Oratorians (C.O.), the Oratory of St. Philip Neri and the French Oratory, groups of priests organized in the spirit of the Council of Trent (1545–63) to improve the quality of clerical leadership. The Oratory of St. Philip Neri, established in Rome in 1564, was named after its founder and inspiration. Philip Neri (1515–95) was respected as a holy priest and popular spiritual director. Called Oratorians because they gathered in the oratory of the Church of St. Girolamo, the Italian Oratorians emphasized holiness of life, sound preaching, and well-prepared worship services. The French Oratorians, founded in 1611 by Pierre de Bérulle (1575–1629), were modeled after their Italian counterpart. Their chief ministry became the education of seminarians and, though they shared many of the purposes of the Italian group, they were independent. The Oratorians represent a constructive response to the need for genuine reform of priestly life in the sixteenth century. See also Philip Neri, St.

oratorio, an extended musical composition on a sacred subject for solo singers, chorus, and orchestra. The first oratorios were composed in the late sixteenth century and were a staple of the later Baroque musical repertory. See also Catholicism and music.

The interior of Brompton Oratory, a major Catholic center in London, founded in 1849 through the efforts of Frederick William Faber and John Henry (later Cardinal) Newman and moved to Brompton Road in 1854; nineteenth-century painting by Herbert A. Gribble. The Oratory of St. Philip Neri, from which the name is derived, is a congregation of priests living in community without vows.

oratory, a place (other than a church) designated for divine worship. Each religious house is to have a chapel (public oratory) where the Blessed Sacrament is reserved. Each bishop is allowed to have a private oratory. See also chapel.

Oratory of Divine Love, Catholic reform movement of the sixteenth century founded under the inspiration of Catherine of Genoa (d. 1510) to serve charitable purposes. The Roman branch was the nursery of Church reformers: Gian Matteo Giberti, St. Cajetan, Gian Pietro Caraffa (Paul IV), Jacopo Sadoleto, and Gasparo Contarini. Cajetan and Caraffa (then bishop of Chieti, or "Theate") later founded the Clerks Regular of the Divine Providence, also known as the Theatines, in 1524. See also Catherine of Genoa, St.; Theatines.

Order of Preachers. See Dominican order.

Order of St. Basil the Great, Byzantine-rite monastic order. Metropolitan Joseph Rutskyj (appointed in 1617) centralized the men's monasteries in the Ruthenian (Ukrainian and Belorussian) Catholic Church and promoted theological studies. The order influenced all church life, guiding people spiritually and providing all bishops until the nineteenth century. In the 1830s the order was suppressed in territories under the Russian empire, surviving only in western Ukraine. Another reform begun in 1882 led to a notable expansion in Ukraine and among Ukrainian immigrants. A Romanian branch was aggregated in the 1920s. The nuns were organized into an order in 1951. See also Basil, Rule of St.; Basilians.

orders. See Holy Orders.

ordinariate, military. See military ordinariate.

ordinary, title for an individual who holds one of a certain class of offices within the Church. Although in common parlance the term often refers to the bishop of the diocese, canon law includes a greater number of officeholders under this title. Canon 134 gives a taxative list. The term includes the pope, diocesan bishops, vicars general and episcopal vicars of a diocese, those in charge of groups legally equivalent to a diocese (e.g., a vicariate apostolic), and major superiors in pontifical clerical institutes. All but those in the last category are also called "local ordinaries."

The law frequently uses the term "ordinary" and reserves certain powers to those who hold an office so designated. All of these officeholders have executive power of governance. Superiors in institutes that are classified as lay are not considered "ordinaries" because such superiors might be themselves laypersons, and canonical tradition excludes laypersons from the power of governance in the strict meaning of that term. See also diocesan bishop; local ordinary.

ordinary, liturgical, the part of the Mass, the Liturgy of the Hours, and other sacramental rites that does not vary. Musical compositions of the Mass, both classical and contemporary, render these parts chorally: the Kyrie or "Lord, Have Mercy," the Gloria or "Glory to God," the Credo or creed or profession of faith, the Sanctus or "Holy, Holy, Holy" and the Agnus Dei or "Lamb of God." Ordinaries supply a consistent structure that is filled out by the liturgical proper, or parts that vary. See also proper, liturgical.

ordinary/extraordinary means, terms used to describe operations, treatments, and medicines as obligatory or nonobligatory for physical health and survival.

Catholics view the meaning of both life and death within the context of the Paschal Mystery (the life, death, and Resurrection of Christ). This has a relativizing effect on both life and death. Thus, while life is a basic good as the condition of all other experiences, it is not an absolute one. It may be sacrificed for other, more urgent or higher goods. For this reason Catholic tradition has put a limit on the means that must be used to preserve life. As Pope Pius XII noted in 1957 in an allocation to an international congress of anesthesiologists: "But normally one is held to use only ordinary means—according to circumstances of persons, places, times and culture—that is to say, means that do not involve any grave burden for oneself or another. A more strict obligation would be too burdensome for most and would render the attainment of the higher, more important good too difficult."

Recent Catholic tradition has therefore distinguished between ordinary means (obligatory) and extraordinary means (generally nonobligatory) to preserve life. Ordinary means are understood to include all means (medicines, surgery, etc.) that offer a reasonable hope of benefit and can be had and used without grave inconvenience. Extraordinary means are understood as those that offer no reasonable hope of benefit or, even if they do, involve an excessively grave burden. Examples of grave burden given in the textbook tradition were pain (in preanesthetic days), expense, disfigurement, risk, recuperative travel to a distant land, and climate.

The terms "ordinary" and "extraordinary" have been widely used even outside Catholic circles, but they have been so badly misunderstood and misused that many authors in bioethics prefer different language. For instance, in its Declaration on Euthanasia (1980) the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith noted this fact and cited the possibility of using "proportionate" and "disproportionate" to avoid the misunderstandings associated with "ordinary" and "extraordinary." Whatever the language employed, the key judgment anchors in a weighing of burdens and benefits for the particular patient. See also bioethics; medical ethics; quality of life.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

ordinary jurisdiction, the power of governance attached by canon law to a particular office. Certain positions within the Church include certain governance powers. The office of diocesan bishop, for example, carries with it all of the powers necessary to perform the tasks required by the ministry of bishop. See also jurisdiction.

ordinary magisterium. See magisterium.

ordinary minister, the minister prescribed by canon law as the one authorized to celebrate a particular sacrament without special permission. For example, the ordinary ministers of the sacrament of Anointing are priests and bishops. Bishops alone are the ordinary ministers of the sacrament of Holy Orders. See also extraordinary minister of Eucharist; sacrament.

Ordinary of the Mass, the term used, prior to Vatican Council II, to describe the invariable parts of the Mass, as distinguished from those parts that varied with the ecclesiastical calendar (called the Proper of the Mass). The Ordinary comprised the priest's preparatory prayers ("prayers at the foot of the altar"); the Kyrie; the Gloria and Creed (on most Sundays and feasts); the Canon (Eucharistic Prayer from the "Sanctus" onward); the Lord's Prayer; the Agnus Dei; the priest's prayers before Communion; and the last Gospel. Musical settings of the Ordinary (whether plainchant or polyphonic) commonly included five parts: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei. See also Proper of the Mass.

Ordinary Time, the days of the Church year that are not Advent, Christmas, Lent, or Easter. The longest period of the year, Ordinary Time is so called not because it is set apart from the "extraordinary" times, but because it is time ordered for, or ordained to, the everyday living of a Christian life. This is clearer in the Latin title, tempus ordinarium, "measured time." There are two discrete periods of Ordinary Time. The first is the five to eight weeks between Epiphany and the beginning of Lent (Ash Wednesday). The second is the twenty-three to twenty-seven weeks following the feast of Pentecost and concluding with the Solemnity of Christ the King, the final Sunday of the liturgical year. The liturgical color for days in Ordinary Time is green. See also liturgical calendar.

ordination, the sacramental rite of the Church in which the Spirit of God is invoked on candidates for the office of bishop, priest, and deacon as they are initiated into ministry in the Church. Ordination points to two fundamental beliefs in the Church's understanding of itself and of its ministry: that the ministry of the Church in any age is always linked with the ministry of Jesus and of the apostles; and that the Church and its ministry must always draw on the power of the Holy Spirit if it is to be true to itself.

The form of ordination has a long and varied history. Its origins are found in NT references to the designation of ministers for service in the Church, sometimes accompanied by references to prayer and the imposition of hands. A pattern of imposition of hands and prayer over the candidate appears in the earliest extant ordination rites, found in the Apostolic Tradition (ca. 215) of the Roman writer Hippolytus.

Ordination rituals of the late patristic period add elaborate allusions to high priests, priests, and Levites of the OT. Roman prayers of the same period introduce a preoccupation with gradations of honor and dignity in the ranks of the ordained. Medieval Gallican and Germanic influences contributed a ceremony of anointing, a ritual of vesting, and the presentation of symbols of office. The liturgical books of William Durandus the elder, thirteenth-century bishop of Mende, France, give a highly ornate ordination ritual for bishop, priest, and deacon. This ritual inspired the Roman pontifical books, which became the norm for the post-Tridentine Church.

Catholic ordination rituals were revised after the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), with efforts made to reflect the council's teaching on the offices of the ordained. Emphasis is placed on the imposition of hands and the prayer over the candidate to be ordained. The meaning of the office is incorporated in the suggested text for the address to the congregation and the ordinand and in the prayer following the imposition of hands. Although rites of vesting, anointing, and presentation of symbols remain, they are ancillary to the imposition of hands and the prayer that follows.

While the revised rite of ordination of a bishop draws upon the ancient prayer of Hippolytus, the ordination prayer of a presbyter retains much from the liturgical books of the post-Tridentine Church. That prayer's emphasis on the honor and dignity of the presbyter contrasts with the stress on service of Vatican II. The rite does recognize, symbolically, the responsibility of the entire congregation to approve the choice of the ordinand. Ordination rites teach that ordained ministry exists to assist and enable all the baptized to carry on the serving mission of Christ.

Catholic teaching holds that in addition to the grace of office, the ordained receives a sacramental "character." While the understanding of character varies in the tradition, the notion of character implies that ordination confers a sacramental union with Christ and the ecclesial community such that ordination cannot be repeated. See also Holy Orders; sacramental character. FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI ordination of women, a proposition that has met with controversy about the possibility of ordaining women to the priesthood or presbyterate. Current practice in the Catholic Church prohibits the ordination of women. Little is known of any organized movement to change that practice until the twentieth century. In the 1930s, however, a British organization called Saint Joan's Alliance submitted a petition to the Vatican stating that, "should the Church in her wisdom and in her good time decide to extend to women the dignity of the priesthood, women would be willing and eager to respond." The alliance has continued to submit petitions in this vein yearly since. In the United States, the movement is usually traced to Mary Lynch, who began in the mid-1960s to append to her Christmas cards messages about the timeliness of the ordination of women. In 1974 the Women's Ordination Conference (WOC) came into being at a meeting in Detroit. Organizers were anticipating about 600 women and 1,200 actually arrived. The founding of WOC led to a series of dialogues between a committee of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) and leaders of the Women's Ordination Conference on topics related to the possibility of a change in the practice. These talks eventually broke down in the wake of the 1976 Vatican declaration Inter Insigniores, which defended the Church's position, and the subsequent pressure on bishops to uphold what the document declared to be an "unbroken tradition."

Irregular ordinations of Episcopal women as priests in 1974, followed by the 1976 decision of the Episcopal Church in the United States to approve women as priests, made for increasing models of an ordained ministry of women in a tradition close to Catholicism. A scientific survey of U.S. Catholics in 1974 reported that 29 percent of those polled were in favor of ordaining women; by 1992 that percentage had risen to 67 percent. In the interim, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops committed itself to writing a pastoral letter on the concerns of women, one of which was their exclusion from ordained priesthood. Over the course of nine years and four drafts, the pastoral letter shifted from discussing the possibility of ordaining women to the diaconate to reiterating the official arguments against admitting women to any of the sacramental orders. In the fall of 1992, the fourth draft of the proposed pastoral letter failed to attain a majority when put to a vote of the bishops, and the project was abandoned, though not before some U.S. bishops had publicly expressed their support for the ordination of women.

As the numbers of ordained men decline, however, more parishes are being administered by women. Women are also acting as pastoral associates, chaplains, and spiritual directors, as well as carrying out many of the liturgical functions previously reserved to men. The decision of the Church of England in 1992 to ordain women increases the ecumenical strain over the issue and leaves the Catholic and Orthodox Churches the remaining opponents to a change in official policy. See also Holy Orders; ordination; priesthood; women in the Church. MARY AQUIN O'NEILL ordinations, liturgy of, the rituals by which the Church calls out and consecrates one or more of its members for specific service of the Christian community. The earliest such ritual still extant is that of the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (ca. 215), which provides instructions and prayers for the ordination of bishops, presbyters, and deacons. From the fourth century there is a succession of such rituals in the Eastern and Western churches well into the early Middle Ages. Two assumptions are attached to these rituals in the first centuries: that the celebration takes place on a Sunday or major feast day when the whole community is gathered and that a person is always ordained for a specific community (consultation with and approbation by the community is the norm).

Other general elements of these rituals are: some form of proclamation of what is about to happen and an invitation to pray for the candidates; the prayer of the people; the imposition of hands on the candidates by the ordaining bishop, followed by a prayer of ordination; some concluding rituals (the kiss of peace, the handing over of the symbols of office). The ordinations of bishop, priest, and deacon also have special rituals to point up the specific role of each of these offices. In the case of the bishop, other bishops in addition to the ordaining bishop participate in the laying on of hands silently, and the Gospel book, containing the portions of the four Gospels read at Mass, is placed on the head of the candidates. The ordination prayer is distinct for bishop, priest, and deacon. The ordination rituals were revised in 1968 and reflect the theology of Vatican II (1962–65). See also Holy Orders; ordination.

REGIS DUFFY

ordo (Lat., ordo [pl., ordines], "order," "plan," "arrangement"), a liturgical handbook or calendar that describes and/or regulates the celebration of Mass, the sacraments, the church year, or the Canonical Hours. An ordo presents the outline or blueprint of a liturgical action and the sequence of its component parts. The ordo's description of ritual acts complements the sacramentary's prayer texts. The most influential examples are the Ordines Romani, ancient collections of ceremonial directions for the papal liturgy that began circulating in the late eighth century and that helped spread the Roman rite throughout Europe.

O'Reilly, John Boyle, 1844–90, author, promoter of Irish freedom from British rule. Born in Ireland, O'Reilly was court-martialed by the British Army for his association with the Fenian Brotherhood, a secret revolutionary society in Ireland and the United States organized to achieve Irish independence from England by force. He was exiled to Australia, but in 1869 he escaped to America, where he found work with the Pilot newspaper in Boston. He eventually owned and edited the paper, acquiring a wide reputation as a poet, essayist, and orator. He is best known for a volume of poems, In Bohemia, and for The Ethics of Boxing and Manly Sport (both 1888). O'Reilly was a leader in the movement that sought to achieve respectability for Irish immigrants.

organ, a winded-pipe instrument with keyboard(s) used in liturgical worship since at least the twelfth century. The most common use of the organ in church has been for the accompaniment and elaboration of liturgical song. In recent decades electronic instruments designed to simulate the tone of pipes have been purchased by churches, primarily for economic reasons.

organ transplantation, the removal of a bodily organ from a living person, from a cadaver, or (rarely) from an animal and its transfer to a living person. Catholic teaching on this issue has undergone significant change since transplantation became common in the 1940s. At first moral theologians tended to oppose all living donor transplants, arguing that they were forbidden by the principle of totality, which allowed a mutilation of a living body only for the total good of that same body. But gradually this opinion shifted, largely due to American Catholic medical ethicists, who began to support those procedures that brought great benefit to recipients with little or no harm to donors. Some defended the practice on the basis of an extended principle of totality that would include the human race and not just the donor's body; others argued on the basis of Christian charity. Today Catholic moral teaching generally supports organ transplantation.

However, certain cautions are required. Living donor transplants require the free and informed consent of the donor and recipient, a proportionality of harms and benefits, and the use of alternative therapies when available and equally beneficial. All transplants must be judged in the context of scarce medical resources; these expensive procedures ought not unjustly limit access to basic care. Catholic moral theology need not oppose interspecies transplants (from animal to human), provided the usual requirements are met. Transplants from fetal cadavers should be subject to the same criteria, but are often rejected because of a claimed connection to immoral abortion. See also bioethics; medical ethics.

DAVID KELLY

Oriental Institute. See Pontifical Oriental Institute.

Orientalium Ecclesiarum (oh-ree-en-tahl'ee-*oo*m ek-klay-zee-ah'r*oo*m). See Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches.

Origen, ca. 185–ca. 254, theologian and biblical commentator. Born in Alexandria, where he lived until 231, Origen spent the last twenty years of his life in Caesarea in Palestine with travels taking him across the empire from Roman Arabia and Asia Minor to Rome. The greatest teacher of Christian doctrine of his time, he has exercised an enduring influence as an interpreter of the Bible for Christianity in East and West. The son of well-to-do and devout Christian parents, Origen was deeply affected by the martyrdom of his father, Leonides, during the persecution of Severus in 201. He completed his education in the circle of a rich Alexandrian woman, where he had direct encounters with Valentinian Gnostics. A few years later he came under the influence of Alexandrian Platonists, like Ammonius Saccas, and read extensively the works of Philo the Jew, who was a contemporary of Jesus and who had written philosophical and deeply religious commentaries on the Torah.

Teaching Career: While still in his late teens, Origen was appointed catechetist by Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria. The young man's fiery mysticism, combined with a rigorous intellectualism, led him to divide his mixed audience of Christian catechumens and pagan sympathizers into two groups, one for beginners whom he entrusted to Heracles, his assistant, and a second level of students whom he led through a program of Christian instruction reflecting the advanced studies of the Alexandrian academia of his time. It was Origen's conviction, two centuries before Augustine conceived his own program of Christian instruction, that a proper interpretation of Scripture required a grounding in many secular studies such as arithmetic, music, geometry, astronomy, grammar, and rhetoric. He introduced his students to the major philosophical currents, teaching them to apply Christian discernment in retaining the truth compatible with the Bible. Master and pupils shared a semimonastic life-style with the possibility of martyrdom ever in mind. Origen's fame as a learned layman spread far beyond the local community. Invited to give homilies in Palestine and ordained to the priesthood ca. 230 by Theoctistus of Caesarea and Alexander of Jerusalem, Origen incurred the wrath of Bishop Demetrius and was banished from the Alexandrian church. In Caesarea he started a new teaching career, in addition to intensive preaching in the local churches. He was invited as theological advisor to a synod in Arabia (Jordan) and traveled to Cappadocia and to Athens before suffering imprisonment in the persecution of the Roman emperor Decius (250–51). Broken in health, Origen died some time after his release.

Literary Legacy: Origen did not begin the authorship of his vast works until he was in his early forties. Dictating to secretaries provided by his patron, Ambrose, Origen became the most prolific commentator on Holy Scripture in the ancient Church. With many of Origen's writings lost even in the first century after his death, Jerome, in the fourth century, could still enumerate hundreds of titles. The majority of the works surviving today are known only through Latin translations by Jerome, Rufinus, and other Western commentators. In order to secure a critical text for his exegetical works, Origen carefully compared the Greek translations of the Bible circulating among the Christian and Jewish communities with the Hebrew Scripture available to him. His intention was to verify and correct the Septuagint version, which was standard in the Alexandrian tradition. He juxtaposed "six columns" of text (Gk., Hexapla) in an immense papyrus volume, of which only one copy survived by the fourth century. The biblical verses were transcribed word by word, first in the original Hebrew, then in Greek transliteration of the Hebrew, then in the remaining columns, the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion. In the fifth column, the Septuagint, critical signs helped to secure a corrected text, in showing what had been added to or subtracted from the Septuagint text by different generations of copyists. This enormous enterprise continued over a period of at least twenty years. While there can be no certainty that the whole Bible came under the scrutiny of Origen and his assistants, there can be no doubt that through all these labors Origen acquired an uncommon familiarity with Scripture. Origen's earliest commentaries were on the Psalms and the Gospel of John. Other extended commentaries, preserved in Latin, were those on Matthew, the Letter to the Romans, and the Canticle of Canticles, all of which were to have an enduring impact on later generations. A greater number of Origen's exegetical works (twenty-eight in Greek, but the majority in Latin translation) were in the form of homilies, such as those on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Gospel of Luke. A distinctive mark of Origen's genius is to have inaugurated his literary production by dictating the treatise On First Principles (Peri Archon), by which he meant a theological articulation of the most basic Christian beliefs. The notion of divine Trinity serves as a central focus for the doctrinal analyses of creation and salvation, as well as the final recapitulation at the end of book four. A synthesis of Christian Platonism and biblical thought, the work immediately attracted controversy. It is very possible that it contributed to his banishment from Alexandria in 231. Although it continued to be used against him long after his death, its seminal influence can be traced through the centuries, as is evidenced in the work of Erasmus of Rotterdam in the sixteenth century. Origen wrote an Exhortation to Martyrdom for his friend and patron, Ambrose, an essay On Prayer, and another essay On Easter, as well as an extensive apologetic work, Against Celsus, a refutation of a pagan philosopher of the second century. Some letters and many fragments of his works have also survived the attacks on his literary legacy at the end of the fourth century, as well as the proscription of his works by the emperor Justinian in the sixth century.

Origenian Doctrine: Origen taught that God, almighty, provident, and saving, is known only through Jesus Christ, as announced in Jewish Scripture and witnessed in the NT. Jesus Christ, preexistent as the Eternal Word of God (Gk., Logos), originated the universal creation in producing a purely spiritual world. Celestial powers and human souls experienced a precosmic fall in that spiritual world. Fallen angels, according to Scripture, became evil powers. Fallen souls needed to undergo the hardship of existing in a material world, which was created for their spiritual reeducation and ultimate reintegration into the divine unity of all things. Thus salvation is a divine pedagogy by which Jesus, the perfect model and accomplished teacher of virtues, illuminates and transforms the souls of believers. Many would make only limited progress, receiving the Scriptures in a simplistically literalistic manner. But the more gifted would climb to the highest contemplation and enjoy an ever-deepening knowledge of the divine mysteries. While later tradition rejected Origen's mythic notion of preexistent human souls and his speculation about the final consummation of the universe, as well as the elitism of his spirituality, the riches of Origen's exegesis and theological accomplishment have contributed to all major schools of thought of the ancient Church in both East and West. See also Logos; Origenism; Scripture, interpretation of; Septuagint; soul.

Bibliography

Balthasar, Hans Urs von. Origen: Spirit and Fire. A Thematic Anthology of His Writings. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1984.

Crouzel, Henri. Origen. Trans. A. S. Worrall. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1989.

Kannengiesser, Charles, and W. L. Petersen, eds. Origen of Alexandria: His World and His Legacy. Notre Dame, IN: Notre Dame University Press, 1988.

Origen. On First Principles. Trans. G. W. Butterfield. London: SPCK, 1936.

Trigg, J. W. Origen: The Bible and Philosophy in the Third Century Church. Louisville, KY: John Knox Press, 1983. PAMELA BRIGHT

Origenism, a pejorative designation for Origen's teaching or teachings derived from it. Origen's influence was massive and fundamental for fourth-century Orthodox theology, all of which with some justice could be called "Origenism." But the term as usually used refers to certain heterodox themes allegedly taught by Origen, themes later exaggerated and incorporated into rigid spiritual systems based on his thought. These include the doctrines of the preexistence of souls, the transmigration of souls (metempsychosis or reincarnation), the "apocatastasis" or restoration of all souls including that of the devil, and the teaching that the final, resurrected state will be bodiless. Origen himself is also accused of teaching that the Son was subordinate to the Father, that creation was eternal, and that Christ's sacrifice was not unique but will be repeated in future worlds.

Origen's Teaching: Of these doctrines, Origen did teach the preexistence of all rational beings and that their "cooling off" from contemplation of God resulted in their fall and differentiation into human beings, angels, devils, etc. But in his own day such speculation was not heretical and was advanced as a theodicy to counter Marcionite charges against the Creator God based on the inequality of humans at birth. For Origen this inequality was a result of a prenatal free choice to fall away from God, the degree of fallenness determining what sort of body one fell into. Further, against Marcionite and Gnostic denigration of matter, the material bodies into which souls "fell" are good, created by God as an accommodation to the fall and as a means for return. The "spiritual" resurrection body, following Paul (1 Cor 15:35–50), will be continuous with these bodies but not identical, as a plant is continuous but not identical with a seed. And, if God has created from eternity, it is clear that creation is dependent upon God, is not divine, and at any rate is eternal only as its idea or plan exists in the eternally generated Logos. Origen denies metempsychosis and explicitly affirms the uniqueness of Christ's sacrifice, and, although the salvation of the devil must be left open as a logical possibility in a system emphasizing the divine pedagogy and human freedom of will to the degree that Origen's does, there are passages in which he rules it out. Finally, Origen's subordinationism is in part an illusion created by interpreting his vocabulary through later, fourth-century specialization of terminology and, for the rest, is orthodox for a time and place when the distinctions of Nicaea (325) were still seventy-five years in the future.

Controversies: Controversies over "Origenism" began quite early. Methodius of Olympus (d. 311), Peter of Alexandria (d. ca. 311), and Eustathius of Antioch (bishop, ca. 324–27) objected to what they believed to be Origen's teaching on the resurrection body, on the preexistence of souls, and on the eternity of creation. But the most significant and most bitter controversy began in the late fourth century, when the monk Evagrius of Pontus (345–99) incorporated his own scholastic systematization of Origen's teaching into a spiritual system adopted by many monks both in Palestine and Egypt. Controversy between Origenist monks and non-Origenist monks in Egypt led to a condemnation of Origen by a synod convened at Alexandria (400) by Theophilus, the bishop, and ca. 402 Theophilus excommunicated the four "Tall Brothers," leaders of the Origenist monks. Meanwhile, Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, had included a one-sided version of Origen's teachings in his collection of heresies, the Panarion. By 395 he had persuaded Jerome (in his monastery in Bethlehem) to agree and to press for the condemnation of John, bishop of Jerusalem and sympathetic to Origen. Rufinus of Aquileia, who also admired Origen, supported John from his monastery in Jerusalem, thus alienating himself from Jerome. His translation of Origen's On First Principles, published in 398 after his return to Rome, infuriated Jerome because it pointed out that Jerome had also initially been an enthusiastic supporter of Origen. Jerome's countertranslation (399) and bitter accusations ensured that the controversy, and Theophilus's condemnation, would travel to the West, where Pope Anastasius I condemned Origen's teaching in three letters.

Another major controversy developed in the sixth century, again stemming partly from a controversy among monks, initiated in this case by the anti-Origenist monks in Palestine against their "Origenist"—actually radical Evagrian—counterparts. The anti-Origenists were able to secure from the emperor Justinian the Letter to Menas (Menas was patriarch of Constantinople) condemning Origen; it was approved, together with extracts from the On First Principles and anathemata, by a synod convened at Constantinople in 543 and subscribed by Pope Vigilius and the other patriarchs. Following this condemnation, a division arose among the Origenist monks. The most radical, the "Isochrists," were virtual pantheists who believed that all souls will be equal to the soul of Christ in the apocatastasis; they were opposed by the "Protoctists," who believed in the permanent superiority of Christ's mind. These latter eventually gave up belief in the preexistence of souls and joined orthodox opposition to the Isochrists. The controversy was ended by the Second Council of Constantinople (553), which included Origen in a list of heretics condemned, almost as an afterthought, in the anathemata associated with a different dispute (the Three Chapters). The precise value of this condemnation is uncertain: it seems clear that it is actually the Isochrist doctrine that is condemned under Origen's name, and that the council fathers may even have believed that Origen, who actually confessed his faith under the persecuting emperor Decius despite torture, was an apostate. See also apocatastasis; Gnosticism; Jerome, St.; Marcion; Origen; subordinationism. JOHN C. CAVADINI original justice, or original righteousness, the theological term describing the perfect, prefallen human condition. Prior to the first instance of sin—in the Genesis narrative, Adam's rebellion—humankind theoretically existed in a state of complete happiness, free from sin and its consequences. The concept of an original justice thus provides a theological counterpoint to the present sinful condition of the human race, indicating the authentic, divinely intended mode of human existence. Neither Scripture nor theology shows an interest in humanity's prefallen state in itself; rather, original justice suggests that the justification brought about in Christ is essentially a restoration of humanity. See also original sin.

original sin, the state into which, owing to the first sin of Adam and Eve, all human beings are born. The term original sin is actually used in two senses: in reference to the initial, "originating" Adamic sin (Lat., peccatum originale originans) and, in its more generally understood sense, to describe the subsequent "originated" universality of human sin (Lat., peccatum originale originatum).

History: A doctrine of universal human sin might be implied by certain scriptural texts, especially some Pauline writings (Rom 5:12–19; Eph

2:3), but developed notions of original sin took shape only after some centuries, and were by no means uniform in their portrayal of how the human race participates in the first sin. Original sin does not figure prominently in the earliest Christian writings outside the NT. References to Christ's redemptive work in writers like Clement of Rome (d. ca. 101) and Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) feature only sparse allusions to the source of the evil from which we are redeemed.

From the second century onward, one can speak broadly of a distinction between Greek and Latin Christian writers concerning the consequences of Adamic sin. Early Greek writers from Justin Martyr (second century) to John Chrysostom (fourth–fifth centuries) denied that human beings bear the guilt for Adam's transgression. Rather, they believed that humans are culpable only insofar as they willingly imitate the first parents by sinning; Adam's sin is a model or prototype. By contrast, early Latin writers beginning with Tertullian (d. ca. 225) tend to portray a much more direct and deleterious connection between Adam's sin and the subsequent human condition. Tertullian speaks of a propensity to sin sown in each soul through the parent (On the Soul 16.39–41). Cyprian of Carthage (d. ca. 250) was the first to argue that infants are baptized because of a "contagion of death" inherited from Adam (Letters 64.5).

This rather severe view was continued in the West by Ambrose (d. 397) and Ambrosiaster (late fourth century), but the Western view received its fullest and most enduring development in the writings of Augustine of Hippo (354–430), who coined the term peccatum originale. The Pelagian controversy, which occupied the later years of Augustine's life, supplied the context for his seminal writings on original sin. Pelagius denied that infant baptism imparted forgiveness of sin, since infants could not be guilty for sins they did not commit. Augustine responded by asserting that the guilt of Adam's sin is passed on to his posterity through the libido (Lat., "lust") involved in procreation. The human liability to death is the most evident penalty for the first sin. Augustine identifies original sin with concupiscence, the yearning for self-gratification in humans that turns them away from God, such that the human will invariably fails to choose the good. Because all human beings both inherit the guilt and penalty for Adamic sin and experience its presence as concupiscence, the human race as a whole stands condemned, a massa damnata (Lat., "condemned mass" [of human beings]). God might with complete justice have left humanity to its collective condemnation, but through Christ some receive, gratis (Lat., "freely"), the transformation needed to reorient them toward the good. Augustine's anti-Pelagian views on original sin were endorsed in the canons of the Sixteenth Council of Carthage (418), which were in turn approved by Pope Zosimus (d. 418).

Through the Middle Ages discussion about original sin in the West preserved many Augustinian themes, but also departed from Augustine's profound analysis in important ways. From Anselm (d. 1109) onward discussion of original sin focuses not on concupiscence but on the lack of that sanctifying grace (or original justice) forfeited by Adam in the first sin. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) speaks of original sin as a weakened, disordered condition but does not fully follow Augustine's pessimism about original sin's effects on human nature. Original sin is taken away in Baptism, while concupiscence and death remain. The Council of Trent (1545–63) argued precisely this point against the Protestant Reformers, who tended to follow Augustine's identification of original sin with concupiscence (sixth session, 1547). One sees little development in subsequent centuries, though post-Tridentine Catholic theologians (including John de Lugo, d. 1660, and Louis Billot, d. 1931) elaborated theories as to how Adam's sin could be imputed to humanity.

Theology: Catholic theologians today, in a world inclined to see both concupiscence and death as simply constitutive elements of human existence, go beyond the difficulties of theories regarding original sin as either the sin of the first humans or as an inherited collective guilt. In an age that has witnessed unspeakable human evil on a massive scale, theologians have attempted to revivify a doctrine that for many has become abstract and peripheral to Christian thought. The most influential modern Catholic theologian on this question, Karl Rahner (d. 1984), echoes the Scholastic and Tridentine equation of original sin with the lack of sanctifying grace, but frames his treatment in existential terms. The lack of sanctifying grace, i.e., the absence of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, is, contrary to God's will, the universal interior condition of humanity. The offer of grace reveals to us the negativity of our situation. We are born fallen or wanting, into a world in which the presence of evil circumscribes our freedom. The purely Augustinian view fails, for it never established carefully the difference between original sin and the voluntary, personal sin for which one can be accountable. Original sin is merely analogous to personal sin, and therefore its designation as "sin" can be somewhat misleading. Recent formulations underscore the tendency to view original sin in terms of the concrete situation of human life and society rather than as a taint transmitted biologically through human history. The doctrine of original sin is thus expressed in contemporary Catholic thought less as a "catechism truth" valorizing infant baptism and more as a useful category for the analysis of the tragic human condition. See also Adam and Eve; concupiscence; grace; redemption; sin. THOMAS A. SMITH

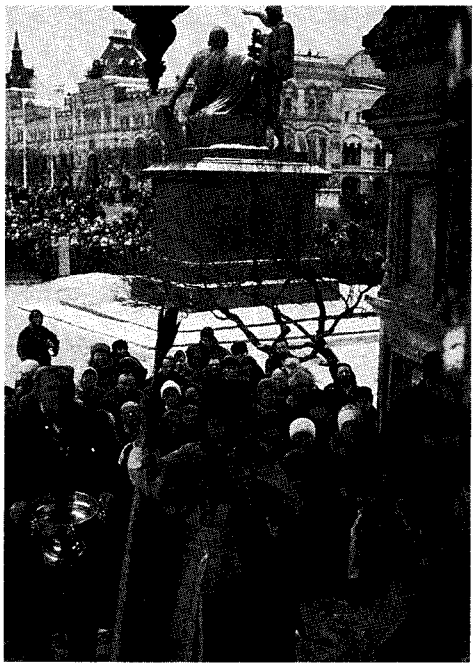
Origins, a weekly journal published by the National Catholic News Service of Washington, D.C. First published in 1971, it reprints papal and episcopal addresses and exhortations, statements from Catholic and ecumenical groups, speeches of prominent individuals, and reports on current events. Articles are published with prefaces, marginal notations, and summaries.

Orthodox Christianity, the original Apostolic churches, and the later churches they founded, in the Eastern half of the Roman Empire and in other Eastern territories beyond the imperial frontiers: Armenia, Ethiopia, Persian Mesopotamia, Georgia. Originally the epithet "orthodox" applied only to those who accepted the Council of Chalcedon (451). In the East this included the churches of the Orthodox patriarchates of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and the Byzantine Orthodox churches derived from them. Today the pre-Chalcedonian Eastern churches also call themselves "Orthodox," and in contemporary ecumenical discourse it is customary to distinguish between the

A Russian Orthodox worship service in the seventeenth-century Church of the Holy Spirit, Moscow.



The celebration of Orthodox Christmas, January 7, 1992, in Red Square, Moscow. The Russian Orthodox follow the Julian rather than the Gregorian calendar.

Eastern (i.e., Byzantine) Orthodox and the Oriental (i.e., pre-Chalcedonian) Orthodox churches. The latter include the Armenian, Coptic, Syrian, and Ethiopian churches. Eastern or Oriental Orthodox churches comprise the majority of the Christians in what was the Eastern and later the Byzantine Empire (present-day Albania, Armenia, Belarus, Bulgaria, Cyprus, Georgia, Greece, Macedonia, Romania, Russia, Serbia, Syria, Turkey, Ukraine), and in most of the Middle East except Lebanon and Iraq. There is also a strong representation outside of the home countries, i.e., in the diaspora, including the United States. Statistics are inaccurate and reliable data are impossible to obtain. There were certainly over 200 million Eastern Orthodox in 1993, and this figure will probably be revised upward as people return to the churches as a result of the newfound freedom in the former Communist bloc. In addition, there are about 4.5 million adherents of "noncanonical" Eastern Orthodox churches not recognized by the others. Estimates of Oriental Orthodox adherents also vary widely (e.g., the Copts claim over 12 million, others estimate their entire membership at less than a third as many), but they probably number at least 30 million. See also Eastern churches; Eastern rites; uniatism. ROBERT F. TAFT orthodoxy (Gk., orthos doxa, "right praise," "right belief"), a pattern of belief and worship that is consistent with the fundamental teachings of the Church. Orthodoxy is the opposite of heresy. The term is also used of Eastern churches (Greek Orthodox, Russian Orthodox) that acknowledge the honorary primacy of Constantinople, but are not in union with Rome.

Although the word "orthodoxy" does not appear in the NT, concern for sound doctrine and right belief was evident already therein (Rom 16:17; 1 Cor 11:2, 28; 15:1–3; 1 Tim 1:10; 6:3–4; 2 Tim 4:3; Titus 1:9; 2:1). In the early centuries orthodox faith was expressed in creeds, especially the Apostles' Creed, the Nicene Creed, and the so-called Athanasian Creed. Other criteria of orthodoxy include an appeal to the consensus of the Fathers of the Church and to the universally held beliefs of the Church down through the centuries as embodied in the formula attributed to Vincent of Lérins: "that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by everyone." Solemn conciliar and papal teachings are yet another source of orthodox belief. The main practical criterion of orthodoxy, however, is the liturgy: lex orandi, lex credendi (Lat., "the rule of prayer is the rule of belief"). Indeed, the Greek word for orthodoxy itself can mean either "right praise" or "right belief."

The word is often used today as a polemical term by ultraconservative Catholics to describe the body of teachings they recall from their own pre–Vatican II catechetical formation. By contrast, the council used the word only once (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 66).

orthopraxy (Gk., orthos praxis, "right practice"), a pattern of Christian behavior that is consistent with the practice of Jesus and the spirit of the gospel. The term grew out of liberation theology in Latin America and political theology in Europe during the 1960s and 1970s. It complements orthodoxy as practice complements belief and as doing complements knowing.

orthros (awr'thraws; Gk., "dawn," "daybreak"), Byzantine-rite Matins, including both nocturns and Lauds. It is characterized especially by the long liturgical poetry of its nine-ode canon. See also Matins; odes.

Ortynskyj, Soter (soh'tair ohr-tin'skee), 1866–1916, first Ukrainian Catholic bishop in the United States. Born in Ukraine, he became a Basilian monk and was ordained priest in 1891. In 1905 he was named ritual bishop for immigrants in the United States, but without the power of governance, which greatly hampered him in organizing parishes.

O Salutaris Hostia (oh sahl-oo-tahr'is hoh'stee-ah; Lat., "O Saving Victim"), the words that begin the last two stanzas of the hymn "Verbum Supernum Prodiens," written by Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) for the Feast of Corpus Christi. These stanzas are also sung at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. See also Benediction; Corpus Christi, Feast of.

O SALUTARIS HOSTIA

LATIN TEXT

O Salutaris hostia,
Quae caeli pandis ostium,
Bella praemunt hostilia:
Da robur, fer auxilium.
Uni trinoque Domino, Sit sempiterna gloria,
Qui vitam sine termini
Nobis donet in patria.

ENGLISH TEXT

O Saving Victim, opening wide
The gate of heav'n to all below!
Our foes press on from ev'ry side:
Thine aid supply, Thy strength bestow.
To thy great name be endless praise,
Immortal Godhead, One in Three;
O, grant us endless length of days
When our true native land we see.

Osservatore Romano (aw-sair-vah-tohr'ay roh-mahn'oh), Italian-language newspaper of the Holy See. Founded in 1861, it appears each day (except Sunday) and serves as the authoritative voice of the Vatican. It publishes news of the Vatican, official statements of the pope and Curia, as well as news from the Catholic world, book reviews, etc. In recent decades various foreign language editions have also been made available on a subscription basis. A weekly English-language edition began in 1968. The contents of the paper run from the informational (e.g., the papal schedule for a given day) to editorial comments reflecting papal policy.

ostensorium (ah-sten-saw'ree-uhm). See monstrance.

Ottaviani, Alfredo (al-fray'doh ah-tah-vee-ahn' ee), 1890–1979, cardinal, canonist, and head of the former Holy Office. A native Roman, he spent his entire life in the service of the Church in Rome. After a distinguished career in Church law, he became prefect of the Holy Office (now the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith). Named a cardinal in 1953, Ottaviani was a central figure at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) as one of the most articulate and intransigent conservatives, especially on issues concerning religious liberty and papal authority. Despite his reactionary attitudes, he was also known in Rome as a zealous priest whose spare time was spent in the care and education of orphans at the Oasis of St. Rita (near Frascati), which he founded and supported.

Otto, St., ca. 1062–1139, bishop of Bamburg. He was deeply involved with missionary activity in Pomerania. Feast day: July 2.

Otto of Freising, ca. 1114–58, Cistercian historian and bishop of Freising. His historical writing modifies the Augustinian notion of the two cities (the City of God and the earthly city) by unifying them in the Catholic Church as the continuation of the Roman Empire. See also City of God; Roman Empire.

Our Father. See Lord's Prayer.

Our Lady, common title given to the Blessed Virgin Mary, usually followed by some special designation associated with a place, a devotion, or some service rendered by her, e.g., Our Lady of Hungary, Our Lady of Grace, Our Lady Help of Christians.

Our Lady, Mother of the Church, a title personally given to the Blessed Virgin Mary by Pope Paul VI during his speech at the end of the third session of the Second Vatican Council (1964). This was a gesture of healing on his part toward the council's minority that had wanted a separate document on Mary and then, failing that, wanted the chapter on Mary in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) to be entitled, "Mary, Mother of the Church," a title with medieval roots. This proposal also failed. Because the Church itself is the Mother of all, most felt it better to speak of Mary as the preeminent member of the Church, a disciple par excellence, and as a type, or exemplar, of the Church.

Our Lady of Czestochowa. See Czestochowa, Our Lady of.

Our Lady of Guadalupe. See Guadalupe, Our Lady of.

Our Lady of La Salette. See La Salette, Our Lady of.

Our Lady of Lourdes. See Lourdes.

Our Lady of Mount Carmel, a Marian title derived from a community of twelfth-century hermits who lived on Mount Carmel in the Holy Land and expressed their special devotion to Mary by wearing brown scapulars. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Our Lady of Sorrows, a Marian title pertaining to the spiritual martyrdom of Mary, particularly in the Passion and death of her son. By the fourteenth century her sorrows (Lat., dolores) were fixed at seven: the circumcision of Jesus in the Temple, the flight into Egypt, Jesus being lost in Jerusalem, the encounter with Jesus on the way to Calvary, the crucifixion, the taking of the body down from the cross, and Jesus' burial. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Our Lady of the Rosary. See Rosary.

Our Lady of the Snows, a Catholic liturgical feast, also known as the Dedication of the Basilica of St. Mary Major, celebrated on August 5. The feast originated in a tenth-century legend claiming that, during the pontificate of Liberius (352–66), a Roman couple who had vowed their wealth to the Blessed Virgin Mary had their vows confirmed when Mary appeared to them in a dream, instructed them to build the Basilica of St. Mary Major, and caused a miraculous midsummer snowfall. See also Mary, Blessed Virgin.

Our Sunday Visitor, a weekly newspaper published by OSV, Inc., of Huntington, Indiana. Founded in 1912 by Father (later Archbishop) John F. Noll to refute anti-Catholic bigotry and provide adult Catholics with ongoing catechesis and news analysis, its positions on pastoral, theological, and social issues reflect a generally conservative point of view.

Oxford movement, religious reformation begun at Oxford University in 1833, also known as the Tractarian movement and Puseyism. It aimed at and effected spiritual, doctrinal, and liturgical renewal in the Anglican Communion by returning to the Church Fathers and seventeenth-century Anglican theologians. In pamphlets and treatises, such as the ninety popular and controversial "Tracts for the Times," and in sermons, poetry, lectures, and articles the movement relentlessly attacked the secularism (religious indifference), liberalism (the view that reason alone can cure all evil) and Erastianism (the idea that final authority in religious matters belongs to the state) of university, church, and country. Affirming doctrine and devotion, the movement promoted the Holy Catholic Church as a supernatural, divinely authorized institution, a visible unity on earth possessing sacraments and unbroken apostolic succession of bishops.

The movement's leaders were noted for their intellectual, moral, and spiritual stature and for their personal attraction and influence: John Keble, poet of Anglican devotion; Richard Hurrell Froude, zealous apologist for Catholic truths; Edward Bouverie Pusey, devout, erudite aristocrat; John Henry Newman, acknowledged leader and genius of the movement, who developed its foundational position, the Via Media. Reaching its zenith in 1838, the movement, though antipapal, was increasingly attacked by church and university for its Romanism. Nonetheless, it survived Newman's conversion to Rome (1845) and spread fragmentedly to urban centers, there emphasizing social, pastoral, and liturgical matters over doctrinal ones. Besides bringing many converts to Catholicism, the Oxford movement was a renaissance of catholicity in the universal Church. See also Anglicanism; Anglo-Catholicism; Newman, John Henry.

MARY KATHERINE TILLMAN

Ozanam, Antoine Frédéric, 1813–53, French intellectual and founder of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. He distinguished himself as a literary scholar, a professor of rhetoric, and a defender of doctrine against its opponents. A political liberal, he founded the Society of St. Vincent de Paul in 1833 as a religious association of laymen for the service of the poor. See also Society of St. Vincent de Paul.

P

Pacem in Terris (pah'chem in ter'ees; Lat., "Peace on Earth"), encyclical on peace issued by Pope John XXIII in 1963. It provides the most systematic presentation of rights and duties of all the documents in Catholic social teaching. These rights and duties are grounded in the claim that there is an "astonishing order" in the universe created by God. This order is reflected in human persons and is the basis of their inviolable dignity. This dignity is the basis for a wide array of rights, for instance, the right to life, to a just wage, to worship, and to form associations. These rights have corresponding duties, particularly the obligation to "contribute to the establishment of a civic order in which rights and duties are more sincerely and effectively acknowledged and fulfilled" (n. 31).

Because the recognition of these rights and duties requires protection and promotion, there stands a need for public authority. Therefore, John addressed the basis for legitimate authority. All rightly ruling authority serves the common good, which is the sum total of the conditions that allow persons to seek their perfection "more fully and more easily." Such conditions are specified in the rights and duties.

Pope John XXIII extended the range of modern Catholic social teaching in two additional ways. First, he applied his social theory to the relations between states. Previous documents focused primarily on the relations within states. Second, this emphasis on international relations led him to address more fully the problem of war and the conditions of peace. Previous social teaching accented the economic sphere. See also Catholic social teachings; encyclicals, social; peace. TODD D. WHITMORE

Pachomius, ca. 290–ca. 347, founder of the first organized monasteries in Upper Egypt at Tabennisi ca. 320. His emphasis on disciplined obedience contrasted with greater individualism among the solitaries. Soon he had a following of about nine thousand monks and nuns in several monasteries. The texts of his rules are probably mainly written by successors.

pacifism, the belief that human beings ought always to seek peaceful, nonviolent ways of living together and resolving conflicts and ought never to kill other human beings.

In Christian teaching, pacifism is the starting point even for positions that allow for justifiable exceptions. Jesus taught, "Do not resist an evildoer," but rather "Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you"; turn the other cheek if struck (Matt 5:39–43). Among Protestants, Mennonites and Quakers have been especially committed to nonresistance; among Catholics, monastic orders, such as the Franciscans, have been particularly engaged with it.

Christian pacifists note that Jesus did resist evil, though without lethal violence. They practice a more activist form of pacifism, or active nonviolence. Its most important exemplar, however, was a Hindu admirer of Christ, Mahatma Gandhi. In leading India to independence from British rule, he developed strategies of nonviolent coercion, protest, and social mobilization. Martin Luther King, Jr., later appropriated these in the U.S. civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s. Dorothy Day, her Catholic Worker movement, Thomas Merton, and peace activists such as Daniel and Philip Berrigan also modeled such a pacifism.

Some representatives of the Catholic Church's just-war tradition have concluded that warfare in the nuclear age has become so destructive that no modern war can meet the criteria for a just war. They speak of their position as nuclear pacifism. See also just-war doctrine; peace; peace movement, Catholic.

PADRES (Span., "fathers"), the organization of Catholic Hispanic clergy in the United States.

Palamas, St. Gregory, ca. 1296–1359, monk and mystical theologian in the Orthodox Church. Gregory convinced his sisters, brothers, and widowed mother to enter religious life. On Mount Athos he encountered firsthand the Hesychast tradition of which he became a prime defender and exponent, especially against Barlaam of Calabria and Western theology. Gregory systematized the thought of Simeon the New Theologian; both he and Simeon found the liturgy a normative resource for theology. Gregory emphasized the need for theology to be apophatic, i.e., restrained in its speech about God, because of the transcendence of God, but with a firm affirmation of the reality of divine revelation. He put special emphasis on the Transfiguration and on the light seen there by the disciples, a light that was a divine reality. For Gregory God's grace brought to the faithful the gift of deification. Gregory Palamas became archbishop of Thessalonica in 1347 and was canonized in the Orthodox Church soon after his death in 1368. Feast day: November 14, also the second Sunday of Lent (East). See also mystical theology.

Pall

Paleo-Christian art, Christian artifacts made before Constantine's Edict of Toleration in the early fourth century. These consist mainly of such artifacts as carved gems, catacomb frescos, tomb decoration, some pieces of sculpture, and architectural remains that predate the period when Christians were not subject to persecution. See also Catholicism and the visual arts.

Palestrina, Giovanni, ca. 1525–94, foremost liturgical composer of the sixteenth century. Brought to Rome in 1551 by Pope Julius III, Palestrina created rich and complex polyphonic settings of the Mass (e.g., Missa di Papa Marcello) that were important artistic expressions of the Counter-Reformation. See also Catholicism and music.

pall (pawl; Lat., pallium, "cloak"), 1 a sacred cloth, usually a square piece of cardboard covered with linen, placed over the chalice at Mass. It derives from a larger altar cloth, capable of being folded over the chalice. 2 The term also designates the cloth covering for the coffin at funeral Masses.

Palladius, ca. 365–425, historian famous for his Lausiac History (419–20), one of the most important sources for the history of ancient monasticism. He was accused, perhaps unjustly, of Origenism and exiled (406–12) for his support of John Chrysostom. His Dialogue on the life of Chrysostom is both a defense and biography of his friend. See also Chrysostom, St. John; monasticism; Origenism.

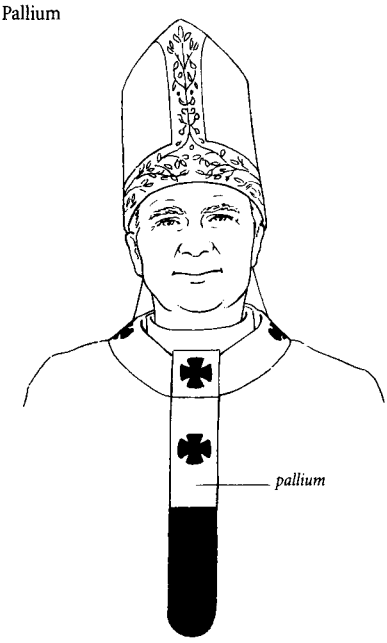
pallium, a narrow circular band of white wool, marked with six dark purple crosses, with two hanging strips front and back. It is worn around the neck and shoulders of the pope, signifying the plenitude of the pontifical office. The pope may grant its use to archbishops (and occasionally bishops). See also archbishop.

Pallotti, St. Vincent, 1795–1850, founder of the Society of the Catholic Apostolate (Pallottine Fathers) in Rome in 1835. He later founded the Sisters of the Catholic Apostolate. Pallotti supported artisan guilds and schools for young workers. He has been called the second Philip Neri because of his ministries during a cholera plague. Feast day: January 22. See also Pallottine Fathers.

Pallottine Fathers, popular name for the Society of the Catholic Apostolate (S.A.C.), founded in Rome in 1835 by Vincent Pallotti. Members strive to be a bridge between diocesan and religious priests. They are an exempt (i.e., from the control of the local bishop) society of clerics and lay brothers who live a common life and make promises, not vows, of poverty, chastity, obedience, and perseverance. In 1854 their name was changed to the Pious Society of the Missions because it was asserted that the "apostolate" belonged to the hierarchy alone. The name was restored in 1947. Works include education, parish ministry, missions, and publication. The generalate is in Rome and there are five provinces in the United States. See also Pallotti, St. Vincent.

Palm Sunday, the first day of Holy Week, the

Pallium



Sunday before Easter. This day's distinctive ceremonies—especially the procession commemorating Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem shortly before his death—are already attested in the fourth-century Peregrinatio Egeriae, the travel diary of a woman who saw this ritual performed in Jerusalem. Such rites were adopted slowly in the West, where they are first met in an eighth-century Gallican sacramentary known as the Bobbio Missal. Originally separate from Mass, the Palm Sunday procession was eventually attached to the beginning of the eucharistic celebration. Since Vatican Council II (1962–65), this day also has been called Passion Sunday. See also Holy Week.

Palmieri, Domenico (doh-men'i-koh pahl-myair'ee), 1829–1909, Jesuit philosopher and theologian. He taught at the Gregorian University in Rome before falling out of favor with neo-Thomists because of his rejection of hylomorphism, the belief that every being is constituted of form and matter.

Panagia (pah-nah-gee'ah; Gk., "all-holy [one]"), Byzantine title for the Mother of God and, by extension, for the loaf of bread blessed at table in Greek monasteries and elevated in her honor. It is also the Russian term for the Byzantine episcopal "pectoral" (Gk., enkolpion), an oval-shaped medallion worn by Byzantine-rite bishops and more recently adopted by bishops of other Eastern churches. It usually bears a small icon of the Panagia holding the Christ child. See also Mother of God; Theotokos.

Pancras, St., d. ca. 304, martyr. His cult was established in Rome and spread to England after Augustine of Canterbury (d. ca. 605) built a church there in his honor. Nothing reliable is known of him. Feast day (with Sts. Nereus and Achilleus): May 12.

Panentheism (Gk., pan, "everything," en, "in," theos, "God"), the belief that the being of God is "in" the whole universe, but that God's Being is more than the universe (unlike the view of Pantheism that God and the universe are one). Traceable to Plato in his discussion of the problem of the one and the many, various forms of Panentheism have stressed that contained in the Absolute God are both infinity and limitation, abstract possibility and concrete realization, the unchanging and the essential, as well as the dynamic and the accidental. Twentieth-century theorists such as Alfred North Whitehead, Charles Hartshorne, and the Jesuit Pierre Teilhard de Chardin have given formal expression to Panentheism in views espousing belief in a dipolar or evolving God, at once eternal and temporal, encompassing and transcending the world. See also Pantheism.

Pange Lingua (pahn'jay ling'wah; Lat., "Sing, my tongue"), a hymn composed by Venantius Fortunantus (d. 610). Another version of it, composed by Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), is sung on Holy Thursday and Corpus Christi, and its last two verses, Tantum Ergo, are sung at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. For the full English text, see The Raccolta (1957) or P. Klein, ed., Catholic Source Book (Dubuque, Iowa: Brown-ROA, 1990). See also Benediction; Corpus Christi, Feast of; Holy Thursday; Tantum Ergo.

panniculus (pan-ik'yuh-luhs; Lat., panis, "bread"), a small morsel of bread, like a Host. Alternatively, in ancient sources, a small rag, an altar linen, or gremial (a bishop's ceremonial lap cloth).

Pantaleon, St. (pan-tay'lee-ahn), also known as Panteleimon, d. ca. 305, martyr and patron saint of physicians. A physician whose patients included the emperor Galerius, he was beheaded during the Diocletian persecutions. He is venerated widely in the East as a great martyr and wonder-worker; in the West he is considered one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, and his blood at Ravello, Italy, is believed to liquefy on his feast day like that of St. Januarius. Feast day: July 27. See also Fourteen Holy Helpers.

Pantheism (Gk., pan, "all"; theos, "God"), belief or theory that identifies God with the world and the world with God. In the Hindu literature of ancient India, the absolute deity is immanent in all reality and animates humanity. Buddhism, Jainism, and Taoism likewise reflect varying degrees of identification of God with the world. For Christianity, the relationship between God and the world, between Creator and creature, is characterized as both unity and difference, maintained in tension so as to affirm God's transcendence while stressing the participation of creatures in the infinite being of God. Although Catholic doctrine clearly upholds the unity of Creator and creature "in the Holy Spirit," teachings about the reality of grace never negate or suppress belief in the finitude of the human soul or the otherness of God. Such a tension is virtually eliminated in religions with strong pantheistic tendencies. See also Panentheism.

THE PAPACY

The papacy is the office and jurisdiction of the Bishop of Rome (the pope). In the history of Christianity, the papacy has always been considered one of the most important and controversial issues. Because of the tradition that Peter and Paul (the two main leaders of the apostolic Church) were martyred in the imperial city of Rome, the bishop of the local church of Rome has been considered the possessor of a specific authority associated with the mission and well-being of the whole Church. This mission implies a specific power of jurisdiction for the oversight of all the other bishops and the churches these bishops serve as vicars of Christ (cf. Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 27). But even as early as the time of Cyprian (d. 258), the relations between the bishop of the principal episcopal see and the other bishops were never exempt from tensions and even conflicts. It has been said that, because a relationship between power and freedom is always involved, the papacy is a gift of God difficult to manage evangelically. On many occasions it has been at the root of Christian division and remains an important stumbling block on the way to full visible unity of all the disciples of Christ. Nevertheless, it belongs to the structure of the Church.

The Roman papacy changed considerably between its quite rudimentary beginnings in the first centuries and the form it assumed following the Middle Ages. But it is important to understand that any such changes have always been linked to the evolution of the whole Church and its relation to the whole of human history. Sometimes many tasks assumed by the Bishop of Rome were the consequence of political and social conditions, as, for instance, the government of the so-called Papal States. Quite often external pressures obscured the authentic nature of the papacy. One of the main challenges of the papacy is to judge all tasks in the light of the gospel in order to avoid transforming ecclesiastical jurisdiction into political power. It is clear that during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the papacy has been led, because of political circumstances as well as some evangelical streams of renewal, to give up most of its worldly power. The papacy is now universally perceived as a spiritual reality and not as a political one, even if it intervenes more often than in the past for the promotion of social justice, peace, human rights, and political freedom. Since the pontificate of Leo XIII (1878–1903), the papacy has been considered a very strong voice in concert with the voices of all those who work for the defense of the poor and of workers. The influence of Paul VI (1963–78) and John Paul II (elected 1978) on the political scene has been acknowledged by political experts. The papacy is seen as a spiritual power, grounded in a long history of service to humanity, counterbalancing the political games of the worldly powers.

For many centuries, the papacy has been considered by non–Roman Catholics as a source of intractable problems. These have been central to the separation between Rome and Constantinople and between Rome and the so-called Reformed and Protestant churches. Nevertheless, thanks especially to the entry of Roman Catholicism into many bilateral ecumenical dialogues and the World Council of Churches' Commission on Faith and Order, significant steps forward have been accomplished. The papacy is no longer seen as an incarnation of the antichrist and on many occasions the leaders of other Christian bodies address the Bishop of Rome as one of their brothers. During the Seventh Assembly of the World Council of Churches at Canberra, Australia (1991), it was said (not only by Orthodox delegates but also by representatives of Protestant churches) that now it is no longer the presence of the papacy but its absence from the World Council of Churches (except for the Commission on Faith and Order) that is the main problem of the ecumenical movement.

During the first centuries, when the Eastern churches and the Western churches were in communion, papal power was exercised mainly by giving authoritative answers to controversial questions (like the date of Easter), by protecting the rights of the other bishops, by arbitrating conflicts, and sometimes by excommunicating those refusing to accept the decisions of the Roman see (as Victor I did in 198 and Stephen I in 257). But slowly the Roman see came to take initiative in leading other churches toward what it understood to be the will of Christ for the Church. Pope Leo I (d. 461)—following the policy of Siricius (d. 399), Innocent (d. 417), and Zosimus (d. 418)—gave the papacy the high profile it kept for the next centuries. It was Gelasius I (d. 496) who opened the way to the theology of "the two powers," according to which political and temporal power was subordinated to spiritual power. It is this theory that was expressed very harshly by Boniface VIII in the bull Unam Sanctam (1302), a source of many problems for Western Christianity. Before the separation between East and West, the existence of the patriarchates and their officially recognized authority within their own juridical structure were powerful moderators of the papacy's growing desire to control and direct the whole life of the churches, an enterprise that the see of Rome had felt, in many circumstances, was in harmony with its mission. After the split in 1054, the shape of the papacy changed considerably. Only one patriarchate remained in the West. Thus, because its patriarch was the same person as the primate of the universal Church, the patriarchal leadership came to be entirely absorbed by the power of the papacy. Western Christianity became what some Orthodox describe as a papal church, that is, a church that relates so predominantly to the see of Rome that the relationship to the local bishop is somehow swallowed up. The traditional vision of the Church of God as a "communion of local churches" was in danger of being entirely absorbed into the vision of a "universal Church under a universal primate."

Against this background, Vatican I's (1869–70) constitution Pastor Aeternus and the original draft of it sound very moderate. Because of the strong theological positions of the so-called minority, the council tried to propose a vision of the papacy that did not restrict the authority of the other bishops over their own local churches. It stressed the fact that the Bishop of Rome is not the bishop of any other local church. Moreover, during the discussions it became clear that supreme papal authority cannot be exercised in a purely worldly manner; it is the authority of the servus servorum Dei (Lat., "servant of the servants of God"). The correspondence between Pius IX and the German bishops, provoked by the intervention of German chancellor Bismarck (1875), shows very clearly that, according to Vatican I, the authority of the local bishops is essential to the life of the Church and cannot be considered a pure concession. The papacy is not a religious form of monarchy, in which the bishops are the vassals of the Roman Pontiff.

At Vatican II (1962–65) Pastor Aeternus was reread by placing it within the main insights of the ecclesiology of communion. It became very clear that the Church is neither a monarchy in which the supreme head delegates authority to the vassals, nor a confederation of local churches whose bishops give to a president a certain amount of authority in view of their "being together." It is a communion of local churches to which Christ himself gives, in the person of the bishop of the see of Peter and Paul, a ministry of unity in order to keep the churches in authentic unity of faith, charity, mission, ministry, and sacraments. Since Vatican II the Catholic Church has been experiencing a new stage in the history of the papacy. On one side, through his apostolic trips all over the world, the Bishop of Rome has made his personal presence more and more important; on the other, since Paul VI, the World Synod of Bishops has been periodically convoked in order to work with the Bishop of Rome in an advisory capacity and, if necessary, to exercise deliberative power.

See also collegiality; communion, Church as; infallibility; Papal States; Petrine ministry; Petrine succession; primacy, papal; Vatican Council I; vicar of Christ; Vicar of Peter.

Bibliography

Bertrams, Wilhelm. The Papacy, the Episcopacy and Collegiality. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1958.

Brezzi, Paolo. The Papacy: Its Origins and Historical Evolution. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1958.

Caragounis, Chrys C. Peter and the Rock. New York: W. de Gruyter, 1990.

Dionne, J. Robert. The Papacy and the Church. New York: Philosophical Library, 1987.

Granfield, Patrick. The Limits of the Papacy: Authority and Autonomy in the Church. New York: Crossroad, 1987.

Miller, J. Michael. What Are They Saying About Papal Primacy? New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

Tillard, Jean-Marie Roger. The Bishop of Rome. Wilmington, DE: Michal Glazier, 1983.

JEAN-M. R. TILLARD

papal audience. See audience, papal.

papal blessing, 1 a benediction or blessing bestowed by the pope. Cardinals and bishops may be delegated to bestow the papal, or apostolic, blessing on solemn occasions. It may also be given by abbots, retreat masters, and priests at the hour of death. It carries with it a plenary indulgence, i.e., the remission of all temporal punishment due to sins that have already been forgiven. 2 The term also applies to the parchment certificate bearing the words of the blessing for particular persons on special occasions, such as a wedding anniversary.

papal chamberlain, commonly known as a monsignor, formerly one of several ranks, some merely honorary, conferred on ecclesiastics attached to the papal household. In 1968, Pope Paul VI eliminated or altered many such categories, with papal chamberlains renamed as "Chaplains of His Holiness." See also Honorary Prelate of His Holiness; monsignor.

papal election, the election of a pope by the College of Cardinals in conclave, a closed meeting. The conclave must begin between fifteen and twenty days after the death of the previous pope. In 1970 Pope Paul VI restricted participation to those cardinals who are less than eighty years old, and in 1973 he limited the number of cardinals who could participate in a conclave to 120. The dean of the College of Cardinals convokes the conclave, and prior to it, a committee of the cardinal chamberlain (Camerlengo) of the Apostolic Camera (Lat., "chamber"; office that administers the Holy See during the vacancy in the papal office) and three cardinals (a cardinal-bishop, cardinal-priest, and cardinal-deacon, each chosen by lot from the 120 cardinal-electors) determines dates for mandatory daily general sessions preparatory to the conclave. The dean presides over the preliminary sessions, which decide necessary details, review pertinent legislation, and administer required oaths of secrecy. After entrance to, and sealing of, the conclave, election takes place in the Sistine Chapel with only cardinal-electors present. Election is permitted by acclamation (spontaneous, unanimous, vocal proclamation) or by compromise (entrusting the choice to a group of nine to fifteen cardinals), but the usual manner is by scrutiny (secret ballot). Actual voting is governed by detailed norms for the size, shape, and appearance of ballots as well as how they are cast, counted, and destroyed. Two scrutinies are held per day, and a vote of two-thirds plus one is required for election. Ballots from inconclusive scrutinies are burned with straw and chemicals, producing dark smoke. Ballots from a conclusive scrutiny are burned without straw, producing the white smoke that signifies election of a pope to those outside the conclave. See also Cardinals, College of; conclave. ELIZABETH MCDONOUGH papal enclosure. See enclosure.

papal flag, the national standard of Vatican City State, consisting of two equal-sized vertical stripes of yellow and white, with the insignia of the papacy on the white stripe (a triple crown, or tiara, over two crossed keys, one gold and one silver, tied with a red cord and two tassels). See also Vatican City State.

papal legate, a representative of the pope to a particular church or civil government or to an international council or conference (Code of Canon Law, can. 363). Legates to civil governments are emissaries of the Holy See recognized as an international entity having a worldwide spiritual mission. See also Holy See; nuncio.

papal nuncio. See nuncio.

papal primacy. See primacy, papal.

papal resignation. See resignation.

Papal States, parts of central Italy and the territory of Avignon and Venaissin in France that once acknowledged the temporal sovereignty of the pope. Although popes claimed temporal sovereignty over certain areas in Italy beginning in the fourth century, it was not until the eighth century that the papacy assumed juridical and administrative control. The center of its territories was the former Byzantine Duchy of Rome. In 1791 the papal territories situated in France were absorbed by the Republic. In 1861 the remaining lands under papal control, except for Rome itself, became part of the Kingdom of Italy, and in 1870, after the withdrawal of French protection, Rome itself became part of the Kingdom of Italy.

After 1870 the "Roman Question" became a major problem in Italian politics. Pius IX (d. 1878) rejected the concessions offered by the Italian state, which granted the pope a pension and control over the basilicas and palaces of the Lateran and the Vatican. Final resolution was not reached until 1929 when Vatican City was recognized as a separate state. See also Lateran Treaty; Vatican; Vatican City State.

Papias, early-second-century bishop of Hierapolis. Irenaeus calls him "a man of old," who knew "John" and was a friend of Polycarp. His five books of Expositions of the Lord's Sayings are lost apart from fragments, the most famous of which concern the origin of the Gospels of Mark and Matthew. See also synoptic Gospels, problem of.

parable (Gk., parabolē, "a casting alongside of," hence, "comparison"), a story, metaphor, or simile drawn from ordinary life or nature and often used by Jesus to make a religious point. The NT "parable" translates the Hebrew mashal, which is used in the OT for a wide variety of literary forms such as proverbs (1 Sam 10:12; Prov 1:1, 6; 10:1; 26:7–9), riddles (Judg 14:10–18), taunt songs (Mic 2:4; Hab 2:6), and allegories (Ezek 17:3–24) and in the intertestamental literature for long revelatory discourses such as the similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 39–71). The NT exhibits similar variety; "parable" describes proverbs (Luke 4:23), wisdom sayings (Luke 5:36–39), allegories (Mark 12:1–11; Matt 22:1–14), and the more familiar narrative parables (Luke 18:9–14). Passages not explicitly called parables can be considered as such when they contain introductory formulas such as "it is like" (Matt 11:16), "the kingdom of heaven is like" (Matt 13:31, 33), or "to what shall I compare" (Luke 7:31; cf. Mark 4:30) or because of their context (Luke 15:11–32; see 15:1–3). Teaching in parables was characteristic of the historical Jesus, especially in his proclamation of the kingdom of God (see Mark 4:26–32; Matt 13:24–30, 33, 44–46; 18:23–35; 20:1–16). See also allegory; kingdom of God [in the Bible].

paraclete (par'uh-kleet; Gk., "one called to the side"), a counselor or an advocate. The Fourth Gospel uses the term for the Spirit that Jesus promises to send to instruct his disciples (John 14:16, 26; 15:26; 16:7). 1 John 2:1 uses the term "paraclete" of Jesus himself ("advocate" in NRSV). See also Holy Spirit.

Paraclete, the, monastery of nuns in Troyes, France, founded by Peter Abelard, confirmed by Pope Innocent II in 1131, with Héloïse as its first prioress and abbess. Abelard accommodated the Benedictine rule to the needs of women, provided directives for lectio divina (Lat., "spiritual reading") and for studies, composed a treatise on the origin of nuns as well as hymns, sermons, prayers, and a breviary. After Abelard's death in 1142, Héloïse founded several daughter houses. In 1147 the Paraclete received canonical status as a religious order and survived until the French Revolution. See also Abelard, Peter; Héloïse.

paradise, in the NT (Luke 23:43; 2 Cor 12:3; Rev 2:7) and in common Christian usage, the realm of God into which the righteous enter after death. It also refers to the garden of Eden as symbolic of that realm (Rev 2:7). The Hebrew word (pardēs) is a loanword from Old Persian, meaning a private park or enclosure. See also heaven.

paraliturgy, a service of public prayer modeled on the liturgy but not found in the official books. Paraliturgies originated in post–World War II France as biblically and liturgically inspired prayer services that were created locally, in the vernacular, and authorized by the local bishop. The liturgical reforms of Vatican II made them largely redundant. See also extraliturgical service.

parents, duties of, the general and particular obligations that the Church specifies to be those that mothers and fathers have toward their children. Canon law states that "Parents have the most serious duty and the primary right to do all in their power to see to the physical, social, cultural, moral, and religious upbringing of their children" (can. 1136). The documents of Vatican II speak of the family as the domestic church (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 11), where parents are the first to communicate the faith to their children (Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, n. 11). Parents must set an example by their own faith, as well as by their conjugal love and fidelity. Parents also have the task of educating their children to recognize God's love for everyone and to show concern for the material and spiritual needs of their neighbor. In this sense, family life is an apprenticeship for the Church's mission (n. 30). It is also the duty of parents to help their children in vocational choices generally and to promote religious vocations when these are discerned (n. 12). Parents are obligated to send their children to Catholic schools whenever possible (Declaration on Christian Education, n. 8) and to safeguard their children against those elements in society that threaten their faith or morals (Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication, n. 10). See also family.

Paris, a Christian center beginning in the third century. According to Gregory of Tours (d. 594), historian of the Franks, St. Denis, the first bishop of Paris, was one of seven bishops sent to evangelize Gaul in the mid-third century (by the end of the second century there was already a Christian community at Lyons, in east-central France). Several key institutions that flourished during the Middle Ages made Paris an important Christian center: the Benedictine abbey of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, founded in the sixth century; Notre Dame Cathedral, begun and consecrated in the eleventh century; and the abbey of St. Victor and the University of Paris, both founded in the twelfth century. In the thirteenth century Paris was the chief center of Scholasticism, including among its outstanding theologians members of the new mendicant orders (the Dominicans Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas and the Franciscans Alexander of Hales, Bonaventure, and John Duns Scotus) and diocesan priests (William of Auxerre and Henry of Ghent).

By the end of the fourteenth century, however, Paris began to recede as a theological center with the decline of Scholasticism, the Great Schism (1378–1417), and the war with England, during which the city was occupied by English forces (1420–36). In the seventeenth century Paris was the center of a religious renewal under the leadership of Francis de Sales, Vincent de Paul, Pierre de Bérulle, and Jean-Jacques Olier, in reaction against Gallicanism and Jansenism. In the eighteenth century, however, Paris became a center of rationalism and the Enlightenment. With the French Revolution of 1789 and subsequent revolutions of 1830 and 1848, Catholicism in Paris went largely into eclipse. The theology faculty of the University of Paris, abolished since the revolution of 1789, has been represented since 1875 by the Institut Catholique. See also France, Catholicism in; Institut Catholique; Notre Dame Cathedral; Saint-Germain-des-Prés; Scholasticism; Victorines.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

parish, a defined, stable community of Christian faithful usually established locally within a geographical section of a diocese and entrusted by the diocesan bishop to the pastoral care of a priest called a pastor. If circumstances should warrant, diocesan bishops may organize parishes nonterritorially, in accordance with special religious or sociocultural needs, like rite, nationality, or language. Canon law safeguards the stability of parishes, endowing them with the status of a juridical person, requiring bishops to consult the presbyteral council of the diocese when opening, closing, or changing them, and instituting special procedures for removing and transferring pastors. See also pastor.

parish council, a body of representatives chosen or appointed for the purpose of sharing administrative and ministerial responsibilities with the pastor. Parish councils had their origin in Vatican II's Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (1965), which called for lay involvement in diocesan councils and encouraged a parallel development on the parish level (n. 26). The Directory on the Pastoral Ministry of Bishops (1973) further specified the responsibilities of these councils: they were to assume temporal administrative tasks (n. 135) and works proper to their apostolate (n. 179), and their formation was intended to foster a sense of community and to promote zeal for the apostolate among the laity (n. 147). Parish councils can be required by a diocese, but they are not mandated by canon law (can. 536). Canon law further stipulates that parish councils are to be governed by norms determined by the bishop, while their immediate president is the pastor. Their authority and vote are to be consultative.

In the first decade after Vatican II (1962–65), more than ten thousand councils were founded. By the late 1980s approximately 75 percent of U.S. parishes had a council in place. Councils are often organized into committees responsible for the various administrative and pastoral ministries of the parish: administration, finance, liturgy, education, social justice, spiritual development, ecumenism, and parish activities. They function variously as advisory or decision-making bodies. Tensions over the relative authority of council and pastor and the assignation of tasks proper to each have emerged in the years following the council and continue to inform the ongoing definition of ministry and of lay vocation in the Church.

Among the issues that such councils face as they enter their second generation are the continuing need for committed volunteers and adequate training, the challenge to realize collaborative models of interaction, and the mandate to articulate and enable leadership at the parish level. See also laity; parish. CATHERINE MURPHY parish mission, a technique of evangelization that originated in the Catholic Reform era of the sixteenth century. Promoted by religious orders, especially the Jesuits, it sought to strengthen the religious faith and devotion of the people. Itinerant missionaries would arrive in a parish and remain there for a week, two weeks, or even longer; they would follow a regular schedule of sermons, always seeking to convert their listeners to a life of holiness. It was very similar to revivals taking place in Protestant churches at this time. The preaching was emotional and the message of sin and salvation inspired every sermon. After flourishing in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the parish mission went into decline in the eighteenth century. It was revived in the nineteenth century and was brought to the United States by immigrant clergy. The parish mission was a key element in the renewal of Catholicism in the nineteenth century. See also revivalism, Catholic.

parish team, a group of people working in partnership to exercise the ministry of leadership on behalf of a parish community. Typically, a parish team consists of both lay and ordained ministers whose collaborative efforts are aimed at facilitating the teaching, preaching, sacramental celebration, and action on behalf of justice and peace, which together create an authentic, local actualization of the Church of Christ. See also parish.

parochial school, general term for a Catholic elementary school, but specifically a Catholic school attached to a particular parish. The first Catholic schools in the United States were operated by congregations of women religious who used the proceeds from their academies to fund free schools. St. Mary's School in Philadelphia, founded in 1782, is generally considered the first parochial school in the United States. Intensive development of parochial schools began in the 1840s, as Catholics battled Protestants unsuccessfully for a share of state educational funds. Catholics objected to the distinctly Protestant bias of the public or common school, and so established a separate school system to protect the Catholic faith of their children. Essential to the development of parochial schools was the hard work and devotion of countless groups of teaching sisters, who provided the inner strength of the Catholic educational system. In 1852 the First Plenary Council of Baltimore encouraged each parish to establish a school, and in 1884 the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore mandated that each parish open a school within two years, and set the ideal as "every Catholic child in a Catholic school." Though the ideal was never realized, a massive Catholic school system did develop throughout the country. Catholic schools reached their peak in the post–World War II era. The 1960s brought a severe questioning of Catholic schools, highlighted by Mary Perkins Ryan's challenge, Are Parochial Schools the Answer? (1964). The biggest challenge facing the post–Vatican II parochial school was financial. With the reduction in the number of teaching sisters, more lay teachers had to be hired, entailing a dramatic increase in school budgets. The increased costs, plus the flight of older Catholic groups from the inner cities, led to the closing of many urban Catholic schools in the 1980s. See also Catholicism and education. JEFFREY M. BURNS parochial vicar, associate parish priest assigned by the diocesan bishop to collaborate with the pastor in parish ministry. Diocesan law and policy may define the assignment process and the specific rights and duties of parochial vicars. The diocesan bishop may remove and transfer them for just cause. The parochial vicar was formerly known as a curate. See also parish team; pastor.

Parousia (pahr-oo-see'uh; Gk., "presence," "arrival"), the coming of Christ in glory. In the Hellenistic period the term was used for the visit of an official to a city or territory. Paul thus speaks of his own parousia to his congregations (Phil 1:26). From that use derives the application to the Second Coming of Christ, described in detail in 1 Thess 4:15–18 or Matt 24:3–41. Parousia then becomes the standard designation for the event in Paul (1 Cor 15:23; 1 Thess 2:19; 3:13; 5:23; 2 Thess 2:1, 8) and other early Christian writers (Jas 5:7–8; 2 Pet 1:16; 3:4, 12; 1 John 2:28). See also Second Coming.

Parsch, Pius, 1884–1954, Austrian canon of St. Augustine, promoter of pastoral liturgy, and author of the influential The Church's Year of Grace. Realizing how removed the liturgy of his day was from the life of the average Catholic, Parsch began a publishing house that generated popular biblical and liturgical materials. See also liturgical movement.

Parsons, Robert, also Persons, 1546–1610, Jesuit missionary. A fellow at Oxford, Parsons left England and converted to Catholicism at Louvain, becoming a Jesuit in 1575. Along with Edmund Campion, he led the first Jesuit mission to England in 1580, but left for the Continent after Campion's arrest. He continued his diplomatic activity in Rouen on behalf of the English Catholics, promoting for twenty years the Spanish invasion of England and formulating ideas about a Catholic successor to Elizabeth I. His most influential writing was an exhortation to the way of salvation by faith and good works, The Christian Directory (1582). From 1597 until his death, he was rector of the English College in Rome. See also England, Catholicism in.

partes inhonestae (pahr'tays in-oh-nest'ay; Lat., "dishonorable parts"), euphemism for the genitals. Based on 1 Cor 12:23–24, this phrase was used in the Vulgate to translate Greek equivalents. Augustine, who regarded the genital organs as instruments for the transmission of original sin, and other Latin writers handed down the term to the Scholastics. From there it was incorporated into the Latin manuals of moral theology in use up to the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

particular church, canonical term for local church. The code of canon law identifies particular churches "first of all" as dioceses. Others include territorial prelatures, territorial abbacies, apostolic vicariates, apostolic prefectures, and apostolic administrations "which have been erected on a stable basis" (cans. 368–74). Groupings of particular churches include ecclesiastical provinces and regions (cans. 431–34). See also diocese; parish; prelature, territorial.

particular judgment. See judgment, particular.

particular law, canon law norms legislated for a specified group of the faithful. Contrasted to universal law, which is laid down for the entire Church, particular law might exist for a given group such as a diocese, a country, or a religious institute.

parvitas materiae (pahr'vi-tahs mah-tair'ee-ay; Lat., "smallness of matter"), a technical term in Scholastic moral theology referring to the "smallness" or "slightness" of the moral content of an act. Following Scripture (1 John 5:16–17), Catholic moral theology maintains that most sins are not mortal. One reason a sin could be venial is that the moral "matter" involved is slight. For example, the theft of two dollars is of "slight" moral seriousness in comparison with a murder.

Pascal, Blaise, 1623–62, French mathematician, scientist, and religious thinker. Born in Clermond-Ferrand and educated at home by his father, Etienne, Pascal was brought into contact with leading scientists when the family moved to Paris in 1631 and his father joined the Society of Scientists. Pascal published his first mathematical treatise at age seventeen, and soon thereafter invented a calculating machine. His analysis of the mathematics of chance resulted in probability theory, and in physics Pascal's law has become the basis of modern hydraulic operations.

Pascal exerted a singular influence on the Christian spiritual tradition after he encountered Jansenism at Port-Royal. An initial "conversion" in 1646 was followed some years later by a second conversion during the night of November 23, 1654, when an intense religious experience profoundly altered his life. Pascal became more involved with the teachers of Port-Royal (Arnauld, Nicole, Le Maitre de Saci), supporting Arnauld during his controversy with the Jesuits and the papacy. Pascal's defense, published pseudonymously in a series of eighteen articles (Provincial Letters, 1656–57), quickly became a classic and was placed on the Index of Forbidden Books.

Pascal's most enduring legacy, however, is another classic: the Pensées, a collection of notes intended as an apology in defense of Christianity for unbelievers. Pascal drew from the experience of paradox that lies at the heart of the human condition and that he expressed as tension between human power and frailty. When faced with ultimate questions, reason and science are powerless. God is finally known (i.e., experienced) not by human striving but by God's gracious self-disclosure, not through reason but in the heart. Pascal's views mediated against the optimism of the Enlightenment and were opposed by Diderot, Voltaire, and others. See also apologetics; faith and reason; Jansenism.

EILEEN KEARNEY

Pascendi Dominici Gregis (pah-shen'dee doh-mee'nee-chee gray-jis; Lat., "Feeding the Lord's Flock"), an encylical of Pius X condemning Modernism, published on September 8, 1907. The various points of the Vatican's understanding of what it called "Modernism" were presented sharply and synthetically. It defended the transcendence of God and the reality of the Incarnation and revelation; it examined the philosophical, moral, and practical aspects of agnosticism and immanentism; and it commended the teaching and study of Scholasticism as well as the censorship of writings. Alfred Loisy (d. 1940), a French biblical scholar, was an implied target of the document. German scholars insisted that the papal charges did not correspond to German thought. See also Modernism; Pius X, St.

Paschal I, St., d. 824, pope from 817 to 824. In 817 Emperor Louis the Pious confirmed for Paschal the privileges accorded the papacy by Charlemagne, and the emperor also promised not to interfere in the papal domains or in papal elections. Paschal actively promoted the evangelization of the Danes and crowned Louis's son Lothair I as coemperor in 823. Although he made many efforts to renew the city of Rome and its monuments, Paschal's manner of governing was harsh, and he made many enemies. After his death, his body could not be buried in St. Peter's Basilica because of the disfavor he had incurred among the Roman people. His feast day, May 14, was dropped from the liturgical calendar in 1963.

Paschal II, d. 1118, pope from 1099 to 1118. More flexible than some of his predecessors, he was able to develop compromises that ended the investiture controversy in England and France; his attempts to come to an agreement with the German emperor, however, failed. See also investiture controversy.

Paschal Baylon, St., 1540–92, lay Franciscan brother and Spanish ascetic. He lived a life of self-denial and deep devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. He was known for his staunch defense of the doctrine of Christ's real eucharistic presence against the Protestants. Feast day: May 17.

paschal candle, Easter candle, marked and lit at the opening of the Easter Vigil. It was in widespread use as early as the late fourth century. Its symbolism is best understood from the Exultet (Lat., "exult") sung in its honor, usually by the deacon. It is the Easter proclamation of Christ's resurrection from the dead for our salvation. Though the paschal candle used to be extinguished after the Gospel reading on Ascension Day, it now remains near the ambo until Pentecost and is kept near the font through the year. It is used for its resurrection symbolism at baptisms and funerals.

paschal lamb (Aram., "passover"), the lamb sacrificed and eaten by Jews on the Feast of Passover to commemorate the liberating event in which God "passed over" the homes of the Hebrew people (who had sprinkled their doorposts with lamb's blood) and then brought them, led by Moses, out of Egypt and into Canaan (Exod 12:3–11). Christians have applied this name to Jesus Christ (1 Cor 5:7; John 1:29). See also Passover.

Paschal Mystery (Gk., pascha, Hebrew pesah, "passover"; Gk., musterion, "secret reality" or "rite"), the unified total event of Christ's Passion, death, Resurrection, Ascension, and sending of the Holy Spirit, insofar as it reveals and accomplishes God's previously hidden plan of salvation. The term reflects the Hebrew Passover, God's act of delivering Israel from Egypt, anticipating God's redemptive action in the Christ event. In the Paschal Mystery, Christ "passed over" to the Father, drawing all humankind and history with him. Christians remember, celebrate, and share in this Paschal Mystery in the liturgies of Holy Week/Easter Season and in each sacrament. See also Holy Week; Jesus Christ; salvation.

Paschal season, or Easter season, a fifty-day period beginning with Easter Sunday and concluding on the fiftieth day, called, since the fourth century, Pentecost Sunday. This liturgical period celebrates the Easter mystery of new life in Christ inaugurated by the Lord's Passion, death, and Resurrection, and bestowed by the Spirit. The Paschal season, a week of weeks, is a time of festival and, for the newly baptized, is the period of mystagogy, a fuller understanding and living of the Easter sacraments. See also Easter; Easter duty; mystagogy.

Paschasius Radbertus, St. (pash-kay'zhee-uhs rad-bair'toos), ca. 785–ca. 860, abbot and theologian. Abbot of the Benedictine monastery of Corbie from 843 to 849, he wrote the first treatise devoted exclusively to the Eucharist (831, revised in 844). He took an extreme realist view of eucharistic presence (identifying it with the human flesh of Jesus) and was excessively credulous regarding eucharistic miracles. His position was criticized by Ratramnus and Rabanus Maurus but remained influential throughout the medieval period. Feast day: April 26. See also Real Presence.

Passaglia, Carlo (kahr'loh pas-sahl'yah), 1812–87, influential theologian at the Roman College from 1844 to 1858. He left the Jesuits in 1859 and was suspended from the priesthood by Rome in 1862 because of his advocacy on behalf of priests sympathetic to Italian nationalism.

Passion, the (Lat., passio, "suffering"), the suffering and death of Jesus; a shorthand reference to the Passion narratives (Matt 26–27; Mark 14–15; Luke 22–23; John 18–19). Prior to these narratives, the suffering and death of Jesus were the subject of early Christian preaching and confession (Acts 2:23, 36; 4:10; 5:30; 10:39; Rom 8:32; 1 Cor 1:23; 15:3) and were liturgically celebrated (Phil 2:6–11; Rom 6:3–5; 1 Cor 11:23–26). Other more concrete terms are used for the Passion of Jesus: (1) the Cross (1 Cor 1:18; Gal 6:12, 14; Phil 3:18; Col 1:20); (2) the [saving] death (1 Cor 15:3; Rom 6:3); (3) blood and the shedding of blood (Rom 3:25; 5:9; 2 Cor 10:16; 11:27; Eph 1:7; 2:13; Heb 9:14; 10:19; 1 John 1:7; 1 Pet 1:2); (4) the "handing over" of Jesus (Rom 4:25; 1 Cor 11:23; Mark 9:31; 10:33); and (5) the "lifting up" of Jesus (John 3:14; 12:32) with the double meaning of lifting up on the cross and exaltation or return to the Father (John 14:28; 16:16; see Luke 9:51, Acts 2:33).

The Jewish Scriptures provided the major influence on the language of the Passion. Faced with "the offense of the cross" (Gal 5:11; Deut 21:23) and the absence of any OT expectation of a suffering messiah, early Christians mined the OT to argue that the Passion was "according to the Scriptures" (1 Cor 15:3; see Mark 14:21). Some of the major motifs are (1) Jesus' death as the Passover sacrifice (1 Cor 5:7) and Jesus himself as the Passover Lamb (John 19:36; see 1:29, 36; Rev 5:6, 12; 7:14; 12:11), or as a propitiation (Rom 3:25) taken from the liturgy of the Day of Atonement; (2) Jesus as the "righteous just one" who, like other figures from Jewish history, is unjustly persecuted but vindicated by God (Gen 37:39–41; Dan 3, 6; 2 Macc 7; Wis 2, 4–5; see also Psalm 22), and as the "suffering servant" of Isaiah (esp. 52:13–53:12); (3) Jesus as the high priest according to the likeness of Melchizedek who, by his death, offers the definitive sacrifice for sin (Heb 5:1–10; 7:1–27; 9:1–28; 13:11–12, 20).

Though the Passion narratives are the principal historical source for the final days of Jesus, they are written from the perspective of post-Easter faith. Mark stresses the paradox of faith: the Cross is the revelation of Jesus' true status (15:39); Jesus the true Messiah (royal figure) is mocked as a king (15:16–20); the lowly one is the risen one (16:6). Matthew portrays a Jesus who goes to death as lordly master of his own fate (26:53–55), and his removal by death is the way to an enduring presence with the community (28:16–20). In Luke, Jesus is a model martyr who is judged innocent by Pilate (23:22), forgives his persecutors (23:34), and dies with a prayer of confidence (23:46). John mitigates the harsher aspects of the Passion (19:2–3), which is less a story of degradation than the triumphal return of the Word to the Father and Jesus' hour of glorification (17:1). See also crucifixion. JOHN R. DONAHUE

Passionists, popular name for the Congregation of the Passion (C.P.), founded in Rome in 1720 by St. Paul of the Cross, who wrote the rule and constitution when he was twenty-six years old and still a layman. The purpose of the congregation is twofold: the sanctification of the self and the sanctification of others. The first foundation was established in 1737; papal approval was granted in 1741.

In the same year, Pope Clement XIV entrusted to them the care of the Basilica of Sts. John and Paul on the Coelian Hill in Rome. Their motherhouse is located on the grounds. When religious institutes in Italy were suppressed by Napoleon, the Passionists were totally destroyed since all of their houses were in that country. After being restored in 1814, the congregation flourished.

Passionists are an exempt (i.e., from the control of the local bishop) clerical order who take simple perpetual vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience. They vow obedience first to the pope and then to the superior. Brothers and priests share the same status in their common life. They chant the Divine Office daily. The coarse black wool habit, with a leather belt, bears a heart-shaped insignia with the words Jesu, XPI Passio ("The Passion of Jesus Christ"). Passionists are committed to preach and to center their ministries and spiritual lives on the suffering and death of Jesus Christ. The spirit of the congregation is prayer, penance, and solitude. Their primary work is preaching missions and retreats; catechetical instruction is secondary. The Passionists in the United States conduct television programs and published the Sign magazine until 1982. See also Paul of the Cross, St. REGINA COLL passions, faculties and acts of the sense appetites, e.g., love, hatred, hope, fear, desire, aversion, joy, and sadness. In Scholastic psychology, the passions are understood to be tendencies of the human person, grounded in the physiological responses of the organism toward its environment as those are experienced affectively, toward what is perceived to be beneficial or pleasurable, and away from what is perceived to be hurtful or unpleasant. Human passions cannot function unless they have first been informed by cognitive judgments that certain things are desirable, and others are undesirable or hurtful. Nonetheless, they can be misdirected toward what is not good overall. In contemporary moral theology, the language of the passions has largely been superseded by discussions of the emotions, understood developmentally. See also concupiscence; emotions, moral aspects of; appetites, concupiscible and irascible.

Passion Sunday, the Sunday opening Holy Week, popularly termed "Palm Sunday" because palms are blessed and distributed in commemoration of the Lord's entry into Jerusalem. This commemoration, derived from fourth-century Jerusalem, is the first part of the liturgy and may include a procession. Of Roman origin, the second part focuses on the Cross and Passion of Christ. One of the synoptic Passion accounts is proclaimed as the Gospel. The 1969 calendar revision suppressed "passiontide," renaming Palm Sunday (then the second Sunday of passiontide) Passion Sunday. See also Holy Week.

Passover, a major Jewish feast celebrated on the evening of 14 Nisan (i.e., March–April, the first month of the Jewish calendar during the spring equinox) commemorating the deliverance from Egyptian bondage (the Exodus). The English term derives from the Hebrew pesah, Exod 12:13, "I will pass over you . . . when I strike the land of Egypt," while the Greek loanword pascha is the basis for the English "Pasch" and "paschal." Exod 12:1–13:16 offers evidence that the feast developed from the joining of the Passover sacrifice (Exod 12:2–13) with a seven-day spring Festival of Unleavened Bread (Heb., massot, Exod 12:14, 18–20; see also Lev 23:4–9; Num 9:1–14; Deut 16:1–8; Ezra 6:19–22). Passover became a pilgrimage feast celebrated in Jerusalem as a ritual meal with the extended family. According to the synoptic Gospels (Matt 22:17–29; Mark 14:12–25; Luke 22:7–38) Jesus celebrated Passover with his followers before his death and is subsequently identified with the Passover lamb (1 Cor 5:7; John 1:29–30; Rev 5:12).

pastor, priest responsible for the pastoral care of a parish community entrusted to him by appointment of the diocesan bishop, under whom he exercises his duties by collaborating with his parishioners and his ministers. Besides fulfilling their sacramental and catechetical ministries, pastors are responsible for finances, building maintenance, parish programs, and coordinating the entire parish mission, fostering lay ministries in particular. While pastors serve under the authority of the bishop, appointments, transfers, and removals are procedurally safeguarded by a consultative process. See also parish.

Pastor Aeternus (pahs'tohr ay-tair'nuhs; Lat., "Eternal Pastor"), "First Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ," constitution issued by the First Vatican Council on July 18, 1870, defining the primacy and infallibility of the pope. See also infallibility; primacy, papal.

pastoral associate, collaborator with the pastor or pastoral coordinator in parish ministry. The pastoral associate may be a nonclerical ministerial assistant to a coordinator of sacramental, administrative, educational, or social activity in a parish. The proper term for a priest assigned to assist the pastor is "parochial vicar," although "associate pastor" is common. See also parish; parish team; pastor.

Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Lat., Gaudium et Spes, "joy and hope"), one of the sixteen documents of Vatican II. Approved on December 7, 1965, it was the last and the longest document of the Second Vatican Council. It was a truly conciliar text not only in its formal character, but also because the idea for such a document was a product of conciliar reflection and debate. As the bishops reflected on the nature and mission of the Church, the need for an explicitly theological address to the world became imperative.

Gaudium et Spes, along with the Declaration on Religious Liberty (Dignitatis Humanae), fulfilled this need. The theology of the pastoral constitution is rooted in two sources: the papal social teaching of the twentieth century and the theology developed in Western Europe from the 1930s through the 1950s.

The social encyclicals from the pontificate of Leo XIII (d. 1903) through that of John XXIII (d. 1963)

had elaborated a social philosophy and a moral assessment of the socioeconomic order. They did not provide, however, a theological or ecclesiological foundation for the social teaching. This more explicitly theological writing was produced after World War II in Europe particularly in the work of Yves Congar, Henri de Lubac (d. 1991), and Gustave Thils. When the decision was made at Vatican II to develop a document on the Church in the world, much of the basic theological work had been done. The conciliar text, nonetheless, was an advance beyond the previous theological work.

The nature, methodology, and tone of Gaudium et Spes all contributed to its distinctive character. First, the idea of a "pastoral constitution" meant that it was rooted in doctrinal principles but extended its analysis to contingent issues in the sociopolitical order. Second, the methodology of Gaudium et Spes required that the first step of theological reflection be an assessment of the empirical situation the Church sought to address. Then the assessment of this data "in the light of the gospel" followed. This approach influenced much theological reflection in the post-conciliar period, including the theology of liberation and the pastoral letters of the U.S. bishops in 1983 and 1986.

Gaudium et Spes has two parts. The enduring theological contribution is contained in Part One, where the conciliar text synthetically presents a Christian anthropology, a theology of human work, and a reflection on the Church's role in the world. Part Two is essentially a development of the themes found in the social encyclicals.

The chapters on marriage and the family and on the international community have had a major impact on the life of the Church since Vatican II. The chapter "Fostering the Nobility of Marriage and the Family" established the framework of the postconciliar debate on contraception by recasting the relationship of the unitive and procreative dimensions of sexuality.

The chapter "The Fostering of Peace and the Promotion of a Community of Nations" gave Catholic theology on war and peace a major impetus. By reaffirming traditional restraints on war in the face of the technology of the nuclear age and by legitimizing a nonviolent position for Catholics, Gaudium et Spes provided the foundation for Catholic theology of war and peace in the 1970s and 1980s.

The influence of Gaudium et Spes extended beyond any single issue. It is impossible to understand the highly active and effective social engagement of the Catholic Church in the postconciliar era apart from this document. See also Catholic social teachings; Vatican Council II.

Bibliography

Group 2000, ed. The Church Today: Commentaries on the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1967.

Murray, J. C. "The Issue of Church and State at Vatican II." Theological Studies 27 (1966): 580–606.

Vorgrimler, H. Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II. Vol. 5. Freiburg: Herder, 1968.

J. BRYAN HEHIR

pastoral council, representative diocesan or parish consultative body. Strongly recommended by canon law (cans. 511 and 536), a pastoral council collaborates with the bishop and the pastor, and all those ministerially associated with them in fulfilling the total mission and ministry of the diocese and the parish.

Members of such councils are either elected or appointed. Some members may be elected and others appointed. The function of the councils is advisory only. See also diocesan pastoral council; parish council.

pastoral counseling. See counseling, pastoral.

pastoral letter, a document, sometimes of considerable length, issued by a bishop to address matters of pastoral concern in a diocese. The term also refers to similar documents issued by a conference of bishops (Code of Canon Law, can. 447) that deal with pastoral matters in the territory of a particular episcopal conference. Examples of pastoral letters issued by the U.S. Catholic bishops include "The Challenge of Peace" (1983) and "Economic Justice for All: Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy" (1986).

pastoral Letters, a term referring to three NT Letters: 1–2 Timothy and Titus. They are called "pastoral" because they are addressed to "pastors" and because they are concerned with the pastoral life and welfare of churches. These three Letters purport to be by the apostle Paul to two co-workers. All three, however, probably come from the late first century A.D. They are likely the product of a Christian group that saw itself carrying on the traditions of Paul (a "Pauline school"), located, perhaps, in Ephesus. They also reflect a sense of a developing Christian tradition. See also catholic Letters.

pastoral ministry, commonly described as the self-realizing activity of the Church whereby the saving and shepherding care of God for all peoples is made present in the world. In its commitment to gospel proclamation, liturgy, administration of the local church, and acts of service, pastoral ministry is concerned not merely with the communication of theological principles but also with how those principles can be applied to concrete and changing circumstances. It aims to aid human persons and communities to recognize in all circumstances a depth dimension indicative of the salvific presence of God. See also ministry.

Pastoral Provision, also known as the Anglican Use, a canonical arrangement, approved by the Vatican's Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in June 1980, whereby married Episcopal (Anglican) priests who enter into full communion with the Catholic Church and who are eligible for ordination as Catholic priests may be dispensed from the discipline of clerical celibacy and whereby Episcopal (Anglican) parishes that enter into full communion with the Catholic Church may maintain a "common identity reflecting certain elements of their own heritage" through the use of Vatican-approved liturgical rites for the sacraments, the Liturgy of the Hours, and other forms of worship contained in the Book of Divine Worship. Each such parish, however, remains subject to the pastoral jurisdiction of the diocesan bishop. See also Anglicanism; Anglican ordination; Episcopal Church.

Pastor Bonus (Lat., "good pastor"), the apostolic constitution by Pope John Paul II ordering changes in the Roman Curia. Published on June 28, 1988, and made effective on March 1, 1989, the constitution was based on the broad outline of Pope Paul VI's (d. 1978) four-year reorganization study of the Roman Curia, beginning in 1963 and ending with the publication of Regimini Ecclesiae Universae (Lat., "On the governance of the universal Church") in 1967. The reorganized Curia consists of the Secretariat of State, nine congregations, three tribunals, twelve councils, and three offices, as well as many other departments and agencies attached to the Holy See. See also Roman Curia.

Patarag (pah-tah-rahg'; Arm., "offering," "sacrifice," "gift"), one of the common names for the Armenian eucharistic liturgy.

Patarenes, radical Church reform movement originating in Milan in the 1050s seeking to end clerical marriage and simony (buying and selling of Church offices and spiritual goods) and hostile to lay involvement in the Church. Though supportive of papal reforms, they were criticized by Pope Alexander II for their violence and extremism. "Patarene" eventually became a general label for heretics.

paten (Lat., patena, Gk., patane, "dish," "plate"), a small, circular, flat dish that holds the presider's host at Mass. Originally made of glass, it is presently made of gold-plated metal. Before the ninth century, the paten was large enough to hold sufficient bread (unleavened) for Communion of the faithful.

Pater Noster (pah'tair nah'stair). See Lord's Prayer.

patience (Lat., patientia, "endurance"), the virtue that enables one to bear suffering over a long period of time, courageously and without rancor. It is part of the cardinal virtue of fortitude and is to be distinguished from indifference, or insensitivity to misfortune.

patriarch [biblical], in a strict sense, any of the male ancestors of Israel mentioned in Genesis, both before and after the Flood. More commonly, however, the term is restricted to the descendants of Abraham, principally Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. As heirs of Israel and its traditions, early Christians saw themselves as "children of Abraham." See also Abraham; Isaac; Jacob.

patriarch [ecclesiastical], title for the highest-ranking bishop of an autonomous church or federation of local eparchies (dioceses), with effective jurisdiction over all its bishops. The title "patriarch" (Heb., nasi) originally referred to the spiritual head of the Jewish Diaspora in the Roman Empire, and was also employed by the heretical Montanists. After 429, when Emperor Theosodius II suppressed the Jewish patriarchate, the title was applied to the principal bishops of a region. In 451 the Byzantine emperor Justinian I determined the five chief patriarchal sees as Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, and in the East the title became restricted to those sees. In the six Eastern Catholic churches with a patriarchal structure (Armenian, Chaldean, Coptic, Maronite, Melkite, West Syrian) the patriarch is subordinate to the pope. The Ukrainian Catholic Church also claims a patriarchal structure, but this has not yet been recognized by Rome. See also patriarchate; pentarchy.

patriarchal basilica. See basilica, patriarchal.

patriarchate, an autonomous, self-governing federation of dioceses under the jurisdiction of a chief bishop, called "patriarch," and his synod. The five most ancient patriarchates of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem were considered to form a ruling "pentarchy." Later developments, like the schisms following the councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451), and the creation of national churches consequent upon the rise of new political entities from the sixteenth century on, led to the creation of numerous other Eastern and Oriental Orthodox patriarchates. Though the Catholic Church established nominal Latin patriarchates in the Middle Ages, the patriarchal system is basically an Eastern phenomenon. See also Latin patriarchates.

Patrick, St., ca. 390–ca. 461, bishop and apostle to Ireland. Born the son of a deacon and the grandson of a priest in England, he spent some years in slavery in Ireland after having been captured by border raiders. Returning to England (perhaps after spending time in Gaul), he was ordained to the priesthood and returned to Ireland to evangelize the country from his see in the north (Armagh), where he seems to have had a residence and a school. While not a monk himself, he strongly supported monasticism. We possess two authentic texts, both obscure and in bad Latin, from his own hand: a Confessio, an autobiographical apology, and the Letter to Coroticus, which protests British slave trading. The famous Lorica (Lat., "breastplate"), a work praising Christ attributed to Patrick, is probably his.

The traditional folk tales about Patrick (e.g., his using the shamrock to illustrate the concept of the Trinity, driving snakes from the island) are all pious elaborations of a later time. Feast day: March 17. See also Ireland, Catholicism in.

Patrick, known as the Apostle of the Irish, a fifth-century British missionary bishop who endured great hardships to plant the Catholic faith in Ireland and who remains the country's most popular saint and patron; sculptured stone, St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York.

Patrick's Cathedral, St. See Saint Patrick's Cathedral.

Patrimony of St. Peter, lands in Italy under direct papal rule until 1870, also known as the Papal States. In 754 Pepin the Short gave the land between Rome and Ravenna taken from the defeated Lombards to the papacy instead of returning it to its former rulers, the Byzantine emperors. Papal control over these lands was sporadic until Pope Julius II (1503–13) established Rome's authority in a series of military campaigns. Many of the states joined the new Italian kingdom in 1860, and the remainder were seized by Italy in 1870. See also Papal States.

Patripassianism (Lat., "the suffering of the Father"), the belief that, in Christ's suffering and death, God suffered and died. It derived from Monarchianism, which emphasized unity in the Godhead. Patripassianism regarded the Son as merely a different mode of God and not a Person distinct from the Father. Thus, the Son's death meant God's death. This view was espoused by Praxaes (d. ca. 200), a theologian who was denounced by Tertullian. The trinitarian doctrine of the Second Council of Nicaea (787) excludes Patripassianism from Christian faith. See also Monarchianism.

patristics, a designation dating from the seventeenth century for the branch of theology dealing with the thought and culture of the Fathers (Lat., patres) of the Church, generally in the West up to Gregory I (d. 604) and in the East up to John of Damascus (d. 749). See also Fathers of the Church.

1. OCCUPATIONS AND GROUPS

accountants	Matthew actors	Genesius
advertisers	Bernardino of Siena altar boys	John Berchmans
anesthetists	René Goupil
architects	Thomas the Apostle
artists	Luke Catherine of Bologna Bl. Angelico astronomers	Dominic athletes	Sebastian
authors	Francis de Sales
aviators	Our Lady of Loreto Thérèse of Lisieux Joseph of Cupertino bakers	Elizabeth of Hungary Nicholas bankers	Matthew barbers	Cosmas and Damian Louis
blacksmiths	Dunstan
bookbinders	Celestine V
bookkeepers	Matthew booksellers	John of God
Boy Scouts	George
brewers	Augustine of Hippo Luke Nicholas of Myra bricklayers	Stephen brides	Nicholas of Myra builders	Vincent Ferrer
butchers	Anthony of Egypt Luke cabdrivers	Fiacre
cabinetmakers	Anne
canonists	Raymond of Peñafort
carpenters	Joseph
catechists	Viator Charles Borromeo Robert Bellarmine children	Nicholas of Myra clerics	Gabriel of the Sorrowful Mother
communications personnel	Bernardino of Siena
confessors	Alphonsus Liguori John Nepomucen
cooks	Lawrence Martha
coppersmiths	Maurus
dairy workers	Brigid of Ireland
dentists	Apollonia
dietitians, hospital	Martha ecologists	Francis of Assisi
editors	John Bosco
engineers	Ferdinand III
farmers	George Isidore
firefighters	Florian
First Communicants	Tarcisius
fishermen	Andrew
florists	Thérèse of Lisieux
funeral directors	Joseph of Arimathea Dismas gardeners	Adalhard Trypho Fiacre Phocas of Sinope glassworkers	Luke
goldsmiths	Dunstan Anastasius
gravediggers	Anthony of Egypt grocers	Michael hairdressers	Martin de Porres homemakers	Anne hospital administrators	Basil the Great Frances Xavier Cabrini
hunters	Hubert Eustachius immigrants	Frances Xavier Cabrini
innkeepers	Amand Martha jewelers	Eligius Dunstan journalists	Francis de Sales
jurists	John Capistrano
laborers	Isidore James John Bosco

lawyers	Ivo Genesius Thomas More librarians	Jerome
locksmiths	Dunstan maids	Zita
marbleworkers	Clement I
mariners	Michael Nicholas of Tolentino medical technicians	Albertus Magnus messengers	Gabriel
metalworkers	Eligius
military chaplains	John Capistrano mothers	Monica Gerard Majella
motorcyclists	Our Lady of Grace
motorists	Christopher Frances of Rome
mountaineers	Bernard of Montjoux musicians	Gregory the Great Cecilia Dunstan
notaries	Luke Mark
nurses	Camillus of Lellis John of God Agatha Raphael nursing and nursing services	Elizabeth of Hungary Catherine of Siena orators	John Chrysostom painters	Luke paratroopers	Michael pawnbrokers	Nicholas
pharmacists	Cosmas and Damian James the Greater philosophers	Justin physicians	Pantaleon Cosmas and Damian Luke Raphael pilgrims	James the Greater plasterers	Bartholomew poets	David Cecilia police officers	Michael porters	Christopher postal employees	Gabriel preachers	John Chrysostom priests	Jean-Baptiste Vianney (Curé d'Ars)
printers	John of God Augustine of Hippo Genesius prisoners	Dismas Joseph Cafasso public relations	Bernardino of Siena radiologists	Michael radio workers	Gabriel sailors	Cuthbert Brendan Eulalia Christopher Peter Gonzales Erasmus Nicholas Elmo scholars	Brigid of Ireland Bede Jerome
scientists	Albertus Magnus
sculptors	Four Crowned Martyrs
secretaries	Genesius
seminarians	Charles Borromeo servants	Martha Zita
shoemakers	Crispin and Crispinian
silversmiths	Andronicus singers	Gregory I "the Great" Cecilia skaters	Lydwina
skiers	Bernard of Montjoux
social workers	Louise de Marillac soldiers	George Ignatius of Loyola Sebastian Martin of Tours Joan of Arc speleologists	Benedict
stenographers	Genesius Cassian
stonecutters	Clement I
stonemasons	Stephen
students	Thomas Aquinas surgeons	Cosmas and Damian Luke tailors	Homobonus tax collectors	Matthew

teachers	Gregory the Great Jean-Baptiste de La Salle telecommunications workers	Gabriel television workers	Gabriel theologians	Augustine Alphonsus Liguori
travelers	Anthony of Padua Nicholas of Myra Christopher Raphael watchmen	Peter of Alcantara widows	Paula
wine merchants	Amand workers	Joseph writers	Francis de Sales
yachtsmen	Adjutor
young boys	Dominic Savio
young girls	Agnes
youth	Aloysius Gonzaga John Berchmans Gabriel of the Sorrowful Mother

2. SPECIAL CATEGORIES

animals	Francis of Assisi
art	Catherine of Bologna charitable societies	Vincent de Paul Church	Joseph
crops, protector of	Ansovinus
Eucharistic congresses and societies	Paschal Baylon expectant mothers	Raymond Nonnatus Gerard Majella
greetings	Valentine hospitals	Camillus of Lellis John of God Jude missions, foreign	Francis Xavier Thérèse of Lisieux missions, parish	Leonard Casanova retreats	Ignatius of Loyola schools, Catholic	Thomas Aquinas Joseph Calasanz television	Clare of Assisi universities	Bl. Contardo Ferrini
vocations	Alphonsus Liguori

3. SPECIAL NEEDS

barren women	Anthony of Padua Felicity beggars	Martin of Tours
blind	Odilia Raphael blood banks	Januarius
bodily ills	Our Lady of Lourdes cancer patients	Peregrine of Auxerre convulsive children	Scholastica
deaf	Francis de Sales
desperate situations	Jude Rita of Cascia dog bites	Vitus
epilepsy	Vitus Willibrord eye diseases	Lucy
falsely accused	Raymond Nonnatus
headache sufferers	Teresa of Ávila heart patients	John of God
invalids	Roch
learning	Ambrose mentally ill	Dymphna
orphans	Jerome Emiliani
poor	Lawrence Anthony of Padua Giles
possessed	Bruno Denis rheumatism	James the Greater searchers of lost articles	Anthony of Padua sick	Michael John of God Camillus of Lellis snake bites	Vitus
throat ailments	Blaise
women in labor	Anne

4. COUNTRIES AND REGIONS

Americas	Our Lady of Guadalupe
	Rose of Lima
Angola	Immaculate Heart of Mary
Argentina	Our Lady of Lujan
Armenia	Gregory the Illuminator
Australia	Our Lady Help of Christians
Belgium	Joseph
Bolivia	Our Lady of Copacabana ("Virgen de la Candelaria")
Brazil	Nossa Senhora de Aparecida
	Immaculate Conception
	Peter of Alcantara
Canada	Joseph
	Anne
Chile	James the Greater
	Our Lady of Mount Carmel
China	Joseph
Colombia	Peter Claver
	Louis Bertrand
Cuba	Our Lady of Charity
Cyprus	Barnabas
Czech Republic	Wenceslas
	John Nepomucen
	Procopius
Denmark	Ansgar
	Canute
Dominican Republic	Our Lady of High Grace
	Dominic
East Indies	Thomas the Apostle
Ecuador	Sacred Heart
El Salvador	Our Lady of Peace
England	George
Ethiopia	Frumentius
Europe	Benedict
	Cyril and Methodius (co-patrons)
Finland	Henry
France	Our Lady of the Assumption
	Joan of Arc
	Thérèse of Lisieux
Germany	Boniface
	Michael Greece	Nicholas
	Andrew
Hungary	Blessed Virgin ("Great Lady of Hungary")
	Stephen of Hungary
Iceland	Thorlac
India	Our Lady of the Assumption
Ireland	Patrick
	Brigid and Columba
Italy	Francis of Assisi
	Catherine of Siena
Japan	Peter Baptist
Korea	Joseph and Mary Mother of the Church
Lithuania	Casimir
	Cunegund
	John Cantius
Luxembourg	Willibrord
Malta	Paul
	Our Lady of the Assumption
Mexico	Our Lady of Guadalupe
Monaco	Devota
Netherlands	Willibrord
New Zealand	Our Lady Help of Christians
Norway	Olaf
Papua New Guinea	Michael the Archangel
Paraguay	Our Lady of the Assumption
Peru	Joseph
Philippines	Sacred Heart of Mary
Poland	Casimir
	Cunegund
	Stanislaus Kostka
	Stanislaus of Cracow
	Our Lady of Czestochowa Florian
Portugal	Immaculate Conception
	Francis Borgia
	Anthony of Padua
	Vincent of Saragossa
	George
Russia	Andrew
	Nicholas of Myra
	Thérèse of Lisieux
Scandinavia	Ansgar
Scotland	Andrew
	Columba

Slovakia	Our Lady of Sorrows
South America	Rose of Lima
Solomon Islands	Most Holy Name of Mary
Spain	James the Greater
	Teresa of Ávila
Sri Lanka	Lawrence
Sweden	Bridget
	Eric
Switzerland	Gall
Tanzania	Immaculate Conception
United States	Immaculate Conception
Uruguay	Blessed Virgin Mary ("La Virgen de los Treinte y Tres")
Venezuela	Our Lady of Coromoto
Wales	David
West Indies	Gertrude

patron saint, a saint venerated as a special protector or intercessor. Individual persons, occupations, churches, dioceses, countries, or particular problems may be under the protection of patron saints. A person's patron saint is the saint whose name is received at Baptism. The patron saint of the United States, for example, is Mary, under the title Immaculate Conception.

Saints usually become patrons of countries, professions, and special needs through popular devotion and custom rather than by any official designation. They may be closely associated with the history of a country, or have been engaged in some form of work associated with a particular profession, or have performed certain ministries or healings related to special needs. Sometimes, however, the connection is difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain. See also saints.

Paul I, St., d. 767, pope from 757 to 767, brother to Stephen II (III; d. 757), who received the Papal States from the Frankish king Pepin. Paul's diplomacy ensured their preservation. He assailed the iconoclasm of Emperor Constantine V, restored Roman churches, and translated many relics of saints from the catacombs to churches. Feast day: June 28. See also Papal States.

Paul III [Alessandro Farnese], 1468–1549, Counter-Reformation pope from 1534 to 1549. He was educated in Florence and was a friend of Medici pope Leo X. Alexander VI named him a cardinal (1493), but Farnese postponed ordination until 1519. He indulged in Renaissance Rome's lax morality and nepotism, but upon becoming pope, he also embarked decisively upon Church reform, calling unsuccessfully for a general council (1535, 1538). Paul finally convened the Council of Trent in 1545, suspending it in 1549 after noteworthy but incomplete reforms. He also endorsed reforming religious orders, notably the Jesuits (1540), and commissioned Michelangelo to paint the Last Judgment and to supervise the work on the new St. Peter's Basilica. In 1538 he excommunicated Henry VIII and placed England under interdict. See also Trent, Council of.

Paul IV [Gian Pietro Carafa], 1476–1559, Counter-Reformation pope from 1555 to 1559. He came to the Roman Curia from the Neapolitan nobility through his uncle Oliviero's influence. He participated in the Oratory of Divine Love (1520–27), was a model bishop of Chiete (where he founded the Theatines), and reorganized the Roman Inquisition against Italian Protestants (1542). As pope, he refused to reconvene the suspended Council of Trent, believing that he could carry on the necessary reforms on his own initiative more effectively and more quickly. Although he enforced some needed reforms, such as insisting that bishops live in their dioceses and monks in their monasteries, his approach was often harsh and severe. In 1559 he intensified censorship and his own unpopularity through the Roman Index Librorum Prohibitorum (Lat., "Index of Forbidden Books"). He also allowed the Inquisition to harm many innocent people, such as Cardinal Giovanni Morone (d. 1580), who was wrongly imprisoned for heresy. And it was also Paul IV who confined Roman Jews to a ghetto on the suspicion that they were somehow aiding Protestants. See also Index of Forbidden Books; Inquisition; Theatines.

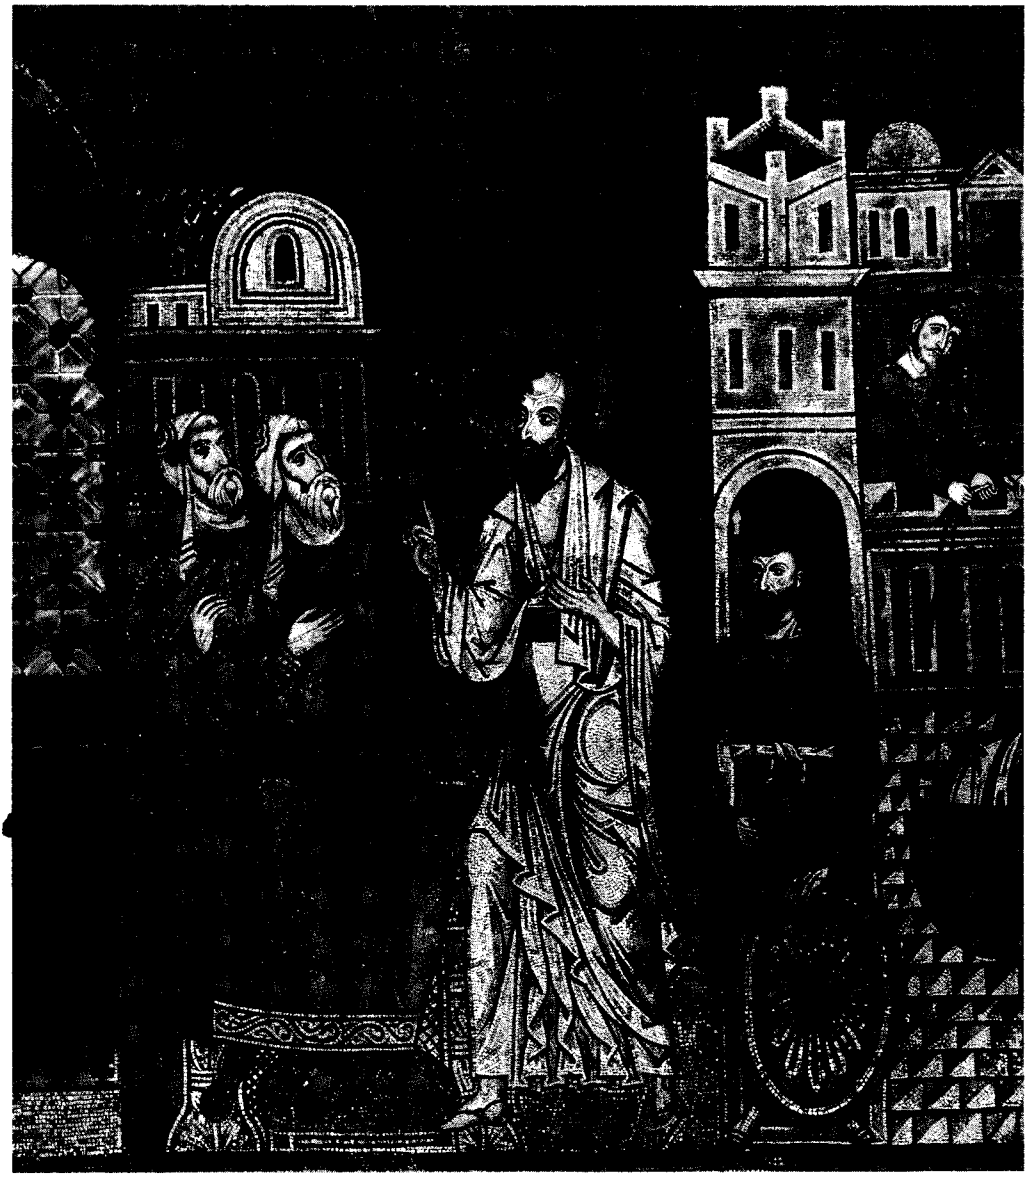
ST. PAUL

St. Paul was the prominent early Christian missionary and "apostle to the Gentiles." Paul, whose Jewish name was Saul, was born in Tarsus in Asia Minor of a Hellenistic-Jewish family probably between A.D. 1 and 5. He received both Greek and Jewish education and probably possessed Roman citizenship. Paul described himself as a Pharisee (Phil 3:5) and received some of his Jewish education in Jerusalem beginning around A.D. 30. Shortly afterward he "persecuted" the early believers in Jesus because of his zealousness as a Pharisee (Gal 1:13–14; 1 Cor 15:9). Contrary to Acts 9:1–2, this probably involved only subjecting them to the normal punishments of the synagogue, including flogging and exclusion from the Jewish community, rather than either imprisonment or capital punishment. About A.D. 35, on the way to Damascus, Paul experienced what he described as a revelation by God of the risen Jesus (Gal 1:15–16). Paul interpreted this experience as a call to preach the risen Jesus to the Gentiles. After spending three years in the area around Damascus (A.D. 35–38), Paul spent the next ten years (A.D. 38–48, his first missionary journey) preaching in Syria and Asia Minor. In 48 he was part of a delegation sent from Antioch to Jerusalem to discuss with the leaders of the Jerusalem community the status of gentile believers (Gal 2:1–10; Acts 15:1–35). The two groups finally agreed that gentile Christians did not have to be circumcised or observe Mosaic law but that Jewish Christians would continue to do both. Paul spent the next eight years establishing Christian communities around the eastern Mediterranean. The center of operations for his second missionary journey (A.D. 49–52) was Corinth in Greece; the center for the third missionary journey (53–57) was Ephesus in Asia Minor. While Jewish members were prominent in these Christian communities, the majority were of gentile origin. During these journeys (especially the third), he wrote the letters that form part of the NT. In A.D. 57 he returned to Jerusalem, where he was arrested and imprisoned for two years. In 59, exercising his prerogative as a Roman citizen to appeal his case to Caesar, he was sent by the procurator, Porcius Festus, to Rome (59–60) and was held there under house arrest for approximately two years. Between A.D. 62 and 67 he was executed in Rome by the Roman authorities.

St. Paul, the greatest missionary in the history of the Church; painting by Masaccio, Civic Museum, Pisa, Italy.

WRITINGS

Paul made extensive use of letters to maintain contact with and direct the communities he had established. Of the thirteen Letters attributed to Paul in the NT, seven are generally agreed on as written by Paul: 1 Thessalonians, Galatians, 1–2 Corinthians, Philippians, Philemon, and Romans. The Letters were written between A.D. 51 and 57. 1 Thessalonians was written in 51 from Corinth on Paul's second missionary journey; its purpose was to assure the Thessalonian Christians that those of their number who had already died would not be at a disadvantage at Jesus' coming in power. The other Letters were written during Paul's third



Paul, newly converted to Christ after he himself had persecuted Christians, disputes with the Jews of Damascus about the Christian claim that Jesus is the Messiah (Acts 9:19–22); when the Jews plot to kill him, his disciples take him by night and "let him down through an opening in the wall, lowering him in a basket" (9:25); mosaic in the Palatine Chapel, Palermo, Italy.

missionary journey. Galatians (A.D. 53–54) was written from Ephesus to oppose the preaching of Jewish-Christian missionaries who claimed that Christians were obliged not only to believe in Jesus but also to be circumcised and observe at least part of Mosaic law. 1–2 Corinthians (A.D. 54–56), written partly from Ephesus and partly from Macedonia, reflect the complex and rocky relationship between Paul and the Corinthian Christians over a number of issues, including the Corinthians' interpretation of their Christian beliefs on the analogy of Greek mystery cults (1 Corinthians) and their fascination with mystically oriented Hellenistic-Jewish interpretations of the Scriptures (2 Corinthians, which combines several letters). Philippians (A.D. 55–56), also a composite, again deals with the problem of Christians and the observance of Mosaic law. Philemon, written during the same period, deals with the problem of the runaway slave Onesimus. Paul's last extant Letter is to the Romans, written from Corinth in 57. In it Paul assures the Roman Christian community that his controversial views about the observance of Mosaic law were ultimately in accord with the Jewish Scriptures and tradition.

Twelfth-century mosaic depicting four scenes from the life of Paul: his baptism, his preaching, his escape from the city of Damascus by being dropped over the wall in a basket (Acts 9:25), and his handing over of his letters to Timothy and another disciple.

THEOLOGY

Although Paul was controversial both during his lifetime and subsequently, many of his basic convictions were traditional, rooted in Judaism and early Christianity. Two of his basic convictions were belief in Jewish monotheism and belief in the revelation of God in the Jewish Scriptures. Hence Paul always thought of himself as a Jew, both ethnically and religiously. From Christian tradition and his own experience on the road to Damascus came his conviction about the centrality of Christ, especially of his death and Resurrection. Also characteristic of Paul is his conviction, rooted in his experience of the risen Jesus, about the relationship between Jews and Gentiles and the status of Mosaic law. For Paul there was "in Christ" no longer any distinction between Jews and Gentiles (Gal 3:28; Rom 3:22); all are saved through faith in Christ rather than through the observance of Mosaic law (Rom 3:21–30). Through faith in Christ there is no longer any need for either Jewish or gentile Christians to observe Mosaic law as such. Although there is some dispute, Paul seems to have included in this both the ritual and the ethical sections of the law. Christian conduct was now to be guided by the presence of the Spirit, by faith working through love, and by Christians becoming servants of one another (Gal 5–6). Paul also had a belief, based on but expanded from early Christian eschatology, that in the consummation of the world all things would be subjected to Christ and to God. For Paul this included the Jewish people (Rom 9–11). Although the precise manner of this inclusion remains uncertain, it is clear that Paul could not imagine a consummation of the world in which the Jewish people were not included. Paul's reputation in the second and third centuries remained controversial, especially for Jewish Christians. Interpretations of Paul's Letters were central to the thought of Augustine, Aquinas, Luther, and Calvin. Feast days: January 29 (Conversion) and June 29 (Peter and Paul).

Bibliography

Bultmann, Rudolf. The Theology of the New Testament. 2 vols. New York: Scribner, 1952–55. 1.185–352.

Fitzmyer, Joseph A. Paul and His Theology: A Brief Sketch. 2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1989.

Meeks, Wayne. The First Urban Christians: The Social World of the Apostle Paul. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1983.

Sanders, E. P. Paul and Palestinian Judaism. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1977.

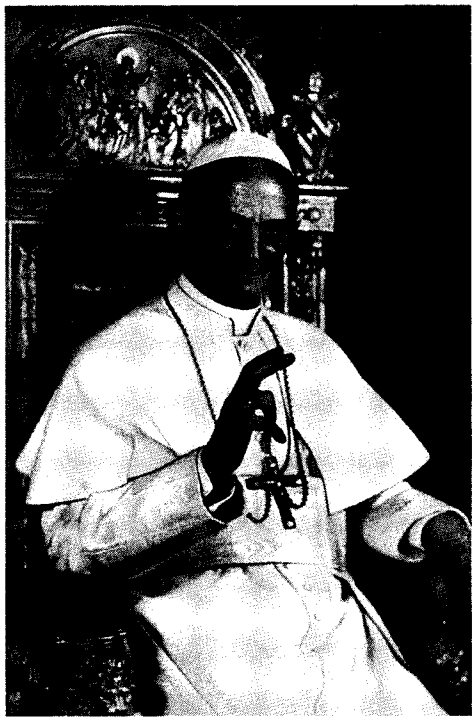
Segal, Alan E. Paul the Convert: The Apostolate and Apostasy of Saul the Pharisee. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1990.

THOMAS H. TOBIN

Paul V [Camillo Borghese], 1552–1621, Counter-Reformation pope, from 1605 to 1621. Important for completing work on St. Peter's Basilica, for rebuilding the aqueduct of Trajan in Rome, and for enforcing the reforms of the Council of Trent, he placed Venice under interdict for rejecting papal claims to temporal power and for trying clerics in secular courts (1606–7). Although he published a revised Roman Ritual, tightened discipline in religious orders, and approved the use of the vernacular in the Chinese liturgy, he was also infamous for having censured Galileo (1616) and placing Copernicus's treatise on the movement of the earth around the sun on the Index of Forbidden Books. See also Galileo.

Paul VI [Giovanni Battista Montini], 1897–1978, pope from 1963 to 1978, who guided the Church during its difficult post–Vatican II transition. He was prepared for the papal office by working intimately with popes Pius XI (d. 1939) and Pius XII (d. 1958). He assisted then-Cardinal Pacelli (later Pius XII) in the Secretariat of State, became prosecretary in 1952, and archbishop of Milan in 1954. A liberal in liturgy, ecumenism, and social questions, he had long advocated the "internationalization" of the Curia. But he had not expected the council called by his friend Pope John XXIII and thought at first that it would stir up "a hornet's nest of problems." His spiritual adviser told him to relax in the Holy Spirit.

Pope Paul VI, whose task it was to carry forward the work of the Second Vatican Council following Pope John XXIII's death and then to guide the implementation of its reforms in the face of misunderstanding and opposition from conservatives and progressives alike.



So Paul VI—his name was chosen to express the adventurous, outgoing spirit of Paul the missionary to the Gentiles—had to conclude a council that he would not himself have called. He had already helped rescue the first session from chaos by providing it with an architecture that he realized in his pontificate. He had to be won over to collegiality, reassured that it did not undermine the primacy. But once convinced, he loyally accepted the council's authority.

His hesitations on documents concerning religious liberty, ecumenism, and the Jews were all motivated by his desire to ensure that the defeated minority was not simply crushed. He wanted them to be convaincus, pas vaincus (Fr., "convinced, not vanquished"). Sometimes he made too many concessions to achieve this end, notably with the nota praevia (Lat., "prefatory note," which really served as an appendix) on collegiality, which tried to dilute the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church's emphasis on episcopal authority at the alleged expense of the pope's.

Papal Journeys: Paul influenced the council by his journeys, infrequent and well thought out. He went first to the Holy Land, from which St. Peter came, and there embraced the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople, Athenagoras (d. 1972). This "return to the sources" had great ecumenical potential. With the assistance of Father Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of the University of Notre Dame, Paul established Tantur in Israel, an ecumenical project to reflect on salvation history in an atmosphere of study and prayer. His second visit was to India, a land of ancient religious traditions that welcomed him as a holy man. Then he went to the United Nations in New York on the feast of St. Francis, 1965, met the whole world in miniature and proclaimed, "Never again war!" In 1966 he longed to go to Poland for the millennium celebrations, but the Polish government denied his request.

Apart from their intrinsic significance, these journeys spoke of the Church's relations with non-

Christian religions and with nonbelievers—the outer circles he had spoken of in his first programmatic encyclical, Ecclesiam Suam (1964). Paul set up secretariats to deal with both of these matters. They joined the Secretariat for Christian Unity and the Justice and Peace Commission to form the "new Curia," which was contrasted with the old in its readiness to listen and the fact that it had corresponding local bodies. It proved more difficult to renew the habits of the old Curia, but by shrewd appointments Paul tried to make it more responsive. He was greatly aided from 1969 by Cardinal Giovanni Benelli, the human dynamo who was sostituto (Ital., "substitute" [secretary of state]). Benelli's power grew when Paul appointed that same year a French secretary of state, Cardinal Jean Villot.

Paul's most important innovation was to found the Synod of Bishops as an instrument of collegial consultation. Elected representatives of the episcopal conferences were to offer "advice and information" to the pope. In 1971 the synod dealt with justice in the world (and produced a fine text) and the ministerial priesthood (at which a proposal for the ordination of married men was narrowly defeated). Though the 1974 synod on evangelization ended in confusion, it provided Paul with the raw material for his finest apostolic exhortation, Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975). The 1977 synod on catechesis came too late for him to do more than accept it.

The Pope and Controversy: Little collegial consultation, however, took place before his famous encyclical on birth control, Humanae Vitae (1968). The withdrawal of contraception from the competence of the council had been justified on the grounds that a pontifical commission existed to deal with it. However, the advice of the commission was then set aside, so that Humanae Vitae looked like a solo exercise of the primacy. The Extraordinary Synod of 1969 dealt with the aftermath of reconciling primacy and collegiality. Humanae Vitae was never presented as irreversible, still less infallible, and Paul resisted attempts to make it the be-all and end-all of his pontificate. Insofar as it posits a permanent element in human sexuality and insists on the equal importance of the unitive and procreative aspect of human sexuality, it contained a valuable insight.

Clerical celibacy was the other topic withdrawn from the council's competence. This was harder to justify. Paul's encyclical Sacerdotalis Caelibatus (1967) showed the fittingness of celibacy, but could do no more, given the existence of married priests in the Eastern Catholic churches. Besides, by restoring the permanent diaconate, Paul ensured that there would be married clerics in the Church. In his apostolic letter Ministeria Quaedam (1972) we hear for the first time of "lay ministries," and episcopal conferences were invited to be "creative." Though the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith's Inter Insignores (1976) said no to women's ordination, it was not presented as a definitive statement for all time.

In the Third World Paul's most important encyclical was Populorum Progressio (1967), which spoke of "development as the new name for peace." It also cautiously stated the conditions under which there might be a "just revolution." Right-wing papers dismissed it as "souped-up Marxism." Even more acceptable to the liberation theologians of Latin America was Octogesima Adveniens (1971), which finessed on "socialisms" and admitted that such was the complexity of the modern world that no universal teaching could be provided. The task of "discerning the signs of the times" fell to the local churches.

Paul believed that relations with the Orthodox were crucial, for this was the original schism. His relations with the ecumenical patriarch were good. The excommunication of 1054 was lifted. Koinonia (Gk., "communion") was made the basis for theological unity. The brother patriarchs exchanged the kiss of peace in Rome and Constantinople, thus indicating that they belonged to "sister churches." The same language was used of the Anglican communion. Paul received two archbishops of Canterbury, Dr. Michael Ramsey (1966) and Dr. Donald Coggan (1977), by which time the Anglican/Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) had revealed "convergences that were as happy as they were unexpected," as the common statement read.

Paul died on the feast of the Transfiguration, August 6, 1978. Though much criticized, even ridiculed, in his lifetime, nostalgia for his pontificate has increased notably in the years since his death. See also Ecclesiam Suam; Evangelii Nuntiandi; Humanae Vitae; Octogesima Adveniens; Populorum Progressio; Vatican Council II.

Bibliography

Hebblethwaite, Peter. Paul VI: The First Modern Pope. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

PETER HEBBLETHWAITE

Paula, St., 347–404, ascetic. A married Roman noblewoman under Jerome's guidance, she devoted herself to a life of charity and penance and founded a convent and monastery in Bethlehem. She is the patron saint of widows. Feast day: January 26.

Paul and Thecla, Acts of, second-century apocryphal work describing, in the style of Hellenistic romance, the miraculous missionary adventures of Paul, not always appearing to advantage, and Thecla of Iconium, a convert and companion of Paul whom Paul commissioned to teach and to baptize. According to tradition she established a ministry in Seleucia of Isauria, where she taught, cared for the poor, and healed the sick. While Tertullian (d. ca. 225) denied that her example provided warrant for baptisms by women, fourth-century evidence shows her faith and ascetic virtue commended by both women and men, and her name was often taken by vowed virgins including Macrina (d. 379), older sister of Basil the Great and Gregory of Nyssa. Thecla's feast day was celebrated in the East on September 24 and in the West on September 23, but her name was dropped from the calendar of saints at the time of Vatican Council II (1962–65).

Paul Chong Hasang, St. (pawl chong hah-sahng'), d. 1846, Korean seminarian and martyr. The Korean martyrs were collectively canonized in 1984 by Pope Paul II. Feast day: September 20.

Pauline privilege. See Privilege of the Faith.

Paulinus of Nola, St., ca. 355–431, bishop of Nola (409–31). From a family of noblest rank, Paulinus was baptized (389), withdrew from public office, and with his wife, Teresia, gave away an immense fortune, retiring to the shrine of St. Felix at Nola where they founded an ascetic community. Many of Paulinus's poems and letters survive. Feast day: June 22.

Paulists, formally known as the Missionary Society of St. Paul the Apostle (C.S.P.), an order founded by Isaac Thomas Hecker (d. 1888) dedicated to serving English-speaking Catholics and winning American converts to the Catholic Church. Hecker, an American convert, evangelist, and Redemptorist priest, visited Rome to seek permission to expand the work of parish missions among English-speaking Catholics in the United States. The Redemptorists were strongly identified with work among German-Americans. Dismissed from the Redemptorists for coming to Rome without permission, Hecker appealed to the pope and, together with four Redemptorist associates, won permission to establish a new religious order. The original Paulist band included Augustine F. Hewit, Francis Baker, and George Deshon. They made solemn promises rather than vows and emphasized individual initiative and flexibility in the apostolate. Their rule was given final approval by the Holy See in 1940.

Under Hecker's leadership, they established St. Paul the Apostle Parish in New York City, offered missions in English-speaking parishes, and initiated efforts to attract non-Catholics by means of lectures, a magazine (The Catholic World), and a publishing house, later known as the Paulist Press. Always a small community, the Paulists continued this combination of internal and external evangelization, the former through their own parishes, parish missions, and ministry on non-Catholic university campuses in the United States and Canada. They achieved recognition for innovative missionary work among non-Catholics through publications, urban information centers, home missions, and use of the mass media. See also Hecker, Isaac Thomas.

DAVID O'BRIEN

Paulists, Melkite, a men's missionary society of the Melkite Catholic Church founded in Lebanon in 1903 by Bishop Germanos Mouaccad to preach retreats and missions, work for the "return" of the Orthodox to Rome, staff schools, and maintain a Catholic publishing house. Since Vatican II (1962–65) the society has worked to strengthen both the Orthodox and Melkite Catholic churches. See also Melkite Catholic Church.

Paul Miki, St., d. 1597, Jesuit brother and martyr. One of twenty-six martyrs for the faith who were crucified in Nagasaki and canonized in 1862. Feast day: February 5.

Paul of Samosata, third century, bishop of Antioch from ca. 260 to 268, when he was deposed. Paul taught an Adoptionist Monarchianism, advocating a consubstantiality between Father and Logos (perhaps even using the Gk. homoousios) that conceded no independence whatsoever to the Logos, which he conceived as God's governing power. Because it indwelt Jesus, he became God's "Son." There is no preexistent "Son." Jesus differs from the prophets and saints only in the degree of indwelling. See also Monarchianism.

Paul of Thebes, St., also known as Paul the Hermit, d. ca. 340, an early Christian hermit. Jerome provides all that is known about Paul, namely, that he lived a hermit's life until he was 113 and that Anthony of Egypt buried him in a cloak owned by Athanasius. Feast day: January 15.

Paul of the Cross, St., 1694–1775, founder of the Passionists. Born in Italy as Paul Francis Danei, he is said to have had a vision of Our Lady in a black habit with the name Jesus and a cross in white on the chest. She told him to found a religious order devoted to the preaching of the Passion of Christ. Paul himself became one of the most celebrated preachers of his time. He also founded an institute of Passionist nuns. Feast day: October 19. See also Passionists.

Paul the Deacon, ca. 720–ca. 799, Carolingian monk and scholar. A Lombard nobleman educated at Pavia, Paul entered the monastery of Monte Cassino when Charlemagne conquered Lombardy (774), later (ca. 782–84) visiting Charlemagne's court. Among other works, he wrote a History of the Lombards and compiled a Homiliary based upon patristic sources. See also Charlemagne; Monte Cassino.

Pax Christi USA, an affiliate of the Catholic European peace organization, Pax Christi International. In 1972 Pax Christi USA grew out of the American Pax Association. Pax Christi USA's primary orientation is gospel-inspired nonviolence; the organization is committed to making the Church an instrument of peacemaking. Two bishops, Carroll T. Dozier (d. 1985) of Memphis and Thomas J. Gumbleton of Detroit, agreed to act as its first episcopal moderators.

The organization publishes a quarterly magazine, organizes an annual national assembly, publishes and disseminates informational literature, and encourages local and regional development with peace groups and parishes. In 1992 the organization had over eleven thousand members, ninety-two of whom were bishops. See also pacifism.

Payne, St. John, d. 1582, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Ordained at Douai in 1576 and sent to Essex, he was arrested in 1581 and executed in 1582. Feast day: April 20. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Pazzi, St. Mary Magdalen Dei, 1566–1607, virgin and nun. Spurning an arranged marriage, she entered a Carmelite convent against her parents' wishes. She fasted on bread and water except on Sundays and holy days and cured many sick people. Her body lies in the church attached to the Carmelite convent in Florence. She was canonized in 1669. Feast day: May 25.

peace, a state of ordered tranquility. In the Catholic tradition, peace is not merely the absence of overt conflict, but the result of right relationships with God and neighbor. This is evident in three key sources for reflection on peace: Scripture, the writings of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), and Catholic social teaching.

In the OT the term for peace is shalom (Heb.), which is best understood as the spiritual and material well-being of both persons individually and the community as a whole that results from fidelity to the covenant with God. The covenant, and thus peace itself, is initially a gift from God. The close link between peace and the covenantal relationship with God is evident in Isa 54:10: "My covenant of peace shall not be removed." The gift of the covenant is to the community as a whole, and includes, therefore, right relationship with the neighbor. In the NT, Jesus Christ becomes the means of this peace. He offers peace (John 14:27) and, ultimately, is this peace (Eph 2:14).

In the work of Thomas Aquinas, peace is tranquility both within and between persons. Within the individual, it is the harmony of the desires when the soul is directed by charity to its true good, that is, God. Full peace is not attainable in this lifetime, but a partial peace is possible when the will and the intellect control and guide the desires. Charity prompts peace to extend beyond the person when it directs her to love her neighbor as herself. This leads the person to desire to fulfill the neighbor's will as if it were her own. Justice, motivated by charity, regulates the external relations between persons and thus describes the order of peace.

Catholic social teaching since Pope Leo XIII (d. 1903) continues to understand peace as the fruit of a right relationship grounded in justice and directed by charity. Because justice concerns the external ordering of charity, the social teaching often makes an explicit link between justice and peace. Pope Pius XII's (d. 1958) motto was Opus iustitiae pax (Lat., "Peace is the work of justice"). Pope John XXIII (d. 1963) picks up this concern for the relationship between peace and justice, particularly in Pacem in Terris (1963), where a social order based on truth, justice, charity, and freedom is the source of peace. Pope Paul VI (d. 1978) argues in Populorum Progressio (1967) that economic inequality leads to violence and that a just economic development of poorer peoples is "the new name for peace." Pope John Paul II sums up the idea of right relationship with neighbor under the term "solidarity" and writes, "Opus solidaritatis pax" ("Peace is the work of solidarity").

In the event of an outbreak of war, Catholic teaching recognizes two legitimate responses. The first is that of the just-war tradition, which holds that for the sake of justice it is sometimes legitimate to use carefully circumscribed lethal armed force. The second is pacifism, which holds that it is never legitimate to take human life. Both pacifist and just-war traditions seek peace, but they diverge on the question of the appropriate means. See also Catholic social teachings; Pacem in Terris; pacifism; peace movement, Catholic. TODD D. WHITMORE peace movement, Catholic, organizations and initiatives devoted to peace and nonviolence. In 1927 John A. Ryan founded the first Catholic peace organization in American history and called it the Catholic Association for International Peace (CAIP). Prior to World War II it had grown in size to five hundred members. When the United States entered World War II, the organization sanctioned the actions of the government and declared that the nation was engaged in a just war. After the war, the CAIP declined in significance.

The first Catholic group in the United States to identify with the American peace movement and to challenge the just-war doctrine was the Catholic Worker, when its cofounder, Dorothy Day (d. 1980), first proclaimed Catholic pacifism during the Spanish Civil War and maintained this position through all subsequent wars. Dorothy Day and the Catholic Worker supported the 223 Catholic conscientious objectors during World War II.

After World War II, the Catholic Worker added nonviolence to its Catholic pacifist position and in the 1960s fostered the growth of Catholic peace groups. In 1962 the American Pax Association (PAX) was founded. Its aim was to have the Catholic Church in the United States recognize conscientious objection. In 1964 the Catholic Peace Fellowship (CPF), an affiliate of the interfaith Fellowship of Reconciliation, was formed to provide draft counseling and oppose the war in Vietnam. When Daniel and Phillip Berrigan, priests and brothers, left CPF to perform the draft board action at Catonsville, Maryland, Catholics emerged at the forefront of the American peace movement.

In November 1968, the U.S. Catholic hierarchy in the pastoral letter "Human Life in Our Day" declared that Catholic teaching supported conscientious objectors and selective conscientious objectors. By 1969, 2,494 Catholics had received conscientious objector status, representing the single largest percentage of all American religious bodies. Finally, in November 1971 the bishops condemned the war in Vietnam as unjust. It was the first time in history that a Catholic hierarchy had condemned its own nation's war effort.

The organization of Pax Christi USA in 1972 was one of the most important developments in the post-Vietnam phase of the Catholic peace movement. Its aim was to make the Catholic Church an instrument of peacemaking. In their 1983 pastoral letter "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and Our Response," the U.S. bishops for the first time condemned nuclear warfare and indicated that pacifism and nonviolence are as valid a position to hold in response to war as the just-war doctrine, specifically, that pacifism and the just-war doctrine "support and complement one another, each preserving the other from distortion" (n. 121). See also Catholic Worker movement; Day, Dorothy M.; just-war doctrine; pacifism; Pax Christi USA. PATRICIA MCNEAL

Peace of Westphalia, treaty ending the Thirty Years' War (1618–48). Westphalia reconfirmed the religious articles of the Peace of Augsburg (1555), including the cuius regio, eius religio principle (Lat., "whose region, his religion"), but extended legal recognition to the Calvinists and gave individuals greater freedom of worship and belief. The papacy condemned the treaty, but it remained in effect until 1806. See also Cuius regio, eius religio.

Peasants' Revolt, or Peasants' War (1524–25), a rebellion in Germany against the Catholic Church and feudal lords. Appealing to the message of Martin Luther, German peasants attacked monasteries and castles seeking redress of traditional economic and political grievances. Rejected by Luther, the revolt was put down with ferocity by the armies of the Protestant princes. See also Luther, Martin.

Peckham, John, ca. 1225–92, master in theology at Oxford and Paris, Franciscan, and archbishop of Canterbury (from 1279). He was much concerned with pastoral care and clerical reform, although his Augustinianism led him to reject (1286) some teachings of Thomas Aquinas as heretical. See also Canterbury.

pectoral cross, a cross of precious metal worn by bishops and abbots on the chest and suspended from a chain around the neck. In some Eastern churches, it is worn also by priests.

Péguy, Charles (pay-gee'), 1873–1914, French poet, dramatist, essayist. Born in Orléans, Péguy was educated at the École Normale Supérieur, where he embraced socialism. Péguy soon abandoned Catholicism, opened a socialist center in Orléans, became a disciple of Henri Bergson, and actively crusaded against the injustices of the Dreyfus affair. Péguy founded the Cahiers de la Quinzaine (1900–1914), a journal for uncensored political and philosophical discussion. In 1908 Péguy reclaimed his Catholic heritage and, until his death at the Battle of the Marne, worked to bring about an alliance between Catholicism and socialism. His poetry and poetic drama were designed to express the mysteries of faith, e.g., Le Mystère de la Charité de Jeanne d'Arc.

Pelagianism, the body of teaching about divine grace connected with Pelagius (ca. 350–ca. 425), an ascetic teacher in Rome. Pelagius, probably a British Celt by birth, emphasized in his reformist teaching the freedom of the human will and the necessity of good works for the Christian. His teaching asserts human freedom against Manichaean fatalism, emphasizing the human capacity or ability to do good. The freedom to choose rather than to act by natural necessity separates humans from all other creatures. This ability, given by God, is grace according to Pelagius; the desire for, and the realization of, the good lies within human nature. Because all people are fundamentally free to choose good or evil, one could theoretically live without sin, though such a case would be exceedingly rare. Humans are born without an inherent proclivity to sin, though the force of habit gives sin a particular power over us. No special, supernatural grace is needed for one to choose the good. For Pelagius, the grace needed to live a holy life consists in: the primal gift of free will; the law of Moses; Christ's redemptive death; and the teaching and example of Christ.

Around 409 Pelagius left Rome, and passed through Carthage on the way to Palestine. His disciple Celestius was condemned at Carthage in 412 for asserting the sinlessness of infants prior to baptism, and Pelagius's own teaching was first attacked directly by Jerome in 413. Pelagius's treatise On Nature, written ca. 414, drew a reply in Augustine's On Nature and Grace (415), the first of his many explicitly anti-Pelagian tracts. Successive synods in 415, first in Jerusalem, then in Diospolis, failed to find anything objectionable, at least to Eastern opinion, in Pelagius's teaching. The North African bishops condemned Pelagius and Celestius in synods at Carthage and Milevis (416) and requested a judgment from Innocent, bishop of Rome. Innocent excommunicated Pelagius and Celestius in three letters of January 417, saying that On Nature blasphemously denied the need of divine grace. In 418, in the wake of the Sixteenth Council of Carthage and an imperial banishment of Pelagius and Celestius, Pope Zosimus issued his Epistola tractoria renewing their excommunication. Eighteen Italian bishops led by Julian of Eclanum refused to subscribe to Zosimus's letter, and until Augustine's death in 430 Julian was the main spokesman for the Pelagian viewpoint. Monastic writers like John Cassian (d. 435) and Faustus of Riez in Gaul (d. ca. 490), while not endorsing Pelagius's doctrine, continued to express reservations through much of the fifth century about the more extreme elements of Augustine's anti-Pelagian works. See also grace; nature and grace; semi-Pelagianism; sin. THOMAS SMITH pelican, ancient symbol for Christ. Attested as early as the sixth century, the symbolism derives from the folk belief that pelicans pierced their breasts with their beaks to nourish their young with their own blood.

Pelletier, St. Mary Euphrasia, 1796–1868, French founder of the Sisters of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd to care for girls and women who were considered "wayward." In 1835 she received papal approval to centralize the government of a group of independent convents involved in this work. She was canonized in 1940. Feast day: April 24.

penal law, norms that regulate penalties for the violation of Church laws. Although the Church is a society based on forgiveness, it is argued that some form of penal law is necessary to facilitate the conversion of the wrongdoer and to maintain public order. The first of these ends is met by what are called censures or medicinal penalties; the second, by what are called expiatory penalties. In addition, there are lesser penalties called penances that are also regulated by penal law.

Penal law is considered "odious" in the canonical tradition, and so is to be interpreted strictly. It is to be understood in as narrow a manner as possible so that there are as few ecclesiastical crimes as possible and consequently as few ecclesiastical penalties as possible. Penal law considers certain causes to diminish, at least partially, the culpability of a given individual. When the moral culpability is diminished, there is a consequent diminishment of the gravity of a crime. Such diminishment can result in the total abolition or diminution of a penalty.

The censures levied in Church law are three: excommunication, suspension, and interdict. Suspension is a penalty that limits the ability of a cleric to perform his ministry. Both excommunication and interdict in varying degrees distance a person from the life of the Christian community and the celebration of the sacraments. Although in the former law (1917) interdict could be levied against a whole group of the faithful, current law (1983) understands it as a penalty appropriate for use only against an individual.

The commission of some crimes automatically incurs a given penalty. These are latae sententiae (Lat., "concealed [automatic] sentences") penalties. In the 1983 revision of the code of canon law their number has been considerably lessened; Pope Paul VI ordered that they be fewer in number and used only for more serious offenses.

At times a penalty is inflicted as the result of a trial or an administrative procedure; such a penalty is called a ferendae sententiae ("imposed sentences") penalty. In such a trial or procedure there are provisions in canon law to guard the rights of the accused. Failing to follow procedure might result in the invalidity of the sentence rendered.

Penalties are ordinarily pardoned by the local bishop or someone to whom the bishop has entrusted such remission. Some penalties for the most serious matters can be lifted only by the Holy See. Examples of the latter include desecration of the Eucharist, violation of the seal of confession, and laying violent hands upon the pope. Permission to lift penalties for crimes confessed in secret is to be obtained in a fashion that does not violate the confidentiality of the confessional. See also censure.

JOHN F. LAHEY

penalties. See penal law.

penance, 1 the sacrament of Penance, or of Reconciliation; 2 the prayers or works one performs at the direction of one's confessor after receiving the sacrament; 3 a prayer or work one does, independently of the sacraments, to express sorrow for sin. In almost all religious movements, the realization of sin, i.e., a transgression against God, has stirred followers to lead lives in which they realign themselves with a religiously correct set of moral standards. In the Christian framework, there are clearly defined elements: (1) a transcendent personal God has created the world and established a normative structure; (2) through the gift of free will and the presence of original sin human beings deliberately transgress this normative structure; and (3) Jesus Christ alone has provided redress (redemption) for human sinfulness. Christian life, therefore, is basically penitential: Christians freely acknowledge their sinfulness and their dependence on Jesus. Following Jesus often requires moral behavior that is at odds with the prevailing culture and that demands sacrifice, suffering, and even death, patterned after Jesus' own Passion and crucifixion. It also involves an attempt to minimize both sin and the temptation to sin. In medieval Catholic life, Penance became a common name for the sacrament of Reconciliation. In the renewed rite of this sacrament, after Vatican II (1962–65), each form of the ritual is called a "rite of Reconciliation," and the entire ritual an "order of Penance." See also Reconciliation.

penance service, communal, the sacrament of Reconciliation observed within a liturgical assembly of more than two members. The Book of Rites allows for two forms of communal penance. Form two is celebrated whenever there are several penitents. A Liturgy of the Word is held in common followed by the private confession by each penitent and individual absolution bestowed by a single confessor. Form three is celebrated in emergencies or whenever the number of penitents disproportionately exceeds the number of available confessors. Following the Liturgy of the Word, form three concludes with a communal confession of sins and general absolution pronounced over the entire assembly. Form one is the rite for the reconciliation of individual penitents. See also Reconciliation.

penitential books, catalogues compiled for confessors specifying the appropriate penance for various sins. Appearing first in Welsh and Irish monasteries in the sixth century, they exerted influence through the eleventh. Penitentials by Vinnian (ca. 549), Columbanus (ca. 590), Cummean (ca. 650), and Theodore (ca. 700) prescribed fasting, psalm recitation, and often permitted monetary commutations to substitute for rigorous physical satisfactions.

In the eighth century, following Irish and Anglo-Saxon missions, penitential books became influential throughout Latin European Christianity, bringing confusion as disparate compilations judged sins and penances in widely different fashion, some overemphasizing the possibility of monetary commutation. Carolingian reformers sought to base practice on ancient church canons, but penitential books continued to be widely used until they were superseded by the appearance of more sophisticated general guides for confessors such as that by Alan of Lille (d. 1203). See also confession, auricular; Irish tariff penance; moral theology.

Penitential Rite, part of the opening rite in the celebration of the Eucharist. After the entrance hymn and the greeting by the presider there are three possible forms that this prayer may take. The Confiteor ("I confess to Almighty God") may be recited by all, a short call and response to awareness of our sinfulness may be prayed, or a threefold invocation echoed by "Lord, have mercy . . . Christ, have mercy . . . Lord, have mercy" may be used. At other times an alternative form of prayer is in order: at a Eucharist in which a baptism, marriage, or funeral is celebrated, the Penitential Rite gives way to appropriate prayers for these celebrations, and in the Easter period, the sprinkling of blessed water with its recollection of one's baptism is used. See also Eucharist.

Penitentiary, Apostolic, that tribunal of the Apostolic See with responsibility for all matters of the internal forum, both sacramental and nonsacramental, including absolutions, dispensations, commutations, sanctions, condonations, and other favors, as well as over granting and usage of indulgences (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 117–20). See also internal forum; Reconciliation.

penitentiary, canon. See canon penitentiary.

penitents, those who acknowledge their sinfulness. In the early Church, penitents formed a special order, like catechumens. When private confession prevailed, the order disappeared. In current Catholic theology, every Christian is a penitent, i.e., in continual need of God's forgiving grace. Liturgically, penitents today are those participating in the rite of Reconciliation. See also penance; Reconciliation.

pentarchy (Gk., pentarchia, "rule of five"), a theory of church governance, gradually developed in the fourth- and fifth-century Byzantine East, according to which the five patriarchs of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem are invested with supreme authority in the universal Church. In 451 the theory received ecclesial sanction in canon 28 of the Council of Chalcedon (a canon never accepted by Rome) and civil confirmation in Novella 109 of Emperor Justinian I. Some Byzantine theologians considered a council to be "ecumenical" only if all five patriarchates were represented. This raises questions in the 1990s about the possibility of an Orthodox ecumenical council without Rome. In the Orthodox pentarchial system the Bishop of Rome is "first among equals," neither superior to nor in command of the others. Some Catholic theorists advocate distinguishing more clearly the distinct levels of the pope's jurisdiction as Bishop of Rome, Primate of Italy, Patriarch of the West, and Pope of the universal Church. But in Catholic ecclesiology such distinctions are largely nominal, and can be considered an Eastern system that has never been an effectively operative part of Western ecclesial consciousness, much like Western views of centralized papal authority are in the East. Though these two views of church governance coexisted peacefully in the undivided Church during the first thousand years of its existence, their implicit tensions, never adequately resolved, formed the basis of later conflicts. See also patriarchate.

Pentateuch (pen'tuh-took), the first five books of the Bible. They are unified by a story line that begins with creation and ends with Moses' death. The books combine narrative (Genesis; Exod 1–19; parts of Numbers) and law (Exod 19–40; Leviticus; Num 1:1–10:10; other parts of Numbers; Deut 12–26). Some of both types of material are contained in Deut 1–11; 27–34. The narratives relate how the people were chosen and promised a land; the laws define how life in the land was to be lived.

Though the belief that Moses had written these five books arose in OT times and is echoed in the NT, modern scholars divide them into four sources or documents, all of which were written after Moses' time. In the classical form of the Documentary Hypothesis, the sources are identified and dated as follows: (1) J (the Yahwist source), the work of a ninth-century B.C. author who wrote a narrative from creation (beginning in Gen 2:4) to Moses' time and always referred to the deity as Yahweh ("Lord"); (2) E (the Elohist source), an eighth-century B.C. narrative in which the deity is called God (Heb., 'elohim) until the burning bush scene; (3) D (Deuteronomy), a seventh-century B.C. collection of speeches and laws; and (4) P (the Priestly source), a combination of laws and editorial notes, with a few stories (such as Gen 1). The J, E, and P sources were combined to produce Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers; to these Deuteronomy was added.

Pentecost (Gk., "the fiftieth day"), the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles (Acts 2:1–41) fifty days after Easter and the liturgical feast that celebrates the event. It is popularly regarded as the birthday of the Church because from that point on the apostles carried the message of Christ to the whole world. The feast of Pentecost is also known as Whitsunday. The Greek name was originally given to the Feast of Weeks (Tob 2:1), which fell on the fiftieth day after Passover. So important is the feast of Pentecost that, until 1969, the Sundays between Pentecost and Advent were identified as Sundays after Pentecost. Since 1969 they are called Sundays in Ordinary Time. See also Holy Spirit; liturgical calendar.

Pentecostal churches, Christian charismatic churches founded on the conviction that believers should have a religious experience similar to that of Pentecost (Acts 1:12–2:13). The primary manifestation of this experience is glossolalia, speaking in tongues, similar to that of the first Christians (Mark 16:17; Acts 2:4–11; 10:46; 19:6; 1 Cor 14). These loosely affiliated Protestant churches came into existence primarily in the United States beginning in the late nineteenth century. Instrumental at the outset of this movement were Bethel Bible College (Topeka, Kansas) and the Apostolic Faith Gospel Mission (Los Angeles, California), where the Azusa Street Revival occurred in 1906. Today, many of these charismatic churches are connected with the Pentecostal World Conference in Wales. See also Charismatic Renewal movement; evangelicalism; fundamentalism, biblical; Protestantism.

Pentekostarion (pen-tuh-kaws-tah'ree-ahn; Gk., "Pentecost [book]"), Byzantine-rite liturgical book of hymnody containing the prayers assigned to Sundays and feast days (propers) for the second half of the Paschal-Pentecostal cycle, from Easter Matins to All Saints' Day on the Sunday after Pentecost inclusive. Formerly included in the Triodion, this hymnody first appears in a separate Pentekostarion anthology in the fourteenth century. See also Pentecost.

People of God, biblical image of the Church; by extension, the whole human race. In the OT there are some three hundred uses of the Hebrew word for people ('am). The classic text is Ezek 37:26–27: "I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them; and I will bless them and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary among them forevermore. My dwelling place shall be with them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

The NT identifies the People of God with the Church in Rom 9:25–26; 2 Cor 6:14–16; Titus 2:14; and Heb 8:10. The notion of the Church as the new eschatological People of God is the guiding theme of the Letter to the Hebrews. However, the classic text is 1 Pet 2:9–10: "But you are a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people, in order that you may proclaim the mighty acts of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. Once you were not a people, but now you are God's people; once you had not received mercy, but now you have received mercy."

Nowhere is the Church spoken of explicitly as the "new" People of God, but there is explicit mention of the "new" Covenant (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25; 2 Cor 3:6; Heb 8:13; 9:15; 12:24), and that covenant is connected, at least implicitly, to a new community (Heb 8:8–12 cites Jer 31:31–34, where such a link is made).

A tension remains, however, between the old and the new People of God, and it is most strongly portrayed in Paul's Letters, especially in Rom 9–11. Unbelieving Israel is "Israel according to the flesh" (1 Cor 10:18), but believing Israel is "the Israel of God" (Gal 6:16). God calls us, Jew and Gentile alike (Gal 3:28–29). But even in the NT the new People of God are not identical with the community of the elect. In other words, membership in the Church is no guarantee of participation in the final kingdom of God. False prophets will be rejected by the Lord at the end (Matt 7:22–23) when all evildoers will be cast out (13:41–43). On the other side, many who did not belong to the new People of God will be acknowledged by the Son of Man as his brothers and sisters (Matt 25:31–46; Mark 13:27).

The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) made the People-of-God image its dominant image of the Church, more prominent even than Body of Christ, meriting an entire chapter in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church. The placement of this chapter generated one of the most dramatic conflicts at the council. It was finally decided that it should be placed before, rather than after, the chapter on the hierarchy to emphasize that the Church is a community with a hierarchical structure rather than a hierarchical body with spiritual subjects.

The People-of-God image reminds us that we are saved not merely as individuals but as a community (n. 9) and that everyone in the community—laity, religious, and clergy alike—participates in the threefold mission of Christ as prophet, priest, and king (nn. 11–12; Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, n. 2). The image, therefore, introduces a principle of coresponsibility that some Catholics, contrary to the council itself, find threatening to the Church's traditional structure of governance. See also Body of Christ.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Pepin III, "the Short," 714–68, king of the Franks. Succeeding his father, Charles Martel, as Frankish Mayor of the Palace (741), he later persuaded Pope Zacharias and the Frankish nobles that he should take the place of the nominal king, Childeric III. Pepin was succeeded by his son Charlemagne. See also Charlemagne; Franks.

Percy, Walker, 1916–90, American novelist and man of letters. Born to a prominent Southern family, he trained as a physician and took up fiction relatively late in life. His The Moviegoer (1961) won the National Book Award the following year. His corpus of fiction reflected his keen interest in philosophy and his deep Catholic faith, to which he converted in 1947. His close study of semiotics, psychiatry, and existentialism is reflected in such nonfiction collections as Lost in the Cosmos (1983).

Peregrine of Auxerre, St. (pair'uh-green uhv oh-sair'), d. ca. 261, bishop, martyr, and patron saint of cancer patients. Regarded as the first bishop of Auxerre, he was martyred for opposing the dedication of a local temple to Jupiter. Feast day: May 16.

Perfectae Caritatis (pair-fek'tay cah-ree-tah'tis). See Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life.

perfect contrition, a form of contrition in which love for God moves a sinner to repent of sin, ask for forgiveness, and promise not to sin again. Perfect contrition became a technical theological term in medieval Scholasticism. Peter Abelard (1079–1142) noted that whenever a sinner makes an act of perfect contrition, sin is forgiven. This position seemed to minimize the need for sacramental confession. Subsequent medieval theologians tried to relate the two. Theologically, the term "perfect" is added to "contrition" to indicate that contrition is made perfect by grace (D 1676, 1677). The Council of Trent (1545–63, D 1704) considered contrition, along with confession and satisfaction, as part of the matter of the sacrament. (The form is the absolution by the priest.) In contemporary post–Vatican II theology, there has been no major discussion of perfect contrition; nonetheless, some studies have been made on the issue of conversion, which involves the basic elements of perfect contrition. See also attrition; confession, auricular; contrition; imperfect contrition; Reconciliation.

perfection, a spiritual quality, proper to God alone, of being without any moral defect of any kind or to any degree whatever. Christians, however, are called by Jesus to strive for perfection: "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt 5:48). This saying is a fusion of Deut 18:13, "You must remain completely loyal to the Lord your God," and Lev 19:2, "You shall be holy, for I the Lord your God am holy." Luke 6:36 reads, "Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful." Thus, the biblical notion of perfection is an ideal of imitating God's goodness, holiness, and mercy. Jesus expressed this ideal in his challenge to love God fully and to love one's neighbor as oneself (see Mark 12:28–34).

In the Christian tradition, the goal of Christian life is union with God in love, and it recognizes love, expressed as virtuous life, as the means to this goal. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) taught that the perfection of the Christian life consists of acts of charity inspired, first, by a love of God and, second, by a love of neighbor.

Because the human person, even with the help of grace, has a capacity for love of God and neighbor that has been weakened by original sin, persons can achieve only certain degrees of perfection on earth. If the obstacles to perfection are selfishness and sin, the aids to perfection are self-knowledge, prayer, and the sacraments. A misinterpretation of spiritual and moral perfection as a life without any flaw or failure whatever has discouraged some from pursuing the ideal of perfection given by Jesus in the Gospels.

This perfection in love differs from what was once called a state of perfection, which pertained to members of religious orders and congregations who took vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Given the Second Vatican Council's teaching that the call to holiness is for everyone, not just for clergy and religious and those who take vows, the term "state of perfection" is no longer used (see Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 40). See also discipleship; love; perfection, state of. PATRICIA M. VINJE perfection, state of, a pre–Vatican II term describing the canonical status of members of religious orders and congregations who had taken the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience in pursuit of the perfection to which Jesus had called his disciples (Matt 5:48). However, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) taught that the call to holiness is universal, namely, "that all the faithful of Christ of whatever rank or status are called to the fullness of the Christian life and to the perfection of charity" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 40). Consequently, the term "state of perfection" fell into disuse because of its spiritually elitist overtones. See also perfection; religious life.

perichoresis (per-ee-kor-ay'sis). See circumincession.

pericope (pair-ih'koh-pee; Gk., "cut around"), any self-contained unit of Scripture, e.g., the pericope on the calling of the disciples (Mark 1:16–20).

peritus (Lat., "expert"), a consultant with special knowledge or skill. In some cases canon law requires that experts in behavioral science be called to assist a judge by their testimony. At Vatican II (1962–65) many bishops had periti in theology, Scripture, or canon law to assist them in theological understanding and decision making.

permanent diaconate. See deacon, permanent.

Perpetua, St., d. 203, North African martyr. The Passion of Perpetua and Felicitas provides not only an exemplary account of suffering and triumphant death under the emperor Diocletian but also, in its concentration on the plight of two young mothers separated from their nursing infants because of their faithfulness to Christ, one of the earliest records of the experience of Christian women. Perpetua was a visionary in whom the continuing and authoritative presence of the Holy Spirit was manifest. Feast day: March 7. See also Felicity, St.

perpetual vows, final vows in a religious institute by which people make their lifelong consecration to God and become definitively incorporated into a religious community. The candidate for final vows must be at least twenty-one years of age and have spent a probationary period of at least three years in temporary vows. As with any religious profession, to be considered valid it must be free from coercion, fraud, or grave fear and must involve the free approval of the appropriate authorities. The pronouncing of perpetual vows is considered a very significant life passage and the ceremony is often performed with great solemnity. See also religious institute; vows.

Perrone, Giovanni (joh-vahn'ee pair-roh'nay), 1794–1876, Jesuit theologian. He exerted a profound influence on Pope Pius IX (d. 1878) and other curial officials as dogmatic theologian and rector of the Roman College. A Scholastic theologian only in the broadest sense of the term, Perrone was well versed in patristic studies. He wrote an influential multivolume dogmatic manual and prepared for the definition of the Immaculate Conception in 1854.

persecutions, acts of harassment and violence directed against Christians. The sectarian, apocalyptic Judaism that was the background of Christianity often predicted persecution. The righteous would suffer, perhaps in a final confrontation with the forces of darkness, variously identified with the Jewish or Roman establishment. The suffering of the righteous could serve as atonement for the sins of the people, righteous and unrighteous alike (Isa 53; 2 Macc 7:32–38), and Jesus himself died the death of a martyr/prophet, speaking of his own death accordingly (Mark 14:24; Matt 26:28; 23:37–39). The Gospels warn would-be disciples that they, too, could expect persecution (Mark 10:39; Matt 10:16–25).

Christians and Rome: The Romans did not distinguish earliest Christianity from Judaism, a religio licita (Lat., "a religion authorized by the empire"), but Christians were cast out of synagogues and persecuted by the Jewish establishment. Stephen was martyred ca. 35 (Acts 7:60); ca. 44 Herod Agrippa I, Rome's client, executed James the brother of John and detained Peter (Acts 12); Paul himself confesses he had persecuted the Church (Gal 1:13); in turn he was opposed and harassed both in the Diaspora and at Jerusalem (e.g., Acts 17:10–13; Acts 21; Acts 24). James, "brother" of the Lord, was executed ca. 62 by the high priest Ananias.

As Christianity gained more gentile converts, the Romans learned to distinguish it as a separate, unauthorized religion. The emperor Nero initiated a gruesome persecution ca. 64, perhaps scapegoating the Christians for the great fire at Rome, blamed by some on himself. Hostility between Jews and Christians may have played a role here. The Jews, in popular imagination misanthropes and incendiarists who insulted the Roman gods, would have been natural scapegoats; they may have in turn suspected and accused the renegade hostile sect from whom they wished to dissociate themselves. Whatever the cause, Christians were now placed in a legally precarious position, henceforth vulnerable to popular prejudice, which regarded them, like the Jews, as antisocial. They were also charged with secret incest, cannibalism, and atheism (refusal to worship the gods of Rome). All of these, especially the last, only amplify the original charge; in failing to worship the gods of Rome, the Christians seemed to be assaulting the very character and aspirations of Roman society.

The emperor Domitian, according to the historian Eusebius, banished certain Christians from Rome (95). But the emperor Trajan's correspondence with Pliny, his governor in Bithynia, provides the first clear statement of official policy toward Christians (112). Christianity in itself is a capital offense; recantation earned one's release; but Christians should not be sought out or anonymous denunciations accepted, a provision strengthened under Trajan's successor Hadrian (ca. 125). Later, Marcus Aurelius's reign (161–80) marked the rise of mob violence against Christians, with particularly vicious outbreaks at Vienne and Lyons (177), preceded by executions in Asia Minor (including that of Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna), Athens, and Rome (e.g., Justin Martyr, ca. 165). Under Septimus Severus (193–211) persecution seemed directed particularly at converts (Perpetua and Felicitas, ca. 203, catechumens at Carthage; at Alexandria six students of Origen, ca. 206, besides Origen's father Leonides, ca. 204). Under Alexander Severus (222–35), however, persecution subsided and the Church even began to own property, although Maximinus Thrax (235–38) exiled Pope Pontian (230–35) and Hippolytus from Rome and violence broke out in Cappadocia and Pontus and in Caesarea.

The Final Phase: Decius (249–51) was the first emperor to institute an officially sponsored empire-wide persecution against the "atheism" responsible for the declining fortunes of the empire under his predecessors. Early in 250 he required all to obtain a certificate (Lat., libellus) proving sacrifice to the gods. In Caesarea Origen was tortured; the bishops of Jerusalem (Alexander) and Antioch (Babylas) were martyred. The most savage phase of this persecution, and perhaps of all early persecutions, began in 257 under Valerian (253–60). Imprisonment, torture, loss of property, exile, reduction to forced labor in chains, and death were the fates of many, including Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, Pope Sixtus II, and several prominent women of Rome. Fructuosus, bishop of Tarragona, and two deacons, Augurius and Eulogius, were burned alive at the stake (259). The accession of Gallienus (260), however, began some forty years of relative peace for the Church. These came to an abrupt end with the final "Great Persecution" begun by the emperor Diocletian (303). As part of his general reform platform reinstating fundamental Roman values, Diocletian aimed to eliminate Christianity. At his abdication (305) the persecution virtually ceased in the West except in Africa. In the East persecution continued brutally, especially in Egypt, ending only with the Edict of Constantine (313). See also lapsi; martyr; martyrdom.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

perseverance, final, the divine gift of continuance in the grace of justification until and at the time of death. Catholic theologians traditionally have distinguished final perseverance from the virtue or habit of perseverance by describing the latter as a potential power and the former as the act brought to completion at the end of life. The doctrine expresses the necessity of special divine help and, second, cooperation with God in attaining salvation. This position stands in opposition to the semi-Pelagian estimate of the complete sufficiency of the natural power of free will for perseverance and in opposition to the general disregard of the Reformers for the role of the human will in salvation. Hence, the teaching must be seen as chiefly the product of theological reflection on the efficacy of grace and divine predestination, though it has been ascribed various scriptural roots (e.g., Phil 1:3–6; Matt 10:22). The Council of Trent (1545–63) followed Augustine (d. 430) in calling it a "great gift" that fixes the free will in choosing the good and followed Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) in teaching that it is beyond merit and, therefore, beyond the certainty of our knowledge; nevertheless, the just may be confident of obtaining it through prayer. See also grace; salvation.

personal law, in canon law norms whose force applies to a given individual rather than a particular geographical territory. These laws are said to "cling to the bones" of a person. Their force follows an individual regardless of where he or she might be.

personalism, Christian, a philosophical orientation that emphasizes the value and dignity of each individual human person, the importance of dialogue (the I-thou relationship), and the notion of human solidarity. Rooted in the teachings of Jesus, the approach is particularly strong in the writings of the French Catholic philosopher Gabriel Marcel (d. 1973). It is also central for the Lublin School of philosophy, with which Pope John Paul II was once associated and whose philosophical orientation continues to influence his thinking and writing, especially his 1981 encyclical Laborem Exercens (On Human Work).

person of Christ, the divine Logos (Word) made flesh. According to the Christian tradition, the Logos is the person in whom the divine nature and human nature are united. The person, or hypostasis (Gk.) of the Second Person of the triune God, is the unifying subject in Jesus Christ, who is truly God and truly a human being. Christ's human nature did/does not exist on its own but "subsists" by virtue of participating in the existence of the Word, the Son of God.

This understanding raises such questions as: Was Jesus conscious of himself as the Son of God during his earthly life? Could he have sinned? Did he enjoy the Beatific Vision throughout his life? In Catholic theology of the mid-twentieth century the issue of the self-consciousness of Jesus Christ was considered by theologians like J. Galot, E. Gutwenger, B. Lonergan, and K. Rahner. It was addressed, too, by Pius XII in his encyclical Sempiternus Rex Christus (1951), which, though setting some limits, left the way open for critical inquiry. Such inquiries require that one clarify such notions as person, experience, and consciousness, distinguishing between their psychological meaning and their ontological/metaphysical meaning. See also Christology; hypostasis; hypostatic union; Jesus Christ; subsistence theory.

Persons, divine, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as named in the NT. Although "person" is often thought of as an individual center of consciousness, applied to the Trinity this would be tantamount to tritheism. In contemporary theology, philosophy, and psychology the relational characteristics of personhood are emphasized. Thus, a person, whether divine or human, is one who comes to self through another, who is free, who loves and is loved, and who knows and is known. All persons, whether divine or human, are ineffable, unique, and unrepeatable. By definition, a person is "ecstatic," oriented toward others. Finally, all persons are made for communion with other persons. Thus, what is "unnatural" for persons is to be self-focused or self-absorbed. Indeed, contemporary philosophers and theologians view the self-reflective self as a false self.

In the history of trinitarian theology, "person" was a fluid term, defined differently at various stages of doctrinal history and in contrast to nature or essence. Boethius's (d. 524) definition is classic: a person is an individual substance of a rational nature. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) used Boethius's definition and thus it had perduring influence in Latin theology. According to Scholastic theology, the one divine nature is differentiated by three divine Persons who subsist in perfect equality, alike in Godhead.

In Eastern Christianity, personhood is predicated as the rudimentary ontological category. Person logically precedes nature, because the originating principle of all reality is a personal (not a substantial) God. The primary truth about God is that God is not a substance that can be metaphysically determined, rather, God is "someone" who meets us in a redemptive history.

In sum, "person" is a central category in trinitarian theology. The claim that God is "personal" is, of course, an analogy. The point is that God is capable of relationship with a people throughout salvation history. See also God; Trinity, doctrine of the.

CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

pertinacity, persistent and tenacious obstinacy. It traditionally characterizes the denial or doubt of heretics concerning articles of faith.

Perugino (pair-oo-jee'noh) [Pietro Vannucci], 1448–1523, Italian artist. An Umbrian painter, he did important frescos in the Vatican (most lost) and in Perugia. He taught Raphael for one year.

pessimism, the philosophical doctrine that this is the worst possible universe or, less extremely, that in this universe evil outweighs good. It runs counter to the Catholic affirmation that the universe, taken in its entirety, is intelligible and good because it has been created by an infinitely wise and loving God. See also despair; hope.

Petavius, Dionysius (di-uh-nee'shuhs peh-tay' vee-uhs), 1583–1652, also known as Denis Pétau, Jesuit theologian and patristics scholar. He taught theology at the Collège de Clermont in Paris for much of his career. An accomplished student of the early Church writers, Petavius edited numerous collections of ancient theological texts and, in his multivolume work of dogmatic theology, sought to demonstrate the biblical and patristic origins and development of Church doctrines.

Peter Baptist, St., 1545–97, Franciscan missionary and martyr and patron saint of Japan. Spanish-born, he worked as a missionary in Mexico, the Philippines, and Japan, where he was crucified with twenty-five other Christians, all of whom were canonized in 1862 as the Martyrs of Japan. Feast day: February 6. See also Japan, Catholicism in.

Peter Canisius, St. See Canisius, St. Peter.

Peter Chanel, St. See Chanel, St. Peter.

Peter Chrysologus, St. See Chrysologus, St. Peter.

Peter Claver, seventeenth-century Spanish Jesuit, devoted minister to African slaves brought forcibly to the New World (modern-day Colombia in South America), and minister to the native peoples as well.

Peter Claver, St., 1581–1654, Spanish Jesuit missionary known as "the Saint of the Slaves." He entered the Society of Jesus in 1602 and was inspired by Alphonsus Rodriguez to become a missionary in South America. In 1610 he went to the seaport of Cartagena, Colombia, to begin his practice of meeting ships arriving from West Africa and going into their holds in order to care for the physical and spiritual well-being of the slaves. He is said to have instructed and baptized over 300,000 slaves. In 1616 he was ordained a priest in Bogotá. During his last years, he suffered a paralysis and mistreatment by his servant. In 1888 he was canonized by Pope Leo XIII. Feast day: September 9.

ST. PETER

St. Peter was Jesus' leading disciple, traditionally regarded as the first pope. The synoptic Gospels indicate that Simon was the first disciple chosen by Jesus, on which occasion Jesus either gave him a new symbolic name (Cephas, or Peter, "rock"; Matt 16:18) or designated him as "fisher of men" (Mark 1:17; see Luke 5:10). Respect and authority reside for the ancients in the first of a line, firstborn or first chosen. Peter was a fisherman from the village of Peter, with John the Evangelist (right), is instructed by Jesus, "Go to the sea and cast a hook; take the first fish that comes up; and when you open its mouth, you will find a coin; take that and give it to them for you and me" (Matt 17:27). When he first called Peter to be his disciple, Jesus said to him, "Follow me, and I will make you fish for people" (Matt 4:19); fifteenth-century painting by Masaccio, in the Brancacci Chapel, Santa Maria del Carmine, Florence, Italy.

Peter receiving the keys of the kingdom of heaven from Jesus in Caesarea Philippi (Matt 16:19), a scene traditionally regarded as the basis of Peter's and his successors' pastoral authority over the Church; medieval English enamel plaque (ca. 1185).

Capernaum, son of Jonah (Matt 16:17) and brother of Andrew. He worked his father's trade, possibly in a consortium with Zebedee and sons. He was married (Mark 1:30) and apparently traveled with his wife (1 Cor 9:5). Acts 4:13 records a public verdict that he was an "uneducated common man."

STATUS AND ROLE

In Matthew's Gospel Peter enjoys a special status and role. The traditional elements of his call by Jesus are supplemented with charismatic phenomena such as walking on water (14:28–29), special revelations (16:17), and miraculous events (17:27). Peter asks key questions and so becomes the unique conduit of information from Jesus about an important range of topics (15:15; 17:25–26). Thus his status is a blend of traditional commissioning stories and unusual charismatic demonstrations. Only in Matthew is Peter formally designated "rock" of the new church, given keys of authority to admit or exclude, and promised that his role in the group would survive death (16:18–19).

All the Gospels record many unflattering remembrances about Peter. He is the disciple who rebuked Jesus when he first began to speak of his impending death in Jerusalem; Jesus called him a "Satan" (Mark 8:33). Peter's faith failed after he began to walk on the water (Matt 14:30–31). Finally, Peter is famous for his boasts of loyalty to Jesus (Mark 14:29, 31; John 13:37) and his subsequent shameful denial of the Lord (Mark 14:66–72). One Gospel identifies him as the disciple who drew his sword in the garden to defend Jesus (John 18:10). That his insight is inferior to that of the Beloved Disciple is noted twice (John 20:6–9; 21:7). Yet for all that, Jesus prayed for him that his faith be strengthened (Luke 22:31–32). Like Paul, who is remembered as the one who "persecuted the church," Peter is remembered as the disciple who denied the Lord.

Many NT documents testify to the importance of Peter, which confirms our appreciation of his unique position among the earliest churches. Among the Twelve there seems to have been an elite inner circle consisting of Peter, James, and John. They accompanied Jesus to the raising of Jairus's daughter (Mark 5:37), to the Transfiguration (Mark 9:2), to the Mount of Olives for a special farewell discourse (Mark 13:3), and to close association with Jesus in the garden (Mark 14:33). Yet Peter is more typically presented as the spokesman for the disciples, asking about the interpretation of parables (Luke 12:41) or offering the correct confession about Jesus (Mark 8:29).

Paul, either willingly or reluctantly, admits Peter's special position; he mentions that Jesus appeared first to him (1 Cor 15:5) and that he functioned not only as a "pillar" of the Jerusalem church, but as the leader of the mission to the circumcised (Gal 2:7). Luke describes Jesus at the Last Supper commissioning Peter as leader of his disciples (22:32) and notes that the risen Jesus appeared first to him (24:34). John's Gospel is more complicated, as it indicates a rivalry for leadership between Peter and the Beloved Disciple. But even here, Jesus formally commissions Peter as "the noble shepherd" (21:15–19), namely, his successor and leader of the group.

It cannot be underestimated how important is the pervasive witness to the tradition that Jesus appeared to Peter after the Resurrection. Luke indicates that Jesus appeared first to Peter (24:34), a primacy supported by Paul's list of witnesses (1 Cor 15:5). And the angel at the tomb instructs the women to tell their message to "the disciples and Peter" (Mark 16:7), mentioning him by name. Finally, Matthew (28:16–20), Luke (24:36–49), and John (20:19–23; 21:15–19) all record a formal commissioning of Peter, either in the group or individually, as witness. If such Resurrection appearances function as commissioning stories, Peter is the most commissioned of the Twelve.

PETER AND THE EARLY CHURCH

Peter's role in the early Church is described in Acts. To outsiders, he functioned as chief witness about Jesus, either heralding the good news to the crowds (2:14–36) or defending the gospel before legal courts (4:7–12). To insiders, he enjoyed the role of judge (5:1–10), missionary (9:32–42), and arbiter of conflict (15:7–11). He articulates the need to replace Judas with a new, qualified apostle (1:15–22). Acts records him receiving an important vision of foods descending from heaven, with the accompanying explanation that Jewish rules for kosher food no longer apply to Jesus' disciples (10:13–15). On the same occasion, Peter was designated by God to begin the mission to the Gentiles by approving the admission of Cornelius and his spirit-filled household into the Church (10:44–48). Acts mentions his imprisonment and apparent flight from Jerusalem (12:17). The mention of a "Cephas party" at Corinth might indicate his migration there (1 Cor 1:12), but this seems doubtful.

He is credited with writing two Letters, 1 and 2 Peter. While a case can be made for Petrine authorship of 1 Peter, it seems unlikely that he is the author of the second Letter. Nevertheless, the author of 2 Peter is privy to a host of stories about Peter that indicate a common and widespread appreciation of his stature in the early Church. 2 Peter knows that Jesus revealed his death to him (1:12–15; see John 21:18–19); Peter's witness of the Transfiguration is noted (1:16–18; see Matt 17:1–7); like the Peter of the Gospels, he is credited with inspiration (1:20–21; see Matt 16:17). He receives revelations about future false prophets (2:1–3; see Matt 24:11, 24), the unknowability of the time of the Parousia (3:8; see Matt 24:8, 36), special traditions about the Parousia (3:10–13; see Matt 24:29–31), the thief in the night (3:10; see Matt 24:43), and the regeneration of the world (3:11–12; see Matt 19:28). This document, then, is a compendium of traditions about Peter and a witness to his importance.

The NT records that Peter did not stay in Jerusalem, as seems to be the case with the other apostles. He traveled to Lydda, Joppa, and Caesarea (Acts 9–10). Peter and Paul eat together with the church at Antioch (Gal 2:11). He probably visited Corinth (1 Cor 9:5); and there is solid support for his eventual travel to Rome and martyrdom there; the Roman leader Clement describes Peter's trials in Rome (1 Clem. 5:4), and Eusebius reports an ancient story about Peter's crucifixion in Rome (Ecclesiastical History 2.25.5, 8).

There is even less evidence of how Peter functioned while in Rome. It would be wrong, however, to read back into first-century Rome the existence of the papacy as we know it today. Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) did assume that Peter and Paul exercised special authority over the church in Rome, and Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) claimed that they jointly founded the church there and inaugurated its succession of bishops. Historical evidence suggests that not until the mid-second century did the monarchical episcopate (a single bishop presiding over a diocese) finally replace the Roman system whereby a body of presbyter-bishops functioned in the presidential role. By the late second or early third century, however, the tradition identified Peter as the first Bishop of Rome, and the tradition continues to this day. Feast day (with St. Paul): June 29.

See also papacy, the; Petrine ministry; Petrine succession; pope; primacy, papal.

Bibliography

Brown, Raymond, Karl Donfried, and John Reumann, eds. Peter in the New Testament. New York: Paulist Press, 1973.

Brown, Raymond, and John Meier. Antioch and Rome: New Testament Cradles of Catholic Christianity. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

Brown, Raymond. The Churches the Apostles Left Behind. New York: Paulist Press, 1984.

JEROME NEYREY

Peter Comestor, d. 1179, exegete. Born in Troyes, where he became dean of the cathedral, he then studied and taught in Paris. His major work is Historia Scholastica (Scholastic History), a continuous history from creation to the end of Acts utilizing Scripture and the Church Fathers to weave a consecutive narrative.

Peter Damian, St., 1007–72, Doctor of the Church, reformer, and theologian. Born in Ravenna, after studying and teaching the liberal arts he converted to the monastic life, joining a group of hermits at Fonte Avellana in the Apennines. Called to Rome in 1057 and made cardinal-bishop of Ostia, he was sent on several missions on behalf of the reform papacy. His writings urged clerical reform. He was an early proponent of apostolic poverty for the clergy and wrote in favor of clerical celibacy. He was a moderate on the question of simony, the buying and selling of spiritual goods, including Church offices. While insisting that it is a sin and that simoniacal priests should be punished, he concluded that their sacraments were valid. Feast day: February 21.

Peter Gonzales, Bl., 1190–1246, Benedictine preacher and patron saint of sailors. Spanish-born, he served as King Ferdinand III's chaplain, preached a crusade against the Moors, then counseled mercy. He was particularly concerned with the welfare of sailors. Feast day: April 14.

Peter Lombard. See Lombard, Peter.

Peter Martyr, St., ca. 1200–1252, Dominican preacher and martyr. Born of Cathar parents, Peter was admitted to the Dominicans in 1221 by Dominic de Guzman himself and spent the rest of his life trying to convert heretics. Appointed inquisitor for northern Italy in 1251, he suffered martyrdom the next year and was canonized the year after that. Feast day: April 29. See also Cathari; Inquisition.

Peter of Alcántara, St., 1499–1562, founder of the Spanish Discalced Franciscans. Peter studied at the University of Salamanca and lived a life of solitude and austerity. His followers were known as Alcantarines. A trusted adviser to Teresa of Ávila, Peter was canonized in 1669. Feast day: October 19.

Peter of Alexandria, St., d. ca. 311, bishop of Alexandria (ca. 300–311). Imprisoned under Diocletian and freed ca. 306, he fled renewed persecution and returned in 311, but was beheaded shortly thereafter under Maximinus Daia. His leniency toward the lapsi (Lat.,"those who denied the faith under persecution") prompted Melitius of Lycopolis to try to take over in Peter's absence, ultimately provoking the Melitian schism. Peter's works are lost. Fragments show he disputed Origen's teachings on the soul and resurrection body. Feast day: November 24 (East); November 25 (Ethiopia); November 26 (West). See also lapsi.

Peter's Pence, an amount of money contributed annually by Catholics worldwide for the support of the Holy See, revived by Pope Pius IX in 1860 after the fall of the Papal States. Its origin can be traced to England in 787 as a tax of one penny that was levied on all but the poorest families and given to the pope. The practice spread to other nations and should not be confused with the feudal tribute, or census (Lat., "assessment"), paid for papal protection at a time when the Holy See was a temporal power. The census was abolished in England by Henry VIII in 1534 and did not survive in any nation after the Reformation. See also Holy See.

Peter the Chanter, ca. 1130–97, exegete and theologian. He was canon and master of theology in Paris at the cathedral school, where he also became the cantor. Principally concerned with moral, pastoral, and sacramental theology, he also wrote commentaries on biblical books.

Peter the Venerable, ca. 1092–1156, ninth abbot of Cluny and leader of twelfth-century revival of monastic life. His writings include treatises against Christian heretics, Muslims, and Jews. He had the Qur'an translated into Latin. Though honored as a saint, he was never canonized. He is listed in some books of saints with a feast day of December 29. See also Cluny.

petitioner, party initiating action in canon law. The petitioner must have some direct involvement in the case. Hence only a spouse (or the promoter of justice, the diocesan prosecutor) can introduce a marriage case. The petitioner need not be Catholic. Minors and certain mentally incompetent persons, however, can only stand trial through parents or guardians since procedural capacity is required.

Petrine ministry, the ministry that the Bishop of Rome (the pope) exercises in his capacity as Vicar of Peter. The Spirit of God gives the bishop of the see where, according to tradition, Peter and Paul were martyred a specific mission and some important prerogatives. Their purpose is the serving of the communion formed by all the local churches (presided over by the local bishops) and indeed by all the disciples of Christ. This ministry is the ministry of the one among the bishops called by Christ to fulfill the declaration that Luke inserts into his account of the Last Supper: "I have prayed for you that your own faith may not fail; and you, when once you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:32). The ministry of Peter as leader of the apostolic community in the first part of the book of Acts is the model and the norm of this ministry, precisely because it is Peter himself who continues to preside and serve through his vicar, the pope. Like Peter, the Bishop of Rome has to witness to the faith that Peter (and Paul) confessed, to watch over the way the local churches keep and transmit this faith with integrity, to help his fellow bishops defend the content of this faith when its authentic meaning is at stake, to promote and coordinate the activities of the churches in their missionary task, to speak in the name of all the bishops and all their local churches when (guided by the Holy Spirit) he knows it is necessary, and to declare officially and solemnly the meaning of a revealed truth in the name of the whole Church with the guarantee of the charism of infallibility and under precise and very strict conditions. Because the whole Church is the communion of all the local churches and each local church is under the oversight of one bishop, the ministry of the Bishop of Rome is necessarily connected with the authority each bishop possesses in his own diocese. In order to safeguard the communion of all the local churches in faith, charity, and mission, the Bishop of Rome has the duty to watch over the inner unity and cohesion of the whole episcopal college, to help his brothers in their tasks, to make known their needs, and sometimes to speak for them when they are unjustly accused or prosecuted. His ministry is the ministry of the servus servorum Dei (Lat., "servant of the servants of God"), an old episcopal title that describes at one and the same time the pope's relation to his fellow bishops and to the whole People of God. See also collegiality; communion, Church as; papacy, the; Peter, St.; Petrine succession; pope; primacy, papal; vicar of Christ; Vicar of Peter. JEAN-M. R. TILLARD

Petrine privilege. See Privilege of the Faith.

Petrine succession, an expression pertaining to the complex process by which the bishops of Rome (popes) follow in the line of St. Peter as his vicars and as earthly heads of the universal Church. The process is complex because it is clear that in his function as founder, with Paul, of the apostolic see of Rome, Peter cannot have a successor. It is also clear that as one of the Twelve he cannot have any successor in the basic apostolic function of bearing witness to the fact that the Risen Lord is really the Jesus in whose company they spent some years of their life. Moreover, no one may succeed Peter and the other apostles in the eschatological privilege of surrounding the Christ at the time of the judgment (cf. Luke 22:30) and of being the foundations of the eschatological Jerusalem (Rev 21:14). It is indeed possible for him to have inheritors in the responsibility of evangelizing the whole world and of keeping in communion all the baptized people. But these inheritors will be continuators, not replacements, and his death will not prevent him from presiding over the destinies of the Church founded on the rock of his faith. These inheritors will fully succeed each other, but their link with Peter will only be a succession in an analogical way. Because in Rome they are continuing the mission once for all given to Peter, their relation to the other bishops will be the same as the relation of Peter to the other apostles; their authority over the whole college of bishops will be the same as the authority exercised by Peter in the midst of the apostolic group; their responsibility for the leadership of the Church will be the same as the responsibility of Peter over the apostolic community. But it is the once-for-all nature of the office of Peter that remains present through all those who successively occupy the apostolic see of Rome.

It is important to remember that for Cyprian (d. 258) every bishop in his own episcopal see is in some sense Peter's successor: the other apostles were what Peter was (i.e., signs of unity and bearers of the tradition); Peter was in every apostle. Hilary of Poitiers (d. 367) calls all the local bishops "successors of Peter and Paul" (Migne Patrologia Latina 10.645). Augustine (d. 430) says that in Peter the whole Church, not only Peter, was receiving the keys of the Kingdom (Tract on John 27.9; tract. 118.4; tract. 124.5). Theologians of the Orthodox churches maintain that Rome is not the only see in which Peter exercised his apostolic primacy and in which an episcopal succession may be found. They affirm that according to the Scriptures the apostolic see of Antioch is one of the Petrine churches enjoying a Petrine succession. See also apostolic succession; papacy, the; Peter, St.; Petrine ministry; pope; vicar of Christ; Vicar of Peter. JEAN-M. R. TILLARD pew, wooden church benches. Pews, arranged in rows, are used by the congregation or individuals for worship and private prayer.

pew rent, a contribution for the use of a particular pew in a church. Sometimes the term has been used for a contribution solicited from worshipers as they enter the door of a church. Both practices are no longer extant in the United States. The 1917 Code of Canon Law mandated free entry to divine worship.

Peyton, Patrick J., 1909–92, Irish-born Holy Cross priest who promoted the Rosary on radio and television and also through diocesan "crusades." His motto was "The family that prays together stays together."

Pharisees (fair'uh-seez; Heb., "separated ones"), a Jewish sect during the time of Jesus. The group was active from the late second century B.C. through the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. They are mentioned in the NT, the works of the Jewish historian Josephus (Jewish War 2.162–66, Antiquities 18.12–15), and the literature of rabbinic Judaism.

At the core of the Pharisaic program is God's injunction to Israel to be holy (Lev 19:2). Through a tradition of interpretation (the oral Torah) of the Pentateuch, the Pharisees extended law (Heb., halakah) applicable to the priests and the Temple to all of Israel. Such traditions were eventually codified in the Mishnah.

The NT portrays the Pharisees as models of conventional piety (Luke 18:10) but criticizes them for concern with superficial matters (Matt 23:13–29; Luke 11:38–52). Matthew records Jesus' admonition to abide by Pharisaic teaching but to avoid their example (Matt 23:2–3). The Pharisees often appear as hostile questioners of Jesus (e.g., Matt 9:11; 16:1; 22:15; Mark 9:11; 10:2; Luke 6:2; 11:53; 17:2). John suggests that their hostility led some to conspire with the high priests against Jesus (John 7:32; 11:47, 57). Yet some Pharisees apparently were well disposed toward Jesus (Luke 13:31; John 3:1; 7:45–52). Acts 5:33–40 records that a distinguished teacher, Gamaliel, advised tolerance for the new community.

Before his experience with the risen Christ, the Apostle Paul was a Pharisee (Phil 3:5). On trial in Jerusalem he used the Pharisaic belief in resurrection to his advantage (Acts 23:6–11). HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE phelonion (fay-loh'nee-ahn), also phenolion, Byzantine-rite liturgical chasuble, principal outer vestment worn by priests. Like the Western chasuble, it evolved from the Roman paenula, from which its name derives. See also chasuble.

phenomenology (Gk., phainomenon, "what appears"; logos, "study of"). 1 A general type of inquiry that objectively describes the subject matter and the experiences associated with it, without attempting to explain the cause(s) of these experiences. 2 A philosophical method, developed principally in Germany in the first half of the twentieth century. The primary representative of this philosophical school was Edmund Husserl (1859–1938). The phenomenological approach, emphasizing the material world as the bearer of the sacred, has been especially prominent in sacramental theology, particularly in the writings of Edward Schillebeeckx, the author of Christ the Sacrament of the Encounter with God (1963). See also philosophy and theology; sacrament.

Philemon (fi-lee'muhn), an early Christian convert of Paul (Phlm 19) and recipient of a letter from him. Philemon was a wealthy resident of Colossae, at whose house an early Christian community met (Phlm 2). He also owned the slave Onesimus, who had run away to Ephesus and had been of great service to Paul during Paul's imprisonment (Phlm 13). Paul then sent Onesimus back to Philemon. In his letter Paul urged Philemon to receive Onesimus back no longer as a slave but as a beloved brother (Phlm 16). It is unclear whether Paul was asking for Onesimus's emancipation or simply for Philemon to treat him kindly.

Philip, St., one of the twelve apostles. Philip is listed with the Twelve in the synoptic Gospels (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13). He plays a significant role only in the Fourth Gospel, where, along with Peter and Andrew and like them an inhabitant of Bethsaida, he is among the first disciples called by Jesus (John 1:43–44). At the feeding of the five thousand he comments that two hundred denarii worth of bread would not suffice to feed the crowd (John 6:5–7). Because he has a Greek name, it is appropriate that "the Greeks" come to him looking for Jesus (John 12:21–22). At the Last Supper, he asks Jesus to show the Father to the Twelve, eliciting the response that the one who has seen Jesus has seen the Father (John 14:8–9).

Philip the Apostle is often confused in tradition (e.g., Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 3.31.2) with Philip the deacon (Acts 6:5), who evangelized Samaria (Acts 8:5–13) and converted the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26–40). Acts 21:8 gives this Philip the epithet the Evangelist and places his home in Caesarea Maritima.

At least two apocryphal works attributed to Philip circulated in the early Church. Epiphanius (Panarion 26.13.2–3) cites a Gospel of Philip used by fourth-century Egyptian Gnostics. A Coptic Gospel of Philip was discovered in the Nag Hammadi collection, without the material cited by Epiphanius. The latter text contains disparate materials, many of which share an interest in sacramental symbolism.

Philip is the patron saint of Uruguay. Feast day: May 3. See also apostle; Twelve, the.

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Philip II, 1527–98, king of Spain from 1556 to 1598. Champion of Catholicism against the Reformation and of Catholic reform, he suppressed religious dissent throughout Spanish territories, provoking Dutch revolt. His effort to restore English Catholicism ended with the defeat in 1588 of the Spanish Armada.

Philip Neri, St., 1515–95, Italian priest, founder, and confessor. Known as a man of prayer and generosity, he was regarded as a living saint by contemporaries. It was reported that he experienced spiritual ecstasy. His most notable accomplishments include the cofounding of the Confraternity of the Most Holy Trinity, dedicated to assisting pilgrims and the sick, and his inspiration for the Congregation of the Oratory, an association of priests whose aim it was to promote holiness of priestly life and to foster good preaching. Feast day: May 26. See also Oratorians.

Philip the Chancellor, d. ca. 1236, theologian, chancellor of the University of Paris by 1218, and author of Summa de Bono (Concerning the Good), a comprehensive statement of Christian theology widely read by thirteenth-century Scholastic theologians.

Philippines, Catholicism in the. Catholicism was introduced to the Philippines in 1521, when Spain claimed the islands as a colonial outpost. For over 350 years, the Philippines were under Spanish rule. A variety of religious orders including Augustinians, Franciscans, Jesuits, Dominicans, and Augustinian Recollects evangelized the islands. The archdiocese of Manila was established in 1578, and was made a Metropolitan See in 1595. The first bishop was Domingo de Salazar, appointed in 1579. In order to provide better instruction of the native Filipinos, the widely scattered barangays (Sp., "clans") were encouraged to resettle in larger villages. Despite evangelical efforts, popular non-Christian religious practices, particularly ancestral worship, continued to flourish. As a result, Filipino spirituality has always been attracted to sacramentals—relics, holy water, medals, and devotions to saints.

While the institutional Church grew, it failed to develop a native clergy; native Filipinos were not allowed to become priests until the late seventeenth century. As the number of native clergy increased, tensions grew between Filipino diocesan priests (directly subject to the local bishop) and Spanish religious order priests. In 1872, several nationalistic Filipino priests were accused by Spain of rebellion and were executed; a repression of the native clergy ensued. The Revolution of 1896 against Spain contained significant anticlerical feeling, though anticlericalism was directed primarily at the Spanish clergy. In 1898, as a result of the Spanish-American War, the Philippines and the Philippine church came under American control. At the same time, a strong push was made for the appointment of Filipino bishops; with no appointments forthcoming, a movement led by a guerilla hero, Father Gregorio Aglipay, split from the Catholic Church to form the Independent Filipino Catholic Church in 1902. The schism claimed close to one-fourth of the islands' Catholics, though by the 1930s and 1940s the numbers had declined precipitously. In 1906, a Filipino bishop, Father Jorge Barlin, was appointed, and more Filipino bishops were subsequently named. The Filipino church also confronted increasing Protestant proselytization as a result of American occupation, but few inroads were made.

Over the course of the twentieth century the Church in the Philippines has grown in size and strength, and so has popular religiosity in the form of fiestas, processions, and devotions to saints, such as the Santo Nino. In 1994, it was estimated that over fifty million Catholics live and worship in the Philippines, 83 percent of the total population.

JEFFREY M. BURNS

Philocalia (fi-loh-kay'lee-uh; Gk., "love of things beautiful"). 1 An anthology of Origen's writings collected by Gregory of Nazianzus and Basil of Caesarea ca. 359, preserving the original Greek of many passages otherwise extant only in translation. 2 A 1782 collection of spiritual writings from the fourth to the fifteenth centuries focused on hesychastic themes, especially the Prayer of the Heart (the Jesus Prayer). See also Jesus Prayer; Origen.

Philomena, St., revered in the past as virgin and martyr. Because virtually nothing is known about her, the Church suppressed her feast (August 11) in 1960. Philomena's veneration flourished in the nineteenth century and Jean-Baptiste Vianney, in particular, was devoted to her.

Philo of Alexandria, ca. 20 B.C.–ca. 50 A.D., leading figure of the Jewish community in Alexandria and major source for understanding diaspora Judaism. Although Philo wrote more than seventy tractates, only fifty survive: thirty-eight in Greek and twelve in Armenian. His commentaries on the Pentateuch are divided into "Questions and Answers," the "Allegorical Commentary," and the "Exposition of the Law"; the other works are apologetic and philosophical treatises. His insistence on both literal and allegorical meanings of the Bible allowed him to create a synthesis of Jewish faith and Middle Platonism. Central to his thought is the divine Logos, an intermediary between God and humanity. Both his method of exegesis and his thought significantly influenced the development of Christian theology, especially through Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Ambrose. See also Logos.

philosophy and theology. Since the time of the Greeks, philosophy and theology have sometimes been seen as complementary to each other and at other times in opposition. In Greek "philosophy" literally means "love of wisdom," while "theology" means "knowledge of God," so it would be natural for believers in God to consider them to complement each other, while unbelievers would try to find wisdom apart from belief in God. Any attempt to relate the two raises questions about the relation of reason to faith. For the Greeks, theology was equivalent to a study of the most fundamental causes of the universe and so represented the culmination of a philosophical inquiry. For Jews and Christians, on the other hand, theology had as its subject the God who was self-revealed to human beings—at Sinai or in Jesus—and so required a prior assent of faith.

It was inevitable that Jews or Christians in the Hellenic world should find themselves at odds intellectually. These differences account for the various senses given to the two expressions as time went on: unconverted Greeks complained that their philosophy comprised all there was to know about the universe and about God, and converted Greeks insisted that their theology was the only true philosophy. Finding the proper way to distinguish between philosophy and theology, so that they could also be related, was the work of signal Christian thinkers, notably Augustine of Hippo in the fourth century and Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth. Augustine used the current philosophy of Plato to show how one might understand the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Jesus not as something outside the universe but as the source of its very life and goal-directedness. Aquinas employed Aristotle to show how Christians' faith, in a universe that is freely created by God, permeates the world we observe and seek to understand. In other words, the philosophy of the Greeks can be incorporated into Christian inquiry as the "handmaid of theology." In both cases, however, relating philosophy to theology in this fashion required these authors to restrain the pretensions of philosophy to offer a total explanation of the universe. That claim also contains the seeds of their opposition.

Later thinkers found themselves less able to conceive of these modes of inquiry as complementary. The period of European thought associated with Immanuel Kant (d. 1804) and called the Enlightenment revived the totalizing pretension of philosophy just at the time in which the Reformation introduced distrust of the claims of human reason. So a new form of opposition between philosophical and theological inquiry was generated. Christian thinkers have insisted, however, that one never begins any inquiry without presupposing something. Therefore, a hybrid discipline of "Christian philosophy" may well be legitimated, even in the academy. Herein, the creative tension continues in a new form. See also theology. DAVID B. BURRELL philosophy of religion, the study of religion from a philosophical perspective. The philosophy of religion is a relatively recent phenomenon. Its predecessor, philosophical (or natural) theology, sought to probe the most philosophically vexing issues of theology, while the new discipline limited itself to those points where religious questions link up with other human concerns: the meaning of language about God, the problem of evil, and similar questions. See also philosophy and theology; theology.

Phocas of Sinope, St., possibly fourth century, martyr and patron saint of gardeners. His name is surrounded by legend, and he is sometimes made into three different saints (Phocas of Antioch, Phocas of Sinope, and Phocas the gardener). Because of the confusion, it is impossible to cite one single feast day; it is most commonly given as September 22 or July 14.

Phos hilaron (faws hee-lah-rahn'; Gk., "O joyous light"), opening words of the "hymn of light" sung at Byzantine-rite Vespers in honor of Christ, the Light of the World. Called the "thanksgiving for the light," it was already considered ancient in the fourth century. See also Vespers.

Photius, ca. 810–ca. 893, courtier, scholar, and patriarch of Constantinople. When the patriarch Ignatius of Constantinople opposed Bardas, uncle and chief minister of the young emperor Michael III, he was soon exiled. The brilliant aristocratic civil servant Photius, a layman, was quickly tonsured, ordained, and installed on the patriarchal throne (Christmas, 858). Ignatius, however, claimed that he had been deprived of his see without sanction of a Church council; Pope Nicholas I consequently refused to recognize Photius. So began the Photian Schism between East and West. The basic problem was aggravated by attempts of the Bulgar khan to play Rome and Constantinople off against each other, by political rivalries between the Frankish emperor and the Byzantine, and by long-standing disagreements about papal authority over the patriarch. In the end, however, palace politics were decisive. In 867, Michael's favorite (and coemperor), Basil, murdered both Bardas and Michael and, as sole ruler, exiled Photius and recalled the elderly Ignatius. In 874, Photius was recalled and given a post in the palace; when Ignatius died in 875, Photius succeeded unchallenged to the patriarchate. In 887, Basil's son, Leo VI, accused Photius of conspiracy; exiled a second time, he died in retirement. Feast day: February 6 (East). See also Constantinople.

physical person [canon law], an individual who is the subject of rights and duties in Church law. The 1983 Code of Canon Law addresses itself to members of the Catholic Church and those seeking membership in the Catholic Church. Non-Catholics are affected at those points where they interact with Catholics, e.g., marriage situations.

physico-theologies, seventeenth- and eighteenth-century tracts for God's existence based on the new mechanical science. Each tract, e.g., Robert Boyle's A Disquisition About the Final Causes of Natural Things (1688), attributed to divine intervention phenomena believed to be inexplicable by the new mechanics. Advances in mechanics, and especially widespread acceptance of Darwin's evolutionary theory, undermined this movement in natural theology.

Pico della Mirandola, Giovanni, 1463–94, Italian humanist and mystical writer. An accomplished linguist, he was the first scholar to seek in the Jewish Cabbala a way of access to the meaning of the Christian mysteries. In part to reconcile humanism with Scholasticism, he developed a set of some nine hundred theses on a great variety of religious topics, but when Pope Innocent VIII found many of them to be heretical, Pico abandoned the project. He died soon after being received into the Dominican order by Girolamo Savonarola (d. 1598), a Dominican preacher and reformer who would later be tortured and hanged as a heretic.

Pierozzi, St. Antony. See Antoninus of Florence, St.

Pierre d'Ailly. See d'Ailly, Pierre.

pietà (pee-ay-tah'; It., "pity"), artistic depiction of the Virgin Mary holding the dead Christ after his body is taken down from the cross. The most famous is Michelangelo's marble sculpture in St. Peter's Basilica in the Vatican. See also Michelangelo.

Pietism, reform movement in Protestantism that focused on personal devotion and experience, ethical conversion, literal interpretation of the Bible, and the imitation of models from primitive Christianity (e.g., small groups, especially in the beginning, met in homes). Characteristics like these often led to opposition by Church authority; separatism was a constant temptation.

Pietism has been linked with the publication in 1675 of the Pia Desideria by the Lutheran Philip Spener (1635–1705). The beginnings and expression of Pietism, however, were more diverse and more widespread than Spener's Lutheran version. The original impulses of Pietism were effective through the late seventeenth century and the first half of the eighteenth century. Associated with early Pietism were August Francke (1663–1727), Friedrich Lampe (1683–1705), and Count Nikolas von Zinzendorf (1700–1760). The last named influenced the formation of the Moravian Brethren at Herrnhut.

Pietism has had a lasting impact on Protestantism to this day. Modern interest in Pietism has brought considerable refinement of its varieties, affinities, and exponents. Pietism opposed and was influenced by the Enlightenment. Moravian Pietism had an effect on John and Charles Wesley and subsequent Methodism. Pietism was a major force in the formation of American Protestantism, and the Pietist tradition shaped the thought of the influential theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834). See also Enlightenment, the; Methodism; Protestantism; Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst.

La Pietà (the Blessed Virgin Mary cradling the crucified body of her Son), Michelangelo's masterpiece in St. Peter's Basilica, Rome.

piety (Lat., pietas, "dutifulness"), a virtue that calls for faithfulness in relationships to others, e.g., to family and kin (familial piety) and to country (patriotism). Piety is also one of the gifts of the Holy Spirit. This gift moves a person to venerate God with generosity and affection and to be responsible in one's relationships with others. Sometimes the words "piety" and "pious" describe devotional practices. "Piety" and "pious" have also been used pejoratively as indications of insincerity, hypocrisy, or religiosity, but these are caricatures of authentic piety, which is expressed with gladness. See also gifts of the Holy Spirit.

Pighi, Albert, ca. 1490–1542, Dutch theologian and humanist. An opponent of Luther and champion of papal infallibility, he participated in the effort at reunion with the Protestants at Ratisbon (1541).

Pignatelli, St. Joseph, 1737–1811, Spanish Jesuit who lived for forty years in exile in Italy after the Jesuits' expulsion from Spain. Following the suppression of the Society of Jesus in 1773, Pignatelli worked tirelessly for its restoration. He was made provincial of Italy in 1803; he died three years before the order was fully restored. Feast day: November 28.

pilgrimage, a religiously motivated journey to a specific location to visit a holy person or to commemorate a special event that occurred there. The journey to and from this special place, along with the stay, comprise the pilgrimage.

Three requisites constitute an authentic pilgrimage: (1) the belief that God responds to prayer, (2) the conviction that God is present at holy sites, and (3) the desire to make a sacred journey to a holy site. People undertake pilgrimages to seek guidance for direction in life, to thank God for favors received, to petition God for spiritual and physical favors, or to atone for sin.

The practice of pilgrimage has often been regarded with skepticism in the Christian tradition. Early Christianity considered it a form of pagan worship. However, with the legalization of Christianity in the fourth century, resulting in an upsurge of public devotions, pilgrimage became popular. Once pilgrimages became fashionable they played a considerable role in influencing liturgical practices. For example, the procession of palms and veneration of the cross were brought to the West by pilgrims to Jerusalem, where these practices had originated. Devotion to Mary, Mother of God, developed when pilgrimages to the sites of Jesus' life were undertaken. In the Middle Ages, Christian crusaders were sent by popes and Catholic temporal rulers to the Holy Land to win back the holy places from the Muslims so that pilgrims could visit them safely once again.

The Church promoted pilgrimages to Jerusalem, Rome, and Santiago de Compostela as a form of penance. The spirit of exile imposed by the journey was meant to be a deterrent against future sins that might place one in a permanent state of exile from heaven. From ascetical-spiritual perspectives, extended pilgrimages were more a form of flight from the world. Like the hermits of the desert, the pilgrim left home and possessions and all superficial concerns.

Contemporary spirituality fosters the notion of an inner journey, but this is not a new concept. Philosophers and spiritual writers such as Boethius, Bonaventure, Teresa of Ávila, and John of the Cross advocated interior ascents or descents within the inner self to find God. The symbolic interpretation of life on earth as a pilgrimage enables the Church to see itself on a journey to the heavenly Jerusalem. See also Egeria, Pilgrimage of; People of God; pilgrim Church. PATRICIA M. VINJE pilgrim Church, an expression emphasizing the transitory, changeable, and imperfect phase of the Church's life on earth as it moves through history on its way toward the final kingdom of God.

pious association. See associations of the Christian faithful.

pious foundation, endowment established for works of religion or charity. Such a foundation is governed by a number of norms in canon law. These norms reflect concern that the foundation be under proper Church supervision in order that the donor's wishes be respected. See also foundations.

pious union. See associations of the Christian faithful.

pious will. See wills [canon law].

Pisa, Council of, 1409–10, first of three reform councils (the others are Constance and Basel) dealing with the crisis of papal authority provoked by the Great Schism (1378–1417). Cardinals from the Roman (Gregory XII) and Avignon (Benedict XIII) obediences convened the council (1409) without papal approval. Approximately 200 prelates, 287 abbots, and 700 theologians supported the council, which declared Gregory and Benedict deposed (June 5) and elected Peter of Candia as Pope Alexander V (June 26). Supporters of the other claimants refused to recognize the validity of Alexander's election. Pisa had failed to end the Great Schism and had indeed complicated matters further, because now there were three rival popes rather than two. The crisis was resolved at the Council of Constance (1414–18), which deposed Alexander's successor, John XXIII, brought about the resignation of Gregory, and elected Martin V. The third claimant, Benedict, fled. See also Great Schism.

Pius I, St., d. ca. 155, pope from ca. 142 to ca. 155. He was perhaps native to Aquileia, perhaps a brother of Hermas, author of the Shepherd. Evidence for Pius's martyrdom, like all else about him, is uncertain. Feast day: July 11. See also Hermas, Shepherd of.

Pius II [Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini], 1405–64, Renaissance pope from 1458 to 1464. Born in Pienza (near Siena), Italy, he was a conciliarist and renowned humanist. He served antipope Felix V at the Council of Basel and then the emperor Frederick III in Germany (1442), where he defended Roman superiority in letters and civilization against German humanists. As pope, Pius II abandoned his earlier conciliarism and decisively strengthened papal power in the bull Execrabilis (1460), which prohibited any appeal of papal decisions to a future council. He encouraged the patronage of arts and letters and the lavish pageantry popularly associated with the Renaissance papacy.

Pius IV [Gian Angelo Medici], 1499–1565, pope from 1559 to 1565. His most important achievement was in reconvening the Council of Trent (1562), suspended since 1552, and bringing it to a successful conclusion (1563). He published a new edition of the Index of Forbidden Books, approved Communion under both kinds (consecrated bread and wine) for the laity of Germany, Austria, Hungary, and other regions where Protestantism was strong, and initiated work on the Roman Catechism to be based on the "Profession of the Tridentine Faith." See also Trent, Council of.

Pius V, St. [Antonio Ghislieri], 1504–72, Dominican Counter-Reformation pope from 1566 to 1572. He served the Inquisition in Milan and Bergamo. Elected pope with the support of Charles Borromeo, Pius made monastic austerity a model for Counter-Reformation Rome. He strengthened the Index of Forbidden Books, the Roman Inquisition, and carried through the reforms of the Council of Trent. He also published the Roman Catechism (1566), the Roman Breviary (1568), the Roman Missal (1570), and a new edition of Thomas Aquinas's works (1570). Pius excommunicated Queen Elizabeth I of England and promoted the military alliance with Spain and Venice that defeated Turkish naval power at Lepanto (1571). He was canonized in 1712 by Pope Clement XI. Feast day: April 30. See also Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation.

Pius VI [Giovanni Braschi], 1717–99, pope from 1775 to 1799. His was one of the longest pontificates in history, but at its end many thought the papacy had reached its nadir. He died in exile, having been removed from Rome by French Napoleonic forces. Throughout his pontificate, Pius had difficulties with various temporal powers as secularism, atheism, and nationalism grew: the kingdom of Naples, the Austrian emperor Joseph II, and especially France following the Revolution of 1789. In 1786, when he tried to establish a nunciature at Munich, even the German bishops defied him on the grounds that they did not want any intervention from Rome. After the invasion of the Papal States by Napoleon in 1796, the pope was forced to hand over valuable manuscripts, artworks, and a substantial portion of his territories, and then formally to recognize the new French Republic. See also Febronianism; Gallicanism; Josephinism.

Pius VII [Luigi Barnaba Chiaramonti], 1742–1823, pope from 1800 to 1823. He was one of the first popes to oppose modernity. Forced to give concessions to Napoleon in areas of French church life, he nonetheless furthered the period of the Romanticist restoration of Catholicism by encouraging tolerance of some modern approaches and ideas, by expanding Asian missions, and by encouraging priestly education and pastoral life in the aftermath of the secularizing Enlightenment. He worked to make Rome a center of culture through restored and new museums and schools. See also Romanticism.

Pius IX [Giovanni Mastai-Ferretti], 1792–1878, longest-reigning pope in history, from 1846 to 1878. His pontificate was characterized by civil and religious controversy. By nature a warm and open person, Pius began his pontificate with a positive attitude toward the political and economic changes that swept over Europe during the first half of the nineteenth century. But the revolution in Italy and in Rome itself, along with the nationalistic confrontation between Italians and Austrians, compromised Pius's position. Unable to take sides in a nationalistic dispute, Pius saw his popularity with the Italian people vanish almost overnight. Forced to leave Rome late in 1848, Pius was able to return only after the Austrian army overthrew revolutionary governments in the provinces and when French expeditionary forces defeated the new Roman Republic in the city of Rome itself in 1850. In the opinions of Italians the papacy had stood in the way of national unification. The Papal States straddled the country from west to east, making a union between northern and southern Italy impossible. In the years that followed his restoration, however, Pius saw his worldly sovereignty over the entire "Patrimony of St. Peter" (Papal States) evaporate as one church province after another chose to become part of the new Italian nation. In 1859 Rome itself was left unprotected by the French, at which time it, too, joined Italy. The future of the pope's earthly sovereignty over the Papal States—the so-called "Roman Question"—remained unresolved for the rest of Pius's pontificate and for the rest of the nineteenth century. Pius refused to recognize the new Italy and forbade the Italian faithful to participate in it.

Pope Pius IX, the longest-reigning pope in history (1846–78), who promulgated the dogmas of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (1854) and of papal infallibility (1870).

Corresponding to his turn to political conservatism, Pius's church leadership tended toward the reactionary. In contrast to the nineteenth century's trend toward shared political power, Pius centralized the Church and asserted his own authority over that of other bishops. This culminated in the calling of the First Vatican Council (1869–70) and in its declaration of the dogma of papal infallibility. Reaction to the dogma was immediate and massive. Austria disclaimed its Concordat with the Vatican. Religious confrontations broke out in Switzerland. A minority of the faithful broke off from Rome, formed their own church, and became known as the "Old Catholics." The pronouncement on infallibility helped kindle the Kulturkampf (church-state political struggle) in Germany. Already incensed over Pius's earlier document, "The Syllabus of Errors" (1864), which condemned many tenets of nineteenth-century Liberalism, such as freedom of speech and of religion, German liberals joined forces with the conservative, Protestant chancellor Otto von Bismarck in an all-out attack upon the Church. The controversy was centered in Prussia, the largest German state, whose population counted the second highest number of Catholics, but spread as well to other central European states. Only the death of Pius allowed the Kulturkampf to subside.

A second Church dogma, the Immaculate Conception of Mary (1854), also emerged from Pius's pontificate. This teaching gave encouragement to the strong Marian movement in France and beyond. The Confraternity of the Immaculate Conception spread with alacrity throughout the Western hemisphere. Thus, Pius laid the foundation for the broad development of Marian devotion in the twentieth century.

In other Church teachings Pius was equally conservative. Shunning modernity and the new scientific and religious ideas that developed during the nineteenth century, Pius also laid the foundation for the neo-Scholastic emphasis in Church teaching that dominated much of the twentieth century.

Although unpopular with the educated, Pius IX enjoyed support among the masses, who recognized his sincerity and his pastoral and spiritual concern, even in the midst of great temporal upheavals. Pius died amid the controversy that his leadership had brought to the Church in Italy and on the Continent. See also Immaculate Conception; infallibility; Kulturkampf; Syllabus of Errors; Vatican Council I.

MICHAEL PHAYER

Pius X, St. [Giuseppe Sarto], 1835–1914, anti-Modernist pope from 1903 to 1914. A parish priest, seminary spiritual director, bishop of Mantua (1884–93), and patriarch of Venice (1893–1903), he inclined more toward the inner life than toward Church leadership. Concentrating on problems within the Church, he showed little interest in pursuing or expanding the contacts with society established by his predecessor, Leo XIII. Unsympathetic toward the Orthodox churches, rigidly opposed to cultural adaptation in the missions, and tireless in securing political rights for the Church, he developed the public image of a man of prejudice and negation. Hostile to democracy in Italy and the United States, he argued for support of the poor while at the same time weakening the labor movement. He saw the ensemble of philosophical and biblical trends the Vatican came to call "Modernism" as dangerous to Christian revelation and the Church and was convinced that modern forms of culture were generally irreconcilable with Catholicism. This attitude produced a flood of measures: condemnations of individuals (Herman Schell) and of movements (Le Sillon in France). At the same time he tolerated the right-wing, monarchist movement Action Française.

Pope Pius X, early-twentieth-century pope well known for his personal sanctity and his encouragement of frequent reception of Holy Communion. He was also responsible for the harsh repression of Catholic scholarship that set the Church's intellectual life back nearly fifty years, until the pontificate of John XXIII (1958–63) and the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

The decree Lamentabili and the encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis (1907) became the central documents of several anti-Modernist campaigns and remained influential until Vatican II (1962–65). These documents opposed the reduction of revelation to logic or human consciousness, the absorption of the event of Christ in the flow and laws of history, and the replacement of Church authority by democracy. To enforce these views he established a secret network of informers whose reports on theologians, historians, and biblical scholars led in many cases to dismissal from their teaching positions.

Other Vatican measures were similarly ill informed, such as the conscious ignoring of the pastoral leader of the Church in the United States, John Ireland, or the inflammatory encyclical on Charles Borromeo, which, because of its vulgar polemics against German Protestantism, was quickly withdrawn. On the positive side the pope established realistic relationships with Italy, proposed Christian measures for the improvement of society, insisted upon a deeper spiritual formation for priests, and worked for improved preaching, more suitable liturgical books, and a restoration of Church music (Gregorian chant in particular). He reformed aspects of the central administration of the Church and initiated the process for the codification of canon law in 1917. He became popular as the "pope of frequent Communion" and is remembered for having lowered the age for First Communion to the "age of discretion" (approximately seven). He was canonized in 1954. Feast day: August 21. See also Modernism.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

Pius XI [Ambrogio Achille Ratti], 1857–1939, pope from 1922 to 1939. A seminary professor, librarian, and diplomat, he was cardinal-archbishop of Milan when elected to the papacy. Strongly opposed to modern liberalism, communism, and secularism, Pius XI turned to fascism in the hope of increasing the influence of the Church on modern-day life and out of fear of communism. He signed agreements or concordats with both of the most successful and notorious twentieth-century fascist leaders, Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini.

The Concordat with Italy allowed Pius to reach a favorable solution to the "Roman Question," the name given to the conflict between Church and state in Italy since 1870, when Italian forces occupied Rome and incorporated the city into the new Italian state. The 1929 Lateran Accords gave the pope sovereignty over Vatican City, a small enclave within the city of Rome itself. Furthermore, many anticlerical laws were repealed and religious instruction in secondary schools became obligatory. In return, the Church recognized Italy as a kingdom with Rome as its capital and did not object to Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia or to Italy's antidemocratic intervention in the Spanish Civil War.

Pope Pius XI, who signed the Lateran Treaty with Mussolini in 1929, walking in the Vatican Garden to the rear of St. Peter's Basilica.

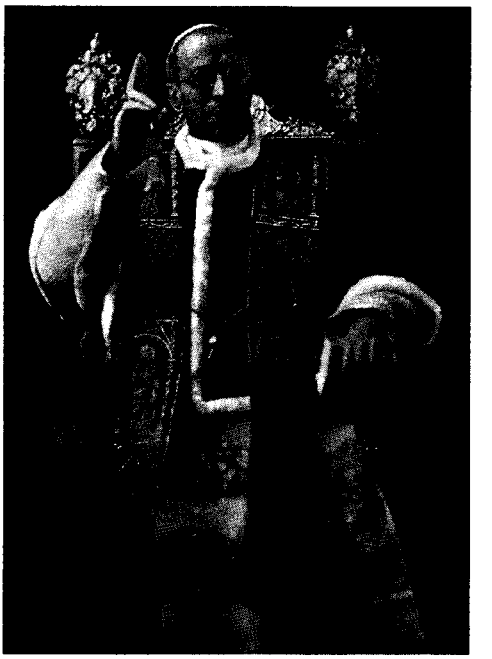
During the 1930s Pius became critical of anti-Christian aspects of fascism and, specifically, of its racism. Pius is celebrated for his denunciation of Nazi excesses in the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (1937). Written largely by the cardinal-archbishop of Munich, Michael Faulhaber, the letter soured the already difficult relationship between Hitler and the Church in Germany when it was publicly read in churches throughout the country in March 1937.

Pius took at least four important steps to increase Christian influence over modern life: (1) He invited greater lay initiative and participation in the life of the Church through the Catholic Action movement. (2) He emphasized Christian social teachings in his encyclical Quadragesimo Anno, published in 1931, in the midst of the worldwide economic depression. (3) He doubled the number of missionaries by requiring every religious order to engage in missionary work, and founded a faculty of missiology at the Gregorian University in Rome. (4) He promoted science and scholarship, founding the Pontifical Institute of Christian Archaeology in 1925 and the Pontifical Academy of Sciences in 1936. He also installed a radio station in the Vatican in 1931 and was the first pope to use radio for pastoral purposes. See also Fascism; Lateran Treaty; Nazism.

MICHAEL PHAYER

Pius XII [Eugenio Pacelli], 1876–1958, pope from 1939 to 1958. Ordained in 1899, he entered the papal service two years later, working on the codification of canon law while teaching international law at the school for papal diplomats in Rome. In the midst of the First World War, he became nuncio to Bavaria in 1917 and to the new German Republic in 1920, subsequently forging concordats with Bavaria and Prussia. As papal secretary of state (1930–39), he also fashioned concordats with Austria and National Socialist Germany (the latter was repeatedly violated by Adolf Hitler, and relations with the Church deteriorated). With the world on the verge of another war, he was elected pope on the third ballot in a one-day conclave, the first secretary of state chosen as pope since 1667. Dedicating his pontificate to the cause of peace, two months after his election he called for an international conference to settle differences. His pontificate faced the problem of dealing directly with many authoritarian regimes: the Italian state, Nazism and various other fascisms, as well as Communism.



Pope Pius XII, although somewhat aloof, one of the most prominent of the twentieth-century popes, having governed the Church during the Second World War and prepared the way for the reforms of the Second Vatican Council through his encyclicals on the renewal of biblical studies, the liturgy, and the Church.

The Pope and the Germans: While living in Germany during the 1920s as nuncio, Pacelli came to admire German culture and German Catholicism. A known Germanophile, he would later as pope choose Germans as his close advisers and confidants. The future pope was less familiar with the U.S. Catholic Church, although he traveled through the United States in 1936. The trip also provided the opportunity for Pacelli to make the acquaintance of President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

His respect for things German kept him from recognizing the dangerous rise and then ruthless oppression of Hitler; his generous financial support of refugees and Jews was counterbalanced by a reluctance to denounce the Axis enslavement as forcefully as demanded. Uppermost in the mind of Pius XII (as with Pius XI) was the need to preserve the benefits that previous concordats with Germany had won, but the signing of a new concordat at the beginning of Hitler's chancellorship lent the German leader international prestige.

The question regarding the attitude of Pius XII toward the Nazi persecution of the Jews did not arise until after his death. His supporters pointed to his efforts to rescue Italian Jews through financial assistance and by dispensing with Church regulations so that Jews could be hidden in ecclesiastical institutions, including monasteries. On the other hand, he did not speak out plainly regarding atrocities but only in general terms (the style, for example, of his otherwise strong Christmas address of 1942). Even before the end of the war the pope challenged the notion of the collective guilt of the German people, and the appearance of the Cold War soon after 1945 seemed to confirm Pius's view of Germany as a bulwark against Communism.

The Pope and Church Renewal: Pius adopted a moderate attitude toward modernity's relationship to the Church; he approved a limited use of the historical-critical method for biblical studies (Divino Afflante Spiritu, 1943), a modest beginning for the liturgical movement (Mediator Dei, 1947), and a theology of the Church that promoted positive relationships with nonbelievers (Mystici Corporis, 1943). At the same time, he held himself aloof from ecumenism and from any theology in dialogue with modern philosophy. He did not appreciate the intellectual need within Catholic life to pass beyond the simple categories of neo-Scholasticism and the false dichotomies between grace and world (the "new theology" in France, censored in the encyclical Humani Generis, 1950). He did not grasp the dramatic effects of secularization in Europe in the twentieth century (e.g., the further loss of working classes), and he was unsympathetic toward new pastoral theologies ranging from religious education to the use of abstract art. He used personal appearances, radio, and newsreels to contact millions of people; his addresses, invested with varying levels of papal formality and authority, brought Catholic ideas to bear on a large number of topics ranging from architecture to sports. He worked tirelessly for the expansion of institutions conducted by members of religious orders, particularly schools. His efforts to hold back Communism in Eastern Europe were unrelenting, but he distinguished between the subjected peoples in their culture and religion and the atheist ideology forced upon them. His many writings and addresses on Mary found their climax in the infallible proclamation in 1950 of her Assumption into heaven.

Having presided over an extraordinary growth of the Church throughout the world, Pius XII must be seen as one of the most powerful popes in modern history. Despite the tightly centralized mode of Church authority, his authoritarian personality did not reject the emergence of democracies and secular institutions, and he gained considerable credibility and influence for the papacy and the Church among non-Catholic powers throughout the world. This was strengthened and advanced by three facets of an immature theology: the presentation of his own person as an aloof "Holy Father"; the theology of his office as the basic and immediate pastor for every Catholic; and the implication that the charism of infallibility was easily accessible to all of his major decisions.

At the same time he prepared for the theological event of Vatican II (1962–65) by furthering Catholic intellectual life, by multiplying dioceses (the number rose from 1,696 to 2,048), by appointing numerous native bishops in Asia and Africa, and by internationalizing the College of Cardinals. See also Jews, Catholicism and. THOMAS F. O'MEARA placet (plah'chet; Lat., "it is pleasing"), affirmative response or vote given to a particular proposal, nomination, or proposition. In some circumstances the word refers to a vote cast in a collegial body such as an ecumenical council; in other circumstances it refers to an approval given by proper authority.

Placet iuxta modum (plah'chet yooks'tah moh' doom; Lat., "it is pleasing to a certain extent"), conditional affirmation given to a particular proposal, nomination, or proposition.

plate. See paten.

Plato, d. ca. 347 B.C., familiar name of Aristocles, ancient Greek philosopher. Plato wrote thirteen letters and twenty-seven dialogues, of which Apology, Phaedo, Republic, and Timaeus are the most popular. The dialogue style enabled him to present the different views held by philosophers of his time and to draw readers into thinking through their own philosophical positions. A fictionalized Socrates is his spokesman and model philosopher. A sequential arrangement of his dialogues shows the beginning, development, and critique of a philosophical system. There is a hint of a secret and unwritten philosophy.

The main features of Plato's philosophy can be summarized thus: Truth emerges in ongoing dialogue; knowledge is contrasted with unreflective opinion, and is arrived at by questioning (the Socratic method); the sensible world of experience is a limited imitation of, and participation in, a higher world of eternal ideas or forms. Plato used myth to suggest that the human soul possessed these ideas in a previous existence but forgot them when it descended into a human body. Learning is the gradual recovery, usually through questioning, of these innate ideas (theory of reminiscence). Education prepares the soul to free itself from the tyranny of the senses and rise to philosophical insight (dialectic). These ideas laid the foundation for liberal education in the West.

Ethics is the major concern in the early dialogues, including the Socratic Dialogues, Protagoras, and Republic. Plato argued that virtue is knowledge; growth in virtue is growth in the understanding of ethical ideas (values); on the other hand, moral failure is not a matter of will but of ignorance. The good state models the good man; justice is the proper functioning of various social classes and groups: workers, warriors, philosophers. The proper virtues of the philosophers are temperance, fortitude, and wisdom (cardinal virtues). Therefore, the king should be a philosopher who has knowledge of ideas, especially the idea of the good, the highest in the hierarchy of ideas and cause of all being and all knowledge. The ascent to the good begins in the love (eros) of beauty. Though a mythmaker himself, Plato criticizes the works of imagination (poetry, art) because they stand between the soul and the ideas (mathematics, values, being, the real world).

The human soul is eternal, and though it does not remember its previous existence, it desires to be free of the body and return to its origins and the world of ideas. The soul alone, using the body and its organs as an instrument, like a boatman using a boat or a rider using a horse, forms the essence of the human being. Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.), a pupil of Plato, reacted against the philosophy of ideas and developed a philosophy that relied more fundamentally on sensible experience. Religious thought in the West, particularly Christian thought, has swung back and forth between Plato and Aristotle even to modern times. Later Platonists, preeminently Plotinus (ca. A.D. 200), developed a synthesis of Plato, Aristotle, and the Stoics called Neoplatonism, which heavily influenced the philosophy of early Christianity, the Middle Ages, and much of modern philosophy. Christian leaders in the development of Neoplatonism were Augustine (d. 430), Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (d. ca. 500), and Bonaventure (d. 1274). Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) gave a strong Aristotelian twist to this development, which formed much of Renaissance Scholasticism in the sixteenth century and neo-Scholastic philosophy between 1879 and Vatican Council II (1962–65). See also Neoplatonism.

ROBERT F. HARVANEK

pleasure, any form of joy, satisfaction, or gratification at the anticipation or attainment of something good. In this sense, pleasure can be not only morally neutral but morally good, e.g., if it accompanies virtuous activity. In a more restricted sense, pleasure is understood as the sensual gratification of one of our basic appetites, e.g., for food or sexual intercourse. Even in this sense, pleasure in itself has been viewed as morally neutral, but some theologians have viewed it with suspicion as an inducement to sin. Others have viewed even physical pleasure as morally desirable when it accompanies morally praiseworthy actions. See also concupiscence; passions.

plenary council, an ecclesiastical assembly, convoked by the conference of bishops, with authority to enact particular law for the dioceses of a nation. Only bishops have a deliberative vote in the council, although others participate. Three plenary councils were held in Baltimore, Maryland, in the latter half of the nineteenth century. See also council; ecumenical council.

plenary indulgence, forgiveness of all temporal punishment due to sin, often conferred at the moment of death, and related to the sinner's prior prayers and good works. The idea of a plenary indulgence derives from the time of Urban II, who granted plenary indulgences (1095) to those who took part in the Crusades. Alexander II may have also granted plenary indulgences (ca. 1063) to those Christians fighting the Saracens. Boniface VIII in 1300 extended plenary indulgences to those Christians who took part in the first "holy year" by making a pilgrimage to the Roman basilicas. At the time of Vatican II (1962–65), Paul VI restricted plenary indulgences to those Christians who rejected all sin, including venial sin. See also indulgences.

plenitude of power (Lat., plenitudo potestatis), fullness of power exercised by the pope in religious matters, compared to the partial power of other bishops. First used by Pope Leo I (440–61), the term refers, according to Vatican I (1869–70), to the pope's legal authority over other bishops. See also papacy, the.

pleroma (Gk., "fullness" or "totality"), a theological term used by early Christian and Gnostic writers. In Paul, pleroma describes the fullness of divinity in Jesus (Col 2:9). Later Christian writers, notably Origen and Tertullian, applied it to the fullness of divine revelation experienced by Christian faith.

Plessington, St. John, d. 1679, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Ordained in Spain in 1662 and sent to England the next year, he was hanged at Chester in 1679 as a member of the popish "plot" against the king. Feast day: July 19. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Plotinus, ca. 205–70, first of the Neoplatonist philosophers. A Greek who studied under Ammonius Saccas, Plotinus developed from the Platonic system his own metaphysics that was the basis of his mysticism. For him the human ascent or return to the source of all being culminates in the presence of the One. Contemplation or ecstasy is for Plotinus the highest of human activities, not totally a work of grace as Augustine would teach. His pupil Porphyry posthumously edited the six Enneads of Plotinus. Christian thinkers like Augustine of Hippo and Denys the Areopagite found the mysticism of Plotinus congenial, adapting it to fit their own articulation of Christian mysticism. See also Neoplatonism.

Plunket, St. Oliver, 1629–81, Irish bishop and martyr. After studies at the Irish College in Rome and ordination (1649), he taught at the Propaganda Fide College in Rome until he left for Ireland as archbishop of Armagh in 1669. An indefatigable pastor, he was arrested as a conspirator against the crown after the Titus Oates plot and was imprisoned in Newgate jail (London) for three years. Falsely accused, he was executed for high treason in 1681. He was canonized in 1976. Feast day: July 1. See also Ireland, Catholicism in.

pluralism, in moral theology, the existence of disagreement concerning the method and/or content of moral reflection. Ethical pluralism is largely a product of cultural or social pluralism. New moral problems may also generate ethical pluralism while the Church investigates their implications and attempts to develop new moral norms to address them. Pluralism itself has become a matter of disagreement in recent times; some theologians and other Church members believe ethical pluralism to be disruptive of the unity that ought to characterize the Catholic community, while others consider tolerance of disagreement to be compatible with unity at a deeper level. Similarly, some Church members are concerned that the faithful will be confused by the multiplicity of opinions on moral matters; others view ethical pluralism as a necessary stage in the process of growth in understanding. Moral theologians who consider ethical pluralism healthy often attribute suspicion of pluralism to a confusion of levels of moral discourse. These theologians argue that legitimate disagreement on the applicability of general moral norms to specific cases need not imply disagreement on the norms themselves. Disagreement about the validity of ethical pluralism is thus often a disagreement about the level of moral discourse at which Christian unity ought to be located. See also moral theology.

pneumatology (Gk., "study of the Spirit"), the branch of systematic theology that deals with the Person and work of the Holy Spirit. While biblical references to the Holy Spirit are important sources for pneumatology, the discipline itself cannot be said to have developed prior to the fourth century, when a controversy arose over the divinity of the Holy Spirit. See also Holy Spirit.

Pneumatomachians (noo-mah-toh-mahk'ee-uhns; Gk., "fighters of the Spirit"), a term used to designate Christians, otherwise orthodox, who in the second half of the fourth century denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit. They are also called Macedonians, after Macedonius (bishop of Constantinople ca. 342–60), perhaps the first to explicitly defend this position. See also Holy Spirit.

Poland, Catholicism in. Beginning with the introduction of Christianity in the territories of the western Slavs in the tenth century by missionaries aligned with Rome, the fortunes of the Catholic Church have closely mirrored those of Poland itself. Championed initially by the nobility, the Catholic religion in time completely displaced the native paganism, and for most of the past thousand years Catholics have formed the overwhelming majority of the population. While Poland, and its church, has enjoyed periods of great prosperity—especially under the leadership of strong kings in the later Middle Ages, when Polish intellectuals and churchmen played prominent roles in the broader cultural and religious life of Western Christendom—the country has suffered greatly throughout much of its history, with severe repercussions for the Catholic Church.

Poland's great misfortune has been its close proximity to powerful nations with expansionist tendencies. The late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries brought the partition of Poland at the hands of Prussia, Russia, and Austria, and it was only at the end of World War I (1918) that Poland regained its independence, only to lose it again with the German invasion that initiated World War II. The years under foreign rule imposed severe hardships on the Polish people and the Catholic Church. While the Austrian conquerors tended to leave their coreligionists in peace, the religious commitments of Poles under the rule of Protestant Prussians and the Orthodox Russians were repeatedly put to the test. Nevertheless, foreign oppression did not defeat the Polish people, and, aided immeasurably by the spiritual and intellectual resources of the Church, a distinctive Polish identity has emerged unscathed. A more serious challenge than foreign occupation to the continued fidelity of the people to the Church came from within during the Reformation, when factions among the nobility adopted different sides in the great religious conflict of the age as part of the struggle for power in Poland. The attraction of the Protestant cause, strong in some quarters for much of the sixteenth century, in the end proved fleeting and Poland has been steadfastly Catholic ever since.

Piety: A special mark of Polish Catholic piety has been the vibrant devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary, who is seen as the protectress of Poland. Most prominent of the many Marian shrines that dot the countryside is that of the "Black Mother of God" at Czestochowa, the icon credited with saving its monastery from foreign attack in 1655. Thousands travel yearly to this and to other shrines to express their gratitude and to seek Mary's favor. Providing structure to such religious expressions is the Polish ecclesiastical hierarchy, which has demonstrated a remarkable resiliency, going underground during the worst oppression, but quickly reemerging and expanding when conditions became more favorable. Even under Communist rule after World War II, the Polish hierarchy was well articulated and widespread: over seventy bishops distributed over a number of ecclesiastical provinces, and thousands of priests and nuns, now serve the pastoral needs of the people.

Modern Period: The history of Poland from the onset of World War II (1939) to the present encapsulates the suffering and the glory of the country, underscoring as well the centrality of the Catholic Church in the maintenance of Polish identity. World War II brought unprecedented brutality. Millions of Poles died during the war, including most of the sizable pre-war Jewish population in the Nazi death camps. Recovery after the war was slow and the establishment of a Communist government in Poland, closely tied to the Soviet Union, created new challenges for both the people and the Church. The early years of Communist rule were marked by persecution of Catholics and their leaders. Eventually, however, the Church was able to work out a more tolerable mode of coexistence with the state. More recent events have disclosed the irrepressible vitality of Catholicism in Poland. The election in 1978 of the first Slav pope, Cardinal-Archbishop Karol Wojtyla of Cracow as John Paul II, was a matter of enormous national pride and itself provided a stimulus to the growing political and social reform movement in Poland. The success of the reformers in overthrowing Communist rule and establishing democratic institutions was in no small measure due to the alliance between the reformers, especially those in the Solidarity labor movement, and the leaders in the Church. The coming years promise new challenges, as the Polish people attempt to develop a society that avoids the pitfalls of both their former Communism and the excesses of capitalism of the West. On the basis of its history it seems clear that the Catholic Church will continue to play a leading role in the life of Poland.

In 1994 there were almost 37 million Catholics in Poland, comprising more than 96 percent of the total population. There are fourteen archdioceses and twenty-six dioceses. See also Czestochowa, Our Lady of.

JOSEPH WAWRYKOW

Pole, Reginald, 1500–58, archbishop of Canterbury and humanist. Opposed to the divorce of Henry VIII and shocked by the executions of Thomas More and John Fisher, Pole wrote a treatise censuring the king, which led to the imprisonment of his family and the execution of his mother. Made cardinal in 1536, Pole sought unsuccessfully to mediate between Protestant and Catholic views of justification, both as councilor of Contarini at Ratisbon (1541) and as legate to the Council of Trent (1545). Sent by Pope Julius III as legate to England in 1553, Pole absolved Parliament of schism in 1554 and was made archbishop of Canterbury in 1556. He died in 1558, caught between the policies of the pope and Mary Tudor. See also England, Catholicism in; Mary Tudor.

Polish National Church, late-nineteenth-century schismatic group. Struggles between Polish ethnic parishes and their non-Polish hierarchy led, in 1897, to a breakaway Polish parish in Scranton, Pennsylvania. The divisive issues were not doctrinal but questions of jurisdiction and ethnic pride. Other parishes joined the dissidents, with the pastor eventually receiving episcopal ordination from an Old Catholic prelate. In this century there eventually grew a national church movement with approximately a quarter of a million members and an outreach into Poland itself. After World War II the church made ecumenical links with both the National Council of Churches and the World Council of Churches. In the late 1980s ecumenical conversations began with Catholic authorities.

politics. See Church and state.

Polycarp of Smyrna, St., ca. 69–ca. 155/6, bishop of Smyrna. A disciple of John, according to Irenaeus, he bridged the apostolic age and the second century. His Letter to the Philippians gives early witness to certain NT writings. The Martyrdom of Polycarp records his execution at Smyrna. Feast day: February 23. See also apostolic age; Apostolic Fathers.

polyglot Bibles, printed Bibles in which the Hebrew and Greek biblical text is accompanied by translations in several languages. The first was the Complutensian Polyglot (1521–22); others were published in Antwerp (1569–72), Paris (1629–45), and London (1654–57).

polyphony (Gk., polyphonia, "many tones"), musical term denoting the simultaneous interweaving of many melodic lines into a single whole in a musical composition. Its opposite form is monophony, which uses only one melodic line. Polyphonic church music reached its apex in the Renaissance and Baroque periods, although its roots go back to the late Middle Ages. See also Catholicism and music; liturgical music.

Pomponazzi, Pietro, 1464–1525, influential Italian Renaissance philosopher. Distrustful of the Scholastic appropriation of Aristotle, he insisted on the limitations of reason in teaching Christian doctrine and on the need for the Church to rely on supernatural revelation to guarantee the truths inaccessible to unaided reason.

Pontian, St., d. 235, pope (230–35) and martyr. After five years as pope, he was banished by the new anti-Christian emperor Maximinus Thrax to Sardinia where he died of harsh treatment. Before dying, however, he abdicated his office to make possible the election of a successor. He was the first pope to abdicate. Feast day (with St. Hippolytus): August 13.

Pontifex Maximus (pon'tee-fex max'ee-muhs; Lat., "Supreme Pontiff," "bridge-builder"), a title of honor accorded the Bishop of Rome, the pope, since the late fourth century, stressing his ministry of bridging the gap between heaven and earth, the divine and the human. It was originally a pagan title given the emperor as head of the college of priests in Rome. See also papacy, the; pope.

Pontifical Biblical Commission, commission established in 1902 by Pope Leo XIII to encourage biblical studies in the Church. The commission soon became a vigilance committee, seeking to safeguard the Bible's authority against Modernist criticism. It consisted of five cardinals and thirty-nine consultors. From 1903 to 1933 the commission published thirteen responsa (misentitled "decrees"), replies to intricate questions on biblical topics (e.g., Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, historicity of Gen 1–3, authorship of Hebrews). These replies cast a cloud of conservatism over Catholic biblical scholarship. After Pius XII issued Divino Afflante Spiritu (on promoting biblical studies, 1943), the commission changed its activity and image. Its secretaries issued in 1955 a quasiofficial explanation, making it clear that the responsa touching on literary questions (e.g., authorship, date, integrity) were time-conditioned and that Catholic interpreters could pursue research in such matters "with full freedom" (Catholic Biblical Quarterly 18 [1956]: 23–29). In 1964 the commission published an instruction titled "On the Historical Truth of the Gospels," obliging Catholic interpreters to expound the Gospels according to the sound principles of form criticism and the three stages of Gospel tradition. This Gospel interpretation was adopted by Vatican II (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, 1965, n. 15). In 1971 Paul VI restructured the commission, appointing twenty biblical scholars instead of cardinals as members. The commission is no longer a vigilance committee and acts as an advisory board to the pope and the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. See also Bible, Church teachings on the.

JOSEPH A. FITZMYER

Pontifical Biblical Institute, a graduate-level institution of teaching, research, and publication founded in Rome by Pope Pius X in 1909. The pope intended the institute to be a positive response to Modernism, a center under papal supervision for studying and teaching biblical exegesis based on firsthand control of the sources. The institute was entrusted to the Society of Jesus. A Jerusalem branch was opened in 1926, and a faculty for ancient Near Eastern studies was established in 1932. Degrees given are the licentiate (S.S.L., equivalent to a rigorous M.A.) and the S.S.D. (doctorate in Sacred Scripture). An average of sixty-five licentiate degrees and six doctorates are granted every year.

Pontifical Commission for Latin America, a department of the Roman Curia related specifically to the Congregation for Bishops, whose prefect is its president, and that has responsibility for advising, assisting, and studying questions of interest to the dioceses in Latin America (Pastor Bonus [1988], nn. 83–84). See also Latin America, Catholicism in; Roman Curia.

Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, the office of the Roman Curia responsible for contacts and dialogues with other churches and ecclesial communities and for fostering ecumenical activity within the Catholic Church.

On May 30, 1960, Pope John XXIII announced the establishment of a secretariat that was to host non-Catholic observers at Vatican II. But in the end the new office was also given responsibility for drafting important conciliar documents. In 1966 Pope Paul VI confirmed the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity as a permanent office of the Holy See. In 1974 a special Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews was set up in association with the secretariat.

The presidents of the secretariat have been Augustine Cardinal Bea (1960–68), Cardinal Johannes Willebrands (1968–89), and Edward Cardinal Cassidy (since 1989). In 1989 the name of the office was changed to Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

Currently the council sponsors theological dialogues with ten different communions and cooperates with the World Council of Churches through the Joint Working Group. It also provides and updates ecumenical guidelines for Catholics in an ecumenical directory (1967, 1969). See also ecumenism.

Pontifical Council for the Family, a department of the Roman Curia that promotes pastoral care of families, fosters studies on marriage and family spirituality, strives for acknowledgment and defense of family rights, including protection of the unborn, and encourages associations that serve families (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 139–41). See also family; Roman Curia.

Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts, department of the Roman Curia authorized to issue authentic (i.e., authoritative) interpretations of Church laws. It reviews the documents of curial departments, synods, and episcopal conferences regarding their juridic form and content and assesses conformity of other legislation with universal law (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 154–58). See also canon law; Roman Curia.

Pontifical Council for the Laity, a department of the Roman Curia responsible for promoting lay participation in the mission of the Church. It coordinates the lay apostolate, fosters cooperation in catechetics, liturgy, the sacraments, and charitable works, and regulates international associations of the faithful (Pastor Bonus, 1988, nn. 131–34). See also laity; Roman Curia.

Pontifical Gregorian University. See Gregorian University.

Pontifical Marian Academy, international institute for the promotion of multidisciplinary Marian studies and devotion to Mary. Founded in 1946 by Carlo Balic, this Rome-based academy holds congresses and publishes the acts of its meetings and other Mariological literature. In 1959 Pope John XXIII bestowed upon the academy the title "Pontifical," commissioning it to coordinate Marian studies by worldwide Mariological societies. See also Mariology.

Pontifical Oriental Institute, a graduate school for Eastern Christian studies founded in Rome by Pope Benedict XV in 1917 and given over to the direction of the Jesuits in 1922. In addition to its degree programs, it is noted for the high level of its scholarly publications and for its renowned library, considered by many the best in the world on Eastern Christianity. The "Orientale," as it is called, forms part of the consortium of Jesuit Roman institutions, along with the Pontifical Gregorian University and Pontifical Biblical Institute. The post–Vatican II (1962–65) era of East-West ecumenism and, more recently, the demise of Communism in the East have greatly increased its student body and given a new impetus to its work.

pontifical right, status of a religious institute or society of apostolic life that has a decree of approval from the Holy See. Such approval allows more autonomy to an institute because its internal affairs are then mostly free from the supervision of the diocesan bishop. See also religious institute; society of apostolic life.

pontifical universities, schools that have particular approval by the Holy See. In some cases schools that have one or more approved departments or faculties in particular academic disciplines are also called "pontifical," even though the approval has been given only to those departments. These schools can grant "pontifical degrees," i.e., degrees approved by the Holy See, and are governed by particular norms approved by Rome.

Poor Clares, religious order of women. Originally called the Poor Ladies, the Poor Clares were founded at Assisi, Italy, in 1212 by Clare of Assisi. In the beginning, they adopted the ideal of poverty espoused by Francis of Assisi, having the custom that neither individual religious nor the given community might hold property of any sort. In time, this interpretation of poverty was modified. The Poor Clares were established as a canonical religious community in 1215 under Pope Innocent III. Brought to the United States from Italy by Mother Maria Maddalena Bentivoglio and Mother Maria Costanza Bentivoglio, the order established its first American monastery in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1875. The members of the community take the three vows of religious life—poverty, chastity, and obedience—as well as a vow of enclosure. As a contemplative community, the sisters engage in the recitation of the Divine Office, contemplative prayer, and mental and manual labor. Worldwide in 1994, the order of Poor Clares numbers more than 17,000 sisters in a thousand autonomous monasteries. Contemporary followers of St. Clare are known as Poor Clares (P.C.), the Order of St. Clare (O.S.C.) and Poor Clares of St. Colette (P.C.C.). See also Clare of Assisi, St.; Franciscan spirituality.

pope (Lat., papa, "father"), the Bishop of Rome and the earthly head of the Catholic Church. In earlier centuries the term was used of any bishop in the West, while in the East it seems to have been used of priests as well, and was a special title of the patriarch of Alexandria. In 1073 Pope Gregory VII formally prohibited its use for all except the Bishop of Rome. See also papacy, the; pope, titles of the.

pope, titles of the, Bishop of Rome, Vicar of Peter, Vicar of Jesus Christ, Successor of the Chief of the Apostles, Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church, Patriarch of the West, Primate of Italy, Archbishop and Metropolitan of the Roman Province, Sovereign of Vatican City State, and Servant of the Servants of God. See also papacy, the.

Pope Joan. See Joan, "Pope."

popular religion, term denoting a wide range of practices (e.g., pilgrimages, novenas; devotion to the Virgin Mary, the saints, shrines) not directly tied to the official liturgy of the Church. These practices tend to differ according to locale and are not infrequently connected to customs and practices that may predate Christianity or were absorbed from the surrounding non-Christian culture. Official statements of the Church tend to support such practices since they reflect the experience of the poor and the marginalized. See also devotions.

The following list of popes—262 in all—is based on the annual Vatican directory, known as the Annuario Pontificio, and on J. N. D. Kelly's The Oxford Dictionary of Popes (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986). When there is a minor discrepancy between the dates given by the two sources for the beginning and end of individual pontificates, especially in the case of the earliest popes, Kelly is generally preferred.

Alternate names are given in brackets; nationalities other than Italian are given in parentheses. The dates in the second column refer to the beginning and end of individual pontificates. The second date almost always coincides with the pope's death. The dagger symbol (†) following the dates indicates that there is a separate entry on that particular pope elsewhere in the encyclopedia.

1. Peter, Apostle, St. (Galilean)†	d. ca. 64	Although the terms "first pope" and "first Bishop of Rome" are traditionally associated with Peter, the monoepiscopal, or single-bishop, system of governance in the church of Rome only gradually emerged and did not become clearly identifiable until the pontificate of Pius I (ca. 142–ca. 155).
2. Linus, St.†	ca. 66–ca. 78	Although he and several other early popes are regarded as martyrs, the historical evidence is, in most cases, lacking.
3. Anacletus, St. [Cletus]	ca. 79–ca. 91	Very little is known about him, but he is mentioned in the ancient Canon of the Mass.
4. Clement I, St.†	ca. 91–ca. 101	Author of the most important first-century document outside the NT, 1 Clement, sent to Corinth to resolve a dispute about authority.
5. Evaristus, St. (Greek)	ca. 100–ca. 109	There is little reliable historical information about him.
6. Alexander I, St.	ca. 109–ca. 116	Little is known about him except that he played a leading role in the church of Rome.
7. Sixtus I, St.	ca. 116–ca. 125	Little is known about him.
8. Telesphoros, St. (Greek)	ca. 125–ca. 136	The only second-century pope whose martyrdom is historically verifiable.
9. Hyginus, St. (Greek)	ca. 138–ca. 142	A philosopher who, like his contemporary Justin Martyr, came to Rome from the East.
10. Pius I, St.†	ca. 142–ca. 155	With his pontificate the monarchical episcopate becomes a settled reality in Rome.
11. Anicetus, St. (Syrian)†	ca. 155–ca. 166	He erected a popular memorial shrine for St. Peter on Vatican Hill.
12. Soter, St.	ca. 166–ca. 174	During his pontificate Easter became an annual feast in Rome.
13. Eleutherius, St. [Eleutherus] (Greek)	ca. 174–ca. 189	Although his reign was peaceful, he seems to have ignored Irenaeus's warnings about the growth of Montanism, a movement that stressed the imminent end of the world.
14. Victor I, St. (African)†	189–198	He enforced the Roman date for the celebration of Easter and was the first pope to have dealings with the imperial household.
15. Zephrynus, St.†	198/9–217	During his pontificate, Rome was torn by debates about the divinity of Christ.
16. Callistus I, St. [Calixtus]†	217–222	His pontificate was marked by conflicts over doctrine and discipline with the Church's first antipope, Hippolytus, who thought Callistus too lax in both areas.
17. Urban I, St.	222–230	Although the antipope Hippolytus was still alive during much of Urban's reign, his pontificate was relatively peaceful because there were no persecutions under the emperor Severus.

18. Pontian, St.†	July 21, 230–Sept. 28, 235	The first pope to abdicate, after being arrested and deported in 235 by the new emperor Maximinus Thrax.
19. Anterus, St. (Greek)	Nov. 21, 235–Jan. 3, 236	The first pope to be buried in the new papal crypt in the cemetery of Callistus.
20. Fabian, St.†	Jan. 10, 236–Jan. 20, 250	One of the great popes of the early Church—an outstanding administrator and reformer.
21. Cornelius, St.†	Mar. 251–June 253	He was bitterly opposed by the antipope Novatian, a disappointed candidate for the papacy, who thought the pope too lax in his attitude toward those who had weakened under persecution and were seeking readmission to the Church. Cornelius excommunicated Novatian.
22. Lucius I, St.	June 25, 253–Mar. 5, 254	Banished from Rome by the emperor Gallus almost immediately after his election as pope, he returned under the emperor Valerian. Little is known about him thereafter.
23. Stephen I, St.†	May 12, 254–Aug. 2, 257	He was best known for his clashes with Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, especially over the question of the rebaptism of those baptized by heretics. Stephen vigorously opposed rebaptism.
24. Sixtus II, St. (Greek)†	Aug. 30, 257–Aug. 6, 258	He took a more conciliatory stand on the issue of rebaptism, apparentlyallowingbothpracticestocoexist.Beheadedwhile presiding at liturgy, he became one of the most revered martyrs of the early Church.
25. Dionysius, St.	July 22, 260–Dec. 26, 268	One of the most important popes of the third century, he was not elected until two years after the death of Sixtus II because of the continued persecutions. He held a synod in Rome to clarify the relationship between the Father and the Son and proved to be a vigorous administrator and reformer.
26. Felix I, St.	Jan. 3, 269–Dec. 30, 274	Very little is known of him or of his pontificate.
27. Eutychian, St.	Jan. 4, 275–Dec. 7, 283	The last pope to be buried in the papal crypt in the cemetery of Callistus.
28. Caius, St. [Gaius]	Dec. 17, 283–Apr. 22, 296	Little is known of him except that his pontificate was peaceful.
29. Marcellinus, St.†	June 30, 296–Oct. 25, 304	During the Diocletian persecutions, he complied with imperial orders to hand over copies of Sacred Scripture and to offer incense to the gods. Some scholars think he was deposed before his death. His name was omitted for a time from the official list of popes.
30. Marcellus I, St.†	Nov./Dec., 306–Jan. 16, 308	He was so much of a rigorist in his attitude toward those who compromised their faith under persecution that the emperor banished him from Rome as a disturber of the peace.
31. Eusebius, St. (Greek)	Apr. 18–Oct. 21, 310	He adopted a more compassionate policy toward apostates, but the split in the community over the issue deepened and the emperor Maxentius deported him.
32. Melchiades, St. [Miltiades] (African?)	July 2, 311–Jan. 10, 314	During his pontificate, all confiscated Church properties were returned. The emperor Constantine presented him with the empress Fausta's palace (the Lateran) as a papal residence.
33. Sylvester I, St. [Silvester]†	Jan. 31, 314–Dec. 31, 335	Pope during the reign of Constantine the Great, when Rome acquired the trappings of a Christian city, but he does not seem to have exercised great influence, particularly on the Council of Nicaea (325).
34. Mark, St.	Jan. 18–Oct. 7, 336	He had a short, uneventful pontificate.
35. Julius I, St.†	Feb. 6, 337–Apr. 12, 352	A vigorous supporter of the teaching of the Council of Nicaea and of Athanasius.
36. Liberius†	May 17, 352–Sept. 24, 366	A weak pope, he at first opposed the excommunication of Athanasius by the Arian party with the support of the emperor Constantius, but later relented under pressure. He returned to orthodoxy after the emperor's death. He was the first pope not to be listed among the saints.

37. Damasus I, St.†	Oct. 1, 366–Dec. 11, 384	Active in the fight against heresies and in promoting the primacy of Rome, he restored the catacombs and authorized Jerome to do a new translation of the Gospels based on the Greek.
38. Siricius, St.†	Dec. 384–Nov. 26, 399	The first pope to issue decretals in the style of imperial edicts, he ruled that no bishop should be consecrated without the knowledge of the Apostolic See.
39. Anastasius I, St.†	Nov. 27, 399–Dec. 19, 401	Although he did not understand Origen's writings, he acquiesced in their condemnation.
40. Innocent I, St.†	Dec. 21, 401–Mar. 12, 417	No previous pope had made the claim so strongly that the Apostolic See possesses supreme teaching authority.
41. Zosimus, St. (Greek)†	Mar. 18, 417–Dec. 26, 418	Temperamentally impulsive and politically inept, he generated bitter conflicts and upon his death left Rome torn by factions.
42. Boniface I, St.	Dec. 28, 418–Sept. 4, 422	A dedicated opponent of Pelagianism and a vigorous advocate of the authority of the papacy. "It has never been lawful for what has not been decided by the apostolic see to be reconsidered" (Romocuta est; causa finita est; Lat., "Rome has spoken; the cause is finished").
43. Celestine I, St.	Sept. 10, 422–July 27, 432	He took a strong stand against Nestorius, who posited two persons in Christ, but played little part in the Council of Ephesus (431), which condemned Nestorianism. As the successor of Peter, he claimed oversight over the whole Church, East and West alike.
44. Sixtus III, St. [Xystus]	July 31, 432–Aug. 19, 440	He acted as peacemaker in the aftermath of the Council of Ephesus (431) and directed a major rebuilding program in Rome in the aftermath of the invasion by the Visigoths in 410.
45. Leo I, "the Great," St.†	Aug./Sept. 440–Nov. 10, 461	One of only two popes called "the Great" (the other being Gregory I), he was especially strong in claiming supreme and universal authority for the papacy and was a firm supporter of the teachings of the Council of Chalcedon (451). He personally persuaded the Hun to withdraw from his advance toward Rome.
46. Hilarus, St. [Hilary]	Nov. 19, 461–Feb. 29, 468	A supporter of Christological orthodoxy, he frequently intervened in church matters in Gaul (France) and Spain.
47. Simplicius, St.	Mar. 3, 468–Mar. 10, 483	He interacted primarily with the East in trying to maintain Christological orthodoxy and the prerogatives of Rome.
48. Felix III (II), St.†	Mar. 13, 483–Mar. 1, 492	A vigorous opponent of Monophysitism (the denial of a human nature in Christ), his authoritarian personality kept alive the first schism between East and West. He excommunicated the patriarch of Constantinople, Acacius. (St. Felix II had served as antipope 355–65.)
49. Gelasius I, St. (African)†	Mar. 1, 492–Nov. 21, 496	The first to be called "Vicar of Christ," he was, after Leo the Great, the outstanding pope of the fifth century.
50. Anastasius II	Nov. 24, 496–Nov. 19, 498	Unlike his predecessors, he took a conciliatory attitude toward the Acacian Schism, but this provoked dissension among the clergy and then schism in Rome itself.
51. Symmachus, St.†	Nov. 22, 498–July 19, 514	The first to bestow the pallium (a symbol of episcopal authority around the neck) on a bishop outside of Italy.
52. Hormisdas, St.†	July 20, 514–Aug. 6, 523	He ended the Acacian Schism between Rome and the East. His son later became pope.
53. John I, St.†	Aug. 13, 523–May 18, 526	The first to leave Italy for the East (Constantinople), he also rejected Alexandrian computation of the date of Easter, which would be accepted throughout the West.
54. Felix IV (III), St.	July 12, 526–Sept. 22, 530	A proponent of semi-Pelagianism, which held that the beginning of faith is the result of human effort, not grace.

55. Boniface II	Sept. 22, 530–Oct. 17, 532	Though born in Rome, he was the first pope of Germanic stock. His record as pope was mixed: at times he was vindictive, at other times conciliatory. He confirmed the teaching of the Second Council of Orange (529), which ended the controversy on grace.
56. John II	Jan. ?, 533–May 8, 535	Because his name from birth was that of a pagan god (Mercury), he was the first pope to take a different name upon election to the papacy. He was also famous for contradicting, under pressure from the Eastern emperor, the teaching of a previous pope (Hormisdas) on a matter of doctrine: he accepted the Theopaschite formula, "One of the Trinity suffered in the flesh."
57. Agapitus I, St.†	May 3, 535–Apr. 22, 536	He had to pawn sacred vessels to finance a peacekeeping mission to Constantinople, where he died.
58. Silverius, St.	Jun 8, 536–Nov. 11, 537	Because he and the senate had surrendered Rome peacefully to the Gothic army, he was charged by the Monophysite empress Theodora (wife of Justinian) with being pro-Goth and was stripped of his pallium, degraded to the rank of a monk, deposed, and deported. Justinian relented and let him return, but his enemies (including his successor) kidnapped him to an island in the Gulf of Gaeta, where he was forced finally to abdicate on November 11, 537. He died Dec. 2.
59. Vigilius†	Ma 9, 537–June 7, 555	A devious and weak person in league with the Monophysite empress Theodora, he was elected under the most dubious of circumstances in which he compelled his predecessor's abdication. His vacillation on the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon caused great consternation in the West, leading even to his excommunication by a synod of African bishops.
60. Pelagius I	Ap, 556–Mar. 3, 561	Although he was a gifted administrator, dedicated reformer, and generous pastor, his pontificate was marked by great frustration because of his association with the emperor Justinian (who seems to have named him without an election) and rumors about his role in the death of Vigilius, his predecessor.
61. John III	Ju 561–July 13, 574	As the invading Lombards marched on Rome, the pope fled to Naples to beg Narses, the emperor's viceroy in Italy, to take charge of the resistance. This created such a negative reaction in the city that the pope had to take up residence outside of Rome.
62. Benedict I	Ju 575–July 30, 579	Little is known of his pontificate, except that he died while the city was under siege by the Lombards.
63. Pelagius II	N 579–Feb. 7, 590	His pontificate, too, was marked by the crisis of the Lombard invasion. At the same time, the Visigoths in Spain were converted and a controversy erupted with the East over the bishop of Constantinople's use of the title "ecumenical patriarch," to which the pope objected as an encroachment upon papal supremacy.
64. Gregory I, "the Great," St.†	S 590–Mar. 12, 604	The first pope to have been a monk. With the breakdown of temporal authority in Italy, he became its virtual civil ruler. An ardent reformer and gifted administrator, he dispatched the first missionary band to England under Augustine of Canterbury. He was a prodigious writer; his most enduring work, Pastoral Care, became a textbook for medieval bishops.
65. Sabinian	604–Feb. 22, 606	Unlike Gregory, he promoted diocesan (secular) clergy rather than monks. Also unlike Gregory, he sold grain to the hungry rather than give it away. He was so unpopular at the time of his death, his funeral procession had to be diverted outside the city walls to reach St. Peter's.

66. Boniface III	Feb. 19–Nov. 12, 607	He received from the new emperor, Phocas, a formal declaration that Rome, as the see of Peter, was head of all the churches. He also held a synod to regulate papal elections. The penalty of excommunication would be imposed on anyone discussing a successor to a pope or bishop during the pope's or bishop's lifetime and until three days after his death.
67. Boniface IV, St.	Sept. 15, 608–May 8, 615	A disciple of Gregory the Great, he turned his house into a monastery. His reign, too, was marked by famine, plague, and natural disasters. He also displayed a special interest in the English church.
68. Deusdedit, St. [Adeodatus I]	Oct. 19, 615–Nov. 8, 618	The first priest to be made pope since John II (533–35). Unlike Gregory the Great and his predecessor, Boniface IV, he was partial to diocesan clergy rather than to monks and religious.
69. Boniface V	Dec. 23, 619–Oct. 25, 625	A compassionate and kindly pastor, he continued the pro-clergy policies of his predecessor as well as the special interest of Boniface IV in the English church.
70. Honorius I†	Oct. 27, 625–Oct. 12, 638	An admirer of Gregory the Great, he, too, turned his house into a monastery and employed monks rather than diocesan clergy on his staff. He became an unwitting adherent of Monothelitism, which held that there is only one (divine) will in Jesus Christ. After his death he was formally condemned by the Third Council of Constantinople (680).
71. Severinus	May 28–Aug. 2, 640	An elderly man, he resisted the emperor Heraclius's pressure to endorse Monothelitism, but paid a high price in the form of an imperial siege of the Lateran Palace and a plundering of the papal treasury. He died two months after consecration.
72. John IV (Dalmatian)	Dec. 24, 640–Oct. 12, 642	He held a synod in 641 that condemned Monothelitism.
73. Theodore I (Greek)	Nov. 24, 642–May 14, 649	An uncompromising opponent of Monothelitism, which continued to find favor in the East.
74. Martin I, St.†	July 5, 649–June 17, 653	Another determined opponent of Monothelitism, he paid a high price in the form of capture, deposition, deportation, humiliation, ill-treatment, flogging, imprisonment, and death (Sept. 16, 655) at the hands of the emperor. The church of Rome, which had abandoned him during his ordeal, later revered him as a martyr, the last pope to be so honored.
75. Eugenius I, St. [Eugene]	Aug. 10, 654–June 2, 657	Even though condemned by the Third Council of Constantinople (680), Monothelitism continued to divide Rome and Constantinople. The pope tried to reconcile the two sides by prematurely accepting a compromise that seemed to posit three wills in Christ. The clergy and people of Rome rejected it and demanded that the pope reject it as well. He died before the emperor Constans II could do to him what he had done to his predecessor.
76. Vitalian, St.	July 30, 657–Jan. 27, 672	He restored good relations with the emperor, but not without serious compromises. After the emperor's murder, the pope supported the claims of his son, Constantine IV, for which the new emperor was grateful. The pope was able to profess orthodox doctrine more freely against Monothelitism.
77. Adeodatus II	Apr. 11, 672–June 17, 676	An elderly man upon election, he did little more than reaffirm orthodox doctrine on the question of the two wills in Christ, but he had a good reputation as a kind and generous pastor.
78. Donus	Nov. 2, 676–Apr. 11, 678	Even less is known about his pontificate than about that of his predecessor's. He died before efforts to restore harmony between Constantinople and Rome could bear fruit.
79. Agatho, St.†	June 27, 678–Jan. 10, 681	His pontificate was marked by the definitive end of imperial support for Monothelitism in the East and the restoration of good relations between Rome and Constantinople.

80. Leo II, St.†	Aug. 17, 682–July 3, 683	An accomplished singer and patron of church music, he ratified the Third Council of Constantinople's condemnation of Monothelitism and anathematized (censured) its adherents, including Pope Honorius I.
81. Benedict II, St.†	June 26, 684–May 8, 685	A man devoted to the poor, he secured agreement from the emperor to allow the imperial exarch (viceroy) in Ravenna, Italy, to ratify papal elections instead of having to wait for approval from Constantinople.
82. John V (Syrian)	July 23, 685–Aug. 2, 686	He was so ill during his brief pontificate that he established little or no significant record.
83. Conon	Oct. 21, 686–Sept. 21, 687	An elderly compromise candidate, he was weak and ill during his year-long pontificate.
84. Sergius I, St. (Syrian)†	Dec. 15, 687–Sept. 8, 701	He successfully resisted pressures from the emperor Justinian II, who was eventually overthrown and exiled. He restored churches in Rome, including St. Peter's and St. Paul's, and introduced the singing of the Agnus Dei (Lat., "Lamb of God") at Mass.
85. John VI (Greek)	Oct. 30, 701–Jan. 11, 705	He had to spend great sums of money ransoming prisoners and bribing invaders so they would not enter Rome.
86. John VII (Greek)	Mar. 1, 705–Oct. 18, 707	The first pope to be the son of a Byzantine official. He was known for his building projects and for being a patron of the arts.
87. Sisinnius (Syrian)	Jan. 15–Feb. 4, 708	Already old and crippled upon election, he established no record of accomplishment.
88. Constantine (Syrian)	Mar. 25, 708–Apr. 9, 715	Summoned by the emperor, he made a year-long journey to Constantinople to normalize relations between the two sides. The meeting was a success. Justinian II was later murdered and replaced by a fanatical Monothelite, but he was himself overthrown and replaced by an orthodox emperor.
89. Gregory II, St.†	May 19, 715–Feb. 11, 731	The first Roman to be elected pope after five popes of Greek or Syrian background, and the most accomplished pope of the eighth century. He opposed iconoclasm (antipathy to icons and other sacred images), promoted monasticism, and was a liturgical innovator.
90. Gregory III, St. (Syrian)	Mar. 18, 731–Nov. 28, 741	The last pope to seek approval for his consecration from the Byzantine exarch (viceroy) in Italy. He made a pact with the Franks to protect Rome against the Lombards, supported Boniface's mission to Germany, promoted monasticism, and beautified Rome.
91. Zacharias, St. [Zachary] (Greek)†	Dec. 3, 741–Mar. 15, 752	The last of the Greek popes. He, too, supported Boniface's mission to Germany and solidified the alliance with the Franks, agreeing to the transference of the crown from the Merovingian to the Carolingian line.
92. Stephen II (III)†	Mar. 26, 752–Apr. 26, 757	He established the independence of the papacy from the Byzantine empire and placed it under the protection of the Frankish kingdom. He also formed the Papal States. (An elderly Roman priest who would have been Stephen II had been elected pope on Mar. 22 or 23, 752, but died before being consecrated. In those years consecration rather than valid election was the essential requirement.)
93. Paul I, St.†	May 29, 757–June 28, 767	He defended the young Papal States and strengthened the papacy's ties with the Franks.
94. Stephen III (IV)†	Aug. 7, 768–Jan. 24, 772	He directly replaced not Paul I, but the antipope Constantine, a layman who illegitimately reigned from July 5, 767, to August 6, 768. A subsequent synod at the Lateran formally invalidated that election. Stephen's reign was marked by political vacillation.

95. Hadrian I [Adrian]†	Feb. 1, 772–Dec. 25, 795	He supported Charlemagne, even when he interfered in the Papal States and elsewhere in Italy, and he approved the Second Council of Nicaea (787), which condemned iconoclasm.
96. Leo III, St.†	Dec. 26, 795–June 12, 816	He crowned Charlemagne as emperor on Christmas day, 800, and was the first and only pope to offer obeisance to a Western emperor. Nevertheless, he resisted Charlemagne's efforts to add the Filioque (Lat., "and the Son") to the creed.
97. Stephen IV (V)	June 22, 816–Jan. 24, 817	The first pope to anoint an emperor (Louis the Pious), suggesting thereby that papal approval was necessary for the exercise of full imperial authority.
98. Paschal I, St.†	Jan. 24, 817–Feb. 11, 824	The practice of crowning the emperor in Rome took hold during his reign. He was so detested by the people that his body could not be buried in St. Peter's. His feast day, May 14, was dropped from the liturgical calendar in 1963.
99. Eugenius II [Eugene]	June 824–Aug. 827	Upon election he acknowledged the emperor's authority over the Papal States and swore an oath of allegiance to him, but he maintained his independence on matters of Church doctrine and discipline.
100. Valentine	Aug.–Sept. 827	He was elected with the participation of the laity, as mandated by the imperial constitution of 824, ratified by Eugene II.
101. Gregory IV	late 827–Jan. 25, 844	He was elected with the support of the lay Roman nobility; his pontificate was undistinguished.
102. Sergius II	Jan. 844–Jan. 27, 847	Elderly and gout-ridden when elected by his fellow Roman aristocrats, he engaged in simony and other dubious practices to raise funds for his ambitious building program. Muslim pirates plundered St. Peter's and St. Paul's during his reign—acts many saw as divine retribution for papal corruption.
103. Leo IV, St.†	Apr. 10, 847–July 17, 855	He restored papal prestige through successful military expeditions against the Saracens who were threatening Rome.
104. Benedict III	Sept. 29, 855–Apr. 17, 858	Little is known of his brief reign, but he reasserted Rome's primatial authority over Constantinople.
105. Nicholas I, St.†	Apr. 24, 858–Nov. 13, 867	He viewed himself as God's representative on earth with authority over the whole Church, including all bishops (regardless of rank) and the East generally. He and Photius, the patriarch of Constantinople, excommunicated each other, thereby contributing to the final separation of East and West.
106. Hadrian II [Adrian]	Dec. 14, 867–Nov./Dec. 872	When the Fourth Council of Constantinople (869–70) placed Constantinople second in rank behind Rome, relations between East and West temporarily improved. He consecrated Methodius as archbishop of Sirmium and legate to the Slavs.
107. John VIII	Dec. 14, 872–Dec. 16, 882	Although elderly, he personally led military expeditions against the Saracens. To win support from the East, he accepted the decisions of a council in Constantinople presided over by Photius in 879, including the lifting of the anathematization of Photius. He was the first pope to be assassinated.
108. Marinus I	Dec. 16, 882–May 15, 884	He was the first bishop of another diocese to be elected bishop of Rome, in violation of canon 15 of the First Council of Nicaea (325).
109. Hadrian III, St. [Adrian]	May 17, 884–Sept. 885	He maintained friendly relations with the East but died under dubious circumstances that suggested assassination.
110. Stephen V (VI)	Sept. 885–Sept. 14, 891	Mainly involved in political activities and in military defense against Saracen raids, he unwittingly pushed the Slavs away from Rome and into the arms of Orthodoxy when after the death of Methodius, he forbade the Slavonic liturgy.

111. Formosus	Oct. 6, 891–Apr. 4, 896	He was most famous for what happened to him after death. His body was exhumed, propped up on a throne in full pontifical vestments, and subjected to a mock trial (the so-called Cadaver Synod) in which he was found guilty of perjury, coveting the papacy, and having violated the canons forbidding translation from one diocese to another. His acts and ordinations were declared null and void, and three fingers of his right hand (by which he swore oaths and gave blessings) were cut off. He was reburied in a common grave and then exhumed and thrown in the Tiber. A hermit retrieved the body and gave it a third burial. Pope Theodore II exhumed the body and gave it a fourth, and final, burial with honors.
112. Boniface VI	Apr. 896	Although defrocked twice from the priesthood, he was elected under pressure of riots. He died after only fifteen days. A Roman synod two years later prohibited such uncanonical elections.
113. Stephen VI (VII)	May 896–Aug. 897	He was most famous for his role in the mock posthumous trial of Pope Formosus. He himself was deposed, stripped of his papal insignia, imprisoned, and strangled to death.
114. Romanus	Aug.–Nov. 897	Little or nothing is known of his reign. Some say that he was deposed by a faction partial to Formosus who wanted a stronger pope in order to rehabilitate their hero.
115. Theodore II	Nov. 897	Although he reigned only twenty days, he held a synod invalidating the so-called Cadaver Synod, which degraded the dead Formosus. He also rehabilitated and reburied Formosus (the fourth and final burial) with honors.
116. John IX	Jan. 898–Jan. 900	He, too, convened a synod in Rome annulling the Cadaver Synod and burning its acts, pardoning some participants and deposing others. It also prohibited trials of dead persons and decreed that, while the pope should be elected by bishops and clergy at the request of the senate and people of Rome, his consecration should take place in the presence of imperial representatives.
117. Benedict IV	May/June 900–Aug. 903	Very little is known of his reign other than that Rome continued to be torn by partisan conflict.
118. Leo V	Aug.–Sept. 903	After only thirty days in office he was overthrown by an antipope, Christopher, imprisoned, and murdered.
119. Sergius III	Jan. 29, 904–Apr. 14, 911	He was elected pope after leading an armed force against Rome and imprisoning the antipope Christopher. He had both Leo V and Christopher strangled to death. He held a synod that reaffirmed the Cadaver Synod, including its declaration that all the episcopal ordinations of Formosus were invalid. This threw the Church into a state of confusion and turmoil. He was the pawn of Roman noble families, especially the Theophylact.
120. Anastasius III	ca. June 911–ca. Aug. 913	The domination of the papacy by the Theophylact family continued during his brief reign.
121. Lando [Landus]	ca. Aug. 913–ca. Mar. 914	Also a product of the Theophylact family's influence, his brief reign was undistinguished.
122. John X	Mar./Apr. 914–May 928	With his election, also supported by the Theophylact family, the resistance to translating bishops from one diocese to another subsided because of the growing recognition of the unique significance of the see of Rome. He took an active role in the defeat of the Saracens, who had been plaguing Italy for sixty years. Because he tried to distance himself from the noble families, he was deposed, imprisoned, and suffocated to death (929).
123. Leo VI	May–Dec. 928	An elderly man who was elected to keep the papal throne warm for a son of the Theophylact family; nothing of any consequence is known of his short reign except that he himself died before his deposed predecessor was murdered.

124. Stephen VII (VIII)	Dec. 928–Feb. 931	His election and reign were marked by the same forces that controlled his predecessor's brief pontificate.
125. John XI	Feb./Mar. 931–Dec. 935 or Jan. 936	He is generally regarded as the illegitimate son of Pope Sergius III and Marozia, head of the house of Theophylact. He officiated at an unpopular marriage of his widowed mother, for which he and his mother were imprisoned. He was later released but kept under house arrest as a virtual slave of his half brother Alberic II, the self-declared prince of Rome.
126. Leo VII	Jan. 3, 936–July 13, 939	A creature of Alberic II, he, too, was limited to ecclesiastical functions. He supported major monasteries like Cluny and Subiaco and promoted reform of the clergy.
127. Stephen VIII (IX)	July 14, 939–Oct. 942	Supported also by Alberic II, he was confined to ecclesiastical duties. He seems at the end to have incurred the wrath of Alberic. He was imprisoned and mutilated and died soon thereafter.
128. Marinus II	Oct. 30, 942–May 946	Also controlled by Alberic II, he did little during his reign.
129. Agapitus II	May 10, 946–Dec. 955	Elected with the support of Alberic II, he promoted, like his immediate predecessors, Alberic's interest in monastic reform. On his deathbed, Alberic made the pope and others swear, in violation of the decree of Pope Symmachus in 499, that the next pope would be Alberic's son Octavian.
130. John XII†	Dec. 16, 955–May 14, 964	Elected at age eighteen, he was the second pope in history to change his name (from Octavian). He restored the Holy Roman Empire, crowning the German king Otto I in 962, and allowed the emperor to reassert his influence over papal elections. His private life was marked by gross immorality. He was deposed by a Roman synod Dec. 4, 963, at the urging of Otto, but resumed the papacy in Feb. 964 after deposing Leo VIII, Otto's candidate. He died in May 964.
131. Leo VIII	Dec. 4, 963–Mar. 1, 965	The legitimacy of his election is a matter of canonical debate because of the deposition of John XII and later reinstatement. After John XII's death, the Romans elected Benedict V. But Otto deported Benedict and reinstated Leo in June 964.
132. Benedict V	May 22–June 23, 964	A reformer rather than a libertine, his pontificate was marked by strife and confusion because of the political power plays involving John XII, Leo VIII, and the emperor Otto I. He was deposed and exiled to Germany, where he enjoyed a reputation for personal holiness. He died July 4, 966.
133. John XIII	Oct. 1, 965–Sept. 6, 972	He was elected and reigned with the full support of the emperor Otto I, whose political and ecclesiastical bidding he did.
134. Benedict VI	Jan. 19, 973–July 974	When his protector, the emperor Otto I, died, he was seized, imprisoned, and strangled to death by order of the antipope Boniface, a tool of the powerful Crescentii family in Rome.
135. Benedict VII	Oct. 974–July 10, 983	Favored by both the emperor Otto II and the Crescentii family, he promoted monastic reform as well as the emperor's political and ecclesiastical programs. The latter included the prohibition of simony, i.e., the buying and selling of spiritual goods. The practice of ad limina (Lat., "to the thresholds" of the tombs of Peter and Paul) visits to Rome by bishops from around the world became more common during his pontificate.
136. John XIV	Dec. 983–Aug. 20, 984	He was appointed by the emperor Otto II, whose former archchancellor he had been, without consultation with the clergy and people of Rome. Because his baptismal name was Peter, he changed it to John to avoid using the name of the first pope. When Otto died, John was left at the mercy of his enemies. He was seized, beaten, and imprisoned and died either of starvation or of poisoning.

137. John XV	Aug. 985–Mar. 996	Elected with the support of the powerful Crescentii family, he was the first pope formally to canonize a saint: Ulric of Augsburg in 993. He was hated by the clergy for his greed and nepotism.
138. Gregory V (Saxon)	May 3, 996–Feb. 18, 999	The twenty-four-year-old relative of Otto III, he was the first German pope. He took the name Gregory because of his admiration for Gregory the Great. He crowned Otto emperor and named him protector of the Church. Gregory died of malaria before he reached the age of thirty.
139. Sylvester II [Silvester] (French)†	Apr. 2, 999–May 12, 1003	The first Frenchman to become pope, taking the name Sylvester, a fourth-century pope who had forged a close working relationship with the emperor. Opposed to simony, nepotism, and clerical marriage, he was a man of keen intellect and great cultural breadth.
140. John XVII	May 16–Nov. 6, 1003	A relative and agent of the Crescentii family, he left little or no trace of a record of his pontificate. (In between John XV and John XVII there was an antipope who took the name John XVI.)
141. John XVIII	Dec. 25, 1003–June/July 1009	Another creature of the Crescentii family; his pontificate has left few historical traces and the manner of his leaving office remains shrouded in obscurity.
142. Sergius IV	July 31, 1009–May 12, 1012	Another product of the Crescentii family's influence, he, too, changed his name from Peter out of deference to the first pope. The fact that he died within a week of his patron Crescentius and the fact that his successor came from the rival Tuscalan family (in the line of the Theophylact family) have led historians to speculate that both the pope and Crescentius were murdered.
143. Benedict VIII	May 17, 1012–Apr. 9, 1024	Elected while still a layman with the support of the Tuscalan family, he changed his name from Theophylact to Benedict. He restored relations with the German royal house and crowned the king, Henry II, emperor in 1014. He spent much of his time in military expeditions but, at the instigation of the emperor, also initiated ecclesiastical reforms. He is said to have wielded more power than any of his predecessors.
144. John XIX	Apr. 19, 1024–Oct. 20, 1032	The younger brother of Benedict VIII, he, too, was a layman upon election. He was accused of gaining the papacy through bribery.
145. Benedict IX	Oct. 21, 1032–Sept. 1044; Mar. 10–May 1, 1045; Nov. 8, 1047–July 16, 1048	Another layman and another member of the ruling Tuscalan family who gained the papacy through bribery, he had an ignoble personal reputation. He was the only pope to have held office for three different periods.
146. Sylvester III [Silvester]	Jan. 20–Mar. 10, 1045	After Benedict IX was expelled from Rome, Silvester was elected. Benedict, however, returned and expelled Silvester, who returned to his diocese of Sabina as bishop. He died in 1063. The legitimacy of Sylvester's election is open to question.
147. Gregory VI	May 5, 1045–Dec. 20, 1046	Given the circumstances of his election, upon abdication of Benedict IX, he was accused of simony by the emperor and synod and deposed. The emperor took him back to Germany where he died in 1047.
148. Clement II (Saxon)	Dec. 24, 1046–Oct. 9, 1047	He was the first of four German popes imposed upon the Church by King Henry III of Germany in order to rescue the papacy from the power of the feuding Roman families. Clement crowned Henry and his wife as emperor and empress on the same day he was consecrated as pope. Significantly, he remained bishop of Bamberg during his pontificate. Upon his death Benedict was restored to the papacy for a third time, until forcibly ejected upon orders of King Henry III. He died 1055/6.

149. Damasus II (Bavarian)	July 17–Aug. 9, 1048	The second of the German popes imposed by King Henry III; his reign was brief and uneventful. He continued as bishop of Brixen after his election.
150. Leo IX, St. (Alsatian)†	Feb. 12, 1049–Apr. 9, 1054	The third and best of the German popes imposed by King Henry III, he retained the see of Toul until 1051. He arrived in Rome dressed as a pilgrim, to the delight of the Romans. He deliberately selected the name Leo to recall the ancient and still pure Church. He proved to be a great reformer pope, although his last years were marked by failure.
151. Victor II (Swabian)	Apr. 13, 1055–July 28, 1057	The last of the German popes nominated by Henry III, he remained bishop of Eichstätt during his pontificate. Like his predecessor he was a reformer, combatting simony, the alienation of Church property, and abuses of clerical celibacy.
152. Stephen IX (X) (French)	Aug. 2, 1057–Mar. 29, 1058	He was the abbot of Monte Cassino when elected and remained so during his brief pontificate. He committed himself to Church reform and surrounded himself with leading reformers.
153. Nicholas II (French)	Dec. 6, 1058–mid-July 1061	A leading reformer, he remained bishop of Florence during his pontificate. At a Lateran synod in 1059, simony was prohibited in papal elections but, more significantly, the election of a pope was restricted to cardinal bishops, with the clergy and people giving their subsequent assent. The synod also legislated against clerical concubinage and produced the first prohibition against lay investiture (the conferral of ecclesiastical offices by laypersons).
154. Alexander II†	Sept. 30, 1061–Apr. 21, 1073	A reformer pope, he also supported the liberation of Christian lands from the Muslims, as well as Duke William of Normandy against Harold of England in the battle of Hastings in 1066.
155. Gregory VII, St.†	Apr. 22, 1073–May 25, 1085	One of the greatest popes in history; his pontificate marks the real turning point between the first Christian millennium and the second. In an effort to free the papacy and the Church generally from temporal control, he claimed temporal as well as spiritual power over the whole Christian world. He opposed simony, clerical marriage, and lay investiture and insisted that metropolitan archbishops come to Rome to receive the pallium.
156. Victor III, Bl.†	May 24, 1086–Sept. 16, 1087	The abbot of Monte Cassino when elected (and until three days before his death), he took the name Victor as a gesture of reconciliation with the emperor Henry IV, whose father Henry III had supported a candidate by that name. Partisan conflicts (including the presence of an antipope) made his pontificate very difficult.
157. Urban II, Bl. (French)†	Mar. 12, 1088–July 29, 1099	To win support from the antireformers, he moderated Gregory VII's methods. He issued a summons to the First Crusade (1095–99) to liberate Jerusalem from the Muslims. He also established the Roman Curia.
158. Paschal II†	Aug. 13, 1099–Jan. 21, 1118	Under pressure from the emperor Henry V, he reversed many of the reforms initiated by Gregory VII, and the papacy itself suffered a decline in prestige.
159. Gelasius II	Jan. 24, 1118–Jan. 29, 1119	An elderly man, he was attacked and imprisoned immediately after election by the head of a patrician family that detested his predecessor. When the emperor left Rome, Gelasius returned butfounditcontrolledbyhostileforces,includinganantipope. He fled to France and died at the monastery in Cluny.
160. Callistus II [Calixtus] (French)	Feb. 2, 1119–Dec. 14, 1124	He agreed to the Concordat of Worms in 1122, which settled the investiture controversy. The Church retained all spiritual rights in the appointment of bishops and abbots while the emperor's role was largely limited to Germany. The concordat was ratified by the First Lateran Council in 1123.

161. Honorius II	Dec. 21, 1124–Feb. 13, 1130	Like his predecessor, he was a member of the younger generation of Church reformers, more open to compromise than were the so-called Gregorians. (Although usually classified as the antipope Celestine II, a cardinal priest by the name of Teobaldo was canonically elected to succeed Callistus. Troops broke into the conclave and forced Teobaldo to resign in favor of Honorius II.)
162. Innocent II	Feb. 14, 1130–Sept. 24, 1143	One of two cardinals elected to succeed Honorius II; Innocent represented the new reformers; the antipope Anacletus represented the old Gregorians. An eight-year schism followed, ending only upon the death of Anacletus. Innocent II called the Second Lateran Council in 1139, which annulled all of Anacletus's acts and reaffirmed the reform legislation of the past.
163. Celestine II	Sept. 26, 1143–Mar. 8, 1144	An elderly scholar, he supported the internal reform of the Church.
164. Lucius II	Mar. 12, 1144–Feb. 15, 1145	He faced serious political problems in Rome where a senate, independent of the papacy and critical of the clergy, was established under the leadership of the brother of the late antipope Anacletus.
165. Eugenius III, Bl. [Eugene]†	Feb. 15, 1145–July 8, 1153	A Cistercian who retained the habit and life-style of a monk while pope. He was committed to monastic and clerical reform and also proclaimed the Second Crusade in 1145.
166. Anastasius IV	July 8, 1153–Dec. 3, 1154	A very old man upon election, he had good relations with the popular commune in Rome and with the civil authorities generally.
167. Hadrian IV [Adrian] (English)	Dec. 4, 1154–Sept. 1, 1159	The first and only English pope; his reign was marked by conflict with the German king Frederick I Barbarossa.
168. Alexander III†	Sept. 7, 1159–Aug. 30, 1181	The first pope who was a lawyer. His election provoked an eighteen-year schism between those loyal to him and those loyal to the antipope Victor IV, including the Holy Roman emperor, Frederick I Barbarossa. Only after the emperor's defeat by the Lombard League and the subsequent peace treaty of 1177 did he acknowledge Alexander as pope. Alexander called the Third Lateran Council in 1179, which decreed that a two-thirds majority of cardinals is necessary for papal election.
169. Lucius III	Sept. 1, 1181–Nov. 25, 1185	Because of the hostility of the Roman citizenry, he spent most of his papacy residing outside the city. In concert with the emperor, he established a charter of the Inquisition to repress and punish heretics.
170. Urban III	Nov. 25, 1185–Oct. 20, 1187	An avowed opponent of the emperor, he retained his archbishopric of Milan while pope so that the revenues of the archdiocese would not pass into the imperial treasury, as was customary during a vacancy. His confrontational policy, however, was largely a failure.
171. Gregory VIII	Oct. 21–Dec. 17, 1187	Elected because of his better relations with the emperor, he devoted himself in his short reign to reform of the clergy and Curia, and especially to the preparation of the Third Crusade to liberate the holy places in Jerusalem.
172. Clement III	Dec. 19, 1187–Mar. 1191	Weakened by poor health, he nevertheless brought the papacy back to Rome after a six-year exile, establishing a relatively cooperative relationship with the popular commune and the emperor, but at a high price in financial and other concessions. He was preoccupied with mounting the Third Crusade (1189–91).
173. Celestine III	Mar./Apr. 1191–Jan. 8, 1198	Elected at age eighty-five, he had a surprisingly long reign marked by delicate relations with the new young king, Henry VI. The emperor challenged the pope's authority, even in Church matters, but the pope responded by supporting the emperor's opponents in Germany and elsewhere.

174. Innocent III†	Jan. 8, 1198–July 16, 1216	One of the most powerful popes in history, claiming authority not only over the whole Church (as Gregory VII had done) but over the whole world as well. His principal concerns were with two crusades, reform of the clergy and Curia, and the combatting of heresy, especially Albigensianism in France. He also called the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, which decreed, among other things, that Catholics should make an annual confession and that Jews and Muslims should wear distinctive dress.
175. Honorius III†	July 18, 1216–Mar. 18, 1227	Although he was old and in poor health, his reign lasted almost eleven years. He was preoccupied with the Fifth Crusade (1217–21), but he also launched a crusade against the Moors in Spain, continued the battle against Albigensianism in France, promoted the Inquisition, and approved the establishment of the Dominican order.
176. Gregory IX†	Mar. 19, 1227–Aug. 22, 1241	A friend of Dominic and Francis of Assisi and a protector of the Franciscan order. The beginning and end of his reign were marked by conflict with the emperor Frederick II. He established the papal Inquisition under the direction of the Dominicans.
177. Celestine IV	Oct. 25–Nov. 10, 1241	An aged and sick man, he was elected as a compromise candidate by eight other cardinals who were forcibly confined for sixty days. He died about two weeks later.
178. Innocent IV†	June 25, 1243–Dec. 7, 1254	A distinguished jurist, in 1245 he called the First Council of Lyons (to which he had secretly escaped from his enemies), which was concerned with the liberation of the holy places and other matters. The papacy suffered during his pontificate because of nepotism, bribery, and other financial misdeeds.
179. Alexander IV	Dec. 12, 1254–May 25, 1261	He supported the new mendicant orders, especially the Franciscans, and founded the Augustinian Hermits.
180. Urban IV [French]	Aug. 29, 1261–Oct. 2, 1264	When elected, there were only eight cardinals left. He himself was an outsider, the patriarch of Jerusalem, who happened to be in Italy on business related to the Holy Land. He appointed fourteen new cardinals, six of them French. Because of civil strife, he never resided in Rome as pope.
181. Clement IV (French)	Feb. 5, 1265–Nov. 29, 1268	Another Frenchman, he, too, resided outside Rome (in Perugia and Viterbo) during his pontificate because of civil unrest. He centralized the authority of the papacy by decreeing that appointments to all benefices in the West were papal appointments.
182. Gregory X, Bl.†	Sept. 1, 1271–Jan. 10, 1276	He was elected at the famous conclave in Viterbo, where the civil authorities locked the cardinals in the papal palace, then removed its roof and threatened them with starvation. He was in the Holy Land at the time on a crusade (hence he was not consecrated until March 27, 1272, in Rome), and he made the liberation of the holy places the central concern of his pontificate. He also called the Second Council of Lyons in 1274, affirming a short-lived union with the Greek church. He also decreed that papal elections be held within ten days after the death of the pope, in the city where he died, and with the cardinal-electors having no contact with the outside world.
183. Innocent V, Bl. (French)†	Jan. 21–June 22, 1276	A Dominican scholar and collaborator of Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas, he was the first Dominican pope. He was also a friend of the Franciscan Bonaventure and preached at his funeral. The papal custom of wearing a white cassock began with this pontificate, since the Dominican habit is white.
184. Hadrian V [Adrian]	July 11–Aug. 18, 1276	A nephew of Innocent IV, he suspended Gregory X's rules for a papal conclave but died before he himself was ordained a priest and consecrated. In The Divine Comedy, Dante placed him in purgatory for the sin of avarice.

185. John XXI (Portuguese)	Sept. 8, 1276–May 20, 1277	A Portuguese-born scholar with a medical background, he left the administration of his papacy to Cardinal Orsini (later Pope Nicholas III). It was as the result of his papal bull, however, that the bishop of Paris condemned nineteen propositions of Thomas Aquinas. He died when the ceiling of his newly built study collapsed on him. Dante placed him in paradise in The Divine Comedy. (No pope took the name John XX.)
186. Nicholas III	Nov. 25, 1277–Aug. 22, 1280	To preserve the independence of the papacy in Rome, he decreed that no outside prince could be a senator without papal approval and he had himself elected to the senate for life. He was the first pope to make the Vatican palace his residence. Dante placed him in hell in The Divine Comedy for nepotism and avarice.
187. Martin IV (French)†	Feb. 22, 1281–Mar. 28, 1285	Because the Romans refused him entry into the city, he was consecrated in Orvieto and for most of his pontificate resided there. He excommunicated the emperor Michael VIII Paleologus in 1281 and thereby voided the union with the Greek church forged at the Second Council of Lyons in 1274. He was unabashedly pro-French in his policies and appointments. (He was actually the second Martin, not the fourth. Popes Marinus I and II were incorrectly given as Martin III and IV in the official lists of the thirteenth century.)
188. Honorius IV	Apr. 2, 1285–Apr. 3, 1287	The grandnephew of Pope Honorius III; his election was greeted positively in Rome. He was crowned there and maintained his residence in the city. He was a strong supporter of religious orders, especially the Dominicans and Franciscans.
189. Nicholas IV	Feb. 22, 1288–Apr. 4, 1292	The first Franciscan pope. To solidify his standing in Rome, he forged close and compromising ties with the Colonna family. During his pontificate, the Catholic Church was established for the first time in China.
190. Celestine V, St.†	July 5–Dec. 13, 1294	A hermit who was elected at age eighty, he proved to be an ineffective, easily manipulated pope. He resigned voluntarily but was prevented by his successor from returning to his retreat. He died under virtual house arrest on May 9, 1296.
191. Boniface VIII†	Dec. 24, 1294–Oct. 11, 1303	Few popes made greater claims for the authority of the office. He engaged in constant battles with the temporal powers, especially Philip the Fair of France. In 1302 he issued Unam Sanctam (Lat., "One Holy"), asserting papal supremacy over the temporal as well as spiritual orders and declaring that every creature is subject to the pope. He also proclaimed the first holy year in 1300. (Boniface VII was antipope June–July 974 and Aug. 984–July 985.)
192. Benedict XI, Bl.	Oct. 22, 1303–July 7, 1304	A Dominican, he took the name Benedict after his predecessor's baptismal name, Benedetto, but he weakly acceded to most of Philip the Fair's demands, in spite of the latter's enmity toward Boniface. He created three cardinals—all Dominicans. (Benedict X was antipope April 1058–Jan. 1059.)
193. Clement V (French)†	June 5, 1305–Apr. 20, 1314	Elected by the pro-French cardinals, the first nine of ten cardinals he created were French, including four of his nephews. The French king insisted he reside in France, and thus began the seventy-year "Babylonian captivity" of the papacy in Avignon.
194. John XXII (French)†	Aug. 7, 1316–Dec. 4, 1334	He expanded papal power in the appointment of bishops and the imposition of papal taxes. He was severe in his condemnation and punishment of the Spiritual Franciscans (who held to a strict form of poverty), but he himself was accused of heresy for his stated belief that the saints do not see God until after the final judgment.

195. Benedict XII (French)†	Dec. 20, 1334–Apr. 25, 1342	A monk by vocation, he was a careful and competent administrator. He insisted that clergy live in clerical residences and monks in monasteries, improved their training, reorganized the Curia, and prohibited the flow of income from benefices during vacancies. His bull Benedictus Deus (Lat., "Blessed God") decreed in 1336 that the saints see God face to face (the Beatific Vision).
196. Clement VI (French)	May 7, 1342–Dec. 6, 1352	His bull Unigenitus (Lat., "Unbegotten") defined the treasury of merits won by Christ and the saints that could be drawn upon by the faithful. This laid the groundwork for the doctrine of indulgences. He proved to be the most French of the Avignon popes, naming mostly Frenchmen to the College of Cardinals and enlarging the papal palace, where he lived the life of a secular prince.
197. Innocent VI (French)	Dec. 18, 1352–Sept. 12, 1362	He promoted the reform of the clergy and of monasteries, but was particularly severe toward the Spiritual Franciscans, because of which Bridget of Sweden withdrew her support of him and denounced him as a persecutor of Christ's flock. He had hoped to return the papacy to Rome but died before he could do so.
198. Urban V, Bl. (French)†	Sept. 28, 1362–Dec. 19, 1370	He retained his Benedictine habit and life-style while pope and continued his predecessor's reforms. He founded universities in Cracow and Vienna and was a generous patron of the arts. In 1367 he left Avignon and returned the papacy to Rome, which he found in miserable condition. He devoted himself to rebuilding and renovation, including St. John Lateran Church, which had burned down in 1360. He returned to Avignon just before his death.
199. Gregory XI (French)†	Dec. 30, 1370–Mar. 27, 1378	The last of the Avignon popes. Upon appeal from Catherine of Siena, he returned the papacy to Rome in 1377. He devoted himself to the reform of religious orders and employed the Inquisition to stamp out heresy. Because of political factors, he had to leave Rome for Anagni under pressure from a hostile citizenry.
200. Urban VI†	Apr. 8, 1378–Oct. 15, 1389	Historians believe him to have been mentally unstable, volatile, and abusive. So intransigent and unreasonable was he that the French cardinals elected an antipope, Clement VII, thereby inaugurating the Great Western Schism of 1378–1417. Urban solidified his place in Rome through force, but he eventually alienated the people and it is said that he died of poisoning.
201. Boniface IX	Nov. 2, 1389–Oct. 1, 1404	Though he ruled like a benevolent despot, he was popular in Rome because his personality was so different from his predecessor's. He took no steps, however, to resolve the schism, even rejecting the conciliatory gestures of the antipope Benedict XIII. His reputation was marred by charges of nepotism and the selling of ecclesiastical offices and indulgences.
202. Innocent VII	Oct. 17, 1404–Nov. 6, 1406	Although he had promised to work toward the resolution of the schism, he rebuffed the efforts of the antipope Benedict XIII to reach some settlement.
203. Gregory XII	Nov. 30, 1406–July 4, 1415	In his eighties when elected, he at first attempted to heal the schism, but it became clear that neither claimant to the papal throne was ready to abdicate. He broke a preelection pledge and named new cardinals, including two nephews. This enraged some of his cardinal-supporters who then held a council at Pisa in 1409 where a third claimant was elected, Alexander V, who was succeeded the following year by John XXIII. Eventually Gregory resigned as part of a plan to end the schism and died on Oct. 18, 1417, three weeks before Martin V was elected.
204. Martin V†	Nov. 11, 1417–Feb. 20, 1431	His election at the Council of Constance ended the Great Western Schism. He entered a devastated Rome three years later and set about the task of rebuilding churches and public buildings and of restoring order to the Papal States.

205. Eugenius IV [Eugene]†	Mar. 3, 1431–Feb. 23, 1447	He tried to dissolve the Council of Basel in 1431, but it refused to disperse and instead appealed to the Council of Constance (1414–18) in declaring a general council superior to a pope. The pope had to withdraw his decree of dissolution and accept the council's validity. A revolt in Rome forced him to Florence where he remained for nine years. The Council of Florence in 1439 ratified a short-lived union with the Greek church.
206. Nicholas V	Mar. 6, 1447–Mar. 24, 1455	A conciliatory and politically astute man, he brought peace to Rome and the Papal States. The first of the Renaissance popes, he was a patron of literature, the arts, and architecture. When Constantinople was sacked by the Turks in 1453, Europeans were terrified. The pope tried unsuccessfully to mount a crusade of liberation.
207. Callistus III [Calixtus] (Spanish)	Apr. 8, 1455–Aug. 6, 1458	His pontificate focused on the recapture of Constantinople, but the costs were regarded as too high by others and the campaign never received the necessary military and political support in the West. His nepotism was especially resented. One of two nephews he made cardinals was the future infamous Alexander VI.
208. Pius II†	Aug. 19, 1458–Aug. 15, 1464	He, too, was preoccupied with the effort to combat the Turkish advance into Europe, but like his predecessor he could not muster the necessary forces or resources. He died while waiting to set sail for battle.
209. Paul II	Aug. 30, 1464–July 26, 1471	A very unpopular pope, he refused to implement the program of reform expected of him by the cardinal-electors. He loved luxury, sport, and entertainment. Many humanists detested him for his treatment of scholars and the suppression of the Roman academy. He installed the first printing press in Rome. Like his immediate predecessors, he failed to marshal support for a crusade against the Turks.
210. Sixtus IV†	Aug. 9, 1471–Aug. 12, 1484	A Franciscan, he supported the mendicant orders and canonized Bonaventure. He focused too much, however, on temporal power over the Papal States and on the interests of his own family, making six nephews cardinals. His profligate ways left his successor with a huge deficit, but he transformed Rome from a medieval to a Renaissance city. He also built the Sistine Chapel and established the Vatican archives.
211. Innocent VIII	Aug. 29, 1484–July 25, 1492	The papacy sunk to the depths of worldliness in this pontificate; Innocent left Rome insolvent and the Papal States in anarchy.
212. Alexander VI (Spanish)†	Aug. 11, 1492–Aug. 18, 1503	The nephew of Callistus III, he lived a dissolute life before and after election and fathered several children. At first he restored order in Rome and made promises to address other problems such as the Turkish threat, but it soon became clear that the interests of his own family had the highest priority. Nepotism and unbridled sensuality were the hallmarks of his pontificate. He was pope when Christopher Columbus landed on American soil in 1492. (Alexander V was antipope 1409–10.)
213. Pius III	Sept. 22–Oct. 18, 1503	A compromise, or stopgap, candidate in poor health, he died ten days after his coronation.
214. Julius II†	Nov. 1, 1503–Feb. 21, 1513	His election ensured by exaggerated promises and bribes, he strengthened the Papal States and secured the independence of the Church from foreign powers. He was a patron of artists such as Michelangelo and Raphael, and he commissioned plans for the new St. Peter's Basilica, to be funded by the "sale" of indulgences.
215. Leo X†	Mar. 11, 1513–Dec. 1, 1521	His personal extravagance, military campaigns, and engagement in the construction of St. Peter's led the Church into deep debt that he tried to reduce through the selling of offices and indulgences. The Dominican John Tetzel and the Augustinian monk Martin Luther reacted, and the Protestant Reformation soon followed. Leo excommunicated Luther in 1521.

216. Hadrian VI [Adrian] (Dutch)†	Jan. 9, 1522–Sept. 14, 1523	The only Dutchman elected to the papacy and the last non-Italian until John Paul II in 1978. His nationality was resented by the Romans and his efforts to bring reforms and financial belt-tightening to the Curia were resisted by the cardinals. He also failed in efforts to deal with the Turkish threat or to deal effectively with Luther's challenge to Rome.
217. Clement VII†	Nov. 19, 1523–Sept. 25, 1534	During his pontificate Rome was invaded and sacked by the imperial forces and he had to live away from the city for nearly a year. He did not recognize the gathering clouds of the Reformation and refused the emperor's request to call a council in order to deal with the crisis. England and northern Europe drifted away from the Catholic Church during his reign.
218. Paul III†	Oct. 13, 1534–Nov. 10, 1549	A Renaissance pope in the best and worst senses of the word: a patron of the arts and a nepotist. He recognized the crisis of the Reformation and began laying out a program for renewal, including the reform of religious orders and the development of new congregations such as the Jesuits. But he also established the Congregation of the Roman Inquisition (Holy Office). He called the Council of Trent in 1545, but suspended it in 1548.
219. Julius III	Feb. 8, 1550–Mar. 23, 1555	Like his predecessor, a quintessential Renaissance pope. The Council of Trent reconvened in 1551, but had to be suspended a second time in 1552 because of political and military problems. He encouraged the Jesuits and welcomed the temporary return of England to Catholicism under Queen Mary. He appointed Michelangelo chief architect of St. Peter's.
220. Marcellus II	Apr. 9–May 1, 1555	One of the few popes in modern times to retain his baptismal name (Hadrian VI, the Dutchman, had also done so). His pontificate began on a note of promise with a modest coronation rite, a reduction of the size of his Curia, and the discouragement of nepotism (he ordered his relatives to stay away from Rome). As he prepared to publish a comprehensive reform program, he died of a stroke after only twenty-two days in office.
221. Paul IV†	May 23, 1555–Aug. 18, 1559	At first reformers were delighted with his election at age seventy-nine, but they soon found him to be a pope in the triumphalistic, medieval mold. He was vehemently opposed to Protestants and Jews (confining them to a special quarter in Rome and requiring them to wear distinctive headgear), and he lent his strong personal support to the Inquisition. He created the Index of Forbidden Books in 1557. Upon his death crowds stormed the Inquisition and toppled his statue.
222. Pius IV	Dec. 25, 1559–Dec. 9, 1565	In personality and policies his pontificate was in striking contrast to Paul IV's. He reconvened the Council of Trent in 1562 (it had been suspended for ten years). He worked thereafter to have the council's decrees and teachings accepted throughout the Catholic world. In one of the few successful instances of nepotism in the papacy, he chose his nephew Charles Borromeo to be cardinal and archbishop of Milan.
223. Pius V, St.†	Jan. 7, 1566–May 1, 1572	A Dominican, he enforced the decrees of the Council of Trent, published the Roman Catechism, reformed the breviary (Divine Office) and the Roman Missal, and declared Thomas Aquinas a Doctor of the Church. His excommunication of Queen Elizabeth in 1570 had a very negative impact on Catholics in England, but the victory over the Turks at Lepanto in 1571 also occurred during his reign.
224. Gregory XIII†	May 14, 1572–Apr. 10, 1585	A firm promoter of the decrees of the Council of Trent and of Catholic reform generally. A strong supporter of the Jesuits, he reconstructed and endowed the Roman College, later called the Gregorian University in his honor. His name is more notably associated with the reform of the Julian calendar, completed in 1582, involving the dropping of ten days and the introduction of a leap year. It is still in use and is known as the Gregorian calendar.

225. Sixtus V†	Apr. 24, 1585–Aug. 27, 1590	A Franciscan, like Sixtus IV, he restored order to the Papal States by harsh and repressive means. He set the maximum number of cardinals at seventy, a total that was not exceeded until the pontificate of John XXIII (1958–63). He also reorganized the Roman Curia, which remained basically unchanged until Vatican II (1962–65). Through his building projects, including the completion of St. Peter's dome, he transformed Rome into a great Baroque city.
226. Urban VII	Sept. 15–27, 1590	He contracted malaria the night after his election and died before his coronation.
227. Gregory XIV	Dec. 5, 1590–Oct. 16, 1591	He made his incompetent nephew a cardinal and then secretary of state, which created resentment and opposition among the other cardinals. While he was pope, Rome suffered from plague, food shortages, and lawlessness.
228. Innocent IX	Oct. 29–Dec. 30, 1591	An elderly man when elected as a stopgap candidate, he had a short and undistinguished pontificate.
229. Clement VIII	Jan. 30, 1592–Mar. 5, 1605	Despite his faults, which included nepotism and a love of display, he restored prestige to the papacy. He reduced the influence of Spain in Church affairs, issued a corrected edition of the Vulgate, and reformed various liturgical books. But he also expanded the Index of Forbidden Books and intensified the severity of the Inquisition. The holy year of 1600 brought millions of pilgrims to Rome.
230. Leo XI	Apr. 1–27, 1605	A nephew of Leo X, he was elected with French support and in the face of Spanish opposition. However, he was already old and in poor health and died before the month was over.
231. Paul V†	May 16, 1605–Jan. 28, 1621	The pope who censured Galileo for teaching that the earth revolves around the sun. On the other hand, he promoted Church reform and encouraged missions, approving the use of the vernacular in the liturgy for China.
232. Gregory XV	Feb. 9, 1621–July 8, 1623	He decreed that papal elections should be conducted by secret ballot (a practice that remains in force today) and founded the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. He canonized Teresa of Ávila, Ignatius of Loyola, Philip Neri, and Francis Xavier.
233. Urban VIII†	Aug. 6, 1623–July 29, 1644	Historians refer to him as a "reckless nepotist" who created a brother and two nephews cardinals, advanced other family members, and enriched his relatives generally. He consecrated the new St. Peter's in 1626 and selected Castel Gandolfo for summer retreats—a place still used by popes to escape the summer heat of Rome.
234. Innocent X†	Sept. 15, 1644–Jan. 1, 1655	He was an elderly man when elected; his pontificate was dominated by his ambitious sister-in-law. He opposed the use of Chinese ritual in the liturgy in that country and condemned Jansenism.
235. Alexander VII	Apr. 7, 1655–May 22, 1667	Although he showered his family with Church offices and properties, he did permit the Jesuits in China to use Chinese rites and dispensed Chinese priests from praying the Divine Office in Latin. He confirmed the condemnation of Jansenism. He also commissioned Bernini to enclose St. Peter's piazza with two semicircular colonnades.
236. Clement IX	June 20, 1667–Dec. 9, 1669	He spent much of his short pontificate trying to resolve existing tensions and disputes involving Spain and France, and in assisting Venice (unsuccessfully) to recover Crete from the Turks.
237. Clement X	Apr. 29, 1670–July 22, 1676	He was elected at age seventy-nine, and his pontificate was marred by the nepotistic and avaricious behavior of his cardinal-assistant, related to him through a niece's marriage. Clement canonized an unusually large number of saints, including Rose of Lima, South America's first saint.

238. Innocent XI, Bl.†	Sept. 21, 1676–Aug. 12, 1689	Although a morally upright, antinepotist pope, he manifested Jansenist leanings, an impression accentuated by an apparently anti-Jesuit bias. He was in constant conflict with Louis XIV of France and the French church generally. He is regarded as the outstanding pope of the seventeenth century.
239. Alexander VIII	Oct. 6, 1689–Feb. 1, 1691	Elected at age seventy-nine, he was welcomed by the Romans as a pleasant contrast with Innocent XI. The Romans delighted in his worldly ways and blatant nepotism. He also lowered their taxes and food prices.
240. Innocent XII	July 12, 1691–Sept. 27, 1700	A reformer pope in the style of his hero Innocent XI, particularly in his campaign against nepotism. He reached a compromise with Louis XIV, ending a fifty-year political and religious impasse between France and the papacy.
241. Clement XI	Nov. 23, 1700–Mar. 19, 1721	His long and relatively ineffective pontificate was preoccupied with political troubles in Spain and continued debates about Jansenism in France. It was he who finally settled the argument between the Jesuits and Dominicans by siding with the latter in forbidding the use of Chinese rites (1704; reiterated in 1715). Persecution of Chinese Christians and the closing of missions followed. The prohibition was not lifted until 1939 by Pius XII.
242. Innocent XIII	May 8, 1721–Mar. 7, 1724	He disliked the Jesuits and even thought of suppressing the order when he learned that they were still using Chinese rites. His short pontificate, however, was marked by constant illness.
243. Benedict XIII	May 29, 1724–Feb. 21, 1730	A Dominican who retained his monastic life-style after election, he remained archbishop of Benevento but also took a direct pastoral interest in the diocese of Rome. Unfortunately, former associates from Benevento formed a corrupt inner circle around him, much to the detriment of his pontificate and popularity among the Roman citizenry.
244. Clement XII	July 12, 1730–Feb. 6, 1740	Elected at age seventy-nine and blind from the second year of his pontificate, he relied on poor advisers, especially his cardinal-nephew, and the international standing of the papacy continued to decline. He erected the famous Trevi Fountain in Rome.
245. Benedict XIV†	Aug. 17, 1740–May 3, 1758	He was elected after the longest conclave in modern times: six months. He cultivated good relations with many foreign countries and improved the financial condition of the Papal States. He also won the respect of non-Catholics for his generally tolerant and cultured ways.
246. Clement XIII	July 6, 1758–Feb. 2, 1769	His pontificate was dominated by the Jesuit issue. He was under heavy pressure from Portugal, and then France, Spain, Naples, and Sicily, to dissolve the order. He summoned a special consistory to discuss the matter but died the day before it met.
247. Clement XIV	May 19, 1769–Sept. 22, 1774	A Franciscan who had been friendly with the Jesuits before election, he saw his task as one of satisfying the Catholic powers' insistence that the Jesuit order be suppressed. After delaying his decision for four years, he finally acceded to their demands in 1773.
248. Pius VI†	Feb. 15, 1775–Aug. 29, 1799	He was pope during the French Revolution and denounced the Civil Constitution and the Declaration of the Rights of Man. Thereupon Napoleon Bonaparte invaded the Papal States and imposed arduous terms of peace. Pius was deposed as head of state and withdrew to Florence. He was later taken across the Alps and died as a prisoner.
249. Pius VII†	Mar. 14, 1800–July 20, 1823	A Benedictine, he entered into concordats with the Italian Republic and with France, but when he later excommunicated all "robbers of Peter's patrimony," he was arrested by Napoleon's forces, imprisoned near Genoa, and then taken to Fontainebleau. His captivity was severe, but his manner of bearing it enhanced his personal prestige. He restored the Jesuit order in 1814.

250. Leo XII	Sept. 28, 1823–Feb. 10, 1829	Elected with the support of conservative cardinals, he replaced Pius VII's liberal secretary of state and condemned indifferentism, religious toleration, and Freemasonry. He reinforced the Index of Forbidden Books and the Holy Office, reestablished the feudal aristocracy in the Papal States, and confined Jews once again to ghettos. He died an unpopular figure.
251. Pius VIII	Mar. 31, 1829–Nov. 30, 1830	He returned to the spirit and policies of Pius VII, generally opposing liberal movements in Ireland and Poland, but supporting the July (1830) revolution in Paris against King Charles X. He approved the decrees of the First Council of Baltimore in the United States in 1830.
252. Gregory XVI†	Feb. 2, 1831–June 1, 1846	A Camaldolese monk elected with the support of the conservatives, he banned railways in his territories, opposed Italian nationalism, and crushed an uprising in the Papal States with the help of Austria. Although he condemned freedom of conscience, freedom of the press, and the separation of Church and state, he also denounced slavery and the slave trade and encouraged a native clergy and hierarchy in mission lands.
253. Pius IX†	June 16, 1846–Feb. 7, 1878	He was elected as a moderate liberal, but his reputation soon changed when he refused to support the expulsion of Austrian forces from Italy. The Papal States were annexed to the new kingdom of Italy, and he refused thereafter to set foot outside the Vatican. He defined the Immaculate Conception (Mary was born without original sin) and called the First Vatican Council (1869–70), which defined papal primacy and papal infallibility. His was the longest pontificate in history.
254. Leo XIII†	Feb. 20, 1878–July 20, 1903	The first pope to attempt to bring the Church into the modern world. He called for a renewal of the thought of Thomas Aquinas and opened the Vatican archives to scholars. He supported biblical research and gave tentative support for democracy. His most famous encyclical, Rerum Novarum (Lat., "Of New Things"), promoted social justice and the rights of workers. During his pontificate, there was a vast missionary expansion of the Church.
255. Pius X, St.†	Aug. 4, 1903–Aug. 20, 1914	Taking an entirely different approach from Leo's, he emphasized the rights of the Church against temporal authorities and the purity of Catholic doctrine. He enforced the latter with an oath against Modernism and a vigorous prosecution of those suspected of heresy. He also reorganized the Curia, prepared a new code of canon law, encouraged early and frequent Communion, and reformed the liturgy.
256. Benedict XV†	Sept. 3, 1914–Jan. 22, 1922	His pontificate was overshadowed by the First World War, in which he maintained neutrality and was reduced to an observer. He called a halt to the internecine warfare between traditionalists and progressives in the Church, promoted reunion with the separated churches of the East, and promoted the missions.
257. Pius XI†	Feb. 6, 1922–Feb. 10, 1939	He encouraged lay participation in the mission of the Church, condemned contraception, and concluded a Lateran Treaty with Mussolini establishing the Vatican City State as a separate political entity. He opposed both Communism and Nazism and supported Franco in Spain. The number of missionaries doubled during his pontificate. He was the first pope to use the radio for communication.
258. Pius XII†	Mar. 2, 1939–Oct. 9, 1958	Pope during the Second World War, he was a firm opponent of Communism in the postwar years. He promoted biblical studies, liturgical renewal, and Marian devotion, defining the Assumption (Mary was taken bodily into heaven) and declaring a Marian Year. He was the first pope to be heard widely on radio and seen on television.

259. John XXIII†	Oct. 28, 1958–June 3, 1963	He called the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) to update the Church and brought a whole new pastoral and personal style to the papacy. Although elected at age seventy-seven and in office less than five years, he was one of the most beloved popes in history, by Catholics and non-Catholics alike. He was a strong proponent of ecumenism, peace, and social justice.
260. Paul VI†	June 21, 1963–Aug. 6, 1978	He continued the Second Vatican Council begun by his predecessor and assumed responsibility for implementing its decrees. He was the first pope to travel by airplane and to visit countries thousands of miles away from Rome. Although progressive in theology and social thought, his pontificate was forever marked by his divisive encyclical condemning contraception.
261. John Paul I†	Aug. 26–Sept. 28, 1978	Although he died after only thirty-three days in office, this humble man left his mark on history by being the first pope in centuries to refuse to be crowned. He was invested instead with the simple pallium of an archbishop.
262. John Paul II (Polish)†	Oct. 16, 1978–	The first Slavic pope and the first non-Italian since Hadrian VI (1522–23), he is also the most traveled pope in history. Although committed to the Second Vatican Council, much of his pontificate thus far has been dedicated to the containment of progressive ideas and practices following from that council. For that reason, it has been called a restorationist papacy. Others see him as the first postmodern pope, a strong and deeply spiritual leader guiding the Church toward a new century and a new millennium.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Populorum Progressio (pah-poo-lohr'uhm prohgres'ee-oh; Lat., "Progress of Peoples"), social encyclical issued in 1967 by Pope Paul VI. It expands Catholic teaching's concern about the gap between rich and poor to the differences and tensions between wealthy and impoverished countries. Therefore, the encyclical focuses on the problem of international development. Pope Paul is forceful in his insistence that development is spiritual and cultural, as well as economic. He urges a "complete humanism" that accentuates "the fully rounded development of the whole man and of all men" (n. 42).

Backing the call to development is the theological claim that God intends the earth and its goods for use by everyone. A growing gap between rich and poor nations inhibits God's intention from being realized. Therefore, Populorum Progressio emphasizes the necessity of aid to poor nations and that trade between nations be regulated by the principle of social justice.

Pope Paul also picks up and carries forward Pope John XXIII's insistence in Pacem in Terris (1963) that peace is intimately bound up with economic justice. Peace is not the mere absence of war, but a quality of relationship between persons and nations. For this reason, Pope Paul argues that "the new name for peace is development" (nn. 76–87). See also Catholic social teachings; encyclicals, social.

Porphyry, ca. 232–ca. 303, Neoplatonic philosopher who was biographer and popularizing successor of Plotinus; author of commentaries on classical philosophy influential for the Middle Ages. His direct importance for Christian literature is twofold: a consistent opponent of religious credulity, he wrote a now-lost, sophisticated and fierce attack on Christian beliefs, including biblical interpretation, which elicited elaborate apologetic refutations, notably from Eusebius of Caesarea. While Augustine joined the criticisms in his mature work, Porphyry's writings were likely among the "Platonist books" to which his religious development was indebted. See also Neoplatonism.

Porras y Allon, St. Rafaela Maria (paw-rahs' ee i-ohn'), 1850–1925, Spanish-born founder of the Handmaids of the Sacred Heart, devoted to teaching children and to retreat work. Feast day: January 6.

Porres, St. Martin de. See Martin de Porres, St.

portal (Lat., "gate"), the main door of a church or cathedral.

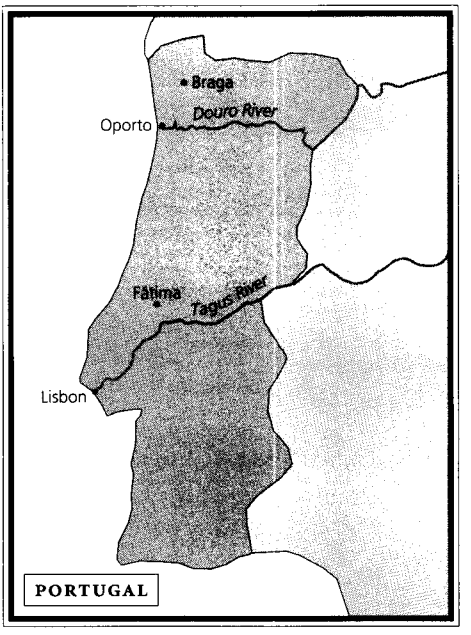
porter, the first and lowest of the old minor orders. Originally the porter's duties included guarding the doors of the church from entry by unauthorized people, calling the community to worship by the ringing of the bells, and assisting the preacher. The office was abolished by Pope Paul VI in 1972. Laypersons now perform its functions. See also minor orders.

Portiuncula, chapel near Assisi, Italy, also known as St. Mary of the Angels, the main church of St. Francis.

Port-Royal, Cistercian convent and Jansenist center near Versailles, founded in 1204. The convent in 1602 came under the direction of a ten-year-old abbess, Jacqueline Marie Angélique Arnauld (1591–1661). Through her spiritual director, the Abbé de Saint-Cyran (1581–1643), Port-Royal attracted devout laypersons who took no vows (known as "Solitaires"), including Antoine Arnauld (1612–94), and became a center of Jansenism, a morally rigorist movement. In 1661 the nuns refused to acknowledge the papal condemnation of five Jansenist propositions contained in Cornelius Jansen's Augustinus, which led to their persecution. Some nuns were transferred (1664), others forbidden the sacraments. In 1679 the archbishop of Paris prohibited new novices to Port-Royal, and in 1709, when the nuns again refused to condemn Jansenism unconditionally, the convent was closed. See also Arnauld, Jacqueline Marie Angélique; Jansen, Cornelius; Jansenism.

Portugal, Catholicism in. It is traditionally believed that Catholicism was brought to Lusitania, the Portuguese area of the Iberian Peninsula, through the missionary work of St. James during the apostolic age. By the beginning of the fifth century the majority of the population in the peninsula was Christian. In A.D. 409 the Swabians and later the Visigoths settled in Portugal. The Lusitanians suffered a religious crisis until the Swabians were converted by Martin of Braga in the 550s.

Muslims invaded the Iberian Peninsula in 711 and ruled for over five hundred years. Christian Crusaders drove them out beginning in 1212. The reconquest of Portugal by the Christians under Alfonso III (d. 1279) was concluded in 1249 with the victorious battle for Algarve. To this day the liturgical feast of the Vitória dos Cristãos (Port., "Christian's Victory") is celebrated in Portugal in commemoration of the expulsion of the Moors.



In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, while the unity of the Church was being challenged throughout Europe, Portugal and Spain remained loyal to the Church. In the age of exploration, Portugal established colonies in Indonesia, India, Malaysia, China, Japan, Africa, and Brazil, opening the way for evangelization therein. However, these missionary efforts were sometimes corrupted by an unholy alliance between the Church and business and political interests.

The Church suffered a major anticlerical attack from 1750 to 1777 under the Marquis of Pombal. Pombal expelled the Jesuits in 1759 and restricted the activity of the clergy. Pombal's sanctions were temporarily lifted during the reign of Maria I. Anticlericalism continued through the nineteenth century, but Catholicism prevailed in the Concordat of 1886. With the emergence of the Portuguese Republic in 1910, the Law of Separation of Church and State was passed to eliminate Catholicism from the country. The Church was disestablished the following year. However, the people from the north continued to support the Church, and the reported apparition of the Blessed Mother at Fátima in 1917 strengthened the Catholic faith of the Portuguese people.

Relations with the Vatican were resumed in 1918. The political separation of Church and state was finalized by Antonio Salazar (d. 1968) with the Concordat with the Vatican in 1940. The Catholic Church was once again allowed to maintain private schools, and most of its property was restored.

Among the most prominent Portuguese saints are Anthony de Padua, John of God, John de Britto, Eulália of Mérida, Rudesind, and Theotonius. Elizabeth of Portugal was originally from Saragossa, Spain. Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception was proclaimed the patron saint of Portugal in 1645 by King John IV.

In 1994 Catholics constituted about 93 percent of the total population of over 10.5 million. There are one patriarchate, two archdioceses, and seventeen dioceses. MARIA L. CARRANO positive theology, theological inquiry based on historical facts and concrete data (e.g., liturgical practice, religious customs). It is characterized by an inductive approach in contrast to the more deductive methods of natural theology, philosophical theology, and systematic theology. One form of positive theology is historical theology. See also theology.

positive way. See ways of the spiritual life.

positivism, a type of philosophy according to which the human intellect can know only that which can be apprehended by the human senses and tested empirically. As a result, it denies the possibility of metaphysics and theology. It is exhibited in the positive philosophy of Auguste Comte (1798–1857) and the "logical positivism" of Alfred Jules Ayer (1910–89). See also philosophy and theology.

Possevino, Antonio, 1534–1611, Italian Jesuit missionary and diplomat. One of the most versatile and gifted Jesuits of his age, he worked to obtain the conversion of Protestant Sweden through King John III, and obtained papal absolution for Henry of Navarre. He was one of the first Westerners to visit Muscovy in 1581 as a papal emissary, where he unsuccessfully discussed church union with the staunchly Orthodox Czar Ivan IV, "the Terrible."

Postel, St. Mary Magdalene, 1756–1846, French-born founder of the Sisters of Christian Schools of Mercy. She worked in the field of religious education. Feast day: July 16.

postulancy, program to prepare a candidate for the novitiate in a religious community. Many religious communities attempt to assist the emotional, intellectual, and spiritual development of their candidates even before the novitiate. Such programs vary considerably from one religious community to another, and often the term itself might not be used for such a program. See also novitiate; religious institute.

postulant, a candidate for the novitiate in a religious institute who is participating in a formal program called a postulancy. See also novitiate; postulancy; religious institute.

poverty, a state of material deprivation and dependence. Poverty is usually considered a lack of physical necessities, such as food, clothing, and shelter. The greatest poverty is loss of life.

Early in OT history, the Israelites considered poverty a sign of divine chastisement; however, their experience of exile gradually transformed that understanding to one in which the poor became the faithful who humbly relied on God for all needs. Christ manifested the religious character of poverty. The giving of his own life for the sake of others revealed the redemptive value of sacrifice.

Involuntary poverty embodies the real, though often unacknowledged, human condition of reliance on God. Voluntary poverty freely embraces this state of dependence for the purpose of providing more generous service of others, in imitation of Jesus. Spiritual poverty is a form of voluntary physical poverty in which one acknowledges dependence on God for material and spiritual needs. Sensitivity to the spiritual and material needs of others is a fruit of spiritual poverty.

The evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and the religious vow of poverty underscore human dependence on God and the interdependence of all creatures. Francis of Assisi (d. 1226) gave a special meaning to institutional poverty through the Franciscan order, which he founded. Franciscans commit themselves to a life of poverty and simplicity, and to the service of the poor. See also counsels, evangelical; Franciscan order; Franciscan spirituality; Spiritual Franciscans.

power, the capacity to effect action. The OT contains no speculation on the nature, origin, or exercise of power. Israel was, of course, familiar with the reality of political power, as a result of subjection by the superpowers of the day, successively Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, Persia, Macedonia, and Rome. The political power of its own rulers was also a present and sometimes oppressive reality. A steady refusal to grant such power ultimate validity is evident, especially in the prophetic writings. Psalms in particular often express a sense of powerlessness in the face of not only political realities but also cosmic forces threatening the return of chaos, variously symbolized as Leviathan, Rahab, Tannin, Behemoth (Pss 74:13–14; 89:10; Job 3:8; 9:13). Ultimate power rests with God, a conviction generally expressed in terms of the political realities of kingship and imperium (e.g., Isa 6:1–5). The idea of divine power focuses on creation, to which appeal is made in speaking of divine control of nature (e.g., Amos 4:13; 5:8–9; 9:5–6; Job 38–39), the powerlessness of other gods, and the folly of those who worship them (e.g., Isa 44:9–20; 45:9–13).

The NT adds nothing new to this belief in divine power but affirms that God has made his power available for salvation in Jesus (Matt 28:18–20). Early Christians were aware of contemporary belief in autonomous cosmic forces ("rulers and authorities in the heavenly places"; Eph 3:10) but denied either their autonomy or their reality. The endowment of Jesus with power is revealed in miracle (for which the Greek word dynamis, "power," is often used; e.g., Matt 7:22) and exorcism, the casting out of Satan and voiding of his power. At the same time, the Gospels relay the message that the exercise of power and authority is to be eschewed in favor of service (Luke 22:25–26; John 13:14–15). Indeed, Jesus charged his disciples not to be engaged in any struggle for power among themselves (Matt 20:20–28; Mark 10:35–45). JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP power of the keys. See keys, power of the.

Praemunire (pray-m*oo*-neer'ay; Lat., "to fortify in front"), English statute (1353) forbidding appeals to courts outside of England in cases where royal courts could exercise jurisdiction. Originally aimed at appeals to the papal Curia in cases involving English benefices, the statute was infrequently invoked until Henry VIII (d. 1547), who used it for political ends. It was finally repealed in 1967. See also benefice; England, Catholicism in.

Praepositinus of Cremona (pray-pahz-i-teen' uhs), ca. 1140–1210, theologian and liturgist at the University of Paris, whose writing on the symbolism of the Offices exerted considerable influence.

Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438), a decree governing the relations of the Church and state in France. Negotiated with the Council of Basel by King Charles VIII, the sanction curtailed papal rights to award French benefices, interfere in French canon law cases, and levy taxes in France. Gallicanism, the movement in support of independence of the French church from Roman interference, appealed to the Pragmatic Sanction. See also Gallicanism.

pragmatism, a school or perspective in philosophy that holds as its central claim the notion that ideas are authentic or true only insofar as they have practical consequences that verify the ideas. Widely considered to be an American branch of philosophy, pragmatism was nurtured by utilitarian thought, and is represented by William James (1842–1910) and John Dewey (1859–1952). Pragmatism may have influenced the Catholic Modernists, since they judged that the Church needed to restate its teachings to make their meaning more relevant to the concerns of twentieth-century Christians.

Prague, Infant of, statue of the child Jesus in kingly crown and robes. Smaller reproductions were popular objects of devotion before Vatican II (1962–65). The original eighteen-inch-high statue was donated by Princess Polixena to Our Lady of Victory Church, Prague, in 1628.

Prat, Ferdinand (prah), 1857–1938, French scripture scholar. After ordination as a Jesuit in 1885, and studies in oriental languages and exegesis in Beirut, Paris, and Rome, he taught in France, Belgium, and Lebanon. He was one of the first consultors to the Pontifical Biblical Commission (1902–7), and is author of the influential The Theology of St. Paul (Eng. trans. 1926) and The Life and Teaching of Jesus (Eng. trans. 1950).

praxis (Gk., "doing," "performing"), the aspect of Christian discipleship expressed through actions and choices. Liberation theologies and religious education theorists (e.g., Thomas Groome) in particular have emphasized the importance of reflective activity, maintaining that the content of faith must be formed not only by acts of worship and intellectual assent to a body of truth-claims but also by participation in efforts aimed at transforming human persons and communities. A commitment to praxis does not depreciate worship or theological reflection but challenges them to become ever more consistent parts of an inseparable whole, leading to, issuing from, and enriching one another. See also liberation theology; religious education.

PRAYER

Prayer is the act by which one enters into conscious, loving communion with God. Prayer acknowledges the existence of a relationship between God and humanity and, more specifically, that God relates to each human being with ongoing solicitude and benevolence. All prayer is based on the underlying reality of personhood and the ability of persons to be present to one another. A divine Person interacts with human persons who reach out to the One who sustains all creatures. When prayer is directed to the mother of Christ or a saintly intercessor, the one prayed to is viewed as connected with God.

The basic sense of the word "prayer" as entreaty, supplication, and petition is the introductory phase of approaching the One who is infinite power and limitless goodness. In addition to petition, prayer is also intercession, thanksgiving, repentance, adoration, and praise. Scriptural phrases to describe the way in which people pray include "call upon," "intercede with," "meditate on," "consult," "cry out to," "draw near to," "rejoice in," and "seek the face of."

Definitions of prayer from the great teachers of the Christian tradition include raising the mind to God (John Damascene), conversation and discussion with God (Gregory of Nyssa), affectionate directing of the mind to God (Augustine), intimate sharing between friends (Teresa of Ávila), and loving attentiveness to God (John of the Cross).

All Christian explanations of prayer agree that the initiative comes from God, who moves people to the act of praying. Grace disposes the mind and heart and energizes the praying throughout. The human spirit is raised to enlightenment and love through the guidance of the Holy Spirit. The objects of prayer can be temporal or spiritual goods for oneself or for others. A person cannot request something evil, since that would deny the intrinsic nature of an all-good God and be a perversion of prayer.

In praying, people acknowledge divine truth, mercy, and power. Christian pray-ers celebrate the Good News of Jesus Christ, revealing God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Their pleas for God's help or praise of the divine goodness are rooted by faith in Christ. This faith moves toward hope and reaches out to embrace God in love. They believe in the divine willingness to come to their aid, they trust in the salvation made available to them, and they are moved to love the One who pours out infinite love on them.

The power of prayer is affirmed throughout Scripture. It does not reverse the divine will, but in the eternal designs prayer is causally connected to the outcome desired. Prayer, then, is part of the decrees whereby providence works unto good. Strength, comfort, and resignation are given to the pray-er even if what is asked does not come to pass exactly as requested.

By praying, individuals are changed, raised to a new level of spiritual being that affects understanding and behavior. Increase in virtue should be the fruit of praying. Interaction with other people should be marked by greater charity, compassion, and willingness to be of service. A new freedom from deep-rooted, self-centered attachments begins to emerge. Selfishness gives way to an awareness of others that is based on deeper awareness of God. Perceptions are cleansed and capacities for joy increased. Suffering and pain are linked to the central mysteries of redemption. Earthly passage is directed toward its goal in eternity. Prayer, then, is meant to influence the way people live by turning their attention to the divine dimension of earthly existence.

VOCAL PRAYER

Vocal prayer uses words that are recited, spoken, or sung. It may draw on already composed material with a long history in a particular culture or community. It may also be spontaneous. The Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, liturgical texts, psalms, litanies, and ejaculations are examples of centuries-old vocal prayers. In public worship, words combine with gestures to make up the ritual of the Church's official ceremonies.

Vocal prayer is particularly expressive in devotions, with their more individualistic, expansive character. Less strictly regulated than liturgical worship, public devotional practices lack the power and austerity of liturgy. But they have a warm emotional immediacy. Private devotions, the choice of the suppliant, are able to focus on what evokes the strongest personal response. However, devotional prayer alone can keep one at a less profound and even superstitious level of religious awareness.

Liturgical celebration rises out of the local Christian community but unites it to all believers on earth and to the Church Suffering in purgatory and the Church Triumphant in heaven. It represents the praying congregation at its highest level of worship. Sacramental reality joins heaven and earth in a union that empowers physical being with the transcendent dynamism of Christ's living mysteries. Ritual observances, especially when linked to the Eucharist, educate the pray-er through symbol and bodily action. Without a connection to the Church, prayer can become idiosyncratic.

MENTAL PRAYER

Mental prayer refers to a reflective process that involves mind, imagination, and will. Beginning as meditation on divine realities, it pulls in the wandering mind in order to focus it. For authentic prayer to take place, eventually the heart must be moved. Meditation methods like the Ignatian and Sulpician are made up of considerations, affections, petitions, and resolutions. Methods with such carefully laid out schemas did not appear until the fifteenth century. Contemporary practices like journaling, imaging, and narrative techniques have a strong psychological component that aims at self-understanding in order to facilitate spiritual development and its expression in praying.

Monastic approaches to mental prayer still draw on ancient customs, echoed in the twelfth century, that speak of lectio (Lat.), reading, as seeking the sweetness of the blessed life, meditation as finding it, prayer as asking for it, and contemplation as tasting it.

Meditation practices should gradually move into a more affective mode. Thinking decreases and the heart is easily aroused to fervor. Charismatic renewal is an example of the power of affective prayer on the group level. Eventually affective prayer simplifies even more and is increasingly drawn to interior stillness. The multiplicity of acts by mind or heart are silenced into one single act of longing that is more like a state of being. This stage is aptly called the prayer of simplicity. Other names given to it are the prayer of faith, of repose, of simple regard, or of the simple presence of God. It has also been designated as active contemplation, a phrase used less frequently today.

Contemporary prayer methods focus increasingly on this stage of simplification. The Jesus Prayer, or Prayer of the Heart, which comes from the Christian Eastern monastic tradition, and the various forms of centering prayer deal with praying in the simplified mode. Non-Christian spiritual techniques from Asia, with their emphasis on mindfulness and interior emptying, have influenced some Christian simplification practices. A mantra's power to focus interior attention is analogous to the teaching of the fourteenth-century Cloud of Unknowing. However, a Christian word or phrase repeated in order to hold the mind's attention always bears some theological content. Active recollection, described by Teresa of Ávila, while appropriate to all stages, is especially helpful when interior calming occurs. In Teresa's practice, the Christian mysteries always play a dominant role.

PASSIVE PRAYER

Simplified prayer reaches out to contemplation. In some spiritual literature, the term "contemplation" can mean an inward summarizing glance of love that is still in the active mode of praying. But monastic teachers and especially the Carmelite school always use contemplation to describe infused passive prayer. Pure gift of God and wholly beyond the power of human effort to generate, it initiates the mystical encounter with the divine Beloved.

Contemplation in its earliest form is passive recollection, sometimes considered the prayer of simplicity with an infused element. The pray-er at this stage needs at times to reach out actively to make contact with God. Therefore, it is a transitional phase in which the infused gift, still weak, does not occupy the inner attention entirely. The prayer of quiet is a deeper form of passive recollection. The heart is held, but mind and imagination are often free to wander.

Simplified prayer before the onset of infused contemplation and even in the first passive stages often bears with it the suffering of aridity and distractions. The radical decrease of material that the mind finds nourishing leaves the understanding open to the onslaught of useless imaginings. Prayer, as it simplifies, cleanses excessive attachments to what is less than God and increasingly demands greater purity of conscience. Temptations can seem stronger than before because the cleansing effect of more advanced prayer uncovers the psychic compromises people make with their imperfections. To someone used to the sweetness of the earlier stages, especially in affective prayer with its high emotional content, the bleak desert of contemplative purgation can seem like moving backward.

Longing for God continues and deepens in the desert. A simple gaze of love unifies one's being, overflowing into one's life. One looks at ordinary existence with new eyes, seeing the mark of God on everyone and everything. Prayer, no longer a set time on the clock, permeates all activity and all rest. Awareness of the Divine Presence transforms perceptions.

In the prayer of full union, the inflowing of contemplation controls the interior faculties of mind, imagination, and will so powerfully that a person is wholly caught up in God. In the next stage of ecstatic union, absorption or rapture seizes the pray-er so that the senses can no longer communicate with the outside world. Spiritual betrothal and spiritual marriage are the last phases of mystical prayer. Here transformation in God reaches its completion, but the pray-er still retains his or her distinct being.

Intoxicating fulfillments in passive prayer are granted at the cost of intense suffering. A person advances in holiness and virtue through the strengthening discernment of contemplation. But the path can be enveloped in deep, crucifying darkness. John of the Cross describes this passage as the "night of the senses" and the later, much more terrible "night of the spirit." Spiritual purification is exquisitely fitted to each person's particular temperament and personal history. Just as the final transformation in God realizes a unique, unrepeatable beauty in each human being, so the preparatory cleansing is apportioned in degree and kind by a God who knows how to apply the process of purification with infinitely loving precision.

Extraordinary phenomena like private revelations, visions, locutions, unexplained fragrances, levitation, and the stigmata are peripheral to holiness. If communicated by God, they instruct and encourage but are not of the essence of mystical contemplation, which always proceeds in faith. They can be a hindrance when valued possessively.

Contemplative experience, even at its lowest levels of passive recollection and quiet, exhibits characteristics that are manifested later in greater fullness. Mystics describe these qualities in experiential phrases: the perception of God's living presence; felt inward quiet; the taste of everlasting life; love burning but not consuming; the wine of inebriating joy; blessedness irradiating every passing moment with eternity.

Mystics testify to the apostolic power of prayer, which serves the Church and the world by drawing down divine blessings. Even when prayer is not in the distinctly intercessory form, the saints attest to its efficacy for achieving good and conquering evil.

Prayer stages are not distinct divisions. A person does not pass beyond an early stage, never to return there. Earlier characteristics can appear in more advanced prayer. One must pray as one can since God has infinite adaptability. The great teachers of spirituality urge never giving up a practice that is the source of so much goodness.

Prayer at every stage is the conversation of heaven already begun on earth. It realizes human potential through a deepening perceptual process. This takes individuals to the dimension of earthly existence where the divine exemplar is already imprinted on their creaturehood. In prayer, the indwelling Trinity calls to persons, conforming them more and more to the image of the Incarnate Word.

See also spirituality, Christian.

Bibliography

Balthasar, Hans Urs von. Prayer. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1986.
The Classics of Western Spirituality. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1978.
Cunningham, Lawrence. Catholic Prayer. New York: Crossroad, 1989.
Foster, Richard J. Prayer: Finding the Heart's True Home. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1992.
Wright, John H. A Theology of Christian Prayer. 2d ed. New York: Pueblo Publishing Co., 1988.

MARGARET DORGAN

Prayer, Apostleship of. See Apostleship of Prayer.

Prayer After Communion, a prayer concluding the Communion rite; formerly termed the "postcommunion." After the Communion of the people, a period of silence may follow. The prayer after Communion, usually beginning with a reference to the assembly's Communion and then moving to the effects of this union in Christ, concludes the rite.

Prayer of the Faithful, the litany of general intercessions at Mass or during the Liturgy of the Hours. Appropriate subjects for the Prayer of the Faithful include the Church and its ministers, civil authorities, the world and its peoples, the health and physical well-being of the ill or physically challenged, those who are dying, the faithful deceased, those who mourn, those who are receiving special rites such as Baptism or Matrimony, and those observing anniversaries or birthdays. On Good Friday, the Prayer of the Faithful assumes an especially solemn character as each intercession is followed by silent prayer and what was formerly (before 1965) called a Collect, or prayer recited by the priest in which the intentions of the congregation are "collected" together and presented to God.

Prayer over the Gifts, formerly termed the "Secret," a silent oration, prayed after the bread and wine are placed on the altar, that concludes the rite of Preparation of the Altar and the Gifts. The prayer generally mentions presenting gifts to God with a petition for their transformation.

Prayer over the People, an extended form of blessing used on certain occasions (e.g., the Sundays of Advent). Part of the dismissal rite, this prayer in the form of a Collect, in which the priest "collects" the prayers of the congregation and presents them to God, precedes the simple blessing formulary. Its content relates to the season or mystery celebrated. See also blessing.

prayers for the dead, the custom of praying that God will admit into heaven the souls of the departed still in purgatory. According to Catholic doctrine, people who die in the state of sanctifying grace may have committed unabsolved venial sins or still owe temporal punishment for other sins already forgiven in the past. In these cases, atonement must be made before the soul can enjoy the Beatific Vision in heaven. By praying for the "poor souls" in purgatory, the Church Militant (living members of Christ's Body on earth) intercedes for the Church Suffering (deceased members of the Church as yet unperfected). In this way, the living help to hasten the admission of the dead into the company of the saints. The liturgical celebration of All Souls' Day on November 2 each year is an example of this ancient practice. So are Masses of Christian Burial and anniversary Masses for departed relatives and friends. Prayers for the dead, however, need not be restricted to liturgical celebrations. One may offer a prayer such as: "Lord, have mercy on her soul," or "May his soul and all the souls of the faithful departed, through the mercy of God, rest in peace." In defending this custom, Catholics refer to 2 Macc 12:42; 45–46 where the text seems to encourage such prayers. Christians have prayed for their dead from the time of the Roman persecutions. See also purgatory.

Preachers, Order of. See Dominican order.

preaching, canon law concerning, norms regulating preaching, which is the proclamation of the word of God by one authorized to do so, usually a bishop, priest, or deacon (cans. 762–72). Canon law is concerned with the regulation of preaching in order to ensure that the word of God is properly proclaimed; it is considered one of the chief duties of ordained ministers. Bishops may preach anywhere in the world, and universal canon law allows priests and deacons to do the same unless the local bishop explicitly forbids them to do so.

In Church law two kinds of preaching are considered: the homily, a sermon based on the scriptural readings of the day's Mass, which is part of the liturgy itself, and other preaching, such as at a prayer service, a parish mission, a retreat, or a day of recollection. The first kind of preaching is reserved to an ordained minister. People other than clerics, however, may speak at Masses, for example, where many children are present if they may be better understood by the children. The second kind of preaching is to be regulated by norms established by the bishops' conference in each country; this kind of preaching is open to qualified laypersons as well as clerics. Preaching is not only for instruction, but also to bring people to faith. See also homily.

preambles of faith, introductory premises or conditions of the act of faith. This phrase, not common in present-day Catholic theology, had its home in apologetic theology prior to Vatican II (1962–65).

It was part of an analytical account of the conditions and logic of the act of faith. The preambles of faith are those things that can be known historically and through reason; together they generate the reasonableness or credibility of the object of faith. Since faith is a free act and its object transcends all this-worldly knowledge, the preambles of faith do not establish faith but only lead one to its threshold.

A good example of the preambles of faith is the use of Jesus' miracles in neo-Thomistic fundamental theology. The Gospel miracles were taken at face value to be overt manifestations of the divine in history that established the divinity of Jesus, his authority, and the authority of the Church he founded. The content of Jesus' revelation remained the transcendent object of a free act of faith. But as a preamble to that faith Jesus' miracles established reasonably and with a degree of certainty that Jesus' teachings were expressions of divine revelation. See also apologetics; faith and reason.

precedence, ranking given a member of the hierarchy, clergy, or a religious community in accord with law or custom. Such a ranking might determine the place of an individual in ceremonies or in voting groups. It might even determine the outcome of a tied election. The ranking is determined according to universal or particular norms.

precept, a canonical decree given to an individual by a legitimate authority (e.g., a bishop or religious superior). The decree obliges a person to act or enjoins a person from acting. A precept often urges the observance of an existing law.

Precepts of the Church. See Commandments of the Church.

preces (pray'chez; Lat., "prayers"), brief prayers of intercession. Preces may be said responsively, with an opening phrase delivered by a minister and a concluding phrase by an assembly. A common example is the prayer (versicle) "Rest eternal grant unto them, O God"; (response) "And may light perpetual shine upon them." Another (versicle) "Pray for us, O Blessed Virgin Mary"; (response) "That we may be made worthy of the promises of Christ."

Precious Blood, devotion to the, veneration of the blood of Jesus Christ as a symbol of his self-giving life (e.g., 1 Pet 1:18–19; Matt 26:28; John 19:34). The veneration of relics of Christ's blood began at Mantua in 553, Weingarten in 1090, and Bruges in 1158. Special devotions to the Precious Blood developed in the early 1800s, and in 1849 Pope Pius IX dedicated the first Sunday in July for the celebration of the feast of the Precious Blood. In 1960 Pope John XXIII approved the Litany of the Precious Blood. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) encouraged Christians to venerate the whole person of Jesus Christ and, as a result, the feast has been dropped from the liturgical calendar. For the full text of the litany, see The Raccolta (1957) or P. Klein, ed., Catholic Source Book (Dubuque, Iowa: Brown-ROA, 1990). See also blood of Christ.

Precious Blood Fathers (C.Pp.S.), religious community founded in Italy in 1815. The society's founder, Gaspare del Bufalo, envisioned a community of priests and brothers dedicated to the task of giving missions and fostering devotion to the Precious Blood, i.e., the blood shed by Christ on the cross for the redemption of the human race. The bond among the members was not a vow, but a charity. Their only distinguishing feature was a large crucifix on a gold chain, worn over a cassock and cincture. Although severely criticized by some as too novel, Gaspare's rule was approved by Pope Gregory XVI in 1841. The first American foundations began in Ohio in the 1840s. Eventually, the society spread to several states, and missions were also founded in South America.

predella (pray-dehl'ah; It., "footstool"), the platform at the top of several steps upon which an altar may be installed. See also altar.

predestination, the eternal, gracious, and infallible decree of God conferring human salvation. Using the language of such texts as Rom 8:29–30 and Eph 1:5, 11, this doctrine refers to the Church's faith that the salvation of the saints is the result of the knowledge (foreknowledge) and the unmerited, gratuitous, and sovereign act of God (election) and, therefore, is part of God's eternal will (decree). At the same time, because human beings are endowed by God with free will, salvation is consequent not only upon the free self-offer of God in love, but upon its free acceptance by the individual. The basic underlying issue is how to conceive the relationship between divine grace and human freedom.

Classic Formulations: The classic formulation of this problem arose in Augustine's (d. 430) disputes with Pelagius (d. ca. 425), who contended that the grace necessary for salvation is already given to all men and women in the free will with which they are endowed by God. Augustine countered that human nature had become so radically disordered by sin that only God's gratuitous decision to save could provide the unique grace necessary to liberate, empower, and guarantee true freedom (On Nature and Grace 53.62). But his theology so emphasized the power of grace and the utter dependence of human freedom upon it, that it became difficult to see how human self-determination was preserved. This emphasis led Augustine to speak at times of a double predestination, that of the saints to salvation and that of sinners to damnation (City of God 15.1). The Second Council of Orange (529), however, taught that no one is predestined by God to sin.

Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) emphasized that God desires all to be saved (1 Tim 2:4) and is ready to give grace to all. While affirming that God's will in predestination is infallibly effective, Aquinas insisted that God is able to move the human heart to the love of God in a manner that in no way diminishes human freedom (Summa Theologiae 1–2.113.3). God rejects only those who refuse grace (Summa Contra Gentiles 3.159.2). But at times, Aquinas can be read as leaning to a more Augustianian position. Appealing to texts such as Mal 1:2–3, Aquinas spoke of those whom God predestined to receive grace (thus revealing divine mercy) and those whom God reprobated in permitting them to remain in their sins (thereby revealing divine justice). Simply put, God frees some sinners from their sins and leaves others in them, according to the prerogative of God's sovereign freedom. In Aquinas's view, God is not unfair, for in bestowing a favor on some, God does not deprive others of what they are due. (Summa Contra Gentiles 3.161, Summa Theologiae 1.23.3, 5).

From the Reformation to the Twentieth Century: The doctrine of double predestination became central among several Reformers, notably John Calvin, who believed that God predestines not only to salvation but also to damnation. This doctrine represents a major break with the single predestination doctrine, found in the works of Aquinas and Augustine, and was condemned by the Council of Trent (1545–63). Its Decree on Justification (1547) is the most important formulation of official Church teaching on the necessity and gratuity of grace and the freedom of the individual under grace. Debate continued as evidenced in the extreme Augustinian writings of Michael Baius (condemned in 1567), in the "De Auxiliis" controversy about how grace aids human freedom to do good that developed in the late sixteenth century between the Dominicans (following Domingo Bañez) and the Jesuits (following Luis de Molina), and in the struggles with the Jansenists, who denied that Christ died for all human beings (condemned in 1653).

In the twentieth century, Karl Rahner (d. 1984) posed the question in somewhat different terms, insisting that God's eternal plan is the salvation of the whole world, not the salvation of some and the damnation of others. In Pauline terms, one should speak of predestination for salvation alone (Rom 8:29–30; cf. 1 Cor 15:22). God wills and effectively offers salvation to all (1 Tim 2:4, 4:10; Tit 2:11). Christ is the revelation that God has created human freedom in such a way that it is oriented toward divine life as its final goal. The term predestination, then, is simply a way of expressing God's universal saving will and eternal purpose as accepted by human freedom. History and free human decisions are not superfluous, because God cannot predetermine how individual free creatures will respond to the grace of Christ.

There has never been an undisputed consensus among theologians on the subject of predestination. Two things must be borne in mind concerning the relationship between divine grace and human freedom. First, as the tradition has stressed since Augustine, human freedom must be and is liberated by God's grace from the power of sin in order that it may become truly free and therefore able to respond to grace. Second, the necessity of a human response in freedom is in no way diminished by the action of God's grace in liberating human freedom. The Church has permitted a considerable range of opinion on the question, while always requiring that in some way both the necessity of the divine initiative and the reality of human self-determination and responsibility be maintained. See also De Auxiliis;* election, divine; nature and grace; providence; salvation.

Bibliography

Jüngel, Eberhard. God as the Mystery of the World. Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1983.

Kasper, Walter. The God of Jesus Christ. New York: Crossroad, 1984.

JOHN R. SACHS

preevangelization, those pastoral activities that prepare the way for the direct preaching of the gospel to those who are not yet ready or able to hear it. These may include works of charity, justice, and education designed to remove existing obstacles to evangelization, e.g., chronic illness, poverty, ignorance, and oppression. Some of these activities are now seen as "a constitutive dimension of the preaching of the gospel" (1971 World Synod of Bishops, "Justice in the World," par. 6). See also evangelization.

preexistence of Christ, the existence of the person of Christ prior to the Incarnation. Belief in Christ's preexistence developed within the early Church. Christians perceived Jesus Christ to be the Son of God who existed from all eternity (1 Cor 8:6; 2 Cor 8:9; Phil 2:5–11; John 1:14; Col 1:15–17; Heb 1:2–3). This biblical witness was affirmed in a condensed form in the creed of the Council of Nicaea (325), that from eternity the Son of God "was begotten" from the Father, "came down," "was made man," and "ascended." See also Jesus Christ.

Preface (pre'fis), the varying prayer of the Mass that immediately follows the Prayer over the Gifts and initiates the Eucharistic Prayer or Canon of the Mass and is an integral part of it. A dialogue precedes it and an acclamation ("Holy, Holy, Holy") follows. More than ninety prefaces are available for various feasts and seasons. An extended poem of praise and thanksgiving, each preface elaborates on God's work in creation and redemption while focusing on a particular aspect of God's saving work in Christ. See also Eucharistic prayer.

prefect apostolic, a priest in charge of a geographical area in which the local church has not grown sufficiently to be a diocese. The prefect apostolic has many of the same responsibilities as a diocesan bishop.

preferential option for the poor, an expression used in liberation theology, in the documents of the Latin American Bishops' Conference (CELAM), and in the social encyclicals of the pope to underscore the Church's primary commitment to the service of the poor, motivated by both charity and justice. "The Church's love for the poor," Pope John Paul II writes in his 1991 encyclical Centesimus Annus, "which is essential for [the Church] and a part of its constant tradition, impels it to give attention to a world in which poverty is threatening to assume massive proportions in spite of technological and economic progress. . . . [L]ove for the poor . . . is made concrete in the promotion of justice" (nn. 57, 58). See also Catholic social teachings.

prelate, a priest who has the power of governance in the external (public) forum. Such a classification includes all those considered ordinaries and certain officials of the Roman Curia. There are also honorary prelates, e.g., priests called by the title "monsignor" in the United States. See also external forum; Honorary Prelate of His Holiness; ordinary; prelates of honor.

prelate nullius, literally, the prelate without a diocese. He is the head of a territory independent from and equivalent to a diocese. The prelate nullius governs with powers similar to those of a diocesan bishop. The current term for a prelacy nullius is territorial prelacy.

It has also served as an honorary title, carrying no jurisdiction but entitling the bearer to the wearing of a special ecclesiastical costume and to a place of distinction in ceremonies. See also prelate.

prelates of honor, one class of priests commonly called "monsignors" in the United States. The title is purely honorary and is usually given by the Holy See at the request of a diocesan bishop. The bearer has the right to wear ecclesiastical garb similar to a bishop's. See also monsignor.

prelature, personal, a society of secular clergy (priests and deacons) established by the Apostolic See for the purpose of providing an equitable distribution of clergy or to perform particular apostolic works. It is governed by its own statutes and presided over by a prelate as its proper Ordinary, a bishop or priest who has authority over the society. The prelature's relations to the local Ordinary (the diocesan bishop) are defined in the statutes. The prelate has the right to establish seminaries, incardinate (formally enroll) the students, and promote them to Holy Orders. Laypeople can be affiliated with a personal prelature and share in its apostolic works and spiritual activities, as in Opus Dei, an organization of laity and clergy to bring the faith into ordinary life and especially the professions. See also Opus Dei; prelature, territorial.

prelature, territorial, also known as territorial abbacy, "a certain portion of the people of God which is established within certain territorial boundaries and whose care, due to special circumstances, is entrusted to some prelate or abbot who governs it as its proper pastor, like a diocesan bishop" (can. 370). See also abbot; pastor; prelate; prelature, personal.

Premonstratentian Canons. See Norbertines.

premoral evil, the undesirable dimension or disvalue of a human action that is relevant to, but not always determinative of, the act's morality, e.g., the loss of fertility in a necessary surgical procedure.

Premoral evil becomes morally evil when it is caused or permitted without a sufficient reason. See also evil, moral; proportionalism.

Preparation of the Gifts. See offertory.

Presanctified Liturgy, a Communion service in which the reserved eucharistic gifts, previously consecrated at a eucharistic liturgy (hence the name "presanctified"), are consumed. A Presanctified Liturgy is found in the Roman, Byzantine, and Maronite rites, and was once used in the Armenian, West Syrian, and East Syrian rites as well. In the Roman rite it is restricted to Good Friday, and is preceded by a Liturgy of the Word. In the Byzantine rite it is celebrated with Vespers. Intended for use on "aliturgical days" when the Eucharist was not celebrated, the Presanctified Liturgy results from the fourth-century practice of prohibiting the Eucharist, deemed festive, on Lenten ferias (weekdays without a special feast) and other days of fast and penance. In the East, Presanctified was an afternoon service, often celebrated with Vespers, because only one meal, taken in the evening, was allowed to those fasting; even Holy Communion was considered to break the fast. In Latin and Eastern monasteries, which usually had no daily Eucharist (and often no priest), it was customary for the religious to have Communion made available to them daily at a short monastic Presanctified service. The apocryphal attribution of the Byzantine Presanctified to Pope Gregory I does not antedate the twelfth century. See also Good Friday.

presbyter (prez'beht-uhr; Gk., presbyteros, "elder"), a term used for Church officials in the NT and early Church and currently, on occasion, as an alternative term for priest. Christian use of this term quite probably derives from postexilic Judaism, where councils of elders, lay leaders distinct from Jewish priestly families, functioned as synagogue leaders. When the term was applied to Christian community leaders, it sometimes was used interchangeably with the term episkopos (Gk., "overseer"), from which comes the English term bishop. Only at the end of the first century did the presbyter's role become distinct from that of the "overseer."

The presbyter of the second and third centuries functioned as a member of a council of advisors to the bishop and does not seem to have had a regular liturgical function. With the expansion of Christianity into rural areas, the presbyter came to have a distinctive role as community leader and presider at Eucharist. In the process, his role as advisor to the bishop was diminished. Gradually the presbyter came to be identified as a priest. It is likely that the English word "priest" comes from the Latin form presbyter and its contracted form, prester.

The term "presbyter" was used by Vatican II when it spoke of priests: the council desired to reflect NT usage; it wished to distinguish the priest from the bishop, in whom, the council teaches, the fullness of priesthood resides; and it sought to promote a notion of priestly ministry more extensive than one focused predominantly on worship. See also priest; priesthood.

presbyteral council, mandatory representative body, or senate, of priests serving as chief advisers to their diocesan bishop. For some matters the bishop must consult with the council to act validly, e.g., the erection, suppression, division, or merger of parishes, and in the determination of remuneration for the diocesan clergy. Following ancient tradition, however, the diocesan bishop should regularly consult the presbyteral council in all important matters of governance.

Statutes approved by the bishop according to the norms of the episcopal conference determine membership, about half to be elected by the priests. Most members will be diocesan priests. Some should serve ex officio; others may be appointed by the bishop. The bishop convokes and presides over the council and proposes its agenda. Items for discussion and consideration may, however, be received from any of its members.

presbyterate (prez-bit'uh-ruht), union, based upon ordination, of all the priests (presbyters), including religious priests, with the diocesan bishop. Antecedents of this understanding are found in second-century councils of presbyters united with the local bishop. After centuries of neglect, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) revived an appreciation of the sacramental bond between priests and bishop. See also priesthood.

Presbyterianism, a movement among Christian churches whose form of polity depends upon councils composed of presbyters (Gk., "elders"). This form of governance is less hierarchical than the Church of England and the Catholic Church, but it is more structured than Congregationalism. The Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century sought to recover the communal decision making of the early Church (e.g., the council of Jerusalem, Acts 15). According to John Calvin (d. 1564), the risen Christ calls a local church to be a community that ministers in his name, and, therefore, the congregation itself must select its specific ministers by means of a governing council (presbytery) composed of elected elders. Guided by this understanding, churches overseen by boards of pastors and presbyters were established beginning in the middle 1500s in Switzerland, the Netherlands, England, and Scotland. Under the leadership of John Knox (1513–72), Presbyterianism flourished in Scotland, and in 1557 the Presbyterian Church was recognized as the Church of Scotland.

Presbyterianism came to North America with the colonists. In 1706 the first church with a presbytery was established in Philadelphia by the Irish missionary Francis Makemie, and in 1716 a Presbyterian synod was constituted. In 1746 Presbyterians founded the College of New Jersey, now Princeton University. At the time of the Civil War, the Presbyterian churches in the United States affiliated with either the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (with offices in New York City) or the Presbyterian Church in the United States (with offices in Atlanta, Georgia). In 1983 these two bodies merged into a single organization, the Presbyterian Church of the U.S.A. The Presbyterian Church of Canada was formed in 1875. Worldwide membership in the Presbyterian churches as of 1994 has been estimated at fifty million. See also Calvinism; Protestantism; Reformation, the. ROBERT A. KRIEG presbyterium (Lat., "body of presbyters"), the area of the church building reserved to the seating of clergy. In Roman basilicas, this was the apse; in later churches, it became synonymous with the choir. "Presbyterium" may also refer to the priest's senate (more commonly, the presbyteral council) or diocesan chapter, an advisory body to the bishop. It is also synonymous with "rectory," the house for one or more members of the clergy, although that is more commonly called the "presbytery." See also presbyter; presbyterate; sanctuary.

Presbyterorum Ordinis (pres-bee-tair-aw-room awr'dee-nees). See Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests.

Presence, Real. See Real Presence.

presence of God, an affirmation in the Christian tradition of divine involvement in the universe and human affairs, called immanence as opposed to transcendence. A current task of theology is the exploration of the connectedness of immanence and transcendence. Even with Israel's emphasis on transcendence, belief was in a God who is near (Ps 119:51). Jesus is the presence of God in the world through the Incarnation and as the Body of Christ (Church and Eucharist). Jesus promised: "I am with you always" (Matt 28:20). It has been suggested that the presence of God is the most appropriate model for mystical experience. See also mysticism; transcendence.

Presentation, the ceremony in which the infant Jesus was brought to the Temple and Mary was purified after childbirth. According to Luke 2:22–40 Mary came to fulfill the requirements of the Torah (Exod 13:2, 12; Lev 12:6–8). Simeon greeted them and pronounced the prayer that came to be known as the Nunc Dimittis ("Now you are dismissing [your servant]"), and the prophetess Anna spoke of Jerusalem's redemption. The feast of the Presentation of the Lord is celebrated on February 2.

Presentation, Sisters of the. See Sisters of Mary of the Presentation.

presidential chair, the seat from which the presider leads the assembly in prayer. The chair's significance in each parish church is derived from the cathedra (Lat., "chair") in the cathedral from which the bishop of the diocese presides. Only the bishop uses the cathedra, which may be imposing in the cathedral though it should never resemble a throne. The presidential chair in the parish church should be placed prominently in a presiding position without suggesting domination or remoteness. The chair is to stand alone, not crowded by chairs of other liturgical ministers.

presidential prayers, prayers or orations that the presider voices in the name of the entire assembly. The premier presidential prayer in the Mass is the Eucharistic Prayer or Canon of the Mass, which is sung or spoken by the presiding priest. Other presidential prayers at Mass are the Opening Prayer, the close of the General Intercessions or Prayer of the Faithful, the Prayer over the Gifts and the Prayer After Communion. Rites of other sacraments, the Liturgy of the Hours, and other liturgical celebrations include presidential prayers spoken by the one who leads the praying assembly.

presider (pree-zi' duhr), the one who oversees any act of public worship. The presider's responsibility is to animate the ritual texts and inspire the assembly to active participation. The presiding priest at Mass has often been called the principal celebrant or PC, which sometimes has caused the people to forget their role as celebrants along with the priest. The illusion was created that the priest was the sole celebrant, while the assembly watched him celebrate. The use of the term "presider" offers a corrective, in an attempt to alert the people to their active role in worship. But the term could prove unsatisfactory if it were to diminish the role at Mass of the priest, who alone acts in the person of Christ. See also Eucharist.

Presov. See Pseudo-Synod of Presov.

Prester John, fabled medieval Christian king of the East who, according to differing legends, lived in the Far East, India, or Ethiopia. He was thought to have defeated the Muslims in the Holy Land.

Preston, Thomas Scott, 1824–91, priest and administrator. Born in Hartford, Connecticut, and ordained an Episcopal priest, he converted to the Catholic Church in 1849. A prolific preacher and polemicist (author of fifteen volumes and numerous articles), the rigidly orthodox Preston was successively secretary, chancellor, and vicar-general to three New York prelates (Hughes, McCloskey, and Corrigan) until his death. With Mother Mary Veronica Starr, he cofounded in 1886 the Sisters of the Divine Compassion (R.D.C.), who work in education, retreats, social services, and related ministries. In the 1990s there are over one hundred members serving in the Archdiocese of New York.

presumption, in Catholic moral theology, the distortion or vice directly opposed to the theological virtue of hope. Where the vice of despair is the lack or absence of hope, presumption, at the opposite extreme, constitutes an unwarranted and exaggerated hope. In general, the vice of presumption rests on a misinterpretation of the relation between divine mercy and human freedom, and is classically described as either the habitual expectation that eternal life will be gained without God's assistance, or that salvation will be granted regardless of one's personal responses to God's gifts of grace. Both expectations are traditionally held to be gravely sinful. See also hope.

Prie-dieu

pride, the disordered love of self or one's own success to the exclusion of others or God. Pride is a capital sin because it is often the source of other sins. Pride may be the cause of the allied sins of presumptuousness, undue ambition, and vainglory, which is the exaggerated striving to demonstrate one's real or imagined excellence to others. Because of the malice involved, pride that seeks directly to disregard God and rightful authority is more serious than pride that only occasionally disregards God or the worth of others by making too much of one's own worth. See also capital sins.

prie-dieu (pree'dyuh; Fr., "pray-God"), a kneeling bench. The prie-dieu remains a common liturgical furnishing for weddings and the Mass. A stand-alone bench with a padded cushion for kneeling and a small bookrest, prie-dieus are often placed in the sanctuary area in front of and around the altar, where there are typically no pews.

Prierias, Sylvester (pree-air'ee-ahs), 1456–1523, Italian Dominican theologian. He was an early opponent of Luther and author of the compendium of moral theology Summa Summarum Quae Silvestrine Dicitur. As Pope Leo X's adviser (1515), he formulated the first theological attack on Luther's Ninety-five Theses and supported papal authority.

priest, one who performs the basic ordained ministry in the Catholic Church. The English word "priest" is used to translate both the Latin word sacerdos and the Greek word hiereus, both of which suggest ritual responsibilities pertaining to worship, an emphasis that served to express medieval and post-Tridentine Catholic associations between priesthood and Eucharist. "Priest" also translates, and in fact derives from, the Greek presbyteros ("elder"), a term suggesting a broader range of pastoral responsibilities, both in the NT and in the documents of Vatican II. The term also designates Christ (Letter to the Hebrews) and, collectively, all the baptized (1 Pet 2:5 and 9). See also presbyter; priesthood.

priesthood, the identity and role of Jesus and of the entire community of the baptized; also, the identity and role of the most common of the ordained ministries within the Church. While the latter usage is most common, Catholicism since Vatican II (1962–65) has tried to give due recognition to all of these meanings of the term.

Biblical Background: Certain details of Jewish priesthood figure in the historical development and understanding of Christian priesthood. Three items are of particular importance. The first is the priestly tribe of Levi, regarded as one of the twelve tribes of Jacob. In ancient times, the Levitical priesthood had responsibility in three areas: proclamation of the divine will, instruction and interpretation of the Law, and responsibilities associated with worship and ritual sacrifice (Deut 33:8–10). In the time of the monarchy, prophets assumed the first responsibility. In the exile, scribes became Israel's teachers. In postexilic Judaism, the priests' basic function centered around sacrifice and offering. In this narrower meaning, the term influenced Christian usage.

A second item is the figure of the high priest, associated with Aaron and his sons in the book of Exodus and with Zadok, appointed high priest by King David. The principal religious function of the high priest occurred on the annual solemn feast of the Atonement when the high priest entered the innermost sanctuary of the Temple to offer sacrifice for the sins of the people.

Thirdly, along with the priestly tribe of Levi and the high priesthood, the entire nation, because of God's covenant, was seen as a priestly people (Exod 19:5–6): the people as a whole were to live so that by their lives, regarded as sacrificial offerings to God, all nations would come to know the goodness of the God of Israel.

Two of these Jewish notions are background for two understandings of priesthood in the NT, that of the risen Christ and that of the entire body of the faithful. In the Letter to the Hebrews, and only there, Jesus is called priest. It is the risen Christ, interceding for us at the right hand of God, who is said to fulfill the functions of the Aaronite priesthood: he is the mediator between God and humankind; he is compassionate; and he is appointed by God to this office. By a line of reasoning using the figure of Melchizedek, the author of Hebrews argues that Jesus surpasses the high priesthood of the Aaronite line. While Jesus' sacrifice of himself as a holy and unblemished victim on the cross achieved definitive atonement for all and renders obsolete the annual sacrifices offered by the high priest in the Temple, it is in his present intercession for us that Christ is priest.

A second understanding of priesthood, as it applies to the entire Christian community, appears in 1 Pet 2:4–12. The author, using the imagery of Exod 19:5–6, identifies the community of those baptized in Christ as a "body of priests" and calls the people to offer their lives as spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God. By seeing the example of such lives, the nations of the earth will come to glorify God.

NT writings, while recognizing divinely authorized leadership roles within the Christian communities, do not designate as priest any who hold such roles. It was only at the end of the first century when Christians came to see themselves as a religious body distinct from Judaism and the Eucharist as an unbloody sacrifice replacing Temple sacrifices that they began to apply the notion of priesthood to Christian leaders.

Priesthood in the Tradition of the Church: In the early centuries of the Church, the leadership of the community and its worship centered on the bishop. In the conviction that Jewish priesthood and worship were types of Christian realities, the bishop came to be called high priest and priest of the Christian Church. With the growth of the Christian population, especially in rural areas, presbyters increasingly came to function as community leaders and presiders at Eucharist and so they, too, were called priests.

As Christianity became a legal religion of the Roman Empire and then its official religion, Christian priests were also seen as replacing the priesthood of the Roman cults. With this development came an increasing emphasis on the ordering of different groups within the Church, analogous to the diverse orders of groups distinguished from the general populace in the empire. Heightened stress on priesthood lessened appreciation of the role and responsibility of the laity. Application of monastic ideals to priesthood also contributed to the separation of clergy from laity.

The patristic idea of priesthood was further influenced by the anti-Arian reaction in which the Eucharist was experienced less as a sacrifice of the Church than as a holy theophany. The liturgy became the preserve of the priest, whose role as ritual minister increasingly was emphasized.

Early medieval emphasis on the Eucharist further promoted an understanding of priesthood in terms of liturgical power to change bread and wine into the body and blood of the Lord and diminished the notion of priesthood understood in relationship to the community. Bishops, in turn, were seen as priests who had additional power of jurisdiction by which they could ordain and exercise ecclesial authority. The writing of Pseudo-Dionysius, with its great emphasis on spiritual and ecclesiastical hierarchy, influenced the medieval emphasis on the divinely ordered hierarchy of bishop and priest in the community and further separated the priesthood from the laity.

It was in reaction to these developments that the Reformers insisted on ministry as basically a power to preach, on a lack of distinction between clergy and laity in the priesthood of all believers, and on what they believed to be a lack of biblical warrant for a divinely ordered hierarchy within the ministry of the Church. In response, the Council of Trent (1545–63) reaffirmed the distinction between clergy and laity, the presence of a divinely constituted sacramental priesthood with power to offer sacrifice and to forgive sins, and a hierarchical ordering of ministers in the Church. Although Trent's teaching on priesthood dealt only with the most pressing questions of the day, the emphases of that teaching dominated Catholic thought and practice until the mid-twentieth century.

Priesthood in the Teaching of Vatican II: The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) sought to present Catholic teaching on the priesthood in relation to the biblical, liturgical, and historical traditions of the Church. In so doing, the council presented an understanding of the priesthood and priestly ministry that differs significantly from the emphases of post-Tridentine Catholicism.

Two teachings of Vatican II are basic to its teaching about ordained priesthood: its reaffirmation of the priority of the priesthood of Christ and its teaching that the entire community of the baptized is a priestly people sharing, by the power of the Holy Spirit, in the threefold mission of Christ as prophet, priest, and servant of the kingdom of God. Only within the context of these truths does one properly appreciate the role of ordained priesthood in the Church.

The council's principal teachings on ordained priesthood included the idea that the fullness of the priesthood resides in the episcopate. Through sacramental ordination, bishops receive the office of sanctifying, teaching, and governing in the Church. The order of priests shares with the bishops in the one and same priesthood and ministry of Christ, though it does so in its distinctive way. In ordination, priests receive the power of the Spirit to act sacramentally in the person (role) of Christ, the head and shepherd of the Church.

The council deliberately broadened the notion of priestly ministry: rather than defining the priest in terms of his relationship to the Eucharist and his power to forgive sins, priesthood is seen in terms of a threefold ministry, that of the word, of the sacraments, and of community leadership. The priest exercises these functions in union with the bishop and the college of priests of which the bishop is the head. Priests are cooperators of the episcopal order, necessary helpers and advisers in the ministry and office of the bishops.

The ordained priesthood and the laity share, through Baptism, a common dignity, a common grace, and a common vocation to perfection. Within that framework, the council teaches that ordained priesthood differs essentially from the priesthood of the faithful, though the two are ordered one to the other and each in its own way shares in the one priesthood of Christ. Basic to the function of ordained priesthood is the charge to so minister in the name of Christ to the entire body of the faithful that the entire Church sees itself and acts as a prophetic people, a priestly people, servants of the kingdom of God.

The understanding and practice of priesthood within the history of Catholicism show both continuity and development. Past history suggests that both characteristics will continue to be present in the future. See also Holy Orders; ministry; ordination.

Bibliography

Cooke, Bernard. Ministry to Word and Sacraments: History and Theology. Philadelphia: Fortress Press, 1976.

Donovan, Daniel. What are They Saying About the Ministerial Priesthood? New York: Paulist Press, 1992.

Galot, Jean. Theology of the Priesthood. San Francisco: Ignatius Press, 1984.

Osborne, Kenan B. Priesthood: A History of the Ordained Ministry in the Roman Catholic Church. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.

FREDERICK J. CWIEKOWSKI priesthood of all believers, the belief that the corporate body of the baptized are, in Christ, a priestly people, sharing in the one priesthood of Christ. The term has its biblical foundations in Exod 19:6, where Israel is called a priestly people by virtue of the covenant, and in 1 Pet 2:5 and 9, where the Exodus imagery is applied to believers in Christ. After a long period of neglect, largely because of negative Catholic reaction to teaching of the Reformers, the notion was revived at Vatican II (1962–65). "For their part, the faithful join in the offering of the Eucharist by virtue of their royal priesthood. They likewise exercise that priesthood by receiving the sacraments, by prayer and thanksgiving, by the witness of a holy life, and by self-denial and active charity" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 10). See also Baptism; laity; priesthood.

priests' senate. See presbyteral council.

primacy, papal, the honorary and jurisdictional authority possessed by the Bishop of Rome (the pope) and exercised over the universal Church. The Roman Catholic doctrine on papal primacy has been at the heart of the last two ecumenical councils of the Church: Vatican I (1869–70) and Vatican II (1962–65). Its authentic meaning has to be discovered not only in the affirmations of Vatican I but also in the very important clarifications of Vatican II. The ecclesiological language of Vatican I was strongly juridical. This council was the culmination of a long process of development in Western theology that had, since 1054, been isolated from any vital dialogue with the Eastern churches. By contrast, Vatican II was deeply influenced by the old ecclesiology of communion where, without being denied, the primacy of the Bishop of Rome is related to the collegiality of all the bishops, and this collegiality of the bishops is related, in turn, to the synodality of their local churches. Nevertheless, the strongest affirmations concerning the primacy of the Bishop of Rome are in the so-called Nota Explicativa Praevia (Lat., "Prefatory Note of Explanation") of the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium), where it is asserted that collegiality does not contradict papal primacy.

See of Rome: The constitution Pastor Aeternus of Vatican I states, in one of its principal paragraphs, that the primacy of the Bishop of Rome cannot be separated from the primacy of the local church of Rome: "We teach and declare that in the disposition of God the Roman Church holds the preeminence of ordinary power over all the other Churches and that this power of jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff which is truly episcopal is immediate" (DS 3060). This link between the see of Rome and the bishop who occupies this see of "the Church of Peter" (and Paul) is reaffirmed when the constitution deals with infallibility, which the Bishop of Rome possesses when he speaks ex cathedra (Lat.), "from his see (or his chair)" (DS 3074). The constitution quotes the Second Council of Lyons (1274), which affirms: "The holy Roman Church possesses the supreme and full primacy and authority over the universal Catholic Church which it recognizes in truth and humility to have received with fullness of power from the Lord himself in the person of Blessed Peter, Prince or head of the Apostles of whom the Roman Pontiff is the successor. And as it is bound above all to defend the truth of faith, so, too, if any questions should arise regarding the faith, they must be decided by its judgment" (DS 3067; it is important to remember that this council was convoked to bring about the restoration of communion with the Eastern churches). Moreover, Vatican I affirms that the charism of truth and never-failing faith was conferred on those presiding "in this Chair" (or see) of Rome (DS 3071). Even if the same Vatican I document includes statements that stress the reverse relationship (the importance of the see of Rome depending on the primacy of its bishop), it is ecumenically crucial to point out that Pastor Aeternus does not forget the most traditional way of understanding the Roman primacy. The primacy of the church of Rome and the primacy of the Bishop of Rome cannot be dissociated; they are mutually dependent.

During the first centuries and until the Second Council of Nicaea (787), in spite of many doctrinal and political tensions, it is evident that the church of Rome is concretely considered the first among the local churches dispersed throughout the oikumené (Gk., "the whole wide world"). It is from the see of Rome and its bishop that other churches ask for help, for solution of conflicts, for guidance. While, according to Pope Zosimus (d. 418), no other church can judge the church of Rome, this Roman church is convinced that it is called by God to a sollicitudo omnium Ecclesiarum (Lat., "pastoral care of all the churches"). This unique position among the other churches (and not over them) comes from what Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) calls "its more powerful principality," having its source in the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul. Peter showed the link with the people of the OT; Paul showed the link with the evangelization of all the nations (Against Heresies 3.3, 2), and both were explicitly called by Christ for a specific mission. Clement of Rome (d. ca.101), Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca.107), Dionysius of Corinth (d. ca. 170), Tertullian (d. ca. 225), and many other Christian writers of the first centuries associate Peter and Paul, inseparable from each other, with the destiny and the prerogatives of the church of Rome. Rome, indeed, is not the only church grounded in the faith of the two apostles. Moreover, Peter and Paul were not the first disciples of Christ to come to Rome. Nevertheless, since both shed their blood in this city because of their confession of Christ, the church of Rome carries more weight than other apostolic churches. The charism of Peter and Paul together with the blood of their "confession" are forever part of the identity of the local church of Rome. It belongs to this see.

Role of the Bishop of Rome: It is because of this charism and these prerogatives of his local church that the bishop of the see of Rome has a specific role concerning the communion of all the local churches in the apostolic faith and everything attached to this faith (charity, mission, sacramental life, eschatological hope). He is the first among the bishops because he is the minister and the representative of the local church that, among all the local churches, has been called to be the guardian of the supreme confession of the apostolic faith. To be in communion with him means for another bishop (and for the local church that this bishop serves and represents) to be in communion with all the bishops and all the churches who confess, have confessed, and will confess this faith. Vatican I's Pastor Aeternus affirms that his mission is communion in faith "in order that the episcopate itself might be one and undivided, and that the whole community of believers might be preserved in unity of faith and communion by means of a closely united priesthood" (DS 3051). But other bishops are not the vicars of the Bishop of Rome, and no detriment may be done to the ordinary and immediate jurisdiction of the bishops in their own local churches (DS 3061). Vatican II adds that in his local church each bishop is "vicar of Christ" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 27) and that the power of jurisdiction he possesses in this local church is given through his sacramental ordination and not through the Bishop of Rome.

College of Bishops: The primacy of the Bishop of Rome is a primacy of jurisdiction, but Vatican II states that the college of bishops, together with the Bishop of Rome who is its head, also has a full and supreme power over the whole Church. The college of bishops does not possess this jurisdiction because it has been conceded to it by the Bishop of Rome, but because of Christ himself.

When a local bishop exercises his own jurisdiction in his local church or in a collegial action (as in a general council), he is necessarily acting in communion with the Bishop of Rome and consequently with all those in communion with the see of Rome. But the Bishop of Rome himself, even when he speaks alone without consulting the college, is never out of essential communion with his brothers. He cannot act as if he were not the head of the college. What he has to say or to declare is either the faith confessed by all his fellow bishops (as the faith of Peter was the faith of all the apostles) or the answer to a need he has seen in the life of the communities assigned to the bishops. Even when he performs actions "which in no wise belong to the bishops, for example, convoking and directing the college, approving the norms of action" (Nota praevia 3), or acts on his own initiative without any explicit cooperation of other bishops, he is acting as head of the episcopal college and not as a private leader. Nevertheless, although the consent of the Bishop of Rome is required for every decision of the college as such, the consent of the college is not required for every decision of the Bishop of Rome (DS 3074). Even if the Bishop of Rome is morally bound to consult with the college before making an important decision, he is not canonically obliged to do so. Vatican II stressed the unity that exists between the head of the college and the college as such, but did not deal with concrete situations.

As primate, the Bishop of Rome has a jurisdiction that is not delegated (it is ordinary) and can be exercised directly for the whole Church without having to go through an intermediate body (it is immediate). This power is episcopal, given in the sacramental grace of episcopacy. See also collegiality; communion, Church as; infallibility; papacy, the; Peter, St.; Petrine ministry; Petrine succession; pope; vicar of Christ; Vicar of Peter.

Bibliography

De Satge, John. Peter and the Single Church. London: SPCK, 1981.

Dionne, J. Robert. The Papacy and the Church. New York: Philosophical Library, 1987.

Granfield, Patrick. The Limits of the Papacy: Authority and Autonomy in the Church. New York: Crossroad, 1987.

Tillard, Jean-Marie Roger. The Bishop of Rome. Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1983.

———. Church of Churches: The Ecclesiology of Communion. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1992. Pp. 256–318.

JEAN- M. R. TILLARD

primate, an honorary title reserved usually for the archbishop or bishop of the oldest diocese in a country or region. In most instances, the title is purely honorary, although historically it often carried with it certain jurisdictional responsibilities. For example, the archbishop of Armagh is primate of all Ireland. But in the United States, although Baltimore is regarded as the country's primatial see, the archbishop of Baltimore is not considered a primate, even for honorary purposes.

Prime (Lat., prima, "first"), the first hour (hora prima) of the monastic office, celebrated at 6 A.M. In the Rule of St. Benedict (ch. 17), it was to consist of a hymn, three psalms, a brief Scripture reading, versicles and responses, and concluding prayer. Later, longer preces (litanic prayers) and the reading of the Martyrology were added. Prime was abolished by Vatican II (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, 1963, n. 89, d). See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Primitive Rule, the foundational rule of the Carmelite order, laid down in 1209 by Albert of Vercelli, the Latin patriarch of Jerusalem. The rule was one of rigorous asceticism. It prescribed absolute poverty, total abstinence from flesh meat, and solitude. After the order was reorganized in the mid-thirteenth century along the lines of the mendicant friars (Franciscans and Dominicans), the rule became less stringent. In the sixteenth century the Primitive Rule was restored in many houses under the leadership of Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582) and John of the Cross (d. 1591). Those living under the Primitive Rule were called Discalced ("without shoes") Carmelites in contrast with the Calced, who continued to follow the less stringent rule. See also Carmelite order.

prior, title for a religious superior in certain religious orders of monks, mendicants, and canons regular. For example, the Servites, Augustinians, and Carmelites call the superior of the house the "prior"; the major superior of a province, the "prior provincial"; and the supreme moderator of the order, the "prior general." See also religious orders and congregations.

prior bond, impediment of, invalidating obstacle to a marriage because of a previous marriage while the previous spouse is still living. The impediment stems from the nature of marriage as a monogamous and indissoluble union. From the twelfth century on, this prohibition has been known as the impediment of ligamen. See also ligamen, impediment of; marriage law.

prioress, title for a superior in certain communities of women religious, roughly corresponding to the position of prior in men's communities. Originating in the Middle Ages, the title is still used today by various religious institutes of women, most of them cloistered orders of nuns. See also religious orders and congregations.

priory (Lat., "the first"), a type of residence for a community of vowed religious. The community is under the leadership of a prior, i.e., the "first" (of the community). In some religious orders a priory is a house that is not yet firmly established; when further growth occurs, the status of the house is upgraded, e.g., to that of an abbey under the direction of an abbot. Other religious orders call their fully established houses priories.

Prisca, St. See Priscilla, St.

Priscilla, St., also known as Prisca, a first-century Christian who, along with her husband Aquila, was praised by Paul (Rom 16:3–5) in A.D. 58 for hosting the Christian assembly in her home. She is mentioned five more times in the NT (Acts 18:2, 18, 26; 1 Cor 16:19; 2 Tim 4:19). Feast day: July 8.

In Roman tradition, two other women have this same name. One is St. Prisca, a martyr whose relics are enshrined in the fourth-century church bearing her name on Rome's Aventine Hill. Feast day: January 16. The other person is Priscilla, a noblewoman, who in the first century established a catacomb for Christians on Rome's Via Salaria.

Priscillianism, a heresy of the fourth to sixth centuries. It takes its name from Priscillian, a rigorous ascetic who taught in Spain beginning ca. 375 a dualistic doctrine reminiscent of Gnosticism and Manichaeism. Although such teachings were denounced at the Council of Saragossa in 380, Priscillian was elected bishop of Ávila shortly thereafter. In 386 he was brought to trial, convicted of sorcery, condemned by the emperor, and executed. Thus, much to the dismay of some Church officials, including Martin of Tours and Ambrose of Milan, Priscillian became the first heretic to suffer capital punishment. The movement he inspired, however, persisted until its condemnation at the Council of Braga in 563. Its adherents taught that while human souls came from God, because of their sins they were united to bodies, which were the creation of the devil. It followed that Christ could not have had a real human body (Docetism). Their doctrine of the Trinity was Modalist, i.e., the belief that there are not three distinct Persons in God but only three modes of divine existence and activity. See also dualism.

private vows. See vows, private.

privilege, a special favor granted by Church authority. The favor given is not required by law. It can be given to a person or to a group of persons. Unless otherwise specified, a privilege continues until it is revoked by the one granting it, by that person's successor, or by higher authority.

Privilege of the Faith, the dissolution of a nonsacramental marriage for the sake of the living out of the faith. The privilege encompasses two models. The first of these is called the "Pauline Privilege" and is based on 1 Cor 7. The initial marriage is between two nonbaptized parties, one of whom converts to Christianity. Under specified conditions the convert may enter into another marriage, which dissolves the first marriage.

The second model, sometimes called the "Petrine Privilege," involves a marriage between a baptized party and a nonbaptized party. Under given circumstances the pope may dispense from the first union so that a second marriage can take place. See also indissolubility of marriage.

Pro, Bl. Miguel, 1891–1927, Mexican Jesuit. He exercised his priestly ministry even though it was illegal at the time for priests to do so. He was accused of an assassination plot against the Mexican president and was arrested and executed. Feast day: November 23 (United States).

probabiliorism, a moral system for resolving doubts about the moral character of actions by following the "more probable" opinion. Probabiliorism became a favored response of Jansenists and Dominicans in the seventeenth century against what they regarded as the abusive laxness of probabilism. Probabilism held that one may follow a moral opinion if supported by a sound argument, even if this were not the more probable argument. Probabiliorism maintained that one must follow the more probable opinion or argument amid diverse positions. Effectively, however, probabiliorism demanded that one always follow the present law rather than any more benign opinion. See also equiprobabilism; probabilism; tutiorism.

probabilism, a system for forming a certain conscience in cases of doubt about the lawfulness of an action by following any probable opinion. Probabilism asserts that the opinion favoring freedom from obligation, if it is solidly probable, may be followed with moral integrity even if the opinion favoring obligation or the law is more probable. The need for some moral system is rooted in the universally held conviction that it is wrong to act when one is in doubt about the rectitude of one's act. A person who acts with uncertainty is said to act with an uncertain conscience. Some reflex or indirect way must be found to bring certainty to the agent's conscience. Probabilism fills this role by maintaining that a doubtful obligation is certainly no obligation.

Any number of arguments have been used to establish this certainty. The following is fairly standard: "No one is bound by any precept except through the knowledge [Lat., scientia] of the precept" (Thomas Aquinas On Truth 17.3). But there is no true knowledge of a precept when the opinion supporting it is only probable.

Central to the understanding of probabilism is the meaning of probability. Probability can be either intrinsic or extrinsic. It is intrinsic when the reasons for the opinion are cogent but not conclusive. It is said to be extrinsic when its probability is grounded in the authority, learning, and prudence of the authors who hold it. A rule of thumb often cited is that if five or six truly reputable authors hold an opinion, that is a sign of its intrinsic probability.

Probabilism was first systematically presented by the Dominican Bartholomeo Medina in 1577. It became a matter of bitter dispute in the Church and the system was accused of being laxist. The great moral theologian Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787) favored equiprobabilism in his later years, but frequently proposed the basic tenets of probabilism (a doubtful law does not bind, an uncertain law cannot induce a certain obligation). For the last three centuries, the Church has imposed no particular system on theological schools and indeed has tolerated the presentation of probabilism throughout the world.

While probabilism, like any other system, can be, and has been, abused, it is still of great theological and pastoral significance in the Church. No purification or renewal of Christian morals can do away with the fact and urgency of concrete decisions. As long as these decisions are to be made and as long as uncertainty adheres to some of them, some reflex principle like probabilism is essential for the achievement of certainty of conscience. In broader perspective, probabilism remains a tribute to the claims of human freedom against all systems or ideologies that would attempt unduly to restrict this freedom. Furthermore, it has indirectly benefitted moral theology by preventing premature closure of difficult moral questions.

The use of probabilism is not without risk. It is often difficult to determine what is a genuinely probable opinion, who is a reputable theological authority, and what weight is to be given to past and present magisterial pronouncements. See also certitude, moral; equiprobabilism; probabiliorism.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

pro-cathedral, church used by a bishop (e.g., in a newly erected diocese) as his cathedral until a suitable cathedral is built or designated. See also cathedral.

process theology, a term applied to any theological system that emphasizes becoming over being as a metaphysical ultimate, but particularly those systems that are heir to Alfred North Whitehead's "philosophy of organism" (Process and Reality: An Essay in Cosmology, 1929). Originally a mathematician, Whitehead was influenced by the observations of Albert Einstein; his thought is both a highly speculative philosophical cosmology and an empirical reflection on human nature. Process theologians tend either to emphasize Whitehead's metaphysical system, first rigorously clarified by Charles Hartshorne, or to read Whitehead in the company of William James and Charles Sanders Pierce, sometimes under the heading American empirical theology.

For Catholic theology, the distinguishing feature of process thought is its rejection of the Aristotelian basis of Scholastic metaphysics of being in favor of a metaphysics of becoming, in which the ultimate units of reality are events and relationality is prized over philosophical simplicity. Key to this is Whitehead's reversal of the usual pattern of causality. Rather than seeing causes as the producers of effects, effects generate themselves by their selection of causes. Each entity, including God, is causa sui (Lat., "a cause of itself"); God is, therefore, the supreme exemplar of a relational cosmos, not the supreme exception. God's vision or will is but one of the causes that may or may not be appropriated by a moment of becoming. Thus God's power to effect change in the world is persuasive and not coercive, making process thought fertile ground for theological issues such as evil, divine omnipotence, and the relationship between God and creation. See also philosophy and theology.

NANCY DALLAVALLE

procession, divine (Gk., ekporeusis; Lat., processio, "to emanate from another," "to have one's origin from another"), term used in trinitarian theology to signify the origin of one divine Person from another. According to Latin theology there are two processions, the Son from the Father, and the Spirit from the Father and the Son (Lat., Filioque). In Greek theology the Son proceeds from the Father, but the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father through the Son. Latin and Greek theologies agree that God the Father does not proceed since the Father is unbegotten and unoriginated, coming from no one.

Processions are distinguished from missions. Though the two processions of begetting and spirating are said to take place immanently ("within" God), the two missions of Incarnation and the sending of the Holy Spirit take place within the economy of salvation. At the same time, because of the identity of economic and immanent Trinity, the divine missions presuppose the intradivine processions. See also Filioque; Trinity, doctrine of the.

procession, liturgical, the ordered movement of a liturgical assembly or its ministers from one location to another. Often accompanied by religious song, processions occur regularly during liturgical worship. The most frequent are the Entrance, Gospel, Offertory, and Communion processions, which are made, even in abbreviated form, during almost every Mass. Solemn processions are performed on Presentation of the Lord (February 2), Palm Sunday, the Feast of Corpus Christi, at the Stations of the Cross, or during the Rite of Christian Burial. The religious procession provides a vivid image of the Church: a body of pilgrims moving through time following the lead of its Lord in concerted action toward and on behalf of the world.

Proclus, St., d. 446, patriarch of Constantinople (434–46). The Council of Ephesus (431) included in its acts a homily he preached (428) in Nestorius's presence defending the Theotokos (title for Mary as "Mother of God"). His "Tome" (435) to the Armenian bishops attacks the teaching of Theodore of Mopsuestia (without his name) using the formula "God the Word, one of the Trinity, became incarnate," but the controversial sixth-century ("Theopaschite") formula, "one of the Trinity was crucified in the flesh," is not his. Feast day: October 24 (West); November 20 (East). See also Ephesus, Council of; Theotokos.

Procopius, St., d. 303, martyr and patron saint of the Czech Republic. Born in Jerusalem, he was beheaded in the Diocletian persecutions and was later revered as a great martyr by the historian Eusebius of Caesarea. Feast day: July 8.

profession, religious. See religious profession.

profession of faith, the public recitation of the creed, usually during the liturgy. A creed is a concise statement of the central beliefs of the Church. It is both a doxology that proclaims the glory of God and a hymn of thanksgiving for all God has done in and through Jesus Christ. The creed is used liturgically at the eucharistic celebration and during the rite of Baptism. Its public recitation on these occasions narrates the saving events that form the basis of Christian faith, identifies the assembly as a Christian community, and expresses the willingness of the members of the community to live as followers of Christ. The profession of faith is thus the assembly's verbal response to the salvation proclaimed in the Scriptures and memorialized in the Eucharist. A profession of faith is also recited by bishops and pastors before taking office. See also creeds.

pro-life movement, in the United States, a popular organized opposition to abortion. It receives substantial support from the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB) and from other religious bodies. Since the 1973 U.S. Supreme Court decision affirming a woman's right to abortion (Roe v. Wade), pro-life activists have sought to defeat pro-abortion legislation and overturn public policies and judicial decisions. Cardinal Joseph Bernardin of Chicago and the U.S. bishops generally have exhorted Catholics to broaden their pro-life position to include other issues affecting human dignity and human rights. This is the so-called "consistent ethic of life" position, also known as the "seamless garment" approach. Many in the pro-life movement reject it, or are highly critical of it, because they feel it diminishes, or even undermines, their fight against abortion. See also abortion; civil law and morality; consistent ethic of life; right to life.

promise, a commitment made to another that one will do or refrain from doing something, to the benefit of the other. In moral theology, the obligation to keep promises is usually discussed in the context of unilateral and gratuitous commitments rather than mutually binding contracts. A promise is morally binding in justice if both parties understood it in that way. More usually, promises are binding in fidelity. Promises binding in fidelity ought still to be kept because truthfulness requires conformity of actions to words.

promoter of justice, mandatory diocesan prosecutor for all penal and contentious cases involving the public welfare as determined by the bishop, canon law, or circumstances. The bishop must appoint a priest or layperson of sound temperament and reputation with at least a canonical licentiate. Some cases are considered as invalidly tried unless the promoter of justice is involved, e.g., a case involving the imposition of penalties on a cleric, such as a suspension imposed in a judicial proceeding.

Promoter of the Faith, once popularly known as the "devil's advocate," an office within the Sacred Congregation for the Causes of Saints whose purpose is to investigate thoroughly any objections raised against a cause for beatification and canonization and to safeguard the integrity of the procedure. See also beatification; canonization.

pro-nuncio, the papal ambassador in countries where the representative of the Holy See is not head of the diplomatic corps. The pro-nuncio not only represents the Holy See to the government of the country, but also has certain responsibilities toward the Catholic Church in that country and toward its hierarchy. See also papal legate.

proofs of God's existence. See five ways of St. Thomas Aquinas; God.

Propaganda Fide (prah-pah-gahn'-dah fee'day). See Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

proper, liturgical, the part of any liturgical rite that varies from day to day or from season to season. Solemnities, feasts, memorials, and the seasonal cycles of Lent/Easter and Advent/Christmas often have their own proper parts, i.e., presidential prayers or orations, readings, prefaces, antiphons, psalmody, responsories, and intercessions, which do not belong to the liturgical ordinary. See also ordinary, liturgical.

Proper of the Mass, the variable parts of the Mass. The proper parts of the Mass are taken either from the Proper of the Season (Sundays and other feast days without fixed dates) or from the Proper of the Saints (feast days of fixed dates). The parts of the Mass included in the Proper are the entrance antiphon, the Opening Prayer, the chant after the first reading, the preface, the Prayer over the Gifts, the Communion antiphon, and the Prayer After Communion. See also Ordinary of the Mass.

property, an object of ownership. Ownership, seen in Catholic thought as fundamental for the autonomy and development of the human person, is the right to dispose freely of something as one's own, unless otherwise prohibited. Catholic social teaching on property distinguishes between the right and the use of the right. Thus, "unless otherwise prohibited" means that the use of the right is limited by the duty to observe the other virtues, legitimate laws, and contracts. These limitations are centuries old in Catholicism (see Summa Theologiae 2–2.66) and are presented repeatedly in papal encyclicals (Mater et Magistra [1961], 43; Populorum Progressio [1967], 23–24; Centesimus Annus [1991], 30.2). Such limitations are rooted in the universal or common destination of human goods. John Paul II, after asserting the right to private property as "valid and necessary," added: "Private property, in fact, is under a 'social mortgage,' which means that it has an intrinsically social function based upon and justified precisely by the principle of the universal destination of goods" (Sollicitudo Rei Socialis [1987], 42.6). See also Catholic social teachings.

property law, norms concerning Church property and Church-related property. The Church's reasons for its possession of material goods are that they are for: (1) divine worship, (2) works of religion and charity, and (3) the just remuneration of its ministers. Canon law understands Church property to be any property belonging to a public juridical person (similar to a corporation). So, for example, each diocese, parish, or religious institute holds property under the supervision of Church leaders but not at their free disposal. Indeed, Church property is not to be administered solely by one person but with the advice and sometimes the required consent of councils and financial experts. These must respect the purpose for which property has been given the Church.

prophecy, divine communication through a human agent, variously defined depending on whether the emphasis is placed on prediction, emotional preaching, social protest, religious enlightenment, or charismatic endowment. Among evangelicals and, to some extent, sociologists, the emphasis tends to be placed on millenarian and apocalyptic sects and their beliefs. The predictive understanding of prophecy, with reference to the new reality of Christ and the Church, has prevailed throughout most of Christian history, while in Judaism the predictive function has been subordinated to a close connection between prophecy and the law. The modern critical study of prophecy concentrated on identifying the message of the prophets, a message focused on the present rather than the future and proclaiming a religion at once individualistic and ethical in contrast to contemporary popular religion centered on sacrificial rituals. This typical nineteenth-century view has since given way to a more objective and nuanced understanding of prophecy in relation to the institutional life of Israel, especially Temple ritual and worship, and one that could assume different forms in different historical circumstances.

Both early Christianity and the Qumran community read the prophetic books and other biblical compositions, especially Psalms, as predictive of their own identity and as corroborating their own self-understanding. Several early Christian churches prized the charismatic gift of prophecy, meaning insight into the Christian reality communicated effectively to the community (1 Cor 12:28–29; 14). The names of several early Christian prophets have been preserved (Acts 11:27; 15:32; 21:9–10); some served in leadership roles in churches (e.g., Acts 13:1), while others were itinerant (e.g., Did. 11–13). The consolidation of Church structures and hierarchy, together with the threat posed by prophetic-millenarian movements (e.g., Montanism in the second century), led to the gradual disappearance of prophecy as a distinct social phenomenon.

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP

prophet (Heb., nābî; Gk., prophētēs), one of a class of intermediaries who transmit communications from God to particular individuals or to the people as a whole. While the designation is commonly taken to refer primarily to the putative authors of the twelve books of Latter Prophets, in the course of time its scope was enlarged to refer to any important figure from the past, e.g., Abraham (Gen 20:7) and Moses (Deut 18:15–18; 34:10). It is therefore not surprising that John the Baptist (Mark 11:32) and Jesus (Mark 6:4; Luke 24:19) were thought of as prophets. The gift of prophecy was highly prized in many early Christian churches (e.g., 1 Cor 12:10) and prophets both male and female are often referred to in the NT (e.g., Acts 11:27; 13:1; 15:32; 21:9) and other writings down into the second century (e.g., Did. 11–13). See also prophecy.

propitiation, the act of appeasing another human being or the deity. In the latter sense, it was an important function of sacrificial ritual in antiquity, though the primary function of sacrifice in Israel was the removal of sin. The Greek term hilasterion used by Paul in Rom 3:25 should be translated "expiation" rather than "propitiation" to avoid the idea that the sacrifice of Jesus was needed to assuage the anger of God. See also atonement, biblical view of; atonement, doctrine of.

proportionalism, a type of analysis for determining the objective moral rightness and wrongness of actions in conflict situations and a procedure for establishing exceptions to behavioral norms. It began in the mid-1960s as a revision of both the principle of double effect and the doctrine on intrinsic moral evil. "Proportionate reason" is the moral principle used to determine concretely and objectively the rightness or wrongness of acts and the various exceptions to behavioral norms. Proportionalists argue that no judgment of moral rightness or wrongness of acts can be made without considering all the circumstances of the action. Because the human act is a structural unity, no aspect of the act can be morally appraised apart from all the other components. Consideration of the agent's intention, all foreseeable consequences, institutional obligations, and a proportion between the premoral values and disvalues are necessary before making a moral judgment.

The proponents make a distinction between moral and premoral values/disvalues. Moral values and disvalues describe qualities of persons as they confront situations, e.g., just or unjust. Premoral evils or disvalues refer to the harms, lacks, deprivations, etc., that occur in, or as a result of, human agency, e.g., death. Premoral values refer to those conditioned goods that we pursue for human and nonhuman well-being, e.g., life, health, etc. This distinction is used by proportionalists in their application of the principle of proportionate reason. The principle contains two elements. First, the word "reason" means a premoral, i.e., a conditioned, and thus not an absolute, value that the agent seeks to promote in the total act. Second, the term "proportionate" refers to a proper relation that must exist between the premoral disvalue(s) contained in, or caused by, the means and the end or a proper relation between the end and the premoral disvalue(s) in the consequences of the act.

In making exceptions to negative behavioral norms, e.g., no killing, proportionate reason is used to discern if the premoral disvalue contained in, or caused by, the means (killing) stands in due proportion to the premoral value in the act (self-defense). If a proportionate reason is present, the norm as stated does not apply to this act under its terms of reference. Exceptions to behavioral norms that prohibit premoral evil, then, are made on the basis of the presence of a proportionate reason.

Proportionalists claim that the distinction between direct and indirect in the principle of double effect is not always morally decisive. The distinction can be merely descriptive in that it only indicates what agents are doing, what they are aiming at, and with what means. See also double effect, principle of; evil, intrinsic; premoral evil; values, moral.

JAMES J. WALTER

proselyte (prah'sel-it; Gk., "one who has newly arrived or come near"), in the religious sense, a "convert." In the NT it refers primarily to full converts to Judaism (Matt 23:15; Acts 2:10, 6:5, 13:43), distinguished from "a worshiper of God" (Acts 16:14, 18:7) who did not obey the whole law. Though proselytism ("convert-making") has a negative connotation today, the original term is neutral. See also conversion; convert; evangelization.

prosopon (proh'soh-pahn; Gk., "face," "mask"), a term used by ancient theologians to distinguish the members of the Trinity by describing each member as a distinct prosopon, or person. Originally, the term referred to the mask worn by a Greek actor. Its lack of philosophical precision forced theologians to use the more precise term, hypostasis (Gk., "substance," "person").

Prosper of Aquitaine, St., ca. 390–after 455, lay theologian who defended Augustine's teachings on grace against John Cassian and the other semi-Pelagians. His defense was somewhat moderated after Augustine's death (430), following the lead of Pope Celestine I, whom Prosper had consulted in 431. His Call of All Nations defends God's universal salvific will. His Book of Sentences, perhaps the earliest florilegium of extracts from Augustine, was influential at the Council of Orange (529). Feast day: July 7. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.; grace; Orange, Council of; semi-Pelagianism.

prosphora (praws-faw-rah'; Gk., "offering," "gift"), a loaf of leavened, Byzantine-rite eucharistic bread. The form of a cross-in-square with the seal ICXCNIKA ("J[esus] Ch[rist] conquers") is stamped on top of the prosphora. A cube-shaped section of the loaf bearing the stamp, called the "lamb," is cut out by the priest during the Prothesis, or rite of Preparation of the Gifts, and is used for the eucharistic consecration. See also bread, eucharistic.

Protestantism, a sixteenth-century religious movement that originated in western Europe over against the prevailing Roman Catholicism; it has spread over most of the world during the last four and a half centuries. Conceived originally by its leaders in northern Europe and the British Isles as a reform of Catholicism, it soon broke with the Catholic Church, which had dominated Europe for the eleven centuries after its establishment as the religion of the Roman Empire. Some of the reform leaders quickly removed themselves from obedience to Rome. Others worked harder to remain within the Catholic orbit but undertook actions that forced their early excommunication. By the 1550s Protestantism had taken shape.

Protestantism derives its name from a document at the Diet of Speyer in Germany in 1529. The name, however, suggests a unity the protest causes never had. Even those who signed that document spoke for only a couple of parties, which did not represent many others. Protestantism in the British Isles, whether in the form of what became Anglicanism after the break with Rome under King Henry VIII (d. 1547) or in what became Presbyterianism under John Knox (d. 1572) in Scotland, developed quite independently from the way continental Lutheran, Reformed, or Anabaptist movements took shape.

Indeed, from the viewpoint of Catholics in 1529 or even at the end of the twentieth century, Protestantism has had only two distinguishing marks: it is divided, fragmented, and ever capable of generating more offshoots and divisions, and it has no positive set of common doctrines or practices that characterize its life. Only one aspect is universally present: the rejection of obedience to the hierarchical system that finds its pinnacle in papal authority, personified by the Bishop of Rome, the pope.

The Divisions of Protestantism: According to reference books such as the World Christian Encyclopedia (1982), near the end of the twentieth century there are almost twenty-five thousand separate Christian church bodies or what in North America would be called denominations. That number grows by about five per week, thanks to the vitality of independent and often prophetic or Pentecostal movements in sub-Saharan Africa, Latin America, parts of Asia, and the Pacific Island world. All of these groups are considered Protestant groups because of the nature of Protestantism itself: there is no central jurisdiction such as the papacy to determine the legitimacy of one group or another.

In Protestant theory, while all Christians are members of the single and undivided Body of Christ or one, holy, catholic, and apostolic church, in the world of appearances this church inevitably takes on many forms and embodiments. In the twentieth century an ecumenical or church-unity movement, largely of Protestant orientation, has worked to bring the separate churches into communication and communion with one another, usually through the forming of councils and federations. Ecumenism, however, has not inhibited the tendency of Protestant bodies to be independent of one another.

The World Christian Encyclopedia projects that by the beginning of the twenty-first century, there will be 1.144 billion Catholics and 386 million Eastern Orthodox; there will be 61 million Anglicans, 24 million "marginal Protestants," 204 million "nonwhite indigenous Christians," and 386 million just plain "Protestants" of the sort most European and North American Catholics know: Presbyterians, Lutherans, Methodists, Baptists, and the like.

The four-way clustering does not begin to suggest the varieties of Protestantism. For example, not all Anglicans (Christians who are connected to the see of Canterbury in England, whose bishop presides as "first among equals" of the Anglican or Episcopal bishops), consider themselves Protestants. They are "Anglo-Catholics" or simply "Catholics" of Anglo background, wherever they reside. They seek friendly relations with Rome but will not yield obedience to the pope. "Marginal Protestants" are offshoot movements such as the Mormons, Jehovah's Witnesses, and Christian Scientists, who are completely separated from ecumenical Protestantism and are considered heterodox across the spectrum.

"Nonwhite indigenous Christians" are offspring of missionary endeavors, for example, in Africa; they are thus derivative of western European impulses. But in postcolonial nations, as the missionaries left the scene voluntarily or were made to feel unwelcome on the soil they had prepared, indigenous and independent movements took shape. They are the most rapidly growing sector of Protestantism. Meanwhile, the just plain "Protestants" also flourish everywhere, though their heartland remains western Europe, the British Isles, and North America.

No one can prevent a prophet in Mozambique or Chile or a splinter group in Tennessee or Texas from forming as an independent Protestant denomination. That independence looks chaotic and anarchic to Roman Catholics but is a feature of church life with which Protestants have lived from the beginning, from times when Martin Luther (d. 1546) and Reformed leaders like John Calvin (d. 1564) and Ulrich Zwingli (d. 1531) agreed to disagree—or even disagreed on the terms of disagreement. If they and the Anglicans constituted a kind of Protestant "mainstream," often remaining established by law even after the break with Rome, they were nagged from the beginning by more radical and anti-establishment groups, some of which they exiled or persecuted. Most of these were Anabaptist, which means they rejected infant baptism and then rebaptized Christians. They represented what we might see as a protest against the protest.

Despite the apparent chaos of division, from some distance one can see coherences in the form of Protestant families in approximately this order of size: Lutheran, Reformed (including Presbyterian), Baptist (which is currently the most rapidly growing group worldwide), Methodist, mainstream Pentecostal, United Church of Christ, and Disciples of Christ. Then follow various Holiness, Adventist, Mennonite, Moravian, Friends, and other groups, such as Unitarians and Universalists. Few of them follow the Anglicans in having an authoritative council or episcopal leadership, though many have formed international federations.

Antipapacy and Protestant Doctrine: While early Protestantism found its identity in rejection of the papacy, there were varying degrees of distancing. Thus in the middle of the sixteenth century, many Lutheran leaders were still willing to picture a reunion with Catholicism in which the Bishop of Rome would be first among equals. But they would not submit to papal authority on terms that would have satisfied Rome. For Luther and many other Protestant leaders the pope was the fulfillment of the prophetic biblical pictures of the antichrist. They saw him usurping roles that only God in Christ through the Holy Spirit rightfully could claim.

Centuries later, especially since the appearance of modern popes after the model of John XXIII (d. 1963)—bishops of Rome who were more friendly to conciliar and synodical governance and who in their attitudes were concerned to show regard for the Christian expression of Protestants—there has been a great diminishing of opposition to the papacy. Antagonism has often been replaced by genuine signs of positive concern and affection. Still, whoever canvasses the whole range of Protestant teaching will find that the only common bond across the entire range has been an unwillingness to surrender to papal authority.

Lacking such authority, most Protestants from the beginning have insisted that the only source and norm of their doctrine has been the Bible, made up of the Hebrew Scriptures, called the OT, and the NT. They respect the Apocrypha, but regard these noncanonical writings as inferior and not "inspired" by the Holy Spirit the way the sixty-six canonical books are. Of course, interpretations of the Bible vary widely. Therefore, when the majority of Protestants cry the Reformation motto sola Scriptura (Lat.), "Scripture alone," they solve very little in the eyes of other Protestants, to say nothing of Catholics.

Battles over how to interpret the Bible have marked the life of Protestantism. While the seeds of "private interpretation" were present in the sixteenth century, especially among the more radical groups, most leaders and movements were "churchly," which meant they regarded the communal character of interpretation to be vital. However, in the eighteenth century, when a philosophical movement called the Enlightenment took shape and as political freedoms grew, the freedom to interpret the Bible apart from community came to characterize much of Protestantism. In Catholic eyes, Protestants are people who are quite free to go their own way undisturbed with the interpretations of the Bible they favor.

If the eighteenth century saw an increase in freedom, independence, and autonomy, the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries saw develop a new polarity that cut through or divided denominations. On the left have been modernist or liberal movements that granted more to the Enlightenment and private judgment. Thinkers and actors in the leadership encouraged adapting of the faith to modernity, being up to date, and embracing reason and science and progress. Over against them are the currently burgeoning movements on the right, from the extremes of fundamentalism to the more moderate forms of evangelicalism and Pentecostalism. Most of them insist that the Bible is inerrant in all details and that they alone interpret it correctly.

Protestant doctrine is not only about the Bible, however. Most Protestants retain the Lord's Supper, attaching a wide range of meanings to it. All but the Quakers, who also do not regularly celebrate Holy Communion and may utterly reject such ordinances, also keep Baptism as a sacrament. Most Protestants continue to baptize infants and some, like the Lutherans, see in the act the imparting of grace. But Baptists and many others insist on "believers' baptism" and consider the act a sign of commitment, covenant, or obedience to a command.

Protestants in the main will say that alongside the devotion to the Bible they are constituted by an equal devotion to its main theme: that God is gracious and that through faith believers are grasped by divine grace and, as a corollary, made members of the Church. Over against what they saw and still often, though with diminishing warrant or passion, regard as Catholic dependence or partial dependence on the good works and merits of humans who would be right with God, the Protestants were "evangelical," or gospel-centered. As they saw it, this meant they would stress the entirely unmerited grace of God as the initiative and fulfillment of the divine transaction with humans. Works of love were to follow the response in faith, but they did not "save" the sinner.

Most Protestants, at least until the Enlightenment and outside the modern liberal movements, have held to views of human nature in which the human is "fallen," inescapably given over to sin apart from the works of God in Christ. Most Protestants have continued to teach and believe in the atoning work of Jesus Christ on the cross and the reality of his Resurrection as the grounding of reasons for faith. While not all of them share the majority preference for retaining the Apostles' and Nicene creeds (Baptists, for example), most would, in the words of the end of a creed, share faith in "the life of the world to come."

Protestant Practices: If the practices of faith differ widely from place to place even within such an ordered and regulated body as Catholicism, it is easy to see that practices will vary drastically from place to place and from communion to communion across Protestantism. Yet there are at least some means of grasping the varieties. For instance, just as most Protestants administer and receive two sacraments, so they also expect the living of a godly life, however described; that is, believing has consequences. Protestants stressed this so much that some Catholics, looking at them from the viewpoint of a sacramentally graced faith, have equated Protestantism with grim moralism, a series of many "don'ts" alongside numbers of "do's." Some of these moralist Protestant movements such as Puritanism serve as stereotypes by which Catholics often miss the vision of exuberance and the presence of joy in much Protestant worship.

Protestants, given their devotion to the Bible, have been promoters of translation of the Scriptures (into many hundreds of languages) and of literacy directed to biblical and other texts. This has meant that they stress education of the young and have often been originators of colleges and universities in newly missionized territories. Like Catholics, they have been devoted to healing, often establishing the first clinics or hospitals in an area.

Attitudes toward the arts vary. In general, Protestantism has been suspicious of Orthodox icons and Catholic statuary, visual representations that evangelicals feel can often attract devotion bordering on idolatry. Yet names like Johann Sebastian Bach, Rembrandt van Rijn, and John Milton signal Protestant devotion to the sundry arts. Protestantism has made a particular contribution to church music. Protestants like to build and use churches, "houses of God," and have developed many indigenous styles of architecture to match their concepts of worship.

Some leaders have defined Protestantism, given its origins in protest and its often unestablished or outsider status, as an extension of biblical prophetic movements. While many if not most Protestants, like their Catholic and Orthodox counterparts, become defenders of the status quo, they also frequently respond to calls for justice. They have developed movements called the social gospel, Christian socialism, social Christianity, or various conservative evangelical but socially radical programs. The liberals did so to "bring in the kingdom of God" and the more conservative types did so because they believe that Protestant Christians are to be responsible citizens and supporters of earthly government.

Such conservatism and support have not meant mere acquiescence to the powers that be. For example, in Britain and the United States, Protestant impulses developed into movements for the abolition of slavery over against other support for slavery, often by Protestants. Movements to extend suffrage, to work for equity in the economic realm, to extend health care to the poor, and to work for world peace have issued from Protestant groups. Often relatively small groups like Quakers, Mennonites, and the Church of the Brethren, historically "peace churches," have led the way, to be joined by their larger and more adapted Protestant counterparts.

The Future and Fulfillment: Mainstream Protestantism in Europe and North America is generally not an expanding group, but given the fire of Pentecostal and prophetic movements, it grows almost wildly in Africa and Latin America. So dramatic has been the spread in many Latin American nations that the Protestants have unsettled Catholic communities and created antagonisms that could mean that the twenty-first century may see, in some places, renewed hostility between Protestants and Catholics—hostility compensated for by continuing growth in the ecumenical spirit in most places.

While original Protestantism saw itself as a reform within Catholicism and while the language of sixteenth-century evangelical movements often spoke of reunion with Rome, the terms for such reunion have been such that neither side expects it to occur. The vast majority of Protestants have settled for ever-changing patterns of church life in which "return to Rome" or reunion with Rome has not been a practical or vivid expectation. While they seek ever better relations except where there is open competition for souls, as in Latin America, they try to find ecumenical expression in forms that will not find them yielding what they see to be a spirit of freedom and independence and a rejection of the human authority they find in the papacy.

Protestants tend to be eschatologically minded; that is, they have their mind and eye on "the last things." Literalists expect a literal second coming of Christ, and often talk in millennial terms, expecting a thousand-year reign of Christ. The nonliteralists have no such vivid pictures of visible returns, comings, or endings in mind. Yet they also believe that history is worked out under God through the lordship of Christ. Such history has beginnings, central points—the Crucifixion and Resurrection of Christ and the coming of the Holy Spirit—and the expectation of a fulfillment or a consummation when the fullness of God's love and care for all believers will be made evident. They expect that such a consummation will involve all sorts of Protestant believers with the Catholics and Orthodox from whom they may remain divided for many ages to come. See also Catholic Church; Catholicism; Reformation, the.

Bibliography

Barrett, David B., ed. World Christian Encyclopedia. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Bouyer, Louis. The Spirit and Forms of Protestantism. London: Harvill Press, 1956.

Brown, Robert McAfee. The Spirit of Protestantism. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961.

Forell, George. The Protestant Faith. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1960.

Marty, Martin E. Protestantism. New York: Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, 1972.

MARTIN E. MARTY

Prothesis (proh'thes-ihs; Gk., "offertory"), Byzantine-rite offertory or rite of preparation of the bread and wine, a separate akolouthia (Gk.) or office performed by the priest and deacon before the public beginning of the Eucharist. The rite is also called Proskomidia (Slav.) or Proskomide (Gk., "offering," "anaphora"), though that is more properly the name of the prayer preceding the anaphora, or eucharistic prayer, in the Byzantine rite. See also offertory.

protodeacon, "first deacon," an honorary title conferred on a nonmonastic Byzantine-rite deacon. The term also refers to the first deacon of a cathedral church of the same rite. See also deacon; hierodeacon.

Protonotary Apostolic, an official of the Roman Curia who notarizes certain documents. The title is also given other priests as an honorary title. Until 1968 protonotaries could on occasion wear bishops' vestments when presiding at Mass, but this privilege is no longer given.

protopresbyter (Lat., "first presbyter"), a Byzantine-rite archpriest, an honorary title similar to monsignor. Among Russians it is the highest title conferred on a nonmonastic priest, and is granted to very few. See also monsignor; presbyter.

prototype (Gk., proto, "first"; typon, "of a kind"), a soteriological term designating Jesus Christ as the savior of all people because he is the archetypal human being in relation to whom all other human beings can be formed or renewed by the Holy Spirit. Paul speaks of Jesus Christ as the new Adam (1 Cor 15:20–21), and Colossians describes Christ as the "firstborn" of the new creation (Col 1:15–20). In his theory of recapitulation Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) presents Christ as the "new head" of the human family. See also Jesus Christ.

providence, the divine plan by which God brings creation to its goal. Derived from Latin, it means literally "foresight." Providence was a technical term of Stoic philosophy to express divine rule over all events. Although providence is not a biblical term (but see Wis 14:3; 17:2), the idea of a loving, wise, and powerful God at work in the world is everywhere present. In contrast to Stoicism, however, the emphasis is on loving care rather than on power. Early Christian writers used "providence" to express the biblical idea. But gradually it came to have Stoic connotations, emphasizing power. This was especially true in Augustine of Hippo (d. 430).

The Stoic view encountered two main problems: human freedom and evil. Augustine confronted the first when opposing the Pelagian error that free will without any further grace enables human beings to achieve salvation. He taught that God's grace decides who is saved and who is lost. He recognized that this imposes necessity on human activity, but he did not wish to deny human freedom (City of God 5.9).

Augustine dealt with evil by making all suffering punishment for sin. The sin of Adam and Eve made the whole human race a "lump of clay damned in its root." From this lump God mercifully chooses to make some vessels destined for eternal life, the rest God justly lets go to eternal damnation (Admonition and Grace 7, 16). However, God is so powerful that God would never let any evil enter creation if God could not draw good from it (Enchiridion of Faith, Hope and Love 11).

John of Damascus (d. ca. 749) suggested another view. He distinguished between the antecedent and the consequent will of God (The Orthodox Faith 2, 29). The first makes salvation possible for everyone; the second condemns only unrepentant sinners. This view regards providence as "contingency planning": God does not predetermine events or choices, but directs whatever occurs to the infallible realization of God's gracious purpose.

Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) described providence as the order of creation to its end as this order preexists in the mind of God (Summa Theologiae 1.22.1). He, too, presupposed "contingency planning" in explaining how God's will is always fulfilled (Summa Theologiae 1.19.6).

Aquinas maintained that infallible divine knowledge does not necessitate human choice because God does not foresee events as future, but eternally sees all things as present. Knowledge of what is present can be infallible without imposing necessity on what it knows (1.14.13).

Aquinas basically accepted Augustine's solution to the problem of evil (Summa Theologiae 1.48.5). However, recent thought does not see all human suffering as a consequence of sin. Rather, some things happen that God does not directly intend (though God intends their possibility in willing to make a universe where there is emergent freedom), whether these be sins and their effects or natural contingent events, and God is present to draw good from them. See also creation; evil; God; providence [in the Bible]; salvation history. JOHN H. WRIGHT providence [in the Bible], God's care for all creatures and the chosen people in particular. The classical examples of the latter occur in the Exodus from Egypt and the forty-year sojourn in the wilderness during which time the Israelites were provided with food (Exod 16:1–36; Num 11:4–35) and drink (Exod 17:1–7; Num 20:2–13) and guided to their destination by means of an angel, or the divine presence (face) itself, or the fire and cloud that descended on the ark and the tent. This theme is repeated often in the homiletic material in Deuteronomy (e.g., 6:31; 8:16). Numerous other instances occur illustrating God's solicitous care for creatures: God clothes the man and the woman before their expulsion from Eden (Gen 3:21), provides Cain with a protective mark (4:15), takes care of Jacob during his twenty-year exile in Mesopotamia (28:15), and provides for the future of the midwives who put themselves at risk by protecting the Hebrew male infants in Egypt (Exod 1:20). The story of Jonah illustrates how God's care even extends to the animal world (Jonah 4:11). God's providence is especially in evidence in narratives about holy men and women; Elijah is fed miraculously by ravens (1 Kgs 17:6), as Anthony of Egypt, in the biography by Athanasius, is fed by angels.

God's action in leading events toward a predestined end, often in defiance of the will of human agents, also comes to expression in some of the most accomplished literary compositions in the OT. In the so-called Succession History (2 Sam 11–1 Kgs 2), for example, Solomon ends up on the throne in spite of his low ranking and the morally tainted circumstances leading to his conception and birth. In the Joseph story (Gen 37–50), the protagonist attains the highest distinction in Egypt and succeeds in saving his family in spite of the hostility of his brothers. In this case the point is made explicitly: "Even though you intended to do harm to me, God intended it for good, in order to preserve a numerous people, as he is doing today" (Gen 50:20). This deep sense of a divine purpose at work does not, however, entail a doctrine of fate, an idea that comes to expression only in the philosophical reflections of Qoheleth (Eccl 2:14; 3:19; 9:2).

Explicit allusion to divine providence (Gk., pronoia) occurs for the first time in Jewish authors writing in Greek in the postbiblical period, especially in the Wisdom of Solomon (14:3; 17:2). By this time influences from Greek philosophy, especially the Stoics, may be detected, though in the latter providence tends to be of a more impersonal and cosmic nature. In the Gospel tradition Jesus recommends laying aside anxiety in dependence on divine providence and even appeals to God's care for the birds of the air and the lilies of the field (Matt 6:25–33). Providence is related to other NT passages that speak of God's plan (Acts 4:28) or predetermined purpose (Rom 8:29–30; Eph 1:5, 11). See also providence.

JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP

Providence, Sisters of. See Sisters of Providence.

Providentissimus Deus (prah-vi-den-tis'i-muhs day'uhs; Lat., "The Most Provident God"), encyclical of Leo XIII on the study of Sacred Scripture, promulgated on November 18, 1893, in response to emerging higher biblical criticism and new archaeological discoveries. Though it inaugurated a new era in Catholic biblical studies by urging the study of biblical languages and methods of exegesis, it remained cautious by affirming that Scripture was written "at the dictation" of the Holy Spirit, by stating that all exegesis must proceed on the basis of the analogy of faith, and by stressing the normative role of Church doctrine in interpreting Scripture. After Leo XIII's death and in the wake of the anti-Modernist reaction, it was interpreted in an increasingly conservative sense. See also Bible, Church teachings on the.

province, a grouping of a number of dioceses under the supervision of a metropolitan archbishop. The term is also used for a major division, usually geographical, of some institutes of consecrated life under the governance of a provincial superior.

provincial council, gathering of bishops of an ecclesiastical province for the purpose of deciding matters concerning the Church in that province. The term is also used to designate the group of advisers to the provincial superior of a religious institute required by canon law.

provincial superior, official with authority over, and responsibility for, a province, i.e., a significant portion of an institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life. Assisted by a council, which gives advice and consent on given issues, the provincial superior has personal authority over the individual communities within the province (known as houses) and each of the members of the province. Not all communities use the terms "provincial" or "province" to designate their major divisions. See also religious institute; society of apostolic life.

Provisors, Statute of, English law (1351) forbidding papal appointments to English ecclesiastical offices, a practice known as "papal provision." The statute stated that only local electors and patrons had the right to fill positions in the English church. See also England, Catholicism in.

prudence, one of the four cardinal virtues, also known as the "rudder" virtue because it "steers" all other virtues. Prudence, together with temperance, fortitude, and justice, has traditionally been viewed as one of the four qualities of character necessary to live a humanly good life, as well as a fully Christian life. The centrality of prudence for the Catholic moral tradition is difficult to understand today, since many people tend to equate prudence with a morally dubious tendency toward caution and shrewdness.

However, for Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and for the moral tradition that follows him, prudence is understood in a more comprehensive way. Aquinas, following Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.), holds that in order to live morally, it is necessary both to know what is a humanly good life, and to have the intelligent discernment necessary to translate this general knowledge of the good into concrete actions. This capacity of discernment, by which the individual translates the general demands of morality into concrete actions, is prudence. Prudence is, strictly speaking, an intellectual virtue, but it is counted among the moral virtues because without it, full moral virtue is impossible. Prudence can only be acquired through experience and reflection. At the same time, Aquinas claims that God bestows prudence directly on those who receive grace, together with the other infused cardinal virtues, even though some of those who are graced would not have the intellectual capacities to acquire prudence on their own. See also cardinal virtues; discernment of spirits; fortitude; justice; temperance.

Prudentius, Aurelius Clemens, ca. 348–ca. 410, Christian Latin poet. Born in Spain, a lawyer and civil administrator, he devoted his retirement to poetry. His collection (404/5), with an autobiographical preface, includes "Hymns for Every Day," the Peristephanon ("Martyrs' Crowns," the passions of fourteen martyrs, most Spanish or Italian), the Psychomachia ("Spiritual Combat," an allegory with personified virtues and vices), and other works of theological interest. He is the only lay Latin Father of the Church. See also Fathers of the Church.

psalmody, the musical style for the liturgical singing of psalms at Mass or, more typically, at the Divine Office. Psalmody is responsorial (as at Mass) when a leader sings the verse and the congregation sings a refrain or response. It is antiphonal (as in the Divine Office) when the congregation is divided into two groups that alternately sing the verses. Psalmody is direct when all sing the verses together. See also liturgical music.

Psalms, the (Gk., Psalmoi, "songs sung to a stringed instrument"; Psalterion, "stringed instrument"), or Psalter, a compilation of 150 Israelite religious lyrics, poems, and prayers by many authors. The Psalter consists of five books (Pss 1–41, 42–72, 73–89, 90–106, 107–50) compiled from earlier collections and individual compositions. The numeration of the psalms in English versions derived from the Hebrew Bible (RSV, JB, NAB) differs from those dependent upon the Septuagint and Vulgate (earlier Catholic Bibles, including Douay, Knox, and Confraternity). The compositions are of several types, such as wisdom psalms (Ps 1), royal psalms (Ps 2), and laments (Ps 22).

Several Psalms scrolls from Qumran differ from the traditional Hebrew Psalter in content, arrangement, or both. These manuscripts indicate that the Psalter was gradually assembled from psalms written earlier. Pss 1–89 were mostly in their present order by the first century B.C., and the whole collection (Pss 1–150) was finalized in the second half of the first century A.D. The psalms have continued to play an important role in Jewish tradition, prayer, and communal worship.

Psalms are frequently quoted and messianically interpreted in the NT, especially Ps 22 in relation to the Crucifixion (Mark 15:34), and were the model for several NT hymns or prayers. For the early Church, the psalms were both prayerbook and hymnbook and are featured in the writings of many patristic authors. The Psalter is prominent in Catholic and most Protestant liturgies. For the Liturgy of the Hours, the complete Psalter is recited during the course of a one- or four-week cycle; the psalms also play an important role in the celebration of the sacraments. See also Psalter. PETER W. FLINT pseudepigrapha (*s*ood-e-pig'rah-fah), books whose authors assume the names of famous ancient characters. Pseudepigraphy was widely practiced in antiquity and is attested in Judaism and Christianity. Examples are the books of Enoch, which were composed from the third century B.C. on, and the book of Jubilees (ca. 150 B.C.), which claims Moses as its author. Some biblical works are pseudepigrapha, e.g., Wisdom of Solomon (first century B.C. or A.D.) in the OT and perhaps 1–2 Timothy and Titus in the NT. The motivation for the practice varied but it need not have been unethical. It may have been a way of acknowledging the tradition in which one's ideas belonged.

Psalter, a liturgical book containing the psalms and biblical canticles used in divine services.

Pseudo-Dionysius. See Denys the Areopagite.

Pseudo-Synod of Lvov (Lviv), a Communist-orchestrated pseudo-synod held on March 8–10, 1946, in Lviv, capital of Galicia in western Ukraine, at which the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church was forcibly integrated into the Russian Orthodox Church.

Western Ukraine was incorporated into the USSR (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) at the end of World War II. Lviv was the metropolitan see of the Ukrainian Catholic Church, to which most of the population of western Ukraine belonged (the Polish Orthodox parish in Lviv was the only Orthodox church in the entire region). In the winter of 1944–45 the Soviet regime prohibited all contact of the hierarchy with its clergy and faithful, and initiated a campaign of forced meetings and propaganda in favor of union with the Russian Orthodox Church. Opponents were arrested and tortured. In April 1945 the entire hierarchy was imprisoned, and the regime recognized an "Initiative Group" of three Catholic priests, formed to carry out the government plan, as the sole authority over the Church. The government instructed them to make lists of all clergy who refused to recognize their authority.

Under police protection this group carried out a campaign of propaganda and threats. The NKVD (Soviet secret police) pressured the unwilling Greek Catholic clergy to sign the petition for union with Orthodoxy. Those who refused were arrested. At the end of February, thirteen Catholic priests were received into Orthodoxy secretly in Kiev, and the two celibate members of the "Initiative Group" were consecrated as Orthodox bishops. Their leader, Havriyjil Kostel'nyk, a married priest, was made a mitred archpriest, the highest dignity open to the married clergy (he was assassinated September 20, 1948). On March 8–10 a "synod" of 216 terrorized priests (many were married men who, like Kostel'nyk, had received threats against their families) and nineteen laypersons, orchestrated in Lviv under the leadership of this group, abolished the Union of Brest (1596), by which millions of Eastern Christians entered into communion with Rome. This purported to be a synod of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church, but its entire hierarchy was in prison, and the thirteen-priest presidium of the synod had in fact already become Orthodox in Kiev on February 22–23, 1946, though this was kept secret until the action was completed. Some claim that Patriarch Alexis I of Moscow never recognized the legitimacy of this action (the congratulatory telegram sent in his name has been said to be a forgery). The "reunion" was followed by massive arrests, interrogations, abuse, trials, banishment, and deportations, causing incalculable suffering and death. Of over three thousand Ukrainian Catholic priests, Orthodox sources claim that 986 submitted to Orthodoxy. Some three hundred fled west; the others were arrested or went underground.

The acts of the synod were published in Ukrainian in Lviv in 1946, and in 1982, for the forty-fifth anniversary of the synod, the Moscow patriarchate, which by then had become embarrassed by the realities, issued bowdlerized versions in Ukrainian, Russian, and English, much to the derision of the scholarly world. The publication of the acts of the synod also provoked a large body of scholarly studies in the West and, from the Russian Orthodox side, a relentless campaign of propaganda until the late 1980s, when the public admission of the truth, even by Soviet government officials and police agents who had participated in the "synod," revealed the synodal proceedings as shameful. It had been neither free nor representative of the Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church.

On May 16, 1992, the synod of the Ukrainian Catholic Church in Lviv unanimously declared the pseudo-synod of 1946 canonically invalid. But despite repeated Catholic appeals since 1980, Russian Orthodox authorities have defended the action as a legitimate abolition of the "forced" Union of Brest, and have refused to disclaim or condemn it, saying that they may not annul a "Catholic Synod," though it is common knowledge that its presidium and the two bishops present at it were already Russian Orthodox.

Since the granting of religious freedom in Ukraine, the return to the Greek Catholic Church of an estimated five million faithful and at least four hundred Orthodox priests would seem to disprove Orthodox claims that the union with Rome was artificial and forced, without popular or religious roots, and that it dissolved itself in 1946 as soon as its external political props were removed. See also Russia, Catholicism in; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Pseudo-Synod of Presov, a Communist-orchestrated assembly on April 28, 1950, in the city of Presov in Slovakia, which incorporated the 305,000-member Greek Catholic Church into the Orthodox church. Until 1950, the minority Orthodox Church in Slovakia had only 20 churches to the Greek Catholics' 434 churches and 72 chapels. Relations between the two churches were good, and there was freedom of religion. Orthodox proselytism among Greek Catholics was intense, and any Greek Catholic who wished to join the Orthodox was free to do so.

At the end of World War II the 35,000-member Orthodox Church of Czechoslovakia came under the jurisdiction of Moscow, and a Russian was named Orthodox bishop of Presov. After a government-coordinated propaganda campaign that won over only nine Greek Catholic priests, a "Greek Catholic Conference" (Slovak, sjazd) was convoked. Though later called "The Historical Synod of Greek Catholic Priests and Laity," the 820 delegates who gathered, including 100 priests, had not been informed about the purpose of the meeting. After speeches praising the USSR (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and the Russian Orthodox Church and attacking the Catholic Church and the Vatican, resolutions liquidating the union with Rome were accepted "by acclamation." The Greek Catholic cathedral in Presov was seized by force, and an Orthodox service of thanksgiving was celebrated. A government decree of May 27 confirmed these actions, handed all Greek Catholic property over to the Orthodox Church, and declared that "From now on, therefore, in all matters concerning the former Greek Catholic priests, whether there is question of their person, their salary, or their residence, all civic and state agencies shall have recourse to the bishops of the Orthodox Church."

By this fiat all Greek Catholic priests, most of them married men with families, were placed under Orthodox authority for their homes and livelihood. Those who accepted this transfer to the Orthodox Church were allowed to remain in their parishes; the rest were evicted, confined for about a year, then banished. A hundred diocesan priests, one-third of the total, eventually converted to Orthodoxy. The two bishops were imprisoned. In 1950 it was estimated that 50 percent of the people had remained loyal to the Catholic Church, including 230 priests; all were forced to reside in exile in the Czech regions outside their native Slovakia. Over four hundred thousand recusants who opposed the suppression were deported west to the Sudetenland, from which three million ethnic Germans had been expelled in 1945–46.

During the "Prague Spring," a brief period of political freedom under Alexander Dubāek, later suppressed by the Soviet military, the Greek Catholic Church was legalized by government decree of June 13, 1968. Plebiscites were held in the parishes, and the people returned to the Greek Catholic Church en masse. There were sporadic incidents of intolerance and violence by both sides when the Orthodox, having lost the vote, refused to deliver the church. The discredited and collaborationist Orthodox Church was reduced to a critical position. Hopes that the Soviet invasion of 1968 would crush the Catholic resurgence were not fulfilled, but the government halted the plebiscites in the summer of 1969, after the Orthodox had won in only 5 out of 210 parishes. An imposed settlement prohibited further voting. The 205 parishes that had declared themselves Catholic were assigned to the Greek Catholics; another 87 remained Orthodox, only 5 by a free vote. Seventy-eight Orthodox priests became Catholic, joining the 166 surviving priests who had remained Catholic at the suppression. The Greek Catholic Church is estimated to have recovered 90 percent of its faithful, with about ten to fifteen thousand choosing to remain Orthodox. The Czecho-Slovak census of 1991 listed 188,397 Greek Catholics and 53,613 Orthodox in the country. See also Greek Catholic Church.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Pseudo-Union of Alba Iulia, the forced reintegration of the Romanian Greek Catholic Church into the Romanian Orthodox Church by the Communist regime at Alba Iulia in 1948.

In 1947 the Romanian government reorganized the Orthodox hierarchy. The metropolitan of Moldavia was replaced by Justinian Marina (1901–77), who was then elected patriarch on May 24, 1948. On August 4, the new law on cults (outlawed religious groups) forbade relations with any foreign religious body, severing Catholics from the Vatican, and provided for the withdrawal of legal recognition from a religious body for a good reason. All property of the outlawed cult would pass to the state.

The government orchestrated an intense campaign and the patriarch made threatening appeals to the Greek Catholics to return to Orthodoxy for reasons of national unity. Greek Catholic priests were harassed, arrested, and tortured. During September 1948, about 430 priests were coerced into signing a declaration empowering delegates to engineer the return to Orthodoxy. On October 1, 1948, thirty-eight priests were brought to Cluj for a "congress" under police surveillance. Thirty-six priests (two had escaped) "unanimously" signed a government-prepared "decision" to join the Orthodox Church. This was "accepted" by the patriarch and synod and then confirmed in Alba Iulia on October 21 before a large rigged assembly, after which Marina celebrated a thanksgiving service in the "former" Greek Catholic cathedral there. Later a plaque was affixed to the cathedral to commemorate this sham. The statistics and the dates expose this action as a contrived response to the act of union with Rome signed by thirty-eight Orthodox clergy in Alba Iulia 250 years earlier on the same date.

All who opposed went into hiding or were arrested, including all the Greek Catholic bishops. On December 1, the thirtieth anniversary of the Union of All Romanians in 1918, the government decreed that the 1,562,980-member Greek Catholic Church, with five dioceses and 1,834 priests, had ceased to exist. The government confiscated its property except for the parishes, which were handed over to the Orthodox. "Certificates of Orthodoxy" were required of Greek Catholic priests even for civil purposes. Since most of them were married men, they were forced to acquiesce in order to support their families. It is estimated that some three hundred of them, mostly in the countryside, adjusted to the situation and were left in their parishes. Many of them are known to have remained Catholics in conscience, and witnesses hold that only a few Catholic priests accepted Orthodoxy willingly.

The "reintegration" was accomplished with extraordinary brutality. Some six hundred priests were arrested. Estimates claim that two hundred were imprisoned and four hundred executed. All the bishops died in confinement. But the Greek Catholic Church continued a precarious underground existence. The faithful resisted the takeover of churches: on October 31, 1948, the Orthodox metropolitan of Sibiu needed the help of the Communist police to enter the Catholic cathedral in Blaj. Continuing resistance and greater audacity as the illegal church increased its underground activities led to new clergy show trials in 1957, with sentences of up to twenty-five years.

The Romanian Orthodox Church was largely a passive spectator in the forcible reunion. Seventy-eight Orthodox priests went to prison rather than take over Catholic churches assigned them, and Romanians in exile publicly condemned the suppression. But Patriarch Marina had campaigned openly for the "reintegration," a few of the higher clergy openly supported it, not one of them spoke out against it, and for over forty years Orthodox exponents have systematically lied about its true nature. Marina's statements to the press during a 1972 visit to Belgium provoked widespread scandal and indignation in the free world. In 1973, Orthodox bishops demanded that the government be more severe with the uniates. But times had changed, and by then the government wished to integrate the recusants into the Latin rite.

Upon the overthrow of the Ceausescu regime in Romania in 1989, the instantaneous resurgence of this church, despite Orthodox protests and slander, disproved Orthodox claims that the "reintegration" of 1948 was free. See also Romanian Catholic Church.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Pseudo-Union of Uzhorod, the Soviet-orchestrated forcible incorporation into the Russian Orthodox Church of the Greek Catholic Church in Subcarpathia in 1949. In June 1945, the Subcarpathian region of Czechoslovakia was incorporated into the Ukrainian Soviet Republic, a Russian Orthodox bishop was named to the region, all churches were declared state property, and Greek Catholic churches began to be seized and delivered to the Orthodox. On November 1, 1947, the Byzantine Catholic bishop Theodore G. Romzha of Mukachevo was assassinated by the Soviets. In June 1948, Russian Orthodox archbishop Makarij Oksiiouk of Lviv, the Soviet government's agent in the 1946 Lviv "reunion," was sent to the largely Catholic region. In February 1949, the regime relinquished to him the Catholic cathedral in Uzhorod, and the following August he declared the Union of Uzhorod at an end without holding a pseudo-synod like the one he had helped orchestrate in Lviv in 1946, a service that had earned him his promotion to archbishop. The outcome was the same as in Galicia (western Ukraine): arrests, persecution, deportations, with the Church driven underground to reemerge and reclaim its faithful when granted freedom in 1990. See also Uzhorod, Union of.

psychiatry. See Catholicism and psychology/psychiatry.

psychology. See Catholicism and psychology/psychiatry.

psychology and spirituality, two disciplines, as well as processes, that intersect most pointedly in questions of human interiority and the nature of the self. Psychology studies mental and emotional states and their interplay in the emergence of the self. Spirituality is concerned with the total lived response of a person to the presence of God in life.

Psychology studies and facilitates a process of self-appropriation. Spirituality supports a process of self-transcendence. It identifies a dynamism within the human personality to go beyond itself to know and love the other. A Christian perspective understands this self-transcending dynamism to be the result of Christ's Spirit enabling the human spirit to grow into consciousness, responsible living, and a loving union with God, others, and creation.

Two extremes are possible in the relationship between psychology and spirituality. One extreme reduces spirituality to psychology and locks the person in the psychological self with no other resource. Spirituality, however, addresses realities for which psychological categories become inadequate. Nor can psychology responsibly escape these deeper questions of the human spirit.

The other extreme denies any relationship between psychology and spirituality and thereby is unable to find in psychological processes an indication of God's grace, or identify any psychological determinants that impinge on a person's response to God, such as early childhood factors, unconscious motivations, or psychic factors in shaping images of God.

Psychological wholeness and spiritual holiness are not linked inseparably, nor are they totally unrelated. Psychological readiness for a full and faithful response to God is always a relative matter. Individuals who are psychologically impaired may evidence heroic faith in God. Such individuals remind us that all psyches are limited and that a life of faith is a gift unmerited by anyone. On the other hand, Christian mystics testify that their experience of God transformed and healed their psychic structures. Desires warring within them were reoriented and put at the service of God's will in their lives.

Psychology attempts to name specific issues that arise in the unfolding of personality. Christian spirituality addresses the origins of this life, the power that sustains and impels it, and the goal of its growth. The Christian spiritual tradition has generally affirmed that knowledge of self is required for knowledge of God. However, the tradition also holds that one's true self is only revealed in relationship with God.

Developmental psychologists chart human development through crises, passages, and seasons as the personality undergoes transformation. Spirituality understands freedom and authentic personhood to be the result of a process of conversion underlying these personality changes. From a Christian perspective, developmental theories explore not simply personality transformation, but manifestations of what is, at root, a graced invitation to surrender a life in trust to God's empowering love and mercy. Psychological constructs may be understood as a tracing of the Paschal Mystery, the dying and rising of Christ, inbuilt in human development.

The Christian mystics, paradigms of humanity, teach that authentic human development is ultimately a process of divinization, a participation in the knowing and loving of God. The mystics report a graciousness at the core of life, a transcendent source of identity and empowerment within the psyche, which nurtured and guaranteed their personhood. See also Catholicism and psychology/psychiatry; spirituality, Christian. JOHN F. WELCH psychology of religion, the rational or scientific study of the psychological and philosophical aspects of beliefs and practices of religion. Two early pioneers were William James (1842–1910) and Pierre Janet (1859–1947), although best known are the theories of Sigmund Freud (1856–1939) and Carl Jung (1875–1961).

Included in the study of the psychology of religion are the role of the emotions in the origins of belief, the psychological dynamics of religious conversion, comparative phenomena in Eastern and Western religions, and the relationship of religious belief and practice to psychopathology. Psychology of religion has enjoyed a surge of interest in Christian churches since the 1960s, especially in the training of pastoral counselors. See also Catholicism and psychology/psychiatry.

public vows. See vows, public.

publican (Lat., publicanus, translated, somewhat inaccurately, from telones, "tax or toll collector"), a generally wealthy individual who purchased the right to collect taxes, often in a brutal and exploitative manner. The Gospel "tax collectors," befriended by Jesus (e.g., Mark 2:15–16), were petty bureaucrats, often scorned as agents of an occupying power.

Puebla, the city in Mexico where the Third General Conference of Latin American Bishops (CELAM, the acronym for Conferencia Episcopal Latinoamericana) was held in January 1979 and attended by Pope John Paul II. Building on CELAM II (in Medellín, Colombia, in 1968), CELAM III endorsed the notion of "integral liberation," approved of the formation of "base communities," and committed the Church to a "preferential option for the poor." The documents are available in J. Eagleson and P. Scharper, eds., Puebla and Beyond (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1979). See also base communities; Latin America, Catholicism in; liberation theology; preferential option for the poor.

Pulcheria, St. (pul-kair'ee-uh), 399–453, empress and consecrated virgin, elder sister of Emperor Theodosius II (408–50). She succeeded him at his death, taking the elderly Marcian as consort. An able and pious stateswoman, she had the bones of John Chrysostom returned to Constantinople (438) and took an active part in theological controversies, arranging and organizing the Council of Chalcedon (451). She bequeathed her wealth to the poor. Feast day: September 10. See also Chalcedon, Council of.

pulpit, an elevated wooden or stone stand for the preacher or reader. In early Christian times the bishop preached from the cathedra, or episcopal chair. Later the ambo, an elevated platform structure, was used. Pulpits, often ornately decorated, became popular in medieval times. Currently, the lectern has replaced the pulpit, for the most part. See also ambo; homily; lectern.

Purcell, John Baptist, 1800–1883, U.S. archbishop. Born in Ireland, he served as instructor and then president of Mount St. Mary's Seminary in Emmitsburg, Maryland. He was appointed bishop of Cincinnati (1833) and later promoted to archbishop (1850). He was an ardent supporter of Catholic schools.

purgative way. See ways of the spiritual life.

purgatory, an intermediate state of purification between death and heaven that provides for the removal of remaining personal obstacles to the full enjoyment of eternal union with God. According to Catholic doctrine, such purification continues and completes the process of sanctification (or divinization) that makes intimate union with the triune God possible for persons justified and reconciled in Christ. The obstacles in view here are both venial sins, unrepented at the time of death, and any enduring dispositional consequences of the repented and forgiven serious sins committed during one's earthly life. There is no question of a reversal of the direction that one has taken in the course of earthly life. Purgatory is not an opportunity for conversion where none has transpired in earthly life. The eternal destiny of the "holy souls" is not in question. Given that individual judgment follows immediately upon death, purgatory affords an interval of final purification for erasing conditions that would prevent justified persons from enjoying full fellowship with God in the communion of saints.

The doctrine of purgatory, as it came to be formulated by Church councils, articulates the basic assumptions of an unbroken liturgical tradition in the Christian community of intercessory prayer offered on behalf of "those who have gone before us." This is evident in conciliar affirmations of the doctrine, notably at the councils of Florence (1439), Trent (1563), and Vatican II (1965; Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, nn. 49–50). Through prayer, the pilgrim Church on earth affirms its solidarity with the Church on the threshold of glory.

Christian art, preaching, and exhortatory literature have pictured purgatory as a place of fire and torment to be endured for a definite duration. But these imagistic conceptions, though significant for understanding the cultural setting of the doctrine, are by no means central to its affirmation. At its core, the doctrine affirms simply a transitional spiritual state (possibly instantaneous and coincident with death) of transformation in view of the assured prospect of the Beatific Vision. See also Beatific Vision; eternal life; heaven; last things. JOSEPH A. DINOIA purification, a cleansing that restores a person to life in the community, or to communion with God. Primitive belief held that people could be contaminated by contact with certain profane or sacred objects. In the OT, purification rites cleansed people who had contracted a legal uncleanness through an impurity such as a skin disease, or through contact with the divine, as in childbirth. Jesus Christ emphasized the importance of faith and loving service of brothers and sisters rather than ritual purifications.

Traditionally, spiritual writers have spoken about a purification needed to overcome resistance to God's love. John of the Cross (d. 1591), for example, pointed to God's love at work freeing the soul through the purification of the dark night. More generally, one can speak of the purification that comes through the faithful living of one's commitments. See also absolution; Presentation; sanctification.

purificator (Lat., purificare, "to purify"), a small cloth used for wiping the paten and drying the chalice (after rinsing the latter with water) at Mass. It is made of white absorbent linen, 16 inches by 8 inches, the width being folded in thirds. A small red cross decorates it at one end.

Puritanism, a term covering a number of groups from the time of Elizabeth I (1558–1603) to that of Charles II (1660–85) seeking to purify the Church of England of all vestiges of Catholicism. The first Puritans rejected the Lutheran/Anglican claim that ceremonies are indifferent matters (Gk., adiaphora), insisting on the removal from worship of all that obscures the once-for-all sacrifice of Christ, such as vestments, altars, and prayers for the dead. The next generation sought to restore the worship and polity of the early Church, rejecting episcopacy for a presbyterian polity and making discipline a third mark of the Church. The movement further diversified with the creation of the Congregationalists or Independents under Robert Browne (1582) and the Baptist movement under John Smythe and Thomas Helwys (1612). Suppressed by the Act Against Puritans (1593) under Elizabeth I, the Puritans set their hopes on James I, to whom they presented their Millenary Petition on his way to London. The king frustrated their hopes at the Hampton Court Conference of 1604, but he did agree to a new Bible translation, the Authorized Version of 1611 (the King James Version). Charles I and archbishop of Canterbury William Laud pursued an expressly anti-Puritan policy, mandating the "Roman" ceremonies Puritans found offensive. The execution of Laud and Charles I by the Long Parliament and the Solemn League and Covenant with Scotland (1643) led to the creation of the Westminster Confession of 1649, a synopsis of seventeenth-century Puritan theology. The Civil War under Oliver Cromwell gave ascendancy first to the Presbyterians, then to the Independents. With the Restoration of 1660, the Puritans were excluded from the Church of England, although they were protected under the Toleration Act of 1689 and had established communities in Holland and New England. See also Protestantism; Reformation, the.

RANDALL C. ZACHMAN

purity, living as a sexual person in accord with God's will. The Church has vigorously taught the moral obligations related to human sexuality. At times, however, these obligations have been associated with an un-Christian understanding of sexuality. This dualistic perspective regarded even appropriate sexual expression as tainted or somewhat "dirty." This was because bodily activity of its nature was not so good or so pure as spiritual activity. In the 1990s, Pope John Paul II and others have tried to present a more holistic understanding of purity. See also chastity; sexual morality.

purity of heart, a spiritual state that is gained, according to the Desert Fathers, by ascetic practices and attainment of tranquility. Those who enjoy purity of heart are free from self-serving desires of the spirit, mind, and flesh. Their will is transformed by the will of God alone so that all expressions of egoism cease. See also asceticism.

putative marriage, in canon law an invalid marriage that is presumed valid if celebrated in good faith by at least one party. Historically, this concept was instituted to avoid the adverse consequences of illegitimacy and invalidity on innocent parties. See also marriage law.

pyx (piks; Gk., puxis, "wood container"), small metallic receptacle used by a priest or other eucharistic minister to carry Holy Communion to those who, by reason of sickness, are unable to attend Mass. The term is less frequently used to designate the container of the Host used for public veneration of the Eucharist; that is more properly known as a lunette. See also Communion, Holy.

QR

Q, the designation, mostly likely derived from the abbreviation of the German Quelle ("source"), given to roughly 235 verses that the Gospels of Matthew and Luke share in common, but that are not found in Mark. Advocates of the Two-Source Hypothesis argue that Matthew and Luke composed their Gospels by combining Mark and Q, along with special material from their own traditions, designated as M and L. Following the Lucan order, a widely accepted list of Q passages would be the following verses (with slight variations in the Matthean parallels): Luke 3:7–9, 13–17; 4:1–13; 6:20–23 (the Beatitudes and woes) 27–49 (the Sermon on the Plain, cf. Matt 5–7); 7:1–10, 18–35; 9:57–62; 10:2–16; 21–24; 11:2–4, 9–20, 23–26; 29–35, 39–52; 12:2–12, 22–31, 33–34, 39–46, 51–53, 57–59; 13:18–21, 23–30, 34–35; 14:16–24, 26–27, 34–35; 15:4–7; 16:13, 16–18; 17:3–4, 6, 23–24, 26–30, 33–37; 18:14; 19:12–27; 22:28–30. Q contains mainly sayings of Jesus, has only one miracle (the healing of the centurion's servant in Luke 7:1–10), and has no Passion or Resurrection narrative. Many contemporary scholars argue that Q itself underwent different editions, with the earliest version consisting of wisdom sayings of Jesus (e.g., Luke 6:43–49; 11:34–36) and the later portions having a high proportion of eschatological sayings (e.g., sections from Luke 12), reflecting the delay of the Parousia (the expected return of Jesus). Jesus, the prophetic wisdom teacher, is awaited as the coming Son of Man and judge. The collection and preservations of Q may be the work of a community that followed the itinerant life-style of Jesus (Luke 10:1–16) and lived in expectation of the imminent return of Jesus. JOHN R. DONAHUE

Quadragesimo Anno (kwah-drah-jay'zee-moh ah'noh; Lat., "After Forty Years"), social encyclical written in 1931 by Pope Pius XI. It sought to develop Pope Leo XIII's social teaching as articulated in Rerum Novarum (1891), the encyclical credited with inaugurating modern Catholic social teaching.

Quadragesimo Anno first assesses the impact of Rerum Novarum on both Church and society. The Church turned more to the plight of the worker. Civil authority responded by following Pope Leo's positive understanding of the role of the state, leading to policies to protect and aid the worker. Pope Leo's emphasis on the right of workers to associate facilitated the formation of unions.

Pope Pius XI then applied Rerum Novarum to the circumstances of the era. Issued in the midst of the Depression and the rise of Communist totalitarianism, Quadragesimo Anno critiques both capitalism and socialism. The former can lead to an excessive individualism that leaves the worker unprotected, while the latter can oppress human freedoms through a damaging collectivism. An understanding of private property as a qualified right allows Pope Pius XI to avoid both errors. While an individual has a right to private property, the use of that property is limited by its social character. God created the goods of the world for the well-being of everyone within it.

Pius XI offers a concrete alternative to both capitalism and socialism, a society based on vocational—that is not to say class—groupings. Relationships between these groups are regulated by the principle of subsidiarity: do not do through large-scale institutions what can be performed by smaller, more intimate ones. See also Catholic social teachings; encyclicals, social; subsidiarity, principle of.

TODD D. WHITMORE

Quakers, also known as Friends or the Religious Society of Friends, a religious community devoted to listening to and obeying Christ speaking within. They emerged under the leadership of George Fox (1624–91) during a time of great religious ferment in Commonwealth England under Oliver Cromwell. By 1647, Fox began to travel throughout northern England, declaring to Christian assemblies in "steeplehouses" that Christ had come to teach his people himself, so that they might know Christ and God by the Spirit in themselves and speak the word of God to others in a fellowship of love by the same Spirit that had spoken through the prophets and apostles in Scripture. The followers of Fox, called "Friends" by him but "Quakers" by others because "we bid them tremble at the word of God," were mainly dissatisfied Independents and Baptists. They would gather for worship in silent meetings, listening for Christ speaking within and often speaking to others on his behalf. The movement gained momentum in 1652 and rapidly spread to Ireland, Scotland, North America, and the Continent. Its most famous representatives are William Penn, who founded Pennsylvania in 1682, and Robert Barclay, who wrote its greatest defense in his Apology for the True Christian Religion (1676; Eng. trans., 1678). Quaker opposition to tithes, oaths, military service, and hierarchical social conventions brought persecution and often execution. Quakers have been dominant in the antislavery movements, law and prison reform, as well as opposition to war and religious persecution. See also pacifism.

quality of life, judgments about the kind of life a patient experiences before or after the application of medical technology. The term originated in the 1950s with the advancements of medical science and technology. There are disagreements about the meaning of the term, but quality-of-life judgments should not be understood as evaluations of the individual's ability to contribute to society. Life itself is valuable because it is created by God. However, physical life is not an absolute value, but it is only the condition for the pursuit of other values. It provides us with the possibility or opportunity to pursue material, moral, and spiritual values. Quality-of-life judgments, then, are assessments about the patient's current or future medical condition in relation to his or her abilities to pursue these other important values that transcend physical life. Any decision to use medical technology must consider whether the application of this technology will enhance or worsen the patient's ability to pursue life's values beyond merely physical existence. See also bioethics; medical ethics.

Quam Singulari (kwahm sin-goo-lah'ree; Lat., "That with a particular [love]"), decree issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, August 8, 1910, requiring that children who have reached the "age of discretion" (understood to be approximately seven) be permitted to receive Holy Communion.

Quanta Cura (kwahn'tah koo'rah; Lat., "How much concern"), encyclical of Pope Pius IX, December 8, 1864, accompanying the "Syllabus of Errors." It condemned liberalism, socialism, communism, secularism, and what Pius IX viewed as other contemporary social evils. See also Syllabus of Errors.

Quartodecimans (kwohr-toh-dech'i-muhnz; Lat., "fourteenth"), the designation used by Hippolytus and later heresiologists for Christians who celebrated Easter on the date of Passover, the fourteenth day of the Jewish month Nisan, instead of the following Sunday. This practice, followed especially by the churches in Asia Minor, was essentially the celebration of a Christian Passover. Prominent Quartodecimans include Polycarp of Smyrna, Melito of Sardis, Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Polycrates of Ephesus, whom Pope Victor I (d. 198) threatened to excommunicate, although he was rebuked for this by Irenaeus (d. ca. 200). The Council of Nicaea (325) settled on the Sunday celebration of Easter, but Quartodeciman practice continued until at least the fifth century. See also Asia Minor; Easter; Passover.

quasi-domicile, temporary residency within a given diocese or parish. Canon law is concerned that each person be attached to a Christian community in a diocese and/or parish, even on a temporary basis, in order that the person may receive the pastoral ministrations of the Church. One must have the intention to stay within a given territory for at least three months or actually stay there for at least three months in order to acquire a quasi-domicile. See also domicile.

Queen of Heaven, a Marian title pertaining to the belief that, after her Assumption, Mary was crowned Queen of Heaven. The feast of Mary the Queen, celebrated on May 31, was instituted by Pius XII in 1954. The queenship of Mary is now observed as a memorial in the liturgical calendar on August 22, the octave of the Solemnity of the Assumption (August 15). See also Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Regina Coeli.

Quiercy, synods of, a series of important Church councils (754, 838, 849, 853, 857, 858). In 754 Pope Stephen II concluded an alliance with King Pepin III that resulted in the foundation of the Papal States. Quiercy also saw condemnations of the German monk Gottschalk (849, 853) for denying the universal salvific will of God, and an attack on Amalarius of Metz (838) for his fanciful and artificial explanations of ritual. See also Amalarius of Metz; Papal States.

Quietism, heretical spiritual movement of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The Quietists insisted on the annihilation of all human desires in the spiritual life so that a disinterested love of God could flourish. This view fostered the teaching that even the desire for salvation must be abandoned. Further, their passive spirituality led some Quietists to reject as unimportant active works of charity. Quietist ideas were expressed most fully by Miguel de Molinos, who was imprisoned in 1685. Charges of Quietism surfaced in France with the works of Jeanne Marie Guyon and François Fénelon. Guyon's writings were condemned in 1695, and Fénelon's Maxims of the Saints was condemned in 1699.

Quinquagesima Sunday (kwin-kwah-jehz'ee-mah; Lat., quinquagesimus, "fiftieth"), formerly the Sunday before Ash Wednesday. Quinquagesima refers to both a day (the fiftieth before Easter) and a season (the penitential period marked, in ancient times, by abstinence from meat). Following Vatican II, Quinquagesima was eliminated from the Roman Catholic calendar.

quinquennial report, mandatory diocesan status report to the pope filed by the diocesan bishop every five years in a manner and time determined by Holy See. Most bishops submit their report on the form provided by the Sacred Congregation for Bishops detailing diocesan administrative, financial, educational, and personnel organization, pastoral and ecumenical activities, and pertinent statistics.

Qumran (koom-rahn'), the name of a dry riverbed (wadi Qumran) and site of the ruins (khirbet Qumran) of a community compound built next to the wadi, near the northwest shore of the Dead Sea, about 8 miles south of Jericho and about 13 miles east southeast of Jerusalem. The Dead Sea Scrolls were discovered in eleven caves immediately west and north. A predominantly male cemetery lies east of the buildings. Pottery and coins found there suggest that the site was occupied ca. 150 B.C. to A.D. 68. Qumran is the only archaeological site north of Engedi on the west side of the Dead Sea that can correspond to Pliny's description of the Essenes' settlement. See also Dead Sea Scrolls quodlibet (kwahd'li-bet; Lat., "anything [whatsoever]"), an academic exercise held at regular intervals at a medieval university at which masters were expected to respond to topics raised at random by students and other masters. It required considerable mental agility, and some written versions are extant, revealing much about contemporary concerns in theology. See also Scholasticism.

Quo vadis? (kwoh vah'dis; Lat., "Where are you going?"), according to legend, words addressed to Christ on the Appian Way by Peter, who was fleeing Rome during Nero's persecution (A.D. 64). Christ replied that he was heading to Rome. Peter returned to Rome and was martyred. See also Peter, St.

Qurbana (kuhr-bah'nah; Syr., "sacrifice," "oblation"), East (Qurbana) and West (Qurobo) Syrian variants of a common Syriac name for the eucharistic service.

Rabanus Maurus, also known as Hrabanus Maurus or Raban Maur, 780–856, abbot and archbishop. Born at Mainz, educated at Fulda and Tours (where he studied under Alcuin), Rabanus served Fulda as master of the school and as abbot (822–42), becoming archbishop of Mainz in 847. His commentaries, homilies, and other writings are based on careful selections from patristic sources. See also Fulda.

rabat (rab'bee), the cloth or silk material that is attached to a clerical Roman collar and is worn under a suit or cassock. The rabat of a bishop or monsignor is purple, a cardinal's is red, the pope's is white. For all other clerics and seminarians, it is black.

Rabbi (Heb., "my great one"), title of respect in ancient Judaism, particularly for a teacher. The title, or its equivalent Rabbouni, is applied occasionally to Jesus (Matt 16:49; Mark 9:5; 11:21; 14:45; John 1:38; 6:25; 11:8; 20:16). Jesus, however, prohibited his disciples from accepting such a title (Matt 23:8).

Raccolta (It., "collection"), anthology of prayers. Common title for the book of prayers to which indulgences have been attached. The first such collection was published in the early nineteenth century, but such publications are now obsolete. They have been supplanted by the much briefer Enchiridion Indulgentiarum of 1968. See also indulgences.

racism, discrimination against persons on the basis of their racial or ethnic origin. The first Vatican document to deal solely with racism is the Pontifical Justice and Peace Commission's 1988 statement, "The Church and Racism: Toward a More Fraternal Society." It understands racism as "contempt for a race characterized by its ethnic origin, color, or language." The first section traces the history of racism. Although racism is rooted in the reality of human sin, its rise is due primarily to colonialism from the sixteenth century forward. It was not until the eighteenth century that a clear ideological basis for racism developed. While the Catholic Church often made statements condemning racial prejudice, at times missionaries "even gave it encouragement on the basis of false interpretations of the Bible."

"The Church and Racism" cites several forms of contemporary racism. Institutional racism encodes the practice in a country's constitution, excluding persons from participation in the political order. In other instances, there may be participation on a limited basis. Elsewhere, customary practices, not encoded in law, exclude persons of minority races. Finally, "spontaneous racism" often erupts, particularly in places where there is a high rate of immigration.

Church teaching counters racism with its emphasis on the dignity of the human person and the unity of the human family. The imago Dei (Lat., "image of God") doctrine backs both of these emphases. Because persons are created in the image of God, they have an inalienable dignity. Since all persons are so created, there is a unity to the human family. Such dignity and unity forbid discrimination on the basis of race. According to the Catholic Church's moral teaching, racism is a sin. See also imago Dei.

TODD D. WHITMORE

radical sanation. See sanation.

Rahner, Hugo, 1900–68, German Jesuit historian, theologian, and elder brother of the theologian Karl Rahner. At the University of Innsbruck (Austria), Rahner taught primarily in the field of patristics. He was best known for his early theological study of preaching, his book presenting Mary as the symbol of the Church (at the time of Vatican II), and his studies on Ignatius of Loyola.

Rahner, Karl, 1904–84, probably the most prominent and influential Catholic theologian of the twentieth century. A German Jesuit ordained in 1932, his education in neo-Scholasticism was complemented by philosophical studies with Joseph Maréchal (who was among the first to develop a connection between the thought of Kant and Aquinas) and Martin Heidegger (who fashioned an existential metaphysics from neo-Kantian and Husserlian origins). This educational background offered Rahner the opportunity to fashion a new style of theology out of the approaches of Thomist, transcendental, and existentialist philosophies.

Theological Career: As Rahner began his teaching at Innsbruck in 1936, the Nazis closed Catholic schools. During the war he worked in the religious education of clergy and laity in Vienna. Returning to Innsbruck in 1948, he wrote creative essays that liberated Catholic theology from an increasingly rigid neo-Scholasticism. These collected essays began to appear in 1954 in Schriften zur Theologie (Eng. trans., Theological Investigations), a series that would continue for two decades through more than twenty volumes. Their method and content were an example for many theologians of how Catholic theology need not flee originality and development in order to remain true to Church tradition. In the 1950s some of Rahner's ideas incurred Vatican censorship, but in 1962 he was named a theological adviser (Lat., peritus) to Vatican II. Two years later he became the successor of Romano Guardini at the University of Munich. During the conciliar years (1962–65) he worked on commentaries on the conciliar documents, a new edition of the encyclopedia Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Lexicon for Theology and Church), theological dictionaries, and multivolume handbooks of pastoral and systematic theology. He presented his own system, later published as Foundations of Christian Faith, first at Munich in 1964, and then at the University of Münster, where he taught from 1967 until retirement in 1971.

The Elements of His Theology: Rahner drew upon Aquinas's thought even as he related Karl Rahner, German Jesuit priest generally regarded as the greatest Catholic theologian of the twentieth century, who, like Thomas Aquinas in the thirteenth century, attempted to reconcile Christian faith and contemporary thought.

Catholicism successfully to idealism, phenomenology, and existentialism, but without falling into modern tendencies to derive grace and revelation solely from human consciousness. Rahner's theology found expression in several genres: there are the essays on theological topics considered historically and pastorally; the Foundations is a presentation of what is most basic in Christianity for an educated but nonspecialist audience; and there are also books of sermons, meditations on the mysteries of Christ, and reflections on faith in daily life.

One can see in Rahnerian thought three areas of focus: the analysis of the human person; the self-communication of God as the ground of revelation and grace; and the history of self and of culture. The human person becomes the place where revelation occurs. Human structures of knowing and of ordinary life make possible the reception of divine revelation and grace. Divine self-communication comes first in a universal and unthematic way to all; later, human beings and society make it concrete in life and religion. What is called "salvation" is a primal presence of God, including what emerges as "grace" and "revelation." Different cultural and theological epochs emerged in history because an incarnational revelation disclosed itself in the forms of a particular age.

Rahner developed his theology to meet basic contemporary challenges: the development of a Catholic theology that took seriously modern thought; a description of how God's presence touched nonbelievers in secular northern Europe; the existence of grace in the world religions; perdurance and change within the historical forms of Catholicism occurring after Vatican II; and, finally, the monumental shift in the Catholic Church from European Christendom to a world Church.

Rahner insisted that he wrote not for scholars but for ordinary Christians, for all religious people. He wanted to explain what was most basic in the gospel, the reality of the mystery of a special presence of God in each individual life and in the history of humanity. The transcendental and existential side of Rahner's theology was modified after Vatican II by his attention to history and to praxis. Despite his use of terminologies from modern philosophy and a vivid, if dense, German style, his works have been translated into many languages and have attracted a wide following around the world. In this century he pioneered the project of rethinking Catholic dogmatic theology in modern philosophical categories, and he became after Vatican II the Catholic Church's most important theologian.

Bibliography

Rahner, Karl. Theological Investigations. Baltimore and New York: Helicon, 1961–69; Seabury/Crossroad, 1977–.

———. Foundations of Christian Faith: An Introduction to the Idea of Christianity. New York: Seabury Press. 1978.

Vorgrimler, Herbert. Understanding Karl Rahner. New York: Crossroad, 1986.

Weger, Karl H. Karl Rahner: An Introduction to His Thought. New York: Seabury Press, 1980.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

Ramsa (Syr., "evening"), East (Ramsa) and West (Ramso) Syrian variants of the term for Vespers. See also Vespers.

Ranke, Ludwig von, 1795–1886, Protestant German historian. A professor of history at the University of Berlin at only thirty years of age, he gained fame through his balanced and detached history of the modern papacy from the sixteenth century to the First Vatican Council (1869–70).

rape, impediment of. See abduction, impediment of.

Raphael [Raffaello Sanzio], 1483–1520, Italian Renaissance artist. Noted for his classical idealism, harmonious forms, and profound spirituality, Raphael was painter at the papal courts of Julius II and Leo X, and architect of St. Peter's Basilica for Leo X. Significant works include the Sistine Madonna and paintings and tapestries for the Vatican apartments. See also Catholicism and architecture; Catholicism and the visual arts.

Raphael, St. (Heb., "God heals"), archangel. In the story of Tobit, Raphael heals Tobit's blindness and provides Sarah with a husband (Tob 3:16–17). Raphael is God's messenger, who hears people's prayers and brings these before God (Tob 12:12, 15). Feast day (with Michael and Gabriel, archangels): September 29, also known as Michaelmas Day. See also angel; archangel.

rapture. See ecstasy.

rash judgment, the attribution of moral inadequacy or fault to another without sufficient evidence. Rash judgment is imprudent because it decides without sufficient reflection; it is judgment rather than suspicion or doubt because of the certainty with which the view is held. Because rash judgment results in a lowering of the esteem in which another person is held, without a sufficient basis in fact, an injury is done to the person judged. As such it is a violation of justice and charity. See also calumny; detraction; justice; slander.

ratified marriage. See marriage law.

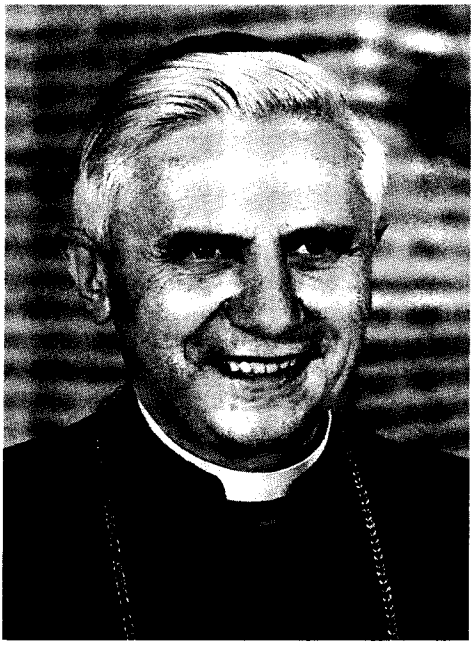
rationalism, any worldview that either explicitly or implicitly requires that all claims to truth either be based on clearly and scientifically demonstrable premises or be unambiguously derived from what can be so demonstrated. Because the processes of the mind determine the criteria for demonstrability, nothing can claim the status of truth that is not already given in the content or structure of the mind or positivistically through the five senses. Consequently, rationalism stands in opposition to any religious tradition oriented toward mystery and claiming access to revealed truth. Rationalism and its opposite, fideism, were condemned by the First Vatican Council (1869–70). See also faith and reason; fideism.

Ratisbon, Conference of, or Conference of Regensburg (1541), the last attempt to reconcile Protestants and Catholics during the Reformation. Participants on the Catholic side included John Eck and Gasparo Contarini; on the Protestant side, Martin Butzer and Philipp Melanchthon. Compromise articles on the condition of humans before the Fall, free will, the cause of sin, and original sin were rejected by both Luther and the papacy. See also Reformation, the.

Ratramnus (ruh-tram'nuhs), d. ca. 868, theologian and Benedictine monk of the monastery of Corbie who criticized the extreme realist eucharistic theology of Paschasius Radbertus and advanced a symbolic understanding of eucharistic presence. His teaching, wrongly attributed then to John Scotus Eriugena, was condemned by a synod at Vercelli in 1050. The treatise was placed on the Index of Forbidden Books in 1559, after some Protestants appealed to it in support of their own doctrines, but it was removed again in 1900. He also wrote on predestination. See also Real Presence.

Ratzinger, Joseph, b. 1927, German Catholic theologian and cardinal. Ordained a priest for the diocese of Regensburg (1951), he was awarded his doctorate in theology from the University of Munich (1953) and served as professor of theology at the universities of Bonn (1959–63), Münster (1963–66), Tübingen (1966–69), and Regensburg (1969–77). During Vatican II, as a theological adviser to Cardinal Joseph Frings of Cologne, he was known for his progressive views. In March 1977, he was chosen by Paul VI to succeed Cardinal Julius Döpfner as the archbishop of Munich, and in June 1977 he was named a cardinal. In November 1981, he was appointed prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith by John Paul II, where he has led an effort to maintain doctrinal orthodoxy and clerical discipline in the post–Vatican II Church. See also Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.



Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, who has served as Pope John Paul II's principal defender and enforcer of orthodoxy and as the principal architect of the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992).

Raymond Nonnatus, St., ca. 1204–40, Cistercian abbot and patron saint of expectant mothers and those falsely accused. Spanish-born, he led military expeditions against the Moors, forming the military order of the Knights of Calatrava. Feast day: February 6.

Raymond of Peñafort, St. (payn'yuh-fohr), 1180–1275, Dominican canon lawyer. Commissioned by Pope Gregory IX to prepare an official codification of canon law, Raymond finished the Quinque Libri Decretalium (Lat., "Five Books of Decretals") in 1234, which remained in effect until 1917. Feast day: January 7. See also canon law.

raza (rah'zah; Syr., "mystery"), ecclesiastical term for sacrament. In the Syro-Malabar tradition, raza is the proper name for the most solemn form of the Qurbana or eucharistic liturgy. The plural raze, "mysteries," is the common term for eucharistic services, including the Presanctified Liturgy. See also sacrament.

RCIA. See Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

reader. See lector.

reading, spiritual. See spiritual reading.

Real Presence, the teaching of the Catholic Church that Jesus Christ is present at and in the Eucharist in his body and blood, humanity and divinity, under the form of bread and wine.

The NT attests to the faith of Catholics and other Christians that Christ is present in and to his Church in a variety of ways. As the Risen Lord, he is no longer bound by the constraints of a particular time and place and thus can be present when his disciples gather to pray, invoke his name for healing, proclaim his gospel, forgive sins, suffer for his sake, and assemble to remember his Last Supper with his disciples. Fundamental to the recognition of this presence was the Church's experience of the power of the Spirit of the Lord transforming it into the community of his body and empowering it to continue his mission.

The accounts of the Last Supper in the three synoptic Gospels (Matt 26:26–30; Mark 14:22–26; Luke 22:14–20), as well as in Paul's First Letter to the Corinthians (11:23–25) and the Bread of Life discourse in the Gospel of John (ch. 6), attest to the celebration of the Lord's Supper in the NT Church. Paul and John also speak of the bread and wine in terms strong enough to evidence the belief of the first-century Church in the presence of the body and blood of Christ: Paul speaks of sharing in the body and blood of Christ (cf. 1 Cor 10:16–17; 11:27) and John speaks of eating the flesh of Christ and drinking his blood (6:52–56).

Throughout the first millennium, the faith of the Church in the presence of the body and blood of Christ went relatively undisturbed. Diverse terminology was used to describe the change of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, and theologians sought to relate this presence of the body and blood of the Lord to his historical and risen body as well as to his ecclesial body. But some controversy erupted in the ninth century and developed further in the eleventh century between extreme positions that saw the bread and wine either as mere signs or as totally changed even in their physical elements. Out of these controversies came the Church's teaching on transubstantiation, which held that the substances of the bread and wine are changed into the body and blood of Christ. This was taught by Lateran IV (1215) and Trent (1551). In the latter case, the council reiterated the doctrine in response to perceived distortions of the tradition by the Reformers.

Contemporary Church teaching and theology has placed the doctrine of the Real Presence within the context of the many ways in which Christ is present in the Church. In his 1965 encyclical Mysterium Fidei Pope Paul VI identifies these as prayer, works of mercy, preaching, governance, the sacraments, and finally the Eucharist, "a way that surpasses all others" (n. 38), because this presence "is substantial and through it Christ becomes present whole and entire, God and man" (n. 39). Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) spoke of Christ's presence not only in the consecrated bread and wine but also in the proclaimed word, the person of the minister, and the worshiping assembly itself (n. 7).

The Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist flows from his total self-gift on the cross and his will to make that gift effective for all people throughout history. Thus the purpose of his presence is communion with his Church through his body and blood. See also Eucharist. JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI reason and faith. See faith and reason.

recapitulation (Lat., "summing up" or "summary"), used in Eph 1:10, where God is said to "sum up" all things in Christ. Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) proposed a theory of recapitulation in which God restored fallen humanity to full communion with God through the full obedience of Christ, who in turn "summed up" all divine revelations prior to the Incarnation. See also Jesus Christ.

Reception into Full Communion, liturgical rite used to receive baptized Christians into full communion with the Catholic Church by a simple profession of faith. Equating a candidate with a catechumen, an unbaptized person undergoing catechesis for entrance into the Church, should be avoided. Full reception should occur within a liturgical context clarifying the connection between the reception and eucharistic communion (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, n. 476). Preparation for this profession of faith should include spiritual formation.

Although it is the office of the bishop to receive baptized Christians into full communion, he may entrust this celebration to a priest who thereby has the faculty to confirm the candidate within the rite of reception, unless the person had already been validly confirmed (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, n. 481). See also convert; profession of faith; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

reception of doctrine (Lat., recipere, "to take up," "accept," "adopt"), a process whereby the faithful accept a teaching or decision of the Church; an ecclesial community or institution accepts a dogmatic tradition or decision that did not originate within itself and makes this tradition or decision its own. Examples of items received are the decisions of a council, doctrines concerning matters of faith and morals, disciplinary ordinances, liturgical decrees, even the transfer of persons from one ecclesiastical office to another. The recipients can be local churches, conferences, councils, the pope, or the entire Church. Reception can also occur between separated churches.

In the NT, reception is a basic act of faith and is characterized by lambanein (Gk., "to take in") and dechestai (Gk., "to receive graciously"). It concerns the acceptance of the word of God (Mark 4:20), the message of Jesus (Rev 2: 41), and the gospel (1 Cor 15:1). It also concerns the acceptance of Jesus and God by accepting those whom Jesus has sent (Matt 10:40; John 13:20) and whom he himself has first of all accepted (Rom 15:7). This acceptance is a life process effected by the Spirit (1 Cor 2:10–16).

In the ancient Church confessions of faith, liturgies, and the decrees of councils attained general recognition and authority by means of reception. The formation of the biblical canon also took place in this way. The general reception of a writing or doctrine by local churches was understood as a demonstration that it agreed with apostolic tradition. Recognition by reception is a form of consensus formation in a Church that understands itself as a community of local churches.

In the Catholic Church, as the particular role of the local churches diminished and the role of a centralized "lawgiver" became more prominent, reception was reduced to obedience. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) the Church is being rediscovered as community and the role of reception is regaining respect.

Reception does not legitimate or validate the decision of the ecclesial teaching office. It is the confirming witness of the sense of the faith by the People of God regarding a decision's truth and serviceableness. When nonreception occurs, those responsible for the decision need to examine the reasons for the lack of acceptance. A responsibly acting pastoral and teaching office will review the preparation of its decision in relation to the belief of the People of God and the legitimate requirements of decision making in order to avoid nonreception. Regarding the infallible decisions of the teaching office, the Second Vatican Council says: "The assent of the Church can never be lacking to such definitions on account of the same Holy Spirit's influence, through which Christ's whole flock is maintained in the unity of the faith and makes progress in it" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 25).

An example of reception in the recent history of the Church is the acceptance of the aims of the biblical, liturgical, and ecumenical movements by Vatican II. In the realization of the vision of the Second Vatican Council, reception is currently being experienced as a longer, more difficult, and more creative process than anticipated. An example of nonreception or partial reception is the anti-birth control encyclical Humanae Vitae (1968) by Paul VI. The great majority of married Catholics do not accept the teaching that the use of artificial means to prevent conception is always morally wrong. In the ecumenical movement the processes of reception are acquiring ever more significance. Convergence and consensus of opinion are first worked by commissions into documents, which then must be accepted by the participating churches. With the acknowledgment of the historical character of the Christian faith and the Church, all churches maintain that formulations of the faith that were received earlier by the Church are always to be appropriated again and communicated anew (rereception). See also doctrine; reception of law; sensus fidelium. HERMAN J. POTTMEYER reception of law, the process by which the laws of the Church are appropriated by the community and become a vital force in shaping its life.

Every human law has its own life cycle, which divides into two principal stages. In the first one, the actor is the legislator, conceiving the law by identifying a specific value that is either necessary or beneficial for the community, and ascertaining that the community has the capacity to reach out for it. The legislator then formulates the law; that is, a proposition is construed in an imperative mood (ordinance) directing the subjects to act accordingly. Finally, the legislator promulgates the law; that is, it is brought to the notice of those for whom it is intended. The end result of this stage is an abstract, general, and impersonal command that carries a binding force but does not as yet shape the life of the community.

In the second stage, the actors are the subjects. From the words of the law they must understand the meaning of the law, that is, the action or order the legislator wishes to impose. Then, as they encounter concrete, particular, and personal situations, they must come to a conscious decision to implement the law. In this act of implementation, the original norm of action meets the demands of real life and, as in a crucible, it reveals its suitability or its shortcomings. Finally, the subjects must form a critical judgment about the law, either by affirming it through steady observance, or by bringing to the legislator's notice the difficulties the law may generate; all this must be done in the living spirit of communio (Lat., "communion").

When this process is completed and the law is observed throughout the community, its reception is achieved: it has become a vital force that shapes the life of the Church.

For the perfection of this process, the legislator must be disposed to explain the values that it intends to uphold and promote, so that the subjects have all the information that is necessary to grasp the full meaning of the law and become able to appreciate it rationally and implement it responsibly.

Further, the subjects must be aware that the ultimate criterion for an act of obedience to any law is in the judgment of a well-informed practical conscience. To surrender with dignity to its dictate it is necessary to know, or to sense, the value behind the positive rule. By embracing freely that value, the members of the community ready themselves to accept also the hardships that the observance of the law may entail. Through such attitudes and acts the law is intelligently and freely received.

The reception of the law, as described, should never be confused with its juridical ratification by the subjects. A correct act of promulgation can impose a legally binding norm; yet, its effective reception alone can make it into a vital force, leading to a pleasing sacrifice to God. See also canon law; reception of doctrine. LADISLAS M. ORSY recidivism (Lat., "a falling back"), in moral theology, the pattern of behavior established by one who repeatedly commits the same kind of sin without attempting to avoid doing so; the moral disposition resulting in this pattern. Behavior resembling recidivism may result from extreme immaturity or repeated and severe temptation, but the true recidivist is characterized by a lack of intention to amend the sinful behavior. See also habit [moral].

recollection, an inward focus of attention on the presence of God. It involves maintaining a clear alertness regarding the object of recollection throughout the day. Recollection also includes an awareness of how thoughts, speech, and actions affect spiritual life. To remain centered interiorly may require withdrawing attention from exterior objects that arouse sensory or other desires.

Recollection conserves energy for spiritual practice and keeps attention and desires from being dispersed. Some people use short prayers, particular actions, scheduled breaks in activity or other aids to recollection. Silence, solitude, and recollection support each other. See also meditation; prayer.

Recollects, a designation of two religious orders. One was a reformed branch of the Franciscan Observants begun in France during the late sixteenth century. In 1897 Pope Leo XIII incorporated them and other Franciscan groups into the Franciscan order (O.F.M.). The other Recollect order was a reform branch of the Augustinian Friars begun during the sixteenth century in Spain. They became a congregation in 1621 and an independent order in 1912. They are known as the Order of Recollect Hermits of St. Augustine (O.A.R.). The prior general resides in Rome. See also Augustinian Hermits; Franciscan order.

RECONCILIATION

The sacrament of reconciliation is the ritual of the Christian community, under the leadership of the bishop or priest, in which sinners are reconciled both to God and to the Church. Reconciliation is found on almost every page of the NT; it is an essential part of the gospel message. Jesus preached a message of reconciliation both in his parables and in his healings. His life, death, and Resurrection were all part of revelation: the good news of God's gift of reconciliation. The entire life of a disciple of Jesus is essentially a life of reconciliation. Nonetheless, in the course of history, the Church developed a ritual of reconciliation, which came to be called a sacrament. In the NT three specific passages have often been used to substantiate the sacramental ritual: Matt 16:16; 18:18; and John 20:23. Major biblical scholars today, however, do not find either in the text or in the context of these passages an account of an institution of a reconciliation ritual. Rather, there is in these passages a power, present in the Church at large, to isolate and negate sin. Sin is removed by every prayer, by fasting, by charity to one's neighbor, by all good works, and by every sacramental act, especially the Eucharist.

RECONCILIATION IN THE PATRISTIC CHURCH

In early Church history one does not find any record of a reconciliation ritual until ca. 150. This first written record of a ritual stems from Hermas, a layperson, whose mystical writings include mention of a rite of reconciliation as a sort of sabbatical. Hermas, however, indicates that a sinful Christian could receive this ritualized forgiveness only once in a lifetime and the rite was a public one. Hermas does not indicate which sins required this ritual, nor does he describe the rite. However, in the churches, both East and West, this form of reconciliation very quickly became the official form: the ritual was public in nature, i.e., a communal ritual, and a sinner could receive reconciliation only once during a lifetime. If a Christian fell into a publicly known serious sin a second time, the Christian community prayed for this sinner on his or her deathbed, but the sinner did not receive the sacraments of Reconciliation, of Anointing, or of the Eucharist. Records indicate that major, publicly known sins such as apostasy, murder, and adultery were the more common sins that required this form of reconciliation. Other publicly known sins were at times also included, but these varied from region to region. Moreover, this ritual was a process that often lasted three years. For some sins, such as murder, however, fifteen years were prescribed in some local churches. The process itself was not uniform throughout the Christian world; various local churches developed their own forms of the ritual. Generally, however, the final act of this ritual included the silent laying on of hands by the bishop or priest. The penitent could then join the Eucharist with the community. In the West, more than in the East, an additional penance was added to this ritual: namely, those who received this form of Reconciliation had to remain celibate for the remainder of their lives. This caused the breakup of marriages, and the rule of celibacy was resisted by many Christian communities. The length of time, the severity of the penances, and the inclusion of celibacy made this form of Reconciliation so odious to the majority of Christian laity, that from about the year 700 onward Reconciliation was deliberately postponed, and it became more often than not the sacrament of the dying. Bishops continued to urge the reception of this public form of Reconciliation, but the laity did not respond.

THE CELTIC FORM OF RECONCILIATION

In England and Ireland, this public ritual of Reconciliation was never used, according to historical records. There is no indication in the early documents of any alternate form of Reconciliation. Among the Celtic monks, however, a form of spiritual direction began to take place, in which monks and nuns privately and frequently discussed both their sinfulness and their need of reform with the abbot or abbess. Precisely when and how this form of spiritual direction regarding sin, conversion, and amendment became the actual form for the sacrament of Reconciliation remains shrouded in undisclosed history. When the Celtic monks came as missionaries to continental Europe in the latter part of the sixth century, this form of private and frequent confession became popular and gradually was considered the normal sacramental rite of Penance. Early records do not describe any precise ritual, but they do indicate the listing of sins.

The Celtic form of Penance, which was private and frequent, clashed with the Roman form of Penance, which was public and available only once in a lifetime. Slowly, however, the unofficial Celtic form became so widespread that the public form almost disappeared from the local churches. In 1215 at the Fourth Lateran Council, church leadership officially adopted the Celtic form of Reconciliation. This was done in an indirect manner, through the decree Omnis Utriusque, in which each baptized Christian was required to confess his or her sins and receive the Eucharist once each year. Only in the Eastern churches have public forms of Penance continued down to the present time. In the twelfth and thirteenth centuries Scholastic theologians provided a theological base for this private form of confession, utilizing the process, developed by Peter of Poitiers (a.k.a. Peter the Chanter, d. 1197) and popularized by Alexander of Hales (ca. 1186–1245), namely contrition, confession, absolution, and satisfaction. Among the major theologians were Alexander of Hales, Albertus Magnus (ca. 1200–1280), Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1225–74), Bonaventure (ca. 1217–74), and John Duns Scotus (ca. 1265–1308). Each of these formulated the theology of Penance in different ways, and the Franciscans and Dominicans, in particular, shaped their theologies of Reconciliation in quite opposite directions. Nonetheless, they all followed the fourfold process—contrition, confession, absolution, and satisfaction—a theological mode that eventually became standard within Catholic thought down to the renewal of the sacrament in the post–Vatican II period.

THE REFORMATION AND THE COUNCIL OF TRENT

The Reformation leaders Martin Luther and John Calvin accused the Roman Catholic Church of extolling good works over God's grace. In a special way they found this accusation realized in the way the sacrament of Penance was presented by the Catholic Church, both in its official documents and in the Roman form of theology. In particular, the Reformers focused their accusation on the detailed confession of sin, the need to make an act of perfect contrition, and above all the ex opere operato (Lat., "from the work worked") words of absolution by the priest, as well as the "penances" imposed on confessing sinners. All of these seemed in their eyes to be good works, which denied the absolute gratuity of grace. The Reformers also accused past Church leadership of "inventing" this sacrament and imposing it on the Church community, because unlike Baptism and Eucharist, the institution of this ritual did not appear to have scriptural basis. The bishops at Trent reacted against the Reformers' denial that bishops had any authority to determine the form of sacramental rituals that were binding on the baptized. They also insisted that the sacrament of Penance was indeed scriptural, although they realized that this ritual was not as clearly indicated in Scripture as were Baptism and Eucharist. The bishops also struggled to present the sacrament of Penance in conformity with the teaching on the absolute gratuity of grace. However, the two issues, grace and Penance, were discussed separately: the decree on justification appeared in 1547; the decree on the sacrament of Penance in 1551. No effort was made by the bishops to unite these two decrees in a unified way. Nonetheless, the bishops at Trent officially taught that God's grace is absolutely gratuitous and that we do nothing to gain it. The bishops indicated that good works, including the act of contrition, the confession of sins, priestly absolution, and the penance or satisfaction after confession, must and can be explained within the framework of the decree on justification. After Trent, the Scholastic, rather than the patristic, understanding of this sacrament became common, and frequent confession of sin was encouraged. Jansenism, a movement that emphasized the need for severe forms of penance, abetted the frequent confession of sin.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY RESEARCH ON PENANCE

In the twentieth century, the history of this sacrament began to be studied in depth, particularly the rich understanding of reconciliation in the patristic period, and with this research came a call for pastoral renewal of the sacrament. In several areas of Europe, just prior to Vatican II, new forms of the Penance ritual were introduced and some of them included general absolution. There occurred at the same time a rethinking of sacramental theology, recognizing Jesus, in his humanity, as the primordial sacrament and the Church as a basic sacrament. The bishops at Vatican II mandated a renewed ritual, and in 1973 the new ritual was finally promulgated. This new ritual was based on criteria taken from Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium): (1) the rite should clearly express both the nature and effect of the sacrament; (2) the role of the church community must be emphasized; (3) the reading of the word of God should be central; (4) because liturgical services are not private functions but celebrations of the Church, a public form of worship should predominate over a private form; and (5) the rite should be short and clear, free from useless repetitions, and formulated within the ordinary person's power of comprehension, i.e., not requiring extensive explanation.

The revised ritual includes four distinct forms: the first is an individual ritual; the second is a communal ritual with individual confession and absolution; the third is a communal ritual with general absolution; the fourth is an abbreviated, emergency ritual to be used at the time of immanent death. The theology behind all of these new forms is twofold: sin is basically an offense both against God and against one's community; and reconciliation, therefore, is reconciliation with God and with the community. In this approach the social nature of sin and the social nature of the ritual of Reconciliation are officially stressed. With the exception of the emergency form for time of death, the other three forms are presented in the ritual in a way that does not make any one normative over the other. In accord with the Vatican II Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, the preferred or normative form would always be communal, since liturgical rites are never private rituals. Even more profound, however, is the emphasis on prayer throughout the renewed rite. There is a prayer of welcome, a prayerful reading of the Scriptures, a prayerful reflection on the word of God, a prayerful examination of one's conscience, and a prayer of absolution followed by a prayer of praise, a prayer of blessing, and dismissal. Whenever the ritual of Reconciliation becomes a time of communal prayer, the sacrament of Reconciliation is indeed renewed.

In the Praenotanda (introduction) of the new ritual, one finds an important overview of the theology undergirding the new ritual. These Praenotanda begin with Jesus himself as reconciliation, both in his message and in his life, death, and Resurrection. In this way, it is indicated that Jesus himself is the primordial sacrament of Reconciliation. Second, the text moves to the Church as a basic sacrament of Reconciliation, indicating that in every ecclesial activity reconciliation is present. Only then does the document focus on the sacramental ritual of Reconciliation. This indicates that the new ritual must be understood within the framework of Jesus as fundamental sacrament of Reconciliation and the ecclesial community itself as basic sacrament.

ISSUES OF CONTINUING PASTORAL CONCERN

There remain today, however, several issues in need of further discussion: namely, the frequency of confession; the age of First Confession; the use of general absolution; and the need to confess privately to a priest. The new ritual, if celebrated properly, does take more time, and this tends to run at odds with an emphasis on frequent confession. A stress on frequent confession will have the effect of curtailing key prayer elements in the ritual, thereby thwarting the intended renewal. Second, the regulation from Lateran IV on the necessity for confession, i.e., once a year if one has committed a mortal sin, remains the basic law of the Church binding a Christian of any age to receive the sacrament of Penance, if morally and physically able. A blanket requirement of First Confession prior to First Communion on the part of baptized children runs counter to the regulation of Lateran IV. Third, bishops of various conferences are not in agreement with regards to the occasions when general absolution is licit within their jurisdictional area. This lack of uniformity arises from the theological uncertainty behind such key words as "case of necessity" (Lat., casus necessitatis), "for a long time" (diu), and "integral confession" (confessio integra). Moreover, some Church leaders, counter to the ritual, wish to make the first form, the individual form, "normative." Until these issues are clarified, the role of a Reconciliation ritual that includes general absolution in the daily life of the Christian will remain ambiguous. Finally, in the case of general absolution, the ritual requires that those conscious of mortal sin confess such sins when they next make their confession privately to a priest (the first and second forms). Since such mortal sins are already forgiven and the person in question can receive not only the Eucharist but all pertinent sacraments licitly and validly, the reason behind the regulation of "confessing such sins privately to a priest" remains unclear. Moral theologians are also discussing in a deeper way the nature of sin, particularly the social nature of all sin, because such an emphasis seems to indicate that the more socially destructive a sin is, the more evil it is in comparison with other sinful situations.

See also absolution; Celtic spirituality; confession, auricular; contrition; general confession; Jansenism; penance; penance service, communal; Reconciliation, liturgy of; sacrament; satisfaction; sin.

Bibliography

Dallen, J. The Reconciling Community: The Rite of Penance. New York: Pueblo, 1986.
Gula, R. To Walk Together Again: The Sacrament of Reconciliation. New York, Paulist Press, 1984.
Kennedy, R. J., ed. Reconciliation: The Continuing Agenda. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1987.
Orsy, L. The Evolving Church and the Sacrament of Penance. Danville, NJ: Dimension Books, 1978.
Osborne, K. Reconciliation and Justification. New York: Paulist Press, 1990. KENAN OSBORNE

Reconciliation, liturgy of, ordinarily refers to the rite of Penance promulgated in 1973. The rite has three distinct ritual forms. The first is the reconciliation of individual penitents; the second, the reconciliation of several penitents with individual confession and absolution; and the third, the reconciliation of several penitents with general confession and absolution. Although early witnesses testify to the Eucharist as the premier liturgy of Reconciliation, current popular Catholic parlance would more often refer to the liturgy of Reconciliation as the rite of Penance in one of its threefold sacramental expressions. Less often would it refer to nonsacramental prayer services with a penitential theme but without sacramental confession and absolution, which were included in an appendix in the 1973 reformed rite of Penance.

The four parts of penance (contrition, confession, act of penance or satisfaction, and absolution) are operative within each of the three official forms of the liturgy of Reconciliation. Contrition is the heartfelt desire in the life of conversion to turn from the darkness of sin to the light of Christ. Confession refers to that part of the rite when the penitent, moved by the inner attitude of contrition, expresses in honest and coherent language the ways in which he or she has participated in the darkness of sin since the last celebration of the sacrament. The priest proposes the act of penance or satisfaction; the penitent accepts the penance as an exercise to amend conduct, repair injury, or restore order. Absolution, the tangible expression of God's forgiveness, includes two simultaneous parts: the imposition of the priest's hands on the penitent's head (or at least the extending of the priest's right hand over the penitent's head) and the priest's praying of the prescribed absolution formulary that affirms God as the agent of forgiveness, Christ as its means, and the Church's minister as its mediation.

The Rite for Individuals: The rite for individual penitents is made up of six moments: (1) the reception of the penitent by way of the priest's greeting, a sign of the cross, and an invitation to contrition and trust in God; (2) a reading of the word of God that the confessor or the penitent chooses; although this reading is optional, it is encouraged, if only a sentence from Scripture read from the text or recalled from memory; (3) the penitent's confession of sins and acceptance of an act of penance or satisfaction that the priest assigns or both determine in light of the penitent's need or circumstance; (4) the prayer of the penitent expressing sorrow for sin in a fixed form (act of contrition) or spontaneous words of the penitent's own choosing; (5) the priest's praying of the formula of absolution with imposition of hands; and (6) a proclamation of praise of God and a farewell or dismissal.

While face-to-face exchange between the penitent and priest in a reconciliation room is encouraged, the revised rite retains the option for a private confession in a confessional box or behind a confessional screen to secure anonymity. This option continues to serve as a necessary form in response to pastoral need. However, several empirical studies have noted a marked decline in its use well before the revised rite's promulgation. Critics of the rite claim it reinforces the larger culture's tendency to individualism and privatization, securing a sense of personal sin as one's own private affair and thus limiting the penitent's awareness of participation in sinful social structures and the sinful condition of the world.

The Rites for Groups: More frequently used is the rite for several penitents with individual confession and absolution. Custom has situated its celebration during Advent and Lent, although it is not restricted to those seasons. The second rite is similar to the first with some variance due to its public nature: (1) introductory rites (song, greeting, opening prayer); (2) the celebration of the word of God (first reading, responsorial psalm, second reading, gospel acclamation, Gospel, homily, examination of conscience); (3) the rite of Reconciliation itself (call to penance, prayer of contrition or confiteor, litany of forgiveness, the Lord's Prayer, closing prayer); (4) individual confession and absolution; (5) the proclamation of praise for God's mercy; (6) a concluding prayer of thanksgiving; (7) the concluding rite (blessing and dismissal). This rite is favored because of the communal experience and expression of solidarity in sin and grace. Reservations about the rite concern the often limited time for individual confession, which minimizes opportunity for ample exchange between the priest and penitent.

Least frequently used is the rite for several penitents with general confession and absolution. The rite is permitted in two cases: in danger of death when there is no time for the priest(s) to hear confessions of individual penitents (soldiers going off to battle, for example) and in circumstances of serious necessity (too many penitents and too few priests to hear confessions within a reasonable span of time, thus depriving people of sacramental grace or the Eucharist for an extended period of time). Ecclesiastical restrictions discourage the celebration of this rite. Its shape is almost the same as the second, with the omission of individual confession and absolution and the inclusion of a communal act of penance, an act of contrition, the Lord's Prayer, and the extended absolution formulary provided for this occasion. In addition to the three rites, a short rite is provided in dire situations of emergency or accident in which the short form of the absolution is sufficient.

No other sacrament historically witnesses to the intensity of development in liturgical forms and expression as do the liturgies of Reconciliation that make up the rite of Penance. The Church faces another critical historical juncture. Negotiating this transition successfully will demand adaptation of current rites in response to the continuing pastoral need in people's lives to express Christ's forgiveness and reconciliation in sacrament. See also Reconciliation.

Bibliography

Dallen, James. The Reconciling Community: The Rite of Penance. New York: Pueblo Publishing, 1986.

Gula, Richard. To Walk Together Again: The Sacrament of Reconciliation. New York: Paulist Press, 1984.

DANIEL P. GRIGASSY

reconciliation room, or chapel, a space in the main body of a church where the rite of Penance in its first form (Individual Confession of One Penitent) is celebrated. Located near the baptismal area, the room is designed to safeguard the penitent's anonymity or to allow the option of an informal face-to-face exchange between the penitent and the priest. It is furnished with two chairs, a fixed grill or screen and a kneeler, and a table with a simple cross and a Bible. The two options for reconciliation should be immediately recognizable to the penitent entering the room. Never a multipurpose room, but a space solely for the prayerful celebration of the sacrament, it is more appropriately called the reconciliation chapel. See also confession, auricular; confessional.

rector, title for the supervising office of a religious institution. The title of rector is used with reference to a church, chapel, cathedral, school, or religious house. In the United States, a rector commonly refers to a priest who has the pastoral responsibility for the cathedral parish. It is often used in Europe for the head of a school.

recusancy (Lat., recusare, "to refuse"), adherence to the Roman Catholic Church in Anglican England. In 1559, the Uniformity Act, issued by Queen Elizabeth I, made attendance at services of the Established Church mandatory for all subjects of the English monarch. Those who refused to attend such services, recusants, were subject to large fines. Later versions of the law added further penalities, such as confiscation of land and denial of burial in consecrated ground. The crime of recusancy for not attending the services of the Church of England was abolished by the Catholic Relief Act of 1791. See also England, Catholicism in.

redeemer (Lat., redimere, "buy back"), literally one who buys back property that has been sold or a relative who has been enslaved (Lev 25:23–26; 48–49). Metaphorically, when used of God (Job 19:25; Pss 19:14; 78:35; Isa 41:14; 49:26), it takes on the nuance of one who rescues a person from oppression or some other grave danger (Exod 6:6; 15:13; Pss 25:22; 26:11; 119:34–35; Jer 15:21; Mic 4:10). In the NT Jesus is never called "redeemer," but his saving work is described as "redemption" (Luke 2:38; 21:28; Rom 3:24; 8:23; 1 Cor 1:30, Eph 1:7, 14; 4:30; Heb 9:12). It is also related to the notion of "ransom" or the price paid to free a slave (Exod 21:8; Mark 10:45; 1 Tim 2:6). Irenaeus (ca. 130–ca. 200) and Origen (ca. 185–ca. 254) developed the theory that the human race was enslaved by Satan and that the death of Jesus was the "price" of release. This theory remained popular until it was replaced by the satisfaction theory of Anselm (ca. 1033–1109). Today "redeemer" and "redemption" have lost their technical sense and are used for the saving action of God conceived often as rescue from human alienation or from evil social structures. See also redemption.

redemption (Lat., redemptio, "buying back"), God's saving activity through Christ in delivering humankind from sin and evil. Unlike the doctrine of the one person of the Son of God in two natures (divine and human), the redemption Christ effected for all did not provoke theological debate and teachings from general councils during the first centuries of the Church's existence. From NT times on, it was taken for granted that it was only through Christ that human beings could be saved (Acts 4:12), and that the purpose of everything from his Incarnation to his Second Coming was, as the creeds stated, "for us and for our salvation." The Fathers of the Church, in particular the Greek Fathers, often used the belief that human beings had been healed and divinized through the Incarnation (and Cross) of the Son of God as a premise from which to argue that he must therefore have become fully human by assuming a complete human nature (and not just a body). Since he was fully human and fully divine, Christ could act as mediator between God and the human race in effecting redemption.

Creation and Redemption: The NT associated God's redemptive work with creation by acknowledging Christ to be not only the redeemer but also the agent through whom all things were originally made (John 1:3, 10; 1 Cor 8:6; Col 1:16; Heb 1:2). Redemption entails "a new creation" (2 Cor 5:17; see Rev 21:1–5). The biblical vision of Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) held together the orders of creation and redemption as two distinguishable but inseparable moments in God's one saving plan for all humanity. John Duns Scotus (d. 1308), Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (d. 1955), and others maintained the unity in God's creative and redemptive work—a unity challenged by the view encouraged by Athanasius of Alexandria (d. 373), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), and others that if human beings had not sinned, the Second Person of the Trinity would not have come among humanity. Vatican II's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965) linked creation and redemption by describing redemption as God's renewing of creation (n. 9), and presenting Christ as being actively present in the whole, universal work of salvation from creation to the end (n. 45). Paul VI's apostolic exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi (On Evangelization in the Modern World) of 1975 expounded the divine redemptive work as beginning during the life of Christ, being definitively accomplished by his death and Resurrection, and realized fully at his final coming (n. 9). But in his first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis ("Redeemer of Humankind," 1979), John Paul II returned to the vision of Gaudium et Spes by explaining redemption as the renewal of creation (n. 9).

The Nature of Redemption: Through the centuries official Church teaching has rarely addressed directly the issue of redemption. Even Vatican II's summary of Christ's redemptive work (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 22) occurs "indirectly"—reaffirming teachings on the dignity of the human person. Faith in Christ as redeemer of the human race has usually been accepted by all Christians. Such issues as original sin (see, e.g., the Pelagian controversy in the fifth century), the ecclesial nature of grace and the axiom "outside the Church no salvation," the issue of predestination of the elect, and the Council of Trent's teachings on justification and on the Mass as a sacrifice that "re-presents" the bloody, once-and-for-all sacrifice of Calvary inevitably introduced teaching on redemption—at least under the aspect of its subjective appropriation.

The objective dimension of redemption has been expressed by the Church's Scriptures, liturgy (see, e.g., the Exultet, or Easter Proclamation) and theology in three characteristic ways: (1) as Christ the second Adam conquering the power of sin, death, and all evil, and so through a new exodus liberating fallen human beings for new and eternal life (1 Cor 15: 25, 54–57, Col 2:15: 1 John 3:8); (2) as Christ the great high priest expiating sin and cleansing human defilement through his sacrificial death and Resurrection (Rom 3:24–25; Heb 2:17–18); and (3) as Christ the universal mediator whose act of reconciliation has brought humanity a new covenant of love with God and one another (Rom 5:6–8, 10; 2 Cor 5:18–20; Heb 9:15). In these terms Christian visual art, hymns, and poetry have persistently interpreted Jesus' Cross as the flag or standard of victory, the means of atonement, and the great sign of divine love toward humankind.

The NT recognizes that redemption through Christ embraces not only the human race but also the cosmos. Christ has reconciled all things to God—a reconciliation to be consummated at the end of history (Col 1:20; Rom 8:18–23). Such recent Church teaching as John Paul II's Redemptor Hominis recalls that the whole world shares the human need for final recreation (n. 8).

Along with the Bible, the official texts from the Church's public worship, together with popular devotions, offer the fullest range of concepts, symbols, images, and narratives in response to those who ask: What is redemption? When and where did and does it occur? Who brought and brings it? The liturgy bears witness, above all, to the utter centrality of Christ (and his Holy Spirit) in the work of humanity's redemption, which has brought to humankind justification, adoption as God's sons and daughters, incorporation into the Body of Christ, the gift of the Holy Spirit, and a divinized existence that lets human beings share in the life of the tripersonal God. See also atonement, doctrine of; Christology; crucifixion; expiation; Resurrection of Christ; sacrifice; salvation.

Bibliography

O'Collins, Gerald. Interpreting Jesus. New York: Paulist Press, 1983.

Schillebeeckx, Edward. Christ: The Experience of Jesus as Lord. Trans. John Bowden. New York: Seabury Press, 1980.

GERALD O'COLLINS

Redemptor Hominis (ray-demp'tohr hom'ee-nees; Lat., "Redeemer of Humankind"), first encyclical letter of Pope John Paul II, issued on March 4, 1979. The letter emphasizes the gospel's affirmation of the "worth and dignity" of the human person, rooted in the redemption (n. 10). At the same time, it acknowledges the threat posed by the abuse of technology and modern means of production, which so often involve the "exploitation of the earth" and the destruction of the environment (n. 15). The document is especially strong in its condemnation of consumerism, that is, the accumulation and misuse of goods by privileged social classes and rich countries "to an excessive degree" (n. 16). It also condemns the arms race, which diverts essential resources from the poor, as well as the widespread violation of human rights around the world (n. 17).

Redemptoris Mater (ray-dem-tohr'is mah'tair; Lat., "Mother of the Redeemer"), sixth encyclical letter of Pope John Paul II, issued on March 25, 1987, in preparation for the Marian year (June 7, 1987–August 15, 1988).

Redemptorists, Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (C.SS.R.), an order founded in Naples, Italy, by Alphonsus Liguori in 1732 and approved by Pope Benedict XIV in 1749. A community of Redemptorist nuns was similarly approved in 1750. Members take the three traditional vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience and add a fourth of perseverance.

The congregation was originally founded to work with poor and abandoned Catholics in remote districts of the Italy. Their main work is retreats, parish missions, and foreign missions. Following the example of their founder, they have made significant contributions in the area of moral theology, reflected in the work of Bernard Häring. Asceticism, prayer, a commitment to community living and apostolic works are the hallmarks of the Redemptorists. The generalate is located in Rome. There are three American provinces (Baltimore, Maryland; St. Louis, Missouri; and Oakland, California) and two vice-provinces (New Orleans, Louisiana; and Richmond, Virginia). See also Alphonsus Liguori, St.; Häring, Bernard.

red hat, the wide-brimmed red hat with tassels that was conferred upon a newly appointed cardinal at a public consistory. It was not used again during his lifetime. At his death, the hat was hung from the ceiling of the cathedral church. The practice of conferring the red hat was discontinued in 1967. See also cardinal.

Red Mass, a votive Mass of the Holy Spirit offered to invoke wisdom and guidance during the coming term of a school, legislative, or judicial year. The custom originated in thirteenth-century Europe with members of the legal profession, receiving its name from the red vestments worn by presiding clergy and the scarlet robes donned by judges and academicians in attendance.

reduction of wills. See wills [canon law].

Reformation, the, political and religious event in the sixteenth century that divided the Western Christian Church into Catholic and Protestant.

The fourteenth and fifteenth centuries were among the darkest in the history of the Church in the West. The papal monarchy that had developed in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries had become a bloated bureaucracy with an insatiable appetite for money and power. The disaster of the Avignon papacy (1305–78) and the Great Schism (1378–1417) brought the papacy into such disrepute that the councils of Constance (1414–18) and Basel (1431–39) sought to replace it as head of the Church. During these years the clergy became increasingly corrupt. Church offices (benefices) were for sale. Careerists accumulated numbers of benefices (pluralism) that made it impossible to serve them all personally (absenteeism). Ill-paid substitutes who were often uneducated and negligent provided for the needs of the people. Clerical immorality, greed, and arrogance were blamed for what was perceived as a religious decline. The need for reform was universally acknowledged but was thwarted by the self-interest of the hierarchy and of secular rulers who profited by the abuses. As a result, popular dissatisfaction and anticlericalism assumed threatening proportions, creating a powder keg awaiting the spark of Martin Luther.

Central and Northern Europe: In 1517 Luther posted his Ninety-five Theses against indulgences. Though the theses themselves were rather conservative, in the months and years that followed Luther developed a theological critique of the Catholic Church that denied any human contribution to salvation, the Catholic teaching on the sacraments, papal authority, the Catholic priesthood, monasticism, the cult of the saints, and the right of the hierarchy to interpret Scripture. Unlike earlier reformers Luther saw the problems of the Church as primarily theological, not moral. By arguing that the corrupt state of the Church was simply the product of false doctrine, Luther provided an ideological weapon that undermined the Catholic Church's authority, opening the door for wide-reaching theological, institutional, and spiritual change. In Germany Luther's message fell on fertile soil. He was viewed as a liberator from foreign papal domination and exploitation. A popular movement spread rapidly through Germany in the 1520s. Churches and Church property were seized. Monks, nuns, and priests who did not join the reform were expelled. The Catholic liturgy was revised and the sacraments reduced to only two: the Lord's Supper and Baptism. Fearful of the social unrest (especially after the Peasants' War in 1524–25 and the Anabaptist Kingdom of Münster in the mid-1530s) local princes and city councils coopted the movement and proceeded to construct territorial or city-state churches. In Sweden, Olaus Petri, a married priest who had studied at Wittenberg, began preaching Lutheranism in 1519. The new king Gustavus Vasa adopted the new movement with the support of most of the bishops. In 1527 the Swedish church broke with Rome, and in 1544 the kingdom became officially Lutheran, though the episcopal form of church government under the king's rule was retained. Denmark followed in 1536. When Denmark conquered Norway the same settlement was imposed, as it was in Iceland.

Religious divisions in Europe following the Reformation, ca. 1600.

Alongside the Lutheran movement in northern Europe and northern and central Germany, there arose a competing Protestant movement in the cities of southern Germany and Switzerland. Beginning with Ulrich Zwingli in Zurich and achieving its classic form under John Calvin in Geneva, this Reformed Protestantism agreed with Lutheranism on most points, e.g., justification by faith alone and the role of Scripture. But the Reformed were more radical in their demands, rejecting all of Catholic worship as idolatry, emphasizing predestination, and instituting a rigorous system of religious and moral discipline. In 1525 the Reformed and the Lutherans divided over the interpretation of the Eucharist. Calvinism spread down the Rhine to the Netherlands where it became wedded to a movement for national independence from the Spanish crown. Charles V and his successor, Philip II, had been particularly uncompromising in the suppression of heresy, particularly during the regency of the Duke of Alva (1567–73). The northern provinces (Holland) achieved their independence in 1584 after Calvinism had been accepted at a synod at Dort (1574). Despite its Calvinism, Holland became one of the few places in Europe to allow religious diversity.

A third stream of Protestantism is usually referred to as the Radical Reformation. The largest segment, the Anabaptists (the ancestors of modern Baptists and Mennonites) rejected infant Baptism, insisting that only those who had faith be baptized. Anabaptists were condemned as heretics by Protestants and Catholics alike. More than fifty thousand were executed in the sixteenth century.

The existence of Protestantism created a political problem. The Edict of Worms in 1521 had made Protestantism illegal. Nonetheless, many princes and city-states became Protestant in the 1520s, making enforcement of the ban impossible. Fearing war, the Imperial Diet of Speyer in 1526 issued a new edict that left enforcement of the Edict of Worms to individual princes and cities, in effect granting toleration to the Protestants. In 1529, again at Speyer, that toleration was rescinded, a move that provoked a "Protestation" from which "Protestantism" gets its name. After Charles V invited and then rejected Protestant confessions of faith at Augsburg in the following year, the Protestants formed the military and political Schmalkaldic League. Frustrated in his attempts to reach a compromise and momentarily freed from outside distractions, Charles V finally launched the Schmalkaldic War (1545–46). The Protestants were defeated and forced to accept a compromise religious settlement, the Augsburg Interim. Popular resistance rendered the Interim ineffective, however. In the Princes' War (1552–53) the Protestants struck back. The Peace of Augsburg (1555) divided the empire into Protestant and Catholic territories and brought peace until the Thirty Years' War (1618–48).

England: The course of the Reformation in England was idiosyncratic. Though there were disciples of Luther at the universities and coastal cities already in the 1520s, it was the desire of King Henry VIII to divorce Catherine of Aragon that gave the early impetus. Henry broke with Rome and had himself declared the head of the Church in England (1534). This was followed by the dissolution of the monasteries (1535–40). Though Henry and many of his bishops and courtiers remained Catholic in doctrine and practice, Protestantism spread, fostered by the prime minister Thomas Cromwell. Nonetheless, Henry executed Protestants as heretics at the same time as he executed Catholics (e.g., Thomas More, John Fisher) as traitors. Under Henry's son Edward VI (1547–53) Protestantism became the official religion with both English (Thomas Cranmer, Nicholas Ridley, Hugh Latimer) and foreign (Martin Butzer, Peter Martyr Vermigli) leaders. A new liturgy—The Book of Common Prayer (1549, 1552)—and Forty-Two Articles of faith (1553) were promulgated. The Catholic "Bloody Mary" (1553–58) reinstated the Catholic hierarchy and the Mass. Protestantism was outlawed and she executed 273 men and women, among whom were 5 bishops (including Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer). Many others fled abroad. Protestant Elizabeth I (1558–1603) and parliament issued the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity (1559), which maintained the episcopal organization of the church but placed it under the headship of the throne. Both the reissued Book of Common Prayer and the revised Thirty-Nine Articles were a compromise between conservative Anglicans and radical Protestants (Puritans), many of whom had returned from exile in Reformed Protestant centers. The tensions between these two branches of the national church would lead to civil war in the seventeenth century. In Scotland John Knox introduced a Calvinist church order (1560–61) and a simple Reformed liturgy (1564).

France: Protestantism made little headway in the 1520s and 1530s in France, but under the guidance of John Calvin and Theodore Beza, the Huguenots grew rapidly in the early 1550s. The first Reformed congregation in Paris appeared in 1555 and by 1559 the city saw France's first Calvinist National Synod. The Catholic forces were powerful, however, and France was torn asunder by the Wars of Religion (1562–94). Henry IV, a Protestant who had returned to Catholicism in order to hold his throne, issued the Edict of Nantes (1598) granting Protestants toleration. Never more than a strong minority, their numbers slowly dwindled until Louis XIV revoked the edict in 1685, when most fled or went underground.

Eastern Europe: Bohemia (the former Czechoslovakia) proved fertile ground for Protestantism, given its Hussite heritage, and it spread widely among the nobles and city dwellers. The defeat of White Mountain (1620) at the hands of the Habsburgs resulted in the crushing of the movement, though some remnants remained to rise again in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Hungary was influenced first by students of Luther and Melanchthon (Synod of Erdöd, 1545) and then by Calvinism, the Calvinists and Lutherans winning religious toleration by force of arms in 1606. Poland was introduced to Lutheranism already in 1518. After 1540 Calvinism also spread. King Sigismund Augustus (1548–72) favored Protestantism. It achieved its high-water mark at the Synod of Sendomir (1570). Divisions among the Protestants, however, and the pressure of the Catholic Counter-Reformation thoroughly undermined the movement by the seventeenth century. See also Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation; Protestantism.

Bibliography

Dickens, A. G. The English Reformation. University Park, PA: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1991.

Kingdon, Robert M. Geneva and the Coming of the Wars of Religion 1555–1563. Geneva: Librairie E. Droz, 1956.

Ozment, Steven. The Age of Reform, 1250–1550. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1980.

R. EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

Reformed churches, in general, all Christian churches whose beliefs have been shaped by the Reformation, but specifically those Protestant churches that have adhered in some manner to John Calvin's teachings, especially regarding the Lord's Supper. These churches, frequently also called "Presbyterian," stand separate from the Lutheran churches. In this specific sense, there are numerous associations of Reformed churches throughout the world, including the Church of Scotland, Germany's Reformed Alliance, which formed the Confessing Church during the Third Reich, the Hungarian Reformed Church, the Netherlands Reformed Church, the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, the Reformed Church of France (also known as the French Calvinists or Huguenots), the Swiss Reformed Church, and in the United States and Canada the Reformed and Presbyterian churches. Reformed and Presbyterian churches also exist throughout Africa and Asia. See also Calvinism; Protestantism; Reformation, the.

Reformed Church of America, Protestant denomination also known as the Dutch Reformed Church. It was originally brought to what is now the state of New York by colonial settlers from Holland, where it began in 1571 in conformity with the teachings of John Calvin (d. 1564). Formally established in the colonies by Jonas Michaelius in 1628, it became independent from the church governing body (classis) in the Netherlands in 1754. It founded Queens College, now Rutgers University, in 1792. In 1867 it officially changed its name from "Reformed Protestant Dutch Church" to "Reformed Church of America." In the second half of the nineteenth century, the new Dutch immigrants to the midwestern United States established congregations of the Reformed Church that tended to be more doctrinally conservative than the congregations on the East Coast that dated from the colonial period. Today, the Reformed Church sponsors Hope College (Holland, Michigan) and Central College (Pella, Iowa). See also Calvinism; Protestantism; Reformation, the.

Regensburg. See Ratisbon, Conference of.

Regimini Ecclesiae Universae (rej-i'meen-ee ek-klayz'ee-ay *oo*n-ee-vair'say; Lat., "On the governing of the universal Church"), apostolic constitution, promulgated by Pope Paul VI on August 15, 1967, reforming and modernizing the Roman Curia. It decreed some changes of names, e.g., Propaganda Fide became the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples; new curial appointments were limited to a five-year term; all prelates, including cardinals, were to resign at age seventy-five; all offices were to lapse upon the death of a pope; the main modern languages were to be used in official documents; and all curial departments were declared juridically equal (n. 1, sec. 2), although the Secretariat of State was assigned the task of overall coordination (n. 19, sec. 1). See also Roman Curia.

Regina, St., second-century virgin and martyr. Regina was imprisoned, tortured, and beheaded when she refused to marry a pagan, sacrifice to idols, and deny her faith. Feast day: September 7.

Regina Coeli (reh-jee'nah chay'lee; Lat., "Queen of Heaven"), an ancient title that honors Mary as Queen of Heaven and emphasizes her role as queenly intercessor. Because she is Mother of God, Mary is queen of the kingdom of God. The feast of the queenship of Mary is celebrated on May 31. Regina Coeli is also the title of an anthem to the Blessed Virgin recited during the Easter season in place of the Angelus. It probably dates from the twelfth century; its author is unknown. See also Queen of Heaven.

Reginald of Piperno, ca. 1230–90, Dominican, companion and secretary of Thomas Aquinas, responsible for compiling, from Thomas's earlier writings, the "Supplement" to the unfinished Summa Theologiae. See also Summa Theologiae.

regulae iuris (reg'oo-lay yoor'ees; Lat., "rules of law"), rules developed to aid the interpretation and application of canon law.

Regula Magistri (reg'oo-lah maj-is'-tree; Lat., "Rule of the Master"), a monastic rule written in the vicinity of Rome in the first quarter of the sixth century. Benedict of Nursia (d. ca. 550) incorporated considerable portions of it into his own monastic rule but avoided the anonymous "Master's" wordiness and his extreme suspicion of human nature. See also Benedict, Rule of St.

reign of God. See kingdom of God.

reincarnation, a doctrine held by various religions and philosophies that generally includes belief in the preexistence of the soul prior to its union with the body and the soul's return to life after death in some other human or nonhuman form, perhaps depending on the deeds of the prior life. Reincarnation differs considerably from Christian doctrine, which teaches the eschatological resurrection of the body, in which ultimate personal destiny is inseparable from one's original integrity of body and spirit. Reincarnation may presume a different conception of the soul, i.e., as a life force or energy rather than as the center of individual identity. Reincarnation is particularly incompatible with Aquinas's doctrine of hylomorphism, which asserts that the soul is the form of the body. Reincarnation often accompanies cyclical models of history rather than the Christian eschatological understanding of history, which envisions history moving toward a final consummation. The latter coincides with Christian doctrines of individual and general judgment, which attribute eternal significance to human decision in one's life. In spite of these difficulties, assertions of total incompatibility should be moderated by awareness that both the doctrine of purgatory and the concept of reincarnation attempt to allow for a process of purification after death. See also hylomorphism; immortality; soul.

relativism, the view that morality varies according to differences in cultural or individual attitudes. There are two broad types of relativism. Cultural relativism points out the differences in moral norms from one culture to another and draws the conclusion that no moral norm is objectively correct for all cultures. Individual relativism, sometimes called "subjectivism," avers that the moral rightness of an action depends on conformity with one's motives at a particular time and place. On this view, an action that is wrong for someone in one situation can be right in another situation, even when the morally relevant circumstances are the same. See also situation ethics.

relativity, Albert Einstein's (1879–1955) theory revolutionizing previously held concepts of space and time. The strongly confirmed special theory (1905) weds space to time in a four-dimensional space-time continuum such that measurements of distance and duration vary according to the observer's motion: there is no absolute length or time scale. The general theory (1916), still undergoing crucial testing, constitutes a revision of Isaac Newton's (1642–1727) theory of gravitation and implies this space-time continuum is curved. See also eternity; space; time.

relics (Lat., reliquiae, "remains"), in the strict sense, material remains of the bodies of canonized and beatified saints; in a wider sense, those things used by canonized or beatified persons during their lifetime or objects that have touched their material remains (cans. 1186–90). The old Code of Canon Law (1917) further distinguished major relics (whole body, head, arm, hand, heart, tongue, or part of the body that suffered martyrdom) from minor relics (can. 1281.2).

In the early Church, relics emerged alongside the development of the cult of saints/martyrs. On saints' feast days, Eucharists were celebrated at their graves. In the sixth century, martyrs' bones became required elements in church altars (see can. 1237.2). This mandate led to the transfer and division of remains.

Medieval theologians drew careful distinctions between the worship (Gk., latria) appropriate to God and the veneration (dulia) appropriate to saints. They further distinguished the cultus absolutus (reverence paid to God and to God through saints) from the cultus relativus (honor paid to things related to the holy person). These distinctions were often inoperative in the Church at large, however, where relics were thought to possess an inherent power parallel to Christ's redemptive act.

Sixteenth-century Reformers opposed the veneration of relics, seeing them as images prohibited in the OT. The Council of Trent (1545–63) reaffirmed Catholic practice but encouraged bishops to avoid past extremes. Vatican II's Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) articulated the place of relics, relative to the mysteries of salvation (n. 111). See also reliquary; saints. CATHERINE MURPHY religious, a member of a religious institute, i.e., a group of individuals who live life together as brothers or sisters and publicly profess religious vows. Religious vows are the evangelical counsels of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

There is considerable variation in the manner of living the vows and of sharing the common life depending not only on the particular purpose of a religious community but also upon its historical development. Although a religious may be either a layperson or an ordained minister within the Church, canon law applies many of the rules of clerical conduct to religious. The reason for this is that a religious, by public profession of vows, is seen to represent the Church in a way not unlike that of a public minister of the Church.

Together with the obligations they have assumed, religious have certain rights, especially within their communities. Chief among these is the right to the common life, i.e., the life of sharing as sisters or brothers, considered one of the essential elements of religious life. Once finally professed, a religious cannot be dismissed from the community or denied community rights without cause and proper process. See also counsels, evangelical; religious life; vows.

religious education. There is little consensus about the precise meaning of the widely used term "religious education." Specifically, it designates an academic and school-based study of religious tradition(s). Its pedagogy is more intellectual inquiry than religious socialization; its intent is more sympathetic understanding than confessional commitment. In this sense, religious education is clearly distinct from "catechesis" or "Christian education," the favored Catholic and Protestant terms for forming people in Christian identity.

This distinct meaning suggests a convenient division of labor between parish and school and would seem to encourage rigorous and critical study without confessional interest or restraint. It is clearly helpful in a social context like Britain where "religious education" is a required discipline in the curriculum of government-supported schools but where the law (1944) mandates an academic study of various religions and forbids any attempt to influence people's religious identity.

However, this specifically academic meaning also reflects the myth of objective and disinterested knowledge and presumes a dichotomy between "knowing" and "being," as if religious study is not to impinge on people's lives. Furthermore, posing catechesis as nonscholarly and nonreflective tends to forget the Catholic wisdom that faith is deepened by understanding and that revelation is enhanced by reason.

The more generic meaning of "religious education" refers to the whole educational enterprise of enabling people to learn about, to learn from, and to learn to be religious persons by studying religious tradition(s). When religious education is sponsored by a particular tradition or denomination, as is typical in the United States, it can be further designated as, e.g., "Christian," or "Jewish," or "Muslim" religious education. However, all particular expressions reflect the common intent to inform and form people in faith by studying the traditional ways of being religious.

As a generic term, "religious education" signals that the general enterprise and specific instances should be good "education" that draw from educational research and literature to inform practice (a value not carried by the term "catechesis"); that there should be an ecumenical bond and partnership between all efforts to educate people religiously; and that it should avoid the pretext of value-free study and recognize that all religious education should inform and form people's religious identity.

All religious traditions do "religious education" in one way or another; from the beginning, Christianity believed it had the mandate of the Risen Christ to "go therefore . . . and teach. . ." (Matt 28:19–20). As a field of study and research, however, religious education is relatively new and its formal beginnings are typically linked with the founding of the Religious Education Association in 1904. Under the initiative of William Rainey Harper, and with many of the academic leaders of the era as founding members, the REA stated its purpose as: "to inspire the religious forces of our country with the educational ideal; to inspire the educational forces of our country with the religious ideal." This still-urgent purpose continues to be carried on by the Religious Education Association today. See also catechesis.

THOMAS GROOME

Religious Formation Conference, formerly the Sister Formation Conference, founded in 1953, a national organization providing initial and ongoing intellectual and spiritual formation for men and women religious through an annual national congress and newsletter, In-Formation.

religious house. See religious life.

religious institute, a group approved by competent Church authority who live in community and profess the public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. A religious institute may be of diocesan right (mainly under the authority of the local bishop) or pontifical right (for the most part under the direct authority of Rome). It may be clerical (founded to be engaged in the work of ordained ministry) or lay (founded for a number of works, but excluding that of ordained ministry). It may be contemplative (devoted mainly to the pursuit of prayer) or active (given to the works of the apostolate).

Canon law has a considerable number of regulations concerning the foundation, supervision, and administration of religious institutes. In addition, each institute has its own norms approved by Church authority. One of the major goals continued from the post–Vatican II reforms into the current canon law is to allow each institute the freedom needed to live out its own particular identity. See also counsels, evangelical; religious orders and congregations; secular institute; society of apostolic life.

religious law. See religious life.

religious liberty, the freedom to exercise one's religious beliefs, even in the public forum, according to one's conscience. Catholic understanding of the problem of religious freedom has developed through three stages. In the first stage, extending up until Pope Pius IX's "Syllabus of Errors" in 1864, Catholic teaching held that the establishment of Catholicism as the official state religion was the only acceptable arrangement between Church and state. Pius IX listed as error no. 77 this statement: "It is no longer expedient that the Catholic religion should be treated as the only religion of the state, all other forms of worship whatever being excluded."

This statement, suggesting that Catholicism be the only official religion in every state, struck many commentators as excessive. This inaugurated the second stage of Catholic thought on religious liberty. The French bishop, Félix Dupanloup, qualified Pope Pius's statement in a commentary that developed a "thesis-hypothesis" distinction in the relations between Church and state. The Catholic state is to remain the ideal, or "thesis." Still, historical circumstances might require an altered relationship, or "hypothesis," at least until the situation changes so that a Catholic state is once again a viable option. This allowed for the toleration of the arrangements in the United States, Latin America, and Belgium.

The American Jesuit John Courtney Murray (d. 1967) is the person most responsible for the shift from the second to the third stages of Catholic teaching on religious liberty. His argument was that a variety of Church-state arrangements, with no one arrangement being preferable, best protects the freedom of the Church. Which arrangement is best in a particular instance depends upon the concrete historical circumstances. In a pluralistic society like that in the United States, the best arrangement is one of constitutionally protected religious liberty. Any attempt to bring about a Catholic state would provoke a backlash that would limit the freedom of the Church.

Thus religious freedom, for Murray, is a protection against interference by the state and other associations in the practice of religious communities. It is, in Murray's words, "simply a negative, namely, immunity from coercion in religious matters." Religious freedom "contains no positive evaluation of the religious phenomenon in any of its manifestations. It simply defines the immunity of these manifestations from interference."

In making his case for religious liberty, Murray is careful not to condemn earlier teaching. His approach is to place such teaching in its historical context. Earlier cases for a Catholic state were legitimate because the populace was not ready to be self-directing, and thus needed a paternal government. However, persons are now more literate and capable, and therefore more aware of their human dignity. This required a development in Church teaching. The development occurred in Vatican II's Declaration on Religious Freedom (1965), for which Murray himself was largely responsible. See also Church and state; Declaration on Religious Freedom; Murray, John Courtney. TODD D. WHITMORE religious life, a way of living the Christian life that includes communal living and the profession of the public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience in a community approved by competent Church authority. Religious life has a rich history of development that produced various models, many of which continue today. The forms include (1) the monastic life, in which the community lives together and is bound by the celebration of the Liturgical Hours; (2) the mendicant life, which was established to give members more mobility to preach the gospel where needed; and (3) the Counter-Reformation and later apostolic communities, which maintain a major focus on apostolic works. Religious life embraces communities given to the works of the apostolate (preaching, teaching, nursing, publishing, foreign missions, social work, etc.) as well as communities devoted solely to contemplation. Every religious institute has its distinctive mixture of the above elements, and Vatican II (1962–65) called each community to renew itself by rediscovering that founding charism (inspiration) that is its specific distinctive mixture of a particular spirituality, way of life, and work. That special charism is seen as a gift to the Church, not only because of the apostolic work an institute accomplishes, but mainly because of the particular manner in which the way of life itself witnesses to the gospel. This renewal was accompanied by considerable change and tension in many religious communities. At present, however, not only do the older forms of religious life continue, but new forms continue to develop as well.

Religious life is governed by general Church law that applies in principle to each individual religious and to each religious community. It is also governed by particular law, approved by Church authority, which applies to a given religious community and to its members. The laws have as their purpose the protection of the rights of the members, the safeguarding of the ideals of the given community, and the harmony between religious communities and the Church.

The way of life in any religious institute entails prayer in common and private prayer, accountability for the use of material resources (which are all to come from the common fund), participation in social interaction with others in community, doing one's part in work, sharing in the decision-making processes of the group, obedience to the authority of the institute, and observance of the vows. In communities devoted to the apostolate, it also means having involvement in a ministry commissioned by the community.

Some communities are approved by Rome and have a degree of exemption from the authority of the local bishop (of pontifical right), while others have been established by a local bishop who retains a greater role in their governance (of diocesan right). The institutes approved by Rome have a certain degree of autonomy from the local bishop, especially in regard to their internal affairs, while those of diocesan right look to the bishop as a superior even in matters internal to the living of the religious life. Some institutes whose way of life involves the exercise of the ordained ministry are called clerical institutes; others are called lay institutes. See also counsels, evangelical; religious institute; religious orders and congregations. JOHN F. LAHEY religious profession, the pronouncement of vows in a religious institute approved by the Church. These vows consecrate persons to God and make them members of religious community. The person professing vows must be of sufficient age and have had the requisite period of formation in order for the vows to be recognized as valid by the Church. The candidate must be admitted to profession by competent authority and must make the profession freely and without grave fear or fraud. The vows must be received by an authority competent to receive them. Initial religious profession is made for a temporary period of time; final profession for the whole of life. See also religious institute; vows.

RELIGIOUS ORDERS AND CONGREGATIONS

Religious orders and congregations are groups living under a religious rule and publicly professing the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience or their equivalents. Technically, the terms refer to groups who are recognized by Church authorities, are subject to canon law, and have central authority structures. However, there are "noncanonical" groups that are considered under this heading. Equally, the terms are understood to include associations of autonomous monasteries (e.g., the Benedictines) following a common rule. The outdated distinction between "orders" and "congregations" was based on technical differences concerning the status of their vows.

At their most fully developed, religious orders are a Roman Catholic phenomenon. In the Eastern Orthodox churches, a variety of patterns exist within a single monastic tradition. Anglican religious life and the small number of communities within some Reformed churches have not generally developed the centralized features of Roman Catholic orders.

ORIGINS OF RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES

A visibly distinctive, consecrated life within the Christian community existed from earliest times. Precisely how to define "religious life" is a matter of dispute. Some authorities suggest that celibate community is the common core. However, Celtic monasticism was not exclusively celibate and community life means different things to an enclosed nun and a missionary priest.

Traditionally, religious life is dated to the end of the third century when groups of women and men ascetics retired to the Egyptian desert in search of a purified gospel life-style. They did not see themselves as other than ordinary Christians, living out the full implications of Baptism. Early monasticism was a lay movement. However, there was an earlier tradition of ascetics in the Palestinian and Syrian wilderness. There were also autonomous virgins or widows alongside deaconesses within local Christian congregations at a very early stage. By the fourth century, virgins lived increasingly in communities. Community life under a rule originated in Egypt primarily with Pachomius (ca. 290–ca. 347). The monastic ideal traveled to the West through such Easterners as John Cassian (ca. 365–ca. 435), whose writings, based on the Egyptian tradition, influenced the Rule of St. Benedict.

A SINGLE LINE OF DEVELOPMENT?

It was once thought that religious orders developed in a single line from primitive monasticism to modern international missionary congregations. In that sense, all religious life was a kind of monastic derivative. This view was oversimple.

First, while the Benedictine model (strong abbot, stable residence, centrality of the Liturgy of the Hours) eventually prevailed, early Western monasticism was pluriform. Monastic founders such as Martin of Tours (d. 397) were not in the Benedictine tradition. Celtic monasticism, such as that of Columba (d. 597) on Iona, Cuthbert (d. 687) on Lindisfarne, Hilda (d. 680) at Whitby, and Columbanus (d. 615) in Gaul and Italy, had different values and structures from the well-ordered world of a Benedictine abbey.

Second, there is another ancient stream of religious life in the West, the so-called canonical life. Its nature has often been misunderstood and treated as a subspecies of monasticism. By tradition, Augustine (d. 430) founded the first monastic community at Hippo in North Africa at the end of the fourth century. The rule named after him had considerable influence during the Middle Ages, particularly from the eleventh century. Its spirit contrasted in significant ways with that of the Rule of St. Benedict and was adopted by more active communities such as canons and canonesses, friars and nursing sisters.

Third, an understanding of religious life depends on whether one includes the solitary life. After the early solitaries and single virgins, the solitary life continued in the Western Church although it was not always formally recognized by Church law. The recent revision of canon law (1983) once more gives it a formal status and there has been a striking revival of the solitary life in recent years.

During the Middle Ages, "hermits" or "solitaries" were not necessarily enclosed recluses. The majority had fairly close contact with the local community and some served it as guides to travelers, hostel-keepers, and guardians of bridges or coastal beacons. Others made pilgrimages to the great shrines of Christendom. In contrast, "anchorites" had a more secluded, contemplative vocation. Among these may be counted the fourteenth-century English mystic Julian of Norwich (d. ca. 1420).

After the thirteenth-century foundation of the mendicant orders, groups of associated tertiaries (Third Orders) were established for those unable to take on the full life of the parent religious order. Some gathered in communities, but others lived autonomously at home. The same mixture may be found among the women's movement, the Beguines of Flanders, northern Germany, and northern France, from the end of the twelfth century. These developments offered an alternative to the traditional structures of religious life.

IMPORTANT DEVELOPMENTS AND REFORMS

There have been three particularly important periods of development associated with social and cultural change and movements of Church reform. The first, from the eleventh to thirteenth centuries, was a period of greater centralization and increased freedom of the Church from political control. At the same time there were major cultural developments such as the "twelfth-century Renaissance" as well as social changes involving the gradual development of towns and a new mercantile class. Alongside all this grew a complex movement of spirituality with particular emphasis on gospel simplicity and radical poverty.

During the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the reforms were largely within the traditional structures of religious life. Thus many groups joined the canonical life under the Rule of St. Augustine and there were various attempts by men and women to return to the original spirit of the Rule of St. Benedict. This produced reformed monasteries and new orders such as the austere and physically isolated Cistercians and Camaldolese. The latter, and the better-known Carthusians, balanced solitude with community.

During the early part of the thirteenth century an entirely new form of religious life emerged, the mendicant orders with their emphasis on preaching and poverty. The Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, Carmelites, and Servites had varied origins. The common style that emerged can broadly be described as urban, conventual but not enclosed, with a strong emphasis on university teaching and popular preaching.

Women participated in most of these movements but were increasingly subject to restrictive legislation. For many centuries attempts had been made to impose strict enclosure on women with varying degrees of success. The participation of women in groups of wandering preachers during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries provoked strong reactions from Church authorities that went hand in hand with the restriction of all ministerial roles to a celibate priesthood with enhanced status. Mendicant women, in the end, were unable to share exactly in life-style of their male counterparts.

The second period of significant development came in the sixteenth century. In response to social and religious upheaval, there arose a new form of religious life freed from enclosure and lengthy public liturgies, mobile and espousing a spirituality strongly oriented toward service. New clerical communities under a rule became known as clerks regular. Perhaps the best known example is the Society of Jesus, or Jesuits. From these roots stemmed what became known, somewhat unfortunately, as "apostolic religious life," embracing all orders and congregations whose primary focus was active ministry. Women, however, were once again limited in their roles. For example, the initiatives of Angela Merici's Ursulines in the sixteenth century and Mary Ward's Institute of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the early seventeenth century in creating mobile groups of women were severely hampered until modern times by an imposed degree of enclosure.

Although new, mostly active religious congregations of women and men continued to be founded throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the third great period of expansion in religious life was during the nineteenth century. This development is closely associated with the growing distance between the Church and large sections of new industrial city populations and the acute social and educational needs produced by industrialization. There was an extraordinary proliferation of women's communities involved in catechesis, education, and various forms of social and medical work. Finally, European colonial expansion in Africa and Asia saw the development of many specialized missionary congregations.

THE CONTEMPORARY SITUATION

The Roman Catholic Church has inherited four broad categories of orders and congregations: monastic, canonical, mendicant, and fully active (or "apostolic"). Some of the striking, if superficial, differences between orders have blurred in recent years with the move toward less institutional life-styles and the breakdown of rigid distinctions between contemplation and action. Since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the recovery of a theology of one, common baptismal vocation and the rejection of a spirituality of separation from the world as the precondition of holiness have also blurred the distinction between religious life and the laity and clergy. New religious movements and groups are increasingly open to single and married people alike. In this context, the precise future of the traditional structures of religious orders has become more uncertain.

See also Augustine, Rule of St.; Augustinians; Benedict, Rule of St.; Benedictine order; Carmelite order; Cistercian order; Dominican order; Franciscan order; Jesuits; mendicant orders; monasticism; religious life; vows.

Bibliography

Brown, Peter. The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.

Hostie, Raymond. The Life and Death of Religious Orders: A Psycho-sociological Approach. Washington, DC: CARA, 1983.

Schneiders, Sandra. New Wineskins: Reimagining Religious Life Today. New York: Paulist Press, 1986.

Sheldrake, Philip. Spirituality and History. New York: Crossroad, 1992.

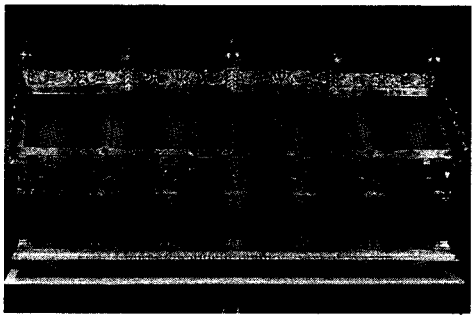
PHILIP F. SHELDRAKE



Ornate twelfth-century medieval reliquary containing the bones of Archbishop Anno of Cologne (d. 1075); made of oak, gilded copper, bronze, precious stones, and rock crystal; in the Abbey of St. Michael, Siegburg, Germany.

reliquary, a vessel used to contain and expose relics, frequently made of precious metal and decorated with gems. Forms include caskets, capsules, crosses, and monstrances. Whole bodies are often enclosed in gabled shrines. The shape of the reliquary may correspond to the shape of the relic (arm, leg, head, bust). See also relics.

Rembert, St., d. 888, archbishop of Hamburg and Bremen beginning in 865 who also evangelized the northern Slavs in Sweden and Denmark. He worked to free Christians enslaved by the northern Slavs and Norsemen and inaugurated the conversion of the former to Christianity. Feast day: February 4.

remedial penalty, a penalty in canon law whose purpose is to seek some kind of repair for the damage done to the common good. It is contrasted with a "medicinal penalty," whose purpose is to seek the correction of the wrongdoer.

Remigius, St., or Remi, ca. 438–533, bishop and evangelist of the Franks. A Gaulish nobleman appointed bishop of Reims at twenty-two, sometime around 496 he baptized Clovis I, king of the Franks, and many followers. Feast of the translation of his relics: October 1 (no longer universally observed). See also Franks.

Renaissance (Fr., "rebirth"), ca. 1300–1550, a renewal movement in arts and letters associated primarily with Italy. Scholars, however, now discount views that the Italian Renaissance broke decisively with medieval culture. Historians point to other "renaissances" in European history, notably the eighth-century "Carolingian Renaissance" led by Alcuin of York (d. 804) and the "Renaissance of the Twelfth Century" leading to the rise of European universities. Common to all was a rediscovery of classical Roman and Greek texts.

The Italian Renaissance is conventionally dated from the time of the Italian poet and humanist Petrarch (d. 1374), also known as Francesco Petrarca, who championed the study of ancient classics, particularly Cicero, and the liberal arts of poetry and rhetoric. This intellectual emphasis distinguished humanists from the Scholastics, who stressed dialectics. Later humanists included Giovanni Boccaccio (d. 1375), Lorenzo Valla (d. 1457), Pico della Mirandola (d. 1494), and Niccolò Machiavelli (d. 1527). They valued the active over the contemplative life and rejected what they called Christian escape from the world. Renaissance artistic styles favored realism, perspective, and secular themes. Although the personal corruption of individual popes and their involvement in artistic patronage had led some to view the Renaissance as anti-Christian and pagan, the age was strongly, even conventionally, pious. In northern Europe, Christian humanists such as Desiderius Erasmus (d. 1536) and Thomas More (d. 1535) employed humanist techniques to advance piety and biblical studies. See also humanism, Catholic; humanism, secular. DAVID MYERS

Renan, Joseph Ernest, 1823–92, French orientalist and philosopher. He became estranged from the Church, becoming a skeptic in matters of faith, and denying the divinity of Christ and the existence of a transcendent God. His chief work is a seven-volume history of the origins of Christianity. The first volume, The Life of Jesus, for which Renan is most famous, denies the divinity of Jesus and presents him merely as a great moral teacher. Renan made more significant contributions to Semitic philology than to theology. See also Modernism.

renewal of marriage vows. See convalidation; sanation.

reparation, penitential and devotional acts that allow an individual or community to participate in Christ's redemptive work of restoring all things to God. In the sacrament of Reconciliation, acts of reparation for personal sin are made by the penitent after receiving absolution from the presiding priest in order to mend the damage created by personal sin. These acts of reparation, usually in the form of prayers suggested by the priest, are intended to honor God whom sin has offended, to remind the penitent that sin is a grave matter deserving punishment, and to guard against future sin. Acts of reparation form an important part of the devotion to the Sacred Heart inspired by the visions of Margaret Mary Alacoque (d. 1690). The Morning Offering prayer and the holy hour meditation seek to unite one's daily actions and one's affections to the sufferings of Christ in order to share in Christ's work of making satisfaction for sin. See also Morning Offering; penance.

repentance, a response to the experience of the gracious love and forgiveness of God. The term originates from the Old French repentir, "be sorry for" (Lat., paenitere), and translates principally the Hebrew šub, "turn back to the right path," and the Greek metanoia, "a change of heart" or "disposition," or epistrephein, "turn around or toward." It is central to prophetic preaching (Amos 4:16–13, Hos 5:15–6:5; Jer 3:12–24), and to the preaching of John the Baptist (Mark 1:4; Matt 3:2; Luke 3:3) and Jesus (Mark 1:14–15; Matt 4:17; Luke 13:3, 5). The early Church proclaims repentance and forgiveness of sin in the name of Jesus (Mark 6:12, Acts 2:39; 3:19; 26:18, 20; 2 Pet 3:9). See also contrition; conversion.

repose, altar of (Lat., repositorium, "storehouse"), a side altar where hosts, consecrated at the Holy Thursday Mass of the Lord's Supper, are reserved for Communion on Good Friday. Believers are encouraged to pray there until midnight, contemplating Christ's Passion, death, and Resurrection. The space should be suitably decorated. See also altar.

reprobation, in Catholic theology, the divine decree whereby sinners are excluded from grace in this life and from the final vision of God in the next. Reprobation refers both to God's foreknowledge of spiritual failure and the divine intention to abandon unrepentant sinners to damnation. Reprobation can be understood as the negative side of predestination but, according to Catholic theology, only insofar as it is taken as a function of God's foreknowledge. God wills the damnation of those who are foreseen as freely and definitively rejecting the divine offer of grace. This reprobation is said to be positive and consequent, that is, it entails God's positive intention to punish as a response to human sin. There has been considerable debate within Catholic circles concerning negative reprobation (the denial of divine election as an undue gift, apart from considerations of punishment). The debate, which centers on the question of in what sense God could will that human beings die in the state of mortal sin, has been polarized in the teachings of two sixteenth-century Spanish theologians: the Jesuit Luis de Molina and the Dominican Domingo Báñez. Strict Molinists take the less rigorous position, refusing to admit antecedent reprobation of any sort. Nevertheless, Catholic theologians are unanimous in rejecting any understanding of reprobation that posits God's condemnation antecedent to human guilt. This includes a rejection of the Jansenist position, which states that foreknowledge of original sin alone is sufficient to justify God's positive reprobation prior to individual sin. See also damnation; De Auxiliis; predestination. GERARD JACOBITZ reproductive technologies, medical procedures used to overcome infertility in the male or female. In its broadest sense the term includes artificial insemination by husband (AIH), artificial insemination by donor (AID), in vitro (Lat., "in glass") fertilization with embryo transfer (IVF-ET), gamete intrafallopian transfer (GIFT), surrogate mothers and carriers, and all the ancillary techniques that are part of or supportive of such procedures, for example, cryopreservation (freezing) of sperm and preembryos, various micro techniques to improve efficacy, for example, zona drilling (the making of a hole in the outer layer of the ovum to facilitate access by the sperm).

The medical indications for such procedures are related to the cause of infertility. For example, in vitro fertilization can be used where the woman's fallopian tubes are blocked or when she suffers from pelvic endometriosis. Donor insemination is often suggested when the husband is genetically at risk as a carrier, or when he is oligospermic (produces too few sperm) or azoospermic (produces immobile or dead sperm). Donor preembryos might be used when both husband and wife are incapable of fertilization.

World attention focused on in vitro fertilization on July 25, 1978, when Louise Brown was born in Oldham, England. She was the first so-called test-tube baby, the culmination of the work of the late Patrick Steptoe, a physician, and Robert Edwards, a research scientist. Since that time, thousands of babies have been born around the world as a result of

IVF. It is no longer regarded as an experimental procedure; several states in the United States have legislated its inclusion in insurance coverage. Rates of success (defined as carry-home babies) differ according to the technology and the experience of the team involved. Quality control has been a problem. Some practitioners, for example, offer IVF-ET, yet have never achieved a success in this procedure.

Over the years any number of commissions have addressed the ethical aspects of the reproductive technologies. Some of the more important are the Ethics Advisory Board of the former U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (1979); Waller Report from Australia (1983–84); Warnock Report from England (1984); Ontario Law Reform Commission (1985); Benda Report of the Federal Republic of Germany (1985); American Fertility Society (1986 and repeatedly updated).

The Church and Reproductive Technologies: The official Catholic response to the new reproductive technologies appeared in March 1987. The document is entitled "Instruction on Respect for Human Life in its Origin and on the Dignity of Procreation" (Donum Vitae), and was drawn up by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

The Congregation first proposes a criterion for judging these technologies: the dignity and integral good of the human person. Reproductive technologies, therefore, cannot be assessed and rejected merely in terms of their artificiality.

The ethical assessment of these technologies is complex and can involve any number of considerations. Three, however, stand out: the moral status of the preembryo, the use of third parties in these technologies, the simple procedure of IVF-ET ("simple" meaning that the semen of the husband and ovum of the wife are used).

(1) The status of the preembryo is a key moral issue because of preembryo discarding, freezing, and experimentation. Such procedures are not inseparable from IVF-ET, but often accompany it. Many of the commissions listed earlier concluded that the preembryo deserves profound respect, but not necessarily that due to persons.

Donum Vitae refers to "unconditional respect." The preembryo must be "treated as a person from the moment of conception," for "how could a human individual not be a human person?" It views destruction of preembryos as abortion, and nontherapeutic experimentation on them as a "crime against their dignity as human beings."

Some contemporary Catholic theologians have raised doubts about this doctrine. Pointing to certain phenomena of the preimplantation period (twinning, recombination of fertilized ova, totipotentiality [capacity to become an integral individual] of the preembryo, spontaneous loss), these theologians believe that while genetic individuality is present from fertilization, developmental individuality is not.

(2) Third-party participation is a broad category that includes sperm donation, egg donation, embryo donation, and uterus donation (surrogacy). While these procedures differ markedly, present official Catholic teaching would reject them all as violations of the unity of marriage. Donum Vitae states: "Human procreation has specific characteristics by virtue of the personal dignity of the parents and of the children: the procreation of a new person, whereby the man and the woman collaborate with the power of the Creator, must be the fruit and the sign of the mutual self-giving of the spouses, of their love and of their fidelity. The fidelity of the spouses in the unity of marriage involves reciprocal respect of their right to become a father and a mother only through each other."

While this statement appears in the section on heterologous artificial insemination (AID), it touches in principle all third-party donations in reproductive technology.

(3) The simple procedure. Donum Vitae begins its consideration as follows: "The Church's teaching on marriage and human procreation affirms the 'inseparable connection, willed by God and unable to be broken by man on his own initiative, between the two meanings of the conjugal act: the unitive meaning and the procreative meaning.'"

The citation within the above quote is drawn from Pope Paul VI's encyclical letter on birth regulation, Humanae Vitae (1988). The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith refers to this "inseparable connection" as a "principle based on the nature of marriage and the intimate connection of the goods of marriage." It goes on to note that just as contraception separates the unitive and procreative dimensions, so does IVF-ET in an analogous way. Because this is the case, procreation by IVF-ET is "deprived of its proper perfection" and is not "in conformity with the dignity of the person" because it fails to respect the body-soul unity of the human person.

Thus official Catholic teaching rejects any reproductive technology (e.g., AIH) that replaces sexual intercourse. This is the most controversial aspect of this teaching and has been challenged by many Catholic theologians who agree that not everything that is "deprived of its proper perfection" is necessarily morally wrong. Thus, while many accept the inseparability of the unitive and procreative, they apply this to the marriage relationship, not to individual acts. See also bioethics; in vitro fertilization; Marriage; medical ethics.

Bibliography

Kelly, Kevin T. Life and Love. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1987.

Shannon, Thomas A., and Lisa Sowle Cahill. Religion and Artificial Reproduction. New York: Crossroad, 1988.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

reputation, moral right to, the moral claim of an individual to the esteem of others. In traditional Catholic moral theology this right was treated in relation to its most prominent violations, detraction and calumny. Detraction is the unjust violation of another's reputation by revealing to others some true but hidden fault of the person. Calumny is the imputation to another of a fault that is false in fact and known to be false. It adds to the injustice the sin of lying.

Detraction is serious if the defamation has been serious (a cause of great harm) and unjust. It has always been admitted in Catholic tradition that the revelation of another's fault is not unjust where it is in the circumstances necessary or very useful. Thus, it is usually not unjust to reveal a child's faults to its parents or those of a religious to the superior. Nor is it considered detraction to reveal a fault that is already juridically notorious. Detraction and calumny give rise to the duty of restitution. See also calumny; detraction.

Requiem (Lat., "rest"), the funeral Mass. The first word ("Requiem") of the Introit of the older funeral Mass became a shorthand description of the Mass itself. The Requiem Mass is now called the Mass of Christian Burial, or simply the Mass for the Dead, when celebrated apart from the funeral rites. In the larger sense the term now means any valedictory on the occasion of a death. See also burial, Christian; funeral Mass.

reredos (Old Fr., arrière, dos, "behind the back"), the decoration of the space behind (and above) the altar, e.g., in the form of hangings or wooden panels or painted scenes. The reredos presupposes an altar at which the priest stands with his back to the people. See also altar.

Rerum Novarum (ray'ruhm noh-vahr'uhm; Lat., "Of new things"), "On the Condition of the Working Person," encyclical of Pope Leo XIII, issued on May 15, 1891. The first of the major social encyclicals, it sought to apply traditional Catholic teaching to the new conditions created by the Industrial Revolution. The pope's deep concern over the growing alienation of workers from the Church and the widening and increasingly bitter division between the classes added urgency to his message.

The encyclical defended the right to private property and condemned socialism, but it also supported the right of workers to form labor unions for collective bargaining, insisting on the worker's right to a just wage and to decent working conditions. The pope made it clear that the Church has the right and the duty not only to teach the principles of justice, but also to apply its teachings to the temporal order, that is, "to point out the remedy" (n. 26). Indeed, the Church is not "so preoccupied with the spiritual concerns of her children as to neglect their temporal and earthly interests" (n. 28).

The Church's intervention, however, was not to be limited to the activities of the hierarchy and clergy. There was an important and indispensable place for the laity as well (nn. 54–55). At the same time, the state has its own proper role to play, but bound always by the Church's teachings on justice and human rights (nn. 32–49).

The encyclical inspired a century of papal, conciliar, and episcopal pronouncements, for example, Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno ("Forty Years After"), Paul VI's Octogesima Adveniens ("The Eightieth Anniversary"), and John Paul II's Centesimus Annus ("The Hundredth Year"). See also Catholic social teachings.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

rescript, a response to a question or request by proper ecclesiastical authority. The term is most often used to refer to a response given by the Holy See. The response might clarify a point of law or grant a dispensation or a privilege to one requesting it.

reservation, mental. See mental reservation.

reservation of the Eucharist, the practice of retaining the remainders of the consecrated bread and wine beyond the time of the Mass itself. According to the 1967 document, Eucharisticum Mysterium (Lat., "Eucharistic Mystery"), "the primary and original purpose of the reserving of the sacred species in church outside Mass is the administration of Viaticum." Viaticum is Communion for the dying. Other purposes for the reservation of the eucharistic foods include the distribution of Communion outside of Mass, as during the Liturgy of the Presanctified in Eastern rites and on Good Friday in the West. The eucharistic foods are reserved for the purposes of worshiping and adoring Christ, who remains present and available to communicants in his body and blood, even after the Mass itself has ceased. Normally, the eucharistic bread alone is reserved. Most Catholic churches reserve a modest supply of consecrated breads in a solid and secured tabernacle attached to an altar in a side chapel. Occasionally, consecrated wine may be reserved for specific purposes, e.g., the Communion of one unable to consume solid foods, but ordinarily its reservation is forbidden. The Catholic and Orthodox practice of eucharistic reservation stands in contrast to the practices and pieties of Protestant denominations. Ecumenical dialogues have suggested that Protestant Christians will, in charity, move toward greater reverence in the disposal of the eucharistic foods. Catholics and Orthodox have been asked to minimize devotional exaggerations, and to emphasize the primary purposes for eucharistic reservation. See also Blessed Sacrament; eucharistic devotions; Holy Communion; Viaticum. JEFFREY T. VANDERWILT reserved censures. See penal law.

reserved sins, those sins for which forgiveness of is reserved to a bishop or to one designated by the bishop, or even to the pope alone. The reservation of sins is basically a canonical rather than a theological issue. The first recorded appearance of a reserved sin occurred in England in the eleventh century. As canon law developed following the original codification by Gratian (d. ca. 1159), the regulations for the reservation of sins also became more specific. Reservation of certain sins depended on their gravity, and Germanic law influenced the way in which canon law defined such gravity. The revised code of canon law discusses the reservation of canonical penalties (cans. 1354–63) but abrogated former laws on the reservation of sins. Church law, not divine law, determines both reservation of sins and of penalties; consequently, such laws can vary from one period of time to another, and from one place to another. See also confession, auricular; Reconciliation; sin.

res et sacramentum (rez et sah-krah-men'toom; (Lat., "the reality and the sacrament"), in classical sacramental theology, a shorthand way of referring to the inner reality of a sacrament, as distinguished from its outward rite (sacramentum) and its ultimate purpose (res sacramenti). The res et sacramentum of the Eucharist, for instance, is the Real Presence of the body and blood of Christ. See also sacrament; sacramentum tantum; res tantum.

resignation, the loss of an ecclesiastical office by one's own initiative. Canon law (can. 187) recognizes resignation from office "for a just cause" as a right, to be exercised even by the pope. Although a papal resignation is not accepted by anyone, it must be manifested to those who are responsible for filling the vacancy of office (can. 332.1), namely, the College of Cardinals. A papal resignation takes effect immediately, but a pope who resigns could be eligible for reelection (can. 189.4). The older term for resignation is abdication. The first pope to abdicate was Pontian (235), and the last pope to resign was Celestine V (1294). See also abdication.

respondent, the nonpetitioning party summoned to a nonpenal ecclesiastical trial. Sometimes called the defendant, though more appropriately so in penal trials, the respondent must answer a legimately executed summons. Canonical procedures protect the rights of respondents to be heard and be informed throughout the trial.

Responsorial Psalm, the portion of a psalm sung in a responsorial manner between the first and the second readings from Scripture at Mass. To sing responsorially is to alternate between a response (or antiphon) sung by the entire assembly and a verse sung by cantor(s) or choir. Responses are either sentences from the designated psalm or some other biblical phrase appropriate to the day or occasion. See also psalmody; Psalms.

responsory, a liturgical chant that follows the reading from Scripture during the Liturgy of the Hours. Responsories follow this structure: A two-part sentence forms the response, followed by a scriptural verse and the "Glory be to the Father." An abbreviated response, i.e., only the second half of the response, concludes the chant.

res tantum (rez tahn'toom; Lat., ("the reality itself"), technical expression in classical sacramental theology that refers to the grace conferred by the sacrament and hence to its ultimate goal or purpose. In the case of the Eucharist, the res tantum is the unity of the Church and the indwelling of Christ in the soul of the communicant. See also sacrament; sacramentum tantum; res et sacramentum.

restitution, an act of commutative (or strict) justice by which the injury of another's right is repaired. The proper or formal source of the obligation to restore or to do something to repair harm that has been done is not the wrong of injustice as such, but rather the undue inequality that has been created by the injury. It can happen, for instance, that an inequality exists without there being any wrongful act of injustice on anyone's part—for example, a person in total good faith has what actually belongs to another.

Catholic tradition has recognized two proximate sources of restitution: the wrongful possession of another's goods and harm unjustly done to another.

Over the centuries a virtual encyclopedia of casuistry developed around the duty to restore. Undoubtedly this can be traced to the very complex situations in which people found themselves. For instance, for an obligation of restitution to exist as a result of unjust damage, three conditions were stipulated: (1) the action had to violate strict justice; (2) the action had to have been the efficacious cause of the injury; and (3) the action had to be theologically culpable.

By and large it can be said that the detailed treatises on restitution were composed for the direction of confessors who had to make sure that in forgiving a penitent they were not further harming the victim. Some of the solutions arrived at might strike modern readers as the kind of dogged and logical pursuit of judicial rules that occasionally compromised fairness. See also casuistry; justice.

restorationism, a pejorative term used to describe the effort of some church officials to restore Catholicism as fully as possible to its pre–Vatican II condition (before 1962). The restorationist agenda includes a powerful and unchallenged papacy, weak national episcopates, strong individual bishops uncritically loyal to the Holy See, traditional gender roles in ecclesiastical life and ministry, and a spirituality that separates the life of faith from the struggle for justice.

restrictive interpretation of law. See canon law, interpretation of.

Resurrection of Christ, Jesus' return to divine life with God on Easter (e.g., Rom 1:4). The Resurrection of Jesus is the basis for the Catholic belief that all faithful Christians will share a glorious, heavenly life with God (e.g., Phil 3:20–21; Rev 21:1–22:5).

Resurrection in the Time of Jesus: Most of the OT speaks only of this life. God rewards, punishes, protects, and rescues people from death while they are alive (e.g., Ps 23). By the time of Jesus, centuries of suffering, exile, and persecution had led some Jews, notably the Pharisees (e.g., Acts 23:6–8), to believe that God would raise up and reward good people who had suffered in this life. Dan 12:1–3 speaks of persons who had taught others holiness and were transformed like angels or stars. Stories of Jews who had suffered martyrdom for God promised that the martyr's tortured body would be given a new life with God (e.g., 2 Macc 7).

The Risen Christ; panel from the sixteenth-century Isenheim Altarpiece by Matthias Grünewald, Unterlinden Museum, Colmar, France.

Other Jewish teachers insisted that it was impossible to believe in resurrection because it was not part of the ancient tradition. Mark 12:18–27 describes Jesus arguing against such teachers, saying that it would be absurd to imagine that people in heaven had exactly the same physical bodies they have on earth. Jesus uses the imagery of Daniel to make the point that resurrection life is like that of angels, not of earthly humans. He suggests that when God spoke to Moses, God referred to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as living. Therefore, even the law teaches that God raises the dead.

Some passages in the OT speak as though God takes people into new life as soon as they die (e.g., Wis 3:1–9). Others look foward to a future judgment when God will punish the wicked and reward the righteous. Resurrection to new life with God is part of the future reward (e.g., Dan 12:1–3; 2 Macc 12:43–46). At that time, death will be abolished (e.g., Isa 25:6–9).

The Resurrection of Jesus: Since belief in resurrection was usually linked to the end of the world, Jesus' disciples did not expect to encounter the Risen Lord on Easter (e.g., Luke 24:13–35). Even in ancient times, skeptics accused the disciples of inventing the story of Jesus' Resurrection (e.g., Matt 27:62–66; 28:11–15). Christians have always insisted that the Resurrection of Jesus was unexpected, a new experience of God's saving power.

When Jesus was raised from the dead, he did not return to the human life he had lived with his disciples. Jesus returned to a divine life. Christians worship the Risen Jesus as Lord (Phil 2:6–11). They turn to Jesus in prayer (Heb 4:14–5:10; 1 John 2:1–2). The Holy Spirit, which inspires and shapes Christian life, is the spirit of the Risen Jesus (Rom 8:9–17; John 14:15–26). Throughout the NT, the Christian experience of living a new life in Christ depends upon the belief that Jesus was raised from the dead. Christians are baptized into Christ. Baptism is an experience of dying and rising with Christ (e.g., Rom 6:3–11; Eph 2:4–7). The Risen Christ is present at the Eucharist (Luke 24:30–32).

How did the disciples come to believe that Jesus rose from the dead on Easter? No one actually witnessed the corpse of Jesus returning to life or being taken out of the tomb. The proof came as a revelation from God. Some women, who had gone to mourn Jesus at the tomb, were told by an angel (e.g., Mark 16:7; Luke 24:5–7). Other disciples had visions of the Risen Lord (e.g., 1 Cor 15:3–8). When Paul saw the Risen Lord, he was firmly convinced that Christians were corrupting the Jewish tradition. He was persecuting the Church (e.g., Gal 1:13–16). One of Jesus' relatives, James, who did not believe during Jesus' lifetime, was apparently converted by a vision of the Lord (e.g., 1 Cor 15:7). The cases of Paul and James indicate that visions of the Risen Lord were not merely subjective wish fulfillment. All of the earliest witnesses are convinced that the one who appeared in this vision was Jesus of Nazareth, the human being who had died on the cross.

The earliest evidence for early Christian belief comes from the Letters of Paul. He refers to those who had seen the Lord, Jesus' heavenly exaltation, and the activity of the Spirit in the community. Paul does not use details of his own experience to prove the truth of Christian belief. The proof that God raised Jesus is found in the transformation of Paul's life from persecutor to apostle (Gal 1:13–17; 1 Cor 15:8–10). Several decades later the Gospel writers provided narrative accounts of appearances of the Lord.

Such stories are secondary to the belief that Jesus has been raised and is exalted as Lord. The differences in details, timing, place, and persons present show that these accounts are not dependent upon a single source. Some refer to Jesus appearing to disciples in Galilee (Mark 14:28; 16:7; Matt 28:16–20; John 21:1–14); others to appearances in Jerusalem (Matt 28:9–10; John 20:1–29; Luke 24:13–49). Each Evangelist has shaped the stories to suit the narrative emphases of the particular Gospel account. Though they do not provide eyewitness evidence for the Resurrection of Jesus, the Gospel narratives show what early Christians believed about Jesus' Resurrection.

Just as Paul claims that God called him to be an apostle through the vision of Jesus, so the Risen Jesus commissions the other disciples to preach the gospel (e.g., Matt 28:19–20; Luke 24:47–49). Other sayings refer to the foundations of the early community (e.g., John 20:21–23; 21:15–17). The stories in John and Luke also suggest a need to affirm the reality of the Risen Lord. John 20:24–29 contains an episode said to occur a week later. Thomas demands and receives tangible evidence that the Risen Lord is identical with the crucified Jesus. In Luke 24:36–43, physical evidence reassures the disciples, who initially think that they are seeing a ghost. By the second century some Christians held the false belief that Jesus was a divine being who had only used a body to appear in our world. His divine, spiritual self returned to God prior to the Crucifixion. The appearance narratives provided evidence for the Catholic arguments against this attempt to deny the humanity of the Savior.

Another story that only appears in the Gospel narratives concerns the tomb of Jesus. A visit by female disciples finds the tomb empty (Mark 16:1–8; Matt 28:1–8; Luke 24:1–10; John 20:1–2). Those Gospels in which Jesus' male disciples are still in Jerusalem report that Peter confirmed the women's account (Luke 24:12, 24; John 20:3–10). All the stories emphasize the perplexity caused by this discovery. Matt 28:13 alleges that enemies of Christianity spread rumors that the disciples had stolen the body. In John 20:2, 13, Mary Magdalene voices the suspicion that someone else has removed the body. An empty tomb of itself would not lead anyone to believe that Jesus was alive. However, the earliest traditions show that Christians believed that the Risen Jesus was the crucified person, not merely the inner spirit of the Lord. Therefore, early Christians certainly believed that the tomb of Jesus was empty. The glorious body of the Risen Lord (Phil 3:21; 1 Cor 15:22–23, 47–49) could not coexist with the corpse buried in the tomb.

Resurrection of the Believer: The earliest traditions about Jesus' Resurrection spoke of resurrection as glorification. Jesus assumes the divine name "Lord." Christians whose lives were shaped by the Risen Lord clearly expected to share the same heavenly life. However, 1 Cor 15 and 1 Thess 4:13–18 show that some early Christians were confused about whether and how resurrection applied to them. Christ's return as judge signals the resurrection of the dead and the transformation of the living from material to spiritual existence.

At the time of Jesus, resurrection was primarily considered a reward for those who had remained faithful to God. Occasionally, the wicked were said to be resurrected for judgment (e.g., John 5:28–29). Their fate is generally understood to be eternal death because they are separated from God's presence (e.g., Wis 5; Rev 20:4–15). 1 Thess 4 and 1 Cor 15 describe the gathering of the faithful at the end time. Their resurrected existence reflects the divine life of Jesus. Catholics do not believe that 1 Thess 4:13–18 refers to a gathering up of the righteous before the end of the world and the judgment, a phenomenon that many evangelical and fundamentalist Christians refer to as "the rapture."

Greek philosophers believed that human beings are composed of a mortal, material, and emotional bodily reality and an immortal soul, and have a rational element that is capable of learning truth and of acquiring moral discipline. Immortality of the soul is a consequence of its nature. Christians believe that the human person, body and soul, was created by God. Resurrection is not a natural consequence of perfecting human nature. It is a gift of God that represents the goal of the transforming work of God's Spirit (e.g., 1 Cor 15:42–55). Natural phenomena such as near-death experiences do not prove or disprove Catholic belief in the resurrection. Since Catholics believe that the whole person, including those elements of the person dependent upon our bodily and emotional individuality, is transformed in Christ, resurrection excludes the possibility of reincarnation. God perfects what remains imperfect and incomplete at the end of this life for those in who are "in Christ" (e.g., Rom 8:12–39; Phil 3:12–21). See also Easter; Jesus Christ; redemption; resurrection of the body.

Bibliography

Brown, Raymond E. The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus. New York: Paulist Press, 1974.

O'Collins, Gerald. What Are They Saying About the Resurrection? New York: Paulist Press, 1978.

Perkins, Pheme. Resurrection: New Testament Witness and Contemporary Reflection. Garden City: Doubleday, 1984.

Williams, Rowan. Resurrection. London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1982.

PHEME PERKINS

resurrection of the body (see Apostles' Creed) or of the dead (see Nicene Creed), the everlasting life of the whole human person. OT hope in resurrection (Wis 3; Job 19:25–27; Dan 12:2; 2 Mac 7:9, 14) was disputed among Jews in NT times (Mark 12:18–27; Acts 23:6–10). For Christians, this belief is grounded in the Resurrection of Jesus and is central to the faith, as evidenced in the appearance stories of the Gospels, the early kerygmatic formulas found in Acts, and the ancient creeds of the Church. In the Bible, the most extensive treatment of its nature and significance is in 1 Cor 15. Paul understands the raising of Jesus as the inauguration of the end time that brings God's judgment and promised salvation. In Christ, all shall be made alive. He is the first fruits; then at his coming, all believers (v. 23). Paul opposes those who deny the resurrection, but he does not advocate the idea of the immortality simply of the soul, a concept familiar in Greek philosophy of the time but very different from biblical thought, which views the human person as an integral whole. Here Paul is not interested in contrasting soul with body, but human life in its entirety as it is threatened by sin and death (flesh) with the new life of the Spirit.

It would be wrong simply to read the Pauline distinction flesh/spirit as body/soul. Our hope for eternal life is not based on an inherent immortality of the human soul, but on the life-giving Spirit of God, who alone is immortal and raises the dead. Human persons, not simply "souls," are saved by God and raised to new life. This will not be a resuscitation and prolongation of life as we know it. Even from a scientific point of view, what we call the body is an ever-changing constellation of atoms, none of which persist throughout a mortal life. Resurrection of the body does not mean the survival of a matrix of particular atoms, but identity and continuity of persons and lives in a process of final transformation.

The Resurrection Stories: The resurrection stories, which stress the bodiliness of the Risen Lord, are just as insistent that his body has been radically transformed. Paul concludes that God, who provides us with the kind of body appropriate to this life, will also transform it in a way appropriate to the new life of the kingdom of God (15:42–50). How this happens remains a mystery.

Christians of Paul's generation believed that the Lord's coming, and with it the resurrection of the dead, was imminent. As this expectation faded, the question about the fate of the faithful departed, still in their graves, became acute. Later NT writings offer assurance that they are with God, and gradually a Christian teaching, heavily dependent upon Greek philosophy, arose about the soul as the human self that survives after death, deprived, until the time of the final judgment and resurrection, from the complement of its body (councils of Toledo, 675; Lateran IV, 1215; Lyons II, 1274; Vienna, 1312; Florence, 1439; Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, 1979). Although any dualistic reading of a body/soul opposition, found in Western philosophy since Plato, is problematic, especially given the Church's own insistence upon the integrity and unity of the human person (Vatican II, Gaudium et Spes, n. 14), many Christians today speak of "saving one's soul," which, unlike the body, can "go to heaven." This view can lead to a depreciation of the body, individualism, and a flight from our responsibilities in this world. The biblical doctrine of the resurrection of the body can remind the Church that God does not wish to save our souls from this world, but to save our souls and our world from sin and death. The body symbolizes the connection that human beings have with each other and with the earth. Thus, the life of the resurrection must be seen in its communal and cosmic dimensions. There can be no salvation apart from the body, the community, and the world. The time of the resurrection is a subject of continuing theological dispute involving various understandings of history and eschatology. Some, like Karl Rahner (d. 1984), hold for resurrection at the time of individual death. Others, like Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, maintain a more traditional position, i.e., that it happens universally at the end of history. See also eternal life; Resurrection of Christ; salvation.

JOHN R. SACHS

resurrection of the dead. See resurrection of the body.

retreat, a personal or group withdrawal for prayer, meditation, or study. A retreat is both a place and a spiritual experience.

Almost a million people each year come to the six hundred retreat centers in the United States and Canada in search of religious experience. The phenomenon is repeated in many other countries as well. Often in solitude, sometimes in dialogue, retreatants are guided through reflections on life's mystery and meaning.

About 80 percent of these centers are run by religious orders of men and women. Each religious order has imprinted its unique spirituality on the programs at its retreat center. Programs range in length from a three-day weekend to a week or a month. The retreat movement was lay initiated and was begun in the late nineteenth century responding to a widespread need for formation in spirituality. The purpose of a retreat is religious awakening and the deepening of spiritual living. It is an invitation to prayerful listening and responding to the spirit of God in the contemporary world.

Reuchlin, Johannes (roykh'leen), 1455–1522, German humanist. Reuchlin championed the study of cabala and Jewish mystical literature, opposing the destruction of Hebrew books proposed by the Jewish convert Johannes Pfefferkorn and other Cologne Dominicans. Reuchlin's work stimulated the study of the OT in the original language. He was tried for heresy, and his satirical pamphlet Augenspiegel (Ger., "ophthalmoscope") was condemned by Pope Leo X in 1520. Though many Reformers took his side in the controversy, Reuchlin remained a loyal Catholic and tried to dissuade his grandnephew Philipp Melanchthon from drawing close to Martin Luther.

revelation (Lat., revelare, "to take away the veil"), the disclosure of persons, events, and things previously hidden or only partly known; ultimately, the self-disclosure of God. Against Gnostic claims that they enjoyed special revelations that added to the truth already manifested through Christ and his apostles, orthodox writers in the early Church insisted on the complete and once-and-for-all nature of NT revelation. But revelation (its existence, nature, and mediation) did not become a theological issue for many centuries. Not even the Council of Trent (1545–63) was as much concerned with revelation itself, which can be identified with "the gospel" that the council announced to be "the source of all saving truth and rule of conduct," as with its transmission through the inspired Scriptures and the various traditions going back to the apostolic age.

The debate about revelation really began with the emergence of deism at the end of the seventeenth century. Can or do we know everything that there is to be known about God, as well as about the nature and destiny of human beings, simply by using our natural, created powers of reason? Or did the coming of Christ reveal something substantially new?

In one of its two major documents, the First Vatican Council (1869–70) addressed the theme of faith, the human response to God's revelation. It taught that, by the light of human reason, both the existence of God and basic divine attributes can be certainly known (the "natural" way). But it insisted on the "supernatural" way by which God has revealed to humans the divine "mysteries" (plural) of which humans were ignorant. Through revelation humanity has been given a certain knowledge of other truths which humans alone would only imperfectly grasp. Vatican I, although it spoke of divine self-revelation, highlighted God's communication of truths previously unknown or at best only inadequately known. In this version of faith, human beings, with the help of the Holy Spirit and acknowledging God's supreme authority, give an intellectual assent to the divinely revealed truths.

Vatican II: Developments in biblical, liturgical, patristic, ecumenical, and philosophical studies, along with wider theological, cultural, and historical shifts, made it possible for Vatican II to produce richer teaching in its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum) of November 1965. At least eight points merit attention.

(1) Revelation is essentially God's self-communication, a loving and utterly gratuitous invitation to enter a dialogue of friendship (nn. 2–4, 14, 17). That self-revelation also has a content; it manifests truths about God and human beings that can be summarized as "the treasure of revelation" (n. 26) or "the deposit of faith" (n. 10).

(2) Human beings are called to respond in faith totally and not merely intellectually to the divine self-disclosure (n. 5). This dialogue of faith expresses itself in biblically based prayer (n. 25).

(3) The divine self-revelation is understood to be utterly centered on Christ, who is the Revealer and the Revelation (nn. 2, 4, 17). Although the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation refers twenty-three times to the Holy Spirit (e.g., nn. 4, 5), many Eastern Christians think its emphatic Christocentrism led it to neglect somewhat the role of the Spirit in revelation.

(4) From the outset the document considers revelation and salvation as practically synonymous: the "economy" of revelation coincides with the history of salvation and vice versa (nn. 3, 4, 6, 7, 14, 15, 17, 21). God's self-manifestation and gift of grace are two sides of the same coin, which can be expressed together as the divine self-communication (n. 6). The essentially salvific impact of revelation relates to its sacramental nature. Like the sacraments themselves, God's saving self-disclosure takes place through words, deeds, and events associated with the person of Christ (nn. 2, 4, 14, 17).

(5) The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation makes use of Pauline language to speak of the divine "mystery" (singular) disclosed in Christ—i.e., God's final plan of salvation for all human beings (n. 2). This unifying sense of the one, historic revelation contrasts with Vatican I's revealed "mysteries" (plural). This language shift has been maintained in the encyclicals and other major documents of Pope John Paul II. He consistently speaks of the one mystery of redemption or revelation in Christ.

(6) For the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, as well as for the Church's liturgy and the earliest Christian proclamation, revelation and salvation reached their full, definitive climax with the dying and rising of Christ, along with the coming of the Holy Spirit. It is neither with the Incarnation nor with the ministry of Jesus but with the Paschal Mystery that God "completed and perfected" revelation (n. 4).

While recognizing the fullness of foundational revelation "back there and then" with Christ and the apostolic Church, the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation does not relegate revelation simply to the past. Revelation remains a reality, which involves more than just a growing understanding of the full, divine self-disclosure in Christ (n. 8). The living voice of God continues to speak (nn. 8, 25). As a call to faith, the event of divine revelation is repeated every time God invites a human being into an interpersonal dialogue of friendship. This endlessly repeated event of divine self-disclosure remains dependent on the revelation completed through Christ (and his apostles) and adds nothing essential to its content.

(7) Much of the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (five out of six chapters) discusses the transmission of revelation (in its primary and secondary senses—as event and content, respectively) through the inspired Scriptures and tradition, understood to be strictly united in this process. The experience of spiritual realities enjoyed by the faithful (n. 8) appears as one factor in the growth of the Church's living tradition. But, in general, the document pays little attention to human and Christian experience, nor does it address the relationship between the transmission of revelation and the wider events of human history and world religions. Likewise it has little to say about the consummation of revelation at Christ's final coming (nn. 4, 7).

(8) The document does not develop the roles of the magisterium (the bishops) and theologians in transmitting, interpreting, and helping to actualize revelation. Yet it includes items of great importance: the magisterium "is not above the word of God but serves it" (n. 10); theologians should find the soul of their discipline in the study of the Scriptures (n. 24), the inspired record and interpretation of foundational revelation.

The Integral Doctrine: The Dogmatic Constitution Divine Revelation drew together most significant issues of Catholic doctrine and theology on divine self-manifestation. Respect for Vatican II's integral doctrine of revelation requires, however, that we incorporate the teaching on revelation found in other conciliar documents. At least three complex themes should be mentioned.

(1) Vatican II texts such as the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium, 1964), the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Ad Gentes Divinitus, 1965) and the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate, 1965) reflect on the knowledge of God found through other religions. These documents provide commentary on major world religions and the implications of Christ being "the true light" who "enlightens everyone" (John 1:9).

(2) Concern for the post–NT experience of revelation and salvation leads the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965) to examine various themes: the deeper questions and desires of the human condition itself (which open human beings to God's redeeming manifestation in Christ); the dynamics of history and world cultures; the present signs of the times through which, if they are interpreted in the light of the original gospel, humans can hear God speaking now; the mission of the Church in mediating to all people the saving revelation of God; and the way all things converge toward the final manifestation of Christ (nn. 39, 45).

(3) Along with the bishops, theologians have a special responsibility to discern the voices of our times (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 44). They should also constantly be concerned to use common language so as to communicate more adequately the essential truths of revelation (n. 62).

Post–Vatican II: Since Vatican II, official documents and dialogues of the Catholic Church have developed further teaching and reflection on at least two major themes concerned with revelation. The first is the way in which such primordial and universal experiences as that of suffering correlate with and can become privileged places where God speaks to and saves humanity; see, for instance, John Paul II's Dives in Misericordia (1980) and Salvifici Doloris (1984). Second, the role of non-Christian religions as imperfect and provisional ways of revelation and salvation has been addressed not only by such papal texts as Paul VI's Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975) and John Paul II's Redemptor Hominis (1979) and Dominum et Vivificantem (1986), but also in interfaith dialogues and much theological writing. Usually issues have been articulated in terms of salvation and grace. But any position taken on the means of redemption necessarily carries implications for a theology of revelation.

Finally, Avery Dulles, Aylward Shorter, and others have developed a theme that has preconciliar roots in the theology of Karl Rahner (d. 1984): revelation as God's symbolic self-communication. The Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation used the language of divine self-communication (n. 6); further, its sacramental version of revelation approached the language of symbolism. Contemporary theology of revelation speaks to an age that seems to be regaining a richer sense of the power and reality of symbols. The flourishing science of social communications can enrich the approaches to the divine self-communication found in Rahner's theology of grace and John Paul II's encyclical on the Holy Spirit (Dominum et Vivificantem). See also faith; revelation, biblical.

Bibliography

Dulles, Avery. Models of Revelation. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983.

O'Collins, Gerald. Fundamental Theology. Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1981.

Shorter, Aylward. Revelation and Its Interpretation. London: Geoffrey Chapman, 1983.

GERALD O'COLLINS

revelation, biblical (Lat., revelare, "to unveil"), the disclosure of what is hidden or obscure; theologically, the self-manifestation of God to humans. Divine revelation in word and deed is central to the OT. God's word is revealed through the Torah (Deut 6:20; 29:29), through self-manifestation to figures of destiny (Gen 12:1–3; 17:1–22; Exod 3:1–4:31), by prophetic calls (Isa 6:6–13; Jer 1:6–9; Ezek 3:1–11) with accompanying divine communications (Isa 1:10–31; Jer 2:1–4:4), and through the gift of divine wisdom to humans (Prov 2:6–15; Wis 7:7–8). Early creedal statements (Deut 6:20–25; 26:5–10; Josh 24:2–13), hymns (Exod 15:1–18), Psalms (Pss 78, 105, 106) and narrative accounts (Joshua-Kings) affirm God's self-disclosure in history. God is also revealed in the glory of nature (Pss 8, 104) and in religious experience, especially in a cultic setting (Pss 18:6; 48:9). In the postexilic period (after 539 B.C.) a distinct genre of literature developed, which contemporary scholars call apocalyptic (Gk., apokalypsis, "uncovering"). Arising among a persecuted and often marginalized people, apocalyptic literature is characterized by an emphasis on the hidden plan of God that explains the historical suffering of a people. This plan is revealed to a specific prophet or seer (e.g., Dan 7:15–16; 1 Enoch 1:1–2; 37:1–5), with assurance that God favors those persecuted (Dan 7:23–27) and with hope for future vindication through a final cataclysmic judgment (Dan 8:18–27; 12:1–13). Revelation in the NT builds on the OT. God is revealed in word (John 3:34; 6:63, 68), in history (Acts 7:2–53), and in religious experience (2 Cor 12:1–9), but all these assume a marked Christological focus (1 John 1:1–2). Jesus' life and teaching reveal God's nature and purpose (Acts 2:22–36) and Jesus becomes the preeminent "word" (John 1:1–18). Apocalyptic motifs are also very strong especially in Mark 13 (and parallel texts), in parts of Paul (1 Thess 4:13–5:11; 1 Cor 15:35–58) and in the book of Revelation (the Apocalypse). Essential to all expressions of revelation is the freely given self-communication of the hidden God which transcends human capacity, along with an invitation to enter more deeply into the divine presence and mystery. See also revelation.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

Reverend (Lat., reverendus, "worthy of respect"), a title used for the clergy since the fifteenth century. Bishops are addressed as "Most Reverend" and monsignors as "Reverend Monsignor." Older titles for monsignors were "Right Reverend" (for a domestic prelate) and "Very Reverend" (for a papal chamberlain). Abbesses, prioresses, and superiors of religious communities of women are often addressed as "Reverend Mother." The word is an adjective, not a noun. Therefore, the definite article "the" precedes it in formal correspondence.

revivalism, Catholic, a style of religion that stressed personal conversion, promoted by Catholic preachers, most often members of religious orders. This development was first noticeable in the Catholic Reform era that took place after the Protestant Reformation of the sixteenth century. Religious order preachers traveled across Europe conducting revivals, also known as parish missions. These missions or revivals stressed the need for personal conversion that would be ratified through reception of the sacraments of Penance and Eucharist. Like their Protestant counterparts, these revivals nurtured an evangelical piety that was rooted in the religious experience of conversion, but their emphasis on the sacraments of Penance and Eucharist gave this evangelical piety a decidedly Catholic quality.

Such revivals flourished in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; after a period of decline in the eighteenth century they experienced a renewal in the nineteenth century throughout the Catholic world. They declined once again in the mid twentieth century. See also parish mission.

reviviscence (ree-viv'uh-sens), a later, delayed reception of the grace of a sacrament once the obstacle to that grace—often seen as ignorance or a culpable resistance to the grace of the sacrament—has been removed. This teaching is especially applied to those sacraments that cannot be repeated because they impart a particular character: Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders. For example, after being baptized as an infant but never raised in the faith, individuals who undergo a conversion to Christ and the Church later in life cannot be rebaptized, but because of their conversion, the grace that had been "blocked" becomes operative in their lives. See also grace, sacramental; sacrament.

Revue Biblique, the oldest Catholic quarterly of biblical studies, edited at the École Biblique in Jerusalem and published in Paris. It covers archaeological, epigraphic, and patristic studies as well as exegesis. Founded in 1892, it continues to be a major scholarly journal. Articles are published in the major European languages. It maintains a regular archaeological chronicle that enables the researcher to follow the progress of excavations throughout a region on an annual basis.

Reynolds, St. Richard, ca. 1492–1535, Brigittine monk; canonized as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales. Learned friend of leading Catholic humanists, his refusal to take the oath of supremacy recognizing Henry VIII as supreme head of the Church in England led to his execution by hanging. Feast day: October 25. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

rhipidion (rih-pih'dee-ahn; Gk., "fan"), a Byzantine-rite flabellum or liturgical fan of wood or metal, also called hexapterygon (Gk., "six-winged") because it symbolizes and often bears the image of the six-winged Seraphim worshiping before the throne of God (Isa 6:2–3). The use of such fans in the liturgy dates from the fourth century. They are carried in processions and the deacons agitate them over the eucharistic gifts during the anaphora, or eucharistic prayer.

rhythm method. See natural family planning.

Ricci, Matteo, 1552–1610, scientist and Jesuit missionary to China. Born in the Papal States, Ricci joined the Jesuits (1571). In 1582 he studied Chinese language and culture, which he mastered to an extent unheard of by a foreigner. He entered China (1583) along with Michele Ruggier (1543–1607). Ricci attracted converts using Western science. Arriving at the imperial court (1601), Ricci became a favorite of the emperor and an important scientific and literary figure. He published in Chinese a catechism (1595), "On Friendship" (1595), "Twenty-Five Sayings" (1604), a work on ethics (1604), along with polemics against the Buddhists and translations of Euclid. In order to missionize, Ricci adopted the controversial method of adapting to Chinese culture, e.g., referring to God as the "Lord of Heaven," promoting the use of Chinese rites, and assuming the status and style of a mandarin. An acrimonious controversy between Jesuits and Dominicans about his methods followed his death, and his approach was definitively forbidden by Pope Benedict XIV in 1742. In 1939, however, Pope Pius XII reopened the case and declared the practices "licit and commendable." See also China, Catholicism in; Chinese rites controversy; inculturation.

Richard, Gabriel, 1767–1832, missionary. A Sulpician priest, he fled revolutionary France and came to the Old Northwest Territory as a missionary (1792). He labored throughout the Michigan Territory; he ministered to Native Americans, established schools, hospitals and churches, introduced the first printing press to Detroit, and published the first Catholic newspaper in the United States, The Michigan Essay (1809). One of the founders of the University of Michigan (1821), he served the institution as vice president, professor, and trustee. As Michigan's territorial delegate, he was the first Catholic priest to serve in the U.S. Congress. While caring for cholera victims, Richard died from the disease.

Richard of Chichester, St., ca. 1197–1253, bishop of Chichester. Having studied at Oxford, Paris, and Bologna, Richard served as chancellor of Oxford and later of Canterbury. He was noted for his generosity to the poor and his zeal in promoting clerical discipline. Feast day: April 3.

Richard of St. Victor, d. 1173, exegete, theologian, and disciple of Hugh at the abbey of St. Victor in Paris. His treatise De Trinitate (On the Trinity) stresses the empirical basis for the proof of God's existence and indicates that it is possible to arrive at the doctrine of the Trinity through speculative reasoning. Richard wrote treatises on Scripture such as Benjamin Maior, which emphasizes the biblical narrative as the basis for the ascent of the soul in contemplation. In De Quattuor Gradibus Violentae Caritatis Richard stresses love as the basis of all contemplation. See also contemplation; Trinity, doctrine of the; Victorines.

Richelieu, Armand Jean du Plessis, 1585–1642, French cardinal, minister of Louis XIII from 1624 to 1642. A defender of Catholicism and opponent of the Huguenots and Jansenists, Richelieu was interested mainly in strengthening French independence from Rome. He therefore sided with German and Swiss Protestant princes against the Catholic Habsburgs during the Thirty Years' War (1618–48), precluding Catholic restoration in Germany. See also Gallicanism.

Rienzo, Cola di, ca. 1313–54, Italian humanist who sought to restore ancient Roman glory during the Avignon papacy. Rienzo appointed himself tribune in 1347, but his dictatorial behavior and imperial pretensions led to his expulsion by the Roman nobility. Returning to Rome as senator in 1353, he again offended the people, who revolted and killed him in 1354.

Rievaulx (ree-voh'), Cistercian abbey in Yorkshire, England, founded 1131 by Walter Espec and monks sent from Clairvaux by Bernard. Rievaulx's third abbot, Aelred, presided over considerable growth and the building of a new church. The last abbot, Edward Kirkby, was removed by Henry VIII's Royal Commissioners, and the house was dissolved in 1538.

Rigby, St. John, d. 1600, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. A Catholic layman born in Lancashire, he was executed for refusing to attend Protestant services. Feast day: June 21. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

righteousness, a quality predicated in Scripture of both God and human beings. God is declared righteous (Exod 9:27; Jer 12:1; Ps 116:5) and is said to judge with righteousness (Isa 3:13; Ps 9:9; 98:9). This divine judicial quality becomes in postexilic writings that whereby God manifests divine salvific bounty in a sentence of acquittal (Isa 46:13, where "my righteousness" is parallel to "my salvation"). The Pauline understanding of God's righteousness echoes this postexilic understanding (Rom 1:17; 3:21–26; 10:3). The Hebrew equivalent of Paul's phrase is not found in the OT, but is known from Qumran texts (1QM 4:6; 1QS 11:12). Paul, however, uses the same phrase to describe the status of justified Christians, "that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor 5:21; cf. Phil 3:9). It thus denotes the gift of righteousness coming from God to human beings, an alien righteousness given to Christians by God as an effect of what Christ has done for humanity in his life, Passion, death, and Resurrection. Among NT writers Paul also speaks of human beings as righteous (Rom 5:19; Gal 3:11), by which he means the status of acquittal that sinners have acquired before God's tribunal through faith in the gracious merits of Christ Jesus. Matthew, too, speaks of the Christians' righteousness, denoting their moral conduct in keeping with God's will (Matt 3:5; 5:20; 6:1; 10:41; 21:32).

rights and obligations in canon law, those goods and benefits to which members of the Church are entitled together with the duties by which they are bound. Many of these rights and obligations are listed in the Western and Eastern codes of canon law. The primary listing for the rights and obligations of all the Christian faithful is found in canons 208–23 in the Western code and canons 7–26 in the Eastern code; these apply to all the baptized in full communion with the Catholic Church. In addition, because of their proper roles in the Church, there are listings of rights and obligations for laypeople alone, for clerics, and for religious. It is only after the post–Vatican II reform of canon law that we see such listings. The original contemporary enumeration was found in a document called the Lex Ecclesiae Fundamentalis ("Fundamental Law of the Church"), which was an attempt to write a legal constitution for the Church. Although the attempt was not successful, the list of rights and obligations from this proposal was used in both codes. These rights and obligations are virtually the same as those articulated in the documents of Vatican II, and much of the language the codes use is taken directly from those documents. Although articulated by the council, the bases for these rights and obligations are, for the most part, to be found either in the natural law (and thus they are common to all human persons) or in the dignity of Christians, which derives from their Baptism and from the nature of the Church (thus they are common to all those baptized in full communion with the universal Church). These rights and obligations are, therefore, neither granted as a concession nor imposed as a burden by ecclesiastical authority; they would exist whether or not they were specified in the code of canon law.

The rights and obligations include: the fundamental equality of all believers, the obligation to seek the truth, the right to freedom of inquiry, the obligation to remain in communion with the Church, the right to express pastoral needs and opinions to the pastors of the Church, the obligation to support the Church with material assistance, the right and duty to participate in the Church's missionary endeavors, the right to the Church's spiritual ministrations, the right to a Christian education, the duty to pursue holiness, the right to a good reputation, and the right to vindicate one's rights within the Church.

Given that clergy and laity, although sharing a fundamental equality, are seen as having different roles within the Church and within secular society, some of their rights and obligations differ. After a general list of rights and obligations applying to all the faithful, there are separate listings for the laity and the clergy found in both codes (see cans. 224–31, 273–89 in the Western code and cans. 399–409, 367–93 in the Eastern code). Some, though not all, of the rights and obligations in those lists are considered matters of Church discipline and tradition that are subject to change. As such, they are less fundamental than the rights and obligations mentioned above.

All rights and obligations form part of the context for the interpretation of other laws, and it would be a violation of canonical equity to disregard them in understanding canon law. It is important to note, however, that they are not always to be taken absolutely and in a manner indifferent to other rights, duties, and concerns for the individual and common good. One of the rights a member of the Church has is to vindicate rights. In the judicial area this right is well provided for in those places where the ecclesiastical tribunal system is functioning. In places where that system is not established, as well as in other areas of Church administration, the ability to vindicate rights has been, at times, more difficult because of the drawbacks of distance or confusion concerning the procedure to be followed, or outright resistance to it in principle. There was a proposal that the 1983 code establish administrative tribunals in order to ameliorate this situation. Although it was turned down, there is evidence of ongoing concern for the vindication of rights at the highest levels of Church administration. See also canon law, interpretation of; due process. JOHN F. LAHEY right to die, the claim that persons have a legal or moral right to die if and when they so choose. The phrase "right to die" is ambiguous. It may refer only to the choice to reject treatment or it may include the claim that (active) euthanasia is morally right and ought to be legally right as well.

The Catholic position is based on two essential moral distinctions. First, persons have an obligation to use "ordinary" means of preserving their lives, but are not required to use "extraordinary" means. The difference is based on the burdens and benefits of the treatment and of its results. This right of a dying person to be free of useless or overly burdensome treatment is sometimes called the right to die, and in this sense it is supported by Catholic moral theology.

Second, though persons may sometimes reject treatment, they may not directly kill themselves or be killed by others. The withholding and the withdrawing of extraordinary means of preserving life is not (active) euthanasia, nor is the sedation of a dying patient from pain, even if the medication indirectly hastens the moment of death. But persons may not intend to kill innocent persons or actually kill them. Some theologians suggest that euthanasia may in some cases be licit, but even most of these oppose its legalization because of the social harm it would cause. The Church has consistently opposed the movement to legalize euthanasia. If "the right to die" includes the option for (active) euthanasia, the claim is denied by Catholic moral teaching. See also euthanasia.

right to life, a term in general use to characterize the position of opponents of abortion. It also refers to a political advocacy group, the National Right to Life Committee (NRLC), formed in the late 1960s to combat abortion. The NRLC, formed and organized with substantial support and direction from the leadership of the U.S. Catholic Church, was and remains the largest antiabortion organization in the United States. The NRLC severed its formal connection with the Catholic Church in 1973 but continues to draw support from it. Right-to-life activists express their opposition to abortion by means of local protests and national political initiatives. See also abortion; civil law and morality; consistent ethic of life; pro-life movement.

rigorism, an attitude in moral theology whereby the law is always applied severely. Rigorism, strong among the Jansenists of the seventeenth century, offered an image of God as harsh and intimidating. For the rigorist, the only way to overcome human depravity was through "rigorous" obedience to the will of God as expressed in God's laws. See also Jansenism; laxism; tutiorism.

Rimini, Council of (359), council called, together with an Eastern council at Seleucia, by the Arianizing emperor Constantius to solve the Arian controversy. The majority of the four hundred bishops present approved the homoousios (Gk., "of one substance") for the Son, but subsequently, pressured by Constantius and the Arian delegation, the council reversed itself, accepting a vague formula (also approved at Seleucia) describing the Son as "like the Father according to the Scriptures." Use of ousia and cognates was banned. Jerome commented that "the whole world groaned, amazed to find itself Arian." See also Arianism; homoousios.

rings, metal (usually precious) bands worn on the finger(s) of the hand. Such insignia mark fully professed religious sisters, some members of male religious orders, and prelates such as bishops and abbots. The pope wears a special ring known as the "Fisherman's Ring." Traditionally such jewelry signified a symbolic marriage to the Church or to Christ. Couples exchange rings at marriage as a sign of mutual fidelity.

Rita of Cascia, St., 1381–1457 Italian widow and nun. She lived with a brutal husband until he was murdered. Then she became an Augustinian nun. She is the patron saint of desperate situations. Feast day: May 22.

rite, any repetitive ceremonial activity with fixed rules; also, a particular ritual ceremony ("the rite of Baptism"). The term "rite" is also used for a distinct liturgical family, comprising all the liturgical rites and usages of a particular tradition or historic liturgical family (e.g., Roman rite, Byzantine rite). This broad meaning of rite is to be understood not only in the external, ritual sense, but also as the particular ethos that sustains the rite, and which the rite expresses. Without this spirit that animates it and that alone justifies its celebration, the liturgy of a rite is little more than superficial ritualism. In pre–Vatican II Catholic usage, "rite" in this latter sense was also used to designate the particular Catholic tradition to which one belonged. Since Vatican II (1962–65), Catholic documents refer instead to the particular church.

In addition to the Roman (Latin) rite, there are seven Eastern Catholic rites (statistical estimates of their adherents in 1993 in parentheses): Armenian (142,853); Byzantine (8,840,000); Coptic (152,584); Ethiopian (118,550); Maronite (2,176,152); East-Syrian, including Chaldean (469,764) and Syro-Malabar (2,887,050); West Syrian, including Syro-Antiochene (100,245) and Syro-Malankara (281,868). See also Eastern rites; Latin rite; Roman rite.

rite, change of, an expression often used to mean transferring from one Catholic church to another of a different rite. Such transfers are governed by canon law and generally require the consent of the Apostolic See of Rome. In marriages where the spouses belong to different churches, the wife is free to transfer to the church of her husband.

There are at present twenty-one Eastern Catholic churches in full communion with the Apostolic See of Rome (e.g., the Chaldean, Maronite, Melkite, Ruthenian, Syro-Malabar, Ukrainian). Each of these churches possesses its own rite, which is described in the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches as the liturgical, theological, spiritual, and disciplinary patrimony peculiar to each church because of culture and historical circumstances. See also Eastern rites; rite.

RITE OF CHRISTIAN INITIATION OF ADULTS

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) is the liturgical and formational process of Christian initiation. The Rite of Christian Initiation was revised and restored in 1972 in accordance with the mandate of the Second Vatican Council (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 64) and by decree of Pope Paul VI. National statutes for the catechumenate were approved in the United States by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops in 1986. And, finally, the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults was mandated for use in the United States beginning on September 1, 1988.

A candidate for initiation into the Church, also known as a catechumen, stands with her sponsor (left) during the Rite of Election on the First Sunday of Lent, at which time she is deemed worthy of admission to the sacraments of initiation (Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist), to be administered at the Easter Vigil.

THE ORIGINS OF THE RCIA

During the first and second centuries there was no formal process of initiation into the Church. Faith in Jesus Christ and in God as Father of Jesus Christ, conversion of life-style, and signs of concern for the needy were the only requirements for Baptism. In time some elementary theology and moral instruction were imposed. The Didache (Gk., "The Teaching," an early document on Church practice from ca. 100) presents two ways: the way of life and the way of death. By the third century the process of initiation was formalized. In the Apostolic Tradition (ca. 215) Hippolytus defines two stages of preparation: those being introduced to God's word for the first time, called catecumeni (Lat., "catechumens") or audientes ("hearers"), and those who have been chosen for initiation. The latter had been observed by the community and deemed worthy of the sacrament.

Although the rites were always developing and fluctuating depending on the local church, a highly structured and unified rite of initiation evolved. A signing with the cross, claiming the inquirers for Christ, and welcoming them into the catechumenate constituted the first step in the process. Catechumens could have spent as many as three years in a period of catechetical, liturgical, and spiritual formation. The roles of catechists and sponsors were clearly defined: catechists were to explain the history of salvation from the beginning of time to the present, and sponsors were to walk the way of conversion with the catechumen and then testify to the catechumen's sincerity of intention and readiness to continue the process of initiation.

Thereafter, catechumens were urged to enter a more intense period of preparation, usually coinciding with the season of Lent. Once chosen, they were presented to the bishop and given a new name. Lent took the form for the whole community of a lengthy annual retreat before Baptism. The period was one of intense prayer, fasting, and continued study. The Apostles' Creed and the Lord's Prayer were handed over to the chosen. The Gospel stories of the Samaritan woman (John 4:16–42), the man born blind (John 9:1–41), and the resurrection of Lazarus (John 11:1–45) formed the basis of the scrutinies, the purpose of which is the strengthening of the catechumens' ability to overcome temptation as well as the purifying of their intentions.

An Easter Vigil baptism at Holy Cross Church, Onamia, Minnesota. Baptism is a climactic moment in the process of Christian initiation, the liturgical culmination of which is the Eucharist.

Tertullian (d. 225) and Hippolytus both identified the great vigil of Easter as the most appropriate time for Baptism. There was much diversity in how the churches celebrated Baptism, but among the consistent elements were the renunciation of Satan, the proclamation of the Apostles' Creed, prebaptismal anointings, the bath of new birth with a trinitarian profession of faith, bestowal of white garments, and anointing and imposition of hands. Following these initiatory rites the newly baptized were welcomed at the eucharistic table.

From the beginning there was a strong linkage between liturgy and catechesis. Catechetical readiness determined the time of the liturgical rite. The rites expressed what the catechumens were experiencing in their faith development. Certain core elements of the faith were not shared until the converts had been initiated. Catechesis on the Eucharist was only possible after full initiation. A period of mystagogia (Gk., "deepening of faith") provided the community with time to continue the formation of the newly baptized.

THE DECLINE OF INITIATION RITES

The fourth and fifth centuries saw an increase in the number of converts after Christianity became the official religion of the empire. This resulted in a shortened initiation process, relaxed requirements, and unverified conversions.

With the universal acceptance of infant Baptism during the fifth century and indiscriminate baptisms of conquered "barbarians," the adult catechumenate became nearly defunct. Despite efforts to renew the process, the catechumenate was relegated to one season of Lent, seven weeks at first, later only four. Only missionary territories retained some semblance of a process of initiation within a community context.

RITE OF CHRISTIAN INITIATION OF ADULTS

PERIOD OF EVANGELIZATION AND PRECATECHUMENATE
A time, of no fixed duration or structure, for inquiry and introduction to gospel values, an opportunity for the beginnings of faith.

FIRST STEP:
ACCEPTANCE INTO THE ORDER OF CATECHUMENS
The liturgical rite, usually celebrated on some annual date or dates, marking the beginning of the catechumenate proper, as candidates express and the Church accepts their intention to respond to God's call to follow the way of Christ.

PERIOD OF THE CATECHUMENATE
A time, in duration corresponding to the progress of the individual, for the nurturing and growth of the catechumen's faith and conversion to God; celebrations of the word and prayers of exorcism and blessing are meant to assist the process.

SECOND STEP:
ELECTION OR ENROLLMENT OF NAMES
The liturgical rite, usually celebrated on the First Sunday of Lent, by which the Church formally ratifies the catechumen's readiness for the sacraments of initiation and the catechumens, now the elect, express the will to receive the sacraments.

PERIOD OF PURIFICATION AND ENLIGHTENMENT
The time immediately preceding the elect's initiation, usually the Lenten season preceding the celebration of this initiation at the Easter Vigil; it is a time of reflection intensely centered on conversion, marked by celebration of the scrutinies and presentations, and of the preparation rites on Holy Saturday.

THIRD STEP:
CELEBRATION OF THE SACRAMENTS OF INITIATION
The liturgical rite, usually integrated into the Easter Vigil, by which the elect are initiated through Baptism, Confirmation, and the Eucharist.

PERIOD OF POSTBAPTISMAL CATECHESIS, OR MYSTAGOGY
The time, usually the Easter season, following the celebration of initiation during which the newly initiated experience being fully a part of the Christian community by means of pertinent catechesis and particularly by participation with all the faithful in the Sunday eucharistic celebration.

SOURCE: Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults: Study Edition, Liturgy Training Publications, 1988.

From the sixth through the ninth centuries parents of infants to be baptized were invited into a catechumenal process. In the sixteenth century there were attempts by Dominicans and Augustinians to restore an adult catechumenal process, if only for seven to forty days. In 1552 Ignatius of Loyola established catechumenate houses where converts gathered for three months.

Modern missionary efforts to renew the catechumenate were heroic, but all failed by the beginning of the twentieth century. The only place that kept a catechumenal model alive was North Africa, where the White Fathers recognized the need to build the Church from the grass roots. North Africa's experience drew the attention of the European churches, especially of France, with its large number of nonpracticing Catholics. The revival of the catechumenate in Africa and Europe was the principal basis for the Vatican's reinstatement of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

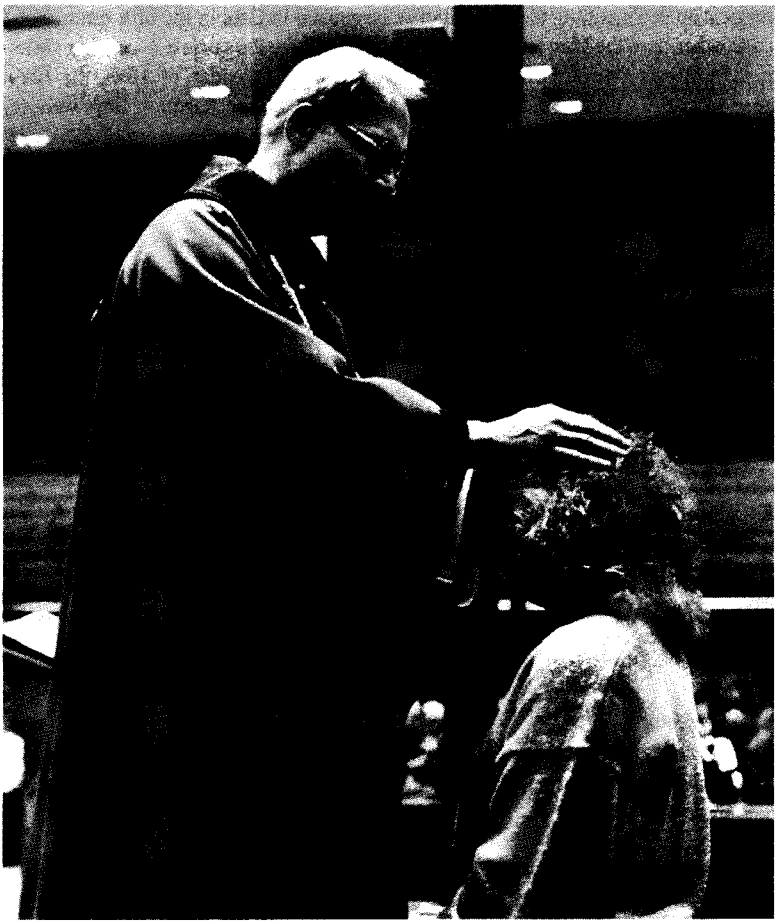
THE REFORM OF VATICAN II

The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) mandated the restoration of an adult catechumenate, and in 1974 a provisional text was published for use in the United States. The reinstatement of the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults restored a vision of Christian community embraced by the early Church, the vision of a people with conversion as its primary focus, the faith community as its context, and discipleship as its goal. The Church recognized once again that conversion cannot be artificially induced, that motives for initiation must be questioned and evaluated, and that the whole community needs to be renewed. "The initiation of catechumens is a gradual process that takes place within the community of the faithful. By joining the catechumens in reflecting on the value of the Paschal Mystery and by renewing their own conversion, the faithful provide an example that will help the catechumens to obey the Holy Spirit more generously" (RCIA, n.4).

There was a major shift also in the understanding of who is responsible for initiation: "the people of God, as represented by the local Church, should understand and show by their concern that the initiation of adults is the responsibility of all the baptized" (RCIA, n.9). The rite reclaims the roles of catechists, sponsors, godparents, the pastor, and the whole faith community. While each individual's ministry is unique, it is part of a fuller, more comprehensive process of initiation.

PASTORAL REFLECTIONS

The RCIA was designed specifically for the initiation of unbaptized persons. These, and only these, are called catechumens upon entrance to the catechumenate. The rite also supports preparation of baptized uncatechized Catholic adults for Confirmation and the Eucharist, and for other baptized Christians seeking full communion with the Catholic Church. However, all these people are called candidates, and the document clearly states that the dignity of their Baptism is to be respected.



A priest lays his hands on the head of a catechumen during a Lenten ceremony known as the scrutinies, intended to purify the catechumen's mind and heart, to strengthen her against temptation, to purify her intentions, and to solidify her decision to enter the Church.

The 1988 mandate decreed that whenever an adult or anyone of catechetical age is prepared for Baptism, the RCIA is to be used. The RCIA, therefore, has become the norm of formation. Consequently, it has had impact on the process of preparation for all the other sacraments by emphasizing the need for evangelization, by introducing liturgical and lectionary catechesis, and by contributing to a catechumenal model of the Church, which includes also a call to conversion, personal and communal prayer, and participation in apostolic activities.

See also Baptism; catechumenate; conversion; Easter Vigil; Holy Week; Lent.

Bibliography

Duffy, Regis. On Becoming Catholic: The Challenge of Christian Initiation. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1984.

Duggan, Robert, ed. Conversion and the Catechumenate. New York: Paulist Press, 1984.

Ivory, Thomas P. Conversion and Community: A Catechumenal Model of Total Parish Formation. New York: Paulist Press, 1988.

Morris, Thomas H. The RCIA: Transforming the Church: A Resource for Pastoral Implementation. New York: Paulist Press, 1989.

Yarnold, Edward. The Awe-Inspiring Rites of Initiation: Baptismal Homilies of the Fourth Century. Slough, England: St. Paul Publications, 1972.

Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults: Study Edition. Chicago: Liturgy Training Publications, 1988.

BEVERLY M. BRAZAUSKAS

Ritual, Roman, a liturgical book containing those special rites and blessings, other than the Mass, that are commonly performed by priests. One of the last books to be revised since Vatican II (1962–65), the Roman Ritual is now called the Book of Blessings. The rites and blessings have been newly revised for use in Christian assemblies, large or small, actively participating, with simple and clear vernacular prayers and gestures. The revised rites are marked by a more prolific use of Scripture. See also blessing; liturgical books.

Robert Bellarmine, St. See Bellarmine, St. Robert.

Robert of Melun, d. 1167, English logician, theologian, and bishop of Hereford from 1163 to 1167. A student of both Peter Abelard and Hugh of St. Victor, Robert founded his own school at Melun in France in 1142 and taught theology there until recalled to England by Henry II in 1160. Robert promoted the development of theology as a science, especially through his teaching and writing, e.g., his Sentences (1152–60).

Robert of Molesmes, St. (moh-lem'), ca. 1027–1111, abbot of Molesmes and cofounder of Cîteaux. He left the monastery of Molesmes, which he had founded, when its life-style became lax to found Cîteaux, later the motherhouse of the Cistercian order. He eventually returned to Molesmes. Under Robert's leadership, Molesmes became a famous Benedictine center. See also Cîteaux.

Roberts, St. John, ca. 1577–1610, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Raised a Protestant in Wales, he joined the Benedictines and was ordained in 1602. Especially known for his services during the London plague of 1603, he was arrested and expelled from England a number of times before he was executed in 1610. Feast day: December 9. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Roch, St. (rahk), 1350–80, French layman, devoted to the care of plague victims. He is invoked against epidemics. Feast day: August 16.

Rogation Days, days of special public intercession in the Roman liturgy, marked by litanies and processions. The Great Litany, held on April 25, originated in Rome in the fourth century; the Lesser Litanies originated in Gaul in the fifth century and were held on the three days before Ascension Thursday. In the Roman Calendar of 1969, the Great Litany was abolished. The Rogation Days were retained, though the time and manner of their celebration was left to episcopal conferences. See also Litany of the Saints.

Rolle, Richard, ca. 1300–49, English hermit and author of biblical commentaries and didactic treatises on prayer, asceticism, and mystical experience. His works include his letters to those under his spiritual direction and his Latin treatise Incendium Amoris ("Fire of Love"). Rolle was an enormously popular English mystical writer in the late Middle Ages. See also English Mystics.

Roman Catholic, an alternate post-Reformation designation for a member of the Catholic Church. Before the sixteenth century the Church universal was simply the Catholic Church. The adjective had its origin in Ignatius of Antioch (early second century) and was found also in the writings of the early Fathers of the Church and in the creeds. When the authority of the Bishop of Rome became a source of contention between West and East in the eleventh century, and between Catholics and Protestants in the sixteenth, the adjective "Roman" served to distinguish those Christians who remained in union with Rome from those who did not.

However, the adjective "Roman" tends to confuse rather than define the reality of Catholicism. The history of the Church begins with Jesus' gathering of his disciples and with the eventual post-Resurrection commissioning of Peter to be the chief shepherd and foundation of the Church—in Jerusalem and in Caesarea Philippi, not in Rome. Therefore, it is not the Roman primacy that gives Catholicism its distinctive identity within the family of Christian churches, but the Petrine primacy.

The adjective "Roman" applies more properly to the diocese of Rome than to the worldwide Church that is in union with the Bishop of Rome. Indeed, it strikes some as contradictory to call the Church Catholic and Roman at one and the same time.

Eastern-rite Catholics who are in union with Rome (sometimes pejoratively called "Uniates") also find the adjective "Roman" objectionable. They prefer to speak of their churches as Catholic and then to distinguish particular ecclesial traditions

(e.g., Roman, Byzantine, Maronite) within the Catholic communion. In addition to the Latin, or Roman, tradition, there are seven other non-Latin, non-Roman ecclesial traditions: Armenian, Byzantine, Coptic, Ethiopian, East Syrian (Chaldean), West Syrian, and Maronite. See also Catholic Church; Catholicism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern rites. RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Roman Catholic Church. See Catholic Church.

Roman Catholicism. See Catholicism.

Roman congregations, major departments or offices through which much of the executive business of the Holy See is conducted. The congregations are an important part of the Roman Curia, which assists the pope in his responsibilities governing the universal Church. Each is presided over by a cardinal-prefect assisted by an archbishop-secretary who is second in command. These, in turn, are assisted by a number of functionaries who handle the day-to-day business. The actual members of the congregations are cardinals and bishops drawn both from those resident in Rome and those living elsewhere. The cardinals are also chosen in such a way that an individual cardinal might be a member of a number of congregations whose concerns overlap. A full meeting of a congregation is called a plenarium and discusses more important matters.

The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (formerly the Holy Office) is concerned with matters touching upon doctrine. The Congregation for Bishops deals with bishops and their ministry. The Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (also called Propaganda, from Propaganda Fide, Lat., "Propagation of the Faith") handles the Church's missionary activity. The Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and for Societies of Apostolic Life covers religious communities and other similar groups publicly recognized by the Church. The Congregation for the Oriental Churches relates to those Eastern churches in communion with Rome. The Congregation for the Clergy deals with the life and ministry of clerics and with catechetical matters. The Congregation for Catholic Education (also called "for Seminaries and Universities") handles the Church's schools. The Congregation for the Causes of Saints oversees the processes of beatification and canonization. The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments oversees public worship and dispensations from clerical obligations. See also Roman Curia. JOHN F. LAHEY

Roman Curia, bureaucracy that assists the pope in his responsibilities of governing the universal Church. Although early in the history of the Church bishops of Rome had assistants to help them in the exercise of their ministry, it was not until 1588 that formal organization of the Roman Curia was accomplished by Pope Sixtus V. The most recent reorganization of the Curia was completed in 1988 by Pope John Paul II in the apostolic constitution Pastor Bonus.

The Curia is organized into offices of various ranks and importance. Chief among them is the Secretariat of State, which not only deals with diplomatic relations with various states, but also is in charge of the overall supervision of the other departments (discateries) of the Curia. These include various councils, tribunals, and prefectures that handle matters ranging from the economic patrimony of the Holy See to the liturgical celebrations of the pope. The higher officials of the Curia are cardinals or archbishops.

In relatively recent times, beginning especially under Pope Paul VI (d. 1978), the Curia has become more internationalized as the number of officials, even higher officials, from countries other than Italy grows. Some concern that more women be included among curial officials has been addressed, though the tradition that higher officials be archbishops or cardinals has meant that the few women in positions of leadership currently cannot aspire to higher positions. With a growing emphasis on the role of the local (diocesan) church, concern has also been expressed over the centralizing tendency of a large curial operation.

The offices and officials of the Roman Curia are listed in the official publication Annuario Pontificio. See also Pastor Bonus; Vatican. JOHN F. LAHEY

I. THE SECRETARIAT OF STATE TO HIS HOLINESS:

Assists the pope in the care of the universal Church and in his dealings with the Roman Curia.

First Section: For General Affairs:

Assists the pope in matters not within the competence of other dicasteries, or departments, within the Roman Curia and coordinates the activities of, and fosters relations with, these other departments and also with the bishops and with the diplomatic missions of the Holy See.

Second Section: For Relations with States:

Formerly the Council for Public Affairs of the Church. Assists the pope in all matters relating to civil governments, diplomatic relations of the Holy See with other governments, and diplomatic missions of the Holy See.

II. THE CONGREGATIONS

Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith:

Responsible for the safeguarding of Catholic faith and morals, for all matters pertaining to the Petrine Privilege, or "privilege of the faith" (dissolution of a valid and consummated marriage between a baptized and an unbaptized person), and for safeguarding the dignity of the sacrament of Reconciliation, or Penance. Attached to this Congregation are the Pontifical Biblical Commission and the International Theological Commission.

Congregation for the Causes of Saints:

Responsible for all matters pertaining to the beatification and canonization of saints and the preservation of relics.

Congregation for the Oriental Churches:

Responsible for all matters pertaining to persons, discipline, or rites of the Oriental churches (Eastern-rite Catholic churches in communion with Rome), with authority over territories in which the majority of Catholics belong to Eastern rites (e.g., Egypt, Greece, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria) and over minority communities of Oriental Catholics, no matter where they live.

Congregation for Bishops:

Responsible for all matters having to do with the naming of bishops and the establishment of dioceses and provinces, except what is subject to the authority of the Congregation for the Oriental Churches and the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of the Sacraments:

Responsible for all matters pertaining to the seven sacraments, except what is specifically reserved to the authority of other offices of the Holy See, particularly the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. It deals with the causes for nullifying ordinations and for granting dispensations from the obligations of ordination to deacons and priests.

Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples or for the Propagation of the Faith:

Responsible for the direction and coordination of missionary work throughout the world, including the proposing of candidates for bishop, the establishment of episcopal conferences, and the mobilizing of financial support for missionary activity.

Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and for Societies of Apostolic Life:
Responsible for institutes of religious, societies of the apostolic life, Third Orders, and secular institutes. It is divided into two sections; the second is responsible for societies of the apostolic life; the first is responsible for the rest.

Congregation for the Clergy:
Responsible for everything pertaining to clergy and the clerical life. It is divided into three sections; the first is concerned with diocesan priests; the second, with preaching, catechesis, and religious education; the third, with the temporal goods of the Church, except where other Congregations have authority over them.

Congregation for Catholic Education:
Responsible for all that pertains to the formation of the clergy and the Catholic education of both clergy and laity. It is divided into three sections; the first is concerned with seminaries and whatever concerns the education of diocesan clergy, and with the formation of religious and secular institutes; the second, with Catholic universities and institutes of higher learning; the third, with parochial and diocesan schools and other educational institutes below the level of a university.

III. TRIBUNALS

Apostolic Penitentiary:
Has authority over anything pertaining to the internal forum (i.e., matters of conscience) and to the granting and use of indulgences.

Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura:
The supreme court of the Church and of Vatican City State. It is divided into two sections; the first is concerned with the proper administration of justice and other matters assigned to it by the code of canon law; the second, with matters referred to it, including the resolution of conflicts of authority among various departments of the Holy See.

Sacred Roman Rota:
Hears appeals from decisions of lower tribunals, primarily on matters pertaining to the nullification of marriages.

IV. PONTIFICAL COUNCILS

Pontifical Council for the Laity:
Responsible for the apostolate of the laity and their participation in the life and mission of the Church.

Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity:
Responsible for relations with non-Catholic Christian communities and with Judaism (via the Commission for Religious Relations with Jews) and promotes ecumenical dialogue and other activities.

Pontifical Council for the Family:
Responsible for the promotion of family life.

Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace: Responsible for the promotion of justice and peace, especially through the social teachings of the Church.

Pontifical Council "Cor Unum":
Provides information and coordinating services for Catholic aid and human development organizations and projects throughout the world.

Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerants:
Concerned with pastoral assistance to migrants, nomads, tourists, and sea and air travelers.

Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of the Health Care Apostolate: Fosters the work of formation, study, and action by international Catholic health-care organizations.

Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts:
Provides official interpretation of the universal laws of the Church.

Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue:
Responsible for relations with non-Christian religions and for promoting study of, and dialogue with, them. The Commission for Religious Relations with Muslims is attached to the Council.

Pontifical Council for Dialogue with Nonbelievers:
Studies atheism and promotes dialogue with nonbelievers.

Pontifical Council for Culture:
Responsible for promoting dialogue between the Church and the many cultures of the world.

Pontifical Council for Social Communications: Responsible for matters pertaining to the communications media.

V. OFFICES

Apostolic Camera:
Cares for and administers the temporal goods and rights of the Holy See during a vacancy in the papal office.

Prefecture of the Pontifical Household:
Responsible for the Apostolic Palace, including the papal chapel, for papal audiences, papal trips outside the Vatican, and nonliturgical papal ceremonies.

Administration of the Patrimony of the Holy See:
Responsible for the estate of the Holy See under direction of papal delegates. It is divided into two sections; the Ordinary Section performs regular administrative tasks assigned to it; the Extraordinary Section fulfills duties assigned to it by the pope.

Central Office of Statistics:
Gathers and organizes statistics relevant to the condition and mission of the Church.

Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See:
Coordinates and supervises the administration of the possessions of the Holy See.

Office of Pontifical Ceremonies:
Responsible for everything pertaining to liturgical and other sacred ceremonies done by the pope or in his name.

Archives of the Second Vatican Council:
Maintains records and documentation pertaining to the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

VI. COMMISSIONS AND COMMITTEES

Commission "Ecclesia Dei":
Responsible for facilitating the return of full communion with the Catholic Church those priests, seminarians, and religious who went into schism with the late Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre (d. 1991).

Commission of the Roman Curia:
Responsible for matters of discipline.

Council of Cardinals for the Study of Organizational and Economic Problems of the Holy See:
Responsible for monitoring the financial problems of the Holy See.

International Theological Commission: Advises the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on matters pertaining to Catholic theology and doctrine.

Commission of Cardinals for the Pontifical Shrines of Pompeii, Loreto, and Bari:
Responsible for the care of these three shrines.

Pontifical Biblical Commission: Advises the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith on matters pertaining to the study and interpretation of the Bible.

Pontifical Committee for the International Eucharistic Congresses: Responsible for international eucharistic congresses.

Pontifical Commission for the Revision and Emendation of the Vulgate: Responsible for matters pertaining to the Latin Vulgate Bible.

Pontifical Commission for Vatican City State: Responsible for the care of Vatican City State.

Pontifical Commission for Sacred Archaeology: Responsible for matters pertaining to archaeological exploration of Christian antiquity.

Pontifical Committee for Historical Sciences:
Responsible for matters pertaining to the history of the Church.

VII. INSTITUTIONS CONNECTED WITH THE HOLY SEE

Vatican Secret Archives:
Responsible for the care of Vatican documents not open to public review, but since 1881 open to scholars.

Vatican Apostolic Library:
Responsible for the care of the Vatican libraries.

Pontifical Academy of Sciences:
Honors pure science and its practitioners, promotes freedom of pure science, and fosters research.

Vatican Radio: Responsible for the operation of Vatican Radio.

Vatican Television Center:
Responsible for the operation of Vatican Television.

Fabric of St. Peter's: Responsible for the administration, care, and preservation of St. Peter's Basilica.

Office of Papal Charities:
Distributes alms and aid in the name of the pope.

Vatican Polyglot Press:
Responsible for all printing done by the Vatican.

Vatican Publishing House: Responsible for the preparation of books and other documents for publication.

Institute for the Works of Religion:
Responsible for the banking and administration of funds for the work of religion.

L'Osservatore Romano:
The daily newspaper of the Holy See.

Press Office:
Handles day-to-day relations with the world's communications media.

Commission on Latin America:
Concerned with matters pertaining to the Church in Latin America. Attached to the Congregation for Bishops.

Commission for the Preservation of the Artistic and Historic Patrimony of the Church:
Responsible for the care and preservation of the artistic and other historic possessions of the Holy See.

Commission on Russia: Responsible for all ecclesiastical matters pertaining to Russia. Attached to the Secretariat of State.

Commission on Religious Relations with Jews:
Responsible for dialogue and the fostering of ecumenical contacts with Jews. Attached to the Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

Commission on Religious Relations with Muslims:
Promotes, regulates, and interprets relations with Muslims. Attached to the Council for Interreligious Dialogue.

Commission for the Protection of the Historical and Artistic Monuments of the Holy See:
Responsible for the protection of the artistic and other historic possessions of the Holy See.

Commission for the Preservation of Faith, Erection of New Churches in Rome:
Responsible for matters pertaining to the faith of Catholics in Rome and for the building of new churches in the city.

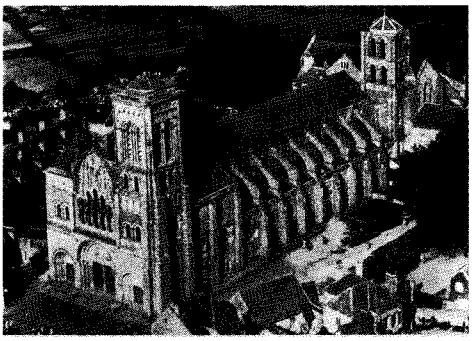
Labor Office of the Apostolic See:
Responsible for those who are employed by the Holy See and for settling labor disputes with them.

Catechism Commission:
Responsible for the drafting and translations of the Catechism of the Catholic Church (published in 1992; English translation, 1994).

Roman Empire, the territory around the Mediterranean and in Europe that was ruled by Rome from the first century B.C. to the fourth century A.D. Ancient Christian historians often pointed out the coincidence of Christ's birth with the reign of Augustus (27 B.C.–A.D. 14), the first emperor, but Christian attitudes regarding the empire varied. The book of Revelation pictures Rome as "Babylon the great . . . drunk with the blood of the saints . . ." (17:5–6). Hippolytus (d. ca. 236), among others, agreed, and Revelation continued to inspire apocalyptic protest in groups as diverse as the Montanists and Donatists, but more often Christians protested imperial policy toward Christians along with various aspects of imperial culture without actually impugning the empire itself as evil. This is the attitude of the Apologists, and even Tertullian (d. ca. 225) insists that Christians pray for the good of the empire (although his fellow African Minucius Felix denounced it altogether). Origen (d. ca. 254), while exhorting his students and congregation to martyrdom and himself dying as a result of torture, nevertheless felt that the empire had a providential character, intended by God to make it easier to "Go and teach all nations," as Jesus had commanded. Eusebius of Caesarea (d. ca. 340) agreed, extending this logic in the wake of Constantine's accession and portraying the Constantinian empire as the fulfillment of God's intentions from the time of Augustus and Christ. In the West, Ambrose (d. 397) and Prudentius (d. ca. 410) represent this view (somewhat modified), but Augustine (d. 430) came to be much less sanguine, regarding the empire, Christian or not, as at best a neutral reality where the destinies of the City of God and the city of this earth were ambiguously intertwined.

At any rate, despite the antipagan legislation of Theodosius I, Christians at the end of the fourth century had no reason to believe any given emperor would be Christian. The fourth century had seen a succession of Arian emperors, and the memory of Julian's pagan revival loomed large. It is not until the time of the Council of Ephesus (431) that one can begin to think of a "Christian" empire. In the East the "Byzantine" empire survived until the fall of Constantinople in 1453; in the West it soon gave way to the new Germanic kingdoms, but the imprint of the empire persisted even there, in the organization and polity of the Western Church. The diocese as an ecclesiastical territorial unit had its precedent in Roman civil territorial divisions; the insignia of Roman officials passed into use among the various ranks of clergy; and regulations for transfer and promotion of clergy were patterned after those for Roman civil servants. The legacy of Roman law was especially enduring in the area of appeals procedures, procedures for councils, marriage regulations, and the structure of papal legislative authority. See also Constantine, the Great; persecutions; Rome.

JOHN C. CAVADINI



The Romanesque basilica of Vézelay, France, with its characteristically thick walls, barrel vaults, and relatively simple ornamentation.

Romanesque style, an architectural term designating the church architecture that emerged in the West ca. A.D. 1000. Characterized by massive, thick walls and piers, relatively small windows, and heavy barrel vaults and arches, Romanesque architecture derives from a style that looked similar to Roman architecture. See also Catholicism and architecture.

Romanian Catholic Church, the Byzantine Catholic community centered in Transylvania, one of the three major regions of modern Romania. It is the counterpart of the Romanian Orthodox Church.

Early History: Transylvania became part of Hungary in the early eleventh century. Although the principality was home to large numbers of Hungarians and Germans who were mostly Latin Catholics, Orthodox Romanians made up the majority of the population. Soon after the province was taken by the Turks in the sixteenth century, Calvinism gained ground among the Hungarians and Lutheranism among the Germans.

In 1687, the Habsburg emperor Leopold I drove the Turks from Transylvania and annexed it to his empire. It was his policy to encourage the Orthodox faithful within his realm to become Byzantine Catholics. For this purpose the Jesuits began to work as missionaries among the Transylvanian Romanians in 1693. Their efforts, combined with the denial of full civil rights to the Orthodox, and the spread of Protestantism in the area, which caused growing concern among the Orthodox clergy, all contributed to the acceptance of a union with Rome by Orthodox metropolitan Atanasie of Transylvania in 1698. He later convoked a synod that formally concluded the agreement on September 4, 1700.

At first this union included most of the Romanian Orthodox in the province. But in 1744, the Orthodox monk Visarion led a popular uprising that sparked a widespread movement back toward Orthodoxy. In spite of government efforts to enforce the union with Rome—even by military means—resistance was such that Empress Maria Theresa reluctantly allowed the appointment of a bishop for the Romanian Orthodox in Transylvania in 1759. In the end, about half of the Transylvanian Romanians returned to Orthodoxy.

It proved difficult for the new Byzantine Catholic community, known popularly as the "Greek Catholic Church," to obtain in practice the religious and civil rights that had been guaranteed it when the union was consummated. Bishop Ion Inochentie Micu-Klein, head of the Greek Catholic Church from 1729 to 1751, struggled with great vigor for the rights of his church and of all Romanians within the empire.

The Romanian Greek Catholic dioceses had originally been subordinate to the Latin Hungarian primate at Esztergom. But in 1853 Pope Pius IX established a separate metropolitan province for the Greek Catholics in Transylvania. The diocese of Fagaras-Alba Iulia was made the metropolitan see, with three suffragan dioceses at Gherla (Cluj), Lugoj, and Oradea. Since 1737 the bishops of Fagaras had resided at Blaj, which had become the church's administrative and cultural center. Romanian Greek Catholic synods were held at Blaj in 1872, 1882, and 1900, which drafted legislation governing the life of the church.

At the end of World War I, Transylvania was united to Romania, and for the first time Greek Catholics found themselves in a predominantly Orthodox state. By 1940 there were five dioceses (a fifth diocese had been erected at Maramures in 1930), over 1,500 priests (90 percent of whom were married), and about 1,500,000 faithful. Major seminaries were functioning at Blaj, Oradea, and Gherla. The Pontifical Romanian College in Rome received its first students 1936.

From World War II to the Present: But the establishment of a Communist government in Romania after World War II proved disastrous for the Romanian Greek Catholic Church. On October 1, 1948, thirty-six Greek Catholic priests met under government pressure at Cluj-Napoca. They voted to ask for reunion with the Romanian Orthodox Church and to terminate the union with Rome. On October 21, it was formally abolished at a ceremony at Alba Iulia. On December 1, 1948, the government issued a decree that dissolved the Greek Catholic Church and gave over most of its property to the Romanian Orthodox Church. The six Greek Catholic bishops were arrested on the night of December 29. Five of the six later died in prison. In 1964 the bishop of Cluj-Gherla, Juliu Hossu, was released but placed under house arrest in an Orthodox monastery, where he died in 1970. Pope Paul VI revealed in 1973 that he had made Hossu a cardinal in pectore (Lat., "in the breast," or secretly) in 1969.

After forty-one years underground, the fortunes of the Greek Catholic Church in Romania changed dramatically after the Ceausescu regime was overthrown in December 1989. On January 2, 1990, the 1948 decree that dissolved the church was abrogated. Greek Catholics began to worship openly again, and three secretly ordained bishops emerged from hiding. In March 1990, Pope John Paul II reestablished the hierarchy of this church by appointing bishops for all five dioceses.

Unfortunately the reemergence of the Greek Catholic Church has been accompanied by a confrontation with the Romanian Orthodox Church over the restitution of church buildings. The Catholics insisted that all property be returned as a matter of justice, while the Orthodox held that any transfer of property must take into account the present pastoral needs of both communities.

As of mid-1992 the impasse continued with only about fifteen churches, including the Blaj cathedral, having been returned. However, even though they had very limited resources and elderly professors, seminaries had begun functioning in Blaj, Cluj, and Baia Mare.

The new head of the Romanian Greek Catholic Church, Metropolitan Alexandru Todea, was created a cardinal by Pope John Paul II in June 1991. Todea had spent eighteen years in prison under the Communist regime.

Before the suppression there were two orders of sisters unique to the Romanian Catholic Church. The Contemplative Nuns of Moreni were founded in 1938 and numbered twenty-eight sisters when the monastery was closed. Some Sisters of the Holy Mother of God of Obreja, involved in education and works of charity, survived and the community is now receiving new vocations.

The size of the Romanian Catholic Church as of 1992 is disputed. The Greek Catholics themselves have claimed that they now number almost 3 million. But according to a government census carried out in January 1992, those declaring themselves Greek Catholics were only 1 percent of the population, or less than 250,000. In Romania the church calls itself "The Romanian Church United with Rome."

An apostolic exarchate for Romanian Greek Catholics in the United States was created in 1982. In 1987 it was elevated to the rank of eparchy (diocese). See also Byzantine rite; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites.

Bibliography

Georgescu, Vlad. The Romanians: A History. Columbus, OH: Ohio State University Press, 1991.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Roman Martyrology, the official listing of martyrs (and other saints) and their feast days, issued by Gregory XIII in 1584 and subject to several subsequent revisions. It is currently being revised once again in conjunction with the post–Vatican II renewal of the Roman liturgy. See also martyr; martyrdom; martyrology.

Roman Missal, the book containing the introductory documents and prayer texts for the celebration of Mass according to the Roman rite; also known as the sacramentary. Prior to Vatican II (1962–65), the Missal of Pope Paul V (1605–21), also called the Tridentine Missal, contained all the elements of Mass, both the "proper" elements, i.e., the Introit, Collect, Epistle, Gradual, Alleluia, Gospel, Offertory, Secret, Communion and Post-communion, and the "ordinary," i.e., the Order of Mass. Since 1970, when the Roman Missal containing the liturgy that was revised following Vatican II was promulgated by Pope Paul VI, the missal has consisted of two books. The Roman Missal proper contains the three presidential prayers (Opening Prayer, Prayer over the Gifts, Prayer After Communion), the entrance and Communion antiphons, and the Order of Mass. A second book, the Lectionary for Mass, contains the Scripture readings. The lectionary follows a three-year cycle of OT readings, NT readings, chants, and Gospels for Sundays, and a two-year cycle of first readings and Gospels for weekdays. Readings for feasts and votive masses are also included. See also Mass; sacramentary.

Romanos Melodos, St., d. ca. 560, acclaimed hymn writer, master of the "kontakion," a metrical sermon form he invested with a depth of feeling and drama that remains unsurpassed. Feast day: October 1. See also kontakion.

Roman Pontifical, the liturgical book containing the prayers and ceremonies for Latin rites presided over by a bishop, e.g., Confirmation, ordinations, the dedication of churches. The first printed edition was published in Rome in 1485 and an authoritative edition was issued in 1596 by Pope Clement VII. A partial revision was undertaken during the pontificate of Pius XII (d. 1958), and the remainder was revised after, and at the direction of, the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also bishop; sacramentary; worship.

Roman Question. See Lateran Treaty.

Roman rite, sometimes inaccurately called the Latin rite, principal ancient liturgical tradition of the Western Church and of the entire Catholic Communion, and the most widely used rite in Christendom.

Origins and Formative Period: Originally, the Roman rite prevailed only in the area around Rome and in "Suburbican Italy," i.e., southern Italy and the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica. Roman liturgical usages gradually came to predominate throughout Europe in the eighth and ninth centuries, under the Carolingian and Ottonian emperors. In the seventh century, Roman missionaries under Augustine of Canterbury had established it in the British Isles. In the following century, Rome-oriented missionaries from Britain returned to the Continent to reform the Gallican church and evangelize the Germans. They brought with them a Roman-type liturgy and found that Roman liturgical books and customs had already penetrated north of the Alps. These "Gelasian" and "Gregorian" Roman usages amalgamated with local Gallican and Visigothic customs to form a Franco-Germanic-Roman synthesis.

It is this hybrid rite, reintroduced to Rome in the late tenth century during the Germanic hegemony of the Ottonians, that is the immediate ancestor of what is called the "Roman rite" today. The original Roman rite was one of great sobriety; what is considered most "Italianate" in Roman Catholic liturgy is actually the product of this Nordic transfusion.

The Gregorian Reform: From Gregory VII (d. 1085) to the Council of Trent (1545–63), a reformed papacy, invigorated by the investiture victory that prevented lay princes from installing bishops, Cluniac monastic renewal in Rome, which included the repression of simony and enforcement of clerical celibacy, and the Gregorian reform (1073–85) that encompassed all of these measures, regained liturgical leadership in the West. Although under Gregory, the Roman rite was imposed in Spain, it spread more by the power of example: itinerant Franciscan friars and the peregrinations of the papal court carried it across Europe.

The Period of Tridentine Catholicism to Vatican II: A period of consolidation followed the Council of Trent, which reformed and codified the Roman liturgical books and imposed them throughout the West. Exceptions were allowed where an ancient tradition still prevailed, and some dioceses of France and northwestern Germany did not accept the Tridentine books until the nineteenth century.

In modern times, beginning with the nineteenth-century romantic revival, the liturgical movement and the twentieth-century liturgical reforms of several popes culminate in those of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and beyond. See also Latin rite; Roman Catholic.

Bibliography

Bishop, Edmund. "The Genius of the Roman Rite." Liturgica Historica. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1918, 1–19.

Klauser, T. A Short History of the Western Liturgy. London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1969.

van Dijk, S. J. P., and Joan Hazelden Walker. The Origins of the Modern Liturgy. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1960.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Romanticism, a movement in literature and art beginning in the late eighteenth century and continuing in different forms through the nineteenth century. Going beyond the Enlightenment's emphasis on reason and classicism, it emphasized intuition and emotion, individualism and history. By 1790 in Germany there was a new appreciation of human history (Johann Gottfried von Herder), emotional individualism in literature, enthusiasm for Plato and Shakespeare (August and Friedrich von Schlegel), and for Eastern cultures and folktales (Jacob and William Grimm). Friedrich von Schelling developed a philosophy that appealed to people such as Johann von Goethe and the Schlegels: the absolute realizes itself through central ideas in intuitive consciousness, bringing about a unity of science, art, and the history of religion.

This romantic idealism influenced not only Protestants such as Schleiermacher, but also Catholic thinkers, from theologians to politicians, in southern Germany. Although Catholicism had found the rationalism and secularity of the Enlightenment alien to its tradition, it was more sympathetic to the characteristics of Romanticism, such as organic diversity and unity, intuition and mysticism, universality-within-diversity, incarnation and sacramentality. This influence could be detected in the work of Joseph von Görres in Munich and of Johann Adam Möhler in Tübingen.

Just as after 1860 one sees a "late Romanticism" (less historical and optimistic, but psychological and darkly morbid) in the operas of Richard Wagner or the theories of Sigmund Freud, so one finds in the Catholic devotions and spiritualities of the nineteenth century a particular kind of Romanticism, less substantive, theologically shallow, and more focused upon visions, death, suffering, penance, and similar themes.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

Rome, the capital of the Roman Empire, traditionally founded 753 B.C. by the twins Romulus and Remus.

First and Second Centuries: Christianity was well established before the arrivals of Peter and Paul; Paul's Letter to the Roman church (A.D. 57–58) includes a list of twenty-four individuals prominent enough to be known by name (Rom 16), some wealthy enough to provide their houses as meeting places. The tension between these Judeo-Christians and the Roman synagogues is probably to be credited for the disturbance, "instigated by a certain Chrestus," which Suetonius mentions (Life of Claudius 25.4) as responsible for Claudius's expulsion of the Jews from Rome ca. 49 (cf. Acts 18:2). Paul was martyred under Nero, probably in the persecution associated with the great fire at Rome in 64 (Tacitus Annals 15.44). Tradition uniformly reports that the apostle Peter also arrived in Rome and was martyred there, although the dates are unknown. Another glimpse of the early Roman church at the end of the first century is afforded in the letter Clement, its bishop, sent to the Corinthian church on matters of church discipline (1 Clement).

There is much better information about the second century. The bishop Telesphorus (ca. 125–ca. 136) was probably a martyr. Rome was a missionary center for the evangelization of Italy, and probably for Gaul and North Africa as well. Until Victor I (ca. 189–98) all the bishops spoke Greek, and thus links with the Eastern churches were retained and extended. Anicetus (ca. 155–66) received Polycarp of Smyrna, with whom he discussed the contentious matter of the date of Easter. Dionysius of Corinth wrote to Soter (ca. 166–74) to defend himself against accusations that had caused Soter to censure him; Victor attempted to regulate the date of Easter for the whole Church, although Irenaeus, who himself may have lived at Rome for a time before becoming bishop of Lyons (ca. 178), reproved him when he excommunicated Asian churches for their Quartodeciman practice. The second century also saw the confluence of Christians of all stripes at Rome, from Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165), his pupil Tatian, and Hegesippus (ca. 110–80), to Marcion (excommunicated ca. 144 by Pius [ca. 142–ca. 155], brother to Hermas who wrote the Shepherd), and Valentinus (in Rome ca. 140–ca. 160). In 177 Montanists were excommunicated by Eleutherius (174–89), although Irenaeus, still a presbyter, came to Rome with a request for toleration of them on behalf of the church at Lyons. Later, Theodotus the Leather Merchant, an Adoptionist Monarchian from Byzantium teaching in Rome, was condemned by Victor, followed by his disciple Theodotus the Banker, also from Byzantium, condemned by Zephyrinus (198/9–217).

Third Century: In the third century, Hippolytus (d. ca. 235), in his recently recovered Apostolic Tradition, provides valuable information regarding Baptism, the catechumenate, the Eucharist, and forms of assistance including the agape and a collection taken up to provide for burials. Under Zephyrinus, the deacon Callistus, as one of seven deacons set in charge of charitable works in each of the city's seven districts, maintained for the Church the catacomb on the Appian Way. Eusebius attests to a numerous clergy and a relief system serving fifteen hundred needy, although there is no evidence for any churches apart from private homes.

A dispute, and perhaps a schism, resulted when Callistus (217–22), who succeeded Zephyrinus, seemed to Hippolytus to be dealing too leniently with penitents and to have incorrectly approved marriages of Christians of unequal rank. Hippolytus was reconciled with Callistus's successor Pontian (230–35, after Urban, 222–30) only after they were exiled together and about to be martyred. Later, a more serious schism arose after the Decian persecution, when in 251, the presbyter Novatian led a community in opposition to the bishop Cornelius (successor, after a thirteen-month vacancy, to the martyred Fabian [236–50]), whom Novatian felt had dealt too leniently with the lapsi (Lat., those who had lapsed under persecution). Cornelius was able to assemble a synod of some sixty bishops against him. A related issue divided Stephen I (254–57) and the more rigorist Cyprian of Carthage, who objected to Stephen's reinstatement of two Spanish bishops accused of yielding under persecution and who insisted on rebaptizing persons baptized by heretics or schismatics (e.g., Novatianists). In the persecution of Valerian, Sixtus II (257–58) and his deacon Lawrence were martyred (258). Dionysius (ca. 260–ca. 268), who succeeded Sixtus, criticized the trinitarian theology of Dionysius of Alexandria, although he ultimately accepted the Alexandrian bishop's defense.

Fourth Century and Later: Little is known of the Roman church during the persecution of Diocletian, but after the victory of Constantine (312), there is a blossoming of church construction: the basilica, later St. John Lateran, founded by Constantine to serve as the episcopal church and papal residence; St. Paul's Outside the Walls, erected by Constantine and rebuilt as a basilica by the emperor Honorius (395); St. Peter's, erected by Constantine; St. Mary Major, founded by Liberius (352–66) and rebuilt by Sixtus III (432–40); and Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, founded by St. Helena.

The great popes of the fourth century—e.g., Julius I (337–52), who sheltered Athanasius in 339 and called the Council of Sardica (342–43) which pronounced Athanasius the rightful holder of his see; Damasus (366–84), who adorned the tombs of the martyrs with poetic inscriptions, commissioned Jerome's revision of the Latin Bible, and condemned the Pneumatomachians at a Roman council in 377; and Siricius (384–99)—advanced the Nicene cause and enhanced papal prestige. In the fifth century this tradition was continued especially by bishops such as Innocent (401–17), who condemned Pelagius at the request of the African bishops; Boniface (418–22), who secured the claim of Rome to immediate jurisdiction over Illyricum; Celestine (422–32), who intervened on behalf of Cyril of Alexandria in his dispute with Nestorius; and finally Leo the Great (440–61), whose Tome was canonized by the Council of Chalcedon (451), and who, with Damasus and Gelasius (492–96), was one of the foremost theorists of the papacy.

By the sixth century the empire in the West had fallen (the last Roman emperor was deposed in 476), and Rome, sacked for three days in 410 by Alaric and for seventeen days in 455 by the Vandals, was almost completely abandoned during the Gothic War (537–53) between the Goths and the Byzantines. As Byzantine power waned and the Lombards invaded Italy (from 568), the population relied on the popes to negotiate treaties, prisoners, etc. Pelagius II (579–90) and Gregory the Great (590–604) were crucial in the survival of Rome through this, its lowest period. Rome remained within the dominion of the Lombards until Pepin III defeated them in 754 and again in 756 and donated the duchy of Rome, the exarchate of Ravenna, and other territories to the Holy See, thus formally creating the Papal States. See also Byzantine Italy; Constantinople; Latin rite; papacy, the; Papal States; Paul, St.; persecutions; Peter, St.; Roman Catholic; Roman Empire; Roman rite; Rome, churches of.

Bibliography

Alfoldy, Geza. The Social History of Rome. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1985.

Claster, Jill. The Medieval Experience: 300–1400. New York: New York University Press, 1982.

Garnsey, P., and R. Saller. The Roman Empire: Economy, Society and Culture. Berkeley, CA: University of California Press, 1987.

Meeks, Wayne. The First Urban Christians. New Haven, CN: Yale University Press, 1983.

Salmon, E. T. The Making of Roman Italy. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1982.

JOHN C. CAVADINI

Rome, churches of, places of Catholic worship located in the city of Rome. Excluding nonpublic chapels or oratories, there are well over one hundred Catholic churches within the city of Rome. The buildings themselves reflect the long history of Christianity's presence in the city.

Rome's cathedral is St. John Lateran, which sits on a site given to the Church by the emperor Constantine in the fourth century. St. John Lateran is also a major basilica; the other three in the city are St. Peter's in the Vatican, St. Mary Major, and St. Paul's Outside the Walls. Those churches, along with the basilicas of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls, Holy Cross in Jerusalem, and St. Sebastian, constitute the seven pilgrimage churches that were the obligatory parts of the pilgrimage visit to the city in ancient times.

The oldest of the Roman churches were called tituli (Lat., titulus, "name" or "title"). These were places of worship known by the name of their location or of the person who donated the land and monies for the place. After the fourth century these churches assumed the names of saints. Venerable churches like Santa Sabina, Santa Cecilia, and Sts. John and Paul have the remains of earlier tituli under their present foundations. Of similar antiquity are those churches, like that of St. Agnes, that were built over the tombs of early Roman martyrs.

Some Roman churches commemorate historical events: the seventeenth-century Baroque church of Santa Maria della Vittoria was built in honor of the end of the Thirty Years' War (1620). Other churches, like the Jesuit Sant' Ignazio and the church of the Gesú, were inspired by religious orders. Small churches and oratories dot the city because they were annexed to either palaces (San Lorenzo in Damaso) or monasteries. Craft guilds had their own places of worship, like the tailor guild's St. Omobono. A pious confraternity, like that dedicated to the care of condemned prisoners, had a church dedicated appropriately to the beheaded St. John the Baptist (San Giovanni Decollato).

Many historic churches in Rome, which once served particular purposes, now serve as "home" churches for various nationalities: e.g., Santa Susanna (United States), San Luigi dei Francesi (France), San Silvestro in Capite (England), and Santa Maria in Campo Santo (Germany). Other churches serve various rites of the Church, like the small Abyssinian (Coptic) church on the grounds of the Vatican.

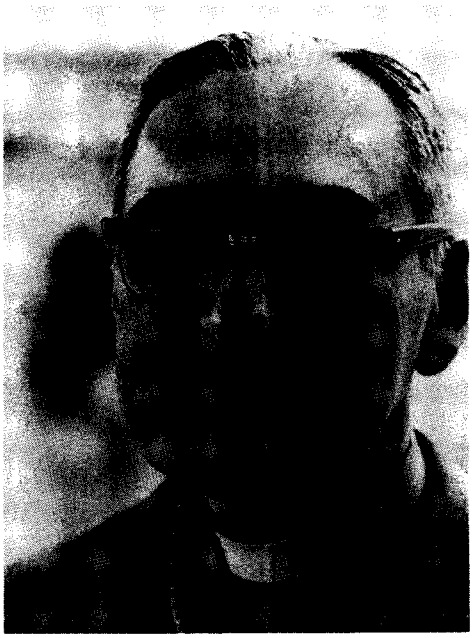
Most of the ancient churches of Rome reveal layers of rebuilding. St. Peter's in the Vatican, for instance, was designed by Michelangelo in the sixteenth century (with additions in the seventeenth) but was built over the site of an ancient church begun in the period of Constantine (fourth century), which rested, in turn, over a burial chapel for the tomb of St. Peter. The oldest church dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, Santa Maria in Trastevere, started as a third-century oratory, with elaborations done in the twelfth century, followed by restorations and additions in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries. The present portico (porch) was added in the nineteenth century during the pontificate of Pius IX.

The plethora of churches in the city is a challenge in terms of maintenance and restoration. It is also a pastoral problem. The diocese of Rome needs churches for the burgeoning population in the suburbs, where both clergy and buildings are scarce, while the historic center of the city has too many churches. See also basilica; Lateran Basilica; Rome; Saint Mary Major; Saint Paul's Outside the Walls; Saint Peter's Basilica.

LAWRENCE CUNNINGHAM

Romero, Oscar Arnulfo, 1917–1980, martyred archbishop of San Salvador. Born in Ciudad Barrios, El Salvador, Romero entered the minor seminary in 1930, studied theology at Rome's Gregorian University beginning in 1937, and was ordained in Rome in 1942. Returning to El Salvador in 1943, he became the bishop's secretary for the diocese of San Miguel. Serving in this capacity for twenty-three years, he was appointed the editor of the diocesan newspaper, the pastor of the cathedral parish, and the rector of the minor seminary. In 1967 he was elected secretary of the national bishops' conference for El Salvador, and in 1968 he was chosen to be the executive secretary of the Central American Bishops' Secretariat. He became the auxiliary bishop of San Salvador in 1970, and was named the bishop of the diocese of Santiago de Maria in 1974. He was installed as the archbishop of San Salvador in 1977. Though known to be politically cautious, he took seriously the documents of Vatican II (1962–65), and of the Latin American Bishops Conferences (CELAM) at Medellín, Colombia (1968), and Puebla, Mexico (1979), as well as Pope Paul VI's Evangelii Nuntiandi (On Evangelization in the Modern World, 1975). As a result, he increasingly spoke in behalf of the human rights of the poor and the powerless. As the violence increased in El Salvador amid efforts for land reform, Romero read aloud each week at Mass a roll call of the week's dead. He also publicly condemned abuses of human rights and pleaded that foreign military aid cease, writing a letter in this regard to President Jimmy Carter. He was assassinated on March 24, 1980, while celebrating Mass in the chapel of San Salvador's Hospital of Divine Providence. His tomb, erected in the cathedral of San Salvador, has become a popular site for prayer and pilgrimage. ROBERT A. KRIEG

Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero of San Salvador, one of the unofficial martyrs of the twentieth century, who was gunned down in 1980 while celebrating the Eucharist because of his vigorous defense of the poor and the powerless against the military and the wealthy classes.



Romuald, St., ca. 952–1027, hermit and founder of the Camaldolese order. Of noble birth, Romuald became a monk to do penance for his father's slaying of a kinsman in a duel. Seeking a rigid life-style, he constantly moved about, founding hermitages and monasteries, including Camaldoli. Feast day: June 19. See also Camaldolese.

rood screen (Old Eng., rood, "cross"), an architectural term denoting the wall-like structure that divides the choir from the sanctuary area (or the choir and sanctuary from the nave) of, mainly, English cathedrals. It is so called because a cross (rood) figured prominently in the decoration of such screens.

Rosary, the most common of Catholic devotional prayers. The term derives from the Latin rosarium ("rose garden"), which by the fourteenth century had come to mean a collection of devotional texts. Today it generally refers to the so-called Dominican Rosary, which consists in the recitation of fifteen decades of Hail Marys, each introduced by the Lord's Prayer and concluded with the Doxology. Each decade is accompanied by a meditation on some aspect of the life of Christ or the Virgin Mary, called a mystery. These are divided into three groups of five, known as the Joyful, Sorrowful, and Glorious Mysteries, focusing on the Incarnation, Passion, and glorification of Christ respectively; the whole is a virtual epitome of the liturgical year. Ordinarily only one of these sets, or five decades, is recited at a time; to assist the memory, the prayers are commonly counted on a string of beads.

A legend dating from the late fifteenth century attributed the Rosary to St. Dominic. This opinion can no longer be historically sustained; in fact the Rosary as we know it received its present form only in the sixteenth century. On the other hand, its roots extend into the distant past. The use of beads or knotted strings as a device for keeping count of prayers is found in many religious traditions, and from patristic antiquity Christians also utilized such means to assist in the continuous repetition of biblical passages or other texts. By the eleventh century, the custom of saying 150 Our Fathers as a substitute for the psalms was widespread among devout laity. This "poor person's breviary" was often divided, as was the Psalter, into three sets of fifty; the strings of beads used to count them were called "paternosters."

Rosary beads

In the twelfth century, as Marian piety increased, the Angelic Salutation from Luke's Gospel was added to these, and soon the words of Elizabeth at Mary's Visitation as well. Gradually, popular piety created "psalters" dedicated to Jesus or Mary, concentrating the devotee's attention on biblical scenes. Much of this development, especially a "rosary" consisting primarily of Hail Marys, originally took place in Carthusian circles. However, the term "Dominican Rosary" is very accurate, as the friars of that order did the most to make it a general, popular prayer by propagating it through their preaching and the foundation of rosary confraternities, as well as by introducing a number of simplifications that standardized the prayer in its present form. The Dominican pope Pius V did much to foster the devotion and in 1572 instituted an annual celebration to give thanks to the Blessed Virgin for having delivered Christendom from the Turks by the decisive sea battle of Lepanto the preceding year. This feast, titled Our Lady of the Rosary since 1573, was eventually fixed on October 7.

Both the contemporary liturgical movement and a renewed emphasis on the reading of Scripture have reduced the dominance of the Rosary in Catholic devotional life, but because of its practical simplicity and warmth it remains widely popular. See also devotions; Marian devotion. DOMINIC MONTI

Rose, Golden. See Golden Rose.

Rose of Lima, St., 1586–1617, first canonized saint of the Americas and patron saint of South America and the Philippines. Reputed to have extraordinary mystical gifts, Rose modeled her life after St. Catherine of Siena, living the life of a recluse and adopting extreme practices of mortification and penance. She joined the Third Order of St. Dominic at the age of 20. Feast day: August 23.

Rose of Lima (lower right), Peruvian mystic and patron saint of South America, has a vision of the Blessed Virgin Mary and two other Dominican saints: Catherine of Siena (holding the cross) and Agnes of Montepulciano (holding the child Jesus); eighteenth-century fresco by Tiepolo, in the Church of St. Mary of the Rosary, Venice.

Rose Philippine Duchesne, St. See Duchesne, St. Rose Philippine.

Rosmini-Serbati, Antonio (ahn-tohn'ee-oh raws-meen'ee-sair-bah'tee), 1797–1855, Italian philosopher. Ordained in 1821, Rosmini founded the Institute of Charity (Rosminians) and an academy dedicated to the study of Thomas Aquinas. His metaphysics and epistemology were grounded in the immediate intuition of ideal being as the basis for every act of knowledge. It was this line of thought that led to the periodic accusations of ontologism leveled against him. But he was best known for his writings on behalf of Church reform. His Five Wounds of the Church was condemned by the Congregation of the Index [of Forbidden Books] in 1849. His influence was strong in Italy, but only negligible elsewhere.

Rossello, St. Josepha, 1811–80, founder of the Daughters of Our Lady of Mercy [Pity] in Italy in 1837 to care for abandoned girls. She was canonized in 1949. Feast day: December 7.

Rota (Lat., "wheel"), the second-highest (and most active) court of the Holy See. Different theories as to the derivation of the name are: the auditors (judges) hear the cases in turn, the documents are wheeled from judge to judge, or there was a wheel design on the floor of its courtroom. This is the court of third instance for most marriage cases and has been the source of important developments in matrimonial jurisprudence.

Rousselot, Pierre (roos'suh-loh), 1878–1915, French Jesuit philosopher and theologian. Despite his untimely death in the First World War, his two doctoral theses were significant contributions to the twentieth-century revival of Thomism. The first thesis asserted the primacy of the intuitive intellect over discursive reason. The second examined the relationship between love of self and love of God, reconciling the two. See also philosophy and theology; Thomism.

rubrics (Lat., "red text"), directives for liturgical actions or gestures. Rubrics are printed in red so as to distinguish directions for action from spoken texts, which are printed in black. Rubricism, the scrupulous regard for correct performance of rubrical minutiae, derives its name from this term.

Rudd, Daniel, 1854–1933, the leading African-American Catholic spokesman of the late nineteenth century. In 1886, he began publishing the American Catholic Tribune. He also initiated the black Catholic lay congress movement, which brought black Catholics together in national conventions five times between 1889 and 1894. See also black Catholics.

Rudesind, St., also known as Rosendo, 907–77, Portuguese saint who founded the monastery of Celanova. Feast day: March 1.

Ruether, Rosemary Radford, b. 1936, Georgia Harkness Professor of Applied Theology at Garrett-Evangelical Theological Seminary in Evanston, Illinois, and theologian known for her work in feminist theology (Sexism and God-Talk: Toward a Feminist Theology, 1983). Ruether's academic specialty is historical theology; her doctoral dissertation at Claremont was on Gregory of Nazianzus.

Rufinus of Aquileia, ca. 345–410, translator. Educated at Rome, where he became friends with Jerome, Rufinus later lived in Egypt (373–80), subsequently founding a double monastery on the Mount of Olives (381) with Melania the Elder. Jerome, in Bethlehem by 386, sided against him in the controversy over Origenism, precipitating a bitter enmity that persisted until Rufinus's death. In 387 Rufinus moved back to Rome. He undertook a series of extraordinary translations, including works of Origen that would otherwise have been completely lost: On First Principles and homilies on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Canticle of Canticles, and Romans. Rufinus also translated (and supplemented) Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History; homilies of Basil and Gregory of Nazianzus and the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions. See also Jerome, St., Origen; Origenism.

Rule of St. Augustine. See Augustine, Rule of St.

Rule of St. Basil. See Basil, Rule of St.

Rule of St. Benedict. See Benedict, Rule of St.

Rule of the Master. See Regula Magistri.

Rupert, St., d. 717, Benedictine abbot-archbishop. He spread Christianity in southern Germany, rebuilding an old town, Juvanum, and renaming it Salzburg. He founded an abbey and a school there. He is venerated as an apostle of Bavaria and Austria. Feast day: March 27.

Rupert of Deutz, ca. 1075–1129, Benedictine theologian, biblical commentator, and abbot of Deutz, near Cologne. Experiencing as a young man a divine call to interpret God's word, he produced works filling four volumes of J.-P. Migne's Patrologia Latina. His exegetical writings are characterized by original allegorical interpretations and emphasis upon the history of salvation. Rupert opposed the encroachment of dialectic in theology and entered into disputes over the Eucharist and predestination with leading masters at Paris, Laon, and Liège. See also allegory.

Rusin, Rusyn, an ethnic name designating the East Slavic inhabitants of Austria-Hungary and their descendants in the United States. Today it applies more specifically to the Eastern Slavs living in the Transcarpathian district of the Western Ukraine. See also Ruthenian Catholic Church.

Russia, Catholicism in. Christian missionaries from Europe first evangelized Russia in the ninth and tenth centuries. Prince Vladimir of Kiev (d. 1015) embraced the Christian faith in 988 and subsequently established Christianity as the official religion within the territories under his control, including Kiev, Polotsk, and large areas of White Russia (Belorussia). He built many churches and placed great pressure on his people to accept baptism. Because of his desire to forge closer relationships with Europe, he brought in priests from the Byzantine Empire, centered in Constantinople, and established a Greek hierarchy under a metropolitan. From the outset, however, the Slavic tongue was used in worship and a Russian clergy gradually replaced the Greeks.

Monasticism, perhaps Russia's most spiritually powerful religious institution, began with the monk Antony, who had come from Mount Athos in Greece in the middle of the eleventh century, establishing himself in a grotto near Kiev from which the great monastery of Kievo-Petcherskaja would develop. By the next century there were seventeen monasteries in Kiev alone. Sergius of Radonezh (d. 1392), a monastic reformer and one of the most revered of Russian saints, gave added impetus to the monastic movement all over the country. It was the monasteries that supplied the bishops, while the married diocesan clergy tended to be uneducated.

It was during the early years of the fourteenth century that the metropolitan see, originally established by Vladimir in Kiev, was moved to Moscow. In 1461 the Church in Russia was divided between two metropolitans, one in Moscow and one in Kiev. Moscow was entirely Russian and firmly Orthodox. Kiev was more exposed to Western influences. When the Council of Florence (1442) forged what proved to be a temporary agreement (the Decree of Union) between Rome and Constantinople on such issues as the double-procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (the Filioque controversy), the Eucharist, papal primacy, and purgatory, the Russian church, under Basil II of Moscow, rejected it. In 1448 a council of Russian bishops elected a metropolitan of Moscow without any reference to Greek ecclesiastical authorities, thereby laying the foundation for an autocephalous (Gk., "oneself the head"), or independent, Russian church.

Those Christians who remained faithful to Rome were severely repressed in Orthodox Moscow after the Council of Florence, while Russians in the metropolis of Kiev (which came within the territory of Poland and Lithuania) found themselves under pressure from their Roman Catholic rulers. Although a large part of the Russian church in this region acknowledged the authority of the papacy at the Synod of Brest-Litovsk in 1596, the Orthodox metropolis of Kiev continued in existence, in spite of persecution, and was in constant conflict with those loyal to Rome.

Growing Estrangement and Reduced Presence: Early conflicts between the Prince of Novgorod, Alexander Nevsky, and the Germanic Knights, together with Catholic Sweden, hardened Russian feeling toward the West. As a member of the Hanseatic League (a late-fourteenth-century mercantile alliance based in northern Germany), Nevsky's own Republic of Novgorod remained a focal point of Western culture during the Russian Middle Ages. Here an edition of the Bible was prepared using the Latin Vulgate.

Estrangement from Western culture in Muscovy resulted from the Tartar yoke, as well as growing hostility between Orthodox Muscovy and Catholicism's Eastern bulwark, the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth. Ill feeling culminated during the occupation of Moscow by the Poles at the end of the sixteenth century, during the "Time of Troubles." Popular Russian Orthodoxy identified the Catholic Church with Poland—a tendency already present during the Kievan period of the eleventh and twelfth centuries when there was a state centered in Kiev.

In 1473, Zoe Sophia Paleologa, the Greek bride of Ivan III, arrived at the Kremlin with her suite, including several Italians. Scion of the Imperial House of Byzantium and ward of the Greek cardinal Bessarion, Sophia was at least a nominal Catholic. Soon after her wedding by proxy with the Muscovite sovereign, arranged by Pope Sixtus IV (d. 1484) and held in Rome at St. Peter's, she exchanged Catholicism for Orthodoxy in Russia. In 1583 Czar Ivan IV received the Italian Jesuit Antonio Possevino in Moscow. Possevino successfully concluded the Treaty of Yam-Zapolsky but was unsuccessful in fermenting papal plans for church unity or in organizing a common crusade of Orthodox and Catholics against the Turks.

Under Austrian protection, the Jesuits were able to establish a foothold in Russia, first under the reign of Czar Alexis (1629–76) and later during that of his son Peter the Great (1672–1725). Jesuit influence in Russia reached its apogee under Catherine II (1729–96) and her son Paul (1754–1801). Banned in Europe, the order survived in Russia thanks to Catherine's admiration of the Jesuit system of education, their quick acceptance of Russian rule after the Polish partitions, and their dislike of revolution or abrupt social change. The Jesuits were permitted to administer colleges in the Belorussian lands and a school for the nobility—both Orthodox and Catholic—at St. Petersburg. They were finally expelled in 1820 by Alexander I.

Despite limited patronage of the Jesuits and some interest in Catholic ritual, Czar Peter turned Russia toward Protestantism and the secularized West rather than to the papacy. Peter's grandfather, Patriarch Philaret, a Polish captive during the Time of Troubles, ordered the rebaptism of Roman Catholic and "Uniate" converts to Orthodoxy, but the anti-Nikonian Council of 1666–67 declared this to be unnecessary.

Catholics as Subjects of the Czars: While Catholics in Russia until the time of Catherine II (d. 1796) were generally foreigners who dwelt and worshiped in segregated areas of the larger towns, the first partition of Poland in 1772 incorporated 100,000 Latin Catholics and 800,000 "Uniates" with their ancestral lands into the Russian Empire. Always hostile to those who accepted the Union of Brest, Catherine II and her successors eventually succeeded in destroying the latter's link with Rome and incorporating them into Russian Orthodoxy.

Russia's Latin Catholics, on the other hand, were organized into the monolithic diocese of Mogilev, an unimportant town in Belorussia, which served as the center of the largest ecclesiastical province in the world. Despite the adverse influence of the sycophantic metropolitan of Mogilev, Stanislaus Siestrzencewicz-Bohusz, under whose jurisdiction all Latin Catholics of the empire fell, an apostolic nunciature was established at St. Petersburg in 1798. Three successive nuncios, Andrea Archetti, Lorenzo Litta, and Tommaso Arezzo, were able to visit or reside in Russia.

Catherine's son, the eccentric Paul I, sponsored the Jesuits and Knights of Malta and declared himself in favor of union with Rome, but these plans came to naught.

A few conversions to Catholicism among the Westernized nobility occurred under Czar Alexander I (reigned 1801–25), but penal legislation against abandoning Orthodoxy for Catholicism hardened under Nicholas I (reigned 1825–55) and his successors in conjunction with the Polish rebellions. Despite Nicholas I's general dislike of the Catholic Church, which he equated with revolutionary Poland, he enjoyed a papal audience in 1845. This visit laid the basis for a concordat between Russia and the Vatican that was signed two years later.

Catholics in nineteenth-century Russia were almost exclusively of foreign origin. At St. Petersburg they were divided into four nations: Germans, French, Italians, and Poles. By the time of the revolution of 1917 there were about a million and a half Catholics in Russia, organized into 680 parishes, including about twenty-six in the areas of the empire with a mainly Russian population and thirteen in Russian Asia.

Nicholas II was forced to concede the Edict of Toleration in 1905, which allowed Orthodox to change their religion and resulted in the mass conversion of a quarter of a million Polonized Belorussian peasants to Catholicism.

Russian Catholics, the Revolution, Today's Situation: The end of the nineteenth century saw the beginnings of the Russian Catholic movement, which attempted to reconcile Catholic dogma with Russian ritual and ecclesiastical tradition in accordance with the teachings of Vladimir Solov'ev. Always small in number, these Byzantine-rite Russian Catholics included several intellectuals, including the Dominican nun Catherine Abrikosov, the laywoman Julia Danzas, and their pastorally gifted exarch Leonid Feodorov. While relations were difficult with the almost exclusively Polish Latin Catholic hierarchy in Russia, Russian Catholics enjoyed the support of Andryj Sheptyckyj, metropolitan of the Greek Catholics in Galicia. The Russian Catholic movement did not survive the revolution and forthcoming Stalinization but continued to exist among emigrants. Traces of their teachings survived in the Soviet Union.

The Latin hierarchy was likewise decimated through persecution following the Revolution of 1917. An attempt to restore it by the French Jesuit Michel d'Herbigny during the 1920s ended in disaster. By 1934 only three Catholic churches remained open in the Soviet Union.

The situation changed after the Second World War, when significant numbers of Catholics in formerly Polish Belorussia and the Baltics and Greek Catholics of the Western Ukraine were incorporated into Soviet territory. These groups became subject to many restrictions.

With the fall of Communism after 1990, the Catholic Church in the former Soviet Union attempted to regroup its losses. Rome appointed an apostolic administrator for European Russia, a bishop for Siberia and Central Asia, and other nominations in Ukraine and Belarus, despite the protests of Russian Orthodox hierarchs who feared Catholic proselytism.

Catholics are still a somewhat foreign element in Russian society, despite a tendency toward increased assimilation and growing acceptance on the part of some Russian intellectuals. There are fewer than 400,000 Catholics in a total population of some 150 million. See also Communism; Byzantine rite; Russian Catholics in the Diaspora.

Bibliography

Just, Sister Mary. Rome and Russia. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1954.

Mailleux, Paul. Exarch Leonid Feodorov. New York: P. J. Kennedy and Sons, 1964.

Stehle, Hansjakob. Eastern Politics of the Vatican; 1917–1979. Athens, OH: Ohio University Press, 1981.

Zatko, James. Descent into Darkness. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1965. CONSTANTINE SIMON

Russian Catholics in the diaspora, those Russian Catholics living outside of Russia. They are estimated as of 1993 at about 3,500 and have an apostolic visitor, a papal representative, based in Paris, whose responsibility is to visit Russian Catholics living outside of Russia and to determine their pastoral needs. He can exercise no canonical or pastoral authority over these Catholics, however. They remain subject always to the authority of their local Roman Catholic bishop. In pre-revolutionary Russia they numbered only about 400 in three communities. Immediately after the revolution, Russian Catholic parishes were established in the principal centers of Russian emigration in France, Berlin, New York, and in Manchuria. They were placed under a Russian Catholic bishop of Lithuanian origin, Peter Bucys. In 1923, French Dominicans opened a seminary in Lille for training Russian Catholic clergy. The Russicum, or Russian College, was opened in Rome for this purpose in 1929. In 1921, the French Jesuit Louis Baille opened a school for Russian boys at Istanbul, an early center of Russian emigration. Later transferred to Namur in Belgium and then to Meudon, a suburb of Paris, the school continued to exist until 1969. Both Jesuits and Marian Fathers worked among the Catholic Russians in Manchuria. The English Jesuit Frederick Wilcock organized the evacuation of the Russian community at Shanghai in 1949 in the wake of the Chinese Communists. In 1950 he helped found the Russian Center at Fordham University in New York. A parish was later founded for Catholic Russians at El Segundo near Los Angeles and a smaller center in San Francisco. Other parishes were organized for them in Australia and in South America at São Paolo, Buenos Aires, and Santiago. Distinguished Russian Catholic laypeople include the poet Vyacheslav Ivanov, the historian Helen Iswolsky, the opera singer Nicola Rossi-Lemeni, the religious activist Catherine de Hueck Doherty, and Irina Posnov, a publisher of Russian religious literature. See also Russia, Catholicism in. CONSTANTINE SIMON

Russicum, the Pontifical Russian College in Rome, founded by Pope Pius XI in 1929 and entrusted to the Jesuits. Its original purpose was to train Catholic clergy of the Byzantine-Slavonic rite for missionary activity within the confines of the Soviet Union, where all Christians were suffering persecution. Although courses in Russian and liturgics were offered to its students, the Russicum served mainly as living quarters for seminarians who attended theology lectures at pontifical universities. From the beginning, Russians comprised only a small part of the student body. After Vatican II, the Russicum enjoyed many fruitful contacts with the Russian Orthodox Church in the Soviet Union. The original aim of the Russicum has been reexamined in the light of ecumenical dialogue and the new religious freedoms offered to the faithful, both Orthodox and Catholic, within Russia. See also Russia, Catholicism in.

Ruthenian Catholic Church, a Byzantine Catholic community centered in the extreme western part of the Ukraine, an area known variously in the past as Carpatho-Ukraine, Carpatho-Ruthenia, Carpatho-Russia, and Subcarpathia, and presently Transcarpathia. Although the ecclesiastical term "Ruthenian" was formerly used more broadly to include Ukrainians, Belarusians, and Slovaks, it is now used by Church authorities in a narrower sense to denote this specific Byzantine Catholic Church. In terms of ethnicity, Ruthenian Catholics prefer to be called Rusyns. They are closely related to the Ukrainians and speak a dialect of the same language. The traditional Rusyn homeland extends beyond Transcarpathia into northeast Slovakia and the "Lemko" region of extreme southeast Poland.

Early History: In the late ninth century, most of this area came under the control of Catholic Hungary, which later began to promote Catholic missionary work among its Orthodox population, including the Rusyns. This activity culminated in the reception of sixty-three of their priests into the Catholic Church on April 24, 1646, at the town of Uzhorod. The Union of Uzhorod affected the Orthodox population of an area that roughly corresponds to present-day eastern Slovakia. In 1664 a union took place at Mukachevo that involved the Orthodox in today's Transcarpathia and the Hungarian diocese of Hajdúdorog. A third union, which included the Orthodox in the county of Maramaros to the east of Mukachevo, took place in about 1713. Thus within a hundred years after the 1664 Union of Uzhorod, the Orthodox Church virtually ceased to exist in the region.

Early on there were jurisdictional conflicts over who would control this new Byzantine Catholic Church. In spite of the desire of the Ruthenians to have their own ecclesiastical organization, for more than a century the Ruthenian bishop in Mukachevo was only the ritual vicar of the local Latin bishop, and Ruthenian priests served as assistants in Latin parishes. The dispute was resolved in 1771 by Pope Clement XIV who, at the request of Empress Maria Theresa, erected the Ruthenian eparchy of Mukachevo and made it suffragan of the primate of Hungary. A seminary for Ruthenian Catholics was set up at Uzhorod in 1778.

After World War I, Transcarpathia became part of the new republic of Czechoslovakia. By this time there were two Ruthenian Catholic dioceses at Mukachevo and Presov. Although in the 1920s a group of these Ruthenian Catholics returned to the Orthodox Church, Rusyn ethnic identity remained closely tied to the Ruthenian Catholic Church.

World War II to the Present: At the end of World War II, Transcarpathia, including Uzhorod and Mukachevo, was annexed to the Soviet Union as part of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. Presov, however, remained in Czechoslovakia. The Soviet authorities soon initiated a vicious persecution of the Ruthenian Church in the newly acquired region. In 1946 the Uzhorod seminary was closed. In 1949 the newly named Orthodox bishop of Mukachevo declared the union with Rome dissolved and the integration of his diocese into the Moscow patriarchate. Rusyns on the other side of the Czechoslovakian border were also forced to become Orthodox, while those in the Polish Lemko region were deported en masse in 1947 either to the Soviet Union or other areas of Poland. In all three countries, an attempt was made to wipe out any residual Rusyn national identity by declaring them all to be Orthodox and Ukrainian.

The collapse of Communism throughout the region had a dramatic effect on Ruthenian Catholics. The first changes took place in Poland in the mid 1980s, where Lemko organizations began to surface and press for recognition of their rights and distinct status. In Czechoslovakia, the much-diminished Ruthenian Catholic minority began in November 1989 to campaign for recognition within the predominantly Slovak Greek Catholic diocese of Presov. And finally, in the Transcarpathian heartland, the Ruthenian Catholic eparchy of Mukachevo was reestablished when the Holy See appointed a bishop and two auxiliaries in January 1991. In late 1990 it was estimated that there were about a half million Ruthenian Catholics in Transcarpathia with 100 priests and 120 registered communities with 60 churches. After an unpleasant confrontation with the Orthodox, the old Greek Catholic cathedral in Uzhorod was returned to its pre-1949 owners in early 1992. At that time a new seminary was being built in Uzhorod.

A continuing issue for Ruthenian Catholics will be their relationship with the much larger Ukrainian Catholic Church. With the restoration of religious freedom in the Soviet Union and now in newly independent Ukraine, the Mukachevo diocese for the first time is functioning openly within the same country as the Ukrainian Catholic Church. Although the Mukachevo diocese is not a part of the Ukrainian Catholic metropolitanate, Ruthenian Catholic bishops have attended recent Ukrainian Catholic synods. The bishop of Mukachevo has made it clear, however, that he opposes integration into the Ukrainian Catholic Church and favors the promotion of the distinct national and religious identity of his Rusyn people. It remains to be seen what type of relationship will develop between Ukrainian and Ruthenian Catholics. Much will depend on the uncertain future political status of Transcarpathia itself.

Many Ruthenian Catholics had immigrated to North America in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Because of strained relationships with the local Latin hierarchy who would not recognize such legitimate Ruthenian Catholic traditions as a married clergy, large numbers of these Catholics returned to the Orthodox Church. In 1982 it was estimated that out of 690,000 people of Rusyn descent in the United States, 225,000 were still Ruthenian Catholics, 95,000 were in the Carpatho-Russian Orthodox diocese, 250,000 were in the Orthodox Church in America, 20,000 were in Orthodox parishes directly under the Moscow patriarchate, and 100,000 belonged to various other Orthodox, Ukrainian Catholic, Roman Catholic, and Protestant denominations.

In many areas of the world, including Australia, Great Britain, and Canada, Ruthenian Catholics are not distinguished from Ukrainian Catholics. In the United States, however, the Ruthenians had in 1994 four dioceses and about 200,000 members. This church, generally known simply as "Byzantine Catholic," emphasizes its American character and celebrates the liturgy in English in most parishes. See also Byzantine rite; Ukrainian Catholic Church.

Bibliography

Warzeski, Walter C. Byzantine-Rite Rusins in Carpatho-Ruthenia and America. Pittsburgh, PA: Byzantine Seminary Press, 1971.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Ruysbroeck, Bl. Jan van (roiz'brook), 1293–1381, Flemish mystical writer. Ordained a priest in Brussels in 1317, he remained there another twenty-six years before retiring to a more secluded location at Groenendaal. Many of his eleven treatises were motivated by a desire to combat the Quietist (spiritually passive) tendencies of his day, but their tone is generally not polemical. Rather, Ruysbroeck enunciates a positive understanding of the entire course of the spiritual life, from its humblest beginnings to the deepest mystical union with God. See also mysticism; Quietism.

Monsignor John A. Ryan, known during the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration (1932-45) as "Monsignor New Dealer," gave the benediction at Roosevelt's second and fourth inaugurations.

Ryan, John Augustine, 1869–1945, American moral theologian and economist. Inspired by Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), Monsignor Ryan's life's work focused on the relationship of Christian ethical principles to the nation's socio-economic conditions. Ordained in 1898, he studied at The Catholic University of America (1989–1902), received his S.T.D. (1906), and served as a member of Catholic University's faculty (1915–39). Prior to that appointment, he taught moral theology at St. Paul Seminary in Minnesota, lectured on labor issues, and worked for minimum wage laws for women in Wisconsin and Minnesota. His book The Living Wage (1906) was the first of many publications that addressed the plight of the wage earner. In 1919, Ryan wrote the policy statement of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, known as the "Bishops' Program of Social Reconstruction." It contained eleven proposals that anticipated New Deal legislation. Ryan was so zealous a supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal that he was sometimes referred to as "Monsignor New Dealer." See also Catholic social teachings.

Sabas, St., also known as Sava, 439–532. 1 A monk born in Cappadocia, the founder of the large lavra (colony of monks) known as Mar Saba, located between Jerusalem and the Dead Sea. The monastery, with few monks, still functions. Its best known resident was John of Damascus (d. ca. 749). Sabas opposed Origenism and Monophysitism. He is buried at Mar Saba. Feast day: December 5. 2 Patron saint of Serbia, d. 1235. Feast day: January 14 (Serbian Orthodox Church).

Sabbath (Heb., shabbat, "to stop, rest"), the seventh day of the Jewish week. On the Sabbath no work is to be done, according to early biblical laws (Exod 23:12; 34:21; Lev 23:2–3) and both versions of the Ten Commandments (Exod 20:8–11; Deut 5:12–15). The prophets and later books praise observance and condemn violations of the Sabbath rest (Isa 56:1–6; Neh 13:19–21). Concern for keeping the Sabbath and the development of more detailed rules are evident in Second Temple literature (1 Macc 2:32–38), the NT (Mark 2:23–3:6), and rabbinic literature. Sabbath observance was a well-known Jewish practice during the Greco-Roman period.

Sabbath was a festival marked by a holy convocation and special sacrifices (Lev 23:2–3; Num 28:9–10) and symbolically associated with creation (Gen 2:2–3; Exod 20:11), the covenant (Exod 31:16), and holiness. The origins of Sabbath observance are unclear: the term may be connected with a Mesopotamian word for the day of the full moon or derived from the root sbt ("completion, cessation"). Or the practice may reflect a cultural preference for periods of seven days. Followers of Jesus continued the observance of every seventh day as holy but soon transferred the day to Sunday, the day of Jesus' Resurrection (Acts 20:7 and often in early Christian literature). From the fourth century on, councils and Christian legislation frequently mandated cessation from work and attendance at worship on Sunday. See also Sunday.

Sabbatine Privilege, a promise of Mary's to bring to heaven, on the Saturday after their death, the wearers of the Carmelite brown scapular, a tradition based on a papal bull now considered spurious. See also scapular.

Sabellianism, third-century trinitarian belief denying any real distinction of the divine Persons. It has been variously defined as Modalism or as a form of Monarchianism and was condemned by Dionysius of Alexandria (d.ca. 264) because of its exaggerated emphasis on the unity of the divine Being. The chief spokesperson for this doctrine, a Roman cleric named Sabellius, developed a theme from the writings of Noëtus of Smyrna, whose work was largely a reaction to subordinationism. Like other Monarchianists, Sabellius held that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are merely modes, aspects, or energies of one divine Person, who exercises three distinct functions or activities on behalf of humanity. See also Modalism; Monarchianism; Trinity, doctrine of the.

sacrament (Lat., sacramentum, "oath," "pledge"), one of the seven principal liturgical rites of the Church through which participants experience the love and power of God (grace) that flows from Christ's Passion, death, and Resurrection. Prior to the determination of the present list of seven sacraments in the twelfth century, the term "sacrament" had a much broader meaning. Used originally to name any manifestation of God's power and love in space and time, sacrament (Gk., mysterion, "mystery") also conveyed a sense of hiddenness. This usage stems from the use of the word mysterion in the Greek version of the Scriptures to indicate the hidden plan of God manifested in human history and made accessible to those who have faith (see, e.g., Wis 6:22; Matt 13:11; Rom 16:25–26; Eph 1:9–10). The life of Jesus Christ, culminating in his suffering, death, and Resurrection (the "Paschal Mystery") is the realization of God's loving intention to save humanity and the basis not only for the Church's sacramental worship, but also for its existence.

Tertullian (d. ca. 220), a lawyer from North Africa, was the first to translate mysterion into Latin as sacramentum. In secular usage, a sacramentum was the pledge or oath a soldier made upon entering military service. Sometimes this oath was accompanied by branding the new soldier on the arm with a sign of the general he was to serve. Tertullian spoke of Baptism using this image of sacramentum as a permanent consecration to God's service through word (oath) and visible sign (brand) made possible through sharing in the Paschal Mystery of Christ. Augustine (d. 430) further developed a notion of mysterion/sacramentum that would prove very influential in the writings of later theologians. He described a sacrament as a sacred sign or "visible word" composed of word and material element. This distinction would help later theologians develop the distinction between matter (the material substance) and form (the verbal formula).

During the Scholastic period (eleventh–thirteenth centuries) a more systematic approach to the sacraments was introduced, influenced by the newly recovered philosophy of Aristotle. There was a concern to distinguish the principal ways in which God builds up the Church and brings its members to salvation. The seven sacraments were thus distinguished from sacramentals in that the sacraments are "instrumental causes" of grace, the means by which God chooses to sanctify humanity and unify the Church. God unfailingly acts in these signs because they were instituted by Christ himself. The Church's present list of seven sacraments dates from this period, as does the familiar definition of a sacrament as "an outward sign, instituted by Christ, to give grace." The seven sacraments are: Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Reconciliation (or Penance), Anointing of the Sick, Marriage (or Matrimony), and Holy Orders.

In recent years, modern sacramental theology, while not disagreeing with the Scholastic definition, has emphasized that the Incarnation of Jesus Christ is the "first" sacrament. It is from the Word taking flesh in the person of Christ—in his living, suffering, dying, and rising again—that all sacraments ultimately derive their power. The Church is also a sacrament insofar as it is a continuation of Christ's presence on earth until the end of time, for it is the Church, existing in time and space—the Body of Christ in this world—that proclaims God's powerful love for humanity in and through the Paschal Mystery of the Risen Lord. See also Anointing of the Sick; Baptism; Confirmation; Eucharist; Holy Orders; Marriage; Reconciliation; sacramental character; sacramentals.

MARK R. FRANCIS

sacrament, form of a, the verbal formula determined by the Church that so "shapes" the material element and ritual action prescribed by the rite that the sacrament is truly celebrated. Thus, for example, the form in the Roman rite for the sacrament of Baptism is the declarative sentence, "I baptize you in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit" while the minister immerses the person being baptized in water or pours water over the candidate's head. The words defined by the Church as the form of the sacrament are the absolute minimum necessary for those present to be sure that the sacrament was indeed celebrated. See also sacrament; sacrament, matter of a.

sacrament, matter of a, the material element and/or gesture used in the celebration of the sacrament. For example, the matter of the Eucharist is the bread and wine; of Baptism, the threefold immersion or pouring of water; of Holy Orders, the imposition of hands on the head of the ordinand. The sacrament of Reconciliation is the only sacrament to which this definition does not strictly apply. In Reconciliation the matter is not a gesture or material element, but the penitent's contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Matter is often discussed with its correlative term, "form": the words used to announce God's saving action in the sacrament. See also sacrament; sacrament, form of a.

sacramental character (Gk., karakter, "distinctive mark"), the traditional teaching, affirmed by the Council of Trent (1545), that in the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders "a character is imprinted on the soul, a certain spiritual and indelible mark, and for this reason these sacraments cannot be repeated" (D 1609).

A scriptural basis for this affirmation was found in the interpretation given to certain biblical texts by Greek patristic writers who interpreted the Greek word "seal" (sphragis) as a description of how Christians are marked by Baptism. Rev 7:2–8; 2 Cor 1:22; and Eph 1:13, 4:13 are all cited as supporting the notion that the Holy Spirit permanently seals or marks as God's servants those who are baptized.

The teaching regarding the nonrepeatability of certain sacraments is found as early as Augustine (d. 430), who sought to explain the common practice of not rebaptizing persons who had received the sacraments of initiation at the hands of heretics. He maintained that in the conferral of the sacraments of initiation as well as in Holy Orders it is really Christ who acts. Therefore, the fact that the minister is in error or sin does not affect the permanent, public, and lasting value of Baptism (including Confirmation) and Holy Orders.

It was not until the thirteenth century that theologians began to discuss the nature of the sacramental character itself. Pope Innocent III (d. 1216) distinguished between the sacramental character and the grace bestowed by these sacraments. Alexander of Hales (d. 1245) and Bonaventure (d. 1274) taught that sacramental character was a habitus (Lat., "condition") that marks the soul and disposes it to the grace of the sacrament. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), on the other hand, described character more in functional terms, emphasizing that it is a potentia

(Lat., "power") or spiritual power that conforms an individual more to Christ, forever changing one's relationship to God and the Church, giving one a share in Christ's priesthood, and deputing the Christian to engage in acts of worship.

The Council of Florence in 1439 affirmed the existence of a character imparted by the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders, speaking of character as an "impress" on the soul (D 1313). It was this definition that was essentially repeated by the Council of Trent to answer Luther's denial of the existence of the sacramental character.

Contemporary theological treatment of the sacramental character has tended to move away from discussing character as a "thing" conferred at Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders, and has emphasized that the reception of these sacraments publicly and irrevocably changes one's relationship to Christ and the Church. Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964, n. 11), for example, speaks in dynamic terms of the character conferred by Baptism as that which appoints all Christians to religious worship and witness to the faith.

The teaching on sacramental character underscores the Church's deeply held conviction that, despite any possible infidelity on our part, God is always true to the divine promises incarnated in Christ and celebrated in the sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders. See also Baptism; Confirmation; Holy Orders. MARK R. FRANCIS sacramental grace. See grace, sacramental.

sacramentality, principle of, the notion that all reality, both animate and inanimate, is potentially or in fact the bearer of God's presence and the instrument of God's saving activity on humanity's behalf. This principle is rooted in the nature of a sacrament as such, i.e., a visible sign of the invisible presence and activity of God. Together with the principles of mediation (God works through secondary agents to achieve divine ends) and communion (the end of all of God's activity is the union of humanity), the principle of sacramentality constitutes one of the central theological characteristics of Catholicism. See also Catholicism; sacrament.

sacramentals, sacred signs instituted by the Church, similar to the seven major sacraments in that they "signify effects, particularly of a spiritual kind, that are obtained through the Church's intercession. They dispose people to receive the chief effect of the sacraments and they make holy various occasions in human life." This definition of sacramentals, taken from the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963, n. 60), points to a renewed understanding of the way in which sacramentals help sanctify human life and how they are intrinsically related to the sacraments themselves.

Unlike older definitions of sacramentals, such as the one found in the previous code of canon law that referred to sacramentals as objects and actions usually "done by" the clergy, this new definition identifies sacramentals as dynamic signs used in celebration. They are first and foremost liturgical actions in which the faithful are invited to participate (Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 79). Thus, holy water, ashes, palms, candles, and the like serve legitimate liturgical purposes and are not simply static objects but elements that enhance individual and communal prayer. It is true that some sacramentals, such as rosaries and medals, are not used in a specifically liturgical context, but they too remind individuals of God's presence in their lives and call them to prayer.

Among those signs named as sacramentals by the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy are liturgical prayers and rites used in administering the sacraments, funerals, exorcisms, blessings of persons, and consecrations and blessings of objects. All sacramentals are intercessory prayers of the Church. They ask for God's grace and blessing on persons—for example, on a religious woman or man consecrating themselves to Christ in the context of a religious community—or on objects such as ashes, holy water, rosaries, sacred images (and on those who are to use these objects). Blessings of secular objects or places used daily by the faithful, such as homes, cars, and places of business, also fall under the category of sacramentals.

Sacramentals are distinguished from sacraments in that they have been instituted by the Church and do not find their origin in Christ. While sacraments produce their effect ex opere operato (Lat., "from the work done") because it is Christ himself who celebrates them, sacramentals confer grace because of the Church's power of intercession (ex opere operantis ecclesiae, Lat., "by the work of the working Church"). They exist in order to make holy almost every event in the lives of believers and, like the sacraments, draw their power from the Paschal Mystery of Christ's Passion, death, and Resurrection, the only source of the Church's power. Sacramentals, like the sacraments, also underscore the Church's deeply held conviction that all of creation is a potential medium for the revelation of God's presence and blessing. In speaking about sacramentals, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (n. 61) affirms the goodness of the material world and plainly states that "there is hardly any proper use of material things that cannot be directed toward human sanctification and the praise of God."

Although the Apostolic See reserves to itself the regulation of all sacramentals (can. 1167), the 1983 Code of Canon Law recognizes the age-old practice of the Christian people in administering some sacramentals. Many of the practices of popular religion, of exchanging blessings and the like, are now legally allowed by the 1983 code (can. 1168); laypersons can be legitimate ministers of some sacramentals in accord with the provisions in the liturgical books, e.g., parents blessing their children, laypersons distributing ashes on Ash Wednesday. Non-Catholics can also now be the recipients of some sacramentals.

Along with the sacraments themselves that hallow the key moments in human life—the Liturgy of the Hours (Divine Office) that sanctifies the Christian day and the liturgical year that relates the annual cycle of seasons to God's grace—sacramentals address the myriad of occasions in the lives of individuals, families, and communities where there is need for the Church's prayer and the blessing of God. See also sacrament. MARK R. FRANCIS sacramentary, the liturgical book containing all the prayers needed by the presider (priest or bishop) for Mass, for the celebration of sacraments (e.g., Baptism), for the Liturgy of the Hours, and for occasional services (e.g., funerals). As the presider's book, the sacramentary does not include material needed by other ministers in the liturgy (e.g., it contains neither Bible readings nor music, because these are assigned to readers, deacons, or cantors). Nor does the sacramentary provide "rubrics" (detailed directions about how the service is to be conducted), since these are contained in books known as ordines (Lat., singular, ordo). The sacramentary did not appear all at once in developed form; its historical evolution is complex. It was preceded by small booklets or leaflets (Lat., libelli missarum), which contained formulas for one or more Masses (e.g., the texts for Christmas day). Eventually these booklets were collected into larger groups. An early example is the sixth-century collection called the Leonine or Verona Sacramentary. Although the Verona Sacramentary followed the civil calendar, later sacramentaries, such as the Old Gelasian (manuscript, ca. 750) and the Gregorian (manuscript, late eighth century), usually followed the church calendar. As early as the tenth century, the sacramentaries began to be replaced by books called "missals" or "pontificals," which contained all parts of the service (including readings and music) in a single portable volume. By the thirteenth century the sacramentary had all but disappeared. It was restored as a functional liturgical book following Vatican Council II (1962–65). See also Roman Missal; sacrament. NATHAN MITCHELL sacrament house, a late Gothic tower-shaped receptacle for reservation of consecrated hosts (Blessed Sacrament). It was freestanding or attached to the sanctuary wall. Used universally in German-speaking countries until the seventeenth century (Cologne until the nineteenth), it was prohibited by Church law in 1917 in favor of the tabernacle. See also tabernacle.

Sacrament of the Sick. See Anointing of the Sick.

sacramentum tantum (sah-krah-men'toom tahn' toom; Lat., "the sacrament itself"), in classical sacramental theology, the external rite and symbol perceptible to the senses. For example, in the Eucharist, the sacramentum tantum is the consecrated bread and wine; in Baptism, the pouring of water and the invocation of the Trinity. See also res et sacramentum; res tantum; sacrament.

sacrarium (Lat., "sacristy"), a basin or sink located in the sacristy that drains directly into the soil. The sacristy is a preparation and vesting room usually located near the sanctuary or wherever the liturgical rite is to be celebrated. The sacrarium is used for the cleaning of Mass linens, purificators, and eucharistic vessels. It is also used for the disposal of blessed ashes, oils, or holy water. Consecrated wine, however, is never to be poured down the sacrarium.

Sacred College. See Cardinals, College of.

Sacred Heart of Jesus, Congregation of the (S.C.J.), a nonexempt (i.e., subject to the local bishop) clerical religious institute with pontifical status whose members take the traditional vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Founded in 1877 by Father Leon Dehon, their constitution received approbation from Rome in 1923. Its priests and brothers are committed to devotion and reparation to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and their works include education of young boys, seminaries, retreats, parishes, and missions. In the United States they minister especially among African Americans, Hispanics, and Native Americans. The Sacred Heart Fathers also conduct missions in South Africa. See also Sacred Heart, devotion to the.

Sacred Heart, devotion to the, a form of devotion to Jesus Christ as the Word of God Incarnate, consisting of veneration of his physical heart, united to his divinity, as the symbol of his redemptive love. Anchored in Jesus' assertion that living water would flow from his heart (John 7:37–39) and the patristic tradition that the Holy Spirit flowed out upon the Church from Jesus' pierced side (John 19:33–37), this devotion draws upon the popular sense of the heart as the seat of a person's inner life, both natural and supernatural. Christ's threefold love—human, infused, and divine—is epitomized by the pierced heart of Jesus hanging on the cross. The Middle Ages saw a transition from the wound in Jesus' side as a source of grace to the Heart of Jesus as the express object of a particular, more personal devotion. Coupled with a subjective piety that emphasized Christ's Passion, the devotion was taken up by the Devotio Moderna and was bequeathed to the Society of Jesus and the Sisters of the Visitation by their founders, Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) and Francis de Sales (1567–1622). John Eudes (1601–80) composed a Mass and Office of the Sacred Heart, and the private revelations of Margaret Mary Alacoque (1647–90) at Paray-le-Monial, France (1673–75), promoted the devotion and shaped its practice, especially acts of reparation and consecration. In 1765, the bishops of Poland were allowed to celebrate a feast of the Sacred Heart, which was extended to the universal Church in 1856. It is celebrated on the Friday after Corpus Christi. The practice of enthroning an image of the Sacred Heart in homes began at Paray-le-Monial in 1907. Pope Pius XII described the theological foundation of the devotion in the encyclical Haurietis Aquas (1956).

JAMES T. CONNELLY

A type of depiction of the Sacred Heart of Jesus that was common in pre–Vatican II Catholicism. It is one of many mass-produced devotional items in an art style in which Jesus is portrayed as effeminate, if not sexless.

sacred minister, technical term used in canon law for an ordained minister. Ordained ministry is considered sacred not only because of the responsibilities of the minister, but also because it is conferred through a sacred sacrament. See also ministry.

sacrifice, anything offered to God. The positive function of sacrifice was to appease the deity by offering a gift, while the negative function was to remove sin. Priestly theory (as expressed in the narrative and legal portion of the Pentateuch composed by priests) distinguished between inadvertent and deliberate sin ("acting high-handedly," Num 15:27–31), and it remains unclear to what extent sacrifice could expiate the latter (see Heb 9:22). The biblical narrative records sacrifices made from the earliest times, e.g., by Cain and Abel (Gen 4:3–5) and Noah (Gen 8:20–22), but according to the Priestly view sacrificial ritual was instituted at Sinai. Lev 1–7 is a manual of instruction for the performance of sacrificial ritual, with the respective roles of priesthood and laity clearly specified. The principal types of sacrifice were the burnt, cereal, and peace offerings, which were unscheduled and ad hoc, and the mandatory sin (purgation) and guilt (reparation) sacrifices, which were essential for the removal of sin. Sacrifice also accompanied the making of covenants (Gen 31:54; Exod 24:3–8) and the Passover is explicitly designated as a sacrifice (Exod 12:27). The near-sacrifice of Isaac by Abraham (Gen 22) may have had the purpose of discouraging the practice of human sacrifice, which, however, was not unknown in Israel (Judg 11:30–40; 2 Sam 21:1–14; 1 Kgs 16:34; 2 Kgs 16:3; 21:6). Infant sacrifice associated with Molech, common in Phoenicia and its colonies, was practiced in Judah and proscribed during the reign of Josiah (2 Kgs 23:10).

The sacrificial cult came to an end with the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. In the NT, sacrificial language serves to bring out the meaning of the self-offering of Jesus by his death (1 Cor 5:7, Heb 9–10). See also Eucharist; priesthood. JOSEPH BLENKINSOPP sacrifice of the Mass, the doctrine of the Church that Christ's sacrifice on the cross is made present in the celebration of the Eucharist. Late Judaism had already developed the principle that the sacrifice most pleasing to God was the obedience of a person to the divine law and will and that fidelity to God, even to the point of martyrdom, could be a source of salvation for others. Jesus would have been aware of this tradition. His words regarding the cup of his blood being poured out for the many have definite sacrificial overtones (cf. Mark 14:24). The setting of the Last Supper within the context of the Passover celebration—with the sacrificed lamb as the center of the meal—would have heightened awareness of Jesus' sacrificial intentions.

Certainly the first-century Christians did not hesitate to understand Jesus' death as a sacrifice (cf. 1 Cor 5:7). Paul's contrast of the Eucharist with pagan sacrifices (1 Cor 10:14–22) hints at the fuller identification of Eucharist as sacrifice in the future. So, too, does the Bread of Life discourse in the Gospel of John (cf. especially 6:51).

In the second century there was increasing application of sacrificial terminology to the Eucharist, culminating in the identification of the Eucharist as a sacrificial action in the beginning of the third century. Patristic thought saw this action as the Church's, which could make this offering only in the power of Christ's own sacrifice made present through the Church's remembrance of the Paschal Mystery. The Church's engagement of itself in remembrance of the death and Resurrection of the Lord is made possible by that very mystery, which makes itself present through the Church's action and assumes that action unto itself so that the Church's offering is ultimately Christ's offering of himself through and with the self-offering of the members of his ecclesial body.

The Reformers of the sixteenth century, reacting against abuses and exaggerations in the role of the priest and the multiplication of Masses, denied that the Eucharist is a sacrifice because such a teaching took away from the unique and infinitely abundant sacrifice of Christ on the cross. The Council of Trent responded in 1562 by declaring that "in the Mass, the same Christ who offered himself once in a bloody manner on the cross is contained and is offered in an unbloody manner." Christ's offering is one and unrepeatable, but it is made present in every Eucharist.

It has been in the twentieth century that scholars have recovered the rich notions of memorial in the Scriptures and the patristic era. The remembrance of divine action opens space and time to the presence of that divine action, fulfilled once historically but in the eternity of God always available to subsequent generations. Thus Christ continues to make his sacrifice on the cross present and effective for the Church, which through his Spirit gathers to remember and give thanks for his death and Resurrection.

The recovery of the ancient notion of memorial has led to increasing ecumenical agreement on the presence of Christ's sacrifice in the Eucharist. See also crucifixion; Eucharist; priesthood.

JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI

sacrilege, the violation or profanation of any sacred person, place, or thing. There are three categories of sacrilege: personal, local, and real.

A personal sacrilege is the violation of persons who have dedicated themselves to God by Holy Orders or religious vows. Canon law establishes penalties for the use of physical force against clerics and religious. The penalty for assault against the Holy Father is automatic excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See; against a bishop, the penalty is automatic interdict, an ecclesiastical censure imposed without a hearing or other process. Physical force against a cleric or religious out of contempt for the faith, the Church, ecclesiastical power, or ministry is punishable by a just penalty. Also considered sacrilegious are wrongfully imprisoning or suing clergy and religious, or engaging in sexual conduct with them.

A local sacrilege is the violation of a sacred place—a dedicated or blessed church, oratory, private chapel, altar, or cemetery. The violation occurs by the commission of certain crimes in them, such as murder or theft of precious or sacred objects, or by engaging in sexual acts in them. Sacrilege also occurs by illicitly using the sacred place for a profane purpose.

A real sacrilege is the violation of a sacred thing that has been dedicated to God or reserved for divine worship. A standard example is simony, i.e., the selling of spiritual goods. Another is sacrilegious Communion—the reception of Holy Communion when one is conscious of serious sin and has not made an act of perfect contrition with the intention of confessing the sin. Such examples of sacrilege are considered mortally sinful. JOHN HUELS sacristan, person charged with the care and maintenance of sacred vessels, vestments, altar linens, candles, oils, holy water, and other liturgical items. The sacristan may be lay, religiously professed, or ordained. In larger churches and shrines, the sacristan may be a full-time ministry, though in most parishes the duties of sacristan are shared among volunteers.

sacristy, a preparation and vesting room, often located to one side of the sanctuary. Vestments, altar linens, eucharistic vessels, and other liturgical wares are stored in the sacristy. It is the place where the presider and other liturgical ministers proximately prepare for liturgical ceremonies by vesting and by sharing last-minute instructions and a brief prayer.

Sacrosanctum Concilium (sah-kroh-sahnk' t*oo*m kahn-chee'lee-*oo*m). See Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy.

Sadducees (sad'j*oo*-s*ee*z), a Jewish religiopolitical party in the last two centuries B.C. and the first A.D. No Sadducean writings have survived, but the Sadducees' views were described by the first-century historian Josephus and by NT writers. Their name, which apparently derives from Zadok, the leading priest in the time of David and Solomon, suggests a priestly orientation. In legal matters, they considered only the written law of Moses to be authoritative, not the oral tradition of commentary accepted by their opponents, the Pharisees. They denied the existence of fate and believed that individuals are responsible for their own actions. They are mentioned several times in the NT in connection with other denials. In Matt 22:23–33 Jesus refuted their thesis that there would be no resurrection of the dead. The same issue figured in a dispute between Paul and Sadducean members of the council reported in Acts 23:1–10. When Paul mentioned the resurrection of the dead (which the Pharisees accepted), there was a violent disagreement between Pharisees and the Sadducees who "say there is no resurrection, or angel, or spirit; but the Pharisees acknowledge all three" (23:8). The Sadducees, according to Josephus, thought the soul died with the body and that there was no afterlife. Josephus also reports that the Sadducees were men of high standing in society and the group attracted only the wealthy. Some high priests are known to have been Sadducees, and they exercised strong influence on the state at different times, though the Pharisees were usually more popular. See also Pharisees; scribes.

Sadoleto, Jacopo (jah-koh'poh sah-doh-lay' toh), 1477–1547, Italian cardinal, classical scholar, reformer. An influential adviser to Pope Paul III, in 1537 Sadoleto became a member of a special commission on Church reform and for the preparation of a general council (to be held eventually at Trent). He tried to reconvert Protestants, notably Philipp Melanchthon (1537) and the city of Geneva (1539), without force but also without dogmatic compromise. Extremist Catholics suspected his orthodoxy, charging that his theology of grace and original sin reflected a semi-Pelagianist bias, ascribing too much to human effort and too little to grace in the attainment of salvation.

Sailer, Johann Michael (z̲i'luhr), 1751–1832, German pastoral theologian. Ordained in 1775, he served as professor of theology at Ingolstadt, Dillingen, and Landshut. In 1829 he became bishop of Regensburg. He is considered one of the founders of the science of pastoral theology, which seeks to understand and develop the implications of faith for the actual situation of the Church, specifically for preaching, counseling, and various other ministries.

Saint-Cyran, Abbé de, 1581–1643, a founder of Jansenism. Born Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, he was Cornelius Jansen's friend and an important supporter of Jansenism as the spiritual counselor to the convent of Port-Royal and Antoine Arnauld, brother of Mère Angélique, the abbess of the convent. He was incarcerated from 1638 to 1643 for his Jansenism and for opposing Cardinal Richelieu, the chief minister of France. His influence continued through his spiritual direction and his Lettres chrétiennes et spirituelles (1645), which contained the basic teachings of the Jansenist movement, namely, an emphasis on the irresistible power of grace, the Sainte-Chapelle, thirteenth-century chapel and masterpiece of Gothic architecture and medieval glass, was built in Paris for King Louis IX to house various relics of the Passion of Christ, including allegedly the Crown of Thorns.

An abbey church founded in Paris in the sixth century, Saint-Germain-des-Prés became a center of historical scholarship in the seventeenth century, but most of the abbey, like other Catholic properties, was destroyed in the French Revolution of 1789.

difficulty of attaining salvation, and the need for a life of moral severity and rigorism. See also Jansenism; Port-Royal.

Saint-Denis, abbey in Paris founded ca. 625 on the reputed site of the martyrdom of the patron saint of France who during the Middle Ages was assimilated to the Dionysius reported in Acts (17:34) to have been converted by Paul. Known as the first Gothic church from the twelfth-century renovations under Abbot Suger, Saint-Denis served as the burial site for the kings of France. See also Denis, St.

Sainte-Chapelle (sant shah-pel'), chapel built in Paris ca. 1245 for King Louis IX of France to house relics of the Passion, including the Crown of Thorns. Desecrated in 1791, it still retains much of its original character despite heavy remodeling in the nineteenth century.

Saint-Germain-des-Prés (san jher-manh' deh preh'), Benedictine abbey founded in the middle of the sixth century. Located in Paris, the abbey is named after its benefactor, Germain (d. 576), bishop of Paris. The abbey became a great center of learning during the seventeenth century.

Saint Joan's Alliance, originally called the Catholic Women's Suffrage Society, an international organization founded in London in 1911 to secure legal and true equality of women in the Church and in society. Since 1915, they focus especially on the Church. The Alliance holds consultative status at the United Nations.

Saint John Lateran. See Lateran Basilica.

Saint Mary Major, also known as Santa Maria Maggiore, one of Rome's four major basilicas. Founded in the fourth century by Pope Liberius on the Esquiline Hill, the present church was built by Pope Sixtus III in the fifth century. Relics of Christ's manger are reputed to be held in the basilica. The feast commemorating its founding is August 5, which was formerly called Our Lady of the Snows because, according to legend, the pope built on a site where snow fell in August. See also basilica.

The interior of the basilica of Saint Mary Major in Rome. According to a medieval legend, the Blessed Virgin Mary left her footprints on the site during a miraculous snowfall one August evening; thus the feast of Our Lady of the Snows.

Saint Patrick's Cathedral, New York City landmark and the cathedral church of the archdiocese of New York. The present structure superseded the Old Cathedral and was the personal dream of Archbishop John Hughes, who was determined to erect a cathedral "worthy of the increasing numbers, intelligence, and wealth" of the Catholic community.

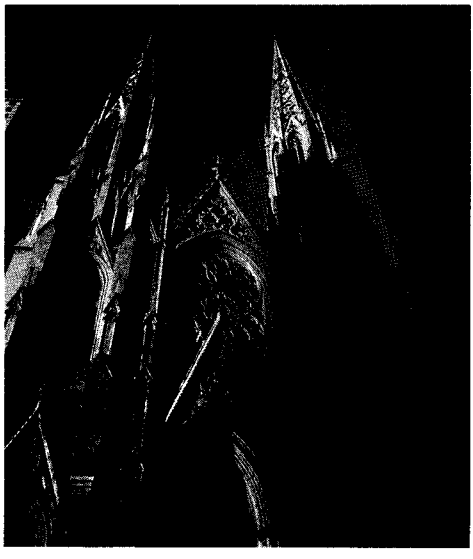
Architect James Fenwick was commissioned to build the Gothic Revival church. In preparation for the groundbreaking in 1858, Hughes circulated a letter to raise the funds "for the glory of God . . . Holy Mother Church . . . the honor of the Catholic name in this country." It was left to his successor, Cardinal John McCloskey, to complete the task; the formal dedication was held on May 25, 1879. The orator Bishop Patrick John Ryan delivered the sermon to a crowd of seven thousand, commending both the rich and the "children of toil" who gave generously to build the "greatest church edifice of the New World," a testimony to the great spirit of the "faith of the ages."

Expansion of the scope and structure of the cathedral continued over the years with the construction of the famous spires in 1885 and the lady chapel in 1906. The mortgage finally cleared, St. Patrick's was solemnly consecrated to the service of God by Cardinal John Farley in 1910.

Saint Patrick's Purgatory, a pilgrimage center on an island in Lough (Lake) Derg, County Donegal, Ireland. Nothing can be said of a connection with St. Patrick since pilgrimages probably began in the twelfth century. To this day it is a popular center of pilgrimage and penance during the summer months. See also Ireland, Catholicism in; Patrick, St.

Saint Paul's Outside the Walls, one of the four major basilicas in Rome. Its full name derives from its location on the Via Ostia outside the walls of the city. First built over the relics of St. Paul by Constantine in the fourth century and later enlarged, the basilica burned to the ground in 1823. It was rededicated (after a complete rebuilding) in 1854. Only the mosaics in the present church survived the fire. The church has been maintained over the centuries by Benedictine monks who live in an adjacent monastery. See also basilica; basilica, major.

The imposing facade and spires of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York City, one of American Catholicism's most recognizable symbols and one of the city's most popular tourist attractions. It is the largest Catholic cathedral in the United States.



The interior of the basilica of St. Paul's Outside the Walls in Rome, one of the city's four major basilicas and the place where, on January 25, 1959, Pope John XXIII first announced his intention to call the Second Vatican Council.

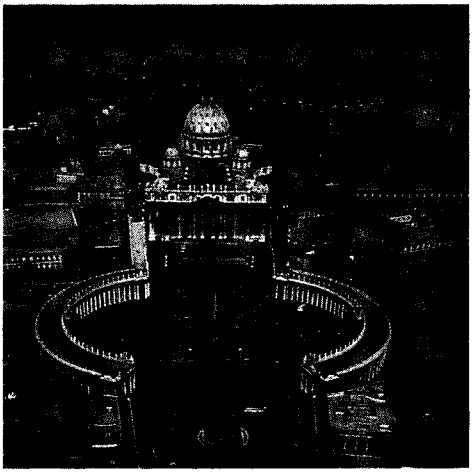
Saint Peter's Basilica, Catholicism's principal church. Built over the site on Vatican Hill in Vatican City State where St. Peter was said to have been buried, the original building was constructed during the reign of the emperor Constantine (d. 337). The original church was built in the basilica style with a large courtyard (atrium) at its entrance. The present church was begun in 1506 under the direction of a succession of architects (Bramante, Raphael, Peruzzi, and Sangallo). The final shape of the church derives from Michelangelo (d. 1564), who did not live to see the erection of the great dome. (The dome stands 404 feet from the pavement and has an interior diameter of 137 feet.) The long nave and facade, designed by Carlo Maderno, was added in the seventeenth century; it was not planned by Michelangelo, who had envisioned the church as having the shape of a Greek cross. Over the main entrance, Maderno also installed a loggia for public blessings. Now 619 feet in length, the church was dedicated by Pope Urban VIII (d. 1644) in 1626. Gianlorenzo Bernini (d. 1680) further decorated its interior with the famous baldachino over the main altar, and the baroque "altar of the chair" was added. He also designed the piazza in front of the basilica. Set off by a semicircle of four rows of columns, the piazza is centered by an Egyptian obelisk excavated from the nearby Gardens of Nero. The obelisk, in turn, is flanked by two fountains.

Excavations begun in this century have shown that the church is built over a large Roman necropolis. Archaeologists think they have discovered the ancient marker (Lat., tropheum) that was placed over the grave of Peter before the building of the Constantinian basilica in those excavations. The "confessio" (Peter's grave) is under the main papal altar. The crypts and altars of the basilica contain the burial places of over a hundred and thirty popes. See also basilica; Michelangelo; Vatican City State.

LAWRENCE CUNNINGHAM

St. Peter's Basilica, Vatican City, Catholicism's mother church; Bernini's famous columns embrace St. Peter's Square, with the obelisk at its center; the papal residence is behind the columns to the right and the Vatican Gardens are to the rear of the basilica. Various administrative offices are to the left, including the papal audience hall.



saints, in a strict sense, those officially recognized (canonized) by the Church as persons who have lived a holy life, who now share in the Beatific Vision (i.e., face-to-face experience of the presence of God), and who may be publicly venerated by the faithful. To be sure, there are countless more saints than those who have been formally offered for public veneration. Anyone who may reasonably be believed to have lived a good life and who, therefore, may be presumed to be enjoying eternal life with God can be considered a saint. Devotion to the saints is an expression of the doctrine of the communion of saints, a belief that even death does not break the bonds that tie Christians together. Holiness of life and heroic virtue mark a saint; miracles and wonders worked are not necessarily signs of saintliness.

Saints do not witness to one model of sanctity. The list of canonized saints provides a wide variety of models of holiness. Saints come from all walks of life and provide creative instances of living a Christian life in different times and in response to different challenges. The faithful are encouraged to follow the example of the virtuous lives of the saints according to the lights of their own day.

History: Paul used the word "saint" to refer to all the Christian faithful (2 Cor 13:12; Eph 1:1). Neither the OT nor the NT speak explicitly about invocation of the saints. In the early Church, however, veneration of the original disciples of Jesus and of martyrs became widespread. Soon, persons who suffered for the faith (confessors) but who were not martyred were also venerated. After the era of persecution subsided, virgins, hermits, and monks were honored as saints. In time, holy persons who led exemplary Christian lives, especially those who practiced great austerity and penance in the spirit of the martyrs, were added to the list.

Over the course of centuries, the number of persons proclaimed as saints by the faithful grew to enormous proportions. Each locality had its own list of saints and devotions to them. Abuses arose and the Church established a process whereby a bishop made the final decision after studying a biography and an account of miracles presented to him. If the bishop approved, the person was declared a saint and a feast day assigned in that diocese or province, usually the anniversary of their death.

The custom grew of asking the pope to formally approve the canonization, since papal approval had greater prestige than that of bishops. In 993, Ulric of Augsburg (d. 973), a bishop, was declared a saint in the first papal canonization (by Pope John XV). Gregory IX formalized the process and in 1234 papal canonization became the only legitimate form of canonization. Veneration of the saints was one of the controversial practices rejected by the Protestant Reformers because it seemed to detract from devotion to Christ. The Council of Trent (1545–63) reaffirmed the Catholic doctrine.

Veneration of Saints. The juridical process whereby a person, already declared blessed, is proclaimed a saint involves beatification (when public veneration is permitted) and canonization (the definitive declaration that the individual is in heaven). If, after a person has been beatified, additional miracles are alleged, a further process of investigation and verification is undertaken. Upon a positive completion of this process, the pope issues a bull of canonization declaring the blessed to be a saint and extending veneration of the saint to the whole Church. An elaborate and solemn ceremony celebrates the canonization.

Once a person has been declared a saint, a feast day is assigned, and churches and shrines may be dedicated to the saint. The person may be declared patron saint of a country, a diocese, or other religious institution. Statues and images may be struck, prayers said publicly in his or her honor, and relics venerated. A Mass is composed in the saint's honor.

Catholics pray only to God; they ask the saints to intercede for them with God. They do not believe that healing, forgiveness, or other blessings come through the power of the saint, but from God through the saint's intercession. Veneration afforded saints is considered praise and glory of God since holiness is impossible without the gift of God's grace. The veneration given to saints (Gk., dulia, "service or veneration") and to Mary (Gk., hyperdulia, "more than veneration") is distinguished from the adoration and worship due to God alone (Gk., latria, "worship"). Honor given to the saints is honor given to God. The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) teaches that while it is fitting to love the saints who are our brothers and sisters in Christ, devotion to the saints is ultimately directed toward God. "For by its very nature every genuine testimony of love which we show to those in heaven tends toward and terminates in Christ, who is the 'crown of all saints'. Through Him it tends toward and terminates in God who is wonderful in His saints and is magnified in them." (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 1964, n. 50). See also beatification; canonization; dulia; hyperdulia; patron saint; saints, devotion to.

Bibliography

Delaney, John J. Dictionary of Saints. New York: Doubleday, 1980.

Farmer, David Hugh. The Oxford Dictionary of Saints. 3rd edition. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Woodward, Kenneth. Making Saints: How the Catholic Church Determines Who Becomes a Saint, Who Doesn't, and Why. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1990.

REGINA COLL

saints, canonization of. See canonization.

saints, devotion to, private and public practices that honor or venerate holy men and women. These holy people are ordinarily, though not necessarily, properly canonized, i.e., their names placed on the official list (canon) of saints. Never to be confused with adoration (Gk., latria, "worship"), which is due God alone, devotion to a saint acknowledges his or her life of virtue as a model of holiness that provides a path to God through the one doorway, Jesus Christ. The saint was a holy person insofar as his or her life conformed to Christ's, manifested the inherent values of the gospel tradition and provided a paradigm for the Christian life. At certain junctures in the Church's history, confusion about the relationship between the saints and Christ caused the misconception that Catholics actually worship the saints. Church teaching retains the important distinction: God is worshiped; Mary and the saints are venerated and appropriately honored in private and public devotions.

In the earliest days of the Church's persecution, special homage was paid to the memory of martyrs who suffered to the point of death. The cult of martyrs united people in a common memory and cultivated devotional practices that invoked the martyrs' intercession. When the age of persecution ended with the Peace of Constantine (ca. 313), the cult of martyrs extended beyond "red martyrdom" to "white martyrdom." The latter included those who did not die but suffered imprisonment and torture because of their faith or those who purposely severed themselves from the mainstream of life in the world and took up the discipline of ascetics as monks in the desert or some other place of solitude. The cult of Mary as Mother of God and Mother of Christ also grew in the early centuries.

Both the "red" and "white" martyr came to be honored annually on the anniversary of his or her death, the day of birth to a new life in heaven. Churches were named in honor of saints and placed under their patronage. Special prayers to saints were added to the Mass and readings about them were inserted into the Liturgy of the Hours. Eastern churches venerated their images, while Western churches revered their relics. Hagiographical literature, or lives of the saints, came to be more familiar than Sacred Scripture and thus formed the Catholic imagination of the Middle Ages, when popular devotions to the saints flourished with pilgrimages to places where relics reposed. Saints' names were assigned to people and places as patrons, and feast days were often regarded as civic festivals.

Changes in Devotional Practices: There were excesses, and exaggerated stories and practices brought protests from within the Church itself (Lateran IV, 1215). In 1530, Martin Luther contested the intercessory role of saints as detrimental to Christ's role as the unique mediator between God and humankind. The Council of Trent (1545–63) countered Luther's stance by encouraging Catholics to invoke the saints as sources of grace from God through Christ, who alone is redeemer. The following centuries witnessed a steady increase in the canonization of saints and devotions to them, especially in Italy, Spain, and France.

Vatican II (1962–65) warned against abuses that detract from the praise of God in Christ. At the same time, the council encouraged devotion to the saints as a way to enrich the worship of God through Christ in the Holy Spirit. Postconciliar reforms addressed both public and private devotion to the saints by way of the church's official liturgical life and its public popular devotions, as well as the individual's private devotion. The liturgical life of the Church manifested the renewal in its liturgical calendar and books. The Sanctoral Cycle or Proper of Saints ensures the annual liturgical remembering of past figures who loom large in the corporate consciousness of Catholics. Obscure saints have been eliminated from the calendar, which was restructured on principles of universal and local devotion and need. The Lectionary (1969) and Sacramentary (1970) offer a common (a proper of the Mass that can be used by saints without a special Mass) of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of martyrs, pastors, Doctors of the Church, virgins, and holy men and women, as well as votive Masses for particular saints and one for all saints. The Office of Readings includes the writings of saints and hagiographical texts about them. Private devotions are encouraged by way of image and prayer, ultimately directed through the saint to Christ as the source of all holiness. Always a hallmark of the Catholic tradition, devotion to the saints is cutting across ecumenical lines in an increased awareness of the communion of saints among all Christian peoples. See also canonization; communion of saints; saints. DANIEL P. GRIGASSY sakkos (sah'kaws), Byzantine-rite episcopal dalmatic. Originally an imperial garment, its use as a liturgical vestment was extended to patriarchs and, progressively, to all ranks of bishops. See also dalmatic.

Saint-Sulpice, Society of. See Sulpicians.

Salamanca. See Salmanticenses.

Salesians, the Society of St. Francis de Sales (S.D.B.), a community of priests founded in Turin, Italy, by John Bosco in 1859 dedicated to the education of boys and young men. John Bosco had a lifelong interest in helping poor youth with their material needs and in seeing to their religious education. At first, he gathered boys for evening classes where they could learn trades in a religious atmosphere. Later, with the help of other interested priests, he established a "pious society" named after St. Francis de Sales (1567–1622) to develop this ministry to youth throughout Italy. It was Bosco's hope that some of the youngsters trained by the Salesians would eventually enter religious life. In 1772, he established the Daughters of Our Lady Help of Christians to work with girls in the same capacity. Today, both congregations have members all over the world. See also Bosco, St. John.

Salmanticenses (sahl-mahn-tee-chen'sez; Lat., "those of Salamanca"), collective name for the Spanish Discalced Carmelite authors of the commentary Cursus Theologicus Summam d. Thomae Complectens (1631–1701). This theological textbook, a huge running commentary on the Summa Theologiae of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), helped Salamancan Thomism attain influence throughout Europe. Its authors, professors at the University of Salamanca in Spain, were Antonio de la Madre de Dios (d. ca. 1640), Domíngo de Santa Teresa (d. 1654), Juan de la Anunciación (d. 1701), and three others. See also Summa Theologiae.

salt, symbol used in religious rituals from early times because of its seasoning and preservative qualities. The Rite of Blessing and Sprinkling of Holy Water in the Sacramentary contains the blessing for salt added to holy water. A blessing is also found in the Book of Blessings. See also blessing.

salvation, the condition of the ultimate restoration and fulfillment of humanity and all creation effected by God's action in Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit; also, the process by which this condition is brought about.

The Theology of Salvation: As the condition of humanity and the cosmos at the end of history, salvation is the final triumph over sin and death and, therefore, the ultimate accomplishment of God's purpose for creation. Sin is the rejection of God's will. It is made actual in the evil free decisions of individuals and embodied in unjust social arrangements. Sin results in disorder experienced variously as pride, alienation, enmity, oppression, and violence, as well as destruction of the environment. History, Christian tradition, and personal experience agree that human capability alone cannot bring about the needed reconciliation and restoration.

But in Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit, God is restoring and reconciling the world. God's work will be brought to completion at the end of history. This end will not be arbitrary; rather, it will be the consummation of history when all creation enters into the destiny intended for it by its Creator. Then all that is good, true, and beautiful in human nature and achievement will not be obliterated, but will be purified and transfigured.

Salvation as experience means perfect fulfillment and happiness. As such, God is its content as well as its cause. But complete and eternal union with God can never be adequately understood and expressed, because God's reality transcends human comprehension. While the Bible apparently depicts the experience of salvation quite explicitly (e.g., Matt 25, Rev 21), the pictorial details in passages like these cannot be taken as a descriptive report. "Heaven" and "Hell" are not places but rather the joy of union with God or the anguish of separation from God. The images are not meant to satisfy curiosity about the final state but to foster participation in it. Taken seriously but not literally, they are reminders of the ultimacy involved in one's everyday decisions.

Popular devotions, saints' testimonies, and theological reflections have also depicted the ultimate salvation in various ways. Official Church teachings, however, say essentially no more and no less than what the Bible affirms. They have been developed when needed to protect the mystery of salvation from being reduced to spatiotemporal categories and particular culture-bound models.

As a process, salvation is God's work of reconciliation and restoration in Jesus Christ in the Holy Spirit. As God Incarnate, Jesus is God's total self-gift to humanity. As human, Jesus makes humanity's complete and irrevocable acceptance of God's gift. This acceptance became definitive in his self-surrendering death on the cross and was vindicated in his Resurrection. The Church as the Body of Christ continues Jesus' saving work in the world. It expresses and brings about people's reconciliation with one another and with God.

Meaning of Salvation Today: Membership in the Catholic Church is, however, neither a requirement nor a guarantee of salvation. After the Protestant Reformation (sixteenth century) and prior to Vatican II (1962–65), many Catholics held Church membership to be necessary for salvation: "Outside the Church, no salvation." But the Church never definitively taught that Church membership was necessary for salvation and condemned the view that it was. Vatican II recovered a fundamental affirmation of the Catholic tradition in teaching that those who strive to do God's will as it is made known to them in conscience can be saved (e.g., Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 14).

Despite the Nicene Creed's confession of faith in the "resurrection of the body," Catholic theology before Vatican II tended to exalt grace over nature and spirit over matter. Salvation was taken as the healing and final condition of the soul, which survived death. The destiny of the body, along with the rest of material creation, was depreciated. So Christianity was attacked by some as a narcotic. By preaching a blissful hereafter, it seemed to render Christians uncaring and blind to the dehumanizing injustices of this world.

Vatican II recovered the more traditional and comprehensive meaning of salvation as transformation and restoration of the entire universe (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 39). Latin American liberation theology, European political theology, and feminist theologies have led the Church to insist that the process of salvation necessarily includes (but is not limited to) transformation of unjust and oppressive social conditions. Wherever people's God-given dignity and rights are denied, God's salvation is needed and awaited.

The mystery of salvation lies not in the impenetrable darkness of the future but in the omnipotent love of the God who is beyond human comprehension. To experience that love is to experience the essence of salvation's meaning and mystery. See also salvation outside the Church; universal salvific will of God. JON NILSON

Salvation Army, Protestant denomination and social service agency. Founded by William and Catherine Booth in 1865 to spread evangelicalism in the London slums, the Salvation Army emphasizes individual conversion, holy living, and social welfare activity among the poor. By the early 1990s the Salvation Army was functioning in over one hundred countries, and in the United States had over four hundred thousand members and over four thousand facilities serving more than five million people.

salvation history (Ger., Heilsgeschichte, "sacred history"), the pattern of events in human history that realize God's salvific activity. The notion of salvation history as a theological category was originally formulated in the nineteenth century to express the biblical teaching that God acted in the history of the divinely covenated community to bring salvation to the entire world. The key events recounted in the OT include God's promise to Abraham, the liberation of the Israelites from slavery, the Sinai covenant, the conquest of Canaan, and the establishment of the Davidic kingdom. The NT sees this history as culminating in the person of Jesus Christ, whose life, death, and Resurrection constitute God's definitive act of redemption. In much of Scripture, the believing community expresses the content of its faith precisely by reciting the story of these mighty deeds of God (e.g., Deut 26:5–9; Ps 105; Acts 10: 36–43).

In this understanding of salvation history in its special sense, contemporary Catholic theology contends that all history is the arena of God's salvific action, even if unrecognized. Further, Catholic theology affirms that salvation is a matter not just of an individual's inner religious experience, but also of a communal response to the concrete historical process wherein faith discerns the saving activity of God. The Church's ministry participates in that process: through word and sacrament and through the sacrifical love that meets evil with good. The Church serves as a divine instrument in liberating the human race from the effects of sin and ushering it into communion with the triune God. See also history, theology of; salvation.

salvation outside the Church, a topic of debate throughout the Church's history—whether people can be saved if they are not members of the Catholic Church. This question and possible answers to it must be understood in terms of the traditional axiom, "no salvation outside the Church" (Lat., extra Ecclesia, nulla salus). Taught by such early Church Fathers as Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) and Origen (d. ca. 254), this axiom reached its classic expression in Cyprian (d. 258) and Fulgentius of Ruspe (d. 527). Affirmed by Church councils (e.g., Lateran IV, 1215; Florence, 1442), and by papal documents through the centuries (e.g., Unam Sanctam, 1302; Quanto Conficiamur Moerore, 1863), this axiom states that salvation is granted only within the community of believers and highlights the biblical and Catholic view that salvation is a communal and not merely private event. Negatively, the most severe interpretation of this doctrine stated that salvation was possible only for visibly incorporated members of the Catholic Church, excluding from salvation Jews, Muslims, pagans, apostates, and members of Christian churches not in union with Rome. This interpretation was repeatedly rejected by Pius IX as invalid for those "invincibly ignorant of the true religion" (1854, 1863), and condemned by the Holy Office in Suprema Haec Sacra (1949). Pius XII in Mystici Corporis (1943) taught that non-Catholics can be saved by being "ordained to the mystical body of the Redeemer by some kind of unconscious desire or longing." Vatican II distinguished various ways in which diverse religious cultures are related to the Church and taught that all those "who seek God with a sincere heart, and, moved by grace, try in their actions to do his will as they know it through the dictates of their conscience may achieve eternal salvation" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 16). Awareness of divine mercy and the desire to extend the possibility of salvation have prompted theologians to devise ways to account for salvation outside of visible membership in the Church, e.g., a baptism of desire available for those who have not been baptized; implicit faith for those to whom the gospel has not been effectively presented; or a special moment of final choice at the time of death. After Vatican II, new developments in ecclesiology and soteriology, along with an increasingly acute awareness of the growing, not decreasing, number of non-Christians around the globe, led many theologians to assert more boldly that salvation is available outside the visible Church. To support this view some simply postulated that each religion is the place of salvation for its members. Others distinguished between the Church and the kingdom, between Christ and the Church, or between Christ (who saves Christians) and God (whose salvific will extends to all) and used these distinctions to explain how salvation is available to all. Karl Rahner (d. 1984) maintained that those who do not know Christ explicitly can nevertheless encounter him anonymously and live mysteriously in his grace and thus be in communion with the Church. By the end of the twentieth century, the terms of the debate were once again changing, as increasing familiarity with the world religions created a new context in which the issues related to "salvation outside the Church" were being rethought with respect to specific religions, their distinctive characteristics, and their own theologies of salvation. See also Church; salvation; universal salvific will of God.

FRANCIS X. CLOONEY

Salvatorians, the Society of the Divine Savior (S.D.S.), a society founded in Rome in 1881 by Father Franziskus Maria Jordan. They are priests and brothers who take vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, as well a fourth vow promising fidelity to the apostolate. The society's purpose is the spread of the faith through education, retreats, and missionary activity. The Salvatorians, who have missions in several foreign countries, arrived in the United States in 1896; their principal work has been the education of young people in seminaries and high schools. They also staff parishes, give retreats, and run programs for adult vocations. Father Jordan, with Baroness Theresia von Wüllenweber, also founded the Sisters of the Divine Savior in 1888.

Salve, Regina (Lat., "Hail, Holy Queen"), opening Latin words of an antiphon in honor of the Virgin Mary. The text was probably composed by Herman of Richenau (d. 1054). It was sung or recited after various hours in the Divine Office. During the Middle Ages laity joined with monks and friars in singing the Salve, Regina at the end of the day. From the fourteenth century it was usually sung after Compline in the Roman rite. Pius V directed that it also follow other hours of the Office. Leo XIII assigned it as a prayer to follow low Masses, a practice discontinued in 1964.

SALVE, REGINA

English text:

"Hail, Holy Queen, Mother of mercy! Hail, our life, our sweetness, and our hope! To you do we cry, poor banished children of Eve. To you do we send up our sighs, mourning and weeping in this valley of tears. Turn then, most gracious advocate, your eyes of mercy toward us; and after this, our exile, show unto us the blessed fruit of your womb, Jesus. O clement, O loving, O sweet Virgin Mary! Amen."

Salvian of Marseilles, ca. 390–ca. 480, theologian, best known for his Governance of God, a defense of providence (God's guiding care for the world) in the face of barbarian invasions and an important historical source. See also providence.

Samaria, a city and district in north-central Palestine. The city was the capital of the Northern Kingdom, Israel, until its fall in 721 B.C. and was later a provincial center. Jesus passed through the territory (John 4:4); Philip the deacon evangelized the city (Acts 8:5). It is the traditional site of John the Baptist's burial.

sanatio in radice (sah-nah'tsee-oh in rah-dee' chay; Lat., "healing in the root"). See sanation.

sanation, the validating or, literally, healing of a marriage previously considered invalid in Church law. The marriage might be considered invalid because a Catholic married outside a Catholic ceremony without the Church's permission or because the marriage labored under an undispensed impediment. Validation usually takes the form of the couple's exchanging consent before a properly authorized deacon or priest and two witnesses. This is commonly called the "blessing of marriage." A marriage may also be validated by a legal decree of the diocesan bishop as long as matrimonial consent is still mutually present on the part of each spouse. In these cases there is no obligation for the couple to formally exchange the consent before a Church officiant and two witnesses. This manner of validating a marriage can be used when one of the spouses is reluctant to exchange consent publicly.

Sanchez, Thomas, 1550–1610, Spanish Jesuit moral theologian. His major work, Disputations on the Sacrament of Holy Matrimony, enjoyed great authority during the seventeenth century. One volume of the Venetian edition was listed on the Index of Forbidden Books until the nineteenth century because it omitted a passage defending the pope's right to legitimize illegitimate children without interference from the civil authorities. The Venetian Republic objected to the passage. In his Opus Morale in Praecepta Decalogui (Lat., "Moral Opus on the Precepts of the Decalogue"), published after his death, Sanchez developed a moral system based on the Ten Commandments, but he did not go much beyond the Second.

sanctification (Lat., "making holy"), the transforming effect of divine love and presence in an individual's religious and moral life. Jesus' teaching about the "reign of God" and his metaphors about water and life, banquet and family, as well as Paul's theology of the presence of the Spirit in the Christian life are developed in theologies of human sanctity. Holiness follows upon God's gift of forgiving grace, i.e. justification, which not only overcomes sin in its source, if not in all its effects, but also interiorly transforms the individual. Catholic theology after the Middle Ages, however, has distinguished between a transient grace, which inspires a prophet or a leader, and an ordinary grace, i.e., sanctifying grace, which brings to an individual faith and love.

Sanctification is the perduring, personal effect of grace: it brings about an interior transformation and renders God silently but constantly present; it also overflows into distinct facets of grace called virtues and gifts of the Holy Spirit. Sanctity, therefore, is not a collection of miraculous phenomena in an odd or unhappy life, but the lived, individualized Christian life enabled by grace and modeled after the teaching and practice of Jesus. The active holiness of God created in humans is only driven out by serious, lasting activity that is directly counter to God's presence.

Some important differences between Protestants and Catholics have focused upon sanctification, and its links to human freedom and an ethical life (good works). Catholicism has always stood between a sole emphasis upon justification (as in Lutheranism) and a fascination with supernatural charisms (charismatic and fundamentalist churches). Ecumenical discussion and recent pastoral movements since Vatican II (1962–65) have brought to Catholicism a richer theology that grounds sanctification in the sovereign initiative of God in Christ in light of the Reformers' theology; assimilates the theologies of grace in Eastern Christian theologians; reflects on grace in the human personality in terms of modern psychologies; takes seriously the charismatic manifestations of grace; and insists that grace is the source of all offices in the Church and leads normally to service.

Only God can be the proper cause of sanctification. Any created means of holiness like the sacraments, devotions, or self-discipline are either instrumental, directive causes of God's grace or simply conditions, themselves inspired by grace, which enable personally deeper responses to the present invitation of God. See also grace; justification.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

sanctifying grace. See grace, sanctifying.

sanctity. See holiness.

Sanctorale, the Proper of Saints, governing both Mass and Divine Office, running through the whole year alongside the Temporale. The earliest example is the Philocalian Calendar (ca. 354), listing the dates of death and burial places of the bishops and martyrs of the city of Rome. Continuing additions to the Sanctorale have tended to overshadow the Temporal Cycle and led to significant pruning from time to time, most recently in the 1970 Roman Calendar. See also liturgical year; Temporale.

sanctuary (Lat., "building for religious worship"), that space in a church immediately around the altar. Until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), it was separated from the remainder of the church by the altar rail; the sanctuary may also be called the "chancel," or "choir." The common-law notion of "sanctuary" is related to that separation; the sacred precincts of the altar are not to be desecrated by violence or the spilling of blood. See also sanctuary, right of.

sanctuary, right of, the privilege of refuge from persecution or law enforcement offered in a consecrated place, such as a church, and guaranteed by law or custom. Catholic churches have historically provided places of sanctuary for those fleeing persecution; in the late twentieth century the concept of sanctuary enjoyed a resurgence in the United States because of its use in offering shelter to refugees from violence in Central America. These refugees have been considered illegal aliens and have on occasion been pursued by agents of the U.S. government.

The right of sanctuary is rooted in the reverence for places of worship and an abhorrence of any violation of sacred space.

Although an explicit right of sanctuary was not included in the 1983 revision of the Code of Canon Law, the long tradition of the Church in providing sanctuary has encouraged some Catholic communities to continue to provide haven for refugees, whether in the church building itself or in the homes of parishioners.

Sanctus (sahnk'tuhs; Lat., "Holy"), title for the acclamation sung following the preface of the Eucharistic Prayer at Mass. The text is based upon Isa 6:3, Ps 118:26, and Matt 21:9: "Holy, Holy, Holy Lord, God of power and might, heaven and earth are full of your glory. Hosanna in the highest. Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord. Hosanna in the highest."

San Lazzaro, a small island in Venice, home monastery of the Venetian Congregation of Armenian Catholic Mekhitarist monks, who moved there in 1715 when their refuge in the Venetian colony in the Peloponnesus was occupied by the Turks. See also Mekhitarists.

Santa Claus, name derived from St. Nicholas (mid-fourth century), bishop of Myra in Lycia (Turkey), patron saint of Russia, sailors, and children. The North American custom of giving gifts to children at Christmas was introduced in the 1600s by Dutch Protestants in New York, where the Dutch "Sint Klaes" was changed to the English "Santa Claus." Feast day of St. Nicholas: December 6. See also Christmas; Nicholas of Myra, St.

Santa Maria Maggiore. See Saint Mary Major.

Santeria (sahn-tair-ee'ah; Sp., "pertaining to the saints"), a syncretic religion developed in Cuba, combining elements of African religion (primarily Yoruba) and popular Catholicism. It developed as an adaptation of the ancestral religion of the slave population to their new circumstances in the Ibero-American world. This was done primarily by identifying the divinities of the Yoruba pantheon (Yoruba, orishas, "gods") with saints whose attributes matched those of the gods or goddesses, so that the thunder god Shango, for example, is identified with St. Barbara, who was invoked as a protectress during thunderstorms. Contact between the believer and the supernatural world is thought to be achieved by means of rituals that culminate in the devotee's possession by the divinity. Devotees of Santeria in the United States have encountered difficulties with the civil law because of their ritual sacrifice of animals.

Santiago de Compostela (sahn-tyah'goh day kohm-pohs-tay'lah), pilgrimage shrine and metropolitan see in Galicia, Spain. Location of the relics of St. James the Great, who was said to have evangelized Spain, it served as a major pilgrimage site in the Middle Ages as well as a symbol of the resistance of Spanish Christianity against Muslim rule. See also James the Great, St.

Sapra (Syr., "dawn," "morning"), East (Sapra) and West (Safro) Syrian variants of the term for Matins. See also Matins.

sarcophagus (Gk., sarx phagein, "to eat flesh"), stone coffin, usually made of limestone, used for above-ground burial in the ancient world. Highly decorated ones are important sources for an understanding of early Christian art, especially in the fourth century and later. See also burial, Christian.

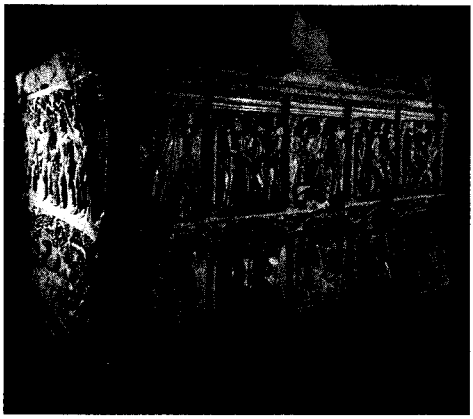
Sardica, Council of (343), a council summoned to deal mainly with the orthodoxy of Athanasius. It was intended by emperors Constans I and Constantius II to be an ecumenical council, but the Easterners withdrew when the West insisted on seating Athanasius and others deposed in the East. The



The sarcophagus of a Roman prefect, Junius Bassus; an example of fourth-century Christian art, in the Vatican.

Satan, the fallen angel who refused to serve God, smitten by Michael the archangel; engraving illustrating John Milton's Paradise Lost, Book VI, vv. 320–24.

Western bishops reaffirmed their reinstatement (341, Council of Rome) of Athanasius and Marcellus of Ancyra, forbidding, like the Creed of Nicaea (325), a distinction of hypostases (substances), language favored by the East. The council also made provisions allowing bishops condemned by provincial synods to appeal to Rome. See also Arianism; Athanasius; St.; hypostasis.

Sarpi, Paolo, 1552–1623, Venetian scholar, Servite theologian. He was an opponent of papal power and the author of the Istoria del concilio Tridentino ("History of the Council of Trent"). As official theologian of the Republic of Venice (1606–22), Sarpi brilliantly and successfully opposed Pope Paul V's interdict of Venice for attacking ecclesiastical liberties, for which he was excommunicated in 1607.

Satan (Heb., "accuser", "adversary"), head of the demons and evil spirits. Satan only appears in the postexilic books of the OT, Job 1–2 and Zech 3:1–2, and in a more general sense, in 1 Chr 21:1. Satan is a member of the court of God and his role is to act as accuser of humankind. It is he who initiated all the sufferings of Job. In the intertestamental literature and the NT there was a clear development of the concept of Satan. This arose particularly because of the belief in dualism, the polarity of good and evil. Satan was known variously as Satan, Belial, Beliar, Mastema, Sammael, Asmodeus, Apollyon, and Beelzebul, the devil, ruler of this world (John 12:31); later he was identified with the serpent in the garden of Eden. Subsequent mythology tells of his expulsion from heaven because he would not acknowledge the superiority of humankind (see Rev 12:7–12). His female counterpart is Lilith, queen of demons. Satan and his angels are opponents of God and his angelic host (see esp. the Qumran War Scroll). In the NT he tempts Jesus in the desert (Matt 4:1–11; Mark 1:12–13; Luke 1:1–13; see Matt 16:23) and enters into the heart of Judas Iscariot (Luke 22:3; John 13:27). He is associated with physical and mental diseases. Revelation predicts that God will conquer him in the last days and throw him into the lake of fire (Rev 20:2, 7, 10). Throughout the centuries the Christian churches possessed a strong belief in Satan, influenced not so much by the Bible as by literature such as John Milton's Paradise Lost (1667). Many modern theologians consider Satan a symbol of evil forces and inclinations rather than a personal spiritual figure. See also devil. J. MASSYNGBAERDE FORD

Satis Cognitum (sa'tis cog'nee-toom; Lat., "Known Enough"), encyclical of Pope Leo XIII, issued on June 29, 1896, on religious unity. Reflecting the spirit of Counter-Reformation theology, it insisted on the acceptance of papal primacy as a necessary condition of Christian reunion.

satisfaction (Lat., satis, "enough"; factio, "a doing"; hence, "making amends"). 1 In moral theology, the third moment in the process by which sins are forgiven. Following contrition and confession, a penitent must make reparation for sin by engaging in some form of satisfaction (e.g., prayer, almsgiving, fasting, restitution, or good works). 2 In soteriology, Christ's act of reparation for sin. Anselm (1033–1109), using the feudal motif of vassal and master metaphorically, reasoned that the "offense" done to God's "honor" by Adam's sin could only be remedied by someone who was both God's equal and also a human being, though without sin. In his Incarnation and life of obedience to God, Jesus Christ has vicariously made amends to God for the dishonor and the disruption done by Adam. As a result of the saving activity of Jesus Christ, harmony has been objectively restored to the relationship between God and creation. Anselm did not intend this "satisfaction theory" to present God as legalistic and punitive. Rather, by the use of the feudal language of honor, he sought to highlight God's love and mercy, for God has done what a master did not need to do, namely, God took the initiative to remedy the alienation. Also, Anselm intended to affirm God's respect for the rational, natural order, wherein offenses cannot merely be forgotten but must be forgiven. This soteriological view is limited by its neglect of the Resurrection (Rom 4:25), and also by the fact that it can easily be misunderstood when used by those unfamiliar with the thought patterns of the medieval world. See also Anselm of Canterbury, St.; atonement, doctrine of; Jesus Christ; redemption.

ROBERT KRIEG

Satolli, Francesco, 1839–1910, first apostolic delegate to the U.S. hierarchy. A leading Thomist in Perugia and later Rome, he was named archbishop in 1888. In January 1893, he became the first apostolic delegate to the U.S. hierarchy. In 1895, he became a cardinal and prefect of the Congregation of Seminaries and Universities in Rome, where he opposed Americanism. See also Americanism; apostolic delegate.

Saulchoir, Le (luhr sohl-shwahr'), named for the nearby willows (Fr., saules), a studium generale ("study center") of the Dominicans of the province of France, established in Belgium in 1903 when religious orders were expelled from France. In the years 1937–39 it was transferred to Étiolles, near Paris, then in 1971 to Paris. Its important library was moved to Paris in 1972, but in 1974 its teaching functions ceased. Its innovative historical method for studying theology was described in 1937 by M.-D. Chenu in a prophetic book that aroused Vatican censure in 1942. In addition to training many students, its remarkable staff produced the Bulletin thomiste ("Thomist bulletin"), the Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques ("Review of the philosophical and theological sciences"), and many other important studies.

Dominic Savio, a young Italian peasant who was a disciple and collaborator of John Bosco in his ministry to boys in need; he was canonized by Pope Pius XII in 1954.

saving history. See salvation history.

Savio, St. Dominic, 1842–57, confessor of the Church and patron saint of young boys, especially juvenile delinquents. Born in Italy, he was trained under the wise and temperate influence of John Bosco, who was deeply impressed with Dominic's piety and goodness. In 1954 Dominic became the youngest nonmartyr to receive official canonization. Feast day: March 9.

Savonarola, Girolamo, 1452–98, Florentine Dominican priest and religious reformer. He employed apocalypticism and prophecy to preach against the ruling Medici family and papal corruption. After Savonarola correctly prophesied the French invasion of Italy in 1494, Florence exiled the Medici and reestablished the Florentine republic under Savanarola's stringent moral guidance. He convinced Florentines to destroy art, jewelry, and literature. In 1497, his attacks on papal immorality brought his excommunication by Pope Alexander VI. When his attempt to demonstrate miraculous powers in public failed, his popularity declined, and his political protection vanished. On May 23, 1498, the Florentine government hanged and then burned him in the Florentine piazza.

Scalabrini Fathers, Congregation of the Missionaries of St. Charles Borromeo (C.S.), a congregation founded in Italy in 1887 by John Baptist Scalabrini. As bishop of Piacenza, Scalabrini recognized the expediency of providing for the spiritual and temporal needs of Italian emigrants to America when he encountered large numbers of them in the railroad station in Milan. To this end, the congregation provided priests, established churches and schools, and set up committees of assistance in Italian settlements in North and South America.

Scala Sancta (Lat., "holy stairs"), stairs near the Lateran Basilica in Rome, traditionally thought of as having been ascended and/or descended by Christ when he went before Pilate. Allegedly brought to Rome from Jerusalem by Helena, mother of Constantine, in the early fourth century, they are a popular place of pilgrimage, many pilgrims making the ascent on their knees.

scandal (Gk., skandalon, "stumbling block"), conduct that gives moral offense to others, incites others to do evil, or provides others with an occasion for morally wrongful conduct. How we act or do not act may encourage or discourage the virtuous conduct of those who belong to the same families, institutions, and communities. Giving scandal amounts to doing wrong against our neighbors, because love for our neighbor dictates that we encourage one another to virtuous conduct.

A common problem is that some people appear to see scandal in anything, maliciously construing innocent actions as perverse. Jesus was a source of scandal for the Pharisees because he ate with the prostitutes, tax collectors, and sinners, thus, the term "pharisaical scandal." Nevertheless, Jesus continued his mission, challenging those who were scandalized to realize that he came to call sinners, not the righteous. Thus, for sufficient reason a Christian might rightly take some action though some members of the Church or community will be scandalized by it. Sensitivity to local customs and culture is required for responsible decisions about actions that may cause others to perceive scandal.

An external action or omission that gives scandal may or may not be sinful in itself. For example, Paul urged those Corinthians eating meat offered in pagan temples to refrain from doing so. Paul told them that loving concern for their neighbors prohibited them from allowing their liberty be a stumbling block, a scandal, for those of weak conscience (1 Cor 8:9). Thus, charity might oblige a person to refrain from conduct foreseen to lead others to evil, though the conduct in question may not be wrong in itself. DANIEL KROGER

Scandinavia, Catholicism in. Christianity took hold slowly in the Scandinavian lands, introduced first in Denmark and then Norway, later spreading to Sweden and Finland. Although a Danish chief had been converted while visiting Louis the Pious in the ninth century, only in the first quarter of the eleventh century was the Christianization of Denmark complete. Olaf Haraldssön, king of Norway from 1016 to 1030 (he was subsequently canonized), sponsored the evangelization of that country. Beginning in the eleventh century, English missionaries were especially prominent in Sweden; missionaries from Sweden, as well as from England and Russia, converted Finland over the course of the twelfth century. The experience of medieval Scandinavian Catholicism mirrored that in the rest of Europe. Along with its saints, such as Bridget of Sweden (d.1373), conflicts between secular and ecclesiastical officials were common, and there was often a perceived gap between apostolic ideal and clerical performance.

The Reformation virtually destroyed the Scandinavian Catholic Church. Scandinavian kings and their subjects converted to Lutheranism by the end of the sixteenth century, although small communities of Catholics survived. Catholics were granted religious toleration by 1849, but few Scandinavians converted to Catholicism; in the 1990s, 95 percent of Scandinavians are Lutherans. See also Reformation, the.

Scanlan, Patrick F., 1894–1983, journalist. As editor of the Brooklyn Tablet (1917–68), he was a highly influential ultraconservative voice in the American Catholic press before Vatican II (1962–65). He was a fierce anti-Communist and polemicist.

scapular (Lat., scapulae, "shoulders"), a narrow

Carmelite monk in a brown scapular, the model for the personal scapular, which is only slightly bigger than a large postage stamp; it is held by strings and worn around the neck by pious Catholics, but was more common in the pre–Vatican II era than today.

cloak with an opening for the head that hangs down the front and back of a body. Such a garment was standard apparel for a monk in the Benedictine tradition and was later adopted by a number of other orders like the Dominicans and Carmelites. Lay affiliates of these orders often wear a stylized scapular (two small decorated patches of cloth connected by two strips of ribbon) under their ordinary clothes as a devotional practice. The use of the brown scapular of the Carmelites was especially popular as a devotion before the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also devotions.

Scheeben, Matthias Joseph (shay'buhn), 1835–88, German theologian. He drew not only on Scholasticism but on the early Greek Fathers, along with contemporary developments in German theology inspired by Romantic idealism. In the area of ecclesiology, he offered a positive appraisal of the role of the laity; his understanding of the Church included the animating presence of the Holy Spirit. At the same time he was a vigorous defender of the papacy and of papal infallibility. In his consideration of the relationship between nature and grace, his commitments to the gratuitous self-offering of the divine life led him to appear to posit nature and grace as two distinct realms. His major work in English was The Mysteries of Christianity, originally published in German in 1865.

Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von, 1775–1854, German philosopher who merged the transcendental philosophy of Immanuel Kant and Johann Fichte into Romanticism and idealism. In 1800 he developed an initial systematic presentation of a philosophy of the self, of the absolute, of nature manifest in chemistry and electromagnetism, and of art. After 1810 this system influenced Johann Sebastian Drey of the Catholic Tübingen school of theology and, through Johann Adam Möhler, Vatican II (1962–65). After 1827 a final system unfolded a trinitarian dynamic in religion and Christianity. He distinguished three elements in God: (1) necessary being; (2) unconscious and natural will, and the unity of the two; and (3) the three Persons who evolve from (1) and (2). Schelling's Protestant origins are shown in a God of will and struggle, and in a Christology of the Cross; after 1960 he became prominent again among Catholics because of his understanding of presences of the ideal in the real. He distinguished three periods in the history of the Church: Petrine (Western Catholic), Pauline (Protestant), and Johannine (charismatic or Orthodox).

schema (Gk., "dress," "habit"), Byzantine-rite monastic habit of monks and nuns. The "small schema" is the mandyas or monastic mantle (cappa in the Western Church). The "great schema" is the monastic cowl (Gk., koukoulion) and scapular adorned with embroidered symbols. In Orthodox usage very few attain to the "great habit," usually only in old age. See also cowl; mandyas; scapular.

Schervier, Bl. Mary Frances, 1819–76, German founder of the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis. She showed concern for the poor and the sick from childhood. In 1844 she joined the Third Order Franciscans and organized soup kitchens, the beginning of her institute. Her sisters came to the United States in 1858. She was beatified in 1974.

Schillebeeckx, Edward (skil'eh-bayks), b. 1914, world-renowned Dominican theologian and a major theological influence on the renewal of Catholic life and thought during and since the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). Born in Antwerp, Belgium, he entered the Dominican order in 1934 and was ordained a priest in 1941. At Le Saulchoir, the Dominican faculty in Paris where he pursued doctoral studies under the direction of M.-D. Chenu (d. 1990), Schillebeeckx learned the importance of interpreting theological positions in their historical context and of the theologian's active engagement with political and social movements of the day.

Edward Schillebeeckx, Belgian Dominican noted for his writings on Christ, the Church, faith, revelation, and ministry, who ranks with Jesuit Karl Rahner and fellow Dominican Yves Congar among the leading Catholic theologians of the twentieth century.

He taught dogmatic theology at the University of Louvain from 1947 to 1958, and occupied the chair of Dogmatics and History of Theology at the Catholic University of Nijmegen in the Netherlands from 1958 to 1983. While not an official peritus (Lat., "expert") at the Second Vatican Council, he exercised a significant influence on the council through his well-attended theological lectures in Rome.

His commitment to relate the Christian tradition to human experience is reflected throughout his writings on sacramental theology, the Church/world relationship, revelation and the mystery of God, eschatology, ethics, spirituality, hermeneutics, Christology, and ministry. While the radical secularization of Western culture has remained a constant concern in his work, Schillebeeckx's later writings focus more critically on Christian claims that Jesus is the universal Savior in the face of radical suffering in the world; crises of ministry, ecclesiology, and authority within the Catholic Church; and the liberating power of Christian faith.

He founded the Dutch-language theological journal Tijdschrift voor Theologie and was a founding editor of the international theological journal Concilium. In 1982 the Dutch government awarded him the Erasmus Prize for contributions to the development of European culture.

His major writings include Christ: The Sacrament of Encounter with God (Eng. trans., 1963), Jesus: An Experiment in Christology (Eng. trans., 1979), Christ: The Experience of Jesus as Lord (Eng. trans., 1980), and Church: The Human Story of God (Eng. trans., 1990). MARY C. HILKERT schism (Gk., schisma, "tear"), a formal breach in Church unity brought about when a particular group willfully separates itself from the larger faith community. As distinguished from heresy, schism is not directed against orthodoxy but communion. Thus, Augustine (d. 430) accused the Donatists of the sin of schism because they abandoned the one Body of Christ by establishing a rival altar and a competitive Eucharist.

The East-West Schism is traditionally dated from 1054, when mutual hostilities were exchanged between Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople, and Pope Leo IX. However, it was the sacking of Constantinople by the Crusaders in 1203 that sealed the divisions between the two churches.

The Great Western Schism occurred in 1378 when the election of Urban VI was declared null and void by the College of Cardinals. When Urban refused to abdicate in favor of the newly elected Clement VII, two rival claimants to the papal office emerged, establishing rival sees at Avignon and in Rome. The schism did not end until the Council of Constance deposed two claimants, witnessed the abdication of a third, and then elected Martin V as pope in 1417.

In traditional Catholic theology, all those who are not in communion with the Holy See were regarded to be in material schism and thus guilty of sin. This included the Orthodox and all Protestant communities. This theology was changed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), particularly in its Decree on Ecumenism (1964), which acknowledged that there are degrees of unity among Christian churches and called for the restoration of Christian unity rather than the return of non-Catholics to the Catholic Church. See also Eastern Schism; Great Schism.

MICHAEL O'KEEFFE

Schism, Eastern. See Eastern Schism.

Schism, Great. See Great Schism.

Schlegel, Friedrich (shlay'guhl), 1772–1829, German philosopher and literary historian. His religious convictions were prominent in his later writing. His Philosophie des Lebens ("Philosophy of Life," 1827) contrasted the vacuity of materialism with a biblical spirituality. In Philosophie der Geschichte ("Philosophy of History," 1828), he configured the epochs of world history around biblical revelation.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Daniel Ernst (shlī'uhr-mah-kuhr), 1768–1834, German Protestant theologian and philosopher. He was appointed head of the theological faculty at the newly established University of Berlin in 1810, where he remained until 1834. In numerous writings, he developed a philosophy of human knowing, an ethics, and a theory of hermeneutics, all of which contrasted with the influential philosophies of Kant, Fichte, and Schelling. He is remembered above all as "the father of modern theology" because of his apologetic defense of religion and Christianity in Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers (1799; Eng. trans., 1893), his articulation of the nature of theology in the modern university in Kurze Darstellung des theologisches Studiens ("A Concise Presentation of Theological Studies," 1811, 1830), and his dogmatics, The Christian Faith (1821–22, 1830; Eng. trans., 1928).

Schleiermacher's theology received only minimal attention from his Catholic contemporaries; exceptions include J. S. Drey, J. A. Möhler, and F. A. Staudenmaier. Catholic theologians have criticized Schleiermacher's doctrine of revelation, Christology, and ecclesiology. But his apologetic defense of the religious nature of the human person and of the nature of Christianity against deists and rationalists and his organic understanding of doctrinal development and the Church are points of common interest. The growing influence of the Hegelian and Ritschilian paradigms among Protestants and the rise of neo-Scholasticism among Catholics caused interest in Schleiermacher to wane in the second half of the nineteenth century. Because of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the decline of neo-Scholastic theology, and the work of Karl Rahner (d. 1984), numerous Catholic theologians have taken a renewed interest in Schleiermacher's thought. See also theology.

BRADFORD E. HINZE

Schmalkaldic Articles, theological statement by Luther that is foundational for the Lutheran church. Prepared in response to a proposed Catholic Church council to meet at Mantua in 1537, the articles stated clearly the key Lutheran doctrines and disagreements with the Catholics. They were included in the Book of Concord (1580). See also Concord, Book/Formula of; Lutheranism.

schola cantorum (skoh'lah cahn-taw'room; Lat., "school of singers"), a school for the training of singers of liturgical chant. Schola cantorum is now synonymous with "choir," a small group of singers appointed to support the singing of the liturgical assembly and to perform more difficult chants and pieces in their stead. In the Middle Ages the schola represented the earliest model for the liberal education of boys. See also choir.

Scholastica, St., ca. 480–543, virgin, sister of Benedict of Nursia, and patron saint of Benedictine nunneries. The Dialogues of Pope Gregory the Great are the source of our scanty information on the saint. At the time of her death, she was living near Benedict's abbey, Monte Cassino; brother and sister were eventually interred in one grave. Feast day: February 10. See also Benedict of Nursia, St.

Scholastica, sister of Benedict of Nursia, with her brother, other members of the Benedictine community, and some of the sisters from the convent she founded nearby. She and Benedict met annually to discuss spiritual matters at Monte Cassino; medieval manuscript illustration, Condé Museum, Chantilly, France.

Scholasticism, a method of intellectual inquiry that was prominent until the sixteenth century in Western medieval thought, especially in universities, in contrast with the lectio divina (Lat., "divine reading," i.e., meditative reflection on the Bible and other classical sources) and more rhetorical type of thought usually found in monastic schools. Scholasticism is described by M.-D. Chenu as "a rational form of thinking, consciously and voluntarily working from texts it held to be authoritative" (Toward Understanding St. Thomas, p. 63).

Methods: In the eleventh-century, dialectics (posing one text off against another) was increasingly applied in philosophy and theology by teachers such as Berengar of Tours and Lanfranc of Bec, the teacher of Anselm. Anselm's program of "faith seeking understanding" could be understood in two ways, either as a search for devout contemplative understanding of the divine mysteries or as an understanding the intellect sought within faith by using all the resources of human reason. Abelard, a textual critic of the Bible, furthered the use of dialectics, drawing upon himself the wrath of Bernard of Clairvaux and William of St. Thierry, who disagreed not only with his teachings but also with what they viewed as his rejection of the pious use of reason they espoused. Nevertheless, dialectics and Scholastic methods came to be used universally in cathedral schools and universities.

In the universities, a Scholastic master would apply himself to lectio (Lat., "reading"), reading a text and commenting on it in a logical, somewhat artificial manner, often reducing examples and metaphors to abstract concepts. Or he would undertake systematic inquiry into every conceivable problem, usually by quaestiones (Lat., "questions"). These brought out different aspects of a question through arguments on both sides of the issue, which were followed by the master's solution or "determination" of the question. His replies used the method of distinctions, which allowed the master to accept some part of the arguments while rejecting the rest. The appeal to distinctions, useful for such clarification, became in later Scholasticism an excessively subtle display that ended in sterility and provoked derision from sixteenth-century humanists. Even when masters wrote systematic summae (Lat., "syntheses"), they usually used the question format as the building blocks of the whole work.

Authorities: When commenting or questioning, Scholastic authors showed deference to authorities—texts of Scripture, the Church Fathers, ancient secular authors, or revered masters who had such great prestige in some fields that their writings would regularly be quoted in arguments pro or con. If the texts seemed to be opposed to a master's views or in conflict with other authorities, they could not simply be dismissed; they were brought into harmony with the master's position or were shown to agree with other authorities—in either case by explanations that could be legitimate or creative (the latter were called "benign" or "reverential interpretations"). Gratian's work in canon law, the Concordia Discordantium Canonum ("Harmonization of Discordant Canons"), was a model for this aspect of Scholasticism, as was Peter Lombard's Sententiae ("Sentences"), although Lombard sometimes simply gathered texts and left their concordance to others. Abelard's Sic et Non ("Yes and No") called attention to many apparently discordant patristic texts; he did not resolve the discordances but prefaced these texts with an important introduction on textual interpretation meant to guide those wishing to resolve such differences.

Scholastic inquiry involved impersonal, formal reasoning, breaking texts into small logical components, using repetitious formulas, divisions, and distinctions. Language, especially "speculative grammar," which saw grammar as a faithful mirror of underlying metaphysical or theological truths, was a major tool of Scholasticism in different periods. The fairly common use of similar methods masks the rich variety and originality of persons and positions that flourished in the Middle Ages. If the method lacked elegance, imagination, or rhetorical flourish, when used moderately it provided a scientific basis for free investigation of every sort of question. It served to clarify issues, to make language precise, and to foster critical inquiry, logical exactness, and objectivity. See also neo-Scholasticism; Thomism. WALTER PRINCIPE schools, Catholic. See Catholic colleges and universities—statistics; parochial school.

School Sisters of Notre Dame (S.S.N.D.), an international congregation founded in Bavaria in 1833 by Mother Theresa Gerhardinger and Bishop George Wittmann for the ministry of education. In response to a call to preserve the faith among German immigrants, the School Sisters came to the United States in 1847 and established themselves in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, where, under the leadership of Mother Caroline Friess, the community learned to adjust to national cultures. This enabled the congregation to spread rapidly to other countries. In 1993 there were more than six thousand sisters in Europe, Asia, Africa, Latin America, and North America engaged in educational work at all levels. The motherhouse was in Munich from 1843 until 1957, when it was transferred to Rome. See also Notre Dame Sisters.

Schoonenberg, Piet, b. 1911, Dutch Jesuit theologian. Noted for his work on the Dutch Catechism and writings in Spirit Christology, Schoonenberg was trained at Maastricht and has taught at the universities of Louvain, Nijmegen, Fordham, and the Jesuit School of Theology at Berkeley, California.

Schrader, Klemens (shray'duhr), 1820–75, German Jesuit theologian. Professor at the Roman College, he provided a more historical orientation to contemporary Scholastic theology, drawing upon the work of the Tübingen theologians. His increasingly papal-centered views influenced his authorship of the theocratic first draft of Vatican I's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church.

science. See Big bang; Catholicism and the social sciences; creation; creationism; Darwinism; evolution; faith and reason; Galileo; materialism, scientific; nature; nature and grace; scientism.

scientia media (shee-en'see-ah may'dee-ah), Lat., "middle knowledge"), a theory within sixteenth-century Molinist thought explaining the knowledge by which God infallibly knows what a free creature would do in any circumstance before any action of God and without presupposing that action. This theory attempts to reconcile human freedom with the themes of God's foreknowledge, providence, predestination, and efficacious grace. See also De Auxiliis; Molinism.

scientism, the belief that empirical science provides sole access to truth. In opposing scientism, the Church teaches that although empirical science legitimately studies connections of cause and effect in the natural world, there are truths to which empirical science has no direct access, including, especially, moral and religious truths. See also faith and reason.

Scotland, Catholicism in. Christianity reached Scotland by the fifth century through the efforts of British and Irish monks, notably Columba (d. 563). Brought into conformity with the Roman hierarchy and calendar in the seventh century, the Church of Scotland withdrew its allegiance from the Holy See in 1560, adopting Calvinist theology and Presbyterian government and outlawing the Catholic Church. A large body of Catholic loyalists remained in the Gaelic-speaking highlands and in the nineteenth century many Irish Catholic immigrants settled in the industrial cities. The hierarchy was restored in 1878, with archbishops at Edinburgh and Glasgow. In the 1990s, Catholics make up only about 15 percent of the population of over 5 million.

Scotus, Eriugena. See Eriugena, John Scotus.

Scotus, John Duns, ca. 1266–1308, Franciscan philosopher and theologian, known as the "Subtle Doctor." Of Scottish birth, he studied theology at Oxford and Paris; after holding the Franciscan chair in theology at the University of Paris (1305–07), he moved to Cologne, where he died. In addition to his writings on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, Scotus's literary production includes quodlibetal (freely posed) and disputed questions, as well as commentaries on some of Aristotle's books.

John Duns Scotus, medieval philosopher of the thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries, who combined Aristotelianism with Augustinianism, thereby emphasizing love and the will more than knowledge and reason, as in Thomas Aquinas's system.

Scotus's deeply metaphysical thought has been immensely influential down to the present. Such characteristic teachings as the univocity (single meaning) of being, the primacy of the will and of love over reason and knowledge have contributed to the development of distinctive doctrines of God and the human person. Not all, however, have found him so appealing. His dogged attempts to work out every implication of his main insights can be wearing and seen, ultimately, as irrelevant. The word "dunce" is a later play on his name.

Perhaps his most lasting contribution is his championing of the Immaculate Conception. Earlier theologians had argued against this notion, stating that Mary had been conceived in the normal way and thus had been stained by original sin; to say that she had always been free of sin would have been to imply that she did not need redemption. Scotus's advance was to ascribe the Immaculate Conception to the grace of Christ, styling the total preservation from sin as a first and distinctive application of Christ's redemptive work. See also Immaculate Conception; philosophy and theology; Scholasticism.

screens, partitions made of various materials (stone, wood, metal) that divide a church into two or more sections, e.g., a screen dividing the choir of a church from its nave. Screens were elaborate or simple, high or low. A screen mounted with a cross is called a rood screen. See also choir; nave.

scribes, governmental officials and, later, scholars in the law of Moses. In the OT some scribes were officials employed by the royal government (e.g., 2 Kgs 18:18; 22:3; Isa 22:15). Baruch, however, who wrote down Jeremiah's prophecies, is also called a scribe (Jer 36:26, 32); and Ezra, who was "a scribe skilled in the law of Moses" (Ezra 7:6), enforced provisions of that law in Judea. Sirach, who may also have been one, praises the scribe in glowing detail (Sir 38:24–39:11): he has the leisure to devote "himself to the study of the law of the Most High" (38:34); he ponders prophecies, wise sayings, and parables; he advises rulers, travels, and acts piously. In the NT, scribes, who are legal experts, figure often as opponents of Jesus and his followers. They are closely associated with the Pharisees and are even called "scribes of the Pharisees" (e.g., Mark 2:16). With the Pharisees they are the objects of Jesus' woe sayings in Matt 23; here their legal views are strongly opposed. Jesus recognized their authority as experts in the law of Moses; however, he taught that they should be obeyed but not imitated. Some scribes with the chief priests and elders participated in Jesus' hearings or trials and were present at the Crucifixion (Mark 14:43, 53; 15:1, 31). These and other passages indicate that some scribes were members of the council, also known as the Sanhedrin, composed of chief priests and leaders in Jerusalem (see also Acts 23:9). See also Pharisees; Sadducees.

scriptorium, the workroom, generally in monasteries, where manuscripts were written; by extension, a center of literary and artistic production with its own proper calligraphic style. Often located near the library, the scriptorium, sometimes divided into carrels for individual scribes, was oriented so as to admit the maximum of light. General management of the scriptorium and scribes was entrusted to the armarius (Lat.) or librarian. See also monastery.

scripture, literally, that which is written. As used in theological and ecclesiastical circles, the term connotes either a small part of the biblical text, for example, a single verse (scripture), or the entire Bible (Scripture). When the term appears in the NT, it designates what would later be called the OT or the Jewish Scriptures. In its specifically theological usage, the term serves to identify the written and authoritative word of God (see Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 9) rather than any specific textual content. It is insofar as they are Scripture that biblical texts are read during the celebration of the Church's liturgy. See also Bible

Scripture, accommodation of, the use of a biblical text for a purpose other than that for which it was originally intended and other than that for which the biblical text was incorporated into the canon. As such, the accommodated sense of Scripture is a result of eisegesis (Lat., "reading into" a text), rather than a result of exegesis ("reading out" of a text). Exploiting a more than literal sense of the text, it has appeared in a variety of fashions throughout the ages.

Origen (d. 254) had recourse to an accommodated use of Scripture when he found in the three decks of Noah's ark (Gen 6:15) a warrant for his doctrine of the three senses of Scripture: corporeal, psychic, and spiritual. Gregory the Great (d. 604) used the Scripture in accommodated fashion when he used the five talents of the Matthean parable (Matt 25:14–30) in reference to the five senses. Throughout the patristic era the Scriptures were often used in an accommodated fashion since they served as the principal catechetical text for the instruction of the faithful.

The liturgy frequently uses the texts of Scripture in an accommodated fashion, especially on feasts and memorials, for example, in applying the lover's canticle (Cant 3:1–4) to Mary Magdalene or a reading about God's choice of David (1 Sam 16:6–13) to saintly pastors. Homilists often use the Scriptures in an accommodated manner. Caution should be exercised when doing so, lest the faithful confuse the product of the homilist's imagination with the true meaning of the text. According to Pius XII's 1943 encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu, a homilist's use of an accommodated sense of the sacred text may be useful but it is "extrinsic and adventitious to Holy Scripture." See also Scripture, interpretation of.

RAYMOND COLLINS

Scripture, authority of. Vatican II (1962–65) recognized that the role of the Scriptures in the life of the Catholic Church is somewhat different from what it is in the churches that are not united with Rome: "When Christians separated from us affirm the divine authority of the sacred books, they think differently from us—different ones in different ways—about the relationship between the Scriptures and the Church. In the Church, according to Catholic belief, an authentic teaching office plays a special role in the explanation and proclamation of the written word of God" (Decree on Ecumenism, n. 21).

The authority of the Scriptures derives from the fact that the Scriptures have been inspired by the Holy Spirit and are revered as the word of God. Thus, the authority of the Scriptures is an expression of the authority of God. The Scriptures bear witness to the word of God and have influenced the lives and actions of believers throughout the centuries.

In Protestantism: The authority of the Scriptures is a focal point in the teaching of the various Protestant churches. At the time of the Reformation the doctrine of the authority of the Scriptures was initially promoted in an argumentative fashion, taking issue with the authority of the Church in matters of faith and morals.

The polemical thrust of the doctrine has disappeared from most contemporary Protestant writings, but the authority of the Scriptures continues to be a central focus in Protestant teaching. For Protestants, the Bible is the source of Christian faith; the teachings of the Scriptures are considered to be authoritative for faith and morals.

Since the development of the historical-critical method of biblical interpretation during the eighteenth-century Enlightenment, much discussion has taken place within the different Protestant churches as to the nature of biblical authority. Some churches and various writers see the historical-critical interpretation as an attack upon the authority of the Bible. Among many, a biblical fundamentalism is seen as a way to safeguard the authority of the Scriptures. Other churches and other writers, especially those representing mainline Protestant denominations, view the historical-critical approach as a contemporary form of fidelity to the Scriptures, in keeping with the spirit of early Reformers such as Luther and Calvin. The precise nature of scriptural authority continues to be a point of discussion among contemporary Protestants.

In Catholicism: Generally Catholics do not reflect on the "the authority of the Scriptures" as Protestants do. The expression occurs in Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenism, but it is not otherwise used in conciliar texts; nor is it employed in the Catechism of the Catholic Church (1992). It is almost as if Protestantism has preempted the use of the expression "authority of Scripture." Nonetheless, the realities to which the expression points are central to the teaching of the Catholic Church on the Scriptures.

The inspiration and the inerrancy of the Scriptures are an important element of Catholic doctrine. That Dei Verbum (Lat., "the Word of God"), Vatican II's document on divine revelation, has the status of a dogmatic constitution (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation) is a forceful expression of the authority the Church attributes to the Scriptures, as the word of the living God.

This constitution teaches that the Church venerates the Sacred Scriptures just as it venerates the body of Christ, particularly within the context of the eucharistic liturgy (n. 21). By describing the Scriptures as the soul of theology (n. 24; Decree on Priestly Formation, n. 16) and as the supreme norm of faith (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 21), the Church expresses its teaching that the Scriptures are authoritative in matters of faith and morals.

What distinguishes a Catholic view of the authority of the Scriptures from a Protestant view is the relationship between the Scriptures and the Church. Catholic doctrine links tradition, the Scriptures, and the teaching authority of the Church together so that one cannot stand without the others (n. 10).

It teaches that the Scriptures must be read within the living tradition of the Church and that they be interpreted within the context of "the analogy of faith." From the perspective of divine revelation all of the truths of faith cohere with one another. According to Catholic doctrine, responsibility for authentically interpreting the word of God has been entrusted to the teaching authority of the Church, the magisterium, which is called to serve and to faithfully explain the word of God. See also Bible and doctrine; inspiration of Scripture; magisterium; Scripture and tradition. RAYMOND COLLINS

Scripture, canon of the. See canon of the Scriptures.

Scripture, inerrancy of. See inerrancy of Scripture.

Scripture, inspiration of. See inspiration of Scripture.

Scripture, interpretation of. Concern for the proper interpretation of the Scriptures has always been part of the life of the Church. The canonical Gospels themselves portray Jesus as being in conflict with the Pharisees over the proper interpretation of the Scriptures (Matt 15:1–9; Mark 7:1–13). 2 Peter warns its readers about those who twist the meaning of Paul's letters and the other Scriptures (2 Pet 3:15–16). On the other hand, the Gospels repeatedly make reference to the Scriptures being fulfilled in Jesus (e.g., Matt 1:22–23; Luke 4:21) while the Letters interpret various scriptural passages in the light of the Christian experience (Gal 4:21–31; Hebrews).

Patristic Interpretation: Interpreting Scripture in light of the gospel continued in the patristic period. The Letter of Barnabas tries to show that the OT scriptures point to Christ, as does Justin Martyr (d. ca. 165) in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. On the other hand, Marcion, a second-century Roman heretic, read the OT in a very literal way and rejected both it and its God in the name of a Christianity he had misconstrued on the basis of Paul's writings. In opposition to Marcion, Irenaeus (d. ca. 200) highlighted the OT's use of anthropomorphic language and had a vision of the Scriptures that accorded a pride of place to the four Gospels. In the Scriptures he found a "norm of truth."

From the end of the second century until the fifth century, there were two main schools of interpretation in the Eastern church. The school of Alexandria stressed the harmony between the OT and NT but often allegorized the biblical text in order to do so. Clement of Alexandria (d. ca. 215), for example, interpreted the biblical division between clean and unclean animals as a reference to the separation between the Church and Jews and/or heretics. Origen (d. ca. 254) developed a theory of scriptural interpretation in which he distinguished the corporeal, psychic, and spiritual senses. Origen's approach was inspired by a Platonic anthropology that distinguished body, soul, and spirit, but he found a biblical warrant for it in the three decks of Noah's ark (Gen 6:15) and the three loaves of bread offered to a friend (Luke 11:5).

The school of Antioch was more literalist and historicist in its approach to the Scriptures. Theophilus of Antioch, for example, developed a chronological table of the biblical events beginning with creation and ending in his own day. In the West, Jerome (d. 420), the renowned biblical scholar, was strongly influenced by the Alexandrians, especially by Didymus the Blind. Augustine (d. 430), Jerome's contemporary, worked out a system of biblical interpretation in On Christian Doctrine, one of his major works. He claimed that the goal of the entire process was knowledge of the love of Christ and warned against interpreting literal expressions figuratively and figurative expressions literally, but he was prone to allegorize many biblical texts.

Medieval Interpretation: The goal of the allegorical method, used in the interpretation of Canticle of Canticles and many other biblical texts, was to extract a spiritual meaning from the text. Due attention was to be paid to the literal or historical meaning of the text (Lat., litera). In the case of narrative material, this was not "history" in the modern sense of the term, but the story line of the text. In the twelfth century, the school of St. Victor especially emphasized the importance of the literal meaning of the text.

Generally, however, medieval authors believed that a spiritual sense flowed from the literal meaning of the words. In this regard they were dependent upon the great patristic writers. They distinguished an allegorical, a tropological, and an anagogical sense of the text. These senses more or less correspond to a Christological, ethical, and mystical reading of the text.

The medieval dependence upon patristic exegesis was, in this regard, fostered by the way in which biblical texts were copied. Typically there appeared along with the transcription of the text itself interlinear or marginal comments (Lat., glossae) or fairly large blocks of interspersed commentary (postilla). To a large extent the comments were comprised of citations of patristic authors. Notwithstanding this tendency, some medieval theologians, for example, Abelard (d. 1142) and Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), made use of philosophy in the interpretation of various biblical texts.

Historical-Critical Interpretation: The doctrinal interpretation, with a relatively heavy emphasis on points of ecclesiology and sacramentology, led the Reformers to seek out the "plain sense" of the Scriptures. The way for this approach had been prepared by Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples ("Stapulensis," ca. 1461–1536), whose commentary on the Psalms (1524) had distinguished between the literal historical sense and the literal prophetic sense of those scriptures. It was abetted by the Renaissance, whose fascination with classical learning led to a desire to have available the texts of the Scriptures in their original languages. The French Oratorian Richard Simon (1638–1712) and the Dutch humanist Erasmus (1469–1536) were pioneers in this movement.

Erasmus's edition of the NT, appropriated by the Reformers, ultimately served as the basis for the translations of the NT found in the popular King James Version and Luther's German Bible. In reaction to the new movement, the Council of Trent, on April 8, 1546, reaffirmed the Catholic Church's acceptance of the Latin Vulgate as the authentic text of the Scriptures and the authority of the Church to judge the "true sense and interpretation of the Holy Scriptures."

With the eighteenth-century Enlightenment came the development of a critical sense of history. From that time on a variety of questions have been raised regarding the historicity of the traditions narrated in the Scriptures. These questions dealt with the development of the biblical tradition even more than they dealt with the brute facticity of the scriptural data. These questions gave rise to the historical-critical method of scriptural interpretation. The new method was principally developed and refined in the schools of theology of continental European, and especially German, universities. Gradually it made its impact on the interpretation of the Scriptures in theological seminaries and came to be used by Catholic interpreters as well as by those of the various Reform movements.

The historical-critical method of interpretation, in fact, comprises various methodologies. A first endeavor focuses on the establishment of a critical edition of the scriptural texts. This is the task of text criticism, once known as "lower criticism" to distinguish it from "higher criticism," which was concerned with the historical meaning of the text. Higher criticism (exegesis) seeks to establish the meaning of the biblical text within its proper historical context. It is concerned with what the text meant at the time it was written, as distinct from what the same text might mean for people of faith at the present time.

Source criticism was an important component of the new approach. Questions as to whether or not a biblical author made use of written sources help to identify the potentially oldest witnesses to the events and to clarify how biblical texts came into existence in their present form. Along with these kind of questions were those that critically examined traditions attributing, for example, the entire Torah (Genesis through Deuteronomy) to Moses and the Letter to the Hebrews to the Apostle Paul. Before the end of the eighteenth century it had been suggested that the book of Isaiah was a two-part composition, with the second part (chs. 40–55) coming from the sixth century B.C. By the end of the nineteenth century scholars were writing about the documents on which the Pentateuch was based and proposing various theories as to which of the three synoptic gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke) served as the principal source for the other two.

The historical-critical interpretation of the Bible was refined during the twentieth century with the development of a form-critical and a redaction-critical approach. The former concentrates on individual units of material (genealogies, miracle stories, legal collections, etc.) and seeks to relate them to their presumed social settings. Redaction criticism focuses on the way in which the biblical authors worked creatively with the documentary material at hand as well as with the oral traditions known to them in order to weave these materials into the literary compositions we now have as books of the Bible.

Catholic scholars were at first reluctant to espouse the historical-critical method of biblical interpretation, but the principle of form criticism was endorsed by Pius XII's encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), and that of redaction criticism was supported by the Pontifical Biblical Commission's instruction "Holy Mother the Church" (Sancta Mater Ecclesia, 1964) and Vatican II's Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum, 1965).

Other Approaches: The historical-critical method of biblical interpretation does not answer all the questions raised by those who seek to understand the Bible fully. Consequently some interpreters elucidate the text by paying attention to the communication techniques taught in the rhetorical schools of old as well as to the impact of an author's words upon the presumed readership (rhetorical criticism). Others focus on the way in which the biblical stories are narrated, with attention drawn to what they say and how they say it (narrative criticism). Other scholars focus their attention on particular points of view, asking about the social structures to which the biblical texts refer and the social circumstances in which they were written (sociological reading). Feminist hermeneutics studies critically the role, or lack thereof, of women in the Bible.

This wide variety of approaches to biblical interpretation is partially due to the size of the Bible, with seventy-two different books, whose component parts were written over the greater part of a full millennium. It is partially due to the fact that those who read the Bible have many different kinds of questions and all of these questions must be answered as completely as possible if the Bible itself is to be more fully understood. See also Alexandria, school of; allegory; Antioch, school of; Bible; biblical criticism; hermeneutics; Scripture, senses of; Scripture and tradition.

Bibliography

Collins, Raymond F. Introduction to the New Testament. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1983. Ch. 2, "Historical Critical Methodology." Pp. 41–74.

Morgan, Robert, with John Barton. Biblical Interpretation. The Oxford Bible Series. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Neill, Stephen, and Tom Wright. The Interpretation of the New Testament 1861–1986. 2d ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.

Schneiders, Sandra M. The Revelatory Text: Interpreting the New Testament as Sacred Scripture. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991.

RAYMOND COLLINS

Scripture, private interpretation of, the practice associated with Martin Luther and other Reformers, whose numbers later included John Wesley and some Puritan leaders, who claimed that the meaning of the Bible is plain enough for ordinary Christians to understand. These Christians were therefore encouraged to read the Bible on their own. In response, the Council of Trent (1546) affirmed that it is the responsibility of the Church to interpret the Scriptures. The Scriptures are to be interpreted within the context of the community of faith that is the Church. The Catholic tradition maintains that the understanding of Scripture involves more than personal insight; it includes the role of the community exercised through the teaching office of the bishops and the insights of scholars and pastoral ministers. See also Scripture, interpretation of.

Scripture, senses of, the multiple meanings of a biblical text. The early Christian attribution of more than one meaning to a biblical text arose from two convictions: all Scripture preaches Christ and, therefore, OT texts have a hidden Christological meaning; all biblical texts are revelatory and, therefore, those whose apparent meaning is banal or even irreligious have another deeper meaning. This led to the development of the theory of two, three, or four senses in every text. In modern times, especially during the Modernist crisis in the Catholic Church in the early twentieth century, biblical scholars were pressed to find current Church teaching and/or contemporary relevance in texts that did not, literally, support such readings. This led to the revitalization of theories of typological sense and sensus plenior (Lat.), or the "fuller sense" of Scripture. Contemporary literary and hermeneutical theories provide more solid grounds for multiple interpretations of texts.

History: Origen (d. ca. 254), the Church's first great biblical scholar, distinguished between the "body" of the text (the literal/historical meaning); its "soul" (moral meaning); and its "spirit" (spiritual/allegorical meaning). In practice, he usually distinguished literal from allegorical, or letter from spirit. Sometimes Origen used "literal" to refer to the historical meaning that he always considered important as a vehicle of deeper meaning. But often "literal" meant the most naïvely materialistic (mis)reading, which he showed to be absurd, God's way of hiding the meaning so that the believer might search more deeply by means of allegorical interpretation. For Origen "allegory" included symbolism, metaphor, and allusion, which today would be considered part of the literal or literary meaning. His allegorical interpretation, although sometimes fanciful, was a scholarly attempt to attain the sense of the text intended by God through the human author, i.e., its spiritual sense. Origen's influence dominated biblical scholarship until modern times.

From Augustine (d. 430) and John Cassian (d. 435) through the Middle Ages, most interpreters held to a fourfold sense of Scripture: the literal, i.e., historical sense; the allegorical, i.e., the doctrinal/spiritual sense; the moral, i.e., behavior-guiding sense; and the anagogical, i.e., eschatological sense. Although some scholars (e.g., Aquinas) defended the priority of the literal sense, most interpreters regarded the four senses as equal.

Until quite recently, modern critical scholars distinguished between the literal sense, i.e., the meaning intended by the biblical writer as that is ascertained by historical critical research, and more-than-literal senses, which included dogmatic, pastoral, and other senses, namely, any meanings not actually intended by the human author. Catholic scholars favored the theories of the typological sense and the fuller sense. A "type" is an OT reality (e.g., Isaac carrying the wood on which he would be sacrificed up Mount Moriah) whose full (i.e., Christological) meanings could only be grasped in light of its NT "antitype" or fulfillment (e.g., Jesus carrying his cross up Mount Calvary). The fuller sense of a text is a meaning that the human author could not or did not intend but whose God-intended meaning could only be recognized in light of subsequent developments in salvation history, e.g., that Isa 7:14 was a reference to the virgin birth of Jesus.

Increasingly, contemporary scholars recognize that all texts, including biblical ones, carry multiple meanings because meaning is an event of interaction between text and reader, not a fixed "content" established by the author. They also recognize that a variety of interpretive methods, eliciting diverse meanings, can legitimately be applied to a text. This is a post-critical reappropriation of the ancient insight that the biblical text is a many-layered mine of meaning. See also Scripture, interpretation of.

SANDRA M. SCHNEIDERS

Scripture, versions of, translations of Scripture from the original languages (e.g., the King James Version, the Douay-Rheims Version). While any translation can be called a version, the most important are the ancient Aramaic and Greek versions of the OT. These versions provide information on the history and establishment of the biblical text and evidence of the Hebrew text accessible to and used by the ancient translators, a text older than any extant Hebrew manuscripts, sometimes including departures or deviations from the standard Masoretic Text of the Hebrew Bible. Translations of the biblical books from their original languages (Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek) are termed primary versions. Early translations of the primary versions are called secondary versions. The other principal versions are in Syriac, Latin, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Armenian. While the Septuagint and the Jewish Aramaic Targums represent only the OT, the other versions contain complete Bibles. By the second century A.D., the consonantal Hebrew text had been fixed in the form still used today.

Aramaic Versions: Beginning in the postexilic era (after 539 B.C.), Aramaic gradually replaced Hebrew as the language of Jews in Palestine and Mesopotamia. It was for these Jews that translations of the Hebrew Bible into the Aramaic vernacular were produced. Probably originating as oral translations and paraphrases of the Scriptures when Jews gathered for prayer, these translations were ultimately committed to writing in what are called Targums, the Aramaic word for "translation." The Targums contain not simply translations of the Hebrew text but exegetical and homiletic expansions of the text as well.

The Targum Onqelos, an Aramaic translation of the Pentateuch, is the most literal and authoritative of the Targums. Originally produced in Palestine in the first or early second century A.D., it was taken to Babylonia where, after extensive revision in the second and third centuries, it became the official Babylonian Targum. The authoritative Targum of the Former and Latter Prophets is Targum Jonathan. Like Onqelos, it had its origin in Palestine and was revised in Babylonia in the fourth and fifth centuries A.D. More paraphrastic than Onqelos, Jonathan contains expansions of the text chiefly in the poetic sections.

Greek Versions: The oldest Greek version is the Septuagint (LXX), so-called from the legendary account of its origins in the Letter of Aristeas, which speaks of seventy-two Jewish translators producing a Greek version of the Pentateuch in Alexandria in the third century B.C. The translation of the rest of the books of the Hebrew canon (Former and Latter Prophets; Writings) followed, from the second century B.C. to the first century A.D. The Septuagint also includes books not part of the Hebrew canon (Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch, Tobit, Judith, 1–2 Maccabees) as well as additions in Greek to the translations of Daniel and Esther.

The use and veneration of the Septuagint by the early Christian Church and its deviations from the current Hebrew text occasioned several other Greek translations of the Hebrew Bible in the second century A.D. for Jews, which survive only fragmentarily.

Syriac Versions: The Syro-Palestinian Bible is a Western Aramaic (not Syriac) version that survives primarily as a Melkite Christian lectionary text. Extensively adapted to the septuagintal tradition, the surviving parts of the Syro-Palestinian OT are rooted in older Syriac and (possibly) Jewish Aramaic texts. While extant Syro-Palestinian Gospel lectionaries date from A.D. 1029 and later, there is some evidence that the Syro-Palestinian version arose in the sixth century.

Several different, usually interdependent, Syriac translations of the OT and NT are known. One of these, the mid-second-century Diatessaron (Gk., "[One] through four"), was probably composed in Greek by Tatian, a Syrian disciple of Justin Martyr, and soon thereafter translated into Syriac. It is a continuous harmony of the four Gospels and some apocryphal material that circulated widely, apparently as the official Syrian Gospel text (rather than the four Gospels). It was eventually replaced by the four Gospels in Syriac.

Harmonies similar to the Diatessaron (or translations of it) have come down in various other languages. The Armenian and Georgian Gospels were influenced by it and traces may be found in patristic citations.

The Old Syriac OT is known only from incidental citations and some early traces that survive in the Peshitta. The Old Syriac Gospels are known from two fifth-century manuscripts with variant forms of a Syriac text that is later in origin than the Diatessaron. Citations from Acts and the Pauline corpus in early writers suggest a similar Old Syriac version for them too, but no continuous Old Syriac texts survive.

In both OT and NT, the Peshitta is a compilation and careful reworking of earlier materials. Firmly established by the early fifth century, it remained the Bible of all Syriac-language Christians. The Peshitta OT, mainly a series of somewhat uneven translations from the Hebrew, was also influenced by the Septuagint. The NT books of Revelation, 2 Peter, 2–3 John, and Jude were not transmitted in Peshitta manuscripts; their Syriac versions in modern editions are of later origin.

The Syro-hexaplar OT is a partially surviving early-seventh-century translation of the Septuagint text in column five of Origen's six-column Greek Hexapla with an apparatus of variant readings from other columns, all transposed from Greek into an awkward Syriac that reflects the source as closely as possible.

Contemporary with the Syro-hexaplar OT is a similarly stiff and mechanical rendering of the NT edited by Thomas of Harkel, bishop of Hierapolis in Syria. This Harclean NT, based on a revision of the Peshitta done a century earlier, was reworked for use in later West Syrian lectionaries.

Latin Versions: Except for Jerome's OT from the Hebrew, all early Latin renderings of the OT and NT were made from the Greek. The place of origin for the Latin Gospels and, indeed, for much of the Old Latin Bible can no longer be established with certainty; alongside North Africa, both Rome and Gaul have been suggested as early European centers for the Old Latin Scriptures.

No complete Latin OT version based on the Greek survives from the early period. The five OT books known best in the Old Latin form (1–2 Maccabees, Wisdom, Sirach, and Baruch) are those that Jerome judged uncanonical and refused to revise or retranslate. Preserved in the Vulgate anyway, each exists in a full text that is the work of a single translator. In general, surviving Old Latin versions were reworked in the centuries after Jerome's time and reflect mutual contamination of the Vulgate and the Old Latin.

Around the end of the fourth century, Jerome broke with the Septuagint–Old Latin tradition to produce the Vulgate rendering based directly on the Hebrew OT text preserved among the Jews. The parts of Esther and Daniel not included in the Jewish canon he supplied from the Greek; for Daniel, he drew on the book's "Theodotionic" form, which also influenced his rendering of the Aramaic sections. Tobit and Judith were translated on the basis of Aramaic recensions rather far removed from the lost Aramaic and Hebrew originals, respectively.

The Vulgate recension of the Gospels, a correction and adaptation of the existing Old Latin text in the light of good Greek manuscripts, was prepared in Rome by Jerome; the extent of his influence on the remaining NT in the Vulgate is unclear. The thirteen Pauline Letters (exclusive of Hebrews) go back to a single, early translator. The varying forms of Acts seem to derive from one early North African version. Two renderings are known for Hebrews, and possibly three for Revelation.

Other Versions: The complete OT does not survive in any one Coptic dialect. Like the Aramaic Targums, the Coptic OT versions were sometimes paraphrased or simplified to clarify the Hebrew OT. In contrast, the Coptic NT translations are fairly literal and often reflect the Alexandrian Greek text. The earliest versions reflect Greek manuscripts older than most of those used to establish the critical text of the Greek NT.

The Ethiopic OT, based on the Greek and sometimes a good witness to the unrevised Alexandrian Septuagint, is the only complete source for apocryphal Jubilees and 1 Enoch. The Ethiopic NT (translated partly from Greek, partly from Syriac) has fifth-century origins, but few manuscripts antedate the fourteenth century. While the Ethiopic Gospels were reworked under Egyptian Arabic influence in the thirteenth century, two manuscripts of the unrevised fifth-century Gospel survive.

The early fifth-century Armenian translation, based on pre-Peshitta Syriac forms, was subsequently revised to match the Greek. The fifth-century Georgian version, based on Armenian texts with Syriac origins, was similarly revised by the seventh century. The Arabic versions are late and represent Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Coptic, and even Latin prototypes.

Modern and contemporary vernacular translations of the Bible also reflect choices about meaning and interpretation, but they are not versions in the strict sense, since they do not provide independent evidence for the earliest biblical text. Such translations may shed new light on the meaning or implications of biblical passages, however, and each can be consulted with profit. No version, ancient or modern, can be absolutized or regarded as the exclusive bearer of the biblical message. It is advisable to consult a variety of translations about any biblical passage in order to reach a deeper and more nuanced insight into its meaning. See also Bible.

Bibliography

Ackroyd, P. R., and C. F. Evans, eds. The Cambridge History of the Bible. 3 vols. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1963–70.

Bruce, F. F. The Books and the Parchments: How We Got Our English Bible. Rev. ed. Old Tappan, NJ: Revell, 1984.

Jellicoe, Sidney. The Septuagint and Modern Study. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1968.

Metzger, Bruce. The Early Versions of the New Testament: Their Origin, Transmission and Limitations. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1977.

JOHN KSELMAN AND KEVIN G. O'CONNELL

Scripture and tradition, the relationship between the Bible and the process of handing on the faith within the Church. In the life of the Church Scripture and tradition are not two realities radically distinct from one another; together they form a single copenetrating reality. Because some proponents of the Protestant Reformation denied the value of tradition and extolled Scripture as the only authoritative expression of the word of God (Lat., sola Scriptura, "Scripture alone"), the Council of Trent strongly emphasized the importance of tradition (1546). As a result, some Catholic theologians spoke of Scripture and tradition almost as if they constituted two distinct sources of revelation.

Vatican II (1962–65), however, explained that, "there exist a close connection and communication between sacred tradition and sacred Scripture. For both of them, flowing from the same divine wellspring, in a certain way merge into a unity and tend toward the same end" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 9). Again, "sacred tradition and sacred Scripture form one sacred deposit of the word of God, which is committed to the Church" (n. 10).

The conciliar texts, as do many Catholic theologians, reflect on the relationship between the NT and tradition more clearly and systematically than they do on the relationship between the OT and tradition. To some extent this concentration is based upon the faith conviction that the Christ event constitutes the fullness of revelation. Given the unity of the two Testaments, however, what can be said about the NT can be analogously applied to the OT.

Through his teaching, activity, and very being Jesus Christ revealed God and the kingdom to the disciples. Called to be apostles, the disciples witnessed to what they had seen and heard. Their oral preaching transmitted to others what they themselves had received from Christ and learned through the prompting of the Holy Spirit. In turn, this tradition was passed along to others. The living tradition develops within the Church with the help of the Holy Spirit who enables the Church to have an ever fuller understanding of the tradition that has been passed down. In this fashion the living tradition of the Church witnesses to divine revelation.

Under the inspiration of this same Holy Spirit, the apostolic message was committed to writing. These writings came to be known as the scriptures of the NT. The living tradition of the Church has shaped the tradition written in these Scriptures. In the life of the Church the writing of the Scriptures is a privileged moment in the handing on of tradition. They are a product of and a witness to the tradition in its earliest stages.

The tradition to which the Scriptures bear witness is the apostolic tradition, which is constitutive of and normative for the life of the Church. Those entrusted with the teaching office in the Church, the magisterium, have a particular responsibility and the grace of office in the handing down of this divine revelation. Normative apostolic tradition is to be distinguished from the various traditions, dogmatic, liturgical, pastoral, and devotional, that have developed in various places at different moments in the Church's history. See also Bible, Church teachings on the; Bible and doctrine; Scripture, authority of; tradition.

RAYMOND COLLINS

scrupulosity, the condition of a person who sees and fears sin where there is none. It is not simply a fear of sin, or even a great fear of sin, which is characteristic of the delicate conscience. Scrupulosity is morbid, i.e., fear of sin for unreasonable motives. Thus the person is unable to formulate a practical judgment concerning the morality of action.

Scruples can settle in any area of the moral life, or in many areas together, or in the whole moral attitude. The most common types of scrupulents are those who are apprehensive that they are about to sin or that they are always sinning. See also sin.

scrutinies, the catechumenal rituals that mark the final preparation of candidates to receive the sacraments of initiation (Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist). These rituals are normally celebrated during the Eucharist on the third, fourth, and fifth Sundays of Lent. The Gospel readings for these Sundays are from John 4, 9, and 11. The ritual takes place after the readings and homily. The candidates (now called the "elect," or the chosen) come before the presider and kneel to pray silently. Then everyone stands for the prayers of intercession for the elect, to which they respond "Lord, hear our prayer." A prayer of exorcism then follows, in which God is asked to free them from the power and wounds of sin in their lives, and then the presider lays his hands on the head of each candidate. The readings from the Gospel of John, which deal with the Samaritan woman (Third Sunday), the young man born blind (Fourth Sunday), and the raising of Lazarus (Fifth Sunday), reflect the meaning of these rituals, a profound conversion to Christ's offer of healing and salvation, themes that resonate in the prayers of exorcism. See also Baptism; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

seal of confession, the injunction placed on a priest to maintain absolute silence about matters discussed within the sacrament of Reconciliation. The issue arose when private confession to a priest became acceptable. In the first nine hundred years of the Church, the official form of Reconciliation was public, and it affected only those whose sins were publicly known. A seal of sacramental secrecy, therefore, had no meaning. From the end of the sixth century onward, a private form of confession began, unofficially at first, to develop. The privacy of the confession ritual and the requirement that private sins be confessed eventually raised the issue of sacramental secrecy. Only in the ninth century is there evidence of a church law requiring secrecy, i.e., the seal of confession. Eventually, the law of the sacramental seal became standard in late medieval canon law. The law of the seal affected only the priest, not the penitent. The revised code of canon law calls this seal "inviolable" (can. 983). A priest who directly discloses confessional matter is automatically excommunicated, and the removal of the excommunication is reserved to the pope (can. 1388). Indirect disclosure of confessional matter is also punishable in accordance with the seriousness of the situation. Those who act as interpreters for a penitent or who have knowledge of confessional matter from another source are also held to secrecy. If such people reveal confessional matter, they may be punished by church law (cans. 983, n. 2; 1388, n. 2). See also confession, auricular; Reconciliation.

KENAN B. OSBORNE

seamless garment. See consistent ethic of life.

Sebastian, St., d. ca. 288, a widely venerated Roman martyr and saint; in his honor a basilica was erected on the Appian Way. Later legend has him dying of arrow wounds. Feast day: January 20.

Second Coming (Gk., parousia, "arrival," "coming"), the expectation among Christians of a return of the exalted Jesus. In the earliest extant Christian writing, 1 Thessalonians, Paul uses apocalyptic imagery to indicate that Christians who have died will rise to greet the Lord at his coming (1 Thess 4:13–18). At the Parousia, Jesus will be manifest in his glory (e.g., Mark 13:26). That day will see Christ revealed as judge; the wicked will be destroyed (2 Thess 1:7–10) and the righteous vindicated (Rev 20:4–6). That an imminent return of the exalted Jesus was eagerly awaited by the early Christians is evident in the expectant prayer Maran atha, "Come, Lord" (1 Cor 16:22; see also Rev 22:20) and in Paul's instructions to remain in one's present state since the "time has grown short" (1 Cor 7:25–31).

The belief in a proximate Parousia and the hope that God would triumph over civil powers gave rise to the notion of an earthly millennial reign of Jesus, based on Rev 20:4–6. Such millenarian beliefs continued with varying intensity through the early centuries of Christianity but were rejected by some, including the allegorists of Alexandria and Eusebius of Caesarea. With the ascendancy of Constantine in the fourth century, an emperor sympathetic to Christianity, greater emphasis is placed on the historic successes of the Church. Such concerns, together with the increasingly evident delay in Jesus' return, effectively quashed active hope in an imminent Parousia, although anticipation of Jesus returning as heavenly judge continued and is enshrined in early creedal statements. Chiliastic expectations have, indeed, recurred at significant junctures in the history of Christianity. See also apocalypticism; Parousia. SUSAN MYERS

Second Vatican Council. See Vatican Council II.

Secret. See Prayer over the Gifts.

Secretariat of State, the office in the Roman Curia that provides special assistance to the pope in the care of the universal Church and in his dealings with the Roman Curia (see Pastor Bonus 39). Divided into two sections, it has responsibilities dealing with a wide range of issues including diplomacy. It is considered one of the most important offices of the Holy See. See also Roman Curia.

secretarium (seh-creh-teh'ree-uhm; Lat., "secret place"), the room near the entrance of a cathedral, distinct from the sacristy, for the vesting of the bishop and other ministers prior to the opening procession of the Mass or other liturgies. From historical studies of Christian architecture, it can be determined that the development of the secretarium was prior to that of the sacristy. See also sacristy.

sect (Lat., secta, "faction"), a religious body that has separated itself from a larger religious body, or denomination. The term is usually associated with moral rigor and exclusivity, enforced through a variety of social or religious means. Sects often appeal to some specific religious experience as a basis for membership and separation. See also sectarianism.

sectarianism, a type of religious adherence and practice associated with the spirit or attitude of sects. The term is often used in reference to certain elements or factions within mainline Christian churches that embody the negative characteristics of a sect, namely, the desire to be separated from the larger Christian community by appealing to individualistic aspects of Christianity, stressing the importance of moral purity, and defining true Christianity as incompatible with membership in established Christian churches or with engagement with modern culture. Sectarians tend to reject the value of diversity and define themselves in opposition to others. They are not instinctively drawn to ecumenism and dialogue.

Sectarianism pertains particularly to the relationship between the Church and the wider society. A sectarian group is one that is detached from the world and resistant to any involvement in the sociopolitical problems that exist outside the Church. Indeed, the sectarian defines the Church as the exclusive locus of God's activity, and the mission of the Church as limited to a countercultural, otherworldly salvation. Although sectarianism is diametrically opposed to Catholicism, a certain sectarian orientation has emerged in recent years in portions of the Catholic peace movement and in some younger Catholic moral theologians influenced by Protestant sectarian ethicists. See also catholicity.

secular institute, group of persons who live a consecrated life in the world. Its members work for their growth in Christian charity and for the sanctification of the world. They often do not live a common life similar to that of a religious community, but such a life is not precluded by the general law of the Church. Both laypersons and priests, depending on a given secular institute's rules, may be members of a secular institute. A number of the general laws of the Church concerning secular institutes are similar to those of religious communities. See also religious institute.

secularism, the general attitude, form of life, or philosophical system that excludes or denies the existence and relevance of any values beyond those of the natural order. Secularism focuses exclusively on this finite world. As a philosophical system, secularism typically asserts the possibility of human perfection within the context of a self-sufficient, though evolving, natural order, and often holds the natural sciences to be the highest forms of human knowing. Though it is not always explicitly hostile to the Church, secularism's consistent denial of the supernatural directly contradicts traditional Christian faith in God and divine providence.

sede impedita (sed'ay im-ped-ee'tah; Lat., "when the see is impeded"), a situation that occurs when the bishop of a diocese is prevented from exercising his ministry. Such a situation might arise in times of war or persecution. Canon law provides regulations for the governance of a diocese when its bishop is prevented from governing.

sede vacante (sed'ay vah-kahn'tay; Lat., "when the see is vacant"), a situation when there is no bishop in a diocese. It can arise through the death of the bishop, through his resignation and acceptance of the resignation by the pope, or through the removal of the bishop from office. Canon law has certain regulations concerning the interim governance of the see; chief among them is that the interim pastoral leader is only a caretaker and that nothing new is to be undertaken (Lat., nihil innovetur, can. 428.1).

sedia gestatoria (sed'ee-ah jes-tah-tohr'ee-uh; Lat., "portable chair"), the chair on which the pope can be carried through a crowd in such a way that he can easily be seen by the people. It was last used by Pope John Paul I (d. 1978), who originally discarded it but resumed its use when told it would allow more people to see him.

sedilia (seh-dee'lee-uh; Lat., "seat" or "chair"), the chair for the presider of the Eucharist. The sedilia was constructed either as a single seat to hold three ministers or as a combination of three seats. When combined, the presider occupied the center chair, and his assisting deacon and subdeacon sat on either side. Most American churches use a single presider's chair. Assisting ministers sit elsewhere in the sanctuary, the space surrounding the altar.

Sedulius Scotus, Irish scholar active in the middle of the ninth century on the Continent. He was a poet and a grammarian. His writings include a Collectaneum, from works of classical and Christian authors; a treatise, On Christian Rulers; and commentaries on Matthew and the Pauline Letters.

see (Lat., sedes, "seat"), a local church. The Latin word from which the term is derived refers to the chair of the bishop. This chair is symbolic of the apostolic office of presiding over, and teaching, the Christian community. At times the first occupant of the see gives the name to the see, e.g., Rome as the See of Peter. See also diocese.

self-defense, protecting oneself from unjust physical attack through the use of force. Basing its argument on natural law, Catholic moral theology has generally maintained that individuals and societies may rightly defend themselves against such attack. However, the instinct of self-preservation should not be allowed to develop into hatred or excessive violence. Love of neighbor must constrain any necessary use of force, keeping it proportionate to the attack. The example and teaching of Jesus leads some Catholics to adopt a peaceable life-style that rejects violence and employs nonviolent means of self-defense. See also just-war doctrine; pacifism.

self-denial, the disciplinary practice of foregoing legitimate bodily pleasures for the purpose of gaining spiritual strength to combat temptation and overcome the power of sin. Fasting for brief periods and abstaining from certain kinds of food are examples of self-denial that are familiar to many Catholics, especially during the season of lent. See also mortification.

semi-Arianism, a fourth-century theological movement positioned between Arianism and Catholic orthodoxy. Identified with Basil of Ancyra, the movement rejected extreme Arian views that stripped Christ of any claim to a unique relationship with God. The semi-Arians spoke of Christ as having a substance "like" the Father's (Gk., homoioúsious rather than homōoúsious, "of the same substance"), and their whole tendency was toward orthodoxy. Their writings had a positive influence on the Cappadocian Fathers and the subsequent defeat of Arianism at the Council of Constantinople in 381. See also Ancyra; Arianism; homoousios.

seminary (Lat., seminarium, "seedbed"), the program of training candidates for the priesthood; also the building(s) in which the program in conducted. The seminary originated in the Council of Trent's decree Cum Adolescentium Aetas (1563) that enjoins each bishop to sponsor a college at his cathedral to train poor youth for the priesthood. The decree prescribes a general education and instruction in the tasks of ministry for seminarians. The bishop was free to determine the length and content of studies according to diocesan resources and needs. The decree does not address the training of religious-order priests. Subsequent developments influenced the operation of the diocesan seminary. The seventeenth-century French school of spirituality provided a method of spiritual formation stressing mental prayer and the candidate's identity with Christ. In the nineteenth-century United States, the diocesan seminary developed in several formats: within bishops' households, combined with lay colleges, sponsored by religious orders, and in institutions devoted solely to priestly formation. At the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884), the bishops outlined six-year programs of studies for minor and major diocesan seminaries. Roman centralization is reflected in the seminary canons of the 1917 Code of Canon Law that outlined the seminary's operation, named its officials, listed courses, determined the years for study, and made seminary studies a prerequisite for ordination. Thereafter, the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities issued additional regulations based on these canons. Vatican Council II in 1965 issued the Decree on Priestly Formation directing each national hierarchy to devise its own national program of priestly formation. See also Baltimore, councils of; seminary, major; seminary, minor; Trent, Council of. JOSEPH M. WHITE seminary, major, an institution, with a six-year program of studies in philosophy (two years) and theology and related sciences and disciplines (four years), established for the educational, pastoral, and spiritual formation of candidates for the ordained priesthood. Some, but not most, seminarians will have attended a minor seminary before entering the major seminary. The students are in residence at the major seminary where they receive their spiritual and pastoral formation, but may take some of their academic courses of study elsewhere. The final, or deacon, year is usually taken in a pastoral assignment away from the seminary campus. See also seminary; seminary, minor.

seminary, minor, an institution, with a four- or six-year program of studies in the humanities and the sciences, established for the education and spiritual formation of candidates for the ordained priesthood. During the four years of high school, the students may be in residence at the seminary or live at home with their own families. During the first two years of college, however, they usually reside in community and attend classes on or off the seminary campus. Following completion of their studies at the minor seminary, the candidates for the priesthood enter a major seminary for the remainder of their education and spiritual formation. See also seminary; seminary, major.

semi-Pelagianism, modern name for the teaching of certain fifth-century monastic theologians in southern Gaul who reacted against what they considered the extremes of Augustine's teaching on grace. It originated from two monasteries, at Lérins and Marseilles, founded by Honoratus and John Cassian, respectively, both of whom had Eastern ascetic formation. The principal documents of semi-Pelagianism are Cassian's Conference 13, Vincent of Lérins' (probably) Ojectiones Vincentianae, the Capitula Gallorum (these last two being responses to the Augustinian Prosper of Aquitaine), and On Grace of Faustus of Riez (ca. 400–ca. 490, sometime monk of Lérins). The so-called semi-Pelagians held that the first step toward salvation was independent of grace, which, however, was operative thereafter. The Council of Orange (529) decided against semi-Pelagianism, in favor of a somewhat modified Augustinian view of grace and predestination. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.; Cassian, St. John; grace; Orange, Council of; Pelagianism.

Sempiternus Rex Christus (sem-pi-tair'noos reks krees'toos; Lat., "Christ, the Eternal King"), an encyclical of Pius XII, commemorating the fifteenth centenary of the Council of Chalcedon, October 8, 1951. See also Chalcedon, Council of.

senses of Scripture. See Scripture, senses of.

sensus fidelium (sen'soos fid-ay'lee-oom; Lat.), "the sense of the faithful." Other phrases for the same idea are consensus fidelium, "the consent of the faithful," and sensus fidei, "the sense of faith." The last phrase, the sense of faith, points to an aspect of the knowability of faith; faith possesses what is called a "connatural," or instinctive, spontaneous, and intuitive knowledge of its object (God). This is called a supernatural sense because it comes from the inner presence and working of God as Spirit in the person of faith. This makes the community of faith a pneumatological community, anointed and animated by God as Spirit (1 John 2:27). The sense of the faithful is thus the intuitive grasp on the truth of God that is possessed by the Church as a whole, as a consensus. It is both an adherence to the public teachings of the Church and an active charism of discernment, a power of practical and possessive knowledge belonging to the body of the faithful by virtue of their concrete living of the faith in response to God as Spirit.

This concept is found implicitly in the Fathers of the Church when they insist that Church teaching can never contradict the universal and corporate faith of the Church. John Henry Newman drew this teaching out in his essay of 1859, On Consulting the Faithful in Matters of Doctrine. Yves Congar developed it further in his influential Lay People in the Church prior to Vatican II (1962–65).

Vatican II teaches that this sense of the faithful is infallible: "The body of the faithful as a whole, anointed as they are by the Holy One, cannot err in matters of belief" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 12). This unerring quality is manifested when the whole Church, sustained by the Spirit of truth, "shows universal agreement in matters of faith and morals" (n. 12). This does not mean that in every matter of detail a majority or even a consensus of opinion in the Church at any given time is theologically sound. But it does mean that the experience of the faithful is a source for theology and that, in the terms of Newman, the faithful should be consulted in the teaching of the Church.

This concept of the sense of the faithful is fruitful because of its bearing on many other areas of Catholic theology. It enriches the notion of tradition as something mediated by the corporate living of applied faith by the whole Church. Thus, tradition as the historical process of the sensus fidelium provides a basis for understanding the dynamics of the development or reinterpretation of doctrine. The sensus fidelium forms part of a theology of the laity which must be an integral part of ecclesiology. The reality of the sensus fidelium also recommends a theology of reception to complement the teaching authority of the Church. See also reception of doctrine; tradition.

ROGER HAIGHT

sensus plenior (sen'soos playn'ee-ohr; Lat., "fuller sense"), the deeper meaning of the words of Scripture that is intended by God but is not fully understood by its human authors. The term was in vogue among Catholic exegetes from ca. 1925 to ca. 1970. The idea of a sensus plenior is dependent upon an instrumental theory of inspiration, according to which human authors serve as God's instruments in the composition of biblical texts. See also Scripture, senses of.

Sentences, collections of scriptural sayings and the opinions of the early Church Fathers ordered topically, a favorite genre of twelfth-century theologians. The most successful collection was that compiled by Peter Lombard (d. 1160) in the 1150s. Drawing on mostly Western materials, most notably the writings of Augustine (d. 430), Lombard's Sentences fall into four books: on God, on human beings under sin and grace, on Christ and the virtues, on sacraments and the last things. Originally divided only into chapters, the division of the four books into distinctions was the work of Alexander of Hales (d. 1245), who did much to popularize the genre. A handy compendium of theological opinions, by the end of the first third of the thirteenth century and for centuries thereafter, Lombard's Sentences had been incorporated into the theological curriculum: commenting on the Sentences marked the final stage in the formal training of the Scholastic theologian, required before becoming a regent master. Numerous commentaries, including those of Aquinas, Bonaventure, and Duns Scotus, are extant. See also Lombard, Peter; Scholasticism.

Septuagesima Sunday (sep'too-ah-jeh'sih-mah), "the seventieth" day before Easter, the tenth Sunday before Easter, and third Sunday before Lent. Septuagesima once marked the beginning of the pre-Easter penitential season. The pre-Lenten season, once begun on Septuagesima, has been suppressed following the revision of the Roman Calendar in 1969.

Septuagint (sep'too-ah-jint), the original Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, often designated as LXX. The name derives from the tradition, begun in the legendary Letter of Aristeas, that seventy-two or seventy (Gk., septuaginta, "seventy") Jewish elders translated the Pentateuch into Greek. Quotations by early writers and manuscript evidence suggest that the Torah was translated as early as ca. 250 B.C., the Prophets by ca. 200 B.C., and several of the Writings by ca. 150 B.C. The Septuagint was the first translation of the Hebrew Bible into another language, and it is the best single witness, after the Masoretic Text, to the ancient Hebrew text. The Septuagint includes all the books in the rabbinic Bible, as well as the apocryphal or deuterocanonical books. In contrast to the threefold division found in the Masoretic Text (Law, Prophets, Writings), the earliest Septuagint codices display a messianic four-part arrangement (Pentateuch, Historical, Poetic, and Prophetic books), though early lists differ in contents and order. While some of these books are similar to their counterparts in the Masoretic Text (Isaiah), others are substantially shorter (Jeremiah) or longer (Daniel), thus attesting to different editions or editorial stages in the development of the books. Several revisions of the Septuagint were made up to the mid-third century, both Jewish (Aquila) and Christian (Origen). Until it was eclipsed by the Latin Vulgate, the Septuagint was the first testament in the Bible of the Christian Church, and it remains such for the Greek Orthodox Church. See also Hexapla. EUGENE ULRICH sequence, a hymn sung after the second reading and before the gospel acclamation at Mass. Only four are presently appointed for liturgical use: Victimae Paschali Laudes (Lat., "Praises to the Paschal Victim") on Easter Sunday, Veni, Sancte Spiritus ("Come, Holy Spirit") on Pentecost, Lauda Sion ("Praise Sion") on Corpus Christi, and Stabat Mater ("The Mother Stood") on the feast of Our Lady of Sorrows. Perhaps the most famous sequence is the Dies Irae ("Day of Wrath"), though it is no longer sung at funerals.

Sepulchre, Holy. See Holy Sepulchre, Church of the.

Sergius of Radonezh, generally regarded as the greatest of Russian saints, founder of some forty monasteries, and mediator and peacemaker in political disputes; depicted here as an abbot.

seraphim, celestial beings around the throne of God who take part, with the cherubim, in the heavenly liturgy. Isa 6:1–7 describes them as having three pairs of wings and intoning the praises of the holy God. Etymologically, the word might mean "burning ones" and may go back to the representation of a winged serpent common in ancient Near Eastern iconography. See also angel.

Serapion of Thmuis, St. (suh-rap'ee-awn; thum-wees') fourth-century Egyptian bishop (d. after 360). An important collection of early liturgical texts—called the Euchologion of Serapion—is attributed to him.

Sergius I, St., d. 701, pope from 687 to 701. Elected by clergy and people over two rivals, he resisted attempts by the emperor Justinian II to coerce him into signing canons (Trullan Council, Constantinople, 692) that would have given the see of Constantinople the same authority as Rome. Feast day: September 8. See also Constantinople.

Sergius of Radonezh, St. (rah-doh'nesh), 1314–92, the most popular Russian saint and first Russian mystic, venerated by Orthodox and Catholics alike. Considered the patron saint of Russia, Sergius is often called "the Russian Orthodox Francis of Assisi." Born of noble parents, after their death in 1334 Sergius withdrew to the forests of Radonezh just north of Moscow to live a life of monastic solitude. In 1336, he built a chapel in honor of the Trinity, and soon attracted disciples who lived a "lavriot," or semieremitical, monastic life. In 1354, Sergius and his disciples adopted a cenobitic (community) rule, and the great monastery that developed, now known as the Trinity-St. Sergius Lavra, became a center of pilgrimage, the principal center of Russian spirituality, and the spiritual heart of Russian Orthodoxy. Sergius refused election to the patriarchate of Moscow in 1378, and became a national hero when he gave his blessing to Prince Dimitri to repel the Mongols at the famous Battle of Kulikovo in 1380 during the Tatar domination of Rus' (early name for Russia) and Muscovy. Because he lived before the Orthodox rejection of the Union of Florence (1439), the feast of St. Sergius on September 25 is also found in the Eastern Catholic sanctoral. See also Russia, Catholicism in.

Seripando, Girolamo, 1492–1563, Italian theologian, archbishop of Salerno, and influential Catholic reformer. A member and later vicar-general (1538) of the Augustinian order, he strongly opposed Lutheranism but nevertheless espoused a biblical and Augustinian view of justification and Scripture. At the Council of Trent (1545–63), Seripando failed in his effort to elevate Scripture above tradition as a source of Catholic truth; however, he was influential in formulating final decrees on justification and original sin. As archbishop (1554–63), Seripando fulfilled the Tridentine ideals of episcopal residence (living in his diocese), visitation, and preaching.

sermon. See homily.

Sermon on the Mount, sayings of Jesus in Matt 5–7 (111 verses), with parallels in Luke 6:20–49 (the Sermon on the Plain). The sermon begins with Beatitudes that praise those virtues and dispositions that characterize the new eschatological community (Matt 5:3–12). After statements on the abiding validity of the law (5:17–20), there follow six antitheses (5:21–43) contrasting the old law with the teaching of Jesus (e.g., "You have heard that it was said . . . but I say to you"). Since these do not describe accurately the OT (e.g., nowhere does the OT say "hate your enemy," as Matt 5:43 suggests), emphasis should be put on the positive exhortation. After instructions on the practice of Christian discipleship, including the Golden Rule (Matt 7:12), the sermon concludes with exhortations to both hear and do Jesus' words (7:24–27). Though often called "utopian," in Matthew the sermon describes those attitudes and actions which constitute discipleship in response to the love of God manifest in Jesus (see Matt 4:23–25).

Serra, Bl. Junipero (hoo-ne'pair-oh sayr'ah), 1713–84, Spanish Franciscan priest, founder of the California missions. He established the first mission in present-day California at San Diego in 1769, and went on to establish eight more missions, serving as president of the missions until his death. He was beatified in 1987, but his cause for canonization became the source of controversy between the Catholic Church and Native American activists, who objected to the missionaries' treatment of those whom they sought to convert.

Sertillanges, Antonin-Gilbert, 1863–1948, French Dominican theologian. A thinker characterized by breadth and openness of thought, Sertillanges wrote on Thomistic philosophy, moral theology, ecclesiology, and exegesis; he taught Scripture at the École Biblique (Jerusalem) and theology at Le Saulchoir in France. For his time, he was unusually irenic and well-informed as he sought to explain faith and Church to modern philosophy, literature, and science. He is perhaps best known to many Catholics for his book The Intellectual Life (1946).

servant of the Lord, "servant" referred to in certain passages in the later, exilic part of the book of Isaiah (42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–11; 52:13–53:12). The passages speak of a chosen instrument of God with a mission to Israel and the nations, in which the servant perseveres in spite of opposition, and in pursuit of which he suffers ignominy and, possibly, death. The standard Jewish interpretation connects these passages to Israel's mission to the world, but there are indications that at least one of them must allude to an individual or collectivity within Israel, thought by some to be the exiled ruler and by others a prophet or prophetic group. The last of the passages, which speaks of the suffering and (probable) death of the servant, has left a deep imprint on the NT representation of the mission and death of Jesus (Matt 12:15–21; Mark 10:45; 1 Pet 2:22–24).

server, altar, an assistant to the presider at Mass. The principal functions of the altar server are to hold the sacramentary for the bishop or priest as he prays with extended arms at Mass, to bring the sacred vessels to the altar at the presentation of the gifts, and to minister the wine and water for the presider. Altar servers originated in the ninth century, as young boys assumed the role of ordained acolytes. They carried the Mass Book (missal), placed it on the altar, responded to the priest's prayers, and ministered the wine and water to the presider. The revised Code of Canon Law (1983) allowed in principle for women and girls to fulfill this function, but not until 1994 was a definitive interpretation rendered by the Vatican, with the approval of Pope John Paul II, authorizing national conferences of bishops to permit women and girls to serve at the altar. See also acolyte.

Servetus, Michael, ca. 1511–53, Spanish physician and antitrinitarian. The author of De Trinitatis Erroribus (On the Errors of the Trinity; 1531), Dialogorum de Trinitate Libri Duo (Two Books of Dialogues on the Trinity; 1532), and Christianismi Restitutio (The Renewal of Christianity; 1553), in the latter revealing the pulmonary circulation of the blood, Servetus was executed for heresy at Geneva at Calvin's instigation. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

servile work, physical labor forbidden on Sundays and holy days, contrasted with mental work, like reading or music, which was allowed. The distinction, however, scarcely suits modern life. In the encyclical Laborem Exercens (1981) Pope John Paul II identifies labor in all its forms as a defining characteristic of what it is to be human. Accordingly, the 1983 Code of Canon Law, unlike the 1917 code, focuses on the purpose and spirit of the Sunday rest, directing that Catholics, except in cases of necessity, refrain from any work or business concerns that hinder their worship of God and the celebration of the day (can. 1247). See also Sunday.

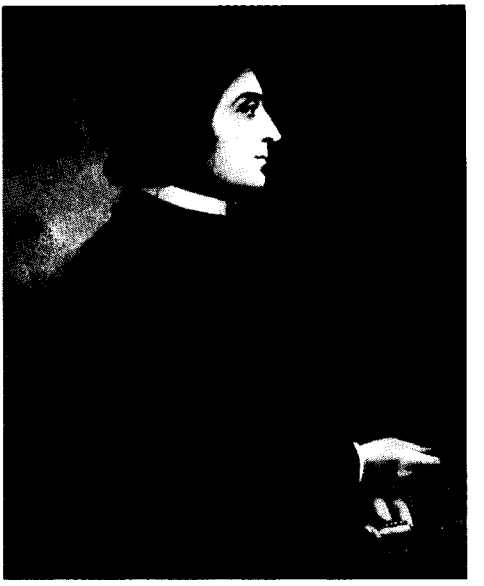
Servites, the Order of Friar Servants of Mary (O.S.M.), a religious community including priests and brothers, contemplative nuns and tertiaries. Servites lead a monastic life in the tradition of the mendicant orders and undertake various apostolic works. The order was founded in Cafaggio, Italy, in 1233 by cloth merchants from Florence. Now known as the Seven Founders, their original intent was to live in the spirit of the early Church, according to the Rule of St. Augustine. The order was given papal approval in 1256. There have been American foundations of Servites since 1870. See also Seven Holy Founders of the Servants of Mary.

Servus Servorum Dei (sair'voos sair-vohr'oom day'ee; Lat. "Servant of the Servants of God"), papal title. First used by Pope Gregory the Great (590–604), it has been in general use since the pontificate of Gregory VII (1073–85).

Seton, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley, 1774–1821, the first American-born saint. Born in New York City of a wealthy and devout Episcopalian family, the daughter of a professor of anatomy at King's College (now Columbia University) in New York and the stepsister of Archbishop James Roosevelt Bayley of Baltimore, in 1794 she married William Magee Seton, a wealthy merchant, with whom she had five children. She became involved in social work and established the Society for the Relief of Poor Widows with Children in 1797. Six years later, during a trip to Italy with the entire family, her husband died. Inspired by the kindness of an Italian family, she converted to Catholicism in 1805, upon her return to the United States. The rector of St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore invited her to open a school for girls, and in 1809 with four companions she founded a religious community, the Sisters of St. Joseph, and also a school for poor children near Emmitsburg, Maryland.



Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton, the first person born in America to be canonized (Frances Xavier Cabrini was the first American citizen to be so honored) and founder of the Sisters of Charity, a religious community devoted to the poor and the sick.

Her community's rule, based on the rule of Vincent de Paul, was approved by the archbishop of Baltimore in 1812. She was elected superior and, with eighteen other sisters, took vows the following year. Thus began the first American religious society, the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph, devoted primarily to the education of the poor and to teaching in parish, or parochial, schools. That is why historians often credit her with laying the foundation for the Catholic parochial school system in the United States. The new order spread throughout the United States, the rest of North America, South America, and Italy. By the time of her death at Emmitsburg, there were already some twenty communities in existence. With extraordinary support from the Catholic communities in and around Philadelphia and Baltimore, she was beatified by Pope John XXIII and later canonized in 1975 by Pope Paul VI—the first American-born saint. In his canonization talk, Pope Paul VI praised her for her contributions as a wife, mother, widow, and consecrated religious, and her witness to an authentic spirituality in a land where "temporal prosperity seemed to obscure and almost make seven capital sins. See capital sins.

[it] impossible." Feast day: January 4. See also Bayley, James Roosevelt; Sisters of Charity. RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Seven Holy Founders of the Servants of Mary, thirteenth-century Florentine youths who founded the Servites. Their names were Buonfiglio Monaldo, Alexis Falconieri, Benedict dell'Antello, Bartholomew Amidei, Ricovero Uguccione, Gerardino Sostegni, and John Buonagiunta Monetti. Feast day: February 17. See also Servites.

Seven Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary. See Our Lady of Sorrows.

Seventh-Day Adventists, members of the largest Protestant denomination to emerge out of the Millerite movement in the United States. Organized in 1863 by James and Ellen G. White, Seventh-Day Adventists believe in reading the Bible literally, Saturday as the Sabbath, the imminent return of Christ, and the prophetic nature of Mrs. White's writings. They emphasize health, abstaining from alcohol, tobacco, and often meat. Like other evangelicals, Seventh-Day Adventists promote individual conversion, and often have coupled their evangelistic efforts with the founding of health-care institutions. In the 1990s, there were 783,000 Seventh-Day Adventists in North America and 7.3 million worldwide.

Severinus Boethius, St. See Boethius, St. Severinus.

Severus of Antioch, ca. 465–538, bishop of Antioch (512–18), whose moderated Monophysite teaching approached, in effect if not in language, the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451). See also Chalcedon, Council of; Monophysitism.

Sexagesima Sunday (seks'uh-jeh'sih-mah), "the sixtieth" day before Easter, it is actually the sixty-third. Sexagesima is the second Sunday before Lent and the ninth before Easter. As with Septuagesima, the preceding Sunday, and Quinquagesima, the following Sunday, its observance has been suppressed under the reformed Roman Calendar (1969).

sexism, patterns of discriminatory attitudes and practices based on gender. The habits of considering one sex inferior to the other and of evaluating a person's worth on the basis of sex have come to be known as sexism. Though the term could theoretically apply to either sex, in practice it usually conveys the meaning of discriminatory attitudes toward women. Often compared to racism, it is considered by many theologians to be a form of social sin. See also feminism; inclusive language.

Sext (Lat., "sixth"), second of the three daytime hours of liturgical prayer. Sext is prayed at the "sixth" hour, roughly 12:00 noon. Like its companion offices, Terce and None, it is brief, and its texts and songs vary far less frequently than those of the major hours: Matins, Lauds, and Vespers. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

sexton (seks'tun), the person charged with the day-to-day care and maintenance of the physical structure and environment of a church building and its properties; the janitor. Because sextons cared for church-owned cemeteries and belltowers, they once had to possess ancillary skills in undertaking and bell ringing.

sexual morality, an understanding of the moral obligations associated with human sexuality. Unlike some other ethical traditions, Catholicism holds that there is an objective moral order that is greater than the sum of individual moral choices. In the very act of creation God gave to all aspects of creation a purpose or a finality. Often spoken of as the "natural law," this purpose gives meaning to human activity and also establishes moral obligations for human living.

The purpose of human sexual activity is to express love and create new life in the context of marriage. Any sexual activity or expression that is not consistent with, or violates, this purpose is considered to be morally wrong because it opposes the divine plan. This is why artificial means of birth control, masturbation, fornication, and premarital intercourse have been viewed in the Catholic tradition as always immoral actions. The reason these actions are always immoral, it has been argued, is that the nature of these activities is such that neither human intention nor circumstances can change or mitigate their violating the purpose of human sexual activity. For that reason these actions are said to be intrinsically evil.

Many theologians disagree with some aspects of this traditional teaching. While affirming the purpose or finality of human sexual activity, they say that there are circumstances in which, for example, artificial birth control would be morally correct. The Church's hierarchical magisterium has rejected this position. At the same time Paul VI and John Paul II have taught the positive value of human sexuality. This teaching is grounded in a deep appreciation of humanity having been created in the image and likeness of God, a God who is love. Consequently, human sexuality is good and is most authentic when it is an expression of committed love in marriage. See also chastity; fornication; homosexuality; masturbation; purity. MICHAEL D. PLACE

Shakers, members of a millennialist offshoot of the Quakers. They derived their name from the shaking which possessed them through spiritual exaltation. Ann Lee, revered for her prophetic visions, led a small group of Shakers from England to America in 1774. Early Shakers emphasized celibacy, communal living, and ecstatic, yet simple, worship. They were innovative farmers and superb artisans. Around 1850 nineteen communities housed perhaps 3,600 members. In the early 1990s there were only a handful remaining in New Hampshire.

shalom (Heb., "peace," "well-being"), a common greeting. It achieves a special resonance in the context of epistolary greetings in early Christianity (e.g., Rom 1:7).

Shea, John Gilmary, 1824–92, Church historian, considered by some to be the "father of American Catholic history." His four-volume History of the Catholic Church in the United States covers the period from the earliest settlements to 1852 and in certain respects has never been superseded. After a vocation with the Jesuits, Shea remained a layman. He never held a teaching position and was bitterly disappointed when he was not named to the Church History chair at The Catholic University of America when it opened in 1889. He wrote popular history and journalism to support his family, but also published a history of Georgetown University and many works on Indian missions.

Sheed, Francis Joseph, 1897–1981, writer, lecturer, publisher, and lay theologian. Born in Australia and educated there and in England, he was a street preacher before he and his wife, Maisie Ward, founded the Catholic publishing house of Sheed and Ward in London in 1929. His public speaking led to his writing; he is the author of more than ten books, including Theology for Beginners (1957).

Sheen, Fulton J., 1895–1979, archbishop, preacher, author, and radio and television personality. Ordained for the diocese of Peoria in 1919, he continued his education at The Catholic University of America, and received a Ph.D. from the University of Louvain in 1923.

Appointed to the faculty at Catholic University in 1926, he taught philosophy and theology until 1950. Sheen attracted widespread attention as a dynamic preacher, anti-Communist, and intellectual popularizer. A pioneer of the electronic church, he was the featured speaker on "The Catholic Hour" radio broadcasts (1930–52), with an estimated four million listeners. He was also celebrated for his "Life Is Worth Living" television show (1951–57), which reached an audience of some thirty million viewers.

Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen, before the Second Vatican Council the most popular Catholic radio and television speaker in America, having reached millions of listeners and viewers via his "Catholic Hour" and "Life Is Worth Living" broadcasts from the 1930s through the 1950s.

In 1950, he became national director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, raising millions of dollars for the missions. He was the author of more than sixty books, and was instrumental in receiving prominent people, such as Congresswoman Clare Booth Luce and former Communist Louis Budenz, into the Catholic Church.

Named bishop of Rochester, New York, in 1966, Sheen focused his attention on ecumenism and urban poverty. After a short and stormy tenure, marked by controversy over his style of leadership, he resigned in 1969. He became increasingly critical of certain post–Vatican II developments in the Church and gradually receded from the public scene.

Sheerin, John B., 1906–92, Paulist priest, editor, and ecumenist. Ordained in 1937, he was editor of The Catholic World (1948–72), a syndicated columnist in the Catholic press (1956–82), an official Vatican observer to the World Council of Churches (1957–63), a peritus (Lat., "expert") at the fourth session of the Second Vatican Council (1965), and the author of several books, including Christian Reunion: The Ecumenical Movement and American Catholics (1966).

Shenoute (sheh-no*o*'tay), also known as Shenudi, ca. 350–ca. 450, abbot of the White Monastery in Upper Egypt and one of the greatest Coptic writers of homilies, letters, and treatises. His severe adaptations of Pachomius's rules prescribed floggings and required a written profession of obedience. He collaborated with patriarchs of Alexandria from Athanasius to Dioscorus, even accompanying Cyril to Ephesus (431). Feast day: July 1 (Coptic). See also Copt, Coptic.

Sheol (shay-ohl'), ancient poetic Hebrew term for the underworld, translated "grave," "pit," or "hell" (cf. Job 17:13–16; Vulgate, infernus). It originally designated a place of confinement, but not punishment, for all the deceased. During the Hellenistic era, it became associated with Greek Hades and the notion of judgment developed. It is to be distinguished from the NT Gehenna (e.g., Matt 5:22).

Shepherd of Hermas. See Hermas, Shepherd of.

Sheptyckyj, Andryj (ahn-dree' shep-titz'kee), 1865–1944, Ukrainian Catholic metropolitan of Halych and archbishop of Lviv. Of noble origin, he entered the Order of St. Basil in 1888, was ordained a priest in 1892; he became bishop of Stanyslaviv in 1898 and metropolitan in 1900. As head of the Ukrainian Catholic Church, he combined deep spiritual life with tireless pastoral activity, and an ecumenial spirit far in advance of his times.

shrine (Lat., scrinium, "coffer"). 1 A container for relics exhibited in a church or chapel. 2 A church location holding a sacred statue or painting that people visit for devotional purposes. 3 A separate complex near a church that houses, typically, a statue or other object of devotion. 4 A pilgrimage destination (e.g., Guadalupe or Lourdes) that may encompass a complex of buildings but whose main focus is a cult site or cult figure, like a statue or an altar with relics. See also relics; reliquary.

shrines, Marian, holy places devoted to Mary that are the destinations of pilgrimages. Although many places in medieval Europe and elsewhere had shrine destinations connected with devotion to Mary (e.g., the cathedral of Chartres, which held the relic of the tunic of Mary, or the Shrine of Our Lady of Walsingham in pre-Reformation England), there have been any number of shrines connected to the cult of Mary that have continued to draw large numbers of pilgrims. These shrines are also the loci of purported Marian apparitions. They include the Mexican shrine of Our Lady of Guadalupe (famous since the late-sixteenth century), or more modern Marian apparition shrines like Lourdes (France), Knock (Ireland), Fátima (Portugal), and La Salette (France). Recent alleged Marian apparitions (e.g., those in Medjugorje in Croatia) have developed into objects of pious pilgrimage. Some Marian shrines are more important for their miraculous images than as the sites of apparitions: e.g., Our Lady of Montserrat (Spain) or the Black Madonna shrine on Jasna Gorna (Pol., "Shining Mountain") in Poland. See also apparitions of the Blessed Virgin Mary; Marian devotion.

Shroud, Holy. See Holy Shroud.

Shrove Tuesday, Tuesday before Ash Wednesday. Also known as Mardi Gras (Fr., "fat Tuesday"), the day in question was named "Shrove" from the Old English word scrifan, meaning to hear or make confession. It is a day for confessing and feasting. See also Holy Week.

The Marian shrine of Our Lady of Montserrat in Spain.

Shuster, George Nauman, 1894–1977, educator, publicist, and government official. A graduate of Notre Dame and Columbia University, Shuster served on the staff of Commonweal magazine (1924–37), was president of Hunter College in New York (1940–60), and was assistant to the president at Notre Dame (1961–77). A prolific author, he published important works on German history and culture and on American Catholicism. See also Commonweal; Notre Dame, University of.

Sic et Non (sik et nohn; Lat., "Yes and No"), a medieval text, first drafted by Peter Abelard in 1121, that provided students and teachers of theology with a resource for resolving apparently contradictory teachings. The brief prologue, a collection of patristic and classical rules for interpreting problematic texts, is followed by 158 questions, each of which presented patristic, conciliar, and scriptural sayings on a controversial theological issue.

While Abelard's debt to others in this work is well-known, Sic et Non is a distinctive work. It is a significant early championing of a place for dialectic in theological inquiry, thus furthering the development of theology as a "science." See also Abelard, Peter; Scholasticism.

Siger of Brabant (see'zhay), ca. 1240–ca. 1284, French philosopher. Active as a teacher and writer at the University of Paris in the 1260s and 1270s, he is considered the founder of Latin Averroism. After 1270, he progressively modified his views in the direction of orthodoxy; nevertheless, he was a prime target of the Parisian condemnation of 1277. Bishop Stephen Tempier listed a number of Averroist errors, particularly the idea that, when in conflict, truths of philosophy are superior to truths of the Catholic faith. See also Averroism.

Sigismund, St., d. ca. 523, king of Burgundy from 516 to 523, son of the Arian king Gundebald.

Sigismund converted to Catholicism ca. 499. Feast day: May 1.

Signatura, Apostolic, the highest tribunal in the Church judicial system. The court's responsibilities include the adjudication of procedural issues raised in other tribunals and administrative procedures, as well as the supervision of all other tribunals in the Catholic Church. Some think that the court's name derives from the fact that its early meeting room was the place where documents were signed. See also Roman Curia.

sign of peace, the phrase used since Vatican Council II (1962–65) to describe the liturgical greeting exchanged among Christians as a sign of neighborly love and unity. At Mass, it follows the Lord's Prayer and precedes Communion. The sign of peace may also be exchanged at other services: e.g., the Liturgy of the Hours, ordinations, baptisms, and during the liturgy of Reconciliation (Penance). Because cultures differ in their manner of expressing unity and peace, this liturgical sign may take many forms: a kiss, an embrace, bowing, touching one another, a handshake. The handclasp is common in many parishes in the United States.

sign of the cross, the private or public act of tracing an image of the cross on persons or things. Tertullian (d. ca. 225) already attests to the use of this gesture as a way for Christians to sanctify daily life or signal mutual recognition during periods of persecution. Soon the personal gesture was extended to Baptism and Eucharist, and then to other liturgical blessings of persons and objects. In early times the cross was drawn on the forehead with the right thumb. Later, in the Roman rite, it was made by drawing the right hand from forehead to breast, then from left shoulder to right shoulder. See also cross.

signs of the times, a phrase referring to the activity of God in the world and in the changing events of human history. It is taken from the Bible (Matt 16:3) and is found also in Pope John XXIII's 1963 encyclical Pacem in Terris (nn. 126–29) and in the Second Vatican Council's Gaudium et Spes (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, n. 4). To carry out its role as a servant, the council declared, "the Church has always had the duty of scrutinizing the signs of the times and of interpreting them in the light of the gospel."

Silas, short form of the name Silvanus, a companion of Paul. He is mentioned in Acts 15:22–18:5, under the name of Silas, as a fellow evangelist of Paul and Timothy. He is called Silvanus in 1 Cor 1:19. He is the coauthor of 1 and 2 Thessalonians, and is the scribe of 1 Peter (1 Pet 5:12).

silence, the quieting of one's being. The first requirement is not speaking. True exterior silence also includes refraining from eye contact, gesturing, reading, writing, touching, and other forms of communication. Deep interior silence requires recollection, stilling thought, calming emotion, and acceptance of experiences without judgment.

Silence centers one in the ability to listen without reaction or distraction. It is important in contemplative living and required in some monastic codes. It is essential for concentration, awareness, self-understanding, and prayer life. Deep silence aids recollection and makes possible the primarily receptive prayer that ripens spiritual life. Ultimately, silence is being still in order to know God. See also prayer.

Sillon, Le (luh see-yohn'; Fr., "the furrow"), French lay movement founded by Marc Sangnier (1873–1950) to reconcile Catholicism with the French Republic. It was condemned by Pope Pius X in 1910 because of its desire to be free of hierarchical control, its acceptance of theories about the revolution, and its alleged Modernist tendencies. See also Modernism.

Silvester [name of popes]. See Sylvester.

simandron (Gk., simantron, "bell"), a wooden beam (or metal bar) used in Byzantine monasteries in place of a bell. It is struck with a bar or baton to signal the beginning of the chanting of the Divine Office and other liturgical services.

Simeon, a character in Luke's Gospel. Simeon was a pious old man who recognized the significance of Jesus at his Presentation in the Temple (Luke 2:25–35). Upon seeing Jesus he pronounced the prayer that came to be known as the Nunc Dimittis. Another Simon, "The Black," was a leading figure in the Christian community at Antioch (Acts 13:1). See also Nunc Dimittis.

Simeon Stylites, St. (sti-lee'teez), also known as Simeon "the Elder," ca. 390–459, first "stylite" or pillar saint, from northern Syria. After living in a monastery and then as a hermit, Simeon from ca. 423 lived on top of a succession of pillars, the last one about fifty-five feet high. His holiness was admired worldwide, and he exerted significant influence on contemporary events. His disciple Daniel (d. ca. 493) and his namesake Simeon ("the Younger," d. ca. 596) were also both famous stylites. Feast day: January 5 (West); September 1 (East). See also stylite.

Simon, Richard, 1638–1712, the founder of modern biblical criticism and the greatest biblical scholar of his day. He was ordained an Oratorian priest (1670), and, partly to answer Protestant claims about the sole authority of Scripture, published Histoire critique du Vieux Testament (1678), which denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. He was opposed by Jacques Bénigne Bousset and was later expelled from the Oratorians because of his controversial views.

Simon, St., one of the twelve apostles. His nickname, "the Cananaean" (Matt 10:4; Mark 3:18), Aramaic for "Zealot," is used in Luke 6:15 and Acts 1:13. Simon may have been zealous for Israel's independence or for the law. Tradition relates his missions to Egypt and Persia followed by his martyrdom. Feast day: October 28. See also apostle; Twelve, the.

Simon Bar Jonah. See Peter, St.

Simon of Cyrene, the bearer of Jesus' cross. From the capital of Cyrenaica in North Africa, Simon was probably in Jerusalem for Passover when impressed into service (Matt 27:32; Mark 15:21; Luke 23:26). Mark also notes his sons Alexander and Rufus. Paul may have greeted the latter in Rome (Rom 16:13).

Simon Stock, St., ca. 1165–1265, prior general of the Carmelite order about whose life very little is known. Late medieval traditions attributed the granting of the brown scapular to Simon by the Blessed Virgin. Relics are venerated at Bordeaux and Aylesford, England. Feast day: May 16 (Carmelite order). See also scapular.

simony, the buying or selling of Church offices, named after Simon Magus, who tried to buy the power of laying on hands from Peter (Acts 8:9–24). Simony has been a recurrent problem in the history of the Church, and a significant portion of canon law is given over to measures to eradicate it. The eleventh-century Gregorian reformers made simony one of their main targets, and the investiture controversy had its roots in disputes about the simoniacal character of lay investiture. Many of the conditions that made simony prevalent no longer exist, and the abuse is rare today. See also Gregorian reform; investiture controversy.

Simplicianus, St., d. 400, bishop of Milan who succeeded Ambrose, his pupil, in 397. He played a crucial role in the conversions of both Marius Victorinus and Augustine. Feast day: August 16. See also Augustine of Hippo, St.

sin, a general term that covers several different realities: actual sin (a violation of the moral order); habitual sin (the sinful state that results from actual sin); and original sin (the sin of the first humans, resulting in the fallen condition into which all are born), Scriptural Basis: In the OT (Gen 3) sin appears as a deliberate act against the divinely established order, but even more as internal pride and rebellion against God whose supremacy the human person refuses to acknowledge. In the Synoptics sins are acts that contravene the moral order in different ways, but beyond this it is the heart from which they proceed that is sinful. Therefore, conversion of heart is required. John speaks not only of sins, but of sin (Gk., anomia), which refers to hostility to God, the internal state of the sinner. In Paul's Letters there is the distinction between sin transgressions (in the plural, generally referred to as paraptomata) and sin (in the singular, generally referred to as hamartia) which is a kind of power in the sinful person. Sin transgressions are manifestations of the sinful condition of the person and from this condition redemption is had only through the death and Resurrection of Christ.

Mortal and Venial Sins: Sin properly so called refers to actual sin. In Catholic tradition actual sin was categorized as mortal (death-dealing) or venial (slight) sin. There is a fundamental difference between the two because what is said of mortal sin (that it involves a radical rupture in the person's union with God) cannot be said of venial sin.

Some contemporary theologians have suggested that there should be a threefold division of sin: mortal, serious, and venial. They base this suggestion largely on the unfortunate popular tendency to interpret venial sin as "only" venial sin in a way that makes light of it. Not only is this theologically and spiritually regrettable in itself, but it obscures the fact that some venial sins, like offenses in a family, can be very serious without rupturing the relationship with God.

The characteristics of sin are most perfectly realized in mortal sin. Traditionally the requisites for the commission of mortal sin were said to be serious (grave) matter, sufficiently full knowledge, and full consent of the will. For many centuries the difference between mortal and venial sin was traced to the matter; that is, if the matter was slight (e.g., a small theft, a relatively harmless white lie), the sin was all but automatically judged venial. With the recovery of the notion of fundamental freedom, there has been an adjustment in this analysis, although not all theologians accept it. The matter of the violation is now related to fundamental freedom. Only serious matter is likely to provoke an individual to the profound self-disposition known as a fundamental option. Therefore, many modern theologians see a sin as mortal if the opposition to God proper to every sinful act is penetrated from the central depths of the person by self-disposing freedom. Therefore, it is not unthinkable, even if unlikely, that such a self-disposition could occur where only slight matter is involved. Venial sin, committed at a less central depth of personal freedom, remains compatible with the love of God alive in the depths of the soul.

There are important practical implications to the contemporary view of the distinction between mortal and venial sin as based on the intensity of the personal disposition involved. First, in contrast to the view of the moral life as above all a series of discrete actions or omissions, this view lays greater stress on subjectivity and views the moral life as above all a growth process, the deepening of the biblical "adhering to God," and of the love of Christ poured into our hearts. This avoids an excessive objectivism.

Second, this approach avoids a kind of "securityism," the view that avoidance of materially grave violations is equivalent to justification before God. Actually our internal disposition before God, rooted as it is in our fundamental freedom, is not available to our awareness with absolute security. However, we do have a certain conjectural certainty about our true internal disposition, a certainty necessary for a basic optimism and joy in the spiritual life. For instance, Christian tradition believes that the experience of peace and consolation testifies to the efficacious presence of the Spirit of Christ.

Finally, since external acts are not sure signs of internal dispositions, there is every reason for a nonjudgmental attitude toward the neighbor. See also fundamental option; mortal sin; venial sin.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

sin against the Holy Spirit, the final repudiation of God's grace. The synoptic Gospels (Matt 12:31–32; Mark 3:28–30; Luke 12:10) report Jesus' saying that all sins against people can be forgiven, but that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit cannot. Apostasy is viewed similarly in Heb 6:4–6. 1 John 5:16 mentions a "mortal sin" that may be related.

The precise meaning of the "sin against the Spirit" has been much debated. Patristic authors favored the notion of apostasy or the rejection of the Gospel. Moderns tend to emphasize the final and obdurate rejection of God's forgiveness itself.

Sinai (si̲'ni̲), the sacred place where the covenant between God and the Israelites was inaugurated. Sinai is the name of the triangular peninsula between Africa and Asia. It designates the wilderness in which Mount Sinai is located (Exod 16:1; 19:1). On the mountain itself God delivered the law to Moses (Exod 19–34). See also Commandments, the Ten; covenant.

sinlessness of Christ, the belief that Jesus Christ, being free from sin, remained in perfect communion with God the Father throughout his earthly life. Rooted in the NT (Heb 4:15), this belief has been continually affirmed by the Church, beginning with the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Because Jesus Christ was without sin (Lat., impeccantia), he was able to embody in himself the perfect union between God and humanity. On the one hand, he perfectly discloses the divine for humankind. Being without sin, he is the perfect image of the invisible God (Col 1:15). On the other hand, Jesus Christ is the fulfillment of the human movement toward God. Through him, humans have access to God, and in Jesus' life, death, and Resurrection is a paradigm of how humans are to be in relation to God and to one another.

Neo-Scholasticism claimed that because Jesus Christ was a divine person, he was not capable of sinning (Lat., impeccabilitas). Today, theologians claim that because Jesus Christ is fully human, he had the capacity to sin. He remained sinless because he chose not to sin; he refused to alienate himself from the Father by an act of his will. See also Jesus Christ.

Siricius, St., d. 399, pope from 384 to 399. His letter to Himerius of Tarragona (385), first letter in the papal decretals, promotes the authority of Rome, insists on celibacy for deacons and priests, and recommends clemency toward public penitents. Another letter regarding matters of church order was sent to the African churches (386). He condemned Jovinian (392). Feast day: November 26. See also celibacy, clerical.

sister. See nun.

Sister Formation Conference. See Religious Formation Conference.

sisters, congregations of, institutes of women who profess the simple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, live a common life, and are engaged in ministering to the needs of society. The strict rule of enclosure does not hold for sisters as it does for nuns.

Common life involves sharing material things and traditionally has meant living together in a monastery or convent and sharing an horarium (daily schedule). Recent developments in the definition of community focus more on unity of spirit and of values rather than sharing daily life. As a result, some sisters live in small self-chosen communities, and some live alone. Communities also may include members of other congregations and persons who do not belong to any congregation. These auxiliary members are often called associates; they accept the vision of the congregation and share in the ministry.

Authority: Congregations of sisters may be pontifical, under the authority of the pope, or diocesan, under the authority of the local bishop. The constitutions of the congregations are approved by the appropriate authority.

Congregations are usually governed by a president or superior, assisted by a council. Some congregations have adopted a conciliar model of governance without one person acting as president or superior. The leaders of congregations are ordinarily elected by a general chapter. The chapter is the highest governing body while it is in session.

History: While cloistered orders of women have existed since the fifth century, in the sixteenth century women united to form a new kind of religious commitment. They strove to unite the practice of prayer, meditation, spiritual reading, and silence common in cloistered congregations with ministerial activity in response to the needs and sufferings of the day.

Early efforts by women like Angela Merici, founder of the Ursulines (1535), and Jane Frances de Chantal, founder with Francis de Sales of the Visitation Sisters (1610), were halted as the cloister was imposed by Church authorities. Vincent de Paul insisted that the Daughters of Charity, which he founded, would have no convent but the hospital, no chapel but the parish church, and no cloister but the streets.

It was not until 1900 that the Church, in Pope Leo XIII's Conditae a Christo, recognized congregations committed to the active apostolate as true religious.

Recent History: In 1950, Pope Pius XII convoked a meeting of the superiors of religious congregations under the title of the First General Congress of the States of Perfection. Two years later, he called the First World Congress of Mothers General and suggested updating certain aspects of the sisters' lives so they would be able to respond to the needs of the times. The pope issued two documents on women in religious congregations: Sponsa Christi (1950) and Sacra Virginitatis (1954). Among the issues considered were the modification of the habit, the abolition of class distinctions that existed among some sisters, and the use of the vernacular in praying the Divine Office.

Pope Pius XII also encouraged the creation of national congresses of heads of religious congregations. In the United States, the Conference of Major Superiors of Women (today, the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, LCWR) was established.

Vatican II: In 1965 the Second Vatican Council issued the Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life (Perfectae Caritatis) calling for "two simultaneous processes: a continuous return to the sources of all Christian life and to the original inspiration behind a given community and an adjustment of the community to the changed conditions of the times" (n. 2). The document also provided five principles for this renewal: (1) the fundamental norm of religious life is the gospel; (2) each order's uniqueness is best served by a return to the spirit of the founder; (3) each community should participate in the enterprises and objectives of the Church; (4) members should develop an appropriate awareness of the contemporary human condition as well as the needs of the Church; and (5) interior renewal must inform exterior changes.

The Council of Trent (1545–63) spoke of religious life as superior to marriage. The documents of Vatican II avoid all such language and insist on the universal call to holiness.

After Vatican II: Congregations were founded to answer a particular need in society, but over the years some of those needs have changed as society has changed. In response to the challenges of Vatican II, sisters respond to new needs according to the spirit of the founder rather than simply maintaining the particular works envisioned by the founder. Thus, congregations dedicated to teaching may educate outside the formal school system; hospital sisters have begun to minister in clinics and other noninstitutional ways. Some work in business or government. Many sisters minister on parish and diocesan staffs. Sisters have become involved in justice ministries.

In the years immediately after Vatican II, changes in the habit and life-style, changes in the understanding of community, and the appropriation of new ministries have contributed to a new definition of sisters as well as diminishment in the number of sisters. As numbers decrease and the median age rises, some congregations are uniting with others of similar background and vision.

Taking seriously the model of the Church as the People of God and the challenge of the 1971 Synod of Bishops for "action on behalf of justice and participation in the transformation of the world" as constitutive of the mission of the Church, sisters are more involved in ministries aimed at changing oppressive structures in society. Direct service to the poor and needy is supported by efforts toward the transformation of society. At the same time, congregations of sisters are continuing many of the institutional ministries sponsored by the Church (schools, orphanages, and hospitals). See also Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life; religious orders and congregations.

Bibliography

Foley, Nadine, ed. Claiming Our Truth: Reflections on Identity. Washington, DC: Leadership Conference of Women Religious, 1988.

Neal, Marie Augusta. From Nuns to Sisters: An Expanding Vocation. Mystic, CT: Twenty-third Publications, 1990. REGINA COLL

Sisters for Christian Community (S.F.C.C.), founded in 1970 by Lillanna Kopp, one of the largest noncanonical communities of women. As such, the community is not constituted as a juridical person under canon law. It is not subject to any control by the Vatican or the local bishop. The degree of commitment is decided by each individual member within the framework of a profile that presents the scriptural, theological, and historical focus of the community. Their purpose is to provide an experience of communal life, marked by prayer, mutual support, and service to those in need. Each member is self-supporting and responsible for her own living arrangements. There is no presiding officer, motherhouse, rule, or constitution. Most members were once in canonical institutes. There are sisters in the United States, Canada, Australia, Europe, and Central and South America.

Sisters of Charity, a generic term used especially in the United States and England to denote any Catholic sister engaged in works of charity. There are many congregations of Catholic sisters around the world who are called Sisters of Charity. Many originally used some form of the rule of St. Vincent de Paul's Daughters of Charity, which allowed them to go out of their convents to work among the poor and avoid the cloistral prescriptions of traditional religious life for women. Thus there are German congregations of Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul in Freiburg, Fulda, and Heppenheim, and one in Zams, Austria. Irish and Australian Sisters of Charity stem from a group founded by Mary Aikenhead in Dublin in 1815. There are Belgian groups of Sisters of Charity at Kortemark, Roeselare, Ghent, Namur, and Kortrijd, and a Canadian group in Quebec. Many groups add additional titles after "Sisters of Charity" such as: "and Christian Instruction" (Nevers, France); "of Lovere" (Italy); "of St. Joan Antida" (Rome); "of Ivrea" (Italy); "of St. Augustine" (United States); "of the Blessed Virgin Mary" (United States); "of the Cross" (Canada); "of the Incarnate Word" (United States).

United States: In the United States several groups of Sisters of Charity trace their origin to the first active sisterhood founded in the United States by a U.S. citizen. Elizabeth Bayley Seton (d. 1821), a prominent New York widow and convert, founded these Sisters of Charity in Emmitsburg, Maryland, in 1809. Her community wore the simple black widow's garb and bonnet that Seton wore. She and her mentor, Bishop John Carroll, rejected the constitutions of the French Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul because they were not suited to the American situation. A modified version of this rule was adopted. The sisters operated schools, orphanages, and hospitals, and nursed in epidemics and wars.

In 1850 the Emmitsburg motherhouse affiliated with the French Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. They doffed the simple bonnet to don the elaborate cornette of this community. Their new rules dictated, among other things, that they could not care for male orphans over age five. Many sisters objected to the adoption of French ways, and bishops who needed the sisters to staff orphanages for boys were furious. At this point independent branches of Mother Seton's original Sisters of Charity were established in New York City under Mother Elizabeth Boyle and in Cincinnati, Ohio, under the leadership of Mother Margaret George. This latter group sent missionaries to China in 1928. In 1855 the Sisters of Charity of Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada, became independent of the New York group. The Sisters of Charity of St. Elizabeth (Convent Station, New Jersey) became independent of the New York group, with help from Cincinnati in 1859 under Mother Mary Xavier Mehegan. The Greensburg, Pennsylvania, Sisters of Charity of Seton Hill became independent of Cincinnati in 1870, lead by Mother Aloysia Lowe. The Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, Kentucky, were founded in 1812 by Father John David, to provide education and works of charity for the people of the area. Mother Catherine Spalding was the first superior general. These sisters have conducted schools, hospitals, orphanages, and other works of charity, including nursing in epidemics and wars. In 1947 they began notable missionary work in India, where there is now a separate Indian province. The Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth, Kansas, branched off from this community and established themselves in Kansas in 1858, under the leadership of Mother Xavier Ross. See also Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul; Seton, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley; Vincent de Paul, St. MARY EWENS

Sisters of Holy Cross (C.S.C.), a congregation founded by Father Basil Moreau in Le Mans, France, in 1841, providing graduate education in theology for women when it was not available elsewhere. In 1843 four members came to Indiana, where they established a motherhouse at Notre Dame, Indiana. In 1869 they became independent of the French motherhouse, with Mother Angela Gillespie as the first American superior general. Health care is also an important ministry of the congregation. They nursed in both the American Civil and Spanish-American wars and claim the distinction of being the first U.S. Navy nurses. Mission work was begun in India in 1889. These sisters have also done mission work in Bangladesh, Brazil, Uganda, Ghana, Mexico, and Peru.

Sisters of Loretto at the Foot of the Cross (S.L.), a congregation founded in 1812 by pioneer women of Kentucky—Mary Rhodes, Christina Stuart, and Nancy Havern—with help from Father Charles Nerinckx, a Belgian emigré. He gave the community extremely penitential rules that were later mitigated to suit American conditions. The sisters were notable for opening schools in sparsely settled territories, particularly in the American Southwest. They also provided education and access to Catholic religious life for young African Americans. In 1923 Loretto Sisters became missionaries to China.

Under Sister Mary Luke Tobin, they were leaders among American sisters in the renewal of religious communities and the Church during and after the Second Vatican Council and supporters of the civil rights and peace movements beginning in the 1960s.

Sisters of Mary of the Presentation (S.M.P.), a congregation founded in Broons, France, in 1828 by Mother St. Louis Le Marchand and Father Joachim Fleury to educate people in the faith following the suppressions of the French Revolution and to care for the poor, the sick, and the needy. Mother St. Andre Petitbon, who became superior general in 1838, guided the development of the congregation for forty-eight years. At various times in its history this congregation suffered from the effects of anticlericalism. Sisters were expelled from their schools in the early years of the twentieth century, which caused some to emigrate to Canada and the United States. In 1914, by a decree of dissolution, the sisters were expelled from their motherhouse, and it was turned into a military hospital—at which some of the sisters later nursed. When the decree was revoked in 1923, the sisters returned from their exile on the Isle of Guernsey in the English Channel. In 1956 a mission was begun in Cameroon, Africa. There are about four hundred sisters in the congregation in the 1990s, with provinces in France, Belgium, Canada, and the United States. Health care and education continue to be its chief areas of ministry.

Sisters of Mercy, religious community of women.

Founded in 1831 in Dublin, Ireland, by Catherine McAuley, the Sisters of Mercy are dedicated to the service of the "poor, sick and ignorant," as the original wording of their fourth vow of service indicates. Popularly known as the "walking sisters," the women who gathered around Catherine McAuley nursed the sick poor in their homes, gave shelter to young women harassed by their employers, and engaged in other corporal and spiritual works of mercy as the need arose. Though Catherine herself never intended to establish a religious order, the expectations of the Catholic Church of the day, as well as her desire to give lasting form to the work her associates were doing, led her to do so. Foundation Day, December 12, 1831, marks the day the first Sisters of Mercy took vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Mother Catherine McAuley identified as characteristic of the institute "a most serious application to the instruction of poor girls, visitation of the sick, and protection of distressed women of good character."

History: Between 1831 and 1841, the year of her death, Catherine McAuley personally opened twelve of the fourteen original Convents of Mercy. In time, the Sisters of Mercy became the largest group of women religious established in the English-speaking world. Mercy congregations are now found in Ireland, Australia, Great Britain, New Zealand, Newfoundland, South Africa, Philippines, and the Americas.

The Sisters of Mercy came to the United States in 1843. The first American congregation was founded when Sister Frances Warde, with seven companions, traveled to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. By 1854, Sisters of Mercy from Ireland had settled in New York, Pittsburgh, and San Francisco and from these cities moved throughout the country. By the end of the Civil War, in which Sisters of Mercy served as nurses for wounded soldiers on both sides of the conflict, the community could be found throughout the Northeast, down the Atlantic seaboard, in the South, the Midwest and along the West Coast. So numerous were the foundations by 1929 that Sister Carmelita Hartman suggested an amalgamation to gather the autonomous houses into a single canonical structure. The move was only partially successful; approximately one half of the Sisters of Mercy in the United States joined the new Sisters of Mercy of the Union, and the others remained independent. Later in the century, however, the desire to be in close communication led to the establishment of a Federation of Sisters of Mercy. That experience made possible a new move toward unity in the 1980s. After a series of community chapters considered a new structure that would unite the Sisters of Mercy in the United States and in the Latin American/Caribbean region, the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas came into existence on July 20, 1991.

In the new institute, there are 25 regional communities with approximately 7,400 sisters in 1994. Through the regional communities, the institute has international partnerships with congregations in Argentina, Belize, Chile, Guam, Guyana, Honduras, Jamaica, Panama, Peru, and the Philippines. Education, health care, social work, and parish service constitute the major forms of serving the "poor, sick and uneducated," as the modern terminology phrases it. The Sisters of Mercy serve in parish schools and eighteen colleges in the United States and Guam. They sponsor more than a hundred health care facilities in more than a hundred cities, as well as operating emergency shelters, food banks, and soup kitchens for the poor. Providing financial support, technical assistance and management expertise is a new form of the original concern for sheltering the homeless. Ministries with battered women and children, pregnant teenagers, persons with AIDS, the chemically dependent, and those in prison continue the work of the "walking sisters." They are joined by more than 1,300 Mercy associates who make annual formal commitments to share in the work of the order while maintaining their lives as clergy, married, or single persons. Others have joined in the works of the Sisters of Mercy through Mercy Corps, a full-time volunteer program. The central office for the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas is located in Silver Spring, Maryland.

See also McAuley, Catherine; Warde, Frances.

MARY AQUIN O'NEILL

Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur (S.N.D.), a congregation founded in 1803 by Julie Billiart for the education of the poor in Amiens, France. Because innovations in the rule were not acceptable in France, the motherhouse was moved to Namur, Belgium. The congregation spread to the United States in 1840 and to England in 1845. Education at all levels has been the special work of this congregation. Sisters became missionaries to the Congo in 1894, to Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) in 1899, to Japan in 1924, to China in 1929, and to Italy in 1931. By 1993 these sisters could also be found in Zaire, Brazil, Kenya, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Peru, and Sudan. The generalate is now in Rome.

Sisters of Providence (S.P.), several congregations with this name, including those in France at Alençon, Annonay, Arras, Chartres, Corenc, Douai, Evreux, Langres, Laon, Pommeraye, Lisieux, La Jumelliere, and Gap; at Gosselies in Belgium; and in Amsterdam. One group was founded in Montreal, Canada, in 1843 by Mother Emilie Gamelin. An offshoot in Kingston (Canada) established another group in Holyoke, Massachusetts, that became independent in 1894. In 1856 Mother Joseph Pariseau and four other sisters established an American province in Washington Territory (now Seattle) dedicated to education and health care. Mother Joseph was an intrepid designer and builder of schools, hospitals, and orphanages; her statue stands in the rotunda in the Capitol in Washington, D.C. The congregation began work in Argentina and Chile in 1852, and in Haiti, Cameroon, Egypt, and Nigeria in 1960. The American congregation of Sisters of Providence of St. Mary of the Woods, Indiana, was founded from that of Ruille-sur-Loire in France in 1840, with Mother Theodore Guerin at its head. Education is their chief work.

Sisters of St. Dominic (O.P.), officially the Order of Preachers, apostolic religious communities of women affiliated with the Dominican family founded by Dominic de Guzman (1170–1221) in Prouille, France, in 1206. The Dominican family, with its international headquarters in Rome, is comprised of priests, contemplative nuns, brothers, sisters, and lay members not living in community. Dominic revolutionized religious life by taking it out of secluded monasteries into the newly developed towns and among the people, where he preached the gospel to combat the Albigensian heresy.

"To contemplate and give to others the fruits of one's contemplation" is the goal of these sisters, and "Truth" their motto. Study and contemplation inform and inspire their ministries in schools at all levels, in health care, pastoral, missionary, and social service work. Since Vatican II (1962–65) they have expanded their roles as members of the Order of Preachers to include direct preaching of the gospel. Democracy and the principle of dispensation from rules for the sake of ministry characterize Dominicans. The leader is called "prioress," "first among equals."

Apostolic congregations of Dominican Sisters blossomed in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, when contemplative groups established new foundations in North America, Australia, South America, and Africa, where conditions forced them to develop into active communities. Thus, for example, Holy Cross Convent in Regensburg, Bavaria, with fewer than fifty members itself, sent groups to the United States, which eventually developed twelve different congregations with thousands of members. Congregations such as these struggled to find a balance between practices of the contemplative life, such as rising at midnight to recite the Divine Office, and the demands of teaching and nursing. The number of congregations changes as groups merge or separate, but in 1991, a total of 148 women's congregations were affiliated with the Dominican family in Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, Australia, and New Zealand. At that time, there were thirty-six congregations in the United States, with 10,205 members. See also Dominican order.

MARY EWENS

Sisters of St. Joseph (S.S.J.), congregations of women religious within the Catholic Church who trace their origin to LePuy, France, where they were founded originally as a single community in the mid-seventeenth century. There, several women, inspired by Father Jean Pierre Médaille's preaching, assembled to live in community and to profess simple vows. On March 10, 1661, Bishop Henri de Maupas du Tour granted official approbation to the Sisters of St. Joseph, then composed of Francoise Eyraud and five companions. Father Médaille prepared Constitutions, Reglements and Maxims of Perfection for their guidance. Dedicated to the Holy Trinity, the sisters were encouraged to acquire personal perfection and to assist their neighbors by all the works of mercy of which women are capable. Membership was open to all classes of women. Living in small communities, the sisters ministered in hospitals and reformatories, conducted schools, and taught catechism and a trade to young women. Each autonomous motherhouse maintained a novitiate for the formation of new members. Bishops and pastors in south central France sought the presence and service of the sisters and thus contributed to the spread of the congregation.

The French Revolution of 1789 disrupted religious life by anticlerical decrees. Forced to leave their convents in 1792, the sisters returned to their families. Some were imprisoned and five Sisters of St. Joseph were martyred in 1794. After Napoleon's Concordat of 1801 women's congregations were gradually restored. In 1807 Cardinal Joseph Fesch, archbishop of Lyons, summoned Mother St. John Fontbonne, a Sister of St. Joseph, to direct some women desirous of becoming religious. Having entered the community in LePuy in 1778, she had become superior at Monistrol from 1785 to 1792. After that she had lived with her family except during her imprisonment in 1794. The women whom she trained in the spirit of the Sisters of St. Joseph received the habit on July 14, 1808. This date marks the restoration of the congregation at Lyons. Here and at other centers, including LePuy, sisters worked to meet the pressing religious, educational, and social needs of the people. The congregation spread within France and beyond. By 1900 the Sisters of St. Joseph had missions in the United States, Canada, India, Italy, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Russia, Iceland, Armenia, Algeria, Argentina, and Brazil.

United States: In the United States the apostolic needs of the growing Catholic population caused bishops to seek financial support and religious personnel from agencies and congregations in Europe. Bishop Joseph Rosati of St. Louis, Missouri, appealed to the Society of the Propagation of the Faith at Lyons and to Mother St. John Fontbonne. She appointed six sisters, including her nieces, Sister Delphine Fontbonne and Sister Febronie Fontbonne, to go to America. Bishop Rosati welcomed these pioneer sisters on March 25, 1836. With few exceptions, the present twenty-nine congregations in North America have originated, either directly or indirectly, from this initial establishment at St. Louis. For instance, sisters sent to Philadelphia in 1847 later made foundations at Toronto in 1851 and at Brooklyn in 1856. These motherhouses, in turn, responded to requests for sisters. Brooklyn sent sisters to Baden, Pennsylvania, in 1869, to Rutland, Vermont, and Boston, Massachusetts, in 1873, and to Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1883. Education on all levels, instruction of the deaf, and health care became the characteristic ministries of the Sisters of St. Joseph. Their increase in membership, geographic expansion, and mission activities reflected developments in Church and society. Empowered by their educational attainments, influenced by the Sister Formation Movement of the 1950s, and called to renewal of religious life by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), the Sisters of St. Joseph in the United States and throughout the world examined the spiritual, communal, and ministerial aspects of their lives. Research into their history and the founder's original inspiration was facilitated by federations established in Canada and the United States in 1966 and in collaboration with the French Federation, an organization of individual congregations. Translations of Father Médaille's documents and renewed awareness of their charism assisted renewal among the sisters. Through general chapters and revised constitutions, the Sisters of St. Joseph have reaffirmed their vocation "to serve God and their neighbors without distinction" and to become "the congregation of the great love of God and neighbor." While many sisters continue in educational and health-related service, others engage in religious and adult education, pastoral ministry, social service, and advocacy for women and children. The sisters serve in Japan, Australia, Papua New Guinea, Hawaii, Kenya, Puerto Rico, Nassau, Guatemala, and Peru. See also Joseph, St.; religious orders and congregations.

MARGARET QUINN

Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary (S.N.J.M.), an order of nuns canonically established in 1843 in Quebec, Canada, for the education of children and young women. Eulalie Durocher, later known as Mother Marie-Rose, adapted the Marseilles S.N.J.M. rule to the situation in Canada to better respond to unmet needs in the Church and society. She became the order's first superior. Sisters came to the United States in 1859. They conduct elementary schools, high schools, and colleges emphasizing education in the faith, spiritual growth, and Catholic social justice principles. In South Africa, they conduct schools and dispensaries. See also Durocher, St. Marie-Rose.

Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (I.H.M.), an order of nuns founded in 1845 in Monroe, Michigan, by Louis Florent Gillet, C.SS.R., and Mother Teresa Maxis Duchemin in the spirit of Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787), Italian founder of the Redemptorists. Originally founded for education and health ministry, today they are also engaged in pastoral ministries, campus ministry, and social service. In 1978, they initiated a program for associate members. The sisters serve in about fifty dioceses in the United States and in Central and South America, the West Indies, and Africa. The motherhouse is in Monroe, Michigan. See also Alphonsus Liguori, St.

Sistine Chapel, named for Pope Sixtus IV (d. 1484), the principal chapel of the Vatican palace in Rome. Famous for its frescoed walls by various artists (including Botticelli), the Sistine Chapel is best known for the ceiling and altar wall painted by Michelangelo, the ceiling showing scenes from the book of Genesis (including the famous Birth of Adam) and the altar wall depicting the Last Judgment. Many papal ceremonies are conducted in the chapel, but the most famous is the gathering of cardinals in consistory when they meet to elect a new pope.

The Sistine Chapel in Vatican City, known for its frescoes by Michelangelo, especially his Last Judgment, which covers the wall behind the altar; the chapel is used by cardinals for the election of a new pope.

Recently cleaned and restored, Michelangelo's frescos are considered to be the epitome of High Renaissance art of the sixteenth century. The chapel is accessible through the Vatican museum and attracts thousands of visitors each year. See also Michelangelo; Sixtus IV; Vatican.

situation ethics, a system of ethics in which acts are judged according to their contexts rather than by a set of absolute principles. Sometimes called "contextual ethics" or "the new morality," situation ethics refers more to certain general philosophical tendencies than to a coherent moral theory. In a broad sense, all ethics can be called situational because circumstances do make a moral difference. Aristotle and Aquinas claimed as much. Although situation ethics takes many forms, three tenets distinguish it from other approaches: (1) the loving intention has priority over law; (2) a preexisting objective moral order that yields concrete absolute norms rendering some actions intrinsically wrong in every situation is questionable; and (3) moral principles find significance only in the situation and not in an abstract, fixed human nature.

The philosophical roots of situation ethics lie in nominalism and existentialism. Historically, situation ethics grew out of the collapse of the post–World War II social world in Germany and France where people were becoming aware of historical change and were left free and fully responsible for their decisions. In that context, it endorsed the actualizing of human freedom and the interpreting of laws in relation to human needs rather than to abstract human nature.

Pope Pius XII in 1952 and again in 1956 condemned any version of situation ethics that rejected an objective moral order, and that claimed that moral decisions have their ultimate foundation in an individualistic and subjective appeal to immediate intuitive judgments based on the situation but not on any universal, objective moral law, either natural law or God's revealed law.

Situation ethics became popular in the United States with Joseph Fletcher's Situation Ethics (1966). His method falls between antinomianism and legalism. It has three characteristics: (1) love is the only universally binding principle and is served by the principle of utility, that is, the greatest good for the greatest number; (2) other moral principles illumine moral obligation but do not prescribe an absolute and universal obligation; and (3) the absolute moral obligation (God's will, or what love demands) arises from within the situation and is not subject to abstract law. Thus, Fletcher's method demands that each person discover the most loving deed by calculating its consequences in the situation. The moral quality of the deed derives from maximizing love.

Situation ethics has been criticized for setting love in opposition to rules, and for being naive about human ability to control consequences. It does not adequately appreciate the role of principles and is vulnerable to the dangers of self-deception. Actions and situations are sufficiently similar and continuous to warrant a prescriptive use of principles.

Yet the discussion of situation ethics has directed attention to neglected aspects of decision making. It has forced a clearer refinement of the relationships of love, law, and freedom and the relationship of context to principles. It has taught that decision making is more than the reasoned application of objective norms, but that is also includes some form of intuitive judgment or moral instinct. It has also shown that objectivity in morality means that moral standards must be based on the way things are, and not on the way we would like things to be. It has led Catholic morality to rethink basic concepts of natural law and to include the discernment of spirits in the process of making decisions. It has also given rise to further considerations regarding the binding force of magisterial teaching on moral matters, on the debates between deontological versus teleological methods, and between holding firm to exceptionless concrete moral absolutes versus proportional moral judgments. See also magisterium and morality; moral theology; natural law.

RICHARD M. GULA

Sixto-Clementine Vulgate. See Scripture, versions of.

Sixtus II, St., d. 258, pope from 257 to 258. He restored relations with Cyprian, broken by his predecessor, Stephen I, yet continued the Roman practice of not rebaptizing those baptized by heretics. Given Sixtus's less confrontational style, he apparently accepted the coexistence of both practices. Martyred under Valerian, he was highly venerated. His name is in the Canon of the Roman Mass. Feast day: August 6. See also lapsi.

Sixtus IV [Francesco della Rovere], 1414–84, Franciscan pope from 1471 to 1484. He transformed Rome from a medieval to a Renaissance city through a number of physical improvements. He built the Sistine Chapel, founded the Sistine choir, established the Vatican archives, and enriched the Vatican library. His priorities as pope, however, seemed to be focused on the Papal States and the advancement of his own family. His brother Girolamo drew the pope into the Pazzi conspiracy of 1478 in which two members of the Medici family, Lorenzo and Giuliano, were attacked (Lorenzo was wounded, Giuliano was killed), apparently with the pope's knowledge. This drew the pope, in turn, into a politically and financially debilitating war with Florence (1478–80), the power base of the Medici family. See also Sistine Chapel.

Sixtus V [Felice Peretti], 1520–90, Counter-Reformation Franciscan pope, from 1585 to 1590. As pope, Sixtus strictly enforced the disciplinary demands of the Council of Trent, especially against simony, strengthened and expanded both the Inquisition and censorship, and supported overseas missions. He fixed the maximum number of cardinals at seventy (not exceeded until Pope John XXIII, 1958–63), reorganized the Roman Curia (not changed until Vatican Council II, 1962–65), and required all bishops to visit the Holy See at least every five years and to submit reports on the state of their dioceses (the ad limina visit). Through ambitious building projects, he transformed Rome into a magnificent Baroque city. He rebuilt the Lateran palace and completed the dome of St. Peter's. He also established the Vatican press.

skete (skeet; Gk., "small monastery"), a small monastery, generally the dependency of a lavra or large independent house.

slander, the violation of another's reputation by false accusation. Slander differs from detraction, which harms the good esteem of another by revealing true but hidden faults. Slander is also distinct from libel in that it is defamation in spoken words rather than in writing. It is practically indistinguishable from calumny.

Slander adds the sin of lying to that of injustice. Its seriousness is measured by the harm done, and this harm is determined by the character and position of the slanderer and the slandered. Slander generates the duty of restitution. See also calumny; detraction.

slavery, the possession of persons as property for the purpose of unrecompensed use of their labor. Because slavery was an integral part of the social system at the time when Christ lived, the practice was largely unchallenged by the early Christians. The NT treats slavery primarily from a religious rather than a social perspective, preaching the elimination of distinctions before God between master and slave (Gal 3:28; 1 Cor 12:13; Philemon).

For many centuries Catholic theologians did not question the morality of slavery. Some, like Leonhard Lessius (d. 1623) and John de Lugo (d. 1660), justified slavery if it arose out of birth or a contract, or in punishment for a crime or as the result of a just war. However, their fellow Jesuits were among the strongest opponents of slavery in the mission territories of South America. In Paraguay they established a model colony without slaves before being expelled in 1768. Pope Gregory XVI's widely cited condemnation of the slave trade (1839) was interpreted by bishops in the southern United States as referring to the transatlantic slave trade. If it can be said that Catholicism was slow and relatively late in its rejection of slavery, it is clear today that Catholic teaching condemns slavery as a direct violation of both the gospel and the natural law.

Slipyj, Josyf (joh'sif slip'ee), 1892–1984, metropolitan of Halych and archbishop of Lviv. He was ordained a priest in 1917, was rector of Theological Academy, was ordained bishop-coadjutor to Andrew Sheptyckyj in 1939, under Soviet rule, and became Sheptyckyj's successor in 1944. In 1945 he was arrested; freed in 1963, he had to leave the Soviet Union. He was named cardinal in 1965.

sloth. See capital sins.

Slovak Byzantine Catholic Church, a Byzantine Catholic community located in present-day Slovakia arising from the Union of Uzhorod (1646). It has had a separate identity since 1818, when the diocese of Presov was created for the area, then a part of Hungary.

Slovakia became part of the republic of Czechoslovakia after World War I. (In 1992 the republic split into the Czech Republic and Slovakia.) In April 1950, under pressure from the new Communist government, the church was dissolved and incorporated into the Orthodox Church. But most of the former Byzantine Catholic parishes opted to become Catholic again when conditions permitted during the 1968 "Prague Spring."

The Presov diocese in 1993 had about 363,000 faithful. The Canadian diocese of Sts. Cyril and Methodius, with 30,000 members, is the only jurisdiction of the church outside of Slovakia. See also Byzantine rite; Eastern churches; Eastern rites; Ruthenian Catholic Church.

Smith, Alfred E., 1873–1944, first Catholic candidate for president of the United States. Born and raised in New York City, he became a major figure in New York State politics. He served as governor of New York for four terms in the 1920s and in 1928 became the first Catholic to be nominated by a major party for the presidency of the United States. His candidacy as the Democratic party nominee inspired a national debate on the compatibility of Catholicism and American democracy. The Republican party nominee, Herbert Hoover, easily defeated Smith after a campaign marked by considerable anti-Catholic bigotry. See also anti-Catholicism.

Snows, Our Lady of the. See Our Lady of the Snows.

sobornost (soh-bohr'nawst; Russ., sobornaja, "catholic"), Russian theological neologism that defines an ideal of ecclesiology that is conciliar and collegial (Russ., sobirat', "to gather, congregate" from which is derived Russ., sobor, "cathedral," or Gk., katholikon) based on an interior spiritual communion of freedom and love. Apparently coined by the Russian Orthodox Slavophile and lay theologian Alexis S. Khomyakov (1806–60), the term is untranslatable, which is why it has entered other languages. Sobornost is claimed to be characteristic of Orthodox ecclesiology, and to provide a via media (Lat., "middle way") between the two Western extremes of excessive individualism (Protestantism) and the legalism of an ecclesial communion based on external authority (Catholicism). This claim is only partly true. In the Orthodox communion of national churches, often in disarray and conflict with one another, sobornost exists more in theory than in practice. See also communion, Church as.

Sobrino, Jon, b. 1938, Jesuit theologian of El Salvador. Born in Barcelona, Spain, and ordained a Jesuit priest, he was awarded a doctorate in theology at the Hochschule Sankt Georgen in Frankfurt am Main, Germany (1975). He is professor of theology at the Universidad José Siméon Cañas of Central America in San Salvador and a leading figure in Latin American liberation theology. See also liberation theology.

social action movement, a general term describing the coordinated effort of Catholics, especially laity, to effect a greater measure of justice in society. Leo XIII (d. 1903) and the twentieth-century popes have taught that social reconstruction requires not only the reform of morals but also the reform of social institutions. They have urged Catholics to organize in social action groups to achieve institutional change, especially regarding the distribution of wealth, the rights of labor, human rights, and world peace. See also Catholic social teachings.

social encyclicals. See encyclicals, social.

social gospel, a movement among American Protestants in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries that interpreted salvation as a process of social and economic transformation. In response to the social problems of modern industrial life and laissez-faire capitalism, advocates stressed the Bible's prophetic call for justice and the teachings of Jesus Christ. They believed Christ had proclaimed the kingdom of God on earth in order to create a society of love, justice, and cooperation. They often joined forces with labor and other social movements. The social gospel movement as such had little direct impact on Catholicism, but Catholics have responded in analogous ways to modern social problems.

socialism, a politicoeconomic system based on common ownership (or centralized regulation) of productive economic resources. Adam Smith (d. 1790) thought that if the regulation of the national economy were left to the free market (Fr., laissez-faire), reasonable demands would be met at the lowest possible prices.

Although industrial free market capitalism proved immensely productive, it was also subject to cycles of inflation and unemployment, widening the gap between rich and poor. Hence, before 1848 many "utopian socialist" schemes were proposed by reformers, to be instituted simply through education and the example of successful models. Socialism took a political, revolutionary turn with Marx and Engels' Communist Manifesto (1848). This "scientific socialism" claimed to prove that the demise of capitalism through class struggle was inevitable.

In the 1990s, Socialist or Social Democratic parties still advocate centralized economic control and state ownership of large industries, to be achieved through nonviolent political action. Yet, against the resistance of free market ideologists, many socialist reforms have already been incorporated into modern capitalism.

Catholic social doctrine, as expressed, for example, in Pope John Paul II's 1991 encyclical Centesimus Annus, defends private property, but also demands that the state regulate the economy to achieve social justice. Sometimes this is called "Christian socialism." See also Catholic social teachings.

social justice, virtue pertaining to the structural requirements for a just society focused on the human rights and needs of each person. The paradox of the concept of social justice is the major role it has in the Church's life and ministry contrasted with its recent appearance in Catholic teaching. The paradox is resolved when its is understood that the idea of social justice has an ancient lineage in the Catholic tradition, but its precise designation is found in Pius XI's encyclical Quadragesimo Anno (1931).

Catholic Teaching Before 1931: Catholic teaching on justice prior to Quadragesimo Anno was shaped by two major influences. On the one hand, biblical conceptions of justice, especially as they are found in the teaching of the prophets, served as a point of reference for Church teaching on justice. The biblical influence, however, was not a dominant theme of social teaching. It held a secondary role to the natural law ethic through which the Church expressed its teaching on the political, economic, and international orders. This second source of moral wisdom, the natural law ethic, found its classical exposition in Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Aquinas developed his theory of justice by drawing directly from Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.), as well as the insights of the Stoics and the Scriptures.

The clear link between Aristotle and Aquinas is the basic understanding of justice as suum cuique (Lat.), giving each his due, and the elaboration of this highly formal notion through the three types of justice: commutative, distributive, and legal justice. In the development of a theory of justice, Catholic teaching identified it as the proximate norm to govern all social relationships. The three types of justice are distinguished by the relationships they govern in society.

Types of Justice: Commutative justice sets standards for social and economic relationships between individuals. Often the model implied in commutative justice is that of a contractual relationship involving a private transaction. The standards of commutative justice are rooted in Catholic thought in the principle that every human person shares equal dignity and is invested with equal rights. The relations between such persons are conceived in terms of strict equality, a standard Aristotle described as arithmetical proportion. The moral conviction supporting commutative justice is that duties can be precisely defined and that failure to fulfill one's precise obligation requires restitution to the party who has been harmed.

Distributive justice governs public relationships in society; more precisely, it is the standard that measures the fair allocation of benefits and burdens to individuals and groups in society. The relationship envisioned by distributive justice is too complex to admit of arithmetical precision. Distributive justice envisions individuals as citizens and seeks to determine what access to public goods each citizen needs and deserves to protect his personal dignity. The state's role in guaranteeing a fair distribution of benefits and burdens, e.g., through taxation and social programs, is a major aspect of distributive justice, but it does not exhaust the category.

For Aquinas, legal justice, sometimes called "general justice", is the broader objective norm within which the demands of "particular justice," i.e., commutative and distributive justice, are determined. Legal or general justice, in the Thomistic scheme, directed the action of citizens toward the common good. It also served to relate the virtue of justice to other virtues exercised in society. These other virtues are directed to the common good by legal justice. The notion of legal or "general justice" thus fulfilled a broad regulative function in society; its content was never as precisely defined as the two forms of "particular justice."

Catholic Teaching After 1931: The decisive contribution of Pope Pius XI to Catholic teaching on justice was the way in which he replaced the idea of legal justice with that of social justice. The development occurs in Quadragesimo Anno and it is a good illustration of the way in which social science influenced Catholic moral teaching in the twentieth century. Pius XI's encyclical demonstrated a much clearer grasp of the structured, institutional character of modern society than earlier Catholic teaching had shown. Building upon this understanding, Pius XI took over the notion of legal justice, i.e., its focus on the common good, and then focused social justice on the assessment of the structural organization of society. The fruit of these two notions is that social justice is designed to evaluate and redirect those public institutions of society that hinder the achievement of the common good. Just as commutative justice is focused on the contractual relationship between individuals, so social justice is focused on the functioning of major public institutions of the social, legal, economic, or political orders.

The function of social justice is to evaluate the essential institutions of society in terms of their ability to satisfy the minimum needs and basic rights of the citizenry. Because social justice is directed to the achievement of the common good, the obligation to pursue it falls, in different ways, upon all in society: the state, voluntary associations, business and professional groups, religious and cultural organizations, and citizens themselves. It is usually expected that social justice will be accomplished through organized activity rather than individual actions.

From the publication of Quadragesimo Anno, the term "social justice" has assumed a central role in the development of Catholic social teaching. While retaining the specific demands of commutative and distributive justice, the emphasis in papal teaching is directed by the concept of social justice. The character of the teaching stresses the need to shape the institutional patterns of social life in accord with the demands of justice so that commutative and distributive justice may be more easily fulfilled. Pius XI had focused his teaching on economic justice within a nation; his successors placed growing emphasis on the structure of international society, e.g., in Pacem in Terris (1963), Populorum Progressio (1967), and Centesimus Annus (1991). The Third International Synod of Bishops (1971) referred to the concept of "international social justice." Pope John Paul II in his encyclicals Redemptor Hominis (1979), Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1987), and Centesimus Annus has criticized the trading and financial institutions of the international economy as failing to provide an adequate distribution of goods and services for developing countries.

The demand of social justice in contemporary Catholic social teaching is to reform those institutions at the national level that do not meet the needs of the national common good and to create new institutions at the international level that will be directed toward the emerging needs of the international common good.

The scope of social justice is determined today by both the increasing complexity of domestic societies and the increasing demands of the international common good. The other major influence on the Church's teaching since Vatican II has been the systematic use of biblical perspectives to shape the understanding of social justice. The biblical categories are less precise and less analytical than the teaching of Aquinas and the earlier encyclicals, but they add a power and passion the philosophical categories do not possess.

The influence of the teaching on social justice may best be assessed in light of the fact that the entire social ministry of the Church is today often described simply as the work of social justice. See also Catholic social teachings; justice.

Bibliography

Calvez, J. Y., and J. Perrin. The Church and Social Justice: The Social Teaching of the Popes from Leo XIII to Pius XII (1878–1958). Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1961.

Hollenbach, D. Claims in Conflict: Retrieving and Renewing the Catholic Human Rights Tradition. New York: Paulist Press, 1979.

J. BRYAN HEHIR

social ministry, also called justice ministry, service that aims to alleviate human suffering by working to transform those structures that cause or promote oppression, poverty, war, racism, or sexism. See also ministry.

social sciences. See Catholicism and the social sciences.

social teachings. See Catholic social teachings.

society of apostolic life, a group whose members live together in common to pursue some apostolic end, but who do not take religious vows. A society of apostolic life may be very similar to a religious community and may be subject to many of the same norms as religious communities.

Society of Jesus. See Jesuits.

Society of Missionaries of Africa. See White Fathers.

Society of St. Peter. See Fraternity of St. Peter, Priestly.

Society of St. Vincent de Paul, religious congregation founded in Paris by Frederic Ozanam in 1833. Ozanam, a layman, was deeply moved by the poverty and disorder that gripped Paris in the early stages of industrialization. With a desire to blunt the efforts of the Saint-Simonians (followers of the French socialist Claude Saint-Simon, 1760–1825), he and his companions formed a Catholic organization of laypersons devoted to individual holiness, personal contact with the poor, and the distribution of alms. The new group took Vincent de Paul as its patron saint and was organized into conferences on local levels. Eventually diocesan, national, and international councils formed the framework for broader cooperative endeavors. As urban poverty and social dislocation spread throughout Western society, the need for the work of the Society grew. It expanded rapidly in France and in 1845 made its first appearance in the United States in St. Louis. It eventually spread to 112 countries.

Vincentians, as the members are called, devote themselves not only to personal contact with the poor, but to the creation of institutions to care for the needy, such as orphanages and hospitals. More commonly, the Vincentians' used-clothing and furniture stores are found in many American cities. See also Vincent de Paul, St.; Vincentians.

Society of the Divine Word (S.V.D.), a clerically exempt society, independent of the local bishop, whose members take the evangelical vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, founded in 1875 by Arnold Janssen in Holland and approved by the Vatican in 1905. Members include both priests and brothers.

The main work of the society is evangelizing in non-Christian areas. To this end, they are involved in education on all levels and the publication of magazines and pamphlets. Emphasis is placed on the education of native clergy. In the United States, their ministry includes work among African-Americans.

The generalate is located in Rome and the American headquarters is in Techny, Illinois.

Society of the Sacred Heart (R.S.C.J.), formerly known as the Madams of the Sacred Heart, a community of sisters devoted to religious and academic education. Founded in France by Madeleine Sophie Barat (d. 1865) in 1800 for the education of girls, the community established itself in the United States in 1818 devoting itself for many decades to educating the daughters of the wealthy. It is engaged today in religious and academic education in parishes and schools, and is also involved in social and health care ministries. In 1994 there were about six hundred sisters in the United States. See also Barat, St. Madeleine Sophie.

sociobiology, the scientific study of the biological basis of social behavior. Sociobiology studies the evolutionary basis of prosocial behavior, e.g., cooperation, reciprocity, and altruism, as well as antisocial behavior, e.g., aggression and bias against groups other than one's own. Sociobiology (also called "neo-Darwinism") focuses attention on ways in which specific traits (e.g., incest avoidance) bestow adaptive advantages on their organisms, whose reproductive success in turn promotes the continuation of the species. Human sociobiology tends to depreciate the spiritual dimension of human beings as well as human freedom.

Sociobiological accounts of the place of human beings in nature raise questions for Catholic theology in several areas, including the doctrines of providence, creation, and the imago Dei (the human person as the image of God). Theories of "kin altruism" (doing good for one's own relatives) and "reciprocal altruism" (doing good for those who have done good to oneself) pertain to the natural bases of neighbor love and justice. The adaptive significance of morality, territoriality, loyalty to one's own group, homosexuality, and sexual promiscuity provide interesting, if not determinative, evidence relevant to moral norms.

Socrates "Scholasticus," ca. 380–450, ecclesiastical historian. Socrates intended his Historia Ecclesiastica (Lat., "Ecclesiastical History") to continue the work of Eusebius, chronicling events from 306 to 439. Both the Arian controversy and the Novatianist sect are addressed in some detail. The writings of church leaders in the East, official ecclesiastical and imperial documents, and oral testimony served as his sources. See also Arianism; Novatianism.

sodality, an association of Catholics to promote the spiritual life of its members, apostolic works of evangelization, and aid to those in need (see can. 298). Jesuit John Leunis organized the first sodality in Rome (1563). Sodalities, under the patronage of the Blessed Mother, offered Catholic men a well-defined program for spiritual formation, prayer, and Christian service. During the nineteenth century, sodalities in the United States served as a basic parish organization for both women and men. The sodality's monthly meeting emphasized Marian devotions, frequent Communion, and social action. In the twentieth century, Jesuit Daniel S. Lord, editor of the Queen's Work, the movement's publication, promoted the development of sodalities throughout the nation. In 1931, Lord instituted the Summer Schools of Catholic Action. These sessions, attended by Catholic youth, consisted of intensive prayer, lectures, and social activities. In 1956, the U.S. bishops approved the formation of the U.S. National Federation of Sodalities. Pope Paul VI promulgated revised norms for these sodalities in 1971, and their name was changed from Sodalities of Our Lady to Christian Life Communities. Although the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius of Loyola remains the specific source of the movement's spiritual life, the emphasis in the post–Vatican II years (after 1965) has been on Scripture, liturgy, and ecumenism rather than on personal piety, as in the preconciliar period.

Soisson, councils of, several Church councils or synods held at Soisson, France, during the late eleventh and early twelfth centuries. Only two of these councils are considered significant; both concern trinitarian doctrine. In 1092 the nominalist Roscelin of Compiègne was condemned for tritheism. In 1121 Peter Abelard, Roscelin's pupil and opponent of nominalism, was condemned for Sabellianism and forced to burn his book On the Divine Unity and Trinity. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

sola fide (soh'lah fee'day; Lat., "by faith alone"), a Reformation principle that justification by God in Christ comes from "faith alone" and cannot be earned, or "merited," by good works. Catholic doctrine insists that, while faith is indeed the beginning of salvation, faith must issue in good works and those good works are meritorious of salvation to the extent that they are expressions of faith. See also faith.

sola gratia (soh'lah grah'ztee-ah; Lat., "grace alone"), the Reformation principle that we are saved by "grace alone," that is, by God's action and not at all by our own. Catholic doctrine insists that God requires our free cooperation, although it is God alone who makes that cooperation possible. See also grace.

sola Scriptura (soh'lah skrip-toor'ah; Lat., "Scripture alone"), a foundational principle of Protestantism that Scripture as God's word mediates faith and is the final arbiter of theology. Other correlative authorities such as tradition, reason, and experience are not independent sources of revelation but assist in the interpretation of Scripture. Catholic doctrine insists that the Bible is itself the Church's book and that all official teachings are subject to its authority. However, the task of "authentically interpreting the word of God . . . has been entrusted exclusively to the living teaching office of the Church" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 10). See also Scripture, authority of.

solea (soh-lay'ah; Gk.), that part of the raised sanctuary platform in front of the iconostasis (sanctuary screen covered with icons) in Byzantine-rite churches. The term originally referred to the enclosed processional pathway that led from the sanctuary chancel to the ambo (pulpit) in early Constan-tinopolitan churches in the fourth through sixth centuries.

Solemn Blessing, part of the concluding rite at Mass, the Liturgy of the Hours, the Liturgy of the Word, and other sacramental rites that may expand the presider's simple blessing over the assembly. The Roman Missal offers twenty solemn blessings, with additional texts for specific solemnities, feasts, and seasons. The deacon (or in his absence, the priest) invites the people to bow their heads and pray for God's blessing. With hands extended, the presider prays a threefold invocation, to which the assembly responds "Amen." The usual blessing in the name of the Trinity follows. See also blessing.

Solemn High Mass (Lat., Missa Solemnis), the third and most solemn form of the Tridentine Mass (excepting the Pontifical High Mass, which is a Solemn High Mass celebrated in the presence of a bishop). The Tridentine Mass was the Latin-rite Mass in general use by the Roman Catholic Church from the Council of Trent (1545–63) until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). The Solemn High Mass, like the High Mass, was chanted from beginning to end. It was marked by a proliferation of ministers and assistants, notably by the mandatory deacon and subdeacon, who were often priests vested in dalmatic (the outer vestment of the deacon) or tunic (the outer vestment of the subdeacon). During the Solemn High Mass, incense was used and special ceremonies were added, such as the Asperges (the sprinkling of the people with holy water) and the Gospel procession. With the revision of the Mass in 1969, the tripartite ranking of ceremonial elaboration has been abandoned to the more flexible principle of "progressive solemnization," the idea that the Mass might be progressively solemnized according to the relative importance of its various portions. See also High Mass; Low Mass; Mass.

solemnity (soh-lem'ni-tee), a principal day with the highest rank in the liturgical calendar. A solemnity eclipses all other feasts or memorials. Its observance begins with Evening Prayer I, or First Vespers, on the evening of the preceding day. Some solemnities have their own vigil Mass. All Sundays throughout the year are solemnities. Easter and Christmas are the two greatest solemnities, with Easter being the Sunday of Sundays. Principal days of local significance may be raised from a memorial or feast to a solemnity in regions, dioceses, or religious institutes. See also feasts, liturgical; memorial.

Solemnity of Mary, the most important liturgical celebration honoring the Blessed Virgin Mary in the Catholic Church: the Immaculate Conception (December 8); Mary, Mother of God (January 1); the Annunciation of the Lord (March 25); and the Assumption of Mary (August 15). In addition to the solemnities, the liturgical calendar dedicates three feasts, five memorials, and four optional memorials to Mary. See also liturgical calendar.

Solesmes (soh-lem'), Benedictine abbey of Solesmes, France. Founded as a priory in 1010, it remained so until 1791. Dom Prosper Guéranger (d. 1875) refounded the monastery in 1833. Because of Guéranger's efforts at liturgical renewal, Solesmes became foremost among centers for the research and revival of Gregorian chant. Its roster of chant scholars boasts a continuing legacy: Canon Augustin Gontier (d. 1881), Dom Paul Jausions (d. 1870), Dom Joseph Pothier (d. 1923), Dom André Mocquereau (d. 1930), Dom Joseph Gajard (d. 1972), Dom Jean Claire (choirmaster since 1971). More than simply its chant scholars, Solesmes produced the first and many subsequent typical editions of the Kyriale (containing the chants for the ordinary prayers of the Mass), Graduale (containing the Gradual prayers), Antiphonal (containing the chants for the antiphons), and the Graduale Triplex. Gregorian scholarship continues at Solesmes with inquiries into Gregorian semiology, rhythm, and the origins of the Western modal system. See also chant, Gregorian; Guéranger, Prosper.

Solesmes, famous eleventh-century French Benedictine monastery that contributed significantly to liturgical renewal in the twentieth century, especially the renewal of liturgical music.

solitude. See desert.

Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (soh-lis-ee-too'doh ray'ee soh-shee-al'uhs), "On the Social Concern [of the Church]," social encyclical issued in 1988 by Pope John Paul II. The document celebrates the twentieth anniversary of Pope Paul VI's encyclical, Populorum Progressio. John Paul assesses the originality of Paul VI's encyclical, which includes the latter's recognition of the spiritual and cultural dimensions of international development and its linkage of peace with economic justice. Then, Sollicitudo analyzes the present conditions of the international economy. Pope Paul's hope for development remains unfulfilled. The gap between rich and poor is widening, and this is due in large part to the East-West superpower rivalry that diverts human energy and resources from meeting basic human needs. The institutions that structure the rivalry are "structures of sin" driven by the desire for profit and the thirst for power. John Paul II also extends Paul's concern for the environment. Populorum Progressio is the first encyclical to accent the limits of the earth's natural resources. Sollicitudo picks up this point and makes it a key theme.

To respond to these problems, John Paul II sets out guidelines for ecclesial and social action, though he is careful to point out that he is not advocating a third ideology alongside capitalism and socialism. Rather, the guidelines reflect theologically-based criteria for reflection. The main guideline is the "option for the poor." This option arises out of the fact that the goods of the world are intended for all persons. Righting the present imbalance regarding access to the goods of the world requires giving the poor priority in policy and action. See also Catholic social teachings; encyclicals, social. TODD D. WHITMORE

Solomon, David's son and successor (ca. 961–922 B.C.). He was one of David's younger sons yet he became a candidate for the throne and, through his mother's intrigues, obtained it. The Lord granted him wisdom, riches, and other gifts when he asked for understanding (1 Kgs 3). He built and dedicated

Solomon renders his most famous judgment in the dispute between two women who claim to be the mother of the same child (shown lying on the ground). When he orders that the baby be cut in half to be shared equally, only the real mother begs him not to do it, and Solomon in his wisdom grants her the child (1 Kgs 3:16–28); fifteenth-century painting by Giorgione da Castelfranco, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, Italy.

the Temple and wrote proverbs, songs, and scientific lists. After his many foreign wives led him into idolatry, he was punished with revolts, and his son lost most of the kingdom. He is credited with parts of the book of Proverbs and with the Canticle of Canticles, also known as the Song of Solomon, while Ecclesiastes and the Wisdom of Solomon imply that he wrote them.

Solomon, Odes of. See Odes of Solomon.

Solov'ev, Vladimir Sergeevich (vlah-dee'meer sair-gay'vitch soh-law-yawf'), 1853–1900, Russian religious philosopher, poet, and mystic. Although a brilliant student, his teaching career was ruined after he pleaded for clemency for the assassins of Czar Alexander II. He was influenced early by the German Romantics and Spinoza, as well as by the Gnostics and early Christian mystics. Later he evolved into a forerunner of the ecumenical movement, urging the reunion of the Orthodox Church with Rome. This earned him the ire of the Slavophiles, who preferred Slavic culture to Western culture, and the Holy Synod. Whether or not he died a Catholic is a moot point. His thought enjoyed an even greater resonance after his death, especially throughout the recent religious renaissance in the former Soviet Union, when it particularly influenced intellectuals who admired the West. See also Russia, Catholicism in.

Somaschi (soh-mahs'kee), order of clerks regular founded in 1534 at Somasca, Italy, by Jerome Emiliani. Their continuing apostolate is directed to the care of orphans and the teaching of the poor. They are known today as the Somascan Fathers (C.R.S.), with headquarters in Rome. See also Jerome Emiliani, St.

Song of Songs, also known as the Song of Solomon, a book of the OT. Divided into eight chapters, this collection of love songs, so filled with erotic symbolism, has rarely been interpreted literally. The most consistent tradition has been allegorical, spiritual, or mystical, beginning with Origen (d. ca. 254). In the Middle Ages, Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153) composed eighty-six influential sermons on these songs. In the sixteenth century John of the Cross's "Spiritual Canticle" was a mystical rewriting of the Song of Songs. Modern scholars, however, call for a reading of these songs that keeps the literal and spiritual traditions of interpretation in creative tension.

Son of David, a designation for Jesus. The claim of Davidic lineage indicates that Jesus fulfilled Nathan's oracle (2 Sam 7:14) that a Son of David would forever sit on David's throne. The Annunciation (Luke 1:32) and the speeches of Peter and Paul (Acts 2:29–30; 13:22–23) recall that oracle.

Jesus' Davidic lineage is frequently emphasized in the genealogies (Matt 1:2–17; Luke 3:23–38), the requests for healing (Matt 9:27; 15:22; 20:30; Mark 10:47; Luke 18:38), and the symbolism of Revelation (Rev 5:5; 22:16).

Some texts question the title. Jesus is portrayed as suggesting that the Messiah is more than David's son (Matt 22:41–45; Mark 12:35–37; Luke 20:41–44). Paul notes that Jesus was of the Seed of David according to flesh, but Son of God by the Resurrection (Rom 1:3). John, perhaps ironically, minimizes the connection of Jesus to David and Bethlehem (John 7:42). Heb 7:14 contrasts Jesus' Davidic lineage with his heavenly high priesthood. See also David.

son of God, in biblical literature an individual in a special relation to God. In the OT "sons of God," as in Canaanite myth, were heavenly beings (Gen 6:2, 4; Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7). The image is also used of Israel (Exod 4:22–23; Deut 1:31; 8:5; Hos 11:1; Mal 1:6) and the king (2 Sam 7:14; Ps 2:7; 89:26–27). Eventually the title applied to righteous individuals (Wis 2:18). The Davidic title was extended to expected messiahs (4QFlor 10–14; 1 Enoch 105:2; 4 Ezra 7:28–29).

The confession of Jesus as Son of God is partly based on his own intimate address to God as Father (Matt 11:25–27; 26:39; Mark 14:36; Luke 10:21; 22:42). Experience of the Resurrection also grounded early Christian belief (Acts 9:20; Rom 1:4; 2 Cor 1:19; Gal 1:16; 4:4; 1 Thess 1:10; Heb 1:5; 4:14).

The synoptic Gospels situate the confession of Jesus' divine sonship within narratives of his baptism (Matt 3;17; Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22), temptation (Matt 4:3; Luke 4:3), Transfiguration (Matt 17:5; Mark 9:2; Luke 9:35), and encounters with demons (Matt 8:29; Mark 5:7; Luke 8:28). Several texts, particularly in Matthew, report Jesus' own language claiming to be God's Son (Matt 7:21; 10:33; 12:50; 16:16–17; 18:19, 35).

The Fourth Gospel shifts from a functional toward a metaphysical notion of Jesus' sonship. Jesus is not simply a messiah (John 1:34, 49), but the Son who was in the Father's bosom (John 1:18), who descended from heaven (John 3:13) and yet remains one with the Father (John 10:30, 36–38).

Creedal affirmations of the early Church tended to rely heavily on the Christological perspective of the Fourth Gospel. See also Christology; Jesus Christ; Son of Man; titles of Christ. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Son of Man, a designation for Jesus. In Hebrew and Aramaic, the phrase "son of man" is an idiom for "man" or "someone." In the book of Ezekiel, the prophet is regularly addressed as "son of man." In this context, the point is that he is a mortal creature in contrast to the immortal God. In the vision of Dan 7, four beasts symbolize four kingdoms, and the ancient of days represents God. The significance of the figure described as "one like a son of man" who receives kingship is disputed. In this context, "one like a son of man" means a figure with a human appearance. Angels are regularly described as "men" in Daniel. The figure would thus seem to be an angel, the agent of God and patron of the people of Israel, probably Michael. Other theories propose that he is a collective symbol for Israel or the idealized Messiah. In the Similitudes of Enoch (1 Enoch 37–71), a Jewish apocalypse written in the first century A.D., "that son of man" in Dan 7 is interpreted as the heavenly Messiah. Another Jewish apoca-lypse composed around A.D. 100 also alludes to the figure in Dan 7 and interprets him as the Messiah (4 Ezra 13).

The book of Revelation preserves the sense of the Semitic idiom and implies that the Risen Christ is the one "like a son of man" in Dan 7:13 (Rev 1:13; see 14:14). Elsewhere in the NT (Mark, Matthew, Luke, John, Acts), the phrase has become definite rather than indefinite and a title or fixed nickname, rather than a descriptive phrase intelligible only as an allusion to Dan 7. See also Christology; Jesus Christ. ADELA Y. COLLINS sophia. See wisdom.

Sorbonne (sohr-buhn'), originally a college for secular theologians at the University of Paris founded by Robert de Sorbon in 1257 and mirroring the provisions for members of the mendicant orders studying at Paris. By the mid-sixteenth century, the term came to refer to the entire theological faculty at the university and more recently to the University of Paris itself.

Sorrowful Mysteries of the Rosary. See Mysteries of the Rosary.

Sorrows, Our Lady of. See Our Lady of Sorrows.

soteriology (Gk., soter, "salvation"; logos, "word about"), critical reflection upon the salvific activity of Jesus Christ. This branch of Christology asks: What does it mean to say that Jesus Christ "saved" us? From what and/or whom has Jesus Christ "saved" humankind and creation? Why did/do we need to be "saved"? In answering these questions, soteriology gives serious consideration to the testimony of the OT (e.g., Gen 3:1–4:16) and the NT (e.g., Mark 14:24; John 11:49–52; Rom 4:25; 5:6–11; 1 Cor 15:3; 1 Pet 1:3).

The Church Fathers tended to see Jesus as the Christus Victor (Lat., "Christ the Victor"), who freed creation from Satan's power. In the Middle Ages, Anselm proposed his satisfaction theory, and Abelard offered his view of exemplarism. During the Reformation, Martin Luther, John Calvin, and Philipp Melanchthon accentuated Jesus Christ's saving work for humankind and proposed theories of imputation and substitution. Today, some theologians (e.g., Karl Rahner), retrieving Abelard's view, have presented a sacramental understanding in which the entire life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus Christ disclose God's love for humankind and Christ's complete surrender to God, even in the face of absurdity. In recent years, some theologians have proposed that, when used in light of the Gospels, "liberation" is another word for "salvation." See also atonement, doctrine of; Christology; exemplarism; imputation; Jesus Christ; redemption; satisfaction; substitution of Christ.

Soto, Dominic de, 1494–1560, Spanish Dominican theologian. Professor at the University of Salamanca in Spain (1532–45), he became Charles V's imperial theologian at the Council of Trent (1545–63) and later his confessor (1547–50). He subsequently returned to his native Salamanca and was elected to the University's principal chair of theology, whose previous occupant was Melchior Cano (d. 1560).

Soubirous, Marie Bernarde. See Bernadette of Lourdes, St.

soul, the principle of life in a human being. Christian reflection on the nature of the human soul attained clarity only gradually. Thus early theologians adopted positions that from a later standpoint must be judged erroneous: Tertullian (d. ca. 225), for example, took the human soul to be in some sense corporeal, and Origen (d. ca. 254) held that it preexists the creation of the body.

The notion of soul that has predominated in Catholic theology since the late thirteenth century is that of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Following Aristotle, he conceived of soul in general as the pattern of interrelatedness ("substantial form") that integrates the many parts and processes of an organism into a functioning whole. In human beings, this integrating or formal element manifests itself not only in the activities that Thomas referred to as "vegetative" (e.g., nutrition, growth) or "sensitive" (e.g., seeing, hearing), but also in the higher-order activities he designated as "intellectual" or "rational" (e.g., questioning, understanding, deciding, loving). On this view, the human soul is naturally and intrinsically related to the body; it is not a spiritual captive in a material prison.

The Catholic Church affirms that each human being has only one soul; that the human soul is spiritual, for, as Aquinas explained, its higher-order activities are neither material nor intrinsically dependent upon matter; that it is created directly by God and simultaneously with the body; and that it is immortal, although whether this attribute is natural or a gift of grace has never been defined. See also eternal life; holy souls; immortality; mind/body.

MICHAEL STEBBINS

Southwell, St. Robert, 1561–95, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. A native of Norfolk, ordained a Jesuit in 1584, he had a successful mission in London from 1586 until his arrest in 1592 and his execution in 1595. He was widely known for his poetry. Feast day: February 21. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Southworth, St. John, 1592–1654, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. Ordained at Douai in 1618, he was especially known for his ministry during the London plague of 1636. He was executed in 1654; his relics were hidden and then rediscovered in 1927. Feast day: June 28. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Sozomen, early fifth-century ecclesiastical historian. Sozomen's Historia Ecclesiastica (Lat., "Ecclesiastical History") covers the period A.D. 324–421, roughly the same span chronicled by Socrates "Scholasticus," his main source. However, Sozomen includes material from other sources, e.g., concerning the Church in the West and biographies of monks, etc. He depicts the emperors as defenders of orthodoxy and stresses the role of divine providence in history.

space, according to common sense, the three-dimensional expanse in which material objects exist and move. The major philosophical and scientific controversy concerns whether space is "absolute," like a container, or "relative," merely a set of relations between objects. The theory of relativity denies that space by itself is absolute but has not resolved the controversy with respect to space-time. Regardless, theology traditionally holds that, as Creator, God is present to all points of space (space-time), not subject to its constraints. See also relativity; time.

Spain, Catholicism in. Catholicism has been a key element in shaping Spain's national identity. Christianity arrived in Spain in the late Roman period. By the fourth century Spain had produced major Christian figures such as Bishop Hosius and Pope Damasus I (366–84). In 587 the Arian Visigoths who had invaded Spain converted to Catholicism. A symbiosis between the state and the Church destined to last into modern times soon developed. The Church exerted considerable influence on law and customs while the state controlled the appointment of bishops.

After Spain had fallen to Muslim invaders in 711, the remnants of the Visigoths in northern Spain initiated a protracted War of Reconquest, seeking to restore the land to the monarchy and Christianity. This enterprise was seen as a crusade, especially after the discovery in Compostela of the supposed tomb of St. James. He was named patron saint of the country, and his tomb became a major center of European pilgrimage. As the beneficiary of substantial land grants, the Church had the resources to build numerous churches, cathedrals, and monasteries in the Romanesque and Gothic styles, a reflection of heavy influence from the French Cluniacs and Cistercians.

Missionary Expansion: This militant character did not abate with the completion of the Reconquest in 1492. The Catholic rulers Ferdinand and Isabella enhanced the role of Christianity by making it the essential factor in unifying under one crown a politically and culturally diverse country. Jews were forced to convert or leave the country, and the recently created Inquisition, an ecclesiastical tribunal controlled by the state, watched for heresy and false conversions. In the sixteenth century Spanish Catholicism reached its apex. Under the effective leadership of Cardinal Ximénez de Cisneros, a general reform of both religious and diocesan clergy raised their standards of education. In the newly created universities, Catholic thought flourished in a general climate of openness strongly influenced by Erasmus (d. 1536), the outstanding Christian humanist of his time. The Church also played a prominent role in Spain's imperial expansion into the New World, where the religious orders (mostly the Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, and later the Jesuits) achieved the most important missionary enterprise since early Christianity. They converted and educated a large number of the native population and frequently protected them from common abuses by civilians.

A Palm Sunday procession in the small Spanish town of Mohernado, Guadalinara; one of the world's oldest Catholic countries, Spain was first evangelized around the year 200 and by 1994 had more than 39 million Catholics, or almost 95 percent of the total population.

Tensions Between Church and State: In the seventeenth century Spanish Catholicism declined in intellectual and moral vigor, although popular and artistic religiosity continued to thrive. The number of clergy reached an all-time high—close to 3 percent of the population—and religious orders dominated secondary schools. The first tensions between the state and the Church developed in the eighteenth century. The Bourbon monarchs sought to increase their control of the Church by confiscating its vast landholdings, a process that was not completed until the 1860s. The Jesuits, feared because of the power they exercised through their vast network of secondary schools, were expelled from Spain and Spanish America in 1767. A more profound split developed between the enlightened lay class, which favored a moral and educational renewal of the Church, and the church hierarchy, which tended to cling to the traditional ideology. The split intensified in the nineteenth century, as the liberal ideology grew in strength and some of its followers became radically anticlerical. The Concordat, signed in 1851, reflected a compromise between the moderate liberals and the church hierarchy, for the state still acknowledged Catholicism as the national religion, although its control of the Church increased by appointing and paying the diocesan clergy directly. A Catholic renewal at the end of the century failed to stop the increasing alienation of intellectuals, urban workers, and landless southern peasants, who increasingly viewed the Church as a natural ally of reactionary forces. With the powerful emergence of leftist revolutionary movements in the twentieth century, opposition to Catholicism took a new and violent form, crystalizing in the revolutionary violence of the Civil War (1936–39), during which thousands of clergy were killed and many religious buildings were destroyed.

Post–World War II Spain: The Church overwhelmingly supported Generalissimo Franco's victorious side by terming the war a modern crusade and then helping the authoritarian regime attempt to build a reactionary form of the traditional national Catholicism. This effort ultimately failed in the 1960s, when a significant part of all levels of the clergy and many Catholic lay organizations clamored for reform and supported a wide variety of political options, including the radical Left. After Franco's death in 1975, the Church by and large supported the peaceful transition to democracy, which ultimately brought about the first complete separation of Church and state in the history of Spanish Catholicism.

Although Spain remains largely a Catholic country, increasing desacralization of the country has considerably undermined the traditional influence of the Church. Church attendance has decreased substantially, the number of vocations has reached a critically low level, and strong opposition to divorce and abortion legislation by the hierarchy failed to bring results. Nevertheless, customs, rituals, and celebrations of a religious character remain as popular as ever.

As of 1994 Catholics constituted nearly 95 percent of the total Spanish population of thirty-nine million. See also Latin America, Catholicism in.

Bibliography

Glick, Thomas F. Islamic and Christian Spain in the Early Middle Ages. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1979.

Payne, Stanley G. Spanish Catholicism. An Historical Overview. Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin Press, 1984.

ANGEL DELGADO-GOMEZ

Spalding, John Lancaster, 1840–1916, bishop, writer, educator, and poet. Born in Kentucky and educated at Louvain and Rome, he was ordained for the diocese of Louisville and worked there and in New York before being named the first bishop of Peoria, Illinois (1877–1908). As bishop he was an ardent promoter of parochial schools and of the Irish Catholic Colonization Association, which sought to settle Irish immigrants in rural areas in America. A proponent of a Catholic institution of higher learning for the United States, he chaired the bishops' committee to found, in Washington, D.C., The Catholic University of America in 1888, refusing appointment as the first rector. He also supported the establishment, in Washington, D.C., of Trinity College for women (1900) and Sisters' College at Catholic University (1911).

Spalding, Martin John, 1810–72, archbishop of Baltimore and author. Born in rural Kentucky, alumnus of the Urban College of the Propaganda, he was ordained in Rome in 1834. In 1848 he was named coadjutor to Bishop Benedict Flaget of Louisville, Kentucky, whom he succeeded in 1850. He authored historical and apologetical books and a host of articles. In 1864 he became archbishop of Baltimore, where he provided the Church in the United States with a comprehensive legislative code at the Second Plenary Council. At Vatican Council I (1869–70) he proposed a compromise definition of papal infallibility. He was the most productive and perhaps the most influential U.S. Catholic bishop at mid-century. See also Baltimore, councils of; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

speaking in tongues. See glossolalia.

Spellman, Francis Joseph, 1889–1967, cardinal-archbishop of New York. Born in Whitman, Massachusetts, he graduated from Fordham College and studied at the Urban College in Rome, where he was ordained on May 14, 1916. Relegated to minor positions by Cardinal William O'Connell of Boston, he was appointed to the Vatican Secretariat of State in 1925. Through his friendship with Eugenio Pacelli, later Pius XII, he became auxiliary bishop to Cardinal Francis J. Spellman, one of the best known, and, because of his personal friendship with Pope Pius XII, one of the most influential American bishops in the twentieth century.

O'Connell in 1932. In 1939, he was named archbishop of New York by Pius XII.

Spellman was also military ordinary, a position that gave him influence with President Franklin D. Roosevelt and other world leaders. Though he failed to obtain formal U.S.-Vatican diplomatic relations, he was instrumental in having Roosevelt appoint a personal representative to the pope in 1940. Named a cardinal in 1946, he frequently provoked controversy in his public attempts to defend Catholic interests. Yet, he also had John Courtney Murray (d. 1967) invited to Vatican II to help draft the council's Declaration on Religious Freedom. See also military ordinariate; Pius XII.

Spiritans. See Holy Ghost Fathers.

spiritual bouquet, an enumerated collection of prayers, devotional exercises, and acts of self-denial offered to an individual for spiritual benefit. This pious custom, in vogue before the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), was especially popular with parochial school children. The listing, or bouquet, of pledged spiritual activities was presented usually in some artistic form, to the local pastor, a nun, or member of one's family on some special occasion, such as an anniversary of ordination, religious profession, or marriage. The custom passed out of favor after the council because it tended to view spiritual realities, including Mass, as quantifiable entities whose spiritual benefits are readily transferable to others.

spiritual combat, theme in the NT using language of war and athletics, e.g., "Take up the whole armor of God" (Eph 6:13), to describe the individual Christian's inner struggle between the flesh and the spirit. An element in desert spirituality, it gave a name, Spiritual Combat, to a book by Lorenzo Scupoli.

Spiritual Communion, the desire to receive the Eucharist as a substitute for the actual, physical reception of Communion. Known in the fourth century, it developed in the Middle Ages together with looking at, and adoring, Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. Overemphasis on Christ's divinity and an exaggerated sense of personal unworthiness fostered this practice. See also Communion, Holy.

spiritual direction, a guided process of understanding one's relationship with God. A common form of spiritual direction occurs when a spiritual director listens to the prayer experiences and life experiences of one under his or her direction and asks significant questions, encouraging growth and honesty in facing personal strengths and weaknesses. Communal liturgy, friendships with members of the Christian community, and spiritual reading (lectio divina) also serve as major sources of spiritual direction because they deepen one's relationship with God and raise significant questions about one's spiritual journey. See also discernment of spirits.

Spiritual Exercises, a pattern of contemplations, meditations, examination of conscience, and other forms of prayer, considerations, and instructions framed by Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556) as indicated by the experience of the working of God in his own life. The Exercises, normatively made in solitude over thirty days under the guidance of a spiritual director, dwell initially upon God's gracious forgiveness of sin and then upon the life, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ. Their purpose is "to prepare and dispose the soul to remove from itself all disordered affectivity in order to seek and find the divine will in the disposition of one's life." The Exercises place great emphasis upon the discernment of the various religious movements and influences ("spirits") within one's life and, above all, upon allowing God to work immediately with the "exercitant." The Exercises have historically been adapted according to need. The book, The Spiritual Exercises, was written from 1521 to 1548. See also Ignatius of Loyola, St.; Jesuit spirituality.

Spiritual Franciscans, those who sought to separate from the ruling body of Franciscans, the Conventuals, in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth century, believing that the order had deviated from the strict poverty of the rule and testament of St. Francis. This rebellious minority, originally called Zealots (Zelanti), adhered to the prophecies of Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202) and viewed themselves as ushering in the age of the Holy Spirit. The Spirituals faced alternately persecution and toleration until their movement was formally condemned by Pope John XXII in 1317, 1318, and 1323. See also Franciscan order; Fraticelli.

spiritual healing, the forgiveness of sin and the resolution of spiritual and emotional difficulties.

There are four kinds of sickness that require healing: physical illness, emotional distress, sin, and demonic affliction. The sacrament of Penance, and in some cases the sacrament of the Anointing of the Sick, along with counseling, are avenues of spiritual healing. See also Anointing of the Sick; forgiveness; Reconciliation.

spiritual life. See ways of the spiritual life.

spiritualism, a practice, rejected by the Church, which involves contacting the dead through a living person (a medium) and sometimes using this contact to learn about the future (necromancy). Popular in ancient China, spiritualism (also known as spiritism) is noted with disapproval in 1 Sam 28:8 and condemned in Deut 18:11. Spiritualists believe that mediums possess powers and efficacious techniques, like turning tables and involuntary writing that provide access to the spirit world. No evidence exists to support such claims.

Spirituality, American Catholic, the network of human experiences that form a lived faith commitment within the U.S. context. Pluralism emerges as significant in forming this spirituality. Catholics encounter pluralism in U.S. society and in their own ethnically diverse communities. Despite a constitutional guarantee of religious liberty, the nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century immigrants experienced the constraints of U.S. culture's anti-Catholicism. The challenge for nineteenth-century Catholics was to retain their ethnically mediated religious identities while shedding foreign traits that thwarted political and economic aspirations. Parishes often bridged the gap between the ethnically familiar and culturally new. Parish associations adapted the essentially Protestant notion of voluntarism to meet adult immigrants' diverse religious needs. Parish schools diminished children's ethnicity by creating American patriots and Catholics faithful to uniform sacramental practices. Individual piety retained unequivocally Catholic forms, with abundant choices among popular devotions featuring a saint, Mary, or the Eucharist. Socially engaged spirituality emerged in the twentieth century, including Benedictine Father Virgil Michel's justice-oriented liturgical reform, the Catholic Worker movement, and Thomas Merton's socially conscious contemplative writings. The post–Vatican II emphasis on Scripture radically affected American Catholic spirituality, minimizing private piety and declericalizing communal piety, as in the charismatic renewal and the development of small Christian communities. Still, the parish-celebrated Eucharist remains the primary lay religious experience in American Catholicism. Adapting worship to the spirituality of Hispanics and African-Americans reflects an effort toward integration of diversity. Liberation theologians, feminists, and others continue to call the Church to greater inclusiveness in determining whose experiences will define future American Catholic spirituality. See also spirituality, Christian. SANDRA Y. MIZE spirituality, Celtic. See Celtic spirituality.

spirituality, Dominican. See Dominican spirituality.

spirituality, Franciscan. See Franciscan spirituality.

spirituality, Jesuit. See Jesuit spirituality.

spirituality, lay. See lay spirituality.

spirituality, liberation. See liberation spirituality.

spirituality, monastic. See monastic spirituality.

spiritual reading, a traditional Christian practice that involves setting aside some time each day to explore the spiritual life by reading works of respected authors in the field. The point of spiritual reading is to benefit from the insights and experiences of others and to deepen one's own sense of the sacred.

spiritual sense. See Scripture, senses of.

spiritual theology. See ascetical theology.

spiritual works of mercy. See mercy, spiritual works of.

Spiritus Paraclitus (spir'i-tuhs pahr-ah'klit-uhs; Lat., "the Holy Spirit, the Comforter"), encyclical on biblical studies by Pope Benedict XV, issued on the fifteenth centenary of St. Jerome's death (September 15, 1920). While encouraging biblical studies, it is more cautious than Leo XIII's Providentissimus Deus (1893). See also Bible, Church teaching on the.

CHRISTIAN SPIRITUALITY

Christian spirituality is the daily, communal, lived expression of one's ultimate beliefs characterized by openness to the self-transcending love of God, self, neighbor, and world through Jesus Christ and in the power of the Spirit. "Spirituality" is a term that describes realities related to the Spirit of God. The OT speaks of the "breath" of God and in the NT, especially in Paul's Letters, "spirit" often refers to the Spirit of the Risen Christ in the community. Throughout the tradition, the term "spiritual" has had intellectual, juridical, and philosophical connotations, but it has referred consistently to that aspect of human life characterized by grace, that is, by the presence and activity of the Holy Spirit.

During and after the Middle Ages, many spiritual writers emphasized the interior, affective aspects of the spiritual life and advocated spiritual practices intended to nurture a life of perfection and heroic virtue that exceeded the demands of the ordinary Christian life. This view has changed dramatically and the journey toward holiness is now seen as an integral outcome of the baptismal commitment of every Christian.

Since Vatican II (1962–65), the Catholic Church has experienced a renewed interest in spirituality that encompasses a wide range of elements: the primacy of religious experience; biblical spirituality; renewed liturgy; recovery of the tradition's spiritual classics; interest in Eastern forms of the spiritual life; the relationship between spirituality and psychology; liberation and feminist spiritualities; and mysticism. Other signs of this renewal include the retreat movement, charismatic renewal, prayer, and Bible study groups; spiritual direction; the study of spirituality; and intensified social justice activity. In addition to a number of single volumes on spirituality, several publishing houses have inaugurated multivolume series on Christian and world spiritualities, making this material readily available to a wide audience. Such renewal is visible among many groups of Protestants as well. This abundance of material suggests the rich and varied ways in which one can experience and understand spirituality. On the negative side, it can lead to confusion, lack of coherence, and uncertainty about how to discern the wheat from the chaff.

In the past, treatises on the spiritual life were, in the main, written by and for members of clerical and monastic communities. This understanding of the spiritual life did spill over and affect the laity, but too often lay spirituality was seen as peripheral and inferior to the primary spiritual business of the Church. At Vatican II, the Church emphasized the primacy of Baptism for all Catholic Christians and issued a clarion call to universal holiness (Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, nn. 40–41). The shift has significantly altered the discussion about the contours of the spiritual life and has broadened the audience to whom spiritual counsel is addressed. Every baptized Catholic is now encouraged to become conscious of, and to develop, her or his own spiritual life.

A satisfactory, comprehensive definition of spirituality is elusive. A marked pluralism leads one to speak of spiritualities rather than a single Christian spirituality. Definitions reflect various starting points, emphases, and perspectives, revealing the broad horizon in which the spiritual life is situated. All aspects of existence, even sin, have the potential to be part of one's search for spiritual meaning. For some, spirituality deals primarily with prayer and explicit religious experience, but for others it encompasses one's entire life in all its diversity—relationships, work, love, suffering, creativity, and so on.

But one can identify spirituality on at least three levels. The first is the originating experience—an individual or group of individuals have an encounter with God that develops into a sustained relationship. Second, although this primordial experience of God is ineffable and beyond human grasp, it may find outward expression in a way of life, a text, a set of images, or even music. This expression varies depending on its context, e.g., historical period, geographic location, age, sex, background, and experience. Third, students of the spiritual life analyze, categorize, and communicate in an organized fashion elements of this outward expression. In turn, persons are led anew to their own personal encounter with God, continuing the cycle of originating experiences.

TYPES OF SPIRITUALITY

Scholars reflecting on religious experience have categorized what appear to be different types or approaches to the spiritual life. One of the most common distinctions uses terms derived from the Greek, "kataphatic" and "apophatic." "Kataphatic" denotes a positive spirituality that finds God primarily in created things and uses analogy to speak of God, e.g., God is like the dawn or God is a friend. The term "apophatic" describes a negative spirituality that speaks of God in ways that call attention to the transcendent otherness of God, e.g., God is not like the dawn or God is not a friend as we experience these realities in human life.

In the past, God's transcendence was often emphasized more than God's immanence, and many thought that God could be spoken of more adequately through the negative way. Today, there are two changes in this way of thinking. First, these two ways to God are no longer seen in a hierarchical way, placing one above the other. It would seem, in fact, that the positive way is the way that most persons experience God. Many surveys on religious experience in the United States, for example, show that the majority of persons find God enmeshed in the very fiber of their daily life, with its personal relationships, struggles, and joys. Second, these two ways to God are seen not in opposition to each other but as different facets of the same religious experience. Most persons will experience both the positive and the negative approaches to God. Indeed, it could be said that one can only fully appreciate one way when it is seen in light of the other. They go hand in hand, reflecting the fullness of the human experience of God.

The terms "action" and "contemplation" are used to denote a second major distinction in the way one speaks about the spiritual life. Leah and Rachel in the OT and Martha and Mary in the NT have been seen as "types" of these two modes of the spiritual life. Here, too, one often encounters a misunderstanding. Because the Christian spiritual life has been so rooted in monasticism, it was sometimes thought that action was a necessary, but inferior, form of spirituality. This hierarchical understanding led the Christian community to see those members who dedicated themselves to formal contemplation as superior and more holy than those members whose lives were filled with activity.

As with the positive and negative ways, there has been a reevaluation of the dichotomy between action and contemplation. Movement and rest are two different, but crucial, rhythms in human life and both are required for survival. Most Christians spend most of their lives in some kind of activity. Occasionally it is important to step back and reflect on the meaning and intention of life and to engage full attention on God. But for the most part, one experiences God within the very matrix of existence. Jesus is a model. Occasionally he withdrew to pray and to discern God's will, but for the most part he was engaged in an active and demanding ministry.

Active and contemplative modes are being drawn closer and closer to each other. For Christians, active involvement in the world need not be seen as a distraction from, but rather as the very core of, the spiritual journey. Work, family, education, disappointment, illness, leisure, friendship, celebration—all are at the heart of the journey of holiness. Beholding the world at any given moment with an attentive, loving gaze is also at the heart of a contemplative existence. On the other hand, contemplation can be experienced as profoundly cosmic, relational, engaged, and committed to the world.

SPIRITUAL DEVELOPMENT

During the course of the twentieth century, the study of psychology made enormous strides in its understanding of how the human psyche functions. Much of this information proved relevant and helpful to an understanding of spirituality. Rather than seeing self and world as divided into separate compartments and eliminating certain elements from the spiritual life, such as bodiliness and sexuality, there is a more holistic view. The world and the human person are seen and valued in their totality. Nature and grace are not at war with each other but build on each other in a mutual and reciprocal way.

Foremost among these discoveries is the idea of human psychic growth and development. While the stages of growth should not be regarded in confining or rigid ways, they can be helpful in explaining the periods and kinds of growth and/or decline one is likely to experience in the spiritual life.

Growth in the spiritual life will not be divorced from the stages of life, even though each person experiences these stages in a unique way. The experiences of birth, childhood, adolescence, adulthood, old age, and dying are the moments of spiritual development. Spirituality can never be inimical to the depths of genuine human existence. The classic spiritual writers often recorded their own experience of God in order to provide guidance for others in their spiritual quest. These texts can be of assistance, provided the necessary adjustments are made to accommodate them to the present.

For hundreds of years, Catholic spiritual theology has delineated three major stages in the spiritual life: purgation, illumination, and perfection. In the first stage, the person strives to root out sin and to nurture a life of virtue. In the second stage, one reaches enlightenment; a life in conformity with God makes it possible for God to be known. In stage three, one experiences union with God, characterized by a knowledge of God that is tender and loving. These stages are not intended to be followed in an exact temporal sequence; rather, they describe aspects of the spiritual life that are present in different ways as one progresses toward final union with God.

Today, many spiritual writers caution against taking sin (purgation) as the starting point and focus of the spiritual life. A renewed theology centered on creation and incarnation has led to an emphasis on the goodness and value of the created, finite, material order. Catholics are invited to see themselves and all of creation as expressions of God's image and therefore as sacred. This is what is meant by a sacramental view of reality. From this renewed starting point, one is moved, second, to recognize sinful behavior and to experience genuine sorrow and the need for forgiveness from a generous and loving God. Third, spirituality views the person as graced by God, invited to participate in and extend God's creative activity in the world. Through this process, one's human existence is transformed and holiness is understood in terms of one's full, authentic humanity.

FUTURE TRENDS

The understanding of spirituality will continue to develop in a global context. National and political units are breaking down at an accelerated pace, demanding a reorientation of thought about and action toward people of all beliefs. Almost overwhelming are all the new voices that are part of the base of experience from which the spiritual life must be understood. Not only are there black, Hispanic, Asian, and female Christian voices, there are also the voices of Hindus, Buddhists, Jews, Native Americans, Confucians, and New Agers. As the awareness, knowledge, and practice of one's own tradition deepens, the dialogue with other voices in a spirit of inquiry and openness continues.

Second, many authors emphasize the connections between the practice of the Christian life and efforts to preserve the ecosystem. As the nuclear threat wanes, problem areas such as global warming, acid rain, the destruction of rain forests, and the pollution of air and water systems demand attention. Spiritual practices can never be at odds with the genuine welfare of the planet and of each person who inhabits it.

Third, spirituality takes seriously the mandate to identify with the poor, working in solidarity with them and for them. Action for justice, as the fruit of an authentically lived Christian spirituality, takes many forms—from the immediate alleviation of food and housing needs, to care of AIDS patients, to lobbying for just legislation, to paying a just wage, to improving education, and so on. In his Letter to the Ephesians (4:25–5:20), Paul captures the true spirit of the Christian life, the test of authentic spirituality.

Fourth, it remains to be seen how the inclusion of women's experience will eventually affect an understanding of the spiritual life. In general, women's spirituality emphasizes personal relationships, focuses on process and inclusive categories, moves toward synthesis, is oriented toward nature, takes seriously the body and sexuality, is concerned with the concrete as well as the abstract, and includes the affective as well as the intellectual. In the past these elements were often marginalized. Now they stand nearer to the center, thanks to feminist theology and feminist spirituality.

Finally, a renewed theology of the Holy Spirit has opened doors to new and broader ways of imaging God and to a fresh, more inclusive understanding of the person of Jesus. As awareness of the power and dynamism of the Holy Spirit at work in each member of the Church increases, words and images for the Third Person of the Trinity will need to be attended to anew.

See also Asia, spirituality of; Benedictine order; body and spirituality; Carmelite order; Carthusian order; Celtic spirituality; Dominican spirituality; feminism; Franciscan spirituality; Holy Spirit; Jesuit spirituality; lay spirituality; liberation spirituality; monastic spirituality; mysticism; spirituality, American Catholic; ways of the spiritual life; women in the Church.

Bibliography

Classics of Western Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press, 1978–.
Conn, Joann Wolski. Women's Spirituality. New York: Paulist Press, 1986.
Fox, Matthew. Original Blessing. Santa Fe, NM: Bear, 1983.
Woods, Richard. Christian Spirituality. Chicago: Thomas More, 1989.
World Spirituality: An Encyclopedic History of the Religious Quest. Vols. 16, 17, 18. New York: Crossroad, 1985, 1988, 1989.

ELIZABETH DREYER

sponsor, the person who, during the process of Christian initiation, stands as witness to the candidate's moral character, faith, and intention. Sponsors are significant ministers for both catechumens, unbaptized persons undergoing catechesis for entrance into the Church, and young people preparing for Confirmation.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults distinguishes sponsors from godparents. The sponsor must give witness before admission to the catechumenate. Meeting the necessary qualifications, this same person may also serve as the godparent (nn. 10–11). Furthermore, the Code of Canon Law recommends that the one who undertook the role of sponsor at Baptism be the sponsor for Confirmation (can. 893.2). See also Baptism; godparent; Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults.

Spy Wednesday, Wednesday in Holy Week. The term is believed to have originated in Ireland. Given the reference in the Scripture reading for the day to Judas Iscariot as a traitor, the day is so called to commemorate the betrayal of Jesus by Judas. See also Holy Week.

S.S.D., Sacrae Scripturae Doctor (Lat.), doctorate in Sacred Scripture, granted only by an official ecclesiastical faculty, such as the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome, or by the Pontifical Biblical Commission (can. 817). It usually requires advanced studies in theology and in Sacred Scripture as well as some teaching experience.

S.S.L., Sacrae Scripturae Licentiatus (Lat.), licentiate in Sacred Scripture, granted only by an official ecclesiastical faculty, such as the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome, or by the Pontifical Biblical Commission (can. 817). It usually requires two years of course work after a licentiate in Sacred Theology (S.T.L.). A licentiate is a graduate-level degree, comparable to a master's degree, granted by faculties authorized to do so by the Holy See.

Stabat Mater Dolorosa, (stah'baht mah'tair doh-loh-roh'sah; Lat., "the sorrowful Mother stood"), a thirteenth-century poem describing Mary, the Blessed Mother, that begins, "At the cross her station keeping, stood the mournful Mother weeping." The author of the poem is unknown. In the 1990s, the poem is used for the feast of the Seven Sorrows (September 15) and for the Stations of the Cross. For the English text, see Catholic Source Book, P. Klein, ed. See also Stations of the Cross stability, the practice of perseverance as prescribed by the Rule of St. Benedict and other early monastic rules. It implies not merely remaining in the community of one's profession throughout life (sometimes called "stability of place") but observing all the sound monastic practices followed in that community ("stability of heart"). See also Benedict, Rule of St.

stalls, the rows of seats, often ornately carved, situated in the choir of churches. Accompanied by a prie-dieu (kneeling bench with book rack), they are outfitted with a seat that may be folded up and with armrests in two positions.

Stanislaus Kostka, St. See Kostka, St. Stanislaus.

Stanislaus of Cracow, St., 1010–79, bishop, martyr, and patron saint of Poland and the city of Cracow. He was slain by King Boleslaus's own hand after Stanislaus, as bishop of Cracow, reproved and excommunicated him. Pope Gregory VII placed Poland under interdict and the king eventually fell from power. Feast day: April 11. See also Poland, Catholicism in.

Stapleton, Thomas, 1535–98, Counter-Reformation Catholic theologian. As canon of Chichester, after studies at Oxford and travels to Paris and Rome, he refused to take the oath of supremacy and left England in 1563 to teach at Douai and Louvain. Influenced by Augustine (d. 430) and Melchior Cano (d. 1560), his writings defended the teaching authority of Rome and the importance of tradition.

Starr, Eliza Gates, 1859–1940, American Catholic social worker. After visiting the world's first settlement house, Toynbee Hall (London), Starr and Jane Addams established Chicago's Hull House in 1889. Starr was active in the union movement and Chicago politics. Inspired by her aunt, Eliza Allen Starr, a noted Catholic educator, she converted to Catholicism in 1920.

state of perfection. See perfection, state of.

stational liturgy, a type of urban processional liturgy, first seen in fourth-century Jerusalem, in which the worshiping community, headed by its bishop and clergy, went in procession to one or more sanctuaries or sacred sites, making a stop (Lat., statio) at each for a liturgical service adapted to the shrine or feast. During the procession it was customary to chant antiphons. Such outdoor, mobile liturgical services involving stational processions and rogational (prayers for the harvest) services, especially with litanies, were characteristic of the liturgy in Jerusalem, Rome, Constantinople, and other major urban centers from the fourth century through the Middle Ages.

Stations of the Cross, one of the more familiar Catholic devotional exercises in which participants focus their prayer on representations of fourteen scenes of Christ's Passion. Its origins are ultimately traceable to pilgrims' visiting the various sites in Jerusalem associated with Christ's suffering and death, a practice that began in patristic antiquity and continued throughout the Middle Ages. Not all could make such a journey: by the twelfth century the fervor of the Crusades and a heightened devotion to the Passion created a heavy demand in Europe for pictorial representations of the last events in Jesus' life. When the Franciscans took over the custody of the shrines in the Holy Land in 1342, they saw it as part of their mission to propagate devotion to these places; soon in western Europe a series of shrines erected to commemorate Christ's Passion became commonplace. There was for many years a considerable variety in both the number and the title of these "stations"; the current number of fourteen first appeared in the Low Countries in the sixteenth century, becoming standard in the eighteenth century with a series of papal pronouncements. The chief promoter of this devotion was the Franciscan Leonard of Port Maurice (d. 1751), who set up more than five hundred sets of stations, the best known being the one in the Colosseum of Rome. Modern liturgists have emphasized that devotion to the Passion is incomplete without reference to the Resurrection and to this end have fostered the addition of a "fifteenth station." See also devotions.

statue, a three-dimensional image of Christ, an angel, Mary, or other saint. Statues may be regarded as merely decorative, didactic, or, more significantly, as devotional objects. Fashioned as expressions of faith, they are honored by the faithful because they represent persons who share God's holiness. Against misunderstandings and abuses, the Church has supported the use of statues, maintaining that veneration of statues (and other sacred images) is directed not to the material itself, but to the person represented; and that veneration of statues and the persons mirrored by them is appropriate, being distinct from the adoration due to God alone.

Statue of the Blessed Virgin Mary and the child Jesus; fourteenth-century French sculpture in limestone, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Staudenmaier, Franz Anton (stow'den-mi̲yuhr), 1800–56, German theologian. Ordained in 1827, he became professor of dogmatics in Giessen in 1830 and in Freiburg in 1837. His theology reflects the influence of the Tübingen theologians J. A. Drey, J. A. Möhler, and J. B. Hirscher as it treats the religious nature of the human person in relation to the historical character of revelation.

Stauffenberg, Claus Schenk Graf von (shtohf' en-berg), 1907–44, leader in the German resistance against Hitler. From old Catholic Swabian nobility, his enthusiasm for social reform had turned to anti-Hitler resolve by 1942. He prepared three assassination attempts on Hitler's life, the last ending in a bomb explosion in the headquarters of the eastern front from which, nevertheless, Hitler escaped. Von Stauffenberg was later executed.

S.T.D., Sacrae Theologiae Doctor (Lat.), doctorate in Sacred Theology. This is the highest degree conferred after the licentiate in Sacred Theology and requires advanced study at a pontifical university, one under the authority of the pope. The licentiate is a graduate-level degree, comparable to a master's degree, granted by faculties authorized to do so by the Holy See.

Stein, Bl. Edith, 1891–1942, philosopher, feminist, and convert. Stein, assistant to the philosopher Edmund Husserl, gave up her Jewish faith and became a Catholic in 1922. She was a teacher and lectured widely on pedagogical and women's issues. She entered the Carmelite order in 1923 at Cologne where she was known as Sister Teresa Benedicta of the Cross. She published philosophical and religious writings such as her book on John of the Cross, The Science of the Cross, and an autobiography, Life in a Jewish Family. Nazi persecution sent her to the Netherlands. Arrested there and executed at Auschwitz, Stein was beatified in 1987. Feast day: August 9.

Stephen, St., d. ca. 35, the first Christian martyr and one of the seven chosen by the twelve apostles to serve tables (Acts 6–7). A Greek-speaking Jew living in Jerusalem, he was converted to Christ and became a leader of the Hellenist Christians. This group argued that the new faith could not develop except by separating itself from Judaism, and in particular by putting distance between itself and the Temple and the Mosaic law. The Hellenists also urged a more expansive approach to the mission of the Church so that the gospel would be preached to the Gentiles as well. Feast day: December 26. See also Hellenism; martyr.

Stephen I, St., d. 257, pope from 254 to 257. He incurred the ire of Cyprian of Carthage for his leniency in reinstating two Spanish bishops who had lapsed under persecution and, later, for insisting that those baptized by heretics did not need to be rebaptized to be admitted to full communion. In 256, Stephen refused to receive legates from Cyprian. He was formerly believed to be a martyr. Feast day (until 1969): August 2. See also Cyprian of Carthage, St.; lapsi.

Stephen II (III), d. 757, pope from 752 to 757. Confronted by the Lombards, who were expanding into central Italy and threatening Rome, Stephen appealed to Byzantium for aid, but the emperor was unable to help. The pope next turned to the Frankish king Pepin, who defeated the Lombards in the campaigns of 754 and 756, thus transferring the papacy from the Byzantine sphere of influence and to that of western Europe. See also Pepin III.

Stephen III (IV), d. 772, pope from 768 to 772. Restoring order in the Roman church after the brief reign of the antipope Constantine through a synod in 769, Stephen soon became involved in Lombard politics. His mishandling of affairs left Rome open to Lombard attack and the city was saved only by the pro-Frankish policy of his successor, Hadrian I. See also Hadrian I.

Stephen Harding, St., d. 1134, abbot of Cîteaux and cofounder of the Cistercian order. Of English origin, Stephen left the austere community of Molesmes to found another at Cîteaux. His writings formed the core of the Carta Caritatis, the constitution of the order. Feast day: July 16. See also Cistercian order; Cîteaux.

Stephen of Hungary, St., ca. 975–1038, national saint. After ascending to the throne in 997, he undertook the task of uniting and Christianizing the Magyar people, aided by the German emperor and Pope Sylvester II. Feast day: August 16. See also Hungary, Catholicism in; Sylvester II.

sterility, the incapacity to have offspring. It differs from impotence, which is the incapacity to have sexual intercourse. Sterility does not establish an impediment to marriage in canon law; impotence, however, does. See also impotence, impediment of.

sterilization, a medical or surgical intervention that renders procreation impossible or very unlikely. Sterilization may be of the male (e.g., double vasectomy) or the female (e.g., tubal ligation). It can be either permanent or temporary (e.g., by pill). Traditional Catholic theology has distinguished between direct, or contraceptive, sterilization (where the contraceptive effect is desired and intended as a means or end) and indirect sterilization (where the contraceptive effect is not intended but occurs as the result of a necessary or highly desirable therapeutic procedure, e.g., the removal of cancerous ovaries or uterus).

Early Christian tradition was unfamiliar with the forms of sterilization now practiced. However, as early as Augustine (354–430) the "poisons of sterility" were rejected. Medieval theologians continued this usage, though it is not always clear what means they intended to include under "poisons of sterility."

While Pope Pius XI's Casti Connubii (1930) condemned contraception, it remains very doubtful whether sterilization can be included in this solemn condemnation. During the 1920s the key issue involving sterilization was compulsory eugenic sterilization. Twenty-three states had laws permitting sterilization of persons classified as feeble-minded or insane. The U.S. Supreme Court in 1927 upheld the constitutionality of such laws. Casti Connubii was explicitly concerned to reject such practices when it asserted that the individual's right over his or her sexual faculties was superior to the welfare of the community.

Pius XII was very explicit in his condemnation of direct sterilization. "Direct sterilization—that is, sterilization which aims, either as a means or as an end at rendering procreation impossible—is a grave violation of the moral law and therefore illicit" (Address to the Midwives, 1951). Paul VI's Humanae Vitae repeated this condemnation in 1968.

Since many theologians dissented from the central assertion of Humanae Vitae, it was to be expected that many would also hold that direct sterilization could also be justified, at least as a last resort. Many did. Aware of this, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith repeated the absolute condemnation of direct sterilization on March 13, 1975, in its document on sterilization in Catholic hospitals. It acknowledged the existence of widespread dissent, but denied "that this fact as such has any doctrinal significance, as though it were a theological source which the faithful might invoke, forsaking the authentic magisterium for the private opinion of theologians who dissent from it." Many theologians continue to believe that the overall good of the person can justify sterilization.

This division of opinion continues to create problems for Catholic hospitals. Tubal ligation remains a hospital procedure but is prohibited by official teaching. Sisters of Mercy of the Union, sponsors of the largest group of nonprofit hospitals in the country, finished a painstaking study in 1980 with the conclusion that tubal ligations could be allowed when they are determined by patient and physician to be essential to the overall good of the patient. The General Administrative Team came under intense pressure from the Holy See to reverse this conclusion, and eventually did so rather than forfeit other valuable aspects of their ministry. The practice of Catholic hospitals remains uneven with regard to tubal ligation. Some permit it for grave reasons; other tolerate it as a form of material cooperation; others forbid it. See also bioethics; medical ethics.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

sticharion (stih-kah'ree-ahn), Byzantine-rite liturgical vestment. The term is used for the alb or undertunic worn by priests and bishops, as well as for the deacon's outer garment or dalmatic. See also alb; dalmatic.

stigmata (stig-mah'tuh; Lat., "marks"), bodily signs borne in commemoration of Christ's Passion. The word is used by Paul in Gal 6:17, "I carry the marks of Jesus branded on my body," but in the Middle Ages referred to actual wounds corresponding to those of Christ. Although not the first to carry such marks, the most famous stigmatic was Francis of Assisi, who received wounds on his hands, feet, and side during an ecstatic experience in 1224, two years before his death. Since then, hundreds of cases of stigmata have been claimed, usually accompanied by an ecstatic experience of the Passion of Christ.

Francis of Assisi receiving the stigmata; illustration in a fifteenth-century French manuscript, Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York.

Stigmata can take many forms; they may be visible, as in the case of Francis, or invisible as in the case of Catherine of Siena (d. 1380). They may appear in different shapes and in different places on the body; they may appear only at certain times and represent all or only some of the wounds of Christ.

On very rare occasions, the Catholic Church has accepted an occurrence of stigmata as authentic, but has never defined their origin or nature, thus allowing for physical, psychological, and preternatural explanations for these phenomena.

Stigmatines, Congregation of the Sacred Stigmata (C.S.S.), a congregation of priests and brothers founded in Italy in 1816 by Gaspare Bertoni, a priest in the Verona diocese. The early rule was based on that of the Jesuits; the rule and constitutions were approved by Pope Benedict XV in 1916. They arrived in the United States in 1905, eventually settling in New York and Massachusetts. The major work of the Stigmatines is education, but they also carry on missionary work, direct summer camps, and do preaching and retreat work.

Stimmen der Zeit (shti'men dehr tzit; Ger., "Voices of the Time"), a German Jesuit journal of religion and culture. Begun in 1871 as Stimmen aus Maria-Laach, it became Stimmen der Zeit with the return of Jesuit institutions to Germany in 1914; contributors such as Erich Przywara and Karl Rahner indicate its depth and contemporaneity in addressing Catholic encounters with society and Church.

stipend, an offering (the preferred term today) given on the occasion of requesting a special remembrance in the Eucharist. It is to be distinguished from a stole fee, which is a voluntary offering on the occasion of the administration of sacraments and sacramentals other than the Eucharist. The custom originated in the offerings of bread and wine by the people at the Eucharist (mentioned already by Justin Martyr in the second century). An offering of money eventually replaced such offerings. It came to be a supplemental means for the financial support of the clergy. Canon 848 insists, however, that the poor and the needy are never to be denied access to the sacraments because of their lack of material resources. See also Mass stipend.

stipend, Mass. See Mass stipend.

S.T.L., Sacrae Theologiae Licentiatus (sive) Lector (Lat.), licentiate or instructor in Sacred Theology. This is an intermediate graduate degree conferred after the baccalaureate (S.T.B.) by a pontifical university, one under the authority of the pope.

stock, holy oil, a small vessel in use since the Middle Ages to store the three sacramental oils: oil of catechumens for prebaptismal rites, oil for Anointing of the Sick, and chrism for Baptism, Confirmation, and ordination rites. See also holy oils.

stole, a long narrow strip of fabric worn over one or both shoulders by bishops, priests, and deacons, normally under an outer garment. Its remote origins are obscure; it may be related to a kerchief or, alternatively, to a festal ceremonial garland. Its Christian use derives from rank-signifying scarves worn by Roman officials. See also vestments.

stole fee, offerings given upon the celebration of certain liturgical functions other than Mass. The term is not currently used because it gives the impression that a fee must be given for these ministrations. Canon law requires pastors to provide these services to all regardless of the ability to pay.

Stone, St. John, d. 1539, an Augustinian friar of Canterbury canonized in 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales. Arrested in 1538 during the visitation of the monasteries under Henry VIII, he was executed sometime in 1539. Feast day: December 27. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

stoup, a vessel for holding holy water. Fonts were located at the entrances to ancient churches and monasteries so that individuals could wash their hands prior to entering the church. Possibly due to medieval developments surrounding the Asperges rite (sprinkling with holy water during the opening rites of the Mass), the act of washing evolved into blessing oneself with holy water. See also asperges; holy water.

straw, liturgical, a tube that may be used in Communion to ingest the eucharistic wine. The communicant purifies the tube by sipping some water, then places the tube on the paten. The General Instruction on the Roman Missal permits drinking from the chalice directly, using a tube or spoon, or intinc-tion (n. 200). The 1970 Instruction prefers drinking from the chalice directly (n. 6). See also Communion, Holy.

Stritch, Samuel A., 1887–1958, cardinal-archbishop of Chicago (1940–58). After service in Memphis and his native Nashville, he was made bishop to Toledo in 1921. In 1930 he became archbishop of Milwaukee, where his term of office coincided with the Great Depression. In 1940 he was appointed archbishop of Chicago and was created a cardinal in 1946. A bookish man, Stritch was a conservative and genial prelate, known as the "bishop of charity" and the "bishop who never said no." Under his tolerant policies, priests were often given ample leeway to pursue innovative approaches to racial justice, urban affairs, Christian education, and family life. He died in Rome on May 26, 1958, soon after assuming the Vatican post of Pro-Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.

Studites, a federation of Byzantine Orthodox monasteries founded in Constantinople under the leadership of Theodore of Studios (759–826) that flourished and dominated Orthodox monasticism from the ninth to the thirteenth centuries. The liturgical synthesis of Palestinian and Constantinopolitan monastic usages the Studite monks created was an important phase in the formation of the Byzantine rite. The name "Studite" is also used by a congregation of Ukrainian Catholic monks formed by a group of peasants in 1900 and developed under the direction of Andryj Sheptytskyj, metropolitan of Lviv, who remained their archimandrite or general superior, though he confided them to the care of his brother, the Studite hegumen (abbot) Klimentij, in 1915. They numbered 225 when dispersed after World War II, and have emerged again since 1990 in the new religious freedom in Ukraine.

Stuhlmueller, Carroll, 1923–94, biblical scholar. A member of the Congregation of the Passion since 1943, he was professor of Old Testament studies at Catholic Theological Union in Chicago and the only male member of the steering committee of the Women's Ordination Conference. A past president of the Catholic Biblical Association, he served as general editor of The Bible Today, as editor of Old Testament Message, a twenty-three-volume international commentary series, and on the editorial boards of the Journal of Biblical Literature and the Catholic Biblical Quarterly. He was the author of twenty-three books and many scholarly and popular articles on the Bible.

stylite (Gk.,"pillar"), a solitary monk who lived on a platform on top of a pillar. The pillars were of varying heights, and sometimes the platforms were covered to form a small hut. Disciples would bring the stylite food. Stylites were especially common in Syria and Egypt between the fifth and tenth centuries. Simeon Stylites (d. 459) is regarded as the founder of the practice. See also Simeon Stylites, St.

Suárez, Francisco de, 1548–1617, Spanish Jesuit philosopher and theologian. Suárez was the foremost representative of the Jesuit tradition in philosophy and theology as it took shape in the golden age of Spain and Portugal. His philosophical doctrine, broadly Aristotelian-Thomist, yet incorporating many Scotist and nominalist elements, has had a major influence on modern metaphysical thought. His Disputationes Metaphysicae (1597) was the first modern systematic treatise in metaphysics. In theology, Suárez was a major systematizer of the Jesuit position, first developed by Luis de Molina, in the De Auxiliis controversy about free will and grace. An original political and legal theorist, Suárez explored the nature of civil society and the relationship between civil authority and the Church in his Defensio Fidei Catholicae and De Legibus, rejecting divine right theories of kingship. With his ideas of the natural community of nations and the law of peoples, Suárez was one of the founders of international law. See also De Auxiliis; Molinism.

subdeacon, until recent times in the Western Church, the first of the major orders. With the reception of this order, one was entrusted with certain functions in the solemn liturgy and undertook the obligations of praying the Liturgy of the Hours (Divine Office, breviary) and of observing clerical celibacy. The earliest evidence for the subdeacon, as liturgical assistant to the deacon, comes from the third century. In the thirteenth century the subdiaconate came to be regarded as the first of the major orders, though held only in transition to diaconate and priesthood and not regarded as part of Holy Orders. In 1972 Pope Paul VI abrogated the order of subdeacon in the Roman Catholic Church. The liturgical functions of the subdeacon were transferred to the lay ministries, reserved to men, of reader and acolyte. The function of subdeacon continues to exist in Eastern-rite Catholic churches. See also deacon; major orders.

submersion, an ancient method of baptism whereby the whole body is plunged under water three times. With time, the more common form of baptism became the pouring of water over the head. The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) has revived an appreciation of submersion. Churches are encouraged to consider the construction of baptismal fonts suitable for this practice. See also Baptism.

subordinationism, an understanding of God in which the Son is made inferior in status to the Father and in which the Holy Spirit is made inferior in status to both the Father and the Son. This understanding of God sought to ensure a monotheistic expression of Christian belief by limiting divinity to the Father alone. The writings of such esteemed authors of the first three centuries as Hermas, Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen contained elements of subordinationism. The councils of Nicaea (325) and of Constantinople (381) condemned the subordinationist teachings associated with the Alexandrian priest Arius. See also God; Trinity, doctrine of the.

subsidiarity, principle of, a modern Catholic social teaching, first articulated by Pope Pius XI in Quadragesimo Anno (1931), that the best institutions for responding to a particular social task are those that are most proximate to it. Properly understood, subsidiarity cuts in two directions. First of all, it carries a presumption against direct involvement by large-scale institutions. The role of large-scale institutions is to support, not replace, the smaller ones. The root meaning of the Latin word subsidium is "support." Larger institutions have difficulty discerning and responding to the unique textures of human life. If they usurp the prerogative of the smaller, more intimate institutions, the result can be the opposite of what was intended. Second, subsidiarity affirms that the role of larger institutions in the form of support is positive and necessary.

The words of Quadragesimo Anno are direct: "It is an injustice and at the same time a grave evil and a disturbance of right order to transfer to the larger and higher collectivity functions which can be performed and provided for by lesser and subordinate bodies. Inasmuch as every social activity should, by its very nature, prove a help to its members of the body social, it should never destroy or absorb them" (n. 79).

The two dimensions of subsidiarity are evident in the treatment of private property. While one has the right to private property, if it is not used for the common good, then the state can intervene and even expropriate the property. See also Catholic social teachings; common good. TODD D. WHITMORE subsistence theory, an explanation of the hypostatic union that holds that the human nature of Jesus Christ, substantially complete in itself, did not exist on its own but existed ("subsisted") out of its union with the divine Logos. This theory is meant to safeguard the total unity of the humanity and the divinity of Jesus Christ. See also hypostatic union; Jesus Christ.

subsistent relations, the idea that divine Persons (constituted by their relations) are identical to the divine substance. According to the trinitarian doctrine of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), everything in God is identical with the divine essence or nature. God's wisdom, for example, is not predicated of any of the divine Persons in particular, but of the divine essence. At the same time, each of the divine Persons possesses this wisdom because of the inseparability of person and nature.

Relation is the fundamental category of trinitarian doctrine. Relations are said to be either logical or real; a logical relation is one that does not constitute the reality of something (for example, one's relation to one's desk), whereas a real relation is constitutive of the essence of something (for example, creation would not exist at all or be what it is except for God's agency to create). In God there are no accidents, thus there are no logical, only real, relations. Further, in God, real relations result from an activity immanent in God.

There are four real relations in God: Begetter to Begotten (Father to Son), Begotten to Begetter (Son to Father), Spirator to Spirated (Father and Son to Spirit), Spirated to Spirator (Spirit to Father and Son). Only three of these relations are person-constituting: Begetting, Being Begotten, and Being Spirated. The three divine Persons "subsist," that is, they exist as what they are, because of their relations to another. In a sense there are no discrete "persons" who have relationships to other persons, rather, to be a divine Person is to be a relation. Relations in God, paternity, filiation, and spiration, are thus not accidental but are as real as the divine nature itself and, while distinct, are inseparable from the divine nature. See also Persons, divine; Trinity, doctrine of the. CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA substance, a philosophical concept derived from Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) that describes pure existence independently of the changeable "accidents" inhering to it. The categories of substance and accidents are traditionally used to describe the transformation of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. This is the doctrine of transubstantiation, which speaks of the Real Presence in such a way as to explain why we do not taste flesh or blood when we consume the Eucharist. The whole substance of the bread and wine is replaced with the substance of the body and blood of Christ; the accidents (the outward appearance of the bread and wine perceptible to our senses) remain unchanged. See also accident; transubstantiation.

substitution of Christ, a theory of atonement derived from the ancient Israelite practice on the Day of Atonement of burdening a goat with the sins of the people and then releasing it into the desert (Lev 16:20–22), where it would perish. In this view, Jesus Christ assumed responsibility for the sin and guilt of all human beings and endured God's punishment in our place, thereby reconciling humankind with God. This theory relies on disputed interpretations of Luke 22:27b and Mark 10:45. See also atonement, biblical view of; imputation; Jesus Christ; redemption.

Suenens, Leo Josef (soo'nenz), b. 1904, former cardinal-archbishop of Malines-Brussels and one of the leading figures at the Second Vatican Council. Ordained a priest in 1927, he was made bishop in 1945, archbishop and primate of Belgium in 1961–1979, and cardinal in 1962. He served as a moderator of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and received the Templeton Foundation Prize in 1976. Former vice-rector of the University of Louvain 1940–45, he is the author of many books, including Coresponsibility in the Church (1968). He became active in the Catholic charismatic movement after the council and wrote frequently on it, including A New Pentecost? (1974).

Cardinal Leo Josef Suenens, Belgian cardinal-archbishop who was one of the leading figures at the Second Vatican Council (1962-65); he placed particular emphasis on the active role of the Church in the modern world.

suffering, a painful and often mysterious aspect of human life, embraced by Jesus Christ. Before his own Passion, Jesus closely associated himself with those who suffer by befriending, defending, and healing them. Jesus also said, in reference to the hungry, thirsty, sick, and imprisoned, that whatever one did for these, one did for him (Matt 25:31–46).

The types and causes of suffering are manifold. Suffering can be emotional, physical, spiritual, or mental. Some suffering is freely chosen as a form of self-discipline or as a necessary component of serving others. Other suffering is caused by human errors and sins. On occasion, however, people endure tragedies that have no apparent cause or purpose. Only by faith can such people believe that "all things work together for good for those who love God" and nothing "will be able to separate us from the love of God" (Rom 8:28, 39).

Catholic social teaching emphasizes the need to serve the suffering as Christ served them, and to serve them with the same devotion one would serve Christ. In the Catholic spiritual tradition, those who suffer can draw consolation by uniting themselves with Christ, uniting their current suffering with Christ's redemptive suffering. See also redemption.

sufficient grace. See grace.

suffragan, a diocesan bishop considered in relationship to the archbishop of his ecclesiastical province. The term is not widely used; the Western Church does not put a great deal of emphasis on the role of the bishops in the province vis-à-vis the metropolitan archbishop.

Suger, Abbot (soo'zhay), ca. 1080–1151, abbot of the monastery of St.-Denis, near Paris, and an important adviser of King Louis VII. The new church he built for St.-Denis was the first great example of Gothic architecture. See also Gothic style.

Sulpicians, a community of diocesan priests on leave from their dioceses to teach in seminaries. The Society of St. Sulpice, one of the Church's smallest communities of priests, originated in 1641 when Jean Jacques Olier assembled a small group of clergymen dedicated to the religious formation of aspirants to the priesthood. Within a short time the community of priests who were attached to the church of St. Sulpice in Paris and to its nascent seminary were known as Sulpicians. They became identified with the revival of parish life, reform of seminary education, and the revitalization of spirituality of the priests. The Sulpician system entailed a rigid schedule of prayer, spiritual conferences, and study. Each Sulpician was an educator as well as a spiritual director.

Olier sent Sulpicians to the Canadian settlements of New France in 1657, but it was not until 1790, during the period of the French Revolution, that fear for their survival led them to enter negotiations with Bishop John Carroll to establish a seminary in the United States. Arriving in Baltimore in the summer of 1791, four Sulpicians and five seminarians founded the first American seminary, just two years after establishment of the first diocese in the new republic.

In addition to St. Mary's Seminary, the Sulpicians founded St. Mary's College for lay students, assumed ownership of Mount St. Mary Seminary and College until 1826, and became missionaries in the West and South.

From the origins in 1791 to the closing of St. Mary's College in 1852, when they opened St. Charles minor seminary, thirty-five Sulpicians served the Church in the United States, ten of whom became bishops and archbishops. They opened seminaries in Boston (1884), New York (1896), and San Francisco (1898). Seminaries were also opened in Seattle, Hawaii, Detroit, and Louisville, but in recent years a decrease in vocations led to the closing of many Sulpician seminaries; St. Mary's in Baltimore and St. Patrick's in San Francisco (Menlo Park) are the two remaining Sulpician seminaries. The Sulpician Seminary in Washington, D.C., is now Theological College, a residence for seminaries under the spiritual direction of the Sulpicians. A few Sulpicians serve in seminaries in Zambia.

In 1992 there were ninety-two Sulpicians in the American province. Though always a small community, the Sulpicians have had a significant influence in the U.S. Catholic Church. See also Olier, Jean-Jacques.

CHRISTOPHER J. KAUFFMAN

Sulpicius Severus, ca. 360–ca. 420, historian and ascetic known chiefly for his biography of Martin of Tours (d. 397), which exerted wide influence in the burgeoning Western monastic movement. His Chronicle, or history from creation to 400, offers important evidence regarding Gallic Arianism and the condemnation of Priscillian, a Spanish layman who was associated with ideas at odds with the official teachings of the Church. See also Martin of Tours, St., Priscillianism.

Summa Contra Gentiles (Lat., "Summa [Synthesis] Against the Pagans"; the more correct title is The Truth of the Catholic Faith Against the Errors of Unbelievers), a selective synthesis of Catholic theology written by Thomas Aquinas between 1259 and 1264, possibly for Dominican missionaries to Muslims but more likely for Christians to help present their faith to infidels or to argue against "paganizing" philosophers. A work of theology, not apologetics, its first three books examine God, creation, and the human return to God, employing reason without recourse to Scripture or the Fathers; these, however, are used abundantly in the fourth book where Aquinas explores the Trinity, the Incarnation, sacraments, and eschatology—mysteries of faith inaccessible to unaided human reason. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas; Summa Theologiae.

Summa Theologiae (Lat., "Summa [Synthesis] of Theology"), Thomas Aquinas's most important systematic work in theology, written at Rome and Paris for "beginners," that is, for Dominican students trained in philosophy and studying Scripture concurrently with systematic theology. The Summa Theologiae therefore presupposes a reader's competence in biblical theology and Scholastic philosophy. Having begun in 1266 to revise his Scriptum Super Sententiis, Aquinas decided that the "order of doctrine" or "order of teaching" for students required a different plan and method from those of a commentary on Lombard's textbook, the Sententiae ("Sentences"). He also wanted a more solid doctrinal base for the predominantly moral-pastoral training being given to Dominican students. It is uncertain whether he actually taught the sections of the Summa that he wrote in Rome; it is known that he never taught the other parts.

The work has three parts. The first part, written in Italy (1266–68), examines God, the procession of creatures from God, and some aspects of the creature's return to God; the second part deals with the return to God of human beings insofar as they are images of God; it itself is divided into two parts (the first, Paris, 1268–70; the second, Paris, 1270–71); the third part (1271/72–73) presents Christ and his sacraments as the Way of creaturely return to God (we come from God in birth and return after death): incomplete, it breaks off within the study of the sacrament of Penance.

The supplementum—texts from his earlier Scriptum arranged by Thomas's disciples after the pattern of the Summa so as to complete the work—is not authentic and should not be attributed to Aquinas, especially since he later changed some positions he had held in the Scriptum.

The Summa Theologiae is not, as are later theologies, a series of treatises, tracts, or theses to be proved, but rather it is an organic whole in which the different questions or parts must be read with reference to the whole. It is a grave error in reading this or any medieval summa to presume one has the whole doctrine by isolating a few articles or questions while disregarding the relationship and complementarity of many other questions or parts. This is particularly true of the Summa Theologiae concerning Christ: all that is said in the first and second parts must be seen in relation to Christ, who in our history provides the only access to God and to the Trinity's personal saving work through justification, missions, indwelling, and gracious guidance to beatitude. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas. WALTER PRINCIPE

Summi Pontificatus (soo' mee pahn-ti-fi-kah' toos; Lat., "great pontificate"), the first encyclical of Pius XII, issued October 20, 1939, on the threshold of the Second World War. It presents a Christian vision of a harmonious human society.

Sunday, the first day of the week. Originally named to honor the Sun (or solar deity), Sunday was chosen later by Christians as the day for weekly worship in honor of Christ's Resurrection. In the Jewish system, days were simply numbered ("first day," "second day," etc.); only the final day of the week was honored with a specific title ("Sabbath") and preceded by a "preparation day" (Friday). As a day of rest and (eventually) liturgical assembly, the Sabbath established the precedent and pattern for a weekly day of worship. The earliest Christians (at least those of Jewish origin) probably continued to observe the Sabbath as their day of rest and worship.

At a very early period, however, Christians began emphasizing the connection between Sunday, the "first day of the week," and Jesus' Resurrection (see Mark 16:2). So prominent did the Resurrection motif become that by the end of the first century, Sunday was known simply as "the Lord's day" (Rev 1:10). There is evidence that in some first-century Christian communities Sunday (evening) was already being singled out as a particularly appropriate time for communal worship and "the breaking of bread" (see Acts 20:7, possibly 1 Cor 16:2). Still, the NT offers no conclusive proof that Christians considered Sunday a day of rest, or that they chose it as an exclusive day for worship (a replacement for the Jewish Sabbath), or that they held eucharistic meals on Sunday only. The earliest Christians may simply have viewed Sunday as primus inter pares (Lat., "first among equals") because it memorialized the Lord's Resurrection.

By the mid-second century, however, Sunday had clearly become the preferred day for weekly Christian assembly and Eucharist. Describing practices in Rome (ca. 150), Justin Martyr noted that every Sunday a common assembly was held, the "apostles or prophets were read," the presider offered instruction, prayers were said, and bread and wine were blessed with thanksgiving, then distributed to the faithful (First Apology 67). The pattern for Sunday as a day of Eucharist was thus set.

Meanwhile, the connection between Sunday and Christ's Resurrection was ever more strongly stressed. Christian teachers like Clement of Alexandria (ca. 150–215) spoke of Sunday as the "eighth day," that is, the eschatological fulfillment of that "first day" who is really Christ, the Dawn of a new creation and the Light of the world. Increasingly, the resurrectional character of Sunday was seen as incompatible with labor, penitential fasting or kneeling. In 321, Constantine decreed abstention from work and legal matters on Sunday. Similarly, the first ecumenical council of Nicaea (325) forbade kneeling on Sunday and during the fifty days of Eastertide.

From the sixth century onward, the obligation to attend Mass on Sunday became the object of increasingly strict ecclesiastical legislation. Catholics are still bound to it according to the 1983 Code of Canon Law (can. 1246), which notes that the Lord's day, on which the Paschal Mystery is celebrated, is to be observed everywhere as the primary holy day of obligation. See also Easter. NATHAN D. MITCHELL Sunday observance, practices used to mark the Lord's day among Christians. Early Christian practice observed Sunday to mark the day of the Lord's Resurrection. Today Church law requires that Catholics participate in the celebration of the Eucharist on Sunday or on Saturday evening. Although the liturgical observance of Sundays and greater feasts had for centuries started with the celebration of First Vespers the evening before, it was only with the 1983 code of canon law that the fulfilling of the Sunday obligation on Saturday evening was universally permitted. The custom of starting the Sabbath on the evening prior is of course reminiscent of the Jewish practice of starting the Sabbath on Friday evening. In addition, Catholics are to refrain from unnecessary work on Sunday. See also Sunday.

supererogation, works of, actions which exceed the demands of morality. Catholic moral theology, like other theories of morality that give a central place to a conception of a moral law, recognizes a category of praiseworthy actions that exceed the minimal demands of morality. These sorts of actions are described as supererogatory. Within the Catholic context, discussion of acts of supererogation tends to focus on the so-called evangelical counsels, but not all supererogatory actions are of this sort; for example, the heroic action of a woman who saves a child by throwing it out of the path of a truck, knowingly sacrificing herself in the process, would also be a work of supererogation. See also counsels, evangelical.

superior, official with authority and responsibility. The term is used for an official at the parish, diocesan, or universal level. Within a religious institute or society of apostolic life a superior may have authority on the local, provincial (regional), or general level. A superior has personal authority, but at times must obtain the advice or consent of a council.

superior general, the highest official in an institute of consecrated life or society of apostolic life. The superior general, assisted by a council that gives advice and consent on given matters, has authority over all the provinces, houses, and individuals in the institute. Particular law determines the term of office, manner of selection, and particular areas of authority. The title is not used by every religious community or society of apostolic life.

supernatural, that which pertains to whatever absolutely exceeds the power and capacity of human nature and any created natural reality, apart from the grace of God. In Christian theology the supernatural is the divine plan for the human race beyond its biological and psychological resources. What Jesus called "the reign of God" and what the Pauline author of the Letter to the Ephesians described as God's mysterious "plan," theologians express as a level of being or a horizon of consciousness that is above the natures, powers, and claims of creation. With roots in the NT and the writings of theologians of the fourth and fifth centuries, the dialectic between the natural and the supernatural in the human person reaches in the writings of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) a theology that emphasizes both distinction and harmony in the interplay of nature and grace. The Enlightenment, idealism, science, and some Protestant theologies have sought to reduce the supernatural to the natural or to meld the two into one reality, thereby denying the supernatural (against which the papal anti-Modernist documents protested). Some authors drew all powers and energies, human and divine, into one system, realizing in human history God's unfolding life (Schelling); others asserted that the scientifically formed individual would no longer believe in any supernatural intervention of God but would find in Christianity an existential psychology drawn from religious narratives, or myths (Bultmann). Catholic theologians such as Henri de Lubac (d. 1991) and Karl Rahner (d. 1984) criticized the widespread mentality in Catholicism in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries that conceived of "two layers" in reality: the natural and the supernatural. Drawing on medieval and patristic sources, theologians at Vatican II (1962–65) emphasized the variety of God's (supernatural) presence in the world, the notion of revelation in history and not only in religious texts, and a divine grace which intimately touched individual lives and social movements. See also grace; nature; nature and grace. THOMAS F. O'MEARA superstition, a morbid or submissive attitude toward objects or processes of nature, an exaggerated belief in luck, or any irrational attitude toward nature or the mysterious, which is subversive of true religion. Superstition may involve worship of an object other than God, which is a form of idolatry. More common among religious persons is a disordered attachment to particular rituals or persons in the context of worship of God. Such attachments usually do not involve any irreverence to God, but reveal the frailty of the human spirit.

Surplice

supreme moderator. See superior general.

surplice, originally a wide-sleeved white linen alb-like vestment adopted in northern countries for wear over fur-lined cassocks in the twelfth century. It became the lower clergy's distinctive dress outside of Mass. Later it became a waist-length, lace-decorated vestment worn over the cassock. Today the alb is considered the appropriate vesture for liturgical ministers. See also vestments.

Susanna, St., reputedly a virgin martyred in Rome during the third century. Her existence is based on the primitive Hieronymian Martyrology, which contained the notice: "In Rome, at 'Two Houses' beside the baths of Diocletian, the birthday of St. Susanna." The ambiguity of the notice has given rise to many legends. Feast day: August 11.

Suso, Bl. Henry, See Henry Suso, Bl.

suspension, penalty imposed on clerics that restricts the exercise of ministry. The penalty might totally restrict a cleric's ministry or might prohibit a cleric from a specific act or acts of ministry. In some cases, canon law automatically suspends a cleric for the commission of an ecclesiastical crime. A suspension can be imposed by a competent Church authority with a published declaration that a certain act has been committed and that this act carries with it a certain penalty. In other cases, a suspension is imposed through the sentencing of a Church court. In these cases, the commission of an unlawful act must be proven and the punishment decided by the court. In still other cases, suspension can be a punishment for violation of a penal precept, a decree given by a legitimate authority to which a penalty is attached for noncompliance. In such a case the competent superior gives a command under the pain of suspension. If the command has been violated, the punishment of suspension may then be inflicted.

As with all ecclesiastical penalties, laws are to be interpreted strictly. In addition, many factors can diminish an individual's imputability for personal actions and thus lead to a decision that a person has not been guilty of violating the law and is not subject to the penalty of suspension. See also penal law.

Swiss Guard, soldiers in the employ of the Vatican as a small security force for the papal palace and the person of the pope. Originally recruited from Switzerland as mercenaries in the service of the papacy in the early sixteenth century, these soldiers are still recruited from Switzerland today. Their colorful uniform of red, yellow, and dark blue, originally designed by Michelangelo (d. 1564), is one of the best-known features of Vatican life today. New recruits to the corps must be Swiss, Catholic, unmarried, and under twenty-five years of age. See also Michelangelo; Noble Guards.

Swithbert, St., 647–ca. 713, Anglo-Saxon bishop, scholar, and missionary in the Netherlands. Feast day: March 1.

The Swiss Guard, composed of about one hundred Swiss men serving as military guards of the pope and the papal palace; the uniforms were designed by Michelangelo.

Switzerland, Catholicism in. The Christian faith came to the area now known as Switzerland in the fourth century. By the late fifth century, bishops were seated in Geneva and Chur, and the monasteries of Romainmotier and Saint-Maurice were established. The pagan Alamanni repressed Christianity in central Switzerland from the sixth through the ninth centuries. Throughout the Middle Ages, religious foundations were begun by the Cistercians, Franciscans, and Dominicans. Beginning with the Reformation, Catholics lived in tension with the followers of Ulrich Zwingli (d.1531) and John Calvin (d. 1564) until the twentieth century. There are six Swiss dioceses that, lacking a metropolitan see, are directly responsible to the Holy See. In April 1991, Pope John Paul II met with the Swiss bishops to discuss pastoral issues, including Rome's controversial appointment of the bishop of Chur. In 1994 Catholics made up nearly half of the nation's approximately seven million people. See also Reformation, the.

Syllabus of Errors, document containing eighty previously condemned theses, attached to Pope Pius IX's encyclical Quanta Cura, of December 8, 1864. The Syllabus itself was never signed by the pope. The origin of the document can be traced to 1849 when the Provincial Council of Spoleto requested that the pope draw up a list of new errors threatening the Church. The final form of the Syllabus contained eighty condemned theses and was modeled on a similar list of eighty-five errors found in an 1860 pastoral instruction of Bishop Gerbet of Perpignan. The condemned propositions coalesced around three themes. A number of the propositions were concerned with Pantheism and naturalism, either the attempt to identify God with the world or to exclude God from it. A second theme concerned the interplay between faith and reason and condemned were the various forms of rationalism that tended to identify the act of faith with the processes of human reason. A third theme directly addressed the fruits of political liberalism as they affected the civic prerogatives of the Church. In an age when the Church's possession of the Papal States and its temporal authority in general were being threatened, the Syllabus sought to preserve the legitimate autonomy of the papacy and of the Church itself with respect to its right to property, to elect bishops, to regulate the life of the faithful, and to communicate Church teaching. While the listing of many of the condemned propositions was aimed at correcting specific abuses associated with modern liberalism, the wording of these propositions was often vague and led to misunderstandings and abuse. The document must be read now in light of its original political context and of twentieth-century developments in the Catholic Church's teaching on religious freedom and Church/state relations as articulated at the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also Pius IX.

RICHARD R. GAILLARDETZ

Sylvester I, St., pope from 314 to 335. An important figure in the period after the Peace of Constantine, he had representatives at the First Ecumenical Council, Nicaea, in 325 and oversaw the building of St. Peter's Basilica as well as of St. John Lateran. The claim that he received lands from Constantine (the "Donation") in thanksgiving for a miracle has no factual basis. Feast day: December 31.

Sylvester II [Gerbert of Aurillac], 940–1003, scholar and pope from 999 to 1003. After being a student and master at Reims (and, briefly, abbot of Bobbio), Gerbert became archbishop of Reims in 991 in a disputed election. Under imperial patronage, he was elected archbishop of Ravenna in 998 and pope in 999. Several of his letters and mathematical and logical treatises survive.

symbol, something through which something other than itself is incarnated and encountered. A symbol runs deeper than a mere sign, which arbitrarily points to some other thing extrinsic to itself. A symbol in various ways embodies and mediates the other, as does a dream the subconscious or an artifact a vision of life. Such symbols are of different kinds: they may be concrete things, linguistic concepts, or ritual actions. Symbols are multivalent; they open up different meanings that cannot finally be circumscribed. Symbols are also realistic; they bear the reality poured into them; they often communicate what can be reached in no other way. Religious symbols embody transcendent reality.

Because of these various qualities, the category of symbol is particularly relevant to theology and commonly used in its subdisciplines. Some theologians understand revelation as having a symbolic structure: God is always encountered as mediated through things of this world. Faith as a human response expresses itself in objective beliefs such as the creeds, traditionally referred to as symbols of faith. Jesus is the Christ because he mediates God. Sacrament is a subspecies of symbol. The Church, as the sacrament of Christ, mediates God through Christ symbolically. The concept of symbol is as important in Catholic theology today as the idea of analogy was in the Middle Ages. See also analogy; mystery; sacrament.

Symmachus, St. (sim'uh-kuhs), d. 514, pope from 498 to 514. His first years were troubled by schism when the pro-Byzantine party of his predecessor, Anastasius II, elected a rival, Lawrence. With this behind him after ca. 504, Symmachus rejected Zeno's Henoticon, expelled the Manichees from Rome, protected African Catholics persecuted by Arian rulers, confirmed the primacy of Arles over Spain and Gaul, and introduced the singing of the Gloria on Sundays. Feast day: July 19. See also Henoticon; Manichaeism.

synagogue (Gk., "assembly"), a Jewish gathering place for prayer and religious instruction or the congregation assembled in it. Although their origins are unclear, synagogues certainly existed by the first century A.D., when they are attested in the NT and in Jewish sources (Philo, Josephus, inscriptions). Synagogues are found both in the land of Israel and in the Greek Diaspora.

Jesus is portrayed as teaching in synagogues (Matt 4:23; 9:35; 13:54; Mark 1:21; 3:1; Luke 4:15–16; 6:6; John 6:59). Paul, too, is said to have preached in Jewish synagogues in his missionary activity (Acts 13:5, 14; 14:1; 17:1, 17; 18:4). See also Church.

synaxis (sin-ak'sis; Gk., "assembly" or "congregation"), the gathering of the Christian community for public prayer or liturgical celebration. In the early Western Church, it referred to noneucharistic services, while in the Eastern Church it was used for the eucharistic assembly. Since Vatican II (1962–65) official documents have adopted the latter usage.

syncretism, the mixing of elements from different religious traditions. Gnosticism combined Jewish, Christian, Zoroastrian, and Platonic elements without achieving any stable synthesis. Catholicism has been accused by Protestants of syncretistic distortions of the pure gospel in its efforts to inculturate the gospel, e.g., different liturgical rites or the veneration of Mary.

synderesis, habitual knowledge of the first principle of practical reasoning. (The word is a corruption of the Greek word for "conscience".) According to Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), rational reflection, whether speculative or practical, proceeds from first principles that are naturally known, specifically, the principle of noncontradiction in speculative matters, and the principle that good is to be done and evil is to be avoided in practical matters; knowledge of the latter is called synderesis. As such, it is the foundation of all moral reflection, even though the first principle of practical reason should not be understood as applying to moral good and evil alone, but to any sort of goodness or noxiousness. See also conscience.

Synod of Bishops, World, a consultative assembly drawn from the whole Catholic episcopate to discuss matters of concern to the Church universal and to provide opportunities of collaboration between the bishops of the world and the Bishop of Rome. Chartered by Pope Paul VI on September 15, 1965, in the document Apostolica Sollicitudo (Lat., "Apostolic Solicitude"), the synod was originally mandated by the Second Vatican Council's Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church (n. 5). The pope serves as its president, determines its agenda, and can grant it deliberative power, if he so chooses. Although the synod only meets every few years at the call of the pope, it is a permanent body, with a permanent general secretariat presided over by a general secretary appointed by the pope, and with the assistance of a council of bishops. The Code of Canon Law treats of the synod's structure, responsibilities, and powers in canons 342–48.

The synods, in ordinary and extraordinary sessions alike, have addressed a variety of topics, including the unfinished business of the council (1967), collegiality and the relationship of episcopal conferences to the Holy See (1969), priesthood and justice (1971), evangelization (1974), catechesis (1977), the Christian family (1980), Penance and Reconciliation (1983), the Second Vatican Council (1985), the laity (1987), priestly formation (1990), and religious life (1994). See also synods.

synods, gatherings of Church leaders to decide or advise on matters touching the life of the Church. A synod can also be a gathering of bishops of a country, a region, or a church organized on the basis of rite, e.g., Byzantine or Maronite. After Vatican II (1962–65) Pope Paul VI established the Synod of Bishops. Drawn from the worldwide episcopate, a group of bishops, some elected by fellow members of their conference, some appointed by Rome, gather to advise the pope on matters of current importance to the Church. Before such a synod, lineamenta, or discussion topics, are mooted; the preparation for the synod, therefore, can involve the wider Church. Topics covered by synods have included: the family, ordained ministry, the effects of Vatican II, the laity, and the religious life.

Yet another type of synod is found on the level of the local church. Diocesan synods are to involve certain leaders within each diocese, clerical, religious, and lay. They are to offer the bishop advice. The current code of canon law does not require the celebration of the diocesan synod but allows it. Some dioceses have used it in such a way as to involve a wide number of Christians in the process of renewal in the local church. See also collegiality; council.

synoptic Gospels, problem of, the issue of accounting for the similarities and differences among the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. The first three Gospels share much of the same traditional material about Jesus and recount the events of his life in much the same general sequence. Important differences are also apparent. Matthew and Luke, for example, contain more of Jesus' teaching than does Mark. The content of that teaching is the same in many details, but the order of its presentation varies. Matthew and Luke also have accounts of the birth of Jesus, but these are quite different.

Numerous theories have attempted to account for these similarities and differences. Some scholars have argued that the Gospels rely on different forms of oral tradition. Most assume that there is a literary relationship between the Gospels and that one or more used the others as sources. Some theories also incorporate data external to the Gospels, particularly the testimony of Papias (in Eusebius Ecclesiastical History 3.39.16) that Matthew composed a collection of sayings of Jesus in Aramaic that others translated. Augustine (d. 430) held that the canonical order was the order of composition: Matthew was indeed first; the account was abbreviated by Mark, then expanded by Luke. In the eighteenth century J. J. Griesbach (1745–1812) proposed a theory that has recently been revived, that Matthew wrote first, that Luke used and expanded his work, and that Mark wrote an epitome or conflation of the other two. This theory is known as the Griesbach or Two-Gospel Hypothesis.

The most widely held contemporary theory is based upon arguments developed in the nineteenth century that Mark was the first Gospel to have been written. Matthew and Luke independently used Mark for their narrative framework. Into that framework they inserted teachings of Jesus derived from a collection of sayings that scholars have labelled Q, from the German word for "source" (Quelle). Luke is thought to have preserved more faithfully the original order of Q, while Matthew often better preserves the original wording. Both also had access to special traditions. These are often designated M for the Matthean special material and L for the Lucan. There is considerable debate about whether such sources were oral or written. This general theory is known as the Two-Source Hypothesis or the theory of Marcan Priority. Numerous other more complicated theories have also been developed.

The synoptic problem played a role in the Catholic controversies about biblical scholarship that took place in the early part of the twentieth century. At one time (1911–12) the Pontifical Biblical Commission decreed that Catholic scholars should defend the priority of Matthew. That restriction has long since been lifted and Catholic scholars now may be found defending all the major alternative theories.

See also apocryphal Gospels; gospel; infancy Gospels; Luke, St.; Mark, St.; Matthew, St. HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

Syriac, a northwest Semitic language evolved from the Aramaic dialect of Edessa and Osrhoene, the traditional ancient liturgical language of the Chaldean, West Syrian, and Maronite rites, and, until after Vatican II (1962–65), of the Syro-Malabar and Syro-Malankara rites as well. Beginning in the second and third centuries it became the medium of a brilliant and flourishing Christian literature. With the breakup of Syriac Christianity into the Nestorian (East Syrian) and Jacobite (West Syrian) churches, Syriac evolved two variants, Eastern and Western, differing chiefly in alphabet and pronunciation. Modern dialects of Syriac are still spoken among the Syriac Christians of Iraq, Iran, Turkey, the Caucasus, and in the United States, including large communities in Detroit, Chicago, Los Angeles, and San Francisco.

Syrian Catholic Church, the ecclesiastical community of Syro-Antiochene, or West Syrian–rite, Catholics who are in communion with Rome and who are principally located in Syria, Iraq, and Lebanon. It is the Catholic counterpart of the Syrian Orthodox ("Jacobite") Church which, not having accepted the teaching of the Council of Chalcedon (451) that in Christ there are two natures, one human and one divine, has not been in full communion with the Catholic Church since that time.

During the Crusades there were many examples of warm relationships between Catholic and Syrian Orthodox bishops. Some Syrian bishops seemed favorable to union with Rome, but no lasting results were achieved. Similarly, a Decree of Union between Syrian Orthodox and Rome at the Council of Florence (1439) did not endure.

Jesuit and Capuchin missionaries began to work among the Syrian Orthodox faithful at Aleppo in 1626. So many Syrians became Catholic that in 1662, when the patriarchate had fallen vacant, the Catholic party was able to elect one of its own, Andrew Akhidjan, as patriarch. This provoked a split in the community, and after Akhidjan's death in 1677 two opposed patriarchs were elected, an uncle and nephew, representing the two parties. But when the Catholic patriarch died in 1702, this brief line of Syrian Catholic patriarchs died out with him.

The Ottoman government supported the Eastern Orthodox against the Catholics, and throughout the eighteenth century the Catholic Syrians underwent much suffering and persecution. There were long periods when no Syrian Catholic bishops were functioning, and the community was forced underground.

In 1782 the Syrian Orthodox Holy Synod elected Metropolitan Michael Jarweh of Aleppo as patriarch. But shortly after he was enthroned, he declared himself Catholic, took refuge in Lebanon, and built the still-extant monastery of Our Lady at Sharfeh. After Jarweh there has been an unbroken succession of Syrian Catholic patriarchs.

In 1829 the Turkish government granted legal recognition to the Syrian Catholic Church, and the patriarchal residence was established at Aleppo in 1831. Catholic missionary activity resumed. Because the Christian community at Aleppo had been severely persecuted, the patriarchate was moved to Mardin (now in southern Turkey) in 1850.

Steady Syrian Catholic expansion at the expense of the Syrian Orthodox was ended by the persecutions and massacres that took place during World War I. In the early 1920s the patriarchal residence was moved to Beirut, to which many Syrian Catholics had fled.

The patriarch always takes the name Ignatius in addition to another name of his choosing. Although Syrian Catholic priests were bound to celibacy at the Synod of Sharfeh in 1888, there are now a number of married priests.

A patriarchal seminary and printing house are located at Sharfeh monastery in Lebanon. Efforts have been made to revive the "Ephremite" tradition of male religious life (after Ephraem the Syrian), and the Ephremite Sisters of Mercy were founded in 1958.

The largest concentrations of Syrian Catholics, who in total number just over 100,000, are found in Syria, Lebanon, and Iraq. Their common language is Arabic, but Syriac is still spoken in some villages in eastern Syria and northern Iraq. There are no Syrian Catholic bishops outside the Middle East. See also Antiochene rite; Chalcedon, Council of; Eastern Catholics and ecumenism; Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites; West Syrian rite. RONALD G. ROBERSON

Syrian spirituality, a spiritual tradition linked with Syria and Syriac-speaking Christians, evolving from the second to the thirteenth century. Up to the fourth century it had an emphasis on the imitation of Jesus, a commitment to virginity, and its own style of small-group monasticism. From this era the best known author was Ephraem of Syria (d. 373), biblical commentator and composer of hymns, who wrote only in Syriac. See also Ephraem the Syrian, St.

Syro-Antiochene rite, also called the West Syrian rite, the liturgical tradition of the Syrian Orthodox in the patriarchate of Antioch and in India, as well as of the West Syrian and Syro-Malankara Catholics. Though called "Antiochene," the rite is actually a synthesis of native Syriac compositions with Greek elements from the Antiochene and Jerusalem liturgies. See also Syro-Malankara Catholic Church; West Syrian rite.

Syro-Malabar Catholic Church, a Syro-Malabar-rite church deriving from the Christian community tracing its roots back to the Apostle Thomas (Thomas Christians) that the Portuguese encountered in 1498 while exploring the Malabar coast of India (now the state of Kerala). Although the Thomas Christians were then in full communion with the (Nestorian) Assyrian Church of the East, they greeted the Portuguese as fellow Christians and as representatives of the Church of Rome, whose special status they recognized despite centuries of isolation.

But the Portuguese, with the assistance of Catholic missionaries (especially Jesuits), began to impose Latin customs and rituals on the Thomas Christians. At a synod held at Diamper in 1599 under the presidency of the Portuguese archbishop of Goa, a number of such latinizations were adopted, including the appointment of Portuguese bishops, changes in the eucharistic liturgy, the use of Roman vestments, the requirement of clerical celibacy, and the setting up of the Inquisition. This provoked widespread discontent in the community and finally culminated in a decision by most of them in 1653 to break with Rome. In response, Pope Alexander VII sent Carmelite friars to Malabar to deal with the situation. By 1662 the majority of the dissidents had returned to communion with the Catholic Church.

European Carmelites served as bishops in the Syro-Malabar Church until 1896, when the Holy See established three vicariates apostolic for the Thomas Christians (Trichur, Ernakulam, and Changanacherry) under the guidance of indigenous Syro-Malabar bishops. A fourth vicariate apostolic (Kottayam) was established in 1911. In 1923 Pope Pius XI set up a full-fledged Syro-Malabar Catholic hierarchy.

This new autonomy initiated a strong revival of the church. While in 1876 there were only about 200,000 Syro-Malabar Catholics, this number had more than doubled by 1931. By 1960 there were nearly 1.5 million faithful, and by 1992 they numbered just under 3 million. Presently there are 2 metropolitan sees with equal rank at Ernakulam and Changanacherry, and nineteen other dioceses in India. Vocations to the priesthood have been very strong, and the church has over 20,000 religious women belonging to sixteen different Syro-Malabar congregations, five of pontifical right. There are major seminaries at Alwaye (interritual), Kottayam, Satna, Bangalore, and Ujjain.

In 1934 Pope Pius XI initiated a process of liturgical reform in view of a restoration of the oriental nature of the heavily latinized Syro-Malabar rite. A restored eucharistic liturgy, drawing on the original East Syrian sources, was approved by Pius XII in 1957 and introduced in 1962. Despite a reaffirmation of the main lines of the 1962 rite by the Congregation for the Oriental Churches in 1985, however, there has been strong resistance to this reform. The majority of Syro-Malabar dioceses still use a rite that in externals is hardly distinguishable from the Latin Mass.

Relations between the Syro-Malabar and Latin churches in India have often been marked by tension, particularly regarding the question of the establishment of Syro-Malabar jurisdictions in other parts of India to care for the many who have emigrated there. In 1987 the Holy See began to establish Syro-Malabar dioceses throughout India, even where Latin dioceses already exist. See also Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites; India, Catholicism in; latinization; Syro-Malabar rite; Thomas Christians. RONALD G. ROBERSON

Syro-Malabar rite, the liturgical usages of the Catholic "Thomas Christians" of Kerala in southwest India, who trace their origins to the Apostle Thomas. These Christians came under East Syrian ecclesiastical influence in the fourth century, receiving bishops from the Mesopotamian "Church of the East" and adopting their Chaldean (or Assyro-Chaldean) rite with local variants. They celebrated it in Syriac, which only the clergy understood. This apostolic church underwent Latin influence in the era of Portuguese colonization beginning in 1498, especially under Jesuit influence at the Synod of Diamper in 1599. Since the time of Pope Pius XII (1939–58), efforts, hitherto only partly successful, have been made to restore, modernize, and inculturate the Syro-Malabar liturgical traditions. Since Vatican II (1962–65), Syriac in the liturgy has been abandoned in favor of the local vernacular, Malayalam. See also Syro-Malabar Catholic Church; Thomas Christians.

Syro-Malankara Catholic Church, a Syro-Malankara-rite church that originated in the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church in India, established in the seventeenth century by Thomas Christians, evangelized by the Apostle Thomas, who rejected the latinizations imposed by Portuguese colonialists. They had subsequently established full communion with the Syrian Orthodox (Jacobite) patriarchate of Antioch.

In 1926, five Malankara Orthodox Syrian bishops opposed to the jurisdiction of the Syrian patriarch commissioned one of their own number, Mar Ivanios, to open negotiations with Rome with a view to reconciliation on the condition that their liturgy be preserved and that the bishops be allowed to retain their dioceses. Rome proposed that the bishops make a profession of faith and that their baptisms and ordinations be proven valid in each case.

In the event, only two of the five bishops accepted the new arrangement with Rome, including Mar Ivanios, who had founded the first monastic communities for men and women in the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church. These two bishops, a priest, a deacon, and a layman were received into the Catholic Church together on September 20, 1930. Later in the 1930s two more Malankara Orthodox bishops were received into communion with Rome.

This triggered a significant movement of faithful into this new Syro-Malankara Catholic Church. By 1950 there were some 65,588 faithful, in 1960 112,478, and by 1970 the community had grown to 183,490. By 1992 there were three dioceses (Trivandrum, Battery, and Tiruvalla) for nearly 300,000 faithful, all in Kerala State, India.

An interesting development in this church was the foundation of the Kurisumala Ashram in 1958. This is a monastic community based on a strict Cistercian interpretation of the Benedictine monastic rule, the observance of the Syrian liturgical tradition, and forms of asceticism in use among Hindu ascetics. It has become a spiritual center for Christians and Hindus alike. See also Eastern Catholics and Rome; Eastern churches; Eastern liturgies; Eastern rites; India, Catholicism in; latinization; Syro-Malankara rite; Thomas Christians. RONALD G. ROBERSON systematic theology, an area of Christian theology that addresses and develops the interconnectedness of mysteries and doctrines. Since Origen in the third century some theologians have sought to arrange, usually by drawing on a particular philosophy, the totality of Christian teaching in a framework that focuses upon certain organizing points and has a certain order. Although Christianity is based upon the unsystematic elements of God's plan and upon the history of Jesus of Nazareth in particular, an arrangement of teachings can and has been made on the basis of their relationship to one another and to the core of the gospel and the history of salvation. Contemporary examples are found in the Protestant theologies of Paul Tillich, Karl Barth, and Wolfhart Pannenberg and in that of the Jesuit theologian Karl Rahner (d. 1984). The term "systematic theology" can also apply to the part of theology that treats the central doctrinal and dogmatic areas of Christianity other than moral theology; indeed, prior to the 1960s Catholics called it simply "dogmatic theology." See also theology.

Syro-Malankara rite, the West Syrian rite practiced with some local variants by the Syro-Malankara churches, Orthodox and Catholic, centered in Kerala in southwest India. This rite was introduced into India after a group of Syro-Malabar Catholics abandoned Catholic unity in 1653 to escape the Jesuit domination of their Church. They eventually received bishops from the Syrian Jacobite church and adopted their rite. A group of these Christians reunited with Rome in 1930. Since Vatican II (1962–65), they have abandoned Syriac in the liturgy in favor of the local vernacular, Malayalam. See also Syro-Malankara Catholic Church.

systems, moral. See moral theology.

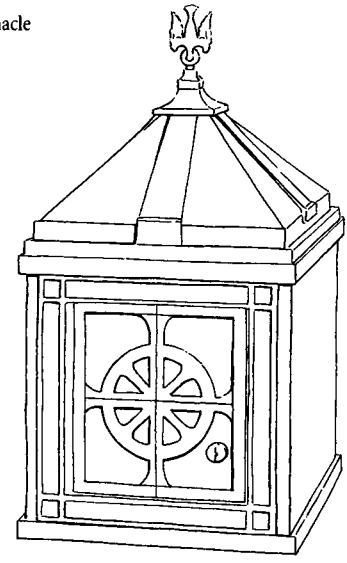
T

tabernacle (ta'buhr-nak-uhl; Lat., tabernaculum, "tent"), a container or cupboard in the church in which the eucharistic bread is reserved. The box is secured and stationary; its door is locked with a key. The tabernacle holds bread primarily for the purpose of Viaticum (Holy Communion) for the dying and secondarily for Communion outside Mass and for adoration and devotion.

From the early days of the Church, the sacrament has been reserved for the sick and dying in a variety of ways and locations. A pyx suspended over the altar, a sacristy cupboard, or a sacrament house provided reverent repose for the eucharistic bread. The sixteenth century showed a preference for reservation on the altar, but the practice was never legislated. By the nineteenth century, the custom of building the tabernacle into the high altar was legislated and all other forms were forbidden.

Reforms following Vatican II (after 1965) changed pastoral practice. Each church is to have one tabernacle, preferably located in a chapel separate and distinct from the body of the church. If a separate chapel is not possible, the tabernacle is placed in a significant location, conspicuous and conducive to prayer. Its form and design are consistent with local usage and artistic creativity. Placed on a pedestal, pillar or column, or in a recessed wall niche, the form of the tabernacle should be solid and unbreakable, dignified and appropriately ornamented, always mindful of the function of eucharistic reservation. See also Communion, Holy; Real Presence; reservation of the Eucharist.

Tabernacle



Tablet, the (London), English Catholic periodical under lay editorship. Founded in England by Frederick Lucas in 1840, it is the oldest Catholic weekly journal of opinion in the English-speaking world.

Taizé (ti̲-zay'), a religious community in France, founded by Roger Schutz (b. 1915) in 1940 to revive the tradition of monasticism in Protestantism. Now an ecumenical order whose members live under a rule dating from 1952, the community takes its name from its location, the town of Taizé in southeastern France. One of the principal works of Taizé is the fostering of unity among all Christian denominations. The celebration of the Liturgy of the Hours three times each day exemplifies both the community's grounding in monasticism and its effort to root ecumenism in a life of common prayer. The church at Taizé is called Church of the Reconciliation.

Talbot, Matt, 1856–1925, Irish layman, model for recovering alcoholics. At age twenty-eight, he underwent a conversion, took "the pledge" against further drinking, and embarked upon a life of penance and devotion, in accordance with Louis Grignion de Montfort's "True Devotion." See also alcoholism; Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de.

Tall Brothers, four Egyptian Origenist monks. John Chrysostom's reception of them after their condemnation by Theophilus of Alexandria helped bring about John's deposition in 403. See also Origenism.

Talmud (Heb., "teaching, study, learning"), a collection of Hebrew and Aramaic interpretations of the Mishnah, exposition of Scripture, rabbinic traditions, and stories. There are two Talmuds, the Palestinian and Babylonian, of which the Babylonian is more lengthy and thoroughly edited. The Babylonian Talmud is the basis for numerous commentaries and law codes and is normative for most of Judaism.

Tametsi (tahm-et'see; Lat., "nevertheless"), first word of the decree of the Council of Trent that established (in 1563) the canonical form of marriage for Catholics. Before this decree there were no canonical requirements for entering into marriage in the Roman Catholic Church, other than consent. See also marriage, form of.

Tanakh, traditional Jewish designation for the Hebrew Bible. The word is derived from the names of the three major divisions of the OT, the Torah, or Pentateuch; the Nebi'im, or Prophets, which includes both the historical books and the prophets proper; and the Kethubim, or the Writings. See also Bible.

Tanquerey, Adolf Alfred, 1854–1932, theologian and priest of the Society of St. Sulpice. He was born in France, where he taught theology and performed various priestly ministries. He also taught dogmatic and moral theology as well as canon law at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Maryland (1887–1902). Tanquerey composed manuals of dogmatic, moral, and spiritual theology that were widely used in the seminaries of France, the United States, and elsewhere. His The Spiritual Life: A Treatise on Ascetical and Mystical Theology (English trans., 1930) served seminaries and novitiates until Vatican II (1962–65) as a standard manual for spiritual theology. See also ascetical theology.

Tantum Ergo (tahn'toom air'goh; Lat., "come adore"), the opening words, and title, of a eucharistic hymn. The text is sung in Latin or English form to various melodies at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. The text is usually attributed to Thomas Aquinas (ca. 1263), who was invited by Pope Urban IV to compose the hymn for the Solemnity of the Body of Christ (Corpus Christi). The two verses cited below are actually the last verses of a longer eucharistic hymn known as the "Pange lingua [gloriosi Corporis mysterium]" ("Praise [my] tongue the mystery of [his] glorious Body"). The longer hymn is sung during eucharistic processions, especially on Corpus Christi and at the close of the Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday, when the eucharistic bread is reposed overnight for Communion at the celebration of the Passion of the Lord on Good Friday. The text rehearses the entire history of redemption in Christ and should not be confused with the "Pange lingua [gloriosi lauream certaminis]," ("Praise [my] tongue his victory in the glorious contest"), an earlier hymn (ca. 569) composed by Venantius Fortunatus to honor a relic of the True Cross. See also Benediction.

Tantum ergo Sacramentum
Veneremur cernui:
Et antiquum documentum
Novo cedat ritui:
Praestet fides supplementum
Sensuum defectui.

Genitori, Genitoque
Laus et jubilatio,
Salus, honor, virtus quoque
Sit et benedictio:
Procedenti ab utroque
Compar sit laudatio.

Come adore this wondrous presence,
Bow to Christ the source of grace.
Here is kept the ancient promise
Of God's earthly dwelling place.
Sight is blind before God's glory,
Faith alone may see his face.

Glory be to God the Father, Praise to his coequal Son,
Adoration to the Spirit,
Bond of love, in Godhead one.
Blest be God by all creation
Joyously while ages run.

Taparelli d'Azeglio, Luigi. See d'Azeglio, Luigi Taparelli.

Taparelli d'Azeglio, Massimo. See d'Azeglio, Massimo Taparelli.

Targum (Heb., trgm, "translate," "explain"), the Aramaic translation of the Hebrew Bible. Targums were produced for most books of the Hebrew Bible, especially the Pentateuch (Targums Onqelos, Pseudo-Jonathan, Neofiti). Some Targums are literal translations, others paraphrastic and interpretive; as such they differ in form from midrash, which presents scriptural verses followed by commentary. Originating in the late–Second Temple period for synagogue use, the Targums underwent heavy revision as late as the fifth century A.D. Targums of Leviticus and Job were found among the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Tarsicius, St., third or fourth century, martyr and patron saint of altar boys and First Communicants. He was stoned to death while transporting the Blessed Sacrament to Christians in prison. Feast day: August 15.

Tatian (tay'shen), second-century Apologist and native of East Syria famous for his Diatessaron, a harmony of the Gospels that became the standard Gospel text of the Syriac churches until the fifth century. Visiting Rome, Tatian became a disciple and perhaps convert of Justin Martyr. Later he founded a school in Mesopotamia, increasingly adopting a strict, Encratite asceticism opposed to marriage and perhaps veering toward a Gnostic distinction between the true God and the Creator. The Oration to the Greeks, a critique of Greek civilization, is his only extant work. See also Apologists; Diatessaron.

Tauler, John, ca. 1300–61, German Dominican mystic and spiritual writer. A disciple of Meister Eckhart, Tauler belonged to a "Friends of God" circle. His Conferences interpret in an orthodox sense Eckhart's negative theology, which the Church had censored. These German sermons had a wide influence and were admired by Martin Luther.

tax collector. See publican.

teaching authority. See magisterium.

tears, gift of, spontaneous sign of repentance. With precedents in the OT and with the example of Jesus who wept over Jerusalem and for Lazarus, early Christianity considered tears a normal expression of sorrow for sins or for the suffering of Christ. Authenticity, however, depends on tears as an expression of inner sorrow. See also repentance.

Te Deum (tay day'oom; Lat., "You [are] God"), title of the hymn of praise: "You are God, we praise you." Once attributed to Ambrose of Milan and Augustine of Hippo, it is now considered to be the composition of Nicetas, fourth-century bishop of Remesiana. Once part of Sunday Lauds, the canticle now concludes the Office Readings on Sundays and solemnities.

TE DEUM

You are God: we praise you;
You are the Lord: we acclaim you;
You are the eternal Father;
All creation worships you.

To you all angels, all the powers of heaven,
Cherubim and Seraphim, sing in endless praise:
Holy, holy, holy, Lord, God of power and might, heaven and earth are full of your glory.

The glorious company of apostles praise you.
The noble fellowship of prophets praise you.
The white-robed army of martyrs praise you.

Throughout the world the holy Church acclaims you:
Father, of majesty unbounded,
your true and only Son, worthy of all worship, and the Holy Spirit, advocate and guide.

You, Christ, are the king of glory,
the eternal Son of the Father.

When you became man to set us free
you did not spurn the Virgin's womb.

You overcame the sting of death, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

You are seated at God's right hand in glory.
We believe that you will come, and be our judge.

Come then, Lord, and help your people, bought with the price of your own blood, and bring us with your saints to glory everlasting.
Save your people, Lord, and bless your inheritance.
Govern and uphold them now and always.
Day by day we bless you.
We praise your name forever.
Keep us today, Lord, from all sin.
Have mercy on us, Lord, have mercy.
Lord, show us your love and mercy;
for we put our trust in you.
In you, Lord, is our hope;
and we shall never hope in vain.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre, 1881–1955, French Jesuit paleontologist and theologian. Ordained a priest in 1911 and appointed professor of geology at the Institut Catholique in Paris, he went on paleontological expeditions in Africa and China from 1923 to 1946. There he evaluated the sites where important human fossil remains had just been found and trained the first Chinese paleontologists. In the midst of scientific fieldwork and writing, he began in the 1920s outlines of a theology whose directions and parameters were drawn from a scientific milieu. He viewed Christianity from an evolutionary perspective, in which the movement is always toward greater complexity and higher levels of consciousness. He identified the Risen Christ as the future center of a higher level of human society propelled by the invisible force of charity. After 1951 he worked at the Wenner-Gren Foundation in New York City, where he died on Easter Sunday, 1955.

Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, pioneering French Jesuit priest and scientist whose theological and spiritual writings, although controversial during his lifetime, have grown in influence since his death in 1955.

Some questioned the orthodoxy of his thought, and his speculative writings were published only after his death. They said he regarded the spiritual soul as resulting from materialistic evolution; but, though the human soul as a center within does result from the complexification of matter, this is due to the causal influence of God. Also, God as Omega seems to result from the convergence of the universe upon its goal; but "Omega" has two meanings. God as Omega, while intimately present to the universe, is distinct from it. The final state of the universe may also be called Omega, but this must not be confused with God. Some said he did not take evil seriously enough; but his concern was to see it in evolutionary perspective, not to deny it.

Nevertheless, throughout his life he was forbidden by the Vatican to publish works outside of science, but immediately after his death his theological writings, entrusted to friends outside of ecclesiastical institutions, were published to worldwide acclaim. This unusually imaginative thinker in theology, paleontology, and the cultural implications of science offered in a vivid and elegant style a worldview linking human evolution in the widest sense to themes from the Gospel of John, Paul's Letters to the Colossians and Ephesians, and the Greek theologians of the first Christian centuries. His optimistic thought helped to set aside conflicts between religion and science, inspired the spiritual journeys of many men and women in diverse areas of life, and stimulated countless studies of the Christocentric sacramentality of the universe. See also evolution; process theology.

Bibliography

Lukas, Mary Ellen. Teilhard: A Biography. New York: Doubleday, 1977.

Teilhard de Chardin, Pierre. The Phenomenon of Man. Trans. by Bernard Wall. New York: Harper & Row, 1965.

———. The Divine Milieu. Trans. by Bernard Wall. New York: Harper & Row, 1960.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA AND JOHN H. WRIGHT

Tekakwitha, Bl. Kateri, 1656–80, Native American holy person, also known as "Lily of the Mohawks." Born in Ossernenon (Auriesville, New Kateri Tekakwitha, Native American holy person, known as the "Lily of the Mohawks."

York), she was the daughter of a Christian Algonquin mother and a Mohawk warrior. She survived a smallpox epidemic that claimed the lives of her parents but suffered from facial disfigurement and poor health. Jacques de Lamberville, a Jesuit missionary, instructed Tekakwitha in the Catholic faith and on Easter Sunday, 1676, she was baptized and received the name Kateri (Catherine). Because her Christian commitment and refusal to marry angered her kin, Kateri fled the village and found refuge at the Mission of St. Francis Xavier near Montreal. There she taught children, cared for the sick and aged, and lived a life of penance and prayer. Kateri, known for her great holiness, died at the age of twenty-four (1680). The bishops of the Baltimore Council (1884) petitioned to begin Kateri's beatification process; she was beatified in 1980. Feast day (in the United States): July 14.

teleology (tee-lee-ah'luh-jee; Gk., telos, "end"), a way of thinking about right or wrong according to the end to which an action leads. Various forms of teleology are present in ethics. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) is teleological in holding that whatever leads to the person's ultimate end, union with God, is morally right. The traditional Catholic understanding of the natural law is teleological in holding that conduct must correspond to the ends of human nature. Situation ethics is teleological in its utilitarian quest for the greatest good for the greatest number. Proportionalism is a moderate form of teleology with its concern for the relation of means to ends and in its assessment of the totality of an act in light of its effect on total human wellbeing.

The strength of this approach is that it challenges us to hold in view the big picture. It takes seriously the future implications of an action as part of the action's moral meaning. Its weakness is apparent when it ignores other aspects of the act that may be involved in creating the future. Also, there is no unanimity on the way to order goods or to choose among competing goods. Since no one is an expert on the future, this method is limited by human ability to predict what will happen. Teleology needs to be complemented by considerations of deontology and an ethics of virtue. See also deontology; virtue.

temperance, the proper control of one's desires, one of the four cardinal virtues. The word "temperance" is today often associated with abstinence from alcohol. Originally, however, it directly translated the Latin temperantia, for which "self-restraint" or "self-control" is a more accurate meaning. According to Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), a moral virtue is a habit directed toward a good work well done. In the case of temperance, the habit is attained by educating one's passions—as in the desire for food, drink or, in part, sexual pleasure—to the point that one more or less spontaneously and easily chooses the right action, not allowing temptations to deflect the choice. A person assaulted by strong emotions or desires may exercise self-control in the situation, but this is not yet the complete virtue or habit of temperance. Temperance is a quality of character that is dependable because one's desires have been disciplined to respond to the truly good. Furthermore, unless one acts for a truly good end, temperate behavior is imperfect because the full act cannot be considered good. Thus, fasting, which is the temperate control of one's desire for food, is not fully virtuous if the person knows that sickness will result. To the objection that emotions are fundamentally spontaneous, one must answer that human beings can both choose good aims or goals and learn to guide their desires according to these good ends. Thus, the cardinal virtues of prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude, as consciously chosen, require implementation through careful training. See also cardinal virtues. MARK MILLER

Templars. See Knights Templar.

Temple, the sacred complex in Jerusalem. Solomon (ca. 961–922 B.C.) constucted the first Temple in Jerusalem ca. 950 B.C. (1 Kgs 5–7). It functioned until the Babylonians destroyed it in 587/86 (2 Kgs 25:9). When exiles returned to Jerusalem in 538, they built a new Temple on the same site (Ezra 1–6). It stood from 516 B.C. until A.D. 70 when the Romans burned it down. King Herod had begun remodeling the Temple in about 20 B.C., and the process continued for many years (John 2:13–22). The Temple consisted of three rooms (Holy of Holies, holy place, nave) in the building proper, with surrounding courtyards and structures.

Temporale, the Temporal Cycle of the Church's calendar, which divides the year into three seasons celebrating the mystery of redemption: the Christmas Cycle (Advent and Christmastide), the Paschal Cycle (Lent, the Triduum, and Eastertide), and Ordinary Time, with its Sundays and moveable feasts temptation, an inducement to sin. In its most general sense, temptation is any sort of inducement that could lead an individual to act sinfully, or in nontheological terms, to act in a way that is contrary to the demands of morality. The specific conceptions of temptations found within the Catholic tradition have varied with changing conceptions of grace, sin, and the nature of the moral life. For those theologians who have emphasized the dangers of sensuality, and of sexual sins in particular, physical pleasure, pleasant or stimulating circumstances, or even the presence of other human beings have been stigmatized as occasions of sin. Others, following Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), have tended to emphasize the intellectual dimension of the moral life, and have identified inducements to sin as those forms of persuasion that appeal to the intellect and to the wider emotional life, presenting a way of life that is superficially attractive but ultimately destructive.

(Trinity, Corpus Christi, Sacred Heart, and Christ the King). See also liturgical year; Sanctorale.

Earlier moral theologies tended to put a great deal of weight on the importance of recognizing and avoiding temptations. More recently, however, moral theologians have deemphasized temptations, preferring instead to consider difficult situations as opportunities for moral growth. There is a greater awareness of the possibility that the culture as a whole can present temptations, by what it obscures from our consciousness and by the inducements that it offers us. See also sin.

temptations of Christ, specifically, the narrative of Jesus' temptations or testings in Mark 1:12–13 and in the sayings Gospel Q incorporated in Matt 4:1–11; Luke 4:1–13; generally, Jesus' testings throughout his ministry (Luke 22:28), especially in his suffering (Heb 2:18; 4:15). The origin of the narrative is disputed. The symmetry of the temptations and the unrealistic details rule out a literal understanding. Some think the account goes back to Jesus, who told parabolic stories to illustrate his victory over the lure of political messiahship or related inner experiences in figurative language. Others believe the early community created the story to correct false messianic expectations or to hold Jesus out as a model for Christian behavior. The narrative probably arose in response to the demand for signs (Luke 11:16). Either way, the story has religious value. The Marcan version is a brief narrative introducing Jesus' conflict with Satan and demonic forces. The Q account is a dialogue between Jesus and the Devil, which draws on Deut 6–8 to contrast Israel's failure in the wilderness with Jesus' success. Matthew inserted Q into the Marcan frame, while Luke placed a genealogy between the baptism and temptation and reversed the last two temptations to emphasize Jerusalem's importance. By juxtaposing the baptism and the Q form of the temptation, Matthew and Luke accentuate Jesus' filial obedience to God's will. See also Jesus Christ.

Ten Commandments. See Commandments, the Ten.

Tenebrae (Lat., "darkness"), the popular term for Matins and Lauds of the last three days of Holy Week. These morning offices were anticipated, i.e., celebrated, on the evening before. The term came into use because candles were gradually extinguished during the service and all departed in darkness (tenebrae) and silence. See also Holy Week; Liturgy of the Hours.

Terce (Lat, tertia, "third"), the monastic office celebrated at the third hour (hora tertia), or 9 A.M. Probably originating in the early Christian practice of commemorating different moments in Christ's Passion at the third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day, Terce was traditionally associated with the Crucifixion (Mark 15:25). See also Liturgy of the Hours.

Teresa of Ávila, St., 1515–82, mystic, founder of the Discalced Carmelites, and first woman Doctor of the Church (1970). Born Teresa de Cepeda y Ahumada near Ávila, Spain, Teresa came from a large family with Jewish ancestry. In 1535 she entered the Carmelite monastery of the Incarnation at Ávila. During the next two decades Teresa led a prayerful life, but she felt that she had not surrendered fully to God and later commented that she had not felt fully alive. In 1554, while she prayed before a statue of the wounded Christ, she underwent a profound conversion.

Inspired by the memory of thirteenth-century Carmelites, Teresa founded her first reform convent of Carmelite nuns in 1562 at Ávila. In the same year Teresa composed the first draft of her Life, which included a nearly independent treatise on the growth of mystical prayer using the imagery of water (chs. 11–22). In 1566 she wrote the first, and probably the second, edition of The Way of Perfection as well as her Meditations on the Song of Songs.

In 1567 she met for the first time the newly ordained John of St. Matthias (later known as John of the Cross), whom Teresa convinced to remain a Carmelite and to collaborate in her reform of the order. Teresa admired John's holiness and wisdom. Although she and John act in the tradition as complements and interpreters of one another, Jerome Gracian was her closest friend among the friars. In 1568 Teresa saw to the inauguration of the first of the reform houses of the friars at Duruelo, and in 1577 she began the composition of her masterpiece, The Interior Castle, a disguised autobiography in the third person written while her Life was in the hands of the Inquisition. This book describes the mystical life through the symbolism of seven mansions, with the first three mansions as the premystical journey to God and the next four mansions as growth in the mystical life. With the imagery of the Song of Songs in the background, Teresa saw spiritual betrothal occurring in the sixth mansion and spiritual marriage in the seventh mansion.

For Teresa the test of growth in the mystical life is love of neighbor. Teresa stressed the importance of rooting prayer in Christ, and she emphasized the wholly gifted nature of the mystical life. Although Teresa was profoundly contemplative with regular manifestations of mystical phenomena, she was very active as the leader of the Discalced reform, making numerous foundations of nuns and friars. She was adviser, spiritual and otherwise, to countless people, as her warm and informative letters show; in fact, these letters reveal the lively and down-to-earth personality of Teresa. This Spanish mystic had a strong ecclesial sense. She died saying: "Finally, Lord, I am a daughter of the Church." Modern writers find Teresa's spirituality a complement to that of Ignatius of Loyola (d. 1556). She was beatified in 1614 and canonized in 1622. She is a patron saint of Spain. Feast day: October 15. See also Carmelite order; John of the Cross, St; mysticism.

KEITH J. EGAN

Teresa of Calcutta, Mother, b. 1910, founder of the Missionaries of Charity (M.C.). Born Agnes Gonxha Bojaxhiu at Skopje in the former Yugoslavia, she joined the Sisters of Loretto in Ireland at the age of seventeen, and within a year she was sent to teach in Calcutta, India. There she became acquainted with the poor who lived and died in the streets. In Mother Teresa, one of twentieth-century Catholicism's most inspiring examples of Christian ministry to the poor, the sick, and the dying.

1948 she left the Sisters of Loretto to serve the sick and the dying in the city's slums. She became known as Mother Teresa. In 1949 she founded the Missionaries of Charity, a community of sisters, priests, and brothers who serve the poor by providing food, clothing, shelter, and medical care. Within thirty years there were eighty foundations of this community in thirty-two countries. She was the recipient of the 1979 Nobel Peace Prize, the Nehru Award, and the 1981 Père Marquette Discovery Award.

Térèsa of Lisieux, St. See Thérèse of Lisieux, St.

terna, list of three candidates proposed to fill a vacated office. Many offices, including that of bishop, require a terna from which electors or the responsible authority can choose. The list is usually presented by those authorized to do so (e.g., the bishops of a province) and is given in order of preference. In some cases the electors or authorities are bound to choose from the list; in other cases they may choose a person not on the list. See also bishops, appointment of.

territorial law, in canon law a law whose authority is limited to a geographical territory. Such law can be said to "cling to the stones" of the territory. Territorial law is designed to meet the needs of a given region. It has no force outside of a given diocese, province, or country.

tertianship, the third and last stage of probation in the Society of Jesus (Jesuits). It is a year of spiritual training and study required of members after ordination to the priesthood and some years of experience in ministry. This year of renewal includes a thirty-day retreat. See also Jesuits.

tertiary, popular term for membership in the only secular associations (third orders) of the faithful still explicitly mentioned by the Code of Canon Law (can. 303). Traditionally, members of secular third orders associate themselves with either first order or second order communities of women or men to live under their guidance and according to their spirit, but without the bonds of public vows or common life. Although twelfth-century records refer to groups of devout persons receiving spiritual guidance from Benedictines and Premonstratensions, such tertiaries were initially formalized by Francis of Assisi (d. 1226). Currently, several tertiary orders observe papally approved rules of life affiliated with the Augustinian, Benedictine, Carmelite, Dominican, "Norbertine," Servite, and Trinitarian traditions. See also third orders.

Tertullian, ca. 160–ca. 225, Latin Christian writer and Apologist from Roman Africa. While a large body of Tertullian's writings have come down to us, few details of his life are known with any certainty. He was born in Carthage and, like many of his countrymen, probably practiced law in Rome for some years. He converted to Christianity in his maturity and, according to Jerome, was ordained presbyter. In later life Tertullian was attracted by the uncompromising rigor of the apocalypticists who proclaimed that the heavenly Jerusalem would soon descend upon the earth and became Montanist. (A century later, Augustine reconciled to the Catholic Church a group of Christians called Tertullianists.) By 197, Tertullian had placed at the service of Christianity his skills in rhetorical composition, his bilingual ability in Latin and Greek, his ironic wit, his incisive mind, and his abundant energy. For more than twenty years he defended Christianity against paganism (the Apology and To the Nations), exhorted his fellow Christians to ever more rigorous standards of moral life (On Penitence, On Modesty, On Fasting Against the Psychicos [the Catholics]), attacked heresy and defended the Scriptures (Against Marcion in five books, Against Hermogenem, On the Prescription Against Heretics, among numerous other titles). Tertullian wrote profoundly on doctrinal issues, including seminal works on Trinity (Against Praxeus) and Christology (On the Flesh of Christ) that were to be points of reference for fourth-century pro-Nicene theologians like Hilary of Poitiers. Tertullian's writings illuminate many aspects of church life in the second and third centuries, its spirituality (On Prayer, On Patience), its sacramental life (On Baptism, On the Crown), its inner tensions (On Flight during Persecution), and its suffering (To the Martyrs). While Augustine (d. 430) places him with Cyprian (d. 258) among the admired Christian writers, Tertullian stands beside Augustine himself in infusing Christianity with a distinctive Latin genius. See also Africa, the Church in Roman; Montanism. PAMELA BRIGHT

Testem Benevolentiae (test'em ben-eh-voh-len'see-ay), apostolic letter of January 22, 1899, condemning Americanism. While praising American patriotism, Leo XIII warned against religious indifference, watering down doctrine, denigration of religious vows, and the rejection of external authority in the Church—positions attributed in Europe to Isaac Hecker (d. 1888, founder of the Paulists). See also Americanism; Leo XIII; United States of America, Catholicism in the.

tetragrammaton (tet'ruh-gram'uh-tahn; Gk., "[the word with] four letters"), the four Hebrew consonants Y(J)HWH for the name of God (Exod 3:14), generally in English translations written as LORD. Because the divine name was not pronounced, 'adonai (Heb., my Lord) was substituted. "Jehovah" is a sixteenth-century combination of the consonants of YHWH and the vowels from 'adonai.

Tetzel, John, ca. 1465–1519, German Dominican preacher. In 1516 he was commissioned by Pope Leo X to preach in Magdeburg and Halberstadt (in modern-day Germany) to secure financial donations for the rebuilding of St. Peter's in Rome, in return for which donors would receive spiritual benefits known as indulgences. His approach outraged

Martin Luther because of its assumption, widely believed at the time, that the payment of money could secure the release of souls from purgatory. In response, Luther issued his Ninety-five Theses on October 31, 1517, the day commonly regarded as the beginning of the Protestant Reformation. See also indulgences; Luther, Martin; purgatory; Reformation, the.

Thaddeus, St. See Jude, St.

Theatines (Lat., Theate, "[from the town of] Chieti"), Italian religious order founded in 1524 by Cajetan, an Italian priest, and Gian Pietro Carafa, bishop of Chieti and later Pope Paul IV. Both were members of the Oratory of Divine Love, a group committed to the spreading Catholic reform throughout Europe. The ascetic Theatines observed the practice of absolute poverty, but were not allowed to beg. They dedicated themselves to evangelization, helping the poor, and parish work. They are known today as the Congregation of Clerks Regular (C.R.), with headquarters in Rome. See also Cajetan, St.; Oratory of Divine Love.

Thecla. See Paul and Thecla, Acts of.

theism, the belief that the universe originates from a unitary source and cannot be presented as its own explanation. Theism is contrasted with monism, according to which the universe contains its own principles within itself. Theism relies on a "distinction" of God from the world, while monism finds God immanent within the universe. Theism is also distinguished from deism, which considers the divine origin as initial and remote and thus practically severs the universe, once originated, from its divine source. The term theism broadly characterizes a family of religious faiths that includes Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, even though each of these holds quite distinctive teachings regarding God's free origination of the universe. But since theism would be compatible with the idea of a God who necessarily brought forth the world, the philosophical system of Plotinus (third century), presented as an alternative to Christianity, could count as a form of theism. While it is tempting to think of theism as a generic term that comprehends all those religions that avow creation, the term is far too inclusive to countenance such use. Most accurately, it intends a position opposite to atheism or to monism, yet in itself it is too vague to indicate which God (or gods) are intended. See also God.

theocracy (Gk., "rule by God"), a term coined by the first-century historian Josephus to describe Mosaic law. As is the case in some contemporary Islamic states, ancient Israel was ruled directly by religious leaders. Another form of theocracy was the submission of temporal rulers to the papacy in the Christian Middle Ages (see Unam Sanctum, Boniface VIII, 1302).

theodicy (Gk., theos, "God"; dikē, "justice"), the attempt to justify belief in the goodness of God in the face of the evil and suffering in the world. The existence of evil requires that one modify either the belief that God can do all things or the belief that God wills only good. Faced with the question of theodicy, theologians tend to stress human free will and responsibility for evil, the limits of human ability to discern the full meaning of an event, the ineffability of God, and the fact that the world is still on the way to perfection. See also God; natural theology; theology.

Theodore of Mopsuestia, ca. 350–428, bishop of Mopsuestia from 392 to 428, pupil of Diodore of Tarsus, and staunch defender of the trinitarian theology of the Council of Constantinople (381). Against both Arians and Apollinarians, his Christology developed Diodore's doctrine of two natures and (in effect) two subjects in Christ, the "man assumed" and the divine Word who assumed and indwelt him by grace. They were united in one prosopon (Gk., figure, presentation, "person"), a description of unity that seemed weak to Cyril of Alexandria, who viewed it as an early form of Nestorianism. Theodore was condemned at Constantinople II (553), a victim of Justinian's efforts to placate the Monophysites.

Theodore's brilliant but strongly antiallegorical exegesis, typically Antiochene, severely restricted not only allegory but even typology in the OT, regarding only four Psalms (2; 8; 45; 110) as Christological, excluding prophecy of Christ from all of the prophets except Malachi, and finding in Zerubbabel and the Maccabees the fulfillment of most of the messianic prophecies. See also Antioch, school of; Christology; Constantinople, councils of; Monophysitism; Nestorianism.

Theodore of Studios, St., 759–826, Byzantine monastic reformer and opponent of iconoclasm. In 799, he and his monks took over and revived the dying Studios monastery in Constantinople. His tightly organized monastic confederation of Studite monasteries under the leadership of the abbot of Studios was much like a Western monastic congregation. Its Typikon, or rule, and the spread of Studite liturgical usages from the tenth through the thirteenth centuries were crucial influences in the formation of the Byzantine rite. See also Studites.

Theodore of Tarsus, St., ca. 602–90, archbishop of Canterbury from 668. Theodore reformed and unified the government of the English church, establishing the metropolitan authority of Canterbury, and presiding over important synods in 673 (Hertford) and 680 (Hatfield). Feast day: September 19.

Theodoret of Cyrrhus, ca. 393–ca. 466, bishop of Cyrrhus from 423. He supported Nestorius and two-nature Christology against Cyril of Alexandria, even after Nestorius was condemned. Responding to accusations of dividing the Son, he composed a confession supporting the use of Theotokos (Gk.), "God-bearer," for Mary. Nevertheless, he was condemned by Dioscorus, Cyril's successor, and was deposed in 449. At the Council of Chalcedon (451), he reluctantly anathematized Nestorius and regained his see. He wrote apologetic works, biblical commentaries in the Antiochene tradition, and historical works, including a History of the Monks of Syria and a Church History (covering the period 323–428). His writings against Cyril (one of the "Three Chapters") were condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 553. See also Christology; Cyril of Alexandria, St.; Nestorianism; Theotokos.

Theodosius I, "the Great," 346/7–95, Roman emperor from 379 to 395 and architect of the Catholic empire, enacted through a series of decrees outlawing Arianism and other heresies and progressively restricting pagan sacrifice. As part of his anti-Arian agenda, he called the Council of Constantinople (381). In 390 he was obliged by Ambrose to do public penance for a punitive massacre at Thessalonica. See also Arianism; Constantinople, councils of.

Theodulf of Orléans, ca. 750–821, abbot and bishop. Probably born in Visigothic Spain, Theodulf served as abbot of Fleury, Micy, and St. Aignan as well as bishop of Orléans (from 781). Active at Charlemagne's court, especially after Alcuin's retirement, he was accused of conspiracy by Louis the Pious (817) and died in exile. He is the probable author of Libri Carolini, books attributed erroneously to Charlemagne containing teachings critical of the iconophile Second Council of Nicaea (787). See also Libri Carolini.

theologian, professional practitioner of theology, which is the scientific study of God and of God's relationship to the world. A person of faith, the theologian needs scientific training, so to approach theology both positively (through knowledge of data from the Bible and religious traditions) and speculatively (through a developed capacity for evaluation and reflection). Eastern Christians call attention to the indispensable role of prayer for the theological enterprise. They give the name of "the Theologian" to John the Evangelist, traditionally identified by them as the Beloved Disciple who appears in prayerful intimacy at Jesus' side in John 13–21. The methods and standards of theologians are inevitably affected by the setting of their work, whether university, seminary, or monastery, their audiences, whether the general public, students of theology, or the Church at large, and their philosophical systems, whether Platonism, Aristotelianism, or some form of existentialism or other system.

Whatever the setting, Catholic theologians need to cultivate a sense of their ecclesial role, showing genuine responsibility towards the members of the hierarchical magisterium and the wider faith community. As was indicated in the 1990 "Instruction on the Ecclesial Vocation of the Theologian," published by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the prophetic function of theologians in the service of the Church will involve some fruitful tensions with the magisterium. See also magisterium; theology.

theological notes. See notes, theological.

Theological Studies, a scholarly journal published quarterly by Theological Studies, Inc., under the sponsorship of the U.S. Jesuit Conference. Established in 1940, it publishes articles and book reviews representing a broad range of theological reflection: systematic theology, moral theology and ethics, biblical studies, historical theology, and spirituality. Its two most prominent editors have been John Courtney Murray (d. 1967) and Walter Burghardt.

theological virtues, faith, hope, and love, grouped together by Paul in 1 Cor 13:13. Their proper and immediate object is God. Unlike other virtues, they are not acquired by personal effort but are received as gifts. Like other virtues, they require exercise to be perfected and can be squandered by neglect. Though each has a distinct activity, they cannot be fully isolated from one another. Different historical periods have emphasized different virtues. Augustine (d. 430) saw love as the ordering virtue. Martin Luther (d. 1546) placed faith at the center of Christian life. Recent theology has seen an increased emphasis on the virtue of hope. See also charity; faith; hope.

theologoumenon (theh-aw-law-goo'men-ahn; Gk., "that which is said about God"), a nondoctrinal theological interpretation that cannot be verified or refuted on the basis of historical evidence, but that can be affirmed because of its close connection with some defined doctrine about God. Belief in the virginal conception of Jesus or in the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (Filioque) are two examples of theologoumena (pl.).

theology (Gk., "the science of God"), any scientific, or methodical, attempt to understand and interpret divine revelation mediated through the data of Scripture and tradition. Classically described as "faith seeking understanding," theology begins with faith and uses the resources of reason, drawing in particular upon the disciplines of history and philosophy. In the face of the divine mystery, theology is always seeking, and never reaches final answers and definitive insights. Theology may be practiced within an academic setting. Yet unlike the philosophy of religion or religious studies, it should be done in and for (not outside or merely alongside) the believing community.

Systematic theology, often coinciding in practice with dogmatic theology, attempts to expound in a coherent and scholarly fashion the main Christian doctrines. Its branches include: Christology, which interprets the nature and significance of Jesus Christ; the doctrine of God, with special focus on the Trinity; Christian anthropology, which examines the creation, fall into sin, redemption through grace, and final destiny of human beings and their world; ecclesiology, which systematically reflects on the origin, nature, distinguishing characteristics, and mission of the Church; and sacramental theology, which interprets the seven visible signs instituted by Christ that reveal and communicate grace.

Fundamental theology studies foundational issues, in particular, God's definitive revelation in the history of Israel and Jesus Christ; the conditions that make human beings accessible to this divine self-communication; the signs that make faith in and through Christ a reasonable and responsible option; the transmission, through inspired Scripture and Church tradition, of the experience and content of God's self-manifestation.

Moral theology methodically examines the nature and norms of responsible human and Christian conduct. Pastoral or practical theology reflects on the Church's religious mission to the world in preaching, catechetics, and liturgical and sacramental celebration, involvement in struggles for justice and peace, and care of people facing special problems in different life situations.

Interests and Approaches: Particular interests or methodologies have always shaped theology. In addition, new movements have arisen, such as the theology of hope, the theology of the Cross, and narrative theology (in which biblical and Christian history and stories play a leading role). New realizations shape theologies such as black theology, which opposes racism and promotes full civil and ecclesial rights; feminist theology, which opposes masculine bias in theology and biblical interpretation and promotes full equality of women and men in civil and ecclesial life; and liberation theology, which opposes institutionalized injustice and the impoverishment of masses of people and promotes the integral liberation of human beings through structural change.

Approaches to theology frequently (but not always) have varied according to their geography. European and North American academic theologians typically raise questions about meaning, look for truth in dialogue with professional colleagues, place great importance on written texts, and often use criteria elaborated by speculative reason. Many recent Latin American theologians represent another theological method, which seeks justice, works in a very public context, privileges the voices of the poor and suffering, and respects the criterion of praxis, reflection that is linked with actual practical experience. North American feminist theological method recovers the contributions of women in the history of Christianity, privileges women's experience, and uses the criterion that whatever promotes the full humanity of women and men is redemptive. A liturgical and monastic approach to theology contemplates divine beauty and glory, finds its home in the setting of prayer, and takes its texts and criteria from the Church's worship. Ideally, Catholic and indeed all Christian theology can only be enriched by a proper pluralism in which the academic, practical, and liturgical styles work to complement each other, and are pursued in an ecumenically sensitive way. Like all human beings, theologians should be open to the true, the good, and the beautiful.

"Religion," John Henry Newman (d. 1890) stated in the nineteenth century, "cannot do without theology." He saw theology as "the fundamental and regulating principle of the whole Church system." Newman appreciated the essential service that theology, practiced with deep faith and impeccable intelligence, should render within the Church and for the Church and the world. See also faith; feminism; liberation theology; magisterium; philosophy and theology; praxis; revelation.

Bibliography

Congar, Yves. A History of Theology. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1968.

Dulles, Avery. The Craft of Theology: From Symbol to System. New York: Crossroad, 1992.

Lonergan, Bernard. Method in Theology. New York: Crossroad, 1972.

Newman, John Henry. Idea of a University. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1976.

GERALD O'COLLINS

theopaschite clause, a fifth-century Monophysite text, "who was crucified for us," added to the Trisagion hymn, "Holy God holy mighty holy immortal," by patriarch of Antioch Peter Fuller ca. 468–70. The addition is found in all Eastern Christian liturgies except the Byzantine and East Syrian. Much disputed during the sixth century, the addition was condemned at the Council of Trullo in 692. It is now agreed that the clause can have an orthodox meaning provided the hymn is being addressed to Christ. See also Monophysitism; Trisagion.

Theophany (Gk., "divine manifestation"), common early Eastern Christian name for the January 6 feast; in the West called the Epiphany (Gk., "manifestation"). In the East this was the original Incarnation feast, celebrating both the Nativity of Jesus and his manifestation as Son of God at his baptism in the Jordan. In the West, the Nativity is December 25, and Epiphany celebrates the manifestation of Jesus to the Gentiles represented by the Magi. When the East adopted the Western Nativity feast of December 25 at the end of the fourth century, the two scenarios, Bethlehem (including the visit of the Magi) and the Jordan River, were split, the former assigned to December 25, the latter to January 6. But the mystery celebrated in both is the same: the manifestation of God's salvation in Jesus Christ. The Armenian Orthodox Church did not accept the December 25 feast; it maintains the ancient Jerusalem tradition of Christmas on January 6. See also Christmas; Epiphany.

Theophilus of Alexandria, d. 412, patriarch of Alexandria (385–412). He campaigned against paganism and destroyed its shrines, most notably the Sarapeum. At the urging of Egyptian monks, he opposed Origenism. His latter years were marked by bitter confrontation with John Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople. Feast day: October 15 (Coptic); October 17 (Syrian). See also Chrysostom, St. John; Origenism.

Theophilus of Antioch, St., late second century, bishop of Antioch and Christian Apologist. His apologetics develops the doctrine of the Logos by distinguishing between the logos endiathetos (Gk.), God's Word prior to creation, and the logos prophorikos, God's Word spoken to form creation. He is the first known theologian to apply the word "triad" (hence, "triune") to God. See also apologetics; Apologists; Logos.

Theotokos (thay-oh-taw'kaws; Gk., "God-bearer"), the title given to the Blessed Virgin Mary at the Council of Ephesus (431). The council taught that because Jesus is one divine person, not two as the Nestorians had argued, Mary is truly the Mother of God and not only the mother of the human Jesus. See also Ephesus, Council of; Mother of God.

Theotonius, St., 1086–1166, Spanish-born Portuguese saint. Honored by the people as a very holy man, he persuaded King Alphonsus of Portugal to release the Mozarabic captives, Spanish Christians who practiced their faith under Muslim rule. Feast day: February 18.

Thérèse of Lisieux, St. (tuh-rayz' uhv leez-yoo'), 1873–97, saint popularly known as the Little Flower. She was born Thérèse Martin in Alençon, France, the youngest of five sisters who became nuns. She entered the Carmelite monastery of Lisieux at age fifteen and subsequently became Thérèse of the Child Jesus and the Holy Face. Told to write the story of her life, she composed an autobiography she said reflected not on what had occurred but on grace at work in the events. She declared she had suffered much, but even in the excruciating darkness of mystic purification she continued to rejoice in the outpouring of divine love for her. Thérèse makes her story a canticle of gratitude to Jesus Christ, whom she sees present with her in every experience.

Thérèse of Lisieux, better known as the Little Flower, a highly influential spiritual force for Catholics in the first half of the twentieth century because of the simplicity and practicality of her approach to sanctity.

Her teaching shows how the most ordinary human existence contains material for extraordinary holiness. Thérèse invites others to follow her "little way" of spiritual childhood, which she describes as an attitude of unlimited hope in God's merciful love.

Her spiritual nourishment came especially from Scripture and the works of John of the Cross (d. 1591). She emphasized the apostolic power of prayer, hidden but far-reaching in serving the Church and the world.

All major languages have translations of the writings of this most beloved of modern saints. Thérèse's profound and joyous simplicity conveys original insights into the theology of grace.

She died of tuberculosis at age twenty-four. Countless miracles attributed to her intercession fulfill her promise to spend her heaven doing good upon earth. Feast day: October 1. MARGARET DORGAN thesis-hypothesis. See Church and state.

Thierry of Chartres (teer'ee uhv shahrtr), d. 1151/6, Scholastic philosopher and theologian. A teacher at the school of Chartres, and in 1141 its archdeacon and chancellor, Thierry sought to reconcile Platonic philosophy with Christian revelation, as in his work on the creation. He also wrote important commentaries on Cicero and Boethius.

Thils, Gustave, b. 1909, theologian. Ordained a priest for the archdiocese of Malines, Belgium, in 1931, he obtained his doctorate and Magister theologiae (Lat., "Master of theology"), a degree beyond the doctorate, at the University of Louvain (1935, 1937) and taught theology (1939–47) in the major seminary of Mechelen (Malines) and at the University of Louvain (1947–77). Author of more than twenty books and many scholarly and popular articles on the Church, ecumenism, spirituality, and related topics, he was an expert (periti) at the Second Vatican Council and a major contributor to the Decree on Ecumenism (Unitatis Redintegratio) and the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes).

Third Order Regular of St. Francis, religious congregations tracing their origins to the third order secular established by Francis of Assisi in 1221. Though Franciscan tertiaries did not initially take public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and did not live together in community, many fourteenth- and fifteenth-century Franciscan tertiaries of Italy began to do so. They were accorded official approbation as third order regulars by Pope Nicholas V in 1447. Congregations of third order Franciscans, both male and female, having arisen throughout Europe and the United States, now take public vows and live under a common rule of life in the spirit of St. Francis, as do the other principal orders of Franciscans: the Friars Minor, Conventuals, and Capuchin[esse]s. See also Franciscan order; tertiary; third orders.

third orders, associations of laity (third orders secular) or of religious women and men (third orders regular). The latter are religious institutes whose members take public vows and follow the spirit and rule of an order, e.g., the Third Order Regular of St. Francis. Traditionally men belonged to a first order and women to a second order, e.g., Second Order Dominicans. Third order has been a category for laity who seek to attain holiness by following a way of life in the world but under the inspiration and spiritual guidance of a papally approved religious institute. Diocesan priests can also belong to third orders. Most third-order members, sometimes called tertiaries, make promises but some members take vows. Promises and vows in third orders, as among first and second orders, are a renewal of baptismal promises. The religious practices of third orders are meant to suit life in secular society, but third orders challenge members to take seriously the gospel of Jesus in the context of the traditions of the order to which they are affiliated.

The third-order movement attained formal structure with Francis of Assisi, and the Franciscans spread the movement throughout Europe. However, during the Middle Ages there was great variety in the kinds of affiliation that the laity had with the first and second orders. Secular third orders, since Vatican II (1962–65), often go by other names, e.g., Lay Carmelites. Canon law accords official recognition to third orders as corporate juridical persons. See also tertiary; Third Order Regular of St. Francis.

Thirty-nine Articles, the doctrinal summary of the Church of England. Passed by Convocation in 1563, the Thirty-nine Articles represent the teaching of the reformed Church of England, based on a revision of Cranmer's Forty-two Articles of 1553, combining Lutheran and Reformed themes in a way characteristic of the Elizabethan settlement. Founded on the material norm of Christ's once-for-all sacrifice for sin (Articles 1–4) and the formal norm of Scripture alone (6–8), the articles present a Lutheran understanding of justification (9–16) and a Reformed understanding of election (17) and the sacraments (25–31), along with the Erastian (state over church) ecclesiology of Elizabeth I (19–21, 34–39), who personally deleted the article on sacramental eating (29, restored in 1571) and wrote a preface to Article 20 on rites and ceremonies in order not to offend Catholic piety. See also Anglicanism.

Thirty Years' War (1618–48), last European religious war and first "world war." Beginning with the Defenestration of Prague and ending with the Peace of Westphalia, the Thirty Years' War destroyed central Europe, undermined the Holy Roman Empire, and ushered in the modern era of secularized international relations. See also Holy Roman Empire.

Thomas, St. (Aram., "twin"), one of the twelve apostles. Thomas is mentioned in all the lists of the apostles (Matt 10:3; Mark 3:18; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13), and he plays a prominent role in the Fourth Gospel. There he is designated not only by the name Thomas, but also by its Greek translation, Didymus (John 11:16; 20:24; 21:2). Thomas first appears as one who is ready to die with Jesus (John 11:16). At the Last Supper he admits that he does not know where Jesus is going (John 14:5). After the Resurrection he plays his most famous role as the doubting Thomas (John 20:24–29).

The tradition of the early Church connects Thomas with Parthia and India. In particular, the Acts of Thomas tells of his legendary missionary activity in the East. The Acts of Thomas portrays Thomas as an extreme ascetic who preached total sexual renunciation. Thomas is supposed to have been martyred in India and his bones transferred to the Syrian city of Edessa. There the fourth-century pilgrim Egeria visited his memorial. Thomas's mission to India is venerated by the Thomas Christians of the Malabar Coast and relics are preserved in the Cathedral of St. Thomas at Mylapore.

The Gospel of Thomas is a collection of sayings of Jesus that Thomas supposedly transcribed. Like the Acts of Thomas, it has Syrian connections and ascetical leanings. The distinct Infancy Gospel of Thomas says nothing about the apostle.

The Syrian traditions represented by the Gospel of Thomas and the Acts of Thomas understood Thomas's name to indicate that he was the "twin" of Jesus. Feast day: July 3. See also apocryphal Gospels; apostle; Thomas Christians; Twelve, the.

Thomas à Kempis, ca. 1380–1471, author of the Imitation of Christ, a book that expresses the spirituality of the Modern Devotion (Devotio Moderna). This renewal movement was begun in the latter half of the fourteenth century by Geert de Groote (d. 1384) and spread through the Netherlands and Germany. Thomas was born in Kempen in the Rhineland and schooled by de Groote's Brothers of the Common Life at Deventer. In 1399 he joined the Canons Regular of St. Augustine at Mount St. Agnes. He was elected subprior in 1425 and was responsible for training novices. First published anonymously, Imitation is commonly attributed to Thomas. He wrote other devotional works, sermons, and biographies of the founders of the Modern Devotion. See also Devotio Moderna.

Thomas Aquinas, St. See Aquinas, St. Thomas.

Thomas Becket, St. See Becket, St. Thomas.

Thomas Christians, common epithet for the Malabar Christians of India, mostly concentrated in the state of Kerala on the southwest coast, who trace their origins to the evangelization of India by the Apostle Thomas. Today these Christians belong to the Syro-Malabar and Syro-Malankara Catholic churches and to their Orthodox counterparts, or to various offshoots from these historic churches. See also Syro-Malabar Catholic Church; Syro-Malankara Catholic Church.

Thomas More, St. See More, St. Thomas.

Thomas of Villanova, St. See Villanova, St. Thomas of.

Thomism, the thought of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and of the succession of individuals and schools that interpreted and applied his ideas. Expositions of Aquinas are found in universities (Louvain, The Catholic University of America), religious orders (Dominicans, Jesuits), periods (the Baroque, the early twentieth century), and in orientations (political, historical, philosophical, transcendental). Thomism has four periods: the age of defenses (thirteenth–fifteenth centuries); the age of commentaries (1450–1630); the age of disputations, encyclopedias, and systems (1500–1720); the Thomist revival (1860–1960). The last three, particularly the most recent, are "neo-Thomisms." Neo-Thomism in turn is a development within neo-Scholasticism, the revival of Scholastic, that is, medieval theology. Modern neo-Thomism (rarely discussed outside of Catholicism and mandated by papal documents like Pope Leo XIII's encyclical Aeterni Patris of 1879) sought to transcend the Enlightenment and Reformation by proposing that the thought-world of medieval Scholasticism, and particularly that of Thomas Aquinas, could hold solutions to contemporary problems.

Important moments in the history of Thomist interpretations occurred, for instance, in the sixteenth century with the Salamancan Dominicans defending human rights, the controversy between Jesuits and Dominicans over grace and free will, and the interpretation of grace and personality employed by the Carmelite mystics. Less positive were the unimaginative Church responses, mired in a dated Scholasticism, to both the Renaissance and the Reformation, and the widespread but superficial and often oppressive study of Thomist textbooks prior to Vatican II (1962–65). The "third Thomism" (1500–1720) was excessively philosophical, a sign of which is the attempt through "Twenty-four Theses" to establish one set of philosophical principles that would encapsulate all of Aquinas. At the turn of the century various scholars (Martin Grabmann, Étienne Gilson, and Marie-Dominique Chenu) initiated the study of the Middle Ages, locating Aquinas's theology in its cultural context; others (Pierre Rousselot, Joseph Maréchal) brought the thought of Aquinas into dialogue with modern philosophies. Along with the reemphasis in Catholicism on the Bible and the Fathers, these scholarly initiatives led to a greater appreciation of Aquinas as a theologian.

Basic Elements: Throughout its many metamorphoses Thomism remains a philosophical theology where human life remains in active touch with the worlds of nature and of grace. Fundamental to this school of thought are the following: each nature reveals its being through activity, and it acts for a goal; God bestows upon creatures the reality and dignity of true causes; human knowing grasps and forms the external world; human beings are created images of God's intelligence and goodness; the life of the Trinity is shared with women and men through grace; this graced life, theologically explored from Aristotle's psychology, is an invitation for all to virtue and meditation; in this life Jesus is both casual influence and model and his power continues in sacraments of grace. One can find these characteristics at work in modern theologians such as Edward Schillebeeckx and Karl Rahner (d. 1984), painters such as Fra Angelico (d. 1455) and Raphael (d. 1520), novelists such as Graham Greene (d. 1991) and Flannery O'Connor (d. 1964), or in papal encyclicals on social justice.

The most recent Thomism, with its own pluralism (Jesuits and Dominicans, Reginald Garrigou-Lagrange and Antonin-Gilbert Sertillanges), succeeded by 1935 in making known the texts and philosophy of Aquinas and in extending the influence of his thought. But many sought through Vatican power a monopolistic and dictatorial control over Catholic thinking, and, in the name of Thomism, warred against modern philosophy, science, and politics as well as ecumenism, vernacular liturgy, and modern art. But the mind of Aquinas was, in fact, remarkably open to diverse movements and sources. This monopoly of thought ended when Vatican II (1962–65) affirmed modern biblical, patristic, systematic, and pastoral theologies, many of which were rooted in Aquinas's historical openness and positive depiction of God and humans. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas; neo-Scholasticism; Scholasticism; transcendental Thomism. THOMAS F. O'MEARA

Thompson, Francis, 1859–1907, English poet and critic. The son of converts to Catholicism, his early life was a series of failures: he dropped out of seminary, ended medical studies at Manchester University, quit as a salesman, and was not accepted by the army. When his mother died in 1880, he became an opium addict and a derelict. In 1889 the monks at Storrington took him in, and his masterpiece, "The Hound of Heaven," was written the following year. His last ten years were quite productive: he wrote over five hundred reviews. His poetry is metaphysical in its interests, mystical, and somewhat florid.

Thorlac Thorhallsson, St., 1133–93, patron saint of Iceland. He founded a monastery at Thykkviboer and became its abbot. Later he was named bishop of Skalholt, one of two dioceses in Iceland. Feast day: December 23.

Three Chapters (ca. 544), strictly speaking, an edict of the emperor Justinian, but the name is usually transferred to the three subjects it anathematizes. Justinian attempted to appease the Monophysites by condemning the person and works of Theodore of Mopsuestia, the writings of Theodoret of Cyrrhus against Cyril of Alexandria, and Ibas of Edessa's letter to Maris—all representatives of the Antiochene theology inherited and developed by Nestorius. Pope Vigilius protested but, summoned to Constantinople, reversed himself (548). The Western churches objected vehemently, and Vigilius withdrew his support, but Constantinople II (553) condemned the Three Chapters and excommunicated Vigilius. When Vigilius, condemned to prison or exile, confirmed the council's decision (December 553), the Western bishops again protested, the patriarchate of Aquileia even withdrawing from communion. The schism persisted until ca. 689. See also Antioch, school of; Constantinople, councils of; Justinian I; Monophysitism; Vigilius.

throats, blessing of, the practice of placing two crossed candles, accompanied by the recitation of a prayer, on the throats of the faithful. This practice arose as part of the cult of St. Blaise, a fourth-century bishop of Sebaste (modern Armenia). When Diocletian ordered the persecution of Christians, Blaise hid in a forest. Legend describes wild animals gathering in his cave where, unharmed, he fed them all. When hunters came upon his hiding place and saw him surrounded by lions and bears, they decided he was a magician and took him captive. While in prison, he saved the life of a boy who was choking on a fishbone. The boy's mother rewarded Blaise with food and candles. Blaise was later beheaded. After his martyrdom he was invoked, as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, on behalf of people suffering from throat infections. The blessing of throats with candles on his feast day began in the sixteenth century when his cult was at its peak. Feast day: February 3. See also Blaise, St.

throne, bishop's. See cathedra.

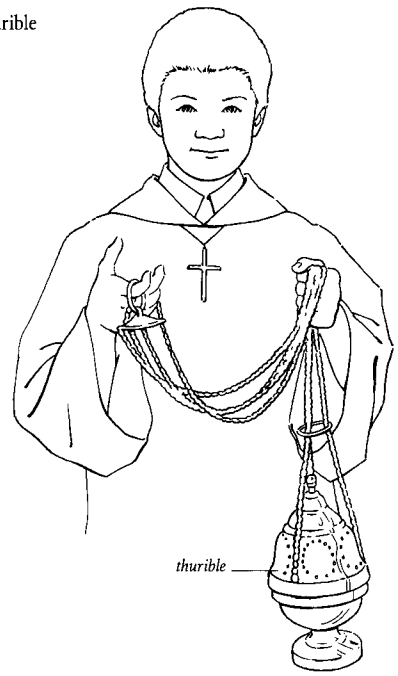
thurible (thur'ih-bul; Lat., "censer" or "incense"), the vessel containing hot coals in which incense is burned. It may also be called a censer. Thuribles are made of metal, suspended upon a short chain, and swung gently to create the most smoke. Some vessels for burning incense are stationary, but these are more properly called braziers. See also incense; thurifer.

Thurible



Papal tiara

thurifer (thur'ih-fur; Lat., "thuriblе carrier"), the minister or acolyte charged with holding the thurible and incense boat during liturgical ceremonies. The thurifer maintains the lighted charcoals within the thurible. The thurifer is always the first member of any procession, proceeding either the cross or the Gospel book. See also incense; thurible.

tiara, papal, extraliturgical papal headdress that evolved from a kind of cap in the early Middle Ages. It assumed a coronet and then, in time, two and finally three coronets with two cloth strips (lappets) hanging behind. The final, beehive shape took its form in the fifteenth century. The symbolism of the tiara was closely associated with both sacred and secular papal power. With the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), however, that symbolism, plus its increasingly ornate and costly character, came to be regarded as inappropriate. The use of the tiara (and any "crowning" with it for new popes) was ended by Pope Paul VI after the council, and no pope has used it or been crowned with it ever since. See also coronation, papal.

Tillich, Paul, 1886–1965, German Protestant theologian who influenced both Protestant and Catholic thinkers, especially in the United States. Tillich's experiences in World War I modified his education in liberal Protestantism, while his life in Berlin expanded his cultural horizons. He was a pioneering advocate within Protestantism for a more positive attitude toward modern art and psychotherapy. After influencing generations of students at Union Theological Seminary in New York, his university-wide lectures at Harvard University and the University of Chicago were exceedingly popular, and during this time he composed his three-volume Systematic Theology (1951–63). With Catholic theologians in the United States, he initiated a dialogue that spread to Germany, France, and Italy, and then to Africa and Asia. Catholics were particularly attracted by Tillich's appreciation of philosophy and mysticism, his knowledge of the history of Christianity outside of Protestantism, and his theology's openness to the divine in the finite (the principle of sacramentality).

time, duration wherein events are ordered as earlier than, simultaneous with, or later than one another. Philosophers and scientists debate, for example, time's relationship to change, how time as subjectively experienced relates to time as an objective measure, and whether, in view of its relativistic connection to space, time "flows." Augustine (d. 430) and Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) formulated the traditional position that, as its eternal Creator, God exists "outside" time, whatever its ultimate nature. Divine "timelessness" is, however, much debated by contemporary theologians. See also eternity; relativity; space.

time [canon law], computation of time according to legal rules. Some canonical rules seem quite obvious, such as "A day is composed of twenty-four hours." Others are more complicated and legislate the amount of time within which certain procedures must or may take place. Still others lay down the manner in which time should be calculated for certain actions.

There are two kinds of time in canon law (cans. 200–203): continuous time (the usual way of calculating the lapse of time) and available time (sometimes called useful time). Terms of office are calculated continuously, as is the six-month interval between ordination to the diaconate and ordination to the priesthood. On the other hand, if a person is elected to an office, the law provides eight days of available time from the receipt of notification to the time when the person informs the authority whether he or she accepts the office. However, if the person is unaware of this legal provision or is unable to respond within its limits, the time within which the response is to be made does not run. Available time also applies to appeals against judicial sentences and for recourse against administrative decrees.

Timothy, St., early Christian missionary and coworker of the Apostle Paul. Timothy came from Lystra in Asia Minor, the son of a Jewish-Christian mother and a Greek father (Acts 16:1). Paul first met him during Paul's second missionary journey. Timothy accompanied him during parts of his second and third missionary journeys. During the second missionary journey, Timothy was sent by Paul to strengthen the Thessalonian Christians (1 Thess 1:1; 3:2, 6). During the third he was sent by Paul from Ephesus to Corinth (1 Cor 4:17; 16:10) and to Philippi (Phil 2:19) as an emissary to deal with the problems of these two communities. Paul joined Timothy again in Macedonia (Acts 19:22; 2 Cor 1:19), and he accompanied Paul to Corinth (Rom 16:10) and at least as far as Troas on Paul's return to Jerusalem (Acts 20:4). Timothy's prominence is indicated not only by the delicate tasks that Paul gave him but also by his being listed by Paul in the openings of 1 Thessalonians, Philippians, and 2 Corinthians. Timothy was also the supposed recipient of two letters from Paul (1–2 Timothy), both of which probably came from a "Pauline school" toward the end of the first century A.D. In later Christian tradition Timothy was considered the first bishop of Ephesus (probably based on 1 Tim 1:3). Feast day: January 26.

Tisserant, Eugene Gabriel, 1884–1972, French orientalist, Oriental Scriptor, and later Prefect (head librarian) of the Vatican Library. Created a cardinal and bishop in 1937, Tisserant is esteemed for his years (1936–59) as Prefect of the Vatican Congregation for the Oriental Churches, where he manifested his knowledge, love, and support for Eastern Catholics. He was dean of the College of Cardinals when John XXIII was elected (1958).

tithing, the setting aside of a tenth of one's income for sacred purposes. A common practice in the ancient Near East, it appears in several OT law codes. Some texts suggest it was associated with shrines (Gen 28:22; Amos 4:4) or served as a royal tax (1 Sam 8:15, 17). The Deuteronomistic code modified regulations in an effort to create a central sanctuary (Deut 14:22–29). The priestly code and postexilic texts stressed clerical support (Lev 27:30–33; Num 18:21–32; Neh 10:32–39). Later attempts to harmonize variations in these codes resulted in multiple tithes (Tob 1:6–8). NT writers mention tithing only in passing (Matt 23:23; Luke 11:42; Heb 7:1–10). Paul's instructions on the Jerusalem collection urge voluntary giving (1 Cor 16:1–4; 2 Cor 8–9), which became the practice of Christians until religious and civil authorities (sixth and eighth centuries) initiated legislation mandating tithing. Although the Council of Trent (1545–63) upheld the practice, civil authorities have abolished it since and ecclesiastical practice has moved back toward voluntary contributions.

title, a classical inscription (titulus, Lat.) denoting a claim to a particular building or territory. Thus, the term applies to a church or deaconry assigned to a cardinal. Because the College of Cardinals has its origin in the clergy of Rome, each cardinal is assigned to a church or deaconry (section of that city) in remembrance of this fact. The term was also used in the past to indicate the source of support for a cleric receiving Holy Orders, e.g., the title to remunerated service of the diocese, or to daily meals at the common table. See also titular church.

titles of Christ, biblical references to Jesus Christ. The name "Christ" is the English translation of the Latin Christus or the Greek Christos, both of which are references to "the anointed one," or the Hebrew word for "messiah." Shortly after Jesus' death, the disciples called him "the Christ" to express their belief in him as the unique Messiah, but this title became shortened to "Christ." The NT uses "Jesus Christ" and "Christ Jesus" interchangeably. Additionally, the Christian tradition includes the following biblical references as titles of Christ:

son of Joseph (Mark 6:3) son of Mary (Luke 3:23) the Son of Man (Matt 8:20) the Bread of Life (John 6:35)
the Master (Luke 8:24) the High Priest (Heb 5:10) prophet (Matt 21:46) bridegroom (Mark 2:19) the Alpha and the Omega (Rev 22:13) Logos (John 1:1)
the Just One (Acts 3:14)
Lamb of God (John 1:29)
the Way, the Truth, and the Life (John 14:6)

the Good Shepherd (John 10:11) the Lord (Rom 10:9) the Head of the Body (Col 1:18) the Vine (John 15:1)
the Savior (Titus 3:7)
Redeemer (Luke 24:21)
Servant (Luke 22:26) the Light of the World (John 8:12) the Resurrection (John 21:23)
the firstborn (Col 1:15)
He-Who-Comes (Luke 13:35)
the Son of God (Matt 14:33)
See also Jesus Christ.

titular bishop, bishop given an honorary diocese. Auxiliary bishops, together with those in diplomatic or administrative posts and who are not heads of dioceses, are given the title of an extinct see (e.g., Hippo, St. Augustine's diocese in North Africa) as a reminder that the office of bishop has its primary purpose in caring for the people of a Christian community. Most of these extinct sees are in areas of the world in which there are no longer large numbers of Christians. See also auxiliary bishop; titular see.

titular church, Roman church assigned to a cardinal for honorary purposes. Because the College of Cardinals has its origin in the clergy of Rome, each cardinal is given an honorary position among the Roman clergy. Titular churches usually display the coats of arms and portraits or photographs of the cardinal to whom they have been assigned. Many cardinals take an interest in their Roman churches and offer them financial assistance. Cardinal deacons' churches are known as diaconal rather than titular churches. See also title.

titular see, extinct diocese given to a bishop who is not the head of an extant see. The bishop might be an auxiliary or have another administrative or diplomatic position. Titular sees (e.g., Hippo in North Africa) are in a part of the world (e.g., Turkey, Syria, North Africa) where there is no longer a Christian community (at least not one large enough to be recognized as a diocese). See also titular bishop.

Titus, St. (ti'tuhs), early Christian missionary and co-worker of the Apostle Paul. Titus was of Greek origin and perhaps a native of Antioch on the Orontes. In A.D. 48 he accompanied Paul and Barnabas from Antioch to Jerusalem to meet with the leaders of the Jerusalem church about whether gentile Christians had to be circumcised and observe Mosaic law. As an indication of his success, Paul claimed that Titus, although a Greek, was not compelled to be circumcised (Gal 2:3). Titus was Paul's co-worker at least during Paul's stay at Ephesus on his third missionary journey. In Paul's sometimes bitter dispute with the Corinthian Christians, Titus was sent to Corinth to serve as intermediary. He was successful in mediating the dispute for, when Paul rejoined Titus in Macedonia, he was comforted by the news that Titus brought from Corinth (2 Cor 2:13; 7:6, 13–14). Titus was also the supposed recipient of a Letter from Paul (Titus), which probably came from a "Pauline school" toward the end of the first century A.D. Titus also appears in several of the apocryphal Acts of the apostles and, based on Titus 1:5, was later thought to be the first bishop of Crete. Feast day: January 26.

Toledo, councils of, apart from the relatively insignificant first and second councils (ca. 397 and 527), a series of sixteen Visigothic councils meeting at Toledo from 589 to 702. They embody a uniquely Visigothic symbiosis between Church and state. Convened by the king, but under the presidency of a bishop, they issued professions of faith and canons pertaining to church discipline, but could also promulgate law codes and other legislation pertaining to national affairs. See also Spain, Catholicism in.

tolerance, religious, respect for the consciences of others in matters of religious faith and practice and acknowledgment of their legal right to express and practice their faith. Catholic teaching on religious tolerance developed significantly at Vatican II in the Declaration on Religious Freedom (1965). Before the council, the Church called upon states to protect the religious freedom of the Church when Catholics were a minority, but did not call for tolerance toward other faiths when Catholics were a majority. At the council the Church went far beyond merely advocating tolerance and held that religious freedom is a natural right. The foundation of this right is twofold: the dignity of free and rational human persons, which requires that individuals assume personal responsibility for their actions and omissions (n. 2); and the freedom of the act of faith (nn. 9–10). The full exercise of human responsibility requires freedom from both coercion and restraint in all matters of religion. Since human responsibility is inalienable, this right may not be removed or impeded, except to protect the public order (n. 4). The council further held that this natural right to religious freedom should be given constitutional protection and hence become a civil right (nn. 2, 6).

The Church's prior official teaching was rooted in the proposition that error and evil have no rights and in the fear that an endorsement of toleration would support religious indifferentism or relativism. The council avoided this problem by seeing religious freedom as a negative right, a freedom from coercion, not a freedom to believe what is false and do what is evil. See also Declaration on Religious Freedom; religious liberty.

THOMAS POUNDSTONE

toleration of evil, the allowance or noneradication of wrongful practices or institutions. The context for discussing toleration of evil is that of the use of authority, and most especially (though not exclusively) civil authority. Civil authorities are charged with protecting the rights of individuals and promoting those conditions favorable to their flourishing. In brief, they are charged with promoting the common good. This means that they will work to stamp out evil and its causes wherever feasible.

However, the eradication of evil is not always practically feasible. At times the attempt to do so will induce even greater evils or sacrifice indispensable goods. Catholic tradition has, therefore, accepted the general notion that the toleration of evil by civil authorities is sometimes morally permissible.

The classic statement on the matter is that of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) in the Summa Theologiae: "Human governance is derived from divine governance, and it ought to imitate this divine governance. Although God is omnipotent and good in the highest degree, nevertheless he permits certain evil things to develop in the universe, which he would be able to prevent except that, if these things were taken away, greater goods would be eliminated or even greater evils would follow as a consequence. So also in human governance, those who govern rightly tolerate certain evils lest certain goods be impeded or also lest some greater evil obtain, as Augustine said in the second book of his De Ordine" (2–2, 10.11).

Theologians have accepted this general principle but they have disagreed vigorously at times about its application to this or that evil, e.g., prostitution and abortion. See also civil law and morality; evil.

RICHARD A. MCCORMICK

Augustus Tolton, a priest whose courageous example in the face of racial prejudice has inspired African-American Catholics in the United States ever since.

Tolton, Augustus, 1854–97, the first African-American priest to identify with, and to be acclaimed by, black Catholics. Born a slave, Tolton was ordained in Rome in 1886. Denis J. O'Connell, rector of the North American College in Rome, said that Tolton's ordination "opens the door wider here for colored candidates." After an initial period of acceptance, however, his trials as a pastor in Quincy, Illinois, and in Chicago, where he endured severe racial prejudice, portended the fate of many black priests. Bishop James Ryan of Alton, Illinois, explained to Rome that Tolton's trouble in Quincy resulted because "he wants to establish a kind of society here that is not possible (integration)." Even the great archbishop John Ireland of St. Paul, Minnesota, once said of a prospective young black seminarian, "I want no Toltons." Tolton's ministry, however, inspired increased black Catholic activism in the Church and in society and his name is still held in high esteem among African-American Catholics today. See also black Catholics.

Tome of Leo, the letter sent in June 449 by Pope Leo the Great to Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, condemning Eutyches's Christology; it is the classical articulation of the Western Christology of two natures, one person. The Tome was canonized by the Council of Chalcedon (451), and many of its phrases were adopted into the council's formula. It teaches that the one subject in Jesus is the person of the Word of God, in whom two natures are permanently but unconfusedly united. Each nature retains its characteristic properties (e.g., it is the humanity, properly speaking, that suffers), but because of the unity of person, it is also appropriate and indeed necessary to say, e.g., that God's eternal Son was crucified. See also Chalcedon, Council of; Christology; Leo I, "the Great," St.

tongues, gift of. See glossolalia.

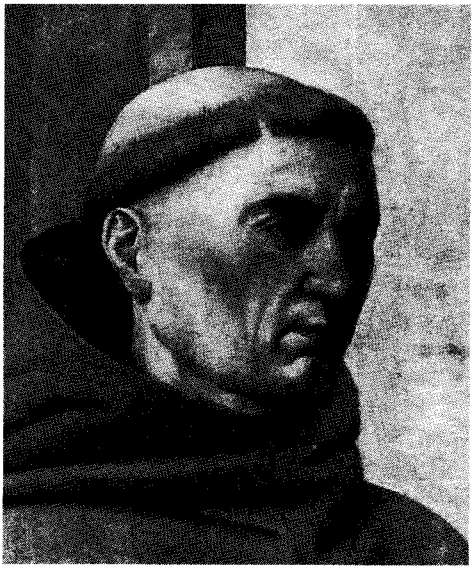
tonsure, a now-abandoned rite of initiation to the clerical state. The rite involved the ceremonial cutting of a portion of the candidate's hair on the crown of the head. Originally a monastic practice, tonsure later emerged as a distinct rite of admission to the clerical state in the sixth and seventh centuries. Paul VI eliminated tonsure and all minor orders in 1972. Admission to the clerical state now occurs at ordination to the diaconate. See also clergy; deacon.

Traditional full tonsure of a monk; other forms were much smaller in size or, in the case of candidates for the diocesan priesthood, involved only a symbolic clipping of a few hairs from the crown of the head.



Torah (tohr'ah; Heb., "instruction"), the traditional Jewish designation for the Pentateuch. Torah can be used generically to refer to commands and rulings (Gen 26:5; Exod 18:16) or to instruction, particularly for priests (Deut 17:10–11; 33:10). The term epitomized the instruction that God gave through Moses (Josh 1:7; 1 Kgs 2:3). It came to be applied to the collection of such instruction found in the book of Deuteronomy (Deut 1:5; 4:8; 28:58, 61; 31:26), a version of which was found in the Temple under Josiah (2 Kgs 22:8; 23:25). From that application arose the more comprehensive reference to the whole of the Pentateuch. See also Pentateuch.

Torquemada, Juan de, also known as Juan de Turrecremata, 1388–1468, Spanish Dominican bishop, cardinal, and theologian. He attended the councils of Constance (1414–18) and Basel-Ferrara-Florence (1431–43), defending the rights of the papacy, opposing conciliarism, and presenting the first systematic exposition of the pope's universal pastoral jurisdiction. He also played an important role at the Council of Florence in the negotiations for reunion with the Greek Church. His magisterial work, Summa on the Church (1489), was a major step in the development of ecclesiology. Although it defended papal infallibility and the fullness of the pope's spiritual power, it took a moderate position on temporal papal power. He supported the Thomist tradition in opposing the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception.

Torquemada, Tomas de, also known as Tomas de Turrecremata, 1420–98, Spanish Grand Inquisitor and Dominican confessor of Isabella I and Ferdinand. Though himself of Jewish descent, he encouraged the expulsion of the Jews from Spain. In spite of papal attempts to restrain him, he pursued people accused of heresy with unprecedented rigor. See also Inquisition.

totality, principle of, the principle that justifies the sacrifice of an organ or its function for the overall good of the whole person (thus, "totality").

Pope Pius XII discusses this principle in many places in his essays on medical ethics. He rejects its application to the individual's relation to the community, as if the person could be subordinated to the good of the community. While the name "principle of totality" is relatively new, the concept is not. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) wrote: "Since any member is a part of the whole human body, it exists for the sake of the whole as the imperfect for the sake of the perfect. Hence a member of the human body is to be disposed of according as it may profit the whole. Per se, the member of the human body is useful for the welfare of the whole body; per accidens, however it can happen that it is harmful, for example, when a diseased member is injurious to the whole body. If, therefore, a member is healthy and continuing in its natural state, it cannot be cut off to the detriment of the whole" (Summa Theologiae 2–2, 65.1c).

Clearly, contemporary theologians, with greater medical knowledge, realize that even healthy organs and functions can be a "detriment to the whole." See also bioethics; medical ethics.

Toth, Alexis (tawth), 1845–1909, first Ruthenian Catholic priest in America to convert to Russian Orthodoxy. This conversion happened after an interview with Archbishop Ireland of St. Paul, during which he requested and was refused permission to function as a priest. In all, about 300,000 Catholic Ruthenians became Orthodox as a result of the movement that the Hungarian-born Toth started. Posthumously, he was hailed by the Russian Orthodox as the "Father of American Orthodoxy." See also Ireland, John.

tract, a psalm chanted after the first reading in the Tridentine Mass by a soloist on certain more solemn penitential days in which the Alleluia is not sung. See also Tridentine Mass.

Tracy, David W., b. 1939, a leading American theologian and professor at the University of Chicago. Ordained in 1963, he received an S.T.D. from Gregorian University, Rome, in 1965. He has taught at The Divinity School, University of Chicago, since 1969 and has, since 1987, occupied the Greeley Distinguished Service Professorship of Catholic Studies. He is the author of major works in foundational theology, including Blessed Rage for Order (1975) and The Analogical Imagination (1981).

tradition, the process and content of the transmission of beliefs, doctrines, rituals, Scriptures, and life of the Church. As process, tradition constitutes the teaching, life, and worship of the Church through which the truth and reality communicated by Christ and the Spirit to the apostles is passed on to succeeding generations. As content, tradition comprises the whole life of the Church, everything that contributes to holiness of life, all that the Church is and believes (Vatican II, Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 8). This content is more than a message; it is the whole life and activity of the Church, the totality of Christian revelation.

General usage distinguishes between Tradition (capital "T") as the process of transmission, tradition (small "t," singular) as the content of what is transmitted, and traditions (small "t," plural) as the particular customs of separate churches or movements.

Council of Trent: The relationship between Scripture and tradition has been a critical point of discussion in the history of the Church. When Martin Luther insisted that the word of God in Scripture was the only source of Christian truth, the Church was faced with the task of articulating the relationship between Scripture and tradition. After rejecting a preliminary draft that stated that revelation is contained "partly in written books, partly in unwritten traditions," the Council of Trent (1543–65) taught that the gospel, the source of saving truth and rule of conduct, is "contained in the written books and unwritten traditions" that have come down to us. (D 1501)

Sometimes Trent is interpreted as teaching that revelation is contained in two separate, parallel sources, Scripture and tradition, and this was, in fact, the general interpretation of the Counter-Reformation, which interpreted revelation as a series of propositions contained either in Scripture or handed down by oral tradition, so as to imply two different sources of Tradition. This was the position of Melchior Cano, Peter Canisius, Robert Bellarmine, and H. Lennerz. J. R. Geiselmann, on the other hand, held that divine revelation is contained entirely in tradition and entirely in the Scriptures. J. Beumer developed an intermediate theory according to which tradition encompasses all that Scripture contains and interprets it.

Today it is generally agreed that Scripture itself is a product of tradition (upper and lower cases alike). In the early Church an oral tradition preceded the written tradition collected in the Scriptures. In this sense tradition logically and chronologically precedes Scripture.

Trent does not explicitly consider tradition in the modern sense of the whole life of the Church. Nor does it refer to traditions as a collection of traditions, that is, ecclesiastical customs. Rather, "traditions" refer to apostolic traditions, what is essential to faith. Examples of traditions in the Tridentine sense would include the sacraments, particularly the Eucharist.

Second Vatican Council: The Second Vatican Council (1962–65) clarifies this relationship in the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation when it teaches that sacred Tradition and Sacred Scripture form one sacred deposit of the word of God, which is entrusted to the teaching authority of the Church for authentic interpretation (n. 10). Vatican Council II refused to adopt the expression "two sources of revelation." It spoke of a single deposit of the word of God expressed in written form or in the form of Tradition (n. 10). Significantly, the document does not oppose oral traditions to written traditions. Vatican II no longer identified revelation with propositions, but with the word of God in its entirety. Further, Tradition is seen as encompassing the whole life, witness, and worship of the Church.

Scripture and tradition are intimately interrelated; both of them, "flowing out from the same divine well-spring, come together in some fashion to form one thing, and move towards the same goal" (Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, n. 9). The correlative relationship between Scripture and tradition is evident in the fact that Scripture is the critical norm to which tradition is subject, while Scripture itself is one form of apostolic tradition because it represents the Christian community's experience of the life and teaching of Jesus.

As the relationship between Scripture and tradition has been a focal question in the Church, so, too, is the relationship between tradition and change. Tradition demands continuity with the past, yet because it is living, it also develops. Vatican II teaches that Tradition continues through the apostolic succession and develops with the help of the Holy Spirit with the result that revelation is received with greater understanding. Growth in insight into what is being passed on occurs through the contemplation and study of believers, their intimate sense of spiritual realities, and preaching (n. 8).

"The authentic interpretation of the Word of God, whether in its written form or in the form of Tradition, has been entrusted to the living teaching office of the Church alone" (n. 10). It is the responsibility of the teaching office to ensure that any growth in the tradition is continuous with the Tradition and with original revelation. This teaching office is limited by what has been handed on to it. See also revelation; Scripture and tradition; traditionalism, Catholic.

Bibliography

Congar, Yves. Tradition and Traditions. London: Burns and Oates, 1966.

Mackey, John P. Tradition and Change in the Church. Dayton, OH: Pflaum Press, 1968.

Moran, Gabriel. Scripture and Tradition: A Survey of the Controversy. New York: Herder and Herder, 1963.

Tavard, George H. Holy Writ or Holy Church. New York: Harper, 1959.

SUSAN K. WOOD

traditionalism, Catholic, a teaching of certain Catholic philosophers and theologians in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries that human reason can attain to knowledge of God and of moral and religious truth only by God's revelation. Revelation is passed down within a tradition that provides instruction through the written and spoken word. There were two main schools of traditionalist thought. The rigid school was represented by L. de Bonald (d. 1840), who taught that the Creator had to provide the human mind with both ideas and language and had done so by speaking to a particular man who then instructed others. Similar teachings were put forth by F. de Lamennais (d. 1854) and by J. de Maistre (d. 1821). A moderate traditionalism was closely associated with the University of Louvain. Moderate traditionalists considered instruction a necessary condition for human reason to come to understanding of divine truth, though the capacity for such knowledge resided in reason itself.

Traditionalist doctrine was formulated against the extremes of Enlightenment rationalism, which denied any value to Christian tradition and fostered the idea that reasoning alone would lead to an understanding of all truth, even divine truth. Traditionalism itself, however, tends to the error of promoting blind faith, suggesting that faith is irrational and disregarding the value of human rationality.

Numerous provincial councils and several papal encyclicals during the first half of the nineteenth century condemned traditionalist writings. Nonetheless, the doctrine continued to attract adherents. Against extreme traditionalism, the First Vatican Council (1870) officially declared that without external revelation, human reason is capable of reaching the conclusion that God exists. The conciliar document, however, retains the values found in traditionalist emphasis on the importance of faith. It asserts that revelation, tradition, and instruction are important aids to full and correct understanding of God. Today Catholic traditionalism applies to those opposed to the central reforms of Vatican II (1962–65). See also tradition; Ultramontanism; Vatican Council I.

CORINNE WINTER

tradition of the instruments. See instruments, tradition of the.

traditors (Lat., traditor, "one who handed over"), persons who surrendered the Scriptures when possession of them was outlawed in Africa during the Diocletian persecution (303–311). When peace was restored to the churches, controversies began concerning the validity of sacraments celebrated by traditors. See also persecutions.

traducianism (Lat., tradux, "vine branch"), the doctrine that human souls are derived from their parents' souls, either by direct generation (Tertullian) or by God's individual shaping of spiritual substance derived from the parents' souls (admitted by Augustine as a possibility). See also soul.

transcendence (Lat., transcendere, "to climb over," "to surpass"), the divine, or supernatural, order. God is described as transcendent because God's existence surpasses creaturely existence. Transcendence is often contrasted with immanence. The latter emphasizes the presence of God within human existence rather than above and beyond it. See also supernatural.

transcendental Thomism, an approach in philosophy and theology that combines modern philosophy with the thought of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). Transcendental philosophy, which has origins in the works of Immanuel Kant but includes the range of modern philosophy from Friedrich Schelling to Henri Bergson and Martin Heidegger, focuses on the conditions of knowledge and on the nature of the human subject. Despite a century of hostility from Church authorities, after 1900 a few Catholic thinkers began to point out the similarities between this modern philosophy of the free human subject and that of Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) and Aquinas. The latter two had addressed the dynamics of human knowledge. In the modern Francophone world the same issues were addressed by Pierre Rousselot, Joseph Maréchal, and Maurice Blondel; after World War I, in Germany other Catholic scholars continued the same approach: Gustav Siewerth, Johann Baptist Lotz, Max Müller, Bernhard Welte, and Karl Rahner. In Rome, the Canadian Bernard Lonergan examined philosophy, theological method, and ways of knowing. The more conservative orientation of Hans Urs von Balthasar also had some sources in transcendental thought. Karl Rahner's theology in particular has shown how to consider the most basic truths of Christianity from the point of view of the human subject without sacrificing the divine initiative and the reality of revelation and grace. The Church is at times viewed by Vatican II (1962–65) as a collective self (People of God) or as a symbolic sacrament for history and the world. When an area of Christianity is explored through an analysis of the human subject, whether in psychology or existential philosophy, and when the historical and cultural context of knowledge and life is taken seriously, such a theology is really building upon the work of the transcendental Thomists. See also Thomism.

THOMAS F. O'MEARA

Transfiguration, the appearance of Jesus to his disciples in glorified form. The synoptic Gospels all record the episode (Matt 17:1–9; Mark 9:2–10; Luke 9:28–36). Jesus took Peter, James, and John with him onto a mountain. There he appeared before them in a luminous form with Moses and Elijah at his side. Peter reacted by proposing to build three tabernacles. A heavenly voice then declared Jesus to be the "beloved son" and enjoined the disciples to heed him. Jesus then appeared in his usual form and commanded his disciples to keep silence.

Jesus is transfigured with Moses and Elijah, while Peter, James, and John cover their faces; sixteenth-century painting by Raphael, Villa Albani, Rome.

Numerous interpretations of the episode have been proposed. Some view it as a misplaced account of a resurrection appearance; others as a report of a mystical experience that Jesus' disciples had in his presence; others as a symbolic account devised by the first Evangelist or the tradition on which he relied. Whatever its origin, the episode serves as a literary device to place Jesus on the same level as the Law and the Prophets. He is the authentic source of divine truth for those who would listen to him. The feast of the Transfiguration is celebrated on August 6. See also Jesus Christ.

transfinalization, philosophical theory developed in the latter part of the twentieth century maintaining that the substance of a thing is its finality, or ultimate purpose; sacramental theory that in the Eucharist the finality of bread and wine as food to be eaten is changed into a new finality of nourishing Christians with the body and blood of Christ. In Mysterium Fidei (1965) Pope Paul VI insisted that the new finality is grounded in a new ontological reality, i.e., there is not only a change in ultimate purpose of the consecrated bread and wine but also in their very being. See also Real Presence; transubstantiation.

transignification, philosophical theory developed in the latter part of the twentieth century maintaining that the substance of a thing is its meaning; sacramental theory that in the Eucharist the meaning of bread and wine as the ordinary nourishment for human beings is changed into a new meaning of communion with the body and blood of the Lord. In Mysterium Fidei (1965) Pope Paul VI insisted that the new meaning is grounded in a new ontological reality, i.e., there is not only a change in the meaning of the consecrated bread and wine but also in their very being. See also Real Presence; transubstantiation.

transitional diaconate. See deacon, transitional.

transmutation, word used in the patristic era to describe the change that takes place in the bread and wine at the Eucharist; also used by Guitmond of Aversa (late eleventh century), who described the change of the bread and wine as a transmutation of their substance into that of Christ's body and blood. See also Real Presence; transubstantiation.

transubstantiation, teaching of the Church that the substance of the bread and wine offered at the Eucharist is changed into the substance of the body and blood of Jesus Christ. The term emerged out of medieval attempts to resolve the conflict between seeing bread and wine as mere signs or asserting their change into the body and blood of Christ even in their physical components. In the late eleventh century theologians described the change that takes place at the Eucharist in terms of a change in the substance of bread and wine, which undergoes transformation into the substance of the Lord's body and blood. The term "transubstantiation" itself is found only in the twelfth century and was subsequently used at Lateran IV (1215).

Under the influence of Aristotelian thought, theologians gradually came to distinguish between the substance of the Eucharist (the body and blood of the Lord) and the accidents of bread and wine (their weight, texture, color, etc.). These remain, even as the substance of bread and wine changes into the substance of Christ's body and blood.

In response to opposition to transubstantiation from the Reformers of the sixteenth century, the Council of Trent in 1551 affirmed that the substance of bread and wine is changed into that of Christ's body and blood, adding that "this change the holy Catholic Church has fittingly and properly named transubstantiation."

Trent's use of the word was intended not to explain how the change takes place but to provide a term that describes what takes place. Theological attempts in the latter part of the twentieth century to define the substance (transignification and transfinalization) led Pope Paul VI to insist in Mysterium Fidei (1965) that the new meaning and finality of the consecrated bread and wine are grounded in the new ontological reality of the presence of the body and blood of the Lord. See also Real Presence.

JOHN J. STRYNKOWSKI

Trappistine Sisters, officially known as Cistercian Nuns of the Strict Observance (O.C.S.O.), an order of Cistercian women who trace their origins to the founding of a cloister for women at Tart, near the Cistercian monastery at Cîteaux, France, in the early Trappist monk, also known as a Cistercian of the Strict Observance, fulfilling a normal daily task of service to his community and the Church with the use of modern technology.

twelfth century. The Trappistines represent a reform movement instituted by Dom Augustin with the 1796 founding of the convent La Sainte Volonté de Dieu in Switzerland. Today the Trappistines have convents throughout Europe and Africa, as well as two houses in the United States: in Wrentham, Massachusetts, and in Dubuque, Iowa. They are cloistered nuns, living a contemplative life of prayer, spiritual reading, and manual work. See also Cistercian order.

Trappists, the popular name for the main branch of the Cistercians, the Order of Cistercians of the Strict Observance (O.C.S.O.). It was formed in 1892 by the consolidation of three congregations of Cistercian monks and nuns who had resisted mitigation of monastic customs. The Strict Observance developed against the backdrop of seventeenth-century Gallicanism and Jansenism. Gallicanism claimed for the Catholic Church of France almost total autonomy from Rome. The crown made all ecclesiastical appointments and adjudicated disputes. A morally rigorous Jansenism opposed both papal centralism and state control of the Church, as well as aristocratic extravagance and Jesuit theology. In this environment, young reform-minded Cistercians declared their determination to observe the Rule of St. Benedict to the letter. The symbolic dividing line of reform—the refusal to eat meat—led to the nickname "abstinents," as against the "ancients," or followers of a long-standing relaxation of this rule.

Historical Development: Under Cardinal Richelieu, chief minister of France and commendary abbot general of the Cistercian order, and his successor, Cardinal Mazarin, the Strict Observance became increasingly influential, despite opposition from other Cistercian congregations and from Rome. When Richelieu died in 1642, the Ancients became defenders of the papacy against secular involvement in religious affairs and the Abstinents enjoyed the protection of the French queen, Anne of Austria (d. 1666), who traded papal acquiescence for royal opposition to Jansenism. The apostolic constitution In Suprema (1666) recognized the Strict Observance as a legal entity within the Sacred Order of Cistercians and fruitlessly imposed perpetual silence over the dispute.

The best known of the Strict Observance abbots was Armand-Jean Bouthillier de Rancé (d. 1700). A nobleman with connections to the royal court, Rancé had become commendatory abbot of five monasteries at age twelve, one of them the delapidated La Trappe. Having decided to introduce strict reform to La Trappe, he entered the Cistercians and in 1664 became the regular abbot of a community of nine. Modeled on early Cistercian ideals but strongly imbued with desert spirituality, the penitential life of La Trappe elicited awe and admiration in an age of indulgence.

The French Revolution (1789) abolished monastic orders as relics of medieval superstition and appropriated their properties. Disdaining both proffered pension and the requisite oath to the revolutionary government, the last novice-master of La Trappe, Augustin de Lestrange (1754–1827), fled with twenty-one monks to La Valsainte, Switzerland. Austerities were intensified, diet and rest restricted, and manual labor increased. Among the several small foundations Lestrange sent out, two groups bound for Canada were diverted by war to Westmalle, Belgium, and to Lulworth, England.

Breaking with Cistercian custom, Lestrange opened a school for boys and formed the teachers, children, and refugee nuns of various orders into a Third Order of Cistercians. At the French invasion of Switzerland, Lestrange set off with his monks, nuns, and schoolchildren—some 542 strong—on a two-year odyssey through eastern Europe to White Russia, back to Germany, on to America and finally, with the fall of Napoleon, back to France and La Trappe.

Some newly refounded Strict Observance houses abandoned the stringent "new reform" of Lestrange for the "old reform" of La Trappe. In a new war of observances, Cistercians divided between Ancient and Strict Observance, and among new reform, old reform, and new reform without Lestrange's oversight. By 1892 Pope Leo XIII insisted on the consolidation of the Strict Observance, and the Order of Reformed Cistercians of the Strict Observance, popularly called "Trappists," came into being.

Postconciliar Changes: Until the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), Trappist monks and lay brothers as well as nuns were strictly enclosed and supported themselves chiefly by agricultural work and cottage industries. Since the council, Trappist have emphasized the founding ideals of the Cistercian order more than the seventeenth-century austerities that gave rise to their distinctive observance. Work is still done within the enclosure, although monks and nuns now go out for medical, business, and educational reasons. Private "cells" have replaced common dormitories at most monasteries. The distinction between choir monks/nuns and lay brothers/sisters has been discontinued, and strict silence and sign language have given way to necessary speaking.

The order maintains close bonds through triennial general chapters and regional meetings. New constitutions have recognized the cultural diversity of members in Europe, Asia, the Americas, and Africa by authorizing a "more authentic monastic life through legitimate diversity." Separate general chapters of monks and nuns have been supplemented since 1990 by a triennial meeting of abbots and abbesses with equal voice and vote. See also Cistercian order.

Bibliography

Krailsheimer, A. J. Rancé and the Trappist Legacy. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publishcations, 1985.

Lekai, Louis J. The Rise of the Cistercian Strict Observance in Seventeenth-Century France. Washington, DC: The Catholic University of America Press, 1968.

Shank, Lillian Thomas, and John A. Nichols, eds. Hidden Springs: Medieval Religious Woman. Vol. 3. Kalamazoo, MI: Cistercian Publications, 1993.

E. ROZANNE ELDER

traveler [canon law], a person who is outside his or her place of residency. Canon law places certain obligations upon travelers, namely, to obey the universal laws of the Church, and releases travelers from other obligations, namely, particular laws that apply to their home diocese or to the diocese in which they happen to be, so long as no harm to the public order of the Church occurs (can. 13). Thus, a Catholic traveler from Ireland, while visiting the United States in March, would be bound by the Sunday obligation to attend Mass each week but would not be bound to attend Mass on St. Patrick's Day, even though it is a holy day of obligation in Ireland.

Travelers are distinguished from wanderers (Lat., vagi) in that the former have a domicile, or residence, whereas the latter have no fixed residence anywhere. See also domicile; quasi-domicile; wanderer.

Trent, Council of, ecumenical council held from 1545 to 1563 in response to the Protestant Reformation.

The papal and imperial condemnations of Martin Luther (1521) were followed by the demand by the Diet of Nuremberg (1523) for an immediate "free Christian Council on German soil." The popes, however, were leery of Church councils because of their experiences with the councils of Constance (1414–17) and Basel (1431–49). They feared that the council would contend for control of the Church and introduce reforms to curtail papal power and diminish papal revenues. Under pressure from Charles V, Pope Paul III finally convened a council in the northern Italian city of Trent. It met in three convocations (1545–48, 1551–52, 1562–63) comprising twenty-five sessions. By its conclusion the council had defined Catholic doctrine in a way that made the split with the Protestants irrevocable.

From the beginning, the council was badly divided. The papacy and the Italian bishops dependent upon it wanted the council to limit itself to issues of doctrine to meet the Protestant challenge and to leave the reform of corruption and abuses within the Church hierarchy to the pope. The "ultramontane" churches (Germany, France, and Spain) wanted to begin with reform since they laid the blame for most of the abuses at the feet of the papacy itself. They decided to deal with doctrine and reform simultaneously.

Doctrine: The council (session 4) declared, in contrast to the Protestant reliance on Scripture alone, that Scripture and tradition were to be received with "equal reverence." The Latin Vulgate text of Scripture was declared the authentic version upon which Church teaching was to be based. These decrees rendered impossible any dialogue with the Protestants.

Session 5 further hardened the lines separating the two confessions. The council rejected Luther's teaching that Baptism did not eliminate original sin in its entirety. For Luther the concupiscence that remained was itself sin. For the council it was only a "scar," but not actually a sin. After months of heated discussion the council (session 6) rejected justification by faith alone. While asserting the necessity for grace at all stages of salvation, free will and human dispositions to receive grace were also affirmed. Faith is the fundament, but good works are required and increase grace. The Protestants had distinguished sanctification from justification and had seen in the latter solely the remission of sins. By contrast, the council defined justification as including the "sanctification and renovation of the inner man."

Session 7 saw the reaffirmation of the Church's teaching on the sacraments as efficacious signs that confer grace through their proper execution (Lat., ex opere operato) independently of the faith of the recipient. The council maintained the traditional seven sacraments, rejecting the Protestant claim that only Baptism and the Eucharist had scriptural warrant.

Session 13 affirmed the Real Presence of Christ in the consecrated bread and wine of the Eucharist, thus rejecting the purely symbolic sacrament of Zwingli and Calvin. The council also defined that presence in terms of transubstantiation, implicitly rejecting Luther's consubstantiation.

Session 14 defined the sacrament of Penance and upheld the juridical nature of sacerdotal absolution. It also maintained Extreme Unction as a sacrament. Session 21 affirmed that in the Eucharist Christ was wholly present in each of the two elements. In Session 22 the pope was authorized to handle the practical question of whether the laity should receive only the Host or both Host and Precious Blood. Papal permission for the laity to receive both was eventually given for a time to several areas in Germany. Also in Session 22 the council reaffirmed that the Mass was a propitiatory sacrifice that may be offered to venerate the saints and to help the living and the dead. Session 23 defined the sacrament of Holy Orders as a divine ordinance conferring an indelible character. Session 24 reaffirmed the sacramentality of Matrimony and for the first time required that it be solemnized before a priest.

The council failed to issue a decree on the Church or to define the nature of the Roman primacy. The council was badly divided on the status of the bishops within the hierarchy. While extreme papalists, reflecting the growth of papal monarchy in the later Middle Ages, tended to view the bishops as deriving their power from the pope, the Ultramontane bishops retained the older tradition of the bishops as deriving their authority directly from God. For the Ultramontanes the pope was merely the first among equals. These two contrasting outlooks clashed over the issue of the residency of bishops in their dioceses. One of the gravest abuses of the late medieval Church was the practice of bishops failing to reside in their dioceses, usually preferring to dwell at royal courts or urban centers. They normally received papal dispensations to do so. The reformers at Trent believed that declaring residency a divinely established responsibility would prevent papal liberality in this regard. The papal party opposed it for that reason and because it implied that bishops derived their being directly from God. A compromise was formulated in Session 23 that failed to resolve the matter.

Reform: The council also issued reform measures. For the first time Session 5 obligated bishops and pastors to preach on Sundays and holy days. Session 7 saw a number of measures designated to reestablish episcopal authority in the dioceses. Session 23 ordered the establishment of episcopal seminaries to train priests. Previously priests had received no formal training. Candidates simply presented themselves after a period of private study or apprenticeship. No spiritual preparation was provided. It was only in the seventeenth century that seminaries were established in great numbers, but they proved to be the most successful of the council's reforms. The council also commissioned the pope to carry out certain tasks after its closing: the Index of Forbidden Books (1564), the Tridentine Catechism (1566), a new Roman Breviary (1568), a reformed Roman Missal (1570), and a revised edition of the Vulgate (1597). The decrees of Trent were confirmed by Pius IV in 1564 and became the law of the Church despite the resistance to certain of its reform decrees in France and Germany. The dogmatic decrees clearly delineated the Church's theological position over against Protestantism. The result was the form of Roman Catholicism that endured into the second half of the twentieth century, yielding finally to the modern reforms of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). See also Counter-Reformation/Catholic Reformation; justification; Protestantism; sacrament; Scripture and tradition; seminary.

Bibliography

Jedin, Hubert. A History of the Council of Trent. New York: Herder, 1957–61.

R. EMMET MCLAUGHLIN

trial of Jesus, the process in which Jesus was condemned to death. The Gospels report that after his arrest Jesus was brought before the Sanhedrin or supreme council of Jerusalem for what apparently was a hearing (Matt 26:57–68; Mark 14:53–65; Luke 22:54–71; John 18:13–24), the precise purpose of which remains obscure. Thereafter Jesus was brought to the Roman prefect, Pontius Pilate, who questioned him about the politically dangerous claim that Jesus was king of the Jews (Matt 27:11–14; Mark 15:2–5; Luke 23:2–5; John 18:29–38). Luke 23:6–12 adds that Pilate sent Jesus for a hearing to Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, who returned Jesus to Pilate, who found him innocent of any wrongdoing (Luke 23:13–16). The prefect, after proposing to release the insurrectionist Barabbas (Matt 27:15–23; Mark 15:6–14; Luke 23:17–23; John 18:39–40) delivered Jesus to be crucified (Matt 27:24–26; Mark 15:15; Luke 23:24–25; John 19:16).

The Gospel accounts preserve important historical data, although they recount that data with obvious biases. It is clear that Jesus was executed as a perceived threat to the Roman imperial order, as a Jewish royal pretender. Nonetheless, the role of Pilate and the political character of the charges against Jesus are minimized. The role of the Jewish leadership is highlighted and their religious opposition to Jesus stressed, whereas they probably shared Pilate's concern in maintaining public order. See also Jesus Christ; Passion, the.

tribunal, an ecclesiastical court. The term applies to courts on all levels of the Church's judicial system. There is to be a tribunal in every diocese. In addition, there are appeal courts for diocesan courts, and courts of the Holy See. None of these courts set precedents but decide matters of Church law for individual cases. Although a number of issues are brought before tribunals, the majority of cases deal with the validity of marriage. Personnel who staff the courts must have degrees in canon law (judges are required to have at least the J.C.L.) or have acquired needed expertise in canon law.

Tridentine (Lat., tridentinus, "of Trent"), adjective describing the liturgical, disciplinary, theological, and cultural contours of the Catholic Church resulting from the reforms and spirit of the sixteenth-century council held in the northern Italian city of Trent. Those characteristics include a baroque religious mind-set and a preference for firm discipline centralized in Rome. As used today, the term has a pejorative meaning, denoting an old-fashioned or reactionary attitude. See also Trent, Council of.

Tridentine Mass, the name given to the Latin Mass celebrated according to the ritual prescribed by the Missal of Pope Pius V (1570) following the

The trial of Jesus before Pilate, who washes his hands of the matter, saying to the crowd, "I am innocent of this man's blood; see to it yourselves" (Matt 27:24); fourteenth-century painting by Duccio, Cathedral Museum, Siena Italy.

Council of Trent (1545–63). The Tridentine Mass remained in force (with minor changes and variations) until the reforms of Vatican Council II (1962–65) were codified in the Missal of Pope Paul VI (1970). In 1984, Pope John Paul II permitted celebration of the Tridentine Mass under certain strictly controlled circumstances. In the opinion of some, this permission constitutes a concession to ultraconservative Catholics who question (or even repudiate) the liturgical reforms of Vatican Council II.

triduum (tri'doo-oom; Lat., triduum, "a space of three days"), a span of three consecutive days reminiscent of biblical periods of gestation and rebirth. The term is used most often when referring to the Easter Triduum, which includes the three days prior to Easter Sunday: Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and Holy Saturday. Some usage embraces the entire sacred three days of the crucified, buried, and Risen Lord, from Holy Thursday evening to Easter Sunday inclusive. The Easter Triduum begins with the evening Mass of the Lord's Supper on Holy Thursday, reaches its high point at the Easter Vigil and closes with Evening Prayer on Easter Sunday. Since the core and center of the Paschal Mystery (the life, death, and rising of Jesus Christ) is celebrated in these sacred three days, the Easter Triduum is considered the culmination of the entire liturgical year. The term is less often used in a general sense for any three-day period of special observance to prepare for the celebration of a feast by prayer and fasting, to give thanks for special blessings, or to acknowledge and honor extraordinary occasions or events. See also Holy Week.

trikirion (tri-keer'ee-ahn). See dikirion, trikirion.

trination, the practice of a priest's presiding at the Eucharist three times in one day. For pastoral need a diocesan bishop may allow trination on Sundays and holy days of obligation. See also bination.

Trinitarians, popular name for the Order of the Most Holy Trinity for the Redemption of Captives (O.SS.T.) founded by John of Matha and Felix of Valois and approved by Innocent III in 1198. The original purpose of the order was the redemption of Christians captured by the Muslims. There is no accurate record of the number of captives ransomed, but the estimates go as high as 140,000. When that need was over, Trinitarians ministered in schools, hospitals, missions, and prisons. The Trinitarians are an exempt mendicant order (i.e., not under the authority of the local bishop) whose rule is modeled after that of the Monastery of Saint Victor in Paris; they are committed to combining the contemplative life and the active life. In addition to the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, they add a fourth: not to aspire after ecclesiastical honors. They recite the Divine Office, or Liturgy of the Hours, daily. The habit is a white tunic with a white scapular and hood. There are provinces in Canada, Italy, Spain, and the United States; the motherhouse is in Rome. See also John of Matha, St.

The three Persons of the Trinity; fifteenth-century icon by Andrei Rublev, Tretyakov Gallery, Moscow. Inspired by the account in Gen 18 where Abraham is visited by three men, taken to be three divine beings who become one (vv. 10, 13), the icon situates the Father on the left, the Son at the center, and the Holy Spirit on the right.

Trinity, doctrine of the, the specifically Christian way of speaking of God. The doctrine of the Trinity, which stands at the center of Christian faith, summarizes the basic truth of Christianity: that people are saved by God through Jesus Christ by the power of the Holy Spirit. The triune mystery of God is the central mystery of Christian faith and life; thus the doctrinal formulation about the nature of this God is the source of all other mysteries of the faith.

Scriptural Basis: The doctrine of the Trinity as such is not revealed in either the OT or the NT; however, the essential elements of what eventually became the doctrine are contained in Scripture. For example, the OT depicts God as Father of Israel and personifies God through the concepts of Word (dabar), Spirit (ruah), Wisdom (hokmah), and Presence (shekinah). In the NT God is called the Father of Jesus Christ 170 times: 4 times in Mark, 15 in Luke, 42 in Matthew, and 109 in John. The word "Abba" (Aram., "Father") is used only 3 times in the Scriptures: once in Mark's Gospel (14:36) and twice in Paul's Letters (Rom 8:15; Gal 4:6).

In addition to the pater (Lat., "father") texts, the opening greetings in the Pauline and Deutero-Pauline (those attributed to Paul, but not written by him) Letters direct that praise be offered to God through Jesus Christ. The most explicit triadic texts include the baptismal formula in Matt 28:19, the benediction in 2 Cor 13:14, the account of Jesus' baptism in Matt 3:16–17, the fragments of prayer in Gal 4:6 and Rom 8:15, and the description of the whole economy of salvation in Eph 1:3–14. The purpose of searching the Scriptures for testimony to God's triune mystery is not to find passages that contain "three" names, but to discover those that testify to the saving works of God who redeems through Christ by the power of the Spirit.

Liturgical Origins: Alongside the biblical roots of trinitarian doctrine, its liturgical origins are also important. Christian prayer was normally mediatory and directed to God through Christ (cf. Rom 1:8; 1:8; 16:27, 7:25; 1 Cor 15:57; 2 Cor 1:20; Eph 5:20; Col 3:17; 16:27; 7:25; Heb 13:15; 1 Pet 4:11). The same mediatory pattern was found in common eucharistic prayers. Eventually this mediatory pattern was eliminated because it was open to heretical misinterpretation about the status of Christ. In many prayers the Holy Spirit was not mentioned but was assumed to be the power by whom the prayer was offered.

The baptismal formula in Matthew is important from both scriptural and liturgical points of view, but later doctrinal developments should not be read into it, as if Matthew is affirming a metaphysical unity of Father, Son, and Spirit. Still, Matthew's injunction to baptize "in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit" quickly became normative for baptismal practice.

Development of Doctrine: Trinitarian doctrine as such emerged in the fourth century, due largely to the efforts of Athanasius and the Cappadocians (Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa), who responded to the doctrinal challenges of Arius and Eunomius about the status of Jesus Christ. In the West, these Christological and trinitarian questions were taken up by Augustine.

Arius and his successors claimed that Jesus Christ was less than God—higher than other creatures, but still less than God. To Athanasius and the Cappadocians this threatened human salvation, since Jesus Christ was believed to be essential to accomplishing salvation. These theologians took technical concepts such as person (Gk., hypostasis) and substance (ousia) and refined them to accommodate theological concerns in order to affirm that the nature of the one God is unthinkable apart from God's concrete existence in the economy of redemption in the Persons of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. The doctrine of the Trinity formulated in the late fourth century thus affirms that the one God exists as three Persons. The purpose of this formulation was to profess that God, Christ, and the Spirit are equally responsible for our salvation, thus each must be "divine."

This formulation does not contradict the fundamental religious assertion that God is one. Indeed, trinitarian doctrine is a guard against tritheism as well as Modalism. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) notes that each divine Person is the divine nature. Further, the Council of Florence (1442) formulated the principle that "everything in God is one except where there is opposition of relationship." Thus, the doctrine of the Trinity simultaneously affirms both "unity of substance" and "diversity of persons." The divine Persons are said to be really distinct and utterly unique in their personal identity. The Father is Unbegotten, the Son is Begotten, and the Holy Spirit Proceeds from the Father and, or through, the Son. At the same time, the divine Persons are who they are by virtue of relationship to each other. "The Father is wholly in the Son and wholly in the Holy Spirit; the Son is wholly in the Father and wholly in the Holy Spirit; the Holy Spirit is wholly in the Father and wholly in the Son" (Council of Florence).

The trinitarian synthesis worked out by the Cappadocians in the East and Augustine in the West was refined by medieval theologians such as Gregory Palamas in the East and Anselm and Thomas Aquinas in the West. Once the main tenets of trinitarian doctrine had been formalized in the medieval synthesis, it underwent very little change and attracted very little notice, until recently, when there has been a resurgence of interest in the doctrine of the Trinity and an effort to reconnect it with the themes of salvation and the daily demands of Christian life. See also Arianism; Filioque; God; Modalism; Persons, divine; subsistent relations; tritheism.

CATHERINE MOWRY LACUGNA

Trinity Sunday, an annual solemnity celebrated on the first Sunday after Pentecost Sunday. Trinity Sunday explicitly acknowledges the threefold revelation of God as Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Special emphasis on the Trinity in preaching and devotion emerged as a result of the Christological and trinitarian controversies of the fourth and fifth centuries. This emphasis escalated in the seventh and eighth centuries, formulating a proper preface and votive Mass by the ninth century. Testimony before the year 1000 suggests a solemnity of the Trinity with its own proper and office observed in some monasteries on the Sunday after Pentecost. Although the Trinity is celebrated every Sunday, and in fact every day, the solemnity of the Trinity was extended to the universal Church in 1334. This "idea feast" commemorates an aspect of doctrine, rather than an event in salvation history. The readings and presidential prayers focus on the mystery of redemption by God through Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

Triodion (tree-oh'dee-ahn; Gk., "[book] of three odes"), Byzantine-rite liturgical book containing the seasonal propers, prayers assigned to Sundays and feasts, of the Lenten cycle from the tenth Sunday before Easter until the Holy Saturday midnight-office inclusive. Its name comes from the fact that the poetic canon of Matins during this period often has only three odes instead of the usual nine. Early Triodia also included the propers of the Pentecost cycle, now found in the Pentekostarion.

Trisagion (tri-sah'gee-ahn; Gk., "thrice-holy"), a fifth-century liturgical refrain, "Holy God holy mighty holy immortal (who was crucified for us), have mercy on us!" The section in parentheses is the famous "theopaschite clause," a much-disputed fifth-century Monophysite addition accepted by all rites but the Byzantine and Chaldean. Though the origins of the Trisagion are disputed, it is traditionally held to be a synthesis of the biblical Sanctus ("Holy, holy, holy"; Isa 6:3) with elements of Ps 41:3. See also Sanctus.

tritheism (Lat., "three gods"), the doctrine that there are three gods who share one divine essence. No theologians have deliberately taught tritheism, but a number have been properly accused of it because of their inadequate attempts to explain the relationship of divine Persons and divine nature. Christian apologists of the second and third centuries often had to defend Christianity against false accusations of tritheism because the Christian practice of using the names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in worship seemed to some outside observers to oppose the strict monotheism of the OT. See also God; Trinity, doctrine of the.

triumphalism, the tendency to exaggerate the achievements and good points of the Church and to minimize or deny its mistakes and weaknesses. The term was popularized by Bishop Emile de Smedt of Bruges, Belgium, in a highly publicized speech, critical also of the clericalism and legalism of the preconciliar Church, given during the first session of the Second Vatican Council (1962).

True Devotion. See Montfort, St. Louis Grignion de.

trusteeism, lay, a development in the republican period of U.S. history (1780–1830) that sought to adapt European Catholicism to American republican values. Trusteeism emphasized the participation of laymen in the government of the local church. Called "trustees" and elected annually by members of the congregation, these men were responsible for the temporal affairs of the parish, such as salaries of clergy and church personnel and the maintenance of the church and its properties. The most widespread implementation of this system of church government was in the diocese of Charleston, South Carolina, where the bishop, John England, was an ardent supporter of lay involvement in church government. The emphasis on republican values, such as election of trustees and lay involvement in church government, came into conflict with the tradition of clerical control of church affairs. Numerous trustee controversies occurred in the republican period and eventually the hierarchy, with the support of the papacy, was able to suppress this republican lay initiative. But the suppression was never complete because each new immigrant group that came to the U.S. sought to implement this style of local church government. This desire for democracy in the Church never failed to create tension and conflict in the immigrant communities. Each new controversy only served to intensify the demand by the hierarchy for strong centralized episcopal control of church affairs. See also laity; United States of America, Catholicism in the. JAY P. DOLAN truthfulness, veracity, the virtue of making oneself and one's thoughts known both accurately and in a manner appropriate to the circumstances. Truthfulness primarily concerns the presentation of who one takes oneself to be. Hence, for example, the president of a country ought to act and speak as a president in order to be truthful. To pretend or claim either to be more than one is (boastfulness) or to be less (false modesty) is a failure in truthfulness, though understatement is not inimical to the virtue as is boasting.

Veracity includes a disposition against lying, but its demands extend much farther than a rule against false speech. For instance, it requires both the habit of judging things according to their real worth as well as a due regard for the nature of the audience and the particular circumstances. See also lying.

Trypho, St., also known as Tryphon, third-century, martyr and patron saint of gardeners. He is said to have been martyred at Nicaea under the emperor Decius, but much of his life is legendary. Feast day: November 10.

Tübingen, a city in southwest Germany whose prestigious university, founded in 1477, included among its students the astronomer Johannes Kepler (later a professor there), the philosophers Georg Hegel and Friedrich Schelling, and the poet Friedrich Hölderlin. Led by Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792–1860), the university's "Tübingen school" in Protestant theology applied Hegel's philosophy to the study of early Christian history. The university's "Catholic Tübingen school," established by Johann Sebastian von Drey (1777–1853) in 1817, is committed to fashioning a theological synthesis of Scripture and tradition, historical inquiry, and contemporary thought. Its best-known Catholic professor is Hans Küng. See also Küng, Hans.

Tunstall, Cuthbert, 1474–1559, bishop of London and Durham. Loyal to the crown, Tunstall accepted Henry VIII's break with Rome, but remained an unrelenting opponent of Protestantism. Under Edward VI he was imprisoned (1551) and deposed (1552). Restored by Mary, he was deposed by Elizabeth and died in prison.

Turibius of Mogrovejo, St. (toor-eeb'ee-oos uhv moh-groh-vay'yoh), 1538–1606, Spanish-born archbishop of Lima (Peru) known for his pastoral zeal. He is one of the first saints of the New World. Feast day: March 23.

tutiorism (Lat., tutior, "safer"), a mode of moral decision making, similar to rigorism, whereby one chooses to follow the "safer" way, that of the law. One may doubt a moral law either because its wording is unclear or its application to a particular situation is uncertain. Tutiorism proposes that obedience to the law is always the safer and required choice. As a strict form of probabiliorism in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, it tended to make certainty more important than the search for truth, relying upon a notion of morality as obedience to the will of another, particularly God, as expressed in laws. Tutiorism was condemned by Pope Alexander VIII in 1690. See also probabiliorism; rigorism.

Twelve, the, a designation of Jesus' intimate disciples. Although Jesus sent many disciples on mission (Luke 10:1), he chose twelve apostles, who have come to be called the Twelve. This number imitates the sacred twelves in Israel's history: twelve sons of Jacob, twelve tribes of Israel, twelve guardians of the shrines corresponding to the twelve months of the year (Rev 21:12–14). Although no mention of the Twelve is found in the Q source, a very early tradition, the four Gospels indicate that Jesus chose twelve men (Mark 3:16–19), gave them special instructions (Mark 4:10), sent them on preaching tours of Galilee (Mark 3:14), and designated them judges (Matt 19:28). Mark 3:16–19 lists their names, a tradition repeated in Matt 10:2–4, except for the different placement of several names on the list. The Gospels signal the Twelve's importance, not simply by recording their choice by the earthly Jesus, but by their formal commission by the Risen Christ (Luke 24:46–48; John 20:21; 1 Cor 15:5). Their role in the early Church is mentioned sparingly. Acts 6:2 describes them functioning like elders of the group. Paul visits Jerusalem and sees only Peter, James, and John (Gal 2:9), "pillars" of the Church. This correlates with the Gospel description of an inner circle among the Twelve, Peter, James, and John, to whom Jesus gave special revelation, took on special occasions, and with whom he prayed before his death. The NT records that only Peter left Jerusalem, traveled to Antioch (Gal 2:11), possibly to Corinth (1 Cor 9:5), presumably to Rome. Legends abound concerning the travels and missions of the rest of them. See also apostle; disciple.

JEROME NEYREY

Twelve Great Feasts, the most important liturgical feasts of the Byzantine rite. The list, variable in earlier sources, eventually comprised the following twelve, given here in Byzantine calendar order: Nativity of Mary (September 8), Exaltation of the Cross (September 14), Entrance of Mary into the Temple (November 21), Nativity of Jesus (December 25), Theophany (January 6), Hypapante (February 2), Annunciation (March 25), Entrance into Jerusalem (Palm Sunday), Ascension, Pentecost, Transfiguration (August 6), Dormition (August 15). The principal feasts as depicted in a series of festive icons will also include Resurrection (Easter), which is the feast beyond all lists, and Crucifixion (Good Friday), though the latter is never listed liturgically among the Great Feasts. See also feasts, liturgical.

Two-Source Hypothesis, an explanation of the relationships between and among the three synoptic Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke. According to this theory Mark was the first Gospel to have been written. Matthew and Luke each independently drew upon Mark for the framework of their accounts of Jesus' ministry. Each also combined with Mark a collection of sayings of Jesus, usually designated "Q," from the German word for "source," Quelle. Hence, the two sources of the synoptic Gospels are, according to this theory, Mark and Q.

The Two-Source Hypothesis accounts for most of the similarities and differences among the synoptic Gospels. Originally elaborated by German Protestant scholars in the mid-nineteenth century, it is widely accepted today among Catholic as well as Protestant scholars, although some specialists defend other solutions to the "synoptic problem." See also synoptic Gospels, problem of.

two-swords theory, the medieval belief that the pope has power not only in the spiritual realm but also in the temporal. It found its highest expression in Boniface VIII's papal bull Unam Sanctam (1302), which held that "there are two swords, the spiritual and the temporal, in the control of the Church. . . . One is used by the hand of the priest, the other by the hand of the kings and knights at the command and with the permission of the priest." Therefore, "for every human creature to be submissive to the Roman pontiff is absolutely necessary for salvation." See also Church and state.

Tyconius, d. ca. 400, lay theologian of the Donatist church of Roman Africa. Tyconius authored at least four books, the most influential being a biblical commentary challenging the literal interpretation of the book of Revelation, and another, the Book of Rules, in which obscure prophecies regarding the Church were explained in terms of seven mystical rules. Censured by Parmenian, Donatist bishop of Carthage, Tyconius influenced the development of Augustine's ecclesiology and interpretation of Scripture. See also Africa, the Church in Roman; Donatism.

Typikon (ti-pee-kahn'; Gk., "model," "rule"), a Byzantine-rite monastic and/or liturgical rule or custom-book. Byzantine monastic rules, like the Rule of St. Benedict, also contained prescriptions regulating fasting and liturgy, especially the Divine Office and its psalmody. In addition, early Byzantine liturgical calendars included norms for the readings, commemorations, and particular services of each day. From these rudimentary liturgical prescriptions the present Byzantine-rite liturgical Typikon evolved. It is essentially a liturgical calendar to which have been added instructions for each day's liturgy, especially when there are special services not found on ordinary days. Adherents of the Byzantine rite use the term "Typikon" for the Byzantine rite, much as Western monks will use "the Rule" as shorthand for the monastic way of life. See also Byzantine rite.

typology, a way of interpreting the Scriptures whereby older realities (types) are seen as having foreshadowed, according to God's plan of salvation, future realities (antitypes). One clear example of typology is in Rom 5:14, where Paul identifies Adam as "a type [Gk., typos] of the one who was to come," that is, Christ. In similar fashion Paul portrays the Israelites' passage through the Red Sea as foreshadowing Baptism (1 Cor 10:2). The author of Hebrews sees Melchizedek as a type of Christ (Heb 6:20–7:28; cf. Gen 14:18–20). The author of 1 Peter presents the salvation of Noah and his family as foreshadowing Baptism (an antitypos; 1 Pet 3:21).

The Fathers of the Church such as the author of the Letter of Barnabas, Justin, Melito of Sardis, and Irenaeus used typology to argue in favor of the unity of the two Testaments. Their interests were largely polemical, but later Fathers of the Church used the approach to provide for a Christian understanding of the OT. Typology is closely related to the allegorical reading of the OT promoted by the Fathers of the Church and various medieval authors. In the mid-twentieth century attention to the patristic exegesis of biblical texts led to a new interest in typology among some prominent Catholic scholars such as Jean Daniélou (d. 1974) and Henri de Lubac (d. 1991). See also Scripture, interpretation of.

Tyrrell, George, 1861–1909, English theologian associated with the Modernists. Raised Anglican, he was received into the Catholic Church in 1879, entered the Jesuits in 1880, and was ordained in 1891. An outspoken critic of neo-Scholasticism, he wrote on the development of doctrine, the nature of the Church, and the importance of religious experience. Because of his controversial writings he was expelled from the Jesuits and suspended from the priesthood in 1906. After publicly criticizing the encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis in 1907, he was excommunicated. He received the Last Rites of the Church before his death, but was denied Catholic burial. See also Modernism; neo-Scholasticism.

U

Ubertino of Casale, 1259–1330, Franciscan preacher. Entering the Franciscans in 1273, he studied at Paris and served in Italy as preacher and lector. An ardent and uncompromising Spiritual Franciscan, Pope John XXII transferred Ubertino to a Benedictine house for refusing to be reconciled with his own order. See also Spiritual Franciscans.

Ukrainian Catholic Church, a Byzantine Catholic Church centered in Galicia in western Ukraine, a former republic of the Soviet Union.

Early History: The Ukrainians received the Christian faith in its Byzantine form, and their church was originally linked to the patriarchate of Constantinople. But by the fourteenth century most Ukrainians were under the political control of Catholic Lithuania. Metropolitan Isidore of Kiev attended the Council of Florence and agreed to the 1439 Decree of Union between Catholics and Orthodox. Although many Ukrainians within Lithuania initially accepted this union, within a few decades they had rejected it.

In 1569, Lithuania and Poland united to form a single commonwealth, and most of Ukraine passed to Poland. By this time Protestantism was expanding rapidly in the Ukrainian lands, and the Jesuits had begun to work for a local union between Catholics and Orthodox as a way of reducing Protestant influence. Soon many Orthodox also began to view such a union favorably as a way of improving the situation of the Ukrainian clergy and of preserving their Byzantine traditions against the expansion of Latin Polish Catholicism.

These developments culminated in a synod of Orthodox bishops at Brest in 1595–96 that proclaimed a union between Rome and the metropolitan province of Kiev. This event sparked a violent conflict between those who accepted the union and those who opposed it. The dioceses of the far western province of Galicia, which lie at the heart of what is now the Ukrainian Catholic Church, adhered to the union much later (Przemysl in 1692 and Lvov [Lviv] in 1700). By the eighteenth century, two-thirds of the Christians in western Ukraine had become Byzantine Catholic.

As Orthodox Russia expanded its control into Ukraine, however, the union was gradually suppressed. In 1839, Czar Nicholas I abolished it in all areas under Russian rule with the exception of the eparchy of Kholm, which was itself disbanded in 1875. Thus by the end of the nineteenth century Byzantine Catholicism had virtually disappeared from the empire.

Easter procession at the Ukrainian Catholic Church of the Blessed Virgin Mary, in Saskatchewan, Canada, where there are large concentrations of Ukrainian Catholics; in 1993 there were almost 150,000 Ukrainian Catholics in the United States.

But the Ukrainian Catholic Church survived in Galicia, which had come under Austrian rule in 1772 and passed to Poland at the end of World War I. The church flourished for a time under the energetic leadership of Metropolitan Andrew Sheptyckyj (1900–1944). The situation changed dramatically at the beginning of World War II, however, when most of Galicia was annexed by the Soviet Union.

Post-World War II: The Soviet government acted decisively to liquidate the Ukrainian Catholic Church. In April 1945 all its bishops were arrested, and the following year they were sentenced to long terms of forced labor. In March 1946 a "synod" was held at Lvov (Lviv) that officially dissolved the union and integrated the Ukrainian Catholic Church into the Russian Orthodox Church. Those who resisted were arrested, including over 1,400 priests and 800 nuns. Metropolitan Joseph Slipyj, the church's head, was sent to prison in Siberia. In 1963 he was released and exiled to Rome. In the same year he was given the unique title "Major Archbishop" of Lviv of the Ukrainians. He was made a cardinal in 1965 and died in 1984.

Although the exact role played by the Moscow patriarchate in the suppression has not been clearly established, the events of 1946 would poison the atmosphere between Ukrainian Catholics and Orthodox for decades to come. All this came to the surface in the late 1980s when new religious freedoms inaugurated by Mikhail Gorbachev enabled the Ukrainian Catholic Church to emerge from hiding.

On December 1, 1989, Ukrainian Catholic communities were given the right to register with the government. With the support of the local authorities, Ukrainian Catholics gradually began to take possession of their former churches. All this led to a strong Ukrainian Catholic resurgence in the region. In March 1991, Cardinal Myroslav Lubachivsky, the head of the Ukrainian Catholic Church, was able to take up residence at his see in Lviv. In December 1991 he reported that his church had 11 bishops, 1,100 priests, 300 religious, 700 nuns, and 5 million faithful with 2,176 churches in the newly independent Ukraine. Seminaries set up in Lviv and Ivano-Frankivsk and monasteries were receiving many vocations.

As the Ukrainian Catholic Church was reestablishing itself, the Moscow patriarchate protested that violence had been used in repossessing some churches (which the Catholics denied) and that Ukrainian Catholics were attempting to expand at the expense of the Orthodox. A series of high-level contacts between the Vatican and the Moscow patriarchate began in 1990, but the talks have not yet been able to resolve the dispute satisfactorily.

Also affected was the fate of Ukrainian Catholics in Poland. When the Soviet Union annexed most of Galicia during World War II, about 1,300,000 Ukrainians remained in Poland. In 1946 the new Polish Communist authorities deported most of these Ukrainians to the Soviet Union and suppressed the Ukrainian Catholic Church. Approximately 145,000 Ukrainian Catholics dispersed around the country were able to worship openly only in the Latin rite. Only in 1957 were pastoral centers opened to serve the Ukrainian Catholics. In 1989 Pope John Paul II appointed a Ukrainian bishop auxiliary to the Polish primate. He was named bishop of Przemysl of the Ukrainians in January 1991, thus providing Ukrainian Catholics in Poland with their first diocesan bishop since the war.

Two men's religious orders are unique to the Ukrainian Catholic Church: the Studite Monks and the Basilian Order of St. Josaphat. The Redemptorists also have a Ukrainian province. Women's communities include the Basilian Sisters, the Studite Nuns, the Sister Servants of Mary Immaculate, the Holy Family Sisters, the Sisters of St. Joseph, the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, the Sisters of Mercy, the Sisters of St. Josaphat, and the Catechists of St. Anne. The Catechists of the Sacred Heart exist only in the diaspora (those Ukrainian Catholics living outside the country).

There are major seminaries for Ukrainians in the diaspora in Washington, D.C., Ottawa, Canada, and in Curitiba, Brazil. A Ukrainian College has existed in Rome since 1897.

The Ukrainian Catholic diaspora, 700,000 strong, played a significant role in preserving Ukrainian traditions during the suppression. There are four dioceses in the United States, five in Canada, one each in Australia, Brazil, and Argentina, and apostolic exarchates in Great Britain, Germany, and France. See also Brest, Union of; Byzantine rite; Poland, Catholicism in; Russia, Catholicism in.

Bibliography

Dyrud, Keith P. The Quest for the Rusyn Soul: The Politics of Religion and Culture in Eastern Europe and in America, 1890–World War I. Philadelphia: Balch Institute Press, 1992.

Himka, John-Paul. The Greek Catholic Church and Ukrainian Society in Austrian Galicia. Cambridge, MA: Ukrainian Studies Fund, Harvard University, 1986.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

Ulfilas (uhl'fuh-luhs), ca. 311–83, evangelizer of the Goths. Consecrated bishop in 341 by the Arian

Eusebius of Nicomedia, Ulfilas worked among the Goths both north of the Danube and within the empire, and thus the Christianity transmitted to the Goths and the other peoples who later settled in the Western empire was Arian. Using an alphabet he invented, Ulfilas translated the Bible into Gothic. See also Arianism.

Ullathorne, William Bernard, 1806–89, Benedictine monk and bishop. He worked as a missionary in Australia from 1832 to 1840, especially among convicts, and was vicar apostolic for western, later central, England from 1846 to 1850 and bishop of Birmingham from 1850 to 1888. In 1888 he resigned his see and became titular archbishop. He was a friend of John Henry Newman; his correspondence during the First Vatican Council (1869–70) has been an important source for that council's history. See also Newman, John Henry; Vatican Council I.

Ulric of Augsburg, St., 890–973, the first saint to be formally canonized. He succeeded his uncle as bishop of Augsburg in 923. When he named his own nephew to succeed himself, he was accused of nepotism. Nevertheless, he was canonized by Pope John XV in 993. Feast day: July 4. See also canonization.

Ulric of Cluny, St., ca. 1018–93, Cluniac monk and prior at a number of monasteries. Godson of Emperor Henry III, Ulric joined the monks at Cluny after a pilgrimage to the Holy Land and wrote a three-volume work on the customs of Cluny. Feast day: July 14. See also Cluny.

Ultramontanism (Lat., "beyond the mountains"), a nineteenth-century intellectual and political movement in European countries beyond the Alps (France, Germany, Spain, England) that exalted the papacy as the bulwark against political liberalism and modern philosophical and scientific trends. Until their destruction during the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, European ecclesiastical structures, especially in Germany and France, were rooted in feudalism and contained limits that held in check centralizing forces in the Church. After the revolution, governments sought to subsume the now weakened Church under claims of national sovereignty. By means of concordats the popes succeeded in arranging ecclesiastical structures in new ways and securing a degree of civil freedom for Catholics. Because of this success and in reaction to the spiritual and intellectual insecurity within the Christian faith, many Catholics looked to the papacy for reassurance. Since many Catholics saw the pope as the guardian of the Church's political independence and the source of its internal security, they wanted papal authority strengthened, even at the expense of the local churches. Initially, even many liberal Catholics were strongly Ultramontane. They did not, however, support the program of political restoration and intellectual defensiveness pursued by Gregory XVI (1831–46) and Pius IX (1846–78). This restorationist and anti-modern Ultramontanism sought to oppose the Enlightenment and liberalism through the strengthening of papal authority. The movement found its programmatic voice in several influential journals, e.g., Civiltà Cattolica, and L'Univers. The Ultramontane movement provided strong support and incentive for the doctrines of papal primacy and infallibility at Vatican Council I (1869–70). See also Pius IX; Vatican Council I. HERMANN J. POTTMEYER

Unam Sanctam (oon'ahm sahnk'tahm; Lat., "One Holy"), bull of Pope Boniface VIII, promulgated in 1302, that insists on the absolute primacy of the pope. Written during the conflict with King Philip IV of France, it concludes with the declaration that submission to the pope is necessary for salvation. See also Boniface VIII; papacy, the.

uncreated grace. See grace.

unction. See anointing.

Underhill, Evelyn, 1875–1941, English mystic. Her many writings, especially Mysticism (1911), demonstrate the complementarity between theology and mysticism. She functioned as a spiritual director and was popular as a director of retreats. In addition to her books, she also translated and edited The Cloud of Unknowing, Walter Hilton's Scale of Perfection, and other works. In her later years she was active in the pacifist movement against World War II. See also English Mystics.

uniate churches. See Eastern churches; uniatism.

uniatism, a pejorative term for a method of union between Eastern Christians and Rome, considered by its critics as politically rather than religiously motivated and contrary to the communion ecclesiology of the undivided Church. In "uniatism" one church is seen as the aggressor against a "sister church" with which it is at the moment in schism, deceptively absorbing groups of the "sister's" faithful by allowing them to retain their own rite and a certain autonomy. Some historical instances of uniatism are seen as the result of political pressure reinforced by violence, which created not unity but new divisions in an already fragmented Christendom.

Origins and Nature of Uniatism: Though uniatism is considered to have begun with the Union of Brest in 1596, its application to all cases of reunions of Eastern Christians with Rome is without justification either historically or ecclesiologically. The Maronites and Syro-Malabarians, for instance, resumed union with Rome without having formally broken it and without having entered into any formal reunion. The Italo-Albanians, too, are not "uniates," the result of a union. They are the ancient Byzantine church of southern Italy, within the territory of the Roman patriarchate. Their continued ecclesial communion with that patriarchate is in full accord with all the norms of the traditional ecclesiology of the undivided Church of the first millennium.

Uniatism is considered in the 1990s to be a questionable phenomenon both historically and ecclesiologically, apart from the exaggerations, anachronistic reductionism, and falsehoods with which the topic is often treated. To understand this negative judgment one must understand the nature of the reunions of the sixteenth and later centuries, and of the uniate churches that resulted. Regardless of the intentions behind them, these reunions were not, except in the most formal theological sense, a restoration of the communion that had existed before the schism between East and West. They represented something new in the history of the Church, a departure from the past.

Had the Union of Florence in 1439 been successful, the phenomenon of uniatism would never have emerged. For at Florence the Latin West and the Byzantine East tried to deal with each other directly. But the later Orthodox repudiation of the Union of Florence (a repudiation definitively sealed by the fall of Constantinople to the Turks in 1453) resulted in a clear, though perhaps unconscious, shift in tactics by the Latin church. Disillusioned by the failure to achieve a general union, the Roman Catholic Church began to sign separate union agreements with individual groups of Orthodox, thus nibbling away at the fringes of Orthodoxy in areas under the political control of Catholic powers. For the Orthodox, this was perfidious. Rome could respond that they were simply entering into union with a local church, which indeed they had every right to do. But phenomenologically, the churches had evolved beyond the pre-Nicene system in which one could legitimately view the universal Church as a federation of local churches with no intervening higher structures. The Orthodox groups that entered into union with Rome were not simply restoring the former, broken unity between a local church and the Church of Rome, even if this was their intent. Rather, they were separating themselves from one entity, their Byzantine Orthodox Mother Church, and being absorbed into another, the Latin Catholic Church of the West. In short, they were leaving the Eastern Church and being assimilated into the Western Church. Instead of restoring the broken communion between the two, this led to new divisions.

The "uniates" not only separated themselves from the living roots of the Oriental tradition, they united to a Latin majority quite different from themselves in religious culture and outlook, and not at all accustomed to more than one way of doing things. Inevitably, a process of latinization set in, and the Eastern tradition began to erode as the "uniates" gradually began to lose the spirit of their heritage.

Uniatism as an Ecumenical Problem: This highly emotional issue is the major stumbling block in relations between the Catholic and Orthodox churches. It is much discussed today, often with distortions and oversimplifications of history, rarely with fairness and objectivity. The Orthodox accuse Catholics of practicing uniatism, but the Orthodox, too, have practiced it in both the past and present, in the forced unions of Armenians with the Byzantine church, for example, in 590 under Emperor Maurice; the "Western-rite" Orthodox jurisdiction in France; and the receiving of some disaffected Latin Catholic parishes in northern Italy into the Russian Orthodox Church in the 1970s.

The problem of uniatism has become especially acute since the late 1980s and the restoration of religious freedom in the former Soviet bloc. The emergence from the underground of the persecuted Eastern Catholic churches has led to conflicts and a resurgence of traditional Orthodox anti-Roman sentiment.

In Search of a Solution: Catholics have begun to struggle with the issue through a painful examination of conscience. Discussions of the topic with the Orthodox have begun, with tangible results, as the public forum serves to instill some fairness, objectivity, and courtesy in those with otherwise intemperate views. Pope John Paul II has already enunciated the three inalienable and inseparable principles with which this issue and every community and person involved in it must be treated: truth, justice, and charity. Those of good will on both sides of the debate are in agreement on two fundamental principles: (1) uniatism is to be rejected as a no longer valid method for the future; and (2) the religious liberty of both individuals and communities is an absolute right that excludes all violence or coercion, physical or moral. Four other necessary principles have not yet been sufficiently recognized by some: (1) judging past events in the light of newly acquired principles is considered by some an anachronism devoid of ethical or historical validity; (2) the dignity, rights, and very existence of an ecclesial community today cannot be impugned on the basis of problems and injustices at its historical origins; (3) one cannot challenge a church's right to continued existence because it ill accords with another's ecclesiology, or with new advances in theological and ecumenical consciousness; and (4) ecumenism is a dialogue in which each side must judge itself by the same criteria and standards of behavior with which it judges the other.

Only the reestablishment of communion between the Catholic and Orthodox churches will solve these problems satisfactorily. But if, in the meantime, solutions remain provisional, interim answers to the pastoral and ecumenical problems posed by the existence of Eastern Catholic churches must be sought with charity, objectivity, and realism, without the bigotry and reductionist simplifications of history to which these communities are too often subjected. See also Church; Eastern churches; Eastern Schism; Florence, Council of; latinization; Orthodox Christianity; unity of the Church.

Bibliography

Suttner, Ernst C. Church Unity: Union or Uniatism? Catholic-Orthodox Ecumenical Perspectives. Rome: Centre for Indian and Interreligious Studies/Bangalore: Dharmaram Publications, 1991.

ROBERT F. TAFT

Unigenitus (*oo*n-ee-jay'nee-toos; Lat., "Only Begotten," a reference to the Son of God). 1 Papal bull of Clement VI in 1343 granting remission of sins to all who visited Rome during the Jubilee year of 1350. The bull formally set out the doctrine of the "treasury of merit," which stated that Christ and the martyrs had built up by their acts a vast reserve of merit that the papacy could dole out to lesser mortals to offset the burden of sin. 2 Papal document issued in 1713 as the constitution of Clement XI condemning 101 propositions drawn from the contemporary Jansenist writings of Pasquier Quesnel (d. 1719). See also Jansenism; Jubilee, Year of; merit.

Union of Brest. See Brest, Union of.

Unitarianism, a religious movement teaching the one good God and the goodness of humanity against Augustinian pessimism and against Trinitarianism. It developed out of three distinct yet loosely related movements. The first was sixteenth-century opposition to the Trinity, initially expressed by Martin Cellarius, Michael Servetus, and Bernardino Ochino and culminating in the anti-Trinitarian movements in Hungary and Poland. The second began in England with the anti-Trinitarian tracts and conventicles of John Biddle (1615–62), often called the father of Unitarianism, and emerged as a denomination in 1774. The third movement began in America when Jonathan Mayhew challenged the doctrine of the Trinity in 1755. The formation of the American Unitarian Association (1825) under the leadership of William Ellery Channing gave greater momentum to the movement, as did the writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson and James Martineau. In 1961, the American Unitarian Association merged with the Universalist Church of America to form the Unitarian Universalist Association. See also Trinity, doctrine of the.

Unitatis Redintegratio (oo-nee-tah'tis ray-din-tay-grah'tsee-oh). See Decree on Ecumenism.

United Church of Christ, an American Protestant denomination that was formed at a synod in 1957 through the union of the General Council of Congregational Christian Churches (Congregationalism) and the Evangelical and Reformed Church (Presbyterianism). It recognizes the autonomy of the local assembly and simultaneously organizes these churches into regional associations and state conferences, which elect representatives to the General Synod (convened biennially). The Statement of Faith, adopted in 1959, is regarded as a nonbinding witness to the faith of the affiliated churches. It affirms two sacraments, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and it recognizes ordination through the imposition of hands. At the same time, it acknowledges the autonomy of each local congregation regarding worship, doctrine, and government. See also Protestantism; Reformation, the.

United Methodist Church. See Methodism.

United States Catholic Conference (USCC), the civilly incorporated (1967) operational secretariat and service agency of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops (NCCB). The USCC replaced the National Catholic Welfare Conference (1919), itself the successor to the National Catholic War Council (1917), and provides the organizational structure, in the words of its certificate of incorporation, "to unify, coordinate, encourage, promote, and carry on all Catholic activities in the United States; to organize and conduct religious, charitable and social welfare work at home and abroad; to aid in education; to care for immigrants and generally to enter into and promote, by education, public action and direction, the objects of its being." Day-to-day management is the work of a general secretary, who is also general secretary of the NCCB. Principal officers of the USCC are the same bishops who fill the positions for the NCCB. An administrative board of bishops is identical with the administrative committee of the NCCB. There is an executive committee and a national advisory board composed of bishops, priests, religious, and laypeople. Three major departments, on communications, education, and social development and world peace, are chaired by bishops and operated by secretariats under supervision of a committee having equal numbers of episcopal and nonepiscopal members. Many Catholic organizations are affiliated with the USCC. The USCC, its administrative board, executive committee, and several departments periodically issue statements on social and political matters.

unitive way. See ways of the spiritual life.

Unity Brothers (Lat., Fratres Unitores), a medieval Catholic Armenian religious congregation originally associated with the Dominicans, whose rule and habit they borrowed and whose missal and breviary they used in Armenian. Founded around 1331 by an Armenian monk and a Dominican, they eventually became autonomous with their own superior, then were absorbed into the Dominican order in 1583.

unity of humankind, the concept that despite national, cultural, ethnic, and sexual differences the human race is essentially one. The idea is foundational in Catholic theological anthropology and constitutes a basic presupposition of the Church's social teaching. At its heart is the doctrine that every human being is created equally in the image of God, is redeemed by the death and Resurrection of Jesus Christ, and is destined for eternal life in the heavenly kingdom of God.

unity of the Church, the oneness of the Church, both in the sense that there can be only one Church of Christ and in the sense of its communion in faith, worship, and charity, brought about by the Holy Spirit. From the fact that the Church is the Body and Bride of Christ, it follows that there can be only one Church of Christ. The communion that is the work of the Holy Spirit is described by Vatican II in the following terms: "It is the Holy Spirit, dwelling in those who believe, pervading and ruling over the entire Church, who brings about that marvelous communion of the faithful and joins them together so intimately in Christ that He is the principle of the church's unity" (Decree on Ecumenism, 1964, n. 2).

The same council further declares that the unity that Christ wishes his Church to have requires visible communion in the confession of the one faith, in the common celebration of the sacraments, and in the fraternal harmony of the family of God. It is through the preaching of the gospel by the successors of the apostles, through their administration of the sacraments, and through their exercise of authority that Christ perfects his people's fellowship in unity under the influence of the Holy Spirit (see Decree on Ecumenism, n. 2).

While Vatican II insisted that the visible unity that Christ bestowed on his Church subsists in the Catholic Church as a gift that it cannot lose (cf. Decree on Ecumenism, n. 4), it also recognized that a real, though imperfect, communion binds together all the Christian churches and ecclesial communities, which in various ways participate in the reality of the one Church of Christ. See also Church; ecumenical movement; ecumenism; marks of the Church.

FRANCIS A. SULLIVAN

Universal Catechism. See Catechism of the Catholic Church.

CATHOLICISM IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Roman Catholics in 1994 numbered 59,858,042, or 23 percent of the U.S. population of 259,353,627. Most American Catholics are of European descent, but 350,000 Native Americans and 2.5 million African Americans also belong to the Catholic Church. Of an estimated 22.4 million Hispanic Americans, 80 percent are baptized Catholics. Recent immigration has added Filipino, Haitian, and Southeast Asian Catholics. The Church in the fifty states and the District of Columbia is divided into thirty-three metropolitan archdioceses, the archdiocese for the military services, and 150 dioceses. Thirteen Eastern-rite dioceses have 500,000 communicants. Catholics in the United States are 80 percent urban or suburban and primarily in the middle to upper income range. Over 70 percent have a secondary school education, and about 20 percent are college graduates.

A small U.S. country church, Old St. Hilary's in Tiburon, California (now a Historic Site); in 1994 there were almost 60 million Roman Catholics in the United States, over 7.8 million of whom were in California.

COLONIAL PERIOD TO THE PRESENT

Catholics came to the present United States as Spanish and French explorers in the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Spanish settlements stretched in a long arc from Florida to California. The legacy of Spain is evident in placenames, in "mission-style" architecture, and in Native American and Hispanic Catholics who trace their ancestry to colonial days. Spain's arc was intersected by a French one, anchored at Quebec and New Orleans. Spaniards planted missions and presidios, but settlements were few on the French arc. Except in Arizona, a Jesuit mission until 1767, Franciscans founded the Spanish missions. Jesuits and Franciscans, together with Carmelites and Quebec seminary priests, evangelized along the Great Lakes and the central river system.

The first permanent Catholic presence was established in 1565 by diocesan priests at St. Augustine, Florida. Franciscans were more successful with Florida tribes than the Jesuits who preceded them, but in 1763 the missions ended when Florida became British. Catholics in Florida were few after the 1821 U.S. occupation. The twentieth century has seen Catholic growth in Florida with retirees from the north and refugees from Cuba, Haiti, and elsewhere.

The original colonists in the southeast were Low Church Anglicans, followed by Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, Baptists, and Methodists. African-American slaves were generally evangelical Protestants. The twentieth-century movement of industry to the Sun Belt has modified the picture as Catholics follow jobs south, but Catholics remain few except in Louisiana, where Creole and Cajun descendants of the French live, as does the country's largest concentration of African-American Catholics. Catholics in Texas are growing, fed by immigration from Mexico and migration from the north.

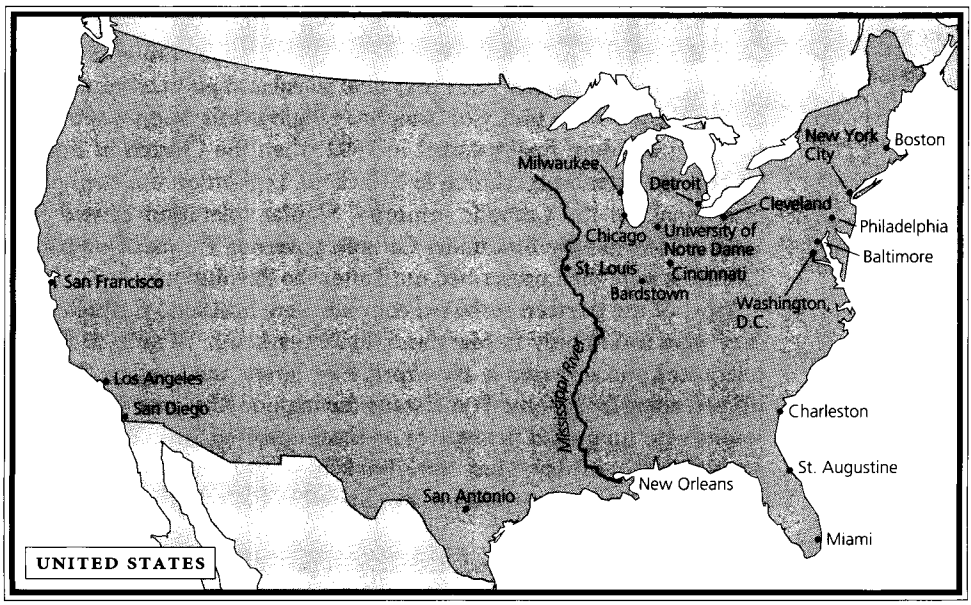
New Mexico and Arizona have retained a strong Spanish-Mexican patina. Many southwestern Catholics are of mixed Mexican and Native American heritage. Though after 1848 missionaries from France and elsewhere organized the Church on a European model, the twentieth century has seen a reassertion of Latino style, together with an influx of sun-seeking Catholics from elsewhere in the United States.

What is now the state of California was neglected by the Spanish until Russian moves southward from Alaska in 1768 prompted attention.

Members of a congregation exchange handshakes at Mass, following the Lord's Prayer and the presider's invitation, "Let us offer each other the sign of peace." The handshake replaces the kiss of peace (a ceremonial embrace) exchanged only by priests in the pre–Vatican II solemn High Mass.



Junipero Serra (d. 1784) was the planner of the Franciscan chain of twenty-one missions in which more than one hundred thousand natives were baptized between 1769 and 1834. California became a U.S. territory in 1847, in time for the gold rush, which brought adventurers from around the world. The dominant religious culture was Protestant, although a wide cross section of Catholics were among the settlers. The lingering Spanish-Mexican tradition was reinforced with the beginning in the 1890s of massive Mexican immigration.

France's colonial empire left little trace, save for placenames and a late-nineteenth-century immigration from Canada, chiefly into New England. In the Midwest, Catholicism came with pioneer settlers and later immigrants. Cities such as Cincinnati, St. Louis, Milwaukee, and Chicago became Catholic urban centers, while farmers from Maryland settled in rural Kentucky after 1785. Cities along the industrial Great Lakes drew increasing numbers of Italian and Slavic Catholics as the nineteenth century progressed.

A lay minister of the Eucharist offers the chalice to the communicant. The distribution of Holy Communion under the species of both consecrated bread and consecrated wine and the reception of Communion while standing rather than kneeling are the results of the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65).

ORGANIZATION OF THE CHURCH AND RELIGIOUS TOLERATION

Church organization in the United States stemmed from Lord Baltimore's Maryland colony (1634). Catholics were never a majority, not even aboard the ships the Ark and the Dove, which brought the first colonists, but for twenty years they held social and political control, and during those years a policy of complete religious toleration was in force. Religious freedom finally ended in 1692 when the Church of England became the established church in Maryland. Legislation was then passed that penalized the Catholic minority. Similar toleration existed from 1683 to 1689 in New York under Catholic governor Thomas Dongan, but Catholics were then proscribed until after the Revolution.

Most of the thirteen seaboard colonies were hostile to Catholics, and they were found only in Maryland, in Pennsylvania (thanks to Quaker tolerance), and scattered in New York, New Jersey, and Virginia. The only priests, apart from some Franciscans during one fifty-year period, were Jesuits who supported themselves on slave-operated farms and exercised an itinerant ministry. Most were English, twenty-one were American-born, and a half dozen Germans ministered to Catholics among Pennsylvania Dutch farmers.

In colonial New England, Congregationalist, Unitarian, and Baptist descendants of the original Puritan settlers predominated. Until the Revolution, there were few Catholics, except for the Abenaki in Maine, converted by French Jesuits. Nineteenth-century immigration from Ireland, Quebec, Italy, and Portugal changed the religious face of the region. In its southern tier of states Catholics developed their strongest regional concentration in the United States, especially in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island.

REVOLUTION AND THE FEDERAL PERIOD

In 1776 Catholics numbered 25,000, or 1 percent of the population. There were twenty-three priests, all ex-Jesuits. Their religious order had been suppressed in 1773 by Pope Clement XIV; they were subject to a bishop in London, but in practice governed by their last Jesuit superior until in 1784 Rome named ex-Jesuit John Carroll superior of the mission. In 1789 the priests elected him as the first bishop of Baltimore, and in 1808 he became archbishop. Carroll had a strong sense of the newness of America and the challenge it offered. A partisan of the Revolution, he advocated universal religious toleration and separation of Church and state. His efforts to introduce republican styles in church government were less successful. He retreated from support of vernacular liturgy and failed to involve the laity in choosing of pastors. While he argued that "an ordinary national church" had the right to choose its own bishops, he failed to organize a system to do that and acquiesced in a "mission" status that left matters in Rome's hands and set a model later imposed on the whole Church.

Refugees from the French Revolution included Sulpician priests who founded the nation's first seminary, St. Mary's in Baltimore (1791). Elizabeth Ann Bayley Seton (d. 1821), American founder of the Sisters of Charity, symbolized the Church's commitment to education and health-care institutions. Disputes with lay trustees, often triggered by less-than-exemplary clergy, plagued port cities, but the church of Boston prospered under Bishop Jean Cheverus, as did the frontier diocese of Bardstown (later Louisville) under Benedict Flaget.

CATHOLIC POPULATIONS OVER 500,000 IN U.S. ARCHDIOCESES (*) AND DIOCESES

*Los Angeles	3,559,816	Cleveland	815,608	Brownsville, Tex.	652,214
*Chicago	2,322,000	*Hartford	802,688	San Diego	647,094
*New York	2,286,187	Pittsburgh	792,178	Providence	645,653
*Boston	1,993,126	Buffalo	758,313	*San Antonio	628,776
Brooklyn	1,630,013	Galveston-Houston	748,781	*Milwaukee	616,276
*Detroit	1,480,116	Trenton	701,987	Orange, Calif.	598,663
*Philadelphia	1,428,395	*Miami	694,558	San Bernardino	570,040
Rockville Centre, N.Y.	1,340,279	*St. Paul–Minneapolis	691,180	*St. Louis	558,775
*Newark	1,301,838			*Cincinnati	544,100

SOURCE: 1995 Catholic Almanac (Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor Publishing Division, 1994).

EXPANSION AND THE IMMIGRANT PERIOD

The 1803 Louisiana Purchase doubled the land area of the United States. Texas was annexed in 1845; Idaho, Washington, and Oregon came by agreement with Great Britain in 1846; and the Mexican cession in 1848 added another half million square miles. By the mid-nineteenth century immigrants were transforming the Catholic body. Ten million Catholics arrived from Europe between 1820 and 1920. They settled in coastal and midwestern cities; some few became farmers. Archbishop John Hughes of New York (d. 1864) was an aggressive Irish immigrant leader; Bishop John Nepomucene Neumann of Philadelphia (d. 1860) was an example of earlier German-speaking immigrants. By 1850 the Roman Catholic Church was the largest single denomination in the country, but the national culture remained resolutely Protestant. Converts, like the philosopher Orestes Brownson (d. 1876) and the founder of the Paulists, Isaac Hecker (d. 1888), explored the compatibility of Catholicism and Americanism, but the pre–Civil War years were marked by antiforeign and anti-Catholic nativism, which abated only with the war, in which Catholics fought and Catholic sisters nursed on both sides.

American bishops attended Vatican I (1869–70), where most opposed a definition of papal infallibility. They had a strong collegial tradition, developed in the seven provincial (1829–49) and three plenary (1852, 1866, 1884) councils of Baltimore, that ran counter to contemporary Roman ideas, but they failed to put into place permanent supporting structures like those envisioned by Bishop John England (d. 1842) of Charleston, who wrote a constitution for the diocese and held regular conventions of clergy and laity.

A soup kitchen at Blessed Sacrament Church in Seattle, Washington, highlights the traditional commitment of U.S. Catholics to the service of those in need as well as the increased involvement of lay Catholics in the mission and ministries of the Church.

Post–Civil War reconstruction began with the Second Plenary Council's failure to take initiatives on behalf of the freed slaves. Work among Native Americans was hindered by the government's "Peace Policy," which turned many Catholic tribes over to the ministry of Protestants. Urbanization and industrialization brought prosperity to many Irish and Germans. Archbishop John McCloskey (d. 1885) of New York became the first American cardinal in 1875, but the reigning churchman for a half-century was Cardinal James Gibbons (d. 1921), archbishop of Baltimore from 1877 until his death.

STATE CATHOLIC POPULATIONS OVER 1 MILLION

California	7,827,156	Florida	1,821,941
New York	7,331,820	Wisconsin	1,548,632
Texas	3,974,688	Connecticut	1,368,962
Pennsylvania	3,617,998	Louisiana	1,311,458
Illinois	3,561,715	Minnesota	1,165,523
New Jersey	3,250,180
Massachusetts	2,978,321
Michigan	2,267,063
Ohio	2,223,714

SOURCE: 1995 Catholic Almanac (Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor Publishing Division, 1994).

Catholic numbers grew with the influx of immigrants from Italy and eastern Europe. They formed ethnic neighborhoods served by national parishes and schools. There was conflict with established Catholics, and small groups of Lithuanians and Poles separated from the Roman Catholic Church, as did an estimated quarter-million Eastern-rite Ukrainians. Italian adaptation was helped by the arrival of priests and sisters from Italy, including Frances Xavier Cabrini (d. 1917).

The Catholic Church in the United States has been characterized by development of educational and social-welfare institutions paralleling those of the state. The Third Plenary Council (1884) declared that "no parish is complete until it has schools adequate to the needs of its children." Secondary schools, colleges, and universities followed. The Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., opened in 1889. Other institutions included vocational and industrial schools, orphanages, protectories, and hospitals, chiefly staffed by religious sisters, who became the backbone around which the Church grew.

A young member of a Christian service group at Resurrection Church in Tempe, Arizona, assists in the construction of houses for poor families near Tijuana, Mexico.

Catholics at the turn of the century were torn by conflict over the pace and extent of Americanization. In the Midwest, an activist, optimistic religious approach flourished. The "Americanists" endorsed Church-state separation, championed organized labor, and were less enthusiastic about parochial schools. Opposition to them centered in the church of New York and among the midwestern Germans, who resisted assimilationist tendencies. Two papal encyclicals by Leo XIII cooled the Americanists' ardor: Longinqua Oceani (1895), which mingled caution with praise for American accomplishments, and Testem Benevolentiae (1899), which criticized an excessively activist religious approach. Pope Pius X's crusade against Modernism (1907) had lasting effects in discouraging intellectual advances in the U.S. Church.

A CHURCH CONSOLIDATED

Post–World War I restrictions on immigration slowed Catholic growth from that source and allowed stabilization. Major building projects were undertaken: seminaries, churches, and cathedrals were built. The 1920s were marred by an outbreak of anti-Catholicism, largely spurred by the Ku Klux Klan. Broader Protestant fears contributed to the 1928 defeat of the first-ever Catholic major-party presidential candidate, Alfred E. Smith. Catholics suffered with everyone else in the 1930s depression, but became influential in the labor movement and had better political connections than ever before with Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal. Groups like the personalist, communitarian Catholic Workers, led by Dorothy Day, took root. A growing liturgical movement was understood as an expression of social Catholicism. Interracial committees and organizations in support of marriage and family multiplied. The Legion of Decency, publishing moral evaluations of moving pictures, had a substantial impact on the film industry. The 1930s were also notable for the popularity among many Catholics of the right-wing populist radio priest Charles E. Coughlin.

A sister and lay teacher interact with young students in a Catholic school; in 1994 there were over 600,000 students enrolled in Catholic high schools and almost 2 million in Catholic elementary schools.

Wholehearted Catholic participation in World War II was followed by a decade of religious revival. The Catholic population increased between 1940 and 1960 from 21 to 42 million. An estimated 70 percent regularly attended Sunday Mass, and seminaries and convents were filled. Bishop Fulton J. Sheen (d. 1979) popularized religious philosophy as a national television personality. Lay Catholics were socially and economically upwardly mobile, a process aided by the GI Bill (1944) and the economic successes of the labor unions.

American Catholicism's contemporary era was introduced by the pontificate of John XXIII (1958–63), the Second Vatican Council (1962–65), and the election (1960) of the first Catholic American president, John F. Kennedy (d. 1963). Idealism among Catholic youth found new outlets in the Peace Corps and similar agencies. All this was prelude to American involvement in the worldwide societal convulsion of the 1960s, which found expression in growing agitation for civil rights and disillusionment with the war in Southeast Asia. Catholics were among the most radical antiwar activists.

With the exodus of Americans from cities to suburbs, the role of the parish as social center diminished. Parish schools declined as costs rose and Catholics moved away from close-knit neighborhoods. The downward trend in religious vocations and the broader range of ministries open to sisters and laypeople have been major factors in altering the institutional face of the Church. The feminist movement affected church life, and women took on administrative and pastoral responsibilities, but without ordination. In half the country's 19,000 parishes, 20,000 laypeople (85 percent women) and sisters function as ministers in several pastoral roles.

American Catholics run the ideological spectrum. There are small groups who reject liturgical reform and in general "Vatican II Catholicism." Most are religiously centrist. There is greater liberalism in ethics, in judging what is and is not sinful. Both social-activist liberals and right-wing intellectuals are active. The hierarchy speaks out more frequently, usually through the National Conference of Catholic Bishops and its operational secretariat, the United States Catholic Conference, both organized in 1967. While a national "Call to Action" Conference (Detroit, 1976) was less influential than anticipated, the appointment of pastorally oriented younger bishops during the tenure as apostolic delegate (1973–80) of Archbishop Jean Jadot, combined with a perceived liberal bent in the bishops' Washington staff, resulted in publication of pastoral letters on topics like the United States economy, war and peace, and the Hispanic presence in American Catholicism. Heightened consciousness on the part of bishops of their collegial teaching responsibility provoked some tensions with Rome in the restorationist pontificate of John Paul II. A "third age" of American Catholicism, following the colonial and immigrant phases, has begun. It finds American Catholics better integrated into the national life and less defensive about their religion than ever before. But structures and style appropriate to the "third age" are still very much in process.

See also Americanism; Baltimore, councils of; Brownson, Orestes Augustus; Cabrini, St. Frances Xavier; Calvert, Cecil; Calvert, Charles; Calvert, George; Calvert, Leonard; Carroll, John; Coughlin, Charles Edward; Day, Dorothy M.; Flaget, Benedict Joseph; Gibbons, James; Hecker, Isaac Thomas; Hughes, John Joseph; Kennedy, John Fitzgerald; McCloskey, John; Neumann, St. John Nepomucene; Serra, Bl. Junipero; Seton, St. Elizabeth Ann Bayley; Sheen, Fulton J.; Smith, Alfred E.

Bibliography

Dolan, Jay P. The American Catholic Experience: A History from Colonial Times to the Present. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1985.

Ellis, John Tracy. American Catholicism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.

Hennesey, James. American Catholics: A History of the Roman Catholic Community in the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.

JAMES HENNESEY

universal salvific will of God, God's intention to save human beings. The classic text indicating the scope of God's salvific will is 1 Tim 2:3–4: "God our Savior, who desires everyone to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth." The universal scope of God's saving mercy is shown in many other texts as well, e.g., Rom 11:32, John 3:16, 1 Cor 15:21–22, 2 Cor 5:14–15.

But what does it mean for God to will the salvation of everyone if conceivably not everyone is saved? Augustine (d. 430), from the time of the Pelagian controversy, emphasized the infallible efficaciousness of God's will. Augustine took it for granted that many were lost. Hence, he gave these universal texts a restricted scope. He said they meant that God wills the salvation of all who are saved, or the salvation of people of all kinds and classes. But God does not actually will everyone to be saved; for if God did, no one would be lost.

A more satisfactory explanation was given by John of Damascus (d. ca. 749), who said that God antecedently wills the salvation of all, i.e., prior to a consideration of sinners who die unrepentant, but that God consequently wills the salvation only of those who freely accept and persevere in divine grace. Salvation is a divine gift that only God can confer; but God wills to give it to everyone who does not refuse it. This is the common opinion of Catholic theologians today. See also predestination; salvation; salvation outside the Church; will of God.

universities, Catholic. See Catholic colleges and universities—statistics.

universities, pontifical. See pontifical universities.

unmixed chalice, the ancient Armenian custom of consecrating at the Eucharist pure wine unmixed with water. Given a later Monophysite interpretation as signifying that Jesus had only one nature, it was a source of frequent controversy and condemned more than once, notably at the Council in Trullo in 692. Recent restoration of the Armenian Catholic Eucharist has reinstated the original Armenian custom. See also mixed chalice.

Urban II, Bl. [Odo], ca. 1042–99, pope from 1088 to 1099. After serving as canon and archdeacon of Reims, France, and prior of Cluny ca. 1070, he was made cardinal-bishop of Ostia and served as papal legate to France and Germany. As pope, Urban II was occupied with reform of the Church and conflicts with the emperor, Henry IV. He presided over the Council of Clermont (1095), where he inaugurated the First Crusade, and the Council of Bari (1098), where he attempted an unsuccessful reconciliation of the Greek and Latin churches. See also Clermont, Council of; Crusades.

Urban V, Bl. [Guillaume de Grimoard], 1310–70, pope from 1362 to 1370. A French Benedictine and professor of law, he attempted as pope to reform the Avignon curia and, unsuccessfully, to move the papacy back to Rome. He was beatified in 1870. Feast day: December 19. See also Avignon.

Urban VI [Bartolomeo Prignano], ca. 1318–89, pope from 1378 to 1389. Urban succeeded Gregory XI, who had returned the papacy from Avignon to Rome. Taking advantage of his violent demeanor, which led some to think him deranged, the French cardinals elected a second pope, Clement VII, claiming Urban's election had been invalid because the Romans had coerced them into electing an Italian. Clement immediately returned to Avignon, beginning the Great Western Schism (1378–1417). Urban's reign was marked by disorder and war. He executed five cardinals who plotted against him, and he himself may have died by poisoning. See also Avignon; Great Schism.

Urban VIII [Maffeo Barberini], 1568–1644, pope from 1623 to 1644. As pope he revised the Roman Breviary (1632), enforced the Council of Trent's decrees on the residence of bishops in their sees, and built extensively in Rome. He was also a nepotist, issued the second condemnation of Galileo, and condemned Jansen's Augustinus (1642).

Urbi et Orbi (oor'bee et ohr'bee; Lat., "to the city and to the world"), the blessing given by the pope, ordinarily in public (e.g., from the balcony of St. Peter's Basilica in Rome) and on a major feast day, such as Christmas or Easter, intended for both the people of Rome and for all of the faithful of the world.

Ursula, St., ca. fourth-century virgin and martyr. In legend, she was a British princess who fled to Cologne to preserve her virginity and was martyred there along with an unknown number of companions. Her cult grew with the discovery of her bones in 1155. She is a popular figure in religious art and iconography. Feast day: formerly October 21 (no longer observed).

Ursulines (O.S.U.), a general title for various institutes of religious women that are the monastic heirs to the Company of St. Ursula, founded by the Italian Angela Merici in 1535.

The original Company of St. Ursula had the goal of educating girls. Under the Primitive Rule set forth by Angela Merici, the members continued to live with their families, until a 1585 revision appropriated the Brescian rule's vision for community life. A 1612 bull of Paul V made the community into a formal religious order of cloistered nuns taking solemn vows.

In the seventeenth century the major Ursuline monasteries were in France, at Paris and Bordeaux. These monasteries were the sources for foundations in Quebec (1639) and New Orleans (1727). Ursuline communities in Tildonk, Belgium, and Mt. Calvary, Ahrweiler, Germany, also have foundations in the United States. At the initiative of Pope Leo XIII, many Ursuline convents banded together into the Roman Union of the Order of St. Ursula in 1900, under a single prioress general, Mother St. Julian. Other Ursuline communities are under pontifical jurisdiction as independent monasteries or under diocesan jurisdiction as convents.

While embracing many apostolates, the education of women has continued to be a distinctive hallmark of the Ursuline order in the United States. In 1848 the Cleveland community added a fourth vow, that of instruction, to their profession. The Ursulines of Cleveland run Ursuline College, which has undertaken to revamp its curriculum to reflect the particular ways in which women learn. See also Angela Merici, St.

usher. See hospitality, minister of.

usury, the charging of an excessive payment (interest) for the use of money. Many Fathers of the Church condemned interest on loans absolutely because, according to their interpretation of Mosaic law, the practice originates in lenders' greed and leads to exploitation of the poor. Some early councils forbade only clerics from charging interest, but others made the prohibition absolute. There is no analysis in these texts of the meaning of interest, nor is there consideration of the question of moderate rates of interest.

Early Scholastic philosophy based its analysis on the notion that the value of money consisted in its being a commodity directed to immediate consumption, like food or drink. Early Scholastics, therefore, classified monetary loans as gratuitous by nature. Moreover, following Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.), they thought of money as essentially sterile, so that charging interest was a violation of commutative justice. However, they did acknowledge that there could be extrinsic reasons for charging interest, such as compensation for loss due to late payment.

In the sixteenth century, a large number of Catholic authors distinguished loans for consumption from loans for production. By rejecting the Aristotelian notion of money, they could affirm that the same amount of money could have a different value at different times and, consequently, that there could be intrinsic reasons for charging interest.

Although Benedict XIV made the Scholastic teaching part of Church doctrine by his encyclical Vix Pervenit of 1745, the rationale behind the distinction between intrinsic and extrinsic justifications of interest has become obsolete. The Scholastics themselves recognized that the value of different currencies depended on the agreement of traders in the market, and thus that market forces could determine a just price for loans. ROBERT P. KENNEDY utilitarianism, any of several moral systems that maintain that the moral rectitude of an action is determined by its overall utility or usefulness, measured on a previously determined scale of value. In its classic form, as developed primarily by Jeremy Bentham (d. 1832), utilitarianism held that utility refers to an action's contribution to the general welfare; classical utilitarianism identified human pleasure as the only absolute good and pain the only evil. Subsequent modifications of utilitarianism advocate some system of maximization of human welfare. Utilitarianism has been criticized by Catholic moral theologians because of the inadequacy of its value structure and its incomplete understanding of human action. See also moral theology.

utraquism, the teaching of John Hus and his disciples in the fifteenth century that Christians must receive the Eucharist under the forms of both bread and wine, since Christ's words in reference to the bread speak only of his body and in reference to the wine only of his blood. This teaching was rejected by the councils of Constance (1415), Basel (1432), and Trent (1551). See also Communion under both kinds.

Uzhorod, Union of (1646), the first of three unions between the Catholic Church and Orthodox faithful, who had long coexisted within the Catholic kingdom of Hungary.

Because no act of union was formally documented, the precise date and other details of this event are obscure. The majority opinion is that on April 24, 1646, a group of sixty-three Ruthenian priests made a profession of Catholic faith at the castle of Uzhorod. This was done without the knowledge of the Holy See or any higher Catholic ecclesiastical authority, but was simply accepted by the Latin bishop of Eger. According to a letter written by six Ruthenian archdeacons to Pope Innocent X in 1652, the group acknowledged the primacy of the pope and added three conditions: that they retain the Byzantine rite, elect their own bishop who would then be confirmed by the Holy See, and have the free enjoyment of ecclesiastical immunities.

The evidence indicates that these Orthodox asked for full communion with the Catholic Church because they felt that union would offer a defense against the advance of Protestantism, improve the level of clerical culture, and liberate the Ruthenians from social and economic servitude.

The seed sown at Uzhorod in 1646 took root and spread. In 1664 and 1713 other unions took place that resulted in the virtual disappearance of Orthodoxy within the Hungarian kingdom.

These unions gave rise to the Byzantine Catholic churches that are now located in Slovakia, Transcarpathia (Ukraine), and Hungary, as well as in the Maramures area in Romania. See also Hungary, Catholicism in; Pseudo-Union of Uzhorod; Ruthenian Catholic Church; Slovak Byzantine Catholic Church.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

V

vagus (vah'guhs). See wanderer.

Vaison, councils of, two interprovincial synods of the church in Gaul important for the history of the liturgy. The first (442) specified regulations for penitents. The second (529), under the presidency of Caesarius of Arles, gave to rural priests the right of preaching and ordered the singing of the threefold Sanctus at Mass.

Valdés, Juan de, ca. 1500–1541, Spanish humanist and writer. His Erasmian piety, emphasizing inner religious feelings over hierarchical authority, inspired prominent laypeople and clerics in Italy, where he had moved in 1531. Although devoutly Catholic, his spiritual writings were posthumously condemned by Counter-Reformation Church leaders. Some of his followers became Protestants, notably Bernardino of Ochino and Peter Martyr.

Valentine, St., the name of two saints about whom very little is known. One was reportedly a priest from Rome, beheaded in 269 by the Emperor Claudius II (d. 270) for refusing to worship Roman gods. The other, martyred several years earlier, was bishop of Terni, renowned for his gift of healing. Feast day: February 14.

Valentine's Day, St., a popular feast celebrated on February 14 by the exchange of signs of love. Its origins are found in the Roman martyrology, the earliest listing of martyrs, where two Valentines were commemorated on February 14, both beheaded on the Flaminian Way. One was a Roman priest, the other, a bishop of Terni. Whether there were one or two Valentines remains an open question. Neither has a clear connection with courting couples or those in love. The custom of sending love notes and gifts probably originated in the Middle Ages from the belief that February 14 marked the mating season of birds. This day is no longer acknowledged or celebrated as a memorial or feast in the liturgical calendar. See also Valentine, St.

Valentinus, ca. 100–ca. 175, founder of a Gnostic Christian school of thought that included Heracleon, Ptolemy, Florinus, Theodotus, and Marcus among its followers. He came to Rome from Alexandria, ca. 136–40, where he earned great respect for his learning. His failure to be elected the Bishop of Rome may have prompted the founding of his school. Only fragments remain of Valentinus's own writings, but the Gospel of Truth, Tripartite Tractate, Gospel of Philip, and Epistle to Rheginum reflect the thought of the Valentinian school. See also Gnosticism.

validation, in canon law the rectification of an act previously not recognized as legal. Validation may take place by repeating the act in the proper manner or, under certain conditions, by decree of an authority competent to rectify the act.

validity [canon law], the quality of an act that determines whether it is recognized as legal. At times canon law requires that an act be performed in a certain manner in order to be valid; in such cases the law states this explicitly. The presumption of canon law is that all acts are valid until proven otherwise.

validity of sacraments, juridical concept, used along with liceity in speaking about sacraments. Validity refers to the minimal requirements necessary for the Church to recognize that an action or celebration has resulted in a true sacrament. For example, in Baptism the minimum requirements for validity are the pronouncement of the prescribed form (the trinitarian formula) and the use of the correct matter (water). If either of these minimum requirements is not met—for example, the form only invokes one person of the Trinity or water is not used—the sacrament is not celebrated and is considered invalid.

Other conditions also affect validity. The administration of any sacrament other than Baptism on someone not baptized is considered invalid. The reconferral of those sacraments that leave a character and hence can only be celebrated once—Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders—is impossible and therefore also invalidates the sacrament.

Finally, the intention of both the minister and recipient of certain sacraments may also play a role in their validity. Minimally, the minister must intend to do what the Church intends in celebrating a sacrament. In Marriage, for example, since the spouses minister the sacrament to each other, their intention to celebrate the sacrament is a sine qua non (Lat., "absolutely necessary condition") for validity. See also liceity [canon law]; sacrament.

Valla, Lorenzo, ca. 1406–57, priest, Italian humanist scholar, and opponent of Scholastics. A champion of Renaissance classicism, Valla pioneered textual criticism, seeking by philological methods to expose medieval "corruptions" of important texts such as the Bible and the Donation of Constantine, which Valla claimed was a complete forgery.

Vallumbrosan order, contemplative order of monks, nuns, and lay brothers known for its ascetic life-style, founded ca. 1035 by St. John Gualbert near Vallumbrosa, twenty miles east of Florence. A few houses remain active. See also John Gualbert, St.

values, moral, those worthy (Old Fr., valoir) things that are essential to proper human living, e.g., the capacity for love. Moral values include such virtues as honesty, justice, chastity, fortitude, and temperance.

The broadest and most essential difference in understandings of value is that between the subjective and the objective. For subjectivists, the value of something depends on how people esteem it. For objectivists, things have intrinsic worth, so that evaluations must respect the relative worth of their objects and can thus be correct or incorrect. In Catholic ethics, value translates the Latin bonum, "good," and therefore has objective reality.

Values are either properly moral, related directly to the morality of the person (e.g., justice, chastity), or, more commonly, morally relevant effects of human action. Properly moral values are absolute and inviolable because to act against them involves violation of one's own or another's conscience. In the second sense, values are identical with premoral goods, e.g., knowledge, health, friendship, beauty.

Judgments about intrinsic value find expression in moral norms or rules. If the value is moral in the strict sense, it yields a formal, inviolable norm, such as the injunction to be just or truthful. Formal norms do not, however, specify what particular actions accord with them. If the value is premoral, then the norm is specific and may admit of exceptions; whether specific norms, such as the rule forbidding contraception, are in principle open to exception is a matter of contention. ROBERT P. KENNEDY

Vandals, Germanic people who in 429 invaded North Africa and by 439 had captured Carthage. Arian Christians, they persecuted the orthodox Catholic population, confiscating property, exiling people, and raiding ships and ports throughout the Mediterranean. They seized and "vandalized" Rome in 455. Their kingdom in Africa fell in 534–35. See also Arianism.

Vatican, an independent state in Italy where the Bishop of Rome (the pope) resides. The term is often used as a shorthand expression for the central authority of the Catholic Church: the pope, the Roman Curia, and the Vatican City State together. It takes its name from the Vatican hill, which in classical Rome was located outside the city walls and was the site of Nero's circus and a cemetery. Tradition holds that the Apostle Peter was martyred in Nero's circus and buried in the nearby cemetery. A shrine over the tomb of the apostle was reported in the second century, and the fourth-century emperor Constantine leveled the previously hilly site of the cemetery and built a basilica in honor of the apostle. This church was replaced in the Renaissance by the present St. Peter's Basilica (dedicated, 1626).

Because of the deterioration of the palace at the Lateran, the papal residence at the Vatican became the principal residence of the bishops of Rome after the Avignon papacy in France (1309–77), though the popes also used other residences, including the Quirinal Palace until the unification of Italy and the fall of the Papal States in 1870. At that time the pope became a "prisoner of the Vatican" until the solution of the "Roman Question" in 1929. The Lateran Treaty with the Italian government recognized the independent sovereignty of the Vatican City State, compensated the papacy for the loss of the Papal States, and granted official recognition and privileges to the Catholic Church in Italy. The treaty was renegotiated in 1985, with the Catholic Church relinquishing most of the privileges granted in 1929, including compulsory religious instruction in government schools and the payment of clergy salaries by the Italian government. See also Saint Peter's Basilica; Vatican City State. JOHN F. LAHEY

Vatican City State, the political entity that governs the territory where the Holy See is located. The smallest sovereign state in the world (108.7 acres in all), it is completely surrounded by the city of Rome. It contains St. Peter's Basilica, the Vatican Palace (the residence of the pope), the Vatican Museum, the Vatican Library (containing 70,000 manuscripts and almost 800,000 books), Vatican Radio, Vatican Television Center, the Vatican Observatory, Vatican Polyglot Press, the Vatican Gardens, art galleries, archives, a post office, a bank, a newspaper, a railroad station, and various offices, apartments, and service facilities. Its extraterritorial rights also extend to various other buildings in Rome, including the major basilicas of the St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major, and St. Paul's Outside the Walls; office buildings for various Congregations of the Roman Curia; and the papal villa at Castel Gandolfo, fifteen miles southeast of the city. The pope is the head of the government, with full executive, legislative, and judicial power. The administration of its daily affairs, however, is in the hands of the Pontifical Commission for the State of Vatican City. The territory's normal population is about one thousand, but it employs about four thousand in all. One could walk across the territory in thirty minutes or less.

Located outside the walls of classical Rome, the Vatican hill is revered as the site of the Apostle Peter's martyrdom and his burial place. Although the term "Vatican" has come to refer to the pope as well as to those offices of the Roman Curia that assist the pope in his teaching and pastoral ministry, the Vatican City State was established only in 1929 as part of the Lateran accords that regularized the relationship of the Holy See with the government of Italy. The pope had been a temporal sovereign until the fall of the Papal States in 1870. The "Roman Question" then became a vexing concern especially between the new state of Italy and the Holy See. The question involved a number of issues, including a concern to grant the pope an independence from temporal authority that could allow him to fulfill his ministry to the universal Church, free from coercion. As part of the settlement the Vatican City State was created as an independent political entity. This Lateran Treaty was signed on February 11, 1929, and ratified on June 7 of the same year, by the Italian government and Vatican City. The agreement recognized Catholicism as the religion of Italy and provided financial compensation for the loss of the Papal States. A new concordat was ratified on June 3, 1985, ending the official status of Catholicism in Italy, the mandating of Catholic instruction in government schools, and the payment of clergy salaries by the Italian government.

Vatican City State and the Holy See are not synonymous. The Holy See is the sovereign spiritual and diplomatic authority exercised by the pope. Vatican City State is the political entity and territory in which the Holy See is located and that guarantees the Holy See's independence. Over one hundred nations have formal diplomatic relations with the Holy See, not with Vatican City State. See also audience, papal; basilica, major; Holy See; Lateran Treaty; papacy, the; papal flag; Roman Curia; Saint Peter's Basilica; Vatican Library; Vatican Radio. JOHN F. LAHEY Vatican Council I, the twentieth (according to customary enumeration) general, or ecumenical, council of the Church, which met from December 1869 to October 1870 at Rome in St. Peter's Basilica. It approved two dogmatic constitutions: Dei Filius, on the relationship of reason and faith, and Pastor Aeternus, on the papacy's juridical primacy and on the infallibility of the papacy's teaching office.

Historical Background and the Preparation for the Council: Pope Pius IX and his advisers intended the council as a bulwark against the modern spirit and the principles of the Enlightenment and the French Revolution of 1789. They wanted to combat rationalism, materialism, and atheism, since these ideologies undermine religion; liberalism as a worldview and as a political movement, since it calls into question the authority of the Christian faith and the Church and, together with nationalism, threatens the unity and independence of the Church and its existence as an institution; and theology insofar as it had become open to modern ideas. The plan for a council stood in close relation to the encyclical Quanta Cura and its well-known "Syllabus," the list of "modern errors." Two days before the encyclical's publication, on December 6, 1864, in the presence of some cardinals, Pius IX declared for the first time his intention to convene a council. The preparatory commissions began their work in 1865. It became increasingly clear that the pope intended the council to solemnly confirm the condemnation of the errors listed in the "Syllabus."

The commissions that prepared the council were composed predominantly of supporters of Ultramontanism, a movement that opposed the Enlightenment and liberalism through the strengthening of papal authority. Their goal was the declaration of the dogma of papal infallibility and the papacy's juridical primacy. Nevertheless, there was at the outset no agenda for the preparatory work. Since 1867, Bishop Senestrey of Regensburg and Archbishop Manning of Westminster, along with Rome's Jesuit journal Civiltà Cattolica, had promoted the definition of papal infallibility. From the point of view of the Ultramontanists and their supporters, opposition groups appeared to be forming, headed by J. J. I. von Döllinger in Germany, Acton and Newman in England, Gratry and C. de Montalembert in France. Many of these opponents regarded the definition as impossible for historical reasons, others as inopportune in the current situation. To the latter group belonged Archbishop Spalding of Baltimore and fourteen German bishops, who informed Rome in late summer 1869 of their lack of support for a decree on papal infallibility. Since the beginning of 1867 the preparatory commission for the dogma was preoccupied with this opposition.

The Course of the Council: In June 1867 it was officially announced that Pius IX planned to convoke the council the following year. The invitation to the Orthodox bishops and Anglicans and Protestants was pro forma (Lat., "according to form"), i.e., perfunctory, and not acted upon by the pope. The solemn opening occurred on December 8, 1869. Of the approximately 1,050 possible participants, 774 were present, of which two-thirds were Europeans and one-third Italians. Most of the missionary bishops also were Europeans. The United States was represented by forty-eight bishops and one abbot. The five presidents of the council were named by the pope.

Of the fifty-one schemas, or proposed decrees, prepared by the commissions, only six were discussed and only two—in part—acted upon. The council treated the schema on the erroneous teachings of rationalism, traditionalism, and semirationalism, the last of which represented by the theologians Georg Hermes from Bonn and Anton Günther from Vienna. The schema was severely criticized, reworked, and finally unanimously approved on April 24, 1870, as the Dogmatic Constitution on the Catholic Faith (Dei Filius).

The council fathers, differing on the definition of papal infallibility, can be divided into three groups. The small group of active infallibilists under the leadership of Manning and Senestrey represented an extreme view, upholding the infallibility of all papal teachings, especially of the Syllabus, and also advocating papal infallibility as the source of the Church's infallibility. The majority of the council was not primarily interested in declaring a formal definition of papal infallibility, but these bishops wanted to strengthen the principle of papal authority and were, therefore, receptive to the propaganda of the infallibilists. The third group, the minority in opposition to the definition of papal infallibility, comprised a fifth of the council fathers and was composed primarily of bishops from Germany, France, and Austria-Hungary. Archbishop Kenrick of St. Louis and Archbishop Connelly of Halifax also belonged to this group. Their opposition was based partially on ecclesial-political and ecumenical reasons and partially on principle. Many rejected the Ultramontane-centralist model of the Church because it conflicts with the ecclesial structure of the ancient Church.

The infallibilists succeeded in filling the important delegations on the dogmatic statement with their members and presenting to the pope a list of four hundred supporters of a definition of papal infallibility. In light of this support, the pope decided that the schema on the Church would be expanded with a chapter on papal infallibility. When public discussion grew sharper, the majority of the council pressed for a quick decision. At the request of approximately a hundred council fathers, the pope chose to separate from the schema on the Church the chapter on papal primacy and papal infallibility and to allow this chapter to be acted on separately as the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ.

In conciliar debate, the minority hardened in its resistance to the proposed constitution. Minimally, these bishops wanted it stressed that the pope could only be infallible if he was supported by the infallible tradition of the faith of the whole Church. This was the understanding of the majority, but in light of earlier conciliar and Gallican tendencies, they did not want to introduce procedural conditions for the validity of a papal decision (e.g., that the pope must poll the episcopacy prior to declaring a pronouncement infallible). Neither the extreme infallibilists nor the minority could win in the final version of the text. Out of protest sixty-one members of the minority left Rome before the final vote. On June 18, 1870, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church of Christ (Pastor Aeternus) was passed, with only two negative votes.

The minority of bishops, who had not voted for the decree, gradually accepted the decision on condition of its reception by the Church as a whole and in the sense of its interpretation that was indirectly clarified by the pope. In German-speaking lands protest within the Church led to the formation of the Old Catholic community.

Because of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, Pius IX adjourned the council on October 20, 1870, for an indefinite time. It was never reconvened.

The Results of the Council: Because of its premature ending the council remained incomplete. Fortunately, it did not accomplish the intended goal of making the Syllabus into a dogma. Although conditioned by the concerns of its time, the constitution Dei Filius can be regarded as effective. In opposition to rationalism, which makes the value of revelation dependent upon the judgment of human reason, it teaches the proper truth of revelation. In opposition to fideist traditionalism, which denies to human reason any capacity for religious and ethical knowledge, it defends reason and the rational credibility of Christian faith.

The one-sided emphasis of the constitution Pastor Aeternus is regrettable. As the minority anticipated, this document has proved harmful to the Church. It was also unnecessary, because the supreme pastoral and teaching authority of the papacy was not contested at the time. Nevertheless, the minority did prevent the acceptance of the extreme definition of papal infallibility, and eventually the views of the minority were confirmed by Vatican II (1962–65). See also faith and reason; infallibility; Manning, Henry Edward; Newman, John Henry; Old Catholics; Pius IX; primacy, papal; Syllabus of Errors; Ultramontanism.

Bibliography

Butler, Cuthbert. The Vatican Council, 1869–1870. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1962.

Ellis, John Tracy. "The Church Faces the Modern World: The First Vatican Council." The General Council: Special Studies in Doctrinal and Historical Background, edited by William J. McDonald. Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1962.

Hennesey, James J. The First Council of the Vatican: The American Experience. New York: Herder and Herder, 1963.

HERMAN J. POTTMEYER

Vatican Library, founded by Pope Nicholas V (d. 1455), a collection of some 70,000 manuscripts, almost 800,000 printed books, and 7,500 incunabula (Lat.,"cradle [books]") housed in Vatican City State. (The incunabula are products of the so-called cradle days of printing, i.e., the fifteenth century.) The oldest public library in Europe, it also contains the Vatican archives, which were opened to scholars by Pope Leo XIII in 1881. See also Vatican City State.

Vatican Radio, the electronic voice of the Vatican, inaugurated in 1931 by Pope Pius XI. Designed by Guglielmo Marconi, the inventor of radio, and supervised by him until his death in 1937, the station broadcasts in thirty-four languages to every part of the world. It has a staff of over four hundred broadcasters and technicians, including thirty-five Jesuits. The Vatican Television Center was founded by Pope John Paul II in 1983. See also Vatican City State.

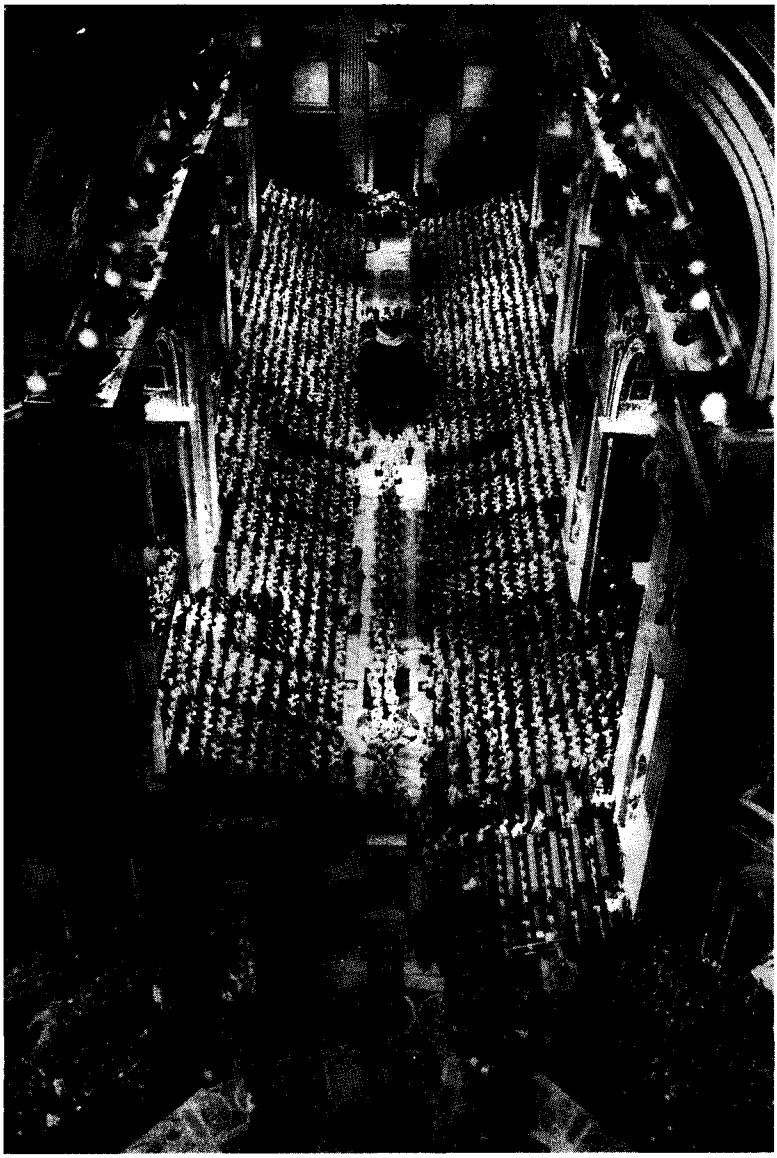
Vaughan, Henry, 1622–95, English spiritual poet. He had a conversion experience early in life, which diverted his attention from the practice of medicine to the writing of spiritual poetry. His best-known work is the Silex Scintillans, published in two parts in 1650 and 1655.

Vaughan, Herbert, 1832–1903, English cardinal, founder of the Mill Hill Missionaries. Appointed archbishop of Westminster in 1892, he obtained permission from Rome for English Catholics to attend Oxford and Cambridge universities and built Westminster Cathedral, begun in 1895. See also Mill Hill Missionaries; Mill Hill Sisters.

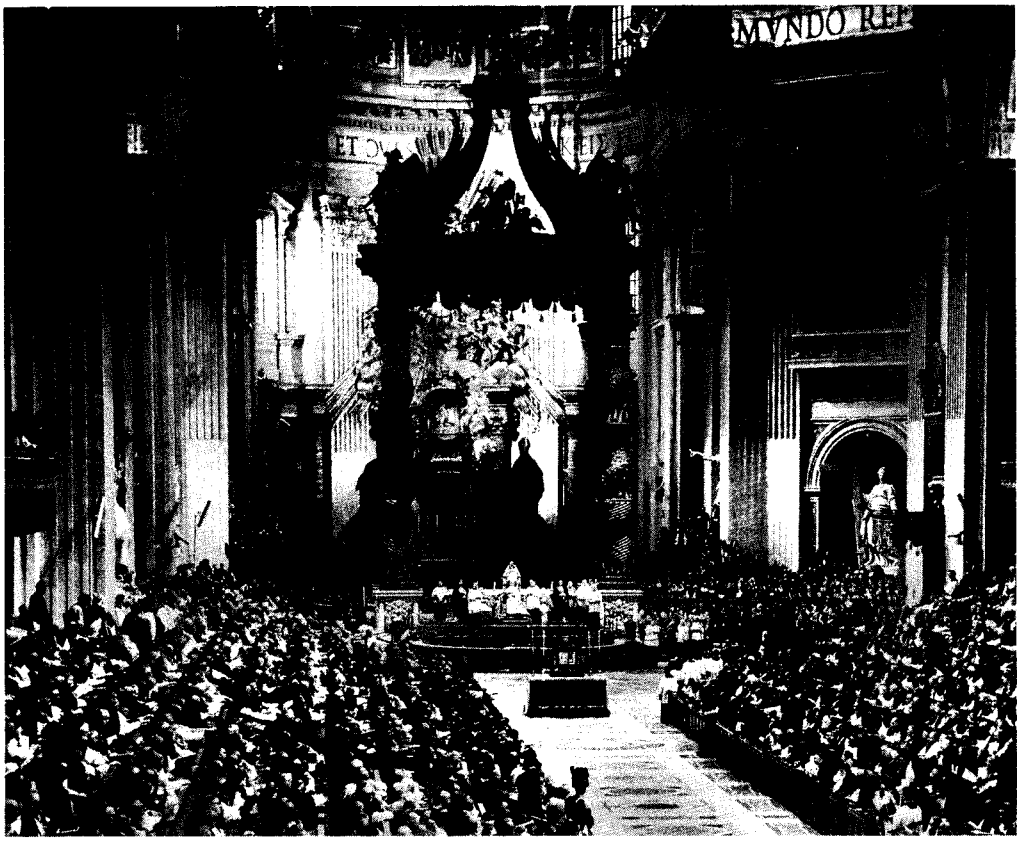
Vawter, Bruce, 1921–86, biblical scholar, leader in the Catholic biblical renewal. He entered the Congregation of Mission (Vincentians) in 1942; was ordained in 1947; received S.S.L. (1952) and S.S.D. (1957) degrees from the Pontifical Biblical Institute, in Rome; and taught principally at Kenrick Seminary in St. Louis, St. Thomas in Denver, and De Paul University in Chicago (1968–86). He was president of the Catholic Biblical Association (1961–62). His influential books A Path Through Genesis (1956) and The Conscience of Israel (1961) were models for the presentation of solid scholarship to a wider audience.

VATICAN COUNCIL II

Vatican Council II was the twenty-first general, or ecumenical, council of the Church (October 11, 1962–December 8, 1965). The council is regarded by many as the most significant religious event since the sixteenth-century Reformation and certainly as the most important of the twentieth century.



Gathering of all the Catholic bishops of the world in the nave of St. Peter's Basilica, Vatican City, for the ceremony opening the Second Vatican Council, October 11, 1962; Pope John XXIII enters the basilica in procession down the middle aisle.



St. Peter's Basilica during the Second Vatican Council, with a view of the altar, Bernini's classic baldachino overhead, the sanctuary, the enthroned Bible in the center aisle, and many of the bishops and official observers.

GENERAL FACTS ABOUT THE COUNCIL

Pope John XXIII first announced his intention to call a council on July 25, 1959, and convoked the council on December 25, 1961, in an apostolic constitution, Humanae Salutis ("Of Human Salvation"). There were four separate sessions, all held in St. Peter's Basilica: October–December 1962, September–December 1963, September–November 1964, and September–December 1965. Each day began with Mass celebrated in as many different rites as were represented at the council—twenty-six by one estimate—and by the enthronement of the Sacred Scriptures.

The total number of delegates (or "fathers") at this council greatly exceeded the number attending any of the preceding twenty. The largest previous ecumenical council had been Vatican Council I (1869–70), with 737 in attendance. Vatican II had more than 2,600 bishops from all over the world (2,908 would have been eligible to attend the first session). The total number of participants exceeded 3,000, counting theologians and other experts. These experts, periti in Latin (as distinct from the bishops' private advisers), numbered about 200 in the first session and 480 by the end of the council.

The council was not only the largest in terms of numbers but also the most ecumenical (meaning, lit., "the whole wide world") in terms of nations and cultures. Vatican I, for example, was dominated by Europeans, including European bishops in mission territories. Because of the Church's success in building native clergies between Vatican I and the mid-twentieth century, most of the bishops from mission countries attending Vatican II were themselves natives of those lands and products of those cultures. Among eligible bishops, 1,089 were from Europe, 489 from South America, 404 from North America, 374 from Asia, 296 from Africa, 84 from Central America, and 75 from Oceania. All speeches and discussions were conducted in Latin, however. Cardinal Richard J. Cushing of Boston offered to pay for a system of simultaneous translation, similar to the one used at the United Nations, but the Vatican declined.

The council was also more ecumenical than previous councils in terms of non-Catholic and lay observers. Some forty non-Catholic observers were present from the start, although none from the Eastern Orthodox churches. By the beginning of the second session in 1963, there were sixty-three observers from almost every major Christian denomination, including three newly arrived representatives of the Russian Orthodox Church. By the end of the council, there were eighty in all. These observers had some of the best seats at the council, in the tribune of St. Longinus, close to the moderators' table. Once a week they met with one of the periti to discuss matters under consideration, but their influence was indirect rather than direct, as they had no right to speak or to vote at the council. Eleven laymen were invited to attend the second session, but by the beginning of the fourth and final session in 1965 there were fifty-two lay auditors, twenty-nine of whom were men and twenty-three women, including ten nuns.

This was also the first ecumenical council in history to have available to it electric lights, telephones, typewriters, and other modern means of communication and transportation (although it did not yet have access to computers and satellite technology). It was also the first council to be covered by newspapers, magazines, radio, and television from all over the world, although the media were not allowed in St. Peter's during the sessions. They relied on press handouts that usually reflected the views of the conservatives and on the reports of friendly bishops and periti.

The council was unique in its stated purpose as well. Unlike so many previous councils, Vatican II had not been called to combat heresy or to deal with some serious threat to the unity of the Church. On the contrary, Pope John XXIII, in his opening address of October 11, 1962, said that the council's goal was to eradicate the seeds of discord and to promote peace and the unity of all humankind, not to repeat traditional doctrinal formulations or to condemn errors.

The preparation for this council was the most extensive in the history of the Church. Ideas for the conciliar agenda were solicited from every bishop, from the heads of clerical religious orders (but not orders of religious women), from Catholic universities and theological faculties, as well as from members of the Roman Curia. Over 9,300 proposals were submitted. The material was indexed and distributed to eleven preparatory commissions appointed by Pope John XXIII in June 1960 to prepare draft documents for discussion. These commissions met between November 1960 and June 1962 and produced over seventy documents, or schemata. These documents, in turn, were reduced to twenty separate texts, each of which was reviewed and revised by the Central Preparatory Commission before being submitted to the pope for approval. In July 1962 seven of these documents were circulated among the bishops of the world in preparation for the opening of the council in October. The documents were concerned with the sources of revelation, the moral order, the deposit of faith, the family and chastity, liturgy, media, and unity. By contrast with the final documents approved by the council itself, these schemata were very conservative in orientation. Fearful of the impact of the council on its traditional ways of conducting the business of the Church, the Curia had seen to it that only the safest, mostly Rome-based theologians were appointed to serve on the preparatory commissions.

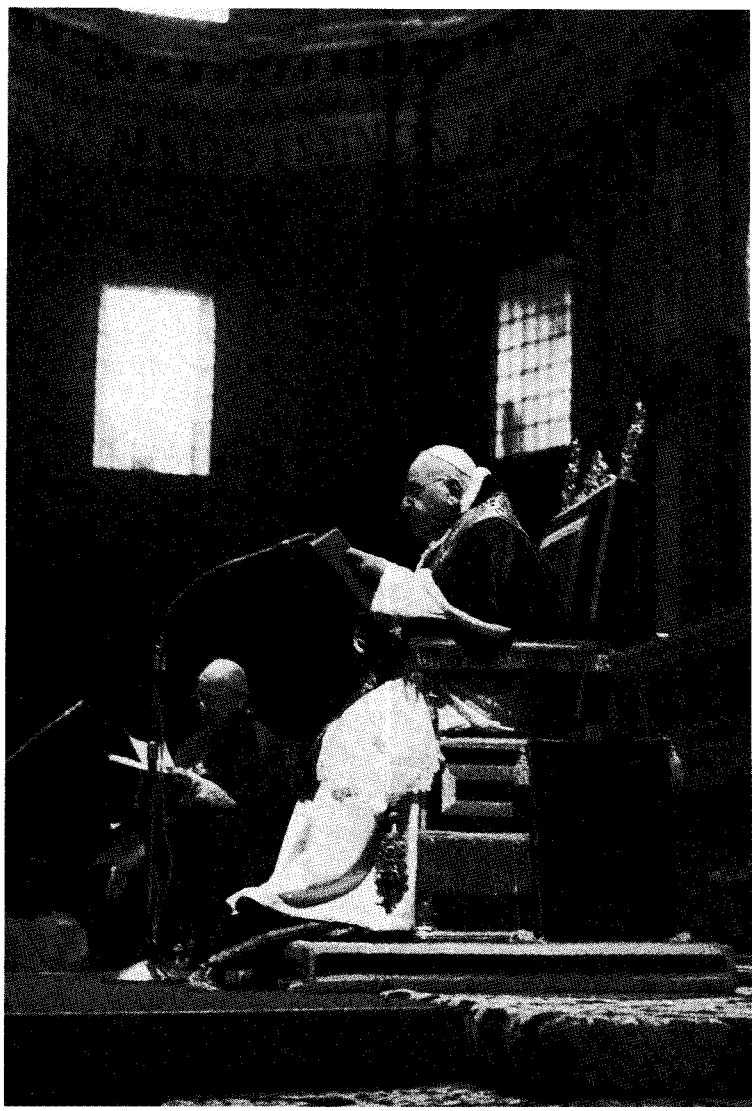
THE FIRST SESSION (1962)

The most dramatic and most important of the four sessions was the first. There were at least five significant moments in this session: Pope John XXIII's opening address, the refusal of the bishops to accept the Curia's organization of the conciliar commissions, the initial debate over the document on the liturgy, the debate over the document on revelation, and the rejection of the Curia's draft document on the Church. Together these developments signaled a new mood and direction for the Catholic Church.

In his opening speech on October 11, 1962, Pope John XXIII underscored the positive purposes and opportunities of the council; namely, to work toward the unity of humankind so that "the earthly city may be brought to the resemblance of that heavenly city where truth reigns [and] charity is the law." Indeed, he explicitly rejected the advice of those close to him who "can see nothing but prevarication and ruin," who regard the modern era as worse than others and getting worse all the time, and who are "always forecasting disaster." He called them "prophets of gloom." He also rejected their view that the council should simply reaffirm traditional doctrines of the Church, while condemning errors that undermine those teachings. "For this a council was not necessary," he said. Instead these doctrinal formulations should be presented in new forms that reflect modern thought. And the most effective way to combat error is through "the medicine of mercy rather than that of severity." The Church must show herself always as "the loving mother of all, benign, patient, full of mercy and goodness toward the brethren who are separated from her."

The second key moment in this first session came two days later, on October 13, when Cardinals Liénart of Lille and Frings of Cologne successfully urged the council to reject the Roman Curia's plan for election of members to the ten conciliar commissions. Instead of voting immediately, they suggested that regional groups of bishops should meet to choose the best qualified candidates. The loud applause indicated that the council would not be under the Curia's control.

The third key moment occurred on October 22 when the document on the liturgy was brought up for discussion. There was an obvious and immediate division of the council between traditionalists and progressives, the former rejecting any change, especially in the language of the liturgy, and the latter upset by the obvious tampering with the document between the time it was approved by the Central Preparatory Committee and the time it reached the council itself. A few days later Cardinal Ottaviani, prefect of the Holy Office, complained about revolutionary tendencies in the council and charged that these would cause scandal among the faithful. When he went over his time, he refused to stop. When his microphone was turned off, the assembly applauded, another indication of a major change in the balance of power.



Pope John XXIII, who called the council, addresses the opening session of the Second Vatican Council on October 11, 1962, in a speech in which he criticized conservative "prophets of gloom" in the hierarchy and the Roman Curia; Cardinal Francis Spellman of New York is at the pope's right.

A fourth development concerned the document on revelation. At the opening of debate on November 14, Cardinal Liénart attacked the schema on the grounds that there is only one source of revelation (the word of God), not two (Scripture and tradition). The following day Cardinal Döpfner of Munich complained that the schema was too one-sided and should be rejected. On November 20 a vote to reject the schema had the support of 60 percent of the Fathers, but not enough under the rules of the council to scuttle the document. The following day the pope ordered its withdrawal and directed that it be considered by a new commission jointly chaired by Cardinals Ottaviani and Bea, the latter of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity.

Finally, on December 4, three days after Cardinal Ottaviani presented the schema on the Church, Cardinal Suenens of Belgium called for a complete redrafting of the document. His speech was greeted by prolonged applause. The council was on a different course from the one marked out by the Curia.

THE SECOND, THIRD, AND FOURTH SESSIONS (1963–65)

Pope John XXIII died the following June and was succeeded by Cardinal Montini of Milan, one of the council's leading progressives, who took the name Paul VI. One of his first acts was to determine September 29, 1963, as the opening day of the council's second session. In his opening address he listed four aims of the council: the development of a clearer idea of the Church, its renewal, the unity of all Christians, and dialogue between the Church and the world. The most contentious issue in this session had to do with the doctrine of collegiality, but the most dramatic moment came on November 8 when Cardinal Frings of Cologne openly criticized the Holy Office for its dealings with theologians and called for reform of the Curia. Cardinal Ottaviani took the floor to denounce Cardinal Frings's attack as an attack on the pope himself, but that afternoon Pope Paul VI telephoned Cardinal Frings to express his approval of what he had said. At the end of the session, on December 4, the first two council documents were formally approved: the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and the Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication.

The pace quickened in the third session, leaving many with the suspicion that the conservative minority was trying to rush matters in order to leave some business unfinished. There were discussions on a wide variety of complex topics: religious liberty, the Jews, the laity, the Church in the modern world, marriage, culture, the missions, and the formation of priests. After an "Explanatory Note" (Lat., Nota praevia) reaffirming the authority of the pope was added to the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, conservative opposition to the document disappeared and the constitution was approved on November 19 with only ten negative votes. Other late developments in the session added to the pessimism of the progressive majority: the sidetracking of the document on religious liberty, last-minute changes ordered by the pope in the Decree on Ecumenism to satisfy the conservative minority, and the postponing of a vote on the document on non-Christian religions. The mood was somber at the closing of the third session on November 21. When a grim-faced Pope Paul VI was carried into St. Peter's, there was no applause.

The fourth and final session began on September 14, 1965, with an announcement by Pope Paul VI that he would establish the long-awaited Synod of Bishops. He did so the next day, which also marked the beginning of debate on religious liberty—a document drafted in large part by the American Jesuit John Courtney Murray and rescued from curial burial through the efforts of Cardinal Spellman of New York and others. Discussion resumed also of documents on the missions, religious life, priestly formation, priestly life and ministry, and non-Christian religions. The bulk of this session was devoted, however, to a section-by-section discussion of the document on the Church in the modern world. On December 6 the document was approved by an overwhelming vote, and a major reform of the Roman Curia was announced. The final public session was held on December 7, at which the pope removed the excommunication of 1054 against the patriarch of Constantinople. The next day there was a closing ceremony in St. Peter's Square.

DOCUMENTS OF VATICAN II

There are sixteen documents in all: the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium), the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum), the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium), the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes), the Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication (Inter Mirifica), the Decree on Ecumenism (Unitatis Redintegratio), the Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches (Orientalium Ecclesiarum), the Decree on the Bishops' Pastoral Office in the Church (Christus Dominus), the Decree on Priestly Formation (Optatam Totius), the Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life (Perfectae Caritatis), the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (Apostolicam Actuositatem), the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests (Presbyterorum Ordinis), the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Ad Gentes Divinitus), the Declaration on Christian Education (Gravissimum

Another view of the Second Vatican Council meeting in St. Peter's Basilica in the presence of Pope Paul VI; the non-Catholic observers are seated on the right, in the Tribune of Longinus, diagonally opposite the altar.

Educationis), the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate), and the Declaration on Religious Freedom (Dignitatis Humanae).

Constitutions touch substantively upon doctrinal and universal pastoral matters that pertain to the very essence, or "constitution," of the Church. Decrees and declarations are directed at practical questions or specific pastoral concerns. As such, these latter presuppose the doctrine, theology, and pastoral directives of the constitutions.

Among the distinctive teachings of Vatican II, by contrast with some common beliefs of the pre–Vatican II era, are the following:

1. The Church is, first and foremost, a mystery, or sacrament, and not primarily an organization or institution.
2. The Church is the whole People of God, not just the hierarchy, clergy, and religious.
3. The Church's mission includes action on behalf of justice and peace and is not limited to the preaching of the word and the celebration of the sacraments.
4. The Church includes all Christians and is not limited exclusively to the Catholic Church.
5. The Church is a communion, or college, of local churches, which are not simply administrative subdivisions of the Church universal.
6. The Church is an eschatological community; it is not yet the kingdom of God.
7. The lay apostolate is a direct participation in the mission of the Church and not simply a sharing in the mission of the hierarchy.
8. There is a hierarchy of truths; not all official teachings of the Church are equally binding or essential to the integrity of Catholic faith.
9. God uses other Christian churches and non-Christian religions in offering salvation to all humankind; the Catholic Church is not the only means of salvation.
10. The dignity of the human person and the freedom of the act of faith are the foundation of religious liberty for all, over against the view that "error has no rights."

See also separate entries on each of the council documents and Bea, Augustine; constitution, conciliar; declaration, conciliar; decree, conciliar; ecumenical council; John XXIII [Angelo Roncalli]; Murray, John Courtney; Ottaviani, Alfredo; Paul VI; Spellman, Francis Joseph; Suenens, Leo Josef.

Bibliography

Hastings, Adrian, ed. Modern Catholicism: Vatican II and After. New York: Oxford University Press; London: SPCK, 1991.

Miller, John H., ed. Vatican II: An Interfaith Appraisal. Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1966.

Vorgrimler, Herbert, ed. Commentary on the Documents of Vatican II. 5 vols. New York: Herder and Herder, 1967–69.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

Vázquez, Gabriel, 1549–1604, Spanish Jesuit moral theologian. He was critical of fellow Jesuit Francisco de Suarez's congruism, which held that God gives grace in accordance with circumstances that God foresees as most favorable, or congruent, to its use. Vázquez instead defended a strict Molinism, holding that the efficacy of grace is rooted not in the divine gift itself, but in human free will which God foresees will be present when the grace is given. See also Molinism; Suarez, Francisco de.

veil, a head-covering worn by some religious congregations of women to symbolize their separation from the world. Traditionally, novices wear white veils and professed sisters, black.

Venantius Fortunatus, St., ca. 530–609, bishop of Poitiers and poet. Fortunatus composed Vexilla Regis Prodeunt ("The Royal Banners Forward Go") and Pange Lingua Gloriosi ("Sing, My Tongue, the Glorious Battle") to mark receipt, by a convent in Poitiers, of a fragment of the True Cross. He was elected bishop ca. 599. Feast day: December 14 (local observance). See also Pange Lingua.

Venerable, a traditional title given to a deceased person whose holiness is under investigation with a view toward beatification and eventual canonization. The title is conferred on those who have been judged to have lived a virtuous life to a heroic degree. The most famous historical figure bearing that title was the Venerable Bede (ca. 673–735), biblical scholar and "Father of English History." See also beatification; canonization.

veneration of the cross, devotional practice. Known principally as part of the Good Friday service, the veneration of the cross entails the unveiling of the cross to the congregation with the invitation to come forward to show some sign of respect for it. Participants often bow and/or kiss the cross at this time. See also cross; Good Friday.

venial sin, a moral transgression not considered serious enough to rupture a person's relationship with God; thus, one where pardon (Lat., venia) is relatively easy. The distinction between mortal and venial sin, while not formally present in the biblical sources, is foreshadowed there in the gnat and the camel (Matt 23:24), a speck and a log (Matt 7:3), sins of daily occurrence (Matt 12:36), and those that exclude from the kingdom (1 Cor 6:9–10). The magisterium asserted against the fifth-century Pelagians and later against the sixteenth-century Reformers that not all sins strip one of the spiritual effects of justification, i.e., of being made righteous in the sight of God. Catholic tradition has struggled to explain the possibility of venial sin in an analytically satisfactory way. Some (e.g., Baius and the Nominalists) appealed to a decree of God. Others traced the mortal-venial distinction to the matter of the action. But neither of these analyses explains why any sin, as a negative response to God, is not a total perversion of the relation of Creator and creature. Many contemporary theologians find the difference in the type of freedom (basic, peripheral) present in the act. See also imperfections; mortal sin; sin.

Veni Creator (veh'nee cray-ah'tohr; Lat., "Come, Creator"), Pentecost hymn. The text is attributed to Rabanus Maurus (d. 856). Its seven verses are sung for Evening Prayer on Pentecost Sunday, at the dedication of a church, for Confirmation, and at ordination. English translations may be found in most Catholic and many Protestant hymnals.

Veni Sancte Spiritus (veh'nee sahnk'tay spee' ree-toos; Lat., "Come, Holy Spirit"), Pentecost sequence hymn. Informally called "The Golden Sequence," the hymn was written by the archbishop of Canterbury, Stephen Langton (d. 1228). It is sung at Mass on Pentecost Sunday between the second reading and the Gospel acclamation. See also Pentecost.

vernacular (Lat., "native"), the native language of a particular country, region, or culture. The term refers particularly to the use of a community's native language in the liturgy. This is by way of contrast with the use of a so-called dead language (such as Latin) in worship.

Veronica, St., legendary figure. Preserved in Catholic imagination and memory by the sixth Station of the Cross, Veronica is the woman who is thought to have wiped Jesus' face with her veil as he carried his cross through the streets. She subsequently discovered on her veil an impression of the face of Jesus. Feast day: July 9. See also Stations of the Cross.

Verot, Jean-Pierre Augustin Marcellin (vair-oh'), 1805–76, bishop of Savannah, Georgia, and first bishop of St. Augustine, Florida. Born in France, he entered the Sulpician community and was ordained in 1828. Two years later he came to the United States and taught at St. Mary's College and the Sulpician Seminary in Baltimore. In 1858 he was consecrated a bishop and appointed vicar apostolic of Florida. In 1861, he was given the additional post of bishop of Savannah while retaining the Florida jurisdiction. He was caught up in the politics leading to the Civil War and was an unabashed Southern nationalist, winning the sobriquet "the Rebel Bishop." He also endorsed the property rights of slaveowners in an 1861 sermon entitled: "A Tract for the Times: Slavery and Abolitionism." In the Reconstruction era, he undertook an ambitious missionary program among the freedmen and at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore in 1866 called for a major Catholic effort among the newly freed slaves. At Vatican I (1870) he opposed the definition of papal infallibility and absented himself from the final vote. See also Baltimore, councils of; infallibility; Sulpicians.

Veronica, a woman of Jerusalem who, legend tells us, wiped the face of Jesus on his way to Calvary on Good Friday; fourteenth- or fifteenth-century painting, National Gallery, London.

versicle, in the Mass, a sentence from Scripture that is divided into two phrases. The first phrase is sung by the presider or cantor, the second, in the manner of a response, by the choir or assembly. One of the most common versicles is used in the funeral liturgy and other rites for the dead: "Eternal rest grant unto him/her, O Lord"; the response to which is "And let perpetual light shine upon him/her."

versions of Scripture. See Scripture, versions of.

Vespers (Lat., "evening star"), or Evening Prayer, the liturgy of the Church celebrated in the early evening as daylight ends. One of the two principal Hours of prayer, Vespers includes a hymn, two psalms and an NT canticle, a reading from Scripture (usually the Pauline Letters), a proper responsory, the Magnificat with its antiphon, a litany of intercessory prayer, the Lord's Prayer, a concluding blessing, and dismissal. See also Liturgy of the Hours.

vestibule (Lat., vestibulum, "entrance-court" or "courtyard"), the entrance hall between the front doors of a church and its main interior.

vestments, the special garments worn by liturgical ministers indicating the proper function of the wearer. In the first centuries of the Church, there was no special clothing for liturgical ministers. Gradually a fairly complex set of vestments became mandated, especially for bishop, priest, and deacon. The alb, a white tunic reaching to the ankle, is common to all liturgical ministers. The stole, a long scarf placed over the alb, is worn over the left shoulder by the deacon and over both shoulders by a priest or bishop. The chasuble, a long, sleeveless outer garment, is worn over the alb by a priest or bishop. See also alb; chasuble; stole.

Vetus Latina (Lat., "Old Latin"), the Latin translation of the Bible prior to Jerome's Vulgate. It was probably made in the Roman province of Africa. The earliest evidence of the Vetus Latina is from such North African Christian writers as Tertullian (d. 225) and especially Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258), who quotes it more than fifteen hundred times. No codex of the entire Bible exists, but there is a large number of manuscripts of the Gospels and Acts. See also Scripture, versions of.

Veuillot, Louis François (loo'ee frahn-swah' vuh-yoh'), 1813–83, journalist and editor of L'Univers from 1843 to 1883, a strongly Ultramontane French newspaper that gradually became a semiofficial Vatican medium. He enjoyed the confidence of Pope Pius IX, passionately argued for defining papal infallibility, and strongly defended papal temporal authority even when it conflicted with French foreign policy. For the latter he was arrested in 1844 and had to suspend publication of his paper from 1860 to 1867. See also infallibility; Ultramontanism.

Via Antiqua, Via Moderna, rival late medieval realist and nominalist schools. The Via Antiqua (Lat., "Old Way") can be identified with the moderate realist tradition, whether Thomist, Scotist, or Augustinian, which views linguistic structures as mirroring reality and argues that universal terms represent real things. The Via Moderna ("New Way") followed the nominalism of Ockham, holding that only individuals exist in reality, universals being merely names (nomina). In theology, the Old Way continued the tradition of natural arguments for God's existence and attributes. The New Way stressed God's absolute freedom to the point where nature, which could be utterly different, provided no base for reasoning to God. In the fifteenth century, the New Way came to dominate in the schools. It has been suggested that by its separation of physics from metaphysics and by its belief that reality encompasses only individual things, the Via Moderna fostered the rise of empirical science.

Via Dolorosa (vee'ah doh-loh-roh'sah; Lat., "sorrowful way"), the original stations of the cross in Jerusalem, which trace the path of Jesus on the way to Calvary. Metaphorically, the term refers to the way Christians must walk to follow Christ. See also Stations of the Cross.

Via Media, theory developed by John Henry Newman (d. 1890) during the Oxford movement concerning a distinctive Anglican identity. It proposed that the Church of England was a middle way (Lat., via media) between the accretions and centralized authority of Catholicism and the subtractions and privatized pluralism of Protestantism. Later rejected by Newman as "paper religion," the theory was based on the principles of dogma, sacrament, and anti-Romanism. See also Newman, John Henry; Oxford movement.

Via Moderna. See Via Antiqua, Via Moderna.

Vianney, St. Jean-Baptiste. See Curé d'Ars.

Viaticum (vi̲-a'ti-kum; Lat, "food for the journey"), the reception of Communion by a dying person, specifically as provision for the passage through death to eternal life. This is properly the last sacrament of Christian life. It may be celebrated within or outside Mass. In the latter case the minister may be a deacon or an unordained minister entrusted with the care of the sick. In addition to the reception of Communion by the dying, the rite includes a Liturgy of the Word, renewal of the baptismal profession of faith, and the exchange of the sign of peace by the dying person with the minister and others who are present. See also Anointing of the Sick; Communion, Holy.

Viator, St., fourth-century deacon, patron saint of catechists. Little is known about him except that he went to Alexandria in 381 in the company of Justus of Lyons (d. ca. 390) and joined a monastery in Egypt.

Viatorian Fathers, Clerics of St. Viator (C.S.V.), an order founded in 1835 by Louis Joseph Querbes of Lyons to enhance the religious literacy of post-Revolutionary France. After the suppression of religious schools in France (1903), most Viatorians emigrated to Belgium or Canada, where they continue to administer and teach in several schools for the hearing impaired. After a short-lived first mission in the United States, at Carondelet, Missouri (1842–57), they opened schools for boys in Illinois and established in 1868 St. Viator College at Bourbonnais. Though the college closed in 1938, Viatorians continue to administer and teach throughout Illinois and have also been assigned by U.S. bishops to missions in Japan, Taiwan, and several South American countries. See also Viator, St.

vicar, one who has, by office, the authority to act in place of another. The authority to act comes from the nature of the office that a person holds and thus is not given by way of delegation to the vicar. A vicar may have the authority to act in all matters pertaining to an office or may have authority limited to a certain class of persons or to given subject matter. Vicars are found in dioceses and in religious institutes. A vicar must not act contrary to the will of the one for whom she or he is a vicar. The pope and bishops have been called vicars of Christ, although the more traditional title for the pope is Vicar of Peter.

vicar, episcopal. See episcopal vicar.

vicar, judicial. See judicial vicar.

vicar, parochial. See parochial vicar.

vicar apostolic, prelate who governs, in the name of the pope, a territory equivalent to a diocese. The territory has not yet become a diocese because of particular circumstances, e.g., insufficient ministerial and material resources.

vicar capitular, under the 1917 code of canon law, the priest who was elected to govern a diocese when a see became vacant. He was called "capitular" because he was elected by the cathedral chapter in those countries that had chapters. Currently the interim administrator is elected by the college of consultors and is called diocesan administrator. See also cathedral chapter; consultors, college of.

vicar forane, the priest who functions as the head of a deanery. Appointed by the bishop, this priest has very limited responsibility for a vicariate forane or deanery, i.e., a particular geographical territory of the diocese. The more common term for this person is dean. See also deanery.

vicar general, the priest who functions as the bishop's deputy. He has wide-ranging responsibility for the executive functioning of the diocese. In some circumstances there can be more than one vicar general in a diocese, but usually there is only one.

vicar of Christ, a traditional title for a bishop, although recently applied only to the Bishop of Rome (the pope). The title has a very long and complicated history. This history shows that it is a mistake to understand it only as a specific or characteristic title of the Bishop of Rome in his capacity of Universal Primate of the Church. When Vatican II declares that "bishops govern the particular churches entrusted to them as the vicars of Christ and his ambassadors" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, n. 27), it is not innovating; this has been part of the Western tradition since Cyprian (d. 258). During the Middle Ages the title was usually employed to characterize the specific mission of all the bishops. Only during the pontificate of Eugenius III (1145–53) did the title begin to be officially seen as a specific designation for the function of the Bishop of Rome. In the past, the use of this title as a papal title was connected with the strong conviction that the most characteristic title of the Bishop of Rome was "Vicar of Peter." Innocent III (d. 1216) found in the title "Vicar of Christ" the root of his universal power, even over temporal authorities. "Although successor to the Prince of the Apostles, we are not his vicar nor that of any man or apostle but we are the vicar of Jesus Christ himself." Great defenders of the authority of the pope like Robert Bellarmine (d. 1621) propagated the theory that Vicar of Peter is an incorrect title and, therefore, that the Bishop of Rome has to be called Vicar of Christ. This title implies that the pope is acting in the place of Christ (Lat., Christi vices), with the power corresponding to this function. In light of recent historical studies, however, Vicar of Christ must be understood as an implication of the traditional title Vicar of Peter. It expresses the episcopal relation to Christ of the one who, as bishop of the local church of Rome, is charged by the Lord to watch over, in faith and love, the communion of all the local churches of the world. It is a consequence of the episcopal grace of one among all other vicars of Christ. But this bishop is the head of the local church of Rome, which enjoys an unparalleled claim to apostolicity because of the martyrdom of Peter and Paul there. The pope is Vicar of Christ, however, insofar as he is a bishop, not insofar as he is a pope. See also papacy, the; Vicar of Peter.

JEAN-M. R. TILLARD

Vicar of Peter, the most traditional title designating the function of the Bishop of Rome (the pope) and theologically the most adequate. The title was commonly accepted by popes themselves from the end of the fourth century. The title is important for two reasons. First, it shows that in the apostolic witness there was an untransmittable element that is precisely the most important component of the rock on which the Church is built, namely, the eyewitness experience of the Risen Christ (Acts 1:21–22). Through the oversight of the Bishop of Rome and the other bishops in communion with him, it is this faith in the Risen Christ that is kept alive in the proclamation and pastoral ministry of the Church. The Bishop of Rome and his brother bishops do not take the place of Peter and the other apostles. The Bishop of Rome and the other bishops are not apostles. They are not eyewitnesses of the Resurrection. They can only be the vicars of Peter and the other apostles by keeping alive what they have transmitted. But, second, even concerning what was transmittable in the apostolic mandate, i.e., the proclamation of faith in the Risen Christ, the pastoral care of the community, and especially maintaining it in authentic communion, the mandate and power of the Bishop of Rome and his fellow bishops are the same as those given to Peter and his fellow apostles, always judged and measured by reference to them. The Bishop of Rome perpetuates within the communion of bishops and for the whole Church the "once for all" of Peter's apostolate. See also papacy, the; Peter, St.; Petrine ministry; Petrine succession; vicar of Christ. JEAN-M. R. TILLARD vice, a habitual disposition to act evilly; the opposite of virtue. Vice results from repeated actions at either extreme from the moderate course represented by the virtues. The traditional list of capital sins represents instances of character-shaping patterns of sinful behavior, or vice. Vice is thus typified in patterns of pride, sloth, lust, envy, anger, gluttony, and covetousness. The number of vices is greater than that of virtues because in each case both extremes of disordered behavior constitute vice. One lacking in prudence and temperance may demonstrate a lack of courage, e.g., by a disposition either to rash action or to cowardice. See also capital sins; virtue.

vice-chancellor, the assistant to the diocesan chancellor. In the United States, the office of chancellor, which is primarily responsible for record keeping in a diocese, has traditionally been more significant than in other countries. See also chancellor, diocesan.

Victor I, St., d. 198, pope from ca. 189 to 198. Victor's attempt to regularize the date of Easter throughout the universal Church was a milestone in the development of papal prerogative. His efforts met with general agreement except among the Quartodecimans (those who celebrated Easter on the day of Passover) of Asia Minor, whom he threatened to excommunicate. He also excommunicated the Adoptionist Monarchian Theodotus. Feast day: July 28. See also Quartodecimans.

Victor III, Bl. [Desiderius of Monte Cassino], ca. 1027–87, pope from May 24, 1086, to September 16, 1087. He was the most powerful abbot of his day and was elected pope against his wishes several months before his death. As abbot of Monte Cassino, Desiderius served as the chief negotiator between the Holy See and the Norman forces in Italy. Feast day: September 16. See also Monte Cassino.

Victorines, canons regular (semi-monastic clergy) of the abbey of St. Victor in Paris. A group of clergy originally following the leadership of the Parisian scholar William of Champeux organized the Augustinian abbey of St. Victor in 1113. Although the abbey remained active until 1790, it is best known for the brilliant school of theology centered there in the twelfth century. The most outstanding and influential of the Victorine scholars was Hugh of St. Victor (d. 1142), whose students included the biblical scholar Andrew of St. Victor (d. 1175), the mystical theologian Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173), and the liturgical poet Adam of St. Victor (d. ca. 1180). See also Adam of St. Victor; Andrew of St. Victor; Hugh of St. Victor; Richard of St. Victor.

Victorinus Afer. See Marius Victorinus.

Vienne, Council of (1311–12), ecumenical council. Convened by Clement V in the French city of Vienne, the council refused to condemn the Order of the Knights Templar despite the French king Philip IV's insistence; Clement unilaterally disbanded the order by a special decree. Both the council and the pope, however, rejected the king's demand that they condemn Pope Boniface VIII (d. 1303). The council did condemn the radical Spiritual Franciscans, as well as the Beguines and the Beghards. It limited the pastoral activities of the mendicant orders, placed restrictions on the Inquisition, and legislated against usury and attacks on the clergy. See also Beghards/Beguines; Boniface VIII; Inquisition; Knights Templar; mendicant orders; Spiritual Franciscans.

vigil (Lat., vigilia, "watch"), a prayerful watch on the eve of a solemnity. The term has many and varied meanings. Its most important usage refers to the Easter Vigil, the mother of all vigils, which begins after nightfall on Easter Saturday and ends before the dawn of Easter Sunday. Each Sunday of the year is reminiscent of Easter Sunday. In several dioceses, a vigil Mass is held on Saturday at 4:00 P.M. or later, using the same liturgical proper as the Sunday Mass. Other solemnities that do not fall on Sunday may also have a vigil Mass with liturgical propers differing from those of the solemnity itself. The Order of Christian Funerals (1989) prefers a Vigil for the Deceased to a wake service because the vigil anticipates the approaching funeral Mass. The term

"vigil" is also used in monastic communities to refer to the night office, Matins or the Office of Readings, which is prayed communally in the first hours of the day. See also Easter Vigil.

Vigil for the Deceased. See wake service.

Vigilius, d. 555, pope from 537 to 555. He is remembered principally for his role in the Three Chapters controversy. See also Three Chapters.

Vigilius of Thapsus, late-fifth-century bishop of Thapsus, anti-Arian polemicist, and defender of the Council of Chalcedon (451). His surviving works include the Against Eutyches and the Dialogue Against Arians, Sabellians, and Photinians. See also Chalcedon, Council of.

vigil light, a burning wax candle, usually contained in glass, or an oil lamp kept near a tabernacle in which the Eucharist (Blessed Sacrament) is reserved. The light indicates the eucharistic presence of Christ, reserved for Communion of the sick, and reminds Christians of the reverence due the Sacrament. See also candle; votive candle.

Villanova, St. Thomas of, 1486–1555, archbishop of Valencia and outstanding figure of Catholic reform in Spain. Thomas became an Augustinian in 1516 and was ordained the following year. As provincial, he sent Augustinian missionaries to the New World. He was known as a powerful preacher and devoted himself to the care of the poor and sick. He founded colleges for young students in need and was canonized in 1658. Feast day: September 22. See also Augustinians.

vimpa, a veil worn over the shoulders and hands by an attendant who holds the crosier at episcopal functions. See also crosier.

Vincent de Paul, St., 1580–1660, French priest and founder of the Congregation of the Missions (Vincentians). After escaping enslavement by pirates in 1607, he began a life of charitable works that led to his founding of the Sisters of Charity. In 1625 he established the Congregation of the Mission, a religious order of men known as the Lazarists, now more commonly called Vincentians. The Lazarists worked as mission preachers and seminary educators. Before he died, Vincent distinguished himself as a preacher against Jansenism. Feast day: September 27. See also Jansenism; Sisters of Charity; Vincentians.

Vincent de Paul Society, St. See Society of St. Vincent de Paul.

Vincent Ferrer, St. (fair'uhr), ca. 1350–1419, a Spanish Dominican priest, he is best known for his preaching missions in Europe and for his labors in bringing unity to the Church during the Great Schism. Feast day: April 5.

Vincentians, the Congregation of the Mission (C.M.), founded in France by Vincent de Paul in 1625 to do missionary work among peasants. The aims of the congregation include preaching to the poor, administering parishes, training seminarians, and promoting Catholic education. The beginnings of the congregation lay in Vincent's awareness of the need for religious instruction among the peasants on the estates of the nobles in the area around Paris. Because its early headquarters was the former priory of St. Lazare in that city, the Vincentians are known in France as Lazarists. Vincentians are secular (diocesan) priests who take simple vows and live in community. After the Louisiana Purchase in 1803, the Vincentians came to America, eventually establishing parishes, schools, and seminaries across the country, including St. John's University on Long Island, Niagara University in upstate New York, and DePaul University in Chicago. In their parish work, Vincentians follow their founder, Vincent, who gave new meaning to the Catholic parish as a center of the spiritual life and also of the charitable and communal activities of its members. In this holistic approach to parish life, Vincent anticipated by three hundred years the parish revitalization envisioned by Vatican II (1962–65). From their earliest days, Vincentians have been deeply involved with the training of priests and have staffed various diocesan seminaries in addition to their own institutions.

Vincent of Beauvais, ca. 1190–1264, Dominican author of the encyclopedia Speculum Maius (Lat., "Greater Mirror") and of On the Education of the Sons of Nobles, a pedagogical treatise.

Vincent of Lérins, St., d. before 450, a monk and priest on the island of Lérins involved in the debate over semi-Pelagianism. His Objections against Augustinianism, now lost, were the subject of Prosper of Aquitaine's rebuttal, Responsiones. Vincent's Excerpts is one of the earliest florilegia of Augustine, a short collection of passages compiled against Nestorius. But Vincent's best-known work, the Commonitorium, is the most influential early statement of the character and authority of tradition and its relation to Scripture and of the possibility of the development of doctrine. Tradition is quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus (Lat., "what [has been believed] everywhere, always, and by all"), but Vincent carefully points out that this is subject to growth in understanding and explication. Feast day: May 24. See also doctrine, development of; Lérins.

Vincent of Saragossa, St., d. 304, deacon, martyr, and patron saint of Portugal. Spanish-born, he is known almost exclusively through his martyrdom by the Romans. His memory was revered by Christians throughout the Roman Empire, relics were venerated, and several churches were dedicated to him. In art he is depicted as a deacon holding a palm or suffering the torture of a gridiron. Feast day: January 22.

vincible ignorance, a type of ignorance that should be removed by the exercise of ordinary care. Ignorance of this kind implies some degree of subjective fault for performing a wrong act. The agent is morally responsible for not exercising diligence in discerning a moral obligation that applies in the situation or for not knowing the circumstances of the action. Because the agent is culpably negligent, the act is considered voluntary and imputable. The handbooks on moral theology generally divide vincible ignorance into simple, crass, and affected. If the agent makes some minimal but insufficient effort to overcome the ignorance, it is simple vincible ignorance. The ignorance is crass or supine when virtually no effort is made to dispel the ignorance. Affected or studied vincible ignorance is the most serious; it is directly voluntary, and there is the desire to remain in ignorance so that the person may remain free from any moral obligation. See also ignorance; invincible ignorance.

vipassana (vi-pahs'suh-nuh; Pali, "insight"), insight meditation, a practice of Theravadan (early) Buddhism. It involves sharp, clear awareness of the changing contents of one's mind and purification of the mind of negative contents. It has been adapted for Christian use as a method for pursuing the teachings of Carmelite mystic St. John of the Cross (d. 1591).

virginal conception of Jesus, the belief and teaching of the Church that Jesus Christ was conceived by the Blessed Virgin Mary through the power of the Holy Spirit without a human father. It is commonly equated with the virgin birth. See also infancy Gospels; Jesus Christ; virgin birth of Christ; virginity of Mary.

virgin birth of Christ, the belief that Jesus became a human being without the participation of a human father. Since its beginnings, the Church has attested in its Scripture and tradition to the virginal conception and birth of Jesus Christ.

The Biblical Witness: Biblical evidence for the virginal conception can be found in the infancy narratives in chapters 1 and 2 of both Matthew and Luke. It is widely believed that these narratives are the earliest part of the Gospel tradition, because interest in the human origin of Jesus arose later in the Church. Most scholars hold that the Gospel formation began with the death and Resurrection of Jesus and grew backward to include his public life and ministry. Mark's Gospel (ca. A.D. 70), which opens with Jesus' baptism by John the Baptist, is the example of this stage. Around A.D. 80, when the Gospels of Matthew and Luke were written, the belief that Jesus was Messiah and Son of God from his conception onward was firmly established. Few historical facts were available, as is evident in these two Gospels. The points of agreement between their infancy narratives are the names of Mary and Joseph, the fact that they were engaged (though not yet living together), the name of Jesus, his conception from the Holy Spirit, angels as messengers (in Luke to Mary, in Matthew to Joseph), the birth in Bethlehem, and the return to Nazareth. The differences are much more numerous, though noticed less because of the harmonization in the telling of the Christmas story. The agreement of Matthew and Luke on the matter of Jesus' conception from the Holy Spirit without the participation of a human father is, therefore, especially important.

Matthew opens his Gospel with "the genealogy of Jesus the Messiah, the son of David, the son of Abraham" (1:1), thereby rooting Jesus in the Davidic Messiah tradition. His ancestry is traced through the male line until the final verse where a significant change occurs: "Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom Jesus was born, who is called the Messiah" (1:16). Matthew then begins his narrative: "Now the birth of Jesus the Messiah took place in this way. When his mother Mary had been engaged to Joseph, but before they lived together, she was found to be with child from the Holy Spirit" (1:18), an expression that Matthew repeats in the message of the angel in Joseph's dream (1:20). Matthew summarizes the events in the fulfillment formula, "All this took place to fulfill what had been spoken by the Lord through the prophet [i.e., Isaiah]: 'Look, the virgin [Gk., parthenos, in the Septuagint] shall conceive and bear a son, and they shall name him Emmanuel,' which means, 'God is with us'" (1:23). Joseph then "took her as his wife, but had no marital relations with her until she had borne a son; and he named him Jesus" (1:24–25). The use of "until" neither disproves nor proves Mary's virginity post partum (Lat., "after giving birth").

In the Gospel of Luke the account of the conception and birth of Jesus parallels and surpasses that of John the Baptist in many details. John's miraculous birth from a barren mother and aging father is transcended by Jesus' conception from a virgin. Most significant in Luke is the conversation between Mary and the angel Gabriel (Luke 1:26–38). Mary is told not to be afraid, because she has found favor with God. The angel's announcement does not explicitly say that the child will not have a human father, but Mary's request for an explanation, "How will this be since I am a virgin?" receives this assurance from the angel: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you; therefore the child to be born will be holy; he will be called Son of God" (1:35). This statement reiterates what is explicitly said in Matthew: Jesus was conceived in the Virgin Mary by the Holy Spirit without the participation of a human father.

The names and titles given to the child (in Matthew: Jesus [God saves], Messiah, Savior, Emmanuel, God with us; and in Luke: Jesus, Son of the Most High, descendant of David, holy, Son of God) make clear that the Gospel accounts of the virginal conception have primarily a Christological significance. They have become, in the tradition of the Church, affirmations of the holiness, obedience, and commitment of the Virgin Mary as well.

The Teaching of Tradition: Church tradition has persistently recognized Mary's singular role within God's salvific activity and, specifically, the virgin birth as a particularly clear manifestation of the mystery of the Incarnation. During its first centuries the Church refined its reflections on the birth of Jesus Christ, especially through the writings of Ambrose (d. 397) and Augustine (d. 430). Since the end of the fifth century the virgin birth has usually been considered according to three aspects: (1) the virginal conception of Jesus Christ in the womb of the Blessed Virgin Mary through the power of the Holy Spirit without the participation of a human father (also referred to as ante partum, Lat., "before giving birth"); (2) the virginal parturition of Jesus Christ in which Mary gave birth to her son without the loss of her virginity (also referred to as in or durante partu, Lat., "during the giving of birth"); and (3) the perpetual virginity of Mary, that is, that she remained a virgin throughout her entire life, with the result that Jesus had no siblings (also referred to as post partum).

This threefold understanding is manifest in the Second Vatican Council's primary statement on the Blessed Virgin Mary. Placing its reflections on Mary within the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium, 1964), the council (1962–65) presented the Church's view (initially promoted by Ambrose) that Mary is the paradigm or model of the Church, for her purity of heart and faith exemplify the perfect human response to God's love. Within this perspective the council affirms, with differing degrees of emphasis, the three traditional aspects of the virgin birth. (1) It attests to the virginal conception of Jesus: "This union of the mother with the son in the work of salvation was manifested from the time of Christ's virginal conception up to his death" (n. 57). (2) The council witnesses to Jesus' virginal parturition: "This association [of the mother with her son] was shown also at the birth of our Lord, who did not diminish His mother's virginal integrity but sanctified it" (n. 57). (3) It refers to Mary's perpetual virginity when it appeals to the "Easterners, who with ardent emotion and devout mind concur in reverencing the Mother of God, ever Virgin" (n. 68).

Over the centuries, the Church's witness to the virgin birth has been prompted not by a curiosity about the biology of Jesus' conception and birth but by a concern to express key theological convictions: the gracious and free act of the Father in sending the Son into the world, the uniqueness of Jesus Christ, the inability of the human family to provide its own savior, and the Church's vocation to become like Mary, who "stands out in eminent and singular fashion as exemplar of both virginity and motherhood" (n. 63). In support of this theological focus, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (formerly the Holy Office) issued an instruction on July 27, 1960, in which it warns against inappropriate considerations of the biological dimensions of the virginity of Mary and urges that the Church's reflections on this mystery remain theological.

The early Church's first formal testimonies to the virgin birth are located within its Christological confessions. The Roman Symbol, for example, as found in the Interrogatory Creed of Hippolytus (215), asks, "Do you believe in Christ Jesus, the Son of God, Who was begotten by the Holy Spirit from the Virgin Mary, Who was crucified. . . ." While the phrase "begotten by the Holy Spirit" denies Adoptionism, the phrase "from the Virgin Mary" opposes Docetism. The same twofold Christological emphasis also occurs in the full Apostles' Creed (ca. 700): "And in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord, Who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born of the Virgin Mary, suffered under Pontius Pilate . . ." Mary is not included in the Nicene Creed (325), but she is mentioned in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381): the Son of God "was incarnate by the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary and became man." With the inclusion of this Christological tenet, the creed specifically refutes Apollinarianism, the belief that Christ had no rational soul. The Council of Chalcedon (451) also views Mary within a Christological perspective: "As to his deity, he was born from the Father before the ages, but as to his humanity, the very same one was born in the last days from the Virgin Mary, the Mother of God, for our sake and for our salvation . . ." By using the title "Mother of God," the doctrine specifically opposes Nestorianism, the belief that in Christ there were two persons, one human and one divine.

Although the Catholic Church has never offered a dogmatic formulation on the virgin birth, it does consider this belief among its dogmas. It does so because it recognizes that this belief has its origins in Scripture and the early Church and has persisted in Christian faith over the centuries. At the same time, the Church allows a limited spectrum of theological opinions concerning both the place of this belief within the Church's "hierarchy of truths" and also the exact content of this belief. In the twentieth century support for belief in the virgin birth and theological refinements of this belief have been offered by such highly respected theologians as the Protestant Karl Barth (d. 1968) and the Catholic Karl Rahner (d. 1984). See also Chalcedon, Council of; Docetism; Ephesus, Council of; infancy Gospels; Jesus Christ; Mary, Blessed Virgin; virginity of Mary.

Bibliography

Brown, Raymond E. The Birth of the Messiah. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977. Rev. ed., 1993.

Brown, Raymond E. The Virginal Conception and Bodily Resurrection of Jesus. New York: Paulist Press, 1973.

Fitzmyer, Joseph A. The Gospel According to Luke I–IX, The Anchor Bible. Vol. 28. New York: Doubleday, 1981.

Graef, Hilda. Mary: A History of Doctrine and Devotion. 2 vols. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1965.

Jelly, Frederick. Madonna: Mary in the Catholic Tradition. Huntington, IN: Our Sunday Visitor, 1986.

ROBERT A. KRIEG
JACINTA VAN WINKEL

virginity, the condition of never having had sexual relations. In the patriarchal society of early Israel, female virginity was prized, as legal traditions attest. It was expected that a bride would be a virgin. If her husband found her to be otherwise, she could be stoned to death; if he complained falsely, he would merely be whipped (Deut 22:13–21). Rape of a betrothed virgin was punishable by death; violation of one not betrothed simply required payment of a bride price and marriage (Deut 22:23–29; Exod 22:16–17). Priests could only marry virgins (Lev 21:13–15; Ezek 44:22).

Virginity, symbolizing the status of Yahweh's daughter or bride, was used metaphorically of Jerusalem or Israel (Amos 5:2; Isa 37:22; 62:5; Jer 14:17; 18:13; 31:4).

The NT values virginity as suitable for service of the kingdom of God. Paul praises, but does not require, maintenance of virginity in view of the "impending distress" (1 Cor 7:7, 25–38). He also portrays the Church, like Israel, as a pure, i.e., virginal, bride (2 Cor 11:2; Eph 5:27). The martyrs in Revelation are virgins (Rev 14:4). Some of these attitudes may reflect Jesus' own preference for celibacy. His comment that some make themselves eunuchs for the kingdom (Matt 19:12) may be ironic, given the low status of eunuchs. Yet the saying apparently supports sexual renunciation.

The traditions about Jesus' birth (Matt 1:23; Luke 1:34–35) affirm the virginity of Mary when she conceived her son. These passages form the basis for later beliefs in the perpetual virginity of Mary. Such doctrines in turn reinforced the preference for celibacy that has characterized Christian asceticism. See also brothers of Jesus; celibacy, clerical; chastity; virgin birth of Christ; virginity of Mary; widow.

HAROLD W. ATTRIDGE

virginity of Mary, the doctrine that Mary was bodily a virgin before, during, and forever after the birth of Jesus Christ.

Before (Lat., ante partum, the virginal conception): NT infancy narratives testify that Mary conceived Jesus by the power or overshadowing of the Holy Spirit without male intervention (Matt 1:18–25 and Luke 1:26–38). The focus of these narratives is Christological. They attest that Jesus' origin is in God, that what is special about him cannot be explained by human parentage alone but is due to God's creative initiative.

During (in partu, the virgin birth): post-biblical apocryphal literature such as the Protevangelium of James extends Mary's virginity to include her giving birth painlessly without biological rupture.

After (post partum, perpetual virginity): developed in tandem with the patristic Church's prizing of lifelong, consecrated celibacy, perpetual virginity refers to Mary's having no sexual relations after Jesus' birth. Jesus' brothers and sisters (Mark 6:3) are then interpreted as step-siblings or cousins.

The subject of some patristic argument, this belief in its tripartite form was officially taught by a Lateran council in 649. In devotion it interweaves with belief in Mary's sinlessness and Christ's divinity. Critical NT study today questions whether the infancy narratives reflect history or legend; available evidence makes a definitive answer unlikely. While presuming Mary's virginity to be historical, Vatican II also interprets it symbolically as wholehearted fidelity to Christ that the Church, by the power of the same Holy Spirit, is called upon to emulate: "the Church herself is a virgin" (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, 1964, n. 64). See also brothers of Jesus; Mary, Blessed Virgin; virgin birth of Christ; virginity. ELIZABETH JOHNSON virtue, an enduring quality of character or intellect, through which an individual is enabled to act in praiseworthy ways or to live a morally good life. This general definition is compatible with many different theories of virtue. Within the Catholic tradition, the most influential theory of virtue is that of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), which is in turn deeply indebted both to Augustine (d. 430) and to Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.).

Virgin Mary, Blessed. See Mary, Blessed Virgin.

For Aquinas, a virtue is a habitus (Lat., "habit"), a stable quality of the intellect, will, or passions through which an individual can do what morality demands in a particular instance, and do it in the right way, i.e., with the appropriate motivation. The usual translation of habitus as "habit" is misleading in this context, however, since it suggests that virtue could be acquired and maintained through unreflective good actions that become customary over time. While some theorists have indeed understood virtue in this way, Aquinas, following Aristotle, insists that the virtues must be grounded in a rational apprehension of what it means to live a morally good life. At the same time, a general knowledge of the good alone is not enough to produce fully virtuous behavior. The virtuous individual must also be able to apply one's knowledge of the good to concrete circumstances through the virtue of prudence. Since fully virtuous behavior involves responding in accordance with the true human good, as well as acting in accordance with it, the passions of the virtuous individual must be formed in such a way that one responds appropriately, that is, in a way that is congruent with one's overall understanding of the good; the relevant virtues here are temperance, which regulates sensual desires, and fortitude, which regulates fear, aversion, and aggressiveness. Finally, one must maintain appropriate relationships with those around oneself, with one's community as a whole, and with God, through the virtue of justice. Thus the four cardinal virtues, prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance, are jointly necessary if one is to lead a humanly good life.

While the cardinal virtues are sufficient to direct their subject to a humanly good way of life, they are not sufficient to bring one to union with God in the Beatific Vision. This requires the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity, which have direct union with God as their object. Through faith, the individual comes to believe in God, to accept God's revelation in Christ, and to begin to understand that one's ultimate good consists of union with this God. (Today, however, a majority of theologians argue that faith consists of an implicit belief in, or orientation toward, God that is not explicitly recognized as such.) Hope is the orientation of the will toward the attainment of this union with God, and finally, charity is the love of God for God's own sake, and of oneself and others for the sake of God.

Because of the growth of legalism in the fourteenth century, reaching its high point during the first half of the twentieth century, the virtues were reduced to tendencies to obey the laws of morality. The importance of the emotions to the moral life, and the significance of the quality of one's life, apart from one's particular actions, were obscured in moral theology. This trend was reversed by the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) and the biblically based moral theology it promoted. Consequently, a number of scholars have turned away from an exclusively rule-and-act-oriented account of moral life and are attempting to recover some sense of the importance of the virtues for Christian morality. See also cardinal virtues; moral theology; theological virtues. JEAN PORTER virtue, infused, a virtue given directly by God rather than acquired by natural means. While some moral virtues direct us toward a purely natural form of happiness, and may be acquired by natural means, others direct us toward personal union with God, and exceed the natural capacities of any creature, whether human being or angel. These latter virtues include both the theological virtues of faith, hope, and charity, and the cardinal virtues of prudence, fortitude, justice, and temperance as they exist and function in an individual who possesses the theological virtues. Both the theological and the cardinal virtues were traditionally said to be infused directly by God, and were therefore referred to as infused virtues. See also virtue.

Visigoths, Germanic people settled by the Romans in Gaul as a federated people in 418. Expanding into Spain after King Euric declared himself independent of Rome in 475, they were restricted to the Iberian peninsula when Clovis defeated them in 507. The Arian Visigoths ruled the Hispanic Roman population, who were Catholic, with tolerance, maintaining a degree of cultural continuity almost unparalleled at a time when learning was dying out in many other regions of the West. The conversion of King Reccared to Catholicism in 589 and the unique succession of councils of Toledo established the Visigothic kingdom of Hispania as one of the foremost centers of Catholic civilization until its fall to the Muslims in 711. See also Spain, Catholicism in.

vision of God, usually a clear, although not comprehensive, intuitive knowledge of the divine essence. In the OT, Jacob, Moses, and Isaiah "saw" God in theophanies that were understood as an experience of God present yet essentially hidden. In the NT, Jesus Christ is the full disclosure, the icon, of God. He revealed that God is in a loving relationship with this world. Therefore, God is truly known in Jesus Christ, in the brother and sister participating in God's life through the divinizing work of the Spirit, and in God's creation. We know God's essence, indirectly, in this mediated fashion. Because God's self-communication can never be received fully by us, God remains ineffable. Church teaching affirms that God is seen face to face in the Beatific Vision only after death and by the light of God's glory. See also Beatific Vision; contemplation; mysticism.

visions, extraordinary phenomena including images, ideas, and words, which may accompany and express the activity of God. God's self-communication at the core of a person's life may result in physical, psychological, or intellectual manifestations. Therefore, visions may be physical apparitions, or occurrences in the imagination, or deeply experienced intuitive understandings.

Visions seen with the eyes and heard with the ears occur rarely in the tradition. Events such as the Marian apparitions at Lourdes and Fàtima have been approved by the Church as credible but not as objects of Catholic doctrine. Catholic mystics generally mistrusted visions apprehended by bodily senses.

Visions that occur solely in the imagination are most probably conditioned by factors such as a person's religious education, age, and psychic structure. Intellectual visions represent an intuitive knowledge beyond form and image. These deeply interior expressions of God are less open to distortion and are therefore more trustworthy, according to the mystics.

Visions are not of the essence of the spiritual life, but they may be integral to a particular individual's journey. They are generally absent in the later stages of union with God. Visions that contain a message do not add to revealed doctrine but may specify God's will in particular situations. A healthy skepticism regarding the authenticity of visions may be more prudent than a naive credulity. However, an openness to the possibility of visions is in accord with the nature of Christianity, which is, after all, based on historical revelation. See also contemplation; mysticism. JOHN F. WELCH visitation, canonical, an official inquiry into a Church organization such as a diocese or religious institute. The inquiry could be one regularly established by law or one instigated because of special circumstances. Depending upon the law or the particular mandate, the visitor might have a wide range of powers touching upon investigation, recommendation, and decision making.

The Blessed Virgin Mary visits her cousin Elizabeth, who greets her with the words "Blessed are you among women, and blessed is the fruit of your womb." Mary replies, "My soul magnifies the Lord, and my spirit rejoices in God my Savior . . ." (Luke 1:42,46–47); fifteenth-century painting by Fra Angelico, Prado, Madrid.

Visitation, the encounter of Mary and Elizabeth in the Gospel of Luke. According to Luke 1:39–56, Mary, having learned that both she and her aged cousin had conceived, visited Elizabeth and remained with her for three months. Upon arrival Mary uttered the song of praise known as the Magnificat. The event is commemorated as one of the joyful mysteries of the Rosary. The feast of the Visitation is celebrated on May 31. See also Magnificat.

Visitation order (V.H.M.), congregation of contemplative women founded in France in 1610 by Francis de Sales and Jane Frances de Chantal. They were established at Georgetown, Washington, D.C., in 1799 by Father Leonard Neale, later bishop of Baltimore. In 1815 Pope Pius VII granted the Georgetown foundation the rights and privileges of the Visitation Nuns. Humility before God and meekness toward one's neighbor constitute their spirit. The strictest form of separation from the world, known as papal enclosure, is observed. Autonomous monasteries in the United States are grouped into two federations, loosely knit organizations of independent monasteries, based on nonteaching or teaching activities. See also Chantal, St. Jane Frances de; Francis de Sales, St.

vitandus (vi-tahn'doos; Lat., "one to be avoided"), according to the 1917 Code of Canon Law, an excommunicated person under the most severe censure. The punishment restricted the interaction that could be had with members of the Church. The punishment is no longer in force under the current law (1983). See also excommunication.

Vitoria, Francisco de, 1486–1546, Spanish Dominican theologian. He held the first chair of theology at the University of Salamanca from 1526, and was the forerunner of the Salmanticenses. Among his treatises was the famous De Indis (1532, "Concerning the Indians"), which defended human rights for all peoples and is considered the origin of international law. He criticized papal plans for distribution of the newly discovered lands in America and Spanish methods of colonization, holding that indigenous people were not necessarily damned by their social structures, religion, or lack of Christian faith. He laid down the conditions of a just war, basing his views on Augustine (d. 430) and Aquinas (d. 1274), but going beyond them. He held that no war would be just if it endangered the world or Christendom. See also just-war doctrine; Salmanticenses.

Vitus, St., d. ca. 303, martyr and patron saint against epilepsy and a nervous disorder known as St. Vitus's Dance. Also patron saint of dancers and patron saint against dog and snake bites. Feast day: June 15.

Vladimir, St., 956–1015, ruler and baptizer of Kievan Rus', the land and people from which present-day East Slavic peoples (e.g., Ukrainians, Russians, Belorussians) derive. After fratricidal fighting, Vladimir became ruler of Kiev in 980. At first a fervent pagan, in 987, with the opportunity of marrying the sister of the Byzantine emperor, he became a Christian, accepting baptism from Byzantium. For the rest of his reign he promoted the evangelization of Rus' and the organization of the Church in his realm. He was canonized in the thirteenth century. See also Russia, Catholicism in.

vocation (Lat., vocare, "to call"), the inclination toward a particular state of life that the Christian accepts as a call from God. Vocation has a general and a particular meaning in Catholic parlance. In general, the term refers to the call of Christ, offered to all the baptized, to follow him and to become signs and witnesses of the reign of God. In this sense, all Christians share a common vocation. The word, however, also has a particular meaning. It refers to a specific state of life to which believers understand that God is calling them. Some people are inclined, by God's grace, to follow Christ as husbands and wives. Others feel called to the single state without seeking Holy Orders or taking vows as religious women or men. Still others hear God inviting them to become sisters, brothers, priests, or deacons. No one vocation is superior to another. Each leads to a manner of life and specific tasks that are essential for building up the Body of Christ and the reign of God.

voluntary, term for that characteristic of an act whereby it proceeds from the will. Voluntarity demands two features: an act must proceed from the will as an act of the will or as an act of another faculty led by the will, and it must involve intellectual knowledge of the means as means or the end as end, the type of knowledge thought to be exclusive to creatures endowed with intellect. An act can be involuntary in two different ways: first, it can be nonvoluntary, e.g., one accidentally discovers a lost friend; second, it can be positively involuntary, e.g., when one accidentally kills a friend, an act to which one would be positively opposed.

Many other distinctions about voluntarity (necessary vs. free, perfect vs. imperfect, in itself vs. in its cause, etc.) are of concern mostly to specialists. See also free will.

von Balthasar, Hans Urs. See Balthasar, Hans Urs von.

von Hügel, Friedrich. See Hügel, Friedrich von.

voodoo (Fr., vaudoux; Dahomey, vodu, "sorcery"), a syncretic religion developed in Haiti, combining elements of African (primarily Dahomean) religion and Catholic popular religiosity. The popular association of malignant magic and witchcraft with voodoo has a certain amount of truth to it, but is often exaggerated and sensationalized; like any other religion, voodoo is primarily a vehicle for its adherents to access the transcendent.

votive candle, a burning candle, usually set in a glass container, which, by pious custom, is placed before some representation of Christ, Mary, or the saints as a way of prolonging a prayer.

votive Mass, a Mass in which the proper parts (readings and presidential prayers) are directed not to a particular solemnity, feast, or season but to a particular devotion (Lat., votum). The liturgical books of Vatican II (1962–65) offer sixteen votive Masses: Holy Trinity, Holy Cross, Holy Eucharist, Jesus Christ the High Priest, Holy Name of Jesus, Precious Blood, Sacred Heart of Jesus, Holy Spirit, Blessed Virgin Mary, Angels, Joseph, Apostles, Peter, Paul, One Apostle, All Saints. Other Masses for various needs and occasions and Masses for the dead are also included, which are often referred to as votive Masses. A votive Mass may be celebrated on weekdays in Ordinary Time when there is no particular memorial or in place of an optional memorial. Pastoral need may also displace obligatory memorials of saints, weekdays of Advent, Christmas season, and Easter season in favor of a votive Mass. Serious need or pastoral advantage may also suggest the use of a votive Mass on any day of the year with the permission of the local bishop, except on Sundays of Advent, Lent and the Easter season, on Ash Wednesday, and during Holy Week. See also Eucharist; Mass.

votum (voh'toom; Lat., "a wish, a vow"), an opinion, usually of the bishop or superior, sought before action is taken in a given case. The case might be, e.g., a request for a dispensation or the filling of an office. The term can also refer to a vow. See also vows.

vows, promises made to God. The term most often refers to the vows of religion, i.e., those made in religious institutes. These are vows recognized as public in Church law and are regulated not only by the law of a given religious order, but also by the general law of the Church. Certain requirements as to the age, condition, and preparation of the one making the vows, as to the content of the vows, and as to the authority of those who allow the vows to be taken and who receive them in the name of the religious community and of the Church are laid down in Church law.

The vows themselves most often include those of consecrated chastity, poverty, and obedience. Some religious orders also have particular vows, for example, to serve in mission lands, to be at the special disposal of the pope, to live out one's life in the same monastery. The meaning of any of these vows is spelled out not only in Church law, but also in the legislative documents of a given religious community. Under Church law vows are first taken for a temporary probative period before final or perpetual vows are pronounced.

The term can also refer to private vows and is used commonly, though inaccurately, to refer to the promises made by diocesan priests, specifically to the requirement of celibacy, which binds diocesan priests. See also counsels, evangelical; religious institute; religious life; vows, private; vows, public.

vows, private, vows that do not have the public juridical effects of public vows. The term includes both those promises made to God singly and privately by individuals and promises made within the context of a community. The latter are not considered public because they are not recognized as such in canon law. See also vows.

vows, public, promises made to God that are recognized as public by the Church and that fall under the supervision of the Church. The Church supervises these vows, first of all, by regulating the conditions under which they may be made and by determining who is competent to receive them and to make them. Second, the Church supervises the conditions under which the vows are lived and the ongoing observance of the vows. See also vows.

Vulgate, the Latin Bible containing the translation of Jerome (347–420). Jerome's earliest biblical work was a revision of the Old Latin Gospels (382–85, in Rome), which he corrected on the basis of the Greek manuscripts available to him. Moving to Bethlehem after 387, Jerome undertook a Latin translation of the Greek OT, using the Septuagint from Origen's Hexapla, available to him at the library established at Caesarea by Origen and Eusebius. Jerome began this undertaking with a translation of the Psalms; this translation, known as the Gallican Psalter (because of its liturgical use in Gaul), was to become the Psalter of the Vulgate. Job, 1–2 Chronicles, the Canticle of Canticles, and parts of Proverbs were the next fruits of this project.

Jerome abandoned his translation of the Septuagint ca. 390, in favor of a translation of the Hebrew OT. This decision was reached on the basis of his principle of Hebraica veritas (Lat., "Hebrew truth," i.e., the superiority of the Hebrew OT to its Greek translation, as containing the truth of the word of God). For Jerome, this principle determined not only his decision to translate the Hebrew text rather than the Greek; it also determined for him what was canonical and therefore authoritative. Excluded from canonical status were the books found only in the larger Greek OT (1–2 Maccabees, Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Baruch, Tobit, and Judith).

Jerome translated the following books from the Hebrew OT ca. 390–405: 1–2 Samuel; 1–2 Kings; the Psalms, the so-called juxta Hebraeos ("according to the Hebrews"), a version that never achieved the popularity and use of his earlier Gallican Psalter; the Prophets (including Daniel) and Job by 392–93; 1–2 Esdras (Ezra-Nehemiah) by 394; 1–2 Chronicles by 396; the "Books of Solomon" (Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Canticle of Canticles) by 398; and the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Esther (with its Greek additions) by 405. Tobit and Judith he translated from the Greek OT, with the help of the Old Latin.

Apart from his revision of the Old Latin Gospels, Jerome did not translate the rest of the NT (Pauline Letters, Catholic Letters, Acts, Revelation). The Latin version of these books in the Vulgate is probably the work of Jerome's disciple, Rufinus (400–405).

The authority of the Vulgate as authentic (i.e., canonical and authoritative) was affirmed by the Council of Trent in its fourth session (1546). The council also mandated a new edition of the Vulgate. This edition, published by Pope Sixtus V (1590) and improved by Pope Clement VIII (1592), came to be known as the Sixto-Clementine Vulgate. It was this version, and its translation into other languages, that remained authoritative for Roman Catholics until Pope Pius XII's encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), which allowed and encouraged modern translations of the Bible from the original languages. See also Scripture, versions of. JOHN S. KSELMAN wake service, the principal rite following death and preceding the funeral liturgy, or if there is no funeral liturgy, preceding the rite of committal. The preferred term is the Vigil for the Deceased. The vigil may take place in the home of the deceased, in the funeral home, in the chapel of rest, or in some other suitable place. It may also be celebrated in the church in due time before the funeral liturgy. The Order of Christian Funerals (1989) offers the vigil in the form of a Liturgy of the Word consisting of introductory rites (greeting, opening song, invitation to prayer, pause for silent prayer, opening prayer), the Liturgy of the Word (first reading, responsorial psalm, Gospel reading, homily), the prayer of intercession (litany, Lord's Prayer, concluding prayer, eulogy), and a concluding rite (blessing, hymn, silent prayer). The rite may be adapted to incorporate other devotions, depending on popular custom and pastoral need. See also prayers for the dead.

WX YZ

Walafrid Strabo, ca. 808–49, abbot of Reichenau and poet. Student and editor of Rabanus Maurus, Walafrid wrote Visio Wettini ("The Vision of Wettin"), on visions of heaven and hell. The Glossa Ordinaria was for a long time erroneously ascribed to him. See also Rabanus Maurus.

Waldensians, Christian sect that traces its origin to a lay preacher of the late twelfth century, Valdes of Lyons (Peter Waldo). After his conversion in 1173 to the apostolic life, Valdes gave away the wealth he had acquired as a merchant and took up the life of a beggar and preacher. When he and his followers sought recognition from Pope Alexander III in 1179, the pope urged these Poor Men of Lyons to be obedient to their local bishop and priests and would not grant them permission to preach in public. The Waldensians nevertheless continued to preach and gain followers. Persecuted as heretics from 1184, the Waldensians eventually became strident in their criticism of the Roman Catholic Church, accusing it of apostasy and refusing to swear oaths or bear arms. Waldensian communities still exist.

Wallburga, St., ca. 710–79, abbess and sister of St. Willibald and St. Winnebald. English-born, she was asked to help Boniface in his missionary work in Germany. She became abbess of the double monastery at Heidenheim upon the death of her brothers, who had founded it. Feast day: February 25. See also double monasteries.

Walpole, St. Henry, 1558–95, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. A native of Norfolk, ordained at Paris in 1588, he returned to England after working in Europe, but he was arrested the day after he arrived in England in 1593 and executed in 1595. Feast day: April 7. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Walsh, James Anthony, 1867–1936, cofounder of Maryknoll. Ordained a priest for the archdiocese of Boston in 1892, he served as archdiocesan director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith from 1907 until 1911, when he and Father Thomas Price organized the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America, also known as Maryknoll. He was its superior general from then until his death in 1936. He was named a titular bishop in 1933. See also Maryknoll.

Walter of St. Victor, d. after 1180, theologian. A member of the famous Parisian abbey of St. Victor, he wrote (after 1179) Contra Quattuor Labyrinthos Franciae (Against the Four Labyrinths of France) attacking Peter Abelard, Peter Lombard, Peter of Poitiers, and Gilbert de la Porrée for their use of dialectical method in theology. See also Victorines.

wanderer (Lat., vagus), a person without a fixed residence. Church law makes certain provisions for the pastoral care of wanderers (e.g., can. 383). See also domicile; quasi-domicile; traveler [canon law].

Wanderer, The, conservative U.S. Catholic lay-owned weekly newspaper, based in St. Paul, Minnesota. Originally printed in German, it was one of many German Catholic newspapers founded in the nineteenth century to preserve German Catholic allegiance to the faith. Its adversarial tone was sharpened when it took a firm stand against the Americanizers in the U.S. hierarchy, including the ordinary of its own city, Archbishop John Ireland (d. 1918). Despite its highly touted rejection of Hitler, the fortunes of the paper sank dismally in the 1930s and during World War II. By 1945 its total subscriptions sank to 1,800. The onset of the cold war revived its fortunes when its strong anticommunism seemed to harmonize with the new mood of the country. It was one of the few Catholic publications that did not support John F. Kennedy in 1960. The paper's national reputation and circulation soared when it served as one of the main organs of criticism of the reforms of Vatican II. In the 1990s it reaches about 40,000 subscribers.

war, holy, warfare as a ritual activity in which the gods of the respective combatants are involved. Campaigns of this kind are often rounded off with the ban, i.e., the dedication by destruction of the persons and property of the conquered to the deity (e.g., Num 21:1–3). The idea of holy warfare is not confined to Israel. In certain parts of the Muslim world today, it is referred to as jihad.

war, morality of. See just-war doctrine.

Ward, Barbara, also known as Lady Jackson, 1914–81, economist. Trained at Oxford, her international influence came from her many books and articles on the political and economic challenges facing poor and developing nations, and from her role as foreign editor of The Economist (from 1946). Her influence in the Church before and after the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) was rooted in her application of Christian values and teachings to modern economic and political problems. Her many writings include monographs on the social thought of Pope Pius XII and on the 1967 encyclical Populorum Progressio of Pope Paul VI, and such books as Faith and Freedom (1954), My Brother's Keeper (1959), and The Rich Nations and the Poor Nations (1962).

Ward, St. Margaret, d. 1588, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. She was executed for helping a priest escape from Bridewell Prison and for refusing to divulge his hiding place. Feast day: August 30. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Ward, Wilfrid, 1856–1916, writer and journalist. Son of William George Ward, he was editor of The Dublin Review from 1906 until his death. After the condemnation of Modernism, he tried to exercise a restraining influence on intemperate anti-Modernism and opposed its anti-intellectual excesses. He wrote biographies of his father and of Cardinals Wiseman and Newman.

Ward, William George, 1812–82, apologist and writer. Ordained an Anglican priest in 1840, he was a disciple of John Henry Newman (d. 1890) and a zealous member of the Oxford movement. He became a Roman Catholic in 1845. He edited The Dublin Review from 1863 to 1878 and made it the leading English-language Ultramontane journal. A supporter of an extreme interpretation of papal infallibility, he became alienated from Newman, whom he regarded as insufficiently loyal to Rome. See also infallibility; Newman, John Henry; Oxford movement; Ultramontanism.

Warde, Frances, 1810–84, American founder of the Sisters of Mercy. Born in Ireland, she worked in Dublin with Catherine McAuley at her Baggott Street center for needy children and women. When McAuley founded the Sisters of Mercy in 1831, Frances Warde was one of her first postulants; her chosen name in religious life was Mary Frances Xavier. She came to the United States in 1843 with six other Sisters of Mercy and in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, she established parish schools, academies, and a House of Mercy for young women, along with an orphanage and a hospital. She led the Sisters of Mercy in the United States through a period of rapid growth and was responsible for establishing thirty-nine convents in thirty-seven years throughout the United States. See also McAuley, Catherine; Sisters of Mercy.

washing of feet. See Mandatum.

water, an ancient symbol for life and sometimes for chaos. Jesus speaks of water he will give the believing person as "a spring of water gushing up to eternal life" (John 4:14). See also Baptism; holy water.

Waugh, Evelyn, 1903–66, English novelist and man of letters. Known for his well-crafted satirical novels, he was a convert, in 1930, to the Catholic faith. An inveterate traveler (and travel writer), he never lost his insular British sensibility. His Catholicism is most clearly reflected in his finest novel, Brideshead Revisited (1945). His biography of his friend Ronald Knox (1959) reflects his conservative and very English conception of Catholicism. He never reconciled himself to the changes of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65); indeed, his natural pessimism led him to lament loudly the changes both in the liturgy and the social program of the renewed Church. A prodigious letter writer, diarist, and writer of fiction, he is considered one of the finest British prose writers of the twentieth century.

ways of the spiritual life, the three stages of the spiritual journey as understood by many Christian writers from Origen in the third century onward.

The theoretical and practical interpretation of the threefold way was developed further by later mystical theologians such as John of the Cross (d. 1591). Traditionally, the three stages were described as purgative (for beginners), illuminative (for the experienced or proficient), and unitive (for the perfect). The initial purgative stage involved conversion from sin and detachment from the senses or material reality. The second, the illuminative stage, was one of deepening knowledge and love of God within a contemplative experience. According to some writers, movement to the third, unitive, stage was marked by a further experience of purgation ("dark night"). In the unitive way, desire is dominated by love of God and all things in God. The typical prayer is characterized as "loving attentiveness," in which an intense union with God is experienced without complete loss of personal identity.

Some mystics adopt other titles for the three ways. For example, Jan van Ruysbroeck (d. 1381), in The Spiritual Espousals, did not focus on union with God exclusively in the final stage. He wrote, rather, of three kinds of union. The "active life" was for beginners and involved "union with God by intermediary." The "interior life" was more inward and union with God was "without intermediary." The "contemplative life" was the highest point and union was "without distinction."

In general, the threefold way has been criticized in recent times both from a theological and a psychological standpoint. Most modern spiritual writers regard any notion of absolutely distinct, successive stages, with universal application, as far too rigid. It conflicts with the uniqueness of each person and the uniqueness of grace. The understanding of union with God as a final stage has also been criticized. As Ruysbroeck argues, union with God in some sense must be present from the very beginning as the precondition of all spiritual growth. Union, too, is a gift that is not achieved by human effort. An Anglican expert on mysticism, Evelyn Underhill (d. 1941), has also pointed out that, in the greatest Christian mystics, union becomes not an end in itself but leads quite naturally to selfless service of others.

Theologians such as Karl Rahner (d. 1984) have suggested that the traditional scheme of distinct stages depends too much on a Neoplatonist understanding of the human person. According to this understanding, derived from Origen, growth involves detachment from all human passions and ascent away from the material world. However, interpreted flexibly and particularly not as a set of completely distinct and unrepeatable stages, the threefold way remains a useful guide to the spiritual journey. People are at different stages in their relationships with God and in prayer and it is important to identify distinctive needs. Equally, the characteristics that identify the traditional ways—conversion, enlargement of vision, growth in selfless love—are recognized as the major challenges present in different proportions at all points in the spiritual journey. See also mysticism; spirituality, Christian.

PHILIP SHELDRAKE

Wearmouth and Jarrow, twin monasteries in Anglo-Saxon Northumbria (modern Yorkshire, England). Founded (673) and enriched by Benedict Biscop, the community of Wearmouth-Jarrow had many ties to Rome: Codex Amiatinus of the Bible, written here ca. 715, was meant as a gift for the pope. Bede was a monk of Jarrow. See also Bede, St.

Weigel, Gustave, 1906–64, Jesuit priest and ecumenical theologian. He taught theology in Santiago, Chile (1937–49) and at Woodstock College, Maryland (1949–64). His openness, warmth, and tolerance of differences won acceptance among Protestants despite his conservative theology. He was named consultant to the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity in 1960 and served as interpreter for Protestant observers at Vatican II (1962–65).

Weil, Simone, 1909–43, French essayist and mystic. Born in Paris of a distinguished Jewish family, Weil was educated in classics and philosophy at the École Normale Supérieur, where she embraced Marxism. Her commitment to social causes led to personal involvement, e.g., she joined the March of Miners (1933), served with the International Brigade against Franco during the Spanish Civil War, and worked as a laborer on farms and in factories.

Weil's writings, now in collections such as The Need for Roots, Gravity and Grace, and Waiting for God, reflect her experience of God's absence in the midst of suffering and the need to wait for God's return. While she was visiting Assisi (Italy) and Solesmes (France) in 1937, Weil had several mystical experiences. Although never baptized, she espoused Christianity, believing that Christ's Passion continued in the suffering of each person.

Wells, St. Swithun, 1536–91, one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales canonized in 1970. He was a married schoolmaster who aided the underground Catholic Church in England. Feast day: October 25. See also Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Wenceslas, St., ca. 907–29, king, martyr, and patron saint of Bohemia. A Christian who sought to extend the Church's influence in his realm with the support of Emperor Henry I, he issued policies that met with strong opposition from the nobles, many of whom were pagan. Killed by a band of conspirators that may have included his brother, he is venerated as a martyr. He was memorialized much later in the famed Christmas carol. Feast day: September 28.

Wesley, Charles, 1707–88, preacher and writer of hymns and brother of John Wesley. Ordained a priest in the Church of England (1735), he underwent a conversion on Pentecost in 1738 that shaped his ministry as an itinerant preacher. He eventually became attached to the City Road Chapel, London. He wrote over five thousand hymns, including "Love Divine, All Loves Excelling," "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," and "Christ the Lord Is Risen Today." See also Methodism.

Wesley, John, 1703–91, founder of the Methodist movement (originally within the Church of England) and brother of Charles Wesley. Ordained a priest for the Church of England (1728), he underwent a conversion in 1738, after which he undertook an itinerant ministry to the poor and uneducated throughout the British Isles. Wesley's reliance on lay preachers and his ordination of priests and bishops created tensions between his ecclesiastical organization and the Church of England. After his death, the Methodist church was founded. See also Methodism.

Wessel [Gansfort], ca. 1419–89, Dutch theologian. Though often viewed as proto-Protestant because he criticized papal infallibility, indulgences, and purgatory, Wessel was a pious Catholic.

Western Schism, Great. See Great Schism.

Westminster Abbey, the London church that has, since William the Conqueror in 1066, been the site of English royal coronations. Already a Benedictine monastery by the end of the eighth century, it was refounded by Edward the Confessor (1003–66); the monastery was dissolved under Henry VIII in 1540, reestablished by Mary I in 1556, and again dissolved by Elizabeth I in 1559.

Westminster Confession, the confession of faith of the Westminster Assembly. It was drafted by an assembly meeting in Westminster Abbey and was approved as the confession of faith by the English Parliament in 1647 and the Scots Parliament in 1649. It remained the central confession of English-speaking Presbyterians. Based on the witness of the Holy Spirit in Scripture (Article 1), the confession follows the temporal enactment of God's predestinating will (Art. 3) in the election of some of fallen humanity to salvation by Christ (Art. 4–9) through their calling, justification, adoption, sanctification, and perseverance (Art. 10–17). The confession is noteworthy for subsuming the work of Christ under limited election (Art. 8), for distinguishing between the covenants of works and grace (Art. 7), for making the practical syllogism foundational for assurance (Art. 18), and for equating the Sabbath observance with Sunday (Art. 21). See also Presbyterianism.

Westminster version. See Scripture, versions of.

Westphalia, Peace of. See Peace of Westphalia.

West Syrian rite, also called Syro-Antiochene rite, the liturgical tradition of the Syrian Orthodox in the patriarchate of Antioch and in India, as well as of the West Syrian and Syro-Malankara Catholics. Antioch and Jerusalem were the principal liturgical centers at the origins of the West Syrian rite. It is a synthesis of native Syriac elements, especially hymns and other choral pieces, with material translated from the Greek liturgical texts of the early Jerusalem and Antiochene traditions. This synthesis was the work of the Syriac, non-Chalcedonian, monastic communities in the Syriac-speaking hinterlands of Syria, Palestine, and parts of Mesopotamia, beyond the Greek-speaking cities of the Mediterranean littoral (coast). These Syriac Christians were organized into an independent church under Jacob Baradai (d. 578), after whom they are sometimes called "Jacobites." The Divine Office of this rite is closely related to that of the Maronite rite, and all three Syrian rites—the latter two plus the Chaldean—have basically the same liturgical year. Its eucharistic liturgy, however, is based on the Jerusalem Liturgy of St. James. See also Syro-Malankara Catholic Church.

Whitby, Synod of [Streanaeshalch], Anglo-Saxon church council (664). Mid-seventh-century Northumbria had two provinces, two kings, and two churches—Roman and Celtic—separated by differences over the date of Easter and other observances. King Oswy and his son King Alchfrid summoned Roman and Celtic spokesmen to St. Hilda's Abbey at Whitby; after hearing them debate, Oswy opted for Rome, lest the gatekeeper of heaven deny him entrance. The chief Roman spokesman was Wilfrid of Ripon. See also Wilfrid, St.

White, Andrew, 1579–1656, Jesuit priest and missionary. Ordained a secular priest at Douai, France, in 1605, he served as a missionary in England, was expelled after the Gunpowder Plot (1605), entered the Jesuits (1607), taught philosophy, and then returned to missionary work in England. He founded the Maryland mission (1634), was deported to England in chains (1644), and was then exiled. He returned to England and died. His works include A Narrative of the Trip to Maryland and pamphlets encouraging colonization.

White Fathers, Missionaries of Africa (M. Afr.), a society founded in Algiers in 1868 by Cardinal Charles M. Lavigerie, archbishop of Algiers. The name White Fathers (dropped in 1984) was derived from the white habit they traditionally wore. The first aim of the society was care of orphans following the typhoid epidemic of 1867. Missions were soon established in other parts of the area around the northern fringes of the Sahara, although two attempts to cross the Sahara and establish missions in the interior of Africa failed, ending with the massacre of six White Fathers by their Touareg guides. In 1878, in response to his plan for the evangelization of Central Africa, Lavigerie was appointed apostolic delegate to Equatorial Africa. That same year, the first of what were to become annual caravans of missionaries left Tanganyika and headed toward the interior. The society faced great hardships, including persecution by tribal chiefs and slave traders. Many priests, brothers, and lay associates gave their lives for the work of the missions; twenty-two Christians martyred in Uganda were canonized in 1964. Slowly, however, Lavigerie's visions became reality. The goal of building up an indigenous clergy bore its first fruit with the ordination of two priests in Uganda in 1913. Dedicated to their apostolic work in Africa, the White Fathers may not accept any other apostolic work outside of that continent, unless requested to do so by the Holy See. An American province of the White Fathers was established in Washington, D.C., in 1948. See also Africa, Catholicism in.

White Sisters. See Missionary Sisters of Our Lady of Africa.

widow, a married or (in Jewish tradition) betrothed woman whose husband has died. The care of widows and orphans in the ancient world was an important duty of the community because the widow rarely possessed means of support. Hence there are constant exhortations in the Scriptures pleading for care and justice for widows, e.g., Exod 22:22. A childless widow in the Jewish tradition was expected to marry her husband's nearest male relative. The practice was known as levirate marriage. In the primitive Church widows played an important role. Indeed, there may have been an order of widows that later merged with that of deaconesses. The older widows were formerly registered as ministers of charity within the community (1 Tim 5:3–18). The widow enjoyed greater independence than other women. Exonerated from the patriarchal system, childbearing, and household responsibility, she was free to use her own wealth, to travel, and to play a vital and often influential part within the community. This is seen especially in the corpus of apocryphal acts of the Apostles (e.g., the Acts of Paul, the Acts of Thomas). The status of consecrated widow was of greater prestige than the consecrated virgin in the first three centuries of the Church. Gradually, however, virginity became the preferred status. See also virginity.

Wilfrid, St., 634–709, bishop of York from 664 to 709. He advocated the Roman position on the date of Easter at the Synod of Whitby (664), promoting closer ties with Rome generally, both with regard to liturgical practice and to papal authority. Feast day: October 12. See also Whitby, Synod of.

will of God, a notion about God's infinite capacity to desire the good. Scripture teaches that the creation of the universe and the Incarnation of Jesus were the results of God's will, and that God "desires everyone to be saved" (1 Tim 2:4). The Christian tradition has repeatedly directed Christians to discover and to follow God's benevolent will for them. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) argued that where there is an intellect there is a will, that the one who knows has the capacity to choose the good known. As one who has all perfections, a knowing God is also a God who wills.

Considering the will of God raises numerous questions. The will of God, like God's very self, is a mystery. Thus, those who want to conform their lives to God's will must seek ways to discover what God's will is for them. The Scriptures and the Catholic tradition contain much discussion about this process of discovery. The existence of evil, natural and moral, also raises questions that theologians have tried to answer for centuries. If God wills only good and knows the good perfectly, how can the existence of evil be explained? Some theologians have argued that in some cases God wills only indirectly. Thus, God's will for justice indirectly wills the punishment attendant to the implementation of justice. God does not will moral evil, but God permits its existence as a result of human free will. Indeed, Christian faith consistently affirms the existence of God's loving will despite the presence of physical and moral evil in the world. Since the time of Jesus, Christians have prayed daily that the will of God be accomplished: "Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven" (Matt 6:10). See also nature and grace; providence; salvation; universal salvific will of God.

PATRICIA M. VINJE

William of Auvergne, ca. 1180–1249, theologian, bishop of Paris from 1228, and prolific author. His efforts to reconcile the newly recovered Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) with the Platonism of earlier theology anticipated the more successful work of later theologians at Paris. See also Aristotle; Plato.

William of Auxerre, d. 1231, theologian at the University of Paris and author of the Summa Aurea (Lat., "Golden Synthesis"), a comprehensive statement of Christian theology employing Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) in the service of Christian truth that was influential throughout the thirteenth century. See also Aristotle.

William of Champeaux, ca. 1068–1122, French logician and bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne from 1113 to 1122. Renowned as the finest teacher of dialectic in Paris at the turn of the twelfth century, William, a logical realist, became embroiled in debate on the problem of universals with his former student, Peter Abelard. Although William retired from teaching in 1108, he soon resumed the task, and, with other Augustinian Canons, founded the School of St. Victor. See also Scholasticism; Victorines.

William of Moerbeke, ca. 1215–ca. 1286, Flemish Dominican, archbishop of Corinth (1278–86), and translator from Greek into Latin. Besides classics of mathematics, physics, optics, and medicine, he translated previously unavailable works of Aristotle (d. 322 B.C.) and many commentaries thereon. His literal translations directly from Greek often replaced versions made from Arabic and Syriac intermediaries; this made possible a more accurate reading of Aristotle, the fruits of which appear in Thomas Aquinas's (d. 1274) theology. His translations of Proclus shaped German Dominican mysticism. See also Aquinas, St. Thomas; Aristotle; mysticism.

William of Ockham, ca. 1285–1347, Franciscan philosopher and theologian; known as the "Venerable Inceptor" because, although academically qualified, he never secured a position as regent master of theology at a university. After entering the Franciscan order at an early age, the English-born William studied theology at Oxford, lecturing on the Sentences of Peter Lombard from 1317 to 1319. Next serving as a lecturer in a Franciscan house (probably in London), his literary energies were focused on logic and natural philosophy, as well as on more overtly theological issues. In 1324 he was summoned to Avignon to respond to charges that some of his theological positions, including those on the Eucharist, were heretical; there he met Michael of Cesena, the minister general of the order, who had come to the papal court to champion a stricter Franciscan line on spiritual poverty. As he studied papal pronouncements on poverty at Michael's urging, William concluded that Pope John XXII had himself lapsed into heresy. Fleeing the papal court in 1328, he was received by the rival of the pope, Emperor Louis of Bavaria, and lived out his life in Munich. His later works, including the "Work of Ninety Days," were more political in tone and highly critical of papal pretensions. He was never, however, formally condemned as a heretic.

Ockham's philosophical and theological teachings exerted tremendous influence in the later Middle Ages. Although not the originator of the concept, he made great use of the distinction between the absolute power of God, which refers to the vast range of possibilities open to the omnipotent God, and God's ordained power, which designates the course of action on which God has, in fact, settled. By virtue of the distinction, which was widely employed in subsequent theology, Ockham was able to insist on both divine transcendence and the radical contingency of the creation: the world need not be the way it is, for God could, in absolute power, have decided to establish things differently; that the world takes its present form is due to God's ordained will.

Ockham, however, is now probably best known for his "razor," which advocates economy in argument. "Ockham's razor" is a rule in science and philosophy stating that, because entities should not be multiplied needlessly, the simplest of two or more competing theories is preferable. See also nominalism; philosophy and theology; Scholasticism.

JOSEPH WAWRYKOW

William of Saint-Thierry, ca. 1085–1148, theologian, mystic, and abbot of the Benedictine monastery, Saint-Thierry, in Champagne, France, from 1119 to 1135. While abbot he argued for a strict observance of the Rule of St. Benedict. In 1135 he was released from his duties, at his request, to retire to the stricter Cistercian monastery of Signy. See also Benedict, Rule of St.

William of Tyre, ca. 1130–86, chancellor of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, archbishop of Tyre, and historian. Commissioned by King Amaury to write a history of the kingdom, he also led the delegation of Jerusalem to the Third Lateran Council (1179).

Willibald, St., 700–786, bishop of Eichstätt (742–86) and associate of St. Boniface, who consecrated him bishop. Feast day: July 7. See also Boniface, St.

Willibrord, St., 658–739, missionary to the Frisians (in western Germany). An oblate under Wilfrid at Ripon, England, and later ordained a priest in Ireland, he left in 690 for West Frisia with eleven companions. Visiting Rome in 692, he received the support of Pope Sergius I, who in 695 consecrated Willibrord as archbishop of the Frisians. He established his cathedral outside Utrecht on land granted by Pepin II, and in 698 established a Benedictine monastery at Echternach, which became a base for further missionary activity extending as far as Denmark. Feast day: November 7. See also Germany, Catholicism in.

wills [canon law], gifts to the Church and to Church-related institutions. Church law is concerned not only with gifts given by way of last will and testament, but also with gifts given while the donor is still alive. A major concern of the law is to follow the intention of the donor. The bishop, or in some cases the competent religious superior, has the duty of ensuring this, and consequently the responsibility of oversight; of interpreting the meaning of the donor's intent when it is not expressed clearly; and, under certain conditions, of making changes in the intent when it is impossible to fulfill.

Windesheim Congregation, association of Augustinian Canons Regular committed to the Devotio Moderna movement inspired by Geert de Groote (d. 1384). Eventually spreading from Windesheim through the Low Countries and Germany, the congregation had about one hundred monasteries before its suppression by the Protestants. See also Augustinian Canons; Devotio Moderna.

wine, eucharistic, the wine consecrated during the Eucharistic Prayer and distributed during the Communion rite at Mass. The sacrifice of Christ is recalled by the words "the blood of Christ," which are spoken both during the Eucharistic Prayer and as the consecrated wine is distributed to the faithful during the Communion rite. See also mixed chalice; unmixed chalice.

wisdom (Old Eng., witan, "to know"; Lat., videre, "to see"), a gift of the Holy Spirit that, according to Catholic theology, is a special grace of the Spirit to help one practice virtue more perfectly. Wisdom is a kind of knowledge in the sense that it allows one to understand God's purposes and the divine will. In the Hebrew Scriptures, wisdom (a feminine noun) is God's first creation (Sir 1:4) and is frequently associated with "fear of the Lord" (Ps 111:10; Prov 1:7; Sir 1:12–14)—an expression that means reverence for the Lord. In the NT, Paul identified Christ with God's wisdom (1 Cor 1:24) when he attempted to express Christian reliance on Christ crucified and to distinguish Christian faith from the empty wisdom of Greek learning. Relating wisdom to God's incarnate Word, as Paul does, and to divinity itself, as Sirach suggests, indicates that wisdom is not a human virtue or a skill that can be acquired through self-effort. As the author of Proverbs put it, God gives birth to wisdom (8:22). While creatures can discover and understand valuable knowledge, wisdom always originates with the creator God. See also gifts of the Holy Spirit.

witchcraft, the use of supernatural powers with the aid of evil spirits. Condemned in both the OT (Exod 22:18; Deut 18:9–14) and NT (Gal 5:20) as opposed to the worship of God, the early Church considered witchcraft to be superstition. By the thirteenth century, witchcraft was condemned as heresy and subject to the Inquisition and prosecution by secular justice. Persecution of witches grew in the following centuries and continued in both Protestant and Catholic countries into the eighteenth century.

Wittenberg, a university town in Germany. With both Martin Luther and Philipp Melanchthon as professors, the University of Wittenberg (established 1502) became the center of the new Protestant movement in the sixteenth century. Luther nailed his Ninety-five Theses on Wittenberg's Castle Church, in which both he and Melanchthon are buried. See also Luther, Martin; Melanchthon, Philipp.

Wolff, Madeleva, 1887–1964, a Sister of the Holy Cross and third president of St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, from 1934 to 1961. Distinguished educator and poet, she was the author of My First Seventy Years (1959).

Wolfgang, St., ca. 924–94, bishop of Regensburg, monk, missionary, and educator. He was noted for his zeal in church reform and pastoral care. Feast day: October 31.

Wolsey, Thomas, ca. 1474–1530, cardinal from 1515, who as privy councilor to Henry VIII attained great power, being named bishop of Lincoln and then archbishop of York (1514), lord chancellor (1515), and papal legate. His failure to procure a papal dispensation for the divorce of Henry VIII from Catherine of Aragon in 1529 led to his arrest in 1530 for high treason, but he died before his trial.

woman deacon. See deacon, woman.

Women for Faith and Family, an organization founded in 1984, with headquarters in St. Louis, Missouri, to provide Catholic women with the means to express support for the hierarchy and the teaching of the Church.

Women's Ordination Conference (WOC), an international grass-roots movement of women and men committed to the ordination of Roman Catholic women to a renewed priestly ministry. Officially established in 1976, WOC had its beginnings in Chicago, where two years earlier Mary Lynch had gathered a small group of women to discuss raising the question of the ordination of women during the International Year of Women.

The general office is in Fairfax, Virginia, and local WOC chapters exist in many major cities. WOC is a clearinghouse of research and information. It sponsors workshops and conferences, conducts surveys, and provides speakers to local groups. The official bimonthly publication is New Women, New Church. See also ordination of women.

word of God, a verbal expression of God's power, will, and purpose; a frequent Christian description of the Bible. In the ancient Near East, "word" carries the nuance of "expression of power," and in Hebrew dabar means both "word" and "event." The Bible opens with the creative word of God: "Then God said, 'Let there be light': and there was light" (Gen 1:3; see Pss 33:6, 9; 147:4, 15–18; Isa 40:26). The OT uses the expression "word of the Lord" over two hundred times, most often for the powerful advent of God that transforms human history, especially in the calling and activity of the prophets (1 Kgs 17:1–5; Isa 6:6–13; Jer 1:6–9; Ezek 3:1–11; Amos 3:1; 4:1). The decalogue is literally the "ten words" of God (Deut 4:13; Exod 20:2–17; Deut 5:6–21), and in Deuteronomy the word of God is virtually identical with the "decrees and the statutes and the ordinances that the Lord our God has commanded you" (Deut 6:20). The Gospels refer to the OT as the word of God infrequently (Matt 15:6; Luke 1:38, 45; 3:2), but the phrase appears in Acts and the Pauline writings as a virtual synonym for the early Christian proclamation (Acts 4:31; 6:2, 4, 7; 8:14, 25; 11:1; 1 Thess 2:13; 1 Cor 14:36; 2 Cor 2:17; Col 1:25). The OT legacy of the powerful word is captured by Heb 4:12, the word of God as "living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword." As revealer and expression of God's presence Jesus is "the word" (John 1:14–18; Heb 1:2).

The biblical background is a caution against calling Scripture the literal word of God. The Bible is God's word as the written witness to the powerful presence of God manifest in the history of Israel and in the Christ event (i.e., the life, teaching, death, Resurrection, and abiding presence of Christ). See also Bible; inspiration of Scripture; Scripture, authority of.

JOHN R. DONAHUE

WOMEN IN THE CHURCH

From the beginning of Christianity, women have played a significant role in the Church, some according to the customs and mores of the times and others in sharp contrast to the conventions of their day. In the twentieth century, the women's movement and the Church's sensitivity to issues of human dignity and justice raised expectations among women and encouraged them to assume greater responsibility for the Church's mission.

WOMEN IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

Recent research by Scripture scholars has unearthed new insights concerning women and their involvement in the life of Jesus and the early Church. Jesus welcomed women among his disciples and treated them in a manner that differed from the accepted norms of his religious and social milieu. Women followed him from town to town and some provided for him out of their own means (Luke 8:3). There is no indication that he ever dealt with women as inferiors or tried to control or manipulate them. Women remained at the cross and the Risen Christ appeared to them and sent them as apostles to announce the Resurrection to the other disciples (Mark 15:40–41; 16:7). Women were present at Pentecost and received the Holy Spirit (Acts 1:14).

Paul refers to women as fellow workers in the service of Christ and as fellow prisoners for Christ. He commends Phoebe as sister, patron, and deacon (Gk., diakonos) of the church of Cenchreae (Rom 16:1–2). She is the only person in the NT who is called deacon of a particular church, yet she has remained relatively unknown. Significantly, when the Church uses Romans 16 in the liturgy, the Roman lectionary omits the two verses about her and begins the reading with v. 3. Paul mentions many other women by name who served as "fellow workers" (Rom 16; 1 Cor 16:19; Phil 4:2–3).

The baptismal formula cited in Galatians 3:28 expresses the understanding of Pauline communities that there is no distinction of race, status, or sex among the baptized. "There is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus."

The Fourth Gospel presents a story of women's leadership role in the community. Martha assumed leadership in the community in the story of the raising of Lazarus from the dead, sending for Jesus and professing faith in him, and in the resurrection of the dead (John 11). In this Gospel it is Martha who professes faith in Jesus, as Peter does in the synoptic Gospels. Luke presents Martha and her sister Mary as symbolizing the ministries of the table and of the word (Luke 10:38–40).

While Scripture may provide positive models, it also includes negative insights concerning the role of women. The household codes, prescriptions for behavior, present another picture of the role of women in the early Church. They are instructed to keep silence in the churches (Cor 14:34), to be submissive (Titus 2:5) even as children (1 Tim 3:4) and slaves are (Titus 2:8), to listen in silence and not act as teachers (1 Tim 2:11–12), and to find salvation through childbearing (1 Tim 2:15). Arguments for women's silence and submission are given in 1 Timothy: Adam was created first, then Eve, and it was she who was led astray (2:14). These arguments have been repeated over the centuries in efforts to silence women.

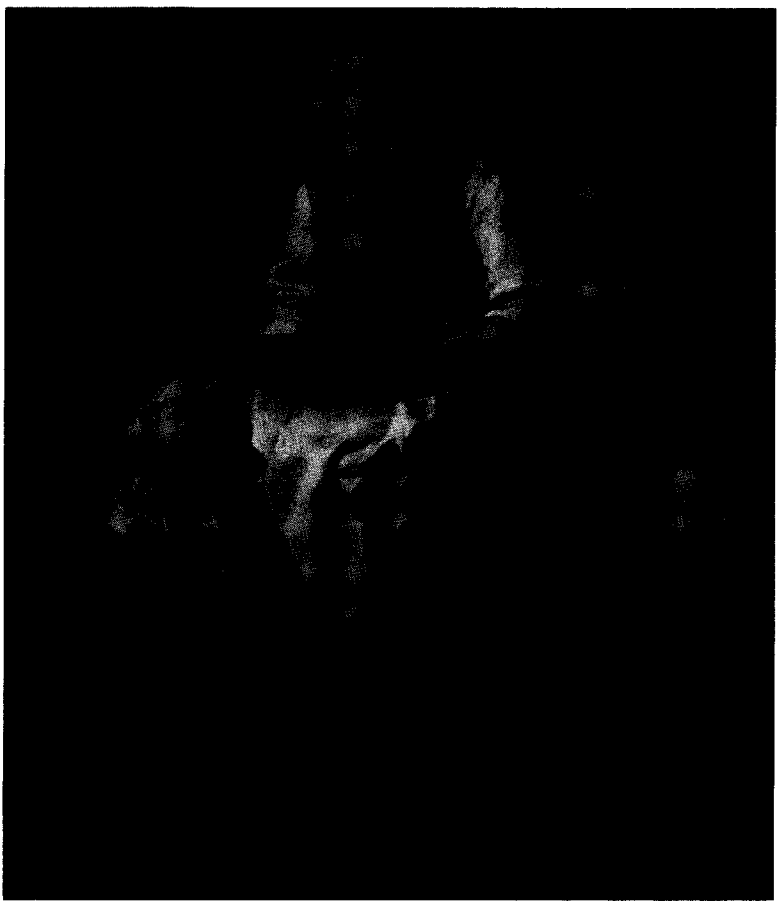
The contributions of women to the Church have frequently been overlooked because of emphasis on their roles as mother, wife, or harlot. For instance, Mary is honored as the virgin mother; little is said about her role as disciple. The Samaritan woman is remembered more for her five husbands than for the fact that many in her town believed in Jesus on the strength of her word (John 4:39). Magdalene, faithful to the end (Luke 24:10), is known as a repentant sinner, even though Scripture does not describe her thus (Luke 8:2).



Christ in the home of Mary and Martha, two types of personalities, the one (Mary) contemplative and the other (Martha) active; "Mary has chosen the better part," Jesus said to Martha (Luke 10:42); seventeenth-century Dutch painting by Jan Vermeer, National Gallery of Scotland, Edinburgh.

WOMEN IN THE EARLY CHURCH

Women in the early Church assumed leadership roles for groups of Christians in the cities of the Mediterranean world by opening their homes to members of the Church and serving those in need. During the persecutions, women courageously professed the faith and died as martyrs along with their brother Christians. Later, holy women and men looked to desert mothers as well as desert fathers for guidance in their lives of prayer, penance, and study.

The Apostolic Constitutions, a fourth-century document, describes a ceremony for ordaining deaconesses. When the bishop laid hands on a woman, he was to pray, "Do Thou look down on this Thy servant, who is to be ordained to the office of woman deacon and grant her Thy Holy Spirit." Later councils forbade the practice of ordaining women as deacons. Numerous reasons were given, the final one being "because of the weakness of their sex." The discipleship of equals established by Jesus was overcome by societal and cultural forces of patriarchy.

THROUGH THE AGES

Abbesses in medieval times exercised jurisdiction over double monasteries of both women and men. They shared in the responsibilities and symbols of episcopal office. Abbesses were ordinarily women from royal or powerful families and often wielded a kind of power that was usual in their day but that has been criticized as inappropriate as a model for today's women.

Mystics of the Middle Ages such as Julian of Norwich (d. ca. 1413), Mechtild of Magdeburg (d. ca. 1280), and Hildegard of Bingen (d. 1179) exerted great influence over their contemporaries. The many revisions and recent publications of their works testify to the esteem in which they are still held. Catherine of Siena (d. 1380) and Teresa of Ávila (d. 1582) have been declared Doctors of the Church.

Before the seventeenth century all convents were strictly cloistered, but the founding of active communities of women dedicated to the works of mercy radically changed the nature of religious life. These communities of religious sisters assumed responsibility for education, health care, and social outreach while maintaining many of the practices of the cloistered communities. Sisters assumed positions of authority in schools, hospitals, orphanages, and social agencies, often in conflict with both social customs and the hierarchy.

WOMEN IN TODAY'S CHURCH

Education, especially higher education, has prepared women to assume more public roles and responsibilities in society and the Church. Madeleva Wolff, president of St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, Indiana, established the first doctoral program in theology for women in the United States in 1943. Nine years later, Pope Pius XII founded Regina Mundi, a pontifical institute in Rome to prepare women to teach theology in women's colleges. Since that time, women have earned graduate degrees and teach in universities and seminaries throughout the world. Women are earning Master of Divinity (M.Div.) degrees preparing them for pastoral ministry. The number of women in professional theological and biblical societies has increased dramatically in recent decades. Women theologians are making significant contributions not only in the field of feminist theology but in all areas of theology and biblical studies.

The challenge of Vatican II (1962–65), coupled with the shortage of priests, has increased women's involvement in the life of the Church. The Notre Dame Study of Catholic Parish Life (1986) indicated that women are engaged in ministry in greater numbers than men. Women comprise over 80 percent of those who minister as teachers and sponsors of the catechumenate and who serve the poor, visit the sick, and comfort the grieving. Half of parish council members, lectors, and eucharistic ministers are women. In practice, however, men are called on more often to serve in these capacities.

A laywoman distributes Holy Communion at Mass in St. Stephen's Church, Anoka, Minnesota. Before the Second Vatican Council, the distribution of Communion was a function restricted to priests and deacons.

The documents of the Second Vatican Council (1962–65) locate the call to ministry in Baptism and charge all Christians to minister. The theology that has developed since that time has provided the foundation for women and laymen to assume more public roles as ministers in the Church. Involvement of laypeople is not just to make up for the shortage of priests. Ministry is recognized as the right and responsibility of all Christians.

Some women minister in a general way. In families as well as in parishes, the majority of teachers and catechists are women. Women volunteers keep many parish projects afloat. Mothers, wives, and single women comprise the largest group of women whose faith, love, and generous service nourish and build up the Church. While sisters make a great contribution, they are fewer in number.

More women are currently involved as paid professionals in the Church than in the past and are assuming responsibilities once closed to them. Parish administrators and pastoral associates are but two of the more recent ministries that women provide. Women serve as hospital chaplains, campus ministers, religious educators, liturgical coordinators, and vicars in dioceses as full-time professional ministers.

In priestless parishes (now more than 10 percent of all parishes in the United States) women carry out the ministries of a pastor with two exceptions: they do not celebrate the Eucharist or hear confessions. They are the liturgical and prayer leaders of the community as well as spiritual directors. They counsel parishioners, conduct Scripture studies, visit the sick, and care for the suffering. In some remote areas, women have been commissioned by the local bishop to preside at weddings and funerals.

Women teach and serve as administrators in seminaries and in programs preparing men for the diaconate. Wives of candidates for the diaconate are encouraged to accompany their husbands in the training process. Some dioceses admit women to the training program but do not promise that they will be ordained permanent deacons.

A Native American nun speaks with Native American Catholics.

WOMEN IN RELIGIOUS CONGREGATIONS

Pope Pius XII issued Sponsa Christi in 1950, in which he discussed the need for professional and religious formation of sisters. He also noted that modern life demanded that sisters be able to support themselves and not depend on gifts. Under the impetus of the Sister Formation Movement (1951), the process of transformation was begun. When Vatican II's Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life mandated a return to the intention of the founders, revision of constitutions, and examination of life-styles, sisters were already prepared for the challenge.

In 1966, two-thirds of all sisters were teaching in elementary schools, high schools, and academies. Others were serving in hospitals, orphanages, and homes for the elderly and persons with physical and mental disabilities. Since that time, large numbers of sisters have left their orders. Those who remain are involved in less institutional ministries and many have responded to the call for a "preferential option for the poor."

OFFICIAL STATEMENTS REGARDING WOMEN

The Church gets mixed reviews for its treatment of women over the centuries. In some times and places it has protected them by curbing the power and authority of patriarchal rulers, totalitarian governments, and of abusive husbands and fathers who would deny them full human dignity. In other situations, it has contributed to abuse and exploitation by perpetuating degrading stereotypes and condoning abusive situations with appeals to biblical passages on suffering, submission, and patience. Recent documents indicate a growing awareness by the hierarchy of women's changing role in society and the Church. The ideals these documents contain have, for the most part, not yet been accomplished.

Pope John XXIII, in Pacem in Terris (1963), cited women's participation in public life as one of the three most significant signs of the times to which the Church should attend. The Second Vatican Council's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World also noted the changing role of women in society (nn. 9, 52, 60). The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity states: "Since in our times women have an ever more active share in the whole life of society, it is very important that they participate more widely also in the various fields of the Church's apostolate" (n. 9). In 1971, the Third World Synod of Bishops called for women to participate in, and share responsibility for, the life of society and of the Church ("Justice in the World").

The ministries of acolyte and lector were restored to the laity in 1972 when the apostolic letter Ministeria Quaedam was published. While women were given permission to serve in both capacities, formal commissioning to those offices was reserved to men. Many dioceses have discontinued the practice of commissioning because of this discrimination.

In 1976, the Pontifical Biblical Commission reported that Scripture alone did not support the exclusion of women from ordination. In the same year and in spite of that report, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued the "Declaration on the Question of the Ordination of Women," presenting arguments against the ordination of women to the priesthood. The main arguments were that the Church is following the mind of Jesus who chose only men as apostles; that it has been the constant tradition of the Church; and that the "natural resemblance" between Christ and the celebrant of the Eucharist would be difficult to see if the role were not taken by a man.

In 1983, the National Conference of Catholic Bishops agreed to write a pastoral letter in response to the concerns of women. Over the next nine years, four drafts of the document were submitted to the NCCB. The fourth draft was voted down in November 1992. One of the main points over which the bishops disagreed was the question of the ordination of women. The bishops referred the concerns addressed in the drafts to various committees in the NCCB, which were to issue statements on particular issues rather than attempt to write a more encompassing pastoral.

On August 15, 1988, Pope John Paul II issued Mulieris Dignitatem ("On the Dignity and Vocation of Women"). This encyclical was released shortly after the first draft of the NCCB document. The foundational anthropology was complementarity, suggesting that there are unique roles, abilities, and characteristics for women that are different from those of men. The theory of complementarity holds that it is God who determines woman's unique nature to complement man. The subsequent drafts of the U.S. bishops' document drew on that anthropology rather than that of partnership, as in the first draft.

The U.S. Bishops' Committee on Marriage and Family Life and the Committee on Women in Society and the Church issued "A Pastoral Response to Domestic Violence Against Women" in November 1992. In doing so they followed the example of bishops in Canada and New Zealand. The document identifies violence against women as sinful, decries the use of Scripture to support abusive behavior, and encourages pastors and other ministers to provide support for abused women. In November 1994 the U.S. bishops approved a pastoral reflection on women in the Church and in society, "Strengthening the Bonds of Peace," which rejects sexism in Church teaching and practice and commits the bishops to enhance the participation of women "in every possible aspect of church life."

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS

Organizations of Catholic women span the spectrum from liberal to conservative. Some of the more active organizations are St. Joan's Alliance (1911); the National Council of Catholic Women (1920); the Grail (1921); the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, formerly the Conference of Major Superiors of Women (1956); the National Assembly of Religious Women, formerly the National Assembly of Women Religious (1968); National Coalition of American Nuns (1969); the Women's Ordination Conference (1974); the women-church movement (1977); the Women's Alliance for Theology, Ethics, and Ritual (1982); and Women United for Faith and Family (1984).

See also deacon, woman; feminism; ordination of women.

Bibliography

Carmody, Denise Lardner. Responses to 101 Questions About Feminism. New York: Paulist Press, 1993.

Carr, Anne E. Transforming Grace: Christian Tradition and Women's Experience. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1988.

Coll, Regina. Christianity and Feminism in Conversation. Mystic, CT: Twenty-Third Publications, 1994.

LaCugna, Catherine Mowry, ed. Freeing Theology: The Essentials of Theology in Feminist Perspective. San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1993.

REGINA A. COLL

work, theology of, an understanding of human labor most thoroughly developed in Pope John Paul II's 1981 encyclical, Laborem Exercens ("On Human Work"). The primary text for grounding John Paul II's theology of work is the book of Genesis. He draws from this text two fundamental doctrines. The first is the imago Dei doctrine, which affirms that all persons are created in the image of God. Because God is our Creator, and persons are created in the image of God, persons are to live out that image by working with creation. "The word of God's revelation is profoundly marked by the fundamental truth that [the human person], created in the image of God, shares by his [or her] work in the activity of the creator, and that, within the limits of his [or her] own human capabilities, [the human person] in a sense continues to develop that activity and perfects it as he [or she] advances further and further in the discovery of the resources and values contained in the whole of creation" (n. 25). Work is participation in the activity of God.

The call to work with God in creation leads to the second doctrine underpinning the theology of work: God's charge to humanity to "subdue the earth." Because God is active in creation, humanity, created in the image of God, should be so as well. Moreover, it is precisely through the activity of subduing the earth that humanity realizes and fulfills its true nature as being in the image of God. In Pope John Paul's words, "[The human person] is the image of God partly through the mandate received from the creator to subdue, to dominate, the earth. In carrying out this mandate, [the human person], every human being, reflects the very action of the creator of the universe" (n. 4).

Centrality of the Human Person: The force of these two doctrines in interpreting the nature of work is to place the human person at the center. This theologically grounded understanding of the nature of work has two corollaries, one philosophical, the other social. The philosophical corollary is the priority of the subject over the object in the understanding of work. While work may have indispensable external, objective purposes—particularly the production of material goods to meet human needs—the primary purpose is to serve as a means for humanity to realize its true nature. John Paul II makes the link between the theological doctrines and the philosophical corollary clear: "In order to continue our analysis of work, analysis linked with the word of the Bible telling [us] that [we are] to subdue the earth, we must concentrate our attention on work in the subjective sense, much more than we did on the objective significance. . . . [The human person] is to subdue the earth and dominate it, because as the 'image of God' he [or she] is a person, that is to say, a subjective being capable of acting in a planned and rational way, capable of deciding about himself [or herself] and with a tendency to self-realization. As a person, [the human being] is therefore the subject of work. As a person he [or she] works, he [or she] performs various actions belonging to the work process; independently of their objective content, these actions must all serve to realize his [or her] humanity, to fulfill the calling to be a person that is his [or hers] by reason of his [or her] very humanity" (n. 6).

Priority of Labor: The social corollary of the theological doctrines and the centrality of the subject of work is the priority of labor over capital. In highlighting this priority, John Paul II is not criticizing market economies per se, but rather the tendency in some market economies for capital—the external means of objective production—to take precedence over the human work that makes production, and even the accumulation of capital, possible. According to John Paul II, human labor created the means of production in the first place. This makes human labor the "primary efficient cause" of production, while capital "remains a mere instrument or instrumental cause." Therefore, human labor should have priority in Catholic reflection on the nature of work. Capital is only "a collection of things" that results from human labor.

The theological understanding of work and its philosophical and social corollaries have concrete implications for the economic sphere of life. The first is a view of the relationship between the owners of capital and labor that does not place them in opposition. If capital is dependent on prior labor and continues to be so dependent, then the relationship between the two is more interdependent than either traditional capitalism or socialism allow. The second implication is that recognition of this interdependence leads to specific proposals for embodying it in the workplace. John Paul II recommends joint labor-management ownership of the means of production, worker-management sharing in the profits of business, and shareholding by labor. Behind these recommendations is an understanding of the nature of private property that rejects both socialist and capitalist extremes. Unlike socialism, persons have a right to private property. In contrast to capitalism, the right to private property is not absolute.

It is subordinate to the right of all persons to the use of the things of creation. If private ownership is not meeting this more comprehensive criterion, then state involvement and even ownership is allowable in certain cases. State-directed compensation for unemployment is an example of such redirection of private property for the common good. The preference, however, is for meeting problems of distribution through coordination of intermediate, nongovernmental institutions if possible.

Ultimately, the person, created in the image of God, participates not only in God's creative activity, but also in God's salvific activity through work. This becomes most evident when one takes into account the fact of human toil, which "marks the way of human life on earth and constitutes an announcement of death." At this point, John Paul II places the theological significance of work in the context of the Paschal Mystery. Through toil, persons participate in the redemptive activity of the Cross. "The Christian finds in human work a small part of the cross of Christ and accepts it in the same spirit of redemption in which Christ accepted his cross for us" (n. 27). See also Catholic social teachings; creation; imago Dei; Laborem Exercens; property.

Bibliography

Baum, Gregory. The Priority of Labor: A Commentary on "Laborem exercens," Encyclical Letter of Pope John Paul II. New York: Paulist Press, 1982.

Baum, Gregory, ed. Work and Religion. New York: Seabury Press, 1980.

Chenu, Marie-Dominique. The Theology of Work: An Exploration. Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1966.

Kaiser, Edwin. Theology of Work. Westminster, MD: Newman Press, 1966.

TODD D. WHITMORE

Worker Priests, French and Belgian priests who joined the workforce to evangelize alienated Catholic workers. The idea seems to have originated with priests who had done forced labor in Germany during the Second World War. Between 1944 and 1954 well over one hundred priests involved themselves in this ministry, supported and encouraged by prominent members of the French hierarchy and the intellectual elite. Rome began to suppress the experiment in 1954 and so restricted it by 1959 (because of what was seen as a compromise of the priestly life) that its original intent was compromised. Little was left of the movement when the Second Vatican Council opened (1962), but a guarded tribute to its work did appear in the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests (n. 8). The 1971 World Synod of Bishops in Rome left the possibility of secular employment for priests to the discretion of the local ordinary. The Code of Canon Law (can. 285) only forbids "unbecoming" employment for clerics.

world, end of the material, a theological metaphor pointing to the "new creation" or the fullness of God's salvific activity. Salvation brings the material order not to destruction, as though it were an evil to be overcome, but to completion. The material order is truly caught up in the mystery of redemption initiated in creation through the Word and united eternally with the divine in the Word-made-flesh, Jesus Christ.

From the perspective of cosmology, the metaphor "the end of the material world" must be interpreted within an understanding of the innate goodness of creation and of the full flowering of that goodness through the divine will to save.

From the perspective of anthropology, the metaphor is linked with the redemption of the human race and finds its primary paradigm in Christ's death and Resurrection, "the first fruits of those who have died" (1 Cor 15:20). It underscores the openness of the material world to the activity of God's life-giving Spirit.

The fullness of life, flowing from Jesus' relation to the Father, is only available to us in history through our embodied openness to human interaction and relationship, self-giving, and mutual love. Our hope in the transformation of the whole of creation, with its manifold cultural, social, and political structures, in accordance with God's revealed desire for this world can lead the reflective Christian to see what is lacking or distorted in human relationships and the created order and to participate in the process of this transformation. See also eschatology, individual; eschatology, universal; eternal life; salvation history.

world, responsibility for the, commitment to, and moral accountability for, the welfare of the planet. Arising with the exponential expansion of technological and scientific power in the modern period, the phrase reflects both an increased sense of the vulnerability of nature to human actions as well as a deepening awareness of human dependence on the natural world.

"Responsibility for the world" refers primarily to moral accountability on the part of both individual persons and collectivities (e.g., corporations) for the negative impact of human actions (e.g., industrialization and consumption patterns) on the natural world. This responsibility is not total, but rather proportioned to the degree of control and power that human agents can exert.

The proper ordering of competing claims posed by various objects of responsibility (e.g., the needs of the poor vs. the needs of a local biosphere) constitutes the major problem in moral deliberation over responsibility for the world, as in the ongoing debate over sustainable development. The Church's prohibition of artificial birth control has been criticized for contributing to environmental destruction by undermining efforts to control population expansion.

The Bible's characteristic "desacralization" of nature, in which nature is separated from God, contributed to the flourishing of technology and the subjugation of nature in the West. Following the works of Francis Bacon (d. 1626) and René Descartes (d. 1650), the dominion over creation granted to humanity in Genesis was used to justify the tyrannical domination of nature. Acknowledging a degree of complicity in the legacy of Western ecological exploitation, the Church today strives to retrieve a sense of stewardship and interdependence with nature and advances a moral vision of the universal common good that encompasses nature as well as human societies ("planetary common good"), a theology of cocreation and cooperation with nature, and a sacramental understanding of nature. See also creation; history, theology of.

STEPHEN J. POPE

World Council of Churches (WCC), the most visible international expression of the ecumenical movement in the twentieth century. It was constituted at its first general assembly in Amsterdam in 1948, when 147 national churches became members; there were 317 members at the seventh assembly in 1991 (Canberra, Australia).

A precondition for membership is a church's acceptance of the WCC basis: "a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Savior according to the Scriptures, and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit." With no intention to be an incipient "world superchurch" or to legislate for the churches, the WCC since 1948 has notably advanced in its self-understanding, structures, and programs. The 1975 assembly (Nairobi) agreed that the "common calling" of the churches is "to advance towards visible unity in one faith and in one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and in common life in Christ."

The WCC organizes its studies and activities around four focal points: (1) Unity and Renewal: ecclesial unity, inclusive community, theological education, worship, and spirituality; (2) Mission, Education, and Witness: evangelism, health and healing, gospel and culture, theological significance of religions, and dialogue with peoples of other world faiths; (3) Justice, Peace, and Creation: ethics and creation, racism, churches in solidarity with women and with youth, international affairs, development and socioeconomic justice, peace, and human rights; and (4) Sharing and Service: relief in emergencies and work with refugees, advocacy and action with the poor, sharing ecumenical resources, linking churches in service.

In these tasks the WCC works together with national and regional councils of churches, world confessional bodies such as the Lutheran World Federation, and other ecumenical groups.

Geneva is the headquarters of the WCC general secretariat and staff of about 270 persons. A 150-member central committee exercises governance between the general assemblies (every seven years) of delegates from each of the member churches (at Canberra in 1991, there were 842 delegates).

Prior to Vatican Council II (1962–65), the Catholic Church had kept deliberate distance from the WCC. Pope Pius XII (1939–58) forbade Catholics to attend its program meetings and assemblies. After Pope John XXIII founded the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity in 1960, he delegated official observers to the 1961 third general assembly (New Delhi). Paul VI in 1965 approved the Joint Working Group, an official consultative forum of the World Council of Churches and the Roman Catholic Church that initiates, evaluates, and sustains collaboration between its respective organizations and programs. Although not a member church, the Catholic Church participates in various ways in almost all WCC programs. For example, twelve Catholic theologians are full members of the Faith and Order commission.

The Catholic self-understanding as "a universal fellowship with a universal mission and structure," which differs from that of the mainly national churches in the WCC, was offered as the main (but not the only) reason why the Roman Catholic Church in 1972 declined to request WCC membership "in the immediate future." But Catholic membership might also have a destabilizing effect on the organization. Given its status as the world's largest church and the requirement of proportional representation, it would inevitably dominate all of the WCC's governing bodies.

The success of the WCC in carrying out its various purposes over four decades in ever-changing regional and world arenas has uncovered both the strengths and the weaknesses of ecumenism in the member and nonmember churches, as well as in the WCC. Called "a privileged instrument of the one ecumenical movement," the WCC in fact remains the focal point for positive evaluations and negative criticisms of the ecumenical movement itself: its vision and motivations, its intermediate goals, its activities, and its institutional forms. See also Church; ecumenical movement; ecumenism; unity of the Church.

THOMAS F. STRANSKY

worlds, possible, complete cosmic histories that might have taken place. The philosopher Leibniz (1646–1716) speculated that, apart from God's actual decision to create, God must know all such "possible worlds" and how much value would be realized in each. In virtue of that knowledge and of God's goodness, the actual world must then be the best of all possible worlds, containing the maximum achievable good despite the concomitant evil. This view has affinities with the theory of God's "middle knowledge" (Lat., scientia media), devised by the sixteenth-century Jesuit theologian Luis de Molina to reconcile the infallibility of divine providence with human freedom. Not all Catholic thinkers admit the feasibility of the concept of possible worlds or that of "middle knowledge," but many contemporary philosophers employ the former as a convenient way of discussing possibility and necessity as modes of being. See also creation; Molinism.

Worms, Diet of (1521), German Parliament that condemned Martin Luther. Summoned to the Diet after his condemnation by the papacy, Luther refused to retract any of his theology unless proven wrong by Scripture. On May 25 he was proclaimed an outlaw and went into ten-months' hiding at the Wartburg, a twelfth-century German castle. See also Luther, Martin.

worship (Old Eng., worth-ship, "honor"), the praise, thanksgiving, and acknowledgment given to God by believing individuals and communities through actions and words.

The Scriptural Notion of Worship: The Gospels describe Jesus as a devout Jew who participated in the worship of the synagogue and in the Temple feasts at Jerusalem. Recent scholarship has emphasized the importance of Jewish worship for understanding Jesus' unique prayer and some of the origins of early Christian worship. In Jesus' time, the sacrifice of animals was only performed at the Temple in Jerusalem. Sacrifice, whether of animals or food, was a major form of worship whose importance increased after the Babylonian exile (sixth century B.C.). Except for the high holy days, most Jews worshiped in their local synagogues where a prayer service was conducted in the morning, afternoon, and evening. The core of these services was short citations from Scripture and a series of blessings that originally may have been improvised. The daily Temple worship included the sacrifice of two male lambs as well as meal and drink offerings, the sacrifice of incense, and the burning of lamps. God's Commandments were recited as well as the scriptural citations and blessings used in the synagogue services. The most sacred part of the Temple, the Holy of Holies, with its ark of the covenant was the symbol of God's presence to and covenant with Israel. In brief, Israel's worship in Christ's time was expressed in a number of ways but was always addressed to the God of the covenant made with the Jewish people.

The uniqueness of Christian worship is expressed by comparison with Temple worship. The Letter to the Hebrews argues that since Christ's death was a perfect sacrifice, no further sacrifice is needed (Heb 9:11–12, 24–28). With his death, Christ became the unique High Priest who entered the Holy of Holies once for all to offer the perfect sacrifice. In place of the physical structure of the Temple, Christians had become the temple of God and a royal priesthood in which the Holy Spirit dwelt. Christ had established a new covenant (Heb 9:15). The people of this new covenant are continually to offer "a sacrifice of praise to God, that is, the fruit of lips that confess his name" (Heb 13:15).

The earliest Christians at Jerusalem continued the familiar Temple and synagogue worship while retaining their own communal forms of instruction and worship (Acts 2:42–47). The baptism of John had been transformed into a baptism into the death and Resurrection of Christ, and his last meal with his disciples before his death continued to be celebrated as a principal form of worship. In 1 Corinthians a new stage of development is described, occasioned by Paul's formation of Christian communities with both Jewish and gentile converts. Unlike their Jewish or pagan contemporaries, Christians had no sacred space such as a temple, not only because of practical reasons, but because the community itself was the Body of Christ. Worship was celebrated in "house churches," that is, usually the commodious homes of more affluent converts. The Greek term "to come together" assumes a special Christian meaning of a gathering to pray, sing, hear the Word of God, and celebrate the Lord's Supper. Scholars have pointed to examples of hymns probably used in early worship in the NT (Col 1:15–20; Eph 1:3–14; 1 Tim 3:16).

Paul's practical rule for solving problems of order in worship (e.g., the potential disruptive conduct of charismatic Christians) is simple: whatever is for the "upbuilding" of the community is permissible (1 Cor 14:26). In other words, Paul connects the worship of the community with its God-given tasks to announce the gospel and its message of reconciliation. In giving praise and thanks to God, the Christian community is enabled to live out the gospel message and give a credible witness to the world. These practical corollaries of worship are tested in the situations Paul faces in the Corinthian community. The Eucharist was normally preceded by a meal shared by rich and poor Christians. Inequalities in food and drink had caused divisions among these Christians (1 Cor 11:17–22). Paul draws the obvious conclusion: the Corinthians had missed the point of their worship. For Paul, all worship of God has been transformed by the death and Resurrection of Christ. With this event the new covenant marked by a redeeming oneness has been established: "Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body, for we all partake of the one bread" (1 Cor 10:17). Authentic worship brings about a unity of life and purpose that effectively announces the reign of God.

The Historical Development of Christian Worship: Aside from general references to worship and the celebration of Baptism and Eucharist, the NT does not offer great detail about the ways in which worship was carried out. In part this is due to the different cultural backgrounds of Christian communities spread throughout the Roman world and also to the improvised character of much Christian prayer. Even the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (third century) in giving the text of a eucharistic prayer reminds its readers that it is only an example of how the prayer might be improvised. In the fourth century, with the end of the persecutions and official recognition by the state, the Christian communities were free to develop their own traditions of worship and sacrament in their communities. The result was families of liturgical traditions in the East and West that incorporated the cultural traditions and the theological emphases of their communities.

Two trends mark the historical development of worship from the early Middle Ages to Vatican II (1962–65). First, the liturgical participation of the laity was gradually reduced to a passive role with ritual language and actions becoming the exclusive domain of clerics. Second, in addition to the sacraments of initiation, Baptism, Confirmation, and Eucharist, there was a gradual development of other sacramental expressions that were not definitively clarified as among seven sacraments until the Middle Ages. With the final demise of the catechumenate by the early Middle Ages, the preparation for worship and sacraments was no longer formed by catechumenal and symbolic training, and popular devotions began to replace communal worship as the mainstay of peoples' religious life.

Vatican II's Renewal of Worship: With the promulgation of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy in 1963, the council in its first document placed liturgical reform at the head of its pastoral agenda. It situated the dying and rising of Christ at the center of all worship and the presence of Christ in the Eucharist and the other sacraments, in the word of God, and in the assembly gathered for prayer. It called for a full, conscious, and active participation of all the faithful in liturgy and a reform of worship so that it would be more accessible to peoples of every culture. This liturgical reform has served as a model for other Christian churches as well. See also Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy; liturgical movement; liturgy; liturgy, theology of.

Bibliography

Duffy, Regis A. Real Presence, Worship, Sacrament, and Commitment. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1982.

Kavanagh, Aidan. On Liturgical Theology. New York: Pueblo, 1984.

Power, David. Worship: Culture and Theology. Washington, DC: Pastoral Press, 1990.

Vorgrimler, Herbert. Sacramental Theology. Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1992.

REGIS A. DUFFY

worship [in the Bible], actions in veneration or service of a deity. Throughout most of the history of Israel worship was carried out at sanctuaries scattered around the land. The biblical texts, archaeological data, and place names attest that, in addition to Yahweh, other deities were the object of veneration, especially those indigenous to Canaan (El, Asherah, Baal). Worship is essentially a public and social phenomenon, and we are not well informed about personal piety at any time during the biblical period. The principal form taken by worship was sacrifice, accompanied by prayer, which came to assume greater importance from the time of the Babylonian exile in the sixth century B.C. Psalms constitutes our principal source of information on prayer and, indirectly, the ritual acts of which it formed a part. The Deuteronomic program (Deut 12) restricted sacrifice to the Jerusalem Temple and its priesthood, though local cults continued in operation into the postexilic period. The details of worship were organized and codified by the Jerusalem priesthood (see esp. Leviticus and Numbers), creating a system that continued until the destruction of the Temple in A.D. 70. Early Christian worship preserved many of the forms and formulas of Jewish worship, which, however, were transformed by the new reality of Christ expressed in the ministries of word and sacrament. See also Bible and liturgy; sacrifice; worship.

Wounds, the Five Sacred, the wounds incurred by Jesus during his Passion and Crucifixion, namely the four nailmarks in his feet and hands and the lance wound in his side from the soldier's spear (John 19:34). Devotion to the Five Wounds has included special graphic emphasis on Christ's endurance of the pain of the cross and symbolic allusions to blood and water flowing from his side. See also crucifixion.

wrath of God, the metaphor of anger employed by the ancient Israelites to describe God's attitude toward sin. This anthropomorphism occurs in the OT when God is described as punishing sinners (Exod 15:7; Pss 2:12; 29:6) and also as inflicting trials upon the innocent (Job 14:13). The prophets, too, speak of God's anger toward Israel and Judah (Jer 25:7–38). This anthropomorphism is implied in the NT when Jesus says "Woe to you" (Matt 3:7). Paul speaks about the day of judgment as the "day of wrath" (Rom 2:5). The book of Revelation refers to "the wrath of the Lamb" and "the wrath of the Almighty God" (Rev 6:16; 19:15). See also judgment, general; judgment, particular.

Wright, John Joseph, 1909–79, American prelate. Bishop of Worcester, Massachusetts, 1950–59; bishop of Pittsburgh, 1959–69; cardinal, 1969; prefect, Sacred Congregation for the Clergy, 1969–79, Wright was the most prominent American ecclesiastic in Rome in the years following the Second Vatican Council (1962–65). He was a doctrinal conservative but a liberal on social issues.

Wycliffe, John, ca. 1329–84, Oxford theologian and critic of the temporal authority of the Church and much of Catholic theology. He insisted that the right to rule, in both state and Church, came from personal piety and not from the office, and on biblical grounds he rejected transubstantiation, purgatory, and indulgences. Twenty-four propositions from his writings were condemned by the Blackfriars Council called by the archbishop of Canterbury, William Courtenay, at London in 1382, yet he was never excommunicated and died of natural causes at Lutterworth. Because of his continuing influence among the Hussites and Lollards, his works were formally condemned by the Council of Constance (1414–17), and his remains were ordered by the council exhumed from consecrated ground and burned. See also indulgences; Lollards; Protestantism; purgatory; Reformation, the; transubstantiation.

Xavier, St. Francis. See Francis Xavier, St.

Xaverian Brothers, Brothers of St. Francis Xavier (C.F.X.), a community of laymen who take vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience and who participate in the Church's mission of evangelization. Theodore James Ryken, a Dutch layman, established the first community in Bruges, Belgium, in 1839 to serve the needs of the Church, especially in missionary countries. Over the last one hundred fifty years the Xaverian apostolates have included teaching on all levels; the running of homes for needy youth; college and university work in Belgium, England, and the United States and in mission areas of Zaire, Bolivia, Kenya; and home missionary work among Native Americans in South Dakota and African Americans in South Carolina. The brothers' ministries include religious and adult education, campus ministry, and prison ministry. Administrative centers are located in Milton, Massachusetts, and Ellicott City, Maryland. See also brothers, religious.

Ximénes de Cisneros, Francisco (zi-may'nez), 1436–1517, Spanish scholar and reformer. Confessor to Queen Isabella (1492), he became archbishop of Toledo (1495) and cardinal (1507). Pious and ascetic, he spiritually renewed the Spanish church by vigorously reforming monastic and mendicant orders. Cisneros advanced the goal of Spanish religious purity by expelling nonconverting Moors in Francisco Ximénes de Cisneros on horseback and in cardinal's attire leading a Spanish force into Oran, Morocco (1509); sixteenth-century Juan de Borgoña mural in the Mozarabic Chapel, Cathedral of Toledo, Spain.

1502 and supporting the Inquisition. He became grand inquisitor of Castile in 1507. As a scholar, Cisneros produced a landmark in biblical studies: the Complutensian Polyglot Bible, which consisted of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew versions of the Bible arranged side by side; it was the first Christian edition of the Hebrew Scriptures. See also Complutensian Polyglot Bible.

Yahweh, a name used for God in the OT. It was revealed to Moses, to whom God is identified as "I am who I am" (Exod 3:14)—a wordplay on Yahweh. It is an archaic form of the Hebrew verb "to be" and may mean "he causes to be." Many OT names are compounded with abbreviated forms of Yahweh such as -iah (e.g., Hezekiah) or Jeho- (e.g., Jehoshaphat). Later the name was considered too sacred to pronounce and other words, especially the word adonai ("my Lord"), were substituted for it. It was then translated into Greek as kyrios ("Lord") and subsequently into English as Lord.

year, liturgical. See liturgical year.

YMCA (Young Men's Christian Association), community-service agency sponsoring educational and recreational activities. Founded by George Williams in 1844 as a nondenominational organization to spread Protestant evangelicalism among young men in London, the YMCA no longer has an explicitly religious mission. For that reason Catholics are no longer discouraged from membership as they once were. Today it serves 30 million people in 110 nations. In the United States it has over two thousand local organizations.

yoga (Sanskrit, "union"), Eastern methods (with origins in Hinduism) for union with God. They include selfless action, physical postures, controlling vital energies, and meditation. Yogic techniques, originating in India and first codified by Patanjali in about the second century B.C., characterize much Asian spirituality. Various yogic disciplines have been adapted to Christian spiritual practice.

Yom Kippur (Heb.), the Day of Atonement. Special sin offerings marked this holiest day of the Jewish year (Lev 16). According to Heb 9, it prefigured Jesus' sacrificial death. The day is still celebrated as the holiest Jewish holiday of the year on the tenth day of Tishri (September–October).

Yorke, Peter C., 1864–1925, Irish-born priest, educator, and labor leader. Ordained in Baltimore for the diocese of San Francisco in 1887, he gained legendary status by vanquishing the anti-Catholic American Protective Association, acting as union spokesman during the successful teamster strike of 1901, founding and editing the Irish newspaper The Leader, publishing a series of textbooks on religion, and supporting the fight for a free Irish state.

Young Men's Christian Association. See YMCA.

Young Women's Christian Association. See YWCA.

Yugoslavian Byzantine Catholic Church. See Byzantine Catholic Church of the Diocese of Krizhevci.

YWCA (Young Women's Christian Association), community service agency sponsoring educational and recreational activities for girls and women. Founded in London in 1877 to assist young women without family support, the YWCA originally promoted the values of Protestant evangelicalism. Today the organization serves people regardless of religious faith in eighty nations; there are four hundred affiliates in the United States.

Zabarella, Francesco, 1360–1417, Italian canonist. He wrote standard commentaries on the twelfth-century Decretals of Gratian. He supported antipope John XXIII (1410–15), who created him a cardinal, and held conciliarist views. His collection of proposals for ending the Great Schism, De schismate (Lat., "On schism"), was placed on the Index of Forbidden Books because the work placed the power of a general council over that of a pope. See also conciliarism; Great Schism.

Zacharias, St., d. 752, pope from 741 to 752. A supporter of St. Boniface, Zacharias defended images against the iconoclast emperor Constantine Copronymus and translated Gregory the Great's Dialogues into Greek. Feast day: March 15 (West, formerly); September 5 (East). See also iconoclasm.

Zachary [name of pope]. See Zacharias, St.

Zahm, John Augustine, 1851–1921, Holy Cross priest and professor at the University of Notre Dame. He was the author of Evolution and Dogma (1896), which argued that evolution was compatible with Catholic teaching. It was condemned by Rome, largely because Zahm had identified himself too closely with the liberal faction in the controversies then raging over "Americanism," the loosely structured movement that sought to accommodate Catholic faith and practice to American culture. See also Americanism.

Zealots, a Jewish group or party that played a prominent part in the revolt against Rome (A.D. 66–70). They may have begun in A.D. 6 under Judas the Galilean. They appear to have agreed with the Pharisees in many respects but differed from them in their violent refusal to serve anyone as lord or king except God. Their opposition to Roman rule, which may have continued sporadically after A.D. 6, exploded just before and at the beginning of the revolt when Zealots took Jerusalem and Masada. Luke 6:15 names a disciple of Jesus "Simon, who was called the Zealot."

Zechariah, father of John the Baptist. According to Luke 1:5–25, 57–80, Zechariah, while performing priestly duties in the Temple, learned of John's forthcoming birth from the angel Gabriel. Temporary dumbness answered his doubting request for a sign. Upon his son's birth and naming, Zechariah recovered his speech and pronounced the prophetic oracle now known as the Benedictus. See also John the Baptist, St.

Zen Buddhism, a blend of early Buddhism with Taoism. This mainly Japanese form of Mahayana Buddhism has two major schools. Soto Zen teaches meditating with simple awareness of all one's experiences. Rinzai Zen uses "koans," mental puzzles defying rational solution, to bring experience of the mind's limitations.

Zen's goal is enlightenment, direct experience of reality simply as it is. This nonconceptual state is beyond dualism. It destroys ego-centeredness and flows naturally into compassion. It is sometimes called sunyata (emptiness) or tathata (thusness), and is seen by some Christian practitioners as analogous to the unmanifest Godhead. Some Jesuit priests are Zen masters.

Zeno of Verona, St., d. 375, bishop of Verona in northern Italy from 362 to 375. A collection of ninety homilies, divided into two unequal books and primarily liturgical and exhortatory in nature, is attributed to him. Feast day: April 12.

zeon (zay'ahn; Gk., "hot"), the custom, peculiar to the Byzantine rite, of adding hot water to the consecrated chalice just before Communion. The origins of the custom are obscure, but it was usual for the ancients to drink wine cut with hot water. Later liturgical symbolism interprets the zeon to mean that in Communion one receives the warm blood of the living, Risen Christ. See also Communion, Holy.

Zephyrinus, St., d. 217, pope from 198/9 to 217. Information about him comes mostly from the hostile testimony of Hippolytus, bitter enemy of Callistus, Zephyrinus's close associate and successor. Hippolytus alleges that Zephyrinus was uneducated and a virtual Modalist, even though he excommunicated two Monarchians (both named Theodotus) for heresy. Origen visited Rome during Zephyrinus's pontificate. Feast day: August 26.

Zion, a hill symbolizing Jerusalem and its Temple. Zion designated the Jebusite city captured by David (2 Sam 5:6–10), then the Temple Mount immediately to the north (Pss 2:6; 46:4; 78:68–69). In the Byzantine era the name came to designate a ridge southwest of the current walled city, traditional site of David's tomb and the Last Supper. See also Jerusalem; Temple.

Zita, St., 1218–78, Italian-born patron saint of domestic servants. She herself was in domestic service for forty-eight years. Feast day: April 27.

zone (zoh'nay; Gk., "cincture"), a belt of vestment cloth used as the liturgical cincture in the Byzantine and Armenian rites. See also cincture.

Zoroastrianism, religion of ancient Persia founded by Zoroaster (Zarathustra, sixth century B.C.), who reformed an older warrior-based cult related to the Vedic religion of India. Zoroaster's religion was, within the confines of an ultimate monotheism, dualistic and antisacrificial. After a period when the old cult was reintroduced, it was reformed and systematized under the Sassanids (from the third century A.D.). Small groups of believers still survive in India, Iran, and the United States.

Zosimus, St., d. 418, pope from 417 to 418. Revoking Innocent I's condemnation, Zosimus readmitted Pelagius and Celestius to communion (417), but under pressure from the African bishops he reversed himself, provoking Julian of Eclanum's schism. Feast day: December 26.

zucchetto, a skullcap worn since the thirteenth century by bishops, cardinals, and the pope. The color indicates the rank of the wearer: purple (bishop), scarlet (cardinal), white (the pope), and black (others, such as abbots).

Zwingli, Ulrich, 1484–1531, Reformer of Zurich. Educated in Basel, Bern, and Vienna and ordained in 1506, he served as priest in Glarus and then at Einsiedeln. In Einsiedeln he came under the influence of Erasmus. Zwingli's reputation as a powerful humanist preacher grew and he was called to be People's Preacher at the Great Minster in Zurich (1519). By 1522, Zwingli emerged as an evangelical Reformer, preaching Christ crucified as the sole source of grace and the gospel in Scripture as the sole norm of truth, against what he perceived to be the abuses of the Catholic Church. Stirred by his preaching, the people of Zurich called for reform, which was taken up by the city council of Zurich in two debates (January and October 1523), both of which upheld the reform agenda of Zwingli while claiming sole authority for its implementation. By 1525, canon law was annulled, images and organs were removed from churches, monasteries were dissolved, and the Latin Mass was replaced by a Lord's Supper in German. From 1525 to his death in the Second Battle of Kappel in 1531, Zwingli was involved in constant controversy. Against the Catholic and Lutheran theologians, Zwingli argued that the sacraments do not confer grace. Nor is the body of Christ present in the Lord's Supper, given Jesus' statement that "the flesh is useless" (John 6:63) and the article of faith that he has ascended to the right hand of the Father. Philip of Hesse tried and failed to attain unity on this issue between Luther and Zwingli at the Marburg Colloquy of 1529, leaving Zwingli isolated at the Diet of Augsburg (1530), where he was forced to submit his own account of faith for Zurich. See also Protestantism; Real Presence; Reformation, the.

Alinari/Art Resource, NY: 53, 90, 117, 134, 140, 144, 191, 235 (left), 260 (upper left), 305, 507 (upper), 539, 551 (upper), 596, 608 (detail), 610, 649 (middle right, detail), 669 (detail), 685 (lower left), 716 (detail), 743 (upper), 752, 764, 773, 776, 830, 895 (right), 949 (upper), 972, 973 (detail), 974, 1000, 1166 (detail), 1263, 1269, 1293 (lower), 1318; Kirk Amyx: 869; courtesy Archives Canada: 903 (lower, detail), 920; T. Arruza/Image Works: 873; Art Resource, NY: 1005; Alan Becker/Image Bank: 1282; Bettmann Archive: 35, 158 (left), 213, 231, 707, 925 (middle), 929, 1163 (right), 1170; Boltin Picture Library, Georges Rouault: 695; Bord Fáilte: 381; Bridgeman Art Library, London: 388, 599 (middle, detail), 631 (detail), 632 (detail), 649 (lower left), 653, 949 (lower, detail), 990, 1013 (detail); Bridgeman Art Library/Art Resource, NY: 1331, Dan Budnik/Woodfin Camp: 1145 (middle left), 1155; Bulloz: 507 (middle), 531, 591; Karen Callaway/Catholic News Service: 1119; Cap-Viollet: 1131; Luis Castañeda/Image Bank: 1212, 1145 (middle right); Catholic News Service: 153, 208, 234, 351, 386, 387, 389, 395, 437 (upper), 475, 483, 486, 627, 708, 740, 744, 828, 856, 898, 976, 1144, 1164, 1188, 1213, 1239 (bottom), 1239 (middle right), 1243 (right), 1259, 1299, 1300, 1303, 1305; Kay Chernush/Image Bank: 556; Collection Viollet: 903 (upper), 913, 1004 (right), 1207; Crosiers/Catholic News Service: 487, 1123, 1283, 1284, 1333; Michael Dyer/Stock Boston: 1288; John Eastcott/Yva Momatiok/Image Works: 1275, 1276; Victor Englebert: 756, 825; Fabian/Sygma: 713 (left); Fathers of London Oratory/ Bridgeman Art Library/Art Resource, NY: 925 (upper), 935; Les Fetchko/Catholic News Service: 1286; Chuck Fishman/Leo de Wys, NY: 36; Mimi Forsyth/Catholic News Service: 59; Foto Marburg/Art Resource, NY: 278, 551 (lower), 589, 731 (upper), 733, 743 (middle), 774, 798, 803 (middle), 806, 817, 843; Stuart Franklin/Magnum Photos: 306, 428; Fratelli Bonella: 599 (lower), 618 (upper left, upper right); Robert Frerck/Woodfin Camp: 595; Frick Collection, NY: Giovanni Bellini, Saint Francis in the Desert: 542; Hans Holbein: 893; Robert Fried/Stock Boston: 137; Gene Plaisted/Crosiers/Catholic News Service: 61, 348, 437 (middle), 446, 840, 1120; Alexis Georgeon/Gamma Liaison: 375, 1265; Gerhard Gscheidle/Image Bank: 860; Giordani/Catholic News Service: 1002; Giraudon/Art Resource, NY: 325 (right), 383 (lower right), 391 (upper, detail), 413 (detail), 430, 576, 698, 1145 (upper), 1153 (left), 1168, 1208, 1260; Ulysse Gosset/Sygma: 685 (middle), 688; Spenser Grant/Photo Researchers: 823; Jeff Greenberg/Photo Researchers: 945; Harlingue-Viollet: 1243 (left); Michael Hoyt/Catholic News Service: 600, 731 (lower), 738; Hulton Deutsch Collection Limited: 151, 652, 678, 862 (right), 1184; courtesy International Melkite Catholic Union: 844; J. B. Co.: 618 (lower); Bob Kalman/Image Works: 182; Shinichi Kanno/FPG International: 1154 (lower left); Lisa Kessler/Catholic News Service: 665; KNA-Bild-Rollik/Catholic News Service: 796, KNA-Bild/Catholic News Service: 742, 1073 (lower), 1077, 1079, 1137, 1176; Lauros-Giraudon/Art Resource, NY (detail): 125 (middle), 170; Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY: 15, 31, 56, 64, 74, 132, 158 (right), 235 (right), 260 (lower right), 325 (left), 360, 380 (lower right), 601, 629, 650, 651, 690, 697, 751, 799 (detail), 803 (lower), 805, 832, 834, 838, 895 (left), 991, 1073 (middle), 1103, 1108, 1138 (right), 1154 (upper left), 1163 (left), 1293 (upper), 1308; Mary Ellen Mark: 1239 (middle left), 1246; Alvin T. Marriott/Catholic News Service: 989; J. Messerschmidt/Leo de Wys, Inc.: 2; Metropolitan Museum of Art: Andrea della Robbia, Harris Brisbane Dick Fund, 1960, (60.127.2): 862 (left); Antonello da Messina, The Friedsam Collection, Bequest of Michael Friedsam, 1931, (32.100.82): 382; Antonio Rossellino, Kennedy Fund, 1911, (11.136.1-5): 377; Fletcher Fund, 1947, (47.100.54): 383 (lower left); Fletcher Fund, 1950, (50.5.3): 380 (upper right); Fra Filippo Lippi, Rogers Fund, 1935, (35.31.1A): 759; Frederick J. Brown, The Ascension, Edith C. Blum Fund, 1983, (83.259): 1 (lower, detail), 99; Gift of J. Pierpont Morgan, 1917, (17.190.38): 437 (lower), 493; Gift of J. Pierpont Morgan, 1917, (17.190.409): 207 (lower right), 383 (upper right); Guido Reni, The Immaculate Conception, Victor Wilbour Memorial Fund, 1959, (59.32): 649 (upper left, detail), 655 (detail); Mr. & Mrs. Isaac D. Fletcher Collection, Bequest of Isaac D. Fletcher, 1917, (17.120.1): 1222; Pierre Raymond, Fletcher Fund, 1945, (45.60.10): 636; Pol, Jean and Herman de Limbourg, St. Francis Receiving the Stigmata, Purchase 1954, The Cloisters Collection, (54.1.1 folio 171): 1224; Robert Campin, The Annunciation, The Cloisters Collection, 1956, (56.70): 718; The Cloisters Collection, 1963, (63.12): 380 (lower left); The Cloisters Collection, 1977, (77.421): 717; Peter Menzel/Stock Boston: 861; Jean Paul Nacivet/Leo de Wys, NY: 1190; New York Public Library, Picture Collection: 590 (left); Michael J. Okoniewski/Image Works: 1334; Oroñoz: 592; David Perry/Catholic News Service: 207 (middle), 338; Van Phillips/Leo de Wys, NY: 1153 (right); courtesy Pilgrimage Saint Thérèse of Lisieux: 1252; Chuck Place/Image Bank: 871; James Raca/Catholic News Service: 887; Alon Reininger/Leo de Wys, NY: 714 (right); Kate Relches/Catholic News Service: 1228; Roger-Viollet, Paris: 712, 1004 (left); courtesy Sacred Heart Fathers, Fairhaven, MA: 391 (lower), 392; SAK/Art Resource, NY: 127; Nicolas Sapieha/Art Resource, NY: 113; Scala/Art Resource, NY: 1 (upper), 28, 44, 46, 62, 63, 87, 94, 104, 107, 115, 125 (upper left, detail), 142 (detail), 145, 189, 192, 207 (lower left), 238, 260 (lower left), 277, 301, 312, 322, 376 (detail), 383 (upper left), 545, 551 (middle), 575, 590 (right), 667, 703, 839, 1154 (lower right), 1200, 1270; Sebastiao Salgado, Jr./Magnum Photos: 743 (lower), 755; SEF/Art Resource, NY: 765; M. Siragusa/SABA: 1233; Snark International/Art Resource, NY: 692; St. Joseph's Provencial House, Emmitsburg, MD (detail): 1145 (bottom); 1186; St. Patrick's Cathedral: 966; Joel Stettenheim/SABA: 20; State Historical Society of Wisconsin: 734; Diana Thewlis: 1 (middle), 27, 42, 102, 125 (lower), 178, 187, 197, 207 (upper), 233, 296, 303, 317, 318, 326, 367, 379, 381, 384, 391 (middle), 417, 471, 507 (lower), 534, 599, 644, 731 (middle), 732, 803 (upper), 810, 811, 876, 890, 949 (middle), 951 (left, right), 1048, 1073 (upper), 1138 (left), 1232, 1239 (upper), 1240, 1255, 1256; University of Notre Dame: 594, 613, 745, 903 (middle), 921; UPI/Bettmann: 685 (upper left), 709; Vanni/Art Resource, NY: 302; Victoria & Albert Museum, London/Art Resource, NY: 148; Joe Viesti/Viesti Associates: 881; Vyatkin Eastnet/SABA: 925 (lower), 944; D. Wells/The Image Works: 186; Nancy Wiechec/Catholic News Service: 1287; Laurie Platt Winfrey, Inc.: 1321 (detail), 1343.

Color photographs following page 506.

Artephot/Nimatallah: A6-20; Boltin Picture Library: A1-2, A1-3; Bridgeman Art Library: A4-9; Catholic News Service: A8-29, A8-32; Fine Arts Museums of San Francisco, Peter Paul Rubens, The Tribute Money, purchased with funds from various donors, (44.11) (detail): A1-1; Giraudon/Art Resource, NY: A4-10, A5-18, A6-21; Kavaler/Art Resource, NY: A6-23; Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY: A2-5, A3-6; Scala/Art Resource, NY: A1-4, A3-7, A3-8, A4-11, A4-13, A5-14, A5-15, A5-16, A6-19, A6-22, A7-24, A7-25, A7-27; St. Patrick's Cathedral: A4-12; Steve Vidler/Leo de Wys, NY: A8-31; UPI/Bettmann: A8-30; Vaticano/Palazzo Apostolico Lateranense: A7-28; Vaticano/Scala Regia: A5-17; Will McIntyre/Photo Researchers: A7-26.

Color photographs following page 730.

Alinari/Art Resource, NY: B3-10; Maher Attar/Sygma: B7-29, B7-30; Jim Cantrell/International Thomas Merton Society, Bellarmine College, Louisville, KY: B5-21; Bob Daemmrich/Stock Boston: B5-20; Victor Englebert: B6-24; B6-28. Christopher Fitzgerald/Catholic News Service: B8-38; Robert Frerck/Woodfin Camp: B6-26; Georgetown University Art Collection, Washington, DC: B5-19; Giraudon/Art Resource, NY: B3-11; Piero Guerrini/Woodfin Camp: B8-36; Michael J. Howell/Leo de Wys, NY: B4-16; M. Jacob/Image Works: B7-32; Kees/Sygma: B7-31; J. P. Laffont/Sygma: B7-33; Erich Lessing/Art Resource, NY: B1-1, B1-2, B1-3, B1-5, B2-6, B2-7, B2-9, B3-13, B8-34; Paul Lowen/Image Bank: B6-23; Steve Maines/Stock Boston: B6-27; Metropolitan Museum of Art, The Friedsam Collection, Bequest of Michael Friedsam, 1931, (32.100.226): B1-4; Brother Paul/Gethsemane Farms: B4-17; Scala/Art Resource, NY: B2-8; 3-12, 8-35; Sepp Seitz/Woodfin Camp: B8-37; St. Joseph's Provincial House: B5-18; Dennis Tillman/Image Bank: B4-14; University of Notre Dame: B4-15, B5-22; Joe Viesti/Viesti Associates: B6-25.

PHOTO RESEARCH BY PHOTOSEARCH, INC., NEW YORK.