dealing mainly with literary and theological (and ideological) aspects of the book of Zephaniah.

Bibliography: I. Abrabanel, Prophets and Writings: Perush (1960), Hebrew. R. W. Anderson, Jr., "Zephaniah Ben Cushi and Cush of Benjamin: Traces of Cushite Presence in Syria-Palestine," The Pitcher Is Broken: Memorial Essays for G. W. Ahlström (JSOTSup 190, ed. S. W. Holloway and L. K. Handy, 1995) 45-70. I. J. Ball, A Rhetorical Study of Zephaniah (1988). R. A. Bennett, "Africa and the Biblical Period," HTR 64 (1971) 483-500; "The Book of Zephaniah," NIB (1996) 7:657-704. E. Ben Zvi, A Historical-critical Study of the Book of Zephaniah (BZAW 242, 1991). A. Berlin, Zephaniah (AB 25A, 1994). M. Bolle, Sefer Zephaniah (1970). Hebrew. J. Calvin, Commentaries on the Twelve Minor Prophets 4 (1950). H. Cazelles, "Sophonie, Jérémie et les Scythes en Palestine," RB 74 (1967) 22-44. D. Christensen, "Zephaniah 2:4-15: A Theological Basis for Josiah's Program of Political Expansion," CBQ 46 (1984) 669-82. A. B. Davidson, The Books of Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (1905). M. de Roche, "Zephaniah 1:2-3: The 'Sweeping' of Creation," VT (1980) 104-9. A. Edens, "A Study of the Book of Zephaniah as to the Date, Extent, and Significance of the Genuine Writings" (diss., Vanderbilt University, 1954). R. Edler, Das Kerygma des Propheten Zefanja, (FThSt 126, 1984). K. Elliger, Das Buch der zwölf Kleinen Propheten (ATD 25, 2, 1951). M. Eszeneyei Széles, Wrath and Mercy: A Commentary on the Books of Habakkuk and Zephaniah (1987). G. Gerleman, Zephanja: Text kritisch und literarisch Untersucht (1942). R. D. Haak, "'Cush' in Zephaniah," The Pitcher Is Broken: Memorial Essays for G. W. Ahlström (JSOTSup 190, ed. S. W. Holloway and L. K. Handy, 1995) 238-51. S. Hieronymi, Commentarii in Prophet as Minores (CCSL 76a, 1970) 655-711. P. R. House, Zephaniah: A Prophetic Drama (JSOTSup 69, 1988). J. P. Hyatt, "The Date and Background of Zephaniah," JNES 7 (1948) 25-29. A. Ibn Ezra, in Miqraot Gedolot. H. Irsigler, Gottesgericht und Jahwetag (ATSAT 3, 1977). Y. Kara, in Miqraot Gedolot. A. S. Kapelrud, The Message of the Prophet Zephaniah: Morphology and Ideas (1975). C. A. Keller, Nahoum, Habacuc, Sophonie (CAT 11, b, 1971). G. Krinetzki, Zefanjastudien: Motiv- und Traditionskritik und Komposition und Redaktionskritik (1977). G. Langohr, "Livre de Sophonie et la critique d'authenticité," ETL 52 (1976) 1-27; "Rédaction and composition du livre Sophonie," Le Muséon 89 (1976) 51-73. N. Lohfink, "Zephanja und das Israel der Armen," BK 39 (1984) 100-108; Option for the Poor: The Basic Principle of Liberation Theology in the Light of the Bible (1987). M. Luther, Lectures on the Minor Prophets (Luther's Works 18, 1975). Miqraot Gedolot with Malbim's Commentary (1964), Hebrew. J. Nogalski, Literary Precursors of the Book of the Twelve (BZAW 217, 1993) esp. 171-215. P. E. Pusey (ed.), Sancti patris nostri Cyrilli Archi episcopi Alexandrini, in XII Prophetas 2 (1965) 167-240. Radak, in Miqraot Gedolot. Rashi, in Miqraot Gedolot. B. Renaud, "Le livre de Sophonie: Lejourde YHWH thème structurant de la synthèse rédactionelle," RevScRel 60 (1986) 1-33. J. Ribera Florit, "Laversion aramaica del profeta Sofonías," EstBib 40 (1982) 127-58. G. Rice, "The African Roots of the Prophet Zephaniah," JRT 36 (1979) 21-31. J. J. M. Roberts, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (OTL, 1991). W. Rudolph, Micha-Nahum-Habakuk-Zephanja (KAT 13, 4, 1975). L. Sabottka, Zephanja: Versuch einer Neuübersetzung mit philologischem Kommentar (BibOr 25, 1972). J. E. Sanderson, "Zephaniah," The Women's Bible Commentary (ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe, 1992) 225-27. J. Scharbert, "Zefanja und die Reform des Joschija," Künder des Wortes: Beiträge zur Theologie der Propheten (FS J. Schreiner, ed., L. Ruppert et al., 1982) 237-53. K. Seybold, Satirische Prophetie: Studienzum Buch Zefanja (SBS 120, 1985). H. Shy, Tanhum HaYerushalmi's Commentary on the Minor Prophets (1991). G. A. Smith, The Book of Twelve Prophets 2 (1929). J. M. P. Smith, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Obadiah, and Joel (1911). L. P. Smith and E. R. Lacheman, "The Authorship of the Book of Zephaniah," JNES 9 (1950) 137-42. R. L. Smith, Micah–Malachi (WBC 32, 1984). H. N. Sprenger (ed. and tr.), Theodori Mopsuesteni Commentarius in XII Prophetas (1977) 280-301. M. A. Sweeney, "A Form-Critical Reassessment of the Book of Zephaniah," CBQ 53 (1991) 388-408. J. D. W. Watts, The Books of Joel, Obadiah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah (CBC, 1975). M. Weigl, Zefanja und das 'Israel der Armen': Eine Untersuchung zur Theologie des Buches Zefanja (1994). D. L. Williams, "The Date of Zephaniah," JBL 82 (1963) 77-88.

E. BEN ZVI

ZIMMERLI, WALTHER (1907–83)

Z. was born Jan. 20, 1907, in Schiers (Graubünden), Switzerland, where his father directed the Evangelische Lehranstalt, setting an example of active, direct teaching of the Bible. Z. studied theology at Zurich, Berlin, and Göttingen (1925–30). His eventual choice of HB as his discipline lay in part with his teachers: J. Hausheer, the sensitive translator of the HB for the Zurich Bible from whom Z. learned Aramaic and Syriac; E. SELLIN in Berlin; M. LIDZBARSKI and O. RAHLFS in Göttingen; but most of all J. HEMPEL in Göttingen (1930–33), with whom Z. worked as assistant and under whom he wrote his dissertation on the history and tradition of Beersheba and Bethel.

Z. served pastorates in Aarburg, Switzerland (1933–35), and in Zurich (1935–50), where he also supervised students in their theological studies through the communal life of the "reformed student houses" he and his wife founded and directed. There Z.'s exegesis of the primeval history took shape: The Yahwist depicts the riddle of human existence in Genesis 1–11, while the priestly writer outlines the great divine orders for the world. Z. also wrote essays on the language of Trito-Isaiah (as distinct from Deutero-Isaiah) and on the second commandment (1950). Called to Göttingen in 1950, he attained emeritus status in 1975, remaining there until his death Dec. 4, 1983.

Z. became an exponent of the theological reappraisal of the HB. He believed that "exegetical theology is left hanging in the air" without a theological standpoint to give meaning and illumination to what has been learned historically (R. Smend [1984] 281). On the other hand, "A systematic theology that does not have as its basis the awakening faith of the biblical word remains empty speculation" (ibid., 282). At Göttingen, Z. was successor to G. von RAD, who became his principal dialogue partner on questions of HB THEOLOGY. With von Rad, M. NOTH, and others, Z. was a founder of the Biblischer-Kommentar. In the context of this project he posed the "question to systematic theology of whether it should not to a greater extent than previously take upon itself the treatment of the HB promises in their christological dimensions" (EvTh 12 [1952/53] 58). His work on the HB was carried out under these theological perspectives.

Z.'s central concerns lay with the prophets (see PROPHECY AND PROPHETS, HB), particularly with Isaiah and Deutero-Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel (whom Z. associated with Israel's Bundeswirklichkeit) and with Genesis and HB theology. His major accomplishment was his commentary on Ezekiel "the theologian among the prophets" (1955–68). The careful weighing of texts in which he used the LXX (see SEPTUAGINT) led Z. to argue for a textual Vorlage that was sometimes shorter than the MT. Still, he supported the idea of the expansion of the text by the prophet himself as well as by his school (Ezekiel 40–48), and his commentary concerned the book as a whole with its clear overall structure and its "marked linguistic individuality" ("Ezechielbuch," RGG^{3} 2 [1958] 847-48).

In Exekiel, prophetic material (call and vision reports, prophetic signs, oracles against foreign nations, divine words, and proof-sayings) and priestly-sacral material (the categories of clean and unclean and the eschatological Temple order) are combined. Z. recognized the need for a methodological treatment of Ezekiel different from other prophetic exegesis (RGG, 849). This goal was served by investigations of distinctive formulations drawn from the opus magnum (1953, 1954, 1957; all repr. in his Gottes Offenbarung [1963]). The most important among these formulations is the "I am Yahweh" formula. The "one center" (Mitte), the "finally compulsory factor" that Z. ultimately demanded in opposition to research into the multiplicity of traditions and streams of tradition (VT 13 [1963] 105; Probleme biblischer Theologie [1971] 640) he found nowhere so clearly stated as in this expression of divine self-introduction (FS A. Alt [1953] 11).

Even though Z. had since his 1933 studies appreciated the "worldliness of the OT" (1971), his efforts still evolved essentially around "the OT as address," as he titled various contributions for publication in 1956. This "address" had its basis in the revelation of God. Thus he never forgot the theological task; his last great publications were dedicated to OT and to biblical theology.

Works: Geschichte und Tradition von Beerseba im alten Testament (partially pub. inaugural dissertation, 1932); "Zur Struktur der alttestamentlichen Weisheit," ZAW 51 (1933) 177-204 (ET in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom [ed. J. L. Crenshaw, 1976] 175-99); 1. Mose 1–11: Die Urgeschichte (2 vols., Prophezei, Zürcher Bibelkommentar, 1943; in 1 vol., 1957^2, 1967^3); "Zur Sprache Tritojesajas," FS L. Köhler (STU 20, 3-4, 1950) 62-74; "Das zweite Gebot," FS A. Bertholet (ed. W. Baumgartner et al., 1950) 550-63; "pais theou," TWNT 5 (1952) 655-76 (ET, Z. and J. Jeremias, The Servant of the Lord [SBT 20, 1957] 9-42 and TDNT 5 [1968] 656-77); "Ich bin Jahwe," Geschichte und Altes Testament (FS A. Alt, BHT 16, 1953) 179-209 (ET, ed. W. Brueggemann, I am Yahweh [1982] 1-28); Ezechiel (2 vols., BKAT 13, 1-2, 1955–69, 1979^2; ET, 2 vols., Hermeneia, 1979–83); Das Alte Testament als Anrede (BEvT 24, 1956); Das Buch des Predigers Salomo (ATD 16, 1962, 1967^2); " 'Offenbarung' im Alten Testament: Ein Gespräch mit R. Rendtorff," EvTh 22 (1962) 15-31; Das Gesetz und die Propheten: Zum Verständnis des Alten Testamentes (1963, 1969^2; ET, The Law and the Prophets: A Study of the Meaning of the OT [1965]); Gottes Offenbarung: Gesammelte Aufsätze zum Alten Testament (TBü 19, 1963, 1969²); "Die historisch-kritische Bibelwissenschaft und die Verkündigungsaufgabe der Kirche," EvTh 23 (1963) 17-31; Israel und die Christen (1964, 1980²); "Erwägungen zum 'Bund': Die Aussagen über die Yahwe-bryt in Exod 19–34," FS W. Eichrodt (ed. H. J. Stroebe, ATANT 59, 1970) 171-90; "Alttestamentliche Traditionsgeschichte und Theologie," Probleme biblischer Theologie: G. von Rad zum 70. Geburtstag (ed. H. W. Wolff, 1971) 632-47; Die Weltlichkeit des Alten Testaments (1971); "Die Bedeutung der grossen Schriftprophetie für das alttestamentliche Reden von Gott," VTSup 23 (1972) 48-64; Grundriss der alttestamentlichen Theologie (1972, 1975²; ET, OT Theology in Outline [1978]); Studien zur alttestamentlichen Theologie und Prophetie: Gesammelte Aufsätze 2 (TBü 51, 1974); "Zum Problem der 'Mitte der Alten Testaments,' " EvTh 35 (1975) 97-118; 1. Mose 12–25: Abraham (Zürcher Bibelkommentare, 1976); "The History of Israelite Religion," Tradition and Interpretation (ed. G. W. Anderson, 1979) 351-84; "Biblische Theologie I. Altes Testament," TRE 6 (1980) 426-55; "Biblical Theology," Horizons in Biblical Theology 4 (1982) 95-130 = "Biblische Theologie," Berliner Theologische Zeitschrift 1 (1984) 5-26 (expanded); "Ezechiel/Ezechielbuch," TRE 10 (1982) 766-81; I Am Yahweh (ed. with introduction by W. Brueggemann, 1982).

Bibliography: R. Smend, "Gedenkrede auf W. Z.," In memoriam W. Z. (Göttinger Universitätsreden 73, 1984) 20-48 = his DATDJ, 276-98. S. Wüst, Beiträge zur Alttestamentliche Theologie (FS W. Z., ed. H. Donner et al., 1977), full bibliography to 1976, 559-80.

T. WILLI

ZINZENDORF, NICHOLAUS LUDWIG VON (1700–1760)

Z. was born May 26, 1700, and died May 6, 1760. After the early death of his father he was raised by a Pietist grandmother (see PIETISM) and educated at Halle, where he was influenced by A. FRANCKE; Wittenberg; and Utrecht. Intending at first to enter the Lutheran ministry, he eventually took up responsibility for his family's Saxon estates. In 1722 he opened an area of the estate to the persecuted remnant of the Hussite movement in Moravia, the Bohemian Brethren, who named the village they established there Herrnhut. Thereafter, Z.'s theological development and that of the Renewed Moravians were closely united. Under his direction the Moravians undertook an active mission movement and soon had established centers in England, Pennsylvania, Georgia, and elsewhere. En route to Georgia, J. WESLEY first met and was influenced by them.

Z.'s theology was influenced by that of Halle; he put particular emphasis on the need for a "heart religion," which he believed was at the root of all Christian denominations. His position led him to press for ecumenical discussions, and in the 1740s he was especially active in such discussions among the many churches and sects in Pennsylvania. Following the interpretative principles of other Pietists of his day, he emphasized the centrality of the story of JESUS for explaining the Scriptures, which he saw as a compendium directed first to the life of the church and second to the edification of individuals.

Bibliography: E. Beyreuter, N. L. Z. in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten (1965). G. Mälzer, Bengel und Z. (1968).

P. C. ERB

ZÚÑIGA, DIEGO LÓPEZ (fl. early 16th cent.)

Better known by his Latinized name, Stunica, Z. collaborated on the editorial team that prepared the Complutensian POLYGLOT BIBLE at the University of Alcalá in the early sixteenth century. His main responsibility was probably the editing of the VULGATE NT. Between 1519 and 1524 he engaged in a bitter controversy with ERASMUS on questions of NT scholarship. Z. considered the Vulgate more accurate than Greek texts of the NT and wrote a series of works attacking the critical studies of Erasmus and other humanist scholars. Z. was a knowledgeable and clever man, but his conservative principles of scholarship were eventually eclipsed by the critical philological methods developed by his humanist rivals.

Works: Annotationes contra Iacobum Fabrum Stapulensem (1519); Annotationes contra Erasmum Roterodamum (1520); Assertio ecclesiasticae translationis novi testamenti (1524).

Bibliography: J. H. Bentley, Humanists and Holy Writ: NT Scholarship in the Renaissance (1983). H. J. de Jonge, "Introduction," Apologia respondens ad ea quae Iacobus Lopis Stunica taxaverat (in Erasmus, Opera Omnia [1983] 9, 2:1-57).

J. H. BENTLEY

ZWINGLI, ULRICH (1484–1531)

Born Jan. 1, 1484, and educated at the universities of Vienna and Basel, then strongly associated with humanism, Z. became firmly committed to a humanist program of reform in the 1510s. A personal encounter with ERASMUS during the latter's sojourn at Basel (1516) appears to have been decisive in winning Z. to Erasmus's position in this regard. In 1519 Z. was called to Zurich, where he began his own program of reform; he was destined to exercise considerable influence within Switzerland and beyond. He died in battle Oct. 11, 1531, while serving as a chaplain.

Z.'s biblical interpretation was strongly influenced by Erasmus, especially the latter's Enchiridion (1503). His fundamental concern was for the "natural sense of Scripture" (which is not necessarily its literal sense). This demands a detailed knowledge of classical languages and familiarity with both the SEPTUAGINT and the Hebrew text of the HB. It also demands an awareness of the complexity of human language and figures of speech. In an important appeal to RHETORICAL analysis, Z. argued that an ability to distinguish alloiosis, catachresis, and synechdoche was vital unless the natural sense of Scripture was to be equated with its literal sense. The importance of this point was brought out in his debate with LUTHER over the meaning of Matt 26:26, hoc est corpus meum. Luther argued that est was to be interpreted literally as "this is my body"; Z. argued that its natural sense was nonliteral (alloiosis, in this case), and that it should be interpreted as "this signifies my body."

In his interpretation of the HB (especially Genesis and Exodus), Z. drew a distinction between the literal and allegorical sense of Scripture, using the term allegory in an unusually broad sense that apparently subsumes typology. The HB should not be read simply as historical accounts concerning Israel or Jerusalem but as prefiguring something that was accomplished and perfected in Christ. There are strong parallels between Z. and ORIGEN on this point, perhaps reflecting the mediation of the latter through Erasmus's Enchiridion. However, Z. insisted that allegorical interpretation of Scripture may only be used to justify doctrines or practices that can be established on the basis of the natural sense of Scripture; allegorical interpretation must be the decoration, not the foundation, of an argument.

Z. demonstrated a strong concern for the moral sense of Scripture (although he did not use the precise term). Where Luther tended to regard Scripture as narrating the promises of God, Z. tended to see it as setting forth authorized paradigms of human conduct. HB figures, for instance, are seen as providing moral examples for the believer.

Works: The Clarity and Certainty of the Word of God (1522); commentaries on Genesis (1527), Exodus (1527), and Isaiah (1929).

Bibliography: F. Büsser, "Bullinger as Calvin's Model in Biblical Exposition: An Examination of Calvin's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans," In Honor of J. Calvin (1509–64) (ed. E. J. Furcha, 1987) 64-95; CE 3 (1987) 481-86. C. Christ, "Das Schriftverständnis von Z. und Erasmus im Jahre 1522," Zwingliana 16 (1983) 111-25. R. G. Hobbs, "Z. and the Study of the OT," H. Z. (1484–1531): A Legacy of Radical Reform (ed. E. J. Furcha, 1985) 144-79. W. Köhler, "Die Randglossen Z.s zum Römerbrief," Forschungen zur Kirchengeschichte und zur christlichen Kunst (1931) 86-106. G. Krause, "Z.s Auslegung der Propheten," Zwingliana 11 (1960) 257-65. E. Künzli, "Quellenproblem und mystischer Schriftsinn in Z.s Genesis- und Exoduskommentar," Zwingliana 9 (1949–54) 185-207, 253-307. I. L. Snavely, Jr., HHMBI, 249-55. W. P. Stephens, The Theology of H. Z. (1986).

A. E. MCGRATH